Hazel eyes sparkled as she teased, “Of course you’ll miss me . . . I’m your kickass, totally awesome big sister. You will totes miss me.” Winking at him fondly, she continued, “And I’ll miss you too . . . but that’s what Facebook and Skype are for. We’ll talk so much, you won’t even have time to miss me. I promise.”
Translations;
(R) Chertenok - imp
(R) khishchnick - little hawk (literally "little bird of prey"; Bucky's nickname for Clint)
(R) Bog, ya tebya obozhayu. - God, I adore you.
(R) pereshmeshnika - mockingbird
(R) moy lyubimov - my love
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) Yasha - the Russian form of "James"
I would like to apologize for how long it has taken me to finish this. It's the end of semester, and my professor dropped seven assignments on us in three weeks. (If there's anything I hate more than procrastinating partners, it's procrastinating professors.) But semester is almost over, and all I have to do now is study for the final. Which is kind of a relief, because I do really well on tests. wipes forehead phew!

Either way, I do apologize for the lateness of this chapter. I hope you enjoy this chapter and I do look forward to reading your reviews.

Translations at the end, same as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 144: Family Ties Take 2

It was a rare thing for Marina Ivanovna Petrovka to be truly angry. To date, it was commonly accepted – at least among those who knew of her more than checkered past – that the only people who had ever been able to achieve the emotion were the Brothers Grimm – who she loved with a tender fierceness and who had the ability to make her lose her temper faster than anyone else in the world – followed closely by Ric Byer, the Krasnaya Komnata and a group of long dead drug runners in Peru who had put a series of bullets into her lover and paid the ultimate price for the offense.

But currently, that was exactly what she was; she was obozlenyy pokinut’. She came storming into the S.H.I.E.L.D. training center and headed straight towards the cluster of people standing around one of the training mats. Her lover was in the middle of the mat, stripped of his shoes, the S.H.I.E.L.D. embossed track pants clinging to the sculpted muscles of his thighs and plain muscle tee soaked in sweat. One arm was held tightly across his chest, the hump of his joint clearly out of place, while the other hand was up in front of his face as he watched his opponents advance. Despite his dislocated shoulder, his face was mostly unmarred though there would probably be portions of his torso mottled into bruising before much longer.

There were three junior agents arrayed in front of him, each of them watching S.H.I.E.L.D.’s senior analyst with predatory eyes. It was clear that they each thought his injury was going to be the end of him and the fight in general; despite the overwhelming sense of protectiveness in her gut, she almost wanted to see the three of them on the ground as her beloved Colonel wiped the floor with their asses, one handed or not.

Stepping forward to stop the fight, her mouth opening to yell out, she was waylaid only by the sudden appearance of Brian Grimm at her left, his hand gripping the curve of her elbow hard.

“Don’t,” he insisted quietly.

Marina glowered at her charge for a moment, before turning her attention back onto the fight. The four combatants were still sizing each other up, Will Grimm’s sides heaving as he sucked in as much air as he could manage as they waited. One of the baby agents grinned as he noticed, taunting the older man loudly, “What’s the matter, old man . . . getting too old for this?”

The Russian’s jaw clenched furiously and it was all Brian could do to keep her stationary at his side. It was only a few moments before Natasha joined him, both agents struggling to keep her from izbiyeniye der’mo out of the insolent little punk. Somehow, the Colonel saw her out of the corner of his eye and spoke quietly, the tone low but insistent, “Marishka . . . stay out of this, dong ma?”

At the name, all three spun with wide, terrified eyes to face the woman. “Agent Petrovka!” the one squeaked, earning a chilling grin from the Russian.

“Pay attention, mudak,” she hissed, settling back on one heel comfortably. Despite her need to protect her lover, there was no way in hell that she was going to step in to stop this fight. She was going to watch her partner wipe the floor with them . . . and then yell at the stubborn idiot until he was deaf.

Will’s grin slipped across his lips like flashfire, before he whistled sharply and drew the reluctant attention of the three junior agents. “You heard the woman . . . pay attention, kids. Wouldn’t want to give the ‘old man’ an unfair advantage now would we?”

Eyes flashing back and forth between Marina and Will, it wasn’t hard to see the one training agent swallow hard. The fact that the two were lovers wasn’t exactly common knowledge, but it was still very heavily implied. They had definitely picked the wrong person to pick a fight with . . . and both of them were determined to make sure that they remembered it.

It was immediately obvious the second that the three morons decided to take their defeat like men. Their backs lengthened, their shoulders straightened and they refocused once again on the Colonel. They glanced at each other briefly, before launching what would have been a successful attack if Will hadn’t been waiting for it. The rest of the room was in awe as Will moved like a well-oiled machine, his one hand blocking punches while his feet found vulnerable places in their defenses.

The whole fight took maybe five minutes, and when it was over, Will stood over the prone bodies of his opponents. His shoulders heaved as he dragged in air, though his face was completely unreadable as he stared down at them. Brian chuckled as he leaped up onto the mat next to his brother, clapping him gently on his uninjured shoulder, before turning to face his training class. “So who wants to take a guess at what these idiots did wrong?”

There was a long moment of silence, before someone spoke up quietly from the middle of the pack. “Tried to win a fight against Agent Brandt?” was the sarcastic question, causing a round of nervous twitters from the rest of the trainees and another reply of, “Pissed off Agent Petrovka?” This prompted the shouted question of, “Is there only one right answer to this question?”

Natasha laughed softly from where she still stood next to Marina, her arms folding over her chest. “How about assuming that an injury was going to weaken their opponent? Or not pressing their advantage when they had the chance . . . giving him the chance to regroup and remount his defenses?”

As the class began to throw out theories, Marina turned to Natasha and cocked an eyebrow in question. The redhead grinned in response, waving a hand in Will’s direction. Now that the fight was over, the adrenaline was starting to fade and the eldest Grimm was starting to weave on his feet. Shoving her way through the crowd, the Russian leaped effortlessly onto the mat and came to loop one arm gingerly around her partner’s waist. Lifting his head he gave her a tired grin, asking, “So how’d I do?”

“Oh Mishka . . . vy debil,” she scolded fondly, shaking her head as she braced him up and helped guide him out of the training center. It was only when they were nearly at the door that Marina paused and called back over her shoulder, “Moreau . . . Simon . . . and Ward . . . I expect to see you all in my office by 8 am tomorrow morning. Do I make myself clear?”

The groans from the three trainees were silent but nevertheless still audible as each replied promptly, “Yes ma’am.”

It was a silent walk out to the car, the indentations from Marina’s teeth getting deeper in her lower lip as she guided her lover to their practically ancient Army Jeep. Settling him in the passenger seat was a little tricky in that each of them was being a little more careful with the dislocated shoulder than was probably strictly necessary. But eventually, Marina hoisted herself into the driver’s seat and turned the engine over. Glancing at her partner out of the corner of one eye as she shifted gears, she asked calmly, “Do you need Medical?”

When Will’s only reply was, “I’ve had worse . . . take me home,” Marina literally felt herself sag with relief.

If she was being honest about it, she would be forced to admit that she felt sick to know that it was a relief when such a serious injury was not so serious that he hadn’t suffered through a more serious injury in the past. Nodding resolutely, Marina reached out to smooth her fingers back through the short strands at his temples before turning towards home. When they arrived, it was to the sight of Marina’s motorcycle and Aaron’s truck parked in the driveway.
Will frowned at the sight, grunting as he heaved himself from the car with his one good hand. “That was a short trip.”

The Russian’s eyes narrowed as she contemplated the two vehicles. The motorcycle was parked in the driveway itself, instead of still strapped down in the bed of Aaron’s truck. And seeing as Jason had gone back to his apartment after being cleared for duty, they’d just left Brian at the training center, Hansel was in Germany and both Bucky & Clint were still in Miami that could only mean one thing . . . “They brought someone home with them.”

The Colonel frowned at the information, though his eyes were smiling as she braced herself under his good arm as they started up the walkway towards the house. “How do you know?”

“Aaron drove the bike home . . . it’s the only way the bike wouldn’t be in the truckbed. Aaron’s strong, but even he would have needed help getting it out of the bed.”

Humming in quiet agreement, Will watched as the front door swung inwards and Marta appeared in the doorway. The virologist grinned at them both, though her face froze at the sight of Will’s battered torso and obviously dislocated shoulder. “Oh my God . . . Aaron get out here! Colonel, what happened!”

Will’s reply was a pained grunt as Aaron slipped around his girlfriend and came out to help Marina get him inside. “Training accident. It happens.”

Marina’s smile was fond as she winked at Aaron, the two easing Will down onto the living room couch. They’d barely gotten him settled before Marta was shoving them aside to be able to perform a preliminary medical examination on the bruised and battered Grimm. “Considering how frequently they happen in this family, though, it was really nice of you to fall for a doctor, Kenny,” the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler teased, even as she was tilting up her cheek to accept his kiss.

“Eh . . . I figured it was my turn to take one for the team,” he laughed, winking at Marta to take the sting out of the tease.

“Ha ha, very funny,” she snarked, her eyes narrowing at him for a moment, before a sharp wince from her patient drew her full attention once again.

Reaching out to take Aaron’s forearm and tug him gently out of Marta’s line of fire, the two watched for a long moment before Marina finally asked, “So who is the stray you brought home with you this time?”

Aaron grinned, cheeks coloring sheepishly. “How did you know?”

“I have known you for a long time. Not to mention, you couldn’t have gotten the bike out of the truck bed by yourself. And Marta’s too delicate to be able to handle that kind of weight. I’m going to guess that you had too many people coming home with you, to be able to fit them all in the cab of the truck comfortably.” Folding her arms over her chest, she grinned up at him with a wink as she asked again, “So . . . who is it? Another Russian assassin? A mad scientist? A long-forgotten war hero?”

Grimacing lightly, he asked rhetorically, “Can it be a kind of fucked up version of the last one?”

Will’s eyes narrowed at the question, his tone low and suspicious as he asked, “And what, exactly, is that supposed to mean?”

Holding up a hand to signal his brother to wait, Aaron turned towards the stairs and called quietly, “All right, Sam . . . you can stop hiding on the stairs now!”
At the familiarity and the fondness in Aaron’s voice, Marina’s eyebrows furrowed in question. When a young blond man, with one eye circled in a horrific bruise, appeared on the stairwell, the expression in his eyes yanked viciously on her heartstrings. She had seen that shattered, broken look in the eyes of more than one of her own boys – Bucky and Owen included – over the years. Scanning her eyes up and down his frame, she took in how desperately thin he was as well as the half-faded bruises encircling one wrist. The boy stopped at the base of the steps, blue eyes watching the occupants of the room warily, his eyes constantly trailing back to Marta and Aaron for reassurance.

Glancing at Aaron, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler smiled at her solnyshko before moving slowly towards the boy. Making sure to keep her hands where he could see them, she spoke soothingly, “Hello Sam . . . my name is Marina . . . Aaron is one of my boys. It’s nice to meet you.”

Sam’s eyes narrowed slightly at the statement, causing Aaron to explain from behind her, “Remember what I told you about my sister? Marina has raised me since I was a baby. You can trust her . . . promise.”

Folding her hands in front of her, she gave the young man a sunny smile and asked, “You look starving . . . I think I have some homemade chicken pot pie in the fridge. Would you like some?”

Glancing at his aunt, comforted by the smile and nod he received, he looked back down at the diminutive woman in front of him. “I could eat.”

A genuinely maternal smile broke across her face then and she took his hand tenderly, her free hand patting the back gently. “Well then . . . come with me and we shall get thee fed, hm?”

Instantly set at ease by both the woman’s genuine affection and the obvious trust in Aaron’s eyes, Sam nodded once in acquiescence, letting her lead him towards her kitchen and the promised meal. It was only when Will was certain that they were both out of earshot that he chuckled, drawling, “I had wondered how THAT tradition would continue.”

“What tradition?” Marta asked frowning at him, her fingers deft on his shoulder for a moment before a sharp wrench popped the Colonel’s shoulder back into place. The man grimaced briefly, even as he nodded his thanks, his shoulder rotating around the joint to loosen the lingering tightness.

“Well, it’s not so much a tradition as an unspoken fact of life,” Will conceded with a smile, the expression turning mischievous and knowing as he chuckled, “Marina’s Home for Misfit Boys.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(Russian) Krasnaya Komnata - The Red Room
(Russian) obozlennyy pokinut' - pissed off
(Russian) izbiyeniye der’mo - beating the shit
(Chinese) dong ma? - understand?
(Russian) mudak - asshole
(Russian) vy debil - you moron
(Russian) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina’s nickname for Aaron/Kenny)
Chapter 145: The Island of Misfit Toys

Aaron chuckled in understanding, even as Marta asked incredulously, “‘Misfit Boys’? I don’t understand.”

The Colonel smiled as he shrugged lightly, “I realize you haven’t been apart of this family for all that long, but Marina has always been happiest when she has someone to take care of.” Pushing himself gingerly to his feet, he moved cautiously into the kitchen, the injured arm braced unconsciously against his chest. “Unfortunately, her first group of boys are all grown up and don’t really need her to take care of them anymore.”

Aaron’s arms came looping around Marina’s shoulder as he teased, “Don’t let her appearance fool you . . . Marina’s really a little old Russian grandmother.”

Marina glowered at her second youngest charge, punching him lightly in the shoulder as she snapped, “And when exactly did I turn 60?”

Will’s tone was matter-of-fact as he replied, “Five years ago.”

Rounding on her lover, she jabbed him sharply in the solar plexus, growling, “Hush you . . . or you can make up the fold out for yourself tonight.”

Looping his arms around her waist, he hauled her to him as he pressed a fervent kiss to his favorite place on her throat, murmuring into the shell of her ear, “You are the sexiest 65 year old I have ever seen, and I can’t wait to get you into bed tonight just so I can prove it to you.”
The Russian’s chocolate eyes were contemplative, completely ignoring the sound of Aaron’s gagging in the background. The weight of Sam’s eyes on her back was obvious as she twisted to press a warm kiss to her partner’s lips, whispering against the skin, “I’m looking forward to it.”

Grinning at her slyly, the Colonel pressed a sharp kiss to her lips, before moving towards the kitchen cupboard to fish out the whiskey and the ibuprofen, throwing back four of the little pills with a highball of Glenfiddich. Marina’s eyes narrowed at the action, though she said nothing. Whatever Marta had been about to say was halted by Aaron’s hand coming around her forearm and a firm shake of the DOD assassin’s head. Therefore, it was a surprise when Sam’s voice spoke up timidly from where Marina had placed him with a heaping plate of potpie and one of Bucky’s long untouched beers. “Don’t they recommend that you don’t take ibuprofen with alcohol?”

Will turned from where he was putting the bottle back in the cabinet, the half-full highball swirling easily in one hand as he leaned back against the sink. Mercurial eyes were a warm gray as he nodded in agreement, laughing, “Written on the bottle and everything.”

The question was clear in Sam’s eyes as he asked, “Then why?”

Marina snickered as the Colonel laughed, clapping him on the shoulder fondly, “Because I can assure you, Sam . . . it isn’t going to be an alcohol-ibuprofen interaction that’s going to kill me.”

The Russian’s eyes rolled as she snarked, “He’s entirely too stubborn for that . . . heights though . . . heights may be the killer.”

At the very suggestion, Will shuddered sharply in revulsion. “There is a reason we don’t stay at the Burj Khalifa when we go to Dubai. God, I hate heights.”

Aaron snickered, as he teased, “Wait until I tell Clint that you’re scared of his favorite places.”

The oldest Grimm cocked an eyebrow at his little brother, reminding him dryly, “May I remind you of all the times I used to drag Clint down from somewhere high to beat his ass for something stupid he’d done? Just because I dislike high places, does not mean that I am scared of them . . . or that you and Clint are safe in them.”

Blue eyes were twinkling with familiar mischief, as the younger Grimm took a seat across from Sam at the table and kicked his feet up onto the tabletop. Marina cocked an eyebrow at the action, her arms folding over her chest as she cocked one hip. “What the hell do you think you’re doing? Since when are tabletops footrests?” Reaching out to smack his ankle hard, pointedly ignoring his pained yelp, she snapped, “Except for the fact that I know better, I could swear that the lot of you were raised in a barn. I know I taught you manners, Aaron Kenneth James . . . kindly use them.”

“Aaron Kenneth James?” Sam asked curiously, his eyes narrowing as he took in the new information about the man he’d come to call “friend”.

“Once upon a time, I used to be Kenneth James Grimm,” Aaron confessed with a sheepish smile, dropping his feet to the floor and rubbing ruefully at the throbbing spot on his ankle. “But then Kenneth died, and Aaron Kenneth was born in his place.”

“At least that’s what he thinks,” Marina snarked, one chocolate eye slipping closed into a sly wink, “I think it just gives me more middle names to scold him with.

Aaron’s nose wrinkled as he stuck his tongue out at his sister, earning the same gesture in reply. Will’s tone was teasing as he insisted, “Now children . . . play nice.”

Flashing her lover a wide grin, Marina twirled on her toes towards the living room. “You love me!”
she called in a singsong tone over her shoulder, her feet skipping along as she waltzed to the music in her head.

The Colonel chuckled as he shouted in light-hearted reply, “Not the point, moya sumasshedshaya devushka.”

Her tone was knowing as she disappeared up the stairwell, “Isn’t it though?”

Sam was a little embarrassed by his genuine fascination with the relationship between Will Grimm and Marina Petrovka. Their open flirting, and frank affection, was shocking to him, considering the staid relationship between his own parents. Sam had been living in the shadow of General “Badass” Braddock since the first second he’d enlisted, and it had taken him a long time to find a niche where his father’s name didn’t mean anything. He’d never seen his mother and his father interact with each other so casually, and with such honest love. He hadn’t even seen the General kiss his mother’s cheek since shortly after Natalie was born . . . long before Amy died.

When Sam had met Aaron, he hadn’t realized that Aaron Grimm was a Grimm or that he was the once-and-future demolitions expert for the Brat’ya Mrachnyy. Even across borders, the Legend of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy was a formidable one. Though the former soldier hadn’t been on the deployment in question, the American squad had been deployed on one assignment with the JTF2 and had left a long lasting impression. To this day, guys who had been on that assignment referred to the CO and the XO as “The Colonel” and “The Russian”.

So when the former DOD operative had been telling him about his brother, a lowly Colonel with the United States States Army’s Special Forces Unit, and his brother’s badass girlfriend, Marina Petrovka, he hadn’t realized that they were the two in question. And having met them, he found himself struggling to reconcile the mental picture of a destructive twosome based on his buddies’ stories and the sweet, charming couple he’d just met.

Eyebrows furrowing over his frown, he forked a mouthful of chicken pot pie into his mouth. Temporarily distracted by the flavor exploding on his tongue, the groan low in his throat was born of pure bliss. “Oh God, that’s good,” he moaned, eyes slipping closed to savor it better.

Aaron grinned, stealing the younger man’s fork and scooping a heaping bite into his mouth. “Marina is the best cook I know . . . it’s a miracle that we all aren’t disgustingly fat,” he insisted, despite his mouth being full of the cheesy chicken.

Will rolled his eyes, scolding his brother fondly, “You were raised in a damn barn. Manners, Aaron . . . for crying out loud. No one here wants ‘see-food’.”

Grinning at his brother, Aaron stuck his tongue out with a loud, “Blah!” sound.

Marta rolled her eyes at her boyfriend, bending to snatch a stolen kiss from him, before moving to the fridge to dish up food for them. “Heathen,” she laughed, one hand reaching out to ruffle her nephew’s blond mop. “As for you, Sam, you need a haircut. You’re looking a little shaggier that usual.”

Sam pouted, one hand coming up to smooth down his hair, as he insisted, “I just left the military. Can’t I have my hair be a little too long right now? Just for a little while? I’ve never gotten to have long hair.”

The Colonel grunted at the comment, reaching up one hand to scratch at the bristle of short scruff under his chin. “It’s not quite all it’s cracked up to be, I promise. You’ll be begging for a haircut before long, trust me.” Itching at the skin on the back of his neck, he frowned, “Speaking of haircuts, I’m just about due for one. Ugh . . . I don’t know how Brian can stand to have hair on his chin.”

Aaron snickered, as he leaned forward on his elbows. “Remember that god awful ponytail he had back when we were kids? He started growing it out when he was 14 . . . it must have been halfway down his back when . . .” here there was a minute stammer, before he continued carefully, “. . . when he left.”

Will laughed, a genuine grin on his face as he crowed at the ceiling. “Oh God . . . Marina hated that thing. I don’t even remember how many times she threatened to chop it off. He started growing the goatee at the same time; thank God, it was the only style choice that remained. Because I don’t think the ponytail would have cut it at S.H.I.E.L.D.”

Just then, the front door opened and everyone turned to look at the familiar shout of, “Marina! I’m home!”

There was a squeal as the Russian came flying down the stairs, throwing her arms around her youngest Grimm. Clint, sunburnt and grinning, laughed as he scooped his sister up off her feet and spun them both around the foyer. Bucky’s entrance was a little more sedate, though he was chuckling as he watched them chatter back and forth in excited Russian, Clint’s arm around her waist as they moved deeper into the house.

Squeezing her dorogoy once more, Marina pushed him a step away. “I recognize that look . . . there’s chicken pot pie and your brothers in the kitchen. Go on . . .”

Clint whooped, announcing exuberantly, “You’re the best sister ever!”

She was still laughing as she snarked, “Chertovski prav ya . . . and Clint, be careful with Sam!”

The archer was already in the kitchen, when the reply of, “Who the yebat’ is Sam!?” came floating back to her. There was a skidding sound and Will’s voice shouting, “CLINTON FRANCIS, BE CAREFUL!” before Clint answered his own question. “Oh . . . so you must be Sam.”

Turning to Bucky with a grin, she watched her former mentor set their luggage down out of the way of the door, arms open for her customary embrace. “How are you, Zima?”

The once-and-future assassin chuckled, as he replied dryly, “How is it possible to go on vacation and come back more tired than you left?”

Marina’s tone was teasing as she laughed, “You do remember that you went with Clint, right? He could exhaust the saints, even if he didn’t set his mind to it.”

The older man looped one arm around Marina’s shoulders, resting his temple against the crown of her head as he sighed. “Remind me to see about getting him some Ritalin or something. That kind of constant energy level can’t be healthy . . . and even if it is, it isn’t good for my own sanity.”

The two moved into the kitchen, earning the attention of Will and Aaron, who nodded in greeting to the older man. Meanwhile, Marina snickered, poking playfully at his left arm, the metal exposed by his sleeveless tank and gleaming dully in the meager light coming through the shaded windows. “So . . . were you at least able to work on your tan at all? I mean . . . that arm still looks grey.”

It was about that time that Sam looked up, blue eyes snagging on the metal arm. Those eyes went wide in honest terror as he scrambled backwards out of his chair, knocking it over in his haste to put his back against the wall and space between himself and the newcomer. Clint frowned, before demanding around a mouthful of food, “What the hell is your malfunction?”
Sam’s tone was a curious mix of fear and awe as he replied, “It’s the Winter Soldier.”

Clint snorted as he returned his attention to his plate, waving his fork nonchalantly, “Oh yeah. Sam . . . meet my boyfriend.”

The younger man’s eyes flashed to stare at the archer, his voice a squeak as he demanded, “Your boyfriend?!?”

There was a wicked smile on the Army sniper’s lips as he replied, “Yeah . . . I like to live dangerously.”

It was about then that Brian and Natasha, the two members of the family most reknown for suddenly appearing where they weren’t expected – unlike Clint, who was the most reknown for sneaking up on people and scaring the der’mo out of them – appeared in the doorway to the kitchen. Sam jumped at their abrupt arrival, his eyes growing wider as he took in Brian’s features. Brian barely noticed the new arrival, striding across the kitchen to fish out two beers, keeping one for himself and handing one off to Natasha.

Startled blue eyes flashed from face to face, his heart starting to pound in his chest as Sam finally began to take in the facial features of each of the Grimm men. Dropping abruptly back into his chair, he found himself gasping for air. “Oh my God.”

At the breathless sound of her nephew’s voice, Marta sprang to his side, her hands moving quickly as she tried to figure out what was wrong. “Sammy . . . what’s wrong? Are you okay?”

“But Marty . . . they’re identical. WHY are they identical?!” he demanded, earning a smirk from Brian, as the second oldest joked, “So . . . he must be new.”

Will chuckled, bumping fists with his younger brother, before turning to face Sam. “And just think . . . you haven’t met my brother, Jason yet.”

“And if you think you’re having a heart attack now, just wait till Dad gets home,” Aaron agreed, leaning forward onto his elbows. “Then things really get interesting.”

The former soldier’s eyes were very wide as he stared at his aunt’s boyfriend, before finally announcing, “Welcome to the Twilight Zone.”

And almost as one, the brothers agreed, “Here here!”

---

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

- (R) moya sumashshedshaya devushka - my crazy girl (one of Will’s nicknames for Marina)
- (R) Brat’ya Mrachnyy - Brothers Grimm (Code name for the Army’s Special Operations squad, of which Will, Marina, Jason, Aaron and Clint are the sole members)
- (R) Brat'ya - Brothers (shortened form of the Code name)
- (R) dorogoy - darling (Marina’s nickname for Clint)
- (R) Chertovski prav ya - Damn right I am
- (R) yebat’ - fuck
(R) Zima - Winter (one of Marina's nicknames for Bucky)
(R) der'mo - shit
Chapter 146: First Date

Casey nibbled on her lower lip as she stared at herself in the mirror. Tonight was her first date with Jason and she couldn’t find a damned thing to wear. “Get a grip, Shraeger . . . it’s not as though you haven’t had dinner at his diner at least a million times already,” she scolded her reflection, glowering at the pale, panicking woman in the mirror.

And though she heard her own words, a small voice in the back of her head sing-songed cheerfully, “But it’s never been a date before, either.”
“Shut up!” she screeched, collapsing backwards onto her bed. Dragging her pillow over her face, she screamed as loud as she could into its dubious comfort.

Groaning wretchedly, she regretted – and not for the first time – her reluctance to make friends of her own gender. Beaumont was out of the question, for obvious reasons and most of her former high school girlfriends would have a coronary to learn that Casey was worried about what to wear to dinner with a cop. Which left her with a grand total of one option . . . and wasn’t that a terrifying thought that Marina Petrovka was the only friend – in the loosest sense of the word – that she could think of to ask for advice on what to wear on a day with, for all intents and purposes, her son.

Letting loose a string of obscenities around another groan, she reached for the phone and dialed the Grimm’s landline. Maybe she’d get lucky and the Russian wouldn’t be home. The phone rang twice, before a gruff voice answered the phone, “Grimm.”

Casey’s jaw dropped, before she blurted in shock, “THAT’S how you answer your phone!? Jesus, aren’t there like five of you!?”

There was a moment of startled silence, before the man began to chuckle. “Good afternoon, Detective Shraeger. No one ever calls this line, unless they’re looking for me. After awhile, I just became accustomed to being the only one answering it.”

It was about then that Casey realized who she was speaking to. “Oh shit . . . you’re the Colonel.”

Dry chuckling accompanied his agreement. “I am . . . I think Jason’s at his apartment. You’ll probably have better luck getting ahold of him on his cell phone.”

“No . . . I mean, I know . . . I’m just . . .” Sighing, she resigned herself to having made an idiot of herself. “I actually need to speak to Agent Petrovka.”

“Marina?” he asked in surprise, before humming lightly. “Of course. Let me get her on the line for you.” A rustle over the receiver barely muffled the shout of, “Marishka, moya zhemchuzhina . . . someone’s on the phone for you!”

There was a sunny reply, the words indistinct due to the distance, before the woman’s voice chirped cheerfully through the phone. “Zdravstvuyte . . . this is Lt. Colonel Petrovka.”

“Hello ma’am . . . it’s Casey Shraeger,” was the detective’s timid reply, the redhead wincing at her own tone.

“Oh . . . Allo Detective. Please call me Marina. What can I do for you?”

“Well . . .” she stalled, dropping her forehead into her palm. It took her a long moment to work up her courage, before she muttered bitterly, “Oh God . . . this is embarrassing.”

The woman’s laughter was friendly and familiar as she insisted, “No need to be embarrassed. It’s just us girls here.” There was a brief pause, before she inquired kindly, “Can I assume that this has something to do with my Jason?”

Relieved that she didn’t have to try to force it out, Casey grunted as she flopped backwards on the bed again. “Ugh! It’s our first date and I have nothing to wear. Which is ridiculous . . . he’s my partner and we’re eating at his diner! He didn’t suddenly become a different person overnight. He still thinks pretzels are perfectly acceptable in omelets and he still makes absolutely terrible jokes and he’s still freaky good with computers. He’s still just Jason.”

“And yet everything’s changed, hasn’t it?” Marina asked, her tone both amused and surprisingly maternal. “May I offer you some advice, Detective Shraeger?”

“Please, call me Casey . . . and God, yes! I’m desperate!”

“Jay cares for you very deeply; we’ve have more than a few conversations about you. At the time however, you had a boyfriend, which left Jason reluctant to say anything about his feelings for you. Of course, I’m sure that is a situation that has since been resolved, da?”

“Davis and I broke up shortly after the hostage situation at the Second,” Casey agreed sheepishly, thoughts of the kiss that had prompted the break up flashing like lightning across her vision.

“Good. Then I’m going to say this exactly once. He will never do anything that you don’t ask him for. So do yourself, and him, a favor and figure out what you want to have happen tonight. Then stick to it. Ponimayete?”

Casey frowned at the Russian terminology, before replying to the context of the question. “Yes ma’am.”

“Good girl.” Giggling lightly, Marina continued, “That being said, anything you wear will be fine. Jason already knows what kind of woman you are and he likes you just as you are. He won’t appreciate any extra fussing on your part . . . it won’t impress him. Just be the woman that he fell for and you’ll do just fine.”

“You’re sure?”

A husky chuckle rang in her ear as the former KGB assassin agreed, “I know my boy, Casey . . . I’m sure. Just . . . think about what I said and enjoy your night together. All right?”

“Thank you, Marina . . . I do appreciate the advice.”

“Well . . . it seems that this sort of thing is my niche. I should probably just embrace it,” she replied in a dry, sarcastic tone. Casey laughed, easily able to imagine the other woman rolling her eyes in exasperation. There was a pause before the Russian spoke up again, “Oh and Casey?”

Startled by the sudden question, the detective questioned, “Yes?”

“Don’t worry about dinner . . . I had it delivered.”

When Marina hung up five minutes later, Casey was still laughing.

The entire drive to Jason’s diner, the redhead cop wrestled with her own inner voices. She knew that she had never been as overwhelmed by a kiss as she had been when Jason had kissed her . . . or at least when he’d kissed her back. Honestly, she wanted more . . . much more . . . she wanted everything she could get. But at the same time, she wasn’t willing to sacrifice her self-respect – or Jason’s respect for her – to satisfy an itch.

It wasn’t until she arrived at the diner and looked through the window to see Jason unpacking the meal Marina had ordered for them, that she really made up her mind. He wore a pair of old, faded blue jeans, the material clinging to his luscious backside and sitting scandalously low on his hips. His blue-checked button-down looked homey and comfortable, sleeves rolled up carelessly to just below his elbows. One hand was still in a brace, with a couple of his fingers still taped for added stability. But for the most part, he looked . . . normal. Like the Jason Walsh she had fallen hard for without even realizing it.

Looking up at the sound of the bell over the door, Jason grinned at her, the expression warm and real. “Hey . . . so apparently Marina really doesn’t want me to fuck this up. She ordered our dinner from Del Posto . . . I hope you like Italian.”

He hadn’t even come out completely from behind the bar – and God, even his bare feet were adorable!! – before Casey was in his arms. Her momentum propelled him back against his fridge, pinning her there as she pressed her lips to his own.

There was a moment where Jason didn’t move, his hands held out to the sides as he watched her through wide eyes. Finally, seeing something in her eyes that reassured him, his hands came up to grip at her hips and haul her that small inch closer. Wrenching his lips away from her own, he began to lay a trail of kisses along the flesh of her throat. Murmuring against the skin there, he teased, “So, dessert first . . . dinner after?”

Gasping for air as he began to nibble at her collarbone, she refused to deign that with a reply. Hands clutching tightly to the back of his neck, she demanded breathlessly, “Bed . . . now.”

There was amusement in Jason’s voice as he replied, “Yes ma’am.” Biting lightly at her lips, he teased, “I promise, I’ll still respect you in the morning.”

Hopping up to wrap her legs around his waist, she panted, “I really don’t give a damn if you do or don’t . . . right now all I care about is getting naked, as fast as possible. You think you can manage that?”

There was a delicious smirk on his lips as he carried her back towards his bedroom, “Yeah . . . I think I can manage that.”

Hours later, Casey’s voice filled the tiny apartment. Her tone was low and sated, a bone deep contentment easily apparent in the sound. “God . . . I make excellent life choices.”

Jason’s chuckles were fond as he agreed, “Yes you do . . . would you care to make a few more?”

Girlish giggles filled the dark, along with the familiar rustling of the comforter as she purred, “Just a few more? Giving up so soon, Detective Walsh?”

There was a deep growl before a feminine squeal filled the room, the sound quickly lowering into a pleased whimper. “No fair,” she panted, strands of his hair slipping like silk through her fingers.

“All’s fair, Casey . . .” he teased, voice low and seductive where it came from between her legs. “I’d hold on if I were you . . . it’s not even midnight yet. We have hours before dawn . . . and I intend to map out every square inch of your body before then.”

Her tone was breathless as she insisted, “Promises promises, Walsh.”

Her wail filled the room as he paused, before his voice filled the room again. “Jason . . . I think it’s about time you called me Jason.”

Her smile was warm and awed as she whispered, “Really?”

There was the soft sound of skin on cotton as he crawled up her body, his lips warm against her own as he replied, “Yeah . . . I mean, my name isn’t really Walsh. And I think if anyone should call me by my real name, it should be my woman . . . don’t you think?”

A girlish grin unlike anything Casey had worn since middle school broke across her face as she reached up to cup his cheeks in her palms. “Your woman huh?”
She could practically hear his eyes rolling as he insisted, “This isn’t high school, Case. You’re my woman and I’m your man. Sound good?”

Wrapping her arms around his neck, she hauled him back down to her again. Murmuring against his lips, she promised, “Sounds perfect.”

Twelve hours later, everything went to shit.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) moya zhemchuzhina - my pearl (one of Will's rarely used nicknames for Marina)
(R) Zdravstvuyte - Hello?
(R) Allo - Hello!
(R) Da/net - yes/no
(R) Ponimayete? - Understand?
Queen's Gambit

Chapter Notes

Merry Christmas!! And enjoy this one. No translations this time.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
It was very late that night when the need for food finally overrode the need to discover every inch of each other. Lazing back on the bed, the auburn-haired beauty watched her lover throw back the covers and swing his legs over the edge of the mattress. Grinning at his toned backside, she watched as he bent to rifle for his boxer briefs that she had thrown carelessly to the floor in her haste to get him naked.

As he straightened, she cocked her head at the sight of a dark shadow decorating the skin of his back. The design was situated directly over his right shoulder blade. In the dark, she couldn’t see it clearly but from what she could see it was huge. Forcing herself up onto her elbow, she reached out to trace questioning fingers over the mark. “What is this? It’s too big to be a scar, but I can’t really see what it is.”

Jason chuckled lightly, twisting to look back over his shoulder. “No, it’s not a scar. It’s a tattoo of my father’s family crest. All of my brothers, my sister Marina, my dad and I all have one.” Holding up his left arm, he showed her the inside of his wrist. There, where his watch face usually sat, was another, smaller, tattoo. “This one helps people keep me apart from my brothers.”

Rolling onto her stomach, she rested her chin on her hands and frowned. “But isn’t it a tactical advantage, if people can’t tell you all apart?”

Grinning at her proudly, he leaned to kiss her quickly. “Hold that thought... I am starving.”

Wrinkling her nose at him, she nodded, kicking her feet in the air as she watched him head toward the diner to retrieve their – by now – very cold Italian feast. There was some banging around as Jason reheated the plates, before carrying them back to the bed along with two bottles of ice-cold beer. “Five-Star Italian and generic brand beer... my mother would be horrified,” Casey teased, eagerly accepting the plate and bottle.

Running one hand reverently over the exposed length of her back and bare left leg, he leaned to kiss the back of her bared shoulder. Reaching out, he flipped on the overhead light before taking a seat on the bed, his back to the wall. “I’m an Army brat and a circus kid... Marina did the best she could with me, but most of that hoity-toity fancy stuff went in one ear and out the other.”

Shaking her head, she laughed, “Somehow, I get the impression that she didn’t actually try very hard.”

Jason grinned, one hand flashing as he spun the top off the bottle. One shoulder shrugged lazily as he replied, “Probably not. The basics were mandatory, of course – Will and the Army made sure of that – but the rest was really only important if I was on assignment.” There was a flash of something bitter in his eyes as he continued, “Gotta be able to blend in with the rest of the high society snobs, if I want to get the information I needed without have to seduce or kill someone.”

One corner of her lips twitched upwards at his tone, before Casey teased, “So basically what you’re saying is that my mother is going to love you and I will have failed once again at pissing her off about my life choices.”

Leaning forward to tangle his lips with her own, he murmured, “I thought we had already agreed that you make excellent life choices.”

The detective thought about that for a second, before conceding cheerfully with a firm nod, “You are very right... we did.”
Jason’s left hand came up to brush back a strand of hair from her eyes and the dark blotch on the inside of his wrist once again caught her eyes. “All right . . . you were going to explain the tattoos. At least, I thought you were.”

Nodding, Jason shifted on the bed so that his back was to her. In the brightness of the overhead light, the dark blotch resolved itself into a gorgeous tattoo. Even Casey could tell that the design was old, the cadet blues of the feathers – at least, she thought they were feathers but they didn’t really look like feathers – and the austere black outlines left a very nondescript but powerful feel to the picture painted on his skin. Two banners scrolled at the top and the bottom of the design, the words stark against the flesh-tone; KUHN and DEUTSCHLAND. Tracing the design with reverent fingers, Casey breathed, “It’s beautiful, Jason.”

“It’s probably the only piece of our heritage that any of us have. It’s a long story, but we didn’t even know who our father was until about eight years ago,” he agreed, turning back and offering her his forearm again. The tattoo there was only about the size of a half dollar, the two double bars that matched his Captain’s bars a sharp silver against the cream at the inside of his wrist. Frowning, the redhead traced them in question. “What are these?”

“These are my rank; Captain in the United States Army with Special Operations. I’m pretty damned proud of them.”

Nodding, Casey leaned onto her elbows, watching him as he reached out for his beer. “So what’s the deal then? Why get your rank tattooed on the inside of your wrist, where no one can even see it?”

“Because you’re right. Having people in a constant state of shock with regards to my brothers and me is to our distinct tactical advantage. Which is why this tattoo, and my brothers’ own tattoos just like it, are always kept covered. Clint wears his arm guard, Brian has his wrist cuff, Will’s watch, Aaron’s watch, my watch, Marina’s mother’s bracelet, and Dad’s bracers. No one except for us, you and the tattoo artists who inked them know that they exist.”

“So why even get it if no one’s ever going to see it?”

Frowning at the question, the middle Grimm thought for a moment before replying, “Just for the sake of a terrible example, say Will and Clint were on an assignment together. They get ambushed and both of them are killed in action.” Reaching out, he rapped sharply several times on the side of his solid oak dresser, “Knock on wood . . . There would need to be something so that whoever recovered them could identify their bodies, right?”

Green eyes were stone cold sober as they watched her take that thought in. When understanding came at last, the woman bit down on the inside of her lip hard. “But I thought that wasn’t a concern for you anymore. I mean, I thought you weren’t active duty.”

“You’re right. I’m not active duty anymore, but I can still be recalled at anytime. Not to mention, I wouldn’t be able to trust some other dickhead with my brothers on a deployment. Hell, I may go back on active duty someday. I just . . . have to find a good reason for it.”

There was a long silence, before her quiet answer filled the room, “You mean like Sarah.”

His smile was devastating even as he nodded in silent agreement. “Yeah . . . like Sarah. I don’t think I ever told you this, but Sarah Michelle Fitzgerald was the reason I left. I wanted to keep her safe. The irony of it is that she probably would have been safer if I had just stayed.”

The forlorn tone in his voice cut her to the core, and she watched him sadly as he fought to keep his emotions under control. Reaching out, his partner ran her fingernails back through the hair at his temples. “I’m sorry you lost her, Jason. Your brother, Brian? He told me that you’ve never really been the same since she died.”

Jason chuckled quietly, the sound rich with bitterness. “Guilt is a terrible thing, Case . . . it will destroy you if you let it. I hope you never have to experience that kind of pain.”

Casey’s eyebrows furrowed as she shifted to cuddle closer to him. “What on earth could you possibly feel guilty for? It’s not like you killed her.” There was a pause, before she continued, “Right?”

The long silence from Jason made her frown fiercely. Finally, he murmured, “No . . . I didn’t kill her . . . not technically.”

“Jason . . . whatever else we are, we’re partners. Please . . . just trust me.” Tender fingers smoothed over his stubbled cheek as she pressed quietly, “No matter what, Jason, I’m with you, remember? Always. I promised then and I promise now and I will promise forever.”

Watching the green-eyed detective bite down on his lower lip, she murmured, “You said that Delgado tortured Sarah . . . and he called you ‘Agent’ when he took the Second hostage. You both seemed to know each other. Did you used to work for the FBI or something?”

Jason snorted hard at the question, giving her a look that clearly indicated his opinion that she needed her head examined. “Or something. And let me just say that I am deeply offended that you think I would work for the pansy-asses at the Bureau! Come on Shraeger . . . be serious.”

Rolling her eyes, she punched him sharply in the shoulder. “It was an example, Walsh.”

He scoffed lightly, “Yeah . . . a terrible one.”

“Bite me,” she scolded, a moment of stillness filling the room before he leaned over and sets his teeth into the fleshy part of her shoulder, earning a ticklish squeal.

After that, everything else fell to the wayside. Any other questions she may have had were forgotten as she once again lost herself in her new lover’s embrace. It was very late – or very early – when they finally dropped into the Land of Morpheus. It was around ten o’clock that morning when they both finally began to stir awake. Content to laze the day away in his arms, Casey remained tucked against him until Jason yawned widely against her shoulder. “Mmmm . . . morning,” she greeted sleepily, as Jason stretched widely behind her.

Kissing her shoulder, Jason rolled away and climbed out of bed. “Morning . . . go ahead and take your time. I’m just gonna start the coffee and get started on breakfast,” he murmured, bending over the bed to press another sweet kiss to her lips.

“Mkay,” she agreed muzzily, her hands on his cheeks as she allowed the kiss to linger for a few moments more than Jason had originally intended.

Finally, Jason moved into the diner, unlocking the diner door and flipping on the “OPEN” sign in the front window. Wrapping his apron around his waist, he set about to making the only thing he had ever been able to make successfully, pancakes. He was halfway through the first batch when the bell over the door dinged and a man came into the tiny diner. The technical specialist looked up and immediately felt his hackles rise. The man’s smile was too slick . . . too confident and he could feel his Spidey-senses tingling. “Good morning,” he greeted warily, watching man leg up onto a barstool. “Anywhere you like.”
“What’s good today?”

“Well, we got pancakes and we got goulash,” Jason replied honestly, turning his back as he continued to stir the pancake batter, though he watched the man drum the counter in the shiny surface of his griddle.

“Oooh, pancakes. The other one sounds like a shoe.” Even Jason had to agree with that, acknowledging that it probably did taste like a shoe; he’d never been able to make goulash like Marina did, and every attempt he tried somehow came out worse than the last.

“Hey . . . you play chess?” the man drawled, the accent distinctly southern to Jason’s ears. The last time he’d heard a twang like that, Carter’s Circus had been deep in the heart of Texas, as they say.

Chuckling reluctantly, the middle Grimm replied, “No, I prefer a game of impact.”

“No I hear ya . . . I hear ya. Mix it up a little . . . a couple scrapes, a few bruises. What about hunting? You do any hunting?”

“Yeah . . . I do some hunting. People mostly.”

The man laughed as though he’d just heard the funniest joke in his life and Jason felt his unease ratchet up another few degrees. Emerald eyes narrowed fractionally, plating the pancakes as the other man began to ramble on about a Jean Claude Van Damme movie; vaguely, Jason seemed to recall the movie in question being one of Brian’s favorites. It wasn’t until the man picked up his fork and knife and remarked, “Mm . . . last meal,” that Jason knew things were about to get ugly. Wiping his hands on his towel, he watched the man for a moment, before he asked, “Do you have any iced tea?”

“Yes,” Jason agreed, moving away to get the tea out of the fridge. It wasn’t until his back was turned completely that the man asked, “Hey . . . you’re a cop right?”

And that was when every mental alarm Will had ever installed in his younger brothers began to clamor at the top of its lungs. Clearing his throat, he forced himself to speak calmly, “Yeah . . . why do you ask?”

“Oh . . . you just got that look about you. Been around a few cops in my life.”

Turning back around, Jason glanced to make sure that his shotgun was still anchored to the bottom of the counter before moving to place the glass next to his customer’s plate. “Here you go.” Pausing, hands going to his hips, he asked, “So, do I know you?”

“Nah . . . I don’t think so. I got one of those faces though . . . familiar . . . like somebody you dream about.” Pointing to a place just past Jason’s shoulder, he asked, “Hey . . . you mind grabbing me one of them syrups?” Though reluctant to turn his back again, he watched him suspiciously until the man reminded him in a drawling tone, “It’s just not pancakes without syrup, right?”

Jason remained motionless for a moment, a voice sounding very much like Marina’s ordering him firmly NOT to turn around, before replying, “Of course.”

Next thing he knew, he was watching the guy pull a gun from the back of his pants in the shine of his counters. Whirling, he managed to catch the guy’s arm and slam it onto the counter, a few shots going off as the man’s fingers tightened reflexively. Lunging away, he got to his shot gun and pulled off a few shots as the man fired wildly behind him on his way out the front door. Standing, Jason was about to go after him when Casey’s voice screamed through the diner, “Jason!”
Merry Christmas!! runs like a bat out of hell from the pitchfork wielding people
Chapter 148: Crazy Town

Lunging around the counter top, Jason went dashing for Casey, nearly sliding into where she had propped herself up against one wall. Her hand was pressed firmly to a spot high over her ribs, causing a flash of panic at the placement. Seeing it in his eyes, Casey gave him a weak smile. “I’m pretty sure it just nicked me . . . I think . . . but it still feels like I got kicked by a horse,” she assured him breathlessly.
Jason was already on his phone, nodding in absent agreement to her assessment, his hands gentle as he eased her down to the floor. “The bullet probably skidded off a rib on its way past. It can happen.”

Casey smirked at him as he began to bark at the poor sap who had the misfortune to answer the 911 call. Reaching out carefully, she cupped his cheek in her palm. “Jason . . . this is not your fault. Understand?”

Biting down on his lower lip, he shook his head resolutely. “It might be . . . he was targeting me. It felt personal, but I swear I’ve never seen that guy before in my life.”

Scowling at him playfully, she scolded fondly, “Do not change the subject, Jason Grimm.”

Chuckling at the appearance of her usual fiery nature, he bent to press a firm kiss to her forehead as he teased, “No ma’am.”

“And don’t sass me either.”

“No ma’am.”

Rolling her eyes, she growled, “How on earth does your sister put up with you?”

“You are not the first to ask and will probably not be the last either. Ask Marina . . . I’m sure she’ll be more than happy to give you some pointers in surviving the Brothers Grimm,” he replied with a grin, before turning his attention onto the dispatch officer on the phone to relay the necessary information.

Casey dropped her head to lay back against the wall, the dull pain in her side throbbing with every beat of her heart. Her free hand was pressed lightly to Jason’s cheek as she watched him speak to the operator. Once he’d finally hung up the phone, he immediately pressed a button on the keypad and pressed the phone to his ear again. It was a moment, before his sister’s voice spoke up through the phone, “This is Petrovka.”

“Hey Marina . . . it’s Jay. I need your help . . . Casey’s been shot.”

“What!?” she demanded in the same no-nonsense tone that had always snapped him and his brothers into instant obedience as a child.

“I had a customer come in this morning . . . he pulled a gun . . . he managed to get off a couple of shots and Casey got nicked.”

There was a moment’s pause, before Marina sighed, “Please tell me that you don’t actually subject poor and unsuspecting fools to the misery that is your cooking.”

“Marina!” Jason demanded, even as he fought a grin at her dry assessment of the situation.

“All right . . . I’m sending Clint and Aaron your way. And sladkiy, brace yourself . . . there is no way in hell that Clint is going to let you live that down.”

Groaning, he muttered fondly, “I hate you all.”

“We know you do,” his sister chirped cheerfully, earning an amused giggle from Casey at the twisted face Jason made. “I’ll follow your lead up to a point, but Jay, I will make all final calls on this case. And if I say that I’m taking it out of your hands, I’m not going to put up with any arguments about it. Ponimayete?”
The detective bit down hard on the inside of his cheek, before glancing up to see the pinched look on Casey’s face. Taking a deep breath, he agreed quietly, “Da.”

“Good. I’ll be in touch . . . and do NOT leave without your brothers. I am not bailing you out of jail because some poor schmuck decided to pick a fight with you at the absolute worst time in the world.”

“I think I should be offended, but I just don’t have the energy right now.”

“That’s what happens when you stay up all night sexing your new girlfriend,” was Marina’s parting reply, before the dial tone filled her boy’s ear.

Jason snorted hard at the mortified look on Casey’s face, his hand squeezing hers lightly as he teased, “At least you know she likes you.”

“I’m not sure that makes me feel better about the situation at all,” she huffed miserably, just as the front door to the restaurant banged open and a team of paramedics rushed down the aisle towards the back apartment. And right behind them was the familiar sound of two pairs of heavy combat boots. Lifting her hand to his lips, he pressed a fervent kiss to the back before moving to join his newly arrived younger brothers at the doorway.

Clint’s grin was sly as he jostled the older brother fondly, “Dude, how have you not gotten a health code violation yet? Seriously . . . you actually COOK for people and they haven’t reported you yet!!?”

“Shut up,” he snapped lightly, shoving his brother back though his eyes were firmly glued to where Casey was being loaded gingerly onto a gurney.

Aaron’s smirk was small as he joined in on the distracting teasing, “Talk about a new definition for a cast iron stomach.”

The younger of the two snipers snorted as he argued, “Or maybe they’ve died of vicious food poisoning and just didn’t get the opportunity to complain before they died. I mean, this IS the guy who thought that peanut M&Ms went in Spaghetti-Os, for crying out loud!”

“First of all, that was TEN years ago!”

“And you still do it, don’t you?” Clint teased, smirking as Jason pointedly ignored the question.

Smacking at his younger brother lightly, the detective growled, “And secondly . . . you both suck monkey balls.” Stepping forward to grab his partner’s hand as the paramedics began to wheel her past, Jason bent to press a sweet kiss to Casey's knuckles. “I’ll see you soon okay? I’m gonna get this guy, and then I’ll be there.”

The redhead gave him a small smile. “Because that’s not going to freak out the poor, unsuspecting nursing staff or anything.”

Blue eyes narrowed lightly as Aaron remarked cautiously, “I didn’t think we’d told her any of our horror stories from Medical yet.”

The woman’s eyes flashed wide as she whipped her head around to glare at her new lover, demanding, “Explain.”

“The nurses at Medical are pretty well convinced that my father, my brothers and I are demon spawn, specifically created to scare them half to death,” he replied sheepishly, before putting on an audibly fake cheerful tone, “But think about it this way . . . you’re not going to Medical! The nurses at the medical center have absolutely no reason to be scared of me.”

Grabbing him by the collar of his shirt, the pretty redhead yanked him down so that they were nose to nose as she ordered, “Make sure that that remains the case, understand, Walsh?”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed with a sweet kiss to the pursed bow of her lips.

Whatever she’d been about to say was effectively cut off when the paramedics shoved the gurney into the back of the ambulance and climbed in after her. Jason remained on the sidewalk, flanked on each side by his brothers, watching the flurry of activity inside the bus before the driver slammed the doors shut and turned towards the driver’s side door.

Clint’s hand came to rest lightly on his shoulder, squeezing quickly, before insisting, “Come on, big brother . . . let’s get this asshole.”

Aaron snorted as he replied, “And after we do that, let’s discuss the impossible task of actually getting you IN to the hospital. Cause I think that’ll probably be the harder task of the two.”

Green eyes narrowed viciously as the detective drawled lazily, “By the way, just in case you think you came home funny . . . you didn’t.”

The younger brothers snickered lightly, before trailing after Jason back into his diner. The family sniper was the first to shake himself free of the lethargy that came from the sight of the holes in the wall. “So . . . you were behind the counter and he was seated where?”

Taking a deep breath, and ignoring the sudden influx of CSI technicians, Jason began to walk his brothers through what had happened. He was vaguely aware of the arrival of his sergeant, though his attention was firmly fixed on Aaron as the second youngest Grimm sketched out the incident on a paper napkin. “What kind of gun was it? Fairly decent caliber if it went through the wall, right?”

Jason snorted hard at the question, throwing his hands up in frustration, “These walls are cardboard . . . seriously, I could probably punch my index finger through without really even trying.”

Clint frowned at the hysterical note in his brother’s voice, insisting firmly, “Jay . . . take a walk.”

Caught off guard, the middle Grimm noticed the concern in both pairs of eyes and nodded in silent agreement. Moving towards the back apartment, he left his brothers to face the wrath of Sergeant Brown. Flopping carelessly onto the still rumpled sheets of his bed, he strained his ears to make out the irate condemnation he knew his sergeant had in store for him. “He should have told me he was starting an intimate relationship with Shraeger before it happened. She’s his PARTNER. Shit . . . what am I going to tell her father?”

“That sounds like a personal problem,” was Clint’s irreverent response, and even Jason could see him rolling his eyes. “Look . . . I frankly don’t care about your house or the shit going down in it. What I do care about is that this is the second time my brother has had a girlfriend in the hospital, and I’m really hoping this time ends differently than the first time.”

Aaron’s answering hum of agreement was quiet against Brown’s demanding inquiry. “Can you fix this?”

“She got shot . . . but she’ll heal, same as she would with any other injury she got on the job. From what I saw, it was a clean through and through . . . no vital organs were involved. She’s going to be fine . . . hurting like hell but fine,” Clint insisted, before Aaron continued, “As for whether or not we’re going to find the son of a bitch that did this . . . yes, that’s kind of our primary goal right now. Our sister is sending over a sketch artist now. Once we have a workable sketch to go on, running this mudak to ground will be our first, last and only priority. Say what you want about the agency we work for, Sergeant Brown, but the Grimms do not take kindly to people fucking with our own. People have ended up dead for less.”

Brown’s eyes narrowed lightly as he replied in a cool tone, “That is not in the least bit comforting.”

The smirk on the youngest Grimm’s face was sly as he replied, “Who said it was supposed to be?”

*************************************************************************************************************************************************************

So, I’ve been tossing around the idea of writing a few outtakes of when the Grimms were young, after Will left for the Army but before Clint joined the Army, while Clint and Kenny were still kids at the circus. Let me know what you think!

The Misadventures of Clint & Kenny Grimm

Eight year old Clint Grimm was pissed . . . though it was entirely possible he was confusing deep sorrow for pure rage. The departure of his hero – and big brother – was certainly a cause for both. “But why does he have to go away, Marishka!?” he whined, feet drumming a petulant beat against the bottom of his brother’s bed frame.

Marina Petrovka, his big sister and the most badass woman ever, barely looked up from where she was folding stacks of Will’s newly laundered clothing into a drab green carryall. “He needs to do this, dorogoy and we must love him enough to let him.”

Pouting ferociously at the answer, Clint fumed for a moment before surging to his feet and throwing all of the neatly folded clothes to the floor. “No! He can’t go!”

Snatching him firmly by the arm before he was able to dash away, Marina bent him forward and layered a series of sharp swats to his backside. “That will be quite enough of THAT, Clinton Francis,” the Russian scolded firmly.

The boy was soon wailing in pain, before the woman let him up again. Seeing the tears in his eyes, she sighed and pulled him into a hard hug. Kneeling in front of him, his elbows held firmly in her hands, she sighed heavily. “I know you’re going to miss him, dorogoy. I will too. But Misha needs us to be brave for him, okay? Even if it feels as though our hearts are breaking. Vse v poryadke? (All right?)”

A voice from the door broke into their thoughts then. “Guys? Everything okay in here?”

The Russian looked up to see 18 year old William Grimm, already dressed in his fatigues, at the door. Those quicksilver eyes of his took in the open knapsack, as well as the clothing strewn across the floor, and seemed to know instantly what had happened. Reaching out, he took Clint’s shoulder gently. “Why don’t you go play with Kenny? I’ll help Marina finish up.” He waited until the younger brother nodded in forlorn agreement, before reaching out to ruffle his bright blond locks. “And Clint? No more tantrums, ponimayete?”

“Yes sir,” the younger brother muttered.

“Thank you, malysh. Go on; I’m pretty sure Ken’s out with elephants today.”

Nodding, Clint dashed toward the door, only looking back once. Marina was still on her knees, gathering the clothes up from the floor, prompting Will to kneel down and rest his hand on her shoulder. Whatever they said to each other was too low for Clint to hear, but he watched his sister give the eldest Grimm a small smile, laying her palm over the one still resting on her shoulder.
Frowning again, the boy clamped down on his anger and tore from the railcar like a whirlwind.

Kenny was at the elephant enclosure, helping one of the hands give the newborn elephant, Rosie, a bath. Clint hopped up onto the fence and slumped, arms folded and pout on his face. Catching sight of his brother – and the storm cloud brewing over his head – Kenny handed off the sponge and trotted over. “What’s up, little brother?” he teased, always willing to poke Clint about the two and a half years difference in their ages.

The youngest Grimm grunted miserably, watching his brother step up on the bottom-most rung of the fence and rest his chin on his folded arms. “He can’t leave us.”

Kenny’s eyes narrowed for a moment, before his features cleared in understanding. “Why not?”

Seemingly fumble with a suitable answer to that, Clint switched tactics. “It’s like Marina doesn’t even care that he’s leaving.”

The older brother’s face twisted light as he scolded, “Don’t be stupid. Of course she does.”

“Then why is she so willing to let him go? Everything she says is all ‘We have to let him go’ and ‘I know you’ll miss him but he has to do this’ and ‘He needs to do this’. I hate it.”

“Maybe it’s cause she sees something in Will that we don’t.” Fiddling with his fingers, he shrugged lightly. “He’s never been able to lie to her, not even when he’s trying to.”

“But why does he want to go? Doesn’t he love us?”

Frowning, the older of the two tried to remember something that Marina had told him right after the eldest brother had announced his intention to join the army. “Sometimes people don’t leave because they don’t love you anymore . . . sometimes they leave because they love you too much,” he quoted, eyes half-closed as he recited the statement verbatim. The memory of Marina’s sadness, however, continued to linger even after his eyes were open again.

Clint however wasn’t buying it. “That’s dumb.”

Kenny punched him lightly, insisting, “You’re dumb.”

Squawking, Clint lunged at his brother, the two wrestling around in the dirt. Finally, a voice stilled them in their antics. “Clint! Kenny! Come on! It’s time to go!”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R)sladkiy - honey (Marina’s nickname for Jason)
(R) Ponimayete? - Understand?
(R) mudak

Translations for Snippet:

(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina’s nickname for Clint)
(R) Vse v poryadke? - all right?
(R) malysh - kiddo
(R) ponimayete - understand
Chapter Notes

Enjoy this chapter! I am currently back in school, so I will continue to post as often as I can, but things are going to be getting busy here soon. That being said, the response for the Misadventures was so positive that I will posting that as soon as I get more than just a few chapters done. Keep an eye for it.

In the meantime, I hope that this chapter is enjoyable to everyone. The translations, as always, are at the end.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 149: Smiling Revenge

Marina’s morning had started simply. She’d woken to the sound of her partner groaning as he pushed himself from their bed, trying to sneak past without her knowing that he was hurting. Propping herself up onto her elbow, she teased, “Whatcha doing?”
Jolting in surprise, he grunted as the action strained his shoulder. Settling back on the bed, Will looked back over his shoulder at his Russian. “That hurt.”

Her smile was amused as she laughed, “Good . . . maybe it’ll teach you that I don’t like it when you hide from me.”

Tossing back the covers, Marina maneuvered herself onto her knees and crawled over to lay her hand on his injured shoulder. The skin was overly warm, but the bruising was at least starting to settle. “How does your shoulder feel?”

“It hurts like a suka, but I think I’ll live,” the Colonel promised, learning over to press a sweet kiss to her frustrated frown. “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya, I’m all right. Honest.”

Nodding, she lifted her hands to his face and held him still as she captured his mouth with her own and kissed him at her leisure. Content just to kiss, it was a long moment before Will groaned in frustration. Resting his forehead against hers, he murmured against her lips, “I have a meeting in half an hour.”

Glancing towards the clock, Marina frowned at the time. “Ugh . . . how is it 6:30 already?”

Will’s eyes were sparkling as he teased, “Time flies when you’re having fun.”

Kissing her once more, he pushed himself slowly from their bed. Marina’s head cocked playfully as she examined his backside when he bent to grab his pajama pants from the floor. Scampering forward, she smacked his bare butt sharply, causing a surprised yelp. Giggling, she grabbed up her robe and scurried toward the door. Will’s voice followed her as he called after her, “I’m gonna get you for that, Marina!”

Her laughter was genuine as she called back, “I’m looking forward to it.”

Coming into the kitchen, she smiled to see Aaron and Sam seated at the table, eyes half-lidded as they nursed their coffees. “Good morning boys,” she cheered, coming over to press a warm kiss first to Aaron’s cheek then Sam’s. The look of surprise on the younger boy’s face at the action broke her heart, causing her to lean over and give him another one. “How did you sleep, Sammy?”

His smile was small but genuine as he insisted quietly, “I slept all right, thank you, Colonel Petrovka.”

Her fingers were fond in the blond strands as she insisted, “It’s just Marina, Sammy-honey. The Colonel has a meeting this morning, and I have a disciplinary meeting with the three baby-agent-idiots from training yesterday morning, so we won’t be around for very long this morning.”

Aaron grinned at his sister, teasing her fondly, “Never a dull moment in the life, is there?”

“Thank God . . . neither Misha nor I were exactly made for being idle,” she agreed lightly. “Any requests for breakfast, Sam?”

Shaking his head lightly, he shrugged, “Anything sounds good to me.”

“All right . . . cinnamon apple pancakes with hash-browns and bacon it is.”

Sam’s eyes flashed wide at the mention of his favorite breakfast food. The Russian squeezed his shoulder as she chuckled, “Your aunt and I spent rather a lot of time talking about you last night, after you boys had gone to play video games in the living room.”
Ducking his head between his shoulders, he asked timidly, “How much did she tell you?”

Hugging him briefly around the shoulders, Marina replied, “Let’s just say that if I ever meet your father, I cannot be held responsible for my actions.”

The former DOD operative snorted into his coffee as he insisted, “You’ll have to wait in line. I’m pretty sure, that having met the guy, Marta and I hold first claim.”

Marina rolled her eyes as she waved away that comment casually, “Uh-huh. Whatever you say, solnyshko. But I can promise you that I am much scarier than either one of you.”

Chuckling, the second youngest Grimm conceded, “Can’t argue with that.”

Fifteen minutes later, Marina was waiting in the foyer as her lover came tearing down the stairs, shrugging to settle his sling better as he searched his pockets for his cell phone. “Marishka, have you seen my . . .” he trailed off as Marina held up his S.H.I.E.L.D. issued phone and briefcase in one hand, a travel mug of coffee and a breakfast sandwich in the other, “. . . briefcase?”

Giving her a sheepish grin, he watched as Marina set his things on the table by the door. Reaching out, she adjusted his sling deftly and slipped in cell phone into his inner jacket pocket. “Thanks Marina.”

“You’re welcome,” she sing-songed, handing him his breakfast sandwich. “Eat that,” she ordered, scooping up the rest of their things. “I know how much of a control freak you are about driving, but I think I’ll drive today.”

Winking, he teased, “Aren’t you just a little dictator today?”

Sticking her tongue out at him playfully, she called back into the house, “We’re out guys! Aaron . . . please make sure the dishes get done!”

“Can do! Have fun!” he called back.

The couple arrived at the Command Center about five minutes later, Will pressing a quick kiss to his Russian’s cheek before he literally bolted towards the main conference room. “Love you!” he shouted over his shoulder, before he disappeared from view.

Chuckling, she murmured, “Love you too, Mishka.”

Turning towards the handler pool, she hummed lightly as she strode through the halls. The sight of her sister seated at her desk was a wonderful surprise and she cheered happily. “Vika! You’re back!”

Viktoriya Coulson looked up at her youngest sister and grinned, “Marishka . . . it’s good to see you!”

The two women hugged fiercely, before Marina ushered her sister into her office. “So how was honeymoon!? Tell me everything!”

The blond giggled lightly, teasing lightly, “I’m pretty sure that the five of us are going to have to meet up for lunch or something, because the other girls would never forgive me if I didn’t tell everyone.”

“Good point,” Marina giggled, looking up at a timid knock on the door. “Come in!”

Grant Ward stood there, a leery look on his face. Marina turned to glance at her clock, eyebrows up as she noticed the time. “Agent Ward . . . you’re early.”
“Yes ma’am, although that’s kind of a secondary reason for why I’m here.”

Vika chuckled, hugging her sister again as she insisted, “I’ll leave you to it. I’ll call the other girls and schedule a lunch meeting for later today.”

“Sounds good. Thank you, starshaya sestra.” Turning to the young man, she ushered him inside, “Take a seat, Ward . . . what’s wrong?”

Ward bit down on his lower lip, before blurting, “Agent Coulson is freaking everyone out.”

Caught off guard, she laughed, “Excuse me?”

“He’s making the rest of the trainees really nervous. I mean, it’s weird. He keeps . . .” there was a pause as he tried to find a word that would best explain, before finally giving it up as a bad job, “. . . smiling.”

Shaking her head, Marina scribbled quickly on her notepad, before folding his hands in front of him. “I’ll take care of Agent Coulson’s . . . facial expression, I guess. In the meantime, let’s talk about yesterday.”

The training agent grimaced at the reminder of the training exercise the day before. “It will never happen again, Agent Petrovka. And I am sorry.”

The Russian’s lips quirked lightly as she insisted, “Not you’re not . . . not yet . . . but you will be.”

An hour later, Marina knocked lightly on the door frame of Coulson’s office, a small grin on her lips as she poked her head inside the door. “Hey Phil. Welcome back.”

Philip Coulson was practically grinning as he looked up at her, watching as she moved to leaned against the doorjamb with her arms folded over her chest. “Good morning, Marina. I’m assuming you’ve seen your sister this morning.”

“Yes . . . it wouldn’t have looked good for Vika Coulson to miss her first day of work, you know.”

“You know she isn’t going to use the name while on duty.”

“I know, which brings me to why I’m here. You’re freaking out the baby agents,” she teased, winking slyly.

“What?”

“The smiling? It’s freaking them out. Frankly, I think they need a little fear in their daily lives . . . but apparently the staff psychiatrists don’t agree with me. So I’m going to have to ask you to stop scaring everyone. You need to stop grinning like an idiot.”

Phil’s ears reddened slightly as he ducked his head, “I’ve never been this happy in my life. I don’t think I could stop smiling if I tried.”

Marina nodded in agreement, “I know the feeling, Phil, honest. Still, if the smiling is cause a dip in morale, you’re probably going to have to do something about that.”

His eyebrows furrowed for a moment, before he proposed cheerfully, “How about I ‘grin like an idiot’ in my office, but when I leave, I’m still the same emotionless badass everyone knows.”

“That sounds good to me,” she laughed, straightening up. “Vika and I are planning to get all the girls together at some point today, so if you can’t get a hold of your wife, that’s probably why.”
“I’ll keep that in mind,” he drawled lightly. Winking slyly, he adopted a formal mein as he inquired, “Anything else I can help you with, Agent Petrovka? Or do you think we can go over the mission files from while I was gone?”

“No sir, Agent Coulson . . . let’s get some work done, huh?”

An hour later, she got the phone call from Jason. From there, any of her former plans for the day were on hold and her family became her sole priority. Reaching for her intercom, she ordered brusquely, “Vika . . . get me Agent Gamble and the Black Widow. And make sure that are that this is a Priority One call. I want them in front of my desk ASAP.”

It was a widely accepted fact of life that Brian Gamble and Natasha Romanov were two of the most – if not the most – violent, and therefore frightening, of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s senior agents. So when Marina Petrovka called them into her office immediately after getting off the phone with Jason, everyone in the handler pool knew that whatever had happened was bad. And not just bad but the kind of catastrophic usually characterized by screams of “Holy shit the sky is falling”. (Of course, anything that had to do with an immediate threat to the Grimms usually was, but that was neither here nor there.)

It was maybe twenty minutes before the duo arrived at the Russian’s office, but tensions were already high by the time the tactical agent came strolling into her office, his curly-haired redhead right behind him. Dropping carelessly into a chair across from her desk, one knee hooked over the armrest as he slouched, manic brown eyes were beaming at her as he asked cheerfully, “So . . . who do we get to kill?”

Marina’s smile was fond as she shook her head. “For the moment . . . no one. However, I do have a potential target for you in the near future.”

Natasha’s smirk was warm as she asked, “What happened?”

Taking a deep breath, Marina folded her hands in front of her and announced, “Someone tried to kill Jason this morning, at his restaurant.”

She immediately had their attention, as evidenced by the fact that even Brian was suddenly sitting ramrod straight in his chair. His tone was a low, vicious growl as he hissed, “Someone did what!?"

“Apparently, Jason actually utilizes the diner as a diner. The man came in early this morning, posing as a customer. There was a brief altercation, in which he managed to get off a few shots before fleeing on foot from the scene. Jason’s partner, Detective Shraeger, ended up getting caught in the crossfire. The injury was minor, nicked her at most, but she is currently enroute to Susan N. Ogu Medical Center downtown. Clint and Aaron are with Jay now, both to walk him through what happened and to keep him out of the crosshairs of any other glupyye lokhi of a mind to put a bullet through moy sladkiy.”

Both agents watched as the former assassin closed her eyes and took a second to count down from fifty. Shaking her head to clear her thoughts, she opened her eyes once again with a heavy sigh. “I have a sketch artist enroute to the diner as well, after which I’m going to pick Jason’s brain for a bit and then bully him into actually going inside the hospital to be with Casey. This is of course where the two of you come in. The moment I have that sketch in my hands, I want you two to track this asshole down. If he’s not in a body bag by the end of the day, he’d better be in some endless pit where no one will ever hear him scream instead. Ponimayete?”

The answering replies were immediate, and both of the Merry Murderesses present could see Barney starting to pound on the wall of his cell behind Brian’s eyes. Cocking her head at him, Marina inquired lightly, “Brian . . . are we going to have a problem?”

Brian’s eyes were burning with righteous fury as he growled, “We are not. Whoever the yebet took a shot at my kid brother on the other hand, is going to get some first hand intel on why Barney Grimm is so universally feared.”

Chocolate brown eyes narrowed lightly at the statement, before she sighed. Reaching up to pinch the bridge of her nose, she insisted firmly, “Just don’t let your brother catch Barney out of his cage, dong ma? Because I can promise you, Misha will not hesitate to kill him.”

“No ma’am.” Brian agreed, as Natasha spoke up, “I’ll keep Barney under control, Marina, I promise.”

A thankful smile creased the handler’s lips as she breathed a relieved, “Thank you, Tasha. Misha and I both thank you for it.” Looking back over at Brian, she continued, “Let me know if I’m going to need to call out Owen . . . he usually needs at least some kind of heads up before he’s called out into the field.”

Natasha smirked as she insisted, “Regrettably, this is probably going to be more covert and subtle than Barney is currently wanting.”

Nodding in silent agreement, Marina watched the couple exchange a telling look between them, before straightening her shoulders. “That’s all I have for the moment. I’ll read you in as soon as I know more. In the meantime, you both are dismissed.”

The two agents nodded briskly, standing from their chairs and heading towards the door. Pausing briefly at the door, Brian insisted firmly, “If you get any new intel . . .”

The Russian’s smile was fond as she agreed warmly, “. . . you’ll know as soon as I know. I promise. Dismissed.”

Slipping from the room, the Vdova paused to watch Brian pull the door closed with exaggerated calm. “Bri . . . you okay?”

Brian’s chocolate eyes were chaotic with a wide spectrum of manic emotions as he looked up into his girlfriend’s eyes and ground out, “I know we don’t know who this bastard is yet, but I want him dead . . . and I want him dead now.”

Green eyes gleamed as a wicked smirk crept across her face. Reaching out to cup his cheek, she insisted, “Come on, Brian . . . I think I know how to take your mind off of everything until we get the call from Marina.”

“Yeah, how’s that?”

One eye slipped closed in a sly wink as she drawled, “How do you feel about storage closets? Private, secluded, lockable storage closets?”

There was a lecherous grin on his face as he hauled her up against him by the hand on the back of her neck, “Natasha . . . you are a woman after my own heart. Lead the way.”

Linking her fingers with his, she gave him a seductive grin before leading him away to try and take his mind off of what had happened to his younger brother that morning. Well, at least until there was something they could do about it. And which time, all bets were off and all hell broke loose.

The poor bastard didn’t even know what he was in for.
Except for the fact that she didn’t feel any sympathy for the mudak whatsoever, Natasha would almost feel sorry for him. Either way, he’d dug his own grave. All that was left to do was to put him in it.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) suka - bitch
(R) samaya malen’kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina’s nickname for Aaron/Kenny)
(R) starshaya sestra - big sister
(R) glupyye lohki - stupid fuckers
(R) moy sladkiy - my honey (Marina's nickname for Jason is sladkiy which means honey)
(R) Ponimayete - understand
(R) yebet - fuck
(R) Vdova - Widow (shortened version of Natasha Romanov's callsign Chernaya Vdova/Black Widow)
(R) mudak - asshole
Chapters 150: Hell Hath No Fury Like a Pissed Off Grimm

Mei-Zhen Chang had worked for S.H.I.E.L.D. for a lot of years; primarily as a sketch artist and – if that particular skill wasn’t needed – then as a profiler. More importantly, she had worked on more than a few assignments alongside the Brothers Grimm, and within both capacities. So when Agent Marina Petrovka called her into her office to explain the assignment before her now, she had more than understood the seriousness of what she was being asked for.

Positive ID on a target . . . a target the Brothers Grimm intended to kill.
By the time she managed to catch up to Agents Barton and Cross, they had managed to get their older brother – the former Agent Walsh – as far as the front entrance of the Susan N. Ogu Medical Center. Grinning at the detective’s typical reticence about entering the building, she called out in teasing Mandarin, “ Háishi hàipà dà huài nánrén zài kēpà de báisè dàiǐ, Walsh? (Still scared of the big, bad men in the scary white coats, Walsh?)”

Walsh’s response was a growled, “Nǐ tā mā de fēicháng duō, Méi-Zhēn! (Fuck you very much, Mei-Zhen!)”

Reaching out to clasp him fondly on the shoulder, she asked gently, “How is she?”

“She’s still in surgery,” he replied forlornly. “My brothers have been running in and out for me.”

“We keep trying to remind him that it’s just a building, but he won’t listen to us. Seriously, Jay, it can’t hurt you,” Agent Barton insisted, watching his brother carefully, sighing heavily as the older Grimm began to shake his head before he’d even finished speaking. Running a hand over the spikes of his hair, he jumped from where he was perched on the roof of the car and clapped Agent Cross on the shoulder. “Come on, Kenny; let’s go keep an eye on Casey and let Mei-Zhen do her thing with Jay.”

The blue-eyed brother smiled at the older brother, promising, “We’ll call if anything changes okay?”

“Thanks Kenny.”

“You’re welcome. Mei . . . keep an eye on him for us?”

Her head dipped in a regal nod, as she agreed, “Of course.” The two watched in silence until the two S.H.I.E.L.D. agents disappeared into the medical center, before Mei spoke up. “So . . . shall we get started then?”

At Detective Walsh’s nod, she hopped up to sit cross-legged on the hood his car, her sketch pad open in her lap. She knew that Walsh wouldn’t be looking at her, so it seemed best to stay out of his line of sight so that he could focus on remembering the man whose face she needed to sketch. “Whenever you’re ready,” she prompted, before falling silent and waiting.

There was a long moment when she thought he might not have heard her, before at last he took a deep breath and began to describe his attacker. She was putting the finishing touches on the sketch when Walsh looked up at the sound of his name. A tall man with a Latina woman were approaching, trailed by a man with a Tom Selleck ’stashe and a black man wearing a bulletproof vest under his jacket. The detective stopped speaking, nodding in greeting, “Cole . . . Banks . . . Delahoy . . .” there was a noticeable pause, before he at last nodded at the woman, “. . . Allison . . . thank you for coming.”

The woman’s mouth twisted slightly in distaste, though she said nothing when her partner reached out to touch her hand. “She’s one of us . . . of course we were going to be here for her. How is she?"

“Last anyone told me, she was still in surgery.” Gesturing vaguely toward the doors, Walsh insisted, “My brothers are inside; they’ll call if anything changes.”

Mei cleared her throat then, holding out the sketch pad to the detective. “Walsh? What do you think?”

Smirking at the way he obviously startled, it wasn’t hard to guess that the middle Grimm had forgotten she was there. “Jesus, Mei . . . you scared the hell out of me.”
“I’ve been here for quite a bit longer than they have,” she teased, shaking the sketch pad in his direction once more. “Seriously . . . how does it look?”

There was suspicion in dark chocolate eyes, though the female detective said nothing as Walsh reached to take the pad. Frowning slightly, he considered it for a moment as he compared it with his own memories, before nodding. “Yeah . . . that’s him.”

Looking up, Walsh’s eyes narrowed at the horrified look etched in his co-workers eyes. Turning the pad towards him, he demanded carefully, “Cole . . . you know him?”

Walsh watched the six foot tall detective flinch at the question, grey-blue eyes startled as they darted up into the older detective’s own. “No . . .” was the uncharacteristic squeak, before Cole cleared his throat and spoke again, “No . . . I’ve never seen him before.”

Green eyes still narrowed in suspicion, the former field agent insisted, “Are you sure?”

Anything Cole might have said was interrupted as Beaumont leapt to the defense of her partner. “Shove off, Walsh . . . he said he didn’t know him.”

The former couple glared at each other for a moment, before at last Mei-Zhen finally spoke up. “And on that note . . . anything I should tell your sister when I take this sketch to her?”

It was obvious that Walsh was considering the likelihood of Marina Ivanovna Petrovka leaving one of her boys on his own during a crisis. Sighing as he came to the same conclusion she did, he gave in to the inevitable. “Tell her I’ll see her later. And no . . . I haven’t shot, maimed, punched or killed anyone yet.”

Mei’s tone was dry and amused as she drawled, “I’m sure she’ll be thrilled to hear it. Stay safe, Jay. Agent Petrovka is not known for her temperance where you and your brothers are concerned.”

Caught off guard by the statement, Walsh couldn’t hold in the derisive snort. “I think that is the worst understatement I have ever heard.”

Grinning in silent acknowledge, the pretty Chinese artist gathered her material and hopped from the hood of the detective’s car. She wasn’t even out of earshot before the furious Latina demanded, “And who the fuck is she!?" Snorting derisively, she rolled her eyes as she dropped into her car seat. “Frankly, I think I’d prefer to be shark bait that stuck in the middle of those two.”

An hour later, the criminal file and all records existing for one “Franklin Alexander Lutz” were staring up at Marina from her desktop. Reaching out blindly, she dialed Jason’s cell phone as she continued to read. There was one ring . . . two . . . before the technical specialist answered cheerfully, “Wow . . . that was fast. Your minions must be working on overdrive today.”

Marina smirked as she replied, “‘I cannot abide useless people.”

Rolling his eyes at the Firefly quote – and it was a quote . . . episode four, the one called “Shindig” – he sallied his own quote in reply, “‘You know, you aren’t quite right.’”
“‘That’s the popular theory’,” she snorted, struggling to contain her laughter. “So things could be getting interesting here soon.”

The Russian could almost hear Jason’s frown as he demanded, “Define interesting.”

Unable to resist the opening, the handler snorted before quoting deadpan, “‘Oh God. Oh God. We’re all going to die.’”

Jason groaned at the response, before muttering, “Shit . . . I walked right into that one. Seriously, Marishka . . . that Firefly obsession of yours is getting a little out of control.”

“Remember what you said about ‘not quite right’, Jay? It’s not just a quote,” she reminded him lightly. “Not the point . . . does the name ‘Franklin Lutz’ mean anything to you?”

There was a long silence as the middle Grimm considered the name, before replying carefully, “No . . . I can’t say that it does.”

Glancing at the second file on her desk, she mused, “What about the name ‘Navan Granger’?”

The startled pause was answer enough, though Jason’s response was a low, vicious growl anyway. “What the hell does that name have to do with anything?”

“Nothing concrete yet, but they did pop up as possible associates. Why?”

“Navan Granger is Henry Cole . . . Cole changed his name when he came to New York City, to give himself a chance to start over . . . and Cole knows that I know that.”

“Hmm . . . sounds like a hell of a coincidence if you ask me. All right . . . I’ll turn Brian and Natasha loose on it.” Gathering the file together, she scribbled a note to her two agents on the front and then moved to the door of her office. “Vika?”

“Yeah, Marishka?” the pretty Amazon inquired, as she looked up from the stack of requisitions she was sorting through on her desk. “What’s up?”

“Could you get these files to Agents Gamble and Romanov? All the information they need is in there . . . and tell them ‘Good hunting’ for me. After, you can take your lunch. I might be headed downtown for a bit here soon.”

“Sounds good.” Smiling at her sister, she took the file and inquired, “You gonna be able to make dinner tonight or should I call the girls and reschedule?”

Biting down on her lower lip, Marina considered the circumstances and shook her head. “Ask me again in a couple hours. We’ll see how much of this Brian and Natasha get taken care of and then we’ll reevaluate.”

Viktoriya nodded in agreement, before turning to her phone to have their sister and Marina’s boy paged. Turning back into her office, Marina seated herself at her desk again and leaned forward on her elbows as she watched the phone continue to count the seconds of the call. “Jay? You still there?”

“Yeah . . . I’m here.”

She was quiet for a long moment, before asking cautiously, “You been inside yet?”

Again, his pause was telling in and of itself, but Jason still replied anyway, “No.”
“Sladkiy . . . the hospital is not going to bite you. The white coats won’t hurt you and I promise, there are no ‘two by two . . . hands of blue’ inside.”

“Another Firefly reference!? Marina!”

Rolling her eyes lazily, Marina replied nonchalantly, “Misha and I had a marathon last night. I make no apologies.”

“Of course you wouldn’t,” he sighed in frustration. Marina could clearly picture him running his hands back through his hair. “It’s just . . . this is the hospital where Sarah died? What if she’s still here? What if she’s haunting this place . . . just waiting for me to come back and care about someone inside so that she can hurt them?”

“First of all, your father is very certain that Sarah has passed on completely, sladkiy. Secondly, even if she was still inside, she can’t hurt you or Casey unless you let her.”

“Are you sure about that? Because I seem to recall a few of Dad’s stories suggesting differently.”

Rolling her eyes, the Russian S.H.I.E.L.D. agent huffed, “No more horror films before bed, Jason Leonard, seriously. Casey is your partner . . . and your brand-new girlfriend. She deserves your support, if nothing else.”

“I know that! I just . . . I’m scared! What if I lose her too?”

“All the more reason to be with her now,” his sister reminded him gently. “She loves you . . . she wants you with her. Trust me.”

There was a long moment of silence as Jason considered that before confessing, “I don’t think I can go in there by myself.”

Chuckling, Marina stood from her chair and began to gather her things. “I’m ten minutes away.”

Not even fifteen minutes later, Marina strode easily into the room where Casey was recovering from her minor surgery, Jason lingering uneasily just outside the doorframe. The redhaired detective’s eyes widened in surprise, lifting one hand to her matted hair, “Agent Petrovka . . . I didn’t expect to see you,” she confessed sheepishly, obviously concerned by her disheveled appearance.

“It’s just Marina, devushka . . . and I brought you a present of sorts. Look who managed to make it through the front door!” she cheered, reaching back and pulling Jason the rest of the way into the room.

The sight of him lit up Casey’s whole face. “Jason . . . you’re here.”

Giving her a rueful smile, he came to the edge of the bed cautiously. Taking her hand in both of his, he bent his head to press a sweet kiss to the palm of her hand. “Sorry it took me so long.”

Casey’s eyes were brilliant as she promised, “It doesn’t matter . . . you’re here. THAT is all that matters to me. I mean . . . I know how much hospitals freak you out.”

Clint’s voice spoke up then from behind Marina at the door, “Wo de ma he ta de feng kuang de wai sheng dou. (Holy mother of god and all her wacky nephews.)”

At the phrase – yet another quote from Firefly . . . der’mo his whole chertov family was obsessed – Jason groaned in dismay, as Marina proceeded to thoroughly crack up. Aaron and Clint were both grinning, though admittedly both were a little bemused as to why; though it was Casey that finally collapsed the whole room into a fit of helpless giggles. “My thoughts exactly, Clint.”

Meanwhile, Cole was just arriving home at his modest apartment. The events of the day were weighing heavily on his mind, and every part of him was trying to sort out what to do about Frank. He’d brought the chess player to New York . . . it was going to be up to him to get rid of him.

There was a small rustle from behind him just then and Cole froze. His fiancée was with her parents that afternoon . . . the apartment should be empty. Turning slowly, his swallowed hard to see the barrel of a gun pointed firmly between his eyes. Lifting his eyes from the dark hollow, his eyes flashed wide at the sight of a pair of blazing green eyes set in a beautiful, pale face crowned in brilliant red curls. Another muzzle came to rest just under the curve of his jaw and a gravelly voice murmured almost gently in his ear, “Hello Mr. Granger . . . I think we three should talk.”

Flicking his eyes slowly to the side, he felt his stomach fall through the floor at the pair of frenzied brown eyes set in Jason Walsh’s face. “Agent Gamble . . . to what do I owe the pleasure?”

“I hear you’re a God-fearing man, Mr. Granger. Is that true?”

Cole nodded in silent agreement, stumbling as the man shoved him down hard into an armchair. “Well then, I guess you could call us your very own guardian angels, here to pass down a warning about what happens when good little Christian boys get involved with a crazy syn suka like Frank Lutz.”

Natasha Romanov’s smile was as gentle as a knife’s razor edge as she insisted, “May I suggest, Navan, that that’s stupid . . . very, very stupid.”

“Tell us where we can find him, Navan . . . or I can promise you that your pretty little fiancée won’t be getting much a man to meet her at the end of the aisle. Dong le ma?”

Looking up between the two of them, both so deadly and full of righteous vengeance, Cole could easily imagine them as two of God’s archangels sent to Earth to right great wrongs. Relieved that God had heard his prayers and sent someone to help him, he leaned forward on his elbows and vowed, “I’ll tell you anything you want to know.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) Chernaya Vdova I Skopa - The Black Widow and The Osprey (call signs for Natasha Romanov and Brian Gamble)
(R) Sladky - honey (Marina’s nickname for Jason)
(R) devushka - dear girl (a nickname Marina gives to Casey and Marta interchangeably)
(R) der’mo - shit
(R) chertov - puck
(R) syn suka - son of a bitch
(R) dong le ma - are we clear?
Yad Luchshi Drug Devushki

Chapter Notes

Please let me know what you guys think; I missed a lot of your reviews for the last chapter. To those that did review - Julorean, Alek Walker and CatLea - thank you so much. Your thoughts mean the world to me.

Translations are at the end of the chapter as always.

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 151: Yad Yavlyayetsya Luchsim Drugom Devushka

Natalya Alianovna Romanova was NOT Marina Ivanovna Petrovka.

She did not feel the need to be the least bit protective of the Grimm brothers, as they were fully grown men who had proven themselves capable – well, mostly capable – of taking care of themselves. Her need to protect Clint from himself was because he was her best friend and the words “hyperactive, overly-affectionate puppy” had never suited anyone more. And of course, Aaron was too sweet for words and Jason was usually as oblivious as a brick when he was glued to his computer screen and Brian was the love of her life . . . maybe. (Personally, she subscribed to the theory that love was for children. However, if there had to be a man in the world for the job, Brian Joshua Grimm was probably the one she’d choose.) Either way, she wasn’t protective. It’s just that occasionally she needed to check in on them . . . just to make sure they were all right . . . for her sister’s sake . . . really.

Okay, so fine . . . maybe she was a little protective; so sue her, they were family. She adored each and every one of them. And Natasha had always done what she could to protect those she loved.

Which could be why the sight of Frank Lutz, shooting the breeze in the middle of the day with a group of coked-out whores, set her blood on fire. Brian’s own form beside her was tense, muscles drawn tighter than a rubber band stretched to its limit. Reaching out without looking, she laid her hand on the jumping muscles of his bicep in silent admonition. The red-haired S.H.I.E.L.D. agent knew that her lover and partner had been struggling with Barney, trying to contain the monster the alter-ego became when free.

Their lovemaking as they waited for orders had been nearly animalistic. Brian had danced chaotically on the edge of too rough, though Natasha had said nothing. The lingering ache would leave her limping – if she felt like garnering a little unwarranted sympathy from her sisters and the other Grimm women – but the peace in him at completion had ultimately been worth it. Even if the very sight of Lutz had quickly destroyed it once again.

Taking a deep breath, he looked down at her with careful features. Lifting his hand to rest atop her own, he squeezed fondly. “You up for this?”

“Let me at ‘em,” she replied.

“All right then . . . you’re up. Good luck. And Tasha? Leave at least a tiny morsel for me, huh? I really want a chance to rip this guy apart.”

Going up on tiptoes to bit playfully at his lips, she promised, “You got it.”

Turning on her heels, she left her partner leaning back against the wall, coffee-colored eyes laser sharp as he nursed his beer. She could feel the way they burned through her clothes as they watched her saunter towards where the yeldak was practically molesting his shlyukhi on the other side of the club.

Adding a little extra sway to her strut for Brian’s benefit – she knew how much he loved to watch her hips move – she concentrated on getting into the right mindset for the job. Dropping effortlessly into Lutz’ lap, she forced her native accent as thick as she could make it as she drewled seductively, “Get lost, suki. Mr Lutz’s time has already been bought and paid for.”

The outcry from the rest of the women was immediate, though Lutz only waved them to silence with a gesture of his hand. His frown was tinged with too much alcohol to be truly suspicious even as he demanded, “By who?”

”Your friend, Mr Granger, has engaged my services for you . . . to repay you for everything you’ve done.”

The gleam in Frank Lutz’ eyes yanked at Natasha’s gag reflex as those beady eyes raked up and down over her frame. “Well now . . . that’s a good man then.” Grinning at Natasha, he spread his hand across the bared skin of her thigh in a proprietary manner. “I guess I’m going to have change my opinion of the goody-two-shoes after this . . . gonna have to trust that Navan will always do right by a friend.”

Natasha’s smile was small and secretive as she considered how Henry Cole had “done right” by his so-called friend. It was unfortunate that Frank Lutz would go to his death without truly understanding that Henry Cole was a good man at the core of him . . . the kind of good man who would sell out a former friend to save lives and set things right.

Leaning forward, she murmured into the shell of his ear, “How about you and I get out of here . . . find somewhere with a little more . . . uyedimeniye, shall we say?”

There was a lustful greed in those eyes as he drawled, “God . . . that’s hot. What language is that?”

There was a seductive purr in her tone as she replied, “Russkiy . . . Ya iz Санкт-Петербурге.”

Natasha felt her skin crawl at the sound of his shameless groan as he humped his hips up against the back of her thighs. “God . . . it sounds so dirty. I heard Russian girls are kinky . . . are you kinky, sweetheart?”

Her smile was more of a smirk as she slid gracefully off his lap and offered him a hand up. “I guess you’re going to have to come with me to find out.” Bending to grip his lapel, very aware of how much cleavage her garment was flashing, she whimpered quietly, “Let’s go . . . I can’t wait to get you alone somewhere.”

Gifting her with a lecherous grin, he agreed, “Well then . . . show me the way home, honey.”

Turning her back to him, she led him away by the hand as she mused silently, “Bozhe moi . . . the sooner we get somewhere private so I can kill this govnoyed, the sooner I can take a shower. I wonder if I can talk Brian to making me a sandpaper loufa?”

Biting down on her lip at the thought of her lover, she looked up through her eyelashes to see Brian watching the pair carefully. His head dipped in a small smile, acknowledging the plan that they had laid out together, one eye slipping closed in a quick wink. Her smile in return was just on the fluffy side of adoring before she pulled their quarry past him and he was out of her line of sight.

He took her back to the apartment Cole had told her he was paying for, which was quite obviously on the rough side of town. His furniture consisted of a rickety bed, an meager entertainment center and a ramshackle armchair. Shoving him into it, she moved to straddle him, her hands coming up to capture his face as he moved to kiss her. “I don’t kiss on the first date, Mr. Lutz . . . no offense, but how do I know where you’ve been.”

The grin on his face was shameless as his hands trailed down her sides to grip at her hips. “God . . . ya are a hot one.” Just about then, his eyebrows furrowed and he asked, “What’s yer name, pretty girl? I don’t think you ever told me.”

Natasha smirked as she replied easily, “People call me Chernaya Vdova.”

“That’s an interesting name.”

“My handler picked it for me.” Winking at him lightly, she laughed, “It suits . . . I promise.”

His hands were tight on her hips as she used her fingers to build his arousal carefully. Twisting her ring around her finger, she engaged the needle on the underside with her thumb. Careful to keep it from her own skin, she stroked her hands seductively over his shirt-clad biceps. “Take this off,” she ordered as she affected a breathless mien, giggling as his hands flew to fiddle with the buttons.

It was once he was shirtless and hauling her into his body that he demanded playfully, “So your name . . . what does it mean?”

Leaning forward, she scratched him with the poisoned needle on the ring as she whispered into his ear, “It means ‘Black Widow’.”

The paralytic on the ring was a fast acting one, and before he’d even processed the meaning of the name, his basic motor functions were already starting to shut down. His features were beginning to sag as the solution moved rapidly through his veins and left him without conscious control of his muscles. Shoving herself off of his lap, she moved to straighten her clothing briskly, at almost the same moment that Brian let himself into the tiny apartment behind her.

The agent offered his lover a trench coat, smirking at Lutz as Natasha wrenched it on and tied it tightly around her waist. Their mark was making grunting noises as he tried to say something, promptly the redhead to smirk. “I wouldn’t try to talk . . . I’ve dosed you with a poison called curare. It’s a powerful paralytic . . . and unless someone comes along with an antidote for you in the not too distant future, you will die of asphyxiation.”

Brian’s grin was vicious as he continued, “It’s just too bad that the doxy Detective Cole acquired for you left just before you suffered a fatal heart attack.”

At the name, realization dawned in Lutz’s eyes before he released a garbled howl of betrayal. Laughing cruelly, Brian crouched in front of the armchair as he explained, “That’s right, asshole; your friend set you up. And I can guarantee you that he will not lose a bit of sleep over it tonight.” His face twisted angrily as he hissed, “The detective you took a shot at? That was my little brother . . . and no matter my sins, there is one thing I will not allow . . . people fucking with my family. So enjoy what little remains of your pathetic life . . . no one is coming to save you.”

Standing, he placed a tender hand to the small of Natasha’s back. Brown eyes were soft and warm as they looked into disgusted green ones, asking gently, “Are you okay?”

“Yeah . . . nothing happened. But I need a scalding hot shower and at least a dozen deep-cleansing treatments. I feel like it’ll take me at least ten years to exfoliate enough skin from my body to lose the feel of his hands.” Shuddering, she moved to wrap herself into his arms. “Let’s just go . . . please? I just need to get out of here.”

Brian chuckled as he bent to press an adoring kiss to the curve of her temple. “How does a bubble bath with a handful of Epsom salts sound? And a massage . . . with maybe a little inappropriate touching? How does that sound?”

Natasha’s eyes were shining as she purred in response, “Only a little inappropriate touching? Why Brian . . . I think you may just be losing your touch.”

The growl he released pinged every single kink she had as he replied in a low rumble, “I’ll show you ‘losing my touch’ . . . I’ll ‘lose my touch’ all over the glorious backside of yours, Natalya . . . and when your ass is the color of my favorite of those red lipsticks that you wear, we’ll see whether or not you still think I’ve lost my touch.”

She groaned deep in her throat, her eyes rolling back in her head as she considered the picture he was painting. Smirking, she sashayed towards the door as she teased, “Promises promises, Agent Gamble. Let’s see you put your money where your mouth is.”
Brian grinned at the taunt, tossing a mocking farewell to the man dying behind him, “See ya around, Frankie-boy . . . enjoy that fire-and-brimstone in hell, huh? Cause I sure as hell don’t think you’re going anywhere else.” Waving over one shoulder, he laughed, “I’ll meet you there in another half-dozen decades or so; don’t wait up.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) 'Yad Luchshiy Drug Devushki - Poison Is a Girl's Best Friend
(R) yeldak - horse's ball sack
(R) shlyukhi - whores
(R) suki - bitches
(R) uyedineniye - privacy, seclusion, solitude
(R) Russkiy - Russian
(R) Ya iz Санкт-Петербурге - I am from St. Petersburg (in both Romanized Russian and Cyrillic)
(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God
(R) govnoyed - bastard
(R) Chernaya Vdova - Black Widow
Chapter Notes

Yay!!! New chapter is early!

Enjoy! Translations at the bottom.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 152: Gossip & Zagreb

Having received confirmation that Brian and Natasha had eliminated their little problem, Marina had spread the word that “Girls Night In” was ON. Sappy movies were mandatory and salacious gossip was absolutely encouraged. There would be wine, beer and a myriad of other alcoholic refreshments, as well as chocolate by the boatload.
The Grimm men had been summarily banished from the house, a frenetic Will Grimm and shy newcomer Sam Braddock included. The eldest Grimm had protested, seeing as his own home office was much more comfortable than his office within Command; a sweet, knife-edged smile combined with a vicious glare from his partner had effectively chased the Colonel from the house. Bucky had abducted Clint to his own quarters; Brian had retreated to the shooting range; and Hansel had taken both Aaron and Sam back to the base housing he now shared with AD Maria Hill.

Satisfied with the state of affairs, Marina flopped gracelessly into her favorite armchair and grinned. “This meeting of the Grimm Family Women is now in session.” Waving her vodka at her sister, she teased fondly, “All right, Vika, take it away.”

The newly-minted Viktoriya Coulson blushed at the immediate attention of the other women, head ducking as Veronika piped up, “Please tell me that you have at least trakhal on that car you bought him?”

If the blond had been rosy before, she was practically scarlet now. Dropping her face into her palms, she confessed quietly, “On the hood . . . the night we got married.”

Each of the girls oohed and aahed, before Natasha asked teasingly, “And how does it handle?”

Maria snorted in question, “Are we still talking about the car? Or Phil?”

Each of the Russians – Vika included – announced simultaneously, “Both.” Waving away the answer, the red-haired spy demanded, “So!? Answer the question!”

“The car flies beautifully and he named her ‘Lola’, after some movie, ‘Run Lola Run’. Frankly I don’t get the joke.” Turning to Marina, Vika reached to touch her knee, “He said to tell Jason thank you for the modifications.”

“I’ll pass along the message; having just gotten moy sladkiy into his girlfriend’s room at the hospital, I have no desire to distract him out of it again.”

Marta’s tone was quiet, her awe at being included obvious, as she inquired, “How is Detective Shraeger? Did anyone tell you anything about her prognosis?”

“She’s gonna be fine. The bullet did bounce off a rib, so she’s feeling every breath she takes right now. But she’s all right . . . Jay is just feeling the need to smother her within an inch of her life.”

“Good for him . . . it’s about time that he let Sarah go,” Maria remarked, one of the only two women present in the room who had seen how bad he was hurting after her death.

“Amen to that,” was the quiet agreement from all of the women in the room, even those who hadn’t been there back then.

There was a silence for a long moment, before Nika snarked, “I still want an answer to Natalya’s question. How does Phil handle?”

“THAT is none of your business,” the blond Russian squeaked, horrified.

“Come on, Vika . . . what exactly did you think we were going to gossip about?” Natasha teased, lifting her own vodka to her lips as she winked slyly.

“Why can’t we talk about something else?”

“Because you are married . . . and the first of US to get married. We want details,” Nika laughed.
“Not to mention, I need to know if I’m supposed to threaten him or something,” Marina drawled lazily, swirling her drink within the confines of her glass.

The Amazon looked horrified, squealing indignantly, “Marishka!!!”

“What?! I like Phil . . . and he almost deserves you.” Glowering at the continuation of her scandalized look, the brunette protested, “I am your sister! It is my job to be judgmental of your man! And let’s be honest, you’re all judgmental of Misha!”

Maria smirked in agreement, though Vika protested vehemently, “We are NOT!”

“The Colonel is perfect!” the black-haired assassin agreed insistently.

A burst of laughter erupted from Maria, even as Marina’s lips twisted in dismayed amusement. “First of all, Misha is NOT perfect . . . I have the diamonds to prove it. Second of all, don’t tell him you think that . . . I don’t want to deal with the teasing from his brothers as a result.”

“Don’t you mean you don’t want to deal with Will’s ego as a result?”

“No. Will has an ego the size of a gnat. A legitimate boost would actually be helpful.”

S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Assistant Director rolled her eyes as she snorted, “I don’t understand the Colonel. He is easily one of the smartest men in the world and yet he persists in being the most self-effacing man I know. God, even Hans is in possession of one of the most obnoxious egos I know of when he’s good at something and he knows it.”

“That is because in Vati’s opinion, he is an ultra badass. And that is true . . . he is. However, in Misha’s opinion, he was built to be the way he is; he feels no pride in anything he had no hand in and didn’t directly earn. Hell, it took me years to convince him to be proud of his rank!” Knocking back her drink in one shot, Marina sighed, “He doesn’t even understand why moy dorogoy moy solnyshko look up to him. When someone mentions it, you can literally read the scrolling script across his forehead. ‘Does not compute’ . . . ‘Does not compute’ . . . It’s so chertov frustrating.”

“So why would his brothers tease him for something like that?”

“For exactly that reason; if you were to tell him you thought he was perfect, it would be another ‘does not compute’ moment. Send him into what I call ‘Super Agent/Hyperactive Analyst’ mode. And quite frankly, I hate it. His sleep cycle gets even more fucked up than usual.”

Maria chuckled wryly at the disgruntled scowl on her best friend’s face. “I’ve seen him stuck in SA/HA mode. He suddenly gets even more efficient and very punch-drunk. The practical jokes and pranks his brothers play on him get even more hilarious by the end.”

“Either way, I spend the next three months freaking out about his health, force feeding him Ambien and glucose tablets. So let’s not and say we did. Okay?” she asked rhetorically, before chirping cheerfully, “Okay!”

The virologist’s tone was timid – Marina’s eyes narrowed as she considered the younger woman, making a mental note to do something about that debilitating shyness of hers – as she insisted, “I like the Colonel. He’s a good man and Aaron adores him.”

“All of his brothers adore him. Getting Misha to accept that is a whole other kettle of fish.”

The AD chuckled as she commented lightly, “You know that’s why his guys would follow him anywhere, right? He’s a good officer because of his unwillingness to be a conceited asshole.”
The S.H.I.E.L.D. handler’s smile was small but very, very proud as she replied, “Yeah . . . I know.”

Meanwhile, Director Nicholas Fury was having a VERY bad day.

Currently, he was glaring at the two men seated across from his desk. The Secretary of Defense and IMF Mission Commander Swandeck seemed unmoved by his visible displeasure, prompting a low growl from the man. “To what do I owe the annoyance, gentlemen? I have an agency to run and no time for bureaucrats.”

“We are here regarding a top secret assignment for one of your top agents. We have need of his particular skills, heading up a task force in Croatia.”

“And why the hell would I give any of my agents over to head one of your task-forces? After all, Ethan Hunt may be a moron, but he is still one of your best agents . . . and yet you continue to disavow him every time he turns around.”

The Secretary of Defense frowned at the statement, removing his glasses and wiping the lenses clean. Replacing them, he replied arrogantly, “Frankly, you have no choice, Director Fury. Agent Brandt is not just one of your agents . . . he is also a Colonel in the United States Army. And as such, is under the direct supervision of the Department of Defense. I am here as a courtesy, Director. I do not need your acquiescence; I can compel him with or without your compliance.”

Fury withheld a growl only by sheer willpower, before sighing heavily. “All right . . . I shall inform Agent Brandt to assemble his team . . . “

Swandeck interrupted brusquely, “We have no need of any of your agents except Agent Brandt. We have a team already assembled, waiting for him to take command.”

Bursting into uncontrolled laughter, the one-eyed man smirked at the over-confident mission commander. “I don’t think I understand. Are you telling me that you’re taking just the commander of my best squad and leaving the rest of them here!? They are my best for a reason.”

Neither of the other two men were laughing, however, and Fury could already hear the rant that would result when Marina found out that Will Grimm was being deployed without her. Lifting one hand to his face, he pinched the bridge of his nose viciously as he muttered under his breath, “Oh fuck . . . this is going to end well.”

Everyone knew the minute that Marina Petrovka was informed of her partner’s solo assignment. It was hard not to know; the whole base heard her reaction to the news. Fury was still bracing himself when the Russian whirlwind came ripping into his office, demanding furiously, “There is no fucking way that Misha is going anywhere NEAR Croatia without me!! Are you kidding me⁉️”

“Marina . . . my hands are tied.”

“Then untie them . . . it’s Croatia!! Nothing good happens to Grimms in Croatia!!”

Smiling sadly at the woman, Fury shook his head. “I am, in fact, aware of the superstition that you and your boys subscribe to concerning the country. However, this isn’t S.H.I.E.L.D.’s call; this came down from the SecDef himself. The DOD is hauling Will there, on behalf of the Impossible Missions Force.”

The Russian’s eyes narrowed angrily as she hissed, “The IMF⁉️ You’re letting the DOD poach my lover for the IMF⁉️ Oh sure . . . let’s just get Misha killed while we’re at it! Or worse, DISAVOWED!”
The former General’s one visible eye crinkled in amusement as he teased, “I’m sure there is a Harry Potter joke in there somewhere.”

The woman’s glare could have melted icecaps, as she hissed, “Do I look like I’m in a joking mood, Nick?”

There was a heavy sigh as the man conceded heavily, “No, you do not.” Shaking his head, he railroaded over whatever she would have said next. “That, however, does not change the fact of the matter. Agent Brandt is being temporarily reassigned. There is nothing you, nor I, can do about it. The best thing to do for the moment is to spend what time you can with him before he’s deployed then beat the ever-living shit out of the baby agents while you wait to hear news.” Standing from his chair, he came to wrap his hands gently around her biceps as he swore, “I tried to get you deployed with him, Marina, I swear it. I know how protective you are of Will and I would never have let him go alone if I could have avoided it. Unfortunately the Secretary is not being particularly sympathetic to my argument.”

The director could almost hear the handler’s jaw grinding as she hissed furiously, “God I hate the IMF.”

Smirking lightly in acknowledgment, Nick agreed, “Join the club.”

Chocolate eyes slipped closed as Marina began to take deep breaths to try and calm the rage building like a cancer in her heart. When they opened again, they were flashing like lightning as she vowed, “If anything happens to him, Nick . . . I will not be held responsible for my actions. Understood?”

One corner of his mouth tilted upwards in unspoken agreement, before the man referred to most frequently as “God” watched her round on her heel and storm out again. Chuckling heavily, he took a moment to feel sorry for the junior agents that would be forced to accommodate her wrath, before allowing himself the opportunity to enjoy the thought. “Poor bastards . . . they have no idea what kind of hell is about to rain down on their heads.”

A long, torturous week later, Marina Ivanovna Petrovka’s fearsome legend had expanded through word of mouth . . . and Croatia had become the closest thing to hell in a hand basket for one William Michael Grimm.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) trakhal - fucked (as in fucked like bunnies)
(R) moy sladkiy - my honey (sladkiy is Marina's nickname for Jason Grimm)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel)
(R) moy dorogoy i moy solnyshko - my darling and my sunshine (Marina is referring to Clint and Aaron Grimm respectively.
(R) chertov - fucking (as in fuckity, fuck fuck fuck :D)
Partners First . . . Partners Always

Chapter Notes

Hey! Lookit this! New Chapter ALREADY!!! Enjoy!

Translations at the bottom, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 153: Partners First . . . Partners Always

When Marina finally received some kind of news about her lover, she was in the middle of beating a snot-nosed baby agent into the training mat. Four of her Misfits – Bucky, Sam, Clint and Aaron – were standing off to the side, with Sam’s eyes wide with awe as the other three cheered her on in exuberant Russian. The former Howling Commando had been given possession of her phone, with orders to inform her if it so much as beeped. So when the phone began to ring, it was with concern that the ocean-eyed man pulled it from his pocket with a low call of her name.

Spinning on her heel, she put the heel of her other foot low into the boy’s gut and dropped him wheezing onto the mat. Holding stance for another moment to make sure he stayed down, the Russian accepted the towel Aaron tossed her way as she moved to take the cell from her mentor. Eyes narrowing at the display, she considered what it could mean that Nick Fury was calling her cell less than a week after Will had been dispatched, without any backup whatsoever, to Croatia. Taking a deep breath, she swiped her thumb over the display and answered briskly, “This is Petrovka.”

“Agent Petrovka . . . pack your shit. There’s a Quinjet waiting on the tarmac to take you to Zagreb.”

“Zagreb? But I thought SecDef . . .” she questioned in confusion, jaw tightening as Nick interrupted forcibly, “I don’t give a damn about SecDef right now . . . Brandt needs you there, so you’re going. You have a problem with that?”

Her eyes narrowed at the harried tone under his calm and she knew instantly that whatever had happened to her partner was bad. “No sir . . . ETA with the airport is five minutes.”

“Good . . . call me when you hit the ground. And Marina?”

“Yeah Nick?”

There was a pause, before he spoke again. “If something were to happen to SecDef once you and Brandt were back on American soil, I don’t think I would particularly mourn for him.”

And it was about then that Marina knew that whatever had happened wasn’t just bad . . . it was fucking worse. Her eyes hardened as she glared at the wall, growling out, “Understood sir.” Hanging up the phone, already moving to the door of the gym, she muttered under her breath, “Slava Bogu for go-bags.”

The six hours it took the Quinjet to get to Zagreb, Croatia, were agonizing, though the five minute drive by taxi to the hotel was almost worse. She arrived to see the place crawling with DOD assests and American Special Forces. Striding to the desk, she gave the cowed young man a brilliant smile as she greeted, “Hi . . . I’m looking for a William Brandt? I believe he has a room at this hotel?”

He stammered awkwardly for a moment, before finally managing to spit out in halting English, “I am sorry, gospođa, I am not authorized to give out that information to anyone who is not already a patron here.”

Drawing her sidearm and laying it carefully on the counter in front of her, she could feel her smile turn to a vicious smirk as she watched his eyes widen in fright at the sight of it. “Maybe I didn’t make myself clear. I am his wife and I need to know what room he is in. Right now.”

Blinking a couple of times, obviously debating internally on whether to take her at her word or not, he took one more look at the gun and rattled off the room number. Holstering her weapon once again, she nodded briskly with a chirped, “Thank you!”

Fortunately, the hotel was old and decrepit and picking the lock was kind of like taking candy from a very inept child. She walked cautiously into the room, fully expecting to have her partner’s gun in her face in less than a second. Instead, she found Will seated on the edge of the bed, attired in a dirty pair of fatigue pants and a very thin white undershirt, with his head in his hands. His hair was standing on end as though he had spent more than a few of the last days shoving his fingers through it, his shoulders hunched under some terrible weight that hadn’t been there the day he’d left her arms less than a week ago.
Taking a deep breath, she was encouraged to see that the sound finally garnered a reaction; almost immediately, she was staring down the barrel of a Glock 9mm pistol, her lover’s eyes widening imperceptibly as the sight of her registered. “Samaya malen’kaya?”

She said nothing for a long moment, before announcing into the silence of the room, “You look like you could use a cigarette, a stiff drink and a good fuck . . . in that order.”

His laughter was dark and bitter as it barked from him unwillingly. “Are you offering to do something about that?”

Setting down her overnight bag on the table, she pulled a pack of Lucky Strikes and a lighter from the side pocket, offering them to him silently. When he took them, she went back to rummage through her bag for an unopened bottle of Glenfiddich whiskey and a pair of highball glasses. Pouring at least four fingers of whiskey into the bottom of the glass, she turned to offer it to him. He was still staring at the pack, thumb rubbing reverently over the brand name on the front of the cardboard. “You can’t get ‘Strikes in the States anymore. They’re my favorite brand.”

Her smile was sad at the awed tone of his voice, replying lightly, “I know . . . that’s why I picked up a pack at the airport. Nick made it sound like whatever had happened was bad.”

His snort was brittle and wounded, as he muttered viciously, “Understatement of the century.”

Gesturing towards him with the glass, she ordered firmly, “Drink this.”

He took it from her, knocking back at least half, before setting it aside to fish out a cigarette and light it easily. He took several deep drags before holding the smoke in his lungs for a long moment, as he watched his beloved Marishka shed her trench coat to the floor. The scarlet color of the wrap-dress she wore complimented her pale skin tone perfectly, though the Colonel didn’t really get to admire the contrast for very long. Marina reached for the knot at her hip, pulling it lose so that it too fell open around her, sliding down her arms to puddle on the floor. Now half-naked, she at last stood before him in only a pair of crimson side-tie panties with a matching bra that was little more than a large bow over her breasts. Blowing out the lungful of smoke, he gave her a more genuine smile as he insisted, “God . . . it’s good to see you.”

Moving to straddle his lap, she cupped his cheeks in her palms as she breathed against his lips, “I know.”

His eyes slipped half-closed at her nearness, reveling in the scent of her familiar perfume and the well-known silk of her skin. Ducking his forehead against her lips, he murmured wretchedly, “Marina, I . . .”

Pressing one finger to his lips, she shook her head firmly. “Later. First, you need some sleep . . . you look like hell, moy lyubimov.”

“Hold on a second . . . I got my cigarette and my stiff drink. What about my good fuck?” he asked dryly.

Chuckling, and more than a little relieved that he was able to tease her, she laughed, “Frankly Mishka, I don’t think you could stay awake long enough to make it worth my while. Come on . . . sleep first, fantastic sex later.”

“You promise?” he asked, as she busied her fingers with stripping him efficiently of his clothes.

Chocolate eyes were adoring as she vowed, “I promise.”
Those multi-colored eyes of his were a dark grey, tortured by what he had seen and whatever it was that had happened since he’d been gone. Marina pretended not to see, bustling about the room as she prepared them both for sleep. Finally, once he was bare to the skin and tucked comfortably into bed, Marina turned to toss his filthy fatigues into the fireplace. Will jackknifed upwards as he protested, “Wait!”

Marina only glanced back over her shoulder as she tossed the matches in, the fabric catching like tinder as the fire blazed merrily. “Those clothes are filthy and utterly destroyed. I brought you spares; you can manage without these.”

The Colonel’s lips curved upwards slightly as he shook his head in bemusement. The Russian waited for him to speak, before tossing in a few logs to keep the blaze burning brightly and pushing herself to her feet. Crossing to her bag, she rummaged in its depths once more in pursuit of one last bit to ease Will into whatever kind of sleep he could manage. Finally, her fingers brushed against fragile pages and a heavy leather spine, digits closing around it reflexively as she pulled it from the depths. The analyst frowned at the sight of the familiar tome as she carried the book back to the bed, sliding under the covers beside him and letting him curl up against her side. “That’s your fairy tale book . . . the one you used to read to the boys.”

Marina’s only reply was an affirming hum as she began to flip pages in search of one in specific. Seeing that she had no intentions of answering him, he reached up to lay his hand over one page to pause her in her efforts. “Marina . . . I don’t have a story in that book. I never have.”

One corner of her lips curved upward sadly as she looked down at where he lay cuddled up against her ribs, the absent fingers of her free hand delicate in the wisps of his hair as she drew designs against his scalp. There was confusion in his eyes as he looked up at her, promptly her to smile at him fondly and bend awkwardly to capture his mouth in a sweet but piercing kiss. “Just because I have never read to you from this book, Misha, does not mean that there is not a story for you in it. Now hush . . . close your eyes and get some rest . . . I’ll still be here when you wake up.”

The deep breath he took then moved her at least as easily as it moved him, before he nodded against her abdomen and cuddled just that little bit closer. Returning her attention back to the book, she continued to sketch her fingers across his topknot as she read the title aloud in a calm and soothing tone. “The Steadfast Tin Soldier . . . by Hans Christian Anderson.

“There were once five-and-twenty tin soldiers. They were all brothers, born of the same old tin spoon. They shouldered their muskets and looked straight ahead of them, splendid in their uniforms, all red and blue. The very first thing in the world that they heard was, ‘Tin soldiers!’ A small boy had shouted it and clapped his hands as the lid was lifted off their box on his birthday. The boy immediately set them up on the table. All the soldiers looked exactly alike . . . except one. He looked a little different as he had been cast last of all. The tin was short, so he had only one leg. But there he stood, as steady on one leg as any of the other soldiers on their two. But just you wait and see; he will be the most remarkable one.”

Initially caught off guard at the story, it was a moment before a feeling of lightness stole over the Colonel and he could feel a corresponding smile began to tug at his lips. Allowing his eyes to fall closed, he pressed his nose between the indentations of her ribs and just listened to her read. Almost before he even realized it, he was asleep.

Marina knew the moment he’d fallen asleep, as his body suddenly became dead-weight against her. Continuing to read quietly, she flipped through the story of the resilient little soldier who fell in love with a beautiful paper ballerina. His adventures were vivid in detail, as he left his familiar world and experiences the cruelties of the outside, before at last being reunited with his beloved. The tale ended... tragically, with both toys being lost at the hands of fire and careless children.

When the story was over, the Russian handler stretched carefully to lay the book on the nightstand and turn off the light. Her fingers continued to stroke through her lover’s hair, as she prepared to spend a wakeful night chasing nightmares. Allowing her eyes to slip closed, she tilted her head to rest her chin upon his temple and began to whisper a silent prayer against his skin, once again appealing for the grace of a god she found it hard to believe in. The words she spoke were in quiet Russian, her whole frame hopeful that her partner could hear and would be comforted by them.

“Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy Kingdom come, thy Work be done . . . on Earth as it is in Heaven. I know that I am not one who has any right to your grace or your favor; my hands are unclean and I hold the weight of lives on my conscience. But once again, I come to you a penitent supplicant and beg of you my heart’s purest desire . . . true peace and dreamless rest for the man I love best in this world.”

Taking a deep breath, the former assassin considered her wish silently, before picking up the plea again. “Misha is a good man . . . the very best of men and better than a killer like me will ever deserve. Therefore, it is my fervent wish that I can find the words to ease his heartache over what has happened here. Please, help me to know what to say to help him heal. Help me to find the strength to be strong while he is weakened by his fear. Help me to combat his grief with both truth and stillness.”

Bending her head further, she rested her cheek against his hair as she murmured one last request, “Help me to love him enough to stay when he tries to send me from him . . . no matter what prison his pain creates. I love him dearly and would not give him up for the world. Give me serenity in the face of his anger and forgiveness in the face of unkind rage.”

Breathing slowly, she considered the content of her plea and knew that there was nothing else she could request. The absence of each of those things would be the best case scenario; and Marina Ivanovna Petrovka had learned long ago to never expect the best case scenario. Reaching up carefully she crossed herself slowly, as she continued to lay flat on her back beside her lover, her tone a reverent whisper as she closed her prayer, “In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost . . . Amen.”

Will’s voice was a quiet, sleepy reply of, “Amen.”

Rolling her eyes lightly, she smirked fondly as she admonished quietly, “Sleep, moy vozlyublenny . . . our problems, as well as our joys, will still be here when you wake.”

“I better get my good fuck,” he scolded quietly, already three-quarters of the way back into Morpheus’ Land of Dreams.

Chuckling at his persistenrence, she vowed firmly, “You will . . . I swear it.”

“Good . . .” he purred sleepily, nuzzling his nose into her briefly, before insisting, “It’s late, Marishka . . . go to sleep.”

Shaking her head, Marina insisted quietly, “I can’t . . . who else is going to watch over you, if I fall asleep?”

A Will-style smirk lifted his lips lazily as he drawled, “That sounds vaguely creepy. Should I be worried that you intend to molest me in my sleep?”

“I promise you, Mishka . . . if I’m going to be molesting you, you’re going to be awake, participating and enjoying every second.”

A true grin stretched the corners of his smirk as he teased, quoting Firefly lazily, “Are you always this sentimental?”

“I had a good day.”

“What’s so good about it?”

“I’m with you.”

“That’s not much.”

Bowing her head, she whispered in his ear as he tripped further towards sleep, “It’s always been enough for me. Spi spokoyno, lyubov’ moya . . . we’ll talk when you wake up.”

Of course, she would have been much happier if the first thing out of his mouth the next morning was something other than what it was. He woke up, clear-eyed and solemn, eyes fixed on the wall opposite, prompting Marina to roll towards him and look him firmly in the eyes. Neither of them said nothing – no good mornings, no I love yous, only the silent intermingling of breaths as they watched each other – before at last the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler broke the stillness with a desperate plea. “Misha . . . tell me.”

He stared at her, eyes shading from haunted grey to icy blue, before announcing brutally, “Our civilian . . . the asset’s wife we were protecting . . . she’s dead . . .” here he paused again, eyes slipping closed wretchedly as he continued, “. . . and I’m responsible.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(Russian) Slava Bogu - Thank God
(Croatian) gospođa - ma'am
(Russian) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina) (Russian) Misha, a dimunitive form of Mikhail/Michael (Marina's most common nickname for Will) (Russian) moy lyubimov - my love
(Russian) moy vozlyublennyy - my beloved (one of Marina's nicknames for Will) (Russian) Spi spokoyno, lyubov’ moy - Sleep well, my love

(Also, the lingerie set that Marina is wearing is a thing. BlueBella Tatiana Open Cup Bra with Matching Side Tie Panties. Feel free to paste the link and take a look. They're very pretty and totally sexy. http://m.figleaves.com/uk/product/BBA-23117/Tatiana-Open-Cup-Bra-And-Tie-Side-Brief-Set/?productColourId=729799 )
Chapter Notes

Sorry guys, this chapter was heartbreaking for me. I rewrote it like three times, before Will finally got to say what he wanted to say, the way he wanted it said. I hope you enjoy this . . . it's a good chapter.

As always, translations are at the end of the chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 154: The Thing About Croatia . . .

Marina frowned at his declaration, protesting instantly, “Misha . . . you are not singularly responsible for every thing that goes wrong on every op ever. Regardless of what General Ross and the rest of the ublyudki at the Hoover Base expected of you, you are not perfect . . . you are every bit as human

Partners, Lovers, Soulmates . . .

To the world you may be only one person, but to one person, you may be the world.
- Heather Cortez
as the rest of the men and women inhabiting this oblazhalsya mir.”

Flopping backwards onto his back, he glared at the ceiling as he insisted tightly, “I was built to be better than human . . . I don’t have the luxury of saying, ‘It’s okay, I’m human’, when I fuck up.”

Biting down on her lip for a moment, she watched him for a moment, before murmuring fondly, “Misha . . . that reasoning is a path of destruction . . . the only place it will lead you is to pain and heartache. Please . . . don’t let Ross get into your head like that. He’s not worth your self-recrimination.”

Throwing himself from the bed, he barked viciously, “And what about the man whose wife is dead on my watch!? Is HE worth my so-called self-recrimination!?”

Sitting up, she watched him pace back and forth and seemed to know that the true cause of his distress was not the death of the civilian woman he had been assigned to protect; there was too much guilt in his demeanor for that to be the case. Will Grimm was a lifelong soldier, and both of them had seen more than their fair share of colossal cluster-fucks in their careers. Sometimes people died, and sometimes they weren’t always just soldiers; civilian casualties happened . . . rarely, but the fact remained. She had never seen the death of a civilian throw him this far off of his equilibrium, however. And it was that foreknowledge that she came to the realization that his pain came from a much deeper place. Taking a guess at it, and knowing the rage she was risking if she guessed wrong, she prodded lightly at the newly festering wound. “If you could have done even one thing differently . . . would you have?”

Bowing his head into his hands, he sagged in on himself as he replied, “Yes . . .” There wasn’t even a second’s pause, before he shook his head and insisted, “. . . no . . . maybe? . . . I don’t know . . .”

Holding out one hand to him, she coaxed him tenderly back onto the bed beside her. “Come sit with me, moy vozlyublennyy . . . start at the beginning . . . tell me everything.”

Staring at her for a long moment, he finally moved to sit beside her on the bed, his hand clasped around hers in a death grip. Taking a deep breath to calm his raging emotions, he lifted their hands to his lips and pressed a fervent kiss to the inside of his partner’s wrist. Finally, he straightened and began to speak. “It should have been the easiest assignment in the history of the world. I mean seriously, I had done just this sort of mission a million times with no problems whatsoever. And usually, it’s cake. But this time . . . well, to be honest, things starting going wrong from the moment I stepped off the plane. The IMF had debriefed me en route. It was pretty straightforward; a protection detail, nothing that I hadn’t done before. I have a certain amount of luck with these kinds of assignments, so when the IMF approached SecDef about it, I was the first person on his short list.

“I had just arrived on base and deplaned . . . I wasn’t even past the first five minutes of being on the ground. It literally took me five minutes to walk into the hanger bay where I was supposed to meet the team SecDef had put together and I walked headlong into a full out brawl between two of my team. Apparently, there was some lingering resentment over some chick they’d both fucked at some point in the last fifteen years and the bad blood had yet to flush out of either of them.” There was a self-deprecating huff of air as he reached up to rub at the back of his neck, before continuing “I got a little bruised breaking it up, but nothing serious . . . still, usually that’s when I know an assignment is going to give me a shitload of gray hair by the end. I have never lost it at a team like that. By the time I had finished ranting about decorum and discipline and exactly what I would do to them if they fucked up on my watch, I was fairly certain that they could at least be professional if nothing else.”

“Please tell me there were threats of massive amounts of blood and pain. Because seriously? In-fighting over a woman while on mission? What the literal hell? Talk about unprofessional!” Marina interrupted furiously, a fierce scowl on her face. Will could practically see the gears turning behind her eyes as his partner pondered the kind of mayhem she personally would have unleashed if she’d been the one to walk into the situation he had.

As it was, the Colonel only smiled at her fury as he promised, “I may have threatened to send the Chernaya Vdova and the Skopa after them if they didn’t shape the fuck up. Apparently, Brian and Natasha’s reputations are well known and widely feared enough that this was sufficient.”

“Good . . . chetovy pridurki.”

Rolling his eyes at her ferocity, the Colonel only patted her clenched hand fondly and continued to recount what had happened. “Anyway, considering my first impression of this so-called ‘crack team’, I knew better than to expect great things from them. Fortunately, I had a day to organize and get everything settled before our targets arrived.” Snorting lightly, he insisted, “It took 24 hours for each and every one of those pricks to hate my guts. I have never run a team to ground like that before. But at least their thoughts of petty jealousy were crushed by their exhaustion by the time we really got to work.”

Marina’s tone was exasperated and long suffering as she insisted callously, “As it should be!”

Will’s lips curved into a small smile as he scolded fondly, “Marishka . . .” The woman’s only response was a careless shrug as she waved him on with his story. “Anyway, a couple days in, I received intel from IMF’s counter-terrorism unit that a Serbian hit squad was zeroing in the male asset. According to what I was told, he’s some kind of Super-Agent for the IMF; hence, why the two require covert security when they take a vacation. Apparently, the hit squad had it in for him and they were planning some kind of retribution for an operation he had been on recently. At least that was my guess . . . everything Ops could tell me was vague and a whole lot convoluted.”

“Well that’s damnably comforting,” the Russian muttered caustically, before ducking her head under her lover’s glare. “All right . . . I’m shutting up! You were saying . . .”

“They say that forewarned is forearmed, right? Obviously I knew what was coming so I made adjustments to compensate. I rearranged watch schedules . . . switched partners around . . . made sure that I had all the bases covered. There was no reason to believe that this new intel would in anyway negatively affect our mission.”

Flopping backwards on the bed, Will was quiet for a long moment, before he muttered bitterly, “At least it shouldn’t have.” Seeing the guilt building under his stoic façade once more, Marina sprawled out besides him and cuddled close, her head tucked under his chin familiarly. For a moment, he was motionless, before his arms came up to wrap around her and hold her close to him for a long moment. “Marishka . . . I don’t know why, but that intel . . . it nagged at me. It didn’t matter what I tried, I couldn’t let it go . . . some part of me just kept going back to it.” Pressing his lips to her forehead, the analyst paused again, before continued, “I just kept thinking that I should find someway to tell him what I knew . . . someway to tell him what was coming for him. And even as I struggled with how to tell him, I knew I couldn’t tell him. Orders are orders . . . and I had orders not to break cover no matter what the reason was.”

The two were silent for a long time, Marina’s fingers drawing absently over the indentations of his abdomen as they laid there together. When her lover spoke again, the guilt had once again consumed him as he choked out his next words, “I should have found someway to warn him . . . I should have done something to let him know . . .”

At that confession, Marina vaulted upwards, rounding on him furiously, “Done what?! Break protocol? Disobey orders?! Mishka, you know as well as I do that the Brass . . . the IMF . . . hell anyone with any stake at all in this op would have hauled you up before a review board so fast your head would still be swimming by the time you turned 80.” Shaking her head furiously, she insisted vehemently, “No way . . . when in doubt, we follow protocol. Every soldier learns that in basic training. Hell, YOU learned that before you were even old enough to talk!”

Will’s lifeless eyes were locked on the ceiling, his tone completely emotionless as he replied, “And because I was so busy following protocol, that woman is dead.”

Marina grabbed his shoulder and shook him hard, forcing him to look at her. “People die in this business, Misha, everyday . . . through no fault of yours. It sucks, but it happens. Their deaths are NOT your fault. No matter how much we want to, we can’t save everyone.”

Will rolled his eyes as he slumped against the wall, as he muttered petulantly, “You have to say that, because you’re my girlfriend.”

The Russian’s lips pursed as she reminded him dryly, “No . . . I actually ‘have to say that’, because you are currently being irrational and I am your XO; that’s my job.” Folding her arms over her chest, she continued, “Being your girlfriend is not really as important as that right now.”

It was a credit to Will’s good sense that he said nothing in response and simply continued recounting the events of the last week. “About three days later, the man finally left their hotel room. Prior to that moment, the assignment since the targets had arrived was a cakewalk. The couple spent the majority of their time in their hotel room . . . they received their meals through room service . . . housekeeping delivered fresh towels . . . the concierge arranged for anything that they wanted. Frankly, except for the fact that I had read their files, I would have insisted that they were honeymooners.” Rolling his head back to stare up at the ceiling once again, he sighed heavily as he confessed, “When he left his room, I was on watch . . . along with the two idiocy that were fighting that very first day.”

“You’d partnered them together?”

“I have always said that the easiest way to work out differences is proximity and accessibility. To date, it’s worked out to my benefit. I think this is the first time that that theory has ever come back to bite me in the ass. Though, not through any fault of their own.” Blowing air through his lips, he rubbed tiredly at his eyes as he recounted, “He was dressed to go running, and I had already planned to leave the surveillance work to the two of them and go for a run myself so I was already dressed for it. Besides as team leader, it was my responsibility to follow the asset. I left the other two to keep an eye on the wife, with a few well-placed threats to remind them of what I would do to their individual careers if I found out that they spent the time focusing on their ‘girl problems’ and not on their jobs.

“Even now, I can’t say if leaving them to watch over her was a good idea or if it was a bad idea. Either the man is a machine, or I need to get out from behind my desk more often.”

“Mishka, moy vozlyublennyy, you’re neither fat nor slow, so I’m going to go with him being a machine,” she teased, her nose wrinkling and earning the first real laugh she’d heard since she’d arrived.

“’L’stets, (Flatterer,)” he replied in kind, throwing the pillow at her fondly. The action earned a playful scowl and a saucy wink, as she caught the missile and threw it back at him once again. “Do you want to hear this or not?”

Rolling her eyes, she sighed heavily as she confessed, “Frankly, I prefer the sound of your laughter. It has been noticeably absent for the last twelve hours.” Will’s cheeks went rosy at the comment, before she sighed and continued with her thought, “However, that being said, yes I do want to hear this. Go on.”
He snorted, lips curving upwards into a smirk, before he frowned once again. “You know as well as I do, the Cahills were genetically enhanced to be physically superior over the average human being. Even field agents at S.H.I.E.L.D don’t usually have the kind of speed or endurance my brothers and I have at long distances. After a certain point, though, even I was having a hard time keeping up with him. He would have left the two of them in the dust without even breaking a sweat. However, if they had been following him then I would have been watching over her and maybe things would have ended differently. As it was, we were gone from the hotel for a little over an hour.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. handler frowned at the information, holding up one hand to stall whatever he had been about to say next. “An hour long run? That’s excessive . . . even for a field agent. I wonder what he was trying to avoid?”

“Disagreement with the wife? Phone call with the in-laws? Cramp from too much sex?” here Marina smirked a little, before Will shrugged carelessly, “To be honest, I have no idea. All I know is that I didn’t realize anything was wrong when we first arrived back at the hotel. Not until I found my guys unconscious where I’d left them and the agent’s wife gone.” Slumping onto the edge of the bed, Will shoved his fingers back through his hair, shuddering at something only he could hear, “The sound that man made when he realized that someone had taken his wife? That sound will haunt me for the rest of my life, Marishka . . . I have never heard a sound like that one before. And I hope to God that I will never hear it again.” Taking a deep breath, he dropped his face into his hands. When he spoke again, his voice was muffled as he confessed, “They found what was left of her body three days after she disappeared. And yesterday, I was being debriefed by the Secretary of Defense when he received the phone call that the agent, whose wife I had failed to protect, had been arrested for killing six Serbian nationals in cold blood . . . an unsanctioned hit. I don’t think I need to tell you that he was immediately disavowed. He will spend the rest of his life in a foreign prison, and no one will even care.”

Dropping to her knees in front of him, Marina’s hands came up to cup around his own, their fingers threading in the short strands of hair at his temples. Lifting her chin, she nuzzled against him affectionately, tangling her lips easily with his. After a momentary eternity, she pulled back and asked him again, “If you could have done even one thing different, Misha . . . would you have done it?”

His eyes were already closed, but Marina could see the muscle around them squeezing them just that little bit tighter as he considered the question. Finally, he breathed in a broken voice, “No . . . God, Marina, even knowing what I know, I wouldn’t have done anything differently. What kind of person does that make me?”

Marina’s arms came around his neck as she pulled him into her body, feeling him bury his face into the curve of her throat as he once again began to sob. Her fingers were tender in the strands of his hair as she replied honestly, “The person I love . . . come hell or high water . . . no matter what, I will always love you.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) ublyudki - bastards
(R) oblozhalsya mir - fucked-up world
(R) moy vozlyublenny - my beloved (one of Marina's more common nicknames for Will
(E) SecDef - shorthand/slang term referring to the Secretary of Defense
(R) Chernaya Vdova - Black Widow (the codename for Natasha Romanoff, given to her by the Red Room and the KGB)
(R) Skopa - Osprey (Brian Grimm's S.H.I.E.L.D. codename)
(R) chertovy pridurki - fucking assholes
(R) Misha/MIshka - diminutive version of Michael/Mikhail (Marina's most common nickname for Will; his middle name is Michael and Marina is the only one who uses this nickname)
(R) idiots - plural for idiots
(R) L'stets - flatterer (commonly used by both Will and Marina, as neither is very good at taking compliments)
Chapter 155: Decisions

If you asked him, Owen Elliot would swear that he knew his former CO better than almost anyone . . . the obvious exception of Marina Ivanovna Petrovka not withstanding. After all, Colonel William Grimm had been more than his commanding officer; they had been colleagues and friends for years. Based on the way the Spec Ops soldier clung to his partner’s hand and kept those quicksilver eyes of his eyes on the ground as the two strode from the inside of the Quinjet that Director Fury had sent to collect them from Zagreb, Croatia . . . whatever had happened, it was bad. And whenever things got that bad before, there had always been only one thing to do; get well and truly drunk.

Marina’s eyes were confused then relieved as she caught sight of Owen seated behind the wheel of their ancient Army Jeep. Smiling at her relief, he nodded in answer to her silent question. Watching as she tugged an unresisting Will along beside her, she greeted the former Division asset cheerfully, “Up to no good again, Lucky?”

He gave her a cheeky grin, cornflower eyes firmly locked on his friend’s pale features. “Always, Boss-Lady.” Turning his attention onto the other man, he greeted calmly, “How are you, Boss?”

The Colonel’s smile was tired as he replied, “You know.”

It wasn’t a question and Owen refused to treat it like one. Shrugging one shoulder lazily, he agreed casually, “I know enough. So I reiterate . . . how are you, Boss?”

Those eyes slipped closed as he took a deep breath, taking the offer of a chance to evaluate, before answering honestly, “It’s been a long week, Luck.” Looking around, he finally took notice of the obvious absence of his brothers and inquired, “Where’s the boys?”

“They’re at home . . . I figured that the best thing to do for you right now was not to let them smother you . . . though I’m gonna be honest, it was almost a near thing with your Dad. That man is stubborn when he’s of a mind to be. He’s worried about you though . . . they all are.”

One corner of his lips curved upwards as he promised, “I’ll be all right. I need some sleep, in my own bed, and I still haven’t gotten my good fuck, but I’ll be all right.”

Owen chuckled at the look on Marina’s face, her lips quirked into an amused frown, “Priorities, Misha . . . SecDef has never been a particularly patient man.”

Almost in one voice, all three of the Spec Ops soldiers –current and former – muttered viciously, “Asshole.”

Offering his partner a hand into the backseat of the Jeep, Will waited for her to situate herself comfortably before hauling himself into the passenger seat. Dropping his head back against the seat rest, he could feel Owen and Marina’s eyes on him, both waiting for orders from the man who had been their commanding officer for as long as either of them had been soldiers. There was a long pause, before he smirked and insisted, “Let’s go get drunk.”

Owen’s grin was there and gone again before he agreed cheerfully, “Whatever you want, Boss-man.”

The younger man gunned the engine and tore off the tarmac, manipulating the Jeep into a recklessly high speed effortlessly. The wind – and the base gate – rushing past caused a burst of joyous laughter from Marina, the woman pushing herself to stand against the crossbeam, arms out behind her and face tilted into the wind. The Cleaner watched in the rearview as the Colonel reached up to thread a finger in one of her belt loops, his own laughter mixing with his partner’s comfortably. Shifting gears, Owen manipulated the car effortlessly through the increasingly heavy traffic, trying to get as far from the base as was possible.

It wasn’t long before he pulled up outside what was clearly a roadhouse-style dive bar. Parking efficiently, he swung out from the driver’s seat with a grin. “The best place to get trashed in the area. Promise.”

Will chuckled as he clapped the younger man on the shoulder, his other arm slung comfortably over Marina’s shoulders. “I think I should be worried that you know that. I’m fairly certain that you’re not supposed to drink.”

“I’m pretty sure that today is a good reason for an exception,” Owen reminded him lightly, reaching to haul open the door and usher the other two inside.

Stepping into the resulting gloom, Marina had to blink a few times in order to reconcile her eyes with what she was seeing. There were plank tables scattered haphazardly across the floor, with tacky neon signs decorating every available inch of wall. “Damn . . . what the hell is this place?”

“It’s called ‘homey’, Boss-lady. Personally, I like it . . . it’s my kind of place.”

The Russian snorted lightly, eyes rolling as she muttered, “Of course it is . . . it’s about as classless as bars get.”

Will chuckled lightly, insisting, “Frankly I don’t care what the hell it is. As long as the whiskey is good and the beers keep coming.”

Cornflower blue locked on chocolate brown, the two junior officers making a silent vow to keep an eye on their CO that night. Accepting Will’s offered AmEx Black card, Owen gestured the couple towards a table in the corner, before moving quickly to the bar. Tossing the card onto the counter, he waved the bartender over. “I need a round of your local drafts, with a pair of whiskeys, neat. Glenfiddich if you have it, and if not your best Bourbon.”

The young man cocked an eyebrow, before turning to check the wall of alcohols he had in stock. “I don’t have Glenfiddich, but I have Yellow Rose Outlaw. It’s expensive, but it’s worth it. Caramel and vanilla . . . sweet and rich . . . tastes kinda like a really good dessert.”

Glancing over his shoulder at where the Power Couple of the Brothers Grimm were sitting, he considered Will’s slumped shoulders and Marina’s worried frown before turning back and nodding. “Two shots, make them both doubles. Go ahead and set up a tab on the card; we’re gonna be here awhile.”

It took a bit of maneuvering, before Owen was moving to join the other two. Setting a glass of beer and both shots in front of Will, he offered Marina her own glass of beer and kept one for himself. “So, are we going to toast to the lost?”

Will’s smile was sad and whimsical as he replied, “Don’t we usually?”

Marina reached out to lay her free hand over her lover’s, smiling as his hand twisted in her grasp to squeeze her hand tightly. “So, to Mrs. Julia Meade-Hunt . . . may she rest forever within God’s embrace, blessed always with peace and grace.”

“To Mrs. Hunt,” the two men intoned, raising their glasses in silent salute. The moment was sober for a long moment, before Will tossed back the first of his two shots sharply. Marina’s lips quirked as she teased, “Did you even taste it?”

“I don’t particularly care about what it tastes like, as long as I am well and truly trashed before the end of the night.”

Owen smirked, nudging the other glass forward, “The bartender says it tastes a little like dessert. But if you’re only interested in getting well and truly trashed tonight, I’ll make sure that I just get you the cheap stuff from now on.”

“With any luck, the cheap stuff will get me just as drunk as the expensive stuff.”

“I’m pretty sure that’s the way it works,” Marina laughed, cutting her eyes towards the stage that graced one wall of the bar. Taking in the set-up around the stage, she mused lightly, “I wonder if they do karaoke here or if they only do live music.”

Will’s grin was almost real as he inquired, “Why? You planning to sing tonight?”

The Russian batted her eyes at him, as she purred, “Why? Do you want me to sing tonight?”

Picking up his beer, Will took a quick sip, eyes brilliant blue over the rim as he stared at her. Setting the glass down, he gave his partner a small smile as he reminded her, “You know how much I love to hear you sing, samaya malen’kaya.”

Owen chuckled, rolling his eyes at the familiar flirting between the two people in the world he actually considered his friends. (Well, he considered Nikita a friend too, but he was pretty sure that Nikita just thought he was annoying. But they never really had seen eye to eye about anything. It wouldn’t surprise him to learn that they didn’t see eye to eye on their relationship either.) Taking a drink of his beer, he snorted lightly as Marina gave her partner a saucy wink and strode toward the bar. Will’s eyes were burning in their sockets as he nursed his beer, his eyes firmly fixed on her hips as she fairly strutted across the room. Shaking his head in amusement, Owen insisted lightly, “You are a lucky bastard, Boss.”

“I’m fairly certain I’ve heard that said before,” Will agreed fondly, one corner of his lips curving upwards as his Russian proceeded to convince the bartender to turn on the sound system on the stage. The woman reached up to rake a hand back through her curls, twisting to look back over her shoulder at him. Sending him a wink, she turned back to her conversation. “God . . . she’s beautiful. What the hell did I do to deserve her?”

S.H.I.E.L.D.’s best Cleaner chuckled even as he shrugged an answer. “Hell if I know, Boss. But whatever it was, you did good. She worships you.”

At the statement, Will broke into honest laughter, doubling over with the force of it. “You have obviously never seen her mad at me. There have been a couple times I thought she was going to turn me into sludge.”

“Like when?”

“When she found out about the Cahill in Budapest, and that I had known about him for a month without doing anything. Admittedly, not all my fault, as I tried to send a team and was refused. Even still, she was pissed . . . not for very long, but I had a moment where I really thought I was going to be sleeping on the couch for the foreseeable future.”

The blond snorted as he muttered, “Sure . . . if the foreseeable future was like a minute. I’ve heard all about how you two don’t sleep well if you’re not sleeping together.”

Just then, a squeal of feedback from the stage speakers echoed through the bar, causing everyone within hearing distance to flinch from the sound. Then Marina’s voice came out through speakers, clear and smooth. “Okay . . . that wasn’t supposed to happen. Sorry!”

Turning away, she practically skipped toward the soundboard and fiddled for a moment before moving back to the microphone. “Testing . . . testing . . . one, two, three . . . Hey! It works!” Wrapping one hand around the microphone, she adjusted it slightly as she took a deep breath. “So I know it’s not karaoke night or anything, but there is man here that I love who loves to hear me sing. And since there is all this wonderful sound equipment and no one to use it currently . . . I am borrowing it for at least the next couple of minutes. If you have a problem with that . . . that is the door.”

After nodding once towards the young man manning the soundboard for her, she turned her attention onto Will’s face. The opening strains filled the massive room, the melody one that Will didn’t recognize though it must have been one Marina was familiar with as there was no screen with the words displayed in front of her. Those chocolate-brown eyes were affectionate and warm, before they drifted to half mast as she began to sing.

"I Surrender"

There’s so much life I’ve left to live
And this fire is burning still
When I watch you look at me
I think I could find the will
To stand for every dream
And forsake this solid ground
And give up this fear within
Of what would happen if they ever knew
I'm in love with you
'Cause I'd surrender everything
To feel the chance to live again
I reach to you
I know you can feel it too
We'd make it through
A thousand dreams I still believe
I'd make you give them all to me
I'd hold you in my arms and never let go
I surrender

I know I can't survive
Another night away from you
You're the reason I go on
And now I need to live the truth
Right now, there's no better time
From this fear I will break free
And I'll live again with love
And no they can't take that away from me
And they will see...

I'd surrender everything
To feel the chance to live again
I reach to you
I know you can feel it too
We'd make it through
A thousand dreams I still believe
I'd make you give them all to me
I'd hold you in my arms and never let go
I surrender

Every night's getting longer
And this fire is getting stronger, baby
I'll swallow my pride and I'll be alive
Can't you hear my call
I surrender all

I'd surrender everything
To feel the chance to live again
I reach to you
I know you can feel it too
We'll make it through
A thousand dreams I still believe
I'll make you give them all to me
I'll hold you in my arms and never let go
I surrender

Right here, right now
I give my life to live again
I'll break free, take me
My everything, I surrender all to you

Right now
I give my life to live again
I'll break free, take me
My everything, I surrender all to you.”

Out of the corner of his eyes, Owen could see that where there had previously been disinterest from the other patrons, people’s heads were now beginning to turn to watch her sing. However, the majority of his concentration was on the couple. Marina’s full attention was on her lover, the sweetness in the words resonating in her voice, her mood both earnest and adoring. Those chocolate eyes were mirrors, reflecting everything she was feeling in that moment. And if she was fixated on Will, then the Colonel was equally fixated on her.

Sitting back in his chair, the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent watched them watch each other and knew his best friend was going to heal. What had happened sucked – and Owen did know more about what had happened than he knew the Boss would ever feel comfortable telling – and the healing process was going to take time. At the end of it all, though; after the grief, and the guilt and the desolation had passed, Will would be okay. Marina would sacrifice every inch of her own happiness to make sure of it.

When at last the song was over, and the final note was still ringing through the room, Marina said nothing. The crowd, even as small as it was, had erupted into applause but she didn’t even notice them. The Russian simply stepped off the stage and strode to stand before her lover, her hands coming up to cup his cheeks as she bent to press her lips lightly against his own. The words they spoke were quiet and just between them, meaning that he would never dream of eavesdropping, but even still, it wasn’t hard to hear the Colonel whisper, “I love you.”

Hiding his smile in his beer, Owen waited for Marina to retake her seat, before teasing, “I think you were a little flat on that last note, Boss-lady.”

“Bite me, Lucky,” she replied brightly, her nose wrinkling at him.

Will only laughed, shaking his head as he took another drink of his whiskey. “You two are incorrigible together. I don’t know why I ever thought that you should be friends.”

“Too late . . . any damage done is officially your fault. Besides, who else would you go drinking with after a cluster fuck like Croatia?” Owen asked, his tone serious. Will only hummed in solemn agreement, earning Owen a fierce scowl from the man’s worried partner. Taking a deep breath, the younger man shook the thoughts of Croatia away and nudged the nearly full glass of beer in the Colonel’s direction. “Drink up, Boss-man. The night is young and we are not even close to being drunk yet.”

After that, it was an unspoken agreement that they would not speak of Croatia again until Will spoke of it first. Neither Owen nor Marina missed the fact that from that moment, they did a majority of the talking. For the most part, the Colonel was silent as he knocked back drink after drink, his eyes turned inwards as he clearly wrestled with some decision only he could make. When he did finally speak, he drew both of their immediate attentions, not that either one of them thought they’d heard him right anyone. “I beg your pardon?” Marina inquired, her eyes wide at the words she thought she’d heard from him.

Will took another drink, before setting it down and leaning forward on his elbows. “I’ve decided to leave the field. I can’t do this again; I can’t handle having to make that kind of decision again.”

To be honest, the Cleaner wasn’t surprised by the declaration, but based on the look on Marina’s face, she was. Jolting forward, she laid one hand over his and insisted, “But what about your brothers?”
“What about them? They’re big boys . . . they don’t need me.”

“Yes they do. You’re their brother, their CO . . . the only one they’ve ever had. They trust you, in the field and out of it. You can’t just leave them without a commanding officer.”

“So you can take my place.”

“There isn’t a single member of the Brass who would ever give me that job. I’m not CO material, Misha and you know it. My job has always been to go where I’m led and unleash hell where I’m told.” Squeezing his hand tightly as she watched him move to protest, she continued, “I will support you, no matter what choice you make. If you want to leave the field, I won’t try to stop you. All I ask, is that before you make any permanent decisions, just think about your brothers and whether or not you could leave them with someone who would only exploit them in the field. Okay?”

Giving her a small smile, he turned his hand upwards to lace their fingers together. “Okay. I’ll think about it. But I am going to have to talk to Fury sooner rather than later. He’s going to know what happened and he’s going to want to know what happens next.”

“He’s the Magnificent Bastard, Mishka . . . he’ll wait for your answer for as long as it takes for him to get the one he wants,” Marina reminded him with a fond roll of her eyes. It was no secret that Marina and Nick Fury were good friends, closer than some siblings – a thought that tended to terrify everyone who knew them. “Just take some time to think it over. No one is expecting you to have all of the answers right now.”

Nodding once, he leaned forward to kiss her briefly, before lifting his newly replenished glass of whiskey and tossing the double shot back. From there, things got a little hazy.

He woke up the next morning in a bed at the base hotel, there was a legion of tiny men beating on the sides of his skull and Marina tucked comfortably under his chin as she slept beside him. Looking around with a frown, he caught sight of a slip of paper on the nightstand beside him and reached carefully to pick it up. Owen’s handwriting had always been sloppy and the constant reports he was forced to fill out for S.H.I.E.L.D. really hadn’t done much to change that. Squinting, it took a moment before the Colonel was able to force his vision to clear enough to read it.

“Boss, I know you need some space, so we made the decision to put you both up here for awhile.
The Boss-lady talked to your father and your brothers. Like I said, they’re worried about you, but they understand that you need some time to sort through your thoughts. Just remember to call your father; if my son had gone through something like this, I would want to hear his voice for myself.
But after that, take your time. There’s no rush. If you need to talk, I’ll be around. – Lucky.”

Smiling with relief, Will’s eyes slipped closed as he muttered under his breath, “Thank God for good friends.”

Marina’s tone was seductive as she stretched along his body as she purred, “Indeed. So . . . how about that good fuck, Colonel?”

Pinning her effortlessly to the mattress, he growled into the shell of her ear, “About damned time, Major.”

At the usage of her former rank, Marina’s whole body melted and Will proceeded to make the next several hours worth her while. It would be a long time before she would be able to move without feeling the delicious ache in her body, but by the end it had been absolutely worth it.

It was a full week later before Will found the answers he himself was looking for. And once he had them, he found himself in Director Nicholas L. Fury’s office, standing at parade rest across the way from his desk and his eyes fixed on a spot over the man’s left shoulder. Fury seemed to know that no matter what he analyst said, Will wasn’t going to change his mind and SecDef probably wasn’t going to like it. “So . . . what do you want to do, Agent Brandt?”

“I’ll go into the field for S.H.I.E.L.D. I’ll remain the CO of the Brat’ya Mrachnyy. But I won’t go back to the IMF; I don’t want to consult for them in any capacity whatsoever, whether it’s as a field agent or as an analyst. I’m done with the IMF; there is no power on this earth that will ever force me back there. Agreed?”

Nick’s grin was honest as he nodded once, “Agreed. And Agent Brandt . . . I’m glad you’ve decided to stay with S.H.I.E.L.D. We need you.”

Once delivering his decision, Will had been on his way out. Fury’s declaration paused him halfway through the doorway. Turning back, he clutched the doorframe as he insisted tightly, “I’m not staying for you.”

It was only after the door closed that Fury sat back in his chair and smiled solemnly, “I didn’t think you were.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

samaya malen’kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
Misha/Mishka - diminutive of Mikhail, the Russian form of Michael (Marina's most common nickname for Will; Will's middle name is Michael)
Brat'ya Mrachnyy - The Brothers Grimm (The code name for the Army's Spec Ops unit, of which Will, Marina, Jason, Aaron and Clint are the sole members)
Chapter 156: Family Life

Sam Braddock had seen the best and the worst of men; nearly ten years with the JTF2 will do that to you. The shadows that haunted the Colonel’s eyes when the couple finally returned home were reminiscent of the same ones he saw in his own eyes when he looked in the mirror . . . the same ones he saw in Aaron’s eyes, Clint’s eyes, even Brian’s eyes. So when no one said anything about what had happened on Will’s solo assignment, Sam simply followed suit and let himself get swept up in the tide.

He’d enjoyed the last few weeks in New York, but as the 27th got closer and closer the entire family could see the sunny-haired young man starting to shut himself off. Finally, desperate for a problem he could fix, Will stepped in. He found the younger man sitting on the front porch, summer blue eyes watching the cars passing by lazily. “Sam? You okay?”

Blinking in surprise – clearly, the former sniper hadn’t heard the Colonel coming up behind him – Sam twisted to look up at the family’s commanding officer. Seeing the genuine concern in his eyes, Sam forced a half-hearted smile. “Yeah . . . I guess.”

Dropping easily onto the porch next to him, Will leaned back on his hands and tilted his face into the sun. “You wanna talk about it?” he asked, eyes at half-mast as he enjoyed the peace and quiet of the day.

“It’s almost the 27th . . . I have to be in Toronto on the 27th. I guess I just don’t want to go.”

There was a soft snort in response, before Will replied, “Didn’t Aaron tell you?”
Sam’s eyes narrowed slightly as he asked, “Tell me what?”

“I have some friends in Toronto; your new Commander Hollaran, for example. I called in a few outstanding favors. You don’t have to report for another few months. You don’t have to, of course, but we’d like you to consider staying with us. Marina is concerned that you’re too skinny, and she’d like the chance to fatten you up a bit. And I know Marta would like you to stay for awhile . . . be with the family.” Glancing at him out of the corner of his eyes, he asked, “And, if you’re interested, Marina and I both think you’d be a hell of an asset to S.H.I.E.L.D.”

Sam’s jaw dropped at the endorsement. He’d never admit it in a million years, but he’d been curious about a career with S.H.I.E.L.D. ever since Aaron and Marta had dragged him along with them to New York. “But what about the Strategic Response Unit? I can’t just blow them off, can I?”

“Actually, your appointment to the SRU would be of considerable use to S.H.I.E.L.D. We’ve been trying to get an agent into their ranks for at least the last ten years.” Leaning forward on his elbows, Will glanced at the younger man out of the corner of his eye. Seeing the small, excited smile, he chuckled, “You’d have to go through all the same basic training, of course, but Marina and I could tutor you. We’ll get you fast-tracked out in time for you to head off to Toronto.”

“Why does S.H.I.E.L.D. care about a police unit?”

“The SRU is more than a police unit. They’re SWAT and hostage negotiators and peacekeepers all in one heavily armed package. They have their fingers on the pulse of the entire city . . . and S.H.I.E.L.D. wants someone on the inside, because there are a lot of situations that the SRU handles that are of considerable interest to S.H.I.E.L.D.” Seeing the question on his face, he shrugged lazily, “Terrorist attacks by groups on S.H.I.E.L.D.’s watch list . . . hostage negotiations – we try to collect as many good mediators as we can . . . they’re very useful – and of course, the displaced soldier or two who need a place to help them feel useful again.”

Sam’s eyebrow cocked at the comment as he joked dryly, “Are you trying to say something?”

Chuckling at the tease, Will shrugged nonchalantly, “Actually no . . . though I guess it does apply to current company, doesn’t it?”

The two men sat quietly for a long moment, Sam nibbling restlessly on the inside of his lip, as he considered the offer he was being given. “You don’t think I’m not suited for it? I mean, I killed my own best friend.”

“Yeah, about that . . . I’ve been making some inquiries into the incident. It wasn’t your fault.”

“What do you mean? I put a 50 caliber bullet through his skull from 2 kilometers away.”

“Yes, you did. But he had been briefed about your assignment, and he knew the exact parameters of your kill zone.” Turning to look at Sam, he asked calmly, “So he knew that by being there, he was probably gonna get killed. And yet he was there anyway. The question, of course, is why?”

Sam’s eyes were wide, his tone horrified as he breathed, “No one told me that he knew. Why wouldn’t they tell me?”

“I don’t know. But I’ve put enough pressure on a few friends that they’ve opened an inquest into it. I’m sure there’s a perfectly legitimate reason for why he was there; the inquest will make sure we find out what it was.” Reaching out to squeeze his shoulder briefly, he insisted, “But in the meantime, know this . . . it wasn’t your fault. He knew where you were going to be shooting and you didn’t know he was going to be there. It’s no one’s fault. As much as it sucks that your best friend is dead, it’s no one’s fault. All right?”

The look of confusion on the younger man’s face broke Will’s heart, causing him to reach out and pull him into an uncharacteristic one-armed hug . . . just like he would for any of his younger brothers. “You’re a good soldier, Sam . . . an exceptional sniper and I would be proud to have you covering my back anytime. If you want the place at S.H.I.E.L.D., it’s yours . . . you just say the word.”

Though Sam could still feel the guilt deep in his chest, it no longer felt as though it was going to choke him every time he took a breath. Leaning unconsciously into the embrace, the blond nodded once, “I’d like that.”

“All right then. Meet me at my office tomorrow morning and we’ll get your recruitment file put together and a few required signatures. You can join the rest of the junior agents in their classes tomorrow afternoon. Sound good?”

“Yeah . . . thank you, Colonel.”

Will chuckled at the response, squeezing the boy’s shoulder as he teased, “Sam, you’re family. I think you can call me Will.”

The two were silent for a long moment, before Marina’s voice drifted through the house. Her tone was liltting and cheerful as she called, “Boys . . . wash up for dinner! We’re about five minutes away!”

Twisting to look back through the screen door, the Colonel called in a laughing voice, “Marishka . . . they’re not five years old anymore. You remember that, right?”

Marina’s tone was caustic as she snapped back, “You have met your brothers, right? Get that delectable ass in here, Colonel . . . just for that, you have been elected to make the salad.”

“You love my ass!” he laughed, winking at Sam as the two men moved into the house and toward the kitchen together.

“Of course I do . . . and I’m fairly certain that I am not the only one with lascivious designs on it.”

Trapping the diminutive Russian in the corner, Will bent to whisper against her throat, “Maybe not, but yours are the only designs I plan on entertaining.”

The woman’s eyes narrowed, even as she fought to suppress a playful smirk. “That’s because you are a smart man . . . and you know how many ways I can kill you with my pinky finger.”

Chuckling, Will murmured against her lips, “Promises promises, Marishka.”

“Bite me, William Michael,” she snapped briskly, though there was no heat behind the statement, earning a flash-fire grin from the Colonel as he saluted in reply, “Just tell me where, devochka.”

Whatever she had been about to say in reply was cut off by the sound of Clint’s gagging from the doorjamb. “Guys . . . we eat what comes out of this kitchen. Come on!”

Sam was grinning as he turned towards where Aaron and Marta were gathering dishes for the table. “Are they always like this?”

“Worse . . . this is actually pretty tame all things considered. They’re pretending to be well behaved because we have company . . . just wait until they get used to having you around. That’s when all bets are off and you should probably invest in a good blindfold and some decent earplugs.”

Marina’s scowl was fond as she ducked out from under her partner, snapping a tea towel in the operative’s direction. “Hush you . . . no commentary from the peanut gallery.”

“Love you, Marishka,” he teased, dodging out of the way deftly.

“Shut up . . . set the table already. I can hear your stomachs growling from here. Geez . . . you’d think I didn’t feed you or something. Sam . . . do me a favor and set out the silverware. Marta has the plates and, if Aaron will stop laughing at me, he has the glasses. All we need is the silverware.”

“Sure thing, Ms. Petrovka.”

“It’s Lt. Colonel Petrovka or Agent Petrovka. But family usually just calls me Marishka. You should probably get used to it.”

Ducking his head at the acceptance inherent in the kindhearted tease, Sam blushed lightly as he agreed, “I can do that.”

“Good . . . silverware . . . march. And Clinton Francis, don’t you even think about putting those filthy arrowheads on my nice tablecloth! I would swear you were raised in a barn, if I didn’t know better!”

Clint gave her a wicked grin as he insisted, “I blame all undesirable characters flaws on the circus.”

Chocolate eyes rolled as she muttered in a long-suffering tone, “You would.”

Quicksilver eyes were shining in amusement as he rested his palms against her shoulders, a quick kiss to her temple soothing her temper effortlessly. “Where’s Dad, Clint? And Bucky?”

“Pops is still washing up and Bucky was just getting out of the shower; apparently there was an incident with a baby agent and a bucket of something sticky on the way back from the shooting range.”

Marina’s jaw tightened at the insinuation as she hissed, “Is he still having problems with the baby agents? Who’s ass am I going to have to kick to get it through their heads that he’s an ALLY now?! For crying out loud, he’s a Level 7 agent!”

Will’s hands tightened slightly, preventing the woman from storming off in search of some retribution, as he soothed, “Ass kicking later . . . dinner first. Take a seat, Marina; Bucky can take care of himself. If he needs us to step in, he’ll ask us to, okay? Deep breaths, samaya malen’kaya.”

The woman humphed in disappointment, even as she allowed her lover to pull out a chair and steer her into it. Looking at the rest of the family currently assembled, he gestured around the table, “Sit down, guys, before dinner goes cold. Dad and Bucky will be down as soon as they’re done washing up.”

From there, dinner was a harmonious racket as everyone got seated and began to pass the food around. It wasn’t long before Hansel and Bucky both arrived in the dining room, Hansel taking the empty seat on the other side of Natasha and Bucky slipping into the seat beside his boyfriend, after pressing a sweet kiss into his hair. As for Sam, he was forcibly seated between Marina and his aunt, the two women conspiring to load his plate with more food than he could ever imagine eating at a single sitting. When he tried to protest, the Russian only shushed him fondly, as she scolded, “You’re entirely too thin, Sammy-honey. If you’re going to be an agent with S.H.I.E.L.D., you’re going to need some more meat on your bones. Now hush and eat your dinner.”
Amused by her tendency to mother everyone she loved, and touched that he was included, he simply nodded in agreement, “Yes ma’am.”

“Good boy. And for dessert, I made blackberry tarts from scratch.”

Clint cheered in excitement, earning an exasperated chorus of his name from the entire table. “What!? I love blackberry tarts . . . and it’s not even my birthday!”

At which point, the whole table dissolved into laughter. And, to Sam's surprise, that laughter didn't stop for the rest of the night.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

devochka - girlie
samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
Chapter Notes

New chapter! Yay! Not many translations today, except the usual ones. Enjoy!

On a side note, I have an artist sketching and painting some real art for the UALP instead of just my lame banners. I hope you'll enjoy them once she's finished with them. I'm see the first drafts for the first and it is beyond lovely!

Either way, guys, enjoy! Thanks again to everyone who reviewed the last chapter. It always means so much to me. Love you guys! You are the best of all time!

Last thing and then I'm done, thanks be to Amerou who came up with the Indiana Jones Drinking Game, as well as what they should drink for! Thanks Amerou! We love and miss you so much! If you guys haven't read her Hansel/Maria story within this verse (written with permission and input from me) you're missing out. Check it out! Link at the bottom of the page!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 157: Come What May

Hansel was trying not to smother his eldest son. He was, but there was a wounded look in Will’s eyes, where usually there was calm and stoicism. And despite his desire to fix it, the fierce look in Marina’s eyes whenever someone came too close to mentioning the “Clusterfuck That Shall Not Be Named” was enough to dissuade even the most idiotic of men. And say what you want, but Johannes Frederick Kuhn was not stupid.

For the moment, if for no other reason than to ease his overprotective paternal instincts, both Hansel and Maria had taken up a temporary residence in Hansel’s former room. Marta had been assigned quarters on base, and she, Sam and Aaron had decamped there for at least a little while, so that Hansel could smother is son, without actually smothering him. Because Marina was small, but she was deadly, especially when it was her lover she was protecting.

It was late, and once again he found himself sharing the couch with his bleary eyed eldest as they each sipped on their poisons of choice. The television was on and turned to Will’s preferred Nick At Nite reruns, though whether the Colonel could see them through his exhausted daze was up for debate. “Adler, hyu need sleep, mein Sohn. I am sure that Marishka is keeping the bed warm for hyu . . . go and join her in it.”

Before he’d even finished speaking, Will was shaking his head. “I can’t sleep . . . I don’t want to close my eyes right now. I just . . . I keep seeing what happened.”

“Do hyu vish to speak of it mit me?”

Will’s smile was a shadow of his usual one, even as he shook his head, “No . . . not right now. I just want to try to forget for a little bit . . . please?”

Grunting in agreement, Hansel returned his attention back to the television, and for a long time the two men were silent. At long last, only a handful of hours before the sun rose, his son finally returned to his bed and the sleepless woman who awaited him there.

The next day found Will up and out of the house at his usual time, a cup of exceptionally strong coffee in one hand and his briefcase in the other. Hansel could see the strain and the tension in his adoptive Tochter, though the Russian said nothing as she went up on tiptoes to kiss her lover and send him out the door to work. It was only after Will was gone, that Hansel stepped forward and wrapped one arm around her shoulders. “Come . . . Spatzi is waiting for us both at our home . . . there is alcohol and there is company . . . it vill do hyu good.”

It looked as though Marina would protest of a moment, before catching sight of the stern look on Hansel’s face. Sagging in on herself, she gave him a meager grin as she agreed, “That sounds fantastic.”

Squeezing her shoulders tightly, he grabbed her coat and forcibly herded her towards the door. Knowing better than to argue, Marina only gave a small smile and allowed herself to be guided along. The sight of her best friend, offering a triple shot of vodka, was a balm and Marina could feel her heart lightening for this first time in days. “Hello, Vorobyey.”

“Marishka . . . you look like shit,” the Assistant Director announced, earning a twisted smirk from the other woman. “Thanks, Maria . . . you are a balm to a troubled soul . . . really.”

Chuckling at the deadpan delivery, Maria deposited the drink into Marina’s outstretched hand and looped her elbow through Marina’s own. “Come on you . . . I’ve got all three of the Indiana Jones movies that count queued up on the DVR and a whole lot more vodka where this came from.” Dropping her forehead to rest against Marina’s own, she vowed, “No matter what, Marishka . . . Hansel and I are here whenever you or Will needs us.”

Caught off guard by the sentiment, Marina could feel her throat closing around where her heart had lodged. Marina had not cried since seeing the damage to her partner’s soul as much as she would have liked to; Will had needed her to be strong and detached, a stalwart shelter from the storm of his own emotions. To have a shelter of her own . . . it meant more to her than she could ever truly express. Mindful of the alcohol she held, she lifted her arm up and pulled her best friend into a firm hug, burying her face into the curve of Maria’s S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform. “Thank you,” she managed to choke out, feeling the tears starting to sting at the corners of her eyes.

“You’re welcome,” was the whispered reply, the AD’s arms just as fierce and tight around her best friend’s waist.

There was a warm smile on Hansel’s face as his arms came up to encircle both of his favorite women, a fond kiss to Marina’s forehead and a passionate one to Maria’s lips his own comment on the situation. “Come . . . I think now is a very good time to get very drunk.”

Snorting, Marina lifted a hand to wipe at her face. Nodding in agreement, she laughed, “I am absolutely down with that plan.”

The three settled onto Maria’s couch, which was miraculously free of discarded clothing, both clean or otherwise . . . a state of affairs that Marina was pretty sure was Hansel’s doing. After all, the Russian had seen the chaos that was Maria’s quarters when she lived alone; it would have put a frat house to shame. Unable to resist the chance to tease the two, Marina laughed, “So what’s it like having a live-in neat freak?”

Maria grumbled good-naturedly as she pouted. “Just because the house was always a mess, doesn’t mean I didn’t know where everything was. Now, it takes me hours just to find my keys!”

“Hyur keys are in the bowl by the door, where they always are. If hyu cannot find them, meine Spatzi, that is the fault of no one but hyu,” Hansel sallied, a broad wink and a grin a clear indication to Marina that this was not the first time the couple had engaged in this conversation.

Sticking her tongue out at her fiancé in a very un-Maria-like manner, the former military intelligence officer stood from the couch and headed towards the kitchen. Hansel only chuckled, and got up to grab the remotes and begin the first movie. Marina sunk into the overstuffed comfort of the armchair, leaving the couch for the other two, sipping contentedly on her alcohol.

Maria came in, three bottles of alcohol held in one hand and two glasses in the other, as she insisted, “So, if we’re going to watch Indiana Jones, we are going to play an Indiana Jones drinking game.”

Grinning, Marina chimed in, “Double shot every time Indy loses his hat!”

Toasting the suggestion, the AD cheered, “That’s the spirit. Also, a shot every time the theme song plays. And every time someone makes a reference that Hans doesn’t understand.”

“Done!” the Russian laughed, at the same second the German protested petulantly, “HEY!”

The two women collapsed into giggles, just as the screen came to life and the opening sequence began to play, along with the theme song. “Cheers!” Marina cried, toasting the room and the television, before knocking back her first drink, with both Hansel and Maria following suit shortly after. Snuggling back into her chair, she allowed herself to get comfortable and spend some time with two of the people she loved best. “Thanks guys . . . I needed this.”

Maria reached out and squeezed her hand warmly, winking, “We know. Fucking Croatia.”

“I’ll drink to that!” the S.H.I.E.L.D handler laughed in agreement, knocking back yet another drink. "Fucking Croatia should fucking fuck itself, fuckers!"

It was halfway through the second movie, Temple of Doom, that Marina caught sight of Hansel and Maria indulging in a heavy make-out on the couch. “Oh wow . . . so that’s actually a thing.”

Teal eyes blinked up at her best friend, eyes sheened with a lustful haze, as she inquired, “Huh?”

“I’ve always known that you two engage in ill-advised, sexy things when you’re wasted, Vorobey, but this is more than I needed to see of you two.” Pushing herself from her chair, she was pleased to discover that she was only a little unsteady on her feet, tossing the couple a cheerful salute. “I’m going to go shoot some targets for awhile, but really, thank you. I needed this.” Waving at them to stall Maria as she moved to stand, the Russian insisted, “No . . . it’s okay. I can see myself out. You two have fun! Don’t do anything I wouldn’t do.”

Maria laughed, unable to resist the chance to tease her best friend. “It’s you, Marishka, so I’ll take that for what’s it’s worth.”

As Marina was shutting the door, she was pretty sure that she heard Hansel complaining in groaned German that he did not need the mental image of Will and Marina engaging in THOSE kinds of activity. Glancing back, she watched as her best friend laid a finger over those lips and husked sexily, “Hush now, this is a sexy times only zone. Leave all other thoughts at the door.”

There was another growl from her Vati, the context informing Marina that unless she wanted an eyeful, it was time she got gone. Grinning, she turned away and headed towards her own home to get her favorite gun to take with her to the range. Maybe one of her boys would be willing to go with her; tempers were high at the Grimm house . . . a little shooting practice probably wouldn’t go amiss. Maybe some knife throwing to round things out; hands-on was always much better for pounding out whatever issue was stringing them along. Or maybe Bucky wouldn’t mind heading to the gym for some one-on-one on the sparring mats. Her mentor was always up for a chance to reeducate her on a few things.

Shaking her head at her own thoughts, she went into the house and gathered her things. Glancing at the group spread out in the living room, each engaged in their thing, Marina turned towards the door and left again. Maybe what she really needed was time to be alone with her own thoughts, the opportunity to evaluate the upcoming weeks. She had a feeling that things were going to get worse before they got better, and she could use all the calm she could steal.

Setting up in her usual lane, she pulled muffs over her head, loaded her favorite gun and took aim at the target. The resistance on the trigger, the sound, the recoil . . . perfect.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will)
(G) mein Sohn - my son
(G) Tochter - Daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina)
(G) Spatzi - Little Sparrow (Hansel's nickname for Maria Hill)
(R) Vorobey - Sparrow (Marina's nickname for Maria Hill)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel)
So I have a thousand excuses for why this chapter is sooooo late. It's the end of semester, so things are starting to get super crazy around here. I also purchased my first house for my daughter and I, so we've been working on closing and cleaning and packing and getting ready to move it. In addition to that fun stuff, I've also had essays and tests and my cousin's wedding (if I even READ about another wedding in the next year, I WILL scream. This makes six in six months. Ugh. I don't even LIKE weddings!) and all kinds of crap to deal with in the month or so since I've posted.

NOT TO MENTION, THIS ENTIRE CHAPTER SOMEHOW GOT FREAKING DELETED AND I JUST ABOUT HAD A HEART ATTACK TRYING TO RECREATE IT. Fortunately, I usually send pics of everything through my text function on my phone to my betas, chunks at a time for ideas/help. (In case anyone was wondering, iPhone screens are really small and very hard to transcribe from. If I didn't already have glasses, I'd need them now.)

However, I do have a new chapter here and I have the next chapter half way written as it is, so it should be up much quicker than this one was.

That being said, I also have another seven days off from school until summer semester begins once again so I do intend to do some heavy duty writing while I can. With any luck, I'll be able to get caught up, as well as start working on the Misadventures again, which has been shoved to the side as well while I freak out about the next month of my life.

Also, there is gorgeous art from stereowire, of Will and Marina. Do not take it as I will be viciously displeased. The portrait was commissioned specifically for the UALP and I will be sad if I see it elsewhere. Ponimayete?! Thank you! Le sigh. Either way, here's the chapter. I apologize again for it's lateness. And I will definitely do better to make sure that I do not get so far removed from this fic again.

(Also, I have a Tumblr now. It's under galahadsgurl. If anyone wants to look me up, I would love to follow you!)

No translations this chapter. Just brains. :D

Edit: It was pointed out to me that the introduction of Doyle is confusing, as the name that Amerou and I have chosen for him is James. That being said, the only Sgt James Doyle in existence, is actually a character in the video game "Call of Duty". I apologize for any confusion, however this is the Doyle character played by Jeremy Renner in the movie, 28 Weeks Later. Please let me know if there are any other questions regarding the character. Thank you!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
When forced to be honest, even Nicholas L. Fury would be forced to admit that there wasn't much about the Grimms and their resident Russians (plural intended) that failed to impress. And their fortitude in the face of the mess that had just happened, was just one more thing.

Also, never let it be said that Nick Fury was incapable of being a very patient man. Granted, patience was only when the person or situation suited him... and he had found that circumstances so rarely suited him. Still, he did not think he had ever been more anxious for any agent within S.H.I.E.L.D.’s ranks to return to work than he currently was for one William Michael Brandt nee Grimm.

It had been a tense few weeks since the mess in Croatia. Will had retreated almost entirely into his department, allowing himself to be nearly buried under his responsibilities as S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Chief Analyst and thereby easily able to avoid the director himself. By all reports, his sleeping habits became even more sporadic – leaving the bags already under his eyes that much more pronounced – and his eating habits reduced to nearly nothing as the Colonel proceeded to drop weight hand over fist. Marina did the best she could to force the issue, but there were more than a few meals where the agent only pushed food around his plate without actually tasting it.

Fortunately, Marina had full operational control over the rest of her boys or loss of temper would have probably derailed the whole family in their tracks. The Russian had allowed both Will's brothers and his father to hover for all of 36 hours before kicking them forcibly back into their own lives. Hansel and Maria were strongly urged to return to their home, with Aaron ordered to remain at Marta's until further notice. Jason was sent back to his own apartment, following a promise from his sister that she would keep him apprised of developments as they arose. Both Natasha and Brian were sent to South America, into a suspected terrorist cell with orders to dismantle it if sufficient evident was found to support S.H.I.E.L.D.’s suspicions.

Clint Barton and Bucky Barnes were similarly dispatched out of the country, to a highly secluded HYDRA base in Macedonia with orders to blow it sky high. The mission itself was a complete success, no thanks to the deplorably slow buffering on their trigger mechanism. (Fury made a mental note to remind himself to talk to Jason Grimm about coming back to S.H.I.E.L.D. The R&D department was getting a little lax about their newfangled gadgets; at least when Jason had been there part time, things had damned well WORKED when his agents needed them to.) What was regrettable about the situation had been their decision to “celebrate” early. Apparently, the audio file of their sex-scapades had made a complete tour of both locker rooms. To date, Nick still didn't know what the Gadyuka had done to the unfortunate comm technician making money off the file, but whatever it was, the man still flinched whenever he saw the Russian.

As for the Grimm Family Russian herself, her days typically started early and ended later. Fortunately, the youngest Grimm remained a terrible liar and was more than willing to report on his sister's most recent habits. She woke early, often before anyone else, to start the coffeemaker and start on breakfast – usually one of her partner's favorites in the hope that she could coax him into eating. Then she'd put together a lunch for him to eat in his office, and see him off to Command with a warm kiss and as genuine a smile as she could manage.

From this point, Marina Petrovka could be found in one of three places; her office at the handler pool, the sparring mats in the gym or at the shooting range... and usually in the company of her new protege, Sam Braddock. As luck would have it, at least for the other junior agents, Marina had taken a personal interest in the former JTF2 soldier. Otherwise, Nick was fairly certain that more than a few of his agents would have found themselves in Medical with busted skulls, broken ribs or some other spread of serious injury. Say what you would about nepotism, but at least the handler didn't seem to want to break Braddock and Braddock himself seemed more than willing to let her boss him around during his training. (Fury would never tell either of them, but Samuel W. Braddock was going to make a hell of an agent.)

Of course, after training was over and it was time to go home, Marina would fix another feast for her fasting lover. After pretending to eat, he would retreat to his office where he would remain for several hours before Marina finally managed to convince Will to come to bed with her. From there, the time she fell asleep generally relied on how long it took her lover to fall asleep first. And even if he fell asleep quickly, there was never a guarantee that he'd actually sleep through the night.

Frankly the whole situation was a clusterfuck. And if Fury ever saw either of the two bastards responsible, he'd personally string them up from whatever was handy at the moment.

Currently, however, it was not the Grimms or their Russian causing him considerable indigestion. Blinking in shock at his assistant director, he repeated blankly, “Hill . . . I am going to need you to say that again. What the hell did you just say?!”

Maria Hill smirked slightly at the uncharacteristic expression on her boss' face, before repeating slyly, “There are reports of zombies in Georgia, sir . . . the kind that feast on brains, blood and body parts.”

Fury snorted as he muttered, “Isn't there only one kind of zombie?” Slumping back in his chair, some part of him knew that he wasn't portraying the best facade at the moment but he couldn't seem to bring himself to care. “What the hell am I supposed to do about zombies, Hill?”

A small shrug was the woman's only reply as she drawled, “With all due respect, sir, I am fairly certain that is why you are the Director and I am not.”

“Your confidence in my abilities is only a little reassuring, Hill,” he growled, narrowing his eyes at her damn-near cheerful features. Dropping his head back to stare at the ceiling, he growled again. “Damn it . . . zombies . . . what the fuck!? Taking a deep breath, he considered his personnel before straightening and ordering “Find Sergeant Doyle and send him to me . . . Seems to me that his experience with this sort of thing is what brought him to S.H.I.E.L.D. in the first place.”

“I don't think that's a good idea, sir. Sergeant Doyle has been very emphatic over his years with us that he will not get involved in anything that even looks remotely like the London outbreak. He's more likely to tell you to 'Fuck off!' than 'Yes sir!'”

“I am aware of Doyle's sensibilities. I don't care . . . send him to me anyway. At least if he says no to the assignment personally, he can suggest someone else to go.”

Hill cocked an eyebrow, even as she nodded once in brisk agreement, “Yes sir.”

“Dismissed,” was the last thing the man said, before Hill turned on her heel and strode from the room.

Half an hour later, Sergeant James Doyle – former Delta Forces sniper and long time S.H.I.E.L.D. operations leader – stood at the Director's door, staring it down as though it was the cause of all of his problems. Which was probably accurate, considering the fact that he had not met the Director face to face since their first meeting at the hospital in London. Director Fury had shown up out of the blue in the little private room where he lay recovered from the first and second degree burns covering three-quarters of his body – and contemplating his more than likely upcoming courtmartial – and offered him a position within the ranks of the global peacekeeping organization. Not being a fool, Doyle had jumped on the offer immediately and had been leading teams for S.H.I.E.L.D.’s tactical units ever since.
But now the whole place was buzzing with rumors about zombies, leaving the small corner of Doyle's brain that still valued self-p Preservations screaming at the top of its lungs. As much as he like his job at S.H.I.E.L.D., there was no way in hell that he was going anywhere near anything to do with zombies ever again. If the clusterfuck in London, and losing his Scarlett besides, hadn't made up his mind for him, the mess at Dornroschen had. Biological outbreaks and all the crazy that erupted as a result of them was no longer a skill within his purview, not now . . . not ever.

So when the Director proposed the op to him, it took barely a half a second for Doyle to reply simply, “Fuck you very much, sir . . . not a chance in hell.”

Fortunately Director Fury was a hell of a good boss and only smirked at the insubordinate language spouting from his underling. “AD Hill warned me you might say that. That being the case, I would ask your opinion on who I should send instead.”

Those khaki green eyes narrowed lightly at the calm in the other man's tone, head tilted slightly as he examined the request from all sides. “Do you have candidates you'd like me to choose from, or do you want me to just start naming people off the top of my head?” he snarked lightly, arms coming up to fold over his chest with his head still cocked to the side as he watched the older man carefully.

(Unbeknownst to Doyle, however, the man's posture prompted an unwelcome jarring sensation somewhere below Fury's navel. He recognized that mannerism, though he had never seen it on the body before him. Clint Grimm did the same thing when he was staking out a target, cobalt grey eyes narrowed suspiciously and head cocked just that small inch to the left. It was at that moment that Fury realized what he should have known from the very first moment he met the Grimms and Doyle both. Resolving to keep his newfound intel under his hat for the moment, he forced himself to relax and refocus on the conversation at hand.)

Gesturing at the personnel files on the corner of his desk, Fury inquired lightly, “What about the Brothers Grimm?”

“I was fairly certain that the gossip around the water cooler was saying that CO of the Brothers Grimm had fallen off the wagon . . . no longer fit for active duty,” Doyle reported cautiously, eyes narrowed as he took in the suddenly thunderous expression on his superior's face.

Fury's jaw clenched as he hissed, “That is a spurious lie! William Brandt is an exceptional agent and his skills are of great importance to this agency. I need him where in Analysis right now, so that's where he has been stationed. I want to know who told you that.”

“I don't know exactly; I overhead it at the gym yesterday. I couldn't pinpoint who said it if you paid me,” Doyle admitted sheepishly with a small shrug. “Either way, if he's up for it, the Brothers Grimm are probably your best bet for a team. Their record is unparalleled and they're going to need that luck they're so famous for. Anything having to do with biological outbreak is going to be a mess.”

“You think it's biological?”

“I had never seen a zombie before the outbreak in London; I would bet my annual salary for the next twenty years that it's biological, sir.”

“Thank you, Doyle. You're input is greatly appreciated. You may go . . .” Fury insisted, watching the former Delta's back as the younger man turned towards the door. “Oh . . . and Sergeant?”

Pausing with one hand on the doorknob, the dark haired soldier turned to look back at his superior once again. “Yes sir?”
“If you happen to find out who's spreading the rumor, I would greatly appreciate the intel. Understood?”

“Yes sir. I'll keep my ears open.”

“Thank you, Sergeant. You are dismissed.”

Doyle nodded in agreement and very nearly bolted in his attempt to escape the interview before Fury could change his mind about allowing him to skip out on the assignment. He managed to keep his composure all the way back to the small apartment-style quarters he maintained on base. Fumbling with the keys through the blur of tears in his eyes, he cursed steadily under his breath as he fought to get inside and out of sight. Finally, the door swung open, spilling him clumsily into his entryway. Slamming the door, he set his back to the wood and let the tears come.

It had been nearly fifteen years since the last time he'd seen Scarlett's face . . . fifteen years since the last time he'd held her in his arms . . . fifteen years since he'd laughed at her terrible jokes and listened to her rant about her work. And despite those fifteen years, he still missed her, damn it . . . every damned day. Wrestling for his wallet, he pulled the only picture he had of her from its depths . . . the only picture of the two of them together that had survived London . . . and bowed his head once again.

Screw an AWOL charge and screw his obligations, he couldn't even bring himself to care about the consequences. If he was honest with himself, he hadn't been since the night that took her from him. Dropping his forehead against the picture, he allowed his eyes to close and the memories to come.

After all, the memories were all he really had left of her . . .

Chapter End Notes

The assignment that Clint and Bucky go on in Macedonia is written about by Amerou here in The Macedonian Shenanigans. "http://archiveofourown.org/works/805674". If you have not read it yet, I definitely recommend you do. It's steamy and funny and awesome. Amerou is an amazing author and I sincerely hope you have also checked into her Fairy Tales fic, about Hansel and Maria and the beginning of their difficult courtship.
This is from Doyle's perspective so no translations of any kind. As for whether or not Doyle is related to the Grimms? grins Well let's just say that that is my secret, and I'm not telling just yet.

I hope you guys continue to read and enjoy this verse. I love to read your reviews! Please, keep them coming!

So, judging by the look on the face of the hot Major in front of him, this was going to end one of three ways. Option One, he was very very drunk and should be tossed into the brig to sleep off his stupid. Option Two, he was a moron and should be tossed into the brig to sleep off his stupid. Option Three, he was a very very drunk moron and should be tossed into the brig to sleep off his stupid . . . which was quite possibly the most accurate description, seeing as only a drunk moron would have agreed to that damn bet.

All things considered, it was going to be a damned miracle if he got out of this mess without spending any time in the brig.

The woman in front of him folded her arms over her chest, a fierce frown on her face. “So let me get this straight. You and your idiotic friends were out drinking tonight. And someone decided that it would be a good idea to set you on fire.”

Doyle grimaced at the disdain in her tone; this wasn’t really as good a first impression as he would have otherwise hoped for. “Well no, not exactly. The getting set on fire part wasn’t part of the plan,” he replied, with the most charming grin he could manage. (Seeing as he had first and second degree burns running down his good side, it was probably not quite as charming as he wanted it to be.)
One elegant eyebrow cocked upwards derisively, as that dirty-sounding British accent of hers hissed out, “Uh-huh . . . so what was supposed to happen?”

Cringing slightly, he confessed sheepishly, “I don’t think I should tell you, ma’am.”

“And why is that, sergeant?”

“Cause I think that you are sexy as hell and I don’t really want to lose my only shot at getting you to go out with me.”

That eyebrow arched higher, if that was possible, as she purred, “And you don’t think that you’ve already blown that chance already? After all, this isn’t the best way to meet girls, Sergeant Doyle.”

Grinning at her and winking, he sprawled easily back against the bed. “I’m hoping you’ll think I’m charming enough to forgive me for my stupid, if I just flirt with you enough.”

Chuckling against her will, she informed him warmly, “You are a moron, sergeant.”

“Yes ma’am . . . but you still think I’m charming, don’t you?”

Her smile was wry and amused as she shrugged one uniform-clad shoulder. “Maybe . . . guess we’ll just have to wait and find out.” Stepping forward, she reached for his face, “In the meantime, let’s clean out these burns. Wouldn’t want them to mar your pretty face, now would we?”

“I knew you liked me,” he replied with a sly grin, before flinching as she touched the antiseptic to his skin.

It was a long process to clean out the burns. And when it was over and the burns were dressed, he was left alone in the room. True to form, if nothing else, there were a pair of MPs at the door five minutes later to take him to the brig. Staring for a moment in surprise, he couldn’t hold off the chuckles that bubbled up from his chest at the knowledge that he’d lost this round with the feisty Major. Jumping down from the mattress, he turned his back and stood complacently as the MPs cuffed his hands behind him.

It was as he was leaving, that the pretty doctor stepped up to stall the procession. “For the record, you are moderately charming, sergeant.”

The grin on his face was as cocky as hell as he smarmed in response, “Yeah?”

Laughing a low laugh that went straight to his gut, she slipped a small business card into the front pocket of his fatigues. “Call me when you’ve dried out, sergeant.”

“Yes ma’am. Count on it,” he agreed, twisting to watch her over his shoulder as the MPs once again began to lead him away.

End Flashback

It was another 24 hours later before the card had been returned to him and he was able to learn the name of the woman. Major Scarlett Anne Levy-Ross; lead scientist and researcher in charge of the labs on the small base set up at the site of the first outbreak. He waited a day after he was release to complete dry out, before ringing her up. They went out to dinner that evening and back to her place that night; from that moment, he was hers, no question about it.

Sergeant James Patrick Doyle was an orphan and the concept of a family had always been completely foreign to him . . . at least until that first perfect night he spent in her arms. If there was a picture in the dictionary next to the word “badass”, Doyle was fairly certain that his Scar would be the person depicted there.

And if she wasn’t, then someone needed to complain to Webster.

Scarlett was gorgeous and real and a ballbuster unlike anyone he’d ever met before and she was all his. And except for that fucked up assignment in London, he would have never met her. For at least those 28 weeks they were together, he made it a point to thank whatever god was listening for the biological outbreak that brought them both into the same sphere of existence.

Granted, there was something creepy about a biological weapon that essentially turned people into zombies, but Scarlett was one of the scientists in charge of the project to find a cure. She was also confident that the answer was within reach. Call him a sap, but she was the brains in their relationship and he was more than okay with being the brawn. His specialty tended to lean toward shooting shit; if she said they were close, he was going to take her word for it. And technically, the infected weren’t even zombies. The RAGE virus was a nasty bitch though and without a viable cure, there was little else to do but cut the infected down before they began to literally eat people.

The last morning they had together, before everything went to hell, was perfect. He’d spent the night before worshipping every square inch of her with hands and mouth and tongue and teeth, rocketing her to bliss as many times as the night would allow. They’d been together for nearly five months at that point and their morning routine was pretty well set in stone. Doyle had woken first, made them both coffee and then returned to bed to coax her awake with kisses and caresses and teasing. She’d resisted, as always, before melting against him. They were just getting ready to be very late to work when the Code Red was called throughout the base.

Everything was a blur after that, and to this day the former Delta Forces soldier couldn’t remember whether or not he’d told her he loved her one last time. He liked to think that he had, that last morning of their lives together . . . the last time he’d ever seen her, but the thought that they had both simply been too rushed, too busy, too frantic, to say those three words to one another had haunted him every day since.

He knew what his file on the assignment said; that his injuries were his own fault, seeing as he’d been outside the containment zone when he acquired them. He knew that his former superiors and former squad-mates sneered at his decision not to turn his back on the kids. But they were kids, completely defenseless in every way; Tammy was probably 15 at the most and little Andy was only about 12. Not to mention they were immune to the virus and Doyle had been preached at by his hyper-vigilant girlfriend more than once that their immunity was the best chance at a cure for the damned RAGE virus. Again . . . not a scientist; if Scar said those kids were valuable to her research and the fate of mankind, then he was going to do what he could to protect them.

The soldier managed to get the two kids on a helicopter piloted by an old war buddy, Flynn, before turning back for Scarlett. The medical center was heavily protected, but there were RAGE virus patients quarantined inside. Having seen the kind of power the virus gave to the people it infected, Doyle had been desperate to protect her. Like a dumbass though, he’d literally tripped into a group of cleaners as he moving back towards the containment area, the men armed with massive flame throwers designed to burn the bodies of the infected after the hosts were deceased, so as to protect the living from the virus.

He hadn’t had a chance. A stupid rook with an itchy trigger finger had opened fire and his fatigues had caught without a second’s pause. It was only by the grace of god that the boy’s CO had lunged to try and put out the flames, trying to save his pathetic life. The man had succeeded, though three quarters of his body had been covered in second and third degree burns. The wounds were excruciating and Doyle was relieved to be able to say that he couldn’t remember much of the next three weeks as he recovered.

It was nearly a month later that he finally woke, mostly lucid for the first time in weeks, to see Flynn seated where he could have sworn he’d seen Scarlett the night before.

Flashback
Paris, France
May 22, 1996

Pushing himself into a sitting position gingerly, Doyle grinned sheepishly at his old war friend. “Where’s Scarlett? Did she finally get fed up with my lazy ass and head for a bed?”

The instant shock followed by the way that Flynn’s whole face smoothed out carefully should have been the sniper’s first clue that something was seriously wrong. Leaning on his knees, the pilot frowned fiercely. “Dude . . . Scar . . . she’s not here. She’s gone, Doyle . . . I’m sorry.”

“That’s crazy . . . she was just here last night. I saw her, man.”

Flynn’s mouth twisted as his head shook firmly. “The only people who have seen you besides me, have been nurses, doctors and MPs.”

Doyle stared for a moment in horror before accusing, “You’re lying!”

“No . . . I’m not. The infected overran the Med Center. She didn’t make it out.” Running a hand back over his head, before Flynn finished firmly. “The Army bombed it nearly three weeks ago, with everyone still inside. I’m sorry, Doyle, but she’s gone.”

There was an eternal moment of complete stillness, before the sergeant threw back his sheets, announcing in a vicious growl. “Bullshit! Not my Scar.”

Flynn stared as Doyle hoisted himself carefully from the mattress and forced himself to stand for a moment to assimilate the pain back to manageable levels. Finally realizing what was happening, he lunged forward to slap the call button. “Man, what the hell do you think you’re doing!?!” he demanded, reaching to grab Doyle’s arm only to be brushed off.

“I’m going back to London. I have to find her. She’s not dead . . . I know she’s not dead.”

“And how the hell do you think you’re going to get there!? The whole place is ash! There is nothing and no one left to find. Damn it, Doyle. We’re in fucking Paris! You can barely walk and this whole place is crawling with MPs just dying for a reason to arrest you!”

“I’d like to watch them try!” the soldier hissed, limping slowly toward the lone cabinet. Every step was agony but the thought of never seeing his badass woman again was more painful still. “I have to find her, Flynn.”

“You can’t, Doyle. Okay? You can’t and I’m not going to help you. You know she’s gone . . . that no one could have survived that, not even Scar. This is the grief talking. You know that.”

Slumping against the wall at the words, Doyle nearly keened at the pain that consumed him at the knowledge that the other man was right, the agony both physical and emotional. Just then, a swarm of nurses and orderlies poured into the room, practically manhandling the stubborn sergeant back into his bed and drugs into his IV. Suddenly complacent as the sedatives took hold, the Delta Forces soldier could only sag into the mattress, tears leaking from the corners of his eyes. “What . . . what am I supposed to do, Flynn?” Turning his head into his pillow, he sobbed breathlessly, “How am I supposed to let her go? I love her . . . there can never be anyone else.”

Flynn’s eyes were soft as he watched his friend grieve. “I don’t know, Doyle . . . I just don’t. I’m sorry.”

End Flashback

There had never been a moment since that Doyle didn’t regret not going back for his Major. There had never been a second, where the thought of her did not consume him. It had been an infinity since that last day with her, and it would only be time without end until he saw her again.

And that was only if his soul was not destined for an eternity in hell.
Beastly Secrets

Chapter Notes

So I have no excuses other than life is a bitch. Although, I was able to attend Philadelphia WizardCon and got several pictures with the illustrious Sebastian Stan. HE ADORED MY LITTLE GIRL AND KEPT FLIRTING WITH HER!!! At three, she didn't understand why that was awesome BUT I DO!

Either way, this was supposed to be published around Memorial Day, but things got crazy, as previously stated. I hope you enjoy this chapter guys.

Translations at the end of the chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 160: Beastly Secrets

So admittedly? Jason didn't know Detective Catherine Chandler very well. He knew who she was of course, but other than her credentials with Special Projects, she was really just another cop on the job. But that didn't mean that he didn't know everything there was to know about the mannerisms she was currently showcasing. Deliberately evasive, shifting eyes, very very slight hesitations when answering certain questions; she was hiding something. And whatever secret she was carrying, it was a big something. Call him a snoop -- and he did use to be a spy, so take that for what's it worth -- but that secret called to him.

Unfortunately for Catherine Chandler, Marina had always used to tease that her Jay was like a dog with a bone when he wanted to know something, even worse than Colonel "I Need to Know Everything" himself. And seeing as Casey was still out on medical leave after being shot, there was no one to stop him from sticking his nose into her business. He was stuck on desk duty, with Alvarez as a partner; he was bored, frustrated and as far as he was concerned, she was now fair game.

As a result, like any good spy, he arranged to get her alone and out of anyone's hearing.

The other detective jumped a mile when the door to the interrogation room slammed shut behind her, a smirking Jason Walsh leaning back against the wood. "Hiya Chandler," he greeted with a sly wink.

Catherine's eyes narrowed as she took in the "cat that ate the canary" look on his face, before greeting him cautiously. "Hey Walsh . . . what's going on? Reception told me that I had an interrogation in this room and that it had to be me."

"Yeah . . . actually, except interrogation would be more me asking questions and you answering them."

And if Jason didn't already know that she was hiding something, the way her back instantly went up and her whole demeanor tensed would have confirmed it for him. Her eyes narrowed at him viciously, as she demanded, "And why the hell would you need to do that?"

"Because I'm bored and you have a secret. Frankly, I do love a good secret."

"And you think that automatically makes it any of your business, because?!!"

Narrowing his own eyes, Jason watched her fume for a long moment. It was at that point that he came to the realization that Chandler wasn't protecting a what . . . she was protecting a who. And if there was anyone who understood the importance of keeping a secret to protect someone you loved, it would be a Grimm. Moving toward the chair, Jason spun it around and straddled the back, arms hanging gracelessly over the back. "Take a seat, Chandler; I'm going to tell you a true story. After you've heard it, you can make your own choice from there, okay?"

The woman looked suspicious for a moment before moving towards the empty chair on the other side of the table. Settling comfortably, she leaned forward on her elbows on the tabletop, drawling in a tone of forced calm, "I'm listening."

"Once upon a time, there was this project; it was headed by the United Stated Army and it was called 'Project Rebirth'. The project produced a single perfect soldier; the only one of his kind, though there had initially been plans to create more. Sadly, however, the scientist behind the research was assassinated very soon after the success. This soldier became known as Captain America; he was a national hero. He raised war bonds during World War Two, he traveled to bases overseas in an attempt to raise morale, he rescued more than a hundred men of the Army's 107th from the Nazis and Hydra, they wrote comic books about him for crying out loud! He was a good man and a loyal friend to those privileged enough to claim his friendship. But he was lost, following a plane crash in 1945."

Smirking bitterly, Jason reached up to scratch at the back of his head before continuing, "The Army was devastated. What were they going to do without their super soldier? Never mind that they had a legion of capable men and women in uniform who needed their support. So they tried to recreate him, countless times they tried. Finally, in the 1960's they succeeded. They called their successes 'Cahills', but they too were lost. Since then, there had been another handful of projects seeking to recreate the Army's perfect soldiers. Most of them have been total failures . . . No survivors."

Chandler's eyes were getting bigger and bigger as Jason spoke, before she finally chimed in, "How do you know all of this?"

"Come on, Chandler. My brothers and I are identical . . . how do you think I know about all of this?" he drawled, cocking a single eyebrow over an olive green eye.

"So what does any of this have to do with me?"

“Less than a year ago, the fingerprints from a long dead veteran showed up at a crime scene you were investigating. You don’t actually think that I think that’s a coincidence, do you?” Cocking his head, he leaned forward and lowered his voice carefully. “I can help him . . . if there is anyone in this world who knows about secrets that keep you alive, it’s my brothers and me. Let us help you . . . let us help him.”

Chandler’s whole demeanor screamed wary distrust, as she watched his face with narrowed eyes. Checking his watch, Jason pushed himself to his feet with a sigh. “Let’s try this a different way. Tonight, my brother Will and his partner Marina are hosting a Memorial Day barbeque for the base. If I’m right, your secret is a veteran . . . and it’s been a long time since someone thanked him for his service.” Shrugging, he offered lightly, “You both should come.”

Knocking a knuckle against the tabletop, he pushed away towards the door. “If nothing else, come for the food. My sister is a phenomenal cook.”

There was a long pause, before Jason turned to go. He was almost out the door when Chandler spoke, “You’re gonna be there.”

The communications officer paused in the doorframe, recognizing the words for the statement they were. “Chandler, I never skip Marina’s cooking if I can help it. Casey and I are both going to be there.”

At his partner’s name, Chandler bit down on her lip. “How is Detective Shraeger?”

“Chomping at the bit to get back to work. She’s still out for another week or so, though.” Snorting, he drawled, “Can’t come fast enough in my opinion. I am bored as hell. I HATE paperwork. Not to mention, I can only take so much of Alvarez, before I start contemplating the best way to poison his gourmet lunches without getting caught.”

That earned a real smile from the other detective. “I can’t promise anything . . . but I’ll talk to him.”

Grinning, Jason winked. “You do that . . . we’ll see you both tonight.”

Chandler only nodded once, before the middle Grimm ducked from the room. Strolling back towards his desk, he chuckled, “Come on out, little Soldier. Here . . . there be explosives.”

His pathetic attempt at a Captain Jack Sparrow accent made him laugh and he was still chuckling to himself that night when he knocked on his girlfriend’s door. The redhead took in her boyfriend’s gleeful grin and cocked an eyebrow. “What did you do, Walsh?”

“Hey now! Hold on a second. On what grounds did I deserve that?!?”

“You threw me into a garbage pile!” she reminded him briskly.

“That happened once! And my ears are still ringing from that lecture.”

“As well they should be,” she teased, moving into his arms and lifting her face for his kiss. “Hi.”

Jason’s grin widened into adoration as he replied, “Hi . . . how’re you feeling?”

Casey’s mouth twisted bitterly. “I’m fine . . . really. I wish everyone would stop asking me that!” Watching those olive green eyes of his widen in surprise, she slumped with a remorseful grimace. “I’m good . . . I’m just antsy. I just want to go back to work.”

“I WANT you back at work. Trust me. Alvarez is annoying and paperwork sucks,” he whined, shoulders slouching in a sulk.

Chuckling at his childish pout, the woman teased, “Aw . . . poor baby.”
Rolling his eyes at her, he nevertheless wrapped one arm firmly around her waist and drew her that small inch closer. “You’re hysterical.”

“I feel no sympathy. When you were out after the hostage situation, I got stuck with Alvarez too. Longest two weeks of my life!”

The middle brother gaped at her in horror, before demanding, “Is this payback!?! I had nine busted fingers.”

A quick flash of her tongue was his only answer, earning her a light pinch to the ticklish place at the top of her hip which produced a high pitched series of giggles that Jason was absolutely certain that no one else had ever heard . . . even her former, jilted lover, Tall Man. (Granted, he knew the man’s damned name was Davis, but he really couldn’t bring himself to call him that.)

Finally straightening up, Casey cuddled closed to him as she insisted, “Come on, Jason . . . your sister and her cooking awaits.”

The moan in response was practically indecent and the detective could feel her whole body warm as she considered other – more private ways – that she could induce that sound from her lover. Shaking the thoughts away, she scolded fondly, “Hush you . . . we’re about to be in public.”

His smirk was wicked as he drawled, “We could always stay home?”

“And miss Marina’s cooking!? Not a chance in hell! Move it, Captain Hotass . . . there is a plate with my name on it. I can hear the desserts calling me from here.”

Chuckling, Jason offered her a proper bow as he insisted, “As the lady insists.”

Slinging his arm over her hip possessively, he ushered her out of her apartment building and into his car, almost humming to himself as he closed her door. When he opened his own, Casey was only a little surprised to heard a smooth baritone coming from his mouth as he sang under his breath, “She thinks my ass is sexy . . . it really turns her on.”

It took a second for the tune to place, before at last Casey started laughing. “Only you would butcher a Kenny Chesney song for your own maniacal purposes.”

The horror on his face was hysterical, causing another round of giggles as he protested, “I am NOT . . .” There was a long pause, before he insisted, “Clint and Brian totally did it first.”

“Oh I see . . . when in doubt, blame your brothers.”

“Only when they’re not around to defend themselves . . . it’s a tried and true tactic, and it’s never failed me before,” he agreed with a sly wink and a laugh.

There were nearly to the base, before Casey realized that her partner had never answered her first question. Twisting gingerly to put her back against the door, he asked, “Jay . . . why were you grinning like a maniac earlier?”

A soft exhale and a quick quirk of his lips was her only answer for a long time, before he finally replied, “I’ll tell you as soon as I know whether or not it worked.”

Well remembering some of Walsh’s more ingenious – and damnably messy – pranks, she drew back slightly as she demanded warily, “If what worked?” There was an expectant pause, before she continued, “How will you know if it worked?”
“Tell me if you see Detective Chandler at the barbeque and I’ll let you know.”

Cocking an eyebrow, she inquired curiously, “Why would I see Chandler at your sister’s barbeque?”

“Because the secret she’s been hiding is a presumably dead veteran . . . and I think I’ve finally convinced her to let the cat out of the bag.”

“First of all, how did you know Chandler had a secret? And secondly, why did you go digging for it?”

Jason’s face was protesting as he insisted petulantly, “I was bored, okay?! I don’t think you realize how bad it is for me to get bored. A lot of bad things happen when I get bored; empires topple, blood sheds, lives are ruined. It made me good at my job, but it is hell on everyone else.”

Unable to resist, she teased fondly, “There was a lot of hyperbole in that statement, Captain . . . would you care to elaborate?”

“Just . . . let me know if you see Chandler with anyone, and we’ll go from there. I don’t want to make too many conjectures in case I’m wrong.”

Smirking, she joked lightly, “Probably a good idea . . . you do tend to be a wrong a lot of the time.”

“Just because you don’t agree with my brilliance, Shraeger, does not make me wrong,” he sallied in reply with a wink.

Casey’s return reply was flippant as she drawled, “You’re just lucky I make excellent life choices, Walsh. If I didn’t, then where would you be?”

Smiling at the inside joke that was quickly becoming their “Thing”, he snorted, “You’d miss me if I was gone, Shraeger.” There was a moment as he took in his girlfriend’s incredulous expression out of the corner of his eyes, before reminding her cheerfully, “Without me, you’d have Alvarez for your partner . . . permanently.”

The full body shudder in response to that was explicit with her disgust, though her glare was almost worse. Chuckling, he reached for her hand and pressed an adoring kiss to the back. “I would never do that to you. You know that.”

Fortunately, they arrived at the base then, so Casey was saved from coming up with an appropriate response to what she knew was Jason’s unspoken declaration of love. Jason maneuvered deftly through the chaos on base, before finally pulling into Will and Marina’s driveway alongside their ancient Jeep. Even knowing her opinion on chivalry, the comm tech rounded the hood quickly and opened her car door for her. Narrowing her eyes at him playfully, she announced primly, “I’m gonna let you get away with that this time, because I am still recovering from being shot. But this is your only free pass.”

“Yes ma’am,” he teased, as the front door opened and Marina appeared on the porch, wiping her hands on a dishtowel as she watched them.

Casey glared as she ordered briskly, “And that will be quite enough sass out of you, mister.”

Jason’s grin was wicked as he replied, “Yes ma’am.”

The redhead growled viciously as the Russian giggled, slapping at her middle charge with her towel as they grew closer. “All right, sladkiy, that is quite enough out of you. Your father and the rest of the boys are in the backyard, playing football.”
Green eyes blinked in surprise, as he blurted, “Even Will?!”

One brown eyebrow arched upwards as she replied, “It’s Memorial Day. Even Misha takes a day off on Memorial Day. You know that.”

The technical specialist looked sheepish at the scold in her tone, rubbing at the back of his neck. “Well yeah . . . but after Croatia, I thought . . .”

There was a sad smile as Marina nodded once, “I know what you thought. But Sam has to report to Toronto in another few weeks, so we won’t have him with us for much longer. Today’s a family day . . . always has been, always will be. And right now, Misha needs a break. He’s wearing himself too thin . . . even he knows that.”

Jason grinned, winking at his sister as he dodged past her and disappeared into the house. Rolling her eyes fondly, Marina turned to Casey with a smile and a warm hug. “Hello Casey. The women are hiding out in the kitchen, if you’d like to join us.”

“And spare myself that one’s shenanigans? Sounds like a good plan to me.”

“Then come with me. I’m sure I can find some way to put you to work,” she laughed, with a playful wink.

When Marina pushed open the door of her home, Casey blinked, visibly surprised by the number of “women” in attendance. All of Marina’s sisters, Marta Shearing, and Maria Hill, as well as a half-dozen other women that Casey didn’t know, were all bustling busily around the kitchen as they worked at their individual jobs. “All right, Casey . . . if you could get started on the break, I think we will be just about done.”

“You’re making bread by hand!?”

Marina burst into laughter, shaking her head as she gestured toward the dining room. Piled on the table were at least thirty loaves of still warm French bread. “For 250 people? Some things are better bought. Ten slices a loaf, please, Casey.”

Saluting the Russian cheerfully, Casey moved to get to work. The job was soothing and repetitive, meaning that it wasn’t long before the redhead had lost herself in the rhythm of the work.

Meanwhile, Jason had managed to corral his eldest brother in a corner of their backyard and was explaining the circumstances surrounding Catherine Chandler as best as he knew them. The Colonel frowned, nodding slowly, before offering cautiously, “About six years ago, there was a project based in Afghanistan, experimenting with the application of non-human DNA into human soldiers. The official story is that the whole unit was KIA; what really happened was that the entire unit had to be put down. The strand of DNA the experiment used was unstable and caused unpredictable side effects. If you’re right, it sounds like maybe there were survivors . . . or at least A survivor.”

Green eyes narrowed as Jason considered his brother, before inquiring cautiously, “How do you know all of this?”

Will snorted viciously as he replied bitterly, “I was the one ordered to process the KIA paperwork, and write the letters home to the families.” Growling under his breath, the Colonel closed his eyes for a moment, before continuing, “Also, Vanessa Chandler was rumored to be the MD in charge of the project; she was a friend . . . once . . . a long time ago. When she was murdered around the same time as the project getting scrapped, I had Owen do some digging around; suffice it to say that I didn’t really want to know what it is that I discovered.”
“Is there anything that you don’t know, big brother?”

“Sure . . . Ross’ reasons for being a moron and continuing to pursue a successful ‘Captain America’ project. There have been so many failures, and so many lives lost, and no real successes since us.” Rubbing a hand over his face, he muttered caustically, “At least this point, all he’s doing is ruining people’s lives.”

The scowl on Jason’s face was a near-perfect mimic of Will’s own. “The man is an ass. That’s all there is to it.”

Will snickered as his chin dipped in agreement. “No argument here.” Dragging a hand back through his hair, the eldest Grimm asked, “Do you really think that they’ll come?”

“I don’t know . . . I hope so. Chandler could use a larger support system, if nothing else. Carrying this kind of secret alone? It’s hard . . . we at least have always had each other.”

Ruffling is brother’s hair fondly, Will teased, “You’re getting soft in your old age, Jay.”

Jason shoved his brother off with a scowl, snapping, “Shut up, Mr ‘I’ll be 40 on my next birthday’.”

There was a snort from behind them, where the remaining Grimms had obviously been eavesdropping, before Clint elaborated, “That was weak!!”

Chuckling, Will watched as the middle brother lunged at their youngest, causing real giggles as the sniper just barely managed to dodge. Folding his arms, he stood off to the side and watched his brothers roughhouse with each other. Bucky, Sam and Owen stood out of the way, as Jason finally dumped the archer onto his lawn and proceeded to tickle the hell out of him, causing squeals. Of course, Brian proceeded to do his part and pinned Clint’s BFF. Even to Will, Aaron looked unamused though he didn’t fight the older brother too hard.

The squeals reaching super-sonic levels brought Marina instantly to the backdoor, eyes wide as she demanded, “Who’s dying!?”

“Marina! Help!” Clint giggled, helplessly squirming under the onslaught.

Smirking, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler leaned against the door and called, “Save yourself, dorogoy.” Looking over at her quiescent partner, she smiled to see long-absent peace on his features. “And how are you, Misha?”

Closing his eyes, the soldier turned his face into the sun and simply stood for a minute. He could feel his lover’s eyes on him, though she said nothing. Finally he twisted to face her, offering her a hand. The Russian offered a serene smile as she gave him her hand, and allowed herself to be pulled into him, cuddling close. The sound of his heartbeat under her ear was strong and familiar as he replied, “It’s a good day.”

At the calm stillness in his tone, Marina turned her face into his shoulder. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Mishka. Vsegda.”

There was a softness in his voice as he replied, “Vsegda, samaya malen’kaya.”

The arms around her shoulders tightened, lifting her off her feet and to his lips. Their kisses were easy and languid, familiar in that way that only longtime lovers were. Neither of them even heard the backgrounds sounds of her boys gagging or her Misfits laughing. It was a good day indeed.

Soon enough, however, the house began to stir as the time for the barbeque grew more imminent.
The boys were enlisted to pull out the tables and chairs, as the women began to set out the food. Marina herself was in full-out mothering mode, as she fluttered about to make sure that everything was ready. It was during this chaos that Detective Catherine Chandler slipped through the side gate. On her heels was a tall young man, with dark hair and a ghastly scar running down his right cheek.

The younger three Grimms had been banished to a back corner of the backyard with their significant others, discussing the various reasons for why Natasha had dragged Brian into service nearly fifteen minutes. (Clint’s opinion that she had dragged him off to get busy in an empty bedroom was probably the most accurate, but no one was willing to contemplate that option too closely. Natasha had a reputation for being terrifying and lethal and terrifyingly lethal for a reason.)

Bucky was leaning against the trunk of the tree Clint was perched in, while Aaron was seated in the grass at Marta’s feet. As for the two detectives, Jason and Casey were cuddled up together in a camp chair, chatting comfortably with the other four. Everyone’s heads came around at the sound of the gate, as most of the people attending the barbeque were coming through the front of the house. At the sight of their colleague in Special Projects, Jason twisted to face his eldest brother. “Will!! They’re here!”

The Colonel turned from his conversation with Sam and Owen, following Casey’s finger to where the couple had stalled by the gate. The man’s face triggered his memory and he strode forward, offering one hand congenially. “Specialist Keller . . . I’m fairly certain that I processed your killed in action paperwork.”

His partner’s voice rang from inside the house as she scolded, “Misha!! It’s this thing called tact!! Find some!!”

Will chuckled, noticing the wariness in the other man’s as he accepted the offered hand. “My name is Will Grimm. The woman you heard is my partner, Marina Petrovka. Welcome to our barbeque. Happy Memorial Day . . . thank you for your service to this country.”

There were signs of a blush in the tinge of his ears, the smile on the former soldier’s face sheepish as he confessed, “I haven’t been a soldier for at least ten years, sir.”

“That doesn’t matter to me, Keller. You served this country faithfully and from the looks of you, whoever did this to you robbed you of the freedoms you fought and technically ‘died’ for.”

Aaron appeared at Will’s side then, one hand coming up to his brother’s shoulder. “Join the club,” he muttered, still bitter over his recent experiences with Ric Byer and NRAG. Turning to the elder, he teased, “I don’t know what you did, Colonel, but you’re in trouble. Marina is spitting nails in the kitchen.”

“I have no social skills,” was the man’s unself-conscious explanation as he turned toward the house. “I know it’s scary and keeping his secret is hard. But if you need someone to talk to, I’m here to talk anytime. I know what it’s like to have to keep the kind of secret that could mean the difference between life and death for the man I love. All the women in this family do; you’re among friends here, Chandler, I promise.”

There was a long pause as the brunette considered that, before she spoke, “Cat.”
Casey glanced at her boyfriend curiously, seeing her own confusion in his face. “I beg your pardon?”

“My friends call me ‘Cat’,” she repeated, with a small smile on her face.

“All right, Cat . . . call me Casey. And I think you already know this idiot is Walsh. Come meet the rest of the Grimm women; we don’t bite . . . mostly. I think Marta’s probably the only one I can guarantee that with. The rest of the women in this family can kill you with their pinkie fingers and a toothpick.”

Bucky chuckled as he correctly fondly, “It was a chop stick and her thumb, but the basic idea is still the same.”

Halting the two in their tracks, Jason spoke up, “Uh . . . first, let’s get you a plate. Marina is a fantastic cook and you will regret it if you don’t try her shashliki.”

Catherine frowned at the unfamiliar term and attempted to repeat it cautiously, “Sheesh-lik?”

“Shashliki,” Jason reiterated with a flawless Russian accent. “Steak kabobs. Marina’s Russian and it tends to show up in her cooking. But seriously, they are to die for and they are always the first things to go. So hurry up,” he insisted seriously, prodding the two women along. “Move it ladies . . . I’m starving!”

Casey rolled her eyes at the phrase, leaning over to inform Catherine in a stage whisper. “For the record? The Grimms are always starving when their sister is cooking, so take that for what it’s worth. Momma’s boys, the lot of them.”

Jason did little more than glare at his partner, though if Cat snickered at his expense, the detective pretended not to notice.

\|

Chapter End Notes

So I know that the new Beauty and the Beast did not start until 2012, but it is not 2012. It's barely 2008 in the UALP!verse. That being said, it's basically going to all have gone down the same way as it does in the show, just several years earlier. Vincent will shortly be important, so yeah. Enjoy!

Translations:
(R) sladkiy - honey (Marina's nickname for Jason)
(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint)
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) Misha/Mishka - a petname deriving from Mikhail/Michael (Marina's favorite nickname for Will whose middle name is Michael)
(R) Vsegda - Always
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's favorite nickname for Marina Petrovka)
(R) shashliki - steak kabobs (they are delicious! I'm not even joking)
Hey y'all! New chapter! Woot!

The picture is a commission from Philly Con, though I spent a hell of a lot of time painting it, because it was originally in only black and white. Again, it was commissioned with this fic in mind, so please don't post it elsewhere.

Thank you guys again for all the reviews. I love to read them.

Translations, the few that there are, are at the end of the chapter, as always. ENJOY!!!
Chapter 161: The RAGE

Will barely paused alongside his partner, as he led Vincent into the house. Marina was attempting to resolutely ignore her lover, amidst her best friend's teasing snickers. Capturing the Russian around the waist, the oldest Grimm hauled her to him with her back against his chest, as he began to murmur against the skin of her throat. Whatever he said earned a pair of wild eyes and a hungry growl. “Promises promises, Colonel,” she purred seductively, fingers toying playfully with the buttons at his throat.

Grinning at her, he kissed her the join of neck and shoulder sweetly before continuing on his way towards the stairwell. Vincent dipped his head with a deferential, “Ma'am,” before trailing along after him.

Once inside his office, Will took the seat behind his desk and gestured to the empty chair opposite. “Take a seat, Specialist.”

“Sir, I haven't been . . .” he protested, though the disappointment eloquent in the lines of the other man's face was enough to make Vincent fall silent.

“Keller, you were an NCO at the time of your 'death', were you not?”

“Yes, sir, I was.”

“Then, as far as I am concerned, you are entitled to the rank and everything that goes with it. Of course, the rank of 'Specialist' may not be worth much to a commissioned, but it's still a step over a private.” Leaning back in his chair, he fixed the former emergency room doctor with a pair of blazing blue eyes and inquired, “How about you tell me everything you know from the last seven years? We'll go from there.”

Nodding, Vincent Ryan Keller looked down at his hands before starting to speak. “The experiment was supposed to make us better soldiers . . . stronger, faster . . . but it just took us apart. We weren't human anymore . . . we were barely soldiers; we were rabid animals at best.”

“How did you get the scar? It's quite impressive. Another inch and you would have lost that eye.”

Keller's shoulders rose and fell as he shook his head. “I don't recall; all I can guess is that it happened when I was beasted out during my escape.” Looking sheepish as he rubbed at the back of his head, he confessed, “I don't usually have any memory of what happened during those times. I didn't have it before I beasted out and I had it after I was back to normal.”

Leaning over to pick up a pen from his pencil holder, the Colonel scribbled a note on the pad in front of him. “Beast out? Is that what you call it?”

“Well yeah . . . it seems the most accurate description for what happens to me.”

“Why?”

Keller blinked in surprise at the question, stammering for a moment as he fumbled for a good answer. Taking pity on him, Will smiled gently and asked, “Who was the first to call it that? Was it you? A unit mate? Dr. Chandler, perhaps?”

At the question, Vincent stared like a deer in headlights, before asking cautiously, “Who?”

Will frowned, leaning forward to fold his hands on his desktop. “Do you have memory lapses often, Specialist Keller? Dr. Vanessa Chandler was the medical authority on your project; she was onsite throughout the project, to help with the side effects and help manage the effects of the rage. Don't you remember her?"

Keller seemed very far away as he replied in a soft murmur, “I didn't before this moment but I do now. How did you . . .?"

“Vanessa was a friend, once, before we had a falling out over the hypothetical application and the overall ethics about an experiment like this.” Giving the other man a small smirk, he gestured at a picture hanging over his shoulder of him, his father and his four brothers. “I'm sure you can see why that could be the case.”

“Yes sir; Cat told me a little bit about what happened at the precinct where she works . . . and why. I know that violated her nondisclosure agreement, but really, who would I tell? Technically, I'm dead.”

Will slouched backwards as he nodded in acknowledgment of the explanation. “Threaten one of my brothers and my partner will flay you alive. Succeed in actually injuring one of them and there is no safe haven for you on this earth. My Marishka is very protective of 'her boys', to put it mildly, and will not tolerate any harm to come to them.

Smiling, Vincent nodded in understanding, “Duly noted, sir.”

“Good. Back to my question. Who was the first to call it 'beasting out'?"

“My best friend, JT . . . JT Forbes . . . he's a biochemist . . . for a long time, before I met Catherine, he was the only one I trusted to keep my secret. Everyone else I've ever known – my mother, my sisters-in-law, my former fiancée – they all believe that I was killed in action.”

The Colonel's snort was amused as he replied, “I'm pretty sure that that club has its headquarters in my home.”

“I don't understand, sir.”

“My younger brother, Aaron; my brother Clint's boyfriend, Bucky; Aaron's girlfriend, Marta; my best friend, Owen; Marina's sister, Viktoria; and my father are all technically dead.” A hapless shrug was the eldest Grimm's only response to the incredulous look on Vincent's face. “We live a complicated life. Either way, you'll fit in just fine here.”

Looking down, the older man scribbled a series of notes under the first, before looking up once again. “So . . . your friend, Dr. Forbes? . . . has he been able to pinpoint anything that can help you with control?"

“He was able to synthesize a tranq dart that actually works when I become too dangerous, either to myself or to others, but that's about all. He's been working on it, but he's a chemist not a biologist.”

Nodding slowly, Will leaned forward on his elbows. “So here's what I think is going to happen next. Marta Shearing – Marta is Aaron's girlfriend – is a virologist with a knack for suped-up genetics. After the holiday, if you and Dr. Forbes would like, we can arrange a meeting of the minds as it were. See if we can get you some semblance of a normal life back.”

Keller's whole demeanor perked up as he agreed breathlessly. “That sounds amazing.”

“In the meantime, let's talk about your future. You were an MD, were you not?”
“Yes sir, I was . . . I specialized in emergency medicine in medical school. When the Towers fell, and my brothers died inside, I couldn't just do nothing. So I enlisted.”

Humming, the eldest Grimm seemed to get far away for a moment before inquiring, “Do you think you can still BE a doctor? Or would the stress 'beast you out’?”

Considering the way Keller's jaw dropped a bit in surprise, it was obviously a question that he had never considered before. Smiling the Colonel elaborated, “S.H.I.E.L.D. is always looking for a good doctor or ten for our onsite Medical facilities. If you think you're up for it, I can put you in the rotation immediately.” Snorting, he continued, “The training courses are mandatory, but you can join Sam in his accelerated courses. You both were highly trained, special forces soldiers. I'm sure that Marina won't mind taking on another Misfit.”

There was a pause, before the non-commissioned office replied, awestruck, “I don't know sir, but I would kill for a chance to find out.”

Pushing himself to his feet, Will extended a hand with a smile. “In that case, Dr. Keller, welcome to S.H.I.E.L.D.. And that will be quite enough of the 'sir' part of our conversations. You can call me Will or, if you prefer to be more formal, Brandt. Let's get you something to eat and I'll have my secretary prepare your recruitment paperwork first thing in the morning.”

“Thank you, sir . . . er . . . I mean, Agent Brandt. I can't tell you what this means to me.”

Clapping the younger man on the shoulder companionably, Will announced with a grin, “I'll bet I understand better than you think I do. Come on; Detective Chandler probably thinks I've murdered you and buried you in my flowerpots.”

“You have flower pots?”

“Marina’s idea,” he confessed with an eyeroll. “She claims they are soothing . . . I think they smell funny and take up too much room. But she's samaya malen`kaya . . . there isn't much I wouldn't tolerate for her sake. I'm sure you feel the same for Detective Chandler.”

Vincent's grin was wry and amused as he replied, “May I suggest that I know precisely how you feel? And that we should keep them apart, if at all possible. They'd probably try to take over the world together.”

“Too late for that. Marina and her best friend, Assistant Director Maria Hill, are already about ten years in on their master plan for world domination.” Chuckling, Will announced, “Individually, those two women are terrifying. Together, they are utterly unstoppable. Frankly, my father and I have learned to just roll with it. It's easier that way.”

Hansel's heavily accents voice spoke up from the doorframe as he leaned into the room then. “Ja . . . it is much safer too. Adler, mein Sohn, the Director is here to see hyu. Hyu had best come quickly.”

Will frowned, moving immediately towards the door. “What did Fury want? Did he say?”

“He said nothing . . . only that he must speak mit hyu immediately. He would say no more.”

“Dad, if you wouldn't mind directing Dr. Keller towards the backyard and the food, I will go find out what Nick wants.”

“Of course, Adler. Come along, Doktor; there will be a rush for seconds very soon and I doubt that there will be much left after.”
“Please, call me Vincent. So . . . you’re German?”

“Technically, I am Bavarian. But for the purposes of this talk, ja, I am German. Though my sons are as American as Americans come. They are good men . . . meine Tochter has raised them well.”

“Toktar?” Vincent asked hesitantly, butchering the accent terribly and causing a sharp wince from the former witch hunter.

“Marina is as close as I shall come to a daughter, I fear. She makes my Adler happy and my younger sons adore her. If hyu stick around, hyu will learn. There are many debts that I will have to repay once I am in hell; her is the largest share among them.”

The brunette Russian chirped cheerfully as she suddenly materialized at Hansel's left. “Vati, my ears are burning.”

Chuckling, Hansel looped his arm over her shoulders and pressed a tender kiss to her temple. “That is what happens when hyu eavesdrop on a private conversation, Tochter. Hyu hear things hyu should not.”

Smirking, the woman cocked her head, “I was not eavesdropping . . . I was simply waiting for a good time to interrupt. Clint told me that Nick is here and I was hoping you could point me in the direction of my lover.”

“Adler has been apprised of Fury's arrival and is with him now.” Turning, Hansel laid a paternal hand on Keller's shoulder as he continued, “Marishka, I would like to introduce hyu to Dr. Vincent Keller, Specialist, United States Army. Vincent, this is Agent Marina Petrovka . . . Will may be the senior officer, but Marina is the true ruler in this home.” Turning back to Marina, he insisted, “Vincent shall be joining hyur Sam in training, before taking a position within Medical.”

Marina's eyes went opaque with that protectiveness she was so famous for, even as she smiled and shook Keller's hand confidently, “I see. Welcome to S.H.I.E.L.D., Dr. Keller.”

“Please, call me Vincent. It's been a long time since anyone has called me 'Dr. Keller'; it's going to take some getting used to. And it's still a little strange to hear.”

Winking cheekily, her eyes warming into hot chocolate brown again, she laughed, “You should probably learn to get used to it, if you plan to work in Medical. Could get a little awkward otherwise. Just a tip.”

“I'll take that under advisement,” he agreed with a sheepish grin, before Will came blowing through the hallway like a hurricane.

Gone was the charming, if socially awkward, Colonel Will Grimm and in his place was cold and calculating Agent William Brandt. Laying a gentle hand on Marina's elbow, he insisted, “Clear all essential personnel out of the house. Get the boys inside. We have some work to do.”

Marina blinked at him in shock, protesting, “But Misha . . . the barbeque . . .”

“Now Marina,” he ordered, moving past in a brisk rush.

“Yes sir,” she agreed, even as her eyebrows rose in surprise at his tone. Turning to Vincent, she gestured back the way they'd come. “If you wouldn't mind staying? I think we’ll need Medical onsite; whatever just happened, it sounds bad.”

“Sure; what about Cat?”
Unfortunately, Detective Chandler is not S.H.I.E.L.D. She'll have to hang out downstairs for a bit; Casey can keep her company.” Glancing up at the German, she asked, “Vati, if you'd head up with him. I'll go round up the boys.”

“I would call hyur sisters if I was hyu, Tochter. I have a feeling that their unique skill sets will be of considerable use on this assignment.”

“Hmm . . . good call,” she agreed absently, before moving away.

It was probably twenty minutes later that everyone in the family with S.H.I.E.L.D. security clearance was finally congregated in Will's study on the second story of the house. Casey and Cat were both downstairs in the backyard, supervising the final stragglers to the barbeque as well as the beginning of the cleaning-up. Natasha Romanoff was sitting on the couch, with her lover sprawled across the cushions beside her, and both Nika Belinskaya & Vika Coulson perched on the coffee table in front of them. All three of the women were staring intently at their youngest sister, who was sitting cross-legged on the corner of her partner's desk, the two engaged in a terse, sharp and low-toned conversation in fluent German . . . the only language the two knew fluently that a good majority of the rest of the family did not. “Does anyone even have any idea what the hell they're saying?” Nika asked petulantly with a fierce pout.

“Not a clue,” Vika replied, prompting Natasha to nudge her lover roughly. “All right, Mr. Son-Of-A-German . . . translate.”

“The only word I'm hearing repeatedly is Untoten . . . and I have no idea what it means,” Brian answered nonchalantly, eyes still closed and hands folded over his chest, his shoulders shrugging lazily. “Whatever is going on, they both clearly intend to tell us, so chill out okay? Patience is nature's greatest virtue.”

One of Natasha's eyebrows cocked upwards at the phrase, even as she taunted, “And since when have you ever been interested in the exercise of patience?”

Brian's smirk was wicked as he tossed her a sardonic salute, “Touché!”

What the foursome might have said was interrupted as Will finally stood from his desk chair and turned to address the room. “It's been called to my attention that this mission should be on a volunteer basis only.” Reaching up to scratch at the back of his neck, he continued, “In light of what happened in Croatia, I wouldn't blame anyone who chose to stay behind.”

Before the words were even completely out of his mouth, Marina had picked up his pencil holder and thrown it squarely at his head, the canister letting out a hollow ring as it connected hard. “That is NOT why I made the suggestion, William Michael! The ZOMBIES on the other hand . . .”

“Wait, zombies? Like 'I'll eat your brains' kinda zombies?” Jason asked with an incredulously gleeful grin.

“Yeah, real, honest-to-God zombies are reportedly eating people and be overall scary in Georgia,” Marina agreed with a roll of her eyes. “So, as Misha said, this assignment is going to be strictly voluntary. You all know that I'm already in, but you'll each need to make your own choice from there. You want out, speak now or forever hold your peace.”

Each of the younger four Grimm boys looked at each other with varying degrees with excitement and, almost in one voice, announced, “Dude . . . when do we leave!?”

“Jay, you don't have to go. You're not S.H.E.I.L.D. anymore, remember? And you left for a good reason,” Will reminded the younger brother wearily.

“Maybe not, but you can’t say that there are fucking zombies in fucking Georgia and not expect me to be all over that plan. Come on, Will, be serious . . . it’s zombies!”

Will's eyes rolled at the reply, though Marina's smile was a mix of fond exasperation and mild irritation that was unique to the Family Russian's emotions to dealing with the eccentric whims of her beloved boys sometimes. Pausing, Jason considered for a moment, before frowning fiercely, “Not to mention, no way in hell am I trusting you guys to some dumbass newbie comm tech . . . nuh-uh, not a chance in hell. . . I'm going.”

Bucky's arm tightened where it was wrapped around his boyfriend's waist, announcing immediately, “No way in hell am I letting Clint go to Georgia alone . . . god, he'd probably try to pet one . . . or worse, adopt it!”

Clint's indignant protest was immediately swallowed by his boyfriend's lips on his own, though the rest of the brothers were all chortling at the knowledge that Bucky's declaration was more than likely accurate. Pushing away from the corner he was standing in, Sam Braddock spoke up next, “I'm in. Seriously, I have to go just to see this for myself.”

Owen moved to stand beside his best friend, clapping the Colonel warmly on the shoulder, “Come hell or high water, Will, I am your man. I'm in.” Grinning at the other man, Will took the offered arm, the two clasping wrists firmly in long standing camaraderie.

Marta spoke up from where she was curled up beside of Aaron. “Are there any theories about why there are zombies in Georgia?”

“Nothing concrete . . . however, the common consensus is a biological outbreak of some kind, possibly a virus? I don't know for certain.”

Nodding quietly, she frowned for a moment before speaking up, “Sounds like you'll need a virologist onsite to help synthesize an antidote.”

Aaron burst from his chair in instant protest. “What!? Not a chance in hell are we taking my new girlfriend to zombie-infested Georgia! Come on, Will! Side with me on this!”

Will bit on his lower lip, before sighing heavily, “Thank you, Marta . . . your help is much appreciated.”

Aaron stared in horror, before rounding on his sister, “MARINA! Talk to your boyfriend!!!!!”

Marina gave her solnyshko a small smile, even as she shook her head. “Marta's made her own choice. Allow her the dignity of it.”

Vincent looked around the room, noting that the three women beside the second eldest Grimm brother were all nodding in unspoken agreement. Will turned to his father and Maria Hill, and noticed that the two were watching each other carefully, before Hansel spoke up, “Ja, I am mit hyu, mein Sohn.”

Her mouth twisting sadly, Maria shook her head, “As much as I would love to go kick zombie ass with you, Marina, someone has to stay here and mind the ship.”

Marina nodded in agreement, winking playfully as she promised, “When we get back, I'll tell you all about it.”
The new medical officer for S.H.I.E.L.D. – not even officially recruited or even an hour on the job – took a deep breath as the Colonel and the Russian both turned to face him. “And you, Dr. Keller? You in?”

Shrugging haphazardly, he joked, “Sounds like a good way to get my feet wet, I guess. Yeah . . . I'm in too.”

Taking a deep breath, Will nodded his gratitude, before lifting a stack of file folders and beginning to pass them out. “Inside the folders are the mission specs. Head home, get packed, read up and meet back here at 1800 tonight . . . Fury wants us in Georgia yesterday.”

“Yes sir!” was the resounding chorus, the current and former Army boys among them all snapping precise salutes, before the room emptied.

Soon Marina and Will were the only two who remained. Turning to look at her lover, the Russian waited for him to speak. There was a long pause, before S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Chief Analyst finally spoke, “God help us . . .”

Marina's reply was equally reverent as she replied, “Amen.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
(G) Ja/Net - Yes/No
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will)
(G) mein Sohn - my son
(G) Doktor - Doctor
(G) meine Tochter - my daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel)
(G) Untoten - undead (technically could be used for either zombies or vampires. I checked! :D)
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (one of Marina's nicknames for Aaron/Kenny)
Chapter Notes

Lots of translations this time. Mostly names. So yeah . . . enjoy that!

Look, it wasn't a month before I posted again! Woohoo!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 162: Crazy, Stupid, Boys

If Jason had been excited about the zombies, he was even more excited about the part where he got to jump out of a plane. Grinning at Aaron, he fastened the straps almost absentmindedly as he announced, “I think I need to rejoin the world of the living. Do you have any idea how long it's been since I got to jump out of a plane!?”

Aaron's eyes were shining in the dim light, even as his hands moved to check straps and tighten his brother's harness, before allowing Jason to do the same for him. “I can imagine it's been awhile.”

Looking across the cargo plane, the second youngest Grimm called, “Hey Will! How long has it been since YOU jumped out of a plane?”

Will's eyes rolled, though only his partner saw how pale he was under his tan. “It's been awhile,” he replied, with a barely suppressed shudder. Looking down at his Russian as she laid a hand on his forearm, he smirked lightly, “I'm all right; heights just make me a little nervous.”

Chocolate colored eyes were warm as she squeezed his arm, teasing, “Seriously, why would anyone want to jump out of a perfectly good plane?”

His eyes narrowed as he scolded fondly, “Oh please, Little Miss 'My Sisters And I Are Gonna Jump Out Of This Plane Headfirst'.”

Smirking in acknowledgment, Marina's hands moved to check the harness of his parachute, both for his peace of mind and for her own. When she was finished, she went up on tiptoes to press a sweet kiss to the underside of his chin. “We've jumped out of at least a million planes, Mishka, and nothing's ever gone wrong. So relax, okay? I'm gonna go check on the boys. We're almost at the... drop point.”

Nodding, he began to check the pockets on his jumpsuit to make sure he had everything. Leaving him to it, Marina began to move through the group of people in the belly of the S.H.I.E.L.D.-modified troop carrier that had airlifted them out of New York at least three hours before. Bucky and Clint were off to the side, fiddling with each other’s harnesses as Bucky scolded the sniper firmly. Based on the petulant look on the younger man's face, the Winter Soldier was probably informing Hawkeye of all the things he was not allowed to do with the zombies. (Apparently, Marina wasn't the only one worried that Clint would attempt to smuggle one of the walking dead home in his rifle case or something else equally ridiculous.)

Vincent was being assisted with his harness by a surprisingly adept Hansel Kuhn, though to be honest Marina was unsure why she was surprised. Her Vati had proven on more than one occasion that his ability to adapt to the modern world he now found himself in was unparalleled. The former soldier initially looked a little nervous, but whatever Hansel said then sparked a quirky grin and a genuine laugh.

Sam was leaning back against the bulkhead, hands resting comfortably on the butt of the sniper rifle he'd slung across his chest. There were white cords hanging from his ears; considering the closed eyes and the bobbing of his head, he was listening to some music while he waited for the plane to get into position. Unable to resist this young man who was quickly becoming as dear to her as one of her own, Marina moved to brush a hand across his exposed forearm. His eyes stayed closed even as a warm smile creased his lips, his other hand coming up to squeeze hers as he promised, “I'm ready . . . just tell me when, Sova.”

Seeing no reason to reply, she squeezed once more and moved on. Aaron and Jason were still messing with each other, laughing together as Jason ran a last minute diagnostic on his tech while they waited for the order to jump. Marta stood just outside of their reach, giggling as the two brothers jostled each other fondly; more than a few times, Marina saw Aaron's eyes flash over to check on her. Owen had gotten into his gear and taken up position at Will's left shoulder, eyes sweeping the deck as though the Colonel needed protecting from their friends. Exchanging a fierce look with the Cleaner and former Division operative, Marina knew that he was just as determined to keep her lover safe from whatever was down there as she was. Not for the first time, she thanked whatever God was willing to listen to a spy and assassin, for the friendship between the two men.

As for her sisters, both Veronika and Natasha were with Brian off to the side of the plane. The two women were checking their weapons, while Brian tugged firmly on the straps on his girlfriend's parachute. Viktiriya had elected to stay at S.H.I.E.L.D., her attention solely on whatever information they would need as the mission progressed. (Marina was fairly certain the decision had actually been as a result of a certain test the golden-haired Amazon had taken a few days before. However, that secret was not hers to tell, so she kept her mouth shut . . . even if the only sound she could hear in her own head was her delighted squeals.)

Moving to take her place in the empty space at her lover's side, Marina leaned back against the wall and waited for the pilot's all clear. And if anyone noticed the way Will's weight shifted slightly in her direction, they were at least smart enough not to comment on it.

It seemed like a moment and an eternity, before the co-pilot jogged down the steps from the cockpit and announced into the cargo hold, “Agent Brandt . . . we're about five minutes from the jump zone.”

“Thank you, Lieutenant Simms . . . go ahead and tell Captain Abrams that we're ready to jump on his call.”
“Yes sir!” he agreed, with a sharp salute before dashing out of view once again.

Turning to his team, Will called out, “All right . . . huddle up!”

Instantly, he had the attention of the entire room. Everyone moved to form a half-circle in front of him, listening intently as he prepared to go over the last details of the assignment. Marina smiled as she watched Aaron hook Marta's harness onto his parachute; the scientist would be going down with her boyfriend, for both her sake and his own. Will looked around the circle and began to speak, “All right . . . so we’re five minutes from what seems destined to be the worst few days of our lives. I need a sound off of everyone, call signs only. I want to make sure everyone knows them; it's unlikely we're all going to land together so it's important that we know how to keep track of each other.”

Marina spoke first, sensing that the others were waiting for someone to start them. “Sova . . .,” there was a pause, before she grinned, “. . . or Sych, but none of you get to call me that.”

As she'd known it would, that released the ratcheting tension as the rest of the crew released a round of stiff chuckles. Bucky spoke next, “Zimny Soldat or just the Soldat.”

“Yastreb,” was Clint's answer, seconds before Aaron spoke up, “Sokol,” followed by Marta's own timid, “Vorona.”

Sam's smile was twisted with amusement as he answered, “Snayper,” the word sounding too much like “sniper” for everyone – even those who weren't fluent in Russian – to not know what it meant. In contrast, Owen's own smile was wicked as he boasted, “Ubiytsa.”

Vincent's lips fumbled with his own callsign, before Will took pity and recited, “Tselitel . . . you don't have to know how to say it, but at least remember what it sounds like so when you hear it, you know we're talking to you, okay?”

“Yes sir,” was the prompt response, before Brian chimed in next, “Skopa,” with Natasha's laughing “Chernaya Vdova” nearly overlapping his. Nika laughed, her arms stretching luxuriously as she practically purred, “Tigritsa.”

Jason spoke up then, “Krechet . . . I'm going to probably be the voice you hear most often, just as a head's up and a reminder.”

Will nodded to his father, prompting the German to announce, “Volk” before the eldest Grimm finished off with his own, “Orel. So . . . our target is a small landing strip about a mile from here. It's connected to a small research base; all reports indicate that the base is abandoned, however there are higher than expected amounts of energy coming from a place where there isn't anyone in residence. That being said, we're under the assumption that this is Ground Zero for the outbreak. We'll rendezvous about 200 meters from the base tonight, and send recon into the base tomorrow morning. Keep in mind, we are hunting zombies . . . if one engages you, kill it. Right now, I could care a less about the possibility of a cure; I care more about making sure everyone gets home. Understood?”

The rounds of “Yes sir!” was thunderous in the enclosed space. Once the sound faded, Will gestured towards his younger brother, “Krechet . . . it's your floor.”

Nodding firmly, Jason flipped open the lid of the locked box he was holding in his hands. “These are your comm units. They are specifically designed to copy and recognize the DNA of the initial wearer, making them impossible to listen in on. Once they have read you, they will only respond to you so do not lose them. Embedded in the receiver is a GPS locator, which will be able to locate you to within half a meter of where you are.” Pausing, he glared at Brian, as he muttered angrily, “I would appreciate it if you would not force me to have to use that feature, BRI.”
Brian's grin was evil as he winked, “Sure thing, little brother.”

Rolling his eyes, the middle Grimm muttered a series of unflattering insults under his breath, before speaking up once again. “I am going to warn you that they are not S.H.I.E.L.D. approved. They were a project I was working on at home while I was finishing up my medical leave, so let me know how they work, okay?”

Clint grinned as he clapped his brother on the shoulder, laughing, “It's good to see you building crazy shit again, Jay . . . I can't even tell you how much we've all missed your batshit engineering projects.”

Shrugging sheepishly, Jason confessed, “I hadn't realized how much I'd missed it until I started fiddling with my dusty old tools again.”

The look between Will and Marina was eloquent with silent understanding, and in the back of the Russian's mind, she was considering all the different ways she could manipulate Nick into recruiting Jason into S.H.I.E.L.D. once more. Or Maria; the Assistant Director was usually much better about manipulating people into getting the outcome she wanted. Whatever else might have been said was interrupted by the pilot's voice coming through the loudspeaker, “We are in the drop zone . . . I repeat, we are in the drop zone . . . good hunting, agents.”

Will turned immediately towards Owen, who rushed to slap the button to open the cargo bay doors. “All right . . . everybody keep your eyes open. Sam . . . I want you and Vincent to go first, and Aaron, I want you and Marta after them. Bucky and Clint next . . . then Owen and Jason . . . Natasha and Brian . . . Nika and Marina . . . then Dad and me . . . be careful and we'll see you on the ground.”

Two by two, the members of their team moved towards the opening doors and lunged out into open space. Before long, only Brian, Hansel, Will, and the three Russians were left. Glancing at her sisters, the red-haired assassin grinned at the gleeful look on the brunette's face. “Shall we, Murderesses?”

“Shall we indeed, Vdova,” the other two woman agreed with a sassy wink.

Reaching out for each other, both Natasha and Veronika took one of Marina's hands before the three swan-dived from the plane. Brian was cheering after them as he rushed to lean out over open space, watching the women slice through the air like a hot knife through butter. Looking back over his shoulders, he laughed, “Fury's Angels are BAMF chicks . . . and I don't even care that Marina's going to kick my ass when she finds out I said that.”

Will rolled his eyes as he watched his younger brother throw him a sarcastic salute, before whooping, “Cannonball!” and literally cannon-balling from the plane. “Sumasshedshiy ublyudok,” was the Colonel's only response to that, before glancing at his father. “You ready for this, Dad?”

“I am ready, Adler. Are hyu?”

Chuckling ruefully, the oldest Grimm admitted, “I will feel much better when I have my feet back on solid ground.”

Clapping his son on the shoulder, the German chuckled in agreement. “Shall we make that happen, mein Sohn?”

“God yes,” was the last thing Will said, before he too jumped from the plane with his father only steps off of his heels.
Meanwhile, in New York State, the sharp click of high heels on cheap linoleum floors of the diner that Jason Walsh called his home was loud in the other wise silent space. Despite the late hour, and Jason's absence, Casey Shraeger was still there, sitting up in his bed and reading a book. Looking up at the sound, the red-haired detective blinked at the sight of Maria Hill rounding the corner in her S.H.I.E.L.D. uniform and high-heeled combat boots. Blinking in surprise, Casey nevertheless set her book to the side and pushed herself to the edge of the bed. “Commander Hill . . . all due respect, what the hell are you doing here?”

The woman's face could have been steel, considering the narrow-eyed manner in which she watched the detective. After a moment, the assistant director relaxed and a small, pleased smile creased her formidable features. “Detective Shraeger . . . do you have a minute? I think we should talk.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel Kuhn)
(R) Sova - Owl (one of Marina's call signs, first for the Army's Spec Ops Unit, the Brat'ya Mrachnyy, and second for SHIELD's Brothers Grimm task force)
(R) Sych - Little Owl (one of Marina's call signs, but Will is the only one allowed to call her that.)
(R) Zimniy Soldat - The Winter Soldier (Bucky's call sign given to him by the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Soldat - Soldier (a shortened form of Winter Soldier)
(R) Yastreby - Hawk (Clint's call sign, first for the Army's Spec Ops Unit, the Brat'ya Mrachnyy, and second for SHIELD's Brothers Grimm task force)
(R) Sokol - Falcon (Aaron/Kenny's call sign, first for the Army's Spec Ops Unit, the Brat'ya Mrachnyy, and second for SHIELD's Brothers Grimm task force)
(R) Vorona - Raven (Marta's civilian call sign, so the Grimms can identify her over comms without revealing her identity as Aaron Grimm's girlfriend)
(R) Snayper - Sniper (Sam Braddock's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Ubiytsa - Assassin (Owen Elliot's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Tselitel - Healer (Vincent Keller's call sign for SHIELD, while in the field with a deployed Medical team)
(R) Skopa - Osprey (Brian Grimm's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Chernaya Vdova - Black Widow (Natasha Romanoff's call sign given to her by the Akademiya and their Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Tigritsa - Tigress (Veronika Belinskaya's call sign given to her by the Akademiya and their Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Krecht - Merlin (Jason's call sign, first for the Army's Spec Ops Unit, the Brat'ya Mrachnyy as well as previously for SHIELD's Brothers Grimm task force)
(R) Volk - Wolf (Hansel's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will's call sign, first for the Army's Spec Ops Unit, the Brat'ya Mrachnyy, and second for SHIELD's Brothers Grimm task force)
(R) Sumassheshiy ublyudok - crazy fucker (an opinion of Brian shared by almost everyone he knows!)
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will)
(G) mein Sohn - my son
Chapter Notes

New chapter! This is kind of the calm before the storm. Enjoy!

Translations at the end as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 163: The Devil Went Down To Georgia

The Winter Soldier heard his partner's feet hit the ground only seconds after his own. The soft rustling of fabric and clanking of harnesses was audible in the dark as the two snipers stripped themselves instantly of their harnesses. Ocean blue eyes were fierce and steady as they surveyed the dark, ears attuned to the small sounds his lover made behind him, as Clint dug for a small penlight and the map Will had given them of the surrounding area. The tiny light barely broke through the gloom at all, before Clint announced solemnly, “We're about 250 yards from the rendezvous point. The river is about 50 yards to our left; if we head that way, we can follow the river to the rendezvous instead of trying to trek through the woods.”

Nodding, Bucky swung his rifle from where he'd strapped it across his back. “Lead the way, khishchnick . . . I'm right behind you.”

There was a muffled whispering sound as the Hawk tucked the map and light away, before unhooking his bow from where it was strapped to his gear. A sharp flick of the wrist snapped it out to full size and a soft whirring sound indicated that the archer had released the pressure seal on his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issue quiver. Coming to stand beside the Soldier, Clint felt a sharp shiver trace along his spine. “Whole place is chertov creepy, Buck. Listen; total silence . . . no birds, no animals, nothing . . . ’Morbid and creepifying, I got no problem with' but this is 'starting to damage my calm’.”

“Firefly quotes now? Really!?” the older man chuckled in undertoned bemusement. “You really think that's appropriate with zombies running all over the place?”

“There is never an inappropriate time for a good Firefly quote, Bucky,” Clint sallied back with a smart-assed smirk, “. . . never.”
“Freak,” the Soldier teased, before the sound of shuffling feet brought his attention back to their surroundings.

Clint's voice was whisper soft as he insisted, “None of our people would be shuffling their feet . . . and they are moving way too fast for it to be any of my brothers or the Murderesses.”

Bucky's nod was slow as he murmured, “Agreed. Remember what the Colonel said though; do not engage unless engaged upon.”

The Hawk's head dipped once before his whole body disappeared into the shadows. Bucky shifted as well, and before long the tiny clearing was empty and motionless. It wasn't long before a shadow at the edge of the clearing. Bucky's whole body tensed as he watched a clearly dead woman shuffle her way into the clearing, followed by others of varying levels of decomposition. Triggering his comm, he muttered in an undertone, “I know we were hunting zombies, but svyatoye der'mo . . . those are fucking zombies!”

Will's voice was stern as he insisted, “Are you two under cover?”

“Yeah . . . they haven't seen us yet.” Eyes narrowing, Bucky watched the group move past without once shifting focus from the trees on the other side of the clearing. “They don't seem particularly interested in deviating from their path either. Whatever they're after, it's obviously more appetizing than the Yastreb and me.”

Clint's tone was snarky as he retorted, “Bullshit . . . nothing is more appetizing than you!”

Marina's tone was fond and long-suffering as she teased, “You remember that your brothers, father and sister-in-laws can hear you, right, dorogoy?”

There was a moment as the archer considered this before announcing, “That is not an invitation to find out, guys! I will kill anyone who even considers it.”

Natasha's tone was amused as she replied, “Been there, done that,” to which Brian roared, “Excuse you!!! You are a dead man, Barnes!”

Will sighed as he ordered briskly, “Guys . . . focus! Back on point, please . . . there are human eating creatures who would dearly love to make us their midnight snacks so pay attention.” There was a pause, during which Natasha and Brian could be heard arguing under their breaths in Russian, before Natasha finally snapped, “Excuse you, you caveman! I appreciate the whole 'kill anyone who looks at me twice' sentiment here, but we've both had sex prior to this relationship and I do not like any implication that any man could control me. So shut the fuck up, Gamble!”

There was a moment of total silent, before the Colonel spoke up again wearily, “All right, I need a sound-off from everyone.”

It took a moment for everyone to get counted, before at last Marina spoke up again, “All right . . . so Orel, Volk, Tigritsa, Vdova, Skopa and I are about 100 yards from the rendezvous. Any idea on an ETA for the rest of you?”

Stepping into the clearing once it was clear once more, Clint glanced at his boyfriend before replying, “The Soldat and I are about 250 yards away, but we're only 50 yards from the river. We're gonna follow it instead of heading through the forest. We should be there in about fifteen minutes.”

Sam's voice was calm and strong as he replied, “Ubiytsa, Tselitel and I are also about fifteen minutes out. We'll meet you there.”
Marta's voice was timid as she piped in, “Sokol and I are on our way . . . he twisted his ankle on the landing, but he seems to be walking all right, just a little slower than usual. We'll meet you there as soon as we can.”

The Grimm Family Russian's voice was worried as she chimed in, “Solnyshko, sit rep?”

“I'm all right, Sova . . . another couple minutes and it won't be a problem. I just landed on it wrong, it happens. We'll see you all soon.”

The Colonel's tone was strong and sure as he insisted, “Good . . . everyone, try to stay radio silent as much as you can. Be that as it may, though, let us know if anything comes up, agreed?”

“Yes sir!” was the all around call, before Will replied, “Stay safe and good hunting. We'll meet you at the rendezvous point. Orel out.”

The comms went silent and Bucky glanced toward Clint, jerking his head towards the woods. “Let's get out of these woods, huh? Like you said, it's creepy in here. Also, if we're going to run into any more of the undead . . . I would like to see them coming.”

“Amen to that!” the S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper agreed with a smirk, his bow held calmly in one hand, arrow already nocked against the string. Scanning the clearing, Clint got his bearing and pointed, “River's that way. Let's go.”

The two moved silently through the woods, the sound of rushing water getting louder the closer they got. As they walked, Bucky glanced at his lover out of the corner of his eyes and once again marveled at him. Say what you wanted about Clint Grimm, but he was a hell of an agent. It was no secret that he could be immature and playful and a total fanboy, at least where James Bond was concerned. But when he was on an assignment, there was no better field asset in S.H.I.E.L.D. . . . and that did include Bucky himself and the rest of Clint's brothers. He just knew the importance of keeping the job separate from his personal life, and strove to make sure that there was a clear divide between the two.

It wasn't long before they reached the river, the sound a dull roar that only served to enhance the all encompassing strangeness of the forest around them. Moving to the edge, Clint peered into the depths and sighed at sight of fish swimming lazily in the shallows. Dipping his hand in, he waited for some indication that they would attack him, before splashing a small handful onto his overheated features. “That's a good sign,” he grunted, twisting to look up at the Winter Soldier, as the older man stood sentinel by the water's edge.

“What is?”

“Not everything in this neck of the woods is dead. The fish seem to be okay at least.”

Ocean blue eyes rolled as Bucky snarked, “Yeah . . . at least one thing we don't have to worry about eating us in our sleep.”

Baring his teeth playfully, Clint scolded fondly, “Your cynicism is not appreciated, James Buchanan Barnes.”

Cocked an eyebrow, his boyfriend snapped angrily, “And now you're suddenly my mother?”

Flinching sharply, the archer hissed, “What the hell crawled up your dick and died!? Fuck you, Bucky.”

Suddenly deflated at the genuine hurt in his partner's eyes, Bucky sighed heavily, his whole body sagging slightly. “I'm sorry, khishchnick... honest. Like you said, this whole place is creepy and it's setting my teeth on edge.”

Clint grunted, fixing his eyes on the horizon and starting to move away, whole body turned away. “Whatever... let's just get to the rendezvous.”

Feeling genuinely guilty, Bucky protested, “Clint...”

The other man didn't even pause, just continued to move along the water's edge in the direction of the river. Releasing another sigh, Bucky hefted his rifle and followed; he was in the shit house and he totally deserved to be there.

It was a tense twenty minutes, before at last the familiar murmur of voices broke through the silence around them. Waving his boyfriend back, Clint scaled a tree and perched on one of the highest branches in order to get a better look. From his vantage point, the sheen off Jay's communications equipment – and the glowing end of Will's cigarette – was impossible to miss. Jumping from the tree, he splashed quickly through the water, calling quietly, “Will! Marina! It's Clint!”

“Clinton Francis... do you understand the meaning of covert operation?” the Russian teased fondly, ducking from the tent and letting him scoop her up in his arms, his momentum swinging her around several times. Seeing the hurt in his eyes, and the guilt on Bucky's face, however was all Marina needed to know. Humming low in her chest, Marina turned to her lover and announced, “Yastreb and I will take first watch.”

The announcement clearly jolted Will, who lifted his head from his maps and cocked an eyebrow in her direction. Marina gave him a small smile and a wink, earning a pair of narrowed green-grey eyes and a haphazard shrug. Frankly, she understood his confusion; since the beginning of their relationship, she had always shared her watch with her Mishka. But her dorogoy was upset and that was the last thing they needed on an assignment like this.

Squeezing her youngest's shoulder warmly, she coaxed, “Come on, domashniy... let's go find a perch, okay?”

Nodding briskly, he allowed himself to be led off into the underbrush. Will straightened slightly, bracing one hand on the makeshift table as the other one lifted to remove his cigarette from the corner of his mouth. The smoke circled his head in a hazy halo, before he asked cautiously, “What the hell did you do?”

There was a small, sad smile as Bucky shook his head, “I was an ass... and Marina is going to kill me.”

Chuckling dryly, Will took another drag on his cigarette as he turned his attention back onto his maps. “I wouldn't worry about her killing you because Clint's not crying... dismemberment, however, is totally up for grabs.”

Bucky's only reply was a long, drawn out groan of, “Fuck my life.”

Meanwhile, Marina and Clint found a pair of trees and set up a pair of nests to spend their watches in. Setting her comm onto mute, Marina leaned back against the trunk of the tree and watched her youngest charge balance easily on the tips of his toes not ten feet from her. “All right, mal'chik... what happened?”

Glancing at her over his shoulder, those blue-gray eyes of his were piercing in the gloom as he considered the question. Finally, his shoulders dropped as he ran one hand back through his hair.
“Don't worry about it. It's stupid.”

“If you're upset about it, dorogoy, it could never be stupid. I promise . . . just between us. I won't even tell Misha.”

That declaration earned a pair of narrowed eyes as he considered the offer. His tone was tentative as he demanded, “You promise . . . you won't tell Will.”

Nodding once in silent agreement, she swore, “I swear of my father’s grave . . . what you tell me here will go no further than us.”

Huffing out a quick breath, Clint confessed, “I let my feelings get hurt because Bucky got short with me. Like I said, it's stupid.”

“What do you mean, 'got short with' you?” Marina asked, head cocked curiously as she watched him shift his weight slightly.

“I was making some stupid observation about the fish not being zombies, and Bucky jumped down my throat. I was just joking around when I called him by his full name and he accused me of acting like his mother. He tried to apologize and explain, but I wasn't in the mood to hear it.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. handler hummed under her breath as she considered that, before commenting, “This place has everyone on edge. I think Misha's already gone through a whole pack already . . . and he's usually pretty conservative with his cigarettes on deployment.”

One corner of the Hawk's lips twitched upwards as he tilted his head in her direction. “Like I said Marishka . . . it was stupid. I shouldn't have even let it bother me. It's just this place . . . it's not natural.”

“Jayne-level calm damage going on, huh?”

Chuckling against his will, Clint flashed her a quick wink. “Bucky doesn't seem to understand that Firefly has the best quotes for random, out of this world occurrences.”

“Since it's a show about out of this world space-cowboys, it does make a certain kind of sense,” Marina giggled, dropping her head back against the rough bark and allowing her eyes to slip to half-mast. “Are you two going to be okay? Or do I need to kill him for you?”

Clint giggled at the familiar threat, his head shaking in negation. “No, I don't need you to kill him for me. I just need to stop being such a baby and remember that Bucky is just as freaked out by this place as I am. And where I make inappropriate jokes, Bucky gets so tense, you could use him as trampoline spring.”

The Russian chuckled as she conceded that point, “You ever want any really good dirt, Clint, you let me know. I could tell you stories from when I was kid that would give you enough blackmail for at least a dozen lifetimes.”

Shaking his head, Clint laughed, “As tempting as that is, Marishka, I think I can handle Bucky on my own without your no doubt delicious blackmail.”

“Whatever you say, mal'chik. The offer is always open,” she agreed with a wide yawn, settling back more comfortably against the tree trunk. “Ugh . . . why did I agree to first watch? Mishka and I always take third watch . . . I am never going to be able to stay awake for this.”

Rolling his eyes, the S.H.I.E.L.D. sniper chucked a small chunk of bark in her direction. “Get out of here, Sova . . . Sokol and I can handle first watch . . . we always take first watch together.”

Triggering the comm in his ear, Clint chirped cheerfully, “Isn't that right, big brother?”

Aaron's chuckle was low and familiar as he agreed, “I'm on my way. ETA thirty seconds. And Sova . . . I'd appreciate it if you and Orel would keep an eye on Vorona for me.”

“I promise,” she agreed with relief, smiling down at her blue-eyed charge as he suddenly appeared at the base of the tree below her. Grinning at Clint, she shot him a quick salute before shimmying down the tree. Wrapping her arms around Aaron in a quick hug, she whispered into his ear, “Keep an eye on him, okay? He's upset . . . he could use some 'big brother bullshit' right now.”

Aaron grinned and squeezed her lightly, assuring her warmly, “I'm all over it.”

The rest of the Misfits arrived at the rendezvous throughout the remainder of the night, and by dawn everyone was ready to move on to their objective. Bucky was relieved to see that whatever had been said between Clint and Marina the night before had soothed the Hawk's ruffled feathers, and Clint was once again standing as close to him as protocol allowed. The Colonel cocked an eyebrow at his partner's quiescent calm, before sighing at her innocent grin. “Whatever you do to Bucky . . . I would appreciate it if you waited until after we got home before maiming him. I need him in one piece for at least the next 48 hours.”

The Russian said nothing in reply, only flashed him a glimpse of eyetooth, before sauntering towards where Aaron and Marta were packing up the equipment that the virologist would need for the assignment. Turning to the Zimniy Soldat, the Colonel clapped him on the shoulder familiarly and announced, “I will pray for your soul, my friend . . . you will need all the goodwill you can get at this point.”

Snorting hard, Bucky replied, “Chert voz'mi.”

It was about then that the entire camp went on high alert, when the sound of something crashing through the underbrush about fifty feet down the river from their position. The sound of a dozen plus bullets being chambered was deafening in the instant silence. Sam was the first to speak up in a hushed tone, “What the fuck was that?”

Marina shook her head in answer, glancing at Will out of the corner of her eyes. The Colonel's face was stone, jaw locked tight, as he considered the forest in the direction of the sound. Looking back at his partner, he nodded once, “Let's go find out, shall we?”

That crazy grin of hers that he loved so fiercely slipped across her lips as she purred, “Shall we indeed.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) khishchnick - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for Clint)
(R) chertov - fucking
(R) svyatoye der'mo - holy shit
(R) Yastreb - Hawk (Clint's call sign)
(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint)
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will's call sign)
(R) Volk - Wolf (Hansel's call sign)
(R) Tigritsa - Tigress (Veronika "Nika" Belinskaya's call sign)
(R) Vdova - Widow (short for Chernaya Vdova or Black Widow; Natasha's call sign given to her by the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Skopa - Osprey (Brian's call sign)
(R) Soldat - Soldier (short for the Zimniy Soldat or Winter Soldier; Brian's call sign given to him by the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Ubiytsa - Assassin (Owen Elliot's call sign)
(R) Tselitel - Healer (Vincent Keller's call sign)
(R) Sokol - Falcon (Aaron/Kenny's call sign)
(R) Solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Aaron/Kenny)
(R) Sova - Owl (one of Marina's call signs)
(R) domashniy - pet (an interchangeable nickname that Marina uses with Jason, Aaron/Kenny and Clint)
(R) mal'chik - my boy (an interchangeable nickname that Marina's uses with Jason, Aaron/Kenny and Clint)
(R) Misha/Mishka - a diminutive of Mikhail/Michael (Will's middle name is Michael and Marina is the only one who call him this)
(R) Marishka - a diminutive of Marina
(R) Vorona - Raven (Marta's civilian call sign to identify her as Aaron/Kenny's girlfriend)
(R) Zimniy Soldat - Winter Soldier (Bucky's call sign given to him by the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Chert voz' mi - Fuck me
Chapter Notes

This is an action chapter! So tighten your seatbelts and enjoy the ride!

Translations at the end, as always.

Also, a quarrel is another name for a crossbow bolt. Just so we are all on the same page. Enjoy the chapter!

Chapter 164: How Not To Die, As Told By Daryl Dixon

The sight of a startled horse suddenly charging through the underbrush, caused the entire group to flinch in surprise. It took a half a second for Hansel to take stock of the situation and lunge at the dangling reins. “Beruhigt, mein Pferd . . . beruhigt . . .” he soothed in hushed German, stroking his palm along the mare’s forelock.

Marina cocked an eyebrow at the sight of the saddle and gear adorning the animal, but it was Bucky who voiced her thought. “She threw her rider. Whoever it was . . . they’re probably injured.”

Vincent frowned as he asked, “How do you know she wasn’t abandoned?”

Hansel's voice was a low hum as he offered the doctor an answer, “She is healthy, well-fed and comfortable around people . . . she has a home . . . we must return her to eet.”

William laid a strong palm over the mare's nose, earning a huff and a firm nudge, as the animal nickered a warm greeting. “Dad, ride on ahead . . . take Marta on the horse with you. Marina, you take Sam, Vincent and Aaron and go with him. Find the rider . . . let's see what intel we can glean from him.”

Marina nodded in agreement, gesturing her team into motion. Hansel swung up into the saddle effortlessly, leaning down to offer Marta his arm to pull her up behind him. Aaron handed his father his shotgun, a fond smile on his lips at the fearful anticipation on the girlfriend's face. “It's kinda like riding a motorcycle, Doc, just hold on around his waist. Dad'll take good care of you and I'll be right behind you.”

She nodded in agreement, arms looping around the German's waist as she gave her boyfriend a small smile. “I'll be all right, Aaron. Look after Sam for me, okay?”

“Absolutely, Doc,” he promised, before stepping back and allowing Hansel to kick the mare into a careful walk back the way it had come.

Marina's whistle brought Aaron's attention around just in time to catch his rifle as it flew towards his face. Hands flying as he readied the weapon, he scolded his sister fondly, “Has anyone told you that you're an evil woman lately?”

“Not lately!” she chirped cheerfully, winking playfully. “You told her, you'd be right behind her, solnyshko, so let's get a move on already.” Hefting her pack over one shoulder, her rifle held carelessly in the other hand, she punched his shoulder lightly before moving towards her lover.

Will watched the four Spec Ops soldiers, both current and former, move out of the clearing, after accepting Marina's quick peck with a smile. Turning back to the rest, he ordered, “Let's pack up. I don't want us to be separated for any longer than we have to be. Bucky . . . Clint . . . find perches. If it looks dead and it's moving . . . shoot it. Killshots only.”

“Yes sir!” was the resounding reply from the group, before they each rushed to pack up the camp and move out.

Meanwhile, Daryl Dixon was cursing on his terrible luck. “Damn that horse,” he swore, groaning at the piercing pain in his side. Twisting carefully, he glared down at where one of his quarrels had impaled him, the bright orange fletching not yet stained with his blood. Growling, he forced himself to sit up and get out of the water. “Double damn that horse!”

Every movement was agony, as he used his shirtsleeves to stabilize the shaft so it wouldn't move. It wasn't until he heard rustling in the brush that he realized his crossbow was missing. The next thirty minutes were quite possibly the worst of his life; falling back down the cliff wasn't even the worst part . . . knowing that he was hallucinating his older brother as he languished in the muck after falling, however, was. He'd tried to go back to Merle but Merle had cut himself free and taken off on his own. There was only so much he could do; Sophia was a little girl and she needed someone to look for her, especially because of the zombies running around the countryside.

Taking a second to consider the thought he just had, he realized that his leg was shaking. Blinking himself free of the hallucination, he yelled in surprise at the sight of a damned walker gnawing on his boot. Kicking the undead creep with his other leg, he reached for a stout stick at his side and swung it hard, knocking the thing to the ground. Forcing himself upwards, he blinked in surprise as the zombie's head suddenly exploded in a burst of gore.

Twisting slightly, he blinked at the sight of a man sitting atop the damned horse that bucked him, robin's egg blue eyes sighting along the barrel of his shotgun. Bearing his teeth at the animal, he grunted at the man, “That's my horse.”

Startlingly white teeth flashed in a grin as he agreed amiably, an audible German accent nearly overpowering his words, “I thought it might be.”

Another growl called Daryl's attention away from the man and towards another walker shuffling quickly in their direction, his dead, hungry eyes intent on the blood staining Daryl's side. Before he even had the chance to call out, the bloodsucker went down in a short burst of automatic fire. His eyes went wide as he turned to see a petite woman step from the brush, a cocky grin on her face and her AK-47 held at her side. Glancing back over her shoulder, she called cheerfully, “Nice shooting, Sammy-honey!”

A blond young man with eerie sky-blue eyes stalked carefully from the brush behind her, his own rifle still at the ready. Eyes flicking in her direction, he gave her a small smile, before he dashed in the direction of the dead zombie, putting another series of bullets through the walker's head just in case. A dark haired man with a horrific scar down his cheek followed him, crouching beside the newly re-dead man, eyes intent on the body and what was left of its head. Reaching out slowly, he touched the mottled skin. Whatever he found there caused a deep frown, before he pushed himself to his feet once again.

A gentle, almost timid touch on his side yanked Daryl's attention away from the trio and onto the young woman kneeling in the muck beside him. There was a stocky young man standing at her back, an assault rifle in his hands and his eyes fixed on their surroundings, his features identical to those of the man with the shotgun. Seeing that she had his attention, she gave him a small smile. “Hello . . . my name's Marta Shearing . . . I'm a doctor. Do you mind if I take a look at your wound?”

Cocking an eyebrow at her, he snarked solemnly, “Do I have a choice?”

Her smile was amused, even as her companion growled at him, replying calmly, “Not really. Might as well just sit still and suck it up.”

The other woman came over to crouch in front of the two, eyes fond as she watched Marta carefully untie the makeshift bandage and unwind it from the quarrel shaft. Speaking again, it was only then that Daryl was able to hear the Russian accent that still lingered in her tone and pronunciation. “What do you think, Marta? Is he gonna live?”

Humming under her breath, she prodded gently around the area even as she nodded. “I think so. I'd like to get some antibiotics into him, if only because this water isn't exactly the pinnacle of sanitary, but I think he should be all right. The arrow missed all major organs . . . mostly just a flesh wound.” Looking up, she grinned softly, “He should be just fine, Marina.”

Daryl's tone was gruff as he corrected her sourly, “It's a quarrel.”

Those dark eyes were surprised as she looked up into his face, confusion written on her features plainly. “I'm sorry? Who's quarreling?”

Opening his mouth to explain, he was surprised to hear the woman reply, “A quarrel is a crossbow bolt; it's a different kind of shaft than the ones Clint uses with his bow.”

“Oh.”

Patting her hand fondly, the warrior woman turned her full attention onto Daryl, chocolate eyes assessing him briskly for a moment. When she spoke, her tone was firm but warm, an almost maternal sheen in her eyes. “My name is Marina Petrovka, Lt Colonel, United States Army. The blond is Sam Braddock, Master Corporal, and the young man with the scar is Dr. Vincent Keller, Specialist. The one behind Marta is my younger brother Aaron Grimm, Staff Sergeant, and the man on your horse is Hansel Kuhn, Aaron's father.” Cocking her head at his continued silence, she prompted, “And you are?”

By now, the blood loss was making Daryl's head pound and he could already feel the fever of infection boiling under his skin. The sudden appearance of Merle over her shoulder caused a shudder and he scolded his brother bitterly, “Where the hell have you been, asshole?”
The Russian's eyebrow cocked upwards as she twisted slightly to face the younger woman. Marta's head shook, even as her hands nearly flew at his side. “I'm pretty sure he's hallucinating. He's burning up with fever, which is surprising because he can't have fallen from that horse that long ago.”

Sam's face was twisted in disgust as he suggested, “This water is disgusting, Aunt Marty . . . and considering all the blood in the water, he was lying in it for awhile at least.”

Vincent nodded in agreement, crouching on the other side of the two women. “Also, the amount of blood mixed in with the mud around him suggests he's been laying here for at least another twenty minutes after that, if not more. Frankly, its not a surprise that infection is setting in already.”

The virologist frowned as she looked up at her counterpart, insisting, “He needs those antibiotics, immediately.”

“Agreed,” the former soldier agreed solemnly, twisting his bag around the front of him and digging within its depths.

From that point, things got a little hazy and to his dying day, Daryl would swear he had no idea what happened next. One minute he was being hovered over by a group of well-trained soldiers and the next, he was lying on a warm cot in what could only be an Army tent. He was definitely clearer-headed than he had been, and the sound of both a faint Russian and a strong German accents reminded him of the last thing he remembered. Pushing himself to stand from the cot, he groaned softly at the way his head was spinning, before moving carefully towards the door.

Pushing open the flap, he was surprised to see several more versions of the two identical men he'd met before he – dare he say it? – passed out. Staring, he could only stare as everyone turned to look in his direction at the sound of him swearing, “Fuck me.”

Marina's laughter was almost familiar as the sound burst from her unwillingly, one of her hands reaching out to grasp the arm of the man she was standing with. Her giggles rang through the clearing as she bent to try and stem the tide. Marta appeared soundlessly at his side, with her ever-present shadow at her back once again, an amused grin on her lips as she inquired, “It's good to see you up and around, Mr. Dixon. When you tried to slice off the ears from the zombie, I will confess that we were a little worried about your mental health.”

One corner of his lips quirked upwards as he reminded her caustically, “I've spent the last two weeks being hunted by walkers, trying to avoid becoming their next meal. I can promise you, my mental health is nonexistent at this point.”

Her mouth twisted into a smirk as she snarked, “Clearly.”

Hansel Kuhn approached cautiously, resting his palm carefully on the bared skin of his shoulder. “How you do feel, mein Sohn?”

Narrowing his eyes at the German, Daryl growled, “What did you call me?”

There was no answer from the older man, though the man's sons – and the other five men with his face were clearly his relations, even if they weren't his children – snickered at the high pitched tone of his question. A man dressed entirely in a black tactical uniform, a cigarette hanging from the corner of his lips, stepped forward and offered him a hand. “It's a compliment, I promise, Mr. Dixon. I'm Will Grimm . . . let's talk zombies, shall we?”

Daryl's eyes narrowed as he watched the man's eyes cycle through colors like a pinwheel, before finally settling on an almost colorless blue. Nodding once, he accepted the man's hand and agreed with the reply, "We call them walkers. We don't know where they came from or how they even exist; all we know is that two weeks ago, the world went to shit and fucking zombies were suddenly not just a character in cheesy horror flicks."

The man's eyes narrowed slightly, before the red-haired woman standing beside one of his brothers inquired cautiously, "We?"

Nodding, he jerked a thumb backwards of his shoulders in the general direction of Hershel's farm, and the camp inhabited by the other survivors. "There's about 20 of us, living at a farm about 5 miles from here."

Turning to look at Marina, Will watched as she dug in one of her cargo pockets for a map of their surroundings. Spreading it out over one of the tables, the two officers perused the area, before Will stabbed a finger at a smallish blip of color on the map. "Is this the farm you're talking about?"

Moving closer, Daryl wondered why he was even surprised to see that the "map" was actually a thermal image, consisting of a 50 miles square radius of the area. Scanning the rest of the map, he frowned slightly to see the block shaped compound outlined in dark red pen. Shaking himself free from his thoughts, he moved his eyes to follow the man's finger and nodded, "Yeah . . . that's Hershel's farm. The horse is his."

Hansel smiled, stroking a fond hand over the animal's neck, patting her gently. "Ve shall see hyu home, Kavallerie," he vowed in a low undertone, before moving away from her once again.

The officer cleared his throat and drew Daryl's attention around again, moving his finger along the image to the outlined image. "Do you know anything about this compound? Have you ever seen it before? It's about ten miles from the farm?"

Looking carefully over the map, the southerner was forced to shake his head in negation. "I don't remember seeing it before . . . and based on the image you've got, the area doesn't look familiar either."

Frowning, he leaned forward onto one hand as the other lifted to his cigarette, pulling it away from his lips as he released the smoke he'd taken in. "I don't know, samaya malen'kaya . . . we can both see it on the map, but according to Captain Abrams, he didn't see it when he flew over the area. All he saw was a small building that looked like it was falling apart; that doesn't fit the theory, that someone's using an abandoned building as a secret laboratory."

"Maybe what we're looking for is underground? Is is possible that the surface buildings are just that . . . a facade for what is underneath?" came a call from the trees, the tone questioning and its owner completely invisible to Daryl's eyes.

Chuckling, Marina called fondly, "Clinton Francis . . . you're freaking out the newbie!"

"Isn't that kind of my job, Sova?" he called back with a cackle. There was a rustle, before that same voice shouted, "We got incoming . . . shit! That's a lot of fucking zombies!"

Daryl could feel himself pale at the call, announcing, "Shit . . . it's a herd."

"A herd?" came the brusque question from Dr. Shearing's shadow, his hands around her waist as he hoisted her upwards into a pair of arms in the trees.

"It's what we call a large group of walkers . . . a herd. When they travel in large groups like that, it's bad. It means they're hungry and they smell something appetizing."
At the information, Will stomped out his cigarette and started issuing orders. “Everyone into the trees! Get as high as you can! Marina . . . you and Natasha stay with Marta. Sam . . . you and Nika are on Vincent duty.”

“Yes sir!” was the blond's response, even as he swung his rifle from his back and into his hands.

The brown haired brother crouched to the base of the same tree Aaron had lifted the doctor into, ordering sharply, “Move it, ladies!”

One at time, the two women put a foot into his hands and were practically rocketed into the tree. Clint's voice rang out in subdued panic, “Guys . . . you’ve got about 30 seconds! They're right on top of us!”

That galvanized the rest of the group into the trees, with Sam boosting both Vincent and Nika into their own tree. For a moment, it seemed like he would have enough time to get out of the way, before a walker burst into the clearing and got his arms around him. Sam's scream was agonized as the zombie sunk his teeth into the fleshy part at the back of his arm. Both Marta and Marina screamed in terror, held in place only by Will's shout, “Stay put, both of you! Clint . . . Bucky . . . Aaron . . . Owen . . . I want every single one of those bastards dead! Vincent . . . beast out and get down there!”

Vincent's answering call was concerned but resolute as he replied, “Yes sir!”

There was only a second for the rest of the group to wonder what he was talking about, before there was an animalistic roar and a transformed Vincent dropped from the trees. This was not the sweet, charming young doctor that they had been getting to know on this deployment; this was a beast . . . and he was intent on the zombie who was still gnawing on Sam's arm. Fortunately, the young blond was starting to go limp as the pain edged him further into unconsciousness.

Marina reached out and found Marta's hand, the two women practically clinging to each other as they watched Vincent tear the walker from Sam . . . leaving a gaping wound in the back of his arm as the motion ripped the teeth from the skin. It was that renewed pain that dropped Sam completely into unconsciousness, those eerie eyes rolling backwards as he dropped gracelessly to the forest floor. Glancing at each other, Marina shifted and shouted through the treetops, “Bucky!! Can you reach Sam!?”

“Yeah!” came the call, before a body dropped nimbly from the trees and crouched beside the fallen soldier. Straightening with the young man in his arms, he dodged quickly to his right as Clint's voice rang out, “Bucky! On your left!”

Almost a split second later, the walker who had been approaching went down with an arrow in his eye socket. Cradling the boy in his arms, the older man dropped fluidly into a crouch and then practically sprung straight up, disappearing into the branches once again. From there, the fight was practically anti-climactic. Vincent moved like a machine through the throng, ripping heads from bodies and limbs from torsos with his bare hands, allowing the rest of the group to dispatch the outliers easily.

Soon, there was only one zombie left and he was shuffling as quickly as he could away from the fallen bodies that had made up the herd. Daryl stared as a young man with Will and Hansel's face dropped lightly from the tree, lifted his bow and sighted, snarking, “Outrun this, asshole.”

Releasing the arrow, they all watched as the shaft sunk easily into the back of the zombie's head and he dropped like a stone, permanently dead. Daryl scrambled from the tree, fumbling for his crossbow, as Bucky dropped from the same tree as Clint, an unconscious Sam still cradled safely in his arms. Aiming, it was only the sudden appearance of the pretty scientist shoving upwards on the haft that sent his last quarrel into the treetops and not into the young man's brain, with a scream of
“No!”

“What the hell are you doing!?” he demanded furiously, “He's going to turn! Trust me; putting a bullet in his brain is going to be doing him a favor!”

Marta's tone was vicious and even Daryl back-stepped as she snapped, “You touch him and I'll kill you myself. He's going to be fine . . . he has to be fine!”

Staring at the woman who had essentially saved his life, he fumbled for something to say, before at last grumbling, “For your sake, I hope you're right . . . but frankly, I'm not holding my breath.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

Beruhigt, mein Pferd . . . beruhigt - easy, horse . . . easy solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Aaron/Kenny) mein Sohn - my son (Hansel has already decided he is adopting Daryl Dixon) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (one of Will's more common nicknames for Marina)
Sova - Owl (Marina's call sign with the Army and SHIELD)
Chapter 165: Project RAGE

Marina was kneeling next to Sam, worried chocolate eyes fixed on the work Marta and Vincent were doing on his other arm and his free hand in hers, when he jolted back into consciousness. Jerking upward, a strangled scream ripped from his throat at the renewed pain in his arm. Startled by the sudden movement, Marta floundered, grabbing for the wounded appendage, ordering briskly, “Aaron! Hold him still! If I can’t get this bandage tied on right, he’s going to bleed to death before we have to worry about killing him!”

Both Brian and Aaron rushed to pin the boy to the ground, but it was Clint who spoke next. “Marina . . . remember that lullaby you used to sing to us when we were kids?”

She looked up, fear in her eyes, as she nodded, “Of course . . . it was your favorite.”

Clint grinned sadly at the reminder, before continuing, “Sing it to him.”

“What good is that going to do?” Brian gritted out, struggling to still Sam’s frenzied, frightened thrashing. It was clear that the boy was suffering from some kind of delusions, leaving him fighting to get free.

“It used to calm us, right? Maybe it’ll work on Sam too.” Shrugging at the incredulous look on his best friend’s face, he shrugged sheepishly, “It can’t hurt, right?”

Nodding in agreement, Marina swallowed hastily to clear her throat before tightening her hold on the young man’s hand and beginning to sing.

“Spi mladyenets, moy prekrasny, (Sleep, good boy, my beautiful) “Sim uznayesh, budit vremya, (The time will come, then you will learn) branoye zhityo, (The pugnacious life,) smyelo vdyenish nogu f stremya (Boldly you’ll stem your foot in the stirrup)
I vazymosh ruzhyo. (And take the gun.)
Ya sedeltse boyevoye (The saddle-cloth for your battle horse) sholkom razoshyu (I will sew you from silk.)
Spi, ditya mayo radnoye (Sleep now, my dear little child.)
Bayushki bayu.”

The words mean absolutely nothing to Sam, who was still learning the basics of the Russian language, but the love and adoration in her tone was easily understood. Settling slightly, he turned his head towards the sound of her voice and allowed himself to relax a little bit. Marina smiled around the song, resting the palm of her hand on his temple, petting the hair there carefully. Seeing that her nephew was beginning to calm, Marta hissed under her breath, “Keep singing to him . . . it's working.”

Nodding without stopping, Marina shifted so that the sniper's head was in her lap, her fingers combing gently through the blond strands as she continued to sing and his other hand now clutching hers desperately. She must have gone through a dozen lullabies, as Marta and Vincent worked feverishly to stem the bleeding and pack the gaping hole in his arm. She was halfway through “The Sky Boat Song” when Marta finally sat back with a sigh of relief. “That's the best I can do without a hospital.”

The Russian said nothing for a moment, only continuing to sing to encourage Sam to drop the rest of the way into unconsciousness.

“Billow and breeze, islands and seas,
Mountains of rain and sun,
All that was good, all that was fair
All that was me is gone.

Sing me a song of the lad that is gone,
Say, could that lad be I?
Merry of soul he sailed on a day
Over the sea to Skye.”

Sam's head tossed when the song ended, a small whimper leaving his lips as Brian and Aaron lifted him carefully, to shift him into one of the tents that had been set up against the cliff. Zipping him into a sleeping bag, Aaron smoothed a hand over his hair as he soothed in his low, gruff voice, “Sna teper', deika. (Sleep now, kiddo.)”

Meanwhile, Marta was scrubbing her nephew's blood from her hands, tears blurring her eyes. Vincent's hand rested on her shoulder gently, promising, “We'll figure this out . . . he's going to be okay.”

Giving him a small, tremulous smile, she forced out a laugh. “I don't know anything about the project that made you, Dr. Keller . . . but thank you. You saved Sam's life.”

“It really wasn't that big of a deal,” he insisted, his ears going rosy as he lifted his hand to rub at the back of his neck sheepishly. It was about then that she noticed the bloody mark on the backside of Vincent's rib cage. Lunging forward, she demanded, “Did you get bit!??”

Vincent frowned, craning his neck to look down at the spot. “Holy shit . . . when did that happen?”

The scientist's eyes went speculative as she began to prod at the area, inquiring, “You didn't notice?”

“No . . . I didn't even feel it.”

It was about then that Aaron recognized the look in his girlfriend's eyes. “What's are you stewing on in that brain of yours, Doc?”

Narrowing her eyes, she looked back and forth between the two bite victims. “I don't know, Vincent, do you mind if we get some of your blood and a reading of your vitals? I'm gonna need Sam's too, but let's start with you for the moment.”

Shrugging, he agreed amiably, already starting to push his sleeve up past the joint of his elbow. Turning back to her boyfriend, the virologist asked, “Aaron, do you remember how to take a blood sample?”

Nodding, he took the offered supplies and promised, “I'll get Vincent's sample . . . you go get Sam's.”

Offering him a grin, she breathed a sigh of relief. “Thank you. Vincent, you're in good hands. Aaron's really good at this.”

Turning to Will, she inquired, “Is this a good place to camp? Can we stay here for awhile?”

Looking at his partner, the two spoke in rapid-fire Russian, before the Colonel turned his attention back to Marta again. “We can stay for a little bit . . . it's got good sight-lines and decent cover. But I don't think I would feel comfortable staying here for any longer than another night. I don't want to advance on the compound until we know the final call on Sam, but I do think we'd be better off heading towards that farm first thing in the morning. You have till then to work out the specifics of whatever you're tossing around in your head.”

“Understood. Thank you, Will.”

“You're welcome, Marta.” Glancing at his watch, he calculated quickly, before insisting, “You have 12 hours. Make them count.”

Nodding, she turned to Marina, “I'm going to need your help with Sam. He's not going to understand what's happening, so if you could sing to him again while I do what I need to do, I would appreciate the help.”

“Absolutely,” she agreed solemnly, squeezing the woman's arm fondly. “Let's go . . . the sooner we get those samples, the sooner we'll be able to get the answers to whatever hypothesis you're trying to prove.”

Grinning, the virologist found herself chuckling, “How did you know?”

“You have the same look Jason used to get when he was trying to figure out how the toaster worked when he was a kid.”
Chuckling at the mental image that statement invoked, Marta took the other woman's offered hand and moved toward the tent where Sam was lying. Both women were alarmed to see him shivering drastically, his head tossing and sweat clearly glistening at his temples. Jolting forward, Marta nearly threw open her medical kit and got to work. Picking a song at random, Marina's hands were firm but gentle as she held his head still while Marta took his temperature and checked the rest of his vials. The two worked in tandem to make sure that he didn't inadvertently hurt himself as Marta took several blood samples from him. Waving the scientist away as she moved to bandage the site, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler insisted, “Go on . . . you don't have a lot of time . . . I am more than capable of bandaging this up for him.”

“Thank you, Marina,” the virologist breathed, clutching the vials to her chest as though they were precious.

The boys had set up a portable research lab for her next to Sam's tent, so that she would be close in the event that he needed her, Aaron perched on a stack of gear boxes by the door with his rifle across his knees. Looking up at his girlfriend as she paused at the door, he smiled fondly, “Vincent's samples are on the table. I didn't unpack the scope; I figured you would want to do that yourself.”

Taking a deep breath, she eyed the open door for a moment, before turning to look at her boyfriend. “You'll be close.”

Nodding in agreement, he vowed, “I'm gonna be right here the whole time you're in there.”

Leaning down, Marta took comfort in the now-familiar press of his lips to hers. Blue eyes were warm as they looked up into fearful brown, prompting him to reach up and stroke over her cheek. Pulling her down for another kiss, he murmured against her lips, “I love you, Doc . . .”

Breaking into a startled, pleased smile, Marta stared for a moment, before confessing, “I love you too, Aaron. Thank you . . . for everything.”

“That's what I'm here for. Go on . . . I'll be here if you need me and Marina'll take good care of Sam for you.”

Nodding, she took a deep breath and disappeared into the tent for the foreseeable future. For about eight hours after that, there was a lot of muted swearing and moving around in the tent, but no calls for help or requests for anything else. Finally, she called out, “Vincent!! Could you come in here please? And Marina, could you get another vial of blood and check Sam's vitals for me again? Have someone bring them to me?”

Marina's tone was affirmative, even if the words were indistinguishable from the song she was still singing to her unconscious charge. Vincent appeared in the tent, already pushing up his sleeves and moving toward a makeshift chair of gear boxes. Marta gave him a small smile and reached for her kits once again. She was halfway through extracting another vial of blood when Clint came in, offering her the vial Marina had taken and the list of vitals she'd recorded for the younger woman.

Transferring Sam's new vitals to the page she had already all filled out with the rest of the information, she frowned as she considered the differences. Offering Vincent a cottonball to staunch the puncture wound, she gestured for him to look at the chart she'd recorded. “These are Sam's vitals as of eight hours ago and again now. These are yours then and now. Notice anything?”

Vincent's eyes were serious as he looked up at Marta, tone shocked as he announced, “Mine haven't changed.”

Shaking her head, she agreed, “No . . . they haven't. And meanwhile, Sam's temperature has jumped at least six degrees in the last eight hours and his heartbeat is inconsistent and thready.” Turning her attention onto Clint, she asked, “Would you get Marina and the Colonel for me? I have a theory, and I think they should hear it.”

“I'm on it,” he agreed with a grin, jogging from the room.

Folding his arms over his chest, the doctor watched his companion hook up her microscope to a portable projector. “What are you thinking?”

Taking a deep breath, she looked up at him a small smile. “I think I know what strain of DNA they grafted to yours, during the project. And I think . . . Vincent . . . I think your blood is the key to what's going on here.”

Will's voice was calm, if curious, as both he and Marina entered the tent behind them. “What do you mean, Marta?”

Watching the two for a moment, she took a deep breath and released it slowly. “In London, about ten years ago, there was an outbreak of a virus. It turned an percentage of the population into zombies. They called it the RAGE virus . . . it caused aggression, superior strength, discoloring of the skin and disfigurement of the features.” Glancing at Vincent, she continued, “Sound familiar to anyone?”

It was about then that the former soldier understood. “You think I have RAGE virus!?”

“I'm looking at your samples, Vincent, both yours and Sam's. And where Sam's blood is actively fighting the infection, yours is working with it. Combined with the symptoms of one of your . . . beast moments, it fits.”

The Russian took a deep breath, folding her arms over her chest as she inquired, “And that means what for Sam?”

“It means that I can synthesize an antidote . . . using Vincent's own antibodies. And, with any luck, it means that Sam is going to be just fine.”

Glancing at Marina, the two officers held some silent conversation with each other before Will turned back and nodded in agreement. “Do it. Quickly.”

Smiling widely, she snapped off a quick salute, “Yes sir.” Turning to Vincent, she ordered, “All right, Dr. Keller, let's get to work.”
Chapter Notes

Wow . . . that's a record. Two in one day hasn't happened in awhile. :D

Translations are at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 166: Big Damn Heroes

The next hours before dawn were spent trying to fabricate some kind of viable antidote. The swearing got louder and more violent, from Marta and Vincent both, though the interior of the tent was otherwise silent.

While the two medics were working on their own problem, Will and Marina were consulting with Jason, their resident engineering geek, on the best way to distribute the antidote to any of the infected. Both clearly recalled the remainder of the conversation they had had with both doctors, after Marta had explained her theory.

Flashback

“So the zombies we killed . . . they weren't dead?” Marina asked, frowning fiercely at the thought.

Vincent glanced at Marta and spoke up in answer, “While she was in here, I was doing a rudimentary autopsy on several of the bodies.” At Will's cocked eyebrow, he shrugged nonchalantly, “It wasn't my specialty, but we all take the class at some point. Anyway, some of the bodies were stone cold, suggesting that they had been dead for quite some time. Others were still marginally warm, which would make sense if their bodies were rocking a fever at least as high as Sam's, if not higher, until they do die.” Taking a breath, he considered his next words carefully. “When Marta was treating Mr. Dixon, before Sam got bitten, I checked one of the bodies then too; his temperature nearly scalded my fingers. I would bet my license that he was newly infected and still alive – as it were – at the time of his death.”

Both women grimaced at the information, before Marta insisted, “Don't tell Sam. He has enough guilt to carry around; he doesn't need that too.”

“So how do we tell the difference from the dead zombies and the living zombies?” Will asked, reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose. “What the hell is my life, that this is a valid question?”

Marina chuckled, squeezing his shoulder fondly, as Marta shook her head with a shrug. “There's really no one way to be sure, without getting really close and personal. And, as I'm sure you can guess, that's not a good idea. The application of an antidote, however, would drop any of the truly dead and they simply wouldn't get back up again.”

“There are a lot of infected, malyutka. Can you make enough of the antidote here for all of them?”

“No . . . I need a real lab for that. I can make enough to save Sam and possibly a vaccine to inoculate the rest of us, Mr. Dixon, and the survivors at the farm. But I need to get into a laboratory to be able to mass produce an antidote like this.”

“Even then, though, there's the question of how to administer that much antidote to that many infected, most of whom won't let you get close enough without trying to take a bite out of you,” Vincent reminded the trio with a frown.

Will smirked, “I know an engineer for that problem. Leave that to Marina and I. You two get to work on that antidote . . . How long do you think before the virus becomes fatal and the infected are un-saveable?”

Biting her lips, Marta considered the deterioration rate in the blood samples she'd taken from Sam. “Ninety-six hours . . . maybe. I don't know exactly. It could be different for everyone, depending on health and age and even body mass. I just don't know.”

“Then we're going to be working on a tight clock. That settles it; we move out to the farm at 0900 tomorrow. The antidote needs to be done, and Sam vaccinated, by then. Agreed?”

“Yes sir,” she agreed with a determined nod. “I understand.”

“Good,” he replied, before he moved towards the door to duck out of the tent.

“Wait . . . what about Vincent? You're not going to make enough of the antidote for him too?” Marina asked, pausing the Colonel in his tracks.

“I . . . to be honest, I don't know how an antidote would affect him. Because it's grafted onto his DNA . . . frankly, I'm afraid it may kill him. Again, I need a lab to be able to run the tests to find out. For the moment, he seems to be immune and I don't really want to do anything that could compromise that. So I'm going to make enough for each of us, just in case, but even that may be more than I can manage. I just don't know.” Clenching her hands, she implored desperately, “If we're really going to help these people, I NEED a lab.”

“We'll get you one as soon as we can, Marta, I promise.”

Reaching out to hug the younger woman, Marina murmured, “Good luck . . . you have our full support, no matter what.”

“Thank you, Marina.”

Smiling, the brunette followed her partner from the tent, leaving the two doctors to once again get to work.
Jason was currently fiddling with the guts and pieces of one of his handguns, muttering to himself under his breath as he considered the job ahead of him. Finally, wiping the gun oil from his fingers on a ratty rag that he tucked back into one of his innumerable pockets, he nodded once. “I can probably modify a few of our pistols into air-soft dart guns.”

“And where do you intend to get the darts, sladkiy?” Marina teased, earning a delicate moue of dismay.

“Marishka! I am devastated by your lack of faith in me. I'll make the darts . . . it's not that hard to put together a functioning dart. I used to do it all the time . . .” here Jason trailed off, realizing that he was starting to divulge long held secrets.

One of her eyebrows cocked upwards, her arms coming up to fold over her chest, as she prompted, “All the time when, Jay? When we were still at the circus? And you would swear up and down that you had nothing to do with the small projectiles that would cause the elephants to freak out on that one asshole trainer?”

Jason's mouth twisted in chagrin, glaring at his brother as Will chuckled fondly at his lover's adorable scowl. “Busted, Jay.” Clapping him on the shoulder familiarly, he urged him, “We have four hours until daylight. Get to work; if we can't get one of the dart guns into everybody's hands, at least get three done for Clint, Bucky and Aaron. Okay?”

Nodding, the technical specialist leaned over to grab one of Clint's arrows. “I can make Clint some hollow-point heads. That'll be easier than modifying the guns.”

“Sounds good, but I do still want both Bucky and Aaron armed with the darts, in addition to whatever you do with Clint's arrowheads. And if you can get enough of them done for each of us to have one, that will be even better.”

Grinning at his brother, Jason dug into one of his pockets and pulled out his favorite pair of welding goggles. “I'm on it. Be gone with you . . . I have work to do.”

Rolling her eyes, Marina stepped back and watched as Jason dove into the project as gleefully as he had a million times before. Following Will away, she murmured, “We have to get him back into S.H.I.E.L.D, at least R&D if he doesn't want to go back to being a field agent . . . the NYPD isn't going to hold his attention forever. Frankly, I'm surprised he's not already miserably bored.”

His chin dipped once in silent agreement, quicksilver eyes glancing down at his watch as he noted the time. “We're running out of time, samaya malen'kaya. Ninety-six hours . . . we've been on the ground for at least 24 at this point.”

Taking a deep breath, she gave him a rueful smile. “We'll save as many as we can, Misha . . . that's all we can do.”

Turning towards where the sky was starting to lighten into predawn, he hummed in agreement. “Let's hope that's enough then.”

It was about then that Marta finally let out an excited cry and dashed from the lab-tent, a hypodermic needle in one hand as she dashed for Sam's own tent. Aaron and Marina both bolted after her; Sam had been getting more and more restless through the night, and both of them were concerned that he'd attack her without knowing what he was doing. “Hold up a second, Doc . . . let me go in first and get the kid pinned down. The last thing we want is for him to bite you.”
“Sam's not going to bite me,” she protested in horror.

Marina's hand dropped onto her shoulders, holding her in place as she reminded the doctor gently, “Sam may not . . . but that's not really Sam in there right now, Marta. Just let Aaron got first . . . we're going to help him, I promise. But there's no reason to rush into the situation with blinders on. Okay?”

Nodding with a reluctant frown, both women waited with baited breath as Aaron eased the zipper to the tent open slowly. Fortunately, Sam had subsided into another bout of tremors and he only whimpered as Aaron moved further into the tent. Rolling the kid onto his side, his back facing the former Outcome operative, Aaron pinned him firmly with both hands. “Hurry up . . . he's docile for the moment, but there's no guarantee how long that will last.”

Both women moved in to the confines of the space, Marina already humming a song under her breath as she followed Marta into the tent. Between the three of them, they managed to get Sam's tactical pants down far enough to expose the muscle at the top of one cheek. Using her teeth to uncap the syringe, and her other hand to brace herself, she looked up at the two. “A prayer or two probably wouldn't go amiss right about now.”

Switching gears immediately, Marina began to sing an old Russian prayer under her breath, watching as the virologist stabbed the needle down into the muscle and depressed the plunger. Sam bucked slightly at the sudden pinprick of pain, but subsided once again when Aaron's hands only tightened to prevent any real thrashing. Withdrawing the needle, she eased his pants up into place and sat back on her heels. “We should know in about a half an hour if it worked.”

“So soon?”

“It's not going to be a quick fix . . . but for right now, all we need is for the fever to break. If it does, we'll know it worked. How long it'll take for it to completely set in and for him to be back to his old self, I don't know. But at least we won't have to worry about having to put a bullet through his brain because he tried to eat somebody.”

Nodding, Marina leaned over Sam's body to squeeze the woman's shoulder. “You're exhausted, Marta. I'll stay with Sam . . . you go with Aaron and get some sleep. We have a couple hours before we move out . . . take advantage of them while you can.”

“No . . . I should stay. What if he needs me?”

“I'm sure that Vincent will be able to help me with any of the medical things that may come up while you get some rest. Except for you and Aaron, the rest of us have gotten some sleep tonight. That's the beauty of taking shifts; at least someone has the opportunity to rest while someone else keeps watch.” Turning her attention onto Aaron, she hardened her tone, “Go on, Aaron . . . that's an order, understood?”

“Yes ma'am,” he agreed, pushing himself to his feet and reaching down to draw Marta to her own. “Come on, Doc . . . there's no arguing with Marina when she gets like this. Best just to do what she says. We could use the rest . . . the day's going to be here before you know it.”

Still protesting, Marta allowed herself to be herded from the tent by her boyfriend. Taking a seat on the opposite side of the tent from her charge, Marina's eyes were glued to his face as she folded her hands and waited for whatever the outcome was going to be. “Come on, Sam . . . you can do this . . . fight it.”

It was about an hour later that Marina watched him stop tossing and turning, and finally sink into the first real sleep he'd had since he was bitten. Moving forward cautiously, she laid the back of her hand just under the curve of his jaw. Unable to hold in her relieved sob at the touch, she took a moment just to revel in the cool, clammy feeling of his skin there. “Slava Bogu,” she breathed, tucking him in just that little bit tighter, before leaving the tent in search of her partner.

Will was taking his watch just a little ways away, eyes dark and inscrutable behind his sunglasses. Turning to look at her at the rustling sound of the tent door, he asked, “So? What's the verdict?”

“The fever's broken. He's going to be okay.”

“Good . . . Looks like we got here just in the nick of time then.” Glancing back over his shoulder at her, he asked, “What does that make us', zhemchuzhina.”

Grinning, she drawled out the familiar quote joyfully, “‘Big damn heroes, sir.’”

Returning her grin, he agreed warmly, “‘Ain't . . . we . . . just.’”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) malyutka - little one (used for a young girl)
(R) sladkiy - honey (Marina's nickname for Jason)
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (one of Will's more commonly used nicknames for Marina)
(R) Misha - a diminutive of Mikhail (Marina's the only one who ever calls him this; Will's middle name is Michael and Mikhail is the Russian counterpart)
(R) zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for Marina)

Also? I have been waiting to be able to use that beyond iconic quote this whole epic adventure . . . and I finally got to. I am sooooo excited!
Hey yall! New chapter! I like having a new show to prompt myself into shape. (I have a rule, I have to have at least three chapters written during the week before I'll allow myself to watch the new episode. So far . . . it's working. :D)

A couple translations in the chapter, but most are at the end as always. Enjoy!

Chapter 167: Walkers Walking

Currently, James Buchanan Barnes was on unofficial Daryl duty. Not that he minded; the man was funny as hell with a sarcastic wit to rival Will and Marina's own . . . combined. But there was something to be said for the intent way he kept staring at the people going in and out of Sam's tent. Cocky his head, Bucky considered what he knew about the younger man, before asking casually, “Why do you keep staring over there?”

Daryl frowned, glancing at the Winter Soldier before returning his attention back onto the tent where Sam was resting. “I know you all want to protect him, but I just don't see it. In the last two weeks since this zombie apocalypse happened, I've killed things that used to be people. And, as much as it sucks, that kid that they are so determined to protect is going to turn. It's not pretty and it's not fun and I am sorry for it, but the sooner they kill him, the sooner they can start grieving for him.”

Shaking his head, Bucky smirked, “I'm just going to let you know . . . Marina is very protective of the people she considers hers. And Sam is definitely hers; if there's even a chance that she can possibly save him, she's going to try. And Sam is Marta's nephew, so she's pretty protective of him too.” Looking back to where Clint was talking to Will and Marina, he smiled sadly, “Frankly, I understand it . . . the irrationality in trying to protect someone you're worried is going to die on you. Someone that you care about, more than life, whose own life seems so fragile.”

Daryl's eyes were wary as he watched the other man, noting the real pain in his eyes as he fiddled with the glove on his left hand. “Who? Your boyfriend? Because he doesn't seem very fragile to me.”
“Clint? No . . . Clint would kill me for trying to coddle and protect him. No, my best friend . . . he was always sickly. There were times I was worried I'd fall asleep, listening to the sound of his voice in his bed and wake up the next morning to total silence.”

The younger man's chin dipped downwards in a careful nod. “I'm sorry . . . what happened to him?”

Bucky's face twisted slightly, his voice little more than a whisper as he replied, “He's gone . . . he died a long time ago.”

Clapping the agent on the shoulder, Daryl nodded again but said nothing. Some pain required no words to be understood. It was about then, that Hansel legged over the tree trunk on the opposite side of the small fire and leaned forward on his elbows, robin' egg eyes watching the southerner intently. Recognizing the mannerism, Bucky's mouth twisted lightly as he teased dryly, “You should probably ask him if he wants to be adopted, before you start picking out the paint for his room, Hansel.”

“That will be quite enough out of you, Graüchen,” the former witch hunter scolded, even as he reached over to ruffle his longish hair. Returning his attention onto Daryl, he asked, “Who ist Merle? And why do you speak of him with such fond contempt?”

Daryl's eyes went wide at the question, his tone husky as he asked, “What do you know about Merle?”

“Only what you were saying when you were unconscious. You kept imagining him; I do not know what you thought he was saying to you, but whatever it was . . . it upset you greatly. So . . . I ask you again . . . who ist Merle?”

Scrubbing at the back of his head with his fingernails, Daryl grimaced lightly, “Merle's my older brother. He's a total asshole . . . but he did the best he could to protect me when our dad was drunk.”

“What about your Mutter? Where ist she?”

Shrugging haplessly, the man confessed, “She's been dead for as long as I can remember. It was just Merle and me against the old man.”

Glancing at Bucky at the term, he watched as Bucky smirked, “He means his father.”

Hansel hummed in understanding, before turning back to face the southerner once again. “Why ist he not mit you now?”

Confused, Daryl cocked his head as he asked, “I'm sorry . . . I don't understand.”

Clint plopped down then in the empty seat next to Bucky, chirped, “Pops is German . . . when he's upset, he slips back into his old habits. He asked why someone wasn't with you now? Who is someone?” Glancing at his father, he quirked an eyebrow as he asked, “So which house do you think you're going to move him into, exactly? Cause I'm pretty sure Maria may protest if you think that you're just gonna move your new kid into her guest room.”

“Mein Falki, has anyvun ever told you that you talk too much?”

“Yeah . . . Brian . . . all the time. Mostly, I do it to annoy him,” the youngest Grimm replied with a wink and wicked grin. Munching on a handful of MRE M&Ms, he offered the leftovers to Bucky as he announced, “So Marta found a cure.”

Daryl's eyes went wide in shock, before he blurted, “A what!”
“Apparently, not all of the zombies are dead . . . it's a virus and if they don't get the antidote, they will die. However, that means that some of them can be saved. And of course, the only Infected Marina cares about would be Sam, so yeah . . . yay cure!”

Bucky was watched the devastated look on Daryl's face spread across his features. “Why don't you look happy about that?”

“How many people have I killed . . . that this antidote could have saved?”

Clint frowned at the suggestion, leaning forward to get a better line of sight at the tracker. “It's only got a 96 hour window of effectiveness. After 96 hours, they're dead . . . not even the antidote would bring them back. We only got here early yesterday morning . . . most of the infected you've killed wouldn't be saveable at this point . . . and they probably would have killed more people along the way.”

Rolling his eyes at his boyfriend's usual exuberance, Bucky cut in quickly, “What Clint is trying to say, is don't feel bad. You did the right thing.”

“If she hadn't stopped me . . .” he breathed in horror, well remembering the moment he tried to put a quarrel through Sam's brain the evening before.

Hansel reached out and gripped his forearm, admonishing firmly, “Ja . . . but she did . . . so there ist no hyuse in crying over witches that huf not been fought yet. Ja?”

Clint's head cocked as he tried to translate that, before replying, “It's typically 'crying over spilled milk' now, Pops.”

“Eh . . . hyu say 'toe-may-toe . . . I say 'toe-mah-toe'. Ja?”

“So wait. You can use that phrase in context, but not the one I suggested? You're fucking with me, Pops.”

“I vould not 'fuck mit hyu', Falki . . . hyu are mein Sohn.”

Bucky snorted, his hand coming up to clap over his boyfriend's mouth. “All right . . . that is enough trolling out of the both of you. Hush, khischenick.”

The archer grumbled slightly, even as he subsided comfortably in the older man's side. Daryl frowned, still considering the implications of a cure. “That means, even if she was infected, you could still save her.”

“Save who?” Clint asked, munching contentedly on another handful of M&Ms.

“A little over 64 hours ago, we got separated from one of the other survivors. She's 12 and she's out here all alone. We've been looking for her since she got lost . . . her name is Sophia.” Reaching back, he removed the dirty doll from where it still hung in his belt, offering to Hansel with a sigh. “This is her's . . . I found it in the river near where you found me.”

A woman's voice, thick and warm with a nearly purring Russian accent, spoke from behind them and made Daryl jump a mile high. “The only problem I'm seeing with that is that she got lost 64 hours ago, and we have a 96 hour window before she is truly dead. You don't know where she is . . .
she could be miles from here. And there is no guarantee that we'd even find her.”

Jerking his thumb over his shoulder, Bucky introduced the two women and the man standing there without looking. “Daryl . . . meet Nika, Natasha and Brian. Nika would be the one with reservations.”

Brian's grin was sly as he wrapped an arm around the redhead and nibbled on her jaw, as Natasha chimed in, “Just because we don't know where she is, doesn't mean that we shouldn't try to find her. She's a little girl, Nika.”

“I'm not saying we don't try, Tasha . . . I'm just saying that we need to be realistic. The Colonel has us all moving out tomorrow at 0900 to the farm where the rest of the survivors are. It's just past 0630 . . . that's another 2 & a half hours that we lose, plus an hour for the trek. Yeah . . . we keep our eyes open, but let's be real. We also have Sam, who is going to slow us down.”

“Sam shall ride da horse mit me. She is a good horse, strong and true . . . she can carry us both. He shall not slow us down.”

It was about then that the two commanding officers in the family joined the rest around the fire. Brian grinned at his sister and teased, “Please tell me that you got to use the BDH quote . . . in context?”

Marina's smile was wicked and smug, though she said nothing as Will cleared his throat pointedly. “As I'm sure you've heard by now, Marta was able to synthesize an antidote. That means as of this moment, kill shots are the last possible option when engaged by, what Daryl calls, a 'walker'. We're cautiously optimistic about its success, and it will not work on all of them, but we have to try.”

Natasha's eyes were worried, though her face was emotionless, as she asked, “How's Sam?”

“He's gonna be okay. His fever just broke and he's actually sleeping.” Running a hand back through her hair, she continued, “The theory is that as long as the walkers are running a significant temperature, they are still alive. Which makes sense, because this is a virus and the body's natural instinct when faced with a viral infection is to try and burn it off. If they're cold, they're dead. Only thing to do for them is to put them out of their misery and let them find what peace they can on the other side.”

Leaning forward on his elbows, Bucky asked, “How do you suggest we administer this antidote?”

“Jason is working on converting a few of our pistols into dart guns. That will provide us enough distance to avoid getting bit, as well as adequately administer the antidote to the various walkers.”

“How much of the cure do we have?”

“We have enough for three more doses . . . the portable lab equipment Marta has here is not sufficient to be able to mass produce it in viable quantities. So at best, avoid walkers at all costs.”

It was about that time that Natasha spoke up, “There's a little girl in the woods, Will . . . apparently she got separated from the rest of the survivors just under three days ago. Even if she's infected, she's saveable.”

Everyone could see the way Marina's heart swelled with concern, even as she shook her head, “We're working on a 96 hour timetable with the assumption that there are no other contributing factors.” Glancing at Will and taking in his silent nod, she turned back to the rest, “If we find her, we'll do what we can for her in the event that she was infected. But I don't want to say that its a sure thing when not even Marta knows all the details of the virus itself.”

“As it is, she was able to synthesize enough to vaccinate us against the virus in the event that any of us get bitten in the near future.” Glancing at Daryl, the Colonel continued, “She also made enough to be able to vaccinate the survivors at the farm Mr. Dixon was telling us about earlier.”
Daryl spoke up in protest, “It's just Daryl . . . Mr. Dixon was my grandfather.” Looking around the circle, he took a deep breath and looked up at Marina with a chagrined grimace. “In light of this, I'm sorry for nearly trying to kill your boy.”

Squeezing his shoulder gently, Marina nodded once in acceptance of the apology. “It's all right. Sam's going to be just fine and that's all that matters.”

Both Hansel and Will were looking down at their watches and it struck the southerner then just how striking the similarity between the younger men in the circle and their father. Hansel looked up at his eldest then and insisted, “So . . . who is going on to the compound and who is going to the farm?”

Will grinned at the question, folding his arms over his chest. “I'm actually willing to take volunteers. Sam will be going to be farm with Marina; he's too weak to make the trek without the horse and the horse belongs to whomever owns the farm. Marta and Aaron will be going to the compound, as we are still working under the assumption that this is some kind of HYDRA laboratory and, assuming it has the materials, it will probably have what she needs to replicate enough of the antidote to administer it to every walker, living or dead. Vincent will be going to the farm, in order to administer the vaccine to the survivors there. I have been assured that he will be wearing a clean shirt, and as he is still not experiencing any pain, they will not realize that he was bitten.”

“As for who else is going where, we're accepting volunteers. I'm going with Sam and Vincent because Marta cannot. Misha will be going to the compound with Marta and Aaron. Where the rest of you would like to go, is up to you. We do want to keep the teams even, so don't all decide to go to the compound,” she teased, her nose wrinkling lightly.

Bucky and Clint glanced at each other, Clint's eyebrow cocked upwards in silent question. Nodding, they turned back and Clint announced, “Bucky and I will be going to the farm with you, Marishka. You'll need sharpshooters to keep an eye out until Marta is able to meet us there with the antidote.”

Brian grinned as Natasha agreed, “Brian and I will go to the compound with Marta, Aaron and the Colonel. Brian's itching to kill something, and if it is HYDRA run . . . well, there will be killing and Brian would dearly like to be in on it.”

Nika nodded and stepped forward to join the two assassins, “I'm going to the compound . . . it's been a long time since I got kill something and my trigger fingers are itching.”

Jason joined the group around the fire, Clint's quiver over one shoulder and a trio of clearly rigged pistols in both hands. “Okay, so I'm not done, but I have the hollow arrowheads for Clint and at least three of the modified pistols. As for the darts, I'm waiting for the glue to finish drying. For the moment, they are empty due to the absence of Marta's antidote. However, they are exceptionally easy to fill, so once we have the material, we can get them locked and loaded.”

The Colonel nodded, considering his brother as the tech specialist handed the quiver to Clint and two of the pistols to Bucky and Marina, while keeping the third for Aaron. “Jay, once a couple darts are available, I need you to fill at least two with the two extra doses Marta has. Load them into Aaron and Marina's guns. And then you're going to the compound with us. That way you can load the darts with the antidote as quickly as Marta can compound it.”

“Sounds good to me,” the middle brother agreed with a nonchalant shrug and a congenial grin.

Marina frowned as she asked, “Why are you giving me a dose of the antidote?”

Turning away from where he was talked quietly with his father, Will smiled adoringly, “If you happen to see that little girl and she's saveable . . . well, at least you have a dose to use, right?”
Looping her arms around his waist as she looked up into his face with a warm grin, she teased fondly, "Ty staryy tryapka, Mishka. (You're an old softie, Mishka.)"

Lifting his hands to cup her cheeks, he agreed, "Ne govorite mal'chikov. (Don't tell the boys.)"

Bending, Will allowed himself a moment to indulge in a long kiss with his partner. Marina's body was molasses as she nearly melted into him, those hot chocolate eyes slipping closed as they took a moment to wish each other good luck and good bye. They had a plan, but both knew that most plans didn't usually work out the way they were supposed to. More to the point, they were undergoing separate objectives; if something happened to one, the other wouldn't be there as backup. It was a new sensation and both needed the moment to acclimate to it.

Finally, the two broke away and the Colonel glanced down briefly at his watch. Dropping his forehead against hers, he murmured, "It's 0700 . . . you should wake up Sam."

Sighing, she hummed an assent, before stealing one last kiss and moving away towards the young man's tent. Closing his eyes, Will took a deep breath and then turned once again to face his brothers and their unit. "All right . . . we're going to be moving up the timetable. Let's get packed up and move out no later than 0800. The sooner we get this antidote in hand, the sooner we can clear this mess up. Agreed?"

"Yes sir!" came the resounding agreement, before the eldest Grimm barked, "Dismissed!"

Instantly, the assembled group dispersed, dashing off to pack up their own gear and start getting ready to go. It was going to be an eventful day and there was no point in putting it off now that it was here.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Graüchen - Little Grey (Hansel's nickname for Bucky Barnes, because of the color of his metal arm)
(G) Mein Falki - my little hawk (Hansel's nickname for his youngest son, Clint)
(G) Ja - yes
(G) mein Sohn - my son
(R) khishchnick - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for his boyfriend, Clint)
Chapter 168: Darwinism Is Dead

To be honest, Sam didn't remember much of the last hours. The last thing he remembered was getting bitten by a humanoid looking thing that smelled like rotted steak and had razor sharp teeth. There was a vague recollection of a half-man, half-beast who had saved his life, and a beloved voice singing to him when the pain was all he knew . . . something he could safely say his own mother had never done. Shifting slightly, he hissed as he tried to put his weight on his elbows and the right one buckled under him, dropping him gracelessly back onto the thin pallet below him.

“Easy, Sammy-honey . . . trust me, it's gonna be awhile before doing that doesn't hurt like a bitch,” came the warm voice of Marina Petrovka, bringing Sam's tear-blurred vision around to look at her.

“What the hell happened to me?” Suddenly remembering what had bitten him – and the details of every zombie movie he'd ever seen – his head snapped up as he demanded in horror, “Am I going to become one of those things?”

Moving deeper into the tent, Marina bent next to him, one hand warm on his shoulder. “No . . . it's a long story, but the short of it is that Vincent is immune and Marta was able to make an antidote out of his blood.” Reaching up to lay the back of her hand on the skin under his jaw, she breathed a sigh at the coolness there, “Slava Bogu . . . the fever's still gone.”
Sam's face twisted curiously at the phrase, before he voiced the thought he considered more important, “What exactly is Vincent immune to?”

“It's complicated, but apparently this is a biological outbreak of something called RAGE virus. All of these people have been infected with the virus.”

Nodding slowly, Sam watched as Marina pushed herself to her feet and moved to rifle through his pack. “Are we moving out?”

“Yeah . . . there's a farm of survivors about an hour's trek from here. Some of us are heading that way to vaccinate them against the virus while the rest move on to the compound.”

Pouting, Sam muttered, “Guess I know where I'm going, huh?”

Marina's features were fond and maternal as she reminded him kindly, “You can't even put weight on that arm, Sam, let alone make a mile trek through the woods. No . . . you're going to the farm with me, Vincent, Hansel, Bucky, Clint and Daryl. The rest are heading on to the compound.” Pulling out a clean pair of tactical pants, fresh socks and a new t-shirt, Marina offered them to him before turning her back. While he struggled out of his filthy clothing and into the cleaner set, the Russian continued to explain what had been decided while he was unconscious. “We're still working on the assumption that the compound is a lab . . . if it is, Marta will be able to fabricate a larger amount of the antidote. Her portable equipment is impressive, but it just isn't enough to be able to handle this kind of production.”

“Is Aaron going with her?”

The handler chuckled under her breath as she taunted, “Consider what you just said, Sam.”

Rolling his eyes at him, he conceded, “Touché.” Yanking the ties tightly on his boots, he sighed heavily, “All right . . . I'm dressed.”

“Good . . . let's get you up and outside. There's some egg sandwiches by the fire; you can get some food in you while the boys pack up the rest of the gear. You must be starving.”

“I can pull my own weight, Marina, honest.”

“Sam, you're missing a chunk of skin, muscle and flesh from the back of your right arm approximately the circumference of my fist. No one is expecting you to pull any weight at this point. Understood?” she ordered firmly, her features stern as she scowled at him.

Nodding miserably, he agreed, “Yes ma'am.”

Seeing how upset he was, and taking into consideration his reasons for leaving JTF2 in the first place, she sighed and moved to hug him fiercely. “We were all really worried about you, Sammy. Let us coddle you for a bit, if only for our own sakes, okay?”

Mouth twisting in acknowledgment, he nodded once. “Okay.”

“Thank you. Come on . . . let us get thee fed. You're barely within healthy weight limits as it is . . . you don't have the weight to lose.”

Rolling his eyes, he let her guide him from the tent as he teased, “You think that of everyone.”

“True . . . but in your case, it happens to be mostly accurate,” she scolded, cocking an eyebrow at him.
“Busted,” he breathed under his breath, pulling to a stop at the sight of his aunt dashing at him like the world was on fire. “Sam! You're okay!”

The impact of her against his chest was kinda like a cannonball and Sam wrapped his uninjured arm around her mostly out of reflex. “It's good to see you too, Aunt Marty.”

Marta glanced at the other woman, sagging slightly to see her single nod. Looking up at him, her hands flashed as she tracked over his visible vital signs. “How do you feel?”

Grimacing slightly, he confessed, “My arm hurts, but I'm told that part of it is missing so that's probably to be expected.” Lifting her slightly off the ground as he tightened his grip around her, he insisted, “For the most part, I feel okay. Honest.”

Squeezing his shoulder fondly, Marina spoke up, “Since you have him from here, Marta, I'm going to go help the boys pack up. Sam . . . food . . . I mean it.”

Nodding in agreement, both aunt and nephew watched as the warrior woman dashed towards where the rest of her boys were busy tearing down tents and packing up Marta's gear. Guiding him towards the fire, Marta watched him sit and then handed him one of the sandwiches still warming on the fireside grill. “Here . . . they're pretty good . . . apparently there really isn't anything Marina can't cook into a gourmet meal.”

The smell of warm egg and roasted sausage triggered something in Sam's brain and suddenly the young soldier was ravenous, tearing easily through four of the smallish sandwiches before he finally felt full. The virologist grinned as she watched him eat, glancing towards where Aaron was helping his brothers. “It's good to see you eating, Sam . . . I seem to remember your eating habits resembling a bird's in the past.”

Shrugging one shoulder, Sam accepted a sealed bottle of water from her. “So . . . are you going to be okay?”

Smiling at him adoringly, Marta nodded, “I'll have Aaron with me, and I think you and I both know that there is nothing Aaron wouldn't kill to keep me safe.”

The former JTF2 sniper grinned as he agreed, “He does kind of adore you.” Giving her a smirk, he teased, “Don't ask me why.”

“You hush,” she laughed, pushing him gently and causing him to rock a little bit in his seat. “Look . . . I know that you're frustrated because of your injury . . . but Aaron asked me to ask you a favor.”

“Sure . . . what's the favor?”

“Most of Marina's boys are going to the compound, including the Colonel. Therefore, Aaron would appreciate it if you would keep an eye on her. I realize that that's kind of a tall order, considering your arm . . .”

A firm shake of his head cut her off as he insisted, “I can do that. She may be deadly, but she is tiny. She fits pretty easily behind me.”

Laughing, Marta snarked dryly, “Good luck with that.”

Grinning, Sam conceded the point. “Hansel, Clint and Bucky are going to the farm with us; between the four of us, Vincent and Daryl, I think we'll be able to take good care of her.”

“Thank you. I’ll let him know.” Looking over at the sound of her boyfriend's voice, she blinked to see that the entire camp had already been packed. “Wow . . . that was fast.”

Sam grinned as he agreed, “The first thing you learn in Special Forces? Sleep where and when you can. The second thing you learn is how to throw up camp and then tear it down quickly; don't want to get caught in a spot that'll kill you for very long, if your location ends up compromised.”

Aaron's voice rang through the small clearing again as he called, “Doc! We gotta go! Come on!”

Almost seconds later, Marina's voice called through the area, “Sam! Let's go! We're still a good forty five minutes away from that farm and we aren't getting any closer by sitting on our asses!”

Sam chuckled, as he agreed, “Coming! Let me put out the fire first!”

“Thank you!”

Pushing himself to a standing position, Sam reached to hug his aunt tightly. “Take care of each other, okay? And if anything happens to you, kindly warn your boyfriend that I'll kill him. Agreed?”

“He'll probably kill himself first, so I wouldn't worry about wasting the energy,” she laughed, before she pulled him down to kiss his cheek. “Love you, Sammy . . . be safe.”

“You too, Aunt Marty. Don't worry about me; I'll see you soon. I promise.”

Nodding, she hugged him fiercely once more, before dashing towards where Aaron and the rest were waiting for her at the edge of the clearing. Throwing another wave over her shoulder, the first group were visible for only another moment before they disappeared from sight. Bending to the task he'd assigned himself, Sam killed the fire carefully, before moving towards where Marina was seated on the horse. Moving forward, Hansel smiled at the disgruntled look on the man's face as he chuckled, “I hope hyu do not mind the ride . . . we cannot afford to stop.”

Sighing, Sam allowed a moment to curse the zombie that had bitten him and the muscle weakness he could still feel in his body, before reaching up and accepting the help. A strong, smooth pull guided him up onto the horse behind the Russian woman, before the world jolted into motion as Marina urged the horse into a careful trot. Looking back, he was surprised to see that the others in their group were right on the horse's heels, except for Daryl who was several steps behind the rest. “That's not possible.”

“I think you'll find, Sam, that a lot of things that shouldn't be possible, don't seem to make a difference in this family. If you want, you can close your eyes; we've got a bit of a trek ahead of us and you could use the rest.”

Nodding in agreement, the young blond wrapped his arms around her waist and rested his chin over the curve of her shoulder. Closing his eyes, before he even knew it, the soothing motion of the horse urged him into a light doze.

It didn't seem like very long before Marina's voice was calling his name in a low undertone. “Sam . . . Sammy . . . come on Sammy, wake up . . . we're here.”

Yawning widely, he straightened up from his slumped-over position and blinked hard to take in his surroundings. Sensing that he was approaching functional again, Marina reined the horse in to a stop, petting the mare's neck as she murmured, “There's a good girl . . . welcome home, Kavallerie.”

They waited there as the rest of the crew came to a rest beside them, the two snipers trading sight lines and perches with one another almost absently. Hansel hefted his shotgun into the crook of his arm, robin's egg eyes catching on the small camp situated in a stand of trees off to their left, before tracking to the whitewashed house another 200 feet to their right. Glancing down at the former witch hunter, Marina asked, “What do you think?”

There was a moment, before the German answered, “There is rot here . . . I can smell it, meine Tochter.” Scanning the area, he continued, “Something is very wrong here . . . I would not like to stay for very long if it can be avoided.”

Bucky's nose scrunched as his enhanced senses caught a hint of the scent. “Hansel's right . . . there is something dead here . . . and it's been dead for awhile.”

Looking down at Daryl, the Russian woman inquired, “Do you have any idea where everyone is?”

Daryl gestured towards the RV that was set back against the trees. “That's Dale's rig.” Twisting, he pointed towards the house, “Hershel and his family live in that house. Hershel owns the place.”

Nodding in agreement, Marina considered her choices, before gesturing towards the house. “I think we should start by returning the horse . . . she is probably pretty hungry at this point, aren't you, Kavallerie?”

Looking around, Sam slid sideways off the horse and accepted a rifle from Bucky. “Am I the only one who thinks that this place is almost creepier than the woods?”

Clint shook his head with a grim frown, “No . . . you aren't.”

Eying the blond carefully, Marina rolled her eyes at the innocent look he gave her before kicking the horse into a quick walk towards the house. As they approached, it was to the sight of a large group of people standing out front. One, a tall man with a shaved head and wearing khaki cargoes, was handing out rifles and pistols to members of the angry, if clearly divided, group. Hansel frowned as he called calmly, “Marishka . . . I do not like the look of this.”

Swinging down from the horse, Marina dropped the reins to the ground so as to ground-tie the horse, before pulling a large Bowie knife from the sheath at her calf and her Beretta from its holster at the small of her back. “Vincent, you and Sam keep those bite marks hidden, understood?” At the affirming calls, Marina looked down at Daryl, “It might be best if you went first.”

Nodding, Daryl shifted his crossbow from his back and into his hands. Looking around, he caught sight of a woman with cropped short hair near the back of the group, and jogged forward with a call of her name, “Carol!!”

The woman spun, as did most of the others in the group, her face lighting up at the sight of him, “Daryl! Thank God!” Dashing forward, she nearly crashed into his chest and nearly sent him to the ground at the sudden flare of pain. “I thought you were dead when you didn't come back last night!”

“Nah, I'm all right.” Gesturing towards where the others stood, he explained, “They found me after I got hurt . . . saved my ass from being a walker snack . . . fixed me up and gave me a place to crash for the night.”

The man with the bag of guns glared as they got closer, snarling out, “And who the fuck are they?”

“We're with S.H.I.E.L.D.,” Marina replied, her eyes narrowing at his tone. “We're the clean up crew for this mess.”

His face twisted as he sneered, “Five guys and a bitch . . . some clean up crew.”

Both Clint and Bucky jolted forward at the insult, Hansel getting his hand on both of them to stall them in their tracks. “Ruhig, meine Söhne.”

It didn’t escape the Russian's notice that she could hear Sam's jaw grinding as he moved to take up a protective position at her back, just to the left of her and giving himself more than enough space to pull up his rifle quickly if he had to. Marina's lips twisted into a bitter smile as she replied, “I really don't like you. In fact, one day I hope I get to put a bullet in you. And considering I don't even know your name, that is blin vpechatlyayet. I like to make a habit of knowing the name of the person I'm going to kill . . . it's a professional courtesy, really.”

It was about then that Daryl turned his attention back onto Carol. “What the hell is going on? I thought Rick and Hershel said no guns on the property.”

Gesturing towards the barn, Carol replied, “The barn is full of walkers.” Gesturing at the man Marina was still glaring at, she continued, “Shane wants us to put them down.”

Daryl stared for a second in shock, before coming back to his senses. Turning to Shane he announced calmly, “You can't do that. This is a virus . . . they may not be dead.”

Shane scoffed, even as a woman with short reddish hair stepped forward. “What are you talking about?”

“The walkers were created by a virus, called the RAGE virus. They're alive for 96 hours after infection, at which time they're truly dead. According to the virologist with their team, there's nothing to be done for them after that point.”

Her face crumbled, as she sunk down onto the front porch steps, gripping on to the hand on her shoulder, placed there by the young Asian man who moved to stand beside her. Marina stepped forward to crouch in front of the young woman, smiling kindly, “What can you tell me about the walkers in the barn, devochka?”

“Maggie . . . my name is Maggie.”

Smiling in acknowledgment, Marina agreed, ”Just tell me what you can, Maggie.”

"Some of them are members of my family. My father was keeping them contained, because he believed that they could be saved. Others are walkers that Otis found, that he corralled into the barn after finding them.” Taking a deep breath, she looked up with tears in her eyes, “Except for the newest one, they've all been in there for weeks.”

Looking up at Bucky, Marina ordered, “Take Clint . . . see what you can see.”

“Yes ma'am,” he agreed, gesturing Clint after him with a jerk of his head. “Come on, khishchnick. Let's take a look around, huh?”

Clint considered the barn as he moved after his partner, asking cheerfully, “Do you think I could scale that thing?”

Marina chuckled, easily able to hear Bucky's eyes rolling in his response, “I think you're not going to try!”

“You take the fun out of everything, Buck!”

Turning back to the girl, Marina took a deep breath as she considered the pain in her eyes. “I am sorry for your loss.”
Nodding, she bowed her head into her hands. Her young man took a seat next to her and pulled her into his arms, letting her cry against him. Pushing herself to her feet, Marina gestured Vincent forward. “My name is Agent Marina Petrovka. This is Dr. Vincent Keller . . . Daryl is right . . . the walkers have been infected by a virus known commonly as RAGE. We have a vaccine and Dr. Keller is going to be vaccinating everyone here. So if you don’t mind pushing up your sleeves, he will be getting that taken care of now.”

Turning to Hansel as Vincent moved to set up his things on the porch, Marina spoke in quiet German, “Er macht mir Sorgen. (He worries me.)”

Hansel's eyes were fixed on Shane as he agreed in the same language, “Ja . . . er ist nicht richtig. (Yes . . . he is not right.)”

“Andanken? (Thoughts?)”

“Ich arbeite daran. (I am working on it.)”

“Gut. (Good.)”

Turning back to the group, she watched in horror as two men suddenly emerged from the trees, corralling a pair of walkers with them. “Vot der'mo!” she swore as Shane bolted angrily in their direction.

Nodding at Sam and Hansel, the three bolted after him, hoping to stall whatever madness he was intent upon. Skidding to a stop as Shane put three bullets into one of the walkers, Marina sighed at their placement; even if she had been saveable, the bullets would have killed her anyway. Nodding to Sam, she watched as the sharpshooter grimaced slightly in pain even as he lifted his rifle and put a clean shot through her temple. The sight of the woman dropping to the ground stalled even Shane in his tracks, which was just fine for Marina as it gave her a chance to pull off a shot of her own. Letting out a cry, he dropped his gun and grabbed at his now bleeding hand. “Bitch!”

Shrugging nonchalantly, she replied, “That's the best you can do? Frankly . . . I've been called worse.” Looking at the walker still collared, she called up to where she could see the two S.H.I.E.L.D. snipers perched on the barn's roof. “Clint . . . stay up there. Bucky . . . I could use that metal hand of yours for a second!”

She could see his smirk even from where she stood as he literally leaped off the edge of the roof and landed lightly a little more than two feet from Shane. Reaching out with his bionic arm, he spun sharply and snapped the man's dominant arm at the elbow and the forearm as he stripped the weapon from him, before sweeping his legs from under him and dropped him onto his back. Turning back towards the rest of the group, the Winter Soldier started to remove his glove from the left hand as he strode towards the zombie in question. Daryl blinked in shock as the sunlight glinted off the completely metal appendage, blinking again as the zombie attempted to sink his teeth into the hand and couldn't close on it. Bucky backhanded the walker sharply, and managed to get his flesh hand on the skin under his jawline behind his ear. Stepping back with a shake of his head, he announced, “He's gone,” even as he pulled his gun and put a bullet through his left eye.

Keeping her Beretta trained on Shane, Marina spoke to the two newly arrived members of the group. “I'm going to assume that you are Rick and Hershel.”

Nodding in silent shock, they only stared at her as she proceeded to reiterate everything she had already shared with the rest. “I've been told that a good majority of the walkers in here have been locked up for some time, right?”
Hershel's features were still twisted in shock, even as he stammered out, “Yes, that's right.”

“Then I'm sorry, but the best thing you can do for them at this point is to put them down.” Glancing around at the group, she insisted, “If it would make you feel better, my team and I can take care of it for you.”

Taking a deep breath, the older man shook his head. “No . . . this is my family . . . I need to do right by them.”

“Understood.” Shifting her gaze back onto Daryl, Marina inquired, “The little girl you were looking for. What was her name?”

The woman standing just behind him - the one he'd called Carol - spoke up, fiddling with a pendant around her neck. “Sophia . . . her name is Sophia . . . she's my daughter. Why?”

Watching Bucky shed his heavy tactical jacket out of the corner of her eye, Marina smirked at the way jaws dropped when his bionic arm came into view, showcased by the sleeveless undershirt he wore. Turning back to Carol, she answered honestly, “I understand she went missing a little under three days ago? Our best guess is that there is a 96 hour window before the disease is irreversible. So we're working on the theory that, even if she was infected, she's still saveable. We'll check, of course, because we're not going to waste what antidote we do have if she's not, but we're all praying we find her and soon.” Smiling gently, she laid a hand on the other woman's shoulder and asked, “Can you tell me a little more about what she looks like?”

“She's 12 years old . . . shoulder length blond hair . . . blue eyes . . . she's too nice . . . she couldn't hurt a fly.”

Smiling kindly, Marina squeezed lightly and promised, “Thank you . . . that's a big help.”

Looking at Hansel, she jerked her head in the direction of the still writhing Shane. “Think we can use him as bait?”

“Meine Tochter . . . what would mein Adler say?”

Grinning Marina replied, “As long as I had a good reason that wasn't 'He's an asshole', Misha would say, 'Good job.'” Shrugging at the incredulous look on his face, she teased, “My partner knows me well . . . he'd never second guess a decision I made, because he'd probably make the same one in my place.” Eying the lock, she inquired, “Can you break that thing?”

Hansel snorted as he replied, “Bare handed.” Moving forward, he pulled on it carefully, testing its strength. “This thing is a Stück Scheiße.”

Glancing at Sam, she took in his pain level and asked quietly, “You okay?”

Nodding silently, he hefted the rifle and took aim at the door. Gesturing Clint from the roof, she watched fondly as he flipped off the edge, somersaulting in the air before landing easily on both feet. Bucky's tone was teasing as he ruffled his hair, “Show off.”

“Jealous!” Clint sing-songed in return, unslinging his bow from his back and nocking an arrow against the string.

Moving forward, Rick grabbed Shane under the arms and yanked him out of the way of the doors, as the rest of the survivors joined the line. Marina reached for the dart gun tucked into its holster at her thigh, checking the single round loaded there. Shoving it back into the holster, she drew a bead with her Beretta on the door and nodded once at Hansel. “Open it.”
Bicep muscles bulging, he ripped the lock from the door and flung it to the side. Grabbing onto the handles, he yanked the doors open and dodged backwards to rejoin the line. Marina lifted her gun and called, “Save the ammo . . . head shots only . . . if you don't think you can manage that on a first shot, don't shoot. Understood?”

The sharpshooters in the group – Sam, Bucky and Clint – didn't say anything, knowing that she wasn't talking to them, though she waited for the rest to agree to the order. Just then, the first walker stepped from the gloom of the barn and lumbered towards them groaning. The rotted look of his face nearly made Marina gag, even as she called, “Fire!”

Instantly, her three snipers opened fire, putting their targets down with single, precise shots. The rest of the survivors were surprised by the immediate action, but quickly joined in on the killing. Finally, the walkers were dead and on the ground. Marina's features twisted at the smell, as she turned towards Bucky and Clint. “Head out and find somewhere we can safely burn the bodies. Burying them will take too much time and I don't want to risk that decomposed releases the virus into the soil and we have another outbreak in another twenty years.”

The two nodded, before the sound of growling from inside the barn swung them around again, weapons up and ready. Marina frowned at the sound, easily able to hear that the sound was much lower to the ground than the others. “Hold fire until my call,” she ordered, drawing her dart gun and moving cautiously forward.

“Yes ma'am,” Bucky agreed on a grunt, hands tightening on the stock. “Gadyuka . . . too close.”

Waving off his concerns, she stopped at just outside the ring of bodies, peering closely into the gloom. The walker that emerged then was little more than a child, and it was only the agonized cry from Carol that warned Marina who the walker was. “Sophia!” Carol screamed, attempting to dash forward before Daryl dropped his rifle and caught her in his arms.

Bringing the dart gun to bear on the girl, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler called over her shoulder, “Tovrets . . . check her!”

Handing the rifle to Clint, Bucky moved forward quickly. Wrapping his metal arm around the girl to hold her still, he didn't even need to touch her skin to know; he could feel the searing heat of her through his thin shirt. Looking up at his former protege, he nodded, “She's alive.”

“Thank fuck,” was all Daryl could say before Marina pulled the trigger.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Slava Bogu - Thank God
(G) Kavallerie - horse
(G) Ruhig, meine Sohne - Easy, my sons.
(R) blin vpechatlyayet - damn impressive
(R) devochka - girl
(R) khishchnick - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for Clint)
(G) Meine Tochter - my daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina)
(G) mein Adler - my eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will)
(G) Stück Scheiße - piece of shit
(R) Gadyuka - viper (The call sign given to Marina by the Akademiya and the Krasnaya Komnata
(R) Tovrets - architect (One of Marina's nicknames for Bucky, who used to be her mentor)
Hello! Hope you enjoy!

Just to let everyone know, I have been getting a lot of requests to finish one of my other stories. I will not be putting a pause on this one, however, I will be limited to only two chapters a week while I focus some much needed attention on this other story. It's almost finished, so it's just a matter of writing the last chapters. I hope you can understand.

Translations at the end of the chapter, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Marta growled as her foot got tangled again in a root under her feet, earning quiet chuckles from her boyfriend where he stood behind her. “Are you all right up there Doc?”

“Can we just let it be known that I hate the woods? I’m a scientist . . . the outdoors and I hate each other mutually and intensely,” she muttered viciously, yanking on a strand of her hair caught in a section of gnarly branches over her head. “Fucking tree! Let go!”

Still chuckling, Aaron shucked his pack and tossed it towards Will, who was holding out a hand for it. Stopping the increasingly frantic motions of her hands, the former Outcome operative gently untangled her hair and pulled it back into a simple knot at the back of her head. Moving in front of her, he crouched and insisted, “Hop on, Doc . . .”

“I refuse to be carried like a child,” she sputtered, blushing dark red at the thought.

“Don’t think about it that way, Doc. Think about it in terms of the fact that we’re on a tight clock and all the time you and I stand here bickering about whether or not you’re going to let me give you a piggyback ride, is drastically cutting into how many of these people you could have saved with your antidote.”

Glowering at his back, there was a pause before she climbed onto his back, muttering viciously under her breath in Quebecois French. Will chuckled as whatever Aaron said back, in the same language, caused her jaw to drop and her head to bury into the back of his neck in embarrassed fury. Her scolding, “Asshole,” however, was more than understandable to everyone else in the vicinity.

Chuckling, Will hefted the second pack over his shoulder, before turning his attention back onto where Jason was walking and working. The middle brother was fiddling intently with one of the dart guns, and paying absolutely not attention to his surroundings, leaving his older brother to do it for him. “You about done, bratishka?”

Jason’s answering hum was absent and distant as he tilted his head and focused more intently on the guts of the pistol in his hands. Brian laughed from where he and Natasha had taken point, calling back fondly, “You might as well be talking to a wall, Will.”

Snorting in agreement, the Colonel replied dryly, “Indeed.”

A burst of static in his ear turned his attention onto his comm as Owen’s voice sounded in his ear, “Orel . . . this is Ubiytsa . . . come in.”

“This is Orel . . . what do you hear, Ubiytsa?”

“This is a hell of a wind,” the former Cleaner replied, with a snort. He had been sent on to the compound, when Sam had gotten bit, so that they had some reliable reconnaissance going into the area. “Whoever said this place was abandoned, was lying through their teeth. This place is fully functional . . . and it's going nuts. Something happened and I'd bet my paycheck it's tied to this outbreak.”

“Any easy entry points?”

“Sure . . . like I said this place is going nuts. I could blow a half a dozen holes in this perimeter, and no one would even notice that they'd been breached. Something has them seriously spooked, though they do seem to be avoiding one building in the very center of the compound.”

Frowning, Will suggested cautiously, “Sounds like a loss of infrastructure.”

“That was English, Lucky,” Will snarked in reply, before explaining, “Sounds like they lost their officers. The lackeys are all going batshit, because there isn't anyone around to tell them what to do.”

“So . . . let's give them an officer,” Aaron suggested, nodding at Will's own tactical uniform. “You're the best they’re going to get right now.”

“And if I knew a damn thing about what the hell we were walking into, I would be all over that suggestion. But I don't even know who's running that compound . . . who it belongs to . . . who doesn't want anyone to know that it exists . . . I don't know enough to be able to bluff my way in. It's too risky for you guys . . . and for the others at the farm. No . . . we'll do this the old-fashioned way.”

Brian cheered in excitement at the order, as Will continued, “Owen . . . set up a series of explosions. Wait for us to get there and then blow them all. We'll throw them into even more disarray and we'll take over in stealth formation. If you are engaged, you have permission to engage with all prejudice. If they do not, less lethal only, if it can be done. Understood?”

“Yes sir!” was the all around call, before Owen called out an affirmative and left the comm again.

Reaching out cautiously, Will placed his hand on Jason's shoulder and watched the middle Grimm jumped out of his skin. “Svyatoye der'mo! Will, you scared the hell out of me!”

“Sorry, Jay . . . how's it coming?”

Smirking, Jason's hands moved rapidly for a moment, before he offered his older brother the reassembled pistol. “Viola! It's done.”

Taking the pistol, Will examined it for a moment, ejecting and reloading the magazine, before tucking it into the back of his pants. “So how many is that?”

“Marina has hers, Aaron has his, Bucky and Clint both have theirs even if they're not loaded and then that one.” Rummaging in his bag, he grunted, “I have the materials for one more but I need about 20 minutes to be able to assemble it while we're on the move.”

Smiling lightly, the Colonel announced, “You have ten.”

Huffing, the technical specialist sassed, “Do you have any idea how many miracles you've asked me for in the last 24 hours?”

“Quite a few . . . and you've delivered admirably every time.”

Pausing briefly at the comment, the younger brother stopped and stared at the older, eyes narrowed and features suspicious. “All right . . . out with it. You're obviously fishing for something.”

“Are you a hundred percent sold on staying with the NYPD forever? Is there anything that can bring you back to S.H.E.I.L.D.?”

Turning to attention to the parts in his hands, Jason considered for a moment as he manipulated the parts, before shrugging. “I had a good reason for leaving S.H.E.I.L.D., Will.”

“And I'm not saying you didn't, Jay. But Sarah's been gone for a long time, and you have Casey now . . .”

Whatever he'd been about to say next was interrupted as Jason spoke up, “Yeah, I have Casey and she's my partner.” Looking over at Will, his mouth twisted as he insisted, “We work well together. I couldn't leave her with Alvarez. For starters, she'd probably puree my ass and hand it to me on a platter. Two, she gets me . . . I don't have to justify myself like I had to with Kowalski.”

Will’s mouth twisted slightly at the reminder of the younger brother’s former partner. He’d met Kowalski all of once, but that had been one time too many. The man had definitely made an impression, but it had not been a good one. He was truly sorry for his widow and what she’d gone through at his death, but he could honestly say that wasn't sorry the man was dead.

Shaking the thought away, Will continued, “I know you don't want to be a field agent. After what happened with Diego and to Sarah, I don't blame you. But what about a position in research and development? You loved working in R&D.”

Smiling at the reminder of the other tech geeks he'd befriended when he'd freelanced in the department, Jason ran one hand through his hair. “That still leaves Casey.”

Frowning at his stubbornness, he opened his mouth to argue, before Marina's voice called through the comm, “Orel, this is Sova. Do you read?”

Holding up a hand in a clear indication that this conversation wasn't over, Will triggered the comm in his ear, “This is Orel.”

“We found that little girl. She was infected, but, near as we can tell, the antidote worked. Kindly give Vorona my compliments.”

Marta’s tone was excited as she demanded, “Any side effects?”

“Tselitel is with her now . . . all I really know is that she dropped like a stone after I shot her. But he said her fever is at least coming down into a manageable range, so I'm going to assume that that's a good thing.”

Will hummed lightly in acknowledgment, dropping into a crouch as the compound came into view. Out of the corner of his eyes, he watched the rest of his brothers, Natasha and Veronika do the same. “How does the farm look?”

“Tselitel vaccinated everyone here, so that's at least one less problem to worry about in the long run. Also, the entire area is aggressively cleared so it does offer good sight lines . . . Snavper and I are on lookout duty with Yastreb and the Soldat . . . Vati took a few of the men to burn the bodies . . . the moron who owns the farm had a bunch of the walkers locked up in his barn. That's how we found her; they'd locked her up with the rest in the barn.”

Smirking at her tone, Will could imagine the way her eyes were rolling back into her head; Marina suffered fools not at all and had very little patience with any form of stupidity at all. “Any sign of trouble?”

“No . . . not for the moment. I get the impression this entire area here is kind of secluded from the world. Frankly, I don't think Hershel knows a damn thing about what's going on outside his farm. He knows about the walkers obviously, but not much else.” Huffing out an exasperated breath, she muttered under her breath for a moment, before speaking up again, “What about you? ‘All Quiet on the Western Front’?”

Smirking, Will teased, “Has anyone ever told you that your opinion of light reading is not exactly light reading?”

He could see her careless shrug in his head as she replied, “I'm a fan of the Classics . . . sue me. Answer the question.”
"We're at the compound now. Ubiytsa is laying charges... he said earlier that the base was going batshit and, based on what I can see from here, he's not wrong."

The Russian chuckled as she replied, "Yeah, I heard... just remember, Misha, not every one speaks the same English as you, okay?"

"Ha ha... very funny." Narrowing his eyes at something happening down the compound, he asked absently, "Vorona... you said this virus first showed up in London, right?"

Marta nodded in agreement, shooting a quick smile at her boyfriend when he reached out to tuck a loose strand of hair back into the knot at the back of her head. "About ten years ago, yes. Why?"

"Were there any survivors?"

Eyes going wide, everyone could see the way the gears in her brain started to whir as she thought. "I know that the medical center was declared a complete loss; the infected completely overran the building and the Brits ended up bombing the whole building. As for anyone else, I know that there were a couple soldiers who made it out, but not many."

Reaching out, the Colonel guided her to his side gently before pointing towards where a group of soldiers were congregating in the courtyard. In the center of the group was a pair of soldiers holding onto the arms of another. Based on build and body structure, Will could tell it was a woman and considering the way she was yanking her body around, she was not being held there willingly. "Does she look familiar to you at all?"

Eyes squinting as she tried to make out features, the scientist jumped in surprise when Aaron laid a hand on her forearm to get her attention. Smiling at the binoculars he was offering her, she leaned to press a brief, chaste kiss to his lips. "Thank you."

Nodding, the agent glanced toward his brothers, the three younger Grimms moving soundlessly down the treeline towards the compound fence. Watching him go for a moment, she shook herself free of her thoughts and brought the binoculars to her face. All dirty brown hair and frantic brown eyes, the woman was probably several inches taller than Marina though the hulking nature of the men on either side of her made her seem much smaller. Peering closer through the lenses, she watched as they shoved her to her knees. "What the hell are they doing?"

"They're going to kill her, and that I can't allow." He was already moving towards the compound as he ordered briskly, "Tasha... Nika... stay with Marta. Owen... blow it to hell."

Owen's tone was gleeful as he replied, "Whatever you say, Boss-man."

Marta jumped in surprise as the sound of several explosions, one on top of the other, ripped through the silence of the forest. Dropping the binoculars, she pressed her hands to her ears to block out the worst of the sound. Natasha's hand was a warm, gentle weight her shoulder, grounding her to a single point as the world around them proceeded to go to hell in a hand basket. Twisting to look at the two Russian women, she felt her heart settle at the small smile on the redheaded assassin's lips. "They're trained for this... Aaron's going to be just fine."

"Promise?"

Veronika grinned, black hair tied up into an efficient ponytail as she agreed, "Absolutely. Frankly, I'm a little jealous that they're the ones that get to have all the fun."

Natasha rolled her eyes at her sister's exuberance, smacking at her shoulder lightly, "Someone needs to kill something."
Nika's eyes went wide in emphasis as she blurted out, “I know!”

Some part of Marta marveled at her calm in the face of such comments, while the rest of her was infinitely grateful that the four women known most commonly as “The Merry Murderesses of S.H.I.E.L.D.” were on their side. Shifting to rest her temple on Natasha’s shoulder, Marta settled in to wait out the firefight going on below them. Natasha's arms were warm and firm as they hugged her, offering her the reassurance that the virologist needed while her lover was going head to head with the private army below them. “It might be easier if you didn't look,” Nika prompted with a small smirk.

The scientist's head shook, her eyes glued to the one she knew in her heart was Aaron, as she replied, “No . . . it wouldn't be.”

Meanwhile, Brian was cutting a bloody swatch through the soldiers between him and the woman. Fortunately, her executioner had gotten distracted when the bombs went off, allowing Brian the time to put a bullet in his brain before he could refocus his attention on the woman forced to her knees in front of him. He could hear the rest of his brothers and Owen behind him, each of them involved in their own jobs.

Putting a bullet in the hand of the asshole to her left, Brian employed one of the tactics he and Natasha had perfected on each other and dropped the man to the concrete. Barely a split second later, his partner was writhing on the floor on the other side of her. Breathing hard, Brian waited for a moment to see if either would move, before turning his attention onto the woman still kneeling behind him. Turning to her, he took in the horrified hope on her face as he offered her a hand and assisted her gently. Catching sight of the single crown on the shoulder of her ragged uniform, he frowned for a moment before his brain finally supplied the correct title. “Major? Are you all right?”

The whole time he'd been speaking, she'd been staring at his face. Reaching out, her fingers hovered just inches from his face as she nearly whimpered, “Doyle? Is that you?”

Before Brian had even a second to respond, she was in his arms and her mouth was on his. And in the back of his mind, the only thought he could hear was, “Oh fuck . . . Tasha is going to kill me.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) bratishka - little brother
(R) Ubiytsa - assassin (Owen's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Orel - eagle (Will's call sign for the Army's Spec Ops squad the Brat'ya Mrachnyy and for SHIELD)
(R) svyatoye der'mo - holy shit
(R) Sova - owl (Marina's call sign for the Army's Spec Ops squad the Brat'ya Mrachnyy and for SHIELD)
(R) Vorona - raven (Marta's civilian call sign for SHIELD; is also one of Aaron's nicknames for her)
(R) Tselitel - healer (Vincent's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Snayper - sniper (Sam's call sign for SHIELD)
(R) Yastreb - hawk (Clint's call sign for the Army's Spec Ops squad the Brat'ya Mrachnyy and for SHIELD)
(R) Soldat - soldier (short for Zimniy Soldat or Winter Soldier; Bucky's call sign given to him by the Russian Akademiya and its Krasnaya Komnata
(R) Vati - Dad (Marina’s nickname for Hansel Kuhn)
(R)
Translations at the end as always.

If you haven't had the opportunity to read "This Trick May Chance to Scathe You", it's a Trio centric fic that I've started that takes place about 20 years from where we are now. I hope you take the opportunity to read it and let me know what you think, if you can.

Here's the newest chapter, as promised. I hope you enjoy it!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Scarlett Ross-Levy had been living alone and in almost total isolation since the incident in London. She had lost count of how many prayers she'd said, that her lover would come to rescue her. As the years passed, she was forced to accept the fact that he believed her gone, dead at best and infected at worst. And then, for him to finally be here, having saved her from what she'd known would be her death only moments before; it was quite literally her best, most perfect dream come true.

Even if this wasn't quite how she'd imagined their reunion would play out.

His lips were still pressed to hers, however, they there was no activity behind the action. His hands, as far as she could tell with her eyes closed, were held awkwardly out to his sides, as though he was terrified just to touch her. Every muscle of his body was locked tightly into fight or flight and she could tell that if it wasn't for her death grip around his neck, he would be halfway across the courtyard already, with at least 100 feet of space between them permanently.

Finally, she dropped back onto her toes, disengaging from him and looking up at him with tears shining in her lashes. “Doyle? What's wrong?”

The man's face twisted into a grimace as he placed his hands on her shoulders and pushed her a step away from him very gently. “I'm sorry, sweetheart . . . but I'm not Doyle.”

Letting him push her away, she wrapped her arms around her midsection and frowned. “I don't understand . . . that's impossible. You have to be Doyle . . . you look just like him.”

To her surprise, the man's brown eyes rolled as he muttered, “Well, it's not like I haven't heard that before.”

She was contemplating that sentence when it finally hit her; the man's eyes were brown. Doyle's eyes were a warm, laughing sea-green that had watched her with adoration every moment they could steal together. Whoever this man was . . . he was not Sergeant James Doyle, which then forced the question . . . “Who the fuck are you?”

Drawing back from him sharply, she all but glared at him as his own shock at the question spread across his face. “Who the fuck am I!? Who the fuck are you!? Do you have any idea what my Widow is going to do to me because of that kiss!? Listen, lady, I have no desire to die today and thanks to that little stunt you just pulled, I'm going to be very lucky if she doesn't castrate me with her favorite knife and then frappe my dick in our blender, okay?”

Another voice spoke up then from behind her, causing her to whirl in surprise. Another man stood there, this one looking practically identical to the man in front of her. “Is there a problem here, Bri?” he inquired, eyebrows furrowed curiously.

The brown eyed man shook his head at his brother – because if they weren't related, she'd eat her credentials – as he ran his hands back through his hair. “Nah, Will . . . just another case of mistaken identity.”

“Wait . . . she knows Clint? Except for Dad, he's the only one not present and accounted for.”

“Nah . . . she thought I was some guy named Doyle.” Pausing, he frowned for a moment before asking, “Do we even know anybody named Doyle?”

A third brother joined the first two, laughing as he announced, “If I was you, I would be a lot more worried about the redhead storming over here like there's a fire on her ass.”

Whirling at the warning, Brian held up his hands in a placating manner and announced frantically,
“This is not what it looks like, Nat, honest.”

“Really? Cause it kinda looked like some suka was kissing you and you weren’t doing much to stop her,” came the softly accented voice, her tone calmly lethal.

Instinctively taking a step towards the nearest place to hide, Scarlett instead found herself in the green glass laser sights of the woman’s eyes. Grimacing at the barely leashed fury there, Scarlett allowed her shoulders to hunch up around her shoulders as she announced, “So . . . that might have been my fault. I thought he was someone else.”

A delicate snort was the woman's only response, earning a pair of smothered grins from Brian's two brothers. Brian, however, looked like someone had just hit him with a two-by-four. “Come on, Tasha . . . why would I ever want to stray from you? Who else is going to understand my need to kill something every once in awhile?”

Natasha’s eyes narrowed sharply at the question; it was clear to Scarlett at least that the longer she remained silent, the more nervous and uneasy her paramour became. Finally, she stepped into her lover's space, reaching up and twisting her hand in the collar of his shirt. Yanking him down to her own level, she chirped sweetly, “I hope you’re prepared for the consequences, Brian, because I can guarantee that you're not going to enjoy them.”

The way he instantly paled was visible to everyone in the vicinity, as was the way his Adam's Apple bobbed as he gulped at the threat in the sugar-sweet tone. It wasn't long before the younger of the brothers spoke up in a cheerful tone, “Hey Natasha? Where's Marta?”

“I left her with Nika; they were going to be right behind me.”

Nodding in silent agreement, the young man turned to survey the treeline Natasha had emerged from. “Apparently, they missed that part of the memo,” he chuckled, lifting his hands to cup around his mouth. “All right you two . . . you can come out now!”

A disembodied voice floated from the trees as it laughed, “Maybe we're playing hide and seek . . . did you ever consider that?”

“Hide and go seek is only fun when there's a prize at the end of the game,” was the response from yet another brother, his nose glued to what looked like a tablet computer held in one hand and a Glock 9 clutched loosely in the other. “And I can promise you, Marta, there is going to be one seriously kick ass prize at the end of the maze.”

Almost instantly, a slight woman with dark brown hair popped up out of the trees as she demanded, “Did you find my lab?”

“The solar system orbit the sun?” the tech geek scoffed with a blatant roll of his eyes, a gesture that looked a little odd if only because he never actually looked away from the tablet he was examining. “Please . . . the schematics for this place may be buried under the kind of upper level encryption that should have been on Paris Hilton's sex tape, if only to protect the rest of us from that degree of stupid, but clearly, they have never met me.” Turning to tablet around so that the rest of the group could see the blueprints displayed there, he grinned, “Easier than taking candy from a baby.”

“Yeah . . . and what about taking chocolate from Marina?” the black haired woman with Marta taunted, a smirk on her lips.

“Right . . . because that's ever going to happen. It would be easier to steal every gold brick from Fort Knox than it would be to steal chocolate from Marina. And frankly, I don't know anyone stupid enough to try.”

Marta waved away the conversation, practically bounding over to grab the technical specialist's arm and shake him sharply. “Jason! I want my lab!”

Smirking at her, he teased, “Well well well . . . look who's getting all bossy.”

“JAY!”

“All right! Come on; let's go find this lab so that you can cook up your antidote.”

Scarlett's interest was immediately intrigued as she demanded, “Wait. You have an antidote to the virus?”

Turning, Marta frowned. “You know about the virus?”

“Yes . . . I've spent the last ten years here, being forced to turn this stupid virus into a weapon. I've tried everything I know of to create a vaccine without Them finding out, but whenever I got close . . . my captors would find out and I'd have to start all over again.” Springing forward, she latched onto Marta's arm fiercely, ignoring the startled squeak that the virologist released as a result. “Does it work? Are you sure?”

Dark brown eyes were very wide as she stared at the other scientist, prompting Aaron to step in and disengage the two women from one another. The former Outcome Operative took up a position between them, icy blue eyes glaring down at the other woman from over a pair of tightly crossed arms. Only slightly abashed at the admonishment in his features, Scarlett blushed at her exuberance before continuing forward with her questioning. “Please . . . I just want to go home. And the only way I can do that is if your antidote actually works.”

Looking up at her boyfriend, Marta stepped out slightly from behind him and nodded. “My nephew, Sam . . . he got bit. It works; no adverse effects. It even works on people who have been exposed to the virus for longer than just a few hours. Our working theory is that we have up to 96 hours before the virus kills its victim and the infected individual is no longer saveable.”

“Do you have any evidence to support your theory?”

“We split up from the rest of our party earlier this morning. A little girl had gone missing a couple days ago and when our colleagues found them, they discovered she'd been infected. They were able to introduce the antidote into her system and by all reports, the girl is recovering rather quickly, considering,” the brother Brian had called Will explained, his eyebrows narrowed as he asked. “Why can't you go home without a viable antidote?”

Blushing with mortification, Scarlett reached up with one hand to push back her hair. “You have to understand . . . this is what I was intending to do. I only wanted to get out out of here, and the only way to do that was to get rid of my captors. So I doctored one of the weaker strains of the virus samples I had access to . . .” Taking a deep breath, she confessed quietly, “I infected one of my guards. And from there it spread. I was so close to an antidote that I thought I would have more than enough time to be able to finish it before the outbreak became too widespread.”

“Wait . . . YOU were the cause of the outbreak?”

Looking down at her hands in a strange mix of shame and pride, the medical doctor nodded. “The kinds of things they used that virus for . . . it wasn't right. And to be honest, I'm not sad those bastards are in their graves. They destroyed people's lives; some of their test subjects were killed because they introduced a virus into their DNA systems that they didn't know how to control.” Shrugging, she lifted her chin and looked the Colonel in the face, almost daring him to say anything against her. “I'm not sorry for my intentions, only the loss of life that resulted from it.”

Those quicksilver eyes flashed through a wide spectrum of colors, before finally landing on a colorless blue, almost like the wet scales of a fish. “Frankly, I'm not sure I have any right to condemn your actions; that job's for someone with a higher pay-grade. However, I can promise you that whatever tribunal you face will definitely look on you more kindly if you help us. We have a viable vaccine, and a reliable antidote; help us manufacture it in the kind of quantities we need and I will do what I can to help you.”

Nodding in agreement, the pretty scientist squared her shoulders and met Will's eyes dead on. “I will do what I can to help you, you have my word.”

“Good then let's get going. We have a steadily closing time frame and I really don't want to waste any more time,” the oldest brother agreed, turning to the middle Grimm. “Get the two of them and Aaron to the labs, Jay . . . let's get this show on the road.”

Grinning, the communications officer agreed, “Sounds like a plan.”

Watching the four go, Will turned back to the rest. “As for everybody else, if they're moving, let's find some way to restrain them just in case. As for the dead, let's get them out of the main area and find somewhere to either bury or burn the bodies . . . frankly, I'm not picky about which one we choose.”

Owen spoke up cautiously, insisting, “Burning them would be safer. Less chance of the virus spreading via an underground spring or something equally ridiculous.”

“All right; Owen, I'm putting you and Nika in charge of finding an appropriate place to get that taken care of. Brian, you and Natasha round up the still living guards. The ones that are still capable of coherency, I would like to speak to. As for the rest, I'm sure there are a sturdy rooms inside that can double as a cell for a little while.”

“Yes sir,” the four chimed in together, before each pair moved off to their individual jobs.

Remaining where he'd been left, Will reached up and triggered his comm with a series of sharp taps over the open connection. There was a moment, before Marina's voice chimed through on a private channel. “I heard.”

“Who do you think this Doyle is?”

“I don't know; but if she was that convinced that Brian was this Doyle . . . that would mean that there is another clone out there somewhere, Misha.”

“I was worried you were going to say that,” he sighed, his hands pushing down into his pockets roughly.

“I was worried I was going to have to say it,” Marina agreed with a soft chuckle. “No matter what, Misha . . . I'm right here. I promise.”

His lips quirking briefly into a relieved smirk, Will announced, “Thank God for small blessings.”

The Russian's tone was fond and adoring as she replied, “And big ones.”

“Indeed.” Rubbing his hands briskly over his face, Will pushed out a sharp breath. “All right, I love you."

“I love you too. We’ll see you soon. Be safe. Sova out.”

“You too. Orel out.”

And if there was anything more isolating than suddenly being the only one on comms, Will didn’t want to know what it was.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) suka - bitch
(R) Misha/Mishka - a diminutive of Michael/Mikhail (Will's middle name is Michael. Marina's most common nickname for her lover and partner)
(R) Sova - Owl (Marina's call sign with the Army and SHIELD)
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will's call sign with the Army and SHIELD)
Blood and Bullshit

Chapter Notes

New Chapter! Finally!

New chapter up on "Scathe You" too! Enjoy the double helping of Grimm awesome!

Translations at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 171: Blood and Bullshit

Will had said it before and he would probably say it a million times again; he was a soldier, not a spy. And as a soldier, there were some things that did not jive with his modus operandi. Chief among these things was bullshit; he had no patience for it and even less patience for the idiots who attempted it. Fortunately, the idiots stationed at this covert installation could learn. By the time he'd broken the second finger, they were more than willing to spill their guts about the kinds of things that had happened at the base as well as what they may have accidentally overheard at some point.

As he was leaving the last interrogation, wiping his hands on a rag, he heard one of his brothers call out his name. “Will!” came the repeat call, earning Will's reply, “I'm here!”

There was a dull thud as whoever it was careened off a wall to change directions, before Jason appeared at the end of the hall, features alight with excitement. Grinning, Will stood and waited for him, offering rhetorically, “Success then?”

The technical specialist could hardly contain his eagerness as he offered the remodeled gun to his older brother. “I think these things may be the coolest toy I've ever made.”

Chuckling, Will took the weapon and replied teasingly, “I don’t know . . . I think these comms are going to get a longer duration than even these toys, Jay.”

“Yeah, but I'll probably throw a million upgrades at them through the next few years. These are a one-shot beauty, pravitel’.”

Nodding at the statement, Will holstered the weapon as he laughed, “Agreed. What about the vaccine? Are we all set?”

“Marta and Major Ross were just finishing up the last batch when I bolted.”

“All right. Nika and Natasha have confined our reluctant guests into the basement isolation cells. They should be all right there until S.H.I.E.L.D. can send someone to collect them.” Taking a deep breath, Will finished cleaning his hands before reaching up to trigger his comm. “Lucky . . . can I get a status update on the bodies?”

Owen's tone was resigned, if disgruntled, as he replied, “Can I just say that zombies stink? And that the appealing aroma of freshly dead jackasses do not improve the smell?”

Chuckling, Will replied, “You may say whatever you want . . . doesn't mean I'm going to listen to you.”

“Asshole,” the Cleaner grumbled goodnaturedly, the roll of his eyes audible in his tone.

“Takes one to know one, Luck,” the Colonel agreed cheerfully, before turning to his brother. “All right . . . let's round everyone up and get to the farm. I don't even want to attempt to undertake this mess without everyone together; there are reasons why we are so successful, and it is because we work best as a team.”

Nodding in unresistant agreement, the NYPD detective turned on his heel and bolted back the way he'd come. Opening the channel on his comm, Will spoke firmly, “All right everybody, listen up . . . the vaccine and the antidote are done as are the modifications Krechet has made. That being said, things are about to get ugly. If you are at the farm, be prepared for our arrival; I would prefer not get shot accidentally, okay?”

Marina's tone was laughing as she teased, “I make no promises.”

Narrowing his eyes at the tease, he taunted back, “Something I should know, Major?”

The indignant outcry from Clint and Aaron was immediate as Clint announced firmly, “No flirting over comms! I'm pretty sure that's a rule somewhere, and if it's not it should be!”

The Russian's laughter was amused as Will insisted, “And who said we were flirting, Yastreb?”

“You only call Sova 'Major' when you're flirting and thinking dirty thoughts,” was Aaron's response in his younger brother's place.
Rolling his eyes, Will waved the comment away, before continuing, “Sych, we will finish this conversation later.”

“Looking forward to it,” was the warm purr from his partner, earning another chorus of groans through the comms.

“As for everybody else, meet at the front gates of the base to get your piece. Be prepared to move out and move fast; we have no time to waste. Our window is closing fast and so as of this moment, our timetable is running on hyper-speed. Understood?”

“Yes sir!” was the resounding call through the comms, before Will insisted, “Over and out.”

The trip through the woods was relatively uneventful – a detail that would no doubt make Will nervous later – and as a result took very little time at all. Scarlett kept up with the rest easily, her eyes wide as she took in her surroundings; the Colonel would bet every hazard pay check he’d ever received that this was the first time she’d been outside in the world since London had fallen victim to the virus ten years ago. Before long, the farm was in sight and in that same instant, Marta was off at a run towards the farm house with Aaron only moments off her heels.

The rest moved at a more sedate pace through the grounds, branching out as they took in the lay of the land. A muffled thud sounded to Will's left as he moved past the barn and it was without any surprise that the oldest Grimm turned his head to see Marina fall into step beside him as though she had been there the whole time. “Sit rep?”

“We're good here. Vincent is in with Sophia and her mother, Carol, getting another set of vital signs from the girl. Our new friend Daryl is about as prickly as a porcupine; he's been stationed at the bedroom door with his crossbow since I shot the poor thing.”

“Any concerns I should know about?”

“Just the one; his name is Shane Walsh . . . kid's not quite right.”

Will fished in his back pocket from his cigarettes, drawing one out and lighting it quickly, inhaling a lungful of the smoke slowly. “Any reason you haven't killed him yet?”

Marina grinned at the question, replying, “I don't have a reason that's not 'the man is an asshole'. At least not yet.”

“Let me know when you do, huh?”

The Cheshire grin on his partner's face was answer enough and Will exhaled slowly, quicksilver eyes looking over the surrounding area. “Any other trouble?”

“Nah . . . for the most part, the farm is pretty isolated. Frankly, I haven't decided if that's a good thing or a bad thing yet.”

Humming in answer, Will's head came up and around at the sound of his father's voice calling for him, “Adler?”

“I'm here, Dad!” he called back, reaching to lay a hand on the small of Marina's back as he leaned to press a sweet kiss to her cheek. “Catch you later?”

“I'll be around,” she teased, with a wink before turning to rejoin Sam on watch.

Rounding the barn, the Colonel frowned at the sight of Hansel and Scarlett standing toe to toe with one another. Approaching the two slowly, the oldest Grimm asked cautiously, “Something I should know?”

Hansel blinked at the sound of his oldest son's voice, before announcing, “I know this woman.”

Before the statement was even out of his father's mouth, Will's eyebrows were in his hairline as he demanded, “You what!? How the hell do you know her? You hadn't even been abducted from the Germans yet when she was kidnapped during the London outbreak.”

The witch hunter scowled as he waved away his son's argument, “I do not know her personally, mein Adler . . . but I huf seen her picture.”

Narrowing his eyes, the Colonel asked cautiously, “Where?”

“Do hyu remember the assignment Maria and I went on, the one where she was shot?”

“Yeah . . . Austria . . . I had my hands full trying to convince Marina that we couldn't steal a Quinjet and fly there ourselves.” Grunting, he muttered, “I'm still not entirely sure that my Marishka forgives you for letting her best friend get shot.”

Giving his son a wry look, Hansel huffed out a breath and continued, “My commander, Sergeant Doyle, had a picture of her in his wallet.”

Scarlett's whole face lit up, her hands flashing out to catch hold of his sleeve. “You know Doyle!? Is he okay? Why didn't he come for me?”

The German looked down at the woman with a frown, his hand coming up to press over her own. “I have met Sergeant Doyle only the once, and that was many years ago. As for his state of being, he was hale and hearty in body though he was heartsick with missing you.” Smiling at her kindly, he continued cautiously, “At present, he believes hyu lost to him . . . he was told that hyu are dead.”

Scarlett released a sharp, horrified cry, as her hands came up to press over her mouth. Frankly unconcerned by her distress, Will railroaded over whatever she might have said as he demanded, “That mission in Austria was a S.H.I.E.L.D. assignment . . . you mean to tell me that Doyle works for
S.H.I.E.L.D.?!”

“Ja . . . he was a commander for one of the tactical units Maria assigned to Dornroschen. He seemed more like a soldier than a spy, mein Sohn. Maybe that is why hyu huf never crossed paths with one another, hm?

“Maybe. But still . . . you didn't think to tell anyone that you saw someone who looks like you in Austria, who wasn't one of us?”

Hansel ran a hand back through his hair as he concentrated on the memory of the young man. “He was not a clone; his likeness to hyu and hyur brothers was superficial. I remember thinking that he shared the same competence in command as hyu do, Adler, but other than that, there was little similarity. His eyes were khaki green and his hair was very dark. He may have been built a little like Kenny, in that his shoulders were wide and strong, but he truthfully did not look like any of hyu. I just assumed that I was imagining it.”

“Dad, Major Ross jumped Brian at the base, because she thought he was Doyle. That implies that it was a little more than a superficial likeness. She was convinced that Brian was her lover,” Will insisted, obviously riled and just as obviously at loose ends about what to do about it.

“Adler, it is a miracle to me to have hyu and hyur brothers for my sons. Mayhap I simply did not wish to see what was before my eyes, because I did not believe that I could deserve more than what I had already been gifted.”

Pressing his eyes closed, Will borrowed one of Marina's more common habits and began to count backwards from one-hundred in Russian. One hand came up to pinch the bridge of his nose as the telltale throb of a migraine began to beat behind his eyes. “Dad . . . do me a favor? The next time you see what you think might be a miracle . . . tell someone.” Blinking, he reconsidered his father's statement and began to chuckle, “Also, I'm not really sure that any of us fit the bill as a miracle. Thank you for the compliment though.”

Resting one hand on his son's shoulder, Hansel announced firmly, “Wait until you are a father, Adler. Then you will understand; a man's children are always his miracles, no matter how flawed or imperfect they are.”

Nodding with a wry grin, the Colonel watched as Hansel turned at the sound of a shouted, “Pops! You gotta come see this!”

The two men exchanged fondly exasperated looks, before the former witch hunter shouted back, “I am coming, mein Falki. Whatever it is . . . do not touch it!”

The disappointed groan from Clint was informative enough and Hansel moved to pull his oldest into a warm, if uncharacteristic, embrace firmly. “You are a good man, Adler . . . and you are most definitely my miracle. Ja?”

Nodding in reluctant agreement, Will watched as his father nodded briskly at the scientist still standing to the side before bolting in the direction of his youngest son. As for the Colonel himself, he turned back to face Major Ross-Levy with a small smile. “Well, knowing that Doyle works for S.H.I.E.L.D. makes it a bit easier to find him. No matter what else happens, we'll get you home to him. You have my word, Major Ross.”

Her smirk was resigned as she replied, “Please . . . call me Scarlett. I have every intention of resigning my commission, just so that I don't ever have to hear someone call me 'Major' ever again.”

“Completely understandable,” Will chuckled with a grin. Glancing toward the house, he insisted, “You look tired. I'm sure there's somewhere you can lay out a bedroll and bunk down for awhile.”

Her eyes were the color of scuffed metal as she nodded, “I may just do that. Thank you, Colonel.”

“It's just Will . . . your boyfriend is probably family, of some kind, so you should probably get used to it.”

“Sounds like a plan,” she agreed with a laugh, before waving over her shoulder and heading towards the small grouping of tents where the Grimms had set up camp.

Remaining where he was left, the Colonel's eyes scanned the area, taking in each of the survivors one at a time. For the most part, they seemed to be good people, just trying to endure the end of their world as they know it. Sophia seemed to be recovering well, and as soon as he had a spare second, he had every intention of going up to check on both her and her erstwhile parents. (Granted, he knew that Daryl wasn't her biological father but you don't do what Daryl did to find her, without having a certain claim to the role. Of course, then there was the shy looks Daryl spent a lot of time exchanging with the girl's mother, Carol – Will would be his next paycheck that there was something between them, but both were too afraid to pursue it in case it disappeared along with the rest of what they'd once considered normal.)
Of course, as soon as he'd entertained the thought, Daryl emerged from the house, practically chasing after Shane Walsh . . . who appeared to be dragging the sickly and stumbling Sophia Peletier by one arm harshly. Without looking, Will ordered, “Yastreb, if he tries to hurt that girl . . .”

Clint's tone was severe as he quoted, “Bullet to the brainpan, squish’.”

Recognizing the quote for what it was, Will insisted, “Marina . . . get down here. Sam, you too.”

“Yes sir,” was the young sniper's response, though the Russian said nothing and simply appeared at his left once again as he strode toward the altercation taking place on the porch steps.

They were still several steps away when Shane shoved the pre-teen to her knees in the dirt and leveled a gun at her head. Carol screamed, lunging forward and stalled only by Daryl's arms coming around her waist. Marina's tone was cool as she asked, “Does this qualify as a better reason than 'he's an asshole’?”

“I guess we'll see, but all indications point to yes,” her lover replied in an equally calm tone, even as he insisted, “If you would relieve Mr. Walsh of his weapon . . .”

“With pleasure,” she hissed, practically lunging the few feet between them to capture Shane's wrist, bringing it down on her knee hard, the crack audible in the air as the bone fractured. The startled cry brought a grin to the assassin's lips as she whirled and kneed the man hard in the back, bringing him to his knees and allowing Carol the opportunity to break free of Daryl and scoop up her daughter into her arms. Forcing the broken appendage to bend painfully, Marina kept him curled up on his knees while her lover moved into position at his side. “Either you are a very stupid man, Mr. Walsh, or you simply have no talent for self-preservation.”

“That girl is infected! She's going to kill us all!” he insisted angrily, every line of his body coiled with tension even as he remained motionless under the Russian's hands.

Rubbing two fingers over his forehead, Will argued lightly, “She received the antidote, within the projected parameters, which means that she's no longer infected and will more than likely make a full recovery. According to Dr. Keller, she's progressing well and the signs of the virus decrease by the hour.”

“And how do you know this vaccine of yours actually works? We're just supposed to take your word that she's not going to relapse and eat us all in our sleep? The only good zombie is a dead zombie.”

Sam's tone was unimpressed as he snarked from behind the scope of his rifle, “You realize that what you just said is both asinine and redundant, right?” There was a moment's pause, before he sighed and lowered his rifle. Handing it to Will, he reached down for the hem of his shirt and pulled it off, turning his back to display the bloody bandage on the back of his arm. “As for how we know it works . . . well, I'm still standing here, aren't I?” Tucking the shirt into his belt, Sam folded his arms over his chest self-consciously as he glared down at Shane. “But enough about me; frankly, you're the one I'm not really holding out any hope for.”

Everyone could see the way the older man's jaw ground together as he hissed out, “Why not?”

“Well, it's been pretty well proven that we can cure this virus. But there ain't no cure for crazy, which kinds leaves you shit out of luck, doesn't it?”

There was a moment of silence as Shane processed the insult there, before he screamed in outrage and lunged at the sunny-haired sniper, naked blade glinting in his hand. It all happened so fast, that not even Marina was able to move to intercept the blade, before there was a sharp report of a sniper rifl,e and Shane's head snapped back, blood and brain matter splattering from the perfect hole where his left eyes had once been. The body remained moving even as it collapsed to the floor, and Sam flinched unconsciously as he barely managed to dodge the body.

Everyone stared at the body in varying degrees of startled shock, before Will twisted slightly to look towards the barn roof. A dark blond head was just lifting from its sniper scope, one hand lifting to shoot his older brother a thumbs-up. Reaching up with one hand, eyes still tracking his baby brother, Will praised sincerely, “Nice shot, Clint.”

The flash of grin was visible, as Clint quipped, “I never miss.” Chuckling, he quoted again, the tone much more cheerful this time, “Bullet to the brainpan, squish!”

Marina giggled as she crouched to check the body, retorting, “Squish is overstating it a bit, dorogoy.”

“Eh . . . dude's dead . . . win-win for everyone involved.”

Bucky spoke up through the comms then, from where he was sprawled on the roof of the house, keeping an eye on Clint's back and the treeline behind him. “Sounds like just in time, too . . . we got company.”

“Company?” Will asked, even as he let out a piercing whistle and waved Owen over. “Get rid of the mess for me, huh, Luck?”

“Sure . . . we'll just add him to the fire with the rest of them,” Owen agreed with a half-assed salute and a grin. “Nice shooting, Hawkeye!”

“Thank you!” was the proud response from the roof.

Marina waved the banter to silence with a frown, as she called up to her former mentor. “What kind of company, Zima?”

“Single male . . . filthy as hell . . . but doesn't have any of the earmarks of the infected.” There was a pause, before the Winter Soldier continued his thought, “He's missing a hand.”

“How can you tell?”

“There's just a stump at the end of the arm; I can see enough to see the other hand, so it's not a result of the jacket being too big.”

Out of the corner of his eye, Will could see the way Daryl stiffened sharply at that information. Glancing briefly towards where Carol was soothing her sobbing daughter, the Colonel turned his attention onto the tracker. “Someone you know?”

“I don't know . . . could be,” Daryl agreed sheepishly, one hand coming up to scratch at the back of his head. “It might not be, but I don't know too many people missing a hand in this neck of the woods.”

“Well then . . . Sova, get the welcoming committee together . . . let's go say hello to our unexpected guest.”

The Russian assassin nodded sharply, before dashing off in search of Hansel, Brian and Natasha, leaving the rest to check their gear in case of a fight. Reaching out, Will clasped the redneck's shoulder calmly. “No matter what, your first priority is your family. Keep them safe and the rest will fall into place.”
Daryl frowned at the statement, reminding the older man bitterly, “I don't have any family, except for my brother.”

Will's eyebrow cocked upwards as he turned the tracker to face where Carol and Sophia still cried together in the dirt behind them. “Don't you?” Slapping his shoulder gently, the Colonel released him and moved towards the barn. “Sam . . . get up on the roof with Clint. You two and Bucky are on sniper duty.”

Sam nodded, slinging his rifle over his shoulder and dashing towards the barn. It was only another few minutes before the other four had joined Will, waiting on the order to move out. “Daryl, you're coming with us; if it's the person you think it is, you're the only one who would be able to tell us.”

The young man nodded, gathering Sophia into his arms and jogging into the house with Carol only a half-step behind them. There was a brief but emphatic argument, before Daryl moved from the house again, his crossbow held tightly in one hand. Looking at Will, he pulled the weapon up into his hands and insisted tightly, “Let's go then.”

“Indeed. Do not engage unless engaged upon; dart guns only, unless there's imminent threat.
Understood?”

“Yes sir!” was the all around call, before they each branched out to flank Will as the older brother turned on one heel and ran towards the treeline with Daryl to his right.

As they neared the staggering figure, Will could see Daryl's whole body tighten in shock before melting into frustrated resignation. Frowning, the Colonel set his mind to this encounter being an unpleasant one, even as he decided to let the younger man take the lead. Dark eyes were miserable, as the long man looked up at the sound of footsteps, pausing in shock at the sight of the group of people in front of him. It took a moment, before his eyes landed on Daryl and his lip curled derisively, “You ungrateful son of a bitch! Do you see what they did to me? And you let them?”

Daryl flinched slightly, no doubt hearing the same words he'd been hearing in his own mind since Marta and Hansel had found him wounded two days before. “I didn't let them do anything. I went back for you and you'd already cut yourself free. So don't you dare make this out to be that I betrayed you!”

“I have taken care of you, your whole damned life . . . ever since Mama died, you've been my responsibility. And this is how you repay me!?”

Whatever vitriol the man had been prepared to unleash was cut short then as Hansel stepped forward and put his fist into the younger man's face. The bald survivor crumpled under the blow, eyes rolling back into his head without hesitation. The German rounded on the tracker and demanded, “Vy did hyu let him speak that way to hyu!? Vy did hyu not speak up fer hyurself?”

Darly sighed heavily, both hands coming up to shove backwards through his hair miserably.
“Everybody, meet my older brother, Merle Dixon . . . the biggest asshole I know and also my longest-standing protector.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) pravitel - big brother
(R) Krechet - Merlin (a kind of falcon; Jason Grimm's call sign with the Army and formerly his SHIELD callsign too)
(R) Yastreb - Hawk (Clint Grimm's call sign with the Army and with SHIELD)
(R) Sova - Owl (Marina Petrovka's most common call sign with the Army and with SHIELD)
(R) Sych - Little Owl (one of Marina Petrovka's call signs with the Army and with SHIELD; Will is the only one who calls her this)
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for his older son, Will Grimm)
(G) mein Adler - my Eagler
(G) Dornroschen - Sleeping Beauty (a HYDRA base in Austria; the assignment in question is outlined in Amerou's "I Don't Believe In Fairy Tales (But I Believe In You And Me))
(G) Ja - yes
(G) mein Sohn - my son
(G) mein Falki - my little Hawk (Hansel's nickname for his youngest son, Clint Grimm)
(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's most common nickname for Clint Grimm)
(R) Zima - Winter (one of Marina's nicknames for her former mentor and one of her oldest friends)
(R)
Hey guys!

I am so sorry it has been so long. I had a specific plan designed for Merle, but there was a post on Tumblr and it quite frankly freaked me the hell out. So I had to rewrite the whole idea and it took me a little longer than I wanted to it. Not to mention, a serious distraction in the form of Bob Morley’s freckles and well . . . shrugs

I have also reacquainted myself with the awesome that is Auggie Anderson from Cover Affairs (which I am so pissed that the USA Network has cancelled), so expect to see him at some point in the future. :D Apparently, I live for a good cameo.

Either way, I apologize again for how long it took and I promise, it will not take that long again. Enjoy! And as always, I look forward to hearing what you think. Translations are in the note at the end, as per usual.

Chapter 172: Revelations

Merle wasn’t sure what he was expecting to see when he woke up, but he could at least safely say that it hadn’t been a blond-haired man twirling a blade against the tip of one finger, vibrant eyes vowing blue murder at him. Seeing that he was awake, the man straightened in his chair and growled, tone low and vicious, “Gut. Hyu are awake.”

The elder Dixon brother narrowed his eyes at the older man, asking cautiously, “Is there a reason I shouldn’t be?”

“To be frank, Herr Dixon, I had hoped I had killed hyu with that blow to hyur hard head.”

Blinking at the statement, Merle stared in shock for a moment before gathering his usual brashness about him like a shield. “Well fuck you, too, man.”

The man’s jaw tightened sharply, making him look as though he had been carved from diamond, before pushing himself to his feet. “I would watch my step, if I was hyu, Herr Dixon . . . as _meine Tochter_ would say, I need but one reason and I will happily end hyur life.”.

Leaving the other man to contemplate that, Hansel turned and left the room. Will was seated at the dining room table, tracing over a series of maps with a pen when his father stormed into the room. Looking up as his father appeared, the younger man watched for a long moment as he stomped around. “So? Is he dead?”

“Nein . . . regrettably.”

The eldest Grimm smirked at the disgruntled tone, teasing fondly, “You actually sound disappointed, Dad.”

Glowering at his son, he grumbled, “He is a terrible _Bruder_.”

Slouching back in his chair, the Colonel folded his arms over his chest as he grunted, “No argument there. Still, not every family values _family_ like we do, Dad.”

“Hyu are not allowed to be so reasonable right now, understand?” Hansel growled, glaring at his son fiercely.

“_Ja_ . . . I understand,” Will chuckled with a grin.

“_Gut_.”

Cocking an eyebrow, the Colonel watched his father fume for a moment before asking, “I realize that this is something that I usually ask my Marishka, but is there a reason you haven't just shot him yet? No offense, Dad, but restraint isn't usually a virtue of yours.”

“_Mein Spatzi_ tells me that I am an Agent of S.H.I.E.L.D. and that I should behave as such.”

“Marina is an Agent of S.H.I.E.L.D. too. Name one time she's shown restraint when it was family that she was protecting.”

“Shane Walsh.”

“Not a good example. She has standing orders about civilians and good reasons. Otherwise he would have been dead from the word go,” he argued lightly, waving the answer away lazily. “Also, the second he threatened Sam, he was a dead man. Clint just got to him first. Try again.”

Narrowing his eyes at his son for a moment, the German considered what he was saying. “So . . . you're saying that I can shoot him in the foot and hyu would say nothing.”

“If shooting him in the foot is going to protect Daryl, you have my full support.”

Will's lips twitched into a small smile at the sharp intake of breath, just out of sight from the dining room. His father only chuckled, nodding once in agreement with his son's surreptitious form of adoption, as he insisted in a low whisper, “That was underhanded of you, _mein Adler_.”

Chuckling, Will shrugged lazily, “I'm a spy . . . most of my interactions with people tend to be underhanded.”

Humming in absent agreement, the German's head cocked as he listened to the soft sounds of Daryl's footsteps on the floor and then the soft slap of the screen door against the jamb. “Do you think he will be all right?”
“Yeah . . . I think Daryl's going to be just fine, Dad. There are people here who he knows care about him . . . and now he knows that there are other people here who give a damn about him as well. All in all, he's probably better off in the aftermath of the zombie apocalypse than he was before it.”

“That is a truly depressing thought, Adler.”

“But no less true.” Both men were silent for a moment, before Will grunted and leaned forward again, using his pencil to point out a spot on the map. “All right then . . . how about we get back to business?”

Grinning, Hansel stood from his own chair and joined his son. Before long, neither of them were thinking about Daryl Dixon, Merle Dixon or anything other than zombies at all.

Meanwhile, Daryl Dixon was reeling from the information he'd just overheard. The fact that he was considered of importance to the people in the other room wasn't entirely a shock; he still remembered the teasing from the day before, where the man's son-in-law had laughed about asking if Daryl even wanted to be adopted before claiming him. The fact that he wasn't actually teasing, however, was definitely a surprise.

Daryl's mother had been dead for as long as Daryl could remember. Merle was luckier; he had some memories of the beautiful if fragile woman who had brought them both into being. Frankly, Daryl was shocked at the idea that someone actually gave a shit about him. Objectively, the younger brother knew that Merle had done his best to protect him from their father; but those years were eons ago and some part of Merle's protection had been in the pursuit of his own self-preservation. Not to mention, everything had been going to hell since the beginning of the damned zombie apocalypse.

The hardest part for Daryl was the identity of the people who claimed to care about him. To claim that they were anything less than terrifying would be an extraordinary lie. Even if he only counted Will Grimm and Marina Petrovka, they alone were two badass soldiers were wore danger like cloaks and killed with the same kind of ease that most people cut butter. And that wasn't including the cantankerous German with a soft spot for his family . . . and a distinct hatred for the one protector Daryl had ever known. Of course, then there was the rest of the family, not a single one of which didn't petrify him.

Except for maybe Sam Braddock . . . but Daryl had watched even those eery blue eyes go cold and heartless in the short time since he'd woken up after getting bitten. Which, of course, only further served to prove his point.

Moving around the side of the house, Daryl put his back to the wall and dropped his hands into his palms as he tried to sort through the upheaval that had taken over his life. He was alone for a long time, before a voice drawled lazily, “You look like hell.”

Jumping in shock, his head snapped up to look at the person speaking to him. On first glance, he knew that this man was not one of Hershel's survivors; for starters, he didn't recognize him and secondly, there was no way this man wasn't a soldier. The blond's posture was lazy, but wary and though there was a cocky smirk on his lips, his eyes were sharp and focused. Frowning, he pushed himself upwards as he demanded, “Who the hell are you?”

That smirk tilted into something a little more genuine as the man chuckled, “Owen Elliot . . . and from what I hear, you're Marina's next Misfit.”

At the term, Daryl's eyes narrowed. “What the hell is a Misfit?”

Owen grinned as he turned his eyes away from the tracker and towards the barn the unit's snipers were still on watch. “It's complicated; but at the heart of it, Marina's Misfits are those guys who needed a place to be that was different from the place they were. Most of the people in this unit are Misfits; we don't fit in anywhere else but here.”

“Why would anyone willingly associate with that woman? She's not exactly the poster-child for warm hugs and motherly love.”

The blond stared in shock at the question, before throwing his head with a raucous laugh. “Dude . . .
now I've heard it all. Marina Petrovka . . . not the epitome of motherhood . . . what a laugh!!”

“She's not!”

Those eyes were hard as diamond as the laughter bit off sharply as he snapped, “If you truly think that, then you weren't paying attention when Sam got bit.”

Daryl's mouth worked slightly, as he was forced to consider that. He still remembered the first time he'd seen the assassin; an AK-47 clutched in one hand and a grin on her face as she congratulated Braddock on his shooting. The way she had laughed in anticipation of kicking ass, when Daryl's own thoughts had been consumed with the idea of getting the hell out of the way. “That woman is dangerous.”

“Agreed. But she's also one of the warmest and most caring people I know. And trust me, my best friend relies on 'that woman' to keep him sane and his moral code in check. So say what you want, but don't say it about her.”

Slumping back against the wall again, Daryl watched as Owen dug into his pocket for a pack of gum. Shoving a couple sticks in his mouth at once, the Cleaner grumbled under his breath as he waited for the younger man to talk. “I guess I just don't see what you see in her.”

“I see the way my best friend loves her. I see the way she loves him. I see the way she would die for him, would kill for him, and would give everything for him.”

Daryl watched as the other man growled under his breath, kicking at the side of the house viciously.
“Are you in love with her?”

“No . . . and even if I was, there is only one man in Marina's heart. She doesn't see anyone outside of Will. Don't get me wrong . . . I adore the Boss-lady. She's badass awesome and I would follow her and Will into hell, but she loves Will more than anything else in the world. He hung the moon and raises the sun for her; nothing and no one could ever or would ever compete with that.”

Turning away from the other man, Daryl turned his attention towards the rest of the unit that had descended on Hershel's farm. Sam Braddock, the first recipient of Dr. Shearing's antidote, was sprawled on the ground in front of the porch, head resting in Marina's lap and a small grin on his lips as the brunette Russian stroked her fingers through his hair and laughed at whatever he was telling her. There was a sense of absent comfort and mothering ease between the two that Daryl had previously only seen between Carol and her daughter Sophia. Whatever else the Russian woman was . . . she did clearly have feelings for this young man.

Folding his arms, he grunted, “Well . . . maybe she's not so bad.”

Clapping him on the shoulder, Owen agreed, “No . . . she's not. And trust me, once you get to know the Grimms, you'll understand just how lucky you are to be counted as one of them soon enough.”

It was nearly nightfall when Vincent finally approached the dining room to interrupt the planning session between the Colonel and his father. “Hey Will. Herr Kuhn . . . is now a bad time?”

Looking up from the map, Will shook his head. “Hey Vincent . . . what's up?”

“I've completely my examination of Mr. Dixon.” Twisting his lips to one side, he insisted, “Do we know how he lost his hand?”

The Colonel frowned as he insisted, “I think you may be ahead of me here, Vincent. Are you saying that's a recent injury?”

“Very recent . . . and not a properly treated one either.” Running his hand back through his hair, the former soldier sighed, “So I'm going to assume that we don't know.”

“Daryl might; he didn't seem particularly surprised by the announcement that his older brother was missing a hand.”

“Hmm . . . then I need to go find Daryl.”

Hansel grunted as he pushed himself away from the table. “I will find him. Hyu figure out how hyu will tell him whever bad news hyu huf for him.”

Vincent blew out a frustrated breath as he muttered, “Joy.”

The German chuckled and squeezed the young doctor's shoulder once before leaving the dining room in search of the tracker. Heading up the stairwell in search of Sophia or Carol, the former witch hunter discovered the woman sitting on the bed beside her sleeping daughter but no Daryl keeping watch over them both as he had so often since Marina had administered the antidote. Leaning into the room with a small smile, he inquired softly, “How fares the child?”

Carol's eyes were adoring as she smoothed the girl's hair from her face. “She's still a little shaken up, but I think she's going to be okay. Thank you for asking.” Twisting, she gave the man a warm smile as she insisted, “Please . . . thank your son for me. He saved my baby's life.”

“I will pass along the message to mein Falki. He will be glad to hear she is doing well.” Glancing around the room, just in case he'd missed the tracker, he turned his attention back on the gray haired woman and inquired, “Have hyu seen Daryl, perchance?”

There was a small, sad smile as she chuckled, “Not lately, but I can guarantee that he's avoiding his brother. Daryl doesn't talk about Merle much, but what he says is very rarely good.” Chuckling, she winked as she prompted, “You might find him in the barn. When he's stressed out, he likes working with Hershel's horses.”

“Thank hyu, Fraulein.”

“You're welcome,” she agreed, even as she watched him go.

Stepping from the house, he found Marina and Sam still seated on the porch steps, though Sam's eyes were heavy-lidded, indicating his valiant effort to stay away. Owen, Will's best friend and loyal guard dog, was leaning against one of the support pillars, talking quietly with Marina as Sam struggled to keep from falling asleep. “Meine Tochter . . . how is the patient?”

“Tired and restless with it,” she replied, laughing at Sam's disgruntled huff. Smoothing her fingers through his hair, she looked up at her adoptive father and asked, “What's up, Vati?”

“I am looking for Daryl. Dr. Keller has some news regarding his brother . . . it is the kind of news one should hear for themselves, I should think.”

Marina frowned at the information, though Owen was the one who spoke, “Last I saw Daryl, he was headed for the barn. I haven't seen him leave yet, so he's probably still there.”

“Thank hyu, Owen.” Cocking his head towards the other two, he consciously lowered his voice as he begged, “Keep an eye on them for me?”

Blue eyes were warm with affection for the Russian woman as they shot in her direction, “Always.”

“Good man,” he agreed, clapping the former Division operative on the shoulder before moving towards the barn in search of his quarry.

When he arrived, it was to the sight of Daryl brushing one of the horses down, the hunter humming tunelessly under his breath as he worked. Hansel stood quiet for a long moment before finally speaking into the gloom, “Hyu have been avoiding hyur Bruder, I hear.”

The tracker jumped a mile high at the unexpected voice, before twisting to give the older man a self-deprecating grin. “Has anyone ever told you that you have a knack for making a man jump outta his skin?”

Giving Daryl a shark's grin, Hansel agreed cheerfully, “Meine Spatzi has said something to that effect a time or two, ja.”

“Meine Spatzi? Who is Meine Spatzi?”

“My sparrow . . . my fiancee, Maria Hill.” Here there was a small tilt of his lips, as Hansel drawled, “Marina would say that 'she is a hell of a woman.'”

“Seems as though you know a lot of those,” Daryl muttered, returning his attention back to the horse with a shrug. “And meanwhile, I'm stuck with Merle . . . who's an ass.”

“And yet, he ist hyur Bruder. So hyu cannot help but love him.”

The young man grimaced as he argued, “Not much to love about Merle.”

“Which does not mean that it is impossible.”

“Are you sure? Because I'm sure that it is.”

“Then hyu shall not care that the doctor has news for hyu about him, no?”

Whirling in desperation, with eyes widened by fear and concern, Daryl demanded, “What kind of news!?”

“Not the good kind, I should think.” Smiling kindly, Hansel reminded him gently, “But I thought hyu could not find much to love about him.”

Glowering at the gentle reminded, the tracker turned on his heel and ran towards the house. Smirking, Hansel ran a hand down the mare's forelock, crooning, “I am sorry, Kavallerie . . . and I am certain that he vill return to hyu soon.”

When Daryl dashed past the three on the porch and banged into the house, it was to find Vincent Keller seated at the dining room table with Will, the two men conversing quietly with one another. The former soldier blinked at him as he demanded, “What the hell is wrong with my brother?”
There was a long moment of silence, before Vincent smirked lightly and inquired, “Would you like that alphabetically or phonetically?”

If it was even possible, Daryl's eyes only shot open that much wider, earning a small sigh from the Colonel as Will insisted, “How about you start at the beginning and we'll work from there.”

One corner of Keller's lips turned upwards sadly as he nodded once. Looking up at the tracker, he kicked a chair out from the table and gestured to it calmly. “You may want to sit down. This could take awhile.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Gut - Good
(G) meine Tochter - my daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina)
(G) Ja/Nein - yes/no
(G) Bruder - brother (singular form)
(G) Mein Spatzi - my little sparrow (Hansel's nickname for Maria Hill)
(G) mein Adler - my Eagle (Hansel's nickname for his son, Will)
(G) mein Falki - my little Hawk (Hansel's nickname for his son, Clint)
(G) Fraulein - a term of address for an unmarried woman
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel)
(G)
I am SOOOOOO sorry for the long wait between chapters. And in answer to a kind reader, no, I am not dead. Promise.

I just kind of wrote myself into a corner with this arc, and I got soooooooo stuck. But my beta, Julorean is amazing, and combined with having seen both Age of Ultron (which is amazing, and I am totally going to go see it again!) and the new trailer for MI5: Rogue Nation (my beloved Brandt! How do I love thee, let me count the ways!), I have once again become inspired as to this fic. (Hawkeye is the shit in AOU, in case anyone was curious. It was a Hawkeye film, without being called a Hawkeye movie! Yay!)

Anyway, here we are, as always. I hope you guys enjoy this. And as I am already half done with the next chapter, I think I can promise that it will not take this long to post the next chapter after this.

Translations at the end, as always!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 173: Warm Bodies

Dropping heavily into the chair across from the doctor, Daryl's eyes were wide and horrified as he considered the last two things the man had said. “It's bad . . . isn’t it.”

Grimacing sharply, Vincent sighed as he insisted, “Bad may be a bit of an understatement.” Folding his hands, he watched the younger man for a moment before asking, “How did your brother lose his hand?”

Blinking at the question, the tracker gaped for a moment, before shaking himself free of his troubling thoughts. “He cut it off with a hacksaw.” Jerking a thumb over his shoulder, he continued, “Rick handcuffed him to a pipe on a roof and left him there. When I went back for him . . . well, I don't really like to think about what I found. It still makes me sick.”

Frowning fiercely, the former Special Forces soldier demanded, sharply, “When?!”

“Uh . . . maybe a week ago . . . at the most. Why?”

Will sighed as Vincent sagged backwards in disappointment. Folding his arms on the tabletop, he asked calmly, “I'm going to assume that's not what you wanted to hear.”

“Not really,” he huffed, shoving one hand back through his hair.

“What's wrong with my brother?”

“He's suffering from septicimia.”

Hansel and Daryl both looked confused, whereas Will's whole face twisted up in sympathy at the explanation. Vincent gave the Colonel a small smirk in saddened agreement. The former witch hunter was not in the mood for the silent conversations and insisted, “I do not understand. What is septicimia?”

“At its simplest, Dad, it's blood poisoning. Really nasty, usually fatal without medical care, blood poisoning.”

Leaning forward on his elbows, Vincent picked up where S.H.E.I.L.D.'s Chief Analyst left off. “I could give him every antibiotic I have with me, and it would buy him a little bit of time. Considering the fact that we are currently in the middle of a damned zombie apocalypse, however, I really don't want to waste what supplies I do have when it's not going to be of any significant help.”

“What are you saying?”

There was a long moment of silence, before the former ER doctor replied, “I think you know.”

Whatever reaction the other three men were expecting, it was not the one they got. Instead of flying into the expected rage, Daryl only sagged into himself with his head in his hands, before bursting into frustrated, horrified tears.

Say what you wanted about the Grimms – and many had – but the Grimms took care of their own. The Colonel, though infamously uncomfortable around emotional displays that didn't involve his brothers or his partner, immediately stood from his chair and moved to rest one hand on the tracker's shoulder. His father was not so restrained; it was hardly a moment before Hansel was on his knees in front of the sobbing young man and his arms were tight around his shoulders. “Calm, Schässling. It will be all right . . . calm.”

Burying his face into the German's shoulder, Daryl allowed himself the time to grieve for the wreck his world had become, and the pending loss. “He's my brother,” the young tracker sobbed, “the only family I have left.”

Hansel made a thoroughly Gallic noise at this declaration, announcing gruffly, “I would not say that, Schässling. Hyu have Carol and Sophia. Hyu have mein Sohne and meine Tochter, if hyu wish it. And hyur Bruder is not gone yet.”

For a long moment, there was only the sound of Daryl's quiet sobs, before at last the young man sniffed hard and straightened up out of the embrace. “What do I do now?”
Surprisingly, it was Will who spoke now. “You do what needs to be done. You make your peace. And you say your goodbyes. There isn’t much else you can do.”

“Ja . . . and when it is over, hyu gather hyur loved ones close and remind them how much hyu love them,” Hansel agreed, looking up at his eldest son with a warm, significant look.

There was a small, answering smile on the Colonel's lips as he nodded once in acknowledgment at the statement. “If there's one thing I've learned from all the years I've spent in the Army, it's this. Life is too short; every moment is precious and the people we choose to share those moments with infinitely more so.”

Nodding, Daryl pushed himself to his feet. Shoving the heels of his hands into his eyes to push away his tears, he squared his shoulders and turned to face Vincent. “How long does my brother have left?”

“Considering the time since the initial injury, and how far advanced it is . . . maybe another day or so . . . two if he's really stubborn.”

Taking a deep breath, Daryl shoved his hands into his pockets and looked towards the room where Merle had been installed. “I think . . . I think I'm going to go sit with my brother, if that's okay.”

Will's lips quirked slightly as he agreed, “More than fine. We'll call you if we need you, but for right now, spend what time you can with your brother.”

“Thank you,” the younger man murmured, before turning away and disappearing down the hallway.

The three men watched him go before Will spoke, “Someone needs to call S.H.I.E.L.D. We've done our recon . . . but this is an infestation on a scale too big for us. We can deal with the smaller herds that come our way, but we're not going to be able to spread the antidote wide enough with just what we've got.”

Hansel folded his arms over his chest with a grunt, “I can call Spatzi.”

Smirking, the Army officer agreed, “Maria is gonna kick the shit out of this.”

Snorting, the former witch hunter asked, “What does that even mean!?”

Marina's voice was a curious mix of warm amusement and worried concern as she replied from the doorway, “It means, Maria's got this.” Stepping further into the room at the curious eyebrow her partner cocked in her direction, she smirked sadly and continued, “Whatever we’re going to do, we should do it fast. We got company . . . and considering the defensibility of this place, we're practically asking to become the meal at the buffet table.”

There was barely a second before Will was gone and Colonel Grimm had taken his place. Striding to meet her, accepting the offered binoculars as he passed, he demanded, “How many?”

Marina's tone was deferential, as she reported back, “Five so far . . . but I doubt that they're the last ones heading our way.”

Lifting the glasses, Will watched the five zombies go down as Clint and Bucky shot each of them with a dart containing the antidote. Handing the glasses back to his second, Will whistled sharply to draw the attention of his squad. “Everyone inside! Civilians upstairs . . . Grimms in the living room. Two minutes! Move!”

Shoving his way back through the screen door, Will moved toward his own dart gun, ordering his father gruffly, “Call Maria . . . and let her know she might want to put a rush on things. Otherwise, S.H.I.E.L.D. should probably resign itself to kissing their tactical squad goodbye.”

Hansel nodded in grim agreement, watching as his sons and Marina’s Misfits shuffled the survivors into the house and towards the stairs. Pulling his S.H.I.E.L.D. issued phone from his back pocket, he dialed Maria's office number from memory and waited impatiently for her to answer. The sound of her stern, “Hill,” coming down the line was a relief and the German could feel a little of the tension in his shoulders release.

“Spatzi . . .”

“Hans!” was the relieved reply, her tone scolding as she barked, “I was expecting a report yesterday. Where the hell have you been?”

“It is a long story, meine Spatzi. But it believe it will suffice to say, that we are what Clint would call 'up shit creek without a paddle’. We could do with some backup.”

“Should I send medical staff with your backup?”

“Ja . . . once we have separated the dead from the living, there will be many in need of medical services. And Spatzi . . . hurry.”

S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Assistant Director seemed to recognize the rushed, almost frantic note in his tone, her reply brusque as she replied, “Understood. Your backup has been dispatched from our base in Tallahassee and is 20 minutes out. Can you hold that long?”

“We can hold, but the sooner they get here the better.”

There was a moment, as Maria hummed agreeably under her breath, obviously relaying that admonition along the lines, before she spoke again. “Be careful, Hans. And so help me God, if you die . . . I'll resurrect your German ass, kick it to hell and back, and then put as many bullets in it as I can before you die.”

“Yes ma'am,” was the quiet agreement, “Ich liebe dich sehr.”

“Don't you dare say your goodbyes, Johannes Frederick Kuhn. I'm heading for the hanger now . . . I'll see you in five hours. Don't die.”

“It will take more than the undead to kill me, Spatzi . . . I will be waiting.”

There was a moment of silence, during which Hansel thought she'd hung up, before Maria spoke up again, “And Hans . . . I love you too.”

Before he could even register the words, or say anything in reply, the dial-tone rang in his head and his betrothed was gone. “Damn . . . she is a hell of a woman.”

Clint's grin was wide as he crowed, tone teasing, “Dad and Maria . . . sitting in a tree . . . K-I-S-S-I-N-G.”

Hansel couldn't miss the small but playful smile on his eldest's face at his youngest son's good-natured teasing. Resolving to keep that smile on the too-serious Colonel's face for as long as he could, the German shot back fondly, “Clint and Bucky . . .”

The Winter Soldier's visible alarm at this reply sent Will into a burst of laughter, as the former Russian spy interrupted in a panic, “Please, for the love of God, don't finish that sentence!”
The sharp snick! of a bullet being chambered brought everyone's attention around to where Aaron was standing quiet with Marta and Sam. “Orders, big brother? We got incoming and they're moving fast.”

For a second, the Colonel looked disappointed to be called back to work, before his spine straightened and he set his features sternly. “Civilians are to stay upstairs; Sam, you and Vincent are in charge of guarding the stairs.”

“Yes sir,” was Sam's immediately agreement, blue eyes slanting toward his aunt, whose grip on her lover had just tightened considerably.

“Everyone else, find a vantage and get high. Marina, I want you and your sisters here with me; we need to keep them out of the house for as long as we can. Luck . . . I want you . . .”

Owen's face was set as he interrupted sharply, “The only place I'm going is right here. No way in hell am I leaving you.”

“Marina will be here. I'll be fine,” Will argued lightly, his frown bemused as he considered his best friend's refusal.

“The Boss-Lady is super badass, no argument there. But she's going to be focused on zombies, her sisters AND you. No way in hell, Boss . . . I ain't leaving.”

Turning toward his partner searching for support, Will was surprised to see Marina nodding in agreement. “Too many variables, Misha. I'm good . . . not superhuman. I'd feel better knowing that you had more than one pair of eyes on your during this mess.”

Grunting, Will nodded once to concede to the request from his longtime girlfriend. “Everyone in position. Be careful and good hunting.”

Five hours later, Nick Fury and Maria Hill entered the farmhouse to the sight of a well-ordered field hospital. The eldest Grimm was standing off to the side, while Marina fussed calmly over a bandage wrapped around his right hand. The look on his face was one of total contentment, full of fond adoration as the Russian scolded him half-heartedly for the obviously minor injury. Taking in the tableau before him, and noting the relative health of his best team, the Director demanded gruffly, “Damage report, Agent Brandt.”

“No civilian casualties, sir, and only minor injury to Strike Team Misfit.” Looking around, he considered their surroundings before shrugging slightly as he announced, “Situation is contained, sir.”

“And the infected?”

“The antidote is viable, but the infected mortality rate is currently at seventy-two percent and holding. Most of them have just been infected for too long.”

“Good work, Agent. Pass along my congratulations to your team. Transport home is inbound; you all should be on your way to New York within the hour.”

“Thank you, sir, but we can't leave just yet,” came the unexpected argument from the Army officer.

“And why the hell not?”

Twisting slightly, Will stared down the hallway where Merle was being made as comfortable as possible by S.H.I.E.L.D. med-techs while Daryl hovered anxiously, causing the Colonel to sigh heavily. “I can't leave without my whole team, Nick. And one of them just isn't ready to go yet.”

“What the hell happened here, Will?” Maria asked, well remembering the burning piles of dead littering the grounds.

“Frankly, Maria . . . you don't want to know,” was the tired answer, quicksilver eyes sliding closed in bone-deep exhaustion.

Recognizing the haunted look in both Will and Marina’s eyes, the Assistance Director nodded once in silent agreement. “Understood. Get some rack time, guys, you’ve earned it. You all look exhausted.”

Clint’s tone was jovial as he snarked, “Yeah, the zombie apocalypse is not quite all it's cracked up to be. But at least we know we owned its undead ass.”

The middle Grimm didn’t even look up from the surveillance monitors in front of him, as he agreed, “We should put together a list. Things That Tried to Kill the Brothers Grimm and Failed’. Red Room assassins, zombies, 18th Century witches . . .”

“. . . Al Qaeda, Peruvian drug runners . . .” was Will's own input, earning a fond scowl from his partner as she huffed quietly, “Do you have any idea how many grey hairs I have because of you?”

Owen laughed as he looped an arm over her shoulder, wincing as he stretched his bruised ribs. Smirking, he quoted her favorite character from her favorite show. “He takes so much looking after.”

Huffing again, she folded her arms over her chest with a pout, muttering fondly, “Lucky, you have no idea.”

It was about then that they were drawn back into the conversation, just as Brian spoke up. “Let's not forget corrupt Hungarian senators and their lackeys . . .” there was a pause, before he whispered, “. . . and Barney . . .”

It didn't matter that Marina had intended to nip that thought in the bud; everything stopped as Aaron chimed in with his own list, “. . . fucking Alaskan wolves . . . Byer and NRAG . . .”

Sensing the downturn in mood, Maria rolled her eyes as she snarked, “I'm pretty sure that list already exists. In fact, I'm pretty sure that I've seen it. It was unsurprisingly extensive.”

Grinning at his father's girlfriend, Will reached out to link his fingers with his partner's. “And that's even considering the fact, that they probably don't even know about half of the shit that's tried to kill us since our creation.” Pressing a warm kiss to the Russian's temple, he sighed contentedly, “Either way, Maria's right. As of now, we're off duty. Everyone hit your bedrolls while you can; I doubt things will stay this quiet for very long.”

Almost in one voice, each Misfit spoke up, “Agreed.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Schässling - scion (offshoot, offspring, child of a noble house; yeah, Hansel isn’t wasting much time in adopting this one, huh?)
(G) mein Sohne - my sons
(G) meine Tochter - my daughter
(G) Bruder - brother
(G) Spatzi - my little sparrow (Hansel's nickname for Maria Hill)
(G) Ja - yes
(G) Ich liebe dich sehr - I love you so much
Sorry about the long wait everyone! I was working on an Outtake of this verse, called The Bloody Moon. If you haven't read it, it's in the Series tag. If you have, thank you for taking the time to continue exploring this verse with me.

Also, if you haven't read Amerou's fantastic "Fairy Tales" yet, you could get a little confused. Some parts of this chapter directly reference events that happened in "Fairy Tales". I totally recommend it, it's a great piece of work.

Translations, as always, are at the bottom! Enjoy and please comment!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Partners, Lovers, Soulmates...
It would be a long three days, before at last the Grimms were ready to head home.

Merle had languished at the end of his life, verbally berating and endlessly badgering his morose younger brother into all kinds of things. Even Daryl had confessed to a kind of relief when Merle had finally passed in his sleep three days after the zombie apocalypse had ended. Daryl's face had cracked as he announced that it was just like Merle to be a total ass to the very end. Shortly after that, he'd collapsed into Carol's embrace and proceeded to have a very thorough breakdown in her arms.

By that point, the aftermath of the infection – and subsequent Zombie Apocalypse: Take 2 – was pretty much under control. Maria and Fury had brought in a team to clean up the mess and they had done their work admirably. When the Grimms and their team woke the following day, the burning was done, the piles had been cleared away and S.H.I.E.L.D.'s agricultural specialists were well on their way to reseeding and rehabilitating Hershel's property.

Will and Marina had taken Maria aside covertly, to debrief her on the situation with Scarlett Levy and one James Doyle, most recently of S.H.I.E.L.D. The Assistant Director had been briefly horrified at the idea that there could potentially be other Grimms. Her best friend had snickered quietly, knowing that Maria wasn't upset so much about the fact that there could be further victims of the Thaddeus Ross and Project Cahill but more so at the fact that she could barely manage the five Grimms she already had to deal with. More would probably cause her a heart attack.

Nevertheless, Marina's files on the Cahill Project and S.H.I.E.L.D.'s file on Sgt. James Doyle were delivered by Viktoria Coulson the following morning. At that point, Will and Marina had commandeered Hershel's dining room, before herding Hansel, Maria, Fury and Viktoriya inside and sealing the door. “All right, so what are we looking for?” Fury asked, watching his top handler start flipping through one of the operations files on Cahill.

“Anything that could tell us why Sgt Doyle looks like the Cahills,” the Russian announced with a frustrated frown. “Howard had to have written something in the files . . . something that can point us in the right direction.”

Hansel frowned, remembering that his adoptive daughter had been involved with the project through the original project authority. “How long were hyu with Cahill, Tochter?”

“I was 23 when I was assigned to spy on Howard as his personal assistant; Will was born into the program two years later.”

There was a fierce frown on Maria's face as she inquired carefully, “Do you know if they made any prototypes?”

Will's head snapped up at the word, repeating cautiously, “Prototypes?”

“Hansel had been unconscious and in a coma for two centuries. Surely they would have tested the DNA . . . made sure that it was viable for use. Any of them would have been prototypes. And somehow, I don't see Ross letting them get too far away. They may have been useful later.”

The Colonel nodded slowly as he agreed, “It could explain the differences in physical appearance. I doubt they would have cloned them; they were probably born the old fashioned way.”

No one missed the sharp look that passed between Hansel and Maria, or the stricken look on the German's features. Will's eyes narrowed as he watched the two of them, demanding calmly, “What the hell was that look for?”

“Adler . . .” the witch hunter soothed, wincing as Will shoved himself back from the table with a growl. “Don't placate me right now, Dad. What the fuck was that look for!?”

“Gretel . . . she has a son . . . he was born a few years after you. He too was born the 'old-fashioned way’.”

“Der’mo. So not only was Aunt Gretel raped, but we also have a cousin? Who is he? Where is he?” the younger man groaned wretchedly, slouching back into his chair with his face in his hands.

“I do not know. There is only one photograph and he was four years old in it. We have been looking for him since after Dornröschen.”

“Dornröschen? You mean, Austria!? In 1997!? That was almost ten years ago! You've known about him for ten years and you never bothered to say anything!?” He went quiet for a moment, before demanding, “Is that why you went all robot on us!? Because you found out about him!?”

“Adler, please . . . let me explain,” Hansel begged, reaching out to touch his son.

“Don't touch me,” was the low hiss, the Colonel dodging the outstretched hands. “Just leave me alone.”

Watching him storm from the room, Marina flinched as the door slammed closed behind him. “Well, that went well,” she groaned, eyes drifting closed as she groaned. “Vati, why didn't you tell him about this?”

“I was trying to protect him . . . to spare him the worry.”

“Misha doesn't need your protection, Hansel,” was the reply, earning a small wince at the use of his name; Marina hadn't called him anything other than Vati in nearly ten years. “He needs to know that he can trust you. This business is hell on relationships. Trust in the person next to you is all that matters.” Hot chocolate eyes slipped closed as the Russian pinched the bridge of her nose. “I'll talk to him. But this is the second time in as many days where you refrained from telling him something that he should have known. It won't be easy for him to let this go.”

“Second time?” Hansel protested, eyes wide in surprise.

“Da. First, your initial encounter with Sgt Doyle in Austria. Now, this. I promise, he's not really mad, but he is very hurt.” Turning sad eyes on her best friend, she confessed, “And he's not the only one.”

“Marina . . .” the AD protested weakly, eyes wide at the heartache she could see in the other woman's eyes.

Shaking her head sharply to cut off the excuse, Marina insisted coldly, “You should have told me, Maria.”

“Marishka . . . I'm sorry.”

The handler's smile was small and bittersweet as she promised, “I know. But that doesn't change what happened, does it?”

The rest of the contingent watched as the woman turned on her heel and followed her lover from the room. Fury's single eye rotated between the two across from him solemnly, before he sighed heavily. “Seeing as the two of you have been looking for this boy for ten years and haven't yet found him, may I suggest that we get back on track? We have only enough time for one problem at a time, and I think the Case of Sgt Doyle needs to take precedence before we return to New York and return Major Levy back into his arms. Agreed?”

Viktoriya's eyes were shining as she agreed quietly, “Yes sir. I'm sure we would all like to know what is going on here. Not just Will and Marina.”

“Agreed,” was the subdued response from Maria, her eyes clearly showing the wall that she was rebuilding around her heart. Seeing it create itself from her fears and insecurities – they were well hidden, but they were there . . . they always had been – Hansel reached out to squeeze his fiancee's hand, promising solemnly, “It will be all right, Spatzi. Let her calm and then talk to her. Marina understands loyalty above all else; she will understand this.”

“She's my best friend. We've never even fought, Hans. Are you sure she'll forgive me for this?”

“Ja, I am sure. She will listen . . . she just will not listen now. Be patient. Hyu will know when it is time to speak to her.”

Taking a deep breath, and comfort in the thoughtless German, Maria squeezed his hand in agreement, before returning her attention back to the file. “I think we can assume that Doyle is a Cahill prototype. So let's see what we can find out about them.”

“Oh yeah . . . no one ever makes just one prototype. There's always a spare in case the first one breaks down.”

Fury's mouth twisted as he remarked caustically, “Well, that's morbid.”

“But true. And considering the mortality rate in the experimentation that created the son of the Dornröschen, there were probably many attempts and few survivors.”

“Stark was many things, but above all he was a scientist. Even if he was unhappy with the results, or did not agree with what was happening, he would have written down anything and everything to do with Project Cahill . . . including any and all prototypes, regardless of viability. Marina is right; we simply have to figure out where he hid those notes.”

Teal eyes swept the stack of paperwork in front of her with a look of horror in her eyes. “This is going to be like trying to find a needle in a haystack.”

“Then we should probably start looking; this could take awhile,” the blond Amazon sighed, reaching out to pull a stack of files to rest in front of him. “Good luck and good hunting.”

The sentiment was passed around the table in hushed tones, before at last the dining room fell silent as the four dove head first into the traumatizing past of the Brothers Grimm and their heretofore unknown older siblings.

When Marina exited the dining room, her first and only thought was for her lover. She caught sight of a familiar blond head sitting outside on the porch and made a beeline towards him. “Sammy-honey . . . have you see Misha go by this way?”

“Yeah, he went storming that way like there was hell on his heels. Owen went after him,” he promised at the concern on her face. “What happened? Is everything okay?”

“No . . . everything is not okay, but it will be.” Crouching beside him, she cupped his cheek in her palm and brushed her thumb tenderly over his jaw. “You look tired Sammy . . . go on and lay down. At this point we're just waiting on the chopper to arrive; nothing needs doing and even if it did, we are off duty. No longer our problem.”

“Are you sure? I don't want to be a complete waste of space.”

“Malyshe, you're still recovering from getting bit, the fever, the infection . . . no one is going to blame you for getting some rest so that you can finish healing up. And anyone that does, can answer to me. I'm in the mood to kill something; I'm pretty sure that at this point I wouldn't even have any qualms about killing one of our own people.”

Chuckling, the blond wrinkled his nose at her as he teased, “Liar . . . you make not care right away but you'd feel guilty about it once you'd done it.”

Narrowing her eyes at him playfully, “Hush you.” Busing a haphazard kiss across the apple of his cheek, she straightened up once again. “Go on inside and get something to eat and then go lay down. That's an order . . . you need the food and the rest more than anyone else here.”

“Yes ma'am,” the young man agreed, pushing himself slowly to his feet and arching backwards to release the strain in his spine. “I hope Will's okay . . . whatever's wrong.”

“I'll handle Misha . . . you worry about yourself for awhile.” Squeezing his forearm, she promised, “I'll come check on you a little later, okay?”

“Sure. See you in a bit, Ma.”

Marina had already started to walk off in the direction her lover had taken, but skidded to a stop in surprise at the term. Whirling, she watched him blush to the roots of his hair as he stammered slightly, “That wasn't . . . I didn't . . . Sorry?”

“For what?” she asked gently, winking fondly, “I liked hearing it.”

Scrubbing at the back of his neck with his fingernails, Sam promised, “I liked saying it.”

“Then say it as often as you want, and we'll both be happier for it,” she insisted, blowing him a quick kiss before rotating on her heel to dash off again.

She found Owen first, concealed carefully in the trees, keeping an eye on her lover as the older man raged at the trees around him. Laying a gentle palm on the point of his shoulder, the Russian asked in a whisper, “How long has he been yelling?”

“You were, but Vati sometimes forgets that Misha is a grown man and he does not require a father in the same way that his brothers do. Misha has been father, friend, brother, and confidant for all of them since he was 12.”

“Marina . . . what happened?”

“We found out some intel that Hansel had kept hidden from us for about ten years . . . intel that could have prevented the whole confusion about Major Levy and alerted us to the presence of Sgt Doyle a decade ago.” Turning her attention back onto where her lover had stilled and stood motionlessly on the other side of the clearing, his arms folded tightly over his chest and eyes closed quietly, she sighed. “As you can see, he's not taking it well. But no matter what, we'll work it out.”

Owen’s tone was fond as he replied, “You always do. You two are a hell of a team . . . and I am proud to be a member of your squad.” Nodding his head in the Colonel's direction, the former Guardian asked, “You want me to stick around while you talk to him? Or are you okay if I head back to camp?”

“We'll be all right. Whatever else is going on, I think this is one conversation Misha will be happier having without an audience.”

Nodding, Owen offered a fist and smirked as Marina replied with the requisite fist-bump. “Take care of him.”

“Always,” she promised, eyes glued to her lover's form as she considered how best to approach the conversation that they both clearly needed to have.

Dimly, the Russian woman was aware of the rustling of the leaves and the soft steps moving away that indicated the younger man had left the two alone. As it was, however, all of Marina's focus was on her partner . . . and she knew even without seeing his face . . . her partner needed her at that moment more than he needed any of her other alter-egos. The Gadyuka was unnecessary at the moment; as was Agent Marina Petrovka and the Lt Colonel; above all, Will needed his Marishka . . . and if there was one thing Marina excelled at, it was giving her partner exactly what he needed.

Stepping out into the clearing, the Russian watched her partner's shoulders tighten in consternation. With his back to her, any sudden movements were unexpected and cause for concern. It wouldn't take more than a quarter of a second for Will to spin and put her on the ground if he was of a mind to. Closing her eyes, Marina stepped further into the center, leaving herself open and vulnerable on all sides, consciously mirroring her partner's emotional being with her own physical being. “Mishka? Are you okay?”

There was a long moment before Will shook his head in negation of the question. “What are we gonna do, Marina? I have a cousin . . . what the fuck are we gonna do?”

“We're gonna take Scarlett home to her boyfriend . . . and then we're going to find him.”

“You promise?” he asked, accepting her arms around his waist as he dropped his head back to rest his crown against her forehead.

Based on what little Marina could see, it was apparent that Will was avoiding looking at her directly. Whether that was because he was embarrassed by his reaction to his father's news or because he was so angry he could not hold it in, even around her, it did not matter. She tightened her arms around his waist as she went up on tiptoes to press an adoring kiss to the nape of his neck. Standing there with her lips pressed to his skin, she swore fervently, “I promise.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Tochter - daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina)
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for his eldest son, Will)
(R) Der'mo - shit
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel, her adoptive father)
(R) Da - yes
(G) Spatzi - little sparrow (Hansel's nickname for his fiancee, Maria Hill)
(G) Ja - yes
(R) malysh - kid(do)
(R) Gadyuka - Viper (Marina's call sign given to her by the Krasnaya Komnata and the Akademiya upon graduation)
(R)
Hello all! I hope you enjoyed your Fourth of July, regardless of where you're from. Here's a new chapter, and I hope you all continue to enjoy where this is going.

No translations this chapter. ENJOY!

Chapter 175: Bittersweet Reunions

The plane touched down on base and Jason blinked to see a familiar redhead standing next to the S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued SUV. Casey wore the typical security uniform – black tactical cargoes and black t-shirt with a pair of holstered pistols under one arm and on the other hip – and some part of Jason was having trouble reconciling the picture before him with the wounded detective and partner he'd left behind.

A thought struck him and he whirled to glare at his older brother and sister. “Since when did Casey join S.H.I.E.L.D.?”

The Russian's head snapped up from where she was resting against her lover, looking exhausted. She looked as though she had been buried in Grimms at some point in the flight. Sam was sleeping on the bench next to her, his head in her lap, as she smoothed tender fingers through sunny hair. Clint was seated on the ground in front of her, leaning back against her calves as he chatted with Aaron and Marta where they sat on the other side of the tiny cargo hold; a Quinjet the plane was not.

“As though you didn't know, Marina . . . be honest,” the tech specialist snapped angrily, eyes narrowed at his sister.

Seeing his partner's distress at the accusation, Will protested solemnly, “I can assure you, Jay, neither Marina nor I had anything to do with Casey's recruitment.”

His father's girlfriend's tone was approaching smug as she interrupted whatever Jason had been about to say, insisting, “No . . . but I did.”

Marina's only response to that was an eyebrow cocked in question, even as Jason exploded at her furiously, “You did what!? Why the fuck!?”

The Assistant Director said nothing, simply leaning over to fish a manila folder out of her carry-all. Offering it to him with a smile, she explained, “I was hoping that by having Casey Shraeger with S.H.I.E.L.D., it would make it easier for you to accept our offer.”

Green eyes narrowed suspiciously, as he parroted, “Offer?”

“Yes . . . head of Research and Development.”

“Head of R&D? You mean, Department Head of R&D!?” he blurted, eyes flashing wide in shock as he took the folder mechanically.

“You were never officially attached to R&D. But even the freelance work you did with them was better than anything R&D has come up with since you left S.H.I.E.L.D. altogether. We would like you to come back and put the department back to rights; full benefits, contract, all the bells and whistles.”

“Wait . . . what about Daniels? He's DH of R&D.”

Maria's smirk was bitter as she replied, “Daniels is opting to take advantage of his early retirement clause in his contract.”

Will's mouth curved as he inquired lightly, “Opting to? Or being volun-told to?”

“Fury told him that he could opt out of his contract and enjoy the retirement package or he could be released without any kind of package at all. He's rather lost all patience with the man.”

Brian's chuckle was quiet and angry as he remarked, “He's not going to be missed by any of the agents I know, that I can guarantee.”

“None of the shit his guys put in circulation ever works right the first time,” Bucky sneered in agreement, well remembering the tablet that had malfunctioned in Macedonia during an assignment he and Clint had had on. (They had celebrated their success early and it had been awesome, but still, if the damn thing had just worked right, they could have celebrated in an actual bed and would probably not have been recorded through the whole damn thing.)

Jason folded his arms over his chest as he narrowed his eyes at the Assistant Director. “So why Casey?”

“Officially, she'll be your partner. Unofficially, she'll be your security. Daniels had personal security, so will you. Comes with the job.”

“Why? It's not like I really need the protection.”

Will spoke up in answer then, “All department heads have personal security. Last thing S.H.I.E.L.D. wants is a DH to fall into enemy hands, when a guard can – and typically does – prevent that.”

“Even you and Marina?”

“Marina is my security; so is Owen, if Marina’s not available. And Vika is technically security for both Marina and Phil, with Nika as back-up if both of them are out and about at the same time.”
Flipping open the folder, Jason skimmed the text curiously. “What about field work?”

“Strictly voluntary only, with the understanding that Casey or other appropriate security goes with you.”

“And I have complete discretion? Total control over my department?”

“Just don’t go in and fire everyone right off the bat. But essentially yes.”

“Awesome. I’ll give them two weeks to show me what they can do and then I’ll start laying people off that aren’t pulling their weight.”

“Does that mean you’ll accept the job?” Marina asked with wide curious eyes.

“I don’t know. I need to talk to Casey first.”

“I didn’t trick or deceive her into the job, Jason,” the AD protested with a roll of her eyes. “I promise.”

“And for the most part, I know that. I just need to be sure,” was the reply, before the engines shut down and the cargo doors began to open.

Casey’s face lit up at the sight of her boyfriend coming down the ramp, calling playfully, “Hey good looking!”

Unable to resist her goofy smile, he grinned in reply as he scooped her up and swung her around. “Hey sexy . . .” he teased, fingering one of her holsters, “. . . I like the uniform.”

Casey had worked with Jason for a months. And based on his tone, the redheaded young woman knew that they were having a totally different conversation than his words implied. Cupping his cheeks in her palms, she promised solemnly, “I do too.” Hey lips twisted slightly as she insisted, “I chose this job of my own free will. Besides, you don’t like keeping things from me.”

Jason blinked, visibly surprised that she’d managed to figure that out already. Smirking, Casey chuckled, “Now you don’t have to. We have the same security clearance.”

“But what about the Second? You became a detective to piss off your parents.”

“To the shock of absolutely no one, this job actually promotes the same levels of distaste for my life choices as my career as a detective. Yay me!”

“I thought we talked about this . . . you make excellent life choices,” he joked, a wide grin on his face in response to the smirk that crossed her lips.

Reaching up, she tangled her hands in the collar of his t-shirt and hauled him down for a fiery kiss, murmuring, “Damn right I do,” against his mouth before he wrapped her up and proceeded to devour her.

Marina and Will appeared at their sides, Will's arms slung carelessly over his partner's shoulders as he teased, “So does this mean, you're going to take the job?”

“What was the rule on fraternization again?”

“Doesn't matter if you're in an established relationship with another agent at the time of recruitment,” the Colonel replied with a grin and a squeeze to his own lover's shoulders.
"Good. Because I plan to be doing a lot of fraternizing tonight," Jason insisted with a comical leer, earning giggles from Casey and a roll of the eyes from his siblings.

"You're a dork," was Clint's laughing response, as he swung himself into one of the SUV's with Bucky climbing in right behind him.

"Shut up, Fanboy."

"James Bond is awesome! If I have to be a fanboy over someone, at least it's him!" was the petulant rejoinder, causing his brothers to laugh and roll their eyes at the usual defense.

Handing Marina into the SUV, Will turned back and offered his younger brother his hand.
"Welcome back, Jay . . . we've missed you."

********************

It hadn't been that long ago that Doyle was standing outside the Director's door, barely more than a week. He'd gone more than a decade without ever being called into the presence of God and now here he was again, standing at that same door, trying to figure out where the hell he'd fucked up.

Taking a deep breath and squaring his shoulders, Doyle raised his hand and knocked firmly on the wood paneling. There was a moment's pause, before Fury's voice boomed, "Come!"

Opening the door, he moved inside and dropped effortlessly into attention, inquiring calmly, "You wanted to see me, sir?"

"At ease, sergeant. You're not in trouble," the man insisted, with an amused smirk on his lips. "The team I sent to Georgia got back this morning. They had something with them that I believe belongs to you."

"Belongs to me, sir? I don't understand."

There were teeth in the corners of Fury's grin as he gestured toward the corner of the room behind him. "You can come out now, Major."

"Yes sir."

The voice that answered him felt like a blow to Doyle's solar plexus, the air leaving his lungs as he whirled to face its owner. And there she stood, the woman of his dreams. One hand lifted to trace the contours of her face, fingers moving through the air centimeters from her skin, terrified that this was just another dream and trying to touch her would make her disappear once again. He jolted as her hand came up to fold around his, shocked to his core at the touch he'd been missing for a decade.

Khaki green eyes widened as she pulled his hand to her cheek, forcing the appendage to mold along the curve. Throat suddenly very dry, he gasped out, "Scar? Are you real!?"

There were tears in her eyes as she nodded soundlessly, stammering out, "Yeah, Doyle . . . I'm real."

The sound of her voice brought everything into focus and suddenly, his hands were in the hair at her temples and he was hauling her up to his lips for their first kiss in ten years. A sob reverberated through his ears, and to be honest, he couldn't tell who had released it. All he knew was that his Scar was back in his arms and there was no way in hell he was ever going to let her go ever again.

Resting his forehead against hers, his fingers still locked in her hair, he sighed, "I love you . . . damn, I love you."

She was murmuring her own reply against his lips, burying herself in his embrace and just as clearly unwilling to let him go. Wrapping her up in his embrace, he turned to face the director. “Thank you, sir.”

“You shouldn't thank me . . . you should thank the Colonel and his team.”

“Absolutely. Just tell me where to find him. I owe him a huge favor.”

The voice that spoke up then sent tremors down Doyle's spine as another two forms materialized from the same corner Scarlett had emerged from, the woman standing to the left and behind the speaker. “I'm right here. And I would be very interested in collecting on that favor.”

It was kind of like looking in a funhouse mirror. There was just enough distortion that they weren't identical, but there was a more than definite resemblance between the two men. The two men stood at about the same height, though the Colonel's hair was blond and Doyle's was dark. Their features were more than a little similar, enough to send a frisson of unease down Doyle's spine at the realization that in any other life, they probably could have been twins. The Colonel was a little younger than he was, maybe four or five years at the most, but that did little to diminish the confident set of his shoulders and the sense of competence in command that practically exuded from his pores. This was not a man who had any doubts about who and what he was; and some part of Doyle knew that he was about to get a crash course in the details of his own past.

“You have no idea how grateful I am to you right now. I'll do anything you want . . . anything.”

The younger man's lips quirked as he agreed, “I was hoping you'd say that. How about we start with everything you know about the Project Cahill and the children it made?”

At the name of the project his parents had been attached to before his birth, Doyle's eyes flashed wide. “How the fuck do you know about Cahill?”

The Colonel's mouth twisted bitterly for a moment, before he replied solemnly, “I would be one of its children.”

Feeling his heart stammer in his chest at the response, knowing what that meant about himself, Doyle breathed, “Fuck.”

“Indeed.”
Chapter Notes

I am on a roll! Woot!

Translations are few, but there. At the end as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 176: Highway to Hell

About ten minutes later, Will settled himself into his office chair, his Marina taking her usual seat curled up on the corner of the desk while Scarlett and Doyle took their places in his guest seats. “All right, how about we do introductions first, before we get too deeply into the details?” the Russian woman asked, twisting slightly to look back at her partner with a small grin.

“Sounds like a plan,” he agreed, slouching back in his chair calmly. “My name is Will Brandt and this is my partner, Marina Petrovka. Marishka runs the handler pool with Agent Coulson and I’m Chief Analyst for S.H.I.E.L.D.”

The sniper’s mouth twisted slightly as he shrugged one shoulder, “James Doyle; I’m a sergeant for S.H.I.E.L.D.’s tactical units here. I typically lead Echo Team. Most people call me Doyle though; too many Jameses in the world.”

“Agreed,” was Marina’s laughing response, well remembering another James she knew who preferred to answer to another name. “And of course, we know Scarlett.”

“So let's get to the details,” Will insisted, leaning forward to fold his arms atop his desk. “What do you know about Cahill?”

“I don't really know a lot. The only reason I even know about it, is because my parents were involved with Cahill for awhile after I was born.”

“What did your parents do with Cahill?”

“Nothing as far as I'm aware.” Taking a deep breath, Doyle ran a hand back through his closecropped hair. “My parents were career military. My father was a petty officer with the Marine Corps and my mother was a CMO on his ship; that's how they met. He got hurt in a fight on deck and she was the one that patched him up. Mom used to joke that it was 'love at first brawl'."

Scarlett's lips curled upwards as she joked, “That sounds familiar.”

He cracked a smile in her direction, obviously well acquainted with whatever inside joke she was referencing. “In my own defense, I was really really drunk that night.”

“I remember,” she agreed with a roll of her eyes. “Didn't stop you from trying to flirt with me though, did it?”

“Liquid courage, Scar . . . only way I was going to have the balls to tell you how hot I thought you were.”

It was obvious to the other two in the room that they had been forgotten, earning a small smile from Marina as she glanced back over her shoulder at her lover. Will gave her a small sad grin, indicating that she was not the only one remembering their own less than conventional first time . . . which, contrary to popular belief, had not been outside her prison cell inside the Pentagon when he was 26. Returning the gesture, she reached up to fiddle with the pendant of the necklace she wore as she cleared her throat pointedly.

Visibly startled, Doyle tore his attention away from his girlfriend and back on the two senior officers in front of him. “Sorry . . . I totally just lost track of where I was.”

“Dangerous habit for a spy,” Will reminded him, earning a flash-fire grin as Doyle insisted, “Not a spy, thank God. I don't have the temperament or the patience for it. I run the tactical teams . . . I'm much more of a 'punch you in the face' kind of guy than a 'sneak up behind you and choke you to death' one.”

“Crude, but mostly accurate,” Marina chuckled, with a roll of her eyes.

Grinning at his partner, Will returned his attention back on Doyle, “How did your parents get involved with Cahill? Were they assigned?”

“No, they were having trouble conceiving. It was advertised as a fertility service for qualified members of the Armed Forces. Twelve months later, my parents had me.”

Quicksilver eyes settled on a steely-gray as the implications of that began to take form in his mind. “Do you know how many other couples there were?”

“Some. My parents made friends with a few of the other couples during the post-natal portion of the service.” His mouth twisted slightly, as he insisted, “For a fertility clinic, they had a high number of stillbirths and miscarriages. I think my parents were one of the only ones to actually conceive and bring to term.”

“How many other couples had children? Do you know?”

“Four? Maybe five . . . but I'm pretty sure it was just the four of them and my parents.”

“Do your parents know what Cahill was?”

“They found out at the very end.”

“How?”
“The clinic authority gave them an option. They could sign nondisclosure agreements and keep the rights to the kids they had, or they could forfeit their children to the Project Cahill and try to have another child at some other clinic.” Shrugging haphazardly, he concluded, “They all opted to sign, take their kids and go. I know my parents chose not to re-up when their re-enlistments came due, so whatever happened . . . they didn't like it.”

“Is there anyway you could get your parents to tell you the names of those other couples?”

Doyle blanched slightly, one hand coming up to rub at the back of his neck, as he confessed, “I don't talk to my parents much any more. They didn't approve of my joining Delta Force.”

Marina frowned at the statement, unable to imagine not being proud of any one of her boys for that kind of achievement. Delta Force wasn't exactly a walk in the park. Just being eligible to go through training was a hell of a thing to achieve, let alone actually lasting through the training itself. “I'm sorry. For what it's worth, that's awesome. Delta Force is pretty badass.”

“Thank you,” he replied, one hand coming up to trace over his forearm. His sleeve obscured the skin, but the Russian was more than sure that under the fabric he had the trademark red dagger of Delta Force inked there.

“Do you remember anything about the other families? Names? Kids' names? Anything?”

“I was really young the last time I saw any of them,” Doyle replied, mouth twisting in disappointment. “I think one couple's last name was Maitland, one was Gregor, one was James and the other was something Greek. Stephan . . . something.”

The S.H.I.E.L.D. handler twisted to look at her partner. “Is that enough to track them down?”

“Yeah. If Ross was touting it as a fertility clinic open only to couples in the Armed Forces, the clinic would have had to keep pretty meticulous records. I should be able to backtrack through the files and come up with their names.” Turning back to Doyle, Will cocked an eyebrow. “And that's it? That's all you remember?”

“Like I said, my parents found out what Cahill was and they booked it. As far as I know, they have never violated their NDA . . . ever. Either they just wanted to forget they were ever involved or the clinic authority scared the shit out of them enough to make sure that they didn't talk. Either way, they've never said much about it. The only reason I even know what happened there is because I was a nosy little shit, and I will confess to eavesdropping on my parents a lot when I was a kid.”

Marina's smirk grew as she teased, “You sure you're not interested in being a spy?”

“Yeah, pretty sure,” he chuckled, glancing over to where Scarlett Levy was watching the conversation silently. “You okay, Scar?”

“So if this was a fertility clinic . . . why do you and the Colonel look so much alike?”

Marina's mouth compressed as she wrapped her arms around her knee. “I think I can answer that one. Misha and I are fairly certain that instead of helping to implant the woman's egg with her husband's sperm, they used sperm from the same genetic donor they used to clone the Cahills. It was a test run, to make sure that the genetic material was even viable for cloning.”

“Which makes us half-brothers . . . in a weird, roundabout way,” Will announced with a frown. “So, welcome to the family, I guess?”

Doyle slumped back into his chair, arms coming up to fold over his chest. “Fuck . . . this is actually happening, isn't it? It's not some fucked up dream.”

“Unfortunately, no . . . this is not a dream. I'm sorry.”

“Don't be. It's been awhile since I actually had a family I could tell what I do for a living.”

The Russian smirked as she considered that, teasing her lover, “I can see where that would have some appeal.”

“Yeah yeah. You hush,” he mocked with a wink.

“Am I missing something?”

“Inside joke,” Marina laughed, wrinkling her nose at her partner playfully, before jumping off the corner of the desk. “All right. I recognize that look in your eye. I've got dinner to make and you've got research to do, so I will get out of your hair.” Turning back to the other couple, she cocked an eyebrow, “Do you need quarters, Major?”

Scarlett's eyes were wide as she looked up at Doyle, clearly uncertain as to the answer to that. Doyle's head shook firmly as he wrapped his arm around her waist, insisting, “No thank you, ma'am. Scar'll be just fine with me.”

“All right. Let me know if that changes.”

“We will,” the pretty science officer promised, even as she linked her fingers in her boyfriend's and let him lead her out of Will's office.

Watching them go, Marina hummed lightly under her breath as she considered them. “I don't think they realize how hard this is going to be for them. Ten years is a long time, Misha.”

Will looked up at her with a small smile, most of his attention clearly on his laptop as he promised, “They still love each other. They'll figure it out.”

“Hm . . . is that romanticism I sense in your answer?” she teased, leaning forward over the desk, her weight resting on her palms.

“I have been known to indulge in the random romantic moment, now and again,” he reminded her with a small grin.

“Touche,” she laughed, leaning forward further to press a warm kiss to his lips. “Any requests for dinner?”

“As long as you made it, it'll be perfect.”

“I love you,” she sighed, one hand coming up to trace fondly over his jaw.

“And I love you. I'll be home soon, I promise.”

“I'm gonna hold you to that. I have designs on your ass tonight, Colonel . . . don't be late.”

“No ma'am. I'll figure out who these couples are and then I'll be home. An hour . . . tops.”

“All right. See you at home.”

Will nodded in agreement, eyes a warm and sunny blue as they watched her sashay her way from his office, before disappearing completely from his sight once passed the door frame. There was a small smile on his lips as he turned his attention back onto his laptop.

Marina Ivanovna Petrovka was a hell of a woman and he was one lucky man.

The Russian woman would never admit it, but the sound of her front door opening a little more than an hour later caused a deep sigh of relief. Her Misha was well known for getting lost in his research; she well remembered having to drag him out of his office after a 36 hour research bender. She could hear him slipping out of his fatigue jacket and dropping his bag onto the bench beside the door, as well as the jingle of his keys as they hit the bowl next to the door. “Marishka?” he called cautiously, seeking her out audibly before going in search of her.

“In the kitchen!” she called in reply, twisting to look back at him as he moved to trap her up against the counter, his front pressed full length against her back. “Hm . . . feeling affectionate, are we?”

Bending his head, he pressed a sweet kiss to his favorite spot on her neck, a gentle hum vibrating through his lips. “Have I thanked you lately . . . for everything you did for the boys while we were stuck at the Hoover Base?”

Blinking in surprise at the question, Marina leaned over to look up into his eyes with a frown. “What brought this on?”

“I was going through those damned files, trying to pinpoint these couples, and I just . . . it was all there in black and white. Everything you did to protect my brothers when I wasn't able to. I just . . . I needed to make sure you knew how grateful I was for that.”

Lifting her hand to cup his cheek, she pulled him down for a warm kiss, forcing them both to take their time. “I would do it all over again . . . every second . . . so long as it led us right back to this moment,” he promised, pressing his forehead tightly to hers. “Te adoro.”

“Te adoro amica,” she promised, twisting in his arms to be able to embrace him fully, her chin tilted upwards to receive his kiss once again.

The familiar sound of Clint gagging broke the two apart, earning a giggle from the Russian as the second youngest Grimm joked, “At least they're not necking against the fridge again.”

“I'm not sure this doesn't count,” Jason insisted, coming further into the room as he moved to grab a beer from the refrigerator.

Chuckling, Marina turned back to her spaghetti sauce, stirring it one last time before snapping off the stove and moving toward the cupboard to retrieve a bowl. “All right . . . unless you'd like to cook for yourselves tonight, I suggest you stop cracking wise and start setting the table, huh?”

“Yes ma'am,” was the cheerful reply, as both Sam and Aaron moved to get the plates and glasses from their respective cupboards as Clint fished in the drawers for silverware.

After everyone was in their seats, Marina looked up from her plate and asked, “So . . . were you able to find them?”

“Yes. There were five couples in total; they each had a son. James Doyle, son of Petty Officer Matthew Doyle and his wife, Lt. Stephanie Doyle. Angus Maitland, son of Corporal Derek Maitland and his wife PFC Melinda Maitland. William James, son of First Lieutenant Thomas James and his wife Mary. Dillon Stephanowski, son of Master Sergeant Marcus Stephanowski and his wife Patricia. And lastly, Saul Gregor, son of Taylor Gregor and his wife, Captain Nina Gregor.”

Marina frowned at the information, though it was Aaron who spoke up first, “Do we know anything about them?"

"Locations, mostly. Except for William James and James Doyle, none of the others ever joined the military. Maitland was a firefighter in Minnesota, before he quit and went to work in construction. Gregor's from Missouri, but I can't get any information on him that's not ten years old. Stephanowski is married and lives in Los Angeles; he works in a garage out there. Doyle's parents still live in Modesto, but Doyle lives here on base. He apparently hasn't spoken to them in a little over twelve years. And James grew up in sunny Tallahassee; he's a Sergeant First Class with the Army's bomb squads. I think this is his third consecutive tour; he's not married and not close to his parents."

"Married to the Army, huh?" Marta asked quietly, a small smile on her face as she nudged her blushing nephew.

"From the looks of things, yes. He's crazy, but he's good."

"So what do we do about them?" Jason asked cautiously, leaning forward on his forearms as he watched his brother and sister consider the question.

"From what I can tell, none of them have any idea about Cahill, except for Doyle. And even Doyle admits that the only reason he even knows is because he was a 'nosy little shit' . . . his words, not mine."

"Which means that they probably wouldn't appreciate an all new family crash-landing into their lives," Casey pointed out, around a bite of spaghetti.

Marina frowned as she fiddled with her fork. "Personally, I think we should at least check in on them. Keep our distance absolutely, but at the very least, we should see if there's anything we can do to make their lives a little easier."

Brian's nod was slow as Clint agreed, "I can agree with that."

"Marina should go . . . any of us go, and the cat's out of the bag," Aaron commented, looking over at his sister with a small frown on his lips.

"I'll agree that Marina should go, but I don't want her going alone."

"You can't leave, Misha . . . you're Chief Analyst. This could take weeks. And besides, I know that you want to find that kid Vati told you about."

Will took a deep breath, quicksilver eyes scanning the table, before suggesting, "What about Sam?"

The blond jolted upright in surprise, blue eyes flashing back and forth between the two officers. "Me!?"

"You're going to need to be in Toronto in about a month. You can go with Marina on her road trip, and she can get you settled in Toronto on her way home."

Sam's eyes were solemn as he asked, "You'd trust me to look after her? After what happened to Ben?"

"Absolutely; Aaron's right, none of us can go. And of the rest of the options I have, I trust you most. So . . . what do you think? Up for a cross-country trip?"

Sam turned his gaze onto Marina, watching the woman smile at him reassuringly. "I promise . . . it'll be fun. If you want, we can even do some touristy stuff. Los Angeles is pretty close to Hollywood . .
Biting his lips, he nodded with a sheepish grin, “Yeah . . . sounds like fun.”

“All right . . . I’ll make the arrangements. Let's plan on you two heading out within the next two days. Sound like a plan?” Will inquired, sipping on his whiskey as he looked between the two solemnly.

Marina’s sigh was heavy, even as she agreed, “Sounds like a plan.” Cocking an eyebrow, she insisted, “As long as you promise to self-medicate every once in awhile. Not even you can go a month without sleep, Mishka.”

Chuckling, the Colonel vowed, “I promise. I know where the Ambien is.”

“Good. Remember to use it while I'm gone.”

“Deal,” he laughed, leaning over to press a warm kiss to the curve of her jaw.

There was a long silence, before at last Marta chimed in, “So . . . how about the Yankees?”

Almost simultaneously there was a groan around the table, before Clint insisted, “We don't root for the Yankees.”

“You don’t?”

“We're really more into football,” Brian laughed, winking at his brother's girlfriend.

“So . . . Giants fans?”

The looks of disgust on each of the boys' faces sent Marina into a fit of giggles and for the rest of the night, Project Cahill and the upcoming road trip was forgotten.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(Latin) Te Adoro - I adore you
(Latin) To adoro amica - I adore you too.
See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 177: Road Trip

Marina's eyes slipped closed as she leaned back against the seat, the wind creating havoc in her hair as Sam guided the Charger off the highway at their exit. “So . . . last stop before Toronto. Beaver Creek, Minnesota, home to one Angus Maitland.”

Sam chuckled as he downshifted, rolling to a stop at a red light as he joked, “What kind of parent names their kid ‘Angus’?”

The Russian's lips twisted as she joked, “What kind of sister names her baby brother 'Francis’?”

“Last I checked, Francis was Clint's middle name . . . not his first one.”

“Eh . . . semantics,” she agreed, with a grin. Reaching under the seat, she pulled out the file folder with everything that her partner had been able to compile on the second youngest Cahill prototype and flipped it open. “All right . . . let's see what we've got. Angus Maitland, 42 years old. Used to be a firefighter before a house fire that killed an entire family. Neither his team nor his captain knows why, but something happened and he quit the next day.”

There was a soft hum as the sniper inquired, “How long had he been a firefighter?”
“Almost fifteen years. Apparently, it hadn't been their first rough call, which was why it was such a shock when he quit.”

“Which means something must have happened. There had to have been a catalyst. You don't just quit something you love doing for no reason.” The speculative look on Marina's face caused Sam to blush as he insisted, “I would know, wouldn't I?”

“Yeah . . . I guess you would at that,” she agreed with a small smile, reaching out to smooth one hand through the close-cropped blond hair. “Whatever the reason . . . he's been in therapy for the last year with Dr Carla Chuang.”

“Something definitely happened . . . he didn't say anything?”

“All he told his captain was that he couldn't do it anymore,” she replied, continuing to flip through the folder.

Turning into the lot of the little motel they'd be staying in during their stay, Sam hummed as he maneuvered the car into a space and guided the car into park. “We'll figure it out, Ma. I promise.”

Tapered fingers trailed over the face in the picture as she sighed, “I don't know why . . . but this one is getting to me. He reminds me of Misha.”

“Does that mean we're going to be hanging out for awhile?”

Grinning at him, she winked playfully, “Guess we'll find out. We've got another two weeks before you have to report to SRU HQ in Toronto. That gives us about a week and a half, before we should head out of town.”

“Sounds like more than enough time to me,” Sam agreed, as he dug their bags out of the trunk and followed Marina to the office.

“How do you figure?”

“Well . . . it took you like three seconds to adopt me,” he teased, leaning sideways to brush a quick kiss over her cheek.

“Good point,” she giggled, looping her arm through his. “Come on . . . I'm sure Misha is anxious for a sit rep.”

Eery blue eyes narrowed cautiously as he asked, “About that . . . how are you doing? It's been about three weeks since we left home.”

The Russian's mouth twisted ruefully as she confessed, “I miss him . . . and I am beyond ready to go home.” Hitching up her bag onto her shoulder, she shook her head firmly, “But, when duty calls, I know where I should be.”

Slinging his arm around her shoulders, he pressed a warm kiss to her temple. “Maybe this place will have semi-decent WiFi and we can Skype him.”

“Here's hoping. I'd like to see his face with my own eyes. It's a lot easier for him to lie to me, if I can't see how he's doing for myself.”

Squeezing her lightly, Sam moved to the check-in counter as the clerk left the office behind the desk. “Hi . . . I'm Sam Peterson . . . I believe we have a reservation here.”
The teenager popped her gum, clearly bored, even as she turned to the computer. “Sam and Mary? Yep . . . you want the honeymoon suite?”

The handler's laughter was explosive as Sam made a face. “She's my sister . . . two queens would be great. Thank you.”

“Ah . . . what's the matter, Pookie? Embarrassed to be seen with me already?” the Russian teased, crinkling her nose at him and dodging the halfhearted smack with a giggle.

“You're hilarious,” he drawled, with a roll of his eyes, as he corralled her around the neck with his elbow.

She grinned at him brightly, twisting out from under him and dashing away with her duffel bag thumping against the back of her knees. Sam growled, hauling his own bag across his chest and dashing after her. “You're dead, Petrovka!” he called in an undertone, watching her sprint across the parking lot towards their room.

“Gotta catch me first!” she taunted in reply, spinning on the balls of her feet before putting on another burst of speed at the sight of her boy catching up. “Der'mo!” she swore with a giggle, throwing herself into a backspin and just barely managing to dodge Sam's grab.

The two laughed together as they sparred playfully outside of their hotel room. Finally, Marina managed to grab hold of Sam's wrist and throw her thighs up around his neck, taking them both down with a well placed twist of her body. Thumping her heel lightly into the center of his chest, she rolled backwards over her shoulder and got to her feet. Grinning at the sight of Sam trying to catch his breath, she crouched and asked cheerfully, “Best two out of three?”

Rolling onto his side, Sam groaned as he curled up around his bruised solar plexus. “No thanks. I think I'm just going to lie here and nurse my pride for a bit.”

Leaning over to haul him up, she laughed, “There's a bed inside for that . . . I promise, it'll be a lot more comfortable than concrete.”

“How do you know? Maybe to me, concrete feels like feather pillows.”

Rolling her eyes at the uncharacteristic whining, she unlocked the motel door and then dropped him unceremoniously on the bed closest to the back wall. “Sammy-honey . . . no one thinks concrete feels like feather pillows.”

Chuckling at her maternal fussing, Sam reached over to haul the pillow under his head. Marina moved to the room's desk, hauling out the laptop Jason had modified for them and booting it up. “Hey! We've got WiFi!”

“You think Will's going to be online?”

“If I know Misha . . . and I do . . . he's been waiting for this call for awhile,” she insisted, bringing up the S.H.I.E.L.D. interface and inputting her passcodes.

Almost immediately, a picture of Will appeared on the laptop screen. Marina's lips curved happily as she joked cheerfully, “Hey handsome.” Posing playfully, she asked, “How do I look?”

Will gifted her with one of his rare soft smiles, left hand reaching out to caress gently over the curve of her cheek on his own screen, the action out of sight of the camera. “God, you're beautiful.”

“You look tired, Mishka,” she insisted with a frown, scolding fondly, “Are you even remembering to
The man's lips twisted slightly as he confessed, “I miss you.”

“I miss you too, but I'll be home soon.”

Taking a deep breath, Will forced himself lean back in his chair to put some space between himself and the screen. “All right . . . I'm assuming Sam is with you.”

Sam grunted from where he was still curled up on the bed, out of the webcam's line of sight, agreeing, “I'm right here.”

“How's the trip been? Everything going okay logistically?”

“All of the reservations have held up so far. The Charger had a small glitch, but we just took it to an Enterprise office and they swapped it out,” the blond announced from the bed.

“And what about everything else? What can you tell me about the rest of the Prototypes you've seen so far?”

“Well . . . it's been interesting,” Sam insisted, smirking at the woman as she rolled her eyes.

“Interesting is one way to put it,” she snarked, arms coming up to fold over her chest as she huffed.

Frowning at the look on his longtime girlfriend's face, the Colonel insisted, “Define interesting.”

“Oh God . . . Oh God . . . we're all going to die,” was the deadpan response as Marina quoted Wash's response without even a pause.

Will couldn't resist the urge to snort with laughter; one could always count on his Marishka to have a flare for the dramatic and an inexhaustible supply of Firefly quotes. Wrinkling his nose at her, he teased, “I doubt it's as bad as all that, samaya malen'kaya.”

“Probably not . . . but wow, this has not been an easy trip.”

Quicksilver eyes were sharp, before he turned and disappeared from the display. Seconds later, there was the sound of the door to his office closing, before he was back in his chair, watching her with calm, steady eyes. Folding his arms over his chest, and kicking the chair back onto its back legs, he demanded, “Sit rep, Major . . . now.”

“Hey . . . no fair using that title when there isn't anything I can do about it,” she pouted playfully, earning a small grin and a wink from her lover.

Sam chuckled from the bed as he teased, “And suddenly, I understand why your boys are always accusing you two of flirting. Everything you say is an innuendo.”

The Colonel's small smile morphed to a full blown grin as he taunted, “Trust me, Sammy . . . you ain't seen nothing yet.” Turning back to his partner, he insisted, “Tell me, Marishka. Start with Los Angeles.”

“Los Angeles . . . Dillon Matthew Stephanowski . . . 44 years old . . . mechanic,” she recited, recalling the file to mind as she forced herself to recall the beginning of their trip. “Dil is an interesting character.”

Will held up a hand to stall her recounting as he questioned curiously, “Dil?”
“Nickname . . . given to him in high school by his two best friends, Amy Roe – now Stephanowski – and Aaron Miles.”

“He’s married?”

“Yes. Apparently, Amy got it into her head about five years ago that she hadn't done enough with her life. So, she complicated things by getting romantically involved with both Dillon and Aaron. Dillon didn't take well to it . . . apparently he'd fallen for her hard in high school and had been holding onto a pretty hot torch ever since.”

“Sounds like it all worked out.”

“Yeah . . . they're pretty happy together. No children, but I think that's because Dil was only a mechanic at the garage where he worked.”

“Was? He quit?”

Marina's smile slipped into a proud smirk as she teased, “You should pay more attention to our finances.”

Will rolled his eyes at the statement, announcing, “We bought it for him then.”

“The owner was already looking to sell, but he didn't really want it to go to anyone but Dillon. He's worked there since high school.” Shrugging lightly, she continued, “We met his asking price, in cash, and he gave us the deed that day.”

“How did you sign it over to Dillon? No direct interaction or interference . . . we agreed, Marishka.”

“We didn't interact or interfere,” Sam replied, rolling off the bed and leaning forward into the projector's camera with a small smile. “Part of the purchase contract was that the deed was never in our name. All Stephanowski will ever know is that the deed was bought and paid for by two benefactors who prefer to remain nameless.”

“Did we keep any equity in this garage, zhemchuzhina?”

“Yes . . . five percent of all the profits will be deposited into an anonymous, offshore bank account that I had Jason set up for us, that automatically diverts into our primary account.”

“All right . . . what was your take?”

“He's a good kid,” Marina replied, wincing slightly as she referred to the 44 year old as a kid. “Sorry . . . everyone's younger than me. It's a reflex.”

“I know. It's okay,” he laughed, watching her mutter to herself in frustration. “What about his filial relationships?”

“Well, there's Amy. They're blissful together. His relationship with Aaron Miles is a little tarnished because of what happened between Aaron and Amy, but they seem like they're getting it figured out. And his relationship with his parents is pretty good. Dil and Amy live in a modest house, in a decent part of town. They're not rich but they're not poor either. Cars are older model, but in good shape. Barring anything catastrophic, I don't think we're going to need to concern ourselves much with Dillon Stephanowski. He's got it pretty well together.”

“All right . . .” was the solemn agreement. Marina grinned, able to see the way he closed that particular case in his mental filing cabinet. “You said he was interesting. Do I want to know why?”
“He’s . . . colorful?” the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler hedged, biting down on her lower lip uncertainly. “He definitely has a way with words . . . particularly the foul ones.”

“My mother would have washed my mouth out with soap, if I had said half of the things he said. And my mother didn't even really give a damn about what kind of trouble I got into after Amy died,” Sam reminded the two with a twist of his lips.

Marina's eyebrows furrowed at the reminder, glowering slightly as she once again started to plot her vengeance on the couple that had neglected her boy for so many years. Will's tone was soothing as he admonished fondly, “Marishka . . . kabluk. (Marishka . . . heel.)”

“Oni byli luchshe molit'sya ya ne vstretit'sya s nimi, Misha. Eto ne zakonchitsya khorosho dlya nikh, (They had better pray I never meet them, Misha. It will not end well for them,)” she hissed in furious Russian, hot chocolate eyes blazing viciously.

Smiling at her fondly, he promised, “Ya znayu. (I know.)”

Sam's eyes narrowed slightly at the Russian. He'd been with the family for long enough that he was starting to pick up some things, and Marina had taken to tutoring him while they were stuck in the car. Even still, between Marina's hushed tone and the rapid speed of her words, he was a little lost. “I don't want to know, do I?”

“No,” was the simultaneous answer from both the Colonel and his Russian, causing Marina to let her eyes fall close as she took a deep breath in. “Let's just say that should I ever meet your parents, Sammy, I intend to have a series of words with them that they will most definitely not like.”

Nodding in amused agreement, he saluted mockingly, “Got it.”

“Back on track please,” the Colonel insisted, knowing that if he let her, Marina would be stuck fuming for awhile and he would never find out what had happened with the other two prototypes they'd stopped to see before they'd gotten to Minnesota to check in on Angus Maitland. “What happened in Missouri? You canceled like a week on the reservation.”

Sam snorted, snarking, “Missouri was a quick stop.”

Marina cocked a disapproving eyebrow at him. “Sammy . . .”

“It was!” he protested with a shrug.

“Why was Missouri a quick stop?” the Colonel asked with a frown. “We hadn't been able to get any intel on Saul Gregor. It should have taken you more than a day to dig up something we could use to locate him.”

“Actually, it was pretty easy,” Sam sighed, running one hand back through his blond hair.

“Why?”

“There's a death record at the courthouse in Acuso. Apparently, he was executed for capital murder of a child about six years ago,” Marina sighed, mouth pressed into a firm frown as she watched her partner take that in.

“Capital murder of a child?”

“Series of unfortunate events that ended with a dead kid. Apparently, he was a gambling addict. He was deeply in debt and needed cash fast. Tried to rob a convenience store and snatched the kid as a hostage.” Shrugging lightly, the Russian protested, “Doesn't look like he meant for anything to happen to the kid. But . . . best laid plans of mice and men.”

“Yebat’.”

“Yeah. All reports . . . he wasn't quite right at the end. I hacked the reports from the prison where he was incarcerated. Borderline sociopathic . . . but genuinely empathetic and remorseful when confronted with the kid's mother at his execution.”

Sam spoke up then, insisting, “The other inmates on death row remember him pretty well. He was quiet, kept to himself. Found religion, but couldn't seem to connect to people very well.”

“Either way . . . no longer our concern,” Marina sighed, one hand coming up to rub at the back of her neck. “Florida was pretty much a bust too.”

“Yeah . . . James is still on tour. He doesn't get downtime for another six months. And according to his CO, he's already requested to cancel his downtime and get right back onto another tour.”

Taking a deep breath, the handler chuckled as she recalled their trip to Florida. “I was able to meet some of the other techs he'd worked with. Army Sergeant JT Sanborn was still on base, as was his cousin, Senior Airman Sam Wilson of the USAF.”

Sam snorted at the reminder of the two men. “I had a Grimm Brothers moment, Will . . it was crazy.”

“What do you mean?” Will laughed, watching Sam go cross-eyed at the memory.

“The cousins are very similar in appearance. And according to Airman Wilson . . . William James is a crazy motherfucker. An opinion that is supported 100 percent by Sergeant Sanborn,” Marina laughed, snorting at the memory. Both cousins had looked horrified to learn that she was asking about the bomb specialist. Both had tried to warn her to avoid James at all costs. She could only imagine what their reactions would be to the Brothers Grimm.

“So . . . we probably want to leave him to blow himself up without interference?”

“We already have a crazy as fuck member of this family . . . I really don't think we need two,” Marina agreed with a giggle.

“All right . . . what about Angus Maitland?”

“We just got to town. Found the motel and checked in.” Glancing at the blond, she watched Sam shrug lightly, before turning back to the laptop. “We're probably going to head out to get something to eat and then see what if we can't track down his former captain. Man has to know something about Maitland.”

“What makes you think so?”

“Call it a hunch,” the former assassin replied with a frown.

“I have survived on a few of those. All right. Just remember . . . no interference and no interaction unless it's absolutely necessary. Promise?”

“I don't know if I can promise that with this one, Misha. I haven't even met the kid yet, and already he's yanking at my heartstrings.”

Sighing heavily, the Colonel teased fondly, “Nasedka.” Turning to look at the younger man, he insisted, “Keep both eyes on her, Sammy, okay? Make sure she doesn't do anything too stupid?”

“Sure thing.”

“SHE is still sitting right here, thank you very much.”

“Marishka . . . be careful.”

“I will . . . I promise. I'll be home soon.”

“You'd better be,” the eldest Grimm insisted with a frown. “I need you home, Marina.”

Giving him a warm smile, she promised, “I solemnly swear I am up to no good . . . but nothing that's going to kill me.”

“Aiming to misbehave?”

“Always!” she giggled, winking at her partner's use of her favorite Firefly quote.

Chuckling, Will rolled his eyes as he leaned forward on the arms he had folded atop his desk.

“You're not quite right, you know that?”

Grinning at the quote, Marina fired back, “That's the popular theory.’”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen'kaya.”

Blowing him a warm kiss in reply, she vowed, “Vsegda, Mishka.”

“I want another report tomorrow, agreed?”

“Agreed.”

Smiling at her for another moment, the Colonel took a deep breath and visibly steeled himself, before insisting, “Orel out.”

Marina barely had time to give him a small smile, before he reached forward and clicked off the camera. Blinking back tears, the Russian tossed her head slightly before spinning in her chair. “I'm starved. You hungry?”

“I could eat,” the blond agreed, pretending not to see the tears in her eyes as she brushed them away briskly.

“Good . . . that little diner we passed on the way into town looked cute. How about we try there?”

“As long as they don't have anything disgusting like liver and onions, that sounds good to me.”

“Why the hell would they have liver and onions?”

“Why wouldn't they have liver and onions?” was the return salvo, forcing Marina to consider that and shrug. “You present a good point.”

“Come on . . . you're starving remember.”

Laughing, she shoved him fondly from the room as she ordered, “Shut up.”

Chuckling, he dodged around her and slung his arm around her neck again. “Make me, Ma.”
Rolling her eyes, she ducked from under his arm and dashed towards the passenger seat. Sam tossed the keys into the air and caught them on the way down with a grin. “Still upset that you lost that bet in Oklahoma?”

“The bet only gives you exclusive driving rights for another three days, so don’t get too cocky, Sammy-honey. Eventually, you will lose those keys.”

“Yeah, but for another three days . . . driver gets to pick the music and shotgun shuts her cakehole.”

Huffing, she snarked, “Great.”

“Love you too, Ma.”

Reaching up to run her fingers back through his hair, she promised, “Love you, Sammy.”

Grinning at her as he gunned the engine, he insisted, “I know.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Der’mo - shit
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for his longtime partner)
(R) zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's less common nicknames for his longtime partner)
(R) Yebat' - fuck
(R) nasedka - motherhen
(R) ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) Vsegda - always
(R) Mishka - a diminutive of Mikhail/Michael (Will's middle name is Michael)
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will's callsign with S.H.I.E.L.D. and the Army's Bratya Mrachnyy
Chapter Notes

Very few translations, but what there are, are at the end as always.

Enjoy guys! I hope you enjoy this!

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Chapter 178: Malee

The next morning Sam poked at his pancakes, eyes glued to Marina’s face as she muttered to herself in distracted Russian. It had never failed to strike him as funny that she could swear at a grocery list as she was making it, but the sight of her scribbling down information about Angus Maitland while cussing was a bit more sobering. “Ma . . . I think you're scaring the waitress.”

Marina’s head popped up as she blinked at him, surprised by the statement. “What?”

“I get the swearing at lists, but I think it's scaring the waitress.”
“Oh . . .” she sighed, dropping her pen onto the page and reaching for her coffee. “Sorry. I'm just . . .”

“You're worried and feeling protective and maternal, so you have reverted to your default setting. I get it. Just . . . cool it on the viciousness? I haven't gotten a refill of my coffee since you started muttering,” he teased, tapping his mug with a fingernail.

“Ha ha . . . very funny.”

“Lack of coffee is never funny,” Sam argued, turning his brightest and most charming smile onto the teenager as she finally ventured forward to refill their coffee mugs. Winking at her with a grin, he insisted, “Thank you Mia.”

“Welcome,” she whispered with a small smile, before she bolted off again.

“See? Scaring the waitress.”

“All right . . . all right . . . I'll tone it down,” she promised, “I just don't like the picture that Captain Blanchard painted of Angus Maitland last night. It's not a flattering one,” she hissed, slouching backwards against the bench as she poked despondently at the notebook in front of her.

Softening his smile, Sam reached out to lay one hand over hers as he shoved his plate to the side and tugged the list towards himself. “So . . . what part do you want to tackle first?”

“I don't even know,” she groaned, poking miserably at her oatmeal. “Except that she can't tell us anything, I'd want to go talk to Dr Chuang.”

Sam gave her a small smile as she groaned and thunked her head against the table, one hand reaching out to pat her head lightly. At the gesture, the Russian growled, earning a grin from the blond.

“Come on . . . let's go see what we can dig up about Angus Maitland. It's a little town. Someone's sure to know something.”

Just then, a small voice chimed in from the booth behind them. “You know Gus?”

Sam whirled, his hand going reflexively to his gun and knowing that Marina had done the same behind him. The little girl sitting there rocked backwards in surprise at the action, almond eyes wide as she caught sight of the Magnum holstered to Sam's hip. “Sorry . . . I just heard you talking about Gus.”

“Gus?” Sam mimicked, a wayward thought in his mind snickering that he wasn't sure “Gus” was any better than “Angus”.

“Yeah . . . Gus Maitland,” she drawled, looking at them suspiciously. “He's my friend.”

Marina's eyebrows climbed upwards into her hair at that statement, even as she leaned forward on her elbows. “Well, I'm hoping to make friends with Gus too. My name is Mary Peterson . . . this is my brother, Sam. Sorry about the hello . . . soldiers. We don't do well with being startled.”

Sam nodded once in greeting, watching the little girl take in the maternal set of Marina's features . . . her easy posture and immediately relax. Suddenly, he could understand why Marina was typically point for the Brat'ya Mrachnyy; she could convince anyone that she was harmless. “So . . . how long have you known Gus?”

“About a year. He's a patient at my mother's office.” There was a distinct blush to her cheeks as she confessed, “He's super cute . . . and I have a total crush. But he said I have to wait until I'm older.”
Sam barely suppressed his snort, ducking his head over the notebook as he watched the Russian grin at the girl. “The heart always knows what it wants . . . our ages don't always match up with that,” she said, her tone a clear indication that she agreed with what she was saying on a deeply personal level.

“So . . . why are you looking for Gus?”

“It's complicated, but we want to make sure that he's doing okay.”

“Why?”

Blue eyes bounced back and forth between the two as Marina chuckled, “You're a curious kid, aren't you?”

“I just don't want you to hurt him. Gus is . . .” here the girl paused, obviously hesitant to explain too much to the two soldiers. “He's fragile and he's special and I won't let you hurt him.”

“Trust me . . . I don't want you to let us hurt him. I promise.” Grinning at the girl, she asked, “What's your name, devochka?”

“Malee . . . Malee Chuang.”

“It's nice to meet you, Malee. Gus is certainly lucky to have such a good friend like you.”

“I'm 13; you don't have to patronize me,” the girl snarked with a frown.

“Who said anything about patronizing you? I was being serious.”

Cocking an eyebrow at Sam in question, the teenager watched as the blond nodded with a small smile. “Mary's pretty good at patronizing people . . . I can assure you she's being totally serious right now.”

Mary's eyes roved over the booth where Malee was seated, noticing that there was only one place setting and it didn't look like anyone was with her . . . or would be joining her. “You eat here by yourself a lot?”

Malee huffed bitterly as she insisted, “I was supposed to meet my father here, but as you can see . . . he bailed.”

Sam's mouth twisted as he replied, “Absent, huh?”

“Yeah . . . he and my mom got separated and I haven't really seen him much since then.”

Shrugging, the teen watched as the two siblings glanced at each other, having a clear conversation before Sam turned back to face her. “You wanna eat with us? We'd love to talk to you about Gus . . . if you want.”

Biting down on her lower lip, she hedged, “My mom says I'm really not supposed to talk to strangers. How do I know you aren't going to kidnap me or bury me alive or something?”

The blond practically hooted with laughter, causing the brunette woman to snicker at the reaction. “There are so many things wrong with that statement, I don't even know where to begin.” Smirking, she teased, “You worry about kidnappings and getting buried alive a lot in Beaver Creek?”

Blushing at the teasing, Malee nevertheless lifted her chin and insisted, “I'm just being thorough.”
“I can appreciate that,” Mary cackled, winking once before gesturing for her brother to round the table and join her on the bench beside her. “Here . . . you can have that whole side to yourself. Hard to kidnap someone from the other side of a table.”

Sam leaned over with a grin and dragged his plate to rest in front of his new seat. Bumping against Marina with his elbow as he tried to eat left handed, he scowled before standing. “Switch me. I am not playing elbows with you all through breakfast.”

Rolling her eyes, Marina joked as she slid out of the booth so that he could slide in first, “Southpaws. You had to be a southpaw.”

“You'd think you'd be used to it. How many southpaws do you know?”

“Including you? Six . . . which is six too many. Can't you all be normal and right-handed like the rest of the world?” Marina joked with a grin and a wink.

“Wait . . . Grimms can be normal?” Sam gasped in mock shock, eyes going wide in reply.

“Shut. Up.” she scolded around a grin and a laugh.

“Who are the Grimms?”

Mary gave her a soft smile as she replied, “My partner and his brothers.”

“You have any pictures?”

Hot chocolate eyes went wide at the question, darting towards Sam as she scrambled for an answer. Finally, she settled for as close to the truth as she could manage. “None that I could show you.”

“Why not?”

“You know Gus.”

“What does that have to do anything?”

“Remember the part where it's complicated? This is why it's complicated.”

“What . . . your boyfriend is a member of his biological family?” Malee asked with a roll of her eyes.

Mary reared back in surprise at the question, even as Sam inquired, “Biological family?”

“Yeah . . . Gus' parents gave him up when he was like two. He shuffled through foster care pretty much until he was 18,” the girl announced, eyes darting between the two as Mary all but lunged for both the notebook and a manila file folder sitting next to Malee’s transferred plate. “That's not in the files,” the woman hissed to her brother, flipping open the folder and skimming through the paperwork tacked there.

Malee watched as Sam shook his head slowly, before speaking up cautiously, “I only found out because he doesn't have any pictures of family in his house . . . he doesn't really have any pictures at all.”

“You've been in his house?” Sam asked suspiciously, eyes narrowing. Blushing, Malee clammed up causing a blond eyebrow to cock upwards as he continued, “Not something I want to know, huh?”

“I was worried about him. I went to check on him,” she protested, still blushing furiously.
“Did anything happen?”

“I wanted it to,” she confessed petulantly as she slumped backwards against the bench and folded her arms over his chest. “Instead he called my mom. She came and got me.”

“Which was smart. Devochka . . . he's in his forties and you're still a teenager. Trust me . . . emotions are a bitch at this age and it makes people do stupid things. He did the right thing though. You may understand that when you're older and then again you may not, but he did.”

Shrugging miserably, she insisted, “I just wanted to make sure he was okay.”

“That's admirable . . . it is. But maybe not appropriate.”

“That's what my mom said.”

“Parents typically know what they're talking about when it comes to this kind of stuff,” Mary insisted with a dry grin. “How did you find out he was in foster care? Did he tell you?”

“No,” she confessed, glancing away.

“Then how did you find out?”

“I looked at his file in my mom's office. He'd told her.”

Mary's lips quirked as she joked, “You want a job?”

“Ma . . .” Sam scolded with a grin.

“What!? She's a freaking ninja . . . and she's 13!” the woman protested, with an outflung hand in the girl's direction.

“Will is going to be pissed if you show up at home with another kid. Didn't you just adopt Daryl?”

“Vati adopted Daryl . . . I just helped.”

“She's got a mom who clearly cares about her . . . let's pretend to let her have a normal life. At least for another seven years . . . then we'll talk about recruiting her.”

“Nine years . . . she needs a college degree first,” Mary reminded him with a grin, watching the girl watch them in confusion. “Don't worry about it Malee . . . just do me a favor?”

“What?”

“Become a total badass, okay? Go to college, study a language, be amazing. And in nine years . . . I'll come looking for you about that job, okay?”

Seeing the sincerity in her eyes, Malee couldn't stop the small smile that creased her lips. “Okay.”

“Awesome.” Digging in her pocket, she pulled out a small white card. Blank except for a phone number and a twelve digit alpha-numeric code, Mary offered it to the teenager with a grin. “Keep this with you . . . even if you don't use it in nine years, it could still come in handy before then.”

Nodding, Malee reached out and took the card in two fingers, before tucking it into her pocket. It was about then that a young man entered the diner, shoulders stooped and hands deep in his pockets as he shuffled inside. Seeing as the door was behind Mary and Sam, Malee saw him first and bounded to her feet on the seat, “Gus!”
Both Mary and Sam rotated to look, just as the man turned his head to find the voice calling for him. Mary's eyes went wide as his features came into view, one hand reaching up to grip Sam's shirt as she hissed, “Bozhe moi.”

Sam's hand came up to rest over hers, promising in the same tone, “I know . . . believe me, I know.”

Malee frowned as she noticed how pale Mary had gone, before rolling her eyes and jumping from the bench seat. Dashing to Gus, she threw her arms around his waist and hugged him tightly. A real smile, a small one but still real, curved his lips upwards, causing Malee to cheer inside her own head. Getting Gus to give a real smile, and not just one of the ones he used to pretend he was okay, was her goal in life. She knew she was being ridiculous; Gus was in his forties and therefore almost 30 years older than her, but she couldn't help wanting to make sure that he was happy. “Hey, Malee,” he greeted her, patting the top of her head fondly.

“You here by yourself?” she asked cheerfully, glancing backwards towards where Mary and Sam were still sitting in the chair.

“Yeah . . . guy's gotta eat right?” he agreed with a wink and a small smile.

“Right!” she agreed, remembering the time she'd brought him a picnic lunch while he'd been working at a construction site a little under a year ago. That had been right after Rudy died; a year later, she could say that she'd been a little obsessive, but she'd been faced with her first brush with death. She didn't need her mother to psychoanalyze her to know that she had latched on to Gus because she'd sensed a wounded soul much like her own. Grabbing his hand, she yanked backwards. “Come on . . . come sit with us.”

“Us?” he asked curiously, even as he allowed her to pull him along.

“Yes . . .” she insisted, pushing him onto her bench seat. Unable to do anything else, he shifted all the way over as she pushed her way onto the seat beside him. “Gus . . . this is Sam and Mary Peterson. Guys, I'd like you to meet my friend, Gus Maitland.”

He nodded at them, acknowledging them in his quiet way, before turning to look at Malee. “You know I'm going to end up elbowing you the whole time with you seated on my left.”

At the statement, Mary choked slightly, fingers curling into claws where they were still gripping Sam's sleeve. “Left handed?” she asked, clearly in shock.

Nodding once, he cocked an eyebrow at her. “Yeah . . . why?”

“Sam's left handed,” Malee announced, before continuing, “So are the Grimms.”

Unbeknownst to Gus, he asked the same question she had nearly twenty minutes before. “Who are the Grimms?”

Whatever her answer was going to be was cut off when Sam's phone lit up, vibrating its way across the table with a text message. Gus' eyes snapped wide as he stared at the picture of Sam Peterson, with a dark haired young woman and a blond man with his face. Feeling his anxiety levels crawl up the back of his throat, he shoved himself into the corner of the bench seat and demanded, “Who the fuck are you?”

Chapter End Notes
Translations:

(R) Brat'ya Mrachnyy - Brothers Grimm (code name of the Army Spec Ops tactical squad of which Will, Marina, Jason, Clint and Aaron are members of)
(R) devochka - girlie
(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God.
(R)
Chapter Notes

Wow . . . I am on a roll! Yay!

I hope you all are continuing to enjoy this. And please, even if it's just a "Nice" or "Cool" or any single word, comments make my world go round. Please let me know what you think.

No translations this time, so enjoy this one!
Chapter 179: Gus

This was NOT how Marina had envisioned this meeting going.

Sam fumbled for his phone, shutting it up in a second, but the damage was already done. The selfie of Sam with Marta and Aaron, taken during their brief stop at customs on the way home from Toronto all those months ago, was one of her boy's favorites . . . and one of her own. It was the first time Sam had really known that just because his parents were assholes, didn't mean that he was completely without family. His personal cell phone was full of pictures that he'd taken of the family or that the family had taken with him.

A fact that had come back to bite them in the ass, but at this point there was no help for it. “So much for no direct interaction or interference,” she muttered, even as she acknowledged that she never would have been able to stay away from Gus Maitland after what Malee had told them about his anchorless childhood.

Either way, it was clear from Gus' reaction to Aaron's face that this was going to be an uncomfortable conversation . . . no matter how it went down. Finally, Marina took a deep breath and forced herself to let go of her boy's sleeve. Sam's hand rubbed lightly at the spot where her fingernails had gouged him, before he flagged down their waitress for more coffee; both spies were fairly certain that they were going to need it.

Once the teenager had gone again, a soft blush on her face at what Marta called Sam's WOW-smile, Marina folded her hands in front of herself and greeted him as calmly as she could manage, “Hello Gus.”

“Who. The fuck. Are you?” he repeated, eyes wide as he watched her. Only Malee's seat on the edge of the bench prevented him from bolting for the door.

Glancing at Malee, she grimaced, before replying honestly. “My name is Marina Ivanovna Petrovka. My partner . . . is your half-brother.”

“I thought your name was Mary Peterson?” Malee asked carefully, reaching out to squeeze Gus' hand where it lay trembling on the table.

“Mary is an alias . . .” she confessed, running one hand back through her hair, before continuing, “. . . we didn't intend to get involved . . . we just wanted to check in . . . to make sure that you were okay.”

“What?”

Leaning forward on her elbows, Marina watched him for a long moment. It broke her heart to see him flinching away from her, as though she was going to hurt him. But underneath the fear and the trembling . . . her heart skipped into triple-time as she considered how much Gus looked like her lover. There were subtle differences. However where the mothers' DNA had created clear differences in the base genome in the other Prototypes, Gus could have been one of the actual Cahills instead of a Prototype. Confronted with her lover's veritable likeness, she suddenly longed for her Mishka more fervently than she had since she'd left home on this road trip.

He had obviously inherited Hansel's agelessness, as he looked to be about the same age as the rest of the Grimms; which was to say that he didn't look a day over 30, if that. Gus' eyes weren't the same quick changing ones she looked into every morning when she woke, but nevertheless they were shifting between variations of blue and green. He was thinner than the Colonel, though not by much, and if Marina had to guess she would say that he suffered from the same lack of consistent appetite that Marina had always attributed to a result of the trauma her Colonel had suffered as a child. There was keen intelligence in those eyes, the cogs behind them making connections and assumptions based on what she had – and hadn't – said about her partner.

But where Will kept his emotions close to the vest, Gus' own were running rampant across his features. Marina had always known how Will was feeling, and she had had more than a few things to say when past COs had used the Colonel's compassion and well-hidden kindness to manipulate him into what they wanted done. She was a large part of that stoicism; it was a lot easier to lock the pain away now when there was a guarantee of a sympathetic ear later. Her love and her submissive nature had always kept Will on a somewhat even keel, even the Colonel admitted to that. Gus had had no one; his parents had abandoned him as a child and his childhood relationships had apparently never morphed into something concrete. There was no record of a romantic connection in the files; Malee had pretty much confirmed that when she'd confessed to her crush and Gus' admonition that she would have to wait.

This was going to be hell. And some part of her heart twisted at using the same strategies she always employed on Will. But if they were as alike as their physical appearances indicated, handling Gus the same way she would handle Will would be the most beneficial for everyone.

Running her hands back through her hair, she decided to tell him the truth. “We didn't even know you existed until about four weeks ago . . . we didn't know what kind of life you had. If you were happy. We just wanted to know . . . to see for ourselves that you were okay.”

“So where is he . . . my so-called brother?”

“He's at home . . . we weren't sure how you'd react to brothers that look like you.”

“Brothers?”

“There are five Grimms,” Marina replied, smiling at him sadly. “William Michael . . . Brian Joshua . . . Jason Leonard . . . Aaron Kenneth . . . and Clinton Francis.” Gesturing to Sam's phone, she replied, “The one in the picture was Aaron and Aaron's girlfriend Marta.”

“Why does he look like me?”

Blinking at the question, she muttered fondly, “You are so much like my Misha . . . always have to know the answers to the hardest questions first.” Chuckling mirthlessly, she continued, “Your father's name is Hansel Kuhn . . .” There was a pause as she considered how best to explain, before sighing and quoting dryly, “. . . the force is strong in that one.”

“Marina,” Sam scolded, even as he rolled his eyes at the quote.

“It's true. All of Hansel's boys take after him . . . at least in some way or another.”

When Gus' only response was “Why?”, Marina finally started to understand why toddlers could so frustrate their parents with the constant repetition of that question. Taking a deep breath, she glanced at Sam curiously. Sam shrugged slightly, seeming to understand what she was asking without speaking. Arching upwards to retrieve his wallet, Sam slid out of the booth with a small smile. “I'll go pay the bill and get them to pack up something for all of us to go. We should probably have the rest of this conversation somewhere a little more private.”

Malee bit down on her lip, twisting slightly to look at her friend. “Gus . . . you okay?”

There was a set look to his features, but he still managed to send a small smile her way. Looping one arm around her shoulders, he squeezed her lightly as he nodded. “You should probably head on home, Malee. Your mom is gonna be worried about you soon.”

“I wanna go with you,” she protested with a pout, turning a pair of narrowed suspicious eyes onto the other woman seated across the table.

“I know . . . but I think this is something that I need to do by myself.”

“Are you sure?”
“Yeah.” Glancing at Marina briefly, he twisted to look at her fully. “How about this? I'm working at the Old Smithson place this week, trying to finish up their renovations. Swing by tomorrow around lunch with a picnic and I'll tell you as much as I can.”

“Promise?”

“Promise. Go on . . . I'll see you tomorrow.”

“Kay,” she sighed with a frown, leaning over to hug him tightly, before glaring at Marina once more as she slid out of the booth. “Don't hurt him.”

“I'll try not to,” was the best the Russian could do, a sad smile on her face at the knowledge that this wasn't what Malee had wanted to hear.

Huffing in disappointment, Malee grabbed her backpack from the ground beside the bench and dashed towards the door. Before long, the two could see her peddling away down the street. “She's a good kid,” the woman insisted, eyes curious as they turned to look at Gus.

“Yeah . . . stubborn as hell though,” he agreed with a small chuckle.

“Good for her. Stubborn isn't a bad thing. Maybe a little trying when she's stubborn about something that her mother doesn't want her to be, but even still. There isn't anyone in this world that's going to be able to force her into something she doesn't want.”

Sam appeared at table then, holding a plastic bag of takeout containers as well as a thermos of hot coffee. “We ready to go?”

“I guess that depends on where it is we're going?”

“Probably someplace neutral,” the blond suggested, glancing between the two with a frown. “Any suggestions, Gus?”

Biting nervously on his lower lip, the older man announced, “You could come to my place? It's private enough, I guess. I live alone and for the most part, my neighbors tend to mind their own business.”

Cocking an eyebrow, she asked, “You sure?”

“It's as private as it's going to get.”

“All right then we're in the Charger. Did you drive or do you need a ride?”

“I walked. A ride would be great.”

“All right then. I'll take the backseat . . .” she grumbled, earning a grin and a laugh from Sam as he teased, “Backseat's the best place for shorties.”

“Watch it, Sammy. Short or not, I can still wipe the floor with your face.”

“You love this face,” he scoffed, handing the packages to the Russian as he dug in his pocket for the keys.

Rolling her eyes, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler kicked lightly at his shin as he opened the driver's side door for her, before slipping easily into the backseat. Settling in behind him, she waited for him to sit before leaning forward and flicking fondly at his earlobe. “Ha!”
“Ouch!” he grunted, reaching up to smack her fingers away. “Evil!”

She grinned at him, before settling back against the seat again. Gus' eyes were wide as he watched the two joke with each other, before he asked, “You're not siblings . . . are you?”

Sam's blue eyes were gleaming with suppressed mirth as he glanced over at him, shifting absently as he replied, “No. Marina's pretty much my mom . . . my parents aren't exactly the most nurturing of people. Ma snapped me up in a hot second.” Rolling his eyes, he continued, “Not the first and probably won't be the last.”

Marina chuckled at the statement, agreeing lazily, “I have a few maternal instincts, so I just keep adopting people and taking them home with me.”

“A few!?” was the incredulous tease, earning another flick to the ear in retaliation. “OW! Ma!”

“Be nice to your elders, Sammy-honey,” she mocked, giggling as she lifted her calves out of the way of his reaching hand. The backs of her knees were very ticklish; a fact that Sam knew because Clint had shared that little secret in week one. “Watch the road.”

“This is not over,” he insisted with a laugh, pulling up to a red light. Glancing at Gus, he noticed the man watching them with something akin to amazement. Cocking an eyebrow, he decided not to say anything and prompted lightly, “Gonna need some directions, Gus. We've only been in town for about 12 hours, and most of that was spent sleeping at our hotel.”

“Oh yeah. Take the next left and my house is about two miles down the road.”

“You walked here from that far?”

“My therapist says the exercise is good for me. Gives me something to focus on instead of the shit that's in my head.”

Marina hummed, tilting her head slightly as she watched his ears turned red as he blushed. Will didn't typically blush but Clint did and Aaron's ears always went red when he was embarrassed. Smiling fondly, she couldn't help the way her heart made room for him to take up residence. Even as she knew that it probably wasn't smart to say anything, she couldn't stop the confession that made its way into the air then. “You remind me so much of my boys.”

Gus didn't seem to notice that part, latching on to the last bit. “Your boys? You and my brother have kids?”

Marina flinched at the reminder that she was barren; she and Will had tried everything to have a child but so far no luck. She'd hoped that because her assignment with Stark had prevented her from undergoing the “graduation ceremony” she would be exempt from the childlessness that haunted her three sisters. But, even if all of her equipment still worked, it seemed as though she would never look into the face of her partner's child and see them both in the baby's features. Tossing her head in an attempt to shake the tears away, her reply was perhaps more brusque than necessary as she insisted, “No . . . we do not.”

This time she didn't dodge the hand Sam reached back to squeeze her knee fondly, one hand coming up to lay over the top of it. “Misha's brothers are my boys. I helped him raise them.”

“Raise them? Where were their parents?”

“They have no mother. And Hansel didn't even know he had children until Misha was 29. By that point, Clint – the youngest – was already 19.” Lifting her chin defiantly, she protested in the same way she always had when the Ross had barked at her for her consideration and maternal care of the four younger Cahills. “Someone had to raise them . . . and I loved them fiercely. It was my greatest honor to raise those boys into the men they are today. And I refuse to feel sorry for that.”

Gus stared at her in awe, meeting the challenge in the Russian’s eyes for all of a second before Marina ripped her eyes away and towards the scenery outside the tiny window to her left. There was a long moment of awkward silence, before the older man announced, “I'll bet they're amazing.”

Marina’s lips curved upwards as she considered that, nodding once as she agreed, “They are. They're my whole world.”

“My worthless carcass excluded, of course,” Sam chimed in, trying to lighten the mood and grinning as he watched Marina grin in the rearview mirror.

“Of course,” she mocked, leaning forward to wrap her arms around the seat and his shoulders, pressing a warm kiss to his cheek. “Love you, Sammy.”

Lifting his hand to wrap around her wrist, he squeezed lightly as he responded fondly, “Love you too, Ma.”

“Tell me about them?”

Turning to look at him, hot chocolate eyes searched his face, seeing the sincerity and the curiosity in his features before she smiled softly. “What do you want to know?”

“Anything you want to tell me. Everything you can tell me.”

“Oh . . . this could take awhile. Misha's going to be 40 in three weeks . . . which means Clint will be 30 just before Christmas. That's a lot of stories to tell.”

Shrugging lightly, he confessed, “It's not like I don't have the time.”

The Russian hummed as she considered that, before nodding in agreement. “All right. There will be some things I can't tell you, but I'll tell you what I can.”

“Why not?”

“We're soldiers with the Army . . . assigned with Special Operations. A lot of the things we've done are still classified, and even more of them . . . we'll never tell anyone.”
Wow!!! 10 reviews for the last chapter!! You guys made my day!!! Thank you all so much!! I can't wait to hear what you think of this chapter next! Please keep up the reviews. I can't tell you how much they mean to me.

Still no translations.

So there's a bit in here that's briefly referred to in "This Trick May Chance to Scathe You." Trust me the Tales are not over. :D

Enjoy everyone!
Chapter 180: Grimms Brothers Tales

Almost as soon as they were in the door, Gus asked, “How did you meet my brother?”

Rolling her eyes, she joked, “Remember what I said about needing to know the hardest answers first? Good grief . . . heavy hitting much?”

Stepping into the living room, she took up residence in the sole armchair. Leaning forward, she laid the food out on the shabby coffee table, before curling up in the chair with her feet tucked beneath her. Not one to miss an opportunity, Sam practically leaped at the space in front of her chair, putting his back to it and letting Marina's fingers find their way into his hair as they always did. Gus frowned as he took his own seat on the couch, head cocked in question as he asked, “Why would that be a hard answer to give?”

“How I met Misha is classified. Ergo, I can't tell you,” she insisted, blushing slightly. The less people who knew about the Cahill Project the better. Even if Gus was technically a product of the project, he’d at least been spared the ugly details of the program. Not to mention, telling your lover's half-brother that you'd held that same brother as an infant was probably going to cause an aneurysm.

“So what can you tell me about your relationship with my brother?”

It was obvious from the curiosity in Sam's eyes, that Gus was not the only one interested in her answer. At that knowledge, she resolved to be as truthful as she could be without diving too deeply into the specifics. Frowning as she considered the question she finally decided on a heavily altered version of the truth. “I met the man I know now when he was only 12 years old.”

Those blue eyes went wide in shock, the surprised expression mirrored in Gus' own features. Biting on her lower lip, she paused before continuing, “He had been abused and mistreated . . . he was traumatized, cold, calculating and bitterly cynical. But for some unfathomable reason, he knew that he could trust me . . . that I wouldn't let anything happen to him or his brothers.”

“How did he know that?”

There was a small, infinitely sad smile on her face as she confessed, “I was the one who rescued him and his brothers from hell.” Seeing Sam blink in muted shock, she laughed, “Will is not the one robbing the cradle in this relationship, Sammy-honey. Not by a long shot.”

Gus' eyes took her in from top to bottom, intense curiosity in “How much older are you than him?”

Her lips twisted as she replied, “A lot. You can count the difference in decades.”

The blond chuckled as he laughed, “Will wasn't kidding, was he? When he told you that you were the sexiest 65 year old he knew?”

“No. I was 25 years old when Will was born.” Blushing furiously at the incredulous look on Gus' face, she shrugged. “This was not the life I had planned, and I can promise that he was not the partner I thought I would love for the rest of my life. But fate works in mysterious ways and I love Mishka more than anything else in this world. I was born for him . . . and him for me. I wouldn't change a single instant of our lives together.”

“You don't look 65,” was the half-hearted protest from Gus.

Scrubbing at the back of her neck, she lied sheepishly, “I have amazing genes.”

Feeling her son's soundless snort, she reached out to pinch the very top of his ear lightly. “You hush.”

“So . . . how did you and my brother get together?”

There was a long pause, and for a good bit of time Sam was pretty sure that Marina wasn't going to answer the question. Finally, she sighed heavily. “I want your word you don't repeat this to anyone. Not even his younger brothers know, and we would prefer to keep it that way. Both of you . . . this is important.”

The blond agent nodded firmly in agreement, a stern set to his lips as he wondered why she was pushing for secrecy. The nine years the Colonel had spent pining after Marina was not a secret to the family. Every single one of his brothers and even Hansel Kuhn himself had managed to tease the eldest Grimm in Sam's hearing at least once since he'd come to live with them. The popular theory was that Will Grimm had the patience of a saint and the tenacity of a Scottish terrier. The way Marina was talking, however, implied that there was more to the story than Will or Marina had previously acknowledged.

The Russian waited until Gus had agreed quietly, “Who would I tell that would actually give a damn?”

A sly smirk curved one corner of her lips as she snarked, “You might be surprised.”

Cocking an eyebrow, he nodded once in agreement, “All right then. I promise.”

Taking a deep breath, Marina considered how she wanted to tell the story before beginning. “The accepted theory of our relationship was that Misha fell in love with me at 17 and then waited patiently for me to come to him until he was 26. At which point, I miraculously realized I loved him and we became a couple. And officially, that's true.”

“Officially?”

Humming an affirmative, the woman watched her fingers pet through blond strands as she crafted the story as much as she could without saying too much. “After I took the boys away, we ran away to the circus.”

“What!?” Gus blurted in surprise.

“Yeah . . . the place I took them from . . . they were pretty desperate to get them back. But that place was destroying them . . . Misha had horrible nightmares and ugly scars. And he wasn't the only one.” Running a hand back through her hair, she justified her actions briskly, “It's hard to find someone if they don't stay still long enough to be found. Carter's Circus was a perfect hiding place; we were on the road nine months out of the year and the other three the boys were in school in towns where no one would have ever thought to look for them.

“I knew that Will thought he loved me; I knew as soon as the feelings manifested. But he was 17 and I was the only woman he'd known consistently since he was still a child. He'd never dated any of the girls in his classes like Jason; he never dallied with any of the other performers' daughters like Brian; his brothers and me were the most important and only people in his life. So I did what I thought was the best thing for him; I let him down . . . very gently.”

“You refused Will?” the blond stammered, eyes wide at the very thought that the couple he knew might not have ever been a couple at all.

“Shocker of shockers, but yes. He had been my partner in raising his brothers since he was 12 . . . he'd never really been a child, not since he was four years old. And I cared for him very deeply; it was hard not to. He was always so serious, so responsible. I could see myself loving him, and to be truthful I was already more than halfway there by the time he enlisted at 18. But I didn't want him to settle when there was a possibility that there was something more out there for him.”

Twisting to cuddle up against her legs, Sam asked, “But you and Dad got together anyway.”

Marina smirked at the question, teasing, “You know that's the first time you've ever called him 'Dad’?”

“What?”
“I’ve been ‘Ma’ for three weeks, but he’s always been ‘Will’. You just called him ‘Dad’.”

Face flaming, Sam sputtered for a moment before protesting, “He's a better dad than mine's ever been. Do you think he'll care?”

“No . . . actually, I think he’ll be very honored,” she promised, leaning forward to brush a warm kiss to the crown of his head.

Gus smiled softly to see the moment between the two, before his curiosity once again overwhelmed him and he asked, “So what's the secret?”

“He’ll never tell his brothers, but one of the reasons he joined the Army was to get some space. So that he could potentially find that ‘something more out there for him’. Only he never found it . . . he didn't even really go looking for it. And by the time he came home on leave when he was 20, I was pretty well head over heels for him.” Blushing, she tucked a curl back behind her ear as she confessed, “He always wrote two letters . . . one for his brothers and one just for me. His letters to his brothers were funny, lighthearted . . . they didn't talk about the hard parts of being a soldier. They didn't talk about the blood and the death and the tears and the pain. They talked about the hilarious prank his sergeant played on him when he was promoted from lieutenant to captain. They talked about the football game that his unit played one day, shirts versus skins . . . and how he had a hell of a time convincing them all he needed to be a shirt.”

Blinking in an effort to hold back tears, she continued, “His letters to me were honest and raw. He told me about the fact that that sergeant lost a leg to an IED two weeks after playing that prank and about the hole he felt where that sergeant should have been. He told me about the guerrilla attack that took out two of the guys from that unit a month after that football game. He told me about the bullets he’d taken, and the wounds he’d suffered. I was the only person he felt he could tell . . . the only person he could count on to actually listen and to care.”

“So what happened?”

“He got sent home on medical leave just before he turned twenty-one . . . his squad had been in a fight in Syria. Half of them didn't make it and the rest were in pretty bad shape. He was totally gutted . . . he wasn't handling it well . . . and I could see how close he was to falling apart.” Scratching at the back of her neck, she hunched in on herself as she confessed, “I've been there . . . it's a dark, miserable and lonely place. In that moment, it didn't matter that I thought he needed someone his own age. It didn't matter that I thought I wasn't good enough for him . . . that my hands were too bloody to ever be anything to him. What mattered was that he needed someone to be there, to hold onto him when he shook himself apart, to remind him that there was beauty in this world . . . and I wanted to be that someone.

“I put the two younger boys to bed that night a little earlier than usual. Brian had a new girlfriend so he was off doing whatever it was that they did together. Jason was at a friend's house that night, working on a group project for school; he'd asked if he could just spend the night, since they would be in town and camp was about five miles outside the city limits. It worked out for everybody in the long run. Misha wasn't quite legal yet but he'd already discovered the numbing properties of a good whiskey; hazards of the job I guess. I found him sitting outside our railcar, sipping on a glass and just watching the whirlwind that was the camp after a show.”

Here she paused, both in the telling and in her caress of fingers through the blond's hair. Drawing his legs up to his chest, Sam leaned back to lay his head against her knees, watching her struggle against whatever emotions she was feeling. “That was the first night we ever made love; he was a 20 year old virgin who needed to lose himself in someone and I was a 45 year old former spy with more than a few unwanted partners littering my job history. After, we talked and we both agreed that no matter what . . . his younger brothers always had to come first. That despite how he felt about me, and despite how I had realized I felt about him, we couldn't be together until they didn't need me anymore. But from that point on, whenever he needed a touchstone, I was there. And I was everything he needed me to be.” Snorting bitterly, she sighed, “Needless to say, it was a long six years.”

Rolling her eyes, she laughed sadly, “Then Clint turned 16 and Barney did what he did. Misha and I both agreed to let Clint lie about his age to enlist so that he didn't run away from home and do it himself. Kenny voluntarily admitted himself to Nevada’s Irwin State Home, a decision I didn't approve of but that he was adamant about doing. At that point, they didn't need me anymore. That same week, I turned myself in to the Pentagon, with Misha at my side, as a defected Russian spy. A month later I had been debriefed and I was given my commission as a Major in the United States Army. I was assigned to the Brat’ya Mrachnyy as the XO to one Lt. Colonel William Michael Grimm. Which, as everyone knows, is the beginning of our story.”

Gus' tone was awed as he breathed, “You gave up six years with him so that you could take care of his brothers while he was gone?”

“He trusted me to take care of them. And I loved him too much to do anything less.”

“Do you regret it?”

She smirked, eyes warm as she replied, “No. Misha and I knew where our priorities laid. But there is a reason we've never told anyone. His brothers would be horrified and devastated and furious that we had decided they were more important than us. So . . . we let them believe what they want to believe, and we know the truth that no one else does.”

Sam rested his chin on her knee as he promised, “I'm sorry, Ma.”

“I'm not . . . neither Misha nor I would change a single second of our lives together. We have no regrets. If we'd been selfish, there's nothing to say that we'd have any regrets either, but at least this was . . . we're sure we don't.”

“How long have you two been together?”

“If you include that first time, it's been about eighteen years. Officially, it's only been twelve.” Seeing the concern and the sadness in both of their eyes, Marina rolled her eyes as she chirped, “Do you want to hear about the time Misha met teenage aliens?”

“WHAT!?” Sam and Gus both blurted together, eyes wide at the question.

“Yeah . . . he and his squad were stationed in Roswell for about six months. The Circus was doing a stint there for a couple months, so he got to spend some time with us while he was on active duty. The boys were ecstatic.”

“I'll bet. Aaron worships him.”

“That hasn't changed much; both Clint and Kenny thought he hung the moon when they were kids. The sight of Misha in full uniform was pretty striking and I can't tell you how many times I used to find them playing soldier, taking turns to be 'Lt. Colonel Will Grimm.’” Rolling her eyes, she huffed. “It was adorable.”

“Okay, you said something about aliens?”
“Yes. So there were these four kids and they were seniors at Roswell High. The government had apparently decided that they were aliens, and they needed to be executed for the sake of national security.”

“You're kidding.”

“Nope. Misha's team was assigned to do it during their high school graduation. Stage a power outage and then take them out... but not a single of them could find it in themselves to do it. They were kids... eighteen years old. So, Misha went against orders. He tricked his superiors into thinking that the kids escaped and he helped them literally disappear out from under their noses.”

“But were they aliens?”

Here Marina's eyes went wide as she nodded. “Yes. They were.”

“What!?"

“Apparently, three of them were half-human and half-Antarian – Max, Isabel and Michael. Max married Liz, who was human but had alien powers. They left town with two other humans. Needless to say, Misha insists to this day that it was the strangest assignment he's ever had.”

“Does he regret it?”

“No. They were good kids. Liz was valedictorian. They all had straight-A averages. Isabel had graduated early and had married a human. The most trouble they'd ever gotten into was when Max and Liz held up a convenience store because there was an honest to god spaceship in the basement... which I'm told was not a joke. There was a spaceship in the basement.”

“Are you telling me there are aliens among us?” Sam asked, eyes wide in appalled daze.

Giggling, she teased, “Never thought you'd get the opportunity to say that did you?”

“Holy shit,” he laughed, shaking his head at the answer. “That's crazy.”

“Agreed... but no less true.”
Wow!!! 15 reviews!! And I promise, we will see Will's reaction to Sam calling him "Dad" and soon. I already have plans.

Also, I am opening commissions so that I can raise some funds to go to Chicago to see Jeremy Renner in August. I want him to sign a mock-up cover of the UALP, and as a single parent of a four year old, money is typically tight. Let me know if you would be interested! Thank you!

Translations at the end as always!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Marina couldn't stop giggling.

The looks on the faces of the two men in front of her was simply too amusing not to completely give into it. “You both look ridiculous,” she chortled, hugging herself around the waist as she collapsed into another fit.

Throwing up her hands in front of her face, she ducked out of the way of the carrot that Gus threw at her. Sam's grin was wry as he rolled his eyes, protesting, “It's a whole new world, Ma. I mean, aliens . . . holy shit.”

Pushing himself to his feet, he stretched upwards over his head. Turning to look at Gus, he asked sheepishly, “Could I borrow a mug? I would kill for some coffee.”

Blinking at the question, Gus nodded as he pushed himself up as well and moved into his tiny kitchen. Reaching up into one of the cabinets, he pulled down a mug and offered it to the younger man with a sheepish smile. “Sorry, man. I totally didn't even realize that we didn't have anything to actually drink it with.”

Waving the apology away, Sam grabbed up the thermos from the table and poured himself a mug. “No big . . . thanks for letting us crash land into your house.”

Rubbing shyly at the back of his neck, Gus looked around at the clapboard walls and sighed. “It's nice having people here . . . I haven't had anyone over to the house since I left the station house.”

Propping up her chin on her palm, Marina hummed lightly as she asked, “Why did you leave the station house?”

The look in those eyes was like a deer in headlights and for a moment, the Russian regretted asking the question in the first place. Glancing at Sam, she could read the same concern for the former firefighter in the depths of eery blue eyes. There was an awkward second, before Sam plopped back down onto the carpet in front of her armchair and demanded, “So what other batshit things have you done, Ma?”

The question jolted Gus out of whatever fugue state he'd been lost in, and he chuckled in response to the way the woman roared with laughter. Getting down two more mugs, as well as digging out some plates and silverware, he came back into the living room in time to hear Marina joke, “Oh . . . there's a lot more where the aliens came from.” Accepting a full mug from him, she grinned up at the Cahill prototype brightly, “Thank you, Gus.”

“Welcome,” he stammered around a blush, hands fumbling over themselves as he tilted the contents of the thermos into his own mug.

Turning her attention back onto her adoptive son, she cocked an eyebrow as she taunted, “Seriously though. Are you or are you not still healing from a zombie bite? After that, aliens can't be that hard to believe, right?”

Gus' hand flew upwards as he demanded, “Wait . . . back up. Zombies!?”

Leaning forward to set his mug on the coffee table, Sam pushed himself to his feet again. Turning his back, he hauled off his t-shirt and laid bare the gruesome wound in the back of his left arm for Gus to see. “I lived through the Zombie Apocalypse and got an ugly scar to prove it,” Sam deadpanned, before pulling his shirt on once again and settling back against Marina's chair again. “It was a bitch, Gus . . . be happy you missed it.”

“So . . . did the zombie movies get anything right?”
Rolling her eyes, Marina huffed, “No. No they did not.”

Leaning back against the couch back, Gus asked calmly, “So what about my other brothers? Do you have any stories about any of them?”

“I have A LOT of stories, Gus . . . trust me, I have more blackmail on the Brothers Grimm than any of them want to acknowledge,” Marina laughed with a playful wink. “Let's see . . . I could tell you about the first time Clint picked up a bow.”

“A bow? Like a bow and arrows?”

“Like I said, the boys grew up in the circus. Clint was twelve years old that first time. Trickshot had seen him throwing knives with me, practicing his aim, and wanted to teach him to shoot.” Rolling her eyes even as she smirked fondly, “Moy dorogoy was desperate to learn. He followed me around for a week, begging and pleading and promising and wheedling.”

“Clint's her favorite. Dad says she's never told him no,” Sam joked, earning a gentle shove from the woman.

“That's not entirely true, but also not the point. Clint has always known how to get me to do what he wanted me to do. So, after a week of constant pleading, I agreed that he could learn how to shoot. Trickshot gave him an old secondhand bow and had him take his first shots that day.” Snorting lightly, she confessed, “Three shots and he'd hit the bull's eye. From that point on, he's never missed. According to both the Army and the President himself, Clint is the World's Greatest Marksman.”

“How do they figure?” was Sam's curious question, eyebrows fret at the statement.

“Every year, the President hosts a shooting contest with the best marksmen in all of the Armed Forces. Every year for the last 15 years, Clint has taken the top score.”

“Surely he doesn't use a bow during the contest . . . right?”

“No. Clint's not really a fan of guns, but he's just as proficient with them as he is with his bow. Vati has been working with him on his effectiveness with short range weapons, but because of his eyesight, Clint is always going to be more accurate at long range. Not that he's bad with a shotgun, he's just not as good as he is with his bow or his rifle.”

“He took the bow to Georgia,” Sam announced with a frown. “Didn't he?”

“Yes, he did. S.H.I.E.L.D. knows his proclivities lay with his bow, so they're willing to indulge the quirk. As long as the objective is met, they don't really care how it's met.”

Gus shook his head as he considered that, chuckling, “I'm decent with a handgun, but a bow would be a new one on me.”

“Never let it be said that my dorogoy isn't special,” Marina laughed with a smirk and a roll of her eyes. “Then of course, there's Kenny – he goes by Aaron now – who is two years older than Clint. The two of them have been as thick as thieves since Clint was born.” Smiling softly, she murmured warmly, “There's a lot I could tell you about Kenny. He was always my sunshine, my solnyshko; such a happy boy, grinning and joyful and just glad to be close to the family. Will and I were always very protective . . . not that he probably needed it, but we didn't want anyone or anything to hurt him.”

“There sounds like there's a story there?” Gus prodded, cocking his head slightly as he watched Marina’s eyes drift towards the window.
“Kenny was eight, I think, so Misha must have been about 16.” Taking a deep breath, she visibly wrestled with the words, before confessing mildly, “Kenny wasn't on par with his brothers, intellectually. He wasn't stupid . . . his intelligence just laid outside of himself whereas the rest of the boys' intelligence is very cerebral. Kenny could do all kinds of things with his hands; I remember when he was six, he heard me complaining about the lack of cabinet space in our little kitchen, so he built me a cabinet. It was a beautiful piece of work, with hand-etched flowers in the wood and working hinges. I still have it . . it's in the bedroom I share with Misha.”

“So what happened?”

“There was this one carnie . . . his name was Derek . . . he was an ass.” Snorting softly, she sighed as she settled back in her chair again. “I don't remember what happened, but Misha found him picking on Kenny. Pushing him around . . . told him he was a worthless piece of shit and that he was too stupid to realize that we would be better off if he killed himself.”

Sam sucked in air, wincing sharply as he imagined his adoptive dad's reaction to that. “What did Will do?”

“Will saw red . . . the guy wasn't eating solid food for about a year after that. Misha was an angry teenager . . . he struggled with nightmares, sleeplessness, lack of appetite. He'd compartmentalized most of the abuse, but the emotions . . . they reared their ugly heads every once in awhile and when that happened, all hell broke loose.”

“Damn,” the blond breathed, eyes wide as he considered that thought.

“Yeah . . . something like that. Misha has always been protective, but Kenny was special to him . . . he looked after Kenny much closer than he did with any of the other boys.”

“So how did Kenny become Aaron?” Gus asked with a frown, remembering that she'd mentioned Kenny was now answering to the other name.

“Classified. That's probably one story, Gus, I will never be able to tell you.”

“Has to do with how he met Aunt Marty, doesn't it?”

“Yes . . . and how his intelligence quotient spiked. There's a lot of people who would kill for that intel, and there's a lot of people who would bury anyone who knew about that intel in the deepest, darkest pit they could find. It's not that you both don't deserve to know . . . it's that I'm trying to protect you by making sure that you don't know.”

“So what about Jason? He's an engineer, right?”

“An engineer and mechanic and hacker and technical specialist and communications officer. Jason is a maverick, which isn't really a bad thing regardless of what the Army would have you believe.” Humming she mused absently, “He's going to kill me for this one.”

“What one? What happened?”

“Right after we escaped, Jason became obsessed with toasters.”

“Toasters?” Gus blurted, eyes flashing wide at the statement.

“He was desperate to know how they worked. He'd sit in the kitchen for hours . . . making toast and trying to figure out how the coils heated up and how the mechanism activated, and what triggered the discharge after the toast was done.” Rubbing two fingers over her forehead, she groaned, “He must have taken apart four of them before he finally came bursting into my room one night. It was three o'clock in the morning, and he's bouncing on my bed and shaking my shoulders and rambling something to do with toasters. I still don't know what he was saying. I just kind of mumbled an affirmative answer, which was apparently satisfactory because he leaped off my bed and out of my room before promptly passing out on the floor outside of the room Will shared with Clint and Kenny.”

There were literal tears rolling down Sam's cheeks as he practically rolled on the floor, laughing at the mental picture. “How old was he?” Gus gasped around his own laughter.

Marina's face twisted as she calculated that before guessing, “Eight? Clint was almost four and Kenny was six, so Jason must have been eight going on nine. It was adorable . . . and frustrating as hell. I kept finding pieces of various toasters underfoot for at least the next three months.”

“Sounds like there was never a dull moment for them growing up?”

“They never wanted for love or for attention. It wasn't a conventional growing up, but all things considered, I think Misha and I did all right.”

“What about Brian?”

“He wasn't Brian then; he was Barney then. Let's just say there's a lot about Barney that we don't talk about in this family. The place they were . . . if Misha was traumatized, Barney was damaged. He cared about his brothers, but there was always a manic edge to everything. He jumped into fights every time we turned around. He picked on his brothers relentlessly, and reduced both Kenny and Clint to tears more than a few times. He spent most of his time with the Swordsman, which looking back on it was probably where most of his behavior and attitude problems came from.”

“Aaron said he left.”

“Mm-hm. Clint was sixteen and Barney let the Swordsman beat his baby brother to hell before they both left him to die. Barney Grimm died that night . . . it was a long time before Brian Grimm was born in his place.” Shaking her head ruefully, “Brian still struggles with Barney on occasion, but he's mostly got him under control.”

“You make it sound like they're two different people.”

“The things that Barney did then are so far removed from the person Brian is now that they could have been performed by two entirely different people, irregardless of the fact that the two men inhabit the same body.”

“So . . . not everything was sunshine and roses.”

“Actually, most things weren't sunshine and roses. Life at the circus was hard; everyday was a fight to put food on the table and to stay hidden as much as we could. But, we were safe there and we had each other. The good didn't usually outweigh the bad, but when things were good, they were good. The younger boys were happier than they'd ever been, and they were young enough that the trauma could start to be forgotten at least in part if not completely.”

Sam closed his eyes as her fingers once again found their way into his hair. “I wish I'd been yours. I know you said things were hard, but at least your boys knew you loved them.”

“Trust me, Sammy . . . I do too. But you're with us now and we're never going to let you go.” Glancing at the clock, her eyes went wide in shock at the time displayed there. “Holy shit, is that the Gus twisted over his shoulder and smirked at the sight of the oven clock. “Wow . . . guess time really does fly when you're having fun.”

“Two o'clock already? No wonder I'm starving. And Misha is probably wondering where the hell I am; I was supposed to report in at noon.” Pushing Sam's head upwards gently, she insisted, “I hate to run like this Gus, but we should probably be on our way.”

“Do you have to?” he asked, pushing himself up to his own feet and shoving his hands into his pockets self-consciously. “I mean . . . I have more than enough space if you guys wanted to come stay with me while you're in town. And I'd like to talk more . . . if that's okay with you.”

Marina's eyes were wide at the statement, twisting slightly to look at where her son was still sitting on the floor beside her vacated armchair. “What do you think, Sammy-honey?”

“I don't mind staying here . . . besides I like hearing your stories.”

Biting down lightly on her lower lip, she cocked an eyebrow at Gus. “Are you sure, Gus? We have a hotel room. Our reservation is for a week and it would be just fine if you didn't want to host us here.”

“I really don't mind. It's nice not being the only person in the house anymore.”

Taking a deep breath, Marina squared her shoulders and nodded solemnly. “All right then . . . that sounds fantastic, Gus, thank you.”

“So . . . what happens now?”

“Well, if Sam wants to head to the motel to get our things, I can fix something for lunch.”

The blond grinned brightly, as he bumped his hip fondly against the woman's. “You're in for a treat, Gus . . . Ma's pretty much the best cook ever.”

“Vrun,” the Russian scolded, smacking at him half-heartedly. “You shouldn't make general statements like that, Sammy. It's a terrible habit.”

Bending to press a smacking kiss to her cheek, Sam dodged her retaliatory smack as he moved towards the door. “Love you, Ma.”

“Love you too, Sammy. Go on . . . I'll have lunch ready by the time you get back.”

“Sounds awesome. Be back soon,” he called, before he disappeared from the house with the door swinging shut behind him.

Turning on her heel to face Gus, she folded her arms over her chest and insisted, “Please tell me you have more in your fridge than expired ketchup and a primitive society in your mayonaise jar?”

“Uh, I think so.”

“Good. Then let's get started. The hotel isn't that far away; Sam'll be back before we know it.”

Chapter End Notes
Translations:

(R) moy dorogoy - my darling (Marina's nickname for Clint Grimm)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel Kuhn)
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Kenny/Aaron Grimm)
(R) Vrun - liar
Chapter 182: Facing the Music

Will's tone was fond, if mildly exasperated, as he asked, “What part of ‘no direct interaction or interference’ did you have trouble understanding with this one, Marina?”

Cocking an eyebrow at the computer, she reminded him gently, “You and I both know that I wasn't going to be able to walk away from this one, Misha.”
“Knowing something intellectually and knowing it in reality are two entirely different things, Marishka,” he scolded gently, one hand coming up to pinch the bridge of his nose. “Can you just explain to me why? You were content to keep your distance from Dillon Stephanowski and you were the one who insisted on no contact altogether with William James. So why Gus Maitland?”

Biting on her lip, she braced her chin on her knuckles as she considered his picture on the laptop screen. She was sitting in the small guest room Gus had shown her and Sam after the blond had returned with their things. Currently, the two boys were watching a hockey game in the living room, and Marina was left to report in to her lover. Finally, she shrugged lightly as she confessed, “I don't know if I can explain it, Mishka.”

“I will accept any attempt you can make, samaya malen'kaya.”

Huffing lightly, she decided just to bite the bullet and insisted. “I see so much of you in him, Misha. In fact, there is a large part of me that truly believes he is you . . . without a proverbial me. And not me personally, but what I represent to you; peace, calm . . . a safe place. So where you have a safe harbor in me, he is completely adrift and alone. No family, no girlfriend and his only real friend is thirteen years old. Except for Malee, there has never been anyone in his life who cared enough to throw him a life preserver. And did I mention she was thirteen?”

Will's lips compressed at that thought, quicksilver eyes watching his partner as she gnawed restlessly on her thumbnail. When she returned her gaze to his own, she asked carefully, “We can both agree that you're a little damaged, right?”

Chuckling bitterly, the Colonel was forced to nod once in agreement. “Nothing I can say to dispute that. We all know it and to be honest, it's not something I've ever felt the need to hide.”

Rolling her eyes at the truth in that statement, Marina leaned her weight on her folded arms as she continued, “So you're damaged. Your brothers and I have both expended a lot of time and energy over the last 26 years trying to heal those fissures, to fit as many pieces back together as we could. Do you agree with that?”

“Da.”

“Okay, so consider the fact that you're irreparably broken . . . and then think about what it means when I tell you that Gus is completely shattered. And there’s no one here who even knows that there are massive pieces missing.” Her hands came up in supplication as she implored her partner fervently. “I can't just abandon him, Mishka.”

Slouching backwards in his chair, the Colonel ran a frustrated hand back through his hair. “So what do you want to do? Uproot him from his whole life and transplant him in New York?”

“No . . . I just want to be his friend. I want you to be his brother, for all of the boys to be his brothers. I want Sam to be his nephew, and Vati to be as close to his father as the both of them will allow.” Closing her eyes, she confessed, “I want him to be family. Is that such a terrible request?”

“Ah zhemchuzhina . . . you wouldn't be you, if you weren't trying to adopt the world,” Will chuckling softly, fingernails scrubbing briskly through his hair before he sat up once again. “What does he know?”

“Nothing . . . I haven't told him anything about Cahill or about how he was conceived. Frankly, I didn't think that that was intel he needed.”

“So what have you been telling him? It's nearly 6 o'clock here at home, Marishka and I know you.
You've been with him all day.”

“I've just been telling him about you and the boys. Sharing stories to help him paint a picture of who you all are.”

“What kind of stories?” the man asked, a small smirk on his lips as he watched her smirk mischievously.

“Jason's obsession with toasters, for starters.” That earned a real laugh, as Will took a moment to recall that memory and enjoy it. Smiling at the sound, Marina continued, “Our love story . . . the real one. Your need to protect Kenny when he was a kid. Clint's first time with a bow. Just . . . stories that don't really mean anything . . . but at the same time amount to everything.”

Chuckling, the Colonel inquired, “You told him about Bucharest yet?”

“You mean the 'Epic Disaster'? No, I wanted to talk to you before I shared that particular story. It was a hell of a fuck up.”

“No kidding. I still can't figure out how you agreed to stay my girlfriend after that mess,” he muttered with a huff. Listening to Marina giggle, he insisted fondly, “Just leave out the part where you blew up the cafe okay?”

“Aw . . . that's the best part,” she teased, with a wink and a cheeky grin.

Rolling his eyes at her, he folded his arms over his chest and joked, “And suddenly I understand why we only watch action movies together.”

“Ha ha, very funny. Technically, we watch a lot of Chinese action movies together . . . which are typically explosion-lite.”

“Good point,” he drawled. “So what's the plan here? Are you going to head up to Toronto early? You going to stay in Beaver Creek a few days? What do you want to do?”

“I don't know.” Running a hand back through her hair, she sighed, “It's going to take awhile to get Sammy settled. He needs a place to live . . . a car . . . furniture. It's not like I'm just going to drop him in Toronto with nothing then leave.”

“Place to live? Are we thinking an apartment or a house?”

“An apartment could be tricky. He's ex-JTF2, Special Forces trained. A lot of people close by that he doesn't know? Loud music . . . loud fighting . . . loud anything? All of it is going to be problematic.”

Cocking an eyebrow at him, she taunted, “I mean, would we have wanted to live in an apartment after getting home from a deployment?”

“I see your point. Okay, so we're going to buy him a house?”

“I think it would be the best idea, all factors considered. A quiet neighborhood. Definitely big enough to be able to have guests over; I don't intend to never drop in to see my boy, you know that. And if I'm going to be visiting, I am not staying in a hotel. Someone has to feed him every once in awhile.”

There was a fond, resigned tilt to his smile as he teased, “You're going to stock his freezer with homemade meals, aren't you?”

“That's a ridiculous question. Of course I am,” she drawled with a roll of her eyes.
Chuckling, her lover teased fondly, “You remember he's 26 years old and probably perfectly capable of feeding himself?”

“Uh-huh. Which is why he weighed in at fifteen pounds underweight at his S.H.I.E.L.D. physical. Clearly someone has to feed him. And he likes my cooking, which means that he'll actually eat my cooking.”

“Okay. So how long do you think you'll need in Toronto?”

“Two weeks . . . maybe three?”

Only someone who had known her lover as long, and as intimately, as Marina had would have seen the way his shoulders drooped dejectedly. “Oh . . . I guess that means you're going to miss my birthday huh?”

“I have no intention of missing your birthday, Mishka,” she insisted vehemently, frowning fiercely at the very thought. “Why don't you come up to Toronto a couple days before? Bring everybody . . . we can get Sam set up and celebrate the most important day in my year.”

“Most important day in your year, huh?” he laughed, his tone more than a little self-deprecating.

Tone fondly scolding, she protested gently, “The day you were born was kind of a big deal for me.”

“Yeah, I guess.”

“Mishka . . . I wish I could make you understand how very much I love you.”

Leaning forward in his chair, he insisted, “Ignore me. I'm just feeling a little maudlin.”

“Anything I can do?”

“Nah . . . I just want to be able to hold you. And since I can't do that, I will content myself with this.”

“It's only a couple more weeks. At which point, I promise, I am going to embarrass you with a massive public display of affection.”

“You know how I feel about PDA, Marishka.”

“Which is exactly why I'm going to do it.” Watching him roll his eyes at her, she couldn't resist the smile that crept across her features. “Whatcha thinking 'bout, handsome?”

“Not much . . . just how very lucky I am. And how much I love you.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, Mishka . . . vsegda.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, sumasshedshaya devochka.”

Grinning brightly at the long unheard nickname she teased, “Only you would accuse someone of insanity because they just professed their undying love for you.”

“You've always been crazy, Marishka . . . but at least you're my kind of crazy.”

“Flatterer,” she laughed, head dropping back as she giggled, relieved that he was once again willing to be playful with her.

About then, there was a ruckus on Will's side of the conversation, as a door flew open and Marina could hear the youngest Grimm call cheerfully, “Is that Marina!?”

Chuckling at his brother’s usual exuberance, he nodded once. “Da.”

Clint and Aaron were almost immediately in the picture, both of them grinning at her brightly as they cheered together, “Hi Marishka!”

“All domashniy. Up to no good again?”

Clint drew back in mock-hurt, one hand coming up to press to his chest lightly. “Except for the fact that you know me better than anyone except for Kenny here, I would be deeply offended by that question. As it is . . . how’d you know?”

Shaking her head fondly, she joked, “Lucky guess. Do yourselves a favor, and don’t spy on Maria and your father again, okay?”

“Not a chance in hell!” both brothers burst out instantly, their faces contorting into sheer horror at the very thought.

“So . . . what have you two been up to since I’ve been gone?”

Aaron rolled his eyes as Clint chimed in, “Will's still giving Pops the silent treatment.”

Marina frowned at that information, able to see the way that her partner looked away at that announcement. Eyebrows furrowing lightly, she turned her attention back on Clint and insisted, “Leave it be. That has nothing to do with you.”

“But . . .!” he protested, blinking as the Russian snapped fiercely, “I'm serious, Clinton Francis. Promise me.”

Sighing heavily at the admonition, Clint slumped as he agreed, “I promise.” Blowing a raspberry, he muttered, “Of course you'd take Will's side.”

“I'm not taking anyone's side, dorogoy . . . I'm simply insisting that this is something your brother and your father need to settle between themselves. Sticking your nose into it, isn't going to fix anything. Dong le ma’?”

“Da,” was the sullen agreement from both brothers.

“All right . . . so how many things have you two blown up in the last two weeks?”

“At least a dozen,” was Will's response, a cocked eyebrow directed at Aaron as the older of the Terrible Twosome blushed all the way to his ears.

“That last one wasn't my fault,” the blue eyed Grimm protested, eyes wide in protests and earning a soft chuckle from his sister. “How was I supposed to know that the combination was volatile?”

“Research? Testing?”

“What do you think I was doing? Trial and error is a perfectly valid testing mechanism!” was Aaron's response, narrowing his eyes at his brother.

The Colonel smirked at the protest, earning a stuck-out tongue from the younger brother. Rolling his eyes, Will returned the gesture briefly, before getting up from his chair. “It's getting a little cramped in here I think. Marishka, I'll let you three talk and I'll talk to you again tomorrow.”
“Misha . . . this is not over,” she protested, knowing that her partner would read between the lines.

Leaning into the camera's sights, he gave her a small smile as he agreed, “I never dreamed it was.”

“Lyublyu tebya, moya Mishka.”

“Lyublyu tebya, samaya malen'kaya. I'll talk to you tomorrow,” he promised, blowing a brief kiss at the screen before disappearing from view. It was barely a moment later that the door to his office clicked closed behind him as he left the room.

There was a half beat of silence before Aaron spoke up quietly, “You really don't want us to get involved with this thing between Dad and Will? It's been weeks! Will isn't sleeping. He's barely eating. Honest, Marishka, I think this is the first time in three weeks, I haven't seen him glued to this thing. What is he looking for?”

“Oh solnyshko, even if I told you . . . you'd never believe me,” she sighed, sadness radiating from her eyes, Will's tired and drawn features all she could see in her mind's eye.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for his longtime partner and lover Marina)
(R) Da - yes
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel)
(R) zhemechuzhina - pearl (one of Will's less common nicknames for Marina)
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) Vsegda - always
(R) sumasshedshaya devochka - crazy girl (another of Will's less common nicknames for Marina)
(R) Allo - hello
(R) domashniy - pets (an interchangeable nickname Marina uses for Jason, Clint and Kenny/Aaron Grimm)
(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint)
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Aaron/Kenny)
Hey guys! Still loving your comments and thoughts. I can't wait to hear what you think about this one.

Okay, so I just need to clarify here. The situation Marina and Sam go observe pretty much goes down exactly like it did in the show. (If you've never seen the show, there's a hostage situation, a Croatian guy has a woman at gunpoint, and the SRU sniper is forced to shoot him when he shows imminent threat to the team. Also, Sam doesn't make the best impression, but really . . . not entirely his fault.) I don't feel the need to go into that part, since there's no point in rehashing in fic what happened on screen. So, we skipped ahead a little bit, and Sam is still being made to suffer from that less than stellar first impression.

No translations this time. Enjoy the new banner! Sammy's a Grimm now!
Chapter 183: Going Back

It was a week later before Sam and Marina finally decided to leave Beaver Creek. It was going to be a seventeen hour drive to Toronto, and Marina wanted the sniper to have some say in the house she would be purchasing for him. So, even though she didn't want to leave the Cahill prototype, it was time for the two to leave.

Malee and Gus stood outside the house, watching together as Sam and Marina piled their things in the trunk of the Charger. “You have your passport, Sammy?”

“Yeah, it's in the glove box,” the blond replied, bending forward to rearrange the suitcases to make everything fit. “Do you?”

“I always have a passport, Sammy. Now whether it's actually mine or not is dependent on the situation,” she cackled with a wink and a grin.

Chuckling at the reply, Sam shoved hard once and watched with satisfaction as the suitcases fell into place. “Finally . . . this trunk has absolutely no space.”
“It's a sports car. What were you expecting?” she taunted fondly, dodging the pen he threw at her with a giggle. Turning to face the other two, Marina felt her heart lodge up in her throat. Coming over, she threw her arms around Gus' neck and squeezed tightly. There was a moment where the man stood frozen, obviously shocked at the action, before his shoulders loosened and he wrapped his arms around her waist firmly. “I am so happy I got to meet you, Gus. Are you sure you don't want to come with us? The boys are coming to Toronto to help Sammy move into his new place. They’d all love to meet you.”

“I don't think so . . . maybe I'll meet you up there later. Not right now.”

“All right. If you change your mind, just let me know. We would love to have you. Okay?”

He nodded with a shy smile, tightening his arms around her waist for a long moment before releasing her and taking a step back. Cupping his cheek fondly for a moment, she turned her attention on the teenager again. “I need you to look after him for me, Malee.”

“No problem,” the girl promised with a smile. “I mean, I kinda like the guy.”

Grinning at her, Marina laughed, “I do too.” Stepping forward, she wrapped her arms around the girl's shoulders and hugged her tightly. “You are going to be a hell of a woman someday, Malee Chuang. I hope you know that.”

Reaching into her pocket, Malee pulled out Marina's card. “And in nine years, I'll make sure that I'm even more awesome than you think I'll be.”

Chuckling, the Russian agreed, “I am looking forward to it.”

Bending to drop a fond kiss to the top of the girl's head, she stepped back to watch Sam take his turn at goodbyes. Offering the older man a hand, the blond insisted, “Welcome to the family, Uncle Gus.”

The former firefighter blinked at the address, before smiling softly. “Uncle, huh?”

“You're my dad's brother . . . what else am I going to call you?” he asked with a bright grin on his lips and in his eyes.

Clasping Sam's hand firmly, Gus hauled him in for a one-armed embrace. The two grunted and slapped backs for a bit, causing a roll of the eyes from both Malee and Marina at the display of typical male affection. “If you two are finished posturing, we should probably get going? I would like to beat rush hour traffic in Milwaukee.”

Rolling his eyes, Sam stepped back once again, shaking the other man's hand firmly. “Thanks for having us.”

“Thanks for coming. You'll come back right?”

“Yeah. If I know Ma, now that you're family . . . you'll never be free of her.”

“Hey!” Marina protested with a chuckle and a grin. “I don't typically hear you complaining!”

“That would be because I don't. I like being yours,” Sam agreed, digging in his pocket for the keys. He squawked in protest as nimble fingers reached out and plucked them from his fingers, tossing them into the air with a laugh. “Hey!”

“Bet's over, Sammy . . . my turn to drive.”
“Can you promise you won't listen to anything weird?”

“Driver picks the music, Sammy . . . shotgun shuts their cakehole,” Marina taunted, tongue between her teeth as she laughed at his wretched groan. “Oh it’s not that bad. I promise . . . you'll probably even like it.”

“Uh-huh,” he groaned, reaching out to hug Malee quickly before moving towards the passenger seat of the Charger. Dropping into the seat, he slammed the door and strapped himself in. Turning back to the two still standing on Gus’ driveway, he waved as he called, “Bye guys! See you around!”

“Looking forward to it!” Gus agreed, one arm around Malee's shoulders as the two waved after the car as Marina roared the engine.

“Love you both! Keep in touch!” Marina insisted, hand coming over the top of the windshield, before she shifted the car into reverse and backed out of the driveway.

“We will! Be careful!” Malee called, hopping up onto her tiptoes to continue waving after them as the car backed into the street and began to move away. Once the car was out of sight, the teenager looked up at her friend with a timid smile. “They were pretty cool.”

“Yeah . . . I'm going to miss them.”

“Me too. Hey! Wanna see what Marina left for you for lunch?”

“How about we go to the diner for lunch? Just you and me.”

“Cool,” the girl agreed, wrapping her arm around his waist and hugging him tightly. “Come on! I'm starved!”

“Oh . . . the joys of being a teenager,” Gus mocked, laughing as he dodged away from the retaliatory punch to his arm. Collaring her around the neck, he laughed as he rubbed his knuckles fondly over her hair. “Come on, squirt. My treat.”

***************************

It was nearly two days later when Sam and Marina arrived at Toronto's city limits. Sam frowned at the sight of the city where he'd spent at least some part of his childhood growing up. Glancing over at him as she shifted gears, the Russian asked carefully, “You okay?”

“Yeah. I just . . .” pausing, the blond seemed to gather his thoughts for a moment before continuing, “. . . the General and my mother are still here. I don't really think I even wanted to come back.”

“Sammy, no one is making you stay. If you don't want to be here, we'll go home. I will turn this car towards New York City and we will never look back. It's your call, malysh.”

Taking a deep breath, he watched the skyline get closer for a long time before he shook his head. “I may take you up on that at a later date. But for right now . . . I need to do this.”

“You let me know the second you change your mind. I will not have you be unhappy here, Sammy. Okay?”

Nodding once in agreement, he promised, “Okay.”

Reaching forward for the radio, Marina flicked it on and scanned through stations before finding one that was broadcasting a news report. Both glanced at the radio as the anchor reported that Toronto’s
SRU had responded to a situation in the downtown area, where a man was holding a woman hostage at gunpoint after shooting and critically wounding another. Cocking an eyebrow at him, she asked, “Wanna check it out?”

“Yeah . . . let's go see what the SRU can do.”

“Sounds like a plan,” she agreed, downshifting rapidly as she turned off the freeway and gunned it towards downtown.

********************

It wasn't long before a couple weeks had passed. Marina could tell that Sam wasn't happy, though whenever she'd question him about it he'd insist that he was F.I.N.E. – which he damn well knew that the entire family used as an acronym and not as the word was intended – and change the subject to whatever new thing she was doing with the house she'd bought for him. Finally, she stopped asking, trusting that he would come to her if he needed to.

Finally, it was three days before Will Grimm's 40th birthday. The Grimms were going to be flying in the following day to help finish the renovations and getting Sammy settled in. The blond had a shift at the SRU and Marina was juggling S.H.I.E.L.D. tele-conferences around meetings with the contractors and construction workers finishing up the last major changes to the house. That was the day that life for Samuel Wayne Braddock changed completely.

********************

Winnie Camden looked up at the sound of footsteps on the linoleum, watching as a pretty young woman with curly brown hair and dark eyes approached her desk with a small smile. “Welcome to the SRU. How can I help you?” the dispatched asked, eyes taking in the woman's gray-green henley, black leather jacket, heavy boots, backpack and motorcycle helmet.

“I'm looking for Sam Braddock? Is he here or is Team One out on a call?”

Unable to help her reaction, Winnie reared back slightly at the question. “Um . . . they're in the middle of a debriefing. Can I help?”

“No, but thanks. I'll just wait.”

“You sure? They could be awhile.”

The woman's smile flattened slightly as she insisted coldly, “I'll wait.”

Blinking at the hostility she could see in those eyes, Winnie nodded her agreement. “Of course. There's some benches along that wall if you'd like to sit down while you wait for him.”

“Thank you.”

“You're welcome,” the brunette replied, watching as the other women moved across the open area to take a seat against the wall.

Curling up sideways, she braced one shoulder against the concrete wall and then slumped. Cocking an eyebrow as she mentally reviewed the conversation, it was a moment before Winnie returned her attention onto her computer.

About twenty minutes later, SRU’s Team One exited the briefing room. Looking up, the woman caught sight of the blond trailing behind the others as per usual. He was looking a little beaten down, watching his boots as he shuffled along. Granted, he hadn't made a very good first impression, but even still Winnie felt bad for him. Team One were constantly yelling at him, and there were a couple times that the dispatcher literally watched the constable go soldier, face set in stone and tone calm as he caved to whatever recriminations the Sarge, Ed, or any of the others were throwing at him.

Shaking herself free from her thoughts, she stood from her chair and called, “Hey Sam!”

Looking up curiously, it was evident from the look on his face that the youngest member of Team One was very aware of the rest of Team One’s interest in their exchange. “What’s up, Winnie?” he asked, tone tired and stressed out.

Gesturing towards the entry hall, she replied, “You have a visitor. Showed up about half an hour ago.”

Frowning, the sniper stepped around her desk so that he could see, shoulders tensing at the knowledge that his so-called Team was following his actions to get their own look at his visitor. Everyone watched as his whole body visibly brightened at the sight of the woman seated there. Striding forward eagerly, he reached out to touch her shoulder.

Team One gawked as the second his fingertips connected, she was whirling to her feet, one hand ripping a Magnum Desert Eagle from a holster at her back and bringing the muzzle to a rest inches from Sam’s face. Her eyes dark and focused, features set, her finger poised delicately over the trigger. (Ed Lane, Team One’s Team Leader, would recall this moment with a shocked kind of embarrassment. What kind of crack police force stands in shock when a tiny chick pulls a gun on one of their own?)

Surprisingly, Sam seemed to be the only one who wasn’t surprised. He showed no fear as he held up his hands slowly in a universal sign of “harmless and unarmed.” He could see by the look on her face, she wasn’t all there; whatever she’d been thinking of, he’d startled her out of a pretty thorough thought process. “Easy Marishka . . .” he soothed, hands moving into a slow shrug as he gave her a self-deprecating smile, “. . . it’s just me. It’s Sam.”

At the sound of his voice, her eyes cleared as a quiet gasp ripped from her chest, her body relaxing out of its alert readiness. Taking a shaky breath, she flicked the safety on the Magnum with her thumb and tucked the weapon away once again. One hand trembled as it came up to fold over her forehead. Forcing out a harsh breath, she gasped, “Shit . . . sorry, Sammy-honey.”

Michaelangelo Scarlatti – most commonly known as Spike – opened his mouth to crack a joke about her usage of the name. Sam had made his opinion known on his teammates using that nickname vehemently and the fact that this woman was using it so easily bred some intense curiosity. Before he could finish his thought, however, Sergeant Gregory Parker waved the bomb tech to silence. The young man in front of him was an entirely different side of the brash young sniper, one that Team One had not yet seen. Hopefully, by observing Sam with the newcomer, Parker could gain some insight into the notoriously cocky but close-mouthed young man.

Sam spoke up then, cocking his head an inch to the left as he lowered his hands. “Nah . . . that was all my fault. I know better than to startle the soldiers, spies and assassins in this family,” he promised, tone even and peaceful, reaching out to ease her into a stabilizing hug. He knew better than anyone that the adrenaline rush she was feeling was leaving her feeling a little shaky at best and like a live wire at worst. “Come on . . . sit down.”

The woman practically dropped onto the bench, the blond taking the seat next to her. “What are you doing here, Marina?”
Having flipped open his notebook, Parker was scribbling notes as he observed. The name “Marina” made it onto the page, with a single line leading to a bubble asking, “occupation?” This bubble led to three more lines, ending in bubbles labeled “spy”, “assassin” and “soldier”. Looking up, Parker watched as the woman worked to come down from her high, stammering as she tried to come up with a coherent answer.

Shrugging off his over-shirt, Sam draped it around her shoulders and wrapped both arms around her tightly. “Where are you right now?”

Fingers clutching his forearms desperately, she confessed with a shaky laugh, “A long ways from here.” Gesturing to the backpack at her feet, she forced her attention onto answering his original question. “You forgot your lunch. And I have that meeting with the contractor today . . . and the Barn is on the way . . . so I just thought I'd drop it by . . .” she rambled, forcing it out in a single breath. There was a pause as she took a lungful of air, before she continued, “I put some of those homemade power bars that you like in there. I figured you should get some before the boys showed up to devour them all tomorrow. And I made sure to add some more of those energy chews that you like; I swear, I only grabbed the orange ones. And I was bored, so I think there's steak stir-fry with sauteed shitakke mushrooms, carrots and peppers, with homemade fried rice and a couple fresh egg rolls in there.”

Eery blue eyes narrowed as she continued to ramble, shaking her gently as he demanded, “What's wrong?”

“Nothing,” was the immediate answer, her wince a clear indication that she knew she'd answered too quickly to be believed. “I'm F.I.N.E.”

Frowning at the deflection, he asked, “Freaked out, Insecure, Neurotic and Emotional?”

Chuckling at the question, she shoved one hand through her hair as she replied, “Among other things. But really. I'm okay.”

“No you're not. Come on, Ma,” he scolded, earning another bubble attached to the woman's name in Parker's book, the two letter word underlined several times to stress Parker's confusion at the terminology. “You're all over the place. You're never like this. What's wrong?”

There was a long moment of silence, the two practically glaring at each other before Marina slumped. “Aaron went dark this morning.”

Sam's eyes flashed wide, clearly the only person in the room who understood what that meant. “What!? When?”

“A little after 0900 Juliet. He's on a solo . . . it's supposed to be a milk run, picking up a dead drop. Fly down . . . collect the intel . . . come home; easy peasy. Twenty four hours, there and back. But he missed his check-in and Jason can't raise him on comms.”

“Is the comm still working?”

“Yeah . . . it's picking up a GPS location based on his DNA signature. And it's still recording and transmitting vital signs. So at least we know he's alive. But there's nothing actionable we can do about it yet.”

“Why not?”

“Technically, it's still an active op. Assets go dark all the time; the mission's not a bust until or unless he misses his extraction.”
“And when is that?”

Reaching over, Marina grabbed Sam's wrist and twisted it so that she could see his watch. “Four hours and twenty-seven minutes. At four hours and twenty-eight minutes, that plane leaves the tarmac whether he’s on it or not.”

“What happens then?”

“Officially? No exfil . . . no sanctioned exit strategy. He has to get himself out. Or at least that’s the official word that'll get passed down from ‘On High’,” Marina drawled, sarcasm tingling her words as she rolled her eyes. “But my boys won't leave him there. It wouldn't be the first time the Grimms have gone dark to recover one of their own. Probably not the last either.”

“I'm pretty sure I don't want to know . . . but where is he?” Sam asked, eyes narrowed as he read the concern and terror in Marina's posture.

There was a distinct accent as she replied, “Colombia . . . Medellin.”

“Fuck!” the blond hissed, visibly recoiling at the announcement.

“Yeah. Not somewhere you want to leave an agent unaccounted for,” she laughed, the tone bordering on hysterical as she started gasping in air to avoid the collapse into tears the woman clearly knew she was approaching.

Hauling her into him, he held her as tightly as he could manage as she took a second to smother her sobs into his shoulder. “He just came home, Sammy . . . I can't lose him again so soon,” she gasped, struggling to regain her composure.

“You're not gonna lose him. Aaron's badass . . . he's gonna be fine.” Biting down on his lower lip, he asked cautiously, “You told Aunt Marty yet?”

“No. Until there's a reason to worry, I see no point in burdening her with the concern. As far as she knows, everything's going exactly as planned.”

“Tell a spy your plans . . .” he taunted, remembering one of the jokes her sister Nika was always needling her with.

Laughing, she rolled her eyes as she finished the thought, “. . . watch them fuck it up.” Shaking her head at the statement, she reached up with both hands and rubbed briskly at her face. “I needed that.”

“I know,” he agreed, leaning over to bump his shoulder against her fondly. “You gonna be okay?”

“It's gonna be a long four and a half hours, but I'll manage. I trust Misha. He's got this.” Glancing down at Sam's watch again, she grimaced as she groaned, “And I am late.”

Leaning over, she fished out his lunch from her backpack and offered it to him with a smirk. “Remember to eat it, please?”

“Yes ma'am.”

“Sammy . . . I'm serious.”

Rolling his eyes, he took the box in one hand as he used the other to corral her around the neck and press a kiss to her temple. “I promise.”

“All right. Walk me out?”
Nodding once in agreement, he looped one arm around her shoulders while the other gripped his lunch. It was as they were heading out the door that the rest of Team One heard Sam ask, “So when is Dad getting here, anyway?”

“Tomorrow . . . same as yesterday and the day before that,” she teased, chuckling lightly as the two disappeared through the door and out of earshot.

“What the hell just happened?”

“We saw Sam connect . . . just like he would with any other subject. He negotiated her down . . . regardless of previous connection, that's exactly what we saw just happen,” Parker insisted, smiling lightly at the knowledge.

Looking up as Sam made his way back into the headquarters, Ed demanded angrily, “Who was that!”

Those eyes flashed as the blond looked up at his team leader. And for the first time that any of Team One could remember, Sam stood up to Ed and insisted, “None of your damned business.”

Ed blinked at the answer, watching in surprise as Sam brushed past and headed towards the conference room to study the materials to improve his negotiation skills and eat his lunch. Surprised by the answer, Parker turned to face Spike. “I need you to find out as much as you can about this woman. The more we learn about her . . . the more we'll learn about Sam.”

Spike nodded slowly, frowning as he took the page. “There's gotta be a million Marinas in the world, Boss. How do you suggest I narrow it down to just this one?”

“Start with border patrol. She's Russian . . . there's an accent there,” Jules Callaghan spoke up, an underlying jealous clinging to her tone. “She had to have come into the country recently. Maybe even with Sam.”

“I'll see what I can do,” the hacker promised, before he dashed off towards his laptop computer.

“Everyone else . . . barring any hot calls, we are on inventory duty.”

“What about Sam?” Lou asked, glancing back towards where the former soldier was seated at the conference room table, reading through the study materials he'd been provided diligently.

“Leave him be . . . he's where he needs to be right now,” Sarge insisted, watching Sam munch absentely on an egg roll, with a small happy grin curving up the corners of his lips.
Wow!!! The continued response to these chapters continues to warm my heart of heart! I hope you continue to read and enjoy!

Okay, so for those who haven't seen the show. The second episode is about a father who holds a hospital hostage because his dying daughter is being denied a heart that was "supposed" to go to her. Sam is still mostly soldier at this point, and makes suggestions based on THAT training set. It doesn't end well, and Ed Lane DOES in fact send him on a coffee run. So yeah. Not awesome.

Opheliamblack: As for Mrs. Braddock, she's pretty well burned her bridges, though we will see Natalie and even Sam's bio-parents again. Aaron doesn't ever see the General again, but he does regrettably make another unwelcome appearance in Sam's life soon.

Only one translation, but should be pretty self-explanatory. Enjoy! And if anyone can tell me how many Grimms are wearing SHIELD patches or pins (NOT YOU JULOREAN!), there will be a Malee short very soon. So look hard. :D
Chapter 184: Reunions

Will Grimm sat at his desk in the heart of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Analysis Department, trying to finish up the last few items that needed to be done before the family – Owen Elliot, James Doyle, Scarlett Levy, Vincent Keller and Catherine Chandler included – flew to Toronto the following afternoon. On one corner of his desk, there was a small timer, counting down the final 94 minutes before Aaron missed his extraction and Will's much-deserved vacation was officially canceled. Glancing toward the door at the sound of a knock, he called firmly, “Come!”

The handle turned and Jason stepped through the door, wearing a dark gray, grease-stained muscle tank and a pair of black tactical cargoes. There were at least three tools shoved into the pocket at his left thigh and in his hand he carried his S.H.I.E.L.D.-issued tablet . . . that everyone knew he'd enhanced and reconfigured, even though he wasn't supposed to. “Hey big brother.”

Smiling at the middle Grimm, Will flipped closed the file he was signing off on and leaned back in his chair. “Hey Jay, Good timing . . . I was needing a break.” Leaning back in his chair, he cocked an eyebrow at the fierce frown on the younger brother's face. “Something I should know?”

“Someone's looking for information on Marina. The hack originated in Toronto.”
“You can't think it was Sam. Considering everything, that's ridiculous.”

“No, it's not Sam. Marina would tell him anything he wanted to know; he knows just to ask her,” Jason agreed with a smirk. “No, this is a sophisticated attack. And as good as Sam is with a rifle, his computer skills are severely lacking. It's definitely someone else.” Huffing out a breath as he glanced down at the tablet in his hands, he tapped out a rapid series of commands, before returning his attention back to his brother. “So far, I've managed to block every attempt the guy's made. As of now, they're not getting anything. But they're pretty determined, Will . . . and I have to sleep at some point.”

Humming in agreement, Will leaned forward in his chair to wake his computer monitor. A couple quick keystrokes and he had the dossiers for Sam's new team on the screen. Browsing quickly through each members' specialties, he reached out and tapped his pen against a picture labeled “Scarlatti, Michelangelo . . . Tech Support/Bomb Disposal.”

There was a long moment as Jason waited for the Colonel to come to whatever decision he was stewing on before quicksilver eyes looked up to catch his brother's own green ones. “Let him have what he wants, but control what information we release. Army record's okay – so long as it's not redacted or classified – but S.H.I.E.L.D. is off limits. Make sure to cut off all references to the Red Room or the Brat'ya Mrachnyy. Oh, and limit their access to her known associates. I want to be able to put a stop to the information Constable Scarlatti locates if I need to.”

“Controlled release . . . I can set up a program to do that,” Jason agreed, looking down at the tablet again as he made a few notations.

Smirking at his brother, the older teased, “You can sit down you know, Jay.”

“I know . . . but I am dead on my feet. If I sit, I'm going to crash.”

“Working on something? Or just playing with a new toy?”

Green eyes were wide with false innocence as Jason asked wickedly, “Can't it be both?”

Rolling his eyes at the non-answer, Will leaned back in his chair again. Rejoining S.H.I.E.L.D. had been good for the middle brother. There was a spring in his step that there hadn't been for awhile, and though he still picked up a couple shifts here and there at the Second Precinct with Casey, for the most part the couple seemed content to settle into their new jobs as Department Head of Research and Development and Tactical Security. If the Colonel knew his partner at all – and he did – Marina was going to be thrilled.

A quick glance at the countdown brought reality crashing back to the forefront of his mind, wincing to see the time continuing to wind down. Catching the look, the younger of the two grimaced apologetically. “Oops . . . I almost forgot. I finally managed to get a hold of Aaron.”

Will's eyes slipped closed in relief, “Thank God. He okay?”

“Apparently he was in a bit of a tight spot with a 'big fan' or two, but he managed to create a little wiggle room. He's a little battered, but no major damage. With the time he has left, he should be able to make it to his extraction,” the communications officer announced, Will's own relief clearly reflected in Jason's face. “He could have some unwanted groupies, though.”

“I'll relay that to the pilots on the ground. They'll have to clean the flight plan.”

“In that case, he's probably not going to make it back before we leave tomorrow afternoon. We're gonna need to divert the Quinjet to Toronto . . . have him meet us there.”
Biting down lightly on his lower lip, Will watched the timer continue to click down, before pushing himself to his feet. “Change of plans. We’re leaving tonight. Sam’s working at the SRU tonight; he should be getting off around 0200, barring a lengthy hot call.”

“Why the change in plans?”

“I want to talk to Sam. I don’t think he had anything to do with the hack,” the Colonel insisted, watching Jason’s eyebrows skip upwards. Glancing at a stack of SRU transcripts on his desk, those quicksilver eyes paled to nearly colorless fury as he growled, “There are a few things I want to talk to his chertov, so-called TEAM about though.”

“Like what?”

“That’s between me, Sam and Toronto’s Team One,” Will insisted, turning his attention to his watch. “Pass the word. I want to be wheels up in the next three hours. That’ll put us in Toronto about an hour before Sam gets off. We’ll arrive at the Barn about ten minutes before Marina comes to pick him up to take him home.”

“Understood. Want me to pass the word to Marina?”

Smirking, the eldest Grimm shook his head. “Nah . . . let's surprise her.”

“You know how Marishka feels about surprises, Will,” Jason reminded his brother, watching the older man’s smirk morph to a real grin.

“I know . . but I have a feeling that she’s going to like this one.”

*******************

It was just shy of two o’clock in the morning, when a handsome man in black tactical cargo pants and a black t-shirt strode into the SRU’s “Barn”. Over the left breast pocket there was a strange looking logo of a stylized bird, under which was stenciled “W.M. Brandt”. Over it, a navy blue zip-up hoodie hung open to show off his obviously toned abdomen, the back emblazoned with the same symbol, as well as the words “Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement Logistics Division.”

Winnie and Jules Callaghan were standing at the dispatcher’s desk, gossiping together as they tried to kill the last five minutes of both their shifts. Jules looked over her shoulder at the sound of heavy combat boots and blinked, feeling her mouth go dry at the sight of him. “Hot damn,” Winnie insisted in an undertone, both of them staring at him as he came closer. Swallowing hard, she glanced to her friend, before addressing the newcomer. “Hi . . . welcome to the SRU. Can we help you?”

“Sam Braddock?” came the response, tone gravely and solemn as he looked between the two.

“Uh . . . he’s in the locker room,” Winnie replied, twisting to point down the hallway.

“Thank you.”

Both women cocked their heads to the side as they watched him walk away, admiring the way he filled out the seat of his cargoes. Jules frowned as she mused curiously, “You think Sam's gay? Surely a man that gorgeous can’t be gay, right? Would the world really be so cruel?”

Grinning at the question, Winnie shook her head, “No. My gaydar has an impeccable record. That man right there is 100 percent straight. Sam is too.”

Sam was bent forward into his locker, trying to find his S.H.I.E.L.D. hoodie to pull over his bare chest. The last hot call of the day had ended messy, and had taken his last clean shirt with it, therefore necessitating the use of his hoodie. Fortunately, the team had the next three days off, so with any luck he’d be able to get some laundry done. His entire family was going to be in town, though, so even as he planned on laundry he resigned himself to having to buy a new pack of shirts to wear until the laundry got done.

Currently, the rest of the team was causing a ruckus, everyone looking forward to the break and ignoring the blond as usual. He had just located it at the back of the locker when a voice boomed through the locker room. “Sam! Front and center!”

Jolting upwards at the shout, Sam cracked his head on the shelf at the top of the locker. “Ow! Shit!” Bending down again to let the sudden attack of double vision subside, he reached up to hold his head. It took a moment before that voice placed itself in his head, at which point he jolted upwards again and only barely avoided another collision with the heavy steel. “Yes sir!”

“You don’t call me 'sir', Sam . . . I work for a living,” was the long-suffering response.

Grimacing at the disgruntled tone in the scold, Sam slammed his locker doors shut and skidded into the center of the locker room in his bare feet, hands yanking his hoodie over his shoulders haphazardly. Sliding to a stop he smiled timidly at the fondly exasperated man there. “Will! Hi! You’re early . . . does Ma know you’re early?” Just realizing that the entire locker room had gone silent around him, Sam's shoulders hunched slightly, asking meekly, “Am I in trouble?”

“No . . .” Will chuckled, turning on one booted heel and striding away. “Come with me, Sam.”

“Coming!” he agreed, bolting after him and leaving Team One staring after him.

Striding confidently towards the briefing room, Will gestured Sam into it and then slapped the button that closed the curtains. Gesturing to the chairs, the Colonel moved to the windows. Lowering himself into the chair cautiously, the blond asked, “Will . . . what's wrong?”

“You wanna tell me about the coffee run?” was all the other man said, earning a sharp wince and an uncomfortable squirm.

“I was being stupid.”

“No, you were reacting in the only way you knew how,” the Colonel corrected patiently, turning to look at the kid and folding his arms over his chest. “There’s a big difference there, Sammy. And instead of explaining that difference, your team shuffled you off like a naughty kid being sent to timeout by the teacher.”

“I made a bad situation worse when I sent that heart up.”

“Undoubtedly . . . but did anyone tell you not to? Was there any communication directed your way that would have explained why you should have kept the courier and the heart out of the way? Did any even attempt to explain to you why that was a mistake that escalated the situation? Or did they just yell at you?”

Shrugging miserably, Sam looked down at his hands as he shook his head in negation. “I didn't think so, Sammy.” Rounding the table, Will hopped up onto the table in front of him and leaned forward on his elbows. “I’m not mad at you, malysh . . . every rookie makes mistakes, regardless of whether they're SRU or S.H.I.E.L.D. or Army or anyone. I am however furious that instead of taking the time to train you . . . to teach you . . . your sergeant and your team leader couldn't even be bothered to do anything other than yell at you.”
“It's not a big deal.”

“It is to me,” the Colonel protested, reaching out to grip Sam's chin and haul his face up to be able to look into his eyes. “They do not have the right to treat you this way, Sammy. No one does . . . not ever.”

“It's not as though anyone else other than you and Ma care, Dad,” Sam sighed, using the address for the first time without even realizing it.

Will reared back at the term, causing Sam to realize what he’d said. “Oh shit . . . I didn't mean . . . I just . . .” Giving it up as a bad job and offering the older man a lopsided smile instead, Sam announced sheepishly, “Happy birthday?”

Smoothing one hand reverently through blond strands, the Colonel chuckled lightly as he asked calmly, “You sure I deserve it?”

“Well . . . you're kind of the best dad I've ever had.” There was a part of Will's heart that wrung tightly at that response, even as he continued to watch Sam speak, “If you don't want me to call you that . . .”

“No, Sammy . . . I would be honored to have you call me 'Dad',” the Colonel promised, one hand coming up to grip the back of Sam's neck and pull him into a loose embrace. Pushing him back a single step, he gripped both sides of the boy's face and shook him gently, insisting, “Any man should be proud to have you for a son . . . I know I am.”

Just then, Clint's voice rang through the curtains. “Will! We've got incoming! T-minus 60 seconds and counting!”

Chuckling, Will pushed himself upwards from the table. “Come on. I was promised an embarrassing display of public affection.”

“You're going to let her embarrass you here?”

“I don't mind public displays of affection, Sammy . . . I just prefer to be able to dictate where they happen,” he chuckled, moving into the open area in full view of the door just as his beloved Russian burst through the door with a joyful cry of “MISHA!”

Barrelling into his chest at a hundred miles an hour, Will grunted as her momentum sent them both sprawling. Hands coming up to hold her hips, he rested the back of his head against he floor as he teased, “Hi.”

Marina's eyes were shining with happy tears as she wrapped her hands in the edges of his hoodie, ordering briskly, “Kindly do something more productive with your mouth, William Michael.”

“Yes ma'am,” he murmured, one hand tightening on her waist as the other came up to entwine in her hair and haul her down to his mouth for their first kiss in a little over six weeks.

Her sob was muffled by his mouth, even as his hands pressed her to him tightly. Both were dimly aware of the groans resounding from their boys – Sam included for once – though neither could bring themselves to give a damn. Breaking away in search of air, she pushed her forehead into his temple and breathed against the skin, “I've missed you.”

“I've missed you too, samaya malen'kaya . . . so much,” he agreed, tightening his grip in her hair and hauling her down to him again. His tone was reverent as he continued to ramble on about how much he'd missed her, stopped only when Marina ordered firmly, “Less talking, more kissing.”
Of course, Will was only too happy to comply with that particular order.

“Could the parental units find a room or something? Geez . . . you're on the floor,” Clint groaned, leaping upwards to crouch easily on top of the desk and put himself above everyone else.

Breaking away from each other, they both insisted at the same time, “Shut up, Clinton Francis!”

Finally, Will pulled back and looked up at her, fingers whisper soft on her face as he took in every nuance of her. There was a long moment, before he suddenly asked, “Did you cut your hair!? Marina, no! I love your hair!”

Giggling, Marina leaned over to kiss him once more before pushing herself to her feet and reaching down to pull him to his own. “It was barely an inch, Misha. What are you doing here? You're early!”

“Yeah . . . actually, you're just in time.”

Drawing back slightly, though noticeably not far enough to have to remove herself from his embrace, she asked, “Just in time for what?”

“My meeting with Norman Holleran.”

“Norm? Why!?” Greg Parker demanded, stepping forward finally and bringing the entire room's attention onto himself.

“I'm a little disappointed in the behavior of your team, Sergeant Parker.”

“And who the hell are you?” Ed Lane demanded furiously.

There was a momentary pause, as the Colonel glanced over at the blond to gauge his reaction to the conversation, before turning back and announcing firmly, “Will Brandt . . . Sam's dad.” Narrowing his eyes, he growled, “You're Ed Lane.”

“Yes,” the Team Leader replied, though it hadn't been a question.

“You're the one who sent Sam on a coffee run, instead of trying to train him.”

“Coffee run?” Marina demanded, rearing back angrily, hot chocolate eyes starting to boil in a second flat. “What coffee run!?” Rounding on her son, Marina demanded, “What is he talking about?”

There was a pause as she took in Sam's attire, before continuing, “And where is your shirt?!?”

Sam scrubbed at the back of his head sheepishly, as he confessed, “It kinda got destroyed.”

“You know what? I don't care about the shirt; just zip up so you don't freeze to death. I DO, however, care about this coffee run? WHAT coffee run?”

“I was being stupid, and Ed sent me a coffee run to get me out of the way,” Sam announced, in a very matter of fact tone.

“I find that hard to believe. What were you doing?”

“Looking for tactical options.”

“Which is what you've spent your entire adult life being trained for!” the Russian raged, features starting to turn a mottled red as her rather legendary temper began to spill out of its usual cage. “What the fuck, Sam!? Why didn't you say anything?”
“Didn't think it was important.”

“It's damn well important to me! And to your dad! You tell us this shit, you understand me!?”

“Yes ma'am.”

“Don't call me ma'am . . . I work for a living,” Marina snapped off, unconsciously mimicking her lover from barely twenty minutes before. “When does Holleran get here?”

There was a resigned voice from behind them as he announced, “I am here. Hello Will . . . Lt Colonel Petrovka.”

“Norm . . . not the way I wanted to see you again, old friend,” Will greeted with a nod, the two men obviously acquainted with one another. Gesturing towards the briefing room, he asked, “Shall we?”

“Shall we indeed. Team One is to remain at the Barn until the completion of this meeting. Anyone caught disobeying this order will be on immediate administrative leave for the next three days while I try to decide whether or not to fire you. Is that understood?”

“Yes sir,” was the disgruntled agreement, before Holleran turned to the sergeant next. “Parker . . . you're with us.”

The doors slid shut and from that point, silence reigned.
Don't Mess With The Best

Chapter Notes

You guys are so amazing.

Also, I feel the need to post this here. Ewa told me she would like to write fic for this. And Caiti has reached out to do the same. Seriously guys, consider this my Transformative Works Statement for the UALP. If you want to make a banner, or write a ficlet based on the UALP . . . let me know. As long as I'm involved and have final say, I have no problem with publishing those kinds of things under the Cahill Project Umbrella. Just let me know!

Translations are light, and pretty self explanatory. But still at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 184:

As the doors slid closed, Clint let out a low whistle. “Somebody's in trouble! And for once . . . it isn't me,” he sing-songed in an amused undertone to his boyfriend.

“Hush, khishchnick.” Bucky laughed fondly, moving to lean back against Winnie's desk and letting the younger sniper lean forward to drape himself across his shoulders.

“Poor sap . . . stuck facing the wrath of the Colonel and his pissed off Russian all by himself,” Jason grimaced, before grinning as Casey snickered, “Sucker!”

That sent a chorus of chuckles ringing through the room, Sam's own lips curving up into a small smile at the arrival of his adoptive family, and the unwavering support he was receiving every single one of them. Brian and Natasha both leaned back against the wall across from the briefing room, Brian's tone cheerful as he asked, “Think she's gonna to kill him?”

Lewis Young's eyes flashed wide as his best friend, Spike Scarlatti, yelped, “You're in a police station!”

“Clearly, he has no idea what she did at the Second Precinct,” the middle Grimm scoffed with a roll of his eyes. “It was like 27 dead or something, right?”

“Thirty-seven dead, Jay,” Casey corrected with a grin.

“Oh yeah. I always get those two messed up. Twenty-seven dead was in Peru.”

“Also, it's hard to learn from your mistakes when you're dead,” the Winter Soldier reminded the younger Grimms with a sly grin.

“Eh . . . details.”

Leaning up, Casey kissed her boyfriend's cheek before moving to join Sam where he'd seated himself on the floor equidistant from the Grimms and Team One. Sliding down the wall and taking a seat beside him, she asked, “You okay, Sammy-honey?”

“Yeah . . . I'm okay.”

“Well . . . at least he didn't say he was F.I.N.E.,” was the response to this, the voice originating from the door as Vincent Keller and Catherine Chandler led Aaron Grimm and Marta Shearing into the Barn.

At the sight of the agent, Sam lunged to his feet and across the linoleum with a cry of, “Aaron!”

Aaron chuckled, catching the younger man around the waist and hauling him up off the floor in a warm hug. “Heya Sammy.”

“Ma said you'd gone dark. You okay?”

Marta's tone was as fierce as the scowl on her face as she interrupted whatever her lover was going to say. “Don't you dare say you're okay, Aaron Kenneth!”

Dark blue eyes rolled as he insisted, “It's just a couple cracked ribs and a black eye. Seriously, it was a milk run!”

“Milk runs do not bring agents home wounded,” the virologist protested vehemently, glaring at him.
furiously.

“I'm not wounded, Doc. Wounded involves Medical, a hospital bed, and a lot of pissed off nurses. Honestly, this is nothing. It'll be gone in three days . . . four TOPS!”

The woman huffed, glowering at him even as he grinned at her brightly. Looping his arms around her waist, he pulled her into his torso, leaning forward to press a warm line of sweet kisses down the curve of her neck. “Come on, Doc . . . you aren't even a little happy to see me?” he wheedled with a charming inflection, sly grin on his lips as he used two fingers to brush a strand of brown hair behind her ears.

Melting at the affection in his tone, and the heat generating from his kisses, she glowered for another moment before giving it up. Throwing her arms up around his neck, she scolded insistently, “I really wish I could stay mad at you, you know that?”

Giving her a cheeky grin, he agreed, “I love you too, Doc.”

Smacking at his shoulder gently, she forced her boyfriend to release her and turned to her nephew. “You look good, Sam . . . Marina's clearly been feeding you.”

“Two helpings every meal, sometimes three,” he joked with a grin, wrapping his arms around her waist. “How are you, Aunt Marty?”

“I'm peachy keen. My boyfriend's not dead, my nephew looks healthy for once and I think I just created a new antivirus to treat Chimera.”

“Ew,” was Clint's response, before Jason chimed in, “Wait, that's still a thing? I thought the IMF eradicated that already?”

“Unfortunately not . . . but I was in the mood to poison someone yesterday so I figured I should avoid a Georgia Situation and create the antidote before I recreated the virus itself. Belaraphon is a bitch to get a hold of; better to have another vaccine on hand just in case.”

“Good call,” Doyle agreed, cocking an eyebrow at his own girlfriend; Scarlett had been the one to cause the Georgia Situation and the eldest of Hansel's sons was enjoying the opportunity to needle her for it every once in awhile. She smacked his shoulder lightly, insisting, “Shut up.”

Meanwhile, Aaron was frowning at his girlfriend, “Poison who?”

“Some junior agent named Harrison? He was making a mess in my lab!” she complained with a pout.

“He still has a job?” Brian blurted, eyes shooting wide as Natasha reached up to pat his chest. “I thought for sure Fury was gonna drum that one out of S.H.I.E.L.D.”

“He's trying to . . . apparently Harrison's made of sterner stuff than the others that have gone before. On the one hand it's a good thing, because he's the longest running of Fury's personal assistants so memos coming out of that office have actually been consistent for once. But on the other hand, nobody likes him so we would really be happy if he finally just cracked under Nick's personal brand of torture and left S.H.I.E.L.D. altogether,” Vika replied, reaching up to brush a strand back behind her ears as she strode into the foyer, her husband and sister on her heels. Smiling at the blond, Vika greeted him warmly, “Hi Sam.”

“Hey Vika . . . Phil . . .” Pausing, he grinned slyly at the black-haired sister and drawled, “. . . Veronika.”
“Shut it, Samuel,” Nika snarked, even as she leaped up into the kid's arms and squeezed the life out of him. “What's shaking, bacon?”

“Not much. You killed anyone recently?”

Winking at him broadly with a click of her tongue, she declined to answer the question as she hopped up onto the desk next to Clint and leaned backwards on her hands as she kicked her heels against the bottom lazily. “So . . . where's the Viper?”

“She and Will are reading some poor idiot the Riot Act,” Natasha explained, eyes closed and perfectly content to lean up against her lover.

“Has she made him cry yet?”

“Not as far as we know.”

“Bummer. She's losing her touch,” the woman snarked, cocking an eyebrow at the dispatcher as Winnie choked from her chair. “I don't think I was talking to you, Sweetcheeks. Mind your own business, da?”

“Nika . . . be nice,” Vika admonished fondly, eyes rolling at the younger sister's typical brashness.

“For me, that was nice.”

Natasha snickered as she reminded the other Russian, “She's not wrong.”

Sighing heavily, Vika threw up her hands and insisted, “I give up! Heathens, the lot of you!”

It was about then that Jason looked up from his tablet and his eyes snagged on Sam's feet . . . Sam's bare feet. “Someone's going to tell Sam he's barefoot right? Before Marina comes out of that meeting and proceeds to mother him to death.”

Casey sniggered as Sam looked down at his feet, toes wiggling on the cold floor as he grimaced. “Jay has a point, Sammy . . . you probably want to go put your boots on.”

Nodding in agreement, the blond rotated on his heel and dashed off towards the locker room. Vika's eyes narrowed after him as she inquired rhetorically, “Anyone else want to wrap him in blankets and feed him soup right now?”

“He looks tired,” Marta agreed, bumping lightly into her best friend's side as Casey moved to lean up against the wall between her boyfriend and the virologist. The redhead chimed in next, “Marina says he's been claiming to be 'F.I.N.E.' a lot lately.”

Brian frowned, but it was Natasha who asked suspiciously, “He knows that that's an acronym and not a word, right?”

“He's aware,” Aaron replied, arms coming up to fold over his chest as he frowned. “We talked about it back on the trip home from Toronto the first time.”

“We're not going to get kill anyone, are we?” Brian growled, brown eyes glowing with a kind of manic rage at the thought.

“Probably not permanently,” Clint chirped cheerfully.

“Well if we do get to kill someone, at least we have Owen here to clean up the bodies,” Jason joked, grinning at Will's longtime best friend and S.H.I.E.L.D.'s best Cleaner.

“Cleaning up after the Boss-lady after she's broken all of her toys is no fun for anyone,” the agent retorted with a grin and a roll of his eyes. “Least of all me.”

“Guys, however this all falls out, the Colonel and uchenyy are going to figure it out. They always do,” Bucky reminded the family, hands tucked into his pockets as ocean blue eyes scanned the family sprawled and scattered around the room.

************************************

The SRU’s top negotiator watched Sam's parents as the doors slid closed behind them. The Colonel rounded the table to take a seat, leaning back comfortably in the chair as the woman – the woman he now knew to be Marina Ivanovna Petrovka, a Russian-born Lt. Colonel in the United States Army – paced restlessly along the narrow strip of floor between her partner's chair and the windows.

Commander Norman Holleran took a chair at the head of the table, folding his hands on the tabletop and leaning forward as he looked back and forth between Parker and the Colonel. The Army officer didn't seem interested in starting the conversation, watching Parker with color-changing eyes and his arms folded over his chest. “From the sounds of it, Braddock doesn't talk about work with either of you much. So how do you know that Eddie sent Braddock on a coffee run?” the negotiator finally asked, eyes flicking up to the woman as the question earned a vicious hiss.

Automatically, his mind reverted to his training. If this was a hot call, the lieutenant colonel would have been categorized at “red” and he would be trying to deescalate her to “yellow” in the hopes that eventually the scene would calm to “green” and the situation would resolve itself without anyone dead. Resting his hands on the table, palms up and fingers open, he asked calmly, “What do you both want to have happen here?”

Will's lips curved upwards in a patronizing smile as he replied, “Are you seriously trying to negotiate me right now, Sergeant Parker?”

Blinking at the question, Parker forced himself to backtrack. Clearly, this was not someone who was unaware of the way a negotiation worked. “I just want this to end in a way that is beneficial for all of us.”

“See, that's where you and I differ. I want this to end in a way that is beneficial for Sam. Because quite frankly, I couldn't give a rat's ass about a single member of your team.”

“Seconded,” Marina hissed, finally pausing in her pacing as she leaned up against the windowsill, her arms folding over her chest.

About then, Holleran spoke up, “Okay. I have to confess I'm only just now hearing about this?”

Turning to look at Parker, Norman frowned, “Why am I only just now hearing about this?”

“It was in the transcripts,” the bald man confessed reluctantly, reaching up to rub one hand over his bald head.
Turning to look at his old friend, the SRU commander asked, “You read the transcripts?”

“I have to,” Will announced. “To you, they're transcripts. To me and S.H.I.E.L.D., they're action reports. I have to make notations and supply commentary on them just like I would have to do to any other reports given to me about an agent in the field.” Cocking an eyebrow, he prompted, “In case you've forgotten, Norm . . . Sam belongs to S.H.I.E.L.D. first and the SRU second.”

Parker leaned forward at the information, demanding, “What!”?

The woman's grin was wicked as she replied, “Sam is a Level Four asset and field agent for the Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement and Logistics Division. We prefer S.H.I.E.L.D.; it's not quite as much of a mouthful.”

Will's eyes were as cold as the colorless scales of a fresh caught fish. “What exactly is your team's problem with Sam?”

Parker's eyes widened at the question, clearly not expecting it. “I don't understand the question.”

“Yes you do. So what is it? Are you mad because his father assigned him to the SRU a grand total of two days after he was honorably discharged from JTF2 as a way to punish his son for what the General perceived as a failure? Or are you mad because I pulled strings to have him assigned to Team One, because I knew that this is where he was going to do the most good . . . where he was going to be able to help the most people?”

“Team One picks their people . . . we didn't pick Braddock,” the sergeant bit out angrily, jaw set and mouth pinched as he glared at the other man.

“Boohoo . . . cry me a river,” Marina mocked, falling silent as Will held up a hand to gesture her to silence. “I'm sorry you feel that I overstepped, Sergeant Parker. But that's not on Sam . . . that's on me. So if you're going to be upset about it, I'd appreciate it if you'd redirect your anger to the person who deserves it.”

“And lay. Off. My. Boy,” the Russian snarled vehemently, causing Parker to lean back a little bit so as to put space between the two.

Holleran sighed as he turned to look at the Colonel. “So what do you want to do here, Will?”

“I want Team One to understand what it means to be a soldier . . . to have to shoot to kill first, or else you're dead. I want them to know what's it like to be Sam, to be Marina, to be any one of the men and women I have watched fight and die in the service of their fellow man over the last 20 years.”

“What do you suggest?”

“At S.H.I.E.L.D., we train our tactical units on paintball courses. Teach them to shoot first and question second.” Shrugging one shoulder, Will turned his attention to Parker as he insisted, “Real time. Non-fatal wounds are just that, non-fatal. The only kills that count are the ones that would kill you. And even if you're mortally wounded, as long as not you're dead, you keep to the mission until you can't anymore.” Leaning forward, Will sneered, “And I can guarantee you, it takes a long time before we can't anymore.”

Turning to look at Parker, the commander asked, “Does that sound amenable to you, Greg?”

“When?”

“Tomorrow. We'll arrange everything. Meet us here at 1400 and we'll show you the difference between the training that Sam has had drilled into him everyday since he became an adult . . . and the training he needs to have in order to be as successful with the SRU as he was with JTF2. Agreed?"

“Agreed,” Parker replied, watching as the younger man pushed himself to his feet.

“Good to hear. We'll see you tomorrow, Sergeant Parker.” Offering his hand to his partner, he linked fingers with Marina as he strode to the door. Slapping the button, he turned back to face the negotiator as the doors started to roll upwards. “Oh, and before you get any ideas to the contrary, Sam's with us tomorrow . . . not Team One.”

The couple came into the foyer then, and Brian smirked as he asked, “How'd it go?”

“Paintball, tomorrow at 1400.”

Immediately, wicked – and in some cases downright evil – grins crept across the faces of each of the Grimms and their S.H.I.E.L.D. counterparts. Nika's head dropped back as she practically purred, “Klassno.”

Grinning at her sister, Marina agreed, “This is gonna be awesome.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) khishchnik - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for Clint)
(R) da - yes
(R) klassno - awesome
Chapter 186: Sam & Marina Against The World

As her boys came into view, Marina swooped in on Aaron immediately, earning a sheepish grin as the second youngest Grimm looped his arms around her waist and lifted her clear off her feet in a warm, lengthy embrace. “I'm okay, sestra... I promise,” he murmured, burying his face in the curve of her throat as her arms tightened hard around his own neck.

It was to her credit that the Russian took him at his word without protest. “I'm just happy you're home, solnyshko.”

“Yeah . . . me too.” Glancing towards the hallway Sam had disappeared down mere minutes before, he asked, “How's the malysh?”

“Desperately unhappy, but resolved to push through it. I already suggested that we go home, but he wouldn't hear of it,” she huffed with a sharp frown.

Will spoke up then from where he was standing at the door, fiddling with a set of keys. “Guys . . . it's 0230 and I would really like to be sleeping right now.”

Clint snorted, “Sleeping . . . right! Like there's a single one of us here who actually believe that.”

“I haven't really slept in about six weeks, Clinton Francis . . . I'm not sure I'd be of much use to samaya malen'kaya at this point. So can we just get Sam and go home?”

“You said you were taking your Ambien!” the Russian protested, moving to fuss at him restlessly.

Capturing her fluttering hands in one of his own, he smirked down at her as he used the other to pull a caught curl from her eyelashes. “Unconsciousness is not the same thing as sleep, zhemchuzhina.”

Glaring him fondly, she scolded, “You need to take better care of yourself, Misha . . . for fuck's sake, how much weight have you lost since I left? And don't lie to me . . . I didn't use to be able to feel your ribs when I tackled you.”

Rolling his eyes, Will slung his arm around her shoulders and pressed a warm kiss to her temple, teasing fondly, “Nasedka.”

“That is NOT the point, William Michael,” she grumbled, even as she slung her own arm around his waist and cuddled further into him.

Tilting up her chin, she grinned into his kiss as they enjoyed a moment where they were the only two in the world. When they parted, Will pecked the end of her nose teasingly, before straightening again. Lifting his head, the Colonel boomed, “Sam! Let's go!”

The kid's boots squealed as they skidded into the foyer, his S.H.I.E.L.D. hoodie properly zipped and his duffelbag over his shoulder as he replied, “I'm here.” Looking between the family's Power Couple and the increasing storm on Ed Lane's face as he conferred angrily with Parker, the youngest Grimm asked, “Everything okay?”

“Yeah . . . we're playing paintball tomorrow . . . 'torture the baby agents' style,” Bucky announced, to which his boyfriend cheered, “This is gonna be so badass!”

Winking at Sam, the Colonel teased, “You remember how to play?”

Grinning at the question, Sam shrugged, “I seem to remember Marina and I holding the record for fastest clear.”

“You're both freaks,” Brian joked, slinging his arm around his nephew's neck and rubbing his knuckles briskly through the kid's blond hair. “And that was against baby agents. This is going to be against Team One.”
“Still think you're going to be holding that record?” Aaron asked with a grin, arms around Marta’s waist as she yawned and cuddled into him sleepily.

It took a moment for the blond to answer, twisting to look at the woman who was both his training agent and the closest thing to a mother he’d had since his baby sister Amy had died. “What do you think, Ma?”

“I think we're gonna roast 'em.”

“You should probably handicap yourselves, at least if you don’t want to actually kill them. You know that right?” Vika asked with a grin, her usually stoic husband smirking next to her. The two had been privy to some of the more . . . effective . . . ass-kickings the Grimms had handed out in their time at S.H.I.E.L.D.

“Ugh . . . who cares about fair play? This is supposed to be fun!” Clint protested with a grin and a broad wink.

“Is there a rule somewhere that says fair can't be fun?”

“Yeah . . . it's right under the rules that say 'kick all the asses' and 'don't fuck with family',” Aaron agreed with a grin.

“Actually, I'm pretty sure that rule reads, 'Don't fuck with the THIS family','” Natasha agreed with a toss of her curly red hair.

“Both are applicable. Guys . . . come on. 1400 is only eleven hours away. Can we get our heads back in the game here?” Will sighed, reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose even as he grinned at the family's usual antics. They were the best tactical unit S.H.I.E.L.D. had . . . but they were also a collective pain in their superiors’ asses. His own included. “Seriously guys . . . fall out. It's time to head back to the house.”

Twisting to look over her shoulder, Marina grinned at the members of her son's Team One and insisted, “I can't tell you how much I'm looking forward to kicking all of your asses tomorrow.” Turning back into her lover, she cocked an eyebrow up at him, “I just realized something?”

“What's that, sumasshedshaya devushka?”

“Where's Vati? And Vorobey?”

“Maria had a meeting she couldn't miss, so they're coming this afternoon. I don't think they're going to make it before paintball though.”

“Eh . . . Vorobey likes to watch us kick ass . . . she's not so into having to deal with us while we're kicking ass.”

The next day, at just shy of 2:15 in the afternoon, Norman Holleran led Toronto's best SRU team into the the command center S.H.I.E.L.D. had erected for their best team during the course of the night. Trailing behind them were the other two off duty teams for the SRU. Will was standing in front of a bank of monitors, arms folded as he watched the action unfold on the screens. Jason's fingers were flashing over his keyboard as he tracked Marina through the scenario.

Eyes flicking towards the door at the sound of footsteps, the Colonel announced, “You're late.” Finger flashing out, he pointed, “You're gonna lose her.”
“I'm not gonna lose her . . . shut up,” Jason snapped, fingers flashing as he pulled up another set of cameras to keep the Russian on the central screen.

Will's eyes scanned through the other monitors, checking in on the second team as they hunted her down. Of Marina's partner in the scenario . . . there was no sign. “Where is he?”

“I don't know. He's found a blind spot . . . there aren't supposed to be blind spots, Will . . . I checked!” the middle Grimm swore, glaring as he tracked furiously through all of the camera angles an agent from R&D had set up the night before.

“Did he find a perch?”

“Any perches not on camera are on the roofs . . . There's no way onto the roofs.”

“Jay . . . this is Sam and Marina . . . there are absolutely ways for them to get on the roofs.”

Growling, Jason swore as he stood and grabbed up a kit. “Call a halt . . two minute hold. Everyone stationary for two minutes.” Throwing his hands up he hissed, “Why the hell did I let someone else put up these cameras!? Idiots . . if you want something done right, do it yourself. Good grief.”

Chuckling, Will leaned over a microphone as he keyed it on, tapping in to all of the comms the players were wearing. “Two minute hold. Everyone back to safe zones. Jay needs to fix the cameras and then we’ll restart the scenario. Understood?”

Aaron's voice chimed in as he hissed, “I had her, Will!”

“You only have me if I'm dead!” Marina singsonged back with a cackle.

The Colonel spoke up to interrupt whatever retort Aaron was about to give. “Actually, Aaron, you're dead. Sam tagged you just before I called the hold. Check your shirt.”

“What!? Bastard!” he roared, looking down to see a bright yellow blotch in the weak point of his vest, just above the opening to the armpit. “Damn it Sam!”

Sam said nothing, but his quiet chuckle was clearly heard through the comms. Marina's voice chimed in then, “Did Team One ever show?”

“Yeah . . . fifteen minutes late,” Will muttered, toggling the monitors as pictures of the roofs finally came on screens and Sam's perch, laid out on the northwest roof, came into view. Nodding in approval of the spot – good vantage and visibility, low risk of being seen and, as Jason claimed, no tangible way to get up there . . . unless you were a Grimm – Will made a mental note to praise the selection when the scenario was over. “Norm brought more people to play.”

“Come get dirty in our sandbox. Here we have explosives,” Nika laughed, a wide grin on her face as she looked up at the camera positioned over her head; all of the dead were gathered in a singular location so as to keep track of them and stay out of the way of any stray paintballs.

“We want to scrap this then?”

“Nah . . we'll let it play. You and Sam have already taken out Doyle, Owen, Aaron, Nika and Vika . . . once Jay's back, we'll restart and finish this game. Team One made us wait . . now they can wait.”

“Sounds good,” the Russian agreed, foot tapping as she looked up at the camera over her head. “Hey sexy?”
Chuckling at her, he asked with a grin, “Da?”

“Did I tell you today that your ass looks fantastic in those tac-pants?”

The chorus of groans ringing out from the younger Grimms earned a quiet snicker from the Russian and a broad grin from the Colonel. “Behave yourself, Major.”

“Hey! What have we said about flirting on comms!?” Clint interrupted sharply, a gagging sound causing the eldest Grimm to snicker.

“Plug your ears, dorogoy,” the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler taunted, a bright laugh erupting from her as her other boys blurted out together, “Get a room!”

“Izvinitе, домашний,” she giggled.

“Vrun!” was the unanimous response from her boys before Jason came skidding back into the command center and slid back into his chair. “Sweet!” Looking up at his brother as his fingers flew over the keyboard, he insisted, “Remind me to fire Henderson. Where the hell did he learn to hardwire a computer array?” Looking up just in time to see Marina doubling over with laughter, he twisted to look back at his brother, “What did I miss?”

“Nothing you're going to be upset about, Jay, trust me,” was Clint's dry response.

“Ohhhkay. So cameras are up, comms are going silent. Play starts again in ten . . . nine . . . eight . . .”

As Will listened to his brother count down, he watched as Marina once again took off running. Narrowing his eyes, he moved forward as he questioned, “She's running right for Clint and Bucky . . . what the hell is she doing? She knows they're there . . . she's checked that location twice.”

“You really want to know?” Jason asked, bringing up the location for the two snipers' perch on the next screen as they watched Marina move. “Look at Sam . . . he's moved.”

Glancing up at the younger sniper, he saw that Sam had indeed shifted his perch just enough that he was aiming at the rooftop across from him. “What is he aiming for?”

“I think we're about to find out.”

“Turn on their comms but mute it. I want to hear what they're saying.”

Nodding, Jason reached out and flicked switches to pull up Sam and Marina's comms onto the main speakers. The recorder was capturing everyone, though Will and Jason had elected to mute the sound while they watched so as not to be distracted from the visual. There was a pause, before Sam's voice crackled through the comm, “You sure about this Ma?”

“You in position?” she asked, not even sounding winded as she literally leaped from an upper landing to the next, seeming to float through the air as she dropped.

“Yeah . . . but two against one.”

“I can make it.”

“You sure? That's a hell of a jump.”

“Just be ready. I don't think this is going to work more than once. We need the snipers out of play. After Clint and Bucky, Brian and Natasha are the only ones left.”
His shoulders moved as he took a deep breath, before he agreed firmly, “Just give me the word. I have the shot.”

“That's my boy,” Marina praised, skidding to a stop just past where Clint and Bucky were lying in wait. Clint was sprawled at his rifle, looking through its scope as Bucky knelt next to him as spotter. “Oh boys!?” she taunted, waiting until she was sure she had their attention before rotating on her heel and dashing back towards the stairwell again.

“Turn it all on,” Will ordered, before every voice from the scenario flooded through the speakers.

Bucky's tone was sharp as he insisted, “We've got Marina! She's in the Northwest stairwell, heading for the top floor. North central building.”

Brian chimed in, “Bucky . . . she's playing you!”

“There's no way out from up there!” Natasha agreed.

Clint grunted, “Good. We'll trap her in the corner and then we'll head after Sam.”

“First we have to find Sam,” was the retort from the red-haired Merry Murderess.

“Let's just get Marina first. Then we'll worry about Sam,” Bucky insisted, the two snipers dashing up the stairwells after her. They arrived just in time to see Marina's feet disappear through the window as she climbed towards the roof. “She's heading for the roof!”

“What the hell is she doing?” Will demanded, bracing himself up on the desk beside Jason as he watched Marina run into the middle of the roof and then stop, clearly waiting for the others to catch up.

Bucky and Clint were on the roof shortly after her, earning a grin before she turned on her heel and dashed, planting her foot on the lip of the roof and then launching herself through the air. Will lunged forward, heart in his throat, watching the cameras intently as she shot out the window a floor down on the building opposite - the same building Sam was currently perched on. Her body landed hard as she rolled forward on her shoulder, using her forward momentum to propel herself to her feet as she continued to run for the stairwell. “You think she's done that on an op?” Jason asked, looking up at his brother with a small smile.

Pinching the bridge of his nose as he fought to calm his racing heart, Will sighed, “I wouldn't put it past her. Damn, but that woman is terrible for my blood pressure.”

Meanwhile, the two snipers were staring. “Holy shit!” Clint shouted, staring after her as she disappeared from view. “We're three fucking stories up!”

“What happened?”

“She made her own exit strategy,” the Winter Soldier announced, gun out as he moved cautiously towards the edge of the roof with Clint just behind and to his left.

“What does that mean?” Brian demanded.

Whatever they were going to say in answer was cut off as two paintballs exploded against the hollows of Clint and Bucky's throats, the vulnerable spot left exposed by their vests an instant kill shot. As they exploded against the skin, they left twin bright yellow blotches and effectively took the two snipers out of the game, as well as leaving Brian's question unanswered. Will leaned forward and announced into the PA system, “Clint and Bucky are dead. Brian and Natasha . . . Sam and Marina . . . you are the only four left. Clock is ticking. Twenty minutes left on the scenario. Good hunting.”

It was about then that Will could hear Spike Scarlatti’s gasp from behind him. “Oh fuck. We're so screwed.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) sestra - sister
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Aaron)
(R) malysh - kiddo
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
(R) zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's less common nicknames for Marina)
(R) Nasedka - mother hen
(R) sumasshedshaya devushka - crazy girl (one of Will's less common nicknames for Marina)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel Kuhn)
(R) Vorobey - Sparrow (Marina's nickname for her best friend, Maria Hill)
(R) da - yes
(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint)
(R) izvinite - sorry
(R) domashniy - pets (an interchangeable nickname Marina uses for the youngest three Grimm boys)
(R) vrun - liar
(R)
Hey guys! You are all amazing. So now I need you to be even more amazing.

You'll notice at the end of the chapter that there are a couple of new pieces inspired by the UALP, by the lovely Caiti (Caitrona_3). She wrote these with my full support and input, and I strongly encourage you all to go take a look. And there's a new Family Photo in her "Photo Album" too! Let's spread the UALP LOVE, people!

Since this chapter is told in Spike's POV, there are no translations this time. Enjoy! with combat skills, which is why all the ladies loved him”. Which would be awesome, except that the ladies didn't tend to love him; Spike was getting exactly zero love.

Really, Spike wasn't entirely sure what the problem with Sam was. The guy wasn't a exactly a negotiator or anything, but he was a solid guy. He learned pretty quick, and he seemed genuinely interested in being good at the job. But Ed and Greg, and even to a smaller extent Wordy, had been gung-ho against the guy since Holleran introduced him two weeks before.

And now, his family was in town... and holy shit, Spike didn't want to have ever found himself on that's family's bad side. Except that, here he was... on that family's shit list. And staring at the monitors over the Colonel's shoulders, that was not somewhere he particularly wanted to be.

Based on his observations, the scenario ran around Sam and his mom being targets for the rest of the group. The systematic, and downright ballsy, way the two were putting down members of their own family was both impressive and terrifying. And then, of course, Lt. Colonel Petrovka took that flying leap off the roof, and Sam cut down the two snipers for the other team and Spike knew without a doubt... Team One was well and truly fucked. “Oh fuck. We are so screwed.”

His team leader's blue eyes were wary as he twisted and cocked an eyebrow at his technical and bomb specialist. “We are not screwed,” he argued on a growl.

“Are you kidding me!? Did you see that!? And she's still moving, as though it never happened. She's gotta be hurting.”

The Colonel's tone was cold as he replied, “Marina doesn't notice pain like normal people. Trust me... she hasn't even realized yet that she's bleeding.”

Jason groaned, reaching out to flipped another switch, “Yo Doc... your favorite patient is being badass again.”

“What's she done this time?” came the deep tones of the family's medical physician.

“Pretty sure she cut herself on glass,” Will replied, head cocking as he watched Sam crawl backwards from his perch and head to the other side of the building. Laying flat, he leaned over the edge of the roof and stretched down to pull Marina up onto the roof next to him.

There was a pause, as the two laid flat for a moment, lips moving as they talked, before Sam rolled to his feet and helped Marina up too. Hands on her shoulders, he rotated her around, earning a fond grin and a visible roll of her eyes. The second Sam saw the blood, he fished in his cargo pocket for a small first aid cut and tended to the injury quickly and efficiently. Will spoke up again, insisting, “Sam's got it, Vince. You're off the hook.”

“Thank God. I don't know what it is with you Grimms, but you avoid Medical a lot better than you do injury. Not to mention, you're the worst patients ever.”

Will grinned as he grunted in acknowledgment of that statement. “No argument there. But that's mostly because the nurses hate us.”

“Which is hilarious, because half of them are crushing on the lot of you,” the former soldier scoffed with a chuckle. “Anything else?”

“Nah... go back and play with the girls. We'll call you if we need you.”

There was a dry tone in his reply as Vincent drawled, “Thank you.”
It was about then that Spike turned his attention back to the screens, where Sam and Marina were attaching lines to harnesses and preparing to rappel down the side of the building. They barely slowed as they went over the side of the building, hitting the ground hard and disengaging in seconds flat. Sam slung his rifle over his back as he pulled the modified sidearm from its holster at his thigh, while Marina had two resting lazily in her palms.

Nodding at his brother, it was only a second, before Sam and Marina's voice filled the room. “This is gonna be a bitch, you know that right?” the Russian asked calmly.

“It's Brian and Natasha, two of the most accomplished assassins S.H.I.E.L.D. can boast. Fortunately, they don't know where we are . . . but we know where they're holed up. With any luck, this'll be over quick.”

“You need a break?”

“Nah. I'm good. Let's get this done.”

“Copy that,” she agreed, eyes scanning the area in front of her, before she gestured him forward with two fingers. “Move out.”

The two moved stealthily through their surroundings, as they approached the building where Brian and Natasha had laid their own trap. Heading for the side wall, the one location where the two would be completely blind to his approach, he tossed it up and grinned as the hook caught on the lip of the roof the first time. Hooking in his line to his harness, he offered her a fist. “See you up top.”

“Remember . . . black wall, third window,” she insisted, bumping his fist with her own.

“I remember,” Sam agreed, before he started to pull himself up the rope hand over hand. “Be careful.”

“Good hunting,” she returned, slipping soundlessly into the building and heading for the stairwell.

Crouching on the landing a half a level down, she whispered into her comm, “You ready?”

“I'm in position. Give me the word.”

“Heading up. Counting down steps,” she agreed, starting to count quietly as she climbed cautiously up the stairwell. Pausing just before the top, she checked around corner carefully with her compact, before dashing silently towards the door to the room where Brian and Natasha laid in wait. “On my mark . . . three . . . two . . . one . . . mark.”

Marina leaned around the door frame then, whistling to draw their attention away from the window at their backs. Dodging back around the wall out of sight, she watched their ammunition sail past her harmlessly. There was a whirring sound, swinging her back into the building and putting two shots in nape of each of their necks as they swung around to plug Sam as he rappelled into the room behind them. “Fuck!” Brian shouted, twisting to look at his sister. “In the back!? Really?”

“Kill shot is a kill shot,” Marina replied with a grin and a wink.

Natasha growled as she glared at her sister, “I should have known better. I should have known you were the one to worry about, and that Sam was the decoy. I was convinced you were the decoy and Sam was the one to worry about.”

“That was the plan,” Marina agreed, looking up at the camera as Will's voice came through the PA system. “Sam . . . Marina . . . good job. Come on back. Let's get this thing started.”
Glaring at his team leader, Spike asked, “Still think we’re not fucked? Because I really think we’re fucked.”

The Colonel looked down at his brother, one eyebrow cocking upwards. “You think we should unleash the Murderesses on them?”

“Do you want them to die today?” was the rhetorical question in reply, as Jason saved the footage from the game to a portable hard drive and stashing it in his bag before hauling another out and setting up to store the data for the next game.

“Marina and her sisters are not that terrifying.”

“We call them the Merry Murderesses . . . they are absolutely that terrifying.”

The Grimms came into the control room then, everybody congratulating Sam for his marksmanship and ragging on Marina for her general ruthlessness. "Come on, Marishka . . . that leap was crazy,” Clint insisted, staring at his sister in horrified awe.

Bucky's hand came up to rest on the back of his boyfriend's neck, even as he addressed his former protege. “He's not wrong, uchenny . . . are you all right?”

“I'm okay. My shoulder hurts, but that's just cause I landed hard. Really, I'm okay.”

“How's your back?”

“Sam took care of it. I'm all right. Ready to go.”

“You're not human . . . you know that right?” Aaron teased with a grin and a wink.

“Pot meet kettle,” the woman scoffed with a grin, ducking under the wide swing as she tackled her second youngest around the waist and proceeded to tickle the hell out of him.

“All right all right all right . . . settle down,” Will insisted, leaning back against the desk as he watched his family roughhouse with one another. The adrenaline was coursing through them all, but especially through Sam and Marina; Will could practically see the way his partner and their son were vibrating with the excess energy they weren't burning off. “Let's talk specs. Jay, this is your show.”

“Okay, so the scenario is simple. Team One, the Grimms are your targets.” Holding up what looked like a bladeless knife, Jason continued, “This is a modified K-Bar. It is a soldier's most reliable weapon. As you may notice, there is no blade. The plastic is a sensor. If it comes close to any of the receivers in the vests, it will tag you, just like any shot for any of the guns. There are receivers in your neck, your armpits and your waist; slices across the throat, stabbing motions at the arms or the abdomen will count. Anything above the vest counts as a kill. Any questions?”

“No. How did you get all of this?”

“I built most of it,” Jason replied, twisting back in his chair and pulling up the schematics of the yard. “So, here's your playground. Boundaries are here; anyone across a boundary is dead.” Smirking, he insisted, “You can pretend there's landmines if you'd like, but the boundary is finite. There is no dodging it. It will set off the receivers and I will know you crossed.”

“What about buildings?”

“Any of the buildings are fairplay. Just be fair warned, the Grimms are going to have access to them, before you ever get in. They're going in five minutes before you, to get set and then you're in after them. Last team standing... wins.” Spinning his chair around, he grinned, “Good hunting. And good luck... you're gonna need it.”

“You're not coming?”

“No. I'm running the monitors and the comms. Will's not going either, because with his tactical brain... you'd be dead in seconds and that's not fair.”

Marina huffed slightly, muttering in Russian and earning a series of sniggers from the Russian-speaking members of her family. “Are we doing this? Let's do this... I'm bored.”

“Grimms... get set. Team One, your countdown starts now. When the siren goes off, you're clear to enter. Take what time you can to decide your strategy... you'll need one. The park is extensive and you are outnumbered, two to one.”

Marina turned to look at her family as she ordered briskly, “All right, move out. Double time.”

There wasn't even a pause, before the room was empty and Will was turning to Jay. “Turn off the cameras until the siren. No unfair advantages.”

“Copy that,” the younger brother agreed, fingers moving fast across his fingers as he shut down the cameras just as the Grimms began to appear in the park. “Starting countdown.”

Spike had seen the competent and calm way Marina had been ordering her squad around, just before the cameras went down. Turning to his best friend, he saw his own consternation reflected on his buddy's face. “Am I the only one who has a really bad feeling about this?”

Lou's head shook once, eyes wide as he listened to Ed starting to discuss their tactical options and splitting the team up into entry groups. Lou and Spike had the black wall, while Greg and Ed would take white. Jules was assigned Sierra One; it was her job to find a perch as soon as they were in the park. Some part of Spike was worried that anywhere Jules picked, Sam would be already there – ready and waiting to take her out of play – but from the look on the woman's face, that wasn't something she wanted to hear. Wordy had been partnered with one of the members of Team Two, while the rest of Team Two had paired up amongst themselves.

Movement out of the corner of his eyes drew Spike's eyes around. Will was seated on the edge of the desk, leaning down to Jason's height and listening intently to whatever his younger brother was saying. Spike gulped slightly; the two men were eerie in their complete calm. Based on what they both had said, they agreed with Spike's assessment that Team One was well and truly fucked.

Groaning as the timer behind them began counting down the last sixty seconds to the siren blow, Spike turned on his heel and ran out of the room after the rest of his teammates. Lou and Spike were in position with an instant to spare, before the siren blew and they advanced into the park. Moving in stealth formation, they crept into the compound, eyes straight ahead and bodies alert for any sign of life. Which meant that it was a surprise, when a strong arm reached up around Spike's head, covering his mouth with one palm, as the other dragged the modified K-Bar across the exposed flesh of his jugular. Shocked at how fast it happened, Spike stared as Lou fell victim to the same fate only steps ahead of him.

Leaving him where he'd been “killed”, Aaron and Clint Grimm grinned at the two stunned SRU constables, before casting them a mock salute. “Nice knowing you boys,” Clint mocked, before the two turned away and proceeded to parkour up the side of the building next to them, without a rope and using only their hands and feet.
All in all, it was a rout. It took a grand total of seven minutes and twenty-eight seconds for the Grimms to completely decimate both of the combined SRU teams. As Spike predicted, Sam was waiting on the roof of the best perch for Jules, putting a shot into the hollow of her throat before she'd even finished clearing the lip, before taking up his sniper perch and calling out locations to the rest of the family. Ed fell victim to a well placed knife throw from the man Spike had pegged as Clint's boyfriend – though he wasn't going to ask, because if he was wrong, he had no desire to get his ass kicked – while Greg was taken out by a clean shot to the head by the youngest Grimm in his own perch on a different roof.

After it was over, the two groups switched roles. Team One took the place of the targets. It didn't end any better than it did the first time.

As the tech watched the tape after the two scenarios were over, he suddenly understood why the Colonel and his partner were so furious. It had not been hard to see the difference in tactics the two squads had employed. The SRU were obviously cops; clearly confident in their ability to clear the park without a second thought to sight lines or what was behind them. It came with the territory, he guessed. Most times when clearing a house, the person they were looking for wasn't a threat so they saw no reason to hide themselves the way the Grimms had.

The Grimms, though.

They melted into their surroundings effortlessly. Even Sam had managed to make himself completely invisible in plain sight. There was total calm and precision in every action, moving only as much as strictly necessary and employing an economy of motion that was fluid and effortless. They were beautiful and graceful and deadly.

Looking up at his sergeant with a grimace, Spike asked, “We probably need to reevaluate how we're training Sam.”

“Yeah, Spike . . . I think you might be right,” the man announced, eyes wide with shock and awe as he watched Sam joke with his two youngest uncles.
Hey guys! If you still haven't read Caiti's fics, I totally recommend them! They are awesome! And remember to review on them. Spread the love.

So this is the first of two for tonight. I hope you will let me know what you think of both chapters. I've worked really hard on these today.

Translations are at the end as always.

Chapter 188: Unwind

“All right... I need a drink,” Clint insisted, leaning back against his boyfriend subtly. “Who's with
“I guess that depends. Are you planning on getting drunk? Cause we can do that at home,” Marina teased, folding her arms over her chest as she smirked at her dorogoy. “There's plenty of alcohol back at the house.”

“Home is boring . . . bars are fun. Come on. Please, Marishka!”

“Why are you asking me?” she asked, moving to lean against the desk next to her own lover. “Ask your brother.”

“Because if you say yes, you can convince Will to say yes,” Aaron reminded his sister with a smirk, shifting at the last second to catch his girlfriend as Marta lunged into his arms.

Rolling her eyes, she scoffed, “Clearly you have a higher estimation of my influence over your brother than is reasonable.”

A soft brush against her arm brought her attention around to her partner. Will was fishing in one pocket, before drawing her opal from the depths. Offering him her left hand, she grinned as he fit the ring back in its rightful place before lifting the appendage to his lips and pressing a reverent kiss to the skin. Relieved to have it back – she never wore it on assignment, as she was terrified of losing it – she wiggled her fingers and watched the light play across the starburst shape of the deep blue stone. Humming happily, she shifted to burrow into his side, as Will looked up at his younger brothers. “Is there a particular bar you have in mind?”

“Spirits Bar and Grill,” was Jason's reply, a sly grin on his causing a flash of dread to slip past the Colonel's usual stoicism.

“It's a karaoke bar, isn't it?”

“Come on, Will . . . we haven't done karaoke since Jay got promoted,” Brian reminded the older brother, earning a small glare from the others. “You had fun last time.”

“I don't remember last time. And I seem to recall Marishka still holding some piece of blackmail over your head from that night,” the Colonel chuckled with a grin.

Scowling at the reminder, Brian thought about it for a moment and then shrugged. “Worth it.”

It was about then that four more people arrived in the room, led by none other than S.H.I.E.L.D.'s God himself. Marina grinned at the sight of him, even as she watched Team One's younger members stare in shock at the man's face . . . and the black eyepatch hiding his damaged left eye. “Fury . . . you magnificent bastard.”

“Hello Marina,” he greeted with his typical shark's grin, watching as Marina squealed at the sight of her best friend, the two women practically lunging at each other and hugging fiercely. Eyes roving over the faces of the SRU’s Team One, he turned back to Will and asked with a grin, “So? How'd it go?”

There was a small smile on the face of his Chief Analyst as he agreed, “It went. How was the trip?”

“Efficient,” he replied, using his hold on the hand of the woman beside him to pull her forward to stand beside him. “You remember Pam Landy? Pam, this is the Colonel I'm always telling you about.”

Nodding once in agreement, the Colonel greeted her warmly, “Ms. Landy.”
“Just Pam . . . I'm not afraid to tell you, Colonel, you and your family are quite the legend among intelligence circles.”

Shrugging nonchalantly, he folded his arms over his chest as he joked, “I'm sure I've heard that said a time or two.”

“You sure I can't seduce the lot of you away from S.H.I.E.L.D.? You would be a hell of a boon to the CIA.”

Quicksilver eyes flashed to his left as he replied, “No . . . I'm afraid that wouldn't work out for us.”

Following the movement, Landy gawked at the sight of Outcome 5 standing with Dr. Marta Shearing, the two watching her. Five's blue eyes were stark and resolute, though there was clear terror on the virologist's own face. Smirking slightly, she returned her attention back to the Colonel, “I can see how that would be the case.” Smiling kindly at the younger woman, she vowed solemnly, “Your secret is safe with me.”

Nodding once in silent thanks, Aaron wrapped his hand around Marta's own and pulled her gently from the room. Turning away from the retreating twosome, the blonde turned her attention on her brother, grinning brightly. “Hello Phil.”

There was a small smirk at the very corner of side of his mouth, as he replied, “You missed my wedding.”

“I know. I'm sorry.”

Shrugging one shoulder at the response – the handler was more than aware of the mess she'd been untangling at the time – he offered one hand to his wife and tucked the Amazon into him as he turned back to his sister. “Pam . . . I'd like you to meet my wife, Viktoria Viktorovna Dubrovskaya Coulson. Vika, this is my sister . . . Pamela Landy.”

“Pleasure to meet you,” the former assassin insisted with a small smile as she extended her hand to her husband's sister.

Smiling, Pamela stepped forward and wrapped her arms around the other woman familiarly. “Welcome to the family, Vika. I am very pleased to meet you.”

Hansel's eyes were solemn as they watched his oldest son visibly avoid him, eyes darting around the room. Noticing that her Vati was still standing off to the side, Marina released her best friend and turned to be able to look between the two. Narrowing her eyes at her partner, she watched as Will all but flinched at the expression. “All right . . . what's going on?”

“Nothing, samaya malen'kaya.”

Folding her arms over her chest, she watched him fidget for a moment, before rotating on her heel to look at the rest of the family. “All right. Everybody out!”

Will shifted, rocking backwards as she shoved sharply on the center of his chest. “Not you, William Michael.”

The two glared at each other for a long moment, even as she heard Clint joke to S.H.I.E.L.D.'s director, “Hey Boss . . . you met Team One yet?”

There was a pause before Fury rumbled, “How bad was it?”
Jason's tone was cackling as he replied, “They smoked 'em . . . twice.”

Whatever else was said was lost as the door closed, cutting off the family's Power Couple from the rest. Narrowing her arms at her lover, she insisted, “All right. Let's try this again . . . this time without the lie. What is going on?”

“He lied to me, Marina.”

“He was trying to protect you, Misha.”

“I don't need protection!” he roared, rocketing to his feet.

“I know . . . There are times I wish you'd accept it from me, but I know you don't need it. That doesn't explain why both Aaron and Clint said that you've been giving Hansel the silent treatment. And why you wouldn't even look at him when you both were in the same room together.”

Slumping backwards onto the desk, he sighed as he dropped his face into his hands. “My own father thinks I'm weak. What the hell does that say about me? How can I expect to continue to lead this family if my own father doesn't believe I can?”

She sighed as she came to kneel at his feet, hands coming up to brace herself on his knees. “Those we protect are not always weak, Mishka.” Reaching up to lift his chin with a crooked finger, she smiled as she asked, “Do you think Sam is weak, when I protect him? Or Clint when I protect him? Protection is just one more way we show we love someone.” Cupping his cheeks in her palms, she looked surely into his eyes as she implored him, “Please . . . do not let Ross into your head like this. You are the strongest man I know . . . no one else could have survived the kinds of things you have and still come out on the other side sane.”

Will jerked his chin out of her hand, glaring at a spot on the floor, though she dragged him back to her only a moment later. “Mishka . . . he isn't worth it. Don't let him do this to you. Please.”

Those eyes were tortured and angry and devastated, searing into her own as he took in the sincerity of her features and the honesty in her eyes. “I'm so tired, Marina,” he breathed, reaching up to trap her hand against his face.

“I know,” she promised, coming up to nuzzle her nose against his fondly. “Let me carry it for awhile . . . you don't need to be alone in this, Misha.”

She could feel fingers tangling in her hair as he hauled her up to his mouth, seeking absolution in her lips as he all but devoured her. Drawing him to her, she gave back as good as she got. She knew better than anyone how fragile he felt at that moment; they would go out with the family to the bar and attempt to get terribly drunk. And then . . . well, then she'd take him into her bed and let him bury himself in her for awhile.

Come morning, he'd be back on an even keel and maybe – just maybe – whatever damage had been wrought between Hansel and Will could begin to mend.

Finally, the two broke apart. “All right. Let's go out with the boys. I think we could use a break, don't you?” she asked, drawing tender designs on the roughened planes of his cheeks.

Nodding, he slumped down against her for a moment, just enjoying the warmth of her arms around him and the strength of her determination to protect him. After a bit, he straightened and stood from his seat. Helping her to her feet, he pulled her into him tightly, leaning on her lightly and knowing that she could take the weight. “Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen'kaya.”
“Lyublyu tebya, moy Mishka . . . vsegda,” she vowed, going up on tiptoes to kiss the bottom of his chin.

The two exited the room, skidding to a halt at the sight of the entire family waiting quietly for them to come out. There was a certain sense of anticipation, as the brothers looked between their commanding officer and their father, trying to guess what was going to happen next. Finally, Will moved forward and clapped his father on the shoulder companionably as he insisted, “Let's go get drunk.”

The relief was instant, even before Clint cheered, “All right! Cheap beer and shitty musicians . . . here we come!”

Marina's eyes widened slightly at the sight of Spike Scarlatti stepping forward then, followed by Lewis Young and Jules Callaghan. “You mind if we join you?”

Turning to look at her son, she watched as he moved to take up a spot next to her. Reaching up to cup his cheek, she insisted, “It's your call, Sammy-honey. You let me know what you want to do.”

Those blue eyes were curious and a little sad as they looked down at her, before turning his attention onto his teammates. There was a long pause, before at last he shrugged, “Sure . . . you can come if you want.”

“All right then . . . let's out of here,” the Colonel insisted, reaching out over Marina's head to ruffle the kid's hair fondly. “I'm going to assume you have your own transportation?”

“Yes sir.”

“Don't call me sir . . . I work for a living,” was the automatic response, before he moved away with Marina beside him. “Grimms . . . move out!”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint Grimm)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel Kuhn)
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina Petrovka)
(R) Misha/Mishka - a diminutive of Michael (Will's middle name is Michael; Marina's most common nickname for her lover)
(R) (Ya) lyublyu tebya - (I) love you
(R) vsegda - always
Chapter 189: Demons of the Night

Marina groaned as she took in the features of her family. It was about two in the morning. And it had been a long night of drinking.

Her son was literally giggling, one arm over her Misha's shoulders as the Colonel coaxed him tenderly into the back of the Jeep. While she was relieved to see him relatively carefree for once, there was a bigger part of her that worried about what kind of havoc the alcohol would wreck on her youngest. He already suffered from nightmares, and considering that Lou and Spike had finally managed to pester him into confessing why he'd left JTF2 – the looks of sympathetic shock on each of their faces had managed to make tiny cracks in the iron around Marina's heart – she was anticipating a short night.

“All right, Sammy-honey, into the car with you,” she scolded, climbing up onto the back wheel and leaning over to get him propped up against the side of the car and his seatbelt around him securely. Smoothing one hand over his hair, she smiled at the brilliant, if exorbitantly drunk, smile he gave her just before he let out a small hiccup. “Oh baby . . . you are going to be regretting this in the morning.”

Turning to smile at the Grimms, she chuckled to see the boys mostly sober. Seeing as it took the entire stock of the bar they'd gone to in New York to get them drunk the first time, she wasn't really surprised that none of them were currently impaired. Marta didn't drink, so she and Aaron were coaxing a very drunk Jules Callaghan into the back of the Jeep next to Sam. Marina had limited herself to a series of vodka shooters with her best friend and sisters, before consuming only a single beer after that. She would probably be feeling it in the morning, but for the moment she was okay. Her sisters . . . maybe not so much, as evidenced by the way that Hansel and Maria were practically draped all over each other, and by Natasha's lax posture as she slumped against her lover tiredly.

Taking in the other two boys that Clint and Bucky were currently stuffing into the backseat of Aaron's rental, she sighed heavily, “Okay . . . so I think it'll just be easier to take the kids back to the house. We can bed them down in the living room; they can sleep it off and leave in the morning.”

“Sounds good. We'll take Young and Scarlatti. You two gonna be okay here?”

“We'll see you back at the house,” she agreed, accepting Marta's hug warmly before chuckling as Aaron's arms came around the both of them. “Be careful going home. See you soon.”

“We'll see you there,” Aaron agreed, before handing Marta into the passenger seat of the rental. He waited patiently for a moment for her to get settled, before he pushed the door shut and rounded the car to the driver's side. Before long, the Jeep was the only Grimm car still in the parking lot.

Looking up at her lover, the Russian teased, “You ready to get out of here?”

“More than ready. How are our drunkards?”

Twisting, she grinned to see Jules already curled up in her corner and snoring, while Sam was practically sprawled against the seat and snuffling adorably in his sleep. “I think they'll be okay. Just . . . avoid the potholes or we may scramble Sam's brain.”

Reaching across the gearshift, Will took her hand and pressed a sweet kiss to the tattoo displayed on the inside of her wrist. “Let's go home.”

Smiling at him sweetly, she twisted her hands to interlace their fingers before settling back in her seat as the Colonel started the car and pulled out into the street.

Getting everyone into the house ended up being kind of a mess. Marina dropped an unsteady and still mostly sleeping Sam onto the couch, pausing there before going to get what she would need to bed down the three members of Team One in the living room. “Misha . . . bring some water!” she called, cupping Sam's cheek as she insisted, “Stay awake, Sammy . . . you need to drink some water first, okay?”
“Mm-hm,” he agreed in a sleepy hum, even as he curled up in the corner of the couch.

Shaking her head, she looked up as her lover came into the couch with a handful of water bottles. Handing them out to the other three, he took a seat on the arm next to Sam's head and nudged him gently. “Come on, malysh . . . drink some water.”

“Tired, Dad,” the boy moaned, even as he consented to Will's continued prodding.

“I know. But you'll feel better in the morning if you drink some water now. Come on . . . slow sips . . . drink the whole thing . . . good kid,” the Colonel coaxed fondly, running his fingers slowly through his son's blond hair. Looking up at his partner, he nodded, “I got this. Go get the stuff.”

Nodding briskly, Marina dashed towards the stairs and disappeared down the hall towards the linen closet in the spare bathroom. Passing out the blankets and pillows, she moved to crouch in front of her son and partner with a small smile. Reaching up to smooth her fingers over his cheek, she teased, “You're going to be miserable in the morning, baby.”

Trying to shrug, the kid nearly knocked himself onto the floor. “Worth it.”

Shaking her head, she tilted the water bottle up to force him to swallow down the rest, before tossing the empty bottle towards the kitchen where it would be out of the way. “All right, let's get you up to bed,” she soothed, standing and assisting him to his feet.

Will wrapped one arm over his shoulder, letting Marina take the other before the three made their slow, ponderous way up the stairs and towards the smaller room Sam had claimed as his own. Marina had tried to insist that he take the master bedroom, as it was his house, but he'd insisted that it was actually Will and Marina's house, and he was just taking care of it for them. Once the kid was seated on the edge of the bed, Will waved Marina away. “Go on . . . I'll get him ready for bed and join you in a minute.”

Nodding, she bent and pressed a warm kiss to her boy's forehead. “I love you, Sammy-honey.”

Grinning at her, he insisted, “Love you too, Ma. Night.”

“Good night, baby,” she soothed, running her fingers through his hair one more time before leaving him in her partner's capable hands.

By the time Will joined her under their own sheets, it had been about 45 minutes and Marina was well on her way to the Land of Morpheus. Huffing, even as she allowed him to roll her into his embrace, she yawned. “Everything okay?”

“Yeah . . . he got sick but he's all right. He's sleeping.”

“I'm worried.”

“Neither one of us is a particularly hard sleeper, Marishka . . . we'll hear him if he needs us.”

Nodding in agreement, she nuzzled into his ribcage. The two were quiet for a moment, before finally Marina could hear Will give a soft curse. “Fuck it,” he muttered, before rolling onto her, his lips muffling her giggles as he kissed her. “Think we can manage to be quiet?”

“I don't know. I think you're gonna have to gag me,” she taunted, arching her hips up into his own. His eyes slammed closed at the very thought, a low groan wrenched from deep in his chest. “Not fair.”
“Nothing is fair in love and war, Misha . . . especially not sex,” she teased, her fingers tangling in his hair and dragging him down to her again.

She'd kill anyone who wanted to know for themselves, but Marina's favorite part of sex with William Grimm was not the act itself. Not that sex with her partner wasn't a religious experience in and of itself or the best sex she'd ever had because it was and it WAS. Rather, it was the way he touched her, the way he worshiped her with fingers, lips and body. Every second was a testament to his love for her and she reveled in it.

Throwing her head back with a sharp gasp as he bit down sharply on the curve of her collarbone, she swore virulently as he proceeded to follow the bone with a series of sharp kisses and nips that took her breath away. “Misha,” she groaned, undulating against him in the hopes that she could prod him along faster.

“Patience, zhemchuzhina . . . we have all night. And I intend to exploit every second of it,” he murmured, one warm strong hand pinning her hips down to the bed as he moved away from her collarbone and down towards her navel, hands fumbling with the hem of the shirt she was wearing. “Is this my Army shirt?”

Grinning, she purred, “Da.”

Rolling his eyes, he chuckled as he insisted, “I'm going to want this back, you know.”

Whatever Marina had been about to say in response was cut off as suddenly a bloodcurdling scream ripped through the house. The couple froze, Marina's eyes flashing wide as she stared at her lover in shock. Another scream penetrated the silence and it was as though someone had flipped a switch. “Sam.”

Instantly, the two were flying from the bed and dashing down the hallway toward their son’s room. Marina barely noticed Spike sprawled against the wall in Sam's room, with Lou attempting to get a good look at the eye he was holding in one hand. Instead, she lunged past Jules and grabbed both of Sam's flailing wrists, pinning them firmly to the bed. “Sammy! Sammy . . . baby . . . wake up . . . honey, it's Mom . . . wake up,” she prodded, trying to control his frantic thrashing as he attempted to free himself from her grip.

Will moved into the room, taking in the situation with a pair of cold eyes, before insisting, “Everybody out.”

Jules balked at the order, earning a flash of the Colonel's legendary temper as he roared, “Move it!”

It was about then that Sam jolted awake throwing his body upwards as he threw Marina towards the end of the bed. She impacted the foot board hard, though she didn't stay there as she moved to pull him into her arms while he heaved in air, blue eyes taking in his surroundings deliriously. Will hauled the two men up from the floor and shoved them towards the door, hustling Jules after them before moving to the bedside. “Sammy . . . it's Dad and Mom.”

Blinking hard as he tried to clear the last vestiges of the dream, the blond struggled to focus on their faces before whimpering when Marina's fingers slipped familiarly into his hair. “Ma?”

“It's okay, baby . . . I'm right here,” she soothed, bracing herself for the sudden addition of his weight as he all but threw himself into her arms, whole body shuddering as he sobbed. “I'm sorry . . . I didn't mean to kill him . . . I didn't mean to . . . I was cleared . . . I'm sorry . . .” he rambled, gasping as he attempted to speak and sob at the same time.
“I know,” she promised, pulling him into her tightly as she speared her fingers through his hair. Pressing her lips against his forehead, she whispered against the skin calmly, “I know you were, Sammy. It wasn't your fault . . . and Ben wouldn't think it was your fault either. It was an accident, it's okay. It's all right. I'm here. You're okay. It was just a dream. You're okay.”

Will reached up and cupped the back of his head, thumb rubbing gently against the skin just behind his ear where his jaw connected with his skull. Sam shuddered hard, his rambling fading into a low keening sound. Together, the couple worked to calm the kid, conscious of the muffled sounds outside the door as the three members of Team One no doubt went head to head with Will's younger brothers about getting back into the room.

Finally, Sam ran out of tears, slumping into her chest in exhaustion. Snuffling, he nosed at her neck as he sniffled. “Sorry,” he murmured, feeling his body go limp against her.

“There is absolutely nothing to be sorry for, Sammy. Nightmares happen to all of us. It's okay,” Will insisted, cupping his chin and making sure that his son was looking at him so as to see the honesty in his eyes. “I have pretty bad ones too. I can't tell you how many times I've spent the night on our couch at home, watching Nick at Nite and drinking whiskey practically straight from the bottle. We all have our demons. You have nothing to be sorry for or ashamed of.”

Marina hummed in wordless agreement, wincing at the sound of raised voices in the hallway outside though, thankfully, Sam at least didn't seem to notice. “What do you need, Sammy?”

“Just stay . . . at least until I fall asleep,” he begged, looking up at her with liquid, devastated eyes.

“No problem,” she promised, leaning back against the headboard and letting him curl up with his head in her lap, her fingers carding gently through his hair. “You want me to sing to you?”

Nodding, he shuddered hard once before settling once again as his dad moved to sit on the edge of the bed at his back, fingers finding that spot behind his ear once more. “All right. Close your eyes,” she prompted, fingertips trailing softly down his face, pressing his eyelids closed lightly. Taking a deep breath, and linking his free hand with her partner's own free one, she began to sing, “Sing me a song of a lad that is gone . . . say could that lad be I? . . .”

She made it a half a verse more, before Sam completely slumped, finally asleep once more. Will's fingers were light on his pulse point as he counted it out, before nodding slowly once. “He's out.”

Taking a deep breath, Marina nodded in agreement. Together, the two rearranged Sam on his stomach, his head on a pillow and the covers up around his shoulders. Bracing her weight on the bed, the Russian bent to press a warm kiss to his head as she murmured, “Ya lyublyu tebya, malysh.”

Her partner repeated the action as well, before the two crept quietly from the room. The door shut as soundlessly as it could, before they turned away from the room and into a war zone. Aaron and Jules were toe to toe, Jules' whole body tensed for a fight as Aaron insisted, “This has nothing to do with us! We're his teammates!”

“And we're his family,” was Will's sharp response, causing the entire hallway to fall silent as they rotated to face the two Colonels. “Sam is asleep, and quite frankly I'm not expecting him to stay that way for long. It's going to be a hell of a night.” Rubbing one hand briskly over his face, he turned to face Spike, “How's your eye?”

“I'm fine. I just wasn't expecting him to come up swinging.”
“Never try to wake a special forces soldier in the middle of a nightmare, unless you've been trained to do so. It's very dangerous . . . he could have killed you and wouldn't have had any idea he was doing it,” Marina insisted, using two fingers on his chin to turn his face into the meager light. “That's going to be a gorgeous shade of black by morning. Clint . . . go get Constable Scarlatti an icepack, please.”

Nodding once, the youngest Grimm dashed down the stairwell without protest. “As for the rest of you, get some sleep. We're all going to need it.”

Marta bit down on her lip sharply, prompting Marina to take pity. “He's gonna be okay, Marta. I promise. Hashing it out with the two of them just brought it back. That, combined with his tendency towards nightmares and the alcohol he consumed tonight . . . I'm not surprised this happened.”

Twisting to look at the door from the circle of her boyfriend's arms, she stared at it for a long moment as though she could see the body past the wood. Taking a deep breath, she reached out to grab Marina's wrist, begging, “Take care of him?”

“We will. Get some rest. We'll see you in the morning.”

Nodding, she moved forward to accept the Russian's warm hug before allowing her boyfriend to coax her tenderly down the hallway. It wasn't long before Marina and Will were the only two left in the hallway, Will's arm was warm and comfortable as it came up around her shoulders. “Come on, samaya malen'kaya. We might as well get as what rest we can before he wakes up again. We're in for a long night.”

Nodding in agreement, she looped her arm around his waist and let him lead her back to their bed. Climbing under the covers, she waited for him to situate himself before burrowing into his offered embrace. Hot chocolate eyes slipped closed as he pressed a warm kiss to her forehead, “He's going to be okay . . . get some rest.”

Nodding, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler forced herself to close her eyes and attempt to get some sleep. Even as she was drifting off, she was aware of a large part of herself already listening for the next scream . . . waiting for the next nightmare.

Will was right. It was going to be a very long night.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) malysh - kiddo
(R) zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for Marina Petrovka)
(R) Da - yes
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R)
Okay, first, the Bucky manip is by youneedtostrut on Tumblr. It is being used with her permission. I don't know if you can read, but the box is tagged with credit as well. Basically, don't steal it . . . she worked super hard on it and it is awesome. Secondly, NEW BANNER! Yay! If anyone would like to know what the pictures say, please let me know. I can post all of the individual pictures as a separate picture in a new post.

Thirdly, we are ten chapters away from 200 chapters and less than a month from 3 YEARS! Wow, who would have ever thought!

Translations at the end, as always.

Thank you all for your continued interest in this story. Please do keep the comments coming; they are in large part the reason why I am being so productive and so quick right now. They always make my day!

Enjoy this one! After the angst of the last one, and the angst I have planned, I decided to give you all a fluffy, schmoopy chapter to read!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 190: Sorting It Out

Sam woke twice more that night. The first time it didn't take long to settle him, just the knowledge that someone was there and a soft hum as she thread her fingers through his hair. The second he woke vomiting, sobbing and shaking as he cowered away from Will's silhouette against the wall . . . which pretty much confirmed Marina's thoughts on the extent of the abuse the General had dished out to his only son. The black eye he'd sported the first time they met wasn't the first bruise his father had given him . . . just the first readily visible one.

Guiding her son up and out of his soiled sheets, she eased him down the hallway towards the bathroom, stripping him down to his boxers and coaxing him into the shower. Once he was leaning up in the corner under the warm spray and she was sure he wasn't going to accidentally drown himself, she went back to help her partner strip the bed and remake it with clean sheets. Will looked up from where he was yanking the sheets into a bundle. “He okay?”

“Hungover, I think,” she replied with a small smile. “Fortunately, it was mostly alcohol that came up. That should help with the worst of the symptoms.”

Narrowing his eyes at her, he accepted the filthy pajamas she offered him. “You're gonna tell me what that was about, right?”
“I think the General was more abusive than we had previously thought,” she replied with a fierce scowl. “With the shock of waking . . . I think he mistook you for the General.”

The Colonel hummed in agreement, a small frown on his face as he leaned over to peck her cheek before he carted the sheets down to the laundry room to start a load. Moving into the kitchen to grab some crackers and some ginger ale out of the pantry, he was aware of the tense anticipation coming from the living room. Sighing, he turned to look at the constables and was unsurprised to see the three awake and watching him. “You do realize it's still early, right?”

“Is he okay?” Jules asked, brown eyes worried as they flicked towards the stairs.

“He's gonna be fine. The alcohol's playing tricks on his brain. Once he's sober again, the memories will be back under his own control.”

“Those are memories?” Lou asked, eyes popping wide in shock.

“Regrettably,” was the only answer, before the Colonel jogged back up the stairs.

Spike hauled his knees up, wrapping his arms around them as he listened to the activity taking place upstairs. Jules frowned from her place on the couch as she mused, “I wonder if Sam has PTSD . . .”

Lou cocked an eyebrow at the team's profiler as Spike sputtered at the statement. “Who cares if he has PTSD? How about the fact that he has memories that give him NIGHTMARES!?”

Jules gaped at the young bomb technician, before stammering, “The psych evals . . . how did he get past them if he has PTSD?”

“Does it matter?”

“What if he has a flashback on the job? And your life is in hands? Don't you think it would matter then?” Jules scolded, scowling lightly as she glared at her teammates. “Look . . . I like Sam. I'm just trying to look out for the team.”

Sensing that his best friend was on the verge of an explosion, Team One's less lethal expert chimed in calmly. “I don't think Sam has acute PTSD . . . though I'm not going to argue he doesn't have it at all. But he's focused on the job, and he feels very deeply for the people we help. I mean, yeah he obviously has nightmares about things that have happened to him and clearly he has trouble sleeping. But he's capable of emotional connection, I have never seen him anxious or jittery while he's at work, and he really doesn't seem like the type to panic for no reason. He's alert and aware of his surroundings, but I don't get the sense he's waiting for an IED on the side of the road or a sniper on the rooftops. He is aware of where he is, in every moment. He's a little depressed, but I don't think that has anything to do with what's going on right now and has everything to do with how we've been treating him for the last three weeks since he joined the team.” Scrubbing a hand over his head, he insisted, “Even if he has it, it's managed.”

The female sniper watched Spike visibly fumed, glaring at her viciously at what he felt was a slight towards his new friend. Sam and Spike had connected while out last night, and before the end of the night, whatever animosity had been between them had been pretty much gone. Conceding that point, Jules nodded in agreement. “I hope he's okay.”

“You heard the Colonel . . . he's gonna be fine,” Spike snapped, still feeling upset about the fact that she had turned against the Sam . . . however briefly.

It was about then that Marina trudged down the stairwell, a lavender-colored robe over black yoga pants and gray Army shirt. Her hands were pulling her curly hair up into a sloppy ponytail as she trekked into the kitchen. Frowning, Spike called cautiously, “Ma'am?”

“It's Marina,” she insisted over her shoulder as she stretched up on tiptoes to reach the rack of pans over the stove. “Damn it . . . did they have to put this thing so damned high?” she grumbled viciously, before cheering adorably in victory as she managed to slip the big fry pan from its hook. “What can I help you with, Constable?”

“What are you doing?”

“Making breakfast. If we're going to be awake anyway, we might as well have something to eat,” she replied with a small, sad smile. “How are you all feeling?”

Lou made a face, aware of the nauseous tossing in his gut, though Jules only shook her head calmly. “We'll manage.”

“Good . . . then you can come and help,” the officer insisted briskly, clearly having been a drill sergeant in another life. “Spike . . . coffee. Lou, there's bacon in the fridge . . . I need it chopped up into tiny pieces. Jules . . . if you wouldn't mind making the juice; Sam needs the sugar this morning.”

Cocking an eyebrow as they gawked at her, she barked, “Now!”

Scrambling to their feet, the three bolted into the kitchen and to their assigned jobs. The three worked in silence, though Marina hummed along to whatever song was in her head as she filled a pot with water and set eggs to hard boil. Next she began to press uncooked sausage into large flat disks, prompting Spike to cock an eyebrow. “What are you making?”

“Scotch eggs. Trust me . . . it's a fool proof hangover cure. Hard boiled eggs wrapped in sausage and fried in bacon grease,” she replied, giggling quietly to see Lou turned slightly green at the gills. “I promise, they're good and you'll feel a lot better once you've had some.”

“I think I'll take your word for it,” the young black man insisted, swallowing convulsively.

“Bathroom's down the hall and around the corner,” she informed him, watching as he all but bolted away. Chuckling, she muttered lightly, “Oh boy. Poor kid.”

“Who's a poor kid?” Will asked as he moved into the kitchen, heading straight for the coffee machine. Sam crept in after him, plopping down at the kitchen table and burying his face in his arms.

“Lou . . . alcohol is not his friend this morning,” Marina chirped, pouring a glass of the pulpy orange juice and setting it front of her son. Sam groaned as the acidic scent filled his nose, nuzzling further into his arms. “Drink it, Sammy . . . you'll feel better.”

Groaning, he lifted his head and drained the glass in a total of three swallows. “Ugh,” he grunted, before dropping his head onto his arms once again.

Bending, she pressed a warm kiss to the back of his head before skipping to throw her arms around her lover. “Morning!” she chirped, pushing herself up onto her tiptoes to press a warm kiss to his lips.

“Dobroye utro, samaya malen'kaya,” he murmured, hands coming up to cup her cheeks as he trapped her for a longer kiss. His hands skimmed down the side of her neck and fiddled lightly at the collar of her shirt. “I still want this back.”

“Gonna have to take it from me,” she teased, kissing him again before skipping away with a giggle.
Before long, the eggs were being rolled in the sausage patties and carefully dropped into the bubbling bacon grease. Lou appeared back in the kitchen, considerably pale but not quite as nauseous looking. “Feeling better?” she asked, offering him a glass of juice.

“Yes . . . thank you.”

“Good,” she agreed, reaching up to squeeze his bicep lightly as she moved out of the kitchen. Pausing at the bottom of the stairs, she shouted upwards, “Grubs up!” There was silence, as she imagined the more hungover members of the family groaning and burrowing deeper into their partners. Chuckling, she continued, “I made scotch eggs!”

At which point, there was a cacophony of sound and movement as everyone moved to get down the stairs without killing each other. Aaron swung his sister up into a warm hug, Clint there a second later as he slid from the end of the banister. Rolling her eyes at the action, she hugged them both fiercely even as she scolded, “What have we said about banisters, Clinton Francis?”

“Love you, Marishka,” he replied with a grin, dashing on his brother's heels toward the kitchen.

Accepting Jason's warm hug and Brian's kiss on her cheek, she grinned at her sister as Natasha all but collapsed onto her. “I drank too much vodka,” the redhead groaned, earning a soft chuckle as Marina protested lightly, “There is no such thing as too much vodka. Go on . . . you should get some before the boys eat everything.”

Before long, the entire family had found places around the kitchen – at the table, leaning against the counters and walls, seated on the floor – as they ate. Marina perched on the arm of Will's chair, his arm slung around her waist as the two shared a single plate between them. Sam looked considerably less pale, now that there was actual food in his stomach, though he ate slowly and methodically, unaware of Jules Callaghan's curious gaze fixed on the back of his head. Looking around at this family the Grimms had built for themselves over the years, she grinned and leaned to rest her chin on her partner's shoulder. “We did good,” she murmured into his ear, earning a warm squeeze at her waist.

Quicksilver eyes roamed the faces of each person in the kitchen – pausing even on those of Lou Young, Spike Scarlatti and Jules Callaghan – as he agreed, “Yes we did.”

Somehow, someone – read Clint – managed to con the entire family into having a lazy day and watching the first Harry Potter movie. (“It's a good movie!” had been the sniper's argument, to which Brian had scoffed, “Yeah . . . if you're twelve!”) However it had happened, everyone had found a place in the combined living room/family room/parlor, watching the 90 inch LED TV that Marina had splurged on for the house.

Casey was cuddling up in Jason's lap, the two seated in the armchair, a speculative look in Jason's eyes that typically meant he was trying to figure out some complicated math problem. Or at least in this case . . .

“Am I the only one who thinks that Marina's a Hufflepuff?”

“What!?” was the astounded question from the Russian in question, back pressed to Will's ribcage and Sam sprawled out next to her with his head in her lap and his feet in his Aunt Marta's, with Aaron perched on the arm next to her. Owen had made himself comfortable on the arm next to Will, the two best friends exchanging fond grins at the incredulous sound of Marina's voice. Between the six of them, they managed to take up the entirety of one couch all to themselves.
Apparently, no one was going to respond to her question, every single one of her boys nodding in quiet agreement at the statement. “I can see that,” Brian agreed, fingers playing absently in Natasha's hair, his back pressed up against the couch and Natasha sprawled across the floor with her head in his lap.

“How?” Marina demanded, reaching over to flick the back of her boy’s ear.

“Come on, Marina . . . you may be one of the scariest agents at S.H.I.E.L.D., but you're basically a Russian grandmother. If everyone is fed and happy, you are happy,” Maria teased, giggling as she dodged the pillow her best friend threw at her head.

Clint chimed in then, “Will's a Slytherin!”

“No argument here!” was the unanimous response from every single one of his younger brothers, earning a roll of his eyes and a single nod of agreement from the eldest Grimm himself.

Lifting one hand to pause the video, Vika asked fondly, “Are we seriously doing this right now? We're going to sort the family? Into Hogwarts houses?”

“Why not?” the Colonel asked with a soft chuckle. “It's not the craziest thing we've ever done.”

“Okay, so Marina's a Hufflepuff and Will's a Slytherin. Are we agreed?” Clint asked cheerfully, bouncing cheerfully in place where he sat between Bucky's lap and leaning back against his chest.

“Agreed!”

“So who's next?”

“Sam,” was the announcement, causing Sam to blink out of his doze. “What?”

“It's okay, Sammy . . . Clint's trying to sort you.”

“Sort me into what?” he yawned, back arching as he stretched. “What did I miss? I fell asleep sometime after the train station.”

Running her fingers through his hair, Marina insisted, “Didn't miss much. Jason says I'm a Hufflepuff, and your uncles are pretty well convinced that your dad is a Slytherin.”

“Kay. Wait what?” he asked, blinking as what she'd said registered. After a moment, he shrugged and settled back into his spot, asking lazily, “What am I?”

“I think that's what they're trying to figure out?” she promised, watching as Clint and Aaron bickered between them. Aaron was arguing Hufflepuff, but Clint was insistent on Gryffindor, to which Will spoke up. “Except for maybe Dad and Maria . . . there isn't a single Gryffindor in this family.”

“How do you figure?” Spike asked curiously, cocking his head in question.

“The Army pretty much beat the recklessness out of us. A reckless soldier is a dead soldier, period,” was Will's answer, reaching out to grab his coffee mug from the small table next to the couch.

“He's not wrong,” Aaron agreed, leaning down to kiss his girlfriend's cheek. “I wanna say he's a Hufflepuff . . . just like his mom.”

“Why?”

“He thrives in this family, as a part of a community. He's honest to a fault, he works harder than almost anyone and he's fair.” Shrugging, Aaron continued. “Open hearted, down to earth. Patience and stubbornness are two required qualities of being a good sniper; which, considering he took out the family's two best snipers, I'm pretty sure we can put him in that category. I'd say Hufflepuff.”

Looking down at her son, Marina asked fondly, “What do you think, Sammy?”

“At least I inherited something from you,” he teased, tilting his face upwards to catch her adoring kiss on the apple of his cheek. “I'm good with Hufflepuff.”

Will chuckled, sipping from his mug as he insisted, “Clint and Aaron are too. So is Casey.”

“How do you figure!?” Bucky burst out in shock, eyes wide as he stared at his boyfriend's brother. “Clint is the most reckless little cuss I know.”

Rolling his eyes in agreement, the Colonel lifted one hand to play with his partner's curls as he explained, “He's also loyal, hard working, patient and honest. You always know where you stand with him; there's no artifice in him, and he doesn't have a deceitful bone in his body where this family is concerned. So yeah, he's brave and reckless and definitely thrill-seeking, but those aren't at the core of who he is. They're just . . . a smaller part of what makes Clint 'Hawkeye'.”

Marta hummed as she looked up at her boyfriend, “I'll agree that Aaron is a Hufflepuff.”

The second youngest Grimm scowled as he muttered bitterly, “Kenny was a Hufflepuff . . . I am not.”

“Aaron, solnyshko, you and Kenny are not as different as you like to think you are,” his sister insisted fondly, gifting him with a brilliant smile. “You have always been kind to those who need it. Without your kindness, Sam wouldn't be a part of this family, because you never would have brought him home with you. Hell, you wouldn't have gone back for Marta, so she wouldn't be here either. There has never been a moment where we couldn't count on you to be exactly where you needed to be, to keep a secret that we needed kept. You protect Marta fiercely; I have no doubt that Pam would have been in real trouble yesterday, if she'd decided not to keep your secret.” Leaning over as far as she could, she touched the hand he had resting on Marta's shoulder as she insisted, “Above all . . . your loyalties are unquestionable. You would do anything for this family. If that doesn't sound like a Hufflepuff, I don't know what does.”

Twisting his hand upwards under hers, he squeezed her wrist lightly in thanks, before nodding once in silent agreement. Jason cleared his throat, tightening his arms around Casey's waist as he insisted, “How do we think Casey's a Hufflepuff? Cause I'm pretty sure, she can kick my ass.”

“So can Marina . . . what's that got to do with anything?” Brian taunted, dodging the handful of M&Ms Jason chucked at his brother's head. Natasha growled viciously, glaring at the younger Grimm even as she hauled her lover back into place under her head. “Easy, Vdova; we don't murder family, remember?”

Nuzzling back into his thigh, the Black Widow purred as he returned his fingers back to her hair, playing with the curls soothingly. Chuckling at her sister's uncharacteristic affection, Marina twisted to look up at her lover as she insisted, “You were the one who suggested it. You tell him.”

“Casey knew you had secrets and only once demanded to know those secrets. She even accepted that you couldn't tell her. Considering that she didn't know everything, she has still been completely loyal to you. She protected you at the Second, when you couldn't protect yourself. She's fair and probably the most level-headed person here. We entrusted her with our secrets, which means she's pretty damned trustworthy; they're not something we just tell anyone.”
Casey beamed at the endorsement from the oldest Grimm, a light blush painting her cheeks as she replied, “Thank you, Will.”

“Just calling it like I see it,” he promised, saluting her with his mug.

Wiggling back against her boyfriend, Casey insisted, “Jason’s Ravenclaw.”

“As if he could be anything else!” was the near simultaneous protest from his two younger brothers. “Eccentric, talented, intelligent, hella creative. What else could he have been?”

“Aunt Marty's a Ravenclaw. She's always been crazy smart. When we were kids . . . let's just say, I wasn't the one pulling crazy experiments in my room which usually ended in explosions.”

“That was once!” Marta protested, pinching the back of her nephew's calf in retaliation.

“It was still an explosion!” he reminded her, even as he fidgeted at she continued pinching at his most ticklish spots. “Knock it off! No tickling!”

“What about Bucky?” Clint asked, one corner of his mouth pulling downwards as he twisted to look up at his boyfriend. “I'm not sure he's as easy to sort as the rest of us.”

“Brian and Natasha are easy?” Lou asked curiously, blinking as the entire family – including Sam – announced in one voice, “Slytherin!”

“Oh.”

“Yeah, Zima is hard,” Marina agreed with a frown as she contemplated her former mentor. “He could be Slytherin. He's resourceful and ruthless, if the situation calls for it. And I remember a few assignments where that cleverness of his got both him and you out of a tight spot, Clint.”

“He could be Hufflepuff,” Aaron chimed in, watching his brother's boyfriend as the Winter Soldier ducked his face into the curve of Clint's throat, the back of his own neck going rosy as he blushed. “He's loyal and, even if the rest of the agents at S.H.I.E.L.D. don't agree with us, we know he's trustworthy.”

“Actually, Bucky may be the only other Gryffindor in this family,” Will insisted, quicksilver eyes pinning the older man in place as he looked up at him in question.

“How do you figure?”

“I've heard stories about the Howling Commandos . . . they were brave, reckless, arrogant and hella loyal. Property damage wasn't really a big concern, which is good because there was a lot of it. Granted, it was usually to HYDRA's deficit, so . . .eh,” the Colonel shrugged one shoulder as he left the rest of his thought hanging unsaid. “But, combined with his loyalty and his intelligence and his cunning, Gryffindor seems to be the best fit in my opinion.”

Smiling sheepishly up at Will, he reminded the family's CO. “I was Army too . . . once.”

“Yeah . . . but that was a different era. The Army needed a different kind of soldier in that war. Ergo . . . Captain America and his Howling Commandos.”

“I thought those were characters in a comic book,” Spike protested, leaning forward curiously.

Glancing at each other, the Grimms simultaneously burst into laughter. Even Marina was sniggering as she replied, “Oh Spike . . . you should check your history books.”
“They were real people . . . and even though we never met most of them, they have had a huge influence on the Grimms to this point,” the Colonel insisted, the bomb technician flinching slightly at the cold honesty in the other man’s eyes.

Twisting to look up at her partner's best friend, Marina grinned but said nothing, prompting the Cleaner to announce. “Yeah, Boss-lady. We all know where I've been sorted. Shut up.”

“It makes sense; you'd do anything to protect Misha,” she reminded him, with a relieved smile, clearly conveying the comfort she took in that particular character trait. “Ruthless, clever, resourceful, more than a little manipulative when the situation calls for it. I'm not sure why you're surprised that you're a Slytherin, Lucky.”

“A Slytherin?” Lou asked, eyes going wide as Owen nodded in agreement.

“My loyalties are confined to a grand total of two people . . . period. Both of whom are sitting in this room,” Owen confessed, lifting his beer to his lips as he winked at Jules who looked amused by the flirtatious gesture.

Will chuckled as he elbowed his oldest friend lightly, “I'm pretty I should report you for that, but quite frankly, I think we all already knew that.”

Maria rolled her eyes from where she was curled up with Hansel in the other armchair. “I can promise you, that's old news, Elliot.”

The Family Russian grinned at the exasperated look on her best friend's face, before she turned to take in her other two sisters, “Pretty sure Nika's Slytherin too . . . so is Jim.”

Vika grinned up at her husband, the pretty blond teasing as she insisted, “So is Phil.”

“What!?” her husband blurted in surprise, staring down at his wife in shock.

“Resourceful much? Not to mention, you scared the baby agents when we got home from our honeymoon . . . and all you did was grin at them” she taunted, giggling as his fingers dove directly into her ribs causing a squeal of laughter.

Marina sniggered as she recalled the conversation she'd had with Grant Ward that morning. “She's not wrong. Of course, Vika’s Ravenclaw. Goddess of Administration and Organization, we worship at your feet.”

“Why?” Jules asked, eyes wide as she watched Vika smirk at her sister and shrug in acceptance of her role.

“Grimms hate paperwork,” was Vika's response, earning a chorus of “Uh-huh!” and “Oh yeah!” and “Fuck paperwork!” Snickering at the vehement protests stemming from the agents in the room, the Amazon joked, “Doing it for them is pretty much job security. Not to mention, the Colonel is . . . hapless on his own.”

“Excuse you!” Will protested, earning a giggle from his partner as she replied, “You lost your cell phone . . . and it was in your pocket.”

Will's mouth opened to protest, before it closed again. “I don't even have an argument for that.”

“Of course you don't. There isn't one,” Marina giggled, leaning upwards to press a warm kiss to his chin. Catching sight of the eldest of Hansel's son, sitting off to the side of his girlfriend, she frowned as she considered him for a moment. “I don't know if I would feel comfortable sorting you at this point, Doyle. I'm pretty sure Scarlett is a Ravenclaw, but I just haven't had enough interaction with you yet.”

Scarlett rolled her eyes as she shifted in her seat on his lap. “Doyle is a Gryffindor; a reckless idiot.”

“I love you too, Scar,” the tactical leader protested, eyebrows shooting upwards.

“You ran back into a RAGE infected area, because you were worried about me. At which point, you got blasted by a fire cannon and ended up in a hospital in France with second and third degree burns. After you woke up from your medicated coma, you had to be wrestled back into bed, because even though the medical center had been bombed and declared a total loss, you were convinced that I was still alive.”

“I wasn't wrong, was I?”

“Not the point. Second and third degree burns . . . therefore, you're an idiot.”

“I didn't even feel the third degree burns.”

“Of course you didn't! Your nerves were fried!” she scolded, the couple glaring at each other for a moment, before Marina sniggered, “Ah . . . young love.”

Scarlett's features practically burst into flame as she all but lunged to bury her face into her boyfriend's shirt, mortified that her boyfriend's newfound family had just witnessed their immature bickering. “Just kill me and put me out of my misery.”

“Why? That was adorable!” Marta laughed, smiling at her new friend. The two shared a lab at S.H.I.E.L.D., and while Casey was probably Marta's very best friend in the family to that point, Scarlett Levy was only a half a step behind her. “You both are clearly perfect for each other.”

“Sure, if by perfect you mean that half the time I want to beat the moron over the head with a medical chart . . . preferably his. It's thick enough, it would probably do some real damage.”

“Ahh . . . and now we're into the real reason for him being Gryffindor. All right, crimson and gold it is.”

Catherine Chandler was grinning at the crazy family she'd dropped into unexpectedly, leaning sideways into Vincent's body as the Russian scanned the family for anyone she'd missed. Landing on Vincent, she insisted bluntly, “Ravenclaw.”

Nodding in agreement of the assessment, he looked down at Cat and insisted, “Gryffindor.”

“I am not reckless,” the detective insisted in protest, eyes wide at the statement.

“Which explains why you've risked your badge more than once to protect me,” was the dry rejoinder, a single eyebrow cocking upwards.

“That's different.”

“How?”

“You needed to be protected. You were helping people; it wasn't fair that the rest of the world was hunting you just because they didn't understand you.”

“It was risky and unnecessary. I could have just disappeared again.”
“I don't want to imagine my world where you're not a part of it. Okay? Conversation over,” she insisted, leaning up to capture her boyfriend's lips in a fierce kiss, fingertips tracing gently over the scar on his cheek.

Sam grinned as he watched his best friend and S.H.I.E.L.D. partner literally melt under into his girlfriend's affection. Flinching as Marina pinched his ribs in silent admonition, he looked up at his mom. “I wasn't gonna say anything.”

Cocking an eyebrow, she drawled, “Uh-huh.”

Grinning, he cuddled back down into her lap and closed his eyes. Last night had sucked, there was no arguing that. But surrounded by family and other loved ones, he could honestly say . . . it was a good life.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) dobroye utro - good morning
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina Petrovka)
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Kenny/Aaron Grimm)
(R) Vdova - Widow (shortened form of Natasha's callsign, Chernaya Vdova or Black Widow)
(R) Zima - Winter (one of Marina's nicknames for Bucky Barnes, a shortened form of ZImniy Soldat or Winter Soldier)
(R)
Chapter Notes

There is another chapter following this, as this is just the pictures from the banner, with the captions more easily readable.

As I said, there is a chapter following. So stay tuned for that as well.

William Michael Grimm
Rarely concerned with his own self interests, neither is the Colonel above underhandedness or manipulation for gain. Capable of cruelty, viciousness and shrewdness, he is also driven, focused and terrifyingly intelligent. A natural and charismatic leader, Will Grimm embodies Slytherin's core principles of cunning, resourcefulness and ambition.

Marina Ivanovna Petrovka
There can be no argument that despite Marina Ivanovna Petrovka's terrifying reputation within SHIELD, she is also a Russian grandmother at her core. More concerned with the health, happiness and wellbeing of her loved ones, she is the definition of a denning mother bear. God help you if you mess with her boys, but neither does she seek out trouble. Endlessly loyal to those she considers her own, Marina embodies the Hufflepuff traits of patience, perseverance, and kindness to all who need it.

Samuel Wayne Braddock
Considering his occupation, this is no doubt a strange placement. However, Sam thrives when in the embrace of family and community. Honest to a fault, even if that honesty will hurt him in the end. Patience is the first requirement to being a good sniper and he is always eager to help, regardless of who it is asking.

Brian Joshua Grimm
A dedicated, if volatile, agent, Brian Grimm is tireless in his pursuit to atone for past crimes. Willing to manipulate and mislead in his professional life, he struggles daily with maintaining the reins of his vicious alterego in his personal one. Sneaky and resourceful, alongside his partner the Black Widow, SHIELD can always count on this talented undercover agent to bring back the goods... and a few heads besides.
vicious alterego in his personal one. Sneaky and resourceful, alongside his partner the Black Widow, SHIELD can always count on this talented undercover agent to bring back the goods . . . and a few heads besides.

Natalia "Natasha" Alianovna Romanova

As deadly - and beautiful - as the spider for which she is named, Natasha Romanoff has a reputation for perfection in the field. One of the Red Room's greatest achievements, she used her talents for sleight of hand and innuendo to promote Russian dominance until switching loyalties to a certain Hawk and SHIELD. Capable of manipulating even the God of Lies himself, she has no qualms with a good lie . . . as long as it is in the service of her loved ones. She embodies the Slytherin traits of cunning, manipulation, resourcefulness and trickery to SHIELD's ultimate advantage.

Jason Leonard Grimm
As accomplished a pianist as he is a hacker, it can be no surprise that Jason’s pace is in Ravenclaw. Always prepared with a witty joke or a crazy feat of engineering, the tech is a fount of eclectic knowledge. He best embodies the Ravenclaw traits of intelligence, eccentricity, curiosity and creativity.

Casey Beatrice Shraeger
Even without knowing her partner’s secrets - and knowing that he had secrets, Detective Casey Shraeger has been loyal to a fault. Tolerant and fair, she is dedicated to her counterpart and is deemed trustworthy enough to be gifted with the lives and secrets of those he loves. At her core, the redhead is a testament to fairness, honesty and loyalty.
Sweet and gentle Kenny was a shoe-in for Hufflepuff House. Not even his transformation to Aaron Cross changed that. Patient to a fault, Aaron is more concerned with the defense of those he loves than seeking out problems to solve. Down to earth and trustworthy, he is loyal to his family and loved ones above all else.

Marta Shearing
Intensely curious, the virologist has spent years devoted to unlocking the human genome. Capable of condescension and snobbishness with respect to her knowledge of viruses, she is nevertheless endlessly open-minded and eager to learn as much as she can.

Clinton Francis Grimm
Though it is impossible not to claim Clint as brave, reckless and more than a little thrill-seeking, these are not the Hawk's defining qualities. You will always know where you stand, as he will never have a qualm about telling you. Loyalty, hard work, patience and honesty; these traits are at the core of SHIELD's Eye in the Sky.

James Buchanan "Bucky" Barnes
In the Winter Soldier, there are arguments to be made for several different houses. Slytherin’s cunning and resourcefulness suit him, as does Hufflepuff’s loyalty and devotion to trustworthiness. However, at his core, James Buchanan Barnes is a Gryffindor, if an unlikely one. Bold, daring, loyal and a little arrogant, the former KGB assassin has come a long way from the emotionless automaton he was while still under Russian control.
A Tale of Two Fathers - Part One

Chapter Notes

I am so sorry it has been so long. I was on vacation, and trying to finish up a commission before Chicago next weekend. (Can you believe it!? CHICAGO!!! RENNER!!! NEXT WEEKEND!!!) Which reminds me, if you would like a commission of your own, this is the last call for it. After Sunday, I will not be taking any more, as I will be at work all next week before I leave Friday night for CHICAGO!! (I can't stop screaming it! I'm so excited!)

As to the commission, there is a new commission fic, within the UALP. It tells the story of how Marina and Will - and the family - reacted when they found out Marina was pregnant with the twins. I hope you read and enjoy.

Also, I am working with Caiti (and I say working, in that I'm just reading and she's the real writer) on a short ficlet entitled "Rise & Rise Again". There is a link at the bottom of the chapter. I hope you check it out and let us know what you think.

Just as a reminder, Italics without quotation marks are sign language. There are no translations this chapter, so no need to worry about that. ENJOY! And please, I adore kudos, but I love comments more. Let me know what you think! Thank you!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 191: A Tale of Two Fathers – Part One

Sam laughed as he all but shoved his adoptive mother out the door the next morning, his chortles mixing with his Dad's quieter chuckles as the older man stood out on the lawn. The battle of wills had been going on all morning, and the Colonel enjoyed watching the two of them bicker it out. “Ma! Seriously, I'll be fine! It's Dad's birthday! Go! Have lunch, go to a movie, sight-see.” Huffing, he rubbed sleepily at one eye as he promised, “I'm going to go back to bed. Otherwise, I'm never going to make it through tonight . . . especially if there's more alcohol involved.”

“There is always alcohol involved during a Brothers Grimm birthday party,” Marina sighed with a roll of her eyes. “You're sure?”

“Yes! Go!” he insisted, succeeding in his effort to push her into his dad's arms. “I'll see you guys later this afternoon. Text me when you're on your way home, though, so that I know to get up.”

Her eyes narrowed as she scanned him before giving in. “Fine! We're going. Get some rest.”

“Yes ma'am,” he teased, stepping forward to accept the hug and kiss she offered. “Bye, Dad!”
“Sleep well, Sammy . . . we'll see you later.”

Sam stood on the porch, watching his parents climb into their ancient Jeep and drive away. Once the vehicle passed out of sight, he walked back into the house, making sure to throw the lock on the door behind him before he jogged up the stairs toward his room. His shoes went flying as he flopped face-first onto the mattress and cuddled up to his pillows.

The rest of the family had scattered off to their own diversions, and currently Sam was alone in the house. The pub crawl planned for that night was going to kick his ass if he didn't get some rest though. Closing his eyes, he yawned wide and instantly dropped off.

Sam groaned as his phone began to beep with incoming text messages. One hand pulled his pillow over his head to block the sound and began to drift back into a light doze. Then a shrill sound screeched through the air, jolting him awake and sending his hand scrabbling for the iPhone to make it stop. He blinked hard to force himself to wake up. “Yeah?”

“Sammy? Are you still asleep?” Marina’s voice held affection, but a minor irritation played along the edges. "I sent you a text half an hour ago. Your dad and I are on our way home.” Her accent deepened a hairsbreadth as she huffed and muttered. “I can't believe I'm about to say this, but traffic in Toronto is almost worse than traffic in New York. What the hell?"

The blond swung his legs over the side of the bed, yawning as he stretched out his body. “How long?”

“Not too long, I think," she considered. "Barring traffic getting worse. So get up, get showered and get dressed. Everybody's meeting at the house in about an hour.”

“Yes ma'am,” he drawled, eyes drifting as he scratched briskly at his hair. “I'll get right on that.”

“Sammy . . . do NOT go back to sleep. Get up.”

“I'm up!” He stuck his tongue out at the phone before putting it back to his ear. “I'll see you guys soon.”

“Uh-huh,” she teased, before she hung up and the phone went dead in his hand.

He pushed himself to his feet and stumbled to en-suite bathroom before stripping down. Ten minutes later, he jogged down the stairs in bare feet, eyes on the kitchen. He opened the fridge door and grinned at the pitcher of iced cappuccino sitting on a shelf. “Best Ma ever,” he chuckled as he pulled it out. He poured himself a glass and took a long drink, reveling in the shot of caffeine that ripped through his system.

As his brain began firing on all cylinders, his stomach also decided to announce itself. He moved to make himself something to eat when someone knocked on the front door. A check of his watch and a couple of quick calculations in his head drew chortles as he realized it was probably his parents . . . and his ma had already misplaced her key. He put the pitcher back in the fridge – no reason to volunteer for a Marina Petrovka lecture – before jogging for the door. The chortles exploded into laughter even as he swung open the door, a teasing lilt in his voice, “Hey, Ma, lose your keys?”

The laughter froze in his throat as he registered the familiar figure standing erect on his front porch. General Gregory Braddock's face twisted into a fierce scowl. “Last I checked, your mother didn't have a key to this dump. And why would she want to?” he demanded. “This place is a joke.”

Regret over his lack of foresight in not checking the identity of his visitor swirled through Sam’s mind as he stared in horror at his biological father. Some part of him wanted to protest – both Will and Marina created exacting criteria when choosing the house for him – but the part of him trained to obey kept his mouth shut. Even still, he stammered as he sought an appropriate response to the General's accusation. The older man lost patience and snapped, “Move Samuel!”

“Yes, sir!” The blond jumped out of the way.

The officer stormed into the foyer and looked around as he moved into the living room. A collection of shoes piled by the shoe rack, giving evidence to a recent gathering of people. Other than that, though, Marina was a drill sergeant when it came to people picking up after themselves, so the house stayed fairly clean. Sam could see the scorn on his father’s features; the man disapproved of the minor clutter. “This is appalling. I expect better from you, Samuel.”

“Yes sir. Sorry sir.” Caution filled his voice. “No offense, sir . . . why are you here?”

“Finding out where the hell you have been! You were expected to report to the SRU months ago. Instead, I find out you've only been on the job for two and a half weeks!” One heartbeat passed and then another. Then General Braddock barked out a demand. “Answer me, soldier!”

Sam cringed away from the tone in a honed self-protective behavior. “I was recruited by . . .”

“Recruited by who!?” The interruption rang with fury.

“S.H.I.E.L.D., Sir; the Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement and Logistics Division.” Sam straightened as he spoke. “I’ve been in training since I left with Aunt Marta and Sergeant Grimm.”

“So the Army I've given my life to isn't good enough for you, but a government agency filled with quacks, freaks and fanatics is?! No way in hell! You will call your supervisor and turn in your resignation . . . right now, Samuel!”

Silence became palpable as the ultimatum faded. Then a low answer broke it.

“No.”

The single word seemed to startle Sam as much as – if not more than – it surprised the General. Blue eyes flashed wide in shock and he flinched, though his features set in defiance. “I'm twenty seven years old, Sir . . . I can make my own choices.”

“Did your new girlfriend tell you that?” Derision coated the older man’s tone.

“I don't have a new girlfriend . . . I haven't had a girlfriend since I enlisted.”

Wrath flooded the General’s face. “The SRU is only temporary . . . once you're over this, you'll reenlist . . . and you'll be back where you belong.” He pointed towards the cell phone sitting on the table. “Call whatever idiot recruited you and resign. Do it now . . . or so help me God.”

“So help you God, what!?” Sam demanded, his fists balling up as his body shifted into an aggressive stance. “I'm not gonna get 'over this', Sir. I shot and killed my best friend . . . and the only thing you cared about was the damn scandal.”

“You are my son . . . and regardless of what you think, I will not have you affiliated with anything other than what I say you can be affiliated with.”

“We may share DNA . . . but I am not your son,” Sam shot back, his fury overriding his instinctive obedience. “I am the son of Will Brandt and Marina Petrovka. As far as I'm concerned, you were a placeholder . . . and a shitty one at that.”
Recognition sparked in the younger man’s memory – he knew the look on his father's face as those words registered and instinct set him in motion as the punch flew. The fist clipped him, causing him to stagger, but he thanked whatever god might be listening that the reflexive movement had at least deflected the worst of the force. Sam used the General's own momentum against him by grabbing his wrist and yanking him off balance in order to gain enough time to bolt out the back door . . . and towards the expansive, forested backyard his Ma had insisted on.

Panic settled heavy in his gut as it wrapped a tight hand around his throat; that combined with the mild pain in his head caused him to stumble, disoriented and scared. The effort to right himself cost precious seconds and he paused for a moment before the tree line. He regretted it when something flat and heavy slammed into the ribs on his left side.

A cry echoed in the late afternoon sunlight as he went down.

Pain shot through his abdomen as he attempted to roll away, tearing a groan through clenched teeth. Eyes blurry with tears, he rolled onto his uninjured side and saw the General wielding a small spade Marina bought for the vegetable and herb garden she'd put on the side of the house.

Agony exploded through his head and Sam knew nothing more.

Marina spent the last twenty minutes of the drive dodging her lover's pinching, tickling fingers. She barely waited for the car to slow before she bolted from the Jeep, laughter trailing after her as she tried to outrun Will's affectionate retribution. She knew the rest of the family pulled in behind them, but her awareness halted at the edge of her mind as she used a good majority of her focus getting to the house ahead of her lover as he grabbed hold of the crossbar and swung feet first from the Jeep. He hit the ground running, racing after her. She squealed and dashed for the porch . . . only to freeze at the sight of her son's front door. The door hung ajar, a noticeable gap opening to the inside. Every bit of her training went on high alert.

More to the point – every maternal instinct compressed into her compact frame began screaming as she stared at that opening.

Will, as attuned to her moods as he was to his own, knew something had spooked her. His playful face faded into an intense focus. “Samaya malen'kaya?”

“The door.” She reached back for the gun she holstered at her back. “It's open.”

Aaron frowned as he all but shoved Marta behind him, his other hand retrieving his own weapon. “Sam wouldn't have left the door open,” he agreed, eyes beginning to scan the nearby street. “It's a quiet neighborhood . . . but he's still pretty skittish around people he doesn't know.”

Will's eyes turned dark gray as his hands began to flash through a series of silent commands in sign language. Clint . . . Bucky . . . on the roof. Aaron . . . stay here with Marta . . . keep her safe. Marina . . . you, your sisters and Vincent are with me. Brian . . . set up a perimeter around the house. No one in or out until we locate Sam.

Brisk nods answered him as everyone moved off on their given tasks. Aaron herded Marta back towards their rental car. “Aaron!” Marta’s vehement protest came out in a sharp, if quiet hiss. “He's my nephew!”

“Aaron . . . stop.” He pulled the car door open. “I know you're worried, but Will and Marina are on a knife's edge here. Let's not add to their stress levels, okay?” he begged, blue eyes earnest as he gripped her arm just above the elbow.
Her lips thinned, compressing in her concern, but she gave a reluctant nod before dropping into the passenger seat. Aaron closed the door and remained vigilant, careful to continue watching for any movement in the neighborhood even as he guarded his petulant girlfriend.

Marina glanced at her partner, knowing he could see the terror she struggled to push aside. He reached out his free hand and gave the back of her neck a warm squeeze. “Let's clear the house,” he ordered, every inch The Colonel as his eyes flickered from her to the others. “Ladies . . . top floor. Vincent, you and I downstairs.”

“Copy that.”

Marina pushed the door open, each movement slow and soundless. The four Murderesses formed a seamless unit as they crossed the foyer and moved upwards to check the second floor. Will directed Vincent towards the back of the house before he turned his attention to the three front rooms.

“Clear!” Vika's voice came from upstairs.

Marina confirmed, calling out, “Misha . . . he's not here!”

Vincent’s shout rang through the house. “The back door's open!” The whole house seemed to hold its breath before a strangled growl ripped from his throat. “Sam was scared . . . I can smell it.”

Will stalked into the kitchen and frowned at the sight of the back door nearly torn off its hinges. “He's not in the front rooms,” he informed the former soldier as he reached out to catch Marina when she dove into his embrace. His woman vibrated with maternal terror and a matching need for vicious action. “Vincent . . . track him.”

Vincent took a deep breath and let his eyes go gold, his senses reaching outwards. Parsing Sam's scent from the others took a moment, but he began moving towards the back door. He paused at the door frame, leaning close to inhale more of the scents. His brows furrowed. “There was someone here. I don't recognize the scent.”

“Would you be able to find it again?”

“Not a problem.” A dark light glittered in his eyes. “It's a pretty distinctive cologne.” His attention turned towards the backyard. His enhanced senses took in the surroundings for a moment. The backyard was one of the major draws to the house; large and secluded, it offered Sam a safe enclosure while at the same time keeping the blond from feeling trapped. Vincent could smell the family’s other two snipers on the roof over his head. No doubt Clint was using his own augmented sight to search for the kid.

At this moment, in this emergency, Vincent decided the yard was too expansive; the trees offered seclusion all right . . . and too many places for someone to remain unseen. He closed his eyes, forcing himself to ignore the sounds and smells of the family behind him as he pushed his senses outwards. Sam's scent seemed soaked in panic, and Vincent's beast gave a silent roar as he took it in. As he counted Sam as both family and friend, the fear waved like a red cape before a bull. The doctor held onto his control as he turned his attention to the strange scent, prowling after its lingering remains towards the tree line.

There! A sound! The hitching sound of pained breathing all but shrieked to his stretched out sense and Vincent rushed towards it, almost a blur in his enhanced speed. Rage, horror, and fear strangled him as he hit his knees next to Sam's broken, battered body, the blond face down in the dirt and unmoving. The doctor rotated back to face the house and bellowed, “Get Marta and Scarlett! Marina, I need you!”
The Russian broke free from her partner’s hold and bolted towards him with Will only a step or two behind her. Mother and father reached their son as Natasha raced away from her sisters to get the family’s other doctors.

Marina’s cry was strangled as she screamed, “Sammy!”

She dropped to her knees beside her son, reaching out to thread her fingers through the hair at the very top of his head, careful not to jostle him or touch the bloodied hair at the back. Some part of her recognized Vincent going through a rapid triage and even managed to know the instant Marta and Scarlett joined them. The rest of her though, the greater part of her could only focus on her boy and the guilt threatening to choke her. “Oh my baby . . . I'm so sorry . . . I never should have left,” she keened, rocking on her knees as she fought with the maternal urge to gather him into her arms and never let him go.

Vincent's firm grip on her wrist that drew watery hot chocolate eyes back to the doctor. “Marina, I need you to focus. Okay? Sam trusts you, he knows you're going to do whatever it takes to keep him safe. I need you to be his focus when he wakes up. It looks like whatever knocked him out landed a glancing blow. His skull is intact, but I'd bet my certifications that he's got a concussion and a hell of a headache. He's going to be groggy and disoriented when he wakes up, and I need you to be his touchstone, okay?” Giving her a light shake, he demanded, “Can you do that?”

A firm nod answered his question. Marina brushed at the tears and forced her attention onto keeping Sam's head still as the Doctors Three began working on the mangled ribcage near Marta's knees.

“These ribs are a mess,” Scarlett hissed, delicate fingers probing despite Sam's muted groans and unconscious attempts at escape. “What the hell did he get hit with?”

Will spoke up from just within the tree line where he glared at the gardening shovel in his hands. His outer shirt had been conscripted to avoid getting his fingerprints on the evidence. “I'm pretty sure you don't want to know.” He pulled out his phone and pressed the speed dial. “Bri . . . there are some evidence bags under the passenger seat in the Jeep. Bring me the largest one you can find. Then I need for you to arrange for a courier to pick something up to take back to S.H.I.E.L.D. I want fingerprints lifted off this yesterday.” He paused, listening to his brother. “Good idea. Have the family detectives canvas the neighborhood to see if anybody saw anything. But let them do it – they’ve got the training. I need you to get that bag.” His jaw clenched. “I need you back here. We're gonna need as many hands as we can get once the docs are done, to carry Sam back into the house.”

Chapter End Notes

Please comment! I love to hear what you think! And check out "In The Family Way" and "Rise & Rise Again" on the Cahill Project page. Let us know what you think there too. Thank you all! You are so amazing! Only 2 weeks until this series' third anniversary! Can you believe it!?
Hey all! Not quite as prompt as they have been, but not bad either.

Translations at the bottom, as always.

Let me know what you think! Your comments make my day and I love to read them, even if they're only a word or two. You're all amazing and I can't tell you how much your continued support means to me.

Also, I'm wondering if anyone has any ideas for a new title for this fic? The UALP is my baby, but it doesn't really fit on a book cover, does it? I'll be putting together a new banner for Jeremy to sign this upcoming Sunday, and I could use all of your help in deciding what the best title would be. Shoot me a comment and let me know! Thank you again for all of your continued awesome!!!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 192: A Tale of Two Fathers, Part Two

Will Grimm loved his family. Regardless of popular opinion, that was an inarguable fact.

Granted, he was not unaware of the things that people said about him. More to the point, he was conscious of the popular theory that he was cold and unfeeling, incapable of basic human emotion. His personal favorite was the rumor that claimed he had ice in his veins and iron for a heart. Sometimes, he even believed them.

Then he'd see the way that Marina smiled at him, and the way she glowed when he loved her. The joy in his brothers' faces when he put work away and played with them like he did when they were all still kids. Most of all, the quiet pride and fierce love from his son – HIS Sammy. These were all the arguments he'd ever needed; these were his proof to the contrary.

Granted, he prided himself on his calm in a crisis. His cool head in spite of everything. And he was well aware that it was these two traits above all that earned him his reputation. But all of that was gone now.

He could feel the rage burning in his heart, searing through any attempt he would have ordinarily made towards rationality and intelligent action. His son lay in the dirt, left for dead by whomever had done this to him. And yes, even as the Colonel put together vicious plans for gleeful revenge . . . a large part of him knew that they would never come to full fruition.

All of Sam's injuries were purposefully inflicted. There was no damage to his knuckles or, even more troubling, any defensive wounds of any kind. He had neither fought back or attempted to protect himself physically. The most he had been able to do was run, which had lead him to his resting place now. This alone spoke of years of abuse . . . a childhood spent conditioned to accept it and trained to stand still for it.

Since there was only one person capable of bringing that mentality back, Will was very certain already who had been Sam's attacker. Gritting his teeth, he closed his hand hard around the shovel and growled. The sudden tension in Vincent's back and shoulders was a clear indication that the former soldier at least had heard the sound. Fortunately, Marina was absorbed in their son; he would be safe from her rage and need for revenge for the moment. He was no shy about the fact that it would be a welcome reprieve.

At least until they could speak to Sam. Then all hell would break loose.

Brian arrived then, evidence bag in hand. “Here,” he snapped, jaw tightening as he resolutely looked away from where Sam laid. “How's the kid?”

Taking a deep breath, he shook his head. “It's not good.”

Vincent grunted angrily. “Understatement. I won't know how bad it is until he wakes up though.”

“Guess,” was the sharp suggestion from the Colonel.

“Definitely has a concussion. Its severity and what the complications of that are . . . I can't tell you until he wakes up. Broken ribs on the left side; fortunately none of them seem to be endangering his lungs for the moment.” Running a hand back through his hair, he muttered angrily, “Bruised to hell and he is definitely going to be hurting when he wakes up.”

“Prognosis?”

“He'll heal . . . but it's going to be a long and painful process.”

“Anything else you're worried could become a problem?”

“I could give you dissertations,” Vincent snarked with a huff and a roll of his eyes, “but I don't want to get too in depth.” Breathing deeply through his nose, he muttered, “I would kill for an IV, a portable X-Ray machine and a fully stocked pharmacy right now.”

“Don't worry about the pharmacy; anything you're going to need, I can promise you are in our medkit. Including everything you'd need to administer an IV. As for the X-Ray machine . . . I think I can do something about that too,” Will mused, turning to face his younger brother. “Brian, call Dr. Wong back at S.H.I.E.L.D.; remind her she owes me a dozen favors. And if she gets me everything we need to look after Sam here at home, we'll be square.”

“Dr. Wong? Patricia Wong?! S.H.I.E.L.D.'s head of Medical?” Scarlett blurted in shock. The Asian woman was a ballbuster; each of the Doctors Three tread carefully around her if for no other reason than she was terrifying.

“Yes, Patricia Wong. Get a list together, Vincent. Patty's been desperate to get out from under that debt; she'll send us anything you say we need.”
The Doctors Three stared in shock and awe for a long moment before the emergency room doctor nodded in agreement. Standing, the former soldier went with Brian to the house, the bagged shovel clutched in Brian's hands. Moving to kneel beside his partner and his son, the Colonel smoothed tender fingers along the curl of the younger man's ear. “We're here, Sammy . . . stay with us,” he begged softly, his free arm coming up around Marina and drawing her in close to him.

Scarlett grimaced as she considered the young man. No one had felt comfortable moving him too much, and at present Sam remained sprawled face down in the dirt. “I'd kill for a backboard . . . but I am not willing to let him lay outside in the dirt while we wait for one to get here.”

Marina frowned at the statement, offering cautiously, “The workmen left some hardwood siding on the side of the house? They were using it for the cabinets. It's not a backboard, but it's good, sturdy oak. A long enough piece could work, yeah?”

“Hell yes, it could!” she cheered, bolting upwards to her feet. “Where?!”

“It's on the side of the house, leaning up against the fence.”

Whooping happily, the younger woman grabbed Doyle's wrist and gleefully dragged him away.
Meanwhile, Marta had never taken her attention from her nephew’s splayed frame. Smoothing a hand down her nephew's calf now, there were tears sparkling in her eyes as she breathed, 'The General did this . . .”

It was not a question and Will cursed luridly in every language he knew. Marta was well acquainted with the abusive relationship between her nephew and brother-in-law. Maybe not to the full extent –
Sam was fiercely protective of his aunt . . . he would have tried to protect her from the worst of it – but at this point, she was smart enough to extrapolate from there. He should have realized that the virologist would figure it out for herself.

He could feel the way that Aaron stiffened furiously behind him. However, he was more concerned with his partner. His Russian's whole frame locked up at the announcement, rage all but vibrating through her veins. “What did you say?” she hissed vehemently, her eyes sparking with lightening and voice brimming with precocious vengeance.

Marta didn't seem to hear the question. “I knew their relationship was bad, but . . . I never dreamed . . .
.” Here, her eyes flashed wide and her hands flew to cover her mouth as she gasped in horror. “Di . . .
. Diana had to have known.” Turning pale and slightly green, she sank backwards against her boyfriend as Aaron moved to take her into his arms. Ducking her head into his arm, she clutched his forearm as she moaned, “She lied to me . . . Di looked right into my eyes and she bald-faced lied to me.”

“This was not your fault, Marta. You couldn't have known,” Aaron promised, holding her as tightly as he could to try to keep her from shaking herself apart.

“But if I had, I could have warned you . . . told you what to expect from Gregory.”

“Sam didn't want you to know. He tried to protect you from it,” Will insisted, smiling at the scientist kindly. “You are not to blame, and he wouldn't want you to.”

Biting down on her lower lip, she continued, “Suddenly, so much makes sense. He used to claim he was a such a klutz when we were kids, and he was always staying home, ill with something. But then he joined the military, and all of the clumsiness, the sicknesses, everything was just gone. Why didn't I see it? I could have done something . . . I could have taken him with me when I left.”
“Gregory Braddock is regrettably a very public figure. Any accusation of abuse would have dragged Sam though the same mud as his father,” Marina announced then, hot chocolate eyes still boiling but demeanor once again under her control. “I know Sammy well enough to know that he wouldn't have wanted that. It was easier to just go along and get out as soon as he could.”

“And instead, the General trapped him into a different, more brutal kind of control,” Marta hissed viciously. “I'm going to kill him.”

“No, you're not,” the Colonel insisted firmly, ignoring the betrayed look the younger couple was giving him at that moment. “No one is going to kill anyone. We're going to take care of Sam; he is our first and only priority. We're going to let the family detectives compile the evidence and build a solid case. And then we're going to hit the General exactly where it will hurt him most.”

“And how are we going to do that?” Aaron asked calmly, resigned to the course of action if for no other reason than Will looked even more livid than he had when Aaron had been Kenny . . . and a carnie had called him a worthless waste of space.

“We're going to take his control of Sammy away . . . for good. He will never be able to hurt my son again. And if he ever does . . . well, let's just say that Marina and her sisters are not called the 'Merry Murderesses' for no reason.”

Purring up at her lover, the Russian laughed, “I like the way you think, moy lyubimov.”

Will pressed a warm kiss to her temple as he teased, “I thought you might.”

*****************************

The headache pounding relentlessly against the back of Sam's eyelids was the first thing the young man noticed upon waking up. The second was the strong, familiar male voice reading to him softly in Russian.

Relaxing instantly at the knowledge that his dad was close by, Sam shifted towards the voice without thinking and instantly regretted it. Pain ricocheted up his left side as his ribs screamed their protest, clearly making themselves known. He cried out in agony, trying to curl in on himself to cradle the pain even as he knew that it was only making it worse. “Dad!” he sobbed, recognizing the calluses on the hands that gripped his arms above the elbows. Trusting those hands, he whimpered as he was eased forcibly flat once again.

“I'm here, Sammichka,” the Colonel soothed fondly, one hand coming up to fold over the sniper's forehead, the touch firm and grounding. “It's all right . . . . I'm here. Sniper breathing, Sammy. In . . . two . . . three . . . four. Out . . . two . . . three . . . four. That's good . . . again. You're all right, just calm down.”

Blue eyes squeezed closed tightly, the kid all but leaning into the Colonel's gentle hold. “Sir . . . I'm sorry,” he choked out, the old training well up through the confusion and forcing the words out. “… I'm so useless . . . I didn't even check . . . I just assumed it was you and Ma . . . I'm so sorry, sir . . . please don't throw me out . . . I'll do better, I promise.”

Some part of Will was relieved that Sam's eyes were closed, so that his son couldn't see the way his jaw tightened at the soft begging. Finally, as Sam began to gasp for air through the sobbing please, the boy's dad jolted himself free of his vengeful thoughts. Cupping the kid's face in one palm, he ordered softly, “First of all, you don't call me 'sir', Sammy, I work for a living . . . you call me Dad. Second of all, you are my son . . . I will never, ever let you go.”
Pausing, quicksilver eyes took in the young man's awed features, earning a fond grin. “Family doesn't abandon family. And you're a Grimm, through love and affection, even if not through name or blood. You are my son and I love you . . . forever. That is never going to change, no matter what happens. Got it?”

Choking down air, Sam agreed breathlessly, “Copy that.”

“Good. Deep breaths, Sammy . . . as deep as you can manage. Just go slow. We've got all the time in the world.”

Nodding, blue eyes slipped closed as the younger agent forced all of his concentration on breathing. Finally feeling the pain come under control, Sam focused again on his adoptive father. “How bad is it?”

“Well, there won't be any epic paintball battles with any baby agents for awhile,” Will joked, smoothing a hand back through sunny blond hair.

“Damn; that's the best part of being an Agent of S.H.I.E.L.D.,” Sam laughed lightly, earning a heartfelt giggle and a grin from the woman lingering in the doorway.

“I'm sure your Uncle Brian and Aunt Natasha would have a thing or two to say about that,” the Family Russian teased, coming into the room and perching on the bed next to her son. “Hello baby. I'm sorry I wasn't here when you woke up. I was getting some rest; Vincent and Will double whammied me,” she drawled, with a fond glare at her lover, who – as was typical – showed no remorse for the underhanded action. Turning her attention back to her boy, she reached up to pet through his hair, asking, “How do you feel?”

“Like hell,” he replied, leaning noticeably into the hand she had threaded through his hair.

“I'll bet,” she chuckled, bending to press an adoring kiss to his forehead. “Just rest. I'll go get Vincent. He wanted to take a better look at you once you woke up.”

Nodding slowly, Sam watched his Ma go up on tiptoes to kiss her lover sweetly before leaving the room at a near run. Discomfort shivered up his arms and he shifted, grimacing hard as he looked up at the other man. “Dad . . . what happened?”

“Frankly, Sammy, I was hoping you could tell me.” Chucking his chin tenderly at the blank and panicked look that appeared as Sam tried to recall what happened, Will promised, “We'll figure it out, Sammy. Don't worry about it now, okay?”

The former soldier strode into the room then, a small grin on his face at the sight of Sam awake. “Well well well . . . look who decided to rejoin the living. How you feeling, Sam?”

Twisting his features in answer, Sam grunted lightly, “Ugh.”

“That good, huh?”

“Better even,” he snarked, bumping fists with the other man. “Vincent . . . thanks. That's the second time you've saved my ass.”

Smirking, Vincent promised jovially, “I'm not keeping track, I promise.”

“Good to hear,” Sam chuckled, grimacing as he shifted once again in search of a more comfortable position. “Ah fuck . . . I hate broken ribs.”
Rolling his eyes, Vincent set his bag on the bed. “I don’t know anyone who doesn’t. We’ll take this as slow as we need to, okay? Keep me apprised of your pain levels and we’ll take a break if you need to. Deal?”

Nodding, Sam allowed his friend to get him out of the loose button down someone had dressed him in while he’d been unconscious. Smoothing light fingers over the vivid bruising on the blond's chest, Vincent teased, “You light up like a Christmas tree when you bruise, you know that?”

This statement earned a chuckle and a grin, Sam shrugging carefully in reply. Cocking an eyebrow at the action, the dark-haired doctor asked, “What's your pain at right now?”

Sam's eyebrows furrowed as he considered for a moment, offering cautiously, “Six . . . maybe a seven?”

“All right. Tell me if that changes. This isn't going to be comfortable for anyone.” Setting the stethoscope in his ears, Vincent announced, “Here we go.”

It was a grueling process from start to finish. They had to pause several times when the agent's pain spiked, giving him time for it to settle back into semi-manageable levels once again. The worst part of the exam came when Vincent shone a small penlight into Sam's eyes to check his pupils. Stabbing pains rebounded through his skull, causing the agent to cry out sharply and roll away, promptly sick into the basin Marina had thoughtfully placed by the bed. The vomiting jarred Sam's ribs hard and by the time the fit was over, the blond was in agonized tears. No one had the heart to insist that the doctor finish the exam. “All right . . . I think we should take a break. I wanna get some pain medications into you to take the edge off, then you should probably get some more sleep, Sam.”

“No,” the blond moaned, rolling his head to look towards where Will and Marina were perched together on the other side of his bed. “It's Dad's birthday.”

The Colonel smiled fondly, squeezing his leg gently. “It hasn't been my birthday for hours, Sammy.”

Those eyes went wide in horror as he breathed, “Did I sleep through your birthday?”

“It's just a day, malysh,” Marina promised, tightening her grip on the hand she held. “You were more important.” Cocking an eyebrow, she reminded him lightly, “You know how we feel about putting ourselves before our priorities.”

“But . . . the party!”

“We'll reschedule,” Will chuckled with a grin and a wink. “This family rarely needs a reason to go out and get very drunk. The important thing is that you are okay. “Dong le ma?”

Leaning back into his pillows, those eerie blue eyes took in the warmth and fondness on his parents' faces. There was no lie in their faces, no guile or deceit in their eyes at all. They meant every word of what they were saying. Sighing, he nodded in agreement as he replied, “Copy that.”

“Good.” Pausing at the glum look on his face, Will squeezed his leg again. “Let Vincent get some medication into you. You'll feel infinitely more comfortable.” Smiling, he promised, “If you're feeling up to it, I can open my presents in here after that, okay?”

Sam grinned brightly as he agreed. “Awesome!”

Chapter End Notes
Translations:

(R) moy lyubimov - my love
(R) Sammichka - little Sam (it's a Russian pet name based on Sam's nickname 'Sammy')
(R) malysh - kiddo
(C) Dong le ma? - do you understand? (A quote from Firefly/Serenity, which happens to be Will & Marina's favorite tv show and movie)
Hey guys! So Chicago was AWESOME!! Jeremy was so sweet and I can't tell you how much I enjoyed the trip. He FLIRTED WITH MY DAUGHTER!!! And they talked about her doll, and he told her about Ava and it was AWESOME!!

Anyway, I feel the need to make a comment about something I found last week, which really hurt my feelings. I found some really nasty and hurtful reviews left on jeremyleerenner.com about the UALP. And I understand that not everyone is going to like the story; that's a tall order to ask. But if there's something you don't like, please. Let me know. Let me at least attempt to make my story better in your eyes. Don't just post really nasty reviews in an offsite blog. I found them by accident and it practically killed the inspiration seeing Jeremy had caused. So again, your reviews mean everything to me, even the bad ones. So let me hear what you have to say.

And to those who posted such kind things, you reminded my why I write. So this chapter is definitely dedicated to you and your awesome.

There aren't many translations today, but they are at the end, as always. Enjoy!
Chapter 193: Breakdown

Over the course of her long life, Marina Ivanovna Petrovka had been many things.

Once upon a time she had been an adoring daughter, before a single bloody night had transformed her into an angry orphan. At the Akademiya, she had been an excellent student, a star trainee and a fearless protégé. The birth of the Cahills – and her subsequent defection – had taken her from trusted patriot to reviled traitor and hunted fugitive.

That same event, however, had also gifted her with still more roles to play. She was a devoted sister, loving mother and – despite her persistent protests to the contrary – an unrepentant mother hen. She was best friend, confidant and secret-keeper of the Left Hand of God, and sister-in-law to the unflappable Phil Coulson. On top of that, she still snickered at the knowledge that her close friendship with Nick Fury gave some people nightmares.

Professionally, she was an accomplished assassin, talented spy and dedicated handler. She had cultivated connections and loyalties with some of the best and brightest of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s agent pool; her own son Sam Braddock, Bobbi Morse, Grant Ward, Antoine Triplett and Sharon Carter, among others. Of course, then there were the self-proclaimed “Marina’s Misfits” – Vincent Keller, Owen Elliot, Daryl Dixon, Bucky Barnes, her son and the rest of her beloved Grimms – who had each taken up their own places in her heart.

Shifting slightly on the bed beside her son, she frowned fiercely at Daryl's continued absence from the family gathering. Objectively, Marina could understand his need to be in Georgia for the time being. The job of cleaning up was a monumental one, which would feasibly give him time to figure out where he fit in the lives of Carol and Sophia Peletier. (Sandra Bullock had said it best in the movie “Speed”, when she'd told Keanu Reeves that relationships formed under extreme circumstances never worked out.) Even still, his absence was keenly felt and, what's more, the Russian knew that she was not the only one who prayed for a speedy return to the family's fold.

The sound of laughter then drew her attention back to the present and she smiled to see her reason for living, joking around with his best friend. Of all the roles she'd claimed or been assigned, both past and present, this one was her pride and joy. Her place as lover, partner, sanity and peace for Colonel William Michael Grimm would always be her greatest achievement.

Marina had been witness to every moment of his life, from the time he was 12 and there were still things she didn't know about him . . . things he kept from her so as to keep her safe, keep her happy. She had salved his wounds – mental, emotional and physical – when he needed her to, and just been there when he hadn't. He had given her the highest of highs and lifted her from her lowest of lows. He had taken her to breathless peaks with only a look and tormented her for hours with barely a touch. Her Misha was everything and there was nothing she wouldn't do for him. He would never believe her, but it was her Colonel who had brought her to where she was now.

Which was probably why it broke her heart to see Misha floundering so close to the edge of sanity. Being here with the family, surrounded by their love and laughter and adoration, was a welcome balm. However, it was a temporary fix . . . a band-aid at best. When everyone had gone to bed, and the cacophony had died down into snores, the festering wounds Ross had left so many decades ago would reopen and the same old fears would resurface. The loss of his confidence was tearing him – and her – apart. And she was at a total loss as to how to fix it.

Owen's joking laughter broke into her thoughts as he teased his longtime best friend, “Pretty sure I was thinking of the Boss-Lady when I bought you that, Will. Sorry.”

Will chuckled at the plastic ball-and-chain nestled in the bottom of the box in his lap. “So, does this make me the ball and chain? Or Marina?” he asked dryly, earning an arched eyebrow from his partner in question. Cocking the box towards her, he watched her eyes fly wide in startled surprise, before she smirked and rolled her eyes.

There was a pause as the Cleaner considered the question, before announcing, “Yes.”

Jason snorted hard as Marina drawled, “You know, Lucky, I just remembered this assignment I needed cleaned up. I think you'll be perfect. I hear Cameroon is nice this time of year.”

“Shut up, Boss.”

The Colonel's smirk faded as Brian tossed him his gift next. The cylindrical package clinked faintly and the elder brother sighed heavily. “Why are there handcuffs in here?”

Brian smirked at his brother as he asked innocently, “How do you know they're handcuffs?”
Another groan was accompanied by a round of laughter from the younger brothers, before the older tore into the top of the package. Reaching in, he pulled out a rolled up sheet of paper first. Cocking an eyebrow, he read solemnly, “Congratulations on your enrollment into the Beer of the Month Club.” Looking up at the undercover agent, he snarked, “I'm really more of a hard liquor guy, Bri.”

“Snob,” was the quipped rejoinder, “It wouldn't kill you to kick back with a good beer like the rest of us grunts. And this way, you'll get four a month and maybe find one that you like. And if all else fails, I'm sure the rest of us uncultured swine can take them off your hands.”

Rolling his eyes, Will reached back into the tube and rooted around for a second, before withdrawing his hand once again. Sure enough, hooked over one finger by the chain, was a pair of brilliantly hot pink handcuffs. They rattled musically as Will jostled the steel set, asking, “Is there a reason they're pink?”

“Why, big brother, didn't you know that everyone here thinks you're super pretty in pink?” Brian taunted, joining the rest of the brothers in their ritual teasing and taunting.

At that point, Marina was 1000 percent sure that she was the only one who saw it. The desperate look buried deeply in her lover's eyes. It was that desperation, that need, that switched on the light-bulb in the Russian's brain. Lack of control; Will felt as though he had lost control, professionally and personally . . . quite possibly mentally and emotionally too, though he would never confess to it. The plans came together in a flash; Brian didn't know it, but those handcuffs were gonna be a godsend.

Regardless of the accepted dynamics of power in their bed play, Marina was always the one in control despite her submissive role. Will called the shots in bed because she allowed him to. Her safe-word was final and finite. There had never been an argument, question or pause when she'd used it. The need for it was rare; to date she'd only safe-worded out three times, but each time, all play had instantly stopped.

Her Misha was feeling lost without his customary control. As unorthodox as it may be, all at once, the Russian knew exactly what she needed to do to give it back to him.

The hot pink was a little much though. Plain black would have been just as fun . . . and not nearly as ugly.

Relaxing against the headboard as her resolve swept over her, Marina smiled as Sam scooted down the bed a little, cuddling into her ribs with a sleepy purr. Chuckling, she smoothed her fingers through his hair as she teased fondly, “You should probably open Sammy's gift next, Misha . . . I think we're losing him.”

Her son's protest was instantaneous. “I'm not . . .” here, he was interrupted by a wide yawn, “. . . tired.”

“Uh-huh,” Will agreed with a roll his eyes. “We've only got a few left anyway; Aaron, Clint, Jason and Sammy's.”

The sniper grinned, blue eyes sparkling cheerfully. “Open the Uncles' next. I know what I got you.”

“Me next!” Clint insisted, bouncing in his seat as he tossed a box to his brother. Laughing at the typically exuberance, Will opened the present and stared at the coffee carafe inside . . . the bottomless coffee carafe. “What. The. Hell?”

“You're always talking about the need for a bottomless coffee pot. So I got you one! Oooh . . . and a Cocking an eyebrow at the jaunty red button, labeled “ACME”, the Colonel sighed. “Do I want to know?”

“You know how in cartoons, there's a giant ACME button that opens a trapdoor? Well, now you have your very own ACME button to push when stupid people piss you off. You can pretend you're sending them to an alternate dimension or something.”

Honest to God giggles ripped from Will then, as he reminded the youngest brother, “I haven't watched cartoons since you were a kid, Clint, but thank you. The thought is appreciated.” Turning to Jason, the older brother cocked an eyebrow and asked, “Can you make an actual trapdoor for this button to operate?”

“Fuck yes! Just give me the word. I'll figure something out.”

Aaron's gift was a small one, revealing a pair of plain looking glasses. Cocking an eyebrow, Will snarked, “Last I checked, I wasn't so old as to need these yet.”

“Just put them on,” the bomb technician laughed, watching with a grin as Will slipped the frames onto his nose. “Now, tap the right corner where the arm connects to the front.”

Doing as told, Will blinked in shock as suddenly the entire room was reduced to skeletons and infrastructure. “Holy shit!”

“You like them?”

“Hell yeah!” Tapping them off again, Will joked, “Now I can catch Clint when he's sneaking around in my air vents.”

“Kenny! No fair! You gave him X-Ray glasses!? Why the hell would you do that!?“ Pouting, the archer slumped against his boyfriend as he grumbled, “All of my best pranks happen after I've been crawling around in the air vents.”

“Stay out of my vents, Clint, and I promise not to tell anyone else you're climbing around in theirs.”

“Promise?”

Marina straightened, “Excuse you! What about me?”

“As long as you're not in mine or Marina's vents then. I promise,”

“So that leaves Uncle Jason,” Sam laughed, yawning widely again. “This oughtta be good.”

“Oh ye of little faith, nephew. Just sit back and watch the master work,” the communications officer teased, reaching under his chair for a long flat box.

Accepting it, Will pulled of the wrapping paper cautiously, clearly expecting something to explode or worse. Once the box was open, he stared in shock. The aghast and horrified look on her partner's face should have been her first clue that she didn't want to know. However, Marina felt compelled to ask anyway. “What is it?”

Will's sigh was a curious mixture of resigned and amused as he lifted what appeared to be a book out of the box. “Jason put together a wedding album for us . . .” The Russian blinked, the obvious reminder that they had never married poised on her lips, as the Colonel continued, “Complete with terrible Russian wedding photos.”

Turning the cover to face her, he watched as his partner choked at the sight of the photo on the cover. The four younger Grimms were sprawled around a bar, clearly drunk, with Will looking exasperated, while Marina – convincingly attired in a wedding dress and sparkling tiara – floated overhead in a bubble, carrying a magic wand in one hand and chugging vodka with the other. “Oh Jay. You shouldn't have,” she deadpanned.

Jason grinned brightly, “You're welcome.”

The Colonel laughed out loud as he flipped through the pictures, each one more horrific than the last. “No, really Jay. You shouldn't have.” Cocking his head at a depiction of a giant-sized “Will” holding a winged “Marina” in the palms of his hands, he asked, “Do I even want to know how you managed to pull these off? I can't remember any instance in which Marina has ever worn a wedding gown, let alone been photographed in so many different ones.”

“You really don't. Let's just say, this was a lot of fun. Brian, Aaron and Clint all helped though; they picked out their favorite poses for the pictures.”

“Of course they did,” Marina drawled with a resigned sigh. “Oh boys . . . what are we going to do with you?”

Unable to help himself, Will was still flipping through the pictures. There was one of Marina literally sparkling, as each of the Grimms held a corner of her skirt upwards so it made a halo around her. And another of a giant-sized Marina holding him by two fingers over the edge of a bridge. It was the last picture that sent him into another peal of uncharacteristic giggles though. “Holy shit . . . Jay, she's going to kill you.”

“I know. And I don't care . . . it was too good to pass up.”

“What!?”

“It's an ICBM,” Will replied, turning the book so she could see, “An Intercontinental Ballistic Marina.”

On the page was what should have been a picture of a rocket taking off. Instead, a wedding gown clad Marina was where the rocket should have been, smoke and flame trailing from below her dress. Narrowing her eyes at the picture, she resisted the urge to grin at both her lover's and her son’s delighted giggles. “Just you wait, Jason . . . my revenge will be ice cold and deliciously sweet.”

“Bring it on, sestra. It will be worth it.”

Of course, then Brian had to go and ruin it, by teasing, “So, basically you're revenge is going to be ice cream? I don't see how that's going to be effective.”

Rolling her eyes, she groaned, “Bri!” which only set the two off again.

It took a while for both Will and Sam to get their hilarity under control, after which the Colonel reached for the last box in the pile. Frowning lightly, the blond protested, “Do you have to open it? I feel weird about it now.”

“What?” Will asked curiously, folding his hands calmly over the top of the box.

“Everyone else got you something that made you laugh or was absolutely ridiculous. And I got you something kinda serious.”
“That doesn't mean that I want it any less,” the older man insisted fondly, reaching out to squeeze the blanketed leg stretched out on the bed beside him. “I promise, I'm going to love it no matter what, because it was from you. Okay?”

“Okay,” he agreed with a resolute nod, though Marina couldn’t help noticing that his grip around her waist tightened just that little bit as Will started to unwrap the heavy box.

Inside the wrapping paper was a duct taped crate, earning a smirk and a cocked eyebrow. Pulling his K-Bar from his boot, Will slit the tape carefully and lifted off the lid. His jaw visibly dropped at the contents only he could see and Marina could swear that there were tears shining in his eyes as he reached suddenly trembling hands into the crate. Whatever it was, he was very careful with it as he withdrew it slowly from the confines.

Once it cleared the sides, it wasn't hard for the younger Grimms to understand what had caused their brother's atypical reaction. In his hands was a square whiskey snifter, with the logo for Glenfidditch Whiskey etched beautifully onto the front, under which was inscribed “DAD”. It was stunning craftsmanship, and Sam had clearly put a lot of thought into it. The newest addition to the family had only been calling the eldest Grimm “Dad” out loud for a few days, but he'd obviously been calling him that in his head for much longer.

There was reverent awe in the Colonel's tone as he brought shining eyes up to look at his newfound son. “Sammy . . . this is gorgeous.”

“Ma told me you liked whiskey, and that you didn't really have a good whiskey set at home. So . . . I went looking for one. There should be a decanter to match in there too. And a mold for spherical ice cubes.”

“Marina's right; I don't have a set. But this is perfect. Thank you.”

“Yeah? You really like it?” the blond asked nervously, clearly self-conscious about the gift.

Will smiled gently, as he promised, “Best gift I've gotten this whole year. Aaron's X-Ray glasses included.” He set the snifter back into the crate reverently, before pushing himself to his feet. Moving to Sam's side, the Colonel bent and pressed a warm kiss to the crown of the blond's head. “Thank you.”

The rest of Marina's boys seemed to sense that this was between the three seated on the bed and pushed themselves to their feet. “Happy birthday, Will!” they each called behind them as they booked it from the room, leaving the trio alone.

Sam's hands were claws as they clutched Will's over-shirt, letting the older man cradle him close to him. “The General is an idiot, Sam. You are a hell of a man, and I am proud to call you my son. No matter what happens, between now and the day I die, that will never change.”

“But . . .”

“But nothing, Sam,” the Colonel insisted, quicksilver eyes a warm, concrete blue. “I love you . . . your Ma loves you . . . you are ours forever.” Gesturing to the gift, he insisted, “This is amazing, and I will treasure it forever. But if you're just trying to buy your way into the family, to make sure we keep you around, you can stop right now. We are never letting you go. I swear it . . . on Marina's love for me, I swear it.”

Seeing the sincerity in the older man's eyes caused Sam to choke on a sob. Before long, that single sob had devolved into a total breakdown. It became quickly apparent, however, that the blond's crying jag was wrecking hell on his ribs. Moving seamlessly, the Family's Power Couple took their seats on the bed on each side of him and wrapped their arms around him, managing to hold him tightly enough to stabilize them.

Once it was finally over, Sam whimpered lightly as he sagged completely into Marina's shoulder. “Sorry . . . I don't know what just happened. That was a stupid reason to cry.”

The Russian smiled kindly as she pressed a warm kiss to his temple. “There is no such thing as a stupid reason to cry. Everyone needs the chance to breakdown once in awhile.”

Feeling him begin to drift, Marina looked up at her partner quietly. Will nodded in silent agreement and slipped off the bed. Before long, the two had gotten Sam laid out flat on his bed, pillows supporting his swollen wrist and enough pillows behind his head to supply a small army. “All right, Sammy-honey . . . it's time for you to get some sleep. I'm gonna go get to Vincent to get you some more meds.”

“No . . .” he moaned, tossing his head slightly, “I don't want the meds.”

“I know . . . but I don't want you to wake up in the middle of the night, unable to sleep because you didn't take them now. If you don't want the sedative, you don't have to have it, but I think you should . . . just so you can get some sleep tonight, okay?”

Swallowing as he leaned into the palm cupping his cheek, he took as deep a breath as he could manage, before nodding. “Okay.”

“That's my boy,” she praised fondly, before dashing from the room.

Before long, Vincent had administered the mild sedative and pain medication, and Marina was tucking in her son as he hovered just over the edge of unconsciousness. Brushing back blond hair from sleepy blue eyes, she pressed a warm kiss to his forehead as she whispered, “Sleep well, moy mal'chik . . . your dad and I will see you in the morning.”

“Love you, Ma.”

“Love you too, mal'ysh . . . goodnight,” she prompted once again, and watched with satisfaction as he finally allowed himself to drop off.

Accepting Will's arm around her waist, she fussed one last time with the covers, before letting him lead her towards the door of the room. At the doorframe, she paused and looked back at the stack of presents Will had opened that night. “Grab a snifter,” she ordered firmly, a brief pause filling the area as Will moved in to grab one of the glasses, before she continued, “. . . and the handcuffs.”

Will blinked at her in surprise, though he was reaching for the hot pink monstrosities even as he asked, “Oh? Are you feeling a need to be tied up tonight, sumasshedshaya devushka?”

Giving him a warm smile, she promised wickedly, “Oh no . . . they're not for me.” Winking, she insisted, “They're for you.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) Akademiya - Academy (the training center where Marina, Natasha, Viktoriya and Veronika learned to be spies and assassins)
(R) sestra - sister
(R) moy mal'chik - my boy
(R) malysh - kiddo
(R) sumashshedshaya devushka - crazy girl
Role Reversals

Chapter Notes

Thank you all so much for your support yesterday! It meant the world to me!

Okay, so there is sex in this chapter, but not really? Um, I don't porn well. So this is more . . . yeah. If you don't want to read, that's fine, just skip to the line break. However, it's not raunchy and, as told to me by my beta, it's more "intimate and sweet" than anything else. I hope you read and enjoy and let me know what you think.

The Grimms deal with the General next chapter.

Few translations here, but what there is, is at the end as always. Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Я люблю тебя, Михаил.
Всегда.

art by stereowire
There was an open bottle of whiskey on their dresser; Marina was hardly surprised when the first thing Will did upon arriving back in their room was pour himself a glass. Smiling at the way his throat muscles worked as he tossed back the shot, she asked, “Nervous?”

He gave her a small smile, a distinct wobble at one corner, as he reminded her, “It’s been a long time since I’ve willingly allowed someone to handcuff me. And most of those experiences rarely ended well for me.”

“I’m not going to hurt you, Misha,” the Russian vowed, stepping deeper into the room and closing the door behind her. “This isn’t going to be like that, I promise.”

“I know,” he agreed, even as he poured himself another glass. “Forgive me if my nerves are taking a little more convincing.”

“We don’t have to do this. I just thought that . . .”

Setting the snifter down, Will came forward and laced his fingers into the strands of hair at her temples. “I want to do this. You’re always telling me that there is strength in this. And I could use all the strength I can get right now.”

Smiling at him, she insisted, “This isn’t about strength, Misha. It’s about giving you back some control. Cause regardless of the role you’re about to play, you will be the one in complete control.”

Linking her fingers in his, Marina went up on tiptoes and pressed a warm kiss to the underside of his chin. Smiling as he groaned, she purred against the skin before biting down lightly. Will gasped sharply at the pleasurable pain, though his only response was to allow his head to fall backwards as he put himself completely in her hands.

She lifted her hands to his shirtfront, continuing to suck and nibble at his throat as her fingers worked to release the buttons and lay his chest bare. Will's hands were warm and familiar on her arms as he gripped her elbows, anchoring himself in the reality of the moment. “I love you,” she murmured, before drawing back as the last button popped free. Taking in the sliver of exposed flesh she could see through the gap, she took a determined step backwards and insisted, “Strip.”

There was a small tremor in his fingers, even as he nodded in agreement. Gripping the open sides of his shirt, he stripped it efficiently from his shoulders and laid the scarred expanse of his torso bare to her view. She catcalled playfully, watching his ears turn rosy with an uncharacteristic blush as he moved his hands to work at the buckle of his belt.

Soon enough, he was beautifully bare, skin and scars on full display. The Russian bit down on her lower lip hard, one hand reaching out to smooth her fingertips over the curve of his abs, tracing the faint indentations his muscles had carved into the thin layer of fat. “Bozhe moi . . . you're gorgeous.”

The man ducked his head under the praise, his blush starting to migrate down the back of his neck. “Flatterer,” he insisted self-consciously.

Closing her eyes at the typical deflection, she leaned forward to press her forehead against the curve of his collarbone. “I wish you could see yourself the way I see you, Misha. I wish you could see how insanely beautiful you are.”

Lifting his hands, he smoothed his palms soothingly over her upper arms. “I don't need to see myself that way; it's enough to me that you do. Your love is all I have ever needed, samaya malen’kaya.”
She pressed a kiss to the hollow of his throat before stepping back again. “Get on the bed,” she ordered quietly, looking up at him with luminous eyes.

Nodding in solemn agreement, Will lifted her chin and pressed a final kiss to her lips. “Ya lyublyu tebya, Marishka.”

“Ya tozhe lyublyu tebya, Mishka,” she promised, watching as he scooted backwards onto the bed and stretched out across the mattress.

There was tension in his body that tore at her heart, even as she knew it wasn't directed at her personally. She well remembered the last time Will had voluntarily submitted to handcuffs; he'd been twelve, they'd still been at the Hoover Base, and his agonized screams had rang through the base for hours. Blinking her eyes free of tears, she stripped down to just her bra and panties, crawling to kneel beside him. Those eyes were flashing through colors as he stared up at her, before slowly he lifted his arms over his head and closed his hands around the headboard.

Marina bit down hard on her lip, suddenly unsure. Surprisingly, it was Will who broke the tension. He gave her a small, terrified smile, even as he promised, “I trust you.”

Jaw tightening at the trembling evident in the words, the Russian bent forward and kissed him, her hands coming up to click the handcuffs around his wrists and secure him to the headboard. For a long time, she was content to remain where she was, their mouths working against each other familiarly. Drawing back, she smiled down into his face, her hair draping around them in such a way as to block out the rest of the world. Reaching up to touch his cheek, she insisted, “Green means 'all good', yellow means 'slow down', your safeword is 'all stop'. ” Bending to nuzzle against him, she asked, “What's your safeword?”

There was a single twitch to the corner of his lips, before he replied, “Cahill.”

Rearing back slightly, it took her a moment to consider the wisdom in it. It wasn't a phrase that either of them would willingly bring into their bed, and it was the root cause of a great deal of Will's current insecurities. Taking a deep breath through her nose, she settled comfortably on her knees as she nodded. “All right. Use it, if you need to.”

“I will,” he vowed, allowing his body to relax into the mattress as much as he could.

Seeing the discomfort of his current position, Marina reached out to rearrange him slightly. With a light, delicate touch, she maneuvered him the way she wanted him. Then she nudged his knees apart, watching with satisfaction as his thighs fell open and left him completely open to her touch. Smirking, she reached out to run a single fingernail up the sensitive curve of his shaft. Even considering the fact that he was still mostly soft, the Colonel still bucked at the tease, a desperate gasp wrung from his lips. “How does it feel?” she asked, continuing to sketch a phantom touch over the flesh as it hardened under the sensation.

“Marishka . . .” he moaned, body bucking upwards again as her fingernails sketched designs in the hollow where thigh joined hip.

“Does it feel good?” came the gentle insistence, her tone a clear indication that she expected an answer.

“Yes.”

There was a pause, before she asked, “Do you deserve to feel good?”

His reply was all but sobbed as he declared, “No.”
The press of Marina's knee into his left knee should have been an indication of what was coming. However, the series of sharp slaps the Russian applied to the inside of that thigh were completely unexpected. The tingling pain wrenched free a startled cry, prompting him to yank on his bonds as he attempted to writhe away from the brisk punishment. Finally, the stinging slaps ceased and he choked on tears as cool fingers drew figure-eights over the reddened flesh. “Let's try that again, William Michael. Do you deserve to feel good?”

Flinching at her usage of his full name, Will closed his eyes and nodded shakily. She hummed, clearly disappointed in him as she sighed. “Hmm . . . you know better than to lie to me.”

He cried out again as she started to spank the inside of his right leg, the slaps brisk and lingering. Finally, he sobbed out an answer. “Yes! Stop . . . please! Yes!”

“Yes what?”

“Yes . . . I deserve to feel good.”

“Why?”

“Because you love me, and you want me to feel good.”

A bright smile curved Marina's lips as she bent to press a warm kiss to his lips. “Good boy.”

Will whimpered at the phrase, before bucking again as Marina laid another series of sharp swats to the already abused skin. “I love you, Misha. And I am tired of watching you hurt yourself like this. So we're going to be here all night, if need be, until I believe that YOU believe the words that are coming out of your mouth.”

Sobbing, Will forced himself to lay still under Marina's chosen penalty, fingers tightening around the chain linking his hands together. The sudden cessation of pain caused him to blink, before wet heat surrounded his shaft to the root. The resulting buck at the sudden pleasure was halted even as Will yelled out. The Russian's fingers were firm as they pinned him down, preventing him from moving away from the efficiently ruthless blowjob. His partner's mouth was heaven as she dragged him screaming to the pinnacle and he begged as she pulled away a hairsbreadth from the edge. “No . . . please . . . I'm so close . . . Marishka . . . please.”

“Do you deserve to come?” she asked calmly, causing Will's whole body to writhe.

He knew the answer she wanted to hear. He also knew that she would know he was lying to her if he gave it to her. Shifting his hips on the bed, he said nothing in response. The touch of fingers between his thighs, wrapping around his balls and tugging them away from his body, earned another sob. “You'll come when you can tell me that you deserve to feel good, and you actually believe that.”

“Zhemchuzhina . . . please,” he begged, arching as she bit down lightly on a pebbled nipple.

“It's gonna be a long night, Mishka. I'd suggest you either figure out how to lie to me . . . or you start to learn your lesson, da?” His reply was lost as he cried out as she began to spank the insides of his thighs in punishment once again.

It seemed like an eternity to Will before she stopped, though it was barely ten minutes. Each breath was a keening whine, her fingers tracing tenderly over the reddened skin. Gentle kisses pressed to the flesh, earning soft sobs, before Marina pushed herself to sit up once again. His eyes were riveted as she divested herself of her remaining clothing, until she was as bare as he. “My Misha . . . how I love you,” she whispered, her body languid as she moved to straddle his hips. “I don't know how to make you realize that you are everything. That you are perfect and wonderful and all that is good in my life.”

Fingertips reverent, she moved to trace over a faint scar that curved around his left eye. “You were five when this happened. Ross had backhanded you, and his ring left a gash. And I wanted so badly to sweep you up and make it all better; but you just squared your shoulders like a man four times your age and said 'Sorry, sir, I'll do better next time.' I knew at that point . . . you were no longer the baby that I had held in my arms and protected to that point. I was so proud of you . . . and it broke my heart.”

Pressing a warm kiss to the scar, she moved to trace another scar curving around the bend of his jaw. “You were ten . . .”

On and on it went, Marina tracing over scars and recounting the stories of how he'd come to receive them. Once she'd finished, she'd lave the mark with kisses before moving on to the next. She could feel Will's body trembling between her thighs, his hands turning white as they clutched desperately to the bars of the headboard. The pain of the spanking had nearly overwhelmed him; the love she was bathing him with was pushing him further and further to the breaking point.

It was when she finally began to trace the thin, straight scar on the inside of his right wrist, that he felt himself cracking. “You were 17 . . .” she whispered, tears pricking at her eyes at the memory. “. . . and you were so lost. And you cut yourself to feel something . . . and I felt my heart stop when I came into the bathroom to find you bleeding and unable to tend it by yourself. You were careful; it wasn't deep or life threatening, but it scared me more than any wound you had gotten to that point. Because I didn't know if this was only going to be the first attempt, or was I going wake up one morning and you were gonna be gone . . . dead at your own hand?”

Silent tears streaked down Will's cheeks as she sobbed through the end of the story. “Cahill . . . please, Marina, Cahill,” he begged, body thrashing slightly under her.

Instantly, she hit the release on the cuffs, and pulled him into her arms. Rolling onto her back, she drew him between her thighs; taking him into her body with a practiced shift of her hips, one leg hooked around his hip to press him into her. “Come on, Mishka . . . all the way in . . .” Will gasped as he rocked his hips frantically, driving for something only she could give him, even as he felt her tighten her arms around him and draw his head to rest on her shoulder. Her tone was warm and familiar and adoring as she murmured into his hair, “Misha . . . you're safe . . . you're with me . . . never further apart than this . . .” Threading her fingers through his hair, she whispered, “Let me be your safe harbor . . . nothing can ever touch you when you're inside me.”

Will spasmed at the knowledge, his orgasm catching him completely off-guard at the tender words and the implications behind them. He screamed . . . grief, terror, love and fear all combining in the sound, before it trailed off into a keening whimper as he let himself go lax against her. His physical release triggered an emotional one of Marina's own, her eyes slipping closed on tears as she felt him begin to shake uncontrollably in her arms. Lifting her hands, she trailed her fingers through his hair as she whispered, “Lay your head, my love . . . I'll take the watch for awhile.”

Burying himself into her arms, the Colonel proceeded to completely and thoroughly break down.

*******************************

The next morning, Marina woke to actual snores, something that only happened when her Colonel felt truly safe. Smiling, she rolled over to look into the beloved face, one hand coming up to trace the calm and relaxed features of her partner. Will barely stirred under the touch, nuzzling sleepily into her fingertips before snuggling unconsciously back into his pillow once again.
Relieved that the night before had been a successful one, Marina leaned forward and pressed a warm kiss to his bared shoulder. “I love you, Misha,” she murmured, before rolling away and out of bed. Standing at the foot, she watched her lover's nude frame move with his easy breathing, before she dragged out the covers from where he'd kicked them to the bottom of the bed and draped them over him carefully. “Sleep well, love . . . we have all the time in the world to rest.”

Dressing quickly in one of Will's shirts and a pair of flannel pajama pants, she crept quietly from the room. The Russian peeked into her son's room, relieved to see him still sleeping peacefully. Easing the door closed once again, she trekked down the stairs, her soul as light as her steps at the knowledge that everything – and everyone – was where they should be.

Of course, then she walked into the kitchen to start breakfast and got hit with the Grimm Inquisition. The catcalling and teasing was immediate, though it wasn't until Brian spoke that she reacted. “Didn't know Will could scream like that, Marina . . . those handcuffs were handy then?”

Eyes narrowing, Marina whirled away from the counter and drove her palm sharply into the second eldest's solar plexus. Taken by surprise, he struggled to breathe through the sudden constriction in his lungs. Distantly, the Family Russian was aware that each of the brothers had fallen silent in shock, even as she tripped the smart-mouthed agent and landed another blow to his chest that slammed him into the linoleum floor. When it was over, Brian lay wheezing on the floor while Marina stood over him, her shoulders heaving as she seethed.

“I'm only gonna say this once. If I hear even one word out of you about what happened last night, Bri, this will seem like child's play.”

“It's just a little teasing, Marishka,” Jason protested, flinching backwards as she rounded on him next.

“Will is sleeping . . . actually, honest-to-God, sleeping without the help of drugs, exhaustion or excessive amounts of alcohol, for the first time in years! And I refuse to allow you to make him feel ashamed or embarrassed about what happened between us last night, if this is the result.” Hot chocolate eyes swept her boys as she insisted, “Do I make myself perfectly clear?”

“Yes ma'am,” was the instantaneous response, each of the brothers in awe at the implications of what Marina had said.

It was a well known fact in the family that Will didn't sleep well. Hansel was not the only one who knew how many sleepless hours Will spent in front of the television late at night, drinking to forget the nightmares and praying for sleep to come again. If the sounds from last night had given their brother an easy – and uninterrupted – night's rest, there wasn't a single thing any of them would say about it.

“All right then . . . usual chores. Brian, bacon. Aaron, juice. Jason and Clint, chop up some fruit for a salad. I'd like breakfast done by the time Sam and Misha wake up, dong le ma?”

“Da,” they each agreed, moving off to their chores.

And if Will's usual easy stride was halting and uncertain as he came into the kitchen several hours later, each of the brothers knew better than to remark on it.
So embarrassed! runs and hides in shame

Translations:

(R) Bozhe moi - oh my God
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
(R) ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) ya tozhe lyublyu tebya - I love you too
(R) zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for Marina)
(R) da/net - yes/no
(C) dong le ma - do you understand? (A quote from Will & Marina's favorite show, "Firefly")
For The Love of Family

Chapter Notes

Enjoy all! Thank you so much for your support for the last chapter. It was hard for me, and even though you all said it was awesome, I still was very uncomfortable posting it.

I hope you continue to read and enjoy. Not many translations today. What there is, is pretty self-explanatory. Enjoy and thank you again! I enjoy hearing what you think of this upcoming storyline.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 195: For the Love of Family

Once checking he was alone, Will grimaced as he eased himself down into the couch cushions, fingers of his left hand digging into the armrest at the discomfort radiating from his thighs. No stranger to pain, Will had a higher pain tolerance than most people; it wasn't even really pain he was feeling, more as though his skin had been stretched too tight over bones and musculature. Still, it was an extremely uncomfortable feeling and he knew he would be moving gingerly for a few days at the very least.

Looking up at the sound of soft steps in the hallway, he smiled to see Marina watching him from the door. There was a fond smirk on his lips as he promised, “I'm all right. Just . . . aches a bit.”

“Do you want me to get the arnica? It's in my bag,” she reminded him, nibbling self-consciously on her lower lip.

The Colonel's eyes narrowed at her, watching her fingers twist and turn a small object between them. “Maybe later . . . what is that?”

Blinking at the question, she looked down at the box she held as though surprised to find she was holding it. “Oh . . . um . . . nothing. It's nothing,” she stammered, shoving it deeply into her cargo pocket.

Quicksilver eyes narrowed at her as a brilliant blush swept up from her collarbones and splashed across her cheeks. “Uh-huh,” he drawled, one eyebrow cocking upwards and tone disbelieving. “Marishka . . . what is it?”

Biting down on her lower lip, the Russian watched Will frown at her for a moment before he began to shift as though to get up. “No! Sit down . . .” she insisted, coming further into the room. She took the seat next to him as she pulled the small box out of her pocket, one foot coming up to tuck under the opposite thigh. “It's your birthday present.”

There was laughter in his tone as he teased, “I had wondered why I didn't get one from you.”

“It wasn't really something I wanted to hear commentary on from the boys. I wanted this to just be ours,” she explained, spinning the brightly colored box between her fingers once more. Mouth twisting, she took a deep breath and handed it over. “Happy birthday.”

He accepted the gift and took his time in unwrapping it, eyes solemn as he worked at the paper. Clearly it was important to Marina, which meant – regardless of what it was – it was important to him as well. Once the paper fell away, he stared at the velveteen black box in his palm. He could see the way his fingers trembled as he reached to snap the box open. His eyes went brilliant blue at the sight of the small circlet inside. “It's beautiful, samaya malen'kaya,” he breathed, lifting it out carefully.

Colored a sedate, almost bloody, red with a dark silver line through the middle, the ring caught and held the light, highlighting other colors in the crimson. “What is it?”

“It's bloodwood and tungsten. The tungsten is more durable than platinum, so it should hold up no matter what we put it through. And the bloodwood . . . well, the color suits you.”

“You do love it when I wear red,” he teased, winking as he remembered some of the things she'd bought him in red they both had enjoyed . . . some of which were not for polite – or even impolite – company.
Her blush deepened, her thoughts clearly along the same lines as his. “Shut up,” was the fond reply, reaching out to take it from him. She offered him her palm as she inquired, “May I?”

Smiling at her, awed once again by her desire to stay with him, he offered her his left hand. “Pretty sure this is my line.”

“Pretty sure you did this already,” she laughed, wiggling her fingers so her opal flashed as it caught the light. Turning her attention back to what she was doing, she slipped the ring onto his fourth finger, grinning as it settled into place easily. "Perfect."

About then, a commotion sounded from upstairs along with a brisk pounding at the front door. “Damn it, Sam! What the fuck do you think you're doing!?” Vincent's voice boomed furiously, causing Marina to frown, even as the pounding continued on the front door. She stood quickly, eyes on her partner as she asked, “Can you get the door or should I get one of the boys to get it?”

Mouth twisting, the Colonel considered his level of discomfort before shaking his head. A sharp wince further twisted his face as he pushed himself slowly to his feet, insisting, “I'll get it. You should go make sure Vincent doesn't murder our son for being stupid.”

“Yeah,” she drawled with a roll of her eyes, before jogging towards the stairwell. He grinned as she shouted upwards, “Samuel Wayne Braddock, you had better still be in bed by the time I get up there, or so help me, you are grounded!”

“I'm 27 years old, Ma! You can't ground me!” came the shouted retort.

“You wanna make a bet!” she snapped, before disappearing out of sight down the hallway, accompanied by the blond's resigned groan.

Still chuckling as he moved slowly towards the door, Will could feel his focus pulled to the new weight on his left hand. Reaching for the door, he took a deep breath then pulled it open cautiously. His aide, Corporal Patricia Hadley, stood there, shooting into attention with a sharp salute. “Colonel Brandt, sir . . . I apologize for interrupting your vacation, sir . . . but the Director sent this to you and Colonel Petrovka, with his compliments, sir.”

Sighing at the persistent phrase, Will resolved to let it slide – he'd been trying to get Hadley to stop calling him “Sir” since her assignment as his aide and still no luck. He returned the salute then reached to accept the dispatch envelope. “Did he give you a deadline on when he needed this intel back?”

“No sir, but I was told this wasn't anything he needed a response on. And to make sure to tell you, and I quote, 'Analysis will keep. Take care of what's yours.' He was most insistent, sir.”

“Thank you, Hadley. Would you like some coffee?”

“No, but thank you, sir. Will there be anything else, sir?”

“No, Hadley, dismissed.”

“Yes sir. Thank you, sir.” she agreed with another salute, before rotating sharply on her heel and moving back to the official looking jeep idling in the street.

Shaking his head as the jeep drove away, the Colonel pushed the door closed and moved back to the couch in the living room. He slipped his thumb under the flap to open the envelope before reaching in to pull out the three stacks of paperwork inside. Two of the stacks were paper-clipped together so as to keep them separate and the third looked very official, bound in a S.H.I.E.L.D.-embossed folder.
Setting the folder to the side, Will sprawled across the cushions to read through the other two stacks of paperwork.

The first packet appeared to be the adoption paperwork both Will and Marina had contacted Legal about. As he'd reminded them just moments before, Sammy was 27 years old and technically too old to be adopted. But as far as the two officers were concerned, their son's age was hardly a reason not to wrench complete parental control away from Gregory and Diana Braddock regardless. Thick and official, there were clear tabs where Will, Marina, Sam and the two older Braddocks would need to sign to make the adoption official.

The second group of papers was the results from the fingerprints found on the shovel. As Will had suspected, the fingerprints did confirm General Gregory Braddock as the attacker who had beaten Sam with the tool and then left him in the dirt for dead. Will's hands clenched around the pages, jaw tightening hard, before he forced himself to take a deep breath through his nose.

He tossed the packet onto the coffee table upside down so he didn't have to see the words glaring off the page, then turned his attention back to the folder. A post-it note had been stuck to the front of the folder, Fury's bold handwriting spelling out a simple note; “Don't say I never gave you anything.”

Will shuffled through the pages inside the folder then started to read through the official memo that made up the front page. By the time he reached the end of the file, there was a wide grin on his lips. “Fury . . . you magnificent bastard.” Tilting his head back, he called up the stairs, “Marina! You've gotta see this!”

Meanwhile, Marina had arrived in her son's bedroom to see Vincent and Sam glaring at each other viciously. Considering the fact Sam had managed to get dressed in a loose button-down and worn jeans as well as managing to shove his feet into his boots – though he couldn't bend over yet to tie them – it didn't take a genius to figure out the blond had plans on going somewhere. As it was, the kid sat shakily on the edge of his bed, fists clutching the spread in a desperate grip. Her arms coming up to fold over her chest, the Russian demanded, “What the hell do you think you're doing, Samuel Wayne?”

Sam winced hard; to date, he had never been subjected to the full force of Marina's disappointed “Mom Face” and her pointed usage of first and middle names. “I have to go to work, Ma. Team One is back on shift today.”

“Like hell! You can't even stand up straight; how do you expect to wear all of your gear without falling over!?” Vincent exploded, hands flying upwards as he glared at his friend and S.H.I.E.L.D. partner.

“I have a job, Vincent . . . so what? I'm hurt. Doesn't mean I can just ditch out on my responsibilities.”

The dark-haired doctor opened his mouth snap off something, prompting Marina to take the initiative and step in. “Right now, Sammy . . . your only responsibility is to yourself and to your own health. Sammichka, you're already sweating and you haven't even been upright for more than ten minutes. How do you think you're going to get through a 10 hour shift? We'll call Holleran; let him know you can't come in today.”

“And if they ask why not, what are we going to tell them?”

“The truth. You were attacked, you're injured and you need to rest and to heal.”

“And when they ask why there's no police report of an attack? And no record of a hospital visit?
What then? They're not going to believe it was the General, Ma; Ed and the Sarge are going to think it was you or Dad who did this to me. I just know it.”

“Sammy . . . it is not your job to protect us. It is our job to protect you, okay? You are S.H.I.E.L.D. first, SRU second; ergo, S.H.I.E.L.D. would prefer to keep this in-house. We have people trained for this; we don't need outside help.” Crouching in front of him, she lifted her hand to cup his cheek.
“We have the proof we didn't do this. And frankly, they don't scare me. They can think whatever the hell they want. We know what happened, both as a family and as individuals.”

Sam frowned fiercely, thoughts cycling through his eyes as he tried to come up with some argument he could use to convince her. There was a light smirk on her lips as she teased, “Don't make me get Aaron to sit on you, Sammy-honey.”

Groaning, the blond flopped backwards carefully as he protested, “Not fair. Aaron would hit the fan if I even suggested going to work today.”

“As well he should. Which is why I'm kind of surprised you thought you were going to be able to sneak out of here without him noticing,” she scolded, cocking an eyebrow at the shame-faced look creeping across his face. “We'll talk about the sneaking out later. Right now, I want you to get out of your clothes, back into your pajamas and then let Vincent check you over.”

Sam's face twisted at the declaration even as he nodded, though he didn't even shift in order to try and follow it. Marina frowned at the behavior, asking cautiously, “You feeling okay, Sammy?
You're pretty pale.”

“Hurts,” he grunted, accepting the hand Vincent offered and letting out a quiet yelp as the older man carefully pulled him into a seated position. “Damn . . . this may not have been a smart idea.”

“You think?” Vincent snarked, crouching in front of his friend and reaching out to press lightly on the battered ribs. “With any luck, you didn't accidentally puncture your lung with a rib end.”

“He can still sass you, Vincent . . . I don't think you have to worry about a punctured lung just yet,” Marina laughed, watching as Sam stuck his tongue out at her and earned the gesture back in response.

“Meanie,” the younger man protested, his fingers moving to fumble with the buttons on his shirt.

“Memo note to self: pain reverts Sammy to a five year old,” the Russian teased, winking at the fierce pout her son shot in her direction. “I'm sorry, malysh . . . I can't help teasing you about it. It's adorable.”

Slumping with a wide yawn, Sam let out a fond grumble in reply. “Revenge will be sweet.”

“Revenge typically is,” came the fearless reply, before Will's laughing call turned her head.
“Coming, Misha!”

As she turned back to the blond, Marina insisted, “You don't have to get dressed for bed if you don't want to, Sammy, but I would suggest you get into something more comfortable than a button-down and jeans. Da?”

“Can I at least come downstairs?” he asked plaintively, bright blue puppy eyes peering up at her. “I just don't want to be stuck up here all by myself.”

Cocking her head at him, the Russian took a breath in through her nose and sighed. “How about we come up here instead? Then you don't have to try to tackle the stairs, and you're not all by yourself.
Maybe we can convince your uncles to have another Game Night like we used to do.”

Sam very nearly jumped as Clint popped unexpectedly into the room. “Game Night? Awesome!” he cheered, exhibiting some of his inexhaustible energy as he bounced slightly in place. “If we play Monopoly though, someone has to handicap pravitel.”

Sam's forehead furrowed as he frowned at his buttons, frustrated the medications were complicating his ability to undo them on his own. “Pravitel?”

“Big brother' . . . Misha,” his mom supplied, moving to smack his hands away from his shirtfront and unbutton the shirt herself. Easing the fabric from his shoulders, she nodded at the sensible t-shirt he wore beneath. She stepped to the dresser to retrieve a pair of sweatpants, as she continued, “Last time they all played Monopoly, your dad wiped the floor with everyone.”

Sam grinned wide as he joked, “They didn't actually expect a different outcome, did they? Dad spits out numerical sequences, like Spike and Uncle Jason quote computer terminology.”

“Your guess is as good as mine,” she giggled, tossing the sweats onto the bed. “I didn't play; I'm smart enough to know I can't beat Misha at anything to do with numbers and money.” She twisted to look at Vincent as she asked, “Can you help him with his boots and jeans? I'm gonna go see what Misha wanted and help him get up the stairs.”

The blond gave her a fierce frown at the statement, demanding, “Is Dad okay?”

“He's a little sore,” Marina hedged with a soft smile, “Nothing to worry about.”

“What happened?!”

“No offense, malysh, but it's none of your business, da?” Marina insisted sternly, her features set firmly.

Blue eyes took in the slight blush clinging to her ears as he bit down hard on his lower lip. He came to all too easy conclusion; anything that caused his Ma to blush, he didn't want to know about. “Yes ma'am,” he agreed, one corner of his mouth curving upwards.

“Thank you,” she laughed, bending to press a sweet kiss to his forehead before moving towards the door once again. Pausing next to the youngest Grimm, she grinned as he bent forward to make it easier for her to press a warm kiss to his own cheek. “Love you, dorogoy.”

“Love you too, Marishka,” he agreed brightly, before bolting off again. “Kenny! Game Night!”

Marta's laughter through the door was soft but bright as Aaron's frustrated voice called through the door of their bedroom as he shouted, “Go away, bratishka!”

“Come on, Ken! Sammy's bored!” the younger brother protested, watching his sister giggle as she jogged down the stairwell behind him. “Let's be good uncles and amuse him, huh?”

The virologist's tone was low as she spoke to her boyfriend, earning a wretched groan from the older brother as he caved to two of the three people he loved best in the world. “Ten minutes, Clint! Jerk!”

“Bitch!” was the cheerful rejoinder, the archer all but skipping away to track down the rest of the family.

“Fanboy!”
“Shut up!”

When Marina came back into the living room, she grinned to see Will still laid out on the couch, soft laughter at the two youngest Grimms drifting from his lips. Clint and Aaron were fierce in their loyalty to one another; where Clint led, Aaron followed. But that didn't mean they didn't still bicker, tease and poke fun at each other more than any of the other Brothers Grimm combined.

Her grin faded into something quieter, as she took in the happiness and peace on his face, coming in to take a seat at his hip. “How do you feel?”

Eyes slipping closed, the Colonel took time to take full stock of his body. The most obvious ache was in his thighs, the small bruises on the insides causing a fierce itch. Fortunately, he healed fast and the bruises would fade before the end of the day though the ache and tightness would linger for several days. The handcuffs were solid steel, and there were dark bruises around his wrists where he'd struggled against them. The white line of the scar on the inside of the right one stood out in stark relief, though for once Will didn't feel ashamed at the sight of it. Any lingering guilt had healed last night, along with everything else he had been struggling with. The sense of bone deep fatigue which typically plagued him was gone as well, as he had slept straight through the night with no nightmares. If he was being truthful, despite the gentle pain in his wrists and thighs, he felt fantastic.

Comfortable with his self-assessment, he allowed himself to smile up at her as he replied, “Better. Much better.”

Bracing one hand on the armrest under his head, she grinned as she bent to kiss him. “Good.”

Caught up in the taste of her lips, Will would have been perfectly content to forget the rest of the world around them. His left hand slipped into her hair, a tender comb as it moved through the strands even as he angled her head slightly to lick deeper into her mouth. Her shattered moan vibrated through him, earning an answering groan. He grinned against her lips as she melted into him, allowing him to haul her over his body so as to trap her against the back of the couch. “Bozhe moi, I love you,” he breathed, earning a brilliant grin from her. Pressing his forehead against her own, he insisted, “Thank you.”

“For what?”

“Last night . . . the ring . . . this morning . . . every second of every day,” he replied, smirking as he watched her blush. “I don't deserve you.”

Her lips pursed into a frown and she cocked an eyebrow at him, scolding, “Do we need to have a refresher course of last night already?”

The Colonel burst out laughing even as he shook his head. “No . . . I don't think my thighs could handle it. It's just how I feel, Marishka . . . it's never going to change. Which just means I am ever more in awe of the fact you want to stay here with me.”

Her whole body arched upwards as she nuzzled against his nose, vowing solemnly, “Never further from you than this, moy Mishka.”

“Slava Bogu,” came the reverent reply, as he captured her lips once again.

They took a long moment to cuddle close and trade lazy kisses, letting the rest of the world fall away. Clint’s call for Will led Marina to push herself into a seated position once again. “We're coming, domashniy! Pick a game; we'll be up in a minute!”

An affirmative call drifted back even as Marina looked down at her lover. She ran her fingers through the close-cropped hair and asked, “What did you need to show me, Misha?”

Will lifted the envelope from the coffee table and offered it to her with a smile. “The Magnificent Bastard sent us a few presents.”

“Presents?” she asked in surprise, twisting her legs so they draped across her partner's lap as she sat up against the back of the couch.

Will's hands came up to rest on her thighs, drawing absent designs on the denim of her jeans as she pulled out the paperwork. As he himself had done, she set the folder off to the side and began to read through the other two packets first. The adoption paperwork earned a brilliant grin, but her glare grew hot enough to set the second packet ablaze. “The General is a mudak,” she hissed, tossing the evidence on the coffee table with the air of someone desperate to put space between herself and it.

“Yeah . . . but you haven't even see the best part. Open the folder.”

Marina cocked her head at him, before doing as told. Inside she found an itinerary for a summit taking place in Toronto the following week. “A summit devoted to combining central and local intelligence agencies with military intelligence to better equip Special Operations, Special Forces and Tactical Response Units with more actionable, reliable and safe intel? Interesting.”

“Check out the guest list,” he coaxed, flipping through pages and handing it back to her.

“S.H.I.E.L.D. Chief Analyst, William M. Brandt . . . of course,” she teased, wrinkling her nose at him. “SRU Sergeant Gregory Parker and second? Unexpected, but okay.” Continuing to read through the list, she grinned at the next name she recognized, “U.S. Army General David P. Perron . . . it'll be good to see Dave and Denise. Navy Intelligence Officer, Lt. Catherine L. Rollins; I wonder if she'll bring McGarrett?”

“I thought they broke up.”

“They're always breaking up. And then they get back together again. I give up trying to track their relationship. Maria'll be thrilled; she hasn't seen Collins since Catherine left Naval Intelligence and moved with the reckless idiot to Hawai'i.” Muttering names as she went down the list, she could feel her jaw going tight as she paused on one of the last names on the list. “Canadian Army General Gregory Braddock . . . superior asshole of the JTF2.”

“Well said,” Will laughed, even as he tightened his hands on her thighs. “We've been trying to figure out how to pin him down, to get him to sign the adoption paperwork. This is the perfect opportunity.” Smirking, he teased, “There will be a lot of colleagues there . . . a lot of witnesses . . . the last thing he's going to want is for people to know what's in the file and to know what kind of man he is.”

Her eyes narrowed as she considered that, which means it took a moment for Marina to grin. “Klassno.”

Smirking, he teased, “Yeah . . . I thought you'd like that part.”

Chapter End Notes

The General will be getting his comeuppance very soon. Next chapters are devoted to it.
Sorry about the delay. This demanded to be written first.
Hey guys! Another new chapter! Woohoo! Thank you so much for your reviews and continued support on this fic. It means the world to me!!!

Only one translations, so I'll just do it here instead of at the end.
(R) malysh - kiddo (one of Marina's nicknames for Sam)

Enjoy and let me know what you think!!!! Thank you again!

Chapter 196: A Whole New World

Sam was pissed.
The Sarge had showed up at the house that day and all but manhandled him into the car. He'd known that he was going to acting as Parker's Second during this summit, but there was a brusqueness there that Sam hadn't been expecting. The prodding had hurt and currently, he was shifting carefully in his assigned seat, trying to get comfortable while his ribs screamed at him.

He wasn't sure why he hadn't been allowed to arrive at the summit with his parents, but Parker had vetoed that idea the moment he'd suggested it when he was assigned to the position. Fortunately, Will and Marina hadn't seen the rough way Parker had handled him; they'd been on a teleconference with Director Fury and Deputy Director Landy about some intel the two felt was relevant. Aaron and Marta, though; both of them had been sitting on the front porch. Aaron had moved to protest, though Sam had pulled his most pleading face and waved him to silence as he was hauled around.

Either way, Sam was now forty-five minutes early to the damn thing and his ribs hurt like hell. It was not starting out to be a good day.

After about five minutes, the Sarge came back with two water bottles and took the seat next to him. Blue eyes narrowed suspiciously, even as he accepted the proffered bottle, watching warily as Parker took the seat next to him and twisted to face him. “Who did this to you, Sam?” he demanded, eyes hard and narrowed as he watched Sam closely for a lie. “Was it your parents? Agent Brandt and Colonel Petrovka? Did they do this to you!??”

“No!” Sam snapped, furious on his parents behalf. “Dad and Ma have never laid a hand on me, they never would. They found me, when the asshole who did this left me for dead in my own backyard. They took care of me, when I could barely move because it hurt just to breathe. Dad was there when I woke up, reading to me, so that I wouldn't be scared or alone.” Leaning forward with a pained hiss, he snarled, “They're my real parents; they're nothing like the ones who spawned me. They actually give a damn about me. You want to know who did this? You should be looking at the man who gave me his name.”

“No!” Sam snapped, furious on his parents behalf. “Dad and Ma have never laid a hand on me, they never would. They found me, when the asshole who did this left me for dead in my own backyard. They took care of me, when I could barely move because it hurt just to breathe. Dad was there when I woke up, reading to me, so that I wouldn't be scared or alone.” Leaning forward with a pained hiss, he snarled, “They're my real parents; they're nothing like the ones who spawned me. They actually give a damn about me. You want to know who did this? You should be looking at the man who gave me his name.”

“Your father is a general, Sam. Not only that, he's one of the most well respected men in the entire military. I've been reading up; his guys love him.” Here Sam scoffed bitterly, well aware of the persona his father put forward so that no one would know what happened in the privacy of their own home. “Meanwhile, Will Brandt's underlings are terrified of him. And Colonel Petrovka? Well . . . we all saw what she was capable of.”

Sam was grinding his jaw, pissed off on the couple's behalf. “I don't give a damn what you think you know. You don't know shit . . . I know who hurt me . . . my parents know who hurt me.”

“Then tell me why there was no hospital visit, Sam. No police report. Just help me make sense of what happened. That sounds like someone trying to cover something up . . . not two parents giving a damn about their kid.”

“I'm S.H.I.E.L.D., Sarge. S.H.I.E.L.D. takes care of its own. They have a complete file of what happened; with investigative reports, crime scene findings, medical reports, witness accounts. So why would they call the cops?”

“Because it's what you do.”

“Not if you're not a civilian. If I was still military, this would have a matter for the MPs, not the cops. If I was CSIS, they wouldn't have called the cops either.” Leaning forward, a small hiss slipping through his clenched teeth as he compressed his ribs, he snapped, “The only reason you're upset about my parents not calling the cops, is you want a reason to hate them. And you'll never find one . . . not here, not like this.”
Parker went to protest, but stopped when Sam suddenly froze in his chair. Blue eyes went wide and terrified, his body literally shrinking backwards in the chair as though he was trying to make himself smaller. However, a small shift caused a soft cry, and he flinched when the man Parker now recognized as General Gregory Braddock arrived at the table. “Samuel,” was the cold tone, icy blue eyes sweeping his son from head to toe.

Flinching again at the glacial tone, Sam sank inward as he replied meekly, “Hello Sir.”

“I didn't know you would be attending.”

“Medical leave, sir . . . Commander Holleran thought I would be able to handle it, seeing as it's a lot of sitting around and listening.” His eyes flashed bitterly as he sassed lightly, “Kinda like high school; easy to hide injuries when you don't move around a lot.”

Parker blinked in shock at the rage that flashed like fire over the General's face then, before he schooled his features into smooth impassivity once more. “Good to see you're earning your keep then. Sergeant Parker, is he pulling his own weight? Not fucking around or slacking off?”

The older man glanced at his guy, watching the shame and embarrassment flare across his features, though surprisingly, Sam said nothing. It was uncharacteristic of the cocky young man Greg had thought he knew. It was the barely hidden terror in his eyes that prompted him to answer firmly, “No . . . Sam is a great asset. He still has some things to learn, but he's going to be a valuable member of the team. I can tell.”

Clearly that had not been what the General expected to hear – wanted to hear? – and Parker watched as he made a small face before forcing a small smile at his oldest child. “Your mother misses you; you should come by the house, now that you're back in town.”

Sam said nothing, eyes cast aside as the man turned and walked away. It was only when the General was out of earshot that the blond muttered viciously, “Sure . . . so you can finish the job you started? Not fucking likely.”

His superior watched Sam shudder, a sharp wince crossing his face as the reflexive movement caught his ribs and caused pain. “So . . . your dad, huh?”

“There's a big difference between a father and a dad. Will is my dad. The General is my father. I think you can guess which of the two I like more,” Sam snarled, eyes narrowed slightly before he forced himself to shift away and stare at the tablecloth.

“For what it's worth, Sam, I am sorry. I shouldn't have made assumptions.”

“No . . . you shouldn't have;” was all the younger man said, as he continued to glare at the tabletop.

About then Will and Marina arrived, with an unobtrusive Owen Elliot trailing behind. Sam all but lit up at the sound of his Ma calling his name cheerfully, putting an end to the last of Parker's concerns. “Sammy-honey!” she laughed, jogging effortlessly in her high heeled boots towards them. As she got closer, she zeroed in on the lingering fear in Sam's eyes and the pallor that still clung to his features. “What happened? You're so pale, malysh! Are you okay? Are you in pain?” She paused for a moment, clearly seeking an answer before protesting as he remained silent. “Sammy!”

“I'm fine, Ma, I promise. Just . . . a run-in with the General.”

Marina's jaw tightened sharply and Parker stared in awe as she transformed into an overprotective mother bear before his eyes. “I'll kill that bastard. What the hell does he think he's doing, coming anywhere near you after what he did?” she snarled furiously, calming only when her partner appeared at her side and placed one hand on the back of her neck. “Marina . . . heel. We're not killing him, remember?”

“Why not?”

“Because Sam asked us not to,” he reminded her, turning sharp green eyes on his son. “Are you okay?”

“Yeah. Just . . . embarrassed I guess. I let him get to me.”

“Despite all that he's done, Sammy, he is still your father.”

“Maybe, but that doesn't mean I want anything to do with him ever again.”

Will smirked, folding his arms over his chest as he cocked an eyebrow. “Would you like to make that official?”

“Official? Dad, I'm twenty-seven.”

“I remember how old you are, Sammy. That's not what I asked.” Gesturing to his partner, he watched as she dug into her bag and handed the adoption paperwork across the table. “Just . . . think about it, okay? Read it over . . . let me know what you think.”

Sam was still staring in awe at the paperwork, the large letters at the top of the first page causing him to choke up. “Petition for Adoption?” he breathed, blue eyes turning upwards, “Are you serious?”

“Deadly,” Marina promised with a small smile, before turning around at a call of her name. “Oh, Denise!” she cheered, bending to press a warm kiss to the crown of her son's head before dashing off to embrace her friend.

Moving to crouch beside Sam's chair, Will looked up at his son solemnly. “Now that your Ma's gone, be honest. Are you in any pain?”

Shifting slightly, Sam shrugged, “A little, but I'll manage.”

“You don't have to 'manage', Sam. I brought some of your meds, if you want them.” Holding up a hand to stall Sam's expected protest, he promised, “Not the narcotics, just the ibuprofens. It'd help to take the edge off.”

Taking a deep breath, Sam nodded once, “I could use a pill to take the edge off.”

“All right. You got some water?” Sam held up the bottle, allowed Will to ask, “What about something to eat? You're not supposed to take them on an empty stomach.”

“I don't have anything. But there's a buffet table. I could grab something really quick.”

“No, I'll get it. Just stay put. Keller is already super pissed that you're out and about, and not still in bed.”

“Vincent's just a big kitty cat.”

“I'm going to tell him you said that,” Will teased, getting up and ruffling Sam's hair gently, careful to avoid the still tender bump on the back of his head.

Sam made a face at the joke, scoffing, “Great . . . now Vince is gonna kill me.”
“Nah . . . he kinda likes ya,” Will laughed, before turning away towards the buffet.

Parker smirked as he watched Sam settle more comfortably in his chair, a lightness in his demeanor and an easiness in his frame that hadn't been there just moments ago. “You trust them, don't you?”

Sam's smile was small and quiet as he reached gingerly across the table for one of the pens piled in the middle. Finding the tabs with his name on them, Sam began to scrawl his signature on each line. “With my life.”

“So . . . are we going to need to change the name on your locker and your uniform to Grimm?”

Sam shrugged, biting lightly on his lower lip. “I don't know. I guess I'll have to talk about it with Ma and Dad. I've been 'Sam Braddock’ for so long, I don't think I'd remember to answer if someone called me 'Sam Grimm'. But, just knowing that I AM a Grimm would mean the world to me.”

It was about then that Marina descended on the table with Denise Perron from one side, while Will reappeared from the other with David Perron. Will chuckled at something his old friend and superior said, even as he offered Sam the banana bread with butter and apple. “Eat that,” he ordered fondly.

“Copy that,” Sam agreed with a small smile. Bringing the apple to his mouth, he took a big bite with a grin. “Hi Ma.”

“Hello baby,” she replied fondly, reaching out to brush her fingers through his hair. “Sammy-honey, I'd like you to meet a dear old friend. Denise, this is my son, Sam Braddock and his sergeant from Team One, Gregory Parker.”

David spoke up, holding up a hand to forestall any further introductions. “When did the two of you start adopting?”

Sam's grin bloomed further as he held up the paperwork, laughing, “Just now.”

Marina all but lunged for the paperwork, flipping through to see Sam's signature on every line it was needed. Her eyes were shining as she breathed, “Really?”

“Like I told Dad . . .you both are much better parents than I've ever had. It wasn't a hard decision to make.”

Will chuckled as he bumped his hip against his partner's. “And now comes Marina's favorite part . . .”

The Russian grinned wickedly as she replied, “. . . scaring the shit out of your father.”

Denise laughed at her friend's gleeful grin. Pinching her arm lightly, she asked, “How do you have so many handsome boys, Marina?”

The former assassin chuckled with a shrug as she watched her boy blush rosy. “Just lucky, I guess.”

Turning a matchmaker's eye on the young blond, Denise questioned, “You single, Sam? I don't see how that could be, as cute as you are, but stranger things have happened.”

“Yes, ma'am, I am,” Sam replied warily, narrowing eerie blue eyes suspiciously in the direction of the General's sassy wife.

“Oh good . . . I have a few granddaughters I'd like to introduce you to then,” she cackled with a grin.

Laughing outright at the aghast look on Sam's face, Marina teased her friend, “You have already married into this family, Denise . . . you leave my Sammy alone.”

“Well of all, I am not married into this family . . .”

“. . . yet . . .” was Marina’s interjection, which earned a chortle from both of their men and a fond glare from Denise.

“. . . and second of all, I had nothing to do with my niece hooking a Grimm,” Denise protested, even as she flashed a wink.

“You had designs on Jason and Casey before they ever even met. You had everything to do with your niece hooking one of my boys,” the Russian scolded fondly, nose scrunching as she laughed.

It was then that Sam realized who it was that was teasing him. “You're Denise Perron.”

“Guilty as charged. Don't believe anything this one tells you . . . it's all lies,” the woman joked with a broad grin.

“Even the part where you're one of Ma's best, dearest and oldest friends?” he asked, with one of the megawatt smiles that typically turned women from 9 to 90 into total puddles at his feet.

“Oh he is a doll, Marina,” Denise laughed. “As for the rest, the old part is true.”

Marina chuckled, resting one hand on her son's shoulder as she gestured to the other two. “Sammy- honey, this is Denise and her husband, General David Perron, United States Army. Misha, Dave, Denise and I have been friends for a long time.”

“Almost thirteen years,” Dave chuckled, rubbing self-consciously at the back of his neck. “Did I ever apologize for that?”

“Got me what I wanted . . . no apology needed.”

“Apologize for what?” Parker asked curiously.

“When I defected from the KGB and the Russian security service, Dave was my interrogator at the Pentagon. He had me locked up in a cell for a month,” Marina explained, with a small smirk in the general's direction. “It's okay though. He's proven to be a good friend to the both of us over the years.”

Will chuckled, before shifting backwards as Owen leaned forward to speak into his ear quietly. Frowning briefly, he turned back to the assembly. “I apologize . . . I have to go take care of something.”

“Misha?”

A fond smile on his lips, he captured her elbow in his palm and pressed a warm kiss to her cheek. “It's all right. I'll be right back.”

Nodding in agreement, Marina watched the two men go without protest. Sam looked up at her, asking, “What was that about?”

“I have no idea,” the Russian confessed, hot chocolate eyes eagle sharp as she watched them disappear from the room.

The two men strode confidently through the mingling crowd, Will's fingers tight around the paperwork he clutched in his left hand. At the door to the bathroom, Will insisted, “Guard this door .
“You got it, Boss,” was the other man's solemn response, cornflower eyes cold as he watched his long time friend disappear into the bathroom. Turning away from the door, Owen folded his arms over his chest and proceeded to glare at everyone.

Will strode into the bathroom, his mouth tightening at the sight of Gregory Braddock washing his hands at the middle sink. Quicksilver eyes swept the room, taking note of the fact that none of the stalls were closed and all of the urinals were empty. Reaching back, he threw the lock, the sharp click bringing the General's head up sharply. Cold, colorless eyes glared at the older man as the Colonel announced calmly, “You and I should talk.”

Braddock's mouth twisted hard as he ordered briskly, “Get the hell out of my way! Who do you think you are, talking to me like that!?”

Will's face was stone as he replied calmly, “I'm the man who scrubbed your son's blood from under his nails for two straight days after you left him to die in our backyard. I would be the man he calls 'Dad'.”

“Brandt,” came the responding hiss, eyes narrowed in anger as he glared.

A cold smile accompanied his only answer, “Braddock.”

The Colonel folded his arms over his chest, projecting a sense of calm rage and icy control. The S.H.I.E.L.D. logo was prominent on the upper arm of his uniform sweater, and he could feel the tiny prick of the pin displaying his Army rank even through the cotton of his dress shirt. One hand clutched the dispatch envelope Fury had sent, the paperwork Sam had signed already tucked away inside. “You should feel fortunate . . . my partner would rather like to rip you limb from limb. However, I have no desire to be visiting her in prison for the next twenty years. Ergo, the decision to be civilized about this.”

“Like she could.”

“They call her Viper. I assure you . . . it would be very easy.” There was anger in Will's eyes as he compressed his lips hard, all but snarling at the superior officer. “And just because I've decided not to let her rip you to pieces, doesn't mean that I don't want her to rip you to pieces. Forcing me to find my son, bloody and broken, in his own home was not the first impression of yourself you wanted to make with me.”

“You can't prove it.”

“Can't I?” he asked, reaching into the envelope and pulling out the crime scene report. A loud crack rang through the small room as the stack slapped against the marble counters. “There's copies, just so you know. S.H.I.E.L.D. takes the safety of its agents and assets very seriously. And, seeing as you left the weapon in question, it wasn't hard to pull your fingerprints.”

“It's still my word against Sam's.”

“You don't know about the witness, I take it. Someone saw you enter my home . . . saw how scared Sam was when he realized who was on the porch. And their security cameras have a very clear picture of your car . . . and your license plate.” A lazy shrug met Braddock's horrified features. “You may not value Sam, but I value my son very highly.”

“He's my son.”
Holding up the second stack of paperwork, he flipped it open to the first of Sam's signatures he could find. “Not for long. I don't need you or Mrs. Braddock to sign this. Just Sam . . . and he's already done it. As soon as I turn this into my lawyers, Sam will be mine . . . mine and Marina’s, and you will never be able to lay another hand on him without facing the kind of charges I would dearly like to bring you up on now.”

“So why don't you? Why all the cloak and dagger?”

“Because Sam asked us not to. He didn't want to make a big scene about it . . . he just wanted to move on with his life. I am respecting that. And considering what you did to him, you are going to respect that too. You're going to sign the paperwork, next to every tab with your name on it. And then you're going to walk away and never even glance at MY son ever again.” Leaning forward, Will smirked to see the older man visibly recoil. “If you don't . . . well, let's just say things are going to get a great deal less 'civilized'.”

Twenty minutes later, Will slipped into the empty seat beside Marina with the satisfied air of a man who had achieved the impossible. The Russian cocked an eyebrow at him, hissing, “Where have you been?”

Pulling the adoption paperwork from the envelope he'd returned it to, he handed it to his lover with a grin. “Congratulations, Marina . . . it's a boy.”

Marina's eyes went wide at the declaration, grabbing the offered packet and thumbing through each page systematically. She choked on tears at the sight of both her partner's and Gregory Braddock’s signatures on each of the necessary lines. Snatching a pen from the middle of table, she quickly scrawled her own signature to the correct places. Then, not even caring that the majordomo for the summit was getting ready to start speaking at the podium, she shrieked with glee and lunged at her son. Sam caught her with a grunt, her happy squeals earning bright laughter from him. Hugging her tightly around the middle, he asked, “What did I miss?”

The Colonel knew his partner was going to be incapable of anything resembling coherent thought for a minute and tossed the paperwork across the table. “Welcome to the family, Sammy . . . you're a Grimm now.”
Leaning into her lover, Marina sighed as the speaker continued to drone on at the podium. She'd expected the speech to be boring – what else could one expect when the speech was entitled “Tactical Solutions in Civilian Settings” – but the monotone was a little much. Her partner's fingers were playing tenderly with her own, a clear indication he wasn't paying attention either; though on her other side, Sam was riveted. She understood his interest on some level, but this wasn't Marina's typical purview. She had been point for the Brat'ya Mrachnyy for more than a decade; she went where she was led and wreaked havoc where she was told. Figuring out tactical solutions was Will and Clint's job.

One hand came up to stifle a yawn before she grunted miserably, “I don't know how people aren't asleep right now.”

“Who said people aren't asleep right now?” Will teased into the curve of her ear, his arm coming up over her shoulders for a brief squeeze. After a moment, the hand shifted over to thread fingers through the blond hair at the back of their son's head. Despite his interest in the topic, the near constant pain in Sam's ribs was tiring him out and he'd moved to rest his temple against his Ma's shoulder. “How you holding up, Sammy?”

“Tired,” he replied absently, eyes fixated on the speaker as he continued to absorb the information like a sponge.

Blinking hard, Marina shifted slightly to look up into smiling quicksilver eyes. “If I don't get up and move, I'm going to pass out. Ergo, I'm going to head to the ladies room.”

Will chuckled as Sam grumbled lightly in response to losing his pillow, looking up to give Marina a small smile in reply. Once Marina stood, the older man glided effortlessly into the vacated seat and let Sam lean up against him instead. Tilting up his chin, he teased, “Hurry back.”

The Russian shot him a playful wink and all but sauntered out of the converted ballroom. Glancing down at his watch, the eldest Grimm began to count down. A wink like that meant Marina was bored and looking for some one-on-one attention from her favorite playmate. And considering the fact they had spent a large majority of the last months separated . . . Will could honestly say he was looking forward to a little amorous attention himself.

Of course when a large group of people stormed into the room five minutes later, carrying automatic weapons and shouting orders to the assembled guests, it quickly became apparent that this particular plan was shot to hell. Groaning, Will listened to the orders being yelled and carefully drew his son towards the wall.

Sam's eyes were wide and very blue, staring up at the hostage takers in shock. “What the . . .?”

Whatever question the younger man had been about to ask was cut off as one of the thugs slammed the butt of his rifle into Sam's temple with a rough shout of, “Shut up!!”

The Colonel's jaw went tight as Sam immediately reeled. Considering the concussion he was already suffering from, the blow to the head was only going to make the pain in his head worse. Fortunately, Will was saved from acting on his paternal rage, as Owen glided easily between him and the asshole. “Come on, Boss . . . let's get the kid on the floor,” his friend insisted.

Sam's head was lolling on his neck, and it was only Will's arm around his waist keeping him upright. Weak-kneed and nauseous, the blond whimpered as Owen took up the other side and, between the two of them, managed to get him laid out in recovery on the floor. Reaching out to grab Owen's arm, the Colonel hissed vehemently, “No matter what happens, Lucky . . . you watch out for Sam. That's an order.”

“Copy that,” was the agreement, the two friends working to get Sam as comfortable as they could. Glancing back over his shoulder to check the whereabouts of the man Will was now calling “The Asshole”, the Cleaner asked in a whisper, “Where's the Boss-lady?”
“She stepped out to the restroom,” Will breathed quietly, quicksilver eyes watching the terrorists spread out to cover the whole room. “She's not the one I'm worried about right now. Marishka can take care of herself.”

Parker frowned from where he sat on the other side of Will, hissing, “Isn’t she your partner? Aren’t you a little worried?”

Quicksilver eyes swept around to check their surroundings, the Grimm shaking his head with a firm frown. “I always worry. But worrying isn’t going to protect her or keep her safe. So, I'm going to be a good boyfriend and trust her to do what needs doing.” Smoothing his fingers tenderly over the growing lump on Sam's head, he grimaced at the soft sob the blond let out as he pressed against the injury as carefully as he could to determine the extent of the damage. “And quite frankly, Sergeant Parker, Sam needs my attention more at the moment. So unless you want to get both of our asses handed to us by these assholes, I'd suggest you shut up.”

Opening his mouth to protest, Parker froze as a shadow passed by and stalled that idea in its tracks. Quicksilver eyes narrowed at him, before one eyebrow cocked upwards in silent question. Still want to argue with me?

With a fierce frown on his lips, Parker settled back against the wall in silence. For Sam's sake, he'd keep the peace. But he could guarantee . . . this conversation was NOT over.

It was about then a masked man moved up onto the stage and put three bullets into the ceiling. There was an instant outcry, before the entire ballroom silenced in fear. “Frankly, ladies and gentlemen, I'm not here for most of you. Give me what I want and I'll be out of your hair very soon.”

Looking around at the officers assembled, he demanded, “I want the highest ranking officer here . . . the one with the highest security clearances.”

Parker watched as the S.H.I.E.L.D. analyst all but froze, both Sam and Elliot looking up at him at the announcement. Fortunately, the three were saved from speaking when General Braddock stepped forward, sneering, “I'm Gregory Braddock, commanding officer for the JTF2. I'm fairly certain I have the highest clearances here.”

The man narrowed his eyes as the General, gesturing to one of his guys. “Check his chest . . . tell me if he has it.”

Recoiling as the thug reached for him, Braddock snapped, “Get your hands off me!”

Twice the officer's size, it wasn't difficult for the man to subdue him and rip open his shirt to check his chest . . . his unmarked chest. Giving the General an angry, if amused, grin, the leader chuckled, “Clearly someone has a higher estimation of himself than he should.” Gesturing sharply, he ordered briskly, “Shut him up.”

Will grimaced and shifted to block the blond's view as the thug put his fist into the General's face. Resting his hand on Sam's cheek, he insisted, “Close your eyes, Sammy. Don't look.”

The younger agent didn't even protest, just did as he was told, attempting to curl closer to his adoptive father. Will's fingers were warm and familiar in his hair as he smoothed through the strands gently, trying to soothe him. There was a sharp flinch as the leader announced, “That's enough. We don't want the asshole dead.” There was a pause as he evaluated the room, before speaking again. “Let's try this again. I want the highest ranking officer in here, the one with the highest security clearances . . . and the tattoo of a family crest on his chest. You have 60 seconds to step forward, or I'm going to start killing hostages.”
At the clarification, terrified blue eyes shot open and zeroed in on the left side of Will's chest. Parker watched as the man's own hand twitched toward the same spot, before he marshaled himself back under control and cupped Sam's cheek with a small, sad smile. “Dad . . . no,” Sam protested in a whisper, the pain and the fear causing tears to build in his eyes.

“It's okay Sammy,” the Colonel promised. “Everything's going to be just fine. I promise.”

Owen leaned forward, hissing furiously, “Don't you even dare, Boss.”

“You . . . your only priority is Sam, understood? It was an order then and it's still an order now.”

“You are my priority too, Boss . . . I have orders from Fury.”

“Fury will deal. Marina will come for me . . . Sam needs you more than I do.” Seeing the blond gearing up for a fight, Will's hand flashed out and grabbed hold of his arm tightly, “Lucky . . . please. Protect my son.”

Owen's jaw tightened hard, even as he nodded in agreement. “I really don't want to be one of the toys people clean up after the Boss-lady has swept through here, so if you don't mind? Don't get dead.”

“I don't plan on it,” Will agreed with a small smile, before turning his attention back to his son. Sam's eyes were bright with tears, one hand gripping onto the older man's wrist fiercely. “Sammy . . .”

“No! Dad, no . . . don't leave me, please.”

“I'm not leaving you . . . I'm protecting you . . . that's what dads do, okay? Lucky's gonna take good care of you and Marina's going to be here very soon. I'm going to be just fine.”

“Promise,” Sam demanded, tightening his grip as he locked eyes with S.H.I.E.L.D.'s Chief Analyst.

“Fifteen seconds!” came the sudden shout, earning a sharp flinch from the Colonel even as he swore, “I love you.”

Lifting the hand to press a warm kiss to the back, Will disentangled himself and pulled off his S.H.I.E.L.D. sweater. Folding it, he tucked it under Sam's head and then stood. Turning to face the room, his fingers worked at his buttons as he announced, “I'm the one you want. Don't hurt anyone.”

Grabbing the lapel, Will pulled the shirt back to display the Kuhn family crest – in all of its vibrant blues and yellows – tattooed directly over his left pectoral. The leader grinned, gesturing toward two of his men, both of them advancing on the Colonel with menacing grins. “I'm so glad to hear you can be reasonable, Mr . . .”

“Colonel . . . Colonel William Michael Brandt, Chief Analyst for the Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement and Logistics Division.” Quicksilver eyes were hard and cold as they glared at him, “What the hell do you want?”

“Colonel Brandt . . . it's a pleasure. We have a lot to talk about,” the younger man smarmed with a sick grin.

One of the thugs grabbed Will's arm and the Colonel reacted without thought. His body was smooth and practiced as he put the first man and then the second on the ground, both completely incapacitated and moaning in pain. He turned his attention back to the leader, fingers shifting to his buttons as he fastened his shirt, insisting, “Don't touch me.”
Shocked by the calm take down, and the practiced nature of the act, Parker stared. He'd seen what Brandt's partner could do and had no doubts the woman was scary competent and fiercely protective. Brandt, however, had always seemed much less . . . capable. For crying out loud, he was an analyst; he should have spent his days pushing papers and sitting at a desk. Clearly, this was not the case.

The leader stared at the two men on the ground, grinding out, “Those were my two best guys.”

“They could use a remedial lesson or two, in what not to do when going head to head with a career soldier and special operations officer.” Lips quirked into a sarcastic grin, as Will snarked, “Just a tip.”

The leader's jaw tightened hard as he jumped from the stage and stalked towards him. His pace faltered as the officer insisted, “Just because you're in control here, doesn't mean I won't put you on the ground with your friends if you even think about touching me. Fair warning.”

Glowering, the man jammed a finger in Will's face – careful not to touch him – and insisted, “You will tell me what I want to know . . . and I don't give a damn about your dislike for being touched.”

Quicksilver eyes flashed through colors as he stared the man down, before a small smile creased his lips. “S.H.I.E.L.D. doesn't negotiate with terrorists, asshole. Do your worst . . . I'll never tell you anything.”

There was a noticeable cock to the man's head as he laughed, the sound sharp and brittle. “You actually believe that? Everyone talks eventually . . . you'll be no different.”

“More capable men than you have tortured me for the intel they wanted. They didn't get anything except an early grave. I can assure you, your fate will be the same if you don't get your guys and get the hell out of here.”

“You have codes I want . . . that I need. And no one is leaving here until I get them. So flash what bravado you think will save you; you will give me what I want.”

“So be it . . . it's your funeral. And in case you're wondering? The name on your death certificate will be Viper. Enjoy what time you have remaining to you . . . you won't see sunset.”

The two men stood for a long moment, in a clear standoff Will was just as obviously winning. Finally, the man barked, “I don't care how you do it . . . get him out of here.”

And when two guns leveled at Will's head from several arms lengths away, he nodded to concede the first round and went where he was lead.

********************************************************************************

Marina Petrovka – aka Gadyuka aka Viper – was pissed.

Yes, she'd wanted a respite from the boredom and who could blame her for that; monotone can only hold someone's attention for so long. But honestly, this was ridiculous. “What the hell, Jay!? Can't you go any faster?”

Jason grimaced at the snap, glancing towards where Spike was seated next to him, the two men working to gain control of the cameras. “Marishka . . . I know you want to rip some heads off right now, but Spike and I are going as fast as we can. They're monitoring the cameras; the last thing we want to do is tip our hand so soon in the game.”

Just then, Team One's tech specialist cheered, “I got it!”
Marina lunged to lean over his shoulder, eyes taking in the real-time picture being provided from the security cameras inside of the hotel. The glimpse of blond hair drew her attention and she felt rage scream through her body at the sight of her son lying on the floor, resting in recovery position. Owen was sitting next to the younger man, one hand on his shoulder and his eyes taking in every nuance of what was happening around them. “Where's Misha?” she demanded, glancing at the younger Grimm for answers.

Clint's announcement came from behind her, his finger tapping the screen, “There. They're separating him from the rest of the hostages.”

Jason nodded absently, eyes taking in the terrorist leader. “I recognize that guy.”

“What?”

“He's on a file, sitting on my desk back home. Matthew Conrad . . . he's a militant pacifist.”

“A pacifist?! This doesn't look like a peaceful organization to me, Jay,” Brian snarked from where he and Natasha stood against the wall out of the way, one eyebrow cocking upwards at his little brother while Natasha kept a close eye on her younger sister's rage level.

“Militant pacifist. They released a manifesto about a year ago, declaring that their goal was to force the world to accept peace. And that they would give up themselves and their guns, as soon as the world's governments did the same.”

“I'll bet that went over famously,” Maria snarked from the wall, her arms folded over her chest. Worried teal eyes were watching her best friend steadily, taking in the way Marina's eyes tracked her lover across the screens.

“Yeah . . . you could say that. They used to have a hacker . . . a pretty talented one.”

“Used to?” Marina asked, tuning back into the conversation with concern.

The communications specialist bit down on his lower lip hard as he looked up at his sister. “He got busted for trying to hack the Pentagon for nuclear codes. He's doing a couple life sentences right now; military justice doesn't fuck around . . . you know that.”

“Shit,” Marina breathed, forcing her fingers through her hair as she turned away from the screens.

Aaron spoke up then from where he stood near the door of the command truck with Kevin “Wordy” Wordsmith. “Uh, guys? How's this for a shit-fest? Who do we know with top secret security codes . . . including passcodes to weapons silos . . . in that room, right now?”

Clint bolted up from the wall, eyes wide in horror. “That's why they're separating him from the others.”

Maria's tone was horrified as she hissed, “They intend to torture him for those codes.”

“Not gonna happen,” Marina hissed, spinning on her heel and headed towards the door. “Clint, find a perch. Take Bucky and Constable Lane with you. Aaron, you and Brian are in charge of finding Misha. Natasha, you and I are taking out the terrorists in the ballroom and rescuing my son. Jason . . . get us in there without being seen. And call Marta and Vincent . . . get them here. I want Medical on-site and Sam seen to as soon as the scene is clear.”

“Yes ma'am,” the tech officer agreed, eyes wide as he watched his sister and two brothers leave the truck, with the three snipers close on their heels. Closing his eyes, he reached for a prayer Marina had taught him as a child, but he rarely called upon. “Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy will be done, on Earth as it is in Heaven. Protect this family from all enemies both foreign and domestic. And keep Will safe . . . Marina doesn't need more blood on her hands. In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, Amen.”

“Amen,” was the unanimous agreement from the rest of the family through the comms, before they slipped into battle mode.

Jason glanced at Spike, insisting, “Don’t take your eyes off the ballroom. I’ve gotta figure out a way to get everyone inside without being noticed.”

“Copy that,” Spike agreed with a small nod, turning his attention back to where Sam was still sprawled on the floor. The sight of his own Boss sitting on the other side of the former soldier was a relief and he sighed quietly. “You think Sam's unconscious?”

“No . . . but he probably took another hit to the head or the ribs. Will would have put him in recovery just be safe. But he's making small movements, and Owen is clearly responding to him. Out of it, groggy and in pain . . . absolutely. Unconscious, no I don't think so.” Glancing at him out of the corner of his eye, Jason took in the worry and concern on the other man's face. “Hey . . . Sam's gonna be fine. Marina takes names and kicks ass . . . she's gonna get him back.”

“I know. I just . . . he's my friend.”

“I don't think you know how much your friendship means to Sam,” Jason replied, with a small grin as he turned back to the screen. “Trust me, Spike. It took five minutes for the Grimms to take out Team One because they were playing. And right now? Neither Marina or Aaron are fucking around.
Sam's gonna be fine . . . I promise.”
Chapter 198: Prep and Landing

Owen could feel his comm all but burning a hole in his head. He'd been skeptical when Jason had handed them out before the Georgia Mission. In less than three months, though, he had discovered how hard it was to live without them. He wore his near constantly, as did the rest of the Misfits and all of the Grimms. Having it close was like a security blanket; even when it wasn't transmitting, the fact that it was close by if he needed help was a weight off his shoulders that he hadn't realized was there.
After taking over S.H.I.E.L.D.'s R&D department, Jason had put the lot of them through an extensive upgrade to smooth out a few bugs that only the tech genius had been able to see. Currently, the node was flesh colored and all but undetectable to the naked eye. Comfortable for long term wear, they were also easy to use without a one hundred page manual.

Glancing down at Sam, he watched in concern as the kid drifted in and out of focus. How the blond was conscious remained a mystery, though Owen didn't think he'd be conscious for much longer. Unable to force himself still any longer, the Cleaner reached up and double tapped the small device. The closest thug was at least 10 yards away, giving Owen the confidence to whisper, “Sova . . . it's Ubiytsa. Do you copy?”

There was a startled silence, before his best friend's woman breathed a sigh of relief. “Lucky . . . thank God. Are you okay? Is it safe to talk?”

“For the moment, yes. I have to be quiet though, so if I drop off the comm, I'm still here just can't talk.”

“Understood.” Marina agreed. There was a pause, before Marina and Aaron both demanded together, “How's Snayper?”

Lane's question of, “Who's Snayper?” was completely ignored as Owen prepared to give an uncomfortable report. Fingers trailed gently over the massive bruise on Sam's face, causing blue eyes to snap into pained focus for a wild moment before he slipped away again. “He's still conscious, but barely. He took another hit to the head.” He paused as he considered the younger man, before snorting quietly. “You sure Sam isn't your kid, Marina? The kid's head is granite; I can't figure out how he's still conscious.”

“That's my boy,” Marina announced, tone colored with exasperated fondness. “He gets it from Misha. As stubborn as a box of rocks, the both of them. Makes me absolutely crazy.”

Aaron spoke up next, interrupting his sister's muttered rant about stupid boys and serious injury. “Can you get his comm on, Ubiytsa?”

“If he has it in,” Owen agreed, peering cautiously down at Sam.

“He does . . . he never takes it out,” came Marina's affirmative reply.

Grunting, Owen shifted to touch the young man's shoulder. “Sam?”

A soft exhale was Sam's only indication that he was still conscious. It was several minutes before he breathed quietly, “What?”

“I need you to turn on your comm. Your Ma and your Uncle Aaron are worried about you.”

Sam's eyes slipped closed for a moment, and for a long moment the agent was worried that the kid had finally passed out. Then he shifted slightly, left hand coming up to brush shakily at his ear, index finger double tapping the comm sluggishly. He took a deep breath, holding it for a few seconds, before letting it out on a single word, “Ma?”

“Sammy . . . it's okay, malysh, I'm coming for you.”

“No . . . you have to get Dad. They took Dad.”

“I know, but you and I both know which of the two of you Misha would think was the priority.”
Blue eyes squeezed closed as he blew out a frustrated breath. “That's a stupid rule.”

“Maybe, but it's the rule that's kept this family alive for this long,” the Russian chuckled, clearly relieved her son was aware enough to scold her. “How's your head, Sammy?”

“Hurts. Took a rifle butt to the left temple.” Lips quirked at the sound of Marina's hissed intake of breath, a clear indication that she was pissed and people were definitely going to die. “Dad checked; my skull's intact.”

“Thank God for small favors,” Aaron grunted, heavy thuds coming through the comm as he took his frustration out on something – or someone – unsuspecting.

Jason chimed in then, “Guys, Medical is on site. I repeat, Tselitel and Vorona are on site.”

Vincent's voice brooked no argument as he demanded, “Sitrep, Sam.”

“I'm fine,” the blond insisted, wincing a second later as he realized he had just given the worst answer possible.

“That is not a word,” Natasha scolded fiercely, a growl in her voice Sam only heard when she was well and truly pissed off.

“Sorry . . . I'm okay. My head hurts, my ribs are on fire and I think I'm going to be taking a nap soon. But I'm okay.”

“Don't you dare take a nap right now, Sam,” Marta demanded, a clear mix of fear and concern in her voice. “You shouldn't sleep after the kind of head trauma you've sustained.”

“I don't think I'm gonna have a choice, Aunt Marty,” the blond promised, eyes fluttering as he took a deep, if shaky, breath. “I'm trying.”

Whatever the rest of the family had been about to say was interrupted as Jason spoke up, “Sova . . . I've found you and the Vdova a way in. It's hella risky, but it's completely clandestine and all but guaranteed to surprise the hell out of these svolochi.”

“How?”

“There's a vent in the ceiling of the ballroom. Only problem is that it's about two stories up . . . you'll need something to rappel down on.”

Natasha snorted hard as she argued, “Since when have we ever needed anything to drop out of a ceiling?”

“That's a crazy drop, Nat,” Clint protested, tone ice cool and detached; everyone knew from his tone that he was locked in on something with his scope, though he had yet to tell anyone what he was seeing.

Brian laughed as he teased the two women, “Fury's Angels . . . BAMF chicks.”

The red-haired Russian let out a familiar chuckle even as Marina groaned, “I'm not even going to bother threatening to kick your ass, Bri, because at this moment in time . . . you are not wrong.”

“Guys, I got eyes on Orel . . . these guys aren't fucking around.”

“How bad is it?”
“Well, they haven’t started using anything except their fists yet. All things considered, it could be worse,” the family’s best sniper replied.

“Yastreb, guide Sokol and Skopa to him. Guys, get him out before it does get worse.”

“Yes ma’am,” was the simultaneous agreement.

“Krechet, can you get me and Vdova to the vent?”

Jason’s eyes rolling was all but audible as he snarked, “I’m going to pretend you didn’t ask that question.”

Owen smirked at the laughter that came across the comms, ducking his head slightly so that the expression wasn’t noticed by the thugs wandering the ballroom. “Hey Boss-lady, do you want some good news?”

“I guess that depends on what the news is,” Marina snarked lightly.

“The General got his ass kicked.”

An uncharacteristic squeal erupted through the comms, causing Owen to cringe at the pitch. “Couldn’t have happened to a nicer asshole!”

“Agreed,” the Cleaner chuckled. Glancing down at Sam to see how he’d taken the sound, he frowned to see the younger man’s eyes closed and his features lax. “Jay, can you get vital readings on Sam?”

There was a flurry of clicking as Jason brought up the app for his comms, before reporting solemnly, “Blood pressure looks good . . . no fever . . . O2 levels are good . . . and brain activity is consistent with sleep . . . looks like he's finally lost consciousness.”

There was concern in Vincent’s tone as he insisted, “Owen, you gotta keep an eye on him. You don’t have to wake him up, just see if you can get him to respond to stimulus every once in awhile.”

Aaron’s voice was cautious as he announced, “Rub hard over his sternum every ten minutes or so.”

“Can do. I’ll keep an eye on the kid . . . you guys just do what you do, and get us the hell out of here, yeah?”

“Working on it, Lucky,” Marina agreed with a huff, a clanking sound a clear indication that she and Natasha had found the entry point to the vent system and were getting ready to get into position. “Vdova and I could be in and out. The vents are aluminum. Bri . . . you're in charge until I get back.”

“Copy that,” the second eldest Grimm agreed, his tone uncharacteristically serious and stern. “Be careful . . . both of you.”

Natasha’s tone was amused as she teased her lover, “Hey . . . it’s us.”

“Yeah . . . that's kind of what I’m talking about.”

Marina snorted as her sister joked, “What is it they say about the pot calling the kettle black?”

“Well yeah, but usually I'm around to watch your back. So just humor your poor pathetic boyfriend and be careful.”

The Black Widow’s tone was dry and sarcastic as she snarked, “The day I have a pathetic boyfriend, Bri, is the day I am going to beg you to kill him, to put him out of my misery. Okay?”

“Deal. Good hunting.”

“You too.”

“And Skopa? Take care of Orel for me when you find him, okay?”

“Can do, Sova,” the agent agreed, to which Marina replied, “Sova out.”

“All right, Grimms . . . time to get this party started.” Brian's laughter was maniacal through the comm as he all but cackled, “Let's kick some pacifist ass.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Sova - Owl (Marina's callsign)
(R) Ubiytsa - Assassin (Owen Elliot's callsign)
(R) Snayper - Sniper (Sam's callsign)
(R) malysh - kiddo
(R) Tselitel - Healer (Vincent's callsign)
(R) Vorona - Raven (Marta's callsign)
(R) Vdova - Widow (Natasha's callsign)
(R) sovolchi - bastards
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will's callsign)
(R) Yastreb - Hawk (Clint's callsign)
(R) Sokol - Falcon (Aaron/Kenny's callsign)
(R) Skopa - Osprey (Brian's callsign)
(R) Krechet - Merlin (Jason's callsign)
Hey guys, this is all in the General's POV. Seeing as he doesn't know the truth about the Grimms - or that they ARE Grimms - there's a lot of description to describe characters, as opposed to names. And he tends to use last names when referring to people too.

I hope you enjoy this chapter. It was a little difficult to get into the General's head, but it was a fun chapter to write.

Even considering this is in the General's POV, there are surprisingly still translations. So enjoy! I can't wait to hear what you think.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 199: Through Broken Eyes

General Gregory Braddock, superior officer for Canada's Joint Task Force, was fuming as he glared towards the door through which Brandt had been herded ten minutes before. It made no sense! How could a lowly colonel have a higher security clearance than he did? Apparently, there was more to Brandt than he had first realized. There was a small part of him that was grudgingly impressed by the fact, but the larger part of him was livid. First the asshole took his son, then his pride and lastly his superiority. One didn't get to the rank of general without considerable intelligence. He was going to unravel the enigma that was William Michael Brandt . . . even if it killed him.

Glancing over to where his former son lay, he glowered at the sight of Sam passed out on the floor, a massive bruise spreading across his face and into his hair. The reminder that Sam was no longer a Braddock caused rage to burn in his chest; his own son had turned his back on the Braddock name and legacy for some upstart Colonel and his bitch. Who the hell did Sam think he was? What could have ever possessed a Braddock to sign those papers?

There was a snort as he considered his thought. But then, Sam wasn't a Braddock any more. Sam was now a Brandt; maybe the analyst would have better luck turning Sam into a decent soldier. God knew he'd been a rebellious and insubordinate little shit since he was nine . . . since Amy . . .

It was as he stared Braddock realized the blond next to Sam was shifting the fucking brat closer to the wall. Hot black eyes zeroed in on the action, narrowing further at the way the soldier was shielding Sam's head. “What the hell is he . . .?”

Whatever he'd been about to say was cut off by a sudden clang from overhead. An aluminum vent fell from the ceiling, sending armed guards scattering in surprise, before it crashed against the ground with a sound like thunder. The entire room jumped at the sound, and all eyes flew upwards. Just in time to see two figures drop out one after another from the vent.

Both had free flying curls of hair, though the matte black guns they held in each of their hands proved to be their defining characteristic. The terrorists holding the room were struck dumb at the sight of them. The second's hesitation became their most costly mistake.

The General scrambled backwards as the women opened fire on the assembled terrorists, dropping men left and right. The dark haired one landed on her toes and rolled forward over her shoulder, on her feet and moving only seconds before the red haired woman landed behind her. Together, they were Death . . . beautiful, ruthless and glorious in their vengeance, cutting a bloody path through the assembled men.

The dark haired one finally stepped from the pile of bodies she had created and advanced on the now cowering terrorist leader. There was blood trailing down the curve of her cheek, though it was clear it was not her blood. A single curl hung trapped in it, the tacky substance gluing the strand to her cheek and creating a jarring reality of the kind of killer this woman was. Muddy brown hair hung around a face set with plain features and muted brown eyes. She was in no way remarkable . . . and yet, there was something about her that struck a chord deep within him. Her demeanor was leonine and predatory, eyes fixed on her prey as she prowled forward . . . stalking the asshole who had ordered him beaten.

Every inch of Braddock's body cringed away from the woman as she passed, his sense of self-preservation roaring to the forefront of his mind. This woman was a formidable one; she alone had laid waste to half of the terrorists in the room, with the redhead easily taking down the other half. There was no world in which the General wished to earn these two women as enemies.

Of course then she spoke.

“What the hell do you want with my lover?” she demanded, finger twitching against the trigger as she brought it to bear between the man's eyes.

The man stammered as he backed away, eyes wide and suddenly looking very young. “Your lover? I don't want anything from your lover!”

“Which would explain why you took this entire summit hostage, just so you could capture and then torture him,” the red haired woman snarked, arms coming up to fold over her chest as she sneered at the man. “I suggest you tell us. I can assure you the Gadyuka has a twitchy trigger finger and she is absolutely losing patience with you.”

“Gadyuka?” he asked, eyes flashing between the two women.

“They call me Viper . . . and I am about to shoot you between the eyes if you don't start talking, Conrad,” the brunette snapped, thumb shifting to snap off the safety of her pistol. “Now.”

“He has weapons codes . . . he knows the top secret locations of almost every covert operative currently in play for the United States government . . . he has access codes to weapons depots . . . information useful to me! Why wouldn't I try to take it from him?”

“Wrong answer,” was all she said, before her gun spat fire and Conrad's head snapped back, blood spattering across the velvet curtains at the back of the stage to the accompaniment of terrified screams from a collection of the hostages in the room.

The body hadn't even crumpled to the floor before the gun was stowed and the woman was dashing towards where Sam was silent and still on the floor. There was terror and concern and love in her features now, a stark contrast to the ferocious Lady of War who had stood in her place only seconds before. “Sammy!” she cried, hitting her knees next to his body. “Sammy-honey, it's Ma. Wake up, baby.”

“He's all right, Marina; he's just unconscious,” the blond promised, reaching out to squeeze her shoulder gently in reassurance.

Those eyes dropped closed in relief, before she bent to press a warm kiss to the center of the bruise on his temple. “I love you, Sammy,” she breathed, brushing tender fingers over the curve of his ear before she straightened once again. “Marta and Vincent should be here in a bit. I need to go after Misha . . . watch over him for us?”

“Yes ma'am,” he agreed, tone reverent and deferential as he watched her cup the boy's cheek in her palm. “I've got the watch. You go get the Boss.”

“I plan on it,” she growled, eyes going hard and cold once again.

She rolled fluidly to her feet, one hand coming up to touch the man's shoulder, before she strode towards the door to the ballroom. Braddock blinked as her arm came into view and the patch on her bicep resolved itself into the standard issue patch for S.H.I.E.L.D. Command. It was the combination of her name, her claim of Brandt as her lover and her ease with a gun, which finally gave Braddock his answer as to who she was. His tone was both awed and terrified as he breathed, “Marina Ivanovna Petrovka . . . holy shit, it's The Russian.”

Parker's head flashed to look towards him, as he demanded, “The Russian?”

“About five years ago, an American squad – codenamed the Brat'ya Mrachnyy – joined up with a unit of the JTF2 for a single assignment. They were headed up by a Colonel; his XO was a woman . . . to this day the unit refers to her as 'The Russian'. By all reports, they were terrifying together. Destructive, efficient, effective . . . their guys followed them into hell without question. And before the end of the mission, even the JTF2 guys were more than willing to fall in when they said jump.”

Twisting gingerly to look back towards where Sam laid, he breathed, “My God . . . my son was adopted by The Russian.”

“What does that mean?”
There was a certain resignation in his tone as he sighed out an answer, “It means I am very lucky to be breathing . . . and very lucky Brandt decided to be civilized with regards to the paperwork.”

Just then, members of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Medical department swarmed into the room, led by three doctors who instantly took in the tableau before them. One of them was Dr. Marta Shearing and Gregory watched as her eyes skittered to a stop on his face. For a long second, the General thought his sister-in-law was going to storm over to punch him in the mouth. Her face turned red and her body language tightened up like a spring, her fists squeezing hard at her side.

The man with the scarred face came up to stand at her right shoulder while another woman with mousy brown hair and pleasant features stood at her left. “Marta? You okay?”

“It's the General, Vincent . . . I can't decide if I want to ignore him or punch him in the face,” she announced on a growl, one hand coming up to fold over where the man took her arm just above the elbow.

Vincent turned to look at him, and the General recoiled to see his nostrils flare and his eyes flash yellow. “I know that cologne. It was in the kitchen, after Sam was attacked.”

Seeming to sense there was about to be bloodshed, the older woman stepped between her colleagues and the man they both hated. “I am going to insist you and Vincent head over to look after Sam. I'll handle the General,” she promised, her tone suggesting she viewed this to be an imperative sacrifice to be made on her friends' behalf.

“Thank you, Scar,” Marta insisted, gifting the other doctor with a small smile before she turned her back on her brother-in-law and jogged towards where Sam was just starting to stir himself awake.

The dark haired woman came towards him, her features set sternly as she knelt beside him. “My name is Dr. Scarlett Ross . . . where are you hurt?”

“Hello, Doctor; you're a friend of Mar. . . .” the question was interrupted as Scarlett snapped with a brisk British accent, “Yes, which means I am all too aware of who you are. You're the one who beat up our boy Sam with a shovel and left him for dead in the backyard. Thank God Vincent is what he is, or we may not have found him in time.

Leaning forward, she hissed, “Do not mistake me, General Braddock. I am a doctor, and I took an oath which forbids me from refusing medical care to someone in need of it. Doesn't mean I wouldn't like to see you dead . . . food for carrion and scavengers. I'm only here because Vincent or Marta would kill you . . . and I am entirely too fond of them both to let them rot for your miserable sake.” Flashing him her gritted teeth, she snapped, “I hope we understand one another.”

The General could see the firm resolve in her eyes, and nodded firmly. “We do.”

“Good . . . then I suggest you don't talk, unless you're giving me information about your injuries.”

“Yes ma'am.”

Her hands were brusque and quick as they roamed over his body, taking in his injuries with a detached manner than made the General wince. When she spoke he jumped, surprised she was addressing him directly. “Do you have any idea how many broken ribs Sam has? Not cracked, not fractured . . . broken.” Her hands yanked on the edge of a bandage as she hissed, “What kind of a father could harm his own child? Especially a child as amazing as Sam?” Her features twisted as she hissed, “You make me sick.”
“Take a walk, Scar,” came the order from behind them, causing the woman's head to come up. Brandt stood behind her with Petrovka; his face was badly bruised, one eye was swollen closed and it was clear the arm over her shoulders was more for his sake than Petrovka's. The two officers were silent as they took in both doctor and patient. Dr. Ross balked at the suggestion, her desire to do right by her oaths clashing with her fury at the man she was treated. Seeing the hesitation, Brandt's lips compressed as he insisted, “That's an order, Major.”

“Yes sir,” was all she said, gathering up her supplies and storming away to the next hostage in need of her help.

Petrovka's eyes were blazing in her face as she stared at the General; clearly, she needed no introduction and no explanation for the doctor's anger. Brandt's fingers visibly tightened on her shoulder as he insisted, “No killing, Marishka.”

“Copy that,” she promised, even as her eyes glared daggers in his direction.

Braddock glanced towards where Scarlett was kneeling beside another hostage, an easy smile on her face as she tended to a wound in the man's head. “She's a major?”

“She wants to be retired,” the Colonel snarked with a wry grin, glancing at the woman with a fond smile. “It's a long story, and she wouldn't thank me for telling you.”

“How do you know her?”

“She's my half-brother's girlfriend,” was all the younger man would say, his arms folding over his chest. “And in terms of her field, she's one of the best there is. She and Marta are very good friends; add in Vincent Keller and we have a Trifecta of Awesome who terrifies even the Magnificent Bastard himself.”

About then, the tall man with the scar down his cheek glanced up from where he and Marta had been bent over Sam. Dark eyes went wide as they took in Brandt's face, one hand come over to rest on Marta's shoulder and nodding in his direction when the virologist looked up. “Will!” Marta gasped, the reaction spurring the man into motion.

Brandt allowed a small smile, one hand coming up to stall the man's advance as he promised, “I'm okay, Vincent. I've had worse.”

“Not comforting,” Vincent insisted, reaching out to tilt the black eye into the light. “That's a nasty shiner. You sure you're okay?”

The analyst waved the question away indifferently, nodding towards his son. “How's Sam?”

“All things considered, he's fine. Agent Elliot is not wrong; his head might as well be granite.” Running a hand back through his hair, he huffed, “His new bruise seems to be the worst of it.”

Hot chocolate eyes slipped closed in relief as Petrovka breathed, “Slava Bogu.”

“I still want a CT scan, and some X-rays. But the skull seems to be intact and he's reacting normally to stimulus. He's gonna be fine.”

It was about then a younger version of Brandt came storming into the ballroom, two men trailing at his back. “Yo Keller!” he shouted, features set into a scowl.

The young man turned in question, eyes furrowed as he inquired, “What happened?”
“Bucky got chertov shot! Kindly convince him to get looked at please!”

Petrovka stepped forward in concern at the announcement, though Braddock couldn't help noticing she kept one hand wrapped around Brandt's body. “Tovrets'? Are you okay?”

There was a small, strange smile on the face of the man named Bucky as he replied confidently, “Yes, uchenny, I'm okay.”

The younger Brandt barked viciously, “There is a bullet in his arm. He is not okay!”

Vincent's eyes narrowed as he took in the so-called injured party. “Which arm?”

There was a deep breath in through the nose before he replied, “The left one.”

Reaching up to his ear, Brandt spoke in a brisk tone, “Krechet it's Orel; you're gonna need to get to the ballroom right now.” There was a pause as this “Krechet” replied, before Brandt continued, “The Soldat has been shot and it's in the left arm.”

Whatever was said clearly didn't need to be repeated as Bucky groaned miserably and took a seat in one of the few chairs still intact. “Sometimes, Barton, I'd like to duct tape your mouth,” he growled, glaring up at the younger man fondly.

Braddock had a moment to question the name – why the hell was the kid answering to “Barton” when he was clearly Brandt's brother? – before Barton snapped viciously, “Maybe if you would give a damn about yourself, I wouldn't be forced to tattle on you like a kid.”

“Both of you, knock it off,” Petrovka ordered firmly, features set in disapproval as those eyes swept between them. Surprisingly, there was a touch of dismay and shame in both of their faces as they looked down and away at the declaration. “How's the arm?”

“Functional,” was the only reply, the tone curt and to the point.

A whirlwind of pissed off sarcasm blasted into the room, already shouting, “Damn it, Barnes! I just gave that damn arm an upgrade! Two weeks ago! Could you please take care of it, even if you don't intend to take care of yourself! Jeez!” Glaring at the heavy uniform jacket, he ordered, “Get that thing off so I can see what I'm doing!”

Barton stepped forward to help Barnes get the jacket off, fingers confident as between the two of them they got the jacket off and tossed up onto the table. Braddock's reaction was immediate; the glint off the metal arm earned a gut reaction and the General scrambled backwards in an effort to get away from the killer known as the Winter Soldier. Brandt's eyebrow cocked upwards as he snarked, “And suddenly, I understand where Sam's reaction came from.”

“Do you know who that is?” Braddock hissed viciously, unsure where to turn the glare as his eyes rotated between the Soldier, Brandt and Petrovka . . . before landing Sam, who apparently had known who this man was and no longer had any fear of him.

“James Buchanan Barnes, war hero.” Cocking his head, Barton snarked, “You thinking something different?”

The tone was clear indication they knew exactly who Barnes was, and what he had done. And it was just as apparent they didn't give a damn. Drawing himself up as tall as his injuries could make him, Braddock hissed, “That's the Winter Soldier . . . the deadliest assassin in the world.”

“One of them, yes. S.H.I.E.L.D. lays claim to all of the world's best assassins, actually,” Brandt agreed, earning shocked looks from both Parker and Braddock in turn. Rolling his eyes, the analyst asked dryly, “Would the family assassins please make themselves known?”

Braddock choked as Petrovka, Barton, Elliot and Barnes all put their hands up, as well as the redhead who had dropped in with Petrovka and yet another of Brandt's brothers who stood at her side. “And that's not including my younger brother Aaron or Marina and Natasha's sisters, Viktorya Coulson and Veronika Belinskaya. S.H.I.E.L.D. refers to the four of them as the Merry Murderesses, so take that for what it's worth.” Crouching slowly in front of the General, Brandt offered a ghastly smirk as he insisted, “We get our hands filthy so the rest of the world can stay clean. Whatever else Barnes has done, he has proven his loyalties. And I will hear no more about it. Understood?”

Braddock glared, as he hissed, “I'm not one of your soldiers.”

“Thank God. I'd have you in the stockade every time you took a breath.” Eyes narrowed in question, before glancing over at Sam. “I just had a thought.”

“What's that, Misha?”

“Sam had a sister.”

There was an affirmative hum, before the woman supplied a name, “Natalie.”

Turning back to the General, Brandt lowered his tone to just between the two men. “You know what kind of power I now hold. The kind of resources I have access to. So let me make something very clear. I've taken Sam from you, and you'll never lay hand on him again. But if I ever find out you've laid a hand on your wife or your daughter . . .” One hand gestured toward Barnes who was glaring at the general despite the tech's examination of the metal arm. “. . . let's just say, Barnes hasn't forgotten how to make a death appear to be an accident in his time with S.H.I.E.L.D.” There was a pause, before the analyst insisted, “I hope we understand each other.”

Braddock hissed even as he replied, “We do.”

“Good.” Glancing back over his shoulder, he ordered, “Scarlett, if you would be so kind as to retrieve the paramedics. The good General should be on his way to the hospital for his injuries.”

“Copy that,” the doctor agreed, dashing across the room towards where the paramedics were waiting for the signal the scene was cleared and safe to enter.

Bracing his hands on his knees, Brandt moved to push himself up once again. He was nearly vertical when he staggered; Braddock blinked as Petrovka was at his side in a second flat. She slipped herself under his arm to stabilize him on his feet, her tone warm and concerned as she asked, “Misha?”

“I'm all right,” he insisted, eyes slipping closed for a second as he fought to regain his equilibrium.

Vincent moved forward rest a warm hand on the man's shoulder, eyes pensive as they scanned the Colonel. “All right, Boss . . . everyone else has been tended to. Your turn.”

“I said I'm okay.”

“Then you won't mind letting me take a look at you to make sure of it.”

“Come on, Misha . . . come sit with me,” Petrovka coaxed, looping her arm around his waist more fully and guiding him to a chair. Brandt sunk into it slowly, eyes still closed as he tried to force the world to stop spinning. The woman crouched in front of him, her eyes terrified as she insisted, “Misha... look at me.” It took a moment, but eventually dark gray eyes opened to meet her own.
“What did they hit you with? Where do you hurt?”

“Theirs fists, mostly.” When he stopped without going further, his Russian cocked an eyebrow to prompt him to elaborate on his answer, “One of them hit me in the face with his gun, but they spent most of their time pummeling my abdomen with their fists.”

“Why didn't you say anything?”

“It didn't hurt until just a minute ago. As soon as I crouched, my stomach let me know it wasn't happy about the position.”

“You are so stubborn,” she hissed viciously, even as she knelt up to press a warm kiss to his lips. “And just so you're aware, you're going to be sharing a room with Sam at the hospital.”

“No,” was the immediate denial, those eyes all but glaring at his partner as she glowered at him.

“Yes. You need the rest, Misha; and if a hospital stay is the only way that's going to happen, I will lay you out myself right here... right now.” When no further protest was forthcoming, Petrovka rounded on Keller. “Make it happen, Vincent.”

A small smile on his lips, Vincent nodded briskly, as he replied, “Yes ma'am.”

The Russian watched the doctor move to retrieve a gurney, before she rounded back on her partner. Brandt sat slumped in the chair, watching her with tired eyes. Forcing a smile, she vowed, “I love you, Misha.” Running her fingers over his face, she vowed, “I have the watch. You can rest.”

His hand was warm and familiar on the curve of her cheek as he watched her. Finally, he gave her a small smile as he promised, “Ya lyublyu tebya, samaya malen'kaya, vsegda.”

She all but beamed up at him as she replied, “I know.”

Forgotten by all of them, Gregory Braddock sat on the floor of the demolished ballroom, watching these two people love one another... and surprised to discover he was grieving for what he himself had had and had subsequently lost. Amy's death had ripped a hole in the fabric of who he was; in his grief, he had laid blame where it wasn't deserved. And now, almost 20 years later, he could see what that choice had wrought for him. His son was lost to him, adored by and adoring of true parents who deeply loved him. His daughter feared him, though she tried never to let him see. And his wife... his beautiful wife whom he had once loved with all the ferocity of a thousands suns... his wife had lied, and cheated, and broken, and bent to protect him and not their son.

As two separate pairs of paramedics descended on the General and the Colonel both, Gregory Braddock made a vow. He would be better... and maybe, one day, his son would call him “Father” once again.

It was about then Spike Scarlatti bolted into the room, shouting, “We have a problem.”

Chapter End Notes

Another cliffhanger? I have a bad feeling I am about to die!

Translations:
(R) Gadyuka - Viper (Marina's code name given to her by the Akademiya and the Krasnaya Komnata
(R) Brat'ya Mrachnyy - Brothers Grimm (code name for the Brothers Grimm tactical team for the Army)
(R) Slava Bogu - thank God
(R) chertov - fucking
(R) Tovrets - Architect (one of Marina's nicknames for Bucky Barnes, her mentor and oldest friend)
(R) Uchenny - Scholar (Bucky Barnes' nickname for his protégé and friend, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Krechet - Merlin (Jason Grimm's codename with SHIELD and the Army)
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will Grimm's codename with SHIELD and the Army)
(R) Soldat - Soldier (short for the Zimniy Soldat or the Winter Soldier; codename for Bucky Barnes)
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) Misha - a diminutive of Mikhail/Michael (Will's middle name is Michael; Marina's most common nickname for her longtime partner and lover)
(R) Vsegda - always
Hey guys, no cliffie today! Woohoo!

Enjoy this one! We meet Rene, and learn a few secrets about our Power Couple.

Translations at the end as always.

Chapter 200: Pleasant Surprises

Marina groaned as her Colonel brushed away the paramedics, demanding, “What kind of problem?”

Cocking an eyebrow at Team One’s tech nerd, she scolded, “Your timing sucks. Ten more minutes, Spike, and he would have been in the ambulance and on his way to the hospital.” Huffing in frustration, she sighed, “You might as well as tell him, or I'll never hear the end of it.”

“We have a kid barricaded in one of the rooms with a gun.”

Marina's eyes sharpened at the announcement, causing her lover to groan this time. “Marishka . . . no.”

“What!?” was the immediate protest, eyes wide and innocent as she rounded on her partner indignantly.

“I know you, Marina. You can't adopt the kid. He probably has parents.”

Hot chocolate eyes narrowed slightly as she considered before proposing cautiously, “If he doesn't, then can I adopt him?”

“Why are we assuming it's a boy?”

“It's my destiny in life to surround myself with darling boys who make me both batshit crazy and deliriously happy.” Smirking, she teased, “How do you think I got stuck with you?”
“That's a longer story than anyone has time to hear,” he joked with a roll of his eyes. Watching his partner for a long time, he sighed and pushed himself slowly to his feet. “Why do I feel like I'm going to be needing a bigger house?”

When her only answer was a brilliant grin, the Colonel heaved a sigh of resignation. Looking up at Spike, he insisted, “Take us to him.”

Momentarily uncertain, Spike bit down on his lower lip as a pair of paramedics appeared with a currently occupied gurney, Sam still curled up on his side under the straps. Marina reached out as it passed, smoothing her fingers tenderly through sleeping her son's hair, before she watched the gurney disappear from the ballroom. Owen touched her shoulder in understanding, before he bolted after the gurney. Reminded of her adoration for her adopted son, the bomb tech couldn't see a reason why she wouldn't be able to reach out to the terrified boy he'd found in an upstairs conference room. Gesturing back the way he'd come, he insisted, “Follow me.”

Considering the Colonel's injuries, Spike was surprised to see him jogging easily alongside his partner as they bolted up the stairwell two and three at a time. Expect for the bruising on his face, he would have never known the Colonel had been injured. Finally, he paused at the door to the conference room, nodding towards the crack in the door with a frown. “He's in there. Every time anyone gets too close, he opens fire.”

Quicksilver eyes turned silver as he demanded sharply, “At what?”

“I don't know. So far no one's been hurt. So whatever he's aiming for . . . it's not the door.”

Marina scoffed at the supposition, before inquiring, “How old, do you think?”

“Young teen at the oldest . . . probably closer to eleven or twelve. Why?”

“What kind of gun is it?”

“Judging by the bang and the holes in the plaster, it's at least a 9mm.”

“And I bet he can't even reach his hands around the grip,” was the Russian's response to this announcement, a small smile on her face as she stepped closer to the door. “Do we have a name?”

“Not yet . . . kid's not talking. I was hoping Boss would make some headway.” He grimaced as he confessed, “I'm not very good with kids. No brain to mouth filter.”

Marina smirked at the announcement, before she began to disarm right there in the hallway. By the time she'd removed all of her weaponry, she was down to just a black muscle tank, black tactical pants and black boots. Grinning up at her partner, she joked, “Wish me luck.”

Rolling his eyes, the Colonel snarked, “Just don't break a leg . . . or get shot, okay?”

“Yes sir,” she chirped, before approaching the door. “Allo, malchik . . . my name is Marina.” There was an expectant pause, as the Russian waited to see what kind of reaction the boy would have to the call. Some time passed before she spoke again. “Do you mind if I come in? I promise, I'm not here to hurt you . . . I just want to help.”

“You can't help,” was the sobbing reply, the heartbreak in his voice causing Marina's own heart to clench in her chest. “Nobody can help.”

She hummed a response, before continuing, “Do you mind if I come in, kid? It's hard to talk around doors.”
There were tears in hot chocolate eyes as she twisted to look back at her lover, both of them clearly hoping the boy would invite her to join him in the room. When he sniffled hard and announced, “Come in,” both released a relieved sigh neither had realized they were holding on to.

Sliding cautiously through the crack in the door, she slipped into the room. Her first impression of the boy was how small he was; Bozhe moi, he was a child. Cocking her head, she took him in solemnly. There was clear evidence of physical abuse in the bruises marring his face and tiny wrists, in addition to indications the child had spent a great portion of his life underfed. He had the same small and frail look to him she remembered a 12 year old Will having immediately following their flight from the Hoover Base. Eyes slipping closed as she clamped down on her temper, she took a moment to luridly curse Thaddeus Ross’ name to calm herself.

Once assured she was calmer, she allowed her eyes to slip open once again and, for the first time, saw the gun the child was holding. More accurately speaking, trying to hold. A Ruger SR9C, the 9mm was huge in the tiny child’s hands. Gifting the child with a small grin, she moved towards him cautiously. “I know you’re scared . . . I would be too. But guns make everything scarier, don’t you think?”

“My father gave it to me. Said to shoot whatever came through the door,” the boy replied, eyes focused as he attempted to adjust his grip once more.

Nodding in agreement, Marina continued to move towards him, asking, “Looks like you’re having a hard time holding it. Want me to show you how?”

“I know how!” he protested vehemently, before he sighed, “It's just too big.” Marina forced herself to stifle a grin at the small pout and glare the kid aimed at the weapon, as though it was personally responsible for its size.

“SR9Cs are built big. You would have probably been better off with a LCP 380. They’re about the half the size and a fraction of the weight, but with all the accuracy of the SR9C.” Coming to his side, she knelt slowly and reached out cautiously. “I don't think you want to hurt anyone, kid. So how about you give me the gun, okay?”

He watched her hands reach for the gun, a relieved sigh slipping from his lips quietly as she laid her hand over the barrel and flicked on the safety, before extracting it from his hands easily. She checked the weapon briefly, before slipping it into her waistband at her back. Then, with a wide grin, she plopped down Indian-style in front of the kid. “That's better.” Reaching out, she tilted his face into the meager light coming from the window as she tutted under her breath, “That bruise looks like it hurts.”

A lackluster shrug was the child’s only reply, as he jerked his chin away from her hand and turned his face away towards the wall. Once upon a time, Marina had been used to recalcitrant and wounded boys, and she drew on those memories now. Putting her hands back in her own lap, she continued, “My name's Marina . . . what's yours?”

“Enjolras,” came the response, tone dead and seething with resentment.

“That's quite an auspicious name,” the Russian informed him. “He was my favorite character in Les Miserables.”

“He died.”

Considering the book was commonly referred to as “The Brick” and was a hell of a read for even an adult, Marina felt she could be forgiven for the incredulity in her tone as she questioned, “You've read Les Mis?"

“No . . . my mother hoped by naming me that, I'd follow his example.”

Eyebrows shot upwards into her hair at the explanation, before she breathed, “Your mother's a bitch.” His expression was startled as his little face jerked around to face her. A small smirk creased her lips at the surprise in his face. “I'm going to assume you don't hear that opinion of her often, huh?”

“Her boyfriends seem to like her.”

“I'll bet they do,” she sneered, easily able to picture why that was. Placing one hand on the bony shoulder, she questioned, “Where is your mother?”

“My father killed her this morning. He left me here and went downstairs a couple hours ago.”

Recognizing certain facial features, she asked, “Your father? Is he Matthew Conrad?”

A single nod earned a small grimace, Marina well remembering the way Conrad's head had snapped back as she put a bullet between his eyes and dropped him dead to the floor. Reaching out to place a hand on his shoulder, she squeezed lightly. “I'm sorry, Enjolras . . . your father is dead.”

Another shrug before the boy replied, “He's not a good person.”

Surprised by the declaration, even still the Russian was forced to agree with the assessment. “No, he wasn't.” Reaching out, she ran her fingers through the boy's hair gently. “So I get the feeling you don't like your name.”

“Would you? If you knew the only reason you got it is because your own mother wished you dead?”

“No, probably not. But there's a reason I said Enjolras was an auspicious name. Yes, he died, but why he died is the more important part.”

He looked up at her curiously, “Really?”

“Yeah.” Shifting to settle against the wall, she cocked her head at him and asked, “Would you like to hear the story?”

“Don't have anything better to do.”

Snorting hard, Marina joked, “Oh you're going to get along famously with my son. The sass is strong in this one.”

There was interest on his face at the announcement, even as he asked, “So why did Enjolras die?”

“Enjolras was a patriot. He believed in equality and fairness for everyone, regardless of their social station, their wealth, their birth. He believed in these things so fiercely, he created a society with some friends, called the 'Amis d'ABC.'”

“The Friends of ABC?”

“Well, it was a play on words. ABC was actually a stand-in for the 'Abased' . . . the downtrodden and the looked-down-upon. He sought to improve the lives of the Abased. And he and his friends staged a rebellion to overtake the government, so they could bring about these changes. They thought the people they were trying to help would rise up to help them, but when dawn broke . . . they were the only ones there. And instead of surrender, instead of accepting defeat . . . Enjolras and his friends believed so fiercely in their cause they went willingly to their own deaths.” Nudging him lightly, she informed him, “It's based on real events, The June Rebellion of 1832. It lasted two days, June fifth and sixth.”

“So he didn't die for no reason?”

“No, he died for the best reason. Because he believed in helping others, and took that belief to his death.”

“Still doesn't take away from the fact my mother named me 'Enjolras' because she wished I would die.”

“No, unfortunately it doesn't. But it does mean the name is worth much more than just his death.”

Smiling at him, she relented and asked, “So what do your friends call you?”

“I don't have friends. My mother and her friends call me Enjolras.”

“What about your middle name?”

“My middle name's Rene.”

“All right then, Rene it is.” Moving slowly, she looped her arm around his shoulders. When he didn't immediately shrug her off, she pulled him into her side gently. “I'm sorry about your parents. Regardless of what kind of people they were, they were still your parents.”

“Guess I'm stuck with foster care now, huh?”

The Russian frowned at the resignation in the question, looking up to see her lover leaning in the door frame of the room, his arms folded over his chest as he watched them. There must have been some question in her eyes as they looked at each other, because Will nodded in agreement. Pressing a warm kiss to the child's hair, Marina asked, “Maybe not. How would you like to come live with me and my partner?”

Another shrug earned a scoff from her, as she joked, “I'd forgotten how nonverbal teenagers can be.”

At the disgust on his face, Marina burst into laughter, his tone indignant as he protested, “I'm eleven. I'm not a teenager.”

Sniggering, she agreed cheerfully, “My apologies.” Squeezing him once more, she pushed herself to her feet and offered him a hand. “It's not a perfect life, but you'll never lack for affection or for love. I promise.”

“You mean it? You really want me to come home with you?”

“I mean it. But if you have somewhere else you'd prefer to go . . .”

“NO!” was the instant protest, as the boy all but lunged back into her arms. “I want to go with you.”

“All right. We'll make it happen,” she insisted, grinning at her partner's resigned roll of his eyes. “Won't we, Mishka?”

“I'll call Legal . . . get the paperwork drawn up.” Watching the boy flinch, Will consciously kept his distance as he reported, “My name's Will. It's nice to meet you, Rene. Marina's my partner.”

Interest warred with distrust as the boy asked suspiciously, “You're not married?”
“No, but after 12 years together, neither of us are going anywhere. I'm not the kind of boyfriend to Marina your mother's boyfriends were to her. Frankly, she'd murder me where I stood, if I tried to treat her that way.”

Marina's tone was vicious as she muttered under her breath, “Bitch.”

“You shouldn't swear in front of the kid, Marishka.”

“The malchik has seen his mother murdered and knows his father is a bad man. I think swearing in front of him is probably the least of his problems.”

“Touche,” he laughed, leaning forward carefully to press a warm peck to her lips.

Marina's eyes narrowed as a wince flashed across his face when he straightened up again. “Do I have to say it? Or can you guess?”

“I'm sure I can guess. Besides, the paramedics are probably still waiting downstairs for me. And of course, far be it from me to disobey the formidable Marina Ivanovna Petrovka.”

“Your sarcasm is not appreciated,” she drawled with a roll of her eyes, before reaching out to give him a careful push towards the elevator. “Move it, handsome. You need X-Rays and a CT scan and about a week's worth of sleep. March.”

Grinning at the sound of Marina's inner officer slipping free, Will threw a crisp salute as he replied teasingly, “Yes ma'am.”

Knowing he was trying to make her laugh, she huffed around a stifled giggle. “You're incorrigible.”

Smirking, he quoted, “I aim to misbehave.”

The Firefly quote earned a small grin, at which point Marina was helpless to suppress her giggles.
“Ya lyublyu tebya, moy vozlyublenny.”

“Ya tozhe lyublyu tebya, samaya malen'kaya,” he returned, looping arm around her shoulders and pressing a warm kiss to her mouth.

Rene and Spike were both watching the couple, Rene still tucked under Marina's opposite arm and Spike holding the elevator open a few feet away. The eleven year old glanced towards the SRU officer and asked curiously, “Is that how most people love each other?”

“No, but their son tells me the Colonels are special. So I doubt they do anything you would expect normal people to.”

Huffing lightly, Marina looked up at her lover and snarked, “Remind me to have a talk with your son.”

“Why is he my son? You adopted him first.”

“He's trying my patience . . . a character flaw he clearly picked up from you.”

Will's body jolted slightly as he chuckled under his breath, a deep groan reverberating through his chest even as he teased, “I rather think we're even in that respect. Or do you not remember leaping off the roof of a two-story building and hoping you'd judged the distance right?”

“I take years off of your life, Mishka . . . not the same thing,” she bickered, even as her eyes shone with concern. One hand reached out to wrap around his waist, stabilizing him slightly on his feet as the elevator began to descend to the ground floor. “Where's your pain?”

“About a seven . . . I'll manage. Let's get the kid to the medics; I'd like Marta to look him over.”

“As long as you let Vincent whisk you before that.”

“I don't think I'm going to have much of a choice,” he agreed, fingers tightening on her shoulders lightly.

“That's the first time I think I've ever heard you admit to it before.”

“Well, they say there's a first time for everything.”

“Not the kind of first time I had wanted you to have,” she protested, guiding him from the elevator and out into the main foyer. Catching sight of Vincent standing with Marta, Scarlett and a pair of paramedics, she called, “Keller! Over here!”

Head snapping around, the doctor gestured to the paramedics before the three jogged towards them. The former soldier cocked an eyebrow at the kid, teasing, “Adopting again?”

“You hush,” she scolded, even as she hugged the boy a little bit closer. She was clearly reluctant to release her lover, eyes worried as she watched the paramedics guide him up and onto the gurney.

“Take care of him, Vincent.”

“You got it, Marina,” he promised, reaching out to squeeze her arm fondly before waving the paramedics off. “Move out guys . . . let's go.”

Rene's eyes were very blue as he looked up at her. “Is he gonna be okay?”

The Russian gave the boy a small smile as she squeezed him fondly, promising, “Yeah . . . he's gonna be just fine.”

An hour later found Sam Grimm nee Braddock curled up in his hospital bed, blankets to his chin keeping him warm and IV drugs keeping the pain in his head all but nonexistent. Though he would have liked to have disappeared from the hospital already, his S.H.I.E.L.D. partner had immediately put a stop to all ideas of escape. Groaning wretchedly, he flopped over so his back was to the empty bed on the other side of the room.

Fortunately, it was about then he was rescued from utter boredom by the exuberant arrival of his friends, Spike Scarlatti and Lewis Young, from the SRU. “Samtastic! What the hell man!? That was insane!” Spike cheered as he all but bounced into the room, a wide grin on his face as he watched the blond haired sniper perk up at the sight of them.

“Yeah . . . Ma doesn't fuck around.”

“So I gotta ask. She was just screwing with us during the paintball fight huh? If she'd really wanted to rip us a new one . . .” Lou asked, trailing off expectantly.

Sam grinned as he continued, “. . . it wouldn't have taken five minutes. More like two, maybe two and a half.”

Lou groaned at the knowledge, heading dropping back to stare at the ceiling. “You know what, your ma is hella scary and totally badass.”

“She can be,” the blond agreed as he pushed himself up into a seated position. “What are you guys
“So I have a confession to make,” Spike reported with a grimace, body language clearly nervous about whatever this so-called confession entailed.

“So I have a confession to make,” Spike reported with a grimace, body language clearly nervous about whatever this so-called confession entailed.

“Okay,” Sam drawled in confusion, glancing at Lou only to see the black man shrug in confusion. It was clear Lou was just as in the dark as Sam himself was. “Confession about what?”

Biting down on his lip, Spike hesitated for a moment before blurting, “I hacked your mom.”

“What!” Sam demanded, lightning flashing through normally icy blue eyes.

“Sarge asked me to, right after she came to HQ the first time. I hadn't met her yet . . . I didn't realize how awesome she was. So, I did it. Didn't get much, but I did find out something really cool about your parents.”

Based on the stony look on the sniper's face, whatever it was didn't really matter; Sam was pissed. “I can't believe you would betray my trust like that.”

“You're not exactly very forthcoming about yourself, Sammy.”

“Don't call me Sammy,” was the instantaneous protest, a fierce glare on his face at Lou's use of the nickname.

“See! That right there! The Colonels call you Sammy all the time; so does the rest of your family.”

“Yeah, it's a family thing,” Sam explained. “Okay, you remember my granddad?”

“Hansel Kuhn? Yeah . . . he's hard to miss,” Spike announced, eyes wide as a mental picture the Family Patriarch came to mind. “What about him?”

“He and Dad aren't exactly the epitome of affectionate or demonstrative. Granddad's given everyone in the family a nickname, and that's how he tells you he loves you. Same with Ma; everyone has a nickname and it's hers and she's the only one who can call them that.” Shrugging, he confessed, “Sammy-honey is mine . . . that and Sammichka.”

Spike snorted at the Russian diminutive, joking, “I think I prefer Samtastic.”

“Yeah, and you're the only one who calls me that,” Sam reminded him with a grin. “I don't know; it's my Ma's name for me. It's special, because she was the first one to use a name that wasn't Sam or Samuel.”

“I can respect that,” Lou agreed with a grin. “No using Sammy . . . got it.”

“Whatever; really cool thing about your parents, remember!?” Spike protested, waving away the conversation as though it was unimportant.

Smirking at the typical exuberance, Sam agreed, “All right. I'm listening. What's the really cool thing you learned about my parents?”

“Did you know your parents grew up in the circus?” the bomb tech blurted, eyes wide with excitement.

Of course Spike's excitement faded when Sam nodded in agreement. “Yeah. My ma didn't grow up at the circus, but my dad and my uncles did. When Ma took them away from the people hurting them, they joined the circus. Dad was like 12 and Uncle Clint was only 2.” Cocking an eyebrow, he asked, “How'd you know?”

“It came up when I hacked Marina's background.”

“Okay. But I already knew that.”

“Yeah, no kidding. Steal my thunder, why don't you?” the brunette pouted, as he slumped.

Lou chuckled, nudging his best friend with his elbow. “All right, Spike, Sam's sorry he ruined your surprise. Tell him the rest.”

“The rest? There's more?”

“Oh yeah,” he agreed with a wicked grin. Diving for the bag he'd set at the foot of Sam's bed, he rummaged around in the depths before pulling out a long, rolled up sheet of paper. Spike rolled the rubber band from the tube and then slipped it around his wrist for safe keeping. “Wait until you see this.”

With a dramatic flick of his wrist, Spike whipped the page open. For a second, Sam couldn't understand what he was seeing, before all at once the picture resolved itself. It was a poster for a marquee announcing the expected arrival of Carter's Circus to Prescott Valley, Arizona in October of 1987, with expected show dates running from the 12th to the 24th. And there, in vivid color was a stunning portrait of two trapeze artists. The man wore only black pants with black athletic tape around both wrists, while the woman wore a skin-tight leotard made of several different shades of green and flashy sequins.

The picture had been taken during a portion of their act, with the man hanging from the bar, ropes wrapped around his ankles and his hands locked at the back of his partner's neck. As for his partner, she held nothing, her arms stretched out to her sides and utterly trusting that his grip behind her neck would keep her safe. The pose was intrinsically romantic, the two appearing only moments away from indulging in a kiss. There was just enough of their profile for Sam to make out who they were.

Fingers tracing reverently over their faces, he breathed in shock, “Holy shit! It's my parents!”

Chapter End Notes

So, there is a circus outtake currently written, which addresses this picture and what was happening around the time it was taken. If you're interested in reading it, let me know and I'll post Part One tomorrow. It is completed, so Part Two would be up the day after that. Let me know.

Translations:

(R) Allo - hello
(R) malchik - boy/kiddo
(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God
(R) ya (tozhe) lyublyu tebya - I love you (too)
(R) moy vozlyublenny - my beloved
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for his longtime partner, girlfriend and XO, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Sammichka - diminutive of Sam (ie Sammy)
Chapter Notes

Hey guys! The circus outtake, both parts, is posted for everyone who hasn't had the chance to see it yet. As for those of you, who have reviewed, you are all amazing! The part at the beginning in italics, is the last few paragraphs from the last chapter.

My next plan for an outtake, is actually that Malee outtake I've been kicking around in my head for awhile.

Enjoy this chapter! Just the boys, hanging out. Translations at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 201:

With a dramatic flick of his wrist, Spike whipped the page open. For a second, Sam couldn’t understand what he was seeing, before all at once the picture resolved itself. It was a poster for a marquee announcing the expected arrival of Carter’s Circus to Prescott Valley, Arizona in October of 1987, with expected show dates running from the 12th to the 24th. And there, in vivid color was a stunning portrait of two trapeze artists. The man wore only black pants with black athletic tape around both wrists, while the woman wore a skin-tight leotard made of several different shades of green and flashy sequins.

The picture had been taken during a portion of their act, with the man hanging from the bar, ropes wrapped around his ankles and his hands locked at the back of his partner's neck. As for his partner, she held nothing, her arms stretched out to her sides and utterly trusting that his grip behind her neck would keep her safe. The pose was intrinsically romantic, the two appearing only moments away from indulging in a kiss. There was just enough of their profile for Sam to make out who they were.

Fingers tracing reverently over their faces, he breathed in shock, “Holy shit! It's my parents!”

A familiar voice came from the doorway, Aaron's eyebrows furrowed as he came into the room, questioning, “What's your parents?”

“Did you know about this!?" Sam demanded, shoving the poster in his uncle's direction.

A startled blink was the operative's only answer, hands reaching out to take the page with a frown. Blue eyes caught on the date at the corner, earning a pair of narrowed eyes as he looked up at Sam. “This is like eighteen years old.”

“Yeah . . . and look who's in the picture!” the blond protested, stabbing his finger gently towards the couple in the photo.

Turning his attention back to the couple, it was only a moment before Sam could clearly see Aaron fade into the background and Kenny step into the forefront of the man's consciousness. Smirking, he trailed tender fingers over what little of Marina's face could be seen. “To this day, I am shocked that none of us figured it out.”

Spike frowned as he demanded, “Figured what out?”

There was a derisive snort, as the wisp that was Kenny dissipated and Aaron took over once again. “How desperately in love with each other they were.” Running a hand back through his hair, he grimaced lightly, “King and Queen of Self-Denial . . . Will and Marina in a nutshell.”

“Ma told me once they knew where their priorities laid. They have no regrets.”

Taking a deep breath in through his nose, the assassin joked, “That doesn't make me feel any better about it.”

Sam's head came back to rest on his pillow, quietly contemplative, as Spike leaned forward, “So this is them.”

“Yeah . . . Will wasn't quite 21? He'd come home on leave, with Lucky.” Those eyes narrowed in thought, before he mused, “I was twelve, I think. Clint was almost eleven, Jason was fifteen and Barney was eighteen? Will and Barney butted heads that whole leave; can't tell you how many times Will thrashed him before he left again.”

“Thrashed him?”

“Yeah, this was the eighties. Spare the rod, spoil the child? And when you're trying to ride herd on four boys . . . it was effective.”

Lou's features were curious as he settled into a chair, clearly interested in the details surrounding the picture. “They look like they've done this before.”
“Oh yeah . . . Will and Marina got up on the bars together for the first time just after Will turned fifteen. By the time he enlisted . . . they were good. If they weren't close before that, they were after it.”

“You said he was on leave.”

“Yeah, he got hurt on an assignment in Syria . . . ambushed. He took three bullets meant for his best friend. He was on leave for like six months while he recuperated.”

“Looks pretty damn healthy here,” Lou drawled with a cocked eyebrow.

“Grimms heal fast. We're never down for long,” was the nonchalant reply. There was a pause, before he smirked, “We're already taking bets on how long it's going to be before Will manages to manipulate Marina into letting him out of here.”

Sam bit down on his lower lip, recognizing the diversion and well acquainted with the reasons the Brothers Grimm were “never down for long”. For all that Cahill had been a fucked up mess from the word “Go!”, it had its upsides. Forcing himself to nonchalance, he smirked, “How come I didn't know we were taking bets?”

Aaron's nose crinkled lightly as he teased, “We weren't sure whether or not we could trust your judgment. Ever heard of getting your bell rung, malysh?”

“Haha, very funny.” Sam huffed with a roll of his eyes that immediately earned a sharp wince. One hand came up to cradle his suddenly aching head as he muttered petulantly, “Ouch. That hurt.”

“Case in point,” was all the former NRAG assassin said with a small smirk.

It was about then that the Italian chimed in curiously. “Do they still perform together?”

“I doubt it . . . we haven't been back to Carter's Circus since Clint was sixteen. Whether they still practice together, I don't know. But again . . . I doubt it.”

Sam frowned at the thought, turning his attention back onto the poster. “They look so young.”

“They were,” Aaron agreed solemnly, though none of the other three could get him to elaborate on the subject.

It was about then, that the door to the room swung open to admit the rest of Sam's uncles and their significant others. Clint and Bucky were bickering with each other in fond Russian, while Brian was all but draped across Natasha's shoulders. Jason and Casey were last in the room, the technical specialist uncharacteristically quiet as his girlfriend cuddled close to him. Looking away from his boyfriend, Clint caught sight of his best friend and cheered, “Kenny! Dude, you missed it!”

“Missed what?”

Jason spoke up, “Will and Marina's epic smackdown.”

“They got into a fight?!” Aaron blurted in shock, eyes going wide at the very thought.

Brian's features twisted at the thought, as he insisted, “Fuck no! Diana Braddock showed up. Let's just say, the kinds of things Marina called her should never be repeated in polite company.” There was a pause, before he mused absently, “The kid's cute though.”

There was a puzzled twist between the blond's brows as he asked, “Kid? What kid?”
“Rene . . . Sister Dearest is adopting again,” Natasha explained with a grin and a wink. “He's eleven; his father was the leader of the terrorists who took the summit hostage.”

Aaron's tone was suitably dry as he drawled, “Welcome to the Island of Misfit Toys.” Narrowing his eyes at Clint, he asked, “Marta okay?”

“Yeah . . . she's with the kid. It's almost too bad that Conrad's already dead. I rather think Marina would like to kill him again . . . and this time make him suffer.”

“The kid okay?”

“Bruised, battered, underfed . . . he'll live. You know Marishka . . . feed 'em and wrap 'em in blankets . . . the Marina Petrovka Steps to Adoption.” Wrinkling his nose, the sniper teased, “Ain't that right, Sammy-boy?”

“Shut up, Clint,” Sam laughed with a grin, as he threw one of his pillows at his youngest uncle.

For a long moment, there was laughter from the three Grimms at their nephew's expense, before Aaron's voice broke through the mirth. “I'm gonna ask her to marry me.”

The room went silent so fast that Sam felt as though he was suddenly underwater. Finally, Clint blurted, “Say what!?”

“Marta . . . I'm gonna ask her to marry me.”

Brian cocked an eyebrow at the statement, intensely curious, “You don't think it's a little soon for that? I mean, Aaron, you've known each other for awhile yeah, but she hasn't known your real name for all that long.”

“I know your opinion on love, Bri . . . forgive me if you're not the first person I think of asking for advice on my love life.”

“Love is for children. I've never hidden my opinion on that. Devotion, trust and loyalty . . . those are what make a relationship work. Look at Will and Marina.”

“I do . . . and I see how much they love each other. I have never felt this way about anyone, Brian. Not Vika, not anyone.” There was a pause, before Aaron confessed, “I'm only half a man without her. I don't intend to ever let her go.”

Sam grinned as he insisted, “By all means, marry my aunt and make her deliriously happy. I'm okay with this.”

“I'm not asking permission.”

“Thank God! She'd kill us both; you for even considering that she needed permission and me for going along with that crazy talk,” Sam joked with a smirk, though the terrified shudder that ran through him was clearly not faked. “Seriously . . . you make her happy. And that is all I have ever wanted for Aunt Marty.”

Whatever Aaron would have said was interrupted as Marina guided a sleepy young boy into the room and towards the couch against the wall. Her tone was warm and maternal as she coaxed the boy along in fluent French. Before long, the child was stretched out on the cushions and sleeping the sleep of the dead. Grabbing a blanket off the end of the empty bed, Marina tucked the boy in tenderly. Tapered fingers trailed through sunny strands, before she turned her attention back onto her boys. “Allo, mal'chikov.”
“Hi Ma,” was Sam's response, echoed by his uncles' own, “Allo, Marishka.”

Blue eyes were intensely curious as they took in the sleeping child's face. There were ghastly bruises on his face, and the one wrist Sam could see had a deep purple ring around it that could have only come from a man's hand. “Is that Rene?”

“Da . . . he's a little skittish, but his exhaustion is currently overriding his nervousness. Not to mention, Marta gave him something to calm him. Your mother nearly gave him a heart attack.”

“She has that effect on some people,” Sam agreed with a huff. Diana Braddock was many things, and one of them was expert drama queen. The SRU constable couldn't even count how many times Diana had thrown an impassioned fit designed to trigger every guilty thought her only son had ever had. “What did she do?”

There was a droll tilt to Marina's lips as she sighed heavily, “I don't even want to talk it. How you came out of that house as well adjusted as you are, Sammy . . . it boggles the mind.”

Sam snickered at the answer, shifting over on his bed to give his adoptive mother a place to sit down. Marina sunk onto the mattress with relief, sinking into the open arms her son offered with a sigh. “I'm so tired,” she breathed, eyes slipping closed as Sam reached up to thread his fingers through her own curls for once.

“How's Dad?”

“There's a small laceration to his kidney; they've got him in the ER so that they can monitor him. If it doesn't resolve itself, they may have to go in to close it up. Owen and Vincent are with him. He kicked me out; Rene was starting to weave on his feet and needed to be horizontal ASAP.”

Her son rested his chin against her temple, nodding against her head slowly as she yawned. Of course, it was about then that she caught sight of the rolled-up poster. No one even thought to react before the poster was in her hands and she was unrolling it. Her first look at the picture wrung a startled gasp from her chest, and she breathed out brokenly, “Bozhe moi.”

Spike grimaced as she twisted to look at him with hot chocolate eyes shining with tears. “Where did you get this?”

“It's kind of a long story.” Glancing at the poster once again, the Italian turned back to look at the woman and asked, “That's you. And the Colonel. Isn't it?”

One corner of her lips curled upwards as she snorted quietly. “He wasn't the Colonel then . . . just a Captain.” Looking up at the bomb tech, she begged quietly, “Can I keep this?”

“Yeah, absolutely. It's yours.”

Fingers trailed over the picture as she explained, “I always wished I had a picture of this moment. It was the moment I knew without a shade of doubt that this man I loved, this man who had me in his arms, was my forever.”

Chapter End Notes

I am a sappy sap who saps. rolls eyes at self
Translations:

(R) malysh - kiddo (one of Sam's nicknames from the Brothers Grimm)
(R) Allo - hello
(R) mal'chikov - boys
(R) Da/net - yes/no
(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God
Chapter Notes

Hi all! No translations in this one. Enjoy! Still more mushy stuff, but now with Will and Hansel!

Enjoy!
The Grimm Truth

proudly hosted on photobucket
Chapter 203: Awkward Introductions

About three hours later, Sam looked up to see his dad moving slowly into the room, leaning heavily on a cane in one hand with Owen hovering solicitously behind him. Cornflower blue eyes were narrowed as they watched his best friend navigate into the room; the second the older man stumbled, the blond was there to brace him up. “This is a stupid idea, Boss,” he scolded, rolling his eyes when Will merely waved him to silence.

“This is not my first trip to this rodeo, Lucky,” the Colonel reminded his friend, smiling at the sight of both Marina and Rene curled up in their places, eyes closed and sleeping peacefully.

“I'm going to remind you of this moment, when the Boss-lady reams your ass.”

“They said to get up and walk . . . I'm up and walking. Now shut up . . . you'll wake Marina.”

Jason's features were stone as he snapped, “And last thing you want is for your girlfriend to see you up and walking around.”

At the tone, Will cocked an eyebrow at his younger brother. “Did I do something to piss you off today?”

“What the hell were you thinking? Just giving yourself up!” the tech snapped, glaring at his older brother.

“They were threatening to kill hostages. Would you have done any differently?” was the response, mercurial eyes watching his longtime Second calmly.

“That's beside the point. I'm not the central point of this family; you are . . . you and Marina both. It was stupid and it was reckless . . . there's no way you could have known we'd get there as fast as we did. What the hell were you thinking?”

Knowing his brother was more terrified than angry, Will attempted to ease his fears, protesting gently, “Jay . . .”

“No, I need to be mad at you right now, Will. So just shut up.”

Nodding in agreement, the eldest Grimm agreed, “Shutting up.”

Sam cocked an eyebrow at his uncle, before shifting to look at his adoptive father. “You okay, Dad? Ma said there was some damage to your liver?”

“Small laceration to my kidney but I'm fine. They really did tell me to get up and walk; I couldn't be alone and I needed help,” Gesturing at Owen and the cane in turn, he continued, “Ergo, I have company and help.” Taking in his son's bruised features, he asked, “How are you?”

“My head hurts, but I'm told that's normal for the kind of damage my brain has taken in the last two weeks.”

Brian snorted as he joked, “I'm getting the kid a helmet.” Of course, this prompted a wicked grin from Clint as he teased, “Make sure it's blue . . . it'll bring out those pretty blue eyes of his.”

Narrowing those so-called “pretty blue eyes” Sam growled, “Don't make me throw my other pillow at you.”
“Don't wake Marina, I'm serious. Today was a hell of an adrenaline rush; let her rest.”

Aaron frowned as he watched his sister sleep. “I remember how long she slept after Peru.”

“Yeah . . . when she crashes, she's down hard,” Will agreed, gifting Bucky with a small smile as the former killer maneuvered an armchair through the doorway and next to the bed. “Thanks, Buck.”

“You're welcome. Sit down before you fall down,” was the order from the sergeant, ocean blue eyes calm as they watched the family's CO settle gingerly into the chair.

“How's your arm?”

“I'm fine,” was the standard response, causing Jason to snort. “I'm gonna need to put it through an upgrade . . . and we gotta do something about the structural weaknesses. Those plates are a disaster waiting to happen; he got lucky. If something had really gotten lodged in there, it could have been a real mess.”

“If anyone can make it work, Jay, it'll be you,” Will promised with a small, sad smile as he watched the technical specialist fume at the both of them. Sighing as Jason's eyes narrowed in his direction, he insisted, “Would you just get it out so we can move on? I'm tired and I feel like shit.”

“You promised . . .” was all the middle brother said, causing a genuine wince to slip across the Colonel's face with a soft grunt.

“That was eighteen years ago.”

“I know . . . but you still promised. No unnecessary risks.”

“It wasn't a risk.” At the resulting protest, Will held up a hand to stall the argument in his tracks. “Jay, in all the time you've been at my side, have you ever let me down when I needed you?”

“No.”

“Has Marina?”

“Of course not.”

“Then there was no risk. I knew you were coming for me. And I knew Marina was gonna raise hell until I was back at her side where I belonged.” Reaching out to lay his hand on his brother's shoulder, he promised, “You came through, just like you always do. Okay? Don't worry about me. I'm fine . . . all this will be gone in a day or two.”

His son's eyebrows furrowed as he questioned carefully, “Am I missing something?”

Will smirked at the curiosity, before explaining, “Jay has been living in my back pocket for longer than any of the others except Marina. Jason enlisted before anyone else did; it was just the two of us for three years before the rest showed up. We were close at the circus . . . Army made us closer.”

“When he got hurt in Syria and he came home . . . I was so mad at him. He nearly died and he was so good at hiding how he felt from us; it was like he didn't even care.” Running a hand back through his hair, dark green eyes slipped closed as Jason recalled the day in question. “It was the night before he and Owen had to go back. I made him promise he'd come home . . . that he wouldn't take any unnecessary risks.” A fond glare on his face, the middle brother considered the older man for a moment, before heaving a sigh. “This is the first time in eighteen years he's broken that promise. I don't care what you say about the fact it wasn't a risk, Will . . . you got lucky.”
A self-deprecating twist marred Will's smile as he agreed lightly, “No argument here.”

Aaron leaned forward and laid a hand on his eldest brother's wrist. “Be honest, Will . . . are you okay?”

Seeming to understand this was one time his brothers wouldn't appreciate his obfuscating the truth, the Colonel nodded a sober agreement. “I'm gonna be sore for a few days. And I really don't feel like playing basketball, or baseball, or football, or whatever other contact sport we were planning on. But I'm gonna be fine.”

Grey eyes were uncharacteristically solemn, as the family's archer insisted, “Swear it.”

Taking a deep breath, quicksilver eyes shifted to take in the sight of Marina still sleeping peacefully in their son's arms. “I swear it . . . on Marina's life and happiness, I swear it.”

Both Spike and Lou seemed to understand the gravity such a vow was imbued with. Neither spoke as they watched the rest of the Brothers Grimm sag in unspoken relief. For a long moment, the room was quiet, before Brian snarked, “And on that morbid note . . . where's Dad?”

The entire room jumped as a German accented voice spoke from the doorway. “I am here, Arger.” There was an amused crease at the corner of robin's egg eyes as Hansel Kuhn moved into the room followed by his oldest son, James Doyle. “Honestly . . . I leave hyu alone for 12 hours, mein Adler, and I come back to find vas? Hyu beaten, Sam injured . . . again, mein Tochter with blood in her hair and another new grandson. Vas did I miss?”

Jason rolled his eyes as he snarked, “Do you want that alphabetically or chronologically, Dad?”

“Hyu are not as funny as hyu think hyu are, Schalki,” was the dry tone, as the former witch hunter moved out the doorway and a painfully familiar figure came into the room behind him.

The five Grimm brothers stared at yet another person with their face, though Sam's only reaction was a bright grin as he all but cheered, “Uncle Gus!”

Gus Maitland smiled at his sunny-haired nephew, pointedly ignoring the elephant in the room, as he came to the edge of the bed and rubbed a gentle hand over the kid's hair. “Malee said hi and she hopes you get well soon.”

“Tell her I said hi and thank you,” the blond agreed with a grin. “So . . . introductions are probably in order, yeah?”

“That would be helpful, yeah.” There was an achingly fond look in Gus' eyes as he looked down at the brunette sharing Sam's mattress. Bending, he pressed a warm kiss to her forehead, before taking up a cautious position at the head of the bed. “All right . . . introductions.”

Will's eyes were narrowed and curious in response to the action; internally, he sighed. The day Marina didn't garner complete adoration from the men in her life, was the day the world was coming to an end. Frankly, the Colonel hoped the day would never come. Pushing himself to a standing position, Will leaned forward carefully to offer his older half-brother his hand. “Will Brandt . . . nice to meet you, Gus.”

Gus' eyebrows furrowed curiously, the two men taking each other in and both intimately aware of the eerie similarities to be found in their physical features and outward demeanor. “You're Marina's partner.”

“Guilty,” he agreed with a possessive grin.
“She told me a lot about you. Apparently, we're a lot alike.”

There was a haunted sadness in Will's eyes as he agreed, “I don't doubt it.” A sharp blink shook the sadness away, as the Colonel turned towards the rest of his brothers. “These are my brothers – your half-brothers – Brian Joshua . . . Jason Leonard . . . Clinton Francis . . . and Aaron Kenneth James.” Grinning at the second youngest Grimm, he teased, “Don't be surprised if you hear someone call him Kenny; occasionally, he still answers to it.”

Gus' grin held a sly twist as he replied, “Marina mentioned the story was classified.”

Every instinct the Colonel had locked up as Will's eyes narrowed at the statement. It was a moment before he forced himself to relax once again. Marina was notorious for having no brain-to-mouth filter but she'd never spilled Grimm secrets before. The Colonel highly doubted she would be starting any time soon. “Something like that.” There was a curious undertone, as he questioned, “So what brings you up to Toronto?”

“I'm told it was your birthday a couple days ago. Sam and Marina invited me up, but I turned them down at the time.” Gesturing towards where Hansel had taken up a position behind and to the left of Will, he continued, “Then Herr Kuhn and Sergeant Doyle showed up and my curiosity overrode my trepidation. Then I found out Sam got hurt. From there, it wasn't hard to make the decision to come up. I threw a few things in an overnight bag and didn't look back.”

Brian laughed as he joked, “Welcome to the Family Crazy. We're not right, but at least we have fun!”

Almost in one voice, his brothers announced, “Speak for yourself, Bri!”
Hey all! Sorry about the long wait. I got a bunch of requests to see the Marina & Will smackdown of Diana Braddock, so I had to rearrange a little bit.

I sincerely hope you all enjoy this!!

No new translations, so I'm not going to put any up today. Enjoy!!!
Chapter 203: Tying Up Loose Ends

Four Hours Previous

Marta was not having a good night. Her nephew was lying in a hospital bed, eyes closed and blankets pulled over his head petulantly, as he recovered from yet another brutal blow to the head. Eyes flickering towards the tiny cubicle, Marta allowed a small smile at the sight; besides the drab hospital sheets, all she could see of Sam was a curled up lump and a tuft of sunny hair peeking out over the edges.

As for her future sister-in-law, Marina was pacing back and forth like an avenging dragon. All she'd need was smoke coming out of her nose. To this point in time, the virologist had only seen the Family Russian lose her temper once . . . it had been more than memorable. Currently, she was doing everything she could to keep Marina away from her boiling point. A low simmer was fine, but anything more was likely to cause further bloodshed.

For the moment, Marina had enough blood in her hair.

Then there was the child currently under her hands. Enjolras Rene Conrad was a surprisingly stoic child, especially considering the fact he was not frightened of the Russian. The bruises on his face and body should have caused him to flinch away from her raging. Instead, the sight of Marina's potent fury seemed to be a comfort to the boy.

Marta blinked as suddenly Marina was there, pausing next to Rene's bed with a small – but real – smile on her face as she smoothed her fingers through his hair. “How are you, Rene?”

“I'm all right. It doesn't hurt,” he promised, with a grin. Of course, his insistence was promptly negated when Marta hit a particularly sensitive bruise and he flinched widely, a sharp wince creasing his features. “Ow,” he murmured petulantly, a small pout on his lips as he glared up at the two women.

“Sorry, Rene,” Marta promised sincerely, a small smirk on her lips. “You sure you don't want something for the pain?”

A lazy shrug was Rene's answer as he replied, “I've had worse.”

Instantly the virologist's eyes darted to look at the Russian as Marina's jaw locked tight, her tone vicious as she began to swear in her native language under her breath. Though Marta didn't know the language personally, she recognized several of the words and phrases as things Aaron would say when he was thoroughly pissed off and cursing at something . . . or someone. Forcing herself to calm just long enough to press a warm kiss to the child's forehead, Marina once again began pacing the hallway between Rene's cubicle and Sam's.

Marina paused briefly at her adoptive son's bedside, bending to whisper something to the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent. Whatever Sam said in reply amused his mother, because she broke into startled laughter even as she pressed a warm kiss to what little she could see of his head. Straightening, the Russian pet his hair for another moment, before resuming her impatient pacing.

It was times like this Marta realized what a good pair the Colonel and his Russian made. She would never tell the other woman, but she always had this mental image of Marina as a disgruntled kitten. Cute, cuddly and wildly affectionate, until you did something to piss her off. At which point, watch out! It wasn't hard to take her seriously once she started ripping the flesh from your bones with her bare hands.
The Colonel was definitely the more levelheaded of the couple. It was not hard to see he held what little leash Marina would allow, though Marta was pretty sure Will would argue against the need for a “leash” at all. For the most part, Marina knew when to draw the line between patience and violence. At times like this when she was teetering on a knife's edge, however, at least her lover was there to pull her back from falling over.

Even as she focused on the Russian, the presence of her brother-in-law in a cubicle down the way was like a spider crawling up Marta's neck. Her skin prickled and her stomach churned; there was a large part of her wanting to rip into the General's cubicle and read him the riot act. Several times she'd been only seconds from doing just that, before she'd see Marina glance his way, tighten her jaw and take another rotation. Which only furthered Marta's own resolve to steer clear; if Sam's mother could keep her temper, surely Marta could do no less.

Of course, then Diana showed up. And all bets were off.

Marina's whole body locked up at the sight of her, hot chocolate eyes reaching a steady boiling point. Unless Marta missed her guess, there was actually a soft growling sound coming from the woman's throat as well. Seeming to sense his mother's disquiet, Sam stuck his head from under his covers and asked in a tone deferential to his headache, “Ma? You okay?”

The Russian gifted her son with a small smile, insisting, “I'm fine, Sammy-honey. Go back to sleep.”

There wasn't even a second's hesitation from her sister at the confirmation of who was in the room. Diana sailed past her oldest child's room, without even a glance toward the young man in the bed. Flinging herself at her husband, the older woman exclaimed loudly, “Oh Greg! I was so worried!” Her fingers reached up to caress over the bruises on the General's face, crooning gently, “Your poor face!”

It was like lighting a match to an active explosive. The reaction was all but immediate as Marina snapped viciously, “You bitch!”

Diana Braddock's features were twisted into careful horror as she rounded on the seething Russian. There was maternal censure in her tone as she scolded, “Watch your tongue! There are children present!”

“My child . . . I'm aware,” was the hissed reply, body tense and straining against the need to do physical damage to the woman in front of her. Jabbing a finger sharply into the woman's collarbone, she barked, “What about your son's face!? Your son's ribs!? The child you brought into this world that your 'poor' husband bruised and battered and left for dead!? Your poor husband!? How dare you! What about your son!?”

Marta's eyes were wide and curious, even as she slipped between the furious Viper and her sister. “Marina . . .” she coaxed, wrapping one hand around the Russian's wrist. “The hospital won't appreciate you starting a fight.”

“I'm not starting a fight. I'm asking her to pull her head out of her ass and give a damn about the child she has all but abandoned.”

Diana's lips curved into a sick smile as she turned her attention on her younger sister. “Marta . . . I didn't know you were here. How's Gregory? Will he be all right?”

The virologist clamped down on her own fury, knowing someone needed to keep Marina in check until the Colonel was able to take up the responsibility once again. “Frankly, Di, I don't know. I'm not his doctor . . . and considering everything, you don't want me to be.”
“Why wouldn't I want you to be his doctor, Marta . . . you're family.”

“We're not anything,” was the cold reply. “You looked into my face and you lied to me, Di! You swore to me the day I came home; Gregory would never lay another hand on Sam and he'd never laid a hand on him prior to that point. And I believed you! Like an idiot!”

Diana's eyes rolled as she huffed, “Oh please, Marta . . . you're hardly an idiot.”

“That's not the point!” was the anguished cry, eyes wide and horrified at the disdainful look in her sister's eyes. “Your husband beat your SON with a shovel, Diana . . . a shovel! Sam could have died, if we hadn't found him in time.”

It was about then a pair of orderlies arrived, interrupting whatever the elder Shearing sister would have said. “Dr. Shearing, we've got Constable Braddock's room set up. Can we take him up?”

Nodding once in agreement, Marta glared at her sister for a moment in clear warning, before moving to Sam's side. “Sammy?”

“Yeah, Aunt Marty?” he asked quietly, eerie blue eyes flickering towards where both of his mothers were glaring at each other savagely. Except for the Colonel's rule about killing civilians, Sam would have been worried his adoptive mother was going to snap his mother's neck.

“We're gonna move you upstairs for overnight observation.”

Eyes flickering again, he asked quietly, “Are they going to kill each other?”

There was a real smile on Marta's face as she promised, “I'll make sure Marina doesn't wring her neck.” Laying a hand over his, she insisted, “Take it easy. We'll be up to see you soon, okay?”

“Kay.”

Once the bed had cleared the doorway, Marina stepped to his bedside, laying a gentle hand over his. “I'll be right behind you, okay?”

“Thanks, Ma.”

“You're welcome,” she replied with a small grin, leaning over and pressing a warm kiss to his cheek. “Get some rest.”

“Yes ma'am,” he teased, twisting his hand under hers to squeeze her wrist for a moment before the orderlies took the bed away.

Diana's silence was palpable, and Marina's jaw was locked tight as the elevator doors slid closed with no acknowledgment from the woman to her injured son. “What the hell is wrong with you? That was your son! And you couldn't even be bothered to say hello!”

There was a long moment of silence, before the Generals' wife declared, “I have no son.”

Marina flinched at the announcement, before she rolled her eyes. “Technically, he's your son until the paperwork is filed. So yes . . . you have a son.”

“No . . . I don't.”

Marta's eyebrows furrowed at the calm confidence in her sister's features, one hand reaching out to stall Marina's furious diatribe in its tracks. “What are you talking about?”
“We found Sam on our doorstep when he was two days old. Just a baby wrapped in a blanket, left behind with a knock at the door and a note with his name,” Diana explained, tone deadly serious. “We were desperate for a child . . . we couldn't conceive. And there he was, a child of our own.”

The virologist's chin lifted as suddenly pieces began to fall into place. “Then you got pregnant with Amy.”

“She was our miracle child . . . our dream come true. She was perfect. And then Sam got her killed.”

Marina lunged forward, barking, “It wasn't Sam's fault! He was 9 years old and he was doing everything right! The driver was drunk and he jumped the curb . . . there was nothing Sam could have done.”

The look on Diana's face was cold and absolute as she snapped in reply, “He could have taken her place. He could have died instead of her.”

Needless to say, Marina was pissed and determined to make sure both Diana and Gregory Braddock knew it.

Brian and Natasha materialized in the hallway first, drawn by their sister's rage, with Casey, Jason, Clint and Bucky drifting in barely moments later. As they wheedled the story from Marta, they began to cheer their beloved Russian on. Even Marta was rooting for her, a wide grin on the younger sister's face at the terror slowly stealing across Diana's sneering features.

By the time Marta saw Owen pushing Will's wheelchair back into the emergency room, Marina had been yelling at the other woman for twenty minutes. As near as the virologist could guess, there had been ten different languages, at least a dozen different swear words in each language, and more than once one of Marina's boys had had to prevent her from snapping the woman's neck with her bare hands.

The pain from his injuries was clear on the Colonel's face even as he boomed, “Stand down, Colonel!”

Marina's training caught up in less than a second, and her jaw practically clicked as it snapped shut. The sudden silence was deafening, Will's eyes blazing colorless gray as he looked from his brothers to his partner to the Braddocks. Finally, he turned to Marta and demanded, “What the hell is going on in here!?”

Glancing toward Marina and seeing the woman was more than arm's reach from her sister, Marta took a deep breath and confessed, “Diana was informing Marina that it should have been Sam who died all those years ago, not Amy.” A sheepish grin curved the scientist's lips as she drawled casually, “Marina was making her opinion known on the matter.”

There was a soft snort of laughter from the Colonel as he snarked, “Loudly and forcefully, I see.”

“That about covers it,” Marta agreed.

Those eyes shifted to Marina's face. Whatever passed between them was unspoken, the Russian's body softening submissively as she moved to take her place at his right shoulder. Her left hand, with its glittering mosaic opal, lifted to fold over the point of his shoulder, these two guardians of their son's happiness clearly united in their disdain for the woman before them. Marina's thumb moved absently against the t-shirt clad shoulder as Will took her in. “So . . . you're Diana Braddock. I would say it's nice to meet you, but I lie to people for a living. I try to avoid it outside of work if I can manage to.”
Diana blinked at him, clearly surprised by the statement. She blustered for a moment, before clicking her jaw shut up with an audible click. “And who are you to speak to me so disrespectfully?”

One corner of Will's lips quirked upwards as he replied, “According to the paperwork your husband signed this morning, Sam's dad.”

Scoffing, she huffed, “I wish you luck with him. Insolent, disrespectful... you'll regret the decision to take him as your own. Trust me.”

Marina's jaw tightened as she prepared to leap to her adoptive son's defense. Surprisingly, it was Rene's voice which rang through the room. “You're a terrible mother.”

The General's wife stared at the resolute child in shock, before snapping, “I beg your pardon? This is an adult conversation, you little brat. I would suggest you keep your mouth closed around your betters.”

The Colonel could all but see the steam coming out of Marina's ears, a small smirk on his lips as his partner geared up to rip into the woman once again. That smirk burst into a full out grin as Rene dashed up to her, kicking the woman square in the shin before bolting behind Marina for safety. Diana screeched at the action, her eyes blazing as she made an aborted lunge for him. The Russian's features were implacable and murderous as she placed herself between them. “I would seriously rethink that action, if I was you.”

Seeming to realize the assassin was not an adversary to tangle with physically, the other woman changed tactics. Her tone was a vicious hiss as she hissed, “Watch yourself child. I can have you thrown into the nearest group home so fast your head would spin.”

Rene's blue eyes widened in horror at the statement, body recoiling backwards away from the General's wife. Marina's arm came around him immediately, locking his trembling frame to her hip, as her lover roared, “You heinous bitch! How dare you!?”

Will's eyes were blazing as he shoved himself onto his feet, stalking up to her. “There is no world in which you would ever get close enough to try. And if you ever make a threat like that towards a member of my family again, I promise you... you won't like what happens next.”

Behind him, he could hear the plaintive question as Rene appealed for reassurance. “Can she do that? Can she take me away from you?”

Marina's tone was firm and warm as she smoothed her fingers through his hair. “She could try... but Misha and I will never let you go. You're ours now, I promise.”

The Colonel was barely paying attention of the General or his wife, attention firmly attuned to the soft sobs that had overcome the child behind him as Marina tried to soothe him. There was silver fire in his eyes as he rounded on the woman, causing her to scramble backwards in response. Just out of arm's reach, Will was acutely aware of his brother's girlfriend watching the confrontation between her sister and her chosen family. Glancing at the virologist, he gifted her with a tight smile. “Can you give him something to calm him down?”

Nodding, she choked out, “Absolutely. I can give him a mild sedative, if you want me to.”

There was a sharp nod in her direction as he gave his permission, before he turned back to where Marina had sunk to the ground and pulled Rene into her lap, humming to him softly as she stroked her fingers through his hair. The child was clutching at Marina's shirt desperately, his pleas quiet whimpers as he begged, “Don't let them take me. I don't wanna go. I wanna stay with you.”
Dropping carefully to his knees, Will reached out to cup the child's cheek and drew his attention away from where Marta was approaching with the sedative. “We're not going to let them take you, Rene. You're gonna stay with us.”

“Promise?” he demanded tearfully, flinching as the needle made its way into his skinny arm.

“I promise. We're going to keep you forever.” The couple sat for a long moment together, easing Rene down from his panic. Once he was calmer, and nearly on the verge of sleep, Will grinned up at his partner. “You're probably going to want to get him horizontal pretty quickly.”

Her lips quirked as she agreed, “And preferably before he passes out, yeah?”

“He's little, but I think even you would have a hard time carrying him up to Sam's room by yourself.”

Her face twisted into a look of mock affront as she protested fondly, “I'll have you know I am badass awesome. I could totally carry the kid by myself.” There was a pause as her lover grinned at her, before she huffed and admitted grudgingly, “But doesn't mean I want to.”

Leaning forward, he cupped her cheek in his palm as he pressed a warm kiss to her pouting mouth. “I love you.”

“Of course you do . . . you are a smart man,” she teased, her fingers tracing over his features fondly. “Are you coming up with us?”

Vincent spoke up from where he was standing with Marta, mouth twisted slightly as he gave them the bad news. “Actually, the Colonel is gonna be hanging out with us down here for a bit longer.”

Marina's eyes went sharp instantly as she straightened, focus firmly on the doctor's face. Her tone was scared and brittle as she demanded, “What's wrong with him?”

“The MRI shows a small tear in his kidney. It's probably nothing, but I want to keep an eye on it for a little bit. In a couple hours, we'll go get another MRI and see how it looks. If it gets worse, we'll need to go in and seal it up. But I'm hopeful it won't be necessary.”

The indecision was clear on her face; Marina was torn between her newfound son and her longtime partner . . . both needed her, but she could only be in one place at a time. Fortunately, her lover made it easy for her. Two fingers came up and beckoned Owen over to them, the Colonel accepting the hand the Cleaner offered and the steady pull to his feet. “Rene needs you right now, and I know you wanna go check on Sam. I'll be fine. Vincent's going to take good care of me, and I'll have Lucky here if I need anything.”

“Misha . . .” she protested quietly, even as her arms tightened around the sleepy child in her arms.

“I will be just fine, Marishka. Go . . . take care of our sons.”

Nodding, Marina accepted Owen's assistance to her feet, the two steadying Rene as the child leaned heavily against his new foster mother. “Are you gonna be okay getting to Sam's room by yourself?” was the concerned question from her partner's best friend.

“I'll be just fine, Lucky.” Twisting to look at Will over her shoulder, she promised, “We'll be waiting for you in Sam's room.”

“I'll see you there,” the man promised, letting the two doctors fuss him into a bed and under the covers.
Leaning Rene against Owen for a moment, Marina dashed to his bedside. Cupping his cheeks between her palms, she bent to press a long, passionate kiss to his lips. When at last they parted, both were breathing hard. Quicksilver eyes searched hot chocolate ones for a momentary eternity, before the Russian gifted him with a brilliant smile, promising, “Lyublyu tebya, Mishka.”

“Vsegda, samaya malen’kaya,” he promised in return, smoothing a strand of hair away from her eyes. Nudging her away, he insisted, “I'll be fine. Go . . . I'll see you soon.”

“You'd better,” she insisted with a worried frown, before returning to retake Rene from the Cleaner. Gripping the man's arm, she begged, “Take care of him.”

“Always,” he promised, something intimate and knowing passing between these two. Both loved the Colonel and both had sworn eternal loyalty; only one would ever have Will Grimm's love in return and they both knew it.

Smiling at him, she squeezed his wrist briefly, before coaxing Rene away from the emergency room, her partner and the Braddocks. She was anxious to check on Sam, to verify for herself he was all right. Hopefully, the pain medications would have started their work and her older son would be more coherent when she arrived in his room. Also, Rene was getting increasingly languid by the moment, leaning against her more and more. The sooner he was horizontal, the better off they both would be.

Both the Colonel and his best friend watched her go, before Will rounded to face the Braddocks once again. The two had been watching the interaction between the two Colonels curiously, and Diana couldn't help her flinch as the man leveled his fiercest glare on her countenance again. “I am only going to stay this once. Stay away from my family. Sam is ours now. Rene is ours now. Marta is ours now. You threaten my family . . . you harm my family . . . you ever lay another hand on my family . . . and I'll drop you both into the deepest pit I can find and rejoice in your screams as I leave you there to rot.”

Diana protested indignantly, “I never laid a hand on Sam!”

“No. you just let your husband do it for you,” was the snarling reply from Vincent, those eyes flashing beast yellow as the doctor fought to keep his temper.

Glancing at Owen in a clear admonition to get the doctor away, Will turned back again. “Do not test me, Diana . . . I assure you. I am not a good man. And I don't give a damn about what sins you have or have not committed. All I care about is the safety and the happiness of my sons, my partner, my brothers and my family. Your miserable, worthless carcasses mean jackshit to me.’’ The smile he gave her was cold and brittle as he inquired casually, “Do we understand each other?’’

Gregory's eyes were wide as he caught his wife's gaze, the two clearly exchanging some thought between them. Turning back, the General agreed, “We do.”

“Good . . . then I hope you'll understand I mean no offense when I say, I sincerely hope we never meet again.”
Chapter Notes

Enjoy! We're heading towards a time jump soon, so this arc will soon be over. In the meantime, enjoy this one! It's meltingly adorable. :D

No translations this time, surprisingly.

Chapter 204: Romance is Subjective

Sam's hospital room was chaos. The arrival of Gus Maitland had sent Will's younger brothers into a tizzy, and all four of them were quizzing the older man about his life to that point. Tired and sore, for once the Colonel let them have their heads, unwilling to step in and mitigate the boys' excitement and enthusiasm. After performing the introductions, a suddenly tired Sam had hunkered down in the lumpy bed with Marina, mother and son curled up together like tadpoles as they dreamed. Rene was as still as death on the couch, still soundly asleep; his waking was not looking likely any time soon.

Owen was leaning up against the wall behind his best friend, keeping a steady eye on his boss and his boss' brothers. Even the appearance of yet another Grimm didn't phase him; he'd known the Grimms for entirely too long to be shocked anymore. There was a vivid memory of Will running through his brain, one of a much younger Captain hobbling around on a cane, with a bullet fragment moving around behind his knee and pint-sized brothers demanding every second of his attention. Some things at least hadn't changed; Clint and Kenny were older, but there was no mistaking the clear adoration, or the worried concern, on their faces when they thought Will might not be looking.
For his part, Gus seemed to be holding his own against the combined might of the younger four Brothers Grimm, a monumental undertaking to be sure. He visibly shied away from any questions pertaining to his life as firefighter, but had ready answers about anything else they asked. The look on Casey's face when Jason asked about Malee, and was told that the “teenager was sorry she hadn't been allowed to come”, was beyond priceless and Will snorted hard on a laugh. She sent him a withering glare that barely phased him. Huffing, she rolled her eyes as she conceded that the Colonel had probably stared down much worse that a paltry glare from her, including his own pissed off reflection; his resting bitch face was not for the faint of heart.

Finally, everything froze as a soft murmur escaped from the woman stirring on the bed beside Sam. Will moved to get up, before Owen's hand landed heavily onto his shoulder and kept him seated. Frustrated that such a simple thing had laid him low, the Colonel leaned back in his chair and watched as Marina came slowly awake. Those hot chocolate eyes blinked open, a small smile curving up her lips at the sight of her oldest son quiet and peaceful next to her, before she pushed herself up carefully. There was an endearing fuzziness to her gaze as she looked around, before landing on her lover's face. Immediately, the Russian was on the move, crawling from the bed and into his lap, cuddling up under his chin and purring as she burrowed into him.

Marta's voice was amused from the door as she laughed, “Well, if I didn’t think that Marina was just a big kitten before, I do now.”

Will's fingers were warm and soothing in his partner's curls as she nuzzled her nose into the hollow of his throat. “Maybe, but even so, she's no house cat. This kitty's got claws . . . big ones.”

“I can hear you, you know,” she growled, before hunkering back down with another long purr as Will scritchted fondly at the soft skin behind her ear. Giving up the argument before it had even really begun, Marina melted into her lover's embrace, conceding with a quiet, “Meow.”

Clint's grin was huge as he teased his sister, “Could you just pick an animal and stick to it? Mother hen, scary kitty, deadly viper, wise owl . . . geez, Marina . . . greedy greedy.”

Giggling at the joke, she swiped at him fondly with soft fingers, mimicking a kitten's playfulness. Marta and Vincent came into the room then, Catherine wrapped up in Vincent's free arm as Marta came over to take her accustomed place on Aaron's knee. “So, the gang's all here, I see,” Cat joked, eyes widening slightly at the sight of yet another Grimm, though she said nothing about Gus' unexpected arrival.

Vincent shook his head, even as Hansel spoke up, “No . . . we are missing three.”

“Who?”

“Daryl . . . Daryl, Carol and Sophia,” was the solemn response from Jason.

At the names of the missing, Marina withdrew slightly from her lover's arms and twisted in his lap to take in the room. Unconsciously, she began to count her boys, before blinking as she realized that she had counted one too many. Eyebrows furrowing, she went back and started to check eye colors instead, before her eyes flashed wide in surprise. “Gus!”

“Hi Marina,” he greeted her, watching as the woman sprang to her feet and all but leaped to hug him.

The embrace was awkward but warm, Gus patting her fondly on the head as she squeezed him for a moment. When she finally released him, she was practically vibrating with happiness. “I didn't know you'd come. When did you get here?”
“Hansel and Doyle came to get me; then I found out Sam got hurt and I agreed to come back with them.” Shrugging sheepishly, he explained, “Besides, it was Will's birthday and he is my kid brother, right?”

“One of many,” Marina agreed with a grin. “And that's going to take some getting used to; Misha having brothers who are older than him.”

Doyle grinned from where he was sitting on the floor between Scarlett's knees. “I don't think much is going to change there. He's Boss . . . he outranks my ass several times over. And frankly, half the time, I can't remember what I had for breakfast let alone how to manage a family like this one.”

“Agreed,” Gus laughed, rubbing his fingers sheepishly over the back of his head. “Although, I haven't had a rank since I left the station house.”

Marina's eyes narrowed at the statement; the sight of her all but biting her tongue was one seen by everyone in the room. There was a tense second as everyone waited to see what would happen next, before the Russian waved the statement away and asked the more important question. “Where’s Malee?”

“At home. Her mother wouldn't let her come.”

Unable to hold in her curiosity for a second more, Casey burst out, “Who the hell is Malee?! Is she your daughter!?”

Gus burst into laughter at the question, his head shaking firmly as he replied, “She's a friend.”

“You're friends with a teenager?”

“Almost teenager. She's not quite 13,” Marina explained with a grin. “She's a sweet girl. As soon as she's got a college degree, I am going to hire her so fast her head will spin.”

The youngest Prototype grinned as he was suddenly reminded of something the girl had made him promise to tell the Russian when he'd left. “I almost forgot. She's making her mother teach her Chinese.”

“Her mother? Wasn't it her father that she got her Asian genes from?”

“Yeah, but apparently her mother studied abroad in Beijing in college; that's where she met Malee's father.”

Grinning broadly, Marina let out a soft cheer at the news. “Well, I did tell her to learn a couple languages and become a total badass.”

“She is already counting down the days until she can call you. I'm not even kidding.”

There was a wry chuckle drifting from the Russian as she agreed, “I don't doubt it.” Winking, she teased, “She adores you, you know.”

“I am aware of her crush,” Gus sighed, running a hand back through his hair. “She's a little young for me, don't you think?”

“Age is just a number. For some, it doesn't even matter,” Marina reminded him, twisting to look up at her lover pointedly before turning back to the former firefighter. “She's been through a lot, and she knows her own mind.” There was a small shrug, as she insisted, “She'll probably grow out of it, but in the meantime, don't crush it. Okay?”
“She's my only friend . . . I'd never do anything to hurt her.”

Whatever Marina had been about to say about that was interrupted, as Aaron spoke up then. “Marta, I've been doing some thinking.”

His girlfriend's features twisted at the statement, her body shifting a little bit so as to bring his face into view. “About what, Aaron?”

“Us.” There was a pause, before he stated calmly, “Marry me.”

Marta's eyes practically popped out of her head at the statement, her whole body going still with joyous shock. Clint's tone was acerbic as he muttered to his own boyfriend, “Clearly, Kenny needs some remedial lessons in romance.”

The family bomb tech smirked at the statement, even as he replied, “I may not be overly romantic, but I know Marta. She's not a fan of roses, or diamonds, or flowery speeches, or candlelit dinners.”

The woman's features softened as she took him in, leaning into his fingers as they came up to trace hearts over the skin of her cheeks. “She much prefers facts, hypotheses, tangible evidence. And that's what I'm offering.”

Looking up at her, blue eyes caught dark brown, as he cupped her cheeks in his palms. “The facts are this. We're good together. And I love you. I would therefore hypothesize that our marriage would be a happy and fulfilling one for the both of us, filled with love and laughter and children and more family than we know what to do with. And what more tangible evidence of our devotion to each other do we need? We've been hunted by the government we swore to serve, we've rescued each other time and again, you protected me from my worst fear and I protected you when you needed me most. I would do anything for you, and you will never want for love, for affection, for anything. I swear it.”

Finally, there was a small half-smile in the corner of his mouth. “Marta Ann Shearing . . . love of my life . . .” pausing, bright blue eyes searched hers for a mere moment, before he implored her once again, “. . . marry me.”

The entire room waited on pins and needles for the virologist's response, watching her watch her boyfriend steadily. When at last she spoke, they had been listening so hard for the response, they nearly missed it. A soft, shy smile curved her lips as she brought her hands up to hold his own against her face, her tone a mere breath as she replied, “Aaron Kenneth James Grimm . . . yes, I will marry you.” Grinning against his mouth as he suddenly kissed her, she shifted her hands to his own face and gave back as good as she got. When at last they broke for air, she rested her forehead against his and vowed, “I'm yours . . . forever.”
Hey guys, I am soooo sorry about the long wait. I'm building a dollhouse for my 4 year old little girl for Christmas. And I gotta tell you, Christmas is creeping up on me a lot faster than I would like. But here's a new chapter, and I'm working hard with my betas to get the details sorted out for the next one.

Credit goes to Julorean for bashing my head on right with the Fury appearance. He is a Magnificent Bastard and refused to go quietly onto the page. Her little snippet was a big help, as it allowed me to revised it and build it into what i needed it to be. Thank you Jules! For more than one reason (you know why! XD XD)

Enjoy this. No real translations, except for the usual ones. Please leave a comment and let me know what you think.

Also, I am opening commissions once again. So if you would like a ficlet - in or out of this universe- let me know via email. Brittanymoody1275@yahoo.com

Enjoy!
The Grimm Truth

proudly hosted on photobucket
Chapter 205: The End of Vacation

As a rule, Nick Fury preferred not to interfere in the personal lives of his agents, assets and soldiers. Involvement was inevitably messy and not a little chaotic. There were exceptions, of course, but they were few and far between. And even the exceptions required a damned good reason.

Preventing the World's Deadliest Viper and her long time co-conspirator, the Left Hand of God, from enacting their decade's long plan for world domination, just so the Gadyuka could wipe two civilians from its face? That was a Damned. Good. Reason.

Sam Grimm nee Braddock was a hell of an asset, a good sniper and a better man than most. His devotion to the Grimms –specifically Will and Marina – was more than admirable, and Fury at the very least could admit to himself, Sam was a good son to his adoptive parents. It was a shame neither of the Braddocks appreciated the gift they had been given.

Braddock really shouldn’t be so full of himself, Nickolas Fury thought as he picked the lock on the general’s home. The electronic skeleton key had already deactivated the security system, of course. SHIELD had devices for dealing with regular locks too, but sometimes you just wanted to do it yourself.

Fury was a shadow among shadows, moving soundlessly through the house as he made his way inside. A particularly robust cabinet in the Braddocks' living room earned his attention and he smiled at to know he had more than enough time to enjoy a drink before the Braddocks themselves returned home from the hospital.

Currently, he was seated at their formal dining table and sipping on a snifter of expensive brandy. Watching the light play through the liquor, Nick was forced to concede at least one thing in the General's favor. There was no doubt Gregory Braddock was an exceptionally shitty human being, but he did at least have good taste in liquor. He even kept a box of chilling stones in his fridge so ice didn't dilute the alcohol and ruin the purity of the flavor. The sound of approaching footsteps only increased his delight in the alcohol, a small smirk on his lips as he savored the coming confrontation.

The door opened and before long the married couple jolted to a stop at the sight of him from where they stood in the doorframe to their dining room. Braddock gaped at him for a moment, before letting out the expected roar. “Who the hell are YOU!?”

“Someone you don't have the security clearance to know about,” Fury replied, shifting his combat boots from where they had rested on their mahogany dining table. "VsNicholas L. Fury, Director of the Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement and Logistics Division.” The bewildered look on their faces caused a small smirk as he continued, “S.H.I.E.L.D.”

At the way her mouth dropped open, his small smirk became one of his trademark shark's grins. “Yes, Mrs. Braddock, that S.H.I.E.L.D.. The very same organization which employs your former son . . . and Agent Marina Petrovka.”

There was visible horror in Diana Braddock’s face as she finally caught sight of the muddy prints Fury's combat boots had left on her otherwise immaculate table. There was always theory suggesting her face typically looked like that. Considering what he’d been told about the woman's personality, it was a possibility. With his characteristic disregard for stupid, Fury resolved to ignore her.

“Frankly, I'm surprised to see you breathing. By all reports, you have achieved something no one else in this world has managed. You have successfully pissed off the Viper, and by extension, her family . . . and stayed alive. Congratulations.”

Clicking his tongue against the roof of his mouth, he swirled the liquor around the bottom of the glass. “Agent Petrovka is one of the best agents I have, and I don’t like seeing her upset. Bad things happen and a lot of people tend to die when she's pissed.” Taking a luxurious sip, he continued, “Since you've manage to survive her formidable wrath for the moment, allow me to offer you some free advice. Stay away from the Grimms . . . Sam included. They are extremely hazardous to the health of anyone they don't like.”

Pausing for a moment, he chuckled as he considered what he'd just said. “And I promise you, they really don't like you. She’s taken Sam for her own, with an ironclad and unassailable adoption contract. I will remind you, you both have signed that contract and it restricts you from coming anywhere near him ever again. There’s no way you will ever get your son back.”

Tossing back the dregs from the glass, Fury gave the couple another shark's grin. “I'll admit, I had a hell of a speech prepared. From what I hear, though, Marina already gave you an earful. Not much more I can add to that.”

Gathering up his coat, he pulled it over his shoulders and moved towards the door, the leather swirling around him dramatically. Pausing in the jamb of the door, he twisted to look back at them with a frown. “If you cross her again, you can’t say you weren’t warned. To be frank, I’d rather not deal with the clean-up. So, for your own sake, stay out of her way and steer clear of the family.”

With these final words of warning, Nick Fury rotated on his heel and saw himself out, coat flaring out behind him. Both Braddocks dashed to the door, surprised to see he was already gone, having disappeared as quickly as he had come.

********************

Considering the first part of their Toronto vacation, it was understandably a shock when the rest of the trip passed relatively uneventfully. There were a few bumps in the road, of course, but for the most part they were manageable problems. Will may have been feeling all right initially, but all it took was a single night's rest for his whole body to stiffen up like a two by four. As a result, he preferred to let the rest of the boys rough house to their heart's content, while he cuddled with Marina wherever they happened to be; at the park during a family picnic or on the couch during movie nights at home.

As for Gus, he settled into the place Marina had carved out for him uneasily. The boys accepted him readily enough, more than willing to embrace his arrival. It was quickly apparent, however, that the painfully shy former firefighter seemed to prefer lingering on the outer edges of the family. Both members of the family's Power Couple were content to let him ease in at his own pace, effortlessly running interference on some of the more . . . enthusiastic . . . members of the family.

Rene and Sam got on like gasoline and a lit match, though which was which was cause for considerable debate. Most of the time, Sam seemed to adore his new little brother, with 11 year old Rene emerging rapidly from his shell around the 27 year old. Then there were the times Rene could light his older brother's temper like nothing else Marina or Will had ever seen. Even Barney hadn't managed to cause explosions from his brothers like the ones Rene could coerce from Sam.

Part of it was both Sam and Rene were borderline obstinate. As a matter of fact, on more than one occasion, Will's brothers had been heard to tease Marina about whether or not she was sure Will had never had children. Sheer bullheadedness was one of the Colonel's defining characteristics and each of his brothers were convinced he would one day pass it on to his own children. The other part of it was Rene had no sense of self-preservation, which led to his taking unnecessary risks . . . which infuriated his risk-taking, adrenaline junkie big brother. It never failed to make Marina snicker a little; served her Sammy right to get a little taste of his own medicine.

Either way, flashes of raging temper aside, the two adored each other. Once Sam could stand up without feeling like the world was tilting on its axis, they were often found in the backyard with Vincent and Catherine, the three adults playing all kinds of games with the eleven year old.

Before long, though, it was the last day before vacation came to an end. Marina spent the whole day in the kitchen cooking, loading Sam's freezer with foods he enjoyed so he would eat. Though Sam wasn't Will's biological son, they were very much alike; both of them were terrible at remembering to feed themselves. With any luck, that would change if his options were all of the things Marina made that her eldest son liked best.

Though he'd never admit it, Sam wasn't looking forward to having his best friends leave Toronto and over the last few days had tried to spend as much time with Vincent and Catherine as he could before they left. The three adults had decided to spend their last day out at the shooting range. Rene had begged to go along and, despite Marina's misgivings, had been allowed to go with them on the condition he did exactly as he was told without question. Rene had promised to be a perfect angel, which in turn made Sam roll his eyes, the older of the two wincing hard as the action caused his dormant headache to flare briefly. However it had happened, the four of them were out of the house.

The younger Grimm brothers were out and about with their significant others, sightseeing on their last day in town. This left Gus and Will at home with Marina, the two keeping her company in the kitchen as she danced around the one area of the house which had always been her indisputable kingdom. The two were seated at the table, talking and laughing with each other as they attempted to get to know each other better.

Of course, her stoic lover would never tell, but there was a small part of the Colonel which was jealous of his newfound older brother. Especially the easy relationship Gus had with Marina herself. A little jealousy never hurt anyone though. And when Will was the one jealous, it always led to absolutely world-altering sex. Smirking wickedly as she contemplated the activities the evening ahead would inevitably hold, Marina hummed to herself happily as she moved about her domain.

Dinner was as cheerful as it could be, and before anyone even realized it, dawn had broken across the horizon the following morning. There were tears streaming down Marina's cheeks as she fuss anxiously at her oldest. Adoring and conciliatory, Sam stood silent under her maternal scolding, but for the occasional “Yes, ma'am” and “No, ma'am” she seemed to expect.

Fortunately, it didn't take long for Will to come to his rescue. Looping his arm around his partner's shoulders, he pulled her into him even as he pressed a warm kiss to her temple. “Marishka... samaya malen'kaya... stop fussing at him. We're not even an hour away. Our numbers are on every speed dial he has. Spike and Lou and Jules are here to keep an eye on him for you, not that he needs anyone to babysit him. Not to mention, you have guaranteed he will eat well until at least Christmas.”

“But the Braddocks!” she protested, cut off as Will interrupted her gently, “...will be held at bay by the restraining order we included in the adoption agreement. And their newfound fear of Fury and his Angelic Viper. Okay?”

“And we're sure? They can't come within 250 meters, right?”

“Yes ma'am... written in the adoption agreement and everything. Now please say goodbye to our son so we can get going. I am dreading what my department looks like after three weeks away.”
Glowering at him fondly, she teased, “Fatalist.”

“No, realist,” he argued, bending to press a fond kiss to the apple of her cheek.

Rolling her eyes at her Colonel, she slipped from his embrace and into Sam's open arms. The two stood together for a long time, arms tight around the other and silent in the face of their coming separation. Finally Sam choked out, “I love you, Ma.”

Going up on tiptoes, Marina pressed a warm kiss to his tearing face. “I love you too, Sammy-honey. If you need anything, you call us. No matter what time it is. Promise?”

“Yes ma'am,” he agreed, squeezing her tightly once more.

Marina backed up then, wiping her eyes with the backs of her fingers. Almost immediately into her place stepped her partner, father and son embracing fiercely. “I'm gonna miss you, Dad.”

“We'll miss you too, Sammichka.” There was a small pause, before Will gripped the sides of his son's face and forced him to look into his eyes squarely. “You ever need to come home, you don't need an invitation. The door is always open to you.”

“Copy that,” Sam choked out, dropping his forehead against Will's own for a long moment before they both stepped back at the same time.

Marta lunged forward next, wrapping her arms tightly around her nephew. Whatever the two said between them was private, the entire exchange in Quebecois. Determined to keep it that way, the Brothers Grimm each decided to forget Quebecois was one of the many dialects Will was fluent in. Once Marta went up on tiptoe to kiss his cheek, Aaron stepped forward to offer his hand. Sam grinned at his uncle, the two dragging each other into a back-slapping embrace. “Thank you, Aaron... for everything.”

“You're welcome,” the blue eyed Grimm promised with a laugh, ruffling sunny hair with a smirk. “You're gonna be one of my groomsmen, right?”

“Wild horses couldn't keep me away,” the blond laughed with a bright grin. “Just let me know when and where. I'll be there with bells on.”

“Good.”

Vincent all but attacked his best friend, roaring playfully as he scooped Sam up into a bear hug which lifted the smaller man clear off his feet. Sam laughed outright, eyes alight as he smacked playfully at the emergency doctor's shoulders. “Put me down, Vince!”

Dropping him onto his feet, Vincent grabbed his shoulders firmly. “Keep in touch, okay?”

“I'll be around.” Twisting slightly, Sam teased Catherine as she joined them, “Do me a favor. Keep an eye on this guy, huh? Let me know if I need to come riding to his rescue.”

Vincent huffed as he insisted, “I'm not a damsel in distress.”

The pretty detective ignored her boyfriend as she joked with the blond, “If anyone is riding to the princess' rescue, it'll be me.”

Sam burst into laughter at the betrayed look splashed across Vincent's face in response to that. Jaw dropping for a moment, he protested loudly, “Traitor!”
Grinning at him, she hip-checked Sam quickly, before moving off towards their rental car. “Hurry up, Vincent . . . I am not paying for another day on this hunk of junk.”

The two men stood there watching her go, before the SRU officer announced, “Hold on to her, Vince . . . she's a keeper.”

A warm but small smile curved Vincent's lips upwards as he promised, “Don't I know it.” Blinking sharply, he turned to face his best friend again. “Take care of yourself, Sam. We'll see you soon.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Sam promised, the two men exchanging another hard hug before Vincent dashed off after his girlfriend.

Rene all but attacked his brother, leaping upwards to wrap his arms around his neck as the preteen buried his nose in the crook of Sam's neck. ‘I'm gonna miss you.”

“I'll miss you too, squirt. Look after Ma and Dad for me, okay? They've got the world on their shoulders. So be good.”

“I will. I promise,” the eleven year old swore, looking up at his new brother with hero worship in his eyes.

“Good kid.” Nudging him lightly towards the car, Sam insisted, “Go on . . . I think you guys are almost ready to go.”

The rest of the family's goodbyes were much more subdued, before at last Marina was in the Jeep as it backed out of the driveway. Shoving herself to standing, she could feel Will's free hand grab her hip to steady her as she leaned on the center crossbar and waved back at where Sam stood alone on the driveway. “I love you, Sammy!”

“Love you too, Ma!” he called back, his arm waving widely over his head as the Jeep moved down the street before he finally disappeared from sight as Will turned the corner towards the highway.

Plopping down in her seat, Marina sought her lover's hand, her tears blinding her as she clutched onto him tightly. “It'll be okay. We'll see him again soon . . . I promise,” the Colonel vowed, lifting her hand to his lips to press a warm kiss to the palm.

Nodding, she considered the last three weeks to that point. She'd gained not just one, but two new sons, the younger of the two curled up in the backseat and the ink not even dry yet on the paperwork. Her older son had finally found his footing at his job, and friends to share the difficulties with. Her lover was in the seat beside her, his hand warm and familiar as it folded over her knee, mercurial eyes alight with adoration as he watched her. The couple was still trying for a child, but even still, she was thrilled with the family they had built to this point.

It was a good life. A happy life. And it could only get better from here.
Chapter Notes

Merry Christmas!!!!

No real translations, but what there are, are at the end as always. This is an extra long chapter to make up to the dry spell. We have Marta and Aaron's wedding coming up next, and then we take a big jump; a year or so, I think. I hope you're ready for it!

Either way, I hope you enjoy this one. Backstory; if you've seen Flashpoint, you know what happens between Sam and Jules in the second season. If not, you're about to find out. Let me know what you think in the comments section below, they always make my life!!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Marina's heart all but glowed with warmth as she took in the collection of women scattered around her living room. There was S.H.I.E.L.D.'s very own set of Three Musketeers; sweet but shy Marta, brash and bold Casey and brilliant if absent-minded Scarlett. Of course her beloved sisters were also in attendance; calm and steady Vika, vivacious and vicious Nika, and beautiful but lethal Natasha. Then last but not least, her best friend in the whole world, rational and practical Maria. Catherine, the newest addition to their fold, was still trying to find her place among them, but she would settle in. Everyone always did.

Though they were admittedly an odd collection of women, there were deep connections between each of them. Not the least of which, each woman's devotion to a certain family. Fortunately, while the Grimms were a small part of why they had gathered together, the true reason for their meeting was much more enjoyable.

Planning a certain wedding celebration for one Dr. Marta Ann Shearing herself.

It had been a long few weeks since they had returned home from Toronto. Almost immediately, there had been a slew of problems that cropped up as a result of the extended vacation. Marina had vowed never leave anyone in charge of the handler pool again; that mess had given her at least a dozen gray hairs. Marta and Scarlett got lost in the experiments they had put off, and Casey took up her post in R&D once more as Jason's head of security.

After what felt like a small eternity, the light at the end of the tunnel had appeared, however. Things finally began to settle. Tasks could start to be delegated to underlings. Experiments could either be left with interns or unattended entirely. And last, but not least, Jason was lost in a research project with one of his newest engineers – Marina just wanted to pinch Leo Fitz's cheeks, he was the cutest thing!! – and could be counted on not to come up for air for at least the next 24 hours.

Ergo here they were, carving out what little time they could to start planning the event. To be frank, Marina could not be any more ecstatic than if Marta was her own daughter.

The virologist had requested that neither her sister or her brother-in-law be invited to the wedding. A request that the former assassin had had no qualms about granting. If she ever saw either Braddock ever again, she'd probably shoot one or the other or both. Of course, that didn't even come close to what Will, Aaron or any of the other Grimm boys would do should they ever show their faces again.

Granted, seeing as the bride's family traditionally handled the wedding affairs, that put a bit of a twist on the plans. As the Braddocks would not be in attendance at all, the honor of hosting the wedding fell to the Grimms.

Had the Russian mentioned how excited she was about that fact?

Finally, after letting the women chat amongst themselves for awhile, Marina called the meeting to order by banging the flat of her hand against the armrest of her chair. “All right, ladies! This meeting of the Grimm Family Women is now in session!” Glancing around the packed room, she joked, “It would appear that we have increased in numbers since our last meeting.”

“Just means that the Colonel needs to buy you a bigger house,” Maria laughed with a teasing grin and a sly wink.

I have expended a lot of time and energy making this house a safe haven for my boys. My Misfits included. No way in hell is Misha allowed to uproot me from all of my hard work,” the older woman huffed, with a playful pout.

Casey snickered as she took the opportunity to tease S.H.I.E.L.D.'s Assistant Director. “I'm surprised that Marina isn't reading you the riot act, Maria. You and Hansel eloped!?”

The Russian huffed lightly in disgruntled reminder, as the younger brunette glared at the redhead. “I had just gotten her to stop harping on this, Casey. Thank you very much.”

Hot chocolate eyes narrowed at her best friend lightly. “You're just lucky I was there. Or I would have never let you live this down.”

“It was a firefight, Marina . . . of course you were there. Who else was going to be watching my six?”

“Wait . . . you got married during a firefight?” Scarlett asked incredulously, eyebrows up in disbelief.

“Only Maria,” the Russian sighed with a roll of her eyes. “Fury officiated. It was all very 'Pirates of the Caribbean’.”

“Why was there a firefight?” Catherine inquired curiously.

“Let's just say, we were at a summit in Prague. And Fury was having all kinds of fun kicking ass – apparently, he doesn't get to do that anymore. And Hansel was like . . .” here Marina dropped her tone an octave, imitating her foster father's German accent as closely as she could manage, 'Meine Spatzi, let us exchange vows'. And Maria was all . . .” the sound of Marina's natural tenor morphing into a high soprano singsong earned a peal of giggles from around the room as she all but trilled, “'Oh Hans! I thought you would never ask!'”

Maria chucked a handful of popcorn at her best friend as she protested, “I do NOT sound like that.”

“Ah ha! But you don't deny that that's what you said!” Marina laughed, pointing a finger at her as she caught Maria gleefully in her trap.

Momentary stumped, the AD paused to consider where she'd gotten tricked and then slumped in resignation. “You suck.”

“I love you too, Vorobey,” she teased, leaning over to pat the younger woman's shoulder fondly.

Nika bit down on a celery stick, munching thoughtfully as she mused, “I'm not sure which part surprises me more about this. That Director Badass Coat can officiate weddings. Or that he DID.”

“Let's go with both and call it even,” Vika replied with a grin, digging a legal pad from the bag at her feet and pulling her pen from the pocket of her sharp Oxford.

“Which reminds me,” Marina interrupted, leaning forward in her chair to fix Marta with a level stare. “If you and Aaron elope, Marta, I will be personally affronted and utterly devastated. I may never recover. So do us all a favor and don’t.”

The virologist smiled shyly as she promised, “Aaron's pretty adamant about making this wedding a big deal. So I think we'll be good.”

“Excellent!” she cheered, bouncing cheerfully in her seat as she clapped her hands like a giddy schoolgirl. “All right then, first things first. We need a date!”

Marta blushed lightly as Nika drawled, “How about the Longest Night? There'll be plenty of rack time to be had then.”

“Nika!” was the squealed protest, as the pretty young woman flamed in mortified embarrassment.
“It's just a suggestion,” the black-haired Russian teased, with a broad wink and a swaggering sip of her vodka.

The heat in Marta's glare was miles below the heat in her blush, and caused the entire room to giggle at her expense. When at last everything settled down once more, the scientist straightened her shoulders and looked at Marina head on. “To be honest, I don't care when it is. I just want it to be in Toronto.”

“Toronto?” Casey asked in surprise, staring at her best friend with wide eyes.

“Aaron really wants Sam as a groomsman. If the wedding is in Toronto, even if he has a shift, we can work around it.”

“I can work with Toronto. We will need to plan another trip up there to check out churches, venues and what have you. Preferably soon . . . we do need to have some kind of a timetable.”

Whatever Marta was about to say in response was interrupted by a sharp knock on the front door of the house. Frowning, the Family Russian looked around as she took in the fact that everyone was accounted for. “Are we expecting anyone?”

“No one here for us. Could it be the boys?”

“Why would my boys knock? This is their house!” Marina questioned, tossing her clipboard onto the side table.

Getting up from her chair, she frowned as she threaded her way through the room. Her frown deepened at the familiar, though shadowy, silhouette she could see through the small window in the front door. Almost without thinking about it, she came to a stop just outside of Sam's awareness, taking in the unexpected sight of her son.

Whatever had happened, he was hurting. Even from where she stood, Marina could make out the veiny redness of his eyes, a clear indication that he had recently been crying. His cheeks were blotchy with color, as though he'd scrubbed hard at his face to rid all traces of tears. His hair was disheveled and windblown, more than likely a result of him riding his motorcycle all the way from Toronto without a helmet. (When she got to the bottom of the problem, they would be having a long and unpleasant conversation about that little detail.)

Still, he looked serious and calm. There was no sign of whatever turmoil had created the little tells earmarking his distress. As a result, as much as she hated not hunting down whomever had harmed her child, she resigned herself to pretending as though everything was all right. Taking a deep breath to calm her nerves, she strode forward and pulled open the door briskly.

Clearly her acting skills were better than she had thought, as Sam barely flinched when she cheered, “Sammy! What a pleasant surprise!”

“Hey Ma,” he greeted, coming forward to wrap his arms around her waist.

Though Marina noticed that he lingered within the confines of her embrace a little longer than usual, she refused to mention it. Calm and steady would be the best play here; until he told her otherwise, she would continue to pretend as though nothing was wrong. First things first though . . .

Narrowing her eyes, she scanned her attention up and down his frame. Though he was still thinner than her Russian heart would like, it did appear as though he had put on some weight. The last of the bruising that had stubbornly clung to his face had cleared and those beautiful blue eyes were liquid as they watched her scan him. “You break my Russian heart, Sammy . . . come into the kitchen. I'm sure I have some leftovers I can heat up for you to eat.”

“It's all right Ma.”

“You always say that . . . and when was the last time I listened to you?” she asked, prodding him towards the kitchen. “March, kiddo.”

Grinning at her tiredly, he agreed, “Yes ma'am.”

Before long, she had fixed him a plate of pierogi and stroganoff, with a bottle of beer at his left. His smile was small and sad as he mumbled his thanks, before tucking into the meal halfheartedly . . . a reaction which, she was pleased to note, didn't last long past the first bite. If there was one thing she could count on, it was her boy's love for her cooking.

Reaching out, she laid a hand over the one he'd left on the table. “Sammy-honey, you know I'm happy to see you.”

The slight clenching of his fingers on his fork was impossible to miss, as was the slight twitch at the corner of his eye. “Dad said the house was always open if I wanted to come home.”

“And it is . . . that is never in question,” she promised, reaching out to thread her fingers through his hair fondly. “But I am curious as to why you're here.”

“I just wanted to come see you.”

“You had a shift today, Sammichka . . . and you have one tomorrow too. You just going to skip it?”

“I took some emergency time off. Teammates aren't supposed to date; it's against the rules. I just . . . I needed some time.”

Marina flinched backwards in shock, causing a broad wince to slide across her eldest's face. Seeing the apprehension there, she smoothed her features once again. “I didn't know you were seeing anyone. Is it serious? When do I get to meet her?”

The single shrug held a mountain's worth of pain as he replied meekly, “I thought it was. And you already did meet her, Ma.”

Hot chocolate eyes narrowed slightly at the past tense. “Who was it, Sammy?”

For a long time, she was worried he wasn't going to answer her. He picked at his dinner, taking bites to avoid the question for as long as he could. It wasn't until he was chasing the last meatball around the plate that she heard him whisper, “Jules.”

Swallowing hard, he forced out, “She left me. I was there for her, when she got shot . . . I helped her PT . . . I helped her re-qualify for Team One. And last night, she told me she loved me . . . but that I wasn't going to stand in the way of her job. That if I wanted to be with her, only one of us had to transfer teams.” The smile was self-deprecating as he looked up at her, “It was pretty well implied that if someone did transfer out, it wasn't going to be her.”

To say that Marina was livid was probably an understatement. However, her son was in pain; he clearly still had feelings for his teammate regardless of how things had ended. So while she wanted to plot out a very bloody death for the diminutive SRU constable, Marina resigned herself to simply ranting about it to her lover as soon as her Misha returned home.

Her fingers were trembling as she stroked her fingers over the back of his hand. “I'm sorry, baby.”
Sam forced a small smile as he looked up at her. “It's not anyone's fault but mine. I knew the rules, and if it wasn't for the team I could have done it . . . but I just . . . with you and Dad and Aunt Marty and Uncle Aaron so far away . . . I can't give up the team. Spike and Lou . . . they're my best friends. Some days they're the only things that keep me from going crazy from loneliness. I can't give that up.”

Rage soared in Marina's heart, and she struggled to keep the reaction from showing on her face. She would bet every diamond her partner had ever given her, Jules knew that. Had known that Sam wouldn't be able to give up the team. And had intentionally hurt him further by announcing her love for him within the same breath she had told him he was going to need to find companionship elsewhere.

Pulling Sammy to her, she pressed a warm kiss to his forehead. “I'm sure it's not really your thing, but I have some ice cream in the freezer. I can send the girls home, and we can watch a movie until Misha and Rene get home. Just the two of us.”

Biting down on his lower lip meekly, he asked timidly, “You don't mind?”

“Absolutely not,” she promised, standing from her chair. “Let me send the girls home while you get out the ice cream. Your pick . . . as long as it's explosion heavy and there are NO special agents. I get enough of that crazy at work; I'll literally spend the whole movie picking the stupid agents apart.”

This time Sam's grin wavered just that little bit closer to real, as he chuckled, “Whatever you say, Ma.”

“Damn right,” she agreed, ruffling his hair before moving out of the kitchen. If she heard the soft sob Sam let out just before she left earshot . . . at least she tried to pretend as though she didn't notice.

Several hours later, Will arrived home from work, a chatty Rene in his wake. Marina twisted slightly so she could watch them come into the house, trying not to move too much and dislodge Sam where he slept with his head in her lap. “Rene, Chado . . . I need you to lower your voice a little bit.”

Her lover's eyebrows furrowed as he came further into the room, his face clearing in understanding once he had rounded the couch and took in the pale features of his older son. “Oh Sammy,” he murmured, dropping into a crouch. Looking up at his partner, the analyst inquired quietly, “What happened?”

“I'll tell you in a little bit. Can you help me get out from under him? I don't want to wake him; those bags under his eyes are damned impressive.”

One corner of the man's lips twitched upwards as he reached out to help. Between the two of them, they managed to rearrange their son just enough that the Russian could slide free. Will worked on removing his boots, while Marina ran for a blanket in the linen closet. At last the two stood in the entrance to the living room, watching their son sleep. With his arms looped over her shoulders, it was impossible to miss the way his beloved Marishka was trembling, her muscles quivering under her skin with unmistakable rage. Pulling her that small inch closer, the Colonel pressed a warm kiss to her temple, murmuring against the skin, “Not that I'm not happy to see him, but do I want to know what brought our son home, unexpected and unannounced?”

Marina sucked in a long breath through her nose, a gesture Will recognized as a calming technique the handler only used if she was trying not to kill someone. Turning to look to where her eleven year old lurked in the doorway, she ordered firmly, “Homework, Rene . . . now.”

“But Ma! It's Sam!”
Narrowing her eyes, she pointed towards the stairwell imperiously, “Now, Enjolras Rene . . . Sam is going to be home for a few days. You'll have plenty of time to see each other.”

Seeing that the boy was still uncertain, Will chimed in, “The sooner you get your homework done, the more time you'll have to spend with your brother once he wakes up.”

Biting down on his lower lip, Rene considered that statement, before nodding sharply once. “Okay, Dad!” Rotating on his heel, the kid scooped up his backpack as he dashed for the stairwell, taking them two and three at a time.

Once he was gone, Will stepped away. He offered his lover a hand, insisting, “My office? Or the bedroom?”

“Bedroom . . . I'm probably going to throw something. And my pillows are a lot less likely to break than anything in your office.”

One eyebrow canted upwards as he sighed reluctantly, “That bad, huh?”

A heavy sigh dragged itself from the Russian, mosaic opal gleaming through brown strands as Marina shoved her fingers back through her hair. “Worse. He's hurting, Misha . . . he's hurting and for once there is not a single thing I can do about it.”

Glancing at the sleeping blond, Will could feel the way his lips dragged downwards. Taking Marina's hand, he insisted, “Bedroom . . . I need to know what's going on.”

“You don't need to know, you just want to know,” she chuckled, a small, sad smirk on her lips as she teased her lover for his incessant need to know everything.

Lifting her palm to his lips, he pressed a warm kiss to her skin. “Zhemchuzhina, I already know you want to rant to me about this. I also know you don't want to wake Sammy while you're screaming.”

“I cannot handle your typical rationality at this moment, Misha. I cannot be rational right now.”

Tugging her into their bedroom with him, the Colonel closed the door as he agreed fondly, “I understand. I'll let you rant, and I won't even try to calm you down.”

There was relief and fond amusement in the Russian's smile as she breathed, “You are a good man, and I love you.”

Strong warm hands cupped her cheeks as he lifted her face for his kiss. “I love you too, samaya malen'kaya.” They kissed for a long moment, before at last Will broke away and went to sit on the edge of the bed. Shucking his uniform jacket, he tossed it onto the pillows behind him and leaned back on his hands, watching her with stormy hazel eyes. “All right . . . what happened?”

“Sam was dating Jules . . . and she left him.” Her face twisted with fury as she all but screamed, “She told him she loved him with one breath and left him in the next. That suka!”

Frowning, Will protested, “I didn't even know he was seeing anyone. What did that happen?”

“Apparently they were keeping it a secret. From what he told me, members of the team cannot be involved romantically. There are protocols against it, so they didn't tell anyone.” Unable to stand still, she began to pace as she ranted, “Jules got shot and Sam thought it was his fault, because he had the shield . . . he didn't protect her. Nevermind the fact that he was doing his job and that he can't be everywhere at once.” Muttering to herself for a moment, she rotated on her heel and paced back the other way before continuing, “He helped her rehab, he helped her re-qualify, he was there for her during her recovery. And when it was time for her to come back to the team, she gave him a choice. He could have her or he could have the team, but he couldn't have both. She wasn't, and I quote, 'going to let anyone get in the way of her coming back to the team'."

The Colonel sighed heavily, “Meaning she wasn't going to let Sam get in her way of coming back to the team.”

“I'm going to rip her heart out with my bare hands!” Marina screeched, rounding on her lover furiously.

“No you're not,” was the calm rebuttal. “And more importantly, you already know you're not.”

“Misha! You promised you weren't going to be rational right now!” the woman protested on a petulant whine, offering him a disappointed pout.

“I know, and I am sorry. But Marishka . . . Sammichka clearly still cares about Jules. You know that and I know that, just from the pain on his face while he was sleeping. Ergo, you already know that anything you do to Jules is only going to hurt Sam more than he already is.”

Huffing at him, she spun sharply on her heels as she continued to storm around the room. “Just because I know I'm not going to kill her, doesn't mean I'm not going to take immense pleasure in planning to kill her.”

“You wouldn't be my Viper if you didn't,” he agreed with a fond grin. He reached for her hand, using it pull her onto the bed next to him and into his arms. “I love the way you protect our sons, Marina, but you gotta let Sammy handle this one on his own this time. You can't be his mom, rushing in to save him and fix the problem, okay?”

“But I am his mom. And I just want to protect him from this,” the former assassin protested, burying her face in the curvature of his throat, free hand coming up to grip the collar of his shirt.

“I know. And we'll do the best we can to help him heal and recover. But you can't fix this . . . nothing can fix this. The pain has to run its course or he'll never get over it.”

Marina moaned, burying herself deeper into him. “My poor Sammy . . . my poor darling boy.”

**************************************************

It was more than a week later that Sam was back in Toronto. Both Marina and Marta had insisted on going back with him; they had appointments with several different venues for Marta's wedding. Though Marina hadn't explicitly told Sam what she had relayed to his aunt, the young man knew that his sweet and loving Aunt Marty was furious with one Jules Callaghan.

The two women lingered in the doorway as Sam moved to Spike and Lou at Winnie's desk. “Sup guys!”

“Samtastic!” Spike cheered, the three slapping backs as they exchanged a round of hugs. “Dude, you look good. You been eating or something?”

“Dude, I just spent a week at my parents'. Have you ever known my mom not to stuff me with food when I'm at home?”

“Good point,” Lou laughed, the two best friends grinning at each other. Both men were well acquainted with Marina Petrovka's near constant desire to feed her oldest son.
Before long, the rest of his team – including Jules' temporary replacement Donna Sabine – had joined them at the dispatcher's desk. Parker had brought Timmy's coffee and was currently passing them around the group. The reappearance of the blond constable clearly didn't surprise the sergeant, as he only offered Sam an Iced Cap with a small smile. “How was your soul searching, Sam?”

Donna's reply was snide as she chimed in, “Yeah . . . did you find one?”

Marina's temper, already short at the prospect of seeing Jules, flared sharply as she snarled, “Well, she's a charmer.”

Sam sighed as he twisted to smirk at his adoptive mother, scolding fondly, “Ma.”

“What!? It was just an observation, right Marta?”

The virologist was all but glaring at the woman, arms folded across her chest as she agreed, “Marina is not wrong, Sam.”

Meanwhile Spike had whirled to hear Marina's voice, a wide grin on his face as he cheered, “Samtastic's Mama!” All but skipping to hug her, he begged, “Please say you're going to feed us?”

Rolling her eyes in fond exasperation, Marina dug in her backpack for a large dish. “You're lucky I like you,” she joked as she offered it to Spike.

Peeling off the lid, the bomb tech cheered at the sight of still warm cinnamon rolls. “You're amazing!” Spike cheered, bending to press a warm kiss to her cheek as he dashed back to the desk.

“Damn right I am,” she agreed, her whole demeanor going cold as Jules suddenly appeared through the door. Glancing at Marta, she caught sight of the pleading look on Sam's face and resolved to remove herself from the situation so as not to say something that would hurt her son further.

Jules, however, froze like a deer in headlights at the sight of the two women in Sam's life who were the most protective of him. Going up on tiptoes, Marina pressed a warm kiss to her son's cheek, insisting, “Love you, Sammy. Be safe today.”

Turning on her heel, she moved towards the door. Pausing next to Jules, she leaned sideways slightly so as to make herself heard. “I know what you did. I know what choice you forced him to make. And I can promise you, Julianna Callaghan . . . you hurt my son again?” There was a long pregnant pause as horrified mahogany eyes stared into boiling hot chocolate ones. Finally, Marina cracked a brittle smile as she promised, “Let's just say, this is your only warning. I hope we understand each other.”

“We do.”

“Good. Then I would suggest you tread lightly.” Raising her voice slightly so that the others could hear her, she chirped cheerfully, “Have a good day, Jules. Congratulations on making it back.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Meine Spatzi - my sparrow (Hansel's nickname for his fiancée, Maria Hill)
(R) Vorobey - sparrow (Marina's nickname for her best friend, Maria Hill)
(R) Sammichka - a Russian diminutive of Samuel
(R) Chado - child (Marina's nickname for her youngest son, Rene)
(R) Zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for his longtime partner, Marina Petrovka)
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for his longtime partner, Marina Petrovka)
(R) suka - bitch
Happy New Year! I hope this beginning brings you joy and happiness!

No translations this time. But . . .

Will & Marina request the pleasure of your company as they joyfully celebrate the marriage of their brother, Aaron Grimm, to Marta Ann Shearing.

Here . . . there be shenanigans. Next chapter is the ceremony and reception, this is just the lead up to the big day! Enjoy!!!!! had paid a handsome sum to be able to secure the entire park for the event. Regrettably Sam had an early morning shift, but – barring any last minute or lengthy hot calls – his shift would be over by about four in the afternoon.

Aaron had insisted Marina take the role of “Mother of the Groom,” despite Marta desperately wanting her for a bridesmaid. As a result, in the interest of keeping the lines even, Aaron had given up having his eldest brother as a groomsmen. The former Outcome operative contented himself with knowing the Colonel would be just as happy seated next to his Russian as he would be standing up with him.

Currently, the two senior officers in the family were taking care of all the last minute details, while Aaron was in the dressing room with the rest of his groomsmen. At least, he was there physically; mentally he was a million miles away. Clint’s smacking at his hands as he fidgeted with his tie brought him back to the Land of the Living. “Thinking deep thoughts there, Kenny.”

Unable to stop the smile, Aaron asked, “Are you ever going to call me 'Aaron'? Kenny's been gone for a long time.”

“Says you . . . but as much as you've changed, big brother, Kenny is still a large part of who you are. So no . . . you will always be 'Kenny' to me,” Clint insisted with a grin and a wink.

Jason chuckled as he worked on his own tie. “Guys . . . we have 45 minutes to start. How about we worry about where Sam might be? Isn't Natalie already here?”

Aaron shook his head as Clint fussed at him, reminding his older brother calmly, “Team One was on shift this morning. We knew it was going to be tight; that's why Marta wanted it in Toronto. So he could be here.”

“Besides, the wedding doesn't start until the bride says so. And I doubt she's gonna say so without her favorite nephew.”

“Sam is her only nephew,” Aaron laughed.

Jason rolled his eyes, even as he agreed with a sly grin. “Because that matters. Technically, Marina only has two sons.”

Meanwhile, Marina was standing in the foyer of the church, greeting the guests and keeping an eye out for the still missing Sam. Her longtime friend, Denise Perron, arrived then on her beloved Davey’s arm, prompting delighted squeals from both women. The two lunged at each other, hugging tightly as they chattered simultaneously to each other. “I will never not be jealous! Marina, look at you! I was convinced that color could only be found in Army uniforms. Yet here you are, looking ravishing in a dress of Army green mesh and lace!” Denise exclaimed, pushing her friend back a step. “Must be why you're always such a knockout in your uniform.”

The Russian smiled, fingering the almost Army-drab of her knee length dress, the embroidery and beading on the lace bodice and ¾ sleeves twinkling in the meager lighting of the church. “This is unsurprisingly Aaron's favorite color. It looks good next to Misha's dress greens, too, so bonus!”

“You two are always such a striking couple,” Dave agreed, leaning forward to exchange a warm kiss on the cheek with the junior officer. “Where is Will, anyway?”

“Problem with the caterers. We've learned things get done much faster if Misha glares at people, so he's being very . . .” here she paused, trying to decide on an accurate descriptor, before giving it up for a lost cause. “He's being very encouraging right now.”
Dave's chuckle was knowing as he agreed, “I'll bet.”

Marina grinned as she returned her attention to Denise, spinning the woman in a tight circle. “As for gorgeous women, look at you! You look fantastic!”

“I look gray, you mean,” the general's wife snarked with a roll of her pretty eyes.

Marina was peripherally aware of the door of the church opening behind them as she scolded, “And who said gray can't look fantastic?”

“Oh Marishka . . . you flatter an old woman's soul,” the other woman laughed, squeezing her arm fondly.

Movement in the corner of her eyes drew the Russian's attention and she turned to see Sam quietly standing with his team, obviously waiting for her attention. “Sammy-honey! Thank God! You're here!” she cheered, rushing forward to throw her arms around him. Drawing back to get a better look at him, she frowned at the line of bruises running down his cheek, her fingers reverent and whisper soft as they brushed over the injury. “What happened!?”

“Took a Glock to the face. I'm okay.”

“I don't think the pictures will agree,” she huffed, narrowing her eyes at him again. Knowing what she was seeing, he gave her a sheepish smile as he scrubbed self-consciously at the back of his neck. Rolling her eyes, she scolded fondly, “How are you still so thin? You break my Russian heart, malysh, truly. Eat more . . . please. For my sake, if not for your own.”

Denise chuckled as she teased. “Ahh . . . the famous Sammy. Hello again. How do you like being a Grimm, Sam?”

The sniper turned rosy as he cuddled into his Ma, letting her fuss at the bruises on his face. Eery blue eyes were gleaming as he gave Denise a small, pleased smile. “I have no complaints.”

“Good to hear,” Dave laughed, glancing at his wife out of the corner of his eyes. There was a matchmaking gleam in her eyes as Denise questioned, “Are you single, Sam? I still find it hard to believe, but again . . . stranger things.”

Sam's pause was momentary, but it still earned a narrow-eyed look from Marina, her head tilting as she took in the flashfire glance toward his left where a Julianna Callaghan stood fidgeting uncomfortably. Marina's jaw clenched slightly as she fought to rein in her temper. Sam had fallen hard for the young woman only to be left for a cold and thankless job. The Russian tossed her head slightly, refusing to focus on her anger for too long. There were already too many things which could go wrong that day and this did not need to be one of them.

She tuned back into the conversation in time to hear Sam's cautious reply of, “Yes, ma'am.”

“Fabulous!” Denise cheered. “My granddaughter Kaia had to come alone. I hope you won't mind escorting her? You'd be doing me a big favor.”

Marina smirked at the name. Kaia Perron was career military, a first rate nurse . . . and happily committed to her girlfriend Talia. Stepping forward before Sam could gracefully decline, she agreed, “I'm sure he'd be happy to, Denise.” Turning to Sam, she cocked an eyebrow, “Wouldn't you, Sammichka?”

Sam's eyes narrowed slightly as he took in the mischievousness in his adoptive mother's eyes. She was definitely up to something, but whatever it was, the sniper knew she would never intentionally hurt him. Shrugging slightly, he turned back to Denise and agreed, “Sure. Sounds great.”

“Thank you, Sam . . . you cannot imagine how relieved I am,” Denise sighed, twisting slightly to covertly wink at her friend. Marina’s grin grew a small inch more as she allowed an all but unnoticeable shrug in reply.

“No problem,” the young man agreed, gesturing toward the collection of people who stood at his back. “Do you mind if the team stays, Ma? We just left a hot call and it was faster to come straight here than back to the Barn.”

“Of course not, Sammy-honey. There are portable showers set up behind the conservatory, if you all would like to change.”

Dave spoke up then, a frown on his face. “Sam, I meant to ask you before. Are you any relation to Gregory Braddock?”

Sam paled at the question, glancing toward Marina, before nodding gamely. “He's my biological father, Sir. He went by Sir at home, though.”

Dave frowned, insisting, “I am off the clock, so I would prefer just Dave.” The soft growling in the back of Marina’s throat caught his attention and Dave cocked an eyebrow. “Marishka? Am I missing something?”

The effort to remain calm was clearly written across Marina’s face. Hearing her son claim Gregory Braddock as his biological father had enraged her, seeing as she, Marta and Will were the only ones who knew this was not the case. Will had been searching for Sam's true biological parents without much success. Until they had results, however, Marta had begged her nephew's adoptive parents not to tell Sam; there was no need to hurt him if they didn't have to.

Shaking her head to clear her thoughts, Marina took a deep breath and rounded on her son. “You need to go get changed . . . your aunt is freaking out. I had your uniform dry-cleaned for you; it's hanging up in the dressing room.”

Sagging in relief, the blond nodded in silent agreement. Leaning forward, he sketched a quick kiss across her cheek. “You look great, Ma.”

Giving him a genuine grin, she patted his cheek fondly. “Thank you, Sammy-honey. I'll go let your aunt know you're here.”

Nodding again, he bolted off towards the groom's dressing room. Marina plastered her “Agent Petrovka” grin on her face and turned back. “Go ahead and take seats. I have to reassure the bride.” With that she twirled on her heel and moved to check on Marta and her bridesmaids.

Denise looked up at her husband, cocking an eyebrow in question. “Do you know something I don’t?”

“If I do, it is as much of a mystery to me as it is to you.”

Rounding away from her husband, Denise demanded, “Where's the Colonel? Will can always be counted on to tell me what's wrong with his partner.”

“Will is glaring at caterers, remember? If we need to know, they will tell us. And whatever else happens, Marina is not going to let anything ruin her boy's wedding.” Offering his wife a formal bow and a hand, he inquired, “May I escort you to our seats, darling?”
“My hero,” she laughed, accepting his hand with an unsteady curtsy. Glancing at Team One, she insisted, “You'll probably want to get showered and changed quickly. We are all very late.”

Knocking on the door of the Bride's Room, Marina cracked open the door an inch as she called tentatively, “Marta? It's Marina.”

Almost immediately, the virologist was there to fling the door open. “What's wrong!? What happened!?” There was a moment's pause, before she grabbed Marina's mesh covered arms and shook her once, “Who DIED!!?”

Chuckling, as the remaining tension in her muscles fled, the Russian promised, “No one died. Sam is here at last. He's in with Aaron and the other boys getting dressed.” Placing her hands on Marta's shoulders, she insisted, “Relax, malyutka. Everything is just fine. And anything that's not, Misha and I will take care of it.”

Casey Shraeger, Marta's Maid of Honor and Jason Grimm's girlfriend, smiled as she came over to wrap an arm around Marta's shoulders. “I've been telling her that for hours.”

Natalie Braddock, Sam's baby sister and Marta's niece, snickered lightly. “Aunt Marta has always been prone to anxiety.”

Scarlett Doyle, newly married and uncomfortably pregnant, huffed as she scolded the younger woman. “Be nice, Natalie. This is the biggest day of her life. She's allowed to be worried.”

Looking between the four women, Marina couldn't help but smile. It had been a shock to everyone when the fiery, badass detective and the shy, unassuming virologist had emerged from a “Girls' Night In” as best friends. They should have had nothing in common . . . except for the worry which stemmed from being the girlfriend of a Grimm. Apparently, this single commonality had been enough for the both of them and the two had been as thick as thieves ever since.

As for Scarlett, she had had a rocky start of it after her rescue during the “zombie apocalypse” in Georgia. Her boyfriend – Will's newly found brother and Hansel's oldest natural-born son, James Doyle – had been ecstatic to see her and the two had attempted to promptly pick up where London had cut them off. However, ten years apart changes people, especially considering the circumstances of their separation, and both had struggled to really come back to each other.

In the meantime, both Marta and Scarlett became good friends. They were both well respected scientists in approximately the same field, in addition to sharing lab space at S.H.I.E.L.D. Over time, the two women had grown very close to one another. It wasn't uncommon for Scarlett and Casey to gang up on the quieter of their trio and drag her out for a night on the town, just because they could. The relationship was clearly good for all of them, offering support and two steady shoulders to worry on when their respective boyfriends were out on mission and putting their lives at risk.

When Scarlett and Doyle had gotten pregnant, the scientist had panicked; she didn't want to trap Doyle into something he didn't want, despite all his protests to the contrary. After three months of her prevaricating, Casey and Marta had finally managed screwed their friend's head on straight and Scarlett had accepted her boyfriend's proposal.

As fond of both women as she was, Scarlett had been genuinely distraught at the prospect of choosing between them for her Maid of Honor. The two women had solved the problem for her, insisting on splitting the responsibility between them as Scarlett's bridesmaids instead. Casey had planned the bachelorette party and Marta had been the one to go to all dress fittings and cake tastings. The arrangement had worked out for everyone.
The only reason they had not gone with the same arrangement for Marta's wedding was due to Scarlett's physical condition. Five months pregnant with rambunctious and mobile triplets, the scientist was uncomfortable on her feet and even sitting was a thoroughly miserable alternative. As a result, they'd agree to let Casey take the lion's share of the wedding responsibilities to be able to take the load off the older woman, while Scarlett contented herself with being a very supportive bridesmaid.

And then there was Natalie. Marta's niece was not a bad person, but it was not hard to understand why Sam could get so frustrated with his sister's self-centered behavior at times. She'd pitched a fit at the understated, though elegant, bridesmaid's dress Marta had decided on, insisting the dark azure blue and the cut of the dress, with its scoop-neck, cap-sleeves and knee-length, were not flattering with her figure or her coloring. It had taken the combined threesome of Marta's tears, Casey's fury and Scarlett's calm to convince the general's daughter to put aside her own prejudices for her aunt's sake. Granted, she had felt bad for making her aunt cry and had done her level best thereafter to be agreeable to everything, but still . . .

She would take some getting used to, as she was nothing like her more biddable and complacent older brother. At the very least, Marina could see herself liking the girl with a little more exposure to her.

Checking her watch, the Russian squeaked at the time displayed there. “Oh shit! We're late! I'm going to go check on the boys. Is everyone all set to go here?”

Marta's eyes were glowing as she nodded firmly, “I'm ready.”

“All right then . . . let me kick the boys into gear and we'll get this show on the road.”

Nodding in agreement, the younger woman accepted the Russian's warm hug gratefully, whispering, “Thank you so much.”

“You're welcome, Marta . . . you make my boy very happy and that makes me very happy,” Marina insisted, giving her another quick squeeze. “All right, we'll be back to get you soon.”

Outside the door, the Russian caught sight of Brian ushering people to their seats and reached out to grab him. “Bri, when you're done, I need you to meet me at the Groom's Room. Sam's got a nasty bruise on his face and I need you to cover it up for me.”

“Why me?”

“Are you or are you not the one who went undercover as a makeup artist on an assignment, and actually ended up being good at it?” was the rhetorical question, earning a wretched groan from the second eldest Grimm.

Cocking an eyebrow at her, he begged plaintively, “Is anyone ever going to let me live that down?”

“I wouldn't hold your breath too long. Hurry up . . . we're already late and I really would like pretty pictures during the ceremony,” she insisted, moving towards the Groom's Room quickly.

Knocking on the door, she called, “Aaron, it's Marina. Is everyone decent? Can I come in?”

The answer came immediately, as Jason swung open the door and gestured her inside. “What's up, Marishka? Everything okay?”

“Everything is fine . . . we're running a little behind, but it's no one's fault.”
Sam's tone was dark from behind the changing screen as he grunted, “Except mine.”

“Sam . . . we knew starting on time wasn't going to happen because of your shift this morning. I'm just glad you were able to make it reasonably on time. Brian's coming in a minute to see what he can do about covering the bruises on your face. I really would like pretty pictures, and I'm sure Marta would too.”

Aaron's smile was small but adoring as he crossed the room to take his sister's upper arms his palms lightly. “Have I told you thank you for this yet?”

Marina grinned, lifting her own hands to fuss helplessly with his uniform tie. “You have . . . at least a million times. Seriously, it's my honor and my pleasure. I like Marta . . . you couldn't have chosen anyone more perfect for you, solnyshko. No way I wasn't going to make this day perfect for you both.”

Pulling her into a fierce hug, the two stood together for a long moment. Finally, Marina pushed a step back as she laughed tearfully. “Nika is going to kill me! This mascara isn't waterproof.”

“You look amazing, Marishka,” Clint grinned, coming to join his brothers.

Sam emerged from behind the curtain then and before long, she was surrounded by all four of them. The sight of them, each of them smiling and happy, caused her eyes to well up again. “Look at you all . . . my boys, so handsome in their uniforms.” Reaching up to wipe helplessly at her eyes, she scolded, “I said I wasn't going to get all blubbery today.”

“I think we'll forgive you for getting a little emotional,” Jason teased, bending to press a warm kiss to her cheek before he moved to answer the next knock at the door.

The two remaining Brothers Grimm stood there, an adoring smile on Will's face at the sight of his teary-eyed partner. “Samaya malen'kaya . . . the ceremony hasn't even started yet,” he teased, coming to gather her into his arms.

Slapping at his chest halfheartedly, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler scolded, “Hush you . . . it's a big day. I am allowed to cry.”Sniffling hard, she continued, “Everything okay with the caterers?”

Pressing a warm kiss to her hair, he agreed, “Everything is all set. At this point, we're just waiting on the bridal party.” Pointing his thumb over his shoulder, he questioned playfully, "Which I think is why Brian is here?"

Glaring at his older brother at the teasing jab, Brian gripped Sam's shoulder lightly and pushed him inexorably downwards into a chair. Tilting his face upwards into the light, the agent grumbled under his breath as he dug into the make up kit he'd borrowed from Natalie and set to work covering up the bruise on the young blond's face. Smirking, Will continued, “All right. When you're ready, just come line up at the altar. Marina and I are going to go find our seats.” Reaching out, the Colonel pulled the grinning groom into his arms for a warm hug, whispering into his ear, “I am so proud of you, little brother.”

“Thanks, Will,” Aaron murmured, ducking his head into the older brother's uniform for a moment before straightening up again.

The two stood together for another moment, before the elder took a step back and interlaced his fingers with his Russian's once again. “We'll see you out there.”

Before long, the two settled into the family pew at the front of the church, 11 year old Rene tucked against Marina's opposite side as he watched the venue fill with people while he waited for the wedding to start. Aaron had asked him to be the ring bearer and the boy was so excited he could barely sit still. Will sat in the aisle seat, one arm draped over the back of Marina's seat, as Marina turned to engage her three sisters into an excited conversation about Vika's upcoming due date over their son's head. The “graduation ceremony” the three elder sisters had gone through at the end of their training in the Krasnaya Komnata was designed to sterilize the agents. Marina had avoided the “ceremony” due to being assigned to the Project Cahill before it could happen, but her continued struggle to conceive with her beloved Colonel had convinced the four sisters they would not be able to have children of their own. When the blond haired Amazon had announced she was expecting a little boy with her beloved Fil, the news had been met with a great deal of joy and excitement. As far as each of the sisters were concerned, this child was a miracle and the four could hardly wait.

Will's eyes slipped closed as he took in the thrilled Russian chatter beside him, fingers stroking absentely over the sequined fabric of Marina's dress. He was aware of Team One seated in the pew behind him, their curious eyes pinned on the two senior Grimms, and resolved to talk to Sam about what the blond had told his team about the family and what they did for work.

It was about then he became aware of a rustling coming towards him. With a heavy sigh, he opened his eyes and looked up in time to see his aide, Corporal Patricia Hadley, skidding to a halt beside him and shooting to attention. “I'm sorry, sir, but this was just delivered for you.”

Returning her salute, Will's response was absent as he reached for the missive, “Don't call me sir; I work for a living.”

“Yes sir, Colonel. I forgot, sir.”

There was dry amusement in his tone as he agreed, “You always do. Thank you Corporal . . . dismissed,” he insisted, returning her sharp salute and looking down at the folded page as she scurried back up the aisle.

Turning back into his seat, he was met with Marina's concern as she insisted, “Don't open it. If we don't know about it, they can't send us anywhere right now.”

“It's not orders . . . not the right kind of paper,” Will negated, sliding his thumb under the seal and peeling the page open. Eyes scanning the page, he could feel his jaw tightening before he refolded the page and passed it off to Marina. Standing, he called out, “Lucky! Front and center!”

Marina's gasp was both furious and horrified as Owen melted out of the shadows and was suddenly standing in front of them. “What's up, Boss?”

“How dare they!?” his partner raged as she shot to her feet beside the two men. Rene jumped at the anger in her tone, earning a shaky smile from the Russian, her fingers trembling slightly as she smoothed them gently through his hair. Though he still looked concerned, the pre-teen calmed at the familiar action. Looking up, Marina gestured for Catherine and Vincent to join them. "Would you take Rene back to Sam? It should be about time for him to line up with Marta and the girls anyway."

"Sure thing, Marina," Vincent agreed, reaching out to ruffle the boy's hair. "Come on, squirt."

"Sam's the only one allowed to call me 'squirt'," the child protested, reaching up to smooth down the rumpled curls.

"Whatever you say, squirt."

Placing one hand at the nape of her neck, the Colonel waited for the three to be out of earshot before answering his best friend. “General and Mrs. Braddock are going to be here in about an hour.”
Owen's eyes went wide as he joked miserably, “They have some big brass balls. You're kidding?”

“No. I am not.”

“Did they give a reason why? I thought they weren't invited.”

“Apparently, Mrs. Braddock is so distraught at the fact she was not invited to her 'beloved baby sister's' wedding, they have decided to come anyway.”

Marina broke in then, chocolate eyes boiling as she hissed, “She was invited, but she wouldn't concede to not bringing her husband! I waited for three months for her to agree to come alone before I started planning again. Otherwise, we would still be waiting for her to say something.”

“Marishka . . .” the Colonel admonished, trying to settle her down before she caused a scene at the front of the church.

“I am not okay with this! Aaron can't know . . . neither can Sammy,” Marina ordered, glaring at the two men as though they were personally responsible for her anger.

“I have no intention of telling the bridal party at this point. I believe you said you wanted happy pictures of the ceremony, yeah?” he reminded her calmly. Taking the missive back, he read it over once again, before sighing, “They shouldn't be here before the ceremony is over and the bridal party is off getting their pictures done.”

“What about after?!” Marina demanded, arms coming up to fold over her chest. “We can't just not tell them, Misha . . . Sammy at least needs some kind of warning before he has to deal with those assholes.”

“We'll tell them when the pictures are over.” Turning back to his best friend, Will took Owen's elbow and insisted, “Pass the word . . . discretely . . . to everyone not in the bridal party. And make sure to pass on . . .

“. . . under no circumstances is the General to get close to Sam? Yeah, I figured that part out already,” Owen joked, with a wink. “How do we keep Sam distracted?”

“Well . . . Denise has expressed interest in Sammy for her granddaughters,” Marina sighed, reaching up to rub at her temple with two fingers. “Kaia came alone, and Denise asked him to escort her.”

“Kaia?” was the deadpan inquiry, earning a narrowed eyed glare from his partner. Sensing there was something going on between Marina and Denise with respect to Sam and Kaia, Will proceeded to brush the question away and focus on the rest of his partner's statement. “Do I need to remind you Denise has fifteen granddaughters, ranging between 18 to 24?”

The question earned a small smirk from his lover as she laughed, “Fifteen pretty girls flirting with him should keep him fairly occupied, don't you think?”

“Maybe just a little,” the Colonel snarked, with a smirk and a roll of his eyes. “All right . . . get the word out. We'll keep an eye open up here.”

“Copy that, Boss,” Owen agreed, with a grin and a wink, moving to pass the news along as he melted back into the shadows.

Marina rounded on her lover, mouth pinched furiously as she hissed, “They have a lot of nerve!”

“Agreed,” Will sighed, reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose as a migraine built steadily behind his eyes. “Damn, I need a drink.” The sight of his partner working herself up into a rant caused him to reach out and smooth his hands over her arms, as he insisted firmly, “And you need to calm down.”

Marina all but exploded at the admonition, “I am pissed, Misha!”

“I know . . . and as soon as they see you the boys are gonna know too. Which means they'll just worry about what's gone wrong. So you need to calm down and try to put this out of your mind for the time being. There is nothing we can do about it right now.”

“Two hundred and fifty yards, Mishka . . . 250!!” she burst out, in a furious fit of pique.

Viktoriya Coulson, the only sensible one of the four sisters, could always be counted on to soothe the youngest of their quartet. Smoothing one hand over the bulge of her belly, she reached up with the other to tug her sister down into the seat beside her. “Deep breaths, sestrenka . . . there isn’t a single member of this family who's going to let the General hurt Sammy. Every single one of the boys are armed, and Vincent is here to play bodyguard. It's going to be okay.”

Veronika grinned wickedly from where she sat next to her lover, Jim Street, reminding her sister cheerfully, “If you'd just let me put a bullet in him the first time, this wouldn't be happening right now.”

Unable to prevent herself from laughing at the playful reminder, Marina groaned, “Nika!”

“I'm just saying!”

Will rolled his eyes fondly as he settled back into his seat next to his longtime partner, “No one is shooting the General.”

“Why not? It would solve a laundry list of problems,” the Russian huffed, though the Colonel could tell by the twist of her lips she wasn't seriously considering it . . . as much as she’d like to be.

“We're not shooting him, because Sammy asked us not to. He's made his choice and chosen this family. Let's not betray his trust like his own parents did please,” he reminded his partner, earning a twist of the mouth and another huff as she flopped back against the back of the pew.

Phil looked over at his brother-in-law and asked solemnly, “So what do we do about him?”

“We'll run him off when he gets here. With the kids taking pictures, with any luck, Sammy won't even know he was here.”

“It's a big if, Will,” Vika murmured, linking hands with her practically vibrating sister in an effort to calm her down.

Rubbing one hand over his face, Will sighed heavily as he conceded, “It's all I've got right now. We'll have to hope it's enough.”
Sorry for the long wait.

I would recommend that everyone read "In the Family Way" before the next chapter, as this story will skip to past that point next. We will touch on it a little bit, but there won't be much detail. If it happened in Ghost Protocol, we can assume that it happened in The Grimm Truth.

Translations are at the end as always. Part two of the Kenta Wedding. I hope you all enjoy!

Chapter 208: Family Ties Take 3

Knowing a thing intellectually is a great deal different from knowing a thing in reality.

Therefore, even having read the note for himself, there was still a part of Will Grimm that was both shocked and infuriated to see the General and his wife arrive shortly after the ceremony had concluded and the bridal party was off getting their pictures taken. If the way Marina went stiff at his side was any indication, he hadn't been the only one to notice either. One hand came up to fold over the back of her neck, as he ordered calmly, “Steady, Marishka.”

“And we're absolutely sure that I can't shoot him?” she hissed vehemently, even as her body consciously relaxed into him.

Will smirked, leaning over to kiss her hair. “I love you, samaya malen'kaya.”
Tilting her head back, she wrinkled her nose as she teased him, “Of course you do . . . you are a smart man.” Lifting her hand to his cheek, she caressed the curve gently as she sobered. There was an uncharacteristic seriousness to her features as she locked onto brilliant blue ones. “Ya lyublyu tebya, moy Mishka, vsegda.”

The Colonel smiled, bending to her height, with his palms cradling her cheeks. Their kiss was languid and easy, an uncharacteristic display of affection that was nevertheless steadying for them both.

When at last they broke apart, Will sighed in reluctant resignation. “Shall we?”

“Shall we indeed,” she purred, looping her hand into his elbow and allowing him to lead her across the room.

The eldest Grimm was not unaware of how he looked when he was pissed off. His own brothers had nicknamed his resting face as his “I will fuck you up, bitch” face. His lover had teased him more than once about the terrific horror to be found when he combined that with his stone-featured Colonel-face. He could feel his features hardening, and – for the first time ever – he simply could not bring himself to care. He just wanted the Braddocks to go away, preferably with a long walk off a short pier.

As they neared the couple, Will spoke, his tone as cold and hard as his eyes. “Do you not understand the purpose of a restraining order? Because you are currently in violation of one.”

“Marta is my sister!” Diana protested furiously, glaring up at the officer as though he was personally to blame for her invitation being rescinded.

He gave her a cold, flat smirk as he reminded her wryly, “Yes, and she was very clear on the details of your attendance. If you would like to stay, Mrs. Braddock, fine.” Twisting slightly to take in her husband, Will insisted, “He will have to leave. He is not welcome here.”

“Please . . . I just want to apologize to my son,” the General pleaded, eyes broken and sincere.

However, the Colonel had not earned the reputation of being a cold-hearted bastard by being nice to people. Shaking his head firmly, he all but growled at the older man. “Not a chance in hell. If and when Sammy wants your apology, he will seek you out for it.”

Marina's features were murderous as she chimed in next, “And until then, you stay the required 250 meters away from him.”

“But . . .”

“General Braddock, I will have to insist you leave or I will have you arrested for violating your restraining order,” was the only response, Will's tone brusque and unforgiving. He had officially run out of fucks to give.

Glancing over his shoulder, he smiled to see his best friend lurking just outside of his peripheral view. “Lucky . . . would you do me a favor?”

“Sure thing, Boss,” Owen grinned, the expression sinister and manic. “Just tell me who I need to kill.”

Smirking at the startled look in Diana Braddock's eyes, Will joked, “I may take you up on that eventually, Owen, but for right now . . .”
Turning back to the Braddocks, he announced, “You have two options. First; you leave and you don't look back. You stay as far away from my son as you can and maybe, just maybe, in another fifty years while you're both lying on your deathbeds, Sam will forgive you for everything you put him through while he was growing up.” Laying a hand on Owen's shoulder then, he continued, “Your second option is the much bloodier one.”

Nodding in surrender, Gregory Braddock turned to look at his wife. “I'll go. Stay . . . Marta is your sister.”

Diana frowned as she argued quietly, “Marta and I have never been close, Greg, you know that.”

“Then maybe it's time to put forth the effort and try to change that. Just stay and pretend to give a damn,” Braddock argued, earning a blink from his wife and a smirk from their new in-laws. (Now there was a thought. Just the idea that he was now related by marriage to these two lethal individuals before him . . . it felt as though someone had dragged an ice cube up his spine. It was an unpleasant sensation and he resolved to avoid it from then on.)

Bending, Braddock kissed his wife's cheek before turning on his heel and striding away. A voice from the shadows by the door made him jump and he spun to see Fury leaning against the wall, a shark's grin on his face. “You're not nearly as stupid as you look, Braddock, I'm impressed.”

“I can learn.”

“Apparently. Remember what I said, Braddock . . . you'll live longer if you do,” was the last thing the S.H.I.E.L.D. director said before the Canadian general hauled open the doors of the conservatory and moved out of sight.

Diana whirled on the two officers, all but spitting nails. “I can’t believe you ran him off! He's my husband!”

“Yes, and you were informed at the time you received your invitation, neither Marta nor Sam wanted him here. You declined to come without him and instead chose to attempt to make a scene the day of the wedding itself by arriving unannounced and husband in tow.”

Marina's features twisted, as she scolded, “They're called manners. If you're not invited, don't show up.”

“And what the hell do you know about manners? You're a common killer . . . you're worth nothing to anyone who truly matters. You will never be anything more than a waste of perfectly breathable air,” Diana sneered, lifting her chin and looking down her nose at the former Russian assassin.

Will's entire frame locked up at the insult, but surprisingly it was Marta's voice which rang through the conservatory. “She matters to me.”

Diana whirled at the sound of her sister's voice, seeing her sister standing in the door jamb, fingers white-knuckled where they clutched the frame. “Marta, you are a child . . . your judgment when making friends has always been sorely lacking. Peter could take care of you! He could provide for you! He could . . .”

Marta's face was stone as she interrupted her sister furiously. “Shut. Up. Di.” The hem of her skirt swished around her knees as she moved deeper into the room. “I'm not a child and you are not my mother. I have every right to make my own choices about the people who are in my life.”

“She's a killer Marta!”
“I know. And I don't care.” Straightening her shoulders, the virologist stared her sister down calmly. “She was kind to me, when I had done very little to deserve it. She matters to Sam, who would do anything for her . . . to make her happy, to make her smile. Rene adores her, because she loved him from the moment she laid eyes on him, no question or hesitation. She is everything to those boys she raised and who are only alive because she put her life on the line for them.” Looking up at Will, she smiled tremulously. “She matters to the Colonel . . . she is everything to him.”

Turning back to her sister, Marta clenched her hands and bit her lip hard. “They taught Aaron how to love . . . and I will be forever grateful for that. Because he loves me, Di . . . he loves me more than anyone ever has. So you can take your disappointment and your anger that I rejected your precious Peter and shove it where the sun don't shine.”

“Marta, I am your sister . . . I only want what is best for you.”

There was infinite sadness and total resolution on the scientist's face as she replied, “Then leave . . . and don't come back. I don't need your kind of love in my life anymore.”

Diana stared at her sister in shock, clearly surprised by the statement. “Marta, you don't mean that.”

Lower lip trembling, Marta clutched her dress in her fists as she nodded. “I do. I love you, Di, but that just isn't enough to justify your place in my life anymore.” Back stepping quickly as Diana moved towards her, she ducked back behind Will quickly. The Colonel said nothing, only wrapped an arm around her shoulders and put himself between the two sisters.

The General's wife froze, horrified by what was happening in front of her. “Marta . . .”

“Please, Diana, I'm begging you . . . just go.”

The two women stared at each other for a long time, before Diana straightened her shoulders and jabbed a finger towards the door. “If I walk out that door, Marta, I am gone. You are dead to me. And when this so-called 'true love' of yours is over, don't come running back to me.” The older sister's face twisted as she sneered, “You'll screw it up, Marta . . . you always do.”

Aaron's tone was glacial as he barked, “Get the fuck out before I throw you out, bitch.”

Marta all but lunged into her newly wedded husband's arms, taking comfort in his presence as he squared off with her only remaining family. “You are no longer welcome here, so kindly remove yourself from the premises. Marta is my wife and I will not stand silently by while you malign her and mistreat her and misjudge her.”

Owen all but materialized next to the elder Shearing sister and clamped a hand around her elbow. “If you'll follow me, Mrs. Braddock . . . I'm sure there's a lovely little corner of hell just waiting for you to arrive,” he insisted cheerfully, all but dragging her towards the exit.

The former Outcome operative looked down at his wife with a frown. “Are you okay?”

“T'm fine. I've been wanting to say that for years,” she laughed shakily, her fingers finding their way into the lapel of his uniform coat. Grinning up at her husband, she begged, “Can we go dance now?”

“Your wish is my command,” the man agreed, bending to kiss her sweetly, before turning back to the older couple. “Thank you for taking care of her for me.”

“She's family, Kenny. We always take care of our own.” Marina reminded him from her Colonel's arms, reaching out to lay a gentle hand on his shoulder. “Come on. I'm sure everyone is wondering where the hell we have disappeared to.”
“Probably not . . . everyone is still out taking pictures. We're just waiting on the two of you.”

“Us?”

“Well yeah . . . you were practically my parents growing up. I want you in my pictures.” One corner of his lips curled upwards as he teased, “Is that okay with you?”

Will clapped his brother on the shoulder with a wide grin. “More than okay. We're proud of you, little brother.”

There was a soft blush to his ears as the second youngest Grimm grinned in return. “Thanks, Will.”

It should never be said that the Brothers Grimm didn't know how to throw a party.

Before long, Diana Braddock and her nefarious husband had been completely forgotten in the flurry of the reception. There was the sound of loud music and raucous laughter to chase her memory away, and exquisite food and free-flowing alcohol to drown out her words. Soon it was as though she had never even been there.

Denise Perron had taken great pleasure in introducing Sam to her granddaughter Kaia. Though Denise liked Talia Anderson, Marina was her dear friend; she was more than up for anything that would help the Russian in the long run. Before long, the twosome was chatting amiably about various deployments while Jules' face was turning a sickly puce green on the other side of the room. (As to the matter of Talia herself, Marina knew the instant Kaia told Sam about her adorable girlfriend. The way her son slumped with relief was impossible to miss.)

Marina couldn't remember a time she'd laughed so much. Shockingly, she had been wrestled out onto the dance floor by her lover more than once, causing happiness to sing through her being. It was no secret that Will hated to dance and, to be honest, pretended to be not a very good at it so as to avoid having to do it. But he seemed devoted to making her happy and so she giggled like a schoolgirl every time he swung her around the floor with an uncharacteristic grin on his adored and adoring face.

It had been several hours when finally Marta got up onto the impromptu stage that they had erected for the DJ's stand. Accepting the microphone from the DJ, she turned back to face the attentive crowd. “All right. So Aaron and I argued a lot about this next part of the night. My father died when I was very young, and to spare my feelings, my loving husband had proposed to skip the traditional 'father/daughter' and 'mother/son' dances.”

Smiling tremulously towards where Marina and Will sat together at a table, the Russian perched on her Colonel's knee, Marta continued, “That however wouldn't have been fair. Because while my father was gone, Aaron's mother was still here. And I would never have been able to forgive myself if they weren't allowed to have this special moment together on the day of our wedding.” Nodding at the DJ, she insisted, “And so, now for the mother/son dance.”

Marina had straightened sharply when Marta had mentioned Aaron's mother, and when her second youngest boy appeared at her side with a smile, she could do little more than blink at him. Cobalt blue eyes twinkled down at her as he insisted, “May I have this dance?”

“Kenny, are you sure?” she breathed hesitantly, eyes wide and awed as he offered her a very stately bow.

“Marina, you're my mother . . . you always have been.” Offering her his hand, he begged, “Let me have this dance with you?”
She stared up at him in shock for what felt like an eternity, before the sun broke across her face in a joyful smile. Accepting his hand, she let him lead her into the middle of the dance floor to the accompaniment of a dozen cheers and thunderous applause. Taking up waltz position with him in the center of the dance floor, she beamed up at him for a moment before the music began to play.

At which point, she started to cry.

“Hey mom, I know that it's late,
Hope I didn't wake you.
Yeah everything's okay,
I just needed to talk to you.

“I had one of those days,
But I didn't call to complain.
Just to say everything I didn't for all of those years.

“You were a taxi cab driver, a nurse and a maid,
A waitress, a cook and a shoulder to lay
My head on to cry on, when nothing was going my way.
You knew every answer without crackin’ a book,
And I took for granted that I had it so good.
And I'm sorry it's taken me so long to say,
Thank you, I love you, twenty years late.”

Bending his head, Aaron pressed his forehead against Marina's own as he sang along with the words, feeling Marina's tears roll down her face as though they were his own. The Russian was sobbing, her shoulders shuddering as she clutched to him tightly.

“I don't know how you did it, I can't find one spare minute,
The days run together, but I don't remember you ever,
Letting us down.

“You were the judge and the jury when I did wrong,
You were my biggest fan from my very first song,
The gas and the engine that always kept me moving on,
A seamstress, a councilor and the one referee,
That could stop a fight between my brothers and me.
And I'm sorry it's take me so long to say,
Thank you, I love you, twenty years late.”

Wrapping his arms around her, he buried his face into her neck as they stopped dancing. The song still played as they hugged, just enjoying this moment they had together, the one that belonged to them and them alone.

“I'll let you go now, but I hope you know now,
How I feel.
Thank you for making me the man I've become.
I love you and I will always be your son.
Mom, that's all I called to say,
Twenty years late.

“Hey mom, I know that it's late,
I just needed to talk to you.”
When the last strains of the song faded away, Aaron lifted his face from her neck. Brushing a curl out of her face, he insisted, “I love you, sestra.”

Marina choked on her tears as she cupped his face in her palms, promising, “I love you, solnyshko . . . and I am so proud of you. I am so glad you found Marta and she makes you happy. It's all I ever wanted for you.”

“Thank you for teaching me what love meant and how amazing it could be. I could have never had this if it wasn't for you and Will.”

“I wouldn't be so sure about that, Kenny. I think you probably would have been just fine on your own.” Brushing at her tears, the S.H.I.E.L.D. handler caught sight of Marta waiting behind them patiently. There was a warm smile on her lips as she took her boy by the shoulders and spun him around to face her. “That's your future, solnyshko. Don't you dare look back.”

Stumbling forward at the sharp shove she gave his shoulders, Aaron grinned back at her over his shoulder before moving to take Marta into his arms. She grinned up at him, her hands trailing up his arms to lock behind his neck. “Sergeant Grimm.”

His smile beamed at her as he teased, “Dr. Grimm.”

Her eyes slipped closed and she sighed, “I could get used to hearing you say that.”

“I could get used to saying it,” he replied, trailing his knuckle down her cheek. “I love you.”

The look of joy and excitement on the scientist's face could have powered the room at the declaration. “I love you too . . . so much.”

He lifted her to his lips then and they exchanged their second real kiss as husband and wife. And if they noticed that eruption of cheers, whistles and catcalls that filled the area around them . . . neither of them gave any sign.

They were living in their own little world and it was perfect.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for his longtime partner, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) moy Mishka - my Misha (Misha is a diminutive of Michael/Mikhail; Will's middle name is Michael and Misha is Marina's most common nickname for her longtime lover)
(R) Vsegda - always
(R) sestra - sister (one of the lesser used nicknames for Marina by her boys)
(R) solnyshko - sunshine (Marina's nickname for Aaron/Kenny)
Hey guys, so as I said, this chapter takes place following the Cahill outtake "In the Family Way". It's mostly covering what's happened to this point, so we can make our time jump and get going on what everyone really wants . . . the MCU.

I hope you guys enjoy this and that you let me know what you think. Your comments make my LIFE!

Translations at the bottom as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 209: Exposition and Backstory

If Marina had been hoping Aaron and Marta’s wedding was the start of some rest and relaxation, she ended up being terribly disappointed. In point of fact, the wedding ended up being the start to a whirlwind of events.

The best thing to happen during those months was also the first thing to happen. Yasha Filipovich Coulson was the first of the children born to the Merry Murderesses, and his parents could not be more delighted with him. Weighing in at 10 pounds and 8 ounces, the boy was a joy to the entire family. If the training agents had thought Phil was scary following his return from his honeymoon, they found him even more terrifying now after the successful birth of his first child.

Viktoriya had implored her youngest sister to be her son's godmother, a role Marina had agreed to exuberantly, joy and excitement shining in her plain but pleasant features. Phil had once again turned to the Colonel, imploring the man to be Yasha's godfather. Will had surprised the handler by blushing, practically stammering as he consented to the other man's earnest request. It was no secret the two colonels spoiled their godson more than his own parents did.

The return of Tony Stark from captivity in Afghanistan occurred barely a week after Yasha’s birth. S.H.I.E.L.D. was aware of his abduction and had sent more than a few agents into the area discretely to try and track him down. The Ten Rings had long been one of their primary targets in the Middle East; both Brian and Natasha had been dispatched to the Sandbox several times over the years to track down various leaders of the ring.

And then came the sudden appearance of “The Iron Man”, raising more than a few eyebrows among S.H.I.E.L.D’s upper echelon.

It quickly became apparent Tony Stark himself was Iron Man. Except for maybe Jason Grimm, who S.H.I.E.L.D. kept a close eye on to avoid such toys, there was no other engineer in the world who could design and manufacture the suit so effectively. With no other option, Phil Coulson had gone to Malibu to check in on the situation. Marina had protested, seeing as her sister Vika had just given birth to their son and they needed him more than the world did. Surprisingly, it had been Vika who insisted Phil go; the married couple knew their jobs and knew how important those jobs were to both national security and stability.

Even considering Phil's presence at the scene as it were, no one wanted to look too deeply into the details of Tony Stark or Iron Man. The satellite footage of Iron Man completely decimating the Ten Rings' stronghold was met with celebration. Iron Man had done S.H.I.E.L.D. a huge favor by taking them out, something S.H.I.E.L.D. had never been allowed to do on their own. They owed him a debt of gratitude, even if they owed him little else.

Every superhero story has a villain though; first comes captivity, then comes metal suit, then comes Obadiah Stane. Marina still huffed to herself wherever someone mentioned him. Frankly the man was an ass. Stark was a playboy and a genius, and those two things rarely combined well. But he had been genuinely trying to atone for his mistakes and the blasé attitude he had held towards the deaths he caused.

Attempting to ruin all of that development for the sake of money? Just as well the man was dead.

Stark's announcement of “I am Iron Man!” caused a media flurry unlike anything anyone had ever seen before. The Hot Airhead Panel was pushing Fury to take control of both Stark and Iron Man, getting more and more irritating every time they called. Regrettably, his irritation rolled over onto the rest of his agents, and there were more than a few times Marina contemplated shooting him, just to put him out of everyone's misery.

Of course, then Ethan Hunt crashed landed back into her lover's life like the heat-seeking missile he was. Will and Marina had gone with the Secretary of Defense to Moscow, to participate in some peace talks. Despite her partner's concern for her safety, Marina had been adamant; he was not going alone. She'd donned some hideously disfiguring glasses over hazel contacts and been given an entirely new identity, thereby allowing her walked unimpeded through Moscow's international airport and into the motorcade waiting for them.

Neither Will nor Marina had told the Secretary of their relationship, or who she truly was. They had told him she was a skilled interpreter and her presence would be useful, and the Secretary had allowed her to come with no questions asked. As a result, she would never forget the conversation she had overheard between the two men after she'd decamped from the conference room for a brief moment.

The Secretary was an older man with smug features. Leaning back in his chair lazily, he looked Will square in the face and asked, "How's your Russian assassin, Brandt?"

Will jolted hard at the question, quicksilver eyes flashing to the Russians conferring amongst themselves on the other side of the table. Marina's safety depended on the Russians continuing to believe she had been killed by the Winter Soldier so many years ago. Her insistence on accompanying him had already set his nerves on edge; he was literally shedding years off his life like a dog shed water from its coat.

Biting down on his snide response, the Colonel responded carefully, "She's not a Russian assassin, sir. She works for us now."

Cocking an eyebrow, the Secretary sipped on his own mug as he took in Will's face. "She's Russian, isn't she?"

Sighing heavily, Will leaned forward on his elbows and nodded, "Yes sir. Born in Kemerovo, Siberia."

"She's an assassin, isn't she?"

"She used to be sir. She's a handler for S.H.I.E.L.D. now," Will reminded him, earning uplifted eyebrows and a look of disbelief from the other man. It was a long time before Will grunted and caved, "Yes sir, she is."

Grinning as though he'd won the lottery, the Secretary smacked Will's back companionably and demanded, "All right then. How's your little Russian assassin, Brandt?"

Gritting his teeth, the analyst forced a skull's grin as he agreed, "She's fine, sir, thank you for asking."

"Good to hear," he chortled, turning back to the delegation as one of the Russian Ministers approached.

The Gadyuka was not a spy for nothing. She slipped back into the room unobtrusively and trailed the edge of her pinky along the back of Will's neck to offer him what support and comfort she could without blowing their cover. One of his hands came up to fold over the back of his neck, his fingers moving as he spelled out O.K. Settling in her seat to Will's left, she nodded briskly to acknowledge she'd received the message. There was no time to address the conversation, however, as the next thing anyone knew, the Kremlin had exploded and the Impossible Missions Force was being blamed.

Peace talks pretty much dissolved from there.

The Secretary had demanded her partner join him on a quick side trip before they met up with the rest of the delegation at the airstrip to catch their ride home. The look on his face when Marina had grabbed her lover by the ears and proceeded to kiss the hell out of him had made the entire trip worth it. She had smirked all the way back to the airstrip.

The smirk had been wiped off her face as soon as the plane was in the air and neither the Secretary nor her lover were back aboard. She’d gotten a phone call from an unknown number and everything had spiraled downwards from there.

The only good thing to happen during that time was Marina's discovery she was two months pregnant. It was a dream both she and Will had prayed for more than once; to have it finally come true was more than either had ever imagined was possible for them. The look on Will's face as they had stood on the tarmac in Dubai, reveling together in their news... it would linger in her favorite fantasies for the rest of her life.

Whatever happened from there, Will had come home from the op nearly blinded by his concussion and riding on a proverbial cloud nine. The two had cuddled together in bed for nearly a week, reveling in the life growing with her body and the miracle which had created it. To date, this had been the easiest recovery Will – and by extension, Marina – had ever had.

Of course, then there was her eldest son... and his rekindled relationship with one Julianna Callaghan.

Introducing him to Kaia had been both a blessing and a curse. On the one hand it had kept Sam from missing Jules and kept him focused on the person with him. Kaia was hilariously deadpan and the two had gotten on from the word go. He had genuinely enjoyed being her escort. On the other, it had clued Jules in to the little catch in her plans stemming from her feelings for Sam. The rush of jealousy she'd experienced watching Sam and Kaia move together on the dance floor had cleared things up for her quickly. So while Marina would have preferred Sam steered clear of the relationship, he was 27 years old and his own man. There was really nothing she could or should say to gainsay him from whatever was going to make him happy.

Her boys were understandably shocked by this development. Their beloved Russian was notorious for being unable to hold her tongue. She said what she thought, typically without censoring, and everyone else simply had to deal with it. When it came to the petite SRU constable, however, Marina had been consciously censoring herself. She knew in spite of everything, Sam was still in love with the woman and any of Marina's diatribes would only cause him pain.

The two were once again keeping their relationship a secret from the brass and even though Marina understood the necessity for it, she didn't like it. The secrecy had ended their previous relationship, as well as Jules' obsession with her job, and starting another relationship on the same grounds as the last felt as though they were only repeating the same mistakes. Mistakes which could inevitably lead to no different ending than the one before.

Either way, it was not her place to say anything. Jules knew Marina's feelings on the matter. And though she and Sam had never explicitly talked about it, Sam was more than aware that his Ma's feelings towards Jules Callaghan had considerably cooled in the aftermath of their first relationship.

(However, if she happened to rant to her lover in vehement Russian after everyone else had gone to sleep, whatever she said was between her and her Mishka. If there was one thing Marina could trust about her lover, it was his ability to keep a secret.)

Of course, all of this led them to where they were now. The Hulk had broken Harlem. Though if Marina was being truthful, the Hulk hadn't been the problem. Thaddeus Fucking Ross, however . . . of him she could not say the same. Marina rested one hand on her slightly protruding belly as she stared out at the mess the Hulk and Ross' Abomination had created at Culver University. “You think Ross is every going to learn to keep his nose out of other people's business?”

Will chuckled as he shook his head, “I doubt it. He seems destined to be a thorn in our sides.”

The Russian bit down hard on her lower lip, feeling her body contort around the constantly moving forms of her twin daughters. “Hush now, devochki . . . Mama needs a break,” she soothed, drawing absent designs across the distended swell.

Grinning, Will laid his palm alongside hers. “That's my girls.”

Marina glowered at him, scolding fiercely. “That will be quite enough out of you, Colonel Grimm. They do not need any encouragement from the peanut gallery, thank you very much.”

“Yes ma'am,” he teased, dodging her playful slap. Lifting her hand, he pressed a sweet kiss to the back before leaping away from another swing at his head. “Ya lyublyu tebya, zhena chzhina . . . samaya malen'kaya . . . moya sumasshedshaya devochka.”

The sound of his laughter followed him as he disappeared from the command tent, leaving Marina behind to coordinate the S.H.I.E.L.D. agents while he took command of the Army contingent Ross had left behind. “Ooh, that man makes me crazy,” she muttered, before turning away from the door towards the main Hub.

Her hands moved in an unconscious caress over the swell of her stomach as she watched the clean up through the giant monitors Jason's techs had set up in the command tent. Lifting one hand, she went to point at an overturned tank, when a hard grip closed around her bicep and swung her around.

Her eyes went wide as she was suddenly nose to nose with General Thunderbolt Ross. Even as she gaped at him in horror, she could not stop herself from taking him in. He was definitely older, his hair having gone steel gray in the intervening years. Those eyes were still as cold and as piercing as ever, and Marina could feel herself shrinking back away from him fearfully as she had so many times before. A cruel sneer disfigured his face as he leaned into her space.

Finally, he spoke, his tone a yell as he barked in her face. “You Russian bitch! You traitorous, heinous bitch! Where are there!?”

Here there was a pause, before he roared at the top of his lungs, “What the fuck did you do with my Cahills!”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Filipovich - a Russian patronymic that identifies Phil Coulson as the father of Yasha Coulson Gadyuka - Viper (Marina's call sign given to her by the Krasnata Komnaya and the Akademiya) devochki - girls
ya lyublyu tebya - I love you zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for his partner, Marina)
samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina) moya sumasshedshaya devochka - my crazy girl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for Marina)
Hey guys! No real translations. Please . . . your comments make my life! Let me know what you think. I love to get them and to read them. Thank you so much for all the time you guys have invested in this fic. It makes my life!!
Chapter 210: Complications and Insubordinations

The words reverberated through the command tent, the agents inside shocked by the knowledge that someone would have the nerve to manhandle the Viper in such a way. Marina's eyes were huge as she stared up at the uniformed officer, her body visibly shrinking away from him as her free hand came up to cradle her belly protectively.

As for Sam Grimm, he was pissed. His jaw locked furiously as one hand reached back for the service pistol holstered at his back. Before he could say anything however, a calm voice insisted firmly, “Let her go, sir!”

The blond's head whipped around, eyes going wide at the sight of Grant Ward appearing almost magically from the shadows. Frowning, he considered the other agent; he hadn't even known Ward had been assigned to this op. Then he took in the way he was watching the Russian and suddenly understand; Dad had assigned Ward to be Ma's bodyguard. Snorting lightly in ill-placed mirth, Sam muttered, “Oh boy. That's gonna end well.”

Ross himself didn't seem to give a damn for anything the other agent had to say, shaking the Russian agent sharply. “Where are they, bitch!? What did you do with my Cahills!?”

The name jolted Sam out of his reverie and he reached up slowly, triggering his comm. “Braddock to Brandt . . . Dad, please have your comm on.”

Will Grimm's tone was concerned as he asked, “Sammy? What's wrong?”

“There's some guy here. He's got Ma and he's practically tossing her around like a ragdoll.”

There was a distinct bite in the Colonel's tone as he barked, “What!?”

“I don't know who he is, Dad . . . I've never seen him before. Ma's scared of him and he keeps asking her what she did with the Cahills.”

The explanation caused both Owen and Will to let loose with the filthiest string of curse words Sam had ever heard from either of them. When at last they calmed, Owen snapped, “It's Ross . . . Thunderbolt fucking Ross.”

Sam blinked at the name. He'd never seen Ross, either in person or in a picture, but he was more than aware of who the man was. And what he'd done to his father and uncles. He could feel his features hardening into stone, rage building in his heart. “I'm gonna kill him.”

“No!” his dad barked, stone calm and utterly resolute. “You're going to protect your Ma. Where's Ward? Is he there?”

“Yeah . . . as soon as Ma was threatened, Ward came out of the shadows.” Chuckling mirthlessly, Sam insisted, “Ma is gonna hit the fan when she finds out you assigned her a bodyguard.”

“She knew . . . I just didn't tell her who they were so she couldn't ditch them like she does all the others.” There was a pause, the other two men clearly talking amongst themselves, before Will was back on the comm. “Keep an eye on the situation. Get Marina free if you can. If you can't, do not provoke Ross. Lucky and I are on our way back to you.”

“Copy that,” Sam agreed, eyes fixated on the scene as he watched Ward slide a small inch closer. Whistling in a low undertone, the blond called the other man's attention. Ross was focused on Marina, so when the tall agent looked over Sam felt comfortable asking, “Can I trust you? That's my Ma.”

Grant Ward was renown for being an excellent field agent, excellent at solo ops . . . and abysmal at social relationships. And yet, when he looked back at Sam and vowed, “She’s my responsibility; I will not let her down,” the blond agent believed him.

“Good. Dad says not to provoke Ross. They're on their way back. We just gotta try to get Ma free.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Ward agreed, gesturing Sam to take up position on the other side of the tent, essentially caging Ross and Marina between them.

Of course, it was about then Ross swung his free hand and backhanded Marina across the face, her tiny body tossing at the force. At the sound of her pained whimper, Sam literally saw red. The sudden feeling of his sidearm against his palm surprised him, as he didn't remember drawing the weapon. Ward's tone was firm but calm as he called again, “General Ross . . . I am going to have to insist you release Agent Petrovka right now.”

The name brought Ross' attention away from Marina finally, eyes snapping with fury as they glared at Ward. “What the hell are you talking about!?"

“That would be my superior, sir, Agent Marina Petrovka. Senior handler with the Strategic Homeland Intervention Enforcement and Logistics Division,” Ward explained calmly, his hands clenching reflexively around the gun he had aimed at the older man.

“Bullshit! This bitch is Mary Peters! She's a traitor and a thief! She owes the federal government millions of dollars in destroyed hardware.” Shaking Marina again, he roared in her face, “I've waited thirty years for this, Peters!”

Sam forced himself to loosen his grip on his gun as he spoke, “Sir, how old was Miss Peters when you last saw her?”

The question seemed to throw Ross off as he looked up, blinking at the blond in question. “What the hell are you talking about! Why does it matter! This bitch is finally going down . . . she won't get away from me again.”

Ward seemed to pick up on Sam’s reasoning behind the question, “Sir . . . does she look thirty to you? I am going to have to insist you release her . . . Agent Petrovka is currently in a very delicate condition due to her pregnancy. Please . . . let's just think about this before you do something you'll regret.”

Marina cried out as Ross' hand suddenly tightened in a vice grip, his face contorting as he shouted, “No! You're on her side! I'll haul you all up in front of a review board! I will have my revenge!”

Sam all but sagged as his dad's voice suddenly broke through Ross' rant. “General sir . . . I am going to have to insist you release Agent Petrovka . . . this instant.”

The Russian's voice was choked, tears of fear and pain streaming down her face as she struggled against Ross' grip. Whether that fear was due to Ross hurting her or to Will standing clear as day in front of the general, Sam was pretty sure no one would ever know. She strained forward, sobbing, “Misha!”

Rage and fear battled with calm on Will's face, and Sam felt himself stiffen up as his dad gave his partner a small, sad smile. “It's okay, Marina. You're okay.”
“No,” she begged breathlessly, groaning quietly as she bent over to hunch around her belly. “Please no.”

The anxiety on the eldest Grimm's face was palatable, though he forced himself to remain where he was. Glancing around the command center, Will boomed, “Everybody out!”

“Sir!” came the expected protest from the head technician.

“Now!” the man roared furiously, sending the junior agents and techs scrambling for the closest exits.

While the command tent was emptying, Owen slipped into view, taking up position on the other side of Ross from his best friend, leaving Ross the center of a four man cage. Of the four men, Sam's dad was only one not currently aiming a gun at the enraged officer. However, Clint was not the only Grimm with a fast draw and an exceptionally accurate aim; Sam had no doubts his dad could get a shot off before any of the rest of them if the situation called for it.

Sam shifted slightly as Will moved cautiously forward. “What do you want to know about the woman you're currently terrorizing? Do you want to know that she was born January 31, 1966 . . . that she's older than I am and the love of my life? Do you want to know that she was born in Siberia . . . that she was KGB . . . but we met while I was on leave in the states and she defected for me? Do you want to know that she turned herself in to the Pentagon voluntarily? That she was thoroughly interrogated for a month before being released, with a commission with the Army as a Major?”

Will shifted forward further, trying to get close enough to where Marina was now hanging limply from Ross' grip, her body contracted into itself and a low keen coming from deep in her throat. “Do you want to know that she's five months pregnant with my daughters? That it's been a high risk pregnancy from the start? That she's been so strong and so patient, when all I want to do is wrap her in bubble wrap and prevent her from doing anything ever again?

“Do you want to know about her boys? The men who have sworn their loyalties to her? Who will do anything to protect her? Do you want to know about her sons, one of whom has a gun to your head and no problem pulling the trigger if he thinks you're going to hurt her?”

Taking another step forward, Will begged, “Tell me what you want to know . . . and I'll tell you. Just please . . . let her go.”

Sam held his breath, watching the two officers stare at each other, Marina still dangling from the general's grip. For a second, it seemed as though Will had gotten through to the other man, that he was going to let Marina go. But then, Ross seemed to shake himself free from whatever reverie Will had caused. Marina screamed as he yanked her up, shouting, “No! She will not get away from me again!”

Almost before he'd finished speaking, Will had his gun in hand and double tapped the trigger, putting two bullets in the other man. Ross stared in shock, blinking sharply as his grip on the Russian agent went lax. Marina collapsed to the ground with a sob and Sam holstered his weapon, dashing forward in a crouch to lift her up and get her out of the way. The Russian's fingers were claws as they dug into Sam's shoulders, her face buried in his neck as she cried.

The end of Will's pistol was smoking, his eyes cold as he watched Ross look down at his own chest, seeing the two neat holes clustered together in his left shoulder. The sight of Ross going to his knees seemed to jolt Will free from his own thoughts and he took a deep breath, eyes warming as he holstered his weapon. “Lucky . . . call Medical. We need EMS out here now.”
“Yes sir,” Owen agreed, teeth gritted as he watched Ward move forward to toss the general onto his stomach and cuff his hands behind him. The agent’s hands moved quickly, extracting the man's weapons and tossing them away. Finally, Ward hauled the man up into a seated position, back braced against a desk as he put pressure on the wounds in his chest. Twisting slightly, he nodded briskly at Will. “He’ll be okay . . . two exit wounds and no chance of injury to any major arteries. Medical should be here soon . . . he'll live. Regrettably.”

“Good,” the Colonel insisted. Rounding on his best friend, he ordered, “Watch him.”

“Copy that,” the former sergeant agreed, before the stone-cold Colonel facade broke and Will was dashing for his partner with a panicked cry, “Marishka!”

Sam released his Ma into her partner's hands, her body locked up as she all but dove into his arms, burying her face in his chest and her fingers white-knuckled where they dug into the nape of his neck. “Mishka . . .” she sobbed, trying to pull him closer to her as her tears practically shook her apart.

The man’s arms were vice tight as they pulled her into him, his hands moving like fire over her body as he tried to convince himself she was all right. His tone was low and soothing as he murmured, “It's okay, zhenvchuzhina . . . you're okay. WE are okay. Shhh . . . I've got you.”

Ross glowered at the two officers, Will's total concentration focused on his partner as she sobbed. “I'll have you drawn up on charges! I am a general! I'll have you discharged with a dishonorable . . . your career is over!”

Owen growled, but it was Ward who spoke up in answer. “You assaulted an unarmed and very pregnant S.H.I.E.L.D. agent, General Ross. Regardless of the outcome, you were in the wrong here.”

Marina moaned softly as she cuddled into her lover. “Misha . . . something's wrong. I don't feel good.”

“You bitch! This is all your fault!” Ross howled, furious. “I will see you both run out of the service!”

Seeing the concern on his best friend's face, Owen moved over to the general's side. “Shut up!” he barked, bending over to grab his injured arm and haul him to his feet, accompanied by a sharp grunt. “Before I shut you up.” Twisting back to look at Will, the man insisted, “Medical can find him outside just as easily as they can find him in here, Boss. Take care of her.”

Nodding in agreement, Will watched Ward and Owen escort the wounded general outside. Looking up at his son, the Colonel ordered firmly, “I need you to call Fury . . . get him on the phone. Explain what happened and let's get some sympathetic press coverage. If we don't get this under control, this is gonna be a clusterfuck.”

“Copy that,” Sam agreed, leaning forward to press a warm kiss to his Ma's cheek before dashing towards the door, already digging his phone from his pocket.

Marina flinched sharply, fingers digging into Will's neck. “Misha . . .” she moaned, panting hard as she convulsed in on her self. “Something wrong.”

Fear flashed across the Colonel's face, before he scooped her up into his arms and all but bolted from the command tent. “I need a medic over here!” he shouted, moving towards an unoccupied ambulance idling at the curb.

Almost immediately there were paramedics at his side, helping guide Marina onto the gurney as Will laid her down. The two were all business as they gently pushed Will out of the way, starting to take vitals and determine a preliminary diagnosis. The woman wrapped a blood pressure cuff around Marina's arm, demanding sharply, “How far along is she?”

“Five months,” Will answered, eyes locked on Marina's face as the Russian forced herself to take slow, deep breaths. “It's high risk . . . she's been under constant doctor's care. My sister-in-law is a doctor.”

“Her blood pressure is 160 over 90 . . .” the male paramedic reported, causing the woman to speak up. “You said she was high risk? Why?”

Biting down on his lip, the Colonel reached out to smooth back his partner's hair as he confessed sheepishly, “We had a hard time conceiving . . . she's older than I am and I'm almost 42. They were worried she wouldn't be able to carry to term.”

“All right, let's get her to the hospital. She's going to need to be checked out, just to be safe. We're taking her to Lenox Hill; the one here is already filled to capacity from all the wounded.” Will moved to follow as the man pushed the gurney into the ambulance, only to be stopped by the woman. “There's no room. You're gonna need to find another ride. I'm sorry,” she insisted, climbing up into the confines of the truck.

Nodding briskly, he watched as Marina reached for him before the man slammed the doors shut and dashed for the driver's side. He barely flinched as the sirens began to sound and the ambulance squealed away from the curb. Shoving his hands into his pockets, he stood there for a long moment before a hand came up to rest on his shoulder. Expecting Sam, Will blinked when he twisted and saw Nick Fury instead. There was a small smile on the Colonel's lips as he greeted him calmly, “Nick.”

“Will,” the other man agreed with a smirk. “Ross is on his way to the hospital. Braddock and Elliot are handling the clean up here. Ward has already left to keep an eye on Marina, make sure she's safe at the hospital.”

Will's lips compressed tightly as he nodded in agreement. “Thank you.” There was a long pause, before the Colonel spoke again, “I shot a superior officer. My career is over.”

“No, you protected an unarmed, pregnant woman who was being assaulted by a general.” Winking, his next statement was sly as he drawled, “The General is a good man, I'm sure, when he has all of his facilities in order. Once he's had time to think and to consider what's happened, he'll see he was in the wrong . . . not you.” There was a pause, before Fury shrugged, “And if he does not do it of his own volition, S.H.I.E.L.D. will ensure that he sees the light. We – I – have your back, Will, yours and Marina's both.”

There was a loosening of the tension in Will's shoulders, even as he protested, “He was adamant. He was not at all surprised to see Marina, looking exactly the same.”

“I know. Your son told me what happened.” Patting the other man on the shoulder, Fury gestured behind him. “Come on, I'll give you a ride to Lenox and you can fill in any of the holes.”

When Fury pulled up to the front of the hospital, the two men exchanged looks at the media presence outside. Sighing, the Colonel pulled out his phone as he announced, “Looks like the vultures are out.”

“I wonder what tipped them off,” Fury agreed, shifting the care back into gear as the other man called Ward. “You think they know Ross is here?”
“Considering he broke Harlem? I guarantee they paid attention,” the analyst grunted, before turning his attention back to his phone as Ward's voice came through the earpiece. “Ward! It's Brandt. We're here, but it's a circus outside.”

Ward's tone was severe as he agreed, “They showed up almost as soon as the ambulance carrying Ross arrived, sir. Combined with the rumors already circulating . . . I think the media is going to have a field day with this, sir.”

“Great,” he groaned, dropping his head back against the headrest. “How is Marina?”

“Resting. They gave her some ativan a little while ago to calm her.” There was a scoff, before he explained, “They tried to put Ross in the cubicle next to her. Agent Petrovka did not react well.”

“You have a gift for understatement, Ward, truly.”

The younger man's tone was confused as he replied, “Thank you, sir? I think?”

“It wasn't a compliment, Ward, just an observation.” Reaching up a hand to pinch the bridge of his nose, Will took a deep breath before asking, “Can you tell me anything about the ambulance bay?”

“What do you want to know, sir?”

“Is it empty?”

“Yes sir.”

“Good . . . I'll meet you at those doors in two minutes. Brandt out,” he reported briskly, before turning to Fury. “The ambulance bay is empty. Let's go.”

Fury nodded in silent agreement, pulling away from the milling crowd and heading towards the back of the hospital. The car hadn't even come to a complete stop before Will was jumping out and jogging towards where Ward waited, holding open the doors for him. The Colonel gave the young agent a tight smile as he clapped him on the shoulder firmly. “You did good. Thank you.”

“I just did my job, sir.”

“I know. That doesn't negate the fact you protected my woman and kept her safe for me. So thank you.” Slipping into the emergency room, Will waited as Ward pulled the doors shut behind them. “Where is she?”

“I'll take you to her. She was resting comfortably when I left her just a minute ago,” Ward promised.

When Ward finally pushed back a curtain, he waved the Colonel through before planting his feet and facing off with one of the battle-axe nurses coming their way. “Hello, Ms Taylor.”

The woman was older and heavyset, her arms akimbo as she shook her finger under the agent's nose. “Don't you, 'hello' me, Agent Sourpuss. Who the hell was that?! You can't just be lettin' any old asshole have access to my patients!? Who was he?”

Ward's face was amused as he replied calmly, “The baby daddy.”

Nurse Taylor's eyes narrowed in speculation, though she was clearly taken aback by Ward's use of the colloquialism. After a bit, she sighed. “I'll allow it . . . THIS time. Don't push your luck.”

“Yes ma'am,” he agreed, eyes solemn and fierce as he nodded in agreement.
Huffing, the woman scolded, “At least pretend to be a real boy . . . no one likes a sourpuss.”

Whatever the agent may have said in response was lost as the woman bustled along back down the walkway. His eyebrows furrowed as he considered the statement, before shrugging it off. He had a job to do and someone to protect; his responsibility to his superiors was all that mattered.

Meanwhile, the Colonel had paused just inside the cubicle. Marina lay curled up on her left side, her eyes closed and her hands balled into loose fists by her face. Will could feel his entire body sagging in relief at the sight of her. Taking in the monitors around her, he noted that her blood pressure was still elevated from her usual, but even still, it wasn't nearly as bad as it had been back at the site. Moving on silent feet, the eldest Grimm rounded the foot of the bed and settled into the chair next to her.

He would never be able to explain the nervousness which overtook him at the thought of touching her, but before long he was reaching out to take one of her hands in both of his own. Bringing it to his lips, he pressed a warm kiss to her knuckles. There was a drowsy smile on his partner's face as she struggled to open her eyes, purring softly, “Misha . . .”

“I'm here, samaya malen'kaya,” he promised, pressing another kiss to the back of her hand. “How are you feeling?”

She grinned at him, her eyes bright and shining if a little distant. “Wanna know a secret?”

“Sure,” he agreed with a fond grin. “What's your secret?”

“Ativan makes me sooo drunk,” she giggled brightly, her other hand reaching out and capturing the end of his nose in her fingers. “Boop.”
Chapter Notes

Hey all! Enjoy! It's a heartbreaker! :D

Translations at the end as always.

(Photobucket is down, but there IS a banner coming. Will add it when the site comes back up.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 211: Her Worst Nightmare

When Will pulled into the driveway, he sighed heavily at the sight of Brian standing on the porch. The second eldest Grimm was glowering fiercely at the Jeep, his arms folded over his chest and his body all but raring for a fight. Sam whistled under his breath from the backseat, his eyes flickering towards where Marina lay dozing with her head in his lap. “This looks like it's going to be fun.”
Will snorted lightly as he agreed, “Oh yeah . . . loads of fun, Samny.” Twisting in the driver's seat, he reached out to thread his fingers through her hair tenderly. “Marishka . . . we're home.”

There was a soft hum from the woman as she blinked, struggling to come up from under the drugging effects of the Ativan. “Mishka?” she asked quietly, her back arching as she stretched.

“Yeah . . . come on. Let's get you inside. I'm sure our bed will be more comfortable than the backseat of the car.”

“Kay,” she agreed with a yawn, allowing her son to help her sit up.

As unsteady on her feet as a newborn foal, Marina held tightly to both Sam and Will's hands as they guided her from the car. Once she was free of its confines, the Colonel scooped her up into his arms. She smiled at him tiredly, her arms coming up to loop around his neck as she rested her temple against his shoulder. “My hero.”

“Always,” he agreed with a soft laugh, a warm kiss pressing to her forehead settling her once again.

Striding towards the house, he watched Brian open his mouth and interrupted. “Not now.”

“Will,” the younger man protested sharply, earning a bark, “Not. Now.”

Jaw set, the S.H.I.E.L.D. agent glared for a moment before nodding sharply, “This isn't over.”

“I never would have dreamed it was,” the older brother agreed, smiling at Sam as his son pulled open the door, before the Colonel carried his drowsy partner into the house.

Will would have been lying if he'd said the sight of his brothers – all of them – and his father congregated together in his living room was a surprise. The media had had a field day with the news of General Thaddeus “Thunderbolt” Ross having allegedly been shot after assaulting a pregnant woman. His brothers would have panicked at this report, especially since the only pregnant woman Ross could have reason for assaulting was their sister. Ross' hatred of Mary Peters was legendary; their altercation could have been much worse.

Fortunately, whatever blast they'd been gearing up for was delayed when thirteen year old Rene looked up from where he was sitting on the loveseat with Marta and Casey and caught sight of his parents. There was a wordless sob, before he lunged from his seat and bolted at them head on.

“Mama!” he hiccupped, all but crashing into Marina as she loosened one arm from around Will's neck and gathered him to her.

“I'm all right, chado,” she promised with a tired smile. “Just a little shaken up.”

Smiling at the reunion between the two, the Colonel looked up and grunted at the stern look on his own father's face. “No, Dad. Not now.”

“Yes now!” Jason insisted furiously, jolting away from where he was leaning against the wall.

“What the fuck happened?”

“Jay . . . I said not now.”

“You can't avoid this, Will.”

“I'm not. You all have every right to lambast me for what happened . . .” he agreed, looking down in shock as Marina hauled back and punched him sharply in the chest. “Ow!”
“No they don't. They weren't there,” she insisted, her tone suddenly much stronger than it had been since her first dose of the relaxant. “You put yourself in danger to protect me. They have no right to say anything about what happened.”

“Yes they do, samaya malen’kaya. I promised not to be reckless, didn't I?”

“He was going to kill me,” she breathed, her eyes very wide as she stared up into his face. “He had every intention of seeing me burn in hell. You put everything you had ever fought for at risk, just to protect me.”

“And I would do it again in an instant,” he vowed, ducking his head to rest against her own. “Nothing is more important to me than you and our girls . . . nothing.”

Sniffling hard, the Russian used her arms to pull herself closer to her lover, burying her face in the side of his neck. The two stood there for a long second, analyst and assassin, taking comfort in the fact they were still together and still fighting. It seemed like an eternity before Marina yawned, her eyes fluttering sharply as the drugs started to catch up with her once again. Turning to his eldest, he asked, “Would you take your mom and your brother upstairs? She could use the rest and from the looks of things, Rene has no intention of letting her out of his sight for awhile.”

Sam grunted as he agreed, “I know the feeling. Yeah, let me take her.”

“No!” Marina protested sharply, tightening her arms fiercely as she protested. “I'm not leaving you.”

“Marishka, you need to rest. No stress. Remember what the doctor said.”

“Not without you,” she insisted stubbornly, hot chocolate eyes determined as she glared at him. “Zhemchuzhina . . .”

“I don't care. They can wait. I need you more than they need to yell at you.” Lacing her fingers through his hair, she shook her head. “If they want to yell at you, they can wait until after I'm asleep.”

There was violence in her eyes, daring him to argue with her. However, it was the fear hiding behind the violence which made up his mind. “All right. I'll come lay down with you and the boys for awhile.”

There was an instantaneous protest from his brothers, each of them vehemently protesting this turn of events. Marina flinched hard in her lover's arms, but it was surprisingly Hansel who spoke up in defense of the decision. “Silence, meine Sohne . . . Marishka is right . . . her well-being is more important at this time. We can wait.”

Nodding in grateful acknowledgment, Will clutched Marina a fraction closer then turned towards the stairs, both of their sons trailing along behind them. Fortunately, the couple's bed was huge. By unspoken agreement, Will and Marina ended up in the middle, with Rene cuddled into his dad on one side and Marina on the other, with Sam laid out on his side next to the Russian. The teenager and his mom clutched to each other tightly, their clasped hands resting on the Colonel's stomach as piercing blue eyes scanned the woman from head to toe.

Marina smiled, squeezing fondly, as she promised, “We're all right, Rene . . . get some rest.”

“Agreed,” the eldest Grimm insisted, “It's been a long day.”

“You're okay, Mama?”
“I am, baby . . . your dad and your brother made sure of it,” the handler promised, releasing his hand to run her fingers through his hair. Rene cuddled a small inch closer to Will, his knees tucked up into Will's ribs and his forehead pressed into the hollow below his armpit. The man's arm tightened slightly around his youngest son's frame, knuckles running soothingly over the skin laid bare between his t-shirt and his shorts. Marina's own eyes were drifting closed, even as Sam began to hum quietly under his breath.

Recognizing the song, the Colonel closed his eyes as he sang along softly to the tune, “You are my sunshine . . . my only sunshine. You make me happy . . . when skies are gray. You'll never know dears . . . how much I love you. Please don't take my sunshine away.”

The soothing baritone was warm and familiar. Before long Rene had drifted off, snuffling adorably as he tossed onto his back, splayed out like a starfish. Both of his parents chuckled, Marina's laughter infinitely more tired than Will's. Sam continued to hum, his arm coming up around his ma's waist as she fought the last drop into unconsciousness. “Go to sleep, Ma,” Sam whispered, pressing his nose into her shoulder blade. “We've got you.”

One of the woman's hands came up to link with her sons, while the other reached out to clutch her lover's shirt. Knuckles went white as she whimpered, “I'm scared.”

The Colonel's own hand came up to tangle with hers, as he replied softly, “Me too.”

“He looked right at you, Misha . . .”

Sensing the nature of her thoughts, Will interrupted, “. . . And he didn't know me.”

“How long can we guarantee that? How long until he remembers?”

“Marishka, samaya malen'kaya . . . I refuse to borrow trouble. For now, he doesn't know me. With any luck, he never will. However, just because we hope for the best doesn't mean we won't prepare for the worst.” Using a knuckle, he tilted her head back and pressed a warm kiss to the pout on her lips. “I will not let him hurt you . . . not now and not ever.”

“If he takes you, that will be the worst pain I will ever know,” she breathed, her body starting to go lax as unconsciousness crept up whether she liked it or not.

Nuzzling his nose against hers, he promised solemnly, “Then we'll just have to make sure he never has the chance.” Tightening his hand around hers, he insisted, “Close your eyes, Marina . . . we're okay. Ross cannot hurt us again.”

There was a soft sound before he could feel her body sag against him completely. The soft hum from Sam faded away as his oldest murmured, “I think she's out.”

“Yeah,” Will agreed, shifting slightly to press another kiss to her forehead, before he started to extricate himself from the bed.

Those ice blue eyes were sleepy as Sam watched his adoptive father climb from the bed. “Dad?”

Will gave him a small smile, his fingers nimble on the buttons of his uniform jacket as he moved towards the walk-in closet. “Yeah, Sammichka?”

“What are you doing? It's been a hell of a long day . . . I think if anyone deserves a break, it would be you and Ma.”

“And while I would love to, your uncles will eventually lose patience and storm up here to yell at me if I don't go downstairs to meet them head on.”

Yawning, Sam shoved himself upwards, knuckling hard at his eyes. “You want me to come with you? Owen's not here and you could probably use an ally right about now.”

The Colonel emerged from the walk-in then, dressed in a pair of old jeans with holes in the knees and a navy button-down with the sleeves rolled to his elbows. Fingers flew as he threw a tie around his neck and knotted it loosely. “Nah, Sammy . . . stay here with your mom and your brother. Get some rest while you still can . . . you look wrecked.”

“Pot meet kettle,” Sam joked with a tired grin. “You're sure?”

“Yeah,” the older man agreed, bracing one hand on the bed as he bent to press a warm kiss to the top of his son's head. “Get some rest. You can always come to my rescue when you wake up.”

“I sincerely hope they don't intend to yell at you for that long.”

“So do I,” was all the Colonel said in agreement, flashing another small smile at the blond before he turned and left the room, closing the door softly behind him.

********************

Will Grimm was not a stupid man. He knew the coming confrontation was going to be ugly and brutal. It was part of the reason he had chosen to wear what he had. If this showdown had to happen, at the very least he was going to be at ease. The button down was one of Marina's favorites, and more importantly, her perfume still lingered at the collar from the last time he'd held her while she applied it. The jeans were his oldest and most comfortable pair, soft and worn with age. Even still, he moved glacially down the stairwell, fidgeting at his watch as he went. Just because he knew this was inevitable, didn't mean he was looking forward to getting it over with.

The tension in the room was palatable, easily spilling into the hallway where the Colonel had paused to take in the mood of the room. Brian's tone was loud and brash as he ranted to his father about the idiocy of Will, Marina, Sam, and all of their antecedents – the elder brother wisely refrained from reminding him Brian shared most of those same ancestors. As for Jason, typically the most outspoken of the three younger brothers, he was suspiciously pensive and quiet, seated on the couch next to worried and attentive Casey. The tech seemed oblivious to everything else in the room, eyes fixed on where his girlfriend's fingers laced between his. Clint however was signing emphatically at Aaron, who sat with Marta on the loveseat, his features flat and stoic in response.

Of everyone present, only Hansel and Bucky seemed relaxed. Taking a deep breath in through his nose, Will released it slowly before stepping completely into the room. Brian whirled on him instantly, snapping, “About damned time!”

“Marina is asleep; so are Sam and Rene. If you're going to yelling, I can accept that. I would ask, however, we at least try not to wake them.” Glancing upwards at the ceiling overhead, he sighed, “Marishka's had a hell of a scare today; she needs the rest.”

It was at that moment Brian lost what little patience he had thus far been clinging to. “What the fuck happened, Will!”

“Marina is asleeep; so are Sam and Rene. If you're going to yelling, I can accept that. I would ask, however, we at least try not to wake them.” Glancing upwards at the ceiling overhead, he sighed, “Marishka's had a hell of a scare today; she needs the rest.”

It was at that moment Brian lost what little patience he had thus far been clinging to. “What the fuck happened, Will!”

Sparing a fervent wish for the absent Natasha – she had been assigned to the Harlem clean up after the incident with Ross, and Will was not counting on her reappearing for some time – the Colonel shook his head. “In order to answer that question, it might be prudent for someone to tell me what it is you do know. That way I don't have to go over the same material twice.”
Hansel pinned his hot-headed son with a warning glare, before turning to his eldest. “We know only what the news has shared. Both Ross and an unidentified pregnant woman were rushed to Lenox Hill Hospital after the incident in Harlem.” Gesturing towards the stairs, the German smiled sadly as he reminded his son, “As meine Tochter is the only pregnant woman I know of who would huf been in Harlem at the time . . . hyur brothers and I were understandably concerned. And considering the state she arrived home in, our concern does not seem to huf been misplaced.”

Nodding once in subdued agreement, Will allowed his gaze to move from face to face before he shifted to put the wall at his back. Best to have everyone in his eyeline; what he said next was not going to be well received. There was a long pause, before at last the Colonel spoke, “I shot Ross.”

Instantly, the room exploded into enraged pandemonium.

Hansel sank into Marina's armchair with horror in his eyes, while three of the Colonel's four brothers lunged to their feet and began to yell at him. As for Clint, the archer had been complaining of a lingering headache for days and was currently without his hearing aids. He had missed the announcement and grabbed at Aaron's sleeve to pull his best friend's attention around. Blue eyes were smoldering, even as the former Outcome operative twisted to look at the younger brother. There was fierce frown on his face as Clint's hands flashed through his question, the younger man's face twisting at the sharp reply. Gray eyes went wide at the statement, before Clint too was on his feet and demanding answers with forceful signs which clearly displayed how upset he was.

Fortunately, Bucky grabbed hold of his boyfriend and hauled him back into his lap, prompting both Marta and Casey to follow his lead. Though it did nothing to lessen the tension or reduce the anger, it wasn't long before only Brian was still on his feet. Forcing himself to relax, the Colonel rolled his shoulders back and slouched, trying to shake the fight or flight instinct he'd been struggling with while confronted with four of S.H.I.E.L.D.'s most talented assets. “Are you done?” he asked tired, one hand coming up to rub at the bridge of his nose, tired to the marrow his bones.

Jason's head snapped up from where it had been resting in his palms, as he barked, “How the hell can you even ask that!? No we're not done! Do you want to be raising your daughters from Leavenworth!? Ross is a General! He outranks all of our asses, even yours, Colonel Badass!”

Aaron chimed in next, “Did you even think of what would happen when the Army comes for you? Geez, Will . . . how the fuck are you not locked up in a brig somewhere awaiting trial!?” Paling sharply at the statement, he sank backwards into his seat as a thought struck him. “Your trial is gonna end us. They're going to figure it out . . . they're gonna figure out we're Cahills.”

Brian railroaded over the silent Clint as he pushed into Will's face, sneering, “We've all wanted to ghost the bastard, but what the fucking hell!? What . . . you wanted a little revenge, you saw the shot and you wasted him!? Who the fuck are you to . . .”

Suddenly Sam's voice roared through the room, causing everyone to jump in surprise. “Shut up!”

Those eyes were hot and crackling with lightning as the blond shoved between his dad and his uncle, both hands planting firmly on Brian's chest and shoving him several steps backwards. “First of all, Ross isn't dead. Second of all, the bastard deserved everything he got.”

Hansel's head came up at the information, watching his grandson face off against the entire room, the young man's father exhausted and slumped against the wall at his back. “He is not dead?”

“No, but I wish he was. It would have been no less than he deserved.”

“How do you know?”
“I was there . . . no farther away from him than I am from you now,” Sam gritted out, shame and guilt flashing across his face as he remembered how helpless he had been to protect his own mom, the one woman in his life who had always loved him unconditionally.

Robin’s egg eyes flashed towards the Colonel, who was leaning up against the wall with his eyes closed and his sleeves pulled down over the ends of his hands. Looking back at his oldest grandson, Hansel insisted, “Tell me what happened, Sam.”

The blond pulled in a sharp breath through his nose before glancing back at Will. “You okay, Dad?”

“Fine, Sammy . . . just very tired.”

“Ma's still asleep upstairs if you want to join her. I can handle this.”

“No, this is my mess . . . my actions put this entire family in danger. I have no intention of dodging that.”

Throwing up his hands in total exasperation, Sam hissed, “Damn it, Dad. For once, would you attempt to offer up some kind of defense for yourself. You did exactly what needed to be done to protect Ma . . . if you hadn't done it, I was going to. So was Ward.”

Aaron held up a hand to pause whatever argument the eldest Grimm was going to offer, asking, “Wait . . . Grant Ward was there? Why was Grant Ward in Harlem?”

Will sighed heavily, one hand rubbing at the back of his neck as he explained, “I had assigned him as Marina's bodyguard . . . she knew she had one, just not who it was. I have never been so relieved in my life to be an overprotective boyfriend. Ward and Sam kept Marina as safe as she could have been, at least until Lucky and I got there.”

The German cleared his throat sharply, cocking an eyebrow at his sons. “I will not ask again. What happened, Adler?”

“I only know half of it; I didn't get there until after Sam called me over comms that someone had grabbed Marina.”

“Ross grabbed Marina? And you're sure he's not dead?” Bucky asked, eyebrows in his hairline as he stared in shocked awe at the Colonel. There wasn't a single person in the room who doubted that had the Winter Soldier been there, the outcome would have been a very different one. Clint agreed, hands flashing as he signed, If ever there was a time to kill Ross, Will, it would have been while he was manhandling your girlfriend.

Sam was already shaking his head, answering in his dad's place, “Double tapped the trigger, two to the shoulder. Clean through, no significant muscle damage. He'll live to be an ass another day.”

“I will not ask again,” Hansel interrupted, arms coming up over his chest as he glared at the two blonds.

“Dad had left Ma at the Command Tent. He was heading off to give orders to the contingent of Army grunts Ross had left behind in Harlem, while Ma took over coordinating the clean-up and supervising the S.H.I.E.L.D. agents on site. Dad left me with her. Out of nowhere, this guy shows up, grabs Ma and starts yelling in her face about Cahills. Kept insisting she had stolen from him, and he was going to make her pay.”

Scrubbing both hands through his hair, Sam growled, “He backhanded her. I don't even remember grabbing for my gun. All I know is. one second I didn't have it and the next, I had it leveled between his eyes more than willing to use it if he tried to hurt her again. Ward was right there with me. There was no hesitation; Grant would have killed Ross if the General had given him reason to."

Will gripped his son's shoulder firmly as he took up the story. “I showed up about then. Tried to talk him down.” Shaking his head at the memory, he grunted, “I thought I had him . . . that Ross was gonna let her go. But he just started raging again. I pulled my gun and put two in his shoulder.” There was a weary shrug, even as Will met his father's eyes head-on. “I don't regret it and I would do it again in a heartbeat.”

“I do not blame hyu, mein Adler. I do not think any of us would have done any differently, had we been in hyur place,” Hansel agreed, one hand coming up to grip his shoulder fondly. Cocking an eyebrow at Brian, he insisted, “Hyu will hear nothing more from us.”

**************************************************

Some part of Marina knew she was dreaming. The rest of her didn't care.

Sam and Lucky had both of her arms, holding her in place, as faceless soldiers hauled Will away. It was her worst nightmare. She could hear herself screaming, could feel the drag of her pregnancy on her body, could taste the tears on her tongue.

The next images were disjointed and blurry. Her daughters born with Will still gone. A rescue mission. Will coming home, a fake smile on his face and emptiness in continually silver eyes. Endless fights. Countless tears.

Waking from a deep sleep, breathless from the pressure of Will's hands closed around her neck, his beloved eyes gone silver, cold and heartless . . . carrying out Ross' last revenge with the perfect weapon, his perfect weapon. Through the sounds of her gasping wheezes she could hear the sound of screams . . . screams Marina knew instinctively belonged to her innocent, infant daughters.

Eyes flashing open, she jolted upwards and screamed, the sound an anguished howl of soul-deep agony and paralyzing fear.

**************************************************

The scream ripped through the house and immediately the Brothers Grimm were on defense, Casey and Marta shoved none-too-gently to the floor while the rest pulled weapons from their holsters. “What was that?” Jason asked, green eyes cold as they scanned the room.

It took only a moment for a light-bulb to go off behind the Colonel's eyes, before he turned on his heel and dashed toward the stairs, shouting, “Marina!”

The sound of Sam's footsteps on the stairwell behind him was a comfort as the older man bolted towards the master bedroom. They had left Rene on the bed with Marina, the two of them still sleeping soundly at the time. Whatever had happened, the teenager was no doubt terrified by the sound of the Russian's screams.

Sure enough, Will came into the room, to the sight of Rene trying to calm his adoptive mother. There were tears on his cheeks and it was clear her continued screams were freaking him out. There was a distinct absence in Marina's eyes; whatever had happened, it was clear she was not seeing the room around her or her frightened son beside her. “Sam . . . get Rene,” was all the eldest Grimm said, eyes intent on his partner.

The blond nodded, moving forward cautiously to grab his younger brother around the shoulders and guide him away from the bed. Rene's blue eyes were wide and panic-stricken, hands coming up to grip Sam's wrists as the constable pulled him back towards the door. “Sam?” the boy whimpered, tilting his head back, ice blue eyes locking with cobalt.

“It's okay. Ma's gonna be okay . . . I promise. Dad's got her.”

“Why is she screaming like that?” he asked, watching his adoptive father approach the bed slowly.

“Nightmare,” Sam replied, tightening his hold just a touch, before attempting to explain. “Something happened today, something that really scared Ma.”

“Can I help fix it?”

“No . . . I don't think anyone can fix it.”

“No even Dad?” was the plaintive inquiry, eyes very wide as they peered up at his brother.

A sad smirk lifted one corner of the elder's lips as he replied, “No, Rene . . . not even Dad.”

It was about then Marina seemed to snap back to the present, the screams starting to fade into whimpers as she took in the room around her. She sagged slightly at the sight of her sons close by, before catching sight of Will moving slowly closer. Clearly still caught within the horror of her dream, the Russian scrambled backwards towards the headboard as she insisted vehemently,”No! Stay away from me!”

Will froze, features shocked at the negative reaction from his partner. “Marishka?” he asked curiously, his head tilting as he looked her over. “Zhemchuzhina . . . what's wrong?” The sound of her labored wheezing caught his attention and he frowned softly. “Marishka . . . breathe . . . you have to calm down. For the girls' sake.”

Hot chocolate eyes watched him intently, taking in every nuance of him. They shot back to his face as the Colonel begged, “Please, Marina. You have to breathe . . . if not for my sake, then for the girls. Please.”

It took a moment, but the Colonel seemed to come to the realization she was searching for something in his face. Forcing himself still, he held his hands out to his sides, with his eyes locked on her trembling frame while she looked him over. Finally, her eyes locked with his. Almost instantly, she sagged with a sob, before all but throwing herself from the bed and into his arms. “Mishka!” she cried.

There was no hesitation. Will was across the room and gathering her into his arms without even a thought, one hand smoothing through her hair as the other held her as closely to him as their bodies would allow. “It's okay, samaya malen'kaya . . . you're all right. We're all right . . . I am never going to let him hurt you again.”

Lifting her face from where she had buried it in his throat, she whispered, “I know.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) chado - child (Marina's nickname for her youngest son, Rene)
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
(R) Zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's less common nicknames for Marina)
(G) meine Sohne - my sons
(R) Sammichka - a diminutive of Sammy (one of Will & Marina's nicknames for their eldest son, Sam)
(G) meine Tochter - my daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina)
(G) (mein) Adler - (my) Eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will)
Chapter Notes

I melted writing this. I hope you melt reading it. :D Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 212: The Minnow

Maria Hill-Kuhn grinned at her best friend, more than a little amused as she watched the Russian fend off her over-protective lover. Will had all but started smothering Marina Petrovka following the incident in Harlem with Ross. As much as she loved her best friend, watching the couple do battle never failed to make the AD crack up. Finally, the woman huffed, reaching up to grab his cheeks and hauled him down for a passionate kiss, cutting off the list of rules and concerns he'd been giving her.

Disengaging from him, she kept her hands on his cheeks and when he opened his mouth to protest once again, she hauled him down for another kiss. This time when they disengaged, she cocked an eyebrow at him and teased, “I can do this all day, Misha, but eventually Maria is going to stab you with something.”

Those quicksilver eyes were vibrant blue, warm and amused, as he chuckled, “I just worry about you.”

Leaning into his hand as he reached to brush a strand of hair out of her eyes, she laughed, “I know, Mishka . . . trust me, I KNOW. But it's a baby emporium, not an undercover mission in Chechnya. Chill out.” Kissing him, she promised, “I'll call you when we're ready to leave. And I promise not to lift anything heavier than a onesie. Agreed?”

Looking up at Maria, he relaxed almost instantly in response to her firm nod of agreement. “I'll keep an eye on her, and she'll keep an eye on me. We'll be fine. I promise.”

Confronted with these two Fury's Angels, the Colonel finally conceded defeat. “All right!” he capitulated, throwing up his hands in surrender. “I'll let it go. Please though . . . at least tell me you both are armed.”

Marina rolled her eyes as the other woman scoffed. “Please, Will, we are not amateurs. Of course we're armed.”

“Thank God. Have fun,” he laughed, kissing the Russian's cheek, before hauling himself up into the driver's seat of their Jeep. “Love you, samaya malen'kaya.”

“Love you too,” she agreed with a grin and a wave, blowing kisses after him as he put the car in gear and drove away. Once her partner was out of sight, Marina bounced on her toes with a happy squeal, clapping her hands together happily. “Freedom!! It's a miracle!”

Bursting into laughter, the AD looped her elbows through the Russian's. “You need to get out more.”

“I know!” she groaned, tugging on her friend. “Quick, let's go before he changes his mind and comes back.”

Giggling like school girls, the two women headed into the store. They barely made it through the door before they both froze, horrified by the sheer magnitude of the space. “Bozhe moi,” Marina breathed at the exact second her best friend groaned, “Oh shit.”

“We brought the list, right?”

“We did,” Maria agreed, watching her best friend nibble on her lower lip. “Marishka . . . it's just baby things. You were the one who said we needed to stop putting it off.”

“I know! I just never imagined there would be so much stuff!”

“We got this. Think of it as just another mission. Except, you know, with a lot more pink.”

“No pink!” Marina burst out in horror. “Daughters or not, a child of Will Grimm does not wear pink. Green maybe, or a beautiful blue.”

“Traditionally, blue is for boys,” her best friend reminded her, grabbing a blue onesie off a rack with a fire truck on it.

“Buck tradition, Vorobyey . . . blue is for everyone. We wear blue everyday.”
The AD smirked as she reminded the Russian fondly, “Hans will kill me if I dress our daughter in S.H.I.E.L.D. blue. I'm just going to throw that out there.”

“Eh, what's life without a little danger? Live a little. Besides, she needs at least one 'Mommy's Little S.H.I.E.L.D. Agent' outfit! It would be so cute!” Marina chirped cheerfully, clapping her hands together excitedly. “Come on! Let's go see what they've got!”

About an hour later, the two women were seated at the emporium's in-store cafeteria. They each had chosen their cribs, which had been the biggest reason they had come, and arranged for them to be shipped to the base the very next day. There was bags piled beside them, filled with clothing, blankets, infant toys and other knick knacks that Marina had been unable to argue herself out of. And of course, a receipt for three matching t-shirts, specially ordered to read “Mommy's Little S.H.I.E.L.D. Agent.”

Marina frowned as she watched her best friend pick listlessly at her lunch, cocking her head slightly as she questioned, “Vorobey? You okay?”

“Yeah . . . I've been dealing with Braxton Hicks contractions all day. They're starting to get annoying,” she insisted, frowning fiercely in frustration.

“Maria . . . are you sure they're just Braxton Hicks?”

“What else would they be?” the AD inquired, shifting uncomfortably as she reached for her herbal tea.

“Actual contractions. You're due in three days!”

“That's ridiculous. My water hasn't broken yet.”

Chuckling, Marina rolled her eyes as she teased, “You didn't read a single one of those books Medical gave us, did you?”

“I tried, but admittedly, I've had a lot of other things to do in the last nine months,” the woman huffed with a roll of her eyes.

Glancing towards at the ceiling in a plea for sanity, Marina bent to dig in her purse for her phone. “I'm calling Vati and Medical. Even if you're not in labor at this exact second, having contractions for that long? You're probably a lot closer than you think.”

Maria sighed as she reached for her things, insisting, “You're overreacting.”

“Be that as it may, I am not going to be held responsible for that baby getting dropped on her head, because you weren't paying attention to the signs your body was screaming at you.” Shooting upwards as a sudden thought flashed across her mind, she demanded, “Wait . . . how long have you been experiencing the contractions?”

When Maria's only reply was to glance at her watch to try to figure it out, Marina all but screeched, “That long!? And you thought they were Braxton Hicks!? MARIA!!”

“You're being ridiculous,” the assistant director scolded. Of course, as soon as she stood up, she froze. The Russian caught the action, watching her best friend blink in horrified mortification. “What!? Vorobey, what's wrong?”
“My water just broke,” was the sheepish response, an uncharacteristic blush spreading across her cheeks.

Marina stared in startled shock, eyes wide as she watched Maria sink back into her seat. Finally, she squealed, “I told you!”

“Can we hold on the 'I told you so' for right now? We have a few other things that probably need doing right now,” Maria groaned, hunching slightly as another contraction ripped through, this one stronger and longer than the others before it.

Glancing at her watch, the handler timed the contraction, even as she put herself in the seat next to her best friend, arm wrapped around her shoulder's familiarly. Eyes widening at the time – 45 seconds meant her best friend was more than likely almost fully dilated and had been in labor for several hours at that point – she turned her attention back to her friend. “We got this, Vorobey, just breathe.”

“I made a mess,” the AD whimpered, just as a pair of employees bolted over.

The manager was a kindly older woman, easily sixty if she was a day, her eyes smiling just as brightly as her mouth. “Don't you worry about that, honey. It happens more than you think. We'll get it cleaned up in no time.”

Another contraction ripped through the younger woman, her hand tightening hard on the former assassin's hand. The managed looked alarmed at the sustained nature of the action, glancing towards Marina who was once again timing it. Finally shaking herself free, she twisted to look up at her employee, ordering firmly, “Call 911. Explain what's going on . . . and make sure they know to step on it.”

The other girl bolted away with a brisk nod, just as the woman asked, “My name's Annika . . . what's yours?”

“Maria,” she all but keened, sucking in air through her teeth.

“It's nice to meet you, Maria. How long have you been having contractions, sweetheart?”

“All day,” she panted, sagging into the Russian as Marina soothed gentle fingers through the rapidly soaking hair. “I thought they were just Braxton Hicks. They didn't hurt . . . they were just annoying.”

Blinking at her, Annika chuckled, “Well, I don't think we've ever had an actual birth at the store, but I guess there's a first time for everything.” Smiling gently, the woman promised, “The paramedics are on their way. You do what comes naturally and you'll be holding your baby very very soon.”

Looking up at another employee, the woman channeled her inner drill sergeant as she began dispensing orders. “Mandy, we just put those nightgowns on clearance. Go grab me on, and then get some receiving blankets and a pack of onesies and some of the infant washcloths. Take them into the Mother's Room.” Turning back to Marina, she cocked an eyebrow at the Russian's own distended belly, before she questioned, “Can you help me get her into the Mother's Room? There's no reason to keep her in soaked clothes and she'll probably be more comfortable out of the public eye.”

“Yeah, I can help,” Marina breathed in relief, reaching out to grab the woman's wrist. “Thank you.”

“Don't you worry, honey. I had five of my own and was there for at least a dozen grandbabies. From what I can see, she looks healthy and strong, and I don't hear any of the panic that I do from some of the other women who go into labor at my store. Mother and child are going to be just fine.”
By the time the paramedics arrived, the contractions were ranging anywhere from 55 to 60 seconds in length and the soft whimpers Maria had been making had graduated to full on keens. The female paramedic smiled kindly at the laboring woman as she leaned over to grab a couple blankets, tucking them around Maria's bottom half as well as laying them out on the ground under her bent knees. “Can you tell me how long you've been having contractions?”

“Almost 13 hours, as best as she can tell me. The contractions are ranging from 55 to 60 seconds and they’re not giving her much rest between them.”

“All right. In that case, we’re probably not going to make it back to the hospital. I prefer not to birth children in the van . . . not a whole lot of space to maneuver and only one set of hands.” Reaching for the hem of Maria’s borrowed nightgown, she soothed, “Take a deep breath for me, ma'am. I'm just going to check and see how far you're dilated.”

Reaching under the fabric, the woman's hands were steady and competent as she felt before nodding. “We are not going to make it. Your fully dilated and the head is already crowning.” Looking up, she told her partner, “Call it in. We're not gonna be able to make it make it back to the hospital. We're gonna have to deliver here . . . better get the birthing kit.”

Maria clutched at her best friend, slumped back against her as she sobbed, “I want Hans . . . he's supposed to be here for this.”

“I know, Vorobey, I know. But I'm here . . . we've got this,” she promised, brushing the hair out of the other woman's eyes. Clutching her hand tightened, she forced the woman to meet her eyes. “It's just another mission, okay? I've got your back and I'm right here . . . I'm not going anywhere.”

Sensing the conversation was over between the two women, the paramedic placed her hands lightly on Maria's knees. “All right, next time you have a contraction, I want you to push, okay? You're gonna have this baby in your arms before you know it.”

It was almost an hour later before Hansel skidded into her hospital room, his sons hot on his heels. The two women were both staring at the swaddled bundle in Marina's arms, the handler singing a Russian lullaby to the baby as the child slept. Looking up at her husband, the assistant director gifted him with a tired smile, “You're late.”

Looking up, Marina grinned at her partner's father, shifting to her feet carefully. Coming to join him, she offered him the child carefully. “Congratulations, Vati . . . you have a beautiful, healthy daughter.”

Hansel's eyes were huge as he accepted the infant, cradling her as though she was made of the most priceless porcelain with only a little nudge from Marina. Tucking her into his chest, he brushed the blanket from the little girl's face so he could take all of her in at once. Moving to the bed as though in a daze, the German bent to kiss his wife fiercely, “Huu are amazing . . . she is beautiful.”

“I know,” Maria agreed with a brilliant grin, one hand reaching out to smooth fondly over the wrinkling forehead. Looking up at him, she smiled, “I know you wanted to name her Minna . . . but we hadn't picked out a middle name yet.”

Smiling he agreed, “No . . . do hyu have one in mind?”

“Annika.”

Robin's egg eyes narrowed slightly as he considered the name, musing softly, “Minna Annika Kuhn . . . I like it.” Bending, he brushed his nose against his daughter's as he sighed, “Our little Minnow.”
Hiking up onto the bed next to his wife, the couple spent long moments staring at their little miracle. Neither noticed Marina herding the baby’s older brothers from the room. They could wait . . . there would time enough for introductions later.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:
(R) samaya malen’kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina)
(R) Bozhe moi - oh my God
(R) Vorobey - sparrow (Marina’s nickname for her best friend, Maria Hill)
(G) Vati - Dad (Marina's nickname for Hansel Kuhn)
American Idol

Chapter Notes

Hello honeys! Here we go! This one's a roller coaster. I hope you enjoy!!

Translations at the end as always!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 213: American Idol

It had been three months since Harlem. It had taken weeks for Marina to stop jumping at every creak in the floorboards and every step on the porch. Eventually though . . . even the Russian had had to concede that if Ross hadn't come yet . . . he wasn't coming. Which wasn't to say that she or her lover forgot what had happened. The Power Couple had instead prepared themselves for any eventuality should her nightmare ever become a reality.

She'd been showing a little bit since Week 16. So she hadn't really understood why both Marta and her S.H.I.E.L.D.-appointed OB seemed so concerned that she hadn't “popped” yet. The term was contradictory in Marina's opinion and she had puzzled over it more than a few times at night when the twins were active and she couldn't sleep.

And then, it had happened . . . she'd popped. Overnight, she was suddenly the size of a beached whale.

Of course, as if that wasn't bad enough, she was also having to contend with her worrier of a lover. If Marina herself was Batman, then Will was Alfred; worrying and scolding and generally trying to protect her from herself. Lately it had become apparent that her size was in direct correlation to how much he worried. She couldn't hardly lift a finger, without her erstwhile partner swooping in to rescue her from whatever she was attempting to do for herself.

It was getting a little tiring.

Currently, it was the first week of December, it was freezing outside . . . and Marina was sweltering. She'd waddled around her home, throwing open all of the windows that morning, sighing in instant relief at the cool breeze coming through the screens. Her poor Rene . . . he was working on his homework at the dining room table, bundled up in a thermal henley, a pullover sweater, a hoodie and the heavy winter coat his brother had left behind when Sam had returned to Toronto.

Smiling from where she was cutting up celery for lunch, she chuckled as she watched him tug the blanket tighter around him. She'd offered to close the windows a dozen times, and every time he'd insisted that he was fine. “Rene . . . chado . . . let me close the windows, love.”

She hadn't even finished speaking before the fourteen year old was shaking his head. “I'm fine, Mama.”

“You're shivering like a leaf on a blustery day,” she protested, eyes wide.

“And you're wearing a tanktop as though it's 100 degrees out. I can suffer a little bit, if the cold makes you feel better.”

Coming around the counter, she wrapped her arms around her son's shoulders tightly. “I love you very much, golovnya.”

“Ya tozga tebya lyublyu, Mama.”

Pressing a quick peck to the top of his head, she waddled slowly back into the kitchen and picked up her paring knife once more. For awhile, there was peace and quiet as mother and son enjoyed each other's silent company. At which point, Will returned home for lunch. There was the heavy thud of his messenger bag hitting the floor next to the door and the jingle of keys in the bowl on the entry table. Then a relieved sigh as two thunks, one after the other, landed on the hardwood; his boots, unless the Russian missed her guess. “Welcome home, Mishka!” she called, one eyebrow cocking as he came into view.

Frowning at her standing on her feet, he moved forward quickly. “Marishka . . .”

Already guessing the nature of his thoughts, the handler interrupted smoothly, “So help me god, William Michael, I am pregnant . . . not an invalid. If you even think of scolding me for making my own lunch, I will stab you with my knife.” Smirking, she sing-songed, “I will stab you with my knife . . . ten . . . times.”

Blinking at her in surprise, it took a moment for him to catch the reference. Once it clicked he smirked, “Been watching Chicago again, huh?”

“It really is a terrible film, but I do love it so,” she agreed with a happy purr as he moved to her side. Her head dropped back as her eyes slipped closed, their lips tangling lazily as they kissed. “How's work?”

Huffing, S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Chief Analyst begged, “Please, Marishka, for the love of whatever god you believe in . . . do not ask.”

Chuckling, she teased. “That good, huh?”
There was an overly dramatic groan from the analyst as he slumped onto a bar stool, he dropped his forehead onto the bar with a bang and groaned, “Worse.” After a moment, his head came up again. There was a puzzled frown on his face as he inquired cautiously, “Is it just me or is it freezing in here?”

Rene's tone was cheerful as he piped up from the table, “Not just you, Dad. I think there's a couple blankets left in the linen closet. But I'm not giving Sammy's coat back; it's warm.”

Just then Will's phone rang in the pocket of his slacks, prompting Will to drop his head on the bar once again. “I am on lunch,” he muttered, even as he shifted on the stool to dig for it.

Marina was giggling as she passed him an apple, watching as he put it to his ear without ever looking at the screen. “Brandt . . . this had better be insanely important.”

Jason's tone was amused as he joked, “I have to know . . . do you ever actually check the Caller ID on your phone before you answer a call? That's what it's there for, you know.”

The Colonel chuckled as he agreed, “I'm on lunch, Jay. Anyone calling me now had better have a damn good reason.”

There was a serious undertone as the middle Grimm snorted. “Well, I don't know if this qualifies. But I'm pretty sure you're going to want to know anyway.”

“Want to know what?”

“You're never going to believe this, Will, but they found him. Hell, I'm looking at him right now, shield and everything.”

A tiny light bulb was flickering in the back of Will's mind even as he asked, “Found who?”

“The fucking corpse of Captain Fucking America is lying on one of my lab tables right now. If I didn't know my history, Will, I would swear he was just sleeping and not a day over 20. Jesus . . . this is the guy we were built to replace!? He was a kid, at best!”

Will's eyebrows rose at the excited gushing coming from his baby brother. "I think you're gonna have to say that again, because there is no way I heard you right the first time."

"Did you hear the part about Captain America laying out on my lab table?"

"Yes."

"Then you heard me right."

Reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose, Will let that process for a moment. Finally, he asked, “How? I thought his plane went down in the Arctic?”

"A systems program I've been working on located a downed plane in the Arctic Circle. They dispatched a bunch of agents. Lo and behold, there he is, lying in a coffin made of ice.” There was a pause, "Also, that shield is awesome. I'm going to try to convince Nick to let me duplicate it if I can. If not, I think Coulson has already called dibs."

“Coulson should probably keep in mind that he's married to one of the Viper's beloved older sisters. It will help with those inappropriate thoughts of his,” Will snarked, before frowning. “Wait . . . you're not the morgue. Why would they bring him to you?”
"Did you think the ice coffin was a joke? Cause it wasn't? They brought him to me so my nerds can thaw him out before they put America's Hero in the ground at Arlington or something."

"Jay, are you sure that's all they're planning on? That body is all that's left of Erskine's original serum."

There was a pause, before Jason sighed, "Those are my orders. If they have any plans, I don't know about them. But I can look into it, if you want. Either way, I would suggest rounding up the Soldier. The body won't be here for long I'll bet."

Will looked up at Marina, the Russian watching him curiously as he agreed, "Yeah. I'll get right on that. If they come before we get there . . ."

"Stall, yeah . . . I know."

Hanging up the phone, he smiled at Marina. "You are not going to believe this."

Hot chocolate eyes were resigned as she agreed, "I'm not going to like this, am I?"

"Probably not." Leaning forward on his elbows, he reached out to grab her hand in his. "Do you know where Bucky is today?"

Those eyes flashed wide, pain flashing through them like lightning. "He's supposed to be at the training center with Clint today. Why? What's wrong with Bucky?"

Standing, Will shoved his hands back through his hair as he replied, "I'll tell you about it on the way."

The Russian immediately paled. "Bozhe moi. That's bad."

"You're probably going to want to put your uniform on," was all he said, reaching out to grasp her elbow and guide her around the counter. Ruffling Rene's hair, he begged, "Close the windows, huh?"

"Thank you!" he cheered, bolting up from his homework and setting to work on that instantly.

*************************

At this point, Bucky and Clint were just fucking around on the mats; they'd stopped being serious about ten minutes before. The trainees assigned to their earlier demonstration didn't know that though, glancing at each other in confusion as the two legendary snipers joked with each other in seemingly angry Russian. There wasn't just enough time in the day to spend together and neither was willing to give up the time they had with each other at the moment.

Of course, it was about then that Will's voice called through the room. "Class dismissed!"

The unexpected shout jolted both snipers out of their mock-battle, the two straightening immediately. As soon as he locked eyes with his former protégé, Bucky knew something was wrong. Officially, Marina was on leave until after her daughters were born. Yet here she stood, dressed in her uniform and looking up at him with liquid chocolate eyes, one corner of her lip trapped between her teeth and diamond tracks on her cheeks left by tears. Glancing at his boyfriend, he could see that the younger man had also realized that there was something wrong.

Dread rose like a rock in his throat, as he stepped forward. "Marishka? What is it? What's wrong?"
Glancing up at her lover, she took comfort in the compressed smile he gave her before turning back to her oldest friend. “Oh Buck . . . they found him.”

The Soldier glanced at Will but saw nothing in the Colonel's face to explain the statement. Concerned, the man jumped from the mats and came to join her, reaching out to take her hands fondly. “Marina . . . found who? Are you all right?”

“I'm fine,” she promised, twisting her hands in his to grip his wrists. Those delicate but deadly fingers tightened insistently as she looked up into his eyes calmly. “Bucky . . . they found the plane. The one Captain Rogers went down with.”

Suddenly, it felt as though the air had been sucked out of the room. He stared at her, horrified, the world wobbling in and out of focus like a top at the end of a spin. Before he knew it, he had Clint and Will on each side of him, hauling his arms over their shoulders and guiding him towards a chair. The archer's hand was insistent on the back of Bucky's head as he shoved him forward until his head was between his knees, ordering firmly, “Breathe, Bucky.”

Despite her bulk, Marina's whole form was graceful as she dropped to her knees in front of him. “They found the plane last night. His body is intact . . . it's here, at S.H.I.E.L.D. Jason called Will to let him know.”

Ocean eyes narrowed as he asked, “Why did Jason know before the Colonel did?”

“Apparently, they have the body up in R&D for right now, trying to thaw it out. When they found him, he was encased in ice.” Reaching out to take his hands once again, she insisted, “We don't know how long the body's going to be here, Bucky. If you want to say your goodbyes, you're going to need to do it soon.”

He blinked at her, surprised by the very idea. “I can do that?”

“Of course you can. You were his best friend. Not to mention, according to everything I researched on the way over here, you were his next of kin before your death. You get final say over what happens to the body.”

The word made him flinch and he shook his head sharply, “Stop calling him that. Please.”

Nodding in solemn agreement, she promised, “Of course. I'm sorry.” There was a moment as she reordered her thoughts around the new terminology, before looking up at him once again to ask, “What do you want to do, Bucky?”

“I want to see Steve . . .” he insisted, tears burning in his eyes as he tried to hold them back. “. . . right now. Please.”

Nodding in agreement she reached back for Will's hand, grunting softly as the Colonel helped pull her back to her feet. “Would you prefer to go alone? Do you want someone with you?”

“I don't want to go alone. Can you come with me? You and Clint?” he asked, twisting slightly to look up into his boyfriend's solemn gray eyes.

The archer gifted his partner with a small smile as he promised, “You didn't even have to ask.”

The Russian's reply was silent, offering only a single dip of her head. Will wrapped his arm around his partner's shoulders as he pressed a warm kiss to her temple, admonishing her gently, “Please don't overdo it. For my sake?”
“Yes dear,” she drawled with a roll of her eyes, earning a smirk and another brisk kiss to the cheek.

“Be good,” he teased, dodging the playful swipe she swung at his head. “I'm in my office when you're ready to go home, okay?”

There was a soft kind of brilliance in her smile as she nodded, the three watching S.H.I.E.L.D.'s Chief Analyst go before the handler turned back to the other two. That brilliance dimmed slightly as she reached for her former mentor's hand, insisting, “Let's go see Captain Rogers . . . okay?”

Reaching out blindly for Clint's hand, he linked his fingers with his boyfriend's fiercely before following after Marina to Jason's labs at R&D.

The room was freezing. Which he guessed made sense. Didn't want America's Hero rotting before the world got to see him laid out in state.

James Buchanan Barnes barely registered Jason's voice as he spoke to the techs hovering around the table. “All right, lunch time. Everybody out.” Glancing at the man who was for all intents and purposes his brother-in-law, he insisted, “Let's give Agent Barnes a few moments alone with him.”

People brushed by him, hands reaching out in silent comfort as some passed by, before at last, Bucky, Clint, Marina and Jason were the only ones left in the lab. The Russian woman's tone was devastated and concerned as she murmured, “He looks like he's sleeping.”

“It's the ice. It preserved him perfectly,” Jason explained to the woman, even as he looked at the Soldier, making it clear that the explanation was not just for Marina's benefit. “I am sorry, Buck.”

The older man nodded silently, tears trickling down his cheeks as he tried to understand what he was seeing. There was sadness and horror and devastation warring in Bucky's heart as he stared down at Steve. Still soaked from the brine the techs had used to dissolve the ice, his features were calm and peaceful as though he was only sleeping. The former assassin stood next to the lab table, hands braced on the edges as he took in every nuance of his best friend's face. Just looking at his Stevie was pulling long forgotten memories from the depths of the Red Room's brainwashing.

He could hear Marina and Jason talking quietly behind him, the two exchanging rapid fire commentary in Russian about the thawing process. Clint leaned back against the wall just outside of his periphery, a silent and steady presence for Bucky to take refuge in once he had said his own goodbyes. A surge of gratitude rushed through the Soldier as he thanked whatever cosmos was out there for such a supportive partner.

Leaning forward on his elbows, ocean eyes roamed over those familiar features. “Damn it, Punk. This wasn't how we were supposed to meet each other again. You were supposed to be golden and perfect, raising a glass with the rest of the Commandos in heaven, while I rotted in hell for the things I've done.” Dropping his forehead against the other man's chest, he groaned, “This isn't how I wanted to remember you, brother.”

He must have stayed pressed against him for at least ten minutes. At first, he thought he had imagined it . . . the soft contractions under his forehead. Closing his eyes, he tried to keep his imagination from running away from him. But finally, he couldn't deny it; they weren't heartbeats, but something was happening inside of Steve's chest cavity. Jolting upwards, Bucky stared down at him in shock, straining his eyes and trying to convince himself he'd imagined it, even though he knew he hadn't. “He's alive,” he gasped.
Marina frowned, glancing at Jason, even as she insisted, “That's impossible.”

“It's not . . . I kept feeling contractions, under my head. Get a heart monitor on him. Check if you don't believe me. I'm not imagining this.”

Jason squeezed his sister's arm in comfort, before moving past Bucky towards the portable medical equipment against the wall. He came back shortly with a portable AED unit and a pair of scissors. Slashing through the fabric of all but shredded uniform, Jason laid the captain's chest bared before sticking the electrodes on his chest. Flipping on the machine, he fiddled with for awhile before setting it down. There was nothing and Jason looked up at Bucky sadly, “Buck . . . you just . . .”

A sudden beep cut Jason off, his eyes flashing back down to the monitor. Another few minutes and another beep sounded, correlating with the jump of the heart monitor. Green eyes went wide in horrified shock before he bolted to a phone on the wall. Punching in a three digit code, he ordered into the phone, “I need Vincent Keller and Marta Grimm at Lab 2 immediately.” There was a pause as the person on the other end of the line protested, before Jason railroaded over him urgently, “I don't give a damn what they're doing! Get them here now!”

The phone made a loud bang as he hung it up. Gesturing insistently at Marina, he explained, “I need to go back and get the techs. If we want to keep him alive, we got a lot of work to do to make sure he comes up safely.”

“Go, we'll be here,” she promised, watching her boy bolt out of the lab at a run.

As she shifted her eyes back to Bucky, they snagged on Clint. There was desolation and happiness warring in her youngest's eyes. On the one hand, Clint wanted to be happy for his boyfriend; Bucky's most impossible dream could be a reality all too soon. On the other, the archer knew all too well the torch the Bucky had once carried for the golden man on the table . . . and the glaring evidence that once again, he was a placeholder, a replacement, and little more than that.

She stepped forward instantly, long held instincts urging her to comfort him, as she soothed, “Dorogoy . . .”

Those eyes snapped to hers, before he shook his head sharply and bolted from the lab. Reaching out to grab him before he left, she just barely missed him and instead was forced to call after him, “Clint!”

Bucky whirled around, just in time to see Clint disappear upwards into an open vent. Marina grimaced lightly, reaching out to grab for the wall next to her as she turned back to her oldest friend, hot chocolate eyes pained as they locked with ocean blue. Eyebrows furrowed as he moved to her side, taking her arm and guiding her to a chair. Crouching in front of her, he demanded, “Are you okay? Do I need to get the Colonel? Marina!? Talk to me.”

“I'm fine. Kidney shot,” she promised, a small smile on her face as she reached to cup his cheek. Glancing towards the door, she sighed, “I wish I could say the same for Clint.”

“What's wrong with Clint?”

Cocking her head at him, she teased sadly, “Not even you are this obtuse, Tovrets. Steve Rogers is alive . . . and every reason Clint has ever had for existing is suddenly null and void.” Her lips compressed as she smoothed her thumb over his cheek, “He thinks he's lost you . . . and I'm not sure either of us are going to be able to convince him, he's wrong.”

The horror of Marina's words lingered for the rest of the day and long into the night. When he climbed into their bed that night, Clint was still MIA and no one had seen or heard from him since he'd fled his brother's labs. It was nearly two in the morning when Bucky startled awake as a body climbed onto the mattress beside him. Clint settled uneasily on his side, with his back to his boyfriend, both aware that the other was awake and neither sure what to say. Finally, Bucky rolled and fit himself against his partner's back. Hooking his chin over the archer's shoulder, he pressed a warm, gentle kiss to the curve of his throat. There was a small twitch in his cheek as Clint smiled at the action, his hand coming up to tangle with Bucky's own.

The former killer buried his face in the nape of his boyfriend's neck and for a long time the two were silent. Finally a Brooklyn accent broke into the room, promising, “I love you.”

Clint said nothing for a long time and for awhile, the older man didn't think he was going to say anything at all. Bucky was seconds from sleep when the archer finally replied in a tortured whisper, “I know.”

By the time Bucky woke the next morning . . . Clint was already gone.

**************************

Three days later, Steve was removed from the hyperbaric chamber he'd been residing in while Medical fought to get his body functioning without causing damage to his heart, brain or other organs. He was transferred to a recovery room decorated to match what he was most familiar with and outfitted in period appropriate attire. At which point, Will, Marina and Bucky threw up a massive protest to Coulson and Fury's idea about what to tell the captain.

Bucky frowned, arms folded over his chest, as he listened to the Power Couple make his arguments for him. “We're not going to lie to him.”

“We can't tell him the truth!” Coulson protested, looking concerned at the very idea.

“Why not? I've read the reports; Captain Rogers isn't stupid. You lie to him like this, you try to deceive him like this? Not only is he going to figure it out, he will never trust S.H.I.E.L.D. again,” Will protested, cocking an eyebrow in question. “That's not exactly the kind of rapport I think we want to start off with, considering this is America's Hero.”

“So what do you suggest? We've already started the deception,” Fury argued lightly, though clearly still content to hear other options. “You've seen the room he's in.”

“We've surrounded him with things that are familiar to him. That doesn't mean we're lying to him,” Marina insisted, grunting slightly as one of the twins took a shot upwards into her lung. Smoothing her hands over her belly, she hummed in a low undertone, “Easy, devochki, give Mama a break . . . please.”

Will's hand came to rest beside hers and instantly the girls settled, earning a relieved sigh. Looking up at him with an impish smirk, she laughed, “You're not allowed to move for the next month and a half.”

“No hardship here. Maybe I'll actually be able to keep you in bed.”

“Haha, very funny,” she sighed with a roll of her eyes. “Misha and I have both discussed this with Agent Barnes. I'll go in and I'll tell him the truth.”

“The truth about what?”

“Everything. S.H.I.E.L.D., the crash, finding him . . .” pausing, she glanced toward the silent Winter Soldier, before continuing, “Bucky.” Pinning Fury with hot chocolate eyes, she insisted, “After everything he's been through, we owe him that much.”

There was a moment, before Fury nodded in silent agreement. “All right. We'll play this your way. But if this goes wrong, you're going to be the one to explain it to the WSC.”

“It won't. I'll have Agent Barnes in my ear, guiding me through the conversation. And I'm pregnant. As far as he knows? I'm harmless.”

That caused a round of instantaneous laughter. Pregnant the Viper may be, but there wasn't a man there who believed for a second she couldn't wipe them all out with her pinky finger if she was of a mind to, not even Will. And he'd been the most protective of her since Harlem.

Just then a technician came running over. “Director Fury! His vitals are spiking and he's starting to stir. The captain's waking up.”

Nodding in agreement, Fury turned back to Marina, smiling at the woman who was practically his sister as he admonished her, “Be careful and be safe, okay?”

“Yes sir,” she agreed with a small grin, tilting up her cheek to accept the uncharacteristically fond kiss the one-eyed man pressed to her cheek. Spinning on her toes, she went up to kiss her own lover, before heading off to the captain's recovery room. Glancing at the tech supervising the monitors, she asked, “Is he awake?”

“And starting to realize something's wrong,” he agreed, giving her a bemused smile.

Bucky's voice was confused from behind her as he insisted, “As he should. Who chose that game? We were there . . . he wouldn't have heard it over the radio.”

“Well then, sooner rather than later it is,” she chirped, bouncing on her toes. Moving to the door of the room, she put one hand on the handle and turned back to the other man. “Wish me luck, Tovrets.”

Grinning, he laughed, “Don't break a leg. Your boys would kill me.”

She burst into startled laughter at the tease, before facing forward once more. A quick straightening of her spine and a squaring of her shoulders, before she pushed open the door and stepped into the room. There was deep suspicion in the eyes of Steven Grant Rogers, narrowing at her as she came into the room. Closing the door behind her, she moved to the radio and snapped it off, before turning back to face him. Her hands clasped over her belly, drawing his attention downwards; she fought to contain her smirk as he visibly sagged, clearly willing to relax in front of someone he saw as essentially harmless.

“Hello Captain Rogers. My name is Lt. Colonel Marina Petrovka, of the United States Army.”

Gesturing with one hand to the room, she continued, “Welcome to S.H.I.E.L.D.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) chado - child (one of Marina's nicknames for Rene Grimm)
(R) golovnya - firebrand (one of Marina's nicknames for Rene Grimm)
(R) Ya tozga tebya lyublyu - I love you too
(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God
(R) Dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint Grimm)
(R) Tovrets - architect (one of Marina's nicknames for Bucky Barnes)
(R) devochki - girls (Marina's unborn twins)
(R)
Enjoy!

Translations, what few there are, are at the end as always.

(Credit should also be attributed to my betas - you know who you are - because seriously, I had a hard time with Steve and Luna jumped in to give me his voice . . . and of course, everyone else cheerleading and throwing me ideas and just being generally awesome. Thank you all so much.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 214: Debriefing Cap

Marina Ivanovna Petrovka was not a tall woman. She stood a petite five foot one and before she got pregnant, the most common descriptor for her was diminutive. Her Misha stood at an easy five foot eleven, towering over her on any given day. The two of them were a striking couple and more than a few of their friends had commented on the way they complemented each other in looks and temperament.

She had read the file on Steven Grant Rogers. The file had said that he was six foot even and 230 pounds. Looking at him as he rose from the bed, Marina was disinclined to believe it. The man appeared to her as though he was massive, with wide shoulders and slender hips and a stern demeanor that Marina could remember seeing on Will when he was pissed off. Blinking slightly, she muttered under her breath, “I would have appreciated a warning, Tovrets.”

Bucky's tone was curious as his voice rang in her ear, “About what?”

“He’s huge!” she argued, fingers sketching across her stomach as she watched the man stalk forward.

“You should have seen him when he was a kid. Scrawny little punk; he made me crazy,” the man argued, a Brooklyn accent lingering on his words as he grumbled.

“Careful, Soldat . . . your Brooklyn is showing,” she teased, before returning her attention to the captain as he paused next to the false windows. There was a moment, before Marina snorted lightly, retorting, “And I'm supposed to believe that moy dorogoy doesn't make you crazy.”

There was a sharp bark of laughter through the comm, as her former mentor snarked, “Scrawny Steve was a thousand times worse.”

“Well . . . there's a scary thought,” she drawled horrified, before suddenly the officer was directly in front of her.

“Where am I?” he demanded, blue eyes flashing with lightning as he approached her. “Who the hell are you?”

Cocking an eyebrow, Marina scolded firmly, “Watch your mouth! Soldier you may be, but you're also in the presence of a superior officer and I will insist that you comport yourself accordingly.”

“You said you were S.H.I.E.L.D.”

“No, I said I was United States Army. I was welcoming you to S.H.I.E.L.D.” Cocking her head, she watched him for a moment before offering insistently, “I don't think you realize the uniqueness of your situation here, Captain. You've been dead since 1945, at least according to the United States government.”

Those eyes went wide, shock registering across his face as he fumbled backwards for the bed. “Dead?”

“You crashed the Red Skull's plane in the Arctic Circle shortly after the disappearance of your friend, Sergeant James Buchanan Barnes . . . best known as Bucky Barnes.”

“Disappearance? You mean death . . . he fell from the train and into a ravine.”

Cocking an eyebrow, she inquired lightly, “Did you see a body?”

“Well no, but we didn't exactly have the time to go back and look for one. The Red Skull and HYDRA had disastrous plans for our country . . . I couldn't go back for him.”

Marina’s long honed protectiveness came roaring to the forefront as she snapped, “Then how can you be so sure he died? When you rescued him, Armin Zola had been experimenting on him! How can you be sure if you didn’t even bother to check?!”

Bucky’s tone was calm and soothing in her ear as he insisted, “Back it up, Marina. It’s all right . . . I’m okay.”

Closing her eyes, Marina forced herself to take a long, deep breath through her nose. The action, as well as Will’s voice warm and adoring in her head counting down from 100 in Arabic, served to steady her temper, shove her Hufflepuff tendencies back into their box and force her logical brain back into play. Shaking her head to clear her thoughts, she opened her eyes once again to offer the captain a small, sad smile. “I’m sorry. That was uncalled for.”

“What’s going on? Who are you talking to?” the man demanded suspiciously.

Marina’s eyebrows furrowed as she cocked her head, “You heard me?” Glancing at the door, she asked in concern, “What else do you hear?”

Blue eyes narrowed as he considered the question. “I don't know. I've never heard anything like it before. It's a buzzing sound . . . kind of like bees but . . . not.”

Smirking, she laughed, “Eloquent. But effective. It's a comm . . . kind of like a radio, but much much smaller.”

Though he clearly didn't believe her, he nodded slowly. “I remember you.”

“I beg your pardon? I'm not that old,” she huffed, speaking mostly to the laughter ringing in her ear from her former mentor. “Shut up, before I let Clint put shaving cream in your boots and all of your uniform pockets again.”

There was a sputter, before the sniper protested, “You wouldn't dare!”

“Oh, wouldn't I?” she taunted smugly, before turning her attention back onto Steve Rogers. “May I ask how you remember me? Because I can say with all assurance . . . we have never met.”

Sinking onto the bed, he sighed, “I think it was a dream? It couldn't have been real, whatever it was.”

“A dream?” she asked cautiously, perching on the end of the bed outside of arm's reach. “What kind of dream?”

“I heard him . . .” the super-soldier whispered wretchedly, dropping his head into his palms.

Immediately the Russian’s maternal instinct was in overdrive. Conscious of the fact that he was still - at least mentally - the same age as her eldest son, Marina reached out a laid one hand on his forearm. “Heard who?”

“It doesn't matter . . . he's dead. I watched him fall.”

Compressing her lips, she could all but feel Bucky’s pain through the comm. They had agreed - her and Will and Bucky - that showing Bucky to Steve right off the bat would hurt the Captain more than easing him into the transition his life had abruptly taken. But damn if the kid wasn't ripping at her heartstrings.

Will's tone was calm as he reported, “Stick to the plan, Marishka. Tell him what's happened since he went into the ice. Owen's ready too, whenever you're ready to take him for that drive.”

“Captain Rogers, I know this is all going to be quite overwhelming but the year is 2009 . . .
November to be a bit more precise. You have been presumed dead since 1945. But in that time there was always a hope that the wreckage and ultimately you would be found. That you were not only found, but found alive, is a miracle.”

Those eyes were wide and horrified as he whispered, “2009?”

“Yes. The world has changed and I am afraid that there a lot for you to catch up on. But you are not alone. S.H.I.E.L.D knows that you have lost a lot. We're committed to helping you regain a place in the world . . . even if it is not the one you once had.”

“Peggy? The Commandos?”

“Director Carter still lives, though she suffers from moderate dementia.” Giving him a serene smile, she promised, “She had a good life, with an adoring husband and beautiful children. I can promise she missed you though. She still speaks of you fondly.”

There was a small sad smile as he announced, “I’m a little overdue for our dance.”

“I think, in light of the circumstances, she will forgive you.”

A fond smile lit the captain’s face and he shook his head, “Then she’s changed. If I saw her again, she would give me hell.”

Smirking, Marina laughed, “Sounds like my kind of woman. Her reputation was well known when I was in training as a child; though we never met personally, I can tell you that I would not have wanted to be on the opposite side of a fight with her.”

“Most didn't learn that until too late.”

There was amusement in hot chocolate eyes as she teased, “Sounds like you were one of those who caught on a little late.”

“You ever see pictures of my shield?”

“My Jason would literally kill to be able to recreate it. He’s got it sitting on a shelf in his lab and no one is allowed to touch it. Not even my brother-in-law; trust me, Phil and Jason are having a standoff over it.

“The first time I held it, she was standing maybe ten feet from me and pulled the trigger of her gun four times. I never asked her after, but I don't think she knew what it was made out of, she could have shot me and she didn't even blink an eye.” His smile never wavered. “Even considering the fact it’s vibranium, you can still see the bullet scars.”

“Hmmm . . . there’s a thing to find attractive.” A soft blush painted her cheeks as she replied, “Although . . . my lover thinks it’s sexy when I have blood in my hair, so I may have an idea what you’re talking about there.”

“Blood in your hair?”

“It’s complicated, I guess? I’m the XO of a highly trained, highly specialized alpha unit. We’re the ones the Army sends in when shit has hit the fan and they need some serious clean up.” Shrugging lightly, she continued, “When we’re not active duty with the Army, we work here, for S.H.I.E.L.D. It’s not exactly a bloodless occupation.”

There was a furrow between his eyebrows as he considered the statement, before inquiring, “I don’t “remember S.H.I.E.L.D.”

“No, but I’ll bet you remember the S.S.R.?”

“Yeah, Peggy worked for the S.S.R.”

“While the S.S.R. and S.H.I.E.L.D. are not the same thing, they were born with the same ideals. Peggy Carter and Howard Stark claim the lion’s share of the credit for S.H.I.E.L.D.’s inception.” There was a distant look in her eyes as she recited, “A global community committed to peace.”

“Is that how it works?”

There was a self-deprecating twist to her mouth as she conceded, “Not always. But even the best intentions can pave the way to hell. We are only human and we do the best we can to keep to the parameters of peace Director Carter and Mr. Stark believed in.” Reaching out, she laid a hand over his with a soft squeeze. “You rather inspired them both, just so you know.”

“That’s not terrifying or anything,” he replied, a sharp frown on his face at the announcement.

“I wish I could say that everything you have inspired has been so positive, but that would be a lie. I spend rather a lot of time lying in my professional life . . . I try to avoid it in my personal one if I can.”

“I understand the inspiration part, Schmidt and I were created from the same compound and he tried to destroy the world. Even my own country saw different things when they looked at me after the serum.”

He seemed to see something in her features that upset him as those broad shoulders sagged a little. “I don’t want to know . . . do I?”

“I guess that will rather depend on you,” she hedged, one hand on her back and the other on the mattress as she forced herself to her feet with a small grunt. “Shall we?”

“Shall we what?” he asked cautiously.

“Did you not want to see the world outside of this room? Or do you find yourself content with the manufactured reality you find yourself in now?”

The two watched each other for a moment, before the captain pushed himself up from the bed. Gesturing with his right hand, he insisted, “After you, ma’am.”

“Just Marina . . . I’m not THAT old,” she sighed, with a roll of her eyes. Both of her hands came back to brace her back as she groaned, tone resigned as she sighed, “Misha is going to kill me.”

“Do you need protection ma’am?”

“Steve, Marina . . . I’m not kidding,” she scolded, narrowing her eyes and wrinkling her nose. “As for the protection, no. Although, if you let me hide behind you, that would be great.”

Will’s tone was dry and amused as he teased, “I’m standing at the door.”

“Damn it,” she sighed with a soft laugh. “No, Captain . . . I’ll be fine. Misha is my daughters’ father; he worries.”

Owen’s voice came from the door then, as he joked, “Understatement, Boss Lady. You about ready to blow this popsicle stand? Car’s gassed and ready.”
Before long, Will came up to stand beside his best friend, one eyebrow cocked and a warm smirk on his face. Squeaking adorably, Marina skittered behind Steve. Lifting one arm to look behind himself, the young man was surprised to see her peeking out from behind him, a wide grin on her lips. “Captain Rogers has promised to protect me from the big and scary Colonel, Mishka.”

The Colonel’s shoulders were vibrating and it took a moment for Steve to realize that the man was laughing. “What am I gonna do with you? You don’t intend to adopt this one, do you?”

Nose wrinkling adorably, she chirped, “I haven’t decided yet.”

Steve looked between the three not quite sure what to make of what was happening. His eyebrows rose as he echoed, “Adopt?”

Both of the men burst into laughter at the question, causing Marina to pout slightly. Still chuckling, Will sidestepped the captain deftly and swung his Russian into his arms. “How are you feeling?”

“I’m fine, Alfred,” she snarked, with a roll of her eyes.

“Whatever you say, Batman. Just take it easy, okay? I have a younger brother to go corral, so I will not be able to go with you.”

“Which brother?” Marina asked, wide eyed and worried.

“Clint . . . he’s apparently scaring the baby agents at the shooting range.”

“He’s really worried about what all of this means for the both of them, Misha . . . dig deep and find the nurturing side of you, okay? For my sake?”

“Haha,” he snorted. “I’m going to challenge him to a rematch. It’ll put him in a better mood, and give some of the trainees a little piece of mind. He’s a little intimidating when he’s full on Hawkeye at people.”

“Agreed,” she replied, before thinking for a moment and sighing, “Except for when he’s pissing them off by shooting them with nerf arrows from the airvents.”

“Touche,” her lover agreed, hands coming up to cup the swell of her belly as he bent to kiss her. “Be careful. I’ll see you when you get back.”

“What about Zima?”

“Waiting at the motorcade when you get back, as agreed.”

“Still in my ear?”

Bucky’s voice was a warm and gentle hum as he replied, “Always.”

“All right. I leave you in Owen’s capable hands and I’ll see you later tonight. I’m feeling like Chinese.”

Lifting her chin, she hummed happily as he engaged her in a warm kiss. “Tease . . .” she groaned, eyes rolling back as she considered her partner’s penchant for delicious Chinese dishes, each made from scratch and absolutely to die for. “Ya lyublyu tebya, moya Mishka.”

The Colonel smirked, even as he murmured his reply against her skin before slapping Owen on the back and dashing off out of sight. Seeing the curiosity in the captain’s eyes, the Cleaner jerked his thumb over his shoulder. “That was the Boss. He’s the boss cause he’s banging the Boss Lady.”

Rolling her eyes at the double entendre in the words, Marina corrected fondly, “Other way around, Lucky.”

There was scandalized shock in Owen’s eyes as he protested, “Says who!?”

Several hours later, Marina was leaning back in her seat, fingers drawing designs over her belly, as she watched Captain Rogers take in everything outside of the SUV. He’d made them stop at Time Square; the awe and shock on his face as he rotated had caused a deep pang; Marina had been around long enough to remember how it used to look, and had watched it change drastically over the last twenty years since the Grimms had joined S.H.I.E.L.D.

The sight of Stark Tower, still in construction but clearly delineated against the skyline, had earned a twist of his mouth. When she had inquired, he’d stated that the he considered the building to be an eyesore. And yet, he’d gravitated naturally towards the older buildings still standing in Brooklyn and near Harlem. Snorting, she contemplated Tony Stark’s reaction to Captain America disliking his building; the engineer was so egotistical, Marina truly doubted he would care.

They had paused briefly on the block where Steve and Bucky had lived, following the death of Steve’s mother Sarah. While it looked nothing like it had, the location was understandably familiar to him. Neither she nor Owen had pushed to continue on, content to let him explore to his heart’s content.

All in all, it had been a good tour. Which was quickly coming to an end. As much as Marina had been hoping to put it off, the moment of truth had nearly arrived. “What’s our ETA, Lucky?”

“We’re five minutes away from base, Boss Lady.”

Nodding briskly, the Russian took a deep breath through her nose before releasing it slowly from her mouth. “Captain Rogers, there is one last thing . . . something you need to know, before we arrive back on base.”

Steve pulled his still distant gaze from the window and blinked, focusing on her, then noticing something about her manner asked, “Problem?”

“Nothing like that, Captain. Quite the opposite, in fact.”

“Then what is it, Ma’am?”

Sighing at the persistent terminology, Marina waved it aside before folding her hands in her lap. “When I was four years old, the Russians took me from my home and took me to what they called ‘The Academy’. They trained me to be a killer . . . but I was too kind, too sympathetic. I was 13 when the order was given to terminate me.”

Another strong pull of air lifted her shoulders as she considered how to consider, “There was an assassin . . . an asset, for the Red Room, who saw me defending one of my sisters from a group of bullies. And instead of letting them terminate me . . . he took me under his wing instead. He had promised that I would be the best in my class; and I was . . . I am.”

There was a pause as she nibbled on her lower lip, eyes wide and luminous as she watched him. It was clear that she was hesitant about telling him the rest, evidenced by the way her hands twisted and clenched together in her lap. “He was kind to me . . . he brought me candies which were forbidden to trainees . . . he took care of me . . . I daresay he even loved me, even though his reputation would have suggested he was incapable of it.
“There were rumors he was an American, though the idea was ludicrous to those us who heard it. Russia and America were in the midst of a Cold War; it was unthinkable to children, what had to have happened to make him loyal to Мать Россия. He was wiped of all memory constantly, and there were rumors of a machine that kept him loyal. But there were little idiosyncrasies; slang, terminology, occasionally a foreign accent . . . they all pointed to an American.”

Steve’s eyes were narrow as he watched her, visible confused. “I don’t understand. Why do I need to know this?”

Looking up, Marina saw they were pulling into the motorcade. There was a solitary figure standing in the entryway to the garage, feet planted at shoulder width apart and hands in the pockets of his cargos. Turning back to Steve, she replied, “They called him the Zimniy Soldat . . . the Winter Soldier.” Pointing out the front window, she continued, “You know him better . . . as James Buchanan Barnes.”

Chapter End Notes

DON'T KILL ME!!!!! flees the pitchforks

Translations:
(R) Tovrets - Architect (can also be father; Marina's nickname for Bucky Barnes)
(R) Soldat - Soldier (shortened form of Winter Soldier, the callsign for Bucky Barnes)
(R) moy dorogoy - my darling (Marina's nickname for Clint Grimm)
(R) Zima - Winter (shortened form of Winter Soldier, one of Marina's nicknames for Bucky Barnes)
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya, moya Mishka - I love you, my Mishka
(R) Мать Россия - Mother Russia
(R) Zimniy Soldat - Winter Soldier (the callsign for Bucky Barnes)
Terms & Conditions

Chapter Notes

Sorry about the wait. Steve would not put himself on the page; stubborn little punk! However, thanks to my wonderful betas for sticking with me and letting me annoy them at all hours of the day and night . . . the chapter is ready. Also, fair warning, it's short. But this is where the story demanded I cease.

Also, new banner! Woot!

There are no translations, except for the typical ones, so I won't bother this time. Enjoy!!
BROTHERS-IN-ARMS
ForGED IN Fire
Chapter 215: Terms & Conditions

Steve’s breathing hitched sharply at the name. He continued to stare at her, not looking to where she was pointing and shook his head, “That’s not possible. Even if he survived that fall, even if… he would be dead, or too old to be standing there like that. Whoever is over there is young.” He didn’t even have to look straight at them to see that. “So either you have been misled or we may in fact have a problem.”

“Captain Rogers, the only thing misleading about anything you have learned about James Barnes, was that HYDRA only wanted information from him when he was captured. While he was in custody, he was experimented on by Dr Zola. What they did to him allowed him to survive the fall… and kept him perpetually young, such as yourself.” Glancing out the window, she sighed at the stonewalled features of her former mentor, before insisting, “I imagine any other questions you may have, he would want to answer himself.”

She sighed in sympathy at the uncertainty on his face. “Captain Rogers. Look at him. I promise… I have no intention of deceiving you. It truly is him.”

His eyes were laser sharp on her face, hope, fear and nervousness in his features. Half of him was desperate to believe… to know that his best friend had survived the fall. The other half was terrified… How could Bucky have survived unscathed? How would he have landed in the hands of the Russians? What kind of machine? How much of Bucky truly still remained?

Her smile was firm and determined as she nodded, gesturing towards the motionless figure once again. “Just look. At which point, you can decide for yourself.”

Taking a deep breath in through his nose, the captain tore his eyes away from the woman and directed his attention forward through the windshield. The man standing framed in the doorway was strikingly familiar, even as Steve struggled to see past the strangeness of the man’s outward appearance. He wore a pair of dark blue jeans, paired with a dark gray henley and a pair of black combat boots. The shoulders were broader than he remembered, stretching the grey henley to its widest point. Emerging from the end of the left sleeve, if the agent moved just right, there was a flash of shine; this must have been the metal arm the Lt. Colonel had told him about. Blinking as it reflected light into his eyes, he redirected his attention to the face. It was the face that confirmed the woman’s words, however. Long dark hair hung from in a tail down his back, a few stragglers hanging around his all-too-familiar face… and ocean blue eyes that Steve had spent week since he’d died looking for in the bottom of a bottle. “It can’t be,” he breathed, fumbling for the door handle as he continued to stare.

He spilled from the confines of the vehicle, eyes wide and filled with wary hope as he got closer. The face was impassive as the agent watched him approach, as though he was a big cat tracking its prey. “Bucky!” he breathed in shocked hope, clearly terrified that this was all a dream.

One corner of his lips flicked upwards as Steve’s best friend replied, “Hey punk. What the hell did you think you were doing, crashing a plane into the Arctic? I’m not always gonna be around to look after you, ya know.”

Steve’s eyes flashed wide at the lopsided grin, before he took three great strides and threw his arms around Bucky’s shoulders and quickly dissolved into ugly, disgusting sobs. “You’re alive,” he gasped, arms tightening hard.

“Easy, Stevie… most of the rest of us are still kind of breakable, huh? Loosen up a bit,” he chuckled, patting Steve’s shoulder fondly, before looking behind him. Whatever he saw made his eyes go wide as he scolded, “Marishka! Wait a second! You’re gonna hurt yourself!”

“I am pregnant, Tovrets, not an invalid. I am perfectly capable of climbing out of a car by myself,” the Lt. Colonel scolded, even as she accepted Owen’s offered hand. “Thank you, Lucky.”

“That’s what I’m here for, Boss Lady . . . I keep you safe and the Boss doesn’t hand me my ass on a sparring mat. Been there, done that . . . didn’t need or want the t-shirt.”

Marina snorted delicately, turning her attention back to the two super-soldiers before her. “So . . . are you satisfied, Captain Rogers, that I have not been deceived?”

Frowning, Steve turned back to his childhood friend and asked, “Do you know me?”

There was a sharp roll of his eyes as the former Winter Soldier recited, “Your mother’s name was Sarah. You used to put newspapers in your shoes to keep warm. You made me crazy with your ridiculous antics and your incessant need to start fights. I can’t tell you how many times I was cleaning your blood out of my fingernails . . . or how many fights I got into, saving your scrawny, five foot nothing butt.”

Glancing at Marina as she pulled up alongside, he cracked lightly, “That tendency didn’t get any better after the serum either. He was still a reckless little shit. Now he was just a bigger reckless little shit.”

“Sounds like moy dorogoy . . . clearly you were born for corralling ‘reckless little shits’ as you say,” she chuckled around a groan, hands coming up to brace against her back. “Ugh . . . is it January yet?”

“Just a little while longer, Boss Lady,” Owen promised, hand out as though he clearly wanted to assist her in some way but was reluctant to.

Shaking his head, Steve reached out to wrap an arm around her waist and guide her towards the door. Marina blinked up at him, surprise in hot chocolate eyes as she was all but herded into the garage. “Captain Rogers, I’m all right. Really.”

“Your back hurts. Your ankles look swollen. There are pinches at the corners of your eyes that are clear indication that you’re in pain. Please . . . let me help, ma’am.”

The response was instantaneous as she protested, “It’s Marina.” Reaching up one hand to poke at his chest, she asked in awe, “Are you real?”

“Yes ma’am.”

“Marina.”

Cocking an eyebrow at her, he took in her implacable features and simply nodded in agreement, “Of course . . . Marina.”

Grabbing on to the back of a chair, Marina eased herself into it, still staring up at Captain America as though she was staring at some heavenly specter. “Tovrets?”

“Da?” he asked, smirking at the way Steve fussed around her trying to make her comfortable.

“Am I dreaming?”
“No . . . how do you feel, honestly?”

“No . . . how do you feel, honestly?”

Tired, but I’m carrying twins and I’m supposed to be on bedrest. I am always tired,” she reminded him with a fond smile.

“Do I need to go get Boss?”

“Would you all stop fussing at me!? There is kind of a bigger deal happening right now.”

“Oh?” Bucky asked, ocean eyes narrowing as he watched her settle back.

“Sergeant James B. Barnes and Captain Steven G. Rogers are in the same vicinity for the first time in 70 years . . . and they’ve hardly even looked at each other.”

Bucky and Steve both flinched in that moment, glancing at each other sheepishly before their eyes darted away once again. She waited for a long time, watching the two avoid each other. Finally, she threw her hands up in the air and ordered, “Oh for crying out loud! Would you just kiss and make up already!? You’re giving me a toothache over here!”

She smirked with an eyebrow cocked upwards as the Soldier aimed a vicious glare in her direction at the statement. Steve, however, had turned to look at his best friend. He stood motionless, staring at the other man as he tried to reconcile the man he’d seen fall not so long ago with the man who stood before him now. It took a moment, but eventually he came to the same realization he had always had.

He looked different, undoubtedly; the arm was going to take some used to as was the longer hair and ponytail. He moved differently; strong and stiff and determined where before there had been a confident laziness in his stride that had drawn people like flies to honey. But those eyes . . . those eyes had not changed. This man before him -- for all the changes Steve did not yet understand - this man was still his best friend, his Bucky.

As the thought struck him, a well of piercing gratitude and unaddressed grief welled up in his throat. Stepping forward, he threw his arms around the other man, choking on the emotion swelling his airways closed. Bucky went stiff, clearly surprised, before softening as Steve’s whispered words made their way to his ears.

“Thank God you’re alive, Bucky . . . thank God for you.”

There was another moment, before Bucky’s arms came up around the other man and squeezed tightly. “Welcome back, punk . . . I missed you.”
New Horizons

Chapter Notes

Sorry about the wait. This one broke my heart, but yeah. At least it's done.

I hope you enjoy this one!

Translations at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 216: New Horizons

S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Eye in the Sky had only been in the podunk little town for an hour and he had already found the bar. Adding to his building buzz, he was already horrifically bored.

The sound of heartbroken screams were terribly familiar to Clint now. The fact that they were all his head, did not make them any less real. Reaching for one of the shots lined up in front of him, he tossed it back sharply, the alcohol silencing the anguished cries for a moment. At least before they started up again.

Even after only an hour, Clint was fairly certain he was very, very drunk.

Grumbling as they started up once again, the archer tore himself away from the miserable picture in the mirror and rotated on his barstool to take in the room. Puente Antiguo, New Mexico, wasn’t much of a town, but for the foreseeable future . . . this place was home. Feeling the tears linger at the corner of his eyes, the archer clenched his eyes together hard and started counting backwards from 100 in Latin. The last thing he needed was to lose his will and go home. He had spent two weeks single; he had broken up with Bucky so that his soldier could be happy. Being 2000 miles away want going to change his mind.

After everything he’d endured with the Red Room, Bucky deserved happiness more than anyone else in this world. Marina herself had been the one to tell the archer so many years before, that if walking away was the best thing to do for Bucky, Clint needed to be strong enough to do it. And since Captain Fucking America was blatantly adamant that there could be no place for him in his exboyfriend’s life . . . what else could he do?

The stories almost made everything hurt that much more.

The comics had ensured that Captain America and his best pal, Bucky Barnes, were legendary and their close relationship well known. Even the history books, with their dry recounting of WWII, had agreed that the relationship between the two men was close and unprecedented. They were inseparable, living in each other’s back pockets constantly. Snorting he muttered, “And people think Grimms are co-dependent.”

A hot surge of heartbreak and disappointment swelled into his throat, forcing him to rotate back to the bar for another drink to wash it down. Swirling the amber liquid in the bottom of the glass, he watched the light play through it as he remembered his brother and sister’s reaction to his request for this posting a little more than six hours before. It wasn’t often that something or someone caught his older brother off guard.

Will had been flabbergasted when Clint had come to them both after the altercation with Captain
Rogers and begged to be assigned to the security detail for the object which had touched down outside of the little town. He’d argued with Clint for almost an hour; the assignment was pocket change and Clint was inarguably overqualified for it. It would be boring and a waste of the sniper’s time.

Thank goodness for Marishka . . . she had been settled in her favorite armchair, fingers tracing the bulge of her belly as she watched two of her favorite people go at it. Finally she spoke up, “Will this assignment make you happy, dorogoy?”

He’d rounded on her and begged, “Please, Marishka . . . I need to get away for awhile.”

Never let it be said that Marina didn’t know her boys. She’d watched him for a moment, then pushed herself to her feet. A quiet word with her partner had changed the Colonel’s mind and before the archer could even blink, he’d been assigned to the post as Head of Security. Clint would give his brother this; it was definitely boring.

Vaguely, he became aware of someone hitching up onto the stool next to him. It was quiet for a moment, before a lovely voice spoke up, “Last time I saw you, you were giving me a lapdance while I was on Spring Break in New York City. What brings you to this little hell hole?”

Blinking in shock, Clint’s head swung around to stare. There she was, the girl who had haunted his thoughts constantly since the night of Jason’s promotion to detective. Even Bucky had known how much he thought of her; none of their other flings had ever lingered on his mind for as long as she had.

She was beautiful. Long, waving dark hair, framed a pixie face. Honey colored eyes were framed by blocky black glasses, above a pert nose and sensuous mouth. She was thin and willowy, with a rack that made Clint’s mouth water. She was gorgeous and the archer could feel his body sitting up to take notice. Shoving out a hand, he introduced himself, “I’m Clint.”
Smirking at him, she took the hand and shook it firmly, “Darcy. Nice to meet you, Clint.” Blushing lightly, she laughed, “It’s nice to finally have a name to accompany the memory of your butt.”

Clint grinned at her, laughing, “I’ve been told, my ass is my best feature.”

Giggling, she cocked her head at him before reaching out to trace the veins bulging from his exposed forearms. “Maybe not your best feature . . . but definitely in the top ten.” Shifting, she looked around the room before asking, “Where’s tall dark and studly?”

“Who?”

“The guy who was staring at you as though you were a tall drink of water and he was dying of thirst? I always kind of hoped you two had gotten together.”

The archer’s mouth compressed as he reached for another glass, tossing back the alcohol without even tasting it. Darcy’s jaw contorted, her tone small as she sighed, “Oh . . . I’m sorry.”

“It’s not his fault . . . but apparently someone had a prior claim and I was infringing on it.”

“Asshole. He was cheating?”

Clint’s eyes went wide at the question, before he shook his head firmly. “No! No, Bucky wasn’t cheating. He was loyal . . . it’s complicated and messy, and - no offense - but I’m drinking to forget, not to remember.”

Darcy grinned at the statement, chuckling, “I’ll drink to that.” Biting down on the inside of her lower lip, she asked, “Do you want some company? It’s not nearly as much fun, drinking alone as it is with a friend.”

He smirked at her, amused, as he teased, “Friends, huh?”

“Well, I can think of a few friendly things we could do . . . requires a lot less clothes, though,” she teased, her nose wrinkling as she tossed her curly dark hair over one shoulder.

“Oh really?” he asked with a slight tilt to his head. Anyone who knew him would know what the gesture meant; he was sizing her up, trying to assess her weaknesses and gauge her sincerity. “Just between friends, huh?”

“Hey, you don’t believe me, it’s your loss. I will rock your world,” she sassed, rolling the head of her beer bottle against the fullness of her bottom lip.

Chuckling, he tossed his head back, eyes closing as the chilly familiarity of his guinness slid down his throat. “I don’t think I’m drunk enough for this conversation.”

“Then drink up, Stud . . . I have designs on that ass. And they are not for public consumption.”

“I thought you said it wasn’t my best feature,” he laughed, gesturing over the bartender with two fingers to order another round.

She grinned, tone a throaty purr as she promised, “I lied.”

Watching her over the rim of his glass, he watched her throat work as she took several long draughts from her Miller Lite. The imagery was more than enough to bring to mind several fantasies he’d indulged from the last five years. “So . . . for the record, what’s the endgame here?”

“You, me, cotton sheets, and hours of mind-blowing sex. The hot, dirty, nasty kind that sticks with you . . . the kind you dream about on lonely nights when it’s just you and your hand.”

“Gonna make it worth my while, then, huh?”

“Honey . . . by the time I’m done with you, you’re gonna be begging me for more,” she vowed, leaning forward on her arms . . . more than aware of the fact the position put her delectable breasts on perfect display.

“Promises promises,” he teased, with a cheeky wink. “Let’s see you put your money where your mouth is.”

Her eyelids fluttered at the mental image his words conjured up, before she purred, “You want my mouth where your money is, sexy . . . trust me.”

Groaning at the sudden flare of heat her words shot through his groin, he set the glass on the bar then reached out with the same hand. Hooking his fingers behind her neck, he hauled her forward into his lap and captured her mouth in a hot kiss. She moaned, the sound luscious and obscene, even as her own hands came up to grip his lapels and pull him closer. Her fingers pricked on the hawk stitched into the shoulder of his S.H.I.E.L.D. hoodie, and she smirked against his mouth. Her words were little more than a whimper as she insisted, “Come on, Hawkass . . . take me to bed or lose me forever.”

“Just show me the way home, honey,” he replied, completely the quote and earning a brilliant grin.

“Oh I like you,” she giggled, fingers shifting to comb through the short hairs at the back of his neck. “You and I . . . we’re going to get into a lot of trouble together.”

“I aim to misbehave,” he agreed with a wink as she cheered, her eyes alight with joy and excitement. “My place is just around the corner.”

“After you,” he agreed, setting her on her feet on the floor. Tossing a few fifties to cover their drinks, as well as the bottle of whiskey he swiped from behind the bar, Clint pushed himself away from the bar and reached for her hand. Honest appreciation and excitement about the night that lay ahead of them shone in her features as she laced her fingers with his and leaned into his side.

It was destined to be the first night of the rest of their lives together.

Years later, Clint would laugh when Marina would tell the story about his and Darcy’s first night together. “A lot of alcohol, a lot of sex, and a hell of a lot of paperwork.”

There was no question that there had been passion in spades, but there had also been more than enough laughter to warm the cold desert night too. Darcy’s joy had burned as hot as her body, and despite her earlier teasing, she had not been wrong . . . she definitely rocked his world.

By the time dawn broke the following morning, Clint had dragged her screaming into bliss at least a half dozen times, and was working her towards yet another. Her sobs were half-elation and half-agony, her body fighting to keep up with his ministrations as his lips, tongue and teeth worked her to another glittering climax. “I can’t!” she wailed, throwing her hands up to pull viciously at her hair, back bowing under the weight of her pleasure.

He chuckled, lifting his mouth from her as he promised huskily, “You can . . . you will. Even if it takes me all morning . . . you’ll scream for me again.”
As if his words were a prophecy, she spasmed hard, bucking wildly against his mouth as her orgasm swept her up and away once again on a tidal wave of bliss. Smirking against her, and knowing there was no way he was going to be able to get hard again any time soon, Clint flicked one last lick to her clit, before crawling up her body and pressing his mouth to her own. They shared the taste of her between them, her arms coming up to haul him down into her. “Damn . . . I may have to keep you around for awhile.”

“No complaints here,” he laughed, flopping onto his back and pulling her into the circle of his arms.

Cuddling close to him with a purr, she used the pads of her fingers to trace infinities over the skin covering his sternum. Clint buried his nose in her hair, fingers smoothing over her shoulders as he enjoyed the closeness of another human being, body pressed heartbeat to heartbeat and completely honest in their nakedness. After a long silence, she shifted slightly to look up at him. “Clint?” she asked cautiously, her eyes searching his as he tilted his chin down to look her in the eyes.

“What’s wrong, Darce?”

“Do you mind if I ask?”

His shoulders stiffened slightly against his will, even as he took a deep breath through his nose. “Ask me what?”

“What happened? I mean you don’t have to . . . but I’d like to know. If it’s okay with you?” she asked, with a small frown. “He seemed pretty besotted with you . . . and considering the way you kissed him, I would say the feeling was pretty mutual.”

“It was . . . we were together for nearly ten years.”

“So what happened?”

“It’s a long story?” he asked, watching his fingers dance over the bared skin of her shoulder.

“I’ve got all the time in the world,” she promised, a warm smile on his face as he watched her.

Taking a deep breath, he released it slowly with a nod. “His name is Steven Rogers . . . and when my boyfriend . . .” here he paused, heart wrenching hard in his chest once again with the remembrance that Bucky wasn’t his boyfriend anymore, before plowing forward, “. . . when Bucky was a kid, Steve was his best friend. They grew up together . . . Buck was in love with him.”

“But he was with you.”

“Yeah . . . Steve was a soldier. There was an . . . incident, and they thought Steve was dead. Bucky thought Steve was dead.”

“And suddenly he shows up and he’s not.”

“He’s a hero and Bucky is happy he's alive.”

“Again, Bucky was still with you,” Darcy reminded him.

Huffing, he laughed as he realized he was going to have to dance around the conversation a lot more than he was usually forced to. “There’s a lot I can’t tell you. Something’s are classified for a reason. But suffice it to say, I had good reason for being jealous of Steve Rogers to begin with. When he suddenly showed back up into our lives, with no memory of the last ten years and under the impression that no time had passed . . .”
Darcy snuggled closer as Clint trailed off, prompting gently. “Tell me what happened. Let me help carry the hurt for awhile.”

Flashback

Two Weeks Prior

The devastated look in Bucky’s eyes was wrecking Clint’s resolve. “Khishchnick... why are you saying all of this? I don’t want this to be over.”

Clint bit down hard on his lips, Marina’s words from ten years ago repeating a steady mantra in the back of his head. “I have to let you go, Bucky. It’s just a break... but he’s back from the dead, and you deserve the chance to see if there’s anything there between you.”

“I don’t want there to be anything between us! I want you!” the Winter Soldier insisted, stepping forward to take Clint’s face in his hands and visibly distraught when the archer stepped back out of range.

“And if that’s the case, then a little time apart isn’t going to change that. But I have to know I’m not your second choice here, okay? I love you... but I can’t play second fiddle to him again.

Going up on tiptoes, Clint pressed a warm, last kiss to his now ex-boyfriend’s lips, before stepping away. “I’ll see you,” he promised, with a wobbly smile.

There was a moment as the sniper watched the other man, before shoving his hands into his pockets, turned on his heel and walked away. Leaving Bucky still standing where he’d been left.

There wasn’t much about the next two weeks Clint actually remembered. It was all kind of a daze of training sessions with the junior agents, target practice at the range, and dinners with his brothers and very pregnant sister. The Russian, seeming to sense that something was wrong, said nothing about Bucky’s absence from her table and instead focused her attention on making all of her youngest’s favorite foods.

He recognized Bucky in his peripheral occasionally, typically with Steve and typically trying to ignore him. Clint never noticed the gutted look on the other sniper’s face when the archer would turn and leave without any kind of acknowledgment whatsoever. Each time, he could see Bucky and Steve getting closer... and each time, Clint and Bucky had never felt so far apart.

Of course, this all came to a head now... staring at Steve’s face and watching the other man turn red with anger. The accusation the captain had thrown at him rang in his ears and he stammered, sure he’d heard him wrong. “Come again?”

“I said, back off!” the blond ordered, all broad shoulders and flashing blue eyes.

Cocking his head slightly, Clint watched the taller man for a moment before one hand moved through his hair as he insisted, “I’m sorry, i think we’re probably crossing wires in this conversation. Back off of what?”

“Agent Barnes... you need to stay away from him.”

Never let it be said that Clint couldn’t be the most contrary of the Brothers Grimm when he was of a mind to be. Seeing as he had been trying to do exactly that, his hackles went up; Marina called it his “perverseness factor,” where he had to give whoever was giving him crap a hard time in return. Narrowing his eyes, Clint snarked, “Last I checked, he’s a consenting adult and of age. So kto chert voz’mi to stick your nose in my... our business?”
“He will always be my business. And if you think I'm just going to let you come near him you've got another thing coming. He doesn't need anything you've been giving him.”

Clint flinched hard, the gesture earning a pair of narrowed eyes. It wasn’t every day that your boyfriend’s . . . ex-boyfriend’s first love told you that everything you’d ever tried to do for him was worthless. Steeling his nerves, Clint let his lip curl as he snarled, “And who are you to make that call for him? His mother?”

“A better man than you apparently. His mother is a gem and would agree with me about protecting her son from you.”

Every word was a knife. Clint could feel each pain in his heart as they stabbed at him, attacking his most vulnerable places and leaving him bleeding. Reaching up to push the heel of his hair against the side of his face - and catching the single tear he hoped had gone unnoticed thus far - he asked quietly, “What did I ever do to you? Or Bucky for that matter? You’ve been dead for 70 years . . . the rest of us had to keep on living. So what exactly do you think you know?”

“I know you don't have the right to call him Bucky, that's reserved for family.”

“Yeah? And who do you think qualifies as family? Or are you the only one in his life who matters?” he asked, forcing himself to pull on his “Agent Face”; the one that most closely resembled his older brother’s “murder face” . . . and the one that scattered junior agents like marbles on a tile floor.

Steve straightened, “As far as you’re concerned, I am.”

Clint’s jaw tightened, as he nodded in quiet agreement. “I’ll keep that in mind. Thanks for the head’s up.” There was a small, sad smile to his lips as he promised, “I wouldn’t worry about my interfering with your relationship with your precious boyfriend. I got the message loud and clear . . . you won’t be seeing me any more.”

Turning on his heel, he stormed away . . . ignoring everything and anything that followed. Including the sputtering sound of a man caught completely off his guard.

End Flashback

Smiling sadly, he insisted, “Three hours later, I was on a Quinjet to New Mexico. I touched down twelve hours ago and I haven’t looked back since. I hope they’re very happy together.”

Darcy’s arms wrapped around his waist tighter as she just cuddled, promising, “I’m sorry. But hey, look at the bright side?”

“There’s a bright side?” he asked with a smirk.

“Well yeah . . . breaking up with him brought you here so I could rock your world.”

Grinning, he hauled her under him and pressed a hot kiss to her lips. “Good point . . . let’s see if I can rock it one more time.”

Moaning as he slipped inside of her, she begged, “Fuck yes . . . let’s do that.”

Meanwhile, in on a S.H.I.E.L.D. base in New York City, more than a few agents quailed at the clipped sound of high heels on linoleum. Especially when the owner of those heels came into view, lightning in her eyes and thunder in her features. Marina Ivanovna Petrovka stormed into mess hall, temper clearly on a hair trigger, as she stormed up to the table where Bucky Barnes say with Steve Rogers.
Bucky blinked at her, startled by her anger. “Uchenyy?”

“What the hell happened to my son?!”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for her youngest Grimm)
(R) khishchnik - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for his long time boyfriend, Clint Grimm)
(R) kto chert voz’mi - who the hell are you
(R) Uchenyy - student, scholar (Bucky's nickname for Marina, his oldest friend)
Broken Fences

Chapter Notes

Enjoy! Most of the translations are pretty common. The one that isn't is in the main work . . . easier that way. :D

Let me know what you think!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 217: Broken Fences

The mutual fondness between Marina Ivanovna Petrovka and James Buchanan Barnes was well-documented in the annals of S.H.I.E.L.D. It had been the Viper who lobbied to bring the former Howling Commando into their ranks. Who lobbied to pair the perpetual Soldier with S.H.I.E.L.D.'s Eye in the Sky. It had been her lover who dragged the Zimniy Soldat into S.H.I.E.L.D. custody, but it was the Viper who brought him in from the cold.

Only a privileged few knew the origin story to the relationship at all. Who understood the significance of “Tovrets” and “Uchenny” . . . architect and scholar. Who knew the reasons for their closeness, their mutual respect and their individual adoration of each other.

Clint Grimm had been one of those few. In his absence, rumors had begun filling his sister's ears and triggered her legendary temper. Hence, her current rage.

“Do you want to tell me what the hell happened to my son?!” she demanded, hot chocolate eyes boiling with fury as she glared at her oldest friend.

********************************************************************************

The Zimniy Soldat had always loved his Gadyuka; this was an indisputable fact. He had raised her, trained her and guided her, before arranging for the assignment that would eventually set her free. When he had been given the chance to, he had killed her to save her.

In return, the diminutive assassin had looked up to him. She had learned from him, adored him, and - dare he say it -- loved him. She looked up to him, eager for everything he had to offer her. The Gadyuka had been a credit to his legacy and to this day, her name struck terror in the heart of her enemies.

He remembered the first time he saw her again in London . . . it had been almost three decades since she had left the Krasnaya Komnata for the United States under the alias of “Mary Peters”. She was as young and beautiful as she had been at their last farewell. It had taken every inch of training the Soldat had had, to pull the trigger and watch the bullet pierce her chest . . . throwing her to the ground and leaving her fighting for her life.

The wait had been agony . . . the not knowing if he'd killed her. It had been the first time he had ever doubted a shot. Even a quarter of an inch too far . . . and she would have been in the morgue and not the ICU. He had recited every prayer he could remember, even as he reported her death to his handler.

Seeing her at NRAG, the Gadyuka he had trained, striking the fatal blow to Byer's plans for him . . . spiriting him away. It had flipped on a light in his soul that had been dimmed all the decades of their separation. The joy of a prodigal child come home.

Seeing the true worship in the eyes of her lover, and the adoration of her chosen family . . . it had filled him with joy and pride. His Viper was at her deadliest when she had someone to protect, a cause to go to hell for. A family and a home and a lover who adored her; it was all he had ever wanted for her. Setting her free had been the best thing he could have ever done for her.

And then there had been Clint.

Armed with laughter and fun and mischief, Clint had carved a niche for himself in the Winter Soldier's heart, opening the way once again for Bucky . . . for the man he had once been. His khishchnik made him crazy, and drove him completely around the bend, but Bucky Barnes was head over heels in love with him. He had never felt this way about another person before; not any of the girls from Before; not any of the men he'd dallied with when no one was looking, not even Steve whom he would have sworn once was his forever.

They had had ten years together. Ten wonderful, frustrating, blissful, aggravating, perfect years together . . . before it all went to hell. His Hawk had left him . . . had given up his claim for the sake of another, and every time Bucky saw him it was just another knife in his gut, knowing that – for Clint's sake – he had to be sure that Clint was the one he wanted, without a shadow of a doubt. If he went back without that perfect knowledge, his lover would always worry that he had been Bucky's second choice.

So he kept his distance, abstained from Marina's table, spent sleepless nights in his cold, impersonal quarters. Spent time with Steve, catching up and bringing him up to speed . . . all the while wishing for his partner to once again be at his side.

Blinking up at his former protege, he found himself speechless in the face of her fury. To his recollection, she had never lost her temper with him before. Eight months pregnant and heavy with it, his Viper was no less dangerous than she had ever been. And considering the look in her eyes, he had better have a good answer to her question, or she was going to fillet him with her favorite knife.

He leaned back slightly, eyes taking her in cautiously, before scanning the cafeteria in search of the Colonel. It was a well known fact that Agent Petrovka was on maternity leave, her pregnancy considered to be very high risk, and she should have technically been in bed. That Will wasn’t directly at her back meant one of two things; the Colonel was aware of her whereabouts and was more than willing to let her kill him this time or the Colonel was not aware of her whereabouts and either way he was a dead man.

"Marishka . . . what’s going on?" He asked, standing slowly, hands up in supplication as though she were the viper for which she was named. “What happened?"

“He’s gone, Bucky . . . he took an assignment in New Mexico!” she snapped, jerking back out of his reach angrily. “I am less than a month to my due date, and my dorogoy has decided he would much rather be 2000 miles away from you than here with his incredibly high-strung older brother and miserably pregnant sister.” Hands coming up to plant on his pectorals, she shoved him hard even as she demanded, “What did you do?”

Bucky staggered, hand groping out for the back of the chair at the news. “He’s gone? But . . . it was just a break . . . what happened?"

“I don’t know,” she hissed, folding her arms over her belly. “He came to Misha and me last night and insisted he had to get away. That artifact just landed in New Mexico; he’s taken over as Head of Security.”

“He is way overqualified!” Bucky protested, furious on Clint’s behalf.

“We know. My two idiots fought about it for an hour last night. He would not be swayed.” Narrowing her eyes, she stared at him for a moment, taking in the devastation on his face. It took a moment, before she slumped into a chair with a heavy sigh. “You seem surprised.”

“A little,” he replied hotly, shoving his hands back through his hair.

“I should have said something when you stopped gracing my table, and when Clint started looking so miserable . . . but I had assumed that you were both big boys and you could handle your relationship issues yourselves. Clearly, I was mistaken.”

“I didn’t want to break up, Marina!” Bucky shot back at her hotly, ocean blue eyes the color of a tempest. “I love him!”

A sharp smile curved her lips as she hissed, “Then tell me why he seems to think differently. He files a Close and Continuing this morning, with a Ms. Darcy Anderson-Lewis . . . background check pending.”

Bucky felt as though he’d been poleaxed, sinking into his chair as though he’d been cut off at the knees. “He filed a C&C?”

“I don’t know what happened between you two, Bucky, but you’re clearly miserable. Do me a favor . . . fix this.”

“How!? I don’t even know what happened!? We were just taking a break . . . a break I didn’t even want! But he was insistent; he didn’t want to be second fiddle to Steve again.”

“Do you blame him? He’s been the replacement for Captain fucking America since the day of his birth. I can’t say as I begrudge him the need to know he’s first in your heart.”

“But a C&C, Marina! What the ever fuck!?!”

“Clearly, he had reason to believe that your break was permanent. Have you even spoken to him?”

“Clint was the one who insisted on the break! I was doing what Clint wanted!” Bucky argued, one hand flashing out and sending his tray flying in a fit of temper.

About then, Steve’s voice broke into the conversation, “Wait . . . Clint Barton?”

To say that the two assassins jolted was an understatement. Marina pulled a wicked looking dagger from thin air, and Bucky was suddenly armed with a huge pistol the likes of which Steve had never seen before. Blinking at being the focus of these two deadly individuals, the Captain could suddenly understand why these two alone kept S.H.I.E.L.D. in ghost stories; they were scary on their own, together they were terrifying.

After a moment, the tone of his voice broke through Bucky’s focus and his eyes narrowed. “Steve . . .” he drawled, ice in his voice and his eyes.

It was impossible to miss the way the supersoldier squirmed under that look. There was a small smirk on Marina’s lips as she slid the knife back into her boot and leaned back into her chair, to watch her Tovrets read the newbie the riot act. Captain America and best friend or not . . . you did not fuck with Bucky Barnes’ Hawk; it was stupid. “Steve . . . what did you do?”

“What kind of break?” He asked instead, mouth contorting slightly as his eyes flicked between the two.

“Clint was my boyfriend, before you suddenly showed up alive. He has reasons to be jealous . . . and he wanted me to be sure he was what I wanted, when I had been in love with you for years before we both died.”

“Wait . . . you’re gay?” Steve asked, clearly surprised by the statement.

“Bisexual . . . guys and dolls both turn my wheel, so to speak. Clint’s the first person I’ve actually loved since you.” Folding his arms over his chest, Bucky was aware of how imposing he appeared as he glared down at his best friend. “Steve . . . cut the shit . . . what did you do!” He demanded, the brisk burr of his Brooklyn accent there and clear for the first time that Marina could remember.

Steve blinked up at Bucky; this was a side of his childhood friend he had never seen before. The demanding tone, body language and the anger lingering in his eyes making the supersoldier squirm slightly in his seat. Clearing his throat he stammered “I may have told him to back off and leave you alone? I saw the hurt look on your face Buck, every time we saw him and he’s STRIKE; I assumed he was talking shit about you like the rest of them.”

Marina blinked, her tone glacial as she hissed, “Did you actually hear him talking shit? Or did you just assume, like the kolossal'nyy tupitsa (colossal dumbass) you are?”

Looking up at the heavily pregnant, irate Russian Steve suspected even in her condition she’d have no qualms about thoroughly kicking his ass for jumping to conclusions. Sheepishly scrubbing one hand over the back of his neck, he cast his eyes downwards as he muttered “It seems I may have drawn the wrong conclusion.”

“You think!?” the woman snapped, hot chocolate eyes boiling over. Rounding on her oldest friend, she snapped, “I’ll let you handle this. If I handle it . . . I’m going to prevratit’ yego vnutrennosti naiznanku i ispol’zovat’ ikh dlya podvyazki. (turn his guts inside out and use them for garters.)”

Unable to help the bark of laughter at the mental image, Bucky nodded in agreement, bending to kiss her cheek. “Anyway you can arrange for a change in assignment?”

She looked infinitely innocent as she chirped, “Somewhere sunny maybe? I hear New Mexico is lovely.”

“If you would be so kind,” he teased, earning a fond wink.

Rounding on the Captain, she hissed, “If you know what’s good for you, you’ll stay the hell away from moy dorogoy or I will make your life extremely uncomfortable. Dong le ma?”

“Yes, Ma’am. Sorry Ma’am, though I would like to make an attempt to apologise at some point if you and he would let me?” Steve replied wide eyed. He had never imagined, even having known Peggy Carter, that he would ever find himself this terrified of a slip of a woman, especially one this small and this pregnant.

Letting out a sound very much like a harrumph, Marina rotated on her heel and stormed out of the mess hall. And if she noticed the way the junior agents bolted out of her path, she gave no sign.

As for Bucky, he was still giving his best friend his best impression of a pissed off Brooklynite . . . not a sight for the faint of heart. “What did you say to him, Steve? Clint’s got thick skin; he’s the youngest of five boys and he’s never been one to particularly care about what other people have to say about him. I’ve never even seen him lose his temper, except for when someone was talking shit about Marina or his brothers. So what did you say, that he bolted like a long-tailed cat in a room full of rocking chairs?”

“I told him you’d always be my business and if he thought I was going to let him near you he had another thing coming. That you didn’t need anything he’d been giving you. That your mother would agree with me about protecting you from him and that he didn’t have the right to call you Bucky. That was reserved for family.” Steve winced as he summed up his words to Clint. Looking back he could see they probably hadn’t been very tactfully chosen and how the young man could have taken it to heart given what he now knew.
If it had been possible, there would have been steam coming from Bucky’s ears. The Captain had never seen his best friend so red in the face. And that included all the times he’d exploded upon finding Steve trying to enlist, despite his physical ailments at the time. When he did finally speak, it was in a lethally calm tone that sent chills up the back of Steve’s neck. “You told him he didn’t have the right to be part of my family.”

It wasn’t a question . . . and it was clearly the only part of their conversation Bucky cared about.

Steve shifted in the chair, squirming uncomfortably. “Yes?”

And just like that, Bucky was someone he’d never seen before. “You did what!?” He roared, tendons in his neck standing out and tempests churning in ocean blue eyes. “How DARE you!?”

Both hands reached out and planted in Steve’s chest, shoving him hard and sending the chair tilting backwards onto the floor. “You have been dead for 70 FUCKING YEARS! And the last thing you have any right to do, is get tangled up in my business!! HE LEFT ME FOR YOU! Because he thought there was something between us; that I DESERVED the chance to find out if YOU were going to be the one to make me happy . . . when he’s the one who healed me when I woke up ME again and you were STILL DEAD!!”

Steve scrambled across the floor, trying to get out of range as Bucky stalked towards him. “I LOVE HIM!!” the Soldat roared, hands clutched into furious fists and looking very much like he was contemplating taking Steve’s head off with one well placed punch. “And you have made him feel like DIRT . . . like he was RIGHT about you and me . . . didn’t you!? I bet he snarked that he wouldn’t get in the way of your ‘precious relationship with your precious boyfriend’ . . . didn’t he?”

Steve’s jaw dropped as Bucky quoted the archer nearly verbatim, stammering, “How did you know that?”

“Because I know Clint . . . I know him better than anyone except for maybe his sister . . . the Russian woman you’ve royally pissed off and who would very much like to hurt you right now.”

Grimacing, the blond asked meekly, “Is she usually that scary?”

“Only when you fuck with her boys . . . it’s stupid. Don’t do it,” Bucky snapped, eyes blazing. “What the hell were you thinking?!”

“I was just trying to protect you, like you’ve always protected me,” Steve promised, eyes wide as he watched the other man seethe furiously.

“Don’t . . . you suck at it. For that matter . . . stay the fuck out of my business. I built a life without you, Steve . . . I have a family that didn’t include you for 70 years. I HAD a lover, who I fully intend to win back and make mine. And if this girl, Darcy, is who I think she is . . . I’m going to do everything I can to make sure that I don’t lose him to her.” Jabbing a finger in his face, he hissed, “Stay out of my life . . . you’ve fucked it up quite enough, thank you.”

“Buck . . . you don’t mean that,” came the wretched statement, the captain’s face twisting hard at the knowledge that he may have lost the only person he knew in this new world he’d woken up in.

“Right now, I do. If you ask me again in six months, we’ll reevaluate,” he hissed, rotating on one heel and putting his back to Steve. “I can’t believe you would do that. I’m a big boy, Stevie . . . I don’t need you to protect me. Not from STRIKE, not from Clint, not from anybody.”

“I’m sorry . . . really.”
Bucky’s eyes slipped closed at the pleading tone, before he straightened his shoulders and insisted, “Just leave me alone,” before he stormed out of the mess hall, leaving the other man still on his back on the floor.

Chapter End Notes

I promise, it gets better from here!
Chapter Notes

So this chapter is gargantuan! But you know what . . . WARD!!! There can never be too much Ward. :D

Enjoy and let me know what you think? I look forward to hearing your thoughts.

Translations at the bottom as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 218: Tidal Wave Woman

It had required a veritable act of Congress, but Marina was currently back in her office to catch up on some paperwork. Much to her lover's displeasure, of course, but desperate times . . . Besides, it was only for a very short amount of time and with Maria still out on maternity leave, her sister and her brother-in-law had rather enough to do.

As she was sorting through the backlog, she came across an un-reviewed report regarding Harlem . . . as written by Grant Douglas Ward, Agent, Clearance Level Six. Frowning at the front of the folder, she cocked her head as she took in his signature on the bottom left corner, attesting to the accuracy of the file and the account recorded therein.

Marina had never put much stock in handwriting analysis or in the anatomy of signatures. When one was a spy, handwriting could change on a moment's notice as required for the mission. And one never signed the same way twice, to avoid accidental detection down the line. However, she did know that when a signature was sloping downwards the way his was, most analysts would suggest this was a sign of depression or disappointment. Which did not coincide with the word of mouth she currently knew about him.

Agent Grant Ward was John Garrett's protégé, and it was rumored that their relationship predated
S.H.I.E.L.D. Admittedly, her first impression of Ward had been a dark one. She clearly remembered their first conversation following that disastrous training sessions. The month of janitorial duty he'd been assigned as punishment had actually forced his cockiness down and put his head back on straight. As it stood, he was quickly becoming a rising star at S.H.I.E.L.D. Garrett bragged about him to anyone he could find who would stand still long enough and even her own Mishka had good things to say about him.

Frowning, she reclined back in her chair and flipped open the folder, eyes catching on the solemn features in the picture attached to the file. He may not be an agent under her direct purview, but she clearly remembered him stepping up to try and protect her from Ross.

While she was content to disabuse herself about handwriting analysis, Marina had always subscribed to the theory that action reports, and how they were written, was a clear tell into the agent who wrote it. As she read through this particular report, she detected a note of sadness . . . almost loneliness, in his recounting of the events. He seemed genuinely in awe of her Colonel as he transcribed their short exchange at the hospital in impressively perfect detail. When in combination with his sincere relief as to the safety and health of her and her children . . .

Needless to say, Grant D. Ward intrigued her.

Her actions were aimless as she reached out to trigger her intercom, eyes glued to the page as she read his account of her initial reaction to Ross. (She had remembered being frightened. She had not remembered hyperventilating or her keening whimpers as he shook her.) “Vika?” she asked through the com, turning the page to his retelling of the General's shooting and the actions immediately following.

“Da, sestrenka,” was the cheerful response from the Amazonian blonde.

“Would you do me a favor? I need the personnel file for Grant Douglas Ward, Agent ID A-0849329, as soon as you can.”

There was a noticeable pause as her sister considered the request, before the woman spoke. “Uh-oh.
I know that tone. Are you intending to adopt this one?” Viktoriya asked warily, clearly concerned about her de facto brother-in-law's reaction to the news.

Laughing even as she conceded that the concern was valid, Marina assured her sister warmly, “No . . .
I'm not planning on adoption at the moment. I just . . . I need answers, to questions I didn't even realize I was needing to ask. That's all.”

“Of course. Give me ten minutes. I'll send it to your tablet, shall I?”

“Sпасибо, Vika, you're a saint,” the younger Russian chirped cheerfully, before flipping off the intercom and becoming absorbed in her reading once more.
There was something itching under her skin about Agent Ward. She just needed to figure out what it was.

Which is how her partner found her three hours later, when he showed up as agreed to take her home. Marina was seated on her desk, with what looked like an explosion of deconstructed report copies behind her. She had her tablet in hand, bouncing it idly as she stared at the white board set up across from her. There was a timeline sketched on it, with bits of paper, post-it notes and actual sections cut from mission reports laid out to correlate with the events listed.

Eyebrows up at the behavior, Will came further into the room and closed the door behind him. “Doing a little extra credit, samaya malen'kaya?” he asked, a low whistle working its way free as he took in the full extent of the board.

The spread of information was impressive, extensive and clearly important to her. Considering the way she startled at the sound of his voice, she hadn't even heard him come in, she was so absorbed. Blinking at him, she greeted him. “Hello Mishka . . . how long have you been standing there?”

“Just a couple minutes,” he promised, coming over and hitching himself up onto the desk beside her.

He reached out to take the tablet, cocking his head at the profile there. “Grant Ward? What did I miss?”

“I think the real question is what did WE miss,” she sighed, leaning over to accept his kiss, before hopping down from the desk. “Just follow me for a minute, okay?”

“Okay,” he promised, setting the tablet aside and leaning forward on his hands. “What am I looking at?”

“This is Agent Ward's entire life, according to his personnel file.” Her fingers were careful and gentle as she touched the beginning. “Parents . . . siblings . . . Juvie.”

“Juvie?” Will asked, with a blink. “We don't accept juvenile offenders . . . at least I have never passed one through.”

“That's just it . . . his file skipped you. It went to Garrett instead. Of course, he's also admittedly talented. He and Sammy were in the same training class. They graduated One Two, with Sam only points ahead of him.”

“Okay . . . you have my attention.” he promised, eyes narrowing as he backtracked to the beginning, “You mentioned parents and siblings?”

“Yeah . . . details are vague as in nonexistent. I have notations of a brother Christian who's a senator. His parents are almost deliberately forgotten and/or left out. Also, there is a comment about a younger brother and an older sister, but no information on either.”

“Classic abuse case,” Will explained, receiving a nod of agreement from his lover. “Uh-huh.”

Turning back to the board, she spread her fingers over a blank space in the timeline. “Now here's where it gets interesting. I have almost five years with exactly nothing. No associates, no contacts, no address, nothing. I spoke to the warden at the detention center where he was being held pending trial . . . he escaped from Juvenile Detention. Then he just disappeared.”

“After which point, he showed up at S.H.I.E.L.D.,” the Colonel continued, clearly following her thought process.
“Yeah. Vouched for and signed through by John Garrett.”

Cocking his head, he frowned, “Pending trial for what?”

“Allegedly burning his parents’ house to the ground . . . with his brother still inside. That same brother, Christian, was pushing for a maximum sentence of attempted murder; Ward maintains that he didn’t know Christian was inside . . . I’m inclined to believe him. I sent out a couple feelers with my friends among the attaches at the Senate . . . they’ll get back to me.” Frowning fiercely, Marina glared at the picture she’d tacked up of the man, insisting, “Something about Christian Ward . . . he’s not right, Misha. Whatever happened in that house while Grant was a child? Christian was just as complicit as Ward’s parents. I’d bet my bonus on it.”

“So he is an abuse case. What do his psych evals looks like?”

“He doesn’t lie . . . he misleads and he redirects and he withholds but he doesn’t lie. All of our shrinks have seen him post-mission over the years. I went through all of their reports; he’s fit for duty. A little depressed and a lot anti-social, with . . .” here she reached past him for a file folder before reading off the front page, “. . . an awkward sense of personal ownership and social interaction.” Reaching for another folder, Marina handed it to her lover with a frown. “Maria gave him top marks in combat, as well as the highest espionage rating since Tasha. Only thing she marked him down for . . . was his people skills. I asked around; he doesn’t have hardly any friends and none of the other agents ever see him at the watering hole down on 5th where they all go to destress.”

Giving her a fond smile, he teased, “If you want to adopt the kid, just say so.”

“Promise?” she chirped, head tilting adorably as she bounced on her toes.

“In what world have I ever stopped you?” he laughed, hopping down from the desk and coming to finger several of the reports near the bottom. “The Maxwell case? He was assigned to that disaster?!”

“Yeah . . . he took four bullets to center mass. Did you know that?”

“No. But I do remember Garrett pushing him out within the week onto another solo.”

“He’s working wounded, Misha. I have a dozen reports from Medical, where he’s been checked out, by Garrett, against medical advice. And then I have action reports, dated days later.” Pushing her hands back through her hair, she begged, “Why didn’t we notice?”

“He’s STRIKE,” Will answered, showing her a page in his file. “I don’t get his reports . . . Rumlow and Garrett do.”

“And we come back to Garrett,” she huffed, slumping against the edge of her desk.

The Colonel frowned, eyes skimming over the papers and taking in all of the information displayed there quickly. “He does seem to be a recurring factor. Did Garrett break him out of Juvie?”

“Maybe? But that begs the question; what does a top S.H.I.E.L.D. agent want with a juvenile offender?”

Will opened his mouth, poised to offer a theory when he became aware of a flurry of activity headed towards Marina’s office. He knew those heavy footfalls, the huff of frustrated sigh that usually accompanied the family’s resident medic. Turning slate grey eyes towards the door Will wasn’t at all surprised when moments later Vincent was loitering in Marina’s doorway, an angry scowl firmly etched on his face with a low rumbling growl the only thing breaking the silence.
Marina cocked an eyebrow, hands coming up to brace her back as she drawled, “Well . . . you’re in a fine state. What happened?”

“Grant Ward and John fucking Garrett happened,” Vincent growled scrubbing one hand through his hair, his eyes occasionally flashing gold in irritation as his gaze flicked between the power couple.

“Ward got back from his latest mission injured. . . again. Not that that’s a surprise to anyone, and Garrett’s down in Medical trying to get him released.”

“How badly injured? Should he be released?” the Colonel asked, hands finding their ways into his pockets.

“Not as badly as some he’s had. But frankly, I wouldn’t release him. He was already injured when he went out. If I had my say the boy would be on indefinite medical leave until he’d had sufficient time to recuperate.” Vincent huffed, propping his hip on Marina’s doorjamb as he crossed his arms.

“Garrett’s adamant the boy is leaving with him though. So I currently have Ward under light sedation. The nurses have orders to play musical patients with him until I get back and to inform Garrett he’s undergoing tests.”

Will snickered as he questioned, “Musical patients? What the hell does that mean?”

“Same as musical chairs obviously,” Vincent snarked with a roll of his eyes before explaining “They are currently rotating him every fifteen minutes around Medical to prevent Garrett from trying to abscond with the boy. In all seriousness Will, the way Garrett’s running the kid he’s likely gonna end up in a grave sooner rather than later.”

“We were just discussing that,” Marina replied, waving her hand at the white board displaying Ward’s history in black and white detail. “How bad is it? Details, Vincent.”

“This time it’s a bullet wound in his thigh, but he’s still recovering from the broken ribs from his last assignment. He was just in medical last week. Frankly I’m surprised he doesn’t have a punctured lung.” Vincent growled his tone more animalistic than he’d intended.

“Will he walk again?” Will inquired, well acquainted with bullets to legs and the devastation the percussion alone could do to muscles and bone and ligaments. “Is the bone fractured at all?”

“The bullet just missed the bone, thankfully. He should walk again . . . provided we can give him the required time to recuperate, heal and get whatever therapy is required. But if Garrett gets his claws into him before I can see the extent of the damage following Ward being back on his feet . . . well the damage could end up more long term.” Shaking his head Vincent lifted one hand to pinch the bridge of his nose. “Even you idiocy don’t go out as injured as Garrett is continually sending this boy, unless it’s absolutely necessary, which in Ward’s case it isn’t.”

Will hummed, looking to Marina and catching sight of the white board behind her. “He’s STRIKE. My hands are tied . . . I don’t have the authority to take him out from under Garrett.”

“There’s one person who does. Someone even Garrett wouldn’t argue against.” Vincent pointed out, one eyebrow cocking as he looked between the couple before continuing “I highly doubt Fury would want to risk losing such a talented asset to Garrett’s idiocy.”

Marina’s eyebrows rose at the idea, tone curious as she agreed, “Nick would do it, if I asked him to. . . he’d give Ward to me. And with the clear negligence being displayed by his current SO? Nick would never say no.”

“Frankly, Will, the boy would be better off in Marina’s hands. Not only in regards to his injuries but his overall health. He’s underweight for his build, pushes himself too hard on mission and even when he’s off duty from what I’ve seen. He’s working his body towards an epic breakdown.” Vincent supplied with a sigh.

“Did you bring documentation to back up your grievances? If so, we can go see Nick now . . .
Marina intends to adopt the kid anyway,” Will chuckled, one hand coming up to pinch the bridge of his nose.

“I left the folder of grievances on Vika’s desk . . . it’s heavy and thick.” Vincent retorted with a bitter chuckle and unamused twitch of his lips as his fingers clenched. “Let’s just say if I ran into Garrett in a dark alley, he wouldn’t be walking out of it.”

“Behave yourself, Vincent,” the Russian admonished fondly, with a wink. “And if you can’t, let us know so that Owen can deal with the body.”

“Given the mudak is still breathing, I am behaving Marishka.” Vincent said with a toothy grin to the Russian. “And even if I didn’t the body would never see the light of day.”

Rolling his eyes, Will snarked, “Focus, the both of you. You said this folder is thick? How thick?”

Pushing off the doorjamb Vincent disappeared momentarily, before entering folder in hand. The folder was approximately three inches thick, earning a pair of raised brows as he handed it over to the Colonel with an arched brow of his own. “Thick enough. This is every medical report, every account of Garrett checking him out against medical advice and a statement from each of his treating doctors with understandable concerns over Ward’s health.”

Will flipped over the cover of the folder, fingers paging through sheets and his eyes growing darker and darker green. “Wait . . . this is after the Maxwell Case. Four bullets, center mass. Four hours of surgery and Garrett took him out within an hour of leaving Recovery? You’re kidding?!”

“Nope, and the boy was straight back in days later in worse condition. And that folder is starting from the Maxwell case. There are more cases going further back, though not quite as serious hence my call not to include them currently.” Vincent rumbled, eyes now full on gold as he stared at Will seriously. “If I didn’t know better, I’d swear he was intent on killing the boy. That kid looks up to Garrett like a father and the bastard keeps dumping him injured into life and death situations.”

“Not for much longer, once Nick sees this folder. Oh man . . . the look on Garrett’s face is going to make my day.”

“He’s a good kid . . . quiet, obedient and a model patient; he deserves better than he’s getting.”
Vincent grumbled with a shake of his head. Before nodding towards Marina’s whiteboard and continuing “He needs someone who’s going to look out for his interests without having an ulterior motive. If he stays with Garrett . . . he’s going to go down a dark path with his life. Considering his childhood, his past . . . that won’t end well.”

Will snapped the folder closed as he cocked an eyebrow at the doctor. “I mentioned the part where Marina intends to adopt him, right?” Rolling his eyes toward the ceiling, he sighed, “I need a bigger house.”

“Little Russian mothers man, whatcha gonna do with them?” Vincent teased with a wry grin before chuckling. “You wouldn’t trade her for the world though.”

A warm smile on his face, Will took her hand a kissed the back, “Nah . . . she’s stuck with me. More the pity her.”
Marina giggled as she pushed herself up on tiptoe to kiss his chin. “Ya lyublyu tebya, moya Mishka.”

“Vsegda,” the Colonel promised, before insisting. “All right, let's go see Nick.”

“One would hope she’s stuck with you, given the fact she’s carrying your twin girls,” Vincent huffed before turning to clear the doorway for the Power Couple.

Will cocked an eyebrow at his partner as he laughed, “How did an agreement for three hours at your desk become this?”

“You should be grateful this is all that came out of it. In three hours Marina could have plotted someone’s demise in over a dozen different ways or be launching a plot to take over the world.” Vincent snarked in Will’s direction as he fell into step with the couple once they’d exited the office.

“Oh Vincent, that plan has been in place for the last ten years at least,” Marina snickered with a grin. “Maria and I have been fine tuning the details for awhile.”

“And how are you feeling? Are you even supposed to be on your feet?” Vincent asked suddenly, diverting the topic as he switched back to doctor mode, a critical eye running over the deadly, diminutive Russian wedged between him and Will.

“Oh no, not you too,” she groaned, eyes rolling to the ceiling as she grumbled.

“Yes, me too. Whose ass do you think Will’s going to beat if something happens to you three!” Vincent shot back with mock concern and wide eyes . . . not that he held back his rumbling chuckle for long as he bent to press a fond kiss to the top of Marina’s head. “We’re all worried about you.”

Huffing fondly, she joked, “Tell me something I don’t know.”

“Now you know how we feel when you go all ‘fussy Russian mom’ on us.” Vincent pointed out with an unrepentant grin.

“You all love it, don't lie,” she teased, wrinkling her nose at the medic.

“Technically we love you . . . the fussing is an unfortunate byproduct.” Vincent replied playfully, with a gentle poke to Marina’s ribs. “But you love to fuss so we let you.”

It was about then they arrived at Fury’s office. Harrison looked up from his desk and frowned, “The Director is not to be disturbed without an appointment, Agent Petrovka.”

Scoffing Marina sailed past with the reply, “And since when has that ever stopped me?”

Reaching for the door, she trekked further into the Fury's office, announcing, “Hello Nick! I need a favor!!”

That single eye pinned her as he looked up from the paperwork on his desk. “Do you have an appointment?” he snarked fondly.

“No, do you want me to make one?” she inquired innocently, eyes wide and features angelic.

Grinning at her, he laughed, “You have impeccable timing. I’ve been trying to avoid this file all day and I had run out of excuses for it.” Waving his hand at a blustering Harrison, he ordered, “You may go. And send in whomever Agent Petrovka brought with her. Hold my calls and cancel anything on my schedule.”
“Yes sir,” he agreed grudgingly, disappearing through the door to be replaced by Fury's Chief Analyst and his primary trauma doctor. Leaning back in his chair, he drawled, “Well, this can't be good. To what do I owe the gratitude of interruption?”

Will tossed the file onto the desk with a frown, even as Marina insisted, “We need to talk about Grant Ward; from the looks of things? His SO could be trying to kill him.”

*****************

Eyes fluttering open slowly Grant squinted and blinked. It took several attempts for him to get his eyes to focus enough to register that he was staring at the ceilings of Medical . . . again. Some small part of him hoped, maybe . . . just once . . . his injuries were serious enough to require a long term stay that Garrett couldn’t get him out of. Even as he thought it though, he acknowledged how unlikely that was. If four bullets to the chest garnered only an hour's stay at Medical, a single bullet to the thigh would probably give him even less of a reprieve.

He was so tired of it, going out on Garrett’s suicide missions while wounded. Not only did it make his job infinitely harder, he often found his focus wavering, which is usually how he wound up injured again. The soft sound of a chair shifting beside him was the first clue Grant had that he wasn’t alone. His head turned slowly, stomach churning with dread even as he hoped it wasn’t Garrett seated beside him . . . waiting for him to wake up so the older man could whisk him away again.

The very last person he’d expected to see seated at his bedside had been one very heavily pregnant Marina Ivanovna Petrovka. All his previous interactions with one-half of S.H.I.E.L.D.’s top handlers were hit and miss to say the least. She smiled at him kindly, “Hello Agent Ward. Would you like something to drink? I imagine your mouth feels like you swallowed cotton. You’ve been under sedation for some time.”

“Yes please, Ma’am.” Grant croaked hoarsely, blinking sheepishly as he looked to the handler curiously. “Begging your pardon, Ma’am, but why are you here?”

She pushed herself to her feet, waddling slightly as she poured him a glass of water and placed it securely in his hand. “You have it? It's all right to be shaky . . . you've been through an ordeal.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” he agreed respectfully, fingers tightening around the glass as he lifted it to his lips and gulped greedily. Before lowering it momentarily to frown at the Russian, his gaze flicking briefly from her face to her stomach before he mumbled “That’s nothing new to be honest, Agent Petrovka ma’am.”

“And we come to my reason for being here. You've been reassigned, Agent Ward. You are no long an agent under Garrett’s purview. You belong to me.”

“Ma’am?” Grant blinked several times, her words slowly registering as he frowned “Garrett won’t like that Ma’am.”

Grinning at him gleefully, she replied, “I know . . . front row seats to his finding out. Happy day for all involved.” Leaning back, she folded her hands over her belly. “I never got to thank you . . . for what you did in Harlem.”

“It was my job, Ma’am. The Colonel picked me for your team for a reason; I’m good at what I do and wouldn’t have let anyone hurt you . . . well more than Ross did.”

Cocking her head at him, she scolded fondly, “The appropriate answer is, ‘you're welcome’. Now
"You're welcome?" Grant responded quickly and uncertain. They weren't exactly words that had been common in his vocabulary since his early youth, long before his childhood had devolved into pain and misery. Biting down on his lip, he reminded himself why it was a bad idea to accept her offer, as tempting as it sounded. "All due respect, ma'am, I don't need a new handler."

Marina’s eyes narrowed at him as she considered the fidgeting and nervous young man before her. "Why not?"

"Garrett brought me into S.H.I.E.L.D. Ma’am, with the understanding that he’d be my handler,” Grant supplied, it wasn’t the whole truth by any means but for the most part it was true. "Also, Garrett and I work well together. Understand each other. We’ve never had a problem. There doesn’t seem to be reason to disrupt our high success rate."

"Can you do me a favor, Agent Ward? Can you tell me how many of the last ten missions have ended with you injured?" she asked, seating herself in the chair and folding her hands over her belly. Ward squirmed, clearly uncomfortable with the line of questioning. Especially since she already seemed to know the answer. After a long pause he asked instead, "This is because of me? Am I being disciplined? Because injured or not, those missions were all completed successfully."

"You're not being disciplined. I'm proving a point. Working wounded, Agent Ward, increases the possibility of further injury. Eventually, it will get you killed. As you a valuable member of mankind and a vital agent of S.H.I.E.L.D., your health and wellbeing need to be of greater importance than success in the field." Nodding towards the door to the tiny bathroom, she promised, "I'll make you a deal . . . if you can walk normally to the door of the bathroom and back without falling over or the use of crutches, I'll ask Fury to rescind the decision. Deal?"

"Deal, Ma’am," Grant replied brusquely, his hand moving to set the glass on the table beside the bed. Forcing his body to move to sit him upright he threw the bedding aside to swing his legs over the edge of the bed. Some small part of him was grateful for the fact he was wearing a pair of scrub pants as opposed to those horrible backless gowns that would have left his ass hanging out; best not to offend a superior officer and regardless of her current condition Marina was his direct superior.

Easing off the side of the bed Grant took a moment to gain his balance. Gritting his teeth, he straightened and started towards the bathroom door, not that he made it that far. His thigh screamed and burned after the first step even as he forced himself to take a further two before his legs buckled beneath him. He soon found himself sprawled face first on the floor with a soft grunt escaping his throat upon impact.

Almost immediately, Marina was next to his fallen form, eyes worried and mouth set as she rolled him onto his back. "Are you alright? How are your ribs?"

"Fine," he wheezed, fibbing slightly. His ribs burned something shocking and he was struggling to catch his breath, let alone draw in a decent lungful of air at all.

"Uh-huh . . . we'll call that a horrific lie," she snarked, bending to haul his arm up and over your shoulders. "Come on . . . let's get you back to bed."

Feeling her pull him upwards, he balked. "Your pregnancy! You can't!"

"I am made of sterner stuff than I look, Agent Ward, I promise. Come on . . . let's get you up and back into bed," she insisted again, grunting as she levered him inexorably up to his feet. Between the two of them, they got him back into the bed and Marina fussed a little bit with his sheets before retaking her chair. “So, have we settled that matter to your satisfaction, Agent Ward?”

“Yes Ma’am,” Grant replied slightly sullenly, wincing as a thought occurred to him. “Garrett on the other hand won’t be Ma’am. He’ll want me back, come hell or high water.”

“Garrett currently has no say. He'll have to go through Fury. One of the medical staff here went to Fury with a complaint that Garrett was trying to kill you.” Cocking an eyebrow, she joked, “We spent a lot of time and effort to train you . . . We would prefer to take care of our investment. Da?”

“Da.” he replied evenly, his hand shooting out to grasp at Marina’s, his voice quiet and slightly hazy as he murmured, “Garrett . . . he spent enough time training me himself, Ma’am; he’ll want his own investment back.”

“He will simply have to live with the disappointment. You are mine now. And I do not easily relinquish that which is mine. Is that understood?” she asked archly, her free hand coming up to fold over his own.

“Clearly Ma’am . . . though his determination not to lose what’s his could rival your own.” Grant snarked back, before wincing and awaiting a reprimand, body slipping into attention as much as it could and causing another wince as his ribs protested. Garrett wasn’t big on informality or anything that wasn’t related to their mission.

To his surprise, the Russian laughed in response to his snark. “So you do have a personality! I am so glad.” Pausing, she considered his words and frowned fiercely, tone demanding, “Garrett considers you ‘his’? In what way?”

He blinked, realizing he’d said the wrong thing. “Just has the biggest claim, I guess; we’ve worked together a long time, Ma’am.”

Seeing how tense and rigid he was, Marina forced herself to smile and relax back into her chair, instructing firmly but fondly, “At ease, Ward . . . you're not in trouble.”

“That will take some getting use to Ma’am. Most of my life has been me getting into trouble . . . not always by doing anything wrong.” he huffed out quietly, voice broken and eyes slightly distant.

There was a fond press to her lips as she replied, “I know about your parents. I can guess at what they did, and I know how you retaliated. I can understand fighting back against those who have hurt you, the only way you can.”

“It wasn’t just my parents Ma’am. There’s things in my past that can’t be forgiven . . .”

Marina interrupted then, “Your past is just that, in the past. We all have one, and I know few people who don’t have regrets about things they’ve done at some point. The past holds no bearing on the future if you don't want it to.”

The Russian’s hand on his cheek startled him, as he hadn't seen her move. “You're safe here. S.H.I.E.L.D. will protect you, if you let them.” Eyes swept his frame, the glance warm if impersonal as she stated, “So, let's talk what happens next and not happened before. As of now, you're on downtime. You will rest and you will heal and once you have been declared fit for duty once again, you will be returned to the field. Is that understood?”

“Yes Ma’am. But . . . what am I supposed to do if I can’t be in the field?”

Frowning, she asked, “What do you normally do on downtime? You do get downtime, right?”
“Kind of? I train, Ma’am. Garrett was never big on leaving me idle for any period of time; idle hands are the devil’s playground type of thing.” Grant grunted with a scowl.

“Under no circumstances are you to train until you’ve been released by Medical. Do I make myself clear?”

“Crystal, Ma’am. Which again brings me back to my question of what I’m to do in the meantime?” he shifted slightly on the bed, one arm moving to curl protectively around his ribs as he sucked in a short breath.

“Agent Ward, are you in pain? And do not think of lying to me; I have sons who are notoriously bad about hiding when they’re hurting . . . I will be able to tell if you lie.”

“Only when I breathe Ma’am,” Grant joked with a wry grin and a slight wince.

“I think we’re going to need some rules, you and I. What do you think?” Railroading over any protest, she insisted, “Rule 1: you tell me when you are in pain. I don’t care if it's a papercut. Agreed?”

“Yes, Ma’am. Though I may forget . . . on occasion. Garrett considered pain a weakness so I’m used to having to hide it,” he replied quietly eyes downcast.

“I am not Garrett. If I find out you are neglecting your own health or wellbeing, because you don’t wish to bother me, there will be consequences . . . and you won't like them.”

“Duly noted,” Grant acknowledged with a slight nod.

“Rule 2: since you don't know what else to do, you will spend your downtime at the Handler Pool. I'm sure I have work that needs doing, which keeps you off your feet and recuperating as ordered.”

“As you say Ma’am,” his head cocked in thought “I can help with the paperwork and whatever else you deem satisfactory.”

Smiling at him kindly, she promised, “We'll find something for you to do. My sister, Viktoriya, is a task master; she'll put you to work. Rule 3: you obey doctor's orders to the letter. That includes crutches, follow up visits, consistent health checks. Your annual physicals are on time and completed in a timely manner. And you listen to what your body is telling you. Ponimayete?”

“Da” Grant responded, fingers twitching as he processed everything. “I’m not used to being idle Ma’am.”

“Who said anything about being idle? I seem to recall telling you my sister is a taskmaster.” There was a grin to her mouth as she laughed, “Vika is going to adore you.”

“She can’t be worse than Garrett,” Grant murmured under his breath before shaking his head and speaking in a normal tone. “Looking forward to meeting her.”

Marina's eyes narrowed speculatively and he knew she’d heard him, as illogical as that seemed. Ducking his head, he watched her through his eyelashes, clearly able to see the gears turning behind her eyes. Finally, she stood and patting his calf carefully. “Rest well. As soon as you’re released, come find me. Understood?”

“Yes, Ma’am . . . are you in your office or on leave?” He asked curiously. It was a combined case of needing to know so he could find her easier and wanting to know. Coming up against that thought, he stopped short in shock; he usually didn’t want to know anything outside of his mission details.
The change in attitude, and what it would mean, had him frowning as he tried to remind himself of his mission, his orders.

“If I’m not in my office, I’m at home. As to whether or not I’m on leave, technically yes.”

“Copy that Ma’am . . . the Colonel isn’t going to kick my ass again is he? For making you haul my ass off the floor.” Grant murmured quietly, eyes flicking upwards to her face to judge her expression.

Marina smirked, “What Misha doesn’t know, doesn’t hurt you. Promise. We’ll keep it a secret between us. Rest, Ward . . . I’ll be back to check on you in a few days.”

He flinched at her use of his surname, eyes flicking up to see her watching him speculatively. Suddenly sure that she wouldn’t have missed the action, he asked meekly, “Ma’am, may I make a request?”

“Oh course,” she replied, warm and maternal, making every part of him struggle to remember his training, his need to keep her at arm’s length.

“You’re not like Garrett, Ma’am. I’d appreciate it if you didn’t call me Ward . . . it doesn’t seem right coming from you. You have only the best of intentions.” He stammered suddenly eyes darting wildly around the room. He couldn’t believe he’d just confessed to that; he must be drugged. Eyes flicking to the bags at the end of the IV line, he tried to figure out what he was on that would have loosened his tongue so dramatically. Turning back to her, he stammered, “I mean . . . you don’t have to, if you don’t want to. I just . . . I’ll shut up now.”

Her eyes narrowed at the statement and he could almost see the lightbulb go off behind her eyes. Before long though, she smiled again, though he could see her dissecting the statement over and over again. “I can do that . . . rest well Grant.”

“Copy that. You should take your own advice Ma’am, pregnancy is rough under normal circumstances least of all with a high stress job like yours. My sister . . . she miscarried her first two pregnancies.” He offered by way of explanation.

Frowning at the statement, the Russian replied, “I will take better care of myself if you can agree to do the same. Deal?”

“Deal Ma’am.” He replied quickly with a slight grin before adding on “And if I forget I will submit to whatever punishment you decide on.”

“Follow the rules, Grant, and there will be no cause for punishment. However, that being said, you break the rules and your ass is grass.”

“Is that just for intentional rule breakage or if it slips my mind and I fall into old habits?”

“Both,” she promised. “I’ll expect notification of your release, unless I see you before then.”

“Yes Ma’am, you’ll be my first stop upon leaving,” he acknowledged wearily, eyes drooping slowly even as he tried to force them to stay open.

“Grant . . . you may call me Marina,” she chuckled, leaning over to press a warm kiss to the too warm flesh of his forehead. “Go to sleep or violate Rule 3. You don’t want to be in trouble already, do you?”

Blinking up at Marina as his eyes widened in surprise at the action, he stared as he tried to figure out how to react. She was wailing on all of his defenses, a three pronged attack from which he was seeing less and less hope of escape. The Specialist shook his head stammering “No Ma. . . Marina. Before I sleep . . . can I ask a favor? My sister and my younger brother . . . I haven’t had contact with them in some time. Would you . . . I mean, could you check that they’re okay?”

“Of course . . . what are their names?”

“My sister’s name is Lilli, Lillian Monroe . . . she and her husband lived in Vancouver and my brother Thomas used to be in Washington.” he murmured drowsily, eyelids fluttering and fighting to stay open as the pain wracking his body struggled to pull him under.

Reaching out, she hit the button on the morphine pump he’d been given, so as to control his own discomfort. The dose of the fast acting medication hit his bloodstream like a sledgehammer. Combined with the touch of her fingers stroking over the skin of his earlobe, he started to slide completely into unconsciousness. “Rest Grant . . . I’ll see what I can find about them both and let you know. Close your eyes.”

He was helpless to do anything but follow that order. He ached everywhere and was suddenly drained, the morphine a blissful relief as it removed his pain and lulled his body into a relaxed state. It didn’t take long at all for sleep to claim him, his eyes closed and breathing evening out.

The last thing he heard before he slept was a gentle, “Sleep well, Grant . . . may your dreams be pleasant and restful.”

As he slipped away, he thought, “Oh damn . . . she’s gonna be bad for me . . . shit, Garrett’s gonna be pissed,” after which, he knew nothing more.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Da/not - yes/no
(R) sestrenka - little sister
(R) spasibo - thank you
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will Grimm's most common nickname for his longtime partner and lover, Marina Petrovka)
(R) idiocy - idiots (Vincent is currently referring to the Brothers Grimm specifically)
(R) Ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) vsegda - always
(R) ponimayete - understood?
Chapter 219:

Clint was cussing a blue streak as he went skidding into his quarters late the next night. The speed with which he'd fallen for Darcy was still a little surprising to the archer, but at the same time, it made sense. She was deadpan funny, unfailingly cheerful, delightfully intelligent, wonderfully snarky, and way too good for an experienced assassin like himself. Of course, it helped that it didn't seem to have surprised his sister in the least, that he'd fallen so hard and so fast.

She was also incredibly distracting, thus the wide span of swear words from his admittedly impressive collection. His older brother's voice coming through the speakers of his laptop only earned another round of increasingly creative cursing. “What's the matter, punk? You late for something?” he teased sardonically, and the sniper could just picture the smirk on his face.
“Shut up, jerk,” Clint snarked, as he dropped into his desk chair and leaned forward on his elbows, glaring half heartedly into the camera. “I got distracted.”

“It's Darcy . . . and she's not my girlfriend. She's a friend,” he protested.

“The C&C you filed, would suggest otherwise,” Aaron reminded his brother with a sly grin and a wink. “I know all about your ‘friends with benefits' thing . . . but what about Bucky?”

“What about Bucky? Captain Rogers made it very clear. I have no place in Bucky's life anymore,” Clint reminded his brother morosely, slouching back in his chair as he flipped a pen between his fingers. “I'm just trying to move on with my life. I like Darcy; she's awesome.”

“You're an idiot,” the blue-eyed brother scoffed with a roll of those eyes.

Grey eyes narrowed as the younger clone snapped, “I thought you were supposed to be on my side!”

“I am on your side! But Clint . . . it's all over S.H.I.E.L.D.! Bucky tore the Captain a new asshole for running you off. Rogers thought you were one of the members of STRIKE's 'Fuck Barnes' Club.”

Snickering, Clint snarked, “I was . . . frequently and with relish.”

“Okay, ew. Not how I meant that, Clint. There's a mental image I didn't need,” he groaned, scrubbing at his eyes with the heels of his hands. “I'm talking about the Mudak Squad of Rumlow, Rollins, Murphy, Mercer and the rest.”

“In what world would I ever want to be associated with those dumb shits? Their mouths are filled with trash, and it taints the rest of the intelligent world just to listen to them. I'm a Grimm . . . we have a reputation of excellence to maintain.”

“You wear the same STRIKE patch they do, Clint,” Aaron reminded him with a roll of bright blue eyes.

“But I don't share their stupid,” he grunted, with a fierce scowl. “Grimms need a team patch, Kenny, just like STRIKE.”

Chuckling, Aaron joked, “I'll make sure to bother Will and Marina about it. I'm sure they'd be more than willing to jump on it, as soon as they manage to resurface from weird pregnancy cravings, wedding plans and their endeavors to adopt their newest acquisition. He is not making it easy on Marina . . . it's kind of fascinating actually.”

Despite his curiosity over that, Clint zeroed in on the second thing and chirped, “Wedding plans, huh? Did Jay finally grow a brain and ask Casey to marry him? She's too good for him . . . I hope she made him work for it.”

“Not yet. Rumors . . . aka my wife . . . indicate a proposal should be forthcoming at some point this week, but for the moment, no . . . it's not Jay.”

Frowning, he hedged uncomfortably, “Don't tell me it's Brian and Natasha? She would never be that stupid, so who . . .” It was about then, the horrible awful lightbulb flashed on in his brain. “Oh no. Not Sam.”

“Yep . . . Marina is unsurprisingly not happy about it. The only upside to the proposal, would be this “Jules is pregnant.”

“I beg your pardon?” he stammered, eyes going wide, “...you're fucking with me.”

“Nope... three months along. Sam told his parents at the same time he told them he'd asked her to marry him and she'd said yes.”

“Well, that’s... damn, that's a double-edged sword for Marina.”

“Which is why she's keeping her opinions, knife-edged as they are, to herself. Jules is on a probationary period. We'll see if she can dig herself out of the ditch she’s made for herself.”

“For Sam's sake, I hope so. How’s Marta taking it?”

“She has some reasonable reservations about it. Number one of which seems to be that Jules doesn't appear to be quite as head over heels for Sam... as Sam is head over heels for her,” Aaron sighed, leaning forward on his elbows and lowering his tone, “This is gonna end ugly, Clint... I can feel it in my gut.”

“I don’t doubt it. Our gut instincts are rarely wrong and likely the only good that would come from the entire shit storm would be the grandbaby Marina’s always wanted.” Clint grunted, a frown forming as he tried to picture his nephew’s life with Jules involved. “Somehow I don’t see Jules digging herself out of the ditch but more so deeper into it, she doesn’t seem the motherly type when you compare her against Marishka.”

Aaron grinned as he reminded his brother, “No one seems like the mothering type when you compare them to Marina.”

“I dunno man, your Marta might end up giving Marishka a run for her money. Look at the way she looks out for you and Sam.” Clint teased with a shit-eating grin curving his mouth.

“You need to shut up,” his brother snarked with a roll of his eyes. His features turned wicked as he inquired innocently, “Did I mention that Bucky asked to be reassigned?”

Clint blanched suddenly as he squawked “He WHAT? To where?... Wait, do I even want to know the answer to that?”

Blue eyes sparkled as they flicked to something behind his brother, insisting, “You should look behind you.”

Blinking owlishly at his brother on the computer screen Clint’s brow furrowed in confusion, as if in slow motion he spun the chair to look behind as directed. Standing in the doorway was his boyfriend/lover... ex-boyfriend he reminded himself, his gear in hand and watching Clint steadily. He couldn’t stop the slight snigger that slipped free as he mentally categorised Bucky’s expression as a surprisingly accurate imitation of the Grumpy Cat Darcy revelled in showing him every chance she got.

Bucky watched him, fingers tightening slightly on his dufflebag strap as he took in the man he’d never realized would mean the world to him. “So... hi.”

Aaron’s deep breath in was audible through the speakers as he spoke, “Okay then... I’m gonna go! You two have fun. Don’t kill anyone... or each other. Marina will be pissed if either of you end up dead, dong la ma?”
“Thanks for keeping him busy, Aaron,” Bucky replied, with a firm nod of thanks towards the webcam.

Clint whirled, staring at his brother in shock. “Traitor!”

“Love you, little brother. Don’t be stupid and throw away something that means this much to the both of you,” was his only reply, before his side of the connection shut down and Aaron was gone.

Staring agape at the blank screen Clint muttered under his breath for a long moment before turning back to Bucky, shoulders slumped as his eyes focused on the taller man’s boots “So I heard you and Captain American Legend had a bust up?”

“Yes . . . that’s putting it mildly,” he agreed with a small, sad smile. “So . . . a close and continuing huh? Marina told me . . . congratulations. I’m glad you found someone who makes you happy.”

Clint groaned at that, his hand coming up to scratch absently at the back of his head. “Yeah . . . about that, I kinda thought we were over and well Darcy . . . you saw Darcy that night all those years ago. The night we first kissed.” He stammered hand waving absently.

“So it is . . . your mystery girl, that you couldn’t stop thinking about,” he replied, his dejection clearly visible on his face. “I didn’t think you’d move on so fast with anyone but her. I’m glad you were able to find her. I hope she makes you happy.”

Suddenly Clint felt as though that metal hand had just driven into his gut, reached up and yanked his heart out. He wasn’t entirely certain he could be happy with Darcy alone, especially not now, knowing Bucky had all but fallen out with his best friend over him. “Buck . . . I’m torn. My head and heart are splitting and pulling towards the both of you. Yebat’, where is Marishka when you need her!”

“At home . . . trying to adopt a STRIKE kid. He is NOT making it easy for her.”

“Wait . . . which STRIKE kid? Not . . . no way, Ward? How’d that little shit crawl into her heart?” Clint blurted with wide eyes before continuing “Don’t get me wrong; the kid seems nice enough if you can get him away from Garrett and Rumlow.”

“Well, Marina did. Vincent had . . .” here he paused, trying to figure out the right terminology for the Epic Rant the medic had unleashed about Garrett, his antecedents, and everything and anyone to do with STRIKE, “. . . let’s just say, he took his concerns to Marina and Will, and they managed to get Fury to reassign Ward to Marina as his handler. Garrett is still his STRIKE S.O., but Marina has final say in any and all missions, post-mission assessments, and the right to determine whether or not he is fit for duty.” Remembering the crutches and the ugly bandaging and brace around the kid’s knee, Bucky sighed, “Which currently . . . he’s not. Hence, Vincent’s Epic Rant, capitalization required.”

"About time someone did something,” Clint huffed fingers clenching into fists briefly “I’ve been tempted to shoot Garrett more than once for sending him out in the field when he clearly wasn’t at a hundred percent.” Clint’s tone was a low feral growl before he shook his head “So . . . what happens now with us and I guess Darcy?”

Biting down on his lower lip, Bucky flinched slightly, head bowing as he stared at the tops of his boots. “I guess that’s up to you.” One hand came up to scratch at the back of his head as he insisted, “I love you . . . I will abide to whatever will make you happy. Ball’s in your court, Clint. You’re the only one who can make that decision.”

“I never stopped loving you, Bucky. But my heart was in pieces when I got here and Darcy has been good to me. So . . . if I said I wanted to try and make it work with both of you, what would your reaction be?”

“Whatever you want. Anything you want. Like I said, you make the call . . . I will abide with any decision you make,” Bucky promised sincerely, scuffing the toes of his boot against the concrete beneath his feet. “If you want to just try to be with Darcy, I’m okay with that. I just . . . I don’t want to lose my best friend, along with my boyfriend.”

It’s not just my call, Buck. This involves you and Darcy so it kinda needs to be okay with all of us.” Clint pushed off the seat and closed the distance to Bucky, head cocking slightly as he contemplated his next words. “You didn’t lose me, I still love you, Captain Ego just . . . eh I know he was trying to protect you and now know he didn’t have all the facts but don’t give up on your friendship with him or us.”

Bucky’s fingers flinched forward, halting for a mere moment, before his hand looped through one of the tac straps on his uniform top and pulled him forward. “I’m so mad at him right now. I could have lost you, because of him. I need some space; New Mexico seemed like it was going to be putting enough space between us that I’d get over being furious.” Ocean eyes searched Clint’s as that metal hand came up to brush tenderly against his jaw, cradling his face carefully as he asked quietly, “May I kiss you?”

“So you fled here knowing full well that I could be possibly lost to you as well?” Clint arched one brow as he stared up into Bucky’s eyes, mouth twitching into an amused grin “Should I be insulted you felt the need to ask that question?”

“I would never ask you to cheat . . . that’s not fair to you, or to Darcy,” he replied with a frown. “You kidding? Darcy was half expecting to find you around somewhere when she recognised me . . . that wasn’t a fun conversation to have.” Clint huffed out a bitter chuckle before taking the decision out of Bucky’s hands and closing the slight distance between their mouths in a tentative kiss.

Bucky moaned deep in his chest, fingers spasming against his face, before he took control of the kiss. “I’ve missed you,” he breathed into the other man’s mouth, a soft keen slipping from his lips as Clint spanned his back with his hands. “I’m so sorry . . . for Steve, for agreeing to this stupid ‘break’, for all of it. I just . . . I want you back, Clint . . . I want you mine. But I understand you feel something for her and I will not be the one who stands in the way.”

“Give her a chance Buck, you might feel something for her too. Darce has a wicked sense of humor and might surprise you; just don’t piss her off or you’ll be facing the wrath of her and her taser.” Clint snorted, easily remembering the other night when the brassy woman had tased one of the idioty baby agents from the security detail for refusing to take no for an answer.

“If she caught your attention, khishchnik, I’m sure she’s a hell of a woman,” he agreed with a soft chuckle. Bowing his head, he pressed his forehead against Clint’s gently. “God . . . I want you to fuck me. I want you in me, surrounding me . . . is that . . . can we do that?”

Clint stared at Bucky for a long moment pupils blown wide with lust as he tried to force his brain into coherent thought. He nibbled momentarily at his lower lip before groaning in defeat “You locked the door right?”

Chuckling, he agreed fondly, “I can . . . if you want me to.”

With a roll of his eyes Clint snarked “I’d rather not have some of the idioty currently under my command come storming in while we’re in the middle of hot, awkward reunion sex.”
"Awkward? Since when has sex between us ever been awkward?" he teased with a soft frown.

"Since your ninety something year old best friend decided to butt into our business without knowing everything and the fact I’ve been sleeping with someone else?" Clint pointed out with a huff. "It just seems like it’d be a little awkward."

There was a pause, as he considered, “Yeah . . . you may have a point there.” Bending he chuckled as he nibbled teasingly on Clint’s lower lip again, “Well . . . everyone has to have at least one awkward first time. And since our first, first time was mind blowingly amazing . . . this is going to be our awkward first time. What do you think?”

“Sounds about right . . . though we actually may have another in the future if you and Darcy both agree to us trying the whole threeway relationship thing,” Clint reminded with a grin, his hand snatching the duffle away from Bucky as he moved to deposit it at the foot of his bed.

“You’re gonna need to be the one to pitch that idea, khishchnick. Especially considering the fact, I’ve never even met the girl.”

“Met her or not, the first question out of her mouth was to ask me where you were.” Clint chuckled at the memory. "Boy was that another dagger in my chest.”

Bucky flinched widely, his mouth twitching downwards as the statement caused a pain in his gut. “I’m sorry . . .”

Clint smirked, one finger coming up to press lightly against his lips. “Hey . . . none of that. You can make it up to me, by getting naked and getting on the bed. We have three weeks to make up for, yeah?”

Bucky’s eyes rolled back, as he groaned, “Twenty-two days and thirteen hours, but yeah; I’m willing to round it to three weeks.”

“I guess I’ll have to thank Captain Tight-ass eventually. Rumor has it make-up sex is the best.”

Stripping his shirt, the soldier cocked an eyebrow as he teased, “And who taught you that? The Colonel and Marina hardly seem the type . . . and the only one of your brothers to break up with someone was Jason. Not that he seemed to care much . . . he ended up getting Casey out of the whole mess.”

“Darcy, she can be a bit of a chatter box on the most random ass, mundane things. Unless you give her mouth something else to occupy it,” Clint smirked with a shrug “She has a history rife with angry makeup/break up sex apparently.”

“Oh yeah? She teach you anything new?” he drawled sensuously, slinking forward to loop his arms around Clint’s waist and pulling him close, their bodies pressed together from abdomen to knees.

“I wish. There’s this thing she does with her tongue when blowing me. Drives me chertov insane; regrettably, I’ve yet to be able to get her to teach it to me. Could have something to do with that stupid trick of her of tying cherry stems together with her tongue too.” Clint groaned eyes flicking towards the ceiling at the memory, before he teased “Pretty sure you’re going to love her, she gives great head.”

Chuckling, Bucky folded gracefully to his knees and lifted his hands to Clint’s belt. “Better head than me?” he asked wickedly, fingers pulling the zipper down agonizing slow. Clint could swear he heard each tooth as it clicked open, earning a quiet moan from the archer as Bucky leaned in to nuzzle against the soft flesh just below his belly button.

“Hmm, you’ll have to refresh my memory. Give me something for . . .” Clint trailed off with a groan as Bucky nipped at his skin. When his brain kicked his libido back momentarily, he blurted out hastily “. . . an in depth comparison.”

Bucky grinned wickedly, as he replied, “Copy that, Major,” before engulfing Clint’s dick to the root.

The younger man’s eyes rolled back; the hot wet mouth in combination with his rank kicked off a kink he hadn’t realized he had at all. “Oh fuck . . . I cannot wait to get in that ass, Sergeant Barnes. You gonna be my hot bit on the side? Take my cock so good?” Leaning over, he murmured huskily, “I’m gonna get so deep inside you, you’re gonna taste me in the back of your throat.”

Bucky smirked around his length, drawing off with a pop as he teased, “Kinda already do.”

Rolling his eyes, Clint threaded his hands back through his hair as he ordered, “More sucking, less talking.”

"Yes sir," Bucky agreed, before bending back to his task with an almost joyful resolve.

And if Clint lost time a little from that point on . . . well clearly, they’d never been on the receiving end of that mouth or been gloved in that sweet, gorgeous ass. Damn. Fortunately, they didn’t know what they were missing . . . and if Clint had anything to say about it . . . they never would.

When they were finally cuddled together in his bed, Bucky curled into his ribs and dfozing peaceably, Clint frowned a little. His fingers drew absent designs in the drying sweat at the base of his boyfriend’s - his boyfriend, thank FUCK - back, his eyes picking out all the imperfections littering the ceiling of his temporary quarters. Taking a deep breath, he called to mind the look on Darcy’s face that night at the bar, when she didn’t see Bucky right there at his beck and call. With any luck, it wouldn’t be hard to convince her to give the three of them a chance. He loved Bucky, and he was well on his way to being batshit insane about Darcy; he didn’t think he’d ever be able to be content to have only one or the other ever again.

Bucky’s voice was a low hum as he murmured sleepily, “You’re thinking too loud . . . go to sleep. Whatever you’re chewing on, it’ll still be there in the morning.”

Smirking, Clint bowed his head to kiss the top of his head gently. “Yeah . . . I know.”

“If you’re still coherent and awake, clearly I did that wrong,” the Soldier grumbled petulantly, glaring up at Clint through the strands of dark hair that had fallen loose from his usually neat pony tail.

"Nah . . . that was amazing make-up sex,” was the chuckling reply from the archer, bowing his head to nibble happily at the other man’s lips. “Just thinking about Darcy.”

Smirking, Bucky cuddled closer and yawned widely, “I can’t wait to meet her.”

"I can’t wait for you to meet her either. You’re gonna love her,” he promised, looping his arms around the older man’s shoulders and tugging him that small fraction closer. “Go to sleep, Buck . . . I’ll be right behind you, yeah?"

A deep breath through his nose accompanied a warm smile from Bucky as he agreed fondly, “Kay. Love you.”

“I love you too, James Buchanan Barnes . . . my whole life. That will never change."
“Good . . . because I don’t intend to ever let you go again,” he vowed, throwing his arm over Clint’s waist and snuggling closer. “Sleep . . . we’ll worry about your girl Darcy in the morning.”

Nodding against his forehead, the archer hummed a quiet agreement before closing his eyes. Between one breath and the next, he was out . . . his beloved Soldier only seconds behind.

When he woke up the next morning, it was to the announcement that Rumlow had arrived . . . and the look of distaste and disgust on Darcy’s face every time she looked at his partner. Clint didn’t know what Rumlow had told her, and he had told her something, but whatever it was . . . there was no permanent threesome in his future. Not with these two people, who were each one half of his perfect match.

As much as he liked Darcy and wanted to make a go of it with her, Clint LOVED Bucky. He couldn’t lose him again. So he pulled back, made distance, but remained her friend. Just because they couldn’t fuck anymore - which was a damned shame - didn’t mean that he wanted to lose her from his life completely. Maybe, just maybe . . . one day he’d get lucky.

But he kinda fucking doubted it.
Hey guys! So this is the first of two chapters I'm planning to post today and tomorrow. With any luck, the second one will continue falling into place so that can happen. (Reviews will help with that . . . honest.)

Translations at the end of the chapter, same as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
The Grimm Truth

proudly hosted on photobucket
Chapter 220: Reconciliation Part One

Maria Hill was NOT in a good mood. She loved her daughter, don’t get her wrong . . . but the persistent lack of sleep was starting to drag on her hard. And of course, her big lug of a husband - love of her life that he was - was driving her crazy trying to keep her happy and spoiling their little Minnow. “Hans! Let her sleep, please!” she scolded, smacking at his arm as the German leaned in the doorway of Minna’s nursery and just watched the two month old sleep.

“Her leetle snores, Spatzi . . . I cannot get enough. They are so precious,” he whispered, glancing at her briefly, before turning back to stare at the baby.

“And when your lurking wakes her up, her screams will be equally so I’ll bet,” the AD scoffed with a fond chuckle and a roll of her eyes. “I’m going to bed. I haven’t slept in four days and I need a break.”

Smiling at her fondly, he bent to press a warm kiss to his warrior woman’s cheek. “Ja . . . ve will be fine,” he promised with a grin as he shooed her away gently.

Of course it was about then that her phone screamed from the other room. Maria groaned, sagging in horror as she twisted to glare at the appliance. Storming off to snatch it up, she barked, “I am on maternity leave . . . this had better be insanely important.”

Frowning at the snarking reply on the other end of the line, she sighed heavily, her fingers coming up to pinch the bridge of her nose. She could hear the nursery door click shut quietly, and then her husband’s hands came up to knead gently at her shoulders. Reaching up, she squeeched his left hand, his wedding ring a cool presence against her palm. “All right . . . I’ll send someone to take care of it. Thank you, Agent Gamble.”

Clicking the phone shut, she sighed, “And my usual go-to would probably wring his neck if I tried to send her. Not to mention, the Colonel would probably kill me for trying.”

Hansel chuckled, “Let me guess . . . Captain Rogers?”

“Yes . . . he’s apparently destroying the punching bags in the gym, and scaring the bejesus out of the baby idiots training in there.” Groaning, she whimpered, “I haven’t slept for four days, Hans . . . I want sleep!”

“Hyu sleep . . . I will go.”

“Are you sure? You’re just as sleep deprived as I am. Maybe I can get the Colonel to go take care of it.”

“No . . . I will go.” Smoothing his hands around her shoulders, he promised, “Hyu rest . . . I will handle our wayward Captain, ja?”

“You are a saint, and I love you so much right now,” she groaned, head falling back as she gripped the front of his grey henley. Grinning into his kiss, she lifted her left hand to curl around his jaw, conscious of the weight on her wedding finger; there were times she still couldn’t believe he loved her or that he had been so stubborn not to give up on her.

“I love hyu both more than all the stars in the sky, Spatzi,” he promised, thumb stroking over the strip of skin between her comfortable flannel pants and his t-shirt.
Smiling, she laughed, “You know . . . the doctor approved me for regular activity yesterday. Maybe tonight . . . after I get some rest and if the Minnow goes to sleep quickly . . .”

There was a wicked gleam in his eyes as he promised, “Hyu rest . . . I will return as soon as I am able.”

She pressed one more kiss to his lips before letting him go, head cocking as she admired the way his jeans clung to his ass. Humming happily, she muttered, “Damn that ass . . .” before rotating girlishly on her toes and all but skipping for their room. If she was going to get what she wanted, she was going to need to get some sleep so she didn’t fall asleep in the middle.

Unhooking the latest in the line of busted punching bags and discarding it on the pile, Steve collected a new one and clicked it in place on the chain. Taking up his stance once more he scowled at the bag, as he launched into a series of brutal punches into the soft, aged leather.

He was peripherally aware of the awed looks he was getting from the training class on the other side of the gym. As well as the sharp, annoyed barks coming from the instructor as he tried to haul the class’ attention back to their lessons and off the man in khakis colored work out pants and a white t-shirt. Vaguely, he realized he recognized the instructor . . . but where he knew him from was beyond him.

Thinking of the awe in their faces only served to remind him of the looks he had been getting from the rest of the agents he’d come across since he’d woken in this strange time. Not that it wasn’t familiar. Before the serum, he had spent his life looked passed, over or through. After Erskine’s experiment and his subsequent death, suddenly all eyes were on him; with the attention had come the awe. He’d seen it a lot while he was traveling with the USO; as Captain America, he stood for something. And not that he didn’t appreciate the starry eyed applause, but he hadn’t actually done anything to deserve it, unlike the men out battling on the lines. But then, he had finally gotten involved in the war and hadn’t had to deal as much with those looks, he was with his teammates, who mainly looked at him with true respect, something he had returned in equal measure.

Now the looks were back but they didn’t seem to grasp the fact that they were looking at Steve Rogers and as Steve Rogers . . . he was still just a little guy who didn’t like bullies. It made him crazy to watch that awe and respect run to disappointment and distress once they discovered he had no interest in standing for whatever crusade they were pushing for. He was just trying to make his way through this new world.

That was a familiar feeling as well. He was unable to stop himself from once again comparing this to what happened after his transformation. What he wanted didn’t seem to matter. He quickly became aware of what he was worth to people in different positions of power. And along with the awe from many agents he couldn’t help but also see another familiar look, one he had gotten enough from Senator Brandt. He could see them calculating his worth, determining how they could use him.

And while he wanted to useful . . . he refused to be used.

Used. His thoughts unwillingly turned to Bucky. Who had been brainwashed . . . tortured . . . used, by horrible people. If only . . .

Steve’s punch wavered as Bucky’s falling face pushed to the forefront of his thoughts. There was a look he wished he could forget. Even when he’d been a runt, from the day they met, Bucky had always looked at him with respect, fondness . . . typically coupled with exasperation over whatever situation Steve had gotten himself into next. But always . . . that love had been there.
Even when Steve had stepped out the the car to see him alive, it was there though it had been marred slightly by Bucky's uncertainty. Then, when he learned of what Steve had done, it was gone. He hadn't been able to see it anymore from behind Bucky's fury . . . behind the betrayal.

Why hadn’t he told him about Barton? It didn’t make sense, but now the uncertainty made more sense. Had Bucky thought Steve would turn away from him, think less of him? Bucky was different, there was no doubt about that, he had seen the new hardness . . . a deep well of darkness in him. But it didn’t matter to Steve . . . why would it? Bucky was his oldest friend, his brother. How was it possible he didn’t know him anymore, hadn’t known his preferences or that he’d fallen head over heels for the man he’d chased off? Grunting in frustration as he landed a particular harsh punch, detaching one of the chains from the bag, he’d royally screwed up and in the process of trying to protect Bucky all he’d really managed to do was chase off his only lifeline.

“Hyu have quite the collection of broken bags . . . may I suggest hyu do not break another? Mein Spatzi does not appreciate it when people destroy what is not theirs,” came a German accented voice from behind him, tone amused if stern.

“Pretty sure I’ve got some back pay owing; she’s quite welcome to take the cost of the replacements from it.” Steve grunted with one last blow to the uneven bag before he turned towards the voice, eyes focused on his hands as he worked the bindings loose.

“And while that may be true, I am the one who suffers from hyur lack of care, so if hyu would be so kind,” he snarked with a roll of his eyes.

Looking up to the voice’s owner Steve’s eyes widened in shock before flicking to the trainer across the way. And suddenly, it clicked . . . where he knew the trainer from; the two faces were virtually identically to that of Bucky’s boyfriend. Granted when he focused closer there were minute differences . . . even still they were things he likely would have missed if it hadn’t been for his penchant for art. “You’re related to Barton.” He stated quietly.

“My youngest son. The one over there is Brian; he is my second eldest. And I do believe you have also met my oldest, Colonel Brandt, meine Tochter’s partner.”

“Your daughter is partner to your son?” Steve blinked at that for a moment before clicking “Ah the heavily pregnant Russian who threatened to kick my ass, is married to your son the Colonel?” Steve asked with a wince, suddenly thinking he may have stepped on a live landmine with this particular family.

“They are not married . . . only very committed,” he replied with a smile. “My grandchildren are due very soon . . . I confess to a certain amount of pride about it.”

“I have no doubt that Agent Petrovka, once she is fit, will make good on her promise to deal with me over what happened with your youngest son. Had I known then what he meant to Bucky . . . I would have kept my mouth shut.” Three was a moment’s pause, before his eyes went wide as he extended his unwrapped hand to the man befroe him, “Forgive my lack of manners, my ma raised me better than this. Steven Rogers.”

The German accepted the hand with a firm shake, before replying, “Johannes Kuhn . . . most people call me Hansel. I know who hyu are Captain . . . regrettably, hyur reputation precedes hyu.”

“Which reputation exactly? The one as a dancing monkey or the one where I break your youngest son’s heart by misjudging his fascination in my best friend?” Steve huffed bitterly.

“Bucky and mein Falki have reconciled. And hyu did not act in malice. Even Marishka is not very angry now; if she was, hyu would already be dead, pregnancy or no.”

“I don’t doubt that Sir. But I’m glad to hear Buck and your boy have mended their bridges. Had I known about them I wouldn’t have said what I did. I overreacted and judged your boy by the rest of STRIKE. For that, I am sorry and I hope eventually to be allowed to apologise to them both.” Steve responded, turning from Hansel as he worked the rest of the bindings off.

“As for which reputation, neither. We are in a rather unique club, hyu and I. I know of only one other, and she sleeps still.” There was a gentle twist to his mouth as he inquired, “When were hyu born, Captain?”

“July 4th, 1918, Sir.”

Here he smiled, a warm edge to it that put the other man at ease. “I was born October 31st . . . 1796. My sister was born two years following, though she still slumbers in her cursed sleep.”

Steve had froze hearing Hansel’s birth year, “1796? But that would make you . . .”

“Two hundred and thirteen years old, yes. My sister is 211. So hyu see, Captain . . . hyu are not the only man out of time here. I woke from my sleep in nineteen hundred and ninety-nine. I was in my thirties when I was cursed . . . I slept for far longer than I had lived.”

Steve shook his head slightly, awed by the idea. He had not thought he would meet anyone other than Bucky would understand how strange it was to have slept longer than you had lived. Then, he frowned, suddenly curious, “Your sister . . . she’s not named Gretel is she? Like in the fairy tale.” He could confess that, despite his own seventy year sleep, the knowledge of another’s sleep was amazing to him. And for her to still be sleeping . . .

“According to my son, my sister and I are the basis for the fairy tale of the same name. Her name is Margaret . . . but yes, we have always called her Gretel. We are German; it is our way.” Frowning he scolded, “Either way, I understand where hyu have been. It is isolating and lonely, but there is a world beyond destroying punching bags and frightening baby agents.”

“Frightening baby agents?” Steve repeated blinking as his gaze swept to the group on the other side of the gym. “Am I that fearsome without realising it?”

“When angry and depressed, hyur face makes quite a terrible expression,” the other man laughed. Reaching out, he laid his hand on the captain's shoulder, “Mayhap, hyu have need of a friend, ja?”

“Probably, but I doubt anyone will step up after what I did to Bucky, and he was my oldest friend.”

“I would not be so hasty in that assumption. Hyu may find hyurself surprised.” Moving his head to indicate the door, he insisted, “Come . . . hyu will come to dinner. It is good food and good company. After we eat . . . I would show hyu something, if hyu permit it.”

“If you’re anything like your eldest son and his partner, Hansel, I suspect I don’t have a choice.” Steve shook his head with a soft chuckle “And while I may be good in combat I suspect you have a few tricks up your sleeves.”

“Hyu would find hyurself dearly challenged against our Murderesses. May I suggest hyu seek one out? Come, come . . . we will be late. That is never a good idea, trust me.”

“I’m not sure I want to ask how those particular women got that nickname. Lead on?”

“They were Russian assassins once, who defected from their motherland. Marina is one, as are her three sisters. They are fearsome to behold. Even I would balk to meet them in a dark alleyway, as they say.” Hansel replied, pausing briefly at the side of his son. “Are hyu about done, Arger?”

“Tasha and I will meet you there, I promise.”

“Do not be late,” he instructed the brown-eyed agent firmly. “Hyu know how Sova feels about late arrivals at her table,” he insisted, before clapping one hand on his son’s shoulder and striding away, Steve in reluctant tow behind him.

“Do all your son’s look like you?” Steve inquired as his gaze flicked across to the one Hansel had just been speaking too. “If I weren’t an artist and used to picking out slight differences I’d swear you all looked identical.”

“All ten of them, ja. Will looks the most like me, however. His eyes, hyu know . . . they change depending on his mood. So sometimes, rare times, they are exactly the right color.”

“Ten?” Steve blinked at that, his brow furrowing as he frowned “I don’t want to ask how you have ten identical sons, if you were cursed . . . do I?”

“Marishka has told hyu; hyu inspired many, yes? They are the results of one of the more . . . inhumane . . . inspirations. One day, I will . . .” here he trailed off, taking a deep breath in through his nose to calm his temper. “Eet is complicated.”

“Your boys were meant to replace me? That’s what she meant when she said to Bucky about Clint’s whole life being spent replacing me?”

“Only five were, but ja, they were the solution the Army came up with after losing you. They are good soldiers, good agents; they were built to be so. But when hyu awoke . . . everything Clint had ever been was now moot. It was a little daunting to him; he believes that of his brothers, he is the fuck up of the batch, though Sonnenstrahl and Grauchên would disagree.”

“And then I come along and try and take Bucky away from him while sticking my giant foot in my mouth. Suddenly I feel like the little runt I was, picking fights in a back alley with a garbage can lid as my only protection.”

“Hyu have said hyur apologies. When the twins are born, those two will be back. Patience; hyu will get to beg their forgiveness soon enough,” he insisted, smiling up at a huge house on base. “Ah, we are here.”

Staring wide eyed at the house Steve turned to Hansel asking “Exactly how many people live here?”

“It depends on any given day. Come, let us go in. I miss my Minnow . . . her Papa's arms are empty without her in them.”

The door opened to the smell of fresh Chinese stir fry and sweet ginger spiced wontons. “Ah. Adler is cooking.”

“You can tell that by the aroma of the food?” Steve gaped at the man’s back before his head shook and he jogged to catch up.

“Ja. No one makes Chinese quite like Will,” he replied as he led Steve into the kitchen, where Will was working at the stove and Marina sat cuddled up in a cushy armchair someone had dragged in from the living room. “Hello . . . I hope hyu do not mind. I brought a guest to hyur table, Adler.”

Steve stood in the doorway, glancing around the kitchen, feeling out of place. He hadn’t realized, somewhere, that they were going to this particular son’s home and tried not to fidget under the gaze of the very pregnant Russian, who had torn into Bucky so frightenly before. His gaze flicked to Will as he asked, “Is there anything I can do to help? I’d like to pull my weight since I’m a surprise addition.”

Will’s eyes flashed through colors as he wiped his hands on a rag, before they flicked to his partner. “Zhemchuzhina?”

Huffing, she sagged back, “I’m too tired to care, Mishka. He can set the table, if he's of a mind to.”

“You weren’t kidding about the changing eye color.” Steve said as he glanced at Hansel for a moment before returning his attention to the couple in the kitchen. “I can leave if it’s inconvenience, Colonel.”

“It’s not. Marina is just a nasedka and fussing. You’re welcome . . . if you could set the table, it's one less chore I have to wrestle away from Agent Stubborn over there.”

Marina's tone was singsong cheerful as she replied, “Pot, meet kettle!”

“Point me in the direction of the table settings and consider it handled. I also insist you let me handle the dishes afterwards.”

“Oh no . . . we have boys for that,” Marina insisted, before shouting, “Boys!! Dinner!! Wash up please!”

Will rolled his eyes as he retorted in a dry tone to his father, “Well at least this time she didn’t try to get up.”

“Hush you,” the Russian snarked, nose wrinkling adorably as she pouted at him. “I’m pregnant . . . not an invalid.”

“I’m not sure how it is now, Agent Petrovka, but back in the 40’s no pregnancy was easy. I remember Bucky’s Ma being on bedrest while carrying his baby sister Becca.” Steve spoke up dazedly, his mind obviously in the past as he worked to set the tables.

Groaning, she huffed, “Don't give him ideas . . . he has far too many as it is.”

Rene came skidding into the kitchen, screeching as he tried to evade a furious Sam. “I’m gonna kill you!” the older blond roared, swiping at his brother and just barely missing him.

Will's hand was on Marina's shoulder to keep her seated as he bellowed, “Enough! Sam . . . sit down!”

“But Dad!”

“NOW!!” was the booming reply, prompting Sam to drop the ground next to Marina in a heartbeat.

Will's hand coming out to snatch the back of Rene's shirt as the teenager attempted to slither past. “If the two of you are finished behaving like heathens, we have company. Kindly remember your manners.”

“Boys will be boys, Colonel. Bucky and I used to give his ma far worse than that.” Steve’s mouth curved into a sad smile “Course it used to end with Bucky’s pa’s strap being reintroduced to our backsides if we got too out of hand.”

Will gave his younger son a stern glare as he insisted, “I'm considering it.”
“Dad! I'm almost 16!” Rene protested, wide eyed.

“Do I look like I give a damn?” was the reply, glancing at where Sam was fuming even as Marina's fingers pet through his hair. “What did you take, Rene?”

“Jules’ engagement ring,” Sam grit out, glaring at his baby brother.

“Is your name Rene?” Will barked, causing his eldest son's jaw to snap closed as he shook his head. Turning back to the younger, he ordered firmly, “Give it back.”

“Why is he marrying her?” he whined, even as he fished the box from his pocket and handed it over to his father sullenly. “She's so . . . obsessive. Like seriously, Dad's a workaholic, but he's never left Mama for the job either.”

“Sam loves her, Enjolras Rene, and that is all that should matter to you, is that understood? Or should I get the strap I used to use on your uncles’ butts and use a little old fashioned discipline on your backside?” Will ground out, snatching the ring box while simultaneously shaking Rene gently by the collar of his shirt.

“Whatever,” Rene grumbled, yelping as his dad’s hand came down hard on the seat of his jeans.

“Try that response again,” the Colonel insisted, his “Dad” face on at full force.

“No sir. I understand,” he insisted, hand back to rub at the still stinging spot on his ass.

“Smart boy. Wash your hands and face for dinner; we're seconds away.”

Steve finished setting the table, expression stoic even as the scene had reminded him of his own past, the only thing really missing was Bucky. Glancing over the table with a critical eye he inquired “Is there anything missing? Obviously aside from the bodies around the table.”

Marina flicked at the back of Sam's head fondly as she ordered affectionately, “Help the Captain get out the beer, wine, tea and other drinks, please, Sammy-honey.”

“Yes Ma,” he agreed, a small quirk to his lips as Rene scrambled out of reach as he stood. “Yeah . . . you’d better run, little firestarter . . . pyros tend to get burned.”

Steve’s brows rose slightly as he looked at Sam for a moment before shaking his head with a low chuckle “It’s like looking at a blond version of Bucky when we were growing up.”

Sam grinned at the information, “Yeah!? Uncle Bucky is awesome, not gonna lie. He still hasn’t forgiven me for taking him out in paintball though.”

“Paintball?” Steve asked with a confused frown, shaking his head he continued “Bucky’s a sniper, used to be the best. The enemy couldn’t ever find his perch, so how’d you manage to take him out?”

“Ma took a running leap off a roof?” he replied with a grin, the two partners exchanging a fist bump. “Lead him AND Uncle Clint right into my sights. It was awesome.”

Steve’s brow furrowed at that information; clearly his best friend had changed more than he’d known. Excluding the arm of course, that difference was definitely hard to miss. “You’re a sniper yourself then I take it?”

“Yeah . . . my scores come in pretty consistently behind Uncle Bucky. And even Bucky hasn't ever been able to touch Clint's scores, with a gun, a rifle or a bow. Uncle Clint's the Best, Greatest “Marksman in the World,” Sam gushed, a clear case of hero worship gleaming in brilliant blue eyes.

“Sounds like talent runs in the family then.”

Sam blushed as he shook his head, “Nah . . . I'm adopted. I didn't get any of those genes.”

“Sammy . . . what do we say when someone gives us a compliment?” his mother prompted gently, eyes sad as she watched her exceptional eldest sink back under the General's conditioned belittling and self-deprecation.

“Thank you, Captain.”

“Steve is fine, unless I’m in the field.” Steve said with a slight grin before he shrugged “Family isn’t always about genetics and blood. Bucky and I were like brothers growing up in Brooklyn. He and his family were life savers after my Ma passed.”

“This is the only family Sam or I have ever had,” Rene chimed in from where he was hiding behind his father. “My mother and Sam's General . . . not exactly gonna win ‘Parent of the Year’.”

“The sad truth Rene . . . it was Rene right? Not all people are cut out to be parents, and a lot of the time the best parents are ones who never would’ve thought they would be.” Steve said gently as he took the drinks Sam was passing out.

Sam grinned, “Nah, Ma was destined to be a mother. Just took her awhile to get stuck with us is all.”

“She has a big heart; I could see that the first day I met her. More so when faced with her fury not so long ago.” Steve grinned at Sam for a moment before looking to Marina “Bucky always did have a huge heart himself; it's no wonder he threw his lot in with Agent Petrovka.”

“Flattery will get you into many places, Captain Rogers . . . back to my table included,” Marina laughed, reaching up to take the hands Will and Sam both offered her and letting them pull her to her feet. “Ugh . . . I am a whale,” she huffed, hands coming up to brace her back as she stretched a little.

Steve snorted at the comment head cocked slightly “Begging your pardon, ma’am, but that’s a load of crap. You're radiant; if I had my sketch pad, I’d draw you to prove my point.”

Frowning she asked, “Do you have a decent sketch pad, Captain? I know there's been some disagreement among the higher ups about your backpay.”

“Not currently; I’ve been improvising with scraps of paper.” Steve admitted sheepishly, one hand scrubbing at the back of his neck.

Turning to her eldest, Marina instructed firmly, “Sammy-honey, go get one of the empty sketchbooks, from Aaron's old room. He doesn't need 20 blank ones littering his room.”

“Yes Ma,” he agreed, before bolting off towards the stairs.

Steve stared at Marina, slightly dumbfounded with his mouth agape before his brain kicked back into gear “Are you sure you want to do that? I mean I appreciate the thought but given my earlier incident involving your family . . .” He trailed off there with a wave of his hand.

“All due respect, Captain . . . shut up. It's my house and I can do whatever I want with the junk my boys store in it. Aaron buys them in bulk around back to school time, and then formulates his explosives in them. Last I saw, his current book is still three quarters of the way empty. He won't miss one, I promise.”
“Then thank you, Agent Petrovka.” Steve beamed brightly at the Russian before flicking his gaze curiously between Will and Hansel as he quipped “Ever noticed that whenever anyone says ‘with all due respect’, they really mean ‘kiss my ass’? Not that I got that vibe from Agent Petrovka but certain people give it off especially some of the other Agent’s I’ve met.”

Will and Marina both grinned as they replied together, “Nick and Maria.”

“I am not ashamed to admit I’m just the tiniest bit afraid of AD Hill; she reminds me far too much of Peggy for my liking. Which likely means she’ll gladly kick my ass if I screw up.” Steve stated with a slight roll of his eyes and a sad sigh. “Ah, hell. I bet Peggy was livid that I missed our date.”

Marina gnawed lightly on her lower lip before she sighed, “Director Carter lives, you know? Her niece works for S.H.I.E.L.D. too; it is what it is, because she put forth the effort to make it so.”

“That’s good to know. Peggy always was the bravest dame I knew, and if her niece is anything like Peggy . . . S.H.I.E.L.D’s enemies better beware.”

“Sharon Carter is an exceptional agent. Agent 13 . . . she's been my asset for awhile now,” Marina agreed with a fond smile. “She isn't family, but I'll confess I had hopes,” she teased, cocking an eyebrow at her eldest son.

“Ma,” the blond sighed fondly, bending to kiss her cheek. “Meddle in someone else's love life. Isn't Uncle Lucky still single?”

“To my undying dismay,” the Russian snarked, frowning as she hunched over with a sharp gasp and instantly had the attention of the entire room. Will was at her side in an instant. Steve could admit to being impressed, if asked; he hadn’t even seen the Colonel move.

“Everything okay, Agent Petrovka?” Steve’s tone was laced with concern as he took in her hunched posture and the concerned expressions littering the faces within the room, while her partner cuddled her as he fussed.

Will didn't even wait for a response, swooping up the diminutive woman and striding towards the couch in the living room. She grunted as she smacked at him gently, “I'm fine . . . it was a kidney shot.”

“Regardless, you should probably rest a while. You can lay down in here while we’re eating dinner.”

Marina sighed, sagging into the couch. “I don't want to be in here all by myself. Please Mishka . . . it's just a kick, that's all.”

Rene chimed in quietly, “Maybe . . . we could eat in here with her, Dad? If that's okay with you.”

“It’s not right to let a lady eat alone.” Steve chimed in suddenly, a cheeky grin spreading across his face “And Agent Petrovka is a lady.”

Her teeth flashed at him in a sinister grin as she snarked, “A lady who will turn you inside out, if you ever call her a lady again.”

“Peggy was a lady . . . albeit a lady who regularly liked to kick my ass or shoot at me when I screwed up. Seems a fair comparison for you Agent Petrovka; ass kicking ladies as opposed to the prissy little house wives of the 40’s.”

“Shoot at you? There's a story there,” she insisted, perking up a little bit.
“Yes, uh, Howard and I were discussing shields at the time. Shortly before that though Peggy found a blonde dame kissing me,” Steve’s cheeks went a little rosy for a moment as his eyes dropped to his feet. “I pissed her off by saying I thought she and Howard were ‘fonduing’, then asked her opinion on one of the shields. She picked up a pistol and shot at me, then said - and I quote - ‘Yes, I think it works.’ Good thing vibranium is bulletproof.”

“Indeed,” she laughed with sparkling eyes, distracted sufficiently enough that Will could recruit his father and sons into moving the place settings to the living room coffee table. “I only had occasion to meet her the once and found her most enjoyable, wonderfully deadpan company . . . however my handlers genuinely feared her. She was a hell of a woman.”

“That she was, deceptively so. I have no doubt she was a fearsome director for S.H.I.E.L.D. She was never one to sit by and take no for an answer. There were times she tried to join me, Bucky and the Howling Commando’s in the field. She had them wrapped around her little finger and I think she was about the only dame that made Bucky think he was invisible.”

Marina’s eyes went sad at the reminder of her mentor, nibbling on her lower lip as she started to cry. And not just tears; great gulping sobs that found her burying her face in her palms and her shoulders shaking hard as she literally lost it before Steve’s eyes.

“Oh darn, I didn’t mean to make you cry.” Steve stammered as he crossed and dropped to a crouch in front of the sobbing Russian. “I’m sorry if I said something to upset you.”

“I miss him,” she wailed in honest distress, rolling slightly to grab his shirt and sob into his chest. “I want Tvorets home!”

“That’s my fault, I’m sorry for that. I’d like to make it up to you for taking him away from you . . . especially now.” Steve stuttered in dismay, still a little clueless when it came to women as he reached one hand around to pat lightly at Marina’s back.

The Colonel frowned as he came further into the room, hands full of dishes. “What happened?!” he demanded, all but throwing the plates down and crouching at her side.

“I miss Clint and Bucky!” she hiccupped, transferring her weight to her lover and clinging like a limpet.

Sighing out in relief, Will replied, “Oh. That's not nearly as terrible as I was imagining.” Looking over at Steve, he took in the man’s features and promised, “It's the pregnancy. She can and will literally start to cry at the drop of a hat. Don't worry; I promise . . . nothing you did personally.”

“Actually Sir, that one is all my doing. If I’d kept my nose out of things or had thought to look closer before speaking . . . this wouldn’t have happened.” Steve sighed head turning to the ceiling as he scowled “Is there anyway to get them back?”

“They’re assigned to the base there until the situation in New Mexico is resolved, so no,” he replied. Marina suddenly straightened, tears paused as she stared at the dishes, “Those are my good china, William Michael Grimm! What are you doing throwing around my good CHINA ?!”

“See? Crisis averted,” he chuckled bending to kiss her forehead and straighten once more to standing.

“Maybe for me; I think it started a whole new one for you though. I can see why Bucky likes Agent Petrovka though. There’s similarities to his sister Becca in here,” Steve reached out to tap gently at Marina’s temple as he grinned “And given the size of your family, in her heart as well. Becca was always coming home with stray animals.”

“Marina prefers stray boys; they clean up after themselves better,” Will joked, moments before she burst into tears again. “Misha . . . I'm hungry.”

“I know samaya malen'kaya, I'm working on it,” he agreed, bending to kiss her forehead gently. “Why don't you tell the Captain about Bucky raising you at the Krasnaya Komnata while I finish dinner and we wait on the rest of the idiots. Would you like a couple crab rangoons to hold you over?”

“Please?” she asked meekly, big hot chocolate eyes blinking up at him adorably.

“Oh yeah, definitely Becca reincarnated,” Steve teased with a low chuckle.

Turning her head to glare at him lightly, she stuck her tongue out at him playfully. “Be nice, or I won't tell you about the time I drenched the Soldat in chocolate on a mission once.”

Will snorted hard, clearly privy to those details. “Oh boy . . . hauling out the big guns, huh?”

“Mnhmm,” she hummed contentedly, grinning up at her lover as he pressed his hands to her belly. She folded hers over his, lifting her chin to accept his adoring kiss happily. “Ya lyublyu tebya, moy Mishka.”

“Vsegda, zhемchužhina,” he replied in adoring agreement.

“I’m sorry, I’m having a hard time picturing Buck covered in chocolate. He was always so finicky about keeping clean before the war.” Steve mumbled, head shaking as his lips twitched. “You’ll have my best behavior, if I get to hear that story.”

“I was 10 . . . pretending to be his daughter. We were in Bucharest, hunting some rogue KGB. I was a spitfire even then and I was not afraid of him. He scolded me unfairly and I upended my mug of hot chocolate over his head.”

Steve burst into a fit of riotous laughter, dropping back onto his butt on the floor in front of Marina. Hunching over his legs as his face darkened with his laughter “I would have paid to see that.” Steve wheezed a few minutes later.

“He terrified my classmates; the Gospozha used to call him the Boogeyman.” Frowning, she sighed, “He was always kind to me . . . brought me chocolates, ruffled my hair. He was the only father I had then; it broke my heart to disappear, to defect from the KGB. I knew I would never see him again . . . and yet, here we are.”

“It’s good to know there was still some part of him alive in there. My one regret from the war was when he fell, I never went back to look for his body. We were ordered to move on.” Steve growled with a shake of his head. “I guess in some weird roundabout kind of way that would kind of make you my surrogate niece then.” He teased with a wonky grin, blue eyes shining brightly.

“Imagine how he feels, as he's sleeping beside the boy I raised from diapers. By that same roundabout logic, Clint is his grandson,” she giggled, eyes shining with amusement.

“Well ain’t that just a kick in the pants.” Steve snorted with a roll of his eyes. “Bucky and I used to know cousins who dated, it was an amusing thing to discuss on the cold nights when we were huddled up together under the blankets to stay warm. I’m gonna have to do something to make it up to both of them.”
“Be supportive. Bucky loves you . . . he just loves Clint more.”

“Yeah, I get that now. I promise I’ve got their backs when they get home. Bucky . . . he’s my family and that makes Clint family by extension.” Steve said sincerely.

“See . . . you can be taught,” she chuckled, cheering considerably as Will carried in a plate of rangoons for her. “Ooooh . . . yummy. Gimme gimme.”

“That’s me, just a big ol’ dumb, loyal dog that needs a firm hand to train me right,” Steve snarked with a broad grin.

Will rolled his eyes, chuckling, “That sound like something Jay would say. ‘That’s me; just a big dumb dog’.”

“Well how else would you explain me jumping into hell after my best friend and your partner’s surrogate father? Colonel Phillips was not impressed by my behavior.” Steve pointed out with a smirk “But I was done being the Senator’s dancing monkey.”

Will frowned, asking very seriously, “You are his brother. What else were you supposed to do? I’ve done nothing less for my own and for Lucky . . . when it’s all you’ve ever had, family is important.”

“Apparently I was expected to be their perfect little apple pie of a soldier and continue doing their propaganda campaign. If I hadn’t have gone after Bucky, I never would have seen active duty. They were content to let me ‘play’ at soldier when all I wanted to do was protect those I cared for.” Steve grunted, blue eyes darkening at the recollection. “I’m grateful for Peggy and Howard helping me to go after Bucky.”

Marina cocked an eyebrow at her lover as she snarked, “Perfect Little Soldier . . . now who does that sound like, I wonder, Mishka?”

“I love you, Marishka . . . the love of my life, the joy of my heart, the apple of my eye . . .” he continued spouting off epithets, laughing, as she threw her fork at his head seconds after he ducked back behind the door into the kitchen.

“Oooh, that man makes me crazy.”

“You love him regardless of it though,” Steve said solemnly, lips twitching in amusement “I can see it, the same way I saw it in your defense of Clint. They may drive you up the wall but you can’t help loving them, Bucky was the same with me. When I was a scrawny little runt getting his ass kicked in Brooklyn on a daily basis, Bucky used to sweep in like an avenging angel to ‘save’ me.”

“Misha nor I rarely need saving,” she promised with a fond grin. “Where he goes, I follow. A world without him . . . it isn’t a world I want any part of.”

“No but I have no doubt the pair of you sweep in to protect your family, both blood and chosen. Come hell or high water you’re always there for each other no matter what. I missed that when Bucky fell.”

Marina grunted with the effort as she leaned forward to lay her hand over his. “He will forgive you . . . I have every faith in that. As you’ve said, Tvorets’ heart is big and loving. You are his brother . . . why else would he be so mad?”

“That is true, however he’s also an elephant. He never forgets and boy can he hold a grudge when he wants to.” Steve chuckled squeezing her hand gently. “Do you mind if I draw you? I think it’d be a good gift for not only you but for Clint and Bucky as well.”
“I am a whale, Captain . . . but if you wish it, I have no objections,” she agreed with a laugh, seconds before Will, Hansel, Rene and Sam all came in carrying trays stacked high with homemade Chinese food . . . followed by a veritable flood of Grimms. “Yay!! I’m starving!!”

Steve snorted softly at her complaint. “You are far from a whale and I stand by my earlier opinion that you are radiant and I’m throwing in beautiful and kind hearted to boot.” He picked up the book and pencil Sam had left and flipped it open to start sketching an outline.

“I have never been beautiful, Captain,” she chuckled, earning a fond kiss from her lover as he slipped under her body and pulled her back into him. “You've always been beautiful to me.” the Colonel promised with a smile.

“You're biased,” she scoffed with a roll of her eyes, even as she pressed a quick kiss to his lips in reward.

“Beauty is in the eye of the beholder Agent Petrovka. As my Ma used to say there’s more to beauty than looks, your kind heart and protective nature only add to your natural beauty.” Steve hummed peering up over the top of the sketchbook briefly with a grin.

“Bozhe moi . . . at this point, I think you can call me Marina, Captain.”

“My ma taught me better than to use someone’s name before they give me permission, Marina. Same goes for you though, you can call me Steve.”

It was about then that a snide voice chimed in, “Who invited Captain Mudak?”

“Aaron Kenneth James . . . you shut your mouth this instant, if the only thing coming out of it is rude and vitriolic.” Sighing, she muttered, “I could have sworn I taught the lot of you basic manners. Maybe I imagined it.”

“It’s alright Marina, he has a right to be upset. My actions chased off his younger brother.” Steve mumbled shrinking back behind the book as though he were still a scrawny runt from Brooklyn.

“Not just my brother . . . my best friend. Clint is gonna kick my ass when he gets home, for distracting him long enough that Bucky could get to him before he could bolt.” Glaring, blue eyes were boiling hot as he hissed, “Which wouldn't have needed to happen if he'd just kept his mouth shut.”

Flinching at the reminder Steve flipped the sketchbook shut and set it on the coffee table before pushing himself off the floor, his lips a thin line as he tried to avoid looking at any of the newly arrived brothers. “This was a bad idea; I’ll just excuse myself and leave you guys to it.”

“Sit the fuck down,” Will ordered, eyes a silvery grey that pinned Steve in place effortlessly. Turning his attention onto the second youngest brother, his tone was calm, quiet . . . and made Aaron blanch paler than the pages in the sketchbook. “That's enough, Kenny. If you cannot refrain from running your mouth, you may leave.”

“You don't mean that.”

Cocking a single eyebrow, the eldest Grimm asked in reply, “Don't I?”

“Colonel, I don’t want to be the cause of anymore unrest within your family,” Steve stammered from where his butt had plopped back on the floor.

His interruption was sharp as he insisted, “This is my family and my home. And I will have anyone in it I wish. If Kenny doesn't like that . . . he has a home of his own. He can go sulk in it.”

Steve reeled a little on the floor at that, not to mention the fact the merest order from the shorter man before him had him quailing a little. He had a couple inches on the Colonel and more than a crew pounds as well. The authority radiating off the man, however; it was awe inspiring and frankly kind of intimidating. This was not a man he would wish to find himself on the wrong side off, ever.

His eyes flicked to Aaron, tone quiet, as he apologised “I am sorry for what happened with your brother, and I intend to fix it however possible once they return.”

“I did that already,” the blue eyed brother muttered with a roll of his eyes. “Last I talked to Bucky, they were . . . well, yeah. Probably TMI in current company. It was for me, anyway.”

“Bucky’s always over shared,” Steve admitted with a wry grin as he shook his head “And I didn’t mean fix their relationship, rather fix up my own misguided mistake. I need to earn back Bucky’s trust and by extension Clint’s, they both deserved better than my assumptions.”

“STRIKE are morons . . . but Clint’s a Grimm. The only reason he's STRIKE is because he's the best.”

“Well I know that now.” Steve replied insistantly. “I never knew he was a ‘Grimm’ until Marina and Bucky showed up. All I saw was a STRIKE member making my brother and best friend upset whenever he was nearby. Add in the angry and disappointed looks he was throwing over at us . . . my instinct to protect Bucky slammed to the forefront.”

“There are other reasons to ogle the Soldier, you know. Half of the current training class has a bet about who can get Bucky into bed first . . . and I'm not talking about just the women,” Jason snickered with a roll of his eyes. “Brian's been bitching about it for months.”

Will cocked an eyebrow, mouth opening to speak, just before the second deadliest couple in the family blew into the room. “Fuck damn shit! I hate stupid anyone, okay? And those idiots take the damned cake, Will. You’re getting soft in your old age.”

Jason snarked, “Speak of the devil, and he shall appear.”

“Bite me, Jay Jay.”

“Don't call me Jay Jay,” was the cold reply, prompting Will to clear his throat and draw their attention before the two brothers attempted to maim one another.

“I highly doubt I've gone soft, but okay . . . you have my attention. What happened?” the Colonel asked with an amused grin.

Steve glanced curiously to Hansel, one brow arched before he joked “Should we be worried the gym is now lined with the corpses of idiot baby agents as well as busted punching bags?”

“Brian has very exacting criteria about murder. They are probably not happy to be alive right now, but they do live.” Hansel replied calmly, tone and features totally serious.

“Good to know, I wouldn’t want to have been the one to explain that to Fury.”

Natasha chuckled as she slipped around her lover and moved to her sister’s side. “Allo sestrenka, kak samochuvstviye segodnya? Kak moi pleyannitsy? (Hello, little sister, how are you feeling? How are my nieces?)”
“Klassno,” the other Russian replied, the two sisters giggling as they felt the twins rolling around in her belly. “So strong already . . . they're going to keep me on my toes.”

“Hello! Could the murderous contingent of the family kindly pay attention here? I'm gonna start maiming them, if they don't pay attention?” Brian complained with a growl and an impressive pout.

“Oh Bri . . . now what happened?” Marina teased, her hands lying over Natasha’s, as one of the twins battered against the pressure insistently.

The redhead looked back at her lover, teasing, “Apparently, the good Captain has replaced the Soldat as the most fuckable man at S.H.I.E.L.D. His training class couldn't stop staring at him today.”

“I'm trying to teach them how to stay alive. It would be nice if they would pay attention, Will!”

“And how, exactly, is this my fault?” the Colonel asked in amusement, stealing a rangoon from Marina's plate and chuckling at her indignant squeak of dismay.

“Can I make a suggestion?” Steve stammered, cheeks aflame from the comment. “Use the distraction to your advantage. While they're distracted knock one of them on their ass, Peggy did it in basic training before I got the serum. One guy too busy hitting on her and staring at her cleavage to see her fist coming.”

“Why do you think half of them are in Medical and the other half are going to be needing ice packs just to sit for awhile?” Brian snarked, flipping onto the floor with a groan. “And it's your fault, Will, because you vetted them and let them be recruited.”

“I don't recall the application saying anything about 'does not get distracted by hot, blond and badass’. If it did, no one would ever get recruited; haven't you seen the lists in the locker room about which Grimm is the hottest?” Casey snarked with a roll of her eyes. "Last I checked the tallies, Will was stomping all of your butts, pretty much across all specialities."

“Thank you, Casey,” Will replied with a grin. Cocking his head at the addition, he drawled, “I think.”

Marta's cheeks flamed as she insisted meekly, “I know which one has my vote.”

Casey grinned at her best friend as she teased, “I think we all know who that is, Marty. Pretty sure, you married that one.”

Blinking at the conversation as Brian’s words suddenly registered, Steve’s brows both rose to his hairline “You disabled your entire class?”

“Wouldn't be the first time,” was the unanimous response from the entire room.

“Well in that case if you ever need a distraction to reinforce that lesson, I don’t mind assisting.” The blond offered with a shrug. “Breaking them of the habit will save their lives in the long run.”

Brian's eyes sparkled as he drawled, “I'm pretty sure, I'm not supposed to like you, for my brother’s sake. But damn it . . . I like you!”

Will smirked as he joked, “And Brian doesn't like anybody who isn't family.”

“Well if it helps you can kick my ass in your brother’s stead?” Steve stated with a grin. “I do regret what happened with Clint and fully expect Bucky to kick my ass when he returns.”
“Nah . . . I'll let Clint do it. He's . . . sneakier. Maybe you'll learn something.”

“I've got a lot of learning to catch up on,” the blond admitted with a wry chuckle. “The world is nowhere near the same as it was when I went under.”

Will spoke up as Jason opened his mouth to contribute to the conversation, “Guys . . . Chinese is going cold. Can we maybe talk and eat?”

“Preferably not at the same time, my Ma is likely rolling over in her grave at the very thought,” Steve pointed out even as he glanced at the food.

Chuckling, Will gestured around the room, “So . . . this is our family. You're welcome, at your own peril.”

“Hey if Buck considers you lot family . . . then you’re good people. So I’m afraid you may well be stuck with me, I tend to follow Bucky around like a lost puppy according to his Ma.” Steve chuckled with a wide grin.

Nudging at Sam's head when he sat beside the couch, Marina ordered fondly, “Eat something, Sammichka.”

“Motherly instincts never seem to change over the years, however it seems.” Steve teased gently as he gathered a plate and eyed the food.

“My son's relationship with food is neglectful,” she muttered, elbowing back into her lover as she snarked, “Except for that I know better, I'd swear he got it from his father.”

“I've seen worse . . . I was worse. Pre-serum I wasn't much bigger than Rene there.”

Marina humphed in the back of her throat. “You should consider yourself fortunate I did not meet you then.”

“Between you and Peggy, I would have been doomed and Bucky would never have let me hear the end of it. Especially with my tendency to fight outside my weight division.”

“Recklessness at its finest, I see. You fit in with the rest of my Misfits very well . . . my poor Misha.”

“You're not adopting Captain America, Marishka . . . bad plan all around,” Will chuckled with a roll of his eyes.

“Good thing Captain America is a smoke screen then and you just have plain, old ordinary Steve Rogers sitting in your living room,” Steve snarked as he finished wolfing the food on his plate.

Marina smirked at the behavior. “There is plenty Captain. Living in a family of supersoldiers . . . we learned long ago how to cook to feed them until they are full.”

“Sorry, it’s good. I’ve been living on the cafeteria food and MRE’s.” He stammered in apology with a wry grin.

“First lesson you learn in the Army. Eat as much as you can, as fast as you can. You don't know when your next meal will be,” Will chuckled.

“Actually I learnt that before the army, the food in the 40’s was occasionally hard to come by.” He admitted sheepishly. “At times before my Ma died, I’d give up my share to her while she was sick.”

Nodding, Will replied, “There is plenty. Have as much as you'd like.”
“I’m good, thanks. The company is a welcome change.”

“I’ll bet,” was the warm reply, before Casey chirped, “So, Jason built an AI. He named her ‘Shae’…pronounced like the first syllable in ‘Shraeger’.”

“Casey!!” Jason protested, eyes wide.

The eldest brother could only chuckle at the reaction; clearly it had not been something Jason wanted people to know. Before too long, the conversation had moved away from Steve and onto ribbing Jason for his “geekiness” - Brian - or scolding him for pushing himself too hard - Marina. And if anyone noticed the way that Steve seemed content to settle into the conversation silently, at least they were kind enough not to mention it.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) (meine) Spatzi - (my) little Sparrow (Hansel's nickname for his wife, Maria Hill)
(G) Ja/net - Yes/no
(G) meine Tochter - my daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina Petrovka)
(G) mein Falki - my little hawk (Hansel's nickname for Clint Grimm)
(G) Arger - Anger (Hansel's nickname for Brain Grimm)
(G) Sonnenstrahl - Sunshine (Hansel's nickname for Aaron Grimm)
(G) Grauchën - Little Grey (Hansel's nickname for Bucky Barnes)
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for Will Grimm)
(R) Zhemchuzhina - Pearl (one of Will Grimm's lesser used nicknames for his longtime partner, Marina Petrovka)
(R) nasedka - mother hen
(R) Tvorets - architect (Marina's nickname for her former mentor and oldest friend, Bucky Barnes)
(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for his longtime partner, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Krasnaya Komnata - Red Room (the special operations division of the Akademiya)
(R) Soldat - Soldier (shorted form of Zimniy Soldat or Winter Soldier; call sign given to Bucky Barnes by the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) ya lyublyu tebya - I love you
(R) vsegda - always
(R) Gospozha - Mistress (head of the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God
(R) Mudak - asshole
(R) Klassno - awesome
(R) Sammichka - diminutive of Sammy (one of Marina's nicknames for her eldest son, Sam)
(R)
Fated and Mated

Chapter Notes

Special thanks to my betas, lunarweather and AlekWalker. They have been awesome!!

Translations, what there are, are at the end, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Chapter 221: Fated and Mated

Several hours later, Hansel glanced down at his watch with a smile. Brian and Steve were exchanging training techniques, while Marina dozed happily from her place curled up against Will’s chest. Sam still sat the floor in front of his mother, her fingers tangled lazily in his sunny hair. Blinking in surprise at the time, Hansel cleared his throat as he pushed himself to his feet. “Adler . . . it is very late. I had hoped to take the good Captain somewhere, to show him something.”
Will glanced at the Captain, asking, “If that’s all right with the Captain . . . I should probably wrangle Marina into bed soon anyway.”

“Yeah, sorry. Time got away from me,” Steve admitted sheepishly, pushing to his feet he collected the sketchbook before moving to where Hansel waited.

“That happens when one is enjoying companionship and good food,” Marta replied, a soft blush in her cheeks as she grinned up at the tall blond. “Sorry about my husband . . . he’s really a softy, honest.”

Aaron slouched, arms coming up across his chest as he pouted adorably, “I am not a softy. I am a grumpy man.”

“Whatever you say, darling,” she agreed, leaning over to press a warm kiss to his cheek.

Grumbling even as he wrapped his arms around his wife, Aaron glowered up at Steve, he insisted, “Don’t fuck up, okay? When you see my brother again? I hate it when he’s so far away.”

“Trust me when I say I’ve learnt my lesson and if I haven’t I’ll let you lot take it outta my hide.” Steve promised with a wry grin.

“Ooooh . . . bets on whether or not Steve could beat Will? Anyone?” Brian asked, perking up as he looked between his brothers.

“Wait . . . clarify that. Are you betting on Steve winning or on Will?” Jason asked curiously, eyebrow cocked upwards as he looked at his brother.

“Duh . . . Will,” Brian replied, to which the rest of the younger brothers announced, “No bet!”

“I get the feeling I’m missing something there,” Steve glanced to Hansel brow arched curiously before he continued “Besides my hand to hand seems to consist more of hand to shield.”

Hansel smiled proudly at his eldest son, amused by the sharp blush coloring Will’s cheeks, as he explained, “Will has never been beaten. He has been injured, of course, and even fought one-handed, but he has always prevailed in the end. I have never seen him laid low in a fight . . . training, real or otherwise. It is a source of continual aggravation for his brothers.”

“That no one can beat him?” Steve asked a little confused “I’d have thought that would be something to be proud of.”

“Only when it is not them whose faces he is grinding into the mat,” Hansel agreed, still laughing as Will ducked his head behind Marina’s hair. “And even then, it is not something mein Adler himself is proud of, only his brothers.”

“It’s something to be proud of in a way, means he’s more than capable of looking after his family.” Steve stated with a shrug. “Nothing to be ashamed of.”

“Adler was built by the Army . . . to be stronger, faster, and better. The strengths and skills he attained from this . . . they are nothing he sees pride in. Nevermind the fact that he worked hard to take those advantages and improve himself with them,” Hansel sighed in a low tone, glancing back towards where Will was engaged in conversation with both of his sons. Whatever catastrophe had happened earlier between them, the two brothers seemed to be on good terms once again with each other. “He breaks my heart, Captain . . . his only happiness lies in Marishka and his brothers. I do not even think he would find happiness in his job, except for the fact that he feels useful in it.”

“Makes sense, he never asked for what was done to him so doesn’t like to show it off.”

“And while that may be so . . . it does not mean that he should not take pride in the things he has learned.”

“Maybe it’s just not in him to be prideful, he does what he needs to do to get his job done and come home to where he gets to be himself. Where no one judges him.”

Hansel’s jaw ground together as they disappeared from the house, closing the door behind him. “I do not think it has much to do with Adler himself . . . and everything to do with what Ross has done to him. It is hard to find happiness in anything, when hyu are groomed from infancy to be the perfect soldier.”

Glancing to the German as they walked Steve’s shoulders tensed, mouth going to taut as he spoke through clenched teeth “I don’t want to know what this Ross did to your boys while trying to replace me . . . do I?”

“I doubt it . . . though I feel hyu should know, just so hyu can be prepared for the rest of what hyu will learn about the extents to which people will go to emulate hyu. My sons are not the only experiments . . . though their success rate is a much higher percentage than the rest.”

“So even while dead they were still using me as a propaganda tool so to speak and trying to create more.” He shook his head with a huff “Dr Erskine was very selective when he chose me, I doubt this Ross was that thorough.”

“Mein Sohne are the only ones he was able to create from scratch. The rest . . . they were enhanced, such as hyu were.” Glancing over, he asked, “Do hyu remember Vincent?”

“The medic right? There was something deadly in the way he carried himself.”

“Has anyone told hyu about 09/11? What happened here?”

“Yeah, apparently someone decided my history refresher course was best started with wars and terrorist atrocities. Two planes crashed into the Twin Towers right?”

“Vincent is the youngest of four brothers; his brothers pushed him through medical school . . . he did not want to be a firefighter as they had been and his brothers did not want him to waste his potential either. It was this, that saved his life. He was working at the ER, when the Towers fell, all three of his brothers inside doing their jobs and trying to save lives. He enlisted almost immediately following that. While he was in, he was selected as a candidate for a procedure, that would make him enhanced . . . a better, faster, stronger soldier.” Frowning, he sighed, “Of the twenty participants in the program, Vincent is the only survivor. He escaped, while the rest were put down due to becoming too dangerous and unmanageable.”

“The powers that be can’t seem to leave well enough alone.” Steve muttered with a shake of his head.

“That can’t have been easy for him. He was surely friends with some of the other nineteen.”

“Ja, he was. Legally, he is dead. He cannot even tell his brothers’ widows that he lives. His girlfriend, Detective Chandler, she found him . . . vowed to protect him. But my Jason . . . he snoops when he is bored.”

“That’s the tech right? The one whom if I recall correctly still has my shield?” Steve inquired to be sure he was thinking of the right brother. “Somehow I suspect it’s ingrained in all your sons to snoop in some form or another.”

Chuckling, Hansel agreed, “Hyu are probably right. Jason is the Department Head for Research and Development for S.H.I.E.L.D. Before that . . . he was a detective for the NYPD. He convinced Chandler, our dear Catherine, that the secret she was protecting was too much for one woman. She brought Vincent to that home, during Adler and Tochter’s annual Memorial Day barbeque; he was deployed on his first assignment for S.H.I.E.L.D. less than four hours later.” Looking back with a sharp tug of his mouth, he breathed, “He and Marta saved my grandson’s life; without his blood, Marta could never have created the antidote. And Sam would have died.”

“Antidote to what?” Steve asked cautiously, eyes flicking sideways to the older man as he awaited the answer.

“Believe it or not . . . zombies,” the German responded with a wry chuckle.

“This world got a lot weirder while I slept,” the blond chuckled with a shake of his head.

“Ja . . . that is quite the understatement.” Clasping his hands behind his back as they walked, Hansel considered, “They are not the only experiments. The Rage Virus in London; Owen and the Regimen; Aaron and Outcome; Bourne and Treadstone; Vincent and Muirfield; Blackbriar; Cahill; Dr. Bruce Banner and the Hulk . . .” Looking to the Captain, he concluded, “HYDRA and what they have done to my sister.”

“HYDRA is still around?” Steve’s jaw clenched at the information no one had thought necessary for him to know; he’d essentially given up his life to stop them. The last portion of Hansel’s comment had him frowning though “What they did to your sister? I thought you said she was ‘sleeping’?”

“She is . . . but when one has access to a beautiful, immortal young woman . . . better men than HYDRA would have been tempted. Her body is young still . . . fertile . . . and capable of bearing children . . . specifically a son.”

“They violated her? For their own means, turned her into breeding cattle?” Steve hissed, the mere thought of what had happened upsetting him immensely. But what he felt, it wasn’t the run of the mill anger he felt on someone else’s behalf for an injustice done. No this was different . . . this was a raw, roiling ball of fury coiled deep in his gut. His entire body tensing and thrumming with sheer outrage. Some part of him was aware that this was unusual, the rest of him was of the opinion he didn’t care.

“Ja . . . we cannot find the boy. Adler has been hunting for him for two years now and I have looking for longer than that. I do not even know if he still lives.” Looking up as they approached Medical, Hansel allowed a small smile to curve his lips as turned to the Captain. “Come . . . there is someone I would like hyu to meet.”

“Lead on,” Steve easily fell into step with Hansel, blue eyes scanning the hallways of Medical and memorising the route they took.

As they moved together along the hall, Steve could feel something pulling at him. It felt kind of like a hook had gotten caught behind his heart and was pulling him inexorably along. Not that he was fighting it very hard . . . he was more than content to find out what it was at the end of the string. Reaching up, he rubbed absently at his chest as he followed behind Hansel, taking in the features of the nurses around them. Most of them seemed to flinch at the sight of Hansel, or turn away quickly when they saw him coming. “What’s wrong with the nurses?”

“What do hyu mean? I see nothing out of the ordinary,” he replied, taking a right and nodding briskly at the doctor standing against the wall.

The man opened his mouth to protest, before just sighing heavily and waving him off. Steve could swear that he heard the man mutter, “Why should I even bother? He’s going to do what he wants anyway. Damned Grimms.”

“‘Damned Grimms’?” he repeated in surprise, turning to look at Hansel in question. “I get the impression you’re not well liked here?”

“Nein . . . not really,” he chuckled in agreement. “My sister . . . I told you her sleep is cursed. Only her True Love’s kiss can wake her. We had hoped we would find him by now, but . . . we have been looking for him since we rescued her. But no one who has come has felt the pull to her, that my Maria felt to me.”

“What kind of pull?” the Captain asked, striding a little faster and pulling ahead of Hansel slightly. Hansel’s mouth opened to instruct him to turn, and watched in surprise as Steve took the correct hallway before he could be told. Cocking his head slightly, Hansel felt a well of hope surge through him, even as he clamped down on the unwilling suspicion creeping through him. Lingering behind Steve, he watched the younger man lead the way through the hospital, seeming to be completely unaware that Hansel was several steps behind him and not leading the way as he had been.

Steve was the first to pause at a door, blinking a few times. After a moment, he twisted to look back at Hansel, more than a little confused to be ahead of him. Sounding more sure than he looked, his fingers twitched as he resisted the urge to reach for the doorknob, insisting, “We’re here.”

Taking a deep breath, Hansel stared at the familiar hardwood for a long moment before nodding in reply, “Ja . . . we are here.”

Pushing open the door and waving Steve ahead of him, Hansel replied, “Steven Rogers, I would like hyu to meet . . . my sister, Margaret Huberta Kuhn.”

He moved into the room as if on autopilot, blue eyes wide as he took in the sleeping beauty on the bed before him. The breath whooshed from him suddenly as though he’d been struck a physical blow, leaving him breathless and struggling to fill his lungs. Eyes wide, he stammered out, “She looks like an angel.”

Hansel chuckled, “She would fit in well with Fury’s Angels, yes. She may look angelic while she sleeps, but I have seen her break a man’s nose with her forehead.”

“Remind me not to piss her off when she wakes then.” Steve replied with a grin, “But that’s good, that she can defend herself I mean.”

The German offered acknowledgment of the statement as only a single nod, his mouth pulling down as he sighed, “If she wakes.”

Coming to the side of the bed, Steve watched her face as he asked over his shoulder, “You never told me . . . what did the pull feel like?”

“She could not stay away from me, though heaven knows she tried. According to Marina, who was there, Spatz did not truly think she would wake me with a Domroschen kiss. They had been joking about it, and Marina had dared her to try. Ergo, her surprise when I opened my eyes at the touch of her lips on mine.”

“A kiss? Just like the fairy tales?”
“Yes . . . HYDRA . . . they referred to her in their files as ‘Dornroschen’ . . . it means Sleeping Beauty. I can only imagine how many men, HYDRA tried to have wake her.”

Steve frowned, looking uncertain as he confessed, “This is probably going to sound really stupid . . . but as we were walking the halls something felt like it was tugging at my heart. And the knowledge of what was done to your sister . . . I can’t quite describe the anger I felt.”

“Hansel have felt a pull to Gretel? Hansel are sure hansel were not imagining it?”

“For lack of a better way to describe it . . . it felt like a fishhook behind my heart and the line tugging incessantly at me. Then when I saw her I felt as though Bucky had driven that metal fist of his into my gut and forced the wind from me.” Steve said sheepishly, one hand lifting to scratch at the back of his neck as his eyes flicked from Hansel to Gretel and back.

Those robin’s egg eyes were very serious as he stared at the Captain calmly. “She is my sister. I would give the world to have her wake and stand at my side once more. But I . . . I confess . . . I am frightened by this so called ‘pull’ of hyurs. What if hyu are only imagining it?”

“I don’t . . . it’s hard to explain. The tugging was there even before you mentioned it. If you would like to see whether or not it is similar to what AD Hill felt, we can do that.”

“Wake mein Spatzi now? When she has clearly slept long and well? No . . . I have real fear of only one person . . . and she would be my wife.”

“No . . . I didn’t mean wake your wife. I meant wait and see whether or not I keep winding up back here without consciously doing it.” Steve explained.

Hansel could no longer hold it back, exclaiming, “Hansel truly were not aware were hansel?”

“What do you mean?”

“Hansel led the way to this room, without ever having been here before.”

“No, I . . .” Once again, Steve looked confused.

“Believe me I was very much aware of following hansel to my sister's room.”

“I didn't . . . I just followed it. Let it take me where it was pulling me.”

Hansel frowned, along, “And it led hansel here.”

“Yes.” Steve confirmed, his gaze falling to Gretel again.

The German moved to the side of the bed, reaching out to take Gretel’s hand in both of his own. “I love my sister . . . it has been torture to be without her at my side for so long.”

“I can relate . . . though it’s likely far worse for you right now with her being so close and still so far.”

“Yes . . . to have her with me and still unable to stand at my side where she has always been. I miss her.” Mouth twisting, Hansel chuckled sheepishly, “I do not see myself being patient enough to wait and see, as you suggest.”

“Then what would you suggest? She is your sister after all.” Steve inquired with some embarrassment over the conversation.
Hansel frowned as he looked down at his sister. The sight of her so silent and still . . . it never failed to make his heart jerk deep in his chest. Despite ten years of the same picture, his mind rebelled to see her so quiet. “Are you an honorable man, Captain?”

Steve blinked in surprise at the question, before replying cautiously, “I would like to think so, sir.”

Bending to press a warm kiss to his sister’s knuckles, Hansel laid her hand on the bed beside her and stepped back. “I will be in the hall. I trust you to treat my sister with honor. But . . . if you are of a mind to . . . I would ask you to wake my sister if you can. She has been silent for long enough.”

Staring at Hansel’s back as he exited the room Steve pondered the heartfelt request from the older man. He knew all too well what Hansel was feeling. Crossing to the bedside Steve stared down at Gretel’s sleeping face, she looked so peaceful that he couldn’t resist stroking one hand over her hair. His fingers moved to trace down along her cheekbone and jaw, bending down over her sleeping form Steve pressed a chaste kiss to her lips.

There was a moment of perfect stillness before there was a huge intake of air and her eyes fluttered open. For a long moment, the two stared at each other before she spoke in rough German, tone low and husky with disuse.

Steve frowned; he didn't know the language and it was apparent, she was getting frustrated with him. “Uh . . . Herr Kuhn . . . help!?”

Gretel’s whole body went right as she demanded, “Kuhn?! Hansel?! mein Bruder?!”

“Yes,” Steve stammered uncertainly, not sure whether to keep her lying down or assist her in sitting up. His eyes flicked to the door again as he called “Herr Kuhn . . . your sister is awake.”

Hansel appeared at the door, eyes wide and disbelieving as he stared at his sister. “Gretel?” he breathed, as he stumbled to her bedside.

Straightening Steve reached one hand out to Hansel’s shoulder, he used the grip to guide Hansel to the head of the bed where he stood before moving to the foot of the bed. Eyes flicking curiously between the siblings as the weight of the situation dawned on him and what he’d just done.

There was fire in the woman’s eyes as she barked at her brother, clearly demanding answers in their shared language. Hansel answered as much as he could, before flicking his eyes to Steve and insisting, “English, Gretel . . . we are not in Deutschland any more. They speak English here.”

Steve gripped the end of the bed as he looked between the siblings once more before clearing his throat. “Ma’am, Herr Kuhn . . . did you want me to leave you two be and go inform your family of this new development?”

“No, thank you. You woke her . . . you have every right to remain here.”

“Yeah, about that. I don’t think she was too happy when she woke up to a stranger hovering over her.” He admitted scrubbing one hand through his hair. “I couldn’t understand what she was saying.”

Gretel cocked an eyebrow and insisted, “I asked, ‘who the hell are you?’ An answer to which, I am still waiting.”

“Steven Rogers, Ma’am.” Steve supplied with a shy smile.

“And for what purpose, were you kissing the dead, hm?” she asked sturdily, her eyebrows furrowing as she took in his sheepish expression . . . and the blush creeping up the back of his neck.
Hansel blew out a breath, as he scolded, “Hyu were not dead, Gret... if hyu were dead, we would not be speaking now.”

“Semantics,” she snapped, eyes starting to take in the room before turning to her brother, taking in the unusual attire of t-shirt and denim jeans under a long black leather jacket... the only thing she vaguely recognized at all. It wasn’t the one she remembered, but it was close enough. “Vhat are hyu wearing?!”

“Good to know I’m not the only one who has that reaction to this time,” Steve mumbled quietly more to himself than the siblings.

“And who are hyu!? Hyur name tells me nothing! Vhat are hyu here for!?” she demanded, having heard his voice though not his words.

“He woke hyu from the curse, Gret... he is hyur match,” Hansel replied, a small amused grin on his face.

He stared at Gretel for a moment with a shrug and slight nod at Hansel’s words. “Your brother was kind to me and when we were coming here I felt a pull. When he explained the situation, I offered to try and bring you back to him.”

“Hyu offered?” she deadpanned, cocking an eyebrow at him, before turning back to her brother and snapping at him in a scathing tone in brisk German.

“Gretel! We speak English... unless hyu are around Adler or meine Tochter, that is rude!!”

“TOCHTER!?” she screeched, eyes going wide. “Vhat the hell have I missed!?”

“Two hundred years, give or take a decade,” Hansel replied calmly, a small smile on his face as her eyes bugged out in reaction.

“Don’t forget the ten sons,” Steve chimed in with a slight shrug “Better to tell her everything now before she’s faced with them in person.”

“Ten sons!? Mein Gott in Himmel... Hansel, what have hyu done?” she breathed in shock as she stared wide-eyed at her brother.

“Not entirely sure he did anything Ma’am. Your brother slept like you did and certain unsavory elements conducted experiments using his genetics.” Steve offered by way of explanation, a slight scowl forming on his face as he recalled his conversations with Hansel.

“Conducted experiments... they are not human!? Hansel... why do they still live?” she demanded, eyes terrified and uncertain of what she was being told.

“They are not evil, Gretel. I swear it. They are good people.”

“He speaks the truth. They are good people with kind hearts who had no say in how they came about.” Steve said adamantly.

Gretel opened her mouth seconds before Aaron bolted into the room, shoulders heaving as he breathed. Clearly he had run hard and run fast to find his father, “DAD!! Come quick!”

“What is it, Sonnenstrahl?”
“It's Marina! She's in labor!”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for his eldest son, Will Grimm)
(G) mein Sohne - my sons
(G) ja - yes
(G) Tochter - daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina Petrovka)
(G) Spatzi - little sparrow (Hansel's nickname for his wife, Maria Hill-Kuhn)
(G) Dornroschen - sleeping beauty
(G) mein Bruder - my brother
(G) Deutschland - Germany
(G) Mein Gott in Himmel - My God in Heaven
(G) Sonnenstrahl - Sunshine (Hansel's nickname for his son, Aaron Grimm)
Hey guys. I hope you enjoy this!

No translations, though I do have the usual words in the chapter. Let me know what you think!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 222: Complications

It had been an awesome day. Only one hot call, no warrants and Team Three was on inventory duty that month. Currently, he and Spike were hanging out, joking and laughing in the SUV as they patrolled. The rest of the team chimed in occasionally . . . mostly because they were giving Sam crap about the absent Jules.

“Shut up guys! She's scary okay . . . especially when she's sick,” Sam insisted with a fond roll of his eyes. It was still a secret from the team as to why she was ill. Even still, he all but glowed on the inside about it.

Spike glanced over at the blond laughing, “So . . . when are we getting wedding bells, anyway?”

Sam glanced over with a cocked eyebrow. “You remember my Ma is pregnant right? It’s been a rough pregnancy and she can’t fly. And it’s not a terrible drive, but it’s not short either; she’d be miserable in the Jeep.”

The Boss spoke up then, “After your sisters are born then?”

“Most likely . . . so another month at the earliest.” he replied, ignoring his phone as it buzzed in his pocket for the third time. He’d been getting plagued with telemarketer calls and Jules would never call him on shift.

“Are you two gonna be okay to wait that long?” Ed asked curiously.

Sam chuckled, “I’m not getting married without my parents. So yeah . . . I’ll be fine.”

“What about Jules?” Lou asked cautiously. He well remembered the confrontation between Marina and Jules all those months before.

“Ma and Jules are . . . iffy. But Ma is civil for the most part. She hasn’t forgiven her for hurting me. Ma’s mind of overprotective,” he insisted absently as he silenced his phone once again without looking at it.

Spike glanced over and frowned, watching Sam move his hand from the pocket holding his phone. “Everything okay? That’s like the fourth time you’ve shut that phone up.”

“Yeah . . . telemarketers. They’re making me crazy.”

It was a moment later that a voice came over the comms . . . one that didn’t belong on comms. “Glad to know I make you crazy, Sam. Damn it!! Answer your chertov phone!!”

Sam blinked, asking cautiously, “Uncle Jay?”

“No, it's your conscience speaking,” was the dry retort.

Sam’s Team Leader, Ed Lane, was clearly unimpressed by the snark, his tone dry as he inquired, “Who’s conscience? We can all hear you.”

“Everybody’s . . . either that or I’m God,” was the swift snark reply.

Sam rolled his eyes, “Uncle Jay . . . I’m at work. What are you doing?”

“Trying to get a hold of you obviously. You wouldn’t answer your phone so I had to resort to hacking your comms.” Jason replied with a heavy sigh.

Spike spoke up then, “Which reminds me . . . how did you do that anyway?”

“What!? Like it’s hard,” Jason snarked, before refocusing his attention on his nephew, “This is important Sam . . . Marina has gone into labor and your Dad is freaking out.”

Sam jolted, tone horrified. “What!?”

“We’ve just rushed her to Medical. Vincent and Marta are in with her but we don’t have any news yet. Your Dad . . . he’s not handling it at all well. The girls are a month early and he’s worried about them and your Ma.”

Greg Parker’s tone was speculative as he asked, “Define ‘not handling it well’. ”

“This is his third cigarette in three minutes,” Jason sighed heavily, clearly concerned. “Will doesn't smoke unless he's on deployment.”

Sam snarked with a roll of his eyes, “Or freaking the fuck out.”

“Exactly . . . the nurses are giving him an even wider berth than usual.” Jason responded “I sent Aaron to find Dad but I don’t think that’s going to be enough.”

“Where is Grandad?” Sam asked, reaching for his phone and staring in dismay at how many calls from family members he’d ignored. Swiping through them, he started looking up flights, hoping one would get him home as soon as possible following the end of his shift.

“We think he took Rogers to meet Aunt Gretel,” Jason replied to the question. He sighed before continuing “I called the Toronto base to have the ‘jet prepped and put on standby for you.”

Sam's eyes widened at that. “Thank you. I can be there following shift. I'm on for another four hours.”

“Copy that. Do what you have to do Sam . . . just get to Medical as soon as you land. Hopefully World War 3 won’t break out in the meantime.” Jason commented dryly.

Ed and the Boss had obviously been talking of comms cause Greg chimed on then. “How soon can you be ready to go, Sam?”

“My go bag is at work, in my locker. Once I have that, I'm golden. Why?”

“You're off shift as of now. We’ll even give you an escort to the base.”

“Appreciate the assist gentlemen,” Jason said cheerfully before his attention redirected to his nephew “We’ll see you when you get here Sam, I’ll have someone meet you at the LZ and bring you to medical.”

“Thanks, Uncle Jay. I'll see you guys soon. Don't let Dad kill anyone okay?”

“Oh we’ll definitely try. Even if I have to get Dad and Captain America to sit on him.” Jason snarked with an almost audible eyeroll.

“Wait . . . who??!” Ed asked incredulously.

“Amercian Hero from the 40’s, fought Nazi’s. Had comics and trading cards made after him.” The Hacker quipped in response.

“Exactly. He's not real. And even if he was, he'd be in his nineties.”

“And yet he doesn’t look much older than Sam.” Jason chimed wickedly with a cackle before clearing his throat. “But you didn’t hear that from me.”

Sam chuckled before along seriously, “What about Jules?”

“What about her Sam?” Jason asked curiously.
“Should I bring Jules? She is my fiancee.”

“That’s up to you Sam. I don’t have a problem with it and I don’t think your Ma is going to be in any state to comment.” Jason said quietly.

“What about Dad? What are his thoughts?” he asked cautiously, clearly concerned about his dad's state of mind.

“Your Dad as you know him Sam . . . not currently with us. The only way I can explain his thoughts at the moment are spastic, frantic, worried and he’s starting to look stressed.” Jason hummed distractedly in response.

“Starting? To look stressed?” Sam asked, well able to see his father's face at that moment. “You have a gift for understatement, Uncle Jay.”

“Trust me Sam . . . there are varying levels of stress when it comes to your Dad. This is just the beginning and given it’s related to your Mother and sisters he’s going to get a hell of a lot worse.”

“Well that's a terrifying thought,” he sighed with a groan. “Poor Medical. If the nurses didn't hate him before, they will now.”

“I think that’s already starting. Between the chain smoking, the glares and demands for news on Marishka I think Will’s wearing his welcome thin.” Jason sighed.

“Why won't they just let him in with her? That would stop the smoking and the demands. The glares, of course, aren't going anywhere until the twins are born, but the rest is fixable.”

“I don’t know Sam. We can only assume something’s going on but they haven’t told us anything yet.”

“Something's going on? Like what?! Where's Vincent?”

“Sam breathe!” Came the sharp order from Jason, there was a pause before he continued “Vincent’s in with your mother but she’s a month early Sam. At the moment they are preparing for anything.”

“I am breathing!” he snarked, throwing his hands back through his hair. “Where's Rene? He with Dad or . . . ?”

“He’s sitting here with Casey at the moment. We were all too busy trying to get here to figure out who was going to stay home with Rene.”

“Can I talk to Dad? How does he seem? He okay?”

“About as well as you’d expect. Hang on.” Jason’s attention diverted to his older brother but his voice still carried over the comms “Will, you up to talking to Sam?”

There was a moment, before Will spoke into the comm, “Sammy? You on your way?”

Sam nodded, a knot caught up his throat. “Yeah Dad . . . I'm coming as fast as I can.”

He had never heard that note in his father's voice before. That desolation and pain was yanking on every part of Sam's heart. “How you holding up, Dad?”

“Just . . .” there was a noticeable pause, before there was a heavy drag on a cigarette. “I don’t know, Sammichka. I just don’t know.”
“I'll be there soon. I promise,” the blond insisted, before there was a rushing sound as the phone was passed off again. “Jay, seriously . . . how is he?”

“Given he’s on his fifth smoke in as many minutes, I’m going to say not well Sam.” Jason commented.

“Has anyone tried to take them from him? He's gonna give himself lung cancer.”

“We’re going to put Dad on that when he gets here apparently. Unless Natasha decides to takes things into her own hands before then.”

“Yikes. How are my favorite Murderesses?”

“Looking about ready to live up to their name if they don’t hear news about their sister soon.” Jason remarked. “Nika looks about ready to throttle the next nurse who ignores her questions.”

“Nika is the hot-tempered one.”

“She’s doing her best to keep it under wraps for her sister’s sake but . . . well, things could get bloody.” Jason snarked before he yelped suddenly and muttered “What Casey?! It’s true!”

“When the hell are you gonna marry her?” Sam teased with a laugh.

“She has a helluva backswing, I'll give her that,” Jason grumbled. “Your brother wants to talk to you.”

Rene’s tone was timid as he asked, “Sam?”

“Yeah, kiddo?”

“Is Mama gonna be okay?”

Later, Sam wouldn’t be able to explain how he knew or even what prompted him to reply. All he knew was that, no matter what, everything was gonna be just find. “Yeah, Rene . . . Ma’s gonna be just fine. I promise.”

**********************

“It's Marina! She's in labor!”

Hansel blinked at the announcement, visibly startled by the news. “Vas? But she is early!? She its not due for another month at least.”

Steve was standing by the end of the bed in visible shock, shaking his head he glanced briefly at Gretel who was staring at Aaron. Every so often he saw her eyes flick to her brother as though she were comparing the two. Clearing his throat Steve looked to Aaron as he spoke “I doubt the Colonel is taking this well.”

“Understatement of the century. Jay is on the phone with Sam now; apparently he's gone through five cigarettes in five minutes. He never smokes like that . . . not even on deployment,” Aaron replied, eyes wide and frantic with concern for both his sister and his brother. “Dad . . . you gotta come.”

“Mein Gott, Hansel. He looks almost exactly like you.” Gretel’s rough husky voice broke the silence.

“Ja,” Hansel chuckled. “I hear that a lot.”
Aaron, for his part, was staring at Gretel in shock. “Bozhe moi . . . she’s awake!? How the fuck did that happen?”

Gretel arched one brow at the younger version of her brother before her eyes flicked to the shuffling, blushing blond at the foot of the bed. “Steven was kissing the dead.” She retorted with twitching lips.

“Oh . . . yeah, Maria did that to Dad too, and now she’s our step-mother. It’s weird . . . she’s kind of our boss,” Aaron snarked with a smirk.

Gretel’s eyes widened at that her eyes flicking back to her brother’s back as a wicked grin curved her lips as she inquired “Someone finally tamed him enough to settle down?”

“I’m not sure ‘tamed him’ is the correct terminology. More like, he wouldn’t stop harassing her until she agreed to marry him. He proposed with a Chinese daodao; Maria loves the stupid thing. It’s hanging in her office,” the second youngest Grimm replied with a roll of his eyes, before wincing as Jason yelled through his comm. “Where the hell is Dad!? Aaron!?”

“Yeah, Jay, I hear you . . . we’re coming! Also . . . ow!”

“Must be quite a woman to put up with my stubborn, thick headed brother.” Gretel stated quietly, her eyes narrowing slightly as the young doppelganger appeared to be talking to thin air.

Aaron shrugged lightly, as he replied, “She’s just as stubborn and thick headed as he is. Dad . . . seriously . . . Jason is about to plotz and Will is probably going to give himself lung cancer and I still have to call Clint and someone needs to call Bucky and then we have to get Sam and . . .”

Hansel bit down hard on his lower lip, even as he moved to place his hands on his son’s shoulders. “I am coming, Sonnenstrahl. Calm hyurself. But I cannot leave Gretel.”

Rolling her eyes at the statement Gretel pushed herself up, tossed the bedding aside and swung her legs over the side of the bed. Before any of the three men could even try to stop her she inched off the mattress, bare feet hitting the solid, cool floor. She managed to stay standing by herself for all of a minute before the room spun and her hands fisted in the bedding as she fought to stay upright.

Steve was there in a second, sweeping her up into his arms as she toppled to the floor. For a long moment, the two were silent and shocked as they stared at each other, Gretel’s fingers clutching the collar of his shirt as her eyes searched warm blue. “Thank hyu,” she insisted, eyes still wide as she stared at him.

“You’re welcome,” he replied, a soft blush painting his cheeks. “I did the same thing when I first woke up. It takes a little bit for your legs to come back to you, but they will.”

“That is good to hear. I have lain idle too long.” Gretel stated quietly. Her head tilted slightly as she studied Steve’s face, shoulders and arms, before her lips twitched in amusement and her eyes brightened “Come brother, let us go. I believe Steven here is a suitable replacement for Edward for the time being.”

Hansel’s eyes slipped closed as he began muttering to himself. “As hyu say,” he muttered, with a roll of his eyes before turning back to his son. “Come . . . take me to hyur Bruder.”

Aaron nodded, glancing at his father for a moment, before turning to bolt from the room. It was only after he was gone, that Jason asked in Hansel’s ear, “Who the hell is Edward?”

The German’s tone was a low growl as he replied, “Her troll.”
The entire family blurted at the same time, “TROLL!?”

Gretel frowned at her brother as he too appeared to be talking to thin air. “Be nice Hansel . . . Edward used to pull your body cart if you recall.” She snapped briskly.

Will’s tone was absent as he asked, “Normally, I would really want to know what she’s talking about, Dad, but right now? I just can’t bring myself to give a damn.”

Brian chirped next, “I can . . . what’s a body cart!?” Which of course, prompted a heavy sigh and a grunting explanation from the former witch hunter himself.

“I fear my brother may be possessed Steven.” Gretel whispered as she still scowled at her brother’s back as they moved after the bolting doppleganger. “He never used to talk to himself.”

Steve chuckled as he shook his head, “He’s not talking to himself, Ma’am . . . he’s talking to his sons via comm. It’s um . . .” here he paused, clearly stumped on how to explain it, before replying, “It’s complicated, but it lets people talk to one another over long distances. It’s in his ear, so you can’t see it. They all have one.”

“Oh that would have been handy when we were hunting,” Gretel chimed before blinking “Ma’am? It is a bit late to be that respectful after kissing me while I slept, is it not?”

The blond’s cheeks flamed brilliant crimson as he ducked his head. “Well . . . I . . . um . . . No? I don’t believe so. You have not given me permission to use another, and it is clear that you are not happy about the kiss in question.”

“Still you may call me Gretel. My brother will tell you I am very independent and often anger easily. Isn’t that so Hansel?”

Hansel’s tone was fondly exasperated as he called back over his shoulder, “Understatement is a gift you possess in spades, Gret.” About then, they reached the end of the hall, and Hansel slammed to a stop in shock. His tone was equal parts worried and horrified, as he breathed, “Mein Gott in Himmel.”

Gretel had been about to speak when her gaze found several faces almost identical to her brother’s. Her mouth opened and then shut before she blurted “Mein Gott, they all look like you.”

“Ja . . . they are my clones,” he agreed, eyes scanning over the occupants of the room, before apparently landing on the one he was looking for. “Excuse me.”

Striding further into the room, he moved quickly to the one fumbling in his pockets, a half-finished cigarette dangling from his lips. Steve and Gretel both watched as he reached out and snatched the cigarette from his lips, before taking possession of the small box the younger man had pulled from his pocket. “That is enough, Adler. I will not see hyu kill hyurself when Marishka is in such need of hyur strength.”

Those eyes were mossy grey, features pale and distraught. Despite her initial inclination, Gretel felt her heart go out to the young man who was clearly so worried. Strong, capable hands came up to shove back through his hair as he all but keened, forced to focus on what was happening without his self-imposed distraction. “Dad . . . they won’t let me see her. They won’t tell me anything. I just . . . I need to know she’s okay,” Will begged, suddenly looking much younger than Hansel could ever remember. Will had always been the strong one, the steady one . . . he had never been allowed to break down before. It appeared that the prospect of Marina’s loss was enough to break through all of his usual walls and leave him more vulnerable than Hansel could have ever imagined.
There was a moment in which Hansel debated his next course of action. However, this was his son. And while Hansel had never been particularly demonstrative before, in this case ... it was something his son desperately needed. Reaching out, he gripped the Colonel’s shoulders and pulled him into his embrace, offering a safe place to shatter for awhile until he could get himself back under control. The eldest Grimm resisted for all of a moment, before he sagged into the embrace and whimpered.

One of the German’s hands came up to cradle the back of his son’s head as he murmured, “She will be all right, Adler . . . have faith. She will not leave hyu . . .”

“You don’t know that,” Will gasped, fingers clutching his father’s shirt in a death grip.

“Ja . . . I do. She loves hyu . . . she will fight like hell to stay with hyu.”

Steve turned to look at Jason, blinking slightly at the sight of the teenager seated between the man and his girlfriend, Casey. “Has anyone said anything at all?”

“No . . . nothing. Nika’s threatened a few people and so has Brian. Will’s been slowly but surely melting down, as you evidenced by the mess you see before you,” the hacker snarked, with a wave in his brother’s direction, before looking up at him. “We’re Grimms . . . they don’t like us around here.”

The teenager whimpered slightly and leaned into Casey, “I want my mama.”

Gretel frowned at that piece of information, clearly that was far from normal to not be told anything. The young boy’s cry twisted like a knife in her heart as she turned her head back to Steve, one hand swatting at his shoulder firmly as she huffed “You are not a Grimm. They will answer you or by Gott they will answer to me.”

Steve nodded in agreement. “I’ll go find out what I can, Jason.”

“Thank you,” Jason agreed with a compressed smile and a firm nod. “Will needs something, or he’s gonna rip this place down to the foundations.”

“You are not moving Steven. Move before I make you.” Gretel pointed out with a fierce scowl.

Steve chuckled as he turned towards the nurses’ station down the hallway, teasing, “You’re very bossy, you know. Considering I’m carrying you around like your own personal litter.”

“You were the one who picked me up if you’ll recall,” Gretel huffed with a roll of her eyes as she grunted “Edward never complained when he had to carry us.”

“I’m not complaining, simply pointing out a fact of your personality, I would not have expected,” he laughed, eyes wrinkling and a broad, handsome smile on his face. Arriving at the station, he felt his face go flat as he arrived just in time to hear one of the nurses tell her colleague, “Damned Grimms are multipying . . . we’re all fucking screwed.”

Gretel’s scowl deepened at that comment, her hands clenching in the material of Steve’s shirt as she growled in a heavily accented tone “Mind what you say about my brother’s family.”

Steve’s eyes were blazing as he hissed, “How dare you?! You are a disgrace to your profession. I cannot imagine that nursing has changed all that much, since my mother was a nurse. I certainly cannot see it having changed enough to allow you to speak so ill of your patients, or their worried, terrified families. Their sister, lover, daughter and friend is in a room, fighting for not only her life but the lives of her newborn daughters. And you’re denying them the comfort that comes from knowing whether or not she still lives, because of your personal feelings!? How dare you!”
Setting Gretel gently on the edge of the counter, he braced his hands on the edge next to her and leaned over into the woman’s face. “You will tell me the latest news regarding Marina Petrovka, or I swear to God . . . I will see you fired and disgraced. You will never work as a nurse again.”

“And that is far nicer than what I and my brother shall do to you.” Gretel pointed out with a wicked grin, her eyes alight with the same fire they used to hold while she and Hansel hunted.

“Considering she has a troll, I wouldn’t test her if I was you,” Steve agreed.

Five minutes later they were back in the waiting room, both of their faces grave. Jason stood at the sight of them, his hand on his nephew’s shoulder as he asked, “What is it? What’s wrong?”

“They said Marina has something called placenta abruptio?” Steve replied cautiously, eyes twitching over to Will. He blinked at the sight of a young blond man with Hansel, the two working together to calm the Colonel down. He had a feeling his news wasn’t going to make that chore any easier.

“They’ve rushed her into the OR for an emergency C-Section . . . she’s lost a lot of blood.”

Moments later, the information caught up to Will and he let out a heart-wrenching moan of anguish. “No!” he begged on a sob, knees failing and his body crumpling to the floor, the blond catching him tightly and easing him down gently. “Please . . . God, no!”

Surprisingly, the blond was the only one in the room who didn’t look worried. There was a resolute calm on his face as the man held the Colonel close and promised firmly, “She’s gonna be okay, Dad . . . I promise, they’re all going to be just fine.”

Chapter End Notes

runs like hell from the army of pitchforks

Enjoy!
Chapter Notes

peeks from hiding

Enjoy!

runs away again
Ward’s eyes were huge and frightened as he watched Rumlow straighten up from where he’d been leaning over him seconds ago. The man gave him a sickly charming smile and reminded him, “Just remember who you are . . . and where your loyalties lie, yeah?”

The younger man hissed as Rumlow smacked the back of his hand against the heavily bandaged knee, causing his body to go tight with pain and tension. “Yeah . . . I remember.”

“Smart kid,” the man announced, with a brisk nod before he pulled a pack of cigarettes from his pocket and lifted one to his lips. “See ya around, Ward,” he tossed back over his shoulder as he left the room - and a rightfully terrified agent - behind him.

Letting his eyes fall closed, Grant slumped back into the mattress, one hand stretching towards the knee. He’d screwed up the joint on a mission about six months ago, and now that he was basically stuck here, he’d finally gotten it treated the way it should have been then. At this point, the agent was secretly convinced that Dr Keller was conspiring with Agent Petrovka - Marina - on all the different ways they could keep him in the hospital and off his feet for as long as possible.

The surgery had been yesterday and it throbbed on any given moment. Rumlow’s action had turned that throb into a screeching roar. Taking long, deep breaths in through his nose, he fought with his own body to control his pain. He was still several hours from his next dose of oral pain medication, though he did still have the morphine pump to manage any breakthrough pain he experienced.

Turning a stink eye on the stand, he glowered at it for a moment; he hated the damn thing. Marina was always triggering it for him, when she could see that he was being stubborn. He’d never tell her, but knowing she cared enough to offer him relief when he knew he needed it but refused to take it . . . it was battering against everything he had ever known.

Hence Rumlow’s little visit.

Ward was aware of his value to STRIKE . . . to Garrett; they never let him forget it. Squeezing his eyes hard, he punched down into the mattress as hard as he could. “Fuck,” he muttered, feeling tears linger in the corners of his eyes. He’d never regretted the choice he’d made when Garrett had offered it to him, but damn if he wasn’t regretting it now. He’d been such a stupid kid, desperate for any kind of paternal guidance and affection. What he wouldn’t give to go back and kick his own ass for being such an idiot.

Just then, there was a soft knock at the door and Ward jolted. “Agent Ward?” came the timid voice of the young nurse who had been tending him since the last shift change.

Pushing himself backwards, he used the heels of both hands to shove the evidence of his tears out of his eyes. “Yeah . . . I’m decent!” he called back, moments before she pushed open the door to his private room . . . one more benefit of being under Marina’s direct protection.

“You okay? Your vitals took a big spike,” she asked, eyes scanning over him as she tried to account for the change in his readings.

“Yeah . . . knocked my knee against the railing,” he lied with a shaky smile.

“That’s what the morphine is for, Agent Ward . . . breakthrough pain,” she reminded him with a fierce frown, coming over to trigger the switch for him.

“No!” he insisted, one hand flinging out to stop her. “Please, I don’t want it. I’m fine, really.”

Her hand hovered over the switch, eyes taking him in solemnly. They flicked to the monitors around his bed and then to his pleading features. Taking her hand back, she sighed heavily with a single nod. “All right. I’ll let it go, just this once. Please be careful. You have a long recovery coming at you with that knee; don’t screw up all of Dr. Matthison’s hard work before you ever get to rehab, okay?”

“Promise,” he agreed, sagging back against the pillows in relief.

Moving to the door, the girl paused there for a moment, her hand clutching the doorjamb as she watched him. She was clearly tossing around something in her head, and for a moment it looked as though she wouldn’t say anything. “Hey . . . you know Agent Petrovka, right? She’s in here with you all the time.”

Ward frowned, pushing himself up a little bit as he cocked his head at her. “Yeah? What about her?”

Biting down on her lower lip, she glanced out into the hallway before turning back. “I could get in a lot of trouble for telling you this, but . . . she’s in labor. And it doesn’t look good. I thought you’d wanna know.”

It was like someone had dealt him a ham-fisted blow to the solar plexus. He gawked at the nurse, attempting to heave in air and unable to through the giant knot in his throat. His mouth worked, trying to come up with something to say, before he finally blurted, “I need to go.”

“You can’t,” she argued with wide eyes. “You’re not weight-bearing on that knee yet!”

“Then get me a pair of crutches or something . . . I can’t just sit here.”

“She’s been rushed into surgery. What do you think you’re gonna be able to do?”

“I don’t know . . . but she’s been kind to me when few people in my life have been. I can’t just . . . lay here while she could be dying.” His head snapped up in horror as he demanded, “The Colonel!”

“He’s here and pissing off the maternity staff,” she agreed with an amused smile. Glancing into the hallway again, she considered for a moment before nodding in agreement, “All right . . . I’ll get you some crutches. But if you even attempt to put weight on that knee, I’ll . . . I don’t know what I’ll do, but you won’t like it. Okay?”

“Yeah, I get it, I promise. Please.”

“Give me a minute. I’ll be right back. I need to find a stop for your IV port too, so that we can hook it back up when you’re back in bed,” she sighed with a roll of her eyes. As she turned to leave, Ward could have sworn he heard her mutter, “I’m gonna get in so much trouble for this.”

She returned a couple of minutes later setting the crutches to rest against the side of the bed, moving around to the IV he watched as the nurse made quick work of detaching the IV and putting the stopper into place. “There we go Agent Ward. Now to cover my own behind I’m going to escort you to maternity. When you are ready that is.”

Taking a deep breath, he forced himself to push himself around so his legs hung over the edge of the bed. “Can I have them, please?”

“Ooh manners . . . who knew. Most agents just deem to give us lowly nurses orders and demands.” She teased with an amused grin as she made her way back around the bed, collecting the crutches in the process and stopping beside him with them resting on the floor in front of him. “Your weapons, Sir.”

“Thank you,” he replied, before frowning, “Even the Grimms?”
“Personally I have no issue with the Grimms . . . they’re good people. The rest of my colleagues are scared shitless of them for one reason or another.”

Grant tucked the braces under his arms then hopped gingerly to the ground. “Having met the Colonel, I can sympathize. But even when I didn't deserve it, Marina, I mean Agent Petrovka, has always been kind to me.”

Nodding as she settled one hand in the middle of his back she giggled “You’re a ballsy one calling Agent Petrovka that; only family uses her name. I imagine the Colonel is likely wearing his ‘murder face’ up in maternity currently. As a matter of face, I’m pretty sure most of the nurses with issues against the Grimm got themselves transferred up there thinking they’d be able to avoid them.”

He gave her a lopsided grin as He inquired, “How’d that work out for them?”

“Not well apparently. I imagine the entire family that is on base currently is up there and rumor has it Captain Rogers has awakened their aunt from her Sleeping Beauty curse,” she gossiped with a wry grin and a slight shrug “Half the nurses with a grudge against the Grimms are just shooting themselves in the foot career wise.”

Fumbling a little bit as he tried to get his rhythm, he asked, “Career-wise? What do you mean?”

“The Grimms have Fury’s ear and their father is married to AD Hill. You fuck with them and you’re essentially asking to end up assigned to the crappiest assignments in existence.” She pointed out her head turning as he stumbled. “Take it easy, you fall on your ass and injure that knee and we’re both in for the Grimms’ wrath . . . or Dr Keller’s.”

“Not sure the Grimms would care if I hurt myself. And Dr. Keller would likely cackle like an evil mastermind to have another reason to trap me here,” Grant muttered with a roll of his eyes as he steadied himself out and started down the hallway at a better pace.

“Agent Petrovka wouldn’t be sneaking you food to fatten you up if she didn’t care. Same as Dr Keller; if he’s keeping you here it’s because you need to be here medically.” She pointed out with an eye roll.

Glancing at her with a lopsided smile, he asked, “Surgery on a knee that’s been healed for six months is medically necessary?”

“Healed doesn’t mean fixed right or even well. I saw the scans before your surgery; you would have had problems in a few years bearing your own weight if you didn’t get it fixed eventually,” she scolded, leaning over to push the button for the elevator.

Huffing he focused on moving himself into the elevator and putting his back to the wall, letting it support his weight. He hadn’t expected the short distance to wipe him out as much as it had.

“Whatever you say . . . you’re the nurse, right?”

“For another couple of years at least,” she replied with a smirk as she hit the button for maternity, head cocking to study him with a frown. “I think coming back we might need a wheelchair depending on your energy levels.”

“Not a chance in hell. I will not be so weak I can’t move myself where I want to go . . . or don’t want to go.”

“You’ve been hanging out with Agent Rumlow and his crew,” she muttered with a shake of her head as the doors opened to the maternity level and the sight of several flustered nurses scurrying past. “The Grimms strike again.”
Ward flinched hard at her scolding mutter, a well of shame and guilt surging upwards in his gut. “I’m sorry.” Looking out the elevator, he straightened and crutched out. There was a fierce frown on his face as he asked, “What the hell?”

Looking along the hall towards the nurses station the nurse’s eyes widened as she pondered aloud “I wondering if they’re fleeing from the Grimms or an angry Captain America and a 200 plus year old witch hunter.”

“That was . . . oddly specific,” he replied with a furrowed brow.

“You hadn’t heard the rumors about the Grimms’ father and his sister?” she asked curiously.

He shrugged lightly, as he forced himself to move, head down as he watched where he was placing his crutches and foot. “I’m STRIKE . . . I don’t get a lot of the gossip, unless someone thinks it’s relative to the mission.”

“Pretty sure the fact that the man and his sister have been in a cursed sleep for two centuries and are the Hansel and Gretel in the fairy tales is relevant gossip as it were.” She pointed out before frowning at the assembled Grimms.

Grant looked up, blinking to see a familiar blond head bent over the head of another blond boy, this one at least a decade younger, who was clinging to him with a death grip. “Sam? Sam Grimm!? I thought you were in Toronto?”

The man’s head jerked up and he blinked as he took in the hobbled agent before him. “Grant? Yeah, I was . . . what are you doing here!?"

Grimacing as he crutched over, he replied, “Checking on your mom. I just heard . . . is she okay?”

The woman swatted at Grant’s shoulder, pointing to the empty chair with a firm “Sit down before you fall down. Sam, good to see you not coming in blown to hell for once. Do me a favor and make sure he stays put.”

“Hi Miranda. Yeah, I can do that. I’m not going anywhere for awhile.”

“Good, I get the feeling this is going to be a long night so I probably should try and save my fellow nurses before they get themselves shot.”

Sam smirked at the huffing tone of her response, before glancing at Grant, brilliantly blue eyes catching on the tightly wrapped knee. “What the hell did you do? You’re the most accident prone field agent I’ve ever met.”

Grant scowled at his friend, and opened his mouth to protest. However, before he could speak, another voice boomed, “What the hell have you done!? That patient is post-operative and should be in bed, Reyes!”

Miranda flinched at the scatching tone in the voice of the post-op ward’s head nurse. She’d been kind of hoping the battle axe was drunk in her office and wouldn’t notice their absence for a while. Turning on her heel and standing tall she stated firmly “I’m doing my job, Ma’am.” The ma’am was utterly sarcastic as she cocked her head and continued “He wanted to find out how Agent Petrovka was doing and was adamant he was coming one way or another. I thought it prudent he be escorted to prevent any further injury.”

“And just how did he find out about Agent Petrovka in the first place, hm?” she demanded, hands on hips as she glowered at the smaller woman. “I highly doubt one of the damned Grimms came to tell him, seeing as the only one who ever visits is the snake herself.”

Miranda’s lips twitched in amusement as her superior literally stuck her foot in her mouth, laughter eventually bursting free as she shook her head and asked, “You do realize that you just insulted the entirety of the deadliest family in S.H.I.E.L.D to their faces, right?”

The Colonel’s tone was ice cold as he spoke from behind the woman. “And my partner . . . to mine.”

The woman’s whole body locked up, horrified at the realization that the entire family was watching her with the kind of razor focus they were renowned for. Rotating slowly on her heels, she backstepped at the stone-faced fury written across that implacable face, eyes burning a molten silver into her features. “Colonel . . . I didn’t mean it the way it sounded, really . . . I just . . .”

“Shut your mouth, before I shut it for you,” Will barked, hands clenched tightly. “You should feel immensely grateful that the only reason I’m not ripping your insignificant ass into tiny shreds right now, is because I don’t have the patience or the energy for it at this moment. My VIPER may be dying . . . you are an annoying bug on the bottom of my shoe. Do I make myself clear?”

Miranda shot a glance back towards Sam and Grant both brows rising as she fought to still her laughter at the head nurse being thoroughly chewed out by the irate Colonel. Jabbing a finger in Grant’s direction, the man continued, “As for Agent Ward, my Marishka has made her claim on him very clear. He has every right to be with the rest of the family . . . this is where he belongs, not isolated and worrying alone. At least here with us, his family can offer some companionship and solace.”

Ward rocked backwards at the statement, awe and concern warring across his face in equal measure. Even Garrett had never claimed him as family before, and Garrett was the closest thing to a father figure Grant had ever really known. Glancing at Sam, he asked in a hushed undertone, “Did he mean that?”

Sam cocked an eyebrow at the other man, with a slow nod. “Dad rarely says anything he doesn’t mean.” Glancing up at Miranda, he teased, “You look like you’re enjoying this.”

“Oh immensely . . . I’m tired of copping the blame for her mistakes.” Miranda whispered in hushed tones with an eyeroll. “Who do you think was responsible for your last run in with a needle while you were conscious?”

Sam shuddered hard at the word, a dull fear creeping into his features as he replied, “I knew it wasn’t you, that’s all that matters to me.”

“I have enough brains and self preservation to wait until you’re unconscious.” Miranda retorted with a wink.

“Good plan,” the blond agent agreed with a roll of his eyes. Eyes flicking to Grant’s knee, he asked Miranda, “Should that knee be elevated?”

There was a roll of her eyes as she agreed, “Definitely, but will he? Is another matter entirely. Once your father is done tearing the battle axe a new asshole I’m going to ‘suggest’ you all move to the staff lounge. It’ll be far more comfortable.”

“Thanks Miranda,” he insisted, leaning over and grabbing an empty chair. Dragging it over, he positioned it in front of Grant and ordered, “Get it up . . . or I’ll tattle on you to Ma.”

“Evil,” the darker agent muttered, using both hands to lift his leg and lay it across the seat of the
About then, Vincent arrived at the door of the waiting area, still wearing his bloodied scrubs and reaching up to pull his cap off his head. Sam straightened at the sight of him, trying to read the man’s face. “Dad . . .” he called insistently, nodding his chin in the medic’s direction.

The Colonel whirled and caught sight of Vincent. Grant watched as he went even paler than he had been, and he staggered. Jason was there in an instant to catch him, moving so quickly the agent had even seen him move. “Vince . . .”

The young trauma doctor smiled kindly at the older man, coming over to wrap his hand around Will’s bicep. “She’s okay . . . she’s asking for you.”

There was a harsh gasp as Will sagged, eyes slipping closed in relief. “Slava Bogu . . . the girls?”

Catching the man, Vincent helped Jason get the Colonel into an empty seat. Crouching in front of him, the doctor continued, “No problems. They’re every bit their father’s children . . . strong and resilient and completely unaffected by their ordeal,” Vincent chuckled with a fond roll of his eyes. “If only the nursing staff could say the same,” Miranda quipped with a roll of her eyes as the head nurse slunk off while the Colonel was distracted. “Congratulations, Colonel on the arrival of your daughters.”

Smiling at the woman, Will agreed, “Thank you, Miranda. Also I’ll be recommending you for a promotion, if you’re up to it?”

“If it gets me out from under that incompetent, drunken battle axe . . . most definitely.” She replied with a warm smile. “I hate to see the way your family is treated by some of my fellows.”

“Actually, I’m thinking about you taking her job,” the man chuckled, before turning to Ward, “How are you? Marina is gonna be pissed if you’ve gone and injured yourself again.”

Ward shrugged, suddenly self-conscious at the attention. “I’m all right. It only hurts a little.”

Vincent snorted hard at the statement, snarking, “You’re a terrible liar for a spy, Ward.”

Hand coming up to ruffle the agent’s dark hair fondly, Will turned to Vincent and insisted, “I want to see her.”

“I know. Come on . . . let’s go see her.” Glancing around the room, he insisted, “No more than four at a time, not including the Colonel. She’s tired and she needs to rest. Deal?”

“Wait just a minute,” Miranda butted in rifling through the pocket of her scrubs before thrusting a stick of gum into the Colonel’s hand. “Chew that . . . you smell like an ashtray.”

Chuckling, the man accepted the stick and unwrapped it, shoving it into his mouth quickly. “Thank you.” Moving to his suit, he started to strip off his coat, tie and dress shirt next, leaving him in a clean black undershirt and his slacks. The discarded pieces were tossed haphazardly over the back of the seat where Grant’s foot rested. “All right . . . Sam, Rene and Ward . . . you’re up first.”

Ward blinked, stammering, “Sir? Are you sure?”

“Yes, I’m sure. Let’s go,” he insisted, before turning to Vincent and insisting, “Lead on.”

“Don’t argue with the man, Agent Ward. Just get on your feet and use those crutches . . . if Sam tells me you didn’t I will sedate you when you get back into bed. Either that or hit your morphine dose depending on my mood and your antics.” Miranda stated one brow arched as she jutted her thumb after the retreating medic and Colonel.

Sam stood and leaned down to offer Grant an arm, “Come on . . . they’re gonna leave us. Rene . . . go.”

The teenager nodded and bolted, as Ward reached up slowly, accepting the offer and the slow steady pull to his feet. Fitting the crutches under his arms, he nodded, “We better catch up, or they’re gonna leave us.”

Sam nodded, slapping his shoulder gently before rushing after his father with Ward crutching after him. They arrived just in time to see the Colonel move into the room. “Zhemchuzhina?” he asked cautiously, momentarily distracted by the twin bassinets by the bed.

Marina’s head turned slowly to face the door, her eyes glittering as she caught sight of her partner. “Mishka . . .” she breathed, one hand coming up to reach out for him.

Reaching out, he linked his fingers with hers. One moment, he was standing at her bedside staring down at her and the next he was crumpling into her arms. Sam bolted, guiding the fall to the mattress so that his father’s bulk didn’t jostle his mother, causing a warm grin from Marina. “It’s all right, Sammy-honey . . . I can’t feel it anyway,” she promised, free hand coming up to squeeze her son’s wrist, before her arms wrapped around her lover’s shoulders and guided him into a more comfortable position. His nose buried in her throat and his body curled around her, huge and heaving sobs wracking his frame as he clutched to her, her hands sweeping in gentle strokes through his hair and along his back. “I’m all right, Misha . . . I’m okay.”

“I thought I was gonna lose you,” he whimpered into her skin, burrowing just that little bit closer.

“There is no power in this world strong enough to take me from you . . . not today, not tomorrow, not ever. Where you go, I’ll follow . . . never further from you than this,” she vowed, bending her head just enough to press a warm kiss to his forehead.
Beloveds
Ten year old Project One winced as the door clicked shut behind him, the sound disproportionately loud in the silence of the room. It was just after midnight and he was only just returning in order to get some rack time before his 0430 wake up. Despite the fact he was still up, the rest of his meager family was currently asleep and he refused to wake them. With the addition of the newest project to the barracks three weeks ago, sleep had been hard to come by lately.

Taking a deep breath, he forced himself to relax, allowing Ross’ Project One to slip into the background and bringing Marina’s Will to the forefront of his consciousness. It wasn’t often that he allowed himself the freedom to be his true self, far from the “Perfect Soldier” the General hoped for. The distinction between One and Will did nothing to ease the nightmares but at least it made him feel more human.

At least for the short time he allowed himself.

He moved quietly into the main common room, booted feet all but soundless on the concrete floors. His hands reached up to tug at the knot of his tie before he froze, suddenly aware that he was being watched . . . by something other than the habitual cameras. The soft murmur of a baby caused relief to flood through him, his head turning to take in his brothers’ longtime caretaker and his newborn brother - the one Marishka had named “Clinton Francis” . . . the one Ross called “Five”.

It shouldn’t have been a surprise to see Marina sound asleep in the rocking chair, her feet still moving against the floor to keep the rocker in motion. Clint, however, was awake and active, little hands waving in the air and feet kicking against his swaddling as he fussed. Desperate not to wake the woman, Will’s finger came up to press against his lips as he whispered, “Sssh . . . it’s okay, Clint . . . it’s just me. It’s Will.”

The baby gurgled loudly, before a babyish giggle erupted from his lips, clearly recognizing the name. Grimacing, Will’s eyes flicked upwards to take in the sleeping woman. “Come on, Clint . . . Marina’s exhausted,” the boy admonished softly, crossing the floor to stand beside the chair. “Let her sleep, okay?”

Kicking excitedly at the prospect of a new devotee, the three week old continued to kick and squirm in her arms as he cooed at his brother. Will bit down on his lip hard as he took her in; the bags under her eyes were a clear indication of Marina’s exhaustion, as was the fact she had barely stirred at Clint’s fussing. She needed the sleep. But the young boy had never held a baby as young as Clint before. He was a quick study though . . . and he’d watched Marina cart around three of his infant brothers since he was two. Surely this wasn’t as hard as he was imagining it to be.

Tiptoeing closer, Will bent and carefully lifted Clint into the cradle of his arms, hand cupped carefully to support his head as the child soldier tucked the infant close to his thin chest. Quicksilver eyes flicked to take in Marina’s features, a little surprised to see her still sleeping. It was clear she was tired . . . more than even Will had realized.

It was about then that he felt the grasp of a tiny hand pulling on him. He looked down just in time to watch the baby yawn, face screwing up adorably at the action as he flailed outwards. Both of Clint’s tiny hands were caught in the lapels of Will’s uniform, snuggling a little closer as his lips smacked together sleepily.
A small, fond smile slipped across Will’s lips at the action, his free hand moving to tuck the blanket around his brother a little tighter. “That’s it, little brother . . . close your eyes now,” he murmured in quiet Russian, moving away from the rocking chair and into the middle of the room. Cradling his brother against him, he swayed back and forth as he bounced his knees the way he’d seen Marina do countless times before, when trying to soothe her charges to sleep. “Let Marishka sleep . . . she’s had a hard day,” the little boy murmured, ever changing eyes fixed on his brother’s face as the baby started to drift to sleep.

Stroking tender fingers over the baby fine fuzz covering Clint’s head, Will watched in awe as Clint yawned once more before his eyes started to flicker and flutter as he drifted away. Smiling fondly, Will began to hum the melody from some song he could almost remember from his babyhood . . . eyes adoring as Clint finally slumped against him, perfectly asleep. “Good night, baby brother,” he whispered as he lifted the little boy upwards to press a soft kiss against his forehead. “No matter what . . . I’ll never let anything happen to you. I promise.”

A little less than an hour later, Marina found the two of them lying in Will’s bed, Clint’s tiny body cuddled against his brother and his fingers still clutching tightly to the older boy’s uniform. Leaning against the doorjamb, the Russian smiled.

Even in his sleep . . . Will was humming . . . bayushki bayu.

January 3, 2010

It had been thirty three years to the DAY since the first time he’d held his baby brother in his arms. But as Will Grimm bent to lift his fussing younger daughter into his arms for the first time, that moment came back to him in a rush. That awe and pride in his brother was multiplied a thousand fold by the knowledge that he had had a hand in the creation of this perfect miracle . . . the love he had for his Marina and her love for him had gifted them both with not one but two beautiful little girls.

“Allo Princesa,” he breathed, as he lifted the little girl against his chest, cradling her to him and using his free hand to support her head. “I’m your Papa . . . and I am so excited to meet you.”

Marina had passed out about ten minutes ago, exhaustion sapping her remaining strength and sending her deeply into healing slumber. Her hand was wrapped around Grant’s wrist in a death grip, pretty much forcing him to stay put. The specialist seemed a little alarmed by the action, nervous eyes flicking between Marina, Sam and the Colonel himself. Finally Sam rolled his eyes and snarked, “Would you chill? Ma wants you here . . . so here is where you stay. Okay? Stop overthinking it.”

Grant’s eyes narrowed as he snapped back, “Most people don’t want me around at all, so forgive me if I’m having a little trouble wrapping my head around the idea.”

Rene was curled up on the mattress next to his mother, her other arm wrapped loosely around his shoulders, two fingers twitching occasionally in an unconscious caress over his shoulder. The teenager’s eyes flicked between the two bickering men, before twirling to see his father. There was a soft surge of jealousy to see Will standing in the middle of the room, one of his new baby sisters cradled against his chest and his body swaying back and forth as he hummed an unfamiliar melody. Glancing at Sam once again, Rene gathered his nerve and asked timidly, “Dad?”

The Colonel looked up instantly, a soft smile on his face as he asked, “Yeah baby?”

The endearment almost caused him to lose his resolve, but there was a small nagging part of him that needed to get it out and see how the pieces laid when the dust settled. “I’m 15 now.”
“I know,” the man agreed, a bemused smile on his face as he watched the boy gather his courage. “I was there for that birthday party.”

White teeth bit into his bottom lip as Rene carefully extracted himself from Marina’s embrace and sat up, wrapping his arms around his knees. “I’m old enough to fend for myself now... if you need me to go.”

That earned a startled blink as the Colonel repeated cautiously, “Go? Go where, love?”

“I don’t know... I’m sure there’s some foster family here in S.H.I.E.L.D. that could take me. The twins can have my room then.”

That fond smile was back, infinitely gentle and adoring, as Will moved to take a seat on the bed next to his youngest son. Shifting the baby effortlessly into the crook of one elbow, the officer reached out with the other and pulled Rene into his embrace. “Rene... my darling boy who I love... no one is going anywhere. This is your home and this is your family; it wouldn’t be complete without you. Dong le ma?”

“But... you have the twins now. You don’t need me around, taking up space, anymore.”

“Oh yes we do,” Will promised, smoothing his palm tenderly over the boy’s blond hair. “Here’s the funny thing about love, Rene... it doesn’t matter how much you give to someone, there’s always more for someone else.” Lifting his hand, he caught the teenager’s chin between his thumb and forefinger, forcing the child to meet his eyes. “You are my SON. The birth of your sisters does not change that. We didn’t adopt you, or Sam, to replace something we couldn’t have. We adopted you both, because we needed you and we loved you and we wanted you. Okay? No one is going anywhere... most especially not you.”

“You promise?” the young man asked timidly.

“On my life, I swear it. I love you... that hasn’t changed.”

Nodding shakily, Rene used the heels of his hands to brush at his tears before leaning over to get a better look at the baby. “What’s her name?”

“Your mother and I are undecided as of this moment. We’ve narrowed it down to three... but which one gets discarded and which name is assigned to whom is a little up in the air.” Leaning over, he nudged his son’s shoulder gently with his own, “We had thought we had another month to figure it out.”

Sam grinned, leaning forward on his elbows against the edge of the bed, as he asked, “What are the three you’ve narrowed down to? I’m assuming they’ll have the patronymic, right?”

“Yeah... there’s no translation for William in Russian, so we’ve opted for using the Russian form of Michael - ‘Mikhail’ - instead,” Will agreed with a smile. “The only one we’re one hundred percent sold on is Valentina; Valentina was one of your mother’s sisters before she was killed. Marina wants to honor that relationship and I am more than okay with letting her.”

“And the other two?”

“Yekaterina was one and Galina was another. Personally, I think we’re going to decide on Yekaterina; your mother’s seamstress was one of her dearest friends before she was killed and that was her name.”

Rene’s face twisted up in dismay as he questioned incredulously, “Galina? That’s a girl’s name?”
Will chuckled as he nodded, “It is. She’d probably be Lina or something similar for short.”

“We already have a ‘Cat’,” Sam reminded his adoptive father, smirking at the memory of his best friend Vincent’s fiery and fierce girlfriend, Detective Catherine Chandler.

“Da . . . we do. So we were considering Katenka as a nickname instead. But, as I said, nothing is set in stone until we’ve chosen between the last two.”

It was about then that Jason stuck his head through the door, tone a conspiratorial whisper as he asked, “Is Vincent in here?”

Cocking an eyebrow at his brother, Will drawled curiously, “No . . . what are you up to?”

The hacker grinned brightly, before stepping fully into the room and throwing the door open further. “All right everyone . . . hurry . . . before we get busted.”

There was no protest from the Colonel, only a weary roll of his eyes and a snort as the entire family currently on base - including all Misfits BUT Vincent - trekked into the room and found places to lean, sit, stand or kneel around the room. Smirking at the middle Grimm, Will scolded, “When Vincent finds out about this . . . it was your fault.”

“I take full responsibility,” the man agreed with an innocent grin, before turning to face the bed. There was concern, worry and relief in his face as he moved closer to the footboard, free hand reaching out to lay over the lump that was her left ankle. “Can we wake her?”

“I wouldn’t,” Sam replied with a frown. “You heard Vince . . . Ma needs to rest. It’s been a rough couple of hours.”

“No, I know that . . . I just was thinking that Bucky and Clint would want to see her . . . see for themselves she’s okay.”

“And how do you think that’s going to happen?” Glancing down at his watch, Will calculated quickly, before continuing, “Even at max speed, their Quinjet is still at least another two hours out. And that’s IF they left their posts the instant they got the news Marishka was in labor. Which we all know they didn’t . . . for all that we tease Clint for being such a goof and a prankster, he takes his job very seriously. They would have waited for their replacements before they ducked away.”

When Jason lifted the laptop he held in the other hand, Will couldn’t even explain why he was surprised. Bouncing on his toes with a grin, Jason replied, “I know . . . but that’s what Skype is for.”

“You're gonna Skype the ‘jet?’ Sam asked, eyebrows up as he watched his uncle set the laptop down and turn it on. “Clint's flying the plane!”

“Nah . . . they'll have the autopilot on by now, and be worrying in the cargo hold.” Turning to Will, Jay asked calmly, “Your call Will . . . you tell me what you want me to do.”

Taking a deep breath in through his nose, Will nodded once, “Make the call. We'll let her sleep for a little bit though . . . they can meet the twins.”

“Awesome,” he agreed, before his fingers set to the keyboard and he got to work hacking the Quinjet’s onboard communication system.

Sam glanced around the room, before asking, “Do I need to go free Vincent from whatever broom closet you've locked him in?”
Brian grinned at his nephew as he teased, “Vincent is fine . . . he's currently the sole attention of one of my favorite nurses.”

Narrowing his eyes lightly, Will scolded, “What did you set Miranda to now?”

“She's the only nurse any of us like. Except for the husband and two kids, I'd adopt her in a heartbeat,” Will snarked with a roll of his eyes. “Either way . . . I don't want to get her fired okay?”

“She's not gonna get fired. Vincent and the rest of the staff are more than aware of her value, seeing as none of the rest of them like US!” Natasha reminded her de facto brother-in-law.

“There are times I feel like that should bother me, but I really just don't give a damn,” the Colonel sighed with a roll of his eyes.

“It's not our fault the nursing staff hates us . . . didn’t it start with Grandad?” Sam asked from where he sat.

“For the most part . . . not that we typically make life easy on nursing staffs anyway. Sometimes hard to tell who it's who, and that's frustrating to them.”

“Isn't that what our medical files are for? Not to mention dogtags.” Sam snarked with a roll of his eyes. “Thank god Miranda pays attention.”

“Agreed,” Will snarked with a roll of his eyes. “And regrettably, common sense in some people is desperately lacking.”

“Amen to that,” came Bucky’s voice through the speakers, tone anxious and worried. “So? What's happened? Are they okay?”

“Shhh.” Sam hissed suddenly towards Jay’s laptop, blue eyes glaring at Bucky as he continued “Ma’s sleeping at the moment.”

Clint's face was suddenly in the picture, demanding, “Sleeping?! Can she do that in labor? I didn't think she could do that!!”

Will chuckled softly, straightening from where he was lifting the second twin from the bassinet, an infant tucked into the curve of each elbow. He was more than aware he wasn't in the camera field and smirked as he teased, “Deep breaths, bratishka.”

“Come on, Will!” the youngest Grimm whined. “Don't tease! Is she okay?!”

The Colonel sank slowly into the rocker provided, arranging his daughters gently before nodding at Jason. “All right . . . put them out of their misery.”

The tech smirked as he rotated the laptop and brought the three into view. There was a moment before Clint whooped, the sound excited and proud and relieved. Bucky was the only one in the frame now, but everyone once in awhile you could see the archer as he bounced around behind him, whooping and cheering and causing a ruckus. “Hell yes! I’m an uncle baby!! Woohoo!”

The former assassin’s eyes were wide as he stared at the twins, in genuine awe of them. “Bozhe moi . . . Will, they’re beautiful!” he breathed, reaching out, his hand disappearing from view as he traced their features on the screen. “They’re so tiny!”
Will’s chin dipped to the one in his right arm, replying, “This one was 16 and a half inches and 5.2 pounds.” Turning to the other, he continued, “15 and a quarter and 5 pounds even.”

“What are their names?”

“Undecided,” the man chuckled, with a sheepish shrug. “Probably Valentina and Yekaterina, but don’t quote me on that yet.”

It was about then that something shifted in the corner behind Will, and Bucky’s eyes flicked up to see Steve and Gretel. The pair were whispering to each other quietly, Gretel perfectly content to curl up against his chest, her fingers fiddling teasingly with the collar of his checked button-down. Eyes widening a little bit, Bucky blurted, “What the fuck!?”

Jason snorted hard, “Yeah . . . that happened.”

“WHEN!?” he asked in shock.

“About the same time Marina went into labor, apparently,” the tech replied, watching his older brother bow his head over his girls, feet working the floor as he rocked the chair. “Marina would probably kill me if I let you see her while she was sleeping, so I won’t. But she’s fine. The twins are fine. Everyone is fine . . . even Will, though that was a near thing.”

Clint was in front of the camera in a second flat. “What’s wrong with Will?”

“Nearly gave himself lung cancer,” was the unanimous answer from the entire room . . . which is what Vincent walked in on.

The doctor was already scolding Miranda and froze to a stop as he caught sight of the room. “I thought I said four at a time!”

“Yeah . . . cause that was gonna happen,” Brian snarked with a roll of his eyes.”

Rounding on Miranda, the medic gave her the stink eye. “You were distracting me!”

The nurse smirked cheerfully as she chirped, “Of course I was.”

“You’re lucky I like you . . . and that you’re my best nurse to deal with these idiocy.”

“I’m your only nurse to deal with them.” Miranda pointed out with a raised brow. “Everyone else goes running in the opposite direction.”

Grumbling, Vincent muttered, “Don’t remind me. I need to hire new staff.”

“Can I suggest having at least one or two Grimms involved in the interview to test their reactions first?” Miranda cheeked.

“That will be quite enough out of you,” he joked with narrowed eyes, “Out!”

The woman practically skipped away, before pausing in the doorjamb and turning back to face the room once more. “Congratulations again, Colonel . . . they really are lovely little girls.”

“Thank you, Miranda . . . for everything.”

“No thanks necessary sir. Enjoy your family . . . I’ll keep the rest of the vultures away.”

Nodding in agreement, Will turned his attention back to his daughters. And if the rest of the family was simply content to watch their brother, son, nephew, and friend adore his daughters . . . at least it was a unanimous decision.
Chapter Notes

Five in a week!! Woohoo!!! When's the last time that happened??

Thanks go to AlekWalker for being am awesome cheerleading section and helping when I got stuck. She's awesome!!

Translations at the end as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 225: Home is Where the Heart Is Marina slowly stirred from her slumber, vaguely aware of warm flesh beneath the fingers of one hand. It wasn’t until her eyes slowly blinked open and her head turned that she registered the owner of the wrist she held trapped in her vice-like grip. The dark hair atop the head resting on the mattress was vastly different than that of her light-haired boys. Her first thought wandered to when Grant had found out she was here before detouring into how exactly he’d gotten to her room.

From what she could see Grant was curled rather awkwardly within the confines of his chair, wounded knee draped over one side of the chair as his head rested on the mattress by her arm. Rolling slightly onto her side, careful not to jostle herself too much, Marina released her hold on his wrist in favor of stroking her hand through the disheveled dark hair atop his head.

Grant murmured softly, leaning unconsciously into the fingers trailing tenderly down the defined curve of his cheekbone. “Ssshhh . . .” she whispered, thumb smoothing over a small scar below his left eye. “You’re all right, Prizrak . . . my little ghost.”

Tossing his head, Grant’s eyes fluttered open slowly, disorientation clouding those dark eyes as he struggled to make sense of his surroundings. Her smile was fond and gentle as she returned her fingers to his hair, fingers scritchting gently just behind his ear. A flashfire smile ticked up one corner of his lips, his voice a low slur as he asked, “Marina?”

“Yeah . . . it’s me,” she replied, watching him quietly as she indulged herself in petting him for a moment more. It wouldn’t be long before Grant’s walls came slamming down again and he withdrew from her. As a result, she was content to revel in it for as long as he would allow. “How’d you sleep?”

“Good,” he replied with a wide smile, for once appearing content to let her pet him and keep him close.

Marina’s eyes lifted from those now familiar features and scanned the room, before redirecting to take him in once again. “Where is everyone?”

“The nurses came for the twins . . . I think the Colonel went with them. Agents Barnes and Barton have arrived at the LZ; I think Agent Shraeger and Captain Walsh went to go pick them up. Dr. Keller is on his rounds . . . Gamble and Street took Romanoff and Belinskaya to the gym to work off some of their frustration. . . your sister Vika had to go pick up her son and Agent Coulson went with her.” Frowning, he continued, “Your son Rene had homework, so Sam took him home. He promised he’d be back though, and with something for you and the Colonel to eat.”

Her lips curled upwards into a fond smile as she laughed, “Sam is a good son. He takes good care of his dad and me.”

There was a deep seated pain deep in those dark eyes as Ward winced. “He loves you very much . . . he was convinced you were going to be okay.”

“How do you mean?”

Eyebrows furrowing, he shrugged lightly, “I don’t know. He was just adamant that you would be all right. Nothing anyone said would change his mind. It was almost like . . .” here he trailed off, shaking his head as he turned his eyes down to his fingers. “. . . either way, he knew you were going to be okay. I’m glad he was right.”

She smiled fondly as she agreed, “Me too.” Her eyes flicked to his knee as he moved it from its awkward placement and propped it up gingerly on the frame under her bed. “How are you feeling, Grant?”

“Dr. Matthison said I’m healthy and strong, so he’s not anticipating any problems with me getting back to my previous fitness level.”

“Just remember the rules, da? Doctor’s orders to the letter; so no independent work outs until you’re cleared by medical, agreed?"

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed with a small smile.

Marina grabbed a pillow from the head of the bed and tucked it into her belly, curling herself around it carefully as she watched him stare at his fingers where they twisted in his lap. “Prizrak . . . are you all right?”

“Spectre? Why did you call me Spectre?” Grant asked brow furrowed in confusion as he attempted to divert Marina away from her question.

One eyebrow cocked upwards with an amused smile, a clear indication that he was not being quite as subtle as he’d hoped in redirecting her attention. Rolling her eyes, she allowed him to distract her before replying, “What’s the definition of a ‘spectre’, Grant?”

“A visible incorporeal spirit, a ghost, a phantom, or an apparition,” he recited, sounding as though he’d just read to her from a dictionary.

“Yes . . . ‘a visible incorporeal spirit’. I wonder . . . who does that sound like? Of all my boys, you would be the most solitary; we see you, but we can’t seem to touch you.” Smirking with a wink, she continued, “At least not yet.”

“Your ‘boys’? I’m not one of your boys Marina . . .” he trailed off eyes flicking back to his hands. The idea of being one of her boys was far too tempting, but he was Garrett’s asset. The man would never let him go.

The Russian’s mouth quirked into a sad smile as she replied, “Not for a considerable lack of trying. Your stubbornness reminds me very much of my Colonel’s but even my Misha has his weak point. I’ll find yours eventually, Grant . . . it’s just taking me a little longer than it usually does.” Reaching out to lay her hand over his, she asked, “Grant, my ghost, what are you so afraid of?”

“I’m not a good man Marina. There are things about me . . . you wouldn’t like me if you knew.” Grant stammered without lifting his head. He scowled at his hands not entirely sure why he told her that or how she kept managing to slide beneath his walls.

She watched him for a long time, seeing the tight shoulders and the hanging head and the guilt written into every part of him. Finally, she stretched out her hand and cupped his chin, lifting his face level with hers. Forcing him to meet her eyes, she let hot chocolate eyes peer into whiskeyed amber for a moment, before insisting, “Try me.”

“My family . . . they weren’t nice. My parent’s especially had a firm grudge against me and my older brother. Christian . . . he was jealous that Thomas was the favorite.” He paused to take a breath as he stared into hot chocolate eyes which made him feel as though he was drowning. “He wanted Mother to feel his pain so he tormented Thomas . . . but he didn’t do it himself. He was crueler than that . . . he made me do it and would then turn me in.”

“Plausible deniability,” Marina replied, understanding it even if she could feel her body trembling withpent up rage at the information. “Grant . . . look at me . . . who tormented Thomas? Honestly . . . who was at fault for the things that happened to your brother?”

“In theory Christian . . . but I’m just as much at fault. I had a choice . . . I was too afraid of what may happen if I chose to protect Thomas though.”

“There is no theory here, Grant; Christian is the only one at fault. You were afraid for yourself . . . that’s human. It doesn’t mean that you were to blame for what happened. You may have been complicit with the act, but not the intent behind it.” Reaching up to lay her finger next to her nose, she extended it a moment later and tapped the end of his. “That doesn’t make you guilty of the crime. Just as we don’t blame the gun for shooting someone, neither are you to blame for the actions you were essentially forced to take.”

“Those actions had my parents deciding to send me to military school as they occurred more and more frequently.” Grant grunted with a fierce scowl. “I left and hitched my way home with the intention of making them feel my pain . . .”

Marina interrupted then, “Burnt your parents house down . . . and ended up in Juvie. Where you were met by one John Garrett, agent of S.H.I.E.L.D. . . . who I suspect was responsible for your escape. Da?”

“Da” Grant agreed with a nod before blurtting “I didn’t know my older brother was in the house when I set it on fire . . . for the record.”

“I believe you . . . I don’t think you intended to hurt anyone.” the Russian promised with a fond smile as she stroked her thumb over his cheek.

“Garrett, he offered me a chance to be a better man . . . or so I thought. Said I could make a difference,” he mumbled, face turning into her thumb as it stroked.

“‘So you thought’? What do you mean?” she asked, eyes narrowing speculatively as she watched him literally soak in her affection like a sponge. If ever there was a poster child for touch starved, it was definitely Grant Douglas Ward. He reveled in her physical touches more than any other person in her life; and Clint had always been particularly touchy feely.

“I don’t feel like a better man . . . it feels like it did with Christian. Like I’m a tool for his own purposes.” Grant shrugged slightly; it was hard to explain and if Garrett or Rumlow ever found out he was having doubts, let alone expressing said doubts to Marina Ivanovna Petrovka of all people, his ass would literally be grass. If he was lucky, there would even be a body to find when it was all over.

“Then it’s a good thing you’ve been transferred to me, hm? My agents get the hardest jobs, because I have the best agents in the field. It’s not easy work . . . but the reward is typically worth it in the end.”

His eyes flicked away from Marina briefly as he warred with himself internally over whether or not to tell her about Rumlow’s earlier visit. The Russian frowned at the deflection, as she promised, “Anything you tell me, Grant, is between us. No one will ever hear about it from me . . . I swear it. You can tell me anything.”

“I had a visitor earlier . . . just before my nurse told me you were here.” Grant stammered. His eyes flicking worriedly back to Marina as he tried to figure out how much to tell her. “Rumlow . . . he came to remind me of my place and where my loyalties truly lie.”

“And just where is your place, according to Rumlow?” Marina inquired, tone brittle as she contemplated how many ways she wanted to rip the STRIKE commander into a dozen pieces.

“With Garrett . . .” Grant said before his lips twitched and he snarked dryly “and under his authority apparently.”

“If Garrett wants you back, he's gonna need to pry you from my cold dead fingers . . . and even then, Nick doesn't change his mind easily once it's made.”
“Don’t give him ideas . . . the Colonel would have my hide if he wound up a single parent to those little girls.”

There was a quirk to her eyebrow as she inquired, “Last I checked, Garrett was an ass but not a murderer . . .” here she paused, eyes narrowing at him before she continued, “. . . unless you know something I don’t?”

“There’s probably a lot I know about Jo . . . Garrett that you don’t. Plus he has Rumlow and Rollins in his back pocket; STRIKE is well trained.” Grant replied semi cryptically.

A noncommittal hum was Grant’s only answer, her eyes narrowed as the Russian sought to figure out the problem at hand. Finally, she asked, “Are you lying to me? About anything right now . . . and I’m not just talking about this conversation.”

Shifting uncomfortably, he deflected, “Lying? No . . . just not divulging everything. Keeping my cards close to my chest as it were as a bargaining chip?”

“And for what purpose would you need a bargaining chip from me?” Pinching his ear lightly, she insisted, “You tell me the truth and I’ll protect you, that’s the deal, okay?”

“I know . . . I’m just not ready. If I tell you . . . you’ll look at me differently and Garrett will find out.” Grant stated whiskey brown eyes darting off Marina to scan the room.

“No judgement . . . I promise. You don’t have to tell me now, but I look forward to when you trust me enough to tell me. Okay?”

“Okay . . . in the meantime? Don’t trust him, Garrett is like an onion. He has many layers.” Grant grunted quietly eyes downcast.

“I haven’t trusted John Garrett in almost six years,” Marina promised with a soft smile. “I assure you . . . that isn’t going to ever change.”

“Just . . . don’t do anything more that’ll get his attention on you and yours. He’s not a man you want to cross Agent Pet . . . Marina.” Grant caught himself before he fell back on formality thankfully; his ear likely wouldn’t handle another tweak from Marina.

One eyebrow cocked upwards even as she smirked at him. “Nice save there.”

“Sorry . . . still a little stunned and awed by the fact the Colonel claimed me as part of the family in front of the head nurse earlier.” Grant admitted with a sheepish grin.

“Oh he did, did he?” she teased with a wink, “I knew there was a reason I loved that man.”

It was about then, the door slammed open and Bucky Barnes scurried into the room. He looked equal parts relieved and worried, all but bolting to her bedside as he demanded, “Are you okay?”

“Oh seriously, Zima, it’s just a 12 inch slice through my abdomen. We’ve both had worse,” Marina scoffed with a roll of her eyes and a teasing grin.

Grant was thankful for the sudden arrival of the former Russian assassin, his eyes dropping from Marina’s face as his face slid effortlessly into his agent mask. The extra guest he hoped would distract the new mother enough that he could focus on repairing the holes Marina was smashing in the walls around his mind, heart and soul.

The once-and-future Winter Soldier took a seat on the mattress next to her hip, reaching out to grab her hand. “Come on Marishka, be serious. For once in your life . . . please.”

Rolling her eyes, Marina promised, “Tvorets . . . I’m gonna be just fine. I promise.” She turned her head back to look at Grant, free hand reaching to wrap around his wrist. “Zima . . . have you met Agent Grant Ward?”

As Marina’s hand once again curled around his wrist like a shackle Grant silently kicked himself for not trying to make a getaway while she’d been distracted. Not that he’d get very far with the crutches anyways . . . and certainly not without hurting himself again. Frankly he didn’t want a pissed off Marina or Miranda on his case over that. So really better to stay put anyway . . . at least that was his story and he was sticking to it. Lifting his gaze to look at the older man, Grant inclined his head as he spoke “Not to my knowledge Marina . . . though I’ve heard stories about the Winter Soldier.”

The sniper smirked sadly, protesting, “I’m pretty sure everyone has heard stories about the Winter Soldier. Few of them good.”

Marina rolled her eyes, glancing over at the door as she inquired, “Where’s Clint?”

“He saw Will over by the nursery and went to go tease him about fawning over little girls.”

“That could be taken . . . wrong.” Grant muttered quietly.

“Probably why, the last time I saw them, Will was chasing Clint with one of Natasha’s bo-staffs. Miranda’s fantastically amused.”

“Wait . . . they let her in medical armed?” Grant stammered staring at Bucky.

Bucky’s eyebrows rose towards his hairline as he asked in reply, “You wanna be the one to try and stop her?”

“In no state to try and even if I was I think she’d just put me back in here.”

“Entirely possible,” the man chuckled, before leaning forward with a conspiratorial grin. “Wanna know your most reliable weapon against Natasha?”

“Not sure I’m game enough to answer that.” Grant retorted glancing at Marina.

“I can tell you the answer, if you’d prefer . . . it’s Brian,” Marina sniggered, giving her oldest friend a deadpan look. “Leave the child alone, Bucky . . . your dramatics do not suit your advanced age, Tvorets.”

“Pretty sure I’ve seen him wiping the floor with the junior agents but thanks for the heads up?”

“There’s nothing quite like watching Brian and Natasha beat the hell out of every last baby agent in a line up,” the assassin chuckled, with a grin, watching as Marina’s eyes drooped despite her laughter. “Marishka . . . if you’re tired . . .”

“How can I be tired? I slept all day,” she muttered petulantly, her fingers loosening from around Grant’s wrist as she sank closer to unconsciousness.

“You were also rushed to surgery to produce two little people and also apparently missed the awakening.” Grant snarked gently.

“The awakening?” she asked head tilting back to look at him. “Whose awakening?”

Her fingers spasmed slightly, before her grip slipped completely and her hand fell back to the bed as she drifted towards slumber. Grant moved his hand to hers, wrapping it back around his wrist and settling his hand over Marina’s, his fingers tightening around hers to secure her grip about his wrist as he replied “According to Miranda, Captain Rogers awoke the Colonel’s aunt. I guess she is from a Sleeping Beauty curse?”

Her fingers twitched slightly as she frowned, “Gretel’s awake?! Why didn’t anybody tell me?” her tone was breathy and her eyes fluttered as she insisted, “Unconsciousness is no excuse for keeping me out of the loop, Zima.”

“To be fair I don’t think it entirely hit the family until after they sure you were fine.” Grant pointed out with a squeeze of Marina’s hand. “And I think she’s going to be another one the nursing staff hate. When Miranda and I arrived, I’m pretty sure she and Rogers were threatening the nursing staff for not providing your family with information on your condition.”

“If she’s anything like her brother . . . they will absolutely hate her guts,” Marina giggled tiredly, her eyes flicking downwards to where Ward was pressing her fingers into his wrist with his free hand. A small smile curved her lips as she teased, “I would have thought you’d escape once I let you go, Grant . . . not give me a reason to keep you close.”

Grant’s head ducked over their hands as he blushed. Whatever answer he’d been about to give was interrupted as the door swung open once again . . . and in came Steve Rogers, still carrying Gretel Kuhn in his arms. Bucky jolted upwards to his feet, eyes wide as Steve froze, the two best friends staring at each other in shock. It was clear that neither had expected the other to be there. Marina snickered, as she winked at Grant, insisting, “Awkward.”

“Looks like it . . . I’m missing something aren’t I?” the Specialist asked as his eyes flicked from Marina to Bucky.

Stroking her thumb slowly over the skin of his wrist, she joked softly, “Wait for it . . . you’re probably going to get a front row seat to their awkward version of make-up sex.”

“That is probably more than I needed to know.” Grant groaned his head dropping over their hands in embarrassment.

“Considering the fact that Bucky is happily in love with my Hawk and Steve is Gretel Kuhn’s apparent soulmate, there’s probably not going to be any actual sex, Prizrak.” Cocking an eyebrow, she teased in a whisper, “Your virgin is showing. I think.”

Grunting in response to that Grant never lifted his head; he was fairly certain his cheeks would be a near scarlet shade considering how hot they suddenly felt. It probably was also a bad sign for him that Marina actually knew that much about his life.

“I won’t tell . . . I promise,” she chuckled with a wink.

“How do you even know that?” He huffed chancing a peek up at the Russian.

“Process of elimination. Your childhood is not exactly littered with companions . . . there was the five years by yourself in the woods and then you joined S.H.I.E.L.D. . . . where you have gone out of your way to be solitary and alone and have made no friends . . . outside of my son. Who is happily engaged, to my chagrin, and not to you.”

“Garrett frowns upon attachments outside of missions . . . even the four legged variety.” Grant mumbled in hushed tones before shaking his head.
“Attachments are important . . . they’re what convince you to fight hard and come home. Have you never tried to make any friends? Gotten a girlfriend?” Cocking an eyebrow, she asked, “Please, for the love of all things, tell me you’ve at least been kissed.”

“To date?” Grant paused, before blowing out a sharp breath “Only on the cheek or chin.”

The woman sighed heavily, as she lifted her free hand to smooth through his hair. “My poor boy.”

Shrugging slightly he stared at Marina for a long minute considering his words before heartbreakingly murmuring “Doubt anyone would want anything to do with me anyways. I’m a screw up and just not a good man.”

Marina’s fingers reached over and tweaked his ear hard. “You are NOT a screw up. You have a 95% success rate on all of your missions. And considering that most of the ones you’ve been on have been you working injured? That’s not exactly indicative of a screw up, understood?!?”

Wincing at the tug on his ear Grant blinked in shock, stammering incoherently for a long minute before nodding with a crisp “Yes, Ma’am.”

Steve cocked an eyebrow at the interplay between the two before moving to set Gretel into a chair gently. After making sure that she was comfortable, Steve straightened and turned to face the man he still considered his best friend with a small, sheepish smile. “Hey Buck.”

“Steve,” the Soldier replied, eyes flicking to Gretel before returning back to Steve. “So . . . soulmate huh?”

“That seems to be the popular theory.”

Narrowing both eyes speculatively, he remarked insistently, “You owe Clint an apology . . .”

“I know . . . I owe you both an apology and more. I’m sorry Buck, I didn’t know how close the two of you were and in trying to protect you I was the one who ended up hurting you.” Steve replied sincerely as his gaze dropped from Bucky to Marina’s bed.

Marina’s foot moved and kicked her oldest friend hard in the back of thigh. “Tvorets . . . be nice.”

“How am I the one you’re scolding right now!?” he asked incredulously, turning back to her with wide eyes.

“Be grateful that’s all I can do at the moment,” she replied with an overly sweet tone and a toothy smile.

Steve chuckled at the bi-play between the pair, his head shaking slightly as he teased “You seem to have a habit of adopting stubborn people Buck.”

Cocking an eyebrow at Marina, he drawled dryly, “She would be the second of two to come back and bite me in the ass.”

“Oooh . . . dirty!” she chirped with a grin, “I’m telling Misha!”

“I think she’s on the good drugs.” Grant spoke up as he stared at Marina.

“Quite possibly. I also can’t feel anything below my navel, so I’m kind of surprised I managed to hit Zima in the first place.”
“Numb yet still kicking ass . . . more skill than I thought.” Grant snarked as his eyes flicked to the woman settled in the chair beside him.

“You’re just jealous I haven’t kicked yours yet,” she laughed with sparkling eyes.

“Pretty sure that makes me smart. I’ve heard your reputation.”

It was about then that Clint came bounding into the room, head bowed over the baby in his arms as he cooed in her direction. “Look at you, so beautiful . . . yes you are . . . yes you are. You look just like your daddy, which is unfortunate because everyone knows that I am the handsomer brother . . . you should hope you take after your mom. She’s definitely the looker in that relationship,” he cooed, earning a roll of his eyes from his older brother who was coming in behind him.

“You’re an idiot.”

“And yet, still Marina’s favorite.”

Steve’s shoulders tensed at the sound of Clint’s voice, turning slightly so he was side on to his possibly former best friend blue eyes flicked to the youngest of the Brothers Grimm and the baby in his arms. Clint looked up and literally froze, arms tightening around the baby as grey eyes widened at the sight of Captain America. “Uh . . . guys? What the hell did I miss?” Those eyes flicked to the side and then narrowed as he demanded, “Who the hell woke Aunt Badass!?”

“That would be me.” Steve replied sheepishly, one hand lifting to rub at the back of his neck as he looked to Clint. Hunching slightly he was sure he looked every bit like the runt from Brooklyn he’d been pre-serum as he spoke again “I owe you an apology Barton. I’m sorry . . . I didn’t know what you were to Buck.”

“I could make a snarky comment to that, but I’m pretty sure my brother would punch me for cussing a blue streak in front of his little girls,” Clint all but snarled, lightning shooting across grey eyes as he sidled to place himself behind Bucky. “So you woke Aunt Gretel . . . so what? Does that make you my uncle or something? Cause Maria kissed Dad and now . . . she’s my step-mother.”

Reeling at the comment wide blue eyes shot between Bucky and Marina before Steve’s head turned to Gretel as he stammered “Uh . . . um, I don’t know? We’re taking it slow . . . she was ready to hit me at first, until we apparently bonded over threatening stupid nurses.”

A grin flashed across the man’s face, before he laughed, “Please tell me you gave them your disappointed face? Because I’ve read stories and I gotta tell you . . . the ‘Disappointed Look of Doom’ directed on the nurses, could not have happened to nicer people.” Sobering instantly, he snapped, “Unless it was Miranda . . . you insult Miranda, I’ll turn your guts into my new bowstring.”

“Miranda was escorting me upstairs.” Grant supplied suddenly.

“I did and your aunt threatened to burn them at the stake if they didn’t inform the Colonel immediately of Marina’s condition.” Steve said with a wide grin. “They turned all kinds of interesting shades of grey and white at that particular threat.”

There was an amused tilt to the archer’s lips as he insisted, “So . . . Grant speaks . . . it’s a damned miracle. Aww . . . and he’s letting Marina hold his hand; the android is human. Good to know.”

Turning back to Steve, that smirk turned vicious as he agreed, “I think you and I are going to get along just fine.”

“I still owe you and Buck . . . though I have no idea yet how to actually repay you for what I did.” Steve said looking to Clint with a small smile. “Though now I see the two of you together . . . you’re good for him.”

That grin turned lecherous as he tilted his head in Bucky’s direction, “And good to him, I hope . . . but I’m pretty sure he’s the only one who can give me an answer on that.”

Bucky’s eyes rolled even as his cheeks flamed, “Shut it, khishchnik . . . Will, kindly corral your little brother.”

“I’ve been trying to do that for 33 years . . . you’re a lot more likely to succeed at that attempt than I am,” the Colonel replied with a laugh, as he rounded the foot of the bed and took the empty seat next to the bed, opposite Grant. “How are you feeling, Grant? That knee, specifically.”

Glaring in Clint’s direction even as his cheeks darkened Grant replied “The knee is faring better than my ears at least. Yes I speak . . . when I have something to say Hawkeye.” His hand tightened over Marina’s regardless of Clint’s teasing over the matter. For some reason he couldn’t quite fathom yet, losing that contact with Marina was scary.

Marina’s free hand moved back to smooth through his hair, fingernails scritchting tenderly against the back of his head, as she scolded her youngest charge fondly, “Behave yourself, dorogoy.” Turning her attention to her lover, she teased fondly, “Are you going to hog the kroshka the whole time? Or do I get to hold my daughters at some point?”

“What are you going to call them? I know the Colonel said earlier you were tossing up between three names.” Grant asked as he shifted on the chair and adjusted his foot on the under railing of Marina’s bed to stretch his knee.

“I want to name one of them ‘Valentina’ after my sister; considering I killed her, I think it’s only fair I make up for it in some way,” she sighed with a sad smile.

“What will you name which? Also how do people tell babies apart . . . they both looked the same earlier.” Grant inquired with a puzzled frown.

“A mother just knows,” Marina chuckled with a fond smile. “A real one anyway.”

“You are a real one. From what I’ve seen of your boys and Sam . . . you’re a better mother than mine ever was.” Grant stated adamantly, his eyes bright with emotion despite the deadpan expression on his face.

Lips compressing hard, she turned to her lover and sighed, “Remind me to arrange for some kind of unfortunate accident or something, okay Mishka?”

“Someone give the woman one of her kinder before she decides to start spilling blood, ja?” Gretel spoke up suddenly from beside Grant, one brow arched as she looked pointedly at her two nephews who were so much like her brother it was uncanny.

Clint moved forward, laying the infant on the pillow next to her belly, Marina's free hand curling around the child and pulling her close. “Oh . . . she's beautiful,” she whimpered adoringly. “Hello my little Valya . . . I'm your mama.”

Grant’s free hand lifted and brushed gently over the baby's tightly clenched fist. “Wow. I didn't realize she'd be so small.”

“They were early, ja?” Gretel inquired her eyes flicking from the baby on the bed to her eldest nephew. Her head cocked slightly as she studied the way he cradled his other daughter protectively. That in itself would have been all the indication she needed that these boys of her brother's blood weren’t in fact evil. As it was, she’d seen the way Will had shattered in her brother’s arms earlier out of fear and concern for his lover.

“About a month yes. All I care about is they’re healthy. The details mean next to nothing to me,” the Colonel agreed, fingers stroking over the baby’s cheek. “Little Katenka . . . she’s so calm. Not what I expected from a newborn child.”

“If they are anything like my brother and I, and I suspect their parents, one will be level headed and calm while the other is hot headed and brash.” Gretel hummed in contemplation as her eyes flicked between both babies “They are rather precious.”

Grant’s eyes widened as Valya’s fingers shifted and she closed her hand around his finger. She watched him with big newborn blue eyes, little features solemn and intent. “She’s holding on to me,” he announced, sounding audibly alarmed by the fact.

“So is her mother . . . do not be such a Hähnchen.” Gretel responded with a sideways glance to Grant on her left. “She is an infant and unless she is a demon-child she will not harm you, boy.”

Marina scowled, “Gretel, be nice, please . . . his walls are actually down for the moment. Don’t ruin it . . . Hähnchen!? Good grief, not likely.”

“Ask my brother dear girl, this is me being nice. Especially with people I do not know.” Gretel replied with a slight shrug. “My apologies though . . . this has been a rude awakening and will take some adjustment. I also wish Edward were here . . . someone familiar in an unfamiliar place and time.”

Marina twisted to look at her lover, insisting, “She and Brian should not be friends,” seconds before Hansel’s voice chimed in from the door, “And what am I, Gret? Chopped liver?”

“You were busy calming your son.” Gretel retorted even as her lips twitched into an amused grin “Besides you have a rather huge family of your own now, that will no doubt keep you out of trouble.”

Will snorted, “Yeah . . . okay. We’ll go with that answer. One word . . . Austria.”

“Hyr disbeliev is unappreciated, Adler.”

“But not wrong either,” the Colonel reminded his father with a grin. “You were the one who spent 500 deutschmarks on alcohol, on foreign soil, because Maria got shot.”

“Still trying to hide your feelings in the bottom of a pitcher brother?” Gretel teased with an adoring smile in her brother’s direction. “I think I really must meet this Maria of yours.”

“She is home . . . with our Minna. She will be here soon, once the Minnow has woken from her rest. She is most anxious to see Marishka for herself.”

Dark chocolate eyes widened at the baby’s name, Gretel all but twisting on the seat and dragging herself to her knees. “Minna? After the white witch?”

“I had not told them that part, Gretel, so thank hyu for that. But ja . . . I owe Mina Blanche a debt. This is one way I sought to repay it, at least in some small measure.”

“She would like that I think . . . I did not know her well, though I remember hyr fondness for her even after she died.” Gretel admitted.
Will's eyebrow cocked upwards, though for once the notoriously curious Colonel said nothing. He turned his attention onto the bed and smiled; sometime since the two siblings had begun to speak, Grant had fallen asleep, his head resting on the mattress by Valya’s head, Marina and Valya both holding onto his hands as they too slumbered. The three were all but curled together, the two adults pinning the baby in place, even as Grant seemed to seek the protection of Marina's embrace as well.

Clint spoke up from where he was sitting on top of the dresser. “Think she's gonna be able to make him into a real boy, Will? Or is the attempt doomed to fail before it's begun?”

“I guess that depends on Grant . . . and whether or not he wants to be.”

“I think she made you into a real boy, Agent Barton,” Maria sassed as she came sailing into the room, her laughing daughter in the car seat she carried with her. “And you would have been the harder chore, I'd bet.”

“I beg your pardon, but I was adorable as a kid . . . ask anyone.”

Will snorted with a roll of his eyes, “An adorable pain in my ass.”

“But still adorable,” he cheeked with a wink.

Gretel twisted again in her seat to peer closer at Clint. “You . . . I think I like already.”

“Of course you do . . . I'm very likeable. Will's the cantankerous bastard in the family.”

“Like Hansel then,” Gretel teased as she looked to her brother with a broad grin.

“Of all my sons, mein Adler is the one most like me. Thus why I impersonated him all those years ago.”

Maria groaned as she insisted, “Don't remind me. You took twenty years off our lives with that little stunt.”

“You must be my brother’s Maria?” Gretel inquired as she settled in her seat, dark eyes studying her brother’s woman intently for a long moment before her eyes dropped to the child in the car seat, a warm smile curving her lips “And your little Minna.”

“The true love of your brother’s life, Fraulein Kuhn, I assure you.”

Minna laughed brightly, hands grabbing for her father as Hansel crouched to lift the child from the seat. “Little Minnow . . .” Hansel greeted fondly, brushing a tender Eskimo kiss across the tip of her nose. Straightening, he wrapped his other arm around his wife's waist and bent to kiss her sweetly, “Not true, Spatzi. Hyu are the woman of my dreams.”

“Your nightmares maybe;” she muttered, even as she melted into him and lifted her chin into his kiss.

“No, I can assure you the women of his nightmares are far worse. You may call me Gretel; we are family after all, Schwester” Gretel watched the pair with fondness. It was good to see her brother happy for the first time in far too long . . . at least that she could remember.

Maria turned to look at her best friend, sighing at the three curled up together. “Adopting again, I see.”

“Marina wishes . . . he is not making it easy for her,” Will chuckled with a fond grin. “She'll be disappointed she missed you, Maria.”
“How is she? Be honest.”

“How is she? Be honest.”

“Once the drugs wear off and she can feel again, she'll be sore and hurting. But she's strong and healthy and in great shape; she'll bounce back much faster than I want her to, I'm sure.”

“You make that sound to be a bad thing,” Gretel observed curiously.

“Because it would not be a bad thing if Marishka took some time off to rest and recuperate,” Maria explained with a small smile. “She tries so hard to protect everyone . . . to take care of those she loves. It would not kill her to let them take care of her for once.”

Will sighed fondly as he drawled, “From your mouth to God’s ears, Maria. Because it will take at least an act of God to keep Marina at home.”

The evil grin that slipped across the AD’s face was alarming for both Steve and Gretel. Even more so when she pulled her phone from her pocket and started to dial. “That can be arranged.” Lifting the phone to her ear, it was a moment before Maria spoke again, “Fury . . . we need your help with your sister . . . yes sir . . . an Act of God at the very least.” There was a long pause before the woman grinned, “Thank you sir . . . she's in room 469 and I know she would love to see you . . . we'll see you shortly.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Prizrak - spectre (Marina's nickname for Grant Ward)
(R) Zima - Winter (one of Marina's nicknames for her oldest friend, Bucky Barnes)
(R) Tvorets - Architect (one of Marina's nicknames for her oldest friend, Bucky Barnes)
(R) khishchhnik - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for his lover, Clint Grimm)
(R) dorogoy - darling (Marina's nickname for Clint Grimm)
(R) kroshka - babies
(G) Hähnchen - chicken
(G) (mein) Adler - (my) Eagle (Hansel's nickname for his eldest son, Will Grimm)
(G) Spatzi - little sparrow (Hansel's nickname for Maria Hill-Kuhn, his wife)
(G) Schwester - sister
Downtime

Chapter Notes

Enjoy this chapter guys! It's the second to last on this mini-arc, which will feature Daryl, Doyle and Gus, at which point we'll stop briefly on the events of "At the Royal York". After that we'll jump almost 9 months.

Enjoy this! Thank you so much for all of your reviews and your awesome! You've been so amazing!

Translations at the end of the chapter, as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
The Grimm Truth
Chapter 226: Downtime

Will had learned to be silent and observant practically from the cradle. As a result, it wasn't hard to read the ley lines lying between the people in the room. Some were strengthening, some repairing and still others beginning to grow.

Gretel may have been prickly with regards to the Captain at her waking, but you wouldn't know it now, barely hours later. She sought his reassurance constantly, glancing back over her shoulder just to make sure he was still close by. As for Steve himself, he seemed content to stay close, hands braced on the back of her chair as he leaned against it comfortably. The tips of his fingers stretched every once in awhile to caress her shoulder, causing a small smile from the witch hunter as she glanced up at him.

Bucky was leaning against the dresser under Clint, the archer perched once again on the highest point in the room. The two appeared to have suffered no permanent effects from their “break” and seemed to be just as happy as they had been before Rogers had woken from his ice encased slumber. From time to time, Clint leaned forward to whisper in his partner’s ear, earning a quiet chuckle from the former Russian assassin. Will would bet his hazard pay that no one else had realized that Clint had his fingers twisted in the back of Bucky's collar.

There was a shaky truce between Clint and Steve, though the friendship between Clint and their aunt was growing in leaps and bounds. Gretel found Clint amusing, giggling like a young girl at his cheeky teasing and deadpan commentary. As for Clint, it was clear he considered his aunt to be pretty awesome, all but preening at her laughter.

Will had been genuinely concerned by the apparent end of the legendary friendship between Captain America and his former right hand man. However while there were still deep fissures there, they were slowly beginning to mend. Steve’s sincere remorse for what had fallen out with Clint had made up for a lot of Bucky's anger, as well as Clint's determination to ignore the elephant in the room completely.

His father and step-mother were sharing the same chair over by the corner, the two taking minimal part in the conversation as they fawned over Will's little sister. The baby was already completely spoiled, and it was no secret she had her recalcitrant father firmly seated in the palm of her tiny fist. He was gonna have his hands full with that once she was a little older. Not that he seemed to care in the slightest.

His other brothers were absent for the moment, as were his sons. However, the Colonel had no doubt they would be along soon enough. Marina may be the deadliest member of the family, but she was also the heart of it. They would be in to check on her soon enough. And of course, Nick would be there before long as well.

Snickering, Will couldn't help imagining the reaction Nick and Marina - and their affectionate bantering - would get from Steve and Gretel. Neither had ever witnessed their sibling bond before and it was bound to cause some dropped jaws and wide eyes.

Speaking of Marina . . . his eyes flicked to the bed, only a little surprised to see Marina awake once more and smoothing her fingers through Grant's hair. That boy was stuck with her; he really should just give up the fight at this point. She would get her way . . . she always did.

Standing carefully, he laid his sleeping daughter in her bassinet before bending to lift Valya and place her in the one next to her sister. His lover smiled at him, her eyes gleaming as she murmured, “Aren’t they beautiful, Mishka?”

He slipped onto the bed behind her, fingers finding the right knot at the base of her spine and massaging it gently. The woman grunted, eyes drifting blissfully, “You're a saint and I love you.”

“I love you too,” he chuckled as he bent to kiss the bared curve of her shoulder. “How do you feel, samaya malen’kaya?”

“Tired but bored. Worried about a few things I didn't get done before the kroshka were born.”

“Marishka,” the Colonel groaned, head dropping back as he sighed, “you just had emergency surgery. Could you spare my poor, overworked heart its premature heart failure, and take a break?”

“A handler’s work it's never done, Misha, moy lyubimov.”

“It is if I say it is,” came a new voice from the doorframe.

Marina groaned as she turned her head to the door, “No fair, Nick . . . sneaking up on an old woman, frail and infirm.”

The single eye sparkled as he joked, “So frail, you could still snap every neck in this room without ever leaving your bed.”

“Good thing too . . . I still can't feel my legs,” she agreed with a wink.

Fury glanced at Will, as visibly alarmed as the spymaster could manage. The analyst smiled, “The epidural was a little more potent than they had anticipated.”

“I see . . .” he demurred, scanning the woman carefully. “All the more reason she should be at home, resting.”

Marina’s eyes rolled as she muttered, “Sure . . . because that sounds like loads of fun.”

“Marishka,” Will sighed heavily seconds before Fury chimed in, “Who said anything about having fun?”

Steve’s eyes were wide, his jaw practically unhinged as he watched the two spies bicker with one another. The two men had met a couple of times since he woke from his slumber, and every time they’d met, Fury was professional and aloof. The all black attire and the rigid spine, hands clasped at his back while glowering through his single eye. Nothing at all like the man currently standing within the room and bantering with the new mother.

“Steven . . . close your mouth before you are cursed and frozen as such.” Gretel teased even as she twisted in her seat to study and assess the owner of the foreign voice.

“Cursed? Who’s cursed?” Marina asked, perking up curiously as Grant stirred from the bed. “Easy, Prizrak . . . you’re all right. Go back to sleep if you want.”

Gretel’s eyes narrowed at the man, taking in the cut and make of his coat. If she wasn’t mistaken, it was very similar to the one her own brother had been wearing when he appeared at her bedside after her awakening. “Is that my brother’s coat?”

“Oh contraire, my dear Fraulein Kuhn . . . your brother stole mine,” Fury grunted with a roll of his eyes.

Marina chuckled, with a grin. “You always were a little overprotective of your coat, brother mine.”
“At least I don’t kill the people who harm what I’m overprotective of.”

“That is nature . . . for one to seek vengeance for their loved ones.” Gretel stated as though what Nick said hadn’t entirely made sense to her.

Will chuckled, “Not quite to the extent Marina takes it.”

“A woman after my own heart then.” Gretel replied with a bright grin to Marina. “My brother has good taste with his adopted Tochter.”

Grant lifted his head from the mattress, asking, “Marina?”

“Hi sweetheart . . . you’re all right,” she promised, stroking her thumb over the inside of his wrist.

“New pet?” Fury snarked with a cocked eyebrow, “Seriously, Sis, are you ever going to stop adopting? I don’t have a house big enough on base to accommodate your addictive lifestyle.”

The Colonel’s eyes rolled as Ward’s eyes went wide, staring up at the Director of S.H.I.E.L.D. in shocked awe. “Ss . . . sss . . . sir!” he stammered, attempting to shoot to his feet.

“Nick! You’re scaring him! Stop glaring!” Marina scolded, as she tightened her grip on Grant’s wrist and forced him to stay seated.

Grant rounded on Marina, eyes wide, as he stammered, “NICK!? Who the hell is Nick!? That’s Fury . . . God . . . any number of really scary names.”

Fury gave the young agent his shark’s grin as he drawled, “I like this kid, Marina. He has the appropriate fear of authority. Unlike a certain Russian I know.”

“You love me,” she scoffed with a brilliant grin, as she soothed Grant back into his seat. “Please tell me you didn’t mess up your knee with that little stunt.”

“How . . . how can you talk to him like that!?” he whispered, staring at his handler with wide, awed eyes.

“He’s my brother . . . I can talk to him however I want.”

It took a moment, but eventually both Steve and Grant demanded together, “He’s your what!?”

Will chuckled, “You heard her right . . . you weren’t hallucinating, I promise.”

The blond’s eyes flicked between Marina and Fury, clearly tossing something around in his head. “So . . . who’s older?”

“I am,” Marina announced at the same second Fury replied, “She is.”

Gretel rolled her eyes, before demanding, “Okay, now for the important question, who’s God?”

“He is,” the Russian replied miserably, while the spymaster preened, “I am.” Turning to the his sister, Fury braced his hands on the footboard of her bed and insisted, “And since I am God, I am ordering you to stay home, take care of your daughters and heal. I don’t want you back at work for at least two months . . . maybe longer, depending on my mood.”

The handler looked horrified, “Two months!? But Nick!!”

“No . . . Marina, you nearly died this time. We will not lose you. Two months, that’s final.” Patting the curve of one ankle, he all but begged her, “Your family needs you, Marishka . . . so please, for their sake, take a break. Okay? The Coulsons can handle the handler pool without you for at least that long. Let them.”

Just then a timid voice spoke from the door, inquiring, “Am I interrupting something?”

Everyone turned to see Sam loitering in the doorway, with a backpack over one shoulder. “Agent Grimm . . .” the director greeted, with a brisk nod. “No, you are not.”

“Nick was just bestowing an act of God upon Marina,” the Colonel replied, a small smile flirting with the edge of his mouth.

Sam chuckled, as he stripped the backpack and held it up. “Damn . . . sorry I missed it. But . . . I brought Dad some fresh clothes.” Winking at his adoptive father, Sam teased, “You’re getting kind of ripe, Dad.”

The Colonel sighed as Marina snickered. “Yeah . . . I could probably use a shower, while I was at it.”

“Each of the private rooms are equipped with ensuites,” Grant supplied timidly, gesturing towards the door opposite the bed. “The water pressure’s actually pretty decent.”

Will teased with a smile, “Are you saying I stink, Grant?”

“Technically Sam said that, I just pointed out there were shower facilities available Sir.” Grant pointed out with a slight grin as he looked to the Colonel.

Twisting to look back at his son, he asked, “You didn’t happen to bring a towel or anything in that backpack, did you?”

Sam’s cheeks turned a little rosy as he replied, “I went through your bathroom and grabbed everything I thought you’d need; your shaving kit, your electric razor, a couple towels and some washcloths. I was going to grab you a clean uniform and then decided that giving yourself a couple days off from the uniform would probably be a good idea. So I grabbed some jeans, Ma’s favorite button down and your favorite blue tie.”

“It does seem fitting . . . if Marina has to take two months off, the Colonel should take at least a couple of days.” Grant cocked his head studying the older man with a frown before he teased “He’s looking a little frazzled.”

The Colonel’s eyes narrowed lightly as he accepted the backpack from his son and started to rifle through it. Pulling out the jeans, shaving kit and towels, he set the backpack on the floor by the bed before bending to kiss Marina quickly. “I’ll be right back.”

“She promised sweetly, hand coming up to caress over his cheek fondly. “Love you.”

Smiling at her, he kissed her once more then disappeared into the bathroom, the door clicking shut behind him. Humming happily, Marina hunkered down into her bed with a happy, sleepy grin. “Someone wake me when the babies need fed?”

“Can do, Ma . . . just get some rest,” Sam promised, as he came further into the room and sat down on the bed, his back to the footboard. Laying his hand on her calf, he smoothed his thumb over the curve of her ankle. “Love you Ma.”

“Love you too, Sammichka,” she murmured with a grin, before allowing herself to drift into a light healing slumber.

Sam smiled fondly, before turning to look at Grant. “Sup buddy? How are you feeling?”

The agent blinked in surprise at the terminology, “Buddy?”

“Grant . . . we’re friends.” Pausing, the younger blond considered the taller man before asked, “We are friends . . . right!?”

“I . . .” the agent seemed caught offguard by the question, glancing at the sleeping Marina before turning back to his old training partner. “I don’t have any friends, Sam.”

“Well, now you have at least one,” the constable replied with a haphazard shrug. “Better than nothing, I guess.”

Grant stared at Sam for a long moment, blinking slowly as he considered that. The last friend he’d had was Buddy and Garrett had forced him to shoot him. He genuinely liked Sam so he was hoping history wouldn’t repeat itself. “It is . . . I guess.” he admitted with a wry grin. “But it’s dangerous being my friend . . . just so you know.”

“Dude . . . have you met my parents?” Sam laughed brightly, “It’s dangerous just being their SON!?”

“I have; your mother breezed into my life like a force of nature.” Grant reminded with a smirk “Then proceeded to upend it to meet her specifications.”

“Yeah . . . Ma does that. There’s a reason my uncles call her ‘Hurricane’ when she’s in a mood.”

Will’s voice was muffled as he spoke through the towel he was smoothing over his face, to get rid of the rest of the shaving cream on his cheeks. “Among other things.”

Sam’s head tilted sideways as he looked out of the side of his eyes, asking, “Feel better, Dad?”

“Much . . . thank you, Sammy-honey,” he agreed, coming further into the room and lifting the backpack from the floor. Turning his back, he set the pack on the chair and dropped the towel from his shoulders onto the armrest.

Grant stiffened in his seat, eyes locked firmly on the Colonel’s scarred back even as he heard the quiet gasps from Steve and Gretel beside him. His hands fisted on Marina’s mattress as he blurted out, “What the fuck?”

His words were chorused by Gretel’s stiffly growled “Mein Gott in Himmel!”

Steve’s response was neither quiet or restrained as he all but roared, “Who the fuck did that to you?! What happened!?”

The Colonel’s shoulders stiffened sharply, every muscle in his back in suddenly stark relief as he realized the tactical error he had made. “Der’mo,” he breathed, even as he dug his shirt from the pack and pulled it over his shoulders, hiding the scars from sight. Turning to face the room, he watched his fingers work nimbly on the buttons as he asked, “I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Der’mo,“ he breathed, even as he dug his shirt from the pack and pulled it over his shoulders, hiding the scars from sight. Turning to face the room, he watched his fingers work nimbly on the buttons as he asked, “I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“You are your father’s son.” Gretel rumbled eyes narrowing in Will’s direction as she added on “Stubborn.”

“There are worse things to be,” he insisted, with a small sad smile, finger flipping up his collar and looping his tie around his neck. In moments, the tie was tied loosely around his neck and he leaned back against the wall, arms folded as he stared at the floor. “Maybe instead of asking general questions, you attempt to get a little more specific?”

“The scars on your back Neffe, how did you get them? Who did that to you?” Gretel asked, crossing her legs onto the chair as she leant forward hands braced on her knees.

Fury’s tone was a low rumble, as he spoke first, “His name is Thaddeus Ross.”

“Nick!” Will growled, eyes narrowing as he glared at his boss.

Maria chimed in next, “He’s a general with the United States Army . . . he built them. Will’s real name isn’t William Grimm, it’s . . .”

There was deep resignation in the man’s tone as he sighed heavily, “Project One. Ross’ perfect soldier.”

“Now my brother’s words make sense.” Gretel mused with a scowl firmly in place on her face. “Why does this man still live? No one who causes that much pain and suffering deserves mercy. I will kill him.”

Will bolted up from the wall, real terror sketched across his features as he insisted, “Ross is untouchable . . . the safety and freedom of my brothers depends on no one finding out who or what we are. You can’t!”

Steve Rogers was gone; Captain America stood in his place instead. “You can’t be serious. You’re just going to let him get away with what he’s done to you?!”

“My brothers, Marina and my daughters are the only things in this world I would give my life for. I will not put them in danger, because I want something as flimsy and unimportant as revenge. It won’t change what happened to me, and it won’t stop the nightmares . . . I have to protect my family.”

“Is your family truly safe with him still out there Neffe? Are your daughters safe? If he found out where you and your brothers were . . . would he not go for the innocent babes first?” Gretel pointed out with an arched brow, her knuckles white as her nails bit through the material of the scrub pants and into her knee.

“Why do you think we don’t talk about it?” Will asked with a frown. “Fury knows, Maria knows, Dad . . . Marina . . . Marta . . . Casey . . . family. And I’m going to tell you a secret; most of the Misfits? Are other experiments; they have just as much reason to fear Ross as we do.” Will’s face hardened into stone, causing Gretel to instinctively withdraw backwards as he suddenly seemed to loom in place. “And if he ever tries to take my girls . . . there is no world in which he’d be safe. I’ll kill him myself.”

“Wait . . . is that why Ross assaulted Marina in Harlem?” Grant inquired wide eyed.

Taking a deep breath in through his nose, Will’s eyes drifted to look at his lover, her eyes softly closed in sleep. “Da . . . he recognized her. She had been the caretaker for the project . . . she was the one who got us out, who helped us escape. She took care of my brothers; I was 12 . . . there wasn’t much I could do to help. I did the best I could, but . . . I wasn’t really able to do much until I enlisted and could start sending my paychecks home.”

Steve’s fingers clutched the back of the chair tightly as he growled, “What did Ross do? How did you get those scars?”
“Does it matter?” he asked calmly, quicksilver eyes flashing through colors as he watched the American legend fume.

“I would think that would be obvious to you Steven.” Gretel spoke up, head cocked as she studied her nephew’s ever changing eyes curiously “And it is obvious William does not wish to relive it by discussing it further . . . ja?”

Grant’s teeth worried at his lower lip as he considered the mental picture seared into the backs of his eyelids. “Based on the marks and the kinds of scars, I can guess at what made them . . . and if you were 12 when you escaped? None of them should have been used on a child. Not even my parents were so cruel.”

The Colonel’s eyes drifted closed as he lifted his hand to pinch the bridge of his nose. “Specificity, Captain. Which scars did you want to know about? As you saw . . . I have rather a lot of them. Not all of them physical.”

Before Steve could answer the question Gretel twisted and sent a hard punch into her soulmate’s chest “You do not answer that. Tell us of which ever ones you feel most comfortable talking about William.” Gretel responded her accent thick and heavy in her seriousness.

“I’m not sure there are any I feel comfortable with, Aunt Gretel,” Will replied with a soft grin.

Hansel frowned, asking, “Which of them would make them less homicidal, Adler?”

“There aren’t any of those either,” he chuckled bitterly, before continuing, “Ross took me away from Marina when I was three years old. The first time he took a whip to me . . . I was five. I’m sure you can guess what kind of damage that left.”

“Our family seems prone to traumatic childhoods, brother.” Gretel sighed as dark chocolate eyes flicked to her brother and his wife and daughter. “In case he neglected to tell you, a witch was fattening him up on candy at 10 to eat.”

“I don’t think he mentioned that to me,” Will replied with a cocked eyebrow.

“It was the catalyst for our occupation.” Gretel admitted with a sad smile as she turned her gaze back to Will. Her gaze darted to Clint then with a bemused expression as she stated directly at him “If you come across a house made of candy . . . don’t eat the fucking candy.”

“Wait . . . a house made of candy?! That’s REALLY a THING!? Awesome!”

Maria’s nose wrinkled as she protested, “It was disgusting . . . trust me, I’ve seen it.”

“It was not always such . . . we made the mistake of partaking in its goods when we were children. We were hungry. What came after haunts me still.” Gretel grunted as her nose crinkled in recollection of the aroma of burning witch.

There was a gentle caress over her shoulders as Steve’s fingers brushed gently over the skin of her neck. Meanwhile Hansel rolled his eyes as he retorted, “I would disagree, Gretel . . . seeing you stab the Hündin was, in the words of my Falki, ‘kind of awesome’.”

“Oh yes it was enlightening, to say the least . . . a good way to discover we were immune to magic. I still remember the smell of her burning.” Gretel huffed with a roll of her eyes. She then turned around to tease Hansel by snarking “As usual I did all the hard work and you did the heavy lifting.”

“As per usual,” he remarked with a huff. “God forbid you do any of the difficult work.”
“Says the one of us who drank the most and spent most of our planning time flirting with the bar wenches.” Gretel retorted. “Admit it Hans, I was the brains and you were the brawn.”

“The most handsome brawn hyu have ever seen, Gret,” he agreed with a smirk. “As for who is the brains now . . . even hyur intelligence pales in the face of mein Adler’s.”

Gretel rolled her eyes before glancing to Maria and asking “How do you put up with his ego?”

“I have a rolling pin . . . and perfect aim,” she replied with a snicker and a smirk.

“Oh I’m going to like you, Maria.” Gretel stated with a wicked grin. “A woman after my own heart.”

Clint snickered, “Pops sounds a little outnumbered, don’t you think, Will?”

“Maybe just a little.”

“So are Marina and her daughters from what I can tell.” Gretel pointed out looking to Clint with a grin as her fingers twitched. “My fingers itch for my crossbow after this revelation of Ross and recollection of the past.”

Clint brightened at the statement, “You’re an archer? That’s so awesome! So am I!”

“We shall have to compare skills once I am permitted. Given the way you are perched I am going to assume you prefer to be higher than your fellows? Hopefully the right way up . . . unlike Hans.” Gretel teased.

“Damn it, Gret, that happened once,” Hansel grumbled slumping back in his chair and glowering at his gloating sister.

“Fall off a broomstick one time and it sticks with you for life, Brother dear.”

Bucky chuckled as he looked back at his boyfriend fondly, “You're practically itching to get the details of that story . . . I can feel the dresser vibrating with your curiosity.”

“And you're not even a little curious!? You're a terrible liar, Buck,” Clint scoffed with a wicked grin.

Glancing at Marina, Bucky shook his head fondly. “How can she sleep through all our ruckus?”

“Practice,” Clint chirped cheerfully, “She's had decades worth of practice.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's nickname for his longtime partner Marina Petrovka)
(R) kroshka - babies
(R) moy lyubimov - my love
(R) Prizrak - spectre (Marina's nickname for Grant Ward)
(G) Tochter - daughter (Hansel's nickname for Marina Petrovka)
(R) Sammichka - diminutive of Sam (Marina and Will's nickname for their oldest son, Sam Grimm)
(G) Mein Gott in Himmel - my God in heaven
(R) Der-mo - shit
(G) Neffe - nephew
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel's nickname for his oldest son, Will Grimm)
(G) Hündin - bitch
(G) Falki - little hawk (Hansel's nickname for his youngest son, Clint Grimm)
(G)
Hey guys!!! Sorry about the long silence. I'm on vacation and this is the first time I've had the opportunity to post. I may hopefully have another here in a couple days, but we'll have to see I guess!

Enjoy this chapter!

No translations.

Chapter 227: Downsides of Being A Grimm

There was a downside to being a Grimm not that Doyle had ever realized that before this morning. He was heading down to the labs to see his beautiful, gorgeous, too-good-for-him wife when he caught sight of a nurse muttering to herself as she all but jogged down the hallways. “Fucking Grimms . . . and their fucking children . . . and fucking multiplying.”

Frowning hard, he backtracked, reaching out to grab her arm and yank her to a stop. “I’m sorry . . . you said something about a Grimm? And multiplying?!”

The woman stared up at the dark haired tactical officer with wide, horrified eyes, stuttering, “Commander Doyle, I . . .”

“You what?” he asked, hand tight around her arm as he insisted, “Tell me what you said.”

Biting down on her lower lip, she glanced over his shoulder, clearly hoping that someone would come along to rescue her. When the hallway behind him remained empty, she looked back up at him sheepishly. “I don’t think I was saying anything particularly kind, sir.”

“Yeah . . . I got that part. So just tell me what you said without the profanity,” he snapped with a glare.

“Well Sir . . . all the Grimms were in medical. Scowling and grumbling . . . “ She trailed off contemplating her next words carefully. “Then Captain Rogers and and a woman that I think might have been the Grimm’s aunt chewed the nursing staff out for not informing the Colonel on Agent Petrovka’s condition."

“What about Marina!?” Doyle’s eyes widened as his hands snapped up to grab her arms and shook her once, “What happened!? Is she okay!? Is it her babies?”

“She went into labor sir. They had to rush her into surgery, but both she and her daughters came through the operation fine.” The nurse stammered with wide eyes. The Grimms themselves were legendary for their ability to scare people with one look and it seemed to her to be an inherited trait.

“Surgery . . . what kind of surgery?”

“Cesarean section. Her placenta detached and she was bleeding badly. Dr Keller made the call before things could get any worse.”

“But she’s all right!? You’re sure?” he demanded, khaki green eyes snapping with worry and concern. Part of him itched with irritation - not one of his half-brothers had called. The rest of him acknowledged the unlikelihood of any such call if Marina had truly been as bad off as it sounded.

“Yes Sir, she’s recuperating in a private room on the maternity floor of Medical. Both daughters are healthy and strong, but . . . their father possibly not so much. The Colonel didn’t look like his usual put together self.”

Doyle snorted as he rolled his eyes, “Did the Colonel know that his partner was bleeding so badly?”

“I don’t think they told him the extent of her condition? Hence Captain Rogers and Miss Kuhn threatening them . . . I heard she threatened to disembowel them before tying them to a pyre and setting them on fire.” She screwed her nose up before shaking her head. “I was not there I was busy assisting in the theater.”

“Then I can’t possibly imagine why the Colonel isn’t ‘his usual put together self’,” Doyle snarked with a roll of his eyes.

“I’ll admit . . . my colleagues would have been better off keeping him informed. But fear does strange things to people,” she admitted. “There are rumors floating around that the Colonel broke down into his father’s arms . . . not that I normally pay such rumors much attention.” The clarification came hard and fast as she tried to cover her mistake.

The commander’s jaw tightened harder as he huffed, “Uh-huh . . . I’m sure you don’t.” Jerking his thumb over his shoulder, he asked, “What are you doing in R&D anyway? We’re nowhere near Medical.”

“It occurred to Captain Grimm that he hadn’t informed you and he requested I find you . . . I may have been hopeful that you’d already left?” The nurse’s eyes flicked downwards as she muttered her reply

“I hadn’t even arrived yet . . . I’m not usually in R&D until it’s time to retrieve my wife from her crazy science projects.”

“Had I known that I would have left a message with her as opposed to pissing you royally off.” She paused and then straightened. “Sir.”

“Probably a smarter idea than cussing out my brothers and family.”

“I am sorry about that. It’s been a long few hours and when all the Grimms are together in Medical, things tend to get . . . rowdy and hectic,” she stated still looking anywhere but at the man in front of her.

“You realize that half of that is a direct result of their mistreatment at the hands of your colleagues, right? As far as I can tell, my brothers have done nothing to deserve the wild stories that circle Medical, and by extension the rest of the base.”

“The stories do seem to continually change between tellings,” she admitted with a scowl as she tried to recall whether or not she’d had anything occur with the Grimms that hadn’t been started by her colleagues’ disrespect for them. “Nurse Reyes seems to sing their praises.”

“That’s because Miranda is a saint and should be treated as such,” Scarlett’s voice inserted as she exited her lab, taking a moment to lock the door behind her. “Hello husband.”

“Hello Scar, my beautiful gorgeous amazing wife.”

Cocking an eyebrow, she watched him for a moment. Suspicion dripped from her voice as she asked, “What did you do?”

He smirked at her, teasing, “Why do you ask?”

“Because when you start getting prolific with the flattering adjectives . . . you’ve clearly done something,” she replied with an amused smirk. “Please tell me you didn’t forget the triplets?”

“They’re still at daycare, where they should be,”

The nurse glanced between them for a moment before interrupting in a hesitant voice. “Since I have now delivered Captain Grimm’s message . . . rather awkwardly might I add I’ll just be going?”

“Do me a favor? Stop cussing out my family, okay?” Despite putting his words in the form of a question, no one would mistake Doyle’s underlying order.

“Yes Sir. I’ll aim to follow Nurse Reyes footsteps and treat them with the utmost respect.” She nodded and then squared her shoulders. “It’s not proper for one of my career to rely on other people’s opinions of potential patients.”

“Wait . . . what message? What did I miss?” Scarlett inquired, stepping forward to link her arm with her husband’s, eyes wide as she looked up at him.

Looking to Scarlett the nurse gave a quiet reply. “Agent Petrovka had her twins.”

“SHE HAD WHAT!? When did this happen!?” the scientist shrieked, her eyes wide and horrified, “But she’s early!”

A gentle sigh met Scarlet’s reaction and the nurse nodded “She is, hence Dr Keller rushing her into surgery when she had complications. Both mother and children are fine and were resting when I clocked off.”

“Are you sure?”

Doyle spoke up then, interrupting his wife’s quiet freak out, “How about we head over to Medical and check on Marina? Considering the fact she had surgery, I doubt they’re going to have let her out this soon, right?”

“We should stop by the gift shop . . . get something for the two of them. Oh! And I should talk to the other women...we should probably put together a baby shower or something now that she’s going to be off work for awhile and we’ll be able to pin her down for more than a minute at a time.”

“Nurse Reyes can point you to Agent Petrovka’s room. She’s camped out in the nurses station, waiting for her patient to be ready to return to his own room,” the nurse suggested before finally retreating.

“Patient!? What patient?” Scarlet asked, eyes narrowing in concern as she turned to look at her husband. “Is someone else hurt?”

“Your guess is as good as mine, Scar... let’s just go check on her, okay?”

Nodding briskly, she adjusted her grip on his arm and then began to tow her husband along. “Didn't Will call you?” she demanded pulling him into the sunshine as Doyle tried to fish his phone from his pocket.

“Marina just had an emergency c-section. I'll be shocked if we get there and Will isn't chain smoking and looking like someone just died,” the oldest of Hansel's sons replied. “Which means I'd be shocked if anyone remembered to call Gus.”

“Oh Gus! He'll be devastated if something happened to Marina and he wasn't here with her,” his wife insisted with a frown. “Shame on Will. Isn't he the genius?”

“The genius who is thoroughly devoted to his wife... partner... lover... whatever she is... and a total wreck without her at his side. Besides, Marina is the one in that relationship with all the social skills, remember?” he chuckled, grunting as he finally pulled his phone free. “Fucking finally!”

Using one hand, he dialled his younger brother, hoping the former firefighter wasn't working that day. Gus’ tone was tired as he grunted, “Hello?”

“Gus, hey, it's Doyle.”

There was a moment of startled silence as the younger man considered that. For all that Gus and Doyle shared the same family, they were both still trying to find their way... and neither of them were particularly close as of yet. “Doyle? What... no offense, man, but why are you calling me?”

“It's Marina, she went into early labor.”

“Is she okay!!” he demanded, sounding worried. It was no secret to the family that Marina was fond of this particular Prototype... and that he returned her affection with equal fervor.

“According to the nurse Jay sent to find me, mother and daughters are all doing very well considering.”

“What about Will? He's probably freaking out, huh?”

“I haven't seen him yet; we're on our way there now. But yeah, that would be my assumption as well.”

“I don't know how long it'll take me to get there. I have the time off - I warned the foreman I'd be leaving when Marina gave birth - but I still need to book a flight.”

“Don't worry about the flight. I'll take care of that. Just get your bag ready and be at your house in an hour; I'll send an agent for you.”
“Can do. And tell Marina I'm happy for her?”

“Roger wilco,” he laughed, before Gus grunted a goodbye and the dialtone sang in Doyle’s ear.

He couldn't help it . . . he blinked. Gus was eccentric and kind of a hermit, there was no escaping that fact, but Doyle had expected a little longer of a conversation than he’d gotten. “Gus is not a fan of small talk, apparently.”

“And that surprises you?” Scarlett gave him a look that clearly indicated he had lost his mind. “It's Gus!”

“I haven't talked to the kid in months. I was hoping for a, ‘hey dude, how you doing?’ Or maybe, ‘what's new?’ Not ‘okay, bye’.”

“Gus is an extreme introvert.” His wife heaved a fond sigh in his direction as she reminded, “Doyle . . . his best friend is 14.”

“Fifteen . . . Marina's been keeping track,” the man joked with a roll of his eyes.

“Of course she has,” Scarlett laughed, shaking her head. “Did you hear? Malee has been learning Chinese AND Japanese. She's planning on Russian next; our Family Viper is as pleased as punch.”

“German is a perfectly respectable language too, you know.”

“And Hansel would be amused if she attempted to learn it. But Malee adores Marina; it makes sense she learns her own language then attempts Marina's native language. She’s never even met Hansel.”

“Semantics,” he snarked, hand on the small of her back as he guided her from the elevator and onto the maternity floor.

“Kind of an important one,” she pointed out, smiling at Miranda as the nurse looked up and called out a greeting, “Dr. Doyle! Hi!”

“It’s just Scarlett, Miranda . . . I’m pretty sure I remember us having this conversation before,” the scientist laughed with a grin and reached out to squeeze the other woman’s arm. “So . . . who is the patient you’re waiting on?”

“I don’t think you’d believe me if I told you,” Miranda laughed before gesturing down the hallway. “Marina’s room is the last one on the left . . . she’s the only single room on the floor.”

“Special treatment, huh?” Doyle snickered, earning a laugh and a shake of her head, “No . . . more like the only person on the floor with an army’s worth of visitors.”

“How many people are in her room?”

“Your entire family. Fortunately, Dr. Keller and Dr. Grimm are her physicians or she’d be in trouble for sharing her bed . . . the other doctors on the floor get huffy about that kind of thing.”

“I highly doubt any of the other doctors would even be game enough to stick their head in that room, let alone request Marina’s bed guests and visitors to leave.” Doyle snarked with a grin as he looked to Miranda. “In fact I’m almost a hundred percent sure the only person who’d get away with that outside of my wife, Vincent and Marta would be you Miranda.”

“And considering how terrible the Colonel looks, I wouldn't even try. He's not looking so good. This scared him.” Shaking her head with a frown, she continued, “I've seen all of you in here at one time or another, and with some pretty gruesome injuries but nothing has ever terrified him like the thought he was gonna lose her.”

“Which would explain his forgetting to call me and Gus.” Doyle pondered aloud with a frown before continuing “Chain smoking?”

“Your father took his cigarettes away as soon as he arrived,” she agreed with a nod.

“And knowing Will . . . Dad’s about the only one who could.” His face grew even more serious. “How is she Miranda? I’m not sure I trust the opinion of the nurse Jason sent.”

“The epidural was more potent than expected, so she still can’t feel anything, but her prognosis is good. She should recover just fine and with no side effects.”

“Thank God for small miracles. Will wouldn’t take it well if anything went wrong and he lost any of them.” Doyle frowned.

“Indeed. I was genuinely worried he was headed for a bed on the cardio floor . . . he looked seconds away from a heart attack when I arrived on the floor.”

“Which once again brings us back to my wife’s question. Who are you waiting for? None of my brothers are currently in medical as far as I knew.” Doyle inquired with a confused frown as he tried to rack his brain for who the nurse could be waiting for.

“He’s in with Marina. And I’m serious; you won’t believe me unless you see for yourself.”

“Cruel woman,” Doyle teased before tightening his arm around his wife. “We’d best go see then, and check to make sure Will hasn’t worked himself up too much.”

“Agreed,” came Scarlett’s firm concurrence even as she smiled at the nurse. “Thank you, Miranda.”

Guiding Scarlett down the hall Doyle hummed in thought for a moment before looking down to his wife as he spoke “For the life of me I can’t think who she’d be waiting for . . . it’s like holding a bone over a dog’s head and teasing it.”

“Well, are any of the Misfits in Medical right now? Maybe it isn't one of your brothers.”

“Not that I know of other than Vincent but he’s always in medical.” He pointed out with a grunt. “I do know Marina’s been keeping a close eye on her latest asset who’s in medical.”

“I highly doubt Grant WARD is going to be hanging out in her room with the family.”

“This is Marina we’re talking about Scar . . . collector of strays and Misfits alike.” Doyle teased as he extended his free hand to open the door to Marina’s room and usher his wife through ahead of him.

Scarlett’s hands flew to her mouth as she stared; Grant Ward was sitting in the chair next to Marina’s bed, his head resting on the bed and her fingers in his hair as he slept. The woman herself laughed quietly at something that was happening on her tablet. Twisting to look up at her husband, the scientist replied, “Apparently, I can be wrong. Oh my goodness . . . I didn’t think she’d managed to get this far with him yet. He’s been fighting her so hard!”

“Marina could chip her way through Italian marble with her nails if she had a mind to Scar. Still good to know you can admit to being wrong on occasion.” He teased head dipping to press a kiss to the apple of her cheek.
“Hush you,” she sniffed lightly, elbowing her husband lightly in the side.

Marina looked up from her tablet with a smile, “Hello Scar . . . Doyle . . . I’m so glad you were able to come by.” Looking down to her side, she used her free hand to smooth over something Doyle could only partly see. “My lover isn’t quite as meticulous as usual right now. I was worried he hadn’t informed you or Gus.”

“He hadn’t . . . Jason had an afterthought to let me know by scared nurse and I called Gus on our way here and arranged to have him picked up.” Doyle explained with a shrug. “Not Will’s fault; way we hear it he was in a bad place worrying over you.”

Waving them over with two fingers, she sighed, “Still in a bad place . . . Marta had to sedate him to get him to sleep.”

“Good. I’d hate to have to try and knock him out the hard way.” Doyle grunted as he guided Scarlett further into the room. His eyes sweeping over the family spread out and pausing on the pair seated on the floor beside his father “When the hell did that happen and who woke her?”

Hansel’s lips quirked in amusement, but remained silent, allowing Marina to answer. Neither of the people beside him did more than flick an eyebrow in his direction.

“Apparently around the same time I went into labor. And, believe it or not, Steve Rogers woke her.” Snickering, there was a wicked grin on her lips as she joked, “My boys are having a hard time trying to wrap their heads around the idea that Captain America is probably going to become their uncle.”

“They’re not the only ones . . . how’d Clint take it, given the circumstances?”

“Surprisingly well all things considered. Means Steve has no designs on Bucky. Far as Clint’s concerned, he’s as happy as a clam. Though still a little leery; they’ll work it out. I have faith in moy dorogoy.” Turning back to the tablet, she said, “Sorry, Daryl-honey . . . Doyle and Scarlett just came in.”

The familiar Georgian accent came through the speaker, “Hey Scarlett . . . Doyle!”

“Hey Daryl, hope you’re staying out of trouble and aren’t having anymore zombie run ins.” Doyle called with a smirk that soon fell off his face as Scarlett once again jabbed him in the ribs with the point of her elbow. “Ow.”

“It was an accident!” she hissed with a fierce frown, glaring at her husband with a pout.

“No, no zombies,” Daryl replied, chuckling at the byplay. “Clean up is almost done, fortunately. And . . . Carol and I are finally dating.”

“Bout time,” Doyle snarked with a shake of his head. “From what I hear you two have been dancing around each other for a long time.”

“Carol’s husband . . . he was abusive to both her and Sophia. She’s just been a little leery about getting involved with anyone . . . for Sophia’s sake.”

“Didn’t you help save the kid . . . or am I remembering incorrectly?”

“I did, except that when you’ve been hurt one too many times, you have a hard time taking kindness for what it is . . . kindness. But I adore the kid and she adores me. So we’re making our way; slow and steady wins the race, Doyle.”

“Congrats man.” Doyle chuckled glancing to his wife. “A good woman at your side makes life worth living.”

Cocking an eyebrow at her husband, she snarked back, “A good husband who doesn’t tease you about former failures is even better than a good woman . . . husband!”

“I wasn’t teasing! Well . . . not entirely,” Doyle muttered with a sigh “I’m sleeping on the floor aren’t I?”

She gave him a beatific smile as she taunted, “Make it up to me, and maybe not. But it had better be good! And there should be groveling involved somewhere.”

“Yes Ma’am,” Doyle chirped with a wicked grin and salute “I’ll get right on that when we’re alone.”

“Hmm,” she humped with a glare, “You’d better.”

Marina chuckled, cocking an eyebrow at her son who was softly snickering in his chair, brilliant blue eyes still closed. “Something funny, Sammichka?”

“Just Aunt Scar and Uncle Doyle; do either of them ever actually think the other is mad at them?”

“You best start paying attention Sammy, you’re the next one heading down the aisle.” Doyle teased as he crossed to the chair Sam sat in to noogie his nephew’s head.

Sam grimaced under the attention, hunching between his shoulders. “Yeah, I know. You’re coming right?”

“Soon as we know when. I doubt I’ll be on assignment anywhere unless shit hits the fan or your Aunt Scar inadvertently creates another catastrophic world ending virus.”

Marina burst into subdued laughter, earning a grunt and a groan from the body on the other side of her. Looking down instantly, she soothed, “Sshh . . . sleep, my love . . . we’re safe here. Shhh . . .”

Will’s voice was quiet and sleepy as he asked, “Who is it?”

“Just Doyle and Sam and Scarlett . . . it’s okay. Close your eyes.”

“Kay,” he breathed, shifting his head to bury a little more into the side of her breast before slipping away again.

Marina’s eyes narrowed as she mused lightly, ‘That sedative was supposed to keep him out for at least eight hours. Or at least that’s what I was told.”

“It’s Will, Marishka. When has anything ever worked on him as it’s meant to?” Doyle pointed out in hushed tones.

“Tell me something I don’t know,” she giggled, her free arm cuddling her lover a little closer to her body.

“It’s all that stubbornness.” Doyle grinned as he patted Sam’s shoulder before gesturing a finger in Ward’s direction “We didn’t realise you were that far inside his walls.”

“To be honest, I hadn’t either. But he insisted on coming up to be with the family when Miranda told him I was in surgery. As far as I know, he hasn’t moved from this chair since he sat down in it.”

“Well . . . keep chipping away at him and he may just shed that robot persona he sports ninety-five percent of the time.” Doyle studied the sleeping agent and grunted “He’s likely gonna wake up stiff sleeping in that position.”

“He hasn’t protested yet, and he’s NOT a robot.”

“Didn’t say he was,” Doyle retorted, holding up a hand. “Just saying - others have said that. I’ve seen glimpses of emotion from time to time but it gets quickly buried. Almost like he’s been trained not to feel.”

Sam and Marina both spoke up at the same time, “Garrett.”

Sam’s tone was angry and his features were twisted with fury, while Marina only looked sad and resigned. “That man makes me crazy.”

“Well the sooner we get him away from Garrett the better, yeah?” Doyle asked brows raised.

“I’m working on it,” Marina huffed, with a roll of her eyes. “I get to the point where I think I’m making headway, then Garrett rears his ugly head again. Rumlow was apparently here yesterday, reminding Grant of where his loyalty was.”

“Maybe Rumlow needs to be slapped with a restraining order then . . . or at least the Murderess equivalent.” Doyle stated with a wicked grin as he winked at Marina.

“He’s going to be spending his recovery in the handler pool . . . with Vika protecting him. At this point, I don’t think even Rumlow will be so stupid as to piss off my sister; she’s a Coulson, she should give him nightmares.”

“True, Rumlow has some brains in that musclebound head . . . does that go for Garrett however?”

“I think I’m going to strike out there. But Vika can handle Garrett. She likes Grant; she’ll protect him for me, while I can’t be at the pool to protect him myself.”

“Can’t be at the pool? That’s not something I ever thought I’d hear coming out of your mouth. God put his foot down huh?” Doyle teased as he patted Marina’s covered knee.

“Three months! I’m gonna go crazy! I can’t stay away from work that long . . . who’s gonna manage my idiots!? No one else who has tried, has ever come out sane!!” she wailed.

“What about Coulson? He can threaten to tase them and use them as a footrest while watching Supernanny.”

“That barely worked the first time,” Marina snorted. “Misha is much more likely to force obedience out of his brothers. And he’ll probably be at home with me for at least the first month.”

“So sic the Soldat on the idiots; between him and Captain America’s so called disappointed face they’ll sort them out. Right?” Doyle asked no one in particular.

“Bucky and Clint have to go back to New Mexico; they left their assignment there but they only have a couple days leave. And my boys are still shaky about Rogers.” Humming softly, she frowned, “I’ll figure it out. If I have to work a little bit from home, I will.”

Scarlett took a seat in one of the empty chairs, cocking an eyebrow at the pair seated on the floor, speaking in low voices as they basically ignored the rest of the room. “In some weird way, those two actually make a certain kind of sense.”

“The sleeping soldier and the cursed witch? Both of whom time forgot? Yeah, they do. They’ll have someone to commiserate with while they try to figure out the world around them.”

“I think you mean the Witch and her Troll,” Bucky chimed in with a smirk from where he was still seated on the dresser with Clint using him as a pillow.

Steve looked up at that, “I am not a Troll.”

“You were and still are a troll at times, Punk.” Bucky tossed back with a wry grin.

“Shut up, Jerk.”

Gretel sighed then, “I miss my Troll.”

Daryl spoke up then through the tablet, “Okay, I had to have heard that wrong. Did she say she misses her troll!? Like a REAL troll?!”

“Ja,” Hansel acknowledged looking up from his dozing wife and daughter. “She had a real troll named Edward.”

“Have Hans, I have a troll named Edward.”

“No one has seen Edward in centuries, Gret . . . we cannot guarantee that he still lives,” Hansel argued gently, trying not to hurt her but also trying to be as honest with her as he could.

“Trolls don’t exactly walk around in the open Hans, and we have no idea their lifespan.” Gretel retorted with a scowl as her gaze turned to the back of the tablet. “What magic makes that little box talk?”

“Not magic, technology,” Jason cheered, eyes sparkling with the prospect of being able to teach his aunt about the new world and all the technology that was in it. “I can’t wait to teach you all about it.”

“Does that mean the weapons have advanced too?” Gretel inquired, eyes suddenly bright at the thought. “I do not know whether my crossbow survived our last hunt.”

“Even if it hasn’t survived, crossbows are still being made even now. As a matter of fact, I think Clint has one.”

“I rarely use it though, Auntie . . . you can have it, if you like.”

“I will take a look and try it . . . though mine had certain accessories to it. It had a cabling hoist system and a knife.” Gretel sighed at the loss. “It was a trusty weapon.”

“It has been 200 years since we were hunters in Germany,” Hansel reminded his sister. “I would think the weapon long gone.”

“I’m pretty sure my crossbow has a cable hoist anyway . . . the knife wouldn’t be hard to fit into the butt or even attach to the stock.”

“I will try what is available and proceed from there.” Gretel replied with a slight incline of her head.

“A woman after my own heart,” Daryl chuckled “Nothing more reliable than a well made, well maintained crossbow.”
Hey all! Enjoy this! It's gonna be a fun one!

No translations at all.

Chapter 228: Going Home

Malee Chuang was fussing at the contents of her picnic basket, as she moved down the street towards Gus Maitland’s house. There were several decades between their ages, but Gus was probably the best friend she’d ever had. Not that her other friends weren’t awesome - they were - but since Rudy had been killed, Jacob and Leo had been weird. Three years later and things between the trio, once foursome, had never quite gone back to the way they’d once been.

Not that she herself wasn’t weird; 12 year olds didn’t latch on to older men more than twice their age, because they can sense a kindred spirit in loss. But then, her mother had always said that Malee wasn’t exactly the poster child of “normal”. Practically skipping up the path, she hummed to herself as she knocked on the door firmly. “Gus! It’s Malee!” she called, head cocking at the sound of panicked movement inside the small home. “Gus!??”

There was a curse from the other side of the door, before it swung open to reveal a practically frantic Gus Maitland. “Malee! Hi!” His eyes flicked down to the basket, earning a wince. “Shit, that was today?”

“We’ve had this picnic planned for a week,” Malee scolded, free hand coming up to brace on her hip. “It’s your day off and you promised!”

“I know, I’m sorry. But Marina had her twins and my brothers are sending someone to come and get me. I’m still trying to pack.”

Malee perked up instantly, eyes going wide and excited, “Marina had the twins! That’s awesome! Oh, I can’t wait to meet them!” Shoving the basket at Gus, she whirled on her toes and dashed away, calling back over shoulder, “I’m coming too!”

She didn’t even pause at the sound of his called, “Malee! Wait!”

“Don’t you dare leave without me! I’ll tell Sam on you!” she shouted over her shoulder, ponytail bouncing behind her as she rounded the corner at a dead run and disappeared from view.

Gus sighed at that remark, his gaze falling to the picnic basket in hand. He’d been seriously considering doing just that and if Malee called Sam . . . well that would get to Will at least . . . if not Marina as well. At which point, the Russian would probably tan his hide if he showed up without her favorite, soon-to-be protege in tow. He huffed quietly as he turned back into the house “How the hell do I get myself into these situations?”

Setting the picnic basket carefully onto the floor just inside the door, he went back to his packing. All the while, he was praying that the agent Doyle was sending for him would arrive before Malee returned, and he’d be spared having to explain the circumstances to her formidable mother, Dr. Chuang. The woman knew one too many of his secrets; becoming friends with her daughter had been both a blessing and a curse.

Unfortunately, the agent arrived mere minutes after Carla’s car swung into his driveway, Malee bounding out of the passenger seat while her mother pulled a small suitcase from the trunk. He blinked, surprised to see her so complacent about it. “Dr. Chuang . . . what are you doing?”

“Take care of my little girl, Gus . . . she’s bound and determined to go, and she’s on the phone already with your nephew. So either you take her with you now, or Sam sends a car for her after you’re gone. Either way, you’ll both be on the same Quinjet heading east . . . might as well resign yourself to it.”

“I’ll give her credit . . . she know’s how to play the cards to get exactly what she wants. Having Sam wrapped around her little finger definitely works in her favor.” Gus stated with a resigned sigh. “Even if I could convince the ‘jet to leave without her, Sam would likely tell Marina and get me in all sorts of trouble.”
“She’s going to be a handful . . . I pity the man she drags to the altar. He’s going to have his hands full with her.”

“Possibly . . . that being said she could be exactly what he needs too. Your daughter is an old soul I think, far too wise for her years on occasion.” Gus shook his head watching Malee chatting excitedly with Sam even as his lips twitched into a slight smile. “Sometimes I can’t tell if God sent me a guardian angel or a devil when she rocked up in my world.”

“Devil . . . definitely a devil,” Carla laughed with a shake of her head. “She’s either going to put me in an early grave . . . or she’s going to rule the world. I’m not entirely sure it won’t be both.”

“Well given her attachment to my sister-in-law I’m pretty sure the latter is going to happen first.” Gus acknowledged with a wry grin “Malee, quit yakking it up with Sam or we’re going to be late.”

Malee grinned as she chirped cheerfully, “Gus is giving me his ‘Grumpy Dwarf’ face, so I have to go. I’ll see you guys in a little bit . . . I KNOW! I’m so excited!!”

“Sam quit encouraging her!” Gus shouted with a shake of his head before moving to take the small suitcase from Carla in order to put it in the waiting car with his bag. "I'll look after her and keep her out of trouble. Upside is Marina will be too busy with her babies to be filling Malee’s head with ideas . . . I hope.”

Carla shook her head as she laughed, “I wouldn’t hold your breath, if I was you.”

“You may have a point,” he replied dryly with a roll of his eyes. “Maybe I can convince Clint to pull out his old circus routines to keep her distracted.”

“Your best shot at that? Babies . . . just keep her distracted with babies. She loves kids and they seem to like her back, so . . .”

“Which again also leaves me with Clint, he’s still not entirely grown up sometimes.” Gus retorted with a rumbling chuckle. “I can see that though, she’ll make a wonderful mother some day.”

“Let’s hope that day is decades into the future. I cannot handle the idea of my little girl as a mother. Not right now . . . maybe after she turns 50. Ninety works for me too; I am too young to be a grandmother.”

“Good luck with that. I can’t see her waiting that long.” Gus pointed out. “Your daughter is strong willed and once her mind is set on something you have exactly two chances of changing it. Buckley’s and none.”

Carla shook her head in resignation. “Don’t let anyone knock up my little girl, okay, Gus? Please?!”

Gus blinked, visibly startled at the question, before nodding, “Yeah . . . of course. Besides, Marina would probably murder anyone who even tried.”

“Good point,” the therapist replied dryly, smiling at her daughter as Malee bounded into her arms. “Be good for Gus, Sam and Marina, okay? And help Marina out with her twins while you’re there; don’t just be a layabout. One baby at a time is hard enough . . . two has to feel like never ending toil when there’s a dozen other people to take care of.”

“Yes Mom,” Malee agreed with a grin.

“Good girl,” Carla chuckled, hugging Malee tightly, before turning her over to Gus. “I’ll see you both in about a week? School starts then, so she’ll need to be back for the first day of the next I'll have her back by then, I promise,” the man promised, with a small smile.

Nodding once, Carla squeezed her daughter tightly once more, before releasing her and stepping back. “Have fun. I’ll see you both in a week.”

Malee waved brightly, before spinning on her toes to look at Gus. Frowning at the sight of his suitcase in his hand, with hers at his feet, she demanded, “Where’s the picnic?”

“You want to have a picnic on the ‘Jet?” he asked, eyebrows up as she snatched his keys and bolted back to the house. The picnic basket was still sitting just inside the door where he’d left it, and she lifted it before relocking the house briskly.

“Why not?” she asked innocently, hooking the basket over her arm. “We have to eat, don’t we? Cause if you tell me you ate something today, you’re a liar.”

Rolling his eyes, he bent to grab her suitcase next. “Let’s just go . . . or is there something else you need before we leave?”

“Nope, we’re good,” she chirped, grinning up at the straight-faced agent who was standing beside the open door. “Hi!”

“Miss,” he greeted her, offering her a hand and helping her into the backseat of the car. “Mr. Maitland . . . are we ready?”

“Yes . . . let me get the cases into the trunk and we can go.”

Nodding, the agent moved around the front of the car and climbed into the driver’s seat. Gus shoved the suitcases into the trunk and slammed the lid before sliding into the car on the other side of Malee. “All right . . . let’s go.”

Several hours later, Gus was still shaking his head at the ride they’d taken. A Quinjet was nothing like any commercial liner he’d ever taken, and when the pilot had informed them they could remove their restraints, Malee had bounded forward to chat with anyone who would take the time to talk back to her. Their picnic had ended up being attended by their chauffeurs as well, earning an amused grin as the 15 year old proceeding to wrap the entire flight crew around her pinky fingers.

“Do me a favor? Behave yourself,” Gus chuckled, reaching out to ruffle her hair fondly as they walked down the ramp out of the ‘jet together.

“Yes Dad . . . you’re such a stick in the mind.”

“Hey, it’s not that. It’s just . . . Marina gave my brother Will a hell of a scare. And from what Doyle said, he’s still freaking out a bit.”

“Will is Marina’s boyfriend?”

“Partner . . . they’ve been together for longer than you’ve been breathing, kiddo,” Gus chuckled with a small grin, reaching up to ruffle her dark hair. “Come on . . . Sam was going to meet us here to take us to Medical.”

Malee grinned brightly; it was no secret that the then-12 year old had hit it off with the sunny-haired sniper back when they’d first met so long ago. His relationship with Marina had also helped Malee relax around the normally intense Russian; Marina could be scary when she had a problem to fix.
“He’s so awesome. Did you know he’s engaged? Getting married is so exciting, isn’t it?”

Gus cocked an eyebrow at her, teasing, “Finally found someone to turn your attention on?”

“Nope!” she chirped, before waving at the blond who was approaching the jet. “Sam!”

“Malee!” he called back on a laugh, his arm moving in a wide arc over her head.

Bolting off, the teenager launched herself at the young man, squealing with laughter as Sam wrapped his arms around her waist and swung her around in a wide circle. “Hi, Sam!”

The grin on his lips was amused, as he teased, “Sup Short Stack?”

“I am NOT short!” she squealed indignantly, punching at the sniper lightly.

Sam laughed as he looped his arms around her neck, teasing, “Yeah sure . . . whatever you say!”

Looking up at his father’s doppleganger - or was his Dad the doppleganger, seeing as he was younger by a couple years? - he grinned. “Hey Uncle Gus.”

“Hey Sam . . . how’s Marina?”

“Ma’s fine . . . she came out like a champ. And my sisters are precious and beautiful; they already have Dad completely suckered.”

“I’m glad she’s okay.”

“Yeah me too . . . Dad nearly lost it when he thought she wasn’t going to . . .” here he paused, turning uncertain eyes on Malee, a small frown at the corner of his lips. “It’s not important. Dad and Rene were sleeping when I left and Grant was still refusing to leave Ma. All things considered, she’s okay.”

“Grant? That’s a new name,” Gus replied, as Sam led the two towards an ancient Jeep idling on the airstrip.

“It’s complicated. Grant’s good people . . . Ma’s wearing him down, I think, slowly but surely.”

“This is a . . .” here he paused, the word escaping him for a moment, before he continued, “. . . a Misfit thing, huh?”

“I think so. She seems fond of this one, though he’s not making it easy for her at all.”

“Willpower? Against Marina!? Has that ever happened before?”

Sam grinned as he helped Malee climb over the back tire before swinging into the driver’s seat. “Not that I can remember. But hey . . . Ma needs a challenge every once in awhile, or she gets a little stir crazy.” Waiting for Gus to stow the luggage in the back and swing into the passenger seat, Sam shifted gears deftly before throwing the Jeep around and speeding off towards the city. “How was the flight?”

“Interesting,” Gus snarked as Malee cheered, “We had a picnic!”

“A picnic? On a Quinjet?! Well, that’s new,” he laughed, before the howling of the wind prevented any further conversation at all.

Sam swung into a parking space at a tall, imposing building that had Malee’s eyes going wide. “Where are we?”
“Medical . . . Ma’s on the fourth floor. Come on,” he insisted, sliding from the Jeep.

“You’re not going to put the top on?” Gus asked as Sam strode towards the door of the building.

The blond smirked, shaking his head as he laughed. “There isn’t a person on base who doesn’t know who that Jeep belongs to. And there isn’t a person on base stupid enough to piss off the owner of that Jeep. Anything and everything that’s in it will be perfectly safe. I promise.”

It was as they were entering the building that Jason was heading towards the exit. “Uncle Jay?” Sam asked, frowning at the frazzled look on his middle uncle’s features.

“I hate hospitals, Sammy, Medical is no exception,” Jason insisted, eyes wide as he glanced back over his shoulder. “Owen’s in with Will and Marina on guard duty, Rene and Will are both crashed out on cots in Marina’s room, and the combined force of Miranda and Marina are trying to get Grant to head for his own bed. I don’t need to be here . . . my sister already told me to go before I freaked out.”

“You want a ride home?”

“Nah, Casey’s coming for me. Go on . . . your mother could use your help with Ward.” Looking over, Jason offered his older brother a hand. “Hey Gus,” he greeted, before cocking an eyebrow at the teenager with them. “Hey . . . kid?”

“Hi Jason. Jay, meet Malee Chuang. Malee, this is my younger brother, Jason.,” the older man replied, accepting the hand and going easily into the firm embrace Jason pulled him into.

“Hi!” she chirped with a cheery wave.

Smirking at her inherent kindness, he turned back to the younger Grimm and asked seriously, “You okay?”

“I will be when I get out of here,” he insisted, looking up as headlights swung around and a car idled in front of the doors. “Look . . . you’re staying at Marina’s for a few days, right?”

“That’s the plan I think.”

“Then I’ll see you back at the house?”

Nodding in agreement, Gus clapped the younger man on the shoulder and agreed amiably, “Sounds good.”

“Awesome . . . I’ll see you in a bit then. Case and I are staying at the house, to finish getting the nursery set up. The twins are early, and Will doesn’t do well right now when he can’t see Marishka so . . . someone has to do it.”

Sam nodded with a grin, “I’ll let Dad know. He hasn’t exactly been all there lately.”

Jason’s grin was flashfire, if worried, as he replied, “Not since Marina grabbed her belly and went down at the house.” Clapping his nephew on the shoulder, he nodded at his brother, before bolting for Casey’s car and climbing into the passenger seat. All three of them could hear his relieved voice through the window, as he insisted, “Casey . . . I love you.”

“Damn right you do!” the woman laughed fondly, finger appearing in the hair at the back of his neck. “You’re a smart man. Let’s go home, Sexy.”
“God yes,” he agreed, head and shoulders disappearing as he leaned towards her seconds before the car pulled away from the curb and quickly disappeared from sight.

Whistling cheerfully, Sam spun on his heel and led the way into Medical. Gus’ eyebrows furrowed slightly as he inquired, “You don’t seem worried about your mom.”

Sam’s eyes darkened a little as he shrugged lightly, “I can’t explain it. I just . . . Ma’s gonna be okay. And some part of me just knows that. I’m not worried, because I know everything’s going to be fine.”

Gus frowned, even as he nodded. The young man seemed convinced; there was little to do but take his word for it. The two followed Sam into an elevator and then out into a hallway. The blond grinned at a nurse still standing at the nurse’s station, her mouth twisted in fond exasperation as she sighed, “Still playing stubborn, huh?”

“He HAS a bed . . . it would be more comfortable for him than a chair next to Agent Petrovka. But does he listen to me? Of course not! Does he want to go back to his room to sleep? NO! He’d prefer to give himself a crick in the neck than sleep soundly. He’s making me crazy,” Miranda huffed, eyes narrowing as she cocked her head at the two new visitors. “Geez . . . how many brothers does the Colonel have anyway?”

“A lot,” Sam laughed, as he squeezed her arm. “Gus, this is Miranda Reyes, our favorite nurse. Miranda, this is my uncle, Gus Maitland, and his friend, Malee Chuang.”

“Pleasure to meet you both,” she chuckled, turning back to Sam. “Your Dad’s been getting antsy with you gone for so long. I’d get in there if I was you.”

Bending, he pressed a warm kiss to her cheek, teasing, “Marry me?”

“You’ll have to take it up with my husband,” she cackled, smacking at him in amusement, before Sam turned to lead the way down the hall. The blond stepped out of the way of the door, hand coming up to push against Gus’ shoulder as he called into the room, “Hey Ma? You have a visitor.”

Marina’s eyes were tired but happy as she looked up from the dark head resting on the mattress next to her. Her lips curved into a warm smile as Gus greeted her, “Hey Marina.”

One hand came out to reach for him as she replied adoringly, “Gus . . .”
Hey guys!! New chapter!!

New cameo, I'll let you guess who!! XD

No new translations, so yeah, not gonna worry about them this time.

Enjoy! Thanks to all who reviewed the last one!

Also, if you have not read At The Royal York - at all or recently - there is a time break of several months during which this happens (March 2010).

Chapter 229: Setting to Rights

“Khishchnik . . . it isn’t that big of a deal,” the Winter Soldier insisted on a groan, as he hauled his go-bag over his shoulder and followed his pissed off Hawk down the exit ramp. “You just spent two days with your sister and your baby nieces. They’re happy and healthy and beautiful . . . what more could you ask for? Just let it go! I don’t care what he said about me.”

“I can’t ‘just let it go’ . . . Rumlow is pissing me off. You heard what Marina said . . . what Rumlow said to Ward. The kid’s family, Marina’s pretty much got ‘Property Of’ stamped across his forehead. And now he’s messing with Darcy . . . I am going to kick his ass.”

“Or, you know, you could just talk to Darcy,” Bucky sighed in reluctant resignation. If there was one thing Bucky knew about the Grimms, it was the full extent of their stubborn. Once they made up their minds, there was no changing it. The former assassin was pretty sure that character flaw was their father’s fault.

Grumbling, the younger man scowled. “Rumlow’s in NYC anyway. As awesome as I am, not even I can hit a target from that far.”

Rolling his eyes Bucky snarked, “At least you are capable of seeing reason.”

Sticking out his tongue at his boyfriend, Clint looked over and frowned at the baby agent sent to retrieve them from the airstrip. “Geez, they look younger and younger every year.”

“Nah . . . we’re just getting older,” the other man chuckled, tossing his bag at the agent and climbed into the passenger side. “Hello, Agent Hardy. How are you?”

“I’m good, sir,” the dark haired young man replied with a small smile. “How was your trip?”

“It was good,” Bucky replied, before Clint all but leaped into the backseat of the car.

“Sup Frankie!? How’s your brother? He liking hand to hand with Brian?” Clint chirped, lounging lazily in the backseat.

Frank Hardy’s eyes were sparkling with amusement as he twisted to look back at the older agent. “Your brother is malicious.”

“Preaching to the choir here, kiddo,” the sniper laughed, head dropping back against the window and an imperial wave to his hand as he announced, “Drive on, young one! Destiny and Darcy await!”

Frank glanced at Bucky even as he shifted into gear, joking lightly, “He always this dramatic?”

“This isn’t dramatic . . . this is actually almost tame,” Bucky agreed his own head tilting to the side to rest against the glass. “Sitrep?”

“The artifact is giving off a strange electrical pulse, but we haven’t been able to figure out what it is yet.” Shrugging, he continued, “We’re working on it. We’ll figure it out.”

“I have no doubt you will, Hardy . . . you’re one of Jason’s best and brightest. He wouldn’t have sent you if he didn’t think you could contribute to solving the problem.”

There was a blush colored tinge to his ears as he ducked his chin a little bit, replying steadily, “Thank you sir.”

Bucky rolled his eyes, glancing at the younger man out of the corner of his eyes. “You don’t have to call me ‘sir’, Hardy.”

A cheeky grin creased his lips as he replied, “Yes sir.”

“Snarky little shit,” Clint laughed with a grin, “I like this kid.”

“Of course you do,” Bucky drawled with a roll of his eyes. “Like attracts like . . . or is that snark calls to snark?”

“Shut up, asshole,” the archer cackled, lunging forward so he was leaning between the two front seats. “Hey look! The lights are still on at the garage.” One finger poked at the young agent as he insisted, “Let me out, out front?”
“Sir?”

“I have pressing business with Dr. Foster’s hot, stacked intern. This talk is long overdue and I am NOT in the mood to put it off for any longer.”

“Tact, Clint . . . remember to employ some sense of tact, okay? Don’t run her off; I seem to recall the fact that you really like the girl.”

A flashfire grin, eerily reminiscent of his older brother Brian, was the sniper’s only reply, before he ducked from the car and bolted towards the doors. His head shook in amusement, before insisting, “Back to base, Agent Hardy.”

“Shouldn’t we wait for him, Agent Barnes?”

“Barton will find his own way back. I’m tired, Hardy . . . take me back to base.”

“Of course sir.”

Turning back forward, he sighed, “I hope he makes sure she’s not carrying her taser before he starts talking.”

Hardy glanced at the older agent with a frown, asking, “Are you sure we shouldn’t stick around?”

“Very . . . Ms. Lewis doesn’t like me much. Whatever they have to say to each other will be better if it’s just between them.”

Watching his superior out of the corner of dark eyes for a moment, it was a second before Frank Hardy nodded and put the car back into drive. “Yes sir.”

Meanwhile, Clint had stormed into the old station, calling insistently, “Darcy! Where are you!?"

The intern’s head came up fast from her laptop, eyes going wide as she stared at him. “Clint!? I thought you left!”

“My sister had her daughters . . . I went home for a couple of days,” he explained, thunderheads in his eyes as he watched her stand. “We need to talk.”

“I have nothing to say.”

“That’s fine . . . you can listen.”

“To what!?,” she demanded, squeaking as he reached out and took her hand, tugging her gently from her seat and towards the side door for some privacy. “Clint!”

“Do you wanna have this conversation in front of your friends? Or would you prefer to have some privacy?” he asked, even as he continued through the doors and around the back of the building.

“You’re a crazy person,” she insisted, tugging lightly on her wrist and surprised when he released her without protest. “What are you doing here? Shouldn’t you be with the rest of your jackbooted thug friends? And the killer?”

“I’m a killer Darcy,” Clint announced bluntly, eyes flashing as he folded his arms over his chest. “How are my bloody hands okay, while Bucky’s are intolerable to you?”

“Because you kill for a higher cause, on the orders of the government. The people you kill . . . they deserve it.”
“So did Bucky!” Clint insisted. “He was following orders, same as me. His orders just didn’t come from the same place as mine.”

“He’s a murderer, Clint . . . Brock was very clear on the fact that he’d probably kill me just for the fun of it.”

The archer’s jaw locked up hard at the statement, nostrils flaring as he forced himself to take a deep breath in through his nose. “Brock Rumlow is a disgusting waste of space, and a pitiful excuse for a decent human being. Ask your precious Brock what HIS kill count is sometime, huh?”

“At least he’s been honest with me about it!” she shot back, hands clenched at her sides.

“You’ve never even given Buck a CHANCE to be honest with you. As soon as he got here, you did a complete 180 on me . . . you totally blew him off every time I tried to introduce the two of you.” Shoving his hands back through his hair, he insisted, “You didn’t even try to get to know him, Darce . . . he’s been one of my best and dearest friends for ten years. Don’t you think I may know a little more about what kind of man he is, than Brock fucking Rumlow?”

“He dumped you, Clint!”

“No, I dumped him! And when I left, it was all a misunderstanding. And if I’d just opened my mouth and I’d talked to him, I would have known that.” Shoulders slumping, he sighed, “I don’t regret it, running off, because it means I got to meet you again. But Bucky . . . he’s important to me. And I want you to know him, because you’re important to me. Please, Darcy . . . just try?”

“I don’t want to try. The things Brock told me . . . I don’t want to know a man who is capable of that. I’m sorry.”

His lips twitched as he shook his head, “No you’re not. And we both know it.”

Turning his back, he shoved his hands into pockets. “I wish I could convince you that Bucky isn’t the monster you think he is. But I don’t know how to do that. I like ya, Darce . . . you know that. But I won’t give up one of the best people in my life, because of the bias you’ve founded on the words of a morally corrupt asshole with a history of being a total jackass and disgusting piece of shit.”

Glancing back over his shoulder, he sighed, “I’ll see ya around, Darcy.”

“Yeah . . . you too,” she replied sadly, fingers playing with the pendant of her necklace, watching as he disappeared into the night as though he’d never been there at all.

It was several hours later before Clint slipped onto base, waving his credentials at the gate, before disappearing into the barracks. His feet were soundless on steel flooring as he disappeared into his quarters, stripping out of his uniform and folding it onto the chair across from the bed.

Bucky’s bulk was a familiar lump under the sheets and he sighed as he slid onto the mattress and under the covers, plastering himself to his boyfriend’s back.

For a while, the room was quiet, before the sniper asked in quiet Russian, “Ne poshel, kak vy khoteli, da? (Didn’t go the way you wanted, huh?)”

“Net,” Clint sighed, brushing his nose against the curve of his shoulder blade. “What are we gonna do?”

“Be patient . . . that’s all we can do,” the older man reminded him, reaching back over his hip and taking Clint’s hand, pulling it up and around to press a warm kiss to his knuckles.
“I hate this . . . I love you, Buck, I do . . . but there’s something about her. She fills a hole that I didn’t realize was there. She’s light and warmth and sunshine; she’d be good for us.”

There was another long silence, before Bucky sighed, “I believe you. But you can’t force this, Clint. If you try, you’ll push her away.”

Nodding, the archer closed his eyes and sighed, “I love you . . . so much.”

A warmth crept into the quiet voice as the former assassin replied, “Ya lyublyu tebya, khishchnik, vsegda.”

Startled and blinking, Clint breathed in awe, “That’s what Will tells Marina.”

“I know . . . and I mean it. I would do anything for your happiness, Clint. Anything at all.”

Pressing closer to his back, the archer sighed, “I don’t deserve you, you know. But I have no intention of letting you go.”

“Good . . . because I have no intention of going anywhere.” It might have seemed impossible for a man as big and as solid as Bucky to snuggle into his smaller lover, but the Soldier had no problems managing it as he wrapped Clint’s arms around him more fully and rested his head on Clint’s pillow. “Go to sleep, khishchnik . . . we’ll figure it out in the morning. Okay?”

“Okay,” he agreed, pressing a warm kiss to the nape of his lover’s neck before nuzzling into him. “Good night.”

For awhile it seemed like the other man wouldn’t say anything. However, just before the archer slipped away, Bucky murmured, “Sleep well, love.”

*****************************

Something had changed, between Darcy and Bucky. And yet, Clint could still remember the aching feeling of unhappiness that had filled him that night, as he drew Darcy away from the ballroom containing his bloodied, mangled boyfriend. “Darce, come on . . . we gotta let the Doc work. We need to get you checked out, okay? Come on . . .”

“No!” she begged on a sob, straining against the arms he had wrapped around her belly. “This is my fault. I should have done something . . . I should have said something! I could have lied! I could have protected him!”

“Lying would have only made it worse, Darcy. It’s okay, peresmeshnika . . . he’s gonna be okay.”

“No!” she begged on a sob, straining against the arms he had wrapped around her belly. “This is my fault. I should have done something . . . I should have said something! I could have lied! I could have protected him!”

“Lying would have only made it worse, Darcy. It’s okay, peresmeshnika . . . he’s gonna be okay.”

“He just took a half dozen bullets in the chest . . . how can you say that!?” she screeched, eyes wide as he finally managed to drag her completely from the ballroom.

“Because I know Bucky . . . and he will fight like hell to stay alive.” There was a small, sad smile on his lips as he continued, “For my sake . . . and from the looks of things, for yours.”

Sniffling hard, she stared at him in shock. “How are you here? I didn’t know you were here? Who were those people?”

“My family . . . my sister, HER sisters, my brothers, my nephew, my uncle, my sister’s Misfits . . . people we trusted to rescue Bucky and you.”

“I don’t understand. It’s only been about an hour; how did you all get here so fast?”
Clint snorted with a roll of his eyes, one hand coming up to scratch at the back of his head. “Believe it or not, it’s my nephew’s wedding in three days. We all came to help put the finishing details on the event.” One shoulder shrugged as he sighed, “It was just a matter of luck, that’s all.”

“Younger nephew . . . lives in Toronto?”

“My nephew is Sam Braddock . . . although, his real name is Sam Grimm. He only goes by Braddock when he’s working.”

“Braddock? Jane’s BODYGUARD!?” she squeaked, eyes wide open in shock. “He’s your NEPHEW!?”

“Da. He’s my brother Will’s oldest son. Will and Marina adopted him almost three years ago.”

“Why the hell was he assigned to Jane?” she demanded, hands coming up on her hips.

“Because this is not his first protection detail at the Royal York,” came a Clint’s voice from behind her, the tone uncharacteristically stern and almost angry.

Her eyes went wide in alarm as she stared at Clint - who was in fact standing in front of her - earning a wicked grin from the archer as he laughed, “Darcy . . . meet my brother, Colonel William M. Grimm of the United States Army. Will, this is Darcy Lewis.”

Spinning slowly on her toes, she stared up wide eyed at the nearly identical face of the man behind her, molten silver eyes looking down at her from their several inches of height difference. “Hi?” she squeaked, looking sheepish.

One eyebrow cocked upwards as he watched her; frankly she was a little offended his eyes never strayed from her face. She had fantastic breasts . . . they’d gotten her out of more than a few tight spots before. It would be a lie to say that she wasn’t looking for a little help. Colonel William M. Grimm, to be honest, looked pissed. “Miss Lewis,” he replied, eyes piercing into her for a second more, before they moved to his brother. “How’s Bucky?”

“Four bullets, center mass. Marina’s gonna be pissed.”

“Marina IS pissed . . . Lucky is inside grumbling about the ‘Boss Lady breaking all her toys’ again,” Will replied with an amused smirk. “Sam’s in with Vincent?”

“Yeah . . . Vincent needed extra hands and Sam is field trained.”

“Good,” he said, eyes scanning back to the intern. One eye narrowed slightly as he frowned, “You’re Darcy Anderson-Lewis . . . aren’t you?”

The woman blinked at him, startled by his usage of her full last name. She’d refused the “Anderson” identifier since she and her father - the King Asshat that he was - had had their final blow out and Darcy had left Ohio, as well as her beloved baby brother Blaine, behind. “How do you know that?”

His mouth relaxed as one corner of his lips quirked upwards. “I make a point to know everything about the people my brothers claim feelings for. It’s safer that way.”

“Safer!? For who? Stalker!” she exploded, hands coming up on her hips as she glared up at him.

“You are aware of what we do for a living, right? The last thing I want is some HYDRA mole sneaking in and taking out my family because one of my brothers fell head over heels and I didn’t do the smart thing, and check them out.” There was a small tensing in the corner of his smile, morphing the expression to a grimace, as he insisted, “I value my loved ones too much, to care about a little thing like privacy.”

Her eyes narrowed at him, even as her logic brain argued that he did have a valid point. It was probably smarter not to trust anyone at the outset than it was to trust everyone. Which, of course, didn’t mean she had to like it. Folding her arms over her chest, she huffed, “Fine . . . I can kind of understand how that makes sense. However, just as a word of warning, it’s just Lewis now. Anderson has gone the way of the trash heap and I am more than content to let it rot there.”

Nodding once solemnly, he agreed, “Understood.” His head cocked to the side as he asked, “Are you all right, Miss Lewis? I understand you’ve been through quite the ordeal.”

Her eyes rolled as she blew a steady stream of air from between her lips. “I’m fine . . . my personal bulldog made sure of that.”

There was a moment where the Colonel seemed stunned at the response, before he shook his head. “Agent Barnes is one of the best agents I have. He asked to be head of your security detail specifically, left my son Sam to guard Jane.” He smirked as he continued in an almost teasing tone, “To be honest, it was a little startling. Bucky doesn’t usually like anybody.”

Clint’s grin was small as he watched Darcy slouch. “Damn it. Now I feel like a bitch for being so awful to him.”

“It’s okay . . . we all know who would be the one to blame for that little detail.” Will insisted, as his younger brother hissed, “Rumlow will get his . . . you can be sure of it.”

The Colonel chuckled as he reached out to ruffle his brother’s hair, teasing, “No blood on Marina’s carpet. Dong le ma?”

“Da,” the archer grinned with a wicked gleam in his eyes.

Turning back to the intern, the man nodded briskly in her direction. “You should get checked out, Miss Lewis. Clint can see you to the medical staff here on site.” Glancing up as someone called his name from the other side of the crowd, he nodded at her formally and insisted, “It was a pleasure, Miss Lewis. I imagine we’ll be seeing you more over the next little bit, yes?”

She blinked in surprise at the question, glancing at Clint in hopes he could provide the answer. The agent grinned as he promised, “We’ll see you at the hospital, right?”

“Likely . . . I have to head in eventually to check on Buck,” Will replied, looking over as the call came again, this time infinitely more impatient. “I’m coming! Clint . . . Miss Lewis . . .”

Darcy watched him stride through the crowd for a moment more before rounding on her . . . whatever he was, hissing, “You didn’t tell me you and your brother were identical!”

“Didn’t think it was important,” he replied with a lazy shrug.

“Of course it was important! Are you twins!?”

“No . . . Will’s ten years older than I am,” he explained, steering her towards the ambulances. “And I have eight brothers . . . most of them look like me.”

There was a long moment as she tried to assimilate that information before her voice screeched over the sounds of the crowd, “WHAT!?”
Yes, that IS Frank Hardy of Hardy Boys fame. And yes, Joe and Nancy Drew WILL show up at some point, I promise.

Also, check out Caiti and BairsSidhe's fics within the verse guys. They are awesome!!!!
So there was some confusion in the last chapter. Thor DID show up and he DID go back. However, because nothing really changed, I didn't feel the need to go into detail. We will see Thor again, I promise, very soon in fact.

Also. There is a story timeline coming. As soon as we've finished hashing it out, I will get it posted. Thank you!!!

Chapter 230: A Day of Firsts

Grant cursed silently under his breath as he fought to get his pants on over his knee. The brace had been a constant fashion accessory for three months already and he was more than ready to shoot a rocket at it . . . though, preferably not attached to his leg. “Fuck shit damn,” he cussed, teeth grinding as he struggled.

A knock on the door of his room jolted him upwards in surprise. “Yeah . . . I'm decent . . . mostly!”

Sam stuck his head into the room with a small smile. “Your grasp of profanity is awe inspiring, man.
“Seriously.”

“My pants are stuck,” Grant muttered, yanking on his pants.

“Okay, first of all, you're going to rip them. Second of all, you could ask for help,” the blond reminded him, coming into the room and crouching at his feet. Smacking at Ward’s hands, it was only a couple moments before the fabric was free, the brace was sitting correctly around the joint and Sam was drawing the pants upwards past the brace. “Voila . . . crisis averted.”

Grant blushed lightly as Sam moved to lean back against the dresser, watching the other man finish pulling his pants up and fastening them at his waist. Fumbling upwards, he hopped awkwardly to grab the belt from off the table. “Thanks Sam.”

“You are hella stubborn, you know that?” the sniper asked. “Would it KILL you to ask for help once in awhile?”

Grant kept his focus on his hands as he threaded the leather through his pants, shrugging haphazardly. “I'm used to being self-sufficient. Asking for help doesn't come naturally to me.”

Blue eyes rolled as Ward hobbled to the chair where his shoes were resting. Bending, he grabbed them up before making his way towards the bed. It took two seconds of struggling before Sam let out a foul curse and moved forward. “You kill me, Grant . . . like seriously. I'm standing right here!”

Shrugging, the specialist watched as Sam helped put his shoes on as though he were a child, triple knotting the laces just to make sure they didn't come loose. He frowned, watching his friend stand again before blurting, “Are you sure you want me to come to your wedding? You're SURE??”

“Oh geez, don't start this again,” Sam groaned.

“I just . . . I've never been to a wedding.”

“You have the easy job. You sit in a chair between Vincent and Ma and watch. I'm the one who has to remember my vows and say I do and endure a hundred eyes on me.”

“There's not gonna be a hundred people there,” Grant reminded him with a roll of his eyes.

“It was a figure of speech, Grant . . . people use those.”

Narrowing his eyes, he sighed, “Come on, Sam, be serious.”

“I am being serious. You're my friend. Friends come to weddings. I want you, as my friend, at my wedding.”

“But . . .” the brunette protested, earning a sigh and a grunted, “You're an idiot.”

“I am not! I have a decent if not exceptional IQ. I passed all my tests and . . .”

Chuckles stopped Grant in the middle of his diatribe. Frowning, he looked up to see Sam laughing. It took a moment for the light bulb to switch on, before he groaned, “Figure of speech?”

“We'll turn you into a real boy eventually,” Sam replied in answer with a smirk.

“You're hilarious,” Grant joked with a halfhearted glare, before leaning over to grab his crutches.

“Why thank you . . .” Sam sassed, following him from the downstairs guest room and out into the living room of his house. “Do you have everything?”
Grant shook his head, as he maneuvered to grab the items off the coffee table, a book, a notebook and a pen which ended up making its way behind his ear. Sam rolled his eyes in amusement as he watched Grant try to figure out how to use the crutches without losing his things. Stepping forward, he lifted the books and tucked them under his arm. “Come on . . . everyone else is already at the courthouse.”

Nodding, Grant hobbled after Sam as he led the way out to his truck. It took a moment’s maneuvering but eventually, he was inside and they were on their way. “How’s your uncle?” Ward asked, fiddling with the pages of his book as he stared out the side window.

“Bored and frustrated. My Uncle Clint is kind of smothering him.”

Glowering down at his knee, the specialist grumbled bitterly, “Must be nice to heal so fast.”

“Welcome to the world of the supersoldier. It’s a wealth of crazy ideas, batshit plans and a boatload of injury. But at least life is never boring,” Sam chuckled with a grin. “And because they heal so fast, it’s only a couple days before they get to do it all over again.”

“Yeah well us non-supersoldiers go out and do it all over again after a couple of days too.” Grant reminded with a low huff.

“Yeah . . . how long has it been since you’ve been in the field? Cause I don’t think Ma’s let you leave the handler pool since you got transferred from under Garrett last time you got hurt.”

“That was my last time. She’s adamantly I’m not allowed back in the field till I’m fully recovered. And between her and Vincent I don’t have a chance in hell of changing their minds.” Grant said with a roll of his eyes. “Don’t get me wrong; I appreciate what Marina is doing but I’m going stir crazy in the handler pool. If I never see another piece of unfinished paperwork, it’ll be too soon.”

Glancing at the book in Grant’s hands, Sam asked, “So is that why you brought work with you on vacation?”

“This is different. I like doing these for Marina . . . I never had a chance to read before now.” Grant shrugged, his head turning slightly towards Sam. “It’s enlightening?”

“So what are you reading?”

“Much Ado About Nothing. It’s a play by Shakespeare.”

The blond grinned as he teased, “I know what it is, Grant; I’ve read it before. Any favorite parts?”

“Not yet . . . I like that Beatrice isn’t a weakling though. And Benedict is funny.”

“The two of them are a hoot; I’ll let you read the whole thing before I tell you why I love them. But they’re the best characters in it. Certainly the most memorable.”

Grant flipped the pages through his fingers. “I’m only a little bit into it. I just started it.”

“Then sit back and prepare to laugh. It’s a riot.”

There was a reluctant smile, before Grant asked, “You’re SURE?!”

“Grant . . . shut up.”

The two friends arrived to find Marina flitting around the room. One of her daughters was tucked against her chest and the other was in Will's arms, as the Colonel talked with his brothers. She looked like a honeybee gathering pollen . . . except three times as scary.

The two joined the circle, at about the same time Brian did, confusion on his face. “Okay, I missed something,” the brown eyed brother insisted, glancing back over his shoulder. “Who's the new girl?”

Will smiled at Grant and Sam, before turning back to his brother. “Which one?”

“The one holding onto Bucky’s hand like a spider monkey? Seriously, we're not gonna eat her.”

“That's Darcy Lewis. From what I understand, she has joined the relationship between Clint and Bucky.”

“She's one of their flings!?”

Aaron chuckled as he shook his head, “Nah . . . it's a permanent thing.”

“Wait, so the trio is a threesome?” Natasha asked curiously, even as her lover announced, “That doesn't explain what crawled up her bonnet and died.”

“It’s entirely possible that she’s a little daunted by the lot of you. I doubt Agent Barton informed her at first that all his brothers were identical and you all are very scary upon first impression.” Grant chimed up suddenly, his eyes flicking between the gathered Grimms before resting on the Colonel.

“She was appropriately stunned, when I met her for the first time last week,” Will agreed, reaching out to clap him on the shoulder gently.

Sam grunted as he replied, “Asshole terrorists. They couldn't have taken the hotel hostage AFTER my wedding?”

“And what is your day job again?” Grant snarked his eyes flicking to Sam. “Terrorists in general aren’t usually accommodating to our wishes.”

“Yeah, I don't care. Jules, on the other hand, wasn't happy about the delay. It gave Ma an extra four days to ‘brighten up’ the venue.”

“It’s your mother Sam . . . she would have done it regardless of Jules’ wishes. She wants the best for her boy.” Grant pointed out with a grin.

Sam grinned in return, glancing over at the threesome. “So, she's completely taken off guard then. The Grimms don't exactly come with a handbook or a reliable frame of reference.”

The two younger agents looked back at the younger woman. She was clutching at Bucky’s hand, as though he was her lifeline, while also fussing at the assassin whenever he tried to do anything. “So here's the next question? Should we go rescue Darcy? Or Bucky?”

“Well that and she met the most reckless Grimm first,” Grant chuckled, head cocking slightly as he studied to picture. “Frankly I think Bucky needs the rescue more, I don’t think Clint is the only one fussing over him.”

Sam sighed, "The things we do for love of family." Looking up at his dad, the blond snarked, “Grant and I are gonna go rescue Uncle Bucky. Is that okay?”

Will nodded once, an amused smile on his lips, before watching Sam prod the taller agent in the trio’s direction. “This should be interesting.”
“Why do I suddenly get the impression you are planning to use me as a shield?” Grant grunted as he hobbled along on the crutches towards the newly arrived trio.

“First rule of combat among Grimms? Don't harm the wounded,” Sam replied with a snicker.

“Right; so you’re expecting retaliation and I’m your best defense against it.” Grant shook his head before finally pulling to a stop in front of the group.

“Pretty much,” the sniper agreed, before grinning at his uncles. “Hey Uncle Bucky . . . Uncle Clint.” Turning to the woman, he turned on his WOW smile and insisted, “If I wasn’t getting married today, I could honestly say you're beautiful. However my sexy sniper chick would probably shoot me for even looking at another woman, so I'm gonna ask what you're doing with these idiots instead.”

“Your sexy, knocked up and hormonal sniper chick would take it out of your ass.” Grant retorted with an eyeroll “Though he kinda does have at least half a point in the latter, namely in regards to Clint.”

Darcy stared up at the two with wide eyes, prompting Bucky to take pity. “Darcy, my nephew Sam Grimm, and his friend Grant Ward. Guys, this is Darcy. Be nice.”

“Do you really think Marina would let us get away with not being nice to someone who is obviously attached to two of her boys?” Grant asked arching one brow as his eyes flicked to Bucky with a half grin. “Frankly I’m in no condition to handle her wrath.”

“How’s your book report coming?” Clint teased with a smirk.

“Marina has one waiting on Sam’s kitchen bench and I’ve only just started the next book.” Grant retorted as he shifted on the crutches.

Darcy patted the say next to her. “You look tired. Go ahead and take a seat . . . the both of you. You look like you have stories. I could use all the ammunition I can get.”

“I’m still learning the ammunition against them myself,” Grant chuckled even as he gladly slid onto the bench at Darcy’s offer.

Sam grinned, “I, on the other hand, have a lot of it. Ask me anything you want to know.”

Clint glowered at his nephew, muttering, “Don't make me get Marina, Sammy.”

“You really think Marina’s gonna do anything to him on his wedding day?” Grant retorted as his head tilted to look up at Clint. “She gets a little over protective of weddings from what I’ve been noticing.”

“Damn it,” he muttered, slouching back in his chair before reminding his nephew, “Just remember, I know where you keep your favorite rifle. I'd hate for the firing pin to go missing or something.”

“Doesn’t he know where you keep all your bows?” Grant queried as he looked to Bucky one brow arching “You're looking good given the extent of the injuries I heard you received.”

“Four bullets to the chest sucks . . . I don't recommend it,” Bucky agreed with a small grimace in place of his usual grin.

“Marina lecture you about being reckless and putting yourself in the line of fire, yet?” The specialist shifted on the bench to try and get his leg in a comfortable position. “She’s kind of scary when she goes into that whole over protective mother tiger mode.”
“I have more than a little experience with Marina's overprotective tendencies. I've been dealing with them since she was a child,” Bucky reminded the brunet with a grin. “But there may have been a conversation like that at some point in the last week, yes.”

Sam grabbed a chair and hauled it over, ordering, “Put your foot up. Your fidgeting is making me antsy.”

“You sure it's that making you antsy and not the impending nuptials?” Grant snarked even as he put his foot up on the offered chair “But thank you.”

Darcy snickered, amused by their relationship. “So . . . how long have you two been friends?”

Grant snorted, “Well . . . we're friends?! No one bothered to clue me in!”

“Shut up,” Sam chuckled, features bright and laughing as he rolled his eyes.

“I'm not the one to ask on that though Darcy. This is all new to me . . . prior to Marina swooping in most people called me a robot, or pinocchio.” Grant said quietly offering the young woman a slightly sad smile.

“Pinocchio?” she echoed, eyes wide at the undercurrent of loneliness in his eyes. “Why Pinocchio?”

“Well if you ask Sam, I'm sure he'd say I wasn’t a real boy and that they are doing their best to rectify that.” Grant admitted with a sigh. “I got used to being a lone wolf and staying away from human companionship.”

“Everyone needs a little love, Agent Ward. Even Pinocchio.”

“Maybe . . . frankly I'm still adjusting to the whirlwind presence that is Marina.” He chuckled with a shake of his head. “How she stays sane with this lot around boggles the mind.”

“Practice,” Bucky and Clint announced together, earning a chuckle as the archer continued, “Lots and lots of practice.”

“Somehow I suspect that Darcy is probably going to need to learn Marina’s trick.” Grant’s lips twitched slightly.

“Probably,” Sam agreed, seconds before Marina bustled over, offering the baby to the blond “Sam! Take your sister! I have to go figure out what happened to the officiant.” Giving the woman a warm smile, the Russian insisted, “Hello Darcy. I'm so glad you could make it. Grant . . . you stay off that knee as much as you can, da?”

“Da,” he agreed looking up to the woman with a sheepish smile.

Combing her fingers through his dark hair fondly, she then went up on tiptoes to press warm kisses to both her son’s and daughter's cheeks. “Love you, Sammy-honey.”

“Love you too, Ma,” the blond replied with a warm smile.

Darcy’s eyes were wide as she watched the handler disappear. “I was fully expecting to be terrified of that woman.”

“Give it time. You'll see the Gadyuka eventually. Maybe sooner than later depending on Sam’s fiancee and her current mood.” Grant turned to Darcy with a shrug. “Marina is the most loving person you’ll ever meet . . . until you hurt one of her boys. Than she'll likely disembowel you before ripping you to shreds.”

Sam sighed, “My fiancee would be one of those people my mother doesn't like for that exact reason.”

“Jules was a bitch.”

“She had her reasons.”

“Be that as it may, her execution in the matter left something to be desired,” the specialist snarked with a roll of his eyes. They hadn't been friends then, but as he’d told Sam, he wasn't stupid. Marina was NOT happy with Jules, and he’d asked why. Sam had told him; he made his own opinions from there, an opinion Jules had not done much to overturn, though they had admittedly never spent any time together to this point. “Your mom loves you . . . she's biting her tongue, but I promise you . . . she hates this.”

“I know. She's trying though, for my sake at least.”

“Can the same be said of Jules though? She seems to avoid your family as much as can be possible from what I’ve witnessed and especially from being alone with any of them.” Grant shook his head and mentally chastised himself for voicing his opinion.

“I'm working on it,” Sam sighed, glancing over to where Team One was chatting amongst themselves. Spike was the only one who had ventured to the Grimm side of the room. He and Jason were animated in their conversation, which mean there was some kind of technobabble happening.

“Maybe the baby will mellow her out a little. It’ll certainly give her an in with Marina anyways.” Grant looked to the baby in Sam’s arms before scrunching his nose up and crossing his eyes to try and entertain the infant “Which of your sisters is that? I still can’t tell them apart.”

“Valya.”

“Hey there little Miss Valya.” Grant chimed one hand lifting to stroke at her cheek “They are getting bigger.”

“They're three months old already. I can't even believe it. Jules is 4 months pregnant too. It's insane. Five months, I'm gonna have one of my own.”

“Another person who’ll have you wrapped around their little finger,” Grant teased.

Bucky chuckled from where he was cuddling with Darcy. “Baby fever is on the wind. You thinking off a child of your own, Ward?”

“That kind of involves having a woman in your life who can stand being around you, Barnes.” Grant scoffed as he slouched back against the seat.

Sam laid his hand on his shoulder, squeezing warmly. “It'll happen.”

“Yeah and pigs fly, Sam.” The specialist retorted with an eye roll even as his hand came up to squeeze at Sam’s in appreciation.

Clint smirked, “Never thought I'd find our girl again, but we did. Just . . . keep an open mind, yeah?”

“All I can promise is that I'll try. Might take some rewiring of my thought processes though.” Grant snarked back at the archer with a grin.
The archer laughed, “I know a good tech nerd who could take care of that for you.”

Jason snorted as he approached, “You had better be talking about me, birdbrain.”

“Despite being called a robot I’m a hundred percent sure my brain is not a computer.” Grant snorted as he shook his head.

Darcy giggled, amused by the interplay between these men she’d committed herself and their family. Clint grinned, “Nah . . . I was talking about Hardy.”

“Good thing I like the kid, otherwise I’d be sincerely put out,” Jason snarked, before turning to Sam. “Your presence is required. I’ll take your sister.”

Sam suddenly looked nervous, even as he offered the baby to his uncle. “Shit . . . this is it. I’m getting married.”

“Someone make sure the doors are locked and the windows closed. Last thing we need is to lose the groom and face a hormonal, angry bride.” Grant teased even as he squeezed at Sam’s arm one more time before letting his hand drop.

“You suck.”

“You're the one who keeps telling me to be a real boy.” Grant tossed back with a smirk. “It seemed a good time to try it out.”

Sam rolled his eyes, before straightening his coat and moving towards the front of the room. “Here we go.”

Turning his head towards Sam’s uncles, Grant asked “What do you think the chances are that they get through this without the team being called out?”

“One in a million.”

“You think Marina will ever get used to Jules being a permanent fixture in the family? I get the oddest impression she already likes Darcy more than Jules.”

Clint chuckled, “You would not be wrong.”

“Buckle into your seat Darcy, I think you’re officially now part of the family crazy.” Grant turned to the brunette nestled between Clint and Bucky with a wry grin. “Though I’m pretty sure these two will keep you safe.”

“Oh that's not ominous at all.” Eyebrows furrowing, she asked, “It's a good thing she likes me, right?”

“So long as you don’t hurt her boys you’ll be fine. A badass Marina may be but there’s nothing she wouldn’t do to keep her family happy.” Grant admitted “It takes a little getting used to.”

“Spoken like a man with experience,” Bucky chuckled, wincing slightly as he pulled on the still healing wounds.

“Don’t laugh with bullet wounds in the chest man, they hurt like a son of a bitch.” Grant remarked with a sympathetic wince.

“Again with the experience.”
Grant shrugged his expression falling deadpan as he mumbled “What can I say I was broken a lot when Marina scooped me up. She’s still piecing me back together like Humpty Dumpty.”

“Did Garrett really drag you back out into the field after that fucked up mess?” Clint asked, tone hushed as the music began to play, though still curious.

“He always sent me back out before I fully healed.” Grant admitted quietly as his eyes flicked up to where Sam stood.

“Der’mo . . .” Bucky hissed furiously, “. . . someone needs to drop that asshole into a bottomless pit somewhere.”

“I suspect Marina is already planning that somewhere in the back of her brain between her multitasking.” Grant grunted “I’d be obliged if she dumped Rumlow in there with him.”

Clint’s growled, “I second that suggestion,” was not nearly as surprisingly as Darcy’s own, “Agreed.”

Grant blinked. “I missed something?”

Darcy waved her hand imperiously as Jules joined Sam at the front. “Sssh. It’s starting.”

He frowned, opening to speak before Marina took the seat next to him with the Colonel of the opposite side of her, Valya asleep in her arms and Katenka cooing up at her father adoringly. Reaching out with her free hand, Marina linked her fingers with the younger man and smiled. “We might actually make it through this without a catastrophe.”

Rene snickered from the other side of Will, “I wouldn't bet on it.”

Truer words had never been spoken.
Chapter Notes

Sit back and enjoy the ride. It's gonna be a crazy one.

Also there IS a TIMELINE!! It's in construction and subject to change, but it's up! Woot!!

Chapter 231: Toronto Falls

It had, surprisingly, been a good day. No explosions. No yelling matches. And Marina had NOT lost her temper with Julianna. It had been a very good day.

Sam and Julianna were on shift with Team One, enjoying their last day on the same team, before
Sam transferred to Team Three. Marina was in the kitchen, throwing together food for the rest of the family. Grant was at the dining room table, reading his book and working on his book report. And Rene was in the living room with his uncles, playing video games and screwing around together. The babies were in bed and the aunts were cuddling their lovers, gossiping about the wedding.

As for Will himself, he was seated at the table with Grant, keeping an eye on these people he loved and relieved that they were all safe for the moment.

Marina sailed from the kitchen, holding a tray of food. She bent to press an absent kiss to Grant's head before moving to give her lover a more lingering one. “You're thinking too loudly again, Mishka,” she teased adoringly, even as she placed a plate in front of Grant. “Eat that, Prizrak.”

“Yes ma'am,” her newest acquisition replied, tone absent as he continued reading. The specialist’s free hand groped across the table, finding the sandwich by touch and bringing it to his mouth without ever looking at it.

Marina sighed, smiling at him. “Remember to chew it too, okay?”

Grant said nothing, just hummed agreeably before tuning her out. Her Colonel smiled at his Russian, amused by her maternal tendencies. “You are too good to us, samaya malen’kaya.”

She laughed, the sound brilliant and happy. “No such thing, Misha.”

Lifting one hand to grip the collection of necklaces she wore, he pulled her down and pulled her giggling mouth to his own. Her fingers splayed across his face, petting fondly against the skin as she allowed him to devour her at his will. “Ya lyublyu tebya, zhemchuzhina.”

“Vsegda, moy lyubimov,” she breathed in adoring agreement, pressing another kiss to his mouth before taking the food into the living room.

Slouching back in his chair, Will closed his eyes and relaxed. It was a good day.

He could hear the girls in the living room, and he smirked as Casey sighed, “At least nothing exploded.”

Jason snickered, teasing his fiancee, “You love it when things explode.”

“Only in the labs . . . those explosions are pretty,” she argued lightly.

“Pretty?” Aaron asked in a deadpan tone. “Damn, Jay, what the hell are you blowing up?”

“Chemical compounds mostly. They make more interesting explosions than bridges and buildings and the like,” Jason snarked, grinning at the family demolitions expert.

“Bullshit. There's nothing quite like watching a well made bomb do what it's supposed to.”

Will spoke up calmly, “As long as its targets are not civilian, I can agree with that.”

“Bombers who blow shit up just to blow shit up and cause loss of life should be dumped in Afghanistan for a bit. All the IEDs would alter their realities,” Clint snarled, glowering furiously at the reminder of their last assignment in the Sandbox. They’d lost Kenny and, except that the archer was stubborn, they may never have gotten Aaron back either. Clint was understandably still a little bitter about it.

Aaron reached out and clasped his brother's shoulder warmly, hauling him over and into a hard one-arm. “Cool off little brother. I'm back and Byer has seen the error of his ways.”

“He better have. I'm not sure Lucky and I can pull off another HYDRA claim,” Will replied, a small frown growing as Grant's head snapped up at the name.

Those whiskey colored eyes scanned the room for a moment, before locking with the Colonel's. There was deep seated fear and guilt in them, before he blushed and dove back into his book. One quicksilver eye narrowed, before Owen spoke up from the other side of the room. “Eh. They like to take credit for shit they didn't do.”

“How very true,” Will agreed.

Catherine sat on Vincent's lap in the armchair, chiming in, “So, Sam seemed like he was happy.”

“Sam looked worried,” Marta refuted with a shake of her head. “He meant his vows, no question, but he was having some concerns. I could tell.”

Rene looked up from the game, a fierce frown on the teenagers face. “What kind of concerns, Aunt Marta?”

“The tensions between his mother and wife are not imaginary, Rene.”

Marina protested instantly, “I was on my best behavior today. I did everything I could to make sure that was perfect for them both.”

“She’s threatened by you and your presence in Sam’s life,” Grant mumbled after swallowing his mouthful of sandwich, eyes lifting from his book and moving to rest on Marina. “You have a strong hold on his heart and she likely feels threatened by that.”

Will nodded in agreement. “But Sam made his choice and we will abide by it. She can make her peace with that or not . . . it's up to her.”

“So . . . bets on whether or not she gets over her issues and focuses on being happy with him?” Brian asked, curious about what the man thought.

“I can see it going either way really,” Grant stated with a slight shrug. “Depending on whether or not she can pull her head out of her career to focus on her family as well.”

Just then Will's phone screamed from where it was sitting on the mantle. Frowning, he glanced down at his watch, frown deepening at the read out of his son’s number. “It's Sam,” he announced, moving through the collection of legs and bodies to grab the phone.

“Sam never calls during shift,” Marina protested, instantly worried and body on high alert.

Nodding in silent agreement, Will lifted the phone to his ear announcing, “Brandt.”

Sam's voice was angry and frustrated, though the fearful undercurrent had the majority of Will's focus. “Dad . . . we have a problem.”

“What kind of problem?” he asked, hand coming up to stall Marina’s instant demands for answers.

“Someone has planted bombs all around the city and we could use the help. The Health and Welfare building and City Hall both just went up. And before that, Spike defused one at the 911 dispatch center,” his son explained, sounding frazzled and concerned. “We could use some S.H.I.E.L.D. help, if they'd be willing to give it.”
“Done. Where are you all headquartered? We’ll meet you there.”

“Dispatch. With the bomb dead in the water, it's the safest place right now.”

“Give me twenty. And Sam . . . be careful and be smart. Take care of your wife.”

“Copy that. See you in twenty.”

Turning off the phone, Will took a second to gather his thoughts before looking up to sweep his arms across the room. “Suit up . . . we're going to work.”

Grant straightened in his chair. “Work?”

Marina was maybe the only one not stunned by the statement, already bolting for the stairs and her uniform. Will nodded, “A bomber has placed a series of bombs at several points around the city. We've been asked, as S.H.I.E.L.D. to assist.”

Grant reached for the crutches leaning against the table and announced, “I can watch the kids for you.”

“No, Cat, Rene, Gus and Malee can do that. You're a specialist. I need your brain.”

The younger man seemed startled by the insistence, even as he nodded. “I brought my uniform, just in case.”

“Then go change. Vincent, this could be a mess. Can you handle it? Sounds like they're gonna need medical personnel.”

“I'll be fine. Let me go get changed into uniform.”

Everybody move. We're on a clock and it's ticking.”

“Yes sir,” was the instantaneous reply.

Bucky looked up at his CO as Will stepped to place a hand on his shoulder. “You gotta sit this one out, Buck.”

Taking a deep breath, the assassin nodded in agreement. “I know. I hate it, but I know.”

Do you want me to keep Clint with you and Darcy? Just say the word.”

“You need Clint. He's the best sniper in the world. We'll be all right. Bullet wounds or not, I am not helpless.”

“I’d consider myself in your debt if you could watch out for everyone we're gonna leave behind. I don't anticipate the bombs making their way this far out, but panicked people do stupid things.”

“Of course. You don't even need to ask.”

“Thank you,” the Colonel sighed in relief, a small tug at the corner of his mouth. Patting the man's shoulder quickly once more, he turned and headed towards his room, already pulling at his tie and getting into his analyst mindset. The next several hours were gonna be a clusterfuck; civilian targets were always the worst.
Will was already handing out orders to his family as he led the way into the dispatch center. “Jason, I need you to get online. Reach out to as many of your hacker friends as you can. Start with Auggie . . . branch out. I want to try and get this asshole pinned down.” Glancing at his Second, he insisted, “If it has a cell signal, I want to know where it’s coming from and where it’s going to.”

“Copy that,” Jason agreed, veering off towards where Spike was already seated at one of the dispatch tables, Casey hot on his heels.

“Aaron, I need a read on the bomber. Take a look at the bomb Spike defused and see what you can figure out.”

“Got it,” the demolitions officer agreed, moving towards Spike, the two bomb guys shaking hands familiarly before Spike led Aaron out of sight.

Turning to his Doctors Three, Will frowned heavily. “We have a lot of casualties. I need you to check out the city . . . find the best location for a mass triage center. Check the maps first. Soon as you have a few ideas, let me know . . . we’ll get you the security you’ll need. At which point, we need you to get there and get to work. The wounded are the first priority.”

“Yes sir,” Vincent replied, glancing at his colleagues and seeing the same determination on their faces that he knew was on his own. “Ladies . . . shall we?”

Next the Colonel turned to find Grant, finding the specialist bringing up the rear as he crutched through the cluttered space. Looking around the space, he spotted a huge map of Toronto hanging on the wall. “Grant . . . I need your brain.”

“Yes sir,” Grant agreed, crutching forward to stand next to the Colonel in front of the map. “What am I looking at?”

“Targets,” Will replied, glancing at him seriously. “I have a whole city to cover. You’re a specialist . . . if you were our bomber, where would you hit?”

“How many bombs am I looking at?”

“Take a look at your options, assign them a rank in term of viability. Soon as I have an answer, I’ll let you know.”

“Copy that,” Grant agreed, hobbling forward and grabbing a black sharpie from one of the cans on the desk next to him.

Marina came bolting up then, her sisters dark and vengeful behind her. “Misha . . . the federal building that was hit. There’s a daycare inside. Sam can’t get to it . . . he and Lane are too big for the tunnel. I’m going.”

“Wait . . . what?” he asked, whirling to face her, features stern as he asked, “What are you talking about, you’re going?”

“There are children, Misha.”

“I understand that. And I can understand why that’s your first pull. But you’re not going alone.”

“I won’t be alone . . . my sisters are going with me,” the Russian agreed, gesturing to the other three Murderesses at her back.

Natasha’s jaw locked hard as she snarled, “And if we meet the mudak responsible for this, we promise to leave him breathing and regretting every intake of air.”

“That’s my girls,” Will agreed with a vicious grin, stepping forward to kiss Marina quickly. “Go. Be smart . . . kick ass.”

“That’s what we do,” Nika purred in agreement, black eyes gleaming as brightly as stars in her face.

Hands shoving into his pockets, he watched the four women storm from the room, and felt genuine pity for any idiot who got in their way. A voice cleared from behind him, and the Colonel turned to look at Sergeant Gregory Parker, the two men staring at each other awkwardly for a moment. Will hadn’t forgotten the fact Parker had all but accused him of beating his own son within an inch of his life . . . and Parker knew better than to think that the Colonel would have ever forgotten.

This was going to be uncomfortable for everyone.

Taking a deep breath in through his nose, Will offered the other man his hand. “Sergeant Parker.”

Those eyes were assessing, even as he reached to clasp the officer’s hand. “Colonel Brandt. Much obliged for the help.”

“Sam asked . . . I could never have denied him,” the Colonel reminded him with a small smile. “Tell me what you know.”

“Nothing . . . in fact, even less than nothing. We’ve had one call from the bomber, but it told us absolutely nothing.”

“Recorded?” he asked, earning an answering nod.

“Yeah . . . come on. Maybe you can catch something I didn’t.”

Nodding, Will followed Parker to a station and giving the woman running it a charming smile. “Ma’am,” he greeted. “Colonel Will Brandt . . . a pleasure to meet you.”

“Colonel . . .” she replied, seconds before she returned her attention to the call she was taking.

Parker reached out and grabbed a small recorder, offering it to Will with a set of headphones. “I hope you can get something.”

“Do you have a pad of paper? And a pen? I prefer writing out my notes . . . makes it easier for my brain to work.”

A moment later, items in hand, Will put the headphones on and then pressed play. Frowning, the officer closed his eyes and began to scribble his thoughts onto the page. After a moment, he hit stop, rewound and played it again. Over and over again, until at last, he opened his eyes and hit stop. “I think I have a handle on this guy . . . I think.”

“I’ll take any theories you’d be willing to offer.”

“He objected to your rank first . . . he’s seeking control, he wants to be in charge. Your rank is a threat to that. It’s a hindrance to his dominance.” There was a pause, before Will smirked wryly, “I can only imagine what his reaction to my own would have been.”

“I doubt it would have resulted in anything good.”

“Doubtful,” the analyst agreed, as he turned his attention to his notes. “This is the part that strikes me most, though, that tells me the most. ‘The one who’s running the show’. In combination with his calling you a ‘puppet’ . . .” Will’s head shook once, eyes narrowing, “He wants control, because before this he has always been the puppet.”

“Puppet of what?”

“Soon as we figure that out . . . we’ll have a better idea of pinning this guy down.”

Jason spoke up just then, “Will! I have a manifesto!”

“Shit . . . I hate it when the bad guy has a damned manifesto,” Aaron swore, coming back into the room with a scowl. “How’d you get it?”

“He sent it to the news stations . . . news forwarded it on to 52nd Division. Just showed up . . . and he’s either getting sloppy or he’s dropping bread crumbs. Cause it was sent to the station from a smartphone, registered to an Anson Holt.”

“Get on it. Find Holt . . . I want to know how he’s connected.” Turning to Jason, Will ordered, “Under no circumstances are you to send anyone after Holt, until I figure out what the hell is going on.”

“Copy that.”

Turning to Parker, Will asked, “You’re a profiler . . . and I need you to set up a profile. You and Julianna . . . look at the manifesto, let’s break him down . . . get him into his component parts, okay?”

“Absolutely. Let’s get this bastard,” the sergeant agreed, glowering angrily.
Chapter Notes

Hey guys . . . so the next chapter will be a time jump. This is the end of our latest sojourn in Toronto. If you HAVE NOT read Bloody Moon, I would recommend it. We're going to be picking up with Darcy and Bucky, while Clint is away on that hunt with the rest of the family.

Translations, what few there are, are at the end as always.

Enjoy this one! It's going to be wild!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Ya lyublyu tebya, Mishka.
Vsegda.
Chapter 232: Countdown

The percussion sound of the bomb going off through the comm sent ice rushing through Will’s veins. He’d just been arguing with his son about abandoning his bomb . . . heading for safety. Staggering backwards, he was almost instantly braced up by someone, Jason’s voice next to his ear demanding a sound off through the comms as the technical specialist helped his older brother to a chair. One by one, the family called in . . . except Sam.

From Sam, there was only silence.

Marina’s voice was ringing with terror as she screamed through the comms, “Sammy!? Please, talk to me!”

Will was vaguely aware of Parker speaking to Team One via their own comm system a little ways away, but all he could focus on was the continued absence of his son from the cacophony of voices through the comms. “What the hell was that!?” Aaron demanded, tone furious as he ran through the aisles of the triage center towards his brothers.

Jason had the older brother shoved forward, head between his knees as he hyperventilated, completely focused on the voices in his ear and little else. Green eyes were grave as he murmured, “Keep your voice down. Sam’s bomb blew . . . he’s not responding.”

“Der’molo!” he cussed, a fierce frown on his lips as he reached to place a hand on the Colonel’s shoulder.

Just then a cough and a groan came through the comms. “Listen to the boss, guys . . . you don’t want to do this the hard way,” Sam muttered, the sound of him heaving in air audible through the speaker.

The Russian gave a cry of relief, earning a tensing in her Colonel’s shoulders. Pushing back against Jason’s hands, he straightened in his chair and asked, “Sam? Status.”

“All my pieces are in one place, so I’m gonna count it as a win,” Sam groaned, a harsh grunt coming through the line. “I’m all right. My ears are ringing, so it’s hard to hear, but I’m in one piece.”

“Samuel Wayne Grimm, don’t you EVER do that to me again, you understand me!?” Marina demanded, a wealth of terror and relief in her voice. “Your father tells you to get out . . . you go! That is not up for negotiation.”

“Yes Ma,” he agreed, the heavy sound of boots thudding on linoleum flooring. “This one was pretty little. Not much damage here. They were able to evacuate most of the building, so casualties should be low.”

“Good . . . get yourself checked out by EMS. Then get to the stadium triage center. Understood?” Will ordered, tone a cross between worried father and stern commander.

The sniper knew better than to test his luck at the moment, offering only a firm, “Copy that,” before he turned his focus to his wife’s voice in his other ear. “Jules . . . I’m fine. Really . . .”

Tuning that conversation out, Will closed his eyes and allowed the Colonel side of him come out at full force. “That’s the last thing this govnoyed is blowing up today, is that understood?”

“Yes sir!” came the blanket agreement across the family.

“Marina . . . how’s the daycare coming?”
“Children have been evacuated,” she reported, her voice sad as she continued, “We lost one . . . his name was Ethan. He was a beautiful boy.”

Will’s gut clenched, eyes slipping closed as he breathed a prayer for the parents of the lost child. He could not imagine the pain of losing a child so young . . . the thought of losing Sam had locked him up, but Sam was 28 years old and an officer of the law doing his job. He’d lived a whole life. This little boy was a child, a baby, with a life still to be lived.

Jaw tightening furiously, he hissed, “I’m going to kill Faber with my bare hands.”

Grant had been paying peripheral attention to the conversation happening through his own comm unit. There had been a rush of relief at the knowledge Sam was okay, however the majority of his attention was on the map laid out in front of him. Team One had found the map of targets in Marcus Faber’s home. Jules had been able to trick Faber into confirming the existence of ten bombs . . . however there were only nine targets laid out.

He was trying to pinpoint the tenth, based on the profile Parker and Jules had put together from the manifesto. Suddenly, he snapped upwards, staring at the middle of the map in horror. Eyes flicking back to the profile, he leaned over and circled the stadium with a foul curse . . . the stadium where he stood at that moment. The stadium which held the triage center Vincent, Marta and Scarlett had picked, where the Doctors Three were hard at work for the wounded and injured from the attacks. The stadium where the Colonel was running the family from. The stadium Agent Walsh had moved his computer, and to where Agent Cross had followed his wife to protect her. The triage center housing more than a thousand civilians whose only crime against Faber was being in the wrong place at the wrong time.

“Fuck,” he swore, fumbling for his crutches and trying to get them situated in the crowded area.

Moving forward as fast as he could, he shouted, “Colonel!”

Will looked up, eyes scanning the area in search of Grant as he called back, “Over here!”

“I found it! The tenth target, I found it!”

“Where?” Jason demanded, watching the agent crutch forward.

“We’re standing in it. He hates victims . . . he hates being a victim, so he’s targeting victims.” Lifting one hand from his crutch, he gestured around the makeshift medical center, insisting, “And we’ve been stashing his victims here for hours.”

Aaron nodded, “And he wouldn’t have known where the last target was, until it was announced on the news about an hour ago, so he couldn’t have plotted out where he was going to hit it.”

“Yebat!,” Will cussed, ordering through the comm unit, “Everyone to the triage center, that’s an order! And book it double time.”

“Copy that!”

Turning to the second youngest of the Grimms, Will insisted, “Where would he put it?”

“He had the one bomb that was dirty, remember?” Aaron reminded his brother, one hand on Grant’s shoulder as he guided the younger agent into a chair and off his knee. Turning back to Will, he continued, “The one that took out Holt and the University. None of the others have been dirty; it’s a fair guess that this one is gonna be dirty.”
“Okay . . . so what options does that leave us?”

“He's gonna put it high. The magnitude of the bombs he’s made; none of them would have been able to take out this stadium. And he’s been a one trick pony, all of the bombs have been the same. This one is just going to be a vehicle for the Cesium; but if it’s a big enough bomb, it’s gonna spread. The higher the better.”

Will groaned, his head dropping back to stare up at the jumbo-tron overhead. “Why does it always have to be heights?”

“At least it's not the Burj Khalifa,” Jason snickered, earning a shudder from Will at the reminder. Hanging out the window some 100 stories up was not how he’d wanted to spend his day; damn Ethan Hunt anyway.

“There's a story I'm missing here, I'm guessing?” Grant arched one brow curiously as his eyes moved between Will and Jason. “If you're not a fan of heights Colonel, designate someone else to go up?”

“No . . . he’s gonna be here to make sure that his ‘message’ . . . his endgame plays out the way he wants it to,” the Colonel replied with a frown. “And I want to kill him . . . it’s the only way I’ll be convinced he’s dead.”

“Well in that case think of your daughters while up there to distract yourself from the fact you're up high?” the Specialist offered with a slight shrug “Mind over matter and all that.”

A small smile lifted one corner of the older man’s mouth as he looked back down at the people surrounding him. “Jason . . . let’s start evacuating these people. Talk to the Doctors Three . . . let’s try to get as many people out as we can, okay?”

“Got it,” the tech agreed, dashing off to find Casey and Vincent.

“Aaron, you’re with me. I can handle Faber, but that bomb is your top priority.”

“Copy that.”

“Grant . . . the rest of the team is going to be congregating here. I need all hands on deck, getting these people out. Until Marina gets here, you’re in charge. Got it?”

“In charge? Are you sure?”

“Yes . . . make me proud.”

Eyes like whiskey stared at him in shock, before he nodded firmly, “Yes sir. You can count on me.”

Clapping the younger agent on the shoulder, Will turned to look at Parker. “I don’t know if you’re interested . . . but I could use the back-up.”

There was grudging respect in the sergeant’s eyes as he nodded. “I’d be honored. This guy is really starting to piss me off.”

“A sentiment I can agree with wholeheartedly, I assure you,” the Colonel replied, nodding once at Grant before turning away towards the stairs. “We should head up . . . it’s a long climb to the top. We don’t know where he hid it or how long is left on the timer . . . we have no time to lose.”

“Copy that,” the two men with him agreed, before the three moved off towards the stairs.
The three men were nearly to the stairs when a familiar voice rang from behind him, causing the analyst to freeze in his tracks. “Dad!”

The Colonel whirled, quicksilver eyes scanning through the area and catching on Sam where he stood with Grant and Vincent. “Sam,” he breathed, his entire being pulled back towards his bruised and battered son. There was relief at seeing him alive and frustration with the bomber who had nearly taken him from them.

Aaron reached out and touched his brother’s shoulder. “Go . . . I got this. I’ll head up and I’ll meet you there.”

Nodding briskly, Will turned on his heel and bolted towards his searching son, shouting, “Sam!”

The blond whirled to find the voice, face brightening instantly to see his father bolting in his direction. “Dad!”

The two men met halfway, Will’s arms coming around his son hard as they crashed into each other. “Slava Bogu,” the Colonel sighed, one hand coming up to hold the back of his head. Reaching up, he gripped the younger man’s arms and pushed him back a step, silver eyes scanning him from head to toe. “Are you all right, Sammichka?”

“Yeah . . . I’m okay,” the sniper promised, a sheepish smile on his lips as he watched his dad catalogue every bruise and scrape he could see before hauling his son back into his arms once more. “I’m all right, Dad. What about Ma?”

“She’s on her way back from the daycare. They were able to get all of the children out; they lost one though.” There was a sad tilt to the officer’s mouth as he sighed. “She’s not taking it well.”

Sam winced hard, “She’s gonna yell at me.”

“Probably,” Will chuckled, hauling his son back to him and pressing a paternal kiss to his temple. “Don’t do this to us again, please. We tell you to go, you go. We will not lose you.”

“Copy that,” he agreed, hands tightening around his father for a moment before he stepped back. “What can I do?”

“Help Jason and Grant evacuate the stadium. Keep it quiet and discreet, but as quickly as possible. I don’t want to tip our hand until we have to.”

“You got it. Be careful.”

“I will . . . you too.”

“You know me,” Sam laughed with a grin, earning a roll of the eyes from his father, “Yeah . . . hence why I’m saying something about it.”

Aaron’s voice rang from overhead, “Orel! I think I found something! I’d suggest you get up here!”

“Coming, Sokol!” he shouted upwards, before turning back to Sam. “I’ll see you soon.”

“Damn right you will. If not, Ma is gonna resurrect your ass and then kill us both.”

Will snorted hard at the mental image, even as he nodded, “Best not to disappoint her then. Stay safe.”

The blond sniper’s mouth twisted as he demanded in return, “Go careful.”
“Copy that,” he agreed, before squeezing the back of his son’s neck one more time, then bolted for the stairs . . . and hopefully the end of the nightmare.

The first bullet pinged off the handrails mere inches away from his hand. He could hear Sam through his earpiece, shouting his name, as well as Marina’s own demands for an update. “No harm . . . we’ve found the bomb and our bomber.”

“Go careful . . . I’m on my way,” the Russian insisted coldly, moments before her partner protested, “No! This thing only has a few minutes left on the timer. If it goes . . . the twins need at least one of their parents living when this is all over, Marishka . . .”

“Don’t you dare say you’re damned goodbyes, William Michael Grimm, you understand me!?” she demanded. “I am coming to you . . . that is not negotiable. Our daughters will have both parents at the end of the day, so help me God.”

Will grunted, eyes searching lifted his head in search of Faber, infinitely conscious of his younger brother working on the bomb behind him. “Aaron? How are we looking?”

“Two seconds . . . I just need to lift the circuit board and cut the wire,” the bomb tech replied, digging in his pocket for his tools. “I’ve got this . . . you worry about him.”

“Copy that. Parker . . . if you could stay and cover Aaron, I’ll go around and see if I can flank him.”

Glancing over at the younger Grimm as he worked at the bomb, the older man nodded in agreement with the older. “Of course. Go careful.”

“You too,” the Colonel replied, quicksilver eyes scanning the area before he bolted down the gangway in the opposite direction from Faber.

As he made his way around the gangway, closing in on Faber’s perch Will’s vision hazed slightly; his blood rushing through his pounding heart. He was so close to the man who’d almost taken his son from him . . . so close to putting the asshole into the ground, he could almost taste it. Taking a deep breath in through his nose, he let himself get lost in his instincts. If there was one thing he’d learned as a child soldier under Ross, it was that his instincts would never lead him wrong.

Time always passed strangely while he was in his “perfect soldier” mindset. It could have been moments . . . it could have been hours. Either way, Marina was always there to call him home to her. He blinked at the soft sound of her voice, insisting, “Mishka . . . he’s dead . . . put the gun away.”

Shaking himself free, he followed the instruction absently, before looking up at Marina in confusion. “Zhemchuzhina?”

“Da,” she agreed, stepping fearlessly over the body and wrapping her arms around his waist as he swayed. “You’re all right . . . you don’t usually go so deep . . . how’s your head?”

“I’m gonna have a migraine, I think. He’s dead?”

Marina looked back over her shoulder with a twisted, cruel smirk as she replied, “Very.”

The Colonel frowned at her, before letting his eyes follow hers to the mangled body on the ground. There, lying on the ground, was one Marcus Faber. Cause of death . . . six bullets to the face. Will blinked, startled by the brutality of the act. “I don’t remember . . .”
“I know . . .” she replied gently, wrapping her arm around his waist as she guided him away from the body. “Come on . . . let’s get you downstairs. Vincent needs to take a look at that shoulder.”

“Shoulder?” he asked in confusion, before searing pain rocked through him, as though the word unblocked the pain from his mind. He sucked in a sharp breath, free hand coming up to grip the appendage. “Damn . . . when did that happen?”

“Awhile ago,” she replied, fingers squeezing gently at his waist. “Parker’s wounded . . . EMS is on its way up. I would prefer it, if we were both gone by the time they got here.”

Nodding quietly, he asked, “What about the mess?”

“Cleaning up your mess for once will be a refreshing change for Owen,” Marina chuckled, her tiny body once again exhibiting its resilience as she all but manhandled him down the back stairs, completely avoiding the approaching emergency workers. “Come on . . . some hot, sweet coffee and some rest will bring you back to yourself soon enough.”

Leaning over to rest his forehead against her head, he sighed, “What would I do without you, Marishka?”

“The more worrisome question, moy lyubimov, is what would I do without you?”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Der'mo - shit
(R) govnoyed - bastard
(R) Yebat’ - fuck
(R) Slava Bogu - Thank God
(R) Sammichka - Russian diminutive, basically Sammy
(R) Orel - Eagle (Will's callsign with SHIELD and the Army's Brat'ya Mrachnyy)
(R) Sokol - Falcon (Aaron/Kenny's callsign with SHIELD and the Army's Brat'ya Mrachnyy)
((R) Brat'ya Mrachnyy - Brothers Grimm (the Spec Ops unit comprised of Will, Marina, Jason, Aaron and Clint, under the Army's purview.))
(R) Zhemchuzhina - Pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for his longtime partner and lover, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Da/net - Yes/no
(R) moy lyubimov - my love (one of Marina's lesser used nicknames for her longtime partner and lover, Will Grimm)
Chapter 233: Anchored Reconstruction

Grant Ward grunted as he lost his grip on his crutches, a pair of hands shoving hard as a panicked man shoved him out of the way. Without the stabilizing presence of the rods, Grant lost his balance and went down hard, curling up as much as he could to try and protect himself from the insanity that was the evacuation of the stadium. It took a second, but eventually the specialist could hear a familiar voice calling through the crowd. “Grant!?” came the call, before a different voice boomed, “Move it!”

Instantly, the crowd parted like the Red Sea, bringing both Sam Grimm and Vincent Keller into view, as the two men bolted towards where Grant was huddled up on the floor. Brilliant blue eyes lit up at the sight of the dark haired agent, bolting forward with the medic right on his heels. His knees skidded a little on the ground as he dove to shield him from the haphazard feet running roughshod over him. “Grant . . . man, you with me?”

“Yeah . . . I’m all right. Someone pushed me.”
Vincent’s growl was fierce and angry as he all but roared at the young man who was pushing frantically through the crowd, trying to get outside. The kid jolted in shock, shying backwards from the sound, before diverting slightly and continuing on, leaving a wide berth around the three men. Turning back to his friends, the doctor insisted, “We gotta move . . . people are panicked. The pushing and the shoving is only going to get worse.”

Nodding firmly, Sam moved to slip under one of Grant’s arms, utterly ignoring Vincent’s protests of, “You nearly got blown up!? What the hell are you doing?”

Blue ice eyes were glacial as he glanced up at his S.H.I.E.L.D. partner, hissing, “You said we needed to move . . . so help me.”

“Damn it, Sam . . .” the man sighed, as he slipped under the other arm and between the two of them they hauled the specialist upright, balanced precariously on his good leg. “Come on . . . let’s get him to a cot.”

“But the bomb?”

“Doesn’t matter now,” Vincent replied, with a shake of his head. “No matter what, we’re going to be exposed if that bomb goes off.”

“If it goes off,” Sam reminded them both, helping Vincent ease Grant to the thin mattress. “Dad is gonna do everything in his power to make sure that doesn’t happen. Uncle Aaron too.”

“Exactly . . . the best thing we can do now, is pray,” Vincent agreed, features settling into calm as he reached out and began to undo the clasps on the brace. “Tell me if it hurts anywhere, huh?”

Grant said nothing. Vincent wouldn’t have heard him anyway.

It was about ten minutes later that Sam and Grant both looked up from where Vincent was once again securing Grant’s brace at the sound of the medics name. “Vincent!” came the urgent call again, prompting Sam to push himself to his feet.

Vincent gave the blond a dirty look, insisting “Sam, sit down. You almost got blown up half an hour ago.”

“That’s my Ma . . . hell no,” he snapped, climbing up onto the cot to look around a little better. “Ma!”

“Sammy! It’s your Dad! I need your help! Bring Vincent.” Marina called, tone a barely controlled panic.

Catching sight of the family’s Power Couple by the back stairwell, Sam pointed “Over there Vince . . .”

The doctor gave Grant a significant look, ordering “Stay off that knee, you got me? You may have strained it when you fell.”

Grant’s mouth twisted petulantly, muttering “I did not fall . . . I was pushed.”

“Shoved, pushed, fell, skipped; I don’t care. Stay!” He ordered with a rumbling growl over his shoulder, bolting after the blond sniper.

Sam reached his parents first, catching his mother in his arms as she collided with his chest hard. “Bozhe moi, Sammichka, moy mal’chik,” she breathed, holding him tightly for a bit before scanning a critical gaze over him “Are you okay? I was so worried . . . how’s your head?” There was a pause, before she waved away the question, “Don’t answer that . . . Vincent, how is my boy?”

Vincent moved past the two, heading for the dazed Colonel, as he replied “Surprisingly, he’s okay. May have a concussion, but I kinda doubt it.” Crouching, the medic took in the family’s leader, asking cautiously “Will? It’s Vincent . . . you with me?”

A single nod was the only answer, earning a fierce frown. “I’m gonna take a look at your shoulder now. Stay as still as you can.”

Another nod and Vincent was reaching for the clasps of his vest. “Marina, what’s wrong with him?”

“He went ‘perfect soldier’ . . . but he’s never been as deep as he went. It took me nearly ten minutes to get his attention; usually he hears my voice and comes right out of it.”

“‘Perfect soldier’?” the medic echoed, confused.

“I don’t know how else to describe it. Misha’s pretty sure it’s some kind of leftover programming from the Hoover Base. He just kind of . . . let’s go and does what he has to in order to survive and succeed. We’ve been never been too sure about what causes it . . . he’s always done it,” the Russian explained, moving to kneel next to Vincent. “Usually we just treat it like you would shellshock and get him somewhere quiet.”

“How deep is he?”

“Not as deep as he was. He recognized me . . . knew where he was and why he was here. But that doesn’t always mean anything. He’s not usually so . . . complacent. Which is why I think he’s probably still under the programming’s influence, even if he’s not as far under as he was originally.”

Mouth firming into a frown, Vincent looked over at Sam, ordering “Coffee . . . hot and sweet . . . go. And if you can find a clean one, bring one of the blankets too.”

Sam’s eyes were wide and scared as he nodded and bolted away. Between the two and with stern orders from Marina; they managed to get his vest and shirt off, cutting the tight-fitting under armour away from the wound.

Vincent’s touch was firm but light as he probed the wound, tone low as he talked the Colonel through it. “Faber? He asked calmly.

Will stiffened slightly, hissing as he reported briskly “Dead . . . six to the face.”

Dark eyebrows climbed into his hair as the doctor stared, repeating incredulously “Six to the face?”

Marina’s tone was dry as she replied “Hence why we call it ‘perfect soldier’. He didn’t even remember doing it.” Turning back to Will, she stroked her fingers tenderly through the close-cropped strands of blond hair and soothed gently, “You did good, Mishka. I need you to sit quietly for me and let Vincent patch you up. Let’s not call any attention to ourselves until Lucky sterilizes the scene and gets rid of Faber’s body.”

Vincent startled, clearly surprised by the statement. The hard look in Marina’s eyes was a clear sign she would tolerate no questions on the matter either. Sam was back shortly, coffee in one hand and blanket draped over the opposite forearm. Behind him, the two could see Grant crutching towards them, earning a huffing sigh from the doctor. “Why do I even bother?” Vincent muttered, hands moving separate from his brain as he continued to treat the wound. “Damn it, Grant; what did I tell you?”
"All due respect, Vincent, shut up." The specialist watched for a moment as Sam handed his father the coffee first, his hands cupping around his father’s own to make sure he had a good grip on the paper cup. Next came the blanket, the fabric pulled over one shoulder then tucked under the arm of the injured side, the ends drawn together tightly to stave off the minute trembling visible in the Colonel’s body.

"Shock?" Grant asked, lifting his eyes to scan the stairwell and the hallway. His professional mask dropped over his face, only a small flicker betraying any emotions when his roving gaze passed over the small knot of family.

“Of a kind,” Marina agreed, eyes narrowed as she pointed imperiously at the small ledge next to the stairs “Sit . . . what happened?”

Vincent’s “He fell,” overlapped with Grant and Sam’s simultaneous “I/He was pushed and fell.”

Frowning, the Russian asked “Are you okay? How’s your knee?”

"I'm fine," he insisted with a sigh. He followed her pointing finger and perched on the ledge, taking care to choose a spot that allowed him open sight lines to any approaches. “My knee is fine.”

Sam chuckled, laughing “Fair warning . . . fine is not an acceptable answer in this family. I’ll explain later.”

Cocking an eyebrow, Grant considered that for a moment before changing his answer, “Yes, I’m okay. Vincent just feels the need to mother hen me.”

“Tell me something I don’t know, Prizrak. As for the knee, let me know if the level of your pain changes or anything seems weird,” Marina replied with a quiet chuckle. Accepting Grant’s quiet nod of agreement, the woman turned her attention onto Sam next. “What do you hear, Sammy-honey?”

Evidently the question required no clarification as the blond replied instantly, “Ed’s aggressively not paying attention to whatever Owen is doing . . . and Jules is a little distracted by the Boss.”

“Good . . . means they’re not gonna make a big deal about the body suddenly disappearing,” Vincent agreed earning a lopsided grin of agreement from the rest. “Bullet went clean through . . . let’s get him bandaged up and out of here. The last thing we want is for someone to notice the body is missing and make a fuss.”

Grant frowned as he reminded everyone “Officially S.H.I.E.L.D was never here . . . I can guarantee you the satellites and security footage is already being scrubbed. Even if someone does make a fuss . . . without a body or witness, ain’t nothing anyone can do.”

Marina chuckled as she teased, “Interesting turn of phrase. Your Yale education has done itself proud.”

Grant threw the Russian a disgruntled face. She knew as well as he did, his so called ‘Yale education’ was just one of a whole list of fabrications Garrett had engineered to get him into S.H.I.E.L.D. “I’m sure there are a lot of reasons Yale is less than impressed with my educational credentials.”

Slipping under her partner’s arm as they eased the Colonel to his feet, his handler snickered “You may have a point there.”

Vincent slipped under the opposite arm, a worried frown etched onto his face at Will’s complacent acceptance of what was happening; it was unnerving to the medic who had gone head to head with the headstrong Colonel on more than one occasion in the past. His fingers tightened in a small, fond squeeze, as he murmured, “All right, Will . . . let’s get you home to Sam’s, okay?”

There was no real reply from the man, only a slow blink and an indistinct hum of agreement. The medic and the handler exchanged worried looks before Sam insisted, “The coast is clear . . . let’s get out of here.”

****************************

Hours later, William Michael Grimm blinked. The action was unremarkable and indistinguishable from the one that came before it. But, even still, there was a small but subtle difference in the suddenly intent gaze as it scanned over the ceiling. It was only a second longer before Marina’s smiling face filled his view. The woman - his adored and adoring Russian - watched him with equal parts worry and relief in her eyes. He smiled up at her, blinking as he murmured tenderly, “Allo Marishka.”

Eyes slipped closed as she breathed a silent prayer of thanks, Marina bent to kiss him, the touch of her fingers familiar on the contours of his face. Straightening, she gifted him with a tear-stained smile, breathing out, “Hey, Misha . . . welcome back.”
Hey guys! Sorry it's been so long! Darcy/Bucky/Clint, as promised! Enjoy!

Translations are common, so I'm not going to worry about them today. Let me know what you think. I missed hearing your thoughts on the last chapter!

Chapter 235: Sweet Seduction

As was usual when engaged in various . . . amorous pursuits with one Darcy Lewis, Clint was laughing. He was lying sprawled on the double bed, head resting in the palm of his hand, as he watched Darcy tease their boyfriend playfully. Much to his chagrin, Bucky was still on restricted activity and being unable to grab the young woman by the hips and haul her under him was visibly testing his patience. “Damn it, Doll . . . stop teasin’,” the former soldier pleaded, fingers spasming on the tops of her thighs where she knelt over him.

“What’s the matter, gorgeous? Got an itch to scratch?” she taunted, squeaking as his fingers slipped behind the joint of her knee and gave her a quick pinch. “Ouch!”

“You’re killin’ me,” he groaned, his eyes slipping to half mast as he watched her hips roll against his. Her purr was warm and adoring as she bent to kiss him, murmuring against his lips, “Now, that would be no fun at all.”

“You sure is bossy . . . you should do something about that?”

The intern grinned as she twisted to look at Clint, asking loftily, “He sure is bossy . . . before I bust and you don’t get to enjoy the experience.”
The archer’s grey eyes shone silver as he winked at her. “Bossy can be a lot of fun, peresmeshnika . . .”

“Hm, I am not convinced,” she replied with a soft snort, a squeal slipping from her lips as Bucky suddenly threw her over and rolled onto her, earning a scolding, “Buck!” from the worried sniper.

“I’m fine, khishchnik . . .” he grunted, one hand coming up to capture both of Darcy’s wrists and haul them over her head, while the other moved to the hem of the miniskirt that had been flirting with him all afternoon. “But there’s a little girl who needs a lesson in teasing.”

Darcy’s moan rang through the room as his fingers found their way beneath her panties, both slipping into her to the hilt in a smooth thrust. “Oh damn,” she breathed, hips undulating against his hand as he worked her body like a master.

Cocking his head, Clint watched the two with a small grin. "Der’mo . . . you two look so hot together.”

Ocean eyes were boiling hot as they pinned the archer in place. “Get the toy bag.”

A wicked grin slipped across the younger sniper’s face as he rolled from the bed and all but bolted for the closet, pulling a black duffle bag from the shelf inside. Darcy’s eyes were huge as they darted between the longtime couple, arousal warring with mild alarm as she took in the glee painting Clint’s face. “Why do I feel like I should be worried?”

“Worried?” Clint replied innocently, setting the bag on the bed and rifling through. “No reason to be worried, beautiful . . . we’re gonna take good care of you.” Glancing at Bucky, he asked, “What did you want?”

“Mouse and the lube,” Bucky responded, extracting his fingers from Darcy’s core and earning a wretched moan as he lifted them to his mouth and sucked her juices from them. “And the jute rope.”

There was another moan when a short length of purple cording came from the bag, Bucky wrapping it around her wrists firmly and then hauling them up to the headboard, anchoring them there. Darcy tugged a few times, a sharp whimper slipping from her at the realization she wasn’t going anywhere. Her hips bucked against her lover, as she begged, “Damn it, Bucky . . . touch me.”

“I am touching you, Dollface,” he teased, fingers nibble on the fastenings of her skirt before whisking it and her panties away, leaving her naked from the waist down. Crawling up, he nibbled on her lower lip for a moment, before whispering, “Do you trust me?”

There was no pause of hesitation as she agreed, “With my life.”

One corner of his lips flirted upwards even as he replied, “You could regret that one day.”

“Not possible,” she vowed, eyes clear and solemn as the two watched each other carefully.

Clint watched them, a small smile on his lips to see these two people he loved starting to love each other, before he cleared his throat quietly, offering Bucky a small silver vibe. “The mouse, as requested.”

The Winter Soldier grinned at his lover, flesh hand taking the vibe while the metal one slipped behind the sniper’s neck and hauled him into a sharp, piercing kiss. Clint gasped, taken momentarily aback by the possessive desire in the action, before throwing himself into it without reservation. Darcy moaned again, head falling back as she murmured, “That’s so fucking hot.”
Grinning into the kiss for a second, Bucky bit down sharply on Clint’s lip before pushing him away gently. “Get naked.”

“Yes sir,” the younger man agreed, bounding up from the bed and attacking the zippers, buttons, and clasps on his uniform, while Bucky turned his attention back onto their girlfriend.

“All right, Doll . . . you have your choice. Ready for it?”

“Choice? Buck . . . fuck me,” she whined, hips bucking upwards frantically.

There was a wicked glint to his eyes as he tsked at her, teasing, “And when has that ever worked, my little firecracker?”

“Buck . . . please . . .” she gasped, rolling her hips and moaning obscenely in the hopes that she could get him between her thighs and into her.

The young woman jumped, startled, when the tips of his fingers slapped down lightly against her mons and drew her immediate attention. There was a scolding frown on the man’s lips as he shook his head at her. “You have a choice . . . and if you’re not careful, I’m going to make it for you. Is that understood?”

“Yes sir,” she breathed, staring up at him, feeling herself growing wetter and more swollen at the commanding set of his features.

“Here are your choices. One: I’ll make sweet love to you, while Clint plays with your clit, but you don’t get to come. Two: Clint fucks me while you play with our sweet little mouse here and you can orgasm as many times as you want.”

She stared up at him in aroused horror, eyes wide as she breathed, “You’re an asshole.”

“I know,” he chuckled, bending to kiss her softly. “Tick tock, Dollface . . . time is running out.”

Darcy’s eyes flicked back and forth between the two men, both of whom were watching her with hungry, expectant looks on their faces. She had just made her decision and was opening her mouth to speak, when Clint’s computer began to ring from the desk. The archer frowned hard, whirling to face it, announcing, “That’s Jay’s pattern.” Glancing at the two, he sighed, “Hold that thought, okay? Let me find out what’s up and we’ll continue this is a . . . you know what I meant!”

Bending, he grabbed his jeans and hauled them on over his naked - Darcy grinned as she continued adding increasingly lascivious adjectives in her head - ass, before moving to the desk. Making sure that the laptop was faced completely away from the bed, Clint triggered the camera. “Hey Jay . . .

Jason Grimm’s voice was amused as he teased, “It’s a miracle anything gets done out at that base, considering all the time you spend half-naked while you’re there.”

“I am off-shift, mudak,” Clint snarked back, grey eyes shining. “What do you want, Jay?”

“You up for a little witch hunt?” the older Grimm asked curiously.

“A witch hunt? That’s a new one.”

“Yeah . . . apparently a bunch of children have gone missing and Dad says we’re within a couple days of some dark ritual called the ‘blood moon’? Aunt Gretel said something about eating kids, and killing innocents, and Will pretty much said, ‘fuck that shit’ and got the time away approved.”
Despite the dry tone coming through the speakers, Darcy couldn’t hear any skepticism or distrust in what he’d been told. And based on the determined look stealing across Clint’s features, he had no problem believing the details either. The woman blinked as the younger of her lovers demanded, “Do I need to find a ride? Or . . . ?”

“The Quinjet’s enroute. You have ten . . . make them count, little brother. Walsh out.”

“Barton out,” the archer agreed, reaching out to snap the lid of the computer closed. “Sorry, peresmeshnika . . . gonna have to continue this plan a little later.”

Darcy’s jaw dropped, as she stared at him in honest surprise. “Are you serious right now?! You’re passing up sex with me . . . for some kind of wild goose chase, hunting things that only exist in legends and children’s fairy tales.”

Clint smirked at that, stripping off the jeans and moving to get into his off-duty gear. “Buck . . . I’ll let you be the one to enlighten our little bird here about the truth about that little myth. I gotta get going.”

“No problems. I’ll take care of our Doll,” Bucky promised, watching as Clint was dressed and ready to go in seconds flat. The younger sniper bolted to the bed, a grin on his lips as the two cuddled unconsciously. “Love you,” he murmured against Bucky’s mouth, before bending to kiss Darcy next, promising, “Love you too.”

Straightening, he moved to the closet once more and grabbed up the purple bag sitting in the corner. “I’ll see you both in a couple days. Behave yourselves.”

Bucky’s grin was wicked as he agreed, “Of course . . . go before you miss your ride.”

“Yes sir,” Clint laughed with a grin, before slipping through the door and disappearing from sight, the door slamming closed behind him and the heavy sounds of booted feet rang through the hallway, as he bolted away.

Darcy’s head flopped back, groaning. “Damn it. Well that sucked. Is he sure his brothers need him there?”

Ocean blue eyes sparkled as the former assassin chuckled in agreement, fingers tracing lazy fingers over the swell of her belly. “Even if he wasn’t, the Brothers Grimm are the very definition of co-dependent. He was going whether they needed him or not.”

Huffing out a frustrated sigh, Darcy tilted her head back to stare up at her wrists then sighed, “Well, I guess you can untie me. With Clint gone . . .”

“With Clint gone, all the more for me,” Bucky interrupted, one eyebrow winging upwards as he watched her.

Darcy visibly startled at the information, “I thought . . .”

“That I was only in it for Clint? Yeah, I know . . . that’s why I didn’t offer to go with him, despite being family to Hansel too.” Bending, he nibbled lightly on her lips as he murmured, “You and I needed a little one-on-one time. No Clint, no distractions . . . just us, getting a feel for each other and learning who we are to each other outside of him.”

“That sounds dangerous,” she sighed, a blissed out smile on her lips as she smiled up at him.

He gave her a smarmy grin as he bent to kiss her, murmuring, “Very,” against the plump curvature of her lips. “Hang on, Dollface . . . this is gonna be a helluva ride.”

“Can’t wait,” she promised in a breathless whisper, before her body arched into him as he slid into her. “Fuck me running . . . you feel so good.”

“Just wait . . . it gets better.”

Her tone was a delicious purr as she rolled her hips into his, taunting him wickedly, “Less talk, more action, big boy . . . put those hips to work.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, drawing his hips back and then slamming back into her.

Darcy’s whole body exploded into sensation, a long reedy cry slipping from her throat as he rode her hard . . . fully intent on putting her away wet.

From there things got a lot hot and hella heavy. Which could explain the quiet swear words Darcy was muttering to herself as she tried to run and button up her shirt at the same time. She’d thought Clint was bad for her time management skills; Bucky Barnes was freaking worse! Skidding into the lab, she announced breathlessly, “I’m here! I’m here!”

Jane’s tone was fond, if exasperated, as she sighed, “You’re late.”

“I know, but in my defense? I was totally having an out of body experience.”

Eric Selvig snorted at the statement, quiet laughter slipping from his lips, as her boss-lady/bestie snarked dryly, “I’ll just bet. Do me a favor? Ride your boys through galaxies on your own time, huh?”

“You got it, Boss lady!” she chirped, with a grin, fingers combing through the wreck that was her sex-hair, and pulling it up into a messy bun. “So . . . are we any closer to finding Tall, Blond and Muscley?”

Eric smiled sadly as he replied, “No . . . hence Jane’s frustration with your . . .” here he paused, considering, before chuckling, “. . . prolific sex life.”

“Got it . . . no more morning sex . . . I can do that,” she insisted, before hesitating, “Well, I can try to do that. Seriously? The man’s hands, Jane . . . they’re magic. It’s obscene . . . and delicious . . . and . . .” she blinked as a pen cup flew past her head and startled her out of her dewy-eyed remembrance of the morning, “Right, of course, yes . . . shutting up now. Sorry Jane.”

There was a heavily put-upon sigh from the astrophysicist, after which Jane’s Science Face made its first appearance that day. “I need you to correlate this data. Find a pattern. If we can locate the pattern, we can locate the next site. If we can locate the next site . . .”

“. . . you can have your own ‘prolific sex life’!” Darcy cheered excitedly, hands up in a touchdown pose. “Get it girlfriend!”

“Darcy . . .” Jane groaned, even as she chuckled along with her assistant’s exuberant cheering. “Just get to work.”

“On it!” the younger woman agreed, twirling on her toes and bouncing off. And if the scene from that morning caused a few distractions, well . . . who could blame her? Bucky Barnes was one fucking hot hunk with a body to die for . . . and who knew what to do with it. She couldn’t wait to be off for the night, so they could do it all over again.
Also, before I forget, so I got this amazing prompt from Lennox_Crewe. And I just want you guys to know, if there's something you want to see, I am more than willing to see if I can make it work within the story I'm trying to tell. It may not be in the main fic, but outtakes are fun and further the story along. I would love to hear from you guys! Let me know!
Connections and Reflections

Chapter Notes

Okay, so here we go! I'm finally getting back into my groove, now that the move is over and I'm mostly stationary. So I'm catching up! Woot!

Let me know what you think guys! Seriously, your reviews are the reason I write. They always make me so happy to hear that you love what I do!

Translations are at the end as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 236: Connections and Reflections

Darcy Anderson-Lewis stirred sleepily, a happy hum vibrating through the corridor of her throat. She ached pleasantly in every fiber of her being and she all but purred as she tossed over, intent on her lover's body in the bed beside her . . . at least it should have been next to her. Frowning with a pout, she tilted her chin up and listened for him. The familiar rumble of the beloved baritone filled the room, prompting a contented smile at the haphazard mix of Brooklyn accent and Russian vocabulary. It took her a little longer than she would have liked to admit that he was speaking to someone.

Horrified at the thought one someone unknown to her in their quarters, she squeaked as she threw herself around. Scrambling for the bedcovers to pull them up over her nakedness, she froze as Bucky's chuckles filled the compact space. “Net khishchnik . . . it's just our little bird,” he explained into his phone, ocean eyes sparkling at her over the adoring smile lingering on his lips. “Da, I understand. Tell Marina I hope she feels better. Be safe and be patient . . . you'll be home with us soon enough.” There was a pause, before the man's stern features softened further, “Ya tozhe lyublyu tebya, khishchnik.”

As her alarm faded Darcy blushed, abashed by her moment of panic. Relaxing back against her pillows, she let the covers fall loosely once again and took in her lover, specifically his attire or the lack thereof. The former assassin wore a pair of tight black boxer briefs and little else. The metal arm gleamed dully in the natural light and there was a soft sheen leftover from their recent activities.
clinging to his skin. A muscle in his chest twitched, the nipple contracting to a point as the pectoral muscle flexed in reaction.

Biting down on her lower lip, she grunted, “Erk.”

“How’d you sleep, Dollface?” he asked with a fond smile, tossing the phone onto the desk then crossing the room to her. He crawled across the bed, arms and knees bracketing her body as he kneeled over her.

She gave him a lascivious smirk, her hands linking behind his neck to pull him down to her. “Good dreams. Be a good boy and give a bad girl a few more, huh?”

“I can probably arrange for a few more of those,” he chuckled in agreement, allowing her to pull him down against her. Bracing himself up on his elbows again, he allowed his fingers to trace the contours of her face. His smile was warm and affectionate as he teased, “Good morning, Dollface?”

Beaming up at her lover, Darcy purred, “A very good morning indeed.”

The two kissed lazily for a bit, before she pulled back with a contented sigh, setting into her pillows. Tilting up her chin, she nuzzled her nose against his as she asked, “What’s wrong with Clint?”

“Nothing,” he promised solemnly. “Marishka took a bad knock to the head. Plus, she and the Colonel managed to pull home a couple of foster kids. But Clint's fine . . . sticking around through the end of the day for his sister's sake then catching a 'Jet home tonight.”

Darcy grinned at the news, the tip of her tongue poking through her teeth playfully. “We'll have to plan a special 'welcome home' party, then.”

“A welcome home party? This isn't home and no one but us is even going to care that he's back anyway,” Bucky laughed with a grin.

“I know,” she replied with a careless shrug, her smile turning puckish as she agreed, “I was thinking more along the lines of a 'clothing option, dinner and playtime' party.”

“Playtime, huh?” he teased with a wicked smirk. “And what exactly were you planning for your playtime activities?”

She winked, tone lofty as she laughed, “Between the two of us, I'm sure we'll think of something.”

There was times when Darcy could not believe this was her life.

James Buchanan Barnes held a prominent place in American mythology, was covered thoroughly in history books. Of course, they gave the dry details of him; the stats and the kill counts and the blaring details that anyone could figure out for themselves just by watching the Captain America films from the era. His devotion to Steve Rogers was lauded and dissected vehemently, as was what little of their childhood friendship was known. His features were black and white and sepia, always a small figure when standing next to his larger than life best friend.

The James Buchanan Barnes from the history books held no similarity to the flesh and blood Bucky Barnes she was holding within the circle of her arms now.

Oceans crashed and swelled in the depths of his eyes, the color hidden from history for far too long. Silk strands tumbled along his cheeks and down his back, soft to the touch and held tamed by the bun at the nape of his neck. Darcy knew intimately the tenderness in the touch of his lips, had caressed the gentleness hiding in the strength of his frame.
She loved to listen to him, and could happily lose herself in the sound of his voice. It was impossible to predict what he'd sound like on any given day, and each day was an adventure in finding out. Sometimes, he'd tell her stories of his childhood, and she'd be able to see the cacophony of Coney Island and the greenery of Prospect Park in the cadence of his words. Other times, he'd be on the phone with his beloved Uchenny, and she'd glimpse Moscow's Red Square and the iconic St. Basil's Cathedral in the way his lips formed the Russian syllables.

The history books could never know of the haunted look in his eyes or the terrible nightmares that woke him, still screaming. They would never talk about the great love and utter devotion he held for those he loved. Could never see the soul deep bruises or touch the source of his lifetime of pain. She could never have believed it, all those weeks when she hated and feared him, but in this moment she knew . . .

She loved him.

More importantly, she loved him for himself. Not for Clint's sake, but for his own. God or Thor willing . . . she would never have to go a single day without feeling the way she did right now.

Reaching up to caress his cheeks, she pulled him down into a lingering kiss. When at last they separated, she kept him close to her. Earthy brown eyes searched ocean blue ones as she announced, “I love you.”

The joy and happiness in his eyes exploded outwards across his face as he beamed at her. There was sweetness in his smile as he replied reverently, “Ya lyublyu tebya, Dollface.”

Darcy gave him a shaky smile, feeling tears fill her eyes as she read the truth in his words between the cresting waves of emotion in his eyes. Guilt swelled in her throat and she choked out a sob as she begged, “I'm so sorry, Bucky.”

Bucky blinked in surprise at the statement, before he seemed to soften, understanding without explanation, “It's okay, Doll.”

“No, it's not . . . and don't you dare let me off so easily. I was horrible to you.”

“Darcy, Rumlow is the only one to blame for that. You could never have known the truth.”

“Clint tried to make me see the truth, and I wouldn't listen to him. I could have lost this . . . without ever getting to have it at all.”

*****************************

Bucky Barnes had never and could never claim to be a whole man. He had been broken and molded and reformed too many times to be anything less than irreparably damaged. There were simply too many fractures in his being for him to be completely healed.

His Gadyuka had started the healing process. Her fearlessness and adoration had filled the deepest chinks in the mortar, strengthening him with every breath she took. He could not truly remember his friendship with Steve except in little bits and pieces, but he remembered her . . . and how very much he had loved the stubborn, compassionate and utterly fearless little girl she had been, as well as the headstrong, passionate woman she had become.

Then came his Hawk, the love of his life. Clint was fearlessly reckless with love, just like his sister, and utterly careless with his trust. He was also unfailingly loyal, brutally honest and a better man – a better lover – than Bucky deserved. He reached for the hearts of people and had never been wrong yet.
With Clint had come a maverick family, regardless of their admittedly rocky beginnings. That family had given him so much and had asked for nothing in his return. He'd gotten his Marishka back, and gained a confidant in her Colonel. He had a friend in Jason and a conspirator in Brian . . . a defender in Aaron and a supporter in Hansel.

If not for them, he would never have been in a place to be good to Darcy.

She was so very different from Clint. There was evidence she had been hurt before and trust did not come easily to her. But there was laughter in her heart, same as in Clint's, and a boundless capacity for love and hope. There was a pure innocence in her, that had been eradicated from Clint and Bucky both very long ago. As Clint had said, she was good for the both of them.

Bending to her, he kissed her cheek tenderly. Personally, he could think of nothing she had done that she needed to be absolved of. However, if she needed that from him, he had no qualms with giving it to her. “Darcy, I forgive you. It's over and done. All we can do now is focus on starting a new life . . . a new life together.” Brushing his fingers through the fall of her bangs, he gifted her with a warm smile. “Can we do that? Can we build a world together, somewhere you and Clint and I can just love each other and be happy? Some place we can shape and mold to be whatever we want it to be?”

He could see her yearning for it and smiled, insisting, “Dollface, build a life with me. Be the stars in my night sky and the sun in my dawn. Be the strength in Clint's bow and the power in my arm. Can you be that for me? For us . . . for all of us?”

It took her a moment, but before long she relaxed and beamed up at him. “Yes . . . yes, James Buchanan Barnes . . . I will build a life with you and Clint. And we'll be so very happy together.”

He grinned, bending to kiss her sweetly, “That's our girl.”

It was nearly eighteen hours later before Clint entered his quarters on base. It had been a long, if satisfying, hunt. Marina was going to be fine and was already over being fussled at by her partner, and the two Winchester boys seemed to be settling in well with the rest of the family. All that remained was crawling into bed with his lovers and enjoying some quality time with the two of them.

He'd been a little surprised when Bucky had declined to go with him, however he hoped that the time away had given the two a chance to bond together without him there to pad the space. Twisting the key in the lock, he eased the door open and then froze, staring at the picture on the bed. A warm, adoring smile curved up the corners of his lips as he leaned one hip against the doorjamb, arms covering over his chest as he watched them.

Bucky was lying sprawled out on his back, with Darcy clinging to him like a limpet. The two had clearly tried to wait up for him, but had fallen asleep when it had taken him longer to get home than expected. But this right here? This was everything he'd ever wanted . . . and he was never going to let it go again.

His Mockingbird stirred on the bed, blinking her eyes at the light streaming in from the hallway. “Clint?” she murmured sleepily, turning her face into Bucky's chest petulanty.

“Yes, peresmeshnika. it's me.”

“Good . . . shut the door and come to bed. It's still early,” she yawned, humming adorably as she burrowed back into Bucky's arms as the sniper shifted on the mattress in reaction to her voice. “You can tell us all about it in the morning.”

“It is morning, Darce,” he laughed lightly, coming in and shutting the door behind him.
He undressed swiftly as she contemplated that, before climbing under the covers on her other side. Giggling sleepily, she insisted, “Whatever . . . too early.”

“Yes ma’am. Love you, Darcy.”

“Love you too, Hawkass . . . (yawn) . . . see you in the morning.”

“See you in the morning, love. Sleep well,” he whispered, accepting her body as she rolled into him burying his nose in the strands of her hair. She sagged into him, already swept away by sleep again. Clint's free hand quested across the bed to link with Bucky's metal hand, the finger squeezing reflexively against them. Thus connected to both of his lovers, Clint was at last able to relax. He closed his eyes and yawned. “Missed you . . .” he murmured just before he slipped away into the Land of Morpheus. “It's good to be home.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) khishchnik - little hawk (Bucky's nickname for his longtime boyfriend, Cling Grimm)
(R) Uchenny - scholar (Bucky's nickname for his former protégé and oldest friend, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Gadyuka - Viper (callsign given to Marina Petrovka by the Krasnaya Komnata)
(R) peresmeshnika - mockingbird (Clint's nickname for their girlfriend, Darcy Lewis.)
Chapter Notes

Enjoy this one! (Reasons for my lateness at the end, as I don't want to spoil anything.)

Translations, what few there are, at the end as always.

Thank you all for your continued support and your reviews. They make my life!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 236: Even a Perfect Soldier Bleeds . . .

It shouldn’t have happened. There were a million excuses he could offer for why it HAD, but at the end, it all boiled down to that. Four words (five if you counted shouldn’t as two), twenty-three characters finalized by a single, unassuming period.

It was embarrassing.

One minute he’d been headed back to his office from a meeting, listening to Jay through the family’s comm. His attention had been split between his frazzled brother complaining about his future mother-in-law and the folder in his hands. He’d walked this route a million times, knew every crook and cranny so how had he missed that something was off?
The tech genius was incensed as he ranted, “How in the hell did I get the only sane member of that family?! Seriously Will, her mother?! She's NUTS!! Batshit, absolutely crazy!!”

Will's tone was absent, though attentive, as he snarked, “I'll be sure to tell Casey you think her mother's evil.”

“I'm pretty sure Casey agrees with me,” Jason drawled lazily, aware he had only half of his brother's attention. “She's been an absolute menace since we announced our engagement.”

“We're not exactly the high society types,” the Colonel reminded his brother with a soft chuckle.

“Tell me something I don't know. Still, we're certainly wealthy enough for her tastes. You have more money stashed in offshore accounts than the Shraegers could ever dream.”

“That's emergency money, Jason. It doesn't figure officially into our finances.”

“Honestly, if I’d thought Marina wouldn’t tan my hide for it I would have tried to elope.” Jason grumbled irritably.

Will blinked at the word, before bursting into laughter. “Marishka would have had your head on a platter.”

“I dread to think which head she’d have taken,” the Tech specialist muttered, his eyeroll almost audible.

“Pretty sure you wouldn't have cared, since your ability to sit would have been severely compromised,” Will snickered, easily able to imagine the thrashing Marina would have dished out.

“Good point. And then Casey likely would have added to it for my ‘idiocy’ as she’d term it.”

Whatever Will had been about to say in reply was cut off by the sharp, searing agony erupting in his lower back. He choked, arching slightly away from the pain and papers slipping from nerveless fingers. A low, vicious voice hissed, “Ward belongs to US. You and your kind need to leave him alone. Or a knife in the back will be the least of your problems, got me? Hail HYDRA, Colonel.”

It wasn't until the word was spoken that Will understood he had been stabbed. He gasped as the knife wrenched free and he staggered into the wall, feeling the hot, sticky sensation of blood pooling in the waistband of his pants. Looking up, he caught the edge of the STRIKE patch, but saw nothing more before his assailant was gone from view.

“Will?” Jason prompted his brother. He'd heard the mumbling of words followed by his elder brother’s sudden intake of breath. As a result, the sudden silence was eerily unnerving to the tech specialist. “Is everything okay?”

“Jay . . .” he breathed, the sound of pain familiar and prevalent in the officer's voice. “. . . help . . .”

There was no hesitation. Will did not ever ask for help, not even when he needed it. To have him asking now? Something bad had happened and Jason felt fear spear through him, even as he insisted, “Where are you? I'm coming, big brother.”

“Back hallway . . . by Analysis . . . hurry . . . there's a lot of blood . . .” was the terrifying answer, Will's voice going quiet and strained.

“I'll call Medical . . . have them meet me there.”
“No!” was the immediate reply, tone sharp and insistent. “No doctors. Just you.”

“Fine . . . no doctors. But I’m calling Vincent and Owen to meet me, no arguments.” Was Jason’s firm response. “Marina really will kill us all if you bleed out.”

Will had never sounded so weak as he did just then, whimpering, “. . . Don't tell . . . Jay, please . . . she'll worry . . . still weak . . .”

“She’ll find out sooner or later Will; she always does. But I won’t tell. You just focus on yourself right now and hold on for her and the girls . . . we’re on our way.”

“I’ll try . . . tired, Jay,” he murmured, tone going hazy as he fought off unconsciousness through sheer stubbornness. “Hurry.”

Jason was already moving. Garnering more than one strange look from people as he raced from his office in the labs, his attention was focused solely on his brother as he barked towards the comm. “Vincent, Owen. You two got your ears on?”

Vincent's tone was concerned as he agreed, “I'm here,” seconds before Owen asked, “What's up, Jason?”

“Something's happened to Will. Meet me in the back hallways by Analysis ASAP. By his own admission, he’s bleeding . . . badly.”

“What!” Owen roared, though Vincent said nothing. There was only a steady stream of cuss words coming from that participant in their conversation. “How!? This is HQ! Who would attack a Department Head IN HQ!?”

“No idea, Owen. Will’s not exactly in the best position to provide information at the moment . . . he’s more concerned about Marishka not finding out.” Jason huffed with a shake of his head as he barreled through the hallways, uncaring of who he may have knocked aside.

Vincent snorted hard as he snarked, “Yeah . . . good luck with that. Why me? Why not Medical?”

“Will said no doctors. I wasn’t going to argue while he’s bleeding and you’re family; he won’t argue against you being there.” Jason shot back with a sigh. “I did try to tell him Marishka would find out anyways.”

“Uh huh. And she's gonna have all of us in body bags,” Owen snarled, before there was a squealing sound like running shoes on concrete, before the Cleaner and assassin shouted, “Will! Shit! Hey Boss Man, I'm here. Stay with me, huh? Guys, where are you?!”

Rounding the corner Jason spotted Owen and Will ahead, his boots screeched on the floor as he skidded to a stop. “Son of a bitch,” the tech specialist snarled as his eyes swept over Will.

Will's eyes were half-lidded, but his lips were moving insistently, unable to force himself to put any more air into his voice. Owen was stripping his own uniform shirt to make a pressure bandage and didn't notice, though Jason knelt to try to figure out what was so important to the Colonel. “What is it, Will? What's wrong?”

The man's hand closed on Jason's hand like a vice, eyes blazing silver in his face. “. . . Ward . . .”

Jason scowled momentarily at the word. It seemed highly unlikely to him that Marina’s latest addition would be responsible for this . . . not in his current condition anyways. Head cocking slightly as he studied his brother Jason queried “What about Ward? He can't even walk straight and Exchanging a furious look with Owen briefly at the mention of STRIKE, Jason cursed vehemently in Russian for a moment or two before squeezing his elder brother’s hand. “Yeah Will. We’ll look out for him, just save your strength . . . your girls all need you to stick around.”

He huffed out a sigh of air, “. . . Handler pool . . . warn Vika . . .”

Jason was already fishing his phone out of his pocket as Vincent rounded the corner. Stepping aside to give the medic room to work, he hit the speed dial for Marina’s sister and waited for her to answer his call. “Come on, Vika . . . come on!”

“Dubrovskaya,” was the sharp greeting from the blond Amazon.

“Vika, it’s Jay. Is Ward there with you currently?”

“Yeah. He’s at his desk, working on a book report for Marina. It's due on her desk tomorrow. Why?”

“Keep a close eye on him and keep STRIKE away from him.” Jason hurried out, eyes raking over his brother before blowing out a sharp breath. “Someone from STRIKE just stabbed Will in the back because of him . . . and don’t tell Marishka!” He stressed with a fierce tone of voice.

“What!?” she squeaked, horrified by the information. “Just NOW!?”

“Yeah, a little while ago. If you need backup call in Nat and Brian, and tell them what’s going on. Something’s going on and the only word Will huffed out in explanation of what happened was Grant’s name.” Jason growled his free hand balling into a fist at his side.

“And you're telling me NOT to tell my sister why?! She's going to flip out! The Colonel means everything to her!”

“Will’s orders. He’s concerned that she’s still too weak to know right now. As much as I know she’s gonna chew me out for it when she does find out, on that I do have to agree with him. She hasn't bounced back as quickly as we’re all used to.” Jason sighed into the phone his attention torn between Vika and what was going on with Will.

Vincent glanced up into the injured man's face worriedly, before insisting, “I'm sorry,” and dragging Will forward ruthlessly.

The Colonel’s shout reverberated through the echoing hallway, ending on a whimpering moan as he sagged forward over Owen’s bracing arms. “Der'mo,” he breathed in gasping agony. “How bad?”

“It's deep . . . there's a filial puncture. It went hilt deep at the very least. Will, man, we have to take you into Medical. Complications alone . . .”

“No,” was the blunt, stubborn refusal. “I will not let them see they got to me. Take me home. Stitch me there.”

Rolling his eyes Jason spoke to his phone “Vika, what do you think the odds are that Marina will kick Will’s ass for the decision to be stitched up at home?” He gave his elder brother a pointed look even as he shook his head at the order. “The only upside I see to that option, Vincent, is that we can protect him better. Not only from STRIKE but from his own stubbornness.”
Grimacing in agreement, Vincent leaned Will back cautiously. “Here's the problem, Will. You have a puncture wound, at least three maybe four inches deep, in your lower left back maybe an inch above your pelvic bone and four inches left of your spine. If you had more meat on your bones, I wouldn't be as worried about moving you. As it is . . . you let us move you, okay? Or no dice.”

Will's teeth gritted at a wash of pain rushing through his hips and lower back, before he panted out, “Deal.”

“Vika, I gotta go and help them move Will. After you read in Brian and Nat, do you think you could give Clint a call and let him, Aaron and Bucky know? As much as Marina will kill me for her being the last to know, I don’t feel right leaving them out of the loop.” Jason rambled suddenly, his brain whirling over the shitstorm in progress.

“I'll handle it. Just . . . let me know what the prognosis is? I'll keep an eye on our other Perfect Soldier for Will and Marina.”

“Thanks, Vika. Soon as Vincent’s done patching him up I’ll pass on the sitrep.”

“Thank you. And good luck with Marina. You're going to need it.”

“Hey, at least I know she won’t kill me before the wedding.” Jason snarked with a roll of his eyes.

“Small comfort, seeing as you won't get to enjoy the wedding night before she does,” Vika snarked.

“Gotta go. Garrett just showed up . . . and he's making a beeline for Grant.”

“No worries, I'll comm Brian and get him and Nat enroute just in case.” Jason replied before hanging up his phone and turning his attention to his comm link. “Brian, if you're on comms I need you and Nat enroute to the handler pool to back up Vika. She'll fill you in on what’s going on.”

“On it,” the second eldest agreed, before Natasha chimed in, “Is my sister okay?”

“Fine. Just some unwanted guests we would prefer to disappear. Among other things . . . Vika will explain. I gotta go.”

There was a startled second of concern, before Brian growled, “Don't make me kick your ass, Jay. We'll see you back at the house.”

“Yeah, you too,” the tech agreed, before clicking his comm off and coming back to his brother's side. “How are you doing, pravitel?”

Will groaned, breathless and unable to articulate other than, “Zhemchuzhina . . .”

“Yeah, I know. She's gonna kill us all dead.”

“If we’re lucky, Boss Lady will start with the person responsible for the actual stabbing.” Owen joked, even as he adjusted his hold on Will to prevent the Colonel from trying to move away from Vincent’s working hands.

“From your mouth to Thor’s ears,” Jason agreed, crouching and grabbing his brother's hands. “Easy, big brother. He's almost done.”

“Well even if we don’t know which member of STRIKE was responsible we can just aim Boss Lady in their direction and let her go. The only ones we can rule out is Clint and Rumlow who's still with Clint’s detail in New Mexico right?” The Cleaner speculated, while looking up at Jason. “And I doubt the security cameras caught a clear image of Will’s assailant in these halls.”
Jason’s jaw tightened hard, gritting out, “That will be rectified immediately. This will NOT happen again.”

“Not your fault Jason. Whoever was behind this knew Will’s pattern well enough to know that he multitasks even while walking and that he frequently takes the same routes.”

Vincent spoke up, “The ones where he won’t have to talk to people much.”

“Exactly, also meaning less chance of witnesses or of him being found too quickly.” Owen acknowledged with a scowl. “If he hadn’t have been talking to Jason who knows how long he’d have been bleeding here before someone found him.”

Jason groaned, head hanging. “He was distracted because he was talking to me.”

Will’s hand gripped tightly, dragging his brother’s attention to him. “Not . . . your . . . fault . . . say it!”

The Cleaner elbowed the tech specialist when he stalled for too long. Grumbling insistently, he ordered, “You heard the Boss man, say it.”

Jason grumbled even as he agreed playfully, “Not my fault. Shut up, Will; you’re so bossy.”

“Someone . . . has to . . . be,” he gasped out, arching away from Vincent and renewing his struggles against Owen's grip. “Stop . . . please . . .”

“Easy, Boss Man. The more you struggle, the more strength you lose.” Owen grunted, dipping his head to look Will in the eyes. “You focus on the Boss Lady and those beautiful baby girls of yours. Picture their faces and hold onto them. You hear me?”

“Hurts . . . trying . . . Marishka is gonna kill me . . .”

“Which we’ve been arguing from the get go. We need to tell her, Will.”

“No . . . got stabbed . . . just to avoid . . . dancing . . . at the wedding . . . hear her now . . .” he breathed, hauling in gulps of air between words.

“Nah, man. You wouldn’t stoop so low as to conspire with Garrett and STRIKE to avoid dancing with that pretty lady.” Owen teased with a smirk.

“Hands . . . off . . . my . . . woman, Lucky!” was the growling response, the banter between the two practiced and familiar.

“Then keep your ass alive and make me Boss Man,” Owen retorted with a wink and low chuckle. “Keep that fighting spirit front and center.”

“Mudak,” he hissed.

“How you looking back there Vincent?” Owen queried as his gaze flicked from Will to the medic.

“Almost done. Two more minutes and we can move him.”

“And where exactly are we going to put him that buys us more time from Boss Lady’s wrath?” Owen glanced up to Jason then as he continued “It needs to be somewhere defensible . . . just in case these bastards decide to try again.”

There was a momentary silence before the Cleaner paled slightly and started muttering curses under his breath. “If this was a ploy to get Ward away from Boss and Boss Lady . . . is anyone looking out for Boss Lady? Would they make a move against her and the girls?”

Jason swore viciously, triggering his comm, “Aaron . . Nika . . Jim . . get to the house, NOW! Anyone who can, get to the house!!”

Will whimpered, “Marina?”

“I’m sure she’s okay Boss Man. The Boss Lady is badass to begin with; with the girls there, she’ll be as fierce as a momma tiger protecting her cubs. Still better to be safe and send her some backup . . . just in case.” Owen stated with a firm grip to his best friend’s shoulder. “You know your woman. She won’t go down without a hell of a fight.”

“Home . . . take me home . . .”

“So am I the only one thinking the Grimms need to start walking around in Kevlar 24/7?” Owen snarked light heartedly. “Seems to me you guys draw attention in the most unlikely of places. Almost like you’re the foxes in the hen house and drawing down the farmer’s wrath.”

“More likely the chickens . . . hunted by the fox.”

“Nah man. You’re all too badass and sly for chickens. The foxes hunted by the dogs maybe?”

“Either way . . . said ‘hail HYDRA’ . . . as he walked away.”

“So now we have multi headed vipers in the hen house to deal with too?” Owen growled, eyes flicking between Jason and Vincent. “I for one am not being the bearer of that bad news to Fury.”

“We knew . . . something rotten in our house . . . just not what,” Will explained with a hiss and a sharp frown.

Jason frowned fiercely, hissing, “And now we know. Son of a bitch . . . why the hell can’t anything be easy?”

Chapter End Notes

All I can say here is that Will is hella stubborn. He just wouldn't behave himself and let me stab him! It was very frustrating. :D

Translations:
(R) pravitel - big brother
(R) zhemchuzhina - pearl (one of Will's lesser used nicknames for his long time girlfriend and partner, Marina Petrovka)
(R) Mudak - asshole
Circling the Wagons

Chapter Notes

Getting caught up!! Woohoo!!

Translations at the end as always, what few there are anyway. XD

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 237: Circling The Wagons

“Hey, at least I know she won’t kill me before the wedding.” Jason snarked, rolling eyes all but audible in his tone.

Viktoriya Coulson was thrumming with rage and fury. Even still, she forced it down, acknowledging that what had happened was not Jason’s fault. Instead she snarked back to the middle Grimm, “Small comfort, seeing as you won’t get to enjoy the wedding night before she does.”

There was a sudden crash as the door leading into the handler pool slammed into the wall behind it, causing Vika’s head to snap up in alarm. The sight of John Garrett standing there, with his eyes glued on Grant Ward’s bent head caused a deep sigh as she turned her attention back to the phone. “I’ve got to go. Garrett just showed up . . . and he’s making a beeline for Grant.”

Dropping the phone into its cradle without a goodbye, she didn’t think Jason would be upset about it. He had his own hands full with his eldest brother. “Agent Garrett . . . can I help you with something?” she asked, tone glacial. Any of the other agents in the pool would have known not to test her patience when she was utilizing that tone, but Garrett didn’t even glance her way. Striding purposefully through the crowded room, he approached the younger man. Leaning over, he grabbed him by the upper arm and immediately had the kid’s attention.

Grant flinched hard, pulling back against the grip as Garrett snapped, “Let’s go.”

Viktoriya was not the dangerous one among her sisters. Marina was the mother bear, in all of her protective fury. Nika was the wolverine, vicious and gleeful with it. Natasha was as beautiful and as poisonous as her namesake, grace and death in human form. Vika had chosen administration because that was where she had always felt most comfortable.

This did not mean, however, that she was not as skilled or as lethal as her sisters. She was just better at hiding it than they were.

Lunging forward, she laid a well placed chop with the blade of her hand to the curve of his wrist, causing Garrett’s hand to spasm and his grip to release. Grant literally toppled backwards off his chair and scrambled out of his reach. Vika immediately stepped between the two men, her “Murderess” face on at full strength. “Do not touch him again.”

“He’s my asset and he’s sat on his ass long enough,” Garrett growled, eyes blazing as he stared up at the blonde Amazon.

Viktoriya smirked, easily able to see the alarm in his features at the realization she was taller than he was, though not by much. John Garrett may be 6’2” tall, but she was 5’11” without heels . . . and her boots were rocking a four inch heel. “I had it on good authority, Agent Garrett, that Agent Ward is now under the direct supervision of my sister . . . not you.”

“He’s still STRIKE.”

“And he’s on the disabled list. That hasn’t changed. Until he’s released by Medical, he’s not going anywhere!” she hissed, blue eyes blazing as she placed her hands on her hips and leaned into his space.

Growling at her, he leaned down and grabbed Grant by the upper arm, attempting to drag him across the floor. However, he didn’t get very far as Vika’s boot stomped down on his bicep and he released the agent with a pained howl. Using the tip of her boot, she kicked him high in the chest, just below his collarbones, and then used the sole of her boot to shoved him sprawling backwards. Tall and lithe, she cut a terrifying figure as she hissed, “You touch him again, and I’m going to rip you apart. Got me?”

“You and what army?” he sneered disdainfully, before freezing at the sound of throat clearing delicately behind him.

Natasha’s tone was a warm, misleadingly gentle purr as she replied, “Surely you haven’t forgotten who you’re talking to, Garrett? Vika may not like kicking ass, but that doesn’t mean she isn’t still very VERY good at it.”
“And we may not be her army per se, but the Grimms are still an army in and of themselves. So don’t piss me off and back the hell up,” was the rumbling growl from the second eldest Grimm, the one universally accepted as most likely to rip your limbs from your torso if you pissed him off.

The redheaded assassin cocked her head, green eyes wide and deceptively guileless as she asked, “Do we have a problem here?”

Ward’s eyes were huge as he stared up at these three protectors he’d suddenly earned for himself, trying to make himself as small as he could despite the brace around one knee. “No ma’am,” he murmured, scooching to put his back to the wall and keeping the rest of them in his line of sight.

“She wasn’t talking to you, Ward,” Brian insisted firmly, though not unkindly for all of that. “She was talking to Garrett, however.”

“No . . . no problem,” the STRIKE commander insisted, forcing himself to straighten up with a gasping breath.

“I didn’t think so,” she agreed sweetly, before her tone hardened to pure steel. “You can go now.”

His jaw tightened, though he said nothing as he cradled his battered chest and forced himself to his feet. “This isn’t over.”

There was power and magnificence in Vika’s eyes as she insisted coldly, “Yes . . . it is. And if you know what’s good for you, you’ll stay away from this family.” There was a noticeable pause, before she continued, “And that includes everyone, not just Grant. Because if I find out you had anything to do with what happened today . . . I will be the least of your worries. I’ll unleash my sister in all of her fury . . . my sisters and I directly at her side. And we will lay waste to you.”

He glared at her, before stumbling from the handler pool. Brian rounded on Vika as soon as he was gone, demanding, “Something happened?!?” There was barely a pause before he demanded, “What happened!?”

Slumping back against the edge of her desk, the woman shook her head. “I don’t know all the details, but Jason just called. Will’s been stabbed.”

A moment of perfect stillness rang through the room, before Brian exploded with a furious roar, “WHAT!?”

Natasha’s own question was quieter, “Is he okay?”

“I don’t know. From the sounds of it, it’s pretty serious. Jason was gonna call me when they got him home.”

“Who the hell would be that stupid? Don’t they know Marina at all?” Natasha asked, eyes wide with concern and horror. “She’s gonna be pissed!”

Vika’s mouth twisted as she sighed, “Pissed? Is an understatement.”

“And knowing Will, he doesn’t want Marina knowing he’s hurt, so she’s going to be as equally pissed at him and Jay for not telling her.” Brian growled as he paced around the handler pool.

“Yeah. She’s gonna smother Will and scream at Jason. Jason’s already convinced she's gonna kill him.”

“Good bet,” Brian chuckled as Natasha moved to crouch beside Grant. “Are you alright?”
It was clear the younger agent was in a state of shock, seeing as he jolted at her touch. “Is he gone?”

Vika nodded, crouching to cup his cheek. “Yes, Grant . . . he's gone. Are you okay?”

Vika could tell by the way he stared up at her, Grant had considered lying . . . for all of a split second. If Marina found out he’d lied to her, her sister would definitely kick his butt for breaking the rules Marina had laid out. Evaluating his knee by flexing it Grant winced before shaking his head and mumbling “I think I twinged my knee . . . it hurts.”

The blonde nodded, insisting, “All right. Off to Medical with you, Agent Ward. Let's go.”

“Again? Marina’s gonna kill me and it's not even my fault.” Grant groaned as he attempted to haul himself up off the floor unassisted.

“At least if you're following the rules, she'll only scold you. I would sincerely be more worried if I were Agent Garrett right now. I have a feeling a good portion of her wrath is heading his way.”

“I have a sinking suspicion that you’re right and it's going to start a chain of events as Garrett tries to take out his wrath on me . . . again.” He huffed out as he finally managed to get himself into a position to grip the edge of a desk to assist himself upright.

Vika’s grip was implacable as she vowed, “We will never let that happen. You're family, Grant . . . anyone touches you, they deal with us. Da?”

Schooling his features Grant gave a terse nod, although he suspected his fear was still clearly evident in his eyes to both of Marina’s sisters. “I'm still trying to adjust to that fact . . . my family never would have given half a damn over my well being.”

“This one does . . . it does take getting used to, but you're a smart boy. You'll figure it out.”

“Why do I suddenly feel like Pinnochio? With Marina being Geppetto and you the fairy who turns me into a real boy?” Grant snarked light hearted with a wry half grin breaking his mask.

“I've always wanted to be the Blue Fairy,” Vika joked, chuckling. Reaching up to fluff her short blonde ringlets, she taunted, “I even have my hair like hers.”

The specialist bit down on his lower lip in an attempt to quell the laughter forming in his chest at the comment. It was really a losing battle however. After a minute or so there was a soft splutter before a low chuckle broke the silence; Grant’s head dropping towards his hands where they clenched against the desk as his shoulders jerked.

Vika’s lips quirked, pleased by the reaction. “Come on. Sooner gone, sooner done.”

“Yes Ma'am,” Grant responded even as he hobbled to retrieve his crutches.

Brian reached over and grabbed them, sighing, “Sam's right. You are terrible at asking for help.”

“That’s a case of pot meet kettle if ever I heard one. Sam’s not that hot at asking for help himself.” Grant retorted as he grudgingly accepted Brian’s help. “Seems a running theme in this family on occasion too from what I’ve seen.”

“No argument there,” Natasha giggled, earning a smirk from her sister. “Come on you . . . let's get you to Medical so Marishka doesn't totally spaz out.”

“Uhm . . . could one of you grab my book and notes for me? If I’m going to be sitting in Medical I may as well continue my report for Marina. I dread to think what she’ll do to me if it’s not on her desk tomorrow,” Grant asked quietly, eyes downcast.

“I think in this instance, she’d understand, but as you wish,” Vika agreed with a fond smile.

“Probably, but it’ll let me distract myself from the fact I’m in Medical again and stop me from trying to sneak out and getting sprung by Miranda.” Grant admitted.

“Good point.” Turning back to Brian, she cocked an eyebrow and inquired pointedly, “Don’t you have somewhere else to be?”

Brian’s eyes went cold at the reminder, as he growled, “Oh yeah. I’ll keep you informed, Vika.”

There was a rush of affection as Vika gave him a small smile, “Thank you, Bri.”

He gave the two brisk nods, before ruffling Grant’s hair and all but running from the room. Natasha and Vika looked at each other calmly, before Natasha huffed out a sigh. “All right . . . you good to go, Grant?”

“He came,” Vika chirped, turning to the two women still looking at him narrowly. “I’ll lead on,” he agreed, adjusting his grip on his crutches before following the two women from the handler pool. And if he noticed they took up protective positions on either side of him, he at least was smart enough not to mention it.

************************

Jason pulled the Jeep into the driveway of his brother’s house, ears peeled towards the backseat where Vincent was trying to keep his now unconscious brother from bleeding to death. Owen sat in the passenger seat, but he hadn’t been facing forward since the engine had turned over. Slamming the car into park, Jason wrenched the keys from the ignition and twisted. “How is he?”

“Stable, for the moment,” the medic announced, looking up and eyes sweeping the area. “Looks like STRIKE didn’t try to come for her. Front yard’s as pristine as ever.”

“That would be my perfectionist older brother. Stubborn idiot,” the tech geek replied, looking up at the sound of his name. Brian had pulled up on his motorcycle, body moving in practiced repetition as he turned the bike off. “Bri!”

Brian bolted across the lawn, stopping by the back wheel, hands gripping the steel siding fiercely. “How is he?”

“All right for the moment. Guys, if you two could clear the way and distract Marina, Owen and I can get him inside.”

Brian nodded, tone amiable as he agreed, “Can do!” Slapping Owen’s back, the second eldest Grimm insisted, “Be careful with him?”

Jason smirked as he watched the two. No one would ever believe that these two men had once hated each other. Granted that was decades ago, but it was still good to see that the animosity between them was gone. Owen took the question in with the gravity it was intended, nodding solemnly, “You have my word.”

“Thank you.”

The two brothers jogged across the lawn, heading towards the door. Brian froze on the top stair, hand coming out to grab Jason’s shirt, snapping sharply, “Wait.”
“What!?” the younger brother asked, glaring at Brian impatiently.

Brian reached back and pulled his gun, chambering a round as he announced, “There’s blood on the floor.”

“What!?” Jason demanded, whirling and staring at the dark red stain. Someone had tried to clean it, but the imperfection in the wood was there for all to see nonetheless. Jerking away from Brian, Jason pulled his gun and barrelled into the house yelling, “Marina!”

“Damn it Jay,” was the only thing Brian said, as he bolted into the house behind him. Jason ignored him, his only thoughts for his sister and nieces. Whatever had happened, it was clear it was over as there were no sounds of struggle inside. Ergo, there was nothing stopping him from making sure the Russian was okay.

He skidded to a stop in the kitchen, staring wide eyed at the line of bodies stretched out along the tile. “Jesus . . .” he breathed, unable to prevent himself from counting them. Five bodies and no back up on sight. Shit.

A noise from the hidden stairwell into the kitchen had Jason whirling, gun coming up without pause. A familiar chuckle, tired but still amused, drifted through the area as a voice teased, “That’s the second time you’ve pulled a gun on me inside my own home, Jason Leonard. Something I should know?”

Marina stepped from concealment, her daughter Valya against one shoulder and a Glock 9mm gripped tightly in her other hand. Jason felt a rush of relief, stowing the gun and moving forward to pull them both into his arms. “Slava Bogu, are you okay?”

“I’m all right. Just a little bruised, but I’m okay,” she promised, the stock of the gun a firm press against the small of his back as she allowed herself to hug him. “Katenka’s upstairs . . . she slept through the whole thing. This one however, was in the living room with me when they burst in.”

“Is she okay?” Brian asked, darting forward to smooth his fingers over Valya’s dark curls.

“Scared, but all right. Not a scratch on her. I was able to keep them out of the living room for the most part.” Looking between the two, she demanded, “Does someone want to tell me why STRIKE broke into my home today and did their damnedest to put me in an early grave?”

“Marina . . .” Jason hedged, trying to figure out how much to say.

She blanched, her features going very pale as she whispered, “Where’s Misha? What’s happened!?”

The two brothers glanced at each other, before Brian stepped forward and extracted Valya from her arms. At the same time, Jason reached to wrap his hands around her biceps. Hot chocolate eyes were huge as her wrists twisted so her hands could clamp around his own wrists. “Jay . . . what’s happened? Where is Mishka?”

“STRIKE wants Grant back. They knew the only way to do that, was to go through you and Will.”

Marina was already shaking her head, whimpering, “No . . . no . . . no . . .”

Jason tightened his hands around her and announced, “He’s alive . . . but he’s been stabbed.” He winced at her terrified cry of, “No!” but continued, knowing she needed to know everything. “It’s bad, Marishka . . . but Vincent is a stubborn cuss, almost as stubborn as Will. He’s gonna be okay, all right? And then you can kick his ass for scaring you.”
“Is he in Medical? We need to go . . . I'll go get Katenka.”

The tech specialist glanced sheepishly to his brother before clearing his throat. Turning his gaze back onto Marina, he grunted, “Actually, he’s outside in the Jeep with Owen and Vincent. Will didn’t want to go to Medical. He doesn’t want anyone knowing what happened.”

Marina’s eyes widened, before her mouth twisted and she snarked, “I’m going to blame that stupid on the pain. Why isn't he in Medical if it's as bad as you're implying?”

“This is Will we’re talking about, Marishka. Bleeding out or not, he's so stubborn he could butt heads with a bull and likely win. I’m also going to assume he doesn’t want to risk showing any weakness where his attackers can see . . . the STRIKE goon who got him told him to ‘Hail HYDRA’ as he was walking away. So there’s that too.” Jason rambled while putting his sidearm back in its holster.

Brian spoke up next, announcing, “Garrett made an attempt to collect Ward as well, but Vika and Nat are sticking close to him.”

Marina went ice cold at that statement, her tone furious as she demanded, “Say that again!?”

“Which part?” Jason snarked with a fond roll of his eyes. “The part about Garrett being stupid enough to try and engage your sister, the part where Will’s as stubborn as a bull, or the part where we have a secret group of Nazi extremists in our midst?”

“The part about Ward,” she demanded, visibly worried about her boy. There was a moment's pause, before she insisted grudgingly, “. . . and the part where a member of STRIKE said ‘Hail HYDRA’ to S.H.I.E.L.D.’s Chief Analyst.”

Jason sighed, guiding Marina to the table and sitting her down. “When Will told me his attacker said about Ward being ‘theirs’ I rang Vika to read her in. Apparently Garrett was already storming into the Handler Pool so she had to run. Brian and Nat went to back her up, so he likely has a better run down of what happened with Garrett.” Jason explained, one hand lifting to pinch the bridge of his nose “It wasn’t until Vincent was trying to tend to Will’s wound that my idiot brother dropped the HYDRA bombshell.”

“So that's what's rotten in our house,” the woman sighed, one hand coming up to scrub over her face. For a long time, she sat quiet, before straightening in her chair. “At the moment, I don't care. We'll figure it out later.”

Jason’s eyes popped out of his head as he protested, “Marishka . . .”

“No!” she ordered, eyes wide and luminous as though she was holding back tears through sheer force of will. Jason had never seen his sister so fragile . . . so human. Even at her most maternal, there was a core of strength and steel in her. “I am going to handle Misha. The rest can figure itself out.”

“What are our orders in the meantime?” Brian asked, glancing between his two siblings.

Marina’s smile was fond and proud as she replied, “Ask Jason . . . he's Misha’s Second.”

“What?” the middle Grimm asked, startled. The woman said nothing, only bent to kiss the top of his head before extracting her daughter from Brian's arms and heading out to see to her lover. “Marina!”

Her voice was firm as it rang back over her shoulder, announcing, “You can do this. Utilize their strengths and put things in order. I have faith in you, Jay . . . have some faith in yourself.”

The tech was floored; he was Second yes, but after Marina. He’d never taken over while Marina was still in commission, only when his brother AND his sister are unable to give the orders.

Brian took pity, understanding his dilemma. “Jay, Marina is out of play, okay? Her whole priority right now is Will and their daughters. So just parse it out like you would if Marina was down for the count okay? What do we do first?”

“We rally the troops.” Jason stated firmly, scowling as he looked to the ceiling. “We get Rene and Samonik home to look after the girls. Call in Gus and Malee . . . we get the whole family together to protect Will, Marina and the girls. Der’mo I didn’t call Dad . . or Maria about Will.”

“One thing at a time. I'll go get the kids; tell Marina I'm gonna take the NSX. Call Nat and Vika . . . get Ward here as soon as he's released; Marina's gonna worry until she sees him for herself.”

Squeezing his brother's shoulder, Brian promised, “You got this, Jay. One thing at a time.”

Jason's hands came up too push back through his hair as Brian left, feeling panic spike in his gut. “I wasn’t built for this,” he groaned, trying to calm down. After a moment, he straightened, “But that doesn't mean I'm not gonna rock the shit out of this.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Da/nyet - yes/no
(R) Slava Bogu - Thank God.
(R) Samonik - Sammy-baby (nickname for Will and Marina's foster son, Sam Winchester, used by the whole family.)
(R) Der'mo - shit
So there's a Firefly Anniversary party in Grimm Pack, if you haven't read it, you should!!

Only one translation. At the bottom as usual.

Let me know what you think and enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 238: Vincent’s Lament
After sweeping from the room her boys were in, Marina made her way towards the entrance of their family home, Valya being bounced gently against her hip as she walked. The Russian’s eyes widened as Vincent and Owen appeared in the doorway with her unconscious lover in tow. “Bozhe moi! Misha!”

Her fingers tightened unconsciously, earning an indignant squeal from Valya as the Russian watched her partner’s head loll against his best friend’s chest as they carried him inside. The dark blood staining his clothing earned a gasp as she felt tears well up in her eyes. Bolting forward, she grabbed for his dangling hand, whimpering, “Mishka?”

Vincent’s attention diverted from Will at the whimpering tone; one look at Marina and he could already see the tension coiling in her tiny frame as well as the large bruise marring one delicate cheek. He moved to settle a hand gently on her shoulder; voice a low purr as he spoke “Marina, listen to me. You need to stay calm. For little Valya’s sake, she can already sense your fear.”

Hot chocolate eyes brimmed with tears as she looked up at the doctor. “Tell me . . . is he gonna be okay?”

“If he were anyone else, I’d have my doubts. But we both know Will is a stubborn son of a bitch and he won’t leave you and your girls without a hell of a fight.” Vincent soothed with a squeeze to her shoulder. “What about you . . . how are you? That cheek looks nasty.”

She looked up at him with startled eyes, fingers twitching around Will’s hand as she made an aborted movement to touch her face. “My cheek?”

“You have a rather nasty looking bruise there Marina . . . did you not know?” the medic sounded surprised by her response.

“I was more worried about the girls . . . I’m still coming down from the adrenaline.” She gifted him with a tight smile, “I’m sure I’ll feel it soon enough, if it’s as bad as you say.”

“And when Will finds out about that he’ll kick all our asses.” Vincent retorted as he glanced beyond Marina. “Where’d Brian and Jay end up?”

Marina’s head tilted toward the kitchen, as she replied, “They were in the kitchen last I checked. But I imagine they’re calling in the troops at this point . . . getting everyone home safe and sound.”

“Good plan. Once we get Will settled I’ll get Owen to get some ice for your cheek. How are the girls? I’m going to guess they didn’t get close enough to do any harm to them?”

“Katenka was already down for her nap, but this little one was being stubborn. She’s scared, but unharmed. Katenka slept through the entire thing; I just checked on her and she’s still asleep.”

“So her mother’s daughter then,” Vincent teased as he lifted one hand to tap Valya’s nose. “We’re going to get Will through this, Marina. You need to stay strong for him though and remind him you and the girls are waiting for his stubborn ass.”

Marina’s lips quirked slightly as she sighed, “He requires so much looking after.” Taking a deep breath she vowed, “I can keep him with us, Vincent. I will not lose him this way.”

“Admit it. You wouldn’t want him to be any other way.” Vincent retorted with a wink before pulling Marina, and by extension Valya, into a warm, bracing hug. “We’re all here for you.”

“A Will Grimm who wasn’t a stubborn cuss. What on earth would I do with such a man?” Burrowing into the doctor a little, she laughed and continued bitterly, “A better question is, what would such a man do with me?"

“He’d probably be six feet under several times over by now.” Vincent chuckled sadly before pressing a kiss to the crown of Marina’s head and then dipping lower to do the same to Valya. “Pretty sure whoever concocted this plan is going to be regretting it soon enough.”

Her face contorted into vicious fury as she agreed, “I intend to make sure of it.”

“And we’ll all have your back while you and your sisters lead the retaliation.” Vincent vowed. “But right now, I need you focusing all your energy on yourself and these girls first, then Will. If he wakes up and you’re frazzled, he’s gonna kick my ass for not doing my job.”

“And what, pray tell, is your job?” she teased.

“To keep you lot alive. Not easy on the best of days; go ahead and throw in people stabbing you in the back in places you should be safe and I’m having issues.” Vincent replied with a heavy sigh before he teased “Sometimes I think you lot are going to be the death of me.”

“I’m pretty sure, we are going to be the death of ourselves,” she snarked. Her mouth dragged downwards in genuine dismay as she watched Owen carry her unconscious Colonel towards the stairs. “What are we going to do?”

“What we do best. Keep our heads during the crisis; get Will back on his feet; and get Jason and Casey married. Then go hunting for the idiot responsible for this.” Vincent’s voice was a low menacing growl, his eyes holding a golden tinge to them. “They made a mess of him and I’d rather like to return the favor.”

“I’ll make sure you come along then, shall I?”

“Would be appreciated. I know how much Will dislikes it when we disobey orders. Come on, you two need to get some rest, as does the patient.”

Marina bit down on her lower lip, eyes terrified as she looked towards the stairwell. “I don’t know if I could rest. Not now that I know what’s out there... waiting in the wings to kill us.”

“Marishka, we won’t let them anywhere near you. With the entire family coming in this place is going to be as secure as Fort Knox.” Vincent gave her shoulder a firm squeeze. “Trust me, right now these idiots think Will is on death’s door, bleeding out in the back hallways of HQ. They’ll be thinking they’ve won.”

“Like hell they have,” she snarled, earning a wild giggle from her daughter at the sound. Bending, Marina brushed her nose against Valya’s own as she cooed, “We’ll rain bloody vengeance on their little parade, won’t we, my sweet girl? Yes we will.”

“God have mercy on future generations when your children are grown.” Vincent chuckled as he watched the mother and daughter.

“There will be no mercy for anyone who harms my family... not while I live to avenge them.”

“Duly noted. But please hold off on plotting the massacre until we get your other half back on his feet and get Jason married off okay?” Vincent nudged her towards the stairs. “Now get moving before I pick you up and carry you and Valya upstairs after Will.”

Looking up at him, the Russian reached out and cupped his cheek. “Thank you, Vincent, for everything you do for this family. You have been our true friend and I do not know what we would do without you.”

“I could say the same. But we’re family, blood or not. I’ll always stand with you and your boys. Forever and always I’ll be at your back,” he promised. “Now, upstairs with you. Move it, Marishka.”

Gifting him with a quirky grin, she offered him a sassy salute. “Yes sir, Dr Keller, sir.”

Vincent quirked a brow at the antics even as his lips twitched in amusement “Funny, Marina. Now I’m not kidding move it or I will carry you. If Will wakes and you're not there he’s going to struggle against Owen and likely hurt himself more.”

Her eyes went wide at the suggestion, before she clutched Valya closer and bolted toward the stairs.

“I swear one day I’m going to come in here and find you with a broken neck!” Vincent called after the diminutive Russian’s retreating form. He took the stairs quickly, two at a time after her and his patient.

Marina laughed over her shoulder, agreeing, “Be that as it may, at least your life is rarely boring!”

“My life has been far from boring . . . even before I met your lot of reckless boys.” Vincent retorted. “Still at least I know my skills will never get rusty.”

“Thank Thor for that stroke of good luck,” she agreed, eyes turning downwards to take in the quiet features of her eldest daughter. Valya was finally asleep, cuddled to her mother's heart a content grin on her face. “Give me five . . . I need to put her down.”

“Go on. I’ll go make sure Owen’s not having any trouble getting your stubborn partner settled.” Vincent patted Marina’s shoulder on his way past her.

“Thank you,” she murmured, moving quickly down the hallway towards the nursery.

When she came back to her room, Will was still unconscious and lying on his side, facing into the middle of the bed. Vincent was leaning over him, fingers deft on the makeshift bandage. “How is he?” she asked, fingers clutching the doorframe as she watched.

“Resting thankfully, though I don’t know how long that'll last. I may need to go get you some painkillers and sedatives to make sure he rests in order to heal up.” Vincent lifted his head to look at her. “Come and sit with him. Talk to him so he knows you’re here. He’s far too tense and last thing we need is for him to have one more thing to stress about.”

Nodding, she scampered across the floor and climbed into the bed beside him. Fingertips were soft and trembling against the plains of his upturned cheek as she promised softly, “We’re okay Misha my love . . . the girls and I, we're all right. Just rest and get well. I'll be right here beside you, when you wake.”

“You gonna be okay to keep an eye on him for a bit Marina? I want to go call Miranda and get her to collect some supplies I’ll need for Will’s care.” Vincent said quietly, eyes taking in the Russian’s features.

She nodded solemnly, eyes fixed on her lover. He reached over to squeeze her shoulder, before moving to the door. Pausing in the frame, Vincent turned back in time to watch her lay down beside the Colonel, their hands clasped in the small space between them. Hot chocolate eyes searched the beloved features, taking in the pallor of his skin and the darkening bruises beneath his eyes. There was a small sad smile on her lips as she leaned forward to kiss the very corner of his mouth. “I love you,” she murmured, before shifting that small inch closer and tucking her head beneath the jut of his chin, conscious to leave space between her body and his own.

Vincent retreated, feeling as though he had just witnessed something intensely private and incredibly intimate. He worshipped at the feet of his Catherine, his wild Cat with her brazen attitude and fierce protectiveness. He could only hope that one day, their love would become something like what the Colonel and his Russian had. Something deep and all consuming and quietly passionate; a love full of total devotion and crowned with utter joy in each other.

As Vincent made his way down the stairs the front door slammed open with a loud bang, the sounds drawing the medic's attention away from his mental assessment of what was needed for Will’s care. All his senses went on alert, eyes shimmering golden as he prepared for an attack before he caught sight of Marina’s youngest son barrelling towards the stairs. Just as Rene went to move past him, Vincent hooked one arm around the boy’s waist and lifted him off his feet.

Starting back down the stairs with the teenager his golden eyes locked on the younger Winchester’s back as the tall young man closed the door behind them. As for Rene, he was thrashing in Vincent's grasp and trying to wriggle free causing the medic to emit a low growl before he demanded, “Rene, stop.”

“My dad!” he protested, tears in his eyes as he struggled. “Let go, Vincent!”

“No,” was the blunt response, even as he was dumping the teenager onto the couch.

“I need to see my dad!”

“You need to grow up,” the doctor snapped in reply, causing Rene’s jaw to drop in shock. “Your mom is exhausted and she's gonna be hurting in the morning. Your dad was stabbed; it's pretty serious and he is currently unconscious. Which means someone needs to look after your sisters. And who do you think is going to do that, if not for you and Samonik?”

Reaching down, he took Rene’s chin and forced the teen to look at him. “They need to rest and heal, okay? They NEED that. Which means the rest of us need to step up and lend them a hand or twenty.”

Rene considered Vincent’s words for a moment or two before giving a sharp nod as he blurted swiftly “We can do that. Right Sam? Can I assume the family is all being called in?”

Smirking, the medic agreed, “Fort Knox has nothing on a house full of pissed off and overprotective Grimms.”

“Then I guess we better drag out the extra pillows and blankets to air out before everyone arrives.” Rene’s eyes flicked to the ceiling momentarily before asking in a quiet voice “Dad’s not gonna die is he? Mama couldn’t handle that.”

There was always a part of Vincent that had known how fierce Rene was, how much like Will he was. This was perhaps the first time Vincent realized that more than Will's son, Rene was Marina's Child. Fierce, protective and devoted unendingly to those he loved.

Squeezing the thin shoulder, Vincent promised, “No, Rene, your dad isn't gonna die. Your mother will never allow it. You all need him . . . your mother needs him too much to let him go without a hell of a fight. Right?”

“Sometimes I feel like their lives are an endless horror movie,” Rene muttered, scrubbing one hand over watery eyes as he tried to pull his head on straight to take over the care of his baby sisters.
“There is too much love in their lives, for them to ever be a horror movie. It's definitely an action flick though; nonstop go go go.”

“Maybe. But this current situation is screaming slasher fic to me.” Rene retorted before recalling Vincent’s words. “Wait . . . how was Mama hurt?”

Taking a deep breath through his nose, Vincent considered the young man before him. There was a moment when he thought about lying, but that thought never fully developed. “The same people who were behind your father's stabbing, sent a goon squad here to the house to take out your mother.”

The teen’s shoulder’s tensed, eyes narrowing as his gaze darted between his best friend and Vincent as he hissed, “They came for her in her own home? While the babies were here!?”

“There's a tableau of dead bodies laid out in the kitchen,” came the unexpected response from behind Vincent, Jason's green eyes weary and heartsick as he watched his nephew. “Five of them, to be specific.”

“Valya and Katenka . . . they’re okay?” Rene asked suddenly, eyes darting to his Uncle as he processed that information.

“Kat was already down for her nap; she's fine. Valya was frightened but unhurt. She's sleeping in the nursery with Katenka now. Your mother laid her down about fifteen minutes ago,” Vincent promised.

“Why is it whenever Mama’s happy . . . or even when anyone in this family is happy something goes majorly wrong? It’s like Karma hates the Grimms.” Rene groused, slouching down into the couch.

“Your parents face off against the dark every day. This is just one more blip on their radar. They’ll bounce back from this,” Jason promised, a small smile on his lips. “They always do.”

“But in time for your wedding? Mama was excited for that.”

Jason's hands scrubbed over his face as he groaned, “Beatrice is gonna have my head on a platter. I gotta call Casey.”

“Mama won’t let that happen.” Rene responded shakily. “You’re one of her boys, no one hurts her boys.”

“Too true,” Brian agreed, coming into the room holding the phone. Offering it to the teenager, he ordered firmly, “Call your brother. Get him here. Samonik, I called MIT to get Dean excused for a few weeks. You'll need to make up the futon in your room for when he gets here.”

Taking the offered phone Rene dialled Sam’s cell phone, lifting the handset to his ear he focused on the ringing as he tried to figure out just what exactly he was going to say to his brother when he picked up.

Vincent offered him an out, insisting, “Put it on speaker, Rene.”

Just then there was a click as the call was answered. “Grimm,” was the deep baritone, solemn and monotone. It had clearly been a bad day.

“Sammy!” Rene’s voice cracked at the sound of his brother’s familiar, comforting voice. His shoulders started to shake as he fought to not breakdown.
There was concern and confusion in the older brother's voice. “Rene? What . . . are you okay? Where's Ma?”

“Something bad happened, Sammy. You need to come home . . . now.” Rene’s voice wavered as he looked between his Uncles and Vincent. He took a deep breath before suddenly blurting “Mama and Dad, they were attacked.”

Sam’s voice was an infuriated roar as he exploded, “What!? By who!?"

“I don’t know. All Vincent and Uncle Jay told me was that Dad’s been stabbed, that it’s bad, and a group of goons came for Mama at the house and their bodies are littering the kitchen.”

Terror rang through his next question, “The girls?”

“Katenka was asleep upstairs, but Valya was with Mama. Vincent says they’re both okay though.” Rene’s voice wavered, his eyes watering uncontrollably as he fought to stay strong.

“Rene, deep breaths, squirt. Okay? Can you do that for me?”

Sam’s only response was the sound of deep breaths through the line. Rene’s grip on the phone white knuckled as his other hand fist against his jeans. “Uncle Jay’s called all the family home . . . I’m guessing they think this isn’t over yet.”

“Let’s hope no one would ever be that stupid. Okay, so here’s what I need you to do for me, Rene. You listening, squirt?”

“Weren’t they already that stupid coming for Mama in her own home? And yeah I’m listening,” Rene snuffled suddenly as the soothing presence of his brother’s voice helped him to pull it together again.

“Find Owen. He's not gonna want to leave Dad, but we gotta clean those bodies. Ma shouldn't have that filth dirtying up her kitchen. You got Samonik with you?”

“Yeah. Vincent said we’re to look after the girls.”

“Girls are sleeping though right?”

“So I was told.”

“Good. Let them sleep. Get all the blankets and pillows out; make up as many of the beds as you can. There’s some air mattresses in the garage, find them. Then, when Owen’s done, scrub the tile in the kitchen. Get as much blood up as you can, before it dries completely. If it won’t come out, call me and I’ll arrange to get it replaced. Okay?”

“Already a step ahead of you on the beds. I thought of that already.” Rene cheeked before sighing and repeating the instructions “Gotcha. Get Owen to get rid of the bodies, scrub the floor and call you if it doesn’t come out. Anything else?”

“Yeah . . . Samonik? You there, kid?”

“I'm here,” he agreed softly, eyebrows furrowed. “What can I do?”

“Seal the doors; sigils, salt, locks, everything you can think of. With Ma and Dad down, and a bunch of dead in the house, I want to take no chances. Understood? Get Granddad and Great-Aunt Gretel to help if you need it.” There was a pause, before insisting, “See if you can convince Owen to salt and burn the bodies, okay? I want no ghosts in my parents’ home. They have enough to worry about in the dark of the night.”

“Do Granddad and Great-Aunt Gretel even know yet?” Rene asked aloud as he twisted to stare at his Uncles.

Taking a deep breath, Jason nodded miserably, “That was NOT a fun call. They're on their way here. They had to detour to pick up Steve and Maria on their way.”

Rechecking the checklist he’d made in his head Rene nodded slightly in Jason’s direction before turning his attention back to the phone. “We’re on it Sammy; we’ll be in touch if needs be. If not, we’ll see you soon?”

There was the sudden roar of a motorcycle engine through the phone as the key turned, before Sam agreed, “Give me about two hours. I'll be there as soon as I can. Be smart, be safe and, above all, stay inside the fucking house! I'll see you soon.”

Ending the call Rene looked to Vincent, brow furrowing slightly as he asked “Is Owen upstairs with Mama and Dad?”

“Yeah; I sent him up with an ice pack for Marina's face.”

“Could you . . .” Rene’s voice stammered momentarily before he cleared his throat and straightened his shoulders “Could you please send him down? If I go upstairs, I might not leave Mama alone.”

“Yeah, I'll go get him,” the doctor promised kindly. “You get started on your chores, huh?”

“Yeah, I’ll get started on the bedding while Sam does the doors and such.” Rene agreed as he rose off the couch.

Reaching out, the medic pulled the kid into a strong embrace. “It's gonna be alright, Rene, okay? We're gonna get through this. I promise.”

“We always do. Especially when the family pulls together.” Rene acknowledged as he returned the embrace. “You just make sure Dad doesn’t leave us.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Bozhe moi - Oh my God
Rene knew exactly zero about spells, magic, sigils or what have you. What he did know had been taught to him by Samonik since the younger Winchester had come to live with them. The older boy had explained that most of them were only effective if you believed in them . . . except for salt.

Salt was always effective. No matter what you were up against.

Currently they were on the front porch together, Rene holding up one of Sam’s books while the taller teenager carved them into the doorframe. The scholar in Rene was fascinated by the ancient texts, while the terrified son in him was just praying the symbols would protect his uncharacteristically vulnerable family.

Just then, the sound of an engine rumbled through the air, the sound still far off and faint. Even still, the familiar rumble of a motorcycle caught Rene’s attention. The Grimms were famous on base for preferring two wheels to four, and almost everyone - with the only notable exceptions being his father, his grandfather and his Great-Aunt Gretel - had at least one. Case in point, his father had purchased his mother a Ducati for an anniversary present years before. Except for her opal - also given by his father - it was probably her most prized possession.

Rene knew motorcycles . . . knew how they sounded . . . and the engine approaching was a well-loved one.

The book lowered as the rumbling grew closer, Rene’s suspicion of its destination confirmed as the machine appeared. The Ducati was a sedate forest green, laid out almost completely on its side as its rider ripped around the corner at a higher speed than was probably prudent. The motorcycle hardly slowed, manipulated upright effortlessly seconds before it swung into an open space along the edge of the driveway.

Sitting up straight, a gloved hand reached out and snapped off the ignition, startling silence ringing along the street as a result. Stepping to stand next to his friend, Samonik asked cautiously, “Who the hell is that?”

Rene didn’t even hear the question, his attention glued to the figure as the driver stripped off his gloves and then reached up to remove his helmet. Sunny blond hair gleamed even in the meager twilight, the compact frame moving easily from the seat, one leg swinging up and over the back. A soft sob tore from Rene’s throat as he shoved the book at his friend and bolted forward, shouting, “Sammy!?”

Blue eyes flashed as he spun to find the origin of the voice, a small smile slipping across his lips at the sight of Rene running headlong towards him. The two brothers crashed into each other, Rene on a trajectory like a heat seeking missile and nearly knocking the stockier brother back a step before Samuel W. Grimm recovered his footing. Strong arms banded around the teenager’s waist in a fierce bear hug, Rene’s own arms coming around his brother’s neck and clinging like a frightened child. With his face buried against Sam’s neck, his brother’s voice was more vibration than anything as the elder Grimm soothed, “Hey squirt . . . it’s okay.”

“I’m not a squirt,” was the petulant protest from the almost 16 year old, a soft sniffle belying the argument.

“Sure you are,” Sam laughed gently, arms tightening for a second more before he dropped his little brother back onto his feet.

“We’re the same height, Sammy,” Rene pointed out with a huff.

Sam’s hand was fond and playful as it scrubbed through Rene’s hair, earning a squawk of indignation. “Height has nothing to do with the nickname . . . squirt.” Looking up at the sound of his name, the blond gifted the brunette on the porch a half-hearted smile. “Hey Kitty-Cat.”

Catherine Chandler cocked an eyebrow at him. “Hey Sammy . . . you made excellent time,” she admonished, clearly unimpressed by the fact her friend had made an almost eight hour drive in just over five. “How many cops did you leave eating your dust, exactly?”

There was a dark shadow in Sam’s eyes as he herded his baby brother up the porch steps, then bent to kiss her cheek fondly. “A few. I would have gotten busted a couple times, if Uncle Jay hadn’t installed the jammer into the chassis. Where is everyone?”

“Your parents are sleeping. Grant is bunked down in your room, sleeping off a dose of heavy painkillers. Vincent is crashed out on the couch, trying to get a nap while all of his patients are in dreamland. Your sisters are asleep in the nursery. Your grandparents are at HQ, informing Fury and dealing with some kind of problem. And your uncles have got their noses to the ground, trying to sort out what happened and why,” the detective recited, counting off groups of people on her fingers.

Nodding, the sniper shoved a hand back through his hair in frustration. “How’s my dad?”

“You’ll have to ask Vincent, Sammy; I don’t know, I’m sorry.” Cocking an eyebrow, she asked cautiously, “So I don’t see Jules . . .”

“She’s okay. Spike and Lou are gonna bring her down tomorrow for the wedding. She can’t fly and she can’t reach the wheel around her belly right now either. I needed to get here ASAP, so I didn’t bring her with me.”

“How much longer till her due date again?”

“Two months, minus a week or two,” was the preening reply, a sharp grin on his lips. “How are you and Vincent?”

“I’m on sentry duty, with your dad’s friend and your Uncle Jason.”

“They’re here!? But I thought you said . . .”
“Yeah, I know what I said. But Owen’s up with your parents upstairs and Jason is in the study, going through surveillance footage with Casey.”

Nodding, Sam turned to look at the younger Winchester. “Hey Samonik. How’s it going with the sigils?”

“Just got this door to finish. But like I told Rene, if you don’t believe in their power, they’re not going to do much good.”

“We do believe in their power . . . it’ll be enough. Thank you. Your brother on his way home?”

“Yeah . . . I’m sure he’s pushing the Impala to her limits. He was away on a ROTC thing, when the call went out. He just got the message about an hour or two ago.”

“All right.” Turning back to his brother, Sam cocked an eyebrow curiously. “And how are you, squirt?”

There was genuine hesitation as he considered the question. “Is it okay if I don’t know?”

Sam’s arm tightened around his shoulders, pulling him back into a warm embrace and pressing a quick kiss to his temple. Rene huddled close, relieved to have his brother home . . . to be able to pass off the reins to someone else. “It is absolutely okay, Rene,” Sam promised, head coming up and around at the sound of the door. Smiling at his best friend, he greeted the medic fondly, “Hey Vincent. Interrupt your beauty sleep?”

The scarred features were still tired but resolute, the two men embracing hard, exchanging grunts and back slaps. Rene and Samonik snickered as Cat’s eyes rolled in amusement. “You made good time.”

“Yeah . . . don’t tell my Ma. How’s my dad?”

“He’ll live, but the wound is in a tricky spot. He needs to be calm and be still for awhile . . . and you know your dad.”

“Huh . . . good luck with that.”

“I’m hoping we’ll be able to keep him in bed, to look after your mom’s own injuries. Not to mention, she’s still recovering from her C-section. If we can convince him that him staying in bed is in Marina’s best interests, we may be able to swing it.”

“Injuries!? What injuries!?” Sam demanded, rage glittering like diamonds in his eyes.

“She’s got a pretty nasty bruise on her cheek. I can only imagine what else she’s sporting that I can’t see,” the medic reported angrily, a golden sheen shining on the surface of his eyes.

Rene knew how fiercely Marina’s Misfits loved their leader, and had seen with his own eyes the ferocious love Marina Petrovka had for her boys. The depths of fury in Vincent and Sam’s eyes could have started a war, they were practically vibrating with it. “Mama’s okay though, right?” he asked meekly, eyes wide with worry.

“Yeah,” Vincent promised with a fond smile, one arm coming around Catherine’s shoulders, as she slipped her own around his waist. “Your mom’s tough through and through. They underestimated her when they only sent five. Considering your sisters were in the house, they should have sent an army. And even then, it proudly wouldn’t have been enough to take her down. Not with her daughters in danger.”
“Is it smart? Gathering everyone here at once?” the younger Sam asked cautiously.

Vincent shrugged, replying carefully, “We’re on base. And HYDRA was clearly hoping Will would be dead before he could tell anyone about their involvement. Same with Marina.”

“Both attacks essentially failed . . . and they lost five loyal soldiers. They’re going to lay low right now . . . reorganize their strategy.” Sam agreed, blue eyes flashing in the porch light. “Speaking of the bodies . . .?”

“Salted and burned out back. Owen took care of it,” Catherine explained, eyes hard. Despite her profession, she clearly felt no qualms about their deaths or the dismissive manner of their disposal. “Better than they deserved.”

Both Misfits nodded in unanimous agreement, as Vincent agreed, “Also, Will is adamant. Grant is not to know who did this or why this happened.”

Rene blinked, startled by the insistence, though it was clear his elder brother was unsurprised. “Last thing we want is for him to pull away again. Ma’s worked so hard to get him this far; this would only make him regress backwards.”

Samonik sounded as confused as Rene, the two teenagers wearing matching frowns as the older boy asked, “So what does he know?”

“There was an unsubstantiated attack on Will and Marina, perpetrators unknown for the moment. Marina killed her attackers, but Will was wounded in the ambush,” the doctor replied with a sigh. “The bodies were already gone by the time he was released from Medical. He doesn’t know they were STRIKE, and I’m pretty sure no one intends to tell him.”

“So who was it?”

“Jason has the credentials and IDs in the study. Ask him. He’s trying to figure out their patterns over the last six months from the security footage.”

Rene shook his head with a smirk, “Thank Thor that Uncle Nick is such a suspicious and paranoid Magnificent Bastard.”

“Indeed,” was the resounding agreement from everyone else standing on the porch.

Sam bit on his lower lip, glancing at his watch. “Anyone been up to relieve Owen yet?”

“Who in this family would dare try?” Catherine asked with a rueful shake of her head. “I think he feels guilty . . . like this is penance. He is Will’s security.”

“No one could have anticipated an attack like this at headquarters,” Vincent protested, a frown on his face as he tried to argue against it. “It’s not his fault. It could never have been his fault.”

“You really think that matters to him?” she asked gently. “Would it have mattered to you? If it had been JT? Or Sam? Or Grant?” Here she paused and continued, confirming the knowledge that everyone knew about Owen’s loyalty to Will but never spoke of. “Would it have mattered to you if it was me?”

Taking a deep breath in through his nose, Vincent’s lips compressed as he sighed. “No . . . no, it would not have mattered to me. I never would have left you . . . any of you.”

“So what happens now?” Rene asked tentatively, leaning into his brother seeking comfort.
Sam Grimm’s eyes were molten sapphires as he replied firmly, “Now, we wait . . . for the Colonel to wake up . . . for the dawn to rise . . . for the next move. And when it comes . . . we kick its ass.”
Chapter Notes

Hey guys! So I know it's been a long time since we updated on the main fic, but I hope you guys have been enjoying the Outtakes and Separates fics that Caiti and I have been working on for you! We're getting to the end of this particular plotline, so look forward to the next big bit. It was at the request of a reviewer a few weeks ago. I promise! I haven't forgotten!

In the meantime, thank you all of for your reviews on the last chapter! They are always a delight and a pleasure to read. And I can't wait to hear what you think about this new chapter! Please, go ahead a leave a comment at the end. Even a smiley face makes my day! Thank you for your long time devotion to this verse. It means more than I can say.

Translations are in the fic, so I'm not going to worry about putting them at the end. Enjoy!

With any luck, the next chapter will be up within the next couple of days, though I wouldn't quote my on that. Real life, man. It messes with everything!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Furious eyes watched the lean, scarred chest move with each ragged breath. One hand came up to scrub over his face as he took his seat in the chair beside the bed. “Damn it, little brother. Why is it always you?”

James Doyle leaned back in his chair, blinking at the ceiling for a moment before turning troubled eyes back to the still figure on the bed. Sure, he had only known of his brother for a few years now, but that didn’t make this any less nerve-wracking. In fact, the whole situation pissed him off. Who the hell thought they could get away with stabbing this particular man? Who would have ever been that stupid and overconfident?

Well, whoever they were, they better find one hell of a deep hole to hide in – the Grimms were on the hunt. Or they would be . . . as soon as Will decided to wake the hell up.

Frowning, Doyle allowed his eyes to scan over the body on the bed yet again. He’d heard the stories about Will's scars, the horrific things he’d endured in his childhood. However he had never seen them for himself until now.

The stories did not do them justice.

Will lay bare-chested on the bed, curled on his uninjured side so as to allow Vincent ready access to the injury itself. Despite the blood loss, the Colonel's temperature had risen and he had kicked away the heavy comforter more than once in his restless sleep. For the moment it lay low across his hips, allowing Doyle to see Will shivering from the slight chill in the air.

Doyle moved to ease the blankets up, employing everything he’d learned from having restless twenty month old triplets to keep from jostling his brother and waking him. Despite his caution, Will's forehead still began to furrow at the movement. He stirred, his head tossing as he adjusted to the temperature change. Shaking his head in amusement, Doyle lifted his fingers to smooth through the blond strands. “Easy, little brother. You're safe . . . you rest now. We've got the watch. Rest.”

Those familiar features smoothed at the well-known voice, trust inherent in the action as Will slipped deeper into unconsciousness once again.

A wide yawn caught Doyle by surprise, his exhaustion streaking through him as he struggled to stay awake. He’d been on a tactical mission with Bravo Unit when the call came and had rushed back home as quickly as he could. He was running on about two hours of sleep in the last seventy-two. His younger brothers, and his father, tried to hustle him to bed the second they laid eyes on him, but he’d insisted on taking his turn at Will's side.

New to the family or not, Will was just as much Doyle's brother as he was Clint’s or Aaron's.

Knowing he wouldn’t be able to fight the need floor sleep much longer, the elder brother reached out to wrap his fingers around the Colonel's wrist, fingertips resting over the steady beat of his pulse. “Wake me if you need me, Will. I'm right here with you,” he vowed. With that, he closed his heavy eyelids and let himself doze, not planning on going too far under just in case.

When the dream began, he knew it for a dream. Had he fallen asleep a moment ago . . . or a century? For once, his dream came through, clear and concise, though the scenes moved along within that odd sort of disjointed time frame common to dreams. Time might have been weird, but he had no doubt about the theme - a strange and apocalyptic future, following a nuclear holocaust one hundred years in the past.

And all of it centered around a tall young man with dark eyes, wild curls and freckles dusting across his cheeks – a man he didn’t know.
Doyle watched as the stranger moved through the dream, curious against his will. Sure, he didn’t know the kid, but . . . Something struck him as familiar about the boy; something he recognized on a bone deep level, though he would have never have been able to put it into words.

He stared in horror as the young man collapsed, blood dripping from his nose and mouth. Before he could try and force himself to move or wake up or whatever, he became aware of a soft voice calling his name. “Doyle . . . wake up,” came the whispered call, the tone weak and rasping. His instincts turned away from the dream – this particular voice held the greater priority.

Blinking himself awake, khaki green eyes met dull grey ones the same color as the steel from his dream. At the sight of them, he jolted upwards, his mind clicking from dream-self to fully awake, and lunged forward to clasp Will’s hand in relief. “Will! Thank God, you’re awake!”

“More’s the pity,” his younger brother breathed with a small, but impish smile. “Marina?”

“I can go get her,” Doyle promised, already moving to do just that. “I think she’s feeding the twins.”

“No . . . she okay?”

“Oh, yeah,” Doyle promised with a fast smile. “Kicked all the asses.” He winked. “She’s a hell of a woman, your Viper.”

Smug pride shone in Will's features as he agreed, “I know.” Yawning, he asked, “ Weird dream?”

“Yeah,” he grunted with a roll of his eyes. “Memo to me; nuclear winters suck.”

Genuine concern flashed in that pain-filled gaze. “Explain,” Will ordered, his tone as close to a demand as his weakened body could manage.

“It's just a dream, Will,” Doyle reminded his brother, earning a huff from the younger Grimm as Will settled back into the mattress once again. “How do you feel? Do I need to go and get Vincent?”

“I'm all right,” he insisted, before asking, “Sit rep?”

“All quiet on the Grimm front so far,” Doyle said. He knew keeping information from his brother would only get him more riled up. That would put a target on his own ass and he had no intention of becoming the focus of an irate Viper or Healer. “Jason's looking into the agents who attacked here; Owen's already taken care of the bodies. Sam's home; he's downstairs, helping distract Somonik and Rene.”

“Clint?” Will asked, a fierce frown on his face. Despite the archer’s stubborn independence, Clint was their youngest, and the Colonel worried about him – he always would. Rumlow was ruthless, fearless, STRIKE . . . and in New Mexico.

“He's on his way here, with Bucky and Darcy. Fury reassigned someone to security at Pegasus for the time being. Coulson’s at HQ, trying to figure out why this happened, and Maria is with your girl.” An amused smile turned up the corners of Doyle’s mouth and he lowered his voice to a conspiratorial whisper. “Apparently the Left Hand of God can be scared. I keep checking over my shoulder, just in case she’s plotting to get rid of those who know.”

Will chuckled, his body jolting in pain as he tried to suppress the action. A groan escaped him as he squeezed his eyes closed. “Please don’t make me laugh,” he begged.

“Sorry kid.” Doyle’s lips compressed as he reached out to pull the covers back up from where Will had pushed them. “You gotta leave the covers on. You’re shivering.”
“It's too hot,” he whined, sounding very much like a sick child.

“I know it feels that way, little brother, but your body isn't agreeing with you right now.” Doyle rested his hand on Will's forehead as affection surged through him. Maybe he’d only known his brothers for a few years, but it looked like he would still get the chance to play big brother once in a while. “Leave them on, okay?”

A small pout quirked the Colonel's lips for a moment before he nodded with a soft sigh. Taking a second to adjust to the warmth, he asked, “What about Grant?”

“He's here. He's in Sam's room, sleeping. I think Vincent may have dosed him with something; he's been out for awhile.”

Will drew a long breath in through his nose as he considered that. “I wonder if Garrett came to the handler’s pool for him. Jason was on the phone with Vika for a while, but I didn't hear what happened before I passed out.”

Khaki colored eyes narrowed as he watched his little brother pant, eyes at half-mast as he tried to control his pain. Using his hands on his knees, he pushed himself to his feet, with the announcement, “I'm getting Vincent.”

One hand flailed out, latching around Doyle's wrist as the younger man protested, “No! I'm fine, just talk to me.”

Twisting his wrist, Doyle wrapped his fingers around his brother's own wrist and squeezed. “Will, you're in pain. Vincent can help with that.”

“I need to know what happened.” Stubbornness flared in the Colonel's eyes as he argued, “I need to know if my family's okay. That will always outweigh my own discomfort.”

The two men, near mirror images of one another, locked eyes for a long while . . . both trying to change the other's mind. They could have been gridlocked forever but for a quiet knock on the door and Sam's voice calling, “Uncle Doyle? There's someone here to see you.”

Rolling his eyes with a sigh, Doyle poked his finger into his brother's forehead gently and announced, “This is not over.” He turned back to the door, twisting his body to keep himself from pulling free of the hold Will still had on his wrist. “Send them up, Sammy,” the oldest of Hansel’s sons called out.

“Are you sure?! I mean . . . it's a social worker,” Sam replied, his uncertainty clear in his voice. “I can stay with Dad . . .”

“It's all right Sammichka,” Will called with a soft wince, “I'm awake. Go ahead and send them up. And if you could find your mother . . .”

Sam's tone brimmed with joy as he replied, “Yeah, I can do that. Be right back!” Both brothers chuckled to hear his whooping cry as he bolted from the door. “Ma! Dad's awake!”

Will’s grin was tired but worried as he looked up at his brother. “Social worker?”

“You got me . . . and I got nothing.”

Nodding slowly, Will shoved the covers away, glaring at his brother as though daring him to protest before settling more comfortably onto his side. He lay there for a moment, before reaching for the covers. Doyle rolled his eyes, reaching with his free hand to help pull up the comforter. “You are so damn stubborn.”

Will's head shook, shoving at Doyle's hands. “Not the comforter, just the sheet.”

Doyle cocked an eyebrow, but said nothing, just doing as he was told. He separated the lightweight sheet from the collection of fabric near Will’s waist and drew it up to hide the scars from view. “Better?”

The younger man managed a single nod before another soft knock rang against the door. “Misha?”

Doyle watched Will light up at the sound of his partner’s voice, all but beaming as she poked her head into the room. “Marina . . .” he breathed, hand reaching out for her.

“All Mishka,” she murmured, coming to take his hand, a warm fierce kiss pressed to the knuckles. “How are you feeling?”

“Better,” he promised, turning his hand to cup her cheek. “Much better now.”

“Good.” Marina reached into a drawer in the bedside table and pulled out an emergency t-shirt. “Sam is bringing up the social worker and I know you don’t want to meet her laying down.”

“Let me help,” Doyle offered.

Between the two of them, they managed to get Will into the t-shirt and seated against the headboard, cushioned by all of the pillows on the bed. Marina sat beside him, letting him curl his arm around her waist. She eyed her brother-in-law. “Anything we need to know?”

“I am as clueless as you are, Marina, honest.”

“Well, that's comforting,” she sighed.

A brisk knock on the door preceded Sam Grimm peeking into the room. “Everyone decent?”

Knowing Will's dislike of his scars, Marina checked once more to be sure they were hidden from view before replying, “Come on in, Sammy.”

Sam bolted through the door, his attention focused on the bed. Will smiled up at his son as the young man picked up his father’s free hand. “I’m all right, Sammy,” Will assured him, giving a firm squeeze of his hand.

“You're a rotten liar, Dad,” the blond refuted, voice caught between amused and choked. The harsh clearing of a throat prompted Sam to roll his eyes even as he gestured to the woman behind him. “Everyone, this is Miss Evelyn Post, from Philadelphia's Child Protective Services.”

“Philadelphia!!” Alarm lit Marina’s voice as she turned to look at the woman.

All eyes focused on the small, squirming child Miss Post held by the wrist. An unruly mop of dark curls sat atop the boy’s head, hanging over his forehead and into wounded dark brown eyes ringed by long dark eyelashes. His tiny body appeared waifish and frail, but that proved to be misleading. He all but yanked Miss Post off her feet each time he tugged against her grip.

“Bozhe moi!” Marina breathed, hot chocolate eyes flashing wide.

Will frowned and leaned forward, wincing as he pulled on his stitches. “May I ask what business you have with my brother, Miss Post?”
“I’m looking for Mr. James Doyle,” the woman insisted, her nose lifted just enough to indicate her low opinion of her current surroundings. “I was told by his wife he could be found at this address. My business is with him alone.”

“I’m Doyle,” the man in question snorted as he stood up. “And in this family, no one’s business is theirs alone. How can I help you?”

She dragged the child forward, earning an enraged squeak from Marina though the Russian said nothing as the social worker announced, “This is your son, Mr. Doyle, Bellamy Blake.”

Three good seconds of silence passed during which Doyle forgot to breathe. “Excuse me?” he finally managed to ask in disbelief.

“I did not stutter,” the woman sniped as the shorter woman somehow managed to look down her nose at him.

The little boy struggled that much more, as her fingers tightened around his wrist, his free hand coming up to shove at her hand. “Get off! You’re hurting me!” he cried in protest, face scrunched up unhappily.

That proved to be the last straw, galvanizing Marina into action. She slipped away from Will and darted for the boy. Two fingertips pinched down on a pressure point at the woman's wrist and the child was free. Marina swung him up and away in the next heartbeat. “You poor thing!” she soothed, cuddling the little boy as she ran gentle fingers through his hair. “You just stay right here with Auntie Rina . . . we'll protect you from that mean old suka, won't we?”

The child stared up at her in clear surprise for a second or two before burrowing into her. Miss Post reached out as if to take Bellamy back. Not her smartest move. Marina’s glare cut like diamond through glass as she hissed at the woman. “You touch this child again, I'll break your hand.”

Miss Post backed off.

The woman might be stupid, but she’s not suicidal. That errant thought somehow managed to make it through Doyle’s shocked brain. Words proved too much for him just this moment though as he continued to gape at her. Yeah, he’d gotten used to meeting new family members out of the blue in the past few years, but . . . a son?

Marina continued to cuddle the child as she returned to sit down beside her partner. Will reached out to touch the little boy’s hand. “Allo, kroshka.”

The boy sniffled, a tiny frown on his face as he protested, “I'm Bellamy.”

“Da, I know. Kroshka means kiddo . . . or baby.”

Marina snickered as she explained, “I'm Russian sweetie, and your Uncle has been speaking Russian since he was a baby.” Pausing, she considered the boy before suggesting, “What about kolokol instead? It means ‘bell’.”

He perked up a little bit, cheering, “That’s my name!”

“Yes it is, love,” Marina laughed, suddenly seeing the child under the ageless, too responsible eyes. “So . . . do you like it?”

He turned serious for a moment, before asking, “If you give me a nickname, does that mean you’re gonna keep me?”
The Russian's heart squeezed tightly at the question, prompting her eldest son to rush to her rescue. "Ma doesn't give nicknames to people she doesn't intend to love forever. Her nicknames have magic powers," Sam promised, gifting the words with all the gravity of a magician.

Bellamy lit up, breathing out an excited, "Really?! What kind of magic?"

"The very best kind... the kind that means you're loved and wanted. They mean you're always going to have a home with her."

The puckish features went curious as his head cocked in question. "Do you have a nickname?"

Sam grinned as he nodded, "I do."

"What is it?"

"Sammichka. It means I'm her son... and she loves me. Kolokol means you're family... and she loves you too."

The conversation was enough to jar Doyle from his shock. Turning to face Miss Post, he asked firmly, "Where do I sign?"

The woman looked aghast, demanding, "Excuse me?"

He smirked, "That's why you're here right? To leave him with me?"

She stammered, clearly caught off guard by the question. Will frowned at her alarm, his tone sarcastic as he inquired, "That IS why you came, right?"

"Truthfully no," she confessed sheepishly. "Most father's choose not to take in their byblows, especially married ones. They sign away their rights and the children are placed in foster care."

Marina looked horrified by the very suggestion. Doyle’s jaw tightened at the rude term and hissed, "Miss Post, I'm only gonna say this once. You ever refer to my child in that manner again, I'm going to let my sister-in-law rip your spine from your body. I hope we understand each other."

"Is that a threat, Mr Doyle?" she demanded, tone prissy and sanctimonious.

"First of all, it's Sergeant Doyle. Second of all, no... that's a promise. Get out."

She gaped at him, before protesting in a shrill voice, "I can't just leave him here! There's paperwork to be filed and... this isn't the way we do things! This isn't proper!"

Will spoke up, "Sammy, find my phone. Call Lawrence... tell him the Colonel needs the usual custody paperwork and to put a rush on it. I want it here within the hour, if at all possible."

Sam grinned, blue eyes sparkling as he promised, "I'm on it Dad."

Doyle chuckled as he teased the Power Couple, "I never thought the day would come when I would be grateful you have an adoption attorney on speed dial."

Marina's eyes were fixed on the woman as she held Bellamy just that much tighter. "Miss Post, you need to get out of my house. If you can't leave until the appropriate paperwork is in hand, fine... you can wait on the porch."

Looking down at the child, she announced, "I have some freshly baked, chocolate chunk cookies in the pantry. How about a cookie and a glass of milk, hm? Does that sound like something you might be interested in?"

Those dark eyes wide with wonder as he breathed, “A whole cookie? All to myself?”

“Oh honey, you can have as many cookies as you want. I promise. Come with me, kolokol, let's get thee fed and let the rest of the adults work out the details.” All but flouncing to the door, Marina called over her shoulder, “Doyle, honey, please call your wife.”

“Yes ma'am,” he agreed with a grin, heading shaking in amusement as he watched her go. Turning back to the woman once the two were out of sight, he asked, “What happened to his mother?”

“She passed . . . heroin overdose.”

“How long ago?” Will asked, arms coming up to fold over his chest as he scowled.

“What does that matter?” she asked, genuinely confused by the question.

One hand lifted to pinch the bridge of his nose as he groaned. “You cannot possibly be that obtuse. Was she buried? Has there been any kind of service for her? Anything at all to signify her passing?”

“Of course not. No family to claim her body, no life insurance policy and no money. She was buried by the city almost three weeks ago.”

Will grimaced as he threw back the covers, hauling his legs around and causing both Sam and Doyle to lunge, already protesting. “Dad! What the hell?!?” the younger Grimm demanded.

“Sam . . . I am getting up with or without your help. Now are you going to help me or not?”

Groaning, Sam moved to brace his father as he swore a blue streak under how breath. “Ma is gonna kill us for this.”

“You let me worry about Marina. Doyle, call Scarlett and get your family here. Then someone, for the love of Thor, find my fucking phone!” Will ordered, free arm wrapping around his body to press against his wound. “Kitchen please . . . now. Miss Post, I believe my lover banished you to the porch, so if you would be so kind.”

Twenty minutes later, the ink was drying on the paperwork and Miss Post had been sent immediately on her way. Will was on his phone, arranging for Malaya Blake to be exhumed and a proper burial arranged in the family's plot outside the city. Marina and Sam were fussing at Bellamy and Will both, while Vincent cursed stubborn Colonels as well as all of his antecedents.

And Doyle was standing on the porch alone, waiting for his wife and three children to arrive.

Their little SUV pulled up in front of the house, Scarlett’s features warm and understanding as her husband joined her next to the car. “Scar . . . I'm sorry.”

She smiled, going up on tiptoe to indulge them both in a long, sweet kiss. “Doyle, you thought I was dead. And I heard all about your yearlong drunk from Flynn. It's okay. We'll handle this, same as we handle everything else crazy in our lives.”

“But this is a child . . .” he reminded her, earning a wink as Scarlett agreed, “Your child. And that's all that could ever matter to me.” Linking her fingers with him, she squeezed them tightly before insisting. “Come on. Let's get the kiddos out of their carseats and then, I'd really like to meet him.”
“You're amazing.”

“And don't you dare forget it!” she sassed with a laugh, before the two focused on their triplets and corralling the three into the house.

“Be careful with Uncle Will!” Scarlett called, as the twenty month olds dashed at breakneck speeds towards the kitchen.

“Oh Scar!” the Colonel protested with a soft laugh, “I'm not delicate. I can handle some rough love from my favorite nieces and nephew. Come here, kiddos, give me hugs.”

Kelley, Doyle's solemn child, stepped into his uncle's arms, hugging carefully before turning to stare at the newcomer to his aunt’s table. Nike and Kyrene, however, had no such concerns; the two girls bolted into him like a heat seeking missile. “Are you okay, Unca Will? Mommy said you was hurt,” Nike lisped, her dark eyes wide and luminous.

“I'm all right, little Victory,” he promised, though everyone could clearly see the strained white lines of pain between his brows and across his forehead. “And how's my Kyrie?”

“Who's he, Unca Will?” the little girl asked in lieu of an answer.

Smiling, Will looked up at his brother and replied, “Why don't you ask your father?”

Doyle moved to kneel next to Bellamy's chair. “Hey Bellamy . . . I'm so sorry about your mother.”

The kid shrugged as he played with his cookie, turning it into crumbs. “It's all right. She's in heaven now, with Octavia.”

“Octavia?” Scarlett asked, settling her children into seats and dishing up a cookie and milk for each.

“My sister. She was in mommy's tummy, but she came out wrong. The nurse said she was stillborn,” Bellamy explained with a frown. “Are you really my daddy?”

Doyle nodded, reaching out to touch his shoulder gently. “I am so sorry kiddo. I had no idea you existed.”

“Why not?”

“About ten years ago, I lost someone I loved very much. And I made a lot of bad decisions while I was grieving. I met your mom and she was kind to me. But then I got deployed and I never heard from her again. I would have been there if I knew, I promise.”

Reaching back for Scarlett's hand, Doyle pulled her forward. “This is my wife, Scarlett.”

“Hello Bellamy. I'm very happy to meet you,” the scientist promised, a genuine smile on her face as she watched the little boy blush a little bit. “These are our triplets . . . your brother, Kelley and your sisters, Nike and Kyrene.”

“Sisters?” he asked curiously, head tilting as he watched them watch him. “I'm a big brother?”

“Oh yeah. And these three? They can get up to all kinds of mischief so they need an awesome big brother. Whew! Am I glad you came when you did!” Doyle insisted, wiping his forehead of imaginary sweat.

Bellamy giggled a little before turning serious once more. “So I can stay?”
“Yes, Bellamy, you can stay. And we hope you want to stay... forever, if you'll have us.”

A long silence filled the kitchen, before the oldest of Doyle's children inquired solemnly. “Will there be more cookies?”

“As often as you’d like, kolokol,” Marina protested from the wall by her partner.

“And I can keep my nickname?”

“Yours forever,” Will chuckled, amused by the child’s priorities.

Nodding, he looked back to his father once more. “Is it okay if I want to stay?”

Pulling his son into his arms for the first time, Doyle held him close and vowed, “It's more than okay, Bell... it's perfect.”

Chapter End Notes

So we're gonna be trying to chop up Grimm Truth into more readable sections. Not yet, but soon, so keep an eye out for the New Sections, yeah? I promise, this fic is a LONG ways from over.
Hey guys!! I'm glad everyone is still enjoying this fic!! Here's a chapter that addresses some things that haven't been forgotten, but needed to be put off for a bit, within verse. Hansel is a good brother; it's my only excuse.

Enjoy and please do comment. Thank you to all who commented on the last chapter!! They truly do make my day!!
Marina was bouncing with Valya in her arms, patting her back lightly as she waited for the baby's burp. Maria and Hansel sat a little ways away, Maria's eyes glued to her best friend. The AD would never admit it ever, but the news of an attack in Marina's own home had scared the everloving shit out of her.

Steve stood with Gretel in the doorway to the living room. Both had heard the knock at the door, content to see Sam check his gun before moving to answer it. The German huntress turned under Steve's arm, forehead coming to rest on his chest. "Who could do something like this? I do not understand," she breathed in horror, clearly seeking reassurance. "There were children here."

Steve frowned, fingers tracing gentle figure eights between the blades of her shoulders. "HYDRA has never been known for their gentle nature. The children would have been an acceptable sacrifice, if they had succeeded in taking out Will and Marina."

The stream of vehement words coming from his girlfriend then was in German . . . but Steve didn't need the translation to know the gist of it. Tightening his arm around her, he pressed a warm kiss to her forehead, before resting his chin against her temple. "He's gonna be okay."

"I hope so . . . for Marina and Hansel's sake, I truly do pray that is the case."

For a long moment, there was no other sound than Marina's tender murmur and Valya’s quiet babbling. The baby’s twin sister, Katenka, lay on her back on a blanket at her grandfather’s feet, their infant aunt Minna waving a block in the air beside her. The burp, when it happened, earned a blink and a scattered smile from the Russian. Bending to rub noses with her baby girl, Marina teased, "Oh my, that was a good one, my little piglet. Yes it was."

Steve smiled to see mother and daughter giggling at each other, before all motion froze at the sound of Sam's joyous shout from upstairs. "Ma! Dad's awake!"

Relief swept across Marina’s features like a wave across sand. She moved quickly, pressing Valya into Gretel's arms as she passed. The huntress didn't even hesitate, accepting the child capably. The assassin smiled, asking, "Look after her while I see to her father please?" even as she was dashing away.

Gretel didn't even notice Marina's departure, captivated by little Valya. Her knees bounced lightly, causing the baby to coo and giggle at her Great-Aunt. "Of course.

Steve’s eyes softened, watching Gretel pamper Valya with tickles and kisses. "You’re a natural with her," he murmured, a fond smile on his face as he reached to twirl one of Valya's tiny curls around his fingertip.

"Unfortunately it was not just children we saved from die Hexen. They would also take the babes, though not as often, thank goodness. We learned to soothe the little ones. However, changing them would always fall upon Hansel . . . I refused. Do hyu remember the first time, Brother?" Gretel asked with a mischievous smile. "Hyu should have seen him, Maria. Not even a witch had ever caused such a look of horror!"

"Hyu were not the one changing the child!" Hansel protested. "Hyu were hiding behind the witch’s corpse!"

"I was not! I was using it to block the stench! Believe it or not, the witch smelled better!" She looked back down at the baby cooing, "Not hyu, Valya, hyu smell lovely . . . of love and lavender soap.”
“Just wait, Gretel. One day I will have hyu watch my Minnow and hyu will have no choice but to change her.”

“You think so, do hyu? We will see,” she laughed with a teasing grin then looked to Steve and found his soft gaze still upon her. She couldn’t seem to prevent the blush that crept into her cheeks. It wasn’t a stretch to say that no man had ever looked at her in such a way. It was true that she had turned a few heads in her time but they were usually filled with lust. She was never like the other women; she wore pants . . . spoke up for herself and for her brother . . . carried a crossbow and knew how to utilize it.

She had come to realize quickly that she would never find a man who would love her for herself. But then the cursed sleep came and brought her here, to a place in time she was still trying to understand but which felt more like home to her than where she had once been. A place where she could be herself and be welcomed and . . .

She smiled shyly back at Steve.

. . . And, quite possibly, loved.

“But I suppose,” Hansel teased, interrupting her thoughts, “That Steven would have a hard time saying no to hyu, should hyu try and pass the task off onto him.”

Gretel scowled at her brother, her eyes promising a swift comeuppance.

“I wouldn’t mind,” Steve offered. “I may have been an only child but I was pretty much adopted into Bucky’s family. It was to be expected that I learned to help in changing the young ones’ diapers.”

Gretel giggled a little. “There is a sight I would have to see for myself in order to believe. Captain America . . . changing a baby’s nappy.”

He grinned at her, teasing, “I have many talents, you know. I’m also killer at geometry.”

“There’s an understatement,” Maria snorted with a roll of her eyes.

The sound of heavier footsteps than normal on the stairs drew their attention and everyone turned to see Marina come down the stairs, a diminutive little boy perched easily on her hip. “I believe I speak for all of us when I utilize Darcy’s favorite phrase, and ask, ‘Sweet Thor’s tits’, Marishka, what did you do?” the AD demanded in alarm.

“Maria . . . Hansel . . . meet Bellamy Blake . . . Doyle’s son and another grandson to add to the brood,” the Russian explained with a fond smile. “Kolokol, these are your grandparents, your father’s father and his wife, Maria.” Turning a warm smile on her best friend, she insisted, “I promised cookies, so we’re heading towards the kitchen.”

“Cookies!?” Maria asked in mock horror. “Surely not my ooey gooey chocolatey chunky cookies?! Good gracious . . . Marina never shares those!” A warm smile slipped across her lips as she teased, “She must like you.”

The little boy beamed as he cheered, “And she gave me a nickname too!”

“I heard! Did she tell you what it means?”

“Bell!” he announced gleefully, a wide grin on his lips as he bounced in place. “That’s me!”

“Well then . . . I think this calls for a dozen cookies, What do you think?” Turning to Marina, the brunette winked, “Whatcha doin’ standing around for, Marishka . . . to the kitchen!”

Marina was rolling her eyes hard as Bellamy slithered down her frame like a monkey, reaching out to take his new grandmother’s hand. Scooping up Katinka and Minna, the Russian trooped along after the two.

Seeing no reason to remain where they had been left, Gretel reached out with her free hand and took Steve’s, following along behind them. They had barely made it in the door before the woman was plucking Valya free and situating her in her high chair. Steve chuckled a little at the shocked look on Gretel’s face, before wrapping an arm around her shoulders and holding her close.

As Marina busied herself with the familiar task of tending to the children, the remaining four loitered in the entryway to the kitchen. “I have so much catching up to do. I woke to the fact that my brother had a whole new family, with sons grown and grandchildren. And here I have not even begun.”

Hansel and Maria stilled, the smiles dropping from their faces. It was only moments later that Gretel realized something was wrong. “What?” the huntress demanded, seeing the change in her brother. “What did I say?”

She watched Hansel have a silent conversation with his wife before turning back to her. “I must speak with you Gret . . . outside,” he said guiding her to the back door.

“What?” Steve asked with a frown, clearly wanting to follow.

“Let them talk, Steve,” she heard Maria say as the huntress followed her brother into the backyard.

The door slamming closed behind them cut off anything else her sister-in-law might have said. The sound caused dread to clutch at Gretel’s gut as she turned to face Hansel. He was shifting his weight anxiously, hands fluttering as he struggled to figure out what to do with them. All too soon, her dread was a brick of fear threatening to strangle her. “Johannes Kuhn . . . you’re scaring me.”

Blanched and bloodless features twisted in dismay as he read the truth in her face. “Gret . . . Sister . . . What hyu said is not entirely accurate.”

She watched her brother fidget, fingers twisting together as he tried to find the best way to explain. “Hansel, what is it?”

“I did not know how to talk to hyu about this before. As hyu have said, hyu awoke to so many new things in this world. I know the feeling. When I woke, everything was so different . . . difficult to comprehend at times. I learned of my sons the same day, but that was the only way for it to happen. They would have been impossible to explain any other way.”

“Hansel, hyu know I prefer hyu to be straightforward with me. Please tell me what is bothering hyu.”

Hansel’s eyes were resigned as he replied, “I am not the only one to wake with a child in this world.”

Rage unlike anything Gretel had ever known boiled from her as she glared at her brother. “Why . . . how could hyu not tell me?!” she demanded, the betrayal she felt clear in her voice. “Do hyu mean like hyur sons? Daughters made with science to look like me?”

“No. You have a son.” Hansel paused before adding, “He was not made with science.”

“I do not understand. Then how . . .”

Hansel’s jaw tightened in fury, tone a rumbling growl as he hissed, “HYDRA took advantage of hyur slumber.” He looked into her eyes. “They took advantage of hyu.”

‘Took advantage’ . . . Gretel’s gut clenched and she took an involuntary step back as her arms wrapped around herself.

Gretel knew she had been moved, washed, changed, but this . . . How could she not know this had happened? She felt as if her own body had lied to her. She became aware of every inch of her body, how it moved with each breath she took. A feeling of helplessness swept over her, the likes of which she hadn’t felt since the confrontation with Sheriff Berringer and she reacted as she always did; with unsuppressed fury. “Hyu lie!”

Hansel said nothing, allowing her fists to slam into him angrily. “Hyu lie!” she repeated, her tone starting to choke with tears. A keening wail built up within her, tears flowing down her cheeks in torrents.

Finally, she collapsed into her brother’s embrace, overcome by her anger and her hurt. Hansel said nothing, only holding her closer to him. “I am so sorry, Gretel.”

“How could someone do something Like that?”

“HYDRA is responsible for many wrongs in this world. Thus why my sons are so determined to thwart them at every turn,” Hansel insisted chin resting against her temple. “They will pay, Gretel, I swear it. Those responsible for this will pay with their lives.”

She shuddered in his arms, trying to force her tumultuous emotions back under control. It was only as she was pulling away the thought occurred to her. “Wait . . . if I have a son, where is he? Why have I not met him yet?”

Hansel watched his sister, pure heartbreak in his eyes. After a long silence, she demanded, “Hansel . . . where is my son?”

Another moment of silence rang through the area before Hansel replied gently, “We don’t know. As far as we know . . . he may be dead.” Squeezing her shoulder at her horrified gasp, he promised, “We are looking for him, Adler and I, and we will find him. It is just taking longer than either of us had hoped. If he still lives, he is well hidden. If he is dead . . .” he paused at the tortured, strangled sound from his sister. Taking a deep breath, he pressed on, “If he is dead, we will not rest until we find his bones. I swear it . . . on the lives of my grandchildren, I swear.”

Digging in his pocket for his wallet, he pulled a folded page from a hidden pocket. “This is the only photo I have of him. I am sorry that I cannot offer hyu more than this. I know it is not enough, to heal what harmed hyu.”

Gretel clutched the page between trembling fingers. “Do hyu believe he lives?”

“If he has inherited even a small trace of hyur stubbornness, he lives . . . and more importantly, he thrives.” Squeezing her shoulder in soft affection, he vowed once again, “We will find him, Sis, I promise.”

It was just about then that Jason leaned out through the sliding glass doors. “Hey Dad . . . I hate to interrupt, but you need to hear this.”

“Ja, Schalki. I am coming.” Turning to his sister, he murmured, “Shall I send Steven out to join hyu? Or do hyu wish to be alone?”

Gretel’s fingers tightened before she whispered, “I want to be alone.”
“Are you sure?”

“Ja, I believe I shall go for a walk. I promise, I will not go far.”

“Of course. Come and find me when you are ready,” he begged, before letting his hand fall and watching her walk away. A deep breath heralded his distress before he turned to his middle child. “What has happened?”

“We have a problem,” he replied, leading the way back into the kitchen.

Hansel grinned to see Will standing next the table, one hand braced to keep himself upright. Sam and Rene were carrying an armchair into the kitchen with Marina trailing behind carrying a million pillows.

“Adler, I feel as though you are going to be in considerable trouble when our Healer finds you out of bed,” Hansel teased, coming forward to slip his arm around his son’s waist.

“Quite possibly. But there is a lot of work to do,” the Colonel replied, leaning against his father as the elder man assisted him to the chair. Once he was settled, he smiled up at his partner as she offered him their daughters. Between the two of them, they were able to get the twins situated in Will’s embrace, before Marina took a seat on the armrest.

Bellamy’s giggles could be heard in the living room, the little boy clearly a big hit with his new siblings. Doyle and Scarlett stood together near the door, one eye on their children, and the rest on the going-ons in the kitchen.

Aaron sat in a chair at the table, with Marta seated on it and her feet in his lap. His fingers traced lazy designs on the skin of her ankle. Brian and Natasha leaned side by side against the wall behind them. Casey was slouched in the corner of the cabinets, a fierce expression on her face as she watched her fiance pace back and forth.

Steve and Maria stood together, Minna in the woman's arms as they watched Hansel approach his wife. “Where's Gretel?” the captain demanded, clearly concerned about his girlfriend.

“My sister needed a moment to herself. She went for a walk . . . she promised not to go far and she would be back soon.”

“What's wrong?” Steve asked, looking past Hansel toward the back yard, “Is she okay?”

Hansel shook his head slowly as he replied, “No . . . she is not. I told her about her son. It is a shock and she needs time to adjust.”

Steve looked dumbfounded at the news but said nothing.

There was a long moment of silence as the members of the family aware of the situation digested that, before the Family Russian cleared her throat and drew the attention of the room. “So all we're missing is Clint, Bucky and Darcy,” Marina announced, an anxious look on her features as she nibbled on her thumbnail.

A voice boomed from the doorway, “Who said we were missing!? Clearly you have been misinformed, big sister.”

Marina whirled, a look of immense relief on her face, to see the trio come into her kitchen. “Dorogoy, Slava Bogu!!” she cried, lunging at him and throwing her arms around his neck.

Clint’s arms closed tightly around her waist, lifting her clear off her feet and leaving her dangling nearly a foot off the ground. The two clutched each other hard, each of them relieved to have the other close. Darcy smiled and moved to stand with Casey, even as Bucky waited impatiently for his own turn with the handler.

There was relief in the archer’s features, hidden quickly as he buried his face into the curve of her throat. His voice was choked as he confessed, “Damn it, sestra. I was really worried about you. Are you okay?”

Kissing his cheek, she promised, “I'm fine. Your brother, too . . . assuming he'll behave himself, of course.” Releasing him, she transferred her embrace to Bucky, the Winter Soldier’s arms hard bands across the small of her back. Freed, Clint moved to kneel beside his brother's chair, grey eyes scanning over his hero’s face before his arms slipped around Will carefully, Clint’s face buried in his stomach. The analyst smiled, fingers petting through the younger man’s hair, tone reassuring as he insisted, “I'll be alright. It's okay.”

“You could have died, Will.”

“I know. And I'm going to be sidelined while I heal, but at the end of the day, I'm going to be fine. Vincent does excellent work; he's taking good care of Marina and me.”

Jason cleared his throat then. “Guys . . . if I could have everyone's attention? Phil brought something to my attention, and I have a feeling we're gonna want to look into it immediately.”

Will frowned, tone concerned as he asked, “What is it, Jay?”

“Phil found a report at HR.”

“A report? What kind of report?” Bucky asked, arms tightening around his former protege as they both hovered between Will & Clint and Darcy.

“Apparently someone filed a report, in which they claimed to overhear a threat against Chief Analyst Brandt and Senior Handler, Agent Petrovka.”

“How very convenient,” the Colonel drawled with a roll of steel grey eyes. “When was this report filed?”

“Timestamp says a week ago, but I checked . . . the file didn't exist until about four hours ago.”

“Sounds like HYDRA is covering their tracks. Did it happen to name the conspirators in question?”

“Five names matched the identification we pulled off the goons from today. One is unaccounted for.”

“Who?”

“Alberto Ramirez . . . he's STRIKE Team Echo. Coulson had him called in but he was a no show. Phil wants to know if we want to go and look into it for him.”

“Ramirez? That can't be right,” Clint protested with a frown. “Ramirez is pretty much the nicest guy in STRIKE.”

Will grunted, “All the more reason to check him, and this report, out.”

His brothers looked horrified at the suggestion, Jason insisting hotly, “You're not going, Will!”

“Of course not . . . I can barely move. I can however, request a contingent to stay at the house. The last thing I want is to leave Marina and the children vulnerable.”
Sam spoke up from the doorjamb. “I'm staying.”

The blond’s announcement earned a firm nod from Owen. “Me too. The Boss is down and the Boss-Lady is out. I'm not going any further from the house than the sound of a shout.”

Vincent agreed as he insisted, “I'll stay too.”

“All right then. The rest of you; be safe . . . and good hunting.”
Tragic Break

Chapter Summary

Gretel is pissed . . . and she has every right to be.

Chapter Notes

Enjoy this!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes
The Grimm Truth

proudly hosted on photobucket
Chapter 242: Tragic Break

Margaret Huberta Kuhn couldn't decide if she felt horrified by what had happened to her . . . or mortified that no one had told her. Which, of course, segued into the question of who all had known.

Clearly Hansel had known, which meant Maria must have as well. Considering the devotion between her brother and his wife, it was unfathomable to her them not sharing in this secret. Maria’s inclusion in the secret caused a further frown, as Gretel could not reconcile herself with the idea that her sister-in-law would not have told her best friend. And considering Marina Petrovka’s total devotion to her lover, Will Grimm certainly knew as well.

Even if they were the only four, they were still four people who had said nothing about her son . . . or his conception. Four people who should have told her. As she continued to walk, she felt her rage begin to build until it was an all-encompassing thing.

Veering sharply into the wooded area behind Will and Marina's home, she broke into a run. With any luck, she could find Edward . . . he was always good for listening, even if he didn't say much in reply. She bolted through the trees - through the veritable forest her nephew had had erected solely for Edward's safety - and her rage grew exponentially.

Her troll had received more consideration than she had. A clear enough indication of how der Oberst felt about her. Of course, she couldn't forget Marina; her father had been right all those years ago . . . one should never trust a Russian. Back-stabbing, duplicitous, no-good, cowardly, Schweinchen.

A low booming grunt cut off her thoughts and had her almost stumbling to an unexpected stop. There was Edward, off to her right a few yards, sitting on a boulder. Gretel blinked. She would have had to be blind not to notice him there, and yet she hadn’t. Her focus went inward again. The rage was still there but it was simmering instead of overflowing. She huffed a laugh, one grunt and her troll had cut off her spiraling thoughts.

Edward tilted his head inquisitively at her and she tried to give him a reassuring smile as she walked over to join him. “Hello Edward. How are you, my old friend?” she asked, the sound of her native German welcome to her ears. “Do you have enough to eat?”

He rumbled at her, the sound almost like a purr as he moved to bump her shoulder fondly. Rocking on her heels, she gave him as brave a smile as she could manage. “I'm okay. I have enough to eat.”

The look on his face could only be described as concerned, as he bumped into her again. Knowing he didn't believe her, she sighed and attempted to explain her melancholy. “Much has changed while I slept . . . even more than I realized. I have a son.”

As though the words were a sledgehammer, the dam on her tears broke and she dissolved against the troll’s massive bicep. “Oh Edward . . . I have a son,” she sobbed, one hand coming up to smother the sound.

The huge arm came around her shoulders, the troll's ageless voice rumbling through her skin as he soothed, “Calm. Be all right.”

“They've known, Edward . . . Hansel & Maria and Will & Marina. They all knew, and who knows for how long!! And none of them bothered to tell me . . . not until today.” Her jaw tightened. Five months. She had been awake for five months and Hansel had . . . what, forgotten? Only remembering by happenstance? Because of something she said? No . . . it did not make sense.
They had spent so many years together just the two of them. Never trusting anyone else. Protecting each other not only from witches but from the rest of the world. Despite her tough facade, she wasn't emotionless; there had been plenty of tears throughout their years together. Just the two of them in the woods . . . until tears couldn't be held back. But never in all their years had he caused tears of any kind, much less of betrayal.

Her anger simmered once again, forcing her tears to dry and her jaw to tighten up once again. “Hansel would have never kept this from me, except for them.” Not the Hansel she had known . . . not her brother.

Edward's mouth drew downwards as Gretel straightened, rage glimmering brightly in her eyes. He grunted at her, reaching out to prod at her shoulders. Shrugging him off, she whirled towards the house. “They're going to be honest with me, whether they like it or not.”

Edward's soft voice was all but lost as she bolted away, rage clenching her fists tightly at her sides. The run invigorated her, left her feeling powerful and well-equipped to handle the upcoming confrontation. Eyes fixed ahead of her, she broke from the treeline and into the family's backyard.

Slamming through the backdoor, she froze at the tableau before her. At first look, the house appeared to be empty, save for the four she had come to see . . . and the children. It took very little time for her to realize that was not the case, and grudgingly appreciate the devotion the members of their extended family had for Will and Marina.

The crash of the door against the wall had Marina on her feet and guns in hand in a heartbeat. Not even a second later, Sam Grimm and Vincent Keller flanked her, their own guns up while Owen Elliott materialized out of the shadows behind a seated Will like the ghost he was. Those mercurial eyes watched his aunt for a moment, before he murmured, “Marishka . . . samaya malen’kaya, it’s only Gretel. Put the gun away.” Shifting his eyes to his twin daughters, both of whom still slept in his arms, he spoke again, “Sammichka, if you could find Rene and Samonik for me? Have them come and get the girls?”

Ice blue eyes flickered to his mother's own hot chocolate ones, a frown on his face at the small nod she gave him. Stashing his weapon he nodded solemnly. “Yeah Dad . . . I'll be right back.”

“Thank you, Sammy.” Turning to his own father, he insisted, “You may want to let them take Minnow too.”

Gretel's voice was harsh as she demanded, “Protecting the child from me?! I am her aunt.”

Will’s eyes were the colorless silver of fish scales in light, his features stone as he agreed, “Yes . . . and considering the look on your face, she should probably not be privy to the conversation anymore than my own girls.”

Huffing at her nephew's ever rational nature, Gretel rounded on her brother, demanding, “Where is everyone?

“They have gone . . . to track down a lead on Adler’s attacker.” She watched as tumblers clicked over in her brother's head. After a moment, Hansel frowned at the fury coating her features. Head cocking, he narrowed his eyes at her even as he inquired carefully, “Are hyu all right, sister?”

She could feel the way her jaw firmed angrily and the hard line of her mouth as her lips compressed tightly. The Family Russian frowned in what appeared to be genuine concern, her voice gentle as she asked, “Gretel, is everything okay?”
Whatever vitriol Gretel wanted to spit at the woman, was interrupted by the reappearance of the two teenagers. Rene froze for all of a second at the tension in the room. Then he came forward and crouched at his father's chair, hand gripping the man's knee. “You okay, Dad?”

“I'm fine, Rene. But if you and Samonik could take the twins and Minna upstairs please?” the Colonel asked, eyes still fixed on Gretel's slowly reddening features. “Quickly, Rene. And once they're in the nursery, if you would stay with them? Door closed, if you please?”

Nodding slowly, Rene glanced back at his foster brother briefly before agreeing for the both of them. “Sure thing, Dad.” The teenager crouched to take the twins from his father, the two men infinitely careful with the babies as they transferred custody. Unsure but still obedient, Sam Winchester moved to accept Minna from Maria, tucking the seven month old against his chest nervously.

Marina moved to kiss both boys on the cheek, hands correcting the taller boy’s hold unconsciously. “Thank you loves. We’ll come up to get you for dinner, da?”

The two teenagers exchanged a worried look between them, before nodding as they chimed together, “Okay . . .”

Shooing them away, Marina moved to touch Will’s shoulder. “Is anyone hungry? I could put together something for lunch, if anyone would like me to.”

Will’s tone was calm and gentle as he reached out a hand for her. “Marishka, my love, come sit with me. I believe Gretel has something she would like to address with those of us still here.”

Gretel’s jaw tightened at his level tone, her own voice sneering as she replied, “I have recent concerns about your ability to lead this family, Nephew. At least with honest, integrity and honor.”

The Colonel’s eyebrow cocked upwards as he asked, “And what lies have I told you, that you find so offensive?”

“How about what you have determined my brother was not to tell me?”

Marina frowned fiercely, though whatever she’d been about to say was interrupted by Hansel himself. “Gretel . . . this is not their fault. They gave no such instructions.”

“Then why did you not tell me?! I have been awake for months now and I am only just discovering I have a son now! Why is that, but that they have changed you . . . whether you realize that or not.”

Rounding on her sister-in-law, she hissed, “And you! You are supposed to be my sister!”

Teal eyes wide in alarmed concerned, Maria shook her head. Her distrustful nature was a known entity in the family. Even now, she counted very few among the family as her true friends, though she was working to change that. “I am sorry, Gretel; Marina’s the only sister I have. I’m still getting to know you.”

The German woman held in her flinch by pure strength of will, and in her head she acknowledged what the woman said. She had no sisters . . . not even this woman who’s tenacity she had admired since meeting her for the first time. Her brother moved forward, clearly seeing how she had taken that statement, insisting, “Gretel, that is not what Maria meant. Her occupation is such that she gives her trust rarely. Just because she does not count you as her sister now, does not mean she will not eventually. You must be patient, and let her learn to trust you first.”

Her chin lifted as she forced herself to go cold, removing herself from this newest hurt. “You do not need to gentle the blow, Brother, I understood her perfectly. They do not know me. There is no basis for their loyalty or their courtesy.”
Hansel’s eyes narrowed as he snorted derisively. “Gretel, clearly hyu have not been paying attention. Or hyur anger has rendered hyu blind. This family does not have to know hyu, to offer you the same courtesy and loyalty they give each other. Furthermore, their loyalty is finite; once given, it is never retracted.”

Watching her brother she frowned. That was true, as far as she had seen to date, which only served to anger her further. “Their loyalty should have garnered their honesty as well, and yet no one sought to tell me anything about my son... or how he was conceived.”

Marina’s eyes went wide at that, her hands coming to press over her mouth. “Bozhe moi... Gretel, I completely forgot! I am so sorry!”

“Hyu forgot? How could hyu forget something like that?” she demanded, eyes blazing as she stared at the Russian woman. “Hyu Russians are all the same! Hyu care for no one but hyurselves! My father was right! Never trust a Russian, except to stab hyu in the back.”

Marina stepped forward, anguish and shame on her face. “Oh Gretel, honest. I would have told you, or insisted you be told. I know how that feels... to have your body treated as something of use and not as something of value.”

Gretel’s rage boiled over at that point. “Hyu know nothing! Hyu could never know how I feel! How dirty and disgusting I feel!”

At the minute flinch from his adoptive daughter - and knowing the truth of Marina’s history his sister did not - Hansel stepped forward instantly. Braving her anger, he put himself between the two woman and reached to grab his sister’s shoulders. “Gretel, this is not Marina’s fault. I should have told hyu. Just as I should have protected hyu... should have kept hyu safe. I failed in that.” Forcing her to look up at him, he vowed, “I did not mean to keep this from hyu for so long. I just... I did not know how to tell hyu. There were already so many things for hyu to learn, so many things this world would force hyu to come to terms with.” Sheepish and shamefaced, he sighed heavily, “I did not mean for it to go unsaid for so long. I am sorry... I had only the best of intentions.”

“Good intentions...” she snarled, giving a short and brittle laugh as she shook herself free. “... because that turned out so well for us before. Our parents had good intentions... and we were nearly eaten by a WITCH!” Glaring around the room, she hissed, “Hyu could have told me, yes. Whether any of hyu would have is debatable.”

Will’s jaw tightened, his temper starting to boil behind his eyes. “Leave Marina alone. She forgot... she was not being malicious or cruel in not telling you.”

“You did not either. What is hyur excuse!”?

His chin lifted slightly as he looked up at his irate aunt, his eyes swirling pools of verdant green. “We found out five years ago, shortly before we ever met Doyle. Since then, there has been the Prototypes, and the IMF, and getting pregnant, and dealing with Ross in Harlem. Steve’s waking - and yours - nearly loosing her in labor. Then the stress and strain of raising twins, while still performing our duties to the best of our abilities. It is not her fault she forgot... though I assure you, now that remembers she won’t stop until she has avenged you and someone is dead.” Jaw tightening, he continued, “And the last thing you ever would have wanted was for me to tell you. You think the way you found out was bad? I would have been a million times worse. I have no tact... coming from me, it would have been a disaster.”

“I see... so instead I must have preferred for months to pass before being told at all.” Seeing the shadows in her nephew’s eyes, the secrets scattered across his mind, she screamed, “I have the right to know! He is my son! And I demand the truth!"

There was a long moment of perfect stillness, before at last Will nodded briskly. Hands tightening on the arms of his chair, he pushed himself slowly to his feet. Vincent lunged to stop the action and was waved aside insistently. Noticeably, Marina said nothing, her teeth making deep indents in the skin of her bottom lip, as she fought to keep silent about her own protestations. Once he was on his feet, standing as tall and as straight as ever, he spoke, “You want the truth. I can promise you, you won’t like it. But, you demanded it so here it is.”

Taking a deep breath, he held it for a moment, before announcing to the room, “The truth is this. In all actuality, your son - my COUSIN - is still alive and breathing. And even more likely, he’s an agent of HYDRA . . . and one day, I will have to kill him.” His irises were pinpricks of black within the well of murky silver eyes. Frowning at her, he asked sincerely, “Is that the truth you wanted?”

She stared at him, eyes wide. Then the sound of skin against skin rang through the room, Will’s head tossing to the side as Gretel slapped him with all the force she had in her body. Vincent’s eyes went golden, as he roared at her, grabbing her by the wrist and all but throwing her away from his patient. “What the hell!?” he demanded, body coiled with protective fury.

She ignored the healer completely, her focus on the tossed aside head of the Colonel. “My son is not HYDRA,” she hissed, glaring at her nephew as he straightened once again, a bright red blotch on his cheek where she’d struck him.

“I hope not,” he replied, tone as level and calm as ever. “But I have to face reality. And that is the reality of the matter. I’m doing the best I can to find him . . . but he’s either been kept completely off the books or he does not wish to be found at all.”

Marina’s eyes were fixed on her lover. She stepped forward as she watched him sway slightly, his hand coming out to brace himself on the edge of the table. “Misha?”

His eyes slipped closed, even as he spoke, “I don’t feel so good.”

And then, the entire room watched, as Will Grimm’s eyes rolled back into his head and his body crumpled to the floor in a faint. His lover’s voice rang through the room as she screamed, “MISHA!”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(G) der Oberst - the Colonel
(G) Schweinchen - pigs
Enjoy!! Let me know what you think. Your comments mean the world to me.

Also I have decided to accept my title of Queen of Cliffhangers. Muahaha! Mine is an Evil Laugh!! XD

Translations at the end as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 243: Rolling with the Punches

Maria Hill-Kuhn felt her husband’s hand clench down hard on her own. Teal eyes wide, she looked up to see Hansel watching his son - his steady, stalwart and untouchable son - collapse to the ground in a dead faint. Her sister-in-law back stepped in shock, making way for a panicked Marina, Sam, Owen and Vincent. All four were rushing to prevent Will's head from hitting the floor, Vincent moving just that split second faster and cradling the Colonel’s head in the crook of his elbow as he lowered the man to the floor.

Shucking off his flannel shirt, the doctor ordered firmly, “Sam, my bag . . . go.”
The blond didn’t even protest, up and scrambling away in a heartbeat. The AD felt her heart contract hard as Marina reached with trembling hands to touch her lover’s face, begging in a whimper, “Misha?” Even her voice shook, a clear indication of her fear.

“Marishka, I need to turn him . . . can you and Owen help me?”

Cornflower blue eyes were approving as the question forced Marina to take stock and push away her fears. She scrubbed the backs of her fingers against her cheeks as she nodded firmly. “Da. What do I do?”

“Keep his neck steady. Owen, you've got his shoulders and I'll get his legs & hips. Let's keep his spine in line as much as we can. On my count . . .”

Sensing her husband’s rising anxiety, Maria reached with her free hand to touch his face. Distracted from the scene on the floor by the touch, she smiled kindly as he looked down at her, puzzlement thickening his accent, “Spatzi?”

Going up on tiptoes to kiss the corner of his jaw, she urged him, “I promise; I'll keep an eye on Will . . . and Marina. But you need to get your sister away from here. Once she’s not freaking out, Marishka is going to be on a warpath.”

Nodding in resolute agreement, he replied, “I will take her upstairs. She can pound on Adler’s bag for a bit, hm?”

“Good plan. I'll let you know when Vincent's finished his examination. Go . . . take care of your sister,” she insisted, tilting up her face for his customary kiss.

Kissing her warmly, he stroked his fingers over the curvature of her face before focusing on his sister. “Komm mit mir, Gretel . . . komm.”

Gretel went along at her brother's urging but her eyes remained fixated on her unconscious nephew. Only when the siblings were gone did Maria focus back on the immediate circumstances. She jumped a little bit when Sam Grimm blew back into the room like a hurricane, then frowned as her best friend’s son slammed to a stop just inside the door. Vincent looked up, with a frown, “Sam, dude, I need my bag.”

“Vincent . . . look at the pillows,” he argued, tone strangled and worried.

The healer frowned, before twisting to do as told. There, where Will had been leaning, were bloody smears only now turning rusty from oxidation. Even Maria felt alarm, her hands flying to cover her mouth at the rush of concern for her friend . . . and sometime adversary. Whirling back, the man barked, “Roll him . . . now. On my count . . . three . . . two . . . go . . .”

Once the Colonel was settled into recovery, Vincent moved to take in the huge, bloody stain across the t-shirt. Swearing a blue streak under his breath, Vincent lifted his shirt out of his way, then peeled away the sodden bandages. “He tore the stitches. Damn him for being a stubborn idiot.”

Marina’s hands were visibly shaking where they cradled her lover’s throat, panicked hot chocolate eyes glittering with terror as she whimpered, “Don't leave me . . . Misha, please . . .”

Shifting her hands, her fingertips pressed to his pulse briefly. Gasping, she bowed her body forward as though to protect him. A moment later, her hands lifted to cup Will’s cheeks as she vowed, “I have the watch, Mishka . . . we'll be alright . . . rest.”

Vincent and Sam worked together in silent tandem, both of their focus on stemming the blood loss.
“Marina . . . I need you to strip your bed. Use towels . . . old sheets; anything you don't care if he bleeds on . . .”

Marina’s tone was firm as she replied, “He can bleed on everything in this damned house, as long as he lives to kiss me every morning.”

“We're gonna make sure of that much, Marishka, I promise.” Vincent vowed, with a frown.

Owen grinned, elbow stretching out to nudge her fondly. “Boss is gonna outlive us all, Boss-Lady.”

“He had better or I'll kill him myself.” she grumbled, her tone worried and fond despite her words.

Vincent smirked despite himself, shaking his head at the fierceness of the woman before him. “That's our girl.” Turning to look at Sam, he continued, “Take your mom upstairs. Owen and I are right behind you. Let's get him into his own bed.”

The former soldier nodded, moving to take his mother's shoulders between his palms tenderly. “Come on, Ma. Let's go get the room ready.”

Nodding, Marina bent to kiss her lover again before standing with her son's assistance. Moving quickly, Maria reached to touch her best friend's shoulder, halting her in her tracks. “You okay? Is there anything I can do?”

The Russian smiled at the taller woman, moving to hug her fiercely. “As soon as I know Misha is okay, I'll be just fine. As for the rest . . . I would suspect your husband needs you more than I do right now.”

“You're my best friend, Marina, he'd understand,” the AD protested sincerely, arms tightening around her slightly.

One side of her mouth quirked up in a laughing smile as the handler insisted, “I know, but you're his wife. Don't worry; I'm gonna need all the stupid action movies and cheesy romances you can manage to take my mind off of Will's injury soon enough.”

“You got it,” Maria laughed softly, squeezing her once more before letting Sam lead his mother away.

Bracing herself she headed upstairs. She didn't envy Hansel's position in the slightest. Maria could understand how and why Gretel was feeling betrayed, seeing as Hansel was her brother and the only one she’d ever been able to rely on. However, that meant Hansel was already feeling immeasurably guilty about keeping this secret from his sister. Gretel would give him hell and he would allow it, believing it no less than he deserved.

Her husband was too self-sacrificing by half. She had once wondered where Will got that trait from. Since her marriage, she no longer questioned it. Hansel was almost worse than the Colonel.

Climbing the stairs to the attic Maria was surprised by how quiet it was. The door was ajar and she could just make out Hansel's aggrieved sigh before the familiar sound of a punching bag being attacked began. “Gretel, please . . . listen to me. This world . . . it does not work this way. Not anymore.”

There was no response, just the continual pounding on the bag. “I will return Gretel. Please, do not leave.”

Pausing at the door, Maria waited patiently for her husband to appear in the doorway to the attic. His footsteps sounded heavy on the stairs, the beloved face careworn and sad as he appeared in the doorframe. Visibly startled by the sight of his wife, he inquired, “Späti? What is it? How is mein Adler? Is he alright?”

Maria could feel her dismay transform her face as she shook her head. “Vincent is doing the best he can. We must be patient, at least until we know more.” Glancing towards the door, the AD frowned at the sounds of Gretel’s rage being pounded out on Will’s well-used bag. “How is she?”

“Angry. Very angry,” he sighed, hands coming up to scrub at his face. “I cannot fault her for it. However, I do wish she would listen to me. She has not lost him, though she will not believe me.”

“Lost him? I’m confused . . . lost who?” she asked, even as she insinuated herself into her husband’s embrace.

“Hyu must understand. Things have changed . . . in our time, such a thing would have ruined her. She would have been deemed unfit for a wholesome match, a tainted spinster for the rest of her life.” Eyebrows rising in alarm, Maria’s tone was incredulous as she echoed, “Ruined?! Hans, you can’t seriously be suggesting that she believes Rogers is going to leave her because of this!?”

“It is the reality she knows best. We know differently, but . . . Steven must return home. She has great need of his reassurance.”

“Hansel, you know how Rogers feels about HYDRA. This assignment . . . it’s personal for him. He feels as though he must avenge those whom HYDRA has mistreated and abused; Gretel, Barnes, her son . . .”

“Ja, I know this. But my sister . . . she needs him. And the longer it takes for him to arrive, the harder it will be for him to rebuild what she is trying to break.”

Jaw tightening, Maria frowned. “Alright then . . . let’s call the boys.”

Meanwhile, Jason was staring at the barracks housing Ramirez’s quarters. “It’s awful quiet, all things considered, Krechet,” Aaron murmured into his comm, strengthening Jason’s concern over the situation. “This feels wrong.”

Clint chimed in then. “I’m telling you. Ramirez is the nicest guy in STRIKE.”

Brian’s reply was stone cold and final as he insisted, “And people aren’t always what they appear to be, Yastreb. Sometimes, their private persona is vastly different than the one they sport in public.”

“Just because you are paranoid and suspicious as a rule, Skopa, doesn’t mean everyone else is,” his redhaired goddess teased through the comms.

Brian smirked, unable to help it, even as he grumped over the comm. “That doesn’t mean I’m wrong, Vdova.”

Jason crouched in the mud, hands dangling lazily from his wrists as he watched the building cautiously. “Shut up. I wanna know what Ramirez knows. If he’s being framed, I wanna know that too. Be smart and keep your eyes open. We go in on my call.”

Anticipation filled the silence over the comms, but no one expected the voice that spoke next. “Jay, this is Maria. Do you copy? Over?”

Jason blinked as his step-mother’s voice broke across them. “Maria? What's wrong?”
“We need Rogers back at the house, pronto.”

Steve frowned from where he crouched opposite Clint, next to Bucky. “Why?”

“It's Gretel. She and Will had an . . . altercation. She needs your support right now.”

“Altercation!?” was the immediate question from the entire family, tones wavering from shocked to furious.

Steve's voice was a dull roar as he demanded, “What kind of altercation?”

A heavy sigh broke across the wavelength, before Maria replied sadly. “Will told her the truth, about her son, which wasn't the truth she wanted to hear. She slapped him.”

“Slapped him!?” Aaron and Clint asked simultaneously, both of their tones smoldering.

“Good on her,” Brian announced, earning an incredulous, “WHAT!?” from his baby brothers.

“Will nearly died, Bri! She shouldn't be slapping him . . . he's not even supposed to be out of bed!”

“She might not have if he was still in bed.”

Maria scoffed, snort clear through the receiver. “Because the Colonel is so good at taking care of himself, when his brothers need him or they could be in danger. Right.”

“Exactly. And knowing Will, it probably could have been handled better. What did he say?”

“The truth. That her son is probably alive, he's more than likely HYDRA, and one day, if that's the case, your cousin is going to die at his hand.” Sighing heavily, she continued, “In his own defense, he did warn her she wasn't going to like what he had to say. But she insisted.”

Jason groaned, even as he continued, “And you know Will's relationship with tact, Bri. This is on Aunt Gretel, as much as on Will. Neither of them is blameless.”

“Yeah, I'll give you that, but telling a mother he was going to kill her child? He’s lucky she didn’t at least break his nose . . . I would have.”

Maria chuckled. “Surprisingly, she was more irritated about his insinuation that her son was HYDRA, than the part where Will would have to kill him. Again . . . truths she didn't want to hear but wouldn't let him keep to himself.”

“Everybody, stop choosing sides . . . Are they okay?” Aaron asked, genuinely worried about both his aunt and his brother.

“Gretel is beating the hell out of Will's punching bag in the attic. Will . . . he's unconscious. Vincent is doing everything he can, I promise,” Maria vowed solemnly.

“She hit him that hard!”?

“Yes and no. He ruptured his stitches, internally and externally, getting out of bed to help Doyle get custody of Bellamy. He didn't say anything. As a result, he fainted from the blood loss.”

“Damn it, Will,” Jason groaned, seconds before Brian sighed, “Marina’s going to kill him.”

“She has already promised as much.” Maria snarked, before her tone went soft and fond as she continued, “But again . . . Will's life will never be as important to him as the health, happiness and well-being of his family. Doyle is his brother and Bellamy is his nephew; there was no question in his mind where he needed to be. And we all know that.”

Bucky and Clint both echoed together, “Who is Bellamy?”

“That’s right, you two missed the pissed off social worker Marina banished to the front porch today. Apparently Doyle has a son.”

“Knew that. His name's Kelley . . . which reminds me. Who gives a boy, a girl's name?”

“You're one to talk, Clinton Francis,” Jason teased with a snicker.

“Shut it, Jay!”

Maria's tone was brisk as she continued, “Bellamy is eight years old. By all reports, Doyle was on an epic bender for a while after Scarlett’s alleged death. Bellamy was the result. His mother has passed . . . Doyle is the only biological parent left.”

“Damn. Poor kid,” Bucky rumbled with a sigh.

Steve glanced at his best friend, amused, before speaking up again. “So what's wrong with Gretel? Doesn't sound like Will laid a hand on her . . .”

“The Colonel is many things,” the AD stated primly, “but abusive to family is not one of them. Hansel found out why Gretel is truly so angry . . .”

Steve frowned, visibly halting himself from speaking as he waited for Maria to explain. The woman sighed sadly, before continuing her thought. “. . . she believes she's lost you, due to the circumstances in which she conceived her son.”

“Lost me? The woman is my soulmate, predetermined by God, or Fate, or what have you, to be my match. In what world would I be lost to her?” he asked, genuinely curious.

“The one into which she was born. Gretel was born into a time that was even more righteous than yours . . .” Maria retorted, the roll of her eyes all but audible as she explained.

Glancing at Bucky as he contemplated those words Steve exhaled sharply, his voice barely audible to the comms as he replied, “But I could never think differently of Gretel over something she had no say in.”

“Which is why she needs you here. She needs you to say that to her face and make her believe it,” she insisted briskly, as sharp and logical as always.

It was clear to everyone that the Captain was torn. On the one hand, his Gretel needed him. On the other, this was HYDRA, the one foe he’d never definitively beaten. Bucky sighed, nudging his friend with an elbow. “Go . . . we got this.”

“Are you sure? I don't want to leave you a man short.”

“Yeah. Besides, Aunt Badass is way more important than Ramirez. Go,” Clint insisted, with a roll of his eyes.

Aaron's tone was a growl. “There's going to be plenty of HYDRA ass for you to kick another time.”

“Alright then,” Steve nodded, gathering his gear. “Be careful.” On some level, he had known that their devotion to their older brother was unmatched. But seeing it for himself firsthand was something else altogether.

“We always are,” Brian snarked, before running towards the barracks with Natasha and his brothers trailing quickly behind.

Steve’s absence was quickly forgotten; out of sight, out of mind as it were. All that mattered was Ramirez . . . and finding out what role he’d played in their brother’s stabbing. Will wasn’t perfect, a fact they all knew, but he had always been their protector. He’d done everything he could to care for them, even when he’d been little more than a child himself. Now it was their turn to repay the favor.

Jason’s voice brooked no argument as he murmured, “We need him alive. No killing, Bri . . . not until we know.”

“I’m telling you . . . this can’t have been Ramirez,” Clint muttered stubbornly.

Bucky lifted a hand to squeeze the back of his partner’s neck. “We will be as open minded as possible. But first, we must find him.”

They arrived at Ramirez’s barracks, to the sight of the door slightly ajar. Almost instantly, the Grimms were on alert. Natasha’s voice was hard as she murmured, “That’s not good.”

“When does anything that stems from one of us getting hurt ever really end up in our favor, Nat?” Clint snarked, even as his hand gripped his bow tighter.

“Good point,” she sighed.

“We do seem to be perpetually jinxed as a family,” Jason murmured. Already he was inching slow and steady towards the door, eyes alert as he drew his sidearm.

“I’ll take jinxed over some other people’s misery. We at least have each other,” Aaron replied, gun in one hand and fingers of the other stretching out to bump open the door. “Ramirez? Alberto Ramirez? This is STRIKE Team Grimm . . . identify your location.”

Resounding silence answered the announcement earning a fierce frown from the family’s former cop. Raising his voice, Jason took over.

“Agent Ramirez, this is Captain Walsh. If you will not come out peacefully, we will come in with force. You have been warned,” Jason called, fingers tightening slightly around his gun. “You have till the count of five.”

There was a pause before Jason began using commands through sign language. “Five . . . four . . . three . . . two . . . one . . . . . . .”

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) Da/net - yes/no
(G) Spatzi - sparrow (Hansel’s nickname for his wife, Maria Hill.)
(G) Adler - Eagle (Hansel’s nickname for Will Grimm)
(G) Komm mit mir - Come with me
(R) Krechet - Merlin (Jason’s callsign for the Army and SHIELD)
(R) Yastreb - Hawk (Clint's callsign for the Army and SHIELD)
(R) Skopa - Osprey (Brian's callsign for SHIELD)
(R) Vdova - Widow. (short for Chernaya Vdova or Black Widow; callsign for Natasha Romanoff, given to her by the Krasnaya Komnata)
Chapter Notes

Steve is hella contrary. It would be wonderful if he'd just comply with my plans for him without fighting me every step of the way. Oh well; if he did, he wouldn't be our Cap, would be? XD

New chapter; short but it's the best end point for the next bit. Thank you! Enjoy all!!

A couple translations, but not many. At the end as always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Chapter 244: Tale As Old As Time

If you asked his best friend, Steven Grant Rogers was a special kind of crazy. Which was saying something, considering the asinine and crazy antics he and one James Buchanan Barnes had gotten up to in their long and storied history together. The two of them had been getting into scrapes, one following the other, since before Steve could really even remember. But none of the stupid things they’d done before came close to the stupid thing Steve was going to try and do now.

Try and reason with a pissed off German woman, who could turn him into a pretzel, if she was of a mind to. And, as a matter of fact, had towards the beginning of their relationship when he attempted to coddle her instead of going all out against her. That was a lesson he’d learned quickly and well; he had no interest in getting his ass kicked like that again.

It could be said that Steve had a type. First, there was the obvious affinity for women named Margaret. He wondered sometimes, how Peggy would react to the fact that his soulmate shared her name. He could always ask her, of course, but there was a part of him that was reluctant to tell Peggy about Gretel; if he was honest with himself, it was because the idea of those two women becoming friends was frankly terrifying and definitely more than likely.

Then there was the fact, that the women he typically fell for could beat the crap out of him with their pinky fingers. He would never forget the look on Peggy’s face as she pulled the trigger and took three direct shots at his unfinished shield. Vibranium it may be, but Steve still shuddered to think what would have happened if the shield hadn’t stood up against the assault.

In some ways Gretel was softer than Peggy had been, and in others she was harder. Both of them were women in predominantly male professions. They’d had to deal with detractors and defamers all their lives, most of them male and all of them wrong. They got down and dirty with the best of them, and neither cared much for the stupidity of social conventions.

But where Peggy was a ballbuster every moment of every day - even in her softer moments - Gretel had moments of real vulnerability. In large part, that was a direct consequence of waking up into an entirely new time, filled with so many bizarre things to try and navigate through. Steve would never tell her, but he was grateful he was there with her to help her through the worst of the roller coaster.

Of course, he had known about Gretel’s son. And though Hansel hadn’t said specifically how the child had been conceived, Steve wasn’t stupid; he’d guessed . . . and Hansel hadn’t denied. Not a detail he was going to tell a pissed off Gretel, of course, but it did give him a leg up on understanding why she was so angry. Jogging lazily through the darkening streets of the base, the Captain tried to gather his thoughts so he would be able to help her come to terms . . . and hopefully heal.

He arrived at the Grimm home, to almost dead silence. Rene and Samonik had taken the children upstairs, leaving Hansel, Maria, Will and Marina waiting for the return of both Gretel and the "hunting party". Considering the incident between Will and Gretel, the house was a lot more quiet than he would have expected.

His best bet in figuring out what happened from the point where they left until now, would probably be Hansel. If he could get the German to talk to him about it. Even now, the witch hunter was notoriously close mouthed about some things.

Pausing at the base of the stairs, he listened for a second in hopes of pinpointing locations.

“She is in the attic, Steven.”

Steve whirled, alarmed as always by Hansel’s ability to move without sound. “Someone needs to put a bell on you.”

Hansel chuckled as he agreed, “Hyu are not the first to say so. My sons . . . I am not the only sneak here, hyu see.”

“That I knew,” Steve chuckled, well remembering the first time Aaron and Clint had scared the bejesus out of him by suddenly appearing where they had not been a moment before. Sobering, he inquired, “What happened?”

“My sister is angry,” was the succinct reply. “She believes hyu will leave her . . . see her as tainted by what has been done to her.”

“What was done to her, was in no way her fault.”

“Ja, I know this as do hyu. However the time in which we were born has a different theory.”

Steve's jaw tightened. “Damn it.”

There was a sardonic twist to the German’s mouth as he agreed, “Indeed. The attic . . . hyu will find her there.”

A brisk nod was Steve's only response, as he turned to go. Pausing, he inquired, “How is Will?”

Hansel's features grayed with concern as he shook his head. “I do not know. He is very ill . . . only time will tell, I fear.”

“He's stubborn . . . he'll be alright.”

“I know that in my heart . . . my head requires a little more convincing. Go . . . my sister has need of you now.”

Nodding, Steve jogged up the stairs and into the tiny closet which hid the stairs to the attic gym. Will had allowed him the use of the bag on a couple of occasions, when the ghosts of the past had refused to be silenced and only violence would ease their fury. The dull thud thud of fists against the bag were familiar and fast; Gretel's fury had not abated as yet. He would be walking into dangerous waters if he was unable to ease her fears.

He wasn’t surprised when the creak of the door drew her attention away from the bag to him but what was a surprise was how her expression changed. The anger vanished, she looked startled and afraid, her eyes darting to different points in the room before settling back on the bag. Her face grew hard again, followed by - what he was reasonably sure was - an impressive string of German cursing, aimed at her brother and all of his descendants.

“Well then,” she said, straightening up and facing him. “We both know why you are here Steve, so say what you must and leave me be.”

He took a step into the room and closed the door. “I understand I owe you an apology.”

She blinked at him, clearly startled by his sincerity. It was not what she had expected him to say, that much was clear. Pain stabbed through him sharply, as he vowed to make it up to her. “What?”

“Apparently, I have done a terrible job of letting you know just how much you mean to me.”

“I do not . . .” here she paused, eyes narrowing as she hissed, “. . . what exactly did Hansel tell you?” she demanded.

“Only that you have a son, born while you slept. I inferred the rest myself.”

“So then you know. You understand-”

“That I have even more reason to bring HYDRA down? Yes.”

“Stop being so obtuse, Steven! You are too respectable to be with me now! I do not wish this to be drawn out.”

“Even considering the fact that I’m pretty sure the world now doesn’t care as much as you seem to think it will, I’ve never been someone to just sit back and do as I’m told,” he reminded her, with a small, sad smile.

Gretel shook her head, hands coming up to cover her face. “Hyr reputation is important to me, Steven. Why is it not important to hyu?”

“It’s not important to me, because all that is, is standing before me and completely unaware of her value.” His mouth twisted sadly as he confessed ruefully, “It’s breaking my heart.”

“Why will hyu not just leave me? Save hyurself from my taint?”

“Taint?” Steve almost growled. “You have to stop saying things like that. If anyone else even implied such a thing about you . . . I honestly don’t know what I would do to them. But if anything, that is how I would want to lose a meaningless reputation, defending the honor of the woman I love.”

“Hyr reputation tells people what kind of man hyu are, Steven. Is that really the legacy hyu want for hyurself and hyur heirs?”

“Excuse me if I am being too forward but if I have any heirs, I want you to be their mother.” He stepped forward, keeping his eyes locked with hers. “And my legacy will be to live each day worthy of your love and respect. From the moment I saw you asleep on that bed a part of me knew that nothing else would matter as much as you. And now that I know you, nothing will ever make me give you up. Least of all the whims of popular opinion, as fickle as they are.”

Her lips trembled for a moment, before she was lunging across the room and burying herself into his arms. “I was so scared.”

Steve’s arms were solid and reassuring around her as he pressed his lips into the fall of her hair. “I know. But it’s okay; I’m here. I will do everything in my power to protect you . . . even from yourself.”

She dissolved against him, frame trembling with the crash of fear and adrenaline. Her fingers clutched his shirt in a clawlike grip, her nails a soft pinprick through the cotton of his shirt. Steve murmured softly to her, stroking through her hair and over her back.

It was a long time before her tears stopped. Pressing a sweet kiss to her forehead, he asked, “Feel better?”

She nodded, easing a single step back and wiping at her eyes with her fingers. “Besides feeling like a fool, yes . . . much better. Thank hyu.”

“A beautiful fool . . . Bucky used to tell me that love makes even brilliant men idiots,” he chuckled, reaching out to help her smooth her hair from her face. Cupping her cheeks, he lifted her face to his, indulging them both in a poignant kiss.

Gretel bit down on her lip, glancing towards the door to the attic. “I have made a mess of things.”

“No one blames you for your anger. You had every right to be angry.”

“And Will? Did I have the right to harm him when he was only telling me the truth I had demanded from him?”

“That’s between you and the Colonel. I doubt he’ll hold it against you though.”
“It is not mein Neffe I am worried about.”

Steve grimaced as he recalled the glittering rage he'd been confronted with so many months before. He had only hurt Clint’s feelings, and Marina would have gleefully murdered him if not for Bucky threatening to do it for her. He could only imagine the fury she would unleash on someone who had physically harmed her lover. Squeezing his arm around her shoulders, he agreed, “It may be prudent to avoid Marina for a bit until her temper cools. Her rages are not for the faint of heart.”

“Indeed,” Gretel chuckled tearfully. Leaning into him, she toyed with one of the buttons on the front of his shirt. “Hya are a good man, Steven Rogers. I am fortunate to call hya mine.”

Bending to kiss her, he argued lightly, “No . . . I'm the lucky one. Luckiest bastard this side of the pond.”

“How generous,” she teased, nose wrinkling in amusement. “Well . . . not really. I'm afraid if I got him first, I might kill him without letting you get your own vengeance.”

“Thank you for choosing me.”

“Thank you . . . for not writing me off that first day.”

She grinned up at him, before a clatter on the stairs leading up into the attic pulled both of their attentions to the door seconds before it slammed open. Jason stood there, looking grim and solemn as he took them in. “Sorry to interrupt, but have either of you seen Dad?”

“Not since I came upstairs. Why? What happened?”

“Ramirez is dead and I'm pretty sure that, despite their best efforts, it wasn't quite as neat a suicide as HYDRA wanted it to be.” Shoving a hand back through his hair, he insisted, “You're both gonna want to come downstairs. We gotta figure out what the hell our next move will be.”

“What about the Colonel?” Steve asked as the two moved to follow Jason.

“Vincent is still stitching him back together. For the moment it's just us . . . I don't want to burden him if I don't have to. He and Marina have enough to deal with right now. I'm his Second; I can handle this for the moment, until he can take up the reins again.”

“How did the man die?”

“Single bullet to the temple . . . left a suicide note. Said he wasn't going to prison for the Grimms.”
“I’m confused about your urgency here. He's confessed. Isn't the matter now closed?” Steve asked cautiously.

“Ramirez was right handed . . . the bullet entered his left temple. Suicide note or not, he was either murdered or sacrificed. And I need to figure it which one it is . . . for Will’s sake.”

Gretel’s voice was soft as she remarked, “Hyur loyalty to hyur brother is admirable, but does he deserve it, Neffe?”

Jason froze at the question; when he turned to face her, his features were eerily calm, “My brother would cut off his own hand to protect us . . . turn himself in to Ross, if that was what it took to keep us safe. I will never do him the disservice of less. So yes, Aunt Gretel, he does deserve it . . . my loyalty and so much more.”

Rotating sharply on his heel, Jason stormed away, both of the lovers watching him go. Steve sighed, “Well then, I guess that answers that question.”

“What question?”

“Exactly how far the Grimms will go to protect the ones they love from harm.”

Chapter End Notes

Translations;

(G) Neffe - nephew
Happy New Year!! Enjoy!!
The Grimm Truth
Chapter 245: When Darkness Falls

Will's eyes felt like lead as he lay in bed, a sharp pain piercing through his side over and over again. Letting the pain carry him away, he drifted in darkness. Voices lured him back.

Marina's beloved voice was worried and trembling as she insisted, “Tell me the truth, Vincent.”

Vincent sighed, before speaking. “I don't know, Marishka. The wound . . . it's deep and serious. And he's so stubborn, especially about his own health.”

“What do I need to do?”

“I've sedated him for now . . . the best thing for him is to remain still and calm. This is the only way I know how to make that happen.” Huffing out a bitter laugh, he sighed, “Remind me to punch Ross in the face. Will’s resistance to most sedatives makes keeping him under a tricky, pharmaceutical marvel of engineering.”

“But you can do it,” she insisted, not sounding concerned about any kind of alternative.

“It'll take careful monitoring, and he'll probably never be very deeply under, but yes. I can keep him unconscious, at least until the wedding. That should give the injury enough time to start to seal itself closed.” Another heavy sigh, as he grunted, “Never thought I’d say this, but thank God for Cahill healing.”

Marina sounded resigned as she replied, “Agreed. Thank you Vincent.”

“You're welcome Marishka. Just . . . don't forget to get some rest yourself. Let the rest of us worry about this shit.”

A soft sound, a whisper of hair against her throat, and Will could see in his mind’s eyes her quiet nod and the weariness that dragged at her body. “I'm going to lay down now. I think the adrenaline is officially gone.”

“Good girl.” A quiet smack of lips against skin caused by a kiss to the forehead and Will felt affection well within him for this man who loved his Marishka so dearly. Vincent would take care of her; to say it was a relief was an understatement.

A warm body climbed into the bed next to him, the familiar scent of coconuts and hibiscus flowers wafting to his nose. Marina’s lips pressed lightly to his, as she whispered, “I'm here, Misha. Rest well; your brothers have the watch.”

Allowing her presence to ease his worry, Will let go and drifted away into the darkness again.

************

When Will’s consciousness came back to himself, it was to a sound he rarely heard. Clint was worried, and there was a solemnity to his voice that jarred Will's overprotective, older brother instincts. “He’s shivering again,” the archer announced to the room.

The answering voice was calm and gentle, clearly used to the worry already. “Vincent said that was normal, remember? It's okay if he shivers; we just need to tuck him back under the covers,” Bucky soothed, before substituting word for action.

Will hadn't realized he was shivering until his brother had said something. The warmth of the comforter being drawn over him felt nice and he relished the trapped warmth against his chilled skin. Drifting on the sensation, he nearly missed Clint’s next words. “I knew that . . . sorry, Buck.”

“It’s okay, khishchnik,” was the amused reply from the legendary assassin. “I know you're worried about him.”

A familiar grip wrapped around Will’s hand, bringing the appendage to rest against a familiar chin. “He was always this mythical creature, when I was a kid, you know? Superhuman, almost.” A heavy sigh breathed out against the skin of his knuckles. “He was my hero.”

“Clint . . . he's still your hero. Everyone sees the way you worship him,” Bucky chuckled, the sound fond and teasing.

It wasn't hard to picture the way Clint’s ears turned red as he blushed. Will could tell he was embarrassed by the rough sounding, “Shut up,” he huffed at his boyfriend.

The quiet shush shush of a hand ruffling hair earned a sheepish, “Ah Buck . . . knock it off.”

“You're love for your brother is an admirable thing, khishchnik. And he's gonna be okay.” The rustle of fabric, then Bucky's voice was much lower as he no doubt crouched beside Clint’s chair. “And do you know how I know that?”

“How?” came the meek question in reply.

“Because your brother loves you. And he will do everything in his power to stay with you and Marina and his twins and the rest of your family.” A pause signalled some action Will couldn't determine, before Bucky soothed, “He'll fight like hell to stay with us, because that's how Will shows how much he cares; he stays.”

“I know, I just . . . I'm scared. He's never looked so human before,” was the trembling response and Will's heart soared into his throat, yearning to comfort his baby brother. To offer the words that would soothe his fears. Be Clint’s big brother, the one job he knew he’d always been good at.

The small surge of adrenaline was exhausting and Will started to slip away again. The last thing he heard before he was pulled back into the lonely dark once more is, “Love you, Will. Don’t worry, okay? I've got the watch.”

****************

He was never really sure how long he drifted in the darkness, before he found himself pulled back by the sound of voices. Brian had taken a turn following Clint, silent but for the warm press of fingers to Will's pulsepoint. The elder brother had known Brian instantly; the instantly recognizable tattoo running down his forearm, skin raised and scarred from the ink. The darkness had washed him away with the beat of Brian's heart, the cadence comforting and familiar.

His father was telling him old German folk tales when he “woke” next, the words drawled lazily as the witch hunter recited them from memory. Absently, Will had wondered if these were stories his grandmother, Adrianna, had told her son . . . nearly two centuries before this one. Hansel's voice, slow and accented, had nudged him under with quiet insistence. “Rest, mein Adler. I am here with you. Ich liebe dich, mein Sohn.”

How long the darkness held him each time was unclear. However, time continued on, like the inexorable tide of a never-ending river.

**************
When next he woke, it was to the deep rumble of his eldest son’s voice, the younger man seated in the same chair inhabited by the others before him.

“Hey Dad. Vincent said you may be able to hear me, even though you're asleep. And if you can, I don't want you to worry. Ma’s all right; the bruise on her cheek has already started fading. The girls have been little angels, although they miss you; they've been looking for you, I think. You'd be really proud of Rene and Samonik; they've really stepped up to help out and keep Ma on an even keel.”

There was a soft, rueful chuckle as his son cut himself off. “Bozhe moi, some big tough agent I am. I can't even talk to my unconscious father without stalling.”

If Will could have sighed, he would have. His poor Sammy. The blond hid it well, but there were times when the old insecurities raged to the forefront of his thoughts. What the Colonel wouldn't give to rake Braddock over hot coals for the damage the General had caused his son.

Forcing himself to calm, Will settled in to wait. It might take his Sammichka a bit to spit out whatever was bothering him, but he'd get there . . . eventually.

Sam's hands were calloused and warm, as they held his father's hand between them. He rambled for a bit, unable to settle on any one topic for any extended period of time, while his fingers played absentmindedly over Will's own. It was the affection in his touch which calmed Will's concern in the end. Whatever was bothering Sam, it was not his place in their family.

Finally, the young sniper fell silent, having run out of things to say . . . reasons to stall. The chair creaked as he leaned forward to press a warm kiss to the back of Will's hand. “I hope you can hear me, Dad, because I really need your advice.”

The short hair of Sam’s eyebrows tickled the back of Will’s hand as Sam pressed his knuckles against his own forehead. “I think I made a mistake, Dad. And if you can hear me, don’t tell Ma.”

Every warning bell in Will's psyche began to clang at him, forcing his attention squarely on his son. The first press of tears trickled down between Sam’s cheeks and Will’s hand, a clear indication of the distress his son was feeling. What the Colonel wouldn't give to be able to take his son into his arms and hold him tight; to take on the burden of whatever pain Sam was struggling under and carry it for him. But, as much as he railed at the darkness of his body’s prison, he remained motionless to the outside. He could only lie still and listen as his son poured out the fears of his heart.

“I love Jules, Dad, I do. And I can't wait for our child to be born. But . . .” here he paused, motionless in word and action. “This is stupid. I'm being stupid, I know that. Jules married me; of course she loves me. Right? Isn't that what marriage means?”

A flicker of memory - an elfish young woman smiling teasingly into the face of an affectionately stern blond twice her size - shifted through his thoughts at the question. What he wouldn't give to tell his son the truth; that sometimes love came after marriage . . . that sometimes, it was the wrong kind of love for happily ever after. That marriage, like anything, was flawed and imperfect. After all, it was not just his own preference preventing a wedding between him and his beloved Russian. Marina had reasons of her own for refusing a walk down the aisle.

However, he could say none of these things. He could only listen as Sam continued. “Sometimes, I think she's expecting someone else to come through the door. And she's disappointed when it’s me.”

A soft snort filled the room as Sam snarked, “I can tell, because she suddenly gets aggressively affectionate, as though she has to prove to herself - and me - that she loves me.

“And yet, sometimes things between us are so easy, it’s like breathing . . . which is usually when I'm not saying or doing anything to “hover’.”

There was a long silence, where Sam tried to gather his thoughts. When he spoke again, there was an old familiar sadness in his voice . . . a long acquainted pain that would never truly heal. “Things with Matt were never this complicated. Not that I expected Jules to be like Matt. Obviously that's unfair to both of them; different times, places, and people.” There was the sound of a hand through hair, before Sam continued bitterly, “Maybe I lost him before things could turn out this way. Maybe it's me, maybe it's my fault. I just don't know.”

The name was familiar and it was only a second’s reflection, before Will had called its owner to mind.

Matthew Parker Benjamin, known as Matt or Ben, depending on who was talking about him. Sam and Matt had gone to school together on base, and when the General enlisted Sam, Matt was right behind him. Sam had never said, but Will was fairly certain that the friendship between the two boys had already morphed into a romantic relationship by that point. However they weren't allowed to be open about it until they were out from under Braddock’s constant watch.

That the relationship had been one of the happiest in Sam’s life was indisputable. The pictures of Matt and Sam all contained a brilliantly beaming Sam, ice blue eyes sparkling with joy at being with this man. The Matt in those pictures had looked on Sam with adoring eyes, an awed smile on his lips as though he couldn't believe his good fortune.

Combined with Sam’s soul deep devastation at Matt's loss . . . the relationship between those two had been deep and strong. Unable to help it, the Colonel often wondered how things would have been different, if Sam hadn't killed his lover . . . and Matt was still standing at Sam’s side.

Will's attention turned back to his son as he continued, “But I don't think she understands the damage my parents did; the Braddocks and whoever abandoned me on their doorstep. She doesn't understand that I trust her to take care of herself, but I need to protect her too. It’s all or nothing sometimes . . . most times.”

Sam sniffled hard, mucus and tears sucked back into their place as he tried to pull away from his own fears. “I know it's stupid, Dad, I do. We’re having a child together.” Another pause before he breathed out fervently, “I love her. I have since the second I saw her. And that love has just grown as I've gotten to know her better. But . . . I don't know. I just feel like she's already slipping away. And no matter how tightly I try to hold on, the easier it is for her to wiggle free.”

There was a wealth of pain in his voice as he begged, “I don't know what to do, Dad. Do I let her go? Or do I try to hold on? I wish I knew . . .” he stammered off on a sob, before whispering painfully, “More than that, I wish you could tell me.”

The IV pump chose that moment to hiss another dose of the sedative and Will railed against it as it flooded through him. He could feel his awareness trickling away and he fought it, wanting to stay with his son. To be with him, even if he couldn't offer the comfort Sam wanted just then.

The pull of the dark was too strong however and Will slipped away once more. Just before he gave up the fight, however, he heard, "Love you, Daddy.”

**************

There was a glow of affection at the timid voice as Will regained awareness once again. This child was a challenge and a pistol and a charging bull, but Will loved him fiercely. Marina liked to tease him that Rene was definitely his child, an accusation that filled the Colonel with pride.

Enjolras Rene Conrad was eleven years old when they first adopted him. Sullen and angry at the world, he’d blossomed quickly under Marina’s maternal adoration and Will’s instilled discipline. He’d taken a keen interest in the families and soldiers under Will’s authority. Even going so far as to insist on visiting the injured and the newly widowed at his father’s side.

The Colonel would do a lot to spare his son further pain. But he could already see the passion in Rene’s eyes . . . the fire to change the world. With any luck, the teen would find a partner with whom to battle against the world. Someone who would protect him from himself, if it was warranted. Whether that person would manage to keep up . . . Will was trying not to push for miracles.

The bed dipped as Rene slipped onto the mattress next to him, curling into the open space beside him. A soft humming filled the air, the song one Will recognized as a favorite of Marina’s. The tune was quiet and soothing, welcoming the darkness in once more. “Love you Papa . . . sleep well,” his baby boy murmured.

Moments later, the Colonel was whisked away into the depths of darkness once more.

****************

He knew already that he wouldn't be able to stay aware for long. But that was Grant’s voice and the extent of Will's curiosity was legendary. He was definitely fond of the kid, but he hadn't expected him to take up vigil at his bedside either.

“I won't stay long, sir. I just . . . Sam said he thought you could hear him and I . . .” Ward huffed at himself, clearly irritated with his own thoughts. “There are things you should know . . . about me . . . about the kind of man I am. But I don't know if I could ever have the courage to tell you while you were awake.”

He paused, the rapid sound of his breathing a clear indication of his agitation. “I'm not a good person, sir. Garrett made sure of that, all those years I was his loyal puppet. I never asked questions; I just went where I was pointed and did as I was told.

“No one will tell me how you got hurt, or who did it. But I bet I know why. You scare him, you and Marina both do. Because there's no compromise to either of you; there's no shades of grey to the truth with you. And that worries him . . . the thought that you could change me, change the loyalties I've always held, into a life you could be proud of.

“I've never been jealous of anyone before. I've felt hatred, anger, rage. I've allowed the darkness within me to perform acts that haunt me still. And until you and Marina showed me a different way to live, I had never regretted the choice I made.” His voice grew muffled as though he was speaking into his hands, as he continued, “But I am so jealous of Sam and Rene. I would give anything to be your son; to have had a father who loved me, the way you love your sons.”

Mentally, Will frowned as he listened to the specialist. This almost felt like a confession, except there was nothing Will felt Grant needed to atone for. But clearly the young man was weighted down by some dark burden, some sin he held close for fear of rejection. Making a mental note to talk to Marina, he allowed the wave of darkness to crest over him, dragging him away on an undertow of drugs once more.

Grant's vow followed him under. “I will make you proud, sir. I promise.”
Aaron’s turn at his bedside brought Will back slowly. The second youngest Grimm was pulling the covers up and straight, checking Will’s temperature and even replacing the old bandage on the wound. The actions were hardly surprising, however; Kenny had always been the worrier. He fussed after his brothers - and now Marta - whenever they were hurt or sick like a mama bird with her hatchlings. Now, as it had then, fondness welled within the Colonel’s heart.

In this, Kenny - and now Aaron - took after Marina more than anyone.

Clint was always Marina's favorite, a bullet child rushing headlong into every trouble he could find. Kenny had been quieter and gentler, a charming child with a smile like sunshine. Marina had worshipped the child and indulged him more than any of the others . . . even Clint.

One of Will’s clearest memories from just after the escape was Kenny crawling into Will's borrowed bed and snuggling close. The four year old hadn't asked for any comfort or anything at all, in fact. He simply curled against his big brother’s back, closed his eyes, and let the sound of Will’s heartbeat lull him to sleep.

Kenny was Will’s favorite, and the eldest Grimm was not ashamed to admit that he had spoiled Kenny as much as their meager finances would allow. If Kenny wanted it, Will would find a way to make it his. Not that he ever asked for much; he contented himself with being close to those he loved and rarely asked for more.

Losing Kenny had ripped a hole in the Colonel, and even getting Aaron back hadn't completely repaired the damage. Aaron was not Kenny, though it was not quite the definitive separation Aaron believed. However, there was a lot of Kenny buried within the former Outcome operative. The kindness and compassion that made up so much of Kenny’s personality was in Aaron still, even if it wasn't quite as apparent as it had once been.

Content to know he was in good hands, Will let himself drift back into the well of darkness. Aaron’s voice was rough comfort as it floated along beside him. “Ya lyublyu tebya, pravitel.”

“Hyu are so much like hyur father,” was the rough insistence when next Will rose to awareness. “He too is terrible at taking care of himself.”

There was a large part of him that wanted to roll his eyes. That was of no surprise to him. Everyone had mentioned at least once how much Hansel's formerly eldest son took after him. It amused Marina to no end, even as it made her crazy. There was a brutal satisfaction in it, though; despite all of Ross’ attempts, Will was his father’s child and NOT Ross’ Perfect Soldier.

Despite the roughness of his aunt’s voice, Will could detect no trace of the anger it had held before he’d lost consciousness. Which meant he’d either been out of it for longer than he’d expected or Gretel had worked off her anger in some other way. Absently, he wondered how many new dents he’d find in his attic punching bag.

“I wish I understood hyu better . . . the reasons for the choices you make . . . why the name Ross is so terrible to hyu and hyur brothers.” There was the quiet sound of friction as skin rubbed briskly over skin; she’d scrubbed her face with her hands. “There is so much about this world I do not understand.”

Amusement flooded him and he would have snickered if he could. Even he didn't completely understand the world, and he'd been living it in for longer than she had. Lady Luck and her lover, Lord Misery, were fickle creatures and they upended the world frequently. Especially within the sphere of espionage and assassination.

Correction; especially within the sphere of the Grimm family’s life in general, Will mused. Nothing ever seemed to run smoothly for his family for any extended period of time. As much as they may want normal lives, it always seemed just out of their grasp.

Gretel huffed as she continued grudgingly, “I will not apologize for the reasons I slapped hyu . . . I will apologize for causing hyu more harm while hyu were already wounded. Just so hyu know.” The soft sound of hair against skin heralded a shake of her head, “Hyu have no tact, Neffe. Hyu would do well to learn some.”

Now Will really wished he was awake for this conversation. He’d tried to warn her; could he truly be blamed for his particular brand of honesty? She’d demanded an answer he hadn't wanted to give. What else could he have done, but tell her the truth she demanded but did not want?

Marina had been scolding him for his lack since the time he told his first teacher that his teeth were yellow and he smelled like an ashtray. He was 13. His relationship with tact had not improved in the following years. He tried, but - as his beloved Russian was so fond of saying - he was very much a student from the school of blunt force trauma to the face. Be it physically, verbally or, very rarely, emotionally.

Maybe it was just the way he’d been built, or maybe this was how he’d always been intended to be. Either way, Will was a leopard and leopards could never change their spots no matter how much they may try.

Gretel sighed heavily, before speaking once again, “Steven trusts hyu. I guess, for now, that is good enough for me.” A gentle kiss pressed to his forehead, before she insisted, “Rest well. Much has happened while hyu have slept. Hyu will need hyur strength.”

************

Will didn’t remember drifting away, but when he woke, it was to a rough, familiar hand holding his. Relief and comfort soared at that touch, knowing instantly its owner.

“I don’t think I ever knew you were such a lazy slug, Boss-man. I mean, don’t you think you’ve been sleeping long enough?” Owen asked, tone rough with affection and worry.

Will had a dozen comebacks instantly on his lips, furious at the prison that refused to allow their use. The loss of their age old bickering and bantering, no matter how temporary, left Will feeling weaker than he’d felt after being stabbed. The practice had given him strength in his darkest moments and he wished for its bracing effect more than anything.

Forcing himself to be patient, he made note of all the cracks Owen made so as to retaliate later. Thanks to his enforced slumber, he would have plenty of time to come up with the best insults. A comfort that followed him into the darkness as he slipped away again.

************

He had known who his next visitor would be long before he ever heard his voice. Not by process of elimination, or even a really good guess. More because, if there was anyone who needed his big brother in the middle of their family’s current crisis, it was Jason.

Tools clicked and clacked against each other in cargo pockets and Will wanted to laugh at the small squeak emanating from one of his shoes. Ten to one, the absent minded tech still had a hole in the sole of his left boot. Will had been on him to replace them for at least six months. However, Jason rarely listened about anything so mundane for longer than five minutes before some new invention captured his attention.

A heavy thud sounded as the former detective dropped into the chair next to the bed. Amused, Will settled in to wait; Jason was agitated and it wouldn't be long before he exploded with it. “How do you do it?!” the tech specialist suddenly demanded, sounding frazzled and worried. “Fuck, Will, this is hard! Running our family, managing the crisis . . . you always make it look so easy!”

Warmth flooded through Will, pride and affection filling him from tip to toe. He had always known that the middle brother would come out the best of all of them. Independent and stubborn, his loyalty was a thing of legend even outside the confines of their family.

Jason had never been the one to believe in himself unflinchingly. But Will had always known that Jay would step up when called upon and do what needed to be done. Hence why he had never worried about leaving for the Army at 17; Jason was only 12, but Will had trusted him to take care of Marina and his little brothers. That trust had grown rapidly, as Jason had proven himself worthy of it.

When Barney had done what he'd done and left, Jason had stepped into the role of Second without flinching. And while the elder brother knew in his gut that the role made Jason nervous, he'd never truly flinched from the responsibility. Will had told him all the time after they'd left Hoover, that “courage was not the absence of fear but instead being scared and doing it anyway.” Jason was terrified, but doing his best job anyway; Will was so proud of him it was nearly a living thing unto itself.

Jason’s hands closed around Will's own, and the Colonel focused on forcing something to show his brother he could hear him. A slight twitch of his fingers was all he could manage, prompting a sob of relief from the younger man. “I need you to wake up, Will. I'm not built for this and I'm scared I'm fucking it all up.”

Another twitch and Jason took a deep breath to steady himself. “I don’t know all of the details, but Alberto Ramirez is dead.”

The name triggered a flash of information and Will would have staggered if he'd been awake and on his feet. Everything in Ramirez’s file flashed through Will's brain like intel downloading onto a computer. Including the audio clips from various missions, confirming the man’s identity . . . and Ramirez’s hand on the knife that had stabbed him. Which then forced Will to ask; if they had gotten the loyalties wrong of someone like Ramirez, known as the nicest guy in STRIKE, who else’s loyalties were in question?

Jason sighed heavily, hands clutching tightly around his brother’s. “I want you to get better fast, Will, because I can't do this job long term. You are always going to be better at it than me.”

Will wasn’t as sure about that as Jason. But before he could up with someway to argue while he was still unconscious, the darkness dragged him away again. Jason's voice followed him under, insisting, “Miss you, big brother . . . and I love you.”

****************

When next Will came aware, it was a relief to finally see something besides the darkness. Marina sat on the bed beside him, watching him wake with a smile on her lips. “Welcome back,” she teased, bending to kiss him sweetly.
He indulged himself in a long kiss with his beloved Russian, before touching her cheek with his fingers. “We have work to do.”

She shook her head, amused by his declaration. “Don't we always?”
Chapter Notes

Hold on to your shoes. We have another cameo coming up!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Blasts From The Chapter 246: Blast from the Past

Jason could see it already. Will had had enough and was on the last legs of his patience. Granted, the middle Grimm could understand the fussing and the double-checking and the scolding (Marina wouldn’t be Marina, if she wasn’t scolding Will for something with regards to his health). The Colonel had given the entire family a hell of a scare and it would be awhile before they relaxed enough not to smother him. To see him up and around eased a lot of the fear, but Vincent had been insistent before he’d taken Will off of the sedatives.

On the mend was not healed. Will was NOT out of the woods just yet.

It didn’t take long for Jason to take pity on his brother, though, and give him a job to do. One that required of him nothing but sitting in a pew and delegating. Currently, the elder brother was arranging people into their seats with the help of Brian and Clint, while Marina fussed with the last minutes details for the meal. Jason and Casey both had begged the Russian to cater their wedding and Marina hadn’t been able to say no. Casey was in the bride’s rooms, getting ready with her bridesmaids, all of whom were in attendance and nearly ready. Which left Jason with only one thing to do; worry over the absence of two of his groomsmen.

Checking his watch once more, he felt anxiety swelling his throat closed. He nearly jumped a mile moments later, though, when a familiar voice rang through the cathedral Beatrice Shraeger had procured for the ceremony. “Jay!”

Head snapping around in search of the voice, he felt a huge grin light up his face at the sight of the two men approaching. “Finally! You’re late!”

Dark brown eyes gleamed behind wire-rimmed glasses as Dr. Thomas Oliver, laughed, “Chill out, man. We just got off the plane like ten minutes ago.”

Jason burst into laughter, the two men colliding in a strong embrace. “Damn, Tommy . . . it’s good to see you two.”

Billy Cranston chuckled as he fidgetted with the strap of his bag. “Which prompts my next question. Haven’t you ever heard of a phone? Long time, no see, Jay.”

The bridegroom laughed, releasing Tommy and capturing the other engineer in a bear hug, lifting him clear off his feet. “Phones work both ways, Billy . . . Mr. I Haven’t Been Anywhere That Had Cell Service in Five Years.”

Blushing, he agreed, “Okay, yeah . . . I have been a little hard to get ahold of. You may have a point there.” Thumping Jason on the back companionably, he teased, “So, is there anywhere we can change? We did come straight from the airport and, as you said, we are a little late.”

“Yeah. This way,” he agreed, leading the two men away.

Jason frowned, curious and concerned as he caught sight of Jules staring at them from off to the side of the cathedral, her face paling sickly before contorting in mild horror. Clamping her hands over the lower half of her face, she turned and bolted, surprisingly agile for a woman currently eight months pregnant. He made a mental note to have his nephew check on her, before coming to the groom’s changing room.

Clapping Tommy on the shoulder as they disappeared inside, he chuckled to himself as he recalled the first time he had ever officially met the two. Angel Grove High School had been one of the few schools he’d attended where he was enrolled for longer than a single semester. As a result, he was still friends with a few of the people he’d hung out with back then. Adam Park was coming in as well, though he wouldn’t be able to make it until the reception at the earliest which was the only reason Jason hadn’t asked him to be a groomsman too.

As for the others, Jason was still in touch with them, but didn’t reach out via email or phone call nearly as often as he did with the first three. Tanya Sloan was back in Africa and wouldn’t be able to make it, but Adam was hoping he could drag Rocky DeSantos away from his dojo for at least a couple hours. If anyone could, it would be Rocky’s longtime best friend. Jason and Katherine Hilliard had been friends as a result of Kat’s relationship with Tommy, but they had long ago fallen out of touch . . . about the same time Tommy and Kat had broken it off.

Everyone knew that Tommy still had a thing for his first girlfriend, Kimberly Hart, but none of Jason’s friends had seen or heard from her in more than a decade. As for Jason himself, he’d never met her, only heard about her from the rest.

Those three guys had made his sophomore year one of the happiest periods of his life that he could remember. And at least two of them who were going to be standing up with him as he married the love of his life.

Flashback
Angel Grove, California
August 15, 1987

Marina’s voice was gentle and adoring from the other side of the mat as the 15 year old ripped into the punching bag at the Youth Center. She seemed utterly oblivious to the group of teenagers that had been watching Jason attack the bag for the last hour, though Jason could almost feel their curiosity at her presence. “You do remember that your brother is coming home today, right?”

Excitement and joy flooded through Jason at the reminder that his beloved older brother was coming back on leave, quickly dampened by his fury at his other older brother. As a result, his reply was a surly grunt, “Yeah . . . I know.”

There was a rustle of fabric as she shifted, before she asked kindly, “Wanna tell me what happened? Or do you just want to abuse the bag - and your hands - a little bit longer?”

As was usually the case, Jason caved to Marina’s long honed “Mom-voice”. Snarling, he threw a vicious roundhouse kick into the bag and sent it swinging wildly. “Barney is an asshole.”

Marina laughed, startled by the announcement, before smothering the sound at Jason’s betrayed look. Her shoulders continued to shake as she replied, “Undoubtedly. And seeing as you already knew that, I’m struggling to see what the problem is.”

Jason turned to look at her, seeing her in bare feet and workout clothes. Taking the unspoken permission, he dropped into a defensive stance, before swinging out at her. She swept him aside easily, her hands open and guiding as she side stepped him without thought. “If you didn’t react, Jay, he wouldn’t pick on you like he does,” she reminded him, flowing past him as he swung out at her again.

“Unlikely,” he grunted, as he paused to take her in. “He gets off on screwing with us.”

“Something Misha will have something to say about once he gets home, no doubt,” she agreed with a chuckle, ducking his punch and putting a solid fist into the sweet spot just under his ribs.
Instantly winded, Jason dropped to the mat, wheezing. Marina folded her arms as she scolded, "Focus and patience, Jason Leonard. I feel like we have this conversation rather a lot."

"I know. But Barney makes me so mad." Folding his hands over his stomach, he asked plaintively, "And you're sure I'm the younger brother?"

Marina looked back from where she was slipping her feet back into her shoes. "I was there when you both were born, Jason. I'm very sure." Pulling her hair into a ponytail, she insisted, "Misha's plane doesn't get in until about 5, and it's almost a two hour drive home from the airport. Feel free to avoid home for as long as you want, but I do have to ask you to be at home when I get him back. I'm going to need your help with him."

Jason sat up and wrapped his arms around his knees, asking, "It's bad, huh?"

"I don't know; he won't tell me. Which in and of itself tells me more than he wants me to know," Marina replied with a small sad smile. Coming to stand in front of him, she bent to press a warm kiss to the top of his head. "Love you, sladkiy. I have the boys, okay? So have some fun for a few hours?"

"Yes ma'am. Love you too Marishka," he laughed with a grin, one hand coming up in a wave as he watched her leave the Youth Center behind.

An almost familiar voice behind him asked, "That's your mom!?"

Looking back over his shoulder, Jason could feel his mouth twisting as he agreed, "The closest thing I've ever had to one, yeah."

A tall, long haired teenager in a red shirt and blue jeans stood there. Five other teenagers stood with him, all of them watching him with curious eyes. "Dude, she kicked your ass."

"Well, she could have . . ." Jason agreed, pushing himself to his feet. Offering his hand, he introduced himself, "Jason Grimm. I'm a sophomore at Angel Grove."

One of the teenagers, dressed from head to toe in black, spoke up with a chuckle. "I know who you are. You're the only sophomore in my AP Computer Science course. You're good; I've watched you code before."

Jason blushed, a sheepish shrug lifting his shoulders as he confessed, "I've always been good with computers." Cocking his head, he asked cautiously, "You're Billy Cranston, right? I think we have Physics together too."

"Yeah," the bespectacled teenager agreed, gesturing to his friend who had originally spoken, "This is Tommy Oliver."

The girl in pink was introduced as Tommy’s girlfriend, Kat, with the girl in yellow as Tanya. Adam was the solemn, shy young man in green, while blue-clad Rocky all but bounced in place as he cheered, "You wanna spar? I bet you could give Tommy a run for his money."

"I don't have any formal training. And I've heard all about Tommy Oliver and his three black belts in three different disciplines."

Tommy shrugged, "All due respect, you may not have formal training, but you're pretty good."

Glancing towards the door Marina had disappeared through, he chuckled, "Which isn't to say she's “Marina was the one who trained me. She’s always going to be better than me; she knows my tells better than I do.”

Tommy and Adam exchanged glances, before Tommy offered the sophomore a hand. “Adam and I can help you hide your tells . . . if you want to learn how.”

Thinking about it for a second, it wasn’t long before Jason was accepting the hand with a grin, “Hell yeah. When do we start?”

End Flashback

Not that the additional training did any good. It did help him kick Barney’s ass on occasion, but Marina still beat him five times in every five. Still . . . it had been nice to get one up on Barney at least. Jason typically chalked it up to Marina just being better at hand to hand; her life had depended on it more than once, while his speciality was always going to be his computer and engineering prowess.

Speak of the devil and she will appear. “Jay? You okay, sladkiy?”

Twisting to look at Marina, he grinned, “Yeah . . . Tommy and Billy just got here. I was just . . . reminiscing, I guess.”

Marina smiled; she’d hosted the rambunctious group at their little railcar on more than one occasion that year. She liked all of his friends from that time in their lives, though Adam Park had always been her favorite. Jason knew she was looking forward to seeing him during the reception. “I’m glad they were able to get here and mostly on time too. Bonus!”

Grinning at her, he reached out to wrap his arms around her. “How are you, Marina?”

“Tired . . . worried about your brother. But, I have to stop fussing at him. I can tell he’s getting to the end of his patience.”

“Long past, I think,” Jason agreed, before the two turned to look as Sam’s voice filled the hallway. “Ma! Uncle Jason!”

“Here, Sammy-honey!” Marina called in response, a frown on her face as she watched her son bolt around the corner towards them. “What’s wrong? What is it?”

The SRU constable took a deep breath, clearly gearing himself up for an unpleasant conversation. “I hate to do this . . .”

Hot chocolate eyes narrowed sharply as the Russian demanded, “Do what!?”

“Jules isn’t feeling well . . . she’s asked me to take her back to the house,” he confessed, with a sharp grimace.

Marina’s eyes went wide and both men waited for the moment of shock to pass . . .

“She wants you to do WHAT!?!” came the expected shriek.

“Ma, I’ll be right back, I swear. I just gotta take her back to the house so she can get some rest.”

“It’s your uncle’s wedding, Sammy. She drove all the way here with Lou and Spike, just to be able to be here. And she’s not even going to attend!? Why did she even bother?”
Sam sighed heavily, begging, “Ma, please. She’s pregnant . . . doesn’t that gain her a little leeway?”

Marina’s hands came up to scrub over her features, before she sighed. “That’s not the point, Sammy. She knows how important the family is to you, and she’s asking you to miss the wedding . . .”

Jason spoke up. “I’ll talk to Casey. We’ll push it back a little bit. Two of my groomsmen just barely got here, so it’s not a bad thing to give them a little more time to get ready. Go, quickly. We’ll save you a seat in the family section.”

“Thank you, Uncle Jay.”

“You’re welcome, Sammy. Go . . . now.”

Sam nodded, leaning forward to kiss his mother’s cheek, vowing solemnly, “I’ll be back before you even realize I’m gone. I promise.”

Nodding, Marina cupped his cheek fondly, before shooing him off. “Go . . . you have half an hour at most before Beatrice Shraeger starts to get antsy.”

“Thank you!” he called back over his shoulder, before bolting off down the hallway once again.

Jason frowned, before turning to Marina. “I think she might have had an attack of nausea.”

Marina cocked an eyebrow at the statement, asking cautiously, “How do you know?”

“I saw her run off with her hands over her mouth, when I was bringing Tommy and Billy back here a little bit ago.”

“She’s in her eighth month,” Marina reminded him, though he was grateful to see her calmer. “If she’s having struggles with nausea, that’s something her OB/GYN needs to know. Could indicate something’s wrong . . .”

“Or she ate something that didn’t agree with her when we were out at the restaurant for breakfast this morning.”

Huffing, she smacked at him, as she teased, “Stop being so reasonable.”

Tommy’s voice spoke up from behind them as he joked, “Wait . . . we are talking about the same Jason, right? Cause I don’t remember that being a problem he suffered with.”

“You’re hilarious,” Jason snarked with a roll of his eyes, before gesturing to Marina. “Tommy, you remember Marina?”

“I remember her cinnamon rolls,” he agreed hopefully with a boyish grin.

Marina laughed brightly. “Of course you do . . . I could never keep them on the plate long enough for anyone else to enjoy them. How are you, Tommy?” a wicked smirk tilted the corner of her mouth, as she teased, “And how is Hailey?”

Tommy’s cheeks pinked, causing Jason to hoot with laughter. “She’s not my girlfriend, Marina.”

Marina’s hair tossed as she strolled away. “I don’t remember saying she was.”

Jason snickered, as he jostled the taller man fondly. “Busted,” he teased, before moving after her.

The paleontologist was left sputtering in their wake, insisting, “She’s not!”
Billy chuckled, slapping his friend on the shoulder as he followed after the retreating duo. “That’s what you always say. I gotta tell ya, Tommy . . . we haven’t believed you in years.”

Grunting, Tommy raced after them, muttering, “You all suck. She’s not my girlfriend!”

I’m planning on a brief outtake series, based on the circus years, with one ficlet for each of these pictures. Please let me know what you think.

Chapter End Notes

This takes place after Kim was already gone to the Pan Global Games, so Jason and Kim have never met.
Chapter Notes

Sorry for the long wait. I had this finished awhile ago, and then I went to go see Rogue One: A Star Wars Story and found myself drowning in feelings and fix it fic.

Either way, I'm here and I've already got the next chapter started and almost done. So hopefully the wait will not be nearly so long in the future.

Translations at the end as always. Enjoy this!

Chapter 247: It's Never Gonna Be Easy, Is It?

Jason chuckled as he dropped into the seat next to his older brother. “You look bored . . . or murderous, one of the two.”

Will smirked lightly at the teasing tone. “How about both? Both is probably the most accurate.” Glancing back over his shoulder, he asked, “Was that Tommy I saw? Looks a little different than I remember.”

The engineer smirked. “Pretty hard to believe huh? From long-haired martial artist to responsible paleontologist. Who would have thunk it?”

“You ever tell them you knew? About their . . .” the blatant pause was clear, even as Will continued, “extracurricular activities.”
“They weren’t the only ones with secrets Will,” the tech reminded his brother. Earning an understanding hum from his brother, he shrugged. A single eyebrow cocked upwards after a moment, before he asked suspiciously, “Wait . . . you were hardly even around while we lived in Angel Grove. How did you know?”

The wince was there and gone in a second, before Will replied, “Marina told me. We keep no secrets, Jay.” There was a wealth of unspoken knowledge in those quicksilver eyes as he glanced at his brother, “We never have.”

“Not even one?”

“None. I know things about samaya malen’kaya no one else knows and vice versa.” Glancing over at his partner as her giggles filled the room, he smiled, adoration and muted joy flooding across his face. “Things even you don’t know, Jay.”

Jason sputtered at the declaration, unable to fathom something so ludicrous. He had grown up in Marina’s back pocket; he would dare anyone to tell him something about the woman he viewed as his sister that he didn’t already know. “Like what!?”

The Colonel’s laughter was warm and low as he teased, “That’s why they call it a secret, Jason.” Pushing himself up with a hand on his brother’s shoulder, Will grunted as he straightened to his full height. “Come on . . . let’s get you married, huh?”

Willing to be brushed off for the moment, Jason allowed the excitement of the day to rush over him as he agreed, “Hell yes.”

The two brothers strode up the aisle, though Jason frowned as his elder brother came to a stop beside his eldest son. Taking Sam gently by the arm, he looked the blond in the eye and insisted, “We need to talk, okay? Today.”

Sam looked confused for all of a second, before his eyes went wide with startled understanding. Nodding, he agreed, “Yeah . . . okay Dad. Let me know when?”

“Reception?” he inquired gently.

A firm nod accompanied the constable’s agreement, “Sounds good.”

“Good kid,” the Colonel replied fondly, ruffling the sunny hair before once again herding Jason to the pulpit . . . and the disapproving almost-mother-in-law standing there glaring at him.

Jason sighed, already dreading this conversation, before greeting the woman wearily. “Hello Beatrice. How can I help you yell at me today?”

The socialite scowled, unamused by his sarcasm. “You missed the rehearsal dinner. As a matter of fact, your entire bridal party did. Not even my own daughter was in attendance.” Glowering at him, she hissed, “Are you aware of how that reflects on me?”

“Frankly Beatrice, I don’t give a damn. My family has been eyebrows deep in a crisis . . . and Casey didn’t want the chertov dinner in the first place,” Jason reminded her in a surgery sweet tone. “You wanted it so all your high class friends could see how she was marrying beneath her and ‘disappointing you’.”

“I’ll have you know, Detective . . .” she began in a scathing tone that only caused Jason’s mocking grin to expand even further.
He took gleeful pleasure in interrupting her, “It’s Captain, actually.”

The woman fell silent in surprise, blinking at him dumbly, before stammering, “What!?"

“My title? It’s actually Captain . . . Captain Jason L. Grimm, to be specific.”

Will snickered, drawing his brother’s attention away from his adversary. “Technically, it’s Major Jason L. Grimm. I’m just waiting for your updated orders to show up at the house, along with the rank insignia.”

The middle brother’s eyes flashed wide and he whirled to stare at his brother. “What!?"

“It was supposed to be your wedding present, but you know how bureaucracy works. So . . . surprise?” he laughed, rocking on his feet with a groan as Jason hit him in the shoulders with a slightly manic bear hug. “Jay . . . off!”

Releasing his brother like the older man was made of lightning, Jason grabbed his brother by the shoulders and demanded, “Are you serious, right now?”

“As a heart attack,” the Colonel agreed with a laugh. Cupping the younger man’s cheek for a moment, he insisted, “It was long past time you got a promotion. I’m only sorry I wasn’t able to get your insignia before today, so you could married in the right uniform.”

Jason lifted his hand to tug at the cuff hiding the tattoo at his wrist, asking, “Does this mean I need to get this one replaced?”

“Your choice,” Will replied with a shrug, before a strident “Eh-hum!” interrupted anything else they may have said about the matter.

The sound easily sent Jason’s good mood through the floor as he sighed and turned back to the woman staring at them reproachfully. “What Beatrice?”

“Whatever your title is, I was in the middle of making a point,” the woman sniped irritably.

“Of course you were,” he sighed with a long suffering roll of his eyes. “What is it?”

“Rehearsal dinners are so you know what to do during the ceremony.”

Will snorted. “There have been a few weddings in the family to this point. He’ll manage just fine without it.”

“I beg your pardon,” she hissed, mortified by his interruption.

“No, lady, you beg patience. A lot of patience,” Will replied, before rolling his eyes, “And I’m generally accepted to be the most patient one in this family. So take that for what it’s worth.”

“Excuse you!?” she squealed, her tone reaching eardrum splitting levels and reverberating through the cathedral.

The Colonel pulled on his “I am taking none of your shit” face and cocked an eyebrow at her, tone bald and uninterested as he asked, “Who are you again?”

A sharp sniff was clear indication of her disgust with a question. “I am Beatrice Shraeger, Casey’s mother.”
Jason snickered, even as he nudged the elder with a gentle elbow (he hadn’t forgotten the groan of pain Will had let out when he’d hugged him). “Don’t antagonize my future mother-in-law, pravitel.”

“She shouldn’t be antagonizing me. She’s not the one with a 9mm in the holster at her back,” he shot back in a falsely cheerful tone.

The tech felt a sick satisfaction at the way the woman blanched just before organ began to play. Huffing at the tech, she stomped away to the bride’s side of the cathedral. Will chuckled, before reaching up to fix his brother’s uniform tie, his tone fond as he asked, “You ready for this?”

“Can I say yes . . . and still be terrified that I’m going to screw it up?” Jason asked, grinning as his other three groomsmen came bolting up the aisle towards them.

Will ruffled his hair fondly, a warm glow in the blue of his eyes, promising, “Absolutely.” Nudging him along, he insisted, “Come on . . . let’s get lined up. The girls around going to be coming out in about thirty seconds and Marina will flip if we screw this up.”

“Nasedka.”

“Indeed.”

Once again the perfect officer, Will ran critical eyes over Aaron, Tommy and Billy as they all took their places in the line, before taking his own place at his brother’s side as the Best Man. The Colonel had initially balked at Jason’s request, but Jason had refused to even consider the suggestion that someone else would have been more suited to the role. Glancing over at his brother, Jason grinned for a moment at the fond look on his typically stoic brother’s face, before turning back to face the rest of the audience.

Mere seconds later, the doors at the back opened and his half-brother’s daughters, Kyrene and Nike Doyle, led their brother Kelley Doyle up the aisle. Kelley’s half-brother, Bellamy -now Bellamy Doyle- was there too, prodding a clearly reluctant Kelley up the aisle with a small amused smile. The two girls were precious in their red and black flower girl dresses, while Bellamy and Kelley presented handsome portraits in their matching, miniature tuxedos. The girls were clearly loving it, though Kelley looked as though he’d been sucking on a lemon at the restrictiveness of the suit and requisite tie.

Jason winked at his two nephews, earning a shy smile from the older and a brilliant grin from the younger, before the two came to a stop. Kelley pressed back into Will’s legs, the Colonel’s hand brushing fondly over the dark hair before reaching out and nudging his fingers against Bellamy’s ear teasingly. The 8 year old grinned at the tease, finally moving to take his place next to his brother and their uncle.

Next was Natasha, the assassin dressed a blush pink gown that radiated against her skin and flattered her fiery curls wonderfully. A low wolf whistle made its way through the crowd and Jason rolled his eyes. There was only one person that could have been; there was only one person in the world crazy enough to catcall the damned Black Widow. The red-haired Murderess preened a little bit, even as she gave her roguishly grinning lover a blistering glare. Not that anyone really believed she was upset; the blush on her cheeks was pretty clear on that.

Next was Marina, in a dress to match Natasha’s own but in a wonderful blue color that nearly matched the color of Will’s eyes when his brother was happiest. Jason smiled, blessing the ground Casey stood on; the fact that she’d taken the time to notice the color his brother’s eyes were when he was happy and translated it into this moment was more than he’d ever known he’d needed from a partner. He didn’t deserve her. As for the Family Russian, she was beaming almost as brilliantly as any bride, thrilled beyond measure both for her sladkiy and for the opportunity to bring Casey completely into the family. Unable to help himself, Jason glanced over at his older brother, and snickered at the awestruck look on the Colonel’s face. Leaning over, he teased quietly, “You’re catching flies, pravitel.”

Will shoved him fondly, earning a giggle from his partner even as she took her place beside her sister. Scarlett came next, one of Casey’s Matrons of Honor; the fact that Casey had refused to choose between her two best friends had sent her mother into a tizzy . . . an outcome Jason was fairly certain she’d been expecting and looking forward to. Scarlett’s own gown matched the others, except for the color; a creamy seafoam green that played well against her dark hair and dusky skin. She was beautiful and Jason could imagine the look on Doyle’s face as she watched him. The scientist smiled as her two daughters clustered against her, their little faces glowing as they giggled together.

Last but not least came Marta, her gown a radiant yellow that was nearly golden. Both Will and Jason checked back over their shoulders at the audible intake of air from their baby brother. Aaron looked as though he’d swallowed his tongue, earning a brilliant blush from the virologist as she reached up to fix an imaginary strand of hair. She rushed the last few steps to the altar, uncomfortable with the scrutiny from the room, though she glowed at the joy her husband was exhibiting from his place beside her. The family chuckled a little, knowing that her tendency to shyness would never truly go away, and loving her all the more for it.

The bridal march began then, and Jason’s eyes turned once more to the back of the cathedral. For a moment, the door frame was empty, before Casey Beatrice Shraeger materialized like magic from the gloom, all but glowing on her father’s arm.

Jason felt as though he’d been gut-punched. She wore a strapless gown of pure white, the skirt swishing against her legs as she walked to take her place beside him. Her veil was small and curved against the side of her face, topped by a spray of white silk flowers and jewels. She was the most beautiful thing he’d ever seen. He was pretty sure he forgot how to breathe from the moment her father laid her hand in his all the way until the preacher spoke up for the cathedral’s benefit. “If any here have cause to object, let them speak now or forever hold their peace.”

The tech’s eyes went wide, fully expecting Beatrice to say something, a concern Casey shared if the way she tightened her grip on his fingers. However neither of them expecting the voice that spoke, the unexpectedness of it ripping them from their blissful daze. “Well . . . I COULD and considering the way dear Beatrice is glaring at the groom, I SHOULD.” There was a pause, during which Jason smirked at the murderous look on Casey’s face before the voice continued, “However, darling Casey looks like she wants to shoot me. And Casey is much scarier . . . so I won’t.”

Jason turned to look at the speaker and jolted in shock at the sight of him. He didn’t even remember inviting the man, and considering Casey’s own surprise, it was a good bet she hadn’t invited him either. So clearly, he was crashing the wedding, which wasn’t unexpected all things considered, but still . . .

It was about this point when Marina’s voice rang out in disappointed censure. “Anthony Edward Stark, just what do you think you’re doing?”

“Hello Marina,” the genius greeted her, his smile warm and familiar, before he leaned over to the stranger seated just to his left. “I’m gonna be honest. That tone of hers is not any less scary than it was when I was five.”
Marina sighed, visibly exasperated, amused and fond as she scolded, “Tony, sit down and shut up. Whatever crazy idea you have cooking in your brain, you can sit on it until the ‘I do’s. Okay?”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed meekly, sinking into the pew beside him. “Carry on.”

The Russian rolled her eyes before chuckling softly. Turning to look at her partner, she asked softly, “What am I going to do with him?”

Will only shrugged, unfailingly amused, before gesturing to the preacher to continue. The man, obviously expecting a protest and getting none, shook himself free of his thoughts and hurried through the rest of the vows. At long last, he insisted, “I now pronounce you husband and wife. You may kiss your bride, Major.”

Grinning, Jason gathered his wife close to him, before laughing, “Tony Stark is at our wedding and you’re all mine. Will wonders never cease?”

She laughed up at him, fingers sliding tenderly into his hair, “Here’s hoping. Now shut up and kiss me.”

“Yes ma’am,” he agreed, before proceeding to do just that.

Chapter End Notes

Translations:

(R) samaya malen'kaya - my little one (Will's most common nickname for Marina Petrovka, his longtime partner.)
(R) chertov - fucking
(R) pravitel - big brother (nickname used solely for Will Grimm by his younger brothers)
(R) Nasedka - mother hen (Marina Petrovka's most common nickname from her boys)
(R) sladkiy - honey (Marina's nickname for Jason Grimm)
There's a lot going on in real life right now. And I am sorry for how long this took, however, in penance I have prepared two chapters for you all. It was supposed to be just one, but I didn't want to lose the significance of the one over the other.

Enjoy and let me know what you think?
no greater love than a father for proudly hosted on photobucket

Chapter 248: Father and Son

If there was one thing about Sam’s father that everyone knew - be they family, co-worker, adversary or otherwise - it was this. Will Grimm was a very patient man.

The blond constable stood in the frame of the side door to the small reception hall, shoulder braced up against the wood and arms folded over his chest as he watched his father sit on the bench less than 10 feet away and smoke. Eyes half closed as he savored his cigarette, the Colonel looked as relaxed and content as he ever seemed to get without his partner at his side. His uniform jacket had been discarded over the back of the bench beside him, the cuffs of his dress shirt rolled up to just shy of his elbows. The dark blond strands had been ruffled from their usual tamed style, clear evidence of fingers through short hair.

It was a side of his father Sam didn’t see very often . . . a side he was pretty sure very few people ever saw at all.

Chuckling softly, Sam called out, “You know Ma is going to freak out if she looks around and realizes you’re gone, right?”

That earned a soft bark of laughter as the Colonel twisted to look back at his elder son. “Well she would, except for the fact she knows where I am . . . and who’s with me.”

A single eyebrow cocked upwards as Sam realized he’d played perfectly into his father’s ploy. “Sneaky, Dad.”

“Sort of comes with the job description,” Will agreed with a laugh, free hand coming up to wave his son forward. “Come sit with me. Let’s chat.”

Sam moved forward, taking the seat next to his father and slouching backwards against the backrest. The lights of New York City were beautiful from where they sat and Sam smiled. “I can see why you and Ma love this city so much.”

“It has its darknesses, same as any city, but it’s hard to find anywhere else in the world more beautiful,” was the response, cigarette lifting to his lips before he took a slow, lazy pull. “How’s Jules?”

The flash of fury and shame that seared through Sam was startling, even as he knew its source. “At home. Far away from me . . . which is where she seems to prefer being right now.”

“That doesn’t seem fair. She’s your wife, Sammy-honey . . . you’re having a child together.” A small curve tilted up the corner of Will’s lips as he teased, “A little detail that has your mother in quite the tizzy. I don’t think I’ve ever seen her this excited before.”

“Grandbabies . . . every mother’s dream,” the blond agreed with a small smile, before his face smoothed and he sighed, leaning forward, elbows braced against his knees. “How much do you remember? From when you were unconscious?”

“I remember most of it . . . some of it I’m sure I missed, but . . .” Here there was a one shoulder shrug as Will took another drag on his cigarette. “Tell me about Matt.”

Sam flinched, ice blue eyes flashing wide as he jerked. “Matt?!?”

The Colonel’s eyes were warm and understanding as he reached out to lay a hand on his shoulder, steadying his son calmly. “Did you honestly think I didn’t know about your boyfriend?”

The constable groaned, covering his face with his hands. He cussed vehemently, Will’s lips twitching at the younger man’s creative Quebecois cursing. Finally, his hands dropped and he stared at his father with desolate eyes, begging in a horrified whisper, “How long have you known?”

“You don’t mourn a friend like you mourned Matt, Sammy. That soul deep devastation . . . that gut wrenching agony? That’s the kind of pain that comes from losing a lover . . . a companion.” Running his fingers through his hair, Will cupped his son’s cheek and smoothed his thumb tenderly against the skin. “We’ve known since you came to us.”

“Ma knows too?” he asked in a breathless whimper.

“Of course. Your mother and I keep no secrets,” Will told his son. “Why are you so surprised? So upset that we know?”

“I was JTF2, Dad; we both were. That kind of . . .” here there was a bitter sneer as Sam allowed his anger to contort his face, “attachment was heavily frowned upon. And then, considering what I did . . . how he died . . .” Shaking his head, he nearly snarled as he definitively answered the question, “My sexuality hasn’t exactly been something I’ve been able to tell many people about, without them turning on me completely. And if the General had ever found out, being disowned would have been a kindness considering what he would have done to me.”

“I am not the General,” Will reminded his son firmly, before shrugging lightly, “And so what . . . you’re bisexual. So are your uncles; your uncles who happen to be the World’s Greatest Marksman and the Winter Soldier, respectively. Your sexuality does not change who you are; not as a person, as an asset, a soldier or a sniper.” Smoothing back a strand of hair, Will asked fondly, “Have we ever given you reason to think that we would shun you for the gender of the person you loved?”

Sam shook his head again, his wet eyes looking away, “I’ve kept it a secret for so long that I didn’t even know how to say anything. I never told anyone. Jules doesn’t even know.”

“Do you think she’d hate you for it? Turn you away, if she knew?”

Sam shrugged, a bitter laugh ripping from him. “At this point . . . I couldn’t even tell you, Dad. There’s a lot about my marriage that I wasn’t expecting when I asked Jules to marry me.”

An affirming hum floated through the air, tone warm and paternal as he asked, “Such as?”

A long pause rang through the area, before Sam sighed, “Loneliness. I never expected the loneliness.”

“Sammichka . . . my dear boy . . . tell me the truth. Are you happy with Jules?”

Hands coming up to cover his mouth, Sam snorted hard as he shook his head. “I don’t know, Dad. I don’t even know if I can explain it.”

“Just try, Sammy . . . I’m here to listen. No judgment, I promise.”

“I just . . . I love her so much and things with her can be so good and so happy sometimes. And others . . . I don’t know, it seems like I’m having to work so hard just to get to have those moments. I’m willing to try, to work at it . . . I just get so tired sometimes. Listen to me. I’m not trying to complain; I know marriage takes work. It’s just that you and Ma make it look so easy!”

“I promise . . . there have been more than a few times your mother has wanted to fillet me with her favorite knife,” the man chuckled, taking his last drag then stubbing the cigarette out against the sole of his boot. “And it doesn’t matter how hard you work at it, Sammy, if she won’t work at it too. You told me, while I was unconscious, that you thought sometimes she was expecting someone else to come through the door. Do you think she’s having an affair? Or maybe just missing something she had a long time ago?”

“Maybe? Not about the affair. No, I don’t think she would do that, but missing something, someone? Possibly. Jules doesn’t talk about her past much. Even when I ask her directly about something, she avoids it. But it seems like she’s trying to forget something, not remember it, so I don’t push her about it.”

“Noble of you. And I guess, if there's things you don't wish to tell her, it's only fair to let her keep her secrets too, right?”

Sam looked sad but resigned, “Right.”

“Of course. You could always subscribe to your mom's and my philosophy; no secrets. But that has to be something you both come to an agreement on.”

“I would tell her everything . . . anything she asked of me,” the blond insisted, trying to convince his father.

“But will she give you the same level of honesty?” the Colonel asked in reply, a sadness in his eyes clear indication that he already knew the answer.

Sam took a moment to think. “Right now? Probably not. But I’m willing to wait, to have patience.” Sam smiled. “You learned patience from dealing with my uncles, right? I know it’s a different dynamic, but I can do that with Jules. Show her that I can wait . . . that I’m ready to be completely open with her, when she is with me.”

“Just remember to have a limit to your patience, Sammy. Otherwise your wait will never end,” Will reminded his son, with a small sad smile. “Even I have limits to my patience with your uncles.” Rolling his eyes, he snarked, “Just ask your Uncle Brian how many times I thrashed him growing up because Barney was being a little shit.”

Sam chuckled, having heard a couple of those stories from his two youngest uncles over the years. “Uncle Clint’s told me about a couple of those.”

“I’ll bet he has . . . just like I doubt he’s told you about the times I kicked HIS ass because he was being an idiot.”

“No . . . but Uncle Aaron has,” the blond laughed with a sly grin. Sighing heavily, Sam slumped back against the bench. “I just wish I knew how to fix my marriage, Dad. I want us both to be happy in it.”

Will’s lips quirked slightly as he sighed, “Sometimes, a marriage isn’t meant to last forever. Sometimes, they’re supposed to teach you something that will allow you to move on with your life.”

One eyebrow cocked upwards as Sam frowned, tone hesitant as he insisted, “That doesn’t sound like anything I’ve ever been told about marriage.”

“That doesn’t make it any less true.” Smiling, Will reached out to ruffle his son’s hair. “Let me tell you about a couple I knew once, okay? They were married first and then learned to love each other . . . even though that love wasn’t the ‘be all, end all’ of their lives.”
“Married first?” Sam frowned, curious, before inquiring suspiciously, “Who are we talking about? Someone in the family?”

“I think I’ll leave this anonymous for now. And no, I’m not telling you,” Will shook his head as Sam began to protest, continuing fondly, “I’m sure you’ll find out for yourself someday but that day is not today. What’s important right now, is for you to know that there could have been many different outcomes to their story. Like I said, even though they didn’t love each other at the start, they did learn to love each other . . . very deeply in fact. Ask either one of them, and they would both tell you the love they felt for their spouse could have been enough for the both of them . . . despite how happy they each are in the relationships that came after.”

Turning to his son, he smiled fondly, “And while I know things are difficult with Jules right now, you’ve only been married for a few months. The first year is the hardest one in a relationship. Learning to be with someone else so completely, so utterly at their mercy . . . it’s hard. It takes effort and tears and time. It was hard for Marina and me . . . it was for the couple I’m telling you about . . . even for Brian and Natasha, and they’re pretty damned committed to the idea that they’re not committed,” Will snarked, rolling his eyes in concert with Sam’s own derisive snort.

Reaching out to cup his son’s cheek, he promised, “I’m not saying everything is just going to suddenly get better or easier with time, but allowing time for adjustment does help with some of it. And, once that happens, you never know . . . things between you and Jules could get easier. You both could put the little things aside and focus on the big picture.”

“Of course, there’s also another way your story with Jules may end. The same way my friends’ relationship ended, with moving forward . . . moving on . . . committing their lives to someone else.” Threading his fingers through his son’s hair fondly, Will insisted, “I’m not saying you should give up on your marriage, Sammy-honey. But if - after putting everything you have into it - it ends . . . there is no reason you should think of it as a failure. It’s just a jumping point, to something that could be happier and more wonderful for you both. Okay?”

Sam nodded, his slightly distant gaze showing he was thinking over everything Will had said, before wrapping his arms tightly around his dad. “Thank you.” After a moment he pulled away, his head lowered sheepishly, “Sorry for taking you away from the reception for this. I mean, Jason just got married. This could have waited.”

“Probably, but should it have? I don’t think so.” Cupping a hand against the back of Sam’s neck, the Colonel pressed a warm, fatherly kiss to the skin of Sam’s forehead. “Jason is my brother, and I will always be there for him. But you are my son . . . and right now, you needed me more. Jason would more than understand . . . besides, it’s not often he sees the idiots from his high school days.” Snickering, he promised, “He probably hasn’t even realized I’m gone yet.”

“True. My wedding day was mostly a blur. It was so overwhelming. Nothing would have gotten done if Ma wasn’t there.”

“That’s because your mother is a force of nature and there is no stopping her when she has her mind set to something.” Twisting, Will looked back toward the reception hall and sighed, “Even when others have different ideas.” Marina was on a beeline for an enthralled Tony Stark, which was not going to end well if she captured him alone. “Come on, Sammy . . . let’s go rescue your mother from her own good intentions.”

“She’s not going to kill him, right?”
“I don't think so. But it's Tony Stark; god knows stranger things have happened in his orbit,” Will chuckled with a rueful shake of his head and a small, almost unnoticeable wince. “Go on, Sammichka . . . I'll catch up.”
Answers

Chapter Notes

Part two of two. Yay!! Enjoy!!!
Friendship is just a different invention to build.
Chapter 249: Answers

Marina was only a few paces away when Tony turned and noticed her approach. His eyes quickly went to the cup and plate of food she carried, and she noted a tiny twitch in his features. Less than a second showing of . . . distress? As his mouth switched to a smirk and began to open, no doubt to try and sell her a line, she set the dishes on the table next to him and stepped back, one brow raised.

Tony blinked in surprise. She folded her arms and cocked her head, scolding, “It's gonna get cold if you just stare at it, Anthony.”

“Tony, actually. Every time you call me Anthony, I keep getting flashbacks to my childhood and that is last thing I need, so,” he smiled and picked up the glass.

“Tony then . . .” she agreed fondly. “You were always a little troublemaker, you know.”

His smiled widened, “Still am.”

Smirking, she teased, “There's the boy I knew.” Smirk smoothing to a frown, she asked, “What are you doing here Tony? Not that I'm not glad to see you, but . . .”

“Believe it or not but it was actually Daddy Dearest that brought me here. I was checking through my family's assets, accounts and what not when I came across a grant set aside for one Jason Leonard Grimm.”

Marina didn’t even try to hide her surprise as he continued.

“Nothing too special; just enough for a full ride to any college the kid wanted. And so there I am . . . I’ve never heard of a ‘Jason Grimm’ before in my life, and Dad wasn’t exactly one to set up a fund like that for just anyone - especially without a charity dinner to go along with it - so my interest was piqued. And lucky me, what pops up when I do a search for him? Turns out he’s getting married, to a Shraeger! So . . . here I am, at the wedding of a guy I was thinking was going to prove my dad was an asshole to my mother as well…” his gaze was purposely light but bore into her nonetheless, “talking to an old nanny of mine who actually looks younger than me.”

“Just ask your question, Tony. Dancing around it isn't getting you any more answers than you already had.”

“Well congratulations, this is about as speechless as I’m ever going to get because I don’t even know what to ask to start us off.” After a pause. “I don’t suppose you slept with my father and this Jason Grimm is your son? Because I’ve got to say, if he was going to tap any of the nannies, you were the hottest.”

At her unimpressed look he went on, “Alright, that’s a no.” He let out a huff as he looked her up and down, “Who are you exactly? Because you can bet as soon as I saw you here, I started a search. I can be pretty persistent so if I look deep enough what am I going to find?”

Marina's lips quirked, as she insisted, “Nothing . . . you'll find absolutely nothing that I don't want you to find. Your father made sure of that a long time ago.”

“I like the confidence. Though, that was a little hurtful. You know I’m a genius right?” Tony could tell she was amused by his stream of consciousness rambling, seeing as she only chuckled while he attempted to sort out his thoughts into coherent questions. Straightening his shoulders, he frowned and insisted, “Alright, so maybe you’re right and I can’t find anything; either way, it doesn’t sound like you want any attention drawn to whatever the hell this thing is. So why don’t we have a pleasant conversation? No fuss, no muss. Just two old - in your case not as old as you should be - friends talking."

A voice rumbled behind the man then, asking, “Is it possible for him to be any more like his father?”

“Not even a little bit,” Marina laughed, looking up as a man came to her side, lifting her chin for his kiss. “Allo Mishka. Did you and Samny have a good talk?”

“Very good,” Will smiled as he pulled away from Marina and turned his attention back to Tony, who was looking from Will to Jason, who was laughing at his two best friends from his place beside Casey on the other side of the room. Will could see the moment when he noticed Clint and Aaron, laughing and drinking with their partners two tables over, his eyes widening a fraction more.

Tony downed the glass of wine in one motion. “ Seriously, ” he said, turning back to them, “ I need some answers because there is no way I’m going to let this go now.”

“Your father hid us,” Will replied in lieu of an answer. “Of the five of us, Jay was his favorite.”

Tony’s smile became somewhat strained, “Of course he was. Hid you from what?”

Marina shook her head, “Hold that thought. Jason! sladkiy, can you come here please?”

Jason twisted to look back at her before nodding. He turned back to his bride, murmuring something to her, before coming over to the small group. Leaning over, he kissed her cheek, “Thank you for the food, Marishka; everything looks and smells amazing.”

Marina cupped his cheek fondly, before turning him to face Tony. “Jay, I’d like to reintroduce you to someone . . . this is Tony Stark . . . Howard's son. You two used to play together, when Howard would bring him to the circus.”

The fake smile dropped from Tony’s face and was replaced by surprise and confusion, “Wait, what?” His gaze swept over the Grimms again. “You were...that little circus he kept going to see? He hid you there?” Tony looked thoughtful. “I always thought that one was an odd choice for him. A bit small and out of the way.”

“He didn't hide us there . . . but he kept us hidden while we were there. Your father . . . he kept my brothers safe and I owe him a debt,” Will explained calmly, fingers sifting through Marina's curls. “A debt I can only repay to his son.”

Tony held up his hands, “Hey, woah, that’s not why I’m here. I don’t want anything from you . . . besides some answers.”

The Russian woman giggled as she announced, “Actually, Tony has something for Jason . . . a long belated gift from Howard.”

Jason’s eyes narrowed and his head tilted, his longstanding tendency towards curiosity winning out as he frowned, “What? What kind of gift?”

“It seems that back in the day, dear old Dad set up a college fund for you. And while you’re never too young to learn, college may not be what you would want to use it for now, so we’ll just call it a wedding gift. Mazel tov! I’ll have it transferred to any account you want.”

Ivy green eyes blinked, clearly startled at the announcement. His tone was curious and awed and hushed as he continued, “Wait . . . Howard left me a trust fund? Are you . . . you’re kidding me, right!? I was just . . . he felt guilty for what he let happen to us, but we weren’t . . . we weren’t his kids. I wasn’t his kid. Bozhe moi, he liked Marina a hell of a lot more than he liked anyone else, because she was the only one who would kick his ass at the same time she was trying to take care of him.”

There was a fierce frown on Will’s lips as he insisted, “Jay, you know he loved you. You know he did.”

“Well yeah, but he did feel guilty . . . right?”

“Doesn’t change the fact that he loved you . . . or that he wanted you in particular to be happy.”

“In particular?” Tony repeated, then gave Jason a look over, “What makes you so special, J Man?”

Jason flinched hard, shoulders shuddering, “Geez, could you sound any more like your dad? He used to call me that.”

Marina reached out and touched her boy’s shoulder, before turning to Tony once again. “Jason is a brilliant engineer and inventor . . . Howard taught him as much as he could before he died.” Smiling sadly, she continued, “More than a few of Jason’s random toys have saved our lives over the years.”

“Huh,” Tony frowned, “I remember you now. You had all those boxes from the junkyard.”

“Your dad . . . he used to bring me stuff. Old tools or debunked projects or just . . . stuff.” Biting down on his lower lip, Jason’s eyes were sad and serious as he locked eyes with Tony, “I mourned him, when he died. I wanted to go to the funeral . . . but it wasn’t safe, so I couldn’t go. But . . . he was always nice to me, even though he didn’t have to be.”

Tony took a moment to reply, “Sounds like a nice guy. It would have been nice to meet him. Engineering huh? You sure you’re not his kid too?”

“If I am, then I’d like to know why I look so much like my dad . . . and engineering was a,” here Jason paused, looking uncomfortable, “. . . let’s just say, I didn’t choose it; I’m just good at it.”

Will and Marina both snorted hard, Marina’s hot chocolate eyes rolling hard at the statement. “More than good at it, sladkiy. And it may have been chosen for you, but you love it.”

“I’ve got to agree there. For exceptional life saving creations, you’ve got to have a passion to go along with skill.”

Jason’s cheeks turned rosy, before a call of his name came from behind them. Twisting, he waved a hand in response, before turning back to Tony. “Come on . . . it’s my wedding day, and if you’re going to be here, you might as well have fun, right?”

Tony raised an eyebrow, “What did you have in mind?”

“My friends are here from California. We’re going to get stupid drunk and do stupid shit. And trust me when I say, my wife? Will drink even you under a table. So . . . you in?”

Marina sighed, as she leaned against Will, muttering under her breath, “This is going to be fantastic.”

The Colonel snickered, as he watched Tony stare at Jason in surprise and confusion. “What’s wrong, Stark? Cat got your tongue?”

Tony recovered quickly, a more genuine smile turning his lips, “If you wanted to get crazy you should have invited me to the bachelor party, but I accept your challenge. Believe it or not, this is not the first time I’ve gotten into a drinking contest with a bride on her wedding day. First time its happened after the actual ceremony, though, so we’ll see how it goes.”

Jason’s eyes rolled as he snarked, “I didn’t HAVE a bachelor party. Two of my groomsmen didn’t get here until ten minutes before the ceremony was supposed to start. And the other one of my best friends wasn’t going to get here until the reception . . . and is, in fact, still NOT here. This is my bachelor party, and my wedding party, all rolled up in one.”

“I can get a stripper here in twenty minutes, just say the word. Or just the pole. Either way Beatrice would hate it and we’d have a blast. And since I can’t see you winning that woman over anytime soon, why not?”

“Jason Leonard . . .” Marina warned, tone glacial as she gave him a firm frown.

The tech’s eyes were wide and innocent as he turned to face the Russian, asking sweetly, “What? I didn’t do anything!?”

“Mhmm . . . but you were thinking it,” she scolded, seconds before arms came around Jason’s waist and the younger man was lifted clear off his feet to the accompaniment of a barbarian yell.

“Jason Grimm . . . you slippery bastard!” came the cheer from an all but sparkling Adam Park.

“Adam!” Jason laughed, managing to wiggle free and throw his arms around the shorter man. “You made it!”

“Fucking everything,” Adam snarked with a roll of his eyes, before slapping Jason’s shoulders in a fond hug. “Sorry I’m late . . . I got here as fast as I could, I promise.”

“At least you’re here, dude. That’s all that matters to me.” Turning slightly, he gestured to Tony as he insisted, “Adam, I’d like you to meet a new friend, Tony Stark. Tony, this is an old friend, Adam Park. Adam is awesome . . . and I’m frankly a little worried about introducing him to Casey; they both have proven amazingly adept at smothering me to protect me.”

“If you weren’t such an absent minded inventor, we wouldn’t have to protect you from yourself,” Adam scoffed with a grin, before cocking an eyebrow at Tony. “Tony Stark huh? Any chance of getting some real action up in here? Crazy music, epic alcohol . . . an exotic dancer or two? From what I hear, Jay’s monster-in-law could use a little lightening up.”

Tony glanced over at Marina, grimacing at the murderous look on her face, before shaking his head. “No, you see that look right there? That look used to mean I was in major trouble growing up . . . the kind of trouble where I didn’t sit down for two weeks. I think I’ll pass.” Shrugging, he beamed as he joked, “Besides, I’m told it is possible to have fun without strippers. Never had any myself, but it’s always fun to try something new.”

There was a distinct twitch in the corner of the Colonel’s mouth, though he said nothing as Marina threw her hands up in frustration. “Idiocy,” she muttered, before storming away.

“Damn, I hate to see her go, but I love to watch her leave,” the eldest Grimm joked, before turning to clasp Tony on the shoulder. “Welcome to the family . . . go have some fun,” he insisted, before striding away in her wake.

Jason’s arm slung around an awestruck Tony’s neck, as he laughed outright. “You heard the boss. Let’s go have some fun.”

“Wait . . . family?” Tony asked meekly, twisting to look back at the Colonel as he disappeared from “Yeah . . . we may be crazy science experiments, but we’ve always been family first.”

“Later, you’re going to have to explain that statement. But for now let’s enjoy the open bar.”

Jason locked his arm around Tony’s neck and bent him in half, rubbing his knuckles briskly across the top of his head. “Good plan!”
Enjoy these chapters my darlings!! I can't wait to hear what you think. And this is the last chapter of this storyline. Next chapter is going to be an all new storyline; starring our dearly beloved Brian!

Let me know what you think! No translations this time. Until next time!
Chapter 250: To New Beginnings

“You know, Billy, you never did tell me where you disappeared to for all those years.”

Noting the way Adam and Tommy suddenly started paying more attention to the conversation, Jason sensed confirmation on what he had always suspected; the genius’ absence had something to with their extra special extra curricular activities in high school.

“Pretty sure I did.”

“Traveling to ‘find yourself’ was vague. And not really an answer in the first place.”

“I didn’t say that,” Billy protested with wide eyes and a frown.

“You might as well have,” the tech teased with a grin, “And anyway, it must have been a hell of a spirit quest or something, man. What with all the patents you’ve been applying for. Every time I talk to you, you’re working on another one.”

The young genius snorted as he replied, “And how many do you have approved now? I think it’s like twenty, the last time I checked?”

Jason’s cheeks blazed, heat searing through him as he blushed. “That’s because of my work with S.H.I.E.L.D. Otherwise I would probably still be a detective, and still wallowing in the kind of crazy bullshit my department specialized in.”

Tommy smirked as he took a drink of his beer, as Adam laughed out loud. “Speaking of . . . how the fuck did that happen? Last I heard, you were joining your brother in the Army and you were probably going to die there . . . or so you claimed.”

Jason grunted, staring down at the shot of whiskey before him. “Her name was Sarah . . . I don’t want to talk about it,” he snarled, before tossing back the shot like water, barely wincing at the burn down his throat.

“Fair enough,” Tommy said, holding up his hands.

“We’ve all got someone we don't want to talk about,” Billy reasoned.

“Yeah,” Adam agreed with a frown.

“Since I’ve never seen you in a long term relationship, Adam, I really want to ask you about that, but I'm not going double standard you, so how about a toast to silence?”

“I'll drink to that,” Adam said, knocking back a shot.

“Speaking of exes,” Tommy began.

“I knew it!” Adam moaned. “Never talk about exes around Tommy.”

Tommy’s eyes went wide in horrified protest, arguing, “Come on, Adam, I am not that bad!”

There was an indulgent huff as the shorter man snarked fondly, “You talk about her every time I see you!"

Billy nodded. “But to be fair we don’t actually see each other all that much.”

“At least Billy’s got my back.”

Billy smiled at his old friend, tone fond and gentle as he replied, “I still agree with Adam.”

Tommy’s eyes rolled as he muttered, “Traitor.”

Waving a hand magnanimously, Adam announced, “All right, let’s hear it. What new ‘Kimberly’ thought are you having now?”

“You guys are jerks.”

“And your point?” Jason laughed with a grin and a wink. “We’ve known each other for how long? You’d think you’d know that already.”

“You’d think.” Tommy sighed, “I could have sworn that I saw her before the ceremony started today.”

A single eyebrow cocked upwards, even as Billy and Adam both gawked at him. Finally, Adam spoke up, “Tommy . . . come on, man. Be serious. You have to know you didn’t see her, right?”

“None of us have seen her since she left in high school,” Billy reminded him. “That letter was last we ever heard from her.”

Tommy scowled into his beer. “I know that, Billy . . . I just . . . I saw her okay? I would recognize her face anywhere. She looked right at me; someone walked between us and suddenly she was gone.”

Jason sighed heavily as he reminded his friend carefully, “It is a wedding. And we all know she’s ‘The One Who Got Away’. Maybe you were just feeling nostalgic? Imagined her where you wanted her to be?”

“Maybe,” was the reluctant agreement, those eyes staring into his beer with a frown. It was clear from the sadness in his face, he had not wanted to consider the possibility he’d imagined her, even as he accepted it for the truth it was. “Actually, probably.”

Jason twisted slightly and smiled to see Tony watching the four men with wide eyes. It was clear that this was a level of familiarity between friends that Tony had rarely witnessed before. Not that the friendship between Tony Stark and Colonel James Rhodes wasn’t one for the history books. Jason was pretty sure that relationship was one of frustration and insanity and more than a few migraines. But, the tech specialist rarely heard about Rhodes in the articles that dictated some of Stark’s more . . . wild and drunken adventures. It was a fair bet that, despite the closeness between the two men, the concept of just sitting and drinking together was a foreign one.

Reaching out with an elbow, the younger tech nudged the other man. “We don’t bite, Tony. You can chime in.”

“I don’t have exes . . . at least not like the rest of you. Most of mine lasted a single evening, and I couldn’t remember their names the next morning,” Tony replied, tone matter of fact and almost blasé.
Jason cocked an eyebrow, as Billy blinked. “Well . . . that sounds lonely.”

Green eyes glittered as Jason hummed in careful agreement. “Very lonely, actually.” After a moment, he frowned. “Wait a minute . . . I thought you were dating your CEO? Pepper Potts?”

“Ah, my Pepper . . . she is definitely my better half,” the man who was not-so-secretly Iron Man replied with a grin. “She runs circles around me. Deserves better, to be frank, but I’m not going to be the one to tell her that.”

“Who would dare to say anything of the kind? From what I can tell, Pepper Potts is not someone you argue with. She’d probably turn your guts into garters and enjoy every second of your agony,” Adam snarked, grinning into the edge of his glass as he tossed back a shot of expensive tequila. “Damn . . . that is good stuff.”

“It had better be, considering the price,” Jason laughed with a grin. “Never let it be said that Marina allowed my brother to spare any expense for this or any family wedding that has ever come before this.” Smirking, he caught sight of two heads of sunny hair moving through the crowd towards them. “Hell, even Sammy’s wedding was a big deal, small as it was.”

“Sammy?” Tommy asked, head cocking curiously, before Adam spoke up next, “Who the hell is Sammy?”

Ice blue eyes were dark and assessing as the elder of Jason’s nephews spoke, “I am.”

“Guys, my nephews, Sam and Rene Grimm. Sammy . . . Rene, these are three of my oldest friends; Tommy Oliver, Billy Cranston and Adam Park,” the tech laughed, introducing the two groups to each other. “And a new friend, Tony Stark . . . who is apparently an old charge of your mom’s.”

Sam’s eyes practically glowed in the meager light as they swept across the group. “Nice to meet you.”

Rene rolled his eyes, before insisting, “Uncle Jay, Aunt Casey is looking for you. It’s almost time for the First Dance . . . she’s arguing with the DJ about the song.”

Jason frowned at the information, tone heavy as he spoke, “I was pretty sure the DJ wasn’t playing our song . . . Casey asked Marina to sing it forever ago.”

“Hence the argument,” Sam agreed with a small, sad smile.

Taking a moment to watch the older of the two brothers, Jason took Sam in from head to toe. Though he was clearly still upset that Jules had begged off the wedding, there was also a lightness about him that his uncle had never seen before. He held his shoulders straighter . . . his head higher, as though some terrible weight had lifted from him and left his body feeling lighter as a whole. “You good, Sam?”

“Yeah, Uncle Jay . . . Dad and I talked. It’s good.” Here there was a pause, before Sam continued in a firm, insistent tone, “I’m good.”

His oldest friends exchanged telling looks between them, before Billy blurted, “Wait . . . whose son are you? Because you are too old to belong to any of the brothers I knew back in high school.”

-A sly smirk crossed Sam’s lips as he replied shortly, “I’m adopted. Will and Marina are my parents.”
The three turned to face Jason, demanding together, “Will has kids!?”

“Four, in fact,” Jason laughed, smirking at the flabbergasted look on their faces. It was a much talked about conversation during their high school days, that Will was married to the Army and that children were not in his future. Seeing his friends readjust their worldviews was fucking hilarious.

“That’s . . . not possible. Four!” Tommy demanded with wide eyes, Adam tossing back a shot of whiskey like water as he struggled to come to terms.

“Well, Sam and Rene are both adopted, so that’s two,” Jason replied with a grin, before gesturing towards where Will and Marina were cuddling their daughters at another table, “But then there’s the twins, who are six months old now. Yekaterina and Valentina . . . Katenka and Valya for short.”

Leaning forward on the knuckles of his hands, the paleontologist swept the room with his eyes, taking in the entire crowd. It was clear which of the group was from Casey’s side of their newly melded family - none of the Grimms he’d ever known had ever been that snobbish or pretentious - and which was from Jason’s side, and it was to his side that Tommy’s eyes clung. “Damn Jason . . . your family is huge.”

Sam snickered at the statement, even as Jason burst into laughter. “Ma has a habit of adopting people into her orbit, whether they realized they wanted to be there or not.” Mouth twisting lightly, the blond sighed, “I think the only person Ma hasn’t been able to get a permanent hold on is Jules . . . and that’s more because of the fact Ma hates her guts than anything.”

“Who’s Jules?”

“My wife,” Sam replied, before a brilliant grin split his face, “My very pregnant wife.”

Tommy sighed, knocking back a shot as he sighed, “Damn, I’m getting old. Even the babies of the world are married.”

Sam scoffed out a laugh as Rene protested indignantly, “Sam’s twenty-eight years old! I doubt you’re that much older than he is.”

Adam chuckled, with a shake of his head. “Nope . . . only about six years actually. And Tommy’s always been kind of an old man, so you have our permission to ignore him.”

“Easy Squirt . . . save your energy for a more noble cause,” Sam teased, locking one arm around his little brother’s neck and rubbing his knuckles over his sunny hair fondly.

Rene squawked, struggling futilely against the noogie. “Damn it, Sam, let go!” he grunted. “One day I’m going to be taller than you . . .”

“. . . and you’re still going to be ‘Squirt’. I’d suggest you get used to it,” the sniper laughed in easy agreement.

“Revenge is going to be a sweet thing.”

“It usually is,” the older brother chuckled, before twisted to look over as Samonik slunk over to join the two. “Hey Samonik. You find your brother?”

“Yeah . . . he’s flirting with . . .” here the taller teenager paused, as he thought, “Casey’s cousin? I think she’s Casey’s cousin. I decided to be somewhere else, because there’s only so much of my brother’s schmoozing I need to see in a lifetime. And I am getting drastically close to that limit already.”
Rene smirked up at his friend as he insisted slyly, “You need to give Sammy a noogie.”

“So he can smash me into the floor? I don’t think so,” the teen argued lightly with a soft chuckle. “And if you think that you’re ever going to be tall enough to be able to beat your brother out like that, I would like to advise you now, you’re wrong. Dean’s shorter than me, and he still beats me 10 times in every 11.”

Adam chuckled, amused by the interplay between the two teenagers, as Samonik subtly began to steer Rene away from the adults and towards the banquet table for food. “Who’s that?”

“Sam Winchester . . . one of Will and Marina’s foster kids. His brother Dean is apparently around here somewhere, flirting with Sarah Shraeger and no doubt loving every second of it.” Cackling Jason joked, “And when she turns him inside out and upside down, I am going to laugh like a crazy person. Sarah is not a woman for the faint of heart . . . or the seductive by nature.” His tone dropped into a conspiratorial whisper, “She’s scary.”

The other five people at the table laughed at the faux terror in his tone, before talk devolved into the kind of mundane things that happened when people had seen each other for awhile. Tommy was thrilled with his teaching career; three of his students, in particular, seemed to have made an impression on him. (For awhile it was all, Kyra this, and Connor that and Ethan this. It was cute . . . and earned him more than a little teasing from his long time friends.) Billy was self employed, busy building his crazy inventions and clearly suffering from a lack of human companionship. Which, admittedly, wasn’t that different from normal, but he was definitely in need of some company while he spent so much of his time geeking out.

As for Adam . . . Adam was miserable. The dojo he worked for as a sensei was a joke. The kids didn’t care, and the Master was a lazy ass, and the pay sucked. But, it was martial arts work, which is what Adam had always wanted to do.

Finally, Jason frowned and solidified the thought he’d been playing with since his friends had arrived at his wedding. “Hey, you know . . . I’ve been thinking.”

“Historically, never a good thing. You and Billy tend to blow stuff up when you do that,” Adam joked with a grin and a wink.

“Shut up, Park,” the two nerds snapped in concert, before Jason continued, “It would be nice to have my friends around more permanently. So, you know, if you guys needed a change of pace . . .”
Family Matters

Chapter Notes

So this is the last chapter to this behemoth. Ths next chapter will be the first chapter of the next. XD I am still planning to slice this into smaller sections, so keep your eyes open for that too!!

Let me know what you think. I love to hear your thoughts and I can't wait to hear them!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 251: Family Matters

Sam didn’t know how Jules did it. His Ma, he could understand how she got right back into the swing of things at work; she was enhanced. But here it was only three months after the delivery and Jules was already back at work, minimal as it was, it was still more than most women could handle. She was insistent though. Said she was going crazy being stuck at the house.
So here he was.

Sam looked around at the kitchen, purposely ignoring the dishes in the sink; he could tackle those last . . . even as Marina’s well-trained son felt a twinge of guilt for the thought. Still, what his mother didn’t know . . . maybe wouldn’t hurt him. Puttering around at other tasks in the kitchen, he kept one ear open for Sadie’s cry and reflected on the last few months. Sam loved his job with the SRU, he did; however, there was no world in which he’d complain about the opportunity to spend more time with his Sadie Bug. A Sadie Bug who was finally back asleep for the moment, content and with a full stomach. Luckily Jules had stocked the fridge with all the breast milk they would need for the day.

Knowing Jules’ desire to head back to work as soon as possible, the newlyweds had stocked up on all of the necessities. Of course, even if they hadn’t his Ma had brought enough to stock a daycare. They had only stayed at the hospital only as long as needed, but one call from Sam and Marina had commandeered a jet. She’d later lamented to her laughing son that she should have had the forethought to take a helicopter, nevermind that she wouldn’t have been permitted to actually use the hospital’s helipad. Sam smiled remembering the first time she had held Sadie at the hospital.

Flashback

July 10, 2010

Sam was cradling his miracle in his arms, while Jules slept in the bed behind them. She’d fought hard to bring their daughter into the world for hours . . . she deserved the rest. Which was just as well; his mother and father were on their way, and Jules’ silent animosity was the last thing Sam wanted to be dealing with. Closing his eyes over the downy softness of her head, Sam recalled the conversation he’d had with his father the month before and forced himself to calm. He was doing everything he could to make their marriage happy for them both . . . he had no control over Jules’ own behaviors. Or her feelings.

Just then the door eased open and Will Grimm appeared in the doorframe, a warm smile on his face at the sight of his son. “Sam . . .” he greeted in a whisper, arm firmly around his partner’s shoulders as the Russian all but vibrated at his side.

Ice blue eyes were warm and adoring as they lifted to look at his parents. It wasn’t hard to see the impatience in Marina’s frame, every part of her thrilled to meet this first of the new generation . . . her first grandchild. Grinning at the Russian, Sam offered, “Ma . . . come meet your granddaughter.”

Marina lunged forward at the invitation, eyes wide and adoring as the two adults transferred the infant between them. Sadie, fast asleep and comfortable in her swaddling, made a soft sound before settling against the new heartbeat happily. There was a piercing kind of joy in those hot chocolate eyes as his Ma stared down into the cherubic face. “Oh Sammy-honey . . . she’s so beautiful.”

“Sadie Marina Grimm,” Sam replied with a soft smile, watching his father come up behind his mother and peer down at the child over her shoulder. “Maybe it’ll become a tradition.”

Will’s face twisted at the idea of his daughters becoming parents, before he chuckled softly in agreement. “Maybe.” Glancing toward the bed, Will asked quietly, “How is Jules?”

“Tired . . . doctors said it was an easy labor, all things considered, but it was still almost eight hours. She’s been sleeping for about an hour.”

Marina’s fingers were warm and familiar on his cheek as she reached to stroke his face, no doubt tracing the dark circles under his eyes. “You should have called us sooner, Sammy. You look exhausted."

"Worth it," he agreed with a tired grin and a small yawn. "I didn’t want her to be alone."

Will and Marina exchanged a look, the Russian nodding sharply in agreement with whatever conclusion her lover conveyed, before the Colonel moved to his side. Taking his bicep in a firm grip,
Will levered his son to his feet and shuffled him over to the cot in the corner. "Be that as it may, Baba i Deda are here now so she won’t be alone. You need some sleep."

"Dad . . . I’m fine."

"That is not a word, Sammichka," Will scolded fondly, running his palm over the sunny strands, before tipping him over and guiding him firmly under the covers of the cot. "You need rest . . . Sadie and Jules will need you to be in top form once they wake, da?"

Sam’s exhaustion was clear, when his answer was a quiet, ‘Oui’ instead of “Yes.” Even Sam knew that when his native québécois French slipped free instead of his more common English, it was time for him to get some sleep.

“All right then. Rest . . . Sadie will be perfectly safe with us,” the Colonel vowed, taking a precarious seat on the edge of the cot next to Sam, one hand coming up to smooth over Sam’s back and shoulders in a fond caress.

In his own defense, he did try to fight it . . . but then Marina started singing his lullaby to his slumbering child, and Sam was lost. The rhythmic motion of his mother’s body as she swayed back and forth was hypnotizing and he fought to keep his eyes open as it lulled him into safety. At last,
Sam fell asleep to the sound of her voice, his father’s hand warm and soothing as it smoothed up and down the curve of his spine and dragging him further down. The last thought he had was . . .
“Thank you for coming.”

“We would never have been anywhere else,” Will promised in a hushed murmur. “Sleep.”

“Sing me a song of a lass that is gone,
Say, could that lass be I?
Merry of soul, she sailed on a day . . .
Over the sea, to Skye.”

End Flashback

Sam was sweeping every inch of that floor, fully aware that it was the last thing he could reasonably do before it was finally the dishes’ turn. He moved the trash bin to get behind it when he saw the small folded piece of paper tugged into the corner. Unfolding it, he realized it was a receipt from the week before when Grant Ward had showed up out of the blue and had insisted on taking him out to lunch. Grant must have tossed it and missed. Sam was about to throw it away, however, one detail nagged at him. It was a small thing but the receipt was folded not crumpled up like trash. Tapping the slip against his fingers, he considered his memories of that day and vaguely remembered Grant folding it again and again as they walked around town, a giggling Sadie with them. It was a nervous habit Sam had found odd to see the agent get lost in.

The whole meeting had been odd, if Sam wasn’t putting too fine a point on it. Grant had been . . .
weird . . .

Which wasn’t to say that Grant wasn’t usually some level of awkward, but this was out of the norm, even for him. Fiddling with the page in his hands, Sam frowned as he considered that day.
Flashback

Sam Grimm laid out on the bed, ostensibly to get a short nap while his three month old daughter was resting. However, he couldn’t seem to close his eyes; not when there was a literal miracle lying in her cradle beside the bed, less than arm’s reach away. It never ceased to fill him with awe that she was his . . . a child he shared with Jules, his wife. Fifteen years ago, he would never have believed such a thing to be possible.

Of course, then the doorbell rang, sharp and shrill through the house. Sam lunged off the bed, rushing to get to the door before the sound woke Sadie. Granted, she was due to wake up soon, but even a few extra minutes would give her father the chance to get rid of any unwanted visitors . . .

. . . which this one was not, seeing as Sam pulled open the door to see Grant Ward fidgeting on the doorstep. The blond jerked in surprise, head tilting as he took in the frazzled frame of his friend. “Grant?”

Grant’s smile was awkward and lopsided as he tugged on the strap of the rucksack over his shoulder. “Hey Sam.”

“Not that I’m not happy to see you, man, but what are you doing here?” the constable asked, hands finding a home in his pockets as ice blue eyes scanned over his friend. “You okay?”

“Yeah . . . I just. I got off an assignment and my plane is laid over in Toronto until tomorrow afternoon, so I thought I’d swing by,” he explained sheepishly. His shoulders scrunched up to his ears self-consciously as he asked, “Is that okay? I mean, I can go find a hotel . . . you know what, this was a stupid idea. I’m sorry.”

“Hey, dude, chill,” Sam ordered, reaching out to grab Grant’s elbow and swing him back from where he’d started to turn away. “I just wasn’t expecting to see you. And come on, a hotel? I have an entire house that’s empty . . . you know you’re more than welcome to stay at Ma and Dad’s house in the city.”

“I don’t want to put anyone out.”

“You’re not. Ma and Dad aren’t here this week, and I’m not living there right now. You’ll need to order something for dinner tonight, but otherwise, have at. Okay?” the older man asked, trying to soothe the almost manic fidgeting. “Dude . . . what is up with you?”

“Nothing.”

“Liar,” Sam argued, eyes narrowing. “You can’t stand still . . . you’re freaking me out.”

“I just . . . lunch?” Grant mumbled hastily before taking a calming breath and trying again “I was thinking we could go out and have lunch? My treat . . . you know to catch up?”

Sam glanced back over his shoulder, before shrugging. “I have Sadie. So yeah, as long as you don’t mind trucking around a three month old with us. She’s a good baby . . . barely ever cries.”

Grant released a sudden sigh as his shoulders fell down from his ears and he relaxed, a smile curving his lips as he nodded, “I don’t mind, not one bit. Marina can’t stop talking about your little girl.”

The blond chuckled as he stepped back into the house and waved Grant inside. “Yeah, I’ll bet. Ma is a very doting Baba.” Lowering his voice conspiratorially, he snarked, “But I think Dad has her beat. He’s a sucker for the kiddos in the family.”
“Until he comes to the realization that his beloved little girls are eventually going to grow up and start dating . . . then have kids of their own,” Grant shot back with a chuckle. “Then your dad has a tendency to go a little pale.”

A wicked smirk curved the constable’s face as he chuckled. “Fortunately, Dad has awhile before he has to worry about that . . . maybe. Every time Vika and Phil bring over Yasha, my sister Valya is utterly smitten.”

“Sounds like your dad is doomed,” Grant said with a shake of his head. “From what I hear puppy love is the hardest to shake.”

A soft cry rang through the house and Sam whirled, instantly pulled like a moth to flame. “And that’s the Bug.” Gesturing towards the couch, the older agent insisted, “Take a seat, man. Let me get her ready to go, then we’ll be on our way. Okay?”

“No rush, I got nowhere to be.” Grant replied even as he headed for the couch. Stowing his bag out of the walkway, he settled on the couch mildly relieved that Sam had his baby daughter for the day.

It was about a half an hour, filled with a baby’s soft coos and the adoring hum of Sam’s voice, before Sam came out into the living room, a three month old little girl cradled in the curve of his arm. She had a tuft of perfectly blond hair on her head, and was dressed in an adorable footie onesie that said, “What happens at Grandma’s, Stays at Grandma’s.” She was chewing contently on a purple teether, little feet kicking happily. Over Sam’s other shoulder was the baby’s diaper bag, a dark brown leather bag with a patch of Winnie the Pooh stitched on the front flap. “All right . . . I’m ready. You?”

“Yes. You need me to carry anything?” Grant offered as he pushed himself up off the couch, eyes stuck staring at the small person residing in his friend’s arms.

Sam smiled, as he watched Grant’s fascination with his daughter. “You wanna hold her?”

“No . . . no, I might break her,” the specialist replied, horrified at the idea that he could harm the baby.

“She’s tougher than she looks, I promise,” Sam chuckled, reaching out to clasp his friend’s shoulder. “When we get to the restaurant, and you’re sitting down, you can. She’d love to get to know one of Daddy’s friends . . .” there was a soft sigh as Sam looked down at his daughter, before continuing sadly, “. . . Daddy doesn’t have many to introduce her to.”

“Unfortunately, you’re stuck with me. I’m in the same boat man, so I am definitely not giving up one of the few friends I have.” Grant replied as he lifted a hand to squeeze Sam’s shoulder.

Sam’s smile was a little more genuine as he nodded once. “Glad to hear it. Come on . . . we’ll take my car. I have the carseat installed already.”

Awhile later, Sam pulled up outside of a nice cafe near the house he shared with Jules. “This okay? Their lunch menu is pretty good, and they’re pretty fairly priced too.”

“Hey you know me, I’m not fussed. Nothing compares to your Ma’s cooking but food’s food.” Grant slid easily from the car and waited for Sam to collect the baby.

“Don’t ever let Ma hear you say that,” Sam laughed, pulled Sadie free with a cheerful coo. “Hello my little Bug . . . you ready for some lunch? Yeah? Come on, pretty girl, let’s go get lunch . . .”

Looking up at his friend, Sam continued on his previous thought. “Ma’s cooking is the best, but she would be horrified to hear you say that any food is as good as another . . . even as I know exactly where you’re coming from.” There was a sly wink as the constable teased, “That’s when Ma starts pestering up a storm, to try to find out the food you like best. And God help you, if you can’t think of one on your own, because then she goes through the cookbook to find something you enjoy.”

“You’ll note I said nothing compares to your ma’s cooking. Every food other than Marina’s is all the same.” Grant grinned as he nudged Sam carefully. “Thankfully, Marina has been too busy doting about her grandbaby to realize she hasn’t started that process on me yet.”

“Give it time. Soon as she’s no longer fussing at the new grandbaby, and my sisters, she’ll be on you like syrup on hotcakes.”

“Like I’ll complain about that? I’d rather be over stuffed with your Ma’s cooking than survive on the cafeteria food on base.”

The face Sam made in response to that statement was eloquent enough about his own opinion of the cafeteria food at S.H.I.E.L.D., even without the disgusted, “Blech!” that followed it. “Amen to that. And we can’t even blame Uncle Jason for that . . . he’s not allowed near the mess hall stoves.”

“Not entirely sure I’ve ever heard the reason as to why your Uncle is banned from Marina’s kitchen and not allowed to set foot in any other kitchen.”

“Two words; spaghetti-os and M&Ms.”

“That’s just wrong man. Who could ever desecrate M&M’s like that?” Grant asked even as his face contorted at the visual of the dish in question.

“And now you know,” the blond chuckled, waiting for Grant to take his seat. “All right, crook your elbow, 45 degree angle is fine.”

Doing as instructed Grant locked his body into place; the last thing he wanted to do was drop Sam’s beloved daughter. Marina would literally bend him over her knee and tan his hide if he was the cause of harm to her only grandbaby.

Sam laughed, nudging him lightly. “Loosen up, man. She's a baby, not a bomb. Relax . . . I trust you. You're not going to drop her, okay?”

“Actually she’s more like a hand grenade and Marina is holding the cord attached to the pin.” Grant teased as he tried to relax enough for Sam’s liking. “Your Ma is kinda scary remember.”

“Dude, preaching to the choir.” Sam’s fingers were gentle and firm as he adjusted Grant's posture, before bending to lower Sadie into his arms. “Watch her head . . . you got her?”

“Yeah, I think so.” Grant answered even as he stared down at the small bundle in his arms. “She’s so tiny!”

“That's because you're so huge,” Sam teased with a laugh, taking his own seat across from them. “She’ll get big fast. She was even smaller when she was born . . . she’s gonna take after Jules, I think. Short and compact.”

“Nothing wrong with that. You’ll just have to let your Ma teach her how to fight using her size and speed.” Grant said with a teasing grin. Lifting his free hand he stroked the soft downy hair with a sense of awe. “Your Ma is right, you make beautiful babies.”

“Pretty sure Jules helped. You wanna tell me what's going on with you?”
“Just needed to see my best friend. Needed to ground myself in something other than S.H.I.E.L.D bullshit for a little while.”

There was suspicion in Sam’s ice blue eyes, but he said nothing. “Well, you know you’re always welcome here.”

“Think we can hold off further questions of anything other than general chit chat until after lunch? I kinda want to just hang and chill with my friend and his baby girl, get a sense of a normal life for a bit.” Grant asked with soft tone as he tapped one finger lightly on Sadie’s nose. “Besides we don’t want corrupt your little munchkin do we?”

“No . . . I want to keep her free of this world for as long as I can.”

“Good plan. Let her keep her innocence for as long as possible.” Grant agreed.

“Amen to that.” Slouching back in his chair, he asked, “So, you found a girlfriend yet?”

Grant felt his cheeks heat at the question and he dipped his head over the infant to try and hide the blush he knew was clearly there. A shake of his head was followed by a quiet “No. Why on earth would any woman want to tie herself to someone who’s barely there?”

Sam chuckled sadly, “Well, as a husband to a wife whose barely there, I’m not sure I’m the best to ask.”

“Yeah but you two are also in similar jobs, so I’m not sure that counts?” Grant said quietly, eyes flicking back up to Sam with a sad smile. “Like your parents. There’s times they’re always together but on occasion they get sent out on different ops.”

Nodding in quiet agreement, the blond promised, “You’ll find someone, Grant. Just . . . give it some time. And in the meantime, nothing saying you can’t find a lover.”

Coughing suddenly at that last statement, sounding as though he had choked on something, Grant shook his head “Let’s not go there, okay? Seriously after my parents, I was kinda fine with being alone. Now, though, after meeting this munchkin . . . I don’t think that’s quite the case anymore.”

“Good . . . everyone needs someone Grant.” Reaching out, Sam folded a hand over his friend’s own and squeezed. “And I don’t know why taking a lover makes you flinch, but just think about it.”

“I just . . . I’ve never . . .” Grant trailed off and sighed “A lover wouldn’t seem right . . . I mean, it’s not really a good time to . . . you know.”

“No, I don’t. But . . . it’s your life, Grant. Far be it from me to tell you how to live it.”

“Think about it Sam. I was sixteen; I went from military school, to juvie, to homeless, to S.H.I.E.L.D. I didn’t exactly have any time, or any place, to be getting it on with someone.”

A single eyebrow winged upwards, before Sam asked in a quiet whisper, “Are you telling me . . . you’re a virgin?”

“That is indeed what I’m telling you.” Grant admitted with a sigh and shake of his head. “After I got out of juvie, I lived alone in the woods with a dog as my only companion. It was just us for five years out there.”

A fierce frowned formed in the crease between Sam’s eyes, as he asked, “What happened to your dog? I’ve never seen you with a dog.”
“He died . . . someone shot him,” Grant said weakly, his tone breaking slightly at the memory of Buddy, his last and only friend before Sam.

Sam winced hard. “Shit Grant. I'm sorry.”

“Not your fault,” Grant replied, before shrugging lightly, “Anyway, I just need some time away from S.H.I.E.L.D. for a little bit. I figured being stuck in Toronto over night was a good time to take the break.”

Sam nodded slowly in unstated understanding, eyes distant as he considered that while lifting his beer bottle to his lips for a sip. After a moment, he shrugged, “Well, Jules is working a double. Team Three’s profiler is sick, and Jules is covering for him. So if you don't mind a baby waking you up at all hours, you're welcome at the house. I wouldn't mind the company.”

“I'm used to running on not much sleep; it's pretty much second nature by now.” Grant admitted as he glanced from Sam to the baby. “If you show me what needs to be done I can maybe help you look after her tonight? Take turns or something so you can get some sleep.”

“You would be my hero,” Sam laughed in agreement. “Sounds good . . . and I'll give you a ride to the airport too. No need to get a taxi, when I can take you for free.”

Chuckling, Grant agreed, “Far be it from me to argue with you, man.”

“Smart kid,” the blond teased, saluting him with his beer, before settling back into his chair and watching Sadie wrap his friend around her tiny pinky finger.

Back at the house later that evening, after the little Bug had been put to bed, Sam introduced Grant to another one of his loves, hockey. Sam chuckled, flipping to a Maple Leafs game, before heading into the kitchen for something to drink. “You want a beer? Water? Anything?” Frowning, he glanced toward the cupboard over the fridge, he announced, “I think I still have some of the whiskey left, that Dad gave me on my wedding day.”

“Whiskey sounds good,” Grant called from the living room, followed by a quiet, “I need a drink,” that the blond figured he probably wasn’t suppose to hear.

Sam called back over his shoulder, “So lunch is over . . . does that mean we can talk about the hard stuff now?”

“The ‘hard stuff’? What do you mean?”

“Whatever’s going on, that you need a drink,” the constable replied, reappearing back in the living room, with two drinks in his hand. Offering one to his friend, he asked, “Come on, man . . . talk to me. I could barely walk today; you were so close, you were nearly stepping on me. You've touched me more today, than I think you've touched anyone ever. I'm your best friend . . . whatever you tell me, doesn't go further than us.”

Grant seemed to be at a loss, “I just…” He blinked a few times, “I wasn’t touching you that much.”

Sam cocked an eyebrow, eyes laser sharp on the other man as he waited for Grant to recount the day and realize how out of character he’d been acting. “Really? You're being weird . . . even weirder than normal, which is a feat in and of itself.”

Grant took a long sip of his drink, then stared off for a moment before turning to Sam, “I'm . . . new to this whole friend thing.”
“Preaching to the choir, kid,” Sam reminded him with a small smile. “So tell me what you need from me to make this easier for you.”

Grant stared at him then looked away shaking his head and chuckling, “Make this easier for me. You’re a good guy Sam. I’m pretty sure I don’t deserve you.”

“Bullshit,” the agent snarked with a roll of his eyes. “Everyone deserves good friends.” Reaching out carefully, Sam laid a hand on Grant’s shoulder and squeezed firmly. "Whatever you need, Grant . . . I’ve got your back.”

Grant smiled back, still looking somewhat uncertain, “I’m just looking for some companionship I guess.”

“Well then, drink your whiskey, kick back and let’s watch some hockey. The Leafs are actually decent this year . . . they may actually make the playoffs,” Sam explained, flopping into the couch - probably sitting a little closer than he usually would be - and slouched against the back. “They’ve gotta get past the Vegas Aces, though . . . and Parson’s an asshole.”

“Speaking a foreign language, Sam.”

“Yeah I know . . .” Sam chuckled, with a lazy shrug. “Let’s just watch the game, huh?”

Nodding in agreement, the two men sat back to watch the hockey game play out. Sam barely flinched as Grant began to list sideways as the night went on, finally passing out around the second intermission, the crown of his head resting against Sam’s shoulder. Resituating himself to the far end of the couch, Sam prodded the taller man into stretching out completely, letting Grant get some uninterrupted sleep for the first time in what was probably forever. Grant’s head rested on Sam’s leg, snuffling a little as he unconsciously snuggled closer in his sleep. The former soldier chuckled, lifting his hand to card his fingers through the dark strands carefully; his Ma did that to everyone, no matter who they were, and it always made the person feel warm and safe. With any luck, it would produce the same feeling for Grant as well.

End Flashback

Grant had jolted awake at some point and panicked, apologizing profusely for falling asleep on him before bolting to the guest room. Knowing the agent’s twitchy nature, Sam had waved the behavior off, even as he’d noted how horrified Grant had seemed by the idea he’d nodded off in front of someone else. The next morning, when Sam had driven him to the airport, Grant had been almost obnoxiously friendly and cheerful, as though trying to make up for what he considered a grievous accident.

Concerned about the agent’s strange behavior, Sam had called his mother. Marina Petrovka had peppered him with questions about her granddaughter for ten minutes before Sam could even get a question in edgewise. At which point, Marina had gone quiet and concerned. At which point, she’d told him something that frankly he should have already known.

Grant Douglas Ward was touch starved. Plain and simple. He’d gone so long without casual affection and meaningless touch, he didn’t know how to react when he received it from someone whose opinion he valued. Combined with having someone like Garrett as a mentor, Grant probably thought he’d f*cked up by accepting the comfort from his friend . . . even if the affection had been offered willingly and while he was unconscious.

Sam grunted as he dumped the contents of the dustbin into the trash, Sam put the broom away in the laundry room. Returning to the kitchen, he glowered at the contents of the sink for a moment, as though that would make the dishes wash themselves, before he rolled up the sleeves of his flannel and dove in. The repetition of the act was mindless, and for a long time he lost himself in the task.

It was the simultaneous scream from his daughter and the shrill screech of his phone that dragged him back into awareness. He snatched up the cell as he moved to the nursery, tucking it into the crook of his shoulder and chin as he bolted for his child. “Grimm,” he grunted, leaning into the crib and lifting the baby clear. “Sssh, little Bug. Daddy’s got you . . . you’re all right, Sadie Bug.”

“Sammy,” came the fond but worried tone from his mother.

“Ma?” he asked, lifting Sadie to his opposite shoulder as he tried to soothe her. “You okay?”

“I hate to do it, since I know you have Sadie right now. But I have to recall you.”

“Your Uncle Brian and Grant went on an assignment together about four days ago. We lost contact almost 24 hours later.” A small, suppressed sob got Sam’s hackles up. “We just received visual confirmation that they’re in the custody of the Latverian oligarchy. Oh honey, I know he’s your friend, and I’m sorry . . . Grant doesn’t look so good. I don’t know if we’re going to be able to make it there in time.”

Chapter End Notes

Oh man, it feels very weird to see it read Completed. But, never fear, the next chapter is coming soon. I promise.

Works inspired by this one

Don’t Believe In Fairy Tales (but I believe in you and me) by Amerou, Grimm Family Photos by Caiti (Caitriona_3), GalahadsGurl, Do Witches Dream in Enchanted Sleep? by Caiti (Caitriona_3), Marta’s Day by Caiti (Caitriona_3), Rise and Rise Again - Until Lambs Become Lions by Caiti (Caitriona_3), GalahadsGurl, Form 319-A: Why one should never anger a Coulson by BairnSidhe, Song of Marina’s Misfits by BairnSidhe

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!