Shino had lingered even past midnight to watch him. In the block of time since Tama had gone home, Shino certainly noticed Sato drink and cope, forgetting his best friend and the Hokage were still nearby. He was a social butterfly and such a disposition would spare him from loneliness, Sato seemed to think.

But Shino knew that neither Sato nor butterflies are really like that.

By the time the festival shut down and the last revelers departed, Sato was drunk among drop-outs walking towards their guest habitations and hotels uptown. Theirs was the same route that Sato would take home, and Shino followed several meters behind them, a respectable berth, and watched.

Close to the building, Shino thought of the phenomenon his mother termed intuition. He felt it stirring. It felt like worry and pity, and maybe also profound empathy he had with his best friend who loves coffee and sweets and photography. His best friend who had died once, and that same friend who always wanted to include him in events while most forgot he ever stood there. But tonight Shino knew that Sato was upset enough to forget him, just this once. And he felt that nagging in the back of his mind, nudging to at least get Sato into the door of his home.

Sai crossed the street and exchanged words with Sato down the road. Shino fell still.

'He will be fine.'

As Sato and the uncivilized neighbor Sai were destined for the same building, all would end well. His father's insect was perched on his shoulder by then, anyway. His parents would still be awake and interested in what he had to say about the celebration. He was wanted and expected.

Shino turned for home under a waxing moon.

A Bit Earlier…

"We're almost there, Lee." Tenten was puffing in exhaustion and seeing double.

"…not quite." Neji informed her, "We missed the turn." He nearly tripped and knocked the whole operation over, but they caught themselves.

She froze and balked at the corner they had passed, "Wha-? I swore we made that right…"

"Your depth perception—"

"Stuff my depth perception, Neji." She hissed from behind her teeth, "Right up your butt. Stuff it and your…your—" She heaved a breath as they luged Lee, limp as a sack of potatoes. "Ugh. This is the longest walk of my life."

"I'm here too."

"Yeah, fine, our lives."

Lee was muttering and vaguely frightened, seeing things.

"Shh, Lee. It'll be alright. You can wash your face, drink some tea, and go to sleep." Tenten consoled him. At the corner, their slow, ungainly walk was then a straight shot down the lane towards Wong Leung's house at the end.

Tenten braced a hand along a building's brick wall as they shuffled.

"Before we arrive," Neji added blearily, "We should discuss the mode of delivery that makes most sense."

"You mean…how to get Lee inside?"

"The door will be locked and Wong Leung will not humor intruders in his house."

"Let's knock and let his Grandpa take him." She gruffed, as if it were so simple.

"And what will he think when he sees us in this state?"

"Who cares?"

"Tenten, he believes in corporal punishment."

"…you actually think Wong Leung will beat us or-?"
"There is a difference between thinking and knowing, and I know him very well now."

"Ffffppffff..." She exhaled furiously, halting, and dropped Lee's right arm, "Then...a Shadow Clone. Yeah. Why didn't I think of this sooner?"

"You're drunk."

"And you're a bad drunk. How are you still logical right now? Never mind." Tenten held a hand sign and produced a single clone, "There. We'll send the bunshin with Lee to the door...then we make our escape."

Neji grunted. Solid plan.

They continued their approach as the Shadow Clone walked ahead of them, swaying.

Tenten noted, "My clone is drunk."

"It is." Neji agreed feebly.

The Shadow Clone ambled sideways, completely disoriented, and then careened into an alleyway. Beyond their line of sight they heard it slam into a garbage can and a cat mer-rowled. The clone dissolved at the impact.

"Fuck it." Tenten declared, slowly marching on.

Neji burped and lurched in a panic, as if he were about to empty the contents of his stomach all over the sidewalk.

"Oh suck it up, Hyuga..."

After an age, and thankfully no puking, they came to the end of the street and ascended the small step in front of the house. Neji suggested they set Lee down, knock on the door, and make a run for it. Tenten refused, "He's our friend, Neji! He would never do something like that to us."

She knocked on the door and they waited there with Lee. Shortly before midnight, the team rocked to and fro pathetically until Wong Leung finally answered.

The old man was in checkered, full-length pajamas and a nightcap. He stood silently in the doorway and assessed them.

To try to smooth things over, Tenten attempted to speak Hanwen in the hope it would diffuse the situation. Honorable Grandpa...

He cast a stern look at her.

Lee ate...an evil pastry...he became very sick at the festival...

Neji was shocked she could manage it while drunk. Granted, he had almost no clue what she was saying.

We wished to make sure...home safe... She slurred her words, Unbuttered. Please forgive partridges.

Wong Leung twitched his nose like a rabbit and then stepped away to allow them entrance.

"See? It's fine." Tenten whispered to Neji. With Lee indoors, the two assisted Wong Leung in maneuvering his grandson into an armchair and Wong gave him a cursory examination before turning to the kitchen.

Worn out, Tenten and Neji sat in the chairs at the kitchen table. Wong brought a bowl of congee to his grandson, fitted a spoon in his hand, and then affectionately patted Lee’s head as the boy apologized tearily to his grandfather.

Now, now, Lee. The old man said softly, I know that you never do these sorts of things. I made this for supper. Eat it and be well again.

Lee thanked him and tucked into the porridge with sub-par motor functions. Wong ignored the two dozing teens in his chairs and went to a low cupboard, quietly extracting two basins. He moved to the sink and filled both buckets without a word. When both heavy pails of water came to a rest on the tabletop, the rattle hardly disturbed Neji and Tenten.

Until…Wong Leung grabbed the backs of their shirts, one in each fist, and dragged them to their feet.

In their stupor, the two (usually) poised ninja could not resist Wong's powerful motion, in which he cleanly dunked their heads in unison into frigid water. They came up for air, screeching, and then Wong dunked them again. And he repeated the therapy. Angrily.

After about a dozen dips into the icy buckets, Wong released them and began a verbal tirade.

YOU, my grandson's friends and keepers, his MOST treasured people! He shoved Neji and Tenten back into their seats while they sputtered, both hyperventilating, Treat him with greater care! Would Lee have eaten an unsafe pastry if you had not been near him to prevent it? Well?

Soaked, Tenten tried to get her bearings to answer, "W-We…"

"What did he say?" Neji rasped, not daring to wring his hair out onto the man's floor.

"He said that as Lee's friends we should have taken better care to stop something like this from happening to him." Tenten relayed the message and confirmed, "Grandpa, you are right. We should have. I'm sorry that this happened. We were drunk and not paying attention, and then this happened to Lee."

And why is it acceptable for you to be drunk at a festival, young lady? Certainly your honorable parents taught you better.

They did. Tenten commanded Hanwen again, I was with friends. I had fun. My judgement is not always perfect, Grandpa, but please understand…my heart could never bear anything happening to Lee or Neji.

The man sighed and folded his arms behind his back, I know that.

She sniffed, dripping with water and starting to shiver, May we…have something to dry off with?

Absolutely not! The chill will help keep you sober for the walk home. Wong crossed to the door and jarred it open, gesturing, For bringing Lee to me safely, I thank you.

She sighed in defeat and stood, ushering Neji out. Before Wong Leung shut the door behind them, Neji held a hand up to him in a bid for peace.

"I am equally to blame." He insisted, "I must care for Lee too, as my closest friend…I would never stand idly by while he might suffer. Going forward, we will not neglect such a precious responsibility to our friend, Shishou."

Tenten wanted to arch an eyebrow at Neji's deeply respectful title for the man who regularly beat and battered him, but she gawked when Neji took a stab at rough Hanwen he had picked up and correctly uttered, I'm sorry.

Wong Leung nodded, I forgive you, Neji. He shut the door.

Neji turned slowly, letting his own personal disapproval sink in, considering how poorly he had comported himself that night. Tenten caught him by the shoulders and kissed him full on the mouth. He looked at her in surprise.

"That was great!" She grinned at him, setting out in a careful, quivering walk, "I bet you could pick up the language if you tried."

"I already am." He noted, not at all proud of it.

"I think he really appreciated that, and you know Lee will be fine. Congee fixes everything."

"Does it?" Neji chuckled darkly and then glanced at her, "I will walk you home."

"We're close by already. You don't have to—"

"There are certain visitors in this village who would be delighted to find you alone on a street at night, unarmed and weakened." He reminded her, tugging her along, "I insist."

"Alright, but let's face the facts…we're still not quite 100 percent, and in a fight we'd probably end up…" She trembled and wrapped her arms around herself, trying to scurry without falling flat on her face.

Luckily, the two made it to her apartment complex without incident. As Neji was a highly suspicious person, he made sure to accompany her up the three flights of steps and to her door. They would have looked foolish to residents; their upper halves drenched and disheveled, eyes bloodshot, hair sodden and unkempt. Tenten quickly hurried into her home and snapped lights on, ready to find him a towel.

"I don't need anything." Neji maintained.

She returned to the doorway and inspected him, supposing he would keep warm enough on his way back to the Hyuga homestead. "Thanks for coming with me, Neji." Tenten tiredly rested her head against the doorframe, adding, "To the festival. For spending time with all of us, even if the music was louder than you like…and for drinking with me, which you don't normally do." She smiled, "And for walking me home."

"I would again." He said in all seriousness.

"Yeah, but maybe not tomorrow."

He shook his head in the negative.

"Do you…have anything planned for tomorrow? Other than us picking up our outfits for the last fitting, I mean."

Neji examined the tilt of her head and the change of pitch in her voice. Her face was a bit flushed.
"Nothing other than that. Perhaps recovering from…this night."

"Right, well…" She spoke carefully, looking up at him from beneath her lashes, "Would you like to stay here?"

Was she ever bold, even after the trials and tribulations they had survived. Her chest was heaving, her breathing quickened, and Neji did not have to dwell long on the thought to know what exactly Tenten wished to do if he consented.

"I won't," He told her, "Though I want to."

The brief flash of disappointment in her expression softened, satisfied with the admission, "Some other time?"

"Yes."

"After the Exam. How about it?"

"Yes."

She gave him an incredulous look, "Do you understand what I'm actually asking?"

Neji leaned down and captured her mouth, his untamed, damp hair streaking coldly along her cheek while he kissed her as if starved, or as if he were about to push her inside and act upon her suggestion. He did not.

He pulled back again and said, "I know exactly what you are asking."

Tenten blinked slowly, "Huh. Then…that's settled."

"Goodnight, Tenten." Neji set out and she lingered in the doorway to watch him go, also bidding him farewell.

She called out when he did not head for the stairs, "Hey! Where are you going?"

He indicated a window at the end of the hall, the same one that Tenzo had dragged him out of once upon a time (though she did not know that.)

"Oh. Careful there. That fire escape is rickety."

Neji acknowledged her warning and exited through the window. A second later, she heard a clatter and crash. Tenten hurried down the hall and peered outside. It looked as if he may have slipped (still wet from the dunking) while trying to make a leap from the trellis to a nearby tree. He had fallen down one ladder's length of steps to the next level, and was sorely pushing himself to his feet.

"Whoa! Are you okay?"

"Fine." Embarrassed, Neji safely continued down and met the ground again, doing his very best not to stumble home.

On the evening of the celebratory festival for Chunin Exam finalists, Sakura may have said she was a bit disappointed to leave. Disappointed that she had missed the chance to play silly games, to dance to pounding music, to drink and laugh with friends, to poke fun and eat desserts.

But now she could not. She could not claim to be close to disappointed about Gaara taking her hand, leading her beneath a starry sky through the park. There was no better way to spend the night, she was sure.

“This road lets out near the Hot Springs?” Gaara confirmed, trying to remember his way around.

“It does.” She smiled impishly, “Did you want to go for a soak?”

“No, but it will be quiet there.” He presumed, “And the view isn’t bad.”

“It isn’t.”

“I’m sorry to take you away from the festival…”

“We won’t miss much.” Sakura waved off his concern, “I prefer spending time with you, honestly. It just would have stayed loud and crazy back there.”

“Did you have anything to eat?”

“Not since this afternoon.”

He frowned, “You should eat.”

“Well, if we must, we can go somewhere after you tell me…” She skipped in front of him, smiling, “Whatever it is you wanted to tell me!” Her heeled sandals clacked over the wooden boards of a bridge, and they came to a stop over the stream that fed the onsen ryokan.

The lampposts outside of the inn and along the stone-cobbled walkways stretched long shadows over garden boxes and deserted paths. Gaara settled at the edge of the bridge and Sakura leaned against the railing beside him, smiling and expectant.
“It was good to meet your parents today.” Gaara told her.

“I am so relieved it went well.”

“You are a part of them. Sakura, I have no idea why you thought I could have possibly disliked your parents.” He went on, “And they were completely fair to me, and were gracious enough to hear me out…in spite of the fact that I am a rare beast in their eyes.”

“They weren’t sure what to expect. I think maybe they thought you’d be this prodigious dignitary, when they tried to imagine what the Kazekage was like.” Sakura explained, “But I just kept trying to get it into their heads that…” She tilted her face to look at him, “He’s just…he’s my best friend.”

Gaara stared at her and then broke the eye contact, trailing his gaze down to the spring water bubbling along beneath the bridge. His reflection looked positively terrified.

There was a small, nearly unnoticeable tremor in his voice, “Thank you for saying that.”

“You feel that way about me too.” She stated it as a fact, her eyes bright and happy.

“I certainly do.” Gaara took a breath through his nostrils, composing himself, “But I am more than just your best friend or the Kazekage…there’s something else about me…” A twinge of puzzlement crossed her face as he struggled, “Something about me…that you don’t know yet.”

“Oh.” She clasped her hands and leaned on the railing, preserving her amenable exterior. ‘Not time to panic yet.’ She thought, but Sakura was dearly hoping not to go home in tears tonight.

She witnessed Gaara plant a firm, somewhat crazed look on the water below, scowl at his reflection when he saw it again, then tilt his head up to look at the sky; sounds dying in his throat before he could make them. Whatever Gaara wanted to get across, she could tell, he was faltering in his resolve. He was actually scared.

He nodded, attempting to get a grip, and then turned around to keep his back at the rail. Gaara gazed out at the trees on their right, the illumination of the festival seeping through the park even at a distance.

“Sakura…” He tried again, “Do you know how I came to be in the Hidden Leaf Village?”

“Yes. Gama-sennin brought you here when you were small. That was when I first met you.” She replied confidently.

“And where did he find me?” Gaara ventured.

Sakura frowned thoughtfully, “I…never got that detail.”

“I should explain.” His voice was a touch quieter, “I had arrived in a tourist hub called Kuro on the edge of the Fire Country…because I ran away from Suna. I was unwanted by my own father, and he considered me dangerous.”

“At that age? You couldn’t…” She trailed off and restarted, “Well, you couldn’t have been more than the Fourth Kazekage could handle.”

“I was. Even Temari and Kankuro were frightened of me, back then.” He confessed, “I could barely control my powers. I was in crisis and no one in my village could help me. No one wanted to help
“You told me once that your mother died when you were born.” Sakura brought up a delicate subject, “If she had been around, I’m sure—”

“I don’t care to speculate about that. I don’t know what life would have been like if she had been around to look after me.” Gaara roughly shook his head, “But when I landed in Kuro…unfed, sick, and a full-blown insomniac…” A growling sigh, “I was hardly the kind of child anyone would want to approach or assist. But Naruto and Haku didn’t seem to understand that they should have been afraid of me…afraid of what I could do…”

Sakura leaned her head on his shoulder and continued to listen as they faced opposite directions.

“They vowed to stay with me, after they found me. The man who had been caring for Haku looked after us for a short time…until, in passing, Jiraiya considered us a very suspicious group of children.” Gaara elaborated, “He recognized our shinobi lineage and potential, and he felt obligated to bring us to safety.”

“That’s when he brought you here.” She noted.

“That is how and why it happened. And…the Hokage was not very inclined at all to accept me at first. I was a liability and a potential catalyst for conflict with Sunagakure…but he and Jiraiya-sensei made a great effort to help me with my…problems…”

“Well of course they did! The Sandaime and Gama-sennin were never heartless.” She shifted beside him, facing him fully to get a good look, “But Gaara, what does all of this have to-?”

“You told me after your mission to the Hidden Star Village that you had learned of the ancestry of shinobi, and the origin of modern chakra…and while you may find it all compelling and factual, with nothing at all to fear,” He seemed sharper, more defensive, “Do you really believe any of it?”

“I believe what I read— what I learned, completely.” She felt slightly provoked and balled her hands into fists, “I wasn’t spinning stories, Gaara!”

“I know you weren’t.” He assured her, “All of it is true. As Kazekage, I can confirm that what you learned about chakra and Tailed Beasts is as real as the bridge we stand on and the air we breathe. None of it was fantasy, and it surprised me…that so much was accurately recorded in text.”

“I guess someone…wanted to keep the record straight?” She frowned again, “But what is it that’s making you…so anxious?”

“Think back to the previous Chunin Exam, Sakura. Remember my participation in the Final Round against Sato.” It was a visual he could provide her without being too heavy-handed, “I was out of control that day, not unlike how I had been as a child. And my reaction to that losing battle was not simply my power over sand or me feeling upset. It was more than that.”

Gaara pushed away from the rail, only a step away from her, and leveled his eyes with hers, “I am something that a village can use as a weapon, if authorities see fit.”

Sakura’s understanding of his tale was tumultuous, then, her thoughts wild and keeping pace with the hints. She stared back at him breathlessly, forgetting to press her mouth shut when it hung open. She understood, or at least, believed she understood as much as she could without absolute confirmation from Gaara.

She certainly did remember the strange transformation with sand he had undergone, although she had never tried to hazard a guess as to what the cause was. All she had cared about then was that the fight was over, the invasion was over, and everyone had been safe.

“I am something that can be used for defense, if the lives of villagers are in peril.” He illustrated further, “By design, I am a shinobi who must sacrifice so that the age-old traditions and inherited power of the Sand Village are preserved. Because of ancient agreements between the first Kages…
my life and freedoms are at the discretion of councils and elders.”

“Gaara, you don’t have to exp-!” She reached for his arm, but he plodded away over the boards, upset and keeping his head tucked, arms straight, and hands grasping.

Visibly ashamed but unable to retract what had been said, Gaara paced over the bridge, too cowed to look her in the face as he spoke, “Because of decisions I had no part in, I was made into something that other children taunted and called a monster. My connections with others and even the people I loved were strained, and my family became compelled to whisper behind my back, my uncle to resent me, my brother and sister to fear me—”

“Gaara!” When she stepped toward him he evaded, harried.

“My father was determined to kill me when I could not control my actions, and when that endeavor was botched…when negotiation or advocacy on my part seemed pointless to my father…” His voice fluttered in anguish, “I was to be thrown away. What difference would it make…if a failure was buried…or if it disappeared and was never seen again? It made no difference to him that I could only find compassion here, only receive a competent seal here, only have a chance to prosper here, when to him I did not exist anymore. He never knew any of that. I was only a figment of his imagination, then.”

She caught his wrist and held, “Gaara.” Sakura had strength enough to pull him back towards the rail and keep him still, “You exist. You matter.”

His eyes winced open a fraction to glimpse her, “Not everyone would agree.”

“Ah, well…whoever they are: screw ‘em.” Sakura announced.

“You shouldn’t love someone without knowing the full truth about who they are. It was unfair of me to only shed light on the parts of myself I thought were worthy.” Gaara took a few quaking breaths, “I am not always kind. I was violent, and in some ways I still am. I was callous and antisocial…and now I am lenient and desperate to please. I am short-sighted and cowardly. I am nothing without two people to stand on both sides of me…Kankuro and Temari…or Naruto and Haku…”

Though it felt impossible to achieve, Gaara slid his gaze up again to meet hers, “To stand in front of you and only you…all by myself…is so hard.”

“Because you don’t think I want to stay with you.” She surmised coolly.

“I am the jinchuriki of the One-Tail.” Gaara stated, “The people who are content to stay with me…
are usually crazy.”

Sakura went quiet again, rubbing at her nose as she considered what she had been told. After a moment she frowned at him, aggravated, “Do you know how rude it is to call me crazy indirectly?”

“I’m sorry—”

“Nuh-uh! Sh-sh-shh!” She waggled a finger in his face, “You sure do throw an emotional tantrum when you worry. I thought this was going to be…I don’t know…like you were marrying Shishou for political reasons, or something!"

Gaara blanched, “Never.”

“Phew!” She relaxed, “So…the One-Tail?”

“Yes.”

“Now it’s making sense.” Sakura nodded and held her chin like a scholar, “There were plenty of things I still wasn’t sure of, but! Let’s see…Ichibi…is Shukaku…”

“…yes.” He swallowed an insanely, sublimely happy laugh, his eyes glassy.

“Shukaku’s form is a tanuki…and of sand, as is fitting.” She recalled, going back into the catalogs of her brain and the libraries-worth of information there, “He is the firstborn, attuned to Wind and Earth, and— oh! Oh!” Excitedly, Sakura took Gaara’s face into her hands, “The markings on your eyes!”

“That too—”

“It makes sense.” She crowed, almost triumphant in her knowledge, “Gaara! You’re a bit like a raccoon dog.” She squished his cheeks once before releasing him.

“He isn’t the spitting image of a tanuki, just so you know.”

“Yeah, I guess.”

This was going better than expected.

Her nostrils flared again in annoyance as a thought occurred to her, “Gaara…to think you were worried about how I would feel about this…it’s almost an insult compared to you meeting my wacky parents! That was much scarier.”

“Really! I mean, come on, what is there to be afraid of— especially at this point in time?” Sakura gripped, getting a hold of him again, “I heard old stories and some people claim you’re dangerous, and ooh! I’m scared! What are you going to do to me?” She squealed sarcastically, “Take me to lunch?” She pecked his nose, “Hold my hand?” She kissed his cheek, “Do my dishes?” She kissed his mouth and lingered there, feeling tension leave him.

“You.” Sakura said as she flattened out after standing on her toes, “Are completely in control…and very domestic, might I add.”

A sigh rolled out of him that could have started an avalanche. Gaara folded his arms tightly around her and pressed, not too hard, but made it evident that he was still a tad unnerved. Sakura could feel his breathing gradually even out beneath her palms, humming happily as he squeezed her. ‘CHA! I did good! Re-eeal good!’ Her inner specter was applauding the achievement, ‘Doesn’t this floof of mine know I care about him more than I could possibly fear anything on this planet? What a worrywart…’

The night was punctuated with cricket song and the occasional warmp of tree frogs. Sakura was not sure for how long they stood without breaking the embrace, feeling Gaara’s cheek pressed against the top of her head as he digested what had happened.

She asked curiously, “What does it feel like?”

He angled his face incredulously at her, “What does what feel like?”

“Well…you have a living being bound to you. Shukaku is real, as in, would have his own body if he wasn’t stuck inside of a seal.” She explained, “The mechanics of that really are amazing!”

“Sorry. Maybe not so amazing since you had no choice in the matter, but…you are a living, tangible example of something I only considered myth for so long. Just try to see this from my point of view.”

“I do understand.” Gaara stroked his hand up her neck and then cradled her chin in his hand, “I will only describe how it feels nowadays…as it was not so pleasant when I was younger.” His mouth pooched for a moment as he considered it, “When the day is calm…and I want to sleep…he is there. As plain as you are standing with me, I feel Shukaku. He is huge, grounded, and steady, but he is also energetic and mischievous. We can also speak to each other with our minds.”

“No anymore. It’s good to have someone to talk to, when no one else is around.” Gaara noted, “His input can be very helpful. Or morally backwards by today’s laws and standards.”

“That can happen when you’re hundreds of years old.”

“So what is Shukaku like? Not resentful that he’s sealed inside of you, is he?”

“He was, once.” Gaara confirmed, “But we have since come to an understanding. I vowed that when I pass on and the seal restraining him fails, Shukaku may be free of shinobi squabbles and return to the home he knew during the time of the Sage of the Six Paths.”

Sakura braced her hands on Gaara’s shoulders, nerding out, “That’s all he wants?”

“No one ever asked him what he wanted. He was never to be set free. And if Hidden Sand’s bureaucrats combat me on this decision, he may be sealed again after my death, regardless of what we agreed upon.” Gaara fiddled with a strand of her hair, deliberating, “I should establish a failsafe for such an outcome…perhaps notify the Hokage…”

“Unlikely. Suna clings to assets and military strength. It has little else to call its own.”

“Then maybe you should have them make a pact? Could they conscript Shukaku as a paid military force? Then there’d be no need for a jinchuriki in Suna. He’d just be like a giant, local police chief.”

Gaara’s face flat-lined at the suggestion.

That is fucking brilliant. Shukaku echoed somewhere in his head, Shit, I’d work for those fools if they paid and fed me!

There’s no point to an agreement like that if the Akatsuki are still around. Gaara squashed the idea with the sobering truth, ‘Until they are eliminated, your personal freedom will always be
I don’t think I have ever actually been paid before, though. I’ve been like an unpaid intern forever.

‘Quiet.’

“You alright, Gaara?”

“I’m fine. I was getting feedback.”

“Oh!” Sakura brightened, “Did he like the idea?”

“He did. Though there are intricacies that would potentially thwart that elegant solution, the proposal is fundamentally sound.”

“Glad you think so.” Her smile faltered when her stomach gurgled with hunger.

“We should eat.” Gaara remembered.

“Why? We were having such a nice heart-to-heart.”

“We can still talk.” He assured her, “Let’s go to my apartment. I can make something.”

Sakura nodded, feigning composure, and relished the whirling, red alarm blinking and blaring ‘round her insides. It felt as though her stomach would drop out, leaving her lighter than air so that she might float away. ‘Now we’re…going to his place. And he’s happy…and I’m happy.’ Since their fingers had threaded Sakura perceived how her awareness of Gaara was expanding, the touch of his skin now tickling her when she was certain it hadn’t before. He walked along with an expression that was placidly happy and kinetic at the same time.

While following a northwesterly route through town, where the streets were empty at that hour and the neon of bar signs were the last lights buzzing, Sakura allowed herself to accept the overwhelming fact. ‘Things will change now.’ She was sure. Gaara was not a trusting person, and she perfectly understood why that was. Even Naruto and Haku, who she imagined would know his secret, probably did not know the small, excruciating details Gaara had shared with her that night. His identity and personal struggles were to be kept in confidence, and Sakura was awed that she very well could be the only person to know such privileged information…until they were both dead and buried.

‘Okay. Maybe his secret IS a bigger deal than meeting Mom and Dad. And whoa, I still can’t believe we tackled all of this in a day.’ Then again, it was debatable when they would next have the chance to be in the same place for an extended period of time. ‘We’ve got to capitalize on a day…and night…and this.’ She gulped, ‘He made things so serious…I wonder if I should still try to make a move? I don’t know if he is emotionally equipped for something like that right now…’

Sakura rapped her nails along her lips, wondering, ‘Or if I did…how he or the Ichibi might react? He mentioned that stress made him lose control in the past. If Gaara has boundaries like that I want to respect them.’ She snuck a corner-eye glance at him and then pouted, ‘Erg…but then he’s got some nerve looking that hot and angular in summer clothes! What am I supposed to do?’

Gaara stopped suddenly. Sakura stutter-stepped to a halt while lost in thought, and then wisely followed his line of sight far down the road. She saw Huo’s back and queue of hair as he retreated into his guest habitation for the night.
“Huo wasn’t at the festival.” Gaara noted keenly, “Though that comes as no surprise. He has only contempt for his fellow Finalists.”

“He gives me the creeps.” Sakura linked her arm with her boyfriend’s, “Lee told us that he said…he wants to kill us all.”

Unruffled by the statement, Gaara continued walking, “He must mean it.”

“Idle threats are one thing. But if he acts on the threat—”

“Gaara, the boy he fought died shortly after their match. Huo may not be breaking the Exam’s rules, but he still knows how to inflict delayed fatalities.” She was agitated, “I don’t want someone like that being Tama’s first ever Exam opponent!”

“Your sensei would not allow her to enter her match unprepared. Kakashi knows what kind of foe that Rock ninja is. And if things take a bad turn, he and the other Jounin are more than ready now to intervene during a match. Faster than even the proctor, I’d wager.”

“Put it out of your mind, for now.” Gaara suggested, and began to climb the outdoor stairwell of the building. Doors of homes they passed on the way were darkened and quiet.

Sakura asked if Matsuri would be asleep in a spare bedroom, but Gaara shook his head, “She has a guest habitation at the Magnolia Hotel that Tsunade advertised. I invited her to stay here…but Matsuri is enjoying her time without me and making friends.”

“Oh.” Sakura could feel her heartbeat in her throat.

Maybe she should not have been surprised that Gaara had a spare key besides the original he had gifted to her. Sakura tried not to make stupid faces of excitement as Gaara unlocked the door and let her step inside first. She slipped off her sandals in the genkan, considering unfamiliar shapes in the dark, and blinked rapidly when he snapped the lights on.

The chipped, cracked walls…the worn furniture…the cluttered, outdated arrangements that Sakura remembered from her last visit…gone. Even a wall or two she recalled that had once sectioned off the living area, ‘They were knocked down! It's all open. Holy shit, someone painted in here…’ A stately, muted shade of blue-grey, the molding contrasted in white, ‘And hardwood floors…’ As she stepped with bare feet it was warm to the touch, ‘Oh! Radiant heat. How much did this cost? Yeesh! When did he get all of this done?’

Gaara dropped the key ring on a hook after taking his shoes off, following her into the living space, “I had it remodeled a few months ago.”

“I can see that.”

“I was saving. I paid for it myself.” His eyes swept around as if he were not impressed with it, “Naruto and Haku will adjust.”

“You didn’t consult with them?” She was aghast and also running her hand over the top of a sofa sectional that still had showroom smell. Sakura watched him untie the hyper-condensed sand gourd from his hip and gently set it down near a display of pottery.

“That would have complicated it.” Gaara crossed toward the kitchen, “Haku is too fond of breakable antiques and Naruto is too fond of orange.”

Sakura launched herself face-first onto the sofa, beyond his line of sight as she laid belly-down, “Ah! You’re right.”

“Of course I am. What do you want to eat?”

Her head poked up, “Anything my mom did not cook for us today.”

He took it as a valid answer and began rummaging around the fridge and cupboards. Sakura lowered herself down onto cushions again, refusing to squeal aloud in astonishment, ‘I keep forgetting that he cooks. And since when does Gaara have an eye for design? This place looks like a model home!’

Gaara asked her if she would like water or tea, and when she declined a drink he advised her to stay comfortable. Sakura remained on the sofa, her arms folded on the headrest, balancing her chin to stare at him from across the room. He seemed calm. It was an electric sort of calm; she felt his feelings prickling at her strongly as if they carried through airwaves. Her lips curled up, watching him in silence, ‘I feel lucky…’ She exhaled dreamily, ‘He’s been through so much, but Gaara trusts me. This has to be reciprocal. I feel like I can tell him anything I need to…’ Though nothing immediately came to mind.

Her eyes scanned across items around the apartment that were familiar. The old and reliable rice cooker that the three boys had owned since childhood (its steam vent gently puffing,) bowls and glasswork that belonged to Haku, framed photos and artwork, Naruto’s potted plants flourishing on shelves above the sink…

‘The interior may have changed, but their belongings are still here.’ She wondered if the bedrooms had also changed, not that she had ever seen those rooms before.

“Gaara-kun, do you still keep a lot of your things here?”

He looked over his shoulder at her, “Some things. I’ve outgrown old clothes and I did not keep those.”

Gaara turned back to the pan popping with heated oil, replying, “I will always keep those things.”

She inquired as an afterthought, “Should I…bring your Leaf headband here?”

Gaara said nothing for quite a while. Sakura observed him frying battered eggplant, tumbling in his thoughts. He would never be a Leaf ninja again, not without instigating an insane, unprecedented resignation and defection from the village he was now sworn to protect.

“I would prefer if you kept it, Sakura.” He said in a small voice. He wanted that memento to be hers; wanted it to be dedicated to her.

“Okay.” She was smiling and rocking her chin side to side on her folded arms.

Sakura took a guess that the silver-fleshed fillet he had placed in the fish oven was scabbard fish, but she wasn’t exactly sure. ‘I haven’t had it in a while! It’s so popular this time of year it’s always sold
He drifted between kitchen tasks and setting the low, traditional table in the dining area. Gaara’s eyes flicked over to her a few times, ice-green and lit with levity.

When he tended to the last of the eggplant, Sakura frowned to herself, giving the young man the up-and-down, ‘I wonder…’ She pressed her lips to the back of her hands, spying, ‘If he has other features…from the Ichibi…?’ Aside from his dark-rimmed eyes, which Sakura found a most subtle feature, ‘I didn’t see any claws or ears or fur…’

Her eyes trolled down to his lower back, ‘He probably…doesn’t have anything else.’

But, as she recalled carefully turning the pages of an old, oversized tome in Hoshigakure, Sakura acknowledged real descriptions of those with horns, sharp teeth, and flowing manes. She slipped up from the sectional and took conspicuous, lilting steps towards Gaara, ‘I just keep getting more curious…and I don’t want to make it weird by out-right asking him! Sure, like I could say— hey Gaara! Are you hiding a tail somewhere? Just a thought…pff…’

“I’ve just been thinking a lot…” She traced her fingertips over the shell of his ear, which checked out completely normal.

“I don’t blame you. What I told you is not something easily accepted and dismissed.”

Sakura felt around his nail beds and found no claws, trying to play it off as a girlish touch, “I’m glad you told me, Gaara. I consider it an honor.”

He plucked the finished vegetables from the oil with chopsticks, and then turned the gas off. She heard him make another soft, happy sound.

Then, before Gaara could find something else to do and walk away, Sakura did it briskly: hooking a finger into the waistband of his pants and undershorts, tugging them free an inch to glimpse down the plane of his back…finding no tail at all. Her eyes did linger as there were two perfect lower back dimples above his ass, which was distinctly paler than the exposed skin of his face, neck, and arms. She had never known such a charming feature could exist on a man. Gaara froze at this odd, uncalled for contact and she patted his clothing back into place, laughing apologetically.

“You don’t want to know.” She took a serving bowl from his hand, “U-Uh, let me help! Sorry about that. Just an exam I had in mind—”

“Sakura…”

“Pretend it didn’t happen.” She insisted sunnily. Sakura was already at the table organizing food and tableware.

Gaara left the pan’s cooking oil to cool on the stove and fetched the fish from the oven, pressing his mouth into a thin line. Sakura was not at all reacting to him with uncertainty or trepidation, as he might have expected. Instead, she had become handsy and somewhat invasive of his personal space…not that he could complain about it. ‘But why did she-?’ She had blatantly stole a peek at his bottom and he did not know how to feel about it. How was this any way to react to the things he had told her?
He set a plate of scabbard fish on the table, giving her a narrow-eyed look. Sakura, he ought not to forget, could be rather sly and impetuous when the mood came over her. Oh, he knew that well.

Beyond that, Gaara considered himself plain-looking with little talent for attraction, but he was slowly starting to suspect that Sakura had latched onto something, whether it was his admission, some kind of mystique she thought he had, or even the understated way he had dressed—she was ogling him shamelessly, almost grinning.

He might have felt uncomfortable about it if it wasn’t so fucking wonderful. The night could have gone in the complete opposite direction.

Gaara distantly heard her excited “Itadakimasu!” from across the table before the clattering of dishes started. Sakura hurriedly plopped still-hot foods onto his plate first before helping herself. He frowned at her again.

“Habit.” She defended, “Mom makes me serve everyone else first at home. She’s strict.”

“How traditional. I don’t care much for that custom.” He replied and poured her tea before she could touch the pot.

“Thank you.” Sakura sat back and smiled appreciatively, “So how did you get the tachiuo? Every time Mom and I attempted to buy it these past few weeks it was all gone. Crazy women in town form a mob in front of the store…and we don’t want to stoop as low as them.”

“When the Kazekage requests scabbard fish, he is given scabbard fish.”

“If I didn’t know you so well, Gaara, you’d sound grossly entitled right now.”

“Sometimes it is worth taking advantage of your station…for I have seen that mob you spoke of.” Gaara acknowledged, a small tremble passing through him, “We do not have shoppers like that in Suna.”

“I guess people in Suna are used to not being able to find the things they want at the market.”

“Exactly.”

“Do you have summer-time fish like these to eat out there?”

“Very rarely, and at great expense. It’s getting easier to find as trade improves. The Tide Village has been complementary to our commerce.”

“I bet!” Sakura took a bite of the fish with rice and slowly shut her eyes to savor it, “This is wonderful.”

“I should hope so. Or that it’s at least as good as festival food.”

“Honesty, festival food gets old after the first hundred times you eat the same damn thing.”

Gaara nodded and his facial features were lightening in amusement.

“I think Ino was a little drunk by the time I left…” Sakura recalled while nibbling eggplant, “Actually…everyone seemed a bit tipsy. Except for Hinata, of course, her father would give her a diatribe at home if she did something like that.”

“Then why would the Head of the Hyuga clan not scold Neji for a night of drinking?”
“Hyuga-sama would scold him.” Sakura wagered, “But I think Neji was prepared for the consequence…especially since he had his beautiful girlfriend saucing up with him. It was probably worth it for them. Heh!”

“I am still surprised.” Gaara said, somewhat out of context.

Sakura quirked an eyebrow at him, “About what?”

They chewed for a few beats before Gaara elaborated.

“Surprised that his teammate, Tenten, got through to him. I still remember Neji as a closed off person.”

“He isn’t really like that anymore. He’s just bossy and brotherly. Much easier to talk to now, the girls and I agree.”

“How did someone like him come to acknowledge a friend and teammate he formerly took for granted?” Gaara was surprisingly abreast on the turn of events. He rounded off the thought with a swig of tea.

Sakura smiled cleverly, as she had a first-hand account of the catalyst, “Well, Neji had to lose her first! I forgot you missed all of that.”

“Lose her?”

“Yeah. Shishou was compelled to rearrange their team after a rogue nin tried to target them, although she didn’t give me the full story. She did say that Neji got into an insubordinate argument with her when she removed Tenten from Team Gai.” Sakura was chuckling, “She was SO mad. But she also really understood how upset he was. Lee was also in shambles. I remember watching the two of them mope around like the world was ending.”

“Interesting.” Gaara was sincerely intrigued, eating dinner as if it were cinema popcorn.

“Also, they weren’t permitted to communicate with each other. Tenten was the saddest I had ever seen her. We girls tried to hang out with her and cheer her up. Their team was apart for a while and Neji and Lee grew closer.” She explained happily, “But I think when they reunited, Neji had been shaken up enough to admit that he had it bad for her. They started dating!”

“How unusually mature of him. He didn’t throw a tantrum to win her affection?”

“I don’t know about that…He’s still, you know, Neji. Tenten keeps him in check.”

“Lee is a good friend to them.” Gaara recognized.

“Yes. He really is the best. Chouji too. He looks out for Ino and Shika.”

Gaara leaned his head back in thought.

“Much like them…Naruto always wanted me to confess to you.” He disclosed.

Eggplant slipped from her chopsticks. Gaara continued eating, unabashed.

“I’m sorry— what?” Sakura sat up straighter, more attentive.

“Naruto and Haku knew.” He said simply, “How I felt about you. While Haku was encouraging and championed discretion, Naruto thought I had nothing to lose, and that I should have told you.” Gaara added before a final bite of fish, “For someone so utterly blind to his own admirer, previously…
Naruto was sure that I was meant for…”

He trailed off and regarded Sakura’s rosy cheeks, and how she began to smile toothily, “…Naruto, huh?”

“In his infinite wisdom.”

“Man is he nosy!” She was thrilled, “But he was right! He was right about you being my match.”
Sakura reached her hand out and settled it over his, “Naruto actually has some very good insight, when it comes to those sorts of things. I should thank him.”

“He does.” Gaara agreed, relaxing again, “And while he may have been correct with his hunch, it did not change the fact that I wasn’t ready. I never had any expectation or delusion that you would feel the same— that you’d feel just as much as I did, in spite of how close we were. I did not value myself at all, and that constantly hindered my ability to connect with others. Shunning the possibility of rejection meant that I wouldn’t have to relive Suna all over again.”

Sakura gazed at him and said nothing, introspective, and then drew her hand back to begin tidying empty dishes. In those slow seconds that passed, Gaara also rose to help clean up. He wracked his brain, concerned that he had said something stupid or too revealing. ‘What is she thinking about?’

At the sink, Sakura spoke, “You’re still like that, you know.”

Gaara wore an owl-eyed look, confused.

“You’ve grown. You’ve matured and opened up, no doubt about it…but that one weakness of yours did not change.” Sakura shook her head, gently chiding. “You still hesitate to value yourself, Gaara.
If you had felt surer of your worth: your accomplishments and your flaws alike…would it have taken you as long to tell me about Shukaku?” She wondered, “Or for that matter, would have it hurt you so much to finally talk about it?”

“It would have hurt no matter what.”

She let him take over the dish washing as she poured the cooled oil into an old tin can for disposal.
Sakura was still gnawing at her lips with more to say.

“I want you to…” Her voice rose in frustration, “I want you to see yourself the way all of us see you, and not cleave to that image in your head of when you were a kid that no one wanted.” With a bump of her hip she guided him to step aside, taking over the other half of the sink to scrub the pan in her hands, “Gaara, put all of that behind you now. You’re the Kazekage, and you can be damn sure everyone in Suna knows who and what you are. If people here learn that you’re a jinchuriki over time, your actions will speak louder than their prejudice.” She added, “Haters notwithstanding, as there will always be an unjust critic or two…”

Gaara craned his neck to give her another astounded look, laying clean bowls on the drying rack.

“What?” She was annoyed further, scrubbing.

“To tell the truth…I care less about public opinion than I do about your opinion.”

“Then you should be all set now.” She motioned for the dish soap and he passed it to her. Sakura began to simmer down again, “Sorry. I just hate how you vilify yourself. There are leaders and shinobi in this world who are real monsters…and your only crime was being subject to a decision you had no part in.”
“I am by no means guiltless.” He reminded her.

“Who isn’t-?”

“I have killed people in the past that likely did not deserve to be killed. I’ve been callous to those I’ve called my friends and pushed them away. I’ve even said cruel things to you, all in defense of my ego.” Gaara dried her clean pan with a dishtowel, “Every day that I live I try to make up for those things.”

“Well I did do stupid shit like gossip to Sasuke about every little thing I knew.” Her anger rebounded as if to varnish herself with harsh words, “I wanted to help him. I really did. When we spent time…” Sakura grunted furiously, “He…he knew what to say to make me believe I was important, and everything he did proved the opposite. Genius that I was, I played into that. Every time I slighted you was an offense worth the hurtful things you told me. Your feelings mattered, and I just wasn’t getting that. Not then.” Regardless, he vowed, “I will never speak to you like that again.”

“I acted like a dumb bitch and I don’t disagree with anything you said.”

“Sakura—”

“No.” She stopped him, tipping the last few drops in the teapot down the drain, “We will fight. Even if we stay together forever, maybe up until our last breaths, you have to know that we’re going to fight. That’s just what we’re like. We think too much, berate ourselves, criticize others, try to do better, and then end up arguing until things smooth over.” Sakura grinned at him, “It’s like a dream come true.”

“A dream, you say? You’ve dreamt of someone you could argue with?”

“Yeah, especially if he’s a handsome redhead.”

The look on his face fluttered with several conflicting emotions, and Sakura set the teapot aside to settle both of her hands behind his head and kiss him— really kiss him, as ravenous for him as she would have been whether or not he had admitted to being a jinchuriki. His hands scrambled for her face and waist, eyes blithely closing. Gaara tasted rich and aromatic on her tongue, tilting his head down to deepen the kiss as her nails traced a racetrack through his hair and down his neck.

She was murmuring as she drew back to peck the corners of his mouth, toying with his bottom lip, glimpsing between her slitted eyes as the sensation of it had him rioting, quickly shedding timidity, holding her tightly…

Sakura withdrew and a soft puff of air escaped her, “Puh.” Gaara eyeballed her puckish, satisfied face with wonder, starting to imagine that she had designs for him beyond just accepting his jinchuriki identity. She was silken, smelled sweeter than the blossoms of a fruit grove, and oh…what was he worried about again? He had forgotten.

“I always aspired to have a man who I could fight or argue with— constructively…and even if we sting each other with hard truths and criticism…I would never doubt you still loved me.” She slid her fingertips over the line of his shoulder and under the fabric of the desert-style sash there. He was acutely aware of the touch, “So yes, fighting was part of my check list. If I can’t be imperfect and scream at you, then maybe we aren’t for each other.”

“Do your worst.” He taunted.
“That’s what I thought.”

When a deep, pleased rumble came out of him Sakura gave him a well-informed, entertained look. They stood there for nearly a minute without asking about or trying to explain the growl.

She finally questioned its source, “Um…I’m not so sure if those sounds are purely you anymore…”

A sigh dropped out of him and he had to admit, “No.”

“I believe I have heard you do it before.”

“When I…am riled up…there is some overlap between us.” Gaara clarified haltingly, “Shukaku… and I.” He tried not to remember the Tailed-Beast’s participation in a previous, back-alley make out session from weeks before. That was not something he really wanted to fess up to.

“Hm.” Sakura noted it. She took a tour around the kitchen’s new appliances, skirting the quartz-topped island counter, and the gorgeously furnished living space, tugging Gaara along by a few fingers as if he were a locomotive car.

In front of framed photos on the wall near the hallway she asked, “Is it just…noises? From the Ichibi?”

“This will sound stupid, but…is there a tail?”

Mortified, but stone-faced he said, “Yes. When I let Shukaku express it.” And Sakura tapped her fist in the palm of her hand victoriously, as if she were a detective on the trail, “Don’t tell me you were checking for it?”

“I can’t help but be curious about these things! The name suggests that Biju really do have chakra tails, so I wondered if you’d have a feature resembling one. It’s reasonable.”

He shook his head weakly but could not debate it with her.

“Does anything else happen? Anything that you can show me?” She wondered, “You won’t let me talk to-?”

“Not tonight…give that some time.” Gaara deflected the request, “Shukaku does not have a way with words. You may talk in other circumstances, some other time.”

She nodded.

Again, he sighed heavily, wondering if it was worth revealing a glimpse of Shukaku’s features to her. She clearly wasn’t scared and had asked him directly. On a personal level, Gaara had about enough of the discussion centered on his jinchuriki identity, ‘But I can’t simply brush it under the rug when I don’t want to talk about it. Sakura will ask questions. That’s in her nature.’ Would it do any good to could compromise on the matter? ‘If I humor one request, then maybe I can ask her to leave it at that.’

Gaara resolved out loud, “I will show you something, but then no more. If you wish to see other features, I ask that you let me demonstrate at a later date.”

His shoulders dropped a bit as he exhaled, shutting his eyes.
“Is this okay?” She wondered, gesturing with his captive hands.

 Barely moving, he replied, “It’s fine.”

 Gaara was statue-still and Sakura darted her green gaze up and down, seeing no changes whatsoever. ‘Seems like he’s about to fall asleep…maybe I should just leave it alone? I don’t need proof from him, anyway. I completely believe him after what he told me. Gaara’s probably feeling exhausted.’ She pouted, regretting her nosiness, ‘How much can I put him through? I’ll just tell him —’

 He opened eyes that were not his own.

 Her hand instantly travelled up to his cheek and Sakura moved in close, thrilled to inspect the phenomenon. Where once his irises had been glacial celadon, they were molten gold; the pupil tilted and squared—the sclera consumed in black. She patted her thumb beneath his eye, intrigued, “May I ask…how’s your vision? Better, worse…?”

 “About the same.” Gaara guessed, “Things seem a bit magnified…and wider-looking.”

 “The pupil tilt could give you a more panoramic view. Like a creature that needs to look out over long stretches of desert and horizon.” She guessed, “Please tell Shukaku his eyes are very unique!”

 “He heard you.”

 “Oh.” She dropped her hand and was smiling timidly.

 Gaara blinked his eyes and they were his own shade again.

 “Very interesting.” Sakura cupped her chin and began to pace the hallway, “Every trait has a purpose, at least I want to think so. Every beast’s features are to its advantage…and I read that some of the Biju are very unusual in appearance.”

 “That is absolutely true.” Gaara agreed, thinking of how Shukaku was roughly the shape of a cauldron, with about the same level of agility to boot.

 She nosed around the doorway of the darkened bathroom and paused in her investigative monologue, “…oh…” She skittered into it and from the corridor Gaara saw the lights flick on as she prospected.

 “Am I echoing?” She called out to him, “It’s very spacious in here.”

 He folded his arms and stood nearby, listening to her bumble around; the click of cabinets opening and closing, faucets being tested, pushing buttons for temperature control. Gaara heard her muttering about something smelling good—perhaps soap, he guessed. He let her fiddle around until her inquisitiveness ebbed.

 Sakura switched the lights off as she exited, “The tile in there is very nice.” Her eyebrows were aloft from her wide smile, “Have you actually bathed in there yet?”

 “Yes.”

 She turned her face away from him as she bit her knuckle. At that point, Gaara was almost positive he knew what she was thinking about. Sakura surveyed down the hall to its end where Haku’s room was, and she nudged inside to look around. There was no need to tell her who it belonged to—she would be able to tell by the calligraphy scrolls adorning the walls. Lights flicked on and off, and it did not sound like she opened anything to snoop around personal belongings. Gaara returned to the living area while she explored. Sakura had always been equipped to take in massive amounts of information. He was in favor of letting her roam and commit the modernized rooms to memory.

And also he felt just a touch nervous; a Lilliputian tingle in his stomach. Gaara busied himself by washing out the teapot that had been left on the counter.

There were some considerations to be made on his part, chieuest among them was what was going to constitute ‘Good-night.’ The options seemed to indicate they would either: say such a thing as he walked her home and bid her farewell at her doorstep…or that he would mutter it (or maybe even forget to mutter it) as Sakura stayed in his home and fell asleep. With him.

Gaara set the teapot aside to dry. Swallowing felt more difficult. He genuinely felt he was splat in the middle of a maelstrom of decency, expectation, and desire; peppered with a dash of surrealism. Sakura had taken everything in stride and definitely did not seem inclined to leave. Her ease with the whole situation was overwhelming him.

Gaara crossed over to an adjacent wall panel’s light switches, twiddling around with them. More or less light? Total darkness? No, that was just downright suggestive. He became frustrated with his dawdling and grunted, dimming the recess lighting to leave it somewhere in-between the two extremes.

Then again, such mood lighting still seemed evocative, but to hell with it, he thought. Gaara crossed the room, determined not to agonize over it.

You’re thinking way too much. Shukaku drawled lazily.

‘Withhold your input for now. You’ll just make me think more.’

You let her see my peepers and she said they were unique. She is clearly not worried about anything. You fascinate her.

‘That’s what worries me.’

Gaara, there is nothing to worry about. You were treated with more dignity and kindness in one night than I’ve seen in three separate lifetimes. My other sacrifices have had shit compared to you, ya whiner…

From the corner of his eye Gaara could see Sakura had migrated to Naruto’s room and was snorting in laughter at a collage of photos. He entered his bedroom, its lights off, and stood beside the window to stare at the roofs and skyline of the village he had once called home.

‘Sakura will want to—’

Fool. Do exactly as she wants. Did she not do everything that you wished for earlier and then surpass your expectations? You’ll use every bitch excuse you’ve used before. Shukaku rumbled as they both peered out at buildings speckled with glowing windows. Lame excuses: that you’ll distract her from the Exam, that you mustn’t dishonor her maiden body, that you’ll be in pain to be apart from each other, once this time has passed. When you must return to your respective duties, your hearts will ache! Fuh.

‘You should not make light of-!’
I don’t. I told you that I’ve seen men go through worse. Lose everything. Never have anything to start with, and then die with nothing. When you worry about such petty things it makes me sick. You heave and haw at your good fortune.

Gaara was surprised that he felt rather humbled by the notion.

If you want to keep someone, simply do it. Father always said that even time and space can be subject to our will. They are not obstructions. Your will is strong. When you were a weeping child you resisted me every night. Grown ninja have folded to me sooner, before you.

‘Your encouragement is almost uncalled for.’ He admitted, sheepish.

So is your hesitation.

A relenting sigh sounded that Shukaku took as Gaara’s yielding to the point.

You won’t hurt her. You no longer have the capacity to do harm to someone you worship. Seems like you only know how to hurt yourself, Gaara. You still try to find reasons to hate yourself, like she said. A yawn, Anyhow, I will not be involved in whatever you try to do now. I’d like a nap. Enjoy some privacy and don’t be so loud that you wake me up.

“Hush.” Gaara said out loud, piqued and abashed.

Shukaku had retreated, good as his word.

A hint of the waxing moon was visible above a patchwork office building across the residential avenue. He tried to focus on it; tried to be as calm and still as that celestial sliver.

He startled, but Gaara turned on a bedside lamp to dispel the darkness and his brooding. He gave her a boggled look. It made her want to laugh again.

“Naruto has some hilarious photos.” She proclaimed, half-envious, “Sato probably took most of them. I should ask him if he has any spare copies…”

As she had with other spaces, Sakura prowled around his bedroom, ghosting her fingertips over a dresser, desk, bookcase, bins, and keepsakes of his youth. Her eyes had snuck almost a full appraisal of the bed behind her. She stopped to regard the correspondence on the desk, which looked official, “What’s this here?”

“He explained, standing ramrod straight, bordering on awkward. He realized it. Gaara remembered to exhale-inhale-exhale and sat on the edge of his bed, rubbing at his forehead as if it would erase the anxious, on-the-precipice feeling he was fighting.

“Who sent it?” Sakura wondered.

“The Hokage. She sent several invitations to village leaders that she wanted to attend and spectate the Tournament.”

“Ah!” Sakura was pleased, “Who’s invited?”

“You’ll have to wait and see for yourself.”

She puffed her cheeks at the response but accepted. Maybe it would be a delightful surprise to see which other leaders she could impress on the day of her match. It was reward enough that Tsunade and Gaara would be there.

Continuing her inspection near the desk, Sakura picked up and turned opalescent sea shells over in her hands. There were also sunglasses, a tiny ship in a bottle, and a figurine of a seagull in shinobi attire. She hazarded a guess that it was all memorabilia from the Tide Village.

Sakura scanned a few other odds and ends from the Sand Village and then the closet before crossing to the bed. She pursed her mouth as she beheld Gaara, as he had all but crumpled into a ball on top of a luxurious white comforter. She climbed up and kneeled beside him, having an inkling that maybe he wasn’t feeling entirely right about something…or maybe everything.

Without a word she commenced rubbing his head, starting at the crown, ‘This might calm him down a little. Why does he get so rattled?’

He croaked softly and melted into her touch.
‘That’s better.’ Sakura looked around the half-lit room, finally spying an incriminating detail she had overlooked.

“Hm…?”

“Nice painting.” Her smile was audible.

Hung on the wall space above the bed was an enormous canvas, its composition of a cherry blossom tree and its extending branch brightly in bloom. Oil-based paints cheerfully lopped into petals of blush, rouge, and fuchsia. She simply thought, ‘It’s me.’

She bent down to kiss him, positively flattered, but Gaara caught her shoulder in his palm, stopping her before she could reach him.

“I need you to tell me what your intentions are.” He flat-out hurled the query at her, “…for this evening. Understand that in my position, I can make no demands of you. Whatever you want to do I need you to be explicitly clear about it.”

Her heart was harnessed securely to a bungee cord, bounding up and down her insides. Gaara handed her all the power. Sakura suspected that he was still feeling vulnerable, and he probably did not want to be the one to make a serious, progressive move, ‘Even if he is the Kazekage…” Sure, he had confessed about his identity, taken her to his home, had dinner for two, and let her roam around like she owned the place…Gentleman that he was, Gaara was not one to assume that meant he would be taking any liberties with his girlfriend.

She, on the other hand, initially had only one goal in mind after she had walked away from the festival that night. ‘I can’t tell what he wants. He really seems on the fence about doing anything with me. Maybe I should hold off and…just go home?’

Sakura glanced down at the auburn locks in her hands, watching him breathe as calmly as possible with his eyes closed.

‘No. No sulking home!’ Her resolve strengthened. Maybe it was because Ino was a bad influence, and maybe because she had waited for about as long as she could stand. ‘Gaara is shy. I won’t assume anything without asking him first.’ Her gut instinct suggested he wasn’t opposed to doing anything, rather that he was unsure of how to go about it.
“Is it alright if I stay here with you?” She kept her voice even, glass-smooth.

Gaara cracked an eye open at her, “You may.”

“I didn’t really want to go home tonight. We have one last day off tomorrow.”

“Your parents will wonder where you are.”

A slight shake of her head, “They won’t. Ino had my excuse planned.”

Both of his eyes opened, “Did she?”

“She’s an incredible advocate for most of my causes.”

He agreed with a noncommittal grunt. The Yamanaka deserved thanks. Maybe. If this went well.

Sakura stretched out beside him, her hands slowing in their work against his scalp. She was not precisely aware of when tension began to gradually, painstakingly eep out of Gaara. He emerged from his scrunched position, straightening, and reclined into her embrace. But after that Gaara did not move a muscle, tranquil enough to fall asleep, and that was not what she was going for.

‘Please, sir, please pay attention to what I’m doing…’ Her nails grazed down the back of his head and neck, roving to his shoulder. As ordinarily as she could, Sakura slid the sash down past his collar bone, where it gathered in a bunch at his chest. Gaara reacted under her hand and rotated to be on his back, a lured expression on his face. Unrepentant, Sakura smirked at him, ‘What? You don’t need it on anyway…’ She was gratified when he slipped the unnecessary fabric tie free of his arm and laid there. Her hand meandered from his wrist and up, up, up until she cupped the side of his face. She pressed her lips to the skin of his shoulder and grinned.

“She.”

She batted her eyes defensively at him. ‘Don’t warn me to stop. Don’t send me home. I just want to peel clothing off of you, is that really so bad?’

His head was angled toward her, mollified, “Do what you want.”

“You said I had to be explicitly clear about what I wanted.” Sakura reminded him warily.

“Then tell me.”

She bit her lip. Her hands stilled on his soft crimson shirt, and it was so, so warm. ‘Hm. Maybe he can handle this after all?’ The rise and fall of his chest was incrementally calming.

Sakura worked up the nerve to answer him, and slipped closer to nuzzle his neck, “I want to…” She exhaled bashfully and lowered her voice, “I’d like to take your shirt off.”

“Ah.” He said with enthusiasm, for it was as he suspected.

Then she draped her leg over and past his, pivoting above him until he was pinned, and Sakura let her smile curl more nefariously, “Actually, I’d like to tell you what I was thinking about most of this afternoon.”

Gaara was cognizant of that last fleeting moment he was allowed to be hesitant, worried, or unsure. It drifted off into nothingness, a pointless mental block he had formerly believed to be essential. The feeling of Sakura hovering there, bracketing him with her arms and legs, felt a million times better than staring out of a window, resolving not to touch her. And because Gaara felt comfortable enough by that point, and he did not truly want to resist the slippery slope, he prompted her, “Do tell.”

“I wanted to get you here, like this, alone.”

Her lips migrated beyond his neck, pressing against his temple, and then ghosted over his mouth, “I wanted to take your clothes off.”

In total agreement, Gaara arched to assist with the near ripping removal of his top, and Sakura flung it and the helpless eggshell sash across the room. Her hands slid, cruelly slow, down from either side of his neck down newly nude flesh, finally letting him reach for a kiss. He was frantic about it. The sounds she made were by far more pleased than earlier, and Sakura’s trailing touches halted on his abdomen. She sat back for a moment to appreciate him. Her gaze soaked in the handsome attributes she had only been able to imagine for so long; a chest paler than she would have guessed, unmarked and flawless, the arrangement of muscles that were slight in appearance, arrowing down above his tense stomach.

Upon looking back up, she realized he was staring at her, stumped on what he should do. Gaara’s face was starstruck and sincere.

Sakura added as if to explain, “I wanted to look at you.”

He swallowed and managed to speak, “If that’s all—” Gaara cradled her face in his palms, drawing her near again to be kissed.

Her nails nipped at the flesh of his ribcage, making him shiver. Sakura interrupted, “Hey, no, that is not all—” She broke away from a tantalizing, syrupy sweet kiss, “There’s more on you, isn’t there? If you’re feeling shy tell me, but otherwise…” She hitched at the waistband of his pants and was worryingly proficient at pulling them down.

His shorts remained intact, but poise was failing him, and Gaara rose to a sitting position to topple her over. He forgot that wrestling with Sakura was a waste of effort, rolling and crinkling above a fluffed comforter, and his pants were lost shortly after she pinned him with one powerful arm, flattening him onto his back again. She was thrilled, positively smug, “You can say something, Gaara, if I’m too fast.”

A bit tired, Gaara huffed, “That startled me more than it should have.”

“I don’t know how often you hear this, but…you are stunning.” She offered in consolation, leering, “Really. Can I please have a portrait of you to hide under my pillow?”

What flattery.

Gaara decided he liked it. He managed to get his pinned wrist free, fitting his hands to her waist, and up along her exposed back. Gaara pawed curiously at the collar-like fastener of her mint halter top. He was now favoring her potential disrobing to match his own, but admittedly had no idea how her shirt worked.

Sakura pressed down to be flush against his front, giggling uncontrollably, kissing the cove of his jaw and ear. “Keep trying.”
“You’re better at this.”

“Hardly any.” He acknowledged, “I never decided if I cared or was disappointed about it.”

Gaara’s hands gave up on the blasted, solitary collar around her neck. Shirt or no, he felt the valley of her chest pushed into him, soft motions and wriggling, her breathing driving him wild.

Her fingers kept busy along his stomach, inching up along an invisible ladder, examining the tiny dell between pectorals. It registered to him that it tickled, but brain functionality stopped him from reacting to the feathery touch. A boiling chemical reaction sibilated in his veins, heating every inch of skin, and by way of accidental fiddling Gaara eventually pulled open the two buttons of Sakura’s collar. The halter slid away from her neck, fabric creasing in a heap at her clavicle as Gaara could think of nothing but to fasten his mouth to the pulse point of her throat, to that ceramic-blush skin so perfect that only he would know.

She made breathless, muttering sounds of approval. With nary a moment’s notice, Sakura abruptly peeled back to pull her shirt off, where it disappeared with a toss into the dim room. She dipped back to him, resuming with cautious kisses on his lips, studying them. Gaara’s hands stopped on the back pockets of her shorts as a new detail strayed across his senses. Such a detail pressed flat and warm to his chest.

Gaara did not mistake the lack of undergarment beneath Sakura’s skimpy, summer shirt. Her breasts were a delicate size, from what he could assess as they brushed his skin. He felt her smile, felt her lips draw away from his as she sat upright, straddling him; conjuring, for the first time in her life, some true pride in her slim, petite form. Sakura was nine-tenths certain that he would appreciate seeing her bare-chested, and judging by his stare, yes, yes he was.

In fact, she could not divide her attention from Gaara’s singular, bordering-on-enlightenment gaze at her. Sakura took some time to muse while atop the lord of the Sand Village, ‘I looked at him. Now he can look at me. Gaara may very well try look for forever, but I think I’ll have to live with that.’ She noticed his hands slipping from her backside ‘round to her navel, his eyes blown wide, shiny and glacier-hued.

She was compelled to answer his silence, “I don’t…have to wear much during the summer. Small-chested people can get away with quite a lot.”

“Thank you, it took some time for my friends to convince me, but I’m finally starting to believe it… I’ve got a good thing going on here.” Sakura’s grin was fiery.

Gaara nodded and let his hands roam as far as her ribcage before he stopped himself. She signaled with her face and eyebrows, indicating that he was south of the mark.

He could afford some coherent thought before diving completely overboard, “This is more than you suggested earlier, Sakura.”

“It is… and… I know it’s not exactly what you had in mind for tonight.” Sakura rubbed her thumbs along the backs of his hands, “It’s a lot to put on you after what you told me… and honestly… this was all that I could think about since the afternoon. I never expected you to… it’s just—! You and I hardly ever get the chance to…” She gruffed, rucking over and plopped face-first into cushiony blanket beside him, “I’m sorry. I’m sorry, Gaara… you’ve been through so much. How empathetic am I to hear you out without a single concern, understand your pain and worry— and then not alter my plan at all just so I can sleep with—?”

Gaara had turned toward her, his arms strong and bare and pulling at her; and Sakura’s regrets died on her tongue. Her livewire nerve endings zinged at the temperature of his hand sliding past her face, carding through pink strands as he kissed her, and his other hand was busy introducing itself to her chest. Her attempts at speech garbled into encouraging noises, and Sakura sidelined her dominance so that she might learn what this intriguing, formerly-shy man could do to her.

Eyes narrowed, breaths deep and rumbling, he exalted the petal-soft curves of her and tasted his way down her lips and neck, latching onto the juncture of her shoulder with his mouth. Licentious sounds escaped her while Gaara kneaded one breast, teasing the nipple of the other, dusky rose and pert.

She was electrified by the ministrations, and Sakura could do little else than curl her toes, rake her nails down any free space that she could reach— feel Gaara writhe at her clawing. He was only emboldened. He kissed downward, mouth lingering near the underside-arc of a breast. Testing his lips there, Gaara set his eyes on her face to watch Sakura’s reaction, and found her expression did not give away nearly as much as her grip did.

She had gotten a handle on his head, hands fisting in his hair, on the precipice of accidentally crushing him with legendary strength. Gingerly, Gaara reached up to guide her by the wrists, settling her hands elsewhere for his own safety.

Her apology was a breathy mutter, “Sorry… do you still have… all your brain matter?”

“That feels… good.” She was gulping air and shuddering.

He moved lower, “And here?” His mouth traced down her stomach, lovely and ticklish. Not so gently, Sakura pulled him back up by his chin and replaced him at her chest. Gaara kissed and licked and prodded as his curiosity warranted, and also however Sakura guided him, as a few times she forgot her own strength when she squeezed his hands, shoulders, or back. He deliberately made sounds of pain to remind her that yes, she could break a bone and then some.

While her fingertips torched the skin of his flanks, the sensation so good that it couldn’t be real, Gaara slid his hands under her back and requested, “Arch for a moment.”

She bent and provided space enough for him to deftly remove her white shorts, noting not an ounce of reticence from Sakura. Perhaps it made more sense that she was wearing underwear, plain beige and unadorned. She was humming and growling when he shimmied back to kiss newly exposed thighs. Happily, Sakura allowed the distance and traced patterns in his hair until a lucid thought hit her.

She raised her head up, “Ah, uh… just confirming that we…” She recalled the need to oxygenate and inhaled, “Whew. We’re doing this right? You won’t be coy about sex?”
He blinked up at her. At some point her panties had been slipped down and free of her ankles, bunched in the man’s hand as if he had been reveling in the accomplishment. She flushed with mild embarrassment when Gaara stated, “There is no stopping unless you say so.”

“What about you? What if you say-?”

“I won’t.” Gaara assured her simply, inspecting a small triangle of pink hair between her legs. He touched with enticed curiosity, descending, his ears perking up at her mewl when he met wet flesh. There was nothing about this that could even remotely convince him to stop, Gaara determined. She was a divine creature and she wanted him and all that he was…

Sakura flailed her arm out as if she expected something to be within reach. With a confused mumble, she patted around her discarded clothing at the edge of the bed. Then she stilled. Out of respect for the whirling-in-thought woman Gaara did not proceed, and watched as she worked out a potential problem.

“Did you…” Her voice had to pass through frowning lips, almost in a hiss, “Did you see my purse? Maybe in the living area?”

“I don’t think I did.” Gaara admitted. He pressed a helpful kiss to her inner thigh, holding her legs dutifully.

“What about near the Hot Springs…? I must have brought—” She gritted her teeth in realization, “The festival.”

“The one we left.” He agreed unhelpfully.

“In all likelihood that is the case.”

Her palm slapped against her forehead, perturbed, “As I was saying before, I had all of this planned...”

In the midst of glaring at the ceiling Sakura missed the pleased look on Gaara’s face.

“I had condoms. That’s a responsible precaution, right? Up until I, you know…don’t bring them along for this.”

“I can send a Shadow Cl—”

“Don’t.” Sakura replaced her hands in his hair, where his head rested on her stomach, “No one would question it if they saw you…but it’s late…and I guarantee that Ino picked up my bag for safe keeping.”

“Are you sure she did?”

“Yup. I am. Even drunk, I’m confident that girl would never neglect an accessory. Also, she knows.”

“Ah.”

“Unfortunate.” Gaara echoed her sentiment. There was always the option of a late-night convenience store run, but the two seemed to wordlessly agree that their collective ego would not withstand such an ordeal, let alone be up for intercourse after scrambling uptown for contraception.
‘And this was all on me. I shouldn’t have been in such a hurry to leave…and then all of this, and Gaara was willing and ready!’ She wanted to scream. Sakura took a moment to plug her mouth with a fist to muffle all expletives.

Her error felt like a modern proverb. An eternally bright kunoichi who would capsize her ship of wisdom on a night so pivotal…

Sakura snuck a look down at Gaara, his arms lassoed around her midsection, using her stomach as a pillow. ‘Maybe we could still…erg…jeez. I can’t keep pushing everything tonight!’

She felt his stray, consoling touches breezing down her back, ‘For him I would push it, though. I must be nuts. It’s just…I am one of a generation who’s been indoctrinated with caution…and right here, right now, consequence doesn’t mean diddly-shit to me.’

She glimpsed down again. ‘Hm…but give it nine months and consequence might be born with red hair, Stupid.’ Sakura thought to herself, ‘That’s how all of this works. If I could afford being an idiot, then Shishou never would have given me the time of day…’

Responsibility is a nag. It is the thunder crash warning of their youth, the inconvenient distance between their doorsteps, it is her will as a kunoichi: in the rosy dawn of her career that she would sooner do battle, innovate healing, and gain rank than spoil her efforts and training with an impromptu family; and the Kazekage: an avatar of the interests of Suna, expected to be unattached and conscientious, certainly not the type to ever risk parenthood while he must manage—while he must devotedly juggle interests, alliances, hazards, and the judgement that elders and officials pass on him daily…to not let these balls drop if his life were to take a reckless turn.

Sakura resolved quite simply, “We won’t…be doing that.”

Swiveling his head, Gaara looked up at her, “This is precisely why you say stop.”

“It is?”

“I wasn’t even thinking of being cautious.”

Gaara freed his arms and climbed over her, their faces level again, and then he dropped beside Sakura. “I am not disappointed.” Gaara announced before pulling her close, “I have too much to be grateful for.”

“I know, but the cherry on top wouldn’t have hurt.”

He gave a slight shrug, kissing up her nose and over her eyelids. Their hands slowly, tortuously resumed explorations of each other. In little time at all, Sakura was a coiled spring again, quivering, twisting at voracious touches; breasts well-studied and admired, nipples raised into peaks. His canny hand was on a downhill coast, and the muscles in her belly rolled inward in anticipation of the feeling, baited breath hitching as his fingers teased between her legs. It elicited sounds from her that would absolutely bother neighbors in the building. She pressed her forehead to Gaara’s, her eye contact shameless, her mouth gasping, conveying the sensation however feebly she could.

Her reactions were forceful and Gaara held onto her with a free arm before she could thrash her way up the wall. Instead she wound against him, vine-like; stirring intense, lightning-rod pleasure in him when she pressed her stomach to the erection straining in his boxers.

Even in daydreams he had not gone so far; never envisioned Sakura so bold and vulnerable, pale and pink, never imagined her lips so close to his ear, making the sounds that she was. No, not even in the farthest-flung fantasy he’d had behind closed eyes at his desk in post-work hours…his thoughts had never come close to what Sakura was doing now. What she had asked him to do…

What a strange new reality this was, Gaara thought. He held a long kiss that muffled a whine she made, grinding into his front, her hand a powerful, inescapable cuff around his wrist that held his hand just where she needed it. Though not very learned in such things, Gaara estimated that her arousal was about as urgent as it could get. Where their bodies pressed together a slick spot was left on his upper thigh, his hand damp as she shuddered and twitched around his fingers. If it weren’t out of the question, there was no doubt in his mind that he could slide into her with no resistance. The thought alone nearly undid him.

His breath came in a rasp, lightheaded from the friction of her stomach against his length, both desperate for any means to relieve the pressure, the mounting sensitivity— “Gaara.” It was nearly impossible to resist, not while hearing his name softly groaned, aware that his limit was burning a short-fuse to begin with. Desire dripped with each of her words, “There, like that.” Sakura arranged his hand, reacting with a toss of her head, her hips weakly bucking at his touches.

Within a short passing of time, several things happened. Her back bowed, eyes fluttering shut with a low cry, scraping painted nails up his arm in an attempt to hold onto something. The hot, damp walls around his fingertips contracted, Sakura writhing, fixing her mouth to any bit of his skin she could reach— chest, neck, jaw. The feeling he had restrained mounted absurd new heights at the sight of Sakura cresting the peak, flushed from her cheeks to her chest. He was caught up in the craze, the sounds of her, the scent of her pleasure, the red scratches she etched into him, the bliss of her stomach sliding against the most brutal erection of his young life.

Gaara held a thought for a millisecond: to perhaps apologize for how roughly he had clutched at her bottom. It felt like maybe he had sprouted claws from his fingertips; a narrow, subconscious prickling from Shukaku, but he couldn’t tell. Maybe he had hurt her. Maybe not. It likely didn’t register; she was winding down and sleek with sweat, nuzzling him. Sakura smiled against his lips before she planted a loitering, sinister kiss, barely tracing him with a feather-light touch at the ‘v’ of his stomach; Gaara came fast and hard, head tipped back and mouth parted, definitely eliciting a yelp of pain when he clawed her ass.

He relaxed, boneless, and slurried an apology as he pried his nails out of her skin. Sakura sniffed at him, unamused, “That’s going to leave a mark.”

Gaara rolled flat on his back and noticed, with what little brain power he could muster, the mess he had made of his undershorts. Well. It was mostly her doing. He had some strength left to pull his clothing off, very casual before Sakura’s wide eyes as he wiped his stomach, and tossed it, missing the hamper on the other side of the room. Nope. No hand-eye coordination to speak of.

Unashamed, he laid there as his eyes struggled to remain open, feeling the last of Sakura’s moisture drying from his hand and legs. He turned his head toward her, realizing that she was ogling his fully naked form. Gaara watched her unflinchingly, quite satisfied with the new plateau of intimacy.

“I wasn’t sure before, with you being so smooth all over…” She noted, reaching to stroke dark oxblood hair that stretched down below his navel, “I see you have a treasure trail.”

“Just as I suspected.” Sakura nodded, tired but victorious.

“Was it good?” He brushed a knuckle gently along her cheek, “Was it enough?”

“It was. I’m sorry it couldn’t have been more. We probably would have liked it.”

Gaara shook his head, “At the very least you’re prepared for the next encounter.”

Sakura smiled and then bit the corner of her pillow, thrilled that he had been fully converted to her miscreant ways. Nonchalantly, she went about a superficial healing of her bottom and he apologized again.

“In case you haven’t noticed I got you pretty good too.” As she concluded a hasty repair of her now-porcelain-again ass, Sakura brushed a healing palm up his arm, “Sorry! I couldn’t think straight. Thought I was going to fly off and crash into the ceiling…”

“So…was that…?” She frowned curiously and pointed out, “Those weren’t your normal nails.”

“Sakura, I didn’t mean for that to happen. Shukaku meant to leave me alone, but some things might slip through.”

“It seemed pretty minor.” She shrugged, “I would have even forgiven a tail.”

“No.” He deadpanned.

“Relax, I’m kidding.” Sakura burrowed beneath the ransacked comforter and assisted Gaara in the pilgrimage as well, “Well, I don’t care what happens. You won’t hurt me, Gaara. And you can’t make it awkward since I am now fully informed.” She reached to snap the bedside lamp off.

Sakura did not resist when he greedily pulled her into his arms, wrapping her securely. Gaara felt her tiredly drape a leg over his, settling her head on his shoulder. Her right hand drew the symbol of the Leaf Village over his bare stomach. On a sympathetic reflex, he yawned just after Sakura did.

“Your tummy is sticky.” She stated out loud as she realized it. When she reflected on her words Sakura sucked her lips shut in embarrassment.

“So are my hands and legs.” He was totally unruffled.

“Oh. You know, when I imagined this, I pictured it to be less messy.”

“When I imagined it, nothing I thought of was nearly as good as this was. Maybe I lack the vision? Or maybe, Sakura, you are…” Gaara sighed and caressed up her sides, elevating up to her arms and down again, “I never intended to pressure you into anything while I stay in Leaf.”

“There is no you pressuring me. I would have liked it if you suggested it, though. You know, dropped some hints for me…”

“I was afraid to.”

“Well you shouldn’t be now, Gaara.” Her cloud-nine smile pressed to his chest, “I’m always going to love you. No matter what you tell me, or what you do, I want to love you.”

His hand drifted up to the side of her face to cup her cheek, and Gaara let the words hang in the air while he shut his eyes and replayed them in his head for a long while. Sakura just kept drawing shapes on him, utterly content.

It was a simple fact to him now. She couldn’t be afraid of him. A basic premise of fear was that humans were prone to fearing and fleeing the things they did not understand, ‘And Sakura… understands so much.’ Someone so highly educated, who so enthusiastically embraced the origins of chakra, ninja, and other tales, and who never personally witnessed destruction that Biju or Jinchuriki could unleash, ‘She was never predisposed to be afraid of me. Not even when I first met her, she never reacted with fear.’

The miracle walloped Gaara over the head. He felt dizzy and weightless. It was a rare thing that the girl he had been curious about since arriving in Konoha, later being frustratedly attracted to as a friend, thereafter loving her and all her imperfections and mistakes, then lusting for her while hundreds of miles divided them…she loved him back and he knew she meant it. But it felt so feeble to reply in kind, to try to articulate the insane, intangible gravity that pulled him to her, that feeling that made him wise and stupid all at once, the single great, positive motivation that whispered to him even from his darkest corners.

As she began to doze off he roused her with soft touches along her face, watching her brow crinkle in response. Sakura batted her lips and rolled her eyes up towards him, giving him her attention.

“Why did you notice someone like me?” He wondered, “When I was a stranger and homeless, running with a pack of orphans?”

“What kind of question is that?” She poked his stomach in annoyance, “You…noticed me first, I guess. You were always staring, but you never taunted me or rejected me. That was my routine, back then: get publicly humiliated at the Academy every day. You broke the routine.”

“You’re a stare-er. From way back.”

“I loved you before I even understood it.” Gaara’s hold grew a touch tighter around her, “I was helpless to express it. I had no means. No one had taught me anything beyond violence and suspicion.”

“Naruto and Haku definitely helped with that.” She hummed.

“They at least molded me into an acceptable person, but only by my own effort could I become worthy. In retrospect…it was a very poor showing and I condescended far too much to just about everyone.”

She gave a small shrug, “It’s what you do. Being in charge of a village has helped you grow into it. Besides, I looked up to you a lot, growing up.”

“I was thick-headed.”

Sakura raised her hand above him, motioning for a handshake, which he fuddly obliged. “Hi pot, I’m kettle. Childhood was a scream, wasn’t it?” She shook with him and then pealed with teary-eyed laughter while she regarded his face. No one was perfect, least of all them. ‘Ugh…and…I’m exhausted.’ She thought in surprise, yawning again, ‘I know it wasn’t too much, but I really want to sleep…’ Sakura moved to nestle in closer to the junction of his neck and shoulder, but Gaara used two hands to reposition her and kissed her slow and deep.

“I love you.” He said softly against her mouth, “Are we going to do this again?”
Her sleepy eyes widened a fraction, “Oh, uh, you mean like right now?”

By the sound of it that wasn’t what he’d meant, “If you want to.”

“I honestly do not have the energy at the moment.” Sakura raised her eyebrows suggestively, “But tomorrow morning you’re free, right?”

“I am.”

“I have a team fashion meeting tomorrow at one, but that’s about it.”

Gaara accepted the answer and then drew her close, felt Sakura wriggle and adjust until she was comfortable, and after their nerves and excitement trickled into steady, drumming heartbeats they found sleep.

Morning came and poured a pitcher of liquid sunlight down through every window in Konoha. The rays squeaked through a crack between the drawn black-out drapes in Hatake Sato’s apartment, shining a diagonal line over his bare chest, over his heart.

He jerked from sleep when he was smacked on the shoulder.

A nasal voice complained, “I’m gonna be late!”

The drapes were pulled back with a clatter, spilling morning light into the room, and it jarred him into an awakened state. Sato rubbed at his eyes with the back of his arm, muttering swears, and heaved himself into a sitting position.

His waking mind registered, bit-by-bit, as the blanket rolled back how it was the only modesty covering his (equally) naked bottom. It prompted him to ponder, ‘When did I…get undressed?’ Sato braced his hand at the back of his head; it throbbed from a woozy hurricane of a hangover. The bed was in disarray, and at the foot of it was a grimacing, impatient stranger tucking a blouse into a too-short skirt.

“Hell-ooo, earth to Silver Cat, I guess that was a tough night for you. Answer my question already?”

The girl snipped, “How do I get to the Memorial Fountain from here? Isn’t it like four blocks east and a—”

Sato held his hands up defensively, wincing when his head rung like a church bell, “Who’re you? Do I-?”

“No? Well fuck, then this makes you my souvenir from Hidden Leaf.” She rolled her eyes, snapping a hair clip into thick, ginger hair, “If you don’t remember my name then you don’t deserve to be told it.” The girl had a Grass Village headband tied around her waist. She bent to pull sandals on that had been strewn near the bedroom door.

Swallowing the uneasy feeling that rattled in his throat, Sato kept one guarded eye on the stranger while he reached for discarded shorts on the floor. He was coming up with shockingly few details of what had occurred shortly before midnight and thereafter; he knew he’d been drinking too much, talking too much, and overdoing damn near everything else after his friends had gone home. Sato was certain he did not recognize the Grass kunoichi, yet he undoubtedly felt her on his skin, which had the sudden urge to crawl off of him.

He pulled on pants before she returned her agitated attention to him, “The Memorial Fountain. Should I say it slower? How...do...I...get...there?”

Sato stood near the window, skittish, confused, “Did we-?”

“Yeah, stupid. I’m not getting any younger here; I have a ticket scalper to meet at the Fountain in twenty minutes.” She hissed, “Directions please? Also...how’d your chest get so fucked up? I didn’t notice it last night, but when it ain’t dark it’s...pretty nasty.”

Anger bubbled up from beneath his bemusement, “I’m sorry— I don’t think I signed up for an evaluation from some drop-out groupie.” He rounded the corner of the bed to stand face-to-face with the scowling girl, “My scars are from fighting against the Akatsuki. How about you? Got any battle wounds from whining?”

“You’re a goddamn peach.” She growled, taking a seat to buckle sandal straps, “Much nicer when you’re drunk. Just tell me where the fuck I’m going.”

“I don’t want to help you. Get out of my flat.”

“Hmf.” The kunoichi puffed a strand of hair from her face, standing, looking rather disheveled. The clack of her shoes hurt his ears as she crossed the wood floors of the home, down the hall and out into the living area. Sato followed her to ensure no funny business or violence was in store, but the girl stopped at the genkan as she wrenched open the door.

“Know what, Silver Cat?” She smirked over her shoulder at him, “Next time, stick to your caliber of loser. You are the worst lay I have ever had.” She clip-clopped her way out and the door slammed behind her.

He stood for a whole minute in silence, the volume of air throughout the home weighing down on him with peculiar force. Sato crossed to the kitchen and quickly filled a glass with water at the tap. He downed all of it before filling a tea kettle and setting it on the stove. ‘Hydrate. No coffee today. Makes headaches worse sometimes.’ He’d have tea. He never had tea. ‘It’ll help me think.’ When he caught sight of his convex reflection in the kettle he flinched, ‘No. Don’t think. Don’t think.’

He returned to his room and discerned which belongings were out of sorts. The girl had left a small, woven basket with festival trinkets in it. It sat on the desk near the door, likely where they cast things aside before messing around. Sato acted with animal detachment; eyes unseeing as he stripped the bedding to be washed, tossed all items the girl had brought into the garbage. She was never there. He never wanted her to be there and he could make it that way.

But the act was still clinging to his skin. In the shower room he scrubbed himself raw and pink, all of his body from top to bottom. Sato lathered his hair and rinsed several times; worked soap under his nails to be sure nothing was left. Heshed the touches and smells. He brushed his teeth twice before looking in the mirror, wondering what the actual fuck he was doing.

Like some prey animal trying to evade a predator, he was trying to disguise it, as if he were rolling in the mud of the wilds to hide himself— hide something.

Sato dried and dressed in shorts again, anticipating a change into the clothing he and his team agreed would get attention at the Exam. The attire that was passed down in his family, the white-and-red mon of the Hatake clan.

Seated in the kitchen again, he steeped chamomile in a mug and held his head, bracing his elbows on the table. The tea came from a canister that Tama had left in the upper-right cabinet, for whenever she felt like having it.

Tama.

He didn’t want to think about it, but whenever his stream of consciousness tried to skirt the apparent problem, something in his home, or any lone thought that crossed him was free-associated back to her. Someone so instrumental in his life was bound to stay on his mind.

And it was not sitting well with him that he had been unfaithful to the woman he promised to marry.

He thought it and then he could not unthink it. He could not avoid it. After Sato had doggedly pursued Tama’s attention and consent for weeks, playing with her, craving her, seducing her at every opportunity, it had been an easy trade to find a willing floozy after midnight in the park. No, he found, it had not taken the edge off. No, he admitted, it had not been worth the regret and shame.
No: it couldn’t have happened, he wanted to scream, but he did remember it a little.

It had felt rash, it lit him up, it had been completely satisfying for all of fifty seconds, even if he didn’t know the person— actually quite disliked the person by morning. No, it wasn’t what he thought it’d be. And yes, if he’d known all of this newly-initiated information several hours ago, he would have held out and begged the person he really loved to consider him or at least dump a bucket of ice water over him. That would have made sense, Sato believed it down to his bones, but he couldn’t take back what he’d done.

He sipped the tea anxiously.

There was a chamber in the dim dungeon of his brain within which he resented Tama. It was amazing how she had found so many ways to avoid sex with him. Always a good excuse, well-thought out, and earnest…but she’d tempted him and touched him and had gone with him to the edge of intimacy. There was no question that she wanted it. But Sato could not reconcile her demands of waiting when it was she who had pressed him to be serious about their relationship, back when he’d been ambivalent. It had been her, training him with the demanding, impure kisses of an adult; her friendship and laughter that made him confident, she who knew him better than anyone… that he’d realized it would be a joy to be married to her now that he could see it for the privilege it was and not the burden.

Their two esteemed families wished to unite. It was something both of their uncles were proud of,
and a testament to their indomitable friendship.

As honor was an especially precious thing to her kindred, there was no doubt that any knowledge of this transgression would permanently damage both his and Kakashi’s relationship with the Maito family. Sato took a gulp of tea and set the mug down, ‘I fucked up. I…I don’t know if anyone witnessed me…well. Sai was around, I think. I can ask him what he remembers, but he probably wouldn’t talk about it even if he had a clue…’ No one could know, ‘Everyone else hardly knew me or noticed me…at least I think so. It seems safe to say this won’t get out…’

It had to go beyond denial. He had to live and think and breathe as though it had never occurred.
Destroy evidence, confirm the lack of witnesses, and then move on. No dishonor. No discord. Stick to the plan their uncles had set forth: as he now realized it was a very, very good plan.

Sato sipped the tea, gradually acknowledging that while he intended to save face, he wanted to consider Tama’s feelings above all else.

He could not beg for forgiveness in a fit of guilt, desperate to clear his conscience— could not ask her to absolve him of the misdeed. This was the person who had stood by him all of his life, and had vowed to stay by his side until her death. There was no space for penance or her acknowledgment. Tama had been raised by Maito Ken and looked up to Maito Gai, neither of whom accepted betrayal lightly. Sato didn’t have to ruminate on it long to know that Tama would not forgive him; that she had not the means to forgive him after caring for him and supporting him in the wake of his mother’s death. None of the adults had looked out for him in those years: it had been her putting food in his mouth, clothes on his back, contributing money to heat and light his home: from eleven years old and onward.

This was not how he repaid her.

‘I will live with the guilt. I’ll hold my tongue.’ He decided, sliding his chair back, ‘I don’t want to hurt her that way. I love Tama and she deserves someone better than a screw-up like me, so might as well BE that guy. Be the better guy. I could never do something like this again, and if I put it behind me…if she doesn’t know…I won’t make her unhappy. I know I can make her happy.’

He set an empty tea cup in the sink, inhaling deeply through his nose.

It was an odd exercise trying to commence the day as he would have normally. He’d been too nervous to eat. He stuffed the linens, sheets, and blanket roughly into the washing machine, the setting cranked to hot water. He cracked the living room window to wait for Aree and Aroo to report the whereabouts of his friends to him. He mussed his silver hair into place in the bathroom mirror. Sato mused at his reflection again, making a concerted effort not to hate it—not the dark blue eyes his father had given him, or the delicate silver coloring his mother had passed down. The shape of his face was like those of the men before him, ‘Like my uncle and grandpa.’ Sato jerked back from the sink, startled by the resemblance. The two famous screw-ups before him, and he was starting to resemble them in more ways than one.

He padded down the hallway; shoulders slumped, and then pulled the vintage clothing from hangers in the closet. Maybe the new attire would separate him from the person he’d been last night. Maybe he could be new.

‘If I can look it...maybe I can act it.’ Sato hoped, slipping on a black shrug of full-length sleeves, the hybrid cuffs looped around the middle finger of each hand, and then knotted the shrug tight across his chest. ‘Gee. It’s old school. Not actually new...but from Grandpa’s days...’ He tugged on a white and red gi-tunic and fastened it closed, ‘I never got to know Grandpa. Kakashi has a hard time talking about him...but Mom used to say he was super polite and really nice.’ The black pants were slim and tucked snugly into knee-boots. Supply and tool pouches hooked to the belt at his lower back, and he clipped his short swords at his sides, starting to frown with worry.

‘I’m not a new person because of what I’m wearing. It’s because of what I did. I feel...’ Sato shut his eyes and could see flashes of his actions. They choked him with disgust, sorrow, and loneliness. He was adrift, completely alone with the knowledge and guilt, and if no one else ever knew about it, it really was going to be an indefinite tango with self-reproach that he danced until his last breath.

His eyes scanned over the shoulder seams of the tunic where Hinata had taken in the fabric, remembering it had once belonged to a broader, older man. Sato worked up the courage to examine himself in the full-length mirror of the room one last time. Grandpa Sakumo blinked back at him for a moment, glinting in the sunlight, and it felt good. It felt like home. It felt familiar. Then the cloying, warm emotion flushed away and something else replaced it.

Abject humiliation coursed through him. ‘That’s not you. That’s a fake. A pretender! You always want to point out and make fun of the flaws of others, and now you’re cowering in the corner! Hatake Sato: lighthearted fun and jokes, easy to talk to, great dancer, amateur photographer,
He blinked a tear from his eye and glowered at himself. ‘You don’t deserve to feel sad or scared. You have to own your mistakes. You have to hoard them like an ogre and conceal them from those they can hurt. Maybe that’s what your ‘Ninja Way’ is. Coward.’

Aree had soared into the room from the hallway and perched on his shoulder. Sato cleared his throat and rubbed at his eyes, asking, “Where’s…eh-hem…your brother?”

The screech owl tooted and he walked with her aboard towards the living area.

“She’s not here anymore.” Sato motioned the small bird off of his arm and out the window, “Go eat. The both of you meet me later.”

She flew off. He shut and latched the window, exited the home, and locked the door behind him, hoping no one else unexpected would ever set foot there again.

Hinata clapped excitedly when she saw him.

She exchanged a wide grin with their Sensei, Kurenai resting her hands on her hips, and then tittered as Sato came to a stop beside Shino in their huddle. The cacophony of birdsong was almost distracting, blaring from the massive flock flitting around the maples of their training area. Shino kept his insects safely tucked away.

“How perfectly it suits you.” Kurenai smiled at him, “I’m feeling a little nostalgic, Sato. I remember being a little girl and listening to stories about Konoha’s White Fang.”

“Yeah?” His reply was weak, not genuinely enthusiastic, “Thanks, Sensei. Those shoes are too big for me to fill.”

“Ah, but the clothes are not.”

Shino had turned his head and was considering him, pinning him with a hard, wondering look. Sato swallowed, took a breath, and began somewhat believable conversation with Hinata, complimenting her updated attire.

“Father wanted our clan’s mon all over it…” She sighed with mild embarrassment, spinning around. The Hyuga clan’s crest was embroidered on the breast of the short yukata, on both sleeves at the shoulder, and sewn in a huge insignia on the back above her obi. The garment was functional but opulent, white blending into lavender, thistle, and amethyst; her long shorts were tight and dyed a deep violet. She had kept her standard black sandals, her supply pouches and weapon holsters in their usual stations.

“Absolutely rad.” Sato assured her, “Does he want you to tie your hair up? Just in case someone misses an emblem?”

“I think Father mentioned that. He’s really looking forward to Neji-niisan and I competing in the “Tournament.” She pressed her fingers over her mouth to stop herself, as if her cousin were a taboo subject.

“It’s alright, Sunshine. You can talk about Neji.” Sato shrunk a bit as he spoke, “He’ll probably whoop me ‘good.”

“That’s not what you were saying yesterday.” Shino pointed out.

“I was hyped yesterday. Now I’m…” Sato looked between his Sensei and teammates, grasping for the word, “I’m tuckered out.”

“Did you enjoy yourself at the Festival last night?” Kurenai smiled knowingly, “The Hokage was telling me about it this morning. She spoke of its highlights and low points.”

Hinata stayed quiet but recalled Neji looking haggard when he returned home the night previous, sopping wet and bedraggled. ‘I know that he brought Tenten-oneesan and Lee-kun home…but what happened to him?’ She had not seen him at breakfast a few hours ago, and inferred that he was still scrunched in a ball in bed, recovering.

“Yeah, it was a nice way to unwind from training. Tama and I danced pretty much the whole time.” His tongue burned when he spoke her name.

Kurenai was pleased, “I heard. Tsunade-sama adored the performance.”

Shino was still looking at him.

“I hope Lee-kun is alright…” Hinata fidgeted with her sleeves, “He seemed so sick and confused.”

Kurenai asked to be filled in and got a laugh out of it. She assured the girl that no lasting damage could befall Lee. Sato had turned his attention to his best friend, doing a double-take as he examined Shino’s transformative change.

Overcoats and bulky clothing were preferred by members of the Aburame clan, this Sato knew. But his friend had been shucked out of his typical coat, and Sato observed him for the first time: dressed in a form-fitting jumpsuit of heavy combat material. He too had put on knee-high boots.

“Oh. Oh. Hold on.” Sato prodded at the material along Shino’s arms, reasserting a bit of his usual temperament, “I think Hinata put more work into your fitting, man, wow.”

Shino said nothing as Sato fiddled with the hood attached to the suit, pulling it up and down, ruffling Shino’s hair. “Sturdy.” Sato noted. It came as no surprise to him that Shino would feel more comfortable with something covering his head, like usual. The ensemble made him look taller and formidable; outlined in black from shoulder to ankle, deep hunter green contrasting in hexagon patterns at the torso and hips. His updated sunglasses were modern, visor-like, gleaming and just purchased. Sato unclasped them at the back and pulled the glasses from his friend’s head to try them on.

“They are.” Shino said flatly.

Kurenai and Hinata were staring at his face while Sato (off to the side) gawked at surroundings in his distinctive Sato-way, and Shino looked back at them questioningly.
“My, my…you have grown up.” Kurenai chuckled and cupped her chin, “Shino. You may benefit from not concealing your face in the Final Rounds.”

His cheeks pinkened.

Sato removed the sunglasses and weighed in on the matter, “You really are a stud, Shino. I say you wear these on your way into the stadium and then take ‘em off…slay some ladies in the audience when they least expect it.” He grinned, Kurenai and Hinata chirping in agreement. “We could get double the points from just you doing that!”

“No. For real.” Sato insisted, “Just try it.”

Shino took a steadying breath and replaced his glasses when Sato handed them back. To be fair, Kurenai assured her students that they were all highly attractive and sure to instigate competitive betting. She’d expected no less of them, puffing her chest proudly as she tried to digest how grown-up they looked.

Kurenai took up most of the morning going over theoretical outcomes with them. The “if/then” scenarios of how duels could play out determined the possibilities of who they would face later as opponents. There was a concerning likelihood that, if Hinata proceeded to the second round, she could potentially face Sato, Neji, or Lee as potential opponents. She whimpered at the idea. Kurenai added that Shino could advance to the second round to face Tama or Huo, and beyond that point, any of the victorious Leaf kunoichi or perhaps the Grass ninja, Aota.

“Don’t sweat it, Sunshine. I’ll do my damnedest to make sure you don’t have a grudge match against your cousin.” Sato patted her shoulder.

“I know you will, Sato-kun. But no matter what these matches will be very challenging.”

“I am confident my team will go far. I am also confident I will see one of you as the Champion.” Kurenai boasted, “I will be putting money on all of you.”

Shino gently reminded her that the odds of winning were irrespective of favoritism, but Kurenai tsk, tsk’d him. She had a shrewd gambling instinct and an itching left palm.

After some lengthy discussion and minor strategizing, Kurenai asked to see demonstrations of jutsu she had been monitoring and critiquing for the last few weeks. They took turns displaying Ninjutsu and the like, and by noon she had invited her students to join her for lunch at her favorite izakaya.

While walking through town, Sato and Shino followed a few paces behind Kurenai and Hinata, who was soliciting a fervent pep-talk from her Sensei as nerves started to get to her. Sato was listening in until he felt Shino poke his side with an elbow.

His tone was soft and attentive, “What happened?”

“Huh?”

“What happened to you?” Shino clarified.

“Er…nothing…?” Sato was smack-dab between unsure and evasive.
“I thought it would have been in your best interest if I escorted you home last night. You were… highly intoxicated.” A disapproving sniff, “But Sai-san was with you. My father was expecting me home and I returned…but I know I shouldn’t have.”

“What are you talking-?”

“You needed help. You were among strangers.” Shino said simply, “And I left you when I shouldn’t have.”

“N-No, it’s not like that! I’m fine, Shino, really.” He tapped his chest with both hands, “See? All in one piece.”

After a beat, a wise retort, “Not on the inside.”

Sato settled a distressed, side-eye glance on his friend but admitted to nothing.

“What happened to you?” Shino asked again.

They traveled a block in silence, lagging behind the other half of the team.

“Yeah, well, I can’t be happy all the time—”

“That’s who you are. You are carefree. In the Academy, I watched you. I saw you on the day your mother died, and you returned to class the same afternoon with a counselor. You were different. This is like then.”

“No…it’s n-not—” His voice faltered into a warble.

“I take responsibility for your pain.” Shino spoke with surety.

“Don’t.” Abruptly, Sato latched onto the arm of Shino’s uniform, holding tight, “Only I can do that. I fucked up. You can’t be blamed for going home, Shino. That’s what smart people do.”

Shino regarded him with a head-tilt, pausing to think, and then said, “Tell me what happened.”

“N-Not here.”

“Not here. The conservatory will not be busy in the afternoon. We’ll go there.”

“I don’t…really want you to know.” Sato coughed softly, trying to clear a thickening throat, “I don’t think I can handle…anyone’s judgement. Least of all yours…”

“If I had wanted to condemn you for acting foolishly, I would have done that long ago.” Shino assured him.

They stopped outside of the entryway of the pub, hearing Kurenai’s call for them to hurry and be seated so they could order.

Shino peered at him over his glasses, “There is nothing my friend can do…that would inspire me to forsake him.” He pushed aside the door’s noren, “You are far too precious.”
An hour later, a few miles northwest of Kurenai’s favorite pub, Lee arrived at the Hyuga compound. He had spent most of the walk recalling, in surprising detail, what bizarre feelings had overcome him before the end of the festival. It was a bit blurry when Lee tried to remember how Neji and Tenten had gotten him home, but he did remember his grandfather caring for him and sending him to bed.

Lee rubbed his chin, “Hm. I remember…screeching. As if Tenten and Neji…had been shouting in my house…” That did not make much sense to him. Surely he had dreamed it.

At the corner veranda of the Main House, Lee spotted Fujita sipping tea and eating cherries from a breakfast tray. He greeted his young friend and Fujita waved to him with a mouthful of fruit.

“Fujita-kun! Are you feeling better?”

“Good morning, Lee-kun! Almost completely better.” He smiled childishly, “It helped a lot that Mother allowed me to eat my favorite things for four weeks.”

He gestured for Lee to help himself to a cherry. They munched and spat seeds into a refuse bowl.

“Ah. Thank you…do you know if Neji is here? I know we had one last appointment with Kayatosama.”

Fujita inclined his head, glancing back at the house, “You know…he wasn’t up at the normal time today. Hinata-sama was long gone before I saw Neji-sama appear.” With a quick scan of his Byakugan, Fujita reported, “Ah. He is washing his face. He seems…lethargic today.”

At Fujita’s suggestion Lee walked ‘round the house to the correct side and took a seat on the engawa to wait outside of Neji’s room. In the same second Lee thought of Tenten arriving on time, she trudged around the bend.

“Good morning Tenten-!”

“Shhh.” She held up her hands and squinted, “Go easy on me, Lee. Try to speak softly.”

In a whisper, “Whatever is the matter?”

She plopped down beside him on the porch.

“You don’t remember? Neji and I…well…we were drinking last night. I can’t believe we got you home safely.”

Lee half-bowed to her, “Thank you so much for looking after me.”

“Please don’t thank us. We’re part of the reason you suffered.” Tenten mumbled and then smiled, “We’ll do better next time, Lee. We have your back.”

“You already do.”

“Well yes, but next time we won’t be drunk.” She resolved, rubbing her temples. Drowsily, Tenten keened over and rested her head on her friend’s shoulder, “Ugh…what were we thinking?”

Lee was smiling, “You were both having fun.”

“It was fun. I even liked some of those silly dances. Maybe next time I’ll get Neji to join in.”
“It will take coaxing.”

“That’s what I do. I coax him.”

Lee made a sound of utter skepticism. He could hardly imagine his committed, square-of-a-friend participating in a dance.

“Oh god, just look at my face!” Tenten rumbled, lifting her head up and gesturing to the bags under her eyes, “See these dark circles? I’ve never had ‘em before. I don’t know how to get rid of them.”

“Sleep!”

“I did that.”

“Water?”

“I don’t know! I have no practical experience with vanity and women’s tricks to preserve it.”

“Then perhaps you should ask Yugao-san? You mentioned that she was going to assist with grooming our team, no?”

“By tomorrow you’ll be—” Lee trailed off as they watched Neji shuffle out of a porch door and slide it quietly shut behind him. He stood before them in his sleep clothes.

They stared until Tenten chose to greet her boyfriend, “You look swollen.”

“I fell down a fire escape.” He defended.

Lee gasped.

“Relax. It was just one ladder.” Tenten filled Lee in, “Neji, you look to be badly in need of some hangover remedies.”

“My uncle said that as well.”

Tenten and Lee inhaled sharply in fright.

“It was a mild scolding.” Neji assured them.

“And to you, good morning, I suppose.” He groggily cupped his face and tried to massage the pain away.

“As soon as we complete the fittings we should return to my house. Grandpa already has meals prepared for you both.” Lee smiled slightly, “He wanted to thank you for your help last night.”

Tenten was aghast, “Really? What did he make?”

“Pu’er tea, ginger pancakes, and more congee. How curious that he made so much! It is as if Grandpa expected this would happen.”

They followed Neji (still in his pajamas) through his bedroom to traverse the hallways of the house.
Tenten had let her eyes linger on her boyfriend’s tousled bed, picturing herself there reclining like a queen, and then treded after her teammates in silence, a tad hot and bothered. ‘No. Stick to the task at hand! Don’t start imagining that stuff!’ Her eyebrows knitted in a frown, ‘It’s bad enough I wasted an hour masturbating last night when I should have been sleeping. I need to cool off.’

At the end of the central corridor, Kayato had prepared two rooms to allow the teens to try on their outfits. She stayed with Tenten to assist with shrugging and tying the young woman into her clothing, and the boys changed in the adjacent room.

“How are the sleeves? Better, I hope! I know they nearly cut off your circulation last time.” The woman was chuckling, “You put on some muscle, dear. It threw off my measurements!”

“Perfectly comfortable, now. The wrists were a bit long and constricting, and I need space to wear my spinners.” Tenten explained.

“Yes, Neji-sama told me.” Kayato heaved and squeezed the half-rigid obi into place.

It was a Hanfu dress of candy red with form-fitting sleeves, the collar was relaxed like a fighting gi, and the garment was held closed by a flexible, tight obi of bright white and gold. The belt was adorned with a crimson obijime, knotted in a bow at the front, long tassels loose and free. At her back, the obi had been crafted with space for tool scrolls and holsters which Tenten was eager to fill. She pulled on slim, white capri pants beneath the dress, for some modesty where the dress ended mid-thigh. Embroidered in threads of gold, sandstone, ivory, and indigo, a dragon wound up the hip of her dress, across her chest, coiled above her heart.

“This could be...my proudest work for a kunoichi.” Kayato sighed, patting Tenten around the belt’s edges, relaxing the fabric where it bunched. “Isn’t it beautiful?”

“It is! My mother never had anything like this...and she wore some glitzy stuff on missions.” Tenten was grinning uncontrollably even before she stepped in front of the wall mirror, “Kayato-san, will you forgive me if I stick to reasonable footwear?”

“I ordered the red sandals special in your size.” The woman’s face dropped.

“They pinched.” Tenten pursed her lips, apologetic.

“That’s because they’re new! Wear them around today and break them in.” The woman patted Tenten on her shoulders, “It’d be a shame to ruin this ensemble!”

“Okay. I just thought I’d ask.”

“I heard you’ll have your hair done in the morning?”

“All right, everyone is getting their hair done in the morning. And Yugao may need to apply makeup too...” Tenten supposed, gesturing to her face, “Um...can you tell me how to get rid of dark under-eye circles?”

“Oh darling, I’ll write you a list of my remedies. Raw potato, cucumber, almond oil...”

“I don’t think I own any of that.”

“Then it’s time to buy some.”

The adjoining door slid aside and Neji stuck his less-puffy face through. Kayato turned and bit her tongue gleefully as the heir of the Hyuga clan blinked in astonishment at the beautiful girl she had dressed.

Tenten grinned and waggled her eyebrows at him mischievously, “I’m a dragon.”

He took a moment to regain speech, “I see. That.”

“Are you two all set?” Tenten asked.

Neji opened the door fully so that Tenten and his esteemed aunt could see for themselves.

Hanfu had also inspired his attire in a design similar to Tenten’s, the top stark white with black trimming and clasps, loose sleeves, and belted by sashes in three vivid shades of blue. A red-crowned crane was depicted in a silhouette on the right shoulder. At his back, the Hyuga clan’s crest was striking, where it could be glimpsed from beneath his hair. His pants were black, tied and tucked into fleet-footed Han boots. Tenten made several faces at him, ranging from aesthetic approval to untamed attraction.

“You both look amazing!” Lee declared as he rushed in to join them, drawing his friends’ gazes immediately.

Lee was a movie star.

He was precisely fit in a canary-hued jumpsuit a la ‘Game of Death,’ as Kayato had made good on her wild claim of designing for film actors. Black bars dripped down the flanks and arms of the jumpsuit; bold contrast that drew attention to Lee’s height and lean figure. A dark belt was secured around his hips, saddled with weapon holsters, and there had been no need for him to change his footwear. Lee looked positively modern beside Neji and Tenten’s ancient martial arts costumes. The friends gawked at each other.

“This assures me that I have done my job well.” Kayato beamed and tittered with laughter behind her hand, proud and ladylike, “I quite enjoyed this! You’re all fitted now. Please remember that I’m sending my photographer to find you three in the morning. This work is going in my portfolio.”

They agreed stupidly and profusely before Kayato ushered them along; she was expecting a string of appointments.

Across town, a short time later, Wong Leung nearly went into cardiac arrest at the sight of them.

Remarkable. He muttered to Lee, fussing at Neji and Tenten as they entered the house, I have never seen clothing here in the Fire Country that looked so much like the styles of my homeland! Although, Lee… I am unsure what you are wearing.

Lee explained, Miss Kayato said she designed this costume for a movie star.

Is that so? Such work was not done cheaply. Wong motioned for the youngsters to take seats at the table and help themselves to a spread of food.

Neji was kind enough to pay for us. We thanked him for his generosity. As Lee explained, he smiled unthinkingly at his friend, and Neji could only scrunch his face in the usual I-don’t-know-what-you’re-talking-about expression he used for most Hanwen conversations.
Tenten smiled and chuckled to herself knowingly.

Good. He’s obviously rich. Wong Leung snorted, He should be taking care of you and Tian-Tian.

Neji’s ears perked up. Tenten’s name in a foreign tongue was still recognizable.

Wong Leung’s rude remark was met with admonishing expressions from both Lee and Tenten, but the grandfather frowned back at them as he stood by his opinion. They tucked into their food and tea while the old man stood by with his arms folded behind his back.

He asked curiously, None of you are competing against one another in the Tournament?

Not in the first round. Tenten assured him, But maybe we will in subsequent duels.

Hmm. Wong Leung pattered around the kitchen as he considered it.

Grandpa, would you be interested in spectating the conclusion of the Chunin Exam tomorrow? Lee wondered, growing excited, You could see the fruits of our hard work!

Normally, the quibbles of ninja do not interest me…and they fight like barbarians… The old man gruffed, But I do want to see how much you’ve all grown.

We have a spare ticket for you. Tenten added cheerily.

Thoughtful girl! Thank you.

Neji could only pick out the words ‘tomorrow,’ ‘you,’ ‘we,’ and ‘thank you.’ It did not reveal much.

Lee translated for him, “Grandpa told us that he would like to watch our matches tomorrow, Neji. He also wanted to thank you for generously compensating Kayato-san for our outfits.”

“Think nothing of it.” Neji replied, eyeing Wong Leung, suspecting that was not exactly what the old man had said.

“Ah.” That cleared up Neji’s suspicion.

The hangover-cure foods indeed did help. Wong Leung seemed to have completely forgiven Neji and Tenten’s drunken delivery of his stoned grandson the night before, and after the meal he exited the home with them and accompanied them as far as the Han Ethnic Quarter’s market where he set out to shop.

The team continued uptown to the ticket office near the stadium. Gai had said three tickets were on reserve for guests, but it outnumbered the potential spectators they would be able to invite…or so they’d thought. Lee queued up in a somewhat short line to secure his grandfather’s complementary ticket. Tenten and Neji watched interestedly as some of their friends and fellow finalists circled near the box office as well.

Gaara was handing over what could have been pocket money to his excited, chattering student, Matsuri. Sakura was a few steps away, giving recommendations to the girl on places to see before the day was out. Other youngsters were nearby waiting for Matsuri to join them.

Tenten tapped her lips in thought, ‘Where did Sakura and Gaara go last night? They didn’t stay very long at the festival…’
She turned to Neji, “Do you think-?”

“They did.”

“How can you tell?” Tenten muttered, “Maybe they’re just…well rested?”

“I can see…” Neji trailed off and decided he didn’t want to explain.

“What? What?” Tenten was instantly nosy and curious, “Neji. You can’t leave me hanging. Spill.”

“There are incriminating marks and scratches on them.” He assessed with a flash of his eyes.

She sighed wistfully, thinking, ‘That could’ve been me and Neji…”

“They had the right idea to leave early.” Neji considered.

Tenten nodded in agreement, certain that they could’ve gotten someone to babysit Lee and avert disaster. Alas, the opportunity had passed, and now they had to fight for glory and Chunin promotions, possibly against each other.

Ino appeared in a full-pelt run, bounding at least two blocks ahead of Shikamaru and Chouji behind her (who definitely had no idea what the rush was.) When she entered the plaza, chest heaving, her new, flashy outfit in place, Sakura complimented her blonde friend while Ino caught her breath.

Shaking her head apologetically, Ino handed a purse to Sakura, “I am…so sorry. I wasn’t thinking! I should’ve brought this to you-!”

“It’s fine.” Sakura smiled meekly, “We’re fine. It wasn’t your responsibility Ino, and I’m too forgetful for my own good.”

“Not my responsibility?” Ino grumbled, looking between Sakura and Gaara, the latter looking more human than ever beneath her discerning stare. Ino dropped her voice as Shikamaru and Chouji trudged into the plaza behind her, “I’ve spent months trying to get you laid. It’s been, like, the most personal, impossible mission I’ve ever undertaken.”

“Thank you.” Gaara said sincerely.

Sakura hung her head in embarrassment and tugged her boyfriend along, muttering gratitude to Ino as well. As Sakura slinked away, in possession of her purse and its crucial contents, Shikamaru scratched his cheek and gave Ino a blank look.

“That’s it? You had to return Sakura’s bag?”

“Don’t make me explain.” Ino warned, watching her pink haired (and likely) newly-laid friend trod off into the bowels of Konoha with the Kazekage.

“I think I get it.” Chouji said innocuously.

“I don’t think I want to get it.” Shikamaru supposed.

“Yup, because it’s really none of our business.” Ino determined, marching towards the growing line, “We’re going to need extra tickets for our parents, right? You both had better wait in line with me, or at least get me a smoothie or something.”

Whipped, her teammates acquiesced to Ino’s demands. They queued up behind Kiba and Tama, who were making small talk with Hinata ahead of them.
“Where’s Stupid and Shino?” Kiba wondered.

“Don’t call him that, Kiba-kun!” Tama sniffed in aggravation and her teammate wilted in apology.

“I think they said they were going to spend some time in the nature conservatory. They’ve been talking a lot today.” Hinata noted, “They went there right after we ate lunch.”

“Huh. I really thought Sato-kun would find me first thing this morning…” Tama was perplexed.

“He will find you as soon as he is able.” Hinata soothed her friend.

“Speaking of our team, where’d Sakura go?” Kiba noted.

“She went somewhere with Gaara-kun. I know her parents asked them to stop by.” Tama giggled at the thought, “She keeps blushing and looking so embarrassed! I wonder if Gaara asked her dad something important?”

Kiba and Hinata chorused in astounded gasps.

“Maybe!” Tama laughed.

The Finalists in line continued to chat and compliment each other on some very snazzy outfits while they waited.

And though Sakura and Gaara did spend most of that day shooting the breeze with the eternally pleasant Haruno Kizashi, no: Gaara did not ask any important questions. And no, the condoms in Sakura’s purse were not used, nor was there an occasion for her to use them whilst occupied so. Gaara was coerced to stay for dinner, dessert, and wine before he went home alone and fell asleep. Sakura had also retired early on account of her parent’s offering of sake. It seemed strategic.

No, Tama did not see hide nor hair of Sato, not even after she and Kakashi had gone looking for him. Little did they know that Sato was laying low at, of all places, Shino’s bedroom after he had broken down into a sobbing, shameful mess. Shino had been very understanding, as he’d vowed, and did not parse the recollected events that Sato had confided. He listened. He brought coffee. He summoned some butterflies into his room and listened more to his friend.

Tama spent the evening with her parents, battling the acute ache in her chest as she missed her beloved, and allowed her mother to complete an alteration to her mysterious and so far unseen Exam outfit.

Kiba visited his father in his post-trial-conviction jail cell and happily informed him of his plans for the Chunin Exam Tournament. Nichiyo conversed with him civilly, still apologizing for his crimes, and the two got on surprisingly well considering the circumstances.

Hinata and Neji were subjected to the hubbub of Main and Branch attendees at a celebratory clan dinner. Nearly all of their extended family wished them the best of luck at the Tournament. Elder Haburo was distinctly absent from the festivities.

Tenten dropped off braised chicken feet and dumplings for Lee and his grandfather to enjoy for dinner, and then stopped by the Memorial Stone to ask for her parents’ guidance in her matches the next day. She returned home that night and polished her jian, Hok, as she played old recordings of her mother’s bar crooning as well as magnificent, soprano performances for the daimyo of the Land of Fire.

Kakashi and Asuma kibitzed at their favorite bar until it closed at an ungodly hour.

Kurenai slept soundly until Asuma returned to her and curled up on his side of the bed, muttering sweet nothings, futilely proposing marriage for the twenty-third time.

In the wee, dark hours of morning, in ANBU uniforms at the pre-security checks of the stadium, Tenzo gave a variety of examples to Sai about how to treat others with kindness.

Huo did not sleep. His Sensei slept trembling in fear of him.

Tsunade dreamed and snored with a smile on her face, as if Dan were still there.

In Nanakusa, Haku rose before dawn to assist Hiroshi with preparing and opening his tea shop. Pua returned to her master with a much friendlier message from Temari, and his heart leaped.

In Sunagakure, Kankuro woke up late while Temari was on-time, organizing Gaara’s desk; wondering why she’d sent such a weak, sappy bit of correspondence to her once-not-exactly sweetheart.

In Shincha, as the sun rose, Obito awoke to the sounds of Rin and Yuma arguing about what was for breakfast.

Kakashi woke in the morning and cornered his nephew, wondering what was wrong, “Won’t you tell me what’s bothering you?” And the boy denied that anything had unsettled him.

Naruto learned from Fukasaku that the great Toad Sage was named Gamamaru, and that Gamamaru was older than dirt and knew billions of tidbits for trivia games. No, it wasn’t time to meet him yet. They returned to the Toad Oil pool for another day of training, and Naruto tried not to think about how that day, his good friends were going to clash for the title of Chunin without him.

He smiled with homesickness, muttering as he climbed the stone steps, “I’ll be right behind you guys.”

26th of June, 8:49AM— Konoha Sports Stadium

With the Tournament set to commence at 9:00AM, most all of the finalists were completely dressed, powdered, and preened; gathered in a designated participants-only lounge on the ground floor of the stadium.

Those assembled counted it a blessing that Huo had not appeared. Even the Grass ninja, Aota, said that he was relieved the Rock genin was avoiding public spaces.

Shizune occasionally paused in her pacing to reply to transmissions on her two-way radio, Ton-Ton skittering behind her near the entrance of the roped-off concourse.

“Right…” The woman took a breath to settle her nerves and then addressed the Genin, “Please listen, everyone. Tsunade-sama notified me that her high-profile guests are now seated in the VIP booth with her. I’ll be given a signal in a few minutes to send you out for the grand entrance, just like we discussed.”

Sakura added to the thought, “And we can enter solo or with our teams, right?”
“You can. I’ll radio ahead to the announcer a few seconds before he welcomes you to the arena.”
Shizune nodded, “It’s a lot of fanfare, isn’t it? But the stadium is packed to capacity. This event drew even more fans than the previous Exam…and I certainly do I hope things go smoothly this year.”
She’d heard the tales of the Konoha Crush Invasion.

Soon after that they were shepherded into a discreet passageway that would allow them into the arena, its dirt floor dusty from recent leveling, cracked and dry in the morning sun.

Perhaps because he was in the minority by being on his own, the good-looking brunette, Yanagisawa Aota, waved obligingly to his peers before setting out first. A distant voice sounded over surround speakers, reverberating through the narrow hallway, and the announcement was drowned in the excited roar of the opening ceremony.

And Sakura indicated with mouthing and finger pointing (at herself) that her team would enter next. Shizune nodded and signaled when they could proceed.

The sounds of the revved up audience were disorienting, as it was nothing Sakura or Kiba had experienced before. Tama was waving and laughing nervously as she looked around. Akamaru trotted handsomely ahead of Kiba, tail wagging, head low. They walked to a spot on the ground marked with spray paint, where they stood as brief biographical information was shared about each participant.

“Does anyone see my parents?” Sakura asked from the corner of her mouth, head turning in all directions as they waved.

“Nope. See mine?” Tama wondered.

“Nope.”

“I think that’s my mom.” Kiba corrected himself, “Nah. That’s a guy. Maybe we should have checked a stadium map to see which levels our families had tickets for? We might’ve been able to pinpoint ‘em.”

“Why would we do something intelligent like that?” Sakura griped.

They walked off to allow Ino and Chouji to soak up the limelight after them.

While climbing a stairwell to the second floor viewing alcove, Tama picked a few white dog hairs off the back of Kiba’s crop top.

“Thanks, Tama. Someone rolled over my clothes this morning.” His toothy smile was dashing.

“My pleasure.” She and Sakura had already commented on their teammate’s ripped stomach about a dozen times, and were by then pointedly trying not to look at Kiba’s exposed midriff. He was certainly very appealing in form-fitting black that faded into silver ombré at the cut-off sleeves and hips.

Sakura was carefully trying to snip away a loose thread from the hem of her red qipao with a kunai. Tama was aware that her friend had undershorts beneath the daring floral dress, but she figured most eyes would be on her friend’s legs; tall, thigh-boots of black were sure to grab attention. Sakura removed the thread as they arrived at the top of the stairwell, and tucked the kunai away into the utility pouch secured to the belt ‘round her midsection. She fussed at the fingerless gloves on her hands, “I don’t suppose…we’ll be able to spot anyone from here?”

Her team stopped beside an open-air handrail to look upon the crowds in the stands. Curious, Akamaru reared up on his hind legs to gaze out from the balcony as well. Sakura could hear Chouji and Ino’s voices echoing from the stairway just as Hinata’s team ventured into the arena.

Her team looked radiant and a fair share more attractive than their predecessors, Sakura opined. Hinata was a vision in lavender and violet. ‘Wow! Sato is a quintessential Hatake down there, and Shino…’ Her thoughts veered off course when Shino flicked his glasses off, and screams of delight nearly inflicted permanent hearing damage on Sakura and her peers. Kiba and Akamaru tried to seal their ears in response. ‘O-kay! So Shino was concealing a very handsome face for this day. That card was well-played…’ He did put his glasses back on, but the point had been made.

Kurenai’s students continued to the stairs after their introductions. A moment later, Sakura peered down to the passageway, spying Shizune looking around frantically as if she had lost track of a group. ‘Is everything alright down there?’ Sakura folded her arms as she watched, ‘No one got cold feet, did they?’

Resounding cries of confusion rose from spectators as two utility scrolls fell from great height, mysteriously tumbling, opening in a whirl towards the center of the arena…and Sakura reached over to hold onto Tama as she watched a billowing flash of smoke dissipate, allowing Team Gai to make a very memorable appearance. At the VIP booth, Tsunade had raised a fist and was shouting as if they had gotten it right. Sakura exchanged glances with her friends, snickering yet impressed with Lee vibrantly framed in unforgettable yellow between Neji and Tenten, bookends of antiquated fashion beside him.

“Oh! And I see Kakashi-sensei there too.” Tama squinted her eyes. They could safely assume all Jounin Sensei would be gathered within the same vicinity.

Following Neji’s team, Matsuri made her debut, staunch and solitary. She locked her eyes on the Kazekage in his seat beside Tsunade, determined to make her teacher proud.

Tama was touched by the obvious gesture of faith between master and pupil, but she whipped around as soon as she remembered that Sato would be up the steps any second. In a timely manner, Hinata bounded up the stairs excitedly with Shino in tow, raving to her friends about how Neji-niisan’s team had looked and she’d been watching with her Byakugan.

Sato lingered near the room’s corner after making it to the top, and nearly flinched when Tama embraced him. Her smile was a mixture of worry and animation, “Sato, I didn’t see you all day yesterday! Are you alright?”

He nodded woodenly, chancing eye contact with her, “I am. Sorry that I flaked out on you, Tama. I know you wanted to see me.” Sato added, “And sorry about the festival...towards the end, I…”

“Why are you apologizing so much?” Her voice was light and easy, “Relax a little. I really am happy.” Tama touched her forehead to his, “You’ve made me so happy. I promise we can do more after the Exam. Just like I promised, right?”

“Er…” He feared he would swallow his tongue.

“Get over here! Don’t miss the view!” Tama steered him to a space between Shino and Sakura, where she also filed in, “It’s a shame you didn’t get to see Neji’s team appear. That was a crowd pleaser!”

“I bet.”
Shino gave his best friend a half-concerned, I-am-right-here-please-breathe sideways glance. Sato inhaled. Nothing need be said. Definitely not here and now...not ever.

On the opposite side of the arena’s circumference, another mezzanine housed Aota and Matsuri. Everyone seemed to simultaneously deflate when Huo calmly stepped into the pit for an introduction.

Judging by how his friends had fallen silent, Neji took a guess as he arrived in the viewing area, “Huo is here, then?” Lee and Tenten followed shortly after.

Kiba nodded, “Yeah. Can’t say I would’ve been disappointed if that guy never showed up...”

The Leaf compatriots watched in prickling silence as their common adversary stalked to the opposite stairwell to join other non-Leaf combatants on a balcony.

Ino’s sigh broke the lull, “It can’t be helped! Tama-chan is just going to have to mop the field with him. I am looking forward to that.”

The eldest kunoichi nodded with total composure and beside her, Sato had stiffened in terror. All of the things he was trying not to think about were slapping him in the face.

As the gathered female ninja crowded in to lend Tama words of fortitude and confidence, Chouji curiously batted the turquoise tassel of the jian slung on Neji’s back, “Pardon me, but I do not recall you depending on swords much, Neji.”

“It’s a new skill.” His smugness was almost imperceptible, but Chouji, Kiba, and Shino still detected it. Sato was not looking at Neji and not saying anything, trying to make one less painful acknowledgment.

“...slay him.” Kiba muttered, hopeful. Down with Sato; up with Neji, Kiba decided then and there.

“Within reason and good taste, I will attempt to.” Neji concurred.

Lee chimed in, “I have not yet witnessed Neji’s swordsmanship, but if he adheres to Tenten’s capable instruction I am sure he will be most adept.”

“If adept is here,” Tenten measured with her hands about 20 centimeters apart, “And I am here...then Neji is kind of in the middle, closer to adept.” She described it with her hand scissoring the imaginary line.

“So he doesn’t suck.” Kiba said gratefully.

“No, Neji doesn’t suck. He’s just not on my level.” Tenten smiled sublimely as her boyfriend pouted in annoyance, “His sword is named Mo-Ye. It’s the female of the pair my parents used. I think my dad would have liked for him to have had it.”

The conversation was derailed when a storm of cheering kicked up again, and Shikamaru had descended to announce rules and welcoming remarks.

Ino pledged to tell her boyfriend later that he had an unusually suave and composed voice over the microphone. His disclosures eased her nerves, his voice rolled over her in warm waves.

Likewise, Sakura had calmed significantly. ‘Ino and I are up first. I’m kind of glad I can jump right into this!’ While examining the lofty luxury box from afar, she noticed the person seated on Tsunade’s left was Natsuhi, the lovely Hoshikage, and to Tsunade’s right was Gaara, and on his right— Tazuna the bridge builder, ‘I wonder why the old man got a VIP invite?’
Shikamaru’s announcement wrapped, “The first match will be between Yamanaka Ino and Haruno Sakura. Opponents, please report to the arena in five.”

Amicably, Ino took her friend by the hand, “Let’s do this, bitch! I have been waiting my whole life for an official piece of you!”

Laughing, Sakura reveled in the sound of her friends’ clamors of support and excitement, and hurried down the stairs with her rival— the truest advocate for her causes and dreams.

It was an odd feeling knowing that both the Hokage and Kazekage were not rooting for her.

Ino wondered, as she stood a few paces away from Shikamaru (his foot tapping,) how many people in the audience even bothered to bet money on her. She probably looked too pretty— too approachable and likable to win. Sakura likely had that same stereotype counting against her as well, come to think of it. This was not a major money-making match.

The money didn’t matter, Ino told herself. She wanted her parents to do a double-take of surprise as her victory was announced. Her sensei, her teammates, maybe even her distracted friends and peers might be a bit appalled by her ambush-win, not expecting her to so vehemently triumph in this round. What would people think of a kunoichi taking down her closest friend, the Hokage’s star pupil? That perhaps they’d look more carefully at the array of seemingly docile participants in the Tournament, and weigh their odds with squinted eyes.

She had been planning this for months.

‘I'm not going to trip up here. I've been there for her, I've been the shoulder to cry on—the sympathetic confidant...’ Ino watched Sakura’s face as the girl distractedly looked up toward Gaara in the VIP seating, ‘She’s content. I got her laid. I got her relaxed. It was the kind way to do this.’ Ino had knowingly let her dear friend pull ahead in terms of success and studies, making sure to set trap-wires in Sakura’s proverbial path. Now that she had caught up to Sakura here, now that they could face each other as equals...

‘I can prove that this is my time. We finally get to face each other in a match, and I have always been ready for this. She’s been so busy being pulled in every direction, stuffing her head with more than she can handle...I’ve been waiting to take her down.’

Sakura returned her gaze to Ino amidst the din of the crowd’s continued cheers, and Ino promptly smiled again, comfortingly, keeping up the charade. ‘I don’t want her to take this personally. It’s not like she has to win to get promoted. Even I am going to tap out in Round 2 to avoid excruciating injury...’

She had discussed this idea with Chouji and Shikamaru only. Shikamaru was still tapping his foot like a loon because he knew what he could anticipate. Sakura was making it worse by looking so genuinely sentimental and mushy, pitted against her friend and rival, overcome by the Hokage’s and Kazekage’s attention on her. And while he might feel a bit bad about watching the match, Shikamaru could admit he would get off a little on watching Ino unhinge and pounce on an adversary she’d been forbearing and coddling since childhood.

“Are you both ready?” He cleared his throat first so it wouldn’t crack.

The girls nodded, grimacing at each other in that moment; and Shikamaru motioned for them to commence before retreating, “Begin!”

Ino predicted the punch and its follow ups, almost as if she had a roadmap of where to step and tumble to avoid Sakura’s legendary swings. She had practiced with Chouji until her eyes crossed, until she could write essays and slit throats with her left hand, and deflected Sakura’s projectiles with a kunai nestled in her left-palm. Easy, balanced, taking the ribbon-darts from her leg holster with her free right hand, and volleying back at Sakura.

Sakura had been throwing shuriken two-handed, which Ino had accounted for in training, and it afforded her a moment to snap a hidden string and loop multicolored ribbon around Sakura’s neck and shoulders, which shook loose from her darts. The Hokage’s apprentice did not consider the move to be more than a diversion, and Sakura attacked again without pulling off the ribbon.

They waltzed and dashed with almost no exchange of sound, the crowd by then dead quiet, and the girl in red gouged craters in the arena floor during her efforts to pummel Ino, a vision of spring green.

Sakura must have begun to suspect, while tripping over her own feet and slowing in her motions, that she may have overlooked a strategy her opponent was employing. Ino dashed to get close and she reacted, rushing through hand signs, “Katon: Grand Fireball jutsu!” Sakura aptly swept to the side, guessing where Ino would try to evade, and caught the girl (or at least a clone) in the huge orb of flame she exhaled.

Then she turned on her heel, lightning-quick, calculating that Ino would jump her from behind. It was a wise call, and Sakura blocked a barrage of whirling kicks before swatting at another distracting snare of ribbon and vines with yellow flowers. She was already sickened, Ino was sure. Slowing, tottering, still not sure what type of oil and fragrance the ribbons wrapped around her were giving off. But Sakura shrugged free and turned her healing talent inward, sweeping herself for the problem. In that moment, Ino attempted a follow-up strike but came too near another timely fireball—Sakura’s intent to burn off plant matter that was irritating her.

Stepping carelessly, Sakura treaded over a corsage-bomb or two, still disoriented and her head spinning, rolling to put out the skirt of her lit qipao.

Ino’s incoming whip of flowers smacked Sakura on the side of her head, the poor girl too dizzy to avoid it, and Ino grinned to herself as she spun to catch Sakura a second time. She only hit a clone and watched as it fastened paper-bombs to the end of the tendril. Ino abandoned the plant weapon as it erupted with a bang, smoldering and useless, and palmed two more kunai the instant before she felt hands around her ankles.

Shrieking, Ino felt the ungodly, frightening pull downward into softened rock in the arena floor. The Headhunter Jutsu had caught her completely off-guard, stuck her up to her neck in soil, but Ino thanked her lucky stars that Sakura was keening over and retching violently after she had successfully immobilized her rival.

“How’s opium poppy treating ‘ya? Or that Laburnum flower? You’re covered in at least four poisons, Sakura.” Ino tried stalling as she clambered clumsily and much too slowly toward freedom.

“That won’t be enough. I have an an-ti-dote!” Ino warned her in a sing-song voice. While Sakura’s eyes trailed away from her for just a moment, Ino substituted herself in the hole.

She made a rush for Sakura’s blind spot as the pink haired kunoichi turned back to her supposed rival in the dirt, but Ino’s pitch of kunai hit empty air. She rolled and looked around frantically, immediately wary of Genjutsu even before she noted the walking-in-circles effect. With a hand sign and mutter of release complete, Ino dashed again like a garden storm with her final Laburnum whip, and hit nothing again as Sakura was loitering beside the headhunter crevice.
‘Sneaky Forehead...’ Ino blinked hard and gathered her wits, ‘Multi-layer Genjutsu. That’s a nice way to bide time while you’re trying to fix yourself...but you’ll be blind in ten minutes, at least temporarily. And even if you get well enough to run and see me...there are some side effects that you can’t deal with here.’ Ino smiled, breaking down the mental controls Sakura had implemented, breaking out of the illusion within which she had forfeited the match.

The next time Sakura keened over again, Ino knew it would be from something painful and embarrassing, ‘And that affords me an opportunity for Mind-Body Switch. I may have to slow her down more so she can’t keep healing...’

She was freed from Genjutsu precisely when a 180 degree volley of flame-coated kunai vectored down, crisping her ponytail, and Ino evaded into a front split. Low to the ground, she retaliated with her own projectiles and somersaulted again while drawing out her newest weapon from a back pouch, ‘Don’t hate me, Sakura...’

Another fireball distracted Ino from a Tsunade-class punch which clipped the ground she stood on, hurling Ino like a ragdoll, and she willed herself to stay quiet to not give away her substitution. It did not last. Sakura was onto her, moving faster, feeling clearer, ready to corner her with strength and Taijutsu when Genjutsu seemed moot in their equally stubborn brains. Ino ate dirt when Sakura rounded about faster than she’d hoped, slamming her front-ways to the ground with a back-hand swipe. Sakura made a grab to pin Ino’s arm behind her back, and then fell away with a cry, having closed her hand around the waiting butterfly knife.

Face dirty, Ino sprang up again, snapping the weapon in her hand, drawing the blade across exposed skin, joints, getting a clean slice at the back of Sakura’s knees when she tumbled.

Sakura made a crazed punch that Ino bent away from like a piece of rubber, eyes focused on timing, and stabbed the blade into the back of her opponent’s unharmed hand; Sakura opened her fist with a peep of pain. She skidded in the dust and tried to collect herself.

‘Like Chouji, the easiest way for you to win is to get in close and overwhelm your target. But you’re feeling too weak to overwhelm me now, Forehead.’ Ino rubbed a spot of blood on her fingers onto her outfit’s skirt, feeling less guilty than she’d expected.

Sakura was watching her, concentrating harder now, processing in her head how on earth Ino was so incredibly willing to hurt her after the laughing and hugging of fifteen minutes ago. By then, Sakura had worked it out. Not all of their friendly interactions had been fake, but Ino had decided to take advantage of those good feelings. She had gone into the match fighting harder and nastier than Sakura had. It was underhanded, yes, but still brilliant, she yielded. Sakura had been thinking a game of Janken or a staring contest could settle it, as friendship outweighed rivalry in her own heart.

Shaking and half-way mended again, Sakura rose to her feet and leapt out of range of Ino’s next knife thrust. ‘Fine, Ino. You want to do this? I’ll hurt you so bad you’ll think three times before you ever mess with me again!’

Tsunade was not at all surprised when the close-quarters brawling of the kunoichi got bloodier. She could sense Gaara squirming in his seat beside her. He was not accustomed to this side of Sakura—this unchained warrior that Tsunade had groomed to have the fuck you-attitude of a Kage, and the stamina to take hits and abuse. Tsunade watched from the corner of her eye as Gaara flinched, alarmed when Sakura reached again to throw herself onto Ino’s weapon to stop it.

With the blade stuck snugly in her arm, Sakura wrenched it away from Ino with a splatter of red. Ino cursed and consequently took a high-power kick that shot her to the far side of the arena.
Scowling, Sakura stood calmly and pulled the knife free of her flesh, closing the wicked thing and storing it in her pouch to be retired. She healed the gash on her arm moodily and watched as Ino heaved herself to her feet again. The crowd began to titter in expectation.

“I apologize for saying this because I know your mother is up there…” Sakura exhaled roughly, gesturing at the stands, “But way to be a conniving bitch about this, Ino! I’m feeling violated.”

“That means it’s working.” Ino was ordering her hybrid yukata, dusting dirt from it.

“You’ve been an angel to me this week!”

“No shit, Forehead. You’ve known for a month that we were going to do this.” Ino barked, “It’s not my fault you came at me soft.”

“I’ll break your legs, Pig!”

Somewhere in the stadium, Ino’s spectating mother went sheet-white.

“Be my guest! I’ll win before you get your hands on me to snap me, you ape.”

Gaara could swear he heard Mebuki railing in the distance, even if he couldn’t spot her. Tsunade was pleased as pie. Natsuhi and Tazuna, both strangers in this strange land, were not sure how to feel about the insults being hurled.

Shikamaru waited on an observation deck at the edge of the arena, palming half of his face as he listened to the mud-slinging followed by another volley of weaponry. Maybe he’d set his expectations too high to think Ino and her childhood rival would postpone their usual banter to have a clean, regulation match. ‘I can’t believe I thought that’d happen…’ He beheld as Sakura and Ino’s respective paper-bomb kunai clanged off of each other and detonated, billowing a cloud of smoke they rushed into. He could hear the grunting, snarling, and name-calling though.

And then, Ino took an acrobatic, sideways tumble out of the gray haze, pulling with all of her might on her last Laburnum whip. The force pulled Sakura out of the cloud, skidding over dirt before she righted herself and struggled to free her tangle-knotted arms. As if by instinct, Shikamaru knew in that moment the subtle motions Ino took; her bending to kneel, back straight, hands poised in her clan’s trademark seal— and shot her consciousness at Sakura before the girl had a spare moment to react.

‘…Ino got her.’ He shut his eyes and sighed to himself. Though it had taken a crazy, messy effort, he felt relieved that Ino made the mental jump successfully.

His stomach churned when he noticed Sakura shaking off the Mind-Body Switch effects within seconds, seemingly in full control of herself. Shikamaru abruptly realized what Ino was probably discovering while her consciousness floated in search of a body.

Sakura had snuck into the fray during the aftermath of paper-bomb explosions. No wonder she had lassoed it so quickly— Sakura wanted her to have it. ‘Where is she? Where is she?’ Frantic, Ino tried to backtrack as rapidly as possible toward her own impeccably dressed vessel, but Sakura was looming over her body, prodding at her back, ‘Get off of me, Sakura!’

Sakura was working oddly slow, her face drawn into a pained grimace, sweat streaking down the sides of her face. Ino could feel the medical-type attack on the nerves in her neck and lumbar, Sakura trying to sabotage her ability to move. Ino reinserted her consciousness in the nick of time, and snapped her head back into Sakura’s face. The pink haired kunoichi stumbled and fell over, trying to push herself back up to her feet.

Likewise, Ino was a twitching, useless cluster of limbs that could not obey the signals of her brain. ‘Great. I can barely walk!’ She tested her hands and fingers and found it painstaking to perform hand signs, ‘If I can just choke her out or something…’ Ino smiled to herself, ‘Those plant poisons finally got her. She’s beyond the point of being able to heal herself…at least now that her symptoms are too distracting.’

Sakura observed her Earth Clone order itself and shredded the Laburnum whip Ino had been using. She was stock-still in a defenseless crouch, perspiring, eyes narrowed. ‘I can’t move…’ Sakura took stock of her most pressing physical issue, ‘Or I will shit myself in front of everyone here.’ Her parents, friends, teachers, boyfriend, audience, and all of heaven’s creation; the vile plants Ino accosted her with had seeped toxins into her blood and nervous system, wreaking havoc. ‘The variety she hit me with was too much to sweep with healing jutsu while fighting her…’ She tried to take steady breaths and watched as Ino flailed around.

To avoid the humiliation of having a public, involuntary bout of diarrhea, Sakura elected to forsake Taijutsu and Ninjutsu, even though those options were more effective against Ino than Genjutsu. She hastily crafted an illusion and kneaded chakra ‘round Ino’s brain again, knowing it could not last for long, ‘Ino can break out of this…but I only need a few seconds…’ Sakura didn’t want to think about how she was going to get out of this stadium without shaming herself, or without possibly losing the match or arriving at a draw.

But by some curious whimsy, or perhaps because of Ino’s malfunctioning nerves and signals, the Yamanaka kunoichi did not undo the low-level Genjutsu that made it seem like Sakura was charging for her. Ino reeled back in her best and most unnecessary defensive stance, stepping right into the lingering Earth Clone behind her. The blessed clone winched its arm across Ino’s neck in a stranglehold, and then pinned her to the ground. Still snared in an illusion, which was now not the primary concern, Ino wrestled weakly to fight whatever was asphyxiating her.

Pearls of sweat clung to Sakura’s brow, ‘Restroom. Wait for me. God, please…not in front of Shishou…or Gaara…I will forsake all vanity and every shred of dignity in my future, if I can just hold it!’

Shikamaru flitted down and restrained the Earth Clone with his shadow, “That’s enough…” Ino flopped front ways, gasping. After completing its intended use, the clone broke apart into dusty fragments.

The crowd made sounds that indicated they were not very impressed with two kunoichi collapsing all over the place, but cheered when Shikamaru called the match, “The winner of the match is Haruno Sakura!”

Thanks to the beseeching look on Sakura’s face, Shikamaru gathered that he ought to call a medic-nin to escort her away as well. Ino and Sakura were collected from the arena without any obscene spectacle occurring, but in the halls of the stadium’s interior, Sakura all but screamed to be brought to a ladies restroom. Her path diverged from her fallen opponent’s, where Ino was shepherded along for an examination in spite of her spewing of indignant remarks and frustration over the outcome.

In the Exam-Finalist treatment room that was off-limits to the public, Ino argued and snapped at her caregivers. Within ten minutes, she was freed and cleared by the medic tending to her, and Ino stomped down the corridor to the nearby restroom. Thank goodness only a single person was inside of it.

“Forehead!” She screamed, on the verge of a sob.
“I’m sorry!”

“No you’re not!”

“Can you acknowledge what is happening to me right now?” Sakura caterwauled from the stall furthest into the tiled bathroom, empty save for her and her defeated rival.

“You should have surrendered! That match was mine.” Ino declared, “I had you down from soup to nuts.”

“Except for the part when I, uh, could still trap you in Genjutsu.” Sakura countered pithily.

“What’s so wrong with you just backing off for once? Out of respect for the fact I’ve hooked you up and pampered you for weeks?” Ino reasoned feebly, leaning on the commercial porcelain sink. When she caught a glimpse of her reflection in the mirror, Ino tsked and began fixing her ragged hair. She pointedly ignored the terrible sounds coming from the far end of the restroom.

Sakura groaned at length, “Ino, how could you do this to me? Is this really how you wanted to beat me? By humiliating me in front of everyone? I almost…out there—!”

“If you had quit before then that wouldn’t have been an issue!” Ino pressed.

“Get real. No matter how nicely you treat me, or how savagely you attack me, I don’t surrender to you, Ino.”

“Not even for your imploding bowels.”

“Not even then.” Sakura confirmed. But boy was it a close call.

It went quiet, mostly. A poor middle-aged woman who wandered into the bathroom was promptly turned away by Ino and sent packing. Ino returned to the mirror to straighten her ruffled clothes.

“How bad did it look, while we were out there?” Sakura asked curiously, “When it ended?”

“Pretty fucking bad. No finesse at all.” Ino reported, “We both looked like hell.”

“Huh.” It was about what Sakura had estimated.

Ino continued to bemoan her loss, “If I could have just gotten to the second round…”

“Ino.” Sakura gruffed, “You would have surrendered in a second round match no matter who your opponent was.”

“So what? I’m allowed to do that.”

“You do realize it will only get more difficult? And potentially ruin your outfit?”

“YOU nearly ruined my outfit.” Sakura roared. A courtesy flush.

“Pff.” Ino retied a honeysuckle bow around her waist and remembered that, yes, she had kind of sickened Sakura intentionally.

“Whatever.” Ino concluded, “If you want to fight any other battle-crazy knuckleheads even when you can do less to prove yourself worthy, have at it, Sakura.”
“Time frame of when this toxin wears off?” Sakura asked.

“About thirty minutes, if you are actively trying to heal. I guess.” Ino admitted, “I lied about that antidote. We’d have to take time to derive one…so…please fix yourself.”

“Yeah. Still working on it.” Sakura grumbled, “This may have been your meanest tactic yet, I’ve got to say. Can we call it a truce from this day forward?”

“Fine.”

Shortly after that, Sakura was well enough to exit the stall and run her hands under scalding hot water at the sink for a full minute. The sting of burning water hurt less than her constricting stomach. Displeased, Ino made her soap up and finish with cool water, labeling her a masochist.

Sakura asked her friend to examine her and make sure her appearance was entirely presentable. Ino did some minor edits and tugged at Sakura’s clothing, and then whisked her along, “Back to the mezzanine. We’re not telling anyone what you just experienced, right?”

“Not a soul.”

“We should make sure we know where the nearest bathroom is on that level…”

“Yup.”

“So that was something.” Chouji assessed.

“Genjutsu.” Neji explained succinctly.

“Usually Ino-chan is good about dealing with illusions…” Tama noted. She regarded Sato at her side, thinking that maybe he’d have some input to provide based on his Genjutsu expertise, but he said nothing.

Tenten and Lee agreed it was a downright slugfest between two rivals, and about on par with the antics they’d expected. Hinata was still whimpering and hugging herself with her arms crossed, having found it hard to watch. Her friends had not gone easy on each other. It had been silly to think they would.

Some small discussions rippled amongst the friends and competitors; speculating what was to come, because it was no secret that Tenten’s match would be next. Her opponent from the Grass Village was still somewhat of a mystery to them in terms of ability. Shino termed the second, soon-to-be-announced duel a ‘mirror match,’ for all intents and purposes. Two weapon-masters ready to outdo each other, unless one or both had an ace up his or her sleeve.

This notion slightly unsettled Neji. Up until the idea was uttered aloud, he’d been relatively at ease with Tenten’s impending clash against an older, clearly talented Bukijutsu specialist. He had a bad habit of assuming Tenten could handle most anything, at least from his personal experience. But he hated the feeling of knowing so little about the Kusa nin, Aota, and what he could use in a fight beyond weaponry. Neji’s thoughts rattled away as if on a freight train, passing through the possibilities that Aota may be gifted with Ninjutsu, Grass Village poisons or plant techniques, perhaps Taijutsu that could overwhelm Tenten…

Tenten poked his triceps discretely with a finger, muttering, “Calm down. My intuition is telling me this guy is a scrub and I can beat him.”

A fair rebuttal, “Really? That’s not what my intuition is telling me.”

“Then we agree to disagree.” She smiled at him reassuringly.

“He’s the best on his team and he’s seen one of your strongest jutsu already.” Neji reminded her, “There is no doubt that he’s prepared for you to use it against him.”

The sentiment annoyed her, but Tenten could not deny that Neji had a point. Aota had seen her preliminary round match against Ga-Fen, in which she had relied on Dance of the Crescent Moon. Reciprocally, she had not seen Aota perform anything beyond basic tool-summoning from scrolls.

Tournament-style battles had a troubling effect on participants who revealed too much of their talent early on, and afforded future competitors the chance to counter them. The Leaf Rookies’ cardinal rule of Chunin Exam matches was: do not place all of your cards on the table, at least until the Final Round.

While Tenten noodled on the subject, Sakura and Ino clambered up the stairs, a mess of gripes and friendlier comments now that their match was over. Hinata, Chouji, and Kiba gravitated toward them quickly as they were not pressed up against the balcony railing to spectate. Both kunoichi were smothered with congratulations and praise. The two perked up and merged again with the group.

Shikamaru’s announcement followed shortly after that on stadium loudspeakers, calling for Tenten and Yanagisawa Aota to report to the arena. Neji made his best attempt to appear as cool as ever, while Lee professed his full confidence in Tenten. She gave Neji another imperceptible poke before hugging Lee, as he had motioned for it. “You will bring us another vibrant victory!” Lee forecasted.

Her friends wished her well with some hooting sounds, and Tenten proceeded down the stairwell. ‘I am noticing how Neji needs a dose of reassurance before I enter a fight these days.’ She thought to herself, ‘He wasn’t always like this. Though, it’s not like he gave me any encouragement before a match. Ever.’ She had a feeling he was genuinely nervous for her.

‘Weird how he grew up and matured, then began to have human emotions. I’m still not used to it, sometimes.’ Tenten chuckled to herself on her way down the stairs, ‘With Lee, it’s normal. With Gai-sensei, it’s automatic.’ It felt amazingly good that Neji cared. Even if his concerns seemed trivial in her opinion, she appreciated them nonetheless.

Tenten did some self-reflection on the last flight of steps that stretched down to the ground floor.

Maybe she was way too cocksure about kicking the Grass ninja’s ass. It felt like she would, but that was due to the chemical signals in her brain and body indicating her good mood, and not necessarily examining the actual, concrete logistics of the match like Neji had. ‘Even if I lose, all I have to do is exemplify the qualities Tsunade-sama wants in a Chunin.’ Tenten considered, ‘Winning isn’t imperative. I just want the Hokage to believe she can rely on me!’

It happened again. She stepped through the archway and felt a surge of butterflies in her stomach just as she had at the first Chunin Exam. Shikamaru had outclassed her at the previous Tournament, and now he was the supervising proctor for her second attempt. ‘How time does fly…’

The stadium’s crowd was buzzing, more excited by the male-female opposition, and perhaps because Tenten looked like a stunningly red, Han-style dragon with a frown on her face. She was frowning for effect, primarily because the sounds of the audience were making her anxious. ‘I’ve got to pretend like there aren’t nine thousand people up there watching…’ She breathed in and out of her nostrils, ‘Come on, Tenten. Put your best Hyuga face on. Grumpier is better. People love serious-looking ninja.’

Strangely, Aota was smiling when he stopped at the arena’s center within a few steps of her own arrival. A piercing screech of feedback zinged from the loudspeakers, and the Grass ninja winced just as Tenten did.

‘Oh shit, we’re both human.’ She realized, frustrated. Aota smiled at her again while measuring her up. Shikamaru had shut off his shirt-clip mic and was testily speaking into a two-way radio, giving someone hell about the stadium speakers acting up. Even with his microphone off, another sound interface was making unwelcome noise.

The feedback persisted. In the VIP booth, Tsunade had curled her hands into fists in her seat, scowling. If Shikamaru did not reprimand the audio-tech responsible and have the problem rectified, she would be beating that tech to a pulp in a few minutes.

In what was too amicable a gesture, Aota closed the gap to have a word with Tenten while electric squealing echoed in the arena.

“Ours is going to be a great match today.” He surmised.

“I hope so. Let’s try not to embarrass each other.” Tenten recommended.

“You look beautiful, by the way.” Aota added.

Oh. So it was that kind of attention again. Or just the typical get-in-her-head tactic for the match, Tenten suspected. She shrugged at him as thanks for the compliment.

Tsunade’s voice was now crackling over Shikamaru’s two-way radio. Heads were about to roll.

“That guy up there, the Hyuga fellow—” Aota looked up to the mezzanine and she followed his line of sight, “You’re dating him?”

“Pardon my manners, but I came here to beat the crap out of you, Yanagisawa-san.” Tenten confirmed, “Not play twenty questions.”

“So you are dating him.”

“On the down-low, I am.”

“Ahh.” Aota rubbed his lips with his thumb, thinking it over.

“So, you and Huo…” Tenten jested.

“I don’t think he’s into me.” Aota adopted a faux valley-girl voice, “He’s a douche.”

Damn him. Tenten bit her tongue to halt any small sibilance of laughter bubbling up.

“Since you’re on the DL with Hyuga-san, and we’re waiting for an optimally funded sound system to reboot now for our match…” Aota rested his hands on his hips and bent a bit, accentuating his lanky height, “Maybe you want to consider doing something with me after the Tournament?”

“I don’t date men with buzzed under-cuts.”
“Oh, so that’s it.” He determined, snapping his fingers, “You like beautiful men.”

“You bet I do.”

“Like, you two kind of have matching outfits.”

“It was intentional.”

Shikamaru, waved both of his hands between the competitors to ward them apart, “Speakers are up in 30 seconds, and for the love of all that is holy, do not flirt in this arena. I’ll disqualify the both of you!”

Positively offended, Tenten gave Shikamaru a hurt look, “I wasn’t! I’m trying to tell this hipster off.”

“You’re not doing it right.” Shikamaru notified her.

Aota agreed, “Not at all.”

“You,” Shikamaru pointed a finger at the Grass ninja, “Shut it.” He then eyed Tenten, “And you had better not incur Neji’s wrath in any way that makes him unmanageable for me. Got it?”

Tenten was deeply irritated by the implication, “Are you kidding me, Shikamaru? I would never-!”

With a rumble, the speakers were back online. Shikamaru switched on his microphone. The screeching feedback had stopped and Shikamaru proceeded with the match, “Are you both ready?” He was given two simultaneous nods.

Shikamaru gave the word as he stepped back, “Begin!”

Tenten would swear on an obscene amount of money that she was three-quarters of a second faster than Aota when it came to snapping open a tool-summoning scroll. The spinner on her wrist was more accessible, she figured. Within moments, they were strafing in opposite directions and hurling all manner of weapon curiosities at each other. The crowd was moderately thrilled with the aggression.

Aota was practical with his motions, aiming, evading, and deflecting incoming projectiles, never hustling needlessly. Tenten looked like an acrobat by comparison, rolling, leaping, and stepping on scroll parchment to hold it in place for trick-hand shots, two of which had already sliced Aota’s cheek open.

The young man’s levity from before the match began to ebb. His brow was furrowed, concentrating on keeping up. Her next bombardment of spinner-scroll projectiles had colorful tassels and zip-ties attached, misleading Aota’s line of sight. He was cut again, a superficial hit on the arm, and he backed away as he realized Tenten knew the game already and wanted him distracted.

His half-dozen retaliatory fuuma shuriken seemed appropriate. She was a bounding, whirling beast in red fabric, avoiding his volley while returning one of her own with a great leap: a rain of morning star spike-balls. As Aota tumbled away from the metal meteor shower, Tenten fetched a small cable from her hip pouch; a centimeters-long, bladed hook attached. She lashed out like a fly fisherman while he was rising to his feet, and caught the streaming parchment of Aota’s scroll. Her hook ripped it down the middle all the way to its end, snagging on the wood cylinder, and Tenten jerked the ruined scroll from her opponent’s hand.

The Grass ninja was trying to ignore the pleased cheers of the audience. It was obvious to him that Tenten was trying to bait out his other techniques. She had him so plainly cornered in terms of Bukijutsu skill that she was testing for other threats. Playing into her scheme, Aota formed hand signs as he ran, rolling and ducking into the cover over a rapidly growing patch of giant Allium flowers. Tenten closed in with a single Shadow Clone, the two sharing a segment of her summoning scroll as they forced Aota into the spreading thicket of flowers and sprouting greenery.

Tenten crinkled her nose, ‘Kind of stinks like onions…’ She had sent her clone in and watched as it was shredded by the proximity-triggered flowers, purple orbs firing off razor sharp petals in all directions. ‘So Neji was correct in assuming Aota would have a bag of tricks for this match.’ She tossed a homemade grenade into the flower patch and watched as Aota sprinted out into the open to avoid the explosion, ‘I’m going to empty that bag of tricks!’

When the two finally closed the distance, Aota slipped a curved dagger from its leg holster and parried Tenten’s strikes with Hok. His eyes nearly crossed as he stared down the kunoichi who was strong enough to bend him backwards just by pushing with her jian, “Woman, where do you come from? I didn’t think you had enough space in that little body to hide muscle!” She kicked dust in his eyes and, though blinded, he managed to duck her swing for his head.

“I train…with guys…” She puffed as they parried and slashed, “Who are ten times as strong as you…”

“Huh, I figured a girl like you would hate it if I went easy on you in a fight!” He was rubbing at his face and trying to cry the dirt out. Before Tenten could puncture his lungs when his guard opened, a green flower tendril snaked around her ankle and tripped her. Tenten caught herself before she could faceplant, but Aota pegged her with a brutal roundhouse kick to the stomach. She flipped and crumpled backwards over sprouts and tubers.

He had time enough to stow his dagger and procure his back-up tool scroll, summoning a fresh volley of kunai and shuriken as she clambered up and dashed away, knocking several weapons out of the air with her jian.

Keeping in mind she had used up more than half of a single spinner scroll already, Tenten hoped to use her remaining weapons less wastefully. She drew two smoke-bombs from her back pouch and hurled them at Aota’s feet. The Grass nin cursed and staggered when the flares went off, billowing black. Tenten used the cover to maneuver behind him, delaying the materialization of a pair of Shadow Clones. When Aota reappeared, performing another jutsu, she and her replications rushed forward in coordination for Dance of the Crescent Moon.

The timing and positioning were perfect. Though Aota had commenced a technique that was transforming the arena with pond flora and several feet of water, she had taken the liberty of avoiding his kidney after stabbing him in the back. Her clones had gotten Aota in the shoulder and chest with their jian. The audience went nuts. Tenten withdrew her sword immediately, watching as Aota dissolved into a human-height tower of green stalks and vivid lilies.

The Lily Clone unfurled and reached for the nearest victim, a Shadow Clone, and wrapped snugly around it. She took a few curious swings at the plant clone to see if hacking it apart mattered, but it swiftly began to regenerate. Close by, large lotuses and lily pads sprang up to the water’s surface, and Tenten supposed Aota was taking cover underwater. Tenten kept moving as the giant lotus nearest to her opened up and fired an array of hidden weapons. ‘Have to hand it to him, that’s pretty impressive.’ She and her remaining bunshin swatted projectiles aside with their swords. When she tired of the exchange, Tenten sheathed Hok and drew out a smaller utility scroll to summon the Hiyumi.

While her clone obediently taunted attacks to itself, Tenten set up her shot with the bow and then fired at the Lily Clone and each lotus, savagely roasting them with her Fire Release. Her Shadow Clone had spied Aota and tossed another grenade towards him. It flushed him out of his hiding place near a lily pad. He jumped and got his footing on the water’s surface, ready to run and unload more weapons from his tool scroll… but Tenten’s Shadow Clone had borrowed her hook. She had snapped it forward twice before catching the parchment of Aota’s last scroll, and he cursed creatively as the wily clone tore the length of paper all the way to its end.

“You know better than anyone how much time and effort it takes to prepare these!” Aota groaned, playing tug-of-war with the Shadow Clone. He gave up and let go when another fiery shot came soaring for him, lighting up the scroll, and the bunshin tossed it into the water where it turned to pulpy ash.

“That may have been the rudest thing that’s ever happened to me.” Aota pointed two fingers from his eyes toward Tenten, “I’m onto you, Mini-Dragon. You’re going to be real sorry that you didn’t play nice.”

“I think you’ve forgotten what we’re here for!” Tenten warned, bow raised, watching as he produced another pair of giant lotuses meant to occupy her Shadow Clone behind him. She fired again as he was rushing to summon from a utility scroll, his face more serious. He had slipped into the makeshift pond again before she could blow him up.

Tenten ran across the water’s surface to take a better position, her draw hand tucked under her chin, and she released the same moment Aota sprang up again with a new weapon in hand. Her Fire Release crashed over him, eliciting another roar of excitement from observers, but Tenten felt a pang of regret that she had flat-out shot a decent adversary. That remorse was quickly replaced with astonishment as she watched a tuft of vapor dissipate into the air where Aota stood, protected by a sphere of water.

He spun the polearm in his hand and the watery defense he had raised splashed back into the pond. “You got noticed at the last Tournament, didn’t you know?” Aota pointed at her with his weapon, “I memorized what you could do. I lucked out when I got pitted against someone who can’t possibly beat me in the Finals.”

She shot at him again, ticked off. Aota spun the weapon round his arm to condense another water shield, sloshing off the fire arrow blast. He smiled as he had before, “Hey, I didn’t want to be a jerk to you. I wanted to make it as fair as possible. You really know what you’re doing.”

“Flattery and talk aren’t going to help you win!” She tried to regulate her breathing and did a mental audit of what weapons she had left at her disposal to deal with the new problem.

“Kyūrei has been passed down in my clan since the founding of Kusagakure. This weapon is one of the treasures of my village.” Aota clued her in, “And you shooting your literal Will of Fire at me isn’t going to get you anywhere.” He raised a hand up in a peaceful gesture, “So why don’t you let the proctor call it now? No disrespect.”

“He just got comfortable. I’m not going bother him.”

“You won’t be the first Leaf ninja Kyūrei has drowned.” Aota added, a touch darker and more impatient.

Sick of the talk, Tenten poured what was probably an unwise portion of chakra into her next arrow, and released it before she launched herself into a sprint. She felt her eye twitch when she tweaked the arrow mid-flight with the channeling Hayate had taught her, and converted the single bolt into a Scattershot. Twenty burning missiles vectored in all directions, closing in around the Grass nin. It scorched most plant life on the far side of the arena, but Aota was again unscathed. He turned toward her, still wreathed in steam, and swung Kyūrei in a full-length arc that produced a pressurized jet of water, precisely aimed for her.

While on the run, Tenten put away the Hiyumi, knowing better than to risk empowering Aota’s Water Release with her own nature. As far as intuition was concerned, hers had been far off the mark. She may have sensed his inferior skill when it came to summoning and pitching weapons, but she had not accounted for his Ninjutsu and legendary weapon. ‘Neji pretty much nailed it.’ She admitted, directing three new Shadow Clones in different directions, ‘It’s one thing to guess if an opponent has an array of skills, but Neji is good at gauging the magnitude of skill someone has.’ Just by looking at them, he could make snap judgements like that. ‘Aota has been a Genin for a long time. He isn’t young. He must’ve been watching previous exams to know how hard to push himself…’

A wave of water rolled up from the pond in an attempt to sweep her clones away, but they escaped to the wall of the arena and ran while attached with chakra. Tenten considered the issue of the naginata itself: aside from the possibility of Water jutsu, it was a long weapon perfectly suited for staving off enemies and eliminating close-quarters, ‘But I have to…I have to get close enough to disarm him!’ She rushed ahead in synchronization with her bunshin, the last bit of chakra she could spare for Dance of the Crescent Moon.

In the same moment Aota swung to cut in a wide arc, as he could not accurately judge the speed or vicinity of her Shadow Clones, Tenten successfully came up behind the Grass ninja. Her clones were cut apart, and Tenten extended her arm to thrust Hok forward and strike true. Without even looking to see what was behind him, a jet of water shot out of the back of Aota’s polearm, walloping her in the sternum. Her jian flew out of her hand and spun, landing with a pat on the top of a water lily disc. Tenten fell backwards and wondered if the weapon detected her approach, or if there had been some kind of giveaway to tip off her opponent.

Before Aota could make a snarky remark, or Tenten could act on the bright idea to combine Sōshōryū and paper bombs, she plunged underwater, gulping down a disgusting mouthful of pond slosh.

Her brain needed a full second to make sense of it. A Lily Clone had been hiding beneath the surface, and had snatched her out of the air to drag her under. She pondered the absence of her jian, her legs kicking wildly, the futility of cutting at the curling, vine-arms of the clone with the knife she had managed to pull from her holster…‘This is dandy. I can’t pry this thing off!’ She had swallowed an unsafe amount of water while screaming, losing air. In a lucid moment, Tenten recognized that if she fell still and stopped struggling that Shikamaru would more than likely descend to call the match. That option was looking pretty good. Equally disappointing, Neji was probably watching the match and thinking she was a complete idiot. Her friends were probably mortified by this 180-turnaround of a Grass ninja hipster who had played her like a fiddle. Lee, on the other hand, was maybe still gunning for her, however futile it looked.

‘I’m at the bottom of my bag of tricks.’ She noted. Anything more and she would have displayed most all of her jutsu for her competitors to ruminate on. It would be desperate and petty to push herself further just for the sake of winning. At this point, a win may not even afford her enough points with evaluators to be worthy of a promotion. Even a loss like this could count negatively. ‘But if I can fight in future rounds, I still have a chance to earn points. I am not walking away from this stadium as a Genin, today!’

Tenten bit her thumb and formed hand seals, struggling, kicking back against the Lily Clone, and stretched her hands out for the arena floor— now muck and mud. It was a rash, classless action to take and not even guaranteed to work. ‘Fine. So I’m trash. I’m a sore loser! What good is an eirloom weapon if I’m not using it?’ After the flash of a summoning matrix spread, a hole opened beneath her hands and water funneled into it. It still took another unbearable chunk of time for the water level to drop enough for Tenten to inhale fresh air, and the sword that poked up from pond scum was just barely reachable as she thrashed in the clone’s hold.

She flicked the sword out a fraction from its sheath and fell to her knees, gasping, relieved that the close instantly withered and fell away from her. Tenten coughed and gagged, hating the feeling of water in her ears.

While her back was turned, Aota shot her again with Water Release. The crowd whooped in surprise and delight as Tenten rolled and splattered through the mud, sliding to a stop. Shikamaru had dropped into the arena and held up a hand to the Grass ninja.

“If she doesn’t get up in ten seconds, you won’t need to keep doing that.” Shikamaru informed him.

Aota obliged and stood with his weapon raised upright, and leaned Kyūrei against his shoulder like an old-school samurai or monk.

Shikamaru had to hold in his aggravated grumbling as he trekked over mud. Any of his muttering complaints about the arena’s state would be broadcasted over loudspeakers for all to hear, unfortunately. When he was about two meters away from where Tenten was splayed, her outfit no longer pristine, the girl began to haul herself up. He raised an eyebrow at her stubbornness.

Tenten took a deep breath and pretended that she didn’t care how she now looked like a swamp monster…or that the fate of Kayato’s hard costume work was in the hands of a brave drycleaner she would find after the Tournament.

“You might want to…” Tenten gestured at a Shikamaru with a shooing motion, “Back away for this one, Shika.”

“Are you sure you can keep going?” He was skeptical.

She nodded, feeling a loose strand of pond-muck hair smack her face, “Yup. I need a bit of space so this doesn’t affect you.”

He accepted the answer with a shrug and retreated to the observation post.

Aota was not pleased, “Too proud to quit?”

“I’m really most concerned with the evaluation portion of this.” She replied, but could have added, yes, she didn’t actually want to give up. She’d prefer being knocked unconscious if she had to hand him the win. Neji’s inflated ego had rubbed off on her, Tenten acknowledged.

She unsheathed Susumajin fully, exhaling, and glanced around at the remaining puddles and plant life Aota had at his disposal. Maybe he even had enough chakra left to refill the arena with water, but he wasn’t going to have that ability for very long. Mindful of her breathing, Tenten sank into a Wushu stance and extended her leg in front of her for balance, which was a bit trickier in mud. The black jian was laid flush across her arm, the point rising past her shoulder. It was already prodding at its surroundings for energy to absorb, stretching out influence in an invisible field.

Aota spun and positioned his naginata again, prepared to bomb her with the next round of Water Release. His eyes widened in shock at the rapid decay of flora his jutsu had created, dying and crumbling throughout the floor of the stadium.
She was just standing there, not actively trying to change the environment, and it seemed that the Leaf kunoichi was wielding a last-resort weapon. When he fired off a jet of Water Release aimed squarely for her head, Aota balked when the jutsu petered out before connecting. ‘She’s siphoning chakra from me. It’s passive…she isn’t using a jutsu!’ Aota attacked again with a cry, frustrated by how his Ninjutsu had diminished, ‘She’s using that sword to do it.’

The suffocating, slow choke on his chakra reserves was going to weaken his techniques. Close-quarters appeared to be tipped in his favor, thanks to the length of Kyūrei, and so he charged in the hope that he could part her from the black sword.

Footsteps squelching, breathing labored, the two closed in and Tenten rotated the jian around her arm and forward, letting it skim and deflect the water-neutered polearm up and off of her blade. Aota keened to the side and let the back end of his naginata come swooping down on her, though she stepped away lightly from harm. He began to swing unthinkingly, petrified by the amount of chakra that had been shaved away from him, not thinking clearly enough to trip or disarm her.

Tenten ducked the next swing and smashed him in the face with her sword’s hilt. Aota yelped softly when he landed on his back, suctioned into mud from head to toe, feeling flimsy and dizzy. He quieted when she poked his throat with the point of the black jian, pressing hard enough to draw a bead of blood. Kyūrei was stuck and slowly sinking into marshy earth nearby.

“We’re both too proud to quit.” Tenten observed, just loudly enough for him to hear. There was uproar from the audience which they had both tuned out. Tenten sheathed Susumajin to make it safer for Shikamaru to approach.

The proctor gave her a bemused look before crouching down to examine Aota, “You okay, Yanagisawa?”

“I’ve been better.” The Grass nin was trying to wipe mud from his chin, but just smeared it everywhere.

“Want me to call it?”

“I’ve got about as much chakra left as a baby might have, so do me a favor and get me out of here.” Aota advised.

Shikamaru stood up again and pointed a hand to the Leaf shinobi, “The winner of this match is Tenten!”

After tossing Susumajin to the ground, where it was promptly swallowed up for safekeeping, Tenten braced her legs and helped Aota to his feet with two hands. She nearly slipped and fell over, but Shikamaru assisted them before dusting muck from his hands.

Aota sighed and unsummoned Kyūrei, shaking his head at her, “Round Two is going to suck for you.”

“Tell me about it. And my clothes are filthy.” Tenten gruffed and picked up Hok. They plodded towards the arena exit while Shikamaru departed to have a quick word with the Hokage.

She watched Shikamaru leave and then trailed her eyes up toward the balcony her friends were waiting on. Contrary to her theory, they were actually cheering. Even Sato had reanimated, hooting and brandishing a thumbs-up as Lee did the same. Neji, as she had been half-accurate in her guess, was not looking at her. Tenten curiously followed his gaze, turning her head towards the opposite side of the stadium. She peered right into the staring face of Huo.
Matsuri had made herself scarce, as she had probably not wanted to be anywhere near the Rock ninja by herself. Huo was alone on the foreign-combatant mezzanine, pacing back and forth like a wildcat.

Tenten mulled over the significance of it as she looked away. ‘He’s paying awful close attention to me. Of course that didn’t get past Neji.’ She thanked Aota when he gestured to allow her passage first through the doorway into the stadium’s interior, ‘Was it my match or-? Did he…did he recognize…?’ Tenten felt tightness in her throat as she thought, ‘He would know about our clan’s treasured weapon. Probably. And maybe it isn’t a coincidence at all that he’s at this exam. If only other Sasagainu ninja can use Susumajin, maybe Huo wants it for himself?’

An exam attendant ushered her and Aota into a private room to clean themselves off a bit and offered them dry towels. There was little helping her muddy clothes, and Tenten undid what remained of her braided updo and stuck her head under a faucet. She scrubbed mud from her hands, scalp, hair, and face, kissing goodbye the sophisticated eye makeup Yugao had applied.

‘That must be what he wants.’ Tenten reasoned, ‘He wants to face me in a later round. He wants me to use the sword.’ She gulped, unnerved, ‘Could he actually take it from me?’ She shuddered and then Aota hung a towel over her shoulder.

“The mud was my fault.”

The somewhat-clean Grass nin cocked his head, acknowledging, “It kinda was. And you know, the offer still stands for after the Tournament…”

“My boyfriend will damage your organs if you come near me again.” She warned, “He’s not very patient or understanding.”

“Got it.” Aota saw himself out with a small wave, “Good luck for later. You’ll need it.”

Tenten resumed her scrubbing and futile soaping up at the basin sink. Afterward, she glanced at a wall mirror and was troubled by the mess she saw reflected in it, “Oh, that’s a look.”

She cleaned off Hok as best she could before replacing the sword in its scabbard. The attendant directed her back towards the stairwell and Tenten made the tired climb up. She was arriving at some conclusions about the Tournament and a scheme that was fast coming to fruition, ‘I can’t fight Huo. I’m already too exhausted to think about what I’m supposed to do in Round Two. It’d be stupid to risk giving him what he wants if by some chance we do get pitted against each other.’ She’d be more than happy to forfeit, ‘And Tama still has a chance to knock him out of contention. How would he react if he lost? Would he jump me on my way home tonight, like a lunatic?’

“I bet he would.” Tenten mused out loud.

She brewed in her thoughts on her way up, and when she entered the second floor viewing area again she was surrounded by her Leaf peers. Lee swept forward to hug her and then stopped himself, realizing she was still tragically dirty.

“Yeah, try not to touch me or anything. I couldn’t get all of it off.” Tenten advised her friends.

Ino and Sakura chorused their displeasure over her ruined outfit. Hinata was more concerned as to whether or not she was in any pain. Lee found a clean spot on Tenten’s shoulder and repeatedly patted it, very proud.
“Did you know that guy had a Water Affinity?” Kiba checked, “Because he almost…kinda…had you.”

“He did.” Tenten admitted, “I suspected he had some jutsu I was unaware of, but I didn’t realize he was fully prepared to fight someone like me.”

“That black sword worked fine against him.” Chouji noted.

Neji filled in the space beside Lee, critiquing his girlfriend, “You never should have summoned Susumajin. It’s inappropriate for the exam.”

“I know.”

“You’ve depleted most of your chakra.” He added.

“I know.”

“You drew attention to it.” Neji didn’t even have to elaborate whose attention he was referring to. Tenten was nodding at him, hoping he would simmer down and stop bitching at her.

“Neji, lay off her.” Ino pushed her way past Tenten’s teammates with a comb in hand, and went after Tenten’s loose, tangled hair, “I thought it was great! We kind of gathered that weird sword of yours ate chakra. No one is going to want to mess with you after seeing that—”

Neji interrupted, “That sword depletes all chakra within its range, which is substantial. With enough time, it would have eroded our chakra, the Hokage’s, and that of everyone else gathered here.” He stated with finality to Tenten, “It’s inappropriate. In spite of the fact you won’t be disqualified for using it, you should have the sense not to use something like that in this setting.”

Ino muttered to herself and Sakura tried talking her down before excusing herself for the restroom again. Within minutes, Tenten had two, very basic buns tied on top of her head, which was a moderate improvement. She thanked Ino for her service. Shikamaru was still having a conversation with the Hokage about a concern of his, but it looked like it was wrapping up. He was headed back to the arena floor.

Meanwhile, Tenten beckoned her teammates over to the corner of the room and huddled in with them.

“I have more self-criticism to add to your commentary.” Tenten spoke in a low voice to Neji, “Aside from the fact that I might’ve hurt bystanders.”

The young men wore fuddled looks, surprised she wasn’t seeking an apology.

“Huo is descended from the same clan that I am.” Tenten blurted it out in a whisper, “I didn’t really know how to bring it up. But letting him confirm that I own our ancestral sword…maybe made things worse.”

Frown lines intensified on Neji’s face and Lee’s mouth formed an ‘o’ of bewilderment.

“I think he’s here because he’s been looking for it— for me.” She clarified, “And he wants it for himself.”

Neji’s anger seemed a bit more three-dimensional, “And you did not find it prudent to tell us this earlier?”

Lee hissed in a breath, “The Hokage should be informed-!”

“There is no way the Hokage is unaware of it. Tsunade-sama has my file and family records. For some reason, Huo was allowed to participate anyway, which means…” Tenten counted off on her fingers as she cited the possibilities, “She doesn’t believe Huo is a threat. Or, she has security monitoring him while he’s here. Or, she wants to let this play out to see what his actual motive is. OR, and this is not as likely, she spoke with him already and got him to agree to be civil?”

“Not that last one.” Lee determined.

“Again,” Neji repeated, “Why not tell us?” He bumped his shoulder with Lee’s to get the point across.

“I…” Her eyes shifted between the two, “I was scared.”

Lee pursed his mouth worriedly and Neji finally did simmer down.

“I didn’t want it to be true. Maybe the sword is involved, but he…he doesn’t want to just fight me and hurt me.” Tenten explained in a low voice, “He showed me that…he wants to hurt me through you. My friends. He’s willing to kill you because he knows that I…” Her voice fluttered and she trailed off, remembering the look of glee on Huo’s face when he’d laid eyes on Neji and Hinata, then deciding to target them.

Lee pushed the group further into the huddle until they all touched foreheads; an adequate alternative to hugging. “Tenten…” Lee spoke a few quiet words in Hanwen to calm her, and then switched back to Nihongo, “Making yourself face this threat alone could be exactly what he wants you to do. Please depend on us more!”

“Depend on us.” Neji echoed, watching her nod and sniff in weary agreement. He then asked, “How did he show you?”

“Huo…” She hesitated and cleared her throat, “I’ve seen him around the village. He stalks…well…anyone I care about. He wanted to know what mattered to me. And then…” She stopped speaking, remembering something.

“What?” Lee’s eyebrows raised a bit.

“It was like he was never there. When I would look for him…it was like he disappeared.” Tenten recalled, straightening, rubbing her chin, “Like my dad.”

Lee’s face went blank in confusion. Surely she could not draw a parallel between her beloved father and worst adversary? Neji pressed ahead, deriving her meaning.

“He can do something your father could. Is it a jutsu?” Neji gathered.

She shook her head, “I’m pretty sure it isn’t. Sometimes my dad would just…disappear. I don’t think my mom did that, when I was a kid.” Tenten raised her hands as if to dismiss her memories, “What am I talking about? That makes no sense. It’s just because I’m spooked. He’s gotten into my head. That asshole….”
“I don’t think you’re wrong.” Neji was willing to vouch for it.

The group was distracted by the sound of Shikamaru’s announcement for the third match. Sakura had returned to the room in time to see a morbid assortment of worried looks fall on Tama. She had finished speaking quietly to Sato and then turned to her friends, totally unruffled by the silent concern. She accepted hugs from Kiba, Hinata, and Ino.

Sakura pulled her aside and held her hands, frowning like a stern mother, “Remember—”

“I know. Kaka-sensei made me rehearse it top to bottom.” Tama smiled at her, “Don’t worry, Sakura-chan.”

“I don’t know how to not worry about this.” The girl’s voice cracked, “Please beat him…or don’t be too stubborn to surrender. We’ve never fought anyone like him before.”

The older girl nodded and quickly set off. The Leaf Rookies had a moment of wordless introspection which ended with Sato scuttling away from the railing, setting out down the stairwell after Tama.

She heard his voice and stopped on a landing, allowing him to catch up. Sato looked at her helplessly; still not quite able to accept that she had been given the toughest match up of the Tournament. Tama was dressed in a sporty, full-length jumpsuit of black, with electric blue breeze designs up the sides and arms. Her sleeves were rolled up, displaying how meticulously she had wrapped her hands in tape. She was grinning at him.

“Yeah.” His voice drifted back to its pre-pubescent tonality, mostly due to fright.

“I prepared for this. Sensei said he really thinks I can win.” Tama informed him, “And Kakashi-sensei usually doesn’t think anyone can win anything because he considers most people incompetent idiots.”

“Like me.” Sato offered.

“No.” She stepped up to him, letting him wrap his arms around her and rest his forehead on her shoulder, “What I mean is that…he and I took what we saw from Huo’s match in the preliminary round…and made sure I was twice as ready for that on a good day.” Tama added, “Sensei really beat the daylights out of me.”

“But can you…really do it? If you can’t win, Kakashi’s prepared to intervene, right? Or you won’t, maybe…” Sato suggested frailly, “Reconsider?” He felt her hand brushing his cheek, so reassuring. He couldn’t fall apart and cry about how miserable he was feeling, or that he had undermined their relationship with senseless, drunken actions. But the fear was more extreme an emotion—boiling in him, teasing the possibility that she was marching towards destruction.

He let her kiss him, even though he felt sad, still felt unclean—because no matter how terrible he was feeling, Sato understood her feelings mattered more, and he had to embrace and protect what she felt. Despite the inner turmoil, he noticed it was a very good kiss. Tama leaned back and gave him another unbearably confident, heartening look.

“See you in a little bit, Sato-kun.” She pulled away but his hand was closed tight around her wrist.
He did this a lot, she noted. Tama raised her arm up and kissed his knuckles before prying his hand away, “You’re trying to get me disqualified for being tardy, huh?”

“No, no.” He cleared his throat, “Sorry.”

She gave him one last pat before bounding down the last of the stairs. Sato made the solo journey to the second floor without bawling, although he was on the precipice of an emotional breakdown. His breathing evened out when he noticed one of Shino’s insects perched on his tunic, checking up on him.

By the time he had returned to the balcony, the entire Leaf congregation had stuffed themselves against the railing to watch. Shino respectfully gave Sato his spot so he could observe the match.

“That jumpsuit is so on trend.” Ino broke the silence, watching as Tama exited onto the arena floor.

“Lee’s is too.” Tenten built on the comment.

Lee perked up at the statement, “Tenten, does that mean you—”

Shikamaru was having an inner logical debate about surprises and his ability to be surprised. Huo and Tama were both still making their respective walks towards the stadium’s center.

‘I actually want to be surprised today.’ Shikamaru told himself, ‘Tama is going to have to put in some major legwork to wow a skeptic like me. And on the other hand…Huo won’t have to do much to scare me into timing-out this match. Maybe. I haven’t seen enough of either of them to know how to call it for sure.’

Both combatants arrived and stood a reasonable distance apart. Shikamaru turned his head to look between the two, hyper aware of the tense silence and the full-blown staredown. Keeping in mind recommendations from Tsunade and other Exam regulators, Shikamaru steeled himself and raised his hand, “When you’re ready…”

The volume of the audience increased; many eager fans had actually wagered significant money on this first round match.

“Begin!”

As was most natural to Tama, she took an offensive stance that Lee and Gai often fell into. The only detectable change on Huo’s part was his impassive face drooping in disappointment. He looked at Tama impatiently.

From the observation post, Shikamaru was trying to determine what the holdup was. He returned to the two unmoving shinobi in the arena and stood by during a verbal exchange.

Without altering her pose in the slightest, she bit back, “Sorry, but I don’t know what appearances you’re referring to.”

“You are standing here like we are going to fight.” He clarified, “Forfeit the match now.”

“I have no intention of doing that.”
“You are the most inexperienced amateur of your group and an unworthy opponent.” Huo frigidly informed her, “I am not in the habit of providing warnings to foolish ninja. I make examples of them.
Thanks are in order for my patience with you.”

The audience soaked up the sentiment and began tittering, able to hear the comments well enough through Shikamaru’s transmitting microphone that projected from speakers. Tama felt ice cold panic drip down her spine after being openly insulted, and the crowds seemed to be responding to Huo’s attitude. When she made no motion to surrender or apologize for her alleged blunder, Huo turned his back on her and faced the opposite direction in protest. Static noise in the stadium grew louder, piqued, and Shikamaru’s complaint for Huo to take his match seriously was drowned out in Tama’s ears.

‘I look so dumb right now.’ She swallowed hard, trying not to crack the cool exterior she was somehow maintaining, ‘He has no interest in fighting me. He thought this would be a free victory!’

Shikamaru had switched his mic off, frustrated, and was speaking in low tones to the uncooperative Rock ninja.

She had no clever comeback or snappy remark to make. ‘Not that I’m fond of provoking people…but this is embarrassing. I don’t want to wait for Shikamaru to DQ him for refusing to fight me...or for Huo to change his mind and try to assassinate me because I was stubborn.’ Then what to do?
Shikamaru was muttering into a two-way radio and about to walk over to her to illuminate the situation.

‘Well...I could fan the flames of his stereotyping and judgement and see how that goes.’ Tama considered, borrowing a page from Sato’s book. She would go with that.

The kunoichi dashed faster than Shikamaru could blink, replacing herself in front of Huo with her back facing him. Her in-kind dis got Huo’s attention. Tama girled it up from that point.

She pulled her hair into a high ponytail and secured it with an elastic band. She rolled her shoulders to relax, did a few side bends and hip rotations, then taunted her adversary with highly suggestive squats.

Shikamaru, taking the unusual, snide warm-ups as some kind of subtle hint for him to back up, did indeed put some distance between himself and the competitors. He turned his mic back on and watched in bafflement.

Though she couldn’t see what Huo was making of her actions, Tama supposed it was somewhat inflammatory. Commotion from the audience suggested that she was being a delightful brat and they liked it.

Tama dipped into a low, frontal leg extension and then hurled herself backward with an explosion of speed. She had sprung to full height and snapped her southpaw at Huo’s jaw before Shikamaru had opened his eyes after blinking. Huo had raised his arm disinterestedly to block the strike. Tama rolled with it; her lightning-speed punches were no joke, and utterly uncommon of most men, let alone kunoichi. Shikamaru wisely vacated the premises when he realized Tama had things under control, for the most part.

Huo was blocking with one arm. She got it. She understood he was trying to discourage her; he was trying to make her angry and feel inferior. Tama kept up with a blink-and-you’d-miss-it boxing routine intermingled with standard Leaf Hurricane kicks more in an effort to annoy than to harm. But when he tried (and missed) to stomp on her foot, Tama was a bit galled herself.
The Leaf kunoichi began to run literal, superspeed circles around Huo, almost daring him to try once more to hit her. His monolid eyes were dark and devoid of life, but Huo was watching and keeping track of her movements and positioning. He wasn’t childish enough to halt her with an extended arm to clothesline her, so he waited inquisitively to see what she would do next.

And in the sliver somewhere between his blind spot and peripheral, Huo saw her breaking free of the spiral. She charged in with her tape-wrapped fist, like some storybook hero for little girls she probably thought she was… He caught that fist in his hand, which was hot to the touch, and simultaneously capped a full foot in his mouth and cheek as a sneak-attack Leaf Hurricane caught him on his opposite side. The kick launched him sideways, and as he soared Huo realized she had snuck a Fire Clone into her high-speed encirclement, probably behind his back. He had caught the clone’s punch…then she’d kicked him in the face.

Huo somersaulted in the air and wiped his lip when he landed neatly on his feet. Tama, by then accompanied by an entourage of six Fire Clones she’d taken the time to create, bore down on him with a series of gymnastic, coordinated assaults.

He became less stingy about defending himself, whirling and dipping in Wushu forms, blocking the attacks of Fire bunshin with both arms. He couldn’t be bothered with destroying clones that would burn out within a few minutes— but the corner of Huo’s mouth twitched in astonishment when he evaded a clone and flung it…only to be locked into an arm-bar hold that pulled him to the ground. He rolled backwards, up again to his feet, trying not to be wrestled into submission, and flexibly rolled his neck and head away from thunder-clap punches being thrown at him. Huo was slippery quick and avoided Tama’s attacks, but it took more effort than he’d wanted to expend to pry the arm-bar clone away.

When he got a grip on it, the Fire Clone in question began smoking. Huo kicked off of it with two feet, soaring above the heads of the kunoichi doppelgangers, and escaped the clone that had been secretly patched over with paper-bombs. The explosion rattled the ground of the stadium and produced thick, acrid smoke.

In clearer air, the original Tama had begun fighting him in earnest, faster and stronger than she had let on initially. At least to himself, Huo amended his previous belief that this was an amateur, boring opponent. She was actually funny.

Huo smiled to himself and entertained a brief kicking duel with her, outspeeding her efforts, clipping her chin with his heel, and then dropped to sweep her legs out from under her. Tama toppled, but her Fire Clones dove in to stave him off from landing a finisher. She provided them with covering fire of projectiles as she rose to her feet.

His tone was conversational, “Have you noticed that the Ninjutsu most shinobi use has terrible economy?” Huo ducked another southpaw, “Well, have you? Your clones will expire within minutes. Clones are breakable, unreliable. And most Ninjutsu can only channel through and command a finite amount of matter…”

She had no idea what he was blathering about, but that last kick almost had him. Tama wheeled about, keeping up with the Rock nin as he tottered around and avoided the Taijutsu mob.

Huo flipped away elegantly, a good sprint away from the gang of Tamas, announcing, “Tao Arts are not wasteful like Ninjutsu.” He motioned with his arms relaxed at his sides, slowly raising them up past his stomach and chest in a scooping motion, gathering energy, taking a deep breath and then exhaling, “Would you like to see?”

Tama had some good sense to stay behind the pack as her clones charged. She watched Huo as if he were sucking through a straw, inhaling, and drew in her clones— degrading them into wisps of amorphous flame as he swallowed the fire. With each bunshin devoured, Huo’s cheeks were comically puffed. Tama grimaced and supposed that he wasn’t done showing her what his Tao Arts could do.

He exhaled a jet of empowered flame that most members of the Sarutobi and Uchiha clans could scarcely conceive of with hand seals. Tama made a break for it, running as Huo swept the horizontal column of burning catastrophe close behind her. She boldly ran up the arena’s stone wall and flipped off of it, bounding over the fire stream, and began running in the other direction.

‘I bet he has a Fire Nature, like I do. Unless his Tao-techniques can manipulate any element, and I doubt that, he’s just showing off!’ Tama also recalled Huo had put out Sato’s burning Grass opponent in the Preliminary Round, so she stood by her deduction. She was flustered by how long Huo continued to breathe fire, ‘I hope he can keep it up! I’m going to borrow some of it!’

She stopped running and made hand seals, fully prepared for Huo to scorch her as she had provided him with the opportunity.

Her friends watching from the balcony, however, thought Tama had signed her death warrant.

“What are you doing?” Sakura bellowed, thrashing her arms and pointing, “Tama!” Kiba and Akamaru were poised to leap the rail, howling and jabbering, and beside them Ino and Chouji were also having a conniption.

All Tenten could manage was to cover her mouth to hold in a petrified screech. Lee was wincing but withholding commentary until any damage was confirmed. Shino was silent. But Neji seemed to gather from the look on Sato’s face that something amazing was afoot.

The Hatake leaned on the rail, blue eyes glimmering, face lit with anticipation, “Do those hand seals look familiar to anyone?”

“I have not seen that exact configuration before.” Neji acknowledged, “What is-?”

“Right, because then she’d be using one of my jutsu.” Sato grinned, “But it looks like Kakashi let her revise it a bit!”

Down below, Tama held her wrist, letting a massive quantity of chakra and hissing Fire Release well up without any coherent shape manipulation. She ran at Huo with Gate-assisted speed and the pink-hot bonfire in her hand cut apart his fancy Tao-Fire like butter, absorbing and refining what he donated.

Tama could feel the rustle of Huo’s shirt at her fingertips, his heart a short, fatal jab away— but her hand went no further than that. A repulsive force was pushing back just as hard, forcing her off, and the kunoichi narrowed her eyes as she spotted the faint glimmer of iridescent Hanzī characters. They ringed the translucent, lambent shield around Huo with several Tao Arts prepared long in advance—a concealed defense.

Both competitors darted apart, startled. The hissing, furnace roar of the Honokiri faded away as Tama took deep breaths, acknowledging that the assassination technique that Kakashi had passed along would do no good until her opponent’s chakra barrier was eliminated.

Huo looked at her for a long moment, reevaluating his prejudices.
“You’re not here to win.” He observed, “You are only here to stop me. Did your teacher put you up to this? To prevent me from advancing to future rounds? Even if that means killing me…he condoned such a thing?” Huo was plainly affronted, baring his teeth, and he raised his hands to rest in a limber stance, “Despicable. I should report you to the proctor.”

“You threatened to kill all of my friends! Lee told us.” Tama handed him a counterpoint, “I won’t stand idly by while I know what you might do to them.”

“What a sickeningly quixotic goal you’ve set. I don’t feel like letting you surrender anymore.” Huo sneered at her as he slipped through hand seals.

His transition into true Ninjutsu was alarming, as Huo followed one Earth technique after another, hurling geometric slabs of the arena’s dry dirt floor. Tama could not evade all of the hunks of earth in rapid succession, resorting to vault over one still-muddy slab to catapult herself into the next with a shattering punch. The stone crumbled under her blow. As dirt rained down, Huo rushed at her between two upended pieces of the stadium floor—a makeshift alleyway. His Wushu was polished and vicious; clipping her twice in the face though she blocked and weaved away from him.

Tama smashed an exit through the wall of stone to her left, and took the close-quarters brawl out into open air again. She rallied; swinging, jabbing, and kicking faster, lighter— feeling the sweat on her skin hiss away into vapor as she discreetly drew on the power of two Inner Gates. When Huo flipped away from one of her right hooks, his queue of hair streaming as he looked away from her only for a split second…

The Rock nin wheezed at an impact, just as she vanished from his sight, though he felt where she had reappeared— beneath his chin: knocking him mercilessly through the air with up-ladder kicks. He was dazed for a moment as he soared like a kite through open air, and the watching crowd ooohed at the sight. Tama replaced herself under his back, “Shadow of the Dancing Leaf!”

She had begun to snare him with arm wrappings, ready to get a firm anchor on him to dive into Front Lotus, but the bandages burned as he exhaled fire. Huo’s arm snapped out, grabbing her forearm, and he leveraged himself to spin and face her as they fell. She lost count of how many punches to the stomach she took before striking the ground hard. Huo hopped lightly away and dusted his clothes off.

Tama saw double, staring up at the sky framed by the stadium’s circular top, her vision rippling as she sought the willpower to stand and take a breath. There was a great rumbling through the ground as Huo used another Earth Jutsu several meters away from her. She felt the shudder, heard the cracking of stadium floor being torn up. Tama rose to her feet and beheld a slab, three-quarters of the dirt floor they had to stand on— loosened and tossed up as Huo completed hand signs. Her brain could hardly reconcile the feat, something that maybe elite ninja might do to squash a threat, and tried to calculate her response.

Huo leaped, a figure in black, surreally attaching himself with chakra to the bottom of his giant, rocky stamp, and with great strength, flipped it ‘round its axis to smash it flat-side down onto Tama, “Stone Press!”

The kunoichi determined that there was no sensible direction to escape in. Drawing on a third Inner Gate, Tama launched herself at the threat instead, excavating through the earth slab with jackhammer kicks, “Blooming Lotus!” As the rocky floor tumbled apart, the two combatants sailed past each other in opposite directions.

From the observation area, Shikamaru was trying not to stress too much about how the arena had gone from a simple, level floor (briefly irrigated to be a pond) and then ended up as a dry, disheveled, mountainous mess after Taijutsu experts had their way with it. Unless Tsunade complained about the occurrence being a disruption to future competitors, there was nothing he as proctor could do about it.

Both adversaries skipped down towers of stone toward opposite sides of the arena, not in clear view of one another. Huo suspected that what he’d glimpsed of Tama was actually a Fire Clone that she was trying to draw his sight to. And with that in mind, Huo was only half-surprised when he landed, watching with a frown as a pair of hands darted up from the tilled soil to pull him down into the ground with the same, low-level Headhunter Jutsu the pink-haired girl had used.

He made no move to free himself, observing in annoyance as Tama was above ground to pounce on him. Her pile-driver met the Rock nin’s Tao Shield, as did her follow up kicks, and as Tama affirmed the absoluteness of his cheap and foreign defense, she retreated again.

‘How do I break through that?’ She wracked her brain for a solution, ‘I don’t even know what it is. That isn’t a typical jutsu—he’s been calling it a Tao Art. He must have had it in place even before our match, and it blocked Honokiri without a problem…’ Tama took deep breaths, composing herself on a rocky ledge, ‘The characters on that defense sphere…one of them is dim now. One of eight is gone. Maybe he didn’t have the chakra to support whatever technique it had been, after a while. So then…he has limits. If I can push him past his limits, that shield has to go away at some point.’

It was a very optimistic theory, but she hoped it would serve as a solution. Tama relaxed, deciding then to open as many Inner Gates as she could manage, keeping an eye on Huo below as he popped up from his dirt prison and dusted himself off again. He seemed to be aware of what she was preparing to do.

“When someone tells a joke out of order, giving the punchline first, mistakenly…” Huo made sure she could hear him, “That’s what this match feels like. It was supposed to be amusing, but you’ve ruined it.”

“Two problems with that: one, you don’t have a sense of humor.” Tama pointed out, “And two, this isn’t a joke. You wouldn’t know one if it rolled up and cut off your braid!” When she opened the Fifth Gate, her skin flushed red, stones clattered around her feet, and her ponytail thrashed widely as steam surged off her skin.

Not to be outdone, Huo bent into a low, regal posture and flicked his hand over his translucent ring of Tao Arts, scrolling through what remained. He tapped two characters and exhaled, letting the arts convert into an aura, simmering above him in soft blues, greens, and orange light—the burning silhouette of a phoenix that he would be happy to show off to any of his competitors and all of the audience. Because if this Leaf shinobi really wanted him to take her seriously and fight with his true strength, and she intended to pound the daylights out of him with the Eight Inner Gates—she could learn some much-needed humility from Fènghuáng Wushu.

He darted around when she did, the girl probably thinking she was quick and safely out of reach. She probably didn’t care that he was glowing and colorful, the same way he didn’t much care she’d become a steam engine—their reflexes equally acute, speed doubled. They replaced themselves multiple times around the arena, trying to decide how best to engage each other—the rubble they’d displaced was quite the bother.

He copied her when Tama took a perch near the top rim of the arena’s wall, much too close to audience seating for comfort—by the look on the Hokage’s face. But they were safe behind Leaf’s cozy, unseen Sealing Corps barrier, although Huo would make no mention that he knew it was there, indeed for an occasion such as this. When Tama began to charge like a human bullet, circling around the circumference of the wall, Huo likewise imitated her fleet-footed rush, round and round each other until they closed in and met.

Air particles shook when the ensuing flurries of punches and kicks collided. Cheers were deafening in the stadium, thrilled that the proverbial gloves had come off.

Huo’s hits were connecting. Not as if his attacks were any more precise or quicker than Tama’s furious close-quarters devilry—but he could bend and slip in ways that were unlike the Taijutsu of ninja. She was pressed to keep up with him. His firebird cloak flared briefly as he poured his strength into a bulldozing effort, pummeling her with phoenix-boxing that chipped away at the earthen structures around them, pushing her through physical obstacles like a hydraulic press with no escape in sight. If she didn’t act, she would certainly be smashed into paste against the stadium’s wall, or be punched through and out of the building, if the proctor didn’t stop it.

While Huo was mid-way through a turning kick, she took what was perhaps the singular opening she had during the onslaught. Tama double-kicked her legs up to hook both feet behind Huo’s neck, swinging down with her full weight and Gate strength, and she flung the Rock nin like a pebble in a slingshot.

He skipped like a stone over dust and debris, rolled up an incline, and then acrobatically caught himself. Huo landed on one foot and held a stork pose, still glowing with chakra, his face smug. He didn’t bother reacting to her initiation of Reverse Lotus. Tama’s sledgehammering, beastly efforts kicked Huo and his intact sphere-barrier around the arena like a child’s ball. When she reached the height of her climb, ready to snare and double-strike him back down to the earth, Huo finally reacted. With a minimal phoenix-boxing jab, he flicked her off with his extended aura and vaulted above her, vectoring down with an inhumane comet kick.

Tama crashed through a stone pillar on the way down before she was lodged, out of sight, in a pile of overturned boulders and soil. Huo could hear the furious, indignant shouting and taunting of her Leaf comrades as they watched from their balcony.

Huo landed lightly and then charged, imagining what he would do when he found her crumpled up and whimpering from the Inner Gates recoil. ‘Five Gates is a bit much for you, isn’t it pretty girl? This day should teach you that using Inner Gates is the dead man’s preferred Taijutsu. When you can’t move and bear the pain…you bring more of it unto yourself!’

He flicked his eyes left and right as he closed the distance, puzzled by the odd phenomena occurring in the arena. Stones were skittering and bouncing up from the ground, and with a great rumble, Huo witnessed the kunoichi launch herself up with a mighty jump, ‘She opened another-!’

A first, second, and third fiery punch hit him so hard and fast that, as Huo rolled and tumbled in the safety of his Tao Barrier, he had to define the locations of ground and sky again. Once right-side-up, he could see the full, extending glory of her Sixth Gate Taijutsu spanning in a fan of ignited punches, “Morning Peacock!”

The sheer volume of it would surely crack his defense, Huo noted sourly, weighing his options in all of a heartbeat. Now aware that the kunoichi was more than just a Taijutsu enthusiast, ‘A lunatic—that’s who is willing to subject themselves to jutsu that cripple!’ Huo decided to use a technique he had meant to keep to himself, if spending more chakra meant he could save the integrity of a waning shield. This art he could only use once, for it took an entire day to prepare and rejuvenate it. Huo slid his hands in opposite directions, diverting energy into a circular motion, and willed a reflective Tao Art into a glinting, icon of yin and yang. When Tama’s assault struck, he braced himself on steady legs as the icon spun on his outreached fingertips, bouncing back the attack from whence it came. The arena’s invisible Sealing Corps barrier contained the resulting blast.
At the VIP booth, Tsunade was fanning dust bits and smoke from her face after the Morning Peacock barrages had crashed together. She spoke sidelong to Gaara over the din of the stadium, “I am honestly debating if it’s a good idea to send Shikamaru back in there. I need him to call this…but it won’t look good if he comes out of there with a shiner.”

“You think that’s all that would happen to him?” Gaara didn’t like how she minimized the potential danger for her proctor. What was going on below was approaching tectonic activity in terms of power output.

“I can’t send you down there to end it. You’re a guest and it’d have to be pro bono, since I didn’t add you to Exam payroll.” Tsunade tapped her nails to her lips, “But you’d come out of there in one piece, Kazekage-sama.”

“Send Shikamaru.”

“Fine. You pus.” She waved at Shikamaru insistently where he stood on the level beneath the Kage’s booth. The Nara gave her a concerned look, thinking at least a Hail Mary was in order before he jumped back in. Shikamaru was wise to hang back for safety’s sake. The rumble had continued.

Huo took a mighty swing at empty air and it prompted a chorus of confused twittering in the audience. Greatly peeved, the Iwa nin glanced around to look for the lunatic kunoichi who had not yet collapsed in pain. At this point, he would prefer a sitting duck to a mobile opponent. With his Yin-Yang Reflection spent, he could potentially tread much thinner ice in future rounds, ‘And I cannot thank her for that.’

And there, skirting just beyond a toppled pillar of rock, Huo spotted her and then sprang, phoenix cloak glowing, and smashed the earthy pile apart when he landed. He’d come up empty handed again. ‘She hasn’t made any clones. I know she isn’t trying to distract me.’ He kept watch from the corner of his eye, certain that she was simply trying to prey on his blind spots before she toppled over and gave up. Stones underfoot were still skittering, he noticed.

Yet he wasn’t facing front when it would have behooved him to, and some booming force bashed him in the face, hurling him back. He was starting to feel pain. The Tao Barrier was sagging under pressure, relying on the last dredges of chakra he had allotted to it. Huo spun like a feline to catch her with a brutal kick as she went by, but that too hit nothing.

Huo realized, as he pitched forward and was knocked akimbo by another ungodly force, that it was because he was moving and seeing too slow. He was hit twice more before it occurred to him to invest fully in his barrier, realizing he could indeed wait it out—that she wouldn’t last. Though, if she had time and strength enough to continue for a few seconds, neither would he.

This time Huo did clothesline her with the wing of his glowing aura, and watched with satisfaction as Tama slid the radius-length of the arena straight into a wall—too fast to stop herself. Huo’s face dropped when she bounded off of it and blurred away from his sights again. He then perceived that they were rolling and tousling at a high speed he could not personally achieve, but he had knocked her in the chin several times as they grappled and snapped apart in a meteor-shower of Taijutsu. When his Tao Barrier gimmed apart without a sound, Huo felt his first kick of the Exam wallop him in the stomach. He weathered it well—but before he could roll to a complete stop in the dirt and hope she’d do the same, Tama hurled herself over him.

His eyes were watering, so he was unsure if he imagined her gleaming with the outline of some beast. Huo contacted his faculties, replenishing what he could of his defense, and simultaneously gawked as Tama balled her two hands together as a hammer, raised above her head, and brought them down on him with horrific force, “Noon Tiger Cub!”
The debris and dust cloud that billowed up was so pervasive that Natsuhi kindly formed a chakra wing and fanned her fellow village leaders for some fresh air. Tsunade had seen Shikamaru head down to determine a victor of the match, if anyone was left. He would probably wander through dust and wreckage for a while before he found anyone.

Gaara apprised that the match they had witnessed was not characteristic of Chunin. “It exceeded many Exam parameters in an almost punishable sort of way.” He reported.

“It was…a public safety concern.” Natsuhi agreed.

“What am I paying the Sealing Corps for?” Tsunade gruffed, “So it smells a bit smoky— everyone is safe and sound.”

“I give this match full points.” Tazuna decided aloud, “I don’t know jack-all about the jutsu we just saw, but it didn’t look like the shit Genin or Chunin in the Tide Village can use. I don’t think I’ve met a Jounin yet who can do that.” Hidden in a paper bag in his lap, the old man discreetly cracked open a beer can. Everyone still heard it.

Back on the ground, as the dust was still clearing, Tama had tottered away and shut her Gates after the coup de grâce. She collapsed to her knees, shuddering violently.

So that was it. That was about exactly what Kakashi had in mind when he’d asked her to incapacitate Huo in as lethal a way as she saw fit. They had both agreed it was for the benefit of her group as a whole, even if it would take her out of contention.

Tama had prodded at the very limit of the Sixth Gate, reaching far past what was sensible. Much of it had been improvisation, but she held out long enough to stuff Huo in a hole somewhere.

And now the pain had caught up. Tama tried to recall how to breathe properly, tried to somehow block out the sensation of nerves revolting, haranguing the damage to her muscles and bones. She felt patches of skin had rubbed away through her jumpsuit. She let tears roll freely and silently down her cheeks, completely unashamed.

‘I’m pretty sure…my left hand is broken.’ She considered her right hand, which didn’t have much feeling in it. There was no way to tell how long she’d be out of commission, or when she’d feel comfortable enough punching a dummy or sparring partner again.

Within the dim, dusty cloud, Tama looked across the craggy pitch to where Huo lay. She swallowed hard when she noticed him twitch. A sniff of air caught in her nose as she watched him slowly, so slowly, heave himself forward, weakly slipping his legs under himself again.

She had the bright idea to call Shikamaru over, wherever he was in the cloud, but even her voice wasn’t working correctly. Ah. She’d nearly bitten her tongue off earlier, since she’d hit Huo (and been hit by him) so hard. Her heart pounded as she watched Huo rise and stand in the shade of a jagged, displaced boulder. And then, a thousandth of a second later, he was standing in front of her.

Her brain tried to process it. ‘No…that’s not…speed. He isn’t fast. He walked over here like there was a door. Like the distance was so short…”’ He could never hold a candle to her speed, she was certain. But Huo stepped into the long shadow cast over him and then emerged beside Tama where another long, yawning shadow stretched on the arena floor.

He looked furious. He was positively livid— his hair yanked and frizzed out of its queue, clothes dirtied, his chin and hands bruised.

“Insubordinate cunt.” Huo hissed and pushed hair out of his face, “You’ve spoiled six— Six Tao Arts. Who do you think you are? I didn’t come here for you!”

Visibility improved for onlookers, and many spectated the tail end of Huo completing hand signs for his Stone Press Jutsu. On the inconveniently far side of the area blocked by debris, Shikamaru was hurrying to reach the combatants.

In her seat, Tsunade beheld a scattering of movement within the stadium— involving those who were most invested in the match.

As the earth slab from Huo’s retaliatory attack crashed over his defenseless target, Shikamaru snatched him a hair too late in a Shadow Bind. The proctor stood dazed for a moment as he held Huo rooted to the spot, watching as Kakashi and Gai arrived in the same split second. Gai moved to exhume his niece from Huo’s Stone Press, and Kakashi had rushed past Shikamaru on his left side.

It was only then Shikamaru noticed the suffocating killing intent of the person coming up behind him, and Kakashi was gracious enough to intervene on behalf of the heedless proctor and his captive.

Wide-eyed, Shikamaru watched as Kakashi caught Sato in a run and tried to halt him, only to be dragged several meters as his nephew tenaciously tried to wrestle away from him.

Not that he had any true desire to protect Huo, but Exam protocol demanded that he, as a proctor, keep participants of the Tournament from harm— especially third party attacks. Shikamaru stepped sideways over stones, very carefully puppeteering Huo away from the strife.

A string of spit flew out of Sato’s mouth as he screamed his head off, pushing back against Kakashi as his uncle disarmed him of a drawn chakra sabre. All manner of nonsense was uttered from the young man’s mouth, as he demanded, with some believable authority, that Shikamaru hand Huo over. While the audience buzzed all through the stadium during the unofficial timeout, Kakashi managed to drag Sato to the nearest passageway back into the building’s interior. Since Shikamaru and Huo were no longer within earshot, Sato decided to shout at Kakashi instead.

“—it was cheap! He shouldn’t have been anywhere near her, then he was! Let me—!”

“You need to stop this—”

“I need to stop? Why aren’t you out there for her? You made her fight in this match! You let Tama act as a cushion for the rest of us, Kakashi.”

“She told me she wouldn’t back down. I couldn’t convince her otherwise—” Kakashi got knocked by a sharp head-butt for his trouble, and in response he flattened Sato against a wall to hold him still, “Don’t even try to cross me here and now. I’ll put out the word for you to stay a Genin for the rest of your days.”

“Then do it.” Sato spat and continued to struggle in the bear-hug, “I don’t care anymore! Let me go out there. I need to be there, Kakashi, she’s mine…and if she’s…it if she…” Sato’s voice clattered as if he had a throat full of marbles, “…I won’t…d-do…anything to that asshole…but I need to be with her.”

Hearing what he wanted to hear, Kakashi released him.

Immediately, Sato bolted out of the doorway with no weapons drawn, as promised. He came upon Gai and Kiba having successfully dug through the earth pile, and they laid Tama flat under Sakura’s outstretched hands. She kneeled and bent her head above Tama’s face, calling her name, pinching Tama’s wrist in her fingers to find a pulse.
She was brutally mangled. While Gai and Kiba could hardly look, so profoundly disturbed by the sight, Sato stared without flinching when he came to a stop beside the girl he loved. It seemed as if her lower body had taken the worst of it. Maybe she’d found the strength to block and protect her head and chest? There was no way to tell. Sakura had her hands everywhere, working double-time, muttering things to Tama about shopping and girlish charm and damn, even Tsunade never hit that hard. But she did. Everyone had seen it, Sakura told her.

By that point, Kakashi was persuading both Kiba and Gai to stop staring at Huo as if a bullseye had appeared on his face. It was making Shikamaru anxious. After briefly deliberating the consequences of murder in broad daylight, in front of nine thousand spectators, the men decided against it. Greatly frustrated, Kiba rejoined Sakura as Tournament-assigned medic-nin began to flock to the fallen kunoichi. Gai exchanged brief words with Kakashi before going to locate his brother, Ken, who was probably racing through the building to find a way to reach his daughter.

A staff medic listened to Sakura’s comments and then had Tama placed on a stretcher to be moved. They would take her to emergency care at the hospital, the medic clarified, and they would also keep her team informed of her condition. Extensive internal trauma had put Tama at risk, and they would check again for signs of brain injury even through Sakura had not detected any.

Sakura held Kiba’s arm as he shook with anger, and she turned to Sato to speak as rationally as possible, “Stay with her, Sato. Kiba-kun’s match is next. This is…I don’t know what we—”

“…Shino…” Sato muttered under his breath. He looked at Sakura as if he was splitting in two, and then kept pace with the retreating medics who were removing Tama from the arena.

Kakashi returned from speaking with Shikamaru, passing along news to his two quaking students, “We can’t pin him with a technicality. Shikamaru doesn’t have him dead to rights since he couldn’t classify what technique Huo used as a gap-closer…so we’re going to wait for the officials to have the last word. That should have Huo disqualified, hopefully. Then in a short while, Kiba,” He said pointedly to the boy, who seemed to snap out of his fury, “You’ll enter your match with a level head. Got that?”

Kiba nodded wearily.

“Let’s head inside for a minute.” Kakashi advised. He led them along into the junction hallway of the stadium where restrooms, refreshments, and staircases to upper levels mingled. The man patted Sakura’s shoulder as she lowered her chin to her chest and sniffled.

Kakashi gave a long sigh and noted, “This won’t be good. No one is going to be thinking straight from here on out. Ken will be at Gai’s throat; that I’m sure of. It’s really me he should be taking issue with.”

“Tama said she never planned to surrender. You didn’t force her.” Kiba reiterated.

“Yeah…but I asked her to try to stop Huo from advancing. That effort may have jeopardized her needlessly.” Kakashi ran a hand through his hair, vexed, “While I feel that she’s put quite the dent in him…I’d hoped for more. I wanted to put you all in a better position in later rounds…to face each other civilly and not go against foreign competitors.”

“Not all of what we saw were true Ninjutsu or Taijutsu…” Kakashi acknowledged, “I have no insight on how to deal with Tao Arts, I’m afraid. I want you both to be cautious going forward. Forfeiting a match will not disappoint me. Please know that.”
They nodded to their teacher, and as they were about to consider a concession stand’s green tea bottles, just beyond a non-public checkpoint—a rabble began between a wayward spectator and two guards. An old man was clamoring at them to allow him into the participants-only concourse. His Nihongo was terrible and heavily accented. Sakura squinted and recognized the uproarious intruder.

Kiba caught on, “Think he’d know something…? Like, about what we just saw?”

“Yup.”

They turned to Kakashi in unison.

“Alright, alright…” The Jounin loped over to the guards and politely fibbed to them, “Hey there. I’ve asked this gentleman to come down here to consult with me, actually. I’ll bring him on through.”

A chubby guard was adhering to the rules, “He’s got no credentials—”

“He can’t cause any trouble. He’s a hundred years old.” Kakashi chided.

Wong Leung frowned.

“No ID Pass, no entry—” The stalwart guard sputtered and toppled over beside a turnstile. When his companion blinked into Kakashi’s exposed Sharingan eye, he too gently settled himself on the floor for a nap.

“Hmph!” Wong Leung folded his arms and imperiously proceeded past the checkpoint.

“You’re Lee’s grandfather, is that right?” Kakashi asked as he proceeded with the old man towards the stairwell.

_I am. I need to speak to Lee right away._ Wong Leung stopped himself and grumbled, trying his luck in a second language, “Talk to Lee.”

“Er, yeah. Come along then, Mr-?”

_Enough chit chat, you great bag of stuffing. I could’ve gotten past those fools myself._ Wong Leung was making his way up the stairs just a bit stooped over.

Kakashi gave a bemused look to his pupils before ushering them along.

Sato had kept up with the medical evac crew for as long as they tolerated his fluttering presence, snapping at him to stop touching their unconscious patient. They made a brief stop in the Exam-Finalist treatment room and transferred the girl to a rolling gurney, contacted the hospital a few streets south of the stadium, and continuously checked her vitals.

His fingertips skimmed Tama’s forehead protector on her brow before he was pushed away with finality, and ordered to return to the concourse. Sato stood in the corridor with his heart in his throat, wondering what would happen as the medics wheeled her off. Would Tama wake asking for him? Could she move? Would her pain be unbearable, like what he recalled of his injuries in the Land of Rain?

He took a few rattling breaths and then turned back, watching as Gai and Ken filled the space ahead, speaking in hushed tones and moving briskly— like when Kakashi and Gai competed in pointless footraces. But Ken’s haste was not pointless. When his eyes fell on Sato, Ken diverted his path and stopped beside him.

“Aren’t you going to the hospital?” The man sniffed.

“I… I was told not to. I’m expected to compete.”

“How self-sacrificing you are.” Ken observed.

As Sato flinched and took the jibe, Gai intervened, “Ken, we can’t leave without the official ruling and knowing if the Tournament will proceed.”

“Of course it will. Why would the Hokage try to interrupt this monetized circus for my daughter’s sake?” Ken spat, “Miako took the south exit. She and her brother will meet me at the hospital. And…” He turned to Sato, “You stay here. We don’t need you there.” He glared back at his brother, “And I don’t need you there either.”

Ken stormed off.

Sato watched the man round the corner and disappear. Gai exhaled loudly through his nostrils, filled with clashing emotions.

“As soon as this is over, we will join them.” Gai advised calmly, “My brother is upset. He was concerned for Tama-chan well over a month ago…and I am sure he never imagined that she would fight so fearlessly today.”

They backtracked through the hallway together, and Sato mused at the night and day difference between Gai and Ken. Gai always treated him like family. Ken always treated him like deadweight.

“Would he have felt better…” Sato thought out loud about Ken, “If I had attacked Huo? If Kakashi hadn’t stopped me—”

“I told him to stop you.” Gai said.

Climbing the stairs in silence, it occurred to Sato that, yes, maybe Ken may have felt a shred of vindication watching his daughter be avenged. He was the hard-nosed, confrontational, surly type who would appreciate such a gesture from his future son-in-law. Naturally, such a notion curdled Gai’s blood.

Upon reaching the Leaf Finalist balcony, a highly unusual scene unfolded before them.

Lee was there surrounded by his peers in a semi-circle, and his short grandfather stood beside him with his arms folded behind his back. Some sort of conference was being held.

Gai approached Kakashi and asked if allowing a spectator into the Finalist-only area was permissible.

“If it isn’t,” Kakashi supposed, “The officials don’t need to know about it. Even we shouldn’t be up here right now. But we’re still waiting on the match determination so we have some time to kill.”

“Gai-sensei,” Rather somber, Lee greeted his mentor, “This is my grandpa Wong Leung. He was alarmed by the last match. He says he wants us to be as informed as possible about Huo and the Tao Arts he uses.”

Gai could not muster the strength to grin as he normally would have, but he gave his gratitude to the old man, “Thank you. We are in fear for our students.”

That damn Hokage won’t stop this Tournament, will she? Wong Leung wondered, Not even if teachers ask her to?

Lee translated, “Grandpa asked if the Hokage will not consider ending the Tournament if Jounin Sensei request it?”

“I doubt it.” Kakashi replied thoughtfully, “While she has her concerns about that Rock Genin, she would warn any competitor who fears for his or her safety to surrender the match.”

“She has invested much in this Exam.” Gai added.

Surrender. Fuh! What if that brute doesn’t accept surrender? Wong Leung chided, Lee, tell everyone this. Your friends. Tao Arts are formulas. I had no idea there would be a competitor here who could perform them at such a high level. It shocked me out of my seat when I saw it.

Still listening to his grandfather, Lee echoed, “Formulas?”

Yes. As a child, I watched in awe as Tao Masters in my homeland wielded them, but I have never seen a soul use them in these lands. That Rock ninja was taught by a master. I myself can hardly form a script if I tried, and yet he had a ring of verses prepared for his duel. The only way to stop Tao Arts is with Tao Arts: they must be undone, like unwinding a knot. To cancel one another. Therefore, none of you can stop the techniques he will use against you. Wong Leung announced.

“Ah…” Grimacing, Lee relayed the explanation, “Grandpa says that he has not seen anyone use Tao Arts here to the degree that Huo has…outside of the Middle Kingdom. We cannot stop it. Tao Arts can only be halted by other Tao Arts.”

Not Ninjutsu. Wong Leung added.

“Not Ninjutsu.” Lee added.

Kakashi acknowledged, “I couldn’t copy those techniques with the Sharingan.”

Building on the idea, Neji recalled astutely, “He could absorb Fire Clones with a breath.”

Yes, exactly Neji. The old man nodded to him.

“What do you mean we can’t stop it?” Kiba protested, “That dick is outnumbered. If we each fought him in subsequent matches, he’d be finished by the Final Round.”

What sense is there in risking your death? Wong Leung thrashed his head and his queue swung, That scoundrel is as dishonorable and abhorrent as they come. He won’t obey the same rules that you Leaf children do. He will kill you if it pleases him. What he seeks in this village is not contingent upon his victory in the Tournament. It is apparent.

Lee parlayed the counterpoint.

“All the more reason to confront him now.” Neji was aligned with Kiba’s reasoning.

“Excuse my input, but I was watching that match very closely,” Kakashi tapped his hitai-ate concealing his Sharingan eye, “And Tama did stop a Tao Art. At least one, at any rate.”

Wong Leung tried to brush that statement off, The boy’s chi expired. She did not stop it.
Lee passed on his grandfather’s retort.

“Well, that counts as wearing him down, doesn’t it? He can be injured. And that’s all that it will take.” Kakashi reasoned, “Brute force would stop anyone who’s out of chakra.”

The point remains…you would try to challenge and weaken him at your own peril. Wong looked to all of the young, fresh faces watching him, Do teachers truly care so little for their pupils in this country? Was that young woman a sacrifice to feed your pride? He turned to look at Sato, who was wilted beside Gai, Is that young man’s suffering not obvious? Why don’t you ask him to fight the scoundrel, and let him die and be put out of his misery?

Shocked, Lee was at a loss for words. Everyone stared at Lee and waited for the scandalous proclamation.

Instead, Tenten repeated Wong Leung’s statement, “He said: We will challenge Huo at our own peril. Do our Sensei really care for us so little in this land? Was Tama just a sacrifice to feed their pride?” As she spoke, Lee motioned for her not to complete the paraphrasing, “Is Sato’s suffering not obvious?” All heads turned toward Sato, who perked up in embarrassment, “Why don’t we ask him to fight Huo and let him die…and put him out of his misery?”

Hinata balked and tearfully covered her face. Shino grimaced beside her. Many of those gathered quietly retreated into themselves. Kakashi appeared relatively impassive after hearing the biting remark.

“Old man,” Sato rumbled, “That’s not fair. If our sensei didn’t care about us they wouldn’t be standing here now listening, would they?” He gestured to Kakashi and Gai, “Won’t it be worse to let Huo run rampant through this Tournament without any opposition? You said yourself he doesn’t subscribe to rules. He’ll wait until this is over.”

And then your Hokage will have security take him.

Tenten repeated that.

Sato threw his hands up in the air, steamed, “Then you know what? You’re right! All of this is about pride! Look around you. We all want a piece of that bastard. No one wants to punish him more than me. He hurt the person that is most important to me. I don’t even know if she’s going to live to see tomorrow!” His nostrils flared, “And as someone who’s already died once, trust me on this: I don’t give a fuck if someone kills me again. Let me at him.”

More silent, uncomfortable, yet impressed staring.

Wong Leung chuckled to himself, I didn’t think picking on him would do much…

Please do not taunt him, Grandpa. He is very sad. Lee recommended.

He’s more than sad. Wong Leung noticed, And maybe that is good. For all of you.

Grandpa, Tenten interjected, For transparency’s sake, I should mention…I have a blood tie to Huo.

Oh? The old man’s white brows raised enough for his crescent eyes to appear.

Yes…that’s part of the conflict. I wonder if I could diffuse the situation if I…gave him what he’s looking for?

That jian? He quickly guessed it, Dear girl, do not EVER assume that giving in will quell discord.
Imagine what he would do with it! Wong Leung criticized, That would by far be worse than challenging him.

Neji was straining to hear any Hanwen words he recognized, but there weren’t many. Wong Leung identified the concern on Neji’s face and sighed, Tian-Tian…Lee…fight with sense. You and all of your friends take great care and use your best judgment. Overpower Huo and defeat him as many, as a village, like this pinwheel-eye scarecrow suggests. But whatever you do...The old man warned sternly, Don’t give him what he came here for.

The two youngsters nodded fervently. Lee moved along to escort his grandfather down the stairs and to the concourse, and Tenten relayed the last message Wong Leung imparted.

“So...to not put too fine a point on it…” She concluded, “He said we should go with Kakashi-sensei’s plan. Brute force. But also, exercise our best judgment.”

“We were leaning towards that anyway.” Chouji spoke up.

“How many more people...could he...?” Hinata’s voice wavered, frightful, and then a crackling announcement sounded over the loudspeakers.

It was not Shikamaru’s voice, but one of the officials of the panel, Mitokado Homura (at least by ears that recognized it.)

“After review of the techniques used and stopped footage, the panel has agreed that the winner of the match is Sasagainu Huo.”

Gai gnashed his teeth and stomped down the stairwell. Kakashi gave a long, growling sigh as he heard the last of the broadcast: “Tournament matches will continue.”

“I know we were prepared for it, but it fucking sucks to hear them say that.” Kiba gripped the guardrail of the balcony, “Who’s on that panel anyway?”

“Does Tsunade-shishou not get any say in a match’s calling?” Sakura wondered, stupefied.

“Probably not as much as her peers. Even if she and Gaara appealed it, and I bet they did, on what basis would Huo be disqualified? No one died in the arena and the techniques used were sanctioned based on the rulebook.” Kakashi stuffed his hands in his pockets, “Seems like the Exam framework they use for rulings was worded...opportunistically.”

Neji gave the man a hard look, trying to pry into his implication, but then he turned his attention back to Tenten. She was trying to keep the other kunoichi calm. Hinata seemed terribly shaken, Ino, somehow, had gone silent, and Sakura was swinging between terrific anger and tears. How typical. Tenten had the target on her back, and there she was comforting others. When was it her turn to soften and weep?

Never. He had never seen her do it. Not really. Neji searched his memory banks and remembered when he had asked her to attend Hikune’s funeral, and how she had gotten close to showing grief… But no. Tenten preferred sticking her chin out and keeping her back straight, internalizing her turmoil. Maybe, his brain ventured, he ought to bring the subject up to her at a quieter time. It genuinely troubled him.

Shikamaru’s next announcement sounded, “The fourth match will be between Aburame Shino and Inuzuka Kiba. Competitors, report to the arena.”
Sato and Hinata sidled in beside Shino, who stood motionless beside the balcony, and offered their words of support. Kiba accepted a hug from Sakura as she lightly pounded a fist on his shoulder, mumbling, “Don’t be stupid. Don’t overdo it. We’ve got to realize we shouldn’t be fighting each other.”

“Not while that asshole is still breathing.” He spoke of Huo, and squeezed Sakura reassuringly, “I will, Sakura-chan.” Kiba slipped by and called Akamaru with a soft sound, descending to the lower level with his ninken. Shortly after that, Shino also exited for the stairwell. He’d passed Lee by on his way back up.

Sato watched from the corner of his eye as Lee rejoined his team at the left side of the balcony, noticing how they clustered together and spoke quietly amongst themselves. Sometimes, they acted more like a family than a squad that took missions together. Sato shut his eyes and heard Sakura voicing her concerns to Ino and Chouji near the back of the room.

Hinata patted his arm as he leaned on the guard rail, “I know you’re upset.”

“Sorry. I’m trying not to drag you and Shino down.”

“You’ve been upset for two days.” Hinata clarified.

“I…” He cleared his throat, “Yeah.”

Her already soft volume lowered to a near inaudible whisper, “Did you have a fight with Tama-chan? Is that why-?”

“It’s not…exactly like that. I just keep…messing up. Now that she’s—” Sato’s voice cracked and he fought for his normal tone, “Now that she’s hurt so badly…I don’t know how to make anything up to her. I’ve been so scared of losing her. Lately I’m all about self-actualization…but all I seem to discover is how shitty and spineless I am.”

“Shino-kun and I don’t think of you that way.” She chided quietly.

Sato smiled weakly and exhaled, “Thank you. You and Shino are too good to me.”

“You have always been good to us. Shino-kun told me he grew up feeling excluded and overlooked most of his life…but you always acknowledged him and spent time with him.” Hinata straightened and canted her head toward him, “I never felt ostracized on my team…the way I felt at home.”

They watched below as Kiba and Shino crossed the tossed stones and debris towards the estimated center of the arena.

“Shino can win.” Sato wagered, “He’s been keeping his cool. I know that Kiba’s frazzled.” He frowned to himself, “I came here today completely ready to surrender. Now I don’t think I can.”

Hinata’s groomed eyebrows danced above her pearly eyes, “You’re going to-?”

“I need to fight for Tama. If I can continue into future rounds, I’ll take Huo down.” Sato explained, “And sorry, but I’m gonna kick your cousin’s ass first. I didn’t see the point in trying before.”
Curiously, Hinata glanced in Neji’s direction and saw that he was focused on the match down below. She could not soundly rule Sato out when she had once witnessed Naruto, then the underdog by most accounts, unexpectedly clobber Neji and take the victory. And yet, today’s Neji was far more mature and skilled. ‘Beating Neji-niisan won’t be easy…”

“Hey.”

She turned her attention back to Sato.

He nudged her with his elbow, “You and Shino need to fight as hard as you can. I can’t do this without you guys.”

“We will, Sato-kun.” She had a brainwave with her dear friend, thinking of how Huo would quail at the force of friends and those with bonds, “For our team. For Tama-chan.”

On the way down to the ground level, Shino reflected on possible strategies to apply to future rounds. Specifically, reasoning with his Leaf compatriots about establishing a pecking order, having volunteers surrender, propel their strongest contenders into matches against Huo, and approach it from a logical perspective. It would be a much sounder way of dealing with the Rock ninja.

And though Team Gai seemed to have some inkling of what made Huo so dangerous, they’d been furtively huddled near the balcony and disclosed little to their peers. Shino was quite certain they knew something had attracted Huo’s interest. He was disappointed they were not forthcoming with the information.

To complicate the matter, his two teammates, Kiba, Sakura, Ino, and Chouji had reacted angrily and fearfully after listening to Lee’s grandfather. No one was in the right frame of mind to consider his suggestion, Shino deduced. He believed that if they discussed the matter together, if they set aside their emotions for a brief period of time, they could come up with an effective counter.

Unfortunately, Shino had not spoken up and advocated for his idea. He laid the blame with himself, knowing he was too introverted and passive to take a stand and demand the cooperation of his friends. He’d never done it before. Today could have been the day, for he truly felt compelled to act, but once again he had kept quiet and drifted on— carried on a current to whatever fiasco lay ahead.

By the look on his face, Kiba was swirling in rancor after what had befallen Tama. There would be no reasoning with him before the match, Shino presumed. Kiba would probably be incensed if he suggested they organize match victories in favor of Team Gai— to pit them against Huo in later rounds. Stepping out of contention and asking others to consider it (which Shino was personally unopposed to) was now out of the question.

Among the rubble and tilled stone of the arena floor, Shino came to a stop and faced Kiba. Shikamaru arrived shortly after that, twiddling with his shirt-mic to make sure it was not yet switched on. The proctor looked between the two, his frown indicating that he was no longer enthusiastic about Leaf ninja battling each other. It was only natural that Shikamaru, another avid noodler, had drawn conclusions similar to Shino’s. He cleared his throat and asked, “You guys sure about this? Doesn’t look like you’ve put much thought into upcoming rounds against the psycho…”

“Neither of us are suited for such an opponent.” Shino pointed out, coaxing one of his insects from his hood and onto an outstretched finger, “It would be wiser to encourage those more experienced with Wushu and Tao Arts to advance.”
“What, so you’re just gonna stand by and usher Neji’s team ahead? I’m Tama’s teammate. I deserve a chance to fight him.” He was bristling, and beside him Akamaru had also gotten riled up via osmosis.

“Neji and Lee can deal with Huo, in all likelihood.” Shino confirmed, “If Tenten has any strength remaining, she may also be a reasonable choice.”

“And the rest of us just sit it out?” Kiba was baring his teeth a bit too much.

“Yes.”

“Easy for you to suggest—you don’t give a damn about anything that’s happened!”

Shikamaru cleared his throat again to signal he’d gotten the “okay” to commence over his radio, but Kiba continued shouting.

“—! Are you—? Are you trying to preach to me?” Kiba snarled, “Well you can be damn sure you aren’t going to Round Two, Shino. Now you can count on that.”

“Alright.” Shikamaru interrupted, “Mic’s going on now— shut your fucking faces— thanks.” He flipped the microphone on, “Are you both ready?”

Two swift nods and then Shikamaru dropped his hand to start it, ducking away from the action.

Kiba had a knack for redirecting his anger at people, Shino conceded. While he’d known his suggestion would not be received well, it seemed as though Kiba was making an effort to plunge his hate through the current match (and whoever it involved) to let it reach Huo later. Also, he’d wasted no time loading Akamaru up on a food pill and making the ninken transform into his likeness. They came crashing down on the spot Shino had been standing in with horrific force and speed. Light-footed, Shino slipped away and let his insects disperse in the air, keeping track of the human and dog in disguise.

Kiba was shouting things like, “Surrender if you think it’s such a good idea!” And, “You know you can’t take a hit!” Indeed, Shino actively avoided the whirling Fang Over Fang offense that had leveled the last tall boulders and slabs to a roughly level surface again. For some curious reason, Kikaichu insects were having none of Akamaru. The cloud of bugs skirted around the dog as if repulsed. Shino suspected some kind of repellent had been applied to the dog…and maybe to Kiba as well, according to disdainful reports from his colony.

When Kiba came too close for comfort, and his ninken had tried to corner Shino from the rear, it provoked a long, consecutive chain of Substitutions from both competitors as they bashed each other and retreated. By Shikamaru’s estimate, Kiba had replaced himself (and his dog) twelve times and Shino, a bit more slippery, fifteen times. The proctor rubbed his chin in thought, ‘I don’t know if that just broke a Chunin Exam record for most Substitutions, but I’ll confirm that later…’

Somewhere in the distance, Sato was heard cursing and not exactly cheering. It was bellowing in favor of Shino. Kiba gritted his teeth and did his very best not to get pissed off at the Hatake he hoped to wipe the stadium down with later.

Without warning, Akamaru charged off in the wrong direction and slammed headfirst into the broad side of a boulder. Dizzied, his transformation wore off and he swayed on his feet, whining. Kiba called to his dog while charging through a swarm of disinclined Kikaichu insects, diving at Shino, ‘What’d he do to Akamaru? He couldn’t have gotten a hold of him with his colony…’ He went with his gut that maybe, as a student of Kurenai and confidant of Sato, Shino was employing Genjutsu to keep master and ninken apart.

Kiba’s suspicion was proven correct as soon as he patted the dog’s head, releasing Akamaru from a sensory-scrambling illusion, ‘Shino’s crafty but he can’t fight worth a damn!’ He acted quickly to have his dog transform once again, and Shino slipped through hand seals for his clan’s advanced Ninjutsu.

With a shudder, a quartet of huge parasitic beetles, each about 3 meters in length, emerged from the ground and were not in the least dissuaded from approaching Kiba and his look-alike. Kiba felt a very slight but persistent nibble on his chakra as the insects scuttled toward him. Even worse, he stepped back and fell right into a hidden, excavated trap the bugs had dug earlier.

“Ah, fuck me.” Kiba growled and clambered to his feet, looking up at the trap door. A huge insect crawled over it as if to trap him underground. “Really original…not like Kaka-sensei hasn’t stuck us in a trap hole a thousand times…” Kiba formed hand seals again and exhaled a violent fireball, and as it struck the underside of the beetle, the insect screeched and darted away from the hole. For good measure, Kiba leapt above ground and hurled the bug with his clan’s Taijutsu into the stadium wall. He dusted his hands and turned back to watch Akamaru nimbly avoiding the other giant nuisances. Shino was nowhere to be seen, but Kiba still had a faint whiff of his scent.

With a short whistle, Kiba had called Akamaru back to his side, “Ready boy? Let’s fry us up a snack!” The dog placed his transformed paws on Kiba’s back, leaping up and over the young man as he completed hand seals, and the two engaged in a simultaneous, sweeping Fire Jutsu, “Wolf Flame Tongue!” The wave of fire scorched the giant insects and sent them skittering for the edge of the arena, two of which retreated back underground.

After completing their fiery pounce and sniffing out Shino’s hiding place, they accosted the Aburame with Taijutsu that sent him hurtling — the hood of his suit slipped back. With some impressive athletics, Shino rolled over a flat stone top and bounded off of Akamaru’s shoulders to avoid a pincer move, all the while summoning from a utility scroll. Kiba perked up at the sight of a weapon, “Oh? So you’re serious now? What was all that talk about giving up!”

Shino’s colony produced a Bug Clone that squared off courageously against the repellent-stinking ninken. Meanwhile, Shino singled out Kiba, twirling and slashing with a short polearm that cut doily designs into Kiba’s new outfit.

“Hey! Knock it off!” With a roar, Kiba parried the bladed weapon away with a metal arm bracer, sparks pinging everywhere, and spun to land a mighty kick that knocked Shino to the dirt. They dove for each other again, no longer sportsmanlike, hacking and pummeling one another. Shino’s nagamaki cut a clean, horizontal line across his opponent’s exposed stomach, the blood splattered across Shino’s sleeve as they parted.

Kiba did not look at all concerned and reached for his back hip pouch, “I’ll hand it to ya: you tried. But there’s no point in us wasting time when we both know I need to advance!”

At the Leaf Finalist balcony, Sato was still cursing and also apologizing to Hinata for the profanities he used. “Shit!” He slammed his hands down on the rail, fuming, “Sorry Sunshine! It’s just— damn Kakashi!” Sato watched with supreme displeasure as the Inuzuka used the Earth Summon: Tracking Fang Jutsu that Kakashi had passed on to Kiba, scroll spinning and hand seals completed, “My uncle is a useless, flip-flop traitor for giving Kiba that!”
What surprised Sato even more, and Hinata eeped in shock beside him, was the appearance of Kakashi’s own ninkeen pack, all eight dogs charging up from the earth and launching themselves at Shino who had gone into full retreat. Sato cursed less but complained more that his uncle would sign his student to his Dog Summoning Contract before his family. Hinata kindly pointed out that Sato already had a Summoning Contract, and Sato quieted down when he remembered that. “Yeah…so maybe that deterred Kakashi—but still! Kiba’s from the Inuzuka clan so he doesn’t need dog reinforcements!”

The pack closed in on what was actually a Bug Clone, cleverly coated with stray droplets of Kiba’s blood. As the dogs lunged and snapped, the clone scattered apart into thousands of insects. Pakkun, ever the wise dog, redirected his pack mates from the dupe and locked-on to another source of their tracking scent, “Bull! Bisky! All you mutts! On your left-!” The pack charged behind its leader.

Bull was nicked in the shoulder by Shino’s nagamaki, but the massive dog swatted the weapon out of the ninja’s hand. As the smaller, quicker dogs sunk their teeth into the back of Shino’s legs and forearms, intent on immobilizing him, Kiba had initiated another jutsu. Shino had a few moments to watch Kiba with his ninkeen and a hastily produced Shadow Clone for a Three-Headed Wolf Transformation. The physical force of the attack would be monstrous, and Shino supposed Kakashi’s dog pack was aware of that fact. They would retreat before the strike landed.

And as that moment in time surely came, when Kakashi’s dogs retreated and Kiba bore down in the tremendous, earth-sundering form that was sure to win the match…Shino had been plopped down into safety into a trap hole dug by a lingering, giant insect from earlier. The ground shook as Shino exited through another hole, patiently waiting for Kiba’s costly transformation to wear off in a puff of smoke.

Breathing heavily, Kiba rounded about in his slighter, human form, glaring at Shino from across the arena. In the meantime, none of Kakashi’s dogs had been sprayed with protective insect repellent, and were wasting time fleeing and nipping at a cloud of Kikaichu insects. Kiba set to spring for another assault with his ninkeen, and then abruptly fell face-first to the dirt. Retching, he pushed himself up to his knees and looked up again with blurred vision. Off to the side, Akamaru was distracted with the same few giant insects that had burrowed up from below ground.

Shino adjusted his visor glasses on the bridge of his nose, standing serenely, “I am not the one who should be giving up this match.”

Stubbornly, Kiba heaved himself to his feet, “Quit your-!”

“The bleeding has stopped.” Shino spoke of the gash on Kiba’s stomach, “My insects clotted your wound for you.”

Kiba’s mouth hung open, bewildered.

“Additionally,” Shino added with his hands in his pockets, “They are infiltrating other systems of your body as we speak. Your joints will freeze. Breathing will become difficult. You can try to win, but rest assured that you will not be advancing to future rounds.”

In that moment, Kiba made an election not to be overly dramatic even though it was tempting. His head was spinning, still shocked that he had not noticed his infection by Shino’s insects, which he supposed were a much smaller variety than normal Kikaichu. Stoooped over and grinning angrily, Kiba motioned to Shikamaru, “Hey proctor. I don’t want to pass out like a wimp in this stadium, so go ahead and call the match.”

Shikamaru promptly returned, giving Kiba a cursory examination, “You can’t continue?”
“Nah. He did something gross to me.”

Shikamaru tried not to think about it…but he thought about it. He declared Shino the winner and then beckoned the Aburame over while shutting off his shirt microphone. Giant insects retreated, Kakashi’s dogs poofed home, and Akamaru rolled onto his back to scratch an itch—no longer in a fighting mood.

“Shino.” Shikamaru said flatly, “You can fix him, right?”

He fiddled with his glasses again, “I can.”

“Good. Walk him to the treatment room and do that.” The proctor commanded.

Akamaru caught up to his master as Shino, rather pleasantly, pulled Kiba’s arm over his shoulder and helped him walk off. As he had served as a chew toy for eight dogs a short time ago, Shino was trying not to limp from his injuries.

“Ow! Shit! Don’t pull so hard.” Kiba hissed, the cut on his stomach still smarting, “Did you seriously…infect my body with bugs that live in your body?”

“I did.”

“Dude—”

“There is no cause for alarm.”

“You have trillions of microbial fauna in your body at all times.”

“Your body’s organisms are inside of me.” Kiba rationalized down the hallway, “It’s too explicitly intimate!”

“You are suggesting this is sexual in some way.” Shino pointed out his defeated adversary’s discomfort, “Asinine and incorrect. Even if it were, you would physically not come to harm from a co-mingling of our bodies. Not in the way your ego sustains damage from such a notion.”

“That is why…” He pushed Kiba through the treatment room door and towards a patient table, “Sato and I get along.”

“Holy shit.” Kiba realized, “That’s right.”

After that, Kiba calmed down considerably but could not look as Shino coaxed tiny, mite-like insects out of the wound from where they’d entered Kiba’s body. It didn’t hurt, Kiba conceded, but it made him feel squeamish. A uniformed medic-nin healed cuts, scrapes, and bites on the two young men before shooing them out.

‘Maybe I owe this guy…a little more respect.’ Kiba thought to himself, ‘He’s not a jerk. He’s been trying to think ahead…and he didn’t have to do much at all to make me eat my words.’

With that in mind, Kiba asked as the climbed the stairs back up to the second level, “Hey…Shino. Did we just completely screw up future brackets for this Tournament?”

“Are you asking because there was a definitive winner?” Shino replied, “Not necessarily. I can still surrender any match in the rounds to come. However…I doubt others will be so willing to give up for the sake of pitting logical opponents against our common enemy.”

“You mean Sato won’t give up now.” Kiba gathered.

“Correct. He will not surrender. Not after what Tama-san went through.”

Kiba ran a hand through his hair, gruffing, “Great…and we actually need Neji to advance.”

“It would be prudent.”

“Can Sato beat him?”

“No.” Shino confirmed, “He can’t.”

“Then why do you still sound concerned about it?”

“Because even if Sato cannot win…” Shino elaborated, “He may not see the sense in allowing Neji to advance. He may try to impede Neji from doing so.”

“Then let’s hurry the hell up,” Kiba pushed on Shino’s back, nudging him up the stairs faster, “And talk to that idiot!”

And back at the balcony, they discovered Sato was not present. Kiba and Shino bee-lined for Hinata, only stopping briefly to accept congratulations from Sakura, Ino, Chouji, and Lee. Tenten and Neji were on the far side of the room, having a low-volume conversation.

“Hinata.” Shino returned a hug from his teammate when she squeezed him, “Where is Sato?”

“He went to the restroom.” She took a step back and gave Shino a searching look.

“That’s convenient.” Kiba noted, “Guess he’s not coming back before his match, is he?”

“Probably not.” Sakura interjected, “He’s been acting awful flighty today…although it could have something to do with Tama’s—”

“That’s what we need to talk about.” Kiba motioned with his hands to all of their companions, getting their attention, “Maybe we should have thought about this before, well, Shino did—but we need to discuss who should be fighting Huo in future rounds.” He made eye contact with Tenten, indicating that she and Neji join the public forum. All gathered in timely fashion.

Hinata tried to offer a vote of confidence, “I think Shino-kun can.”

“I would attempt to injure and impair him to the greatest extent possible; if I thought it were a sound idea.” Shino agreed feebly, “But I would surrender, regardless of my chances.”

Hinata wilted at the thought.

“Sato probably shouldn’t.” Sakura supposed.

“Definitely shouldn’t.” Tenten seconded the notion.

“Yeah, but-! Couldn’t he do some serious damage? You know— drop a huge bird on that jerk?” Ino suggested.
Lee cut in, “Sato-kun could do that. Though it may serve us all to remember my team found a giant eagle in the Forest of Death completely dismembered…and we are fairly certain Huo was responsible for that.”

Vexed, Ino tossed her ponytail and shrugged, “He has the Chidori! And a heart full of vengeance. Just point Sato at the guy and he’ll get plenty of work in for us!”

“He might die, remember?” Tenten sniffed.

“This time Shika can step in to—”

“He can’t.” Neji also presented sobering facts, “Huo uses some kind of technique to reposition himself close to opponents. Shikamaru will not be fast enough to stop him.”

“And someone here is going to have to put up with that.” Chouji added.

Tenten cupped her chin in her palm, “Yeah. That’s true. Someone has to bite the bullet. We may need those who have better defenses or stamina to fight Huo just to be safe enough to surrender and avoid that gap closer we couldn’t see…”

“So…Hinata.” Sakura suggested.

Lee watched as the color drained out of Neji and Tenten's faces and then waved his hand, hoping to amend the proposal, “Ah! Perhaps not! Hm. I am willing…if only to do as much as I can before forfeiting.”

Hinata was looking between her friends, her cousin, and Tenten, who seemed to be whipped up in a new bout of mental turmoil.

“Lee may be a better choice.” Tenten agreed reluctantly, “But…Huo definitely has jutsu and maybe other Tao Arts we haven't seen yet. No matter what it'll get ugly…”

Shino offered his idea to the group, “Team Gai is best suited to deal with this threat. Myself, Sato, Hinata, Sakura, and Chouji…our intervention is not advisable. While our participation may become necessary in Round Two or Three…our forfeiture is essential. Based on who advances after Round One, we can convene again and assign each Round Two Finalist the amount of damage they must inflict to Huo if he continues to advance. Also…”

Kiba raised an eyebrow as Shino went on.

“Any defeated Finalists waiting here…Kiba, Ino…stay alert for opportunities to interfere, should Huo pose a threat to a comrade’s life again. As Shikamaru may not be able to predict when and how to intervene in critical moments that Huo will take advantage of…your vigilance could save a life.” Shino nestled his hands in his pockets, concluding, “Those who are defeated and well enough to spectate: watch out for our friends.”

“Sure, but…that could get our people disqualified if we step in before a time-out.” Kiba noted.

“Then so be it.” Shino was unruflled by the idea, “We all know, just as the Hokage does, our lives are more valuable than celebrity in this Tournament.”

Neji nodded gravely in agreement, his eyes shut and arms crossed.

“So then!” Ino patted Lee and Tenten on their shoulders, “Not too much pressure on your team! We’ll throw ourselves at Huo if we have to, and step in if we have to…but in the end…you have to deal with him.”

“Right.” Tenten warbled.

“While this plan sounds kosher and pretty dependable, someone still needs to relay it to Sato.” Sakura reminded her peers, “Hinata-chan, Shino…do you mind finding him before the next match begins?”

“Of course we don’t!” Hinata squeaked, tugging on Shino’s suit sleeve, “Shino-kun, let’s hurry.” She darted off and searched with her Byakugan, her teammate quietly tagging along.

The groups filed off again as silence prevailed, Sakura patting Akamaru’s head absentely as she asked Kiba about what Shino had done to him in his match. Ino and Chouji muttered amongst themselves while Lee listened in to Tenten’s whispering comments to him and Neji.

“This is scary. We have to make it to the Final Round. Ideally, two of us will have to lay the hurt on Huo. That should do it.” Tenten admitted sheepishly, “And honestly, I don’t know if I’m the right one for that job.”

“Also!” Lee raised a finger, “Neji must advance past this match. We will need his strength.”

Tenten clapped Neji on the back, “Seriously. We need you, Neji.”

“I know.” He grumbled, arms still crossed, “But if Sato does not listen to reason as Hinata-sama explains a widely-accepted scheme to defeat Huo…he will hamper my efforts.”

Tenten thought on it for a long moment, “Well…I could always ask Ino to poison him before the match so he craps himself and gives up.”

Silence.

“That is certainly an alternative.” Lee yielded.

“If I were in his place…” Neji imagined, speaking to Tenten, “And it was you who were fatally injured by the brute terrorizing this Exam…I would not surrender to anyone. I would demand cooperation and be certain I had the opportunity to avenge you.”

“How very sweet of you.” Tenten praised him, “But that won’t fly here and you know it.”

“Sato will make things difficult.” Neji insisted.

“Hinata-chan and Shino-kun have a good chance to persuade him!” Lee disagreed.

Neji shook his head. Lee and Tenten sighed in unison.

Ten seconds later, Shikamaru announced the Fifth Match. Then Neji sighed. The group was very skeptical that Hinata would find her teammate in time to transmit the plan to him. Those gathered wished Neji the best, and Lee gave his good friend a confident nod and smile. The Hyuga heir moved to the stairs and Tenten trotted ahead of him, saying that she was going to get something to drink at a concession stand. She seemed a jittery, muttering mess, pointedly not looking back at him as they descended the stairs.

At the concourse, before she could turn a corner into a public area to drink and eat her troubles away, Neji gently reeled her in by her crusty sleeve and pulled her close.

“I’ll get you dirty.” She warned him.
“That doesn’t matter.” He asserted, “I have some requests.”

Tenten felt his chin resting on her shoulder; could feel him breathing more harshly, nervously as he held her from behind.

“Requests. Plural.” She noticed, “Of me?”

“Of you.”

Her skin tingled. Tenten asked, “What can I do for you, Neji?”

“Leave it to me and Lee. Do not fight Huo if you have the option to forfeit. I am personally asking you not to fight him.” Neji bent his head a bit, his mouth ghosting just behind her ear, “If you have to…do not use that sword. Promise you won’t.”

“I promise I won’t.” It was easy giving him that one.

“Openly discuss future rounds with the others. Be prepared to account for changes and unforeseen circumstances.”

“Sure! Hey Neji— you’re making it sound like you don’t think you’ll be back up here in twenty minutes or less.” Tenten pointed out.

“I’m not sure of that at all.” Neji confirmed.

She swiveled around to face him, frowning, “Well I think you should be.”

He shook his head, “I don’t take anything for granted anymore. It was my great mistake at the last Exam…and I’ve been fortunate enough to have friends with patience and persistence guide a hopeless fool like me.” Neji gave her a curious look as Tenten began to squeeze his upper arms, fidgety and listening to him intently, “I will do what I can. For all of you.”

Tenten scrunched her eyes shut, willing liquid back into tear ducts and drying up the silly emotional response. Dry-eyed, she moved her hands and patted her thumbs at the corners of his mouth anxiously, and asked, “Do you think any of us will get promoted?”

“I believe we all will.” He answered honestly.

She released a rumbling sigh, “Ah…then that’s good. Now we need to try not to die or play into Huo’s games.”

Neji nodded, very aware of her fingers playing over his lips. A breath of a kiss passed over them to reassure her.

Tenten held his gaze, her frown softening, “Okay. I’ll do everything you requested, and maybe do you a few better. I can be quite clever.”

“I know.” He conceded, amused.

“Full disclosure…” She gave him a preamble to a confession, “If only to give you something to think about while you’re out there…”

Neji looked at her expectantly.

“I am into you. Extremely, distractedly into you. You’ve pulled it together. Neji, at some points in the past you disappointed the hell out of me…and there were days I scratched my head and asked myself, What am I thinking? Him? Really? Want to know what I’m thinking now?” The kiss she planted on him was swift so she could continue explaining, “You’ve turned out better than what I ever dared to hope for. You’re the greatest.” She could feel him smiling, “This outfit looks amazing on you. You’ll probably ruin it, but I’ll always remember. Huh. When I think of all that you can do and of what you will do for others…if you mix pride and euphoria, I guess that comes close to what I feel.” Tenten had to stop talking because he was kissing her.

“I don’t deserve that kind of praise.” He said softly, his face hovering close.

“It’s not really praise. It’s just stream-of-consciousness. Genuine Tenten-thoughts.” She termed it for him. Her brain was recording how Neji was smiling and she was smiling too, right back at him and no one was ever going to see it.

“There is no comparison— nothing brings me joy the way you do—” The start of Neji’s heartfelt return fire was cut off when Tenten shushed him, pointing towards the archway of the concourse.

“Shikamaru will disqualify you if you don’t get out there in the next few seconds.” Tenten snapped him out of it, “Believe me, I do want to hear you say mushy shit to me. Hold on to it and let it percolate, then tell me later, alright?”

“Alright.”

With a parting kiss, Tenten shoved him off and down the corridor. He looked back at her over his shoulder in a way that was wholly unlike Neji’s former asshole persona of old.

She winked at him and then darted off for the concession area, feeling rather proud of herself, ‘Hopefully that got him in the right head space! We can beat Huo. Fuck that guy.’ Tenten stopped in a horseshoe of snack stands, ‘Great, where do I have to go to get mango bubble tea? I need to hurry or I’ll miss something in Neji’s match!’ She dispatched two Shadow Clones to assist in her search, noticing her reflection in a shined kitchen appliance panel, ‘Whoa! I'm blushing like an idiot. I meant to tell him that stuff later, but I just went and blurted it all out. Smooth. Good thing he ate it all up! …God I need to get laid. As soon as possible.’

“So what’d the old fella say?” Asuma pressed, “Something helpful, hopefully.” He had an unlit cigarette resting on his lip. They were seated in a non-smoking section of the stadium.

“He elaborated that Tao Arts can only be neutralized by other Tao Arts. Our students should seek to exhaust and overwhelm Huo with brute strength, if they intend to defeat him.” Gai filled his fellow Jounin in, “But Wong Leung advised against them jeopardizing themselves to fight an opponent who lacks honor and respect for rules.”

“Well put.” Kurenai concurred with the idea, “There is no need to fight Huo at all. He seeks to goad our pupils into believing they must.”

“How would it look if a barbarian from Iwagakure won this Tournament? Purely for the sake of shaming Konoha?” Asuma referenced the past war and lingering bitter feelings, “Administration is going to hate it if our Finalists don’t stop him.”

“Then let them hate it.” Kakashi voted.

“Those tensions should remain in the past. To put our students in danger, merely to subdue a historical enemy…” Kurenai crossed her legs and tipped her nose up, “It is beyond childish.”

“Childish sums up Administration to a T.” Asuma observed.

Kakashi noticed that Gai was staring down into the arena as Sato appeared from an odd entryway, and shortly thereafter, Neji also exited from the typical access point. While Gai could certainly relate with Sato’s anguish over Tama’s injury, he was by far more invested in Neji’s success. Similarly, Kakashi felt no urgency to cheer on Sato in this bout, and was still hoping his nephew would quit and duck out early to be where he was needed most.

Kurenai seemed quite sedate, yet she had not let on to any of her Sensei companions if she expected Sato to proceed seriously or not. She kept her expectations under wraps.

The Jounin watched as the two opponents crossed the trampled dirt of the stadium to convene at the center. Sato was a silent, glowering figure in white, contrasted by red triangles adorning a tunic that Kakashi knew very well had oft been worn by Konoha’s White Fang. It did tweak a nostalgic feeling in him. Neji seemed a true reciprocal to the mon of the Hatake; tall and also in white, trimmed in blues and blacks both tranquil and intimidating, the sigil of the Hyuga clear for all to see.

‘If these two saw things the way that Gai and I do…’ Kakashi thought to himself, stowing his book away. ‘They would realize they are already equals. They would know that their mentors and village leader would prefer watching them resign in peace than demonstrate their fighting prowess.’ He watched as Shikamaru came to a stop between the competitors, ‘What a shame. Neji and Sato never got along, and I don’t expect that to change now.’

Kakashi could only hear a bit of Shikamaru’s voice over the loudspeakers as the audience began to trill in excitement. With that, the proctor began the match and vacated the area. Kakashi, much like his friends seated beside him, who all wished the best for their students, was very surprised as Sato drew a single chakra sabre and pointed it at his adversary.

And Neji stood there and did not move a muscle.

"I'm not joking this time." Sato warned him, "Stay out of my way."

Neji was having an uncommon moment of patience. He stood there without an ounce of hostility trickling in his blood, and regarded Sato who was plainly enraged and unaware of the plan for Leaf Genin to selectively proceed or abstain from future rounds.

Maybe it was because he was in a very pleasant mood thanks to Tenten, or maybe because he did harbor authentic empathy for Sato's pain. In either case, Neji was not ready to spring into a fight if it could be avoided. Had Naruto been watching, he may have fainted from the shock of Neji not itching to brutalize someone.

"No one is in your way, Sato." Neji pointed out innocuously, "Did Hinata-sama speak to you before this match?"

"Yeah, and I apologized to her in advance for kicking your ass."

"I see. So you have not been informed of all Leaf Finalists agreeing to advance and withdraw based on logical progression." Neji noticed the start of a whirlwind of downy feathers, both real and illusory, floating around the arena.

"Logical progression-? You mean me having the chance to avenge Tama, because she's the person I love most and anyone here could understand that?" Sato snipped, "If so, sure, I accept your surrender."

"You've misunderstood," Neji assured him, "Leaf Finalists agreed that my team should be those who advance to defeat Huo."

Sato hated the sound of that so he drew his second chakra sabre.

Neji kindly reminded him, "What you are feeling is completely justified. If you think on it, you'll understand that wasting energy confronting each other is not the best way to go about this."

"Right. So you can give up now or accept that we are about to waste energy trying to beat each other." Sato retorted, "Your choice."

Being nice never was his forte, Neji thought. His peers would have to hand it to him for trying and being considerate of his opponent's distress. But his comments were falling on emotionally deaf ears, and perhaps the kindest way to go about it was to knock Sato out of contention physically. Neji pulled the sash of his jian free of his back and drew Mo-Ye from its scabbard. By then, Sato was already rushing straight for him.

His Byakugan was entirely necessary as Neji quickly realized Sato was far faster and more dexterous than Tenten, with a more unorthodox swordsmanship style to boot. The Feather Caper Illusion had disguised (in the absence of Neji's Kekkei Genkai) several of Sato's Fire Clones, which Neji had taken the time to hack apart and not disturb with Wind Release. Meanwhile, the real Sato had whipped Neji in the chin with the hilt of a White Chakra Sabre, and came careening in with a second swing aimed for Neji's neck. He barely parried with Mo-Ye, whirling, his free hand using the sturdy scabbard he still had to jab Sato in the stomach and push him away.

A Fire Clone ignited behind him in unison with a Tar Clone's leap, hoping to trap and burn Neji while his back was turned. He tossed Mo-Ye's scabbard aside and shot a nature-less Air Palm at the combined clone effort, knocking the fire and tar residuals to the ground in a heaping mess. In the same motion, Neji turned again to parry another flurry of Sato's swordstrikes. His jian was ground to a halt within one of Sato's swift combinations.

With Mo-Ye securely caught between his chakra sabres, Sato twisted himself into a leaping kick that caught Neji in the side of the head. As Neji keened sideways, he watched carefully as Sato acrobatically launched himself again, white chakra shimmering along his short swords as he swung and slashed at a retreating opponent. Once Mo-Ye was free, Neji dipped into an abrupt Wushu form below Sato's reach and propelled himself forward, clanging his jian against a chakra sabre and sliding it up the blade— nicking Sato's hand just enough for him to drop it. Before Sato could somersault to collect the discarded weapon, Neji deftly kicked it away.

Angrily, Sato spun again, feathers everywhere, clanging his sword against Neji's weapon— aiming for the head, face, neck, chest, and sides at a great rate of speed. The audience went bananas while watching the veritable sword duel, as optional techniques fell completely to the wayside for a long while.

When Sato's second Tar Clone came creeping in to snatch Neji from the rear, the Hyuga was caught in a blade-on-blade pushing match as Sato steered him in the direction of the oozing clone. With no other choice, Neji hurled himself into a Rotation that flung the Tar Clone aside, as well as the real Sato, and all weapons flew from their hands and fell, stuck hilt-up in the dirt a considerable distance away. Sato rolled backwards and sprang up just as Neji darted forward in textbook perfect Gentle Fist form to shut an abundance of tenketsu. His hands poised mere inches above Sato's chakra points, it occurred to Neji that his opponent had completed hand seals and was molding an insane, hair-raising amount of chakra right under his face.

Neji had charged into a counterattack.

Sato's Chidori had drastically transformed its shape, brimming with Yang chakra that had flattened and stretched into three-dimensional segments, into panels of a huge wing, "Yōton: Light Wing Chidori!"

And it shot through the right side of Neji's chest, shoulder, and neck with a force that blindsided the Hyuga heir, impaling him up on the chakra wing's climb, and tossed Neji like a ragdoll as Sato withdrew his hand and cut off the jutsu. Neji struck the ground once in a bounce, streaking blood across the dirt, and then landed flatly on his back without a sound. For a long moment, the stadium was hushed and then began to jabber again after the unexpected assassination technique.

Shikamaru descended within a heartbeat and held a hand up to Sato, cautioning him to stand back. He stood over Neji and held in a gasp as the white Hanfu the man wore was dyed in his own blood. Shikamaru shut his shirt microphone off in case he needed to curse. Kneeling down, he brought his face close to detect a very faint breath as Neji inhaled, to his relief, "Holy fuck-! Neji, you okay? Can you hear me-?"

Neji was in fact hearing a garbled mixture of sounds, ranging from the audience's concerned oohs and tittering, to Tenten's petrified shrieks above on the balcony. As politely as possible, Neji reached to push back against Shikamaru's vest and sit up. Shikamaru could hardly believe he was still
"It's a timeout, officially. That was—" Shikamaru glanced over his shoulder back at Sato, who had not moved since the attack, "I'm honestly in awe you aren't dead right now."

"That makes two of us." Neji had to take a moment to ponder how on earth he could still move and think after the assault. He struggled to stand despite Shikamaru's protesting.

The Yōton Chidori had been the hottest, fastest mortal experience he'd ever had in his life, and Neji had experienced Tenten's empowered Hiyumi Fire Release— child's play, by comparison. But Sato had not aimed for any vital organs with the assassination technique, which was perhaps out of camaraderie or pity, Neji guessed. The technique had cauterized the wounds it caused, which explained why the bleeding had quickly ceased. Had Sato pierced him just a few centimeters to the left, through rib, lung, or liver, Neji would not be relaying such information to Shikamaru right that moment.

His cheek and jaw were seared and a good portion of hair from the end of his ponytail had been vaporized, Neji assessed as he stood fully. Shikamaru was having a minor conniption, advising him against continuing the match. Though the injuries were survivable, Neji was astonished by how stingingly painful they remained, feeling as if he were being continually zapped.

"Kakashi didn't teach him that one." Shikamaru noted glumly, "I don't know about this. I really don't think I can let you go on in good conscience. What if he does it again?"

"He will." Neji surmised, "But not before his loss is assured."

"Neji—"

"I will continue."

"I'm not—"

"Disqualify me, if you must." Neji maintained.

Shikamaru relented, "I don't have you down for any technicalities. You're standing and speaking."

"Then end the timeout."

"If being insubordinate and churlish counted as a technicality, I'd Frisbee your ass out of here, Hyuga." Shikamaru muttered before turning the microphone back on, "The match will continue!" He retreated promptly.

Using his Byakugan once again, Neji quickly detected the Genjutsu that Sato has snuck in— tricking Neji's plain eyesight to follow an illusion while Sato ran at the single-degree blind spot at his opponent's back. He had retrieved his chakra sabres by that time. Showing off the bending evasion that Wong Leung had imparted on him, Neji did not turn to face Sato as he slipped and stepped, dodging sword swipes that he kept in his field of vision. Mo-Ye was still stuck up in the dirt several meters to his right.

When Sato managed an unexpected sliding tackle, momentum sending him skidding over the ground, he nearly cut Neji's legs out of from under him. The Hyuga made a timely leap and shot a nature-less Air Palm at the whelp. Sato rolled out of the way, tossing his sabres that he had twined with trick wire, and formed hand signs while his hands were free, "Yōton: Spark Flash!"

Neji had to assume some things— fill in the blanks while his brain and senses acknowledged complete flash blindness. Even the Byakugan was utterly scrambled, overwhelmed by light particles. He assumed that Sato had used trick wire to pull his short swords back after using the jutsu. Neji also assumed that Sato would be sixteen degrees to the left, judging from the dirt crunching, running footsteps and heavy breathing. Neji further assumed Mo-Ye was where he had last seen it, off to his right approximately a seven to eight meter sprint away.

He was not going to speculate when or if his vision would return. As it stood, Neji had been accepting and internalizing Wong's lessons for months to not merely "see with his eyeballs" or so Lee had translated it. So Neji took a chance and dropped into a Wushu crouch that fully evaded Sato's swordsstrike at the precise moment it came arcing for his head. Neji heard the blade whistle by as he pivoted, slipping up from a sequential Wushu form, and made a tightly estimated dash towards Mo-Ye. Hopefully.

Sato gave away his pursuit positioning by his angry cursing. Neji would think it'd be elementary to take advantage of an opponent's blindness by not producing sound, but whatever.

There! He felt the tassel of Mo-Ye at his fingertips and then firmly took the hilt in his hand. Neji turned again, barreled backwards by a strong blow from Sato's sabres that pinged sparks off of his jian. He landed on his back with a wuff, his Chidori wounds throbbing, and felt the pressure of Sato bearing down onto Mo-Ye with both of his short swords. Neji caught Sato's stomach with his feet and rolled back, tossing Sato ass-over-tea kettle to the dirt.

Vague shapes were returning; all sights illuminated in silhouettes of white and pale shadow. The slight bit of vision Neji had regained allowed him to choose between Sato and a paper-bomb swathed Fire Clone, and he swung and thrusted with Mo-Ye as the startled Hatake began to realize his Flash was wearing off. Not that it had mattered— even without sight Neji had been able to keep up, and it was steaming Sato to no end. When the Fire Clone detonated, Neji strafed sideways to avoid the blast, and Sato dove forward to draw Neji's attention again. From behind, Aroo the screech owl furled his claws into Neji's ponytail and pulled sharply.

Though it was a small gesture, Neji was surprised. His head tipped back and he swung once at the distracting bird, the same moment in which Sato used a second Spark Flash.

Neji was not surprised Sato took that moment to disarm him, and let his two minion owls Aree and Aroo make off with Mo-Ye (though it was a heavy item for them to steal away with.) A white chakra sabre mercilessly nicked Neji in the torso wound the Chidori had burned through him, and a yowl of pain escaped him as he bent away from the blade point, blind and weaponless.

He'd had about enough of the preposterous effort Sato was making to proceed to future rounds. Without a doubt, Sato would waste more energy in the hope of winning this match than he could possibly use against Huo. Why didn't he see that? Neji wondered.

Freshly bleeding and furious, Neji stood and braced himself in a low Jyukken stance, able to hear Sato's advancing footsteps a stone's throw away…and fired a vacuum wave swirling with Wind Release chakra.

That attack was probably not advisable, Neji thought a moment later. Wind Release Air Palm had cut down a forest on his first attempt, and killed a man on his second attempt. As Neji could not see the result and things had gone quiet after the whirlwind, he was uncertain if Sato evaded the technique or was currently disassembled on the arena floor. But he had a feeling that Sato was most likely alive, based on the clamoring of the stadium's spectators.

He got the impression that the air and space within the arena seemed more congested, as if something large had suddenly appeared and stuffed itself in the ringed building. Neji took an educated guess that Sato had summoned an owl that had, somehow, defended against a deadly Wind Release attack. And it was a towering behemoth of an animal. And he couldn't see it at the moment.

"You're not in good shape, Neji." Sato's voice sounded distant, as if it were coming from atop the giant bird's head, "Give up so I don't have to hurt you any worse!"

Defiantly, he held his Gentle Fist posture, keeping his eyes shut to rest them. With any luck, Neji would have his vision back in a minute or two— and he could dedicate more effort to stopping Sato's Spark Flash jutsu.

Neji overheard Sato giving orders to his monstrous bird, which he called Haneheika, and heard Sato direct it to stomp Neji or otherwise do as it saw fit. In retaliation, Neji shot another Wind Release Air Palm that made contact, but only seemed to ruffle the feathers of the gigantic beast. He took a running tumble to the right to avoid the crash of giant talons and scaly foot, gouging up the ground where Neji had once stood. When a cloak of the owl's feathers came sweeping by like curtain, Neji repelled them with a Rotation to avoid getting swept by the broom-like motion.

Another stomp of a clawed foot smashed down to his immediate right and Neji tumbled, getting a sense of the speed of the animal and how it positioned itself. As Haneheika brought his face down to snap at Neji with a hooked beak, Neji was successful landing one Air Palm on the owl's nares and a second, rapid follow up squarely between Haneheika's eyes. The owl reeled back with a reverberating hoo-reeeee of pain.

Vision incrementally improving, Neji wagered that as the giant owl retreated and took flight with a storm-inducing flap of its wings, Sato was probably on the ground and poised to strike again. Right about then, a glowing sabre slashed near his face and a second attack grazed his shoulder. Neji spun and relied only on intuition and instinct, reaching out where he estimated Sato's wrist would be, but caught his upper arm instead. Rolling with that, Neji closed a chakra point there and then bent low, slamming Sato with a Wushu high kick to the ribs. The Hatake was flung backwards, and Neji could estimate where he'd fallen. Neji rushed at him.

Sato had mixed feelings about what was happening. He was rather impressed that Neji could be blind and still thrash an opponent. It also grated terribly on his pride that Neji's blind Taijutsu, which was now some hybrid of Jyukken and Wushu, had utterly compromised him and his dancing evasive maneuvers. Sato had to get away from it. Neji had the advantage in close-quarters without vision, and could still guess where chakra points were on Sato while Neji kicked and felt his way around.

He stuck Neji in both shoulders with his sabres, and then Sato kicked him away with a roar. Finally parted, Sato stowed away his short swords and summoned his most faithful, oversized owl, Kutaiku. The truck sized bird took off with his summoner on board.

In the moments that followed, Neji had some peace and was not assaulted by any jutsu, clones, or other nonsense. His vision gradually cleared up, though a bit fuzzy, and the Byakugan was adequately functioning again as he looked up. Neji estimated that Haneheika was in a flapping hover between two and three kilometers above the stadium. Kutaiku graciously dropped Sato off on Haneheika's head and then soared away until he would be needed again.

Well. Sato probably felt confident that Neji couldn't reach him up there. And he'd be right about that. With that fact in mind, Neji wondered how Shikamaru would want to go about calling the match with one of the two combatants sky high.

Except that Shikamaru didn't drop in to call anything. Neji had a few seconds to marvel at the debris and scatterings throughout the arena dreamily drifting up and up, floating miraculously. His brain quickly worked out that no, random objects were not flying away into the wild blue yonder. They were being attracted to a new center of gravity. He too, then, felt his feet slipping against the ground.

Neji anchored himself with chakra and reevaluated. How much did this match mean? Not a whole lot. Sato seemed to think so, but Sato also was too stubborn to acknowledge he was not a proper adversary to take on Huo. Neji wasn't so sure he wanted to fight anyone at this point, from an objective point of view…but Sato had pissed him off. And, admittedly, he was not entirely cured of his own bloated pride. Naruto, Tenten, and Wong Leung had not completely beat it out of him yet.

'He's used such a seal at the previous Chunin Exam, to manipulate gravity.' Neji noted, guessing the paper seal was strung from the rope Haneheika was dangling from his claws like a fishing line, seemingly unaffected by the technique. It was certainly a Forbidden Jutsu Sato had been permitted to hold onto, and that was just as likely totally legal in the Exam's Rulebook, at least according to the anything goes comment Kakashi had made earlier.

Then, the chunk of ground he was attached to by chakra ripped up and began floating away. It was surreal— Neji making a grab for any earthbound material to hold onto, crumbling at his fingertips as he too was whisked up with speed…and shot up weightlessly to where gravity prevailed skyward. The Sealing Corps barrier protecting the audience, apparently, did not have an actual top to deflect jutsu above the stadium.

Below, Shikamaru was fretting that this was going to be a brawl he could not realistically interrupt. He looked to Tsunade in the VIP booth who had leaned over to exchange words with the Hoshikage, probably the only other person in the stadium who could fly. 'Maybe she'd-?' Natsuhi shrugged at Tsunade and then Tsunade shrugged back at her. They remained in their seats. 'Great. Guess Hoshikage-sama isn't going to be rescuing any flyaway Finalists today…'

Many audience members were not cheering so much as freaking out, with rogue cries of fright piercing the excited buzz. Tenten and Lee were among the anxious, vocalizing spectators.

In the clear summer sky, Neji had rightly predicted that Sato wanted him defenseless and tumbling so that he could pierce him again with another Light Wing Chidori. It was a very "fool me once" type of gimmick. Neji shot a Wind Release Air Palm at the paper tag as he came within a dozen or so meters of it, shredded the seal, and had just enough reach to snatch the tip of Haneheika's flapping primary feather. Which— surprise!— feathers are not at all sturdy or easy to hold on to, and the bird's motion flipped him, whizzing through the air uncontrollably, until Neji landed on the broad, muscled wing on the gigantic creature's opposite side. It felt like his heart had plunged into his stomach, and Neji supposed maybe he was not a fan of heights quite like these.

Sato was a fan of heights. And Sato was also slashing at his head again.

Vision fully restored, Neji fought in earnest, a bit petrified of the new venue being a living animal thousands of meters in the air. About the only thing he could do to defend himself against Sato's relentless sabre maneuvers was to knock him a-tumbling with vacuum waves. Neji unwisely used a Rotation once, which snarled the giant owl's feathers and caused it to keen into a near barrel-roll. The young men held on, wind lashing their faces, and charged at each other again when Haneheika leveled off, circling above the stadium.

Neji managed to disarm Sato of a sabre, bowing his head to duck a swing of the second sword, and closed what few chakra points he could before he was kicked in his wound again. Reeling, Neji staggered back and fell through the flimsy overlap of wing feathers. Sato blinked in shock, and then crept over to watch as Neji plummeted down. He sheathed his remaining sabre and quickly followed in a dive.

'Ah.' Neji thought to himself, falling back-first so he could plainly see Sato taking a leap off of Haneheika’s back, ‘Sato would be so generous as to save my life right now, and then he’d ask me to quit...I bet.’ Neji did a double take. Sato had made hand signs for the Chidori again on his way down, narrowing himself like a spear to fall faster. Neji scowled up at him. ‘I was mistaken...’

His Byakugan surveyed the area and determined that Kutaiku, though close by, was still beyond his reach. Not that another one of Sato’s summoned owls would be any safer, but it beat striking the ground and dying in Neji’s book. Rapidly, his brain made some deductions. Sato’s Chidori had transformed again into the large, sharp planes of a Light Style wing. Neji estimated he was falling at maybe fifty-six meters per second…and the stadium's top was less than a kilometer below him by then. Sato was a bullet— plummeting at maybe eighty or ninety meters per second with a devastating technique in hand, sizzling the air around him with heat.

Of all the predicaments he could have gotten into today, this was not one that had popped into Neji’s imagination. Since he only had a few seconds to decide how he was going to try to survive this, he went with his gut instinct.

He flushed chakra out of all his tenketsu, more than double he normally would for a traditional Rotation, and Neji whipped himself into a defensive spin that maybe, just maybe, would protect him from the Yōton Chidori. He forced more chakra into his neat, full spherical defense, and laced it with as much of his Wind Nature as he could consciously tap into. Wind wouldn't protect him from any type of Light based piercing jutsu, but it would drain away the drippings of Lightning style from Sato's attempted attack.

Then the strange variables lined up, and Neji noticed a subtle trade in winds around them as Sato was a mere breath away from his Rotation shield… Chidori heat had spun wind counterclockwise above the stadium, cool air below them was whirling clockwise, and the clashing forces slammed into each other to form a funnel, pulling down wisps of cloud that were drifting by. Dirt, miscellanea, and Sato's owls Haneheika and Kutaiku were thrown into a spin as soon as the accidental tornado formed.

Shikamaru wisely chose to stay sheltered as a, ‘Huh, looks like a tornado.’ Clash of chakra natures rattled the interior of the Sealing Corps barrier. Spectators felt a rushing breeze at most, and safely watched as the wind funnel hurled Haneheika across town, where the giant owl retreated in a puff of smoke. Likewise, Kutaiku unsummoned himself to avoid injury. Neji and Sato, on the other hand, had reduced their speeds but still fell, flung against the arena's walls and upended floor before crashing painfully to the ground. The Yōton Chidori had pittered out before ever contacting its intended target.

The two of them ended up face-first on the dusty floor, about ten meters apart. Since the tornado had dissipated, Shikamaru plopped into the arena to figure out if either of the stubborn idiots had survived. To his surprise, Sato stirred and clambered up after a severe coughing fit. He hacked and wheezed, dusting dirt from his face and person. He shook his head and flecks of rock and debris scattered from his hair. Within that same timeframe, Neji had slowly pushed himself up to his knees. He appeared to be significantly more exhausted. His wounds, Shikamaru also noticed, were bleeding anew.

Shikamaru rubbed the back of his head, considering it, ‘Not that I expected this, but...Sato really got the best of him. I should call it before Neji keels over and bites it...’

Suddenly, Sato was barreled over and off of his feet, and he frantically sprang up again to discern how he’d been ambushed from the rear. His face fell in horror. A clone of Neji had closed in behind him and slapped him with a Gentle Fist assault that suggested it was a truly solid doppelganger, ‘That's a Shadow Clone! Shit— he must have made one when we touched down-!’ Sato dodged and wheeled away from the Kage Bunshin, his last chakra sabre drawn, and supposed Tenten had taught Neji more than just swordsmanship, 'Just quit already, damnitt!'

A tendril of Wind Release chakra sliced his cheek open, and Sato was steered away from the real Neji as he ordered himself and stood. The highly inconvenient Shadow Clone lambasted him with Air Palms. Thankfully, Sato was able to capitalize on the clone's slicing ranged technique, rolled to the side and countered with a Fire Jutsu with the last scraps of his chakra, "Katon: Lighter Thread!" The wire thin ignition flame sparked off of the indiscriminate Wind Release, and it engulfed the Shadow Clone in a blaze before it could protect itself with a Rotation.

Sato charged through the fire, hoping to take advantage of his last few moments of strength, This is over! It's over! He has no chakra, no jutsu left at his disposal— Neji isn't meant to go on the way I am! With a running leap, Sato passed over withering flames and tumbled stones in the arena, spotting Neji who had also scrounged up enough naked ambition to stand and lunge for chakra points. And he drilled them shut— thirty-two tenketsu in Sato's hands, arms, and chest before pain was vibrating the neurons in Neji's brain, pleading with his limbs to stop moving. After all, Sato had jammed his sabre back into the same wound on Neji's right flank, and there was no describing how terrible it felt.

Exhausted, jelly legs buckled, and Neji was unconscious before he landed on the ground on his back, dust softly flitting up and settling on him. Sato had half a coherent moment more as he stumbled and folded up, vision spinning from the attack and chakra exhaustion. He landed frontways again, his arms tucked around his trunk as fatigue and the sting of Jyukken knocked him out of the woken realm.

A lot of expectant rumbling was coming from the watching crowds as Shikamaru did a wellness check on both Sato and Neji, his microphone off— snapping his fingers, calling their names, belittling their foolishness. Shikamaru remained beside Neji, frowning at how a sword was still protruding out of him, and the rate he was bleeding out was worrisome. Shikamaru didn't even have to radio up to Tsunade about what the result was. He announced over loudspeakers, "Both participants are unable to continue. This match is officially a draw!"

Many people were unhappy with that result. Neji had been a popular bet for gamblers…and that money was the house's now.

While a chorus of boos sounded, Hinata was glancing around at the modicum of chaos that ensued. Tenten and Lee had descended into the arena, collecting Neji's scattered jian and scabbard for him, and then anxiously inspected him from over the shoulders of Tournament-assigned medic nin. Shino had gone ahead without her to evaluate Sato's well-being.

She felt rooted to the spot. A horrible, nauseating feeling had clawed its way up from her stomach, and she felt a sheen of sweat on the back of her neck. Her breathing uneven, Hinata fumbled around for a hair tie in her pocket and pulled her hair up. She leaned on the balcony's rail and watched.

"Why did they…do that?" She believed she may have been able to prevent it. Hinata had not found Sato before his match to explain the plan that their Leaf companions had agreed on. But he had purposefully avoided his teammates for the match, and bull-headedly challenged Neji until the two of them were completely out of commission, 'Neji-niiisan knew better than that too…but now…without them...’ The plan was Swiss cheese now. Neji and Sato had shot holes through it, leaving it up to their friends and teammates to figure out what to do about Huo in subsequent rounds.

"Hinata?"
She peeked over her shoulder at Sakura, who had come to stand next her.

"You don't want to go down there?"

"I…" Her voice fluttered with sadness, "I would rather not be out there for all to see…if I…" Hinata wiped a knuckle under her eye to dry a tear, "I just wish they hadn't done that to each other."

"You can say that again." Sakura agreed morosely, "What are we supposed to do now? We all thought Neji should…" She sighed and looked back to Ino, Kiba, and Chouji. How quickly their numbers had dwindled…

"Change of plans." Ino spoke up at length, folding her arms, "Let's all do our best in our matches and not fight that crazy bastard. How does that sound?"

"We can't just let him get away with what he did." Kiba growled.

"We won't be letting him get away with it." Chouji disagreed, "We'll be playing it safe."

"We still-!"

"Are you actually going to lay all of this on Tenten and Lee? Well here's some news for you, Lee hasn't won his match yet. Looks like we have no idea how to call matches, considering how this one went down in flames." Ino reminded them sharply, "With that said, what good is Matsuri going to do us later, hm? Sakura, Chouji, and Hinata— think you can soften Huo up for later matches? I mean really people! Are we being realistic now?"

Kiba and Chouji quieted down. Sakura locked gazes with Ino, "Maybe we could."

"Don't—" Ino grimaced at her.

"Ino, I've been—"

"Yeah, yeah, you have some secret jutsu the Hokage taught you that you didn't waste on me. Is that it?" Ino surmised, "Forget it! There's no point in us risking it, just like Lee's grandpa said! And you know what-?" She continued furiously, "This year is shit. Where is Naruto's team? Well? Do we know? He's off training somewhere with the Hermit Perv, Gaara's ineligible, and where the fuck is Haku? Has anyone actually seen him for the last seventeen months?" She stomped her foot and screeched, "We kind of need them!"

"That's a good point." Kiba yielded.

"Wondering that won't help us now." Chouji patted her arm until Ino inhaled again, lowering her voice as she went on.

"I know it won't help." Ino acknowledged, "But I know I can't be the only one who thinks it's sketchy as hell that at least Haku didn't show up. What, is he like working in a dungeon for Gaara in the Torture and Intel Corps? Is he some spineless daycare worker retired from ninja life, or did he run off and go rogue?"

"Ino, stop." Sakura rested her hands on her hips, annoyed, "Even Gaara hasn't told me exactly what kind of work he has Haku-kun doing. It must be confidential."

"Confidential. My wax appointments are confidential!" Ino ground her teeth, "This is stupid. No one seems to care about all the shady shit that's going on. Never mind we're shorthanded while Sato and Neji, those dumbfucks, thought a double-knockout would be cool! Why is Huo so hell bent on hurting us in the first place? Care to question that asshole's M.O.? Ask the questions, people!"

Chouji was chuckling by then. Tenten and Lee had returned in time to hear Ino's outraged speculating.

"I guess you could call them dumbfucks." Tenten agreed with a shrug.

Lee did not feel that way, "That seems much too harsh a description..."

"I don't know." Tenten held her chin and took the spot on the wall she had occupied earlier, Mo-Ye sheathed and leaned beside her, "Right from the start, Neji was injured severely. I thought he'd probably just avoid the hassle and surrender. Sato could've continued to future rounds, no problem. I don't think Sato would be effective, but we could've let him have his way."

Shino had turned up promptly from the stairwell and evaluated her opinion, "Allowing him to have his way is the same as permitting his indifference to the thoughts and feelings of others. Sato did not consider what we thought at all. We will be affected by this in future rounds." He amended, "Though, Hinata and I did not have the opportunity to speak to him prior to the match."

"Ah, well, Neji explained our plan pretty concisely for him. Sato still didn't care." Tenten sighed, "Even so, I expected a bit more prudence from Neji..."

"And yet his obstinacy still seemed characteristic of him." Lee observed.

She grumbled in the affirmative.

Ino clapped her hands to gather attention again, "Alright...so how about we come up with a new idea?"

"I've got one." Sakura proposed, turning to Hinata and Chouji on her left, "You guys have at it and be fair to one another." She looked to Lee, "Lee-kun...I really do like Matsuri and want to look after her...but we need you to defeat her. Neji kind of fudged our hierarchy for facing Huo."

He nodded enthusiastically, "I am confident I can!"

"Because we have one less person advancing to Round Two, that means no one will be getting a bye. The seeds will be even, meaning..." Sakura glanced at Tenten and smiled worriedly, "You and I will be facing each other at the beginning of Round Two."

The older kunoichi shook her head in amusement, "Here we go again. You did a number on me at the last Exam."

"I still can." Sakura pointed out.

"Yeesh! Stop being scary, Sakura." Tenten yipped.

Sakura went on with her mental-bracketing, "After that, Huo will be seeded against Shino." All eyes fell on Shino and he stood motionless, as if he were still processing that fact. "Huo. Think on it for a while. I know we all want to do our part, but if we're going to take another shot at fighting him, we should at least be sure those that do can escape unharmed or surrender."

He nodded solemnly.

"And the third match of Round Two could be between either Chouji or Hinata against either Lee or Matsuri." Sakura concluded, tapping her lip with her thumb, "That match doesn't seem so bad. Since we're all mature, we can agree that maybe that victory should be given to Lee if he's made it that far."

Many heads nodded in agreement.

"And then semi-final rounds will be terrifying so let's not think that far ahead right now." Ino suggested.

Sakura was going to protest and continue prognosticating, but Shikamaru made the announcement for the next match, asking Chouji and Hinata to report to the arena.

To avoid Sakura's persnickety remarks, Ino offered to walk Chouji down to the ground floor. Chouji thanked her but descended the stairs on his own, as Sakura yanked Ino back and told her to face the music and prepare for what was coming.

Shino snapped out of his thoughts and looked to Hinata beside him. Her shoulders were slouched, and she stared ahead as an onslaught of thoughts and worries distracted her from the moment.

"Don't let what we discussed just now cloud your judgement and abilities. Focus on your match and consider all the rest later." He advised in a soft voice.

Hinata pursed her lips and looked up at him, able to see through his glasses to warm, considerate eyes, "I...I don't want you to fight H—"

"We can debate that after your match."

"Shino-kun." She cleared her throat to speak more clearly, "I will. Sato-kun asked us to fight as hard as possible today, for Tama-chan. I think for now...I can. But later on we should both be very careful."

"I agree." He replied, "Sato will regret not being able to watch your match. It will be artful and won quickly."

"Shino-kun!" Hinata reverted from her fretful state straight back to bashful.

"Go, before you're tardy." Shino gently tugged on her sleeve and she was off. He then became aware of Ino and Sakura regarding him; they'd been watching the exchange.

Ino laughingly grinned at him, "Gosh. You are just so nice."

Shino said nothing.

"I feel like I never knew! How did I not know how nice and smart you are?"

"Maybe because you don't like giving decent people the time of day?" Sakura sniped, "I've known for well over a year now that we can trust Shino with anything."

Off to the side, Kiba agreed that belatedly he had also discovered Shino was cool.

"Hm, that's great Sakura." Ino knocked shoulders with her pinkette friend, "You are an excellent judge of character, aren't you?" Sakura took that jibe much too personally and continued smashing shoulders with Ino, "But really, it's fab that Shino's compassionate and a bonafide strategist...but amazing that he's more handsome than pretty much every guy here."

Kiba and Lee silently wilted at the proclamation, and Tenten barked a reprimand at Ino.

"Like seriously, Shino, watch out. You won't be able to leave this stadium without turning a few
About three and a half minutes into her match, Hinata was feeling a fair amount of guilt. Not only did her highly tuned empathy radar detect that Chouji was not at all interested in hurting her, but he had not bothered with food pills or any sort of advanced jutsu for their match.

Pitting two gentle people against one another made for quite the lackluster fight. Granted, she did sweat a little dodging Chouji’s Multi-Size swipes. When a huge fist or gigantic roundhouse kick came too close for comfort, Hinata whirled in a Rotation to shrug him off.

Though the audience’s mood was tepid, Sakura and Ino were doing a whole lot of extremely loud cheering.

Hinata supposed that the Hokage was already pleased with how much they had grown as shinobi. If this match was going to be brief and border on non-violent frolicking, she may as well turn it into a spotlight performance on her newfound strength. Even though Naruto couldn’t be there to watch her, Hinata imagined her father would delight in seeing her wield the techniques he had trained her in.

So she did. She struck Chouji while he was tumbling full-tilt with his Human Bullet Tank jutsu, firing a precise and chakra-dense vacuum wave she had been practicing for weeks. It blasted her kind-hearted adversary back, and Chouji skidded flatly across the ground before coming to a stop. It knocked the wind out of him.

Hinata apologized under her breath as she battered Chouji with another Air Palm as soon as he stood again. Dazed, Chouji tried righting himself and getting his bearings, easily dispatching a circling Shadow Clone with a super-powered jab to the chin. But as he had settled his eyes on her doppelganger for only a few heartbeats, Hinata had launched herself at Chouji’s right side just beyond his peripheral, and shut what chakra points she could. To halt her, a mammoth Multi-Size hand closed around her. Hinata reacted in a panic, and flushed herself with chakra again for a Rotation.

Chouji soared with a cry, not expecting such a retort, and he hit the arena wall— putting a sizeable dent in it. Hinata brought her hands to her mouth, peeping in surprise. ‘Chouji-kun! Oh why did I do that? I was scared for a moment. I thought he would crush me…’

She could feel her father's eyes on her. This meant a lot to him. He had been waiting to see this for so long. Hinata put aside her anxious feelings about what lay ahead in the Tournament.

She rushed again, lithely ducking under Chouji’s last-ditch swing, and spun cleanly into a Gentle Fist barrage that sealed thirty or so chakra points before Shikamaru’s voice came from behind her.

"Eh-hem. Did you hear me? Time out, Hyuga Princess.” He grumbled. Shikamaru motioned for her to step aside and he silenced his microphone to speak to Chouji.

"I think you can continue, but…” Shikamaru sighed at his best friend, "You weren't taking this match seriously.”

"I don't want to hurt Hinata." Chouji sighed, "But, uh…she kinda blocked all of my chakra just now.”
"Not a good idea to go easy on her, was it?" The proctor sniffed.

"Oh heck no. I'll never do that again."

"You out, Chouji?"

"I'm out."

He switched his microphone back on, "With Akimichi Chouji's forfeiture, the winner of this match is Hyuga Hinata!"

Cordially, Hinata helped Chouji up and exited the arena side-by-side with her fellow mild spirit. She offered to open all of the chakra points she had tampered with, and Chouji gladly took her up on the offer in the first floor treatment room. With no other injuries that needed tending, they were free to return to the Finalist Viewing Area.

On the way up the stairs Chouji mused, "Neji and Sato will probably be in the hospital for a while. Maybe a couple of days…"

Her head drooped at the thought, "Yes, they will."

"Guess we're going to have to catch them up on what happens today at the Tournament." Chouji went on, "That will be the first place I go when this is all over. Just to check on them. Tama-chan too…I want to know if she'll be okay."

"Yes, yes— me too!" Hinata agreed, hurrying up the stairs a bit faster at the thought, "Or if anyone else should get hurt…the hospital is a sensible first stop after this."

Back at the viewing area, the other Leaf finalists had clearly enjoyed Hinata and Chouji's super-courteous match.

"That was like watching the polar opposite of Neji and Sato's smackdown." Kiba described it.

"Thank goodness for that." Sakura breathed easier at the thought.

Chouji pointed out that since he had no expectation of advancing, he would be happy to pick up snacks from the concession stand for anyone who needed something. Lee's match, after all, was one they ought not to miss.

"Oh! Get me that thing that Tenten just finished drinking." Ino pointed out the emptied bubble tea cup in the older kunoichi's hand, "It's got to be good."

"It is. You know Finalists get snacks and drinks for free?" Tenten informed them, "But visitors pay full price, poor things."

At the mentioning of free concession treats, Chouji hurried up the orders from Kiba and Sakura, confirming no one else wanted anything. Then he set off excitedly.

After that the gaggle of kunoichi had reassembled, commending Hinata on a job well done. She blushingly waved off their congratulations.

"Tragic, though…that Naruto wasn't here to check you out in this ensemble." Ino fiddled with the bowed obijime of Hinata's outfit, "It's satisfying to see you win in the Finals, but even better to see you look hot doing it."

Hinata sucked her lips shut in embarrassment, her face tomato-red.
"Come to think of it, Naruto hasn't seen you with long hair yet." Sakura smiled at their shy friend.

"N-No…he hasn't…"

"You have to wear this for him at least once when he gets back." Ino asserted.

She was making small, tinkling I-can't-handle-this-topic-right-now sounds. Nearby, Tenten did nothing to stop it as she tried to suck the last remnants of tapioca out of her cup through a straw.

"Whew! Naruto has got to be taller." Sakura continued teasing Hinata, glancing over at Shino, Lee, and Kiba chatting amongst themselves at the balcony's rail, "Look at all of these knuckleheads, they're almost full grown I'd wager! It happened so fast."

Hinata peeped in agreement.

As a side-note, Ino added, "Yeah, and after watching Gaara hit the town with you he turned out pretty fine didn't he, Forehead?"

Sakura gave her a diabolical, naughty grin that telepathically confirmed to Ino that he was very fine. Tenten quirked an eyebrow at the obvious signal.

"So it's kind of like the law of averages that Naruto will be eye candy for you when he gets home." Ino continued to unnecessarily reassure Hinata, "You know, unless he's developed some serious toad warts or other unfortunate condition."

"He looked healthy—" Hinata immediately caught herself and fell silent.

Sakura and Ino still deciphered the huge, unbelievable blunder. Tenten was working on her cup disinterestedly.

"What did you just say?" Ino transformed into an interrogator. A gorgeous interrogator. Her vocal register dropped and took on a knife-edge.

Sakura also leaned in for the scoop, "We heard that right…didn't we? You've seen him, Hinata?"

"N-N-N-No, no, no, no, no, no-!"

"Yes, yes, yes you did say it!" Ino seized her by the shoulders, "Keeping secrets from the sisterhood, eh? Unacceptable."

"Hinata! But how-?" Sakura was smirking and intrigued.

"I-I-I-!" She was shaking her head defensively.

"Whatever you do, don't make her cry." Tenten warned the youngsters, "I'll shave your heads if you upset Hinata."

"She—" Ino said pointedly of the stuttering girl trapped in her arms, "Has had a secret rendezvous with a man, Tenten! I know you heard it too."

"So? Who here hasn't?" Tenten shrugged it off and tossed her cup in a trash bin across the room.

Ino smirked wickedly at her, "You haven't."

The girls went quiet.
"Say…" Tenten straightened and seemed much taller, looming over the insolent blonde girl, "Remember when I said I'd shave you? I didn't mean with a safety razor. I meant with the biggest, sharpest sword I've got, without suds to save your scalp."

"You don't scare me, frustrated virgin." Ino tittered at her. Sakura and Hinata were mouthing at Ino to cease and desist.

"I will be neither frustrated nor virtuous as soon as this Tournament's brouhaha is over and Neji can, you know, function." Tenten insisted, relenting sullenly and disposing with her threat.

Ino snickered at the word function.

"And I have had secret meetings with him…hmph!" Tenten was muttering indignantly.

"Yeah, and Neji probably didn't lay a finger on you." Ino pressed.

"Ino-chan!" Hinata squealed, "Stop talking about that! He's my big brother! He's very decent."

"Unfortunately." Tenten agreed. Sakura laughed at her.

"Ah that's right, I've digressed." Ino turned back to Hinata, "So did Naruto sneak back home while our backs were turned? Well, Hinata? Confess."

"N-No, of course he didn't." Hinata defended.

"I think I know what happened." Sakura spoke up slowly, as if to minimize the severity of the cross-examination.

Hinata gave the pink haired kunoichi a pleading look.

"Naruto is training on Mount Myoboku right now." Sakura explained, "So Hinata could have used her, uh, special ability to speak with him while he's in range. I'm going out on a limb here, but I guess that could happen."

"What ability?" Ino was flummoxed.

Hinata was not too keen on elaborating, "May we please talk about something else?"

"No."

Sakura interrupted, "Ino, let's give her a break. Her Byakugan can let her overlap her chakra and consciousness with someone else's. There's nothing vulgar or scandalous about it. She's even tried it on me."

Tenten shrugged, "I don't blame her for wanting to reach out to her boyfriend. Do you? It's normal."

"As someone who can also peek into the minds of others for a quick hello," Ino sniffed imperiously, "I am telling you it absolutely can be scandalous."

"Well that's none of your business and you can't make her talk about it here." Tenten seethed with a smile, "I'll take your shit, Miss Princess, but it's time to leave Hinata alone."

"Seems I've hit a couple sore spots on you, Old Lady." Ino smiled back, "Fine. Some other time."

"Hey! Have you noticed how nice your hair is?" Tenten reminded her, "My threats aren't idle, blondie."
Hinata sighed heavily as she listened to the bickering. While the verbal sparring continued, Shikamaru announced the final match of the first round. Tenten held a hand up to Ino's face to shut her down, and then strode across the way to Lee.

"You were having a very animated conversation." He pointed out, thankfully unaware of the subject matter, "You do not need to interrupt it on my behalf—"

"Lee, I am so done with that conversation. Talking to you is always better than girl-drama." Tenten informed him, and they shared a chuckle, "How are you feeling?"

"Capable."

"Don't pull a Neji, okay?"

"What does that mean?"

"It means don't lose to someone because you underestimated your opponent's will to fight."

"I do not often do that." Lee looked upward as he considered it, "Rest assured I shall be as judicious as possible!"

"Just like Grandpa said."

"Just as he said."

And also, Tenten switched to Hanwen, You are like family to me. Please don't get hurt. I really need you today.

I know. He was smiling.

He meant well! Things still surprise him now and then.

Tenten shook her head, exhaling roughly, I'm still scared. I don't want anyone to see me getting nervous or unsure. I don't want to fight Sakura…

It is alright to feel that way. Lee consoled her, Discuss it with Sakura. She seemed to indicate she may wish to advance to future rounds…and maybe it is safer if you do not?

I have no idea, anymore.

Lee hugged her tightly, I promise I will be back soon.

Kiba snarked at them, "Hey, what are you two talkin' about over there? No fair that you just up and switch languages."

Shino gave him a rebuttal, "The language of friendship should need no explanation."

"Yo! Stop being wise and crap, alright?" Kiba grumbled back at him.

Lee set out down the stairwell and Tenten turned in a small circle, unnerved by the absence of her team. She then shuffled back to the flock of kunoichi. The girls had settled down.

Hinata sidled in beside Tenten at the rail, and Ino and Sakura took the space between them and the remaining men. Chouji had the good timing to return with snacks prior to the match.
"Do not worry, Onee-san." Hinata spoke quietly to Tenten, "Lee-kun will be fine."

"I know he will be. It's me who's the problem." Tenten admitted.

"I can feel how worried you are." Hinata noted, "Is something the matter, Onee-san?"

"I..." She trailed off and lowered her voice, "It's a hunch, but...Huo could be here because I have a weapon passed down from our common ancestors. He wants it."

"C-Common ancestors-?" Hinata sputtered.

"Yeah. I don't really want to broadcast the relation. He's horrible. I don't think I can take Huo in a fight...but seeing my friends face him feels worse."

Discreetly, Hinata clutched at Tenten's sleeve as they said nothing more and peered down into the arena. Lee and Matsuri were squaring off as Shikamaru fiddled around with his two-way radio.

It was easy to tell by the look on Matsuri's face that she was fully prepared to use every last ounce of her strength to make her teacher proud. Lee had glanced up at Gaara in the VIP booth, wondering what his feelings about the match were. He turned a fraction to spot Huo on the Foreign Finalist balcony. Huo had cleaned up and preened himself in the time since his match. He was staring down at Lee smugly.

Many thoughts raced through Lee's head: that perhaps Huo suspected how his Leaf opposition was planning to deal with him. That Matsuri was bolder than before, calm, and maybe more eager to please her sensei than Lee himself was (and few surpassed his level of enthusiasm.) Lee also thought about Tenten, and how her tough exterior was beginning to crack as the Tournament wore on, even more so now that Neji was retired to a hospital room to recover.

A moment of tranquility washed over him.

'I am glad that Grandpa came to speak to us. I have never introduced him to Gai-sensei before...and though Grandpa did not have many encouraging things to say...I believe they understood one another.' Lee considered. It felt like the two halves of himself finally met. Culture and tradition had encountered his determination and Nindo, face to face, old and young. He felt lighter. He felt vastly more aware.

Shikamaru was speaking, "Are you both ready?"

Lee took his time-tested stance, nodding as he raised a hand and stared Matsuri right in the eyes. The girl unflinchingly looked back at him, her own hands hovering readily at her hips.

"Begin!"

As expected, Matsuri snapped a metal-chain jouhyou off of her belt, and lashed it out at Lee as she flipped sideways. Lee made certain to keep his eye on the weapon's tooth instead of the distracting, red fabric flag, as Tenten had advised him. He ducked and weaved away from the spinning offense.

Matsuri was stunningly quick, flexing and casting her rope-dart off of her elbow and neck, redirecting it with a kick and twist of her foot. The dart nearly bashed Lee's face four times in only a matter of seconds. He remembered his grandfather talking about the popularity of soft weapons in their homeland, and warriors in the Middle Kingdom who specialized in rope-darts and chain-whips. Matsuri's talent was not learned from a master. She had endeavored on her own to learn the weapon. 'She is like me in this respect! Our hard work is what got us this far!'
When he charged, Matsuri hooked her rope-dart around her thigh and rotated her hips, throwing her free hand forward. A fabric sash whirled out of her tunic’s sleeve, and Matsuri snared Lee’s wrist and pulled back, tightening a knot closed. She would have liked to tug him within range of the return arc of her plummeting jouhyou, but Lee was very, very strong. He somersaulted in the dust to avoid her attacks, pulling with all of his might, and Matsuri was hurled off of her feet. "Wuuh!" Her rope-dart pattered and flattened out on the ground while she was dragged.

Before Lee could start reeling her in by her own cloth whip, Matsuri tugged the knot free and drew it back, looping it around her arm for safekeeping. "Hah!" She spun with a flying kick that shot her jouhyou like a rocket, and clipped Lee as he bounced up. He winced as a line of blood ran down his from his ear. It was a superficial hit, but it proved her aim was impeccable.

Lee stood straight and exhaled. ‘Gaara-kun’s student is remarkable! She has not been in training for very long.’ He reached into the utility pouch on his belt and retrieved his nunchaku. Wasting no time, he went through the minimal, swerving motions his grandfather had taught him, and batted the tooth of Matsuri’s jouhyou away like pesky fly. She snapped and spun her rope-dart furiously, faster and faster, but Lee hardly needed to exert himself to anticipate the attacks.

He edged in closer, carefully, aware that Matsuri was winding up her chain to match him as the distance between them shrunk. Seeing an opening as she cast her rope-dart out to its full length, Lee dashed in, turned to get a full-momentum swing of his nunchaku to crash against her shoulder…but Matsuri had timed her leap perfectly. She vaulted over Lee like a gymnast and caught the tooth of her jouhyou in her free hand, pulling back on her weapon’s chain as it snagged Lee’s nunchaku on the way up and ripped it from his grasp. Matsuri tumbled to the ground and rolled backwards, hopping to her feet like a desert hare—she gripped her rope-dart in her left hand and Lee’s weapon her right hand. She smiled and began spinning the nunchaku.

Lee’s jaw dropped. ‘She…she’s going to use it against me!’ Then he sobered up and grinned. She had made that opening for the sole purpose of luring him in closer to be disarmed. What a crafty amateur.

Willing himself to relax, Lee let himself melt like butter, like his grandfather always demanded. He sunk into a low Wushu stance, and when Matsuri’s jouhyou lashed out at him Lee dipped backwards and spread himself completely flat on the ground. His noodling acrobatics allowed him to close the distance, avoiding her long-distance snaps with the rope-dart…then folding and flopping away from his own cracking, twirling nunchaku. When Lee kicked her ankle, she toppled with a shriek. There was a brief, crazy looking close-quarters struggle in the dirt before Lee was clocked in the chin by his own nunchaku, and Matsuri had taken an indirect Zui Chuan punch to the stomach that made her see stars. She leapt up only to fall over again, gasping.

Several times in the past, Lee had been whacked in the head by nunchaku while practicing with them. Because he was somewhat acclimated to the feeling, he was not dizzied by the bonk on his jaw as much as he could’ve been. While Matsuri was keening and trying to regain her balance, a zipping Leaf Hurricane kick knocked his nunchaku free of her hand, and he back-flipped to catch it.

"Woo hoo!" He cheered.

Lee charged again with his weapon in a full-tilt swing. Matsuri sacrificed her jouhyou by hurling it at him like a chain-bola, and the inertia of it pulled away his nunchaku again as both weapons entangled uselessly on the ground. Improvising mid-run, Lee skidded into an upward kick in preparation of Shadow of the Dancing Leaf, but her cloth whip was just as fast. He yelped as it wrapped round and round him, suspecting it was the work of some kind of Ninjutsu. ‘Ah, yes…definitely Ninjutsu.’ He had been gift-wrapped. Mummified. From his toes to his neck, Lee was straightjacketed in the fabric whip she had parted with.
"You are way too fast…and…" Matsuri lurched to hold her stomach again, "You didn't even wind up for that punch!"

"There was no need to." Lee wobbled and then cried out as he fell backwards, landing supine on the arena floor, completely constricted, "We have both been disarmed. You fight incredibly well, Matsuri-san!"

"I have more weapons where that came from—" The smirk dropped off of her face as she watched Lee make a surprisingly fast inch-worm escape, "H-Hey! What're you-? Get back here!" Matsuri ran after him as the audience roared in laughter, watching as Lee scooted and rolled as fast as he could to escape his opponent.

Matsuri was irked, "You can't get out of those bindings! I applied a Sealing Jutsu to it! If you want me to let you go you'll have to surrender-!"

"—I have never given up…and I-!" Lee struggled and puffed to worm-hop away from her outstretched hands, "I will not surrender to-daaaaaaaay…!" He accidentally fell down into an excavated trap hole from Shino and Kiba's match.

Stupefied, Matsuri peered down into the dark pit and then shook her head in exasperation. She backtracked to go disentangle her rope-dart from Lee's nunchaku. He would be a sitting duck by the time her weapon was free.

Meanwhile, underground…Lee was ass-up in the tilled soil beneath the stadium that smelled vaguely of dog and crisped insects. With a rocking start, he righted himself and took a deep breath.

"Troubling." He acknowledged his predicament.

So Matsuri claimed that the cloth-prison he was wrapped up in could not be escaped, but Lee was always about the good old college try. Flat on his stomach, he bent as far as he could, grinding his legs together like a stridulating grasshopper. To his great shock, the concealed blade in the heel of his shoe (Thank you Tenten!) rather easily cut through the fabric near his feet. With strength, he tore the ripped perforation up further, thrashing and squirming. Lee contorted himself, kicking his shoe off and cautiously lifting it in his mouth, directing the hidden blade carefully. He nicked himself trivially, but was freed with only a few minutes of cutting.

'Had I known that it was possible to break out of this cloth, I may have pulled it apart with strength from the Inner Gates.' That was neither here nor there now, he supposed. Lee pulled his shoe back on and glanced over the shredded fabric. He noticed that Matsuri had applied some type of Sealing technique to the cloth whip…but some characters were written incorrectly, 'Ooohhh…It is not easy to be new at something!'

Lee snapped his head around when debris and stones tumbled down into the pit, foretelling of Matsuri's next potential attack. After glancing around and seeing no other exit, Lee opened Gates to borrow one of Tama's staple techniques.

Above ground, Matsuri felt a rumble and wisely decided to step away from the leftover insect hole.

"Blooming Lotus!" Lee crashed up through shattering of rock and earth nearly whomped the kunoichi before she scurried away.

"How did you-?" Matsuri was distressed to see Lee had escaped her snare.

He had become unbelievably fast— too fast for her to keep up. Lee had caught the flag of her jouhyou, and threw himself down on the chain in a whirling somersault. He pulled the weapon away from her and flung it aside. He rolled up to his feet again and dashed at the unarmed kunoichi. All she could do as he kicked her was perform hand seals frantically.

In position for Shadow of the Dancing Leaf, Lee was truly surprised to see the arm-wrappings he meant to secure her with shred like tissue paper. A swirling gust of wind had passed through her lips, "Futon: Gale Breath!"

They crashed back down to the ground while the audience cheered rowdily. In desperation, Matsuri bit her thumb and rushed through hand seals again. Lee stood and brushed himself off, wide-eyed at the sight of her summoning of two cottage-sized scorpions.

"I'm not going to let you get the best of me!" Matsuri trumpeted, patting the armored body of the insect closest to her, "The desert has tested me! Gaara-sensei has tested me! He trusted me with the contract of our friends in the dunes."

Lee was impressed, "Amazing!"

Matsuri balked, still confounded by compliments coming from her opponent, "Er, uh, yeah! It is!" She pointed her big, dangerous friends at Lee, "Osba! Ireki! Sting 'em!"

Lee screeched in fright because he had not expected them to be upon him in an instant, jamming their hooked tails down with battering-ram force. In the background he could see Matsuri was summoning her meteor hammer from a tool scroll. Lee tangoed with the desert giants between their spindly legs and pincers, marveling at how his punches hardly swayed them at all. Yet he was most surprised when Osba, the scorpion with a reddish tint to his dark shell, used Sand Style Ninjutsu. Though not nearly as precise as Gaara, it was a frightening skill.

Ireki was exhaling Wind Style jutsu, trying to wedge Lee in between desert calamities and keep him away from Matsuri. Lee's hair was terrifically tousled by the attacks, stuck up in a faux-hawk shape. He sprang and flipped onto Osba's back, racing up the creature's tail, and pulled down just above the stinger's notch. Lee's Gate Strength hurled the scorpion onto his companion, Ireki, and the two had been tilted belly-side up with their legs scuttling.

Mostly out of curiosity, Lee whacked the joints of the insects with Wushu boxing as his grandfather might have suggested. And what a wonder— the attacks had frozen the bewildered insects in their vulnerable positions. Lee dusted his hands and stepped back. Then, the metal ball of Matsuri's meteor hammer caught him while he was turned away.

The crushing momentum of the attack flung Lee clean across the stadium's arena and into a wall with a crack. Eyes watering, Lee peeled himself out of the stone and plaster and collapsed to the ground. By all accounts, no weapon wielded by Matsuri's toothpick arms could have hurt so bad or hit so hard. As Lee was an educated, discerning soul, he gathered that she had propelled her meteor hammer with her Wind Ninjutsu. He wasn't sure, but the force felt like maybe a lower vertebrae in his back was, well— something didn't feel right back there.

It took a lot of willpower and even a manly tear rolling down his cheek for Lee to evade the next, bursting swing of the meteor hammer. The ball smashed into the ground and gouged up a trench. Matsuri pulled back on her weapon as Lee opened a third Inner Gate. He roughly caught the chain and ran around the girl, lightning quick, and before Matsuri could begin to wriggle and shrug her way out of confinement, Lee bounded up to give her a mighty toss, "Front Lotus!"

Things did not normally end this… softly, Lee noted. A hair's breadth above the ground, a bed of sand had halted the nosedive before its painful conclusion. Matsuri was safely cocooned and uninjured, and Lee sensibly tottered away to oxygenate and deal with the pain ringing in his back.
Shikamaru, who was then present in the arena, was giving an "all is well" kind of wave to Gaara in the VIP booth.

The Kazekage settled down in his seat and lowered his hand. His student was gently plopped to the ground. Matsuri sat cross legged in the dust with a rattled look on her face. She could not tell what was worse— that her neck may have been snapped by a super-fast Front Lotus, or that her sensei had to step in and save her, thus ending the match. As if taking a cue from Gaara, Osba and Ireki retreated in puffs of smoke.

"Sorry Matsuri, but the Kazekage's interference means that I can't acknowledge you as the winner." Shikamaru offered her an apology.

Wilted, she looked down at the ground and nodded woodenly.

"The winner of this match is Rock Lee!"

The crowd was pleased. Lee needed to be spotted by a medic-nin as he was escorted out of the arena towards the treatment room. Inner Gates recoil and his back injury were making it difficult to walk.

When Matsuri rose to her feet, Shikamaru gave her a consoling pat on the shoulder.

"You are savage, kid." He smiled lopsidedly at her, "Be proud. Lee is strong…and you beat the hell out of him."

"Thank you, proctor."

With his microphone switched off, Shikamaru added, "Oh…and stay away from Huo for a while. Maybe find a comfortable seat in the stands or on another balcony? I don't know if it's safe for you to be around him."

"Yes sir." She nodded and then set off.

Thankfully, her lip did not start quivering until she was indoors. Matsuri scurried into the ladies restroom and shut herself in a stall, waiting as the few women occupying the room finished washing their hands. The door creaked shut after they exited…then she bawled in frustration.

That tiny shred of hope she had allowed herself to hold onto— that foolish fantasy that she might defeat her opponent with the skills she had painstakingly perfected… She was still in last place. She always would be. When she had been a young child, Matsuri had barely scored high enough on the entrance Exam to earn a place at Suna's Ninja Academy. While in school, she was the shy underachiever with no special talent. And now, as she may have correctly predicted, she was still the runt of her Genin peers.

A few minutes passed and Matsuri managed to reduce her blubbering sniffles to quiet whimpers, reflecting on what had happened in her match. 'I think he escaped my cloth whip…because my Sealing Jutsu may not have been applied correctly.' Matsuri let out a shaky sigh, 'I knew that Lee could not use Ninjutsu or Genjutsu, so I thought for sure that would work…' She scoffed at her blunder. It might have worked if she had practiced more to achieve Sealing Competency, as Maki had offered to tutor her in Hidden Sand. Matsuri guessed her allotment of time to Meteor Hammer training two months ago detracted from Sealing lessons she could have paid more attention to.

She froze and went silent as the bathroom door swung open with a clatter. A person rushed into a toilet stall several doors down from her. Seated on the edge of a commode, Matsuri held her forehead in her hands and continued stewing in her thoughts.
I just wanted to catch up. I didn't want to be the best. I don't even need to be as cool or as pretty as the other kunoichi here today.' She leveled with herself, 'I just wanted one victory here. To prove to myself that I worked hard enough...that I won't slack off ever again. I won't chase after a boy again. I won't let anyone make me into a punchline again! Gaara-sensei...and Temari and Kankuro...I don't want them to see me cry anymore.'

Matsuri folded double and resumed weeping, as if on reflex. She could learn new tricks, new jutsu, new forms…but there was no quitting crying. It was as if her emotional thermostat would always get tripped while other people could tranquilly go about their business. Oh, how she envied them. If she could not eradicate the "mousy" part of herself that cried and felt things strongly, Matsuri reasoned she could always hide until she was dry-eyed again.

Except when she couldn't…

The toilet down the row flushed and the other occupant went about washing her hands afterward. Before Matsuri could quiet down enough to go unnoticed, a voice called out, "Matsuri?"

She held back a gasp and lifted her feet up…as if that was going to conceal her in a locked stall.

The voice was familiar, "Matsuri! I saw your match! It was— wow! It was crazy! You did great. I came down here with Tenten when she said she was going to check on Lee. Are you okay?"

Matsuri jumped a little when knuckles rapped on the stall door.

"It's me, Sakura. Matsuri? Are you alright?"

"Sakura-chan..." Her voice was small, "I just need a few minutes."

"You've already been in there for a while…"

A lame excuse, "I had to…uh…my stomach is bothering me."

"Really?" Sakura's voice lilted with skepticism, "Probably not as much as my stomach is acting up. I've been running to the bathroom all morning."

"When does…your match start?"

"There's a twenty minute intermission before the next round. Come out and talk to me!"

Matsuri said nothing. If she refrained from talking and pretended to actually be using the toilet, instead of sulking…

"Matsuri—" Sakura was tapping her foot impatiently on the tile floor.

No. Why was confrontation the only answer for these Leaf shinobi? Matsuri considered that even Gaara-sensei would go off on his own to decompress whenever he was upset. He did not always need to communicate with others for therapeutic effects. 'Why must there always be discourse-?'

Sakura pulled the door off its hinges. She was frowning.

Wide-eyed, Matsuri braced herself on the walls of the stall before she fell off the toilet in surprise. Sakura pulled her up and out of the booth by her wrist, and Matsuri relaxed as the older kunoichi hugged her. Matsuri tucked her head down and squeezed back gratefully.

"You're not hurt." Sakura pointed out, "But you're shaking…"
"I'm just...I'm j-just frustrated!" Matsuri squeaked, crying into the older girl's shoulder, "I wanted to be as good as the rest of you."

Sakura laughed, "You are! Don't be silly. You think I could beat Lee one-on-one? It's not easy for anyone to do!"

"But he can't use—"

"Matsuri, Lee has been a ninja for a year and a half longer than my graduating class." She added wisely, "You have only been a ninja for thirteen months. And you are very good."

Matsuri sniffled, "Thank you."

Sakura patted her back comfortingly, "To have learned as much as you have in so little time...that is the achievement that Gaara is proud of. Not watching you win matches in this stupid Tournament. You know that, don't you?"

"I do..."

"Good! Hey, those scorpions are awesome. I've never seen Gaara summon them!"

"He only needs their help for construction work or deliveries around the village."

"Huh." Sakura took a step back and regarded the younger girl, "Feeling better?"

Matsuri nodded and followed Sakura to the row of sinks. She patted her face with cold water at a tap until she looked presentable again.

"Go have a snack!" Sakura recommended, "I'm going to try to keep a clear head until my match. If you need me, come find me or anyone else at the Leaf lookout, alright?"

"I will, Sakura-chan." Her smile was small, "Thank you."

After parting, Matsuri ventured out of the concourse and past the checkpoint to sniff around concession stands. It was difficult to make up her mind. Relax with a basket of fried treats or a container full of ice cream goodness? 'Maybe I should pick a small size of each...' She stepped into a line of people intending to order red bean ice cream. Matsuri glanced around in boredom until her eyes trolled across a familiar person. She sucked wind quietly when she spotted Menma navigating through the wide lobby of the cafeteria.

Her head snapped forward again. 'Maybe he won't see me. Don't look at him! What's he doing here? Did Tide Village ninja buy tickets to watch this Tournament too?'

Curiously, Matsuri slowly peeked over her shoulder again to see him poking around the area, sometimes stopping to read over snack menus. Eventually, he stopped at a yakitori stand. She let out a breath of relief as he faced the opposite direction. Matsuri permitted herself to give Menma the up-and-down while he was preoccupied. His flaxen hair was tied back into a short ponytail, and his dark clothing seemed new, contrasting the Tide Village-issued Jounin vest that was pale sea blue, its bottom fading into a darker gray hue. A clay flute and some other type of wind instrument were fastened to his belt. She pursed her lips. Ah.

'He still looked good.'

'Those clothes make him look a bit taller, but I can tell he hasn't grown much.' She kept glancing back at him, 'I wonder if he and Inari still spend a lot of time together? I'm sure Tazuna-san is very proud of them.' Matsuri sighed wistfully, 'Maybe I shouldn't have...stopped talking to my friends?'
She missed them. They had been the only people she had ever met who had not tried to gauge her value based on who her sensei was.

"Are you ready to order, Miss?"

Matsuri snapped out of it. She asked for a small cup of ice cream and dismissed the fried dough idea. She could emotionally eat later while out of the public eye.

She thanked the counter worker for the free ice cream and started out on her return to the concourse. Then, like the true idiot she was, Matsuri looked back one final time.

Menma definitely made eye contact with her from the distant yakitori vendor. His whole face lit up. It was an expression that bordered on happy, but was mostly panicked. Panicked that she would flee like she did last time. He bumped shoulders with another customer in line who told him to watch it. Menma apologized and then left the queue.

Matsuri gulped and kept walking. 'Oh no. Oh no, no, no...I don't...I can't do it again!' Her walking turned into swift scurrying. She held onto her spoon and treat. 'Maybe he won't—'

"Matsuri!" Menma called out to her over the din of the concession lobby.

Strike two. She glanced back and saw him running.

"Eeeeh!" Spooked, Matsuri made a break for it. They dodged human bodies crossing their paths, racing towards the spacious, sunlit concourse near the arena's entrance.

"Matsuri! Please let me just-!" She could hear him pursuing, "Inari and I came to find you! Tazunsan is sitting with your—" His shouting cut off when he crashed into someone, but he jumped up and continued the chase, "With your sensei!"

Matsuri vaulted over the turnstiles and was not questioned by the attending guards. As she darted down the vacant hallway, she heard the guards stop Menma, who was not yet dissuaded. She only stopped at the stairwell's archway for a moment to glimpse him again. Menma was trying to reason with the guards: he was a Jounin from the Tide Village, no, he admitted, he did not have Tournament credentials to pass, but please, please, he bargained. He only needed a minute to talk to Matsuri of the Sand Village.

The guards complained they already had the Copy Ninja dupe them today, and no other Jounin was going to pull a fast one on them.

Heart pounding, Matsuri ran up the stairs. She sprinted up past the second floor and the third floor before she slowed down and realized her ice cream was melting. She wolfed it down and fought brain freeze as she stepped out onto the fourth level of the stadium. Even if Menma played a song to get past the guards, which she feared he would, she would lay low until he gave up his search.

Matsuri marched down the corridor looking for access points to duck into, to find some wayward seat where she could eat her snack in peace...

'No more boys. No more distractions!' She puffed her cheeks and finally picked a doorway, dashing through it, and then trotted up a few steps to a long row of empty seating, 'He'll only make me cry again! I'm trying to change that part of myself! Menma would only mess up my progress...'

At the end of the row, Matsuri dropped into a seat and exhaled loudly. There. And good! A Leaf ANBU agent was seated in the row below her feet, less than a meter between them...and if a Tide ninja came by to harass her she could ask the Black Ops nin for help! And beside the masked ninja was a plain-clothes Leaf ninja in black, doodling in a sketchbook. He noticed her curious staring and smiled strangely at her.

"Hello loser of the last match!" He greeted.

Matsuri's mouth dropped open.

The ANBU agent smacked his companion in the side of the head. "See? That is rude, Sai. We've been over this. Point out positive features first in the people you meet!" He turned around in a decorated cat mask to apologize, "Sorry, Matsuri-san. Sai is still learning how to interact with society after his tenure in Root. Your match really was impressive!"

"It was." Sai agreed, "Superbrows is my friend. His superlative nimbleness is always interesting to see."

The ANBU nudged Sai's ribs, "Sai…" He whispered, "Compliment her. She is the one sitting here with us."

"You wield rope hammers." Sai said to Matsuri.

She frowned and nodded. Great. She escaped Menma only to locate the lonely, unoccupied balcony with two weirdo ninja seated on it.

"You are a student of the Kazekage, is that right?" The ANBU nin asked, trying to salvage the first impression, "I can see why he chose you as his pupil! At the last exam I supervised, Gaara-sama was only a Genin. Now he is a village leader. You are both the types to grow and learn fast."

"Thank you, ANBU-san. But Gaara-sensei did not pick me because I was good at something." Matsuri smiled wearily, "He picked me because I was dead last."

Sai gave her a yeah-right look and then shrugged. He could not detect Matsuri's nuanced implication that Tenzo had.

"I see." The Black Ops ninja nodded, "He saw underneath the underneath, when he met you."

Matsuri nodded, feeling a bit better.

"You are timid and you don't like speaking to us." Sai observed shamelessly, "Did you not want to have company on this level? As a competitor, you can sit wherever you want to in the stadium."

"I…did want to be alone." Matsuri admitted, "But this is fine!"

Tenzo tried to engage in relevant conversation again but Sai interrupted him, "I will call you Mouse."

Matsuri stared at him and then began to giggle. Tenzo was absolutely astounded that Sai had achieved such a reaction.

The kunoichi explained, "My sensei calls me that! His whole family calls me their Mouse!"

"You look like one." Sai deadpanned. Tenzo wapped him a second time.

"I know." She was chuckling and scooping the last of her ice cream from its container, "But I use that to my advantage a lot. No one expects me to bash their brains out when I look like this!"

"That is a perfect strategy." Sai agreed.
Tenzo sighed.

Sai then decided, "That makes you a Hammer Mouse."

"I am! I am the Hammer Mouse!"

Shortly after that, Tenten and Sakura walked slowly out into the arena side-by-side, muttering to one another as the crowd got revved up again.

"You quit."

"No, you quit."

"Why don't we both forfeit?" Sakura suggested sunnily.

"For the last time no."

"Tenten," Sakura hissed, "Hinata told me!"

"Told you what?" She was picking dirt out from beneath her nails.

"She told me that you and Huo are from the same clan."

"Oh. That." Tenten remembered.

"So it isn't a good idea for you to fight him, since he specifically has a score to settle with you." Sakura reasoned.

"That is exactly why I should fight him and no one else should." Tenten countered.

"You are a conflict of interest here!" Sakura got in Tenten's face, and the two stopped off-center in the arena to debate it, "I already told you I can handle it. I can finish what Tama started. Tsunade-shishou has made me pretty much indestructible."

"As much as I want to believe that, I'm too afraid to ask you to test that claim out." The older girl folded her arms, "Sakura, it's better if I face him myself. I don't want my friends to stand in the way of a maniac like him— that's exactly what he wants. He wants to rip my heart out by making me watch bad things happen to you."

"Oh, psh! How do you think we feel watching you go up against the maniac? Either way it sucks."

"Well...yeah."

"I can't condone you going ahead to fight him, Tenten. It'd be like pouring gasoline on a bonfire. Maybe even in the literal sense..." Sakura stated with finality, "So won't you please just listen to me, as your friend? And also as someone who can rip limbs off of people?"

"Hmmm." Tenten considered, "I am completely undecided about it."

"Alright. Want to decide it with a round of Janken?"

"Might as well."

Shikamaru had walked over to them with his microphone off, and watched as the girls threw rock, paper, scissors hands at each other. His lip twitched as he waited for them to wrap it up. Shikamaru guessed their match negotiations had failed. Abruptly, Tenten roared in frustration and flapped her arms in a rage after Sakura had beaten her at the game.

Sakura grinned, "Good! It's settled."

"No." Tenten changed her mind, "I won't let you do it. I don't want anyone else to get thrown around by Huo."

"Tenten, you lost fair and square!"

"I am not forfeiting. You're just going to have to beat me." The stubborn kunoichi announced, "And I will do what I have to so that you don't continue on."

"You really have no faith in me, do you?" Sakura growled, "We won't always be your juniors, you know. Ino and Hinata and I...we are just as strong as you now. You're going to have to accept that!"

"Well then," Shikamaru interrupted, "You two fighting or what? It looked like you—" They started barking at him to begin the match and save the fool who got her ass beat. From Shikamaru's point of view, that could mean either one of them...

With his voice live on loudspeakers, Shikamaru confirmed they were ready and then retreated, "Begin!"

Within a span of approximately twenty seconds, Tenten determined that Sakura was perhaps the most evasive opponent she had ever hurled weapons at, barring Neji. 'Although, Neji doesn't always dodge, sometimes he just deflects them with a Rotation...' Indeed, Sakura could bend, dart, roll, and hop better than anyone thanks to Tsunade's soul-smashing volleyball pitches. Medic-nin had to be good at avoiding harm, and boy howdy did Sakura know how to avoid it. 'How did Ino hit her earlier? She could only have done it by predicting Sakura's movements!' And with that, Tenten gave a point of credit to Ino as she thought about it, somersaulting backwards with a hand seal.

Tenten sent a Shadow Clone to assist with directing Sakura into a trick-shot maneuver, but she felt the fuzzy-tongued sensation of Genjutsu settling on her. 'Aw great...' She fought off the illusion with a pin-prick of chakra control and a release seal, and then suddenly stopped. Tenten looked down and noted her complete nudity. 'But-! If I broke out of-! How did she-? Oh my god-!'

Her Shadow Clone patted her shoulder and freed her from the multi-layered Genjutsu. Then, the clone tossed Tenten to the side before Sakura's mega-ton punch came down on top of her.

"Well that was a low blow..." Tenten muttered and dusted herself off. For a second there, she really thought Sakura had stripped her down for the whole stadium to see.

To conserve weaponry against the slippery, pink-haired wonder, Tenten changed gears and coordinated with her Shadow Clone as they drew their respective swords. Getting in close to Sakura was going to be a real bother, but it was the only way to inflict damage. A stab here, a cut there, the occasional parry from Sakura's kunai—Sakura was seemingly immune to jian wounds, or calculated that the half-hearted attacks were not worth putting more space between her and Tenten. It was very clear in that moment, when an opening appeared as Sakura reared back for another punch...Tenten hesitated to use Dance of the Crescent Moon.

Diving and rolling away from the punch's crater, Tenten supposed Sakura was aware of her reluctance. 'I don't want to hurt her even if she's driving me nuts!' Sakura was counting on that.

Tenten yelped when a concealed Earth Clone pulled down on her ankles, burying her up to her neck in dirt with the Headhunter Jutsu. It was a favorite of Kakashi's team these days, Tenten gathered.
Sakura's punch came down on the crown of the girl's head, but only destroyed a captured Shadow Clone. Dust furling up in a cloud, Sakura dusted her hands and leaped out of the ditch. She glanced left and right, 'Where is she? I was so sure that was the real Tenten…but she had the chance to substitute herself…' The sound of the snapping, extending paper of tool summoning scrolls caught Sakura's attention. She tilted her chin up to look.

Above, Tenten and three Shadow Clones had leapt high in unison for a combination attack. Their spinner scrolls stretched and extended while airborne, sharing their sealed repertoires with each other for two-handed throwing, "Heaven's Dragon Drop!" With Sakura squarely in their sights, a hurricane of weaponry shot down at four times the normal speed, sticking the girl like a pin cushion.

The audience was divided by cheers and appalled gasps. When tool scroll smoke and dust dispersed, Tenten and her clones landed and got an eyeful of something that was not Sakura.

A slug about the height of a human adult sat placidly in the arena. Knives, sickles, razors, shuriken, and all manner of projectiles had stuck the poor creature on every bit of surface area its body possessed. Gradually, the weapons were pushed out of the slug's doughy flesh and pattered to the ground. A moment later, the slug expelled Sakura from its body gently. She and her slug summon were completely unharmed.

Tenten chewed the inside of her mouth, and gave a hand signal to her clones. 'Shit! Sakura can summon Tsunade-sama's slug!' Her Shadow Clones provided covering fire with the last bit of her scroll arsenal as Tenten charged with Hok raised, 'Whenever I use ranged attacks Sakura gains the advantage, so I have to get in close to win!'

Sakura handily ducked under the incoming projectiles. Leaping cleanly over Katsuyu, Tenten whirled like a demon and slashed downward to catch Sakura. They skidded as Sakura caught the sword in her hand, but Tenten pulled back on the jian and sliced the webbing between Sakura's thumb and index finger, 'You can't disarm me!' Beside them, Katsuyu had sprayed approaching Shadow Clones with an acid that immediately dissolved them.

"Sakura-chan!" The slug warned the girl to move aside, and Sakura rolled as Katsuyu squirted another stream of acid at the genuine Tenten, forcing her back.

With a chain of hand signs complete, Sakura exhaled a mighty orb of flames, "Katon: Grand Fireball Jutsu!"

Instead of running, Tenten rounded about and funneled chakra through her jian, running full-tilt as she cut through the fireball with her Fire Nature. Sakura balked as Tenten closed in, low to the ground in a Wushu lunge, and stabbed her dead-center in the stomach. Flecks of blood dotted their faces. Tenten pulled Hok back quick as wind, and retreated as Katsuyu chased her off with acid. Sakura toppled to the ground, her face contorted with shock and pain, 'I didn't think she'd make up her mind to finally…do that to me…'

"Sakura-chan, allow me." Katsuyu broke down into a mass of smaller slugs, a portion of which filed off to attack Tenten and the other group wiggled up Sakura's legs and amassed on her abdomen, rapidly healing up her wound. Sakura kept her eyes on Tenten and held still, watching for an opportunity to catch her off guard.

Meanwhile, Tenten reached into her utility pouch and tossed her last grenade, dropping it behind her to detonate on the chasing swarm of tiny Katsuyus. Unfortunately, the explosion only dissipated a few slugs while the survivors divided to avoid harm and continued pursuing their target. As they approached the area where Lee and Matsuri's match had gouged up several sections of ground, Tenten made a Shadow Clone and sacrificed it to the swarm of slugs to slow them down. 'Okay, I got it! Just separate the slugs from Sakura and hit Sakura hard enough so that Shikamaru calls it before she can heal herself! I'll need some clones to distract them, and my chakra is starting to—'

Near the insect trap hole Lee had fallen into earlier, two of Sakura's Earth Clones popped up to ambush Tenten. With a guttural cry, Tenten twisted into a crouch and extended Hok, hacking a leg off of one of the Earth Clones. The other clone swung for her face but Tenten employed a complete Wushu form to weave around the strike, dipping and rising, and cut the clone's head off with her return momentum. With a flick of her eye to assess that the true Sakura was rising to her feet and in peak health again, Tenten dropped into the subterranean trap hole.

Sakura jogged over to the pit with a parrot-sized Katsuyu on her shoulder. The remaining portions of Katsuyu in the arena gathered, sliding up Sakura's body to reassemble on her shoulder into a larger, python-sized companion.

"Be careful, Sakura! She would not allow herself to be cornered unless she wants you to follow." The slug queen warned her.

"I am already a step ahead of her!" Sakura assured Katsuyu smugly, and formed hand seals to exhale another Fireball into the opening of the pit. Thanks to a keen sense of chakra control and a bit of intuition, Sakura predicted a counterattack.

She keened back just enough to avoid a direct hit from Tenten's Hiyumi bolt, empowered with Sakura's own Fire Jutsu. The furnace-hot burst partially broke on Sakura, scorching Katsuyu more than the girl's clothes. Katsuyu absorbed the damage and Sakura rolled to put herself out on the ground. Seconds later, Tenten leapt from the trap hole like a commando, her cheeks dirtied, and she barrel-rolled while firing another shot above ground.

Again, Katsuyu took the brunt of the fiery explosion, protecting Sakura who was only half-enveloped in the slug's body. Sakura rolled once more, breathing and concentrating, and then bounced up to her feet to run for it. She angled herself to get closer to Tenten. Standing fully, Tenten aimed her bow for a precise shot.

"You kind of are living up to that indestructible description!" She conceded. Honing her chakra into a dense point for an arrow, Tenten fired a burning, close range Scattershot. The smaller, hotter chakra arrows that divided in the air shot Katsuyu off of Sakura's shoulder and razed the ground, catching Sakura in the blaze. With no fanfare or warning, Katsuyu departed in a puff of smoke. But Sakura kept running.

She charged like a bull into Tenten, and crashed into her as they went skidding and rolling to the dirt. Tenten made sure to keep her bow firmly in her hands, not allowing Sakura wrestle it away, so instead Sakura targeted her body. Tenten took a knee to the gut and was ground into the soil as Sakura pressed down onto her, grappling her shoulder. She was trying to pull back on Tenten's draw arm, which already had a chakra arrow nocked and drawn. The powerful pull dislocated Tenten's arm, and tears welled up silently in the older kunoichi's eyes as she held her fire under Sakura's chin.

"I can punch your head off of your shoulders right now." Sakura notified her.

"And I can let this go." Tenten retorted.

"With your arm like it is?"

"Only my fingers need to do the work. Besides…" Tenten indicated with a small head gesture that they were not alone. Sakura peeked over her shoulder to see a Shadow Clone of Tenten's aiming its own Hiyumi shot at Sakura's back, "I hid that in the trap hole just in case I needed a hand."
"I bet I can shrug off another fire arrow." Sakura estimated, "They weren't so bad."

"How about two?"

"I don't think you can shoot yours."

"Do you really want to find out?" Tenten hissed.

Sakura was convinced that Tenten could not or maybe would not shoot her at close range like this. And if the Shadow Clone acted, Sakura was confident she could heal herself adequately before dislocating Tenten's other arm. By then, Shikamaru was hovering steps away from them and prepared to halt them with his Shadow Bind.

It probably looked as ridiculous as her fight with Ino. Sakura had to consider that even if she weathered a Hiyumi attack, it didn't guarantee Tenten would not stick her with a sword again while she recovered from the blast. There are a couple of variables here that I don't like… Frowning, Sakura looked from Tenten to Shikamaru. Then she let go of Tenten and leaned back.

"Fine," Sakura relented, "Since we're all so concerned about having good judgement today…there's no sense in me calling a bluff that could maim or kill me."

"You bet your skinny ass there's no sense in it." Tenten still kept her shot lined up with Sakura's face.

Sakura shook her head at Tenten and chuckled darkly, motioning for Shikamaru to call it.

"The winner of the match is Tenten!"

There was some moderately thrilled cheering from the audience. As it turned out, Tenten really did have a fully charged arrow aimed for Sakura's head…but her Shadow Clone dissolved a fraction of a second after Shikamaru's announcement. Tenten sheepishly admitted, as Sakura hauled her up, that she could not be equitable about where she allocated her chakra just then. The clone had just stood there to look good. Tenten could barely tap a seal on her spinner scroll to unsummon her scattered weapons.

The girls trudged back into the building's interior for the treatment room, groaning and complaining. Tenten stowed away the Hiyumi and collapsed onto a low bench. Sakura took the spot beside her and healed the last angry patches of burns on her arms and legs. Only then did she begin examining Tenten's injured arm. Sakura assured the medics in the room she had it under control.

"Sorry to put you through that, Sakura."

"Yeah? Well you should be! I won Janken so you should have surrendered! Also, you were being stubborn and unreasonable…"

Tenten stared at a wall and had a haunting realization, "It's like…Neji is rubbing off on me."

Sakura lost it. She rocked back and forth and laughed until she got it out of her system. Tenten gave her a come-on-this-actually-bothers-me face. In time, she too chuckled quietly.

Sakura carefully cupped her hands around Tenten's shoulder and felt around with her chakra. The diagnosis was that yes, it most certainly was dislocated. Tenten admitted the pain still made her want to cry, but she was not one for crying usually.

Sakura stood up to get in position to relocate her friend's shoulder. Trying to keep Tenten relaxed, Sakura spoke to her, "You know it's okay if you pick up some of Neji's quirks. Thank goodness he's picked up some of yours. Like being polite and sociable."

"On a good day." Tenten agreed.

"I sometimes snap and insult people the way Gaara-kun does."

"Well you're both pretty good at it! And you have to get good at it since you put up with Ino so much."

"I know. Did you hear her going after you before?"

"She's relentless." Tenten complied when Sakura laid her flat on the bench.

"Okay. We're going to abduct your arm. On two take a deep breath, and on three I am going pull up slow and steady while you exhale. Got that?"

"Got it."

"One, two..." Both took deep breaths, "Three..." Sakura used what leverage she could to pull on Tenten's arm at a 90 degree angle, and thankfully the older girl did not squirm or fight as she wailed in pain. The head of the humerus bone slid beneath her shoulder blade and re-articulated. Sakura even heard the bunk sound it made after the successful relocation. Almost instantly, much of the pain subsided and Tenten shut her eyes and sighed.

"Sorry." Sakura apologized, "I've had it happen to me so I know what it feels like..."

"You don't need to be sorry, Sakura. I stabbed you and shot you." Tenten waved off the apology, "I am much sorrier than you are..."

Sakura crossed the treatment room and inquired with a medic staff member where she could find an arm sling. They procured one from a supply cabinet, along with an ice pack from a cooler, and Sakura crossed back to Tenten to help her sit up.

"All's forgiven now. Like I said, there aren't many things that I can't survive." Sakura smiled reassuringly and slung Tenten's arm gently, adjusting the strap, and wrapped the cold pack around her shoulder, "I hate to tell you this, but...your shoulder is going to be unstable for a day or more. You have to immobilize it."

"It's going to have to mobilize again for Round Three." Tenten remarked, pushing to her feet and picking up Hok in its scabbard.

"You need to be careful." Sakura reminded her. They waved to the medic staff before heading out. The pair approached the stairs and Tenten asked if Sakura could actively heal her shoulder and patch it up more.

"Even if I heal you and you don't feel any pain, you'll still be prone to re-injury." Sakura warned her, "And I worry that Huo will try to take advantage of that. He's a bit too keen for my liking."

"You have a point." Tenten conceded, "But can you do it for me anyway?"

"I will, but go up there and take it easy. I need the bathroom again..." Sakura muttered in annoyance, "God, I can't believe Ino...oh and hey! Don't let Ino tease you; if you get riled up I don't want that joint popping loose again!"
"Alright, alright…" Tenten trudged slowly up the stairwell.

For the millionth time that day, Sakura visited the restroom and tried to persuade her rebellious bowels to cool it already. She washed her hands, fixed her hair until she was somewhat cute again, and then trotted out of the restroom. The concourse and concession area beyond had emptied out significantly after the start of Round Two. Sakura estimated the next match would be announced soon.

Then she heard a soft sound coming from a perpendicular hallway, around the darkened corner that fed into the back entrances of the kitchens and food stands. Sakura inquisitively tip-toed over to it to investigate, poked her face past the cusp, and was pulled bodily into the offshoot corridor.

She nearly screamed in surprise, but luckily it was only Gaara.

"Gaara!" Her chest heaved as she caught her breath, and he appeared very amused by her reaction, "You're not supposed to be down here!"

"I'm not?" He was devil-may-care about it, as usual, "That's too bad. I wanted to see you."

"What about Tsunade-shishou? She wants you visible at the VIP guest seats."

"I am visible. I left a Shadow Clone there." He wrapped his arms around her and they leaned against the wall together, relishing the privacy, "Your match…worried me."

"Well I can understand why you feel that way." Sakura acknowledged, "I'm fine. Tenten's still a little banged up." She turned her face away from his warm, nice-smelling shirt to look up at him, feeling his lips brush over her nose and cheek, "What did you think of Matsuri? We spoke after her match and I tried to settle her down…she was a bit upset she didn't win."

"Matsuri honored my expectations and reminded me why I wanted to be a sensei in the first place." Gaara declared, letting Sakura fiddle with his hands, "I found her and spoke with her before I came looking for you. She is in good spirits."

"Ah, that's a relief." Sakura smiled and pressed her ear to his chest, hearing a steady beat, "Are we overprotective of her or what?"

"We are."

"Kind of like…" She trailed off and killed the idea. Gaara was still able to pick up on where she nearly took the subject.

"Did Tsunade-shishou say anything about me?" Sakura smoothly steered to a new topic.

"It was mostly bellowing…but the gist of it was that she was gratified by your performance." Gaara added as he rested his cheek on her head, "Natsuhi-sama was also impressed by you. The Hoshikage is still grateful for your help in the Star Village."

"She's a really nice lady…I need to talk to her again sometime."

"And Tazuna-san rooted for Tenten the entire time. He liked her militant approach."

Sakura supposed that the old man who was a friend of Gaara's, described as the rugged, Spartan sort of bridge builder, likely preferred more aggressive, weapon-wielding contenders.

"So did any of you…discuss Huo?" Sakura wondered haltingly.
"Yes. Tsunade-sama and I tried to appeal his victory. Natsuhi-sama and Tazuna also agreed he used a technique that was an exception to Exam Rules. The administrative panel that is seated nearby… behind safety glass…disputed that with a majority vote." Gaara recalled, "I, of course, have no problem acting on my own if he jeopardizes anyone else in a match. Administrators can rail at me all they like for interfering. It's the right thing to do."

"Thank you…" She held his face in her hands and just stared at him. Gaara was so good at his job. He was also very good at being her boyfriend. He was just so…good.

He was trying to pick out what exactly Sakura was thinking or why she was holding his head and maintaining intense eye contact. Really, he was just acting on that selfish impulse to replace himself with a doppelganger at his seat…so that he could hold her, kiss her, and talk to her. Every waking moment Gaara wanted to drop whatever task he was working on to usurp time with Sakura. His brain was washed with oxytocin every time he saw her, his veins flooding with happiness.

But as Gaara had been molded into the responsible sort, the two hemispheres of his brain now balanced desire and responsibility. Eventually he would return to his seat. For now, he was kissing Sakura slowly and very aware of how her body pressed into him, coiling tension in his stomach and below.

Then, their ears finally noticed that Shikamaru's voice via loudspeakers was not announcing the next match…he was starting it.

Sakura snapped back from the Kazekage, exchanging shit-did-you-hear-that? facial expressions with him before they ran out of the kitchen hallway and into the main corridor. They stopped short at the entrance of the arena to see what the hell was going on after leaving "make-out land."

Gaara did not have to feel it to know what was happening by heart. He watched Shino freeze. It appeared as if Shino had fully accepted the necessity of his participation, and was prepared to fight Huo. No sooner had the match commenced; Huo had paralyzed him with unimaginably potent killing intent. They stood there, Huo stock still, and a subtle, almost unnoticeable tremor had begun to shake Shino from top to bottom.

"Huo is intimidating him." Gaara reported to Sakura, who was leaning into him and holding his hand, "He doesn't want to be met with resistance."

Sakura had only personally experienced killing intent on two occasions— once as a brand new Genin on a mission near Kusagakure, against a rogue ninja, and the other more distressing incident being Orochimaru's attack on her team in the Forest of Death years back. She understood why Shino could not lift a finger against it. It was extremely hard to fight through it when your courage and innards liquefied.

The features on Huo's face rearranged, as if he had suddenly decided he wanted to toy with the Aburame heir a little bit. He bent to spring for a Wushu high kick…but Shikamaru stilled Huo by binding his shadow.

"Attacking a defenseless opponent isn't very sportsmanlike." Shikamaru admonished him, and was not just referring to Shino, but to Tama as well, "I'm giving Shino ten seconds." He released Huo and held a hand up bidding him to remain motionless. Shikamaru examined a digital lanyard-watch for a countdown.

"You didn't stop me in my last match, proctor." Huo sneered.

"I couldn't catch you in the last match."
Huo's crooked smile flashed for only a moment, "Are you going to try this in every round, proctor? I don't see how that will work. No matter what you do, I will win."

"I don't give a damn about who wins." Shikamaru hissed at him, "You and I both don't care about winning at this Exam. Whatever it is that you do want; I will block it to the fullest extent of the rules."

Huo scoffed at him and turned his nose up when Shikamaru spoke into his mic and concluded the countdown, gesturing toward Huo as the official winner of the match. When the audience made low rumblings of disappointment, Shikamaru ignored it and walked off of the field with Shino, tugging him along by his arm. Sakura and Gaara pulled them into the safety of the building and convened on the matter.

"Shino?" Shikamaru gave him a light shake, "I felt it too. He was giving me a fuck-you dose of killing intent. That piece of shit. He's willing to challenge me. I'd like to see him give any guff to the Kages in the VIP booth…speaking of which…" He regarded Gaara from the corner of his eye, "I might need you later, Kazekage. That fucker is unhinged."

"We noticed." Gaara spoke simultaneously with Sakura.

Shino managed to speak up, "It was necessary that I…do something."

"No, it wasn't." Sakura corrected him, "We planned for this going only on assumptions of how he'd react. We planned to beat Huo down more in every round…but if we can't do it safely or can't even move, it just isn't worth it. It's alright, Shino."

Shino incrementally realized he had the hands of Shikamaru, Sakura, and Gaara steadying him by his arms and shoulders. He felt much calmer after that. The panic and terror constricting his muscles faded and loosened him.

"I have to go back out there." Shikamaru grumbled, "Look after him. I'm gonna radio up to the Hokage and share this with her before I announce the next match." He thanked Sakura and Gaara before exiting the archway.

Slowly, coming out of the fog of fear, Shino was able to walk with them towards the staircase. He was able to compliment Sakura's match, and she graciously thanked him. They heard a clamor of running footsteps descending the stairs, and so they waited for the occupant to come bursting through the doorway. Hinata had her hackles raised and stopped herself from running into Sakura.

"Sakura-chan! Gaara-kun!" She was breathing through her mouth and her flared nostrils. Hinata pulled Shino from their hands and hugged him fiercely, "Shino-kun! You're alright! I'm so glad…I'm so glad…"

He patted her back and accepted the embrace.

"I saw what he did! I saw he was going to attack you!" The mixture of rage and discomfort in Hinata's voice was utterly new, in Sakura's opinion.

"Shikamaru stopped him. Going forward, he won't allow that behavior from Huo." Gaara reassured her, "I should return to the other leaders to talk to them."

Hinata thanked him for standing by to help a friend, and Gaara pecked Sakura's mouth before setting out. Even then, Shino was not released from his teammate's bear hug. Hinata wished Sato was still there, "He'd know what to say!"
Sakura countered that Sato would probably just jump Huo and try to slash his major arteries. After a long pause, Hinata quietly yielded that did sound like something Sato would try. Hurting Tama had been Huo's first mistake, but threatening Shino would have been the last straw.

"I am well now." Shino assured her, waiting for Hinata to slip her arms down and come back to her senses, "I am discouraged by how I was entirely ineffective at furthering our strategy…but perhaps someone else will have better results."

They hoped that was the case. Sakura cautioned Hinata that her face was bright red from raging too much, and so Hinata rushed into the restroom to splash herself with cold water. Sakura and Shino returned upstairs, asking her to hurry along so they could speak to the rest of the Finalist group.

She leaned over the sink and cupped her hands beneath the faucet. Hinata was still brimming with fury over Huo's near sucker punch attack on her dear friend. While she fumed, she splashed, refilling her hands several times. Until she glanced down and noticed the still water she was holding was reflecting someone else. Someone she had seen before. 'Is that…?' Hinata scrunched her eyes and looked carefully, 'Is that the person from my dream?' It was the man with horns and white hair, his face looking just as bewildered as hers in the water's reflection. He was emoting and moving just as she was, blink for blink with his own pearly Byakugan eyes.

"Eeeh-oooh!" Squealing, Hinata dropped the water and jumped back from the tap. She pointedly gazed into the glass mirror on the wall to confirm her face was still her face, thankfully. Water was still running at the faucet.

She inched forward to turn the water off and disregard this crazy nonsense. It couldn't be real. It was just stress manifesting, or something like that. Hinata frowned to herself.

Or maybe it wasn't. Maybe, in the same way she had miraculously overlapped her consciousness with Naruto's in a distant valley…maybe this was some similar, albeit weird form of communication?

Hinata cupped her hands and filled them again, hoping she was not losing her marbles. And sure enough, yes, the horned man was there looking back from her reflection. Hinata marveled at the absolutely bizarre and unexpected phenomenon.

"Does this mean something? Do I know you?" She asked quietly, glancing over her shoulder to make sure no one would walk in and catch her acting nutty. She could not get a response. It merely seemed like a magic-mirror reflection trick and nothing more, with no otherworldly, wise spirit trying to guide her or make sense of it all.

Sighing, Hinata dropped the water into the sink and shut the tap off. She took a good, hard look in the wall mirror. Was it her imagination? The Misago Byakugan did not, or rather, had not revealed any supernatural forces to her as of that point in time. However…it was her plain vision that saw something unexplainable in the waking world. She had not dreamt it or used her Doujutsu to perceive it. 'What does it mean?'

A speaker system in the bathroom announced in Shikamaru's voice that Hyuga Hinata and Rock Lee were expected to report to the arena for the next match. Distressed, Hinata clutched at the hair framing her face and lamented how she had dawdled over something so ridiculous.

She scampered out of the restroom as a group of concession workers and cashiers bustled in for a bathroom break. Hinata squeezed past and ran down the corridor, 'What is the matter with me? I was feeling upset earlier but it…it didn't feel like a break with reality. I'm not crazy! Oh, Naruto, you'd tell me I'm not crazy if I told you about it, right?'
Lee was as pleasant as ever.

He was even cognizant of what Hinata was expecting to gain from the Exam. Primarily, she sought to demonstrate her skills publically and please her father as much as possible. It was no secret to her friends that she strived to do so.

Hinata nodded and confirmed it while Shikamaru stood several paces away from them, muttering into a two-way radio about something to someone.

"We can have an honest match, if you wish." Lee offered, "To show off your talents! I will not pressure you into forfeiting immediately."

"I think I would prefer that, Lee-kun." She agreed, "And I want to ask…did our group discuss the Semi-Final and Final Round while I was gone? I'd like to know if Onee-san can go on."

Lee's cheerful exterior flickered briefly. He was concerned about it too.

"I do not know if Tenten can…I do not know what any of us can do, beyond this point." Lee admitted, "Our friends asked me to continue and do what I could. If Tenten is not feeling well enough to fight in her next match, I hope she will be truthful and not struggle to fight such a difficult opponent."

"I hope so too."

Shikamaru returned to them, "Alright you two saints…will you make this a gentleman's match? Please? No bloodshed and misery? It's all I ask for." It was rhetorical. He knew he could trust them to be civilized.

"Begin!" He started the fight and dashed away.

Lee rushed at her and decided to treat this as if it were a match against Neji. Hinata was not someone to underestimate, if Chouji's duel with her was any indication. And also, Lee did not like to underestimate anyone. He had much better success making judgements five or ten minutes into a match. He got to know someone by fighting them.

Quick and springy, Hinata had no trouble avoiding Lee's Drunken Boxing jabs. Her small feet stomped on the ground with poise and surety as they besieged each other in a tight circle, redirecting strikes with wrists and the backs of their hands. Lee did not feel bad about borrowing a maneuver from this grandfather—he slipped his hand below Hinata's arm, folded her elbow up as she lunged at him…and completed his sideways turn to let her go tumbling with her own momentum. But her Byakugan could see the follow-up he had aimed for her back, and Hinata creatively bounced in a forward hand spring to avoid the next barrage of Zui Chuan jabs.

Lee furrowed his brows when he noticed it. This was not Jyukken that he was familiar with. This was not a style Neji had ever used against him.

Hinata was adapting with slippery footwork, whirling the sleeves of her tunic, by far more lithe and airy than her cousin. She was not striking back at Lee's Wushu with her hands…she was reciprocating with the cleverness of her feet! Trying to be mindful of Hinata's Gentle Step, Lee kept an eye on her dancing feints, but was punished more than once by a Jyukken slap on his arm and then neck. Only by the timeliness of his blocks could Lee protect vulnerable chakra points and organs she aimed for.

When he defended against another Jyukken blow, crossing his wrists to catch her striking hand, Hinata retaliated by tapping his shin and knee with the toe of her sandaled foot. Lee yelped in shock.
She closed tenketsu there! With her feet!' He sucked wind and gasped at her, and Hinata's responding laugh at him was friendly, 'She learned to do such a thing...!' "I do not wish to hurt Hinata-sama...but she can use tricks that Neji has never even thought of! I cannot—"

Stepping backwards, Lee drew out nunchaku from his belt with a snap, and then spun with his arm fully extended to drive Hinata away for some distance. He whirled the weapon 'round his arm, frowning as he calculated, 'I can almost hit her...but I cannot—' She lunged at him and he nearly clocked her in the head. Hinata ducked, and with a valiant cry, fired off a vacuum wave from her hands that sent Lee soaring. He landed hard on his back. His breathing sounded as if he were inhaling through a straw. The pain of the back injury he'd sustained in his previous match had returned with a vengeance. When Lee gained his feet, Hinata shot the nunchaku out of his hand with another Air Palm.

Abruptly, he charged. In a skidding, low Wushu form Lee caught Hinata by complete surprise. Though she blocked with both arms when he kicked her airborne, his blow had still sent her two meters skyward with force. Lee worked his arm wrappings around the girl's arms and trunk as if to prepare for a Lotus attack, but then flipped away and rocketed himself up for a different jutsu.

"Fledgling Peacock!" Lee roared. The scorching, not-so-immense barrage of unavoidable punches bashed Hinata terrifically...but the girl dispersed into a cloud of smoke. Lee landed and rubbed his chin, perplexed. He hadn't seen her replace herself with a Shadow Clone, but if she had managed it prior to the last exchange then touché.

And then...a blow struck him between his shoulder blades. Lee's eyes crossed as he careened forward and rolled on his arms, attempting to recover...but it had been a powerful, direct hit of Jyukken. He tumbled away before Hinata could strike his exposed back again. Lee did a cursory assessment of his health, preparing to use more of his strength against a worthy adversary. He felt around his chakra paths, as he often did to test the releasing and closure of his Inner Gates...Lee's face constricted in horror. The Gate of Closing was completely jammed. The chakra points surrounding it...they were inert and not firing as his brain prod, prod, prodded for a response and got nothing.

Surely he could work with Three Gates, maybe, but even those inner portals felt sluggish at the tinge and tug of his synapses. Lee ran like a madman before Hinata could catch him again, considering his options, 'I can ask her to stop now...I can ask for a polite and respectful cessation! And yet...she seems determined! I may need to defeat her in earnest.' He rolled and picked up his discarded nunchaku.

She caught up shortly thereafter, and they hollered at each other as Lee wielded nunchaku with wicked proficiency and Hinata tucked and evaded harm. A lucky shot from one of Lee's Wushu forms tripped her, and as Hinata squeaked and toppled sideways Lee caught her outstretched arms in the extended chain of his nunchaku. Then he wrapped and knotted the chain, restraining her as Hinata felt flat with a wumpf.

Lee followed through with a downward Drunken Boxing knuckle-punch, "Please surrender now!" She outstretched a leg and kicked his wrist away from her stomach, where he stuck dirt.

"Ack! Hinata-sama! You need to consider-!" Lee was hooting in pain again as her footwork kicked him around, knocked his chin, and shut a few chakra points before he staggered away.

Though restrained on the ground, she was not yet losing. Hinata was able to form a hand sign to create a Shadow Clone, and Lee rushed back before it could begin freeing the kunoichi's hands. Unfortunately, Hinata could bend chakra with her feet, lit pin-point blue and flexible, and the Divine Hinata's clone was able to free her and toss the nunchaku away.

Hinata hopped up and crossed over to Lee to apologize, "Lee-kun! I'm sorry! It seems to me you're struggling and I wonder if you-?"

He wobbled to his feet again, grimacing and trying to ignore the injury to his lumbar. Lee insisted, "I am fine! I am well enough to continue."

She was concerned by the apparent evidence to the contrary, "Lee-kun, you may not be able to fight in future rounds if you are injured. I know that I also closed critical chakra points—"

Before Hinata could offer to open up access to his Inner Gates, Lee had snatched her loitering Shadow Clone and spun with it, hurling it into Hinata. The kunoichi fell over as her bunshin poofed away, and she realized Lee was not at all interested in pity. He seemed to be out to prove he could still fight in the Tournament. 'He doesn't want me to persuade him to give up, does he?'

Lee came in close again with accelerated Wushu, his conviction evident, and he employed his grandfather's trips and Breeze Boxing. He seized one of her hands in a vice-like grip and pinched, bending her arm uncomfortably so that she could not respond. Hinata cried out in pain, realizing he was intent on locking her joints to freeze her. It was only natural that he would twist her other hand next, and so Hinata swiftly struck Lee in the stomach with a Jyukken blow.

He had anticipated it. Lee exhaled and weathered the attack, reaching past her shoulder to clutch her neck in Wong Leung's Throat Hook grab. Time and time again, when the old man had used it against him or Neji, they submitted within a matter of seconds.

The audience did not take too well to the display and neither did Shikamaru, who had returned to arena. Before the intervention of a Shadow Bind connected, Hinata had helped herself. She forced Lee off with a Divine Protection sphere of chakra.

Slack-jawed and holding a hand sign, Shikamaru witnessed Lee dive back in. It was something else to see Lee use micro-managing techniques as opposed to the macro-level Taijutsu he often favored. Lee manipulated and twisted Hinata's hands away, locking and redirecting her arms when she lashed out. In the sole moment of opportunity she had to counter, Hinata flashed her dangling yukata sleeve in Lee's eyes to blind him, and struck with Gentle Fist again.

Lee kicked upward and the concealed blade in his shoe stuck into the fabric of her garment. With that leverage, he pulled her down to the ground by the sleeve to open her defense.

Simultaneously, Lee gave a shout as he punched down for a Wushu finisher... and Hinata poured her strength into a robust Air Palm. Lee was knocked back before making contact, and hit the ground again. He was spread-eagle for a few seconds longer than what he would have tolerated in prime health. Before Lee could struggle up, Hinata had darted over to him with a Shadow Clone. They pummeled him briefly with Jyukken before pulling his arms back to restrain him.

"Lee-kun!" She wanted to reason with him, "You are still hurt! This is making it worse! Please do not continue on... please be willing to look after yourself!"

"I must!" He wriggled side to side in the hope of freeing himself, "Tenten said that she needs me! I understand that I am needed!"

"Of course you are, but we have to know better. We can't all adhere to a plan when things change—just like Shino-kun couldn't. Please know that we do not have to fight Huo. Nothing is forcing any of us to do such a thing." Hinata lowered her voice to remind him, "We need to look out for each other."

Lee fell still and stared her in the face. He breathed deeply and tried to relax. Shikamaru ended up beside them and gave them expectant looks.

"Is this over?" Shikamaru asked.

Frustrated, but aware of the sense in surrender, Lee nodded to him.

"The winner of this match is Hyuga Hinata!" Shikamaru declared.

The stadium rattled with excitement and surprise. The semi-final rounds would have the majority of its contenders be kunoichi. Also, the seeds were uneven. A small stampede for betting booths broke out on the third level.

Tournament medic-nin arrived to shepherd Lee to the treatment room, and Hinata accompanied them. She and Lee apologized profusely to one another for a full five minutes. Eventually, a medic demanded that they knock it off and that they were obviously still friends.

They sighed. Lee was laid stomach-down on a table top to be examined, and he answered questions and winced as a medic-nin prodded at his back to determine why his earlier healing was not as effective as it could have been. Hinata excused herself as she quickly massaged open chakra points through Lee's skin, and then retreated to a chair to catch her breath. She held up her arm to examine her torn tunic sleeve. Oh well.

"What has become of this Exam?" Lee wondered out loud, "None of it is at all like I imagined it would be…"

"It really isn't." Hinata agreed with that point, "I have no idea what to expect now."

Lee turned his head to regard her while the medic continued examining him, "You do not?"

"Well…no…everything has been so surprising…"

"The Final Round." Lee reminded her urgently, "Only three competitors remain, because of Neji and Sato-kun's absence." He waited for her to reply, but Hinata pursed her lips and said nothing. Lee continued, "Hinata-sama…you are going to compete in the Final Round. Unless the scoring panel elects to give a pass to Tenten…most assuredly it is yours. A bye will be provided for one Finalist during the Semi-Final, because of this."

Wide-eyed, Hinata stared at him.

"It is possible." He insisted, "You must be prepared!"

Several minutes passed and then Lee was made to sit up. He had been healed and told that his only option was to take it very, very easy. The attending medic wrapped a pack of ice with cling-wrap secure to Lee's back, and then ushered the two youngsters along. Lee tried to use pleasant conversation and the distraction of a curry-bread concession stand to help Hinata calm down about the situation. It only half-worked. She was pressing her fingers together and shuffling from foot to foot. She was over-thinking it.

"Oh! Here, switch!" Lee traded treats with her, "Yours is mild and mine is spicy. Let us eat!"

They dug into their snacks and Hinata raised her eyebrows, impressed with the delicious fried food.
Munching, they listened as an announcement was made over loudspeakers. The Semi-Final round would begin after a thirty minute intermission. It would consist of a single match between Tenten and Sasagainu Huo. An official bye was awarded to Hyuga Hinata due to the absence of another competitor. There would be a thirty minute intermission prior to the start of the Final Round as well.

Staring off into the bustle and clamor of the cafeteria, Hinata's senses dulled and the curry-bread slipped from its wrapping in her hand and dropped to the floor.

Oh. If Naruto could see her now…

Wow, was the temperature perfect today! No breeze. No heat. The faint aroma of peonies blooming around the feet of the Toad Statues was sublime. It was an ideal day for meditation.

Naruto would tell anyone who asked him about it that meditating to gather Natural Energy was a boring and stiff task…but he would also admit he was starting to like it. It was the serenity of the mountain, the bright scents and sounds, the bliss that filtered down to the tiniest components of his cells…

It was a feeble description, but Naruto might claim it made him feel happy. He felt connected. He felt connected to Jiraiya, who, like him, was treated as a beloved child and student by resident toads. Naruto felt connected to his father, Minato, who was long dead and gone…but still felt like he was lingering on the sunny mountain as a pupil.

The stretching, vast feeling was reaching like open arms inside of him. Naruto felt the tingle—the many small heartbeats blinking and lighting the valley in all directions. Slowly, gently, he let their energy mingle with his own.

Shoot. He was fidgeting.

What a way to ruin great progress, his brain lamented. Naruto took a moment to snap back to awareness in his own body, and noticed that his cupped hands in his lap were twitching. He cracked an eye to look down at them. His index fingers were pressing together…as if he was worried about something.

'What...the heck?' He pooched his lips and wondered what this odd rebellion was. Just a moment ago he had been at total peace, harmonizing with all life in the valley…

Naruto opened his eyes and uncrossed his legs to stretch. He called out to Fukasaku, "Hey Pa! I came really close this time! Everything felt right."

The toad was working on a nonogram booklet to pass the time, relaxing in the grass nearby the Toad Oil Pool, "Oh? If that's so then why are you talking, Naruto-boy? I don't see Sage markings on your face."

"I dunno. My hands felt weird."

Fukasaku looked up from his booklet at him, "Weird?"

"Yeah."

"Were you turning to stone?"

"No, no. Nothing like that." Naruto assured him, "It felt like…my hands were full of water."

The toad rubbed at his fluffed, old-man eyebrows, "Weird. That is the word for it."
“What? That doesn't usually happen during training?” Naruto asked. He yawned and stretched again.

“No. During Sage Training I have never heard of or experienced the sensation of...holding water.” Fukasaku confirmed, "Do you feel like you can continue?"

"Yup. I feel great." Naruto nodded and returned to his cross-legged position, relaxing, "I don't think I'll slip up and turn into a statue, but keep an eye on me, okay?"

"Of course, child! Give it another hour or so, and then we'll break for lunch."

With a deep breath, Naruto shut his eyes and pushed all thought out of his head.

In Konoha, the intermission prior to the Semi-Final match was dwindling down to its last few minutes. On the viewing balcony, the Leaf finalist genin were discussing the pros and cons of surrendering to Huo.

"No offense," Ino gave her friends a preamble, pointing to Lee and Tenten, "But the both of you have been beaten silly. You have body parts falling off."

"Okay. We know. Leave Lee alone— he can only spectate anyway." Tenten could not gesture to the saran-wrapped ice pack on Lee's back...her arm was in a sling.

"Pff." Ino brushed hair from her face and shook her head at Tenten, "You aren't any better off, Old Lady. Can you even move that arm?"

"Let's find out." Tenten slipped her arm free and tested her range of motion, "Hmm...it feels fine for now..."

Sakura reached to carefully lower Tenten's arm and inspect her shoulder, "Good. I'm glad to hear it. But the first thing Huo is going to do is punch your shoulder out of its socket again if you fight him."

Lee grimaced at the floor, appalled by the thought.

"True." Tenten conceded, "And I can't use Susumajin against him."

This statement seemed to come as a surprise to her peers. Though they were aware of the black jian's chakra-sucking consequence, they were about ready to endorse the risky method against their enemy.

"You could probably win if you used it." Kiba touched on the subject, seated beside Akamaru on the floor, "If it starts to hurt bystanders, Shikamaru will just disqualify you."

"That alone is reason enough to not use it." Shino disagreed.

"No. You don't understand." Tenten took a deep breath and informed them, "It won't touch his chakra. His is the same as mine."

A hush fell among her peers and they stared at her. Lee, Hinata, and Sakura, who were already aware of Tenten's ancestry, just gave each other mournful looks.

"You're related to that guy?" Chouji was aghast.

"Distantly. My clan doesn't exist anymore...so he's a leftover much in the way that I am." She clarified, "The point is...I can't use a weapon he wants to get his hands on. If he took it away from me...I don't know if he has a way to bind a contract with it. If he does, then we'd have an international security crisis with Iwagakure on our hands. The Hokage would lose it..."
"Then forget that idea." Kiba concurred.

"Want to borrow some poison?" Ino suggested jokingly, "I have no idea if it would do anything to him, but maybe it's worth a try!"

"Oh!" Sakura liked that idea and added to it, "I can hide Katsuyu on you so she can heal you! She can slip down your shirt where no one will see."

"Guys." Tenten smiled wanly at them, "I'm not going to cheat. It isn't worth it."

"You have not had enough time to fully recover your chakra…and Huo has." Lee warned her, "Perhaps some help from our friends would benefit you."

"Lee, I can't." She shook her head, "And yeah…I am seriously lacking chakra. He won't be."

"Want to borrow a dog?" Kiba snickered at her.

Shino had let a Kikaichu insect land on Tenten's cheek, as if to suggest the same thing. She sighed at them and slid the sash of Hok from her shoulder. She handed the jian to Lee, and he looked superbly confused.

"I am going to forfeit." Tenten stated with finality, "But I am also going to talk to him and see what he wants. Maybe I can negotiate something."

Her friends clamored loudly in disagreement and alarm.

"He will not cooperate, Tenten." Lee's voice pressed as he hovered beside her, "No matter what you say to him, Huo is not going to relent…or he will make a demand that you cannot in good conscience fulfill!"

"He's obviously trash. Just remember what he did to Tama!" Sakura added, "He can't be reasoned with. You can't trust him even if you think you've worked something out!"

"Maybe not. And maybe he'll tell me something that the proctor of the Exam isn't supposed to know." Tenten glanced up at a wall clock, noting a few minutes remained, "I'm not exactly an expert at steering a conversation, but maybe I can get him to incriminate himself. Shikamaru can disqualify him if he admits to cheating or blurts out some other egotistical remark."

"Go with that." Sakura condoned the level-headed idea, "If he tries to attack you anyway…we'll be close by to intervene. We should wait downstairs by the arena entryway just in case."

"Yeah. Can't take any chances…" Kiba stood and brushed his pants off.

It was about time to go. Descending the stairs with her entire group of friends was a strange but bracing experience. Every last one of them filed into the corridor on the first floor, lining the walls as they wished Tenten well. She thanked them and passed through the archway into the arena. Lee stood at the doorway after she had gone, clutching Hok in his hands worriedly.

Shikamaru waited at the arena's center and spoke into his radio, asking for the loudspeaker system to be rebooted again. An earlier announcement had failed to be broadcasted about the closure of betting windows. He wanted his comments at the Semi-Final to come in crystal clear. When Tenten arrived and stopped a few paces away from him, he quirked an eyebrow at her.

"You don't exactly look like a grand champion." He muttered teasingly.
"That's because I'm not." She assured him, "Is something wrong with the speakers again?"

"They'll be up in two minutes. What's up? Do you want to say something off the record? Now is the time to do it." Shikamaru confirmed.

"Sort of." She watched as Huo crossed the tattered ground with a swagger in his gait.

When he finally came to a stop across from Tenten and Shikamaru, Huo's gaze trolled up and down Tenten's form. He then snickered in Hanwen, Where is that shabby old jian you keep on your back?

With a friend. She replied, signaling to Shikamaru from the corner of her eye that she might need more than two minutes. He got it.

I see. You obviously don't need a piece of rubbish like that...when you can summon something much better. He tilted his head at her, Do you intend to use Susumajin in this match?

I was chastised for using something that can hurt innocent people in this stadium, Tenten answered, So I do not plan to use it again.

You're a liar. Huo accused her, That isn't the reason. You didn't give any thought to those people in your first match, and you would disregard them again if you were desperate... The corners of his mouth curled up, It is because you know who I am. And I know who you are. That is why you won't call it.

No. I don't know who you are. I don't know why you are doing this. Tenten clicked her teeth angrily and spat, I've done nothing to provoke you! You can take your threats and posturing back to Hidden Rock!

Is that what you want? He shut his eyes and exhaled, Of course I will leave, if you wish it, Tian-Tian. My lady. "Our leader." Our shining jewel. And I will tell you who I am. Huo's sharp, narrow eyes snapped open, I am your replacement.

Tenten's face twisted as she tried to convert the words in her head, wondering if she understood him.

You no longer hold any stake in our clan. The Main line has been deposed. The Branch is the Main, now. My Lord Bihokokuni has transcended his low birth and proven himself worthy, and exterminated you wretched elitists. You are not the only ones who can wield our people's treasures. I will become the new head and rebuild. I will take Susumajin and Hiyumi as you offer them to me with your head bowed in respect.

I don't kowtow for anyone who is complicit in murdering his own flesh and blood. She stood straighter and looked him in the eye when she said it.

Huo smiled at her, They did.

Her face dropped a little, and an uncertain swirling feeling settled in her gut, Who did?

The prince. And your mother. They dropped to their knees and pleaded with Lord Bihokokuni. How do you think he so cleanly severed their heads? They weren't standing! So too shall you bow in apology and acknowledge me.

Tenten was losing her composure. She kept her jaw squared as her eyes moistened at the memory. How could he have known that? If he was aware that Leaf had recovered her parents' bodies decapitated, there must have been truth to his claims.
We have been instructed to rewrite...to overwrite our history...that we come from a heathen woman who disrespected the great shinobi of old and adopted the Tao before Ninshu. I will write you out of our story, Tian-Tian. Whether or not you give me what I ask for...whether or not you bow today, or on a cold night after years of hiding and fleeing from me. Your head will also be my Lord's keepsake.

You aren't a Genin. Tenten spoke to make a bid for information, and also to avoid Huo's hideous words, Is your Sensei in on this? Is she also a filthy, usurping murderer?

Huo referred to the Jounin Sensei of his team, the kunoichi named Sekieima, She is only Qin and Ga-Fen's Sensei. To me, she is a prisoner.

That detail was unsettling, but probably valuable. Tenten attempted negotiation, We have nothing to settle here, today. You are standing in the heart of my village. Nothing that you do will go unpunished. If you really want to challenge me, let's settle it in the future. Then you can have what you want.

My Lord said you would say that. Daughters always want to bargain. They always want to plot their escape and make a mockery of their adversaries. You are no disciple of our school, and your ignorance will be everlasting. Your past life disparaged Lord Indra and cursed our clan ever since. We will right your wrong.

Tenten had a prompt comeback for him, You are out of your mind! None of that is real! Don't you realize you've just been brainwashed by some cultist, rogue ninja? He made it up! Tenten insisted, shouting, Bi is using you to get the things he wants. That man killed my parents, and he will spill your blood without thinking twice about it.

My Lord Bihokokuni is a true disciple. He told me that your family knew the truth. The prince was always aware. The dirty Sa Gou people called our patron Tasaisha, but he is Lord Indra, the custodian of Ninjutsu and true strength, and we seek penance for betraying him.

Shikamaru motioned to Tenten, getting her attention, "You done? Loudspeakers are on. I can start the match."

"No, don't." Tenten was gulping air and trying to breathe, "I forfeit. I refuse to fight."

Shikamaru nodded to her and seemed heartened by her decision. Huo, however, was not done pontificating and threatening Tenten.

Don't try to delay this, you witch! I will make it so you are never born again. He was bristling, his hands fisted at his sides.

You are crazy. Tenten informed him, And you are being used. I don't have to fight you. It would be an insult to my honorable parents.

Shikamaru announced Tenten's forfeiture and made Huo the winner. Huo gnashed his teeth at her furiously. She turned her back and walked towards the exit of the arena, listening as the zealot called after her, I will kill them all! No matter where you go or who defends you, their grief and agony is my utmost priority.

Tenten covered her ears and jogged forward, relieved that Lee met her half-way and guided her inside the building.

"It's done! It's over." Sakura soothed as she crowded in with the rest of the group, encircling Tenten as she hyperventilated, "He was talking to you a lot! Did he tell you something we can use against him?"

She could not form words. Shock had settled in and silenced her. For a while, Tenten tuned out the speculation and concerned rumbling of her friends as they group-hugged. She felt Lee right behind her, protective, and wondered if he'd overheard any of it. Hinata was pressed into her side and patting her back to pacify her. Gradually, the huddle dissolved and Tenten cleared her throat several times. Ino passed her a water bottle and she chugged it.

"Okay. He is crazy." Tenten took a deep breath and elaborated, "He has some bizarre vendetta against me because of…storybook…characters? I don't know. He is clearly not based in reality. And what's worse is that he admitted he is holding his Jounin Sensei hostage…meaning she isn't actually his sensei."

"How can he be allowed to compete if he isn't a certified Genin?" Sakura was astounded, "There can't be that many bureaucratic loopholes in Konoha!"

"Well, I think he is a Genin, but he never bothered to apply for promotions even when he could. It seems purposeful now." Tenten capped the empty water bottle and crushed it in her hand, "Not that I want to go into detail about it, but he knows how my parents were killed. That has to count against him somehow."

"Yeah, I'm thinking it should." Kiba growled in disbelief, "How could someone like him know about that?"

"Because he works for the man that did it." Tenten replied evenly, "And I don't think Iwagakure is dealing with a disgraced, on-the-run war criminal like Dintei Bi anymore. The Tsuchikage would probably agree after hearing all this that there is a prison cell somewhere with Huo's name on it."

"Great. That's just what we needed, right?" Ino brightened, "He is out of this Tournament. Thank God."

Shortly after that, Shikamaru located them in the concourse hallway and conversed with them. Judging by reactions he got from administrators on his two-way radio, Huo's advancement to the Final Round was getting mixed reviews. Tsunade and her VIP seating companions agreed that it was wise of Tenten to avoid confrontation. The on-staff security team also radioed down to Shikamaru confirming that they would be watching Huo's movements in the building. One of their officers did "not like" Huo's verbal altercation and indignant reaction to his forfeiture-win. They wanted to ensure he was not in violation of Exam policies or intending to harm anyone.

Administrators and old-fogey misanthropes on the voting panel, however, seemed to think Huo entering the Final Round heralded doomsday. It was unthinkable. How could a ninja from Iwagakure, the grimy pebble under Konoha's boot, have submitted a contender to shame the Chunin Exam so? A Leaf Genin had to prevail. The Daimyo of the Land of Fire, and other political leaders in nearby nations would certainly take note if Leaf was beaten on its own turf by a former enemy. Conversely, a few on the panel believed it was a wonderful revenue-booster, at least for now. Let the silly, half-bald Iwa Genin fight, they said. Let him win uncontested. Whatever. Money was money. Reputation could be rebuilt after the fact. Besides, what did anyone expect from kunoichi being the only contenders in the Semi-Final and Final matches? A loss was guaranteed. Kunoichi were not dependable. Huo had a clear advantage, and many gamblers were heaping Ryo onto his odds.

Shikamaru sighed, "We are almost done with this day. I need a bath when I go home." He looked around at his haggard, frazzled peers and thought, "We all need a bath."
With encouragement from Lee, Tenten relayed the disturbing information she had gleaned from Huo. Shikamaru listened to her with a stone face and nodded occasionally.

"Do you think that's enough to get him in trouble?" She asked.

"Should be. The bit about his 'Jounin Sensei' is very concerning. Also, the fact that he knows about how your parents died could suggest a Privacy Violation for the Exam. Contenders can use information like that to intimidate one another. It isn't permitted." Shikamaru rubbed his chin, "And, once again, he was threatening your life and everyone associated with you. I'm not going to overlook what he admitted just because he said it in another fucking language. That dumbass."

"Thank you." Tenten breathed softly. Shikamaru clapped her bad shoulder and she howled in pain. Extremely contrite, Shikamaru apologized for his forgetfulness and then spared an urgent glance to Ino and Chouji before going to speak with the Hokage face-to-face.

"Let's get your sling back on." Sakura suggested, and headed for the stairs with Tenten beside her, "We have another thirty minutes to wait before they make announcements. Maybe it won't take the panel that long to penalize Huo."

"Hopefully not." Tenten began to smile, "And then you know what that means?"

Sakura laughed and they both turned back to regard Hinata as she climbed the steps behind them. She blinked in puzzled innocence at them.

"That makes Hinata the champion!" Sakura squealed, "Ha! Are you having a great day or what, Hinata-chan?"

"Hey that's right!" Kiba started cracking up. Shino quietly appreciated the happy turn of events, and Ino, Chouji, and Lee were also jovial that their friend had triumphed in spite of a difficult Tournament. The group celebrated at their viewing balcony. Sakura immobilized Tenten's arm once more and wondered aloud what Tama, Neji, and Sato would think of Hinata's dog day in the sun.

They settled down and relaxed, Chouji returned to the concession lobby for snack orders, and Tenten took Hok back from Lee with a small smile.

"Would you mind escorting me to the hospital?" She asked him sheepishly, "I'm tired. I just want to sit around and talk to Neji. Staying in this stadium is making me sick."

"Yes. You must want to get your mind off of it." Lee understood, "Of course! I will deliver you safely and then return for celebratory festivities!"

"But don't overdo it, Lee. You officially have a bad back."

She bid her friends farewell for the time being and set out with Lee. On the way down the stairwell, they heard the echoes of their friends cheering and making up a chant for Hinata.

Gai found them at the exit of the concession lobby, where the stadium's atrium fed into stone steps, and then on to one of the busy main streets of Konoha. He still seemed somber about Tama's injury, but joy was inching into his features as he commended Tenten and Lee for making him so very proud. Neji had too, of course. They could tell him that when they got to the hospital. Their team would celebrate over dinner as soon as Neji was well again— sensei's treat.

Gai added, "It is best, Tenten, that you do not approach Huo again. You were correct in avoiding him." He rubbed his chin and peered down the corridor, "Kakashi told me that he and other Jounin were going to stand before the panel and listen to Shikamaru's comments. I also wish to hear council members deliberate Huo's falsifications."

Lee said he would hurry back so he could get the full scoop. They carried on out of the building and uptown a few blocks. After making a right turn into the automatic doors of the hospital lobby, a receptionist took one look at them and sighed dramatically.

"Chunin Exam?" The receptionist looked down his nose at Tenten and Lee.

"Yes." Lee confirmed, "We are here to see Hyuga Neji."

The receptionist was surprised, "Huh? Aren't you both going to be admitted? You're injured."

"We're fine." Tenten sniffed impatiently.

"I'm going to have to ask you to fill out intake sheets—"

"No. We want to see our teammate." Tenten pushed the clipboard back over the desk counter, "Which room is he in?"

"I am not allowing visitors into a recovering patient's room. Most especially not some rude Genin who just hobbled away from the Exam..." The receptionist was dishing back attitude. He and Tenten had a staredown until Tenten backed up and grumbled.

Lee courteously filled out the intake sheet for her, as he was still able-handed. Tenten sighed and told him he could return to the stadium.

"You do not want me to wait here with you?" Lee wondered.

"Nah. You said you wanted to participate in the merriment. I just need a break from it all." Tenten assured him, "It's alright, Lee. Go ahead. You can come find me later."

He gave her a careful side-hug before departing. Tenten handed the clipboard back to the snooty receptionist and was admitted by a much friendlier nurse. Her vitals were taken, she answered the questions, and Tenten finally relented as she was brought to a patient recovery room upstairs. The only other occupant in the multi-patient room was a middle-aged man asleep in a bed. The nurse filled out a white board on the wall with Tenten's details. The kunoichi sat on a bed and scowled at the board as the nurse moved on for her rounds.

'I'm not just going to sit here like an invalid.' She held a hand sign and produced a Shadow Clone. Tenten smiled to herself. The clone Transformed into the likeness of the nurse who had cooed at her and settled her down. Tenten sent it downstairs to stealth a glance at the patient intake sheets and find Neji's room number. There. Maybe I should look for Sato and Tama's rooms later too...'

She sat there in boredom and listened to her gurgling stomach. 'Hm. I'm getting kind of hungry now...' Tenten padded silently over to the sleeping patient's food tray, pilfering a pear and an unopened cup of yogurt. She ate in silence for a while, disliking the sterile smell of the ward and how curtains were drawn to block sunlight. She zoned out and stared at long shadows on the floor.

Then, a thought popped into her head courtesy of her disguised Shadow Clone. It dissolved and transmitted its knowledge to her. Neji was in room 240. Good. Tenten hopped up with her half-eaten pear and navigated down the hospital hallway, finding her way up a stairwell to the next floor. It was very helpful that no on-shift nurses or doctors paid her any mind, too busy to acknowledge the errant kunoichi.
She poked her nose into the open doorway of Neji's room and looked in. Tenten sighed in relief. He was napping, propped up on pillows in bed—stitched, bandaged, hospital clothes, thin cotton blanket, monitor hookup—the works. She toed over to the uncomfortable, reedy armchair beside the bed and sat down. Tenten continued eating and did nothing to announce her presence. After a few minutes, Neji cracked an eye open and rolled it to look at who his visitor was.

There was a wonderful, sincere moment in which no words were spoken but the booping sounds of the heart monitor ticked up in frequency. Tenten watched Neji's face slowly pinken as he also realized how obvious his reaction to her was. Annoyed, he ripped the stupid thing off of his finger and tossed it. The monitor went quiet. Tenten grinned at him.

"Are you the winner?" His voice was scratchy.

"Nope! I gave up in the Semi-Final. Huo wanted to kill me so I decided to forfeit." Tenten was honest, still watching Neji's face as he processed the news.

She added, "Gai-sensei said he's proud of all of us. He's looking forward to a team celebration."

"Dinner? Like usual, I suppose."

"And no alcohol." Tenten thoughtfully amended, "For Lee, at least."

Neji nodded tiredly. She bit into her pear again and chewed.

"The Semi-Final." He sounded impressed by how far she had gotten, "Who did you defeat in Round Two?"

"Sakura."

"Ah." He shut his eyes and thought a bit more, "How far did Lee get?"

"He got to Round Two. Hinata beat him. Lee has a back injury from his first match that messed with him." Tenten smiled and set aside her sheathed sword on a bedside table, "Hinata is the champion today. Huo will be disqualified for what he told me before our match."

"Hinata—? What he told you—? He…" Neji was flummoxed, "Hinata will be the uncontested champion?"

"Yes."

"What did Huo say?" Neji pressed.

"He…" Tenten's chin drooped and she stopped eating, "He said a lot of things. We spoke in Hanwen, so when it got personal…Shikamaru didn't really understand it. I told him afterward."

Neji was looking at her with an expression that demanded the details.

She gulped and tried to recount what had happened, "Huo admitted he wanted both Sasagainu clan weapons I have. He wanted to cut my head off and give it to his…his Shifu. He said. The same rogue ninja who beheaded my parents, Dintei Bi. Huo knew all about that…and it really bothered me."

Staring in shock with flecks of anger hardening his features, Neji was all ears as Tenten spoke. He never knew how her parents had been killed, but now he understood why she never wanted to talk about it.
"Huo told me about...how he and Bi were replacing the Main line of the clan. They wanted to rewrite our history. They are repenting for something that my ancestors did...that was offensive to the Branch line's idol. Some kind of...splintering of beliefs. Two ideologies. But...but it all sounded so fake...like some kind of cult." Tenten shook her head and pressed her good hand into her eye, halting a tear, "He said some...pretty horrible stuff. Huo is definitely crazy...but I believe him when he says he wants to kill everyone I care about."

The room was quiet while Neji stared and digested what she'd said. Tenten sniffled until she dried up again, not too keen on revealing her puffy eyes. She never liked to display her weak side to Neji, even now when he was much better at accepting it. She hid it on reflex.

"Also," She cleared her throat, "Huo said that his Jounin Sensei is his prisoner. So she isn't exactly an accomplice in the crazy stuff he's doing. Shikamaru said he would take it up with the panel. The violation of privacy too...those were big offenses."

"I really want to..." Neji trailed off and stopped himself from replying. He turned his head away from her and looked at the wall, visibly angry.

"What?" Tenten peeped.

Neji broke his silence, "I want to kill him. For making you upset, for hurting you deeply even without fighting you...someone like him drives me to such thoughts. I hate him. More than anything." He let out a breath to ease up a bit, "I would give anything to make Huo feel small. To prove how wrong he is."

Neji turned back to look at her and saw Tenten hiding her face again with her arm.

"Show me." His voice was softer.

She shook her head tiredly and rubbed at her eyes with her sleeve. Her subconscious had a weird mechanism in place, at least where Neji was concerned. She did not show grief or worry or any of those wimpy emotions. When she first got to know him, he only valued the people who commanded his respect. As a result, Tenten made a point to only reveal parts of herself that were respectable in his eyes. She did not quite grasp yet how different things were from those days.

He kind of got the gist of why she couldn't do it. Her feelings were no longer a mystery to him.

"The things that hurt you do not cheapen you. They aren't something you need to hide from me." Neji took a shot at appealing to that soft side she pretended not to have, "I want to feel your pain with you."

Tenten sucked in a breath that got stuck on a hiccup. Whoa. Had she heard that right? Yup. Pretty sure she did. Neji said that. The hiccups intensified. Tenten lowered her arm and set the pear down on the empty food tray of a rolling cart. She shuffled over to Neji and climbed up into the space beside him, not sorry about getting dirt from her clothes all over the linens. It did not seem to hurt his bandaged side at all when she curled into him, resting her forehead against his neck. Neji felt her chest and shoulders tremble, but she remained silent. He had enough range of motion to snake an arm around her, closing his eyes again and willing his exhaustion away so he could focus on this. It was important.

"You know, I..." Her voice was thick and wobbly, "I never liked sharing my pain. Not since they died. It became an inconvenience. If you..." Tenten wetted her lips and went on, "If you had learned about it then...back when you had so much pain of your own...I had no idea how you would take it. The last thing I ever wanted to do was make you feel worse than you already did."
"You never made me feel worse." Neji chided.

"Right. Because I made a point of including you in everything and socially rehabilitating you...when you didn't throw a fit or reject it. I never shared anything personal." Tenten's arm slipped out of its sling and her fingers fiddled with his hospital shirt, "I just kind of assumed...that was the best way to help you. I felt what you felt, because it was easier than feeling my own loss. I wanted you to believe I was on your side."

That was a surprisingly bitter pill to swallow. Here he was channeling his new powers of empathy and asking to feel her pain with her...and Neji had to acknowledge what Tenten was saying. That when she was 12 years old and freshly orphaned, then promoted to a Genin team...she had been feeling for him since that time.

Oh, how stupid he had been then— so inextricably caught up in clan politics and advancement...he couldn't even see that a person had been listening to him so intently. To reach past the grimacing, arguing, fighting, and his posturing for the Main House; past his reputation as a prodigy, past his pushiness and selfishness...Tenten had identified the feelings he had suppressed and misunderstood.

Perhaps on a very subtle wavelength, he had detected what Tenten was doing for him when he was younger. He had felt a very strong but unclassified bond with her. He had enjoyed devoting huge blocks of time to training with her. He had been mortified and furious when Tenten told him he was wrong, and that Hinata deserved the accolades and prestige of the Main House, when Neji had once thought they were in competition for it. She was on his side. He didn't want her to support anyone else.

But he had never actually returned that favor. He just made things harder for her, overlooking and squandering that benevolence... She had always seemed fine. Carefree. Burden-less. Neji had since learned that some people made themselves seem that way in order to accommodate others first.

In hindsight, boy oh boy was he bad at this. How had he existed without recognizing the needs and feelings of other human beings? Neji was absolutely perplexed. How had anyone been able to put up with him?

He felt wetness on his neck where he supposed Tenten had been crying, but she was too afraid to show it. Neji reached for the opposite side table with his free arm and pulled back a box of tissues. Before he could get one for her, Tenten had plucked several out herself and muttered apologies to him. He made a point of not getting impatient with her flighty evasion. He had a feeling she just needed to be reassured.

"You could have told me." Neji imagined out loud, and then he waited for her to finish blowing her nose. When she was tucked into him again he went on, "If you had told me about what happened to you—to your family...when I had first met you...I may not have said much. But I would have let it dwell on my thoughts every day. I would have thought about it every night before I slept. I would have thought less about my own exaggerated hardships." Neji concluded, "I may not have known how to help you, when we were younger. But I hope...that if you had confided in me...I would have contemplated about finding the way to do it. I hope I would have found the way to show you that I am on your side too."

She made a small sound in response to his thoughts and remained bunched up. It was the sound of a sob. Then her snuffling petered off and she inhaled again, her chest rumbling with phlegm, and Tenten stuffed tissues under her eyes. She calmed down completely after a few minutes.

"Are you feeling alright?" He asked.
"Yeah." Tenten rolled up the spent tissues and crammed them in her arm sling for the time being. "Sorry about that."

"Don't be."

"I shouldn't—"

"If I had been the one crying, you wouldn't have minded it. Why should I?"

"You. Cry?" Tenten was flabbergasted.

"Not at this age, but…" He sighed and admitted, "When I lost my father…I had tantrums for weeks. Hinata-sama can tell you. It took an incredible amount of cajoling from my relatives to get me out of my room to eat and function those days."

"You were sad." She understood, "And he was the only person you had. It must have been awful to say goodbye."

"Father was the only parent I had, but I was never alone. I was fortunate." Neji acknowledged, "I've been well looked after."

Tenten raised her face up to look at him and listen. Her complexion had evened out again. Her eyes were slightly less red.

"I do have…a reasonable amount of luck." Neji supposed, tipping his head back to relax, "Considering that someone could see past my flaws and pretenses…and tell me that I've got it together." He was looking up at the ceiling, but Tenten noticed his mouth curve into a smile.

"Well…you do. It took a while, but you do." She granted him that, "I mean…is that luck?"

"Is it? It feels like it is." He noted loftily, "And that same someone told me that I have turned out better than what she ever dared to hope for."

"No one told you that." Tenten protested quietly in embarrassment.

"I can assure you someone did. This person also told me I am the greatest." Neji stopped and thought, "Though that is debatable."

In a better mood, she rested her head gently on his shoulder and started to smirk impishly, "No, that one isn't debatable. You can have that one."

"I found it highly subjective."

"Just take the damn compliment." Tenten sniffed.

"I will, if you take care not interrupt me like you did before my match," Neji advised. He adjusted his sitting position to be face-to-face with her, watching her pupils dilate as she looked at him, "You have done something to me that you can't undo, that I won't let you undo."

The gypsum hue of his eyes had traces of lavender and grey in them. Maybe she was staring too hard. She couldn't help it. Her brain was a willing captive.

"I had no talent for seeing the good in others. I had little practical experience with feeling joy. Now I can see it everywhere. Now I feel happy in any moment I stop to reflect. Because you devoted the time to educate, criticize, and cherish me, these things now come easily to me."
She was too parched to swallow properly.

"I suggest that you…get accustomed to me staying by your side. Every day." He slowed down to kiss her mouth and had no idea that Tenten feared her chest might explode into fiery pieces. He spoke again, "You should get comfortable sharing both the pleasant and unpleasant things you feel with me. I am too curious now. I want to know those things." She was sputtering softly when they kissed again, and then Neji said, "I want you."

Unintentionally, Tenten flailed a hand and knocked the tissue box to the tile floor with a clatter. This was a bit too much for her to handle. Earlier she had thought she could absorb whatever mushy sentiments Neji beset her with, but oh ho ho her blood pressure and live-wire erogenous zones said otherwise.

And the other issue was that there was a polite knock on the door frame to announce a visitor's presence. They snapped apart from another kiss with what? we-were-not-doing-anything facial expressions. At the door they saw the same cat-masked ANBU agent that Tsunade had once ordered to keep them separated.

"Tenzo." Neji greeted, surprised.

"The name's Yamato, today." The man chuckled and removed his mask, giving a soft "Phew!" They stared in shock at the gesture.

"I'm off duty for now. Yugao-san took over." Tenzo, or Yamato, gave an amused look to Tenten who was still perched on the bed beside Neji, "She couldn't stop talking about you, Tenten."

"Oh!" Tenten's voice was high-pitched and working through the fact that even members of ANBU were invested in them.

"You both had some very interesting matches today!" Yamato remarked as he took a seat on a physician's rolling stool, resting his elbows on the countertop behind him, "It is good to see you two together for a change. I didn't like keeping you apart."

"Thanks." Tenten was warming up to him, "We didn't like being apart."

"I can see that." Yamato said, indicating their close proximity. With that, Tenten slipped down and back into the uncomfortable guest chair. Yamato shared a recollection with the kunoichi, "Yeah. This brings back memories! Neji was very hostile when I first met him. We had a confrontation in your apartment building."

This was the first she had heard of a confrontation in her building. Tenten pursed her mouth and looked at Neji, who seemed annoyed but also resigned to Yamato's storytelling. Inquisitive, she asked, "Neji came to my building?"

"He sure did. I read him his rights and everything outside…and then he jumped into someone's open flat window. So did I, unfortunately." The off-duty ANBU veteran muttered and rubbed the back of his head, "Neji ran upstairs to get to you and I barely headed him off at the pass."

"You don't say?" She was side-eye smirking at Neji, thrilled.

"Yes. There was even a brief skirmish! With an old woman. Then I pulled Neji out of the third floor window with a Wood Clone. Had you answered your door for him, I would have arrested him in front of you." Yamato nodded to himself sagely, "He caused me so much trouble."

"You were at my door?" Tenten looked at her boyfriend, mildly smug.
"No."

"My report says you were." Yamato corrected him.

"I stopped by." Was all that Neji would admit to.

"It was tricky keeping up with two yearning youths. Like something out of those novels Kakashi reads." Yamato rubbed his mask on his pant leg to clean a spot of concession food gunk off of it.

"Hey, don't patronize!" Tenten didn't like that assessment, "It's nothing like that!"

"Well, maybe you aren't as obnoxious as fiction, I'll give you that. Truly, I do respect you. I respected your father too." Yamato assured her.

She blinked and considered it, "You were in Black Ops with him?"

"Oh yes, when I was a new inductee and Kakashi was first whipping me into shape, Takaharu was a Captain I got to know and I liked him very much. He brought delicious food to the break room."
Yamato remembered fondly, "You can follow in his footsteps, Tenten. You made that plain to me today."

"Pffft. I'm sorry. Were you actually watching my matches?" Skeptically, she pointed out her arm in a sling, "Dad was tough. I'm falling to pieces." Tenten stood from her seat and excused herself, "Uh, whoa, I waited too long. I watched too many matches… Excuse me!" She left the recovery room and got to the restroom across the hall.

"I wonder why she didn't accept my endorsement?" Yamato was stumped.

"She's like that." Neji informed him, "She is highly suspicious of endorsements."

"Hmm." Yamato smiled at him, "It seems she is. And Neji, I must say, I have never seen anyone fall into the sky the way you did in your match. Isn't Kakashi's nephew something?"

"He is something. Foolish." Yamato cracked up.

"Perhaps I should have used jutsu I had been withholding." Neji reflected on how he had held back and been pummeled, "I was not investing my full strength in that match. I thought it was best to conserve techniques to face Huo."

"A wise decision, really. Even if it didn't work out." Yamato agreed with him, "I can only imagine what the Torture and Intel Corps will ask Huo at his post-Exam interview. I know Ibiki is itching to get at him."

"May he languish and rot in their cells." Neji's comment was serrated.

"Had Huo not been a factor in this Exam, this Tournament would have been yours for the taking.
That I am sure of. Your team was dominant and well-equipped. I enjoyed watching your matches!
Sai was quite excited by them as well. He intends to spend more time with you soon, while off duty…” Yamato leaned back again, chipper, "My, my…you all grew so much in so little time."

"Soon, the Hokage will come to depend on us more. We do not want to disappoint her." Neji extended an olive branch, remembering how Tenzo/Yamato had asked him to put faith in Tsunade when it had been difficult to do so.
"Yes. That's the attitude Leaf ninja need. The Hokage's strength does not come from just her abilities...it is the will and service of the ninja who support her that empower her." Yamato mused contently.

Finally, Neji agreed with that statement.

"So..." Yamato transitioned carefully, "How long has that been going on?"

"How long has what been going on?" Neji didn't get it.

"The kissing and embracing. You put on quite the show for me before you realized I had stopped by."

The Hyuga heir's face flat-lined in humiliation. He did not offer a comment.

"Now, now, I won't tease you. Those feelings are important. You may need her support more than anyone else's in the world. I wish I had the good fortune to meet someone like that, but so far my search has turned up empty. Give thanks each day for your irreplaceable someone!" Yamato recommended.

Neji nodded. Yes. Gratitude. He couldn't forget that it would have been a very simple matter for Tenten to not acknowledge or desire him at all. Many shinobi lived busy, career-fueled lives without so much of a hint of romance or true companionship.

"I am just surprised that your relationship is as advanced as it is. I could be mistaken, but I was under the impression that the noblest clans of Konoha don't allow informal courtships." Yamato explained, "Did the Hyuga sanction it for you? For them to consider her a serious future prospect of yours has heavy political implications."

"It's not." Neji enlightened him, "It isn't approved at all. My clan is not aware."

"Oooh." Yamato gave him a wary look, "Be cautious."

Pouting, Neji took a moment to think about what he had given no thought to previously. At some point, if he sincerely wished to keep Tenten as a lifelong companion, he was going to have to make a case for it with the Elders of the Main House. Since that was an immense headache waiting to happen, Neji had automatically pushed the idea to the farthest corners of his mind.

"...I did not think that far ahead." Neji admitted, "But I do know that I won't let her get away, and I won't allow anyone else to have her."

"Maybe that conviction is all you need..." Yamato pondered, "And a decent bribe to grease the hands of the old patriarchs of the Hyuga."

"If you know what would suffice in appeasing them, tell my uncle and I immediately. We still have no idea what satisfies them."

Yamato gave him a wry, knowing smile. He may have said something uncouth in reply, but he stopped himself. A few moments of quiet passed before Yamato turned his head left and right.

"Tenten's been gone for a while. Did she fall in?" He jested.

"Her arm is injured. It may be challenging for her to use the restroom on her own." Neji guessed.

"Ah. That could be it."
Shortly after that, Tenten returned. She appeared a bit disgruntled, "Ugh. What did I miss?"

"Nothing." Neji and Yamato said it in unison, and so she instantly realized it meant something.

"O-kaaay." Tenten dropped into the reedy seat and picked up her pear again to eat, "Well I had a scare in the bathroom. I looked in the mirror. What a nightmare…"

Leaf Genin Finalists had organized in a small gathering on the floor of their viewing area. They were seated in a circle and stuffing themselves with fried dough, icy treats, meat on sticks, and other concession delights. They took turns commending each other and toasting to Hinata's ascension to Tournament Champion.

"If your dad throws a party for you at the Hyuga estate, can we go to celebrate too?" Sakura wondered of her friend.

Hinata was giggling, "I would want you there! I wouldn't let anyone stop you at the gate!"

"Oh, Gaara has to come! Oh my gosh it'll be so much fun."

"Shika too!" Ino was cackling, "He's going to need to let loose after the day he's had."

"We'll have to tuck him into bed later." Chouji predicted.

"Be careful with that invite or the Hokage will show up." Kiba warned jokingly, "And she will drink all of your clan's liquor before you can lock it up safe!"

They were all roaring and guffawing, with the exception of Shino. His mirth was much quieter.

Abruptly, a large, swirling cloud of smoke erupted on the balcony just behind the ring of Genin. Akamaru startled and fell over into Kiba's lap. Lee also reared back and knocked over Mo-Ye from where the jian was leaned against the wall. The youngsters beheld a gaggle of arguing Jounin that had showed up.

A hush fell over the Genin as the shouting of the Jounin allayed. Kakashi was concluding strong words with a veteran kunoichi the Genin had never seen before. She was middle-aged and had wild, graying hair, and a sharp but comely face. Her Jounin vest was unzipped over layered tanks and fishnets. She held a finger up to Kakashi and turned to address the Genin.

"Hello children," She greeted, "I am Sarutobi Kakima. Today I was appointed as a moderator for Exam decisions and I was just now unfairly booted from the panel for calling another panel member a two-faced, sissy swinefucker."

"You should have held your tongue, Kakima." Asuma gruffed at his sister-in-law.

Kakashi was cupping his forehead in disappointment.

"You heard what they were saying. You heard the bias and treason as loudly as I did." Kakima insisted, "Forgive me for negating all of our reasonable and well-thought out recommendations to the council. They weren't going to listen to us anyway."

"We could have played our hand more carefully." Kurenai reminded her, "Your husband was doing well with his persuasion."

"Buh! Netsuke was sitting and nodding too much. Even Asuma wanted him to raise hell."
"I did not." Asuma denied it.

Gai and Genma insisted that Shikamaru's testimony of Semi-Final violations were misconstrued by panel members and thrown out before consideration. The Hokage should intervene. No. Forget it. The Hokage should cancel everything. Except that millions upon millions of Ryo were now flowing freely into Hidden Leaf and how? How were they supposed to cut the cord with so much hanging in the balance?

"Who does that old Shimura turd think he is?" Hayate sniffed, standing shoulder to shoulder with his wife, "He told Yugao she was exaggerating the danger that her Security team reported. I don't see his fucking Root security force watching matches, do you?"

"Screaming about it here won't change any minds." Kakashi stated evenly, "It's over. They ruled disqualification out."

"WHAT? Ruled it out?" Sakura hollered at the top of her lungs, snapping the Jounin out of their closed circuit of bickering.

The Genin were devastated.

"Wait!" Lee stood up, frantic, "Shikamaru submitted his opinions to the panel! Tenten told him what happened!"

"He did, Lee." Gai confirmed it gravely, "A panel member argued that Tenten made all of it up."

"No." Ino's face was aflame with fury, "No. No. No. How do they get to say that? How can they make a snap judgement? They weren't standing down there!"

"Shikamaru did not have a recording of the verbal exchange Huo and Tenten had. Furthermore, it was in a language that Shikamaru and other administrators do not understand." Asuma sighed heavily, "Course, it's not that hard to find someone who can translate Hanwen on short notice. But the lack of a recorded conversation means that they can think whatever the hell they want. Ignorance is bliss."

"Ignorance will get Genin killed today." Yugao was also bristling.

"Elder Tatesono is incorrigible!" Kakima howled, "How can he advocate for a shameless, immoral delinquent to advance purely for monetary gain? I will refer him to the Corruption Committee and daimyo so fast his head will spin!"

"He was rubbing shoulders with Danzo too much. They allowed this." Hayate observed.

"The point is," Kakashi interrupted again, "Huo will be permitted to fight in the Final Round. We can't celebrate yet. We need to be smart and coast to the finish." He turned to Kurenai, "The floor is yours now."

Wilted, Kurenai stepped forward and extended a hand to Hinata, pulling her to her feet.

"I feel that you have been robbed of a limelight that would have displayed your beauty and kindness in the way it deserved to be seen by everyone in this stadium. It was yours. Forgive us for failing in our appeal." She wrapped her arms around her student and leaned back, giving her a stern look, "I will hold this day in contempt for the rest of my life."

"You mustn't, Sensei." Hinata shook her head modestly, "It isn't your fault. I don't need publicity to feel accomplished."
"I know you don’t, but I wanted it for you so badly." Kurenai furrowed her brow and smiled, "Now forgive me for asking you to surrender. I treasure your life and future. Please do not risk your well-being against an unscrupulous competitor, Hinata."

"I won't." Hinata agreed.

"Good. Shino…” Kurenai extended her arm and gestured for him to join them. He got in on the hug, "I am sorry. I could not be more proud of what you both did today. I understand Sato’s pain and frustration, even if he was out of line with his actions. You all did marvelously."

They were heartened, "Thank you, Kurenai-sensei."

"Well, guess we should stand by and make sure that Iwa crook doesn't try to pull anything." Genma proposed, "Come on, you old fucks. Let's go stare menacingly.” By old fucks he meant his Jounin peers. Kakima, the most senior, took offense and smacked the back of Genma's head. They departed and left Asuma, Gai, Kurenai, and Kakashi with their student brood.

Chouji handed Asuma a wrapped curry-bread treat and his Sensei accepted it, biting anxiously into the snack. Ino sighed and moped beside them.

"When the Tournament's over, can we gang up on Huo and rip him to pieces?" Kiba asked optimistically.

Kakashi snickered, 'I'm afraid you'll have to get in line. Torture and Intel Corps requested an 'interview' with Huo, which the Hokage granted, and they always get first pick. Kakima was brandishing her connections to the Corruption Committee, and they may be number two on the list… so give it a few weeks."

"Nah, I can't. I need my rage to be fresh if I'm going to hurt him." Kiba vigorously patted Akamaru to try and relax.

"It's not fair." Sakura protested, "It should be clear to the decision panel that Huo doesn't deserve any kind of recognition. He isn't representative of the qualities the Exam wants to promote!"

"I know, kiddo." Kakashi rubbed his neck, wound tight, "But many councils and decision-making bodies in this village, and pretty much everywhere else, are always stacked with self-serving, rhetoric-spewing demagogues who make it their business to get the final say."

"Tsunade-shishou should just punch them."

"She's done it before...long ago." Kakashi chuckled, "But that was the one and only time she could — she punched Jiraiya out of the auditorium of the Sealing Corps council meeting. He said something to her she disagreed with."

"Ah, well… I guess they won't condone that kind of behavior from a Hokage."

"No. The daimyo could replace her with a new candidate if she did." Kakashi imagined, "And that's the last thing we need— another rat race for leadership while we have enemies hoping to prey on weakness."

They stopped talking and looked to Gai at the top of the stairs, where he was speaking with someone unseen a few steps down in the stairwell. He turned back to the group and announced, "Hinata-chan, Ko-san asked for you to go to the first floor assembly room in the concourse. Your father wishes to speak with you."
"O-Oh…" Hinata handed a cinnamon roll back to Lee when he offered her one. It would not be appropriate to eat nervously while having an audience with her father. She excused herself from her friends and team, then hurried down the stairs.

She had forgotten that her father had been watching, and that he too may have been excited to see her get so close to the end. How unfortunate that he had to get used to being disappointed by her constant stumbling before the finish line…

'I just hope that I did enough today…to please him. I hope that he can see that I have grown and tried to become strong.' Hinata thought to herself. On the first floor, she got confused because she had no idea where the assembly room was. She stopped to ask on duty concourse guards for directions. She then set out down the leftward hall that wrapped around the circumference of the building, connecting to most upper level stairwells.

She glanced at a portable bi-fold sign and saw she had reached her destination. She ducked into the room and found her father there waiting all by himself. His hands were tucked into the sleeves of his overcoat and he was frowning. Hinata shriveled sadly after noting his expression.

"Hinata," He paused before going on to ask, "What do you think I want you to do?"

"I…" Her eyes nearly crossed because both continuing and forfeiting seemed like impossible options when she thought of her father.

Hiashi gazed at her for a long while before the lines near his mouth became more pronounced, and his face was shadowed with worry.

"You don't have to do anything to prove yourself to me." He informed her, "You did that long ago."

"But Father I know that you want—"

"There is nothing that I want…more than your safety." Hiashi confirmed, "I cannot ask you to do anything simply because it would reassure me or gratify me. All I can do is tell you what I feel. In the end, what you think is the sole foundation of your decisions and actions."

"I will always consider what you have to say." She was shuffling and fidgeting in front of him.

"I know you will, but I have been wrong about many things in the past. I would prefer it if you don't weigh my opinions against your own too heavily." Hiashi advised her, "If I had…let my thoughts and feelings affect all of your life choices at the last Exam…I would have left you bereft of opportunities and dignity. I would have forsaken you in an unacceptable way…because of the pompous opinions of our elders." He rested a hand on her arm and closed his eyes, "You are not a bit player for our clan. You are my child. Your life was a gift to me. I regret that there was ever a time…I dared to forget that."

"…u-um…" Her lip trembled. He did not fuss when she leaned her head into his chest, remembering that she hadn't done such a thing since she was a toddler. He held the back of her head, as if nostalgic for the short time she had been small and still needed him.

"Risking yourself for vanity seems like something that a Hyuga would do, and many people in this building may expect such a thing." Hiashi speculated, "But we do not lower ourselves to fight unprincipled adversaries. And our clan should prize its wisdom more than its repute. Let this foe stand alone and friendless in front of crowds, and then leave him to the damp chill of Leaf's dungeons. That is where he belongs."

"Yes, Father." She nodded and took a step back, smiling slightly.
He held her cheek in his hand and wore a pained expression, "There are some days when I think…
that if your mother were still alive and you stood beside her…I wouldn't be able to tell you apart."
He chuckled to himself, "It feels like she never left me."

Hinata patted his hand understandingly, "She didn't."

"Azumi promised me she never would. She also extracted many promises from me, before the end… and I should do better to keep those vows." Hiashi decided, "Hm. Despite all that's happened, there is still reason to celebrate. I will arrange an event with the clan later. But for now…" He rested his forehead against hers briefly, "Go."

Braced by her father's support, Hinata ventured out into the hall again to return to the building's concourse. There was still time. She did not quite know what to do with herself.

Naturally, Hinata found her way back to a vendor of cinnamon rolls and ordered one. She continued on through the lobby while eating. 'If Naruto-kun were here he would want to stop at that noodle vendor at the end. It looked and smelled wonderful!' She let herself daily and daydream to relax. It would be a little intimidating to stand out in the arena again and hand victory away to Huo, but at least then it would be over. 'Oh, Hanabi would love those fruits on sticks, the shapes are so cute!'

At the central corridor past the off-limits turnstiles, Hinata noticed Sai speaking to a Tide Village ninja. Sai was nodding and telling the young man something, and then pointed him to a stairwell. His Tide acquaintance thanked him and took off running.

That sight…maybe it wasn't so unusual. She finished her roll and licked the sugar from her fingertips. Hinata stopped in the restroom to wash the stickiness from her hands. She soaped up thoroughly and rinsed. She paused at the sink and frowned, then recalling her earlier episode in the bathroom. 'Could it…?' She almost didn't do it. Then she gulped, looked down, and cupped her hands under the tap.

What a wonder! The strange reflection was still there. 'Should I have brought this up to Father?
No…I wouldn't want to alarm him by saying strange things. Not today, at least…' Hinata was acutely intrigued. She made faces at the horned man's reflection, tossed her head side to side to shake her hair, and watched as "his" white locks flipped and furled like her own. Nervous, she laughed at what she was seeing. Did anyone else in the world have this problem? A disjointed reflection?

'If I am not crazy…maybe other people could see it too? If I showed them?' Hinata dropped water in the sink and turned the tap off, looking into the wall mirror, 'I know I have seen him before…
whoever he is. Would I be able to see him if I…?‘ She pursed her lips and decided what the heck, try everything! After several moments of concentration with her Byakugan, and many deep breaths, she searched with a wider, stronger field of vision. A-aaaaand…Nothing.

She pushed further, heightened to the level of the Misago Byakugan and then she did perceive something surprising. Hinata saw no strange reflection in the mirror and paid no mind to the vast, internal workings and minutiae of the stadium…but her blood limit detected her own chakra. There was a peculiarity she had not noticed before. An inner, glowing energy…. But it was his. It was hers.
It was as if he was standing inside of her. 'Whoever you are…um…well…have you always been around?' She wondered,'What is your name?' She was snapped out of it.

Hinata rested her eyes when announcements broadcasted over loudspeakers, requesting the presence of Final Round competitors. She prodded her forehead and frowned, hoping she wasn't going to sprout horns. For now, she had no explanation of what or who her "reflection buddy" was. It would have to wait until later.
Her mind wandered again on the way out of the restroom and through the corridor. She remembered the mission to the Star Village, enjoying her time with that team, the thrill of flying, and the terror of struggling against S-Class nukenin. Hinata passed beneath the archway and into the arena. She recalled having fun at the hot springs with her kunoichi companions. She nearly bubbled over with laughter while remembering the Pre-Tournament festival and all the fun she and her friends had. Hinata crossed the dirt floor of the stadium to where Shikamaru stood alone, waiting for Huo to appear.

She thought of what Sato and Shino had told her earlier that day, in the wake of Tama's match. The injustice of it maddened her. There had been no chance to redeem their friend who had fought so bravely. Had Naruto witnessed what befell Tama, he would not have thought twice about breaking the rules to retaliate against Huo. Rather, Hinata was fairly convinced he would do such a thing. 'Naruto cares more about all of our friends than promotions and pageantry. I know that I do too! I became like him. I can champion others. I can face danger. I can be myself.'

Shikamaru cleared his throat beside her. Hinata looked up and furrowed her brow, seeing Huo in profile as if he had no interest in facing her fully upon his arrival. He was picking at his teeth with his pinky finger. That kind of behavior was obviously ticking off Shikamaru.

It got under her skin too.

'And I don't think that I can forgive...this person. That I can fear this person. I don't. All that I really feel is...' Hinata widened her eyes and inhaled, taken aback that she was feeling true, unfettered anger for the first time. She better understood Sato's ambush on Huo. She understood why the Jounin had been shouting and railing after the panel's decision. It turned out that she too, like many of her Hyuga kin, had hot blood that demanded redress for such a wrongdoing.

Shikamaru was trying to get her attention as she stared straight ahead.

"Hinata." He cleared his throat again, as if trying to give a prompt.

Hinata kept staring. Huo had noticed and turned to face her, inspecting her.

Concerned, Shikamaru tried to nudge her along to forfeiture, "Before I begin the Final Match..."

"I changed my mind." Hinata told him simply, "I want to fight him."

The proctor's blood ran ice-cold, upset that his shirt microphone had been on (to shut up panel complaints) and it broadcasted that the Hyuga kunoichi was going to try her luck against the foreign finalist. Shikamaru grabbed Hinata roughly by the arm, as if to pull her away. He shut the stupid fucking microphone off, because screw the panel, and he had a muttering conversation with Hinata to get to the bottom of her insane choice.

"I was told by four Jounin that you were not going to compete."

"Well they were mistaken." Hinata told him shortly. She had adopted one of Hanabi's disrespectful tones.

"You have to quit. I'm not gonna let you fight." Shikamaru hissed.

"Shikamaru-kun...I don't wish to upset you. But if you continue to stall the Hokage will be very cross."

"The Hokage doesn't want you to fight either." He kept his voice down, but knew Huo could probably hear them.
"I don't care. If I need to surrender, I will." Hinata decided.

"This is fucking crazy. You took a crazy pill." He accused her, at wit's end.

"Please don't worry—"

"Hinata, I have to worry about you. Even if I call a time out and you are ready to forfeit, \textit{that piece of shit}," Shikamaru referred to Huo testily, "Will more than likely attack you because he can, and because I may not be able to stop him."

A crackle of impatient \textit{what's the hold up?} questions sounded over Shikamaru's two-way radio.

"You will not have to step in. He won't be able to surprise me." Hinata determined confidently, "I am not fighting alone today."

"The heck does that mean-?" Shikamaru lifted his radio testily to tell the blabbing elder or councilman or \textit{whoever} to hold on to their horses. He gave a long, severe look to Hinata before giving up, "Alright. I have heard from the Hokage you can do some extraordinary things now."

Hinata nodded to confirm she was all about extraordinary these days.

"Pull out all the stops. If you need me, do the Lee-thumbs-up." Shikamaru advised her. He stepped away to turn to Huo, asking if he was ready.

Incredulously, Huo confirmed, yeah, sure, he was ready. He was unsure if it was a joke or not.

"Begin!" Hating himself, Shikamaru began the match and darted away.

Huo stood there and Hinata evaluated him with her Byakugan, composing herself into a neat and tidy Gentle Fist stance.

"You can't be serious." Huo's voice was flat with disbelief.

In the distance, Hinata heard the frightened, pleading cries of her friends from their lookout.

She took a single step to the right and adjusted the position of her arms, aligning them perfectly for an \textit{Air Palm} if he charged. The sound of spectators was drowned out in her ears. She only heard a soft, whining laugh of amazement escape Huo.

He canted his head to observe her like she was some lost school child, his sinuous smile widening, "You want to fight me? Are you upset that your precious ones crumpled up like cowards? Little girl who helps old men on the street...who follows her big brother and big sister around...!?" Huo started laughing wildly and held the stitch in his side, "Think I didn't see how you all dote on each other...? Heh heh...think that you standing there...means I won't find them?" He was teary-eyed and laboring to catch his breath, he had laughed so hard.

"That I won't find them asleep when the moon is high...? That I saw each and every last one of you...I watched today to be sure it was no contest." Huo straightened up, overwhelmingly cavalier, "I thrive in shadow. The dark is my sword. Do you plan to stay awake each night forever?"

"You won't threaten us anymore-!?" She was not precisely sure when he had kicked her in the side of the head. Hinata tumbled sideways and sprang up, trying to calculate how he had closed the distance.

Her Byakugan was an indispensable resource, as Huo weaved and dashed around her without any of the restraint he had used against Tama in their match. Hinata's blocks and defensive combinations were quick and precise, but he was marching her around in retreat, directing her where he wanted her to go. Much in the way Lee had, Huo had no difficulty folding Hinata's arm up like an accordion during a traditional Jyukken strike. He turned to wallop her with a round kick, but Hinata employed her invented Gentle Step to use a rabbity jump off of his thigh, returning her own kick to his chin. Huo hacked as his head snapped back. They fell away from each other before closing in again.

Her brain was an orchestral conductor in fast-forward, directing her hands and feet simultaneously, white matter kindling, rapidly firing off commands through nerves and synapses. She could not afford a single millisecond of distraction. Huo ducked and whirled at her with untamed Wushu, trying to bat her fingers and hands aside when she became too predictable. Every few seconds she had to reinvent her strikes. It helped when she had been able to sneak a Shadow Clone behind him and it swept his legs out from under him. He looked startled when he fell. With a war cry, Hinata bashed him in the stomach with merciless Jyukken, contacting the transparent Chakra Barrier that had once impeded Tama.

Huo somersaulted backwards and mule-kicked up into the face of the Shadow Clone, destroying it. She rushed at him, forcing her steps and stomps to direct his movements for a change. He bent his neck away from her pinpoint Jyukken jabs, swaying side to side, trading nasty elbow blows and knuckle punches for her elegant slaps and pokes.

To Shikamaru's great consternation, the audience was going just as crazy as Hinata had become. He was going to need ear plugs.

Psychology played a part in the unlikely moment in which Huo made a mistake—his Wushu punch for her neck was caught and pinched in her hand, something Hinata had learned from Lee, and she pulled down and twisted his arm painfully to lock him. He sucked wind in fright. Huo had automatically assumed that this kunoichi was not a competent or creative opponent. She looked dainty and gentle. As his barrier halted a powerful Jyukken stab that followed, Huo reconsidered his lax attitude that reflected in his fighting performance. He assessed and then freed himself from that derisory mind set.

Hinata was following up with a kick that he blocked with his own, and Huo snaked his free arm around her locking arm, winding around it like a vine. With her weight shifted, he easily tripped her and threw her to the ground, kicking sand in her face. Hinata screeched and rolled away like a log, pained, still able to detect him with her blood limit as Huo made hand signs.

"Doton: Shattering Canyon!" He sprang airily to the side as the ground cracked apart and violently submerged, Hinata narrowly avoiding a plunge into the new earth feature. The ground raised up and was hurled at her in fragments with follow-up jutsu, and Hinata did not dare employ her Water Release for fear of strengthening Huo's Earth Techniques.

Eyes tearing, she made leaps and dashes to close the distance, avoiding the obstacles he had conjured. Combining her chase with a Shadow Clone allowed Hinata to steer Huo into a clearer, less rocky area, but Huo took that opportunity to smash a boulder with his heel while simultaneously performing a jutsu. It modified the stone chips into hyper-dense carbon shards, and fired them en masse at his opponent. The attack shredded her clone, and Hinata plunged herself into a Rotation at the last possible moment to protect herself.

When Huo rushed forward with a snarl to attempt close-quarters combat again, Hinata was not shy about signaling for five Shadow Clones to bolt from their hiding spots in debris and ambush him. Her heart pounded in anticipation as several simultaneous 64-point attacks struck Huo's barrier, and she did notice two or three of his tenketsu close in spite of his protection. 'It may not last long! His shield! I know that I can get through it!' She was emboldened. Hinata rushed in to assist her assault team, overwhelming Huo as he maintained a Wushu defense.

He shouted something in Hanwen, greatly irked, and then back-hand sprung away from the encirclement of Hinatas and drew a small utility scroll off of his belt, out of sight beneath his long shirt.

"You seek to make things difficult for me." Huo snapped the parchment open and applied a dot of blood to summon a tool, "But I can make it much more difficult for you."

In the split second Hinata witnessed Huo summon a dao sword, he rushed with an unprecedented amount of speed and Wushu flexibility before she had finished blinking. The first Shadow Clone that was too close succumbed to a high-powered kick in the chin, and in a leaping turn Huo knocked a second clone away, dropping into a low crouch as he turned the dao and his wrist gracefully, bisecting a third clone with shocking ease. He was a marvel. The torque and force of limbs harmoniously jabbing with his sword, a single cutting edge cleaved through clones as if they were softened butter. Hinata backed away before Huo's final, circular low sweep-kick along the ground that paralleled the arc of his sword, dispelling all clones in a putter of smoke.

Then he bore down on her with the weapon, dipping low, twisting his joints and limbs for maximum thrust as he swung at her. Hinata frantically used another Rotation to defend herself.

Huo reeled back as the force of her chakra trang'd off of his blade. He sank low again, resting the dao along his arm as he gathered energy and tapped into the Fènghuáng Tao Art, glowing with its aura. Hinata paused only for a moment before recognizing renewed danger, and with a heaving gasp for air she initiated another Rotation just before he exploded forward with speed. Huo circled around her, a blur of luminous green, blue, and orange energy, and then horizontally swung his dao with as much force as he could muster. The blow vibrated the dome of chakra around Hinata before bashing through, terminating the Rotation and hurling the kunoichi far across the span of the arena. A chorus of disbelieving banter reverberated among the audience.

From her place in the dirt, Hinata was gladdened that Huo took a long moment to gloat at his successful breach of her defense. She laid face-down and discreetly pressed a healing hand to the gash on her shoulder, 'Much like how I plan to break his defense, Huo wants to break mine first. If I can get rid of his sword he shouldn't be able to do that again!' Moderately recuperated, Hinata hopped to her feet and spun with Gentle Step, watching with her Byakugan as Huo charged again. A perfectly formed, full-power Air Palm sailed across the clearing and crashed into him. Huo fell back, striking the ground, and she astutely marked the flickering of his Phoenix Art as it was dismissed to not needlessly drain his reserves.

And then Hinata saw it— Huo sank into the ground in the stretch of shadow cast by the pile of overturned stones. He melted into it as if he were sinking into a pool of water, disappearing into the surface completely. He was gone, entirely gone for a whole moment, and her Byakugan was on high alert when Huo reappeared, exiting from a shadow several paces to her left. 'He moves through shadows! So that is how he closes the gap between himself and an opponent!' She forced pin-point, sharp chakra into the tips of her cupped hands, bending chakra that was strong enough to block Huo's sword strikes as he savagely struck at her, as if trying to chop a tree down.

"This trend of Leaf bimboes fighting battles they can't win— it's tacky and demeaning." Huo brought his face close to Hinata's, spittle flying, pressing his dao into the lit, blue chakra wall of her Divine Protection. "While more pathetic than the men, at least the kunoichi have a touch more courage!" He kicked her knee to bend her leg, but Hinata reacted capably and angled her hands to cut with precise chakra, severing the steel of Huo's dao. The top portion of the blade whistled through air and dropped to the ground, leaving him with a sword hilt and a few centimeters of clipped dao.

Enraged, he hurled his broken weapon aside and gave chase, closer to the arena's wall, and had his Wushu neutralized by her spinning, complete sphere of Divine Protection. Hinata felt reassured that he lacked the strength to break through it with just his bare hands. He would have to expend more energy to injure her. As surely as the sun rose, Huo did tap into his Phoenix Tao Art again, bolstering his strength with its aura…and with great momentum and force he tripped over Hinata as she purposefully fell flat to the ground and scissor-kicked Huo's legs to knock him akimbo.

He lined up ideally with the wall, stutter-stepping to catch himself, and while his back was turned Hinata smashed him with a second formidable vacuum wave as she rose up. Huo was crushed into the stone and plaster face-first, his aura flickering, and Hinata charged at him with a hot-blooded shout.

By then his Tao chakra barrier had been spent, and it only lingered to defend his vulnerable chakra points for a heartbeat before vanishing. Hinata felt the seizing and withering of tenketsu under her fingertips. Then, before she could close 64 points as she had envisioned, Huo had slipped away into an underfoot shadow to escape. Her pointed fingers gouged fearsome holes in the wall when she missed. Hinata spun around and searched with her Kekkei Genkai, desperate to locate him. The balance between Huo's offense and defense seemed to swing too far in the favor of one or the other. As he was more concerned with dealing damage, his own defenses had diminished. ‘He will keep trying to get away from me if he is leaving his body vulnerable…’

Hinata pursued the retreating Iwa nin across the arena, not minding Shikamaru as he anxiously hovered off to the side. She fired another Air Palm at Huo, watching as he ducked beneath it into a shadow, and exited beside her— his ring of Tao Arts illuminated for a major technique. Crazy-eyed and teeth bared, Huo wrapped a hand around her wrist and held his free hand flat in a symbol of Confrontation.

She distinctly felt a shift, a shudder of unusual energy, but could not describe the disparity of Yang particles being ejected away from Huo, leaving only Yin energy behind. And the pull of it expanded their shadows on the ground at their feet, stretching wide, rising up with three-dimensionality, and enveloped them in a large dome of pitch black.

The Shadow Trap terrified Shikamaru as it had swallowed both competitors and hidden them from sight, and there was only a dark dome for spectators to contemplate.

Shikamaru ran up to the strange spectacle of a technique and rested his hand on it, feeling the unbalanced composition, surprised that something overloaded with Yin Energy took a physical form. "This can't…how…? I thought Yang is what builds physical properties…” He pounded on it with a fist. Sturdy. Oh that was not good. He could not see through it and was unable to budge it. Shikamaru backed up and held a hand sign for his Shadow Bind, prodding at the dome with his own Yin manipulation. 'Is this even chakra doing this?' It didn't feel like it.

Beads of sweat streaked down the sides of his face as he gradually realized that he was feeding the dome with his tendril of shadow. Quickly, Shikamaru withdrew his technique and pulled the two-way radio from his pocket.

"Hokage-sama, this is officially a timeout, but I reserve the right to call this whole thing off. This goddamn dome is impenetrable. Over." He waited worriedly as the radio crackled before Tsunade's response.

"I'll be right down." She assured him.
He also received communications from Gaara, Yugao, and an auxiliary radio that Kakima was likely sharing with Kakashi's group. Frustrated, Shikamaru switched the channel to call the decision panel, expecting Elder Tatesono to answer him when he asked for assistance. Shimura Danzo's voice fizzled back to him instead.

"Nara-san, what is the nature of the issue? That jutsu is opaque and will obstruct your judgements."

"No kidding." Shikamaru bit his tongue so he wouldn't get too sassy at the unconcerned Foundation director, "Do you have anyone who is familiar with Yin or Yang Release? That's the nature of the problem. I need someone to look at it. Over."

Danzo also volunteered to inspect it.

Within minutes, most radio holders had gathered in the arena to evaluate the anomaly and tried to dispel it. What a rare intermission it was to have a congregation of high-ranking ninja examining an impervious Shadow Dome. Shikamaru was disconcerted to see Tsunade and Gaara's combined efforts to crush or puncture the dome yielded no change. For good measure, Tsunade punched it a second time. She stepped away and stopped beside Gaara, sighing and rubbing her fist.

"This defies what typifies Yin Release jutsu: they are intangible, visionary, complex techniques…not a physical manifestation…" Tsunade cocked her hip and folded her arms, staring straight ahead at the dome, "And whatever Huo is doing in there…he doesn't want Hinata to have any help whatsoever."

"He was tiring." Gaara pointed out, "He opened his defense carelessly more than once."

"Maybe so, but now he has this." Tsunade pointed her thumb at the black vault.

Tsunade turned to Danzo, who was a few meters away from Kakashi and his posse of panicked Jounin. The old man pressed the pad of his thumb to the dome, frowning and feeling around. He whacked at it with his cane and a spiral of Wind Nature chakra gusted off of the obstacle ineffectively. Danzo muttered to himself before crossing over to the Hokage.

"I applied a Yin-Counter-Seal." He informed her, "On the opposite side, Kakima-san and Kakashi-san also applied their own. All three were utterly inadequate and it seems…this dome is not responding to Sealing Counters." He rubbed his chin in bafflement, "Has there ever been a technique that did not recalibrate its light and dark properties immediately after such an intervention?"

"I am not the one to ask." Tsunade was tense, pushing past the gathering that was starting to flock to her, distressed and helpless. She lightly patted Kakashi's arm as he struggled to tamper with the dome. "Kakashi."

"Hokage-sama."

"Counter Sealing seems to be…" She growled furiously and trailed off, "It is never not effective. What is the meaning of this?"

"It's a Tao Art." Kakashi explained quietly, "This isn't something we can deconstruct with Ninjutsu."

"Then what do you suggest?"

"I have no suggestions. Only another Tao Art could break it down."

"Then where do I find a Tao Art Counter?" The Hokage sniffed.

"You don't." Kakashi's shoulders sagged as he admitted it, "No one in this village alive today can use them."

"That…is not the answer I was looking for." She walked on, heels crunching on gravel, and motioned for him to follow her. They reunited with the small forum of concerned veterans and on-hand experts.

Many were sparing sympathetic looks to several Hyuga clan members who had descended and were agitatedly striking the dome, peering with their Blood Limits to discover that not even the Byakugan could see past the dense dark. Hyuga Hanabi had also arrived at the scene and was shrilly screaming her sister's name as she lashed out at the dome, over and over until Hyuga Hideyasu picked her up. She protested and thrashed as he escorted her away to reduce the histrionics.

As other Hyuga clansmen dejectedly joined conferencing veterans and responders, Hiashi stood alone, patting his hands along the dome.

"Someone should tell him." Kakashi recommended, looking from Tsunade and Gaara to Kurenai, who was wringing her hands apprehensively, "This match wasn't supposed to take place. He's going to want to blame someone if anything happens."

"She will be fine." Kurenai asserted severely.

"I know we want to believe that—" Kakashi stopped speaking when she bumped shoulders with him, hurrying over to a gaggle of Sarutobi clan ninja. Kakima and Asuma crossed the area towards Hiashi, following behind Sarutobi Netsuke, the de facto leader of their clan and conspicuously clean-shaven veteran. Shikamaru also joined the group who seemed to have some kind of idea of how to respond. Netsuke waved a hand at Konohamaru dismissively as his son showed up for a piece of the action, and Ebisu-sensei graciously led the boy away before he was entangled in the drama.

Netsuke looked from his brother and Kurenai, who were boring holes into his head with their gazes…and then to his mumbling, right-hand-woman wife, Kakima. She was snickering and speaking quietly in patchwork Nihongo-Hanwen to Wong Leung, who Netsuke had delivered out from the audience.

"Can you ask him if he can bring it down?" Netsuke asked her, "It got around the radio-com grapevine that he understands Tao Arts."

"Don't get your hopes up." Kakima sighed and spoke to the old man, "Wong, can you or your grandkid…? "Uh…can you disengage…" She had to improvise words she did not know, This technique? The bubble?"

I doubt it. He replied honestly, Let me have a look, Lady Monkey.

Wong Leung tottered up to the black structure, and Hiashi stepped aside to give him space for an examination. He analyzed it with finger pokes and a good sniff of the nose. The old man clapped his hands, bent at the knees, and then palm-slapped the dome with a cry. He grumbled to himself when nothing happened. Kakima stopped beside him, expecting an update.

I never was any good at these spells. Wong Leung confessed, That is why I was not taken as a disciple of a Tao Master when I was young…though I had desperately wanted to be trained. I lack enough cultivation qi…

So you can't break it? Kakima confirmed.

I am sorry, Lady Monkey. I am just…not strong enough to trifle with so much Dark Qi. Wong watched forlornly as she crossed back to Netsuke to confirm their fears. He then looked to Hiashi, who had his curled fist and forehead pressed to the dome, his eyes closed, as if his thoughts alone could bring it down.

"Your daughter." Wong Leung pointed out the obvious in Nihongo, getting Hiashi's attention, "Can hear."

"What?" Hiashi raised his eyebrows at him, "Yes, of course she can. I regret that we are meeting under these dreadful circumstances, good elder. I know that you have done a great deal for my nephew, Neji."

Wong nodded, "Neji…done much for me…and grandson too."

Hiashi chuckled faintly, surprised that even in this, one of the lowest moments of his life, there was a touch of grace in it.

"Your daughter…can't see. Can't see out." Wong Leung went on to explain his point as best he could, "But…she will hear." He tapped his finger against the dome, "She needs to hear…not alone."

"Ah." Hiashi understood Wong's meaning, "Thank you."

Wong then had an epiphany, deciding that he should pass the suggestion along to Kakima, who could confirm to other good souls in the Leaf Village to shout and communicate their feelings to the trapped she-ninja. He hurried back to his Lady Monkey friend.

From her position, Tsunade wondered if maybe the Head of the Hyuga clan was losing his mind when he started shouting and telling his daughter to blow a hole through Huo's chest.

As soon as Hinata had been absorbed into the dark Tao Art, things calmed.

Huo walked away from her casually and shook out his arms and legs, rolling his neck to relax. She stared in shock, wondering if she was imagining the sudden ceasefire. He stood below the center of the dark canopy, the dimness obscuring his facial features. Huo adjusted his rumpled clothes and then tended to his messy braid. Guardedly, Hinata stood near the wall of the dome, discouraged that she could not see beyond it with her Byakugan.

"Don't bother." Huo told her, presuming that she was searching for an exit.

"W-What is this?" She demanded.

"Welcome to Limbo. It is the small rift in our reality that allows Tao-Gifted or Sighted to Shadow Step. Think of it as the underbelly of our dimension. All of the things you can't touch…the intangible. The vast." He explained in boredom, "In here, I do not need to use Shadow Step against you. I have the most strength here, in shadow. Anything you do will be useless."

"I can do more than you realize." Hinata warned him in a chirp.

"Perhaps." Huo settled down in seated squat. He folded his hands and shut his eyes. Hinata realized he was trying to replenish his strength. He was resting.

She very clearly heard the hollering of Hanabi, who may have been just beyond the wall of the dome. Hinata swallowed, considering that she could try to delay any further fighting and wait for outside assistance. Belatedly, she remembered that there may not be a way for her comrades to intervene against a Tao Art. She narrowed her eyes and examined Huo.
"What is it that you want?" Hinata asked.

He opened a monolid eye and replied, "To kill you."

"Why?"

"Because she cares for you. When all of you are gone, she will give in more easily." He shut his eyes and smiled to himself. "You know nothing about hunting games, you silly pearl. Sheltered jewels like you have no need to kill and prevail over your competitors."

"I have killed before." It was a feeble threat, even with her hands poised, drawing nearer to him to spring for an attack. "It was not a game. I didn't enjoy it. It was terrible and frightening."

"Everyone enjoys the act...or if not the act, the result. If it isn't the euphoria or excitement that satisfies you...then the relief of safety will." Huo dismissed her lily-livered objection, "Apparently it isn't your sport. Soon, that isn't going to matter."

There was a rustle of her footsteps over the ground, and the cry of Hiashi's voice, urging her to strike. Hinata pounced in the gloom, prepared to jab Huo's heart with merciless Jyukken...and he reached up a hand to halt her arm. She caught his free hand before he could retaliate and stand. And then...he felt a bit foolish for underestimating her bloodthirst or desperation, as he felt the Shadow Clone she had snuck behind him cutting into his neck with a glowing, pin-point needle of chakra. Huo howled angrily and twisted himself, snapping out his leg, knocking the clone over, and Hinata was tossed and she rolled in the dirt, in the dark. Huo jumped up and swiped the blood away from his throat.

He formed hand seals, and Hinata coordinated a timely Air Palm with her Shadow Clone, hoping to catch him from two angles. Huo leapt and corkscrewed in the air to avoid the vacuum waves, snarling, and completed preparations for his superlative Ninjutsu, "Inton: Limbo Fire!" He took a deep breath and exhaled thin line of flame that was attracted to the black awning above them, igniting the interior of the dome with wisped, pale green fire. The savage heat prickled her skin and forced her closer to the center of the space. Hinata's Shadow Clone had a brief struggle against Huo, putting up with his Wushu until he pulled down an orb of fire at will from the burning shade above them.

He burned the clone's face until it was destroyed, departing in smoke. Hinata's only sensible option was to work in the safe space she had, keeping the crazed Iwa nin at a distance with ranged vacuum waves. Delighted, Huo leapt with a spinning kick to launch spheres of jade flame at her. Hinata reacted automatically, using a Rotation to protect herself...and quickly realized it could not keep harm at bay. She felt her hair, skin, and clothes burning as if she were standing prone. Panic had a brief war with sensibility inside her mind, fearing a painful death...and up from the deep stillness of her consciousness she finally felt a droplet. A tear rolling down her cheek. The thought relieved her.

Hinata plunged her Water Nature into her Rotation, effectively absorbing the volatile Fire Nature.

Not to be cowed, Huo roared and spent tremendous chakra trying to incinerate her, getting in close to direct the flames with Wushu.

She could hear encouragements from her father outside; hear him citing their lessons— how Hanabi and he were both Water Natures just as she was. A proud family inheritance. Use it. Fight. 'Use what he taught me!' She clashed with all of her strength, battering Huo with slaps that crashed over him, wet and thundering like a waterfall. Though his jutsu leached off of the energy of his Tao Art, is was tapering off in the presence of her prevailing Nature. Her clothes were burning. Her skin was raw and pink from burns. It was a duel in an oven...and no longer dark. Before exhaustion crept up inescapably on her, Hinata poured the last of her concentration into the Misago Byakugan, hoping to see the way out.

The swirling pattern of the dome...the interchange of energy was questionable and unstable. She could see it plainly then — the absence of Yang when all chakra preferred a balance of light and dark... 'His Tao Art will expire!' A final push could do it, could destabilize the terrible, hellish prison tied to his stamina. With a sound that travelled up from her toes, screeching ferociously, Hinata channeled more than a drop; she channeled a river that she pictured in her mind and felt in her veins, funneling it through her chakra and into a single vacuum wave that Huo could not hide or duck away from.

He blinked as his fire was devoured, almost as if a lion's head crested an ocean wave...and he was swept away, half-aware of the crumbling of the dark dome. Huo was flung out of it by the force of Hinata's last ditch technique. Out in the day-lit world again, it appeared as if the ocean had surged up in the stadium. Huo scrambled to safety and gulped down air.

Hiashi heard a piercing, warlike shriek. A tingle of intuition warned him to retreat, and he did so as he motioned for other baffled Leaf ninja to do the same. Some did not react as quickly as they could have— a calamitous, crashing flood broke out of the dome as it cascaded into nothingness, expired, and the waves swept the Hokage, Kazekage, and several others away, flattening them against the stadium's walls in a violent rush of water.

The Sarutobi bunch and their elderly friend were safe in the stands, watching from a distance. Kakashi and other Jounin checked in with Tsunade as the water technique abated at the arena's edge, "Are you alright, Hokage-sama?"

She batted them away, aggravated, "Do I not look alright?" She brushed a sopping wet strand of hair from her face and tried to neaten herself, her vanity Genjutsu still in effect, "That was unexpected and rude."

"Thank goodness it happened!" Kurenai was thrilled.

Shikamaru was forced away from Hinata and Huo's game of tag as another wave artificially created a churning sea in the arena. He flagged the stragglers down and shouted for them to move up to the observation deck. All did as he directed, flabbergasted that Hinata had wrestled away control from her opponent. The water receded and spilled into open passageways in the stadium, drying out the arena again.

For a time, Hinata had chased Huo with Twin Lion Fists, hoping to use the last ounce of her strength to flatten him into the dirt. There was no telling if cowardice or the hope of outlasting her prompted Huo to flee in and out of shadows with his Shadow Step. He had less gusto for fighting, with his chakra dwindling so. As it stood, Hinata also was scrounging around the dredges of her reserves to attack him.

Huo found a hiding place in a crevasse, although there was no hiding from her Blood Limit. Hinata stood still, oxygenating and shaking, the truth dawning on her. She had no chakra left that she could spend. She was badly burned. Hinata might call it a glass half full for her to survive Huo's fiendish technique...and then be too winded to knock him unconscious at the finale.

She stared ahead, her mouth quivering sadly as she observed lovely celestial shapes transcending the threads of the world's reality...transparent pictograms and symbols, distant and near all at once. There would be no use in employing the Misago Byakugan when she could barely stand. She felt that her legs would give out soon.
Maybe she was punch drunk? Hinata was seeing less of the stadium's arena and more of a sprawling green lawn. Also, it felt like she had just taken a big slurp of miso soup. She was rather hungry.

"What am I—?" Her thoughts crashed into a traffic jam of sensory input. Her consciousness was staying put, but it was also trying to jump ship again.

And Naruto was not so surprised this time.

Whoa! Hinata? He laughed out loud, elated by her arrival. She felt him setting aside his lunch bowl. Naruto was seated on the porch of a house. Back again already! How'd it go? What're ya up to-?

NARUTO.

He nearly fell backwards she thought at him so hard.

Please! I need you here! I need to borrow some chakra...or at least one very good punch. She requested, May I—?

Not that her asking permission to borrow his consciousness and chakra reserves mattered. Instantly, the young man found he was no longer seated outside of Fukasaku and Shima's house enjoying a lunch break. She had commandeered his intangible faculties, placing Naruto smack in the middle of a bedraggled-looking Konoha Sports Stadium.

Holy shit! I was going to tell you to take what you need...but uh...I guess I'm here now. Naruto found it quite convenient that he communicated directly to her head, no speech required. The body he was in— her body, he noted— was about to topple over and take a long nap. But a second wind had come to Hinata as the unfathomable reservoir of his chakra bolstered her, letting her perk up and stand straighter. Ow! What hurts so much?

"I was burned." She muttered to herself, rubbing her arms down with a healing light, "This will help me feel a little better...thank you!"

Sure, no problem. Wait. Burned? What's going on?

"Look there." Hinata waited for Naruto to realize he too was seeing through her Byakugan, spying the gutless Iwa nin hiding in a ditch, trying to gather some energy.

Huh. Is he like missing some hair or something?

"Naruto...that is my Final Match opponent, Huo. He's hurt so many people today; threatened to kill us...mocked and tormented us..." She explained on the way, navigating towards Huo's shelter, "He can move through shadows with Shadow Step! He will be difficult to catch."

That so...? No. He won't be difficult to catch. Naruto corrected her, I can catch anything now.

"Naruto—"

Yeesh, he looks exhausted. You and I aren't! It might take me a second to get used to...seeing everything with the Byakugan. And understand whatever jutsu that jerk uses—

"Wushu! Tao Arts-!"

Yup. Got it. He had no idea what those terms meant, Gonna have to see for myself... Let's smoke him out of his fox hole!
Wide-eyed, Hinata drew her lips into a thin line as she allowed Naruto to take over for a moment, forming the hand seal for a Shadow Clone with her hands. A bevy of smoke clouds formed and dispersed, stuffing the arena full of Hinata-doppelgangers.

From his place on the lookout, Shikamaru swore loudly at the miracle he was witnessing. He would estimate that Hinata was about to collapse from chakra exhaustion…and then she pulled out a Mass Shadow Clone Jutsu from her hat of tricks. Now he'd seen it all.

A lone Shadow Clone dove down into the ditch like a paratrooper, confronting Huo. Meanwhile, Naruto was steering Hinata and accidentally thwarting her brain-mandated motor functions. She was chastising him gently for the hassle. Mostly, he was enamored of the dozens of beautiful, albeit singed clones of his girlfriend standing by in the stadium.

She felt her mouth hanging open—his doing. She clapped her hands over her face and tried to get the grip that Naruto just couldn't seem to get.

Hinata! You grew your hair out! It's way longer than I thought-! Whoa. What's this-? What are you wearing? He lifted her arms, turning her head to gander at the lavender ensemble, I could just…

"Naruto, please! I need your help with finishing this match!" She squealed bashfully. She was flattered that he was reeling over her appearance.

I could just drop dead you are so gorgeous. How about—?

Her brain shoved him away from the controls, leaping as Huo burst from his hiding place, scattering stones and earth, and lunged through the dense throng of clones. The look on the Iwa nin's face was skeptical. This massive crowd of kunoichi was certainly fake. It was only after he had Wushu punched, locked, and smashed a dozen Shadow Clones before Huo realized he was not trapped in a Genjutsu. Every single last bunshin was real, and they were attacking more carefully, calculating his reactions and tailoring their combinations to him.

He ducked under two Air Palms before a third struck him, hurling him sideways, and Huo bellowed in frustration. He thrashed a hand at Hinata while kicking a clone in the mouth, "How are you doing this, wench? You depleted everything you had to escape me!"

"Obviously not, baldbrow!" Hinata retorted and then blanched at her words. Naruto was talking. She wrestled that feature back for a moment.

Ah, well, that made Huo even angrier. He slipped from place to place with Shadow Step, methodically avoiding Shadow Clones and picking them off individually as he flitted to safety.

He's a slippery sucker, isn't he? Naruto was thrilled, sky-high, brimming with her adrenaline. I'm gonna try something that's more my style. Whatever you're doing— that attacking with Air-Hands-thingy— try getting a clone or two do that and move him closer to us!

"What are we-?" She decided not to question it. Hinata motioned for nearby Shadow Clones to approach in a pincer movement where Huo was exiting from a shadow on the arena floor.

She charged with another pack of clones on her left and right, watching in amusement as it panned out like clockwork. Huo avoided the Air Palms and Shadow Stepped toward the offending clones, picking the both of them off.

He never, ever expected the head-butt.
Huo's eyes crossed, air crushed out of him as he was flung back into the fist of another kunoichi clone… and the clone punched him like a truck, upward, and its comrade clones kicked the grandstander simultaneously into the air. Huo's head was terribly rattled as he soared through open air, hearing an unusual cry with each hit, "Hy-uu-ga-!" Then, a clone's somersaulting heel drop came from above, "Hinata Barrage!"

Huo cracked a front tooth when he hit the ground mouth-first. Distressed and bloodied, Huo sunk down into the safety of a shadow to steal away.

"That worked!" Hinata was riveted, "We can coordinate something like that again!"

Heck yeah, he ain't so tough! Doesn't look like anyone is on his side today!

"No one was." Hinata confirmed, "I believed I wasn't fighting alone today. I believed it!"

You better believe it girl! Whoa— what's he doing now? Naruto inquired as Huo's Phoenix Tao Art aura flared to life on the far side of the arena, He's all glowy.

"Naruto, that's the Tao Art that empowers him! He won't be able to hold it for very long…" She passed along the facts, "His Wushu, um, Taijutsu is much stronger when he uses that technique."

For emphasis, Huo was laying waste to Hinata's army of Shadow Clones. Naruto frowned in disapproval with Hinata's face.

A team of Shadow Clones wizened up and spread out, hurling themselves into Rotations to preserve themselves. This instance, however, clued Huo into who the originator was. Closing the gap between them, he plowed into Hinata with a Phoenix Aura wing, flinging her across the arena with a guttural snarl.

On the cross-stadium flight, Naruto reached out with one of Hinata's hands and planted a Jutsu Formula, brushing it from her finger and onto the dirt floor. They tucked and rolled to come to a safe stop.

"What was that, Naruto? On my hand?"

My formula. We might need it, if he's going to be all tough-nut and crazy at us. He brushed Hinata's clothes of dirt and stammered when he accidentally touched her chest. That faux pas was overlooked when Huo came charging again, weaving away from the last infantry of seven Shadow Clones.

"What does the formula do?" Hinata asked, breathing heavily, joining her clones in distracting Huo, hoping to open his now very-strict defense.

We can jump to it with Flying Thunder God. That'll get him. We'll plant a big one right on his ugly mug!

Covertly, while being terrorized by Huo's fire-breathing and rampant Wushu, Hinata let Naruto apply his small formula seals throughout the arena. Her head was nearly kicked off her shoulders by a flying Phoenix Kick, but Naruto retreated to let Hinata's instincts take over, and she defended against the attack with a Divine Protection wall. Two Shadow Clones dashed to her aid and blasted Huo away with vacuum waves, skid marks scoring the diameter of the stadium as he ingrained his feet.

Her clones were throttled, finally outdone by Huo's aura and quick Shadow Step. Naruto borrowed control again, apologizing, and asked Hinata to take a few deep breaths and act as a sentinel while he sensed around her chakra paths and got a feel for shape manipulation.

We're both right-handed, yeah? Well it doesn't matter; I'll get this going… Naruto was responsible for Hinata sticking her tongue out of her mouth in concentration, and also spinning the start of the Rasengan in the palm of her hand. She kept track of Huo with her Byakugan, watching him stalk and dash through shadows like a beast, making his approach toward her again—a single target.

'Naruto, how can I use the Rasengan without missing him? He might-!

Hey beautiful, we're not letting him come to us, we're gonna jump to him! See him hopping? Always through shadows right? If we stand over here in this sunny patch...he's gonna pop out of that big 'ol shadow from that rock pile in front of us. Predictable schmuck.

'We put a seal there?'

Yeah, I feel it. I mean, we rolled around and marked a lot of spots, but that's one of them. We can always try another position if this one doesn't work out. He weighed her hand down with a condensed, metric ton of chakra, But if that guy can keep walking after this...well damn. Even Ero-sensei needs a while to get over a hit from Big Ball Rasengan. That old fart.

In a blink, Huo disappeared. Hinata felt her heart fluttering in her ribcage, frightful.

Don't worry! Pound that asshole's freaking face in with this! You do the honors. I'll just flash for ya!

"Naruto..." Her voice was warbling.

You already won, look at that chump! He doesn't want to accept it. He's too proud to give up, so he'd prefer to learn the hard way. Hey! There he goes...

Huo indeed flung himself out of the quarry's shadow, airborne in a leap, aglow with his Tao Art. Guided by an intuitive motion, Naruto indicated she should turn, and Hinata spun and built momentum as if she were attacking someone behind her. Instantly, she was repositioned, following through with the motion. Courtesy of Naruto's remarkable flash of speed, Hinata realized she was abruptly teleported behind Huo. And to vent some pent up aggression, Hinata righteously let out a howl as she slammed the swirling ball of energy into the brute, "Rasengan!"

'Oh...' It did far more damage than she expected it to.

Huo's inertia was an enigma of physics, velocity changing hazardously, crushing him down into the earthen floor in a crater that most meteorites could not boast after striking the planet. His Phoenix Tao Art flickered out like the final wheeze of a basement lightbulb. Debris scattered everywhere in a dusty plume, and Hinata shut her eyes and mouth to avoid eating dirt, still able to track Huo with the Byakugan. By the look of it, he had several broken bones…and a few of his fingers were not at their correct angles. In that moment, he had not been attempting to defend himself at all. Now, Huo was clinging to consciousness by a thin thread, groaning in pain.

Still skipping with momentum, Hinata back-flipped to correct herself and stuck the landing. In that instant of peace, Naruto was tickled by errant hair displaced on her nose, and he blew it aside playfully.

Wow, I cannot wait to run my hands through this hair! Oh. Duh. He carded her fingers through it.

'Naruto!' Hinata could hear his internal chortling. She looked back at Huo, shocked that he had some semblance of willpower to sneak off through a shadow again, 'He's trying to get away!'
Yeah, like that's gonna happen with his leg all busted up like it is! Get 'em!

Hinata bounded after Huo, ignoring the deafening ovation in the stadium, and with a Gentle Step flourish she whirled, knocking Huo's injured leg with her foot. He yelped and buckled, in too sunny a spot to flee, and Hinata bore down on him with a 64-point strike. Naruto noted the tiny, pinhead-sized tenketsu along Huo's chakra pathways, the internal injuries that the Rasengan had inflicted on Huo, and the pounding, terrified heartbeat in Huo's chest as his Wushu hand locks were molasses-slow compared to Hinata's tried and true Hyuga conclusion.

His front row seat of the motions, the breathing, the strikes, the footwork, the light and lithe body that bombarded the cowering Iwa nin, knocking him back and back again until he was spread-eagle on the ground…Naruto was educated by the experience. Was she ever amazing, 'I am so happy I got to be here with you…I've missed you so much! We kicked ass! Though you did most of the legwork before I got here…' His girlfriend. His darling…

Hinata—Naruto startled, his vision compromised as he began to see a stretch of green lawn ahead of him once more, surrounded by sights and scents of the Toad Valley. He called out to her with his mind as the connection wore out, trying to hold on to that fiber from her Kekkei Genkai. But the technique was spent, and her concentration had wavered, and so it dropped Naruto off to leave him safely on the lush mountain in his own body.

Hinata stood shivering and did not lower her arm as she stared down at Huo. He was crumpled up, unconscious.

When she felt a hand touch her shoulder, Hinata spooked with a squeak. Shikamaru gave her a dubious look and asked if she was all in one piece, definitely alive, and what in the blazes had he just seen?

She stuttered in an attempt to explain, but trailed off tiredly. Shikamaru kneeled down beside Huo to determine the extent of his ass-beating. With his shirt mic off, he lifted his radio to give a cheerful report to several anxious parties.

Every single ache and sting came flooding back, making Hinata wince and shrug her shoulders, bracing her legs in the hope she would not tip over. Curiously, most of her burns had healed, but a few other nicks and sprains remained. She shut her eyes and tried to breathe, noting Naruto's absence. 'Naruto-kun…I'm sorry that I couldn't keep you here longer. If only for a few more moments of talking…that would've been nice.' She sighed heavily, 'I always feel as if you are there for me in every way…in everything I do! And you were! You helped me achieve something important for our village and our friends!'

Hinata batted her lips, thirsty, and then gave Shikamaru a strange look as he ceremoniously took her hand and raised her arm high. She balked at him as he made a new announcement, "Per the review of the Leaf Village's decision panel and my calling, the winner of the Final Round Match and champion of the annual Chunin Selection Exam Tournament is Hyuga Hinata!"

She was grateful that Shikamaru braced her back when she nearly stumbled, jarred by the cheering and fanfare of the stadium's spectators. She shyly peeked around the circumference of the arena, unaccustomed to the public eye and pure mayhem of tournament attendees fussing over or lauding the last match of the Exam. She felt a fidget coming on. Not long after Shikamaru's calling, medic-nin assembled under the watch of the Security force to extricate Huo from the arena. At about the same time, Hinata turned about and was frontally mashed into Sakura, smothered by the hugs of friends as Shino, Lee, Ino, Chouji, and Kiba arrived to blare congratulations.

"You fibber!" Sakura was holding her head, teary-eyed and grinning, "You said you weren't going to fight! Don't you realize how dangerous that was?"

"Of course!" Hinata could not speak over the din of her friends, Shikamaru included.

"What was that? At the end! Holy—!"

"Truly an incredible match, Hinata-sama!"

"You should have seen how distraught the Jounin were when that Shadow Dome went up!"

"—that coward…"

"How the heck did you learn how to do that?"

"Angel-face exterior, badass interior." That one was Ino.

"N-No, I just did what any of us would have tried to do!" Hinata tried to downplay it.

The huddle loosened up and gave the champion some space, quieting down when the Village Leaders came forward to acknowledge Hinata. Tsunade looked as if she were still drying off after being splashed. She rested her hands on Hinata, going over a few noticeable injuries with a healing light. "Young lady, your actions during the match were much too reckless for me to label that good judgement. I hope you know that you didn't have to go so far to be recognized." The Hokage admonished her, "While you were trapped, half of your clan was down here and about ready to howl at the sky in a panic."

"I did not mean to worry or upset anyone. I…um, it was that I…" Hinata folded her hands and said, "I knew I could do it."

"Hmm." Tsunade tilted her head towards Gaara, "What do you think, Kazekage-sama?"

"I think you should welcome her into your service as your newest Chunin." Gaara recommended warmly.

Teasingly, Tsunade smiled and determined, "Well, if the Kazekage is convinced…allow me to confer Chunin Rank upon you here, Hinata. In view of all those who watched you today, no one can dispute your aptitude."

"T-Thank you, Tsunade-sama." She peeped.

"Also." The Hokage lowered her voice and leaned in near Hinata's ear, "You're going to need to explain a few things for me tomorrow."

"I understand-!"

Tsunade was patting her shoulder again, barking grievances at the group of Jounin who were crossing over to join the rabble. Hinata gladly accepted a hug from Gaara afterward as he told her, "Some of your talents…seemed very familiar to me."

"On my own I wouldn't be able to use—"

"You don't have to validate what happened. We both know that Naruto did not want to miss out on this Exam." Gaara assured her, "He can't help himself, obviously."

She giggled at the notion and then graciously accepted compliments from Natsuhi the Hoshikage and Tazuna the Bridge Builder. The frenzy of people and felicitations dragged for a while before Hinata notified Sakura of her intention to slip away for air. Handily, she slinked off and through a concourse passageway before members of the decision panel arrived to offer their stiff sentiments. That segment of interior corridor was not yet bustling, and Hanabi easily found her sister there. She seized Hinata in a running hug.

"Oh! Careful! I'm feeling weak now." Hinata informed her, "Hanabi, I—"

"You scared me." Hanabi squished her sister's cheeks, adding, "You scared Dad! Everyone! And then you were cracking out of the black thing and— Water Release! And those jutsu! How did you use them?"

"I can tell you all about it later. At home… just the two of us, if that's what you would like." Hinata pried Hanabi's hands from her face and squeezed them, "I could hear you calling to me."

"…yeah." Her sister's eyebrows sloped, still a touch unnerved.

"Thank you."

Hanabi sniffed and waved off the sentiment, "Ah, what good did it do anyway? We just made ourselves look like screaming lunatics in public. Our clan Elders are going to be thrilled."

"Aren't they always?" They reveled in their hug for a bit longer before Hinata notified her, "I want to go ahead to tell Neji-niisan! Can you find Father and everyone else who would like to stop by the hospital?"

"Sure. Dad's been looking around for that old Master Neji-niisan trains with. He said he wants to thank him. Pft." Hanabi shrugged, "I'll tell him."

They parted and set out in opposite directions. Hinata scooted off, ahead of the crowds that were beginning to trickle out of the building to exits. She followed the Main Avenue uptown, jogging only part of the way before she slowed to save her strength. Hinata smiled to herself as she trotted through automatic doors, imagining what her big brother and big sister would have to say. Then she was stopped at the front desk by a gruff secretary.

"Chunin Exam?" The clerk drawled.

"Yes. I want to visit a patient." She nodded politely.

"Sorry, but it looks like you need to be admitted. You're pretty banged up."

Hinata's default smile wavered, "I'm only here to visit right now. I would rather rest at home."

The secretary leaned forward to get a whiff of her clothes, "Were you lit on fire or something? Come on now, you'll need medical—" He trailed off, intimidated by the stare of her Byakugan as Hinata leaned over the counter herself, veins bristling at the corners of her eyes.

"I am here for a visit." She repeated.

"R-Right. Which patient?" He squawked.

"Hyuga Neji."

"Ah. Just a second..." The secretary skimmed down the list, "He is on the second floor in room 240. Please note that visiting hours wrap up at 10:00PM—" Hinata walked away before he completed his routine chattering.
She carried on down the hallway, hoping she didn't look too worse for the wear. A few nurses did double-takes at her as she walked by. On the second floor, Hinata stopped in a restroom to examine herself and was taken aback by the smudges on her face, her knotted hair…and the tatters and tears on her outfit, somewhat charred and not at all as presentable as she had looked that morning. Hinata splashed her face at a sink and rubbed the dirt off; a rudimentary fix.

Out in the hallway within the east wing of the hospital, it was tranquil and had fewer roaming nurses. Hinata felt she could get away with racing down the final stretch, counting off room numbers. Then, she excitedly burst into room 240 with an announcement, "I did it!"

Sleepy, surprised yelps sounded as Hinata stood in the doorway and saw that she had loudly awoken Neji, and curled up beside him, Tenten sat up in alarm and blinked her eyes rapidly. They calmed down and regarded Hinata, noting the time on the wall clock.

"Oh! Were you resting? I'm sorry!" Hinata held up her hands apologetically.

"No, it can wait, get over here." Tenten demanded, stretching out her questionable arm to the girl. Hinata walked up to the side of the bed and moved into the hug gladly, "It looks to me like you didn't surrender…and that is just so…"

"I know, Onee-san, it was impulsive to fight Huo."

Neji also sat up. He did it carelessly and banged the top of his head on the extended arm of the vitals monitor beside the bed. He groaned and pressed a hand to the new lump.

"Impulsive is not the term I would use when discussing Huo. We planned all day about how to deal with him!" Tenten reprimanded Hinata before doing a 180, and softly asked, "But you're okay?"

"I'm fine! I won!"

Her bed-tousled elders made sounds of jubilant triumph and worried astonishment. They were a bit grabby too. They sandwiched her in a hug, sighing. Neji muttered a scolding at his cousin, shocked and relieved, "We did most everything we could to make it so you wouldn't have to face him…don't be so rash, in the future."

"I won't, Onii-san." She moved to sit on the edge of the bed.

Tenten lifted a strand of Hinata's hair and passed it under her nostrils, "Whoa. Were you burned? You're definitely going to have to trim these ends…"

"Yes, Huo did his very best to light me on fire while I was cornered by a Tao Art." Hinata nodded as she recalled it, "But it empowered my Water Release."

"Thank goodness." Tenten patted her and grinned, "I guess if you were able to waterlog me, it couldn't be any more difficult to drown his sorry ass."

"It wasn't that hard at all!"

Neji asked at length, "Is that how you defeated him?"

"I…well…not exactly."

They gave her long, wordless, expectant looks.

"Um…” Hinata poked her fingers together shyly, "Recently, I've learned that when I use the Misago Byakugan…it allows me to overlap my consciousness with someone else's. Sometimes."

"We have heard about that." Neji granted.

"Today I...borrowed someone else's consciousness. And chakra...and jutsu."

"Aaah..." Tenten smiled and waggled her eyebrows at Hinata knowingly, "We girls were talking about that earlier!"

"Well I don't want to discuss it here— at home would be better-!" Hinata chirped.

Neji did not quite get it. Borrowed chakra and jutsu? Whose? How he lamented not being there to watch Hinata's match.

Then, a loud crash outside caught their attention. Hinata lightly hopped up from the bed, wondering what the source of the rabble was coming from the hallway. As she curiously, cautiously poked her face out of room 240, she saw that Sakura, Shino, and the rest of their friends were approaching Neji's room. They looked just as confused by the echoing racket as Hinata did.

"Hey Hinata, do you hear that?' Sakura walked up to her, frowning in thought, "Hospitals don't allow excessive noise. A floor manager will come up here and rip them a new one..."

"I don't know. I just heard it now." Hinata toddled a bit further down the white tile corridor, and then turned right onto the perpendicular hallway. Tenten had also joined the group to investigate. She nagged at Neji when he tiredly loped after them, recommending he rest before indulging his wish to move around.

Hinata halted and witnessed a disturbing altercation about six rooms ahead of them. She did not have to use her Byakugan to know that one of the intensive care unit rooms down the way was assigned to Tama. That was because Maito Ken had bodily dragged Sato out of the room and tossed him. Repeatedly, Sato had gotten up and tried to return to Tama's side. Hinata covered her mouth anxiously as she watched Tama's father rough up her already injured teammate. Her friends stood rooted in shock beside her.

Ken was seething, speaking in low tones to Sato, "Go back to your room, I said."

"—I feel fine, please just let me stay-!"

Ken's hand fist ed in Sato's pale, checkered hospital shirt, "Boy: I don't care if your wounds hurt you or not. I don't care about anything you want right now. You are not welcome to stand with my family as we grieve my daughter's pain, which I hold you accountable for. She was never meant to be a ninja."

"I just wanted her to follow the dreams you wouldn't let her—" Sato's teeth sunk into his lip as Ken cuffed him in the face.

"Do you see her chasing dreams now?" Ken was simmering at the idea, "Do you think you'll see Tama pursue anything now that she'll never walk again? Are you going to enjoy being married to my daughter when she will now require more care and assistance than ever? Pity. Obligation. Those aren't the things that should bind you to her. My dream for my daughter was to see her live well."

Weak and distraught, Sato held onto the man's arm with two hands, sinking to the floor, "I know. I know that's what you wanted."

Ken looked down on him, his thick brows furrowed, "I had my reasons for stopping her. My daughter and my brother share that foolish ambition…share their adoration for my father. And do you know what became of Maito Dai? Well, do you?"

Sato whimpered in affirmation, but Ken spoke over him with a scornful narrative, "My father wasted his whole life never getting ahead. He embarrassed me and my brother over and over. He was the eternal Genin. Endlessly naïve and optimistic; he poured all of his free time into training with our family's Inner Gates specialty…"

Ken grabbed Sato's wrists and forced him to let go, "My father wasted time on those things…instead of caring for us and my mother. He clucked his tongue at me when I said I didn't want to be a ninja. While Gai flunked his Academy entrance exams and strained himself to become a shinobi, I educated myself, ran a business, put food on the table, and provided for my family so that a roof stayed over our heads. My father didn't care that we lost our first home— he said that there is a bright side to everything."

Ken roared in Sato's face, "There isn't a bright side to being a ninja. To being gormless and unprepared. To being STUPID. It only guarantees you one thing. Hardship. My father died by overexerting himself with Gates, the same way my brother Gai wants to die—the same way my daughter wants to die!"

Tears sluiced down Sato's cheeks. He stared at Ken's face, listening intently, unaware of the onlookers behind him at the end of the hall.

"How am I supposed to believe you can take care of Tama, if you let her run full speed ahead towards her own demise?" Ken sneered, "In how many ways will you forsake her, now that she is no longer able-bodied? Do you realize how much you owe her?"

"I do. It's all I think about now." Sato confirmed in a gravelly voice, "But I will take care of her no matter what. Anything and everything she needs, I'll provide. I know it's hard for you to do, since you've watched me grow up directionless and ignorant, without much family of my own…but please entrust Tama to me. I want her to live well too."

Sato prostrated himself on the floor, folding and bowing his head in respect, "Ken, please accept my apology for everything. Please try to trust me. From this day forward, know that I dedicate everything I do to giving Tama a happy life."

"If you had told me such a thing before her injury," Ken lowered his voice to admit, "I just might've thought you could do that."

Maito Ken brusquely stepped over Sato and strode down the hallway, past the accumulation of Sato's shinobi peers, and scoffed softly to himself as he proceeded towards the men's restroom.

Shell-shocked, Sato looked at the closed door of room 271, where Tama was unconscious in bed and hooked up to various machines. He imagined that if he went back into the room, Tama's mother Miako and her brother would have no qualms with letting him stay. But Sato was trembling as he slowly heaved himself to his feet, crushed by Ken's edict and ridicule of the ninja-trained portion of his family. Of his concrete, never-ending mistrust of Sato, and that his daughter would forever be saddled with burdens and misfortune.

Moreover, it did not feel good to hear the patter of footfalls come up from behind him, nor did listening to the coos of sympathy from his teammates and friends…who had witnessed most of the quarrel. Sato wiped his eyes on his sleeve, not answering as Hinata and Shino asked him questions and touched him gently. It was hard to breathe through his congested nose, and he was still sore all over from his Exam match. At least his physical troubles did not hurt nearly as much as the emotional wreckage did. Sato was too ashamed to even look at his friends.

"Sato-kun, do you want to tell us-?" Hinata's hand slipped off of his shoulder as Sato fled.

She fretted and did not follow as Sato ambled dizzily down the hall, having lost track of where his recovery room was. He seemingly did not care anymore. He wandered off to rue the events of the last few days, and how he had caused almost all of those hardships.

Shino nudged Hinata's fidgeting hand, getting her attention.

"I will look after him and tell him about the Tournament." Shino advised her, "There is no doubt that your clan will wish to celebrate your accomplishment. You should recover at home and spend time with our friends."

"But I don't want to exclude Sato-kun." She murmured.

"Give me until this evening. Though he won't be in high-spirits, I will bring him by later." Shino decided he could negotiate such a thing, "No matter how he feels, he won't be able to resist honoring your victory."

After the Final Match of the Tournament and giving a tongue-lashing to the obtuse decision panel of the Exam, Tsunade shepherded Tazuna, Natsuhi, and Gaara along. Tazuna was annoyed that he would have to locate his grandson Inari and his retainer, Menma, who was also MIA. He vaguely remembered, "They said they'd meet with me on the steps outside on the ground level…"

Morino Ibiki caught Tsunade on the first floor, asking her to sign a hastily-whipped-up magistrate affidavit that would be sent to the Tsuchikage, providing details on Sasagainu Huo's arrest, investigation, and soon to be extradition back to Iwagakure. The man stalked off after that, ready to direct Intelligence Officers on how to get Huo to squeal.

"He looks like a barrel of fun, that guy." Tazuna estimated. Tough and scarred ninja were always alright in his book.

"Not the kind of fun you'd want to have," Tsunade warned him, "But if you break any laws in my village today, Tazuna, I can send you down to Ibiki's office so you can get better acquainted."

Tazuna passed on the offer.

On the ground floor, Natsuhi longingly walked past vendors that were still selling food. She had forgotten to eat while watching the matches. Tsunade grinned at her and took the woman's arm, assuring her they were going to the best izakaya in Leaf. She had a perpetual tab open at that establishment. She'd pay for the meals and booze.

As the village leader gaggle passed beneath the grand entrance of the stadium, exiting out onto steps, Gaara noticed Matsuri below on the promenade. He raised a hand to get her attention and then quickly dropped it, his voice catching in his throat. Gaara's companions noticed this and followed his gaze curiously.

"Isn't that your retainer?" Natsuhi asked Tazuna.

"Yep. That's Menma. Didn't do much of his job at all today, considering how he went off on a stroll to find yakitori and never came back!" The old man groused, "So much for paying for protection. I'm garnishing that wage."
"You need a court order before you can garnish someone's wage. Believe me, I've looked into it."
Tsunade simpered, "Besides, you've had three Kage beside you all day long. You were never at any point unsafe."

"Righto, I kind of did have the safest seat in the house." Tazuna supposed, "Guess I just miss having my kids around. Menma and Inari go everywhere with me these days."

Speaking of the devil, Inari bounded up the steps toward his grandfather, raising his hands in a warding gesture. It stopped the leaders in their tracks. Visitors pouring out of the stadium parted in a crowd to move around the group.

"Grandpa! Uh, just wait here for a second…before we get Menma." Inari was trying to run defense.

"Why?"
"Uh—"

"Kid, I'm hungry, and the generous, buxom Hokage offered to buy us a meal and liquor. I want to get a move on." The grandfather sniped.

While the two prattled on, Gaara tried not to notice his student making conversation with her Tide Village crush. It was by far more amicable than past encounters, and, in Gaara's opinion, Menma was unschooled in terms of personal space boundaries. He needed to put at least another ten centimeters between himself and Matsuri.

"Oh so that's what it is-!" Tazuna lifted his hand, gesturing at the sight of Menma bending and Matsuri rising on tip-toe to meet in a kiss, "My guard has been out fraternizing with competitors." He turned to Gaara, "Ain't that kid of yours too young to date?"

"Yes." He confirmed.

"It's quite cute, actually." Natsuhi offered her two-cents, crossing her arms behind her back girlishly.

"Eh." Tsunade shrugged.

"That's not a date. Or whatever. That's just how people greet each other these days." Inari tried to write it off.

"You sure as hell don't see me greeting anyone like that." Tsunade disagreed.

"Er…the Tide Village is just trying to strengthen inter-village bonds with the Sand Village." Inari suggested feebly.

"Yeah, we've been making decent progress with that." Tazuna noted, "So, Gaara, do ya want a Tide Village ambassador to report to your office monthly?"

"No."

"Too bad. You just got a new ambassador." Tazuna declared, gesturing again, "I'll send Menma to you with my invoices, project reports, matters requiring attention, and dirty gossip on the first of each month."

"No, you will not." Gaara had to unclench his teeth to speak, "Send a messenger hawk— seagull." He amended, "Send whatever. But don't send him."

"Aw, come on." Inari protested.
"Menma can come to the Star Village, when you're ready to discuss trade agreements in the future, Tazuna-san." Natsuhi offered sweetly, "I'm looking forward to that business!"

"Yeah, pretty lady, and we look forward to those deals too. I've got a project team interested in developing aviation vehicles."

"Can we not talk business until after we are seated at the pub?" Tsunade suggested, carrying on down the stairs. The group followed after her.

Gaara nearly blew a gasket when Matsuri and Menma united with the group on the promenade, and Menma bowed respectfully to him as if he didn't just see the former ragamuffin plant one on his student's lips. Oh. And even better! Now Matsuri was spouting nonsense about how much she looked forward to visiting the Tide Village again.

On the way to the izakaya, Gaara thought he had a good counterpoint in that the Sand Village Training program was in its final stages. Once all of the administrative clutter was settled, mission routines established, and the local lords and daimyo were presented with the option to hire Tide ninja, Sand would withdraw completely from the village.

"But Temari-sama told me that she bought a bungalow down there." Matsuri notified him, "She said I could stay in it with her on our time off and visit the beach."

Gaara's eyes nearly rolled back into his head.

Tazuna scratched his mustache, "Oh, you didn't hear about that? She got a good price. I talked to the seller for her."

"That would be something I'd like to buy, someday." Natsuhi sighed.

"That makes two of us." Tsunade echoed.

"No." Gaara countered again, back at Matsuri, "You'll be too busy to go to the Tide Village now that you're a Chunin—"

"I'm a Chunin?" Matsuri screamed.

Menma winced. She had gotten him directly in the ear drums.

"Yes." Gaara grumbled, "And I will be assigning you many missions. You will be very…very busy."

"Oh sensei, thank you!" She squeezed his arm happily, walking alongside him, "I promise I'll do my best."

"I know you will."

Tsunade blew a raspberry as she watched the giddiness. Hopefully Sakura would not hang on her like that when she got the news.

"Congrats, Matsuri!" Inari laughed and high-fived her.

Natsuhi was giggling.

Once they arrived at the izakaya, Tsunade was given her preferred table and their orders were quickly taken. Because Tsunade was an altruistic soul, she ordered Gaara a pour from a rare bottle of Chichibu whisky.
"Just so you know," She muttered to him, "That glass costs one thousand Ryo per. You're welcome."

He dropped his head back and sighed heavily. He didn't even drink.

Then, Menma did something unexpected and addressed the Kazekage, "Gaara-sama."

Surprised, Gaara sat properly again and looked at the Tide nin seated across from him. Matsuri was sitting stock-still with her hands pressed into her lap.

"I think that maybe you got the wrong impression about me." Menma was direct, "When we met, it was during a stressful time, and reparations to the village required a lot of funding, time, and energy from you. Also, I had just freed myself of the clan that had abused me and stopped them from taking those children." His eyes flickered over to the other adults, who were listening in, "And the time after that, you saw that Matsuri was upset with me."

Matsuri shook her head timidly, "Menma, you don't need to bring that up—"

"Someone I worked with had a bad habit about lying to store management and customers, and made up something about me." Menma explained, "But Matsuri believed it was true, when she was told. It caused a misunderstanding."

Gaara only blinked once while listening to him.

"I hope that you don't think that I…would ever lead Matsuri on…or that I would take advantage of my new home or any of the friends that I've made. They are the most precious things that I have." Menma prodded at the condensation on the glass of water in front of him, "For most of my life, I've been alone. The times during which I was not alone, I was often in bad company. This is the first time in my life I've ever been allowed to care about something…and been strong enough to fight for it."

A waitress came by and set down beverages on the table. Gaara eyed the whisky in front of him before resting his gaze on Menma again.

"So you care about Matsuri?" He asked rigidly, "And you would be willing to fight for her sake?"

Tsunade discreetly mouthed at Gaara to remain calm.

"Yes, I do and I always would." Menma said with a straight face.

Natsuhi, Tazuna, and Inari formed a chorus of swooning and teasing banter. Matsuri tucked her head down a little, hoping she would magically camouflage herself and go unseen.

"Hm." The corner of Gaara's mouth tugged down. He was considering what Menma said.

"The truth is…I also have you to thank for my new life." Menma added, "If you had not taken on Matsuri as a student…and then assigned her to help train ninja in the Tide Village…I would probably still be a captive of the Shin clan." He turned and smiled at the girl sitting beside him, "Matsuri saved me. She saved many people that day. I've never met anyone like her before."

"He really is a total sap for her." Inari confirmed in a hiss from his end seat. Tazuna shushed him.

Tsunade rested an elbow on the table and held her chin in her palm, watching for Gaara's reaction. She was often curious about how he responded to intricate social stimuli. Though she knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that he was a dependable partner for Sakura, sometimes Tsunade wondered how Gaara's student and family members fared in his interactions.

Gaara shut his eyes for a moment, breathing deep, and seemed to make up his mind. He lifted the whisky glass and held it out towards Menma, indicating with subtle face signals that Menma do the same. Uncertainly, Menma held up his water glass.

"To Hidden Sand's new ambassador from Shiogakure." Gaara tapped his glass to Menma's in a toast, noticing the boy's eyes light up with delighted surprise, "May our villages forge many bonds and enjoy mutual prosperity."

"Now you're talkin'." Tazuna also tapped his glass to theirs. Natsuhi, Matsuri, and Inari gladly toasted with their beverages.

Tsunade lazily clinked her sake cup in with the group's, "Kanpai, you turkeys."

The afternoon was characterized by brief interactions between Chunin Exam Finalists and their families, who also received well-wishes from their Jounin Sensei.

The Akimichi and Yamanaka clans were inclined to celebrate Chouji and Ino's performances (going on the assumption they'd been promoted) but did not organize anything on account of most everyone planning to party at the Hyuga estate. They advised their children to attend that function because the Hyuga clan rarely permitted outside party goers to their lavish events. Their families would have their own congratulatory festivities in the coming days.

And by sunset, with lanterns hung in the yards of the stately Hyuga house, a mish-mash of Hyuga clansmen and other Leaf inhabitants assembled to pay respect to Hinata and her peers.

It had taken some convincing of hospital staff, but Neji had been released to his family so that he would not miss out on the revelry. He sat on the engawa of the house while convalescing, watching nearby festivities. He was a little dizzy from pain medication, but had quite an appetite. He sent Lee to the hot-tray tables twice to fetch food for him. Tenten migrated between Neji and other attendees, socializing and joking around with them as she passed through crowds and lines for refreshments.

Hinata was being harried by a jovial mob, with many Branch members fawning over her. She had overheard a few wary accusations that she had used jutsu suspiciously reminiscent of those the Fourth Hokage had employed during the last war, but no one pushed the matter. Her father shooped those conspiracies away. As it was, the Main House elders were going to be looking for an explanation in the morning about whether or not their eyes had deceived them.

While Lee was not tending to Neji, he took time to walk his grandfather around and introduce him to curious party goers. Wong Leung, though not fluent in Nihongo, was happier than usual being engaged by Leaf Villagers he did not normally get recognition from. He was also quite popular with the Sarutobi attendees, including Konohamaru and his parents, who had taken quite a shine to him. Lee was thrilled. After a while, Hanabi and Konohamaru began badgering each other; their usual pastime.

Shikamaru and his teammates sat beside Neji on the porch to eat and occasionally tease the bandage-swathed prodigy. He took the jests in good humor. Kiba and Sakura had wrestled in between Hinata and her admirers, finally getting the chance to converse with her and maybe get some buzz on where the hell that Rasengan had come from.

Tsunade and Gaara showed up after a while. Gaara had brought his own guests: his student and some Tide Village dilettantes. Hyuga clansmen were curious about the Hoshikage, and were asking for a demonstration of Star Village jutsu. Natsuhi assured them she would show off a technique or two only after a glass of wine and some dessert.

Most Leaf Jounin present were well-behaved, but Asuma and his brother Netsuke had been goaded by Hyuga Hideyasu into accepting a challenge to a drinking game. Apparently, Hideyasu and a few Branch members were legendary at "flip cup." Netsuke claimed it was a bold faced lie. Grudgingly, Kurenai and Kakima were pulled into the drinking game, as it was team-based.

Gai and Kakashi were embroiled in some strange contest of Janken combined with a push-ups race and downing shots. Fascinated, Tsunade and Gaara sat down to watch. When Sakura passed by, she shook her head in embarrassment at the sight.

Shino had showed up with Sato as he had promised, though his friend was dressed down in a t-shirt and joggers. Hinata navigated her way over to her teammates at the edge of the yard and then hugged Sato, careful not to irritate his injuries. He sighed and squeezed her, muttering an apology,
"I'm sorry I've been so dumb. I didn't want you to see what Tama's dad…had to say…"

"It was an accident. We just wanted to know if you were okay." Hinata leaned back to look at Sato,
"I wish you hadn't fought Neji-niisan."

"Looking back, I wish I hadn't either. I should have just stayed with Tama." Sato agreed.

Concerned, Hinata pressed a finger to the cut on Sato's lip and sealed it shut with the Palm Healing Jutsu. He laughed softly and thanked her.

"Congratulations, Sunshine. No one deserves to be a star more than you." Sato told her, exchanging an agreeing glance with Shino, "Naruto would have gone nuts watching your match today."

With a small smile, she cupped her hand and whispered, "He did see it!"

"Yo, what?" Sato leaned in and lowered his voice, "Is he here? Oh crap that's great, we could like pants Gaara in front of everyone—"

"No, no, I mean that I overlaid his consciousness with mine during my match. I ran out of chakra and I needed some help." She explained quickly, "And you mustn't do something like that to Gaarakun!"

"You're right. It'd be funnier if Gaara helped me pants Naruto." Sato decided.

While Hinata tittered at the idea, Shino advised Sato to stop thinking about removing people's trousers for comedic effect. They asked if it was alright to help themselves to some of the food and Hinata tagged along with them, also peckish.

Later, Wong Leung set out for home because he had a long bedtime routine and wanted to read the newspaper. After seeing him off, Lee and Tenten took their spots beside Neji as Shikamaru, Ino, and Chouji shifted over, while conversing with Fujita light-heartedly.

"I didn't know the Hyuga clan played drinking games." Tenten remarked to her boyfriend, amused,
"Ino told me that the Yamanaka clan does stuff like that every weekend."

"My clan does not play often." Neji noted, "But they play hard."

"The Sarutobi clan appears to be losing." Lee rested his chin on his fist, watching interestedly.

"Fujita's dad is really good at it." Tenten pointed out, "That must be his fifth or sixth turn and he flips cups perfectly on the first try."

"He's going to need a new liver." Neji muttered.

Later that evening the Sarutobi clan guests were sent home, plastered, with Konohamaru tugging his elders along in a chain of hand-holding and burping. Several sober Branch members proceeded to clean up tables and leftovers, and Hideyasu's team retreated into the house to retch over toilets in various bathrooms.

While playing Koi-Koi with Hanabi on the porch, Fujita held his hand of Hanafuda cards and bid his father goodnight as Kayato lugged Hideyasu into a sliding door. She nearly dropped him, vacillating between laughing at her loaded husband and griping at him for overdoing it. Eventually, she got him inside and shut the door behind her.

The Leaf Finalists bid their friends goodnight and set out, congratulating Hinata one last time before leaving. Sato travelled to the hospital rather than returning home, intending to wait by Tama's side all night.

Lee and Tenten sent Neji to bed and promised to find him first thing in the morning. No guarantee that Gai-sensei would show up, though. He and Kakashi had wandered off in a drunken embrace, and Tenten did not think it was wise to find out where they'd ended up. They too went home after respectfully bidding the Hokage good evening, even though Tsunade was passed out on the porch of the house, her face pressed into a support pillar. Thankfully, Shizune found her and had assistance transporting the Hokage and Hoshikage to their residences.

The Tide Village group and Matsuri had long since vacated to turn in for the night. Sakura was the last to depart after hugging Hinata goodbye, and she caught up with Gaara at the gate of the compound before falling into step with him.

"Mom and Dad are waiting up for me. I said I would go home after the party and let them praise me and feed me sweets." Sakura folded and rubbed her arms, surprised by the night's chill.

Gaara circled an arm around Sakura to warm her as they hiked down a fence-lined street, "Good. I imagine they were very proud while watching your matches. I will walk you home."

"Thank you." She touched her head to his shoulder happily, "I see that you had lots of fun today."

"Most of it was fun."

"Tsunade-shishou overindulged."

"She overindulged before we went to the party." Gaara sniffed.

"Yeah…and you know…" Sakura pulled him to a stop to sniff her boyfriend's neck, "You smell like you've been drinking too."

"I am sound of mind and respect my limits." Gaara protested, "Your master bought me whisky at our early dinner."

"Oh! It kind of…makes you smell good." Rosy-cheeked, Sakura shook her head and continued ahead, darting under a street lamp.

When she asked him what he was doing later, Gaara matter-of-factly told her that if he had the patience, he would wash his face and shut the lights off in his flat before falling asleep. Even if he looked "with it," he was desperately trying not to curl up on a park bench and pass out like a hobo.
"Should I come over later?" She asked in a lilting voice. They turned onto her street. Gaara gave her a lofty, considerate look.

"No." He smiled slowly at her, "You should stay home and rest."

"Aw, but I'm still pretty energetic—"

"I would be useless to you tonight." He asserted, "But I am here for one more day."

"Ah, and you won't be preoccupied with anything?" Out in front of her house, Sakura climbed the steps as slowly as she could.

"Matsuri will be distracted with friends tomorrow, and the other village leaders will be recuperating. I know that Tsunade will not want to address any of her appointments in the morning, even though she'll have to."

Sakura nodded, "Yeah, she's bound to get a late start. Tomorrow is going to be a by-the-skin-of-her-teeth kind of day for Shishou."

"Then she may not need you for many tasks."

"No. I haven't even been added back onto the hospital's work schedule yet. We Chunin can take it easy until we are officially assigned missions." She smiled at Gaara as he waited on the step below her, "So…I'll come find you tomorrow."

He shut his eyes and relished a soft kiss from her. He listened when Sakura added, "And I'll make up a convincing excuse as to where I'll be tomorrow night for Mom and Dad."

"Please do." Gaara held her face and kissed her again.

They nearly jumped in the air in startlement when Kizashi threw the door open behind Sakura, and he and Mebuki were animatedly cheering. Gaara just barely managed to compose himself and politely turn down their offerings of tea, sake, ice pops or umeboshi and just generally staying up all night singing Sakura's praises.

Back at his flat, Gaara, like most everyone else that night, had a deep and dreamless sleep.

When Naruto had come back to his senses earlier that day, he was surprised to find that he was standing in the middle of Fukasaku and Shima's lawn. His feet were spread and arms were arranged in a Gentle Fist pose that evoked the end of an attack.

Jiraiya had only witnessed part of Naruto's remote-controlled motions, glancing out the window of the toad's home. "Hey! Stretching your legs or something?" He called out to his student, but Naruto did not seem to hear him.

Shima recommended that Jiraiya leave Naruto in peace to finish his lunch, "He and Pa are going to get right back to meditation once he finishes."

"I dunno…" Jiraiya scratched his chin and watched the boy from the window, "He's acting bizarre."

"Jiraiya-boy, you act much stranger on a daily basis."

"Nah, I mean he's jumping around and thrashing. Looks like some kind of fit…" The man pushed up from the tatami mats to exit the house, "Be right back, Ma."
By the time he tapped Naruto's shoulder, he had snapped out of it. He turned to give Jiraiya a mystified, googly-eyed look, then lowered his arms to stand normally.

"They need to stop feeding us poisonous insects, I'm telling you—" Jiraiya groused, making an assumption, "I don't want you hallucinating the day away, kid."

"Whoa. Ero-sensei, I wasn't hallucinating or anything like that." Naruto waved his hands and crossed back to the porch, "Hinata needed help at the Chunin Exam final! She kind of just…confiscated my brain and chakra for a bit."

"Confiscated." Jiraiya spun around to look at Naruto as he chugged his cooled-off soup, "As in, you were in her body?"

"Yeah!"

"Fighting?"

"Yeah it was crazy! I could feel her wounds and stuff like that." Naruto patted his shoulder, where he remembered a gash Hinata had hastily healed, "And I was like-! Using Jyukken and I could see chakra points— I saw things the way she did, it was totally—!"

Jiraiya gave him a light shake, "Kid. That kind of oversharing can expose you, you know. She didn't feel the Nine-Tailed Fox, did she?"

"I'm pretty sure Hinata was way too distracted to take a tour of my chakra." Naruto shrugged off his concerns, "Oh man, we knocked teeth outta that guy's head! Hah!"

"So I gather that she won that match?" Jiraiya settled down on the porch, somewhat pleased. Naruto clacked his empty bowl down on the porch, "I think so! That jerk didn't go down easily. He tried to crawl away after we hit him with Rasengan."

"Oh jeez." Jiraiya dropped his face into his palm, "You used that in someone else's body?"

"Er…" Naruto stopped to consider the implications of using an array of jutsu that might get Hinata questioned after the fact, "Well…you know, we had to improvise a few things here and there."

"You didn't use the Hiraishin, did you?" He was frowning.

"Just once." Naruto nearly spilled his tea cup when Jiraiya wapped the back of his head, "Hey! I know. I didn't consider what it would look like at the time."

"People are going to think she's the second coming of the Fourth!" Jiraiya rumbled, frustrated, "Naruto, you can't recklessly use those jutsu in public situations. It can stir up negative sentiments from the Third Shinobi War. And you want to drag Hinata into it, of all people-?"

"No one's going to bother her, come on! They'll call it a fluke or a mirage or something." He sipped his tea again.

"Don't participate in that kind of gimmick again, you hear me? Discretion is key." Jiraiya held up his pinched fingers to emphasize his point, "If you're going to assist her in a fight, try to be subtle about it!"

"I get it already. Can't go back and change what we did…and…" Naruto suddenly had a far-off look on his face, "Hinata was so beautiful."
"I bet—"

Pulling at Jiraiya's tunic sleeve, Naruto lightly shoved his teacher and had a conniption, "You don't understand! When I was there, she felt light as a feather— not at all like how my body feels when I run around and move. She was bouncy." He and Jiraiya made uncomfortable eye contact at the mentioning of the word, "And Hinata was kind of banged up and hurt, but she was wearing this awesome—I don't know what it was. It was a purple, yukata-looking thing. Oh! And her hair was so long and shiny I just had to touch it—"

"That so-?"

"I can't believe I kind of forgot what her face looked like. Well, I didn't forget. But she looks different! Like a lady in those fine art portraits; and her eyes were huge with fluffy lashes-!"

"Kid—"

"And I was freaking out! I didn't want to make it weird." Naruto made a yipping sound, shutting his eyes as he remembered, "I really don't think I can handle it. That she's beautiful spiritually and physically. It's like if I can't touch her I'm going to self-destruct. I'm going to die here, just-! You'll walk by the Toad Oil Pool later and I'll be dead because I want to be with her so bad-!"

Jiraiya was snapping his fingers in front of Naruto's face, "You are blowing a fuse, Naruto—"

"I didn't mean to! I just accidentally touched her there when she was covered in dirt and—"

The man clapped a hand over Naruto's mouth, announcing, "Normally I can handle the extolling of a gorgeous babe and her effect on a man…but you need to cancel the rocket-launch. You hear me? Take the ten you're at and bring it down to a two, alright?"

Removing his hand, Jiraiya regarded Naruto as he took a few calming breaths.

"Phew." The young man exhaled, "How'd she do that to me?"

"Get used to it." Jiraiya gruffed, "Now...if you're done eating and ululating, I'd like to ask you to take it slow and steady when you meditate for the rest of the day. Can you do that?"

"Yeah." Naruto stood and dusted his pants off, "Sorry about that."

"It's alright, kiddo. Just relax and concentrate on Natural Energy. The mail came in a little while ago, so tonight you can read your correspondence." Jiraiya picked up the dishes to bring them inside, "Work hard."

As he was told, Naruto returned to the Toad Oil Pool and found Fukasaku working on the same book of nonograms. The toad patted him down with oil before returning to his puzzles. For the rest of the afternoon, Fukasaku was alarmed by how Naruto fluctuated between fidgeting and rapidly transforming into a toad statue, drawing on far too much natural energy. He was very out of sorts.

An hour before sunset, Fukasaku rapped his cane on the stone steps to get Naruto's attention, "My word, this day's training took a nosedive this afternoon! Let's turn in for the evening, Naruto-boy."

Slightly miffed by his performance, Naruto returned to the house with the Toad Sage.

Over dinner, Jiraiya clarified for Fukasaku and Shima what had distracted Naruto. It grated on Naruto's nerves as they so clinically discussed Hinata's technique, and Naruto's evident inability to cope with the physicality of having his consciousness sojourn in a woman's body.
After the meal, Naruto retired to his room and tried not to be irritated. ‘I don't need them to poke fun at me. Nothing like that has ever happened to me before!’ He flopped over onto floor cushions and unwound a scroll that had been delivered to the Toad Valley. It was a reply from Haku.

‘Ah, good, it's about time he got back to me...’ Naruto spread it flat on the floor and propped his head up to read.

Naruto, maybe I should tell you that I was shocked when I read your letter discussing the identity of your parents. I was for a moment! But, it does make sense to me that you are the child of the Fourth Hokage. In some ways it may seem terribly obvious who you are. With respect to Jiraiya-sensei's guardianship of you, the techniques you've learned, and simple family resemblance, some people could likely guess! It only makes me wonder why friends of the Fourth and your mother did not take responsibility to look after you when you were a baby. You mentioned that Jiraiya-sensei had Leaf's state care look after you, when he was battling alcoholism. Surely there were friends of the Hokage who would have preferred looking after you themselves?

I don't say that to condescend or hurt you. I am genuinely surprised that no one came forward. Perhaps a political element was in play, or such people were discouraged or marginalized for volunteering to raise you? It's all speculation, at this point. Over all, it must feel very good to know who you are and where you come from. Sometimes that feeling can be as daunting as it is comforting. During my travels, I have come across evidence that suggests I am a descendent of the Yuki Clan. Unfortunately, that is the only lead I have so far, aside from a nukenin of the Water Country being a former member of that clan...it may not be wise to approach a criminal simply to ask about my heritage. Although, I've already done that by contacting Zabuza.

"Hmm." Naruto drummed his fingers on the tatami mats, engrossed by the idea of Haku closing in on his clan.

So far, no one I have spoken to knows where to find the Yuki clan, as they are highly elusive. With that goal being inaccessible due to a lack of information, I've also gone about collecting information about potential Akatsuki activity in the Water Country.

I fear that they may have control over the Mist Village, based on what Zabuza and rebel ninja have to say. Rumors purport that the Akatsuki are using the current Mizukage as a figurehead, and could also be targeting him because he is a jinchuriki. Such an operation would also explain the stratocracy that's pervading Kirigakure, tasking Black Ops and Hunter commanders with eliminating Mist's "rebels," or those who may be aware of the Akatsuki using the Mizukage as a puppet. I wanted to warn you, Gaara, and Jiraiya-sensei about this. It may be in Gaara's best interest to send Black Ops and Recon forces close to Mist, to see what they can glean from the area. I know Tsunade-sama may not have the resources at the moment to do a sweep with Leaf's forces.

The only other news I have is something that I ask you not to share with Gaara.

Naruto blinked down at the parchment, awed that Haku would tell him a secret that was meant to be kept from Gaara. He would be a good sport about it and humor the request, but Naruto was itching for a scandal as he read on.

"Temari has been communicating with me again. She does not write to me often, but I am glad that she is no longer completely closed off from me.

"Oh boy…” Naruto groaned out loud.

The only topics she discusses are the Sand Village and Tide Village, or Gaara, Kankuro, and her acquaintances. She never tells me anything about herself, or how she's feeling. I know that I've specifically asked her such things, but Temari has made a point to not talk about her life or ambitions. It's frustrating. I think I may have gotten my hopes up too much, when I started to receive responses from her. Things will never be the same. I know that I've broken her trust. Maybe there is nothing I can ever do to rebuild it. Anything that I put in writing will sound cheap and disingenuous. I have thought about visiting her in person in the Tide Village, to make my feelings clear.

"Aw jeez! Do you hear yourself?" Naruto muttered as he read, "And Ero-sensei was telling me to take it from a 10 down to a 2…it's going to go so wrong if you see her face to face, I just know it."

I find that it isn't so hard missing the Chunin Exam, which I know will be concluded in the next few days. Missing you and Gaara, and all of our friends weighs much heavier on me. I've kept busy, work part time, study Medical Jutsu, and train with Zabuza when I can…but I've come to realize that none of these things are what I want to do with the rest of my life. It took some time for me to discover what means the most to me. And after spending time with and looking after the children of a friend, I've realized that I enjoy that the most. I would prefer a simple home life to anything else. I want children of my own.

Quietly, Naruto re-read the line and was highly aware that he too had some to such a realization not too long ago. Though Naruto had never distinctly pictured such a thing for his friend, now that he related to the feeling on such a personal level, it made sense.

It seems to me that children ask the most important questions. Some of the things that Katsu, Hotaru, and Nagisa say are so profound that it startles me. When in the presence of jaded adults and roughened nukenin, whose words and feelings seem so shallow in comparison. The children argue less, since I've taught them to listen to each other. They emulate me when I do chores or assist Hiroshi-san. When they learn something new, they are eager to share their knowledge with everyone in town. Small things like those make me happiest.

I think you'll understand how I feel about it better than anyone, Naruto. That is the future I see for myself, someday. I look forward to hearing more about your time on Mount Myoboku, and if you learn anything more about your parents and their history, if you're willing to share it. Please give Jiraiya-sensei my best, and pass along those details about the Akatsuki. May Sage Training give you as little grief as possible, and success be within your reach.

Wishing you well,

Haku

Sighing, Naruto set the letter aside and rested his chin on a floor cushion, wrapping his arms around the pillow. 'I can see it now.' Naruto thought to himself. Haku had always been the "mother hen" type for most of his life. He was domestic, organized, mild-mannered, and great with children. Though he may not have grown up realizing what he truly wanted, Haku had eventually found his calling. All while hobnobbing around with a dangerous nukenin…

Naruto laid there for a while as the night's dark stretched into the room. He went to the cupboard and pulled out the futon, set it up, and tossed his blanket and pillow onto it. Naruto snapped the light off and then rolled onto the cloud-like mat.

'Come to think of it, Gaara wrote me that weird letter while he was staying in Leaf for a month.' Naruto remembered, 'He was complaining about paint color in the apartment and saying the new furniture all has to have…light tones…' The concept seemed so frivolous, 'Then when he was done venting about home decorating, Gaara wrote about using Mirin to deglaze pans. I'm assuming that has something to do with cooking, but I had no idea what the heck any of that meant!'
He flattened out on his back and pulled up his blanket, chuckling wildly, 'Holy shit. Gaara's a total homebody too! All he and Haku really want to do is get cozy and stuff! And if I'm honest…' Naruto shut his eyes and smiled to himself, 'I want that too. Nothing will ever be better…than going back home each day to see my family. A family that I make.'

Chapter End Notes

Hey there reader, I hope you enjoyed the conclusion of Chunin Exam 2.0!

Next chapter- 38: Bends in the Road

Bonus Soundtrack: "Pink + White" by Frank Ocean
The long, yawning night hushed activities in Konoha Hospital.

A surprisingly fresh-faced, nocturnal secretary looked up and greeted Sato when he stopped at the front desk, "Hi. Weren't you discharged earlier today?"

"Yeah…but I'm actually here to stay with a patient overnight." He clarified.

The lady at the desk nodded, "Name?"

"Maito Tama."

"Hmm." The secretary skimmed down the roster, "She already has guests staying overnight. Hospital policy requires that no more than two family members visit overnight after hours…” She trailed off at the sight of Sato's worn, heartbroken face, "But…never mind that. Go ahead. Maito-san is in room 271."

"Thank you."

On the way upstairs, Sato fretted about who he would find in Tama's room. He was still smarting from Maito Ken smacking him around and venting his frustrations. He relaxed when he entered, seeing only Tama's mother Miako curled up on a contemporary sofa at the far side of the quiet room. She was arranged in an uncomfortable position, one slip-on skimmer dangling off of her dainty foot, snoring softly. Ken, thankfully, was absent.

Sato silently crossed over to the woman and crouched down. For the most part, he and Miako got along very well. She resembled Tama in most every way, save for being brunette and several centimeters shorter than her statuesque daughter. Respectfully, Sato slipped the mother's shoe back on. He smiled a little when Miako stirred and stretched her arms over her head, gradually remembering where she was.

"Sato-kun," She smiled back at him, "I knew you'd be back here when things calmed down."

"Definitely. Where's Ken?"

"He went home." Miako sat up straight, fighting a yawn, "Waiting was making him anxious. He also told me he has a loan closing to oversee in the morning. He wanted to rest."

"Huh." Sato let his hand fiddle around his pants pocket, annoyed that Ken could bellow about attentiveness and caring for Tama…then go home to sleep and resume business as usual.
As if Miako could read his thoughts, she shut her eyes to simper and stand up, "It's just the line of work he's in, Sato-kun. I can't be mad at him for not staying here."

He grunted noncommittally at the justification. Miako crossed the floor and pulled a second blanket up over her daughter to fight the room's chill. She pushed back Tama's bangs and kissed her forehead.

"She just doesn't want to wake up." Miako sighed, "I really did admire…how strong she was today. I've never seen anything like it." She moved tiredly to take a seat in a bedside chair, missed, and nearly fell to the floor. Sato caught her by the backs of her elbows.

"Oh! Thank you. I am all kinds of clumsy at night…"

He gave her a concerned look, "You really should go home and sleep, Miako—"

"I don't want to leave her." The mother protested, "If she wakes up in pain or is confused…I should be here."

"You've been going all day. Tomorrow will probably be even harder…" Sato let his eyes drift between Miako and Tama. "Rest now while I can be here with Tama. Ken won't want me around tomorrow…so she'll need you here." She gave him a long look of deliberation when he asked, "Is that alright?"

"It is." Miako rubbed at her eyes sleepily.

Sato moved to the room's window and flipped latches before pushing it open. Miako watched him stick his head out and make a tooting call out in the night air. Shortly after that, a screech owl zoomed in and landed on his outstretched arm, "This is Aroo. Let him, uh, walk you home. Well, he'll fly. But he'll also come back and let me know you made it safely. If not, I'll be looking for you."

"There's no need to worry about me!" Miako smiled and patted his cheek, "But thank you, Sato, an escort home will be nice." She motioned with her hand, prompting Aroo to flit over and perch on her shoulder, "I'll be off now. You try to sleep too. I'll be back bright and early!"

He acknowledged her with a wave and a nod, listening as Miako's footsteps retreated down the hallway. Sato then pulled the guest chair up to the side of the elevated bed and took a seat, exhaling roughly. Tama laid there, eerily still. He looked at her for a while and let reality sink in.

The only time he ever saw Tama so still and peaceful was when she was stretched out on the couch for a nap after training. Sato's heart ached for those times to return. That she could be mobile, feel well; smile and stay safe. It was hard to see her so damaged—wrapped and mended, immobilized in lower-body braces, her left forearm and hand in a hard cast. Her hair still looked as luscious and shiny as ever, though.

'Miako must have brushed it for her…' Her right hand was wrapped in cloth bandages but appeared to be adequately functional. Sato gently traced a fingertip along her exposed skin, swallowing hard. The bruises Tama had gotten from training with Kakashi paled in comparison to what now marked her. 'It must hurt. All of it must hurt so bad...that she doesn't want to be awake…' Teary-eyed, Sato glanced up at a drip of strong pain medication, 'I won't even wish for you to wake up, Tama. Not until it starts to get better. I don't want you to…'

He slipped his hand up her right arm, ghosting over a cotton pad adhered to her jaw. Huo had kicked her face and split skin there. 'I don't ever want you to suffer.' Sato shut his eyes, his breaths rumbling. Maybe he should have thought about this nearly two years ago. When he had teased her and encouraged her to become a Genin against her parents' wishes. When he had called in a favor with Iruka-sensei, so that Tama could take the exam and graduate…

"I'm just…really bad at looking out for you." His voice was soft and quivering, "You've always been so good at it. Looking after me. When Mom was gone…and Kakashi was too freaked out to go near me…you protected me from things. You knew what to do. You had your eyes on me."

The sounds of the monitor Tama was hooked up to reminded him of bird chirps.

"But I can do it now." Sato cleared his throat, sniffing, "I've screwed up so many times. That's just how I had to learn. I wish it hadn't been at your expense…I wish you hadn't been hurt. I promise I can do it now. I can protect you. I can look after you." He leaned in to brush his lips across her cheek, "Don't go out of your way for me anymore. It's my turn to care for you. It doesn't matter what I have to do. You have my word."

He let silence settle in again, and Sato shifted to prop himself up on the edge of the bed's mattress, elevated enough to fold his arms and rest his head there. His eyes were trained on Tama's sleeping face.

Sato's thoughts swirled around like marbles in a bowl.

His throat felt tight again when he thought about how he'd been unfaithful and slept with a stranger, merely to sate a craving. For her. Oh, how he wanted to tear his own brain out and throw it to the floor, stomping it and cursing it for failing him. For not safeguarding something so sacred; for saving his body for Tama who, he was sure, deserved that milestone with him. He had sold himself so cheaply. He had once been valuable. Now, looking in reflective surfaces repulsed Sato and reminded him of the mistake.

The alcohol had not justified him. Not even her excuse for leaving that night had justified him. Not when their formidable bond, mutual attraction, and love towered over him as a behemoth reminder. Sato wondered how he could have ever done wrong to someone who cared for him and honored him so. He had never felt quite good enough for Tama. Never felt that he deserved her, if the sarcastic comments of others had been anything to go by. But why? Why tumble into the pitfall? Why be what they said he was? No good.

Sato gulped again. Taking Tama for granted had been a horrible thing to do. When he'd been younger, imagining a future with her used to feel like a heavy, unavoidable requirement. Today, the fear of being unable to build a life with Tama suffocated him with fear.

If he had never advocated for her to become a ninja in the first place, perhaps they would be lounging on the couch right now. She'd be fine. Maybe he wouldn't have cheated, if Tama had not been occupied with Exam preparations, and he could have persuaded her.

Sato pressed his hands to his eyes and rubbed, sickened by the selfish thoughts. Why was he thinking something like that now? Just how much of a degenerate was he, to lament that kind of an outcome? Her life was more important. Whether he was satisfied or not, whether she was a ninja or not… 'If Tama could hear what I've been thinking she would smash my head into garden mulch…' No. Sato acknowledged that now was about a good a time as any to not expect anything physical from Tama. Her welfare came first.

His thoughts evened out. Responsibility clicked back into place. Caring for her meant caring for her selflessly. Anything personal or Sato-related…he deleted those items from his brain. Then he lay there, staring at her face for a length of time he could not measure. Sometimes tears would slip free, and his eyes would dry up again periodically. Things felt very different.
Aroo came back after a time and hooted. Miako was safe at home. Sato thanked the owl and told him to go hunt.

The night wore on and a nurse stopped in, checking Tama's charts and medication drip. She glanced at Sato, bunched up at the bedside and freshly done weeping. She winced in sympathy. "Thanks for staying the night." She told him, smiling gently. Sato blinked up at the nurse, surprised by the remark. She concluded her tasks and carried on down the corridor to her next patient.

With the endless nighttime minutes, his mind ceased speculating and stopped forming ideas of how to improve Tama's circumstance. There was no way to know what was ahead of them. All that he could do was be there. Exhausted, Sato drifted off to sleep. The hands of the room's wall clock completed several revolutions.

The pre-dawn hours of morning were dark and without birdsong. Sato unfurled himself like a dozing cat, pushing up from the bed's edge as he stirred. It was then he noticed Tama's eyes were open just a sliver, almost too narrow to be noticed. She was statue-still.

"Tama?" Sato spoke softly and sat up. When she did not respond he edged in closer, beside her ear, "Are you awake right now?"

She did not move or make a sound. Sato wondered if she had opened her eyes and continued sleeping. Then she slowly turned her head to the right, towards him. Her lashes fluttered as if nerves were firing incorrectly. He felt scared and relieved all at once.

Sato stroked the side of her face and hair as if she were breakable, staying close enough for her to hear as he kept his voice down, "It's me."

"W-W…" She made small sounds, struggling with the effort.

He waited with baited breath for her to complete the phrase.

"Watched…" Tama opened her eyes a bit wider, but seemed disoriented, "I watched…"

"Watched-?" Sato wanted to help her along.

"Watched you sleep." She coughed softly, "Right here." She tapped a single, working finger on the mattress space where his head had rested.

He was startled, "You did? For how long?"

Tama's eyes fluttered shut again tiredly, "A long time."

"I'm sorry, you could've woke me—"

She gave him a weak shhh.

"How are you feeling?" Sato asked a treacherous question, but he genuinely wanted an assessment.

"Not much." Tama batted her lips, "Fuzzy…hard to…speak."

"The medication is super heavy duty. You might feel woozy." He informed her.

"Yeah."

"So you were awake for a while?"
"Watching you." Traces of emotion were returning to her face, bits of discomfort, warmth, and frustration, "Moving…what still moves. My hand. My head and neck are okay." Tama demonstrated by showing off the slight range of motion.

Sato palmed her cheek, "Don't move too much for now."

"Legs." She said simply. She did not mean Sai's nickname for her. She meant that she could not move them. Sato understood and lowered his eyes, despondent.

Tama fidgeted uncomfortably, more awake. Her eyes were scrunched, and she was pursing her mouth, trying to dislodge the nasal cannula fitted in her nostrils, and the small, hollow tubes draped over her ears. "Please." She said tiredly.

He looked at her with shiny eyes and tried to interpret her request.

Tama clarified, "Take it off."

"I can't. I can't tamper with anything." Sato apologized, "I'm sorry, Tama. If you don't move so much it won't bother you. You need the oxygen."

"-can breathe fine." She retorted softly, "Can still do things myself."

"I know." He acknowledged, leaning in toward her neck for comfort, "For now, don't get ahead of yourself. You've been badly hurt. We'll talk to the doctor in the morning."

Tama smiled weakly at him. She stopped fussing.

"I want you to know that we defeated Huo. Hinata beat him." Sato announced with a mix of pride and seriousness, "He got what he deserved. He's under investigation now by Leaf's Security forces."

"…he…didn't hurt anyone else?" Tama hoped not.

Sato kept his head tucked against her as he spoke, "No, no. Sunshine is still scratched up, but otherwise everyone is okay. The group planned out how to deal with Huo."

A long silence answered him. Sato watched the rise and fall of her chest for a time before sitting back, looking her in the face. They held each other's gazes without a word for a while, and Tama understood unsaid things. Sad things. She could see it all in his expression.

She spoke again, "My chest hurts."

"Even with the medication?" He was mildly alarmed.

"Yeah." Tama confirmed.

"Well," Sato swallowed and recalled some info he had gotten when he had checked on her earlier that day, "Your mom told me you have some broken ribs, and you came in with a collapsed lung. The medics had to correct it…with a needle to draw out excess air from your chest." He was grimacing, "I know it's got to hurt. I wanted you to sleep as much as possible…so you don't have to feel as much of it."

"What else?" She asked. Tama was aware there would be a laundry list of problems with her body.

"Let's wait for the doctor tomorrow before we discuss the rest." He recommended again, "Whoever comes in to look at you will have to do some follow-up evaluations. Tsunade-sama will too, when she can."
Tama presumed, "…it's bad."

"You're going to be okay." Sato insisted nervously.

A far-off look came over her face. Tama stared across the room while deep in thought. She was processing the level of physical impairment she would have to deal with. She was weighing it against how she lived her life, her career, her wishes. Sato watched her think with a pattering heart. His worry stretched over them like a rain cloud.

"Sato." Her voice sounded a little stronger, "You can leave."

Sato was surprised but then dismissed the statement, assuming he misunderstood, "I'm staying all night and day, until your family shoos me out. Your mom already went home for some rest."

"No." Tama shut her eyes and shook her head tiredly, "You can leave me."

Sato was hushed in shock and then supposed he was not misunderstanding.

Tama explained to him, "It isn't good. Me like this. I can't live the life…I want. Can't give you the life you want."

He shook his head rapidly in disagreement. She went on to clarify, "There are…no strings. Like this, I'm a burden. If you want to, forget everything. I won't be…offended. Really…I understand.""Can't give me the kind of life I want?" Sato was appalled by the suggestion, "What kind of life is that, Tama? An active one? A meaningless one? I don't want to spend every day with you purely for the convenience." He protested, eyes tearing up again, "I am not intimidated by doing whatever it takes…to care for you. Whatever that entails, I'll do it. If I have to reduce mission activity, or quit being a ninja, I will. I am going to look after you and be with you."

"I may not…be the same." Tama warned him, "Could become…very sad. Un…unfulfilled. I like my pastimes. Dancing. Biking. Running. Working. If I…can't do the things I enjoy…I might change."

She took a break from speaking to catch her breath, then added, "That change may let you down."

Sato regarded her for a long moment and then let out a clipped, half-deranged laugh at the thought.

"Let me down?" He calmed himself, "You…are worried…about letting me down?" Sato sighed at the assertion, "Tama. That is impossible. No matter what you're going through, you will never, ever disappoint me in any way."

Tama stared at him and listened.

"That's one of the craziest things I've ever heard. I'm not in love with you just because of the physical things you can do, although…yeah, I do find you extremely impressive and attractive. But your way of thinking…your spirit…that's what moves me." Sato looked down for a moment and noticed where his hand had settled on the bed's edge, Tama had subconsciously grabbed it while he spoke, "Your devotion and love are the things I want most. There's nothing in the world better than that."

For the first time in days, Tama saw Sato smile the way he used to: genuinely happy, with a hint of the debonair, carefree charm that played a tune on her heartstrings.

Tama's awareness of pain alleviated a bit. Her mouth was tugging up at the corners, pleased that he had disagreed with her.

"Yup." He seemed much more relaxed, "Oh, I am so committed. It's gonna get annoying. Watch out.
Until we are cremated piles of dust, Tama…and whatever happens after that. I don't want to go anywhere or do anything without you."

They smiled goofy smiles at each other.

"Is it okay if I kiss you?" Sato asked her, "Will it hurt you? I'll be careful."

Tama blinked at him, "Even if it does hurt…I want you to."

Acting on that permission he leaned in, half-lidded eyes matching her own when he was only a whisper away from her mouth… Sato stopped short. He paused to look at her as if another urgent declaration had come to mind, "Hey…" Tama peeked an eye open wider when he said, "I love you."

Flustered, she shimmied a bit and only allotted him a bashful peck on the mouth. That did not satisfy and Sato moved in again, his eyes shut, head tilted, kissing her in earnest. Tama had been holding her breath in surprise. She was pretty sure that was the first time she had distinctly heard Sato say those words to her. After a moment he pulled back a bit to look at her and gauge her reaction. She looked astonished.

"Sorry if I taste like onions." He was sheepish, thinking of the ways he could have messed that up, "I didn't brush before I came over here."

Her face was more expressive. Tama was cracking up. She began to giggle, unable to control the rumble that jostled her chest painfully. Sato raised his eyebrows and automatically reciprocated the laughter. With what strength she had, Tama raised her hand and tugged on his t-shirt. He understood. Leaning in, they quieted down and kissed again. It was calming and binding. Without saying so, they both felt much closer and more confident.

"Hmm." Tama dropped her head back on a fluffed pillow. She was smirking and looked very pleased.

Sato shifted in his seat, stifling a yawn as he angled himself downward, and mashed himself onto the corner of her pillow to get comfortable. He pressed his lips to the bare skin of Tama's arm and kept kissing her there. She started chuckling again.

"Thank you, Sato…" She watched his hand caress up from her fingertips to the curve of her shoulder, down and up again, "I love you too."

"I am gonna do more to deserve hearing you say that." He declared, "Now you need to stop giggling adorably and being so damn soft."

"Can't." Another chuckle spilled from her lips.

Grumbling, Sato glanced up at her, "It's turning me on too much."

That, uh, was the point, Tama's expression revealed. She was taunting him cutely on purpose. So what if she couldn't move? She still had it.

"Let's sleep." Tama suggested.

At first, Sato was not much for the idea, even though he accepted the extra blanket layered on top of her—which she wanted off. Covered up and folded onto the bed, they muttered and yawned at each other until they did indeed sleep.
Later that morning, at about 8:10AM, Tsunade took a silent headcount of the former Leaf Rookies who had piled into her office. Maito Tama was not among them. That absence stood out like a sore thumb to the Hokage, and she leaned back in her seat, shutting her eyes for a moment to compose herself. The youngsters chattered quietly while Tsunade collected her thoughts.

At the side of the room, Shizune cleared her throat. Beside her on a display table were ten Chunin vests, each with a small note safety-pinned to a front pocket; the names of who they belonged to.

Right. Tsunade took Shizune's cue. There was no use in dragging the announcement out.

She angled her swiveling chair to get a side-on view of her newly promoted ninja, "I congratulate all of you on a job well done. Each of you has been promoted to the rank of Chunin, with the conclusion of the Exam." Tsunade added airily, "And the shenanigans that ensued generated a staggering amount of revenue…which will provide a much needed facelift for our village. I thank you all for that as well."

They replied in an affirmative chorus and Tsunade raised a hand to settle the group down again. She flicked her eyes toward Shizune, "Shizune is going to call each of you to receive your flak vests and certificates. Frame the paper if you want. The copies that really matter are on file here…and if your vest does not fit as anticipated, be honest. I've seen Chunin walk around this building who are clearly in denial."

Ino cackled softly at the jibe. Sakura nudged her to hush up. Hinata was called first and timorously accepted her accolades from Shizune. Ino and Chouji followed after her, followed by Sakura and Kiba, then Neji's team, and then Shino and Sato last. Aghast, Sato stared at the table, his eyes ringed by dark circles. He turned to Shizune as she gave him a questioning look, trying to hand over his vest.

"What about Tama?" He asked severely.

Shizune tried to explain, "I was told—"

Sato kicked the leg of the table with his foot, turning to Tsunade in outrage, "You didn't promote her?"

"Mind your mouth." Tsunade smiled at him patiently, resting her chin on her folded hands.

"You didn't." He spoke through clenched teeth, "You saw what she can do…how can you exclude her?"

"If I see it fit, I will exclude her however I deem it necessary." Tsunade daringly made eye contact with Sato, "She was promoted to Chunin just as all of you were. I have her flak vest locked in a cabinet on the next floor, if you must know. I won't be giving it to her. I suspended her mission activity."

"How can you?"

"How would it look if I gave her the false impression that she is among you and your peers now?" Tsunade spoke over him, "To give her soft tasks. Desk work. Paperwork or drudgery that requires little movement. That isn't what she worked for. So I won't do that. I will not assign her anything beyond focusing on her recovery."

"Then, in a symbolic sense, at least give her what she earned." Sato tried to bargain, "That would make her happy."
"It won't make her truly happy." Tsunade replied knowingly.

"Do it anyway." Sato spat, and then he looked to Shizune again, "I refuse to participate if you don't recognize her."

Shizune was shaking her head at Sato, still extending his Chunin novelties. Tsunade watched him impassively with her mind made up. Sato stared at the Hokage and tried to compel her to bend on this one trifling matter. She did not.

As good as his threat, Sato stormed off without accepting his vest or promotional document. He brushed past Shino and Hinata who tried to slow him, hoping he would reconsider. Sato squeezed through the group and darted out of the doorway. After that, Shizune wilted and set the items down on the table again.

The whole collection of new Chunin stared at the floor in silence. It was hard to accept. Sakura, for one, had been particularly moved by Sato's solidarity with Tama. She stepped forward in a gesture to return her promotional items.

Tsunade leapt from her seat and barked at her, "No. No dissent among the ranks. Especially not you, Sakura. He's being childish."

Sakura did not give much pushback, "But Tama should still—"

"It was my decision to make. If you all feel bad about this, fine: visit Tama in the hospital and tell her what I told you. I guarantee that she will understand. That is simply how that girl thinks— that's why I can depend on her." Tsunade circled around the desk and approached them, "I am depending on all of you more than I ever have. Don't cut and run just because you don't agree with me."

She stopped in front of Neji and pointedly locked gazes with him. To her surprise, he was fully paying attention to her. The former back-sass and friction she used to get from him were gone. 'Ah, good. He's recovered from that no-contact order, it seems. Just when I'll need him most.'

"For now," Tsunade went on as she paced slowly in front of the Chunin gaggle, "I want you to rest. I will begin mission assignments within a week. Things are still hectic internally with the closure of the stadium, so I may have you oversee things of that nature…"

The youngsters acknowledged her and thanked her. Tsunade dismissed them after that. When they had filed out of the office, the Hokage reminded Shizune she was a seasoned Jounin and advisor, and never had to take anyone's shit. Why had she stood there and not smacked Sato for his impudence? Shizune mumbled lowly, unsure. She felt bad, she guessed.

"Throw it in his face, next time." Tsunade recommended, picking up Sato's unwanted vest and certificate, "Let's go get breakfast, Shizune. Ton-Ton. I'll hand this off first so I don't have to look at it all day…"

Kakashi knocked on the door for ten seconds before he tried the door knob. Locked.

"What a pain." He scratched his head tiredly and then traipsed down the apartment building's interior hallway.

Had anyone been watching, Kakashi would have made it look easy flitting out of a window to the top of a nearby building, circumventing around the complex's exterior until he arrived at the window of his nephew's flat. Sato often left it ajar for Aree and Aroo to come and go as they pleased. Kakashi dropped in via that entrance.
"Yo." He half-shouted into the home. He got no response. Kakashi could tell that someone was around, though.

He tottered down the corridor and popped into the open doorway of the restroom. Sato was vigorously splashing his face at the sink.

"Tsunade-sama called you a dissenter today." Kakashi greeted and watched his nephew sputter and startle, fumbling with faucet handles before he stood upright, surprised by a visitor, "Looks like this is the first time all night and morning you left Tama's side."

"It is." Sato patted his face with a towel, "And I'm going back to her right now. I'm gonna say slanderous shit about the Hokage and talk about how I won't serve as a Chunin. Not unless Tama can."

"That's stupid."

"So is your face."

"That's why I don't show it much."

"That mole is stupid."

"It's a beauty mark." Kakashi corrected him.

Annoyed, Sato stuffed the towel on a drying bar and motioned for Kakashi to move aside. His uncle obliged, but followed him into the bedroom.

"I'm changing clothes, you know." Sato warned him, pulling his t-shirt off.

Kakashi shrugged. He stood there and watched, utterly unaffected, and held Sato's Chunin vest in his hands like a butler. The boy changed back into his white and red tunic, the clothing that he debuted at the Tournament. Kakashi was not surprised that his nephew was embracing the Hatake-style apparel. It suited him.

Sato stopped in front of his uncle, who blocked his exit. He frowned when Kakashi handed his vest to him.

"You're going to put this on, and you're going to serve." Kakashi told him, "Life isn't fair. It doesn't always go as planned. Didn't you think about how Tama would feel if you waltzed up to her and told her you forsook a duty she wants to fulfill? That she'd feel angry and frustrated? It's better if you take responsibility. That's what will cheer her up."

A minute elapsed with a no-blinking staredown, and finally Sato sighed and accepted the flak vest. When he pulled it on and zipped it up over his tunic, Kakashi snickered at him, amused.

"What?" Sato was still not happy about it.

Kakashi ruffled his hair, "You look a lot like my dad."

They left the certificate on the kitchen table. Sato followed Kakashi out of the flat, exiting from the window. Kakashi accompanied his nephew on the trek across town to the hospital. There was a traffic-jam of wheelchairs and other hardware being moved across the lobby, and so they waited for it to pass.

"The Hokage would have felt terrible assigning Tama menial tasks. I'm sure you agree with her that Tama would not want to do those sorts of things." Kakashi ventured, sticking his hands in his pockets.

"I know she wouldn't want to do stuff like that." Sato acknowledged woodenly.

"Tsunade-sama is sympathizing with Tama. I know that she is very fond of you both."

"Because we're like you and Gai." Sato figured.

"Not that." Kakashi disagreed, "You remind her of another time…of a more hopeful time in her life."

Sato quirked an eyebrow at Kakashi, not getting it. When the floor was clear they carried on to the stairwell.

"Off the record, the Torture and Interrogation Corps has detained both Huo and Sekieima, and from what I hear…” The Jounin kept his voice low, "It really was a hostage situation. The network that Huo was a part of runs deep, and has undermined Iwagakure. Like a mob, if you will. Many people are threatened and hushed into keeping it secret."

Sato noted perceptively, "That's not gonna last."

"Not if Huo has valuable information about that operation, it won't. He can't conceal anything from our specialists." Kakashi confirmed, "His restraints sap and lock chakra. He won't be able to use Ninjutsu or Tao Arts."

"Good. I heard Sunshine knocked some of his teeth out."

"Yeah. He's not getting those back."

They wound up and up the steps.

"So do I really look like Grandpa?"

"You do. You've seen the photos." Kakashi confirmed.

"Why don't you ever talk about him?" Sato asked. He'd been meaning to ask that for years.

"Because," Kakashi said as they turned into the hallway, "Some days…I still can't believe he's dead."

Sato processed the sentiment. He felt that way about his mother.

"I don't want people to know how addled my head is. About losing him. Losing everyone." Kakashi chuckled, "It'd be pretty obvious if I talked about my dad, and Semi, and Sensei, and Rin and Obito all of the time. I'd never shut up."

"You can talk to me about it." Sato offered gently, "I won't judge."

"Maybe I will." Kakashi sounded surprised with himself, "Some time. I might."

They arrived at Tama's room and the door was closed over slightly. Kakashi pushed it open and ambled in, followed by Sato. The room was stuffed.

"Who are all of these people?" Sato whispered from the corner of his mouth.

"Hmm." Kakashi was surveying the many visitors crowded around Tama's bed, chatting amiably.
He knew most of them. At least he thought he did.

Eventually, heads turned and noticed Kakashi and Sato had arrived. They received a lively greeting. Tama had strength enough in her right hand to wave a little.

"Hey!" A young man in a Chunin vest laughed at the sight of them, "The Hatake clan is here, move over people!" Sato squinted his eyes. Everyone gathered was a Chunin or Jounin, but they looked young.

'They look...Tama's age.' Sato estimated.

Kakashi was given the space to Tama's immediate right and Sato sidled in beside him, reaching out for Tama's hand and feeling better when she laced her fingers with his.

"Good morning, Kakashi-sensei." Tama greeted politely, "Sato-kun that looks good on you!"

"You'd say that about any old rags I put on." He winked at her.

"You were promoted too." Kakashi informed her, "But the Hokage terminated your mission activity, for the time being."

"Well that's nice." Tama yielded, "It makes sense."

"I had a problem with it." Sato protested mildly.

"Please don't. Please take missions." She soothed him, "I know you'll visit me a lot. We'll find a new balance soon. Work on your schedule and assignments."

"Alright, I will..."

"So..." Kakashi regarded all of the wrinkle-free faces around, "This is your graduating class, Tama-chan. Or, it would have been if you graduated in your year."

"Yes!" Tama confirmed, "Thank you for visiting, everyone!"

Sato's mouth hung open a little. Tama's peers from her Academy days must have seen her match in the Chunin Exam Tournament. Maybe they didn't know she had become a ninja after withdrawing from the Academy years ago, as a late bloomer.

"Looks like you need an introduction," The man who spoke earlier from the left side of the room chimed in again, "I'm Runruna Mion. I know Tenten from your age group, actually. This here is my teammate, Hagino Shoda. Medic-nin and part-time journalist." The dark-haired, bespectacled man beside him waved with a small blush.

Mion pointed to other ninja in the room, "That's Aburame Michiko, isn't she cute? And her teammates: that there's Sarutobi Banri, I hear he's a clerk for the Sealing Corps now. Aren't you, man?"

Banri smiled at him, "Yep. But I am going to apply to be an assistant commissioner next year."

"Good for you, curlies!" Mion congratulated the wild-haired Sarutobi, "And Mizutani Nogo rounds off their team. Yo, Nogo, we need to go out again sometime. See something in the cinema."

Nogo agreed.

"Here's our Ino-Shika-Chou trio." Mion gestured to the three at the foot of Tama's bed, "Akimichi Choukoki, Yamanaka Inohei, and Nara Kojika. Kojika, girl, you spilled your mega-slushie all over yourself at the Tournament, I heard."

"Yeah." She confessed, "During Tama-chan's match. It was exciting."

Tama thanked her.

"And here's Nabeya Yurie," Mion pointed to a man to his left, "One of Tama's rivals from our Academy days." Yurie waved the suggestion off and insisted all of that was behind them, "Huh? Well cool. And here's Shimura Mashu. Whoa, Mashu, you smell good. New cologne!"

Mashu cupped his face in his palm.

"It is new, right?"

"Yes. Please stop talking about it." Mashu muttered.

"Their teammate Aiko quit recently because she had twins!" Mion tittered, "Can't wait to see those cuties later."

All of Tama's age group clamored about how excited they were to see the babies. Mion prattled about how he was also a father to a baby girl now and wow, did time fly by so fast!

Sato was glaring at Yurie's head, as he had realized that was the boy who had injured Tama in the past during an Academy quarrel…and caused her to drop out. Kakashi patted his shoulder, signaling to his nephew to cool it.

Inohei flipped his chic haircut out of his face, "Tama-chan, we're very sorry we fell out of touch with you. Most of us didn't know you continued your shinobi career."

"Not that you being a ninja is the only reason to socialize with you." Shoda clarified.

"Right, I know." Tama assured them.

"When we were kids, you punched me once so hard that I cried." Choukoki remembered fondly, "You've always been strong."

"We wish you a speedy recovery." Kojika was very pretty when she smiled.

"Thank you."

"Also," Mashu spoke up again, "Tama-chan's match was an unparalleled earth shaker…but Hatake Sato-san..." All heads rotated to look back at Sato, "You used jutsu in your match that you invented on your own."

"Technically, I just improved shape and nature manipulation based on what Kakashi showed me." Sato dumbed it down, "Then I poked someone with it."

Laughter answered him. This time he actually wasn't being funny but he accepted it anyway.

"I don't know anyone else who can do that. Even Danzo-sama of my clan, can't do anything like that." Mashu impressed upon him, "No one who saw that Chidori on the ground or in the sky will ever forget it." His peers agreed.

"I probably won't use it so rashly next time." Sato admitted.
"Mashu says stuff like that because he wants to label you." Kojika informed him dryly, turning back to Mashu, "Go on and do it, then. Dub him something. You did it to every single one of us."

"I will, since I have a speck of creativity to my name." He snarked back at her, "Sato-san, like the rest of the Hatake clan, possesses white chakra and incredible talent. Based on what we've seen... he could be the White Wing of Konoha."

Mion blew a raspberry.

"That's not as cool as Kakashi-san's moniker. Or the White Fang's." Yurie pointed out.

"Sounds kinda flappy." Kojika seconded the pan.

"Then come up with something better." Mashu turned his nose up at them. He bid Tama farewell and filed out with Yurie in tow.

Idle chatter continued for a few minutes while Sato pondered the nickname. He didn't dislike it.

Mion and his teammate, along with the Ino-Shika-Chou team excused themselves and promised to visit again before leaving. Michiko did not say much, but she extended her hand and left a ladybug on Tama's casted arm. Her smile was slight and sweet, adjusting her glasses before giving Tama a pat. She and her teammate Nogo carried on out of the room. Sarutobi Banri lingered, however. Sato, still wrapped up in his own head, did not notice the loiterer.

Kakashi did. He was not sure why Banri did not move on with his team. His conversation with Tama seemed trivial, as if scraping for a reason to stay. He called the kid out, "Banri-san, doesn't the Sealing Corps have management meetings in the morning? You'll run late."

"Oh, I..." He glanced up at the clock, "You're right, Kakashi-senpai. Please excuse me."

Banri said goodbye and wished all of them well.

"Friend of yours?" Kakashi asked his student.

Tama smiled lopsidedly at him, "From when I was six. It's so strange not seeing people since I was a kid... I mean, we live in the same village. We should've run into each other before now."

"You all keep very busy." Kakashi observed.

"That could be why."

"Well..." Kakashi steered Sato forward and plopped him into a bedside seat, "I don't think we've eaten. I'll find some edible hospital food for now. Catch up with each other, kids. Before Ken gets here." He plodded out of the room.

"Even Kakashi knows what's up." Sato noted after his uncle had gone, "Did your dad tear into Kakashi too?"

"Not yet. He's still at work." Tama guessed, "Mom came over thirty minutes ago and asked me what I wanted. I begged her to bring me something from the bakery and tell my coworkers that I won't be in... for a while. Hmm! I might get sympathy scones."

Sato pooched his lips, "What's a scone?"

"Delicious."
"That's all I need to know."

"Uncle Gai will probably come by with his team." Tama imagined, tipping her head back, "That'll be nice."

"Yeah, they'll all be in a pleasant mood. I feel bad though. Neji was still limping a little when I saw him this morning." Sato recalled.

Tama clucked her tongue at him. She knew he was responsible for Neji's injuries.

"Come on, everyone's a little roughed up. Lee and Tenten too. I saw them hobbling around at Hinata's party…" Sato started chuckling as he thought about it. "I've got these scary bruises all over me, and I think my butt bone chipped from the falling-out-of-the-tornado incident."

"Tornado?" Tama raised her eyebrows, "You need to tell me more about your match. And it's called your tailbone. Or Coccyx, if you want to be more scientific."

"Whatever you call it, it hurts." Sato whined. He folded forward and mushed his face into the edge of Tama's pillow.

Tama turned her head slightly toward him, "Now you just want attention."

He peeked an eye up at her, "Can you tell?"

"I'll trade your tailbone pain for my full body tingling and numbness." Tama offered, "They adjusted my IV and I'm getting less medication now. I feel way more lucid. Still have the fluffy feeling though! You should try this stuff sometime."

"I think maybe I did get it after the Star Village mission." Sato narrowed his eyes and tried to remember, "My body was majorly screwed up even after Sakura-chan and Tsunade-sama worked on me."

"Oh gosh." Tama then remembered Sato's close shave with death, which she had nearly forgotten, "We need to be more careful."

"I think that kind of goes without saying at this point." He scooched closer and brought his face close to Tama's, "I'm glad we're still here."

Tama possessed more energy than she had overnight, and delightedly kissed him until they were short of breath. Sato settled on his pillow-edge spot again and looked at her, contented.

"Did that make your tailbone feel better?" She asked.

"Totally."

They were interrupted by vigorous knocking on the open door, and looked over to see Sakura grinning at them. She had a stethoscope around her neck and a clipboard in hand.

"Whoa. I came at a good time!" She laughed, gamboling in, "I am so glad you're awake, Tama!"

Sakura scurried over to give her teammate a gentle hug, "Kiba-kun said he'll be by soon! I heard Kakashi-sensei is already here."

"He is. He went to find food, but I already asked my mom to bring me baked goods." Tama confirmed.

"Hmm. I kind of want treats too." Sakura noted to herself, "I might stop there later. Do you mind if I do a couple of tests on you? I was going to take some notes for Tsunade-sama and see where we need to start treatment."

"Please do."

The day before, Sakura had expected not to lift a finger around the hospital for a while. It turned out to be a harder habit to kick than she had thought.

Sakura went through the practiced motions of checking blood pressure, heart rhythm, breathing, pupil dilation, head and neck mobility, and so forth. She glanced over at Sato and was relieved to see him wearing his Chunin vest. He had mostly been watching Tama with a protective look on his face, but Sato eventually made eye contact with Sakura. She seemed thoughtful and optimistic, despite the fact that she confirmed Tama's disablement from the waist-down.

"I don't think I noticed it as much before…" Sakura said as she carefully reclined Tama again to rest, "That you guys are like two halves. Inseparable, in some ways." She moved on to examine Tama's working hand, "It kind of gives me second-hand happiness being around you. I don't know why that is, exactly…"

She scribbled a few things on the clipboard and set it on a physician's table, "Try not to worry or jump to conclusions, Tama. You too, Sato. Tsunade-sama's follow up should get Tama on the right track. I know it."

Her comments bolstered them. Kakashi returned shortly after that and tried to encourage Sakura to stay, "Look, I brought applesauce and onigiri." Hospital food was not very enticing, and she did have a few more patients on the floor to check in on.

Sakura told them to keep their chins up before waving goodbye, carrying on with other duties in the hospital.

By early afternoon, Sakura wrapped up her round in the hospital and returned to the Administrative Building. Tsunade was just about dead on her feet. She had put on her game face for the morning announcement to her new Chunin…but as the day wore on she tarried, shoved papers aside, and snapped at a few visitors to her office.

Shizune had brought the Hokage a pot of green tea and an energy bar. Sakura snickered at the sight as she three-hole punched documents for binder filing.

"What is this?" Tsunade held up the plastic-sealed protein bar.

Shizune frowned at her, "Your lunch."

"I'm going to find something substantial in the break room, not this sad excuse—"

"Not until you look at the preliminary report from Morino-san. It has to be approved and sent out with the affidavit to Iwa. As soon as possible."

"Since when do preliminary findings take up five pages? Ibiki is trying to kill me." The Hokage began peeling the plastic open to get at the snack, resigned.

"You have to get that done, if nothing else. You should not have been so decadent at the party last night." Shizune grumbled over her shoulder, helping Sakura with sliding hole-punched papers into place, "Tsunade-sama, you even said you wouldn't indulge after the exam. We anticipated the workload we'd have today."
"The Hyuga kept pouring the wine. It'd have been rude to refuse their hospitality. And I'll have you know that I had no qualms with getting work done today."

"Pft." Turned away from her mentor, Shizune crossed her eyes at the bookshelf. Sakura laughed out loud.

"Sakura." Tsunade sniffed in annoyance.

"...yes...Tsunade-shishou?"

"Was something funny?"

"Uh..." She gave a cornered look to Shizune.

Tsunade pressed, "Did you complete your check-ins at the hospital?"

"I did—"

"Hmph." Tsunade tossed an interoffice envelope at her apprentice, "You're too ambitious today. Drop that off at the Media and Print building. Then actually rest like I asked you to. At least one of us can."

Without needing to be told twice, Sakura scurried out of the Hokage's office, down the tower's stair, and out onto side streets north toward the small, brick printing offices of the village. She presented the envelope to a clerk who wordlessly took it from her, probably unenthusiastic about his job. This is good! I finished early. I'll go home and clean myself up...fib to Mom about staying over at Ino's...then buy a ton of sweets.' Sakura remembered that she still wanted to drop in at the bakery and treat herself. She hustled across town back to her house.

And then, in true parental fashion, Haruno Kizashi delayed Sakura from her plans for forty-five minutes. He was still so very proud of her and just kept talking and talking...

Laughing at one of her father's corny puns was the appropriate release latch, and Kizashi was so tickled that he barely noticed Sakura sprint to her bedroom in order to gather things for the remainder of the day. Quickly, she changed into less practical, much cuter clothing. She could still hear her father talking to himself out in the hallway.

Sakura could not make a clean escape. On her way back out, her mother exited from the kitchen doorway and set a vase of flowers on a side table. Mebuki gave her daughter a discerning look, "Going somewhere, Sakura?" The overnight bag on her child's shoulder was a dead giveaway.

She stopped and turned slowly on her heel, "Yeah, I finished up my duties today. Tsunade-shishou wants me to take it easy."

"Hm." Mebuki handed Kizashi an empty bowl and a bag of refill potpourri, "A girl's night, then?"

"Ino invited Hinata-chan and I over. You know her sleepover routine: silly board games, staying up late, sugary snacks..."

"You're getting a little old for all of that." Mebuki pointed out astutely, "I suppose that's fine..."

"Oh! We should play a board game tonight, dear." Kizashi was inspired by the idea. He'd filled the potpourri bowl.

Sakura moved in to kiss her father's scratchy cheek, and then her mother's. Mebuki accepted it, but had an attentive glint in her eye.

"Sakura, it's a shame that you didn't bring Gaara-kun over to celebrate with us. Won't he be leaving soon?" She was probing the subject.

"He can drop by tomorrow morning before he leaves. I think." Sakura slid her thumb up and down her bag's strap. 'Play it cool. Mom can smell blood in the water already…'

"Is he busy tonight? Maybe that's why you made plans with Ino." Mebuki and Kizashi moved in opposite directions in the living room, tidying it up.

"Exactly."

Mebuki gave Sakura a long, sharp look. Then she relented.

"Bring him over when he's available. We want to say goodbye, if we don't meet again for a while." The mother smiled knowingly, "I'm sure he'd like to do the same."

Sakura seized the opportunity to diffuse parental suspicion, "I know he does. Gaara likes you both very much." She gave a crinkle-eyed smile to her mother and father, "And that's important to me."

That calmed Mebuki right down, even if she did sense a hint of deception coming from her daughter. Kizashi was flattered by the statement. They told Sakura to have a good time before she tapped her shoes on in the genkan and hurried on her way.

At 4:30 that afternoon, Gaara answered his apartment door. He found Sakura there holding up a large confectionary box like an offering. He blinked at it.

"Once you try what's inside this box," She warned him, "You may love me more."

"I will feel more strongly about you in the future irrespective of food." Gaara replied. He let Sakura inside and closed the door.

She set the box down on the low dining table and was curious as to why it was already set for one. Sakura looked over her shoulder, seeing Gaara fetch another bowl and chopsticks from a kitchen cabinet for his guest, "Oh, were you going to eat?"

"I ordered takeout. It should be here soon."

"So you're having a lazy day?" She nodded in understanding, "I don't mean to—"

"It will be enough for two." Gaara assured her, setting another bowl down on the table. Inquisitive, he pulled the lid of the box up and beheld an assortment of beautiful, unhealthy desserts. Sakura noticed his eyes widen just a touch with I-have-not-eaten-all-day anticipation.

Sakura confirmed, "We're going to be fatties tonight. What kind of takeout did you order?"

"Han food from the Ethnic Quarter."

Awesome. Thank goodness she'd only had a protein bar earlier in the Administrative Building. It was time to pound back saturated fats.

"You don't want to wear your Chunin vest, Sakura?" Gaara asked her. He was walking around the kitchen island, gathering a glass pitcher, ice, and a pot of tea that had been left on the counter to cool. She watched him. He was unusually dressed down.
"No, I brought it home. Call me vain, but I just want to wear pretty things since we got into that habit for the Tournament." Sakura explained, "Gaara-kun...a t-shirt and shorts? Don't you usually wear sashes and drapery?"

"I'm out of clothing." He admitted, filling the pitcher, "Doing laundry now, as a matter of fact."

"Ah." That made sense. No one was laundering clothes for him. He did all of that on his own.

Gaara crossed back to the table and set down the pitcher of cold tea, then took a seat on the zabuton beside Sakura. Before she could utter another word of small talk to him, he moved in and cupped her face, slanting his mouth over hers. Ah, she thought to herself: there it was.

He'd been rather casual about her arrival; even though they were both aware she intended to stay over again. Sakura angled into him and shut her eyes to enjoy the greeting. Gaara kissed her for a long while.

A knock at the door sounded.

Gaara leaned back and looked at Sakura. She appeared dazed, her eyes slitted and lips parted.

"Dinner is knocking." She pointed out.

"I'll get it."

"Why don't you sit and I'll get it?" Sakura started rising, smirking at him.

Gaara pushed her back onto the cushion, "No."

"What? I'm not gonna embarrass you and tell the delivery guy that the Kazekage ordered."

"When you put it that way...I think you will." He laid his hand flat on the top of her head, bidding her to stay put, "As my guest, you will wait here and let me serve you. And don't tease me."

She was grinning, "I came here to tease you."

"Sakura, sit." Gaara ordered. He went to the door, glancing over his shoulder to make sure she wasn't going to rush after him or shout something.

Gaara greeted the delivery-teenager, thanking him as he accepted a brown paper bag. The boy clearly had no idea who he was asking 400 Ryo from. But drats, Gaara realized...he forgot the money on the kitchen counter.

And Sakura had found the paper notes and scurried over, standing beside him to pay the delivery-teenager. Then she let it spill that he had just delivered dinner to the Kazekage, and Gaara gruffed in annoyance as the freckled kid in a cap began to sputter and struggled to come up with the appropriate salutation. Gaara gave him an extra note to keep and shut the door in his face.

"Aw! He had no idea what to do!"

"Sakura—"

"Let's eat!" She pranced back to the table.

Exhaling, he calmed down as he crossed the space and took a seat beside Sakura. She was being playful. He could handle it. Gaara knew he was not in the right head space to dish it back to Sakura or clown around, pajama-bumpkin that he was now. She was pulling food containers out of the bag, evaluating each one while making ooh and ahh sounds. He leaned over discreetly to reach for pork and soybean noodles, getting a whiff of Sakura's hair. She always smelled good. He was starting to do these things automatically while in her presence.

"So...Matsuri isn't joining us?" Sakura wondered, "I kind of wanted to have at least one evening with her."

A grumpy answer, "Well, that won't happen for a while."

She picked up on his inflection and gave Gaara a curious look, "Did something happen?"

"She..." He trailed off and started shoveling golden-fried lamb and spring onion pies onto her serving plate.

"Slow down, that's too much." Sakura smiled with concern, "You didn't have a disagreement-?"

"No. I'm surprised the Hokage didn't tell you." Gaara decided to clarify, "Matsuri is seeing someone."

"Oh-!"

"A Tide Village ninja."

"Oh-!" Sakura was reacting to the news in the exact opposite way he had.

"And now he will act as an ambassador to Suna. I have no idea why I allowed that. I wasn't even drunk." He recalled, "I don't want her to be unhappy...but I don't want him to make her unhappy."

"He won't! What's his name, by the way?"

"Menma."

She nodded before a bite of rice and vegetables, "Ah, that's right."

Gaara chewed on a dumpling lethargically.

"Gaara...such is life. Let her make mistakes and get hurt. Let her date and succeed. She'll come to you if she needs you. You'll always be her teacher." Sakura reminded him, "But I get the feeling Matsuri can handle this and make something good out of it."

"Optimist."

"I know you think that too."

"I do." He admitted with a half-full mouth, "But now I worry more about others being hurt, and not doing enough to stop it. Our villages. You. Everyone."

She paused before another bite, "...what a thing to worry about. So mature."

Gaara grunted at her but smiled a little. The pan-fried pies were the first to go. It only took a few minutes to clear the container.

"These barbecue skewers are kind of burnt..." Sakura noted, passing off the container of chicken. Gaara didn't care. He ate one.

"Did you visit your teammate in the hospital?" Gaara asked, "And how is Sato?"

"Oh! I did. Tama was alert and cheerful. Sato was too, thank goodness." She wilted a bit when she added, "I don't even know where to start with Tama's lower body injuries. We'll need more tests to examine the fractures and nerve damage."

"Can't Tsunade heal her?" He wondered.

"I know she can try. But...it'll be dangerous. Whatever procedure she attempts will be high-risk." Sakura supposed, "I..."

She stopped talking and poured herself some chilled tea. She looked Gaara in the face, shiny-eyed.

"I can't take it anymore." Her voice thickened, "I don't want to lose another teammate. I don't want to take missions without her. Tama's helped me so much." Sakura blinked her eyes and turned away, "I want to do more. To help her. I want her to live and serve as a Chunin like the rest of us."

She sipped her tea and tried to relax. Gaara turned a bit and braced her as she leaned into him.

"Tama-san is fortunate to have someone like you, even if she doesn't recover." He informed her, "She is a true friend to you and is dedicated to your team. She's grown much stronger than when I saw her last."

"All that training so she can waste away in a hospital bed..." Sakura lamented.

Gaara halted her train of thought, "Stop that."

They finished eating and boxed up the leftovers. After tidying up and putting the food away, Sakura followed her boyfriend to the laundry closet after a buzzer sounded. She helped him fold dried clothing.

"Today in Tsunade-shishou's office I was filing employee reports...and I read some of their long-term goals..." Sakura recalled, assisting Gaara with quartering a long sash, "It made me think about what I want to do."

"And what do you want to do?"

"A lot of things. I would like to set up an inter-village conference of Medic-nin and experts annually, to share research and address crises; kind of like a Kage Summit...but that's ambitious at this point."

"It's still an excellent idea." Gaara commended the objective.

"I think that goal is much further out. But maybe in a few years or so...I can get funding and start a bigger, better-staffed mental health clinic. Divisions for children, civilians, shinobi...the clinic we do have in Leaf is kind of falling apart because of its board and administration." Sakura explained, folding pants as she spoke, "I want to run one myself. Correctly. I need to figure out the financial piece, though. Without inviting greedy interests and layabouts into management..."

He agreed, "The quality of the establishment can only be as good as its foundation."

"Did you know that up to 52 percent of active duty shinobi don't seek mental health counseling even when they know they need it?" She quizzed him, "Even when it's affordable or free?"

"Very concerning."

"That's what I said. No one has bothered to do anything about it. I asked Tsunade-sama about using some revenue from the Exam...but she said it's already been mostly spent by the village council on other projects."
Gaara sighed. He knew what it was like when village administrators spent money before anyone had even physically seen it.

"How does Sunagakure compare, on the mental health front?"

"It is less organized and not as available as it is here…though I don't have formal reports on it. I lack the experts to brief with me," Gaara confessed, "I do care. I want to know. I want to hear what you think about it, and have you give me guidance if you can."

Sakura smiled at him and then tottered off with a pile of towels. She went to put them away in a linen closet. Gaara took a pile of folded clothing and carried it by hamper to his bedroom. When he passed the dining room window, he stopped and observed a torrential downpour that had started outside, darkening the evening sky.

"Gaara, should I put towels in the bathroom?" He heard her ask from the linen closet.

"Just two."

"Will do!" Sakura's voice carried down the hall.

While he dawdled at the closet and dresser putting apparel away, Sakura returned to him and waited in the doorway, watching him. She smiled and leaned on the doorframe, "You know what I want to do now…so how about you tell me what you want to do in the future?"

He gave her a wary, side-eye look around the corner of the dresser, "What I want to do?"

"Yes."

"That I'm not already doing or working towards?"

"Yes. Details like that."

"I don't know." Gaara was a bit evasive about it.

"Bullshit—you don't know! Everyone has something they're working towards." She protested.

He did not reply to that. Gaara finished organizing things into drawers and made himself scarce at his bedroom closet, placing tops on hangers. Sakura frowned, annoyed. It was not an especially hard topic to talk about, was it? She was curious. Surely he understood?

She left the doorway without a word. It was suspiciously quiet for six minutes and Gaara concluded his laundry routine, wondering what his girlfriend had gotten up to. He sort of, a tiny bit, did want to tell her what he was looking forward to…but he feared she would not approve of the goal he had in mind. It wasn't typical. He left his bedroom to go looking for her.

"Sakura?"

No answer.

He grumbled to himself and poked into the bathroom, squeaking the door open as he heard water being run. The tub was filled, and beside it Sakura was seated on a bathing stool, completely nude, rinsing herself down with a shower head. She had her back turned to him.

He cleared his throat, miffed, "Sakura."

"Hm?" She glanced back at him, rinsing suds from her shoulders.
"I didn't give you permission to bathe here."

"I didn't know I needed to ask for permission. I'm sorry." She smiled, "Can I take a bath?"

"If you don't, you'll have wasted water."

"Thanks." She took that as a yes.

Even more annoyed, Gaara shut the door and stood in the hallway. Then, he pressed his forehead against it and listened to Sakura bumble around in the washroom. The showerhead had switched off by the sound of it. He took a moment to collect himself. Maybe this was more normal than he thought? Sharing a living space. Maybe he should tell her about the unconventional goal he had in mind?

He took a deep breath and opened the door, finding that Sakura had settled herself in the tub, up to her neck in warm water. She winked at him and said that she really was sorry, "I shouldn't be testing boundaries in your home. It's rude! I wanted to clean up, but I should have asked first."

Gaara shook his head and shut the door behind him. He slid down the wood panel until he sat on the floor where it was dry, ready to stay and talk, "You're not rude. I like that you're comfortable around me."

"I'm rude. But thank you, I am comfortable around you, Gaara."

"I don't mind." His tone of voice evoked a sense of appreciation for the fact she was naked in the tub he used.

Sakura sighed and leaned back, shutting her eyes as she relaxed.

"I do have quite a few expectations for the future." Gaara told her, shattering the silence. She cracked an eye open and listened to him as he went on, "I want Temari and Kankuro to train Genin teams while they still have the energy. They have the skills and mentorship for it. But I've made them both so busy lately...they can't scout for students or read Academy profiles."

"Things will calm down again." Sakura assured him.

"Temari doesn't seem that interested. Not as much as Kankuro is." Gaara recalled discussions with his siblings, and rested his arms over his bent knees, "And down the line I want them installed on the Village Council when they have off from missions. They're already very highly qualified for those seats...and the assembly needs a younger, fresher perspective."

Sakura was chuckling in the tub.

"I don't want Matsuri to get too wrapped up with a sweetheart now. I was going to assign her an apprenticeship to Sand's best Sealing Corps Commissioner, Maki. She already likes Matsuri and sees potential in her. I don't know if I can get her to agree to train that way now if she wants to spend more time and energy on the Tide Village..." He sighed in frustration, "She could be a Jounin if she kept working hard for a few years."

Sakura was optimistic again, "Maybe she can balance it out? Work with Tide and her boyfriend...and still train with the Sealing Corps?"

"I hope so. The only way to know is to ask her to do it." Gaara acknowledged.

"But what about you?" Sakura pressed, "What do you want to do, Gaara?"
"I…” He tilted his head up and looked at the ceiling, pondering, "I want to formalize an agreement with Sand about freeing Shukaku. Once I have it in writing, I can submit it to the council and see how enthusiastic they are about ratifying something like that."

"If they don't like the proposal coming from you alone, maybe you could have portions of it supported by testimony from other jinchuriki?" Sakura suggested.

"Oh." That was a good idea.

"Yeah, if other jinchuriki endorse it and ask their villages to honor similar agreements, you can set a precedent."

"Hm. Cloud and Tide might immediately get on board with that…"

"The Tide village has a jinchuriki?" Sakura squealed, "When did that happen?"

"He's a transplant from Mist. Very talented. Our first meeting went well." Gaara explained, "I should introduce you to him, sometime."

"Wow, that'd be great."

"And along that same line, I want to strengthen deals and build new import incentives for the Tide Village. It could be the greatest opportunity that Hidden Sand has had…since its founding." Gaara estimated, "Which is pathetic from a financial standpoint. That over a hundred years of stagnation and slippage has endured."

"Well, you know…the desert." Sakura said, sticking her toes up from the tub water, "It's not exactly a business utopia."

"But soon it could be. We're nearly there."

"Have you thought about agricultural and greenhouse initiatives-?"

"We have already started a few." Gaara was proud to say.

"Whoa! Where will you build them?" She was impressed.

"There are several locations that daring architects said they can work into semi-subterranean gardens, with the right controls and management."

"How much did that cost?" Sakura snickered.

"The figure keeps going up. It should be worth it." Gaara added finally, "But what I think about most is…retiring in ten years or less."

A soft splash sounded as Sakura pulled her feet beneath the water's surface again, turning to stare at Gaara. He looked back at her and was definitely being sincere, judging by his facial expression.

"You mean…retire from being Kazekage?" She asked, and watched him nod in the affirmative, "You want to be done in ten years or less? Why? You practically just started!"

"It's been two years already. I accomplished quite a few things." He observed calmly.

"But why?" Sakura demanded, astounded, "Can you not…handle it anymore? Is it not what you thought?"
"It's a privilege. It's been very rewarding." Gaara assured her, his expression softening, "I just want there to be an end to it. To the work. To...the distance between us." He confirmed, "I can't stand being far away from you anymore, Sakura. I've thought about what your parents said. I won't make things harder for you if I don't have to."

She was a stuttering mess, slick strands of pastel hair clung to her temple and cheek, "...u-uh...you m-mean—?"

"I know I can live happily in Leaf and be proud of the legacy I leave in Sand." Gaara stated plainly. He was watching her reaction from across the bathroom, amused by her surprise and timidity.

"You mean..." Sakura adjusted her warbling voice, "You want to live...with me?"

"Yes. I would retire tomorrow if I could, but I need to round off my responsibilities."

She held up her hands, overwhelmed, "Wait! You don't need to do anything like that, Gaara! I can move. Really. I have no problem with going to Suna when I get the clearance to-!"

"I dislike how that would remove you from your family and friends. Your parents were concerned about you sacrificing so much for me." Gaara assured her, "I feel the same way they do."

"They're your family and friends too, you know." Sakura insisted.

They went quiet for a while and thought about it.

Sakura scooched down in the tub and ruminated on the possibility. It came with many implications. She blew a few bubbles and tried to muster the courage to ask the question that was really weighing on her mind, at that point.

Almost inaudibly, Sakura asked a question half-gurgled from the water. She was abruptly shy and soft-spoken.

Gaara was turned toward her and seated on the floor, scrunching his face to try to understand, "I didn't hear you, Sakura."

"Um..."

"What did you say?" Gaara needed her to repeat it.

"...I asked..." She could form the words a bit clearer this time, "Do you...want a...family?"

He regarded her with rounder, wider eyes, processing the inquiry. Then he bounced the question back at Sakura, "Do you?"

"What? No, you can't deflect it, I asked you first!" Sakura griped. She was trying to shrink into the tub as if to hide, embarrassed.

Gaara took another twenty seconds to look at her and think.

"I do want a family." It was a basic answer. Sakura watched him noodle on it for a few more seconds.

A tidal wave of honesty suddenly came out of his mouth, "I want to have children. I don't know why I've thought about it so much, but I have. When you came to Suna for the training workshop, I kept thinking." Gaara continued the stream of consciousness tangent, "Many children. I like children; actually...they've grown on me..."
Sakura had adopted the reflexes of nervous poultry from her spot in the tub. Shocked, she needed to stop his narrative and held up a finger, interrupting Gaara, "Okay. To clarify…you want children with me?"

"Did I leave that part out?" He couldn't remember.

"I don't know. Maybe it was implied? But I really need you to tell me what qualifies as many children in your opinion." Sakura notified him, "Can you…?"

"Four." Gaara said.

"Ah, no." She panned it, "I want to continue my career."

"Three." He countered.

"Again, by what persuasion do you expect me to manage that even if I'm in Sand? Because Temari and Kankuro may have their own families and maybe they don't want to babysit?" Sakura wrapped a tidy rejoinder around it, "Ugh. And my mother would ruin them in Leaf…"

"I see how this is going to work." Gaara was getting it, "Two…because that is the standard nuclear family and I will persuade you. I can be relied upon while caring for them and raising them. It wouldn't be your responsibility alone. I'll have the time."

Sakura continued to shrink the number, "1.5, because that's a modern average and I like it better."

"That isn't even a whole number." Gaara complained.

"The 0.5 is a pet and the 1 is the kid."

Gaara replied, "I don't like pets unless they are autonomous and hygienic."

"…I think you misunderstand what a pet is." She snarked at him.

"Sakura," He got serious about the subject, "You can do and achieve whatever you want to. I won't make it so you are burdened or impeded in any way. You have a sharp mind for policy and improvement. You'd make a better Kage than I. You are a more charismatic, personable mover and shaker than I can ever hope to be. So work, imagine, and create things if that's what you want to do." Gaara quelled her fears by admitting, "I can be at home with children. I would like that."

She swallowed hard. He had batted her heart out of the park— a home run.

"Now I'm more inclined towards two kids because you said that." She told him, "But you know…all of this requires the act of making, carrying, and then pushing the watermelon through the orange… which has always scared me in a vain sort of way…"

Gaara pointed out, "We don't have to decide now."

"Right, right…"

"Whatever compromises need to be made, we can make them when we're ready. You have greatness and genius that you need to share," Gaara told her, "I need you to take higher-level missions and advise councils, to advocate for your ideas— which are an incredible asset…sow the seeds for your goals now. I will help you."

She felt jittery. Sakura nodded to him, smiling like an idiot, and then lowered her forehead to her raised knees. Not only did he call her a genius, but he was emphasizing the importance of her using that talent to bring about change. Gaara pushed himself up from the floor to stand. She watched him from the corner of her eye.

Goodness, she was besotted with him. Sakura did a mental, backwards search for the stupid reasons why she had once thought Sasuke had been worth her time. He had asked for so much and given so little. Now it finally felt like she had found love that was rooted in equality and respect. It was powerful. Gaara made her feel strong.

On his way out of the bathroom Gaara said he would bring clean night clothes for her. She thanked him before the door clicked shut.

Sakura stared at the wall and was hyper-conscious of her elevated heartbeat. The excitement had gone from a shade of surreal to tangible ecstasy. 'Lucky does not even describe it anymore…' She composed herself, took a breath, and then stood from the tub to towel off. She drained the water and neated the room.

Well,' Sakura thought to herself, 'I brought condoms this time. And I know I am going to be using them…because, boy, did we come up with a great plan after that talk.'

Wrapped in her towel, Sakura accepted the clothes that Gaara handed off to her at the door. She raised her eyebrows, realizing he had given her a shirt and shorts of his own. She responded to Gaara's wary look and explained, "This is fine, but-! I brought clothes with me in my bag."

"Oh, I'll—"

Sakura shut the door and laughed, "Sorry, I think I want to wear these more!" She heard him give up and walk down the hallway. She shed her towel and dressed, thrilled that she had a chance to wear something of her boyfriend's. 'Maybe I can sneak off with these and borrow them? I wanted something of Gaara's while he's gone again.' Then she remembered she had the key to his flat. She could come by anytime she wanted and run amok in the place. Nap on the couch; try on clothes in his room…

She decided that would be intrusive. She would probably still do it, though. Sakura regarded herself in the mirror, intrigued by the deep, draped 'v' at the front and back of the black shirt. This is very desert-dweller…'The shorts were burgundy and soft and she wanted to steal them.

Sakura ventured out and found Gaara at the dining table again, frisking the box of desserts. She plopped down beside him on a cushion, "You pick first, Gaara."

"I don't know what most of this is."

"Well you must've had daifuku before. You know what that is." Sakura presumed.

"Sometimes Haku would get it." Gaara acknowledged. He picked up the glutinous rice cake and bit into it, then turned to her in surprise.

"There are whole strawberries inside the red bean paste," She informed him, "Good, isn't it?"

He nodded and then pointed to a square tart. He wanted to know what it was.

"Carrot cake." She laughed lightly.

Gaara finished chewing, "Not real carrots…"

"They're dissolved in the batter. It's not very noticeable. Delicious, if you ask me."
"Why is there a design of a rabbit on it?"

Sakura split a piece with him, "Because the baker thought it was cute? Carrots. Rabbits. You know…"

Gaara said nothing and wolfed it down. He continued scrutinizing the treats.

It took a moment before he appraised, "The daifuku is better."

"It's the strawberry inside that makes it a winner." She agreed.

"What is that golden cube?"

"Honey toast. They put chocolate on it for me." Sakura tittered and pulled a corner of the treat off, letting him try it.

He was sitting closer, she noticed. They stared each other in the face while eating and ripping the honey-chocolate toast to pieces. It was the clear favorite.

"Nothing sugary is made in Suna." Gaara was a tad mournful about it.

"Maybe that's to your benefit." Sakura theorized, "I think I can feel my arteries being blocked as I eat this." She licked a syrupy spot off of her thumb after carelessly handling her treat.

"It's an enjoyable way to die." Gaara was eyeing the daifuku again, but canted his head to watch Sakura try to manage her sticky hands. Gently, he plucked her wrist up and did not break eye contact with her when he brought her hand to his mouth.

She inhaled harshly from her nostrils and pursed her lips, wondering what stupid face she was making as Gaara lapped the honey's sheen from her fingertips. Daring, he watched her face emote a variety of feelings in a rainbow of expressions, sucking her pointer finger clean. Sakura sat on her heels, stunned, dropping her hand to her lap after Gaara let it go. In her mind, where a clear, coherent inner voice usually sounded to direct her thought processes, she found only a static buzz.

It looked like he was about to say something, but Sakura quickly poked her hand into the box and drew it out, sticky again. Gaara gazed at her incredulously.

"…look at that…w-would you mind…?" She was a mix of amused and skittish when Gaara made no comment and raised her hand again to lick it clean.

"…look at that…w-would you mind…?" She was a mix of amused and skittish when Gaara made no comment and raised her hand again to lick it clean.

Focus shifted away from dessert altogether. The heated, aching, whirring sensation between her primly folded thighs, her sense of smell sharpening, and taste along with it…Sakura was heavily fuddled by her awareness of him. She leaned forward and narrowed her eyes, watching him hold her hand as if it were a delicate, small thing that needed protecting…

Gaara leaned back to avoid her attempted kiss. He was still watching her. She blinked in confusion, scooching in again, only to be evaded as he slipped back a little on a floor cushion. Bewildered, Sakura then began to detect that he was teasing—a subtle, impish look on his face.

"Kiss me, jerk." She furrowed her brow at him.

"I did that already." He recalled that she had been thoroughly kissed when she first stopped over.

Sakura briefly debated holding him down and getting what she asked for, but she feigned hurt instead and turned her face to the side, drooping, her hand slipping out of Gaara's. Like many a girlish actress, her on-the-verge-of-tears face was a reliable standby. He moved in again and murmured softly against her slender neck. His hands had roamed, sliding down her arms, and Gaara spun her nearly a full-turn while she sat on her zabuton. He faced her back. Sakura trembled and felt him push aside the curtain of her hair, pressing an open-mouthed kiss to the nape of her neck.

It occurred to Sakura that she didn't need to demand anything from him or continue teasing him. Gaara definitely knew what she wanted. 'So I'll just…let him…' Her brainwaves were scrambled. The game was afoot. He wanted to seduce her. He didn't need any guidance. Gaara's kisses traveled down her back, free to descend and graze her skin where the shirt dipped. He tugged a little on the fabric, nearly reaching her lower back. The kissing and pressure from his hands folded Sakura forward, bent almost in a formal floor bow.

His hands moved along her flanks over the draped top. Gaara was kissing his way up, but he kept Sakura in that tucked, vulnerable position. She wasn't resisting. She was calm and alert to every touch, sighing sometimes. Gaara edged in closer, pressing against her to reach her neck again, carding his fingers through short, pink locks; kissing her skin. A soft nip at the round of her right shoulder elicted a shudder. Sakura had her head turned sideways, only able to see Gaara's hand pressed flat to the wood floor beside her face. He was working diligently.

The attention to her shoulders, neck, and the backs of her ears felt good and was quite romantic, Sakura thought to herself. Romantic was nice, but she was hoping for more progressive action. With a brief, nondescript motion, she raised her hips and ground her backside into his front. A frantically thoughtful silence followed. From her viewpoint near the floor, angled in a rather provocative position, Sakura watched Gaara's hand lift away from the hardwood. She felt him replace his hands at her waist, anchoring her. Her ears did not lie: he had moaned softly.

That was a new reaction, 'What a great sound. I need to make him do that again…'

Fascinated by the effect this had on Gaara, she pushed back against him with her bottom and rubbed. His feedback was louder— a strangled groan that quieted in a hiss. He was very, noticeably hard and snug against the cleft of her ass. 'Hmm. What to do? Gaara seems to like this, even if we're not face-to-face, so…'

For the sake of science and her own curiosity, Sakura ground against him again, without pausing to see what he would do. The response from the ordinarily quiet man behind her was a piercing, reactive wail, and Gaara's grip on her hips roughly sunk into her flesh. Abruptly, he let go and shimmied away from her. Sakura peeked over her shoulder, slowly sitting upright again after he'd retreated. Gaara was assessing her too, flustered.

"Now why did you stop? That was the perfect thing to do while we're not aspectant." She didn't turn around completely, hoping he'd be willing to proceed with the newfound pastime.

"I was…” Gaara was a bit flushed, "I didn't want to hurt you."

"You weren't. It was great." Sakura assured him, and then boldly taunted, "Come on, Gaara. I'll take something off if you do."

His brain was on two second delay, "Take something off of myself?"

"Yes. Remove your own clothing. We'll make it fun, and hopefully not awkward."

She was impish and snickering over her shoulder at him. Enticed, but lacking blood in the northern portion of his body, Gaara agreed and sat behind Sakura, watching her back and wondering what to do.

'Good. Stripping will move us along.' Sakura was gloating to herself, pulling her top off over her head, That suggestion helped, I think. Gaara takes direction well.

To be coy, Sakura swiped a spot of chocolate from what remained of the honey toast on the table. She turned to look at her boyfriend, as alluring and topless as possible, and sucked the sweetness off of her fingertip. Certainly he would react to such temptation! Then she got an eyeful of Gaara, who she expected to match her state of undress…and squawked in startlement.

He was not a modest, shy kind of naked— Gaara was up on his knees, staring at her, lanky muscle, pale skin, with a raging erection type of naked.

So. He had missed the point of the playful exercise. His clothes were strewn about on the floor.

"Gaara…" Sakura cleared her throat and averted her eyes, her face scarlet, "One article at a time…is what I meant. I-I…wanted you to copy what I did."

He had moved closer. Sakura could feel the warmth of his body as he kneeled behind her and spoke, "But this was the end result you were thinking of."

"Yeah, but not quite so quick." She admitted.

"I know." He acknowledged loftily, "That's why I did it." Gaara traced a hand in dreamy patterns over her bare back, "And I think you should copy me."

"I…eh-hem…I definitely am going to…" Sakura kept her eyes on Gaara's face when she turned toward him again. Sometimes, no matter how sly she thought she was, Gaara was a pinch more cunning when it counted. Or it only looked that way, and he was really just winging it— not in the least embarrassed.

The kisses were much tastier mid-dessert, and since Sakura's hands were busy with his bare shoulders and chest she let him slide her shorts off. Maybe he shouldn't have dressed her after her bath, Gaara wondered while flicking said shorts across the room. Maybe Sakura would have let him sweep her up and toss her into bed while she was fabulously naked and pruny? Though the idea crossed his mind, he had prioritized good manners and boxed confections first. Not the worst way to go about it, they could agree.

Then there was nothing cute or modest about it. She had nearly climbed into his lap, voraciously claiming his mouth, and Gaara traced his hands over the softest, most sacred parts of her body. Outside, a rumble of thunder accompanied the rainstorm. Sakura flicked an eye to the darkened window, her brain still considering things in the background of pleasure and exploration.

"I wonder how often people…in Konoha…" She tried to speak around his kiss, "Disrobe in their dining rooms?"

"Probably not very often." Gaara estimated. He relished the soft sound Sakura made when her breasts were meticulously rubbed in circles, a silken touch. He pulled her closer and tipped her head back for a kiss.

Sakura's reasoning capability was rapidly shrinking. Undeniably, it was going to happen. Dessert had been a good call on her part. Or maybe the bath had been? And yet, she just couldn't abide the wide space of the dining area and the window that gave the dark evening a glimpse of their activity. With a quiet, smack sound, she interrupted another kiss, "Local voyeurs are in for a show…and they may ask you later who did your nice, new floors." She jested, "Gaara, you have a perfectly good bed…"

He agreed with a weird growling sound and scooped her up. For the road, Sakura snatched a daifuku and bit half of it away. She crammed the rest of the mochi ball into Gaara's mouth as he relocated her. Down the hallway he finished chewing and requested, "Buy more of those."

Once in the bedroom, Sakura made nonsensical, delighted sounds and did not care that she was just about hurled onto the top of a fluffy comforter. She briefly took stock of her surroundings—fresh sheets, lights out, occasional illumination by lightning in the room, and her bag sat neatly on the bedside table like a good little overnight bag should.

Gaara wrapped his hand around her ankle and pulled Sakura toward the bed's edge, firm yet gentle with the motion. She blinked and watched him, wanting to ask what was on the agenda…but she didn't say anything. She sucked in a breath when he kneeled down and slid his hand up her leg, lifting it, pressing kisses past her calf and inner thigh. He roamed up again, over her hips, kissing her stomach and took time to dote on raised nipples, listening to her mumble. Gaara gravitated back towards the porcelain of her stomach after a time, reverent. Sakura watched in wonder; feverish, excited, and curious about what he intended to do.

"Are you alright?" His voice sounded lower, sultry to her ears. Gaara's eyes turned up to look at her face from where he hovered over her navel.

She trilled her answer, "Yes! Uh-herm! Sorry. Yes, why don't you come up here?"

"I will. But not yet." His face looked positively sharp and irresistible in the dim light.

Sakura liked trolling her fingertips over his smooth skin, the knolls and sinew of muscle, then tracing lightly across his scalp. He was using his mouth to get better acquainted with her features, and for now she would do the same with her clever hands. Whenever he decided to join her on the bed, she figured, he wouldn't object to an onslaught of kisses. Then Gaara moved down again. She hadn't expected his sudden relocation between her legs, or how he unabashedly pressed his mouth to her folds. Sakura shrieked in surprise.

He snapped back and ended the contact, acknowledging her with wide eyes, "Should I not-?"

"Don't. No, I mean…do it again. Don't mind the vocalization, please." Sakura struggled to communicate, frantic, aching and excited, "It was new. It's alright. Gaara, please do it again?"

Gaara evaluated her for a long moment, reading between the lines of consent to see if she actually meant it—actually wanted him to do it. That grimacing face of hers…it was impatience and desire on a pale canvas, framed by her damp, blush hair. He had to look down and away, cowed by her beauty. Sakura made another annoyed, encouraging sound at him. Then he bent and resumed, testing with a flick of his tongue.

Sakura was still rather noisy but he paid less attention, wondering at this strange, new human part that was so smooth and pliant under his mouth. Without thinking much, Gaara slid his hand to the space below her bellybutton and held there. He shut his eyes and brushed his lips aimlessly, dipping his tongue when he felt bolder, aware of Sakura's approving sounds and wriggling. Testing, tasting.

His mind went to a way-station at the precipice of consciousness. 'Oh. We won't be friends anymore.' Gaara thought, 'Not like how I used to know you and wish for you as a friend. Then, at the Academy. On summer days when we were younger, and you never stood too close to me, Sakura.' He lapped at a sensitive spot, thinking, 'I will always want you more. Not in simple ways. I want you to give me everything. I want you to take everything I have. To stay close.'

Her touches were busy skimming any part of him she could reach, furling in his hair at times. Gaara listened as Sakura gave him directions, breathy and vague though they were. A few instructions were nearly too scientific in nature, and Sakura bit her tongue, trying to muffle her logical talk and keep it sexy. Before long, her boyfriend struck the ideal balance of pressures and attention with his tongue and lips. Her wailing was a very good indicator, so Gaara took the cue and continued what he was doing, hearing the pitch rise; Sakura's groaning was a lightning strike to his brainstem.

She nearly ripped hair out of his head, suddenly caterwauling. Gaara took care not to overreact or cease contact. He did watch in fascination as Sakura thrashed and made disbelieving sounds. Her head lolled on her neck and her pink lips parted— he did not look away, his mouth still canny at work. Gaara did take liberties as she peaked, enticed by the experience of it, and slid down her folds over the flesh bridge below. Though he was stimulated by the texture and taboo, Sakura made a definitively shocked grunt of objection and surprise.

She patted his cheek and pushed his face away. Sakura was panting and chattering nonsensically, "Was the— huh, did you-? Ah…whew…down there…was that—? Intentional." She breathed deeply, her chest heaving beautifully. Gaara stared. It took a bit for him to compose an answer.

"Should I have not done that?" He wondered, genuinely ignorant.

Sakura was moderately oxygenated, "I…it's weird. It's never been…the most I've ever done for myself…uh." She shook off her embarrassment, "That made it feel way better, but I can't condone you…going that far down, right now. Hygiene! I hate to give a health rant, but that sort of venture goes best with some preparation. You understand, right? The need for prep."

"I understand." Gaara confirmed, clambering up onto the bed beside her.

"But damn it felt good." Sakura added as an afterthought. She had only ever manually pleasured herself all by her lonesome. It was extraordinary to rocket to new levels and feel unfamiliar, insurmountable things because of him.

They rolled on their sides to face each other, pawing lazily and curiously. Sakura grinned at him, "Thank you, Gaara. That was a nice maiden voyage."

"That's what it was, wasn't it?" He was pleased and speaking against her mouth, in-between oddly flavored kisses, "I want to do that to you every day."

"-now think about—"

"Before work. Every day." Gaara decided to himself. He had palmed her ass cheeks in each hand, kneading them while his lips traveled down her neck.

"Do I have to set the bar that high?" Sakura wondered if it had to be reciprocal treatment. She had a hand wrapped around the urgent erection between their stomachs. He stopped moving and sucked wind sharply when the pad of her thumb grazed over the underside bundle of nerves. Sakura made a note of the reaction.

He assured her, "You just have to show up."

"Ah. I got it. Oh gosh, I should know now not to accept missions you request me for. It'll be a trap." She teased.

"A trap." Gaara's voice was changing octaves as her fingertips skimed sensitive flesh. It was too much. She did so little to make him feel so much.

His verbal communication had tragically declined. All power had been diverted to the groin, away from extremities. He was poised to snap like an elastic band—so close…

Gaara rolled away from her and escaped Sakura's fast-learner hand. She pouted at him.

"Just a brief stop." Wow, he managed to speak. Gaara was aware of how it sounded like he was being strangled. Without a break in the action it'd have been over with half a second ago.

Sakura, of course, understood. She regarded him as he laid belly-down on the bed, running her hands from the crown of his head and southbound over his back, surfing down to the backs of his legs. "Oh." She discovered his ass, and with it, rediscovered the dimples of his lower back, "This is perfection I don't see often."

He snorted at her.

"Are you relaxing? We're not done yet. And shush. I like your butt." Sakura informed him.

Within twenty or so seconds Gaara had pushed himself up, seized her wrists, and toppled Sakura over onto crinkling down and pillows. Their staring match was organic and amenable, but Gaara slowly began to choose alluring locales on her body: clavicle, the curves of her breasts, pert nipples, ribcage—nipping and growling. Sakura writhed under those attentions for a time.

Gaara raised his head to peer up at her. His eyes were begging long before he said, "I want to be inside of you." Sakura stared back at him, processing as he requested, "Please. Can I?"

She gave him a comically solemn look, "Yes. You can."

He nearly forgot himself and proceeded. With a touch of super-strength, Sakura batted him aside and reached for her obediently present overnight bag. Gaara watched her and slowly caught on that, oh right, she was trying to be practical and responsible. Like last time. And he still wasn't thinking much about those virtues, even though he'd pontificated about them earlier in the bathroom. His stunted thought processes, Gaara accepted, probably had to do with arousal and other biological impediments.

A finger snap got his attention while his mind and eyes wandered. He blinked at Sakura. She held up a square of plastic packaging in front of his face. With as much dignity as she could muster, Sakura asked him, "So…ever used one of these before?"

Mildly offended, he frowned at her.

"That's a no?"

"I have never had sex before you. Dispose of the searching questions and just ask me if you were concerned." Gaara sniffed at her.

She felt a little bad that she had bothered to be insecure about it. He wasn't exactly a ladies' man. Or anyone's man. Gaara was the bare minimum of social, most days.

"Right…then perhaps you've seen a condom and know what to do with it?"

"I suppose I know. I've seen them in my brother's drawer."

"That was…too much information." Sakura sighed.
"Teach me." Gaara invited. So she did, with a red face, demonstrate correct application and helpful tips that had been shared with her. After that, it was on and he looked down at himself as if he'd made some determination while Sakura sat anxiously beside him. If she wound herself up anymore she'd have a fit of nervous hiccups.

She cleared her throat and gave him options, "Front or back? You…kind of liked it from behind when we were—"

Gaara seemed even more annoyed by her implication, "No." He brushed against her and pushed her down onto her back, "It's impersonal that way. It might hurt you."

"I don't know about that…and either way…" Sakura gave a small shrug.

"I want to see you." He supplied her with the actual rationale and it was enough. Gaara aligned himself with her body and was still accepting kisses, though distractedly. He paid more attention to her slow, luscious explorations with her tongue, savoring his mouth. She was trembling. Sakura's jitters allayed when Gaara folded his hand over hers, holding her in a protective manner.

Mid-kiss she tensed at the pressure of entry, somewhat relieved by the fact that she was obscenely, messily lubricated. A deluge of worries crashed in her thoughts, and Sakura addressed it for a millisecond before noticing something remarkable. She distinctly felt him, cautiously easing in, his fingers laced with hers while Gaara grumbled in a variety of tones. 'Whoa. Wait.' The alien feeling was suddenly marvelous and not what she'd anticipated, 'I was told this hurts. I do not…agree with that.' To her happy surprise, it was a very agreeable sensation. Perhaps because of all of the other pleasure signals hailing her brain and body at the moment, but she'd take it. No complaints.

Gaara, for his part, was far beyond that mild acknowledgment. Fully seated inside of her, everything was amplified. Sakura's deep kisses and stray touches were insane. The caress of her ankle moving up his hip, when she was relaxed enough to cinch her legs around his waist...he understood what all of the fuss was about— why people wanted to do this. He was unashamed of the peculiar grunts and moans he uttered against her skin. Sakura seemed pleased by those noises. Though timidly, she matched the slow rhythm he'd established.

The way she looked when she squirmed, moving his free hand to a breast, glorious skin to skin, moving beneath him, tightening around him...he opened his mouth while inhaling her soapy smell, lost in sensitivity. Gaara groaned and stopped moving completely. He didn't want to finish. There had to be a way to prolong such a divine act.

Oh. But she was a trickster and brat; and Sakura ground herself into him— a minuscule in-and-out slide that made everything wild and dim and sensory. Gaara's rational thought and "present self" were hurled into mental wilderness. He didn't fight or protest what she was doing. He was meeting her in a fanatical epicenter of vulnerability. How could something feel so good that a mortal had a louder, abstract concept of death? Did she feel this way too?

Gaara tried asking her that, but the words came out sloppy.

"It is very good." She was smiling and had an arm draped around his shoulders. He motioned for her to stop moving and she did.

He exhaled roughly, "Try not to move. I don't want to…"

"I know…" Some of her playfulness had come back and replaced apprehension, "There's no rush. They say a man's first time is pretty short—" Gaara pressed a finger to her lips quiet her. She'd still made her point.
It was hard to look at her she was so beautiful. The dark of the room couldn't dim her radiance. Sakura's tea-leaf eyes were bright and seemed to pierce through him. It made him ache.

"You're not in pain?" Gaara asked a bit late.

"No. This is not what others told me it would be." Sakura confirmed, "Maybe it's because we were so occupied beforehand…or my pain threshold is way beyond this." She found a spot on his neck that needed to be nibbled and kissed.

"Sakura, I don't know how…to tell you…" He was sighing and rumbling, slowly thrusting again, "How good it feels to be inside of you."

"We're not poets. Besides, I can kind of tell just by looking at you…what it must be like." Her hands were all over the place and setting his skin a-tingle.

"Then look at me." Gaara's eyes were narrowed and his face a breath away from hers, bearing down on her and moving faster. She made a small sound of aroused accord, sinking her nails into his shoulder and back. She kept her eyes on him.

The proximity and tightness— the pleasure of Sakura's reactions, mewls, and touches; it made him moan and cry out in ways he had never dared. Every nerve ending that Gaara had was his new best friend. The emotions playing across Sakura's features, it was as if he instantly understood the dozens of feelings she was experiencing all at once. It was so strange. She thrashed more when he got bolder, deeper. She softly vocalized and watched him.

Then the far-off wilderness feeling in his mind condensed down to a tiny focal point. Gaara could only stare at her face in wonder and let himself come. It was visceral clarity. Short-lived and intense. Nothing remarkable or outrageous about it, the two entwined and making low sounds; Gaara pressing his face into the curve of her neck to ride out the waves. It was curiously simple as well as profound. Sakura relished his vulnerable countenance during and after orgasm.

For a long while they stayed in the embrace, brushing each other lightly with fingertips and lips. Intrigued, Sakura lifted his hand and noticed claw tips that had sprouted, "This again? That's two for two."

"I got the sheets rather than your skin, thankfully."

"It's fine. It'll just be our normal." She proclaimed cheerfully.

He groaned tiredly when he pulled out. Sakura was briefly fascinated by the drenched condom and then helpfully handed Gaara a tissue. He sat on his knees and removed the sheath, wrapped it up, and chucked it in a waste bin on the far side of the room. Simultaneously, the pair toppled over in a heap.

###

"Sa-akura." Gaara rolled onto his back and took her along, ignoring her disgruntled puff as he squeezed her.

"Gaara." She said, "Blanket." It was chilly. He got the hint and pulled back the comforter, settling beneath it with her. Sakura happily curled into him, tucking her hands against Gaara's chest, "When no one's around you get louder. Not by much…but I liked it."

Gaara traced his fingertip (now clawless) along the shell of her ear, "Good. You are the only one who is going to hear me like that."
"Well, that's the idea. But when Naruto and Haku are home it'd be polite to keep it down."

"Absolutely not." Because for the grief they gave him, Gaara believed they could put up with occasional bedroom snarling down the hall.

She poked him, "You're terrible."

"At least I am consistent about it."

"True. You never coddle them. Naruto once told me you like to tell him to eat shit and die when he needs your help."

"That's how I sign off my letters to him." Gaara confirmed.

Sakura snickered merrily at the thought. Then she asked, "Oh! That reminds me: what have you put Haku up to? Was he overseeing something that stopped him from entering the Exam?"

"Yes." Gaara lied flatly and efficiently.

"Oh. Ino made me wonder. What sort of work is it? Is he enlisted in the Medical Corps in Suna?" She was endlessly curious.

"Not exactly enlisted in the Medical Corps, though he is trained in Medical Jutsu." Gaara confirmed at least that much from Haku's most recent correspondence.

"Not exactly?" Sakura pried impishly, "Black Ops, then?"

"I can't get into detail about it due to confidentiality." He muttered against her hair.

She stated smugly, "I knew it. And Ino kept speculating. Well! Tell Haku-kun I wish him well and that he stay safe."

"Of course."

"Is he in good spirits? Do you two spend time-?"

"Sakura—"

"You know we miss him! We don't hear about him as much as Naruto-kun…"

"He's…not in the best of spirits. He and my sister…" Gaara trailed off and shook his head, wondering why the hell he was entertaining the subject, "To be honest, Sakura…I'm done talking about him."

"Hm." She reflected on the shutdown.

"Haku is alive and working. He irritates me." Gaara gave her that much, "Confidentiality, as I said."

"Right, I understand. It's policy." She nodded sleepily, "We can talk about something else."

"Such as how I want to take you back with me to Suna," He squeezed her gently in the confinement of his arms, "And wake up to you every day."

"Mmmm…that sounds nice. But remember we kind of agreed on a plan?" Amused, Sakura pulled the comforter higher to warm her neck and ears.
"We can amend the plan."

"How do you suggest we do that?"

"Come with me. Then we make a new plan."

"I think an amendment would have to happen before I go anywhere." Sakura double-poked his pectoral.

"I'll speak to the Hokage in the morning and order your reassignment." Judging by how Gaara said it, Sakura determined the statement was 90 percent a joke and 10 percent serious.

"Tsunade-shishou would love to hear you out now that she just promoted me and wants to add to my workload." She ventured further, "And an inter-village reassignment also needs approval from both corresponding administrative panels."

"Those panels almost always go along with what a Kage approves."

"True." Sakura traced her fingertips along his hip bone, "But why abuse your power like that and make yourself look like a douche?"

"I wasn't serious."

"You kind of were."

"I'm tired of being away from you, Sakura." He repeated his earlier frustration and snuggled closer. She sighed.

"I know…" Her eyes were feeling heavy, "I'll tell you what. Give me a hand scrounging up funding so I can establish that new clinic I mentioned. I'll make sure I find staff and administrators I trust to hand it off to, once it's running smoothly. Maybe we can set up a network with Sand and Tide?"

"That is substantial funding you're talking about." He noted.

"You've thrown that kind of money at Tide already." Sakura countered.

"Only after getting screamed at by committees, did I make that happen."

"Will you just talk to the right people for me?" Exasperated, Sakura gave him a light shake.

"I will."

"In exchange, maybe I'll…spend extended periods of time with you, while you're still working as Kazekage. Maybe we'll change our minds about where we want to live?"

"I like the idea. But Suna has no hot springs or sweet shops. Not like here." Gaara considered.

She teased, "That's a steep downside alright."

"If you think about it," Gaara yawned, "It really is."

Several days and nights passed with frequent rain showers. As a result, Neji's seventeenth birthday was a low-key affair at the Hyuga household and was hosted indoors. The next day the sun finally came out again.
That particular post-birthday morning, Neji got his way when it came to eking out more time with Tenten. It had not taken much convincing for Lee and Gai to agree to a special Wushu lesson with Wong Leung downtown. Tenten, of course, was invited to the Hyuga estate.

"Did you get your stitches out?" She was optimistic, trotting alongside him towards the Main House courtyard.

"I did."

"About time. Sakura also said my arm is in perfect working order again." She was smiling a lot.

Tenten had not been able to attend his formal birthday celebration, but the team dinner with Lee, Gai, and Wong Leung had been very festive. It had been evident that Wong was very happy that Neji had thought of him, even if he didn't give thanks for the invitation. Since the informal team party, being promoted to Chunin, and visiting Tama (who was doing quite well, all considered) Tenten was positively buoyant.

Her good mood was rubbing off on him. Neji suppressed a smile, and motioned for her to hand over his jian once they stopped in the square dirt yard. Tenten handed Mo-Ye over to him. Neji cocked his head and looked at the sword in her other hand.

"That isn't Hok." He pointed out.

"No. This is Mo-Ye's mated jian, Gan-Jiang." Tenten handily unsheathed it so he could see the work she put into spiffing the retired sword up, "It was just sitting there in the shop cabinet. I felt bad."

Neji was interested, "Were these used often in the past?"

"I think so. My dad always kept them around." She ambled off into Wushu steps to test out her swings and thrusts, speaking over her shoulder to Neji, "Dad said he named them for a folktale he enjoyed. Like everything else he named, really."

By that point, Neji was aware that though he had never met the man, Tenten's father had been an avid reader of literature.

They went about a Wushu sword routine that Wong Leung had demonstrated prior to the Exam Tournament. Tenten noticed when Neji's crouching step fell out of time with hers during the synchronized drill. She laughed at him, "What's the matter? Partied too hard yesterday?"

Tenten made him start over. The second attempt went much better. Moving in unison, the pair kept a safe distance and completed forms. Hanabi's former babysitter, Natsu, stopped on the veranda for a minute to watch. The green haired woman gasped in delight at the impressive, spinning leaps andslashes. She gave them a little wave before pressing on with household chores.

At a break, Tenten stopped at the porch and sipped from a thermos of tea. Without a word, she held it up and offered it to Neji, but he stood by and shook his head. No sooner had she turned her back and swallowed, she ducked under his swing for her head. 'This isn't the first time Neji launched an unprovoked sword attack on me. Must be how he flirts…'

With good humor, she accepted the challenge and sparred with him— even if he was a bit slow and stiff from his Chunin Exam injuries. Tenten kept it a mild contest because, 1) she hated dinging blades during practice and was a stickler about maintaining them, and 2) it'd be rude to thoroughly whoop him at his own residence.

At the end of a long exchange of parries and creative combinations, she had him woefully trapped.
Tenten leveled the tip of Gan-Jiang with Neji's nose and he paused respectfully. "That's a point for me." She declared. Slightly hot-blooded, he smirked and tapped her blade away with Mo-Ye, charging after her. She chirped in annoyance when his jian nearly caught her earring. If he'd ripped it out...

'I would make him sorry for a week if he did that, accident or no...' His footwork was a bit more polished, she noticed. Neji marched her across the courtyard during a long exchange, and backed her against a porch beam of the house.

Tenten scowled and crossed swords with him. He'd stopped her in a rain puddle on the ground, and her feet became unpleasantly wet. "Your point." She conceded, muttering, "But you didn't have to be rude about it..."

"I am not rude." He informed her as they parted their weapons, "You need to be mindful of your surroundings."

"That's why I have you, isn't it?" Tenten smiled, referring to his talents.

"That is not the only reason you have me." Neji's voice was fond and warm, "Please do not take me for granted."

Tenten liked that he was standing close, also soddened by the puddle. Sometimes he said things that made her wonder if he had ever actually been a true, detached misanthrope in his youth...or if Neji had still loved and cared as much as he was capable of now— but had built defensive walls that he never really needed. She tipped her face up at him because he was already leaning down, misty-eyed and smitten with her.

"That's...impossible." Tenten muttered against his mouth. It was a tender, good-morning kind of kiss. He tasted of iyokan and strong Han tea.

Four blissful seconds then gave way to Neji jerking back from her in startlement. She batted her lashes at the sudden retreat, trying to understand. His face was sheet white.

Tenten's contingency functions gathered that something significant had occurred to Neji and that he'd need a moment. She sheathed Gan-Jiang for good measure. She started to understand when he slowly turned his head to look over his shoulder, and the veins at the corners of his eyes faded, 'Oh. Neji must have gotten a look around. With the Byakugan.' Well then. The matter seemed quite obvious to her now. They'd forgotten themselves in a very formal, noble house. In a formal, noble house where people could see through solid objects.

And she glanced over at the end of the porch that encompassed the internal courtyard, catching a glimpse of Hyuga Hiashi's back. He was nonchalantly sliding a door open and carrying on into the house. If Tenten did not know any better, she'd wager he had not noticed a thing. One could dream.

Tenten chose optimism, "He probably didn't—"

Neji's loud, rattling sigh of anxiety silenced her.

"Okay. Your uncle may have seen that." She stepped out of the puddle and tugged him along to dryer ground, "I'll take my leave now and find a rock to hide under for the next forty years."

"No." Neji sighed again but there was a scintilla of humor in his tone, appreciative of her, "I...should talk to him."

Tenten's eyebrows assumed the position of maximum surprise her face was capable of.

Neji tapped her arm and gestured for her to take Mo-Ye back after he sheathed the sword. He advised, "Wait here. I should not have procrastinated your introduction for so long."

"Wait. You mean this isn't some catastrophic, punishable offense?" She tottered after him as he moved for the porch, stepping up on to it. Tenten stopped in the dirt yard, wondering, "Should we not have—?"

With a bothered head snap, Neji returned his attention to her, "Yes, we should have. I am not an unthinking, unfeeling puppet preoccupied with my clan's customs or prejudices. It's why I never inquired with them in the first place." By force of habit, he took his shoes off to go into the house and left her with, "And you are the only reason I ever would." Then just like that, he was off after his uncle.

Tenten nodded to herself as if absorbing a philosophical truth. Love wasn't a crime. Hyuga clan policies just had a hard time defining what love was and what purpose it served. She sat down on the porch to drink her tea and wait.

Neji caught up with Hiashi at the long corridor's corner, before his uncle could settle down in the tea room to take breakfast and read the morning news. He gave a small, half-bow of respect to the clan head, "Hiashi-sama."

There was a benign look on the man's face. He considered his nephew, "You seem to be feeling better today, Neji. I didn't think your injuries would heal so quickly."

"I am much improved." Neji confirmed, "I apologize that my teammate and I took up the courtyard. I neglected to remember that you reserve it for this time."

Hiashi was unruffled, sliding open the tea room's door, "Do not apologize. I'm an older man now. Sometimes I like it better when I don't have a warm up each and every day…" Neji followed him in and shut the door. When his uncle took a seat at the table, Neji politely kneeled down as well on a cushion.

"Have you more to say?" His uncle imperceptibly quirked an eyebrow and poured himself tea.

"I do not want you to believe I am acting imprudently, or that I do not value my station in our clan… based on my behavior in the main yard." Neji clarified.

"That young woman— Tenten. I know who she is. I watched her performance at the Tournament." Hiashi assured him, "Don't fret, Neji. It's natural for you to lose a contest of weapons against a talent like her. I forgive your transgression, so long as you vow to improve that abysmal swordsmanship of yours."

He was smirking a bit. At first, Neji could not wrap his head around the fact his uncle was trying to make a joke.

Neji opened and shut his mouth, unsure of how to respond.

"Your bond with her does not offend me." Hiashi made it clear to his nephew "I have no objection."

"But you would consider it frivolous and temporary?" Neji asked.

"Yes. Are you telling me that your relationship isn't like that?" His uncle was fishing for the facts, "For anything serious you must seek approval from the Main House."

Neji made his intention plain, "Then I am seeking approval now."
Hiashi’s forehead wrinkled as he took a sip of tea. He regarded Neji for a moment, somewhat surprised.

"I cannot grant permission for a formal courtship…without getting to know her more." Hiashi explained, "I am your custodian. With your best interests in mind, I need her to be introduced to me in order to be certain that she is as serious as you are. If she is spoken for, I should like to meet her guardians as well."

"Tenten has no living family." Neji informed him.

"None at all?" Hiashi wondered, "What is her relation to Wong Leung-san and his grandson?"

"A strong friendship. They share customs and are nearly family…however," He tried to explain it, "Lee and Shifu would not be able to tell you anything that Tenten could not tell you herself."

"Ah." Hiashi shut his eyes and nodded, "She can speak for herself, in that case."

"Is that enough?"

"It is." Hiashi assured him, "If I find her sincere of intention, and to be…compatible with you…I would gladly submit your request to our Elders. I will even advocate for it."

Neji was nodding and trying to downplay the fact that he had feared pushback or disapproval for his personal choice. Maybe choosing to bring this up now, after Tenten had advanced far at the Tournament, was a strategically sound move. She'd made a good impression on his uncle, at least superficially.

"An introduction over dinner will suffice. Of course, this should be treated like any formal consultation. I expect all courtesies that we afford our esteemed friends in the Taketori or other such clans…to be respected at this meeting." Hiashi elaborated, "Make sure that she is aware. She will join us and my daughters tomorrow. I have other commitments today."

"I understand." Neji expressed his gratitude, "Thank you, Uncle."

Hiashi waved it off, "See to it, then. Do not leave a respectable kunoichi waiting on our porch."

Mini-Chapter Track: "Sleeping States" by Gregory and the Hawk

It took most of the next day to explain to Tenten, both in the company of Lee and out of Lee's company, what the heck all of this meant.

Essentially, the Hyuga clan did not date. They bargained. If a potential prospect was introduced to the Main or Branch houses, it was incentivized by the strengthening of blood lines, monetary compensation, gain of resources or influence. Or, if a marriage was not the conclusion of an approved courtship—elders would sometimes ask for a runner up to be sent and considered so that there were no hard feelings between families. It was transactional. Always.

"So how do your clansmen...get to know anyone?" Tenten was baffled, "Is there a lot of...intra-clan marriage and dating?"

"Not as much as there was in the past. Decades ago, that practice exacerbated a variety of hereditary diseases in the Hyuga...and prompted a shift to friendships with other clans and families to remedy that problem." Neji was recounting a bit of history and Lee stood to the side, listening in fascination.

"Hmm. You stand to gain with me...a disease free partner with a sense of humor. That's not much." Tenten shrugged, "Might as well hit up some aristocrat women to be sure that's what you're aiming for, Neji. Make some comparisons..."

He snorted contentiously at the suggestion.

Lee gave some input, "Neji could perhaps worsen relationships with allied clans, if he were to explore with that goal in mind. He is very temperamental!"

"Wow. I did not even consider that risk." She now understood why the socializing bar had not been set too high.

"Enough. This isn't about other possible candidates," Neji reminded her sternly, "It's about you. Whether or not you have a prestigious background...all that truly matters is your dignity and honesty. Even the most refined lords can get that wrong."

Tenten and Lee were impressed by the notion.

Neji went on, "We have a few hours, and much to go over."

Later, they broke the news to Hinata and gently begged for help. Tenten had never been to a dinner more formal than a kaiseki restaurant which, Hinata was alarmed to tell her, was nowhere close to the level of formality that she ought to expect.

"You will need to wear a furisode." Hinata added.

Smiling cluelessly, Tenten acted like she knew what a furisode was.

Neji gave Tenten a long, impatient look. It was obvious to him that she had no idea what they were talking about. The three of them were assembled near Hinata's garden while she watered plants and simultaneously assisted with the courtship project.

"Furisode is the long-sleeved, ornate kimono traditionally worn by unmarried women." Hinata explained helpfully, "Sometimes they are passed down in families, because they are so valuable. They are used to express the eligibility of a woman."

Painstakingly, Tenten was forced to confess, "My family…never had anything like that. Mom always had super expensive qipao, though! Why can't I wear one of those?"

Hinata nearly tossed her watering can when she reacted, "You can't! It isn't formal enough."

"It's beautiful and formal." She protested weakly.

Neji was shaking his head at her.

"Fine. I'll let your traditions trump mine." Tenten gave in, "But I don't own one. So now where do I find furisode?"

"I own two. But they…would not complement your coloration." Hinata tilted her head to look at Tenten, "We need to find someone who is selling or is willing to rent to you."

Tenten was muttering under her breath about all of the hassle.

Neji warned her, "This is the least complicated aspect of this meeting. You still need to be taught prompts, greetings, appropriate eye contact, appropriate volume of voice, table manners—"

"Table manners!" Tenten nearly threw her hands above her head, exasperated, "What am I? Uncultured swine? I have good manners."

"The Hyuga have strict etiquette when it comes to these kinds of introductions. So do other clans." Hinata tried to pacify her, patting Tenten's arm, "We can show you what to do."

After that, they sought out Kayato at her studio in the house. The woman was leaned over a complicated piece of costume embroidery, and when she looked up at her visitors she had a glass eye piece scrunched in her orbital, used for magnification. She grinned at them.

"Ooh, my favorite customer is back." She tittered at Tenten and removed her eye piece, laying down her needlework, "To what do I owe this visit, children?"

Neji explained. Hinata co-explained. Kayato was breathless and excited.

"Oh! Furisode. I haven't worked on one in a while, and I'll be honest…" Kayato smiled wanly, "I haven't got a single one in stock. You're going to have to ask around. Once you do find something I'll have it fitted and tied correctly for Tenten, of course. Also…” She took a discerning up and down look at the girl in question, "What to do with your hair and face?"

"What about them?" Tenten asked defensively.

"Well you need to look your best!"

Tenten held a hand up to her dewy, just-good-enough-face as if she were a game show host revealing a prize. Kayato laughed at her. Not the reaction she was going for.

"Neji won't be a slouch either, just to be clear." Kayato pointed out merrily, "He owns hakama already. That will do. And maybe we'll tie his hair a bit nicer…”
The statement did not grate on his nerves. Neji just accepted it as a necessary evil. It was a one-time meeting and once it was completed and Tenten approved of, they could pretty much go back to how they were doing things before. With the exception of Tenten being more involved with his clan…and entertaining a few other minor theatrics.

The group split up: Neji set out to join Lee for training with Wong Leung, and Hinata scampered off with Tenten in the hope of finding a friend who owned furisode. That afternoon they would all regroup.

Naturally, the girls checked with Ino first. Sakura was visiting her at the Yamanaka flower shop as they gossiped in hushed voices. They ceased whispering and animatedly greeted Hinata and Tenten when they arrived, asking what was Tenten frowning about? Hinata's rendition of the situation was syrupy sweet and excited, while Tenten was not nearly as enthused.

"This is a huge deal, you know." Ino simpered at Tenten, "Try to get over the parts of this that are annoying and inconvenient. If you get your foot in the door with the Hyuga clan-! Damn. That's not easily done. Neji's really sticking his neck out for you."

"I know. It makes me feel worse that I have no idea what I'm doing, or that my parents aren't alive to give their approval, you know?" Tenten revealed her somber train of thought.

Sakura's cheerful face faltered, "Oh. Sorry about that. But you know you're going to get this right! Neji chose well and Hinata's dad can't overlook that."

"Thank you, Sakura."

Hinata's head was bobbling in agreement, "I know my father will like you!"

"Even if I mess up my table manners?"

"You won't." Hinata assured her.

They passed through Ino's home to a tatami-mat storage room, finding a wall of cedar chests. The blonde woman gleefully pulled open a mid-level drawer, lifting away preservation paper to retrieve rich, green silk. Ino proudly held up the kimono, "Feast your eyes on this, girls. My mom and dad found it for me specifically for Coming of Age Day, but if there's an occasion for it you bet I am wearing this sooner."

In another drawer, Ino directed Sakura to retrieve the corresponding violet and pink obi and accessories. Tenten's expression seemed to thaw, marveling at the work of art. Hinata was fiddling with the sleeves.

"Do you have a kimono in every drawer?" Sakura wondered, aghast.

"Nah; just less than half of the chests are filled. Mom and Dad cleaned out a lot of old threadbare pieces."

"My clan has two rooms full." Hinata noted, "And the owners' names are printed on each drawer to avoid mix-ups."

"I bet your clan does, Hinata." Ino sighed enviously and then held up the green furisode against Tenten's chest, "You're a chestnut beauty. Green will look good. You're welcome."

"I…" Tenten pursed her mouth. At the sight of her inexplicable dismay, Hinata's expression also wilted.
"What? What's the matter?" Sakura stood beside her, "It's beautiful! I know you're not into flower designs, but we're lucky someone had something for you...you..." Sakura seemed to pick up on what was concerning Tenten.

Ino blew a strand of hair out of her face, "Problem?"

"Neji won't like it." Sakura determined.

Hinata quailed at the suggestion and reevaluated the garment, frowning as she realized that Sakura was right.

"He probably won't." Tenten reasoned, "He liked me in red...but at this point how can I be picky? I have hours to prepare for all of this. I can't go door to door soliciting for formalwear."

Hinata had to ask, "Maybe Onii-san would understand-?"

"This furisode is as green as Lee." Sakura declared, "Maybe that's only a subliminal message, but men can be touchier than they let on. Unfortunately."

"Pff. Great." Ino proceeded to fold up the garment in defeat, "I wasn't even thinking of that."

"I just appreciate that you were willing to let me wear something before you did." Tenten thanked her.

"I would have called in a favor with you someday, for a premium." Ino warned her smilingly.

"Right. Do we know anyone else that I can ask?" Tenten inquired of the group.

Hinata perked up again, "Maybe Tama-chan!"

Sakura shook her head, "Tama doesn't own furisode either, just hakama for formal occasions. She's sporty. And she's been engaged since she was four years old, so her family never invested in something that signaled: I am up for grabs, gentlemen."

The girls stewed on the dilemma.

Ino turned to Sakura curiously, "I've seen you in red many times, Forehead..."

"I rent from my Auntie. She would charge Tenten an arm and a leg for formalwear..." Sakura lamented, "There has to be somewhere to go..."

Considering the problem in silence, the women racked their brains for a solution and stared off into space. Judging by Sakura's scrunching and quivering facial features, her mind was rapidly combing through a list of Konoha's tailors, expensive boutiques, and eligible women to ask.

Suddenly, Tenten made for the door to exit the storage room, snapping her friends out of their community brainstorming.

"I have one other female friend in my life who could probably help." Tenten ushered them to follow, "As long as Hayate doesn't give me grief about it...Yugao can salvage this."

And by the grace of a higher power, Yugao answered the door, beamed at the sight of Tenten, and yes—she could definitely help. She was delighted to lend Tenten the furisode she had worn only once for her engagement pictures. Now it just sat in a box, like most kimono did. Yugao welcomed the gaggle of kunoichi inside her house, and ignored Hayate's incredulous sounds of protest from the
In passing, Tenten greeted her tutor as he put away groceries. He didn't get much of a hello otherwise, and no explanation of why there were so many visitors.

Yugao nearly floated into a guest bedroom and happily retrieved a lacquer box from the closet. She set it down and lifted the lid, "So things are going well, Tenten? Being introduced to his family! The last time you asked me for help it was for your first date."

Tenten tried to shush her, but her friends were already chattering about it.

The woman lifted up the garment and it silenced the group of girls. The silk was a richly dyed black, emblazoned with a scarlet cascade of flowers and ribbon designs down a sleeve's length and at the legs. It was simple and boisterous all at once. The gold obi also elicited a nod of endorsement from Tenten.

"Oh, so you like it?" Yugao brightened.

"Will Hayate let me walk out of here with this?" Tenten joked.

"No, he won't. But I'll go with you if you have a dresser. I won't be able to put this on you myself." Yugao explained.

"He—"

Yugao shook her head, "Hayate has no business parsing the details of my loan to you. This kimono belongs to me." She smiled, "And I want you to wear it."

"Seems a shame you only wore this once."

"I would have worn it for Coming of Age day when I was younger…but I was on a Black Ops assignment, then." The woman shrugged, "Such a thing may happen to you girls as well, while you take missions."

It was food for thought and gave them pause. Tenten took another moment to fawn over the exquisite piece, "I really appreciate this, Yugao…"

"Not at all!" The woman chirped, setting the kimono in place again and closing the box's lid. Yugao marched from the room with her entourage, and Hayate held up a hand to get her attention in the living area.

"I just want to know if you're coming back for dinner later." The man asked his wife, "And if…I'm feeding all of you?"

Yugao assured her husband that it would be just the two of them for an evening meal.

A short time later, the pack of kunoichi had arrived at Kayato's dressing studio at the Hyuga compound. Sakura had excused herself from the uproar to check on Tama in the hospital. After handing the lacquer box off to Kayato, Tenten was promptly seated on a floor cushion so Yugao could begin styling her hair. As Ino explained it for her, "Hair has to be done before you are cocooned in layers of fabric. I'll take some time to do your makeup."

"Ino, I don't need makeup. I need caffeine or some other stimulant." Tenten complained, relenting as Yugao shushed her in a motherly way and unwound her chignons to set to work.
Hinata offered to run and fetch tea. Ino tsked at her, "Don't indulge her, Hinata. She needs to get through this like a big girl."

"Indulge? Says the queen of indulgence—" Tenten's comeback was cut short when Yugao pulled back too hard on her head with a fistful of hair.

"Sorry!" Yugao chuckled, "I want to do something more intricate today. Bear with me, Tenten."

Tenten relinquished creative input, "Do what you think will make me seem classy."

Yugao and Kayato laughed in unison and Tenten tried not to shrink and disappear into the floor mats. Kayato hung up the kimono for inspection and spoke over her shoulder to Tenten, "Dear, it's so funny to hear you say that you think you don't seem a certain way. Elegance is mostly pretense no matter what."

"But I have to try. The Hyuga clan is…" She trailed off, feeling lost.

Yugao kept clucking her tongue at the girl. Ino had asked Hinata to seek and find a suitable makeup pallet nearby; otherwise she would be running across town to fetch her own.

"The Hyuga clan is distinguished and proud, but in the end…" Kayato simpered as she worked, "Even you saw our clansmen drinking themselves under tables a few nights ago."

"Oh yeah." Tenten relaxed.

"They had to win that game. They couldn't let Sarutobi clan visitors beat them on their own turf." Ino remembered in great amusement. She assisted Kayato in relocating the long obi and other fabric ties about the floor.

When Hinata returned with two sets of cosmetics, Ino inspected them and picked the better option of the pair. Tenten still objected to the one girly art that the stronghold of her tom-boyishness had disallowed.

Ino soothed her and handed over a hair tie to Yugao, still at work. "Tenten. I'm not going to do your face like some neon billboard. Alright? You already have unfairly good skin." Ino traced a fingertip along the older girl's cheekbone, "I'll leave that be. Let's play up your eyes and do a subtle lip. Have a little faith in an expert."

With little other choice, Tenten elected to accept the help. She needed the help. She needed to start feeling adequate so that she could have a stellar meet-the-uncle dinner, and convince Hiashi that she wasn't going to take advantage of Neji or utterly fuck things up.

Yugao was re-doing elaborate chignons that connected in a central, ponytail-like braid. Ino and Hinata kneeled in front of Tenten and continued grooming her. While Ino gently dabbed Tenten's eyelids with some kind of base, Hinata reviewed the shortlist of etiquette with Tenten.

"Anywhere you go in the Main House, you must be escorted. Because you are Neji-niisan's guest, he is the only one permitted to escort you." Hinata raised a finger and added, "To the restroom, for example. Father will not let me leave dinner to bring you myself."

"Will you be wearing kimono too?" Tenten had not considered it.

"Yes. I am required to at these types of functions."

"When I agreed to all of this I never thought I'd be inconveniencing you too, Hinata." Tenten shut her eyes so Ino could work, trying to apologize for the bother.

Though she couldn't see it, Hinata was smiling, "It's alright. It makes me happy that you are the visitor, Onee-san! In Spring I had to do this sort of thing nearly every week for a different suitor. That was..."

"Awful. Nauseating. Pointless?" Ino offered, recalling that dark time as well, "Wow, and even I had to put up with all of that indirectly. I'm glad you survived, Hinata-chan."

Hinata concurred. She also filled Tenten in on: avoiding too much direct eye contact, avoiding too little eye contact, placement of hands in lap, correct seated posture and how to rise from a floor cushion to stand. Ino vehemently agreed with the last subject.

"She's right. You have to practice sitting and standing so you don't flash anyone." Ino recommended.

Hinata explained that food at the dinner table would be served to her by either herself or Neji, and that it would be inappropriate for Tenten as a guest to handle dishes. However, if she wanted anything she could ask at any time. Hinata mentioned that her father would do most of the talking, and that Tenten should do her best to answer his questions. Fibbing was to be avoided. Hiashi did not take well to dishonesty and had a knack for detecting it. Overall, Tenten would be prompted to speak and should avoid talking out of turn or ahead of Main House members. It was just a general rule of thumb. Hinata hoped the introduction would decrease in formality as the evening wore on, and that Tenten could engage in conversation freely.

Also, under no circumstances, no matter what Hanabi said at dinner, Hinata added— do not take the bait. Her sister excelled at cattle-prod questions and remarks. She liked to gauge the character of new acquaintances by mildly antagonizing them. Kayato seconded the warning.

"Duly noted." Tenten acknowledged.

After dinner, Hinata forecasted, there could be further talk and refreshments. After that, before it got too late, Tenten would be politely discharged and could visit Kayato to undress and box up the furisode. Neji would escort her home after that, and hopefully return to hear a positive endorsement from Hiashi. Tenten mentally took notes on the timeline.

By then, Kayato was waiting around since she had concluded laying out the different furisode components. She stood close by and watched Yugao enter the final stages of hair artistry, and then circled 'round to see Ino's handiwork, "Oh, that color! What is it?"

"Burgundy." Ino announced, "And just a bit further in it'll blend into scarlet— which is much brighter and I don't want to overdo it. Then a bit of gold..."

"It corresponds so well with the fabric's designs."

"That's the idea."

Kayato considered the girl, "Ino, was it? I may need to hire you for makeup on photo days before I submit portfolio work to my agent. My models will look so much better."

Ino was charmed by the suggestion.

Hinata had a few last pieces of advice for Tenten: Don't attempt to eat until after Hiashi began the meal, muffle bodily functions and sounds, don't ask very personal questions of anyone at the table (even though Hiashi could ask such things of her,) and in general try to be interesting and also be herself. Ino called the list "a doozy" and wished Tenten luck. She was finishing up and petting color onto Tenten's lips with a small brush.

Yugao finished tying Tenten's hair, and tugging in a few spots to straighten the braids encircling the buns on top of her head, "Ah. There. I've gotten my hair fix for the week. It's always easier doing someone else's. Mine always comes out just a bit off when I tie it up."

Tenten thanked her and peered into a mirror that Ino handed to her. She was relieved to see she looked more aristocratic than costume-y. She breathed a sigh of relief. It was like a beautiful, rich woman was looking back at her. Tenten set the mirror down and puffed up a little, awestruck that it was possible to look so good.

"So, do you have any questions?" Hinata asked finally, "I have to leave soon to get changed. I'll have my sister help me, since Kayato-san will need some time to dress you."

"Well." Tenten considered it for a moment, "I think I want to avoid talking about Huo and Exam drama."

"Yes. Please do." Hinata nodded.

"And would you be so kind as to signal me if I start breaking a rule or forget myself?" Tenten asked.

"I will be as discreet as possible." The younger girl promised.

"Is there a chance that Neji could mess this up, and not me?" Tenten wondered.

"Oh yes, but he won't. Onii-san will use his best manners and patience. He's been to functions like these in the past."

Tenten ventured, "What if, despite my best efforts to adhere to etiquette…and I go home…your Dad decides that he doesn't like me?"

"I don't see how that could happen!" Hinata chirped, "My father will be glad to meet you."

"Maybe, but what if fundamentally he thinks I am a bad fit? He's still entitled to that opinion even if he likes me as a person." Tenten wisely pointed out, "Hinata, if that's the case, is it implied that I stop seeing or stay away from Neji?"

The room got uncomfortably quiet. Ino cleared her throat to fight the awkwardness, bouncing to her feet when she finished touching up Tenten's lips.

Hinata had to suspend her disbelief to reply, "I think that's what father would want, if he felt that way."

"That's fine." Tenten was calm about it, "I just need to know. I'm a realistic person. I refuse to assume things will go well just because I subscribe to positive imagery. What everyone else thinks and feels still weighs on something like this." She smiled warily, "But you know, positive attitudes have gotten my team pretty far."

Kayato chortled as she and Hinata pulled Tenten to her feet. Yugao affectionately patted Tenten's bottom when she stood. She did a fast swap of clothing for underclothing.

Kayato shorted as she and Hinata pulled Tenten to her feet. Yugao affectionately patted Tenten's bottom when she stood. She did a fast swap of clothing for underclothing.

Then, after fitting Tenten with a practical, white nagajuban and undersash, Kayato slipped Tenten into the black furisode. Here and there, Hinata tugged and helped straighten the kimono while Kayato prodded and adjusted. The meticulous, measured preparations and tying took a while. Kayato had rolled up the floor-length sleeves and made Tenten hold them, keeping them out of the Hinata excused herself to get dressed and advised Tenten to stay positive. Tenten watched her go with a wistful expression.

"Relax, she'll be with you at dinner." Ino reminded her.

"I know…"

"If it's any kind of consolation, we all go through something like this." Kayato said while working on a koshi himo at Tenten's waist, "I did, in fact, go through exactly the same introduction you will. I was a nobody. Not even a ninja. But Hideyasu, that crazy man, had haunted my step for two years and was adamant about me meeting his family. They needed some extra convincing that I would be a good match for him, even after we met." The woman laughed, "They came to my place of work to see what I was good for since I was not a kunoichi."

"Did that satisfy?" Tenten wondered in terror.

"For some reason, it did. Then we were allowed to date. I'll admit, living among the Hyuga clan and its stringent rules and elders…it tired me out. I tried to leave Hide-chan several times. I couldn't imagine getting married and staying in a place where I felt so unfree." Kayato explained, "But things got easier, and with time their scrutiny of me relaxed, even when I was trying to run off again…they knew I'd be back."

"I'm surprised they tolerated that." Ino admitted.

"Well, it wasn't exactly tolerated. He and I were still dating, but suitors were called in for Hide-chan for the interim. His elders wanted to give him options."

"And I hear that he did not welcome any of those visits. He scared them away with his weird sense of humor and waited for me."

"Yugao was curious, "How long after that did you get married?"

"About two or three months after my last I'm moving out tantrum. I'd made friends in the Branch family and they were helping me with my new business. It made me feel more secure…and appreciated. I just hated feeling alone when those old men—er, our elders…stared at me and said I wasn't enough." Kayato sighed, "Hide-chan was happier after that. I put him through a lot. He always used to feel scared that I would leave."

"You maneater." Yugao teased.

"I wasn't! I was just frightened." Kayato laughed nervously, "My point is that I know this isn't easy, Tenten. You don't have to go through with anything that you think is unfair or oppressive. Stay true to yourself."

"That seems to be the theme." Tenten recognized, "But I'm wondering how I do that and still impress the head of this house?"

"Make sure you don't apologize for anything." Yugao suggested, "Oh, and don't sugarcoat your opinions. A clan leader may respect you more for being critical about something."

"But don't outright insult anyone either." Ino added on to it. She had begun helping Kayato wind and fold the golden obi around the kimono.

"I may forget most of this." Tenten admitted.
"Just remember to make it clear to Hiashi-sama...how much you value Neji." Kayato recommended, "That's why you're here."

Tenten liked that piece of advice best. It took time to complete the flower-like knot of the obi, and Kayato looped a red obijime beneath it before fastening it at the front. Yugao admitted that she had no idea how Kayato had created the knot, other than employing wizardry.

"When you dress about 200 hundred people a year in kimono," Kayato told her, "You get good at it."

Yugao took another few moments to fawn over Tenten, reminiscing, "I can't believe I only wore it once. It makes me wish I were still young and single!"

"You can be, if you want. Just kick Hayate out. That house is in your name." Tenten jested.

"Oh, no, no. He's a good cook and I like his company." Yugao flipped a dangling, red tassel earring at Tenten's ear, "I wore this furisode when I met Hayate's parents for the first time. I don't know if they approved of me or not by the end of the night because we all got so drunk."

"Maybe that wasn't a bad outcome?"

Yugao thought on it, "Maybe. They like me well enough now."

Kayato forewarned, "Oh, Tenten, so you know— only tea will be served at this introduction. You will all be scrupulously sober."

"I didn't think alcohol would be served. I'm kind of grateful for that." Tenten recalled that she and Neji were not at all presentable after getting drunk the night of the festival, or the morning after.

With her desire to see her furisode worn again sated, Yugao bid everyone good luck and a prosperous evening. She set out for home shortly after Ino did, leaving Tenten in Kayato's company. As Hinata had advised earlier, Tenten slowly practiced sitting and standing from a floor cushion.

"Try not to be so rigid." Kayato demonstrated a good technique on the next zabuton, "It will be easier if you push up with your fingertips for balance, like this. No one will notice with your long sleeves."

After many attempts, she was starting to get it. Tenten even tried to compose her face as if it wasn't a big deal that she wasn't falling over and crushing Kayato's hard work on the obi.

When that was done, Tenten asked for a time check.

"Well, you have nearly an hour to go." Kayato confirmed with a glance at the work desk clock, "I know what we can do. My family won't be joining your introductory dinner...and I bet my son is still practicing out in the yard. Why don't we watch?"

Tenten liked the idea, "Sure. It'll give me time to practice walking without tripping over this."

Since there was no need for shoes indoors, hers were left in the studio and Tenten accompanied Kayato barefoot through the house. The walk down long hallways and around a few corners ended on an outdoor porch that overlooked a green lawn. Fujita and Hideyasu were scrapping with each other, using Taijutsu that was distinctly Gouken as opposed to Jyukken, according to Tenten's trained eye. Kayato sighed at the sight of her husband and child.

"I'm glad Fujita recovered from his injuries." Tenten spoke sidelong to her dresser. She wasn't sure what to do with her arms in long sleeves, so Tenten crossed her hands at her front like a lady. Not her usual posture, for sure.

"It took quite a while. My husband was concerned that he was so out of shape! They've been sparring for the last few days to condition Fujita again." There was a far-off look on Kayato's face while she watched her loved ones. Her shoulders drooped.

Tenten watched her carefully, considering the woman who had not really wished to join the Hyuga clan but had integrated anyway. By Tenten's estimate, Kayato was a genuine best friend and spouse to Hideyasu. There was no question she loved him and their children. She had compromised to keep her professional career, and to fulfill her duties to the Main House. There were probably some days, Tenten gathered, that she still wanted to run away from the surveillance and demands of clan elders.

And of course, one of her children was dead. That probably stuck mercilessly like quills in her heart. Tenten regarded the woman in profile and began to empathize.

"Is it hard not seeing him out there with them?" Tenten wondered.

By him, Kayato understood she meant Hikune, "Very hard. Sometimes I want to burn this place down to the ground, I'm still so angry."

Tenten bowed her head a little and looked out over the lawn again.

"I felt lucky…watching my eldest boy grow up to be smart and kind. He was so much like Hide-chan." Her voice flattened, "But he was also selfish and didn't take rejection well. I disliked listening to Hikune bad-mouth girlfriends that had dumped him. I remember telling him one night that he was the one who needed to reflect, and not the women who had moved on. There was much he had yet to learn. That boy frustrated me on some days…argued with me…"

Amazed, Tenten's ears perked up at the honest admission.

"Children are challenging. I laid awake worrying many nights, wondering if the things I said or did permanently damaged them. It took a while to learn they are largely responsible for their own choices, no matter what I taught them…or didn't teach them." Kayato settled her hands in her trouser pockets, "I worried that they would never understand what the Hyuga clan really needs. That they would never know it the way Neji-sama so profoundly knows it. I feared that even more when Hikune fought with him…that he would prefer that ignorance as long as he could feel superior or secure in some way."

She turned to Tenten and saw the bewildered look on her face, "I'm not trying to panic you or tell you to avoid this kind of a future! Sweet girl…I'm sorry. I just keep talking while you're here—"

"It's okay. I'm glad you're sharing it. I don't have anyone to tell me about these sorts of things." Tenten informed her.

Kayato regarded her warmly, "I see. Well…this path wasn't at all bad. It's quite fun. My sons are neither the most generous nor the most enlightened people…but because they aren't perfect, I forgive myself a little more for not being perfect either." She smiled to herself, "This clan wants excellence so much that we become afraid of our softer, truer selves. You've helped Neji-sama in this respect, but don't be afraid to help yourself either. Don't wallow in doubt. Not for too long, anyway."

Tenten was still upbeat, "This is kind of heavy subject matter for someone who just wants to be allowed to date."

"It is! I know you're not my therapist…but I felt like opening up." The woman laughed, "You may realize that you want more than just the chance to date Neji-sama, and it will be very hard for you. Forever. For every milestone and bit of progress you make, you'll have to keep fighting for him."

Tenten winced a little. She still had not fully considered what was ahead, because she had hardly anticipated coming so far.

"Not to worry." Kayato patted her immaculately dressed shoulder, "Your team prides itself on hard work. I'm sure you can handle it."

"Thank you for your confidence."

The sun had sunk closer to the horizon. Hideyasu and Fujita concluded training and were drying their faces and necks with towels. The two visited Kayato and Tenten at the engawa of the house with puppy-like enthusiasm.

"Wow! New project, Kayato? She looks great!" Hideyasu was thrilled with the kimono.

"Believe it or not I didn't make this. I simply fitted her." Kayato brushed errant hair from her husband's face while he stood a step below in the grass, "Gekko Yugao owns this furisode."

He turned to Tenten, "My goodness, you're a friend of Yugao-san's? How fortunate! She's well-to-do and a respected veteran of our village." Hideyasu noted, "It seems to me you've been formally invited to sit with the Hyuga, is that right?"

Fujita gasped over his water bottle, surprised by the news.

"That's right. Neji had a talk with his uncle and...I'm trying to be effortlessly impressive and vigorously myself for this dinner." Tenten summed up the total of all advice she had taken.

"Bwa-ha-ha!" Hideyasu laughed more easily than his wife did.

Fujita was grinning, "It won't be so bad!"

"I've heard things..." Tenten sighed, "And Fujita, we really need to work you out. We can start weapon drills again...as soon as I get out of expensive clothes."

He nodded happily, "Oh yeah, I'd like that. I don't want to take another mission until I feel strong again."

"Thank you for looking out for my nugget, Tenten." Hideyasu was jolly, "Also, we wish you an expedient and pleasant introduction this evening. May Hiashi-sama have mercy on you."

Kayato whacked Hideyasu in retaliation for the low blow comment, but then they erupted into inside-joke giggles. Fujita mused at his parents and internalized their silly camaraderie. He slipped off his shoes and stepped onto the porch, offering to show Tenten around for a bit while his parents canoodled.

At sunset, Neji showed up and interrupted Fujita's detailed explanation to Tenten about games played with Hanafuda cards. Tenten was intrigued that he was such an avid card game player.

From her seat on the porch near Hinata's garden, Tenten looked up at Neji to where he stood. She blinked and tried to recognize him. The montsuki hakama he was wearing were probably worth more than the apartment she currently lived in, plus the lease for her shop space.

"Hello." She managed to say without swallowing her tongue.
Neji was dressed in a haori of indigo as dark and deep as the ocean's bottom. The crests of the Hyuga clan were visible in bright contrast; with charcoal colored hakama that made him look unattainably important. His hair was pulled back in a regal ponytail, putting his chiseled face on display. Neji frowned at her staring.

"Good evening, Neji-sama." Fujita greeted respectfully, scooping up his cards and into a deck box, "Mother and Father said that Tenten is going to be formally introduced to the clan head tonight. I hope you have a good time."

"Thank you, Fujita." Neji extended his hand to Tenten to help her stand, "Good will be a relative term at this meeting."

"That's boosting my self-esteem." Tenten sniffed at him.

Neji turned his attention back to her and for two very long seconds... he seemed to become squirrelish. He averted his eyes from her slightly, "You were successful." He was pointing out the furisode that she was wearing—not as if she had a choice. 'I couldn't show up here without one, apparently.' Tenten logged Neji's strange reaction to her.

They bade Fujita farewell or in Tenten's case, gave parting remarks on fitness, "Hold a horse stance for a few hours and do high reps of push-ups. Ask Lee to help, he'll whip you into shape—" Neji tugged her through a sliding door into the house.

"He's gotten skinny and flabby." She noted to Neji.

"He had four broken ribs, a ruptured spleen, and a broken wrist. Fujita abided by a no-activity order."

"Spleen too? That can be a lot of bleeding..." Tenten observed as they slowly traversed the hallway. She was actually going at her top speed in kimono.

There was a step down from the wooden floor, leading towards the extra formal dining room of the Main House (where no one ever ate except for nights like this.) Again, Neji held a hand out to help Tenten negotiate the perilous drop. He finally worked up the nerve to say, "You look beautiful."

Safely on the next level, Tenten stopped to regard him and smiled with curling, cherry-hued lips. "You didn't think I had it in me, huh?" She teased.

"I knew you did."

"The layers are killer. Note to self: never wear one of these again in summertime." Tenten added, "I can't wait to get this off and return it."

"Who does it belong to?" He was curious.

"Yugao. She's a lifesaver."

Neji nodded in agreement. He still had not met Hayate or Yugao for a proper introduction or hello, but he felt a shred of gratitude towards them.

"I learned all of my etiquette." Tenten disclosed as they approached the formal room's closed door, "But... just in case this doesn't go well... please know that I really tried, Neji."

He said nothing and kept looking ahead, minding her step so she would not trip. He had to move aside the billowing silk of her sleeve, but Neji was able to locate her hand and stroke the back of it Tenten did not have to inquire about why he did it. He communicated several things through the gesture: he knew she was trying, he would try too, he didn't know what to expect, really, and thank you.

The door slid open and nearly elicited a startled yelp from Tenten, but she contained it. They stepped inside, and the servant in the room slipped out and shut the door behind her. Neji stopped an appropriate distance away from the table, addressing his uncle and two cousins already seated, "Hiashi-sama, Hinata-sama, Hanabi-sama…this is Tenten." He gave her the verbal cue to bow, which she did spectacularly, "Thank you for letting her join us this evening."

Hiashi inclined his head, his expression straddling the fine line between boredom and indigestion, "Welcome." And since that was their cue to join, the two sat down (Tenten carefully so) across from Hiashi and his daughters seated to the left. Tea had already been served. Hanabi brought her cup up to her lips and then reneged on the sip, looking at Tenten with a grimace.

It seemed to just occur to her why Neji would have invited his teammate out of the blue. The thoughts danced across her face, piquing her, "Tenten. Neji-niisan's teammate."

"Yes, it's nice to meet you." Tenten provided a default reply.

"What family are you from? Shouldn't they be here too? Why didn't Onii-san introduce you properly?" Hanabi set her tea cup down, "Who did that makeup and where can I find them?"

Tenten remembered Hinata warning her about not taking the bait, so she played it as cool as possible, 'I'd be happy to tell you…as soon as we're properly acquainted.'

Hiashi gave an annoyed look to his youngest and it reeled Hanabi in somewhat. He turned back to Tenten, "Thank you for joining us. There is no need for presentations, as I know that you are already quite familiar with all of the Main House." Ah, so he'd noticed, "I feel that I should commend you for your performance at the Chunin Exam, Tenten. Both you and Hinata were exemplary in your matches."

"Thank you, Hiashi-sama." Wow, she thought, that kind of felt good.

"Please oblige a few questions so that I can get a grasp of who you are, as Neji considers you a cardinal companion." The clan leader added.

Tenten's stomach did weird acrobatics. There was no platform for Neji, or Hinata, or anyone else to speak because, as they had rightly predicted— Hiashi would do most of the questioning and she would do the answering. Hiashi wasn't interested in what Neji had been up to or the pursuits of his children. Not now, anyway. Two servants stopped in and dressed the table with a handsome spread, efficiently and rapidly setting it. Hiashi paid them no mind.

"How long have you known Neji?" The man asked.

There were a few ways to answer that. Tenten went with, "I got to know him when we became a team about five years ago. But I have known him since we both attended the Academy."

Hiashi accepted the answer and pressed on, "What are your specialties in terms of jutsu?"

Ah. Easy. "Bukijutsu and Ninjutsu."

Neji plucked food from dishes with chopsticks and left a variety of items on Tenten's plate. His eyes subtly traveled between Tenten and his uncle. Hanabi was flat out staring at Tenten, and Hinata could not conceal a bubbly, silent smile.
"And your Taijutsu?" Hiashi wondered, because of course he wondered. It was the expertise of his clan and everyone at the table.

"I'm improving. I've started Wushu lessons with Neji and Lee to hone my skills." Tenten remembered to breathe through her nostrils. This wasn't so bad.

"What rank do you aspire to, if you continue your shinobi career?" Hiashi asked as he accepted a bowl that Hinata handed to him.

Tenten took four extra seconds to actually think about it, "I was told that I should consider enlisting in the ANBU Black Ops. I've seriously been thinking about that. I wouldn't want to retire until seniority."

Hiashi seemed surprised by the answer, "And who told you to enlist?"

"A member of the Black Ops." Tenten hoped her reply wasn't too snappy. It seemed to satisfy him. Though Hiashi wasn't saying anything about how he evaluated her answers, she got the gist that he was trying to gauge how hostile she would be if, for some reason, she had to retire at a younger age.

He went on, "Do you have any other relationships or connections with clans in or outside of the Fire Country?"

"No." No friendly relations, at least. Tenten chose to omit the Huo debacle.

"Do you have any illnesses?"

"None."

"Have you ever been apprehended for illegal activity?" It was a serious question.

Tenten noticed Hanabi's mouth curve up in amusement, and Tenten internally struggled not to also be amused by the thought. After a bite of some of the best fish she had ever tasted, Tenten assured him, "I have no criminal record."

They were eating in earnest. The mood seemed to lighten and become a tad more conversational.

"Do you have any outstanding debts?" Hiashi asked.

"Not anymore. I paid off one of my parents' last loans about a year ago. The other was forgiven." Tenten explained truthfully.

The information registered on Hinata and Neji's faces as they looked at each other from across the table. They were unaware Tenten dealt with that type of burden.

Her response led to Hiashi's segue into, "How long have you been living independently from your parents?"

She chewed for an extra moment because her throat felt tight. Tenten banished the emotion down with the masticated food, "Since they died nearly six years ago."

The admission hung in the air of the room for a while.

Hiashi seemed to be thinking very hard on the matter. His eyes fell away from her and settled on the wall behind her and Neji, eating with easy sophistication. Tenten wondered if he was already aware of that. Her parents had been the same age as Hiashi and shinobi peers of that generation.
He spoke again on a more considerate topic, "I had the pleasure of being introduced to Wong Leung-san at the Tournament. He is a distinguished master, though not from this land. I hope you and Neji both continue to learn from him."

Tenten dared to smile a bit, "I'm glad you met him. We really enjoy training with him. I think he'll be happier if he gets to socialize more in the village."

"I agree. Neji has said that you can communicate with Wong Leung-san in your native language. Tell me about your ancestry, and if it lies outside of Nihon."

She stewed for a moment. He was searching for some type of genetic information to judge her by. Nihon was the region of the world that was home to shinobi countries. Beyond that border were the Kingdom of Han, the Kingdom of Joseon, and Sindhu. Ninja hardly concerned themselves with those foreign territories, but sometimes grew curious about the rest of the world.

"My family is descended of Han settlers who arrived in the last few centuries. They intermingled with old shinobi clans from the north." Tenten did not want to get too specific and raise questions about loyalties or refugee status from the last war with Iwa.

"Do you possess Tao Arts?" Hiashi got to the point.

Tenten coached herself to breathe again. Was this going to be a selling point? Perhaps a deal breaker?

"I don't." She admitted, "My father may have taught me if he were still here. He could Shadow Step."

Hinata tipped her empty tea cup over, bumping it with a tea pot before refilling. The comment excavated memories of her recent struggle against Huo. Tenten gave her an apologetic look, sorry for the blunder.

Hiashi had the opposite reaction, his face lit with interest, "I see."

"I think my mom also used Tao Arts, but for so long I thought it was only Ninjutsu. They never talked about it when I was a child. Unfortunately, I can't confirm it now." Tenten went on, "I have no inherent skill for it."

"That likely is not the case." Hiashi disagreed, "There may be use for abilities such as those in the near future...more than this village realizes. Should you never develop them, it's no loss. You already have a high degree of skill with Ninjutsu."

The positive assessment was like a silent siege on Neji, completely upending his expectations. He tried to eat his meal with composure and not interject until he was invited to.

But Hanabi happily interrupted, "So you're below average compared to your parents? What was their surname? Do I know them? I don't get where you're from. Konoha, right?"

"People leave names behind for protection." Tenten assured her, "That's what my parents told me. And would a name really speak better for me than my own actions?"

Neji damned propriety and added, "She is a Leaf ninja, Hanabi-sama. She has even saved your life, if you recall."

Hanabi wore a blank look and searched her memory. Oh. After the first Chunin Exam when the Invasion hosted a splinter cell of Cloud ninja hunting the Byakugan. That incident. Hinata had been too exhausted to keep fighting to defend her sister, but Tenten was quick to protect the cornered girls.

Hanabi didn't press the matter after that.

Hiashi slowly observed, "Perhaps it is worth mentioning…that she has saved each of your lives at least once."

It got quiet again. Tenten stuffed an uni roll in her mouth and chewed to excuse herself from acknowledging that fact. Her involvement with the Hyuga clan was evident enough for the clan head to certify.

"Thank you." Hinata smiled at Tenten, acknowledging what had long gone unacknowledged.

Tenten chewed, swallowed, and tried to wave the matter off. They saved lives too. It was just part of the job, and not necessarily exclusive to Tenten's friendship with Hinata and Neji. Not that Hiashi would buy into that reasoning.

Hiashi moved the conversation along, inquiring about her interpersonal skills and how easily she formed meaningful relationships. Tenten estimated that she had a pretty good knack for it. She had many friends, but she didn't always want to be around them.

With that the man asked, "How do you think you would fare in a close-knit, dense family unit within a clan? Would it run contrary to your independence?"

Tenten sipped tea and thought, whoa, what a good question. She wasn't exactly claustrophobic, but neither was she accustomed to having 135 housemates.

"I like being alone." Tenten was honest, "I like having free time to metalwork, organize, seal, and train…but it can get lonely. I might benefit from having company again."

That answer also seemed to satisfy. Hiashi nodded and sipped his tea. He had a much better rounded idea of who Tenten was. The meal relaxed from then on, finishing most dishes as conversation became organic thanks to Hinata's small talk.

She brought up Tenten and Neji's experiment with Chakra Affinity and how they helped her practice with her Water Nature, "That was the first time I succeeded with Nature Application, when Tenten used her Fire Nature against me!"

Hiashi seemed to appreciate the anecdote. Such a lesson probably had direct correlation with Hinata's triumph at the Tournament.

While sipping miso soup to conclude dinner, conversation lulled and Hanabi took over again. "How old are you?" She was almost accusatory with the question.

"I'm seventeen." Tenten replied evenly.

Then, the bombshell, "We heard a lot, but really! What's the motivation for this? Why does Neji-niisan like you?"

Hiashi and Hinata turned their heads in unison to scold Hanabi, who still didn't much care about the delivery of the question, which bordered on insult. Neji exchanged a look with Tenten that a lawyer may have given to a client, wordlessly advising: you have the right to remain silent.

Hanabi broke away from bickering with her father and sister, adding to Tenten, "You can't answer that? Psh! You're here because you want to date—we all know it. Why do you even like Neji-
"Nissan? Don't you find his personality abrasive?"

"Hanabi." Hiashi's voice was heavy and prickling with irritation, "Stifle yourself. You owe courtesy and respect to our guest."

"Dad, I just wanted to—"

He pegged her with a I will fling you out of this room if you don't reinstate the manners we have beaten into you look.

Surprisingly, Tenten offered a conciliatory answer to Hanabi's grilling, "I can't speak for Neji on why he enjoys my company, so you should ask him that question. And I do…" She reached for the words, "Find that Neji can be— surly…some days…but I've learned to read beneath those feelings."

Hanabi, along with others at the table, turned their attention back to Tenten and listened.

"What I've gleaned most from Neji's, hmm…concealed thoughts and emotions…are very good things." Tenten provided a heartfelt explanation, "He cares deeply about his family and clan. He vigilantly looks out for his team and friends. Neji holds these people in high esteem and I can see it, and in turn that earns him respect. Neji is smart, but he is willing to learn more, and he is getting better at seeing things for what they really are."

Tenten paused to consider that none of that had clarified her feelings for him, so she amended, "I think Neji is a leader who has also learned how to be led and how to listen. I admire those things. Neji has many of the qualities that I want to see in myself, and I enjoy learning from him. He's the best."

Hinata kept her line of sight only on Neji, fascinated by the minuscule, colorful expressions threatening his face.

Hanabi was flabbergasted by the decorous reply. The girl suggested in a mutter, "If you think all of that…well…maybe we should train sometime." Her opinion of Tenten had transformed.

Nothing was perceptibly registering with Hiashi yet, but Hinata responded jubilantly, "Oh! Onee-san, it's wonderful to hear someone find so many positive attributes in Neji-niisan; apart from our family!"

Tenten contended, "Well, Lee has learned a lot of things about Neji too. Lee truly understands him."

Neji gathered some composure to confirm, "I can attest to that."

And from there, Hanabi turned her questions loose on Neji, "Neji-niisan, you too! Why do you like her? Tell us!" Hiashi didn't bother trying to get her to pipe down again. The answers could prove useful.

But it was silent for quite a while and Neji did not try to answer the inquiry. Tenten glanced down at the empty bowl and plate in front of her, feeling her hands get uncomfortably clammy. Her thoughts tottered towards a new possibility, 'What if this is it? This is where we mess up. Neji could choke or not get this right…I can't be mad about it. I'm glad I did well, for my part.'

Luckily, Neji had only taken some time to refine his statement, "Everything she does teaches me and makes me better."

Hanabi protested, "That's still vague…"
Neji elaborated, "Tenten is the better leader. Her emotional intelligence creates direction on our team. I've known that since graduating from the Academy, and I long fought that reality...but I could never change it or compete with it. I had to grow to match her talent." He concluded, "I have the highest respect for her of anyone I know."

What was conveniently, and appropriately, left out was that both were undeniably attracted to one another and had romanced each other to no avail for years. That was not up for discussion.

Hanabi shut up entirely. Hiashi was visibly amused by the answers. What seemed to be a lot of beating around the brush indicated to him that Neji and Tenten did possess a deep, emotional relationship. From what he could see, Tenten had no ulterior motives. She genuinely cared for his nephew.

After dinner, the table was cleared and plates of namagashi were set out for dessert. The confections were delicately molded into flower and peach designs for summer. Things were less casual in terms of discussion at that point. Hinata was using her imagination, "I think my mother would have liked you a lot, Onee-san." She spoke merrily to Tenten, "I wish she was here. Kayato-san was quite fond of you, I noticed! It'd be nice for you to meet some of the Branch family too. While speaking with me a few mentioned your matches at the Tournament, and they'd be very excited to get to know you!"

Tenten relaxed and prattled on with Hinata: oh yes, sure, she'd meet anyone if it wasn't a bother; and yes, kimonos are a lot of hassle aren't they? It was still fun to have Hinata's help for most of the day.

They did not pick up on the clear expression of hopefulness on Neji's face. He was even bold enough to eat a peach-shaped sweet. Neji caught his uncle's eye and tried to approximate what Hiashi was thinking about.

No one had eaten more than two namagashi before Hiashi asked, "Children; will you excuse yourselves from this table for a short while? To the adjacent tea room— take dessert in there." He announced, "I want a word alone with Tenten."

Heartbeats were nearly audible. Since there was no precedent for something like this, Neji and Hinata had no idea what it indicated. Almost passively, the two agreed and nudged the less-willing Hanabi along with her plate of treats. They shuffled out of the dining room and sealed the door behind them.

Tenten felt a spike of alarm in her gut and then let the feeling go. There was still no use in panicking. Honesty was her greatest asset, even if conditions had changed.

Hiashi leveled an analytical gaze at the young woman, finishing a bite of dessert. He assured her, "We can speak informally now, within good taste, of course."

"Ah, r-right." Tenten untensed her shoulders, "What about, Hiashi-sama?"

"That you are ideal." He said simply.

Her mouth was stuck in a half-smile, her jaw threatening to drop.

"I have watched you for some time. It's been years, in fact." Hiashi explained, "Our clan has many formalities and rules that must be respected, however...I hardly needed this introduction. Not to know how much you've benefitted Neji. It is self-evident."

It was difficult to form words of thanks, and she wondered if thanks were even in order. Tenten just took the compliment with a nod.
"It was not discussed in depth before, but the absence of your parents dampens the spirit of our village. I imagine if they were here, they would have quickly controlled discord at the Tournament… and they certainly would have made this meeting cordial." Hiashi gave her a kind thought, "I did not know them personally, but my brother did. Perhaps that's why this arrangement is a touch ironic. Some friendships endure in new lives."

Tenten cleared her throat with a small laugh, "That's something…my dad might've said."

"So that you are aware of what happens after this: I will take the time to discuss our meeting and Neji's request with our clan's elders. I can advocate for your breeding and abilities, and general compatibility with my nephew…but once you are approved, you will be subject to numerous other bothers and interviews." Hiashi exhaled tiredly at the thought, "Understand that courtship among the Hyuga is serious. If marriage is not the ultimate result, frivolity and wasted time is met with hostility by our elders. Be aware of the expectations."

"But there's no rush for that sort of thing?" Tenten verified.

"There is no rush. You're young yet." He confirmed.

She begged to differ on that. Young? Perhaps; that, or Hiashi was starting to feel old, Tenten guessed.

"Also, please know that I am grateful for your support and defense of Hinata." Hiashi added, "I intend to repay that debt to you."

She raised a hand nervously, "No, no, that isn't something that ever needs to be repaid. I'll always feel compelled to protect her."

The clan head looked at her for a long moment as if something had come to mind. Hiashi recited an old proverb she had reminded him of, "Ten men, ten colors."

A frilly way of saying to each his own, Tenten knew, but she also noticed a reference to her name. Though she had been poised and minimally effusive that evening, she allowed herself a small smile.

Hiashi went on, "When approval is granted there will be many rules you shall abide by, and you will also remain under the watch and care of the Hyuga clan from then on."

She felt slightly caught off-guard by the weight of the arrangement but nodded anyway.

"I imagine that the children are anxious next door…wondering what this is about." He asked of Tenten, "And perhaps you had thought I was a cold, aloof man before we spoke candidly?"

"I never thought that." Tenten certified, "I understand. Well…I've seen the stress that Neji has been under. I know you deal with your own share of quandaries and red tape."

Hiashi appeared briefly delighted by her observation. No one seemed to get it. How hard a day in his shoes could be… He raised his hand and gestured with a wave, as if motioning through the wall for his family to return. Tenten was amused that he knew at least one if not all of them had been watching with the Byakugan.

His children and nephew returned, muffling their own speculative conversation as they entered the room. They had only saved one last namagashi for Tenten, as Hanabi had eaten all the rest. Tenten helped herself to it and gave Neji a reassuring look as he sat stiffly beside her, clueless of how well it had gone.
"I find this to be...a sensible match." Hiashi updated his nephew, who straightened attentively after hearing the opinion, "Know that I approve, and will follow up by morning to have other minutiae of this matter sanctioned."

Hanabi and Hinata started talking at each other, turning their thrilled jabbering toward Neji and Tenten. It was hard to tell who the congratulations and fawning were actually aimed at. Hiashi took a moment to let the girls process. Neji and Tenten, on the other hand, sat beside each other and quietly marveled at the outcome. They spared a glance for each other, pleased.

"Before it gets too late, all of you change out of that formalwear." Hiashi mandated. Oddly, it was only then that Tenten noticed the clan leader was dressed as he always was: in white and black yukata. Quite informal for such a meeting, but he probably did not want to deal with heat or discomfort nearing the end of summer. It was his prerogative.

"Neji, bring Tenten home and then return to me so we may go over other details." He requested of his nephew, and then added to his guest, "How fortunate that we were able to learn more about you, Tenten. From here out we can share even more. Be a good companion to my nephew."

Calmer and cooler, Tenten responded in the affirmative, "I will, Hiashi-sama. Thank you."

After being bid good night, Hiashi and the youngsters went their separate ways, with most intending to find help removing their kimono. As directed, Neji led Tenten back in the direction of Kayato's work area, matching her slow-as-molasses pace.

"Were you watching from the other room?" She asked him.

"We all were." Neji confessed.

"Ah. That's what we thought. Your uncle didn't bother checking what you were up to."

"What did he talk to you about?" Neji needed to know.

"He...huh." Tenten tipped her head as she recalled, "He was nice to me."

Neji was not sure how his uncle had been inserted into the context of 'nice.' He could scarcely even envision it.

"Stop. He just recalled some things about my parents...and talked about a few subjects that were best not said in front of your cousins." Tenten filled him in, "They were already riled up."

"Good." Neji breathed easier. He found her hand again under the billowing sleeve.

"That went well." Tenten observed, amazed.

Neji halted and Tenten stopped short, leashed by his hold on her hand. She turned to see if anything was the matter. He stood close to her with his eyes shut, keeping his face level with her temple. He was winding down: much too high-strung for a rather simple meeting.

"Thank you for doing this. Most of it will be troublesome. There will be critics and naysayers, but I will do my best." Neji spoke the words softly beside her ear, planting a chaste kiss there, "For you."

Tenten badly wanted to kiss him the way she typically did, but it was not the proper time or place. She made a sound of accord in her throat and reveled, standing face to face with him. They just stood like that for a while, wordlessly appreciating each other and how it had turned out.
After a few seconds Tenten lightly jabbed Neji's arm, continuing her slow walk down the corridor, "Not half bad for a late birthday present, right?"

Chapter End Notes

Note: Look at that, they are almost adult-ing. Beware. To describe the form and premise of the next chapter— imagine a full carton of a dozen eggs that are cozy, beautifully smooth, and uncracked. Now imagine dropping them 5 meters onto concrete. Side note; Naruto will be involved in the mess. I will post that soon. Oh and hey, what did you like? Let me know in a review, good reader.

Chapter Soundtrack: "For the Best" by Gregory and the Hawk

Low rumbles traveled down the long corridors of the Hyuga house. It was the morning after a propitious introduction between Tenten and the head of the clan. Many clansmen had set out to attend to tasks and mission assignments, Neji being no exception.

He could hear distant discussion; voices in the far parts of the house as he prepared to depart for training with his team. Neji neared an exit to the Main House's engawa and then stopped, feeling a prickle of intuition.

A short silence in the home was broken by shouting that rattled the rice paper door beside him. Wide-eyed, Neji tried to imagine what on earth the source of commotion was. He peered uncertainly down an interior hallway, hesitant to confirm the feeling in his gut. Something was amiss.

Perhaps against better judgement, he followed the passages of the house toward the sounds of discord. Neji arrived at the portion of the home that Hyuga Main House elders inhabited, stopping uncertainly near the closed door of a tea room. He wondered if it was acceptable to use the Byakugan and determine who the arguing parties were. One of them, by the sound of it, was his uncle Hiashi.

Then, the door slid open after a minute of quieter discussion, and Neji blinked in surprise as the tall Elder Haburo exited the room. Neji glimpsed his uncle seated at a low table with other elders, ready to rise and leave as well. Hosuke commanded Hiashi to remain, as those gathered were not done conversing with him. Haburo shut the door and leveled his gaze on Neji.

The old man's face had lost nearly every trace of fat and elasticity it knew in its youth. Lines were deeply etched into his skin, and his sharp, white eyes drooped noticeably at the corners. His gray hair was tied in the traditional style, but today Haburo was dressed in dark, modern clothing as if to attend a village conference.

"Great grandson," Haburo let out a small sigh as he greeted Neji, "Walk with me. I am stopping at my office."

As far back as Neji remembered, Elder Haburo had never spoken to him one-on-one before or acknowledged the fact that Neji was his direct descendent on his grandfather's side. He felt wary of the old man who he had no threads of a relationship with. He followed half a step behind Haburo.

At the office near the back of the house, Haburo tottered inside on tired legs and moved to the far left window, pulling up blinds. He waved bony fingers at Neji, signaling that he shut the door. He reluctantly did so.
"Come here, Neji-kun, and get these shades." Haburo pointed out the long wall of windows, "Let some light in here. I need to see where I'm going..." As directed, Neji lifted shades and carefully watched the old man circle around a formidable desk. It was littered with correspondence. Haburo proceeded to organize it.

"I am sure you are wondering...why I have never stopped working? My peers are lazy in their retirements...and I am too motivated to sit idly." He licked a fingertip to flip through a multi-page report. He glanced up at Neji again, with the faintest, ghostly expression of affection on his face.

"You are 17 now, your uncle tells me. You are of age to fully assume responsibilities in the Hyuga clan." Haburo noted, "Ah. If I could remember that age...or what it felt like to be strong and young...17. Then, I was busy fighting wars, and providing for my late wife and first child. Days that were bloody and overcast...leaving us weary. Shortly after that I became head of this clan." He dropped documents in an outgoing tray, "Things happened so fast."

Weirdly, Neji could kind of relate. Haburo detected the empathy on the young man's face.

"Do you feel that things move fast, Neji-kun?" Haburo asked him.

"At times it does feel that way." He conceded.

"Ha! And imagine being my age while feeling the speed of life— I turned 90 this year." Haburo was dryly amused, "You have an adult perspective now, and you are interested in finding a spouse and assuming your duties as clan leader, I understand. It will be upon you quicker than you know."

Neji maintained a respectful distance from the desk, regarding the elder who was a conspicuous and persisting antiquity of his bloodline. Neji took a moment to think about how he had snorted and rebelled at the last meeting with clan elders, wondering if that behavior left a sour impression on them. Haburo had been willing to advocate for him, more so than Hinata, at any rate. Neji wondered how Haburo felt now. He seemed willing to talk and express himself. Maybe this was a resource he had overlooked? Hyuga clan elders and their viewpoints, so often vilified by Hiashi and Hideyasu...Neji was not so sure he could ignore them after all.

"Have a seat." Haburo motioned to him again, and they sat in chairs on opposite sides of the desk, "There, that's better. You look me in the eye, Neji-kun. Quite unlike little Hinata and Hanabi...who dislike me so..."

"They have different preferences in the company they keep." Neji spoke on their behalf, "I don't think they have any personal objection to you, Haburo-sama."

"Yes, perhaps. They are social in outside circles, I can see. Fujita-kun is skittish as well." The old man tapped his chin, "What a generation. Like sparrows that scatter..."

Neji tried to keep his face as inexpressive as possible while trying to figure out what this was about.

"Neji-kun," Haburo announced, "Frankly, you are one of the softest people I have ever met."

A bolt of alarm woke Neji up a bit more. He didn't understand.

"You have been pampered and well-cared for by your foster guardian, raised up from the Branch and treated as an equal..." Haburo's mouth slanted in irritation, "How do you expect to repay the kindness of elders who gave you that chance...to live such a life? Have you ever given that thought?"

No, he had never given it thought. Neji hardly knew how to form a sentence involving that Haburo sighed while rummaging around a drawer for something. "And your cousins are recalcitrant and ungrateful for their freedoms. So very spoiled."

"None of you have ever spilled blood in a war. You have never subjugated Branch members engaging in an uprising. Never traded your lives for a greater cause; never for more than the instant gratification that young people seek."

Neji watched in astonishment as Haburo scooped a few peppermints into his mouth. He was very nonchalant about his disapproval.

"When your uncle called for a meeting this morning, while thinking on my way there, I realized that my grandson Hiashi facilitated this bloated privilege that my great grandchildren misuse. So I was compelled to silence Hiashi’s request before he could even make it—just as soon as I sat down."

Haburo elaborated serenely, "The last time I granted Hiashi a favor was when he and Hizashi discussed repayment to Kumogakure in the death of the idiot Raikage on our property."

He was aware of Neji’s shocked staring but continued shamelessly, "I sympathized with Hizashi’s sacrifice and respected it. By elevating you to the Main House of our clan, I believed it was a gesture of gratitude to Hizashi that you would one day reciprocate to the Main House. Though you haven’t yet done so…now I know how I want you to return the favor, Neji-kun."

It was about then he tried to speak up, as if to mention some feeble example of a contribution, but Neji was cut off again.

"You will bring our clan back to its former condition and leadership. Back to strength. Neji-kun, you will complete Sealing lessons under my tutelage to understand our restraint seal, and how best to control Branch members. You will also honor the covenant I recommended."

Haburo reiterated, "We elders agreed this morning that you will select from and marry within the Main House of the Hyuga clan and carry out your duties. This shift in ethos will combine your talent with the clan’s vision of the future."

"Whose vision of the future—?" Neji continued to speak even though Haburo raised his hand to silence him again, "Yours? I intend to repay the Hyuga with kindness, but such a choice leaves me no choice at all—"

He felt a slight poke near his ribcage from Haburo, which had traveled through air. The old man’s Jyukken was subtle and mild, but it made his point clear. Shut up. Neji did.

"You do not have to abide by the vision if you do not believe you can serve as the leader this clan needs." Haburo assured him, "You can repay your debt by rejoining the Branch Family, Neji-kun. That is what you were born into and that is where you belong. Only by my intervention is that not the case." His voice hardened, far less amicable, "Choose wisely. Your decisions will affect your immediate family, one way or another. I have had it with Hiashi and Hideyasu’s games—your games by extension. Such are frivolous rackets, and that is not in the Hyuga clan’s best interest. It has been in your interest. You will no longer shame the Hyuga with your personal pursuits."

The silence in the dusty, sunny room was razor-sharp. Neji seethed in dread.

Haburo spoke again with a hint of smugness, "Did you really believe you are better than all the rest of the Hyuga clan? As a prodigy with talent that we, supposedly, have not seen before? I assure you it has been seen before." He went on, "Did you really think you have dreamed up a future for this clan that no one before you has envisioned, Neji-kun?"
The old man leaned forward over the desk, watching the youngster, "You are not the first to think that the Caged Bird Seal should be done away with. Not the first to be raised from the Branch to join the Main Family. Nor the first, reciprocally, of the Main who will have been relegated to the Branch." Haburo, for his age, was intimidatingly sound of body and mind; it was clear when he stood from his seat and loomed above the clan heir, "Decades and decades of leadership in the Hyuga clan have seen all kinds of wanton stupidity like yours. You dared threaten me and my peers, claiming death was a gentler option than what we suggested to you?" He scoffed at Neji, "That is something your father also thought, no?"

Neji bristled furiously, "Do not drag my father's memory through the mud of your rhetoric, great elder."

"Oh Neji…tens of others just like you, before you…more skilled than you, more popular than you. They are gone." Haburo pointed out, "I am still here."

"Does that honestly speak for their incompetence, or was it your sacrifice of those who came before me?" Neji wondered boldly.

"See for yourself." Haburo offered, "Our brothers in ancient blood, the Uchiha clan…who refused to fit their clansmen with failsafe seals to avoid violence and calamity…" He happily shamed the Uchiha for comparison, "And where did it get them? Where did their lack of control deliver them to? Self-discipline and caution are the hallmarks of longevity. That is what the Hyuga clan has known as we watched our brother clan burn itself from the inside out…destroyed by its own heir, no less."

He was grinding his teeth and considering a verbal onslaught to unleash on Haburo. Unfortunately, no good points were coming to mind. Neji felt a landslide of helplessness slip down his esophagus into his stomach, roiling his insides.

"Think on it." Haburo told him. With his bony hand, Haburo pointed to the door, marking Neji's cue to get out. Woodenly, Neji rose and left the office.

The only thing he could think to do was to return to where he last saw his uncle. Thankfully, or maybe not thankfully, all of the other elders had vacated the tea room. Hiashi and Hideyasu were still occupying it, Neji glimpsed with his blood limit. More than likely they were reeling from the same news.

Neji quickly entered the room and shut the door behind him, just in time to catch some of Hiashi's vocal fretting.

"He's leveraged my daughters." Hiashi lamented what had come to fruition, ignoring Hideyasu's 9:00AM pouring of wine into a rather large glass, "My grandfather, understanding soul that he is…he will send my children to the Branch if he does not see my nephew do his bidding."

"Here. Come on now." Hideyasu caught a flailing arm and fitted the wine glass in Hiashi's hand, "I need you to let this slow you a little, Hiashi-sama. Then we can get constructive."

Neji was bewildered by the sight. Was this a coping mechanism he had never witnessed before? Had they just been good at concealing it?

Hideyasu noticed Neji's arrival, "Oh, gosh, Neji—here." He poured more wine.

"It's morning." Neji reminded him. He moved around the low table to take a seat beside Hiashi, who was sadly sipping the alcohol.

"I know. This must be what mornings in Hell feel like." Hideyasu imagined. He helped himself to the drink that Neji turned down.

"We are all…more disposable than I realized." Neji admitted, stilted.

Hideyasu and Hiashi turned to him at the same time, equally rattled.

"…was that the point?" Neji asked quietly, "That the Head of the Hyuga…is in fear of disobeying our elders? Enacts their will out of necessity and self-preservation?"

"I'm sorry." Hiashi shut his eyes, trying to calm down, "That is the way."

"Will Haburo-sama…do that to Hinata-sama and Hanabi-sama?" Neji ventured further.

"He can, and he would create the necessary justification for it to quell outrage." Hiashi confirmed, "My grandfather…sent Hideyasu's sister, Hizome, to the Branch for disobedience. It happened when you were a child, Neji. As recently as then."

"And he's threatened my other sister, Hikamei, and I with that promise as well." Hideyasu spoke mournfully above his glass, "Now you can see why we don't get much done in terms of forward progress."

"Were you going to…explain this to me?" Neji was a bit perturbed.

"Yes. I had no idea that today would be the day." Hiashi admitted, "I have no more leeway with my grandfather. I cannot call his bluff. He has no qualms moving us to the Branch so that he can puppeteer a new leader…someone more pliant, like Fujita or Hanabi, if he so chooses."

"Well, not Hanabi." Hideyasu laughed morbidly, "She's as good as Branch-sealed, with that mouth."

Neji tried to grasp this new reality, "How do I stop it?"

"He must have told you how to do that." Hiashi guessed, "Grandfather spoke with you, didn't he? Surely he gave you his terms. Those are the only terms that will ensure the safety of my children. If you choose an option other than what he provided…"

"I won't." Neji spoke protectively. The situation was godawful, but he at least had the power to keep his cousins out of the crossfire.

Hiashi's shoulders slackened a little. He set his glass down on the table and let his eyes stare off despondently.

"What did he ask you to do, Neji?" Hideyasu inquired.

The words flooded back to him. The putrid, degrading demands. The insults. He had never felt so small in his life. Neji did not say anything for a while, still digesting what Haburo expected of him.

When he had the willpower to speak again Neji asked, "Did you mention Tenten at all?"

"No. Not by name or explanation of eligibility. I was told to drop the subject in favor of hearing out my grandfather's message." Hiashi informed him, "I have no illusion that they would have reacted favorably, had I been allowed to address it. Please forgive my failure."

"There is nothing to forgive. It is no failure of yours." Neji wasn't sure how he was supposed to console anyone else. He was on the verge of a mental derailing himself.

"She would have been a refreshing opportunity…" Hideyasu sighed and polished off the wine glass,
"I was glad to see Tenten here last night. Fujita and Kayato couldn't stop talking about it…now what do I tell them?"

"The truth." Hiashi offered somberly, "Do not let anyone in our family misunderstand. This extortion is what our tradition is rooted in. Don't let our children live their lives ignorant of this practice." He glanced at his nephew again, "I never wanted for you…to enter an era of disappointment and disillusionment because of our clan, Neji. I regret not being able to prevent any of this. I hope you understand that I won't risk the futures of my daughters. I hope you can come to terms with what my grandfather asked."

"You won't like it." Neji warned.

Hiashi's face dropped. Hideyasu took the cue to pour another glass.

"I will see it done, but I…" His voice cracked slightly, "I am expected to serve the Main House and its interests only. I will be…trained in proper use of the Caged Bird Seal. I will choose a spouse from the Main House. If I decide not to meet those requirements, my alternative was to join the Branch Family." Neji bowed his head, "…I need some time to think. I don't know what's right."

"Dear God." Hideyasu spilled a spot of wine on his pants, horrified, "No matches with the Taketori? The Sarutobi? The Senju? Anyone else? Our own blood…"

"Yes."

"So he does intend to control Hinata and Hanabi, in some capacity." Hiashi observed, cooling off as he realized what the scheme was, "And he's denied you other options."

"Utterly." Neji took a breath.

"I am not one for advocating for a particular match, however…" Hideyasu rubbed the back of his neck anxiously, "Hikamei is 36 years old. Overdue for marriage, in Grandfather's opinion, although she never had interest in being wed…perhaps she will agree if you explain to her how dire our circumstances are?"

Neji just looked at him. He could hardly believe they were entertaining the arrangement.

"I respectfully ask that you do not consider your cousins." Hiashi added, "But do consider the importance of you remaining in your position. No matter what is said, elders underestimate what you will be able to do as a leader of this clan. Neji, I believe it's best if you endure and see to the changes we so desperately need."

Hideyasu chimed in, "Haburo-sama is old and he won't live forever. No one else on our council of elders is so strict and conservative. The rest will be more open to listening to you and finding middle ground."

Hiashi nodded, "This is an important time for someone like you to stay engaged with our clan. Do not surrender your potential influence because of Grandfather's threats."

"I will bear that in mind." Neji agreed.

"Very well. Take this day to…rejuvenate. Or at least make sense of our 'great nobility' and how we of the Hyuga contort sense into fear. I pray you won't let that continue to be the legacy of our clan." Hiashi advised.

Upon leaving, Neji figured that Hiashi and Hideyasu did not care what hour of the day it was. They would consume the wine down to the last drop in the bottle. They had finally shared the heavy burden with him of what it meant to be the heir of the Main House. What it took to navigate the whims of draconian elders and conforming to their standards. Old men that perhaps even threatened and intimidated each other into keeping their timeworn ways.

Neji finally made it to the porch and tapped his shoes on outside. He had already made up his mind that he could not face his team like this. Not while he was a prisoner of his own brain. He went through the motions of Baguazhang on the house's lawn in an attempt to relax and hear his thoughts more clearly.

How had he not seen the big picture for so long? He'd been wrapped up in other things, Neji conceded. Haburo had some valid points. He had never given consideration to the thoughts and ideas of clan elders. He treated them as old, fragile satellites instead of resources. Only now did Neji understand why no one could rely on them as fountains of knowledge. They sought to control every facet of the Hyuga. Not just the Branch, but every last person on the playing board, moving chess pieces around according to their strategy. Haburo was a remarkably skilled player.

His first and strongest instinct, Neji noticed, was to remain. To keep going. To not be cowed by this threat and setback. Either he was brave by nature or it was bravery born from pride. He was smart enough to learn the game too. He would become leader and manage what he could, and have patience, waiting for the day Haburo went to sleep and never woke up. That was when he could campaign for bolder changes with elders, and not a moment sooner.

Yet the drawbacks of this decision were incredibly limiting and painful. Neji thought about it; palms up, arms bent, stepping in easy circles that Wong Leung had demonstrated.

Naturally, being forced to choose a partner from among three Main House peers meant that he could potentially damage the aspirations and well-being of his cousins. Not that he would ever sanely consider them, but it felt worse that Hikamei, who he barely knew, would have no choice but to agree or be complicit in Neji's poorly made match with a closer relation. It bordered on a cruel joke, on Haburo's part.

What came like a rushing undercurrent in his thoughts was the complete ineffectuality of Tenten's presence. Since he had already chosen to remain clan heir, Neji had automatically written her off. He pondered over it, surprised to conclude that she would agree with him if he told her all of this. She would understand why he couldn't stay in her life, or at least, not in the intimate way they had established. As a practical person, Tenten could look at the facts and encourage him to continue on the path he'd embarked on. She always had. Neji felt confident that she would not advise him otherwise.

He felt queasy. Neji had not bothered to eat anything. He also felt that maybe his train of thought was altogether wrong. Trading the future he wanted with someone he loved for a blood relation more than twice his age…was probably a horrible idea. No matter the benefits, there was going to be a catastrophe at some point related to his personal feelings.

Neji stopped practicing forms and stalked off. What a tragically beautiful summer day it was, a perfect day for his clan elders to smother hopes and dreams with verbal feces and intimidation. He left the Hyuga estate and went up town; taking side streets to be sure he would not encounter any of his teammates. They would be done waiting for him at the training field and out looking for him by this time.

He arrived at the village's central cemetery for departed ninja. Neji, half-crazy with anger, stopped at his father's grave and dropped his hands at his sides, accusing the headstone and symbolic, empty space below, "You did this."
Birds chirped in the peripheries from manicured trees and shrubs.

"You facilitated all of this. You put the idea in Uncle's head to foster me in the Main family. You traded yourself to Cloud. You wanted more for me, and then I was given more than I could possibly handle…more than anyone can handle, it so happens." Neji balled a hand into a fist, "Father, you are not as selfless and good as I remember. Now I see how willing you were to let me hurt."

On the far side of the cemetery, a well-dressed man was laying a bouquet of flowers on the headstone of the Fourth Hokage. He had not noticed Neji at all as he set out in the direction of town again, leaving the graveyard empty. Neji stood alone in the space, processing rage and frustration.

"What were you thinking? How could you be more willing to die as a decoy than to live for me? What could I have gained in your absence, after you assured me you would stay with me? Insecurity. Acrimony. Skepticism. The sense that you're a liar. The sense that mother didn't die the way you said she did. Maybe everything you said was to make things easier in the moment." He dug his heel into soft soil, incensed, "You've left me this mess. So I can stretch myself thin trying to fulfill some obligation to you—to make you proud, to honor your memory. At how many people's expense will I achieve that? How many people I care about will be hurt because of what I must do?"

Neji added a clipped barb, "How can you rest peacefully in Heaven watching this mortal devastation?"

A summer breeze seemed to answer, rustling tree tops. It cooled him off a little.

"What did you want for me?" Neji wondered, "I have no idea…I thought I did. Am I supposed to learn of your intention now? Should I look back on these events and reflect, and then tell you what I've learned?"

He wandered into the hypothetical.

"That all ways are wrong ways. That our clan is despicable. That as much as I want to help it, I want to erase it. And…" He took a breath and shocked himself, "That is…what they also think." Neji wondered if he was insane or if he had found common ground with his elders, "So that is your point. I am the architect of these problems far more than you are. We all must be held accountable. How does anything I do matter, then?"

The anger seemed to evaporate and was replaced by something else; something he had not felt in a long time. Neji recalled what it had been like to settle into a three-man team without Tenten. How he had felt anxiety, longing, and sorrow, but then it had felt manageable by comparison. Now the weight of everyone he missed was oppressive, stinging his eyelids, making it hard to breathe.

"Why do I love someone if I cannot have her? Why was I hopeful? How do I reconcile with the end of the most important thing I've done?" Neji tried clearing his throat, staying somewhat dry and calm, "I don't want to end it to start something meaningless instead."

Rather than saying it out loud, Neji apologized in his head to Hyuga Hizashi. Hardly anything was his father's fault. He walked briskly out of the cemetery and would have felt stupid if not for the fact he felt much, much worse than stupid. He was frail and heartsore. Having a one-sided, accusatory conversation with his dead father was probably more normal than he wanted to own up to.

He traversed streets and back alleys, staying unseen. Starving near mid-day, Neji stopped near the central quarter of the village beside a freshwater stream. It was an area where Wong Leung had made him and Lee perform ridiculous balancing exercises in the past. He halted on the bank and controlled his breathing. For all intents and purposes, he had un-made up his mind. Neji had no pull in any single direction, as every course of action was distinctly unappetizing. What was he supposed to tell his uncle in the next few days? Roll dice and assign a decision? He was getting to that point.

Neji realized there was one thing that would take his mind off of this detestable subject. He sank down into a balanced prayer crouch on one foot and folded his hands. His least favorite exercise would distract for a while.

Several blocks south, the gathering of old timers playing checkers timed out for the day. The geezers dispersed from their playing tables in the Han Ethnic Quarter, destined for other parts of Konoha. Wong Leung bought the day’s paper from a local newsstand (printed in Nihongo) and walked toward home. Of course, he spotted someone familiar beside the stream near his house. Wong curiously ambled over to see why Neji was by himself as opposed to working with his team.

Wong Leung stopped behind him and got no reaction, though he was certain Neji had detected his presence. Kitten-paw, he greeted Neji with a Hanwen nickname. That did not register so Wong tapped Neji’s shoulder with the rolled up newspaper. He rose from his crouch and shook loose.

"Neji." Wong Leung greeted again, "No team?"

He shook his head. It was obvious to the old man that he was upset, and did not want his teammates to witness it.

"Troubled?" The old man wondered.

"Shifu…” Neji took a chance and opened up, "I have to make a choice, and the only two options I have are terrible."

Wong raised his eyebrows, "Oh?"

"This is something I should deliberate on before bothering…Lee and Tenten." He explained.

I know how such a thing feels. Wong related in his mother tongue, adding in Nihongo, "Do you know what I said?"

"That you have also felt that way.” Neji presumed, gleaning a few key words of Hanwen.

Yes. Wong Leung nodded, Could you tell me about it?

No, I can't. Neji sighed and used minimal Hanwen, shoulders slumped.

It would be too long of an explanation. Wong understood, So then…I will tell you of my own terrible choices that I had to contend with in the past, and which one I chose long ago.

Surprised, Neji wondered if he properly understood what had been said, but Wong Leung indicated that he had.

At a time like this, don't you wish to know how I made my decision? When I was younger I was much more foolish. Wong Leung went on, And I still had Lee's father with me, then. My only child. His name was Wan Kam.

"Lee's father?"

Another nod, Oh yes. Wan Kam was a street fighter and con artist in his youth. He was a hedonist who used my Wushu to profit. Wong Leung recalled, Wan Kam was beloved to me even when he did wrong. He would pretend to learn from his mistakes to make me happy…but in time I often discovered that he hadn't.

"He was dishonest."

This part may be a bit more difficult for you to understand, but let's see...Wan Kam was always looking to line his pockets. While we lived in the Kingdom of Han, in Shanhu, my son convinced me to join his business venture in Nihon. The Third Great Ninja War was raging and had created opportunities for foreign merchants and businessmen, Wan Kam explained. He said I would attract many Wushu students there if I opened schools, which were not doing so well in Shanhu at the time. Wong Leung checked to see if Neji was getting it.

"You came here for opportunity." Neji gathered.

That's right. To the Fire Country. It was a long journey, and after we arrived in Tanzaku Quarter and completed deals for the buildings we would renovate for my schools...I learned that the property was all ill-gotten. Wan Kam had not told me that it had been stolen or that previous owners had died in war. The old man folded his arms behind his back, I found it completely unethical. It made me hesitant to finish opening my schools. And in no time at all, legally bound owners returned to discover our squatting and had us removed. I could not speak Nihongo or find work. Day laboring was all that I could do to feed my family.

Neji had for the most part understood, and wondered, "What did your son do at that time?"

What he did best. He and his girlfriend Pui Yee conned money and stole from many victims in this country. They partook of drinking, debauchery, and frivolous entertainment. My son sponsored music events and illegal fighting rings. Tasteless, loud music that he thought was a window into the rest of the world. Wan Kam thought that I did not look at other continents and nations and see opportunity in them the way he did. But I knew all he looked at were the popular drugs and Rock music of those countries. He smiled sadly, I knew I was losing him. When I pleaded with my son to follow a virtuous path and make an honest living...he always blamed me for everything.

Some of the concepts were a bit too abstract in the language for Neji to fully comprehend. He got half of the gist, supposing Wan Kam did deceitful things to survive, and that he also had a spouse.

Then he was a father. The least thoughtful one there ever was. He named Lee after his favorite music. Said he would take him around the world and show him the sights. Make him a Wushu star... Wong sighed wistfully, It was not long before Wan Kam grew tired of the responsibility. He and Pui Yee quarreled endlessly about the difficulty of raising a child. When they finally agreed to sell Lee to a buyer in the Tea Country, I could not take it anymore. I had a physical blowout fight with Wan Kam, trying to instill virtue and compassion in him in the exact wrong way. He felt no remorse over hurting me that day, breaking my bones and spirit... The man's lips quivered emotionally, My son told me...he never needed me. That he always hated me. He could make his own way. He shut his eyes, And in exchange for the last bit of saved money I had, Wan Kam gave Lee to me.

Neji watched the man and swallowed thickly. Little of that was lost in translation. He especially noted the part in which Lee was handed off like a bargaining chip to a heartbroken man.

That was the money I had worked for...to go home. Home to Shanhu. To get away from this place... and its strange ways and selfish people. But I...could not part with Lee. Wong Leung ran his hand under his eyes, dabbing at moisture, So I gave up that hope. I let Wan Kam and Pui Yee take my money to conduct their deals in the Kingdom of Han and Sindhu. At least then I was free of them... but I had to settle down and learn how to adapt to a place I did not call home. It was frightening to raise another boy after I had...raised such a rotten one once before.
Neji shook his head, "Your son's cruelty is not a reflection of how you raised him. Not if Lee is anything to go by."

Wong Leung chuckled through his tears; Do you really think so, Neji? I have never been perfect. Certainly not a perfect parent or teacher...and at that time I had thought I made a mistake not taking my chance to return home... But I realized that being with Lee was the right choice. I impressed upon him strict rules and morals, and made my love for him...quieter, subtler... He concluded, Though I have no doubts that my grandson loves me. No matter how grizzled I've become...I take great comfort in that he never once said he didn't need me.

Neji stewed on what he had understood: that there was clearly love between grandfather and grandson. He watched a cupped leaf float down the stream, hearing Wong Leung make a rattling sigh as he relaxed.

"Do you hate being here?" Neji wondered, "That you can't return home to what you knew?"

I don't really hate this place. Not now. Wong Leung admitted, I hated that I felt worthless for so long. That my son hurt me and made me believe...no one would care who I was, where I was from, what I thought...that the Hidden Leaf Village would never need the likes of me. The way Wan Kam didn't need me.

"You can still open a school if you want to." Neji reminded him.

With what money, Kitten-paw?

"Mine. Ours. Whatever my team can provide for you, it would be adequate thanks." Neji shut his eyes, "Dreams should be chased."

You sound as if you are planning to stop chasing your own dream. Wong Leung noticed, Don't sell me dramatic words of support only because you are going crazy with grief. Come now, boy. What's happened to you?

He didn't want to spell it out for the old man, but could share partially, "My ignorance finally caught up to me."

"Ah." Wong said.

And... Neji recalled a useful phrase in Hanwen, I am afraid.

Your clan has...high standards and expectations. Though your uncle is a decent enough man... Wong observed nonchalantly, But there may be some that want you to think you have no value. No choice. The way Wan Kam made me think for so long.

They exchanged a glance.

Do we really want to believe that? The old man asked.

With a wane smile, Neji shook his head and accepted Wong Leung's reassuring clap on his shoulder.

Take a hot bath, eat dumplings... Wong recommended as he strolled back in the direction of his house, And tell whoever is afflicting you to fuck off all the way back to their first ancestor.

Neji guessed that the parting remark had incorporated profanity, but it had been too sophisticated for him to decipher. He peeled away from the stream and set out for the Hyuga estate again. Neji had no motivation to train or to ask for a mission to distract himself. Though Wong Leung meant well and provided him with a listening ear, he was feeling marginally worse after hearing the anecdote.

It was rather strange sitting in a tub in the Hyuga's communal bath in the early afternoon. His tense muscles fought him, refusing to loosen. Not a single soul dropped by the bathing area while he sat there for a long while in silence, meandering through his options.

After that ineffective remedy, Neji dressed and wandered aimlessly around the clan property. He passed by the farthest yards where he had practiced Wind Release with Hideyasu, regarding the stumps and chips where trees had once stood. Neji circled 'round past the Branch quarters, noticing Hideyasu's youngest sister, Hizome, who had been expelled from the Main House.

Hizome was seated on the porch and wiping her youngest child's hands clean with a cloth. Frowning, she nagged at the boy, Tsukuru, to read his Academy Entrance Exam guide more and play in the mud less. Her elder son, Hirokazu, muttered at his brother and ushered him along into the house. With a stern look still on her face, Hizome turned and stared at Neji as he stood on the gravel path.

"Did you drink with my big brother this morning?" She snarked.

"I abstained." Neji confirmed.

"Good. He'll become a lush while resisting the pressures of our elders. Hideyasu hasn't stopped by to tell me what the problem is yet…" Hizome cocked her head at Neji, "But I bet I can guess."

He felt more resigned to it, "You'll find out soon enough."

"I suppose that I will." She was the feisty type, starting to grin, "Don't look at me like my life is horrible. I've lived exactly as I want to. What more can those old men do to me? Kill me? Lock me away? My husband is in the ANBU and he would be delighted to intervene."

Neji crossed over to the porch and sat beside her, "Is he the reason why you were expelled?"

"I am the reason why I was expelled." Hizome corrected him, "I was told to do many things I had no desire to do. So I married without permission and lived away from this estate…and when they dragged me back for my insolence, and I refused to apologize or dissolve my union, I smiled at Grandfather as he attached a seal to my head." She tittered to herself, proud, "Now look at my three boys! Nyozeka, Hirokazu, and Tsukuru…I can't enjoy life without them. Their father is fiercely protective of them."

"I should like to talk to him, sometime." Neji noted of her husband, whose name he did not know.

"He's busy. I apologize I've never properly introduced Masanari to you, Neji-sama." Hizome sighed, "Are you…preparing yourself? To join our House?"

"I think…I might be." He admitted.

"Ho ho! What have you done?" She snickered in amusement.

"Nothing yet." Neji pushed up from his seat to stand, "But like you, there are some things I cannot agree to do even when our elders mandate it."

Hizome waved a hand to get his attention before he continued on, "Neji-sama. Do you think I still matter even while I am a member of the Branch?"

His eyebrows raised slightly, surprised by the question, "I do think that. You and Hirokazu, and all of your family. All of you matter."

"Then you will matter too." She stated simply. Hizome returned to the house.

Neji carried on to the Main House. The day was wearing thin, and he wondered only for a moment what his team thought about his absence. He stepped on to the engawa of the Main House to his corner room, slid the door open and shut it with a soft clack. He lethargically rolled front-ways onto his bed and then fell still.

Neji acknowledged that he was unaccustomed to coping with this level of turmoil. He turned his face to the side and breathed slowly. He could acknowledge something else after reflecting on his feelings.

He was incredibly selfish.

It was a work in progress. Neji certainly was invested in the well-being of others and advocating for them, and at the Tournament he had been determined to help as many people as possible. But in the end, these steps forward towards selflessness and compassion concealed his desire to keep everything valuable he had attained: his status as heir of the Hyuga clan, his influence in the Main Family, the respect of his friends, and the woman he loved. Once one of these critical stations was compromised by Haburo's threat, Neji had been quick to throw away the other gains he had made.

Neji tapped his thumb on the bed spread, growing frustrated with himself. It was deplorable. How he'd straightaway cast aside his free-will choice of Tenten as a companion. He had done so as if she had never endeavored or struggled to stay by his side—as if she had never had pains or losses of her own. What he believed was the unthinkable option, joining the Branch, was easier to evaluate after shedding the initial panic he experienced that morning.

Life would resume, albeit on a lower social rung. This did not disagree with him since he'd had humbling lessons over the last few years. Tenten's companionship was also a boon to him, and simultaneously negated one of Haburo's bids to control Hinata and Hanabi's future matches. Even Hizome's explanation of what had happened to her was comforting. She was doing well. Though she was still at the mercy of elders and had to curb her willfulness for the sake of her family, Hizome was satisfied with her choice. Neji was aware that whether or not he was in the Main House, he would be subject to Haburo's tyranny in some form.

But why was it still so frightening? Why did the prospect tear at his guts so, if he could rationalize that life would still be worth living?

Neji thought back to childhood, on the day that Hinata had frantically, in her chirping, squeaky voice, tried to remove him from harm's way after learning what fate awaited him. That she and her gaggle of misfit friends had been concerned about his imminent subjugation. Naruto hardly knew him then, but had gladly vouched for him and his chance to be free.

It was then Neji felt the distinct feeling, the childhood terror that still lingered…that he understood no one could protect him this time. Naruto and his fellowship would not parade onto Hyuga grounds to defend him again. And no amount of convincing on his uncle's part, or honoring the wish of his sacrificed father, was going to sway Haburo.

Yet knowing the root of his fear, dated and irrational though it was, seemed to clear the decision up adequately.

Neji rolled onto his back and stared at the ceiling. He would do it. He would join the Branch. He would stay with Tenten. He would deny Haburo some of the satisfaction he wanted in pairing off his troublemaking great grandchildren.

Shortly after that he shut his eyes and continued to ruminate on the knee-knocking uncertainty of it all, Neji slipped from consciousness. He slept, worn out from worrying and thinking.

Later, he woke in the evening and sat bolt upright. Neji blinked hard and fussed at his eyes. His heavy heart had completely wasted the day and made him useless. What could he expect to achieve tomorrow?

"Neji-sama," A voice spoke through the door.

Neji acknowledged the visitor, and the bedroom door opened when Kō poked his face in, "Are you feeling well?"

"I am not." He was honest.

"Your family has already taken their evening meal. Hinata-sama told me you were asleep." Kō informed him, "I'll have dinner arranged for you in the first floor tea room, if you're interested in eating."

Neji could feel his churning, empty stomach on the cusp of growling, "Not in the tea room. I will eat in here."

Kō covered up his stupefied look quickly, "Oh. If you prefer that, certainly. Is there anything specific you want?"

"Rice and herring." Neji went to his standby favorite comfort food, and then added, "And dumplings."

Kō smiled a little, "Of course. I'll be back shortly."

Wong Leung had said to eat dumplings. Maybe good could come of the suggestion. He lazed about on his bed for a moment before rising, raking his fingers through his disheveled hair to order it and retie it.

Well. He felt awful. Just about as awful as he had ever felt, if memory served. Though the trepidation of his choice to join the Branch Family was abating somewhat, Neji wondered if actually talking about it would clear away the last of his reluctance. He glanced out the window and saw new dark. He had missed sunset. Who would be available to listen to his dirge of discontent? Certainly he could not subject Hinata to it, and Hanabi lacked the maturity to sit through his reflection if it lasted for more than three minutes.

Perhaps his uncle and Hideyasu were anxious enough after the day's events, and it would be premature to share this decision until they checked in with him first? Neji rubbed his forehead and exhaled roughly. If he spoke to Tenten about it, he would have to prepare for an argument when she would inevitably tell him to forget it and hold his head high; to move on from her. Though he wouldn't listen to such a demand, Neji was concerned that Tenten may resent his motion of surrender in joining the Branch. She was nearly as hard-headed as he was.

Neji shuffled things around on his desk and then stopped. Oh.

Lee.

Lee would listen. Lee had always listened. And he could provide objective insight on the matter while still sharing in his pain, because Lee was the 'empathy extraordinaire' of Konohagakure and also happened to be his friend. Underneath the youth, enthusiasm, and teary-eyed dedication; Lee was the best friend who he could not do without.

"Huh." Neji said to himself, crossing his room and thinking that maybe Lee had better things to do right now. Like have supper with his fantastic grandfather. Or generally unwind from a long day of training that Neji had skimped out on.

But since he had helped carry Lee home on the night of the festival, when he’d been too high to put one leg in front of the other to walk…Neji imagined that Lee wouldn’t mind paying him back this evening.

At the porch exit, Neji slid the rice paper door aside and startled. Outside, Lee also looked spooked. He had his hand poised to knock on the frame and announce his presence on the engawa. Since Lee was able to close his mouth first while Neji continued to gape, Lee greeted, "Neji! I was compelled to come over. Grandpa said you were…despondent."

Neji surveyed with the Byakugan briefly to confirm that Tenten was not around. Then he rested his eyes and moved aside to let Lee into the room. Neji shut the door and groaned lowly. The coincidence bordered on a psychic connection.

"I did not tell Tenten I would be here, although I do not think it would matter to her." Lee filled him in. "After training today she had many orders to fill at her shop, and was eager to complete them. She imagined that you were occupied today, so at first I thought nothing of your absence…"

A small, low table at the edge of Neji’s room was a reasonable place to take a seat. Lee noticed that the zabuton on the floor were still fluffy like new, as if no visitor had ever sat on one before. Neji sort of collapsed beside him onto a cushion, very unstable-looking physically and emotionally.

Lee dropped his voice to a whisper, "Was the introduction…poor? Did Tenten make a mockery of the event?" He was referring to the ‘meet the uncle’ dinner Tenten had recounted to him.

"Hardly." Neji sniffed, "She was impressive and it nearly made me look bad."

Lee laughed quietly.

"None of that was the problem." Neji assured him.

"Then…your uncle did find her to be agreeable? Ah! I am very relieved to hear it."

"In spite of what my uncle thinks of her," Neji leaned back to rest on the nearby wall at his back, "There were other complications that made her ineligible."

Lee just stared at him. He was waiting for the other shoe to drop.

Kō opened the door with his foot and stepped into the room while balancing a tray of food. He did not seem very surprised that Neji had a visitor. He gave Lee polite salutations before setting the food down and excusing himself, asking Neji to feel better soon.

Luckily, extra food items had been brought in addition to what Neji had requested. At first, Lee graciously declined Neji’s offer to share dumplings as he began to explain, between mouthfuls of herring, what his great grandfather Haburo had imposed upon him that morning. Neji recounted the details of that, then the AA conference with his uncle and clan steward that followed, and other odds and ends of his extremely unproductive day.

Highly concerned and listening carefully, Lee began to wolf down dumplings even though he’d already eaten dinner.

When Neji finally came around to his final conclusion, Lee was stressed and looking at him with wide eyes.

"I decided that it's better to be with her." Neji spoke the words calmly somehow, "Joining the Branch Family seemed like a painful decision…but being with Tenten is not painful. I will be humbled and continue to work for improvement in my clan. Maybe this is what I needed all along."

Shiny-eyed, Lee spoke, "I…understand."

"I'm not sure how to bring it up to my uncle." Neji admitted before a sip of tea, "This may not completely resolve the challenges the Main House faces, but it should be a start."

"I…" Lee's voice warbled, "I am disturbed by the climate in your clan…that stunts freedom and change like this."

Neji shrugged and drank his tea. It would take time to figure out how to fight back. For now, he'd come up with the only solution that made sense to him.

From his seat beside Neji, Lee folded over above the table, adding, "And I cannot abide seeing you so upset." His face was genuinely anguished, "Your worries worry me too. Neji…I always did respect you, even when we did not see eye to eye. Now more so than ever before, I respect you…though I never…wanted you to give up the things that were important to you."

They had an unusual and amazing staredown, feeling the exact same way. Complete, mutual understanding.

"You worked hard to be the heir of the Hyuga clan. How is it that we can attain the things we strive for and then just…" Lee stared off at the wall, overwhelmed, "Have no choice but to give up?"

"That doesn't mean I can't strive for other things. I have no intention of moping or being cynical, because of this," Neji attempted to console him, "I'll have more important aspirations now. I could be freer than I've ever been."

"But what if your dishonorable elder tries to intimidate you while you are in the Branch? If he hurts you? Tries to stop you from advocating for change-?" Lee raised good points.

"Then I keep trying until I am dead, or he changes his mind." Neji supposed.

Lee was frowning but could not disagree. Worn out from the recap and conversation, Neji tilted and leaned his shoulder on his friend's. It was literal and figurative support. Lee had definitely helped.

"You have been a good friend to me." Neji acknowledged, "Better than I deserved, Lee."

Lee sniffled.

Neji further observed from Wong Leung's story, "I am grateful that you were never able to join your parents on their sybaritic journey around the world. You've been needed here." He clarified, "I need you."

"Eh…hem." Lee was choked up and cleared his throat, "I am surprised to say…that I am also glad I could not join them."

After gathering empty dishes onto the tray and deciding to call it a night, Lee wondered before he left, "Should I not tell Tenten about the things we discussed?"

"No," Neji shook his head, "I will tell her myself tomorrow. She needs a full explanation."

Lee gave an affirmative bob of his head and bid Neji goodnight, setting out into the dark from the side door of the room. After that, Neji transported his tray to the kitchen of the household and left it near other settings to be cleaned. He looked around the house for his uncle, but ran into Hideyasu first in the corridor.

"Ah, Neji," The man seemed tired but somewhat content, "How are you doing?"

"Anxious…but lucid." Neji told him, "I want to tell Uncle that I will be joining the Branch Family."

A shocked expression froze on Hideyasu's face, and he took a moment to process the statement, "That is…your choice to make. We all know that."

"I will tell him now." Neji was about to continue on but Hideyasu barred him with an arm.

"Now is not a good time to speak to Hiashi." Hideyasu warned him, "We've been…well, all day it's been a circus of distress."

"Then when should I—?"

"Wait until after the full clan meeting in two days. It was pushed up to 10:00AM on Tuesday and so…Hiashi can take the rest of the day to digest your decision, after that." He recommended, "Your uncle probably won't be too upset or try to stop you, Neji. It is brave to fly in the face of what my grandfather says…and no matter what; I know you can help change things around here."

Neji thanked him and was surprised when Hideyasu attempted to scurry off towards his wife's dressing studio. Neji followed behind him, "Don't you have time to tell me what to say? How do I address it with Uncle or our elders? What if they protest-?"

"Now, now, Neji…not tonight." Hideyasu waved him off, "I have quite a bit to attend to at the moment, and an appointment first thing in the morning. Everything can wait until after the clan meeting. Rest assured that I will help you."

With that, Neji had to accept that he would not get everything addressed in a single day. He turned back to his room, snapped off the lights, collapsed in bed and knew no more.

Earlier that same day, shortly before noon, Naruto was devoting daylight hours to showing Hinata around the Toad Valley. Rather, he was touring around while on a break from Sage Training, and Hinata saw the sights and made small talk with their minds overlapped.

Naruto heel-toed across the thin trunk of a bouncy, horizontally bent palm tree. "Have you started taking missions yet?" He asked himself, but it was directed at his cognitive companion.

_Only one mission so far. Hokage-sama has devoted much of our time to resolving Tournament clean up and reporting. I think next week she might give my team a tracking assignment._

"That's not a bad start." He hopped away from the rubbery tree, down to grass, "Are you still wearing that amazing outfit, Hinata?"

_I-I-! It was damaged so Kayato-san is going to sew the tears when she can…but it's summertime so I'll still wear shorts and sleeveless tops._
Naruto's lips curled mischievously, "And your vest?"

Yes, but I don't think I want to wear it all of the time. Mostly for serious missions.

"I can just imagine how good you look..." He snickered with his eyes shut, listening to her stammering, bashful reply.

They passed behind the back of an enormous house that sheltered the mountain's largest toads. Hinata marveled at the assault on her senses: big and small houses and plants juxtaposed, sharp scents from the citrus grove around the bend, the constant vibrato of cricket song, the tickle of butterflies roosting on Naruto's shoulder. Though she dared not look down to see how Naruto was dressed for the muggy summer heat, Hinata had a sense his shirt was little more than fishnet material.

Naruto noted, "Man, this is like the hottest day ever since I got here. Are you doing okay?"

I'm fine because you're fine. Hinata paused to amend, I think.

"Phew. Hot. I'm on my way to the lotus pond and just wait 'til you see those flowers, Hinata."

Naruto chirped merrily, "So! Has anything interesting happened at home lately? I feel like I'm just about on the verge of Natural Energy balance."

That's wonderful news, Naruto-kun! The only interesting thing that happened was...yesterday, Neji-niisan brought Tenten-neesan home to introduce her to my family. Hinata's voice trilled excitedly in his head, Dinner felt a little too formal at first, but later I could tell that my father liked her very much.

"Well that's good. Then Neji won't have to sneak around to date her, right?" Naruto reasoned.

No he won't, and not just that...I think Neji-niisan always wants to be with her.

"Yeah, he's pretty stubbornly steadfast. I'm still kind of shocked that Neji got a woman to put up with him at all." Naruto observed, just slightly off topic.

Naruto...I mean that he might want to settle down with her.

Naruto accidentally kicked the top off of a large mushroom as he walked, "Wha— seriously? Neji? He has a heart that beats warm human blood—?"

Naruto-kun, don't joke! He really does love Onee-san!

"This is just sooo weird!" Naruto laughed, "You don't think he's gonna get married before I come home, do you?"

Oh no, no, no! All of this takes time. But I can tell that he has thought about it already.

"Wow!" Naruto was pleased as pie, "Good for him. I can't wait to tease him mercilessly."

Hinata's giggles echoed between his ears. At the end of the path, Naruto was happy to show his girlfriend what the pond looked like in the daytime for a change. Marvelous, pink lotus flowers floated serenely on the water's surface. A snow white heron waded in the mud and pond grass, looming above unsuspecting fish.

"Might as well show you what I usually do when I come out here!" Naruto pulled his top off and stripped down to undershorts, "Hinata, have you ever cannon-balled before?"

She was dizzied by the sudden disrobement, Oh, I...um! I-I've never!
He left his clothing on shore and hurled himself into the pond with a running start. Hinata switched between tittering nervously and laughing, a faraway, disembodied sound that Naruto heard as he surfaced. He stroked over to a giant lotus petal, "Sorry if that was sudden. I just can't stand sweating my butt off all day. It's worse when I'm trying to meditate and, you know, I can't do anything about it."

As he had seen Jiraiya lounge around in a similar manner, Naruto relaxed in the curve of the petal while Hinata commented on the aroma and oddness of such an enormous plant.

I wish I had this at home. She sighed.

"I know. There's a lot of neat stuff here." Naruto agreed, "I'll try to remember to bring back some of Ma's amazing plants, or ask her to bring them over to you. They're great for medicine. I haven't had a single rash here that couldn't be fixed."

Hinata liked the idea, Please do! The bulbs you sent me are doing very well.

"There's more where that came from!" Naruto pinched his nose and front-flipped into the water again. He surveyed with open eyes the transparent, green-tinted aquatic environment, then fixated on an axolotl paddling above multi-colored pebbles below. Hinata squealed and demanded to know what the creature was. It was cute.

Naruto came up for air again, swimming for the stony bank, "You know, I don't know what you call that thing…but Kosuke said he's a nice guy…"

That would do. Naruto made land and clambered up stones stacked beside the pond's falls.

Climbing upwards, he took care to avoid slipping. Naruto made it up a small incline that recessed into a shallow, eroded den of marble, overgrown with vegetation. He snuffed a bit of water up his nostrils after passing through the curtain of the waterfall, but Naruto shook his head to clear himself once inside. "Whew. Gotta make sure I don't break my neck coming up here. Toads make it look easy…" With careful footing, Naruto maneuvered over smooth stones and took a seat on a flat spot, looking up at the cavern ceiling's skylights that let in sunshine and drops of excess water.

This is...beautiful. Hinata adored the charming, dripping hideaway, Do you come here often, Naruto-kun?

"Just twice after Kosuke showed me." Naruto confirmed, leaning back and stretching lazily, "If I want to get Ero-sensei off my back I know he can't follow me here. He can figure out where I am, but he'd prefer not to slip, fall, and drown just trying to get in here."

You don't avoid him all the time, do you?

"No...no. Everything's alright now. He explained a lot of things to me that...upset me. But I'm glad Ero-sensei told me." Naruto acknowledged, "Like my parents and all of that."

Hinata was thoughtfully quiet before asking, Who were they?

"Uh..." Naruto tapped his fingers to his chin, wondering if full disclosure of the matter would confound her, "How about I tell you everything I know once I get home? I do want to tell you, Hinata. It's just...a long, crazy story."

I see, of course! She was agreeable, as always, Naruto, I'm going to have to repot many of the indoor plants you have. Sakura-chan said she would go to the apartment with me to help! Wait until you see it! It looks very nice.
"What looks very nice?" Naruto yawned and made himself comfortable, laying back and stretching his legs out.

Your apartment. Gaara-kun paid for renovations.

"Renovations?" Naruto was cross-eyed at the news, "Like, cheap ones? Or good work-?"

Quality work! The wall that divided the living area and kitchen was knocked down. And the floors and wall paint are new…everything is so pretty!

"Good grief, that guy doesn't tell me about anything! What if I had color or design preferences?" Naruto complained. He was unaware that was exactly the reason Gaara had never asked for his input.

I think you'll like it. She ventured.

"I probably will." He half-thinkingly scratched an itch on his stomach, adding, "Thank you, Hinata, for taking care of all that. I owe you some gardening assistance when I get back."

He got no answer and realized he was looking down at his hand, or more specifically, Hinata had taken over to have a look. An itch seemed like a mundane thing to pay attention to, but Naruto considered the logistics of a visitor sharing in his experiences.

"Did that feel itchy to you? Like…you noticed it when I did?"

I think so…

"So maybe you…feel everything just as I'm feeling it?" Naruto was kind of embarrassed by the prospect. Passing gas and other such nuisances were out of the question. He would have to politely ask Hinata to cease the jutsu before something like that took place.

I think that's how it works. It's as if…I am in my own body, almost. It's still very different, but many things work just the same.

"Right..."

Also, you need to eat.

"Yeah, I'm kind of hungry!" He laughed, amused that she had acknowledged it.

You… Hinata trailed off and was silent.

Naruto was not especially concerned when his itch-scratching hand took a trip upwards, but he pursed his mouth and swallowed hard when Hinata replaced it on his neck. She was feeling around through his senses. If he truly thought it was too weird he would have objected, but not another soul was around and Naruto, for his age and inclination, was feeling indulgent.

Hinata rubbed Naruto's hand beneath his chin, detecting stubble. He was not at all like he had been when she'd last seen him. His hair fell in long spikes past his ears, overgrown even after he claimed it had been cut two weeks ago. When he spoke his voice was deeper, rarely cracked, yet it had the same upbeat and merry tone she knew well. Walking around the valley in his body from a first-person perspective revealed Naruto's new height and muscles coiled with strength. What a shame that he was away from home, endeavoring to learn Sage Arts when she would have liked to witness such changes with her own eyes and fingertips.
"I know. I don't want to be here. It'd be stupid to just give up this training when I've come so far… but I think about it all the time." Naruto admitted, "Hinata… I want to spend every day with you. In person. Don't get me wrong, I like that you can use this jutsu and talk to me…it beats the heck out of waiting for letters. And I like those too, you know? I…I just want to…"

His breath hitched when she directed his hand southward, over the slick shirtless skin of his chest. The input was not more than he could bear; little different from the feeling of touch while he dressed himself or inspected a suspicious freckle. But Hinata's roaming was bold— over the navel, then his hip bone, stopping at his waistband. She did not touch anything more after that. She seemed to hover in his consciousness on standby, fluttering like a hummingbird and considering him.

Hinata pointed out simply, I've never done that.

"No, I don't think you… we never…" Naruto caught his breath, still keened back in the marble hollow, "But… uh…" He cleared his throat, "You wanted to?"

I want to touch you. If I can't do it at home, I'll touch you however I can. I've missed you! I wanted to know— She was belatedly embarrassed by her actions, A-Ahh, I'm sorry, Naruto. I'd thought I was rude and forward in my letters to you even if I was truthful… but I shouldn't take advantage like this. Not in a physical way…

"What? No, none of that ever bothered me! Keep writing honestly about your feelings," Naruto encouraged, "And this doesn't… bother me either."

It doesn't?

He gulped. Her voice was so clear in his head. Naruto could still picture her perfectly in his mind’s eye, when he had seen her likeness that day at the Tournament. How could he be so lucky? To love someone beautiful and good? Someone who never failed to reach him?

Then, remembering her appearance that day was a slippery slope: her attire, her hair, her eyes and lips, her hands poised as she stood to fight— these were not conducive things to think about. As a red-blooded male, reacting to this particular line of thought was inevitable. Naruto shifted and grimaced, making a pained sound in his throat while wondering if maybe, maybe, she wouldn't notice.

Surely Hinata wouldn't perceive his pounding pulse or hypersensitive nerves. Even though she was not doing anything currently, even when Naruto knew better than to combine the vision of her with that stray touch down his stomach… he was fit to snap. He thought it idiotic on his part, after he had established that if she could feel an itch… she could definitely feel arousal too. Not that she would recognize or understand it, at first.

Are you alright, Naruto?

He was splayed backwards, pointedly not looking at himself for fear of giving away the boner.

"Yeah, just… you know…" His voice cracked terribly, "I feel fine. I wonder if you don't have anywhere to be today?"

Father cancelled training with me this afternoon. I might garden or go somewhere with Hanabi.

"Yeah, yeah, not a bad idea."
Naruto. She was noticing nerve endings that she had no exact equivalent for.

"Maybe we should call it a day and I'll... get back to training. I can beat the heat in here and try meditating—"

You feel good.

Naruto struggled to reply to the flat observation, "Uh... so..."

Hinata made no comments. She merely listened and perceived the intense feeling.

"Pretty much a day in the life of a man... is to be annoyed by this every couple of hours..." Naruto hoped she could make the effort to understand such a plight, "I'm not trying to be weird, or to take advantage somehow, like you said! Please know that, Hinata! This is! It's just stupid, involuntary stuff that had better not happen when you use your jutsu and I still messed that up—!"

Hinata made a hushing sound. She wanted him to stop talking. Very puzzled, Naruto shut his eyes and mouth, in denial that she had totally caught him and he had no idea what to do about it.

His breathing was uneven. Hinata helped steady the rise and fall of his chest. After a moment she told him, I... know that this is normal.

With his eyes shut, Naruto griped, "I'm still mad at myself."

It wasn't on purpose. I know that... Hinata's voice straddled the fine line between swooning shyness and delivering consolation, Did... um... did I have anything to do with it?

"No. Yes. Don't ask me that. Let's maintain the façade of innocence at least until I get home..." He whimpered and apologized again, "Sorry. I won't look. I don't want you to look. I'm such a-

Bliss. It was only half a second of too exquisite a feeling before Naruto lurched back, reeling. He was not sure if it had been an inadvertent touch while reordering his limbs, an unconscious, willful act on his part, or if Hinata had experimentally felt around for the source of sensitivity with his own hand. In any case, Naruto thrashed his arm and yelped, his eyes snapping open. He bumped the back of his head on stone.

Naruto, I'm sorry-! Is your head alright? I didn't... mean to...

Naruto didn't really buy it, or rather, didn't want to believe she didn't mean it. It was hard to feel ashamed when no other soul was around to decry the nature of their encounter or his physical state. After all, human beings apologized enough for their bodies and things beyond their control— it didn't seem apropos to apologize to a bodily intruder... however welcome she was.

Naruto rolled to his knees and rubbed the back of his head until the sting subsided. "Don't be sorry," He had mellowed and allowed himself to pine a little, "I don't want to be sorry. Maybe you'll still love me if I admit it. That I think of you and get like this. That I'm a dog. You make me feel this way... I want you to touch me."

There was something high-pitched about her silence in his head. Hinata supposed that maybe she had overstepped bounds and was also not going to face any consequences for it.

She could feel heat in his cheeks as he flushed. He was making a serious face and staring out into the cavern.

I don't know why you ever thought... Hinata took a moment to compose herself, That I'd dislike it...
"When you hang out with Ero-sennin you don't see a lot of green light signals."

Her voice dropped and seemed sharper, Here, if you want. I will! I already thought about it, Naruto-kun. I'm worse than you. Let me, if that's what you're wishing for. Or I'll stay as you—

"No, no, no, this is just a bit too far beyond the natural order of things…and I know better. Just because I want you to do something doesn't mean you should!" Naruto informed her, "In person in our own bodies, well that's different…but I don't think this should be a spectator sport…ahh, I don't know."

Hinata was perplexed, Oh.

"We're both bad." Naruto mused, "Distance will do that. Bad influences too, I guess."

Is it really so bad? If we feel the same way?

"This isn't what your ability is for. And I shouldn't be an idle chump while trying to justify why I'm not home with you right now." Naruto reasoned, "How about I calm down and we can overlay again later? This is something we should totally discuss in more detail once I master Senjutsu. I swear…I will come running after that. Straight back to you. Like, brace yourself."

Hinata laughed in his head.

"Is that okay?"

Yes. All of it is. I learned something new, really. And…I miss you very much.

"I know. I miss you."

I should be going then. She sounded playful, When I'm gone…will you still think of me, Naruto?

"Silly question!" He was grinning, "You're my favorite daydream."

Rather abruptly, Naruto felt the severance of the overlap. Though he could feel the twinge of happiness and satisfaction Hinata's consciousness had left behind, she had given him his space. He crumpled backwards against a marble wall and exhaled shakily.

Though it was only natural for him to become closer to her, Naruto understood he had to capitalize on his time among sages. Even if he spent hours fooling around and chatting with Hinata through the conduit of her jutsu, Naruto realized it was still a subtraction of time he could spend face to face with her in Konoha.

"I have to get back to work. Either I'm a Sage by next week…or I really am a useless, salivating dog." Naruto tried to self-start but then looked to his left and right. The convenience of being alone was becoming a rarity.

And he'd only need a few minutes.

A short while after that, Naruto was still shirtless and had reported to the Toad Oil pool to be supervised by Fukasaku for training.

The old toad raised a fluffy eyebrow at him, "You've been up to something, Naruto-boy…"

"What? Me?" Playing it off was tricky because Naruto was sure he'd made a weird face.
Fukasaku frowned at him, "Yes, you. If we had begun training earlier this morning we could have avoided this heat. Where have you been?"

"Avoiding the heat." He replied conveniently.

"And now you must meditate in it anyway."

"Yup." Naruto sat cross-legged at the top of the steps beside the pool, "Sorry, Pa. I should've brought you some ice or something while you wait."

"Ma will bring me some frozen grasshoppers in a while. Our favorite treat on days like these…"

Fukasaku settled down on a grassy patch and got comfortable, "Concentrate now, boy. I know you nearly have it."

He shut his eyes and cupped his palms in his lap. For some reason, the heat made relaxing a bit easier. Or, maybe it was the last traces of serotonin in his bloodstream that had calmed him.

Naruto exhaled and then entered his routine. He became conscious of his body starting from the toes and up, incrementally, acknowledging and then separating himself from physical feelings. With each increment, he felt more of what was outside. The rustle of arenga palms that sheltered toad statues, the energy and heartbeat of Fukasaku nearby, particles of pollen floating in air, the breeze in time with his breathing…

The heat was little bother, it turned out. Naruto lost track of time. His awareness expanded farther out, reaching new limits in the valley. He noticed rock spires in a field. He noticed a polished stone amphitheater beyond the residences of the valley's largest toads. He noticed the exchange of food from a mother bird's crop into the waiting mouth of her chick in a nest in a poplar tree. He was the mother bird. He was the chick. He was the tree. All energy felt as if it were one continuous, shining current.

Naruto let the current in, slowly, absorbing each bit thoughtfully. Life was a curious thing. It was so temporary, vast, and vibrant. Everything would die and start anew. Energy that had always been in the world and always would be.

He felt a trickle-down effect from non-living things. It was a deeper, stranger feeling. Microscopic amounts of water in every cell in the things around him— the rays of the sun warming him. Like she did. 'Hinata.' She was life too. She was a part of the current. He wanted to feel her the way he could feel everything else so vivid and alive.

And when he stretched and searched for that energy that he knew was so distinctly hers, Naruto felt himself get stuck. Beautifully stuck. It felt so good and simple. He was a blade of grass. He was in the flow of Natural Energy and maybe this, he wondered briefly, was the answer to everything. He was stuck. He was brimming. It felt like there was so much to know and un-know. Then, Naruto thought nothing more.

Fukasaku, by chance, glanced up from his Sudoku booklet and stared hard at Naruto. For a moment, he could hardly believe his bulging eyes. The boy was mostly stone. He was petrifying in the likeness of a toad while being over-saturated with Natural Energy.

Horrified, Fukasaku sprang and beamed his cane over the top of the young man's head. It made a harrowing crack sound and splintered the walking stick. Fukasaku gasped in a panic.

"Naruto-boy!"

With great strength, he lifted the near-statue of his pupil and laid him flat in the grass. Fukasaku exhaled a volume of water from his mouth in an attempt to rinse toad oil from Naruto's body. That did little good. No amount of smacking or rinsing had any effect on the creeping stone exterior. The Toad Sage lifted again and, with the petrified boy on his shoulder, made haste back towards his house.

"Oh Great Elder Gamamaru! All the deities and hosts of nature! Oh one, Great Spirit that moves us all— Minato and his dear wife if you can hear me—!" Fukasaku cried as he rushed, "Please-! Please help me! Anyone or anything! Don’t let this boy be lost to time like so many!"

He tripped and took a spill in his yard, dumping the petrified Naruto to the ground with a bump.

Fukasaku screeched for assistance. Jiraiya and Shima hurried out of the house.

"I rinsed and I whacked but I fear he's too far gone-!" Fukasaku announced as his wife and human companion kneeled over Naruto, "Shima, your apron—"

"Nothing a sponge-tag can't save!" The old female toad insisted. She reached into her pockets and handed off paper tags to Fukasaku, quickly patting them all over Naruto.

Jiraiya rested his hand on Naruto's forehead, "Kid…? Aw, shit…kid…" His adam's apple bobbed as he swallowed, fearing the worst.

"I don't know if our sealing tags can absorb a significant amount of natural energy…so late." Shima admitted. She and Fukasaku sat forlornly beside Jiraiya, tearing up, "They need to be applied right away to work."

"…I know." Jiraiya gulped. He ground the heel of his hand into his eye to resist crying.

They could only sit there on the lawn on a hot summer day, helpless, as other toads of the valley scampered out of brush to investigate the commotion. Newcomers stilled and folded their webbed hands to pay respect to the lost student of Senjutsu.

A full minute passed and the veteran Toad Sages had time enough to process what had happened.

"It was a risk." Fukasaku acknowledged sadly, "We always understood that."

"He must've gone quickly, if you had no time to stop him." Shima observed, "Pa…do we…should we speak to the Great Elder? Is there no way we can-?"

"There is no way to undo this." Fukasaku stated with finality.

Jiraiya lifted his face from his hands, tearful, "I'm t-to…to bla—"

"You are not at fault for this, Jiraiya-boy." Shima chided him.

"I never should have brought him here. He was too important. I was supposed to look after him…"
With a running nose the man added, "And I just sent him back early to Minato…worthless fuck that I am!"

"He is in the World's arms now." Fukasaku folded his hands and bowed his head, "At peace."

Shoulders rumbling, Jiraiya bent over to give the boy an affectionate, heartbroken pat, and pulled up the sealing tags his masters had hastily attached to Naruto. Then he stilled. Jiraiya quirked his mouth and poked Naruto's stomach with two fingers. Fukasaku and Shima gave him questioning looks.

"Er…correct me if I'm wrong, but…Toad Statues are a full body transformation, right?" Jiraiya asked. His toad companions made shrugging motions with their faces. Jiraiya prodded a graying but oddly not-crusty patch on Naruto's stomach again. The seal of the Nine-Tailed Fox glowed faintly.

Jiraiya frowned at the sight, "Honestly… I don't know what the logistics are of a jinchuriki turning into a Toad Statue."

"Let's agree that this is unusual no matter what those hypothetical results should be." Fukasaku wagered, "Perhaps the tailed beast… does not want to turn to stone?"

"There isn't very much he can do about it, is there?" Shima snipped, still upset. She leaned over and spoke to Naruto's stomach. "Well, you spiteful creature! Not willing to surrender to eternal peace, is that it? Then help the boy! Mix the natural energy with your own, you brute— you have plenty of it!"

The three balked when the suggestion was acted on. The stone coating receded slowly from the seal's epicenter, shrinking on Naruto's skin, back and back until he was pinkish and normal again. He was still very much unconscious, however. Fukasaku and Shima let out a whoop of relief.

Jiraiya rubbed his face vigorously on his tunic, in shock, "Hold on a second, Ma and Pa… this doesn't mean Naruto is still knocking around in there. When we meditate with Natural Energy, it feels like we can get lost in the flow, right? I don't know if the fox can fix that."

"I doubt that he can." Fukasaku agreed, "But have a little faith, Jiraiya-boy. I said my prayers over him and maybe we need to say a few more…"

The man let out a shaky sigh and bent down again, preparing to scoop Naruto up, "I'll bring him inside to rest. I hope we get him back."

A hand curled in Jiraiya's shirt. He looked down in surprise.

Two red eyes looked back.

"…hot shit on a shovel..." Jiraiya murmured. He gently set Naruto down and backed away carefully. Fukasaku and Shima were equally alarmed.

The young man slowly sat up and then examined himself disapprovingly, as if he expected to be bigger. It did not require a wild guess from anyone watching, or anyone feeling the chakra of the new presence, to know that Naruto was not Naruto. Kurama, the Nine-Tailed Fox had climbed up from subconscious thought and was in control. Kurama opened Naruto's mouth and let out an impressive, rolling belch that carried a wind with it. Natural Energy seemed to be expelled through the bodily function.

Grimacing, the jinchuriki glanced around through slitted eyes, taking stock of its surroundings.

"Here I am in the great cornucopia of fruit, toads, and pungent heat…" Kurama sniffed, crossing his arms, "And I can't even unlock my own body while that sage-wannabe-boy isn't here."

Jiraiya and Fukasaku exchanged nervous glances. Shima was bolder, "Nine-Tailed Fox!"

Kurama gave her his attention.

"Where is Naruto-boy? Is he safe and well? Return him to us." She demanded.

"I don't know where he is you purple-lipped prune." He growled, "I don't feel him. If I did, perhaps I could take a more comfortable shape and throw him into my bars for a change." Kurama braced his human hands on the ground in an effort to stand, "So who is the spiteful one you were talking to before? Surely not me. I paid attention at Senjutsu lessons and learned enough to preserve myself in case Naruto pulled this sort of stunt…" When he started to rise he fell over on wobbly legs.

Some muffled laughter came from watching toads that had gathered closer.

Snarling angrily, Kurama weakly tried to lift himself up from the lawn, "Ugh! This pathetic form! This place weighs on me—!"

"This is Mount Myoboku. It takes some getting used to." Jiraiya felt comfortable enough to approach. "So, long time no see. Last time we met you were shoving claws in my chest cavity."

"And I will again, you white sagging ballsack." He flopped over again.

"Whoa there, those are fighting words." Jiraiya chuckled, "And you can't take me right now, Fox."

"I'll take you and your prune-head masters and the whole lot of tadpoles behind you!" Kurama roared, spittle flying from Naruto's mouth as he gestured at the crowd of tittering toads.

"You are terribly outmatched and outnumbered today, Nine-Tailed Fox." Fukasaku warned him, "But let us take this moment to thank you for saving Naruto-boy."

"I saved myself."

"Based on your admission...one might say you are now a disciple of the Toads as well. You could endeavor to be a Sage, if you so wished." Fukasaku offered innocuously.

"I so wish to gnaw your face off, pruneballs."

Shima laughed at the comeback.

"What's so funny?" Kurama managed to stand on shaking legs.

"Nothing. You have creative insults and you're like a tottering fawn. You are not the scary beast I've heard stories about." Shima waved it off.

"Oh, but I am." He assured her. Kurama noticed there was saliva all over Naruto's face, and ran the back of his arm over it to clear it away in annoyance. It felt uncomfortable. He took a few steps to gain balance but appeared to be quite tired.

Jiraiya crouched down and motioned for Fukasaku and Shima to huddle in.

"Okay." Jiraiya whispered to them, "While you keep him busy by teasing him, I'm gonna stop in the house to get a sealing tag to put the Fox under. I don't have one on me at the moment."

"Of course, but even then...if Naruto does not resist the flow of Nature, the Fox could resurface first again. Or indefinitely." Fukasaku observed.

"How dreadful! What would we tell the Hokage?" Shima wondered.

"We ain't telling Tsunade shit about this." Jiraiya hissed, "We can get it under control. We can get Naruto back. We just need to make sure the Fox doesn't mess around out here—"

About then, cries of alarm erupted from the gathering of toads. Many of them scattered into the brush and residences as Kurama drew on an alarming amount of Tailed Beast chakra, glowing with a red aura.
"If you plan to say such things, Jiraiya-boy, knock on wood as you do so." Shima sighed.

Kurama had conjured up two tails of chakra, laughing, "Ha! Run you cowardly lumps! I'll squash you. I'll sink my teeth into you! I'll—!" He made a powerful leap and crashed face-first into a giant, granite cauldron of stored toad oil.

"He's as coordinated as I am when I'm piss drunk." Jiraiya observed, "Hold him off for now, Ma and Pa. Don't let him bust up Naruto's face too much. I'll be right back." He set off for the house.

Fukasaku and Shima waited for Naruto to slide down from the giant cauldron before the bounced forward, hoping to grapple the Tailed-Beast into submission— but were thwacked away by a chakra tail for their trouble. Kurama rolled and skidded in the grass but picked up speed, charging for them, "Don't expect to stop me-!" With Shima's assistance, Fukasaku clotheslined the incoming jinchuriki with a tongue and flung him flat in the grass.

"If we fight you in earnest we may hurt Naruto-boy," Shima explained, "And if we hurt Naruto-boy, or if he dies, your life is forfeit as well, Nine-Tailed Fox." She hopped away before a chakra tail came smashing down over her.

"Don't lecture me you raspberry imps!" Kurama spat, standing again, "You can't hurt anything if you're dead." He went still and focused, hands balanced at Naruto's sides and mouth ajar as particles of energy were gathered.

The coagulation of light and dark particle chakra frightened the Toad Sages, who were not at all pleased that Kurama was aiming for their house. They gathered Sage chakra in about the time Kurama accumulated a rather modest Tailed Beast Ball of energy, and rushed with sliding tackles to send Kurama akimbo. The jinchuriki fell but loosed the freakish chakra attack, and the ball soared far before tapping a lush mountainside at the valley's edge. In a blast of light it exploded, leveling the once majestic slopes on the horizon.

Fukasaku was furious, "How many lives did you extinguish with such a thoughtless act, Fox?"

"Some toads and bugs, no doubt." Naruto was bent double in pain when Fukasaku tore into him with Frog Kumite punches. To salvage the situation, Shima gave the jinchuriki a mighty spin with her tongue before landing on him with a comet-kick, grinding him into dirt.

A lull passed in which Naruto heaved himself to his feet, sputtering, eyes shiftily watching Fukasaku and Shima on either side of him.

"I'll blow this place to hell. Don't tempt me!" The Fox threatened, "Father used to say this was a sacred place, but it's just a ramshackle storage cupboard for your sake and oil! I wouldn't be caught dead training here!"

Shima was stymied by the remark, not sure what 'Father' the Nine-Tailed Fox was referring to. She noticed Fukasaku's cue to attack, and she moved in time with her toad husband to jellify Naruto with a Frog Call Sage Art. Whether it was skill or by accident none could be sure, but Kurama fell over again a sixteenth of a second before the sound waves could grace his ears. As he rolled down the hill, Fukasaku and Shima had paralyzed each other with their jutsu.

When Jiraiya returned with his sealing tag, he discovered Fukasaku and Shima feet-up in the grass… and Naruto was rolling away down a mushroom slope.

"I think a mountain blew up." Jiraiya noted, shielding his eyes to squint over the distance, "Did he do that?"
"Yes." Shima squeaked.

"You guys okay? This wasn't his doing. I'll flatten him out." Jiraiya offered.

"Th-the…" Fukasaku spoke up, "Theater."

"The theater?" Jiraiya gave him a puzzled look.

"Going to…the theater."

"Ah, that's right. The outdoor theater." Jiraiya nodded, "Yep. Looks like he's headed that way. I don't suppose…that kid of yours is still working on it, is he?"

Shima was loosening up slightly, "He'll never finish building it."

"He'll definitely never finish it if the Fox wrecks it." Jiraiya observed, "What do you say…we let the Nine-Tails be his problem for now?"

The jinchuriki stumbled over laid bricks and cut stone, down a few steps in a wide amphitheater almost as large as a sports stadium. The Fox glanced around, hatching a plan to escape. It seemed as if the Toad Sages and Pervert had stopped pursuing him, and if he picked any direction to hurry in, Kurama supposed he could escape the valley and its saturation of Natural Energy.

One clumsy step made him trip and crash into a wall, knocking down a series of carved sconces and cracking them apart on the brick floor. Kurama would have thought nothing of it had he not immediately felt an irritated poke on Naruto's left calf. He looked down between his legs to see a small green toad in a colorful brocade jacket. The toad blinked up at him, with purple markings under its eyes.

"You payin' for that?" It asked.

"No." Kurama tried to kick the toad but stumbled over again.

"You break it, you buy it, buddy." The toad rifled around his jacket pocket and drew out a small moleskin notebook, "What's your name, eh? That Naruto kid. I've heard about you. I'm marking you down for 500,000 Ryo. An extra 90,000 for trying to kick me."

"I am the Nine-Tailed Fox, Kurama." He bent down and clacked his teeth at the toad, "Not Naruto. Naruto is gone. I don't owe you anything, not even your miserable life."

"The name's Kinji." He shook Naruto's uncooperative hand and ducked Kurama's swipe, "I'm the proprietor of this here theater of the arts. Kurama or whoever you are, you owe me 590,000 Ryo for repairs, or you can put in the labor to replace the light installations you broke…then we'll call it square."

"Nothing here is square— this place is round!" Kurama balled Naruto's hands into a hammer and swung down, gouging a huge crater in the circle seating.

Kinji sucked in a long, astounded breath of disbelief.

"You did not." The toad said.

"Will I owe you money when I crack your toady head?" Kurama laughed maniacally, amused with himself.
"I built this place myself. Brick by brick. I stage the productions. I hire the talent. I keep the books. I direct the masterpieces—!" Kinji's voice trilled in anger, "And I punish the nimrods that defile my greatest work. Me. All me! Pay up or I'll liquefy your blondie whisker-face, got that, chump?"

Kurama was still laughing and wiping tears from the corners of Naruto's eyes. "Oh, I've crossed the wrong toad! Hee-hee! Ho, ho, ho-! One little toad is going to punish—" Kinji's incredible mach punch hit Naruto's chin dead center and rocketed him to the far side of the theater, in and out of another stone wall.

Laying on his back, Kurama stared up at the sky and finished speaking, "Me…"

It took some time to claw and clamber out of the rubble, and the jinchuriki ascended unspoiled brick steps nearby to spot Kinji stock still where he had first poked Naruto's leg. Suddenly, the toad's eyes snapped open. He had finished molding Sage Chakra.

Kurama had a moment to consider this bizarre reality. That Naruto was not present to complain and groan at him. That he lacked sea legs in this environment, in this puny body, though movement was getting easier. That the jabber mouth toad whose theater he had smashed was also a Sage, and was demanding hefty remuneration. He threw quite the punch without Sage Chakra.

"I'll let you apologize now…" Kinji warned darkly, "Or you're toast, Whiskers."

"Bite me." Kurama was grinning.

And the two idiots raced at each other, Kurama glowing red with four glorious tails, laying waste to their surroundings as Kinji was extremely precise with Frog Kumite, striking Naruto's chin, ankles, and stomach dozens of times in two seconds. It was effective. Kurama wretched and moaned in between slashing at Kinji, trying to stomp him as he was slippery quick and avoiding the jinchuriki's assaults.

"Cheapskate Nosehook!" Kinji hollered, fitting two fingers in Naruto's nostrils, and flipped, hurling Kurama like a trick yo-yo down onto the theater's stone floor.

Dust settled and cleared around the new crater. In an agonized squat, Kurama clapped Naruto's hands over his bloody nose, "You motherfucker-!"

Kinji struck him again with mach punches, front and back, one into another…and Kurama coiled a chakra tail around him to finally catch the painful little beast. Naruto's propensity for healing had already fixed his nose.

"Pay up, chump!" Kinji demanded as he was squeezed with searing chakra.

"Doesn't that hurt? Why aren't you screaming please let me go?" Kurama sniffed, "I'd kill you now if I didn't want to humiliate you further."

"I'd have killed you by now if you didn't look like an old friend of mine!" Kinji insisted. Then, he lashed out with his tongue, reeled Naruto's face in close, and chomped as hard as a toad could chomp on a face.

Kurama wailed in anger and tossed the toad with a tail flick. Kinji nimbly landed in a fighting pose, his jacket unbuttoned and fluttering heroically.

"You said bite me." Kinji reminded him.

"More like you tried to gum me—" Kurama bared sharp teeth, drawing on more chakra, transforming his chakra cloak into a dark, hazy fox shape, "I'll show you how to bite!"

Naruto was a miracle of speed under Kurama's direction, but Kinji could predict his movements. He dodged and hopped, feeling the trembles of energy in the air, batting aside Fox-punches and weaving between furling Fox-chakra tails. Corrosive chakra was sizzling Kinji's skin off in flakes, but he fought confidently and without flinching. When an opening presented itself, Kinji flipped upside-down and mule kicked Naruto upwards, dashing away for distance. Kurama corrected the fall with chakra tails and landed lightly.

The Fox puzzled at the sight of Kinji creating a spiraling sphere of energy in his small toad hand… and then up-chucked all over it. A sloppy, splattering mess that swirled and was tossed straight down at Naruto, "Oil Rasengan!"

Kurama had time enough to wrap himself up in tails to defend against the Rasengan's impact and the toad oil mess, but not enough time to skirt away from the follow-up. Kinji exhaled a jet of flame that lit up the oil-coated theater. When Kurama made a break for it, he slipped and slid into the bonfire and exited, looking like a burning stuntman with fox tails lit like birthday candles.

"Let me make my wish, Whiskers!" Kinji cupped his hand and called after him.

He avoided the tails that vengefully swung and thwacked at him. Still mostly on fire and aware that it could eventually expire Naruto, Kurama had about enough. He tipped Naruto's head back and prepared the collection of light and dark energy again. Kinji was not unaware of what this precursor gathering of chakra would lead to. He zipped and dashed with Sage speed up behind Naruto with a bound, wrapped his toad legs around Naruto's neck, and pulled down like a wrestler while completing hand signs, "Senpo: Wrestlemania Shadow Banishing Goober!"

Privately, Kurama wondered if it was a real technique name or had been improvised on the spot. He took a loogie to the eyes and mouth, disgusted, and witnessed the wisping gust of Kinji's jutsu flutter away collected dark particles like harmless butterflies. It left an overabundance of light particles, however. Kinji had shut his eyes to avoid the light flash and bang. They fell apart on oil-free stone steps, the Tailed Beast Ball a failure, and Kurama wiped at Naruto's face blindly before another mach punch knocked his legs out from under him. By the way, he was still on fire.

"Holy high-flying fuck, Kinji! Put him out!" Jiraiya's voice screamed from the distant box office of the theater.

"I can't, he keeps rolling in the oil and fire!"

Dizzy, Kurama pushed himself up to Naruto's hands and knees. Nothing could be worth this trouble. Not even liberation. With his eyes still shut, he felt a series of jutsu be combined to cut oxygen from the fire, extinguishing it, and some flame-retardant foam washed over him in a gloopy puff.

He heard Kinji call, "Never mind, he's good."

Jiraiya was sighing in the distance.

"Fucker owes me big money for this, though."

"Fine, whatever. Just hold him still for me so I can get this tag on…"

Kurama's eyes snapped open. No. Liberation was worth it. He could run away. He could tamper and contort Naruto's seal. There was a way out if he could just get away from these godforsaken nuisances!
Recklessly, Kurama charged straight for Jiraiya, chakra cloak wilted and claws extended. He saw the man's wide, astonished eyes, felt him gasp as Naruto's tackle toppled him over onto a brick walkway. Kurama raised a hand triumphantly to julienne Jiraiya like peppers for dinner…but felt a slimy, chilling tongue run up his back from bottom to top. It neutralized the last of his chakra.

Jiraiya regarded the Great Toad Elder Gamamaru who was seated sleepily behind Naruto. He gave the boy a good lick and let Naruto flop over bonelessly, no longer influenced by the Nine-Tailed Fox.

"They just needed a nap," Gamamaru batted his old lips, "Me too."

"Great Toad Elder!" Contritely, Kinji dropped and prostrated before the elder, "Forgive me! I could have stopped him! I had no intention of troubling you. Did the rumbles in the valley wake you?"

"Yes, thought little 'Bunta ripped a big fart next to me." Gamamaru admitted, "I worried a little when I woke up…saw our western mountainside is flattened now. That's where we used to keep the old outhouses."

"No one lives out there, Great Elder?" Jiraiya wanted to confirm.

"Not that I know of. Stunk like doo-doo out there. Should be fine." Gamamaru yawned, "I'll be off for my afternoon nap now."

Jiraiya had hoisted Naruto (badly crisped and bruised) over his shoulder, "Thank you, Great Elder. Will Naruto awaken soon?"

"Sure he will. He's just visiting Nature. And when nature calls, he'll wake up to use the bathroom." Gamamaru assured him, "Kurama won't bother you again. He just feels neglected sometimes. Misses his Papa and the good old days…” The toad elder slowly waddled off, with a few small toad escorts waiting on the stairs for him.

Jiraiya gave Kinji a confused look. Kinji shrugged and buttoned up his jacket again.

"Sorry about the theater, Kinji. My student had a mishap today. Nearly turned into a Toad Statue during Sage Training." Jiraiya explained, climbing the steps beside the small Sage, "When we averted that crisis, Kurama took over Naruto's body."

"Ah, so his name is Naruto." Kinji nodded, "Well then, he's off the hook for repairs until he's better. I'll need help rebuilding."

"Why not ask Ma and Pa-?"

"No." Kinji said flatly.

Jiraiya scoffed at him, "You know your mother and father would help you if you just asked them."

"I don't want Ma and Pa's help." Kinji insisted, "They'll critique everything I do and get in my way. I didn't need their help with Sage Training. I didn't need their help with my theater…"

"Kinji…” Jiraiya sighed, descended steps out of the theater and onto grassy path again, "They miss you."

"Yeah, sure. They miss bitching at me."

"No, they miss you. When you could just be in each other's company without the hostility." Jiraiya corrected him, "Just talk to them, sometime. Children need to remember how precious their parents are."

"Hmph." Kinji turned his nose up at the suggestion.

"Kinji." Jiraiya added, "This is Minato's child. Do you know how badly Naruto has wanted to meet his parents all of his life? How much pain it caused him to be without his father?"

Kinji halted and fell silent, settling his eyes on Naruto.

"Try to understand how it would feel…to lose those who treasure you most…even if they annoy the ever-loving shit out of you." Jiraiya gave him a lopsided smile, "You knew Minato better than any toad in this valley. Better than Gamabunta knew him! It'd be easy for you to know what's in Naruto's heart."

"I…" Kinji pinched his lips shut and rubbed at his eyes, "I do know. I miss my friend. I blame myself for not being there…when Minato's village was under attack."

Jiraiya kept walking, "He knew he couldn't disrupt your training. He thought very highly of you. Shared many things with you…"

Kinji hopped on beside him, "Yes, well…" He cleared his throat, "I can stop by the house, I guess. To help clean Naruto up. I did this to him and I do feel quite bad…"

"He'll be alright. He's had a rough day."

"Are Ma and Pa around?"

"Resting. They kinda…Frog Called each other earlier."

"On purpose?" Kinji was bewildered.

"No, 'course not. They were trying to subdue the Fox."

"Ah." Kinji nodded, "Well good. I'm not ready to talk to them yet."

"Still?" Jiraiya pressed, "What are you waiting for? A gilded invitation? They keep asking to see you and even watch your shows from the back row…because you don't let them get better tickets."

"No, they don't buy early enough for prime seating."

"Kid, you could hold the seats for them. They're your goddamned parents."

Kinji groaned.

"They're like my mom and dad too, most days. I know their quirks. I know they like to tease me without end. But you know what? They're great. I love 'em. As much as I loved my own mom before I lost her." Jiraiya nudged him with a foot, "Don't you see how lucky you are that they're here for you?"

"I do. I get it, okay? But they'll ask me why I can't keep a good girl toad around, like always."

"I get the same shit too. But they know why women don't stick with me. With you, they worry what's the matter with their straight-laced kid."

"I work too much, or I demand too much…I don't know…" Kinji grumbled, "I guess it bothers me most when Ma and Pa know what's wrong with me and I don't."

Jiraiya recommended, "You need to get comfortable with criticism. You are way too defensive, Kinji."

"And you are way too perverted, Jiraiya."

"It's my best quality, I swear."

Outside of the house, Kinji took a steadying breath and then hopped onto the porch. He opened the door for Jiraiya to allow him to pass through with Naruto. Kinji followed after, and no sooner had he shut the door behind him, he heard a cry in unison, "Kinji-boy!"

He muttered in annoyance.

Fukasaku and Shima had propped themselves up on a pile of cushions in the sitting room. They were still a bit stiff from their earlier scuffle.

"Hi Ma…Hi Pa…"

"Son, it's been so long! Did you help Jiraiya-boy stop the Nine-Tails?" Fukasaku was delighted. His foot appeared to be stuck in a Charley-horse.

"Yeah…sort of…the Great Elder woke up to give him a lick. I kept him busy." Kinji noted tepidly, "I won't be staying for dinner. Got a lot of clean up and repairs to do…"

"That's fine, dear. Fetch a basin of water for Jiraiya-boy to help him wash Naruto, please." Shima asked, "And if you do get hungry, tell me."

"Yeah, Ma…" He moved around to collect a basin and cloth.

When Kinji entered Naruto's bedroom and set the items down beside Jiraiya, he observed, "You set me up, didn't cha?"

"Nope. I have no clue how they hauled themselves into the sitting room, okay? They can hardly move. I guess they were excited that maybe you'd show up!" Jiraiya was smiling a little.

"You moved them."

"Na-aaw, not me-!"

Kinji flicked his ear in annoyance, "You're laying bricks with me tonight, ya bum."

& “Eternal Youth” by RUDE

It was the weirdest thing.

He could almost, no, he could feel the split of the cleavage furrow in a microscopic animal cell. It was routine mitosis, a process greatly overlooked by large organisms that cannot witness miracles so small with the naked eye. Pop. The parent cell split. Over and over. ‘Whatever animal this is, it’s getting bigger.’ Naruto noticed. He still could not figure out on the macro-level where he was currently in the flow.

As far as consciousness went, Naruto was a bit more aware that he was stuck somewhere in Nature. Thankfully, everything was wildly interesting and distracting. Whether it was cheering on an orchid unfurling its petals over the course of several hours, or the worker ant that Naruto had joined on its 5-kilometer march in a single day… He was happily, obliviously occupied for 48 hours.

Naruto had even dreamed in the wilds. He dreamt of something that had happened once, long ago. A young man with dusty, beige hair was seated in meditation on top of a slab of slate, balanced on the point of a stone spire. It was a place in the Toad Valley, Naruto vaguely knew. The trainee seemed to be a student collecting Natural Energy. He did not move a muscle and kept perfect balance.

Naruto admired such resolve and decided to chill with the supposed Senjutsu alumnus for a while. He kind of got the hang of it— relaxing and harmonizing with Nature from the stranger’s perspective, and also from his own position above a spire.

The breeze felt marvelous. The serene quiet of the rocky field was great for meditation. Naruto was not sure how long he was there before he felt balance and then a great liveliness, ‘Hm. Did I-?’ He had a feeling he had achieved Sage Mode, or maybe he was imagining it all. Before he could investigate or celebrate the feeling, Naruto scrunched his face when a bit of valley dust wafted up on the breeze and tickled his nose. He sneezed loudly.

The sandy-haired student’s eyes snapped open in surprise. He kept balance on the slate he was seated on while canting his head in confusion, wondering if he had heard something. Upon seeing that reaction, Naruto sensed that he had disturbed the meditating valley resident. ‘Yeesh. I shouldn’t bother him! I know how tough this training is.’

Then, Naruto started to come to with the most radical headache he had ever experienced. With a low, bellowing moan, he cracked his eyes open, squeezed them shut again, and failed to sit up. Naruto felt that he had been laid flat on a futon. Light in the room suggested in was late morning or mid-day.

Why was it so hard to move? He ached all over and felt the sting of a bag of ice tied to the top of his head. Naruto tiredly moved his hand and felt around, noticing a change of clothes he’d been switched into. He also felt a few paper tag seals stuck to his skin. ‘What’s…all this about? Did I get sick during training…? Oh shit, maybe I died? I dunno. Maybe when I wake up I’ll be in the distant future like the premise of those lame fiction novels…’

“You wakin’ up over there, Blondie?” A voice asked from the corner of the room.
Naruto opened an eye to spy the room’s other occupant: a small green toad in a glitzy jacket. The toad sat cross-legged on a cushion and had a stack of reading material beside him.

“…uh…erg…”

“Yeah, I’ll bet that smarts. Ma and Pa told me you slammed face-first into our giant, toad oil cauldron. Do you know how solid that thing is? Pff! And don’t get me started on what I did to ya…”

Sputtering with a slightly stuffed nose, Naruto pushed himself up slightly, “Have we…met?”

“Not that you’d remember, ya got clocked so hard. I’m Kinji. Ma and Pa’s kid.” Kinji licked a finger and flipped a page in a theatrical manuscript, “And I know that you are Naruto, Jiraiya’s little golden duckling. You introduced yourself to me as some jerk fox, though.”

“Oh shit! I’m sorry—” Alarmed, Naruto struggled to sit up and tried to make amends, “I think I might’ve passed out and sometimes the—!”

“You don’t need to explain, Blondie. Jiraiya did a whole lotta gabbin’ already.” Kinji closed his manuscript and set it aside, “You’ve got a fuzzy tenant.”

“Yeah…”

“I beat the hell out of ‘em.”

“It feels like you missed him and got me.” Naruto rubbed his ribs tenderly through his shirt, “Are you a Sage?”

“I am a modern marvel.” Kinji puffed up a little, “You bet your yellow head I’m a Sage. I knew your daddy too. We clowned around when we were younger.”

Naruto was delighted, “You did?”

“Minato was my fellow bookworm and occasional karaoke partner! You know, when he was here in the valley.” Kinji recalled, “Otherwise he was pledging his life and service to his village, and just generally being a nice guy.”

He tossed his blanket off, “Are you kidding me-?”

“—nah, he wasn’t perfect. He chased some red-headed chick around a lot—”

Naruto sidled up to the toad, “No, no, I mean, he could sing-?”

“He was better than me.” Kinji shrugged, “And we were usually pretty sloshed by the time my Pa put music on.”

The gleaming, genuine smile on Naruto’s face took the toad aback. He gave Naruto a pat on the arm, “Uh…wait here. I’ve got to tell Jiraiya that you’re up.”

Naruto languidly rolled over on tatami mats and watched Kinji hop out of the room. He could hear a soft exchange of words outside. After that, Jiraiya appeared at the door and scrutinized Naruto suspiciously, “This isn’t some trick, is it, Fox?”

“Whoa, Perv, you know it’s me.” Naruto frowned.

“Like I’m going to take my chances after you blew up part of the valley…” Jiraiya sniffed, “Say something only Naruto would say.”
“I already did.”

“Just cooperate or I’ll slap another tag on you.”

“Uh.” Confronted with skepticism, Naruto was puzzled over how to prove his identity in a word, “Um…er…believe i—?”

“Alright, that’ll do.” Jiraiya cut him off and entered the room.

Immediately, Naruto had questions about Kinji, “Did he know Dad really well? How come I haven’t met him before today? Can I summon him? Well, duh, I probably can. Oh, and you never told me Dad could—”

Jiraiya clapped his hand over his pupil’s mouth, “Hold it. Let’s talk. You were unconscious for two days. Don’t you remember petrifying into a Toad Statue?”

“What the-! That happened?” Naruto gasped, “I thought I was just living the life of ants and flowers…temporarily.”

“Yeah, well, there’s nothing temporary about becoming a statue, Kid. For most people, anyway. Maybe that’s where your consciousness and spirit goes when your body turns to stone. You just wander around Nature for all time or until you achieve enlightenment.” The man smiled to himself, “And the thought of you becoming enlightened before me seems hilariously accurate.”

“What is enlightenment anyway?” Naruto only had a vague notion of spiritual concepts.

“That’s what the unenlightened ask.” Jiraiya teased, peeling paper tags from Naruto’s chest, “Sages are supposed to basically understand that mumbo-jumbo…which I may have glossed over. Sorry. Dhyāna is the term for meditation or no mind, and it’s supposed to give us the state of perfect equanimity and awareness. That you already understand.” Jiraiya acknowledged, “And when one is a Sage, that doesn’t make one enlightened. Bodhi is the awakening, or, the understanding of the true nature of all things. Toad Sages understand life, balance and some other core knowledge. We don’t necessarily understand how they connect with all the rest of the junk in this universe.”

“So we don’t get…Bodhi just by training in the valley?”

“No. Maybe you can, but I’m guessing you’ll need greater insight than what we have here. The Great Toad Elder is probably enlightened. Or something like it.” Jiraiya finished plucking tags from Naruto, “Anyway, don’t scare me again. I’m a little hesitant to put you back to work after the fox ran amok…”

“So I…started to turn to stone, but…the fox stopped it.” Naruto gathered, “And then he took over?”

“Yeah. Granted, he did kind of save your ass. Then he gave us grief.”

“I don’t really know where I went wrong…why can’t I get this training right?” Naruto rubbed his head anxiously, “I felt like I was getting it!”

“You probably were.” Jiraiya gave him that, “But was anything different that day? Did anything throw you off?”

“Er…” A few recollections drifted to the surface, “Well, maybe.”

“Maybe?” Jiraiya arched a brow at him, “Define maybe.”
“I spent most of the morning with Hinata, you know, the only way we can.” Naruto admitted, “I showed her around and we talked…”

“And you think that impacted your ability to meditate?” Jiraiya ventured with a stern tone.

He felt rather cornered, “I…think it could have. I’m not saying it’s her fault! I’m the one who has to get my act together.”

“Right. But you don’t want to create any more risk than what you are already up against.” Jiraiya advised, “So, less with the remote-controlled dates and more with the discipline and focus. That’s your recipe for success.”

“Got it.” Naruto agreed glumly.

“Good. You hungry? You haven’t eaten in over a day.”

“Yeah.” Naruto pushed to his feet, “Literally any bug or fruit you put in front of me will do.”

“Then let’s funnel all that down your gullet, Kid.” Jiraiya turned merrily out of the door, “And while we’re at it, let’s bother Kinji with embarrassing stories from when he was young.”

It almost felt like watching a sitcom when he watched Ino’s family.

Ino’s mother Noriko was a demure brunette, her hair coiffed in a bun and her sundress immaculately pressed For a moment, she and her daughter looked each other in the face while laughing girlishly. Shikamaru missed the joke from his place seated at a table. As he was visiting them for the morning and having tea, he watched his girlfriend interact with her parents. Noriko could finish Ino’s sentences for her if she was given the chance, but she was much nicer than her filter-less, opinionated child.

Shortly after that, Inoichi thundered back into the kitchen for the third time, as he had clearly forgotten his keys, then the department memo, and then the swipe-card pass for high clearance Intel areas. Cursing his forgetfulness, Inoichi grudgingly accepted another pity-kiss on the cheek from his wife and then stalked out. ‘He’ll probably be back.’ Shikamaru wagered. A bagged bento box was still sitting on the counter, and he imagined that was meant to go with Inoichi as well.

He stared blankly at wall artwork and sipped his tea. At the Nara house, his father would have already been long gone for a morning briefing at the office and then the Jounin Standby Station. Had he lingered at home, Shikamaru guessed his mother would have made small talk with him before diving into embarrassing subjects and/or grown impatient with him and shooed him out to be productive. The Yamanaka family actually liked when he hung around.

When Ino leaned down over the table and he accidentally, sort-of-on-purpose saw down the low cut of her top, it snapped him out of his contemplation. The blonde woman smiled slyly at him.

“Shouldn’t we be going too?” Ino asked him, “If you’re done with your tea. We have a mission assignment today.”

“Yup.” Shikamaru stood from his seat, “Chouji said that you two need to make a stop at the first floor offices?” He moved the teapot and cup from the table.

“Yeah, at the administrative building. We have to turn in paperwork for higher clearances.” Ino clarified, “It should only take a few minutes.”
After cleaning up and saying their farewells to Noriko, they set out through town for the Hokage’s tower. Strolling side-by-side down the street, the pair engaged in sidelong conversation.

“That tea wasn’t your favorite. I could see it on your face.”

“It doesn’t have to be my favorite to be drinkable.” Shikamaru pointed out.

“How does my outfit look?” She was, as always, very polished-looking.

“Fine. Just like yesterday’s. And whatever you threw together the day before that. You can wear your vest over anything, Ino.”

“I was thinking maybe I don’t want to…”

“You’re wearing it today.”

“I’m capricious.”

“I know.”

“Shika, I’m still surprised you woke up early today.” Ino reflected, “Early enough to catch breakfast with my family at least.”

“I prefer your schedule. My parents are nutjobs up at the crack of dawn.”

“Yes, but…I’m surprised.” Her lips were curling nefariously, “That you’re okay with so little sleep.”

“…it was enough.” He was watching her from the corner of his eye, “I don’t see you complaining either.”

“I’d trade beauty rest for a few hours of empty house with you any night.” Ino was humming happily to herself. He knew very well that she was referring to nocturnal activities he had initiated. Even though sex had to be scheduled to avoid pestering families and conflicts of time, Shikamaru could admit it was still the greatest thing ever.

The subject of conversation drifted away from: could you do that again sometime? and don’t hate on violet lace, you still pulled it off me with your teeth! to: Shut up, there’s Chouji.

And Chouji greeted them in the warm, sunny way he always did while offering a tin of muffins he had been eating from on the way to the tower. They politely declined and entered the building together. Chouji left his muffin tin with Shikamaru before he and Ino continued on to the Processing Bureau down the hall. He loitered in the lobby and nodded in salutations when some Chunin associates scurried by.

Asuma rounded the corner after descending the stairwell and immediately honed in on the muffins. He said hello to Shikamaru after his first bite.

“Are you not being fed well?” Shikamaru snarked.

“Kurenai and I don’t do breakfast anymore. That shit’s for newlyweds and posers.” Asuma announced, scarfing the food, “Sato gave her coffee for her birthday and we’ve been converted.”

“That still won’t stop you from starving.”

“Sure it won’t, but coffee works quicker.”
They took a seat on a lobby bench.

“`You came in with Ino?’” Asuma noted, “I saw you from the window upstairs after my briefing.”

“Huh, so are you living there now or what? I hardly ever see you come from the Nara House.”

Asuma snickered, “Her parents should charge you rent, at least.”

“I don’t have that kind of money and it’s just a meal here and there. I’m still at home for the most part.”

“Why don’t you get a place together?”

“Because that’s wasteful.”

“How about: because you’d want to?” Asuma wondered, “Couples do that.”

“Dad said we could, but it won’t look right if our clan elders examine the formality of everything.”

Shikamaru explained, “If Ino said she wanted to, then I would.”

“Then that makes sense.” Asuma agreed, sighing, “You know what Kurenai said to me after we first moved in together? We were still pretty young. She said: I don’t want to do anything else for a while. I want to make Jounin rank and train up a team of Genin. So I said: Train them up? Into what? Apparently she meant to Chunin or adulthood, or whichever came first.” He finished off his muffin, “That’s a long time to live together and do nothing; I’d just like to say.”

“So then why did you stay with her?” Shikamaru snorted, “She made it clear what she intended to do.”

“Because of two main reasons: One, I was the one who liked her and suggested that dating me would be a good idea. And two, after we became a team out of the Academy and got to know each other as Genin, I knew it was best to let Kurenai do exactly what she wanted to do.” Asuma replied evenly, “That’s what made her happiest.”

“What about what made you happy?”

“She made me happy.” Asuma grinned like a sap, “She still does.”

“Hm.” Shikamaru said, considering it.

“I think…now that all of you youngsters have made Chunin rank…Kurenai feels like she can take a step back now.” Asuma observed, “If I’ve been reading the signals correctly, I am pretty sure she’s ready to settle down.”

“Is that so?”

“Yeah. We’re itching for kids. Every toddler we see on the street is suddenly interesting and worth critiquing.”

Shikamaru was not sure what to say. For his part, he was still mostly ambivalent about marriage, children, and other such commitments. He gave his sensei a slanted, bamboozled look.

“When we get married I’d like for you all to be there.” Asuma added.

“Are you so sure she’d say yes? You’ve asked her before. 12 years of turning you down is enough time to make someone comfortable.” Shikamaru was a bit sharp with his response.

“Shit, Shikamaru…” The man chuckled softly, “I’m not sure if you are speaking in defense of me… or if you genuinely disagree that an investment of over a decade is worth anything.”

“I don’t know if it is.” Shikamaru replied.

“That’s the difference between me and you, I think. You’re skeptical of everything.” Asuma reflected, “I, on the other hand…am too optimistic for my own good.” He lectured a little, “You don’t achieve your dreams by questioning the odds constantly. You need to take some risks and be willing to get hurt. That’s the only way you ever truly come to appreciate something.”

Shikamaru noticed that today, for some reason, this sentiment resonated with him more. He wasn’t feeling as sure of himself. He was acutely aware of the future, and some of his insecurities had manifested. He’d been preoccupied with the reality that the Nara and Yamanaka clans could enact provisions, or strip inheritance and responsibility from him or Ino if they pursued their relationship seriously. A future together was not forbidden or frowned upon, but at least one of them, Shikamaru was aware, would give up the majority of his or her clan-related duties if marriage was in the cards. Since that was bothering him, perhaps he ought to reign it in and give his sensei a break?

“Sorry, Sensei. I don’t know what’s gotten into me…” Shikamaru edited himself, “Kurenai-sensei will—”

Asuma gently knuckle-punched his student’s cheek, “She already said yes, you brainiac. Why else am I inviting students and talking about this stuff?”

“Oh.” Shikamaru straightened up on the bench. Yeah. Projecting his concerns onto others made him awfully blind.

When Ino and Chouji returned, Asuma did not bring up the subject again. He engaged in pleasantries and good-humored teasing with them before asking Shikamaru to, “Lead this team well. I’ve got my hands full today…” Then he was off.

Shikamaru supposed Asuma would update his students on the matter when things were official. He returned Chouji’s muffin tin and followed a step behind him and Ino. He was transfixed on the to-and-fro swing of Ino’s long, cornsilk ponytail.

Maybe the other thing that was eating at him lately was that he was starting to think Ino was a bit too good for him. Though boisterous and confrontational at times, Ino had fulfilled three interviews with the Sensory Corps, the Intel Corps, and the Medical Corps for significant auxiliary positions and had turned heads in every building she set foot in. The thought made him restless. He envied her family and their congeniality. Her confidence. He heard the mutterings of those admiring Ino as she passed by.

And yet, Shikamaru thought to himself as they scaled the stairs of the building: she’d chosen to have a morning meal with him, cracked jokes with him, dated him exclusively, and had also made five hours in his bed last night so memorable that he still saw her behind his eyelids when he blinked. So he bucked up a little and smiled to himself.

Ino noticed. She canted her head at Shikamaru and stopped while Chouji proceeded into the Hokage’s office. The angles of her lips and eyebrows noted: That smile of yours means something.

He touched the back of her arm as she walked into the office, angling his eyebrows in a silent reply. Astute, Ino nodded and flipped her hair out of her face. She got it. She smiled to herself.
“Make this quick because I have three consecutive briefings after you.” Tsunade greeted and then added, “Good morning, all.”

As a team, “Good morning, Hokage-sama.”

Tsunade gladly accepted a muffin from Chouji when he left it on her desk, “Oh! You angel.”

Shikamaru approached the desk and accepted the scroll the Hokage handed him, listening as she gave a short briefing to the team.

“Don’t expect any stimulation from this assignment. You’re going to Tanzaku Quarter, reporting straight to the court offices on the east side, you know—the white brick building.” Tsunade sighed as she went on, “You’ll oversee the proceedings of a case with the Shibusawa family, accused of defrauding a host of their clients to make a fortune. Maito Ken will be there with two attorneys and witnesses…and I’d like you three to make sure that our people could not be safer in that building.”

“They’re having a rough year, that family.” Shikamaru recalled bankruptcy and other woes that had befallen the Shibusawa clan.

“It wouldn’t be so rough if they could so much as attempt a legal transaction.” Tsunade sniffed.

“Tama’s father is on this case?” Ino verified.

“Yes.” The Hokage smiled and added sarcastically, “He’s charming.”

Chouji and Ino knew definitively that was a false statement.

“Return tonight and give me details tomorrow morning. If…any thugs or mercenaries happen to drop by that court room…make them squeal before arresting them. It’s clean up season and I want that district swept for low-lifes that the Shibusawa family gave a pass for so long. Intel will help us empty Tanzaku Quarter, or at least start to.” Tsunade lifted her muffin and gave it an experimental nibble, “Hm!” She liked it.

Shikamaru assured her that they would see it done, and then his team carried on after being dismissed. They passed by Neji and Lee as the pair dropped into the Hokage’s office immediately afterward.

Tsunade held a finger up to them so she could finish chewing. She needed to relish her breakfast.

Respectfully, Lee greeted the village leader while Neji stood in silence. He looked gray and weary. Tsunade cocked an eyebrow at him.

“Hyuga, I’ve seen corpses that looked more approachable.” She concluded chewing, “Ah. Eh-hem, so, it’ll be the two of you today.”

“You are confirming that, Tsunade-sama?” Lee asked with a hint of concern, “Neji and I have not…been able to find Tenten since the day before last.”

“Gentlemen, she has obligations and they were cleared with me. I excused her from missions.” She waved it off, “You will see Tenten tomorrow morning, I assure you. For now, I ask that you kindly supervise the transportation of expensive medical equipment to the clinic in Kaido. 20 kilometers south of Leaf, if you’re rusty on that location. It’s a watering hole of Hatake Sato’s and he’s chummy with the mayor there…” Tsunade handed a scroll with details to Lee, since Neji was still not animated, “Please. Take this seriously. This a gesture of good faith with that town whose preeminent medic-nin is almost as experienced as I am, Eto Sarincha. Or whatever her surname is now… See to it that shipment gets to town without issue. The likelihood of interference is rather high…but you two should…” She paused and frowned at Neji, reconsidering her confidence in them.

“No such interference will disrupt the delivery on our watch, Hokage-sama!” Lee tried to avert the Hokage’s notice of Neji and his glum expression.

“Do you need a shot of Vitamin-B?” Tsunade tried to assess the problem, “Or is this a personal problem that is going to affect performance, Hyuga?”

He straightened a little, for Lee’s sake. Neji replied, “There will be no disruption, Hokage-sama.”

“Good. I expect you back tonight and a follow-up report in the morning. Give Sarincha and her mayor-husband my best. And if her father is ever local again…” Tsunade simpered, “Migawari has something of mine that I intend to win back. Be sure to pass that on, Lee.”

“Yes ma’am!”

And they were off after dismissal, walking a bit slower than usual down the hall while discussing the elephant in the room.

“Tsunade-sama did not tell us what Tenten’s obligations were.” Lee observed.

“She isn’t anywhere. Not her home. Her shop. Our training areas. Nor with friends, who were suspicious of my asking…as it was uncharacteristic.” Neji added, “Tenten did not tell either of us she would be…out.”

“No, she did not.”

“Because of her impeccable timing…” Neji rubbed his head, vexed, “I haven’t been able to tell Tenten anything.”

“But Tsunade-sama said she will return tomorrow morning. Perhaps it was some sort of work or personal matter?”

“Can you think of a time that Tenten has not expressly told us where she would be, when she intends to be absent?” Neji countered.

“Never.” Lee yielded, “Not since the no-contact order…”

Lee watched his friend’s face, negotiating the steps in the stairwell while Neji stewed on Tenten’s unexpected absence. She would have no idea what Neji intended to do. Now responsible for a mission that would take up the better part of a day, Neji was probably imagining where to start looking for her when they returned at night; moreover, how Tenten would react to his decision to join the Branch.

On the first floor, Lee cleared his throat. Neji snapped out of his musing and blinked at him.

“This scroll says we will meet the equipment manager at the shipping depot. It is close by. What I mean to say is…we can expedite this mission if it will take your mind off the matter, Neji.” Lee offered, moving a bit more briskly as his friend matched his pace, getting it, “We can make good time! Then I will assist in searching for the flower of our team when we return.”

Neji was grateful for the suggestion, “Lee—”

“Do not tarry!” Lee caught Neji’s shoulders and pushed him into a run.
After concluding her morning meetings in the administrative building, Tsunade handed off a variety of paperwork and incidentals to Shizune and Sakura before migrating to Konoha’s hospital.

Venturing up from the hospital lobby and through the ward on the second floor, Tsunade was briefly detained by her celebrity as some Chunin-ranked medics, still shiny-eyed with pressed lab coats, stopped to chat her up and ask for wisdom. She allowed for six minutes of ego-plumping conversation before she barked at her subordinates to “check charts and quit socializing!” At the far end of the corridor, Tsunade strolled into a patient room without announcing herself.

Tama looked up from reading an unwound scroll in her lap, rolling it closed as she acknowledged the village leader, “Good morning, Tsunade-sama!”

“Hello, Tama.” She stopped to glance over a patient chart at the side of the room, “You’ll be happy to know I left your father in capable hands while he works on a case today. Shikamaru’s team will ensure his safety.”

“Thank you, those are capable hands indeed.” She was merry and pain-free, but Tama sobered up a little when the Hokage shut the door to the room and then strode over to the bed.

With no preamble, Tsunade laid her hands flat on each of the girl’s knee caps and stared off unseeing, surveying the state of Tama’s crushed legs. Shortly after that, her sensing-fingertips travelled to Tama’s left hand, “Better? Sakura and I worked to mend this famous punching hand of yours.”

“Yes. Much better! I’m still getting motion back through physical therapy with Sakura-chan.”

Tsunade stopped the examination and took a seat on a rolling stool, “I want you to be honest with me.”

“Yes, milady.”

“Any feeling in your lower legs or feet?”

“…no.”

“About what I expected. How about your back? Any trouble there?”

“No. My back feels fine. I told Sakura-chan I can move and feel down around mid-thigh.”

“That’s encouraging to hear…” The Hokage frowned, “But I suppose we should discuss your options should you wish to continue being a shinobi. You do still want to serve, am I right about that?”

Tama had a stern look not unlike her uncle’s most serious expressions, “Yes, I really do.”

“Then your options are few, considering your physical state. On the one hand, you can accept a permanent disability status in Leaf and choose from any clerical opening in any of the Corps that are hiring. We could leave it at that to guarantee your health and well-being. Or, you could elect to take an elevated risk and visit Kusagakure for its renowned medical tourism, as I’ve heard that they have those with talents and Kekkei Genkai that can address severe injuries…” Tsunade trailed off and looked out the window, “But your ability to access such treatment is unlikely, because the demand for it far outpaces its supply and the availability of physicians.”

“On the other hand…” Tsunade’s tone took on a blade’s edge of severity, “You take the most risky option and seek treatment with me.”
It nearly seemed like a no-brainer cue to agree, but before Tama could assert her confidence in the Hokage, Tsunade stopped her with a raised hand. Tama stayed quiet.

“What I can do for you is uncertain.” Tsunade clarified, “In all of my years of experience, I have only once treated a similar extent of bone and connective tissue damage. That was some time ago. Though my patient had a good result after the procedure, he died shortly after of complications.” She looked Tama squarely in the eye, “Reversing your injury will have a 50 percent success rate at best, not counting possible post-op issues you may experience. Should you survive surgery, rehabilitation will take time and dedication to yield improvement, and it does not guarantee the same standard of life you knew before injury. Do you understand?”

“I understand, Tsunade-sama.” Tama was listening carefully.

“I say this to you in confidence because you are of the age of majority in Leaf, and so you can make this decision without parental guidance. However…” Tsunade balanced her chin on the back of her hand, “With such a high rate of failure to be considered, I hope you ask yourself what you stand to lose by continuing a career as a shinobi.”

“Quite a lot…” Tama noted, shoulders drooping, “…I know my family would be…frustrated if I made a careless decision that cost my life.”

“And your husband-to-be…I don’t know how I could ever deal with him if he lost you.” Tsunade thought of Sato, adding, “He and Kakashi…they consider you their family. They have already had their share of loss…and I dare not imagine what it would be like if you died under my hands instead of living in safety in their care.”

“…I understand.” The young woman grew quiet, her eyes wandering to watch the wall clock as the minute hand made its revolution. Tsunade also took the moment to stare off into space.

“Maybe I shouldn’t.” Tama supposed. A silence hung in the room.

Tsunade sighed and fidgeted with the end of a pigtail that was draped over her shoulder. She was not very good at giving counsel about these sorts of things. She painted a scene with a brush of truth and facts, and sometimes that hurt far more than the sugarcoated optimism she wished she could peddle. Tsunade, a survivor of lost loved ones herself, could certainly relate to the pain that would be felt by Sato, Gai, Kakashi, and Tama’s family, were Tama to perish. Not that Nawaki and Dan had any real choice in their respective demises, but Tsunade hoped that Tama would see the value in that she had a choice at all.

“Yes, I’ve heard.” The woman smiled wanly.

“My father saw to it that…there were few things I couldn’t do. Self-sufficiency, skill, and knowledge…that’s my father’s mantra.” Tama closed her eyes and leaned her head back, “I can make budgets. I can memorize laws and texts. I can negotiate deals. I can calculate probability and percentages in my head. I can cook most anything. I can build a house. I can dance. I can ride a bike without touching the handle bars. I’m getting good at hot-wiring things, and I can tell you what day of the week any calendar date was or will be.”

“Huh.” Tsunade said.

“I can get a job doing…anything. I guess.”
“Perhaps going into your father’s field would be lucrative.” Tsunade imagined.

“I could…but all of those things I can do…aren’t the things I want to do.” Tama admitted, “I want to be a shinobi. Most of my life, others made decisions for me. My uncle and Kakashi-sensei, and my mother too, decided who I would marry. My father told me to turn away from a ninja career and the Taijutsu style of my family. Even my friends at the bakery, though they mean well…tell me what they think is best.”

Tsunade was nodding and watching the girl from the corner of her eye.

“For so long I’ve been comfortable…humoring the people that steer me. But I am tired of that.” Tama explained, “I’m so tired of that.”

“So then you want to undergo the procedure here in Leaf?” Tsunade ventured.

“I don’t need to inform anyone that I’m going into surgery, do I?”

“Generally it’s a best practice to tell someone. You’ll put me in a precarious position if you should die, you realize.” Tsunade advised.

“I…” Tama pursed her lips and thought on it.

“Maybe we should schedule it for down-time between Sato’s missions.” Tsunade assumed, “I sent his team on a tracking assignment, and I have a few other requests much like it that I need them to fulfill.”

“Right, well…” Tama appeared clearer in her decision, “I want to speak to Kakashi-sensei.”

“Oh?”

“Do you happen to know if he’s in the village-?”

“Well of course I do, I have a bone to pick with him.” Tsunade pushed up from the rolling stool and stood, “Before I nag him, I will send him to you. Talk. Consider everything. Then give me your answer.”

“I will, Tsunade-sama.” She offered the Hokage a small smile.

“Oh and do you have any special food requests?” Tsunade stopped at the door on her way out, “I can have your Sensei bring you something.”

“A doughnut.” Tama said hopefully.

The table of the apartment was littered with fine jewelry and ornaments. Shell bracelets trimmed with gold, magatama pendants of jade and quartz on gold, beaded chains, tassel earrings dripping in sapphires and rubies, a platinum dragon pendant with scales cut from rainbow bismuth; brooches, headpieces, hair pins fitted with diamonds and silver.

Haku nearly fell over when he watched Zabuza turn out the silk bag on the table top and sniff disinterestedly at the spoils. “Y-You-! You didn’t steal that from the dignitary—?”

“Can it, Haku. I grabbed the oaf’s whole goddamn bag. How was I supposed to know he had a fuckload of gems in there with the agreements from Mist?” Zabuza chucked the silk bag aside, “Guess I can dump it all at an auction in the Lightning Country. Aristocrats there love this kind of junk.”
“You are richer than sin already.” Haku’s hand thunked down to emphasize the point, “You don’t need to sell this, Zabuza. We should distribute it the townspeople here.”

“In case you’ve forgotten I have to buy Terumi’s men out. And their loyalty to her has made them expensive.” Zabuza growled, “We’ll hit up an auction in a few months’ time.”

“If you insist on doing so then you can part with a few pieces.” Haku disagreed, “The old Shibasaburō sisters and Oguni-san can use this to fix their houses. Tomo-san can use this too for the children’s schooling…and Hiroshi-san…”

“Alright, just take whatever.” The grouchy nukenin loped away from the table to prospect for food in the refrigerator.

Haku thoroughly ignored Zabuza’s grousing and muttering in the background while he examined a few specimens. Not that he had a trained eye for luxury, but Haku assumed some of the finer metals and gems would fetch higher prices for the struggling retirees of the island. He set aside what looked like it could have been the headpiece of an empress, some brooches and other jewelry.

He fell still while handling a magnificent hand fan. The hinoki material was printed with impossibly rich colors; a blue sky strung with clouds that bled into a sunset scene, and in the foreground, brushwork of a kite flying in the shape of a swallow. On the table beside it were a hair pin and ring inlaid with gems of the same color scheme. Perhaps it was more than Zabuza would allow him to take and set aside for neighborhood senior citizens, so Haku pocketed those items without a word for himself.

Zabuza told him to fetch nori, miso and mushrooms to throw into a pot of simmering broth for noodles. Haku moved about the small space, stuck in his thoughts which he collected the foodstuffs…and they paused as Ranmaru entered through a creaking door and slowly tottered into the room. He had a noticeable, red lump on his forehead.

“Did Thunderbrain do that to you?” Zabuza was half-concerned at the sight of the apprentice who he, for the most part, considered competent and trustworthy now.

“No.” Ranmaru took a seat on an armchair and rested a healing hand on the lump, “I failed Migawari-sensei’s healing exam.”

“A second time?” Haku was surprised, and handed over a bag of ice to his friend, “He barely had the patience for your first evaluation. Migawari-san gave you extra time to study and practice, Ranmaru. I didn’t think he’d…actually whack you with the paddle he’s been brandishing. I thought that was just a threat.”

“You passed on your first try, Haku-kun. I mixed up a few things and…” Ranmaru sighed, “It wasn’t a threat.”

Haku clucked his tongue disapprovingly.

“He said that because we don’t pay him for lessons that the least I can do is not waste his time.” Ranmaru recalled glumly.

“This was the arrangement he asked for. We help around his office in exchange for lessons.” Haku returned to the table to clear away spoils and prepare to chop vegetables, “Well then, Migawari-san won’t see a single bead of what Zabuza brought back with him.”

“He better fucking not, that cheap pickle drum.” Zabuza agreed distantly from a storage closet.
Ranmaru raised his lavender eyebrows at the last shining pieces being dropped into the silk bag, “Oh…! He would want that whole bag of riches. I won’t say anything to him, Haku-kun, promise.”

“I know.”

Another sigh, “I didn’t want Raiga to see my head or he’d get angry.”

“Just wait here until the swelling goes down.” Haku recommended.

“I’ll study a bit harder.” Ranmaru resolved, and then looked up at Haku from his seat, “Haku-kun, because you passed Migawari-sensei’s exam…that makes you a medic-nin.”

“That doesn’t mean I am certified. It just makes me knowledgeable; that I can save lives if I must.” Haku reasoned, “I’m a Genin. I’m nothing more than that.”

“Well,” Ranmaru smiled to himself with his hands in his lap, “I’m not even that. But I’ll be something someday.”

Haku laughed quietly at him.

“Quit yaking and make yourself useful if you’re gonna lay low here, Pipsqueak.” Zabuza warned as he returned to the kitchen area, “Mix or chop something.”

“Yes, Zabuza-san!”

Zabuza gave the child a weird look, absorbing just how unusual it had become to hear such a thing from another apprentice’s mouth. Not long after preparations, boiling noodles, and pan-frying thin fillets of pork, Zabuza grudgingly allowed Ranmaru to join them for lunch as well. Ranmaru was not a big eater, so Zabuza permitted the small purple remora to hang about.

They ate and Ranmaru’s head lump faded. After folding his hands in thanks for the meal and washing some dishes, Ranmaru was off again to find his master.

Zabuza was about to settle down for a nap when Haku plopped down on the sofa beside him.

“What? Are you going for the world record in irritating me today?” The man rumbled. He peered through a slitted eye as Haku held open a scroll for him. He wanted an opinion.

“See this? For me to apply this Yin Seal, I would need to write all of the script formulas in multiple matrices. Flesh, parchment, and soil, I’m guessing…” Haku handed the scroll off to Zabuza who brought it closer to his face to read it and understand, “Have you ever done something like this before?”

Zabuza wondered, “What is this shit?”

“Hokage’s seal my ass.” Zabuza snorted in disbelief, “If this is her seal then I’m a florist.”

“Then you’re a florist.” Haku asserted flatly.
Zabuza just looked at him. After a moment, he unwound the scroll and suspended his disbelief, examining more of what was required to use the technique.

“How the fuck did you get this?”

Haku shrugged it off, “Does it matter? I asked you if you’ve ever applied something like this before.”

“Not recently. Not ever this complex.” Zabuza admitted, “And all you get for it is a bindi, this says.”

“Ah.” Haku said faintly.

“Who the hell has worked on something this convoluted before? Sealing Corps Commissioners, maybe, or other formula-scribbling geeks with no lives…” The man supposed as he sat up, “You’re gonna need a lot of ink— serious ink, to write this. We don’t exactly have that shit handy.” He exhaled between the line of his lips, thinking about it.

“So we could feasibly accomplish this?” Haku wondered, leaning over to see how far Zabuza had gotten.

“Feasibly.” Zabuza snickered at the word, “Yeah. This looks like…I don’t know. Four hours’ worth of Fuinjutsu writing? Not that I can judge accurately, because I was never a candidate for the Sealing Corps. This is technical stuff that, as you know, you can’t fuck up. If you write a single character of the formula wonky or omit anything, you can fry yourself, seal your chakra, or waste all that work once it sits there inert. There are jutsu that can help you avoid mistakes but, again, not my field of expertise.”

“How do you know so much?” Haku took back the scroll and rolled it shut, “Even at the Academy we only got the bare minimum of Sealing information.”

“Yeah, well, I had this crap drilled into my head when I was a kid.” Zabuza pushed off of the sofa to riffle around a chest of supplies.

Haku was mildly curious, “Drilled into your head…by whom?”

“My old badger of a grandmother.”

“Really?”

Annoyed, Zabuza glanced over his shoulder at Haku, “You really don’t know a damn thing about the Water Country, do you?”

Haku frowned, “What should I take that to mean—?”

“My old badger is, oh I don’t know, kind of a big fucking deal in these parts. Even more surprising is that she’s outlasted everyone else in my family and is still kicking. She just refuses to die.” Zabuza went back to fishing parchment, ink, and other materials from the chest, “Momochi Honesuki. She was a Sealing Corps Commissioner in Mist when I left, and then for a while I think she was the Director of the whole fucking operation…but I guess now…”

Haku filled in the blank and recalled their discussions of possible Akatsuki interference.

“I guess she’s been demoted, murdered, or she wipes the Akatsuki’s ass these days. I have no clue.” Zabuza presumed, “She liked to call me the biggest disappointment of her life.”

“You sound alike.”
“Maybe we are. Maybe it pays to be a ruthless motherfucker like her. My parents weren’t. They were soft…and they wound up dead.” The man observed. He brought an armful of supplies over to the table, “So yeah. Get educated. People in this land may know my name or at least my alias, but everyone everywhere knows my grandma is hot shit.”

Haku was intrigued and also disturbed.

“Get over here, Numbnuts. Bring that scroll.”

He moved to the table and set down the Yin Seal scroll, watching as Zabuza lifted and clacked ink containers on the table top.

“No good. We’ll need at least triple this. Since it requires multiple matrices then writing on dirt will be a pain in the ass, so we’re better off with stone or concrete. You’d need to pick the proper area to even start putting this thing together…”

Haku nodded and watched, impressed. Over the last few months, it had felt as though Zabuza had become incredibly unhelpful by withholding information about the Yuki clan, and also because of his volatile hostility levels, ‘But I can’t deny he still teaches me things routinely…’

They talked briefly about an ideal place to apply the seal, where they would attract the least attention or hassle. Hiroshi’s fenced-in courtyard seemed like the frontrunner of their options, but Haku digressed again with another question.

“Zabuza, could your grandmother help us learn if—”

“Don’t.” Zabuza stopped him, “Don’t even ask. We’re not on speaking terms and haven’t been since I first got good at assassinations.”

“But she might know-!”

“She resents me. I didn’t want to inherit her Sealing twaddle and all that shit; not the distinction, not the money, not their problems, or the nose-up bravado that commissioners use to justify how they stand on the backs and shoulders of everyone else in the village.” Zabuza shut the idea down, “She can strain and die on a toilet for all I care. In Mist, she signed off on bounties and warrants for me. Fuck her.”

Haku sighed heavily.

“Don’t fucking sigh at me. You’d hate her too if you met her.”

“I’m not so convinced that I would.”

“Oh, so you want to sass me and ask for my help with this sacred Leaf shit?” He snorted.

“More of the latter, honestly.”

“Fine. If sticking this thing on your forehead will make you less likely to die and more useful to me, sign me up.” Zabuza finished jotting down a list of items necessary for the project, “But shut your fucking face and go buy all the ink the old farts have in town. All of it.”

He swiveled Haku around by his shoulder, directing him out of that flat as he muttered, “That’s the last time I bring up the badger…”

On the way back to the Hidden Leaf Village after completing a mission, near the border of the Tea
Country, Hinata picked up medicinal herbs as she and Shino spotted them in the wilderness. It was a bonus task from Tsunade. Hinata’s salves could fetch a nice price in Kaido, which had increased its imports from Leaf following the Chunin Exam’s success.

When they lagged, Sato whistled for them to keep up.

At about that time, Hinata leaped in surprise when a green toad bounded over an ancient tree root in front of her. Though about the same size as Kosuke, this was a toad she was not familiar with.

“Leaf headband, very pretty, within the approximated area…” The toad went over a mental checklist, “You’re Hinata-hime, is that right?”

“Yes! Do you have something for me from Naruto-kun?” Hinata brightened in excitement.

“Nope.” The toad handed over a scroll to Hinata, “I’m Kinji by the way. Pleased to make your acquaintance, your loveliness.” When he extended his webbed hand, Hinata dubiously and graciously shook it, returning the sentiment.

Nearby, Shino and Sato had stopped on a nearby tree branch to watch the exchange.

“It looks like you’re a bit busy, so I’m just gonna head back to the valley.” Kinji observed, “You can send a reply with ‘lil Kosuke in Leaf, when you want to.”

“Um…thank you, Kinji-san.”

“Nah, just Kinji’s fine.” The toad waved it off, “See you around, Hinata-hime!” And as quickly as Kinji had arrived, he was off again in the forest.

Hinata stood there for a moment and wondered why anything had been delivered at all if Naruto was not the sender.

“Random!” Sato assessed, “Come on Sunshine, Shino. We’ve been pretty slow today and it’s another five hours to Leaf. Want to make camp tonight and set out in the morning?”

The team unanimously agreed to gather food and tinder to make camp. As afternoon waned and the starry dark of the deep forest crepted in around them, the group huddled up in the evening around a campfire.

While Sato and Shino discussed why the squirrel meat they had caught, skinned, and cooked was the worst thing they had tasted in a while, Hinata sat and read her correspondence by firelight.

Dear Princess,

Hope you’ve been well! I bet you never expected to get any kind of communications from a coffin-dodger like me, but this is Jiraiya writing to you on Naruto’s behalf. I need to catch you up on a few things that happened. Based on my account and, thankfully, Naruto’s account of the events, let me try to sum it up for you.

Shortly after your last visit with Naruto by way of your teleconference jutsu (Tell me if you have named it yet, for I am ignorant) there was a training accident that occurred while Naruto was distracted. He gathered too much Natural Energy and petrified into stone. My colleagues and I here in the valley were pretty sure he was a goner.

Hinata gasped while she read, pressing on quickly. She ignored Sato’s concern over her squeal.
Through a series of unexpected circumstances and maybe divine intervention, Naruto’s life was spared and I can report that he is all flesh and no stone at this point in time. He was unconscious for two days, but woke up with no visible side effects or impairments after absorbing that amount of Natural Energy. With that said, my point is this: I want to respectfully ask you to refrain from “visiting” Naruto while he is training here on Mount Myoboku. The good news is that he’s on the verge of a breakthrough, but the bad news is that if he gets distracted and slips up again, I don’t know if he’ll be so lucky next time. Just for now, avoiding him will be to his benefit and can keep him safer. I know you’d want that for him too.

But to allay any of your concerns, please don’t hesitate to contact me if you have questions or need an update. I get it, he’s a lovable idiot and more importantly he is YOUR idiot. But soon he’ll be a Sage, so let that sink in. Anyway, let me know if you need anything and you’ll be hearing from us before you know it. Take care of yourself, and congratulations on your Exam performance! I hear that people are still talking about it.

Regards,

Jiraiya

She set down the scroll and took a chewy, unsatisfying bite of roasted squirrel.

“Is it gross?” Sato asked her.

“Sorry. Next time we’ll go with tubers, fish, and mushrooms like Shino suggested. Not the nearest squirrel in the nearest tree.” Sato resolved.

Shino asked her, “Is that correspondence from Naruto?”

“Um…no, actually.”

“No? But a toad delivered it.” Sato noted.

“Wow! I didn’t know that you’re with the in-crowd of Sages and stuff.” Sato remarked, letting Aree and Aroo finish his unwanted share of squirrel dinner, “Though isn’t he, like, pervvy and girls should avoid him-? Or so I’ve heard Tsunade-sama say.”

“He’s always been good and respectful, to me at least. I trust Gama-sennin.”

“We all can.” Shino agreed.

“Well yeah, and my uncle is one of his biggest fans. Do you know how much money Kakashi spends on that book series per year?” Sato fuddled around to try to boil tea beside the campfire, “An obscene amount.”

Later, after winding down to sleep, Hinata lay awake and thought about Jiraiya’s request.

There was absolutely no way she wanted any kind of harm to befall Naruto. She certainly understood the sense in the request. But she felt like tossing and turning on her bedroll, uneasy and upset that something could happen regardless of whether or not she communicated with Naruto. It would be terrible to find out he had turned to stone and learn of it days later from Jiraiya!
'No. He'll be safe.' But it had happened, it had already happened once, and how could she be sure it would not happen again? Hinata had never taken much time out of her schedule to sit and ponder what life would be like if, abruptly, Naruto could no longer be in hers. The visions in her mind were conjured up in sepia; bleak, arduous, but perhaps rimmed in silver lining that she had been fortunate enough to know and love him once.

‘I can’t get so worked up about this…I need to sleep…’ Hinata balled the edge of her blanket beneath her chin, fretting with her eyes shut.

Or.

Or she could continue to get the reassurance she needed by communicating with an alternative party. Hinata imagined that since it wasn’t so late at night, and because her jutsu would not disturb Sato and Shino as they were beginning to doze off, she ought to drop in on the Toad Sage himself.

By her estimations of brain-based global tracking, and overlapping with Naruto on Mount Myoboku, which was a bit further away geographically relative to her current position…Hinata did feel more resistance and tug on her chakra as she searched with the Misago Byakugan. Though it only took a few minutes before she was seeing out of a new set of eyes. Two large, age-roughened hands slammed down in shock on a low table’s top in Fukasaku and Shima’s house.

At about 10:30 that night, Jiraiya let go a bewildered, caribou-like bellow of surprise as he felt a very distinct, ghostly occupation. Though not quite. There was nothing ghostly about a very alive-and-well presence that chimed in greetings in his head, Good evening, Gama-sennin!

Jiraiya screamed again and fell backwards.

Shhh! Shhh! It’s alright—!

“Confound it all!” A rice paper door slid aside at the edge of the sitting room, “Are you acting out scenes from your book again, Jiraiya-boy?” A small, elderly toad accused, “Ma and I are trying to sleep. Do you intend to wake Naruto-boy as well—?”

“Shush, whoa, shush Pa!” Jiraiya hissed, splayed on his back on tatami mats, “I’m hearing voices.”

“I will burn that book and turn you out if you can’t be quiet!”

“Look, you’re the one who’s shouting now.” Jiraiya sat up and rubbed his head, “Give me a second, will ya? I think I might know what’s going on.”

Gama-sennin, I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to startle you! Kinji-san delivered your letter to me.

“Ohh—! Princess!” Jiraiya chuckled quietly, “You scared me into an early grave…phew.”

Fukasaku sniffed in annoyance and warned Jiraiya to keep it down, if he insisted on having single-participant conversations. He shut the door.

I’m sorry, I know it can be very jarring…

“It’s alright. I’m getting over it.” He straightened his tunic and scooched back towards the sitting room table, “You caught me in the middle of a brainstorm. I’ve been writing for the last few days, and I wanted to make sure that you knew what happened to the knucklehead.”

Is he really unharmed?
“Near as far as I can tell…” Jiraiya spoke softly and marked a journal page, closing it over a pen to keep his place, “I won’t lie. I’ve never been that scared. I’m not a man in the habit of crying either, but that sort of thing…I just can’t let it happen again. It was sudden. He was gone just like that.”

Hinata made a small sound of distress in his head.

“I’ll look after him, Princess.” He added thoughtfully, “Naruto came back with more knowledge, he said. Spouting all kinds of Nature mumbo-jumbo and the things he saw. Maybe this was a good thing?”

Maybe.

“Yeah. Maybe, maybe not.” Jiraiya agreed in a mutter, reaching for a tea pot, “He excels at testing the limits of my blood pressure.”

Gama-sennin…

“Yes, Princess?”

_I don’t want to lose him._

“I know you don’t.”

But I know there isn’t much…we can really do. None of us are made to last forever.

“Not made to last! Heh.” He chuckled, “Certainly not this crude matter we parade around in.” Jiraiya soothed her, “But here in the valley we are taught…that death is an illusion. Life itself can’t be destroyed. It changes. It turns over and over into new forms and fibers of the universe.”

This ran contrary to what Hinata understood of universal balance, _But life must have an opposite-?_

“Yes.” He lifted a cup of tea and took a sip, “The absence of it, not the end of it. The negative of what we know- of what we experience. The azoic and insentient. Lots of space and inverses. There are all kinds of old Nihongo and Sindhi terms for it. It’s hard to explain this stuff…Sages deal in metaphors and will shrug at me and say: well, you’ll just need to see it for yourself so go meditate by that pond over there!” Jiraiya shook his head in amusement, “If we can’t last as ourselves as we know ourselves, maybe there’s comfort in knowing there’s more. Whatever that more is.”

Yes. Hinata had a more upbeat tone of agreement, _I can understand that feeling._

“And you’ll never really lose him.” Jiraiya reminded her.

If I did, Hinata thought, _I would live well. Like Naruto-kun would want me to._

“Good girl.” Jiraiya smiled to himself.

_I may drop in sometimes…just to know if everything is well._ She advised him, _I promise I won’t disturb him. I will wait. He’ll be home soon…_

“He will, he will…” He went on, “And Princess, really. It’ll be fine. You can check with me anytime. Well. Avoid 8AM and 5PM, that’s lavatory time. Other than that, I’ll keep my eyes on Naruto.”

*Thank you, Gama-sennin._

“Say. Where are you right now?”
Oh! The Tea Country border. With my team on a mission.

“South of the Fire Country? Yikes, that’s a bit of a stretch for you isn’t it?”

It is…I don’t think I could ever reach much farther than this. When I do, everything goes black. Hinata recalled being knocked unconscious by a previous, long-distance effort, It takes quite a bit of chakra.

“Then kiddo, call it a night. Get some rest and do your best for Tsunade.” Jiraiya added, “Give her my best, and let’s keep Naruto’s sojourn in nature between the two of us.”

I will.

“Well then, goodnight and safe travels to you, Lady of the Hyuga. I’ve got some outlining to do.” Jiraiya yawned, “And not long to do it! I’m bushed.”

Good night, Gama-sennin.

Then, Jiraiya could tell with certainty that she had gone. He relaxed and returned to his journal, rubbing at his tired, craned neck.

‘That’s quite an odd power. Can do a world of good, though…’ The man thought to himself, ‘Naruto is blessed. May he stay blessed. And may the universe give me the means and strength to look after those two…and everyone who I refuse to lose this time.’

The quiet of the house was peaceful, edging into the later hours of the night.

“Hm! That was a delightful conversation.” Jiraiya noted out loud.

Mornings are for tea and contemplation at the Hyuga house.

But not this morning.

The sun rose and Neji heaved himself from bed in the dim light, dressed, and then crossed town to continue his search. Quite unlike Tsunade had promised, Tenten was nowhere to be found in the morning. Not in her home, not her workshop, and not at Lee’s residence, though Neji passed by to confirm it.

Her inexplicable absence made his imagination run wild. Neji surveyed corners and passageways of the village with the Byakugan in vain on his way back to the Hyuga estate.

Perhaps she was out, beyond the borders of the Leaf Village. On what business she had gone he could never guess, but Neji supposed that could be the case. He would be sure to make Tenten explain herself as soon as she reappeared.

Perhaps she had decided, in whatever state of mind she’d been in after her introduction to Hiashi, that she would rather not be his companion. Tenten herself had declared her appreciation of independence, and had been challenged by the etiquette of his clan. It was not so far outside the realm of possibility.

But call him presumptuous— Neji would insist that if she had dealt with his temper and bad choices over the last five years, Tenten was not likely to be dissuaded by one evening among the Hyuga’s Main House. He wanted to believe that she valued him enough to put up with the extra botheration.

Then the other, more nauseating, most unnerving thought came to mind. At least from the most basic information he had gleaned from Gai and the Hokage, Neji understood that Huo’s post-exam interrogation and evaluations were to end with his chaperoned extradition back to Iwagakure. What if he had slipped away from supervisors? What if he had snuck with Shadow Step through the alleys of Konohagakure, since he’d had a month to study the city’s roads? What if he had been successful in his hunt and Tenten was now at his mercy, or worse?

“Neji-niisan!”

On the lawn of the estate, Neji stopped and noticed Hinata trotting in from the front gate. Very quickly she took stock of his appearance, unsure of why he had such pronounced under-eye discoloration and ruddiness.

“Good morning, Hinata-sama.” His voice was gravelly. He walked with her back to the house.

“Nii-san…”

“How was your mission?”

“Pleasant. A good stretch of the legs.” Hinata railroaded the description in favor of asking, “Um…is something the matter? You don’t look dressed for the meeting.”

“What meeting?” His memory was fuzzy, but as she spoke her next words, Neji immediately remembered.

“The full clan meeting. It begins in one hour.”

Neji palmed his face and groaned quietly. So. He would not be recruiting Fujita and others willing to join a search party to see if Huo and Tenten were locatable, or perhaps locked in a life or death duel. Clan obligations took precedence.

Once inside the house, Neji fed his cousin a few white lies: yes, he was fine. No, training could wait, his team would wait for him. Yes, fine. Tired, though, and that’s why he had forgotten the meeting. He would clean up and be presentable. Yes, he’d like to hear about her travels later.

They went separate ways in the corridor, and Neji mustered the gumption to wash his face, tie his hair acceptably, and determine that he was wearing a messy, day-old shirt before changing into something clean. His body was in the Hyuga house, but his mind and spirit had taken flight and were searching in all directions. He felt sick with worry.

In the tea room Neji barely ate. He sat at the table and tumbled through his thoughts. Hanabi flicked a piece of orange peel at his face from across the table, snapping him out of his trance-like state.

“Neji-niisan. If you don’t feel like eating I can throw things into your mouth.”

“No, Hanabi-sama—”

“You’ve been acting weird.” She deadpanned.

“I have no appetite.”

When Hinata entered the room, changed and cleaned up from her mission, Hanabi warned her sister, “Onee-san, he’s been acting weird for two days! Not talking or eating, wandering around!”

With a distressed look, Hinata took a seat beside Neji and processed that his “I’m fine” statements were probably false.
Neji gruffed at Hanabi, “I’ve had a lot of thinking to do. I have been asked to not share any major decision of mine until after today’s meeting.”

“Oh?” Hanabi was cramming orange slices into her mouth, “Major decisions?”

Hinata gave him a sidelong look while picking at her own fruit plate, “Nii-san…what else?”

“What else?” He echoed.

“Something else happened. You look terrible. I could tell something was wrong.”

He was silent, twitching his nose. He could not get away with withholding information for long. Neji elected to be honest, “I have no idea where Tenten is.”

Hanabi set her bowl down on the table, slowly and dramatically. She made a face at him, prying for some kind of elaboration while also making her own assumptions.

Hinata was not yet panicked, “She doesn’t have a mission or-?”

“No activities that I know of. She is nowhere in the village that I’ve checked.”

Hinata pressed, “And she didn’t…”?

“No.” Neji added, “She didn’t tell me or Lee…that she would be gone.”

“You’ve been dumped.” Hanabi emphasized, “She was cool and I liked her. But when Tenten was in this house she checked every room for an exit like she was ready to make a run for it.”

Hinata hissed and swiped at her trouble-making sibling, “Hanabi! You know that isn’t true!”

“No, I don’t know. All we know is that she’s not around, and Neji-niisan is freaking out.”

“Well…”

Hanabi tossed an orange at Neji and it struck him in the clavicle, falling with a dull thud to the table.

“Eat.” She commanded.

Hinata took another corrective swipe at Hanabi.

“You’ll live.” Hanabi encouraged Neji while ducking away from the corrections.

Neji finally spoke again, “After the meeting…I’m going to keep looking for her.”

“I’ll help!” Hinata immediately volunteered.

“Me too, I guess.” Hanabi supposed, starting on a plate of croquettes.

With that settled, and Neji too agitated to try to bring up their great grandfather’s machinations, he took unenthusiastic bites of watermelon. He listened to Hinata’s recollection of her mission, and grew interested when she mentioned a message from Jiraiya.

“Why would he write to you instead of Naruto?” Neji was keen to the change.
“Well…” Hinata wondered how to put it, “Naruto’s training has grown more serious. Gama-sennin hopes that a reduction in communication will distract him less.”

“I don’t see how the occasional letter is a distraction.” Neji gruffed, peeling an orange for himself.

“Depends on what’s in the letter…” Hanabi snarked.

Neji froze and stared in shock at the young girl. What a suggestion. Hinata was slack-jawed as well. After a moment, the two girls reached simultaneously for the fruit bowl in order to begin a tangerine and apple-throwing war. Annoyed, Neji barked at them to knock it off. Hanabi just cackled and wrestled the bowl from her sister, clocking her with an apple as Hinata blocked with her arms.

By some miracle, Kō opened the door of the room and interrupted them, “Eh-hem! My lord and ladies…Hiashi-sama asked that you get to the auditorium early. He expects the forum to be full today.”

“How early?” Hanabi wondered as she put the bowl down.

“Now.” Kō clarified, “This meeting may run long. There are many topics to discuss…” He eyed the mess on the table, “And I hope that you three will have at least settled your differences before you enter that room.”

He chuckled to himself and moved on, leaving the door of the tea room open.

They finished a few last bites before setting out, turning down long hallways towards the large tatami room that connected the Main and Branch houses. On the way, Neji gazed out of windows and watched fierce winds bend and rustle trees outside. It was the kind of overcast day with winds that heralded an approaching summer thunderstorm. The chaotic plinking of wind chimes hung above the outdoor engawa drove Neji mad.

He was supposed to be a genius. He was supposed to figure it all out. How had he come to feel so helpless, so clueless on how to approach these issues? What was the right thing to do? Where was Tenten? How was he supposed to explain to Hinata and Hanabi the duress he was under?

Neji took a deep breath through his nose and resigned to himself, no, maybe he wasn’t so smart. Maybe he was hurting too much to remember how he normally solved problems. Genius is an unfair standard, he thought, when all he wanted was to feel like a person; not the figure on the pedestal or the strongest piece on the chess board.

Maybe this was exactly what Haburo wanted. That he wanted to reduce Neji and make him so emotionally raw that countermeasures could not even come to mind. Neji wondered if he could have ever expected, as a younger man, that he would become so unreliable when his emotions and dreams were crushed.

At the meeting room, Neji followed Hanabi and Hinata to the front where Hiashi was already seated on a cushion on the right side of the room. Slightly beyond was an elevated section of wood flooring where elders would take their seats on zabuton cushions. Branch members filed into the room, chatting quietly amongst themselves, and on the left side opposite of Hiashi and his youngsters, Hikamei, Kayato, and Fujita settled down. The soft din of talk and catching up persisted until all of the Main House elders had arrived.

Hichida, who was the youngest serving member of the clan’s elders, raised his hands to signal the start of the meeting. He glanced over a list in hand, scanning his eyes over the crowd, “No need for role-call with such a full house…and I have nine absences marked for missions…”
“And two out for Intel Corps committee meetings.” Elder Hosuke added in a raspy voice.

“And two more, yes Hikomi and Hasedera…” Hichida marked his list and commented sidelong to his elder companions, “They’re qualified for promotions, no? They’ve been with the Corps for seven years and haven’t been elevated above analyst level. They work much too hard to not be recognized as advisors…”

“We can discuss that when they return, if they would like us to make recommendations.” Haburo offered. His eyes were drooping and he looked uninspired for the meeting.

After that, Haburo called the meeting to order and the agenda was adhered to. Everything was covered: birth announcements, achievements and awards, enrollment at the Academy, annual budget estimates and projects, replanting the back property with trees (that Neji had cut down accidentally with Wind Release), and recognizing the one year anniversary of Elder Hagumi’s death, the only serving female elder in recent years.

It was hard to digest the drivel. Some input from Branch members was much easier on the ears. Neji would have preferred jamming chopsticks in his eyes to gazing upon the line of elders ahead of him, so he stared catatonically at the floor. Near the back of the room, a baby started crying in her mother’s arms. The Branch member smoothly excused herself into the hallway to soothe the babe.

With so many human bodies crammed into one room in summer, it began to warm up uncomfortably as time passed. Neji trolled his eyes to the left, and noticed that Fujita was looking uncharacteristically alert. He seemed healthier and well-dressed. He was probably taking missions again, Neji assumed. He also noticed that beside Fujita, his mother Kayato was seated without her husband. Neji wondered why Hideyasu had not been marked absent at role-call, or if he was expected to arrive late.

Two-thirds of the way through news updates from the Taketori clan, corroborated by a few Branch members as elders Hayama and Hizen covered topics, the side door of the forum slid open. A servant shut it after Hideyasu entered, and the man greeted his elders wordlessly, but caught their attention with a hand gesture. Hichida nodded to him in acknowledgment.

Smiling, Hideyasu sat down beside his wife. Then Kayato started smiling too.

Neji had never seen anything half so strange at a clan meeting. He snuck a look at Hanabi and Hinata seated to his right, who seemed to pay the arrival and facial expressions no mind. They were bored to tears.

When Taketori news was concluded, Hideyasu made eye contact with Hichida and Hosuke, prompting Hichida to speak up, “We move on to acknowledge one final matter before taking questions and adjourning the meeting. Hideyasu-sama and Kayato-sama…” He gestured to the pair seated beside Fujita, “Have an announcement they would like to share with the clan.”

Hinata and Hanabi seemed to wake up a little. They paid closer attention to the clan steward and his family. Beside them, Neji was perplexed.

Hideyasu exchanged a glance with Kayato before turning to Branch members, “As you know, our eldest son died earlier this year...and nothing has been the same since.”

The thing of it was, Hideyasu and Kayato were very popular with the Branch. While most preferred keeping Hiashi at arm’s length, and many had warmed up to Neji and Hinata, Hideyasu commanded most of the Branch’s respect. So it was no surprise when a chorus of sympathy, remembrance, and kind words came back to Hideyasu and he gently tried to quiet down the chattering.
“But we have some good news we would like to share with everyone.” Hideyasu went on, “My wife and I just adopted a child.”

Sympathetic chattering converted into surprised, excited mutters. This was not something that happened; not any more often than a rare, once-in-a-blue-moon occurrence within the Branch, maybe every decade or so. But for it to occur in the Main House was unusual. Many were pleased that Hideyasu and Kayato, who were famously skilled parents, were willing to go at it again.

What Neji found stranger than the announcement itself was Elder Hosuke’s endorsement, “Yes, all of the Hyuga clan has grieved the loss of Hikune, our young lord. We elders can vouch that your parenting,” He was speaking directly to Hideyasu and Kayato, “Will make any child more secure and bring them prosperity. Not since my wife and I took our own oaths to raise two additional boys…there can be no safer haven for children than the Hyuga clan.”

Ah, so, Neji gathered Hosuke must have adopted too at some time in the past. He sort of tuned it out when Hosuke asked Hideyasu if the child had been brought home or was still in the care of a facility. Hideyasu mentioned that if everyone did not mind a few extra minutes in a hot room, he would be happy to introduce the new addition.

Haburo interjected, “That isn’t optional, Hideyasu. Your child is a member of the Main House and must set an example for all of the clan. If the adoptee is present, bring them before us now.”

“Right…” The man rose while Kayato and Fujita stayed seated, watching as he returned to the side door and poked his head out of it. He had a word with someone outside and the attending servant. He took a step back and let a very well-dressed girl enter, making a poised, one-foot-in-front-of-the-other walk to the front and center mats before the elders. Without any cue from Hideyasu as he took his seat again, the “child” sank into a highly formal bow and touched her head to the floor, thanking the elders for receiving her.

There are times when the human mind needs a few additional microseconds to catch up to what the eyes see. This was one of those times.

Neji’s vacant expression was steadfast as he watched the newcomer’s back, rising up to sit on her heels while dressed in white and red cheongsam. The braided buns were familiar, the hues of skin and hair, the approximate height, all familiar—but the statement made by crest of the Hyuga clan embroidered in a circle on the back of the young woman’s dress made no sense. At first.

As Tenten sat there, focusing her attention on Hosuke’s driveling and greetings, Hinata reacted far more (though infinitesimally) than Neji did beside her at the edge of the room. She fidgeted and made a tiny sound, completely bewildered that Hideyasu and Kayato had not only adopted someone who was not an infant, but was also someone she knew incredibly well. Neji was just not processing it. Hanabi pinched his arm discreetly and he gave her his attention.

“Found her.” Hanabi muttered.

Neji did not have the capacity to reprimand Hanabi for the sarcasm. He retreated into his brain where a yes-no flow chart popped up to make step by step sense of what was going on.

Haburo set his eyes on Tenten and made some considerations. He did not question the legitimacy of Hideyasu’s choice or his motivations, but Haburo was not stupid enough to ignore how big of a loophole had been exploited in his mandate because of this occurrence. For the time being, he addressed the young woman with dignity, “Welcome. We elders of the Hyuga clan will recognize you as Hideyasu and Kayato’s daughter, and Fujita’s sister, henceforth.”
“Thank you…” Tenten had her ear trained on Hideyasu a few steps away, and he inaudibly fed her lines, “…Haburo-sama.” Hideyasu gave her a tiny thumbs up, as if she had used the correct name to address the elder.

Haburo turned to Hideyasu and the man seemed to remember himself, “Oh! Yes, Great Elder and everyone-!” Hideyasu addressed the clan as a whole, “This is Tenten, I meant to say. Please accept her and share our ways with her.”

That’s when all Branch members began buzzing at a higher volume. Many people recognized her, and some even knew that she had been a Semi-Finalist at the Exam and was Neji’s teammate. Questions and murmurs abounded.

“Tenten,” Haburo went on, “You shall represent our clan with distinction in everything you do. You shall bring your honorable parents pride and be loyal to the Hyuga clan. Respect our traditions and your elders.” When she nodded and agreed in a small voice, Haburo addressed all other clan members, “Let it be understood that this is a daughter of the Main House. Our Branch members will recognize her legitimacy and call on her as a Lady.” He then motioned dismissively with his hand, signaling Tenten to relocate beside Hideyasu in a free seat.

The elders welcomed her in unison. Only one elder raised a hand to wave frailly at the adopted girl, the 100-year-old, nearly deaf and age-brittle Elder Akataiyo. He was smiling warmly.

“I’ll add her to the roster.” Elder Hichida added as an afterthought, scribbling on his clipboard.

“And pass this update along to our absentee members.” Haburo advised Hichida, then to the clan, “For any questions—”

His voice was drowned out by a clamor as all Branch members stood from their seats and bustled to the front of the room. They paid their elders no mind as they circled ‘round Hideyasu’s family to inquire and congratulate.

With a sigh, Haburo adjourned the meeting and excused himself from the room. The other elders followed suit, evacuating on tired legs and knowing better than to get tangled in the crowd. Their personal introductions could wait.

Neji had come out of the other end of his brain flow chart, trying to answer his own questions. This was intentional. Hideyasu had actively tried to subvert Haburo’s mandate in an effort to give Neji a more suitable option. Haburo was probably aware that this was the scheme, and Neji dearly hoped he would not concoct a new method of retaliation to respond in kind. After overcoming a few seconds of panic about how this development could be thwarted regardless, Neji took a breath.

Kayato and Hideyasu, he realized, quite liked Tenten. The fact that they were willing to adopt her, for his benefit, probably had to do with the fact that they could all get along. Yet the craziest aspect of this conspiracy was Tenten herself, Neji thought as he sat in a stupor. She had not sought him out yesterday to bring any of this up, although now he guessed she had probably been busy preparing. Likewise, he had been unable to explain to her any of the recent events he needed to get off his chest. But why? He wondered why she had agreed to it. On such short notice, bowing her head for one of the most stringent, self-aggrandizing clans in Konohagakure; how had Tenten abided by this adoption knowing full well it would exact a tremendous toll on her?

Hanabi jabbed her elbow in his ribs. He sputtered angrily and rounded on the girl.

“Hello? We’ve been talking to you, Neji-niisan.” Hanabi indicated Hiashi and Hinata were watching him as well, “Dad asked if you are in shock.”
“Is that what this is called?” He blinked slowly.

“It could be. I apologize for not providing you with any warning, Neji.” Hiashi informed him, “But time constraints and your…frequent comings and goings from the house prevented me from bringing it up.”

“Father, why would Auntie and Uncle want to do something like this so suddenly?” Hinata was curious, “Tenten-neesan just had her introduction with us. Did something happen?”

“We can get into the details later.” Hiashi decided as he got to his feet, “When complications made Neji’s request difficult to fulfill, Hideyasu decided there was a more roundabout way to achieve the same result.” He excused himself to go have breakfast and tea.

Hanabi was only partly flummoxed, “I don’t get it, but whatever. Now she’s just going to have to deal with the same headaches we do.” She stood and extended a hand to Hinata, pulling her up, “Tenten will be busy in that swarm of Branch members for a while. Onee-san, come outside with me and let’s get some fresh air.”

While giving Neji a parting look of cautious optimism Hinata asked, “That wasn’t a bad surprise, was it?”

“I…ask me again when I take corporeal form.” Neji recommended.

Neji set aside his stupefaction in favor of rising and trying to covertly muscle in through a wall of Branch members. He gave up after seeing the rest of the clan patiently take turns to meet their newest member. He should wait his turn too. After all, Neji thought, he got to see Tenten on an everyday basis. Letting others get to know her was more important. Neji skirted around to the side of the room and watched the interactions.

Hizome had gotten first crack at congratulating her brother and sister-in-law’s adoption of Tenten. Hikamei stood nearby, silent and impassive, but Hizome closed in to clap Tenten’s cheeks in her hands.

“So now I have a niece!” Hizome crowed, “Very nice to meet you, young lady. I’m Hizome. Hideyasu is my big brother, and Hikamei there is my big sister. Oh and look here— this is my husband, Senju Masanari.” She passed Tenten down the line of people to say hello, “Our sons: Nyozeka, Hirokazu, and Tsukuru. Here’s our cousin Arisu, and over here we have Tokuma, Kei, Hisako, Hatora, Jun, Iroha, Hoheto and there’s Kō…”

The amount of handshaking and bowing was surely going to snap Tenten’s neck, though she pleasantly greeted each person. All seemed surprisingly amicable and interested in her, despite the Hyuga’s reputation stating otherwise. Kayato was bubbly and going on about how nice it was to have a daughter to design things for and talk about girly things with. Many Branch women robustly agreed with the sentiment. Fujita, after escaping Hideyasu’s mirthful introductions, was able to introduce Tenten to many of the children who had pressed forward to get a closer look at her. She was a sensation among curious clan members.

After nearly thirty minutes of salutations, the room was stifling and the crowd began to disperse. Tenten respectfully asked Kayato and Hideyasu to let her have a break outside on the porch. She retreated to the engawa to get a breath of fresh, cool air. The wind whipped her face as it propelled storm clouds overhead.
Tenten exhaled roughly and leaned against a wooden support beam. It was a gauntlet just surviving the welcome, but actually abiding by Hyuga clan standards? ‘I don’t know if I can do it with finesse, but I can give it the old college try…’

She shut her eyes and calmed down. It was only a little insane to agree to all of this. To react to everything she had been told in a single day, and take on such a challenge in so little time. But since everyone had been nice about it so far, that took the edge off. Tenten appreciated that.

Neji slid the door shut behind him when he stepped onto the engawa. Then he stood there and watched Tenten decompress until she noticed and acknowledged him, “Oh, hi Neji! I haven’t seen you in… I don’t know how long.”

He nodded.

“It’s a bit windy today.” Tenten sat down, dangling her legs off the porch’s ledge, “I… uh…” She looked at him and motioned him over, “Come sit down. I just need a few minutes.”

So he did. Neji closed the distance and took a seat beside her, coming to his senses finally. He stared out at the lawn and, ever so slowly, let the corners of his mouth tug into a smile. While he was restless over her absence and what decision he should make, Tenten had been at the estate the whole time. Right under his nose.

“This is quite the undertaking, you know.” Neji told her.

“I know.”

“Do you understand the implications of your fealty to the Hyuga clan?”

“Yup.” She confirmed, “I’m already getting bossed around. I got a spiel about being educated in other traditions… you know, which I’m so good at already. I have to learn about the Caged Bird Seal, since that’s some sick prerequisite for being a part of the Main House. I’ll need to keep up appearances and maintain good relations with other clans. Stuff like that.”

“There is much more than that.” Neji turned toward her, “You will be subject to intense scrutiny and other duties. You won’t be permitted to live outside of the estate.”

“Yeah, Kayato explained that to me. I had no idea.” Tenten’s shoulders drooped, “Hideyasu said I could take my time to pack belongings at home… but I will have to live here.”

“You have to.” Neji did not sound like he was disappointed about it, “But you’ll live in relative luxury.”

“Well, that’s a trade-off, true.”

“You won’t need to bring much with you.”

“For sentimental value, there are some things I don’t want to leave behind.” Tenten disagreed, “So congrats, Neji, you’re hired to help me stuff things into boxes later.”

Neji did not object. He could distantly hear the wind chimes on the far side of the house swirling in the strong breeze.

“…it will be a burden.” Neji aired some of his concern, “On you. All of this will be difficult. I have no idea if I can even… defend you from what influences will try to act on you now.”
“You don’t have to.” Tenten smiled and poked his thigh, “I’m here to defend you. Hideyasu told me about the whole predicament. He said…you wanted to join the Branch Family. There were a lot of reasons why,” She tilted her head back and added, “But I didn’t want to be one of them.”

Staring at her in profile felt surreal, almost as if he was imagining all of it. He had been so caught up in trying to think his way out of a jam; Neji did not notice the rest of his family had been working on solutions to help. Of course they had approached Tenten for assistance. She would be more than willing to stick her neck out for him, even if it meant her routines, environment, and freedoms would be shaken up and turned inside out.

And the mon of the Hyuga on the back of her dress looked like it belonged there. Kayato had seen to that.

“You know what’s embarrassing?” Tenten lowered her voice, aware of how he had laid his hand over hers on the porch, “All of the paperwork. I mean, it was a tall, extensive stack. Signing all of that and then the legal name change…it was downright weird.”

He raised his eyebrows, “Name change?”

“Uh…is it technically a change if my files never included a surname?” She wasn’t sure.

Neji just looked at her as it sunk in that she had taken the Hyuga name.

“Also, Kayato told me not to be too chatty with some Branch members because gossip does spread around here, apparently. Hideyasu said that I can’t act too familiar with you either, at least for now. We can get approval to date, but he asked me to really sell it for your elders. I should act disinterested in you— like this isn’t some big conspiracy.”

His chest hurt a little. While she made remarks about how she had been advised, watching clouds roll darkly overhead, Neji felt a sharp pang of gratitude he had never before experienced.

He had been prepared to sacrifice something he had valued above all else, for so long, because she had surpassed that goal’s value. The fact that Tenten had sacrificed something for him first assured him that he had chosen correctly. Even if he took the rest of his life to thank her, it still wouldn’t feel like enough. Even if Haburo still desired to hurl obstacles at him, and Neji ended up in the Branch anyway for convenience’s sake or sheer insubordination, he would always be thankful for this day.

Tenten cleared her throat. Neji glanced back to her as she gently pushed on his shoulder.

“You’re a little too close. I was told that we’ll be watched for a while, or until I become commonplace around here.” She shimmed for some space, and drew her hand away from him, “Sell it, Neji. I know you’re probably feeling—”

“Happy.” He supplied a word.

“Huh…I was going to say antsy.” Tenten fought a smile, “How about…we talk to a few more people inside? Then, you can show me where my habitation is and where I can find the restrooms. Critical information. Later, we’ll pack up stuff at my flat while you explain what I’m in for.”

“And while off premises there will be no need for us to keep up appearances.” Neji reminded her.

She cheerily agreed, “Absolutely not. I have no intention of keeping my hands to myself while off-site.”

“Neither do I.”
Maintaining an arm’s length distance, they returned indoors as the first heavy drops of a summer storm struck the ground.

Chapter End Notes

You may have noticed the Anchorman (Ron Burgundy), Star Wars (Yoda), and Stranger Things (Jim Hopper) references in this chapter. That merits a double high-five! Clan politics don’t get any easier, but it helps when someone is on your side. A track list for this fic is available on SoundCloud under tigerowl-sensei, see my profile page up top for a link.

I think we got a bit deeper than usual with the Buddhism concepts and very real human emotions that affect landmark decisions. Thanks for taking the ride, Reader

Chapter 42: Blondie Sage (subtitled: A Nine-Tailed Fox Introduces Himself)
While Lee compared one framed team photo from two years ago, and another framed team photo from last year, he held them up to Tenten.

"Neither of these are worth packing." Lee insisted to her, "Neji did not smile in either shot."

"Lee, I've learned to take what I can get." Tenten plucked last year's photo from his hand and placed it in a cardboard box, "He's nothing if not consistent."

"Yes, consistent. Maybe this year he can be persuaded?" Lee wondered and then turned around to ask Neji as he examined two boxes Tenten had so far packed, "Neji, you ought to experience a much greater margin of happiness now that Tenten is a member of your clan. Smile in this year's photo!"

Neji gave him a slanted, I-don't-think-so frown.

"Merely a suggestion." Lee reminded him.

Tenten stopped picking the sitting-room keepsakes in her flat that she would take with her, and rounded on Neji as he began extracting things from the boxes she had organized, "Wha—what are you doing-?"

"You don't need these. You'll have cushions, bedding, and storage at the estate—"

"I'm not leaving that, my mom made it for me." Tenten nudged Neji aside, retrieved the pillow, and returned it to the box, "You don't need to make hyper-logical judgements right now, Neji. If it's too much when I unpack at my new abode then I'll remove superfluous stuff. But I want to keep some things of my parents.' Alright?"

He relented and sealed the container, motioning for Lee to hand over the packing tape.

Lee handed it off and then tapped his chin, "Tenten, you have not yet told me how you came to possess adoptive parents."

"It's not— I...ugh." She sighed and cupped her forehead in her palm, "I don't possess them, Lee. It's more like teamwork. I co-conspired after they explained to me everything that Neji was going through. It's not as if we had plenty of time for heart-to-hearts and bonding."

"But surely they will grow to care for you!"

"Ah...yeah, I hope so..."

"How were you contacted?" Neji wondered, "I couldn't find you anywhere."

"Well..." Tenten took a moment to recall the odd meeting from a day and a half before.

Tenten was both surprised and economically motivated after spotting a gaggle of ninja lined up outside of the Pailü Weapon Shop. Had there not been an assemblage of potential customers, she would have stuck with her original plan to find Neji. He was absent from team training the day before—not that she found this unusual. She'd been rather occupied herself since business had ticked up after the conclusion of the Chunin Exam.

Tenten waved to the customers as she trotted up the sidewalk, and engaged in idle chit-chat as she unlocked, lit up the shop, and assisted them with shopping and questions. All had been served within 40 minutes, and after that the high of making sales and placing orders fizzled and took a nose dive.

She stomped around the place, updated a supply ordering journal, and then greeted a punctual delivery man at the rear of the building to sign for a shipment. Tenten and a Shadow Clone heaved the heavy box inside while the delivery man looked on worriedly. She shut the door on him before a polite 'have a nice day' could be said.

"Neji should’ve told me if he wasn't going to show up." She reasoned with her clone, "I mean, I know I've been busy too, but I went to that fancy dinner and impressed his family. I feel self-conscious when Neji doesn’t come by to say 'everything's fine.' It makes it feel like everything is not fine, you know?"

"Of course I know." The clone agreed. It held the box steady as Tenten tore the wooden plank lid off with a crowbar. The yanking and beating of the box soothed her grumpy disposition.

"I feel awful today." Tenten noted.

The clone pointed her thumb over her shoulder to a wall calendar, and Tenten took a cursory glance at it.

"Oh. Plunging levels of optimism? Craving seaweed? Unusual irritability? Must be your period." Tenten told herself. She tossed the crowbar and it clanged in the periphery of shelving and tool drawers of the workspace. The Shadow Clone flinched.

Tenten picked at the synthetic packing materials of the box and then asked the clone, "Would you please unload these and make sure everything I ordered is accounted for?"

It had little other choice than to nod fearfully in agreement. While it unpacked the order, Tenten picked up a box of antique throwing darts in a "service required" queue, noting the attached message that the small blades were exclusively made for the Shimura clan, and more may be ordered at year's end if she was available to reproduce them.

At the front of the store, Tenten took a seat at the counter and began to polish the darts one by one back to a pristine shine. She had already sharpened them yesterday. She set another Shadow Clone to work sweeping and reorganizing storefront shelves. Tenten worked on a particularly stubborn scuff in the metal of a dart when the work room's clone showed up, reporting, "Look, there was a double-order and we weren't charged for it." It held up an extra package of leather and hilt-making materials.

"Wow, really? That's from the old man's shop in the Land of Rivers. I don't want to short him if he made a mistake." Tenten shooed the clone off, "Mark it down and we'll pay him for it."

The clone resumed work in the back room and the store's door chime sounded. Tenten turned to try to muster a pleasant greeting for the shoppers, even though she was a sore, temporary misanthrope. Except that she gave no greeting at all, because the two standing in the small showroom were not shoppers. Tenten blinked in bewilderment and stopped polishing darts with a fluffy cloth.

Hiashi had a grave look on his face as his eyes trolled back and forth over displays of merchandise.
Hideyasu had taken a few steps past the Hyuga clan head to greet Tenten at the counter, "Good morning, Tenten. Ah, is that a Shadow Clone?" He gestured to the clone dusting signage at the edge of the room.

"Yeah, wuh— um, just trying to keep things orderly…without employees." Tenten curled her lips inward, highly embarrassed. The place was a bit messier than what she'd want to present to any Hyuga clan associates who were not Neji. Also, it was a small, humble store and she felt like Hiashi was inspecting it a little too hard.

Trying not to feel judged, Tenten set the darts down in the storage box, getting a grip on herself, "I apologize. I didn't know that my place of business would be considered—"

"No, no, it's nothing like that." Hideyasu assured her, "Hiashi-sama and I need to talk to you about something wholly unrelated to weapon sales..." He glanced around, "Although the variety in this shop is staggering!"

"Oh, well, this isn't the place to talk. You might start to smell of turpentine and grinding dust…" Scuttling to stand, Tenten motioned to the men, "Would it be alright if…we spoke at my home? It's up the street. I can make tea—"

"Thank you." Hiashi said, "Please forgive this abrupt visit, Tenten."

Tenten assured them it was quite alright, and left her clones behind to clean up. She locked the door behind them and led the way, stiff-backed and uncertain, to the apartment complex up the road, through the vestibule, stairs, and third floor, feeling ashamed as she arrived at the door of her lowly flat. It was pathetic compared the place the men behind her called home.

With little commentary, Hiashi and Hideyasu followed her inside and took seats at the low table she directed them to. Tenten was harebrained while considering how to entertain high-profile guests, and nearly ran around to boil water for tea, and find any loose leaves that were not of overpowering Han flavor; but she wisely set a Shadow Clone about those tasks so she could sit at the table to speak to her visitors.

"This is quite nice." Hideyasu said in reference to her home, with a distinct friendliness that sort of made her relax.

Hiashi was not observing their surroundings. He was looking at Tenten as if her head was about to explode off of her shoulders. By detecting that alarming facial expression, Tenten assumed that the visit presaged bad news.

"I'll have tea ready in a few minutes. Can I ask…? What went wrong?" She directed the question at Hiashi.

Hideyasu sighed heavily and seemed to mope in his seat. Hiashi gave her the update, "We are beholden to the guidance of our clan’s elders …and our elders are directing Neji down a path that does not include you."

"Oh." Tenten could feel a wave of inflammation and cramping assail her body as the words were spoken. And she thought her period was the only bad aspect of this day.

"Hiashi, don't phrase it like that—our elders are shuffling all of us as they see fit." Hideyasu amended, "Quite frankly it's time we put our foot down. Feet down. Well, you understand what I mean."

"Uh." Said Tenten.
"We seek your help." Hiashi elaborated, "But what we would ask you to do is not a foolproof solution, and it will also demand much of your time and effort."

"To help Neji?"

"Yes," Hiashi went on, "Our grandfather, our Elder Haburo, has advised Neji to seek companionship only from eligible Main House members of our clan. That would mean either of my daughters."

"Or my sister." Hideyasu added.

Tenten laid her palms flat on her knees, seated cross-legged on a cushion, "Wow. Is this in response to my introduction?"

"Not exactly. Our grandfather enjoys making demands of us at every meeting we attend, and the subject of the day happened to be his great grandchildren." Hideyasu clarified, "We all have low rates of approval with him."

"I did not discuss Neji's interest in you at all." Hiashi told her, "Which could be to our advantage."

Tenten was listening astutely as her clone set cups and a pot of tea on the table. She poured for her guests as Hiashi went on, "Neji may choose from the Main Family or he may join the Branch Family if he seeks more freedom of choice. As it so happens, we are aware that he intends to join the Branch."

She set tea down in front of the men, "No wonder he didn't speak to me yesterday. I would staunchly disagree with the decision," Tenten raised her eyes to Hiashi, who seemed perturbed, so she went on, "And not because I would begrudge Neji his choices or happiness! His compassion for the Branch means he would have a good life among them, I know it. But I want him to...one day be someone future leaders of his clan look up to. Give guidance that won't hurt his clansmen, but raise them up. I don't want him to give up on that. Not for anything."

Hideyasu shut his eyes and tried to disguise his smile by sipping tea.

"If you feel that way, perhaps it is best you join our scheme." Hiashi took two consecutive gulps of tea, "A relatively harmless one."

"Soundly legal." Hideyasu echoed.

"Scheme is not a term that goes hand in hand with 'legal,' but I will certainly hear you out." She agreed.

"You told me you have been parentless for six years. I also understand that Kayato and Fujita are fond of you," Hiashi brought her up to speed, "To that end, Hideyasu suggested that he adopt you to give you legal status in the Main House, which would allow Neji to choose you under those circumstances."

"Of course we can't rush any arrangements between the two of you, or risk arousing the suspicion of our elders. You see, you would have to convincingly uphold traditions as our daughter. Beginning a courtship with Neji would have to wait a bit longer." Hideyasu talked with explanatory hand gestures, "Kayato thought it was a good idea. She already stopped by the law offices with me for paperwork." He tapped a manila folder on the table top for Tenten to see, "She was eager to sign these so I let her. Fujita is aware too, of course. There are no hard feelings if you're not up for it."

"I...I..." She slid her thumbs along the circumference of her tea cup, astonished.
"It would not guarantee anything," Hiashi warned her, "It would only make you eligible."

"Right."

"But also, consider that this wouldn't be a strict formality—not pure, paper contract stuff. My wife and I would teach you everything we know, if you'd like to learn." Hideyasu tried to soften the hard edges of the offer, "There are advantages to living with the Hyuga clan, no doubt about it! Though…you would also have to give certain things up. There are always trade-offs."

"And if our Elders are overly critical of this arrangement, which they may or may not be…we may all face retribution at a later time." Hiashi also tried to steer clear of the consequences, adding, "But it is legal and can certainly work as a deterrent. You have my word that you and your interests would be shielded to the extent of what law and my influence can allow."

Tenten nodded dizzily, "I understand."

"My, this tea is so unlike what I drink at home. It's different in a good way." Hideyasu noted out loud, "If you are in agreement, Tenten, please bring some of those tea leaves with you. I want Kayato to try this."

"Sure. Yes, I agree. It's called Biluochun." She was snapping out of her thoughts and into reality, "Do we…so what do we do now?"

"Paperwork, and acquiring the appropriate witness." Hiashi informed her.

"After tea we can get a notarization. Then Kayato will help us set up a few things…" Hideyasu checked with her again, "And are you sure about this, young lady? Your integration won't be easy. I can't promise that elders will be fair to you once you join our house."

"Aside from being able to give Neji a modicum of choice…" Tenten wore a far-off look, "It would be nice to have a family again…after being alone for so long."

Even Hiashi was visibly touched by the sentiment, and Hideyasu pursed his lips as he listened to the admission.

Before she could really make sense of the fact that this was happening, and that they had finished their tea and were crossing town as inconspicuously as possible…Tenten was blinking rapidly and taking noisy breaths through her nostrils when they arrived at the administrative building. So much for thinking it over. There was no time for careful consideration. No time to preserve her identity or privacy, or even check in with Neji to tell him to cool it and not make rash decisions. Because she was kind of making a rash decision herself. At least, Tenten thought, the consequences of her choice were not as severe as what Neji could potentially deal with.

At the Legal Bureau of the building, second floor, Hiashi sat down and scared the daylights out of the attorney at the desk who dared question why the Hyuga clan was adopting anyone. Hiashi's glare shut the thin, suited man up. Hideyasu was nicer. He explained that he had already begun preliminary paperwork, he adored kids, Tenten was an orphan, and that he and Tenten got along swimmingly.

"So here we are." Hideyasu concluded.

The attorney did not question it further, though he certainly wanted to. Hiashi's eyes were on him.

"Ah, look, the green 'sign here' stickers are yours, and the yellow stickers are mine." Hideyasu flipped pages, glancing over document sections he had already read, and adding his signature to Hiashi was telling the attorney about some additional agreements from the Hyuga clan that were added to the office's adoption forms. That paperwork would protect Tenten's assets, examine and secure her records, and provide the Hyuga's legal defense team to represent her and things of that nature. When the attorney said it would take his interns about a week to review and process those additional documents, Hiashi corrected him, "It will take them an hour."

"But sir, please try to understand we've been working on several cases—"

"I understand that your office's preoccupation with trivial lawsuits, drafts, and advising are not as urgent as this matter the Hyuga clan needs fulfilled." Hiashi spoke over him, ignoring Tenten's look of concern from her seat on Hideyasu's opposite side. "Unless you would like a representative of mine to go over it with you?" By representative he was indicating Hyuga Arisu, who was not a very friendly lawyer-nin and took on projects with Maito Ken from time to time. So this particular office was already well aware it did not want to tango with her unless absolutely necessary.

The man at the desk reached with a few fingers and pulled back the folder to examine the documents, "...an hour."

"Ah, there," Hideyasu traded his pen to Tenten, "Your turn, young lady."

"Um. Your clan has...a legal team?" She began to slowly add her given name to blank spaces.

"It has everything." Hideyasu informed her, "Our diversity of skills comes from making good matches and arrangements with other clans and interests. Our legal representatives are sagacious and among the best in the village."

"Though they are predisposed to have hawkish interpretations of Law." Hiashi added.

"Arisu charges quite a lot per hour, for those outside of the Hyuga." Hideyasu noted, unwrapping a hard candy from a bowl on the attorney's desk, "But clan members get a much better rate. Sometimes even her pro bono hours."

"Did she write any of the-?"

"Let's not implicate her in this." Hiashi recommended.

"Hm." Tenten continued signing, thinking it over, "Kayato has...a successful apparel business. And other members of the Hyuga clan...have trades and skills?"

"Yes, of course."

"Would my business...benefit from Hyuga contacts?" Tenten wondered.

"I had a few vendors in mind who would like to partner with you." Hideyasu assured her.

She smiled a little and started signing faster.

Hiashi advised, "Let's not get too far ahead of ourselves. There are still obstacles we must be ready for."

When Tenten concluded signing, she turned to Hideyasu and accepted the candy he handed to her, "I feel like I should shake your hand, like this is some kind of deal."

"You can if you want to." Hideyasu told her.
When they tried to shake, Hiashi got annoyed and disrupted it, "Children and their parents do not shake like business partners."

"Hiashi, as you are not an immediate member of my family, don’t claim to know about my family’s handshakes. Fujita and I still have a secret shake from when he was young." Hideyasu chuckled playfully. Hiashi may have rolled his eyes, but he was turned away from Tenten so she couldn’t see it.

When they rose and gathered paperwork that the coerced, suited attorney was not reviewing, Tenten followed the men to the third floor and realized, by the heavens, she and Hideyasu probably had the same sense of humor. She could not yet confirm it, but she suspected it. Time would tell.

She was somewhat surprised and also not surprised when they knocked on the door of the Hokage’s office. A shout sounded, "Did I summon you for a briefing? If not, get lost."

Hideyasu exchanged frazzled looks with his companions and called back through the door, "My lady, it’s a rather important—"

"Don’t make me repeat myself. No frivolous requests. I’m having a bad morning. Come back tomorrow."

"Hyuga Hiashi wishes to speak with you." Hiashi said.

After a pause, "Fine."

Hideyasu led the group inside and they noticed the aftermath of what looked like a tall stack of correspondence had toppled off of the Hokage’s desk. It was scattered all over the floor like a papery throw rug. The office window behind Tsunade and to the left was broken, as if a projectile had crashed through it. On the far side of the room, a softball sat guiltily in the corner. Tsunade had pressed a healing hand to the back of her head.

"Some sporting idiot made an inadvertent attempt on my life." She grumbled to them, "What’s this about?"

Tsunade stopped and did a double-take at those assembled, repeating, "What is this about? Who died?"

"No one died, Hokage-sama." Tenten was half concerned, "Are you alright? Is Shizune-san—?"

"No, no, I sent her to apprehend the idiot with the bat outside." Recuperated, Tsunade laid her hands on her desk and laced them, "Naturally I have to ask what you are doing with the Head and Steward of the Hyuga clan, Tenten."

"Paperwork." She said truthfully.

"Huh." Tsunade pouted her lips and regarded them, pointing to the scattered correspondence, "Tenten, be a dear and pick all of that up for me, will you? Hiashi." Her tone grew sterner, "What sort of paperwork is she talking about?"

"I would like you to be a witness to Hideyasu’s adoption of this young woman." Hiashi clarified it for her.

The Hokage leveled her gaze on Hideyasu, who was trying to crunch the last of his hard candy in his teeth. Eventually he stopped chewing since he’d been put on the spot, "It’s true, my lady. Kayato and I agreed to adopt Tenten. Because the Hyuga clan will need a credible witness to approve of it, Hiashi and I felt that we would need the oversight of the most credible witness in Hidden Leaf."

"That's comical." Tsunade said dryly, "I'm seeing double right now and you want me to witness something such as this."

"Our elders don't need to know that you had a head injury at the time of this notarization." Hiashi assured her.

"I suppose they don't." She ushered them towards her desk, holding her hand out for the documents. Tenten watched from where she was crouched on the floor, scooping up leaflets and letters.

"I would like to point out the elephant in the room." Tsunade added drolly as she carefully flipped pages, "That Hyuga Neji is, to my knowledge, extremely attached to this young woman. You two are not unaware of this?" She asked Hiashi and Hideyasu.

"We are well aware."

"Why complicate the matter by bringing her into your clan?" The Hokage asked, her eyes pointed downward as she read.

"It will actually simplify the matter." Hiashi replied, "Neji has been subjected to a mandate that restricts him from looking outside of the Hyuga clan for a companion."

Tsunade froze, "Oh. " The realization of what was going on became evident by her morphing facial expressions, "Oh, oh, oh ... I see. So you two, of the Main House, are exercising what control you can to negate this circumstance. And Tenten, are you sound of mind in agreeing to this?" She asked the kunoichi who had stood and set papers on her desk, "You will be subject to their venom when you are legally bound to their clan. Elders never like to be made fools of."

"I know what I'm agreeing to." Tenten said, even though she really meant she understood about thirty percent of what she was agreeing to.

"This reeks of conspiracy." Tsunade turned to the last page of the packet and fished around her drawer for an official seal, "And I'm none too fond of putting my hand on the chopping block for signing anything that could cause your elders to call council...and take issue with this adoption or its motivations in a village forum." She gave a sharp look to Hiashi, "Yet you are confident enough to endorse this, Hiashi?"

"No harm will come to anyone here." He said with certainty, "Not so long as we can argue that this is in compliance with rules the Hyuga clan has set, and we abide by those rules."

"Then you had better be able to argue it." She warned, "Very well, I press this stamp and it's done. Then you navigate the legal minutiae and do it wisely. Though, if I'm going to take on a small degree of risk in doing this then I want some incentives."

Hideyasu plopped 15 Ryo on the Hokage's desk, "The bureau downstairs said that is the fee for the Hokage's notarization—"

Harried, Tsunade flicked the paper notes aside, "Don't listen to the bureau, the bureau makes up prices because it has to! I don't want you to buy me a soft drink with those notes, not for my troubles — you had better remember the Hyuga clan owes me a favor when I next call on them."

"We will remember." Hiashi gave the concession.

"Also, any parties like the one you hosted after the Tournament, I am always welcome to join."
"You were never unwelcome." Hideyasu pointed out.

"If that is so then kindly give me a head's up." Tsunade demanded.

Hideyasu felt that was fair.

"And if there is a wedding and it's a big elaborate affair I am also invited." Tsunade added, "Because I am setting this up I refuse to be excluded."

Tenten stood there feeling supremely awkward in response to how the Hokage was nosily investing herself in the possible outcomes. She had always admired and respected Tsunade, looking to her as an example of how to comport herself as a shinobi. When Tsunade looked at her she saw the means to live vicariously and decadently through Tenten's life and career. What an odd reciprocal.

The Hokage pressed her seal down on the page and dated it. With that done, she nonchalantly extended the papers to Hideyasu and he gratefully accepted them.

"If anyone ends up dead or calamity ensues because of this adoption and its ripple effects," Tsunade cautioned them, "I will be putting the three of you in jail first."

"And that," Tenten concluded for Lee, "Is how I got a new set of parents."

"A fascinating tale." Lee nodded.

Neji was digesting the retelling of Tenten's experience, opening a new cardboard box to be filled, "I still don't understand why none of my relatives told me they were planning this."

"Because we were concerned that you would think it was crazy and tell us not to." Tenten explained, "And if you were aware of it, it wouldn't look like a genuine, independent decision at the clan meeting, remember? Your expression that morning was—" Tenten imitated the look of surprise she had seen on Neji's face, "You obviously had nothing to do with it. That would clear you with the elders."

He conceded, "I suppose it would."

"Oh, Tenten, you said the Hokage had been hit in the head by a softball before she notarized the contract." Lee quoted part of her story, "Do you think she will remember what she agreed to, or is she still suffering from a head injury?"

"I certainly hope she remembers." She took the box Neji handed her, "Or our next mission assignment is going to look really weird when she sees my profile's updates…"

Tsunade had no such trouble with her memory or higher functions that day. She was an adept healer, after all. Her head was in perfect working order.

Maybe she should have questioned Tama's decision to keep her surgery election secret from everyone except her mother and sensei, but she went ahead and assigned Sato's team a mission anyway, sending him off without a word on the matter. Tsunade expected he would have said his farewells to Tama before the mission, and that contact would have sufficed for her.

It was a bit of an odd assignment though, sending Sato and Shino off with Sai as a substitute. Hinata had been tending to a clan obligation, and Tsunade figured that since the hiring client was investigating fraud at an art auction, maybe Sai would be a valuable addition? 'Or he'll be a social hindrance.' The Hokage admitted to herself. Sato and Shino would just have to deal with it. Sai was on temporary leave from ANBU to learn how to integrate more with 'the public' of the village. Tenzo had reported his need for improvement in this respect.

Later that morning, Tsunade steeled her nerves and joined a few experienced medic-nin in the OR to perform Tama's procedure. By early afternoon, surgery wrapped and Tsunade was rather pleased with herself that the kunoichi's extensive injury was, for the most part, reversed. She had not died on the table as Tsunade had imagined in an anxious daydream, perhaps because Tama and her ilk preferred dying on missions and not in hospitals.

At that point in the day, both Sakura and Hinata were available for post-op assistance, and Tsunade directed them about tasks and checks that would ensure Tama's safety during recovery. Sakura was concerned that Tama was taking quite a while to wake up from the fog of anesthesia, but Tsunade waved it off as her teammate was wheeled into the recovery room. "Be attentive, watch her vitals." The Hokage recommended, "And don't imagine things are going wrong when they aren't."

While Sakura took a few notes and glanced at the bedside monitor, Hinata stared out of the room's window while in thought. Tsunade watched the girl space out and cleared her throat, catching her attention.

"Hinata, you've been quite occupied with your clan lately. There's no need for you to oversee anything else." Tsunade recommended, "Go home. Relax for now. Your team should be back in two days, and Sakura can look after Tama."

"But Hokage-sama—"

"That's enough for today." The Hokage repeated, strolling out of the room. She had to inform Kakashi and Miako that Tama was doing well.

Sakura gave a shrewd look to her friend when they had some privacy, "Hinata…I've heard a rumor things got crazy in your clan?"

"Oh it's not a rumor, it's true." Hinata sighed and sat down on an upholstered bench, "Tenten-nee-san was adopted by the steward of the Main House. Neji-niisan and I were shocked, but now I understand why it was arranged."

"That's just— that, how-?" Sakura flapped her arms at her sides, "You'd think something like that would be redundant when Neji can just, you know, get married to her? That's usually how it's done."

"It isn't that easy. Our great grandfather prohibited him from looking outside of our clan for a spouse." Hinata rested her chin on her hands, leaning on her knees in contemplation, "It made Onii-san so upset that he did not tell anyone about it."

Sakura shook her head, pulling an extra blanket over Tama, "Stone cold crazy. I don't know how I would have reacted to that either."

"Me neither," Hinata agreed, "Uncle Hideyasu is very kind and wanted to help, and Tenten agreed to do it. I think Neji-nee-san may feel some relief knowing that there is still a way…"

"I doubt that'll be easy either, but it's pretty interesting." Sakura admitted, "I can't wait to talk to Tenten about it later and get details for Ino."

Hinata was staring at the wall again.

"Hinata?"
She blinked and gave Sakura her attention.

"Is everything okay? You've been a little…out of it, lately." Sakura pointed out, crossing the room to stand near her friend, "How is Naruto?"

"I..." Her voice wobbled, "I don't know."

"You don't know? You talk to him all of the time." Sakura raised her brows.

Hinata released the dam of concern she had held in for a total of 60 hours since she had returned from her last mission, "I was on a mission two and a half days ago and then when we finished our work in the Tea Country and made camp a toad—"

"Slow down—" Sakura braced her friend's shoulders as Hinata continued without drawing a breath.

"Brought be a message from Gama-sennin, and he said that Naruto-kun turned into a statue while he was meditating and I was scared, so I contacted Gama-sennin with Samanvaya and he said that Naruto-kun was fine but I shouldn't distract him so—"

Sakura had pressed a finger to Hinata's lips, "Easy there. I got all of that. But try to breathe, okay?"

Hinata nodded and Sakura withdrew her hand, "Phew. I'm sorry Sakura-chan. I just can't believe it. I don't want to distract Naruto-kun and endanger him during Sage Training…but I want to know how he is doing.

"Well, I bet you can ask Gama-sennin with...uh...what's it called?"

"I spoke to Gama-sennin the other day, he said I could... He suggested we call my technique Samanvaya because I can synchronize to overlap body and mind." She tapped her fingers on her knees, "He said it's a concept from Sage teachings."

"Cool." Sakura rested her hands on her hips, "I'll remember that. Have you ever tried to use different jutsu with your Misago Byakugan?"

"I get nervous. I'm afraid of what might happen." Hinata wilted, "But maybe sometime I should try."

"Sometime, but not today." Sakura recommended, helping her friend to her feet, "Why don't you get some rest for now? I'm going to monitor Tama until Tsunade-sama assigns me something else."

"Alright..."

"If you're free in the morning we can meet up and do something! Before our mission assignments."

Hinata liked the sound of that. She left the hospital and returned home, feeling a bit glum that Neji and Hanabi were out for the day, for training and schooling, respectively. 'Neji-niisan said he was going to help Tenten start packing her belongings too... Hinata recalled. She was not inclined to garden at home since the ground was still muddy and oversaturated from a recent thunderstorm.

At the Hyuga estate, she tried not to think about Naruto and kept herself heavily occupied. She slipped through Jyukken forms in the quiet pebble courtyard. Later, after socializing with a few Branch members, Fujita noticed her from a window and called her inside, "Oh, Hinata-sama, would you mind helping my mother and I with something?"

She followed him indoors, "You don't have a mission, Fujita?"

"Not today. Mom and I are trying to get things organized for Tenten." He restrained a childish smile,
"There isn't any space for her on the second level of the house."

"No?" Hinata was curious about that. Most of the Main Family had their personal quarters upstairs, with the exception of a few Elders, Hiashi, and Neji on the first floor.

"Yeah, I mean, Mom and Dad didn't really think through where they were going to put a new kid. My big brother's room was left alone out of respect, plus we kind of use it like another kamidana." Fujita explained on the way down the first floor corridor, "So Mom is trying to fix another room that Elder Hichida said we could use."

They stopped at what was categorically a closet: 3.5 by 3.5 meters in dimension, windowless, and stuffed with filing cabinets and other office paraphernalia.

"Elder Hichida recommended this space?" Hinata murmured.

"Yeah. Mom moved most of the important paperwork and stuff to storage out back…but she wanted me to move the heavy cabinets." He turned to her with a sigh, "It won't be a very good room even when we empty it out."

"Onee-san won't mind it," Hinata supposed, "But I mind. This doesn't reflect the respect our elders should have for her. She is entitled to something comfortable."

"I know, and the tatami mats in here look like they were ruined a while ago…stains and breaks…"

Hinata huffed.

"We could…clear out Hikune-niisan's room. If Mom and Dad don't protest." Fujita suggested, "He would have totally be fine with it. He really liked Tenten-neesan."

Hinata made a point not to comment on the subject beyond recommending, "Let's not tamper with his room. I'll ask around."

So Fujita carefully moved what pieces he could into the hallway, and on the far side of the house Hinata politely asked elders Hayama and Hizen if there were any other spaces to accommodate their new addition.

The old men were somewhat apologetic, "Terribly sorry, dear. Hiashi-sama has more space than he really needs, he's said, and Hikune's room is unused, but we need to make do with what we have." Hizen added, "It'd be difficult to move everyone around. The corner room on the second floor would be an option if you and your sister shared a room, but I don't think that's wise," Hinata thanked them and took a look around anyway.

She returned to Fujita and determined that the closet was all there was. Fujita reminded her it was in fact a bedroom used by Elder Hagumi before she passed away. After her death it had been filled up with odds and ends. It took hours to move heavy objects and small pieces of furniture.

Kayato returned to examine the tatami mats on the floor, frustrated with their terrible condition.

"Children, whenever there's an ink spill like this on your tatami mats, make sure you take the proper steps. Step one: lay down flour to absorb liquid, step two: vacuum," Kayato began pulling up the mat sections, "Step three: flip them over and see how the mats still look unsightly. Step four: give up. There's no salvaging anything this damaged."

"Mom, you might as well convert step four into step one." Fujita was amused.

"Might as well. Come here you two, help me throw these out."
Luckily the house was well updated, and the cedar wood floor beneath the mats was in acceptable condition. An area rug would do the trick for the interim, since, as Kayato voiced her opinion on it, "Tatami mats are my worst nightmare. I don't want to put any more in that room if we can avoid it." She wanted to clean up the space to pristine condition and let Tenten decide how to personalize it. It would not need paint or drastic repairs. Kayato was aware that Tenten was a relatively low-maintenance individual.

And they moved, cleaned, and rearranged things until the closet/bedroom was almost habitable. Kayato was still not completely satisfied with it, but shooed the children along to prepare for dinner. They would finish it another day.

When Hinata joined her father, sister, and Neji for an evening meal, she was mildly surprised that Tenten had joined her adoptive family on the other side of the house to eat. Neji indicated that he and Tenten made a point not to mingle while in the house. Until they had express permission to spend time together, even Hiashi agreed that they maintain some distance. After dinner, Tenten would likely return to her flat. It would be a few days until her space in the Main House was ready.

The notion stuck with her. All through dinner, cleaning up, and then doing needlework in her room as night fell; Hinata sat wearily and thought how distance from Naruto was a good thing. It was going to help him and prevent further accidents. She changed into her pajamas and tried not to sulk, 'I shouldn't bother Gama-sennin too much...and if I write a letter to Naruto, I don't want all of these feelings cluttering the page.' She flopped on her side on the bed, her knitting project dangling from her hand.

Something like this should be easy. It was straightforward and logical to not jeopardize the man she cared about, certainly not after he'd had a close call already. Missing him was not reason enough to reach out, no matter how intensely the tightness in her ribcage and throat felt. No matter how much she envied Neji being near his treasured one regularly, or when her kunoichi friends discussed dates and experiences so casually. She had waited for so long, and it felt unnatural to stay away from Naruto.

Hinata turned over and snapped her lamp off, morosely pulling her blanket over her head. 'I am. I'm so jealous of all of them. I almost don't care how hard Naruto is training, or what he needs to do. I just want him home.' She curled up in a ball, 'I've worked hard and I've been patient. Maybe I shouldn't feel so entitled, but I don't want to stay away.'

Well. Hinata considered another angle. Jiraiya had not wanted her to divert Naruto's attention away from his studies, but what if she didn't engage? What if she covertly stole the glimpse of Naruto she wanted? He could not come to harm if he wasn't aware she had dropped in.

Rational thought suffered a little as the clock ticked ever closer to midnight. Hinata laid awake with her eyes shut, debating with herself if there was an ethics breach in going against what Jiraiya had specifically asked her not to do...because she thought it was possible to circumvent risk. But she felt tired and impatient, so Hinata reached with her Kekkei Genkai and cautiously tapped into Naruto's mind in the Toad Valley.

As luck would have it, all was dark and still while he slept. Short of jarring him awake, Naruto would be none the wiser about her presence. 'There. I shouldn't be disappointed. He's safe and comfortable.'

By the feel of it, Naruto was spread-eagle on his futon and mashing a pillow to the side of his face while asleep. Hinata resisted the need to giggle.

Then, an unusual feeling made her less aware of Naruto's external senses, and she turned inward curiously. The lone plop of a droplet of water somewhere had caught her attention. Such was not a typical feature in a person's mind or body, Hinata wagered. In the dark of thought and internal sense, she wandered a little.

Away from physical sight and senses, it was bewildering to detect the mental terrain—a narrow corridor, so dim, and its floor flooded with a thin sheet of water. A path less traveled in the mind delivered her to the end of the narrow space, and it opened into a wide, yawning cavern, torches lit by human spirit, barely warding off the dark. When she stepped, ripples raced over the watery floor's surface.

'I'm still with Naruto, I think.' She wondered to herself, 'I don't know if this is a dream. Can I visit a dream?'

She surveyed the unusual surroundings and judged that it was some part of the unconscious mind. It was curiously well-defined and structured. Not like her colorful, surrealist dreams that siphoned abstracts from her imagination.

Hinata stood still and looked down at her feet, watching as a ripple of water rolled toward her. ‘...I didn't do that.’ She looked ahead, squinting in the dimness, treading closer to the end of the atrium that arranged its features into the gigantic, towering bars of a cage. Within the prison it was dark and unknowable, but she peered interestedly at it anyway.

Then a sound came. A deep, reverberating voice. Hmf. It said, Little snoop.

The words stopped her in her tracks. It was completely unlike Naruto's voice. Hinata was certain that by using the Misago Byakugan's Samanvaya she could not have mistaken her target, but intuition screamed at her, alarm bells blared that this consciousness speaking to her was not Naruto's. She glanced around, alone in the dim, watery space, and tried to work up the courage to move. A rush of fear rattled her. She was being watched.

Hinata spoke in a whisper, "Naruto…?"

Silence endured. Mustering the nerve, she proceeded toward the bars. As she drew closer, a presence within the dark of the prison became more noticeable. Though she couldn't see it, there was a volume that displaced everything around it. It exerted pressure on the environment. She could hear slow breaths being sucked past the teeth of what waited behind the bars.

"I am…looking for Naruto." She kept her distance and tried to steady her quaking knees.

There was no answer.

"I didn't make a mistake. I know I'm with him." Hinata clasped her hands, "Is this a place only my technique can find? Who is talking? Is-?"

Hush. The voice gruffed, You are not so unique. Others could find their way here if they have enough insight. This construct is only a seal. It isn't a physical place.

She was stunned and lost her voice. She was awake. It was real. Something was talking to her. Something self-aware and not a figment of her imagination could speak out from the dark.

Hinata heard a rumbling, throaty sound as the caged occupant took stock of her, Hmm.

She back-pedaled a few steps, considering it was best to make a hasty exit. The trouble with using jutsu through the Misago Byakugan, she had known for a while, was how little she understood of the boundaries she tested. It was always difficult to tell if she was in imminent peril or not. 'But then, if Naruto is here in a place like this…or if this is a seal…' She wondered to herself, 'Is he unsafe?' And that thought stopped her. She did not try to flee with a shriek, or scurry quietly back the way she came.

Daughter of the Hyuga. The voice recognized her, Don't you find this cozy?

"...w-where is this place?"

This is Naruto's subconscious.

Hinata muffled a small gasp. She had arrived as intended, even if this was not what she expected. She was calming down a little, edging closer to the bars and the massive presence.

"...I'm Hinata."

I know who you are.

"Because…Naruto knows who I am?"

Hmf. An annoyed grunt.

Within arm's reach of the bars, Hinata stopped and asked, "Who are you? Why are you with Naruto?"

The introduction sounded like a low roll of thunder, I am Kurama. I've always been with Naruto. And before that, Kushina. And before that, Mito…

She wasn't sure what to make of the statement.

You are meddling in things you don't understand. Kurama warned, shuffling around in his prison as if turning away from her, Now go.

"But I want to understand. I don't know what my jutsu can do yet, this hasn't happened before…"

In the dark, Kurama harrumphed.

"Are you a part of Naruto's imagination?"

Annoyed and distant, No.

"This seal looks like a prison."

He responded with a resigned growl of acknowledgment.

"Do you get lonely here?" Hinata asked.

"Have you ever spoken to—?"

Kurama interrupted to mock her, You, small daughter of the Hyuga, don't you have better things to do? I know your sort. You slap the Caged Bird Seal on the heads of toddlers and create strife on councils.
Astonished, she angrily rebuked the claim, "I don't! I would never do that!"

Then what do you do?

She had to navigate feelings of defensiveness and curiosity as the speaker, Kurama, could not make up his mind to send her away or provide an ice-breaker for conversation.

"I…um…well, I'm a shinobi."

You and everyone else around here. He sniffed, unimpressed.

"I was promoted recently, and my teammates are Chunin-level like me." She fiddled with her hair and added, "When we don't take missions together I like to garden or make salves. I've gotten good at knitting. I can cook too. I like to wear sweatshirts when it's cold out. I spend a lot of time with my family and friends…I don't ever try to hurt others or make life harder for them."

The growling presence had gone quiet, and Hinata took that to mean it was done with this exchange. When nearly a minute had gone by, she began to make her way back through the atrium towards the narrow path she had arrived on. She would go home and not think too much about the rude personality lurking in Naruto's subconscious.

The floor's water was jostled, and the heavy sound of the cage's occupant brushing the bars caught her attention, Stop.

Hinata looked over her shoulder, wary.

It does get lonely. He admitted in a small voice, I've gotten used to it.

She turned to face the prison and was moved by the truth in the specter's voice. Hinata trotted back, and then watched in mild alarm and fascination as what appeared to be a large claw reached through the space of the bars. It stopped harmlessly near her.

No one really cares that I exist, or that I too want fresh air and light.

"There, there..." Hinata patted the gargantuan claw, not sure of what it was attached to.

Why do I long for you so? Kurama wondered, You feel like Father did...vast but small. Like there is peace.

"Oh. Peace is a good thing." She kept patting, "One of my favorite things."

It is because you are like Moon Brother.

Hinata stopped for a moment and considered that maybe she understood more of this than she realized. If she took a wild guess—a shot in the dark—she might claim that her disjointed 'Reflection Buddy' could be this 'Moon Brother' that Kurama spoke of. Not that she could get absolute confirmation beyond the feeling in her gut.

"I think I know about that. My clan reveres the sun, but for some reason...I do look to the moon often."

Kurama asserted, That is only natural. Half of your ancestors went there, to watch things from their bridges and gardens on the moon. The others, the Hyuga, they stayed behind to defend the lands under the sun.
"Oh!" She was intrigued and smiling, "You know quite a lot of history!"

I'm old enough to know it. An amused chuckle.

"You are called Kurama."

Don't wear out the name. Or do. Hardly anyone uses it.

Hinata made a few observations, "You remember things from long ago, and you must be...quite big."

The word huge wouldn't offend me.

"Are you a Tailed-Beast?" Hinata asked astutely, "My friend once told me about—"

I don't want to discuss that. He drew back into the dark, Are you...? Maybe you are trying to trick me.

"I don't know anything about you. I don't know why you are a part of Naruto." She reasoned, "But I wouldn't hurt or trick anyone."

Maybe. Kurama conceded, Maybe you can't harm me with those little hands. But you can leave us in the dark. Then I'd hate you. I'd find a way to hate you... With a protesting shake of her head, Hinata stood by her assertion, "I wouldn't do something like that!"

I am always left behind. No one ever cared what I thought. And you're just here to look for Naruto... Kurama growled, Well? Naruto isn't here! How would it feel if he forgets about you? Or if he leaves you? The agitated voice threatened, What if I made him do it?

She slammed the heel of her hand against a prison bar, distraught, unwilling to stand by and take abuse aimed straight at her insecurities. "Stop saying cruel things when I've done nothing to warrant them!"

Then, a huge, red eye opened directly in front of her, attached to a vaguely furry, ginger face in the dimness. Kurama warned her, Don't hurt me. Don't make me upset. I can take everything away, just you wait and see.

"I don't know what it is that you want." Hinata squeaked in frustration, "Do you want me to return here? To talk about things? Or should I never come back?"

After a long pause, the prisoner cooled off again, You should return.

"If that's what you want, then mind what you say." Hinata scolded, "If you feel hurt, you don't need to make others feel just as bad."

If I don't do that, then you will come back. Kurama reasoned, I want to feel moonlight again.

"Then I will. I have a mission tomorrow that will take a few days." She reached into the dark and patted fur that may have lined the underside of an enormous animal chin, "I can visit when I finish my mission. I'm not supposed to bother Naruto...but I can drop by at night."

Doesn't it matter to you that I am not human? The large eye rolled down to look at her, Don't you see these bars imprisoning me? I could be very bad, you know.

"I don't think you are." She said with a degree of certainty, "But I've not yet gotten to know you. I will tell you what I think once I have learned enough."

There was a great rumbling sigh from the dark, and Hinata rather amicably retreated. She returned down the flooded corridor from whence she came, drifting back into the dark, hazy fabric of the mind; Naruto's mind and her own.

And when the Samanvaya link expired, Hinata found she was still safely curled up in bed. She pulled her blanket taught around her frame, considering how she had learned that her ancestors had, long ago, made a choice between serving under the sun or the moon. She had also had a conversation with a being in Naruto's subconscious, and that being’s mood turned on a dime, particularly prone to being jilted or ignored.

Maybe it was another personality. Maybe it was a complex figment of her imagination. Maybe it was a great chakra beast that had been sealed inside of Naruto. Hinata pressed her hands to her forehead, thinking back to Sakura's discovery in the Star Village. Her friend's findings seemed increasingly relevant, though Hinata still doubted the credibility and reality of what she thought she saw. If she had not imagined or dreamt it, then perhaps she had come across something she was not supposed to know?

Hinata rolled over and tucked her hands under her chin. It took a long time for her to fall asleep.

In the morning, Naruto followed Shima around the yard and helped clip laundry to drying lines. He munched on a mango and conversed with her.

"Does being married for so long get annoying after a while?" He wondered.

"Well, we don't pay much mind to anniversary dates anymore." Shima conceded, "I'd say it's about as annoying as it was when I first met Pa, as a young toad. Our quirks didn't change much over time."

She handed Naruto a corner of a sheet to hang while she stood on a stool, "Naruto-boy, the truth is that years seem to slip by. We've been busy and we try to have fun. There's no need to count days or years, and no need to count mistakes or fights." Shima tittered, "I still like him! I really do."

"Phew." Naruto said half to himself. He'd been thinking about these sorts of things.

"Pa and I make a point not to get angry at each other these days." Shima explained, "We know we can't last much longer in this world at our ages. We don't want to have regrets about how we treated each other."

"That's really nice, Ma." Naruto said with a mouthful of fruit.

They finished laundry and then set out down the mossy path toward the Toad Oil Pool. It was Shima's turn to supervise his training. On the way, she talked about becoming a young mother to a small girl toad, Hazumu, and how she and Fukasaku had handled their daughter's Sage Training long ago.

"It was different from how we trained Kinji. We treated her so delicately...always worrying about her...it wasted a lot of time when we distracted Hazumu with our safeguards." Shima remembered, "She would have done fine without the coddling. She completed her training."
"Hey, how come I haven't met her?"

"She died, Naruto-boy." Shima told him, "Hazumu was summoned to war long ago, to fight for shinobi we were contracted with."

"Oh." Stiff-backed, Naruto set his mango down on the grass and stopped at the yard entrance, "…I'm sorry, Ma."

"Don't be. Hazumu always fought bravely." Shima was not ruffled by the memory, "Pa and I only wish she survived long enough to meet Kinji." She hopped up the steps of the pool, "Come now, Naruto, let's get you patted down with oil."

He removed his shirt and proceeded with the routine. Naruto twitched his nose and watched Shima from the corner of his eye, taken aback by a new emotion. It was one thing to lose friends or parents, but imagining the pain of burying a child had never occurred to him. He took a seat on the stone step as Shima scooped Toad Oil over his shoulders.

"Ma?"

"Yes, Naruto-boy?"

"Is that part of the reason…why you don’t count fights or mistakes?” He wondered, "Not to…dwell on regrets?"

"My daughter is part of the reason." Shima sighed softly, "In life, it's so easy to complain and struggle…and move so quickly that we forget to treasure what is most important to us." She rubbed his arms thoroughly, "But Naruto, I swear…days like today were her favorite days. A good breeze…and the hibiscus that bloomed outside of the house this week, did you see them? She always planted those flowers to attract hummingbirds. I think of Hazumu on summer days and feel…a little bit better."

"Hm." He smiled a little.

"So if I tell you that it's a 'Hazumu day,' you will understand." Shima chuckled, "Pa will be surprised that you know what it means."

"It is a nice day..."

After that, Naruto set to work. Maybe he should have felt a shred of trepidation while resuming the collection of Natural Energy that had petrified him days ago, 'But today I think I know my limits better than ever!' He felt great. The valley was a blinking disco-ball of energy, movement, and creation. Chakra of creatures great and small, of all ages and dispositions…Naruto could feel them with a new sense that was far more acute than the feeling of touch his skin knew.

For most of the morning, he toured the valley with that sense, carefully extracting Natural Energy, letting it swirl with his own chakra reserves. 'I could do this anywhere now. Huh, I remember that guy I dreamed about. He was meditating in the stone field…I bet I could too. I wonder if Ma and Pa knew him?' Naruto noticed he had left his no-mind state and was actively thinking to himself. He was also feeling strangely peppy.

"Naruto-boy!" Shima shrieked, hopping up from her seat in the grass.

He opened his eyes and blinked at her, only just noticing a flock of sparrows that were gathered peacefully on his head and shoulders. Shima bounded up the steps toward him, laughing merrily. She clapped Naruto's arm, "You've done it! Look at you!"
"Look at what? Me-?" He was a bit confused. He wondered if there were streaks of bird crap all over him again.

"Child, you've achieved balance! I can see it from the marks on your face!" Shima crowed, bouncing, "You have mastered Senjutsu!"

Naruto held Shima's gaze for a long moment, digesting the announcement, and then his lips spread in a wide, foxy grin. He leaped to his feet with a small roar, "Yee-aaah! I'm in balance! I get Nature! I'm a Sage! I...!" He stopped cheering and swiped a hand across his lower back, "I've got shit on me." The sparrows had since scattered and flown away.

"That doesn't matter, Naruto-boy, quickly!" Shima took off in a hurry, "Come this way!"

He made haste after the female Toad Sage over the statues surrounding the Oil Pool yard, past a tangle of vegetation and mushrooms, over a grassy knoll and onto a plot of flattened dirt where stocks of enormous lumber were stacked high. Shima took a moment to gather Sage Chakra and then turned to Naruto.

"See if you can do this!" Shima encouraged, seizing the end of a timber beam fit to build Gamabunta's house with. The toad raised the tower of a log above her head, and with her Sage strength, flung the beam in what was the mightiest caber toss to ever fly over the valley's east end, spinning away in to the wild blue yonder.

Naruto was incredulous for all of a second before he spat on his hands and rubbed them together. He marched up to the next behemoth beam and got a hold of it, "You just want me to throw this, Ma?"

"You couldn't before with just your twiggy human arms! Now you can, Naruto-boy!"

With a small snarl, Naruto replicated Shima's throwing technique with a short running start, Sage Chakra curtailing his exertion as he lifted the giant beam, and Naruto heaved it up and away to goodness knew where. He shaded his eyes with a hand to watch it spin away. He was a little surprised.

"Here! Over here!" Shima led him along the knoll towards an older training area. Naruto kept up.

"Give Masaru-chan a gentle lift, we mustn't break him," Shima gestured towards a large toad statue ringed by flowers and toadstools, "Move him over there by that palm, Naruto-boy!"

As if he were a super-strengthened day laborer, Naruto handily complied and lifted the monstrously heavy statue, walking it over to replace it by Shima's specified tree. When he set it down she hooted in approval. Gleeful, Naruto rested his hands on his hips.

"Now, try to avoid me!" The old toad launched herself at him over the lawn, her furiously fast swipes aimed for his head and chest. She bounced and spun with Sage tenacity, and could level buildings with her fingers...but Shima was pleased that Naruto could duck and shimmy to evade her strikes, "Good, good!"

He dodged and weaved with a grin plastered to his face, "Ma! I can feel it coming— before you hit me! I know how to avoid you!"

"You should! A Sage can feel minute disturbances in chakra and air!" Shima kept attacking, "We can sense it!"

Their contactless scuffle lasted until Sage Mode wore off after a few minutes. Chuckling, the two sat on the incline of the grassy hill and caught their breath.
Shima patted Naruto's knee, "Well done, Naruto…phew! You are off to a perfect start."

"I'll say! I'm like a slippery otter when I feel hits coming! And where do you think that beam went?"

"It looks like you tossed it over the orchard. We'll have to go find it and bring it back." Shima advised, "Take a moment and then let's try again. See if you can enter Sage Mode safely. Then we can continue with lessons."

Naruto sat and relaxed. He was still dampened with oil from the pool, but he suspected that after sweating some of it off he could still successfully gather Natural Energy on his own. He had a very good feel for it. Within minutes, he had accumulated Sage Chakra again. Naruto turned to Shima beside him and then she accepted his high-five.

"I got it."

"I know." The toad chirped.

"I can totally do this. Anytime."

"I know you can, Naruto-boy!" Shima sprang to her feet, "I haven't been this proud in a long time."

"Me neither, actually." Naruto stood and stretched, "Now let's go clean up. I hope no one got hurt when we threw stuff…"

It took a while to find Naruto's timber beam, which had landed and flattened a diagonal segment of the citrus grove's rows. They returned that first to the storage yard before hiking deeper into the valley to find Shima's beam. It was stuck vertically into soft marsh soil, a straight and solitary turret against the backdrop of sky and mountains— artsy-looking. Shima and Naruto stared at it for a moment. Shima decided, "I think we should leave it like that."

"It looks pretty cool." Naruto agreed.

"Our builders won't notice one less plank…"

They ventured west again towards the valley's center, rinsed their muddied feet and hands at the lotus pond (Shima washed the bird poo off of Naruto's back), and then they accumulated more Natural Energy to show off. Shima felt it would be more entertaining to let Fukasaku and Jiraiya see the result of Naruto's training as opposed to merely hearing about it.

At the house, Jiraiya had opened a window to air out some smoke. Fukasaku had overcooked lunch. Some arguing was audible from the open window as the two bickered and tried to blame each other.

"Ero-sensei!" Naruto called for the man's attention outside, "Quit burning our food!"

Jiraiya glanced out of the window, scowling, "I didn't burn anything! Besides, I didn't ask to eat these bugs anyway…" His speech trailed off as he narrowed his eyes and observed Naruto. Shima was blithely standing beside him.

Jiraiya wondered in a shout, "Did you get a haircut?"

"My hair is, like, ridiculously long, Perv." He restrained a laugh, "Do I…look different?"

Jiraiya withdrew inside and Naruto overheard an alarmed 'holy fuck' spoken within the house. Fukasaku was wrangled to join Jiraiya when he rushed outside. Naruto and Shima rounded the corner to meet them at the porch, and then Jiraiya ambled forward to take Naruto's face in his hands.
He was astounded. He gave Naruto a long, fierce look.

"Whoa, kid." Jiraiya said.

"I don't look all warty and toady, do I?" Naruto asked.

"…all you've got is a bit of Aposematism…red marks around the eyes." Jiraiya informed him, and then grew more excited, "Holy shit, kiddo!" He hugged Naruto's whole head. His student struggled uncomfortably in his arms. Shima and Fukasaku snickered in delight while standing on the porch.

Naruto wriggled out of the near-headlock and stood upright, his smile a bit more sedate, "You told me you wanted to be astonished."

"Yeah, well…that is the case. Color me astonished. You breaking my record time for achieving Sage Mode is freaking me out, Naruto." Jiraiya added, "In a good way."

"I worked my butt off…and almost became a statue." Naruto pointed out, "This wasn't easy."

"I told you it wouldn't be, didn't I?" The man chortled, ushering him back toward the house, "Is this your first successful attempt?"

"Third attempt."

"Damn." Jiraiya rubbed his chin, "You got the hang of it, alright. Before lunch time to boot…"

They sat down to eat soup and vegetables, since Fukasaku had accidentally overcooked the day's protein—grasshoppers. Naruto and Shima's Sage Chakra wore off before they tucked in to eat.

Over lunch, Naruto shared the experience with his elders and thanked Shima for keeping an eye on him. He also wondered about his vision of another student of Senjutsu.

"Yeah, he was in that stone-spike field in the valley. I saw him sitting on some slate and meditating there." Naruto recalled.

Fukasaku contemplated it, "Did you, Naruto-boy? Advanced students go there to train. What was this student's description? Ma and I ought to remember our share of disciples."

"He was a human and he had this sandy hair, and he was kind of pale…and…" Naruto frowned as he thought about it, "He had bumps on his head."

"You lost them at human." Jiraiya spoke sidelong to Naruto, "There have been very few human students in the Toad Valley before my time here."

"Well, only two human pupils that Pa and I personally knew during our lifetimes. And they passed away before we met Jiraiya-boy." Shima observed, "Are you sure of what you saw, Naruto?"

"Positive. He might've been a bit older than me, and I think he had, uh, horns." Naruto defended his statement, "But you have to know that at the time I had just finished marching with ants for forever. I don't know if I dreamed him up or if I met him."

"Met him?" Jiraiya picked out the word choice.

"Well, when I sneezed I think it startled him." Naruto recalled.

Fukasaku and Shima exchanged puzzled looks. They offered to fact check it with the Great Toad Elder and see if such a student existed in the past. Or if Naruto had been tripping major balls out in Nature and imagined the whole thing.

After lunch, Naruto and Jiraiya shot the shit for the rest of the day. He briefly had a contest of Taijutsu with Naruto while both in Sage Mode, and afterward Jiraiya took a breather on the green lawn. He complimented Naruto's reflexes, "Looks good, kid. We'll get you started on Frog Kumite soon. And some other nifty tricks..." He took a breath, "Just so you know...I don't plan on staying here much longer, now that you can use Sage Chakra."

"I was hopping you'd say that." Naruto sat cross-legged in the grass, "So...are we going home in a couple of days?"

"Oh hell no," Jiraiya shook his head, "We've got plenty more to do. I'm waiting on official correspondence from Gaara. He's putting together a small promotional Exam in Suna so you can make Chunin. What a friend! He told me that he'd send a confirmation of your registration to me."

"Gaara was already working on it?" Naruto was bewildered and also thankful.

"He was, although I don't have the full details on how complex it'll be. I'll send a message to Haku to encourage him to enter too..." Jiraiya sighed and leaned back, "But I get the feeling he may be in too deep where he is. I don't expect a nukenin to just let Haku go where he wants without a fuss these days. I've got to figure that pickle out before he ends up dead..."

Naruto presumed, "So we're going to Hidden Sand next?"

"We are. You and I will train and practice some concepts on the way. I'll give Obito the heads up about our travels so he can track the Akatsuki's movements relative to ours. Hopefully we'll be a bit early in Sand so we can catch up with Gaara." Jiraiya estimated, "We'll get moving in about a day or two."

That had him positively stoked. Naruto laid flat in the grass and grinned up at the sky.

"But after this nonsense, you know— your promotion and us annoying Gaara as much as possible..." Jiraiya went on, "I'm cutting the cord, kid. You're able to handle yourself now. I owe training time to Gaara and Haku, so naturally they are next on my list. Also, you've got a lot of people in Leaf who need you."

Naruto agreed that made sense, and after recuperating, the two continued testing the limits of their Sage Chakra and strength without using Ninjutsu. Well. They still tossed their respective Rasengans at each other to satisfy their curiosity, and were later chastised by Fukasaku for gouging holes in his pristine lawn. They were told to vacate to a non-residential area until it was dinner time. Naruto got the idea to show Jiraiya Shima's impromptu art installation in the mud of the eastern marsh.

Later, with their stomachs growling, they were back promptly at sunset. The evening meal was an open potluck of dishes with toads of all ages and sizes in attendance. Gamabunta, Gamaken, and toads of their prodigious stature stayed near the edge of the property as the dinner took on the spirit of a celebration in Naruto's honor. Word got around quickly that he was the valley's newest Sage. Naruto tried to downplay the praise and congratulations, embarrassed that though he'd accomplished the feat, he also nearly lost his life days before. It seemed that not all toads were aware of that.

He ate too much stew. Full of food, Naruto lazied about as lanterns were lit, stars spilled across the dark canvas of night sky, and toads shifted conversation between him and Jiraiya. Kinji eventually found Naruto and set a large jug of sake between them.

Kinji proposed a toast to Naruto and his success, and every of-age guest happily drank in his honor.
It was then that Naruto noticed an abundance of alcohol had proliferated around the potluck. He poked Kinji's stomach in annoyance, "Who brought all of the booze?"

"The Chief Toad is very generous when he wants to party. Check out Gamakichi down there…" Kinji pointed out Gamakichi, now grown considerably large, had rolled on top of some smaller toad guests and fallen asleep, "He overdid it. Amateur."

"Yeesh…"

"Here." Kinji held out a sake cup to Naruto, "Let's celebrate, Blondie."

"I don't—"

"You don't drink because you haven't yet." Kinji sniffed, "You've got a stomach full of food anyways. Take it slow and you'll get yourself a nice buzz. Go too fast and you'll puke up dinner. It's simple science."

Naruto sipped it, "This tastes like…a household cleaner."

"This is the good stuff. I only let my Ma and Pa try this wine out. You, my friend, can consider yourself privileged." Kinji wrapped an arm around Naruto as they sat and sipped, "Kanpai, you handsome dandelion!"

So Kinji educated him for the evening, beckoned over some toads of his size to teach Naruto drinking games and songs, and generally coached the young man not to rush the sake. By the time Kinji was blatantly ossified, Naruto was only mildly affected.

"Hey…I'm sorry I was such a stuck-up ass." Kinji hiccupped, "Mostly to my parents. I've been pretty nice to you by comparison." He was leaned against Naruto who was rosy-cheeked and swaying where he sat. He was still at a high-functioning conversational capacity.

"Just spend more time with them. They'll be cool about it." Naruto recommended. He was eating chips even though he could hardly fit any more food in his gut.

Kinji pulled his jacket over his head as if to hide, "How are they going to take me seriously…like this? If I say anything to them?"

"I don't think they care how drunk you are as long as you mean what you say." Naruto opined, steering Kinji by his shoulders, "Ma and Pa are over there! Go talk to them."

Kinji waddled away to go apologize to his parents near a small bonfire.

Naruto also stood, bidding his drinking companions adieu, and then made his way toward Jiraiya was ostensibly hammered. The man was reclined in the grass.

"Ero-sensei." He said and then he collapsed beside Jiraiya.

"See what happens when you accomplish something, Naruto? It's always an excuse to party." Jiraiya spoke without opening his eyes, keeping his hands folded on his chest, "Imagine how nuts it'll be when you're sworn in as Hokage. I can just see the drunken anarchy in Konoha now…"

Naruto pointed out, "That doesn't sound safe."

"Nothing in my imagination is safe."

Naruto burped.
"Oooh, good one." Jiraiya complimented him.

"I wonder if Mom and Dad would have celebrated like this with us, or if they were too genteel to get messed up?" Naruto stretched out and wondered.

"Oh, they'd get messed up." Jiraiya assured him, "Especially if it was you who achieved something."

"Really?" Naruto raised his eyebrows.

"You never got to know them like I did, kid. Believe me…the two of them would be drunkenly crooning karaoke tunes as soon as Fukasaku got the bright idea to play music. That was like their bread and butter during their down-time." Jiraiya recalled, "Man, if you could've heard Minato's singing voice…huh. Maybe you've got a good set of pipes too?"

Amused, Naruto laughed at the notion and then asked after a pause, "Ero-sensei…did they have any relatives? Could I-? Am I overlooking extended family I might still have?"

"There's a thought." Jiraiya tried to sit up to sip sake, but dribbled it over his tunic, "I know that all of Kushina's family is long gone. Hm…but Minato's parents lasted longer. His dad died late in the war…and his mom died in a group home in the Tea Country about fifteen years ago."

Naruto sat up, alarmed, "Only fifteen years? I could've known her!"

"First of all," Jiraiya held up a finger, "That poor woman suffered greatly. She never would have known who you were. Minato took care of his mother for as long as he could, but she had dementia that hit her young and fast. She was combative and hostile, Naruto, and stress ate Minato alive when it got to be too much. She didn't know him as a teen. In her mind he was just a stranger. He hardly ever caught her on a lucid day." Jiraiya took another sip of wine, "Your dad's life wasn't easy. His little sister died when she was just a toddler. Minato had to rebuild his happiness when his family fell apart. Kushina helped with that."

Naruto was rightly shocked to hear that bit of history.

"Sorry, kid. That's not an easy subject to bring up." Jiraiya apologized.

"No, it's okay. It helps to know about it." He shook his head, "I'd never want to…lose my family. Not when I get to have one."

"Huh, this reminds me of a conversation I had recently…" Jiraiya yawned, "You don't ever truly lose someone, Naruto. You know that. You've seen life go on and on, you told me so."

"…I know." Naruto leaned back on his arms, "But I can't help but be selfish. I just want to keep them by my side for as long as I can…"

"With the way you are now…I bet you can do that." Jiraiya fell back with a puff to relax.

A moment later, Kinji toddled over and clambered dizzily into Naruto's lap, "Yo…my Ma and Pa are cool with me—! Blondie, they said I wasn't that much of an ass…"

"See?" Naruto patted Kinji's head.

"You're the best, man. Like Minato. He was a bro. Here!" Kinji raised his empty cup, "Fill me up! I want to toast to the Blondie Sage again."

The next afternoon, harsh summer sunlight beat down on Shincha's mountaintop in the Land of Stone. A small courier toad from Mount Myoboku passed along a scroll to Sesshu when they met in town, and then hopped off to find a cool place to rest. The golden dog carried the correspondence in his mouth while bounding up the forest trail to his home.

As Sesshu crested the steep, wooded slope at the far end of the front yard, he watched Rin and Yuma set out with totes, towels, and bathing suits on the far end of the property. His bark for their attention was muffled by his full mouth. Sesshu hurried over the lawn, up the porch steps, and then bumped his head against Obito’s leg to get the man's attention. He was shutting the door when he glanced down at the dog, "Oh, hey boy! I thought you said you weren't going to come swimming with us at the pond."

Sesshu nudged the scroll into the man's hand and then spoke, "I'm not. I told you some friends and I like to lay in the shade beside the ice cream shop on hot days like this."

"Right…waiting for kids to drop their ice cream." Obito discerned.

"Their loss is my gain."

"Which friends?" The man wondered as he unwound the scroll.

"Two friendly cats." The dog reported.

"You don't say? I didn't take you for a cat sympathizer." Obito frowned as he began to read the message, "This is from Jiraiya-sama, right?"

"Yes, a toad brought it into town."

"It's been a while…” Obito sat down on a step and set his tote bag aside, "Go ahead to the ice cream shop, Sesshu. Don't make yourself sick on treats."

The dog enthusiastically tore away and down the hill again. Obito read the message:

Hello! Forgive me for not addressing you by name, correspondent, I just can't be too careful about where these messages go or who might intercept them.

This is an official warning. My charming, blonde pupil and I will be leaving The Valley soon. We’re headed to a dry place. My pupil has completed core training in Senjutsu. Please be vigilant for any increased activity within the Akatsuki, and keep me informed. Also, I am not sure if you've heard this rumor yet or gleaned it from your dabbling with criminals...but I’ve heard it said that Hidden Mist may be an Akatsuki-controlled state. My hunch is that other villages may also be under this type of veiled influence, or to a lesser degree be infiltrated by Akatsuki's agents for info extraction.

In the near future, we should investigate these allegations. If it's true, we're going to have some extra work to do. May as well get these well-trained youngsters to pull some of the weight with us! Send a reply with little Izumaru, he's a yellow-and-green fella. I told him to stay in town.

Keep your eyes open. Take care.

A coffin-dodger

Obito carded his fingers over his head through recently shorn, summer-short hair. He exhaled and then smiled to himself, "Wow."

Minato's teenaged, hyperactive doppelgänger who had played with Yuma for a whole day in the Apple Village was now a Sage. Whenever life started to seem ordinary and predictable as he frittered time away, Obito had a shock of the unprecedented that opened his eyes again.

He tucked the scroll into his tote of snacks and towels, then pushed off of the porch. Obito chuckled quietly as he crossed the west side of the property to reach the wooded mountain trail, I am some slacker! I can copy jutsu and rely on stealth to get by, but I've never endeavored to train that hard… maybe at no point in my life. Senjutsu training is supposed to take years! He hiked the bag's strap up on his shoulder, Minato-sensei, your child is really something else. Like mine will be too…

Obito figured he could write an affirmative reply to Jiraiya after a swim in the chilled, stream-fed pond with his family. While he never delighted in keeping closer tabs on the Akatsuki, Obito had a feeling that Rin would agree with his motivations for increased surveillance. Moreover, Jiraiya's tips about the Akatsuki were distressing. He stepped carefully over forest debris to prevent pine twigs from catching in his sandals. Rin and Yuma had gotten far ahead, but he could hear their excited chattering echo from around the bend. He also heard a stray snap of a tree branch come from behind him.

On alert, Obito turned his face towards the sound. He immediately knew that it was no passing deer, traveler, or other such explanation.

It was the visitor. The same one from the stormy night that had kept watch and left footprints in the mud, scaring the daylights out of Obito. Though he could not catch a glimpse of the hidden observer, or a trace of suppressed chakra, Obito stood still and silent in order to acknowledge the contact. This was the fourth time the visitor had returned to the mountaintop, unseen.

I'm pretty sure it's an adult man. Those tracks didn't come from a kunoichi or trainee. He's been gone for a few weeks…his surveys of Shincha are always spaced out. Like he's been busy elsewhere.

Obito rubbed his nose with his thumb, his eyes shifting from side to side, Yeah, it's been a while. Never does a damn thing except watch us…I can't figure it out. If we were being reported on, wouldn't we have experienced some kind of conflict by this point? What kind of scout watches a target and then doesn't act on what they see?

He had a single holster of kunai clipped to his waistband—meager defense provisions, Obito noted. If today was the day a fight broke out, Obito imagined that he would make liberal use of his Sharingan in self-defense. A hand hovered over his kunai holster for a few seconds before he thought better of it. Obito sighed and straightened, trying to understand. He could feel a set of eyes watching him. He felt the lurker scanning his scarred face and features: his right-sided prosthetic limbs in plain view while he was dressed in a sleeveless top and swim trunks; spots of sunscreen on his skin that he hadn't rubbed in well enough.

For a while I felt so sure that this could be an enemy keeping watch… Obito thought to himself, slowly resuming his trek through the forest, But now I have no idea. He kept his ears pricked for any suspicious sounds or activity behind him. I don't want him watching us while we go for a swim… I'll feel even more vulnerable. I don't want to freak Rin out either…

Obito then realized that the visitor only seemed to show up when Sesshu was not around. The ninken would easily detect an outsider's scent. Huh. So he's being thoughtful about these visits. I wonder how he knows when Sesshu is distracted? Obito gradually began to relax, taking two slow steps backward, So just who are you, mysterious visitor? Why don't you attack me? Why do you watch my family like some peeping lowlife? You've got to have a reason…

He felt confident enough to turn his back to the property and continue down the forest trail. As Obito expected, no ambush or anything of the sort occurred. There was only the sound of trilling cicadas in the trees. Further down the path, Obito stopped with an idea. He riffled around his tote bag and drew out a boxed lunch. *If you're a spy, you're a bad one. I've detected your presence plenty of times, and no one has come to my home yet to harm me or my family.’ Obito thought, ‘I should tell Jiraiyasama about this weird scenario…and while I’m at it…maybe I’ll treat you like a creeping stray cat.’

Obito raised the meal briefly above his head to make it visible, and then set it down on a tree stump. The action advertised: Whoever you are, eat this and don’t cause trouble.

After that, Obito proceeded ahead to the pond. He and his family had an uproarious afternoon of swimming, games, and an attempt at teaching Yuma to walk on water with chakra control (which didn’t work out this time). Then they napped and swam again, re-applying sunscreen after every dip. Yuma caught a wild turtle and presented it to his parents, asking if they could feed it their extra cucumbers.

Later, Rin walked hand-in-hand with her husband on the way home as they scaled the forest trail. He stopped for a moment to stare at a tree stump.

She peered at him over her sunglasses, "Is something the matter, Obito?"

"No, no…” With a reassuring smile, he tugged gently on her hand to keep moving. Yuma ran ahead of them with his beach towel tied around his shoulders, streaming behind him as if it were a cape.

The boxed meal on the stump was long gone.

The day that followed was sweltering. Summer heat drove citizens of the Leaf Village into air conditioned spaces, crammed into shady shelters, and sent them flocking to the nearest cool sources of water to dip in.

Lee was still comfortable enough to jog uptown in his Wushu attire.

His grandfather had wrapped up training early so he could relax indoors and chill his feet in a bucket of ice water. Before he sent his pupils away, Wong Leung asked Neji if he had made a decision between his two terrible options.

For a change, Neji tried replying in beginner Hanwen, No, I have not made a decision. With a bit of language coaching and help from Lee, he added, I did not realize my family was looking out for me. They helped me.

As family should. Wong Leung gruffed, smiling a little. The old man waved before strolling up the walkway to his house.

After that, Neji excused himself, "I was told to go to the Jounin Standby Station to retrieve something."

Lee tugged on the collar of his cheongsam top, uncomfortably sweaty, "Oh? But you will be joining Tenten and I—?"

"I won't be long. I'll meet you both at the shop."

And from there they split up: Neji to complete some odd task, and Lee trotted to the nearest convenience store to buy heaps of packaged ice treats and watermelon bars. He would have changed clothes at home, but his jumpsuit and Chunin vest would have been far less comfortable in the heat. With his bag of cold snacks in hand, he stuck to shaded alleys and streets on his way to the Pailü Weapon Shop.

Lee gave a soft Phew! of relief when he dashed into the store and shut the jingling door behind him.
The air conditioning had been on for a long while, and Tenten had set up an oscillating fan to blow cool air into the back room. Lee found her there seated on a stool, leaned over the work table as she tapped an etching design into sword steel with a thin chisel. She glanced over her shoulder at him, half of her face shielded by protective goggles.

"Don't knock that acid over." She gestured to a container on the counter, "What'd you bring, Lee?"

She chirped happily when he handed her a melon bar. Tenten took a break from etching to enjoy the treat.

Between licks of an ice pop Lee explained, "Neji told me he would join us soon. He had to pick something up from the…Jounin Standby Station." Even as he said it, he was perplexed by the errand. They would be briefed for a mission within an hour, and so Lee was unsure what his friend needed to accomplish in so little time.

"Huh. It's not like Gai-sensei was asking for him?"

"If that were the case, I imagine that he would have mentioned it."

"You guys won't have time to clean up or change before we report to Hokage-sama." Tenten observed, "But maybe Hanfu is better. Shorter sleeves."

"Yes, that helped for yesterday's mission."

"Yeah, I thought yesterday was hot. Psh!"

"Tenten," Lee finished chewing a chunk of melon ice, "Have you settled in at the estate yet?"

"Not quite yet…" She admitted, "My room is pretty shabby and they're still trying to fix it. Kayato said it'll get pretty hot in there until summer is over…" Tenten sighed, "I am staying in my flat for now. I'm going to miss my place. Every time I stop at the Hyuga house I find a new way to make a fool of myself."

"Surely you do not." Lee disagreed. He was starting on a second ice pop.

"Yeah, I really do. Take this morning's visit, for example," Tenten recounted, "While you two were training with Grandpa, I brought a box of stuff over. Kayato was taking measurements for room shelving and then the…children," She elaborated, "From the Branch— pounced on me. They're inquisitive and they spot me as soon as I show up. They keep looking through my things and asking me questions."

"Adorable!"

"Persistent is more like it. And I have to be nice to kids that young, because I don't want to come off as a snob or unapproachable." She gestured with her melon bar, "You know? So I entertained them and their grubby little kid hands all over my possessions; then Kayato tells me that I should take measurements for my shop's signage and give it to Hideyasu." Tenten's face lit up, "He's going to update my shop's sign with the Hyuga sigil."

Lee was equally as enthused and wooping, "Is that good for business?"

"I'm pretty sure that is great for business. Respected names attract consumer confidence!"

"None of that is so bad." Lee pointed out.
"Hold on—so then, of course, I was excited. I took off down the hall and I guess I just forgot that you and Neji were training? It was kind of a brain fart. I thought I saw Neji on the porch and I wanted to talk about the signage and how I couldn't wait to update it—" Tenten hung her head in shame, "And I grabbed someone who was not Neji."

"Ah." There was a beat in which Tenten wallowed in her shame and Lee said what she was thinking, "...they do not all look the same."

"Lee! I know that." She reached into the bag for another watermelon bar, "But I swear, Tokuma is like a slightly older carbon-copy of Neji that chopped his hair off. I was mortified."

When Lee laughed she grew more frustrated.

"Laugh if you want, but it wasn't funny when I got stuck in a conversation with a surprisingly nice Branch Member. I tried faking that I actually meant to talk to him...but I think he knew it was a mix up." She waved her ice pop threateningly at Lee, "Not a word of this gets back to Neji, got it?"

"Not a word."

"I've got to pull myself together. Memorize everything. Differentiate people. Tolerate children."

Lee was nodding, "It will be challenging for you."

Tenten listed between licks.

"Challenges are good things!" He insisted.

"Hmf. Guess I should've known what I was getting myself into." She chomped on the last of her watermelon bar, "Nothing outrageous has happened yet. My, uh, parents—" She continued when Lee understood who she was referring to, "And Neji said that clan elders might try to...mess with me."

"Just as they did to Neji." Lee grimaced.

"Right. We're still playing ball. We need to stay on our toes..." Tenten tossed snack refuse into a trash bin and pulled her eye visor down again. "I keep thinking if they do something, and I don't have the chance to ask anyone in the Main Family about how to respond...I...I just don't want to mess up."

Lee was nodding as he tossed his garbage away as well. She warned him again not to knock over the container of etching acid.

"Nah, I can do this. I can make the most of this." Tenten puffed her cheeks, "I mean, I never thought Neji would've given me the time of day a few years ago. I'd squared myself with that. Now here we are."

Lee took a seat on the stool on the opposite side of the work table and assured his friend, "Tenten...even then he would have. You have always been important to Neji."

Her tap, tap, tapping on steel slowed as Lee added in reassuring Hanwen, *His worst days were the days without you. I learned a lot about Neji. And I also learned to be a better friend."

She grinned and kept etching the inscription, Lee, you're more than a friend. You're like family.
I think so too about you and Neji. Even Grandpa feels that way, I can tell.

While they pitched sentimental compliments at each other in their mother tongue, the shop's chime sounded. A moment later, Neji arrived in the work room and immediately fetched himself a watermelon bar from the bag Lee had brought. He didn't say anything while he cooled himself by the fan and unwrapped the treat.

Tenten eyed Neji's high ponytail, "Oof, it must be bad out there."

"Oppressive is the word for it." He grunted, nipping at the ice pop, "And I imagine the Hokage will assign us an outdoor mission."

Lee was keeping the faith, "Tsunade-sama wouldn't—"

"Her most senior ninja will get favorable, more comfortable missions in these temperatures." Neji presumed, "We must still earn our keep."

Tenten sighed in dismay as she leaned over and rotated her chisel carefully to create the decorative curve of a magatama on the blade. She spoke over her shoulder to her boyfriend, "What were you doing at the standby station, Neji?"

"Tenzo was there. He had something to give me." Neji explained, setting a scroll down on the counter. Tenten and Lee barked at him not to knock the acid over. He did not.

"What did he give you?" Lee wondered.

After a lick Neji elaborated, "A Jounin recommendation letter."

Tenten nearly tapped in error during her work but stopped herself. Lee balked from across the table. They snapped their heads around to look at Neji. Their Chunin promotions were still so fresh in their minds that it was difficult reconciling further advancement on Neji's part.

"That's a…bit sudden isn't it?" Tenten asked as she lifted her protective eyewear, "I mean, I know Tenzo has kept an eye on you for a while…"

Neji shrugged with one shoulder, "Not that sudden. Hideyasu-san and my uncle have also given me letters. A few weeks ago."

Lee's nasal, wooooot shout of shock was his reply to the news and Tenten leapt off of her stool, ripping her visor off.

"Three?" She sniffed, "You were moping at home not two days ago, but you received three recommendations in the meantime?"

"I didn't ask for them." Neji reminded her, "When I submit them to the Hokage, it is at her discretion whether or not I may take an evaluation. They are administered by other Jounin. If no one is available to host a test, then I will be admitted to a waitlist with other potentials."

Lee wanted to know if Gai-sensei was aware.

Tenten wanted to know if Neji would leave the team if promoted.

"Gai is aware. No Jounin is required to dissociate from his or her team unless the Hokage mandates it." He tried calming their fussing, "Mission assignments are adjusted by aggregate team skill levels. And…" Neji smiled a little before finishing off his treat, "You have my word I would never leave our team willingly."

They exhaled and relaxed slightly.

"Huh. I bet Tsunade-sama would have a veteran Jounin evaluate you, to knock some sense into you." Tenten put away the near-finished sword steel and pulled her work gloves off, "You may not get promoted on your first try, Neji. Do they let you retake evaluations?"

"I imagine so, but I do not know how frequently."

"I have faith Neji would pass, no matter his evaluator!" Lee gave his vote of confidence.

After that they cleaned up the space, shut the fans and lights off, and set out for the Administrative Building for a mission briefing. Gai would be on another assignment and could not join them. There was one last ice pop in the bag, and so Lee gave it to a passing child on the street who thanked him merrily. On the way, Tenten tried to walk within the lanky shadows cast behind Neji and Lee, savoring any scrap of relief from the heatwave.

It was near the memorial fountain, where some villagers were assembled and dipping—prohibiting sign be damned, that a voice called out to the team and they stopped. Fujita tottered up to them and caught his breath, swiping his arm along his slick forehead.

"Neji-sama, Tenten-neesan, forgive me," He rested his hands on his hips and keened forward tiredly, "And Lee-kun, hello…"

"Good to see you, Fujita-kun!" Lee's greeting was sunny, but his teammates were a tad quailed by the visit.

"I came to tell you that our Great Elder has asked Tenten-neesan to come back to the estate immediately." Fujita reported, "He said that he sent an excused absence ahead for your mission to Tsunade-sama, and that I can act as a substitute for your team."

"No." Neji said rigidly, "That's completely unnecessary."

"Great Grandfather said there was an urgent matter Onee-san must attend to at the house." Fujita passed along the message contritely, "I am sorry, Neji-sama, he only just told me. He did not explain what official clan business it was."

The look on Tenten's face expressed that she was fortifying herself to get whatever the aggravation was over with and not screw up. She had been expecting a stunt like this, after all. Surely Hyuga clan elders had concocted some kind of response to Hideyasu and Kayato's adoption of her. Neji, on the other hand, bristled when he noticed the resigned air about Tenten. When she moved to leave, he snatched her wrist and insisted, "You do not have to agree to anything. Don't engage their schemes or paralogizing."

"I know, Neji, I know." She patted his arm, "Take it easy. I'm not going to let them intimidate me into anything."

Lee looked on worriedly as Fujita wrung his hands.

"Speak your mind without fear, Tenten." Neji gradually let go of her, his glower softening on her, "We'll finish this mission quickly. Don't—"

"I got it, whoa. Take a breath." Tenten smiled, "Neji…go ahead and I'll see you in a day or so. I can handle it."
Fujita gave her an apologetic squeeze of a hug, "I'm sorry, Onee-san…"

"Stop, Fujita. It's fine. Just keep up with these bellyachers." She reassured the boy, "I feel sorry for you three. Working in this heat…"

With a small wave, Tenten turned about to cross town back to the Hyuga compound. She could feel their worried stares at her back.

The most rational course of action, she figured, would be to locate her adoptive parents and ask for coaching before trying to humor a clan elder. What a day to pick, though…I'm soaked with perspiration and covered in steel shavings. That'll definitely impress…'

When she arrived at the compound, much damper than she would have liked, Tenten peeled off her sandals and trudged into the Main House. It was marginally cooler indoors. She hung a right down the corridor and nearly crashed into Natsu, Hanabi's once-upon-a-time babysitter, "Ah, Tenten. Kayato-sama was asking for you."

Tenten unstuck a sweaty strand of hair from her face, "Oh? Yes, I heard that…I was needed for something."

"Hmm." Natsu gave her the up-and-down, "Why don't you go to Kayato-sama's studio and I'll drop by with a cold cloth?"

"I'll owe you one, thanks!" She kept moving.

At the corridor's end, Tenten wrapped on the doorframe before poking her face into the room, "Kayato—?"

The woman pulled her into the room by her shirt and Tenten gave a small yelp. Kayato positioned her in front a fan blowing full-force, "Thank goodness you're a bit early, dear! I sent Fujita running to find you. I'll have some time to dry this sweat off of you…"

"Uh…" She craned her neck to watch her adoptive mother frantically collect things around the studio, "Am I in trouble or something-?"

"Oh, no! You're in demand. Not that being in demand is any easier, just ask Hinata-sama." Kayato gruffed, "Great Elder Haburo is entertaining Taketori guests today. He doesn't want to just talk about the newest member of the Hyuga clan. He wishes to introduce you to them."

Tenten unbuttoned her shirt and slid it from her shoulders, turning to catch the fan's breeze all over her skin. She nodded, "Right, the Taketori clan. Neji told me about them. They're important to the Hyuga clan."

"Very important."

"So I guess I'll have to look nice before I say hello?"

"You do, but I'll be damned before I put you in full kimono. You'll melt in front of them." Kayato drew out a cream and marigold yukata with bird designs on it, "Here, this is a very nice piece and you'll a bit more comfortable in it…"

Natsu stopped in with a bowl of cold water and a cloth, amused as Kayato moved to undress Tenten despite her mild protests. She asked if they needed any assistance.

"No, Natsu-chan, thank you." Kayato shooed her off and the door shut behind her.
Tenten patted her face and neck with a cold towel, "How much time before this introduction?"

"About fifteen minutes." Kayato took the capri pants Tenten kicked off and folded them.

They sighed in unison and then Kayato laughed to herself.

"Hm, hm! Someone knows how it feels now." The woman chuckled, "This is just the start of the train of inconveniences, Tenten."

"Oh, so it's a train? Does it ever pull into station?" She joked and set the cloth aside, pulling on the robe as Kayato held it out to her.

"Not that I know of, but at least we're all on it together." Kayato smiled at set to work, expertly tugging and adjusting, "That's what Hide-chan says."

"Speaking of—" Tenten referred to Hideyasu as well, "Is he here? Are you both introducing me?"

"I can't, dear. I have an appointment in about a half hour. Though I would be delighted to praise you in front of Taketori guests. You'll just have to rely on my husband." She added, "And he may not be quite so inclined to make lighthearted wisecracks with his grandfather in attendance. Great Elder Haburo could make this meeting...stressful."

"Well if all I have to do is make a good impression and not anger our Elder..." Tenten was optimistic, raising her sleeves up as Kayato fitted an obi around her, "No problem."

"That's the spirit. To tell the truth, Hide-chan told me earlier this meeting will help Haburo-sama get to know you better. He hardly knows a thing about you. Certainly he knows nothing about your team or your bond with Neji..." Kayato pulled the extra length of the obi 'round itself in a knot, "I hope he cares enough to learn more. You are one of us now."

"I don't know if someone like him will ever believe I belong." Tenten's eyebrows scrunched, "Then I pity his loss in these late years of his life, ignoring those who deserve to be treasured."

Kayato finished her work and patted her new daughter's cheek, "Then I pity his loss in these late years of his life, ignoring those who deserve to be treasured." The woman gave her a sniff, "Good, you can pass without a bath."

She exhaled in relief, peering at herself in a mirror. Tenten estimated her appearance bordered on pretty; her face plain and braids minimally frizzy from the heat. Decent-looking enough to meet people and get a favorable reaction at the most superficial level.

"Let's have a quick primer on Taketori relations, with these few minutes we have left..." Kayato fished a spare pair of earrings from a jewelry box, "Hide-chan mentioned that Magan-sama, the leader of the Taketori clan, may be joining Great Elder for lunch today. Usually he brings his wife, sister, two retainers, and the occasional dignitary-in-training of his clan for sit-ins. They are all very nice. They maneuver conversations with poise considering how brash our Elders' comments can be."

"So...be respectful, be myself?" Tenten wagered as she hooked the earrings on.

"Oh yes. But because Great Elder Haburo will be there with you and Hideyasu...you may need to censor yourself a little. Not to speak out of turn, for example. Dignified ladies suit Great Elder's tastes...he's no fan of working women or outsiders to begin with." Kayato explained, "Some role-playing of the delicate lady may help you garner favor with Haburo-sama."

"Wow. That may actually be beyond my capabilities." Tenten admitted, aghast.
"I'd give it a whirl if I were you." Kayato laughed, "They've already sat down to eat, I expect. This will be a brief post-lunch meeting. You only need to keep it up for a short while."

"Alright." Tenten took a breath.

"I'll walk you to the tea room. Hide-chan should be there waiting for us." Kayato ushered her along and kept pace beside her, "You do look wonderful, dear. It's a shame Neji-sama can't be in attendance."

Tenten quirked her mouth in a half-smile as she imagined it, "It's for the best. He had a small fit before I came here. I don't know if he'd make it through an introduction without biting someone's head off." She sighed, "I'd prefer a mission even outside in the heat, honestly."

"I know you would."

Hideyasu met them near the tea room and pecked Kayato's mouth anxiously in greeting. He'd swapped his typical gi for a more formal tunic. He turned to Tenten with a lopsided smile, "There may be a slight problem."

Tenten and Kayato's faces dropped simultaneously.

He kept his voice low, "The good news is that Grandfather's guests will be ready to leave soon…but the bad news is that I don't think this is an introduction."

"Of course it is." Kayato hissed, "Tenten hasn't met any of our clan's allies yet."

"Well, you're right about that," Hideyasu huddled in like a sports coach, "But I took a peak in there and Magan-sama brought his son Kitano with him."

While Kayato frowned in understanding Tenten glanced between the two adults in confusion, "What's wrong with that?"

"I can't put my finger on the matter quite yet…but I suspect Grandfather may have asked Kitano to join us while he's still eligible." The man rubbed the edge of his nose as he thought.

"Eligible? That boy just had a meeting with Hinata-sama a few months ago!" Kayato whispered, "Haburo-sama can't just pawn a child of ours off when previous arrangements were made, right?"

Hideyasu gave Tenten a sidelong look and noted her mild but escalating distress, "I...think Grandfather may overwrite previous arrangements if he's determined to do so. Or he may send Tenten as a ward to the Taketori."

"He can't send her as a ward, she's an active Leaf ninja, and," Kayato snipped pointedly, "She just joined us. She won't leave us."

"I don't know what Grandfather will do, but unless we go in there and join him we won't find out."

He patted his wife's arm and added to Tenten, "Young lady, don't worry about thing. Just be as polite and unmarriageable as possible. My Grandfather won't send my daughter away, I will see to that."

Slightly reassured, Kayato wished them luck and then departed for her studio as Hideyasu led the way to the tea room, sliding the door aside to let Tenten enter first. Her ears were ringing from her elevated blood pressure. Once the door was shut behind them, Elder Haburo announced them to Magan and Kitano, and Tenten took the cue to bow, 'I have no idea how to worm my way out of this one.'
Hideyasu thanked his grandfather and when he and Tenten joined the table, he added, "Magan-sama! It's been a while since I've seen you. I hope you and your family have been well."

"Exceptionally well. I see you are the proud father of a daughter now." Magan had a squared face and warm eyes, regarding Tenten curiously, "Your name is Tenten, Haburo-sama told us. I am Taketori Magan, and this is my son, Kitano."

"Yes, it's a pleasure to make your acquaintance." Tenten bowed her head in what she imagined was a demure manner. She stole a glance of Haburo at the head of the table. The old man made no effort to greet her or Hideyasu. His stare was trained on Magan.

Kitano, who was polite in most other situations, had shifting facial expressions. It took him a moment before he acknowledged Tenten, "It is good to meet you too, my lady. It's a bit short notice to have this meeting just before our departure."

"I would gladly have stopped by sooner if—" Tenten trailed off when Hideyasu discreetly poked her arm, warding off the subject.

"Tell me, did you attain Chunin rank as well at the most recent Exam? I heard that Neji-sama and Hinata-sama were promoted." Magan made a bid for cordial topics.

Before Tenten parted her lips to recount her participation, Elder Haburo answered for her.

"She too was promoted, for her exemplary matches that were fought prior to her withdrawal from the Semi-Final match." Haburo explained, "Unlike Hinata-sama, who explicitly ignored her father's and my warning not to participate in the Final Round. It could have cost her life."

"But Hinata-sama prevailed, didn't she?" Kitano recalled.

"She disobeyed." The old man snipped.

"I heard that she was seen using—" Magan was watching Hideyasu's face as his eye twitched again in warning to not bring up any mention or elements of Hinata's success. It was not a favorite subject of Haburo's. Magan switched gears and told Tenten, "Well congratulations, my lady. Haburo-sama's praise speaks for your prowess."

"You both would have enjoyed watching Exam matches that day, had you not been away on business." Hideyasu assured them as he tested a tea pot and was disappointed to find it empty, "While we're on the subject, have there been any interesting developments?"

The arch of Haburo's eyebrow indicated that he wanted the scoop as well.

"We've increased security at the Moon Pool after we found a child from Tanzaku Quarter wandering there." Magan indulged them with news, "I still can't understand how a young boy wandered through our grounds and into the cove past the attention of our posted guard…however that watchman has been dismissed and reassigned elsewhere."

Haburo's tone was clipped, "Good."

Tenten canted her head curiously toward Hideyasu, "What's the Moon Pool?"

He smiled at her, "It is an ancient, sacred place to the Hyuga clan and we visit it from time to time. The Taketori, as our retainers, house that location on their property and guard it as part of an agreement between our clans."
Kitano spoke up on the subject, "Though it is not recommended anyone visit without supervision. It is used for certain rites…but the connecting tunnel can be dangerous."

The men at the table cleared their throats to discourage that subject and Tenten pursed her lips. She pointedly chose not to be irked by being denied certain information at this early stage. She supposed Neji could fill her in sometime on why this 'Moon Pool' or portal was important and/or dangerous.

"Magan," Haburo was on the prowl for other details, "It is my understanding, based on discussion a recent Village Council meeting, that you held an audience with representatives of the Aburame clan. The nature of such a meeting was not disclosed to me."

"It was an environmental conference last month, my lord. The Lady of the Aburame clan respectfully requested a survey of the south end of Taketori property. Some native insects that inhabit those grounds are of interest to them, and my elders and I agreed we would be willing to authorize them entry to preserve wildlife there." The Taketori clan head elaborated, "It was a small, inconsequential contract that does not affect our relations with the Hyuga clan. I did not think it was necessary to follow up with Hiashi."

Haburo was icy, "Did any transaction take place?"

"No, my lord. Signatures only, no collateral."

"How foolish."

"Great Elder…” Hideyasu gently reproved his grandfather's sour mood.

"Very well then. Throw in your lot with Shibi and his wife who can only see the forest for its many trees— that google-eyed woman.” Haburo growled.

Tenten sat still and silent, wondering if a bit of Haburo's elderly discontent was excused by senility, or if he just didn't care about who he belittled. Also, she never imagined someone would speak so coarsely about Shino's parents.

"Great Elder…” Magan elected to be understanding, "We would never seek to trade our standing with the Hyuga clan for the favor of any other clan in Konohagakure. Surely you know that? Today we have discussed many things, such as the Taketori's outreach to the Tide Village's council and merchandising shipments to Hidden Sand. If we are only discussing such trivial matters as these, please tell me why Kitano was requested to attend this meeting instead of attending to previous engagements he had arranged?"

"Yes, I am curious as well." Hideyasu jumped at the chance, "Tenten was also called away from a mission this afternoon."

Kitano perked up again and blinked at the young woman sitting ramrod straight at the table, "Really? You had an assignment?"

"Yes my, uh, brother is filling in for me. Which is fine…but maybe there would have been a more convenient time to meet and be introduced?" Tenten said what they were all thinking at the time.

Haburo shushed the comment, aggravated.

Then, Tenten witnessed something remarkable. Magan gave a look to his son, as if it were some kind of unspoken signal between father and child. He wanted Kitano to speak on the matter. Intrigued, she watched the odd, bumbling scene come to a head as a sixteen-year-old boy shot Great Elder Haburo a plainly angry grimace.
Kitano peeled his eyes away from Haburo for a moment to shed the last vestiges of politeness he had on the appropriate person, "Hideyasu-sama, it is nice to see you again and please accept my congratulations on expanding your family." Kitano then leveled his yellow gaze on Tenten, "You are certainly an impressive addition to your clan, Tenten-sama."

His tone roughed as he added to Haburo, "If I can be candid, Great Elder…I don't understand what this meeting is about. They can leave now. To get to know each other better, I will invite Hideyasu's family to the Taketori castle in the Fall…"

"You should be honored to meet with an eligible lady of the Hyuga today." Haburo disagreed.

"I have no intentions beyond my agreement with Hinata-sama." Kitano countered, adding a nod to Tenten that she took for no offense, "Tenten-sama is the picture of skill and beauty your clan has long yearned to offer, and she seems very nice, but I have no interest in match-making anymore." Kitano clarified, "I was promised no further omiai introductions. I am focused on my shinobi career and fostering good relations at this time."

Magan happily sat back and said nothing. Hideyasu was outwardly impressed he let his child take the reins and snap back at an overbearing old tyrant.

"Kitano-sama, I suggest you rethink your choice of an agreement with Hinata, as she is self-serving and disrespectful." Haburo retorted, trying to balance negotiation and hostility.

Kitano was shrewd, "With all due respect, I am not sure what internal disagreements exist in the Hyuga clan at this moment in time, but I will not reconsider anything I have agreed to. My word is not a ribbon that bends in the wind."

Tenten exchanged soundless, amazed glances with Magan and Hideyasu. If only they had popcorn.

"Haburo-sama, I am deeply insulted that my time has been wasted here. As if a single business discussion were the time and place impose another potential suitor for my hand." Kitano was beautifully poised as the old man squared his jaw furiously at him, "I would not inconvenience my friends in the Hyuga clan this way."

"You." Haburo gruffed. He then looked to Magan as if the man was going to lean forward and apologize profusely at any moment, but Magan did no such thing.

Hideyasu somehow did not let out a squeak of astounded delight while he bit his cheek to keep quiet.

"The elders of the Taketori clan will not be pleased with this." Haburo insisted.

"Will they?" Kitano seemed older and surer when he spoke, "Allow me to extend you an invitation to visit in the Taketori Sun Garden next week, Haburo-sama. It's where my elders like to sit and have meaningful discussion. You are welcome to join them." He added for goading effect, "Just yesterday when I visited, my elders were praising Hinata-sama's performance at the Chunin Exam, her victory, and commended me for considering her as a spouse someday."

This was all news to Tenten, but she sat with her hands crammed in her lap and tried to stay a fly on the wall.

"If you wish to tell my elders that Hinata-sama is not what she seems," Kitano went on, "Please feel free to do so. I've no interest in Tenten-sama or Hideyasu-sama's family beyond wishing them well."

Magan nodded slightly at this, which Haburo certainly did not appreciate.
"Please do not frivolously ask me or my father to come visit in the future, as the Taketori clan strives to never waste the time of its friends." Kitano advised. Then he rose to stand from the table and Magan mirrored the gesture, "My lords and lady, take good care. I have charity work I will see to this afternoon. Pardon my haste."

"It's been a pleasure as always, Kitano-sama!" Hideyasu was the polar opposite of the fuming elder at the table, positively buoyant, "Magan-sama, do make time for us in the Fall. Tenten, Fujita, and Kayato would love to see your gardens and aviary."

"I will send for you then, friend." Magan smiled to himself and set out with his son, exiting the room and let their retainers seal the door behind them.

There was a tense silence at the table as Hideyasu and Tenten were left alone with Haburo. Until the elder dismissed them, they would be required to remain out of respect.

"The insolence." Haburo muttered, "It's as if he and my great granddaughter were made for each other. Never has a Taketori prince disrespected me so!"

"Such nerve." Hideyasu agreed softly. He was still trying to stay in his grandfather's graces.

Haburo sat there and stewed while more silence prevailed. Tenten had a moment to think at that time. Surely this incident presented an opportunity, what with Kitano villainizing himself in Haburo's eyes, much the same way the old man so vocally disdained Hinata. It was as if those pieces on the chess board had been eliminated. Tenten realized she ought to make a move here and now, 'But how do I go about it? How do I get a stubborn old man like this to look at me and try to position me favorably? Or I'll screw up and he'll hate me just as much as the rest…'

Tenten snuck a glance at Hideyasu, who also appeared deep in thought. Haburo's eyes had glazed over as he reviewed avenues of revenge to exact on Kitano in his imagination.

Then, the mood shattered when Tenten abruptly erupted in violent sobs.

Highly alarmed, Hideyasu turned to the girl and raised his hands comfortingly while Haburo looked on like a deer in the headlights—flabbergasted.

"Dear! Sweet girl, what's the matter?" Hideyasu yelped, "That wasn't so bad! They're still quite nice aren't they?" Right then, Hideyasu picked up on the cue. He knew Tenten well enough to know that she was not the crying type. But of course, Haburo didn't know that.

"He, he…" She sniveled theatrically, "The prince hates me!"

"No, Tenten, Kitano-sama doesn't hate you. He just felt compelled to reject you based on previous agreements." Hideyasu's reassurance was perfectly tone-deaf.

"It was humiliating!" Tenten harped on it, "How can I maintain good relations for my clan if I'm dismissed as quickly as that?" A convincing hiccup, "No one is going to want my company!"

"Don't get hysterical…" Hideyasu chided while his face encouraged, please, keep being hysterical.

Teary-eyed, Tenten turned to Haburo for validation, "Great Elder, do you think I'm repulsive compared to Hinata? That young men will hate me?"

Flummoxed, Haburo replied uncertainly, "No, they…shouldn't necessarily think that."

When that comment deliberately did not make her feel better, Tenten faked more teary lamentation while Hideyasu patted her back and mimicked authentic concern.

"I'll never get offers from men my age! I should join the Black Ops and forget everything! That's what I planned to do…" She blathered.

Haburo didn't like that train of thought, "Young lady, calm yourself. You mustn't react in such a manner before giving your circumstance serious thought. I expect other young men will consider you."

Tenten disagreed, "No, Great Elder, the truth is…" A sniffled, "I am too tomboyish, rough, and unrefined. A woman who works with her hands isn't desirable! I fight better than most of my male peers. What kind of man wants that when they can have a cultured, gentle wife?" As if she had any remote desire to marry and settle down whatsoever, but her crocodile tears were working very well.

"The Aburame clan would accept someone of your disposition." Haburo imagined.

"But we just insulted the Aburame clan at this table!" Tenten reminded him dramatically, "Kitanosama and his father will pass along those comments."

Right there, Haburo nearly went cross-eyed as he realized his contemptuous words had actually shot Tenten in the foot—at least for that option. But he didn't need the girl or Hideyasu to explain that Tenten was not classically feminine or mild, and that such a kunoichi may struggle in the matchmaking department.

Hideyasu further sold the sentiment when he turned to his grandfather frantically, "My daughter…she's worked for everything she has. We can't set her up for failure like this, Grandfather! So she's hardy, feisty, and has more moxie than what her peers prefer... I don't think all is lost. We just need to find someone who can overlook that roughness!"

"I am aware of the challenge, Hideyasu." Haburo snorted, "But what such man exists? If I can't arrange any takers while she is still young and eligible…perhaps I will have to allocate a larger dowry?"

Tenten was privately astounded that Haburo weighed her chances to be so low. The man was unaware that she often had no problem catching the eyes and interest of men. But whatever. It was pure pretense now.

"Perhaps we can find someone equally as difficult to like? That could be a sounder option for a match." Hideyasu suggested with as much laughter-free seriousness he could muster.

Haburo, for the first time, settled his gaze on Tenten as she gradually calmed and dabbed at her eyes with her sleeve. Though a clever man on most occasions, he had completely fallen for the pity party. Contrary to popular belief, he didn’t want to destroy the futures of his great grandchildren, but aggressively sought to secure them. To think he had personally dismantled Tenten's opportunity that day struck a blow to his pride. He ought to repair the damage and consider his words more carefully next time.

For a few moments, Haburo held his chin sagely and thought on it. Then he said to Hideyasu, "I have someone suitable in mind…and hard to like. Let me speak to Hiashi to see if he will broker his nephew in an arrangement. I've asked that child to think of such things recently."

"You think that would work?" Hideyasu wondered impishly.

"Heaven knows. My great grandchildren are rapscallions, the lot of them. I will see to Hinata and Hanabi's affairs later, then. For now…" Haburo sighed, "I'll consider more practical arrangements."
Hideyasu motioned for Tenten to bow her head with him, "Thank you for your guidance, Grandfather."

"Enough out of you, you clown. You were oddly prim today, Hideyasu…I expected some jokes." Tiredly, Haburo pushed off of the table to rise on shaky legs, "I may drive a hard bargain, but I do not wish for your daughter to sustain any trauma because of strained negotiations with the Taketori."

A servant opened the tea room's door to allow Haburo to exit, with Hideyasu and Tenten following closely behind.

Before parting ways, Haburo added, "Hideyasu…"

"Yes, Grandfather?"

"Tenten is a strong kunoichi. I expect you to teach her to care less of how men will judge her. She is a sword in the hands of the Hyuga, not a flower." Haburo warned, "And I prefer that to irritant flowers. Teach her to value herself enough to not throw her life away in the Black Ops."

Hideyasu was nodding while marveling at such a rare accolade, "I will, Great Elder."

Haburo tottered off to go negotiate more deals and spin ideas in the heads of other elders. Hideyasu and Tenten then traveled eastbound down the corridor, still hesitant to crack their falsified exteriors.

Further down the hall, Tenten asked, "Do you think that worked?"

"That was quite a show. I'd say Grandfather is genuinely convinced." Hideyasu admitted, pleased, "Whenever he has time to prepare and think, he's an immovable wall. But when he's put on the spot…he is surprisingly pliant."

"I knew I had to put him on the spot." Tenten concurred, "I wasn't sure how. It was sort of instinct to be a sissy, self-conscious girl right then."

"That certainly was not the normal you." He yielded, "It startled me at first."

"I don't know how to cry. I bit my tongue to do it." She revealed a bit of blood in her mouth, "Can we stop so I can spit this out?"

Hideyasu brought her to a half-bath and let Tenten rinse her mouth at the sink. When they carried on to the studio, Kayato excused herself from her client briefly to speak with them out in the hall.

"Well?" She asked quietly.

"It was a disaster." Tenten reported. She and Hideyasu exchanged a low-five.

Kayato was frazzled by such a reaction, "A disaster? Since when do disasters make people look so happy?"

"To be clear, Grandfather actually botched an amicable introduction of Tenten to Kitano-sama. The prince had some choice words for Grandfather before leaving…and Tenten played up the dramatics a little." Hideyasu explained, "And now I suspect Grandfather is concerned that Tenten is not a catch, and that it will be tricky business matching her with a man who doesn't care that she walks around smelling like metal polish and furnace debris."

"Thanks." Tenten said flatly.

"Hmm." Kayato smiled.
"Well, I hope that display will move Great Elder away from vengeance and towards making more sensible arrangements. He does fear jeopardizing the Hyuga's influence with other clans. And crying girls, apparently." Hideyasu concluded, "So take heart, girls! I think we may be headed in the right direction."

"We may just be." Kayato agreed, "Tenten, since you have no mission to complete today, why don't you help me with my client? And you, Hide-chan— can you lend me an hour to help with some needlework?"

"I thought you said my embroidery can be shoddy." He sniffed as the entered the studio.

"Not all of it. Your hand stitching is great but takes too long. You need more practice on a machine." She chuckled, "Don't you think it would be meaningful if you worked on your own daughter's tomesode?"

"Oh!" The man changed his mind, "That would be nice."

"Uh." Tenten circled around a work bench, "What's a tomesode?"

"Something you won't need for a while…but you'll definitely need it." Hideyasu explained vaguely.

Kayato ushered Tenten along to meet the client to learn more about business deals.

Naruto lagged the next morning when it came time to pack his belongings. Shima had kindly gifted him a red sage cloak with black trim to commemorate his Senjutsu achievement. Because he and Jiraiya were preparing to traverse Toad Valley jungle in mid-summer, and then cross the desert to Sunagakure, Naruto had dressed down in lightweight, beige-toned clothing. With a sigh, he pulled on his cloak and travel bag before leaving the guest bedroom.

'I know that I wanted to finish my training and leave…but know it kind of feels hard to leave.' Naruto noticed.

Outside on the property's sprawling lawn, Jiraiya was extinguishing his smoking pipe while conversing with Kinji. Fukasaku, Shima, Gamakichi, and Kosuke had also gathered to see them off.

When Naruto came to a stop beside them, Fukasaku explained, "Gamabunta and the Great Toad Elder will not be saying farewells today, but send you both off with fond wishes." He and Shima shared a disappointed look, "We are all surprised this day came so fast."

"Well the kid's training ain't over yet. I'm still gonna brush up on Frog Kumite with him on the fly." Jiraiya stuffed his pipe in his bag's side pocket, "And while I'm thinking about it, Ma and Pa…is there any reason the Great Toad Elder decided to not hold an audience with Naruto yet?"

"We did ask him that yesterday." Shima confirmed, "The Great Elder said…Naruto will have to learn about one more thing before he is summoned back to Mount Myoboku. Then the elder will share important things with him."

"Hm." Jiraiya rubbed his chin, "If that's so, I hope you won't mind reverse-summoning him back here?"

"Certainly not. We know your time is precious." Fukasaku turned to Naruto, "When the Great Elder asks for you, we will retrieve you."

"I hate to sound so uninformed, but how is the Great Elder gonna know when I know that one other thing?" Naruto asked quizzically.

"He will." Fukasaku assured him, "He will feel the change in you no matter how far away you are."

"Weird." Naruto accepted the answer.

Jiraiya agreed, "Isn't it? Cool stuff though. We've been very lucky to have these stand-up toads in our corner." He settled his gaze on those assembled, "Really. Thank you all. What you've done for us means the world. Don't forget you can depend on us too, alright?"

Kinji teared up a little, "Do you have to make this a sappy moment, Jiraiya?"

"Is it as sappy as your drunken apologies to Ma and Pa the other night?"

"Hey! Watch ya mouth!"

Meanwhile, Fukasaku and Shima huddled in to squeeze Naruto as he kneeled down, wrapping them in his arms.

"Thanks for everything, Ma and Pa. I'll see you soon." He tried to keep it together, "I'll...miss you guys..."

"Naruto-boy, whenever you need us please don't hesitate to summon us." Fukasaku reminded him, "You and Jiraiya-boy are dear to us, just as Kinji is."

His throat felt phlegmy. Naruto tried clearing it and managed to keep his eyes dry. He then accepted hugs from Kinji and Kosuke next.

"Like Pa said, anytime you need us." Kinji reinforced the promise, "I've got your back, Blondie."

"Thanks, Kinji."

"Boss, do you have something you want me to deliver to Hinata-sama?" Kosuke chirped.

"Yup." Naruto handed off a scroll to the vermilion toad, "Thank you for keeping in touch with her, little guy."

Kosuke saluted him.

Naruto got a friendly pat on the head from the enormous Gamakichi, who was grinning his toothless smile, "Take care, Naruto. We'll be together again soon."

With all farewells and safe travels said, they set out along the flower-trimmed path on a northerly route. Jiraiya heaved a long sigh as they ambled down verdant knolls cluttered with life.

After the toads watched their treasured human companions leave, Kinji followed Fukasaku and Shima back into the house. He was inquisitive about something.

"Hey Ma, Pa?"

"Yes, Kinji-boy?" His father was settling down at the table.

"About the Elder... he said Naruto needed to know one more thing before he could come back for an audience. About the prophecy, I'm guessing." Kinji had been filled in by Jiraiya, "What does he need to know about?"
His parents exchanged a hesitant look.

At length, Fukasaku shared the requirement, "He must know loss. Pain."

Later in the day, Naruto and Jiraiya had embarked on the wild, tangled nettle of the secret valley path that would eventually deposit them near the western border of the Fire Country. It was a long, thicketted road with dense canopy that blocked the sky and sunshine.

"Also, as a heads up, there's a lot of poisonous shit in here." Jiraiya informed his student, "So try not to touch vegetation and then rub your eyes. I've had my share of woes on this byway in the past…"

"Got it."

"Damn, too bad I forgot mosquito repellant. It's a different scenario when you're surrounded by toads all the time to eat them for you…"

"Well we could just summon Kinji or someone for that." Naruto suggested.

"You think it'd be polite to make them wait on us even as we're blowing this popsicle stand? They've done enough for us. For now, anyway. I'm not desperate enough to bother them yet." Jiraiya reasoned.

"So how long does it take to get to the end of this trail?"

"About two weeks if we stay on track and keep pace. It's handy because it'll dump us near the Wind Country border, relatively speaking." Jiraiya nearly tripped over a raised root and wiped out, but Naruto caught him by the back of his tunic, "Whew, thanks kid! It's a certified green inferno in here."

"Two weeks." Naruto mumbled and then asked, "After that, how long does it take to get to Hidden Sand?"

"Eh? Well, for that results vary. Maybe a couple of days. Maybe a week. The trouble is the elements and my age might slow things down. I was quicker when I was young." The man complained, "But we'll get there, make some stops in hotels on the way for a decent night's rest…oh…and here." Jiraiya handed him a correspondence scroll, "Gaara sent that to your attention, actually."

Naruto examined the official letter and the attached, laminated ID card.

"That's a temporary pass into Suna. You can take a photo and pick up the real one when we get to the Administrative Offices there." Jiraiya informed him.

Naruto was amused, "Did you get a pass too?"

"No, and kid, I don't need a pass. I'm a famous author!" Jiraiya hyped himself up again, "I might have to do impromptu book signings when I'm out there. I'll be waiting on my agent to let me know when that new manuscript will begin publishing. I could announce it to fans and stuff…"

"Yeesh." Naruto was almost sorry he asked. He continued to examine the scroll.

Accelerated Chunin Exam information, which was rather sparse, stated that the program was capped at 135 applicants, or 45 teams of 3. Many teams would be lacking a third team member, and single applicants would be assigned temporary teams with other participants.

"Hey did you see this? Gaara's willing to arrange perfect strangers on teams!" Naruto pointed out, "I guess the tasks he has set up don't necessarily require us to know our teammates well?"

"That seems to be the case." Jiraiya said before taking a swig from a canteen. The heat and humidity were stifling.

Naruto read other odds and ends, such as entry requirements, accommodations, liability limitations, date and time info... then he moved on to a section that Gaara had written to him personally. Naruto read it silently and reduced his trek to a complete stop as Jiraiya slowly pulled ahead.

_Naruto,

Regarding the Accelerated Chunin Exam details attached, make note you will not need discounted hotel rates in Suna. You and Jiraiya-sensei will be staying in my home. This Exam will be rather simple and straightforward, but should challenge you enough to determine if you are worthy of promotion. I would be tremendously surprised if that were not the case.

It's been so long. I have to admit I am very much looking forward to seeing you. I am driven to distraction lately, expecting you and Jiraiya-sensei to arrive. We have much to discuss. I hope you would be willing to stay for an extended period of time after the Exam's conclusion. I want you to see what my life is like now.

Naruto swiped a tear rolling down his cheek, a bit overwhelmed. It was exhilarating to know he would see his dearest friend again. He jogged over toadstools and greenery to catch up to Jiraiya before pausing again to read.

As exciting as this time is, I must also express how frustrated I am with Haku. He does not anticipate being able to enter this Exam. While he danced around the subject, I gathered that the nukenin whose company he keeps is a deterrent and prevents him from returning to us. To that end, I expect you to keep what I will now tell you confidential. I do not want Haku to know about this:

_I have assigned Temari to head a special task force to track and retrieve Haku. I have also given the order that, if necessary, her squadron may kill Momochi Zabuza if he is imperiling Haku or other bystanders. I imagine that is the reality of the situation. Temari will begin her assignment this evening. If she does gather definitive information on Haku's whereabouts, I see no reason not to share it with you and Jiraiya-sensei while you are staying with me. I do expect you not to act on any intel that Temari gathers. This mission is hers alone, until such time I feel we should personally escalate the matter. I hope you understand that, Naruto.

He felt uneasy. Perhaps in passing, Naruto had gathered that Haku was stuck or possibly in danger, wherever he was, but Gaara was no longer toying around with the possibility. He was taking initiative. With that in mind, Naruto rushed ahead to catch Jiraiya while accepting that, yes, he would respect Gaara's wish. He would not tip Haku off about what was to come. _'I'm in no place to meddle with official missions like that...' _But still, the potential outcomes worried him.

Safe travels to you and to Jiraiya-sensei. I've set up more frequent patrols locally and at the Wind Country border to ensure that the Akatsuki is not lying in wait. Tsunade-sama has also increased patrols at the border, as she is aware that you are on your way to Suna. Prepare to learn while you are here. There are many in Konoha who are anxiously awaiting your return, and I want to send them the best version of you.

_Gaara, Godaime Kazekage

Exhaling, Naruto rolled up the scroll and crammed it into the top flap of his travel bag. He caught up officially to Jiraiya and then pulled a few steps ahead of him.
"Read that letter?" Jiraiya asked.

"Yep."

"You okay with what could happen?" The man wondered.

"What's gonna happen?" Naruto scoffed, "Haku won't put up a fight. He'll go with that team so he can grovel and apologize to Gaara personally. And if his lowlife tutor-buddy crosses a Sand team and doesn't live to talk about it, that's his own damn fault. Isn't it?"

Jiraiya half shrugged, "I suppose it is."

"I dunno. It makes me nervous." Naruto admitted.

"Me too." Jiraiya echoed, "I understand why Gaara feels like he has to get it done...but if he gave me more time, I think I'd have better luck extricating Haku myself."

"You don't even know where he is right now."

"Yeah. But I could wait for that Sand team intel. Except, it'd mean I'd have to leave you flying solo for a while so I can look for my goody two-shoes pupil." Jiraiya mapped it out in his head, "Though I did plan to let you manage yourself for a while, Naruto."

"Well, you old fart; you're going to have to make up your mind if you want to track Haku down or not." Naruto informed him, "Gaara said I can't go out there looking for him. But he didn't say anything about what you could do."

"Ah, how astute of you. That's right."

"And once he's back, that'll clear up the whole lying-to-Baa-chan thing." Naruto recalled, "I don't think she knows, even after all this time."

"Let's see how long it stays this way, if Gaara can bust this wide open without Tsunade hearing about it." Jiraiya laughed to himself, "That'd be impressive."

Still slightly stressed, Naruto ventured, "Do you think...he'd come back to Konoha?"

"Kid, I honestly don't know. Haku will probably go where he thinks he's needed most." Jiraiya flapped his arms, smacking banana leaves on both sides of the pathway.

"Probably." Naruto agreed.

Jiraiya consoled him, "Look, Naruto, think of it this way. Even if Haku chooses to stay in Suna just like Gaara's been pretending he has, you think you wouldn't see him enough to get lectured by him? Let him annoy you about health, hygiene, and good housekeeping?"

Naruto laughed with a small snort.

"Exactly." Jiraiya made his point.

"You know, Gaara's gotten pretty good with keeping a home too. He talks about all kinds of stuff that I don't get." Naruto recalled.

"With any luck he'll educate you while we stay with him."

"...Haku will be fine." Naruto felt a bit more confident about Haku's retrieval, "I know he wants to
"There you go. Yeah, I'm thinking Haku's had enough of the wild side of things." Jiraiya rubbed at a crick in his back, "Jeez, we're barely underway and I'm already sore. So. While we're out here, let's play a game I like to call Itchin' and Bitchin'.

Naruto hiked up his bag's strap on his shoulder, "Sounds fun?"

"The only fun you can have on this godforsaken trail. Anyway, we'll place our bets. Let's say 600 Ryo. Whoever gets a rash, bug bite, or otherwise itchy malady out here and complains about it first loses and pays up." The man raised a hand, thrilled, "I used to kick Minato's butt whenever we hiked this route."

"You're on. I bet you're prone to bites and stuff now." Naruto wagered, because he was a hardy individual and confident in his resistances, "Body chemistry changes as you get older, Perv."

"Heh, you would know about that, right kiddo?"

He gave Jiraiya's ankle a good kick and watched him topple.

Chapter End Notes

Readers! Thanks for your patience. I've been up to my eyeballs in accounting homework these past few weeks and I just. Wanted. To. Write. For. My. Nerds.

Here I will cite the paraphrased quote of Jun's regarding tatami mats from Rachel and Jun's YouTube video "Idiot's Guide to Japanese Apartments." I've loved those dweebs for years.

Chapter 43: Budding Oats

Bonus Soundtrack: "Zephyr's Flutter" by NIKK BLVKK
He stayed several strides behind Shino and Hinata on the return route to Leaf.

"Are you sure Kurenai-sensei is going to the Obon Festival tonight?" Sato called ahead to his teammates.

"She told us she would before we left for our mission," Hinata reminded him, "That's why we're bringing the honey wine along with us that we bought at the traveler's market. Sensei said it's one of her favorites!"

Sato had a laugh, "I don't know if Sensei ever met an alcohol she didn't like."

"For the record, she disdains licorice flavored beverages," Shino relayed over his shoulder, "Sensei said we should be mindful of that."

"Right," Sato nodded, "Lest we buy her a gift she can't drink…"

Hinata laughed at that, but then gave Sato a mild scolding for the comment.

It had been nearly two and a half weeks of frequent missions, high-security zone patrols, and other drudgery. Not so bad, Sato conceded, now that the summer heat was ebbing and growing cooler. Perfect festival temperatures, Hinata declared.

He didn't mention it then, but Sato had no plans to be out that night dancing, honoring the dead, or otherwise enjoying festivities. 'I haven't been in the village enough. There's barely been any time to visit Tama in-between my missions.' Sato thought as he picked up the pace, moving to head the team, 'She's probably bored out of her mind! I've gotta show her the snaps I took of that wisteria tunnel. And maybe later we can at least sit somewhere so she has a view of festival lights…'

During their scouting mission, Hinata briefly mentioned a procedure that Tama had undergone while he and Shino had been out on another assignment. She lacked the particulars of what the surgery was specifically intended for, as it had been a project of Sakura's. Bedrest was key, she understood. "I'm sure Tama-chan will be happy to see you home." Hinata added, "She'll feel like herself again."

Sato was taking that to heart as they closed in on a northwestern service road to the village, his teammates scrambling to match his speed.
After plodding through a clearance gate into the village proper, Hinata and Shino voiced their complaints about being pushed so hard.

"I was already feeling tired after supervising the exposition last night…" Hinata was rubbing her temples, "Then we helped move shipping containers…and interrogated the would-be thief at the warehouse…"

"Not a very good thief." Shino pointed out.

"There was no need to rush, Sato-kun." She concluded.

"Maybe not, but you guys can go home and rest now." Sato offered a bit of consolation, "I'll turn in the mission report, alright? I'll catch you later. I just want to—"

Shino already understood, "Tell Tama-san we hope she is feeling well."

Hinata seconded the motion and even offered to pay Tama a brief visit later. On the northernmost thoroughfare, the teammates set out in three separate directions.

Standard procedure would be to check in and debrief with the Hokage first, but Sato was a man on an elastic-snap trajectory with his better half. He turned down a brick alley lined with young, potted tree saplings that belonged to conservancy offices looming tall over the main avenue.

'Kakashi had better be visiting her— the hospital is boring as heck. I hope Tama's not mad that I've been busy…' Sato ruminated as he headed due south down the wide street, 'It's been killing me. I wanted to get promoted so badly, but it turns out the mission deployment schedule for new Chunin is brutal. I just want to see her! I need to take her out for fresh air tonight, somehow…'

The aromas of pre-cooking festival food stands wafted in the air. His half-empty stomach whined in response to the smells. Sato passed various cafes, buildings, and the outpatient therapy center, mere blocks away from Konoha Hospital before he gave up and stopped in his tracks.

"I'll be bitchy if I don't eat…" He muttered, "And Tama's a sucker for doughnuts, so…"

By that logic, Sato about-faced to march back to the nearest cafe with half a mind to order one of every confection on display. It took a moment to discern amongst the bustle of passers-by and activity on the street a familiar silhouette that had emerged from the therapy center. The young man frowned and blinked slowly. Sato's expression softened when he realized he had in fact spotted Tama, perfectly upright and unaware, in an eggshell blue sundress, exiting from the automatic sliding doors.

It definitely startled people on the sidewalk near him when Sato bellowed her name in shock.

Tama turned toward the call and was surprised to lay eyes on him, sheepish that she had been found out. She had been playing up the bed-ridden angle a little bit since his last visit, whilst religiously attending physical therapy sessions and adhering to Tsunade's prescriptions. Once Sato had returned from his mission, Tama planned to drop the happy bombshell on him. Though this moment would have to do, she supposed.

Sato stood rooted to the spot and wracked his brain while village pedestrians maneuvered around him on the busy street. How in the world was she so drastically improved? By what jutsu or intervention? Tama kept this from me—? And since when does that tracksuit-worshipping woman wear pretty dresses!' Sato's face lit up with a bamboozled grin. Now he didn't really care how exactly she was walking on her own two legs again. It was a thrill to see her do it. Without going so far as to assume she was completely recovered or able to take missions, just seeing Tama stand and wave to Foot traffic circulated in the space between them, and Tama squinted when Sato gestured to a nearby storefront. The boutique’s sound system was playing a favorite song of hers. She returned his grin when Sato mouthed the artist name to her. Their simultaneous head bobbing to the beat did not draw any attention. A few villagers did start to give them strange looks as they moved towards each other with gradual, slinking footwork. It was a brief, giddy dance in which they managed to avoid crashing into anyone. When Sato closed in and folded her hand against his, it was as if an electrical charge raced up his fingers. She was back. She could move! In so far as mild boogying, at any rate. That was a great sign. His heart was soaring.

"Lady— what are you doing walking around and looking so gorgeous?" He pulled Tama close, cackling with elation. Sato held the back of her head and kissed her before she could give a comment.

Two or three startled stares lingered on the public display of affection. Context may have explained the joyful meeting, but eventually people just kept walking.

"I'm sorry," Tama caught her breath after the kiss, "I wanted to surprise you! I've been going to physical therapy for over a week while you were on missions."

"I thought you'd— never again…" He shook his head and calmed down, "Tama, how are you doing this? Does anything hurt?"

"Nope, not really." Her smile was mirthful.

"Sunshine said that you had surgery for something, but you didn't tell me about that either." Sato sniffed in mock-annoyance, "The jig is up."

A voice carried as it exited the automatic doors of the therapy center, playfully taunting them, "Huh! You're like a pair of magnets…" It was Tsunade. She stopped near the two young ninja and rested a hand on her hip, "You've improved quite a bit, Tama-chan. Today went well. You only need to come to the center twice a week from here on out."

"Thank you, Tsunade-sama." Tama put a polite distance between herself and Sato, although he still held on to her hand.

"Hokage-sama!" By then, Sato had mostly worked out the riddle of Tama's recovery, "You did this for her? Tama's going to be fine-?"

"Just fine." Tsunade assured him, "The procedure was risky, but as you can see we were successful. High-risk bets tend to pay out for me, I've noticed. I'm glad I was able to help."

"I need to repay you somehow…" His throat felt thick and Sato gave a small bow while adding, "I'll never be able to thank you enough, Hokage-sama."

Tsunade waved him off and turned up her nose, "If you want to thank me, work hard. I want the two of you to make me proud." She couldn't resist a small smile, "Seeing two grinning yuks in love brings me back to the days I miss most."

Sato kept thanking her and tried to transition into debriefing about the results of his team's mission. Tsunade silenced him with a raised finger.

"Submit a report to me in the morning. Tonight is Obon and you have catching up to do." Tsunade insisted, "Tama-chan: that medication I gave you is taken three times daily. Keep up with it. I'll let you know when I think you're fit enough to resume mission activity.”

Tama nodded chipperly, "I will. Tsunade-sama, thank you so much."

"I just did what I do best, young lady. Now I expect the same of you." The Hokage flipped a pigtail off of her shoulder and turned up the street, "Hatake— bright and early tomorrow."

Once the Hokage had moved on, Sato could barely contain mile-a-minute questions as he accompanied Tama down the street. She tried to keep up with her answers: no, no pain— at least not as bad as it had been. Yes, she was wearing full-length black leggings because her legs were now rather unsightly. Sato scoffed at this answer, but Tama insisted, "Because of the surgery, I have a patchwork of scars that won't go away. I'm glad I have my life ahead of me…but I know I'll be a bit self-conscious from here on out."

"Don't be." Sato squeezed her hand, "You can't help being beautiful at all times, no matter what you go through."

Thrilled, Tama bit her lip.

"Are you going home now?" He asked her.

"Yeah. Dad's at work and Mom has workshops all morning. I thought I'd go home to nap until she comes back from grocery shopping." Tama filled him in, "Why don't you come over? We cut up a huge watermelon and I can't eat it by myself."

"Sure. But uh…doesn't your dad call dibs on watermelon at your house?"

"Usually he does. For some reason he forgot to pack slices before he went to work." Tama recalled, "His head's been scrambled since I recovered. I think Dad's happy…but whenever I go to therapy or see friends he needs to know where I'm going and when I'll be back. I can tell he's still worried."

Sato supposed quietly, "That's only natural."

They turned onto the boulevards of the more affluent side of the Leaf Village. The suburban vista was more peaceful and the homes more uniformly nouveau riche than the rest of Konoha's battle-battered and reconstructed neighborhoods. Maito Ken and most of his well-off acquaintances inhabited this community.

Tama's questions snapped Sato out of his sight-seeing, "What have your missions been like? Is it any different now that you're a Chunin?"

"Uh…kinda the same, honestly. Maybe even before we were promoted Tsunade-sama was trusting us with higher difficulty tasks. Patrols are way more frequent now because we're on alert for the Akatsuki and other threats…” He caught himself and then turned to Tama, wide-eyed, "Hey, did the Hokage promote you? She said you were eligible! Where's your—?"

"My Chunin vest is at home." Tama laughed softly.

"So she did give it to you! Good!" Sato was relieved, "I blew my top about that a while ago."

"I know. Sakura-chan still talks about it. She said you were like my chivalrous knight when you objected." She was smiling and rosy-cheeked, "Though you could've been more even-keeled about it."

"I can only do even-keeled about fifty percent of the time." He gave a small shrug, "Or whenever my coffee rush wears off."

"True facts."

The many trees and flowerbeds on the Maito property were bursting with life and color. Tama led the way up the stone walk to the front door, then opened it and retrieved mail that had been dropped through the postal slot. Sato reminded himself as they went inside that the house was not staged for a magazine spread. It was a real home that people lived in, albeit the furnishings, paintings, potted plants and décor were ostentatious by plebeian standards. They removed their shoes in the fanciest genkan in existence.

"Come in!" She dumped the mail on a white stone countertop and directed him to sit in the kitchen. Tama retrieved the watermelon and set it on dishes, "Here you go. Hm. Do you smell something?"

"Other than the twenty scent-diffusers you have in your mansion?" Sato verified. He bit into a juicy slice and his eyes rolled back in summertime bliss.

"Other than the scent-diffusers." Tama snickered, "I'll find the odor. Maybe I need to take the garbage out?" She sat at the counter with him and munched.

"So have you seen Kakashi lately? Does he know?"

Tama nodded, "He and Sakura-chan know. I'll tell Kiba-kun soon."

"Is anyone else in the dark?" Sato wondered.

"Most everyone else doesn't know I'm up and about, I figure." Tama imagined, "But I thought I could take it easy and walk around the Obon festival to say hello."

"Great idea." Sato concurred, "I'll show you off to everyone."

"Well, I'm still a little beat-up." She conceded, "And I won't be able to stay out for long. I get tired."

"That's why you said you wanted to nap?" He said between mouthfuls of fruit.

"Yeah. It'll take time to build my strength back up to what it was. I'm not going to torture myself about not being as fit.

"That'd be stupid. It's a miracle you can stand and move! Who cares if you can't punch walls down yet?"

"Not you." She chuckled.

"Yo, this is like the best thing I ever tasted."

"You said that about the scones at the hospital." Tama spat seeds out onto her plate.

"Oh yeah. Those were good too."

"You can count on me, Sato. I know where to find delicious stuff. Chouji-kun goes out shopping with me sometimes."

"Say what?" Sato's face lit up, "Chouji takes you on gastronomy expeditions?"

"Sure does. Since last year! Sometimes Sakura-chan comes with us."
He employed faux-outrage, "How dare you leave me out."

"I feed you don't I?" She teased.

"More than you should, probably." Sato dropped a third gnawed-on melon rind on a plate, "Your dad's gonna be mad. We barely left any for him."

She shrugged, "He'll deal with it."

Sato started to wipe his mouth on the back of his hand, but Tama tsked at the behavior. So he bunched up his shirt to dab at the corners of his mouth just to annoy her.

"You're making a mess of yourself!" Tama leaned across the counter to pluck a watermelon seed from his unzipped vest, "Can't take you anywhere..." She paused and sniffed him, "Oh. It's you."

"What's me?" Sato was confused.

"It's not the kitchen garbage that stinks." Tama informed him smugly.

"Al-right. There's need to antagonize, because you were the one who invited me over after a strenuous mission." Sato snorted defensively, "And said mission may have involved me diving into a dumpster to pull a thief out of hiding."

"Ah. Now it makes sense." She took the plate away to dispose of the rinds.

"I couldn't send Sunshine in after him when she spotted him! If she went home stinking and covered in garbage, her dad would go nuts. Ditto Shino, believe it or not. So that just leaves me because I've got no one to offend at home." Sato meant the anecdote to be amusing, but he wilted a little as he realized his situation.

"Well..." Tama rounded the corner and kissed his cheek, "You're home with me and your smell is offending me."

"That makes me feel less lonely." He admitted. Sato moved in to peck her lips affectionately, but Tama pushed him back while fanning a hand in front of her face.

He barked in embarrassment and Tama laughed as she retreated up the staircase to the second level, calling back to him to follow. Sato ascended the stairs and tried not to touch anything with fruit-sticky fingers.

Tama gestured to the bathroom, "Go shower off please."

"I could, but my clothes will still smell."

"I'll wash them." She offered, "If you're going to join me for naptime, I don't need you smelling unpleasant."

"Excuse me; I didn't know I was invited to any such nap." Sato pointed out archly. He detected that maybe she was luring him into something other than just a come-over-and-eat-watermelon visit. Which was great. He didn't feel the need to ask questions.

"Yes, you're invited. You had a long day, Sato-kun, and so..." Tama shooed him into the bathroom and then moved on to a linen closet to find spare towels.

Sato spoke from within the echoing washroom, "Just wondering— what am I supposed to wear in the meantime?"
"A t-shirt and sweatpants."

"Of yours?"

"You'll fit. You have slender hips."

"…I don't know how to take that." Sato was not sure if that was a compliment.

"Relax. Go clean up!"

So he did, mostly because the bathroom was the pinnacle of modern amenities and it fascinated him. Everything was bright, shiny, and spotless. The mirror was sprawling and backlit. The glass shower was giant and took over space that could have housed a tub, But there's no tub! This place is barbaric! All this modern stuff…' Certainly the family had enough money for a hot spring membership to bathe whenever they felt like it. Sato undressed, turned the shower tap, and then moseyed on in. He stood under the shower head as his eyes fluttered shut, muscles loosening under the rain of hot water. Actually…modern isn't so bad.

"Towels!" Tama shouted into the bathroom. She had left a pile on the vanity, collected his ripe clothing, and then bustled out to throw it in a washing machine.

'Ahh… Life's good. I got my act together. Tama's okay! My team is handling tougher missions…' He sighed and let his head droop forward, Maybe I'll just take my nap in here…

It occurred to him while fussing at a spot of dirt on his skin that maybe soap would help…but there was none. Okay, so the fancy shower is also pretty empty. Should've paid attention to that…

Sato called out to Tama until she popped back in, winded, "What is it? Trying to make me run around my house on busted legs?"

He protested, "Your legs aren't busted anymore!"

She was entertained, "Can't wash your back?"

"Literally. I can't. Don't you have any soap in this futuristic palace?" He immersed his head in the stream and let it sodden his hair, flattening it to his head. It was fun by Sato's standards.

"Oh, sorry." Tama tottered in and riffled around in a cabinet, extracting a bottle of shampoo and bar soap, "Dad's rules. We put stuff away when we're not using it."

"My god, no wonder this place looks like a museum."

She tossed the items over the top of the glass panel and the small shampoo bottle bopped him in the head. The soap zipped across the shower's bottom, too slippery to catch.

"Ouch." Sato said as an afterthought.

Tama ordered other odds and ends on the vanity, "I know it looks tidy and un-lived in, but if I had it my way I'd have a normal, traditional house. It gets on my nerves how Dad needs everything so…"

"Editorial-worthy?" He supplied.

"Regimented."

"That's his whole life." Sato agreed, "But I kind of like how your house looks."
"You still make fun of it."

"Maybe because I'm a little jealous."

"Don't be. It takes a lot of work to keep a place looking like this..." Tama sighed.

"So," Sato imagined blindly as he rinsed shampoo from his hair, "You want a house that looks more...lived in?"

"Like, a house that I can take my jacket off and maybe leave it on my couch without getting harangued? Or, dishes can wait in the kitchen sink for a while?" Tama laughed, "Could you live like that?"

"Tama, I do live like that."

"That's what I want."

"Then let's get you exactly what you want." Sato decided, "I'm happy either way, as long as it's got at least four walls and a roof."

It was quiet after that. Sato supposed she had gone out again to attend to laundry. He soaped up his hands and rubbed behind his ears, beneath arm pits, and under finger nails. He tried to cry out the shampoo that had gotten into his left eye. 'Ow. I've been blinded for life.' He wasn't used to this upright-showering business.

Then, Sato nearly jumped in fright when he felt a fingertip slide down his back. He lost the soap again as it slipped from his hand and zoomed away. Like a one-eyed fool he glanced over his shoulder.

"Is something wrong with your eye?" Tama asked him.

"Yeah. Shampoo got in it." Sato cut to the chase, "Tama, what're you doing in here?"

"I wanted to clean up too. I lift weights and do exercises at the therapy center."

"But you don't smell, and there's this thing called waiting your turn." Sato reminded her.

"I know." Tama picked up the wayward soap, smiling to herself.

Sato tried rubbing the sting from his eye because it would be better to see the incredible, naked woman with restored vision. For the moment, he had reached a bizarre mental impasse in which this could have been the most superb thing that had ever happened to him, but he was also distinctly bashful and thinking about how Tama had just recovered. What was this hasty flirtation about? If it could even be called that? Maybe it wasn't. Maybe she was trying to conserve water? Have conversation? Maybe she just felt like seeing him naked? He snapped out of it when she gave him a small nudge.

She moved Sato aside so she could wet her head and smooth her hair. Tama assured him, "I'll be out in a minute."

"Yup. Or, you know..." He said in a small voice, "A few minutes."

Tama was watching him in her peripheral after setting the soap bar down, "We could do a few minutes."
She rubbed herself down with suds and Sato made a half-hearted attempt not to watch, but all he could really do was watch. He wondered if she knew that his breathing had been reduced to short gasps, or that his heart rate was rocketing. With his back to the cool tile wall, Sato maintained what distance he could. She was there, right in front of him, not yet noticing the many ways he was reacting to her.

Remarkably calm, Tama held up a soapy hand and asked him, "Want me to get your back?"

To speak would mean risking his voice cracking in a pitch that straddled ecstasy and terror. Sato turned around without a word and let her set to work. He stopped a soft whimper from passing his lips, because she didn't need to hear that and he didn't need to make it any weirder. He pressed his forehead to patterned tile and tried to breathe.

"Is this okay?" Tama asked him, "Are you okay?"

Sato gave her a look over his shoulder, "You're asking that now?"

"...maybe I am a bit late with this question."

"You definitely, deliberately want us to see each other like this?" He asked, "Not that I would ever protest...only that I hope you know you don't need to rush. You just got better, Tama. If you want to be close, if you want something from me..."

Tama rested the pads of her thumbs over the base of his spine, eliciting an eep from him.

"We've both wanted each other for a while now." She noted.

"There's no denying that." Sato confirmed.

"The only reason I asked you to wait for me was because I didn't understand. Not the way I do now." Tama clarified, "When you come so close to dying and losing the ability to live the life you want to...your perspective can change."

He turned around to look at her, bemused, because this was exactly the same thing he had thought. Sato raised his eyebrows and understood that, ah, she'd gone through it too. Tama had nearly died. When she'd survived, Tama had nearly accepted a life in which she had limited use of her body. Many of the things she wanted would have been forfeit— the things he had also once taken for granted. Sato realized she was chuckling at him because he was subconsciously cupping his chin while he thought about it.

"Sorry, I just," Sato moved to hold her elbows as her hands settled on him, "I completely understand what you're talking about."

"That's a relief. But...on top of all of that...it's kind of an exercise in self-esteem." Tama admitted, "I didn't look like this two months ago. I was smooth and pretty..."

"Are you saying that you're not-? Because you sure look super smooth and amazing." He didn't get it.

She furrowed her brow, "The scars and marks. These won't go away. I worried that you wouldn't...like what you saw."

Sato blew a small raspberry, "That's crazy talk. You are the hottest thing I have ever seen. Now made hotter by badass scars. I'm not happy about how you got them, but believe me, they are not a turn-off."
Tama nodded and smiled a little.

"Oh and in case you haven't noticed," He took her hand and traced one of Tama's fingers over the puckers and marks on his chest and side, "I was looking like ground-beef for a while even after Sakura-chan and Sunshine saved my life. I didn't exactly feel attractive after that, and it took some courage to actually dip in a public hot spring again. I am way more fucked up than our guy friends, and Neji's got his share of scars too."

"Thanks in part to you." She reminded him.

"Eh, what's one more? I don't think he cares."

Tama curled into him and let her fingertips acquaint themselves with the scores on his skin. "I like how you look." She told him.

A pleased rumble escaped him as Sato pressed kisses to her temple. Being nude around each other felt much easier after that heart-to-heart. Not to mention exhilarating— his hands roamed easily over Tama's shower-slick skin, slipping up from her exceptional bottom, over her flanks to rest on her waist. He was examining faded bruises along her ribcage and the spots where he knew her ribs had been broken, and had since healed. Tama tipped her head up to press her lips to his.

Light-headed, Sato happily participated in the lascivious kiss. He was also having a low-key, ethical debate in the right temporo-parietal junction of his brain, just behind the right ear. 'I am all for existential conclusions leading to possible shower sex, but if I am honest...I am still nursing my wounded conscience back to health. Before either of us forgets—Tama is recovering from a serious injury.' His inner specter added, 'Though she is hot and very willing, and I do appreciate her enthusiasm, now is a good time to slow it down. Give it a couple of days! Yeah. Besides, we'll prune up in here—'

But oh hell she had touched him there and suddenly his train of thought careened away into misty nothingness. It was a stray touch that traveled away from his erection and up his abdomen, and Tama made a peep of apology as she was unsure what the quivering of his eyelids and the bowing of his back meant. She was prepared to rethink the close proximity until Sato looped an arm around her, pressing himself into her stomach-to-stomach.

She was not resisting the drenched kisses that followed. Tama was lively, making soft sounds, exploring him with her hands. What brain function Sato could muster suggested that Tama wasn't hurting or doubting, and oh, how her skin slid superbly over his with the smallest of motions... At worst, he figured, the liaison would waste water. They took an intermission for air.

"You know, it was kind of never polite to say it before now," Sato said while rolling his palms over her breasts, "But Tama, these are awesome boobs."

"Thank you, it's definitely more polite to say it now." She agreed smilingly.

"Like, proportionately perfect boobs. Like— artists should reference you for legendary statues—boobs."

"Huh." Tama was gliding her fingertips along the array of scars on his torso. "That's some high praise. They aren't big."

Sato nodded, "Exactly. But the shape and texture...this," Sato gave a light squeeze, "Is why art tries to imitate life. You are Exhibit A."

"I think I'm flattered." She pecked his mouth and then asked, "Can I touch you?"
"You are touching me." His hands were migrating back to her bottom.

Tama wrapped her hand around his length, "I meant here."

Sato folded over slightly with a soft whine, resting his forehead against the side of her face. He took a moment before confirming in a squeak, "Yeah, that's— that's good. I can handle that."

"Are you sure?" Tama snaked her free hand up the back of his neck to brace his head as he leaned into her, "You are allowed to say no. Maybe this isn't a good time…or place. Even no, maybe later is okay." She was smiling at him and just enjoying the embrace. She was not about to proceed unless she got an affirmative from him.

"Tama." He laid his hand over hers to indicate the right pressure and direction of touch, "Yes now and yes later."

Her mouth hovered just a breath from his as she amended, "Well, not later, because later it'll be nap time."

Sato had no problem with that arrangement, exhaling harshly before slanting his mouth over Tama's lips again. So much for thinking straight…and so much for patience and water conservation too. But since Tama had initiated it, and Sato was aware that he was a total fool for this exquisite woman who'd miraculously recovered, he was going along with the feeling.

Tama's ministrations were clumsy, unlearned, and perfect. Sato could only watch her for a few moments before he shut his eyes again, kissing blindly along her neck and shoulders. The sensations flashed through him.

Her palm and fingers stroked along the curvature of the head and then the underside of his shaft, dazzling the nerves there that felt so good Sato sucked in a hissing breath, snapping his eyes open again. He stared at her face in an effort to comprehend it, and then noticed that he wasn't doing much reciprocating. After having his lower lip gently nibbled by Tama he asked, "Where's best for you? I want you to feel good."

"Your hands are doing wonders so far…" Tama informed him. Though that assurance did not stop Sato from sampling other locations, and before long she gave up trying to convince him otherwise. The caresses up and down her sides, over dusty rose nipples, and circling below her naval made her shake from the stimulation. She was muttering small sounds she had no idea she could make. Her legs were not especially strong either, knees trembling in excitement.

A bit tired, Tama braced herself against his body, and while she was at it she indulged a little. With a furtively satisfied look on her face, she rolled her hips and ground against him, sliding him slowly along her shower-damp mons. About then Tama got the idea that maybe there was a more mutually gratifying way to go about the act, and she was aching for it, but before she could suggest it she felt Sato's nails sink into the flesh of her upper arms.

Startled, Tama regarded him as the muscles in his neck tensed, his handsome face suspended in dreamy astonishment and his eyes narrowed to slits. She felt him twitch against her stomach and fingertips, trolling her gaze down while Sato was lost in the waves of release. Tama was not at all offended that he had finished on her lower stomach and hip. She was still feeling the whirl of arousal as she marveled at his charming, silver features and vulnerability. Tama was also rather intrigued by the slippery, pale, pulpy result on her skin, but Sato snapped her out of her examination when he too realized what had happened and squawked in horror.

"Oh my god—" He shoved her back into the direct stream of the shower, which was colder now, ignoring Tama's sputtering as she was wetted down and he swiped the ejaculate off of her, "—I really didn't think I'd-I!"

"Sato, it's fine. I was the—"

"—some goddamn jerkoff like me doing this to you! You need to take it easy and I know it. What's the matter with me—?"

She shut the water off and then turned to him, holding his face in her hands, "Sato, do you think I would have tried any of that if I didn't know how it could've ended?"

His mouth and cheeks were scrunched as he answered, "…maybe?"

"I have kunoichi friends who never stop talking about this stuff." Tama reassured him, "So I've heard a lot. Just so you know, it was great and I think we should do it again tomorrow."

"Uh." Sato inhaled and took her hands in his, "Okay…but I really need to think this sort of thing through more. We ought to be careful…and what if you slipped in here and broke something again?"

"Don't worry so much." She reached for towels and handed him one, "I'm tougher now. I've been tempered in battle and this shower is no match for me."

"Well, I also meant careful as in—"

Tama notified him as she patted her hair dry, "Even if you were inside of me you couldn't make a baby. Not right now, anyway."

With a slow, owl-like blink Sato said, "Whoa. That sounds scandalous when you say it." It was the first time anything like that had been declared to him, "By the way, how do you know that?" They continued toweling dry.

"I've been on medication for…hm…five years? To treat other issues. That's why you can't." She stepped out cautiously with his help, "And back then you didn't need to know."

"I had no clue…"

"It's okay. Most men have no clue."

"Hey, there's no need for blanket dismissals like that."

She was laughing quietly as she wrapped herself up, "Even if it's true?"

Sato followed her out, "Many of us care and are diligent about contraception. Shikamaru knows everything, I swear. He's a very reliable encyclopedia. I think this was even a topic of conversation once while I was out somewhere with my dudes. At least until Shino and Neji told us to change the subject."

Tama snickered at that.

###

In her bedroom, she handed Sato a dark pair of sweatpants and a stretched-out tank top to put on. He was not thrilled about being commando until his clothes were clean and dried. Tama dressed in athleisure and told him to bear with it, "You won't care about that so much if you sleep a little."

"These are kinda tight. I feel like you can see my everything." He pawed across her bed and flopped
"I already saw your everything." Tama hummed happily. She rolled over onto her sheets and fluffed a pillow, motioning for Sato to raise his head and then drop it again on the cushion. They settled down and curled into each other. Tama added, "Your butt looks good in those."

"Thanks, I bet yours does too." He slipped his arm under the pillow and her neck, pulling her closer, "Are you sure your mom won't flip out when she comes home?"

"I'm sure. You're one of my mom's favorite people." Tama yawned, "And it's just my dad who flips out. He won't be home until late tonight."

"Phew." Sato breathed easier at that.

She was genuinely tired. Tama tapped her fingertip tenderly to his lips as her eyes drooped and then closed. He watched her and let his thoughts amble off the beaten path.

'To think this had nearly been taken away from him—this simple and joyful fulfillment. Sato had come close to losing his life on a desperate mission, had carelessly and drunkenly risked his relationship with Tama for the company of a stranger...and had watched Tama imperil herself at the hands of a vicious psychopath at the Exam. This moment, just to relax in good health and peace beside her, was so valuable that it stung Sato to think of how he used to overlook such precious gifts."

"And if I ever see that bastard again...I'll cut him down no matter what. He can hide in any shadow he wants, but I'll still roast him with a light-wing..." Sato believed that Huo had not been adequately punished. According to Kakashi's most recent update, Leaf's Torture and Interrogation Corps was preparing to package Huo in such a way that he would be deprived of his Tao Arts and Jutsu when turned over to Iwa at an agreed upon mid-point. He had half a mind to follow behind the assigned team and bump off the bastard during the journey, no matter the consequences.

"Hm." Tama cracked an eye open at him, "Why are you scowling, Sato?"

"-oh! I was just thinking." His face slackened again, "I'm still not over what Huo did— the cheap shot he used to hurt you. If I ever get the chance...I know I would kill him. I wouldn't think twice."

"That's not good." Tama's fingertips continued brushing the side of his face, "Huo should be judged by those who are responsible for him and those who let him enter our village. He's not worth your time, Sato. Take it from someone who's fought him."

"I just hate feeling that powerless— that I couldn't do anything to protect you or shut him down." He admitted.

"I understand...but you don't need to hold on to that feeling. It'd be exhausting to maintain that anger wouldn't it?" She reasoned, "There are better things to feel. More important things we can do now..."

Sato couldn't resist the wily smile spreading on his face, "You've got a point there."

"Since we've both been promoted to Chunin, we're now in higher income brackets."

"Yeah." Her eyes shut again as she listened.

"You could...move out of your parents' house, if you wanted." Sato suggested.
"Maybe once I'm done with physical therapy...I could start looking on the west side of Konoha for a place." She guessed sleepily.

"And why would you do that?"

Tama peeked her eyes open again, "Because the west side is cheaper?"

"Actually, Tama, I was thinking you should live with me." His smile widened.

She seemed slightly more awake, "Oh."

Sato waggled his eyebrows enthusiastically at her.

Tama gave it a moment before she asked, "When do I start packing my things?"

"Well, don't hurry. I think we should look at some new places. I'm attached to my flat...but it is kind of beat up and small." He conceded.

She scooched closer to be nose-to-nose with him, "So...still on the west side of the village? Where would you like to go?"

"Anywhere. Let's talk to someone who knows about property hunting."

Tama nodded, "Of course. My dad has a friend who's a realtor, and I bet we can find a nice place to rent if he helps us look."

"Speaking of, I should probably talk to your mom and dad soon." Sato added as he fiddled with strands of her black hair.

"They've both been in higher spirits lately so your timing is ideal." Tama encouraged, "Is it about looking for a pl—?"

"I should get permission first before I marry you." He informed her, "That's the right way to go about it, and maybe it'd make your dad feel a bit more at ease." Sato exhaled roughly as an afterthought, "Or he'd relish one last chance to tell me to go scratch...but I'm hoping that he'll understand."

Tama had gone very still and quiet.

"But what do you think of...something small? It doesn't have to be ornate or garish if you're not into that. Maybe not a wedding-wedding, but, you know— a civil officiant thing." He tried to describe what he had in mind, "It'd be kind of amazing to...come home to you...every day."

After what felt like a while Sato observed as Tama lifted his hand (it had been laced with hers) and lightly slapped her cheek with it. She blinked hard to make sure she was awake.

"Come on now, don't do that." He rubbed her face and then wrapped his arm around her waist, "Did you...have any thoughts on this? Honestly, I think it can be whenever. I've missed you and I just..." Sato gave her a squeeze, "I'm so glad you're okay. I'll always be grateful for that. I can't stand not being with you all of the time." He gulped when she did not respond, and Sato wondered if she was taking him seriously, "Woman, don't leave me hanging! Say some words!"

"I..." She was smiling, "Just wanted a nap."

"You are killing me."

"Well..." Tama grinned a little, "I kind of wanted to get laid first. Before I become a respectful woman who will carry on your family name…"

"Oh for crying out— yeah, sure, if that is a point of contention," Sato tried to wipe the smug look off of her face, "Once you are a bit stronger and out of that therapy routine, I will take care of that for you. No problem. But please tell me that is kind of a yes—?

"It's always been yes," Tama reminded him.

"But not because someone told you it was. You want to marry me because you want me?" He pressed.

"Purely of my own accord and love for you…" She assured him, "Free from external demands, recommendations, or obligations…that is an unfiltered yes."

"Even if it won't be perfect?"

"Nothing ever is."

He cupped her face and kissed her again, "You know that I'm crazy about you, right? That I love you? Even though it took me a while to understand…"

Tama nodded sleepily, "I know it."

Sato pecked her lips and face while she struggled not to drift off, muttering, "Thank you, thank you…I've been dumb. I was scared. I love you…thank you—" Tama silenced him with a warm kiss.

She drew back and gave him a bleary-eyed look, "You're still spiraling with a little bit of post-mission stress. It's okay. You really need a nap, and then afterward you can re-propose if you want to or we'll just accept this one as is…because it was very sweet and I didn't expect it."

"Ah, good. Did it get full points?" Tension seemed to whoosh out of Sato as he relaxed in the embrace.

Tama only yawned back at him and nuzzled into his neck, making happy affirmative sounds.

"Thank you for hanging in there. Thanks for the watermelon…and that shower. And for these pants, and…" A sympathetic response made Sato yawn, "Thanks for…just being glorious."

"Shh." She rested her hands just above his belly button.

Sato took the cue to stop extolling and thanking her, then shut his eyes and settled down to enjoy a rejuvenating, brief sleep.

Naruto wondered if it was only his imagination as he and Jiraiya finally began to see more consistent swatches of blue sky up above. The treacherous, winding path through the hills and jungles surrounding the Toad Valley had made for quite a claustrophobic trip. Also, they were going at a slower pace than anticipated. Jiraiya had complained frequently of lumbar pain as they carried on.

"I think…" Naruto did not want to speak too soon, "We are almost out of here…?"

"Goddamn." Jiraiya took a few tired steps forward to get a glimpse of the waning wilds and greenery ahead, "That took way longer than I remembered. Must be because I'm older and creakier now…"

"That might have something to do with it." For Naruto, it had not been nearly as rough.
"Look up there: a dirt path instead of debris and moss, some unobstructed sky…that's the Fire Country out there. The human-friendly portion of it, anyway." The man mustered the will power to keep moving, "Don't let me stop until we make it to an inn or something. I'm due to pass out."

"You're fine. I'll piggyback you out of here if I have to." Naruto was buoyant, "You can even feel a breeze now!"

"Pff. That's nice. Tell my legs and back that I'm fine. They need some convincing."

By mid-afternoon, after their slow exit from the cusp of the toad wilds and setting out a dirt road spanning rolling hills dotted with sparse trees and plants, a building was spotted on the horizon. Naruto did have to keep up the morale just to get Jiraiya there, schlep him inside, remove his crusty geta in the genkan, greet the innkeeper and then reserve a room. His mentor barely made it through a proper bath to clean jungle grime off before collapsing in a hotel room on a futon.

"You didn't even eat dinner yet. They'll be serving it any minute now." Naruto reminded him from a low table in an adjoining room, "This is a nice place, Ero-sensei. Don't you have another hour in you somewhere?"

"Kid, you don't know what it's like when everything hurts and exhausts you. Nope. You don't catch colds. You don't ache. You don't even bleed for very long with all of that Uzumaki vitality of yours." Jiraiya sniffed, "I am gonna lay here until dinner is served because it makes me feel better."

"Have it your way, you old bag of bones." He chuckled, "I can still talk to you from over here."

Jiraiya let out a long sigh.

"That bath was really nice. I was way dirtier than I realized." Naruto stretched his arms above his head, luxuriating in the robe the inn had provided.

"Yeah, it was refreshing. This is a great place…just as pleasant as I remember it." Jiraiya laced his hands and rested them on his chest, "I haven't been here…since I last stopped by with your dad. That was a hell of a long time ago."

"Wow."

"Yep. Your hair's gotten so long you've started to freakishly resemble Minato, so I'm trying not to mistakenly call you by his name. When you get haircuts it does my memory a favor."

Naruto was amused by that, "Really? I wonder if people would notice if I went home looking like this?"

"In Leaf? I'm thinking it could confuse a good portion of older citizens. Give 'em flashbacks…"

"I don't know if I really want to tell anyone about...Dad. Or anything personal."

"Then don't. Even if they ask you who you're related to, it shouldn't matter." Jiraiya gruffed, "You're amazing all on your own, kiddo. I know they're gonna realize that. Everyone who's ever doubted or overlooked you..."

Naruto pooched his lips at the sentiment.

Jiraiya picked at crust in the corner of his eyes, "Of course I'll take a bit of credit for how amazing you are. I put work into you."
Shortly after that, various plated fish fillets and meats, pickled vegetables, dipping noodles, and soups were brought to the room and carefully set on the table. Jiraiya eventually hobbled over to take a seat across from his student.

Naruto pointed out before tucking into a bowl of soba noodles, "You probably can't tell right now… but everything feels light out here— thin and airy outside of the Toad Valley."

"You're right. I don't feel that because I'm an arthritic mess at present… but I used to be able to notice the difference in chakra density shortly after leaving Mount Myoboku." Jiraiya agreed, "It'll wear off in about a day. You won't notice after that."

"That's what I thought. So, have you ever been to Hidden Sand? What's it like crossing the desert?"

"Well. A lo-oong time ago I made some visits out there. Usually for diplomatic assignments…" The man stopped to bite through a cucumber, "Uh… if I recall… it's not the cleanest, easiest trip. If weather permits and we don't have to deal with a sandstorm, then all we need to do is avoid too much sun exposure and accept that we're going to have sand granules up our ass cracks and everywhere else. For a while."

"Sounds great."

"The crossing isn't great, but Suna is. It's nice there, actually. And going off of what Gaara has shared with us, they've invested quite a bit in public works and greenhouse projects. The city itself has a lot going on, plenty of shade and shopping…" Jiraiya squinted his eyes as he recalled, "Also, the Kazekage's mansion is spectacular. We can count ourselves lucky that Gaara decided to put us up in his home. But he might be singing a different tune after he has to live with us for the first week…"

Naruto gestured his chopsticks at his mentor, "Come on, it won't be that bad. We minded our manners at Ma and Pa's house!"

"Yeah, but you'll get excited and forget yourself. I'm calling it now. You always used to goof off around Gaara." Jiraiya smiled mirthfully, "And I don't think that's ever going to change."

Naruto had to admit that, no, it would probably never change.

With the end of dinner, Jiraiya predictably retired to his room with some fond remarks to his student, shut the shared dividing door, and was soon snoring after that. As it was still a bit early that evening, the sunset darkening along the horizon, Naruto took a seat beside his room's wide glass window. He peered out at the slow Waltz of fireflies above the grass of the inn's yard. He felt somewhat anxious to be apart from Mount Myoboku's lush beauty and security, but the hints of nature blinking and breathing outside calmed him. Naruto stared for a while, propping his cheek up in his palm while he leaned on the pane.

'…so this is weird. I was excited to leave. I wanted to go home and see my friends… get promoted and get back into a mission routine…' Naruto thought to himself, 'And yeah, sure, I am excited, but there's a coating of uncertainty on top of that. I feel nervous. Like, scared of how people might react to me. And-! How am I going to resume life at home without Gaara and Haku around? At least for a while… What's that gonna be like?'

Maybe he would have described himself as an outgoing, courageous fellow before embarking on this training trip with Jiraiya, Naruto figured. But he'd been humbled. He had seen and learned so many incredible things. Valuable things. The more there was to cherish, the more that prickling fear and doubt nipped away at the edges of his bold, vivacious disposition. The well-defined parameters and expectations of his life before the journey, before making discoveries on his own— they had been knocked down and rearranged. Such a change probably wasn’t a bad thing, Naruto thought to himself. He’d walked out of that valley wiser than he’d gone in. These changes, even with the anxiety that accompanied his outlook, these changes were going to benefit others. He could return to the people that needed him with new knowledge to back up his convictions.

‘It’s benefited me too for sure. Even the sad stuff. As hard as it was, knowing it and going through it just…frames life. What I want to do and how I want to live. How to get it right and how to accept when I get it wrong.’ Naruto exhaled deeply through his nostrils, ‘And…I’m kind of freaking out. What are Gaara and Haku like now? Well, aside from how bitchy they are on paper. Or sometimes sentimental. Seems like I only get one tone or the other when they write to me…’ He frowned, ‘Come to think of it…those guys…’

It occurred to him he was mildly annoyed at his two friends.

Not in a friendship-shattering, argument-worthy sort of way. Rather, Naruto was not pleased that Gaara and Haku had unknowingly developed a habit of keeping secrets from each other, while fitting Naruto in the middle as they only shared truths with him. ‘God! What is that about? They really need to knock it off. I mean, I know they went through that phase around the first Chunin Exam where they were arguing and resorting to fisticuffs…but like-! That better not be the norm now. When they’re relaxed they get along great…’ Naruto scratched his chin and stewed on it. ‘I don’t want to be a middle-man when they run afoul of each other, jeez! They need to develop coping tools that don’t constantly involve me.’

Naruto was nodding solemnly as he cradled his face in his palm. He’d tell ‘em.

‘Yeah. I won’t divulge any of the stuff they keep from each other— that’s baggage they can work out. I’m not gonna be a therapist or convey favoritism…because I’ll need them to help me when I feel overwhelmed and pissed too.’ Apart from his concerns about the Akatsuki, enemies of Leaf, and the mysterious attacker who had struck on the night he was born, Naruto was sure he would need backup for other matters as well, ‘Trust! And stuff. I hope that when Gaara gets Haku home, they can take that opportunity to be honest with each other.’

As full dark stretched over the landscape, Naruto noodled on the possible outcomes and watched the intensifying light show of insects trying to attract mates.

‘I guess while I’m in Hidden Sand I can suggest that to Gaara. Gotta be subtle about it, though. He can get so damn defensive…’ He sighed softly, ‘If all else fails I can sick Sakura-chan on him. That’ll keep him—’ Naruto blinked as a rush of longing for his own girlfriend stormed the front of his mind, ‘Hinata.’ He rubbed his face roughly in his hands, ‘Now that I think about it…she didn’t answer the letter I sent with Kosuke when I left the valley.’

Naruto stood and crossed the room to his travel bag, retrieving a tooth brush and paste while reasoning, ‘Maybe she's busy?’ He snapped the light on in the connecting washroom, thinking to himself as he brushed his teeth, ‘But even when she's busy she'll usually write a little something…’ He spat and looked up at himself in the mirror, ‘Maybe Kosuke's just running late finding me? Gamakichi didn't always have the fastest turnaround when he was doing deliveries…’ More brushing.

He finished and rinsed his mouth, feeling restless again, ‘I've just been spoiled. When she'd use her jutsu to visit me—that was instant gratification. I should be patient.’ Naruto splashed his face with water at the sink, ‘She'll send a response. It'll be soon. I just want…’

Sniffing at his harried reflection, Naruto shut the light off and saw nothing more in the mirror, ‘I want her to drop by, even for a minute. Just to say hello or that she is busy. She's been absent for weeks. I know she liked to check on me frequently—’ He shuffled over to his futon and crumpled into a heap upon it. ’Was it because Hinata saw me get like that? Did I say something? I thought all of that was fine! It feels like she's been avoiding me.’

Naruto hiked a thin blanket over his head, muttering, ”Yikes, what a spoiled kid I am.”

In the dark and still quiet of the hotel room, he let his racing thoughts coast to a stop while breathing evenly. ’I don’t think Hinata is displeased with me about anything. I told her I was getting close to a breakthrough in Sage Training, so maybe she wanted to give me space to concentrate? That makes more sense.’ Naruto took the rational side of it, ’Or maybe she just needs time to herself when she doesn’t have missions? That’s not a crime.’ With his eyes shut, Naruto settled on those assumptions and made peace with it. It was alright to miss her. There was no real need to panic, as all of their previous encounters had proven very encouraging.

Soon, after his objectives in Suna were seen to, he would return home to Konohagakure. Naruto reminded himself that he wouldn’t be waiting on Hinata’s correspondence or jutsu to get a fix. He could see that marvelous young woman simply by crossing town.

Naruto rolled over onto his stomach and exhaled shakily, thinking about hearing her voice, catching up with her, reaching out to feel her under his fingertips, breathing her airy, blossom scent, becoming closer…

After silently venting some of this frustration, Naruto drifted into a tranquil, opaque sleep.

Fireflies made their appeals to one another deep into the night, beneath the tall moon that shone diaphanous light through a filigree of clouds. Penetrating the window, moonbeams stretched across the floor and brushed Naruto’s back while he was curled up in deep dreams.

When Hinata did flit her consciousness over in the dark hours before dawn, she did not notice much of anything from Naruto’s surface senses. While he was asleep, her presence was funneled into the dim paths of his unconscious mind, back to the place where she had encountered a strange prisoner.
She hesitated for a moment in the wide, watery space. It was tempting to wake Naruto and greet him, congratulating him on his success and asking about some of the things he had recently written to her.

’But I promised that I…would come back here. I don’t know if I should tell Naruto-kun just yet.’
Hinata considered, ’He may not be comfortable telling me about Kurama yet, or what all of this means…’

That alone indicated to her what a violation of privacy it was, but Hinata also recalled that she had promised the prisoner of the seal that she would return. ’Tomorrow. I will see how Naruto-kun is doing in the morning and not bring any of this up. I know he will talk to me about it when he wants to.’ She crossed the space and stopped just short of the bars, glancing around curiously at the featureless dark.

”Um…” She was not precisely sure this was a good idea.

…I was skeptical that you would come back here. You took your time.

”Y-Yes, I…had a lot of work to do. Also, I don’t know if it’s alright for me to be here.” Hinata peeped.

Nothing is stopping you. Doujutsu that peer into the fabric of existence are not much concerned with consent or silly things like that. Kurama scoffed, Had you arrived earlier this evening, you would have found Naruto slaking his lust for you. Even if he’s quiet about it, his thoughts are very loud.

She stammered and then stopped to gulp air. It wasn't entirely surprising. By now she was well aware of Naruto's feelings. Hinata collected herself to advise, "Please do not discuss the…private business of others…"

Why not? A growl came from the dark, Your ability disregards the privacy of others completely.

"Yes, but I won't make rude comments about anyone." She defended in a small voice, "All my life, accidentally seeing others when I shouldn't…I try to be respectful."

Or at least make it seem you are respectful. The voice drawled.

To change the subject, Hinata brought up some of her recent missions and pastimes, and how a friend was recently healed from a grave injury. Kurama wondered if she had anything to do with her friend's recovery, but the girl admitted, no, not really. She would celebrate it all the same.

Kurama rumbled, I know something else that will please you. If you hadn't already noticed, Naruto has left the home of the toads and is heading to Hidden Sand.

She had noticed a slight change in geography when contacting Naruto. Hinata tried not to convey too much excitement, "Yes, Naruto-kun told me he is on his way."

How can you say that so calmly? Don't you suspect him? To make haste to you and have his way with you? The unseen voice snickered, He is such an obvious creature.

"N-No…” Hinata made an attempt to bashfully wave off the topic.

I have seen how you two interact. How dare you deny it, you red-faced human! I've witnessed the act from every mortal perspective. Male and female. My previous containers were women and I remember what debauchery they partook of. Kurama prattled as if he had authority on the matter as a bystander, It's never boring. Sometimes it's funny, but always a spectacle.

She cleared her throat and requested, "Please don't talk about that."

Then what should I talk about? I'd hate to disappoint as a conversationalist. The subject seemed relevant.

"Well, I think it is relevant, but—"

Then I will talk about it. The voice was amused.

Hinata tried to keep it together, "I-I! Um. I just don't know how to bring that subject up…to Naruto…"

Flat out tell him to his face. Kurama recommended, Or you can wait until he's begging on his knees for you. Thoughtfully, he went on, Or I can make Naruto do it to you, if you like.

Hinata was visibly startled by the suggestion. In the dark of the seal's prison, Kurama was softly laughing, You don't know how to be teased. I don't do things like that.

She held her face in her hands and tried to settle down, her shoulders dropped as she took a cooling breath.
\textbf{Little Moon Children get flustered so easily. Kurama observed.}

Curiously, Hinata looked up into the dark space, "Why do you call me that? What does that mean?"

\textit{I told you already.}

"But my ancestors were—"

\textbf{Look at your reflection.} The voice insisted.

It took a moment, but Hinata recalled she would be able to glimpse herself in the water of the flooded floor. She about-faced and glanced down, not as astonished as she once was to see the horned man looking back at her. She tried to make some estimates while able to see the disjointed reflection so clearly. He appeared middle-aged, silver-hair furling down his back, white eyes on a careworn face, small horns as pale as the rest of him curling up from his forehead.

"Who is he?" She wondered.

Kurama spoke casually, as if he could see what she was seeing, \textit{That is Lord Hamura, the Moon Brother. He was a good brother to my father. I never got to know him well, but he visited occasionally until Father died and gave him instructions. He and his people went to the moon as guards, I told you.}

Hinata turned about, terribly confused, searching for the source of the voice, "Your father? His brother…is…why am I like him? Am I him? And why did they go-?"

\textit{We are all more closely related than you know.} Kurama told her, \textit{It would take too much time to explain, and these visits of yours are unsanctioned. Naruto probably won’t like it. But when you see to that, you can come again if you want me to explain. I know some, not all.} He yawned, \textit{And you are cutting into my rest now.}

"Oh!" She felt the need to apologize.

\textit{You have nothing to fear when you see your reflection.} He added, \textit{You are merely a protector.}

"…that's…good." Hinata reasoned, "The next time I visit…I would like to learn more. And to learn about you too."

\textit{Go now and sleep.} Kurama recommended tiredly.

She set out to cross the room, exiting through unconscious dimness. Hinata was yet undecided on how to broach her discovery with her boyfriend, but as she withdrew and returned to her own body in her own home, it did not trouble her much as she fell asleep.

---

The next morning, when Temari pointed out to Gaara that they were dressed in corresponding shirts (oxblood) Kankuro stopped to give them a comparative once-over.

"Hmm. You were all buddy-buddy before we left the house this morning…I guess the mimicry is a subliminal thing." Kankuro assessed. He’d missed breakfast and was still wearing his customary black outfit, but if he had joined his siblings maybe he too would have jumped on the psychological matching band wagon.

"We just own a lot of the same colors." Temari led her brothers down the street as they left the grocery store together, "And Gaara buys three of the same top, for some reason, so it's just simple probability."

"Not always." It was a weak protest. He did wear a lot of red, black, and beige multiples of v-necks, but not for everything.

"Hey, whose bag has the coconut water in it? I wanted to drink mine now." Temari was examining her tote grumpily as she walked. Her brothers obediently searched their bags, and Gaara handed over her boxed drink.

"Thanks." She unscrewed the cap and resumed the march, "Do you think this is enough for dinner tonight? We have a few extra mouths to feed."

"It had better be. If not, I'm kicking those Tide kids out and they can eat at Tanwei or wherever."
Kankuro turned to look to his brother, "Gaara, don't you have that meeting with Wind Country diplomats to get to?"

"I'm stalling."

Temari gestured to him with her boxed water, "Obviously. Why else would he accompany us? He hates sitting in his office, and he doesn't like food shopping much either."

"They're not going to adjourn that meeting even if you show up late." Kankuro reminded him, "Get over there already."

Another flimsy excuse on Gaara's part, "Baki and Zeriko are there. That should satisfy Tide's questions."

"Nah. Since our subcontracting for Tide's shinobi training ended, they keep honking about setting up major trade deals." His brother tried to snatch a grocery bag from Gaara, but Gaara nudged him away, "Those are discussions the Kazekage should sit in on."

"Menma's there, I presume." Temari took a wild guess.

"No duh." Kankuro sniffed.

"We should be discussing how to prepare for the Accelerated Chunin Exam." Gaara tried to steer towards a new subject, "Trade talks can wait."

"You're already making them wait." His sister chuckled, "Just go. Kankuro and I have time off, so we're going to nap and cook all day. Get your least favorite tasks over with and then join us."

Gaara's pout wavered slightly, supposing, yes, he'd get it over with, rush a few things at the office, and then go home to eat and sleep. Live a little.

"Look," Kankuro said in all seriousness, "Menma's a good guy. I've gotten to know him, and to be honest, I put that kid through his paces back when I didn't trust him. You'll warm up to him, Gaara."

"I'll warm up to him when Matsuri stops sighing all the time and rushing her assignments while Menma is in town." Gaara countered.

"Do you have a problem with efficiency?" Temari wondered, "Because Matsuri's speed is something any leader would use as an example to throw in the faces of lazy, slacker teams."

Gaara just made a noncommittal nasal sound in response.
Kankuro provided additional perspective, "Maybe it's not her speed and efficiency, but, you know, the romantic sighs and stuff?"

"Get over it." Temari deadpanned, "Is anything else bothering you Gaara? Just so we can get any other nonsense out of the way now."

"No." Gaara said.

"That was the least convincing no I have ever heard." Kankuro swung a bag to whack his brother in the leg.

"Wait, let me get a look at him." Temari scrunched her face at Gaara, evaluating him, "Something tells me you're thinking about all the people who annoy you today."

"Ah." Gaara sighed a little, "Can you tell if you're on that list?"

"I'm not. Kankuro isn't either."

"Not yet." Gaara warned.

"It's Haku." She guessed again.

Gaara only frowned at her while Kankuro concurred, "Bingo."

"He didn't give you the response you wanted when you asked him to come here for the Accelerated Exam." Temari was ever-observant, "So that's been eating you up, eh?"

For a few meters of walking, Gaara did not reply. Then slowly he admitted, "He didn't even sound that sorry or concerned about declining."

"Not on paper." Temari snipped, "But you can make him sorry in person."

"So what's his hold-up? Is he down south curing diseases or something?" Kankuro was genuinely curious.

"No. He just continually abuses the refuge of my patience." Gaara concluded, "While having little to show for his expedition in finding the Yuki clan."

Kankuro turned to Temari, still not up-to-speed with his brother's and sister's knowledge and correspondence with Haku, "Yuki clan…?"

"Oh yeah. He got a name, at least." Temari tacked on.

"Huh, well, good for him." Kankuro said as he drew the glares of his siblings.

"He can postpone the search, or at least accept my help from this point." Gaara asserted, taking the lead as he moved a bit faster than his siblings, "I'll make him regret not coming here to join Naruto and I. He was growling, "I have work for him. Terrible work."

Kankuro checked him, "You sound a little salty, bro."

"It's justified."

"As much as I agree and relate to how you feel," Temari advised sagely, "You need to put all of that out of your mind for now, Gaara. Seriously, get to that meeting."
"I will." He acknowledged as he gave his sister a weary look, "But I need you to think about and be prepared to track Haku. I'll be putting an experienced Sensor team under your command, and give you what intel we've collected so far on where to look around the Water Country."

"Right." She seemed rather bemused even though she had already accepted the mission assignment. Temari cleared her throat and retreated into her own head to actually give it some real, substantial thought. Beside her, Kankuro could sense her abrupt disquiet.

"Kankuro." Gaara addressed him next.

"Yeah?"

"I also need you to think about how we are going to put up with Naruto and Jiraiya-sensei in our home for the next few weeks."

"Really? You didn't stew on that before you invited them?" Kankuro groused, "Or consider the logistics of feeding them, sheltering them, and dealing with their personalities?"

"I have a meeting." Gaara deflected, and then he was off to the city council building.

Temari and Kankuro stopped on the street and goggled at each other. Even on a day off, they were still heaped with quite the workload.

15 meters of sealing calligraphy slowly began to creep across the dirt and stone floor of the courtyard. The writing stretched in a circle around Haku where he sat cross-legged, the shrinking diameter picked up speed as the formula condensed and wound in on itself. The seal crept up from the ground and over his body, streaming into a focal point on his forehead.

Nearby, Hiroshi stood and watched in bemusement with the rear of his tea shop behind him. Ranmaru, Raiga, and Zabuza were also in attendance, stock-still and quiet as they watched the sealing jutsu run its course. Hiroshi tried not to fidget. He'd never seen anything half so strange, least of all on his property.

After all of the brushwork had disappeared and amassed on Haku's forehead, he blinked his eyes open. Zabuza took a loping stride forward and extended a hand to him. Haku regarded the offer for a moment before he took it and was pulled to his feet. The man then scrutinized his face up close, "…well it worked."

Haku exhaled a small sigh of relief.

"Let's accept this development as the newest reason not to use the Cursed Seal that snake gave you." Zabuza reiterated, muttering, "Four hours of my life…writing those seals…"

"I do appreciate your help." Haku thanked him.

"Hmf." Zabuza palmed the young man's cheek and took another hard look at his forehead, "Yeah, it's there alright. Can't see it yet…but it'll show up as a permanent mark once you finish working on it." Some of the ink on his hand swiped off onto Haku's face. When Zabuza moved to the side of the yard to pack up the seal-writing supplies, Hiroshi and Ranmaru came forward to examine him.

"Hold still a moment…" Hiroshi tried to dab at Haku's messy cheek with a dry rag, "Seems like you'll need to wash up later. You've got a bit of ink just there…"

"That's alright. I can't believe we were able to reproduce that formula correctly." Haku was still astounded they had accomplished it, "If Zabuza or I made one single mistake…you all may have witnessed a grisly mis-sealing."

"Perhaps you are blessed?" Hiroshi surmised warmly, "You've been bestowed with a gift from each of the Legendary Sannin. Take these chances to grow into someone great."

Haku shared a fond chuckle with the shop owner before he felt Raiga's finger flick strike him in the forehead. The swordsman was not impressed, "I don't see what the big deal is. There's nothing there."

From the workbench, Zabuza growled over his shoulder, "That's why we've never counted on you for your powers of perception…goddamn ignoramus." Raiga ignored the remarks.

"Raiga, special things don't always happen right away." Ranmaru reminded his companion.

"Yes, I still need to charge the seal with chakra." Haku explained, "I don't know how long that will take."

With the spectacle concluded in an anti-climactic fashion, Zabuza hauled away his supplies and made himself scarce, and Ranmaru and Raiga set out shopping at the main street's market. Haku ventured indoors to help Hiroshi prepare the tea house for a late opening. The portly man asked Haku to wash his hands and face first before touching anything in the shop.

Hiroshi made small talk as he set Haku to work fetching ingredients for a kuzumochi mixture to be chilled, "I'm sure Migawari-san will be pleased to hear that you were able to make use of that jutsu he's held onto for so long…"

"I think he only gave it to me out of pity…that he expects I'll only invite unwanted attention or danger here." Haku imagined, "He isn't wrong about that."

"Well you said it can save your life, if used correctly. I suppose that make less work for him if you ever get into another fight."

Haku tipped a cup of kuzu root starch into the bowl Hiroshi was mixing, "It could happen. We need to keep the peace on this island. I don't like that Zabuza's presence has made this town less safe for the elderly who live here."

"Look at it both ways— we're securer in some respects with the two of you around…Raiga and Ranmaru too. There are other benefits to it, besides!" Hiroshi recalled cheerfully, "That jewelry you handed out to townspeople…though I don't know where you got it…the Shibasaburō sisters told me they were able to sell it and pay off their mortgage with that income. Your gesture helped many people here."

Preparing metal pans to mold the mixture, Haku assured his friend, "That was the idea." He was hopeful that Temari received some of the pieces he had sent to her with a message. He doubted that she would reject such rare finery.

After filling six molds, heating tea kettles, and setting snacks and breads on display in the shop, Haku unlocked the store and swept the floors as Hiroshi directed. The man counted a cash drawer to begin the day. The morning dragged on with no visitors, and Haku was about to relax and share a pot of tea with Hiroshi when Zabuza suddenly returned. He stormed through the door in a great hurry, snatched Haku by the arm, and pulled him into the back room of the shop just off of the anterior kitchen. Hiroshi sputtered over his tea cup, unsure of what that interruption meant.

Squashed flat against the plaster wall of the pantry, Haku snapped indignantly, "What are you "Shut it." Zabuza held him still and hushed him, turning his head to listen for any activity in the shop. The door chime rang again as visitors entered the tea house and began conversing with Hiroshi.

"Zabuza, you—"

"You seriously need to shut the fuck up right now." Zabuza hissed in a whisper, "A team from Hidden Mist is on patrol."

Haku fell silent after receiving the news. He and Zabuza listened in, and neither were surprised to hear the voices of two adult male strangers asking to be served tea as they noisily took seats at a table. One of them also asked if Hiroshi had encountered any rogue ninja lately.

"I can't say that I have." Hiroshi replied innocently, "Not unless these rogue ninja are pushing seventy years old?"

"Nah. More like early thirties…and a teenager." The Mist nin grunted.

"This is a retirement town. We don't appreciate mischief here." Hiroshi defended, "I'm sure I would have spotted any troublemakers of that description."

"Then you don't have very good eyes." A sharp voice replied. The speaking Mist ninja was not as lax as his teammate, and continued to pry for information, "More than a month ago, Hidden Mist put out an alert for a missing Hunter squadron. Do you know how often our Hunters go missing?" The man sniffed before taking a sip of tea, "They don't. We've been scouring five of the islands west of Kirigakure that the squadron was overseeing. Nanakusa is one of them."

"I still don't see why you would look here for anyone dangerous enough to trifle with Hunter-nin?" Hiroshi stuck to his convincing, ignorant-old-man tone. He was also serving cheesecake, which the less-astute Mist ninja began gobbling up.

"One in five odds gives us a good chance of finding whoever took out that squad— really one in four odds now that we've completed a clean sweep of an island south of here." The Mist team leader announced, "I wouldn't give so much as a backwards glance at this mountain of adult diapers if not for the fact that the Sensor-type nin of our team went missing. Do you know what that is, old man?"

"No."

"A Sensor is a ninja that can detect who the fuck might be hiding in this piss-hole." The man clacked his tea cup down angrily, "Yusho doesn't carelessly wander off during assignments. He checks in frequently when he goes off to investigate suspicious shit."

Worriedly, Haku flicked his eyes up at Zabuza, determining from the look on the man's unwrapped face that he had absolutely killed and disposed of Yusho, the Sensor ninja. Haku's scowl conveyed what a terrible mistake that had been on Zabuza's part.

"We do have some secret gambling houses here." Hiroshi conceded, "Maybe he got caught up in a game?"

"Yusho doesn't gamble." The subordinate Mist shinobi spoke as he munched, "But he does like to get drunk and laid though. Maybe he found a nice old lady here?"

"Not on assignment he wouldn't, Norio." The team leader then sneered at Hiroshi, "My team wouldn't be caught dead looking for leisure in a place like this. So that got me to thinking…what might the seniors here have to gain if a rogue ninja was taking refuge in one of their little cottages? Quite a bit, in times like these."

Hiroshi calmly brought over water to refill the tea pot. Norio wanted another piece of cheesecake.

"People like you can go missing." The Mist captain lowered his voice, "A modest tea shop owner… his whole livelihood stolen. He can disappear without a trace. An old man like you…knows the value of protection when he sees it. How else can you live peacefully in the Water Country?"

"Good luck, I suppose. And a pension."

The Mist captain pushed back his seat and stood, towering over Hiroshi. His stare bored holes in the man's head, suspicious and impatient.

"Yo, Suetada-taicho. At least let him bring me my cake first before you make him squeal." Norio grumbled.

In the back room, Haku tensed. The escalating danger made him want to act— if he was quick enough, he could at least subdue the captain to protect Hiroshi. Yet he couldn't budge Zabuza.

Incredulous, Haku glared at the man for a long moment before silently struggling, unable to escape the grip that pinned him to the wall. One hand was clapped over Haku's mouth as the boy's eyes darted wildly, alarmed, and Zabuza held his hip in the other, locked a leg around Haku's to stop him from bolting.

Suetada wrenched the plate of cake from Hiroshi's hand and dropped it in front of his whining subordinate, backing Hiroshi against the counter as he loomed furiously, "I know my way around these parts. I can smell secrets. Are there Swordsmen hiding around here?"

"T-The—?"

"Any of the disbanded Shinobi Swordsmen of Mist— any of those fuckers." Suetada elaborated, "I wouldn't put it past a fat hog like you to trade shelter in exchange for protection. I've got news for you, porky, Mist isn't blind. It sees more than any of you impoverished bumpkins can imagine. We have eyes and ears everywhere, even among you old fucks." He bared his teeth threateningly, "So it doesn't pay to side with the resistance. You either work with Mist…or you can die like the hog you are while we eat our lunch here and take you for every Ryo in that drawer."

Teary-eyed, Hiroshi spoke in a quaking voice, "I d-don't know…anyone like that…"

Norio watched curiously from the table, stuffing his face. He wondered how his captain was going to work over a defenseless tea shop owner.

"But I…wish I did." Hiroshi sniffled.

Suetada gave him a baffled look, "—what'd you just say?"

In the pantry, Haku was struggling again, biting Zabuza's hand and kicking him as quietly as possible. If Hiroshi did not have the sense to protect himself or misdirect the Mist captain, they needed to do something.

"It'd be wonderful to have some protection around here…the kind you were talking about." Hiroshi elaborated, "Every year it's the same old thing— we pay dues to our Mist contact named Kino. I don't know if that rotten slob's still alive…but this island has made him rich if that money never made it back to Kirigakure." Hiroshi shrugged with hefty shoulders, "If I am going to die here, I suppose that's it. We don't have much left to give. We don't have anything to hide. I only have 3,000 Ryo in that drawer, if you're interested. Eat the bread on the bottom shelves, it's fresher…but I still try to sell the stale stuff."

Norio exchanged a glance with his captain, perplexed.

"I hate to waste your time, really. I couldn't even point you in the right direction if I wanted to, but I just— I have no idea what you've been talking about!" Hiroshi falsely confessed, "I don't know about Sensors or Swordsmen or whatever Mist's doing, besides taking my money. You can kill me if you want, but that would just encourage townspeople here to harbor the rogues you're imagining, no? It'd just make it worse."

"Then we could flush them out." Suetada growled, "Should we leave your corpse here…or out in the street?"

"The picnic tables beside the crematory would be most convenient. I wouldn't want Hasekura-san to throw his back out disposing of me. Make it a short walk." Hiroshi suggested.

Suetada leveled a discerning look at the old shop owner, mulling it over.

"We don't need more angry old people on this island— not like the first one. It could promote rebel sympathy." Norio polished off the last of the tea, "I don't see the point in killing an old fat guy who doesn't know gumdrops about anything. He's a dumb 'ol brick who makes a mean cake…"

"Or he's a liar." Suetada sensed it.

Hiroshi just shrugged at him. Truly, if this was the end, and his friends in the back room did not spring to his rescue, what more could he do but make things less of a hassle for the elderly mortician up the street? Life was hard enough in Nanakusa.

Norio stood from his chair with a burp, announcing, "Well, I'm gonna look around for Yusho. He's off fucking a granny somewhere, I bet. Gotta keep him on task. Do what you have to, Captain." And he was off and out of the shop with the door chime's sounding.

Things became eerily silent. Haku had no idea what was going on at the shop's front, and resisting Zabuza's hold was proving fruitless. He won't let me do anything! How unlike him to act so cowardly…and if this is a serious threat, surely we could do something about it together?" A puff of air escaped his nostrils, frustrated, and Haku gradually noticed the hand not covering his mouth had wandered. Zabuza's hold on his hip had strayed upward, the rough pad of a thumb swiping purposefully over his stomach. Haku stared without seeing, massively confused by the grope. That had not been an arbitrary touch— not like an exchange of tools, utensils or food, nor like the contact of training. With a furrowed brow, he mouthed the words against Zabuza's palm while thrashing again, What are you doing? Let go of me. He met the man's narrow, steel eyes without flinching,
You don't get to touch me. Haku got a good shove in and nearly freed himself, but after that Zabuza wrapped a hand around his neck as if to choke him.

Beyond the storage room, the silence was broken by the door's bell once more. Hiroshi let out a long, petrified sigh that his concealed companions could hear. The choke hold was only for show, as Zabuza applied no force behind it. Haku tore away from him after that, knocking into a prep table and sending bowls clanging and tumbling. He hooked around the corner doorway and into the shop, bracing Hiroshi as the man keened sideways over the display counter.

"Are you alright? How did you get him out, Hiroshi-san?" Haku was aghast.

"Easy…I gave him all of the money in my drawer. As one often does during a stick-up…" The man chuckled in fright, "He said it would have been too much effort to kill me…"

Haku braced his shoulders, "I'll get it back for you. Stay here while I—"

"Don't move a fucking muscle." Zabuza warned from the doorway, "We're not messing with rat-face Suetada. That's not a fight worth picking."

"He just—!"

"I know what he did. I know what he didn't do." The man stalked through the room and peered out between the blinds of the shop window, "For instance, he didn't vaporize your old man with Boil Release right where he stood."

Haku kept a hand on Hiroshi's shoulder, still listening to Zabuza in spite of his indignation, "Boil Release?"

"Terumi Suetada is loyal only to the Mist Village. He's good at two things: reasoning and fighting in close quarters." Zabuza snorted, "Polar opposite of Thunderbrain, really. At least Raiga had the sense to duck in cover too when those fucks started strolling through here…"

Hiroshi had wilted from anxiety, breaking out into a sweat. Haku shot Zabuza a livid look before he guided Hiroshi to the back stairwell and up into his living space. He set Hiroshi down on a sofa to relax and promised to check on him soon. Then, Haku returned to the tea house on the first floor, finding Zabuza still standing by the window and watching activity on the street.

"You would have let him die, if that captain decided to not take Hiroshi-san at his word." Haku locked the shop's door for good measure and dimmed the lights of the place, "You had no right to stop me from helping him. Even if he killed me, Suetada was alone. You could have—"

"Spare me the lecture. I know what kind of a threat he is. At any given time, you have no idea what the hell is going on down here or how things work." The man grunted at him, "I'm not going to let you drag me into fights I know I can avoid."

"You can't always fight for money. You need to fight to help others." Haku stood in the long shadow cast by a tea display, "If you intend to free Kirigakure and mend what its current leadership has destroyed, you can't be just like them. You can't become what you replace."

"That bleeding heart sentiment won't win any—"

"Stop acting as if you don't need anyone or that you're incapable of concern for the welfare of others!" Haku railed at him, wide-eyed and bristling, "Even you can't go on like that! Not for the goal you've set— it'd be pointless! Why change anything if you don't care? So that you can revel alone at your accomplishment?" He brought his fist down on the countertop beside him, "Are you so afraid of growing and changing that you can only hide behind an image? To be something better terrifies you."

Zabuza turned away from the window to stare at the whelp, briefly lit with an apoplectic expression that colored his face with an unusual amount of emotion. He said nothing because Haku's words had sunk in and rang true. That momentary anger fizzled while Zabuza stood there, inured to the subject that Haku had brought to the forefront and challenged him with. There were many days he wanted to claim that he knew better than the righteous, know-it-all waif, but today Zabuza could not.

"You have said yourself that you can't do anything about Mist's oppression on your own…that you would need my help." Haku reminded him, "That you would have to bribe Terumi Mei's rebel forces to cooperate with you— and you've even accepted Raiga and Ranmaru's assistance. Why in the world would any of us try to aid you when we can be sure that you care nothing for our prosperity?"
He lowered his voice, "I have done more for you than I ever should have. You've told me nothing about my clan. You trade empty promises in exchange for an onerous goal."

Not visibly moved by the plea, Zabuza plucked a pastry from the display and helped himself, "So you're saying that none of this is worth it?"

"If you were in my place trying to find out where you come from, would you think any of this is worth it?"

"Probably not." He could admit that in fairness, "I would have killed me already."

Haku had his mouth pressed in a hard line, staring boldly. If he could not make a clear point now about Zabuza's most obvious flaw, there may never be another chance to do it.

The man was chewing nonchalantly, "But you didn't."

"Plenty of others will have the opportunity and desire to kill you." Haku pointed out.

"What do you want? Some metamorphosis out of me? That I might do any of this the right way, or actually win people's trust? Because that scenario has been stacked against me for a pretty long time." Zabuza quipped, "Even if I gave a shit about people, saved them, whatever...they'd never believe it. Anything I did would not be considered authentic. I won't genuinely be trusted. That's what is really pointless."

"Try anyway." Haku insisted, "Should you never be accepted or trusted by others again, you can still choose to do good things."

"Doesn't sound like there's much gratification in that line of work." He set the pastry down and stalked closer, "And that's easy for you to say, coming from you—a shiny do-gooder who's so invested in making life great for everyone."

"I haven't gotten all of it right. I've made mistakes and hurt others." Haku moved back a step when Zabuza approached him, "But the attempt holds more value than the excuses we make for doing nothing."

"So I make excuses?" Zabuza was less than an arm's length away, and the proximity again stirred the uncomfortable feeling that Haku had experienced earlier in the pantry.

"All of the time."

"How do you know the difference between me making an excuse or using common sense?" He rumbled.

"I don't always know the difference." Haku stopped inching backwards, deciding that it was better to take a stand against the intimidation, "But I'm a fast learner."

"Ohh. Then I should be more like you? Think and act more like you?" Zabuza was still too close, and slipped a strand of Haku's hair between his fingertips where it framed his face, "Do I need to start looking like you too?"

He jerked his head away, baffled by the weird interaction.

"If I'm going to stick my neck out for people and be sensitive and all of that shit...though I'm going to fuck that up plenty...you're telling me the attempt matters," Zabuza leveled with him, "In that For a harebrained moment, Haku was not at all sure what Zabuza wanted in compensation. He dearly hoped it would not have to do with any of the vaguely non-platonic signals he’d gotten that day. To escape the awkward vicinity, Haku brushed past him to clean up the mess that Mist ninja had left on a table. He asserted while he worked, "I am not exchanging anything for that. You still owe me information about my clan. Because you feel it's fair to withhold it until we liberate Kirigakure, if you know anything at all…this change should be voluntary."

"No. It won't be voluntary."

When Haku felt Zabuza's hand close around the scruff of his tunic, pulling him away from his task, he felt an urgent flight instinct kick in. Something about this was most assuredly not the same. His suspicions were immediately confirmed when he couldn't swat the man off, and then began to struggle to avoid being restrained again. Haku used a succession of Taijutsu arm locks in response to being dragged, and nearly got the better of Zabuza with a swipe to the eye before an elbow jab in the stomach doubled Haku over. While he gasped for breath, he was again pinned to a shop wall, but Haku had a hand free. He slipped a small knife from the holster under his shirt and pressed it to the area above Zabuza's larynx, cutting into flesh there. The man froze.

"I don't know what you think you're doing…" Haku was electrified with adrenalin, "But you can stop, or I will make you stop."

"What, do you think I've been doing these things for you for free? Sealing projects that go beyond basic training, letting you take shares of a bounty, talk to mob contacts…humoring the posse of dimwits you keep around?"

"Let go of me." He watched Zabuza bleed.

"I don't give handouts. I never will." Zabuza warned him, "And you like to take an awful lot from me."

"I'll kill you." Haku reminded him of the position he was in.

"You would have done that without hesitation if you actually meant to." The man scoffed, "You cause me a lot of trouble, Haku. You can't pay me with money, and you have lousy judgement about how to tackle Mist Village issues." Zabuza asked him, "What do I get out of this?"

With an athletic twist, Haku kicked Zabuza off and cut a line over his clavicle, incensed, "Are you out of your mind? I would never agree to something like that—I'm not for sale—I'm a student and maybe even an ally in your endeavor to stop the Akatsuki in Mist." He righted himself and took a breath, "If I had known you expected repayment for the things I asked your help with, I never would have asked."

Zabuza had ventured around the corner into the kitchen, stemming the bleeding at his neck with a towel, "Who else are you gonna ask?"

"You are shameless." Irate, Haku returned to the table to take away settings and the teapot, "Go back to Moji, you dog. Attention there is cheap."

"That's not on the agenda."

"Right. With Mist patrols active on the local islands, you might be apprehended." Haku recalled, making a racket in the kitchen, "And I would not be motivated in the slightest to intervene."
"Quit fussing like a woman, no one needs that bitchfest."

Haku maintained, "I'm reacting the way anyone would react to what you did."

"Well if that's off the table, you carping prude, I've got another suggestion." Zabuza was glancing down interestedly at the cloth that had been soaked, as if his own blood was an uncommon sight, "You want me to adopt some selfless, altruistic attitude wherein I respect and serve ungrateful denizens who already hate me. That it? Be more like you." While Haku watched him warily from the sink Zabuza elaborated, "Then you should be more like me."

"I don't have the stomach for it."

"Likewise, dipshit. Do you see now what you're asking me to do? To be something I'm naturally not?"

"You are not naturally an unfeeling, selfish brute. What was denied of you in Kirigakure as you grew up, and the horrible demands made of you—that's why you're convinced who you are now is who you were meant to be." Haku chucked another dry towel at Zabuza so he could put pressure on his injury, "I could have been the same as you. I know you remember me—where I was, that day. Alone and near death after I killed my father." He shared a sensitive detail about his past, "The environment you are in changes your perceptions. If you had a different opportunity, the support of others, a secure village, and dedicated yourself to a different goal…you wouldn't even know yourself as you are now. You would be someone else."

They had a staredown for a time and Haku supposed he was preparing a counterargument.

"Fuck it. You're right." Zabuza conceded.

Haku's eyebrows shot up. He had left the tap running and hurriedly shut it off before the sink overflowed.

"That doesn't mean you aren't still asking a lot of someone who wouldn't know decency if it fucking slapped me in the face." The man gruffed, "But it isn't something I've tried yet. If that's what it takes to get those rebel twits to work with me, and to actually affect change in Hidden Mist…screw it. You said attempts matter."

"They do." Haku said in astonishment, "Then for your first exercise: consider helping your friends when they are in crisis…" He added harshly, "And keep your hands off of me."

"Don't bombard me, fuck. One thing at a time."

"These are simple demands."

"Whatever. Then in exchange—you've gotta think more like me. Less reckless, bleeding-heart bullshit. Suetada would've sautéed your organs before you even knew about his Blood Limit." Zabuza informed him, "You're going to learn your way around here…recognize the names and descriptions of Mist ninja who are trouble, I've got old records and stuff for that. You should also start practicing with a spare needle, because I need you to get familiar with Kushimaru's blade."

"I don't know what you're—"

"Mine is a replica of the real Nuibari, and it's busted…but hell, start somewhere. You need to get a feel for it." The man noticed his bleeding had slowed, so he removed the cloth from his neck, "Before I go digging around for the Master Scroll…wherever it was buried with Mangetsu…I want you to know what you're doing."
"I don't need any of that." Haku protested.

"You're going to need it, even if you didn't sign up to succeed a Swordsman. You already have." Zabuza leaned on the prep table and crossed his arms, "That's a weapon you'll want at your disposal when we're knocking at Mist's door."

"I won't be keeping it when all of this is over with. I'll return to my friends."

"Suit yourself. Pass it on to the next shinobi worthy of it... or leave it behind for pig-headed kids to scrap over because they think they can handle it. That's how it worked in the old days." He gave a small shrug, "Are you gonna heal my neck or not? Get over here. I'm practically hemorrhaging."

"You're joking." Haku said flatly, "You deserved that."

"I already agreed to the stupid, compulsory hero shit you shoved down my throat."

"That has nothing to do with the unpardonable molestation you tried to get away with!"

"I explained that already, and I'm not going to bother with your frigid ass again." Zabuza assured him, "What's that medical training good for? Get to it."

Haku muttered in irritation, "You really do have a long way to go..." He crossed over and demanded, "Keep your hands like that where I can see them, and don't move." Scowling, he clapped his palms over Zabuza's injuries to seal them up with chakra.

"Suetada and his lackey might still be out there." Zabuza wondered out loud.

"Then you can deal with them on your own."

"The best way to deal with them is to lay low. And what was all that junk you were spewing about caring and cooperating?"

"You requested one step at a time." Haku reminded him. He finished his work and then turned for the stairwell to the second floor, "I'm going to make sure Hiroshi-san is feeling alright. Since you're trying to understand what it's like being concerned about others, you should come along and see how it's done."

In great annoyance, Zabuza watched the back of Haku's head as he carried on. He followed after him while tenderly rubbing his neck.

A few days later, the first leaf on one of the thousands of trees in Konohagakure was tinged red in anticipation of autumn. The rest remained stubbornly green, dedicated to the lingering warmth of late summer.

That day, returning from the easternmost reaches of the Fire Country, Kakashi's team was traveling with a bit less speed after completing a mission. It was the first mission that Tama had been cleared for after Tsunade's evaluation of her. It involved diplomacy, supervision, and haste-free travel. The Hokage figured that was a reasonably prosaic assignment that would get her late-bloomer Chunin back on track as her body strengthened.

Of course, in spite of the unbearably dull task, Sakura and Kiba were ecstatically happy. Kakashi too was in a most pleasant mood while concealing a persistent smile beneath his mask.

When Tama began to lag behind from exhaustion on the return route, she gave in and summoned her bicycle from a tool scroll. It was a bit easier to coast along beside Sakura as Kiba and Kakashi headed the front of the group. Akamaru orbited between the divided parties of the team.

"So you were saying-?" Sakura asked with hushed enthusiasm.

Tama had a forgetful look on her face, "What was I saying?"

"Before the bike— you were telling me about a shower."

"Oh, right," Tama recalled where she left off, "I washed off with Sato and it was nice. We caught up and talked."

"Anything else-?"

"...well yeah."

Sakura applied the gossiping pressure and flared her nostrils, "Did you... Do. It?"

"Sort of." Tama yielded with a small smile, "I was feeling way more tired and frail that first day he came home. So it was just—" Tama gave a casual shrug as she pedaled, "Lots of touching and kissing and he enjoyed it a lot."

"Oh," Sakura was mildly crestfallen, "Right, I know you're still on the mend. Well, did either of you finish? Being handsy doesn't have to be boring." She of all people would know that.

"Yep, he did."

"Why aren't you more excited about it?"

"Because that wasn't the exiting part," Tama clarified, "Then I settled down for a nap and I let him borrow my clothes."

Sakura scrunched her face, "...seriously, you and I do not have equal definitions of excitement, Tama."

"Sakura-chan, wait! What I meant was that I wanted to take a nap, but Sato-kun proposed to me. That's what I didn't want to tell you until after the mission." Tama's smile stretched in response to Sakura's whooping, grinning reaction, "He was actually very romantic about it. He'd been so worried and kept talking about... coming home to me... and keeping it small..." She sighed.

Ahead, Kiba and Kakashi only overheard a distant, screeching: Oh-my-god-that-is-amazing! They exchanged sidelong glances, curious as to what the kunoichi were talking about.

Tama went on, "And then after the nap we got properly dressed and visited some friends at the Obon festival."

"Yeah, that was fun... much calmer than the last festival." Sakura had extra spring in her step.

"Later I went home with him and stayed over!" She recalled cheerfully, "I told my mom I'd be too tired to cross town at night."

"You always give that excuse."

"Because she always accepts it. I think she covers for me when Dad comes home and asks where I am."
"Wow." Sakura was envious, "I wish I had a mom that did that."

Tama tilted her head back to enjoy a breeze as she coasted downhill. At the bottom, Sakura asked her, "So you haven't actually done it yet?"

"Not yet, but before we went to sleep we...um..." She frowned and tried to find a less graphic way to phrase it, "I still can't do much, so...Sato-kun just used his mouth."

Sakura's face conveyed a sense of total understanding.

Tama admitted, "I liked that."

"Honestly, that may be the best part. It doesn't get much better."

"Well don't tell me that! I haven't tried it all." She tried to shut down spoilers.

"Right, right..." Sakura waved off her friend's objection, "Then let's get into what Kakashi-sensei was talking about this morning."

"His new book?"

"No, how he brought up our peers getting Jounin recommendations...even if Sensei only mentioned it for a minute." Sakura reached out to pat Akamaru's head as he galloped beside her. "He said that Shikamaru's gotten at least one recommendation." She grinned, "And that he's willing to write ours next year, if we keep performing well."

"Wow, the three of us?" Tama was surprised.

"That's what he said. Kakashi-sensei also mentioned that Sato got at least two recommendations, and Neji received three." Sakura added, " Allegedly. I guess we'll know for sure if they apply for evaluations sometime this year."

"I didn't know all of that could happen so fast."

"Sensei said that Jounin are motivated to recruit and test new Jounin because it promotes mission availability, and boosts team success rates. Statistically speaking...and the other reason was because they like to hand off undesirable missions to newbies and otherwise take advantage of them."

"That sounds about right." Tama nodded, "All of that hard work...I can see why they want to delegate it when they can."

"Now that you and Sato are really thinking about getting married, do you think now is a good time for him to try for another promotion?"

"Sure! He can definitely handle more challenging missions. I don't think it'd hurt for him to be tested." Tama imagined, "That doesn't mean that he'll be certified. Or they might only classify him as tokubetsu."

"I don't know." Sakura tried to forecast the outcome, "He's a bit too well-rounded to be a specialist. But I guess that call is up to an evaluator?"

A short time later, the team passed a security checkpoint into the village and avoided a bustling flea market that had spontaneously appeared on a main avenue.

"I guess we're not getting lunch at the tavern." Kakashi supposed, "That area is teeming with people." Cheerily, he waved goodbye to his students, "Well, we can share a meal some other time."
Good work today, you three. I'll turn in the report."

"Kaka-sensei, are you going to show up for training tomorrow morning?" Kiba checked with him before he wandered off, "This will be the first time in a while that Tama can join us."

"We'll see. I may not make it. I've got a few committees to deal with tomorrow." Then he was off, departing just before Kiba and Sakura confirmed tomorrow's plan and also set out for home.

Tama pedaled tiredly across town and into the nouveau community, parking her bicycle out in front of her house. She trudged through the front door and announced her presence with a waning voice. She had put up a front for her team. Hoping not to seem weak, Tama withheld complaints or whines of pain while keeping pace with her teammates, even as her muscles and surgery sites ached.

From around the corner in the living area, Tama heard her mother speaking to her, "Dear, you're home? Are you feeling alright? Two days of work might've been stressful for you…"

"It was alright, Mom—"

"Are you hungry?" Miako zipped from one room to the next, taking Tama's travel bag from her, "I'll put this away for you, Tama, ah, let me…come have something to eat before you go. Oh! I'm so happy you have your Chunin vest on."

"Thanks, Mom." Tama sighed, relaxing. She settled in a seat at the counter and asked, "What do you mean, before I go? I was just going to stay home today and rest."

Miako stilled and silently mulled over the small blunder she had made. She was supposed to keep that detail under wraps. She tittered over her shoulder, "Did I say that? Of course you're staying in, I forgot. But just in case you…change your mind…” Miako pushed a plate of sliced tomatoes, vegetables and rice balls in front of her.

"Mom…"

"Eat up!" Miako gravitated toward a drying rack to put away clean dishes.

"Is something up, Mom?" Tama bit into a rice ball, "Was I asked to go somewhere?"

"No, no!"

Tama restrained a grin, cramming tomato slices in her mouth, "Are you throwing a surprise party or something?"

"No, you know your father doesn't like surprises or parties, and I'd have to invite him if we were celebrating you." Miako simpered over her shoulder, "Don't press me, my lips are sealed!" She turned her nose up, doing her best not to ruin anything.

So Tama asked no further questions, and did not find it so unusual that her mother insisted she change out of her shinobi attire and into something nice. Which she did. She sat on her living room sofa in a white top and floral shorts, unashamed of the track-marks on her bare legs, trying to work out what her mother was hiding, 'Maybe she and Dad did plan something for me? I know they're happy that I'm up and about again.'

She pulled her hair over her shoulder and proceeded to braid it, 'Maybe Kaka-sensei, Kiba-kun, and Sakura-chan are in on this? They left promptly before…I don't know. What's up with them? Or maybe—'
"Yo!" Sato poked his head in through the front door, "You home? Oh!" He spotted Tama on the sofa and grinned at her, "Looks like Mom gave you the memo."

"To get changed?" Tama continued braiding where she sat and grinned back at him.

He gave her a slow wink as he stood respectfully in the genkan in shoes, and accepted a kiss on the cheek from Miako as she greeted him. She turned to her daughter and ushered her over, "Okay! Now I don't have to watch what I say. Sato-kun will handle the rest."

"I suspected as much..." Tama gave her mother a small squeeze of a hug before tapping sandals on, "Will I... be back for dinner?"

"We will." Sato informed her, "We'll have stuff to tell your parents later."

"Ah." She smiled.

Miako saw them out merrily, and outside in the sunshine Tama was hoping she'd get a clear explanation.

"I'm a bit tired so I hope this isn't anything... strenuous." She let Sato tug her along carefully out of the front yard and down the road, "It was an easy mission, but—"

"We are totally gonna take it easy." Sato assured her, "We're just going to meet your family's realtor pal Masajuro-san. His office is pretty close, your dad said."

"My dad told you?" Tama was astounded, "What did you tell him?"

"I told him and your mom that we want to get married, and that we've been thinking about finding a place." Sato gave her hand a small high-five before he laced his fingers with hers, "And I actually didn't get reamed out! They looked legitimately surprised and then kinda happy. So let's check some places out that are close by, because your dad said so... and then tell them what we think later."

"They—? We—! Can we afford this side of the village?" She was blushing and also elated.

"Maybe we can't, but I say we just look at stuff and then set a goal. I was thinking about going for a promotion so I can make more money..." He added, "And my uncle said he wouldn't mind helping us buy a place. Since he's been such a deadbeat to me for so long, Kakashi said he ought to do something like that. He's kind of rich, so I don't feel guilty about taking him up on the offer."

"K-Kakashi-sensei knows?" Her embarrassment escalated, "He didn't say anything during our mission!

"Well, he probably wanted you to bring it up." Sato chuckled at her, "You didn't?"

"I don't exactly broadcast things as fast and loud as you do." Tama pulled him in the correct direction when he nearly took an erroneous left, "This way!"

"It's not broadcasting, this is kind of a big deal and people will find out. You can tell them."

"So have you told—?"

"Almost everyone."

Tama held her face and took a deep breath. She had intended to take it slow and plan thoughtfully, but Sato was probably going to find a rooftop to stand on and crow the news for all to hear. As was his way.
She blushed just about the whole way to the realtor's office, greeted Masajuro-san, accepted his congratulations and small-talk, and then they set out again to inspect a few model homes up the block. On the way, Sato perked up and gave Tama's hand a squeeze to get her attention. She followed his gaze and spotted Kiba crossing a footbridge in the distance, near the back entrance of a small veterinary clinic his sister oversaw. He spotted them as well. Kiba stopped in his tracks and pinned them with a surprised stare.

Tama could not explain the peculiar feeling in her stomach. She gave her teammate a wave of acknowledgement before carrying on.

On the footbridge, Kiba muffled a groan. Well, wasn't today was great.

He had dropped off a supply parcel to Hana's secondary vet office and then laid eyes on Tama and her soon-to-be-husband. Not that he needed another reminder after Kakashi had dumped that fact on him before departing that morning. He returned the wave from Tama and Sato tepidly and then kept moving.

"I'm pretty sure I am almost over it." Kiba spoke sidelong to his nin-ken, "Or, at least fine with Tama living her own life. I'm doing okay for myself aren't I, boy?"

Akamaru made a small chuff of confirmation.

"And I was lucky enough to meet Karui. It'd be nice to get another chance to talk to her."

The dog agreed again.

"I don't know…I'm just tired of this swirl of feelings—it's just—" Kiba motioned at himself, "I'm not even mad. Maybe my timing kind of sucks…and I definitely respect people in their own relationships and won't trifle with them…but I want someone to look at me like that. I'm eligible. Charming, on a good day. I know I could treat a significant other like a goddess if I had the chance."

Akamaru's soft whine seemed to recommend patience.

"Yeah, I guess. There's plenty of time." He sighed, "It's easier when I don't think about this junk."

Akamaru had stopped paying attention as they walked uptown and trotted over to a butcher's shop, sitting like a good boy beside the dried jerky stand. Kiba, as he often did, bought the treat for his dog as thanks for his participation on the mission. Akamaru chewed nosily as they kept moving.

Kiba did not feel like returning home just yet to be subjected to the high-energy ramblings of his mother, and the grumbling complaints of his grandfather. The family would be returning to court next week to seek damages against Nichiyo, since his father had lied and taken advantage of him, ‘Among other things…’ Now he also had a baby half-brother somewhere in the Tea Country, allegedly. Tsume had warned him and Hana not to go looking for the extramarital sibling they now had. It was not as if they were compelled to find and bond with this mysterious baby brother, so they had agreed to their mother's wish without a fuss.

On the northeast side of the village, on the way to the cherry blossom grove, Akamaru stopped inside the open doorway of a printing office. A few moments later, Fujita appeared and began patting the dog vigorously. He looked up and noticed Kiba, "Kiba-kun, did you need to print something for the Sensory or Sealing Corps? The office is closing in a few minutes."

"Nah, just walking around…” Kiba gave his young friend a fist bump when they united and carried on toward the grove.
"Did you return from a mission, then?"

"Yep." He folded his arms behind his head, "It was an easy one, and Tama was able to join our team again."

"That's great!" Fujita was chipper, "I have no other work to do...so I should probably go home and help mom with some things."

"Keeping busy?"

"Very. Now that I have a new big sister...and Great Elder Haburo has asked us to do so much..." Fujita let out a small, tired breath, "There's never a dull moment."

"Oh shoot that's right." Kiba remembered the circumstances, "Your parents adopted Tenten; I think Sakura told me that."

"Yes. I like her quite a lot, and mom and dad have been happy...though a bit more stressed." Fujita recalled, "Great Elder met with Onee-san and determined that she will not be likable enough to forge relationships with other clans."

"Uh..." Kiba gave him a confused look, "Is he even talking about, like, Tenten? Actually? She gets along with everyone."

"I know, but I don't think Great Elder saw that quality in her while he was trying to arrange a match for her."

"-shit— she just gets in and they try matching her up with a guy that fast?"

"Great Elder always does things like that. Dad said Great Elder made a mistake during the last Taketori meeting that offended a few parties...so he asked Neji-sama to consider courting Onee-san to settle things." Fujita frowned to himself, "It was odd that I had to sit in on that conference and approve it too. Great Grandfather looked worried that Onii-sama would not agree to it...but he quickly did."

"Bizarre. And newsflash: Neji was already dating her, I thought." Kiba stopped beneath a shady tree and leaned against the trunk, "Why is the Hyuga clan so damn weird about this stuff?"

Fujita gave a small, confounded shrug. He had no idea.

He considered the situation again, "Well, that's good then. She'll calm Neji's ass down."

Fujita stifled a laugh, "Not really. Neji-niisan has been serious about courtship and gets aggravated with other clansmen or guests who talk to Tenten-neesan for too long. Glaring at or interrupting them...I noticed that he has spent a lot of time with her at the estate. I think Great Elder asked them to get to know each other better...but they already seem to be the best of friends."

Kiba was amused by this, "You know, for a wise old elder...it sounds like he doesn't see much."

"He sees and hears what he wants to, Dad says."

"Pff, a lot of old guys are like that..." He observed, "It's kind of nice to have an older sister, isn't it?"

Fujita lit up, "It is."

"They come in handy...give us perspective we really need sometimes..." Kiba thought fondly of his own sister, "They tend to understand things in ways that brothers won't."
"That's true. I still miss Hikune a lot...but I feel better with Onee-san around. She spends time with me and is learning about the things I like." He added merrily, "And she told me that entering the Accelerated Exam in Sunagakure was a good idea even though I don't have a team to compete with."

"Whoa, you entered that?" Kiba raised his eyebrows, "I didn't think you could enter it as an individual."

"Single entries are allowed, but space was limited. I think the application window is closed now."

"You'll pass." Kiba affectionately patted the boy's head, "Well, depending on who you get matched up against if there's a knockout round."

"Sensei said there might be, so I'm preparing as best I can."

"You're not the only one entering that Exam, by the way." Kiba warned him, "Sakura-chan told me that Naruto is entering too."

Fujita patted Akamaru absent-mindedly as he considered the news.

"Yeah, you better hope you don't get matched against him. He cleaned Neji's clock at the last one." Kiba chuckled, "But hey, no pressure. You're going in this time knowing a bit more about what to expect."

Fujita released a rumbling sigh, feeling a bit more anxious about what awaited him at the next test. Kiba gave him a clap on the back and steered him westward through the grove, where he'd spotted Shikamaru and Chouji, "Look over there, let's make them buy us lunch out of sympathy. I'm still starving and you're shaking like a leaf, kid..."

Chapter Notes

Reader Beware: Salutations folks, most of you who I assume are of age and of a mature mental capacity while reading this fic. This chapter is categorically erotic character development. It includes buildup for the violent hysteria of the next chapter, and also unapologetic payoff for you shippers and curious readers. Intense and graphic sexy stuff is ahead, marked ### for your convenience, then inter-village camaraderie. Happy reading, nerdfriends.

Chapter Soundtrack:  "We Can Be Ghosts Now" by Hiatus

In an outpost at the edge of the Wind Country, which was still technically within the Land of Rivers, Jiraiya told him, Naruto sat down to write a note for Gaara.

Hey, so are you sure that Haku is not participating in the Exam?

Am I supposed to bring anything, like a gift for the host or whatever?

Are Ero-sensei and I sharing a room in your house or do we each get our own? Is it a big house? You didn't say, I can't picture it and I think Ero-sensei is exaggerating the size to me.

Oh and also, are you feeding us? I've been subsisting off of bugs and tubers for months so I am kind of desperate for real food.

Naruto paused in his writing as he realized his message had taken on list form. Kosuke was sitting patiently beside him at the tavern table, waiting for his human pal to finish.

"Hinata-hime told me she spoke to you a few days ago." Kosuke noted, "Is this message for her, boss?"

"No, it's for Gaara. I'm going to send you ahead since Ero-sensei is slow and bitching about bone pain." Naruto informed him as he rolled up the scroll, "Thanks again, and don't dry out while you're crossing, Kosuke."

"I'll be careful boss!" The small toad gave a salute and then bounded out of the establishment.

Naruto then turned to Jiraiya, who was heaped onto a table while resting his head beside a bottle of sake, "Ready to go?"

"Do I look ready?"

"I can never tell anymore."

"No, I'm not. I am reluctant to leave shelter with plumbing and food. Crossing the desert ain't fun."

"It was your idea." Naruto reminded him.

"Yeah, but I'm really starting to feel my age today."
"Maybe, or it looks like you drank too much."

"It was half off a bottle with any meal purchase." Jiraiya burped.

Naruto snorted at him, "Use the bathroom or whatever and then get up you old fart. We're not going to make it if you just keep sitting there."

Naruto thought it rather sad that Jiraiya mustered the willpower to push up from the table and trudge toward the washroom, but he had taken the bottle of sake with him.

Blowing eastward over the hills in the Land of Rivers, storm clouds crept into the Fire Country again. Cool air whirled against the summertime heat, and arcs of lightning skipped around the underbellies of thick rainclouds.

For over a week, Tenten had not been particularly fond of trying to sleep in her Main House bedroom at the Hyuga estate. Though Kayato had appointed it nicely, and Tenten had brought some of her personal belongings into the space, it was cramped, stuffy, and sweltering each night. She tried to avoid staying in it whenever possible while not taking missions. 'It makes me feel...like I'm still other. That I don't belong yet. There's always pressure bearing down on me...' Tenten had thought about it and expressed such feelings to Neji. He understood. He agreed that no one could ever convince him to reside in that meager hole in the wall.

"I'll try to get you something better." Neji told her that morning. They took tea on the porch, in plain view of some Branch members and Elders who did not disguise their watchful interest in what they considered a budding romance.

Apart from her miserable bedroom at the compound, Tenten could admit she quite liked living among her new clan. The Hyuga were personable toward her for the most part, and as for those that were not, she chose not to take their indifference personally. Quality time and meals with Hideyasu, Kayato, and Fujita were always enjoyable, and it bolstered her sense of belonging when at times it ebbed. And of course, Tenten felt rather privileged to see Neji about the house during off hours—at times in sleep clothes, or off to brush his teeth, or fresh from training with Lee and Wong Leung and in need of a bath. When he could, he devoted time to her without hesitation, even for things as trivial as lunch or lessons with Branch House children.

She smiled to herself. Though there had been hurdles to clear before reaching this point, Tenten would absolutely assert that it had been worth it. Even the acute stares of approval from clan elders, since Haburo still believed this arrangement was his idea, were comforting.

For today, no mission had been assigned to their team. Tenten had assisted Hideyasu with some menial tasks earlier in the day, and then later joined Lee and Neji for training. That afternoon, she decided to take some superfluous belongings from her room at the estate and return them to her flat. "It's just taking up space, and I need to breathe in there." She reasoned. As the sky grew overcast and training wrapped up, Neji helped her transport some of the things she could do without.

Upon entering and flipping the light switch, she discovered her flat was already in desperate need of dusting. Tenten set a Shadow Clone to the task and asked Neji to unpack the boxes they brought over. She appeared to be thinking about other things she wanted to get done. He frowned as he watched Tenten leave the apartment without an explanation.

Since Neji was an astute soul, he turned to the clone and asked, "Why did she leave?"

"Oh!" The clone knew why Tenten had stepped out, "I wanted to get some things to cook. It's been so long and they won't let me make anything at the estate. I'll be right back."

"You don't have to cook anything anymore," Neji supposed, "But you still want to."

The clone stared at his face for a moment, rosy-cheeked, and then turned back to its work without saying anything more. Neji did not pay any mind to the bashful replication as he extracted books and scrolls from a box. He was taken aback when he pulled out several picture frames as well, all of which had photos of Tenten's parents as the subject. 'Why would she not want these with her?' Neji did not understand it. As far as he knew, Tenten had adored her parents and spoke fondly of them. Had Hideyasu and Kayato replaced them so suddenly in her heart?

Yet she had still chosen to remove these items from her room, so Neji replaced them at free spaces on shelves and table tops around the apartment to be displayed. He stopped for a moment to examine a jubilant shot of her mother and father, both younger-looking in the photograph. He could see that Tenten was the spitting image of her mother, though she had a bit of her father's stature and bone structure. Her mother appeared tiny even by petite standards. Her grin was mischievous and bright. Neji swiped a bit of dust from the glass with his thumb. Tenten's father was tall with far-seeing forest eyes, a kind face, and dark hair. Neji also noticed a jade ring on the man's finger, where his hand was resting on his wife's shoulder.

Neji set the frame down and returned to the last box to empty it. He'd seen Tenten wear such a ring from time to time. She still longed for her father.

A short time later, Tenten returned and found Neji boiling water for tea. Behind him on the far side of the room, Tenten caught her Shadow Clone giving her boyfriend the up-and-down while going over wood floors with a rag. Miffed, she dispelled the infatuated clone.

Without turning to look back at her Neji remarked, "That clone had more cleaning to do."

"This is good enough." She grumbled and set down a bag of various vegetables, pork, and quail eggs.

Neji was looking through a cabinet for a long while and struggling, "...I cannot read your tea containers." The labels were written in Hanzi.

Tenten lightened up a little, "You'll like the one furthest on the left. The strainer is in the pot."

Neji thanked her and went about making tea.

"Erg...can I just stay here tonight? Where there's space and air conditioning?" Tenten thought out loud as she went about washing vegetables and sprouts at the sink, "I just want...a me night. To be comfortable."

Neji tilted his head as if to shrug, "No one will know the difference between you avoiding the estate and you being occupied by a mission."

"Really?"

"Many do not know you still have a place of your own. It's more suspicious for those born within the Hyuga clan to not return for curfew." Neji pointed out, "Not that they care. Much can go beyond the notice of our elders."

"That is music to my ears." She set aside the produce to dry and then began cubing the pork with a sharp knife, "But you've never stayed out, have you Neji?"
"Never." Neji confirmed.

"I thought so. Can you boil some more water for these eggs?"

He set aside the steeping tea pot and did as she asked. While Neji wasn't looking, Tenten beamed at him. It was difficult containing her feelings today.

They prepared food for a while and discussed Hideyasu's offer to manage her flat's lease for the interim. Until there was any definitive event that bound her to the Hyuga estate permanently, she and Hideyasu agreed it made sense to keep her home should anything change. Neji felt this was a sensible course of action, but was touchy about Hideyasu's offer to pay for her.

"I mean, he doesn't have to, but he suggested it." Tenten was slightly embarrassed to talk finances, "It just takes some of the burden of rent off of me, because I'm working fewer hours at my shop when I have to do things at the Hyuga estate…"

"I know that." Neji's answer calmed her, "But I could absorb that expense for you. Hideyasu has done enough already."

Tenten was carefully slipping quail eggs into a boiling pot of water, and gave him baffled side-eye, "Uh, Neji…you're not responsible for me…yet. And he's my father now, so…I thought it was appropriate."

"I can be responsible for you." Neji had a resolute, serious look on his face.

She gulped, "But you're not. We…"

'Way to make that awkward…' Tenten chided herself as Neji strode off into the dining area to set things on the table. He seemed irked by her reluctance to accept his help. 'It's not that I don't want Neji to…look after me, or anything like that! I just don't want to take advantage. Neji shelled out a lot to pay for Lee and I before the tournament. Why does he get so ruffled when other people do things for me? I mean, sheesh! I could go back to being independent! I'm fine with that.'

The subject thankfully dropped over dinner and tea at the table, while they went over the events of the day and the schedule for tomorrow. Neji then inquired why she was removing photographs of her parents from her bedroom at the estate.

Tenten halted over a bite of tossed noodles and gave him a wary look. She swallowed a lump in her throat, then set her food down and admitted, "I don't really want to remove those photos, but it… might help for now."

Neji listened as he chewed.

"I can't sleep." She smiled sadly, "Especially when I look at them, it keeps me up all night thinking about them."

"Ah." That cleared up the matter for him, "You didn't tell me you weren't getting any rest."

"Transitions are always hard." Tenten said before her next bite. She did not comment on how Neji had eaten all of the quail eggs. She had a feeling he would enjoy them.

"You look a lot like your mother." Neji shared his earlier observation with no preamble whatsoever.

Tenten kept her composure while trying to navigate this new, testy topic, "I do look like her, I guess."
"You told me that she sang. She was famous."

Tenten chewed with misty eyes and nodded.

"But you are most like your father." Neji presumed.

She took a moment to stop eating and calm down. Truthfully, it would be cathartic to talk about them with Neji, who was genuinely inquisitive about her life and origin. Just as soon as she could get a grip and not dissolve into sniveling tears, Tenten would supply some answers.

Tenten took a deep, rattling breath, "I am like my dad. He taught me just about everything."

"I think I remember seeing him when I was small, around the village." Neji reached back into childhood memories, "He came to the Academy often."

"He did." She opened up a bit more to reminisce, "He was...always looking out for others. He was thoughtful...and he could be so philosophical; some of the things he said went way over my head at times...but...Mom used to say..." Tenten stopped to take a sip of tea and collect herself. Neji waited for her to complete the thought.

"Mom used to say...he grew up so lonely that it was hard for him to believe her when she said she loved him." Tenten gave a small shrug, "Dad was a little weird too. He used to talk about loving Mom since they attended the Academy, but she never noticed him and she was always off with other people and doing other things. So he occupied his time as much as he could to keep his mind off of it."

Neji had emptied his plate while listening to Tenten's recollections.

"He read and wrote a lot. He was very good at working with his hands, and I think...his experience with Tao Arts is what made learning Ninjutsu come so easily to him. He took many high-level missions from a young age, even though my grandpa begged him not to." Tenten clarified when Neji seemed inclined to ask, "My grandparents are dead. I was three, I think."

"Hmm." Neji poured her more tea.

"He just never liked himself. Dad always tried to get out of the way of other people, as if he was a burden, and above all he didn't want them to know that he was sad. I know it was hard for him coming to Leaf as a child...a lot of our family was killed on the way." Tenten sipped her drink, "I...never noticed that was how he felt, when I was a kid. He seemed so happy and fun to me."

"Any parent would try to make themselves seem that way. That's what their child needs."

"Well, Mom made him happiest. I think that's why I saw the best side of Dad. That's how I remember him." She appeared lost in a memory, "As I get older...I think I've realized how much I'm actually like them. So...because they aren't here...it hurts to have questions I want to ask them." Tenten sighed, "Hideyasu and Kayato are great, don't get me wrong. But not having my parents here...there are pieces of me that are missing that I don't understand. I'm always thinking about it."

"Then that makes two of us." Neji yielded. He motioned for Tenten to eat because her plate was mostly untouched. She obliged and listened to him for a change as Neji went on.

"I don't remember much of my father being joyful or carefree, save for a few times. I knew him during the days he struggled most." Neji recalled, "I think I made him happy."

"Of course you did!" Tenten nearly lost a noodle as she proclaimed it.
"I did." Neji supposed, "But he was overwhelmed by everything else. By being in the Branch, serving my uncle, our elders…and his inability to do as he wished."

Tenten's question was on the tip of her tongue, but she refrained and took bites of food instead. She only ever heard Neji speak about his father, but not his mother.

She finished her meal and stood to clean up, ushering Neji to sit down again when he moved to assist. She asked him to finish the tea. Things were peacefully quiet as Tenten scrubbed dishes at the sink, and after a time she finally worked up the nerve to ask over her shoulder, "Neji? Do you know anything about your mom?"

Neji watched her as she worked, "Not much."

"What happened to her?"

"She died while having me." Neji explained coolly.

Tenten shut the water off and set the dishes on a drying rack. She tried to minimize her sympathetic expression, because she sensed Neji would not appreciate it.

"It's alright." Neji assured her.

"Sorry, I did wonder about it."

"My father once told me she was an outstanding ninja. I did not understand how someone so strong could die while having a child…but that was a shameful thing to think. I was young and stupid, and thought it was worth resenting her for leaving my father alone." He confessed, "Now I know better. Though…beyond the few things my family and clansmen have told me…I know little about her life or who she was."

"So she married into the Hyuga clan?" Tenten returned to the table to wipe it down.

Neji gave her a slow, amused glance while he thought of something.

Tenten gave him a feisty What? glare.

"She did." Neji confirmed, "Father said that she was his teammate."

"Oh." Tenten said, standing and crossing back to the sink. She was feeling a spike of elation and embarrassment again. Maybe he didn't mean anything by that statement, although he probably did. While she wrung out a wash rag, Neji inclined his head toward a white board on the wall that Tenten used to keep track of appointments.

"You have something marked for today's date." Neji commented.

"What?" Tenten was astonished, and snapped her head towards the board, "I thought I-! Oh." Her face fell. Beside the day's date, scheduled for twenty minutes ago, she had drawn a small plum. That was how she indicated meetings with Yugao.

"I forgot all about her!" Tenten rapped her knuckles against her forehead, furious with herself, "I haven't been checking my schedule enough…and Yugao's probably still at the shop…"

"She is." Neji confirmed with his Byakugan, peering out of the building and down the street.

"Does she look mad?"
"I can't tell from here, although I doubt that woman is capable of being frustrated with you." He said airily while pouring more tea for himself.

"Well thanks for that." She sighed, "Do you mind if I go and fulfill her request quickly? It won't take long. I mean, you can go home if you want—"

"I will be here when you return." Neji affirmed.

"…right." Tenten took another fortifying breath, "Then, make yourself at home Neji."

Before Tenten sped out of the door Neji warned, "Take that umbrella." There was a parasol on a hook above the genkan. Without questioning what Neji had spied outside, Tenten snatched up the umbrella and shop keys and dashed out.

Neji found there was something underrated about being in a noiseless space alone, to be able to think without interruption. At the Hyuga house, someone was in his business every fifteen minutes, just about. That was simply how clan life was. He had wondered a few times how Tenten would adapt to it, but she seemed to be responding well to the social exchanges in the Hyuga clan.

He relaxed at the table and watched with his Blood Limit as Tenten exited the apartment building, sprinted down the street in a light drizzle, and then met Yugao outside of the weapon shop to apologize. All appeared to be forgiven quickly as Tenten unlocked and led her friend inside. He stopped watching after that.

Neji reveled in the quiet for a while before standing, crossing over to heat the water kettle again. Tenten was right. The tea was good. He could probably finish the canister all on his own if she let him. He meandered around the flat to indulge his curiosity and examine the mementos of Tenten’s life strewn about.

Potted bamboo stalks on a side table appeared to have been neglected for a while, but were surviving in spite of not being watered. Fine pottery sat on shelves here and there, yet the most prominent feature about the place was the abundance of books and scrolls. Undoubtedly, those had been accumulated by Tenten’s father, for she was not a frequent reader.

Neji stopped near a shelf and skimmed through a few volumes. There was a fair deal of poetry. Some strategy manuals for shinobi operations as well as Shogi…novels written in Hanzi and also in the common tongue. The amount of literature was staggering. Beside a well-worn cookbook on a shelf, Neji drew out a leather bound journal that was ruled and had been written in.

He set it down for a moment, supposing it was rude to look through personal things this way, but eventually Neji cracked the journal open again. Flipping through its pages, he discovered it was filled with entries cover to cover. Neji noticed that the start of the journal had much older writing, and appeared to be written by a younger, more frantic hand. The newest entries had the more refined scrawl of someone who had grown up. The first page even had lines of text written in poor Hanzi, and gave way to Nihongo characters thereafter.

Father says I was named Chūn Ying, but everyone in the village will call me Takaharu. It is clean here and I like the smells. Father and I planted a window box today because mother died a year ago. We said a prayer for her. I learned about ninja dogs today when I tried to pet one, but I didn’t know it would be offended. Father wants me to be respectful to everyone in Konohagakure, so that means everyone.

Neji smirked to himself. Takaharu must have been a very young child, then.
Does the Hokage ever feel worried, having so many people to protect? It must be quite frightening. His face looks brave on the monument, but when I met him today Hokage-sama seemed tired and shaken. Things are hard now because of the war.

When the tea kettle began to steam, Neji shut the journal and set it down on the sofa. He crossed the room to prepare tea again. Against the windows of the flat, the soft drizzle of rain escalated into a harsh patter.

He considered what Tenten had shared with him; that she was at a loss about certain things without her parents around to explain. Neji suspected she could glean some valuable information from the old writings of her father, if she ever had the patience to sift through journal entries and the heaps of books all about the place. He tipped tea into a cup and dawdled around again. Out of pity, he watered the bamboo bunches.

On top of a cabinet, beside a humorous photograph of Lee while he'd been in the Academy (his braid and traditional clothing intact) was an odd device Neji was not familiar with. Beside it was a square case that had once housed a disc, with a note written from Sato: I got a copy of this from the public records office and thought you'd like it! Being the clever sort he was, Neji eventually gathered that it was a small, semi-modern stereo system. Such things were not allowed at the Hyuga estate, and neither were other ridiculously simple, staple things now common in households. After a few button prods, music began to sound.

It took a moment for him to recognize that he was hearing Tenten's mother perform. Sato had likely happened upon the recording by chance, and then passed it on to Tenten. Neji hovered for a while, basking in the dulcet notes and harmonies, drinking tea and not thinking much. He tried to put a finger on what kind of stringed instrument was being played.

Sharp, cracking strikes snapped Neji out of his listening, and he noticed the abrupt change in weather beyond the window. Rain was freezing into hailstones—a nuisance of summer storms. Neji shut off the player and imagined Tenten was going to be in a less pleasant mood when she got home. In an effort to be thoughtful, he stopped in her bathroom to fill the tub with warm water. She would have done such a thing herself upon her return, as her preferred environment was a boiling hot spring as opposed to teeth-chattering cold.

He sat down to finish another pot of tea while keeping watch for her, observing as Tenten was concluding business with Yugao. By the look of it, Tenten had offered her umbrella to Yugao as the weather had worsened. The woman had a much longer route home across the village. Tenten sent her on her way, locked the shop, and then made a run for it. Predictably, she looked rather disgruntled on her way up the road. Neji followed her progress into the building and as she slogged up the steps to the third floor, completely drenched.

Tenten squelched into the door and stopped in the genkan—a very sorry sight.

She asked in a feeble voice, "Could you get me a—?"

Neji handed a dry towel to her.

"Oh." Her eyebrows shot up, "You are incredibly helpful for incidents like these."

"I might as well be."

"Thank you." Tenten patted herself down and kicked off her sandals.

"The bath is warm."
"No way." She was especially impressed, "You did that for me?"

Neji was not proud of himself, "It took minimal effort, and it wasn't hard to anticipate what you would want after that trek through a hailstorm."

When she patted his cheek her hand was cold, and Tenten scurried into the interior of the home and sealed herself in the washroom. She would be back up to temperature soon.

Neji hung the umbrella to dry and sat at the table again, sipping his beverage, hearing the sounds of tiny orbs thwacking against the building.

He could do more, he thought. Tenten always seemed surprised by his gestures. Really, most of it was inconsequential or basic provisions of care, and Neji didn't like how she did not yet expect things like that from him. Granted, he had not been the most accommodating person even a few years ago. Tenten had gotten to know that person very well. He puffed a strand of hair out of his face in annoyance, cursing how he'd dug a ditch for himself in terms of how people chose to rely on him. He had a much better gauge of how to attend to others and assess their needs, particularly in Tenten's case. He was tired of every minuscule gasp that escaped her when he did something right.

After Haburo's strange but favorable sit-down persuading Neji to engage in a courtship with Tenten (he still wasn't sure how the seed of that idea had been sown in his great grandfather's head), he was taking the relationship very, very seriously. He already felt compelled to do things, to provide for Tenten even when she didn't ask him for anything. He wanted to know more about her life, even though she wasn't always keen to share details that pained her. Even instances of less significance, such as spotting her in the Main house or yards, accompanying her for training or missions, and all of the activities involving her that used to give him pleasure— that gratification was tenfold, now flooding his senses. Being around her was consuming and changing parts of him that had been dull or meaningless before.

Having a space away from the Hyuga clan put these emotions in perspective. Cooking seemed like such a mundane task, and one that was no longer required of Tenten, but her practical skills fascinated him. She spoke more freely here. She still enjoyed her smithing work, even though Neji was fairly sure she would never have to depend on her business again to make ends meet— not with him and the clan at her back.

Even when she didn't mean to, Tenten was luring him in. Along with everything else about her that beguiled him, Neji still had to contend with the physical attraction he had not acted on. For instance, she had just reappeared at the apartment; sodden, her clothes stuck to her revealingly, hair slipping free of its confines, her lips and cheeks flushed from the storm… If her mere existence was temptation for him, Neji conceded things were all the more difficult whenever she consciously flirted with him. Navigating this aspect had been tricky, and was now complicated by the drive to protect and provide. Neji wondered in what instance it would be fair to finally give in to the desire to touch her in ways that had so far been disallowed.

He exhaled a harsh breath and carried the emptied tea pot to the sink to be rinsed.

In time, all of this would feel more normal to her. After all, Tenten had rapidly consented to schemes and decisions to help him, and was still mentally catching up to the reality of the situation. She probably was not giving much thought to getting closer to him, or the things she had teased him about before the Exam's tournament. She still needed to adjust. She probably would not comprehend, for quite some time, the expectation that came with her position in the clan and his interest in her. Whether she knew it yet or not, she would plausibly never belong to another man. Hyuga Elders already knew how stubborn and/or steadfast Neji was in his decisions. They ought to feel quite certain that his consenting to court Tenten was a definite confirmation of a future with her. And they'd be right. He was not that hard to predict, after all.

So there. Time would help things, Neji decided. He was being impatient. He was overeager and hot-blooded, and honestly had no experience with how to handle this appetite. His peers boasted about their affairs all of the time, but Neji noted that his friends did not provide much insight on how to resist and respect— not nearly as often as they indulged. Well. That was not to say he didn't indulge on the rare occasion, but not the way they did.

He shut the tap off and braced his hands on the counter, feeling a bit tense. Was this the sort of thing he could bring up to her? It could be that she was interested, even if Tenten was occupied with a million other concerns at present. The clattering of hailstones was softening outside, but a roll of thunder tonitruated nearby.

It would be discourteous to cut his losses and leave the flat for the Hyuga estate without first telling Tenten. Though it'd be easier to avoid temptation that way, she'd think him rude if he didn't say anything. To assess if she was nearly done bathing, Neji stole a glimpse of her with the Byakugan. And no, she looked to be in no hurry. For a moment he stopped looking at her, as if that sufficed, but he had briefly seen a detail that enticed him to look again and be sure he hadn't imagined it. At first it seemed like Tenten had been reclined as if to nap, her head tilted to the side, eyes shut, damp hair loose and furling down over her shoulders.

She was chest-deep in bathwater, her arm reaching down between her thighs and fingers working in a circular motion. Tenten seemed utterly unaware of the space around her, or of the fact that anyone else was around. Her thoughts were far away.

Neji was engrossed for a full ten seconds before he came to his senses. He put an end to the voyeurism, wide-eyed and short of breath, startled by what he had seen. The implications made him reconsider his earlier belief that Tenten was not lusting in any way while she had a litany of other matters to think about. He crossed the room, tapped his shoes on in the genkan, and then Neji saw himself out. He stood in the hallway of the building for a moment, and genuinely did not know where to go from there.

Close by, he peered out of the fire escape window of the corridor and saw thunderheads rolling away from the village. It would be clear soon. He could leave and explain himself in the morning. Evidently, Tenten was enjoying her independence this evening and had forgotten that he was lingering.

Or he could just calm down for a few minutes. It wasn't as if he had unintentionally seen things a hundred times more scandalous than that with the Byakugan, he reminded himself. And what he had seen, Neji conceded as he returned indoors, removed his shoes and took a seat at the table…what he had witnessed was not at all objectionable.

He had a few minutes more to wrestle with his thoughts before Tenten exited the washroom and called out, "You still here? Neji, get in there and clean up while it's still warm. Training got you a bit grimy today."

"I should go home." That was another idea.

Tenten went silent for a moment in the hallway attached to her bedroom before replying, "If you want to, yeah, that's fine. If the weather let up." She didn't sound averse to that suggestion. Neji could not get a read on her.

Right about then, even though the night sky was clearing and calming, Neji got it into his head that maybe it was preposterous trying to avoid this. Once she had retreated to her bedroom to change, he made his way to the bathroom's cracked door, still hazy with vapor, and told her that it would be better to stay and he would take her up on the offer.

Ever nonchalant, Tenten called out again, "Sure, I'll get you something to change into!"

He shut the door, confused, then abducted a hair clip from the vanity counter. He piled his hair on top of his head before scrubbing and rinsing off. In the tub, Neji concluded that he had no idea what Tenten was thinking or what she wanted. One moment she was masturbating, the next she was merrily sending him home. Maybe he was not the most essential variable in this equation?

He submerged up to his neck to fight the chill in the room. For all of their complaints about the brutally hot summer days they'd had, the temperature was more fickle these evenings. He relaxed slightly. Just because he did not know what she wanted was no cause for panic. It could never be said that he was not superlatively respectful of boundaries. If she did wish for something, Tenten would most likely ask him.

Neji grew gradually more tranquil until he remembered what Tenten had been up to a short time before. He stood, drained the tub, dried off, and tried not to think about it. He was kept waiting for about ten minutes before it occurred to him that Tenten had forgotten about him again. She was dressed in pajamas and loitering in her room, he could see as he gazed through an adjoining wall. He wearily regarded his training attire folded atop a laundry basket, which was repellant and sullied. No. A change was definitely called for.

With a towel providing modesty from the waist down, Neji ventured down the hall to pop into Tenten's bedroom. He was disconcerted by the anguished expression on her face as she stood beside a chest of drawers. 'She seemed fine before...' Neji took a step in, "Are you alright?"

She jumped in startlement before dropping several articles of silk from her hands. Tenten immediately scooped them up from the floor, "I am so sorry, Neji. It happened again…I'm just not thinking straight."

The concern on his face was shifting into something more serene, "It's alright—"

"-leaving you in there like an idiot— I found this right away, I think it may fit you. Though my dad was tall and broad-shouldered..." Tenten huffed at herself, holding up a black top, "I took one look at it and just started...remembering a lot."

"As I said, it's alright." Neji repeated, "Do as you like in your home."

Tenten fixed him with a contemplative stare. She crossed over to him and Neji was about to hold out a hand to accept the clothing, but he heard her muttering, "...do as I like..." She was heavily scrutinizing him, rethinking the original, boring plans she'd made for the evening. Neji watched her interestedly. He got the sense that whatever she wanted to do, he was going to go with it.

"I'm having a thought." Tenten announced.

"It appears you are."

"Let's hold off on this." She recommended, indicating this meant the clothing that she tossed onto a bureau to her left. That said to him very plainly that he was right about Tenten's ability to communicate her wants. He could not overstep bounds when Tenten kept drawing the line further and further back.

She asked, "Are you feeling sensitive or flighty?"
Weird question. "No."

"Are you doing anything later?"

"Nothing of note."

"So then stay here for a while," Tenten instructed, "And would you please…close your eyes?"

He took an extra moment to get a look at her, as if to commit her to his mind’s eye before complying. Neji was not exactly sure what she intended to do.

Meanwhile, it was as if Tenten had been served a dish on a silver platter and she reeled for a moment. Neji was being very agreeable. Well, maybe he had anticipated something of this nature, and Tenten also got the feeling that she was indeed free to do whatever she wanted. ‘And it's about damn time…’ She had been bending over backwards for people, lately.

He felt her fingertips skim his arm and then draw away. By the sound of it, she'd taken slow steps over the wood floor to circle around him. Neji presumed this was a minor investigation of sorts as he felt another touch near the nape of his neck, hearing Tenten mumble as she discovered her hair clip on his head. She left it where it was. Tenten slipped her hands down his neck and shoulder blade, visiting scars from past battles. The newest imperfections to his skin had come from the Light-Wing Chidori, burns that had grazed his shoulder, ribcage and beneath his upper arm. His muscles tensed slightly at the tickling sensation.

"I saw that." Tenten reported.

Neji reminded her, "I'm not made of stone."

"Contrary to popular belief…” She agreed, "It looks like this one must've hurt."

"The worst pain, though the briefest."

He felt her lips against his skin, stopping over the first thoracic vertebra that created his blind spot. Neji suppressed another shudder when she muttered against his skin, "Better now."

Tenten's deft fingers slid down his spine, down to the tapered grooves and sinew of his lower back. She tugged once, twice, before Neji was fully aware of how she peeled away his towel. He might've scolded or opposed her on any another day, rather than remain still with his eyes dutifully closed. It was difficult to do. Her fingernails grazed over his hips and sides, exploring, while Neji stood without rebelling and mentally substantiated how he let her get away with it.

He was not at all ashamed of how he looked, and was partially reconciled with this new vulnerability. Visionless at the moment, Neji was not sure how much of his body Tenten had seen yet. Caresses still trailed mindlessly all over him and, inevitably, it would become more and more apparent that he was enjoying those attentions. It was not long before she had circled around him again, brushing her hands along the divot of his collar bone, then down his chest and stomach. Neji tried not to think about snatching her hands and pulling her close, tried not to think about how visibly erect he was by then. He assigned more effort to not producing the sounds that threatened to escape him. He endeavored not to do anything. Feeling Tenten's explorations as his livewire nerves rioted was more than enough in those moments. His talented brain could hardly grasp all of the input.

Oh. He was frowning. Neji was not wholly conscious of his expressions, or that his brow was furrowed with concentration— slitted eyes nearly opening out of desperation. Tenten pressed a hand over them while he was tempted to see something, anything, "Not yet...” Reacting to how she sealed his mouth with a giddy, amorous kiss, and that she was unbothered by how his hands flew up to the sides of her face to hold her. All of his senses were intense: the taste and texture of her mouth, the smell of the rain still on her, the small, pleased sounds she was making…Not being in control was also surprisingly underrated, Neji found.

At some point her hands had migrated to his backside, copping a thorough feel while Neji's mouth quirked at the contact, sightless, listening to Tenten's commentary, "That…is just unreal. Hold on a second." She felt him up again for good measure. He grunted at her enthusiastic antics but did not bat her away.

"I didn't think you would be this patient." Tenten told him.

"I do not have many other virtues." He admitted, unable to see her smile.

"Sure you do. Sorry if I've been…too hands on." He was shaking his head at her and she grinned again, "I thought about…well. I'm fairly certain you've been able to look at me plenty, so I wanted my chance to look at you."

"Understandable. I would not have denied you the opportunity, even if you had asked me properly."

"Ah, I don't know. You seemed kind of— shy earlier?" Tenten had picked up on it.

One of her hands had drifted back up, and he had blindly located it with his own. Her face was still close enough to kiss, so he trailed his mouth along her jaw and cheek, confirming, "I was not sure what you wanted."

Tenten sighed as he pressed light kisses over her brow, "I could've been clearer, yeah. I didn't want to pressure you. You've been so great today, and just being around you was—" Neji had looped an arm around her back to pull her close, kissing her slowly. Tenten was mollified by the touch, her head tipping up to give in to the embrace, to him…then she flattened her palms on Neji's shoulders and pushed him back a step. He had an urge to blink at her indignantly, but she assured him, "Just a second." Neji heard soft rustling.

He could still feel her standing face to face with him, vaguely familiar with the sounds of her disrobing. It also sounded as though Tenten caught her foot while removing sleep pants, and that she was about to topple over while cursing softly. Neji reached without thinking for her— she'd caught herself before falling, of course, but his hand landed on her bare hip; he felt the smooth skin over bone there and how warm she was. She chuckled words of thanks and then enclosed his hand in both of hers, "Ah, almost wiped out…" Tenten fiddled with his captured hand, "Neji, you know you don't have to keep your eyes shut anymore."

His breathing was heavier, quicker. Tenten slid his fingertips over the smooth flesh of her flanks, the dip of her waist, past the convex curve of a breast, over her clavicle and up her neck to let it settle just beneath her chin. She rubbed her thumb over each of his knuckles. Neji told her, "If I see you I will act differently."

"That's what I'm hoping for." The same hand she was toying with she guided down again through the valley of her chest and over her soft, impeccable stomach. His breath noticeably hitched, which made Tenten all the more glad to introduce him to her navel, descending past her belly button below to the downy, short hair along her mound, the tender lip there, the swell of her inner thigh. Tenten could see him fidgeting when she finally let Neji loose, his breathing much noisier and his shoulders taut. He drew her close again and called her, "Audacious."
"Thanks." Tenten kindly reiterated, "This is nothing you haven't seen before, come on."

Neji cracked an eye open at her. She had a cheeky smile plastered on her face, without a stitch of clothing on, her hair loose down her back in chestnut waves. Tenten nudged the arms he had wrapped around her, signaling some kind of forward progress, "You can keep staring if you want, but I'm going to keep doing what I was doing before."

She noticed his facial expression was the most animated she had ever seen it, accompanied by a full on man-stare as her hands vagrated over his chest and front. Neji gradually began to respond with less hesitation, returning touches, canting his head to kiss her properly. Chaste touches converted to caresses, and Tenten rejoiced in the heady feeling of being pressed into him. Slow, decadent kisses did not distract much from the severe erection prodding at her stomach. Tenten was puzzled over how to manage it, or which protocol would work best from that point on. She only knew as much as she'd heard from kunoichi peers, moreover, she did not believe the entirety of what she'd heard either. 'I am pretty sure those girls embellished a few things…'

She stole a downward peek, considering that she had not seen many at-attention penises in her life. Save for maybe one incident on an embarrassing guard detail mission she had taken as a Genin over two years ago, but, well, that and this were starkly different situations. Tenten chanced a touch, stroking gingerly over dark hair and the base of his length, frowning to herself because this did not exactly look like what had been described to her.

"So, I have a question." Tenten declared.

"Can it wait a moment?" Neji asked her.

"Sure, wuh-!" She held fast when he scooped her bottom-first, taking a few paces to the bed's edge to drop her on it.

Neji settled himself there as well, cradling his face expectantly in his palm as he gave her his attention, "What is your question?"

"This here," Tenten clarified while touching him, "I...hm. Is this a scar? I mean, I can admit I am ignorant and only know the sensational garbage Ino has spouted to educate me...but isn't there supposed to be a foreskin?"

"There was once." Neji was unruffled, stretching out on his back to relax, allowing her to touch and examine.

"Oh." She flopped over on her side, "Boys in this village get cut?"

He gave a slight shrug, "It isn't very common."

"Why do it?"

"Because infants cannot give or deny consent, parents think it's beneficial, and it is standard practice in my clan. Few other clans here have such a tradition." Neji explained.

"Huh. I think Sakura mentioned this once." Tenten's voice was pitchy, borderline anxious.

He took her hands and massaged acupressure points on her wrists to calm her. Neji was also consciously trying to relax.

"Then it doesn't hurt you, does it?"
"Not at all."

"I guess you can keep clean more easily." Tenten shifted sideways and overlapped herself with him, attentively tracing the grooves of his abdominal muscles with her fingers.

Neji vouched, "I have no basis for comparison, in that respect." It didn't matter much to him. He was cut and he had no issues with that. He judged by her nod of recognition that Tenten had no issue with it either. While getting comfortable, she felt him card fingers through her hair and stroke down her back contently. He trolled down her smooth curves, idling over her ass before slipping his hand upward again, repeating the motion.

Tenten deliberated over an odd truth that occurred to her during that sedate moment. For quite some time, there had been a kind of unspoken agreement that they would make love. While distractions and commitments had delayed the realization of it, for her part, Tenten noticed that she had been the more fervent, brazen instigator. Neji had been more reserved on the matter, undertaking steps to legitimize his bond with her and reach milestones. In other words, he was unexpectedly pure of both intention and body, in Tenten's opinion.

She also had been somewhat aware of his circumstances for, oh, a long time. He was in no position to rollick carelessly or anything of the sort. His clan and family would never stand for it, never mind that he was famously upright and not one to pursue carnal pleasures. So in some strange reversal of roles, Tenten realized, she had waited and acted as though it was Neji's honor that needed safeguarding. Often, it was the opposite in most situations; a young woman's purity was sacred. In her case, her honor was whatever she made of it and no one was around to judge her based on her choices.

Her thoughts could only endure in a trickle, overwhelmed by the blissful state of languid, indulgent touching. Tenten had only managed a few curious strokes along the ridges and veins of the length in her hands, studying it, then Neji stopped her. She moped when she was made to relocate her able hands.

"Tenten." He was not moved by her faux-tantrum, "That was overwhelming."

"Didn't it feel—?"

"It felt good. I wouldn't last." Neji explained, "Anywhere else, for now."

"Ah." She understood and got over it.

Her ministrations gravitated up again towards Neji's neck, his head tilted as to not jostle the fastener keeping his hair back. Tenten would have liked to have her hands full of his superb bottom again, but Neji had rolled out from under her grasp and onto his knees. He hovered over Tenten while she was reclined, watching him carefully. He lowered himself down, seeing her angle expectantly for a kiss which he refused to press to her lips. Neji brushed his mouth against everything else, down her chest and stomach, and fondly discovered her inner thighs— the sensitivity there made her tremble and whine.

He looked up at her with those full-moon eyes and it made Tenten gulp when he asked, "Show me what to do."

"Show you-? You don't need me to—" Her breath came in a hiss as he traveled north over her body again, lips skimming a nipple before tweaking it with his teeth. Neji continued watching her face and her writhing reactions as he experimented, sucked there for a long while.
This was a kind of motivation he had never been acquainted with, Neji conceded. Whenever he tried to achieve things for the sake of pride, for the sake of friends, for honor, duty, logic and other such cornerstones: he'd never known the insane spur of pleasure — of watching her feel it. All he would ever think about again was being the cause of Tenten's satisfaction. The way her back bent, how she bit her lip, raked her fingers down the back of his head and neck, wriggled under him, humming and mewling sweet sounds…Neji could exalt and obsess over every bit of it.

She did not care that faint marks and bruises had blossomed over her breasts and the rounds of her shoulders. Anywhere Neji set his mouth was ideal, and his hands were equally welcome as he searched her. He breathed the question again beside her ear, asking for a demonstration, "I want to know how it's done."

"...seems like you already know..." Tenten was biting back moans while he worked.

"I saw you touch yourself earlier."

"No, you didn't." She said, as she distinctly remembered doing that in private.

"I watched you, and I want to watch you again." Remnants of his former, classic arrogance lit his face, but Neji was also being sincere.

Tenten seized his chin, preventing him from mouthing her up in any other delightful ways, disapproving of what he'd done for all of two seconds, "Can't I even take a bath in peace?" He shook his head no. Perhaps she should have expected this behavior from a significant other whose gaze traveled through most physical obstructions. At any point she was ever naked or exposed, Tenten would henceforth assume Neji would be an alert observer.

She hesitated for a moment, because this was embarrassing even for an avid masturbator such as herself, 'I mean, do I really have to let him see?' But he already had. Tenten sighed and released Neji's face, then reached down haltingly toward her womanhood as she pegged him with a half-humiliated, half-desperate look.

It helped that Neji resumed kissing her and gave her some time to get into her routine. Timid, slow touches grew surer and more precise, her eyes fluttered shut, focusing on the pattern she preferred and pointedly paying no mind to Neji as he leaned back for a better view. As his fingertips slid over Tenten's chest passively, he watched. He might go wild watching this, he thought, intrigued and electrified. She used different pressures, spread herself with her fingers, avoided direct contact with a hooded bud that Neji had never seen before, but had heard about in conversations amongst his rabble-rouser friends. Tenten seemed to like when he pressed his hand against her stomach, warm and thoughtful, but she would not meet his gaze. It was a daunting position to be in that demanded more than just trust. He knew that. He'd known that when he'd asked her to try it.

Neji rested his forehead against hers, holding the back of her neck as he said, "Let me." She peeked at him from beneath her lashes, giving a head gesture of assent before brushing her lips along the juncture of his shoulder and chest. His hand slipped beneath hers to reenact the motions, unpracticed but still clever, listening to Tenten's murmurs. When Neji was not quite on point she gave him more guidance, conducting his hand just so. He was a quick study, as he was with most things. Before long, Tenten unabashedly ground into his touches, her dark eyes burning as she stared up at him with parted lips.

Her soft cries, her trembling and the slickness against his hand — it was an ordeal to stay on task. Navigating the new mental and emotional terrain between heavy, arresting kisses, and how her body was grazing against him most enticingly…Neji had to take a moment to press down onto her, nerves heightened and screaming at the touch of bedsheets and the smoothness of her legs and hips. Tenten traced her nails behind his head and ears understandingly, encouraging, "Now's fine, if you want, Neji." She interrupted his busy, dedicated hand to arrange herself under him, "I...want to."

He was polite, "Not now." He would be perfectly happy to give her all of the attention.

"Yes, now." Tenten countered, "I just said I want to." She also wanted to direct his attention to how he was pressed into her, and that maybe denying what he was a single motion away from doing would probably not work. She struck the side of Neji's head with a gentle bap as she kissed him, and then gave his hips a coaxing tug. He slid into her easily, all at once, which Tenten did not seem all that fond of when she inhaled between her teeth and narrowed her eyes. Neji was only partially adhering to self-control, an elusive quality at the moment. He stopped himself from carelessly thrusting even though every muscle he had was poised to begin.

He was both muddled and concerned, trying to think straight when he asked her, "Am I hurting you?"

"Objectively, no." Tenten clarified as her hands roamed his back, "Can't call it ecstasy, but everything else feels good, so..."

Neji thought maybe cancelling the act altogether would make sense, but that suggestion only agitated her and Tenten gripped his bottom, simulating the motion needed. She smiled, shuddering when he moaned and shut his eyes, swept his mouth and tongue over her neck while rocking into her. The pace and the pressure weren't so bad, Tenten noted. But the thrill came from him, the sight and experience of his new mannerisms and being open with how he felt. His hands slid from her thighs up to her waist, then to her breasts, frantically descending in reverse order while she matched the rhythm of his strokes. Tenten's quiet, strangled sighs could have been pain or pleasure, or some mix of the two, but those sounds echoed in Neji's ears.

He reached above her head and laced his hand with hers; shreds of lucid thought occurring to him as he watched expressions of awe and desperation cross Tenten's face. This woman had once been a young, plucky kunoichi on his team who had been a constant companion, while also keeping him at arm's length. With time she was bolder, praising him in the days when his social accomplishments were comparatively pathetic, and criticizing him when he terrorized or pushed away others. All those looks of yearning, he remembered, or of her standing silently by— the things Tenten did that he hadn't understood. It was nearly a miracle that she had stayed and persevered for someone like him.

And oh, would it be shameful to admit that even then, when he'd been so hopeless, self-centered, and blind— that she had been a frame of reference for beauty, wit, strength, and all else that was to be admired. Even if Neji had not said it aloud then, had not reciprocated, had not thanked her, had not professed love or anything of the things that he ached to do now, she had always been entangled in his thoughts somehow.

His name escaped her lips in a growl as she cinched her legs around his waist. Then, Neji did not think about how things had been between them in the past, but only of how it was and would be. She felt so good that every pain and hardship he had ever known was swept from his mind. Tenten was aglow, something golden in her skin, hints of bronze in her hair. One hand conducted a survey of his neck, and the other scratched lines into his back as she claimed and tasted his mouth. Neji wondered if he might've felt her pulse racing, she was so tight, but there was too much to feel to try and be sure.

The rushing crescendo crept up his stomach and back, a feeling that made him gasp, that prickled everything into oversensitivity down to his fingertips, completely addling his head. There was just one singular moan, all that Neji had air for in his lungs. He pinned her flat as he fixed his mouth to Tenten's chest, above her heart, finishing hard inside of her in long, trembling twitches. He gave her a soft nip again and Tenten made a breathy, astonished sound. It took a moment before either moved, and Neji evaluated her to make sure she was unscathed. Tenten was wincing, "You're kind of heavy." She gave him a respectful pat to show Neji how he'd heaped himself on top of her tiredly, and was slowly crushing her ribcage.

With a huffing, reluctant sound, Neji propped himself up on his elbows and lingered. He didn't really want to be outside of her, not yet. It was too spectacular a feeling, residual jitters racing up his spine, and being connected to Tenten seemed to transmit her own feelings and sensations to him in some unexplainable way. Neji tried appeasing her with lazy kisses, which she humored for a few seconds. Tenten pushed him off and rolled him onto his side, taking his face in her hands once again. She gave him a rapt stare.

It was about then Neji realized that sex seemed to have opposite effects on them; his coherence and consciousness declined, and Tenten's energy levels skyrocketed. She was wide-eyed and awake, grinning.

"That was different and also better than what I expected." She told him, and Neji did not resist when she rolled him over again. She rummaged near the headboard, tossed pillows on top of him, peeled back the blanket, and gave up when it was stuck under him. Neji heard her bounce up to her feet and out of the room. He blinked in a daze and watched Tenten set out into the far reaches of her flat, in the nude, for god only knew what reason. He found it jarring and annoying. He wanted her right where she'd stuffed pillows against him like placeholders. Afterglow cuddling was standard procedure, no? Was he wrong?

Naturally, he could not help but glare with the Byakugan and behold Tenten moving about and switching lights off. She was fast and efficient, but Neji did not see why she could not have sent a Shadow Clone to complete such a task. She returned to the dimmed room to see Neji sitting up in bed, covered in pillows, rebel strands of hair loose that framed his frowning face. Tenten tsked at his moodiness. While she was still standing, she snapped the blanket out from beneath him, like she had seen a zany server do with a tablecloth in a restaurant once. That of course made Neji even happier.

Tenten laughed and pushed him down, "What?"

"Stay here. Send a clone if you need to do something." He groused.

"Uh…I shouldn't make any more Shadow Clones today." Tenten disagreed.

"Why?" As far as Neji knew, her chakra reserves had not been overworked.

He twiddled with her hands as she sat on top of him, and she appeared quite triumphant. Tenten was embarrassed by the clone subject when he raised it again. Instead she asked him, "Phew, should I crack a window? It got warm."

"Tenten…"

"If I need to do something, I'll do it myself. I am not making any clones while you…are in this state," Tenten gestured at his magnificent nakedness, "They've been acting like idiots around you."

Judging by Neji's enlightened eye contact; Tenten determined that he finally got it. That she was not keen on creating any ardent clones that might want her to share her boyfriend. After a moment his surprised expression turned thoughtful, prompting her to give him a mild whack for smiling knowingly at her.

"Generally I like when you smile, but please stop." She complained.
"How am I supposed to stop?"

"I don't know— remember a time when you walked in on Gai-sensei in a changing room or tried eating the Curry of Life…” Tenten folded over and pressed her forehead to his chest, "Just please let me be enough."

Neji tipped her head up and told her, "You are enough." Her lips curved up as she listened to him, "Forgive me, I thought you remembered how I disdain excess. I have an imagination, but I'm not a slave to it."

"Well," She pecked his chest, "I can't fault you for that."

To avoid smashing the hair clip on the back of his head, Neji removed it so he could lay flat under Tenten. She immediately reached up to play with his dark tresses and then sighed wistfully, "You know, part of the reason I tie my hair intricately and stick fancy baubles in it…” She lowered her voice and admitted, "Is because you have much nicer hair than mine."

Neji had his eyes shut, perfectly relaxed as he slid his hands along her body, "There's no need to be insecure about something so juvenile."

"When you say it like that it doesn't make me more secure, just so you know." Tenten snipped.

"Let me rephrase that." Neji tried again, "It's just hair."

"But yours…” She doubled over again to press her nose to his neck where, yes, he did still smell like shampoo. Even after a busy day.

"If it would not appall my relatives and elders, I would probably cut all of it off." Neji supposed, "But tradition is a stupid, sticky thing."

"Would you really?"

"I've had short hair before."

"Yeah, but that was— you were in the hospital and I think Tsunade-sama sewed you up with it, or something…"

"That's right. Maybe someday when I have fewer people to impress, I will keep it shorter." His thumbs made circling motions on either side of her belly button, "Though now I have your preferences to contend with."

Tenten was amazed by this. She didn't realize to what extent Neji's hairstyle was a non-factor to him. She had once thought Hyuga tradition and such mattered to him, or maybe he just liked how he looked. But nope. It was not a part of his identity, it turned out.

She informed him, "Bad news, I'm afraid. You're never going to have fewer people to impress, Neji. Not in the position you're in."

"What position am I in?" Neji was no fan of double entendre, but in the context of pillow talk he was.

"Ino calls this Girl-on-Top." Tenten clarified casually, "As I was saying, whether you cut your hair or not, either way you'll be handsome."

"You find me handsome." He had never really thought about how she perceived him before.
"I'm sure other people do too, but count me above the rest." Tenten was arranging strands of his hair in pleasing furls and shapes, "I mean, I can see beauty even in your scowls. Imagine what it's like for me looking at you while you smile or enjoy yourself."

"Heart-shattering."

She nodded, "In the good way."

"You are whatever the sky is made of at twilight and dawn..." Neji brushed the back of her hand against his lips, "Molded into a human form. You feel like the deepest, cleanest breath of air I ever took."

"Whoa." Tenten looked down at him, bewildered.

He raised a brow, "Was that inaccurate?"

"I don't know. I don't describe myself that way...and the romance in that was off the charts." She took a small breath, "I'm still processing."

"Indulge me. That was a sincere analysis."

"At what point did you become an authority figure on the sky and my splintering from it?"

"It took time." Neji divulged as he ran a pointer finger down the valley between her breasts, "Much discontent and brooding...observing the unknowable heavens. Cold nights and all that..."

"You were a difficult kid, weren't you?" Despite his seriousness, Tenten could not resist a wisecrack.

"I was one...and one who also knew that some things are beautiful even in a turbulent world. After meeting you I was much surer of it." He plucked up one of her hands again to kiss her fingers, "Shards of heaven are few." Neji scraped his teeth against her finger and she yipped in pain when he added, "And sharp."

"Right, so be sure to handle me with care." Tenten squeezed him in annoyance between the bracket of her legs. He had a slight biting tendency she had not been aware of. She elected to immediately forgive him when he sucked her not-so-injured finger, with quite the alluring look on his face. Neji was hard again and firmly pressed into her thigh and stomach. What timing. Tenten delighted in how forward he was, completely comfortable with trying to seduce and impress her. It definitely worked. Well, even when he didn't try that worked too.

'I think I should be tired, but I'm not. And I'm pretty sure Neji is tired, but he's rallying.' Tenten thought as she rubbed herself against his shaft, relishing the hiss that escaped him. She stroked her hand from base to head, slipping him against the supple wet lips of her opening. Neji was a sight after that, bending his back and bracing her hips, keeping narrowed eyes on her. If all she did was tease him for the rest of the night, he suspected he could still die happy.

Tenten continued rubbing against him as if it were a casual thing, an observer of his writhing and grunting. She inquisitively swirled a dewdrop of moisture that welled at his tip with her thumb. His hips bucked once under her touch and Tenten asked if he would please behave. Neji's chest rose and fell with quick breaths as she resumed her investigation. What an odd, captivating creature he was. Tenten sat back on his legs and traced her fingertips down, 'round the curve of his sac and the ridge there where she pressed gently. Strange that it seemed tighter and more compact in her hand than earlier, she thought, and Tenten may have tested further if not for Neji crying out for all of the building to hear and thrashing beneath her. She found that interesting so she did it again, but the next time he hollered he mixed in a reprimand.
"But I am almost positive you didn't dislike that." Tenten contended cheerfully.

His breaths were harsh and heavy when he spoke, "That...had nothing to do...with what I liked."

"Ah, so, you don't want your screaming to wake everyone who lives here? That's fair." She grinned down at him when he tried to give her a toss, but Tenten held fast to him, and it sort of turned into a mini-wrestling contest until Neji was smiling again because she was being ridiculous and amusing in spite of her torments. Then he laid prone again and thought to hell with it, he did not really want to object to anything Tenten did. And they seemed to be past the foreplay as it was, because Tenten had pushed down onto him until he was deep inside of her, completely and warmly encompassed, and he lollled his head to the side and groaned again.

Her face was scrunched up momentarily as she got situated, adjusting to the occupation. Tenten steadied herself by bracing her hands on his stomach, "Hey Neji, you're blushing. Your face is all—"

"Never mind my face."

"I can't help it. Remember when I said how good-looking you-?"

"Please," Neji jerked again and ground into her, "No matter what I look or sound like...please."

It was sexy when he asked nicely. Tenten distributed her weight evenly on her knees and then rose up a fraction, sliding down again, watching Neji struggle and vocalize as she began to move. This felt better, actually. More specifically, she thought, being able to set the pace and depth helped alleviate the new, stretching sensation that was less painful now and more pleasantly satisfying. She hummed his name when he reached up to knead her breasts, nipples raised and alert to his touches. Neji tended to her sensitive places, keen to the wet tightness as she slid around him, and further aroused by how Tenten eventually resumed touching herself as she had earlier. The only directions she could choke out coherently were for Neji to "not stop what he was doing," and she seemed to be handling the rest. He would try his very best to meet her demands even though he was skeptical if he could last much longer.

It was a flood of toe-curling, tantalizing feelings that made Tenten slow down just a hair, hoping to savor her singing nerves. She felt every groove on him, each twitch and throb. Not much more was needed between Neji's attentions and her own stimulation, and Tenten bowed her head slightly with a low moan that heralded release. She got quieter and leaned back as she came, stealing breaths distractedly and gripping whichever part of Neji was steadiest. Witnessing something extraordinary, he was compelled to sit upright, holding Tenten and maintaining what he could in the embrace. No sooner had Neji moved in to kiss her, as he felt her rippling and contracting around him, Tenten abruptly took a fistful of his hair and pulled his head back. He didn't fight it. He shut his eyes as she kissed and sucked a pulse point on his neck, and he slid his hands down her back to her ass, muttering her name as if it were a tune that would forever repeat in his head.

She relished Neji's cry and squeezed herself a bit tighter, because she knew by his shuddering and the tension of his neck that he was riding his own orgasm out, so briefly after hers. Tenten was courteous enough to let go of the silky locks in her hands and let Neji move freely. He rested his head on Tenten's shoulder for a moment. Spent, Neji secured his arms around her and then fell back onto the corner of a skewed pillow, slipping out of her in the process.

Tenten nestled in beside him and pulled the abused blanket up, draping it over them. While Neji planted amazed kisses on her face and eyelids, she tried not to stress about fluids dripping very noticeably down her legs. 'I really did not think this through. It's my understanding that conception is not an instantaneous thing, but I had better hustle in the morning and make sure I did not seriously mess up just now…” Tenten suspected at least one of her friends would be assigned to rounds at the clinic tomorrow, so she could plead for help then.

The rumbling, unclear sounds coming from Neji formed an inquiry: Was she alright? Not wishing to kill the mood with, "No, we're idiots. Do you mind if I run out to procure preventative measures?" Tenten said instead, "I am great." He made a pleased, affirmative noise in reply. Neji had turned to rest his chin above her head and wind himself around her. Tenten liked that, so she crammed a pillow under her neck and back to fit into the line of his body properly. She had a feeling that she asked something poignant like, "Did I feel more like twilight or dawn?"

But what she really said was, "...why...didn't we do that sooner...?"

Sleepily, Neji confessed that he had really wanted to. But disrespecting her was out of the question, even though she'd encouraged him to be intimate time and time again.

Tenten thought something else, but was asleep, and so it became a dream.

Sometime late that night, Tenten's deep sleep was interrupted by a soft voice and a tap on her nose. She wandered back to consciousness and opened her eyes a sliver, not surprised to be face to face with Neji. Scratchy with sleep, she wondered, "Did you get any rest?"

"Yes." His voice was warm, like the rest of him.

Tenten gave him a hmm of approval before tucking down again, but Neji was drawing shapes on her skin and it kept her awake. She gave a less than enthusiastic grunt to that.

"Once more." Neji requested.

"No." She was happy to say it, "Sleep."

So he left it at that and Tenten rolled over, letting him spoon her fearsomely and she admitted that she liked how he rubbed himself against her backside, but she was definitely going to fall asleep again so goodnight. Neji kissed the back of her neck and behind her ears, listening to Tenten's hushed breathing. Then he slept and dreamt of a fire glowing in the night below a vault of stars.

When Tenten's eyes snapped open in a timely fashion the next morning, 6:00AM was scrawled in red on the bedside table's clock. She held still because she could feel Neji awake at her back, and it reminded her of pretending to be asleep on the journeys to and from the Marsh Country. She wondered if he had done the same, then.

"Hey," She rasped and reached her arm behind her to feel any bit of him, in this case his shoulder, "Neji?"

"Mm?"

"Did you ever...well, when we were on that godforsaken ship headed towards the Land of Marshes, and I bunked with you while Lee was sick...did you actually sleep?" Tenten went ahead and asked.

He stilled behind her, somewhat surprised by the question. Neji spread his hands flat on her stomach as he held her from behind, "I slept."

She pointed out, "You held me like this."
"I know I did. Though it was horrifically uncomfortable and the sleep was sub-par." Neji recalled, "And I may have acted in some moments, to seem asleep when I wasn't."

"Ah-ha." Tenten got to the bottom of it, "I think I knew you liked me then. Just then. It's kind of stupid... but for so long I felt convinced maybe I got on your nerves and challenged you too much. That you were fed up with me."

"What bizarre reasoning."

"But when we fought you were always extra mad at me. Forget Naruto or whoever was in your face at whatever time..."

"You were never the one I was angry at while we argued," Neji gave her a reassuring rub, "Let the records show. I was furious with myself for picking fights with you in the first place."

"Huh. Weird."

He didn't disagree.

"So... yeah, I was pretty sure you were into me while we were stuck on that boat. I even remember something you told me."

"What's that?"

"That I am top quality in every respect." She was grinning.

"The statement still holds up." Neji was kissing the backs of her shoulders, "Though you were late with that realization."

Tenten tried to disguise the fact that she was stunned; taken aback by the prospect that maybe he'd been attracted to her at any point before that. So she asked, "How late?"

"Moderately."

"What does-? No, I mean, give me a time frame."

"Why does it matter?"

Tenten pressed, "Work with me. Significant others are statistically proven to ask dumb things in pursuit of validation."

"If that's so... then..." He was thinking, "It depends."

Flabbergasted, "Depends on what?"

"What you want to know. If you want to know when I was fully aware of how I felt about you, then consider the time the Hokage wanted to break my neck in her office, when you were reassigned." Neji reminisced a bit, "If you want to know when I was only just becoming aware of how I felt, that was sometime during our mission to Katabami to deal with Kurosuki Raiga's gang."

Tenten listened in silence.

"Or you may want to know about how I had no idea that I cared for you, but in hindsight I can confirm I most certainly did." He offered, "Which was shortly after I met you and got to know you on our team. No one else was like you. You were distinguished although I had no way to explain it." Neji concluded, "So it depends upon what you want to know."
She had sunk into the sheets and mattress a bit more, shrinking as if to hide. That was the same length of time she could boast that she'd had eyes for him. Albeit they had achieved stages of affection and recognition at different intervals, but total runtime was about equal. Tenten felt Neji carding his fingers through her hair, but she was wound so tight it was as if her bones might break. She had asked and gotten her answer. Just because she could scarcely believe it was not his fault.

Tenten reeled inaudibly for about a minute more while Neji dillydallied beside her, then she about-faced and looked him dead in the eye, "Are you sorry that you were a jerk? If you liked me-! For that long— do you regret the garbage I had to put up with-?

"Every waking moment," Neji confirmed, "I regret the things I did that hurt you."

She rested a closed fist against his chest, feeling frustration evaporate off of her. There. He had laid it plainly before her and now, instead of feeling shocked or upset, Tenten acknowledged that they had both been fortunate. They were here. And his kisses were feeling very good so she raised her head for a better angle and let him taste her. Neji's hand had also wandered down her chest and stomach, then explored the tender place below. Tenten halted his arm, "Hold on a minute."

Before he could try propositioning her again, Tenten sprang from her bed and out of the room. Neji plopped his head onto a pillow, choosing patience as he heard the creak of the bathroom door. Shortly after that a wail pierced the air. He sat bolt upright in fright.

In the restroom, Tenten had merely wished to relieve her bladder and then go about the day— just as soon as a burning, hellish pain made her shriek. She crumpled for a moment, holding onto the vanity's edge for dear life, 'Did I pee fire?' No. She discovered that, while whimpering and finishing up, she in fact had some degree of ripped skin. Down there.

Tenten heard a segment of Neji's unhelpful, concerned blathering on the other side of the door while she cleaned dried fluids from herself. She tried to negotiate moving around with a much more noticeable injury. Well, noticeable after the morning's first pee. The pain had worn off slightly. She asked him to please keep it down and relax, "It's okay, Neji. I'll be out in a minute." She washed her hands and brushed her teeth, then nearly crashed into him when she exited the bathroom.

Neji caught her by her shoulders, "What happened?"

"Oh, you know, just painful urination." She shrugged wearily, "Not the end of the world, but…I need to go to the health clinic."

As he looked at her, he was rapidly realizing the magnitude of recklessness they had engaged in. Tenten watched as his nostrils seemed to flare in slow motion while he drew breath.

"Take it easy." Tenten advised, "I will be fine. I just shouldn't wait." She kissed the shocked look off of Neji's face and then led him back to the bedroom, handing over the Hanfu she had meant to give him the night before, "Here. Get dressed, go home, and hold a spot for me at breakfast. I am starving."

"I should accompany you." He didn't really think about how that would look.

"Nah," Said Tenten as she pulled her clothes on, "I don't think you should. Sakura isn't going to be thrilled about this…and I don't want her to condemn the both of us."

Across town in an annex of Konoha Hospital, Tenten had asked around and then been pointed in Sakura's direction. She was not currently in the Women's Health Ward, but the secretary said she would page Sakura for her. Tenten thanked the lady at the desk and took a very careful seat in a waiting area. Several minutes later, Sakura appeared (somewhat dressed down) and bid Tenten good morning with a wave. Then her expression crystalized as she immediately noted the absence of buns in Tenten's hair, which had instead been tied in pigtails. It alerted Sakura that something was amiss.

"Trauma Ward is that way." Sakura pointed with her thumb back over her shoulder, "But you don't look like you're bleeding or anything."

"Hi, Sakura."

She rested her hands on her hips and stood beside Tenten, "Hi. What'd you do?"

"Uh." Tenten smiled sheepishly, "I got a little hurt. I was careless."

"Is that so? Walk with me." Sakura sounded an awful lot like Tsunade sometimes, directing Tenten to a nearby patient room, "Give me the details please."

"Well I…have a nocturnal injury." Tenten announced.

Sakura quirked a brow at her as she shut the door, "Nocturnal?"

"You know. A…sex injury."

"…you're kidding me." She tried to frown but only dissolved into laughter, "What'd you-?"

Tenten clarified, "Look, it was my first time and I was pretty stupid about it. Poorly planned, I'll admit. I've been incredibly busy lately, so when spontaneity took over it's not like Neji was paying much attention either."

"Alright, alright. Just, go behind that screen for me and change into this," Sakura handed her a packaged hospital gown, "I'll fix you." Tenten did as instructed as Sakura went on, "External injury?"

"I think so. It hurt like hell when I peed."

"Yeah, that's more common than you'd think." Sakura sighed, "Did you use protection?"

"What's with the survey—"

"Don't start. As your medical caregiver, for the time being, I need you to cooperate."

"Have you ever had other sexual partners?"

"No!" Tenten barked from behind the partition.

"Has Neji ever had other partners?"

"No, Sakura, he definitely hasn't." Tenten stomped around the screen in the flimsy gown and followed Sakura's pointing finger, then clambered up the seat and into stirrups, "I already know how idiotic it was."

"Then don't expect to hear the end of it from me." The pink haired woman adopted a motherly tone, "You can't take chances. Now more than ever you're in a precarious position with your clan, and you may not get a say whether or not you want to complete an unintended—"
"Sakura, I know—"

Sakura turned on a lamp and swiveled it, snapping gloves on before the examination. "Yeah, you know. Then act like it. I can't believe an older, more mature kunoichi who I look up to does dumb shit like this." On a rolling stool, Sakura moved in to take a closer look, "Ah. Right there. Can you raise your butt up a little?"

Humiliated but grateful, Tenten complied and Sakura evaluated her. The medic-nin sighed and asked if anything else was bothering her, "While I'm down here?"

"No." Tenten had folded her hands on her stomach and stared at the ceiling. The drudgery of such checkups straddled the line between boring and mortifying. Then came a knock at the door.

"Sa-ku-ra." It was Ino's voice, and she sounded way too upbeat and awake this morning.

"I'm with Tenten." Sakura called in response.

"Oh!" Ino took that as an invitation to waltz in, which it wasn't, "Good morning, ladies! What's… what the-? Did you switch primary physicians or-?"

"No, I'm with her as in treating her." Sakura grumbled, "Do you mind?"

"Sakura, I was looking for you since we were going to start that double-blind trial, but Shizune-san took over and told me you were paged somewhere." Ino crossed her arms and nonchalantly looked between Tenten's legs, "Rough mission?"

Tenten was no longer embarrassed, simply resigning herself to the scrutiny and clinical takes of her medically inclined friends. She was upfront about it, "Not a mission. Just sex."

"Well that's preferable." Ino conceded, "Huh! Looks like you had a bit too much fun."

"Not really. It all felt pretty normal."

"Except for the part where you were stupid." Sakura reiterated as she pressed a healing hand to the offending wound, "Ripped perineum. This will be just a minute or two."

"If you claim it was normal activity how did you rip that?" Ino was perplexed.

"I don't know. Apparently I don't know anything because I'm stupid." Tenten defended.

"We all do something ill-advised, at some point." Ino offered a rare token of consolation, "And you know what, Tenten? Good for you! It took Neji a while before he pounced."

"It did. I'm happy though. It feels like a…scream-it-from-mountaintops kind of happy." Tenten reported sunnily, "Even if the aftermath stung a little."

"Normal sex wouldn't have done that to you, though. Did you try any weird positions? You're more likely to injure something that way."

"No…no, it was only beginner-level stuff, I'd say." Tenten maintained, "Nothing adventurous."

"Of course not. And in that case, if you kept it basic then you probably tore just because he was big." Ino assessed, unaffected by both Tenten and Sakura's flustered retorts.

"Hey, do me a favor and do not talk about any of that stuff while I'm down here." Sakura complained.
"Gosh, you girls just can't handle frank talk. Sakura, you don't have to think about how you were the second person in the last ten hours to get close to Tenten's—"

Sakura trilled for Ino to shut her mouth and hurled a box of gloves at her with a free hand. Tenten lay in the seat, extremely abashed, "You know what? I'll keep the injury. I'm just gonna go…"

"Hold it, we're nearly done." Sakura tried to reel things in again, "Sorry. Ino has a way with words in situations like this, and there's a time and a place for that talk," She turned and added over her shoulder, "And it's not in an examination room."

"I just wanted to congratulate her." Ino protested weakly.

Tenten chirped, "Thanks, but can you do just say something without squeebing Sakura out? I kind of need her help."

"That's not easy for me to do, but I can give it a shot."

Sakura decided to put her friend to work, "Ino, would you mind grabbing me a patient file and day-after medication? That's just outside in the cabinet on the left."

"Sure. Levonorgestrel tablet, right?"

"Yup. Pink and orange box, about eye-level on the shelf."

Ino set off with those directions and Tenten breathed a sigh of relief.

"She gets less obnoxious when she has something to do." Sakura observed, adding, "When did you last have your period?"

"Over a week ago-?" Tenten estimated.

"Alright. That's cutting it real close to an unsafe time, so be smarter from now on. Ino's getting a medication you should take right away that prevents fertilization. If for any reason it makes you vomit by mid-morning, let someone know or send for me. Though I'm pretty sure it'll work without making you sick." Sakura explained, done with the healing process, "You're all set. Let me just take some notes."

"You're going to keep a file on me?" Tenten slipped out of the seat and moved to the divider to change. She felt much better, save for a slight, residual ache from last night's happenings.

"A few temporary notes, until I can get your health file from the other office. I want to show it to Tsunade-shishou so she can approve a prescription for you. I don't have authorization to do that yet." Sakura pulled the gloves off and tossed them in a waste bin.

While dressing Tenten asked, "A prescription for—?"

"Birth control." Sakura deadpanned, "Unless you have other plans, I assume you want to concentrate on a shinobi career for the time being."

"No, you hit the nail on the head right there."

Ino returned and handed over a folder to Sakura, and then reached around the partition to gift Tenten with a box, "Here you go! Take that with a meal. Congrats again."

"Thanks…"
About an hour later, Tsunade read the file that Sakura had slipped onto her desk. She looked up slowly with an unamused expression and Sakura could only shrug at her.

"All I have to say is good grief." The Hokage sniffed. She approved a blank prescription with the monthly shot Sakura had recommended, and then handed it back to her apprentice, "Go drop that off for me, Sakura. Thank you for intercepting silly visits that I no longer have patience for."

"Just doing my duty, Shishou."

"Come back in a little while, I'm having a brief chat with some Tide diplomats next."

Sakura confirmed she would before leaving the office. She greeted the gaggle of Tide Village representatives who passed her in the hallway. Then the group moseyed on in to boisterously hail the Hokage, at least in Inari's case. Most of his companions were older, quieter, and tuckered out after traveling from Hidden Sand the day before.

"Good morning," Tsunade managed, because she was still running off of the last vestiges of caffeine in her system, "Hello, Inari and Tazuna, it's good to see you." She spotted Menma with a more mature ninja beside him, and two polished middle-aged women who she supposed were the deal-makers, "And hello friends from the Tide Village. How was your visit to Sand?"

"Dry." Tazuna offered, "Saw some old friends of mine out there too. Had a drink with a bridge builder named Mara…ate the Kazekage's food. It was alright."

Inari gave his assessment, "It's awesome! Kind of bigger than our city at home. But like grandpa says, I don't think I could live without a beach being close by."

"What kind of Tide ninja would you be if you strayed from where the tides are?" Tsunade smiled slightly at the boy, who had a Nawaki-like vibe to him, "Were any deals struck?"

"Yep."

"Yep." Said Tazuna, "Wanna give her a summary, Umeka?" He turned to the suited woman beside him.

"It's a pleasure to meet you, Hokage-sama. Honda Umeka; director of Trade Administration in Shioakure." She stepped forward and handed over a card, which Tsunade accepted quizzically,

"Hidden Sand's village council and trade commission accepted our offer of 315 million Ryo over the next three years to import shinobi equipment, weaponry, artisans, and technology. We also concluded deals to export fish, fruit, produce, grain, oilseeds, milk, sugar, textiles, and other crops to Hidden Sand for preferential duty rates. I hope we can expand what Tide has to offer with the Hidden Leaf Village as well."

"You have my attention." Tsunade accepted a small booklet as well, glimmering with photos and smiling faces of Tide inhabitants, "You seem to be doing very well for yourselves. It's remarkable how quickly your village recovered after years of oppression."

"We never thought we would get to where we are now." Umeka agreed, "And we are thankful for our prosperity. We hope to share it with the friends we've made."

"Very good, Honda-san. Can I put our Trade Commissioner in touch with you? I'm not up to date on our current needs and deficits, but I am sure he will be eager to start a conversation." The Hokage handed back that contact info, to Umeka's delight. She and her trade office companion, Masaki, promised they would collaborate soon.

"In addition to all of that frilly stuff," Tazuna tacked on, "Maybe we might set up an exchange of labor, of sorts. We recently tested Tide's Sensory Corps and found it's lacking, to put it nicely. If you'd be willing to lend any expertise for training, Tide can make it worth your while monetarily. And we'd shine your shoes twice if you'd be willing to assist with Sealing Corps training." He exchanged a weary look with Menma, "Sand did a great job establishing our Sealing Corps, and we even had a defected Mist Sealing veteran in charge of it."

"How could that possibly go wrong?" Tsunade wondered.

"Well make no mistake, he was an upstanding gent," Tazuna defended the Sealing Commissioner, "He just happened to be 96 years old and he died last week. Right before our cadets could finish tests to be promoted to analysts...so now we have a bunch of disorganized greenhorns who aren't confident enough to say: We can protect the village."

"Troubling." Tsunade concurred, lacing her hands under her chin.

"Let me know if that's doable." Tazuna requested.

"I will find that out for you. I'm overdue for a talk with our Sealing Corps head as it is." Tsunade leaned back in her chair and scanned her eyes across the line of Tide visitors, "Tazuna, Inari, Menma, Umeka, and Masaki..." She rapped a red nail on her desktop, "And who are you?"

The man released a small sigh, as if he had been trying to blend into the background.

"Tsunade-sama, please let us introduce Utakata to you." Menma spoke up, "He has been with us for quite some time, and was a former Mist ninja. He is an Academy tutor and one of the co-chairs of our Jounin Council."

"Ah, I've heard about you before." Tsunade wore a tiny, sly smile, "Not the most social fellow, but who could blame you? It's heartening to see so many Mist vagrants making a home for themselves somewhere peaceful."

"He's alright, I guess." Tazuna sort of vouched for their transplant ninja, "Quite the foodie, I must say. He's reviewed every restaurant in the Tide Village already. He's not that great with kids, but he's gotten better. I noticed that he recently got a girlfriend too and she's a looker."

"Do you mind?" Utakata hissed out of the corner of his mouth.

"I am trying to make you seem more appealing to the Hokage, but you're a tough sell." Tazuna snapped back.

"He's nice enough." Umeka vouched and Masaki tepidly supported the claim.

"Why do you guys have to make it sound like he's a jerk? He's cool! He saved Menma and Matsuri during the attack, and he's got this Bubble-Blowing jutsu that no one else uses. Well, like, he's got a million jutsu, he knows his stuff." Inari contributed.

"Thank you, Inari," Menma then suggested, "Why don't we let Utakata-san speak for himself? Earlier he said that he wished to speak with the Hokage."

"Oh." Inari quieted down.

Tsunade turned her gaze expectantly back to Utakata as he was given the floor. He seemed to relax a little and took a few steps closer.

He started off with, "I am the jinchuriki of the Six-Tails."
Tsunade was unperturbed, "I know."

"Because Gaara-sama told you?" Utakata supposed.

"He did. He was very pleased to meet you. I am confident he did not share that information with anyone else." Tsunade assured him, "We know better than that."

"The Kazekage told me that you can be trusted. That unlike leaders I've known in the past, you won't use others—you won't use a jinchuriki as a weapon, or against his or her will." Utakata had intense orange eyes, fixing them on Tsunade, "Gaara-sama told me that you care for and believe in the Nine-Tails' jinchuriki. That he has friends and is appreciated here."

Not fully aware of such sensitive details, Tazuna exchanged frazzled glances with Menma and Inari. Umeka and Masaki did not even appear to fully understand what the shinobi in the room were talking about.

"I love this village's jinchuriki. I'm not afraid to say that." Tsunade replied evenly, "If you want to judge whether or not the Leaf Village can be depended upon...because I expect Hidden Mist has let you down...you need to determine that for yourself. My words only count for so much."

"I trust the Kazekage."

"And well you should. He is a good man." She agreed, "Wiser than many twice his age."

"Would you care for the welfare of other jinchuriki? Those who do not belong to your village?" He asked, "If they came here seeking shelter from violence, hatred, or abuse...if their home was no longer their home? Would you accept them? If their power was a danger to themselves and those around them? Or if they feared for their lives because the Akatsuki chases them endlessly, no matter where they go?"

Tsunade smiled at him. She understood him a bit better.

Utakata trailed off and tried to figure out what her reactions meant.

"I already have. My Sensei, the late Third Hokage, has also done so and with great care." She tipped her hand to point at him, "So are you, as one of this fellowship of open-minded shinobi—are you prepared to do your part? Will you and the Tide Village stand with us against the Akatsuki and the terror they spread?"

He was stock still for a long breath, cogs whirring in his head in an effort to make sure he wasn't being lied to again. That this cause was not a farce or distraction, and that the Hokage was not paying him lip service as so many in his life had done. The corner of Utakata's mouth twitched up, resisting a relieved smile. He got a strong impression that she was the genuine article. Hidden Leaf could be an ally after all.

Inari whispered from behind him, "I think we totally should say yes."

Tazuna gave the boy a nudge, "Shh!"

Menma restrained a chuckle and then moved to stand beside Utakata, who glanced at him curiously and then recognized it as a gesture of solidarity. Inari got the hint and then joined the bunch, the shortest ninja among them, but he too bowed to the Hokage with respect when Utakata and Menma did so.

"Guess I've got no choice but to agree too if these blockheads have to make a decision like that."
Tazuna grumbled, cocking a hand on his hip, "Then let's just say your enemies are our enemies now. But if we're gonna be buddies, please feel free to help us get into top shape."

"Certainly. I intend to." Tsunade soothed any doubt, "I'm glad we agree on this matter. Out of respect for the risk you are taking on; know that I will forward any intelligence regarding the Akatsuki's position, activity, and known members to your security advisors and Jounin Council. I will ask Gaara to do the same."

"Thank you, Hokage-sama." Utakata had warmed up to her.

While the Hokage was being pleasant and tittering things like oh, not at all! Her office door whooshed open again and a twenty-something-year-old Sarutobi ninja bustled in with a half-shouted announcement before he silenced himself and slinked backwards out the door again. He had not expected such a large party to be in Tsunade's office, but she ushered him in, "Banri, get in here! They were just leaving."

The Tide Village group said their farewells and saw themselves out. Sarutobi Banri gave them acknowledging nods of his head before rushing towards Tsunade and sinking to one knee in formality, "Hokage-sama—"

"Oh please don't let this be bad news." She prayed out loud, alone with the young man. He was a Leaf Village Sealing Corps clerk, and anything involving the Sealing Corps tended to be a serious matter.

"I don't believe so, but it is urgent." Banri prefaced it before he said, "Netsuke-sama needs a private audience with you as soon as possible, my lady."

"Netsuke?" Her eyes nearly crossed at the name-drop of the Sarutobi clan's leader, "So this isn't related to the Sealing Corps?"

"No, Tsunade-sama. This is a request made on behalf of the Sarutobi clan. Netsuke-sama did not share with me what he wished to discuss, but…" Banri rose to stand and lowered his voice, "He said I should tell you that the Sandaime would have wanted you to know about it."

She exhaled a rattling sigh, realizing she had stood up as the tension of the announcement hit her. Tsunade dropped into her seat again and began rummaging around her drawers for a liquid cure. She flicked her hand at him to signal haste, "Return to him immediately. I will meet Netsuke at my residence as soon as I am able, just to avoid any busybody ears in this building. I have a few more things to attend to."

"Yes, my lady!" Banri departed to carry the message.

"Why did I overbook myself today?" Tsunade wondered miserably. She had about six more appointments, not counting the brief lesson she wanted to go over with Sakura. Some cutbacks were going to have to be made, because she did not like the gut feeling that accompanied an alarm being raised by the Sarutobi clan.

Tsunade slumped over dejectedly when she found that the bottle in her drawer was empty.

At the exact same time, far away in the Wind Country, Gaara was also folded over onto his office desk. It was going to be a short, ten-minute power nap. Shukaku had promised to wake him to get on with the hectic day.

Even while trying to sleep his brain raced. Luckily, it was thinking about mostly good things. Such as how the new deals with the Tide Village were going to catapult Hidden Sand into a new age of abundance. The village was already flourishing, thanks to thoughtful and committed management since he had been sworn in as a village leader. Gaara wouldn't take full credit for it. The accomplishment belonged just as much to his brother and sister, Baki, the elders, the hard-working everymen and merchants, the students, the harried Chunin and Jounin who had returned to their senses after Rasa's conspirator regime and collusion with Orochimaru. Only by forging ahead together had they gotten anywhere.

Somewhere in his head Shukaku whispered for Gaara to roll over a bit, because he was drooling on a chart he had just worked on for thirty minutes, You'll mess it up.

Gaara turned over, and the thought floated back to him, remembering how he'd been concentrating on finalizing the list of entrants for the Accelerated Chunin Exam. Soon he would hold meetings with stage proctors and administrators about guidelines and how to run it.

A brief vision of Sakura danced behind his eyelids. There was a distinct feeling of flirtation and romance, but she seemed tired, as if she'd had a busy workday too. He dreamed of her asking politely to use his hammock on the roof for a nap. Yes, but only if he joined her. But that thought vanished, because something much louder and livelier shook everything up in his mind.

Naruto had practically stormed the Sand Village—stormed his life, and so very loudly. He seemed identical to his younger, hyperactive self. Gaara was aware that this dream-version of his friend was probably not accurate anymore, but it was what he remembered. No, it could not have been current because Haku was there too, being pleasant and attentive—qualities he really did not possess in spades these days. At least in Gaara's opinion.

"Gaara."

Now he was dreaming of someone talking to him. What did he have to do to get some peace and quiet?

Gaara, wake up. Your sister's here.

He peeked his eyes open and raised his head from where it was tucked on his folded arms. Gaara regarded Temari blearily, as she had just returned from a three-day reconnaissance assignment near the Land of Water. She was still dressed in dark stealth colors. She gave his head an affectionate, sisterly pat, "You okay?"

"Recharging." Gaara sat up and yawned.

"You need it." Temari lowered herself slowly onto a cushy armchair on the opposite side of the desk, "Ahh…I'm glad I'm home now. I need a bath. And wine. Do you want to debrief now or keep napping?"

"Debrief." Gaara chose, still mostly splayed over his desk, "What was it like down there?"

"Essentially all went as planned. Kasuga, Muta, and I met with the informant in the Tide Village, the one you put in a reward-ad for. I couldn't believe he wasn't a turncoat or snitch, since he came from Hidden Mist...but Tazuna told me it's normal for Tide ninja who came from Mist to be trustworthy. It's like they're starting over completely." She slouched back and put her feet up on a coffee table, "So anyway, the guy's name was Reijiro and he's a recent Mist defector. Wants to buy a house in Tide so he said sure, he'd help us track anyone in the Land of Water because he knows it pretty well. I talked to him for a while before we paid him. He was a Sensor-type just like Muta, and there was some great interface between them while we searched."
"How did you start?" Gaara asked.

"With rumors. Most of them were tips of where Momochi Zabuza may have been, but they were all eight months stale or older, which wasn't helpful. We took a roundabout route through some southern islands that were remote and cleared of drug cartels. Those hideouts were all empty...we went to some active gang hubs after that on larger islands," Temari stretched her arms above her head and cracked her back, "But you guessed it: not much there either."

Gaara rolled a paperweight back and forth over papers, "When did the trail get warmer?"

"When I made a suggestion." She smiled, "Reijiros convinced for a while that we were looking for a rogue, but by that he meant the rogue he knows. Which is from Hidden Mist. They're cutthroats and scoundrels. He was picturing Momochi Zabuza. Then I corrected him and asked where would we go if we were looking for a humanitarian, or someone who uses medical jutsu? Because that's what Haku does." Temari went on, "Then he got a better idea of how to narrow it down. We went to a place called Moji that used to have a University. He said that sometimes human-rights groups did work there because it's gotten so bad. Know what I found out?" She looked smugly at her brother.

"What?" He was listening intently.

"A few people recognized Haku's description. There weren't any specific leads about where he went or what kind of work he did. But a businessman named Gomo said we should try going north. Hell, north it was. And you told me that Haku is friends with an old merchant named Hiroshi, so we tried asking old people if they had any contact with either of them." She snapped her fingers, "That's when...some shipping depot workers in a harbor told us: Oh, you want Nanakusa. That's the next island over. There are young medic-nin training there, and they serve the senior citizen community." Temari smiled victoriously, "And you know the other attraction of that island? Hiroshi's tea shop. Word got around."

"So he's there." Gaara said, sitting up and shaking off sleep.

"He's there." Temari nodded, "Or at least based there. We would have taken a boat over to check, but we nearly ran straight into a Mist patrol that scared the hell out of Reijiros. We retreated when he said that Terumi psyco would have melted us instantly if he caught us." She recalled, "So I want to go back prepared. Two Sensor-types...give me Muta if he's available. He's good. And I need ninja who are quick and discreet."

Gaara headed her off before she could ask for a veteran kunoichi, "You can't have Zeriko. She's in the Lightning Country."

"Shit." Temari bit her thumbnail.

"Kankuro would be ill-suited."

"I love him, but he'd be ill-suited." Temari agreed, "And you need to stay here..."

"Yes. And I won't send Matsuri."

"No, no, she needs more time to train." His sister sighed, "Well, just put together a team that can hold its own against a Swordsman of Mist."

"It seems I scattered that team on assignments for the time being. I didn't think you would find Haku so fast." Gaara apologized, "Do you want to wait until I recall more veterans?"

"Why? He might leave the island, and veteran jounin will bitch if you send them out again for back-
"What am I paying them for?" Gaara sniffed.

"I don't want to wait. Give me the best team that's available to head out tomorrow. I'll manage."

Temari decided.

He gave her a measured, contemplative look before nodding, "Alright."

"Thanks. Did anything interesting happen while I was gone?" She changed the subject.

"Apart from Tide Village deal ratification and watching the council salivate for that money?" Gaara rolled his eyes up to remember any noteworthy events, "Exam planning, I did laundry."

"Phew. No wonder you're so tired." She grinned at his annoyed face.

"Don't patronize me. Do you know how hard it is cleaning a house after a full day's work?"

"Uh, hello? Let's just get a maid. You don't have to be so uptight about how things are done at home."

"We're not rich."

"No, but the three of us make enough to afford a housekeeper." Temari planted her hands on the desk and leaned over, "You're just stubborn."

"One of my finer qualities." He handed her an empty lunchbox he had eaten out of, "Please take that home. I'll wash it later."

"Oh my god. Don't ever complain to me again." She laughed at him and spun on her heel. By the time Temari was out of the office, Gaara felt nauseous. It did not feel quite right to send his sister on this assignment without the proper pieces on the chess board. He wanted to call her back and renege on the decision; make her wait for more experienced, veteran Jounin to accompany her on this retrieval operation.

She would get miffed at him again. Temari was itching to go, thrilled that her leads had delivered them to a concrete endpoint. She wanted to strike while the iron was hot. That was just how she was. To avoid her razor-toothed impatience and ire, Gaara would give her the team she asked for, when she asked for it.

But it didn't feel right.

Chapter Soundtrack: "Heavydirtysoul" by twenty one pilots

It was a chore trying to integrate Kurenai into the Sarutobi clan whenever she grew uncomfortable and dug her heels in. For cripes' sake, Asuma thought, the woman wanted to marry him. But the clan's estate made her feel antsy and off-balance, the animals freely roaming the property also bothered her, she had a different level of hygiene than his clansmen, and she had a knack for finding small things to nit-pick.

She said she wanted to stay in their tiny, woeful condominium and live out the rest of their days there. He was thinking maybe compromise was necessary, because it was a shitty place to live even though it was affordable. "Very well." He got her to nod her head at compromise.

But they were on their way again to his brother Netsuke's house, located centrally on the sprawling, verdant property of the Sarutobi clan, upon which many houses and even a park had been built. They'd been there before many times, usually to get drunk and play cards. However, it was only noon and they were taking a bit of a meandering walk that sunny day, just to look around. Kurenai was fine with that.

While rounding the bend in the lane that would lead to his brother's house, Asuma stopped for a moment to light a cigarette. He watched as Kurenai leveled her attention on an orchard across the street.

"That smells good." She said absently.

"Oranges." He said, and then she repeated it as if she'd thought of the answer herself. He smiled and followed her as she curiously crossed the street.

"It's not as developed here." Kurenai pointed out, "Not like the last block."

"This area usually stays reserved for gardening projects and the orchards we keep." Asuma walked around the fold of trees and blossoms, arriving at a pebbled walk, "I don't know what'll happen to it now."

"Why not?" Her eyes were sharp and attentive.

"The old folks that tended this plot moved away to a tropical island earlier this year, and the bank's trying to sell their house." He pointed to it, nestled between garden boxes overgrown with flowers, and paralleled by orange blossoms on its opposite side. Asuma exhaled a line of smoke, "Kakima gave up trying to maintain the plants here. I don't know what my brother wants to do about it."

Kurenai was frowning and thinking. Asuma stood back and observed as she carefully approached the home, which was a respectable size and of traditional style. Moss and vines had crept up onto the porch. The windows were dirty. Mother-of-pearl wind chimes hung suspended from a corner beam, swaying in the breeze. He did not object when she let herself inside without a word, entering through the unlocked door to take a look around. Kurenai had a cat-like fickleness when it came to decisions, so Asuma felt it was best to let her analyze and explore as much as she wished. He stood outside and smoked.
He glimpsed her at a second floor window as she was investigating the top level of the house. About ten minutes later, Kurenai returned and stopped beside him.

"It's filthy." She said.

"Banks don't clean as well as they should. They're not the best homeowners."

"I like everything about it." Kurenai told him, "I won't need much convincing, Asuma."

"You sure about that?" He smiled at her and raised his brows.

"It isn't surrounded by neighbors, your brother lives nearby, and I can garden here." She listed the positives, "That's why you picked it and made us come this way."

"That's why." Smoke rose in tendrils from his nostrils.

"Are there animals?"

"They show up from time to time." Asuma held the crook of his arm out for her to take, which she did, and they kept walking, "I can keep critters away if that's what you want."

"They'll eat my plants."

"They can try. There are ways around that."

"It needs to be cleaned, but it's in good condition. I suppose it does outshine the place we have now." She conceded.

"Yeah, it beats the hell out of the closet in that cramped little building we've been putting up with." Asuma agreed, "So if we call this a solid compromise, I'll work out the details."

"How much—?"

He lifted the cigarette from his lips, emphasizing, "Let me work on the details."

Her face was slate-serious, protesting.

"It's about as much as Kakashi's place was." Asuma yielded.

"That isn't cheap."

"It's not. And maybe Netsuke already put something down on it and called it a gift from our Dad." He informed her, "I know how you enjoy contributing, so why don't you furnish it? We can't bring the junk we have there."

"No, I suppose we can't."

While walking, he extended his hand to her and they shook on it.

Then they came to Netsuke's sprawling, Main House home, removed their shoes, and stepped up onto the engawa. Kurenai took a seat in the sitting room while Asuma extinguished his cigarette outside. By the time he ventured in to join Kurenai at the table, Kakima came bumbling through. She had been expecting them and set a variety of unhealthy snacks down on the table while greeting them, "Kurenai, Asuma. Early as usual, you great inconveniences…lunch isn't ready yet."

"I gave you plenty of buffer time. I even took her to see the house." Asuma squared eyes with his "feisty, informal sister-in-law."

"Oh? And the verdict?" She turned to Kurenai.

"It's suitable."

"Hoo! Have I ever heard you use that adjective before? Hot damn." Kakima rose up in great amusement, "Just a second, Netsuke said he was grabbing something." She bustled out to retrieve whatever nice-smelling fish was grilling.

Lunch was served despite Netsuke's absence, and Konohamaru showed up as soon as he smelled the wafting aromas of food. He greeted his aunt and uncle respectfully when he joined them.

"Do you have a mission?" Kakima asked her son, "If you're going to complain to me about why I did not support you signing up for the Accelerated Chunin Exam, then I'd better see you working harder to prove me wrong."

"This afternoon, Mom, jeez."

"You need better role models." She pointed out nonchalantly, "Better diet. You should join my yoga class."

"No, Mom."

"Resist all you like, but I didn't become a Jounin through bursts of training in–between a sedentary lifestyle." Kakima grinned at him, "If you showed up for class, I'd even be willing to teach you a new jutsu afterwards."

"Really?"

"Yeah, really."

Kurenai and Asuma watched the exchange while chewing.

Konohamaru groused over his lunch, "But not one of those crappy low-level jutsu again, right? You always do that to me."

"How are you talking to me now, young man? See, that's what always gets your Dad annoyed. That attitude. That's why he said he would not lift a finger to train you until you become a Chunin. Until you cool it." Kakima reminded him.

"He said that to punish me. Dad never changes his mind."

"True, he doesn't really change his mind for whiners. Anyway, you were asking for it with that last argument you had with him." She twirled chopsticks between her fingers, "I may be crazy, but I don't give him attitude. That's why Dad likes me so much."

"That's gotta be it…" Konohamaru muttered under his breath.

Kakima skillfully snapped a small scoop of nattō at her son and the soybeans plopped and stuck to his forehead. He scowled at her.

"I'm a beautiful goddess and he worships me." She reminded Konohamaru dangerously.

Kurenai was in a very good mood and actually smiling. She quite enjoyed these lunches.
As penance for his muttering and mild defiance, Kakima set Konohamaru to work cleaning up the table after lunch. Asuma asked if they were going to save a serving for his brother, but Kakima insisted that he didn't much care for eating and when he wanted to eat he would scrounge around containers in the refrigerator. Asuma was amazed at the lap of luxury Netsuke lived in thanks to his marriage.

A few minutes after the table had been cleared, Netsuke showed up and set a box down on it, "You didn't save me anything?"

"You don't like eating, remember?"

"That is not in fact true, even when I'm late."

"Then don't be late." Kakima smiled like a knife.

Konohamaru didn't say it, but he did think that his mother absolutely gave his father attitude. She just got away with it.

Netsuke sighed and opened the box, greeting his little brother and Kurenai, "Thank you for dropping by today. Did you see the house?"

"We did." Kurenai confirmed warmly.

"Good. Please buy it soon. It desperately needs proper upkeep." Netsuke went on, "Kurenai, I have something for you."

Her eyes widened a fraction as he extracted a velvet tray of jewelry and other keepsakes from the box, and handed it off to her. Kakima and Asuma watched Kurenai intensely as she examined the heirlooms.

"Some of our father's personal items are in here too, which I'll be keeping." Netsuke clarified, "But those belonged to our mother, Biwako. Seems a shame such pretty things haven't been in use for so long."

Kakima added, "That's your Thanks for coming around! Gift." She was chuckling like mad.

While Kurenai blanched at the incredibly generous gesture, Asuma reassured her, "My Mom would have wanted to pass these things down to you, if she'd been able to meet you."

She shut her eyes and exhaled, overwhelmed, "Thank you. I'm sorry I've troubled all of you for so long."

"It's no trouble. There is sense in taking your time with things." Netsuke observed, "Both of you please feel free to relax here, if you like. Kakima and I have a meeting we need to get to." He handed the box off to his wife to carry, "Do you mind if we go and you see yourselves out later?"

"I know where the door is, Bro." Asuma reminded him.

"Save your sass." Netsuke smirked at him, "We'll be going then."

"Hey, Mom, Dad?" Konohamaru stood in the egress of the sitting room and kitchen, "Will you be gone for long?"

"We may be assigned a mission, if the Hokage or Black Ops need us this weekend." Netsuke estimated, "I don't think we would be gone longer than three days, if that's the case. Otherwise we'll be home tonight and waiting for you to return."

Konohamaru's smile fluttered at the sentiment. It was always hard to watch them go.

Kakima sauntered up to her boy and kissed his cheek, snatching the end of his scarf and tickling his chin with it, "Cheer up, my leaf. Who better to protect the village than your Mom and Dad? We always hurry home to you."

"I know."

"Do well on your mission." She said.

"I will."

"Protect your team." Netsuke added gravely.

Then they left. Konohamaru slumped down onto a cushion again at the table, noticing the finery that had been given to Kurenai, "Is that Grandma's stuff?"

"It was." Kurenai confirmed.

"I never got to meet Grandma." Konohamaru mumbled.

"She was fun." Asuma recalled of his mother, "She had a photographic memory. Very talented and learned as a shinobi. She would have spoiled you rotten."

"Yeah, and I really miss Gramps..." He settled an elbow on the low table and propped his head up on his hand, "So Auntie Kurenai, are you excited to join the Sarutobi clan?"

"I wouldn't say excited. I feel very calm." She was sipping a cup of tea.

"How can you not be excited?" Konohamaru had thought that impending weddings were exciting to all women.

"Please don't mistake my lack of excitement as a lack of appreciation or happiness. I am incredibly happy." Kurenai laughed softly at him, "I have been with your uncle for a very long time. I like to be sure of things."

"Huh. Well that's alright." He agreed, "What do you like about the Sarutobi clan?"

"Hmm." She thought on it, "The flowers all over this property. And Asuma."

"That's it? What about the monkeys or comedy night? Everyone loves that stuff!" Konohamaru was incredulous.

Asuma was merely a spectator of the amusing small-talk between future aunt and future nephew.

"No, Konohamaru, I can't say that I am fond of those other things. Though I may learn to be." She imagined.

While he tittered in disbelief, she poked his round cheek with her pinky finger, "You know, I have a student who you could definitely get along with. I should bring Sato by when he's free."

Today there was a sale on honey. Beekeepers in Nanakusa were having a lucrative summer this year.
Haku turned the jar over in his hand, impressed with the color and clarity. Hiroshi had sent him shopping at the main street's market to pick up things for the tea shop in bulk. After that, he would probably plan with Zabuza this afternoon about where to begin looking for Hozuki Mangetsu's burial site. He might even consider practicing with the spare needle sword that Zabuza had spoken of. If Migawari clamored for his help with patients later, he would do that instead.

He asked a salesman at a table if he could have two cases of honey, and the man nodded chipperly before packaging the goods. 'I haven't had a moment to rest and think, lately...' Haku thought to himself. 'Everyone needs something. At least Zabuza has been more considerate of people, this week.' He also noticed that the strange, non-platonic behavior of the swordsman had disappeared completely. Haku was not sure if Zabuza would ever make a pass at him again, though for now it felt as if the steeled man was utterly disinterested. He hoped to keep it that way.

While paying the honey salesmen, Haku felt a strange twinge. It was almost like a prick at the back of his neck, undetectable and faint. He swatted his skin, wondering if a mosquito had taken a liking to him. There was nothing.

"Hm." Haku glanced around and saw only the high noon hustle of the town around him.

With impressive strength, he carried two large bulk containers of honey jars up a block to Hiroshi's tea shop. He set the delicacy down in the back kitchen and Hiroshi thanked him, "Haku, thank you so much. All I need now are those fruits—the peaches and berries near the end of the market. I'll be making daifuku with them."

"That's a favorite of mine." Haku perked up, "You can get started, Hiroshi-san. I won't be long."

"Sure. How much help can I expect? Do you have training today?"

"I think I will, but I'll confirm that for you." He hurried out again onto the central avenue, passing through the busy stands and tents of the market.

It was a cooler summer day. Cumulus clouds rolled like perfect cotton balls across a blue sky, and the air smelled delicious. Haku would bet that Tomo's children were playing near the creek, supervised of course. Raiga and Ranmaru had gone to the beach together. Migawari would be napping in his house, more than likely. Haku passed by the old medic-nin's building and came to a stop in front of the fruit stand. The old lady greeted him while he examined the produce and gathered desirables into a basket.

His ears perked up to the crunching sound of boots halting on the gravel of the road. Haku looked to his left and saw three Sand shinobi. Swallowing in alarm, he looked to his right, surrounded on that side by another Sand ninja, and beside him was Temari. She looked utterly unimpressed.

"Ah." Haku rolled his eyes forward again to the old woman and handed her money, "Madam, can I ask a favor?"

"Certainly." Her face wrinkled more when she smiled.

"These fruits are for Hiroshi-san, at the tea shop just up the road. Would you please have someone bring this to him?"

"I will, dear. Is something the matter?"

"Not at all. I'm just being arrested by these nice Sand ninja." Haku assured her, "There's no need for fuss. They're peaceful."
"Oh I see, well that's fine. You ought to be on your best behavior next time, young man." She lifted the basket and toddled up the way toward some children who looked strong and bored enough to complete the task for her.

Haku took a breath and turned back to Temari, slightly anxious, "Hello, Temari..."

"Gaara's been patient with you." She reminded him.

"Very patient." He agreed.

"That's over now." Temari updated him, "Don't ask how we found you here, it was a complicated process. Don't ask to do any last minute packing or farewells either. I don't have orders to let you do that."

"Then I won't." Haku saw no reason to protest.

He felt one of the three Sand ninja behind him push him forward, closer to the team captain. Temari turned to one of her subordinates, "Muta." With that cue, Muta stepped forward and gestured for Haku to approach. He had restraints in hand. Haku crossed his hands behind his back and calmly let Muta get to it.

One of the Sand ninja near the fruit stand was surprised, "I thought this fellow was dangerous, Temari-taicho."

"Not to us, he isn't." Temari explained, "To us he's a friend. To Gaara, he's even more important than that. We have to get him back to Suna safely. So remember the rendezvous points we marked just in case—"

Several things happened as Muta shrieked in terror and dropped the metal restraints before they could fold around Haku's wrists. He and Haku watched as the Sand ninja that Temari was speaking to was bisected in a spray of red, splattering them, and his torso toppled off of his bottom half and to the ground. Haku had only shreds of terrified thought race through his head: Muta must have been a Sensor ninja, but Zabuza had suppressed his chakra for the ambush.

"I thought Kori was keeping watch for this bastard!" A Sand Jounin spat as he dove laterally, avoiding the returning arc of Zabuza's sword.

"—he killed Kori! I can't feel him." Muta reported on their sentry, "He just killed…Mitsuie too…"
He was frozen by the killing intent and the foul death of his friend just in front of him.

Haku decided to keep his hands free, warding Muta and Temari back with a gesture, "You can still arrest me! I just have to stop him." He had senbon steadied between his knuckles when he strafed sideways along market stands, trying to get a clear shot at Zabuza as Temari's other two subordinates darted around him. Even more troubling was that, no sooner had one needle successfully stuck into Zabuza's arm as he hurled a ninja named Tokumaru back…Temari slipped in and tranched her metal fan against Zabuza's sword.

His heart was in a freefall inside of his body as panic took root. Haku lunged toward the fight, but Water Clones that been lying in wait at the edge of an alleyway shattered apart a stand with Water techniques, slicing into Tokumaru's face as he rolled away. Haku and the other Sand ninja were bowed over by the barrage, scrambling to avoid the follow up strikes of the Water Clones chasing them. Haku's only recommendation to his new companion was, "Parry them!" Which the ninja managed with a summoned spear, kicking away one clone and then hacking into the other with a spear-tip. As the clone splashed apart, Haku molded it into ice, and he fired icicle shards at another clone that was looming over the defenseless Tokumaru on the ground.

The Sand ninja let out an anxious breath, "Shit. What's your name again?"

"Haku." The two had raced over to the fallen Sand ninja, and Haku set to work healing him, "Who are you?"

"Hisauij."

"Hisauij, I don't know if Temari and your teammate Muta can deal with Zabuza. If he was this willing to ambush your entire team, it means he is confident he can defeat you." Haku explained while healing Tokumaru's head, "You should take him as soon as he is well enough to stand and retreat. I'll stop Zabuza."

"Kid, if something happens to you the Kazekage is going to be mighty pissed." Hisauji informed him, "We already lost Kori and Mitsuie, which is just— I can't even think of that right now. I'm not going anywhere until you and Temari-taicho have got that fucker on his back begging for mercy."

Tragically, Haku spotted what was most definitely a Shadow Clone of Zabuza's. It was casually positioned beside a wheelbarrow and strategically producing Water Clones near a decorative pond to keep the Sand team separated. If only to level the odds, Haku frantically created several Shadow Clones of his own, and sent them to intercept the onslaught that would have surely killed the Chunin Sensor named Muta.

Temari sliced Zabuza's Shadow Clone in half with her fan, concentrating on moving counter to the nukenin's wild dashes and swings. His sword could hardly come close to cleaving her. It was a vain effort on his part as her Wind nature deflected each attack.

"We don't want anything to do with you." Temari announced archly, "You don't need to step in for Haku. This is a matter that the Kazekage is willing to intervene on, so it's best if you back off before I leave you in pieces."

"He ain't the Kazekage's to take." Zabuza warned her, "He belongs to me now."

She did not like the sound of that, not in the least. It was helpful when one of Haku's Shadow Clones made it past the small mob of Zabuza's making, attacking Zabuza without an ounce of restraint. Zabuza whirled and cut into the clone's head, but his blade stuck. The Shadow Clone had been infused with Haku's Ice Release chakra. Temari spun herself with a windmill kick for momentum, opening her fan to three moons for an incredible blasting gust. The strength of her jutsu had reduced the iced-over clone to diamond dust, and forced Zabuza to abandon his sword to avoid the deadly technique.

A Water Clone's sword swipe snipped a few hairs from her pigtails, and Temari dropped quickly to avoid another attack. She kicked and swept the clone's legs out from under it, freeing a kunai from her sash and plunging it into the clone's head. While it dissolved into a puddle, she heard Muta's scream as he fell forward, impaled from behind by something thin and sharp. A second Shadow Clone of Zabuza's was carrying a needle sword, and he pulled back on a cable to retrieve the weapon, plucking it out of Muta's back. Temari chased off the hateful replication with a rush of wind, and kneeled at Muta's side.

"Can you get up?"

"Yeah, I think he missed. He's not so good with that weapon." Muta put pressure on his wound, "Captain…I don't want to die here."
"Me neither." She confessed worriedly, "Wave over one of Haku's clones. He can heal you."

"He and Hisauji are too busy protecting Tokumaru—"

"Wave him over! Haku knows I want you safe." She barked, speeding off again, "Keep sensing for other clones!"

The sounds of townspeople scattering and fleeing had long since quieted. All of the market had taken shelter on the far side of Nanakusa to avoid the ninja squabble. Temari took to the air to avoid a crashing wave of water that rose up from the creek adjacent to the town. The assault washed away many untethered booths on the street, and it had also given Haku unintended ammunition. He began to attack Water Clones more quickly, cannibalizing them, creating more ice, and then turned to give chase to Zabuza's Shadow Clone that was harrying Temari's subordinates.

With a swing of her fan, Temari blew apart the attempted conjuring of mist Zabuza had wanted to use for cover. He had regained the Seversword while she was distracted by Muta's injury, and he held it steady in his hands as he watched her with a calculating stare. Temari wasted no time in summoning her weasel, Kamatari, and held back as the spinning creature moved faster than the naked eye could spot. Kamatari rather handily cut Zabuza into chunks with his scythe.

She realized there was a nagging, aching pain quickly spreading throughout her body, in all likelihood her adversary's doing. She was also stuck in a repetitive vision of Kamatari cutting Zabuza apart, 'Shit, this is Genjutsu!' Temari dispelled the illusion and willed herself to turn, launching a gust of wind where she predicted she would be attacked from the rear. That staved Zabuza off if only for a moment. Knowing she would be vulnerable as the pain worsened, whatever it was, Temari bolted towards Haku as he did battle with the needle-wielding Shadow Clone. Muta and Hisauji appeared to be indisposed.

Haku let the clone wrap the needle blade's cable around his arm, and he pulled back to anchor himself as the replication took aim at him. In cooperative fashion, Temari cut apart the last Shadow Clone with her fan's gust before she dropped like a stone, striking the dirt face-first. Horrified, Haku turned around to make a break towards her, only to see Zabuza's Seversword had been pitched and was spinning through the air towards him. Haku plunged into an ice mirror below his feet to avoid it, exiting in a frozen patch of alleyway between two buildings.

Temari pushed herself up onto her hands and knees, panting, and beheld as Zabuza extended his hand. The Seversword obediently returned to him and when he caught it the kunoichi supposed that, as rumors purported of Mist's Swordsmen, such weapons were anything but ordinary. She coughed and flecked blood onto the pavement between her wobbling arms, 'What is going on? I don't think...I can stand...'

"It takes a while before Drain kicks in, but I've learned how this sword calls to blood." Zabuza clued her in as he stalked close, hovering Kubikiri Bōchō above her brow, "I could let you bleed out. That'd serve you right for daring to set one foot outside of that fucking desert of yours." He rested the blade's edge against her hitai-ate to mock her, "Ask nicely and I'll end it fast for you."

Temari raised her head in challenge, barely able to see as blood began to stream quickly from the corners of her eyes, nose, ears, lips, and fingernail beds. Her blood had never felt so thin, nor had she ever felt the rush of barbed wire along her insides that raked and destroyed, a technique cast by the giant, vile sword the man held. Her fingertips slid along the frame of her fan, wishing she would find the strength to lift it while she bled uncontrollably.

"Suffer, then." He advised coldly. Zabuza stood there and watched her, interested in the potency of the new technique he'd used. When his eyes strayed to where Muta, Hisauji, and Tokumaru were slumped over and regrouping, he had half a mind to chop their arms off and let them wallow. That was until Temari spoke up in a soft sputter, her teeth stained red.

"What a lonely, unhappy man!" A cough muffled her laugh, "You probably don't know what… you'd do without him." She was referring to his desire to keep Haku.

Incensed by the remark, Zabuza raised his sword up for a chopping blow, then Haku careened into him with an exhausted, desperate tackle that toppled Zabuza over. Rather than try to wrestle the Seversword away from Zabuza, which likely would not have worked out, Haku turned 'round on his knees and stretched himself over Temari. He felt her convulsing while he held her, trying to hide her from sight as Zabuza got a hold of Haku's tunic and tried to pry him off of the kunoichi he was shielding.

"What in the ever loving fuck are you doing?" Zabuza snarled, "They're trying to capture you, you imbecile."

"I won't let you do this—I won't let you hurt anyone else." Haku had pressed healing hands to Temari's face as she struggled to stay lucid, "Zabuza, I'm begging you… please let her go unharmed. Let all of them go."

"Let 'em go so they can tell the motherfucking Kazekage what happened, so he can hunt me down next?" The man could hardly believe the stupidity of the request, "They're all fucking dead. These are problems, and dumbass ninja to boot. If you hadn't gotten in my way, I'd be burying the lot of them right now—starting with this prideful witch of theirs."

"You won't." Haku had pressed Temari flat to his chest to avoid the curve of the Seversword Zabuza had aligned with her neck.

Fed up, Zabuza snapped, "Why do you care if this bitch lives or dies—?"

"-she's my girlfriend—!"

Between their roaring and flagging negotiations, Temari weakly pointed out to Zabuza, "He's exaggerating. I broke up with him a while ago."

"Fucking fuck." Zabuza stabbed his sword into the ground and grabbed Haku by his ponytail, pulling his head back to look the boy in the eye, "You are a menace to all progress and sanity. You think you get to pull this shit? You don't. Let go or I'll kill you with her."

Haku held on to Temari and tucked his head down. He readily accepted the possibility.

Furious, Zabuza tossed Haku's hair and stepped back. He momentarily weighed the cost of writing off Haku and the training investment that had gone into the insufferable young man, and then realized that Haku's goodness and dedication could be used against him. Now was an opportune time to do so.

"I'll kill them first." Zabuza offered, watching Haku tense as he laid a hand on his sword hilt and turned toward the Sand ninja who had slung Tokumaru's arms over their shoulders, "Or you can do as I say."

"They can fight." Temari reminded Haku, "Don't let him—"

"Whatever you want." Haku agreed.

She sunk her nails into the skin of his chest, "He's going to use you."
Zabuza opportunistically extracted another deal out of Haku, "You want me to let them go? Fine. They agree to not send any Sand idiots to this island or the surrounding area. That's the first requirement for me to not use their limbs for crab-pot bait."

Haku acquiesced, "They won't."

"Good. If they squeal, I send the two of you in a jar to the Kazekage with my regards."

Zabuza asked Temari's subordinates if they heard that loud and clear, indeed they had, but they still did not trust him as far as they could throw him. With her last bit of strength, Temari ordered the team to collect Kori and Mitsuie, and then wait for her at their first rendezvous point (which happened to be the Tide Village). Knowing better than to protest, the Sand shinobi did as instructed and then withdrew.

"Well then," Zabuza sounded pleased, "You work for me until I say otherwise."

"Fucking kill him." Temari hissed, "He's a lowlife, Haku. Don't believe anything he says."

"You're not just going to help me overthrow Hidden Mist, Haku," The swordsman informed him, "You're going to deal the final blow to the Mizukage. When there's discontent and questions, you are the fall guy for that. Understood? Akatsuki or no, that honor's yours. I've got an image to maintain, you said."

Temari could feel harsh breathing as Haku considered what was said. She felt his lips pressed to the top of her head, and felt his helplessness and resolve clash.

"I'll do it." Haku conceded, "Leave all of them alone, unharmed."

"I have your word." Zabuza pulled his sword out of the damp earth and then stalked off, staying somewhere out of sight where he would watch them to make sure they were not going to call for help or initiate a double-cross.

Temari only had the strength to mutter about what an unbelievable fool he was, unable to stand and curling into herself. Her eyes had shut and her fan slipped from her hand. Haku was not certain how Zabuza had gotten her to bleed without touching her, and neither was he certain of how to stop it. He only had the energy for one more Shadow Clone, which he sent (with Temari's fan in hand) ahead to warn Migawari of a critical patient coming in. Shaking, Haku lifted Temari up and crossed the deserted, damaged road back to the health clinic.

Migawari had risen from a nap, fighting off grogginess once he had received the bunshin's message. He met Haku near the entrance and sucked wind in shock, "What the hell happened?"

"Zabuza tried to kill her and her team." Haku amended as they moved, "I think he is killing her still."

"All this blood? Where are her wounds?" Migawari pushed open a treatment room door and snapped a light on.

"He didn't touch her. Could he have used a jutsu through the Seversword?" Haku was trying to make heads or tails of it as he laid Temari down on a table, her head lolling as she was fully unconscious.

"If he did…” Migawari pulled the woman's headband off and pressed a skilled palm to her head, getting a read on what type of injury she'd sustained, "We may be out of luck, Haku. Those weapons aren't natural and do terrible things to people."
Haku stripped Temari's bloodied jacket off and also felt around with his eyes shut, trying to dive in with a System Survey jutsu to find a cause of trauma.

"This is recurring on the inside. Feel that?" The old medic grunted, "If she had any wounds, she'd be dead by now. Organs are intact...no internal breaks or injuries...but there's something in there. A chakra."

"Tell me what to do." Haku insisted.

"We keep up with it." Migawari pressed several wads of gauze to the woman's face and other sites of bleeding, "Got that Yin Seal on your head yet, kid?"

"I do, but I have barely any chakra stored in it." Haku lamented, "I can't use it."

"You've got a world-class case of bad timing. Who is this Sand ninja, if you don't mind my asking?" Migawari was curious, "You're so worried I thought you just about wet yourself."

"She's...she was..." He lowered his head in shame, sliding his hands along Temari's skin where he felt a roiling, injurious presence wherever he tried to heal, "She's the Kazekage's sister."

"Oof. We might be in trouble here. You are a friend of the Kazekage, isn't that right?"

"Best friends."

"Well maybe not anymore, if we can't get her to thicken up and respond. I'm gonna try to find some coagulants and another agent I've used with some success." Migawari directed him, "Watch that bleeding and follow that ripping chakra in there. Suppress it. I don't know how long it'll linger."

He hurried out and Haku stood over Temari, his breathing ragged, still shaking from head to foot. It was somewhat reassuring when his Shadow Clone stepped in and made an attempt to suppress the drain with its own healing jutsu. It frowned while it concentrated.

To some extent, Haku realized, the Sand team had been poorly prepared. Either they had underestimated how Zabuza would react to their presence, or the ninja comprising the team had less experience than what was necessary. How could Gaara have allowed such a thing? Haku shook his head. No, how dare he judge them. They had probably located him recently and wanted to act quickly. Teams were not easily arranged on short notice. He couldn't criticize the squad trying to recover him since two men had lost their lives, and the remainder of the team nearly had. All because he was wasting time on a selfish, abhorrent nukenin who, it seemed to Haku now more than ever, would never be socially rehabilitated. He was a killer. He had not helped Haku in his search. He only took.

It was his fault. That was a plain fact. Of course Gaara had not accepted Haku's answer— that he would not be attending the Exam in Hidden Sand. Naturally, Gaara would want to retrieve Haku and tie up other inconsistencies, and probably still help him search for the Yuki clan. Haku had been content to stay with the friends he'd made in Nanakusa, but it came at the expense of those who were waiting for him at home.

Pua brushed against his leg and snapped him out of his thoughts. His throat was tight, "Oh...girl, I need you to deliver a message to a Sand team heading west." The rabbit sat up on her hind legs and sniffed at him in the affirmative. Haku's Shadow Clone stopped its work to write out an update for the Sand team that was in retreat. He included an apology, that he was doing his best to heal Temari, and when she was well enough he would send her to the Tide Village to be retrieved. Adding for them to wait and please not do anything reckless, as his armistice with Zabuza was fragile at best. He would jeopardize everything if he tried to escape to Suna now. The clone slipped that parchment into the rabbit's harness and then she raced off.

When Haku resumed work, Migawari returned and administered a small dose of an antifibrinolytic to Temari. He peeled back the soaked gauze and pressed fresh cotton against affected orifices. "Keep at it, Haku. Let's see if this helps." The old man flattened a sealing tag to Temari's sternum and held a hand seal, "We want what's inside her to forget what its job is...sometimes certain jutsu or weapons continue acting without direction from the user of the technique. There are ways to dull it, so to speak."

The Shadow Clone eventually dissolved, and Haku took a rest after a while as Migawari's intervention appeared to be working. Both he and Haku were smeared with blood.

"Heck." Migawari dropped onto a stool, exhausted, "I don't know if this is over with. Her vitals look okay."

"Thank you." Haku said softly.

"Oh you'll thank me alright. You'll be cooking me dinner for a week." He insisted, "Not to mention the fact that all Zabuza has to do is waltz in here while we are plumb out of strength...and finish the job."

"Don't say that." Haku pushed off of the wall to stand upright again, "I made a deal with him. He won't go back on it."

"How can you be so sure? I looked out the window and it's a bloody disaster outside." Migawari griped, "Damn lunatic, that one. Sure, Hidden Mist has issues and can use a proper coup...but I'm thinking he's not the one we want doing it."

Haku began scrubbing his hands and arms at the sink, and Migawari tiredly elected to do the same.

"I don't think so." His shoulders were slumped, "I may never be."

"Hang in there. I'll see if I can find Ranmaru and his stooge. I ought to help reorder things outside and coax frightened townsfolk back out into the open. Should talk to Hiroshi too..." Migawari patted his back, "Stay here and make this lady comfortable. Clean her up on the second floor, where I have those spare rooms. Just be careful with her and line the bed up there in case she bleeds a bit more."

"I will." Haku nodded and watched him go before slipping Temari into his arms, carrying her through the silent corridor and up the stairs. She was feather-light and pale. Blonde hair was matted to the sides of her face, stuck to tear-stains of blood. Her breathing was slow.

Cobwebs were disturbed by the footfalls and motion of an occupant, on the level of Migawari's home that had not had renters in a long while. Haku entered the washroom and managed to keep Temari tucked in one arm while running hot water at the tub.

He whispered soft assurances while undoing her red sash and unclasping her top, "I'm sorry for everything. I'll do anything for you. Keep breathing. I can get you away from here." He tested water temperature with one hand and then resumed stripping her bloodied clothing off, spying blood trails along her chest, down her navel, and between her legs. Haku shut his eyes for a moment, accepting the nature of what had happened to her and what he needed to do to help her. He twisted the tap off when the tub filled, then pulled off her underclothes and settled her in the water.

Typically, it was frowned upon to put anything dirty or unrinsed in a tub this side of the world. Haku would bleach the bathroom if he had to, some other time. He needed a place to keep Temari still while he ran a cloth over the red trails marring her skin. He cautiously sprayed down her hair while holding her upright, snatching product bottles from a tile ledge to use for a lather. It took quite a time to get Temari back to some semblance of health. Haku painstakingly wiped off each of her fingers and the rounds of her ears, folding her over to reach her back, down her legs, and every bit of skin that had suffered. Once she was clean, he wrapped her in as many towels that were within reach. Then he did as Migawari said and rummaged through a linen closet, finding medicalliners and sheets, dusting off a bed to prepare it.

It also occurred to him that the only available clothing around were the simple, masculine garments in the closet and room's drawer. The top and bottom he picked looked huge on Temari's frame, but once dressed she would keep warm and Haku tuckeda blanket around her once she was settled down on a mattress. He took a deep breath and composed himself. She would be alright for now. He on the other hand was still a mess, so he kept the washroom's door open to watch the room vigilantly while he stripped, unclipped weapon holsters, and washed off. Haku was not truly confident that Zabuza would not reappear to end things.

He sat on a bathing stool and stared, tense, frightened, cleaning himself automatically. Afterward Haku tied his damp hair back and dressed in what he could find in the drawer. Maybe he ought to concern himself with what was going on outside, and how best to help the people who had fled the madness, 'I can't. I need to stay with her.' In the noiseless attic apartment, Haku kept the lights off and sat beside Temari where she lay. She was still, her hair fanned out over a pillow, and Haku balanced her hand in his palm and occasionally pressed her wrist with his finger to check for a pulse. It was there each time. As the day dragged on and the light outside faded beyond the window, he dabbed at Temari's small nosebleed with a cloth and pressed a healing hand to her head again. Whatever technique had been at work on her was still trying to function, in spite of healing and suppression.

Her eyes fluttered but did not open, and he held his breath.

"Temari," Haku leaned down as he spoke, "Please say something if you can hear me."

"Nnnmm." Her eyelids squeezed together and her voice was pained, "Don't let him."

"Zabuza is gone. For the time being." He assured her.

"He'll use you." She repeated weakly, "We both need to get out of here."

"We wouldn't survive if we tried." Haku supposed, "And I don't know what he would do to the people of this town if he believed it could get my attention or dissuade me."

Temari croaked, "You need to make better friends."

"I have great friends. I just don't think he's one of them." He admitted.

She peered up at him, shifting slightly under the blanket, "Where are we?"

"Migawari's house. He's a medic-nin tutor I've studied under, and he helped me stabilize you." Haku explained, "Zabuza used a jutsu that I have never seen before. I can only describe it as...a freakish, persistent technique designed to expire the one it affects from blood loss."

"So that's why everything smells like iron." She battered her lips, "Get me some water?"

Haku rose to fill a glass carafe on the bureau with water, the returned to help her sip it. As he helped her sit up, he told Temari, "I will never forgive him for this. He'll pay."
Temari paused in her parched gulping to say, "Try not to plot while we're still at a huge disadvantage, alright?" She took another sip and asked, "Where is my team?"

"They went ahead to the rendezvous point you established, and I believe they took your teammates' bodies with them." Haku recalled, "I am so sorry. They didn't have to die."

"No, they didn't." She handed back the glass, "I should have waited like Gaara said. They weren't ready to deal with a Swordsman."

Temari settled back down and Haku traced a healing light over her face, neck and chest. When he asked, she confirmed that something still hurt all over. The suppression tag that Migawari had stuck to her had since been removed after becoming inert, and Haku could see it had not completely tamped out the Drain. She stared up at the ceiling for a while, her eyes vibrating with thoughts about her squad, the failure of the mission, what her brothers would think, what would happen to Haku…

She shut her eyes and sighed at his touches, "That feels nice."

"I should hope so. It's all I can do to hold back pain or bleeding, for now."

"Well, thanks for fixing me and…I'm sorry that I made things worse."

"Zabuza made things worse. I appreciate that you came to find me." He corrected her.

"I thought I didn't want to, for so long…" She said fuzzily, "But I did and that's why it was scary." She added, "I'm dizzy."

"You lost blood. I should set up a transfusion." Haku ceased his healing work and rubbed his thumbs over her arms, "Get some rest for now."

Temari grunted compliantly and drifted off when he set out to find a hook-up and type-O blood downstairs in the office to transfuse. He came back and was apprehensive about breaking her skin with a needle, but it posed no issue when he did so. Not long after that, Hiroshi and Migawari appeared at the doorway of the bedroom.

Hiroshi whispered in concern, "Is she alright? Are you alright, Haku?"

"We'll be fine." He turned to his friends with a sigh, "I hate to put you through this."

"Nonsense. It was very clear who decided to raise hell today." Migawari dismissed the apology, "I had a witness from a fruit stand say you were going quietly when you were arrested. Kudos."

"I would have had no idea where you'd gone, though it would've been a more peaceful departure," Hiroshi supposed as he approached the bed, "Migawari-san told me this is Gaara-kun's sister."

"Yes, she is. I'm going to protect her until she is well enough to get away and reunite with her team." Haku further advised, "And I want you to stay near Ranmaru. He's the only person here besides Migawari-san that we can trust."

Migawari was examining Temari and checking the transfusion setup while Hiroshi confessed, "I'll try to convince Ranmaru to stay when he gets back later. Zabuza is already haunting my shop."

"Already?" Haku growled under his breath.

"He is. I suppose he wants to keep you in check, somehow. It'd only be the second time this month my life has been threatened." Hiroshi shrugged, "But I can keep him docile with liquor. Maybe some aromatherapy…"
Haku perked up at the suggestion, "You could. Is he eating everything we've stocked?"
"Just about. He must be troubled by this whole debacle."
"And you have a top shelf of whisky and sake?" Haku confirmed.
"Still do."
"Give all of it to him." Haku demanded, "I'll pay you back for it."
Migawari looked over his shoulder, "You want that demon drunk?"
"Only when Ranmaru is around to keep you safe, Hiroshi-san." Haku explained, "I don't think Zabuza would lash out if he starts drinking. He hasn't done so in the past. I just need him preoccupied."
"I'm willing to do that." Hiroshi was sheepish, "And I'll send you the tab later."
"Thank you."
"So, what's her name?" Hiroshi was interested in the snoozing woman, "She's lovely."
"Temari of the Sand."
Migawari made a scoffing sound when Haku said it.
Haku sniffed, "What?"
"You speak her name as if you're in love with her." The old medic had noticed, "This scenario is pretty obvious to me; why she showed up in the first place, why you're trying to keep her safe…"
"We aren't like that anymore." Haku defended, "I hope she's moved on to saner, more dependable companions."
Hiroshi only smiled to himself and chuckled, "Do ask her and find that out. I'm surprised she had the guts to come here knowing the Demon of the Hidden Mist was lingering." He gave them a wave before exiting and descending the stairs.
"Young people." Migawari muttered as he hobbled around the room dusting with a fiber duster, trapping cobwebs, "Love, pff." He turned around and pointed the duster at Haku on the foot of the bed, "Don't lie."
"What are you talking about?" Haku raised his eyebrows.
"You looked possessed when you came into my office with her. Like the world would end if she kicked it." Migawari notified him, "Maybe it would if the Kazekage could get his hands on you, but in the emotional sense, I can see you are not over this woman." He cracked the bedroom window to shake out the cleaning tool and added, "I would know. My daughter played a game like this—unwilling to fess up to the fact that she was still enamored of the man she tried to move on from. I could see it plain as day. Even when she argued with me and denied it, she drove herself crazy while pretending and hiding."
Haku watched his tutor with a weakened, honest expression.
"So I said: Sarincha, put your money where your mouth is. Take a new job in Kaido, far away from Hidden Grass, and I promise you that if you're really done with that shithead then you'll take to it like a duck to water." Migawari threw his hands up over his head, "Then he proposed to her. Well fuck, I said. They got married and she took the job, and now I've got a son-in-law. Anyo writes to me pretty often, which makes it hard to dislike him."

While Migawari grumbled and stomped around, reminiscing, Haku pressed his mouth in a line and tried not to laugh. He got the gist of what his friend was trying to articulate.

"I'll bring some food up. Stay here with her." Migawari offered. Haku thanked him before he left. Worn out, he curled up on his side and dozed for who knew how long, until the smell of a tray of food on the bureau woke him. Haku sat up and regarded Temari who was still and asleep, seeing that color had returned to her skin. In another hour he would take her off the transfusion.

He took the tray and sidled over to her, feeling that it was a crime to wake her. Haku gave her a light shake and asked if she wanted to eat.

"Buh." Temari's hand flopped tiredly against his knee while he leaned over her.

Haku suggested, "Maybe later?"

"I smell chestnuts." Her voice was hoarse.

"Can you sit up?"

She struggled for a moment before wriggling up and sagging against the headboard. Her eyes scanned the tray, "Soup?"

"Mushroom soup."

"I like vegetable better." She was too weak to lift a spoon so she let him feed her. In-between spoonfuls Haku helped himself to a chestnut or two, which ticked Temari off, "Don't eat 'em all. Those are my favorite."

"I'm sorry, here." He held one out for her to bite, "Can't you get these at home?"

"We hardly ever find sweet things in Suna. I guess these must grow on this island." Temari crunched on the treat. Haku raised a cloth again to dab at a spot of blood rolling down her ear.

"I don't suppose it would be appropriate for me to ask how everyone is doing?" Haku ventured, "I would like to find that out for myself, but I have no idea what happens after this."

"You can ask." She opened her mouth for more soup, then went on, "You're a prisoner now, so you either die, or he dies, and then you can come to the mainland to be with civilized people."

"There are some good people here." Haku defended.

"Then they'd want what's best for you."

"I guess they would."

"Why are you even staying here? He may have taught you jutsu or helped you in your search, but Zabuza seems like the type of person you can't stand." Temari was perceptive.

Haku verified her suspicion, "You're right. I can't stand him. He's tormented me and many others. I've learned a lot from Zabuza, but I don't really believe he's capable of change. And he hasn't helped me at all with looking for the Yuki clan. That's what we agreed to in the first place."

"Sounds like he makes up the rules as he goes." Temari opened her mouth again like a baby bird.

"He has." Haku continued to spoon up the soup, "I kept hoping that...he has a chance at making things better in Hidden Mist. At helping all of the people here. But I think I wanted to stay...because I started believing I could do it better."

"Maybe." She shrugged with her face, "You are far more likable."

"It's stupid. I hardly know anything about the ninja or abilities of these lands, the history and strife..." He sighed and provided her with another chestnut, "What could I do that he couldn't?"

"Care." Temari said flatly.

"That won't be enough to save people."

"No, it won't. You'll need help, and probably not his help. Gaara's, Naruto's, Sand and Leaf, and even the Tide Village would consider—"

"It seems unlikely to me that stable, established villages would dive into potential feuds or war to reclaim Hidden Mist just because I asked them politely." Haku handed her the counterpoint, "The only benefit is that they may be able to install a leader who is favorable to them, or who would entertain the idea of an alliance. It's probable that even that wouldn't work."

"You've got to be more optimistic than that." Temari accepted one last bite of soup.

"I think I'm forgetting how."

"If the Akatsuki is there, running things in secret," Temari imagined, "We both know that isn't something you want to deal with on your own. So if you don't trust that Zabuza can actually do something about it, or if Sand and Leaf might hesitate to step in when you need them— convince the friends you've made here to act." She added, "Then come home."

"It might be easier to just give up and go home."

"Zabuza will make that difficult."

"I'll find a way to deal with him." Haku exhaled harshly, letting Temari have one last chestnut.

"You had better. He thinks he owns you. Like you're a piece of property, or a swordsman like him, or whatever psycho things he's got in his head." Temari observed, "If you go on like this, it seems that he wants to use you up—and he will. Let you take the blame or take on risk he might've been saddled with. You're just the means to his end."

"I know that." He gathered items back onto the tray and walked over to the bureau to set it down, "I really am sorry about all of this, Temari. I wish it were easier to figure out. I don't know if I should run away and not act on evidence of the Akatsuki being in Mist, or if I should try to impede them and help people while I'm here. What's going to help the most people?"

"You keep asking that..." She shut her eyes and let her head loll, "When was the last time you thought about yourself? Not just your clan...or your friends...you."

Haku smiled wearily, "I don't." He looked in the mirror on the wall to spot her and asked, "Should I try that—?" Haku blanched as he watched blood run freshly down Temari's face. He spun around and closed the gap as she keened over in pain, "Temari-!"

She had gritted her teeth, restraining a screech. She held out her arm to reveal her injection site was discolored and swelling, and in all of a moment Haku had switched off the device, removed the line, and pressed a healing hand to her arm. Temari tried not to thrash or scream as red tears rolled down her cheeks. "I'm sorry——" He said as he pressed his free hand to her chest, feeling around for the drain or what remained of it, "I'm sorry!" Haku straddled her legs and gave it his best effort, healing and suppressing what he could. He was still winded from fighting and helping her earlier.

After a while she grew calmer, but she did not have the willpower to resist sinking into a pillow and bloodying it. Haku had gotten the ravaging chakra inside of her under control again, but it left him raw and enraged. He said nothing as he patted blood from Temari's face and ears with a rag, hushing her apologies about making a mess. He fetched a damp cloth to clean her up so she could be comfortable.

"How do you feel?" He asked.

"No pain right now. I just want to sleep." She told him.

"I'm going to send Migawari to check you." He settled her down again, "Rest."

Then he stopped at a chest of drawers before leaving the room and picked up the holsters of weapons he had removed. He would need them. Haku moved down the stairs while fastening belts and clips, and then met Migawari near the front of the office. The man instantly noticed new blood stains on Haku's borrowed clothing. "She alright?" The medic asked.

"The technique is fading, but even in bursts it does damage. Will you please look after Temari for a while?" Haku requested with a steely glint in his eyes.

"Sure."

"Thank you, Migawari-san."

"It's getting late...don't do anything I wouldn't." Migawari tried to impart some rationality, as he sensed that Haku had been nudged past the brink.

"I promise I'll be back soon." With that, he was out the door and in the dark of night.

The cool air gave no relief to the boiling in his veins. Damn patience, optimism, forgiveness and tolerance. Zabuza had never been worth those things. He'd never been worth the air Haku expended in conversations trying to get through to the brute. He crossed the street and kept to a single concrete walkway, entering silently through a back entrance of Hiroshi's tea shop. Haku was meticulous about keeping his presence concealed, and stole a glimpse round the doorway of the kitchen to spot Zabuza predictably indulging at a table littered with bottles. Hiroshi had done as he asked. The dining room even had a sour smell to it, some mix of sweat and booze. Hiroshi and Ranmaru ignored the beast drinking in the corner as they cleaned up.

Haku retreated without a sound and exited, scaling a rain spout of the building up to the roof. The main street at the front of the shop had a single lamppost. At the back, only shadows stretched over stone and shingles. Haku crouched there and waited. Time trickled by and his rage did not wane. He waited until Ranmaru left the shop to return to the small space he and Raiga occupied at the far end of Nanakusa. Until the front door was locked, irrespective of Zabuza lounging about, and Hiroshi shut off the lights and retired to his home upstairs for the night. The back door was unlocked, and before midnight, inevitably, Zabuza stumbled out of that exit. Unarmed.
It took every ounce of concentration Haku had not to give away his position, or flare noticeably with chakra or killing intent. He crept along the stone masonry of the roof, eyes sharp, and at the edge waited for Zabuza to pass beneath him on an isolated passageway. He would not use senbon because he wanted to feel the life leave the man he jumped down on, slamming down onto Zabuza's back as he dropped. Haku spun a curved knife in his palm and jabbed with precision, snarling when Zabuza caught his wrist while sputtering in shock. They grappled and rolled across pavers, and Haku used an array of tricks that might slow a drunken but thoughtful assassin.

He kneed the man in the groin, twisted Zabuza's hand back, and nearly had a clean stab to the ribs before the swordsman somersaulted backwards. Haku fell off of him and slashed again, cutting a line across Zabuza's chin while he tried to rise and flee. Zabuza fell flat onto his back but kicked Haku down before he could leap again. Within arm's reach, Haku batted over a plastic spackling drum that had collected rainwater, and spilled its contents onto the walkway. With a thought and a twinge of chakra, Haku froze the pavement under Zabuza's feet. No force was necessary since the man's sense of balance was about nonexistent. He slipped sideways and struck the alley's wall, took a knife to the stomach and a fist to the jaw. Zabuza went down again.

Then Haku was on top of him, battering Zabuza's face with such ferocity that the skin of his knuckles shredded off. Zabuza had some cleverness left in those desperate moments, snatching another knife from the holster at Haku's back and intending to defend himself with it. Haku was faster, and he sprang over the swordsman like a stoat and bent his arm back until there was a snap, and the weapon dropped from Zabuza's hand. Haku picked it up and rammed it with great satisfaction into the space between ribs at his back. He kicked Zabuza's knees and watched him fall forward, trying to brace himself with a working arm. Haku stomped on his functioning hand to pin it, seized the back of Zabuza's head without a word, and began smashing it repeatedly into the stones of the walkway.

Shortly after that Zabuza stopped moving. Haku dropped him, sucking in deep breaths as he stood back and glared at what was left of the selfish man. His arm was bent at an odd angle, knives stuck in him like pins, and blood ballooned in a puddle around his face on the ground. He would die from his wounds.

'Good.' Haku thought. He dusted himself off and left the scene, headed to the west side of Nanakusa and up into the flat they used for a hideout. He sloughed off blood again in the shower and dressed in his own clothes. After that, Haku returned to Migawari's residence.

All the while, a witness had seen the attack on the man in the alley. A local market worker approached the body timidly. Migawari's snoring was audible from his first-floor bedroom. Haku limply climbed the steps to the next floor and found Temari safely asleep. He moved to take the food tray sitting forgotten on the dresser, and startled at the sight of himself in the wall mirror. His nerves were still lit with a fight or flight response. Just then, he was a stranger to himself. Haku could see in that reflection a person who could kill comfortably and be satisfied. Someone who made foolish decisions that could cost the lives of the people he loved. He had no regrets about what he'd done to Zabuza. Haku could admit he was willing to kill anyone who threatened his precious people. He wasn't as upstart and righteous as he had once been.

He lifted the tray and went downstairs to the kitchen, thinking morbidly of how he'd forgotten to use the Crow Summoning scroll for "mop procedure," as Zabuza had shown him. Yet he didn't care enough to go back and dispose of the corpse.

'Zabuza used me and extracted promises from me— he wanted to rape me as a form of payment. He was a miserable pig.’ Haku reasoned. He had done what he had to.

He rinsed dishes and realized the choice had been final. Now there was one less, well-informed rebel to stand against the group holding Hidden Mist hostage. He did not really know where to go from there, or who to contact to build any momentum against the Akatsuki’s control in the Land of Water. He sighed tiredly, 'Let that be tomorrow’s problem.'

Haku scaled the stairs, drew the curtains of the room, and then stretched out in the free space of the bed. He took a clean pillow for himself and tried to relax. Haku's eyes steadied on Temari before he reached and flattened his hand on her chest, searching for any residual murmurings from the technique that had harmed her. He felt none. He kept his hand there as his eyelids grew heavy.

The next thing he knew it was morning, and a sliver of light crept through the drapes at the window. Haku cracked an eye open and saw that Temari was out of bed, carefully toweling herself dry in the bathroom with the door ajar. Near as soon as he'd seen her naked again, he shut his eyes. He'd seen too much already. He heard her footfalls over the floor, and then her riffling in a bureau drawer as she searched for clean clothes. She sighed and dressed, then returned to the bed.

With his eyes closed Haku asked, "Are you feeling alright?"

"I'm better than I was." Temari assessed.

He looked at her and felt his heart constrict. She appeared defeated as she sat cross-legged on a blanket. She asked, "Will he be back?"

"I don't know. I think I killed him." Haku told her.

Her brows shot up, "You think you did?"

"I didn't stay to see his last breath."

"Yeesh. If you killed Momochi Zabuza you should've collected his head to turn it in for the reward." Temari considered it a rookie mistake, "But I guess you should find out before I try to go anywhere."

"I want to go with you." Haku said, "I'm prepared to apologize—to confront any humiliation or punishment that I deserve. I never should have done any of this. I never get any closer to what I've set out to do."

"Are you sure you didn't?" She wasn't convinced.

"Based on the few things I've learned, the Yuki clan sounds like a headache I may not want. It has produced a dangerous nukenin who killed the clan's leader, and now they cower from the world and live secretively. Even if I knew more about them, would my opinion honestly change?" Haku hardly saw the point of it.

"You can still love and appreciate people who have flaws."

"They won't have any idea who I am."

"But those who get to know you are usually glad they did." Temari reminded him, "You think my family was without its blemishes? I know it's weird, but I was able to love and hate my father at the same time. He treated me well while he treated others like vermin. It's not a perfect comparison, but who is to say you wouldn't be cherished by these flawed people who share your blood? There's only way to know for sure."
Haku rolled onto his back and considered it.

"I'm tired." Temari eased herself down again, "Will my team be able to meet me in Tide, if I make a run for it?"

"They will, and I hope they passed a message along to Gaara. Although I have no idea what he'll do in this situation."

From the doorway of the room Migawari cleared his throat, and Haku sat up to see the man beckoning him over. He left the bed and joined the medic-nin in the hall, listening as the old man asked in a low voice, "By any chance did you try to kill Zabuza last night?"

"I did." Haku confessed.

"Well he's in my front office and he's not dead." Migawari clarified for him, "He doesn't seem happy either. I asked him: What's eating you? And he said he'd kill me if I didn't fix his arm and some puncture wounds...so I did, then he told me to tell you that he doesn't suffer traitors."

"Oh." Haku was dismayed to hear it.

"I'd say you do a hell of a job improving our safety, young man." Migawari employed some sarcasm while clapping his shoulder.

"Can he move? Do you think he—?"

"I don't think he's going to murder everyone here, but he looks put out." Migawari motioned for Haku to deposit some blood-soiled sheets and clothes in a hamper, "A Sikh neighbor of mine took pity on him last night and brought him to me. Great man, really, and I don't know if he knew who Zabuza was, but I just thought I'd let you know that I'm gonna try to appease him with breakfast. We'll see how he feels after that."

"Alright. I'm sorry about this, Migawari-san."

"Me too. Enjoy your time up here because it may be the last hour you spend breathing." He departed with the hamper in hand and went downstairs.

Haku shut the door behind him, feeling a swirl of fear and self-loathing ransack his insides. He had made things worse. He'd gone back on an agreement and tried to kill Zabuza, and was now faced with Zabuza alive and unwell and understandably displeased. He crossed the room to the bed and sat down beside it on the floor, devastated. Temari rolled over and frowned at him, "What?"

"I hate myself." Haku reported in truth, "I'm useless. Impulsive. I make things worse."

"Hmm." She blinked at him as she curled up at the mattress' edge and observed his emotions.

He took a moment to swallow and fight the moisture in his eyes. Haku reached up and gently stroked her hairline while telling her, "There are mornings when I watch the sun rise over the ocean, and I like to tell myself that you're seeing it too on the horizon in the desert."

Temari conceded, "I do see it, sometimes."

"I want to make sure that you get home safely. Zabuza is here and I don't think he'll let me do anything without a fight." He illuminated their circumstances, "Don't waste any more of your time on the likes of me. You have a family and a legacy to carry on. I can only ruin everything."
"Don't tell me what to do." She quipped.

"Did I ever tell you that I was born on a farm in the Land of Water? I watched my mother die before I killed my father in self-defense. I think now I understand…all this time, I've been delaying the inevitable since that day." Haku shared his realization out loud, "I always cling to others. Try to further their causes and success, because I can't advocate for myself. Most of my life I tried to hide the fact that I am worthless murderer…so how could I ever have thought myself superior to Zabuza, who had much of the same experience I did?"

He added wistfully, "I want things of my own: a place to live, friends, and a family." His hand tightened into a fist against the bed, "But I should expect to destroy those things with my carelessness —"

Temari patted her finger to his lips, "Shut the fuck up."

Haku stared at her.

She went on, "Phew, you're exhausting. Like a carousel of self-flagellation."

The description startled him enough to make him laugh.

"It's time to get over the fact that you're not perfect or pure— that you had a shitty start and that you still screw things up." Temari advised him, "Many people can say the same and claim to be happy."

Her fingertips migrated along the side of his face, across his forehead, sliding along his eyebrows and back down again.

"Come on, even from my short encounter with him, I could tell with certainty that you're unlike Zabuza." She soothed him, "Your similarities aren't proof of identical guilt, or whatever. I don't think he has a capacity for compassion the way you do. Has he ever gone out of his way for others?"

"I don't think so." Haku yielded.

"There you go." Temari yawned.

It felt good to sit there and say nothing, counting how many times she blinked her teal eyes.

"I think…even if you hate yourself…" Temari postulated, "Selflessness and compassion for others will take you far enough to make the choice."

"Choice?" He rested his chin on the edge of the bed while he listened.

She elaborated, "The choice to forgive yourself. In my case, I feared and ostracized Gaara when we were children— when he needed support the most. I lived with the guilt after my father claimed he was dead…and it didn't feel any better when I found Gaara alive. I was disgusted with how I'd left things. Of what I didn't do for him." Temari poked the bouncy, healthy skin of Haku's cheek and said, "Had I not gotten over and accepted the mistreatment of my brother, we never would have moved on."

Haku had shut his eyes to focus on her voice. He sighed and relished her hand carding through his hair, lightly coursing over his scalp. Thinking about how Zabuza would likely make an authentic attempt to flay him downstairs was far from his mind.

"So, to describe how things are going in Suna…since you asked…" She decided to recap, "Things at home are amazing. The village is prospering, Gaara knows what he's doing, Kankuro keeps us sane, Matsuri is growing up fast...everything is great because everyone is actually putting sweat equity into progress. Unlike my father's regime, where everything was a shortcut or a desperate move... It's kind of a charmed life, nowadays."

"Hmmm." Haku smiled with his eyes shut.

"Though it's not without its ups and downs," Temari traced a fingernail down from his widow's peak and along the bridge of his nose, "I've dated a few men in Hidden Sand. The results were mixed. One strong contender had an extra tooth that— how do I say this? Jutted out crooked from his gums...and eventually I couldn't stand the sight of him even though he had a great sense of humor."

Haku opened his eyes and teased her, "Your loss. He'll find someone less superficial."

"Pfft." Her touches roamed down Haku's neck and shoulder, as far as his shirt collar allowed, "Then there was this handsome guy who pretended for two whole weeks that he was respectful and smart...and then I discovered him outside of a shopping center giving a public rant about women and minorities ruining everything in Sand." Haku seemed to not be entertained by the recollection, but she continued, "Maybe he was embarrassed? He was very sensitive about me outranking him as a shinobi...so I think that inspired his insecure breakdown."

"Unfortunate." Haku supplied a word.

"I kicked him off of the storage container he was pontificating on." She sucked in a delighted breath as if she was reliving the moment, "That felt great. Felt even better when he got lost, that fucking tool."

"I might've said the same thing." He said with a slight, competitive edge to his voice.

She summed up, "Everyone who was interested in me has been a jerk."

"That string of bad luck can't last." Haku forecasted.

"All of them made you look better."

"I'm flattered." He really was.

"So how has your luck been dating-wise?" Temari asked.

"Well," Haku took a moment to compose his answer, "About the same, which is to say, no one came along. Most of my time is occupied by children or the elderly. Zabuza once tricked me into visiting a whore house, which was shocking and repugnant and I bought nothing there." He added candidly, "Most kunoichi I've encountered have tried to kill me, and in terms of excitement, the most exciting thing had to be when I nearly died behind a dumpster across the street. You see, romance just hasn't been in the cards."

"Damn." She said.

"I wasn't really looking, to tell the truth."

"Then...what do you think of a sometimes superficial, formerly promiscuous, Jounin-level kunoichi who really just wants a guy who would fight to the death to protect her brother, put others before himself, and love her even when she's difficult?" Temari inquired.

After a slow blink Haku confessed, "That's my ideal."
She didn't say anything coy or witty—Temari leaned forward just as he did to savor the warmth of his mouth, and it was a kiss that made her want to whine and rub her legs together. How long had she waited for that? It was more arousing than it should have been. She turned her face away from him and listened to his rough breaths, feeling an insane urge to cackle like a madwoman. Haku kissed her again when she turned back to him. Oh, she thought, this was better than the last time.

He held her face and announced, "You need to get out of here."

"You have a botched assassination victim downstairs who's unhappy he's been double-crossed. And I don't think I can move much…maybe I can fly at my slowest speed." Temari guesstimated, "Any suggestions?"

"I distract him."

"Uh huh. Where's the part where you suggest something?" She pressed.

"I did. Leave through this bedroom window, and five rooftops down is the flat Zabuza and I stay in. Go there and take my clothes." Haku told her, "They'll be more reasonable for travel. Ah. And take his weapons, as many as you can. Top shelf beside the sofa."

She kissed him again in thanks.

"Take anything else you need, then go." He rested his forehead against her hand, "I'm sorry about what happened. I want to join you."

"For now that isn't going to work." Temari rationalized, "Besides, I see the sense in you helping out down here and looking for your clan. I bet you're closer than you think. It'd be stupid to throw the towel in before you get a definite answer."

"Not completely stupid…"

"Try it. And feed correspondence back to Sand so we can have eyes and ears out here. Now that we know where to find you, we can send you backup whenever you request it." She pushed herself up with a stiff, traumatized body, "Ugh…I don't know how I'm going to pull this off."

Haku wondered, "Do you think you might bleed again?"

"No, the feeling's gone. I felt something inside ripping me for a while, but it stopped." She rose gracelessly to her feet, "Thanks again for saving my life."

He stood as well, "Not at all. Please sugarcoat this report when you get home."

"Heaps of sugar." She lifted her fan from where it was leaned on the bedside table, "I lost two men on this mission…and Gaara isn't going to be thrilled that my intervention just indentured you to a complete piece of shit. If he had more time on his hands, Gaara would probably wage war for you."

"I don't recommend it." Haku said as he unlatched the window and swung it open, "Stay safe."

Temari had a content look on her face, as if the parting would only be temporary. She was out a moment later. Haku promptly crossed the room and went downstairs, turning right and entering Migawari's household proper where he and Zabuza were seated at a table and eating. Haku dropped into a seat across from Zabuza. The meal froze and went silent.

"You're making this monumentally awkward." Migawari hissed.
"Am I?" He regarded Zabuza, aware that he had been healed, though his face was still dotted with blue bruises and broken blood vessels beside his eyes.

Zabuza watched him while eating a mouthful of egg and rice.

"I was hoping you wouldn't bother anyone else." Haku sniped boldly.

"Bother, as in, draw breath in their presence?" Zabuza said before taking a gulp of milk, "Fuck you."

Migawari told him to restrain his potty mouth and eat more food. Everyone had had a rough night.

"I'd understand your aggravation more if you hadn't killed two Sand ninja," Haku expressed as he added rolled omelets and vegetables onto a plate, "But you did. That's why I tried to kill you."

"You don't get upset when I go after anyone else."

"I do. Yesterday it was personal. I won't let you get away with hurting my friends and allies."

"Still mad that I bled your girlfriend?" Zabuza launched a jibe back at him.

Haku chewed and fixed an irate stare on the man, thinking he'd try his luck again and see if Zabuza stayed dead.

Migawari interjected, "We were able to suppress the jutsu you used, although I'm not exactly sure what it was."

"Drain can only affect one target at a time, and the last fool I used it on didn't survive," Zabuza acknowledged the veteran medic-nin with a tilt of his soup bowl, "So good for you, you old bale of grass. You did something I didn't think was possible."

"I know my stuff." Migawari pushed his spectacles up his nose again.

"The Kazekage won't tolerate what you did." Haku reminded the swordsman.

"Like I give a shit. I already know he's not coming here to save you or he would've done it already."

He was largely unconcerned, "You're not going anywhere."

"And if I do?" Haku suggested boldly.

"Go," Zabuza leaned forward over the table, "Then I kill this guy here. Then fatass tea-man. The kid and Thunderbrain, and all of the children in this town." Scowling, he finished his milk, "Shortchange me. Do it."

Haku shook his head while he poured tea, "You're despicable."

"You want me to be more like you— to give a damn about these losers or anyone suffering because of Mist? Well that's kind of hard to do when you preach that and then try to kill me." Zabuza bared his teeth, "Who's despicable here?"

"Please don't threaten the man who served you breakfast." Migawari snarked angrily.

"Shove it, Miga."

"I only took your advice." Haku smiled darkly at Zabuza, "To be more like you."

"Didn't think you had the balls to do it. Actually, I just didn't think you had literal balls."
"Should I try again? The next time I won't let anyone come to your rescue."

"Maybe I'll bleed that blonde chick like an animal again." Zabuza suggested.

Haku stood up, unable to contain the bolts of wrath and violence surging up from a secluded corner of his spirit. The feelings crackled off of him. Migawari cleared some place settings and shuffled out of the room.

"Don't talk about her." Haku warned.

Zabuza was indifferent to his display, "Or what? You'll dump that soup on me? Since you've got a button that big that can be pushed, build up a thicker skin."

"You don't get to threaten the people I love no matter how thick my skin is."

"Apparently you don't remember the line of work I'm in." He finished another bite, "If your love were paper currency, I'd blow my nose with it. That's what good it does me. Bellyache and cry all you want. Hope you had your chance to fuck her yesterday, because now you're—" Zabuza honestly didn't expect his hand to be pulled up when he was swiftly tossed over the table in a Judo-like flip. He landed on tatami mats that cracked under the impact, and before he could tell Haku to eat shit, he was hurled through the glass of a closed window with chakra-fueled strength.

In the kitchen, Migawari squawked about the damage being done to his house. "These confounded arguments and swordsmen! The two of you—!" He peered around the corner to see Haku had already dove outside after Zabuza.

The tumbling Taijutsu brawl was inelegant, sprawling over a grassy lawn, scattering a wood pile, circling a storage shed. Zabuza took a knife to the back again, the second time in a span of eight hours, and then realized maybe he needed to learn to censor himself. Haku wasn't taking shit anymore, and he was just a bit too quick to be blocked or evaded. It turned out he had made a monster of his apprentice.

He did manage to entangle Haku in a proper arm-lock, and then smashed his knee into the boy's face. While he reeled, Zabuza landed a ferocious roundhouse kick that sent Haku streaking through a fence like a comet. He pulled the knife from his flank even though it wasn't a great idea, and used the blood to summon from a tool scroll. Zabuza procured the faux needle sword as he rushed at Haku.

Haku pushed himself to his feet, wheezing, and used one last kunai to parry Zabuza's swipes. The needle jabbed him twice in the shoulder, and then Haku dodged when Zabuza pitched it, maneuvering it with the cable attached to its hilt. That was the type of weapon Zabuza had told him that he wanted Haku to inherit— wanted him to use to kill the Mizukage.

The day was dry and Zabuza had forced him away from sources of water. It would take a greater expenditure of energy and concentration to condense water for jutsu, which Haku could not spare as he rolled and flipped away from the rapid-fire thrusts of the needle sword. Then he realized Zabuza was gradually positioning himself closer to their hideout. His attacks were warding Haku off.

"I bet you tried to let her get out of here," Zabuza rightly surmised, "But I don't think she's in decent enough shape to outrun me." When he made a break for their lodging, Haku raced after him with a cry.

Thankfully, Haku discovered as they took the fight indoors again that the apartment was noticeably missing items and Temari was long gone. Zabuza snapped the cable's length around Haku's shoulders and arms in loops, designing to impale or confine him before chasing after the Sand kunoichi. But Haku saw that Temari left the sink's faucet running, whether purposeful or not, and he was able to harness that water to shoot several ice projectiles into Zabuza's front before barreling into him. They put cracks and depressions in the plaster wall with their tousling. Zabuza shimmied to freedom through the open window behind him, and Haku followed as he slipped free of the cable.

They struck the dusty ground beside the main avenue outside, hacking and panting, and Haku sprang up first and was able to kick the hilt of the needle sword from Zabuza's hand. He held fast to a segment of metal cable, but Haku had taken up the blade and pointed it at Zabuza's head.

"Let go," Haku taunted, "I thought you wanted me to have this."

Zabuza raised his free hand towards the flat's window, and Kubikiri Bōchō soared out with a spin and gleamed in the sunlight when he caught it. Then he released the cable and stood up.

"You," Zabuza gestured at him with the Seversword, "Keep that."

Haku was flummoxed.

"You did pretty good. You're not a complete waste."

"Sorry…I'm not sure what you're talking about anymore…" He was trying to catch his breath.

"You're a wretched spoilsport and bleeding heart." Zabuza assessed, "But you have the stuff of a swordsman, I can't deny that."

Haku wound up the cable into the hilt and found that the blade was rather flimsy; the tang of the needle was damaged and the wire's spindle was crooked from overuse. He frowned at Zabuza and tried to comprehend it, "That wasn't…a test, was it?"

"It was an argument that I converted into a test." He acknowledged, putting pressure on his bleeding back.

"So you are willingly arming me?" It was hard for Haku to believe.

"You can keep that with my expectation that you won't attack me, and in exchange for assurance that I won't hunt your girlfriend or kill townspeople." Zabuza lowered the Seversword and began the slow walk back to Migawari's house, "Call it a deal, or we can finish this here."

"I think Nanakusa has seen enough violence." Haku agreed, still mildly suspicious, "I have your word that you won't hurt anyone?"

"I don't know. Is the caliber of my word comparative to yours? Because you made me a promise and then immediately broke it." Zabuza hissed, "I'm not going to cop out even when you're insufferable and pissing me off."

Haku lowered his weapon and also moved in the direction of the health office, "Fine. But I'm still skeptical about most of this."

"Maybe you should be, dumbass." Zabuza gruffed, "I'd ask you to fix my back, but you'll probably just stab it again."

"Trust doesn't come cheap, does it?" Haku's observation was barbed.

Then, Migawari bustled out of his front door, down the steps and marched up to them. "My. House-!" He pushed their swords out of his way and yanked the pair back toward the brick building,
"Worthless, dim-witted bastards. Smashing my floor and window! Clean it up and fix it you idiots," They didn't resist as Migawari dragged them and muttered, "Eating my food, sleeping in my beds, making a—" He stopped when he saw blood soaking Zabuza's shirt and pants.

"You. Get to work." Migawari growled at Haku, chucking him in through the entrance.

"You're not bleeding all over my house, troglodyte." The old medic groused, sealing up the wound with green light, "You're tough, eh? In charge of everyone? If you kill us who the hell will feed you?" He slapped the broad side of the Seversword, "Put this shit away."

Zabuza was not at all in a fighting mood anymore, "Quit yammering at me—"

After healing the brute's injury, Migawari gave the sore spot a good smack and pushed him through the doorway.

Tsunade sat in a nicely upholstered armchair in her home, frowning at a monkey on the windowsill.

"This was supposed to be a relaxing evening for me." The Hokage mused, "Then Netsuke calls for an urgent meeting. If you're here it means that he must be on his way." She gestured with a bottle of sake before setting in on a side table, "Do you speak?"

A silver langur sat on the ledge and blinked its watery eyes at her. Its facial markings looked like glasses, and a blue bandana was tied around its neck.

"I don't suppose you do." Tsunade observed, "Not all of you do." She sat back and took sips from a cup.

After a few minutes the monkey clambered down from the window and across the floor. Tsunade's eye twitched when it hopped up to take a seat on the back of the sofa across from her. Netsuke and Kakima arrived a moment later, appearing in a synchronized flash of the Body Flicker.

"You're in plain clothes today." She motioned for them to sit down.

"Yes, but we still stopped by ANBU headquarters. We have news." Netsuke turned to the langur, "Moritoki, shut the window." The monkey strutted awkwardly on its hind legs and pulled the sash down. Tsunade was unnerved when she watched the monkey lock the window with little gray fingers.

Kakima set down an oak box on a coffee table before the Hokage and slid its lid free, "This box contains the final musings of the Sandaime."

Tsunade's eyes were bright as she gave them her attention.

"I found it in a closet within my home among some clutter we were removing, and I wanted to share it with you, Tsunade-sama." Netsuke informed her, pulling out an old, tattered scroll and a journal. He held up the scroll, "Classified reports to corroborate what you're about to see." He held up the journal, "My father's concerns, many of which are still relevant." Netsuke handed both to Tsunade and then took a seat beside Kakima. They were willing to let the Hokage thumb through it and get her bearings.

Nothing seemed out of the ordinary at first. Much of the report recapped older, more secretive operations that had taken place during the Third Ninja War. Each had been signed off on by an ANBU commander or Hiruzen himself. Tsunade unwound the scroll and set it on her lap, stopping to take some time with the worn out journal instead. It's very first entries only predated Hiruzen's
The turmoil on our councils, or in my village as it rebuilds, cannot compare to what is pillaging my heart. Tsunade read the words with a pang of sympathy, noting the aftermath of the Kyuubi's attack.

Biwako is dead. I could hardly conceive of it as I held her in my arms. She was cold and her loyal student, Taji, was dead beside her. With fewer days ahead of us, I grieve the precious years I've lost with my wife. Years that we won't spend doting on grandchildren together, as I'd hoped. I know that this was a violent death, indicated by her injuries. She and her apprentice were killed as they oversaw Uzumaki Kushina's private childbirth. This sort of interference is what permitted the Nine-Tailed Fox to escape Kushina's seal, and was not due to any shortcoming in Sealing work on Namikaze Minato's part. I believe this was intentional, and they were chosen as targets specifically. My greatest regret is relaxing at home instead of standing by as a guard that night. Biwako, Taji, Minato, and Kushina did not have to die. I could have prevented it, and would have been better prepared to subdue the Kyuubi. I could have advised for more caution. Until our investigations yield fruit on who is truly behind this attack, I will be tormented by their faces in my dreams.

Rattled, Tsunade released a breath she had been holding and then took a swig of sake. She flipped a few pages ahead to see where it would land her.

Konohamaru will be turning four years old this December. He is a feisty scamp who delights in pulling down wall scrolls and picture frames all through the house. I gave one of Biwako's scarves to him because it is much cooler this time of year. That boy may never take it off.

Incidentally, I must admit that I am pleased with Jiraiya's actions today. For the most part. He returned to the village with one escaped Uzumaki Naruto, who I had sent out a search party for. He had wandered off and befriended other waifish children in a nearby trading town, and Jiraiya took it upon himself to deliver them to Hidden Leaf. One child is a refugee of the Water Country, who, according to my student, possesses a rare Kekkei Genkai. He seems very bright for his age, and he will excel in the Academy. Jiraiya also delivered to me the Fourth Kazekage's missing child, the jinchuriki for the One-Tail. He is not in the best of health, therefore I do not feel inclined to return this child to Hidden Sand. For the time being, I will follow patrol reports and make improvements to this boy's seal. I stand convinced that companionship will help these youngsters thrive. With agreement from my advisors, and Jiraiya, I have elected to keep them together as supervised wards of the village.

Netsuke interrupted Tsunade's leisurely reading, "Hokage-sama, please turn to the page I've marked."

She glanced at the man before turning over to a red tab in the journal, more recent than other entries.

I should have foreseen the demise of Team Hikki, for it may have been my doing.

Tsunade looked up again and asked Netsuke, "Team Hikki was an ANBU squad?"

"Yes, my lady."

"Headed by whom?"

"Takaharu was the captain of that team," Netsuke recalled.

Tsunade did not feel at ease with that context, but read on anyway:

Today, Team Ro performed a recovery search after Team Hikki was four days overdue. Every member of Team Hikki was confirmed dead, and it was discovered that Takaharu and Chinatsu, his spouse and teammate, were purposefully divided from their subordinates while traveling north to investigate threats made against the Hōrai Bridge and its surrounding communities.

After being engaged by a rogue group via separate attacks, both halves of Team Hikki were defeated. A cursory investigation strongly suggests they were executed by the nukenin Dintei Bihokokuni and his supporters. I know that this level of coincidence does not exist. With Takaharu's retirement from my ANBU force merely days at hand, and his acceptance of a new position imminent, I expect Bihokokuni received tips from someone within Hidden Leaf to track and kill him.

I do not have comprehensive evidence at this time, but I believe that Shimura Danzo sold Takaharu's anonymity to Bihokokuni as part of an exchange. Two weeks ago, I had asked Takaharu to accept a position as the new director of the Root Foundation, with support from the village council and our advisors. I was heartened by his willingness to succeed Danzo as the Chief of our Root ANBU units, remembering that he was reluctant to accept candidacy for the position of Fourth Hokage.

I had hoped this arrangement would eliminate any corruption or unsanctioned activity occurring in Root Black Ops. Danzo had been very supportive of the change during my discussions with him. Now I am convinced he orchestrated this murder to maintain his position, but for what reason I cannot be sure. Does Danzo resent my defeat of him after all of these years? That I selected younger, more able shinobi to succeed me as Yondaime? Or was it this administrative shift that Takaharu was a part of? I do not know, but I hope I will in the near future.

Tsunade had absorbed Hiruzen's distress as she took in the text. She leaned back in her seat and covered her mouth. Her teacher had never shared a word of this with anyone, had he? Not even Jiraiya?

Netsuke offered more context, "When I read that passage, it was difficult to tell if my father had shared this suspicion with anyone. No members of the council were aware of this investigation or the outlandish circumstances when I broached the subject. I summoned Monkey King Enma in the hope that he might verify any portion of this, and he believed that my father's fears were accurate and well-founded." He concluded, "For years, my father's trust in Danzo eroded until this point. His undermining seems blatant, according to this."

"And though it looks bad, the Sandaime seemed to be closer to the proof he needed, just before the Invasion that disrupted the Chunin Exam a few years ago. The supplementary report in that scroll has record of some of the conversations they had." Kakima added, glancing sidelong to her husband, "But, while we're discussing Danzo's possible support of Dintei Bi...we should tell you about intel that came in through ANBU headquarters forty minutes ago. We just finished that briefing."

"I don't think I'm going to want to hear this either." Tsunade predicted.

"While approaching the northwest border between the Lands of Fire and Stone...our escort guarding Sasagainu Huo on his return to Iwagakure was intercepted." Netsuke announced, "My subordinates confirmed three casualties to our Leaf squadron, and two casualties on the team from Iwa that agreed to meet with us. Oku Sekieima, the Iwa Jounin that was also being extradited, sustained critical injuries but was successfully returned to Hidden Rock. We have two tracking teams cooperating with an Iwa squadron to locate these attackers." He stated finally, "We are reasonably sure that Bi's faction is responsible for this interference."

"Of course it is." She tossed the journal down on the coffee table, fuming, "And how did they know where our meeting point would be? Insider intelligence. That butcher still has links to our village."

Kakima crossed her legs and took Moritoki into her lap, "It could be that Danzo gave that group the head's up. Not that we can prove it...and it is very troubling to see a servant of Bi's return to his side.
with more intimate knowledge of Hidden Leaf."

"He's too dangerous to be walking free…Huo…" Tsunade lifted her sake cup again, "However…I may need you both to look into something for me. I was lulled into a false sense of security before this Exam…because Danzo expressed wariness about Sasagainu Huo. But Sarutobi-sensei's journal suggests to me that concern was merely an act. And…I may have the evidence that the Sandaime didn't." She locked eyes with Netsuke, "One of Bi's servants, Dintei Yasuya, was killed in the Toi Mine by Leaf ninja earlier this year. That mission report confirms a Root agent was in contact with Yasuya, by order of Root's Director."

"Ah, they're all related, aren't they?" Kakima was making sense of the details, "Dintei is the cadet family of the Sasagainu."

Netsuke clarified for her, "They were before they deposed the Main Line, due to Bi's frustrations with being an outsider. He was born into the cadet family, with all of the abilities of the main family."

"He seems very good at getting rid of people." Kakima rubbed Moritoki's cheeks.

"It's been his specialty for decades." Netsuke confirmed.

"And we have one survivor of the Main Line left in our village," Tsunade tacked on, "So please understand why I need you to focus on this group, for the time being. I want eyes on Danzo. I want discretion. I'm tired of my villagers dying because Bi considers it his sport."

"Can you secure testimonies from the participants of the Toi Mine mission?" Netsuke asked, "The council will need to hear those accounts when you decide to bring justice against Danzo."

Tsunade sighed, "I'll need the extradition report from Ibiki as soon as possible, since it would be fitting to cite this incident as well."

"Understood. I will keep tabs on our tracking cells to see if they can recover our escaped prisoner…" Netsuke pushed himself up from the couch, "But I don't think that's likely."

Kakima returned the journal and report scroll to the oak box, "Keep these, Tsunade-sama. We hope you'll find these reflections useful."

"Thank you…" She had her chin rested on her knuckles as she leaned on the arm of her chair, "Netsuke?"

"Yes, my lady?"

"Should I involve any of my Jounin in this investigation?"

"Only those who have A-level clearances or higher." He recommended, "And among them, only those you trust the most. Danzo may be responsible for far more in this village than we yet realize. Any who scrutinize him may imperil themselves."

The couple left with their silver monkey the way they had come. Tsunade finished her last bit of sake before rising sluggishly from her seat, fitting the cover back onto the box. She would be lucky if she got a wink of sleep tonight. The news and possibilities were so unsettling, Tsunade suspected she would think twice before ever shutting her eyes again. Vigilance and initiative would be paramount.

She walked the box over to a writing desk and dropped it brusquely, annoyed when it knocked a Jounin Evaluation schedule off of a corkboard's pin. Tsunade hung up the schedule again tiredly.
Soon, some of her new Chunin were going to try their luck in Jounin trials, since she had accepted their recommendations.

And they too would be subject to this madness.

It was a good place to meet for a change—a courtyard replete with peonies and bushels of white flowers that Obito couldn’t recognize. He seamlessly slipped into his Tobi act, and Obito automatically began to pick blooms to weave into a flower crown. He crouched down in the hedge line like a perfect, bumbling fool, humming to himself as members of the Akatsuki congregated in the abandoned stone ruins of the temple.

From his position in the fronds, Obito regarded one of the first people who had arrived at the designated meeting point. Uchiha Itachi was off to his right, tucked against a lilac tree. His partner Kisame was seated on crumbling steps above them, tapping his fingers along the wrapped scales of his sword.

'He probably likes how that tree smells.' Obito supposed. He had watched Itachi make a bee-line for it when he had entered the yard.

Beyond that, he couldn't claim to know much of anything about Itachi. Obito was aware that he had been a prodigy among the Uchiha clan and the gem of his village. According to Jiraiya, he had also been a fond older brother. With such a bright future ahead of him, why had Itachi defected from Konohagakure to join a criminal organization? 'I just don't understand it...’ He frowned in thought behind his mask, 'Jiraiya was vague when I asked about those two hellions...Itachi and Sasuke. I know there were tensions and competitive spirits in the Uchiha clan, but why leave home for a miserable life out here?'

Obito extended his finger to assist a ladybug clambering up from a leaf, 'I think that...maybe...Jiraiya didn't explain everything.’ It left a pit in his stomach. Another shoe had to drop, and soon. The Akatsuki had become mobile again and were prepared to seal Biju from captured jinchuriki. 'If I am going into this operation blind with no background on Itachi, of all people...I won't last unless I start to figure this out. I'll need to know what his angle is…'

A hooded spy of Sasori's scurried through an archway to anonymously deliver information to the puppet master secluded in a corner, and then the informant quickly departed. After what felt like an age, all of the members of the Akatsuki had assembled.

Deidara was about to suggest making the demolition of the ruined temple more complete, but Sasori spoke over him directly to the group's leader, "The Kazekage is strengthening defenses around Hidden Sand. It is rife with protection for an upcoming Exam."

"He was not our initial target." Pein stood at the center of the garden and confirmed, "But in due time he will lower his defenses again. You and Deidara shall be the ones to take him."

Deidara's annoyance at Sasori subsided with that update.

"There has been a great deal of activity in the south amongst the Lands of Wind, Wave, and Water.” Pein informed the group, "Jinchuriki wish to band together."

"Can't blame them when they know what's coming for them…” Kisame smiled gleefully.

Pein shared a look with Konan beside him, as if both had derived the answer to this possible coalition of jinchuriki. He went on, "I want searches for the Eight and Two Tails conducted, as their age and experience will guide younger sacrifices to organize. The Seven and Nine Tails will be found easily. Konan will assign you your targets."

"Not you?" Deidara was curious.

"I will be dealing with a troublesome target personally. This will be the first extraction of several to come." Pein informed them, "After we adjourn, I am leaving for the Tide Village."

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked that, my dudes, or at least had rampant thought provoked in your brains. Now I am off to drink wine for a while and listen to more twenty one pilots.

Chapter 46- The Wind's Shadow

Bonus Soundtrack: "Fairly Local" by twenty one pilots
When Jiraiya woke him with a sharp shake in the middle of the night, Naruto unclogged his throat with a gurgling sound and sat up drowsily. They had settled down in sleeping bags under an acacia tree—the last tall plant visible against the sparse horizon of desert.

"Here you go…" Jiraiya crammed a biscuit in his student's teeth and patted his cheek, "Open those eyes, young Sage, we have a desert-crossing to start."

Naruto chewed sleepily as he slipped out of the bed roll, folding it up, "Ero-sensei…don't you see there are stars out still?"

"Technically, there are always stars in the sky. Sunlight scatters in the atmosphere during the day and reduces their visibility…eh," He lightly slapped Naruto's cheek again as he nodded off over his travel bag, "What I'm trying to say is, no excuses. Wake up. We want to stay cool while we cross."

"Yeah, yeah." Naruto brushed him off with a yawn and pulled the bag over his shoulder.

"It's gonna be hot as balls." Jiraiya began marching ahead of the youngster, "You'll thank me later, Naruto."

"How are you so awake right now?"

"Determination. And I also took a bite out of a knuckle of ginger, so that zing helped."

Naruto made a face at him.

"Got any more of that?"

"No. Just some biscuits, water, a few boxed meals…" The man began to pick up the pace as Naruto fell in step beside him, "And if you're really starving by tomorrow you can kill a hare for yourself and eat that."

"I'm not gonna kill a bunny-!"

"They're not bunnies, desert hares are jerks. Not cute."

"Oh. But still, I'm not so inclined to kill living things now after, you know, becoming one with Nature." Naruto made a case for it, "I'll fast instead."

Jiraiya laughed in disbelief. They had sped up to a full-fledged run, skimming over bonafide sand flats. "Kid," Jiraiya told him, "I finished that training too, and I still know that a meal is a meal. Respecting nature isn't about denying death. It's about recognizing and asserting yourself in the duality of the universe. Life matters because death accompanies it."

Naruto huffed, "Thanks for the early morning philosophy. I'll decide later if I'm hungry."

The southernmost reaches of the Land of Wind were a vast sprawl of dunes and flats, punctuated by rock formations. Though he didn't say so, Naruto was mildly impressed by the terrain. The sky seemed huge. The field of view appeared as though it had expanded with no features to interrupt it.
As sunrise hastened and dimmed the stars, Naruto accepted another biscuit as they kept moving. The desert's chill was abating. He felt it was extremely necessary to point out each sighting of life as they moved along.

"Look at that mouse hop!" And, "That little owl's sitting on a cactus!"

"If you really want your mind blown," Jiraiya advised, "Use Sage Mode and feel the energy of the creatures underground as it heats up out here. There's all kinds of stuff."

So of course Naruto had to try it and he admitted he was sort of amazed. It was not at all as lifeless as he would've expected.

He marveled at the desert's hidden abundance for a few minutes as they pushed ahead, and then let his Sage chakra wear off. Naruto retreated into his thoughts as Jiraiya picked out a route to Suna from memory. Hinata said hello to me yesterday…but she kind of kept it short. He frowned to himself, 'It sounded like she wanted to tell me something, but she was shy and distracted.' Naruto twitched his nose. Maybe he had said or done something to offend her after all. Or maybe she was nervous about his imminent homecoming?

'I don't get it! I know we can't be equally enthusiastic all of the time— but I was excited to hear from her and she was just...' Naruto admitted to himself that she seemed distant, if a bit flighty. Granted, Hinata had explained that her elders had observed her training bout with Neji outside of the Main House that morning. Perhaps the residual judgment weighed on her?

"I can hear you grinding your teeth." Jiraiya said sidelong to his student.

Naruto unclenched his jaw, "Oh."

"Relax." Jiraiya soothed.

"Sorry."

"What's bugging you?"

Naruto vaulted over an exposed peak of igneous rock and then said, "It's probably nothing…"

"That's what I used to say when I was a kid and Orochimaru went missing for days on end." Jiraiya gruffed.

"Jeez! It's not that bad, at least I don't think so." Naruto defended, "Hinata didn't seem like herself when she said hi to me, yesterday."

"She's got a lot going on in her life." Jiraiya supposed, "And it'll get a heck of a lot busier when you're home whimpering like a puppy around her."

"Yeah, I know that."

"Remember, she's still going to be occupied by her clan and responsibilities. She'll always have a lot on her plate." His teacher went on, "You've been smothered with attention and affection from her pretty much since you entered the Academy. As you get older, the both of you will realize that time starts to slip by faster and your priorities shuffle like crazy. It's a learning process."

Naruto wanted to roam into the hypothetical explanation, "What if she doesn't-?"

"Naruto, that girl loves you. You don't have to doubt it."
He released a sigh tinged with tension.

Jiraiya gave him a slanted smile, "It's never going to be as bad as your imagination spins it."

"I just want to know if anything's on her mind. Usually when Hinata's stressed out, she'll talk to me."

"Then the next time she drops in, ask her. If she doesn't want to get into it with you then try to respect that. If she does, listen carefully." Jiraiya suggested.

Naruto was obliged to take such advice. He and Jiraiya carried on for a distance as the morning sun rose, and Jiraiya eventually halted, "Oh shit, hold on." He measured along his outstretched arm, squinting, drawing an angle from the sun's position, "We veered off to the east a bit, whoops. That explains why we didn't see that crag I was looking for…"

"Get your head together, Ero-sensei."

Jiraiya shushed him and set out again with their course corrected. By noon, hawks and buzzards drifted by on thermal updrafts in the sky, and dry heat had stymied the quick pace Naruto and Jiraiya had started out with. They trudged tiredly for a while. Naruto gave thanks for the lightweight clothing he was wearing. He stripped off his sage cloak and wrapped it like a turban to cover his head. His face and scalp had been baking.

"Not a bad idea." Jiraiya decided as he pulled off his outer vest, fastening it over his brow.

"Why the hell does anyone want to live out here?" Naruto rasped.

"It's a wise choice defense-wise." Jiraiya shielded his eyes and peered out on the horizon, "No one really bothers trying to invade the Sand Village, have you noticed? It's a major pain in the ass."

"I'll say."

"Should've bought some sunscreen before we crossed the border."

"We could roll in some mud." Naruto suggested.

"That would imply there's water around here somewhere, and I've got to tell ya…" Jiraiya panted, "You'll probably find buried treasure first."

"Could we buy water with it?" Naruto quipped.

"Nope. The rations we brought with us— don't waste a drop."

Jiraiya was pleased when he located an anticipated landmark. A shaved face of sedimentary rock provided a merciful stretch of shade. He and Naruto rushed into the shelter and sat down, wolfing down boxed lunches and trying not to consume too much water.

"I wish Gaara could come out here to get us." Naruto tipped his head back against the wall of stone behind him.

"This is a formative experience. You have to make this crossing on your own in the future for missions, and he knows that."

"Yeah, but what if you keel over from heat stroke or a heart attack while we're out here?" Naruto speculated jokingly.

Jiraiya declared, "Gaara has always been comfortable with taking risks and jeopardizing my life."
Naruto chuckled at the truism and then put away rubbish and containers in his bag. As Jiraiya rose to stand he added, "I'm tougher than I look. I have my complaints, but this isn't really so bad."

For the rest of the day their pace was halved, and the end-of-summer sun beat down relentlessly. Jiraiya asked a few times for breaks, particularly when there was shade available. They ate their remaining meals even as the sun set. By nightfall, they had set up their bedrolls beside a small campfire as the temperature dropped. Jiraiya summoned a small mustard-colored toad that kept watch for them beside a nettle of sagebrush. Naruto stared up at the stars to let his mind begin to go blank, and then there came a soft yelp from Jiraiya on the other side of the flickering flames.

"What is it, Ero-sensei?" Naruto sat up and noticed a scorpion of curious size perched on Jiraiya's chest as the man laid flat on his back.

With good half-asleep reflexes, Jiraiya swiped the critter off and it scampered sideways to avoid the fire. Naruto could have sworn he heard a whispering sound, and he leaned down to regard the arachnid.

Jiraiya sighed shakily to calm down, "Guess that's par for the course, out here…waking up to find something crawling on you."

"I think it said something." Naruto observed.

"It's a bug."

"I don't think they're technically bugs—"

"Don't parse details with me, just go to sleep!"

Naruto leaned down and turned his ear toward the creature, "Come again?"

In a small voice the scorpion repeated, "Suna."

"Yeah!" Naruto laughed, glad to see his hunch was right, "You're one of Gaara's little dudes aren't you?"

"Gaara-sama said…to keep watch." The scorpion explained. Its human speech was not well-developed.

Jiraiya sat up again because he was surprised that Naruto had spotted a Summon animal quicker than he had.

"Would you tell Gaara we're nearly there? He's expecting us." Naruto requested.

The scorpion said nothing more before scuttling off, presumably to deliver the message.

Jiraiya gave Naruto a grunt of commendation for his perceptiveness and then rolled over to sleep. The next morning, Jiraiya's toad had sidled up beside Naruto after the fire had died out in the night. Naruto awoke with a yawn and dismissed the faithful sentry before nudging his teacher.

Jiraiya sat up and began shaking sand out of his long, white ponytail. Naruto snickered.

"This stuff gets everywhere. I tasted it my food last night too." Jiraiya grumbled.

They buried the remnants of the campfire, packed up, and set out at a brisk pace while the air was still cool. All that remained were their water rations, and by mid-day those had been depleted as well.
Bathroom breaks in the desert were an odd experience, Naruto decided. Either companion merely had to turn their back and keep a distance, but it was strange being in a wide expanse of desert in which, truly, neither could tell if they were being watched or not.

The early afternoon was not as hot as the day before, at least Jiraiya didn't think so. He and Naruto had not wrapped their heads up for protection, though perhaps they should have. A single, fat cloud drifted overhead in the sky.

Naruto narrowed his eyes as he looked ahead, "Is that another landmark?" There was a dark feature on the horizon.

"Yeah, it's called Sunagakure." Jiraiya snarked.

"Whoa-! Really?"

"Yep, that's the stone plateau that the village is carved into. That is--- if I'm not going blind and insane." He turned his empty canteen over and prospected for a single drop of water, "We're on course so that should be it. Or it's a mirage. So don't---" Jiraiya's face fell as his student had already taken off in a full sprint. It was still quite a distance, not that it mattered in the least to Naruto. With a guttural sound, Jiraiya pushed himself as well, trying to incentivize such exertion in the heat, There will be beautiful women and cold drinks there!

Jiraiya was not sure how much time passed, but he made it three-quarters of the way before plopping down on his backside and groaning. He admired the strength and gumption of his pupil, no two ways about it; he just missed the days when youth was on his side. He rested for a while and then noticed a vulture behind him, creeping curiously towards him on its awkward, taloned feet.

"Beat it, shoo." Jiraiya waved it off tiredly. All that did was make it stop and sit beside him.

"Well, I find this telling." The man mused out loud, "Might as well wait and see if I bite it, you ugly buzzard. I know time's not on my side anymore." Jiraiya tossed a handful of sand at it, "But dammit I have a lot to do! So much to write. Kids to whip into shape. Women to immortalize in my work…"

The vulture spooked and took off when a vaguely yellow flash appeared beside Jiraiya. He glanced up in stupefaction at Naruto.

Naruto wore a look of concern that was mostly amusement.

"How'd you do that?" Jiraiya asked.

"I marked your travel bag yesterday, in case something like this happened." Naruto grinned at him.

"Oh." Jiraiya was rather delighted by his thoughtfulness, and took Naruto's hand as the boy helped him to his feet. "Thanks, kiddo. I didn't mean to fall behind-!" He felt a bit queasy as Naruto teleported a second time, holding fast to his companion-cargo, and transported him to the gate of the Hidden Sand Village. Jiraiya bent for a moment and placed his hands on his knees, "-heh! Herp—!" He restrained the urge to hurl and then slowly stood upright.

Naruto plucked his anchoring knife from the ground and apologized, "Ero-sensei, sorry— I just made it here and thought I should bring you over."

"Much appreciated." Jiraiya settled himself and kept walking, "I was a prospective lunch back there."

"Are you-?"
"I'm fine." Jiraiya insisted, "I just need a long drink of water and some air conditioning."

It took a good deal of patience and maturity for Naruto to proceed at a respectable pace alongside Jiraiya. His head snapped around wildly as they passed through the intake ravine of the gate, and it led them into the bustle and noise of the city. Like a good sport, Naruto stopped in the first convenience store they could find and bought his teacher a bottle of water to guzzle. Jiraiya perked up after that, touring down the main avenue and scanning over the crowds that weaved between dusty buildings.

"This place seems a lot more crowded than I remember." Jiraiya muttered.

"So where can we find Gaara?" Naruto was beaming, almost twitchy with excitement.

"Well I'd wager his ass is trapped in an office chair in the Administrative Building which is…" Jiraiya spun in a small circle, "Give me a second. Er…" Jiraiya rubbed his chin and noodled on it, "All this development and remodeling is throwing me off."

Naruto prepared a hand sign, thinking he ought to send a deluge of Shadow Clones to track down his dear friend, but Jiraiya batted at his hands.

"Cool it, kid. Don't get trigger happy with jutsu here, remember: you're a guest in Suna." The man advised as he traipsed along, "This way. I'm decently sure we take this road to the end and then hang a right…"

Near the end of the street, Naruto sidetracked for some rainbow shave ice and nipped it as they continued on. Jiraiya had passed on the treat. They hit a roadblock of people congregated near stalls selling goods from the Tide Village. Jiraiya shoved Sand citizens out of his way as politely as possible, "Good grief! Since when do these people have money to spend? That line wraps around the friggin' block."

"Wanna take a—?"

"No, I need oxygen. I'm getting claustrophobic." Jiraiya toddled along to the other side of the plaza, where foot traffic had thinned, "Phew. I'm surprised no one's recognized me yet. I had my pen handy for book signings."

Naruto mocked him from over his cup of ice, "Maybe they don't sell your trash novels here?"

Jiraiya puffed his cheeks and rounded on the whelp, trying to smack the ice treat and mash it in Naruto's face. They scuffled like juveniles for a moment until Jiraiya stilled and stared down the avenue. When Naruto did not notice anything amiss right away, Jiraiya swiveled him around to look. They spotted Gaara who was completely oblivious to them, his face wracked with worry. He rushed into the front entrance of Suna's hospital.

"That doesn't bode well." Jiraiya observed.

Naruto tipped the last dregs of shave ice into his mouth before tossing the cup into a waste bin. He led the way as they backtracked to the hospital and slipped through the automatic doors. Further into the lobby, Gaara had concluded a check-in at the secretary's desk before moving down a hallway on the left. Naruto was about to give chase like a hunting dog, but Jiraiya held his arm back for a moment, "I just want you to think for a second about why Gaara is distressed and in a hospital."

Naruto wilted at the thought, "Will do."

"This may not be good. I mean, he'll be glad we're here, but it may make this a shitty meeting. Just saying." Jiraiya sighed and released him, "Go find him."

It was not so simple a task as it took Naruto about fifteen seconds to realize a set of double doors in the annex could only be opened by pushing a button on the wall. By then, he'd completely lost sight of Gaara, but he took a moment to breathe and collect himself. He gathered Natural Energy while unconcerned doctors flitted around in the ward, and nurses traveled briskly between monitors and rooms.

In Sage Mode, Naruto easily detected his friend climbing up a stairwell to the next floor, sensing the density of Gaara's chakra. He held back the grin that kept tugging at his mouth, knowing that the circumstances of their reunion would probably not be good. Naruto slipped into an empty patient room, pushed up the window's sash, and leaped up the building's exterior. It was quicker than stairs.

He scaled a concrete terrace and slid open a door, dusting his hands off. Naruto shook some of the sand from his short cloak. Just then, Gaara exited the stairwell on the far end of the corridor and paused. He may have thought it a hallucination at first. Gaara gave his eyes a hard blink. Naruto was still shaking his clothes out somewhat inconsiderately, shedding the desert's residue onto the tile floor. He looked up like he had been caught red-handed by Gaara, several meters down the hallway.

Naruto laughed in spite of himself, and then tried to swallow the reaction because Gaara had been upset downstairs and still appeared to be. 'Shit! I can't be an asshole. I need to be considerate! Keep it together!' He cleared his throat and covered half of the distance towards the stairwell, sheepish, "I know this probably isn't the best time or place…but, uh…"

Naruto had only just blinked when he missed Gaara close the gap, wrapping both of his arms around Naruto's shoulders. The startled feeling dissipated almost immediately and Naruto returned the squeeze, elated.

A phlegmy sound came from Gaara's throat. He stood back to compose himself after the hug, "This isn't a bad time or place, Naruto."

"But you look freaked out! I saw you run in here and I thought…” Naruto indicated with a wary face, "Something bad happened."

"Something did." Gaara confirmed, proceeding a few doors forward, "Though Haku salvaged what he could."

Naruto lit up with unfettered joy as he followed along, "Are you telling me that Haku's-?"

"He isn't here. I wish." Gaara stopped to tell Naruto sincerely, "I'm glad you are."

The turbulent swirl of euphoria and disappointment was giving Naruto whiplash. When he followed Gaara into the recovery room, he had a better understanding of what was wrong. Temari was sitting in bed with two monitor hookups, bad-mouthing a nurse who was in no mood to be argued with.

"I've recovered already. I was fine by the time I got to Tide, and I made it here on my own power." Temari sniffed, "Get this junk off of me."

"Thank God. Gaara, tell them to discharge me. I've had it." She paused to blink at a much taller, leaner Naruto beside her brother, "Holy shit."

Naruto started off with, "Hi! What happened to you?"
"Momochi Zabuza." The nurse flinched at the name and Temari snickered, "You should see what he limped off with."

"I don't think his injuries were of your making, going off of the report Hisauji gave me." Gaara crossed his arms and waited for Temari's explanation.

She only gave him, "It didn't go as planned."

"You tried to get Haku back?" Naruto gathered.

Temari sighed and then gave the nurse a scornful look as he exited the room.

"I couldn't. I just made it worse." Temari admitted in a low voice. Naruto plopped down into a visitor's chair to process the bad news while Gaara elected to stand and brood.

"Two of my subordinates were killed when Zabuza ambushed us. Haku was very polite while we arrested him." She reclined into her pillows to recount the events, "He even tried to save my team, and I don't think Hisauji, Tokumaru, or Muta would've survived if he hadn't been there."

"Nor you." Gaara's rebuttal was clipped.

"You gave me the clearance to go."

"You demanded clearance."

"You can tell me NO when it's a mission." Temari reminded him, "Don't make this completely my fault."

"When I don't humor your requests, you become incredibly difficult, bordering on subversive. And I'd be lying if I said I didn't want to execute that retrieval as soon as you found him." Gaara admitted, "But as a team captain, you were responsible for that mission and the loss of Kori and Mitsuie. You could have waited and surveyed the town first. You could have done any number of things."

"I know." Temari agreed tensely.

"Now he's lost to us. Haku is a hostage of a nukenin in the truest sense of that phrase. If he tries to leave, innocent people on that island pay the price. If I send reinforcements, there will also be consequences." The Kazekage listed the repercussions.

Her hands fisted on the bedsheets crinkled on her lap.

"Is there anything else I need to know?" Gaara was glad to see her alive, but still deeply troubled.

Temari noted Naruto sitting with a pensive expression, trying to spin the scenario through his head. She gave a dry laugh when Gaara asked if he and Naruto should personally go to Nanakusa, "You think that would work any better?"

"We would not be nearly as careless or vulnerable." Gaara retorted.

"You're fucking jinchuriki." Temari hissed, "You want to cross country borders while the Akatsuki are out there? With or without an escort? Don't preach to me about taking risks."

He gave her a dangerous look before Temari went on, "Besides, the Exam is coming up. You're required to observe proceedings and head the panels. Naruto is participating." She reminded him, "Hidden Sand is going to be majorly occupied with heightened security and re-worked mission schedules. So who do we send out there to get Haku? A team from Hidden Leaf? How are you "going to explain this to the Hokage?"

"Enough." Gaara snapped.

Silence hung in the room until Naruto asked the woman, "Are you okay?"

"Thank you for asking." Temari said as she shot Gaara a see what you forgot to say? look, "I'm fine now. Every orifice on my body bled uncontrollably after Momochi used some weird jutsu with that sword. Haku held him off and then saved my life." She added, "And yeah, it hurt like hell. I'm lucky I made it."

Naruto astutely asked, "Is he okay?"

"For a while he wasn't, but I tried to encourage him before I got out of there." Temari told him, "He can still make the best of things, for now. He has good friends there who also helped me." She threw in another jibe at her brother, "By the way, when you see him—Haku— he's breathtaking. As in, more beautiful than anyone alive, well-groomed or whatever you call it…and he's got way more muscle tone than Gaara."

Gaara said nothing and kept his expression flat, but Naruto chuckled at the observation, "Really? Well he's not leading a life of luxury. He probably fights way more often than we do…"

"He did try to kill Zabuza." Temari recalled, "But he fucked up. That's why I left in a hurry."

"Like…he didn't really kill him?" Naruto verified.

"Yeah. Someone took pity on that asshole dying on the street and brought him into the health office, so he survived. And Zabuza was pissed off."

Gaara rolled his eyes.

"We can learn from that." Naruto assessed sunnyly.

"Right. Make sure the job is done." Temari agreed.

"What if Haku is dead as a result of Zabuza's retaliation?" Gaara pressed.

Temari got defensive again, "Do you want me to go and check? Send his rabbit back with a message and find out, Gaara. Stop trying to guilt trip me. I know you're mad."

"You were responsible—"

"I know."

Naruto tried to break it up, "Guys, you need to-!"

"This was too personal. I never should have sent you." Gaara decided.

"You trusted me with this. The only reason you know anything about where he was, was because I got it done." Temari countered.

Naruto's eyes bounced between the feuding siblings.

"It's his fault too. Haku caused undue risk to all of us by attempting something this stupid—"

"You don't get to call him stupid because he wants to know where he comes from." Temari snarled,
"You always had that luxury. You had a family, a name, a village! Don't shit on him because he hoped others like him were out there. And while he's at it, he's saving people's lives and sending you intel on activity in the Land of Water."

Gaara was pacing a bit, frustrated by her points, "He still shouldn't have enlisted the help of a rogue ninja."

"Like he had any other clues to start with-?"

"You—" Gaara's temper careened off a ledge, "Put him ahead of things that are far more important; things I rely on you for here. You need to stop thinking about him and communicating with him—"

"Or what?" Temari's anger was laced with laughter.

Naruto was wide-eyed in the corner.

"Or I'll kill him myself, because I know he'll be your demise someday and he's too selfish to forget you and let you live your life." Gaara finally let on to his ulterior motive for some kind of resolution. That he did not approve of Haku's love for her.

"Live my-? I already tried that." Temari barked,"You can't tell us how to feel— have you been so fucking perfect?"

"He's a liability at this point—"

"He's your friend and you love him."

"He is and I do." Gaara confirmed harshly, "But you shouldn't."

Temari plucked hook-up lines from her arms and tossed them aside, ignoring the alarm pings of the monitor. She pushed herself to her feet to stare Gaara in the face, "So you've got a problem with that?"

"He's become too much trouble for you. You need to stay away."

She was grimacing. It was then Temari understood the fulcrum of Gaara's irritation with Haku. She retorted calmly, "You don't get to tell me what I do or who I do."

Naruto fought through a fog of shock and amazement to cover his ears with his hands. This was too much. He wasn't sure if he ought to stop it, because the argument was probably some necessary form of communication between Gaara and his sister.

"Not him." Gaara stuck to his resolve.

"Even if Dad had demanded that, I still wouldn't give a half of two shits."

"He's already seen me naked." She flung taunts at him, "He fed me and cared for me when I was too weak to move. He slept beside me with that angelic look on his face—" Temari concluded, "What I still don't get is: why can't you abide by the person you trust who treats me that well and goes that far for me?"

Before Gaara could come up with a slipshod answer, Jiraiya ambled into the room. He greeted the three youngsters with, "I heard shouting so I assumed it was you."

Gaara instantly deflated. Temari was wobbling on her feet, lightheaded, but her brother thankfully got off of his high horse and helped her back into bed. They mumbled apologies at each other.

"Ero-sensei! Crap, I should've gone downstairs to get you." Naruto had forgotten about him.

"It's alright, I can find my own way." Jiraiya walked over to Gaara and clapped his hand on the young man's shoulder, "Don't you look riled up?"

Gaara sighed but accepted a fond pat on the head, "It's good to see you, Sensei."

"So…" Jiraiya scanned his eyes over to Temari, who he knew was Gaara's sister although they had never been introduced, "Seems like something went down."

"I couldn't get Haku back." Temari gave the short answer.

"Huh." Jiraiya quirked his mouth, then he turned to Gaara and Naruto, "Why don't you two head outside and catch up? I've got some questions for…" He was sheepish, "What was your name again, miss?"

"Temari." She exhaled tiredly.

"Temari." Jiraiya logged the name away in a rusty memory bank, "Tell me about your mission."

Gaara tried to intervene, "I can—"

Jiraiya stopped him, "Not now. You need to cool off. Go with Naruto and I'll meet you at your house. I'm going to need a nap after the trip we had."

As the young men obediently left the room, Jiraiya dragged a visitor's seat to the bedside and plopped down into it.

Gaara decided that he didn't want to exit in front of hospital-dwellers while half manic, so he took the door of the balcony that Naruto had come in from. Naruto followed a few paces behind him, descending down sills and ledges until they landed near a loading dock behind the building.

Sighing heavily, Gaara leaned against the wall and shut his eyes. On the far side of the concrete pitch, laborers were moving supplies off of pallets. They continued making a racket and shouting orders at each other while Naruto stood beside his friend in silence. He watched Gaara's face and puzzled over what to do. How could he lighten the mood? How were they supposed to reconcile themselves with Haku's captivity?

Ever the hardy soul, Naruto had witnessed Gaara's scandalous tiff with his sister and managed to shrug it off. Both had made valid points. Naruto felt mature enough to digest the barbs he had seen them launch at each other, 'Hopefully they won't fight like that all of the time while I'm here…'

When Gaara cracked an eye open and flicked it over to Naruto, he was surprised by the smile on his friend's face.

"I know this is like a tense moment, or something, but I just can't—" Naruto batted at his whiskered cheek as if to ward away the happy expression, "Nope. I can't be upset. Even after all of that."

Gaara swallowed a small laugh and relaxed a bit, shaking his head.
"We'll figure it out, Gaara." Naruto offered succinct reassurance.

"I've told myself that for over a year." Gaara admitted, "But I haven't figured it out."

"Well, I wasn't around to help you strategize." Naruto shrugged a shoulder to show off his Sage cloak, "Sages are wise. I'll brainstorm with you."

Gaara was tempted to mock his good friend in jest as he readily would have in the past, but he opted not to as Naruto gave his arm an encouraging nudge. Something about him felt noticeably different. Maybe it was a psychological effect; that Naruto's return and upbeat mood acted like a contagion and lifted his spirit. But it was more than that, Gaara thought. It felt like life itself radiated off of him. Whatever it was, Gaara appreciated the odd phenomenon.

The Kazekage took another deep breath and then formed a hand sign to create a Shadow Clone. Gaara sent it eastbound in the direction of the administrative building. Then he began to lead Naruto through a series of back alleys where shade was plentiful, mentioning, "You look sunburnt, Naruto."

"I heal quick! My skin will clear up by tonight." He was still buoyant as he kept up with Gaara, "What'd you make that clone for?"

"To get work done at the office. Normally, I attend to my duties in person, but today…" Gaara was rubbing at a tense knot in his neck, "I would rather go home and rest."

Naruto was curious, "Clones can do that kind of work?"

"With practice, they can focus on it. I don't recommend it. Shadow Clones are not as reliable if an emergency arises. Some of my Jounin are also offended when they have to speak to a clone of my making as a surrogate. They prefer an audience with the real me." Gaara supposed, "It's a proprietary thing."

"Guess it is, otherwise you'd always have a clone do the work for ya, right?"

"I would." Gaara seemed calmer when he leapt up to the roof of a brick building on their right, and Naruto followed as Gaara explained, "The first report that came in from the Tide Village late last night…confirmed two deaths on Temari's team, three serious injuries, and that my sister was a captive."

Gaara shared a bit of his mindset, "You can understand what my stress levels have been like today."

"I might be able to empathize." Naruto wagered.

While crossing rooftops toward a large, multi-story house straight ahead, Naruto noticed some of Suna's Academy students being chaperoned down on the street below. He goggled at the sight of their fresh, babyish faces.

"Look at 'em, Gaara! Are those new students?"

"They just passed their entrance exams—"

Naruto was hooting in delight, "That's cute how they all walk in a line! Where are they going?"

"At the end of this block is the Shirogane clan's puppet museum and workshop. It's for a class trip." Gaara was amused by Naruto's thrilled, fawning exclamations. Perhaps Naruto's extended stay within the human-less Toad Valley made the sight of children a novelty again.

They touched down before entering what Naruto called a "whopper" of a residence. When entering, Gaara flicked his hand at his friend to sift the sand from Naruto's clothing and travel bag, and then willed it outside. They removed their shoes before moving into the living area.

"So this is…your family's house?" Naruto wanted to make sure they had not wandered into a rich stranger's abode.

"It's been passed down for generations. More people used to live here in the past." Gaara slipped the strap of Naruto's bag from his shoulder and set it aside near a staircase, "You can put this away shortly." He pointed out a sectional in a sitting area, "Rest for now. Do you want water?"

"I'm okay, but I guess I should drink some anyway."

"One of my messengers told me you were faring well in the desert." Gaara said as he ventured into the kitchen for refreshments, "Though the crossing was harder on Sensei."

"He really did his best." Naruto sunk into sofa cushions and leaned back, groaning in relief. He stared up at tall ceilings as a thought occurred to him, "Hey, Gaara?"

An affirmative sound came from the kitchen.

"You said your sister was a captive…but did she say how she got away?"

When Gaara returned with a contemplative frown on his face (because he had not asked Temari that) he handed a glass of water to Naruto before he also took a seat.

Naruto went on, "I don't remember much…about Zabuza…but if she was hurt, I don't see how she got out of there without—"

"Haku must have fought him, then." Gaara tried to imagine the scenario, "More than once."

Naruto was slurping the water, thirstier than he thought he was.

"That's why, at the moment, we have no idea if Haku is severely injured or in good health. If he came to an agreement with…or killed Momochi…" Gaara ran through the options, "We need to reach out to him again."

"Ero-sensei will probably have a suggestion, when he gets here."

"If I didn't have the exam to think about, I would be on my way to that island right this moment." Gaara's fingers raked an anxious pattern over the sofa cushion.

"Can the Kazekage actually leave his village without, you know, an entourage or retainers?"

"It's customary for village leaders to be accompanied. Not that I don't disregard customs when I need to…" He leaned back and shut his eyes, "Though this is no time to be foolish enough to travel alone…or think that I have the correct ninja at my disposal for a follow-up retrieval."

"Well I could—"

"No." Gaara interrupted him, "I know better than to take such a risk."

Naruto suggested they change the subject. He wanted to appreciate the fact that they were sitting around doing nothing together once again. Gaara consented and then informed Naruto that, yes, he could put his feet up on the coffee table to relax because everyone else around here did it.

That reminded Naruto, "Hey, is your brother around?"
"I sent Kankuro on a mission. He was the one who sent me Muta's communication about Temari's capture." Gaara recalled, "Kankuro was also shocked that he didn't need to go looking for Temari—she flew to Tide on her own. I still have him working on a training module, down there. Hidden Leaf is also assisting with a Tide Sealing Corps program."

"How long will it be before those guys can actually handle things on their own?" Naruto wondered.

"It takes time. We forget that our ancestors were constantly asking for the help of other clans and warriors, just to survive in ancient times. Shiogakure's position as a new village is not so different from that."

"Huh, you've got a point there."

Splaying sideways, Gaara stretched out on the couch to get comfortable. He hugged a throw pillow and pointed out to Naruto, "You completed Sage Training."

"Yep. It definitely broadened my horizons." Naruto finished his drink before he too flopped over on the other section of the sofa, "You should go to the Toad Valley, Gaara. Not to bust your ass training though, just for a vacation or something. It's awesome there."

"I might just do that, whenever I can finally take a vacation." Gaara agreed, "I don't think I have any desire to become a Sage."

"The food isn't the best or the worst there."

"So I've heard."

"Yeah. I'll ask Ma or Pa to hold onto this anchor knife in the valley when you want to go, then I can get you there with Hiraishin." Naruto formulated the most practical method of transportation, "The jungle road takes too long, and we can't reverse-summon you there without a contract…"

Gaara tilted his head back to look at his friend, "Anchor knife?"

"This is the only one I have that's got a jutsu-formula attached to it. When I get home I should probably have more of them made." He slipped the kunai from a holster on his belt, "Or maybe I could stick my formula on other stuff."

With an upside-down view, Gaara glimpsed the unusual kunai that his friend had held up. It was of an older, less practical design. He went out on a limb as he assessed, "That belonged to your father."

"Yeah. That's why Ero-sensei gave it to me." Naruto sighed and put the knife away.

"Hm." Gaara had shut his eyes and stuffed the pillow beneath his chin.

It occurred to Naruto that he had never really discussed his newfound parentage in depth with Gaara. Certainly Gaara had read about it in one of the last letters Naruto had sent him, but back then he had no comment on the matter.

After decompressing and lazing about for a while, Gaara spoke up, "It seems a shame…"

Naruto cracked a tired eye open to listen.

"That my terrible father lived as long as he did…and yours, a good man, died." Gaara concluded, "I think it's unfair."

"There's nothing we can do about it."
"Even so, it will still bother me."

"Don't let it bother ya. Ero-sensei told me plenty about my mom and dad...and I feel fine with most of it now." Naruto was a bit sentimental about it, "And if things didn't happen the way they did, I don't know if I would've met you or Haku otherwise. So don't regret it."

A dry chuckle escaped Gaara, impressed by Naruto's perspective on the matter. Indeed, his friend had come back a Sage.

That same hour, down south in the Tide Village, Utakata was mildly amused as the young Tide genin named Inari caught up with him outside of the administrative building. Utakata wasn't very popular with children since he'd had a prickly disposition upon arrival, but this particular boy had taken a liking to him.

"Heya Utakata, looks like you're back from a mission—" Inari was being nosy, "What'd they make you do? Did Grandpa ask the council to send you for super-secret stuff? Did you-?"

"It was a routine inspection of cargo vessels, some of which have illegal goods coming from and going to the Land of Water." Utakata fed him the honest, boring truth, "I only beat up three thugs."

"Only three?"

"Not every mission has to be sensational. Count yourself lucky when the stakes aren't high." He gave the rim of Inari's hat a tug, "You know when you wear this that no one can see your hitai-ate, don't you?"

"Yeah, I know..." The boy pulled it off, "It just reminds me of my dad. I should get used to not wearing it every day."

"Hat or no, he is with you." Utakata reminded him. He fiddled with his bubble-blowing pipe as he walked, wondering at his newfound benevolence and social grace while Inari chirped in the affirmative and recalled fond memories out loud.

This place had transformed him; most notably in a literal sense. Utakata glanced down at his outfit, having swapped out his preferred yukata in exchange for dark fatigues and Shiogakure's vibrant, blue Jounin vest. He even sported the Tide Village's headband, an accoutrement he had forsaken since he'd run away from Kirigakure as a teenager.

More surprising than the physical changes were his now frequent mingling with Tide Villagers—a hodge-podge of social classes, ninja, runaways, and businesspeople, all of whom had readily accepted him as one of their own. Strange types were welcome so long as they bore no ill-will, and Tide inhabitants had a sixth sense regarding newcomers who were phony or malicious these days. Unwelcome types were frequently chased out.

His reserved, guarded tendencies had declined in favor of laying down roots in a new and safe home. Utakata much preferred this lifestyle to being on the run.

Inari had gotten his attention again by mentioning, "Yeah, anyways, I saw your girlfriend at the Academy today when I stopped by. She is so nice. She's been tutoring students in Water Style all day, but I thought you said she's only working part time?"

"She's supposed to be working part-time."

"Why? Hotaru-chan told me you guys need to save up money for something."
"We do, but she doesn't need to push herself so hard." Utakata explained, "She just arrived."

"Yeah, I was wondering! What took her so long? She only got here like couple of months ago, but you've been together for a long time. That's weird."

The man clarified, "Two years. I asked Hotaru not to come here right away so that she wouldn't garner too much attention. A portion of her clan has been stalking her, and past confrontations with those outlaws gave us grief. That's how we met."

"She's got family issues?"

"She did. I eliminated a few of her relatives who meant to do her harm, before coming here." Utakata turned off of the main street, Inari keeping up as they approached shinobi training offices, "I believe we can live here without worrying about the Magaki Group."

"Good. The students like her way more than you as a tutor, just sayin'." Inari poked some fun, "Oh, and Menma told me a bunch of Leaf and Sand ninja are back in town!"

"For training. The Sealing Corps' director passed away and the cadets were not prepared to handle things without his leadership."

A valid question from Inari, "Who'll be the new director?"

A heavy sigh answered, "I have no idea. This village is still rather disorganized."

Inari folded his arms behind his head as they proceeded down a road lined with flower boxes, "Maybe a little. Do you think we'll ever have a Kage help run things?"

Utakata gave him an incredulous look, "What? Here? No."

"But, like, I heard some people talking about voting for a Namikage! Someone strong like you or that Saizō guy—you could hold that job down! Then we could join summits and stuff and look way tougher…"

"That's ridiculous." Utakata disagreed, "This village still lacks a steady foundation and an adequate number of experienced shinobi. You certainly won't see me vying for that position, if the council were silly enough to create it."

"How can you be so uninspired?" Inari hissed childishly. He wanted the dream to become reality, yet Utakata did not share the vision.

"Let me tell you something, you starry-eyed novice—" Utakata warned him sternly, "Don't ever think that a village will be more prosperous just because it possesses a Kage, or think that a village can't succeed because it doesn't have one. Many villages have councils or pseudo-figureheads and that's enough. And look to the Mist Village for an example," Utakata went on, "It has had four Mizukages and the village remains in shambles. Prosperity does not correlate with a powerful ninja holding office."

Inari gave his time-worn companion an annoyed look before conceding, "You're definitely right about that." Then he muttered, "But I still want one, it'd be cool. The Star Village has a Hoshikage and she was awesome."

"Inari, that's a ceremonial title. Hoshigakure isn't invited to Kage Summits."

"Maybe this year it'll be different!"
Utakata resisted a small smile, "Petition for it, if you feel that strongly. Tide, Star, Waterfall, Grass, Dream, and others haven't been represented thus far. Maybe they need to hold their own meetings?"

Jolted by the suggestion, Inari playfully punched his friend in the arm and left the training district to campaign for the idea.

Utakata passed the gate for the Sealing Corps' building and received a nod from a guard. He helped himself to tea and honey at a refreshment table, and then poked his face into the open door of an auditorium. Apart from many Tide Village greenhorns, the only ninja present that Utakata recognized was Kankuro of the Sand Village. They had gotten along rather well nearly two weeks ago over dinner. Beside Kankuro was a turban-wearing Sand kunoichi with a large sealing scroll.

Discreetly, Utakata caught Kankuro's eye and beckoned him over, then he spoke with the puppet user outside of the lecture hall, "Hello again. Who are all of these people?"

"The bunch at the front, see them? All from Hidden Leaf." Kankuro spoke softly, "Hi, by the way. Let's see if I remember their names…the Leaf Sealing commissioner who's speaking now, that's Shimura Mochinaga. He brought two Sealing analysts with him from Leaf and they're good. Putting Tide cadets through their paces now…" He pointed to the middle-aged Leaf kunoichi, "That's Sarutobi Hosoka, and that—" Kankuro pointed to a man correcting a Tide cadet, "Is Wada Agoro."

Utakata took a sip of his tea, "How disgruntled they all look…"

"Well, they want to train these up-and-coming Sealing experts the way they would in Leaf, but Tide newbies lack the confidence and discipline. It'll be a bumpy ride." Kankuro shook his head, "The Sand training program did hold their hands a lot. I guess that didn't do much good when it came time for cadets to pass practicals."

"Who is that?" Utakata meant the Sand kunoichi.

"That's Maki." Kankuro informed him, "She's our new Sealing Commissioner."

"She's young to be a commissioner." Utakata noted her appearance and pretty face.

"Pff, not so young anymore. She's your age—" Kankuro stopped himself when he saw Utakata's eyes widen in offense.

"Are you saying I'm not young?" The man grumbled, "I'm not even thirty yet."

"Your file said twenty-six—" Kankuro felt like rolling with the joke and antagonizing him because Utakata's reaction was entertaining.

"-well don't say it aloud—"

"If you feel so young there's no reason to be ashamed of the number, is there?" He lightly elbowed Utakata's flak jacket, "Why so uptight all of the time?"

"I'll send you back to the Kazekage stuffed inside that puppet you're carrying on your back." Utakata warned quietly.

"Man, you can't take a joke-!" Kankuro snickered, "Utakata, I work with fossils in my village, that's how ancient most of our veteran ninja are. Don't sweat age as long as your skin still has elasticity. That's the way we see it at home."

"By that line of reasoning, I suppose I should have no complaints." Utakata emptied his cup in a gulp, "I'm only sensitive because I am older than Hotaru."

Kankuro vaguely remembered the name, "Isn't that your—?"

"Yes."

"Yeah, you mentioned her during your visit." He nodded as he remembered, "What, she's about… twenty—?"

Utakata shook his head.

Kankuro was momentarily appalled, "Younger? Holy shit."

"Nineteen isn't much difference." Utakata defended, "She's a thoughtful, down-to-earth adult."

"I can say I am just barely that." Kankuro felt enlightened, "But it sounds like you're a lucky guy."

The men hushed up when Maki approached them, "Shimura-sama just asked us to leave. We're distracting the cadets…" She brushed past Kankuro and Utakata, "Why don't we go to the annex and see how the Sensory Corps is doing? A Leaf Sensory Specialist is supposed to be visiting too."

They migrated westward through the building, even though Kankuro was under the impression the Sensory Corps in Shiogakure was in decent shape. The look on Utakata's face suggested to him that Tide sensors in fact also needed work. When they passed through the archway and glimpsed into a conference room, a gaggle of Tide ninja animatedly invited the visitors in. A handsome Leaf ninja with long blonde hair sat in the center of a ring of Tide sensor-ninja.

"Ah, so this is him." The Leaf ninja got a look at Utakata, "Don't fret. This sensory team was telling me what it's like to feel your chakra. You are very distinct."

"I prefer if you refrain from discussing…my chakra…so openly." Utakata advised.

"It's alright. All of this is kept in confidentiality. We're focusing on density distinctions and what to do in the rare event two or more chakras we sense feel identical to us. Oh." He gave a small bow of greeting from where he sat, "I'm Yamanaka Inoshishi, Sensory specialist of Konohagakure; you've probably heard of our leader, Inoichi."

"Yeah, we may have heard about you guys." Kankuro was pleasant, "Kankuro of the Sand. This is Suna's Sealing Commissioner, Maki." When Kankuro introduced his companion, she gave an acknowledging nod and smile.

Inoshishi was heartened when the jinchuriki introduced himself, a bit more relaxed, "And I am Awa Utakata."

"Very pleased to meet you." Inoshishi was genuinely affable.

"Your lesson appears to be going better than the lecture for the Sealing cadets." Maki pointed out, "They looked miserable in there." The comment earned a titter of laughter from the Sensors.

"Well, Leaf's Sealing Corps can be…very rigid." Inoshishi rubbed his nose as he searched for a description, "I don't think we've ever seen new recruits with so little practical experience or without backgrounds in their specializations."

"That's because Leaf is spoiled with talent." Kankuro teased.

"Quite an accurate diagnosis, actually." Inoshishi agreed, "Utakata-san, do you know Reijiro? He just joined Tide's Sensory Corps recently, after leaving Hidden Mist."

Utakata scanned his eyes over a twiggy, dark-haired man at a desk who quailed under his gaze. Kankuro gave an acknowledgment that Temari had even worked with him, not long ago.

"I, uh..." Reijiro shrunk in his seat, "...was probably still in the Academy while you were in Kirigakure, Utakata-sama..."

"I think I do remember you." Utakata rested his hand on his hip, "Bragging to your classmates that you could take me in a fight."

The Tide sensory group had another laugh at Reijiro's expense, but the recent inductee snapped back at them, reminding his new friends of the stupid shit they claimed on a daily basis. Of course he had no desire to fight Utakata; he'd been a dumb kid then. Inoshishi sort of lost control of the class after that, and Tide ninja chatted amongst themselves and even pestered Kankuro and Maki with curious questions.

Some of the sensors that were familiar with Utakata turned to him, complaining about another popular Mist-defector who now lived in the Tide Village. The grievance was with the other Jounin council co-chair, Kiriyama Saizō, and that today he was getting married on the beach and he had not invited anyone from the Sensory and Sealing Corps to attend. The group had taken offense to the exclusion now that they had gotten to know each other so well.

"Yeah, it stinks that he only invited other Mist transplants like him, but not any of us." One fellow groused, "I'm surprised he didn't invite you, Utakata-san."

"I was invited." Utakata made sure they knew it, so he could listen to their groans of frustration.

Utakata continued to scold the easygoing, epicurean group, "If I were in his place, I wouldn't have invited any of you whiners either. I seriously doubt Saizō could afford to feed so many gluttons."

They weren't even mad at the observation. The group laughed until Inoshishi was able to rein them in again to resume the lesson. Maki suggested they visit the Jounin Council building to see if any other needs of Tide's standard forces weren't being met, but Utakata said he would only join them halfway across town. He had just gotten off of a mission and had shopping to do.

"That's fine." Kankuro led the way out of the building and back onto the colorful esplanade, "I don't suppose you heard about my sister's team passing through here?"

"Who didn't? They were a bloody mess." Utakata remarked, "What were they doing?"

"They were supposed to retrieve a friend of the Kazekage's from an island in the Land of Water, but Momochi Zabuza threw a monkey wrench into that assignment. It's a long story...but Temari nearly didn't make it out of there." He recapped.

"They should not tread carelessly around Swordsmen of Mist."

Kankuro was a bit tense, "If Momochi ever turns up around here..."

"No need for you or the Kazekage to worry," Utakata assured him, "Zabuza would meet a swift end if he crossed me in this village."

They parted at the market with pleasantries, and while the Sand ninja continued on Utakata idled around food stands to look for deals. He handled most of the shopping. Since Hotaru had begun to work in the Tide Village, she often got too caught up in teaching or making acquaintances. She did her best to adhere to the times she quoted him, but she was almost never home early enough to cook anything.

Utakata bought trout fillets that looked appealing, and a basketful of vegetables that had been grown locally. Around that time, a lazy, squeaky, masculine voice in the back of his mind asked him, Isn’t that the beer you like over there?

‘It is.’ Utakata smiled to himself as he walked past a display of alcohol, ignoring it.

Get some! This market is dirt cheap. How long has it been since you lived this easy?

‘We won’t be having that today, Saiken. You can get a buzz some other time.’

Sure, I’ve got an idea then. We should go back to the shop that sells those make-you-high lollipops and sweets, and you can get something next door for your lady too like a milk-tea or whatever.

‘Sorry, no treats. If Hotaru can’t indulge then I won’t either.’

She won’t care! Saiken protested.

‘Knock it off, you crybaby slug.’

Watch how you’re talking to me, bubblehead!

It was friendly banter, as it often was. Eventually the Bijū he hosted settled down and accepted that a healthy dinner would be served that night. Utakata only heard the occasional whine as he bought paper goods.

After that, he crossed town to the oldest part of the village, where shady trees stood tall in rows beside spacious houses. He liked that the area was less crowded than the newer, more developed parts of the Tide Village. It was only a short distance away from the docks on the lagoon. Hotaru sometimes cast a fishing pole out there on quiet mornings. Just a bit further of a walk, sandwiched between the beach and forest was where Tazuna still lived with his daughter and Inari. Utakata could hear the boy’s dog barking in the distance.

Utakata crossed a grassy yard overgrown with clover and violets, then unlocked the front door of a rental cottage. Before going inside, he noticed an osprey soaring triumphantly up from the lagoon with a fish clenched in its talons. He entered and shut the door, but pulled up the blinds of the sitting room’s window so he could watch the hawk land and dine on its prey in the front yard. Utakata went from room to room putting away items, pulled his vest and fatigues off in the bedroom, and redressed in the yukata he preferred lazing about in.

Afternoon light shone through the windows and brightened the place. Utakata didn’t realize he was smiling to himself. He was only vaguely aware that he was not scrounging around for food like he used to, searching for shelter or settling beneath a lean-to or tree for the night. There was no longer any pressure to flee pursuers from Mist on a near daily basis, fight against rogues and criminals who saw him only for bounties on his head. The pain of being away from the home he once knew, and of being unable to trust anyone he came across had abated. Though Utakata was uncertain how he’d gotten so lucky, he had finally run to the right place, And with the right person…’

Saiken muttered at him to remember to refill on soap-mixture before he forgot, Don’t want to be caught unaware and unable to use jutsu…
'It wouldn't be the end of the world. I have you.'

Yeah, but I can't do it all! You're our first line of defense.

He did as instructed and refilled containers of liquid he kept on hand for missions. For the rest of the afternoon, Utakata toiled making a stock for soup and other delicacies for an evening meal. While waiting on a pot to simmer, he sat at a table beside a small window that overlooked the side yard and lagoon. Utakata jotted recollections down on a pad regarding the last place he had eaten, as he now had a proclivity for reviewing eateries and was a popular food critic. Oh, how civilized life had changed him! His days of running through the wilderness felt so far away.

Hey make sure you mention how that place serves desserts too…Saiken reminded him of features he missed. His Biju was also very enthusiastic about flavor and food. Utakata sometimes wondered if he should credit Saiken as a collaborator for reviews.

The sun sank lower in the sky, the soup came together, the trout fillets roasted, and the cries of seagulls out over the water quieted. Crickets began to replace the sea's music. He finished writing and, with all food prepared and covered, decided to relax on a lounger with a whimsical shibori print on it. Hotaru had bought the chair, citing that she appreciated its 'personality.'

She's gonna be home late again. Just eat.

'I'm going to wait.'

Utakata, that girl is always making you wait. Why not have some wine before she gets back? See, then she won't be missing out.

'As thanks for the patience she has had with me, this is the least I can do.'

She's supposed to be working fewer hours.

'I know.'

Remember when she used to want you to teach her jutsu, and that she followed you around and bugged you? Only you could be her teacher! Now she's the one off teaching little guppies. It's coming full circle, my friend.

'She wanted to learn how to better defend herself from those in the Tsuchigumo clan that betrayed her. It wasn't that she personally wanted to learn anything from me.'

Oh yes she did.

Red-faced, Utakata thought, 'Shut up.'

Ha! Just kiddin'. She loves you a lot which I find impressive. Only your mom and Shishou cared about you before this, so after them I thought it was all going downhill.

'Whenever you're ready you can stop having an opinion, Saiken.'

You need my opinions—you even write them down!

'I listen to you because for so long you were the only one listening to me. You're important to me. But please…don't bring up embarrassing subjects.'
Nothin' to be embarrassed about!

'You apparently don't know how to be embarrassed, Saiken.'

I think that's a good thing, though. The slug sighed. It sure is nice here. Comfy bed, and a whole house to yourself with the little lady. Comfy chair...hey, how about that wine now?

'I told you already, no.'

Why is it that when she can't have something you make a point to not have it either-?

The door creaked open and Hotaru bustled inside, stepping out of her shoes in one practiced motion. She nearly slid on the waxed wood floor, bending fast in a bow of apology, "I'm sorry! You wouldn't believe how crazy the classes got."

"It's fine." Utakata blinked when she rushed over to him, reaching to hold his cheeks in her hands. She seemed teary and her shoulders tense. Even while anxious she was a pretty woman—light, sandy hair and deep green eyes.

"You're not mad?" Hotaru double-checked.

"No." Utakata confirmed again with his face scrunched.

Hotaru exhaled roughly and released him, setting her day bag down. She motioned for him to relocate to the table when she moved still-warm dishes and the soup pot. She was taking deep breaths to calm down.

"Gosh, I am just out of control with these emotions lately." She shook her head to try and snap out of it, "I promise I won't be out that late again. Today was rough, even for overtime pay at the Academy."

Taking a seat across from her, Utakata said as he lifted chopsticks, "I really don't think you should be working at all."

"We need the money. All that traveling was fine while we were broke, but staying in one place adds up." Hotaru laddled soup into bowls while eyeing the other dishes on the table hungrily. She was grateful that Utakata added morsels to her plate first.

"It is more expensive to live here, but I'll be paid better for missions." He tried reasoning his way through the minor disagreement, "And you don't have much control over class capacities and how long student training will take. If you like to do it, I understand. But you need to tell the administrator."

"Tell him what?" Hotaru spoke through a mouthful of delicious, flaky trout.

"That you'll be taking leave within the next month."

"I'm sure I can go another two months without getting tired."

"Let a doctor tell you whether or not that's possible."

"Fuh." Hotaru was in a better mood while eating, "Fine, then. But what if the administrator fires me? I'm worried I won't get my position back."

"Then they don't deserve you."
"Utakata, I'm serious! I really like working for the Academy."

"If they have no employee protection policies, then I don't see the point in you working there."

She would not relent, "Well I do, so maybe I'll ask Tazuna-san if he can put a word in for me when I go back."

The debate went on and on in circles until dinner was finished. Utakata fussed when she tried to clean up, and took over the more intensive tasks. He let Hotaru run along to rinse off and bathe, and worked while Saiken offered commentary on his personal life that he didn't need, once again.

When night cloaked the world outdoors, Utakata locked the place up and drew the window shades. He retired to the bedroom and rolled onto the mattress with a yawn. He would probably be asleep by the time Hotaru was done with her bath. Saiken joked that he was really an old man at heart.

Utakata stared over at the room's desk, where Hotaru's collage of newspaper clippings and photos of goofy Tide Village inhabitants was still an incomplete piece. She was proud of his published contributions to newsletters and daily papers. She snipped out his articles to save them, even though Utakata thought it a frivolous pastime. Hotaru explained that it was just a joyful reminder of how much their lives had improved. After a time, his eyes drifted shut, but he hovered on the edge of consciousness— aware of sounds and motion in the room.

Hotaru had pulled on her pajamas and clambered into bed, trying not to disturb him at first. She tested him with a whisper to see if he was still awake.

"Sorry that I didn't ask you about your day..." She said quietly.

"We had other things to discuss." Utakata croaked a reply without opening his eyes.

"Want to tell me about your mission?" Hotaru had sidled up next to him, adjusting her pillows.

"It was rather boring. Lots of boat shipments. There were not as many criminals as we expected trying to pull a fast one on inspectors."

"Because you were there."

"Or they were just slacking off. They weren't afraid of me initially."

"You got home on time, I bet. Did you get to see anyone today?" Hotaru wondered.

"Sabakuno Kankuro and Suna's Sealing Commissioner were in town. I met some Leaf ninja too…” He paused for a wide yawn, "Spoke to them. Saizō's wedding was today."

"That was today?" She chirped.

"Did you want to go?" He opened his eyes to get a read on her.

"I kind of wanted you to introduce me to your friends from Mist." She mumbled.

"Well," Utakata was amused, "We weren't friends when we lived in Kirigakure, though we are now. I didn't know it was important to you."

"I guess it isn't really. I'm just trying to meet more people in the village."

"I will introduce you to them as soon as our paths cross again." Utakata snaked his arms around her waist, "It will probably be a more memorable meeting, since Saizō won't be distracted by festivities.
He may taunt me about not being married though."

"We'll get around to it." She tucked her hands under her chin, beaming, "There's just been so much to think about, lately."

"Yes. We need to keep our priorities straight. On that note…" He rubbed the small of her back and asked, "Will you stop procrastinating a doctor's visit? You need an appointment."

"I couldn't get one this week." Hotaru provided a lame excuse with a small smile.

"You never bothered scheduling it." Utakata pointed out.

"I know, I know. I just got nervous when I walked into the office the other day…so I walked back out." She admitted sheepishly.

"Hotaru," Utakata pulled her into his front, "You can't quit like that. I need to know how to take care of you now that we're expecting a child. You need to be informed too."

She was nodding and poking the bare skin of his shoulder, uncovered by his robe.

"I'll go with you in the morning." He brushed his lips against her forehead, "To talk to someone. If they can see you right away, I'll stay if you want me to. If it's busy, we'll find something else to do."

"That would make it easier." Hotaru agreed with a sigh.

"You have nothing to worry about." Utakata told her.

She tucked her face against his neck, breathing in his scent, "I know. I've just had a bad feeling since yesterday."

"Oh?" His voice was pleasantly scratchy, "About what?"

"I can't put my finger on it. We should stay away from the beach. I think we should also ask the Sensory Corps to be more vigilant. Something's just not right." Hotaru tried to make sense of her suspicions.

Utakata raised a brow at her, but he would not dismiss her intuition, "I'll pass that along."

"Thanks. It could be nothing, you know."

"Let's hope it is."

She relaxed and told him, "I'm not trying to worry you, Utakata."

"Do I," He paused to yawn, "...look worried?"

"What's with all of this lettuce?" Naruto demanded an explanation.

Gaara shifted Naruto to the side, away from plates of food that needed preparing. He took over the work at the table, cutting marinated short ribs into small slices, "It's for ssambap."

"What the heck is that?"

"A Joseon dish. It's popular in Hidden Sand now." Gaara clacked a measuring cup in front of his friend, "Fill that with water for the rice."
"I just got here and you're putting me to work…" Naruto did as instructed, smiling because he really didn't mind.

"If you intend to eat here, you'll help." Gaara informed him, "It's different with my brother and sister around. They're better at this."

Naruto added water to the rice cooker and flipped the switch, which was about the only job his friend thought he could handle. That—and mixing together a dipping sauce in a bowl. Though Gaara claimed his siblings were more learned in cooking, Naruto was still quite impressed by his skills.

By the time the meat was grilled and the rice was done, Jiraiya had turned up. He stood in the egress of the kitchen to admire the sight of his two students being homebodies, "This is precious."

Naruto was sloppily setting the table, "You could've helped, Ero-sensei."

"No way, I had to take that bath. It restored me to a pristine shine." Jiraiya merrily seated himself while Naruto made a face at him, "Cool it. It's great seeing Gaara domesticate you, kid. You've become a shaggy beast and you need to learn how to hold a house down."

"Not why I'm here; but okay."

Gaara set a tray of grilled meat slices and lettuce on the table. When Jiraiya also asked him what in the heck this stuff was, Gaara gave him the same answer he gave Naruto. Recipes in his family were eclectic and sourced from many regions. Gaara thanked Naruto for his assistance when rice was scooped into bowls.

"Hey, don't you have any sake in this palace of yours?" Jiraiya wondered.

"No." Gaara dashed the thought.

"Don't speak to your master like that." He raised his chin impatiently, "Obviously you do. Your sister told me she needed a drink when she gets out of the hospital tomorrow."

"That doesn't mean you're entitled to the wine here. All of it belongs to Temari, anyway." Gaara dismissed it, "You might be my master, but I'm the Kazekage."

Sitting down, Naruto's delighted hooooooo approved of the comeback, which only irritated Jiraiya. It had yet to sink in for Naruto that his friend was in fact a village leader. Things felt rather commonplace in their current environment. Jiraiya grumbled and accepted a cup of tea instead.

The phrase Itadakimasu had only just left Naruto's lips as he crammed a lettuce wrap into his mouth. It was overstuffed with meat and rice, but no wayward bits of food escaped his maw. Each human-diet meal since leaving the Toad Valley had been a joyful experience.

"So," Jiraiya said as he picked up meat slices with chopsticks, "I've had a thought about what to do for Haku. Speaking to Temari cleared a few things up for me."

Gaara was slightly mystified, "Like what?"

"Well, based on what your sister told me, Haku is being treated like a prisoner and plaything by Momochi Zabuza." Jiraiya stuffed a lettuce wrap and concluded, "Since Haku can't get that gorilla to give him the baseline of respect he deserves, and believe me, Haku's written to me saying that he's tried…" He took a bite, "I'll just talk to Momochi."
"…?" Naruto's mouth was full, but the dumbfounded look on his face was a recognizable response. Gaara wrapped a piece of lettuce so tight that its contents spilled out the sides. "…Sensei."

"Yeah?"

"Momochi Zabuza isn't the kind of person you can just talk to." Gaara provided a reality check.

"In the traditional sense, no, he's not." Jiraiya agreed, "But there's some utility in sending me. I'm flexible. I can negotiate or sneak up on someone in Sage Mode to rough 'em up. You two stay here to concentrate on the Exam, and I'll see what I can do for Haku."

"But why even bother reasoning with him?" Naruto downed his food while gesticulating dubiously.

"Because even shitheads have a part to play, sometimes. Might as well try to direct that bastard's bad temper and energy into something useful. You know, like actually figuring out Hidden Mist's situation. That's a boon to us." Jiraiya expounded on the idea, "I doubt Momochi is used to taking orders from a supervisor...it's been a long time since he's done that. But that'll be healthy for him—it could keep his sorry ass alive if the Mist Rebellion decides to off him because he's too wild. I've gotten rowdy spies under control in the past. It's worked out great."

"You want to make him one of your spies?" Gaara highly disapproved, "...he tried to kill my sister. He killed two of my ninja."

"Gaara, he tried to kill pretty much all of you at one point or another. I do genuinely regret that harm came to your people, make no mistake." The man reminded him, "But a bit of psychology can work wonders. Leave it to me. Oh, and he wouldn't be my lackey..." Jiraiya cleared that up, "He'd be Haku's."

Naruto lost an entire wrap in a saucer of dipping paste, shocked again, "You lost me, Perv."

"There's an attachment there that can be leveraged. Inexplicable as it may be, Temari told me about it. It seems to be one-sided, so..." Jiraiya smirked, "Let me just talk to that asshole and see what can be done. We could get valuable intel or cooperation out of this, or at least get Haku out of there if that's what he wants."

Gaara sniffed, "Of course that's what he wants."

"Right." Jiraiya sighed, "Now I'm going to ban this topic of discussion for a while, at least until I'm ready to set out south for crisis intervention."

"Are you gonna give it a few days? You're still kind of beat." Naruto observed.

"Yeah." Jiraiya was chewing, "I want to do at least one book signing before I mop up another one of my kids' messes."

"Sounds like a plan." Naruto was somewhat relieved, though Gaara seemed to be google-eyed and tense after the discussion. "Is there anything you can tell me about the exam, Gaara?" He wanted to snap his friend out of it.

After a few deep breaths, Gaara wound down again, "There are a few things I can share ahead of time that won't give you an unfair advantage."

Naruto was all ears.
"There weren't many Genin enrolling from Konoha at all. Including you, there were three in total. The third enrollment may be called into question because it lacked the correct application permissions. I'll look into that in the morning. Rosters are finalized by the end of the week." Gaara explained, "If the third Leaf enrollee is disqualified, you'll be given a single-entrant replacement. That individual may come from any village."

"Isn't that kind of…?" Naruto shrugged it off, "Actually, that doesn't bother me."

"It shouldn't. Most participants in this exam will be strangers to each other. Few complete teams entered. With that in mind, teamwork will still matter…but adaptation and critical thinking are more important. Ad hoc solutions will be necessary to complete tasks." Gaara informed him, "There are no formal 'stages.' A series of simultaneous objectives will be assigned to all teams to test them and their capabilities."

Jiraiya was chuckling. Some unique, fresh hell was probably in store for unsuspecting trainees.

"Alright. I'm pretty sure I can handle anything that exam dishes out." Naruto was feeling good about it.

"My only advice to you is: don't let your teammates drag you down, if they aren't equipped to pass." Gaara offered, "Individual assessments are required for an exam like this, since some teams will be unfamiliar with each other. Your points and evaluation do not ride on those accompanying you."

"Good advice." Jiraiya agreed, "Don't let wimps hang onto your coattails, Naruto. If you take pity on them and try to support them so they can pass…that doesn't help them when they're Chunin that can't handle the missions they're assigned."

"Come on, I know that." He swirled meat in the dipping sauce.

With the conclusion of dinner, Jiraiya was kind enough to take part in the clean-up. Gaara showed them to their rooms afterward, and then Jiraiya patted the boys on their heads before retiring to sleep. Gaara directed Naruto to the bathroom, "Clean up here. I'll leave your bag in the room beside mine."

Left in solitude within the wide, tiled room, Naruto gladly stripped off his grainy clothing. His scuffed-up skin, complete with a lopsided farmer's tan, was a sight to behold in the vanity mirror, 'Jeez...I didn't know I looked this rough...'

'Bathing tools and a stool had been neatly tucked aside after Jiraiya had used them earlier. Naruto rinsed himself as the tub filled, finally starting to feel a bit of weariness. It had been a while since he had traveled cross country with Jiraiya, or had to think about how he socialized in the setting of a ninja village. His brain was rapidly recalibrating."

'Yeah. Come to think of it, it's been a while since I've worked on a team…' Naruto lathered his hair while thinking about the Accelerated Exam's requirements. 'Something about simultaneous tasks…points…I'm gonna guess we'll be tested out in the desert.' Which he could live with. 'And I won't know the people on my team very well at all. If they really do start dragging me down…' he arrived at a key question, 'What am I supposed to do? Would I lose points for abandoning them? Or for trying to drag them along? What if they're brand new rookies who have no idea what a promotional Exam is like?'

Naruto rinsed himself and sighed. Maybe an evaluator's explanation on the day of the test would clear up that last concern. Surely the orchestrators of the Exam had kept in mind that unacquainted teams would pose a challenge. He stepped into the tub and hoped that there was some kind of unorthodox system in place; that maybe the test was an exercise in cooperating with the ninja of other villages as well as one's own team. 'That'd make sense, since Gaara likes to arrange alliances when he can. We prefer it when other villages aren't hostile…'
He leaned back in the water but did not fully relax. There was a tingle that travelled from his head down to his fingertips, and then an involuntary jerk of his arm created a large splash of water. Naruto realized he was hearing Hinata's screech of embarrassment in his head.

"Hinata!" He kept his voice down, "It's alright! Don't leave. I won't look or anything." Naruto wanted to placate her before she terminated the jutsu's link, "Just finishing up a bath, I can get out and dress if—"

Her voice came again in a warble, No, it's fine…

He sat, angling himself comfortably to stare only at cupboard on the wall stocked with soaps and other bottled luxuries. He might've laughed at his girlfriend's timidity on any other occasion, but Naruto felt as if Hinata were a butterfly on the loose lately. When he had left the Toad Valley, she had been evasive on that visit. Startling or embarrassing her further would not be conducive to having productive talk.

Naruto kept his voice down, knowing that Gaara could probably overhear him next door talking to himself, "I know it's only been about, what? Five days now? But I've missed you. How have you been?"

*I am well! I'm sorry that I've been so busy, Naruto-kun. Kurenai-sensei asked us to help her pack belongings because she will be moving to a new home soon once she is married. And missions have —"

"Married-?!

To Asuma-sensei.

"Whoa." Naruto had not been aware of that.

Missions take up a lot more of my time than they used to…and I sat to observe a Village Council meeting for the first time, when my father brought me along. Neji-niisan will do that sometimes too.

"Huh. Was it boring?"

I think others found it boring, but everything was so new to me I was able to listen and pay attention. Hinata added in summation, Everyone is doing well…and if I knew exactly when you would be home, I would be counting down the days on my calendar!

Naruto chuckled, "Hah! You'd do that for me?" His face dropped slightly as he recalled how she had acted distantly when she had last contacted him, "Hey, Hinata…is there anything that you want to tell me?"

—! Tell you? Her nervous reaction carried into his body, making Naruto's fingers curl along the edge of the tub.

"Yeah." He muttered, "It's just…I felt like you didn't want to tell me much the week before. I miss you and I could be totally wrong about this…but I just want to know that nothing's wrong, or that you're not mad at me?"

I'm not mad at you at all. Hinata quickly offered that assurance, pulling herself together, Nothing is wrong, Naruto. I've been distracted… She halted the train of thought.

She wanted to bring up Kurama, the seal, the things Kurama told her, and talk about what she supposed Kurama was…but Naruto had drawn himself into a ball in the water, feeling her residual nervousness. Though she spoke to calm him, neither of them truly felt that way.

Please don't worry. She tried again, There is nothing to worry about, Naruto. I feel like I've learned so much lately, and it's a lot to take in. I have many…questions. Hinata bolstered him with: We can talk about anything we want to when you are home. Anything at all!

Naruto stretched out again and took a breath, "There is a lot I want to tell you…"

We can have snacks and talk all night!

"You want to see me stuff my face with junk? Because that's the first thing I need to buy and eat when I get home." Naruto warned.

I've had delicious ramen lately, and the restaurant owner and I talked about you. He can't wait to have you back, Naruto.

"—you're eating ramen?"

With Chouji-kun and Tama-chan, sometimes. Hinata confirmed.

"I didn't have any fear of missing out until just now." He folded his hands on his chest, smiling, "We have a lot of dates to go on…ma-aajor catching up to do."

Her voice was fluttery, I know.

Naruto nearly got hung up on the thought of kissing her, carding his fingers through her hair and stroking the skin of her slender neck. He shuddered and warded the thought away.

Naruto-kun?

"Yeah?"

I am not exactly sure where you are right now. It feels like…

"Oh! This is Gaara's house." He could hear her delighted stammering in his head, "I was kind of gross after crossing the desert so he made me wash up. Ero-sensei went to bed already."

Gaara-kun and Haku-kun must be so happy to see you! Hinata's voice reached new, squeaky heights.

Naruto's facial muscles froze in an unconvincing smile, "Yeah. They are. I think…" He cleared his throat a little, "I'm the most excited."

Hee hee! I can't wait to talk to them again. It's been too long. Hinata added, When will the Accelerated Exam start, Naruto-kun?

"The day after tomorrow…uh…at least that's what I remember the invitation saying."

Is Haku-kun participating?

"Nah…he's kind of…busy with something else." He phrased it feebly.

Oh. Her silence was thoughtful before she went on, I don't know if there will be other Leaf applicants who will join you.

"Me neither. Gaara told me there were only two others, and one of them may be disqualified already."
Something about paperwork…" Naruto relaxed a bit more, "Even if I have to meet new people and work with them, it'll be fine. I've done that sort of thing before."

That's good! I'm confident you will pass.

"Thanks."

But really, what I want most of all… Hinata had subconsciously arranged his hands to fidget, pointer-fingers aligned …is for you to be home. I'm trying to be patient, but I catch myself daydreaming about it all of the time.

"Yeah?" Naruto shut his eyes while smiling.

I keep thinking about you visiting me at my house, like you used to. While I gardened or spent time with my family…I liked how you would surprise me sometimes. A small sigh sounded in his head, When I know you're home I'll rush through my routines and team obligations a little.

"I might do that too." He admitted, "I might…bug you, every day."

N-No— I mean! You won't bother me. I want to see you every day, Naruto.

"Good, because it's going to be hard for me to keep my distance." Mischievousness inched into his grin, "I might squeeze you a little when I hug you."

I would like tha—

"Sneak up on you from behind, sometimes…"

She promised sweetly, If I notice, I'll pretend I didn't.

"Maybe I could get away with holding your hand while we walk around town?"

I don't see why anyone should object to that!

"Some people don't like me."

I don't care what they think. Hinata asserted.

"Phew." Naruto's smile stretched a bit more, "I guess we shouldn't care. Though I won't…kiss you in front of anyone."

—! Her bashfulness was evident.

"So…" His voice was a touch lower, "It's not going to be like it was when I left, you know."

What isn't?

"Kissing."

Oh. She inadvertently made him gulp.

"I'll probably…be closer to you— be more greedy." Naruto supposed, "Maybe not so shy and innocent."

I…I... Hinata composed herself …don't mind that.

"Well, why don't you tell me what you'd like?" He adopted a rakish, flirtatious tone, "I'm definitely going to kiss you when I get back, Hinata…but how do you want me to do it?"

A stir of commotion in the bathwater revealed that Hinata's tendency to fidget was manifest. She clamored nonsensically in Naruto's head for a few seconds. Then she went quiet.

Naruto apologized in case that had been a step too far, "Sorry…I didn't say that to embarrass you."

"It's alright…if you…really want to know... Hinata raised his hand up and poked Naruto's face with a fingertip, Kiss me here.

"Just on the cheek? That's kid stuff."

There's nothing wrong with that.

"Is that what you really want?" He asked.

…but not really.

"Then where?"

She tapped his lips and Naruto grinned again, feeling vindicated.

I want…many kisses, Naruto-kun.

"For you, I have an endless supply."

Not just my mouth… She worked up some courage, Would you…kiss here too? Hinata prodded his shoulder.

The idea still seemed within bounds, at least he thought so. Naruto concurred, "I sure will."

Then his hand traveled laterally and rested on his neck, And here.

A fluttering sensation stirred in his stomach, a heat that was both coy and hungry rising up to color his face. Naruto agreed slowly, "…and there. I will."

Hinata did nothing more after that. She didn't have to. His mind had already wandered ahead to other conclusions, anticipating what she would want. It was thrilling for all of a moment before Naruto had to lean back and cross his arm over his eyes, trying to calm down. How many times would he have to cope with the embarrassment of his girlfriend being completely aware of how turned on he was?

...I'll... There was a satisfied, rascally edge to Hinata's voice, Go home now.

He replied in a short breath, "Yeah, maybe…"

I promise I will talk to you again in a few days, Naruto-kun.

"Okay, that's fine. Uh…" Naruto cleared his throat softly, "Should I be apologizing for…anything…just now?"

Never. Her answer was bold.

Then, just as suddenly as she has appeared to him, Hinata departed. Naruto wondered at the speed with which she had gone from being timid about encountering him in a bathtub…to teasing him and maybe even approving of the compromising position she had him in. Naruto took several deep breaths and tried to relax, I have no idea how I'm supposed to…keep my cool around her when I get home.' He slumped down in the water, 'Just when I think I'm clever and sexy, Hinata schools me…!' Before his imagination could meander again, Naruto rose up from the tub and drained it. He dried off while grumbling to himself, trying to reason with a boner that really needed to quit it. Eventually, the excitement subsided and he ventured down the hall to his guest room, rummaging for sleep clothes in his travel bag. Naruto dressed and then fetched a toothbrush. He hung his towel to dry in the washroom and brushed his teeth, still tangled in thought, 'It's alright. It's awesome seeing Hinata go beyond that shy side of hers—not that I minded it! She was still cute! But I like every side of her. I can't wait to…learn more about her.'

Good grief was he easily aroused. Frustrated, Naruto spat and rinsed in the bathroom sink and shook himself from head to toe like a dog, trying to get a grip. It was too risky to think about her even for a few seconds. He was wired to respond to even the barest hints of his girlfriend. It was going to be challenging seeing Hinata on a daily basis without making a fool of himself. Naruto calmed down again and examined his reflection in the mirror, 'Oh. I put my shirt on inside out.' He pulled it off, corrected it, and slipped it back on, 'I'm losing my damn mind.'

He arrived in Gaara's room unceremoniously, and was confused by the sight of his friend bent over a writing desk. "You're not still working, are you?" Naruto wondered.

"Technically, no." Gaara spoke over his shoulder, "I'm just making note of what my sister told me today. And Sensei's plan. In the event all of this…spirals out of control…I need to keep my facts straight if I am asked to explain it to the Hokage."

"Oh." Naruto understood.

"Tsunade-sama would not only be displeased with my lying about Haku…but that you and Sensei were complicit in it as well." He finished scribbling on a notebook page and leaned back in his desk chair with a sigh, "It's in our best interest that we make things right."

"Well, it's kind of tricky trying to figure out how to do that." Naruto sat crossed-legged on a nearby bed, "Ero-sensei wants to see what he can do for Haku, so…we just need to focus on the Exam for now. After that, we'll go over what we've learned and see how we're supposed to react."

"What if it meant you could not return to Hidden Leaf right away? If we had to respond quickly to help Haku?" Gaara pushed up from his seat and shut off a desk lamp.

Quietly Naruto admitted, "That…wouldn't be great…but I'd—"

"You've been away from home long enough, Naruto." The room grew heavy with silence as the fact hung there, and that both understood it would be highly impractical of Naruto to travel to another nation for a reason not yet disclosed to the Hokage. He keened over with a groan, mashing his face onto a folded throw blanket. He wanted to help Haku. He also wanted to go home and begin streamlining his life again.

Gaara fiddled around the room putting books away on shelves and laying out clothing for the morning over an armchair in the corner. "Naruto," He said, "Don't feel guilty about it."

"I can't just—!"

"I am the one who let Haku go in the first place." Gaara reminded him, "Therefore, I need to do something about this.

"What kind of a friend am I if I'm not helping you guys?" No matter who's responsible for what?" Naruto flattened out on his back lengthwise.

Gaara assured him, "You're still a good friend. You just need to accept there are things you must prioritize. As I have."

"Huh."

In the opposite direction, Gaara settled down on the bedspread parallel to Naruto, studying the cracks of the ceiling. He shut his eyes after a while and folded his hands on his chest. He was dealing with the stress better than he had earlier, Naruto noticed.

"So…you haven't actually told anyone else about this situation, have you?" Naruto was curious.

"No, I haven't. I dislike having to lie to Sakura every time she asks about Haku." Gaara admitted.

"Same here. When Hinata asked me about him before, I didn't like fibbing…"

Gaara cracked an eye open, "What?"

"Oh. I…talked to Hinata." Naruto explained haltingly, "…while in your bathtub."

Gaara swiveled his head to glower at his discourteous guest.

"Come on, she surprises me every time she uses her jutsu and overlaps with my consciousness. Don't get mad at me." Naruto defended, "We have to talk a lot! It keeps us updated. Keeps the romance alive…"

"Don't keep romance alive in my bathroom."

"Chill out. You're just jealous you don't have a radio-brain communication method to talk to Sakura every day." Naruto teased.

"I am, actually."

"It's weird."

"It must be." Gaara empathized, "I watched Hinata use your jutsu in the Tournament."

"Yeah, I didn't really think that one through…" Naruto conceded, "I just want to put in the extra effort before I go home because…I didn't get to speak or write to Hinata for a while. I almost died in the Toad Valley and I was—"

Gaara held up a hand to pause the narrative, "You nearly died?"

"Well, I nearly became a toad statue permanently." Naruto amended.

"How?"

"If someone absorbs too much Natural Energy without mixing it properly with their own chakra, it's possible to that they'll petrify into a toad statue." Naruto folded his arms under his head, "There are a lot of risks involved with Senjutsu training, and I thought I was being careful enough."

Gaara seemed mildly alarmed, "You didn't tell me you could have died doing that."

"I'm fine." Naruto pointed out.
"If something happened to you…"

"There'd be nothing anyone could do about it. Ero-sensei, Ma and Pa told me their hands were pretty much tied when I turned to stone." Naruto recalled, "But they said…the Fox saved me."

Shifting sideways to pay better attention to the odd tale, Gaara blinked, impressed, "So you've made progress?"

"With what?"

"Getting to know your Tailed Beast."

"No."

"That is something that you need to do." Gaara insisted.

A dry reply, "Things seem to be okay as they are."

"I hope that soon you'll see the sense in establishing something better than okay." Gaara was sincere, "That's what you both need. I trust Shukaku with my life."

"You have got to be kidding me. That thing nearly wrecked Konoha—!"

"He's not a thing, Naruto."

Naruto blew an irritated raspberry, "I don't get it. How can you change your minds and become friends just like that? How do you know the One-Tail isn't going to kill everyone you know and love?"

"He won't." Gaara said simply.

"That doesn't help me understand any better."

"I can't be the one to make you understand. You need to find your own way to understand each other." He consoled Naruto, "You can. Open yourself up. Be willing to get hurt again, even if it's frightening. Be willing to listen."

"I…"

"Sakura listened to me, when I told her." Gaara added.

Shocked, Naruto sat up slightly when he heard the news, "You told her you're a jinchuriki?"

"I did. She wasn't afraid or upset at all. Although…Sakura had an unusually broad education on Biju and their origins, so that certainly helped." Gaara recalled, "She said that introducing me to her parents was more nerve-wracking, by far."

"She kind of always was gutsy." Naruto was nodding to himself.

"I like her parents."

"Do ya? I heard they can be a little overbearing."

"They can. We still get along."

"That's good!" Naruto was thrilled with the news, "So, you're kind of set up then! Covering your bases in case—"

"I want to spend my life with her." Gaara's interruption was heartfelt.

Naruto hushed up and stared at him. His friend definitely meant it.

"When I'm not occupied by official tasks or things that need my attention, I've been modeling my future and anticipating how I'll retire from being Kazekage." Gaara filled him in.

After a few beats of confusion, Naruto picked his ear with a pinky finger as if he had misheard, "I'm sorry, what was that?"

"If I can, I would like to retire from my position as Kazekage in the next few years. It could take longer to get things settled." Gaara made it clear as day for his friend, "While I am honored by this responsibility, it's helped me realize what I actually want to do. I would rather marry Sakura and raise our children in the Leaf Village."

He barely made it through the statement before Naruto was sitting upright and beating the faux-chinchilla fur throw with a fist because he could hardly contain his emotions. His face said he was troubled by Gaara's choice to forsake a Kage position (a sore spot for Naruto,) but his laughter indicated that he approved of Gaara's intentions. It reminded Naruto that his friend was a leader. Gaara was the wind's shadow. And he wouldn't always be.

"That's— you want to—!" Naruto lifted the folded blanket and cheerfully walloped Gaara in the head with it, "...holy shit. You're gonna do that for real? Did you talk to her about all of that-!"

"I did."

Naruto continued beating him happily, "So she's cool with all of that— and you'll be in Leaf! You'll probably have an army of grumpy kids with cute chubby cheeks, and I could be their uncle and—"

"I've only been able to negotiate 1.5 children so far, due to Sakura's stubbornness. I'll round that up to 2."

"—crap and you've gotta get married, so you'll have to take missions again and make money obviously—" Naruto was grinning, "So you can still be on a team with me and Haku, if you wanted!"

"It's possible. High-level missions may require us to join different squads or complete solo assignments." Gaara shielded his face when he got tired of being smacked with a blanket, "I may answer to you someday when you are Hokage."

Naruto ceased the beating to consider it, "Whoa. I never thought of that."

"I'll try not to tell you how to do your job," Gaara quipped. For that, Naruto gave him a final face-slam.

Eventually, Naruto tilted over while chuckling uncontrollably. He still remembered the days in which Gaara had been too hesitant to reveal his true feelings or be close to others. To hear from his friend that he wanted love and family, which they had never been lucky enough to enjoy as children, was a precious, momentous thing. Naruto thought of Haku, who had also expressed his wish for a simple life. Their dreams echoed one another.

Gaara fussed at pillows to prop his head up with. He was tired but also interested in talking, at least until Naruto gave up and retired next door to sleep.
"That's awesome." Naruto concluded.

"Let's see if I can make it happen. There will be obstacles, like Haku's safety, for example. The Akatsuki and inter-village squabbles won't make anything easier." Gaara listed some hindrances.

"You don't have to deal with all of that on your own." Naruto assured him, "And...uh...are you sure you'd want to leave Hidden Sand?"

"Reasonably sure, not completely sure. Much of my family's history is here. And Temari and Kankuro will probably stay."

Naruto added, "It's just something to think about. I wonder if Sakura-chan would be alright with moving to Suna...?"

"She offered. I don't think it's right to take her away from her family and friends. I also doubt Tsunade-sama would appreciate it. She has come to depend on Sakura for many things..." Gaara's head sank back into a goose-down pillow, "It doesn't matter what I have to do or give up...I just want her."

"Hmm." Naruto gave his friend a suspicious look.

Gaara reclaimed his throw blanket, wrapping himself in it as if he were ssambap.

"You haven't outright told me yet, but I think I already know..." Naruto mumbled.

"Know what?"

"You've had sex."

Gaara held quite a poker face before confirming it, "I have."

"Like, a lot?"

"Only a few times. Sometimes I get carried away thinking about it, though." Gaara stared at the ceiling again, "I think maybe Sakura gets as distracted as I do."

"Probably." Naruto laid there for a while thinking and then said, "It's strange. I remember how much you liked her when we were younger...and you never did anything. Never said anything. You were shy, kind of like Hinata was."

He didn't notice Gaara puffing his cheeks slightly in protest, disagreeing.

"I mean, the only time you spoke up was usually when you were steaming mad, remember?" Naruto snickered, "Then you yelled at whoever ticked you off: Me, Haku, Sakura, Sato...anyone."

"I make a point not to do that anymore."

"Except when your sister pisses you off." Naruto dug at him.

"Drop it." Gaara sniffed.

"Fine, but then...how did you figure out, you know...that you were going to do it?" Naruto dared ask the controversial question, "Did you plan it? Or did you ask Sakura?"

Gaara recalled, "Actually, she planned it."
Wide-eyed, Naruto gave his friend a flustered look.

"The timing was…well. I didn't expect it. I just wanted to be honest with her about being a jinchuriki. I had no idea that she wanted to…" Gaara stopped, realizing he hadn't given the milestone in his relationship much thought, "I didn't think she wanted me that way."

"Wow." Naruto was likewise stumped, "Guess it helps that she just outright told you."

"It was acute clarification."

"I have no idea what I'm supposed to do about Hinata." The words tumbled out before Naruto could stop himself from oversharing. He slapped his forehead slightly when Gaara redirected his attention on the new subject.

"What do you mean, what you're supposed to do?"

"She…I think…it's not subtle anymore." Naruto chipped off some words, embarrassed, "I think we…know. We talk about the future and…flirt…all the time."

"You've corrupted her with your bad influence." Gaara smirked.

"No. I know perfectly well Hinata doesn't have to do anything for me, and I reminded her of that. But that's…beside the point now." He inhaled deeply before going on, "Hinata wants to…and I just don't know…what it's going to be like living at home— doing everything by the book, if there even is such a thing. Like, how am I going to avoid making her dad and clan hate me? Are we even allowed to date? I can't figure out how I'm going to stand next to her and not go crazy, just ask Ero-sensei, I've—"

A pillow clobbered Naruto in the face.

"You'll learn." Gaara said flatly, "If you care, you'll take the time to learn and respect her and her traditions. And if she wants to be intimate and you decide to go for it, that really won't change much."

"It won't?"

"It won't if you're cautious. I imagine Hinata will be, going off of the fact that Sakura is one of her closest friends. They discuss things just as we do."

"Huh. You're right."

"If you have questions I will do my best to answer them." Gaara offered.

"I've gotten graphic details from Ero-sensei's books, but I might need to sift reality from fiction based on what I read." Naruto was hugging the pillow at that point.

Gaara agreed, "You might."

"Hey, do you think Haku—?" Naruto got a second, more painful pillow to the face, "Ow! What the hell is the matter with you?"

"Don't bring him up." Gaara growled.

"I wasn't bringing him up in the current context." Naruto informed him, "You are hair-trigger, ya jerk."
"Hmf."

"I was just going to ask if you think Haku would want to stay in Leaf if you end up living there. But maybe that's not a good idea. Not until you are over this petty shit." Naruto prognosticated, "If your sister stays in Sand he probably will too."

"Naruto, this isn't up for discussion." Gaara hissed.

"I think it should be. You need to talk about it to emotionally unconstipate yourself." He shifted on his stomach and crushed the offended pillows beneath him, "Here's a fact: Haku told me he wants to have a family. He doesn't want a high position or grandeur—he never cared about that stuff." Naruto went on, "So take that how you will. It's why he doesn't give a crap about these Exams, because the way he sees it—he can take an Exam whenever. But I'm confused about why you're mad that he cares about your sister. Haku would probably do anything for her. I think that makes him trustworthy."

"There are times when I need convincing that Haku is in fact still good and trustworthy." Gaara admitted, "And most of the time, I am unbothered by the fact that he and Temari return each other's affections…" He reluctantly explained himself, "I regret letting him go when we set out for Suna. That is what frustrates me."

"Just that?"

"I thought I was doing what a friend should by letting Haku search for his clan, but I didn't have much time to think it through." He exhaled roughly, "Shortly after that, Suna was searching for candidates and then nominated me to be Kazekage. Nothing about that process was simple or enjoyable. It was chaotic. If Haku had been there with me, I think of how different the transition would have been. Even now, having his support and guidance could significantly help things."

Naruto stewed over those details and listened to Gaara's summation.

"There is no talking Temari out of her pursuits, and if she wants him, Haku has no resistances when it comes to her. I may not like it, but I know I can't trifle with what they have." Gaara wrenched his pillows out from beneath Naruto to return them to their original spaces, "Yet I see how this dangerous waste of time and the distance between us can jeopardize everything. Sensei is even obligated to intervene, at his own peril. We need Jiraiya now more than ever, as adults. I don't want to risk losing him and Haku."

"I get that." Naruto nodded, "Though could you…try not to take your worries out on everyone? Your sister's safe now. And Ero-sensei knows what he's doing. If we take this piece by piece it's not so bad. We're smarter than we used to be."

With a small grunt, Gaara conceded to his point.

"If you're not going to cry and have a nervous breakdown, I'm off to sleep." Naruto gave his friend's arm a slap, "We've got to be up bright and early for tomorrow!"

By morning, the Leaf guests were fed and dressed, providing Gaara with joking commentary as they observed him go about his typical rounds as Kazekage in the village.

"See that statue gallery in there?" Jiraiya pointed out seated figures through the window of the council building. Naruto glimpsed inside with an impish smile.

"You know those councilors are alive." Gaara said archly.
"You can hardly tell." Naruto was restraining a flood of teasing that could get him walloped.

"I forgot how crumbly and old the elders are in this village." Jiraiya muttered, "We can be impressed that they've outlasted many of their peers in other villages, but I bet it inhibits progressive policy in Suna."

"Why don't you go soften their stances on inter-village policy and public programs? I could use an advocate." Gaara held the building's door open. He was surprised when Jiraiya decided to make himself useful and went in to schmooze Sand elders.

"Think they'll listen to him?" Naruto wondered as they walked away.

"I have no idea."

"What now? Can I shadow you while you finish the rest of your duties?"

"You can, but I need to stop at the hospital to bring Temari home. She's been discharged."

With that, Naruto accompanied him to keep peace between the two Sand siblings on the journey back to the mansion. It was pleasantly surprising to find that Gaara was not as irritated as he'd been the day before, and Temari had re-examined her role in the disaster while making apologies. Naruto beamed at their brief hug outside of the house. The sentiments did not last due to a turban-wearing Chunin jogging up to Gaara with a stricken look on his face.

Gaara turned to the subordinate, "Are you alright, Enoru?"

"Kazekage-sama, I know this will sound unusual, but I was on my way to the communications tower when I noticed a carrier pigeon get killed by one of our returning hawks. It wasn't well trained so I apologize…I didn't know a message was coming in for Gama-sennin." He caught his breath, holding out a hand with a scroll flecked red at the edges from the pigeon's accidental demise.

"I don't think he was expecting any correspondence. The Hokage sends things to him via messenger hawk." Gaara accepted the message and unrolled it. He dismissed Enoru.

"Who sends something by pigeon?" Temari was leaning against the doorframe as she and Naruto waited for Gaara's assessment.

"I don't know this person." Gaara said as he scanned the end.

"Let me see it." Naruto pulled the parchment flat when Gaara gave it to him. He trolled his eyes over the panicked, messy scrawl on paper to the signed name, "Obito!"

Gaara and Temari gave him puzzled looks.

"He's—!" Shoulders taught, Naruto froze and realized it would be difficult to explain, "He's…uh…" Naruto rolled up the scroll. "He's one of Ero-sensei's spies…and used to live in Konoha."

"You've met?" Gaara asked.

"Yeah, he's got a really cute kid!"

Mercifully, Jiraiya was marching up the street, visibly annoyed that Sand's counselors had not warmly welcomed his intrusion. He joined the gaggle at the front of the house and could not say a word before Naruto shoved a message in his face, "-eh! What're you-?"

"Ero-sensei, I think something's wrong! I didn't read it all." Naruto stuffed the scroll in his master's hand, "Obito sent this with some country bumpkin messenger bird!"

Jiraiya's eyes stretched to the size of saucers, alarmed. He hastily read the correspondence.

_Jiraiya-sama,_

_I'm sorry about the arrival of this message— I am in transit at the moment with few means of communication in the Land of Rivers. Immediately after the Akatsuki's most recent meeting, I left to hurry ahead to the Land of Waves. Any day now, the leader of the Akatsuki known as "Pein" will be making his way there personally to capture the Six-Tails jinchuriki. I don't believe I can stop him… but I will do everything in my power to the help the people of the Tide Village and warn them of what's coming."

Jiraiya looked up to rub the corners of his eyes, unnerved. The sound of his pupils' inquiries was garbled and drowned out as he continued on.

_I haven't been able to reach out to Rin. The outpost here only had one carrier pigeon. Please tell her I'm sorry. I had every intention of going home to her and Yuma. She won't be pleased that I'm running late. Well, to tell the truth I don't know what will happen. I haven't been doing well recently. I think it started months ago, I'm not sure—but for the last eight weeks solid, I've been hallucinating. I don't know how to describe it exactly. At first I thought it was my imagination or an illness…but I suspect something is wrong with my Sharingan."

_These delusions can make it hard to fight properly. If I don't come back, please make sure Rin and Yuma get to the Leaf Village as quickly as possible. With things as they are now, I want them somewhere safe. Our home is not as secure as it used to be."

Naruto's voice came in clear, disrupting, "What's he traveling for? Going south—?"

"Shut it, kid, this is a report on the Akatsuki!" Jiraiya hissed.

_Please request reinforcements to be sent to the Tide Village. We don't have much time at all. Keep your students safe, as the Akatsuki has agreed to study and attack targets assigned to them, including the Kazekage and Naruto. Both of Kumogakure's jinchuriki and the Seven-Tails jinchuriki will also be surveilled. I fear they may already have sunk their claws into the Four and Three-Tails, but I have no definitive confirmation."

_If you can, find me in the Land of Waves. Take care.

Obito_

A great, dampening lethargy seemed to sweep over Jiraiya, making him stand with eyes unseeing as he stared down a long avenue into the heart of Sunagakure. He didn't even notice Gaara pluck the scroll from his hand, concerned about its contents. Naruto patted his master's back, trying to snap him out of his funk.

"If he doesn't have anything witty to say," Temari assessed, "Then things have gone to shit already."

Naruto shared a brainwave with her, "You are exactly right. I don't think I've ever seen him like this." He gave Jiraiya a small shake, "Ero-sensei? What happened?"

"…I'm just…taking a second." Jiraiya rested his hands on his hips, gave his back a stretch, and groaned, "Fuck me sideways…there may be no fixing this…"

Gaara closed the space of their circle halfway through reading the message, jutting his chin up
"Why does this spy of yours complain about complications with his Sharingan?"

Temari and Naruto gasped, and were then bulldozed indoors as Jiraiya spread his arms and pushed the three youngsters into the house. The door creaked shut behind him as they shuffled in, listening to Jiraiya's justification through gritted teeth, "Gaara. Don't utter dangerous words in public spaces. This is a fucking mess. There's not enough time to explain a fraction of what's going on here."

"Then I need your cheat notes version of it," Gaara demanded, "Or Tsunade-sama will be hearing of this."

Jiraiya gave his insubordinate student's earlobe a yank as a penalty, "You want to kill me? Tsunade can't hear about this until she is seated and liquored up. Stone cold sober and she'd pop my head off like a beer cap…" He held his forehead and shifted from foot to foot, "How far is the Tide Village from here? Can I get there in less than a day at top speed? How about an elite squad of yours?"

Gaara had batted Jiraiya's hand away and rubbed his sore ear. He finished reading the message and then returned it to Naruto, where Temari read it over his shoulder.

"You'll need a day and a quarter, at minimum. And you can't move that fast." Gaara estimated, "My best available team now probably won't arrive before two days' time, but it will have to do." He made a hand sign to create a Shadow Clone, which promptly set out to summon Sand ninja. Gaara added to Jiraiya, "I'll have them ready for you as soon as I can, and I'm sending a warning to the Hokage…without one alarming detail." He crossed his arms.

"Uchiha Obito," Jiraiya began, "Is a one-eyed teddy bear of a human being who lives with his family in a northern mountain pass in the Land of Earth. He's been getting me intel on the Akatsuki for years."

Gaara was back on a steed comprised of pure skepticism, "He's trustworthy?"

Temari tacked on, "How is there another Uchiha living?"

"I'll tell you, but the both of you guarantee this information does not get to another living soul, understood?" Jiraiya pointed a finger in each of their faces, "He was never around for the Uchiha massacre. He's been considered KIA because his team believed he died on a mission in the last war. Obito was a crippled amnesiac used for labor and henchman work by early Akatsuki members. I found him after I dragged Naruto, Gaara, and Haku back to Hidden Leaf when they were little snot-nosed brats. We agreed to work with each other to get info to Leaf."

"A cripple with one eye." Gaara, now half-believing the explanation, could not see utility in such an individual.

"Yep, Obito gets around just fine. Until now he did, at any rate." Jiraiya disclosed off-handedly, "His other Sharingan eye is with Kakashi."

That nearly blew the collective brain matter out of Gaara and Temari's heads, while Naruto just nodded understandingly. Since he was previously made aware of such sensitive information he could keep some composure. Jiraiya was making his way up the stairs to retrieve his travel bag and other necessities.

Naruto filled the silence with the Sand siblings as they stood in a daze in the living room.

"We can't help." Naruto wilted at the thought, "This Akatsuki guy…sounds like bad news."
Temari's distant, foggy reply, "Yeah."

"I should go to the office…write to every contact I have." Gaara supposed.

"Gaara…didn't you say you know the jinchuriki in the Tide Village?" Naruto recalled.

"Utakata." Gaara confirmed, "Kankuro, Temari, and I have gotten to know him. Even in so little time, he's become a friend to many in Shiogakure."

"How are we supposed to divide up Jounin assigned to supervise portions of the Exam tomorrow? It's at least three days contracted work, and 122 foreign Genin will be here." Temari tugged on one of her pigtails in frustration, "We don't have the manpower to deal with the Akatsuki right now, Gaara. We have to keep our teams here."

"I know that." He took a deep breath.

"Then Baa-chan is going to have to send teams from Leaf." Naruto's solution sounded simple enough.

"I don't know if she can do that with enough speed." Gaara motioned for them to follow as Jiraiya descended the stairs and exited through the front door, "It may take days for a response from Konoha. That's assuming she has cells ready that can deal with S-ranked criminals. She's already kept me in a loop regarding the movements of Dintei Bi's faction, Orochimaru, and emerging intrigue within Hidden Leaf— though it was kept vague."

"She'll do what she can." Naruto insisted.

"None of us doubt that, Naruto." Gaara agreed, "It's just that…the Akatsuki picked an ideal time in which other villages are occupied."

"There have to be snitches in our villages, then…slipping information to the Akatsuki." Temari gathered as they followed behind Jiraiya to the administrative building, "They waited for Sand's Exam and Leaf's committing of platoons to track other criminals."

Gaara was bristling, "It's time I find such turncoats and stamp them out."

Obito was nervous as hell.

It had been two full days and nights of running south, with hardly any breaks. He was exhausted, hungry, and feeling incredibly vulnerable without a mask. He'd taken it off to be less conspicuous while passing through the Land of Rivers and a portion of the Land of Fire. At the coast, he finally stopped in a seaside gift shop to buy snacks and power bars.

The cashier gave him a strange look, "There's a café about a kilometer from here, you know. Just across the Great Naruto Bridge."

"Thanks, I need to…eat now." Obito plopped down on an oversized beach cooler. He cramned food in his mouth and wished other customers would pop into the store to make things less awkward. The cashier blatantly stared at Obito's scarred face.

"I just ran a marathon and you looking at me like that makes me self-conscious." Obito barked moodily, "I know I'm overdue for some cosmetic work, alright?"

"Sorry! I didn't mean to—"
Obito waved it off and chewed.

"So…" The teenaged store attendant leaned on the counter, "Was it a charity run? Sometimes they organize those in the Tide Village."

"Not exactly." Obito was glancing around at racks of beach wear and clothing, "Hey…what do people like to wear in Shiogakure? I'm headed there now."

"Oh! Well we just got a lot of new t-shirts and tanks in. I see people buy our jackets a lot. They're pretty soft. That blue section over there is what villagers gravitate to." The kid perked up, smelling a sale, "You interested?"

"Yeah." Obito rubbed his chin while stuffing the last of a granola bar in his mouth, "What's that?"

"A wetsuit."

"I like it. Give me that sweatshirt there." He pointed the boy towards the blue jackets on the wall. It wasn't that he was genuinely interested in any beach shop nonsense, but rather Obito wanted to look as unrecognizable as possible. If he crossed the Akatsuki again, he didn't want to blow Tobi's identity.

In a twist, the boy offered a discount and talked Obito into not just the sweatshirt, but knock-off Tide Village fatigues (on sale), silicone gel bracelets, unnecessary layering tank tops, and even sunscreen. Obito stood at the counter and wondered why he was shelling out so many notes again. Rin would have his head. Before paying, he noticed recreational swimming goggles on a display. He smiled at the sight of it.

"Going swimming after the race?" The shop keeper sure hoped so.

Obito lifted an orange-tinted pair of goggles and tested the band around his head, amused that they fit. He handed over the money, "I'll take these too."

After that, to the shop keeper's eternal confusion, Obito went to the changing room and shed his dark, muddy clothing for the colorful, nonsensical get up he had just bought. He slung a travel bag on his back, stuffed his dirty clothing into it, and saluted the teenager as he strode out.

'I hope I look like the cringiest tourist there ever was.' Obito thought to himself. He feared that maybe such a move was still Tobi-like, but the Akatsuki didn't know him well enough to detect it.

He took off in a swift run, slightly bolstered by the junk he'd eaten. At the entrance of the Great Naruto Bridge, he realized he would be dodging herds of tourists and beach-goers. Obito kept up the pace and avoided them, 'I can't believe this bridge is named after Naruto…and all of these people are here daily! Do they even know who Naruto is?.' He expected at least Tide Villagers would know. He also had to think about what his next move was, 'I know I need to warn the administrators and Jounin in Tide as soon as possible…but I really need to let Rin know what's going on.'

After the crossing onto the island, Obito noticed fortified barracks with ninja coming and going. Behind it was a communication center, where trained osprey and seagulls were entrusted with messages by their handlers. Obito hung a right and decided to try his luck with sending a scroll north, 'This doesn't look as ramshackle as that pigeon coop I went to...' Past a picnic area and wooden gate, he arrived at a front desk where a kunoichi with a Tide headband was seated. She got one look at Obito and immediately judged him.

"Need directions?" She asked while examining her fingernails.
"No, thanks. I need to send a message." Obito said politely.

"Citizens and visitors send their correspondence at the post office, or express center where couriers can fulfill requests." The kunoichi droned in boredom, "231 Main Street on the left."

"I can't send my message with a courier, it needs to be a messenger hawk that knows how to reach the Land of Earth." Obito explained, "My town, Shincha, is very small. It's ninja related business, so I'm in the right place."

"It is?" She quirked a brow at him, "You're a ninja?"

"Yeah." He was getting impatient.

"You're not a Tide ninja…"

"Obviously not. I'm a Leaf ninja."

"You just said you live in Shincha…?"

"I do."

"Well your outfit is ridiculous and you have no headband." The girl said dismissively, "Quit pulling my leg! Get out of here before I call a supervisor."

"I don't have time for you to hassle me about how I look. I'm here to protect your village from the Akatsuki!" Obito dropped his hands on the counter with a thump, "So get your supervisor or whatever! I need someone to—!

"Is there a problem over here?" A boy poked his face around the corner, frowning. He was a Genin.

"Inari! Get this bozo out of here! He says he's a ninja but he's just some nut trying to use the messenger hawk system." The girl complained.

Inari strolled inside with his hands in his pockets, giving Obito the up and down, "Wow."

"Please don't waste my time." Obito took a breath to relax, "I need to send a message and then speak to someone in charge. I have a warning about the Akatsuki."

"The Akatsuki?" Inari at least had a clue, "He's talking about the Akatsuki and you're trying to kick him out? That's serious!" He motioned to Obito with a hand, "You're a ninja right? Follow me. I'll help you send your message."

"Thanks." Obito gratefully followed the boy to the interior of the building, "Are Tide ninja aware of the threat level the Akatsuki poses? Even villages of your size should be mindful."

"They're all still learning and getting the memos." Inari snarked as he climbed the stairs, "My grandpa is the leader of the village for now, so the top brass knows what's up! A lot of my friends are Jounin, so you can talk to them after this." He pushed a door open and Obito stepped into an aviary, "I'll get you a pen and paper. What was your name again?"

"Obito." He shook the boy's outstretched hand, "I work for the Toad Sage."

Inari grinned, "No wa-aaaaay!"

"Way."
"So! Hidden Leaf!" Inari laughed, "I've got friends there." He handed over the implements as Obito bent over a writing table and tapped out a message for his family.

"By any chance is one of your friends the namesake of the great bridge of this island?" Obito teased.

"Yeah actually!"

"I thought so." He smiled a little, "I also know Naruto."

"Hm! Small world."
In the morning, Naruto woke to a quiet house. He discovered a note from Gaara on the kitchen table:

Eat. I had to get up early to coordinate with Exam proctors. Report to the village gate by 8:00AM and take your number tag with you. You will see me later. — Gaara

"Hmm." Naruto lifted up a lanyard with the number seven on its plastic tag, "I guess this is how I'm going to get matched with teammates today…"

He riffled around cabinets and the refrigerator to whip up a half-decent bowl of ramen garnished with vegetables. Naruto ate sleepily, cleaned up, and then dressed in his room, snapping weapon clips on beneath his red sage cloak. He tied his Leaf headband with pride.

'Ero-sensei left in a hurry yesterday with the Sand squad Gaara put together…and I think Gaara and his sister still can't believe what that message said…' Naruto remembered they had looked stupefied for the entire day, though they had agreed not to repeat the secret they'd learned.

There seemed to be a buzz around the Sand Village as Naruto zipped over rooftops, watching villagers scurry below. Store fronts opened in the dim light, tents were raised up in rows to prepare for market sales…no Academy-age or younger children to be seen. 'It's still too early…'

It was a rather nice place, Naruto thought to himself. Sunagakure had a sensible layout of streets, tucked in the sheltering cliff of a plateau for defense and shade. He noticed that many of the buildings were older than those found in the Leaf Village. Fewer internal attacks and ambushes had likely spared the city's infrastructure. Newer looking buildings peppered the landscape here and there, shiny and sophisticated, as if designed by artists. Scents of food and cooking oils wafted up from restaurants as the day got underway.

To satisfy his innate, boundless curiosity, Naruto scaled the tall perimeter wall of the village to stand at its top. The view of the vast desert was a cheap thrill, warming his blood. 'I thought the Toad Valley had a view…but this is a tough one to beat.' He smiled, This is it! It's been a while since I worked in a group or took an Exam. I can't be too big for my britches. For all I know Gaara designed something to really grind me down…'

He peeked over the ledge of the gargantuan wall, seeing the gradual accumulation of Exam contestants below at the gate. Naruto palmed his anchor-kunai, spun it once round his finger and then let it fly—sinking into the wood scaffolding beside the gate. He flashed there without a single soul noticing.

Naruto extracted the knife before hopping down to the ground, turning his head left and right to get an eyeful of the gathering. It was a young, soft-spoken group, if he could make a first impression of them. With a few more steps, Naruto understood that Sand Chunin in turbans were lined up with numbered signs held in their hands. He strode over to a kunoichi waving the number seven, who seemed pleased to see him.

"Ah! My first applicant." She brightened at the sight of him, "Name?"
"Morning! Uzumaki Naruto."

"Yes, you're on Team Seven for today."

The kunoichi nodded as she glanced over the names on the back of her card, "We'll get started once everyone is here."

Naruto nodded, trying to ward off some of the excitement that would make him twitchy. 'Look at this! There are a lot of teams from Hidden Sand. I think that's a Cloud team over there…' There was no sign of Gaara, though a few Jounin were manning the security checkpoint. The crowd grew denser and louder as the hour of commencement approached. Naruto let himself doze on his feet a little. Then a voice came from behind him, "Oh! Naruto!"

Naruto wiped a spit bubble from his lip and turned around, beholding a young man a few finger lengths shorter than him. He was pale with dark hair pulled into a short ponytail, and had unmistakable white eyes. A number seven lanyard was hanging around the boy's neck.

"Hey there! Do I…know you?" Naruto was a bit more alert, able to recognize a Hyuga from leagues away.

"I'm Fujita! I've never had the chance to talk to you, though it feels like I have because of Hinata-sama's stories." Fujita twiddled his hands in the wide sleeves of his airy, black-and-white tunic, "Neji-sama and Hinata-sama are my second cousins."

"Shoot! You're that little kid—! Well. You're not little or a kid, that was a while ago…" Naruto rubbed the back of his head, "Yeah, I remember. Nice to meet you finally! I'm lucky you're on my team."

"I would say that I'm the lucky one." Fujita disagreed smilingly.

"I heard that a third Leaf applicant might have gotten disqualified." Naruto shared a bit of gossip.

"Where did you hear that?"

"From Gaara. I have best-friend-privileges so he gave me the heads up about a couple of things."

Fujita tapped his chin, "That's helpful. Then we can expect someone else will fill our third slot."

With that comment it was time to begin, and the assembled teams faced a raised platform near the gate where Gaara had appeared, surveying the Exam participants. Naruto felt a droplet of sweat on the back of his neck, 'Wait a second…what if our third teammate doesn't show up? Will we be disqualified? Crap.'

Gaara began an introduction, "Welcome to Sunagakure. I am the Fifth Kazekage, Gaara. All of you are—" He trailed off, frowning at a gangly, androgynous teen running from row to row checking team numbers. Gaara waited for the late addition to settle in with Team Seven's group.

It was a girl, at least Naruto thought so. Her orange eyes were striking against olive skin, sea foam hair chin-length and jagged…with a wide grin on her face. "Hiya! This is our team? My name is—!"

"Shh!" The Chunin attendant silenced the newcomer, "The Kazekage is speaking. You're late."

The kunoichi beside them pouted and complied. Her headband indicated she was from Hidden Waterfall.

Naruto exchanged a glance with Fujita, communicating their questions with eyebrow wags.
Gaara's comments continued, "All of you are here to be evaluated for the chance to achieve Chunin rank. Some of you will be amateurs, and others will be experienced. What all of you can count on is that if you are promoted…you will be accountable for greater responsibilities and missions of terrible difficulty. Prepare yourselves. In this day and age, there are enemies that now threaten all ninja villages collectively." He did not shy away from the red-hot topic, "The Akatsuki is an organization that seeks to harness the chakra of Tailed-Beasts to oppress and destroy any ninja village that stands against them. Every single one of you is at risk. There will be no avoiding the confrontation to come." Gaara provided some reassurance, "Let this day serve as a reminder that we can all cooperate. We can fight together and defend our homes. As comrades."

The message sunk in for Naruto especially, and the corners of his mouth tugged into a grin.

"Some of you are standing with teammates that you've always known…and others will be depending on shinobi they have never met before. You all stand a chance in this Exam." The Kazekage explained, "Listen to one another and pool your strengths. Your aptitude will be judged carefully in a series of tasks you must complete over the next three days. Each task will be issued in subsequent clues that can be discovered in the desert. If for any reason you are unable to continue, each team will be outfitted with a device that can call a Chunin proctor to escort you back to Suna."

The Sand kunoichi with the number seven sign handed Naruto a small transponder with a covered switch. He squirreled it away as Gaara concluded his remarks.

"You will also receive a sealed envelope that can only be opened once the Exam has begun." Gaara went on as the Chunin attendants also handed that item over, "If any of you feel unprepared to spend the next few days in the desert, inform your Chunin monitor now."

No one among the crowd of young ninja quailed at the challenge before them. Gaara only gave the Chunin attendants a nod, signaling them to leave their assigned teams and approach the scaffolding. 45 teams of three stood for an awkward beat, hushed and unsupervised, and gradually realized that a huge dome of desert sand was closing in around them.

As startled teams were corralled into the sandy enclosure, Gaara only imparted the words, "The Exam starts now." Naruto noticed a few seconds sooner than others that several, concealed canisters of knockout gas were billowing a plume into the covered dome. This is a weird way to roll things out…' Naruto thought to himself.

Then he was unconscious.

Time and space swirled in darkness until Naruto detected a hand slapping his face. Not in the friendliest or gentlest way either…

"Hey, hey…stop." Half-blind, Naruto swatted the hand off. He tried to sit up with a groan.

"Sorry! You and the cute boy have been sleeping for a while." The kunoichi sat back and apologized, "I woke up in no time! I'm too antsy for naps."

"Uh…yeah." Naruto shook off the gogginess and glanced around, surprised by the dimness of the space surrounding them. "Are we still under Gaara's sand dome?"

"Nope! This is a cave. Musty…smells like we're underground." The girl reported.

"Alright." Naruto reached over to shake Fujita back to the woken realm, "Hey kid! We've got to get started. I think we were moved to a new location for the Exam."
"I like that they made it a surprise!" The Waterfall kunoichi chirped.

Naruto regarded her curiously as he rested a hand on Fujita's shoulder, helping him sit up. The Hyuga boy blinked his eyes, disoriented. He shook sand out of his hair and then retied his ponytail, "We were…put to sleep?"

"Yeah, and now we're underground. Seems like something Gaara would pull…" Naruto smiled at the notion and helped Fujita to his feet, "Next we should—"

There was a scraping sound followed by the fizzing ignition of a lit flare stick. Naruto and Fujita turned around to look at the kunoichi, taken aback.

"Where did you get that?" Naruto asked.

"In this bag! It was here when I woke up, waiting for our team, I guess." She held up a black, cross-body satchel, "I opened the envelope too, but couldn't read the paper inside it— it was dark. So I lit this thing for a bit of light."

"Is that…the only flare we have?" Fujita inquired.

"Yeah." The girl said cheerfully.

"We could be down here for a while." Naruto advised, "Try not to use our resources or do stuff without checking with us first."

"Oh." She understood, and only then did a hint of contriteness flicker on the kunoichi's face, "Sorry about that…I get ahead of things sometimes."

"It's okay." Fujita smiled reassuringly, "Let me read that, Miss. What's your name?"

"I'm Fū!" The kunoichi puffed her flat chest when she handed the parchment over, "You guys are Leaf ninja! Takigakure's leader Shibuki-sama talks about friends from Leaf a lot! I'm psyched."

"I remember hearing about Waterfall," Naruto slipped into his friendliest social mode, "This is a good team match! Uzumaki Naruto." He accepted Fū's handshake with a firm grip.

"Ah, I'm Hyuga Fujita." The younger boy shook Fū's hand too and winced at her strength.

"Great to meet you! Also, we're got food, water, and blankets in here…that kind of stuff." She handed the satchel to Naruto, "You don't mind carrying it do you? I'm already loaded down." Fū gestured with a thumb to the red, cylindrical duffle bag slung on her back.

"What's all that?"

Fū patted her gear bag, "Just travel supplies, shuriken, and scales."

Naruto exchanged another look with Fujita when he glanced up from reviewing the envelope's contents.

"Scale powder." Fū clarified, "From my wings! For jutsu."

Right about then Fujita was prepared to sign off on a crazy applicant affidavit if there were any to certify, but Naruto swiftly changed the subject and asked about what he was reading.

"This appears to be instructions for our first task…which is to escape this cavern, and on the surface we must locate a box. Only one box per team, is underlined…it will be covered with reflectors and very noticeable." Fujita reported, "We should also be judicious with our ration bag. It has to last us for three days."

Naruto dusted his hands, "No problem! Let's get out of this cave while we still have that flare going."

Fū enthusiastically gave the lit stick a twirl in her hand as they set out into a narrow, rock-walled passageway. Fujita politely requested she cease doing so. Accidentally extinguishing the tool would leave them flailing around in the dark. While marching single file, Naruto assured his fellow Leaf ninja, "Don't worry if it gets dark. I can feel the way out of here. As long as something is alive above us, I can track it."

"Something alive?" Fujita, third in line, was intrigued.

"I can feel the chakra of living things when I'm in Sage Mode." Naruto explained from the center. In front of them, Fū was happily twirling the flare again, and only picked up on the conversation when Fujita inhaled in shock.

"Sage—? You mean— Senjutsu." Fujita stamped his feet, thrilled, "Naruto, you trained in Senjutsu? I didn't hear about that!"

Not wanting to gloat, but still a bit fat-headed about it, Naruto confirmed, "I trained on Mount Myoboku, just like Ero-sennin! It was intense."

Fū asked over her shoulder as the way narrowed further, "What's Senjutsu?"

"It's a type of jutsu used by shinobi that can absorb and mix Natural Energy with their own chakra." Naruto abbreviated the concept, "Once someone masters it they can do pretty cool stuff."

Fujita tittered admiringly over the feat, while Fū commended the idea of sharing with nature. The procession nearly ground to a halt when they had to shimmy sideways through a crevice, and then pick their way up a tall slope of loose rock. At the top, Fū leapt down the sheer drop without fear, landing lightly and illuminating the wider cave mouth below.

"She's not very cautious, is she?" Fujita muttered.

"That was kind of a thoughtless jump..." Naruto agreed in a low voice. As they found their footing along the ledge, the two made a more calculated descent. Naruto thought out loud, "But she did say she has wings."

Fujita had taken a glimpse with his Kekkei Genkai to verify, "I don't see any."

"I've seen Star ninja make their wings out of chakra. Maybe she can use a jutsu like that?" Naruto supposed.

"...she just seems a little odd to me." Fujita whispered as they continued on, Fū far at the front picking the way around stalagmites.

Naruto saw the bright side of it, "She's still nice, though. I appreciate it when people aren't hostile."

"Oh yes, Fū is nice." Fujita concurred, "As far as we can tell. Let's see how we feel after we travel together for a few days."

"Hm." Naruto noted to himself that the young Hyuga lad was an astute observer, like most of his kin. Ahead, there was a bit of a ruckus and they noticed that Fū had dropped the flare on the cave floor, where it burned underfoot. She was grunting and wrestling something in the creeping dark. A large scorpion claw had hooked Fū's red duffle and was pulling back on it, trying to drag her into a burrow.

Fū railed at it in protest, reaching back to punch its eyes, "Mister Scorpion knock it off! Stealing is rude!"

Naruto rushed ahead while Fujita needed a moment to gasp, astonished by the rare sight. In close quarters, it was amusing to hear Fū's scolding of the creature while she tried to pry it off without violence.

"Hold on, this is one of Gaara's scorpions." Naruto employed a bit of strength to wrench the scorpion's arm away, while Fū resisted and slipped her satchel free, "I know he wants to challenge us down here, but I'm not eager to hurt the animals that Gaara can summon. They have feelings, you know?"

The scorpion retreated into its burrow while Fū dusted off her skirt and picked up the flare again. "I didn't come here to hurt feelings!" She announced. She blinked in startlement as Naruto went down, his feet tripped out from under him as another, larger scorpion approached from the rear. It got a hold of him and began to scuttle backwards, ignoring its captive's clamoring. Fujita was already on the case. With a lunge, he pelted the scorpion with Gentle Fist strikes that passed through its exoskeleton. Though the creature staggered, it still tried to line Naruto up neatly between its pincers, swinging its tail-stinger down and narrowly missing his head.

Fū cupped her mouth to shout from a distance, "I bet it just wants the food in that bag!"

Naruto wheezed back, "—could ya give it a whack for me-?"

"You said they have feelings!"

"Even jerks have feelings—!"

There was the sharp zing sound of a blade overhead, where Fujita had cut off the scorpion's hooked stinger. The wounded scorpion squealed and scuttled off into the dark. Panting, Fujita wiped off the dagger and sheathed it on his belt again. Naruto hopped to his feet and dusted himself off.

"Phew, thanks! Too bad you had to hurt it." Naruto was appreciative.

"Better it got hurt than you." Fujita reasoned before he rounded on Fū, who was still at the egress of the cavern mouth, "Why didn't you help Naruto?"

"I was helping! I suggested that the ration ba—"

"You help by taking action, not by shouting directions." Fujita marched on, motioning for her to follow, "If you waste even a moment it can mean disaster for a team."

"I'm sorry…! Uh. What's your name again?"

"Fujita." He rumbled.

Fū nodded, "Got it. I won't forget, Fujita, promise. I'm just not used to acting fast because my teammates from Waterfall are always faster than me. Super overprotective. It's annoying."

"Coddling doesn't help anyone on a team learn." Fujita looked back to Naruto as they picked up the pace, "Right, Naruto?"
"Nope. Doesn't help." He agreed and caught up with them, scaling another vertical patchwork of stone overhangs and boulders. Naruto managed to keep the waning flare in hand as he climbed and asked, "Fū, did you just say you have teammates?"

"Well, they're a team I'm assigned to, but they're not the same rank as me. They're like babysitters." Fū explained, "Shibuki-sama worries about me straying too far from the village."

A few stones trickled down from Fujita's foothold before he took a leap up, reaching one of the tallest accessible spots in the cavern. Fū and Naruto followed his lead. Slivers of light revealed gaps in the cave ceiling, and possible exits. He extended a hand to help Fū, who seemed delighted by the gesture. She hadn't needed the help, but was hoisted onto the plateau anyway. When Fujita did the same for Naruto, Fū assisted, and the two nearly lifted and launched Naruto clear across the standing ledge, "Whoa! You got me."

"So why is your village overprotective of you?" Fujita asked as they proceeded along the ledge, approaching wider cavern gaps.

"They don't want to lose me. I'm the jinchuriki of my village." Fū shared the fact casually.

The flare slipped from Naruto's hand, bounced over the precipice, and then tumbled down into the dark chasm below. In shock, he had nearly laughed nervously in response to the announcement. With sunlight shining down from ceiling vents, the loss of their flare was no setback. Somehow, they kept walking and it was Fujita who commented on the matter.

"You're a jinchuriki?" The boy furrowed his brow inquisitively, "Those are ninja whose villages seal and entrust Tailed Beasts to."

"Yup!"

"Are jinchuriki always so young?" Fujita was curious.

"I don't know. Everyone grow old! Though Chōmei was sealed into me when I was little girl…” Fū tapped her chin, "We've had a lot of time to get to know each other."

"Chōmei." Fujita repeated.

"Yes! The Seven-Tails. He shares his wings with me."

"Oh."

Noting the awkward silence behind them, Fū turned around to behold Naruto's quiet reaction. He was deep in thought.

"In Konoha," Fujita shared an anecdote, "The identity of our jinchuriki is not common knowledge. Before I was born, the Nine-Tailed fox escaped its seal and destroyed a large portion of our village. Many people still live in fear of that experience…and associate bad things with our jinchuriki." He raised a finger and added, "My dad says that's garbage."

"Your jinchuriki is garbage?"

"Huh-? No! What's garbage is that people would treat a jinchuriki poorly when they dedicate their lives to the defense of their homes!" Fujita puffed up a little, "Dad's right. I may not know much because I wasn't there, but I don't feel that way at all. I don't fear or hate someone who's blameless. That's ridiculous!" He sighed, "I'd like nothing more than to be a friend to jinchuriki."
Both Fū and Naruto halted, and Fujita stutter-stepped in between them. It was Fū who seized Fujita's hands in her own, beaming ecstatically, "I've been looking for friends for so long!"

"Oh—!"

"I never get to go anywhere or meet anyone new." Fū was nose-to-nose with the young man, "Please be my friend."

"I…" Fujita turned his face aside for a bit of space, rosy-cheeked, "Of course!"

Fū whooped excitedly while crushing Fujita in a brief bear hug, and then raised her hand for a high five. Fujita was preoccupied catching his breath, so Naruto reached up as to not leave the kunoichi hanging. The high-five echoed in the cavern. She tried to understand why Naruto was laughing softly.

"I understand how you feel." His voice was rough with memories, "I really do."

Grinning, Fū took a step back to get a look at Naruto, sensing a deeper meaning in his admission. She rested a hand on her hip, "Friends?"

"Friends. Let's get to know each other. I know some people who you can also be friends with…" Naruto offered, "But first we need to get out of here…and we just ran out of space."

They had come to the end of the topmost ledge.

"We lost our flare too." Fujita noticed.

Naruto rubbed the back of his neck, "Sorry about that…"

"It's alright…the largest opening in this cave ceiling— just over there— it looks precarious." Fujita observed the feature with his Byakugan, "I believe it's a sink hole. That may be difficult to climb out of—!"

Fū seized Fujita from behind, wrapping her arms around his trunk, and took off. As the pair fluttered through open air and up into the daylight of the gaping sinkhole, Naruto did a double take. Fū most certainly did have iridescent green, insect-like wings sprout from her lower back. Several pairs of them. Fujita's frightened hollering echoed 'round the cave's walls, shrinking over the distance when they made their escape.

"Whew. Okay." Naruto rolled his shoulders, readied his anchor knife, and then launched himself against the nearest expanse of rock wall. He attached himself with chakra for a few moments, getting closer to have a clear shot at the sinkhole. With a flick, the kunai soared free of the sandy opening above and was followed by a flash of movement. Before the knife could plummet to the desert ground, Naruto caught it again and landed on a bent knee. He looked over to see Fujita collapsed, sitting on his bottom with a dazed look on his face.

Fū was crouched beside the boy, speaking softly, "Sorry…I thought I gave you enough warning."

"You did…I just…didn't believe it at first." Fujita cleared his throat, "Thank you."

"No problem! Hey—" She turned to Naruto, "How did you make it out so easily?"

"I used one of my jutsu." Naruto held up the anchor kunai before stowing it.

"Does that knife do something?" Fū stood and cupped her chin, trying to figure it out.
"It just has a formula on it that I can teleport to." Naruto did not want to go into the specifics, "Fujita, can you stand? We've got to get rolling."

"Yeah." He dusted himself off, adjusting to the sunny landscape while keeping his eyes squinted, "Naruto, Fū, look for something shiny on the horizon. The next step is to find that box with reflectors on it."

"That has the next clue." Fū nodded. She shielded her eyes and swiveled 180 degrees on her feet, "Tch. Can't see doodles from down here…" She expressed her Bijū's wings again and took off vertically, scoping out the terrain from high above.

Down below, Naruto was chuckling to his Leaf Village companion, "She's going to come in mighty handy!"

"Yes. I didn't expect her to be so outgoing…or adaptable." Fujita admitted.

Fū called down to them, "Over there on that big hill!" She pointed out a southerly route, "Follow me!" She zipped while in flight, dastardly quick, and Naruto tightened the ration bag's strap on his shoulder before following in a sprint. Fujita kept up while they ran beneath Fū's shadow on the ground. The morning had given way to afternoon, and the desert's heat was cut by a merciful breeze that swept and rearranged a wall of sand dunes.

Once at the top, Naruto and Fujita came to a stop beside Fū as she landed, gawking at the view of the sea just down the hill, "Ahhh! It's hurting my eyes it's so shiny! Like Chōmei's dust!" She hopped up and down, "Have you ever seen the southern sea before? I haven't. Let's swim!"

"No, let's get our next clue." Fujita course-corrected her enthusiasm, "Once the Exam is over, come back here to swim if you want."

"Ohh…maybe I'll do that."

Between them the reflector box sat half-buried, but Naruto dislodged its lid with one hand before drawing out its contents, "Huh.

"What is it, Naruto?" Fujita was eager.

"Sandwiches." Naruto announced, drawing out an armful before handing them out, "There's a notecard in here too, hold on…" He lifted the flashcard to read its message, "This is not a clue. It's lunch. Our clue is…underwater." Naruto frowned and read on, "Each team must collect a message in a bottle anchored to the sea bottom. It says here it's pretty shallow and just off the beach."

Ignoring the food, Fujita was already scanning beneath waves crashing against the shore, "I'll look for it."

"See if there any traps down there too." Naruto advised, "There's a warning that this area is moderately dangerous."

"Moderately." Fujita repeated in amusement.

"This sandwich is moderately gross." Fū spoke while chewing, "It melted a little in the wrapper."

"It's hot out. I hope they made these this morning." Naruto gave his sandwich a sniff, "Eh…I think I'll pass."

Fū extended her hand, "Give it here." Naruto handed it over and she stuffed the extra, questionable hoagie in her red duffle. He knew few girls so undaunted by potentially spoiled food. He took a seat and motioned for Fujita to come over, intending to eat any passable food from within their given rations.

After wolfing down the last of the roll, Fū asked, "Hey Fujita, did you spot it?"

"I think so. Do you see that stone arch over there? A few meters away from it are some coral and raised rocks….I am pretty sure I saw it below that." He reported, "If the currents are strong we should be careful. We can get crushed against any of those formations, or dragged to the bottom by a downwelling current."

"Downwelling?" Naruto chomped on an unpackaged rice ball.

"The continental shelf is extremely close. Not even a short paddle from the target…and Dad told me stories of divers here and south of the Land of Fire who go diving for shellfish…" Fujita swept his hand to indicate the long stretch of the drop-off, "Random currents can pull someone straight down to the ocean's bottom without warning. Even shinobi can die that way, if they don't know how to deal with it."

"Hm." Fū nodded along as she listened, "Right…so who's the best swimmer here?"

"Um…" Fujita turned to Naruto.

"I can't say I'm the best, but I swim." Naruto vouched, "I can go."

"I'm just worried you'll have difficulty spotting the bottle." Fujita was also eating a rice ball, "Maybe I should tag along near the surface and point it out to you?"

"That could work."

"While you two make a plan, I'm going over yonder to use the bathroom." Fū pointed out the stone jetty and archway.

They acknowledged her parting and went back to eating lunch.

"What if you do get stuck in a current?" Fujita was predicting the possible threats of a moderately dangerous zone.

"Then I'm a little screwed." Naruto smiled, "But I've got our team's emergency beacon. I don't think we'll need to use it. And I could just leave this with you, if something goes wrong down there." He offered Fujita his anchor kunai.

"Thank you, Naruto, but I don't see how this helps me save your life if you drown." Fujita turned it over in his hands.

"If you have it, you don't need to save my life. I'll save my own life," Naruto corrected him. He peeked into the ration bag longingly. His appetite was still fiery, but it wouldn't be prudent to eat anything more. Naruto pulled the drawstrings of the bag shut and slipped it off.

"You'll….save yourself?" Fujita was confused.

"Here, let me show you." Naruto stood and crossed along the top of the dune. He only gave Fujita a brief thumbs up before he instantly relocated, in a flash that was nearly undetectable to the eye. Fujita blinked and noticed that Naruto had plucked the anchor knife from his hand, "I could probably stick my Hiraishin formula on that big rock bridge in the water, just to save you the trouble. I thought about you and Fū having your hands full if another team shows up after the same thing we are."

"Then we'll…" He gave his head a shake, "Naruto…I think I've seen Hinata-sama use that jutsu."

"She kind of…did." Naruto scratched his cheek, "I let her borrow it."

Fujita was google-eyed with excitement, "Can you let me borrow it?"

"No, no…I mean Hinata has an ability she can use through her Byakugan to connect with people." He tried to let Fujita down gently, "Unless you can do the same, that's the only way I've ever seen someone use another person's chakra or share jutsu."

"Oh." Fujita shared a mutually bummed out look with Naruto. There was a splash somewhere in the distance.

"Don't tell me—" Naruto craned his neck to look over his shoulder, "She did." There was a bubble ring rising where the kunoichi had dove into the water.

"Fū!" Rushing down the hill, Fujita kept watch of her movements underwater with the Byakugan, "She's going for it— I said we have to be careful out here! She heard me say that!"

"She did—"

"How can she be so reckless—?"

"Fujita, jinchuriki can handle themselves pretty well." Naruto tried to quell the hissy fit his companion was about to pitch, "Even when they mess up!"

As they raced along the slope of the jetty, then clambering up the rock archway, Fujita protested the idea, "How do you know that?"

With a small smile, Naruto came to a stop beside the boy and patted his back, "I know a few personally."

From that height, the breeze whipped Fujita's hair wildly as he stared at Naruto's face. He would not go so far as to question Naruto's experience, but he was particularly concerned about Fū's disregard for strategy, no matter how skilled she was. A relenting grunt escaped him as he crouched down and peered into the churning alcove below with the Byakugan.

"Fū…is close to it." Fujita reported, astonished, "I guess those wings help for swimming too…"

Naruto crossed his arms, slightly smug, "Told ya."

A perturbed sigh, "…she just reached the bottle."

"And no rough currents?"

"Not that I can see."

"Then don't worry so much! Our group is pretty capable." Naruto soothed, "We'll watch to make sure she comes back up—"

Fujita had jumped from the edge of the rock crossing, to Naruto's great surprise. He peered over the ledge as a tumultuous crashing of water kicked up in the cove below. The 4 meter wide, gaping mouth of a gargantuan conger eel had all but encompassed Fū on her frantic flight up and out of the water. It was then Naruto heard her half-horrified, half-amused screaming as she raced by in flight, passing him on the bridge. He sucked wind at the sight of Fujita colliding with the broad side of the eel's head, driving his dagger into the milky white eye of the fish.

Bending and furling, the wounded eel fell back into the water with a splash...but had taken Fujita in with it. Both Naruto and Fū had noticed this crisis in a moment of alarm, but it was Naruto who pointed at Fū to call the next shot, "Stay up here. Like we discussed! I'll get him."

"But I—!"

"Stay and don't lose that bottle!" He leapt in after leaving his anchor knife stuck in the top of the archway. While spinning the start of the Rasengan in his palm, Naruto took a breath before the plunge. He got lucky— landing squarely on the charging eel's forehead and pancaking it flat against the sea shelf floor with the whirling sphere of chakra. It had spared Fujita from being swallowed whole.

Fujita may have been slightly disoriented while tumbling underwater, still oriented face-down. Naruto seized the boy's wrist and flashed out of the lapping waters. He sputtered and coughed after being transported back to the top of the rock formation. After vomiting up a bit of sea water, Fujita was right as rain. He stood and immediately shared his gratitude, "—thank you, Naruto!"

"Just breathe, kid, it's okay." Naruto collected his anchor knife and ushered his teammate forward, back toward the beach.

While stumbling along, Fujita wrung out his tunic and lamented, "I lost my tantō..."

"In that thing's eye." Naruto was mildly impressed.

"Tenten-neesan made that for me." His frown was the pinnacle of disappointment.

"Oh she—" Naruto recalled some of the arrangements in the Hyuga clan that Hinata had spoken about, "She'll probably make you another, no problem!"

"I guess if she isn't busy..." Fujita kicked a rock as they scaled the beach dune, and then his eyes locked on Fū at the top, "Fū! Why didn't you listen to us? We had a plan."

"I got it though." She held up the bottle innocently, her voice nectar-sweet.

"That was impulsive." Naruto had to call a spade a spade, "Don't do that again. Next time, it could force all of us to quit this Exam if something goes wrong."

"Right." Fū bowed her head in regret and handed the bottle to Naruto.

The stopper was stuck so he smashed the glass on a stone and pulled the rolled parchment free. He let Fujita and Fū huddle in to read the next clue with him:

Survive the next two nights in the desert. Teams that fail to do so will be disqualified from future tasks in the Accelerated Exam.

For each team's final challenge on the third day, they are advised to head north until they locate a Jounin attendant of the Sand Village. They will be stationed in various locations throughout the desert. Each Jounin carries one small bell that must be acquired by the team and presented to monitors at the village gate. Doing so will conclude Exam challenges, and allow the successful team to go before a panel for a final evaluation. Jounin carrying bells will not make concessions or exceptions for any team. The deadline for retrieving a bell is the evening of the fourth day. All Genin teams who fail to acquire a bell in this timeframe will be ejected from the Exam.
"Well." Naruto handed the paper off to Fū, "He's recycling the Bell Test."

"The what?" Fujita had never heard of it.

"Some sensei in Hidden Leaf challenge their students this way— trying to wrestle a bell away from a Jounin." Naruto explained, "My team had to do it. I think Sakura-chan's team had to do it too…"

"Easy!" Fū laughed as she stuffed the message in her bag.

"It's really not." Naruto cautioned.

"Just one little bell? Come on! It's not like we have to take down a Jounin like our lives depend on it." She reasoned.

Fujita disagreed, "But I doubt that a Sand Jounin will make it easy for any Genin team. We might have to go after a Jounin with everything we've got."

Fū ground her fist into her palm, merrily daydreaming about what that would look like.

"Okay, maybe not everything we've got." Naruto amended, "Because that's just going to be too much."

They set out on a northerly route away from the coast.

"So then our best bet is adhering to a decent strategy." Fujita supposed.

"I promise I'll adhere!" Fū was preemptively cooperating.

"You'd better." Fujita snickered. He was no longer upset by her rash dive for the bottle. Though he wouldn't admit it out loud, he'd had fun coming to her rescue and going wild.

The long trek into the heart of the desert prompted Naruto to wear his Sage cloak like a turban again. Fū was frustrated that she did not have an extra garment to do the same. Fujita stripped off his tunic into an undershirt during the heat of the day, and he let Fū wrap herself in it as if it were a headscarf.

"Phew! This makes me miss home a little." Fū whined, "We've got the best pools and waterfalls. Even a park for the little kids…"

"I'd like to go someday. Cooling off today would be especially nice..." Fujita was fanning himself with a container lid from a spent lunch.

"You should totally visit! I could show you our cabins and otters and where we have water-balloon fights!" Her enthusiasm put some pep in her step.

"Water balloon fights?" Naruto was intrigued. An itch from his former prankster days had flared up.

"Yeah! We have big water balloon fights against Shibuki-sama sometimes, like— we'll ambush him and other teams when they come home from missions."

"Heh heh!" Fujita was amused.

"One time I joked that I filled up a balloon with The Hero's Water and Shibuki-sama got really mad at me…" Fū tapped her chin as she remembered that scolding.

"We're going to need to go on a vacation to your village." Naruto determined, "I'd love to bring Hinata along."
"You should bring Hinata-sama, Naruto! She would appreciate that." Fujita wholly approved.

Naruto did not want to comment on how he and Hinata could do anything, even something as mundane as shoe-shining, and still have the time of their lives so long as it meant spending time together.

Water reserves were beginning to wane by the end of the day, and so the team elected to refrain from drinking until daytime tomorrow. Naruto navigated the way to an outcrop he had slept beneath with Jiraiya on their initial journey, and they set up camp beneath the stone overhang. They collected dried tumbleweeds and bramble to start a fire with. About five whole minutes were wasted while Fujita taught Fū how to get a spark with flint and magnesium pieces, as starting fires was not her thing. He handed off the strips to her and she whooped when she managed it. Fujita commended her effort.

Naruto handed two boxed meals to his teammates and made no move to eat anything.

"Aren't you hungry?" Fū asked as she dug in.

"A little." Naruto smiled, "We need to watch these rations. We'll have pretty much nothing to eat on the third day, so I'll pass this time."

"Naruto, you really shouldn't do that." Fujita was crestfallen, "Have some of mine!"

"It's okay. I'll...go find a desert hare or something." Naruto volunteered to hunt as Jiraiya had suggested, though he was no fan of the idea.

"What's a hare?" Fū wondered as she chewed.

"A rabbit. Sort of." Fujita informed her.

"We don't see a lot of rabbits where I live." She turned to ask Fujita, "Hey...do you want that dumpling?"

"You can—"

She'd already snatched a dumpling from Fujita's box. Fū then directed Naruto, "How about this! Use a sandwich as a lure, if you want to catch some wild animals."

"I don't think they eat sandwiches." Naruto watched the dwindling sunset on the horizon, "Especially not melty sandwiches."

"No self-respecting desert animal would pass up random food! It'll definitely work." Fū asserted.

If only to humorously prove a point, Naruto accepted the sad sandwich from Fū's bag and then set out with it, laying a snare beneath the gooey lump on the far side of a dune. He laid in wait for what felt like hours, but according to Fujita he had only been gone 25 minutes. Bizarrely, he ended up trapping a large ground squirrel. Naruto could hardly believe the result. He quickly put the creature out of its misery and returned to camp with it.

"That sandwich was the MVP." Fū clapped as Naruto settled down to skin the animal.

"I can't believe that worked..." Fujita was aghast.

"Me neither." Naruto was chuckling. He had traded spoiled food for something much fresher. Fū paid close attention to how Naruto prepared the game, although he prefaced the lesson with the fact that it had been a while since he'd needed to catch his own food. He set up the skinned squirrel on rocks over the fire to roast.

"That smells good! I'm hungry again." Fū grumbled.

Naruto politely reminded her to eat her food more slowly next time to savor it. He made short work of the squirrel after it was cooked. The group hunkered down for the night when full dark fell, stoking the fire before getting cozy beside it. Naruto used the ration bag as an uncomfortable pillow, and could hear Fū excitedly whispering things to Fujita beside her before falling asleep.

By morning, the fire pit had burned down to cinders and the first rays of sun did not disturb the sleeping team. As temperatures slowly climbed again, Naruto woke first and shook his teammates awake to begin the next leg of the journey. Fujita rose without complaint, but he had to forcibly hoist Fū to her feet by pulling her up by her bag's straps. They set out sleepily.

"How do you suppose we were transported to that cave so quickly?" Fujita mused aloud as the morning wore on.

"Gaara can probably move a lot of people at once with his sand." Naruto supposed, "I'll ask him for the trick when we get back. I want to know."

"Oh!" Fū exclaimed in surprise, "He's your very best friend."

Naruto turned and fixed the kunoichi with a bamboozled stare.

"Sorry, I'm getting to know you better— so it's easier to read you guys." Fū apologized, "Chōmei lets me read other people's thoughts and feelings sometimes when I get close to them."

Fujita, surprised by the admission, was fit to spin himself into the ground like a top, embarrassed by some of the things he'd thought earlier about being around a cute girl.

"Well yeah, Gaara is one of my best friends." Naruto confirmed, "Can you...really read my mind?"

"It's still foggy. I pick up only recent stuff or on the surface stuff. It's never crystal clear unless I'm asleep...and I'll usually forget what I learn when I'm sleeping!" Fū laughed, "The Kazekage is cool! He cooks."

"Yeah!" Naruto was laughing too.

"He has a girlfriend! He's a jinchuriki!" Fū went on.

Right about there, Naruto asked her to quit oversharing but the damage had been done.

"The Kazekage is a jinchuriki!" Fujita exclaimed, "So that's what you meant, Naruto. I wasn't exactly sure."

"Yep, though that's not the sort of thing you talk casually about, alright?" Naruto advised him, "Not many people outside of Hidden Sand know that. It doesn't matter that much...but some people are prejudiced...and also the Akatsuki are searching for jinchuriki to extract the Tailed Beasts from their bodies."

"That's what...Gaara-sama was talking about before the start of the Exam." Fujita recalled, "Naruto...what happens if a Tailed Beast is removed from a jinchuriki?"

The group pressed forward under harsh sunlight for a while in silence. At length Naruto answered uneasily, "I think that most jinchuriki die...when that happens to them. Having that much chakra ripped out of your body...destroys your system, I'm pretty sure. It's not survivable."

Anxiously, Fu wrapped her arms around her stomach while thinking about the consequences. Fujita noticed her reaction and spoke softly to her, "Don't worry, Fu...we'll look after each other. No one here is going to tolerate the Akatsuki coming after any of our friends."

"Thank you." She smiled at the reassurance, "Shibuki-sama is always telling me to be cautious...but Mama said you can never prepare for everything. We've got to walk the line between careful and carefree all our lives."

"We won't let them win." Naruto vowed, "We won't let them hurt villagers or jinchuriki. Whatever the Akatsuki is trying to do...I'll stop them."

Colorful expressions crossed Fujita and Fu's faces after hearing such a declaration. It was heartening. At mid-day, they took sparse sips of water. The teammates split one of the few last boxed meals three ways, in the hope of having a bit more food until the final challenge was complete. After a few hours, Fu tried her hand at cutting down a prickly cactus, and saved a few paddles of the plant in her bag. She was fairly certain they were edible.

"They probably won't taste good." Fujita was skeptical of the selection.

"You've got to learn how to eat things that taste bad!" Fu marched alongside Fujita, "It's way better than having an empty stomach."

"Then we agree to disagree."

"Don't you like to eat, Fujita?"

"Not really. My favorite food is cherries." He divulged, "But eating too much takes the joy out of it. So I only indulge sometimes."

"Eating builds a greater appreciation of the sport, as does flying!" Fu reported, "If you're not an avid eater, want to try flying?"

"I don't really—"

Naruto heard the two goofballs behind him wrestle and argue, and did not bother turning around to witness Fu taking off with Fujita clamped in her arms. The boy's ruckus died down as they fluttered up and up into the sky overhead.

'I remember when I used to be ultra-hyper and enthusiastic about everything.' Naruto reflected on how much of the rampant energy of his youth had been harnessed for critical thinking and studying jutsu. 'Fu might be...permanently energetic.'

Fujita's cries could be heard from up above.

"Heh." Naruto chuckled to himself, "Someone's gotta deal with it...might as well be the kid!"

A few minutes later, it sounded as if Fujita had adjusted and even marginally enjoyed the flight. He and Fu touched down with news to relay to Naruto.

"We saw another Genin team in the distance!" Fu reported, "Want to chase 'em?"

"No." Naruto replied calmly, "We don't need to chase them. We've got everything we need. No one will have bells until tomorrow, when we start taking them from Jounin."

"But we could take any extra water or food they have." Fū suggested.

"They probably won't have extra anything." Fujita supposed.

"He's right. There's nothing worth ambushing another team for right now." Naruto instructed, "We keep going north until we find shelter, then we'll take a rest."

Later, Fujita wondered if Naruto wanted to try flying around with Fū, but he passed on the offer. He would be a heavier, more cumbersome passenger. They came upon a small canyon of stone and slipped into the shade of the rocky recess. The group had cut off more cactus paddles along the way, and by a majority vote decided to cook the cactus over a fire later. The stress of having less water to consume was weighing on them.

Evening swaddled the desert, and the group roasted cactus paddled over a fire after shaving the needlepoints off, eating strips of the plant.

"It tastes like green beans." Naruto assessed.

Fujita had no qualms with the flavor, "It's not bad."

"Want to catch another squirrel? Maybe they like cactus?" Fū was still peckish.

"You can if you want. I think we should try to take it easy now and rest for tomorrow." After eating, Naruto stretched out on his back.

Fū set out to lure potential prey animals into a trap of her own, but an hour of sitting still was a test of her patience. She gave up and returned to camp, falling gracelessly to her rear beside her teammates with an aggravated huff. Fujita had saved one last cooked cactus paddle for her. With a soft gasp, Fū took his hands in her own before accepting the snack, staring Fujita in the eyes, "You are wonderful."

Flustered, Fujita tried to ride out a few frantic moments of heart palpitations while they locked gazes, unable to say anything. Fū went ahead and stuffed her face with food again. She imagined that the reason why she always wanted to eat was because flying required more physical exertion, and she metabolized like crazy.

"Maybe." Fujita peeped.

The group slept huddled around the fire as night drained the desert of warmth. Fujita dreamt of green landscapes again, moving around the forest with ease the way Fū could. It felt as though he was reliving the same moment repeatedly— chasing his big brother into an open space, and watching a hail of weaponry stick Hikune to death. He had only heard fragments of how his brother had died, but his imagination brought the tragedy to life in his mind. Each attempted rescue and death was visually different, if only for a few minor details. But every time, Fujita lamented his ineptitude, railing and screaming as his brother vanished over and over again in pain.

He bolted upright, chest heaving, startled back to consciousness by the emotional whiplash of his dreams. Fujita dabbed at the corners of his eyes before hearing a soft whimper. Close by, Fū was sitting up as fat tears rolled down her cheeks.

"Are you alright?" He whispered.

Fū shook her head. She ran the back of her hand beneath her eyes.
"…what's the matter? I hope I didn't wake you." Fujita spoke quietly, intent on not disturbing Naruto as he snored on the far side of the fire.

Fū cleared her throat before explaining, "I kept watching him die…"

"Who?"

"Your big brother. I was sharing your dream and it was fun at first, being in that big forest…But he just kept dying in horrible ways and you kept screaming..." Fū sniffled, "That was hard to get through. I wanted to wake up."

Fujita was wildly astonished. He sat there with a wide, pearly gaze, trying to make sense of how she had visited his dream and experienced some of his anguish. He did not know whether to thank her or apologize to her.

"—do you— need a hug?" Fū hiccupped.

"I, uh…" He frowned a little, "Maybe I don't."

"But you're thinking about indulging," Fū relayed her superficial scan of his brain, "Bring it in, cute boy—" She reached out her arms and wrapped him in a tight embrace, relaxing after the night scare.

Fujita was perplexed again, "…did you say cute?"

"Yup! Ahh, I needed a hug too. I feel better now." Fū pulled away and rolled over, "Goodnight! Please have nice dreams. It stinks when you don't."

Startled, Fujita sat and tried to make sense of the exchange, but exhaustion was beckoning again. He settled down and had a slightly better rest for the remainder of the night.

Before dawn, as a sliver of light crept below the horizon, Naruto woke up and stood to stretch. He noticed Fū and Fujita curled up into fish-hook shapes, the tops of their heads nearly touched while they snoozed. He felt a warm, protective feeling for the two. Naruto tottered away from camp and into open space beyond the canyon walls, taking some time to relieve himself while yawning sleepily. His mouth felt dry. He didn't want to take a drink of water until his teammates had their sips first.

'I'll let them sleep in. We've got one more day to go before we're in the bell-zone, I'm guessing.' Naruto thought to himself. He scaled a stone outcrop to its flat top; above the shelf that housed the campsite where his teammates slept. He'd let them get some more rest. Naruto sat and crossed his legs, taking slow, deep breaths in the hope of meditating a little. Part of him wished that Hinata would drop in to say hello. He was probably too jumbled from the Exam to hold a meaningful conversation, but any hint of her presence lifted his spirit.

The peace and quiet lasted a while before the skittering of rocks caught his attention. Fū had fluttered up from the ravine's shelter, stretching luxuriantly a few paces away from him. She toddled over to sit beside him, "Want to see the sun rise? We've got a good view out here."

"I like to watch it," Naruto confirmed, "You don't want to sleep more?"

"Nah. I'm good. Fujita had whacky dreams all night and I couldn't unstick myself from them." She rubbed her temples with her fingertips, "He dreams so loud."

Naruto chortled at the observation.
"I know you didn't want me to say too much, so I'm trying not to read your thoughts or blab about what I see and feel." Fū explained, "This is the first time I've ever gotten to meet new people outside of Waterfall and get to know them." She leaned back on her arms, reminiscing, "A few years back, my village was under attack and I was amped up to jump in and protect everyone…but Shibuki-sama locked me in a cellar and told me to stay put. He was worried that I'd be used as leverage or hurt. Ever since then, I keep trying to get more involved. I'm Waterfall's jinchuriki, so it's kind of my job to keep everyone safe. I just wish they would let me."

"But another way you protect them is by not recklessly endangering yourself." Naruto reminded her, "You don't need to jump into every situation, especially when your leader tells you not to."

"He always tells me not to."

"Then he must care a lot about you." He smiled at the sentiment, thinking of how Tsunade looked after him.

"Your Hokage loves you a lot." Fū sighed, "That's so nice…she definitely won't let the Akatsuki hurt you."

Naruto braced himself for the invasive thought reading, "I know she won't. I should still do my part…whatever she and Gaara need me to do, I will."

"You've been a jinchuriki since you were a baby, wow!" Fū was surprised, "Woops. Chōmei's digging a bit. He says you have the Nine-Tailed Fox!" She muttered under her breath, "Quit being a busybody, Chōmei, at least let him talk to me a little!"

"It's okay." Naruto shook his head, keeping calm, "That's right. I just didn't want you saying that in front of Fujita."

"I won't." Fū assured him, "Hmm…so people in your village are mean to you? Or they were. I feel this heaviness." She patted her chest, "Fujita said the Fox attacked your village once and that's why everyone is so scared."

"That's the long and short of it." Naruto crossed an arm over his knee and propped his chin up with a hand, "I wouldn't change a thing, if I could…but it was hard sometimes."

"That really sucks! In the past, Chōmei protected my village from enemy forces, and ever since my people say that he represents the good fortune of Takigakure." Fū imparted some background to her fellow jinchuriki, "He's my lucky number seven."

"You're making me a little jealous, you know."

"At least you got out to live a little and see the world." She blew strands of hair from her face, "You've made lots of friends, traveled, become a Sage, got a girlfriend…and kicked a lot of butt. I haven't done that."

"That's mostly why I wouldn't change things." Naruto conceded.

"Your girlfriend is pretty and she looks kind of like Fujita…"

"They're related."

Fū bit her lip, "You're, like, cra-aaazy about her! You need to go back to your village and chill out."

"Do you mind…not skimming so much? Can you shut it off?" Naruto wondered in embarrassment.
"Yeah, sure, hold on." Fū slapped her cheeks and muttered to herself again. Then she announced, "There we go. So. I'd like a girlfriend or boyfriend someday, but everyone I've met so far just hasn't been fun enough. They don't want to try any of the things I like, or we don't have much in common. Chōmei will read their minds a lot and tell me that they're not interested in the same way I am, which cuts things short a lot."

"Huh…so you're lucky, but not in every way." Naruto observed, "I was lucky too."

" Heck yeah, you were."

"I almost didn't realize how lucky I was to have Hinata." He tipped his head back and considered it.

"When you get caught up in missions and everything else, it's easy not to notice what's…" Fū held a hand up in front of her face, "Right in front of you. But I know for sure that's not my situation. I thought about maybe dressing girlier or not hitting the buffet at home so hard…"

"Whatever you do, don't change for anyone." Naruto shot down her flaky idea, "Be yourself."

"That's what Chōmei keeps telling me." Fū was bolstered by the claim.

It was somewhat discouraging for Naruto to hear accounts from other jinchuriki who could communicate freely and peaceably with their Biju. First it had been the old man with the Four-Tails, then Gaara, and now Fū, who communicated well with their Tailed-Beasts. Naruto had once believed he was on the verge of a breakthrough, before Jiraiya's injury. These days he felt lost when it came to reestablishing a dialogue with the Kyuubi.

"How do you…talk to him…and not fight?" Naruto wondered, "Why trust each other?"

"Well," Fū tapped her mouth and thought it over, "Chōmei is just naturally nice. That definitely helps. I've been so lonely since I was a kid, only ever seeing the same few people all of my life…I talked to Chōmei a lot and he became the friend I needed. I wanted to be his friend too. I know what it's like to feel trapped, like you can't make your own decisions…"

Naruto's shoulders were slumped, "The Fox doesn't ever want to understand how I feel, or be a friend to me—" He felt Fū press her palm to his forehead, a gesture that seemed to instantly transport Naruto to the wide, dank space where he would go to communicate with Kurama…except that it was a vast and expanded environment of thought that had other occupants. He noticed Fū standing on one of the Seven-Tail's bent wings, or were they tails? Whatever it was, the creature looked like an armored Hercules beetle.

"Hey there!" Fū greeted him from her perch, "I hope you don't mind that I opened a channel."

Naruto puttered around the space, shocked, "How are you doing this?"

"Chōmei's really good at synchronizing people's thoughts! When we hold still, anyway."

Following Fū's explanation, the giant insect concurred, You betcha!

Naruto's mouth was hanging open. It was then he had a heightened awareness of the Kyuubi behind him. He looked over his shoulder to see the same imprisoning bars that had always been there. The Fox stirred behind them and pressed his face to the cage door, alert to the unusual commotion. He looked out-of-place while Chōmei sat merry and unbound with Fū.

Chōmei… Kurama's voice was soft rumble of a greeting.
What's good furry brother—? The towering insect was outgoing much in the way Fū was.

Kurama wasted no time making demands, You're free. Show me how to be free, unfettered by this seal!

Nah, man! Chōmei and Fū shook their heads in the negative simultaneously, Only you can set yourself free.

Kurama head-butted the bars in frustration, How do I do that?

By being nice! Chōmei suggested blithely, It's just your luck that you got a nice container. Try being friends.

The Fox stared blankly in response, completely dejected by the proposition.

Never was your strong suit, eh? Chōmei gathered.

Naruto raised a finger to chime in, "I've made that request before, but it didn't get far. Would it really be…” He looked back at the Nine-Tails, "That unbearable?"

Be quiet. The Fox grumbled.

"Excuse me, Fluffy Fox, but there's no reason for you to be upset with Naruto or for you to mistrust him." Fū bent her arms and rested them on her hips like a heroine, "We can read his heart and thoughts! Naruto truly wants to understand you better."

I've heard that before from other jinchuriki of mine… Kurama growled skeptically, And they never mean it. They always change their minds.

How unusual! Chōmei noticed something while prodding around in the Fox's thoughts, You've been feeling a lot of love recently, Kurama. That's good. Gentle and calm…keep it up! It's healthy for you.

Naruto was astounded when he faced his Tailed-Beast, "You can love people?"

All of you—! The Fox bellowed, Shut. Up. I want to be left alone!

Jolted from the shared space of collective consciousness, Naruto was cradling his achy head and watching the sunrise again. He glanced over to Fū beside him as she deliberated on the encounter.

"Oof, he's a grumpy one." She concluded with a small shudder.

"Tell me about it."

"He'll come around." Fū predicted as she stood and brushed sand from her skirt.

"But will he?" Naruto heaved himself to his feet, "And what was all of that about him feeling affection? Or…why would he feel like that when he can't stand me? He hates everything."

"It's just because the Fox feels love for the same reason you do." Fū's explanation was unhelpfully cryptic. She fluttered down into the shade of the ravine to fetch Fujita.

Naruto paced the canyon top for a minute, trying to make sense of what he'd learned. It could be that he was at a slight disadvantage in some sense, having to deal with a cantankerous Tailed-Beast.
Chōmei's attitude seemed too good to be true, and yet Fū's success was proof of their harmonious relationship. But why? Why would the Fox feel anything good if he tried to kill Ero-sensei, or tell me I'm worthless trash, or try to wreck the Toad Valley? It was mind boggling, Why does the Fox feel love…just because I do? That's not how this works!

He raked a hand through his hair, inhaling slowly with his eyes shut. For the same reason I do... When Naruto followed that thought to its logical end, he recalled his insatiable pining for Hinata, his reactions to her visits, and so forth. Surely that wasn't it?

"Naruto!"

He heard his teammates calling to him. Naruto skipped down into the ravine and found both Fujita and Fū fretting over the water container they had been sharing.

"We're out." Fujita reported, "We need to find water."

"No surprise there..." Naruto lifted the ration bag and slung it onto his back after stuffing the canteen inside of it.

"How about I take a look around and you two wait?" Fū suggested, "Or we can start digging—!"

"Hold on, let's stick to something more practical." Naruto settled down to sit again, "I'll meditate for a bit to use Sage Mode, and then feel around for living things out here. My guess is—the denser the Natural Energy is, the more likely we are to find water around the life it's coming from."

Fujita was enthralled, "Yes! Do you need some space?"

"Just a bit of quiet, if you don't mind." Naruto settled his hands on his knees, exhaling slowly. He shut his eyes and tuned out trivial distractions. Purely for courtesy, Fū and Fujita had exited the canyon's shelter.

The warm rush of Natural Energy fused successfully with his chakra, and after a short time Naruto stood up and brushed sand from his pants. The environment was deceptively active. Let's see...well there's a team or two to the south of us... Naruto scratched his head while feeling around, calculating, Sunagakure is that way. We're not that far from it now. Hmm. Water. I dunno. There are plenty of those ground squirrels and snakes all over the place... He shut his eyes to concentrate, Something brighter...more alive...'

Naruto hurried out of the shady shelter and motioned for his teammates to join him, "I think...I can feel something good."

Fū bobbed her head, "Uh huh. What's good? Is it edible or drinkable?"

"No...I mean there are a bunch of teams gathered." Naruto smiled, "In one spot. I can feel their chakra. Seems like there might be plants and animals there too."

"An oasis?" Fujita presumed.

"Maybe! I think it's worth a shot. It'll be a bit of a hike there...but we won't be good for much if we don't have anything left to drink." Naruto pointed the way enthusiastically, "Let's move it!"

The cooler temperature was forgiving as they made haste in the direction Naruto had established. He explained to his team that in a few minutes, Sage Mode would wear off. If they needed to reestablish the course, he could use it again. He also posited that they would likely be close enough for Fujita to spot their desired location with the Byakugan.
On the way, the sky was tinged with lavender as the sun rose. Naruto moved a faster, stirred by the heavenly hue and the feelings that came with it; as if Hinata were cheering him on from home.

"There." Fujita narrowed his eyes, pulling the group east as he took the lead, "There are other teams ahead. And some trees."

"That screams water almost as loud as my village does!" Fū lifted off the ground with excitement. She tucked her wings away before her team slowed to approach the oasis.

A spring had welled up into a pond of remarkable size, turquoise-blue, tucked against a tall sand dune overshadowing hardy trees and shrubs. Upon arrival, Naruto watched another team set out back into the desert, as if fortified to start the next task. Two other teams were loitering around in the shade of palms. Naruto was about to draw out the canteen to unscrew and refill it like a civilized being, but Fujita and Fū dropped to their knees ahead of him, lapping up cool water face-first. Naruto shook his head at their antics. Fujita snapped his head up for a break, and a string of water whipped off the end of his ponytail and splashed Naruto in the face. It reprogrammed him. "Oh yeah. I am super dehydrated right now."

Naruto bent down and submerged his entire head into the spring. Fū was laughing as she shucked off her red duffle and rolled into the water to float around. Fujita took that as his cue to pick up their discarded thermos and refill it. From behind them, a team of amateur Sand Genin snarked, "Are you guys idiots? You're going to spoil that water for everyone else!"

Fujita ignored the comment and Fū had missed it completely. Naruto raised his head and gleefully shook droplets from his hair and face, "Ahh!"

"Hey morons! Can you hear us?" One of the Sand youngsters repeated.

"Fujita, is he talking to our team?" Naruto lightly nudged Fujita with his elbow.

"I think so. The idea that we might foul this spring is complete nonsense, but they insist that's what we're doing." Fujita brought Naruto up to speed, taking a gentlemanly sip of water from the thermos cap.

Naruto sat and stretched his arms, turning to regard the rude Sand team, "Hey! Have you guys lived in the desert all of your lives?"

"Yeah." A kunoichi grumbled.

"And is this the first promotional Exam you've ever participated in?" Naruto shouted over to them.

"Yeah…?"

Naruto pointed an accusing finger at them, "Then no one cares about your opinions, ya babies!"

Fujita sputtered over the canteen, amused by Naruto's countercharge, while Fū cackled in delight from the pond behind him. The Genin team from the Land of Moon, a bit older and wiser, watched from their place in the shade. One of the Sand Genin sprang to his feet and marched up to Naruto, who was still relaxing on the bank of the spring.

"You should care." The boy ground out from between his teeth, "Or I'll teach you the value of water out here by lighting you on fire."

"Light me on fire?" Naruto raised a brow, leaning back to fold his arms behind his head.
"With my Blood Limit." The boy puffed his chest. His teammates fidgeted uneasily from their spot on a log.

Naruto had a single, raspberry-blowing laugh before he sealed his lips and stopped. That is some big talk coming from a greenhorn…

"Do you really want to laugh at the Shakuton?" The boy hissed, conjuring up a floating orb of flame from thin air.

"No, your attitude is funny." Naruto twirled a kunai around his finger, "You don't want to fight us, no matter what kind of Kekkei Genkai you have."

"You're better off saving your strength for other important tasks, like the Bell Test." Fujita reminded the Genin.

Fū chimed in from the background, "Want to be friends?"

"No! Are you stupid?" The boy was bristling, "You're competitors! There won't be enough bells for everyone to pass. We should trim down rival teams."

"Kid, let me give you a clue, since the Bell Test was originally from my village." Naruto shut his eyes contently, "Worrying about if other people are going to pass or not doesn't help. The trick is working together."

Such a sentiment did not fly with the aggressive participant, and he swung his fist, fiery hot, at Fujita's head since he was nearest. Fujita easily ducked the swing and poked 16 chakra points along the boy's arm, all without rising to his feet. The attacker balked at how his chakra had been diverted, and staggered backwards. Naruto cracked an eye open at the offender, "You didn't just try to smack Fujita, right?"

"Don't worry about it, Naruto." Fujita waved it off and fitted the lid back onto the thermos.

"Hey." Naruto sniffed impatiently at the Shakuton-user, "Say you're sorry."

The Sand Genin was ready to lunge again, "He messed with my chakra points! All of you can go to hell—!"

The anchor kunai whizzed past the boy's face, and Naruto relocated behind him, kicking the aggressor's legs out from under him. He face-planted while drawing out a fistful of shuriken from a leg holster, though he didn't get to do much with the projectiles. Naruto whistled a tune as he shoved the child into the pond with his foot. Fujita sighed wearily, standing up to relocate to some shade.

"Quit splashing so much!" Fū chided the floundering Genin in the pond.

The Sand Genin righted himself, snapping shuriken off of a wire with force, but his target was gone again in a flash. With the same kunai-trick, Naruto had reappeared behind the boy and, with a degree of severity, round-kicked him across the clearing and into his Sand teammates seated on a log. The three toppled over with grunts of pain. Naruto stood on the water's surface and looked down as Fū floated by. She raised her hand for a high-five again.

Understandably, the Sand team scampered away from the oasis after that. The Moon team was howling with laughter from their seats on the periphery, "Guess we found out who the real morons are!"

Naruto shrugged at them and then returned to Fujita to divide up the last boxed meal of their rations.
Fū clambered out of the pond and gave herself a shake, still dripping wet when she accepted a few morsels of food. She hovered on her feet while eating, "Good thing you didn't beat them up too bad…or they'd go crying to your Kazekage friend."

"His name is Gaara." Naruto reminded her.

"Oh yeah."

"That was a rare Kekkei Genkai, though." Fujita conceded, "I thought it had died off in the Wind Country, for the most part."

Naruto crunched on a mouthful of pickled carrots and zucchini, noting, "What good did it do him?"

"No more good than a flute-player on a deer hunt." Fū reckoned.

Fujita just stared at her in fascination. "How does your brain work?" He asked in all seriousness.

"Electrical impulses." She frowned at him and he frowned back, "Right? Isn't that how bodies work?"

"He's just amazed by your creativity." Naruto helped her out.

"Oh." Delighted, Fū smiled again and sat down beside him, "You eating that, Fujita?"

He crammed the last of the shumai in his mouth. She nodded to him, "Good, you've learned."

When gasps of surprise came from the Moon team, Naruto followed their eyeline up to the cloudless sky: three Genin in flight were descending on transparent, violet wings. Naruto sprang from his seat in shock, "Star ninja!"

Fū and Fujita chorused in a question, "Star ninja?"

The Star team landed beside the spring and had come amply prepared. Each Genin had their own canteen for water, hastily filling up at the pond's edge. Naruto jogged over to the group, recognizing them, "Long time no see!"

Sumaru lit up at the sight of him, "Naruto!" He stood and shook his friend's outstretched hand, "I saw you at Suna's gates and tried to get your attention! You didn't see us."

"I didn't?" Naruto scratched his cheek sheepishly, "Sorry about that!"

Hokuto and Mizura also greeted Naruto, though Mizura admitted that he did not know him all that well, "I was sick for most of the time you were in Hoshigakure, Naruto-san, but I'm doing a lot better now thanks to Sakura-san and the Hokage."

Naruto was thrilled to hear that. Out of curiosity, both Fujita and Fū approached to learn more about these Star ninja that Naruto already seemed to be acquainted with.

"Hey team! This is Sumaru," Naruto introduced Sumaru, who bowed in greetings, "Hokuto." The kunoichi mirrored the gesture, "And…” Naruto couldn't quite remember Mizura's name, but the boy gladly introduced himself. Naruto went on to introduce his teammates, "And these are my temporary teammates for the Exam: Fujita; he's from the Hyuga clan in Hidden Leaf," Naruto gestured to his companions, "And Fū from Hidden Waterfall."

"A pleasure." Sumaru nodded to them.
Fū took lilting steps around the Star bunch, cupping her chin and scrutinizing their backs. She said off-handedly to Hokuto, "I'm just checking to see where you put them."

"Put what?" The Star kunoichi asked.

"Your wings."

"They're made of chakra. Our wings dissipate when we stop using our techniques." Sumaru enlightened her.

Fū nodded and gave them a carry on hand gesture, muttering to Naruto as she shuffled behind him, "I shouldn't show them, right?"

He took that to mean that Fū would like to show off her wings, but was also aware it might startle others, "Maybe not."

In the short time Naruto got caught up with Sumaru and his companions, the Moon team vacated the oasis. The Leaf and Star teams sat huddled in the stretching shadows of palms. It came as no surprise to Naruto when Sumaru explained his team's decision to wait for Mizura's full recovery, and skip Konoha's Chunin Exam. It was fortuitous that Natsuhi, the Hoshikage, had learned first-hand from Gaara that Suna would host its own Exam soon after.

"That gave me extra time to practice shape manipulation and finally learn how to fly." Mizura recounted, "I won't continue my training near the star…but I'll have plenty of other ways to develop my jutsu."

Hokuto and Sumaru were both straight-backed and beaming at their teammate, who they had once feared would forever trail behind them in terms of skill.

Hokuto handed out packaged biscuits to everyone seated, which Fujita politely declined.

"It's alright. These weren't part of our rations." Hokuto assured him, "They're just Sumaru's guilty pleasure. He's got a million of them in his saddle bag."

Sumaru cleared his throat in annoyance.

"Thanks!" Naruto was happy to accept charity now that his team was officially out of food.

"So maybe I missed something…" Fū motioned with her cookie, "But how does one train near a star? I've been told that I need to catch up on idiomatic expressions and all that, but I don't quite get how—"

"No, no, it's figurative. We use the term star to refer to the fragment of stone that still radiates ancient chakra." Sumaru corrected, "I ought to have explained that…"

"I was wondering as well." Fujita seconded the notion.

"How would you know the difference between ancient or…recent chakra?" Fū was still processing.

"All chakra originally came from one source." Hokuto passed along a bit of history, "When it escaped from the princess of the Otsutsuki clan and her shinju, and scattered from the possession of her sons, chakra entered the world to be harnessed by humans."

"Our star might be a piece of the former shinju, the original vessel of chakra." Sumaru fished another biscuit from his hip pouch, "Tailed-Beasts are also thought to be manifestations of ancient chakra," born of the Sage of Six Paths."

"Ho ho!" Fū began laughing wildly.

Mizura exchanged confused looks with Hokuto and Sumaru. Likewise, Naruto wished the Waterfall kunoichi would tone it down a little. He wasn't sure if he had misheard Sumaru, but he couldn't get a word in edgewise.

Fū caught her breath, "Chōmei says that's pretty much how it happened!"

"Who?" Hokuto canted her head.

"He's my—"

Fujita clapped a hand over Fū's mouth, "A good friend of hers! Very learned in history."

"Hold on, how do you know that?" Naruto was stumped, "I think Gaara may have mentioned that Sakura-chan read some book in your village, but how did the author confirm that's all true?"

"It is." Sumaru said simply, "Some records were kept by vassal families who tended to the strongest and most powerful shinobi clans in history. In my village, those record-keepers were the Hoshizora clan. In Stone, the Kamizuru clan. In Cloud, the Yotsuki clan. In Sand, the Shirogane clan. In Mist, the Abe clan. In Leaf, the Taketori clan. There were many. The oldest records in their possession, for the most part, were lost. But not in Hoshigakure," He smiled, "We've avoided many conflicts and preserved that knowledge."

"That's—" Naruto raked a hand through his hair, "Kind of nuts."

"I agree. Maybe it's even crazier to try to harness raw chakra and use it for jutsu," Hokuto concurred, "But my dad always said we never could find a better hobby, being wilderness people."

"I know the Taketori clan very well." Fujita was up to speed, "They are vassals of the Hyuga clan."

"Huh." Naruto twitched his nose. Was the world really this small?

"Well." Fū reached to accept another biscuit from Sumaru, "Sounds like I'll be vacationing in Star Village while these two Leaf boys vacation in Waterfall!"

Hokuto and Mizura proceeded to give her the tourism pitch, minus the bit about toxic gas vents in the Bear Country's canyons. Great food, unspoiled forests, glaciers, streams, a giant crater, and the clear night sky— the Star Village was definitely worth a visit. Fū was doubly convinced afterward.

Both teams took deep drinks of water from the oasis spring before parting with pleasantries.

"We will stay briefly in Sand before going home, once the Exam is over." Sumaru clued Naruto into the plan, "We should go out to eat and talk more! Have your friends join us."

Naruto shook on it once again with the Star ninja, "We will. See you then!"

The teams parted ways, and as Sumaru's team took off on a western route, Fū shielded her eyes and watched them go. From beside her, Fujita determined, "They were very nice."

"They were! Seems like they're trying not to bicker while they're out here," Fū had skimmed some unspoken information, "That Mizura boy is jealous of his teammates because they're dating."

Naruto about-faced and kept walking backwards, frowning at Fū, "Chōmei dug that up for you?"
"Yup! Like, those two are walking on eggshells to keep their teammate happy, but he's always trying to hide how annoyed he is." Fū reported, "Third-wheelin' it re-eeaal hard..."

"Sumaru didn't tell me they were dating." Naruto grumbled.

"That's because it isn't our business." Fujita reminded them both.

"Yeah, I know." Naruto spun around again and continued heading the procession, "Let's go north from here. I remember a plateau that Ero-sensei and I passed. We'll take a break and then I'll try to sense if any Jounin are close by."

All was quiet on the march, at least for a while. Naruto noticed Fū muttering random facts about herself and giggling as they hiked. He tuned in a listening ear.

"My dad died when I was little, but my mom's always been tough." Fū flexed one of her arms, "I take after her!"

After another beat of silence, "My favorite? Oh, it's a tie between katsudon and crayfish."

"Crayfish?" Fujita muttered incredulously.

Naruto asked over his shoulder, "What are you two doing?"

"Nothing!"

"—when he thinks questions I tell him the answers!"

It was silent again after they gave conflicting replies. Naruto stopped and cocked a hand on his hip, "Playing twenty questions and excluding me, eh?"

"You can play next?" Fū shrugged and kept marching.

"Who likes to eat crayfish?" Fujita was still grossed out as he tagged along.

Naruto shook his head and then took up the rear of the team. He overheard again as Fū tittered and shook Fujita by the shoulder.

"Your parents are so sweet! And funny!" After glimpsing Fujita's memory of them, Fū had to give a compliment.

"Thanks," Fujita puffed up a little, "I'll never be as funny as my dad, even though he's teaching me about punchline delivery and sarcasm."

"There are funny people in the Hyuga clan?" It shocked Naruto.

"Well, just one person— my dad." Fujita clarified, "He's the clan steward of the Main House."

"Are stewards some kind of cook?" Fū was unsure.

"No...they are the standby heirs in a clan, in traditional practice." Fujita informed her, "Should anything happen to Hiashi-sama, Neji-sama, or my cousins, my father would step in to lead the Hyuga clan as a last resort. Someday I might do the same." He noticed Naruto had fallen into step with him, looking dumbfounded, "Though I really wouldn't want to! It's almost unheard of. I think only twice before in the history of our clan has an acting steward had to do such a thing. We're sort of like a safety net."
"How come I never heard of any of this stuff?" Naruto stomped a bit in the sand, "Was I just not paying attention?"

"It's archaic, to be honest. Most other clans in Leaf will elect a replacement or candidate heir in an emergency like that." Fujita assured him, "Someday…if we no longer use the Caged Bird Seal…we can move to such a system. Then anyone, even someone from the Branch, could be chosen to lead the Hyuga clan if we lose a leader abruptly."

Naruto rubbed his nose and wondered, "What are they waiting for?"

When the rocky plateau came into view, Fū excitedly took off, flying speedily until she was crouched down in shade again. Naruto and Fujita hustled to keep up. The group took a sip of water while regrouping.

"Do you think a Jounin target would hide from us or try to escape?" Fū was prognosticating, "Maybe we should split up or organize an ambush?"

Naruto held up a finger while he sat down, "Let me see what I can feel with Sage Mode, then we'll come up with a plan. An ambush is always a good default…" He shut his eyes and fell still. A moment later, he cracked an eye open again, unchanged, "Did you hear that?"

Fujita was tense, "Hear what?"

Naruto motioned for his teammates to not move or make noise. A faint sound carried in the air. Eyes wide, Naruto rose to his feet and announced, "That's a bell."

"You can hear a bell ringing?" Fū hopped up while cupping her ears, "Hm. I must be hard of hearing..."

Fujita scanned the area with the Byakugan and gasped, "There's a Jounin close by! A kunoichi!"

"It better not be Temari." Naruto mumbled under his breath, "Uh…Fujita, can you describe her?"

"Tall and skinny like a willow tree! Flak vest, short hair like a boy's…" Fujita frowned, "Looks to be…practicing a color guard routine."

"I have no idea what that is, but I'm guessing that's not Temari." Naruto felt secure in that line of deduction.

"Ohh! That's when dancers wave flags or poles around for parades and stuff!" Fū was familiar with the description, "I bet it's a weapon."

"I think it might be." Fujita agreed.

Fū cracked her knuckles, "Let's beat her over the head with it!"

"Hold your horses." Naruto hooked a finger in the loop of Fū's bag before she could strut away, "Fujita, give me details on her position. Let's assume she's hard to sneak up on, since we're out in the open. This will probably be a head-to-head confrontation."

Fujita nodded and relayed the west by northwest position, 38 meters away. He and Fū listened to Naruto's plan.

"I'll send Shadow Clones ahead disguised to look like us, and try to draw her attention. We can get into position if we do that, and jump on her from the rear and flanks." Naruto rested his chin in his palm, pondering, "Something tells me this one probably knows plenty of jutsu, and is better suited for melee combat. A lot of ninja in Hidden Sand are experts in weapons or puppets…so we'll have to try to disarm her, or risk getting smashed."

"Yup, yup." Fū was nodding.

"Okay, so here's the part where we lay our cards down on the table." Naruto rested his hands on his knees, "I need to know what kind of techniques you guys can use, especially to stun or disable our target. You've seen mine already— the Hiraishin, Rasengan, Sage Mode, and Shadow Clones… maybe a fireball if we really need one…"

"I'm a sharp-shot with shuriken." Fū boasted, "And I can blind enemies with a flash from my scale powder! Make a sticky string net…I know a little bit of Water Release…which is no good out here. I've got one Wind Release technique that can help, and Chōmei will lend me as much chakra as I need to get beefy!"

"I've got four quivers of senbon. I know a few advanced forms of Jyukken," Fujita shared, "And I can use Heavenly Rotation for defense… I've also been working on Lightning Release too." He smiled at Fū beside him, "My Lightning Release can make your Wind Release stronger, if we work together."

Fū began patting his back enthusiastically, shaking with anticipation.

Naruto reached over for a fist-bump, "We can work with that. Let's grab that bell and high-tail it back to Suna!"

The youngsters tapped their fists together.

The disguised trio of Shadow Clones did very well when it came to sneaking within a few meters of the Sand kunoichi. That cover was blown when the woman fell still and pointed a metal staff in the direction of the dune they hid behind.

"Don't be shy." The woman spun the bar in her hand, "I'll talk to you like a civilized lady first. There are rules to go over…"

The phony Naruto, Fujita, and Fū clones popped up and approached cautiously. The real team had taken a roundabout route west, moving in silently from behind, and beyond earshot as the Sand kunoichi made some announcements. She was olive-skinned and lovely, her white blonde hair trimmed close to the scalp, dressed in dark, form-fitting fatigues of Sunagakure. When she blinked her cat-like eyes, her irises gleamed peony pink in the sunlight.

"I am Zeriko." She stuck her staff into sand, where it stood about her height beside her, "It looks like you are Team 7, if I recall the roster lists…interesting." Zeriko smiled, "I have a single bell that only one team may take in exchange for entry back into Hidden Sand. I am permitted to use any technique against you that I see fit. And that is true for your team as well— anything goes." She had no idea the original team was creeping up in her blind spot, "Before we begin, are any of you ill or injured? Or do you need water stores replenished? This is a courtesy extended by the Kazekage."

Naruto's Shadow Clone gave a clipped but merry, "No thanks!" when it charged forward in time with its disguised counterparts. An odd chain of events unfolded as Zeriko took a timely leap backwards to avoid the lunging group…and crashed straight into the real Fū who had snuck up behind her. Beetle wings spread, Fū cinched her arms and legs around Zeriko's shoulders and waist, relishing the woman's astonished squeak of surprise. Nearby, Naruto and Fujita groaned at the reckless attack.

"Flying Suplex!" Fū flapped up and took a back-bending dive down into sand, burying Zeriko head first.

Naruto wanted to bark an impatient what the hell do you think you're doing?! but at first glance it appeared that Fū had single-handedly taken the opposing kunoichi out of commission. A breeze rolled across sandy hilltops in a moment of stillness. Fū released the Jounin and stood, dusting her hands off, "Whew! What a thrill—!

One of Zeriko's legs lashed backwards and kicked Fū squarely in the mouth. The girl sputtered and fell. In a kerfuffle of sand, Zeriko unearthed herself, unscathed by the assault, and shook dust and gravel from her outfit. She strode past Fū on the ground before lifting up her staff, spinning it round her forearm, "Don't dish what you can't take, girl."

Fujita gaped at the display, but Naruto's command to take the right flank snapped him out of it. The remaining Shadow Clones shed their transformations and surrounded Zeriko, she handily bashed them apart with a whirl of her metal staff. Fujita dove in as Fū simultaneously threw herself forward; the two hoped to catch the Jounin in a pincer move. Zeriko was there one moment and gone the next in a blink of the Body Flicker. Before the two charging teammates crashed into one another, Fujita slipped sideways with thoughtful footwork.

Naruto whistled, signaling a need to regroup, "She's running away! The real trick is going to be catching her…"

Fū was stewing and rattling off profanities, but she relaxed as she watched Naruto hand his anchor knife to Fujita, bidding them to go ahead.

"I'll catch up as soon as I'm in Sage Mode." Naruto took a seat, creating two Shadow Clones to assist him in gathering Natural Energy, "Fujita, track that Jounin; and Fū: blind her or slow her down!"

Acknowledging their orders, Fujita darted off like a bullet, and Fū kept pace beside him while flying low. Her speed built momentum, eventually overtaking Fujita as he watched their target racing over a sandy flattop, "Fū! She's due west!" His directions faded as he fell behind, and Fū bolted ahead in full flight, with a fresh jolt of chakra from her Tailed-Beast.

She rushed through hand signs and took aim at Zeriko below, "Net Shaped Prison!" And Fū spat a sticky mass of webbing the stretched and smacked the Jounin down to the ground. With a web string in hand, Fū landed hard on her feet and called to Fujita as he barreled ahead, "Do that pokey-hand-thing to her, Fujita!" She pulled back on the string, tripping Zeriko again as she stood and struggled in the net.

Fujita closed in, skidding over sand, spinning into a brutal short-form of Gentle Fist once the Sand kunoichi's tenketsu were in range. He'd drilled chakra into 14 chakra points before recoiling, bouncing his fingertips off of a hard, impenetrable surface. Zeriko's skin— her whole body from top to bottom, was coated in brushed metal armor. In the second he took to evaluate what ability he was witnessing, Zeriko jabbed the end of her pole in Fujita's stomach to push him off. She thrashed and writhed until the web net fell away in stringy pieces. The shiny, sleek armor on the kunoichi's body remained; not a product of a jutsu, but of a natural gift. Fujita was on his feet again, testing to see how strong his strikes had to be to penetrate through the metal surface. Only one hit seemed to reach, and it was nearly a waste of chakra and precision. Zeriko's Taijutsu was swift, clocking him several times in the head and knees. "Where did that third teammate of yours go?" Zeriko was suspicious.

Fujita retreated when he spotted Fū diving in his field of vision, getting in close to Zeriko while holding the Tiger sign, "Scaled Sneak jutsu!" Fū clapped her hands and Zeriko saw only twinkling light, flash-blind from the scale powder tossed in her face.

As the powder cloud thinned, Fū and Fujita attacked the jounin from both sides—reaching for the small bell on a string fastened to Zeriko's belt. She had tossed up her staff and completed hand signs, unfortunately, "Spike Rock jutsu!" Jagged boulders jutted up from the ground beneath their feet, warding the Genin away. Zeriko caught her weapon without an ounce of effort, observing, "The two of you aim to test me—"

Fū was unceremonious about her volley of shuriken, which cut off the Jounin's remarks on their teamwork. Fujita charged in with that covering fire, ducking under the first few swings of Zeriko's staff before rotating in defense, "Kaiten!"

The dome of chakra heaved Zeriko up, where Fū soared above and extended a hand—brushing the cool bell with her fingertips. Zeriko was a whirlwind of kicks and punches again, using Taijutsu in mid-air to fend off Fū as they descended in a flurry. On the ground, Fū successfully blocked another kick to the head, but screeched when the Jounin improvised and grabbed one of her wings. Fū struggled before Zeriko's reverse kick clipped her forehead, sending her face-first into sand.

Without a second to waste, Fujita was following up on the attack, spinning and jabbing as he called to Fū on the ground, "Are you alright?" She gave a weary thumbs-up while rising to her hands and knees.

Fujita wanted to try his luck with a 32-point strike and see if that could slow her, but Zeriko rushed at him with a burst of strength, her staff held lengthwise in order to mow him down, "Steel Train!" He barely somersaulted out of the way of the unstoppable lunge. It kicked up dust and debris that made his eyes water. Fujita gulped when Naruto abruptly appeared next to him in a flash, his eyelids tinged red.

He extended a hand and pulled Fujita up, "Rough going?"

"She's not the type to be caught off-guard or give us an opening." Fujita assessed. He handed the anchor knife back to Naruto.

"Got any long range attacks, then?" Naruto inquired.

"A few." Fujita motioned to Fū to take the left side and wait for an opportunity, "Let's try to make her use Earth jutsu again. I'll be better prepared."

Naruto saluted him and rushed ahead, swinging wide, indirect punches at the Sand kunoichi that battered her. Zeriko was not in the mood for a throttling, and with some coaxing; Naruto did manage to earn another Earth Style attack from the kunoichi. Fujita waited for the rocky spikes to rise up from the ground when he made his move. He slipped several senbon from his sleeves, snapping them forward and stuck them into the rising boulders, draining the Earth Release chakra into his Lightning technique, "Static Noose!"

When the technique flared with an overabundance of chakra, lightning crackling wildly, Naruto had the good sense to throw himself to the side and duck for cover. Zeriko yelped and staggered away as her jutsu had been usurped, and a Lightning counter easily coursed through her metal armor. Dizzy and slightly fried, the Sand kunoichi turned to make another escape…and walked straight into one of Chōmei's great tails as it lashed out from Fū's back. Zeriko was tossed to the dirt once more.

Hands still protecting his head, Naruto looked up to see the lightning field had died off, and Fū had thwacked their target with a tail that resembled her smaller set of wings. With Zeriko pancake flat, Fujita swooped over her and snatched the bell from her belt.

He toddled away and panted heavily, pausing to rest his hands on his knees and breathe easy again.

"Woo hoo!" Naruto was rising nearby and cheering the accomplishment. On the far side of the sandy plain, Fū did a little hip-wiggling dance.

Zeriko's metal body ability flickered, and she shed it as she stood up and rolled her shoulders. Fū stopped dancing at the sight. While Fujita had his guard lowered, Zeriko easily hurled her staff with a spin, whacking Fujita from behind and knocking him down like a bowling pin. Naruto dared protest in an angry shout, and the Sand kunoichi sped over to him while baring her teeth, "Who says I can't take that bell back?"

By all accounts he should've dodged the punch to the face— he felt it coming. Naruto was still punched in the face by an angry Jounin.

Fū sprinted over to Fujita on the ground, hooked her arms around him, and took off. The boy was coming to and still in possession of the bell. Naruto could forgive her for trying to make a run for it. While he picked himself back up, still seeing triple of everything, Zeriko was after the thieving Genin like a runaway steam engine. Naruto sent several Shadow Clones ahead before joining the chase.

"Fujita, say something if you're awake!" Fū demanded as they climbed higher.

"Don't drop me!"

"I won't! I bench weights that are heavier than you!" She shouted some reassurance.

Then, she heard Fujita's yelp of fright and looked down in time to see Zeriko's metal staff could extend, lengthening and carrying her up to a height great enough to leap for them. The Sand kunoichi's arm was coated in metal again, swinging at Fujita like a war-hammer, but Fū's barrel-roll spared him as she purposefully dropped her passenger. She dove down to catch him again, cringing as his caterwaull rattled her ears, "Fū! I told you not to—!"

"You're fine—!"

A gasp, "I think I lost the bell!" They glanced down again, watching the tiny glint falling through air. Zeriko was after it, swiping her staff 'round to defend against pestering Shadow Clones.

Though she closed her hand around the bell and retrieved it, two of Naruto's clones were petulant and detonated beside Zeriko. The explosion flung her and her magically extending staff apart, where the real Naruto, Sage Mode refreshed for a second round, crushed the weapon to smithereens with a Big Ball Rasengan. Zeriko quirked a brow at the move, "I can't replace that. It's priceless."

"Should've had that insured!" Naruto barked.

Zeriko stuffed the bell in her pocket and formed hand signs, and to Naruto's surprise— her jutsu wasn't aimed for him. Behind Naruto some dozen meters, Fū and Fujita landed…and were instantly swallowed up in four gargantuan walls and a roof of metal, enclosing them in a great box. The Sand kunoichi brushed sand from her outfit and hair, sighing. Naruto backtracked to strike the box with a mighty Sage kick (no good) and tried to call in vain to his imprisoned teammates.

"You had better decide what to do soon." Zeriko warned him, "They won't be getting out of that Steel Labyrinth Box for at least an hour." With that, she turned tail and ran again.

Sweat streaked down the side of Naruto's face, sliding his hands along the steel wall. There was no give, no rumbling or disturbance from the interior. He backed up and rammed a fully-formed Rasengan into it, which could only scuff the surface. 'Shit!' Naruto fretted about their target Jounin disappearing on the horizon, 'I can't get them out…it'd take me too long to gouge a hole with a ton of Rasengans, even with a hundred Kage Bunshin at it…she'd be long gone.' Gritting his teeth, Naruto took off running, 'I'm sorry Fujita! Fū! But Ero-sensei and Gaara told me not to let anyone hold me back!'

Naruto gained ground at a grueling speed. He hurled his anchor knife to cover wide distances instantly, collecting the kunai again and again as he progressed. A stab of guilt nagged at him, 'Even if I get this bell, then what? Zeriko could chase me again, unless I knock her unconcious or something! Her box isn't going to expire anytime soon.' He could see the kunoichi as he closed the distance, 'No, I've got to do this. I can go back for them! I won't leave them behind. They're going to pass this with me!'

He was down to his last charge of Sage Mode when he pounced, knocking Zeriko over and trading vicious hammer-fists and high kicks while they skidded in sand. "You're not quite like the other two," Zeriko noticed, "Such a shame you had to leave them…but you've got to look after number one, right?"

"I'm never going to be number one." Naruto ducked a right hook and skimmed Zeriko with Frog Kumite, blasting her into the side of a dune like a hydraulic press, "This is for them!"

She emerged in full steel-armor again, smiling. Zeriko charged back, weaving and jabbing with enhanced Taijutsu, only to mistakenly go after a Shadow Clone again— which seized her in a full- nelson when it detonated. She skipped like a stone over sand and bramble, aggravated, unaware of the Rasengan coming up from behind her until it had already pulverized her into the ground again. In that moment of bleariness, Naruto extracted the bell from Zeriko's pocket and dashed out of the dust cloud. Like the terminator she was, Zeriko got up again faithfully. She began to form hand signs as she reprimanded Naruto, "I have a box for you too, young man!"

Heart pounding, Naruto watched the walls rise up around him in the millisecond after he let his anchor kunai fly. Zeriko dodged the knife as it whizzed past her cheek, and blinked in shock as Naruto reappeared beside her in a flash. Her second Steel Labyrinth Box slammed shut with no captive inside, and Naruto let a follow-up Rasengan with the last of his Sage strength crash over Zeriko's head. It leveled the area and slowed her for a solid 20 seconds, which was an improvement.

With his Sage chakra spent, Naruto sucked in a deep breath and prepared to make a break back in the direction of his team. Zeriko wobbled to her feet. He'd had yet to meet someone who could take half so many direct hits and keep going. A great tremor shook the ground under their feet. The Jounin exchanged a questioning look with Naruto before settling her eyes on the first giant Labyrinth Box. The top and sides were blown off in an earthquake of energy, astounding the two witnesses as a behemoth blue and green beetle emerged— seven massive tails stretching out around it like wings. Zeriko's shoulders sagged at the sight of it.

"Well..." Naruto dusted his hands, positively jolly, "I guess someone can break your super-strong box."

"My jutsu isn't foolproof." Zeriko understood that.

"Time for me to go…unless you'd like to take another shot at us?" He was inching his way toward his teammates.

"It was challenging enough facing a jinchuriki one-on-one while he went easy on me," Zeriko got Candid, "But I lack the confidence to try and stop a Tailed-Beast in all of its glory, unrestrained." She waved him off, "Take that bell. Now that my segment is over, I can go home and make a nail appointment."

Naruto was grateful, "Thanks lady! You're one of the toughest people I've ever smashed with a Rasengan."

"No one with Metal Body Shock is dainty…though I try to look it." Zeriko bade him farewell and set out into the desert.

With that parting, Naruto hurried back towards the enormous beetle, and halfway it spotted him and closed the distance. Covering his eyes to squint up at the towering beast, Naruto saw Fujita atop Chômei’s horn, "You okay up there, kid?"

A voice echoed down, "Yeah! Did you get the bell?"

"Sure did!" Naruto stood beside the Tailed Beast and patted a greenish tail-wing, "Um…is Fū okay?"

Better than okay! We’re just flexing our muscles again. Chômei turned slowly, about-facing to make the way to Sunagakure, Climb on, Naruto.

He did so, finding the way up carefully along the sleek shell of the beast. Never before had Naruto's proximity to a Bijû been so benevolent, though he was quickly adjusting. He sat on Chômei's head and Fujita slid down to join him, bright-eyed and bushy-tailed.

"I felt bad about leaving you guys in that box." Naruto confessed, "Sorry. I had every intention of coming back…"

"I know, I could see you." Fujita patted his shoulder, "Fū told me she was sure that she could break us out, so I trusted her. This could be…one of the most amazing things that has ever happened in my life."

"Yeah…this is pretty high up there, even for me." Naruto conceded.

Chômei's flight pattern evened out, carrying them north over dunes and rocky outcrops. Suna had not been far away to begin with, but the Tailed Beast delivered them a short walking distance to the outer gate. With a polite farewell, Chômei traded places with his jinchuriki again, prompting Naruto and Fujita to leap off as the form shrunk back into that of Fū’s thin frame.

"Whew! Nice workout." She stood between her friends waiting for two simultaneous high fives, which she got, "Good job, fellas."

"I love flying." Fujita decided.

"See?" Fū laughed as they strolled up to the gate entrance, "You didn't know what you were missing! Now you just need to try some all you can eat buffets."

"I'm ready for a buffet now." Fujita did some back stretches while walking.

Fū poked his exposed midriff when his shirt rode up, "What? Those Star Village biscuits didn't fill you up?"

"Better than the cactus paddles did." Naruto wagered.
A Chunin greeter welcomed them and held out a hand for their bell, "Well done! Team number?"

"Team Seven!" Fū hopped up and down in place.

Naruto gladly forked over the dinged and scratched bell.

"You can proceed to the final stage of the Exam, which is a review by panel." The Chunin pointed out a passageway covered by tarps for shade, "Follow that path to the end and to the plaza. On your right you'll see the pavilion tent and be given directions there. You'll be reviewed one at a time."

They did as instructed, though Fū did not get a straight answer if there was a restroom near the plaza, "I've had to pee since noon…"

"Why didn't you?" Naruto was feeling like a beleaguered parent, "You had like a thousand opportunities to go before we tracked that Jounin down!"

"I forgot. I was too excited."

From behind them, Fujita blew a small raspberry.

Fū resorted to power breathing to control her bladder. At last, they came upon the large, tented pavilion and stopped outside of it, finding another attendant asleep on a bench. An old woman dressed in gray robes snored quietly while balancing a clipboard on her stomach. Fū gave her a gentle shake.

"…get…your…filthy mits off of me White Fang!" The old woman leapt up with a screech, disoriented as she woke. She noticed the shaken Genin team waiting for acknowledgment.

"Oh. Early birds." Chiyo wiped her mouth on her sleeve, then flipped through a packet of competing teams to pull their profiles to the front, "Listen up…everything you have done up until this point can be used against you, or in support of your promotion to Chunin Rank. You were under surveillance during every stage."

"We were?" Fujita was surprised. He hadn't noticed anyone watching.

"Did I stutter, boy?" Chiyo sniffed, "Yes, you were. Team Seven, is it? Ho, what a handful…" She wiped a bit of crust from her eyes and then pointed out another bench behind the large tent, "Wait there. Go in once it's your turn. You—" Chiyo pointed to Fū, "First."

Fū's wary smile was the last thing Naruto and Fujita saw before moving to sit and wait to be called in.

Inside the tent, Fū was very amused to see a television monitor set up on a rolling cart beside a long table of children. At the center the two eldest children sat, a boy and a girl, about ten years old by Fū's estimate. They had very serious looks on their faces. On either side of the centered children were a pair of younger children who were distracted with paper folding projects to pass the time. Most of the six-person panel looked up and noticed Fū, then called on each other to focus on the task at hand.

"We," The ten-year-old boy announced, "Are a panel of students from Sunagakure's Academy… classes B, C, and D represented. We will judge your proficiency in this Exam based on recorded footage and notes."

The girl beside him added, "It's for project credit."
A young boy of six years at the edge of the table whispered, "Whoa, you guys sound really grown up readin' that script…"

"Shhh!" They hushed him.

"Name?" The eldest boy tried to sound bored.

The girl on his left whacked his arm, muttering, "It's on the placard, dunce. Chiyo-baasama flips it over when an entrant walks in!"

Fū announced herself anyway, "I'm Fū of Takigakure!"

This greeting invigorated the children, who then chorused back, "Hi Fū!"

"Heh, heh…hi." She stifled her giggles.

"Fū of Takigakure, during this review you are required to answer our questions." The head boy prefaced the evaluation.

The youngest boy at the edge of the table piped up again, "You're dirty."

"We were in the desert for three days-ish. We're all gonna be gross." Fū checked her top and skirt and found streaks from cactus paddle juice, and dried blood droplets from when she'd been kicked in the mouth.

A playback of filmed events rolled forward and rewound on the screen as two younger children quarreled silently over the remote control. The eldest girl confiscated it from them, "The recording shows that Fū was the first member of her team to wake up and figure out what was going on."

All children nodded in agreement and scratched their pencils onto notepads. A few minutes went by as footage was reviewed, played back multiple times, paused, and children bickered over the significance of what they were seeing.

"See? She respected water rations and fairness, that's worth a point on the rubric." A nine-year-old boy grumbled.

"She worked really well with her teammates." A younger girl pointed out, "It was…explerary…er…example…exemplary!"

A boy on her right muttered, "That's a tough word, it's okay."

"She is able to use…a variety," The youngest boy pronounced carefully, "Of Ninjutsu."

"Competence in Taijutsu!"

"Strategy!"

"Takes orders!"

"Improv…isation."

"One of four shinobi in this Exam…that was able to fly." The eldest boy noted, "There are points for uniqueness, I think?"

Scratching on paper pads continued.
"So…” The eldest girl had a hard edge to her voice, "Why should we promote you?"

Put on the spot, Fū blinked rapidly before piecing together a truthful answer, "You…can if you want to. I just came here to make friends, actually!"

The children cheered at that comment.

"Want a juice box?" The youngest girl offered one.

"Yes please!" Fū approached the table to accept the drink, and tapped the straw's wrapper on the table to free it.

"Don't forget," The nine-year-old boy snapped his fellow panel members back to reality, "That Fū jumped recklessly into the surf for a clue, and could have endangered herself and her team."

The kids muttered about the point deduction and scribbled subtractions onto their notebooks.

"Yeah, she also used up some supplies carelessly…”

More scratching.

"I don't know how serious you are about being a ninja, to be honest." The eldest boy turned his nose up at her.

"Me neither. It's a job that I'm good at." Fū gave a sincere answer, "Making friends is more important to me. I remember the Kazekage talking about working together, so it made me believe I could."

Soft gasps.

"As long as I can protect my village, that's enough for me." The kunoichi did not care much either way if she was promoted or not.

The silence hung in the air until the youngest boy asked the important question that all of the panel wanted answered, "…are you…that giant bug?"

Fū rubbed the back of her head, abashed, "Sort of!"

"Points! Points for that!" The boy yowled. He and the other children frantically scrawled on paper.

"Do you have any other comments you would like to make…advocating…on your own behalf?" The eldest girl inquired with new vocabulary.

"Nope!" Fū was done, "Where's the restroom?"

"Just across the courtyard." The girl filled her in.

"Chiyo-baasama!" The eldest boy summoned the village elder while he got a final count of points that the panel had tallied up. When Chiyo poked her saggy face in, he reported to her, "Pass."

Fū thanked them with a wave, accepted a promotional certificate, and then hurried out. Chiyo yawned, "I'll…go get the next one."

One of the children reversed the recorded footage until a young man popped into the tent, glancing around inquisitively. Chiyo hooked a new name on a display placard before toddling out.

"Hyuga Fujita." The eldest girl read the name aloud.
The eldest boy went over his script again, "We are a panel of students from Sunagakure's Academy — classes B, C, and D represented. We will judge your proficiency in this Exam based on recorded footage and notes."

The girl added, "Fujita from the Hidden Leaf village: be sure to answer any of our questions as best you can."

He was momentarily confused by the sight of the panel, but nodded when addressed. A young boy pushed 'play' on the remote, which cued up at an unflattering shot of Fujita screaming in the cavern as Fū took off with him for the first time. A few children snickered.

"Well," A little girl tried to redeem the applicant in front of them, "He cut off a scorpion's stinger before this. Go back a little…"

"That's worth some points."

"Initiative!"

Scribbling began on their notepads.

"Look at that, pause it!" A child gestured at the screen, "He can spin and deflect stuff! Like Gaara-sama's shield, but without sand!"

The children liked the look of it as their pencils scratched again.

"Good cooperation!"

"Put a knife in that eel's eye…"

"Speaking of eyes— his are weird."

"It's the Byakugan, you idiot. Don't you read?" A girl snipped in annoyance.

"He's got great Taijutsu…and that Lightning jutsu put Zeriko-sensei down."

"Not for long…"

The eldest girl was critical of the candidate, "He wants to lead…but is not very good at it."

"He's not the worst."

"How long have you been a graduated ninja?" The youngest girl asked.

"About four years." Fujita estimated. He tried not to take offense to verbal assessments bouncing around.

"Hmm…"

The pencil scratching slowed down.

"Why do you want to be a Chunin?" The eldest boy asked.

"I know I'm not the best." Fujita understood their reservations, "And that is why I'll always be motivated to improve. That's the way I want to serve my village alongside trusted comrades."

Quiet fell after that comment, and children leaned over each other to compare notes and scores.
Someone pointed out to the youngest panel member that he'd been writing upside-down in his notepad. He did not see a problem with this, "My characters are still neat."

"Chiyo-baasama!" One of the children seated at the center called the elder back and nodded to her, "Pass!" The same child handed a promotional certificate to Fujita, mentioning that it needed to be presented to the Hokage.

"Good. You," Chiyo motioned with her head, "Run along. Restroom's across the courtyard on the left."

"Actually, is there somewhere I can get something to—?"

"There's a shave ice cart over there, whippersnapper." Chiyo hurried him out.

Fujita exited the tent to find a snack, flummoxed that a bunch of Academy students had been the ones to promote him.

Chiyo flipped the display placard to the final team member's name. She scrunched her face at Naruto, briefly staring after she ushered him into the pavilion. Then, she returned to her bench.

After seeing how quickly Fū and Fujita had been processed and expelled from the tent (both with certificates), Naruto had an inkling that some strange mechanism was in place. That hunch was validated when he walked in and discovered the panel was comprised of six children. It figured that Gaara would want to be make an evaluation as unorthodox as possible. Gaara had always been privy to how brutally honest and unfiltered the opinions of children could be, juxtaposed to the politicized and biased views of adult evaluators.

A child at the center of the table was reading scripted lines about being Academy students, that they were running the panel for project credit, so on and so on until another kid pitched a fit about stupid, repetitive lines, and a ruckus broke out, knocking the start of Naruto's review off the rails. One child pitched the remote control for the television and clocked another child in the head with it. Crying ensued.

Hoping to get some help, Naruto poked his head out of the tent flap to inquire with Chiyo, "Excuse me, Granny…I think the panel is in crisis?"

She was already out cold on the bench. Naruto ducked back into the tent to watch two younger children chasing each other. The eldest girl stood up on her chair, bellowing for "Everyone to knock it off!" and then the two racing youngsters slammed into one another and began wrestling on the floor.

"Whoa— whoa!" Naruto got in between them, lifting each child, boy and girl, by the scruffs of their shirts, "You guys are supposed to work together! This isn't constructive!"

"I'm just…! Tired!" The little girl wept, "I don't like this stuff. Class is easier."

The little boy wriggled wildly in Naruto's grip.

"And Tomio hit me in the he-eaaaaaad!" The girl sobbed.

"I wasn't aiming for you, Jurina!" The boy tried to pry Naruto's hands off, "Your fat head was in the way! Haruo is being a big jerk!"

At the table, Haruo jumped up from his seat, "I'm following directions! You new kids can hardly keep your eyes open through a full day of school! Cranky little blisters…"
The eldest Academy boy had talked the eldest girl down from her soap box, and those at the table seemed to cool off. Naruto sat down on the floor, keeping each child stuffed under his arms on either side, "Okay…let's just relax everyone…"

By some miracle, cranky students Tomio and Jurina had settled down in whimpers, hugging Naruto for moral support as if he were a stuffed animal. Fuddled, he patted their heads and soothed them.

"Sorry, Uzumaki-san. That was unprofessional of us." The head boy bowed in apology, a gesture that the head girl student mirrored.

"It's cool. Even Kages have bad days." Naruto extended a thumbs up and then looked down at the cuddlers, "Do you two want to go back to the panel now?"

"No. Here's fine." Tomio tucked his head under Naruto's sage cloak.

At the table, a girl reminded them, "You two still have to watch the footage and help us with scoring, if you sit there." Both children nodded and Haruo grudgingly walked their notepads and pencils over to them. Naruto sat passively and held the sniffing pair while the screen flashed with events from the Exam.

At one point Jurina tugged on Naruto's tunic to get his attention, "You smell sweaty."

"Sorry about that…"

"It's okay. I like your whiskers…and butter-color hair." She turned back to watch the screen. She was doodling a whiskered face on her paper pad.

Naruto pressed his lips together and reeled at the peculiarity of his situation.

"Did you see those clones explode? Rewind that!" The eldest boy had the footage turned back, before asking Naruto, "Is that real?"

"Is what real?" He missed the comment.

"Can you really make clones explode?"

"Sure, but I'm not demonstrating in here." Naruto confirmed with a shrug.

Pencils pattered on notepads again.

"Hm…" Muttering from the center of the table, "Good reflexes, strategy…"

"You're so fast I don't even see you move on the screen!" A kid frustratedly tapped on the remote. Some felt that it was worth points, although they were unfamiliar with the idea of teleportation jutsu.

"He kept everyone on track…" The eldest girl observed, "But then he left his teammates in Zerikosensei's box."

The face of every child in the tent fell.

"Why did you do that?" Tomio asked in a small voice.

"I didn't want to…but that was the best way to help them. I had to get a bell while I could." Naruto explained, "We would've missed our chance if we let the Jounin go. I'd never abandon Fujita or Fū. They became my friends! I was going to go back for them, but they were able to break out of that box."
The kids seemed satisfied with his line of reasoning. Someone tried out the word rational to describe it.

Naruto overhead muttering about resources and cleverness, and the clatter of pencils dropping. Tomio and Jurina turned in their pads at the table for a tally of points, slumping tiredly back in their chairs.

"Baa-sama…" The eldest boy called in a weak voice. There was no reaction. He called a second time, louder and more noticeable…but the elder did not respond. Annoyed, the Academy student pushed back his chair and stomped out of the pavilion to fetch Chiyo.

Several seconds dragged by and Naruto envisioned what it would be like if experienced ninja were the ones scrutinizing his performance. There would be a degree of pomp and circumstance, maybe even flattery. Perhaps bias or unfairness, and other mercenary motivations that grown shinobi had. To that end, Gaara had likely done away with the partisan views of adults as an experiment, as he had seen the self-serving attitudes on Leaf's Exam review board. The children were straightforward with their interpretations, simple though they may be. Naruto got the gist of the impetus behind arranging such a young panel.

He shook out of his thoughts as a cardstock edge prodded against his arm.

"Here, take this." The eldest girl of the panel was handing him a certificate, "You need to show it to your Hokage to be officially promoted. We won't get Chiyo-baasama to wake up for a while…so you can go now."

The children of the panel wished him well, and Naruto, a bit dazed, gave them a small wave before seeing himself out. He exited the pavilion and spotted his temp-teammates beside a shave ice cart.

"I've probably lived through weirder stuff..." Naruto guessed as he joined Fujita and Fū, "But I never did think I'd make Chunin that way."

"Likewise." Fujita agreed before a bite of cherry ice.

"I wish every test was like that." Fū had no objections whatsoever.

"Do you guys want to tag along with me while I look for Gaara? He's got to be close by to oversee the Exam." Naruto offered, "Maybe he can tell me if Ero-sensei made it to the Tide Village."

Fujita nodded while squinting due to a bit of sour syrup.

"Sure!" Fū bought an extra cup of ice, "I'll give this to him a gesture of good-will. I hope he'll let us shower somewhere, because woo-boy—! I'm ripe."

Chapter End Notes

Grooved to Led Zeppelin for this one! A cute, easygoing entry to offset the calamity to the south. Sorry in advance, it won't be pretty. Let's eat snacks. It's pretty evident how often I think of munching. Thanks for sticking with me constant-readers and new readers alike! I want to drop you down a rollercoaster plunge next, so please keep your arms and legs in the ride at all times.

Chapter Soundtrack: “Vicarious” by Tool

The same morning that Naruto made lively acquaintances on Team Seven in Hidden Sand, the streets of the Tide Village were bustling far to the south.

A colorful, heterogeneous crowd passed each other in two directions on the main avenue of the shopping district. Gulls and terns swooped above, crying out at the sight of unguarded treats and trash that fell short of litter cans. Clouds parted to wink sunshine down on the city, as the final days of warm temperatures meant tourists were fewer, business hours shorter.

Shiogakure’s health clinic was comprised of three state-of-the-art buildings, and on the central eastern corner of the gridded streets sat the smallest office. Families came and went frequently from the building. Sometimes, congratulatory balloons were stuck by the strings in the automatic doors. Most were set free into the sky and forgotten by distracted parents.

Utakata could admit he felt out of place in such a busy, populated space. For years he’d only known wilderness, stretches of uninhabited coast, fireside warmth, and sparse contact with a commonwealth of any kind. He had to think for a moment as he signed his name beneath Hotaru’s on the intake sheet.

They did not linger for long in the waiting area before they were admitted to an examination room, and the annoyances began from there. Utakata sat passively and watched as Hotaru was shepherded around, sent to the restroom for a urine sample, blood pressure and weight were recorded, and a sizeable vile of her blood was taken by a phlebotomist. After that, the on-hand ultrasound technician made cheerful small talk with them, “Is this your first?”

Hotaru shifted nervously on the reclined table, eyes flicking from the monitor, to the ceiling, then to Utakata’s face. He was rather tranquil, if not charmed by the brouhaha. He could tell she needed some encouragement, so he scooched his seat closer and took slow, deep breaths for her to mimic. Hotaru answered finally, “It is.”

“It’s alright, darling, everything is weird when it’s number one.” The technician nodded understandingly, “All the lingo and instruments and vitamins and rules…good grief. And this stuff,” The woman held up a tube of gel, “Is warmed up but still a little unpleasant. I’ll try to keep it quick, I promise.”

“Thank you.” Hotaru rolled up her shirt, frowning, watching as the goop was applied to her abdomen and swirled around.

“Oh! I’m Yayoi by the way. Nice to meet you both!” The technician paused before pressing the transducer to Hotaru’s skin, She nodded to Hotaru and Utakata, who appreciated the courtesy. Yayoi amended as she scanned around, “Let’s see, well, really I meant the three of you.”

The scrambled, amorphous images on the monitor’s screen sharpened into solid features, including the bumpy roundness of a tiny head. Though the exact body part was uncertain, Utakata’s face lit up at the sight, “Is that it?”

“Yeah…” Yayoi scrunched her face while she searched for better angles, “I’ll confirm, but you seem to be at about 12 weeks…the baby still has a bit of a kappa look to it…”

Utakata’s fingertips slid up and down Hotaru’s arm excitedly, “How does it have arms and legs already?”

“It’s super small…like a toy…” Her face was flushed, but she was more intrigued than embarrassed.

Utakata had various questions, “Can you look at the organs and see if those are normal? Can we see the heart?”

“Hold on— I need to fiddle a little.” Yayoi was chuckling, “See there? Nothing unusual, two chambers here…and…arteries cross like their supposed to…”

“I want to see the feet again!” Hotaru was more enthusiastic.

“Sure, I’m just going to check organ development a bit more, then we’ll go over the model and timeline of what to expect.” The technician resisted a grin at the tittering parents.

Utakata asked not to be told the gender, because he preferred to be surprised, but Yayoi shook her head, “We won’t be able to tell for another ten weeks, so enjoy the anticipation.”

Further into the appointment, both Hotaru and Utakata had most of their questions answered and concerns allayed. A physician dropped by to go over the imaging, follow-up visits, and how they ought to prepare for the next 28 weeks. Yes, it was still safe for Hotaru to use Ninjutsu so long as she did not overdo it, the doctor assured. Strain on the chakra circulatory system would have to be considerable before it affected a developing baby. With that, Hotaru extracted the answer she had been looking for—she could keep working for the next three months if she wished. Unless bloodwork results dictated otherwise, things were progressing normally.

With the conclusion of the visit, they were both clownishly beatific as they left the office. Up until that point, Utakata knew that the both of their lives had been something like an obstacle course. A glimmer of joy was a welcome change.

“Since the doctor said it was okay…” Hotaru crossed her arms behind her back, grinning, “I’m going to report to work.”

He took a deep breath, “I had a feeling you would.”

“Come on, class will be fun today! One of my co-teachers said we’re going north for a field trip at the wildlife preserve. It’s a good place for the students to practice jutsu.”

“Are you going to tell anyone?” Utakata wondered.

“Maybe not until after the next appointment.” She supposed, “The administrator might get weird about it if he hears too soon.”

Utakata saw her point, and that she wanted to avoid the circulation of gossip at the Academy for as long as possible. He walked her a few blocks to the school’s gate and kissed her goodbye there, watching as Hotaru ambled on to greet students lining up in the yard. He even lingered to witness the gathered classes and their chaperones set out for the trip. After that, Utakata slipped an earpiece out of the pocket of his fatigues and fitted it to the side of his face. He had to click around for the correct radio channel.

Channel Two has twelve shinobi reporting in, stationed at the “four corners.” Sabaku no Kankuro is in command. By the way, has that bubble-boy reported in yet—?
“This is Utakata speaking.” He gruffed into the radio as he walked, “Don’t be impatient with me, Suna. I told you I had something to do this morning.”

Right, well, you need to hurry up so our squadrons can coordinate. These Tide ninja are antsy, and the Leaf Sealing Corps people are not happy about staying an extra day…but we agreed it’s best if we all keep watch. Hustle! Kankuro was being pushy.

“I’m on my way to the four corners.” He confirmed.

--What was your name again? Everyone keeps calling you bubble-boy, but I don’t get it. A new voice chimed in on Channel Two.

Utakata raised an eyebrow, “Who is this—?”

--Obito. I delivered the intel on the Akatsuki to your Jounin Council.

“Oh.” Utakata said, “Thank you.”

--You’re welcome!

Obito, he just said his name is Utakata, if you weren’t listening. Not the most social ninja in these parts, but he’s alright. Kankuro joked over the communication channel.

--Got it. Utakata. Obito memorized the name, Stay safe today. I have no idea when Pein will show up.

“Tell me more about this criminal who wants to capture me.” Utakata took on a defensive tone, “How many members of the Akatsuki can we expect?”

--One. He is considered the ‘leader’ of the organization. Pein is no joke. Everyone in the Akatsuki has immense respect for him as the founder, though…I don’t know much about what techniques he can use.

Bummer. Kankuro snarked, What kind of a name is ‘Pein,’ anyway? Trying to intimidate targets, eh?

“Has he ever tried to capture a jinchuriki before?” Utakata asked.

--Hm. Not that I know of…usually he leaves that work to subordinates of the organization. And they are no picnic either.

Utakata surmised, “So we have very little information to go off of…and how many active duty ninja are on watch in Tide?”

Fifty. Kankuro reported, Fifty-seven if you count the Leaf and Sand forces here, plus this Obito fellow.

--I can still hear you, ya know.

“And what kind of jutsu can you use, spy of the Toad Sage?” Utakata teased.

--Hundreds.

“Pff.” He took it for a joke.

--No really. Water, Lightning, Earth, and Wind Style…though Fire Style is my specialty. Obito thought on it, My Taijutsu is a bit shabbier these days, but still not half bad. And good luck getting out of my Genjutsu!

Sorry, you didn’t say you were a prodigy. Kankuro was dumbfounded by the tall claims Obito made, There aren’t many ninja who have skills rounded off to that extent. Where did Jiraiya-sama find you, exactly?

--That’s a company secret, I’m afraid.

I’m not kidding. Kankuro made it clear.

--Neither am I. I don’t want to be careless with my identity, based on the line of work I’m in. Please try to trust me. For what it’s worth, I got beat to crap in the last war…and my right arm and right leg are artificial now. There’s a price to pay for experience.

Utakata agreed, “He’s right about that…” He stopped periodically to swirl a small paint brush in his bubble-fluid container, painting marks on brick walls all down the street. He’d been adding small seals all over the city for two days now, since getting the news of an imminent attack.

“Is Saizō on this channel yet?” Utakata asked as he stopped into a tea shop for a beverage.

I am, Utakata. This stakeout blows. I wanted to take Aosako on a honeymoon, but not if this Akatsuki fuckface is going to waltz in here and mess with us.

“I really am sorry about the inconvenience.” He apologized to his friend.

--Yo! You got married? Obito was happy for the stranger, Congrats! That’s awesome. I married the girl of my dreams and I’ve got to say it’s pretty great.

Saizō was appreciative, Hey thanks. Me too. Utakata’s next; he’s got to wife up that girlfriend of his.

“There are a few pressing matters I need to see to first.” Utakata contended at a counter while ordering a latte. The barista gave Utakata a confused look as he spoke to radio contacts.

Saizō added, Are we gonna have old man Tazuna on this com?

Once he gets out of a committee meeting at noon, he knows which channel we’re on. Kankuro confirmed, But he fell asleep during yesterday’s watch so, you know, we can do without if we have to.

Smiling in amusement, Utakata crossed over to a sidebar station to add sugar to his drink, and looked out the window beyond the countertop. He froze like a rabbit at the sight of a dark cloak strolling by in the foot traffic of the street. Though he’d only been given a description of what the Akatsuki uniform was— red clouds on a black coat— such alarming fashion was too obvious to miss. His hands hovered without purpose over stirring sticks and sugar packets. Breathing became difficult.

Can someone bring me an oolong chiller if they’re not already at the four corners? Saizō requested over the radio, I’ll pay you back.

Most of us are here. I bet Utakata’s already at a café though— hey, make that two? Kankuro jumped on the order.

He couldn’t answer with his chest so tight. Utakata took a sip of his drink; hearing Saiken whisper to him, Don’t run. Don’t panic. Everyone’s close by.
Did you get that? Kankuro repeated, —Utakata?

He cleared his throat and spoke, “That order will have to wait. I just spotted him.”

--Aw, fuck. Obito replied back quickly, Did he see you? Where?

“He hasn’t seen me. Westbound on Main. He’ll be passing the corners soon, so keep watch. I’m behind him now.” Utakata left his drink where it sat and stood poised at the door, “Orders?”

For now, Plan A. I’ve got to tell the other channels…we’re getting into position. Kankuro’s sunny mood transformed into solemn leadership.

“Alright.” Utakata inched out of the door, then craned his neck to look down the stretch of street where the Akatsuki affiliate was a distant pedestrian. Utakata took a deep breath before dashing across the boulevard to alleyway cover, and raised his blowing pipe to his lips.

Within twenty seconds, Kankuro was able to give the order to contacts on channels Three and Four to haul ass to the center of town at the four corners. Plan A.

His thoughts contorted in many directions: Breathe in—breathe out through his nostrils, eyes trained on the street below the rooftop vantage point. Utakata— how the barest trace of fear was audible in the man’s voice over the radio, when he’d inquired what to do next. He was only human. Mortal. By association, Kankuro thought of Temari, then, and how she had nearly been killed on her birthday by Momochi Zabuza— August 23rd. Coincidentally, of course. Kankuro couldn’t contemplate how one of the bookends of her life would have fallen on the day his father used to smile the most.

Tazuna’s voice crackled back over Channel One, finally, So this is it, eh? Do I need to come back from the wildlife preserve and…beg for mercy or somethin’?

“You’re with the Academy classes over there?” Kankuro asked to confirm, skulking along a wall and down brick steps toward an alleyway. He wanted to patrol from the ground while Saizō and his subordinates watched from on high.

Yeah, when the committee meeting wrapped up I thought I’d show my face at the school. That was before you told me this dangerous ninja showed up.

“Just stay where you are, Tazuna.” Kankuro advised, “Keep the classes and instructors away from the center of the city. We’re going to confront him here.”

And if my villagers get hurt?

“I already gave an order for a low-key retreat.” Kankuro peeked around the corner of a dentist’s office onto the main avenue, sighting a few calm Chunin shepherding people away from the thoroughfare and store fronts, “Looks like that’s working fine. They’re evacuating Main.”

Tazuna made a few other demands, some tens of kilometers away on the northern crest of the island, pacing beside a magnolia grove. If destruction of buildings and homes couldn’t be stopped, get the people out. Heck— here we go again… He was grumbling. Worried. He wanted Kankuro to make sure that Inari’s orders placed him as far away from bloodshed as possible. Things of that nature.

Kankuro promised to do so and then switched the channel, back to Two. He had a tendril of a chakra string forming on his fingertip, “Maki? Are you there?”

-I’m here, Kankuro.
“Up there with Saizō?”

-Yes.

“Come down here, beside the dental office. You’re with me today.”

-Right away.

It would be more poetic, he thought, to die beside another Sand ninja that day if any piece of the plan went awry. Peering out of the end of the passageway, Kankuro watched a seagull swoop down on the emptying street, striking its beak into a carton of grilled squid forgotten on a bench.

Kankuro held his breath for a moment, preparing his puppet, unwinding chakra strings as he crept backwards through the alley, through a hedge line, picnic area, into the back door of a business, then stopped at the one-way viewing window of an ice cream shop. It was a wonderful tactical position, whether the shop owners knew it or not. One-way windows were great for ambushes. He’d never have known it was there if he hadn’t indulged with some mango soft serve two days ago.

Maki peeked her face in through the open back door, “I followed your strings. This isn’t the dentist.”

“Nope, it’s not. But I might need to get my teeth checked if I keep eating the sundaes here.” He motioned with his head for her to come closer, “Look through this. You can’t see in from the outside.”

“There’s a cute logo on the other side.” Maki had a rough idea of their position.

They watched from the window, inhaling and exhaling, soft and soundless like mice. In the next instant, Utakata was visible outside in the center of the street. Both Sand ninja tamped down their reactionary instincts as their muscles tensed. It seemed like an innocuous meeting as Utakata and the tall figure in the black, cloud-gilded cloak happened across one another, slowing to a stop. This stranger, this threat—the man with persimmon orange hair, piercings in his face—spikes in his ears…had been crossing from one covered archway to the next between shops, trying to keep a low profile. At least, that’s how it looked to Kankuro at a glance.

‘I thought Utakata said this Akatsuki fellow was coming up Main Street westbound…’ Kankuro tried to recall the report of positioning.

In any case, it was the Akatsuki member that seemed most surprised when Utakata so brazenly showed himself on the promenade. The cloaked ninja may have issued a warning in a low bass voice, not that Kankuro caught much of it. He slipped soundlessly beneath the umbrellas and awning of the ice cream parlor’s front, unblinking as the criminal that Obito had called ‘Pein’ rushed forward to stab a sharp, black rod into his target.

Kankuro twitched his index and middle fingers back, strings live. Maki flashed lightning-quick ahead of him with her trusted sealing scroll unfurled.

Like a fish to bait, Pein had attacked and, to the surprise of all spying eyes watching, been swallowed by the snatching barrel ribs of Kankuro’s Kuroari puppet, its Utakata disguise shed at the last possible moment. After that, the puppet took a violent tumble, pulling the chakra strings taught as Kankuro skidded out into the open. The strength of the captured ninja had whipped him sideways across tables, knocking chairs, displays and plants over as Kankuro was lashed. Maki’s follow-up came in time by a hair’s breadth, the captive crashing out of Kuroari’s chest cavity just as scroll paper wound around him with the written seals Halt-Freeze-Interrupt gleaming. Swathed in the Sealing Jutsu, the target fell with a soft thud onto the sidewalk.
‘Plan A went off without a hitch!’ Kankuro was thrilled as he assisted Maki into the cover of an unlocked mechanic’s garage, waiting for the rooftop group to descend. ‘I wanted to see if it was possible to bag this guy and interrogate him.’

He crouched down beside the mummified body, “Okay Maki, this isn’t a perma-sealing is it? Peel back the face so I can talk to him.”

The parchment lifted under her touch, and Maki grimaced as she discovered a completely inert body beneath her Sealing work, “Kankuro…”

“What?”

“We can’t ask him anything.” Suspicious, the kunoichi prodded the carotid artery in the captive’s neck, “He’s dead.”

“How? We didn’t even fight him!” It was preposterous.

“I don’t know. I…” Maki sat on her heels, wracking her brain for an explanation, “This type of jutsu is used by the Sealing Corps to hold and pacify living things…but there’s no chakra flow here. Everything is just…switched off.”

“…I don’t get it.” He stood and brushed his hands, sighing at the sorry sight of his damaged puppet beside a work bench. The patter of feet meeting pavement sounded by the garage door as Saizō and three Tide ninja filed in. They crowded around to get a look at the unexpectedly harmless body.

“Talk about anticlimactic.” Saizō spat his toothpick into a waste bin, “What’s with this shit? He’s supposed to be spilling his guts to us now.”

“Well, it looks like we gave him a heart attack.” Kankuro gruffed in annoyance, “The old bait-and-switch is a classic. I should’ve known it wouldn’t work out the way we wanted it to.”

Obito’s voice came over the radio, Where’d you guys hole up?

“The garage.” Kankuro replied.

In moments, the crazily-dressed man appeared and shoved past the congress of stupefied ninja. Alarmed, Obito stooped down to scrutinize the captive’s lifeless face.

“This isn’t Pein.” He announced with dread.

A hush fell over those gathered, wherein Kankuro began to shake his head in denial, “He fits your description. He fell for the bait. This has—”

“This isn’t the Pein I know.” Obito insisted, “The face is different. The shape and height…these piercings aren’t the same.” He rose to stand again and ruffled his hair, frustrated, “Is this some kind of decoy?”

“If it is, it’s working, and we’re not out there on Main keeping tabs.” Kankuro inclined his head to signal Saizō’s Tide group to return to their posts, which they did hastily. He then turned back to Maki, “Let’s wrap whatever this is up. If it’s Sealed…or dead…but long as it can’t fight, I don’t care.”

Maki closed off the parchment bindings again and rolled it beneath the work bench with her foot, “What if-? If it is Pein like Obito says…but also something else?”
“That makes no sense.” Kankuro abandoned Kuroari where it sat and returned outdoors, leading Obito and Maki down alleyways while radioing to the village’s jinchuriki, “Utakata—head’s up. We had an encounter and Sealed the intruder…but Obito says it isn’t the right person.”

Red hair and ominous cloak with clouds? Utakata confirmed.

“Well, yeah…but a different face?”

That’s what I saw. I can’t recall the finer details—The transmission cut off.

Kankuro fiddled around, trying to overcome static.

Kankuro stopped and rounded on her, immediately having a eureka moment after the suggestion, “Being controlled by the real Pein?”

“That’s my guess. It was a proxy of some kind.” The kunoichi turned to Obito, “Is it possible that the Akatsuki can do something like that?”

“I wouldn’t rule it out just because I never saw it.” Obito reasoned, “If that’s the type of jutsu being used, then there could be—”

Another! Shouting sounded over their radio earpieces all at once. Several parties on Channel Two were clamoring, Utakata’s voice included. I’m being pursued—!

The ground shook.

Kankuro and his companions hesitated to approach the smoke cloud ahead, and sunlight was blocked by the towering figure that rose up after a Summoning. A large crustacean, not quite lobster or crab, lumbered down the road—stuck full of black rods. The group diverted through a dinette to avoid being seen, out the back, and found rooftop cover to watch from as several young Tide ninja engaged the beast to lead it away from civilization.

“-the hell—! He can summon something like that?” Kankuro tried to get in touch with Utakata again, but there was only radio silence, “It sounded like Utakata was spotted.”

“There!” Obito pointed out another cloaked figure, loitering on a balcony wreathed in flower boxes, “That’s the summoner.”

The accused wore an Akatsuki cloak, the array of piercings unique on its face, long, ginger hair pulled into a ponytail. All could see the resemblance to the first proxy they had examined in the garage. There was no current explanation, however, for how these proxies related or operated.

“So we don’t know how many of these there will be…or if other Akatsuki members are here.” Obito ran down the docket, “Pein ordered most subordinates to handle other projects…then maybe…he can replicate himself or manipulate multiple proxies. We need to find out how.”

Kankuro released a pressure-valve on his sarcasm, “Let’s ask him.”

“O-kay…?” Kankuro watched the spy creep across ductwork toward the newly spotted enemy. Maki crouched beside him, relaying updates to Tazuna in a soft voice over the radio.

There was a sliver of uncertainty about this stranger, Obito, and how he’d come out of nowhere to intervene. Kankuro harbored a half-justified doubt in the man’s ability to deal with the threat of the Akatsuki, particularly when he looked at that getup of every-shade-of-blue clothing, goggles, and Live-Well bracelets. In Kankuro’s book, such a visage fell under non-threatening and/or incompetent.

‘Wouldn’t be the first ninja the Toad Sage relied on that looked or acted whacky…and ended up being a freakin’ powerhouse.’ Kankuro reflected on Gaara’s old teammates as contrary evidence.

Obito ventured closer, peering from behind a vent stack on the next roof, his Sharingan observing faint wisps of chakra radiating from points on the proxy’s body, ‘Where it’s stuck with those rods…they’re like receivers for chakra. It’s coming from someplace else…’ He looked around, but could see no solid link of chakra between controller and controlled.

He snuck back to Kankuro and Maki’s position, whispering, “Is Utakata—?”

“I can’t reach him. I’m going to look for him,” Before setting out, Kankuro asked, “Is this something you can handle? We can trust you?”

“Handle it? I’m Jiraiya-sama’s number one stooge.” Obito pulled his goggles down to cover his eyes, “Through and through.”

“Yeah, you fucking are.” Kankuro sighed at the overt goofballishness.

“Listen, those rods that the proxies are pierced with, and that animal too…they’re receiving a chakra signal.” He reported, “That must be why your Sealing Jutsu stopped it—it repels the signal.”

The method by which Obito had collected such information was lost on Kankuro, “And you know this—?”

The spy insisted, “Work with me. I am insanely perceptive. It’s why I have a job.”

“If that’s so…then that body was most certainly dead before anything was done to it.” Maki was following the logic, “Hurting or trying to kill them won’t be of use. A proxy has to be incapacitated, or have its signal disrupted.”

Kankuro passed along those garbled discoveries into his earpiece, hoping against hope anyone was still listening. A rattle and crash sounded, followed by a volley of small explosions along the south-facing row of buildings. They took off, attempting to catch the Summoning proxy from behind, but it anticipated their approach somehow. It wheeled gracefully down from the balcony while clapping its hands to conjure up a second gigantic animal. Above, another Pein-lookalike was watching from the stone ledge of the post office.

“How many of this fucker are there!?” Kankuro roared, flinging his Sanshōuo puppet forward to block the charging, slobbering dog that had at least five heads. While Maki summoned a jet of flame sealed within her scroll parchment (searing the muzzles of the beast) Obito flitted up the side of the brick residences to their left, his shuriken expertly aimed for the retreating Summoner proxy.

Trick wires attached to the projectiles wrapped ‘round the Summoner’s right arm and a flagpole, winching it up to halt its jutsu. In a dive, Obito met the Summoner proxy in a flurry of Taijutsu, amazed that the decoy was still fighting fiercely while restrained. Somehow, it was also anticipating his punches, ‘How–? It doesn’t have the Sharingan…’ He noticed something odd, ‘But those eyes aren’t normal.’

While Kankuro and Maki were preoccupied with the many-headed, gigantic hound, Obito seconded their call for backup on whatever channel his radio was set to. He plummeted down after the Summoner when it wriggled free of its bindings, and Obito chased as it retreated toward its watching proxy comrade at the street’s end.

Puffing in short breaths, Obito repeated, “Utakata? Can you hear us? Anyone! Someone get over to east Main street and take care of this freaky giant dog!”

Saizō replied, Giant dog? Was that summoned too?

“Yeah, I’m trying to stop the Summoner from calling anything else. It’s just keeping us distracted from helping Utakata.”

--Roger that. My Tide kids are having trouble with this crab, but it’s slow. Follows us relentlessly and its shell might be impenetrable. Watch out for it. I’m moving east for that dog. Who’s handling it?

“Kankuro and Maki.” Obito dodged low and then vaulted over a recycling station as the two proxies hurled sharp, black rods at him, “Everyone! Be careful. I think these things can sense and avoid what we’re trying to do as we do it.”

Saizō and Kankuro’s remarks in his earpiece were jumbled as he closed in on Pein’s incarnations. In an attempt to drive a wedge between them, Obito unleashed a hellish column of a Fire Style jutsu. He immediately filed off as the Summoner dodged left, unconcerned with the other, less active proxy.

Something was not right. Obito’s speedy swings, locks, and kicks were avoided as if he were a novice; his Ninjutsu was handily dodged. Obito sputtered curses, trying to make sense of the sudden, enhanced evasion of his target. ‘How is it doing this?’ He stumbled sideways when he was stuck in the back with a rod. The proxy that seemed to lack techniques had pitched it at him.

Watching from over his shoulder, Obito took cover and removed the projectile, treating the shallow wound, ‘That could’ve been worse. So that other proxy…is staying. It’s not searching for Utakata because I’ve distracted it by chasing the Summoner.’ By that line of thinking, Obito supposed the Summoning proxy was rather significant, ‘Though Pein wants us distracted, I can keep him distracted too. There’s a priority to these things; certain copies are more important…’

Unfortunately, the Summoner had called another animal while Obito was recovering. A large, pierced chameleon appeared and climbed the side of one of the health offices. Its camouflage made it quickly blend into its surroundings, but the Sharingan was still able to spot it. What was worse: the spare incarnation had lunged at Obito when he tried to pursue the Summoner again. The two proxies rounded on him in full-force, and Obito strained to evade their strikes. Their tussle spanned across the street and over benches, approaching the central fountain of the town.

Buildings swayed and the ground trembled as detonations and the footfalls of giant beasts shook the Tide Village. Obito hastily summoned a huge fuuma shuriken from his tool scroll as he made a run for the fountain, half-grateful the proxies had focused on him, ‘Every second they waste on me is helping someone else!’ And yet, his plight became rather dire when the sneaky chameleon whipped its curled tail out of an alleyway, thwacking Obito into the broad side of a retaining wall. The animal disappeared again and retreated while the pair of proxies seized an opening with weapons raised, prepared to skewer the man.

That was, until the unremarkable proxy was snatched from behind by a whip of water. Startled, the incarnation had nary a moment to struggle before it was reeled back into the fountain. The Water jutsu’s user had sprung ahead in a heel-drop kick that warded off the Summoner momentarily, allowing Obito to pick himself back up.
Obito regarded his savior and saw he was merely a Tide Village teenager—a lanky blonde who had raised a woodwind instrument to his lips. He also had a radio earpiece, Obito noticed.

“Thanks! You are?” Obito molded the introduction into his counterattack, preying on the Summoner proxy while he had the numbers advantage.

The Tide Village ninja was playing a tune, and suddenly Obito was invigorated, blood pumping, flash-quick over pavement. His Sharingan tracked the proxy’s hand signs in slow motion while he landed a successful low-kick trip on the incarnation. As it went down, its folded hands lined up with the swing of Obito’s mele-shuriken, snipping off those hands as if he were slicing lunch meat from a roast. In all of a moment, the Summoner wore a bemused look as it lost its only mode of conducting jutsu. The flute-playing Tide ninja added a timely follow up by cartwheel-kicking the neutered proxy into the same retaining wall with a shattering smash.

“I’m Menma.” The boy’s answer was a bit late, “How do you feel?”

“I feel—wow! I could punch a building down right now. What’d you do?” Obito was impressed, “The name’s Obito, by the way.”

“It’s my Rush Melody, and I know. I heard you over the radio—the things you and Kankuro said about proxies.” Menma concluded, “We have to work in groups to deal with them. They counter too fast when we are separate.”

“Yeah, I learned that the hard way.” They doubled back toward the fountain as the long-haired proxy fled. It ran west along the boulevard, where smoke was rising from rooftops and broken windows.

“There are more of them.” Menma warned, “I tried sharing what we saw over the radio! Utakata was dealing with a proxy that fires weapons and explosives, but we asked him to retreat and hide. I think he has for now. We’ve been distracting the proxies with fakes and transformations.”

“Good.” Obito tapped his earpiece, “Kankuro! Are you alive?”

For now! Saizō’s here and used his Kekkei Genkai on this dog, but it grows more heads every time you cut one off! It’s too big for us to seal.

“Oh, dandy.” Obito was alarmed to hear that.

Yeah, so no head-slicing. We have to find another way to stop it. Problem is— it’s heading westbound. We’re in pursuit.

Menma and Obito could feel the rumble of the ground under their feet. Obito added, “Just so you know, that Summoner proxy has no hands, so I think it can’t do much at this point. It did summon a chameleon though, so be on the lookout for an ambush.”

Kankuro-taicho, we’re pursuing one of the proxies now!” Menma reported, “Westbound, nearing the coastal barracks. There’s been trouble with a weapon-launcher type. Utakata is hiding for now. His radio may be damaged.”

We need to find him or at least have a way to communicate with him. Keep us up-to-date on anything else you spot. Kankuro’s commands faded as he and his group engaged the dog again.

When Obito switched over to Channel Three, there was only screaming. He raised his voice to try to get an explanation, “Can you hear me? This is Obito. What is your position and what’s happening?”

- the- beach—! The static of the response was hard to understand, Run! - - He’s killed all of them. - -
- Sucked our chakra dry...we can’t—get away--

The channel went abruptly silent. Obito exchanged an anxious look with his young companion, and then shielded his head when the stone and shingling of a tall building was crushed apart in a plume.
The baying of the freakish dog drowned out warnings on the radio. They avoided the stamping, wrecking beast and the debris it flung about. Ahead, the simple, jutsu-less incarnation of Pein disappeared into the manicured hedges of a small garden labyrinth beside the department store.

“Menma, call for backup and find that proxy before he gets away and joins others.” Obito directed him, “I’ve got to do something about this mutt!”

With a nod, Menma raced ahead and pleaded for assistance over Channels Two and Four. Several Tide ninja rapidly joined him beside the store, and the group took a shortcut to the end of the hedged picnic area. Skidding in a turn, Obito formed hand signs for an Earth jutsu that caved in the road and swallowed the hound’s legs up to the shoulder and flanks. With Kankuro’s group racing toward the stunned beast, he had a prayer that maybe this was a threat they could deal with.

The wheeled iris of his Sharingan spun with each jutsu he reproduced and attacked with. Then, there was a twinge of discomfort— disorientation.

His stomach roiled and a feeling of vertigo struck Obito, ‘Oh no…’

It was back again. Double-vision blurred into another hallucination. ‘I can’t! Not here—I’m not putting up with this again!’ It was as if he could see the fuchsia boughs of a plum blossom grove overhead; a green lawn and tree stumps only a few steps away when in fact…none of it was there.

He had to push through it. His participation was crucial. Obito pulled the goggles on his face down, slung around his neck, and slapped his cheeks. The imaginary orchard faded a little.

He knew that he wasn’t oxygenating well— not breathing correctly. Though Utakata had thought himself prepared, perhaps indignantly defiant about this entire Akatsuki threat, he hadn’t been prepared to watch the heads and limbs of young Tide ninja get blown off by an explosive missile.
Neither had he been prepared to watch the city, his home, Hotaru’s home— crumble and burn.
When the order came for him to hide, he’d done so willingly, trying to take that time to collect himself and breathe.

At the edge of the passageway between the ice cream shop and dentist’s office, there lay a body of a Tide Chunin. Pressed against the stucco wall, and concealed behind advertisement banners, Utakata stared at the fallen young shinobi.

He crept forward slowly, working up the nerve to collect the Chunin’s radio as a replacement.
Utakata crouched down beside the Tide ninja and reverently slid his eyes shut, taking the undamaged radio for himself. Utakata then retreated into the darkened ice cream shop and fitted himself with the radio, clicking over to Channel Two, “Kankuro—”

Fuck— you’re alive! Where are you—? The Sand captain sounded preoccupied, as if fighting something.

“The soft serve shop on Tenth and Main. I’m sorry, I had to find another radio—” Utakata choked up as he thought again of the Tide ninja who had given their lives to protect him, “Most of C Squad is dead.”
A voice spoke back over the channel, I’m alright, Utakata! It was Menma’s voice, to his slight relief. I found B Squad and we’re driving away one of the proxies.

Utakata folded his hands and pressed them to his forehead, grieving, “Menma. I’m sorry.”

We all knew what we had to do. Please don’t take any risks!

“I didn’t want to bring…this destruction on you. Not on any of you…” It felt like Hidden Mist all over again. Watching bodies litter the streets, the senseless violence. Still, it was so, so hard to breathe.

Stay where you are. Kankuro’s command was clear, Don’t engage. If you’re discovered, that’s fine. Fight. For now it’s best if Pein can’t find you.

“But you’ll—”

We’re doing pretty good, all considered. Obito’s jutsu are helping. We’re close by on Main. Kankuro added, This goddamn dog just won’t stop!

A long quiet followed. He loitered in the ice cream shop as vapor and dust floated by, watching the window. Utakata tried once again to steel his nerves as the bedraggled, hand-less Summoner incarnation of Pein hobbled by on the sidewalk outside, heedless of whom could see it from the one-way window.

When a sound caught his attention, Utakata whipped around to see the alleyway side exit of the shop was ajar, and the conical eye of a giant chameleon was peering in at him. Outdoors, the Summoner proxy seemed to instantly know the hiding place of its target. It re-routed and dashed across the street, to Utakata’s shock.

Utakata blew a swarm of bubbles as a buffer while in retreat, fumbling through the store room of the shop, and out of an east-facing window into a loading bay. He weaved through crevices between buildings, under awnings, hearing the footfalls of a pursuer somewhere behind. ‘When that animal saw me…the proxy could see me too.’ Utakata was alarmed by the link, ‘Even though I was hidden, it didn’t matter. That’s why we need to face these things one at a time…I think they share their vision with one another.’

He was racing southeast toward the harbor, where the abundance of water would make counterattacking with Ninjutsu a cinch. Utakata also hoped that since the majority of the fighting was taking place on the west side of the city, there was a smaller chance of being discovered around the deserted pier. He shared his insight over Channel Two, “Kankuro, Obito, Maki, whoever can hear me— these things share a field of vision! Even with their summoned animals. Don’t take on more than one if you can help it-!”

Nearby, a dock house exploded as a hail of missiles struck it and its neighboring buildings. Utakata strafed left behind the latticed fence of a restaurant, unleashing a flurry of alkaline bubbles to assail the persistent missile-launching proxy. It rushed forward without a care, shrugging off half of its cloak to reveal a saw-blade attached to its torso like a sash. It had also been concealing six arms. The proxy hacked the fence apart to continue the chase, unhurt by the alkaline bubbles that fizzed on its clothing and flesh.

At the opposite end of the brick passageway, Utakata saw the Summoner incarnation waiting at the end passively, blocking his exit. The jinchuriki pivoted on quick feet, making a hard right down the perpendicular alleyway as the Summoner and Weapon proxies chased from both ends of the brick passage. The Summoner arrived first at the adjoining path that Utakata had disappeared down, and it inadvertently disturbed a singular black bubble charged with Tailed-Beast chakra.

Jostled, the bubble’s black coating receded, and the resulting caesium explosion leveled the buildings surrounding the alley with a deafening boom. Though the Weapon incarnation was able to clamber out of the rubble with minimal damage, the Summoner proxy was charred and disfigured; motionless under a pile of bricks.

‘One of them is still behind me...’ Utakata made a mental note of how the Weapon proxy just would not quit, and it flushed him out into the yard of a concrete warehouse at the pier. Though he pulled ahead, near enough to lagoon water to begin retaliating with specialty jutsu…a force struck him. Utakata was flung without warning against the side of a warehouse— though nothing had physically made contact with him.

Bewildered, he scrambled to his feet again, his eyes darting between the Weapon incarnation to his left, and the newcomer on the right. Utakata felt an acute feeling of dread, seeing that expressionless face: pierced, solemn, a hard strike etched through the symbol of Hidden Rain on its headband. The new proxy stopped in the exact same moment the Weapon proxy did, then it addressed him, “Six-Tails jinchuriki…”

Without missing a beat, Utakata spat a corrosive stream of alkaline liquid at the speaker. The attack seemed to bend away from the proxy in a sphere— repelled by an unseen force. The hissing, steaming liquid splashed uselessly onto concrete as the incarnation went on, “You are eager to know pain.”

“I’ve never been eager to know anything beyond fine wine.” Breaths came sporadically, his hands pressed against the wall behind him, “You’re the one called Pein. Seem to have yourself a cult following…”

“All are one whole, derived of the Six Paths; one each to rip an equal piece of you away.” Pein raised a hand aimed at his target, “Come, and avert your eyes as this village bleeds.”

Incensed, Utakata gritted his teeth and charged at the heartless shinobi, “—you did this-!”

He lost his footing as he began to slide with speed, pulled by the inexplicable force again. Utakata was dragged in and seized by the collar of his vest, and Pein stuck a black rod into his arm as he struggled. In those fleeting seconds, Utakata spat another jet of alkaline liquid— though a trite response— and Pein released him to leap away from the attack.

‘Why?’ Utakata tried to work out the meaning of the push and pull ability the proxy wielded, ‘It didn’t try to avoid my jutsu before…’ He scrambled toward water, ducking under the swing of the Weapon proxy’s saw-blade.

Covering his tracks with a spray of corrosive bubbles, Utakata sped dockside toward the lagoon shaded by tall silos. He plucked the sharp rod from his arm and tossed it aside, overhearing the explosions of bubbles and missiles that trailed behind him.

There. At the necessary proximity, his hand signs driven by haste, Utakata was able to create a small mob of Water Clones that unleashed a fury of jutsu and bubble-blowing on his pursuers. The force-exerting proxy lingered on the periphery, not actively trying to fight or risk itself. When Water Clones and corrosive bubbles neared, the proxy would deflect attacks with its repelling shield. From where he observed the proxies behind a fiberglass construction panel, Utakata passed on an update, “Kankuro, can you hear me?”

What are you whispering for? Where are you?

“There are two proxies here at the east pier…they’ve cut me off.” Utakata spoke softly as he treaded around the back end of a warehouse, listening to the commotion of his clones battling Pein’s incarnations, “I would try to escape to the north of the island…but I don’t want to lead Pein toward the Academy classes there.”

Then don’t. Stay where you are and hold on. I’m sending reinforcements to you now. We’re kind of in a spot…there’s something on the beach that’s already killed two of Tide’s squads. Kankuro filled him in, Just keep talking to us. We need to keep tabs on you—

On the opposite side of the shipyard building, the Weapon proxy had opened the mechanized plates of its bald head to charge an energy cannon, and the resulting beam shredded all of the clones in the yard. As dust and silence settled, and Utakata tried to hear any instructions from comrades over the radio…his sprint to escape the yard fell short.

Pein’s force had pinned him to the steel siding of the building. Utakata swooned and tried to see straight as the world spun. The Force proxy seized the jinchuriki by his throat, stabbing black rods into his side and stomach. Over the radio channel, Kankuro could hear the breathless wails of his unresponsive friend. His clamoring in Utakata’s earpiece was of no help.

“With the harvest of the Rokubi’s chakra,” Pein explained, “The Akatsuki will be one step closer to leveling and unifying the many nations that shinobi have quarreled over for centuries.”

He dug his nails into the wrist of the proxy, desperate for a gulp of air. Utakata’s eyes watered as he was made to listen to the manifesto.

Pein went on, “You can rejoice in that you have played your part, jinchuriki. The same function you serve is better managed by the Akatsuki, and your existence has not been in vain. Your submission is to the benefit of this fledgling village. Only those that experience pain can know the value of peace —”

Pressurized, geyser-jets of water shot the proxy off of Utakata with sharpshooter precision. The Force incarnation was blasted to the far end of the pier, through a padlocked gate, and into the lagoon. A squadron of Tide shinobi had descended to fend off the attackers, and as the Weapon proxy rounded the corner of the warehouse to counter them, Utakata inhaled and mustered the strength to expel another corrosive alkali breath at it. The incarnation was struck in the face and chest — blinded. It hobbled momentarily as the gaggle of valiant Tide Chunin unleashed Water techniques on it…which aggravated the alkaline liquids it was coated with; steaming and sizzling.

Out of breath, Utakata was hauled away by one shinobi, stumbling north along the wooden planks of harbor docks. They wound around the perimeter of the waterfront, unsteady on their feet, zigzagging to freedom beneath winches and tether lines. Neither could answer Kankuro’s demands over the radio while still trying to oxygenate. Hotaru slipped Utakata’s arm from her shoulder and let him sink down, sitting tiredly and tipping his head back. She lifted the earpiece from his face to speak into the radio, recovering more quickly, “Kankuro? We found him.”

Thanks— sorry to bother you guys, I know you’re supposed to be looking after your students.

“It’s alright, Tazuna sent us here anyway to help.” Her worried gaze settled on Utakata, “I wasn’t going to leave him no matter what, not after I heard what was happening.”

Utakata made a soft sound of protest, “…you need to go back…”

“He’s injured, so I’m going to treat him over here while we have some cover.” Hotaru decided, “Please keep in touch with everyone on Channel Five. They only have a few radios with them…and they’re fighting two on the east side.”
Copy that. I’m trying to direct medic-nin to those injured on the south side, but we’re short staffed. Let me know if you need help.

Utakata was both overjoyed and troubled to see her, as he’d been relying on the reassurance that Hotaru was far beyond the calamity in the Tide Village for the day.

Dizzy, Utakata watched her tip an assortment of medical supplies from her hip pouch onto the dock, and then press her hands beneath the sites of his wounds, “Take a breath—we’re pulling this out.”

He couldn’t, but she removed the first rod swiftly, ignoring his shriek as she immediately went after the other. Hotaru tossed both of the sharp, bloodied receivers into the olive hued water of the lagoon. His hands obeyed when she arranged them to stem the bleeding. While disinfecting and patting gauze over his injuries, Hotaru did a lucidity check, “Can you talk? What’s your name?”

“Awa Utakata.”

“Good. Can you tell me where we are, and who I am?”

“Shiogakure’s east harbor…and you are Hotaru.” He smiled a little, at ease, “My wife.”

“Not yet, I’m not.” She scoffed, rather annoyed.

“Well, in all but name you are.”

“It’s a nice sentiment.” Hotaru concluded and kissed his cheek, “Are you going to be okay? That was scary.”

He shut his eyes and nodded, thanking his lucky stars, “Very.”

“Think you can stand?”

“I can.” He rose sluggishly to his feet, “None of Pein’s attacks were intended to be fatal…perhaps because the Akatsuki needs me alive for an extraction.”

The hair on the back of her neck was on end, disturbed by the prospect, “We’re not going to let them do that.” Hotaru led him by the hand further up the network of docks, under loading bays and suspended rowboats.

“Were those Academy teachers that came with you?” Utakata wondered.

“Yes, and some members of security patrols that returned after Kankuro’s alert.” She confirmed.

He supposed, “They won’t be able to do much against Pein.”

“We have to try.”

“None of you have to.” Utakata protested, “The village bears no responsibility in my safekeeping. It’s the other way around.”

“It does when we, along with other nations, don’t want the Akatsuki to come into power by collecting the chakra of Tailed-Beasts.” Hotaru protested rigidly, “So no matter how you look at it, you staying far away from the Akatsuki is what matters.”

“Not anymore.” He was shaking his head.

Hotaru gave him another tug down a short flight of stairs, arriving at a recreational boat yard where motorboats and fishing vessels were moored. She tugged again, but he didn’t budge as they stood on the deserted landing. There was a desperate look on her face.

He had to speak about his obligations, “I’m going to—”

“No.”

“Hotaru, I can’t sneak away while—”

“No.” She stomped her foot, her temper tinged by grief and fear.

“Do you know how many people I saw die today?” Utakata could not sugarcoat what was happening, “Because of me?”

She bowed her head so he couldn’t see the tears welling in her eyes.

He pulled her close and rested a hand on her cheek, “You saved my life.”

Hotaru was nodding, trying not to surrender to his suggestion.

“Please let me save their lives.” He requested firmly.

“No, they won’t.” Utakata was certain of it, “Pein wants to punish this village. The Akatsuki will never stop looking for me no matter where I go.”

“My clan stopped looking for me when-!”

“This isn’t the same.”

“I swear I’d agree with you—I’d let you—if we weren’t going to start a family.” Her admission was tearful, “You’re the best chance they have…at surviving this. I know that. But you’re also our best chance. I’m not as strong and independent as you are. I can’t raise Bindama by myself.” Hotaru wiped her cheeks with the back of her hand, “I’ll turn him into a nervous wreck just like me. Please.” She peeped, “Stay with us.”

Just then, it was impossible to argue with her. The words sliced straight through to his heart, and Utakata suddenly felt the way he had in the old days—as if he could run endlessly, always a step ahead of those who chased him. The flight instinct was overpowering now that his family was at stake.

So when Hotaru led him on to the nearest berth and stepped down onto the swaying deck of a well-appointed motorboat, he stepped down too. Utakata stood listlessly as Hotaru fuddled around, setting the radio earpiece down on the dashboard. She searched for a key to start the ignition. She was also going over how she’d mapped out a location 62 kilometers east to a mangrove island, where they would ditch the boat and continue south toward the Water Country’s archipelago. She could call in some favors with locals there.

Wrapped up in his thoughts, Utakata wondered why Hotaru assumed the baby was a boy. Although, he really liked the name she picked and told her so, “Bindama is a good name.”
“You think so? That’s great.” Her smile was weary, “Go to the bow and check that emergency ration bag, please. All we need is fresh water. Hold on. I’ve got to hotwire this thing.” It wouldn’t be the first time she had stolen a boat, and it probably would not be the last.

Utakata confirmed there was indeed a store of fresh water jugs and life preservers packed, and he watched Hotaru scrounge up a spare battery and some wire from her leg holster. She crouched beneath the steering column to set to work. He lifted up the radio to check Channel Five, knowing that Hotaru’s peers would still have to deal with Pein, “Tide ninja, do you need assistance?”

_We are en route to the city center! This guy can push and pull stuff…and that weapon proxy is just rampaging blindly!_

“You’re being followed?”

_Yeah! Wanted to give you the chance to-_ The transmission cut out.

Horrified, Utakata switched to Channel Two, “Kankuro? Obito?”

There was no answer.

“Anyone?”

He tried Channel Four, got some static, and then tried to reach Channel Two again.

“Menma, are you there? Saizō?” The lack of replies made Utakata reconsider a harebrained escape.

He glanced down and saw Hotaru toying with a spark, cursing when the starter would not cooperate. Utakata fitted the radio to his ear and then reached down to get her attention, drawing a questioning look from Hotaru. “A boat would probably be of little use to us, in this situation.” He rationalized.

“Then we’ll go by foot. We’ve done plenty of long-distance water walking.”

“You’re pregnant.”

“And fit as a fiddle.”

“It’s 62 kilometers you’re talking about covering; or 16 to the mainland of the Fire Country if you feel that’s any safer.” The second option he also doubted, “Hotaru, go back to the wildlife preserve and stay there.”

“So you can run to the village and fight?” She was scowling, and bent down again to continue her work, “Psh! Sounds about as stupid as every other idea we’ve had.” The engine hummed to life.

Utakata sighed in frustration. Hotaru sealed up the panel and stood, not fighting the tight hug he pulled her into.

“If I leave, then I am a traitor who forsakes all of the friends we’ve made…and spits in the face of the good fortune we’ve had.”

“We are _leaving._” She insisted.

“This is the home we chose. The place that held opportunities for us— that we knew would have opportunities for Bindama as well. The old life is gone. This place is everything.”

Hotaru shook her head at him because it felt like he was using the name she had chosen against her, wielding it as some form of persuasion.
“Don’t you love me more now that I’m someone who has a place in society? That I can take responsibility after rejecting everyone and everything for years?” He asked her.

“No.” She lied, “I’ve never liked heroes. You trying to pull this crap gives me heartburn. Stop it, already.”

“Sorry.” Utakata wiped a few tears from her face.

“We’re wasting gas.” Hotaru pointed out.

“Just a moment.” A good kiss was in order, and it was long and forgetful and mutually calming.
Afterward, Hotaru nestled her head beneath his chin and relaxed. She was a bit suspicious when she felt his hand move and rise up above her shoulder— then she realized it a fraction too late— the blowing pipe pressed to his mouth.

“Don’t-!” Her cry was distorted when he sealed her in a large soap bubble. Hotaru’s reaction was not as quick as his hand signs, when she drew a kunai from her hip pouch and tried to puncture it.
Utakata had fortified the sphere with a secondary jutsu, rendering the bubble un-popable.

“I’ll send you back toward the classes and release you there. Please, stay with Tazuna and the students.” He begged, knowing she wouldn’t listen, “Wait for me.”

Hotaru raged as she floated along the northwesterly winds of the island, kicking and punching the bubble she was trapped in. Her eyes flashed in defiance in the last few seconds he stayed to watch her, and then Utakata took off over the docks, back toward the city.

‘Saiken.’ He thought, ‘I’m scared.’

Me too.

‘She might hate me for this.’

Eh, I say it was the right call. She and lil Bindadoo are gonna be safe.

‘Bindama.’ He corrected.

That’s what I said.

‘Please help me. I can’t leave it to everyone else— I have to fight Pein too!’

The Tailed-Beast slug was hyping himself up, coasting on the adrenalin of his host, Fucking prick!
He squashed all our favorite shops! And your friends!

Help me. He felt the surge. There was no barrier whatsoever. No hesitation. No misunderstanding.
The chakra cloak that enveloped Utakata dripped with every last ounce of Saiken’s chakra.

Inari’s voice sounded over Channel Two, Hey boss— that proxy that’s got no jutsu…well it does. It’s killing people just by touching them! Rips their souls out or something. They’re just gone.

“Oh then you stay the hell away, or your gramps is going to lose it.” Kankuro advised, “Where did you last see it, Inari?”

Second and Providence. Also, the scary chakra-sucking one is coming your way. Closer to Fifth, still on Providence heading north toward Main. The Leaf Sealing Corps are still trying to stop it, but it’s a nightmare! It’s like there’s nothing we can do over here. I hate it.

“Like I said, stay out of it.” Kankuro said as he staggered backwards while Kiryūma Saizō’s Coral Release Kekkei Genkai expanded with an earth-shaking rattle, covering up the multi-headed dog in an effort to stop its rampage. The peach colored mountain of coral seemed to finally freeze the beast in place.

On a nearby rooftop Obito hooted, “Finally!”

Saizō fell to his backside on the street, wheezing, “I am…definitely…not getting paid enough.”

“None of us will be, after this fiasco.” Kankuro expected meager paychecks in the weeks to come. He shielded his eyes and peered down the street as a lone figure appeared in the distance, “Maki? You see that right?”

“A proxy.” She correctly guessed from beside her captain. Immediately after that, the half-melted Weapon proxy raised its six arms and fired a blind volley of missiles—several colliding with the dentistry and real estate buildings…and also cracked the coral vault imprisoning the summoned hound.

The dog struggled and began to break free of Saizō’s Coral Palace.

Unable to see or react to Tide ninja’s counterattacks, the Weapon proxy was firing wildly, turning and slashing with the functioning portion of its saw-blade. Kankuro ordered his main street companions to redirect their efforts on the loose cannon and worry about the dog later.

Except that, a portion of Tide’s Sensory Corps, headed by Hidden Leaf’s Yamanaka Inoshishi, were being chased by the giant crustacean, mid-way between Kankuro’s counterattack and the blinded Weapon proxy. And the Weapon incarnation had not come alone.

The Force proxy reached out with an attractive force and pulled the nearest, hapless victim it could reach. Inoshishi had no time to react when he was delivered to the Force proxy, where it pummeled him to the ground and then stabbed him through the heart with a black rod. The startled man gaped like a fish while staring at the sky for the few seconds he was still alive. Inoshishi’s accompanying Sealing Corps friends were outraged, and foolishly elected to attack the offending proxy. Kankuro could not get a word in edgewise as the mayhem continued south again towards Providence Street. The crab and dog, now free, sandwiched Kankuro’s group on Main with the flailing Weapon proxy. They were in no position to assist the Sensory Corps combating Pein.

Kankuro. He heard Utakata’s voice on the radio again, after a long while.

“You okay, bubble-boy?” Kankuro asked, puppeteering Sanshōuo to block debris and errant projectile strikes, “I lost touch with those Academy teachers on Channel Five.”

They’re dead. Hotaru is safe. Utakata reported, I’m coming back to the four corners. Are you still there?

He didn’t like that idea, “Yeah, but NO, don’t come out now and blow it! We’ve got one melted proxy shooting at everything and two summoned beasts we can’t kill.”

Kankuro knew full well that his rag-tag team was not handling their predicament well, and so a helping hand from anyone ought to be appreciated. But he was hushed in shock when Utakata rocketed onto the scene, an envelope of crimson-violet energy visibly radiating off of him. A tidal wave of bubbles barreled over both of the troublesome summon animals, sparing all Tide sympathizers, and gave Utakata a clear shot at the maimed Weapon proxy on the street.
Though the energy cannon within its head was damaged, the incarnation was going to give it a try anyway. Utakata struck the ground in a meteoric skid, gouging up pavers with momentum, and exhaled a large, black bubble that swallowed the Weapon proxy. The bubble carried it up and up into the sky above, where the incarnation’s own reckless attack resulted in a violent explosion. It scattered in small pieces over the city, destroyed.

Obito and Saizō were very considerate in trying to stop the charging crustacean from crushing the jinchuriki on the street…but Saizō was plum out of chakra, and Obito’s Lightning Release hardly slowed the creature. Their efforts were unnecessary. Utakata’s partial transformation converted his arm into a serrated, corrosive appendage, and it speared the crab through its mouth, through the brain, and out the back of its shell. With a sputter, the animal disappeared in a cloud of smoke. A residual splatter of Saiken’s liquid struck the ground and buildings.

Saizō warded Obito back, “Whoa! Yo, stay away from that liquid. That shit will melt your feet the fuck off…”

“Thanks. I definitely won’t touch it.” Obito said, a bit amazed by the former Mist ninja’s vernacular.

And then, the gigantic dog pounced, slamming the glowing jinchuriki beneath its paws. Its many muzzles snapped and fought each other, each fighting to get the first bite in on its captive. The dog slipped off and tumbled, thrown aside by the rapidly ballooning body of Saiken as his true form was released.

From the alleyway, Obito and Saizō stared in wonder as the Tailed-Beast slug wrapped a few of its tails around the legs and heads of the dog. The viscous, corrosive liquid that Saiken secreted began tearing the dog apart with hissing steam. In moments, a few of its limbs fell away, and the limp body of the hound crashed to the ground. When that summon was also dispelled, Obito could hear Kankuro trying to get through to Utakata on Channel Two.

--Can you still hear me? Try to be inconspicuous! Not giant! Utakata?

Saiken’s pillowy, slow form dissipated, revealing Utakata’s human shape again— his chakra cloak faded. I hear you, Kankuro.

--Good job man, holy shit! Kankuro was incredibly thankful, Lay low for a bit and take a breather. We’ve got three other known proxies to deal with.

Utakata nodded and hurried into the patchwork of passageways and haggard buildings.

Exhausted, Saizō retreated with a pair of Tide ninja headed west on the street in search of medical attention. Kankuro directed Obito and Maki south, to where he had seen Shiogakure’s Sensory Corps members chase the Force incarnation of Pein. Obito fell behind and started rubbing at his eyes.

Kankuro halted, frowning in concern, “You alright?”

“Yeah, just…” Obito blinked hard, “I’m having double-vision. It’ll pass.”

“You should go to the Medical Corps as well.” Maki recommended.

“Not yet.”

“That’s an order.” Kankuro commanded, “I’m not going to let your impairment weigh on my conscience if I see you get toasted today. Get treated.”

“-you’re banged up too-!”
“I know.” Kankuro then spoke into his radio, “Menma? What’s your position?”

--The florist’s rooftop. B Squad sighted the giant chameleon on Fourth and Grove. I had a visual on Utakata’s position as well, inside the hardware store. He may need to relocate. I think the animal is searching for him and we’re trying to distract it.

“Allright, stay there and keep on that lizard. I’m sending Obito your way, and you let your B Squad medic-nin take a look at him. He’s rattled.” The Sand captain added, “I may ask you guys to keep the other proxies away while we work on the nearest one. Since they can all see the same shit, apparently. The Weapon proxy is finished, as are the crab and dog, FYI.”

--Yes, Captain! Menma acknowledged, I’ll remain here for the time being. Utakata, did you hear all of that?

Utakata chimed in, I did. I also damaged the Summoner proxy at the pier. Has anyone heard if reinforcements from other villages are on the way?

“I told Jiraiya-sama about the situation a few days ago, so hopefully he and some Sand ninja will be here soon.” Obito added, “I am not sure how quickly he was able to contact the Hokage.”

Kankuro nodded to Obito, “Get going, then.”

They separated, and the pair of Sand shinobi slinked cautiously onto the somewhat pristine Providence Street, where the Force proxy of Pein had collapsed a concrete building’s terrace onto two unfortunate Sensory Corps members. In the same heartbeat, Kankuro noted how the Sensor ninja named Reijiro counterattacked immediately, snaring a metal-snap net around the fleet footed proxy. Reijiro gave the order to his comrades to attack the caught incarnation, and while the rain of weaponry and projectiles was considerable…it did not do enough.

“Dammnit, what channel is the Sensory Corps on?” Kankuro hissed, and Maki indicated it was Channel Seven, more than likely. He clicked over to that channel, “Reijiro? You need to incapacitate that thing! Cut the head off— superficial wounds and pain don’t slow these things down—!”

The next repelling wave thrust the metal net off of Pein’s incarnation, and it rose to its feet while nonchalantly plucking kunai and shuriken out of its torso.

--Captain Kankuro! Sorry, we’ll try that next. I’ve been counting five seconds between each push or pull.

Upon hearing that, Maki was on all other communicating channels, repeating the same crucial findings.

“Five seconds? Good to know.” He pulled a new tool scroll from his belt, “Since this proxy seems to be one of the baddest in the bunch, I’m going to give it a hell of a time.” Kankuro kneeled down and summoned a lanky, towering puppet from the scroll. He offered Maki a lopsided grin while he attached chakra strings to the segmented body and limbs of the puppet.

“We haven’t tested that yet.” She reminded him.

“Seems like now is as good a time as any to try it out.”

Maki disagreed, “A better time would be back in Suna, in a controlled environment. Certainly that would be better than a trial run against S-Ranked criminals.”

“Do this. I’ll buy you dinner.”
“You’ll buy if we live.” She sighed and unclipped a spare sealing scroll from her back, attaching it to the spine of the puppet. Maki also fixed a few chakra strings of her own to the scroll’s parchment, knowing this hazardous stunt would require extreme coordination for a combo-attack.

Waiting for the ideal moment as the last three Sensor-ninja of Tide scrambled around Pein, Kankuro and Maki rushed from their hiding place when the proxy used a repelling blast. One of the Sensors was impaled by a soaring flurry of black rods, and then retrieved by Reijiro to be brought to the Medical Corps. Pein locked his arm around the swinging punch of the last Tide Chunin before kicking the poor amateur through an adjacent building. From the corner of his eye, the incarnation spotted Sand ninja rushing for him while its force abilities were unavailable.

Maki parted from Kankuro at a forty-five degree angle, flashing by at top speed with her parchment flying free of the puppet, Funanori, its tall sail unfurled and absorbing lines of her Sealing formulas. It was a creation inspired by the Tide Village and Kankuro’s commitment to it— plunging ahead while firing two harpoon lines at Pein’s proxy.

The dual-attack was a ploy and the incarnation knew it. It held still and took a singular hit; shot through the shoulder by a harpoon. Had it dodged left, Maki’s unwinding scroll (now half the span of the road) would have ensnared it. Pein leveled a plainly unappreciative look at Kankuro as he cut himself free, harpoon bolt still lodged in flesh, ducking under the gangly, acrobatic swipes of the puppet.

Seconds ticked by and the time gap closed, allowing the proxy to go on the offensive. Pein raised a hand at the offending puppet to strike it with repelling force…but an incredible leap took Funanori airborne like a kite, avoiding the blow that crushed a patio, restaurant, and the trees beside it. While Funanori soared, Kankuro snapped his hand, launching another volley of harpoons while a second spindle of sail fabric unwound— a copy of Maki’s original sealing work. It coiled down to the earth to snatch the enemy, directed by chakra strings.

Maki’s own Sealing parchment spread wide like a trawl net, closing in from behind as the proxy hopped backwards to evade Kankuro’s attacks. Cornered with seconds to spare, Pein was trapped against the façade of a confectionery. Maki’s lateral scroll length contracted and caught an unintended target— a burnt, fouled incarnation of Pein that lacked hands had jumped down from the rooftop. Maki’s Sealing technique illuminated with a blue shine and mummified the sacrificed target, allowing the Force proxy to escape. The kunoichi ejected her chakra strings and charged, jumping over the neutralized incarnation on the ground.

‘He must have been saving a damaged proxy to use as a decoy!’ She watched as Pein wielded a pulling force to pluck Funanori from the sky, slamming it to the concrete and shattering the fragile puppet.

Kankuro was mid-way through trying to shimmy the copied Sealing sail on Funanori from under debris, tugging on chakra strings, when he realized that Pein was upon him like a whirlwind. He was nicked once in the side of the head by the slash of a piercing rod, and frantically countered with kunai as the jabs came in rapid succession. ‘Not good! If he keeps us in close quarters, he’ll have an advantage when the time gap closes…’ Kankuro could see that his Taijutsu was child’s play compared to the Akatsuki leader’s— Pein thrashed him from side to side, unspoiled and never tiring, driving him through a decorative stele with battering punches.

He was saving it, Kankuro noticed. The incarnation was not wasteful with its force abilities. As Kankuro heaved himself to his feet, wondering if his Karasu puppet could do any good, Pein observed him with a calculating stare. Maki dove at Pein from behind, her hand lit with high-level Seals on each of her fingertips— and he quickly reacted. He blasted her off with a repelling defense, in the same moment Kankuro took to summon his last puppet and struggle out of rubble. For Pein had only blocked a Fire Clone; an old trick from Maki’s days as a student of Pakura, the Hero of Sunagakure.

The real Maki appeared with burst of speed from the right, timely in her ambush, bellowing a war cry as she reached to plant her Sealing formula on the incarnation’s face. Pein thrust a sharpened rod through her palm to stop the jutsu, following through with a round kick that knocked her away. Kankuro was able to maneuver within inches of Pein’s neck, Karasu’s scythes extended, when the repelling blast came again. It hurled the puppet away as Kankuro and Maki were thrown back against the exterior of the largest health office in the city. Bricks tumbled down and dust swirled.

Kankuro tried to get his bearings, his sight blurry and ears ringing, “Maki—?” Agony seared through his shoulder, then his thigh. His eyes snapped wide. The proxy was stabbing him.

The Sand ninja weakly struggled, trying to pry Pein off as it casually stuck him over and over with its piercing rods. Pein was speaking to him authoritatively, “Tell him to come.”

Kankuro lacked enough air in his lungs to utter how he didn’t understand, but Pein went on to explain it to him, tapping Kankuro’s radio earpiece gently with a finger, “Use this. Send the jinchuriki to me, and you will be freed.”

“—like fuck I’ll—!” He sputtered and hissed as he was stuck in the shoulder, the rod grinding against bone. Kankuro supposed his screaming was what woke Maki up right about then, as she had been unconscious.

“You caused me great inconvenience by sealing Naraka Path.” Pein told him, “Call the jinchuriki. Tell him to save you.”

He dared not call out on his radio, writhing and yelping until Pein left him stuck against the wall by three rods. Tweaking with pain, Kankuro’s gaze followed the proxy’s path when it went to Maki, producing another piercing rod from its sleeve. The sloshed words of no and me instead did not deter Pein at all when he dragged the woman to a standing position and pinned her to the cracked bricks. Maki put up more of a struggle while screaming and kicking, her shoulder and stomach stabbed, and Pein demanded the same of her. That she call Utakata on her radio. The kunoichi’s blood rapidly soaked her fatigues.

About then, Kankuro wanted to give up. He raised a trembling hand to call over Channel Two, “We’re on…Sixth and Providence…” His voice croaked, “If anyone can hear me.”

--I do, Kankuro.

“Don’t come here.” He ordered, “Stay away from the Force proxy if you can. Try to get the Sealing Corps…you’ll need numbers…”

--Are you injured?

Kankuro didn’t answer. He tilted his head and called Maki’s name, hoping that it would least keep her conscious. Pein took a few backwards steps to regard them, mildly impressed with the stalwart attitudes of Sand shinobi. Yet he had grown impatient. He raised a hand with the intention of crushing them with a push.

Pein reneged on the decision at the last moment—a torrent of flames rolled like dragon tongues over the pavement, filling the avenue, spilling into alleyways, and superheated the glass of the confectionery until it broke with a high-pitched clink. Kankuro felt sweat slick off of his face as the heat devoured the road ahead of him. Slowly, he raised his arm again to try to free himself of the rod in his left shoulder.

Though it had been a tremendous jutsu, Pein defended himself with his repelling shield. As the immense fire parted and died down, Obito charged at Pein, letting a volley of shuriken fly. As he flitted around the Akatsuki leader, Obito was yammering into Channel Two, demanding that Kankuro help himself—Still with it—? Get out of here! Maki too! I’m not good enough to beat this guy! To Kankuro, it sure looked like he was trying. The man’s craftiness with trick wire and projectiles was remarkable, yet Pein sidled and stepped away from snares with grace. Hacking, Kankuro freed himself, his hands slippery with his own blood as he hurried to aid Maki.

‘This is him alright.’ Obito narrowed his eyes at the face he recognized, ‘This is the form that Pein displays to other Akatsuki members…’ He flipped away from a blasting force, landing neatly beside the saw horses of a construction site. He ducked once, twice, as black rods were pitched at him, rolling over the top of a barricade, and kicked up the steel spade that sat abandoned beside an excavation trench for pipework. It would do. Obito took the shovel and cracked other incoming rods apart like a batter as he rushed at Pein.

His sightline of the road wobbled a bit, but steadied as Obito blinked hard, ‘Phew. I’m fine. So Maki and Reijiro reported this thing’s attacks are five seconds apart? I’ll have to bait him!’ From the corner of his eye, he could see Kankuro limping off with Maki around the bend of the health office. While sliding over rubble and chipped concrete, Obito moved into close-quarters with Pein, improvising most of his Taijutsu. The metal shovel was a marked advantage, way-laying many of Pein’s counters and strikes. Yet with each exchange and flurry, Pein’s blows intensified. He was precise. Tireless. Reactive.

Obito drew on the do-or-die experiences from when he’d lost his memories as a teen, bending and twisting, lunging— when his body had been younger, faster, cleverer with motion. Obito’s offense did get the better of Pein, and when he’d lined up the merciless swing of his shovel to bash his opponent in the temple, the Akatsuki leader pulled the tool from his grasp and shot it into the broadside of a billboard. In that moment, Pein noticed something was amiss. Visual cues were off—and he’d attacked the blue-costumed, goggled ninja as if their exchange was on a delay. He was rooted in the Genjutsu and realizing his plight in the same moment Obito’s Earth jutsu closed two raised slabs of the street upon him, as if shutting a book. Bam. The concrete slabs stuck up unnaturally after the technique.

Panting, Obito staggered toward the billboard and wrenched the trusty spade out, ‘Huh. I guess Genjutsu still works on this fella…but I’ll have to beat his head in to make sure this is over with.’

The Sharingan could detect faint tendrils of a chakra condensing, diverting more energy into the proxy that was sandwiched between street-slabs. Heart-pounding, he understood, ‘If he gives that thing more chakra…’ Obito rushed forward, dropping into a running-slide to avoid the concrete hunks that were blown apart with a noticeably more powerful repulsion.

Pein was in retreat, traveling west along Providence as one of his remaining incarnations had spotted their target. Obito descended on him with ferocity, crossing the spade’s edge with the proxy’s rod, cracked through it, and Pein slid his hand up while moving into the strike—able to wrestle with Obito and knock him away from the incidental weapon. The proxy discarded the shovel into a street drain, then raised his arms to block Obito’s swift sky-kick and lilting hook-punches.

“What do you care?” Pein wondered curiously, “You are no Tide ninja.”

Obito was cuffed in the face twice, but weathered the hits to gain leverage as he swept Pein’s legs out from under him. Obito plunged the proxy face-first to the ground in a tackle, a fistful of ginger hair in one hand, and a kubikiri knife drawn in the other— about to saw off the head of the incarnation. He could see chakra condense again before Pein’s amplified push, and Obito was unable to scramble away before the force tossed him over the street and into the outdoor racks of apparel displays.

The wound on his back had opened again, Obito could feel it. He heaved himself to his feet and asked over the radio, "Are you okay, Kankuro?"

--Can’t say that I am. I think I’m losing Maki.

“B Squad should still be…somewhere on West Providence…”

--I called them but I don’t think anyone’s coming. You’re not still fighting Pein, are you?

Obito wiped his lip, “Nope.”

He was staring down the incarnation that had raised itself to stand with regality, its Akatsuki cloak ripped and tattered.

That was not a response that Kankuro could believe, You can’t handle him one-on-one. Wait for Leaf’s Sealing Corps— or someone-!

He changed the channel and threw down a handful of smoke bombs that choked the road with murky vapor. Obito had to concede that this confrontation was personal in many respects. He remembered the day Pein had boasted of making short work of Kakashi’s team in the Land of Rain…the suffering and loss his friend had endured. ‘This no-good fuck who made light of a child dying— hurt Kakashi-! Our friends-!’ He was simmering as he coordinated his next move, ‘Pein would do that to anyone and feel justified! He doesn’t feel pain at all— he feels nothing!’

The low-visibility had made the unloading of a weapon tool scroll more effective. Pein was not one to waste his abilities, but the stygian haze made it impossible to avoid all of the projectiles darting in. What mattered was the follow-up, and Pein waited for it— waited for the stranger shinobi who seemed to have no detectable allegiance…but hurled himself with a roar at Pein as they encountered each other in the smoke cloud. The proxy evaded the sweeping blow of a summoned short sword, keening backwards, felt the piercing rod in its hand get kicked away— and then had no means to defend against the returning arc of the blade. With a heightened projection of force, Pein propelled his attacker off, as well as the lingering particles of smoke. And the man he had knocked away was merely a Shadow Clone, puffing back into nothingness as it tumbled.

From behind the proxy, Obito had exited an Earth Style hiding pit with only seconds at his disposal. His view of Pein warped, unfocused, the pretty lawn consuming half of his sight again as he charged.

The plum grove was not at all imaginary; it just happened to be about 200 kilometers away.

Kakashi stood there rubbing his forehead after a productive morning, having coached Sato through a series of drills to prepare him for an upcoming Jounin Evaluation. He had to cut training short because, well, he was probably coming down with something. Or in need of glasses.

“Let me see.” Sato bent to take a look at his uncle’s exposed Sharingan eye, as the man sat in a daze on a tree stump. “You know…I don’t see anything stuck in there…” He backed up and crossed his arms, “Did you overdo it today, Kakashi?”

“Not to my knowledge.”
“Maybe I pushed you too hard?” Sato was amused, “All of this prep tired you out.”

“Either way, a break is in order.” Kakashi supposed, trying to clear his head as he made small-talk, “Have you and Tama made a decision yet?”

“We’re going to wait and see what the results of my evaluation are, then save up a bit more before we look at houses again.” He was marching in place, excited by the thought of it.

“And a ceremony?”

“Just something small. Probably after the New Year, if the shrine will take us,” Sato forecasted.

“That’s sooner than I expected.” Kakashi regulated his breathing while pointing out, “You were never in a hurry before.”

Sato was still marching as he imparted the maxim he and Tama now swore by, “Life’s too short.”

“So use your time wisely.” His uncle agreed.

“Feeling any better?”

“I can’t say—” When he next blinked his eyes shut, he saw it more clearly— the carnage and rubble. Streets he didn’t know. A place with wide sky, few trees…and the sight of a face that scared Kakashi straight to his feet.

Sato raised his brows as his uncle spooked, as if poised to act, “What’s the matter-?”

Even with his eyes open, Kakashi’s visual sense lingered elsewhere as if hijacked, ‘How am I—? That’s-!’ It was the same shinobi from the Land of Rain that had attacked his team. He could never forget that face, or how they’d been at the stranger’s mercy in terms of jutsu. A flood of memories unnerved Kakashi as he teetered around. His waking mind was reliving the ordeal—or hallucinating.

“Kakashi?” Sato stepped up to him and rested a hand on his shoulder.

Oh right. His nephew wasn’t dead. The Rain ninja had all but killed him, sure, but here Sato stood thanks to the effort and care of friends. But that moment of violence lived on in Kakashi’s mind, made vivid when he shut his eye and saw the blur of the Rain nin as if he stood before him. It was so real that he took a swing at it. Sato and the host of reality seemed relegated to the background in those insane, pulse-pounding moments. He was fighting again. Back in that fight, somehow, against an enemy he had no hope of defeating.

Distant, Sato’s voice rang with reassurance in Kakashi’s ears while his eyes lied. He bolted like a frightened colt in the grove, trying to get a better angle, trying to get away, or maybe make the vision stop. He whipped kunai at it, reeling in fright when the Rain ninja, with shocking clarity, exerted that force he remembered, in response to which he ducked to vainly defend himself. For a second, Kakashi knew he wasn’t insane. It was happening, even if it wasn’t. There was no use in explaining it.

With the end of the enemy’s push, he felt compelled to dash again, remembering how he’d been counting the seconds between each exertion of the force technique. Though he may have attacked thin air within the lush grove of the training yard, his body, mind, and something else bid with every extant fiber to counterattack. Kakashi formed hand signs, watched himself do it in confusion—not stopping himself as he tracked the movement with his Sharingan.

Obito acted before he could think, before he could recognize how he was copying hand signs from some unknown source—the bright charge of the Chidori came to life noisily in his hand. He darted forward and ran it through Pein’s chest, to their mutual surprise. The proxy remained standing in the gouged portion of the street, and it closed its hand around Obito’s right arm—plunged through the unfeeling flesh of the incarnation, “…that was not your jutsu.”

He knew. Somehow, Pein could tell it was imitation. Without his battle wits at the moment, Obito was processing what had happened. He may have used the assassination technique successfully, but it hadn’t hindered Pein at all. His vision was still noticeably compromised, but now Obito had an inkling as to why, ‘That was Kakashi’s jutsu…I think I can…see what he does.’ While he wavered, Pein was crushing his artificial arm, gripping it and pulling it out. The proxy’s chest was marked by past wounds and mendings—now freshly punctured again with no blood to spill from its reanimated body.

He had to stop thinking about why he could see through the Sharingan in Kakashi’s head, because Pein had noticed him. Obito realized it a touch too late. Pein had pulled his attacking hand free, the automail fashioning of his arm slightly damaged, and held him while scouring his face for a clue. The enemy wanted to know if he was dealing with the Copy Ninja again, though that was doubtful. This was a disfigured, dark-haired person, with no headband to proclaim village allegiance, but his right eye gave away a connection. Pein recognized the Sharingan. He wanted to understand for a moment. Then he lost interest, and elected to kill Obito instead.

With a powerful push, Pein thrust Obito clear of the street, through the glass picture window of a realty office, through plaster walls within, and he landed roughly on neat desks and shelving, knocking all askew.

Groaning, Obito heaved himself up again, trying to get his bearings. He wanted to contact someone on Channel Two, but balked at the sight of a different incarnation of Pein daintily picking its way through the office’s debris. It was coming for him. The long-haired proxy that could reportedly scan minds and rip away the spirit of its victim; this fit the description others had spoken of. Obito clambered backwards over furniture and into an adjoining linoleum hallway, racing up the narrow stairwell to find an escape. He gasped for breath, calling over the radio, “Is anyone still on Providence?”

The resounding silence petrified him.

He bumped walls when he took the corners with too much speed, bounding up the steps two at a time. When Obito stumbled out of the roof access door, he was stunned to find the Force proxy waiting on the roof. He’d imagined that Pein would continue his search for Utakata, or perhaps let other incarnations wear him down…but he’d made a nuisance of himself.

It was almost a casual gesture, how Pein pulled him in with an attractive force, getting a firm grip on Obito’s throat. He held him up to scrutinize him again like some pawnshop curiosity.

“You shouldn’t exist.” Pein said.

There was really no right way to interpret such a nebulous statement. He was clawing at the proxy’s hands to free his airway, turning blue in the face. His chakra was run down and his body worse for the wear—but Obito thought that if he could just get away to hide for a measly three minutes, he’d be back in the fight again. No comrades were chattering on radio waves. No help was coming. The sound of the other proxy’s steps came from behind, leaving the rooftop exit door. Those few seconds were serene and eventless.

Pein might have said something else, but Obito couldn’t hear it over the shattering smash and cacophony of the implosion as the building cracked beneath him. It had been a powerful push, that was for certain—and the materials of the building seemed flimsy on the way down. Ceilings and walls caved while Obito rocketed by, straight down to the ground floor where, miraculously, he was caught in some electrical wiring that stopped his descent. The building swayed and crumbled from Pein’s blow, yet Obito landed on two feet and attempted to scamper away as it caved in. He did not take so much as a step when four levels came down on top of him. With the building flattened, both of Pein’s proxies had left the site to carry on their hunt on the west side of the village.

Obito’s first thought was loud in his head. ‘—! I’m alive.’ He must’ve been, after all, he was thinking.

It was pitch dark, with the quiet punctuated by soft skittering of debris chips falling and settling. His thoughts then turned toward his injuries, which were moderate. Loose plumbing pipe had cut through the back of his left arm in a cookie-cutter like manner. The wound on his back still smarted, most of his joints felt, at least, sprained, and his automail limbs took the brunt of it. When he attempted to move he found it impossible. The mountain of collapsed rubble weighed down, pinning him.

Lying face down on the dusty floor of the space, Obito darted his eyes around, ‘Something…’ He wanted to find a little bit of purchase that he could tug or prod, though only one hand was free enough to do so. ‘I’ve got to get out of here…’ His radio was not only silent, it was gone. It’d been shucked off his head at some point, probably.

Though it was no consolation, he was not hallucinating anymore. The other side had gone dark. As in, it wasn’t looking at anything, or had been covered up. With that, Obito arrived at the conclusion that what he had seen was very real, ‘I can still see some things with the Sharingan that I gave to Kakashi!’ He wanted to laugh wildly. He may have remembered such a phenomenon when he was a teen, repaired and outfitted by Orochimaru and Sasori to handle Akatsuki grunt work. Back when he’d been anonymous and borderline “useless.” On a few occasions, he may indeed have seen things he couldn’t explain. Then there had been a lapse for many years, and so Obito supposed those episodes were a thing of the past— perhaps due to trauma.

Ever since Pein’s run-in with the Leaf team in the Land of Rain, and the disrespectful talk that followed, Obito had felt more connected. He had cried and wallowed while reflecting on Kakashi’s loss and empathized with him, thereafter noticing that something felt different. In an odd way, pain had linked them after all. And so, Obito surmised, he had strengthened his connection with his friend and found a way to reach him…not that it mattered.

He couldn’t move even a finger length. Oh well. You’re connected to Kakashi, but what good does that do you? A voice trilled jokingly in his head. You’re gonna die. Here he was again, years later, pinned once more beneath wreckage with no escape. It’s as if you were destined to die stripped of your dignity, alone, and squashed like a bug!

Obito’s breathing quickened, panic setting in. That was it, wasn’t it? The exact same flavor of helplessness from his Chunin days, though this time he was pressed belly-down. Ouch. It wasn’t any more comfortable in this direction, he could admit.

Never mind the fact that his absence exposed Tide villagers and Utakata to Pein’s full wrath. No, no. He had his own problems. He had a tendency to do way too much for Jiraiya, and only realize it after the fact. He played the game as every character but himself, parading around for Jiraiya, Orochimaru, the Akatsuki, and even neighbors back home in Shincha, who’d never learned his real name. Here in Shiogakure he had given it out willingly. Pft.

Maybe a toad would save him. Jiraiya would arrive in time, right? His help from Hidden Sand?
Perhaps reinforcements from Leaf would sweep over the rattled city and drive off the Akatsuki—the whole of the Uchiha clan’s forces would do it. They’d save him. He could reunite with them and his childhood friends in Konoha. It’d be peachy and idyllic. He could see Kakashi again. He nearly smiled at the possibility. The weight on his back derailed that train of thought. Everything hurt. Breathing was hard. He had a mouthful of dirt.

You shouldn’t exist.

Though it lacked specificity, Obito could see why Pein would tell him such a thing. It was probably true. His time had come long ago. If Death kept receipts, it would have looked up his entrapment near Kannabi Bridge, and subsequent, last-second rescue…so it could reschedule his demise in the same style. How consistent.

With each second it was more real. He would die and no one would know about it. There would be no parting words, no fanfare, and no closure. He’d never been someone special. Still wasn’t. Rin might be broken up about his (presumed) death, once he failed to come home. She might even mourn him for a year or two, knowing how dedicated of a soul she was. But time would pass and she’d find someone else, and she and Yuma would be fine. They might even forget him, or at least, he’d forever lurk in the background of their minds as they forged on with life.

Obito dug his fingers into dust, anguished. He may have counted himself lucky when he reunited with Rin, but perhaps not if he had known he’d go out this way sometime in the future. There was too much to lose. This wasn’t the line of work he ought to be in. Jiraiya knew it too, most likely, but he was in so deep that to lose Obito’s assistance in spy work would be a catastrophe.

He felt the tears start, brimming at his bottom lids, clinging and then dripping from his face. Always was a crybaby, and always would be. He’d come to terms with it. There was no use in trying to change who he was. Yuma cried just as much as he did. Cut from the same cloth, he’d joke. It hurt so much that he screamed—not for the sting of physical injuries, but for the singular thought of not seeing that boy. Obito screamed in what he perceived to be air-raid warning loudness, projecting like a mythical banshee. Nothing had ever hurt so bad.

Yuma. A face so scrupulously crafted that he bore the features of both his mother and father in truly equal parts. Like art, he was one perfect whole arranged and painted with those traits. An Uchiha, but wild and soft. He’d never hate anyone or anything. He’d been born that way.

But to be pulled away from his son was a cruelty he could not accept, even if he could handle losing this mission, losing Kakashi, Rin, and everything else he had. Fuck, he’d made so many promises. Fool that he was. Promised Yuma the Leaf Village, and the Uchiha clan, and friends, all of the trappings and adventures of a life they’d hidden him from. Obito said those things with the intention of being there to walk him through each step and introduction. To let that boy’s hope wilt—to let him languish…there was nothing lower than that.

His piercing screams and wails grew more comprehensible, calling for help loudly, repeatedly. Any friendly ear approaching would have definitely heard him. The chance of such a passerby being able to excavate him was a toss-up. Still, Obito shouted until he was hoarse.

He could only estimate how long he’d been trapped, some eight or ten minutes. In that time, he’d recuperated a bit of strength, and focused chakra carefully into his hands and limbs. Though the bonus of chakra control helped, there was still no budging the slabs on top of him as he tried to rise in the world’s most difficult push-up. Some of the rubble shifted and the metal pipe impaling his arm sunk in deeper, making Obito shriek. He stopped and stilled, hoping everything would settle again. Crazy-eyed and breathing erratic, he wracked his brain for options. There was nothing more he could do apart from screaming.
Bowing his head for rest, he felt himself slipping, almost dangling off the edge of consciousness. He was insane with grief. Rin’s name rolled off his tongue like a song. Oh! —how had one person kept him going for almost all of his life? How sweet it had been to get to know her better; to play and learn and risk, to feel pleasure that he didn’t deserve. To make life. How love had taken form and become a new person, a child. So strange and wonderful.

Trash.

Who’s this idiot?

He heard voices echoing from the past that made his blood boil, scraping his hands again at the dirt floor.

He deserves to see you in person…and you can apologize that way.

Late again?

You were so angry…I was worried you were going to beat that boy up.

You love Rin, don’t you?

I don’t want to be lonely anymore. No one around here really likes me.

Another, agonized howl escaped Obito and then cut short. He might’ve gone crazy. It felt as if he could move freely. His voice wavered as he experienced an utterly alien sensation— the permanency of objects around him was absent. He rose up to stand cautiously, hobbling out of the cave-in’s litter to look back in astonishment. It was as if he had become a ghost and walked away…but his body was not trapped under the wreck. He was in it. He had gotten free.

Startled, he tried to relax and rested his hand on the remains of a fallen light fixture. Tactile sensation was back. Good. He had a physical presence.

‘I don’t think I’m dead.’ Obito reasoned, ‘But I do think I’m weird.’ He sealed up the bleeding gash on his arm with the Palm Healing jutsu he had been taught. His automail limbs were coming close to fragmentizing from wear and tear. ‘Fantastic. Before I know it I’ll be out there leaning on a crutch to stay in this fight…’ Too bad he’d lost the shovel.

Taking a breath, Obito chose to test a theory that could explain his Sharingan’s odd behavior. A twinge of concentration and a sapping on his chakra reserves confirmed that, indeed, his Doujutsu was responsible. Obito walked around and phased through solid objects like an apparition. ‘Oh, how I wish I understood how this worked…’ He didn’t have much time to dissect the details. He ran out of the building and gave the technique a rest, because wow it drained him something fierce. ‘The Sharingan probably has higher levels of evolution…not that I know squat about those legends.’ He wanted to rationalize the development, ‘Don’t know how I did it. Don’t know how it works. But I do know what I have to do!’

Eerie silence had overtaken the Tide Village as he ran west.

—Fall back and call for reinforcements. A voice rasped over Channel One, - - Tazuna, we can’t hold the city. I am ordering a full retreat, for your people and your jinchuriki. Cross the bridge to the Main Land— The voice cut off.

Menma tapped his radio, harried, “Mochinaga-san?” He repeated the Leaf Sealing commissioner’s name several times, getting no response, “Are there any Leaf ninja still fighting? Please—!”
Behind Menma on the roof of the village’s communication tower, Inari was pacing, throwing his hands into the air. He was wearing a radio of his own, insisting to Menma, “They’re not gonna answer, I told you! That freakin’ chakra-sucking thing got ‘em!”

“I need quiet, Inari!” He strained to hear a soft spoken instruction on the channel.

—H- - Hosoka-

“Hosoka-san?” Menma acknowledged her.

- -Sarutobi-Hosoka- - I’m headed — north- - with this proxy in pursuit— She commanded, All forces retreat over the Great Naruto Bridge. - - That’s an order.

“Where are you? We can send help!”

She did not answer.

Tazuna was speaking over Channel One, Copy that. Inari?

“Yeah, Gramps?” The boy stopped pacing.

Get to the temporary infirmary and help them evacuate. I’m taking all of the Academy classes, chaperones, and citizens waiting in shelters to the bridge. His grandfather was remarkably calm, Can you be quick about it?

“Sure…do you know if Mom’s okay?”

She already crossed to the main land with other evacuees. Took the dog with her, she said.

Inari breathed a side of relief.

He entrusted the responsibility with his grandson, Get on it, kiddo. I’ll meet you over there. Tazuna added, Menma?

“Yes, sir?”

Stop that son of a bitch. The man demanded.

Inari exchanged a bamboozled look with his older friend, watching Menma’s countenance turn down with seriousness. As the comments over the radio ended, Inari wanted to amend his grandfather’s instructions, “Help me out at the infirmary, okay?”

Menma shook his head.

He pointed a finger in his friend’s face, “You can’t do anything to stop Pein. We’ve been hearing it over the radio— pretty much everyone is dead!”

“Utakata?” Menma asked over Channel Two, “Give me your position. I’ll provide you some cover so you can evacuate.”

--I am not sure if I’ll be able to do that. Utakata politely declined, Though I do appreciate your consideration. Just leave without me.

“That’s a terrible idea.” Menma disagreed.

Inari was protesting behind him, babbling.
--I have to draw Pein away from the village. I don’t know how else to give everyone a chance to escape.

“Regardless, why be careless and hand yourself over to the enemy? We should make it as difficult as possible for the Akatsuki.” Menma insisted, “You saved me once. I’m going to help you too.”

Utakata laughed softly before he revealed, I’m on Third and Temporal, in the cellar of the brewery.

“On my way.” Menma confirmed with a nod. He turned to Inari, “Please hurry to the infirmary.”

“Forget it!” The boy growled.

“You have orders. You know what they say about shinobi who can’t follow orders.” His friend reminded him, “I have to do my part, Inari. This village has been attacked and razed many times before…and it only stops when we step forward to expel those who would harm us.”

“They said reinforcements—!”

“We can’t stand idly by waiting for reinforcements. We must act.” Menma held Inari’s shoulder firmly, “You told me your friends taught you that. I believe all those things you said.”

“…stupid.” Inari rubbed his eyes and trudged after Menma as they toed the roof’s edge, standing side by side before a leap, “You’ll…get killed.”

“Just come with us.”

“You’re a fantastic friend. Think— in a few years all of the new students will be looking up to you.” Menma smiled at him, “Will you please tell Matsuri that I love her?”

Dropping down from the slated tile ledge, Menma was a blur below in the alleyways as he moved towards Temporal Road. The prickling, heavy anticipation and despair Inari had once felt in the moments before watching his father’s execution returned full-force.

Each of Inari’s cautious steps away from the communication tower toward the infirmary were callous. It felt wrong to go. Most shinobi friends he had made moved on with their journeys and left the Land of Waves behind. Menma had not. He was the friend he could depend on, shoot the breeze with, talk smack, goof off, eat junk food, and generally let his guard down around. The difference in rank and age was immaterial, Inari had come to find. Now it was time to shelve his personal feelings because, with this emergency, friendship could not come before duty.

It was going to be awful to lose him. Inari hated himself for thinking it.

The last Leaf ninja standing, by some happy coincidence, nearly ran head-first into Menma within the many stalls and stands of the market. Hosoka caught herself in a skid and changed directions, electing to stay near a comrade.

“I lost two of the three proxies chasing me— but I guess that means they went looking for the jinchuriki.” She reported, “You’re Menma, right? Help me deal with the Soul-Stealing proxy! It’ll be coming up Torrent Lane because one of my monkeys faked it out…”

“I can try. I was on my way to help Utakata.” He stopped outside the immaculate wooden building of Tide’s brewery, “Would you be able seal it, Hosoka-san?”
“If you can hold it still, I can seal it.”

Menma was not wild about deliberately drawing an incarnation of Pein towards Utakata’s hiding place, but he and the kunoichi dove through the brewery’s front door and slid it shut behind them. While rummaging around the wide space supported by oak beams, between casks, hoses, taps, and processing vats, Menma spoke to Utakata over Channel Four, “Sorry for the disturbance. We’re upstairs.”

--I was wondering what that racket was. Keep it down.

“Hosoka-san was being chased by one of the proxies, so we’re preparing a trap for it.”

…this is not my idea of “cover” for an escape.

“She says she can seal it—” Menma pushed and overturned a huge, airtight wooden barrel with Hosoka’s help, “—just bear with us.”

--If you get yourselves killed—

Hosoka hissed over her radio earpiece, “Quit doubting us, or you can come up here to be live bait!”

A wide, rolling door on at the side of the room slid with a clatter when Menma opened it, and Hosoka hustled to roll barrels outside. Their frantic preparations lasted for a few more minutes before Hosoka made herself scarce at the market’s edge. Once the Soul-Ripping proxy treaded past the last row of vendor booths, Menma taunted the incarnation with a volley of kunai and shuriken. When he had its attention, he made a run for it in the opposite direction, into the dead-end sequestered between the brew house and industrial yard’s walls.

The proxy rounded the corner with speed and charged at the cornered Tide ninja, reaching out a hand to seize its victim by the head. And in a puff of smoke, Menma’s visage was gone, and the transformation revealed a tawny monkey that screeched and wound around the Soul incarnation’s arm. It easily shook the animal off, and had only a beat to look over its shoulder. At the entrance of the dead-end yard, Menma completed hand signs for the aptly named Fountain Spout jutsu, a Water Style technique that launched four simultaneous blasts of unrefined barley and hop water from barrels.

Effectively, the Soul incarnation was canon-blasted with beer; blinded and smashed into the concrete siding of the industrial park headquarters. On that cue, Hosoka leapt from the rooftop and wound a prayer-bead rope around the ankle of the proxy. With a tug, she had tripped the incarnation and splayed it out on the sodden ground. Hosoka landed and concluded her technique’s hand seals, the Sealing formula winding up the cord toward the incarnation…as it hurled a black rod at her. The weapon pierced the kunoichi’s neck and she fell backwards without so much as a peep. Likewise, the proxy keened over and fell still.

In shock, Menma stared at the scene of the double-takedown, intending to run to the fallen comrade and move her body. When he heard hollering from within the brewery, Menma acted on instinct and turned around, racing back to the wooden building.

The summoned chameleon had crawled into the open doorway and was dragging Utakata up the cellar steps by its tongue. Though his physical strength was limited, Menma was able to kick the animal sideways into the brewery’s interior. The creature reeled in its catch by its tongue, though Utakata had a timely retort prepared for it: he spat corrosive liquid on the chameleon’s face. It departed in a puff of smoke.
Motioning with a hand signal, Menma ushered his friend along, “Let’s move. Since it spotted you, the others—”

His train of thought was interrupted by crumbling buildings down the block.

“We’re not going to make it to the bridge.” Utakata surmised. He had to say what Menma was already thinking, which meant that they were thinking the exact same thing.

So they turned around in unison as another portion of wall beside the road collapsed under a push, facing down the Force proxy and its yet unseen companion— a stocky shinobi with spike piercings in its cheeks, lip and ears. According to reports, that was the proxy that could rob victims of their chakra and block Ninjutsu. For a moment, the two Tide ninja could only hear the sound of each other’s breathing in the vast quiet of the west ward. Menma had the good sense to raise his ocarina and play a tune before either of Pein’s incarnations charged, hoping to bolster Utakata with his Rush Melody. To top that, Saiken was flooding his host with chakra.

Menma had never seen a chakra cloak before, half-shocked by the sight of visible, violet Tailed-Beast chakra that fit slimly around Utakata from head to foot in an abstract, animalistic shape. He wondered if his friend was still listening and aware of him, “Utakata?”

“We need to separate them, Menma.” Utakata was fully aware of the environment, and who his comrade was, “Can you distract the short one?”

“That may be all I can do.”

The Absorption proxy was faster than it looked as it charged up the street, angling for the glowing jinchuriki. Menma was quick with hand seals, using a Shepherd’s Whistle to snare the proxy in sound-based Genjutsu. It changed directions and pursued Menma as he retreated into the rows of off-beach cabins at the edge of the road. With each whistle he maintained the taunt, yet it was a problematic arrangement. The proxy demolished obstacles with crushing punches, and was for all practical purposes immune to Ninjutsu.

Its fists demolished the front porch of a chalet, wood beams splintering and tumbling, while Menma flitted like a dragonfly over rooftops and between palms. ‘If that thing catches me…’ He knew there would be nothing he could do. Like those who had battled it on the beach, and considered Taijutsu a viable option— they had lost their lives. He dropped behind a large cabana and slipped under the deck skirting of the home to stay out of sight, creating diversionary Water Clones as the proxy broke everything it could get its hands on in the yard.

The clones were a temporary distraction as Menma switched directions, retrieving tuning-rod darts from his hip pouch. Pein’s incarnation merely had to lay a hand on a Water Clone in order to sap chakra and dissolve it on the spot— one after another splashed apart in the sandy yard. From behind the proxy, Menma pitched a dart into each of the incarnation’s limbs, whistling again to change the frequency of the Genjutsu. Only then did the proxy still and stand dumbly as if in a trance. Pein’s connecting signal with that path was scrambled, and visual communication was also lost. It loitered near a stone fire pit and lounge chairs, indolent.

Menma sucked in shaky breaths, blotting the sweat on his head and neck with the sleeve of his fatigues. He took weary steps around the huge luxury cabin, back towards the paved streets where the clashing of Utakata and the Force proxy rumbled and shook the ground. Fixed to the back of his belt was a long, folded rope sash, much like the weapon that had been used by the leader of the Shin clan. Menma counted six remaining tuning-rod darts in a holster, three compact wind instruments he could use for techniques, and said a prayer as he picked up speed toward the fray.
The sight of Utakata’s energy-lit form was astounding: how he could extend to great lengths with impossible flexibility, snapping corrosive limbs at the Force proxy as it darted around him. Before Menma could wet his lips to whistle and distract the incarnation, it raised a hand and immediately pulled him off the street. Pein flung the boy through the rice paper door of the tutoring center, and while Menma tumbled inside, smacking his head on hard desk surfaces and tossing all into disarray— Pein followed. He blocked the first stab of Pein’s rod with an arm, but could not defend against the blows that pummeled his face and torso. Crashing through an interior wall into another classroom, he was seeing stars and helpless in using jutsu.

Pein was no fool. Menma’s ability, though almost exclusively a sound-based talent, could hamper the connections between paths. Had Utakata not come charging like a bull through the ruins of the office, Pein’s force push would have silenced Menma for good. Instead, Pein turned round as he heard the jinchuriki’s rumbling roar and blasted him back. One of Utakata’s bendy, elongated arms held fast to the sturdy doorframe as he was propelled back, using the momentum while outdoors again to swing around the perimeter of the building. He burst through an adjacent wall from the outside on a rebound, rubbery arms flinging him as if from a slingshot. Utakata lunged at Pein and stuck a caustic, sizzling limb through the proxy’s side. It retreated as the jinchuriki threatened to melt the rest of the incarnation, snarling and rampaging.

Menma laid on the floor and pondered if there was any point in getting up. One of his eyes felt as though the orbital bone was broken, swollen shut from brutal punches. A rib or two was most certainly fractured, and injuries to his arm and hip were bleeding freely. Pein would know better than to let him cast another Genjutsu if he dared show his face again. Slowly, Menma sat up. Utakata couldn’t go it alone, and from a practical standpoint, it was a good thing if Pein focused on a bothersome target in Utakata’s stead. It would give his friend a fighting chance.

He peered out of the office wall that Utakata had knocked down, then gasped at the sight of the Absorption proxy on the move. It was accompanied by the Soul-Stealing proxy he thought Hosoka had sealed, ‘It may have been feigning defeat when I left it to help Utakata!’ He could hardly believe such a costly blunder, ‘It freed the other proxy…and now there are three again…’

He had no choice. He heaved himself to his feet, struggling to direct one foot in front of the other. Menma called over the radio, “Utakata— two other proxies are in pursuit. I thought I stopped them…”

--I know. It’s alright.

“It isn’t! I could have kept at least one of them frozen. Genjutsu works against the Absorption proxy.” Menma trudged out of the door while tying a portion of cloth-whip around his bleeding arm, “Where are you?”

--I’m leading Pein out over the inlet. There is enough space here for a Tailed-Beast ball. Utakata estimated, Menma, if you can follow me and slow any of them…that attack might end it. Nestled within that plan was the implication that such a blow could kill Menma as well, but their options had dwindled.

“I’m on my way!” He pushed on, gritting his teeth as his injuries stung, his vision was hampered. Menma got his bearings and broke into a run on the beach, then out onto the rough waves beyond.

He hoped that Inari had not overheard that radio transmission and gotten the bright idea to follow. No. He was smart enough to keep away and escort villagers to safety. It seemed that the only loss of life had been among shinobi in the village, while rapid response had spared civilians. That was a success, he supposed. Shiogakure would learn from this. Other villages would probably learn from this too, at least he hoped so. Ahead, he could see that Utakata had trapped the Soul-Stealing proxy in a bubble and plunged it underwater. Menma picked up the pace, drawing closer.

The sound of steps along the water’s surface caught his attention, and Menma spotted Obito gaining on him. Ah, so the odds were not quite as bad as he’d thought, but still rather poor in the scheme of things. While running, he just had to scold the spy for showing up late, “Where were you? We broadcasted on all channels for back-up!”

“—lost my radio! Almost died!” Obito panted while falling into step with the youngster, “Came straight here after I saw you taking off from the beach. How many are left?”

“Three. I froze the Chakra-Absorbing proxy with Genjutsu, but another proxy freed it. Utakata trapped the Soul-Stealer below water for now, but I don’t know for how long.” Menma reported, “No other jutsu can stop the Absorption proxy, so we need to be mindful of it.”

“Any way you slice this, it’ll be tough. The three of them means they can see everything going on out here. Genjutsu doesn’t work as well unless they’re alone.” Obito rightly concluded, “But just so you know— I can move through solid objects now. Let’s see if we can use that to our advantage—”

Menma was incredulous, “You what-?”

They dodged one of the Force proxy’s pushes, parting in opposite directions and charging in a pincer formation around the two incarnations. Utakata was doing his damndest to spit corrosive liquid on the Absorption proxy, but it was pointedly keeping its distance to avoid maiming.

For a time, it was a high-stakes game of tag, as Utakata concentrated on following the Absorption proxy and damaging it with corrosive spit— while Menma desperately maneuvered himself to try and stick either incarnation with a tuning-fork dart. He dashed and evaded as best he could, but the Force proxy was making a serious effort to kill him. Obito’s onslaught of Lightning Style jutsu was repelled by Pein, and the Force proxy let fly a barrage of sharpened chakra receivers to stick the young, troublesome Tide ninja with.

And yet, nothing struck. The weapons sailed through Menma as if he were a hologram. Obito had snatched the boy’s arm almost instinctively, flushing chakra into his Doujutsu’s new ability. This curious turn of events afforded a few seconds of confusion within which Obito charged, rushing at the Force proxy with swift Taijutsu. Menma had backtracked, hurling a set of darts at the Absorption proxy. His attack also missed— the incarnation dropped down into the water to avoid the blow. Its shared field of vision had tipped it off to Menma’s ambush. Near as quickly as it had escaped, the burly Absorption proxy burst up from the water again, accompanied by the Soul-Stealing proxy that had been imprisoned underwater.

Another Rush Melody filled the air, giving Obito and Utakata additional speed and strength. Obito had driven back the Force incarnation a healthy distance, pestering it with his invulnerability to physical objects. He knew he could not keep it up, ‘This takes…way too much chakra…’ Even with Menma’s boost, Obito was in no condition to continuously use his Sharingan. Behind him, Utakata had laid down a layer of Mist, where he and Menma took refuge as the proxies circled the billowing haze.

It had not taken long for Pein to learn. After lunging at Obito with a piercing rod, he faked the strike and ran through him once he’d gone transparent, barreling towards the pair of proxies waiting for the Tide ninja to reveal themselves. Obito squawked and about-faced to assist, but not fast enough to stop Pein’s push to eject the mist. Menma and Utakata had jumped back into action with a combined Water Style technique, surprising the Force proxy as a water-vacuum opened up beneath its feet, swallowing it. Unfortunately, the Absorption proxy responded in kind and seized Utakata in a bear-hug.
Obito’s cursing grew louder as he ran to try to help the jinchuriki. Or, that’s how it looked at first. The Soul-Stealing proxy gave chase to Menma and was taken aback by the release of a Transformation Jutsu. The Absorption proxy had, in fact, Menma nestled in its arms and the boy was fading fast. Utakata, meanwhile, flushed with violet chakra and severed the head of the Soul-Stealing proxy with a swing of his arm when it drew too close. Obito bum-rushed the Absorption proxy from behind, making himself momentarily intangible to pry Menma away from his captor, moving through the proxy like a phantom. He hauled Menma away as Utakata stood several yards to the east, charging a Tailed-Beast ball.

Bay water erupted when the Force proxy resurfaced, knocking Obito and Menma apart. It bore down on Obito with furious close-quarters combat, and all but knocked his artificial forearm off. Obito felt ice cold panic slide down his back. He could potentially phase through one more hit, but he was unable to keep fighting. His body would fall apart. Menma made a valiant dash to try to stun the Absorption proxy with Genjutsu again, intending to hold it still for Utakata’s attack. In the split-second before the volatile chakra ball soared, Pein had attracted both the Absorption proxy and Menma toward him, pulling them out of the path of the Tailed-Beast ball. It did not end well.

The dense sphere of energy was loosed, zooming a considerable distance out over the open water of the sea…and then collided with far-off waves in a bright explosion, sweeping a rush of recoil wind and sound over the inlet. Water churned and crested after the tremendous jutsu.

Afterward, Utakata came to his senses and re-routed towards the repositioned proxies. The Absorption proxy had clubbed Obito in the head as his strength waned, skipping him like a rock over the water. Menma hardly had willpower to stand, and none at all to dodge the Force proxy as it stabbed him in the stomach with a rod. Pein had lost patience. He kicked the boy aside and watched to make sure he sank into the bay.

Utakata felt hysterical with rage one moment, and then…the feeling was gone. His chakra cloak wavered. He only had the sense to bend backwards and writhe as the Absorption proxy grappled with him, spitting what alkaline base he could in an attempt to try to melt its limbs off. Before long, Utakata fell to his knees and struggled tiredly.

Pein stopped to stand in front of him, unamused, “This has gone on for far too long.”

Though the Absorption proxy’s arm and side were corroding, it was able to hold fast to Utakata in a neck-lock. The jinchuriki shifted his gaze left and right, calling out in the hope his companions were alright.

“Your resistance is what killed them.” Pein’s voice lacked any trace amount of remorse or identifiable emotion.

Utakata stared blankly at the Force proxy for a long moment, bewildered that the struggle was over. Saiken’s chakra was siphoned rapidly by the incarnation restraining him, making it supremely difficult to think or fight back. Obito and Menma were gone. The majority of Tide’s forces and allies had perished. His desperation to belong somewhere had doomed them.

“Such obstinacy is the hallmark of this pathetic village.” The Force incarnation turned to look back at the city that glimmered over to the tops of waves, four or so kilometers from their position. “One path is enough to show you the error of your ways.” The incarnation raised a hand, channeling a much larger reservoir of chakra from its controller. With no other paths to manipulate, the Force proxy was glutted with energy.

His objections were garbled, yet Utakata made a bid to reason with the Akatsuki leader, “I won’t resist— I surrender. Don’t burden Shiogakure with—!”
Pein’s push registered on a far greater scale, crashing into the water of the bay calamitously, and only spared the spot where they stood. As the spray dissipated, the rolling force displaced the volume of the inlet’s sea water. Water peeled back from beaches and land, exposing the shelf the island sat on. Further out, all condensed into a mighty wave that towered above the buildings and streets of the Tide Village. The few people still evacuating looked up with mortal shock at the spectacle, as the wave’s shadow fell over the city.

Tucked in among the brick walls and alleys of the village, a network of small seals illuminated in response to the tide’s dramatic shift. The same seals Utakata had applied while waiting for the inevitable. Over a hundred such seals released a multitude of bubbles that rose up and melded into a singular, massive bubble. The dome stretched over the edges of the city where homes lined beachfront and lagoons, to the reaches of the forest and the bridge’s span. The wave came and crashed, surging up and over the failsafe dome in what could only be an inexplicable miracle to the handful of souls watching below.

Such a denial, though only by the skin of Utakata’s teeth and pre-planning, was the final insult Pein would endure. His face was impassive as he watched the defense rise and protect the village from the tidal wave. Then he turned and struck Utakata in the head with an abrupt blow, watching the trapped man fold backwards, unconscious. The Absorption proxy lifted up the jinchuriki and carried him on its undamaged shoulder.

The two paths retreated toward land with their target, and their controller wondered how he had come so close to failure.

Obito snuffed salt water up his nose and startled awake, dizzy. He was sliding face-down against something he could not place—some wet, frictionless surface. When his vision cleared, he could see that he was high up, staring down on Shiogakure below. The wave that Pein had generated swept him land-bound, up to the top of the dome, but near as soon as Obito had awoken and hacked up a lung, the bubble burst. Residual water and detritus careened down on the village below, and Obito did not have enough time to cry out in terror as he tumbled.

He landed in the top fronds of a palm tree that bent precariously under his weight. Then he fell again, hitting the flat slant of a bungalow roof, rolled off of it, and landed painfully in a drenched residential garden. Obito wheezed and crouped, shaken by the journey. The world around him seemed to swirl, a mess, and he glanced down at his automail limbs. They were coming apart in pieces and unfit to hold him up. ‘Be that as it may, I still have to do something!’ He knew that Pein could not go unchallenged. He had no idea what had become of Menma, though the jinchuriki’s status was not hard to guess. ‘I’ve got to find a radio or tell a Tide squad to track Pein. It’s obvious he’s going to head north toward land…’

As he wobbled upright and took a step in the flattened spurge and irises, a pang raced through him. His body absolutely refused to do anything. He was worn worse than a dishrag. The last few sensible thoughts Obito had bounced around in his head as he fell face-first into flowers.

Time ticked by in darkness. The only sound was a high-pitched ring of exhaustion, maybe tinnitus, or maybe looming death. Using so much chakra had been utter foolishness. His sleep was devoid of dreams or awareness, and ebbed after who knew how long…

When next Obito batted open his eyes, he was laying on his back on a stiff cot. Above were wooden beams of a pavilion in the Tide Village’s shinobi barracks. He was momentarily amazed that he was not dead. Perhaps his luck was not as bad as he thought.

“You made it.” A voice said beside him.
He turned his head slightly, because that was all he had strength for. Obito recognized the heavily bandaged Sand shinobi named Kankuro sitting on a stool. The paint on his face was long since wiped off. On his opposite side, the Sand kunoichi named Maki was asleep on a cot.

“Is she okay?” Obito wondered of the kunoichi.

“Better. We were able to get treatment before the evacuation order.” Kankuro explained, “Two squads are pursuing Pein right now. He took Utakata.”

Obito tried to sit up and sputtered, weaker than a newborn kitten.

“Yeah, we’re not exactly in any shape to assist.” The young man sighed, “Saizō nearly died from chakra exhaustion and so did you. I don’t have much hope for those tracking teams…but I want to believe reinforcements can find them while they’re on the main land.”

“Did you send out messages-?”

“To everyone.” Kankuro confirmed, “Not just Sand and Leaf. We communicated with Star, Rock, Cloud, Dream, Waterfall…not Mist, though. That’d just be kicking the hornet’s nest.”

“Hmph.” Obito wasn’t sure what kind of a response other villages would have, “You don’t think Rock or Cloud would take advantage of this village while things are like this?”

“If they don’t want shitty publicity or ally retaliation, they won’t. Also, any information about the Akatsuki benefits them as well.” Kankuro shrugged, “Or who knows? This place might be wiped off the map on a petty order. It was done to Hidden Eddy way back.”

“…ugh.” He didn’t want to think about future squabbles.

Attendants scurried around the infirmary and occasionally shouted for supplies. The bustle was somewhat comforting, but there was also a looming frustration among those gathered in the pavilion. How many times had they lost their homes? Their livelihoods and loved ones? Why, whether or not they had ninja at their disposal, could nothing be kept safe? Obito could hear a woman crying about her missing son, a Chunin. People were bemoaning the state of Main Street and the surrounding central areas that were destroyed. Many parties were out locating and identifying the dead, with lists of names being updated.

“Kankuro…were you able to find Menma?” Obito rasped, “He was out there with me, fighting Pein.”

Kankuro shook his head, “No. I did hear over a radio channel that Inari’s looking for him.”

He swallowed anxiously, “He was badly hurt.”

The Sand ninja folded his arms and watched Maki absently, thinking about Menma—the brave young blood who had only just gotten into Gaara’s good graces and settled in his new home. How Inari and Tazuna would feel about such a loss, or how Matsuri would feel, Kankuro tried not to imagine it. His gaze traveled over to Obito, taking stock of the man’s artificial arm, or what was left of it. He carefully plucked up the limb to examine it, “Epoxy resin, carbon fiber, it looks like…this was sturdy for a while but overloaded with chakra….” He frowned at Obito, “This material is used for puppets.”

“It was.”

“Who gave you this?”
“You wouldn’t believe me if I told you.” Obito chuckled softly.

“We use stronger materials these days, well, when we can afford to. Softer resins are cheaper.” Kankuro rubbed his chin, “Lucky for you all of my puppets got destroyed today. How about I retrofit some of those pieces to you later? Just so you can move around.”

“Well sure…but I spent most of my money at a gift shop.” Obito admitted.

“I’ll eat the cost. You’ve more than earned it.” Kankuro assured him, “Replacing my arsenal will be expensive, but I’m going to have to do it as soon as I get back to Suna.

“Another day, another paycheck to kiss goodbye.”

That elicited a chuckle. He canted his head and tried to figure out why he thought he recognized Obito’s face, ‘Not the scarred part…seems like he was on a poster or…I don’t know.’

“You know, my wife knows your brother.” Obito shut his eyes and tried to relax, “He came to our house once.”

“Gaara?” He was astonished.

“Yeah, a while ago. Before he was Kazekage.”

“Just who are you exactly?” Kankuro hissed, “This doesn’t make any sense. Where the hell does the Toad Sage dig up types like you?”

“He wasn’t the one who dug me up, technically speaking.” Obito corrected, “But do me a favor and try not to blab to anyone in Leaf that you know me, okay? It’d come as a shock. Most of them think I’m dead.”

“Oh.” That clarified a portion of it, “Yeah, I was wondering about the secretiveness.”

“Believe me, I don’t like being in disguise and pretending. I’d rather be myself.” He sighed, “But I’ve got a lot of different groups fooled right now, and spoiling the illusion could put everyone in jeopardy.”

“Yeesh. Got any aliases?”

“Just two.”

Kankuro snickered.

“But Obito is my real name.” He confirmed, “Uchiha Obito.”

Kankuro stood up and turned in a small circle. He pulled at his hair but made it look like he had an itch, because overreacting was a surefire way to draw attention in the infirmary. He sat down again, “So that’s why you can put up a fight.”

“That, and sheer stubbornness. I’ve been dealing with these criminal assholes for years. So has Jiraiya…” Obito slipped his left arm beneath his head in place of a pillow, which was surprisingly hard to do. “And it’s been too much for just the two of us. All of the major villages need to pull their weight and cooperate, otherwise the Akatsuki will keep slipping through our fingers.”

“Gaara has been aware of that for a while. Problem is…” Kankuro glanced around the pavilion, “When villages see this and need to think about taking on the Akatsuki, they may not be so enthusiastic.”
“The alternative is much worse.” Obito warned.

“And what will that be, exactly?”

“All Tailed-Beast chakra would be in the hands of the enemy, who can then demand direct rule over every village. No Kage and no councils. No alliances. If one group steps a toe out of line…” He forecasted morbidly, “The Akatsuki could reduce it to rubble in one blast. Negotiations wouldn’t exist. The training of new shinobi would be prohibited or strictly monitored. Life might go on, but no one could think, or question, or be enthusiastic about anything anymore.” Obito supposed.

“You’re making it sound like they just want to control everything.”

“That’s the impression I’ve gotten…but it could be…someone wants that chakra. No one ever said anything about dividing it up equally amongst organization members.” He was getting theoretical, “So maybe they want a jinchuriki who can house all of that chakra.”

Kankuro was flustered, “And what’s the point in that? What could a jinchuriki like that do?”

“Kill all of us. Destroy everything. Start over. Who knows…?” Obito speculated, “I think the point is, if you’re that strong…you don’t need any of the constructs or villages as they exist now. Someone like that wouldn’t need anything. They could do anything.”

“Can something like that even exist?”

“How could it not?” Obito asserted, “All that chakra came from somewhere.”

“I just can’t wrap my head around it.”

“We don’t want to wrap our heads around it.”

“Enough already. This end of the world junk isn’t making me feel better.” Kankuro grunted, standing up to leave, “Rest for now. I’m going to write this crap down for my brother, and then look for those replacement parts.”

Obito watched the young man trudge out of the infirmary and past the gate. Then he laid back and found it rather easy to fall asleep again.

“Wake up.”

Obito woke up.

Smoke tufted up from Jiraiya’s pipe, his cheeks puffing. He had taken a seat on the stool beside the cot, and Obito noticed that Maki and many other patients were no longer in their beds.

“All of our Sand ninja friends are at a conference at the moment, debriefing with the back-up that came with me.” Jiraiya exhaled vapor lines from his nostrils, “Thanks for your advanced warning. I’m just sorry we weren’t quicker.”

“It wasn’t really advanced warning.”

“Ten Sand ninja went out to assist Tide’s tracking squads. We can hope for the best. If Tsunade got my message a day ago, maybe she can send some teams to join them.” He sounded hopeful, “But based on what Kankuro told me…this was not a normal enemy.”

“Not at all. You’ll want to stay seated for this.” Obito struggled to sit up, and then looked down in surprise at his arm. A hodge-podge of materials had been assembled to reinforce his automail limb.

“Seems you were out long enough for him to work on you.” Jiraiya noted.

“Yeah…I’ve got to thank him.” He pressed on with the details, “Pein is more than one person—rather, I think he’s one person, but he can control up to six proxies at once.”

Jiraiya recalled, “Kankuro said he called them ‘The Six Paths of Pein.’ Does that mean anything to you?”

“They each had different abilities and appearances—”

“No, no. Did you notice if it had a Doujutsu?”

Obito was surprised, “How do you know that?”

“Lucky guess.” He turned his head and exhaled away from his companion.

“Each of those bodies had the same eyes…violet-colored, with strange rings in them. They could share a field of vision. Their bodies were pierced with rods that pulled in a chakra signal to control them.” Obito described it, “Jiraiya, how do you know?”

“That ability doesn’t exist in modern times. It was rumored to have first belonged to the Sage of the Sixth Paths, do you understand where I’m going with this?” Jiraiya recounted, “There’s a bit of shinobi history for you. It’s called the Rinnegan, and I’ve only ever seen one person who had eyes like you described…” He extinguished his pipe, “A boy I met during the Second Great Shinobi War.”

“So no one else has it?”

“No.”

“What happened to that boy?”

“He died.” Jiraiya amended, “I thought he died.”

“Jiraiya…”

“I wasn’t there for those kids…when things went from bad to worse. I knew they’d get caught up in the fighting after they were trained…but I never saw or heard from them again, even when I went looking for ‘em.” He confessed, “If Nagato is alive…then maybe he’s the one called Pein.”

Wide-eyed, Obito stared at the man and tried to process what could be the start of a solid lead.

“Guess I’m going to have to sniff around Hidden Rain and see what I missed. If he and the others are still out there, that’s probably where they’d hide. The regime changed and it closed its borders. It’d be a convenient place to shelter the Akatsuki, come to think of it.” He took a deep breath, “I didn’t think…they could turn out like this. If it is him…I swear they were good kids. I knew them and loved them.”

“That doesn’t change what just happened. This village suffered because of him—just one member of the Akatsuki.” Obito snapped, “What are we supposed to do about the rest of them? Jiraiya, they have abilities that will make even Special Ops teams second guess themselves. It can’t be just us. There needs to be dozens of platoons out at all times canvassing the main land, communicating between all villages! Suggest a Kage Summit—”
“Tsunade has already been petitioning for strategies like that, but those things don’t happen overnight.”

“They have to! We don’t have any time left. The Akatsuki are out hunting non-stop.”

“Well, from what I’ve heard, the Raikage had a rather inconsiderate reply to Tsunade’s last peaceable communication with Cloud, the Tsuchikage is distracted by a war criminal running amok, and the bureaucratic red tape in Hidden Leaf has snarled emergency approvals.” Jiraiya filled him in, “But once Tsunade hears this, what she’ll do is start arranging missions and squads that aren’t sanctioned. She’ll act. She’ll catch shit for it and be criticized by the daimyo, probably, but she’s got to find a way.”

Obito folded his hands and pressed them against his forehead, beseeching a higher power to step in. None of the Kage would be able to react fast enough if they followed traditional avenues. The Akatsuki would gain too much ground before any village properly countered their efforts.

“You’re in no shape to track them or keep tabs on the Akatsuki, so take it easy and then go home.” Jiraiya recommended, “I appreciate what you did, Obito, more than anything. You didn’t have to, but you stuck your neck out for people you didn’t even know.”

“I do that a lot.” Obito agreed in a mumble.

“They won’t forget it. I’ve got some meetings to sit in on and intel to pass along…then we’ll wait for feedback on Tide’s tracking squads. If they can cut off Pein from a full retreat, there might be a chance. I’d go myself, but….” Jiraiya rolled his shoulders, “I have business to attend to down here.”

“Down here?”

“One of the islands in the Land of Water, I should say. So I’ll be heading East before long.” He expounded, “Haku got caught up with one of the Swordsmen of Mist, Momochi Zabuza. Thought I might try finagling my way into getting a foothold in Kirigakure.”

“It’d take a miracle.” Obito estimated.

“Maybe I can work one.” Jiraiya smiled sadly, “All of these kids…are running headlong into a mess we couldn’t clean up.”

By morning, a message from Jiraiya was sent from Shiogakure with the fastest available trained bird to Sunagakure. The bright red scroll attracted a monitor’s attention in Suna’s communication tower as soon as the hawk landed. Gaara was not available to take the message right away.

He was in an auditorium, seated at the front panel desk at the head of a long U-shape of seats elevated in tiers. Most of those seats were occupied by Chunin, Jounin, councilmen, Suna’s clan members, and other dignitaries who had stake in shinobi matters. Many had taken their seats and checked to see if microphones were working. The assembly was slightly concerned that the doors of the auditorium had been locked from the outside without explanation. They were told it was a secure and brief meeting.

“You better not try to kill any of us.” Baki warned half-sarcastically.

“I won’t.” Gaara scanned the room, full of nervous faces who were unsure of the purpose of the meeting, “I have not been paying enough attention to internal matters, as of late. I wanted input.”

“Is this like a focus group?” A Chunin-level kunoichi inquired nearby.
“More or less.”

To the right, Chiyo sat and regarded Gaara interestedly. She had an inkling of what his motivation was. Temari was a few seats down, even more aware of what was concerning Gaara.

There was a mole in their midst. An informant, possibly one that was delivering intelligence to the Akatsuki. Gaara had pondered with his sister and Naruto how to start putting feelers out to detect a potential turncoat without falsely accusing anyone, or tipping off said mole to the fact that there was an active search for dissenters. They roundly agreed it was better to conduct a survey under pretense — to make the search look like something else. “And lay some bait.” Naruto had suggested.

Gaara announced that the Accelerated Chunin Exam had been a success, with 22 teams passing and 8 individuals achieving a promotion. There was some quiet back-patting and congratulations that echoed his commentary before Gaara went on, “What could have been done better?”

Desk lights glowed green immediately, indicating committee members who wished to speak.

A member of the Shirogane clan suggested sharply into a microphone, “How about not having hosted the Exam at all? It cost a small fortune.”

Chiyo was feeling sassy and responded quickly with her own desk light glowing, her microphone volume a bit high, “You there— you yahoo— that comment does not contribute towards this discussion.”

The young clan member slapped his hands on the desk top, agitated, “Chiyo-baasama, this is an open forum where we can air our grievances-!”

“The Exam has ended already so why are you still complaining about hosting? It was ratified before a committee just like this.” She barked.

The young man cupped his forehead and sat back. Chiyo exhausted him.

“Wenō, it’s alright.” Gaara reassured the cranky puppet-designer, “I don’t think Suna will be hosting any other exams in the coming years. We will participate in promotional exams that other villages invite us to. It is very costly, in spite of the economic support the Tide Village has provided.”

“Thank you, Kazekage-sama.” That satisfied him.

“A councilman asked, “Why on earth would the Akatsuki bother with that village?”

“More to come on that topic later, at a meeting this afternoon.” Gaara promised, “We are still waiting for details.”

Most nodded their heads, relatively unbothered by the update. They had no idea what level of threat had descended on the small village to the south. Other lights glowed, and then were acknowledged to share.

Maybe the panel of Academy students could have rotated duties between different representative groups? The kids claimed they were tired after ten or so evaluations.” A Chunin suggested, “Other than that, I thought every stage was seamless. We encountered almost no issues.”

Gaara was pleased to hear it.

“Why was such a high-level squad sent to escort the Waterfall team back?” Another wondered.
“Following the report on Akatsuki activity in Shiogakure, that team was arranged as added defense for Waterfall’s jinchuriki while she was escorted home, after her promotion.” Gaara was completely truthful.

Some balked at the revelation, surprised that a jinchuriki had participated and been promoted.

“I would like to propose the inclusion of newly promoted Chunin in our expanded programs. We discussed cross-training and interdisciplinary courses last month. I think there are many new candidates who can join the Medical Corps.” A Jounin recalled, “The green house project is also taking off, if anyone’s interested in volunteering.”

Rumblings of interest asked if they could discuss sign-ups after the meeting.

“At what point are we going to talk about Hidden Leaf’s scatterbrained activity, as of late?” A senior councilman gruffed, “Leaf’s teams are all over the place, tracking Bihokokuni’s rogue cell. Searches have also passed through looking for Orochimaru and the Akatsuki. Following the attack at the border, Konoha and Iwa stopped communicating.”

Gaara nodded, “I am aware.”

“What does that make us—? The monkey in the middle? They need to put their resentments to bed. They have a common enemy that makes their cooperation crucial.” The councilman explained, “Kumo has also been unusually cold to Konoha’s outreach efforts, even as Iwa and Suna continue a steady dialogue with the Raikage. Is there any rhyme or reason for this isolation geared toward Hidden Leaf?”

The observation was an opportune time to take a gander at the reactions and expressions of the committee. Gaara inquired of the group, “Anyone? Do you have a take on this matter?”

There. He could see it was obvious that many of those gathered were troubled by other villages’ exclusion of such a close ally. Some chatter amongst themselves also started and prompted requests to speak. But Gaara noticed a small group of silent, impassive attendees at the far end of the U-shape that did not seem in the least concerned about external affairs.

The chatter went back and forth:

“There was bad blood in the past, right? Between Leaf and Cloud?”

“Perhaps Suna is a more valuable ally to keep, now that we are better positioned than ever. That’s why other villages have reacted favorably to us.”

“The Hokage can be rude.”

“Simple! Kumo doesn’t want to make Dintei Bi its problem. They have enough to deal with. Kumo has two jinchuriki it can’t lose to the Akatsuki. That is their sole focus.”

“Leaf’s councils are more prone to arguing than ever, in recent years.”

“We know what an ass the Raikage can be…”

For that last comment, the speaker was shushed. The clamor died down when doors opened at the edge of the room, after Gaara allowed guards to do so. He spoke to the committee, “Seats 1 through 24 in rows A, B, and C are excused. Also, seats 34 through 50 in rows A, B, and C are excused.”

No one really questioned the unusual dismissal, and the identified committee members slowly shuffled out before the auditorium was sealed again. There were only 15 people total in the tiered seats between 25 and 33. They were as listless as before, unmoved by the change in the room. They also didn’t seem to care that Temari and Chiyo had remained, close to where Gaara was seated.

“Don’t you have an opinion?” Gaara wondered of the remainders.

“Not any that are unique from those already expressed.” A Torture and Intel Corps member admitted.

“Have any of you been covering the communication channels with Rock or Cloud?” The Kazekage asked.

Ten raised their hands. All were members of the Kazekage’s advisory council. The other two-thirds of the advisory council, which had seemed to care more, had already left the auditorium.

“Please stay.” Gaara invited them, “The rest of you can leave.”

“What is this about?” Shirogane Ibushi, an elder on the council, did not appreciate the strange narrowing-down of the committee.

Those who were dismissed exited the room obediently while Temari and Chiyo sat, watching the council members at the edge of the dais.

“Kazekage-sama,” Another senior council member named Tōjūrō addressed the elephant in the room, “Temari-sama and Chiyo-baasama have not left this discussion, per your order.”

“I’ve asked them to stay.” Gaara clarified.

“Is something troubling you, my lord?” An astute councilman, Manao, suspected that Gaara was looking for a particular type of audience. For what purpose he could not be sure.

“I want those most familiar with current intelligence and operations here to advise me on our peer villages.” Gaara laid the bait, “For a double-cross.”

Manao gulped visibly, shocked.

“Who is being double-crossed?” Yūra wanted clarification. He was the most senior and respected member of the council, and was not so rattled by the idea.

“Iwagakure and Kumogakure continually reject our closest ally, while promoting discourse and trade with Suna.” Gaara stood to approach the dais, “There would hardly be a better time to leverage a high-profile prisoner, or frame either village for thwarting the other. Such interference will reverse or reduce enmity towards Konohagakure. We can achieve a much more level field prior to the next Summit, and utilize our influence to mediate.”

“You want to cut new deals this way?” Tōjūrō scoffed, “That’s rather roundabout.”

“Konoha would be excluded from those negotiations, otherwise.”

“Are you certain? I would prefer sending additional emissaries to persuade the Tsuchikage and Raikage’s councils to favor Leaf. It’s safer than turning their animosity on each other.” Ibushi recommended.

“Envoys are more likely to be rejected if they overtly state our support of Konoha’s welfare. Do we have adequate forces and resources to conduct such a mission?” Gaara cut to the chase, watching fear and confusion reflect in the eyes of the men sitting before him. They were reminded of his father, Rasa, and his forceful, underhanded tactics to get ahead. To think the son would rely on his father’s methods—they might’ve thought twice about endorsing Gaara as Godaime.

Yūra assured him, “Both are adequate. Give the order, Kazekage-sama. I will send and direct those teams myself.”

“Not so fast. This will require additional approval by the rest of the council.” Tōjūrō reminded them, “But if you want to move quickly on this Gaara-sama, we will see it done.”

His breath nearly hitched when the two agreed to such a duplicitous task. The others still appeared uncomfortable.

“We will meet again with the full advisory council in the morning.” Gaara decided, “I appreciate your time.”

He had offered the false mission specs to this group, and would then unwind the string to see where the rat would carry the information off to. Upon leaving the auditorium with his sister and Chiyo in tow, Gaara expected this misinformation to circulate to the Akatsuki at some point, and would perhaps encourage the Akatsuki to attack while expecting multiple teams to be away from Hidden Sand. But they wouldn’t be. He would fabricate the whole thing. The village would be fortified and waiting. ‘It’s just that these council members will have no idea that each team they send will have a secondary order that I issue, placing them as sentries throughout the village.’

Any of the council members who were caught after such a bait-and-switch incident would be thrown in prison so fast their heads would spin. Due process would hopefully yield a treason conviction, then the mole would no longer be an issue. The Akatsuki would be, unfortunately. The timing of a reactionary attack and bid to capture him was ambiguous, Gaara knew. Would the organization be wholly occupied with capturing other jinchuriki? Would the Akatsuki turn their attention elsewhere—to Leaf, Cloud, or Waterfall? If his plan worked, Sand would be next in their queue.

“I don’t trust them.” Temari declared as they walked back toward the Administrative Building, “But I’m also not sure if you missed a possible traitor with the first dismissal.”

“I couldn’t get a complete look at everyone, though those who expressed concern are less likely to be culprits.” Gaara reasoned.

“He’s not wrong.” Chiyo agreed, “If you think someone is passing on sensitive information, it most certainly is one of those conceited shitheads on the advisory council. I’ll keep my eye on them for you, Kazekage-sama.” She parted from the youngsters to find her own brother.

Once at the Administrative Building, Temari and Gaara scaled the stairs side-by-side.

“Do you think Gama-sennin made it in time?” She wondered.

“No.”

“What about Utakata?”

“I think he might’ve fought,” Gaara predicted, “And won.”

“You sure sound confident…”

“He’s strong. I think he can do it.”
“Maybe against one shinobi, he could, but not if the whole organization goes after him.” Temari wagered.

He nodded at that, turning on the mid-level landing to look out a window for a moment. The sky was clear. He felt anxious, “Would you mind if I sent you with Matsuri and Shigenori to check on things in Tide? Assess damage and assist with what you can? I can always send more teams if you need them.”

“Sure, but yuck, why Shigenori?” She joked, knowing he had been a rival for the Fifth Kazekage position.

“Because I just realized that I can trust him, and I might be installing him to the advisory council once we oust whoever has been betraying our village.” He concluded.

“Oh. Well, I won’t spoil the news for him…”

“Don’t.”

“He still doesn’t like you much.”

“That doesn’t matter. What matters is that he serves Suna.”

She patted her brother’s back, proud of him.

When they arrived at Gaara’s office and pushed the door open, it looked as though Gaara was already seated at his desk, examining trade permits. The doppelganger looked up from a cup of noodles, slurping slowly.

“Have you been here all morning?” Gaara wondered.

“Yeah, actually. Do I look convincing?” Naruto tried to imitate Gaara’s default facial expression.

Temari gave him a small compliment, “That’s pretty good. You weren’t forging Gaara’s signature, right? That’s illegal.”

“Nah, just reading. I gave out a couple of low-level missions based on these Memos.”

“I didn’t say you could do that.” Gaara circled around the desk and shooed Naruto out of his seat, who released his Transformation, “Did you do anything else?” He chucked the empty cup noodle into a waste bin.

“I took this, but I didn’t open it, because I’m not you—” Naruto handed over a bright red scroll, delivered by one of Shiogakure’s hawks, “I learned a little from one of the greenhouse guys that stopped in, talked to some Genin students, filed some of this junk you have laying around.” He took a seat on the upholstered arm chair opposite the desk, “Fujita made it back to Leaf the other day and sent me a message, and he was wondering why I didn’t go back with him. I kind of bluffed in a reply…”

“You could’ve told him that I ordered you to stay here until you’re cleared. I don’t know what the Akatsuki’s movements will be, and he would understand if you told him why you’re at risk.” Gaara supposed as he settled in, pleasantly surprised by how everything had been organized. Dusted too, by the look of it. Who knew Naruto could keep a space?

“Not just yet.” Naruto crossed his arms, “I’d feel stupid telling the kid first and not telling Hinata!”

“Hm. So that’s what her name is.” Temari chuckled from her place beside a water cooler, filling a glass up.

He craned his neck around the chair to look back at her, “Yeah. You didn’t know that…?”

“I knew some cute girl loves you based on what Gaara’s said, but he never really told me who she was.” The woman crossed over to a bureau and leaned against it, taking sips of her drink.

While the two chattered about incidental details that had been glossed over, Gaara was well into reading the correspondence that had arrived from the Tide Village. Within the scroll were two separate notes: one from Jiraiya and one from Kankuro. Gaara read his brother’s message first.

Gaara, this was a close one. I kind of can’t believe everything that just happened, but overall I think the Tide Village will be alright. We’re still waiting to hear from our tracking teams, and we’re feeling more optimistic that the Akatsuki leader can’t get far with Utakata. His last two proxies are damaged, and we sent about 30 or so skilled shinobi after him.

Listen, this weird spy that works with the Toad Sage—Obito—he saved my life. He saved a lot of people. I’ve never had a brush with death quite this close, so it occurred to me I haven’t told you lately that I’m proud of you, and really glad I’ve had time to be your big brother. You know, not just some cowardly kid back when Dad was fucking things up, but actually get to know you and support you. I treasure you and Temari.

Anyway, Maki and I will be alright. Casualties were very heavy for the Tide teams and Leaf Corps members that stayed here to fight. Damage to the city is as serious if not more so than the Shin clan’s attack, and I don’t mean to be a jerk about this but, Hidden Sand is not on the hook for the repair bill this time. It will be hard for the people here to rebuild, but they’re spunky and making great money. I know it can be done. Tazuna didn’t seem to worry about it much. He’s glad that not a single civilian casualty occurred. We’re all relieved that proactive communication kept people safe.

Jiraiya said he’ll give you the details on this Akatsuki member, based on what we’ve all compiled. When I get home I can tell you more, since I fought and learned some stuff about Pein. Keep your eyes open for follow-up reports, and if by any chance Rock, Cloud, Waterfall, Dream, or Star ask for more information about the Akatsuki: give it to them right away. We’ve asked Hidden Leaf to do the same. Share all of this.

Look after yourself, Gaara. I’ll see you soon.

The heartfelt missive made Gaara glance up after reading and clear his throat, hit by a wave of gratitude that his brother’s life had been spared. Further down the parchment were Jiraiya’s comments:

Hi Gaara, your slow-as-hell Sensei has made it to the Hidden Tide Village and boy have I got some shit to tell you.

First of all, expect to hear some grievances from Leaf’s councils soon. Said grievances won’t be geared toward you or Hidden Sand, but they’ll be directed at Tide regarding the loss of Leaf’s Sealing Corps Director Shimura Mochinaga, as well as other Leaf Corpsmen that died during the attack. These were some highly esteemed shinobi whose deaths will be felt in the village, and their talent will be very difficult to replace. So there’s that. Not quite a major issue, but an issue all the same.

Your brother looks to be fine, however he’s expressed some concern about someone named “Menma” being missing after the fight with Pein. Likewise, Obito is also okay but took a considerable beating, and will need a few days of rest to recover from chakra exhaustion. I’m sending him home to his family when he is well enough to go.

To get to the meat of it, Pein is alleged to be the leader of the Akatsuki, and per the accounts of those who fought him in Tide, he can control up to six “proxies,” which are animated bodies that possess a variety of jutsu. These dead bodies (examinations suggest they are preserved corpses of former ninja) receive signals remotely through “black receivers,” chakra-demodulator rods they are pierced with. Interrupting the signal or rendering the body immobile are the only known ways to stop proxies controlled by this method. Each body seems to have an exclusive ability, and they do not wield multiple jutsu the way living shinobi tend to. Analysts are still examining the null proxies that were left behind. Four of six proxies were destroyed in the Tide Village, with the exceptions being the Absorption and Force proxies. Reports indicate the following abilities were encountered:

- Unknown Type that was immediately sealed by Kankuro’s team, and as such there is no record of what it can do.

- Summoning Type that summoned many types of large, contracted animals that are also controlled by black receivers. Reports noted a crustacean, chameleon, and multi-headed dog.

- Weapon Type that sported six arms that could fire missiles, and had a variety of weapons imbedded within its body.

- Soul-Stealing Type that could make contact with a single target and read the mind of the victim, was also thought to extract the consciousness of a victim to kill them.

- Chakra-Absorption Type that passively absorbs chakra and can negate Ninjutsu. Those that resorted to using Taijutsu in order to deal with this proxy were outmatched, however some success was reported by isolating this proxy and utilizing Genjutsu.

- Force-Manipulation Type is the form that Obito recognized based on its routine interactions with other Akatsuki members. It can manipulate attractive forces to push or pull anything nearby it. There is a gap of time between each use of this ability, approximated to be 5 seconds. It uses this ability offensively and defensively. If more of the controller’s chakra is devoted to this proxy, or perhaps any of the other forms, its attacks are amplified. Furthermore, the time gap reportedly shrinks.

You might be asking yourself how someone can manipulate various bodies all at once. We are not exactly sure, but I have a hunch. Obito confirmed that each of the bodies had abnormal eyes that fit the description of a primitive Doujutsu called the Rinnegan. This type of power was wielded by the Sage of the Six Paths in ancient times, and is absent in modern day shinobi. That’s what we thought up until now. It stands to reason that this kind of Doujutsu could very well be behind Pein’s ability. For now, we are assuming that Pein can create more of these proxies to replace those that are lost, if given enough time.

I need to confess that I have met someone with eyes like these once before, back when I was a much younger man. I looked after three orphans in the Land of Rain during the Second Great Ninja War, and was surprised to find a boy named Nagato who had the Rinnegan. After an ambush on the hideout where he and his friends lived, I left that land assuming they were dead. Naruto is familiar with this tale. Please let him know that I think those children may be connected to the Akatsuki in some way. I will also be warning Tsunade of the possibility.

Once I wrap up damage control here, I’ll be making my way to Nanakusa. I can keep you in the loop on Haku’s status (I have some favors to ask of him), and if Momochi is stupid enough to cross me. If you have questions, don’t hesitate to send a message to Shiogakure. There were many witnesses to the attack, and some people might have details we missed.

Oh, and keep Naruto tucked under your wing for a while. Things are haywire with the Akatsuki brazenly attacking villages. I don’t want him going anywhere without me, at the moment. Why not help him out and teach him what it means to be a Kage? He’s going to need a professional leg to stand on when he gets back to Leaf. Polish him up!

-Jiraiya

When he finished, Gaara held out the scroll to Temari, “You should read what Kankuro wrote.”

“Oh?” She raised a brow and crossed over to the desk.

“What’d he write?” Naruto was eternally curious.

“That he loves us.”

Naruto pooched his lips and slumped down in the armchair, moved by the bond of siblings.

Temari was speed-reading and commenting simultaneously, “I think I’m going to have to cut this out and frame it.”

Gaara nodded in agreement and then added, “I’ll see who among the Medical Corps is free to go south with you and the team I am putting together. I am not sure…if Matsuri will be alright.”

“Why not?” Temari was spilling over into Jiraiya’s message.

“Because Menma is missing.”

Her eyes darted up, alarmed.

Gaara sighed and rubbed his head, feeling the weight of Naruto’s stare on him.

“She shouldn’t go with me to Tide, then.” Temari supposed.

“If she doesn’t and finds out anyway, that won’t put her at ease either.”

“So you want me to watch your student find out first hand that her boyfriend is missing or probably dead?” She was not charmed by the task.

Naruto’s eyes went even wider as he looked at his friend, where Gaara had leaned over his desk and plopped his head into his palm, “No matter what she’ll be unhappy. So what do I do? She’s already preparing to travel.”

An immediate suggestion came from Naruto, “Well, you send her!”

Temari and Gaara goggled at him.

“Even if she’s freaking out, it makes more sense to send her. Then she’ll feel like she has slightly more control over the situation, if she can look and ask around. If she’s stuck here she’ll just go insane. I know I would.” He reasoned.

Gaara wasn’t so sure, “Naruto, Matsuri still has to be able to follow orders in a time of crisis.”

“And you don’t think she can? She’s a Chunin. She can hold it together.”
Vexed, Gaara formed hand signs and summoned a pint-sized scorpion. He muttered orders at it while confirming to his human companions, “Matsuri will go too. I’m assigning her.”

“This is going to be ugly.” Temari predicted.

“So was your last mission.” Her brother remarked.

“Seems to have become my specialty— taking tragedy head-on.” Temari watched the scorpion scuttle away from Gaara’s desk and out an open window, “Which meeting point?”

“The village gate in thirty minutes.”

Temari nodded to her brother and then requested of Naruto, “Help him, Naruto. Neither of you do anything reckless.”

He gave her an affirmative sound before the kunoichi hustled out of the office. The door clicked shut behind her as Naruto rose from his seat to approach the desk, and thunked his hands down on top of it, “Tell me how I can help you, Gaara.”

“You already have.”

“Hey, don’t be figurative. I mean seriously. You need to give me something to do if you’re going to stick me on Suna’s no-exit list.” Naruto punctuated the last words with finger-taps, “Keep--me--busy.”

“We’ll be waiting on correspondence from other villages, and I expect Tsunade-sama’s updates will be arriving soon.” Gaara thought on it, “So if you want something to do…”

“Let me shadow your duties.”

“Later. I have a better idea.” The Kazekage fished around a desk drawer for official letterhead, “Now that you’re a Chunin, you ought to know how to climb the ladder of shinobi hierarchy.”

While standing, Naruto flexed in a feline, tongue-curving stretch, still antsy, “I do know. I work hard and earn respect!”

“Along with that, strategy and timing get you there. You can still be respected and go nowhere. If you want to be Hokage, you have to understand how to make the village want you to be the Hokage.” He was testing a pen that was running low on ink, “Arguably the best place to start is to elect a specialization.”

“Elect a wha-?”

Gaara gestured with the pen, “You have various talents. Develop one that allows you to amass greater acclaim and trust, like how Sakura has risen in Leaf’s Medical Corps. The reason why it works is because those in your sphere of influence will begin to vouch for you when it comes time for a retiring Kage and the land’s daimyo to select a succeeding candidate. Fundamentally, that’s how it goes…but there are always other factors that come into play.” He summarized, “At this point you are blessedly well-rounded and sporting several key advantages, but if you choose a talent that aids the village and serves its best interests—”

“People will be more willing to consider me?”

“Exactly.”
“How do I make an election then?”

Gaara dove into the topic, “You show up to a division or Corps office with a recommendation. Usually there will be a preliminary assessment before you are accepted on a full-time basis. For example, if you wanted to serve on Konoha’s advisory council and join it as a junior member, you submit a recommendation and pass a practical interview. Rather simple. Other divisions in the village will require different materials and commitments from you. They might also try to turn you away at-will with no reason cited.” He indicated that the unjustifiable prejudice Naruto routinely endured as a jinchuriki could complicate the feat, “But you won’t be turned down.”

“I won’t?” Naruto squinted his eyes, “Why not?”

“Because the Kazekage’s recommendation is not so easily ignored.” Gaara was a bit smug, “Neither is the Hokage’s.”

“Wouldn’t that look just a little bougie? It’s not exactly a secret that you guys like me.”

“That’s the point.”

He shrugged, “Ah, if it works, it’s still probably not the worst thing someone’s done to get into one of these.”

“True. Now, what division do you think you could serve?”

“…I’m not re-eeally sure…shouldn’t I give it some thought and choose carefully?”

“Just pick one.” Gaara sniffed, pressing the pen to paper.

“Jeez, fine. Ero-sensei had me eating and breathing sealing scrolls he brought along on our trip, before we ended up on Mount Myoboku. That’s how I worked out the Hiraishin.”

“Alright, so the Sealing Corps.”

“Isn’t that, like, the top rung of shinobi divisions-? I kinda fell off the band wagon and haven’t read much lately.”

“That doesn’t matter. Once you join, you’ll be devoted to studying and assisting analysts. Then after that, coordinators and commissioners. The point is to learn. You don’t have to be the best there.”

“—didn’t you say-?”

“Quiet. I’m writing.” Gaara was concentrating on the start of a bewitching endorsement.

He stood there for a moment, doing his best to remain silent while Gaara wrote. Naruto felt the urge to tap his foot, wild with energy and questions, glancing around the office. When not speaking became unbearable, he whispered a question, “…would I…report to that place every day?”

“Ask those questions after you are accepted.”

“Again with the assumptions.”

Gaara cocked his head in annoyance, “Save your questions for when you are a member. I won’t know every detail of how that division operates in Leaf.” He fished for an official signature seal in a stationary box, “You’ll further distinguish yourself by performing well on missions, obeying the Hokage, and maintaining a rapport with all of the standard forces.”
“Sounds like a cakewalk.” Naruto thought out loud, not counting possible discrimination.

“It’ll be much harder than it sounds…” Gaara assured him as he pressed the sealing stamp at the bottom of the page, “However, you can use a good challenge. Your training over the last few years has gone exceedingly well, so let’s see how you perform in the civic arena.”

Naruto accepted the official letter his friend handed to him, feeling a tickle in his chest. Gaara had faith in him. He felt encouraged, even if he was lost at the fork at the start of this particular path.

After putting away odds and ends on his desk, Gaara stood to fetch a drink of water from the cooler at the corner of the room, “We should go over the things Sensei mentioned in his message. Those details will help us deal with the Akatsuki in the future.”

Naruto plopped back down into his seat, “Alright.”

“Then, lunch. Then more committee meetings. You can shadow me for those, they’ll be brief.” The Kazekage downed the cup of water, adding, “After all that, I’ll show you around all of the Corps divisions we have here, so you get an idea of what they’re like.”

“Huh. I’d appreciate it.”

Gaara crossed over to him and patted the empty cup on top his friend’s head, “Once all of that is out of the way, and I have more free time tomorrow…” He smiled, “We can train together.”

This was a schedule Naruto could get behind, “About time you suggested that, you know.”

“I was getting to it. My job doesn’t allow for days off.”

“I might kick your butt, Gaara.”

“If you do, it won’t damage my ego nearly as much as it would have in the past.” Gaara circled around his desk again and handed off the scroll with Jiraiya’s message to Naruto, “Neither will I boast about it should I defeat you.”

“You are SO,” Naruto emphasized, “Full of shit.”

“I am.”

“You’re buying lunch.”

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked it, peeps. I need to drink from a jug of motivation juice in order to get working on the next few installments, which ought to be a bit shorter in length and easier to churn out. Fanfic posting gets a bit hairy when it coincides with novel writing, whittling down that stack of books I said I’d read, work, whiskey, life, and 3DS games. To anyone who might find the time to do actual editing work/proofreading on a book manuscript next year: drop me a line. I need a serious brain and set of eyes to look at [working title] Quartz Story. Inquire by PM.
Chapter 49- Line of Sight
By the look of it, Ino over-stuffed the box Hinata had brought to stock up on herbal remedy ingredients. The Yamanaka Flower Shop’s donation of rare roots and blooms was very generous, though Hinata regretted not bringing payment with her, ‘This is too much— and they’re expensive…’ Ino had shooed her along cheerily.

Hinata crossed town in a brisk scurry, and on the third floor of the Administrative Building she spied Shizune in a corner workroom. When she entered and set the very full box down on a table top, Shizune batted her eyes in surprise. “Thank you for bringing these so quickly, Hinata…but we only needed three roots at most.”

Young medic-nin trainees were filing into the room and gathering ‘round.

“I know, Ino-chan shared more than I asked for.” She opened a satchel bag slung over her shoulder and scooped a variety of excess plants into it, “I’ll bring these home with me so I can plant some of my own.”

“Perfect.” Shizune nodded to the girl and acknowledged the Hokage when she stepped into the room, “Good morning, Hokage-sama.”

“Morning. Shizune…let’s talk later about what’s going on in Shiogakure. It’ll be a long talk with the advisory council.” Tsunade kept her voice down, then greeted students, “Good morning, class.”

Hinata was about to make her way out before Tsunade stopped her, “Hinata…”

She spun on her heel and bowed slightly, “Good morning, Hokage-sama!”

“I’ve been waiting, you know.”

“Waiting?” Hinata’s brows were aloft, “For what?”

Tsunade cocked a hand on her hip, as if she didn’t believe Hinata was unaware of the broached subject, “Don’t be coy, young lady. Kakashi said he dropped off a recommendation letter for you over a week ago. I’ve been waiting for you to submit it after I heard…I thought maybe you’d forgotten.”

“A…Jounin recommendation?” She wanted to be sure.

“Of course.” The Hokage balanced her spread fingertips on the table, exercising patience, “Bring it to me when you think of it, and then your evaluation can be scheduled.”

“R-Right!” This was the first she had heard of such a letter existing. Had she been informed, Hinata would have scoured her house days ago for this alleged recommendation. She excused herself, and rather than take the stairs of the building, she exited from a top story window and bounded over rooftops.

‘So I did receive one! Just like Neji-niisan and Sato-kun did!’ Her face stretched in a wide smile, still in disbelief over the development, ‘Wait until Naruto hears! My hard work paid off, and other shinobi know that they can depend on me…’

She had been too caught up with other distractions to give much thought to another promotion. Hinata and most of the Hyuga clan were still waiting to hear the results of Neji’s assessment. He set out a day ago and had yet to return. As Hanabi had put it: He went off somewhere, with someone, and it could take over a day to finish the test. Whatever.

Also, Hinata had been chafed to hear that Fujita spent time with Naruto on a temporary team for Suna’s Accelerated Exam…after which Naruto had not come back to Konoha. Fujita explained it thusly: Hinata-sama, I know that he wanted to go home too! It seems the Kazekage had further business with him. It’ll be soon now. You were all he talked about!

She could take a bit of comfort in those words, but her patience was wearing micron-thin. Knowing that Naruto was so close made her a little chicken-headed, and disrupted some of her routines and assignments.

At the Hyuga estate she circled around to the garden and set her satchel on the porch, intending to plant the tubers she’d brought with her. Hinata then kicked off her shoes and hurried into the house, thinking to herself, ‘If Kakashi-sensei brought a recommendation letter here, he most likely gave it to Father…’ That too surprised her— that her father had not mentioned such an honor.

Down the hall and through the door of the sitting room, Hinata found Hyuga Hiashi reading a stack of daily news publications at a low table. He looked up at her fondly and his eyes said hello. Sometimes, nothing need be said between them. Unable to help herself, Hinata smiled and sat down, “Good morning, Father.”

“Good morning.” He poured tea for her, “Have you been rushing somewhere, Hinata?”

“I only had a few tasks this morning, and the Hokage told me…that Kakashi-sensei brought a Jounin recommendation letter to the Hyuga estate on my behalf.” She accepted a cup of green tea, “Do you have that letter, Father?”

Uncertainty crept at the corners of his face, “I don’t.”

“Oh.” Her joy fizzled.

“I was unaware, to be perfectly honest. That isn’t something I would have kept from you.” Hiashi stared out of a rice paper window, deep in thought for a moment, “It is possible that when that letter was delivered…it fell into the hands of our elders.”

“Ah.” She understood why that possibility displeased him.

“I suggest that you ask Elder Hichida, once he returns from prayer at the Branch House.” Her father supposed, “Or you may ask your Great Grandfather Haburo. He is in his study right now.”

Hinata sat quietly and sipped, also staring lethargically at the window of the room. It was no secret to her or anyone in the clan how much Haburo disliked her. In spite of this, Hiashi wanted her to advocate for herself.

Hinata asked, “Has Neji-niisan come home yet?”

“I expect he’ll be here soon. I am curious to learn how he fared.”

“I am too.”
He returned to the initial topic, “Hinata, don’t let our Great Elder take this opportunity from you…if indeed that is what he is trying to do…” Hiashi advised, “Challenge him. If all of the clan and village believes you to be worthy, with my Grandfather being the sole exception, then indeed you are worthy. Remember that.”

She downed the last of the tea in her cup and nodded. Hinata rose from a cushion and ventured back into the corridors of the Main House, proceeding toward the office at the far end. ‘Father thinks that maybe…the elders hid my letter? Maybe Great Elder told them to, or he took it himself?’ She was speculating, ‘Or we could be wrong. Maybe-?’ No. Hanabi and Tenten certainly would not have held onto it; they would have stormed up to her and presented her with such valuable correspondence.

It was deliberate interference, Hinata determined. She rapped on the jamb of the study before sliding the door open, announcing herself, “Good morning, Great Elder. Is it alright if I speak with you…?”

The old man was upright, leafing through pages in a binder he had pulled from a wall cupboard. Haburo did not even glance over his shoulder at her when he said, “Come inside and shut the door.”

Hinata did as she was told and hovered at the center of the room while her Great Grandfather trudged around, putting things away. She had scraped together enough nerve to address the issue, “Great Elder…Kakashi-sensei said that he dropped off a Jounin recommendation letter at the Hyuga estate vouching for my promotion. If you have it…will you please give it to me so I can submit it to the Hokage?”

Haburo shuffled around the edge of his desk toward a tall-backed swivel chair, making tired sounds as he settled into it. Once comfortable, he looked her square in the eye and said, “You may not have it.”

Such a response was expected, but Hinata wanted to uncover the heart of the matter, “Why?”

“I tore that letter to shreds.” Haburo informed her.

Heartbeat soaring and prickling with rage, Hinata took all the time she needed to silently fidget and glare. She was never one to throw a tantrum, but she was truly bewildered by such treatment. ‘I have only ever tried to bring honor to my clan and please our superiors! I’m not helpless like I once was! Why does he hate me so much?’

“Hinata,” The old man said, “You mustn’t think that you do not deserve such an accolade. Rather…now is not the time for you to be focusing on a Jounin promotion.”

Her arms were stiff at her sides, “Not to focus-? Great Grandfather—!”

“You must be thinking about the future of the Hyuga clan and how you will preserve it. I need you to pour your mind and efforts into it. Young Fujita, in spite of his recent promotion in Hidden Sand…is ill-equipped to be this clan’s next acting steward.” Haburo clarified himself, “You will assume that responsibility as stewardess, when Neji ascends to leadership. The Hyuga will be very well-positioned between your combined talents.”

This took her aback, “…I thought the Taketori—”

“You will NOT be betrothed to Kitano under any circumstance.” Haburo announced rigidly, “Choose someone respectable, preferably from Hidden Leaf.” He added with a sigh, “Fujita can maintain relations with the Taketori through his future marriage, and his children may be kept as wards of that confounded clan. If not, he may do as he likes and raise his children with the Branch Seal here.”

Hinata shook from head to foot, frazzled by the projected changes. It did not seem that Haburo hated her at all. He expected many things, but they did not seem nearly as injurious as they had in the past.

“If that is what you want us to do…if you want me to work hard and support our clan—” She marched up to the desk and asked, “Why did you tear up my letter, Great Elder?”

He laced his hands and settled his bony chin on them, weary, “Now is not the time for you to be roaming far and wide, under the direction of many councils and directors. You will stay here…close to the clan. You will not be entrenched in any of the dangerous diversions that superiors would bestow upon a young shinobi like you.”

“I am perfectly capable.” She reminded him.

“Great Granddaughter, please.” The old man’s tone was not cruel, but concerned, “I ask for your cooperation.”

Sullen, Hinata sank down into a spare chair opposite the desk and brewed over the request. Very little of it made sense, but at least she could tell that the old patriarch was not malicious.

After a dragging silence, Haburo admitted slowly, “These trying times…have me worried.” His eyes wandered around the room as he went on, “I ask you to continue your training, and to keep a low profile. With the conclusion of Leaf’s Chunin Exam, too much attention has been on the Hyuga clan.”

A niggling feeling ate at her stomach walls, “What do you mean?”

“I wish for you to pass beneath Root’s notice.” His voice was as soft as snow in deep wilderness, “You must avoid the Foundation while their scrutiny of our clan intensifies.”

The nervous feeling climbing up her stomach and chest reached its peak. Hinata knew precious little about the Root Foundation and what purpose it served outside of the Hokage’s jurisdiction, but she’d heard a few grisly rumors. She leaned forward and lowered her voice, “Great Elder…if we were not being scrutinized, would you have allowed me to take a Jounin Trial?”

“Yes.”

She frowned and considered the implication of such a reply. None of this was personal. If she knew well enough, Root’s primary task was the security of the Hidden Leaf Village through secret and unconventional means, so why would the Hyuga clan fall under their magnifying glass?

“Was it alright for Neji-niisan to—?”

Haburo confirmed, “I allowed him to take a Jounin Trial, although it may not have been wise.”

“What is Root looking for among the Hyuga clan?” Hinata wondered.

“Save your questions for now and do as I ask.” Haburo dismissed the train of thought, “Your ability is inestimably rare, Great Granddaughter. We will take no risks. I will approve for you a mountain of recommendation letters, once uncertain times pass.” He assured her, “The Hyuga clan will depend on you and Neji for protection.”

“From what?” She asked in a whisper.
He tried to speak, but couldn’t. His eyes were glossy and desperate, pale in their sockets as dry air puffed from his mouth. Hinata felt alarmed as the old man strained to give an answer. Then, Haburo gave up and batted his lips, exhausted.

“Run along now.” He told her. His shoulders were slumped as he turned his attention back to items scattered on the desk.

Hinata rose with a cautious bow while watching her Great Grandfather, far more concerned walking out than she had been walking in. She was lost in thought as she retreated down the corridor toward the front of the house. Why didn’t he say anything? Had age robbed him of the thought? He had looked so sure.

She needed fresh air. Hinata stepped out of a side door and spotted Fujita and Tenten seated on the east side of the porch. When she drew close she could hear Tenten gently scolding the young man as she handed him a dagger in a sheath.

“This is new.” Tenten folded his hands around it, “And better than the last one. So don’t lose it, okay?”

“I won’t, Onee-san.” He smiled slightly, “Although, it was kind of cool how I lost my other tantō…”

“Yeah, yeah. In the eye of a big eel or something…” Tenten waved it off, “A waste is still a waste. I give you things with sentimental value, so don’t let them sink into the sea please.”

“Got it.”

Hinata took a seat beside them and felt far more relaxed. The combined easygoing attitudes of the adoptive brother and sister helped her sideline Haburo’s incomplete warning.

“Hinata-sama, Naruto wrote back to me! I got a message this morning.” Fujita reported cheerfully, “He said that he was disappointed he couldn’t join me on the return trip. A broad no-exit order was issued by the Kazekage just after a report on the Akatsuki came in.”

“The Akatsuki?” Tenten was up off of the porch and bending in low Wushu stretches on the lawn, “Did something happen?”

“It said that the Tide Village was attacked by Akatsuki members who wanted to capture a jinchuriki.” Fujita exhaled roughly and leaned back on his arms, “That made me worry a little about Fū…”

Since Hinata was sitting there in a mildly horrified daze, not commenting, Tenten took that time to inquire, “And who is Fū?”

“Our third teammate who we met in Suna. She’s a jinchuriki from Hidden Waterfall.” Fujita was comfortable with the subject, “I know that the Akatsuki is dangerous and hunting individuals like her. I asked Fū to write to me often so that I know she’s alright.”

A presumptuous grin spread on Tenten’s face, “She sounds cool.”

“She is.”

“What does she look like?”

“Uh…well, about my height. She’s strong and fit.” His description was feeble even though he could picture the kunoichi clearly in his mind’s eye.
“Pretty?” Tenten gathered while she sank into a low leg extension.

Fujita puffed his cheeks and nodded.

“You’re such a sucker.” Tenten teased, “Boy can you pick ‘em. A jinchuriki! What must her jutsu be like-?”

“Amazing!” Fujita was compelled to share, “She’s versatile and easy to get along with! Fū can grow beetle wings to fly, or transform completely into a giant insect when using Chōmei’s chakra.” Understandably, Tenten was not familiar with who or what Chōmei was, so Fujita filled her in, “That is the name of her Tailed-Beast.”

“Wow.” Tenten stopped stretching and rested her hands on her hips, “Must be nice to grow wings. Or be huge.”

“It was very helpful.” He recalled Fū’s finest moments.

To Fujita’s left, Hinata was unusually withdrawn while she had been listening to the description. Much of her cousin’s account of making acquaintances with a jinchuriki, even identifying a Tailed-Beast by name, seemed more than coincidental when Hinata thought of what she had learned while ‘visiting’ Naruto. The possibility swirled around her mind, mixing with her disappointment over her torn up letter, as well as her awareness of the Root Foundation that Haburo claimed was ‘scrutinizing’ their clan.

She snapped out of her thoughts when Tenten patted her knee.

The woman smiled warmly at her, “Is something on your mind? You haven’t spoken much to us, Hinata.”

“I…I…” Hinata exhaled and blew a strand of hair from her face, “I’ve had a morning.”

“Ah.” Tenten got it, “Did your Elders get you out of sorts?”

Hinata drummed her hand on her leg, a bit anxious, “Great Elder Haburo said something strange…”

“He spoke to you?” This surprised Fujita.

“I thought he might be in possession of the Jounin recommendation letter that Kakashi-sensei wrote for me, but Great Elder tore it up.”

Aghast, both Tenten and Fujita were on their feet, about ready to light torches and locate pitch forks. They would arrange a mob to rally against such gross injustice. Hinata reached to pull both of them by their sleeves so that they were seated again.

She shook her head, “Please…don’t cause a fuss. He said he would have many other recommendations written for me, as an apology. He was worried about me taking a trial…how it might attract the wrong attention.”

Tenten crossed her legs and arms, still furious as she sat, “An apology? That old man is terrible! How could your promotion attract bad attention?”

“He thinks that…” Hinata glanced around, then dropped her voice to tell them, “The Root Foundation has been watching the Hyuga clan. Since the Chunin Exam, he said.”

Fujita’s concern was rather shallow, as he was unfamiliar with the ancillary Black-Ops organization.
Tenten, however, had a glint in her eye that suggested she was privy to the murmurings of unsavory activity Root was rumored to conduct.

“We haven’t done anything—” Hinata rephrased it, “I haven’t done anything that would be considered…objectionable by security forces. I know that.”

“We all do.” Tenten confirmed.

“Though Great Elder said he was worried.” She added in a whisper, “And he couldn’t tell me about what.”

Fujita protested in a hushed voice, “If Great Grandfather is going to dramatically cancel your chance at a Jounin promotion, surely he can explain-!”

“No. He…couldn’t speak. It was as if he couldn’t breathe, or…I’m not sure.” Hinata pressed her fingers together, bending and flexing them, “He was stopped from telling me. Maybe.”

At that, Fujita ruminated in silence while Tenten held Hinata’s gaze, taking the news very seriously.

“So…” Tenten took a breath, “We should be on the lookout for anyone who thinks they need to watch us. Your dad should know about this. Well, Hideyasu too…” She rubbed her chin, “And Neji, of course.”

“I don’t want to trouble everyone.”

“It’ll be more trouble if they’re unaware of what’s going on when we are inexplicably arrested or who knows what.” She prophesized, “Let’s not blow this out of proportion, but let’s not ignore it.”

“Could we really have committed an offense?” Fujita wracked his brain for any possible context of guilt that would incur Black Ops supervision.

“No, we didn’t. Let’s relax.” Hinata coached her two companions to inhale with her, breathing out heavily, “Now, I would like to eat ramen.”

“Straight to the sodium we go.” Tenten chuckled, “I’ll have lunch with you, if you want. Later I have—”

Reaching over to direct her by the shoulder, Fujita turned Tenten around so she could observe Neji plodding through the entrance of the estate. These days he wore black and white Hanfu almost exclusively, thanks to Kayato’s fashion influence. It looked as though Neji had been jostled around in the forest: green leaf and dirt stains visible on white sleeves, hair a bit untidy. He’d certainly worked hard on something.

The question blared off of their faces as Hinata, Tenten, and Fujita stood in front of the engawa, watching the heir of the Hyuga clan approach tiredly. Neji felt the force of their stares. Of course they would want to know how it went. He wasn’t going to have a few minutes to sit and relax and eat something. The most he’d had for a meal in over a day was a handful of almonds, donated by one of his evaluators.

Ah, and there was Tenten watching, her eyes astute and calculating. She read the signals. His disheveled state. His lack of energy and emotion. His gait. Her mouth curled up in the beginnings of a smile. She didn’t need his explanation to know how his trial had gone.

The expression on her face immediately goaded an honest reaction from Neji. He tucked his head down slightly and tried not to smile, because she always made him want to, but resisting the urge was futile. She had caught him. Without speaking, he’d let the truth slip.

She grinned and folded her arms, thrilled, “Congratulations, Neji. I see that you didn’t come back home a complete chump.”

He stopped in front of her and quipped, “I never do.”

Hinata had surfaced from her funk to greet Neji with her typical congeniality, and beside her Fujita was also chirping his congratulations. Down the way, a door slid open and Hanabi charged out onto the porch with a clamor. Hiashi was following behind her slowly. Neji’s return had not gone unnoticed since they had been watching indoors.

Hanabi’s questions drowned out all other comments for a full thirty seconds. Neji’s answers did not illuminate much: Yes, he’d passed. No, he was not officially a Jounin; the decision still fell to the Hokage, who would look over his transcript later. No, it wasn’t very interesting.

“You need to give more detail than that, Neji-niisan.” Hanabi complained flatly.

“Detail.” Neji sighed as he sat down on the porch, “I would prefer to exchange details for a meal.”

Tenten was assessing his needs, “I bet you’re starving.”

When he nodded, she set out into the house to find something for him to eat. Hiashi stood between his daughters with his arms tucked in long sleeves, amused by his nephew’s evident burnout, “It was a trying task, no?”

“Trying, but not unmanageable.”

“What were you made to do?” Hinata asked.

“I came to understand after a talk with Gai two days ago…it is tradition for old teammates to test the protégées of former team members. In my case, Shiranui Genma and Ebisu agreed to host my evaluation.” Neji explained, “I reported to the designated training area and listened to their instructions.”

“Which were?” Hanabi pressed.

“To test my competency, they wanted to see if I could disable the both of them while adhering to limitations they set.”

Hanabi pestered, “What limitations?”

Story-telling was not Neji’s strong suit. He was frowning as he went on, “None of us were individually permitted to use hand seals to perform Ninjutsu or Genjutsu. I was also told not to use my Kekkei Genkai.”

“But it’s only natural for us to use it!” Fujita was astonished by the handicap.

“They knew that.” Neji acknowledged.

“You clearly overcame their test.” Hinata noticed cheerfully.

“Not without hardship.” Neji acknowledged, “I might have misunderstood the parameters of that duel initially…because they did not hesitate to use combined hand seals for jutsu against me.”

Hanabi’s face was blank, “What’s a combined hand seal?”
To demonstrate, Hiashi wordlessly extended his hand and Hinata folded hers against it, creating a Horse Seal.

Hanabi clucked impatiently at such a simple concept, “So ninja can actually use jutsu that way?”

“To great effect.” Neji confirmed, “I wasn’t expecting it.”

When Tenten returned with a tray of rice, mackerel, and vegetables for her boyfriend, Hanabi caught her up to speed by paraphrasing the start of Neji’s trial retelling. Tenten nodded and sat down beside Fujita on the porch.

“Oh, so they tried to trick you?” Tenten was pleased, “Did they land a hit?”

“A few.”

“You fought without the Byakugan?”

“Without it.”

“So how did you counter a no jutsu situation while your opponents were still technically using jutsu?” Tenten let him have a few moments to chew the food he stuffed into his mouth.

“I focused on Ebisu to wear him down with Taijutsu.” Neji explained, “That additional pressure made him use Supplementary Jutsu, unintentionally…which did not stop the trial. But I felt it was reasonable to bend the rule after a host broke the rule.”

“You used jutsu.” Hanabi accused.

“Just once.” Neji was pleased with himself.

“A Shadow Clone.” Tenten guessed.

“They didn’t notice until it was too late.” Neji took another victorious bite of lunch.

“You were not reprimanded for that breach of regulation?” Hiashi was surprised.

“The matter was debated fairly…and they agreed not to fault me for a reaction to their mistake.” He finished another mouthful and added, “Following the initial trial, I was asked to accompany them on an A-Rank mission. We completed that this morning, and they gave me their endorsement.”

“Huh. So that’s how it works.” Tenten was impressed.

“You will keep this in mind for your own evaluation in the near future.” Hiashi turned to Hinata, arching a brow as if to say, Did you find that letter?

“I…will need to speak to you about that, Father.” Hinata had a few things she needed to address, “May we go inside to talk about it?”

He nodded and shepherded Hanabi along, and Hinata trailed after them on the engawa while parting from Neji and Tenten with a wave. Across the lawn, Hideyasu was bellowing for Fujita to get off his tush as he was late for Nature Manipulation training! Fujita sprang up with a squawk, “Ack— Neji-niisama! Congratulations to you on your promotion! Look after Onee-san today—” He took off to meet his father.

Blinking, Neji watched the boy skirt around the corner of the house in the direction of the pebble training yard. When he wasn’t looking, Tenten picked food from his bowl to sate her empty stomach.
He still noticed, of course.

“You haven’t eaten anything?” He suspected.

“No. I was up early this morning working. I told Lee and Gai-sensei I’d join them for weight training this afternoon.” She wore a pleased-as-pie smile, “And now you can come with me to tell them the news.”

“Yes. Though there’s still time.”

“For what?”

“To go somewhere.” He said.

His bowl was about empty, to Tenten’s displeasure, “Where?”

“Wherever you want—”

Before he could finish speaking, Tenten had selected their destination, “To Nabezo! Let’s get shabu shabu and dumplings.” She did not even wait up for him. Tenten was on her feet and marching off of the property to the beat of her hunger pains.

He set aside the food tray on the porch, which he knew was a rude thing to do to housekeeping staff, and followed after his girlfriend. Their dates were always more pragmatic than romantic, not that Neji would complain. He took comfort in the routines and rituals they had established. There was a time and place for displays of affection, and that was usually beyond the public’s view. And yet, he thought to himself as he walked and caught up to her, watching Tenten from the corner of his eye, ‘I wanted her to…’ He’d expected to come home to less clan fanfare, hoping to discuss his success with Tenten only and then revel in her attentions. His family had mucked with that goal.

Neji slid his fingertip along the back of her hand and arm while they walked. She only spared an acknowledging glance, smiling at him, knowing better than to hold his hand. He didn’t like doing that while out among peers and society who might, heaven forbid, witness him tethered to an attachment.

“I’m proud of you.” She said the words he wanted to hear, because she was also a part-time mind reader.

He smiled and, oh well, some other pedestrians may have seen it.

“I knew you could do it. I wasn’t worried. Lee and Gai-sensei aren’t worried either, but they’ve been preoccupied devising new ways to challenge you when you get back.” Tenten warned him, “Wong Leung’s training might be gentler than what they’ve got in store.”

“Then I’m switching training regimens.”

“Ha, nice try. You can’t go soft right after a promotion. Keep working hard.” She looked lively for someone who had been up since four in the morning and had not eaten anything. Neji kept catching himself looking at her, even after they arrived at the tavern and were seated.

While chatting about the last 48 hours of their lives apart, Neji noticed that in spite of the fact he’d eaten already, he kept up with Tenten as they dipped marbled beef into the hotpot, clearing two plates and then some. Tenten had finished a basket of dumplings without his participation, as that item was her gastronomic fetish. Somehow she was pacing herself to eat long after Neji had politely sat back to quit.
“On top of all that,” Tenten continued the conversation as she boiled radish and mushrooms, “I learned some weird things today.”

“Did you?”

“Yeah. Fujita said he made friends with the jinchuriki of Hidden Waterfall.”

Neji was authentically amazed, his eyes widening a fraction.

“And,” Tenten crowed softly, “He has a crush on her.”

Neji sipped from his glass of water. Apparently his young cousin had a particular palate when it came to women.

“He didn’t say so, I just have a feeling that he does.” Tenten clarified, “He also talked a bit about being on a team with Naruto, which was very entertaining. By the way, do you know what the Flying Thunder God technique is?”

“A legend.” Neji recalled from Academy stories, “Born from the endeavors of past Kage.”

“Well, Naruto uses that technique.” She popped a mushroom in her mouth, “That’s what Fujita said.”

“Fujita is mistaken.”

“I don’t think he is.”

“We’ll ask him to clarify his comments later. He was delirious from heatstroke in the desert.” Neji explained away the contentious claim.

“Yeah, sure. Also…Hinata told us that Elder Haburo said some crazy stuff about the—”

He held up a hand to deter the subject, “For now, I would prefer not to think or talk about Elder Haburo.”

“But he—” She quieted when she took note of the withered expression on Neji’s face. He needed to mentally fortify himself whenever Haburo was mentioned, due to past experiences with his dour forbearer.

“Okay, save that for later because you will be hearing about it from your uncle and Hinata. Most likely.” Tenten forecasted, “What he said was unsettling.”

“It always is.”

She had to hand him that point. She also paid for lunch, which Neji did not object to. Upon leaving the eatery, Neji asked her to take him to the location stipulated on the land deed her father had left her. Tenten thought it an odd request, “Are you sure you don’t want to…go home and take a bath or something?”

“I’m sure. There’s something I want to see.”

“I haven’t been there since I was a kid. It’s south of here…probably overgrown and unfit for resale.” She supposed glumly, leading the way.

They passed the Han Ethnic Quarter, circumvented the west side of the park, and came upon untended flat land at the foot of gently sloped hills. Everything was green but not overgrown, as Tenten had predicted it would be. She stopped and turned her head, “It doesn’t look so bad…” Businesses in the village were developing land and growing ever closer to the unused plot, but for now there was still half a kilometer of pristine, natural space.

Neji was dawdling around, observing young cypress trees that marked the edge of the property line. On a nearby stone, a lizard lay still while warming itself in the sun. Tenten crossed the grass and rested her hands on her hips, asking Neji, “Do you think I should sell it?”

“I don’t think you should.”

“I wish I could’ve lived here. Had a big house…our own yards and everything.” She reminisced about her father’s plans for a new home that he was never able to build.

“Is that what you still want?” Neji inquired.

“No. I have everything I could ever want.” She nudged him in the side with her elbow, content.

“Then what will you do with this place?”

Tenten shrugged, “I don’t know. My home is with you now. If I sell it, it’ll be like selling my Mom and Dad’s dream.”

Red and gold leaves blew loose from a nearby maple, tinted with the start of autumn. They stood in silence and wondered what good they could do together. What could be done that would not insult the past nor forsake the future? Tenten didn’t know. Since the loss of her parents, her life felt like a leftover piece of something, struggling to fit and settle her identity somewhere else.

“What if you restored another dream with their dream?” Neji suggested.

“…if I knew how to do that I certainly would.” Tenten was a little overwhelmed by such an objective.

Without clearing much up, Neji went on, “I plan to take a few solo missions as a Jounin.”

“You mean annually? Or monthly?” She already knew she would miss him.

“Monthly. For a short while. I prefer being with our team.” He explained, “Extra income will be helpful.”

Tenten scoffed, “Extra income.” Like he needed it.

“Permits can be expensive. We should ask about materials…”

“Hold it, you want to build something here?” Tenten caught on. She turned up her eyes as Neji stood very close, trailing his hands down her sides while thinking.

“Would you consider it? This land belongs to you. It’s your decision.” He reminded her, “But if you did, I think Wong Leung would teach at a school built here. He told me that he gave up that goal to raise Lee.”

She shut her eyes to deliberate for one silent minute. Tenten glanced around again and then tapped her finger on Neji’s chest, chuckling, “You thought of that yourself?”

“After he told me about his past, I’ve been thinking about how to help him.” Neji admitted.

“I think I remember Wong Leung mentioning that, once. That he came here to open a school, but it never happened…” Tenten nodded, “Quite the opportunity we have here…I say we do it. We’ll figure out the budget piece and then get to work.”

When Neji went in to kiss her mouth, Tenten simultaneously leaned back to offer her hand to shake on it. She laughed at his dumbstruck face. To seal the deal, she shook his hanging hand and then pecked his lips. After that he appeared to recalibrate.

“I was going to find a way to build it no matter what,” Neji said as they set out back in the direction of Leaf’s city center, “But thank you for doing this.”

She noticed that he was holding her hand, yet she did not bring attention to it, “Not at all, Neji. Though I don’t want to tell Wong Leung or Lee what we’re planning. I want it to be a surprise. Or more importantly, to not get their hopes up since we’re inexperienced and could fail miserably at this.”

“We won’t.”

“We won’t, eh? What do you know about constructing martial arts schools?”

“Nothing.” Neji conceded, “But who knows about anything when they are only beginning?”

Tenten had to tease, “I seem to remember you did as a kid, in the Academy. You were so stuck up.”

“Don’t remind me.”

A few blocks south of Konoha’s Administrative Building, where Neji and Tenten intended to inquire about building permits and such, they passed Tama and Sato traveling in the opposite direction. Tama and Tenten greeted each other civilly, but Sato was his usual cheeky self as soon as he laid eyes on Neji.

“Neji! Someone else’s fashion sense looks great on you.” Sato provided a thumbs-up of salutations.

“Likewise.” Neji was aware that Sato had formed a habit of repurposing his grandfather Sakumo’s clothing.

“Have you taken your Jounin Trial yet?” Sato was curious, “I just had mine scheduled with Asuma-sensei and Namiashi Raidō for next week.”

All Neji shared was, “Yes. It went well.”

“Of course it did.” Sato was smiling. He had a new fondness for Neji after they’d beaten the daylights out of each other in the Chunin Exam. Reciprocally, Neji seemed a touch less prickly around the gregarious Hatake. Only Tenten could have noticed such a subtle change.

Neji was still not very responsive to Sato’s attempt to gossip with him, whipping up tales of Kurenai-sensei and Asuma-sensei’s upcoming, clandestine nuptials, Hinata’s possible participation in Friday’s ramen eating contest at Ichiraku Ramen, and how was life with Tenten at the estate going? Because as soon as Sato got the scoop on that direct from the horse’s mouth, he’d be sure to spread it among their peer group and tease.

Meanwhile, Tenten and Tama carried on their own amenable conversation:

“‘You’re feeling better, Tama?’

“About back to how I felt before the Exam. Therapy helped! Sakura-chan looked after me.”
Tenten agreed, “She’s been protective of you. Me too, come to think of it.”

“Are you going to train with Uncle Gai today?”

“This afternoon. Were you thinking about joining us?”

“I was.”

“By all means.” Tenten invited her, “3:30 on those nose, field C.”

“I’ll be there!”

Tenten walked on with a brief farewell, though Sato grumbled as Neji tore himself away from forced chit-chat to follow his girlfriend.

“He’ll open up to you more soon.” Tama supposed as they walked down the street, “If you pass your Trial, Neji will definitely see you as an equal. He’s not as rough around the edges now that he has Tenten.”

“Yeah, he’s just not a talker. He’s barely even a listener.” Sato joked.

“That’s why we have Lee-kun, Chouji-kun, and Shino-kun.”

“They’re much better listeners, by far.” He agreed, “But I am stoked for Naruto to come back. He’s a chatterer after my own heart.”

“It won’t be long now, right? Hinata-chan would know.” Tama slowed to a stop when Sato did, as her companion had noticed a visitor to the Leaf Village wandering around the intersection of the avenue, trying to get some directional bearings.

Right away, Sato recognized the non-inhabitant as the new Mayor of Kuro Town and his tutor, former Grass ninja Toshisue Anyo. Sato took Tama’s hand in his own and trotted up to his friend with lively greetings, “Anyo! What brings you here?”

“Oh.” The white haired man had a careworn look on his face, “Hello, Sato. It’s nice to see you.”

“How’ve you been?” Sato extended pleasantries.

“Better.” Anyo’s gaze fell on Tama, “Hm. Is this your special someone?”

“Yep, this is Tama.” Sato introduced, “Tama, I’ve told you about Anyo who works in Kuro and chills with me sometimes.”

“He’s told me many good things.” Tama confirmed with a formal bow, “It’s good to meet you, Anyo-san.”

“And you as well, young lady. I’m looking for the Administrative Building.” Anyo announced, “Would you mind pointing me in the right direction? I am not very familiar with Konoha.”

“Oh, sure.” Sato gestured north up the road, “Just continue straight and bear right about…eight blocks up from here? You’ll see it’s a big circular building—kind of faded red with a beat-up roof.” He then wondered, “Did you need help with something in town? A project-?”

“This is more of a personal matter.” Anyo explained, “I wanted to submit a mission request to the Hokage to hire a tracking team.”
Sato and Tama exchanged eyebrow-raising glances.

“That might be a wait-listed request, since Hidden Leaf has a high volume of tracking assignments posted to search for various criminals and organizations.” Tama warned him.

Anyo nodded in understanding, “I’ll still apply. I’ve been struggling lately…since Sarincha went missing.”

The boy’s heart nearly stopped upon hearing the admission, “Sarincha’s missing?”

“It’s been over a week and she hasn’t come home…which is completely out of character for her.” The man lowered his voice, not truly comfortable sharing the situation. “She did not tell me that she would be away if it was for work, or visiting Kusagakure, or perhaps to see her father in Nanakusa…” It appeared as though he was in physical pain just speculating, “Or if something happened to her while I was occupied at the office…though I found no signs of foul-play in town or at our home.”

“That’s terrible.” Tama empathized.

Sato wanted to volunteer, “I can-!”

Anyo flicked his hand at him, “I don’t need you to work yourself up, Sato. There is much that the Hokage depends on you for…and Tama says this village is short on trackers.” He assured Sato, “I won’t stop until I find her. My instincts tell me she’s safe, it’s just…I have no idea where she might be, if not with me.”

“I really want to help you.” Sato protested.

“Well, you told me where to find the Hokage, so that’s enough.” His smile was lopsided.

“Is everything okay, though? You didn’t have a fight or anything?” Sato whispered.

Anyo was miffed by the implication, “No. Everything’s been fine. Better, even. That’s why none of this makes sense.”

“Sorry, sorry. Just wondering…” He was sincere, “It’s just that I really care about you guys. I’ll probably go crazy until you tell me that you’ve found her and that she’s safe. I mean, Orochimaru, Dintei Bi, and the Akatsuki are at large right now…so it’s hard to relax.”

“I know.” Anyo patted Sato’s shoulder appreciatively, “I promise I will keep you informed.”

“Thanks.”

With a nod of his head, Anyo acknowledged Tama, “Once again, it was a pleasure meeting you, Miss Tama. The two of you stay out of trouble…and hopefully I will be introducing Sarincha to you soon.”

“I hope so. Best of luck.” She watched as the man hurried on up the street, watching with Sato beside her, “He looks so jittery…”

“I would be too, if I lost you.” Sato spoke absently, watching his friend go.

Tama smiled to herself and laced her hand with his. Sato did not comment on how he was aware of Anyo and Sarincha’s tumultuous past, or the fact that Sarincha had once privately admitted to him that everything was not perfect in her marriage. She put up with many disappointments as Anyo’s spouse, yet claimed it was worth it. This recent development certainly cast a shade of doubt on that claim, Sato thought with a frown.

“Yo.”

The pair whipped around to observe Kakashi.

“Friend of yours?” Kakashi inquired as he loped to a halt.

“Toshisue Anyo. Swordsmanship tutor and Mayor of Kuro Town.” Sato explained, “Yeah, I know. He looks a lot like my dad.”

“Freakishly so.” Kakashi confirmed.

“Good afternoon, Sensei.” Tama greeted brightly.

“Hi, Tama. I’m not too late for practice, right?”

“You missed it by three hours, but you know we understand.” She relayed Kiba and Sakura’s expectation that Kakashi could never reconcile himself with dates and times.

“Sorry about that…”

Sato circled closer to his uncle, “Are you feeling better Kakashi?”

The man sighed softly, “For the most part. That last episode hasn’t repeated since…”

Tama seemed to be partially aware that Kakashi intermittently experienced strange phenomena attributed to his Sharingan eye. She did not press for further details, though.

“No you know what might’ve caused it?” Sato asked.

“No at all.” It was a seamless response that was only half truthful. Kakashi had ideas on what catalyzed the hallucination, but he wasn’t ready to share them with his talkative nephew.

He regarded Kakashi with a tilt of his head, “Take it easy, alright? We’ll catch up later.”

“Later.” Kakashi carried on as the young couple proceeded south down Main Street. He was not in the mood to broadcast how out of sorts he’d felt since seeing that Akatsuki member again, or how he wasn’t so sure he had imagined it all. It felt real. It still did.

Based on the morning’s update, passed through the grapevine top-down from the Hokage’s Advisory Council… the Akatsuki had attacked the Tide Village. That much was certain. Both Sunagakure and Shiogakure were reporting shinobi casualties, extensive damage to the city, and one missing Awa Utakata. The tidbit that Kakashi had asked for that no one had been able to answer was: How was Tide informed of an imminent attack? That isn’t information that Jiraiya casually happens upon.

None of the council members or Jounin had a clue. While climbing the steps of the Jounin Standby Station, Kakashi suspected that Jiraiya more than likely had an insider within the Akatsuki. It wouldn’t be outside the realm of possibility. Plenty of shinobi were well-connected, and practically made a second living off of espionage and selling information. Accessing the Akatsuki’s inner circle, however, was not common spy work.

‘That type of intel…planning attacks and the like…that would be shared with those who are considered unfailingly loyal to the organization— and this person clearly isn’t. Or…’ Kakashi pushed open double doors at the top of a landing and made a stop at a vending machine, ‘It could be one of the active members who snitched.’ His stomach swirled, ‘Like Uchiha Itachi.’

That, of course, bordered on absurd. Kakashi slipped a coin into the machine and pushed a button, ‘That’d be incongruent with what he did to the Uchiha clan. Although, the thin plausibility of village loyalty might fit there…I’ll have to ask Jiraiya to explain.’ It seemed too soon to try to explore the missing-nin’s motivations, or possible affiliation with Jiraiya. Trying to think about the slim chance of exonerating one of Konoha’s mass murderers in light of the greater good, whatever that was, would probably melt the brains of many councilmen. Kakashi at least prided himself in peeking outside of the box, once in a while.

He unwrapped the sweet apple bun, cozied up in a secluded corner near a window, and ate the snack. As someone who had known Itachi from a professional standpoint, back in the ANBU days, Kakashi could admit he still did not see why on earth the young man had chosen to destroy his clan. There was a fishy smell to it. A faint odor of doubt. Yet, Sasuke’s suffering and Itachi’s defection to the Akatsuki seemed to certify wrongdoing at a cellular level. For most people in Konoha, those actions were proof enough of Itachi’s guilt. They did not need to dig deeper.

And then there was the other coincidence, Kakashi thought as he chewed. That he had seen the Akatsuki member on the very day the attack on Shiogakure reportedly began. ‘Why?’ Had the trauma from his fight in the Land of Rain been so great that he had developed a sixth sense for it? What he could recall with certainty was that his Sharingan had changed during that past struggle, after watching Sato die. Kakashi could not claim to know everything about the eye that Obito had given to him, and so it helped to keep an open mind as he discovered new things. ‘If I am somehow able to see a member of the Akatsuki, I’ll have to grow a spine and keep it together…so I can report on it to the Hokage.’

He tossed the snack wrapper in a trash can and slipped his mask above the bridge of his nose. Kakashi strode past the panel window of a conference room door, deciding that since he was nearly an hour late for the Jounin Council meeting anyway, he’d get caught up once they called recess. He exited a sliding door onto the top floor balcony, where Asuma leaned on a rail and smoked.

His friend did not even turn around before speaking to him, “Get into that meeting, Kakashi. You’d be a useful mediator.”

“I’d feel more inclined if you weren’t out here shirking.” Kakashi happily took the spot beside Asuma.

He uttered a single word after a long drag, “Stress.”

“That bad, huh?”

“There sure as hell weren’t any good topics brought up in there. They didn’t even start discussing Shiogakure yet.” Asuma exhaled smoke from his nostrils, “Kurenai was tough enough to stay; said she’d fill me in later. The council was covering the details of Sasagainu Huo’s escape from custody.”

“I heard bits and pieces of that.” Kakashi turned around to lean his back against the rail, propping up his elbows, “Most of Leaf’s squadron was killed.”

Asuma recapped, “Only Inuzuka Hana survived when Bihokukuni’s group attacked the Leaf and Rock squads at the meeting point…they said our Captain Aburame Shihori took down two of Bi’s men and ordered her squad’s retreat.” He paused to inhale and exhale, “We also confirmed Oku Sekieima made it back to Iwa with serious injuries, but most of the Rock team was also killed in that skirmish. What a fucking mess.”
“I did notice Kiba saying a prayer of thanks yesterday. I had no idea his sister was on that detail.” Kakashi admitted.

“Guess he doesn’t want to bellow it out for the world to hear, or he’ll jinx his family’s luck.” The man had burned his cigarette down to its filter, putting it out in a stone tray, “To be honest, I don’t know how I feel about Tsunade sending out four units to track Huo and Bi’s group. We just got the report on the Tide Village…so rapid response teams aren’t readily available.”

“We’re spread thin.” Kakashi acknowledged.

“She already has stealth trackers checking the Rice Country for any word on Sasuke’s whereabouts. That team had to regroup after triggering a series of Orochimaru’s traps, plus that decoy base fiasco…” Asuma stared out on the city below, “Now a small fleet of medical teams will have to go to Tide. You see why this is a problem, don’t you?”

“Why it’s a problem?” Kakashi was amused, “I should circle all of the above.”

“It means we’ll be pulling double time on our assignments, at the very least.” His friend warned him, “It’ll suck. That’s why the Hokage has been campaigning for young bloods to take Jounin Trials, to pick up some of the slack. In case you didn’t hear, Raidō and I will be testing Sato next week.”

Kakashi only gave his friend a knowing, sidelong smile.

“Eh…so you’re confident in him?” Asuma chuckled.

“He’s ready.”

“Yeah, sure.” Asuma turned back toward the door, “I don’t know if I am.”

Since neither Matsuri nor Shigenori had protested, Temari cut their break short before sunrise and ordered the team to continue. By the time it was proper morning with a blue sky overhead, she had her two companions crossing the Great Naruto Bridge with no complaints of fatigue. The signs of damage and calamity were immediate. As they approached Shigakure’s main hub at the shinobi barracks, Matsuri held her breath and observed an entire road of brick buildings had been flattened, spread out like toy blocks.

Areas that had been washed out and crushed had only just been dried out and cleared. Temari found it heartening that the battered city was crowded, full of citizens actively assessing the scope of loss and clean-up. She and her teammates passed the gate of the barracks, meandering through a dense pack of shinobi responders. Even without his traditional face paint on, Temari was able to pick out her brother’s face among the throng. In seconds, she had slipped through the bustling bodies to reach Kankuro, Matsuri and Shigenori tailing behind her.

“Uh— don’t mind my appearance.” Kankuro said as he rose from a canvas folded stool, still bandaged with an arm in a sling, “Hey Temari…I’m glad you’re here.”

“If only I’d been around when it happened…” Temari was careful not to squeeze him while hugging.

“Trust me, none of you wanted to be down here for that.” Kankuro acknowledged Matsuri with a nod, and was surprised to see Shigenori, “Oh, Shigenori, Gaara’s not giving you a streak of garbage missions is he?”

“Not that I’ve noticed.” The man seemed good-humored about it, “He hasn’t asked me to do much Temari kept her mouth shut, aware of how Gaara was hoping that he could rely on the veteran Shakuton-user when the possible treason case with the Advisory Council blew wide open.

At Kankuro’s feet was a pile of disassembled carbon fiber parts, which Matsuri vaguely recognized, “Kankuro-sama…those aren’t your-?”

“Yeah. All of my puppets were destroyed.” He confirmed, “Further proof you guys didn’t want to be here when the shit hit the fan. It was bad.” Matsuri was cringing at the scrap heap.

“The city looks…” Temari trailed off, “How about the people? Should we be reporting somewhere?”

“Right now, there are four active emergency infirmaries running. All of them also need help identifying the dead, mostly shinobi. A lot of victims were admitted after the big wave…” He further explained, “The Tide Village was spared from that attack thanks to one of Utakata’s failsafe jutsu… but it also struck a nearby community on the mainland. There were a lot of unintended civilian injuries because of it.” Kankuro crossed the busy lobby with the Sand team and asked for directions from Kiriyama Saizō (also bandaged), as he was the only remaining co-chair for Shiogakure’s Jounin Council.

“Do us a favor and help excavate some of the south side buildings— there might still be people trapped there.” Saizō recommended, “Later, donate some of your blood. Most everyone here already has.”

With that, the Sand group proceeded past the more-or-less untouched Star Notojiso Hotel Resort on the south end of the village, and assisted a large group of ninja and townspeople among the rubble of collapsed buildings. The day wore thinly, stomachs empty and complaining, food and supply lines overwhelmed; but Matsuri got a sense of stubborn optimism from those gathered. She too felt a boost when buckled scaffolding over a pit was shoved aside, revealing two trapped Academy students who were shaken, scratched, and in need of food and water. She guided them to the barracks for care, holding the hands of both students as they trudged up the road.

“Matsuri!”

Her heart leaped when she heard someone call her name. After handing the children off to a kind faced Chunin attendant at the gate, she spun around to see Inari sprinting towards her. They crashed together in a weepy hug.

“Oh my god— this has been—” The boy was sniffling, “Thank you for coming here, I wasn’t sure if your Sensei would tell you to stay away-!”

“No, of course he wouldn’t!” Matsuri wrapped her arms around Inari’s shoulders, letting him gasp and cry for a short while.

“…eh-hem. Sorry.” He rubbed his dripping nose on his sleeve, “Thanks. We’ve been working to get everything under control since the Akatsuki attacked. I’m so damn tired…and a report came back from one of our tracking team members.” Inari’s eyes were still watering, “Saying that squad is gone.”

“Gone?” She felt electric fear course through her.

“We think other members of the organization…attacked our follow-up groups. They might’ve had a chance to stop Pein’s escape otherwise…” Inari shook his head, “But they took Utakata, even though we fought our hardest. All of the Leaf ninja and Menma are gone.”

Matsuri gave him a light shake, “Are you sure? About Menma?”

“I dunno! I’ve looked for three days straight. They said he was last seen fighting on the bay.” Inari wilted, “Matsuri…he told me that he loves you and he didn’t expect to…” He cleared his throat, “I think he knew he couldn’t win. He tried to help. He had to.”

“Then…we’ll keep looking.” She swiped a tear at the corner of her eye, “If we’ve got to…identify him at the infirmary…where do we go to ask?”

Inari made a small sound of despair in his throat, but led the way to a wide, tented area of the barracks. Matsuri followed him and reflected, while shaking head to foot, that she had considered this type of an outcome on the way over from the Sand Village. That someone she knew and cared about could have been a casualty of the Akatsuki’s attack. Temari had pointedly not commented on the subject while they traveled the day before. All the same, Matsuri had adopted a few crucial threads of cynical wisdom from Gaara. Thus, she was able to draw sobering conclusions. Her stomach hurt terribly as she thought it over, holding out hope that maybe Menma’s body would not be one of the dozens laid beneath white tarps all over the ground.

The smell of the No-ID tent also made her want to gag, though she marched silently up the row behind her friend. Matsuri guessed that Inari had been through this area before. At a secretarial station beneath blowing fans, there were several shinobi talking to a pack of worried-looking people. Some broke off from the group with chaperones to check rows, guided by descriptions of the deceased.

While speaking to an examiner, Inari learned that unidentified victims from other emergency infirmaries had been consolidated here. Quite a number of them had been identified, claimed by friends or family, and moved to the hospital a few at a time. After Inari gave his description of Menma, the examiner appeared relieved to say, “Thankfully…we don’t have anyone that age, of that physical description here.”

“Are you sure?” Inari pressed.

The man nodded, “I’ve checked all of the victims and had my assistant verify all 24 of our unclaimed. No one blonde, teenaged, etcetera is here, I assure you…though…” He lifted a microphone piece on an old radio atop a table, calling over to another area, “Mimi? Hi, it’s Seidai at the central barracks. We’ve got a party here looking for blonde-haired, fair skinned victim, aged 15 or 16, approximately 61kg and 177cm tall.”

The radio crackled an answered, We have several deceased kids and teenagers on the mainland. Some are fair colored, young…all unidentified. Why don’t you send the identifying party over? We need help with IDs.

All color drained out of Inari’s face and he toddled out of the nearest exit flap of the tent. Matsuri asked the examiner where to go, learning they would have to cross the Great Naruto Bridge and travel a few minutes south along the coast to the tourist town Noto, the hamlet nearest to the Land of Waves. She thanked the examiner and exited the tent, discovering Inari hurling his guts out into a garbage can. Her insides twisted at the sight. ‘Keep it together. Keep it together.’ She patted Inari’s back as he stood upright and spat to clear his mouth, apologizing again.

“It’s alright, Inari. I think you need a break.” Matsuri suggested as they carried on through the camp, “You’ve been working for over three days now.”
The boy stopped at the closest bench to sit down, a film still visible in his eyes. “I was the last person with him, Matsuri. If I’d known the right thing to say, he wouldn’t have gone to fight.” Inari’s imagination had veered toward the hypothetical.

“He never liked quitting.” Matsuri reminded him.

“Yeah…and well, it cost him.” Some resentment crept into his voice, tears slicking down his cheeks, “Why’d he leave? Idiot.” Inari got comfortable and spread out on the bench to lay down, relaxing. He asked Matsuri to come back as soon as she could.

With that, she was off— out of the barracks like a bullet and running over the bridge, recalling the directions she’d been given. Along the way, makeshift signs had also been propped up along the path to direct people to Noto. Matsuri arrived with speed, and was surprised to find not a pitched tent, but a real facility. She entered the clinic to find even more chaos, with many injured patients alive and fussing in the overcrowded space. Matsuri squeezed through and tried to find her way around.

A medic-supervisor in a white coat stopped her before she left the lobby, “Hold it! Are you injured?”

“N-No. I’m looking for someone.” She scurried up to the very tall, burly woman who’d called to her.

“For an ID? Seidai must’ve sent you over. Deceased or living?”

“I don’t know.”

“Start in the east ward here. We have all no-names, coma patients, critical injuries, and mortuary.” The woman named Mimi pointed out a whiteboard on the wall, “We have some details up there you can refer to. If you—”

A raucous erupted behind them, with several medics responding to a heart-failure patient coding on a gurney. Mimi forgot all about Matsuri to help guide the shouting gaggle to a treatment room. The kunoichi turned around and struggled to breathe, her eyes scanning over the chart on the wall. The only details of consequence, since most physical descriptions were unhelpful or incomplete, was “age 16.” Knees knocking, Matsuri ventured down a corridor with fewer occupants, glancing around as she passed rooms toward her destination. At room 33, she poked her face through a door into a darkened room. A white sheet had been cast aside, with only empty beds, unlit monitors and drawn curtains.

Right then, her chest clenched so tight that she retreated from the abandoned room, her back pressing to a white cinderblock wall, then she slid down to the floor to sit.

What a quick result.

There was nothing— no one, where someone was supposed to be. To the left, a few more paces down the hallway, were double doors with signs posted to direct identifiers toward bodies. ‘I can’t take it…I just need to…’ If she could have only a moment of peace to not have to think about how Menma had died and been carted away with other unknowns, she would’ve traded years off her own life for that. Matsuri bowed her head onto her folded knees, trembling tearlessly. The rattle inside of her was so terrible that there was hardly any evidence of anguish on her face. Shock gripped her for a full minute.

This was the fate that so commonly befell ninja. It was a well-known fact. Her parents had been no exception. So too would her boyfriend, and mentors, and good friends perish, if they kept to the path of a shinobi. Bogged down by morbid thoughts and drained of her energy, Matsuri raised her head and took a breath. She tried to place a strange sound: pipes and water. If she had not imagined it, a toilet had flushed.

Bounding to her feet, Matsuri launched herself into the dark room and hooked around the corner to an unassuming, attached lavatory where the door opened...and both the startled occupant and she screamed when they came face-to-face. The person trying to hobble out of the bathroom slipped and fell backwards. Matsuri staggered but maintained quick thought processes, identifying that, yes, it was Menma. Though crumpled on the floor and wrapped up like a mummy, she felt in her bones who she'd scared the hell out of.

It looked as though it would take him an age to slowly and painfully stand up again. He was obviously injured. Menma stared up at her in the faint light with his good eye, watching as Matsuri crouched down to help him.

“Menma, I’m sorry!” Nervous laughter was woven in her words, “I was looking— I thought you were dead.”

He couldn’t talk he was so flustered, though his face betrayed a feeling of relief that superseded the aches keeping him floor-bound.

“Can you stand up?”

“...I don’t think so...” He admitted, “It took all my strength...just to get in here without assistance. Nurses have been busy—” Menma took her hand and looped his arm over her shoulder to rise up with her. He was glasslike; feeble in her hands. Menma didn’t utter a word of protest when Matsuri scooped him up in her arms like a maiden to return him to bed.

After being laid out, Menma held fast to her hand. It was then she got a thorough look at him— his head bandaged and left eye covered with gauze. Through the thin, parted material of a hospital shirt, his chest and stomach were also bound up where his injuries were worst. Matsuri sat down at the edge of the cot and gently touched his face. His exhaled wearily while trying to make sure she was not a figment of his imagination. When her fingertips strayed towards the covering on his eye, Menma flinched.

“That hurts?” She supposed.

“...everything...” He had a hard time speaking.

“Is it hard to breathe, wrapped up like that?” Matsuri gathered, “Your ribs.”

Menma nodded.

The ghost of a wane smile graced her mouth, “You fought hard...”

Giving up, he shut his eyes and had a little faith that she wouldn’t disappear. Just being conscious was exhausting as he endured jolts of agony that sparked from many wounds.

She was irked by the clinic’s scatterbrained handling of patients, “They shouldn’t just leave you in here unattended! The info board outside has no information on you. I had no idea where to look. I should talk to the supervisor to get you something for the pain, and a bed pan, maybe something to eat or drink...”

He shook his head tiredly, smiling.

“Something for the pain at least. Look at you, Menma-!” Matsuri had lightened up a little, “Inari was so worried about you he threw up.”

Menma strained not to laugh because it hurt his fractured ribs.

“I’ll tell him you’re okay. Tazuna-san and Kankuro-sama will want to know too.” She warmed his hand between both of hers, adding, “Try not to worry about Utakata. There are tracking teams hunting the Akatsuki right now, and Hidden Sand is helping. We’ll find him.”

His eyes cracked open, concern stilling him, “Utakata-? He was…”

“Yeah. The village will be alright, though. Kankuro-sama said he saved everyone.”

“What about…Obito?” Menma asked.

She frowned in confusion, “Who’s that?”

“The spy. He was helping us.”

“No one mentioned that person.” Matsuri said as she began to stand, slipping her hand free, “But I can find out for you, if you want to know. Let me go find a nurse, okay?”

Reluctantly, Menma withdrew his hand and watched as she swiftly exited the recovery room.

Matsuri hustled back to the lobby and made an honest attempt to get the attention of anyone who looked official, or of some medical persuasion. Her chirps for assistance and taps on shoulders were brushed off. ‘No wonder so many people haven’t been identified or helped! They’re not listening!’ Fed up, Matsuri scaled the check-in desk, her head nearly brushing the ceiling as she stood and shouted indignantly for someone to pay attention.

“I have a patient to identify AND he needs treatment!” Her fuming did not go unnoticed. Several startled people in the clinic stopped to stare at her tantrum, “Something for pain! Update his records! Don’t you realize he fought that Akatsuki member head-to-head and lived? You should all be thanking him-!”

“Eh-hem.” A voice interrupted below her.

Matsuri glanced down at a pretty woman who had her arms folded, clearly tousled and dirtied from helping other patients. The woman motioned for Matsuri to get down from the desk, which she did.

“Okay angry kunoichi, pipe down.” The woman sniffed, “Don’t do what I did and make a scene. They sedated me with a needle when I freaked out earlier. Then I had to tell them to keep their hands off me because I’m pregnant, and well…” She sighed, “I’m Hotaru.” She shook Matsuri’s hand before the girl could bow in traditional greeting.

“Nice to meet you, Hotaru-san.”

“Just Hotaru is fine.” The woman was crossing the lobby toward the No-ID patient board, “And you are?”

“Matsuri.”

“I’ve heard of you. You’re rather popular in Shiogakure.” Hotaru’s expression was somber, although she put up a sociable front. “Let me help you…since I’m under surveillance and not allowed to go beyond Noto to help look for Utakata. What patient ID do you have?”

“Um…Shin Menma.” Matsuri pointed to the empty box on the white board’s chart.
“Menma’s here?” Hotaru was surprised, “Thank goodness.” She scribbled notes on the board and checked off the ‘guardian’ box in the column, adding Matsuri’s name. “So you said he needs something for pain? I’ll have a nurse come by with us to check him, then bring a schedule III or schedule II medication.”

“It hurts so much that he can barely talk.” The girl’s eyes were watery, “Thank you for your help.”

“It’s fine. I just have to keep my mind—” Hotaru gave her head a shake, “Here. For the people who need us…Utakata would want me to.” She ushered Matsuri along towards a drug storage room.

“Miss Hotaru, is there a radio somewhere around here that I can use?” Matsuri wondered.

“Yes, but what for?”

“I need to tell some friends that Menma is alright. They’ll want to know. And also…” She remembered Menma’s other request, “I need to ask about someone else who helped the Tide Village. Someone named Obito.”

Obito had left the Tide Village a day prior to the Sand team’s arrival. That was not to say he had made great progress traveling north on the mainland, struggling up a route that straddled the border of the Land of Rivers and the Land of Fire. Though most of his injuries had been adequately mended, chakra exhaustion was not something he could shrug off. The average senior citizen could outpace him up the winding dirt path, he estimated. He was slow and half-delirious.

‘I’m not sure how I am going to get home like this…but I couldn’t ask anyone to escort me, with Shiogakure in need of so much aid.’ He considered, ‘And heaven help me if any Akatsuki members are out here…I can barely swat a fly right now, never mind fight...’

As evening drew near, while trudging through the foothill forests, he felt his energy leave him for good. It was impossible to take another step forward. Obito stooped down to the ground and curled up on his side on a bed of pine needles, “Just a short rest.” He had to hold still and hope some strength returned to him. Even searching for food and water was out of the question. He shut his eyes and sleep immediately took him.

Sometime in the middle of the next day, he woke with a start. He was still groggy and sore. Obito blinked, noticing a box turtle crawling by on the forest floor. With his head pressed to the ground so, he had an impeccable close-up view of the wild creature. He watched it journey by and resolved that even if he was as slow as that animal, doggone it, he would get home eventually. His family must have been worried sick, ‘I’ve never spent this much time away from Rin and Yuma. What are they thinking? Are they scared or angry?’

Since he lacked the strength to move, and finding water would become a priority in the near future, Obito shut his eyes again. He would steal a bit more sleep and expect that no one hostile would come across him in the random expanse of wilderness. He had to take the chance. If he’d been more patient, he would still be recovering on a cot in Shiogakure’s main infirmary. That would’ve been the practical way to rest before trekking home. But instead he’d faked resilience, bade his new comrades farewell, and rushed out before realizing what an idiotic task he had undertaken.

Night in the valley was cloudless, the sky clear and starry. Obito woke again as something tickled his face. At first, his senses urged him to react to a threat— whatever had found him was big…but he recognized the slobbery licks were that of a dog’s greeting. His dog, rather. Obito squawked in delighted shock, then wrapped his arms around the huge hound’s neck, “…whoa! Sesshu! …you found me?”
“It’s what I do.” The ninken laid down beside him, content in the man’s hold.

“Thank you, thank you.” He breathed a sigh of relief. “I’m so tired. I thought I could make the trip back to Shincha…but I sort of collapsed.”

“I can see that.” Sesshu was sniffing him curiously, putting together puzzle pieces of scent, “A battle?”

“Yeah.” Obito petted the great oaf’s head and rubbed his ears, “If you don’t mind waiting until morning…I think I can get back on my feet.”

“There’s no need to wait.” The dog said off-handedly, peering out into the dark of the woods as if waiting for something.

Obito didn’t get it. He stared dumbly at the dog who offered no explanation, but the soft crunch of footsteps in the scrub and pine litter alerted him to another presence. In moments, a second visitor had arrived—human this time. With that realization crashing over him, Obito found the strength to sit up and lean into the tight embrace of Rin as she kneeled down. An errant sob escaped him.

For her part, she was far less emotionally raw and physically worn. She made soft sounds while patting the back of his head, her hands covertly searching him for injuries, “Obito…”

“What’re…you-?” He hiccupped, “Doing here-?”

“I came to find you. I got your message, and I had a feeling you would need help.” Rin told him matter-of-factly, continuing to check him, “—my god. You’ve got almost no chakra. What have you been doing?”

“I…” Obito changed the subject, “If you’re here with me, who’s looking after Yuma?”

“I left him with Yoshige and Nozomi back in town. I told them something was wrong and I had to go out for a few days, although Yuma just thinks I’m away on a house call.” Rin filled him in, “Come on, sit up a bit more. Your wrist is broken.”

“It is?” He hardly felt it.

“Yes. It’s hard to tell out here in the dark. Two kilometers north of here there’s a hot spring inn. Let’s go there and I’ll see what I can do with you.” The woman heaved him to his unhappy feet, then draped him over her giant dog, “Sesshu, will you carry him for now? I’ll take over later.”

“I can—” Obito’s protest was cut off.

“Shush. You’re injured. I need you to stay awake to tell me what happened.” Rin braced her hands on his shoulder to steady him, and her ninken strode forward with his cargo aboard.

He spun the tale as best he could, filling in gaps in the story when Rin addressed them, “So the jinchuriki was formerly of the Mist Village, but settled in the Tide Village. Is that right?”

“Yeah, that’s what I meant to say.”

“Got it. It makes sense now. Continue.” They carried on.

He spoke of the Tide ninja and their varied backgrounds. The beautiful seaside city. The Great Naruto Bridge. The Sand ninja who were close allies of the new hidden village, and had risked so much to defend it. He also discussed Pein and his incarnations, although it was very uncomfortable to revisit those memories. Luckily, they arrived at the inn and he took a break from rendering the Akatsuki’s assault. Rin helped him stand and hobble through the entrance of the inn. The door chime woke a middle-aged attendant dozing behind the check-in desk. He was astonished to see two strangers appear in the middle of the night.

“Could we please…” Rin secured her arm around her husband’s waist to support him, asking the innkeeper, “Have a room for tonight? We’re worn out.”

“Is that dog with you?” He pointed to the giant, golden beast behind Rin, “No pets.”

“I’m not a pet.” Sesshu corrected him.

The man stared.

“Sesshu is not a pet.” Rin willed herself to be pleasant, because she believed the honey, not vinegar adage, “Yes, he’ll stay with us too. He’s worked hard and I don’t want him sleeping outside. I promise he won’t make a mess.”

“Uh…” The innkeeper nodded slowly, “Alright. One futon? We’re almost completely vacant so you’ve got prime pickin’s.”

She nodded, “That’ll do. How much?”

“400 Ryo. Another 100 Ryo for breakfast in the morning. I’ll throw in a soak in the onsen for free, if you want.” He tried to be generous after realizing he was most likely speaking to shinobi.

Rin patted down the pocket of her husband’s unusual (she just realized) pants, “Got any money on you?”

“I spent it all.” He admitted quietly.

“On what?”

“This outfit.”

“Are you kidding me?” Rin hissed.

Obito just chuckled and tried not to fall over.

Since she had nowhere to put him, Rin set Obito down on the floor for a moment and rifled through her satchel for money notes. The innkeeper watched, mystified, as she presented him with payment, accepted a room key, and then schlepped who he supposed was her spouse down the corridor. The dog followed behind them.

Somehow, she maneuvered through the door, flipped the lights on, and settled in. Rin lowered Obito into a cushy armchair and then drew the curtains of the room, to block out the blackness of night beyond the window. She crossed back to him and held out her hand, “Show me your arm again. Let’s get you fixed.”

For twenty minutes, she worked without a word, mending bones, strains, and cuts. Obito fell asleep for some of it, and woke again when Rin tried to remove the orange goggles still slung around his neck. He helped her lift them free, amused when she muttered, “Isn’t this a blast from the past? Goggles...”
“I thought that too.”

“Of course you did. This is a nice sweatshirt, though. It’s a shame it got ripped up…” Rin began tugging the rest of his clothing off, “Do you have any energy to take a bath? You stink.”

“No, but I should try to wash up anyway.”

“Where are your other clothes? The dark ones?”

“In my travel bag… which is lost somewhere in Shiogakure.”

Rin grumbled. Across the room, Sesshu’s ears flicked as he dreamed, curled up in a ball to sleep.

Obito apologized to her, “Sorry. Nothing important was in there, if that helps.”

He limped towards the attached washroom with her help, not commenting as he stripped down and watched her do the same. When Obito tried to sit down on a bathing stool, he nearly missed it. Rin caught him during his descent to course-correct him into a safe seated position. She sat on her knees near the spigot and turned the showerhead on, glancing her husband over, “Your arm and leg look different…”

“I needed to get them repaired after fighting.”

“Here.” She made him hold the showerhead to hose himself down with warm water, getting behind him with soap, “So you said you fought many of Pein’s incarnations?”

“I did. With help.”

“And…he saw your face.”

“…yeah.”

“You don’t think he recognized you as Tobi, do you?” Rin asked the critical question, “What if it’s not safe for you to go back to Akatsuki meetings?”

“I don’t think he knows I am Tobi. I had my mask put away in a Tool Scroll, and he’s never seen my jutsu before…but he knows I’m a problem. Pein noticed my Sharingan.” Obito admitted, “And he tried very hard to kill me.”

She was silent as she listened, going over his back with a sudsy cloth.

“He was angry. I used a jutsu that…” Obito trailed off, wanting to wait before relaying his theory about Kakashi, “I nearly defeated the incarnation he uses most often. Then he trapped me under a crushed building. It was like… that day, all over again…”

Rin stilled in her scrubbing, immediately aware of what he was referring to.

“I was so sure I would die. Must’ve sounded… so undignified screaming for help like I did…” He balanced the hose over his leg to soap up his hands and wash his face, “I kept thinking about… never doing enough for you and Yuma… everyone…”

“Well, you’re alive.” Rin pointed out archly, resuming the clean-up process, “God may have heard my wishes when I ran all the way down here.”

“If that’s so, then I was made to save myself. I can… do something kind of weird now.” Obito told her.
“Something weird?” She was scrubbing herself while sharing the warm water.

“I can’t show you yet. It takes a lot of chakra.” He explained, slowly rising to stand, “But I’ll definitely show you. It saved my life.”

Rin waved it off and concluded rinsing herself down, then they toweled dry. Neither bothered with getting redressed. They made a bee-line for the room’s futon, slipping beneath the covers, and did not so much as utter goodnight before they fell asleep.

Sesshu woke them late the next morning, as they would have slept through the breakfast they paid for. Equally groggy, the couple sat down in complimentary robes to eat the spread on the table of a tea room. When the innkeeper greeted them sunnily to ask how they were enjoying their stay, Rin and Obito looked at him morosely from between slitted eyes. The poor innkeeper backed out of the room. It was quiet for a while.

“Maybe…” Rin said between spoonfuls of soup, “You should quit.”

“Being a spy?” Obito wanted to verify context.

“Yeah. I mean, this is all just…it’s crazy. It happened so suddenly. You had no time to rally for adequate help or contact Jiraiya— or me. If you can’t quit, because this has become a major threat to state security, well, it makes sense to reorganize. It’d be different if—” She took a fortifying breath and suggested, “It’d be different if we had the Leaf Village backing us up. You could call the cavalry when something like this happens. Respond effectively.”

Obito raised his eyebrows at her. Whenever discussion of the Leaf Village was on the table, Rin was never the one to bring it up. She hardly ever entertained the idea.

“You have a point.” He said before sipping his tea.

“But I’d rather if you quit.” She was honest.

“I know. I think I would too…but I don’t know if putting our selfish wants ahead of the lives of everyone the Akatsuki threatens is possible. Jiraiya-sama must have thought about this at some point as well…whether or not to back down…” Obito sighed, “If they dismantle everything in the world that we love and value, just because they’ve amassed unbeatable military might…then there’s no point in us living our solitary lives in Shincha. It’d go to shit.”

“That’s not the world he deserves.” Rin acknowledged Yuma’s future.

“It’s not what anyone deserves. We’ve got to take a bit of responsibility. I bet that’s what Minato-sensei would say.” He waggled a bite of baked fish in his chopsticks, “We might pay with our lives, but fighting the organization means others will have the chance too. To stop the Akatsuki.”

“The thing that worries me most…” She professed softly, “Is if this struggle drags on…if someday… Yuma would have to—”

“He won’t.” Obito’s voice was sharp, “This isn’t his war. It’s ours. We’ll finish it. Us. The Leaf Village. All of the great villages— we’re not going to leave it to our kids.”

Rin nodded, fully aligned with his declaration.

“So this conversation gives me the impression you’re more open-minded about Hidden Leaf now?” He ventured carefully.
“I don’t want to dive in without any warning, I mean, everyone still believes you’re dead.” Rin reminded him, “Your clan might not take it the way we want them to…your sisters…”

“Eh, they’ll probably just keep on ignoring me like they always did.”

“The Hokage would need some reassurance from Jiraiya-sama, about the good work you’ve done. Tsunade-sama will just see us as slackers, most likely.” Rin speculated. “And Kakashi…”

“He’ll be the least of our problems.” Obito was optimistic about that reunion, “It’s Yuma who’ll have to bear with the biggest changes.”

“Right.” Rin cupped her forehead in her palm, “We’ve taught him quite a lot, so he’ll need advanced placement in the Academy. Now that’s some paperwork to look forward to. He’ll need to learn about getting around Konoha and making friends…and I’d like for him to finish out this semester of school in Shincha, so it’s less jarring for him.”

“It might be hard to time this switch to the ebb and flow of our son’s schoolyear, Rin.”

“Can we just try?” She gruffed, “In the meantime, I’ll write to Tsume. I think it’ll be easier settling in with my family for the transition. We can’t really sell our house in Shincha—no one would buy it. Once we get to Konoha, we can start working…save money and look for a new home. And if you try to reach out to the Uchiha clan, they might find your reappearance suspicious. At best.”

“Yeah, I’m not expecting open arms. Your family is a safer bet.”

“Okay. But then, after all of that…” Rin brightened, “We’ll just go with the flow.”

“It might be more of a raging current than a flow, just sayin’.”

Ah, did her husband have a way with words… They finished eating, presented leftovers to Sesshu, got dressed, and checked out of the hotel. Obito could only travel at slightly more than a snail’s pace, and so it was decided Sesshu would carry him as far as possible. That arrangement lasted until they reached the northeastern forests bordering on territory near Kusagakure. The great dog wearily came to a stop in a mushroom ring, then dumped Obito to the ground. The two groaned in unison.

“Looks like we should take a rest…” Rin glanced around as the sun set, “We have another day of travel into the Land of Earth. You two pick some of those mushrooms, and I’ll find something else to eat.”

Sesshu was no good for picking much of anything, and so he laid there, forcing Obito to work around him. When Rin returned with river trout to cook over a fire, she found her husband asleep again, using their dog for a pillow. She examined the small pile of edible mushrooms, set up a campfire, and roasted their spoils. Her companions woke briefly to eat, but were snoozing shortly after their meal. For practicality’s sake, Rin stayed awake to keep watch during the night.

The journey north resumed in the morning, with Obito lasting for a greater portion of the route through a mountain range before relying on Sesshu. The dog hauled him dutifully through one of the secluded valleys in the Land of Earth, and then up the familiar, wooded slopes toward Shincha. Cresting the peak and passing the town by to reach their forest home, Rin made due and half-dragged Obito up the footpath. She asked her ninken, “Sesshu, go into town and pick up Yuma from Yoshige and Nozomi’s house. Make sure he doesn’t leave his school bag behind. I want to make sure he’s been doing homework…”

“I’m so tired, Rin…” The dog whimpered.
“I know, so take your time if you want. Just make sure you bring my kid home.” She teased, “I’ll see you later?”

Sesshu turned around to trudge down the hill towards the town proper. Obito gave their loyal dog a wave of farewell, taking weak steps as Rin draped his arm over her shoulders. As the view of their quaint house grew ever closer, Obito’s tittered punch-drunk reflections, “This is like one of those nights we’d go out drinking, then slog home up the mountain…”

“Except that neither of us are drunk, and in fact you nearly died.” She mused.

“Yeah.”

“You’re a little bit stronger today.”

He even made it up the front steps onto the porch, nodding as Rin unlocked the door, “’Lil bit.”

“Maybe when you’re recovered, you’ll show me that jutsu you talked about?” She wondered, “If it saved your life, I was thinking maybe it could help others?”

“I guess it could.” He really didn’t know enough about it. They did an awkward dance in the genkan to remove their shoes.

The pair toddled through the house, down the hall, and into the bedroom, where Rin rolled him onto a mattress and slid a blanket up. In seconds, Obito was out like a light. She stood back and collected herself. There. She’d done it. She had retrieved her wayward husband and brought him home.

It had been a close call. Rin left the room to wander numbly through the house lit with high-noon light filtering through windows. In the living room, she sank down onto the sofa and pondered the wall in silence, tears slowly slipping down her cheeks.

When she had set out on this rescue operation, after receiving Obito’s message from Shiogakure, she was only half sure that she would succeed. Part of her had assumed the worst, like always. Each time he set out to do business with the Akatsuki, or sometimes report to Orochimaru, a lingering fear in Rin’s gut intensified. Every day that passed while Obito was gone felt like the stroke of a hand-saw, scraping back and forth over her nerves. For him to have been absent for nearly a month had been hell.

‘I won’t always be able…to save him.’ She thought as she leaned back in her seat, inhaling deeply, ’Next time, I’ll have no idea where he is. Or what happened. If I don’t know anything, then there’s no way to help him.’ Rin squeezed her eyes shut, ‘He talked about…super powerful ninja. Proxies. Destruction. The Rinnegan. Whatever that is…I wish he’d just give all of this up.’

Based on their conversation at the inn, she doubted that was an option. Too much was at stake. Knowing that his line of work would continue, and that help from Hidden Leaf was critical, Rin was still digesting the inevitable change that would come. They would leave this comfortable life and the friends they’d made behind, ‘I have no idea what’s waiting in Leaf. For all I know, my family’s disowned me. Everyone might react badly…and what if Yuma struggles?’

And yet it had to be done. So she would see it done, no matter the pains it caused. She pushed up from the couch and wiped her slick cheeks. When she had left to find Obito, she had thrown out all perishable items in her pantry. The search had lasted a few days, as she expected. Restocking food was a necessity for a functioning household. She changed clothes, splashed her face with cold water at the sink, slung a canvas tote on her shoulder, and then set out. Waxwings in the yard’s berry bushes sang and squabbled. They’d fly further south to the Land of Fire when winter came, Rin thought. Like her family would.

She hiked through the woods and down the slope toward the garden, glad that a few plants were still yielding vegetables. Rin was swift up two rows, plucking okra, daikon, and peppers. When she passed by the tomato plant she stopped to give it a second-glance. A linen, drawstring bag that would fit in the palm of her hand was snug against the base of the plant. ‘Did Yuma put this here?’ Rin bent down to scoop it up, peeking inside the purse. Within she found 50 Ryo. She tugged it shut and dropped it in her tote with the vegetables she had collected.

On her way out of the garden, it occurred to Rin, ‘Yuma doesn’t handle money…’ She looked back at the plant, noting all of the tomatoes had been picked. Her eyes widened, ‘Someone…took them?’ And paid for them…while she had been gone. Her stomach flipped in fright, ‘I know that Char’s told me villagers are too scared to come up here, in case shinobi from Iwagakure are patrolling…’ So she concluded it must have been someone else, as she bounded up the forest hill.

The idea tickled the back of her mind. She remembered the visitor Obito had spoken to her about.

Nothing in the yard or around the house seemed or smelled out of place. Rin hopped up the porch, dumped her tote of vegetables on a table beside the genkan, and reached up to a tall shelf for a bag of hunting gear, ‘I want to stay close in case Obito needs me. I can’t go into town to buy meat.’ Thus, she planned to catch a meal instead. Since she had settled in Shincha long ago, she’d become a hunting wiz. Rin hiked up a northern trail, keeping her ears pricked for bird calls or a possible tomato-stealing intruder. When curking noises in the underbrush caught her attention, she leapt into the branches of a tree and surveyed the ground.

A gaggle of grouses toddled by, turning up fallen leaves for insects and seeds. Rin waited without a sound, deciding on the fattest-looking birds before pitching a weighted net down. Though she captured one of her chosen targets, she also netted a smaller specimen. The rest scattered in a splay of feathers and escaped. She worked quickly—pulling in her catch, crouching down to snap their necks with a soft-spoken prayer of thanks. Rin unwound her net to replace it in a satchel, making haste back towards the house.

In the rear yard, she peaked into the bedroom window. ‘Yup. He’s still asleep.’ Obito hadn’t moved an inch. Rin crossed over to a waste barrel by the shed to begin de-feathering the birds. She tested their fragile beaks, confirming that they were juveniles, ‘Young grouse are the juiciest…’ It took time to pluck them bare. She sat on an old, wooden bench while carving off the limbs and heads with a knife, removing innards. The viscera went to her compost pile, the rest was for cooking.

No sooner had she seasoned the meat and put it into an oven for roasting, Rin heard the front door slam open, followed by quick stomps and shouting. When she rushed to meet Yuma in the sitting room, it was mainly to hush him up when they collided in a hug.

“Ma—!”

“Not so loud, Yuma, please. Your Dad is asleep—”

“DAD’S HOME-?”

Rin sealed his lips with the pad of her thumb, frowning, “You’re being loud. Shush.”

Awareness colored the boy’s expression as he looked up at his mother, instantly tamer as he kept his thin arms lassoed around her middle. With a library-approved volume, Yuma inquired, “Where did you go?”
She plopped down onto an ottoman and Yuma scooched to sit beside her. “I wasn’t on a house call…” Rin informed him with a sigh, “I went to find your Dad. He was in trouble.”

Since that only skimmed the surface of why his mother had been gone for three days, Yuma listened without comment, expecting that she would tell him more.

“He was fighting an organization of dangerous shinobi…hoping he could protect a small village from them. He succeeded for the most part, but he was injured.” Rin could not help a slight back-and-forth rock as Yuma kept hugging her, “I knew where he was, so I went to find him. He wasn’t able to get home on his own.”

“…everything’s fine now?” The boy wondered.

“Yes.” She kissed the top of his head.

He nestled into the hug and relaxed. Rin relished the contact for a while, not saying anything.

“Good thing you found him, Mama.” He gestured for a high-five to commend her achievement, which she accepted with parental bemusement. Yuma stood up and retrieved his tossed school bag from the floor, “Did my homework…” He crooned proudly.

“All of it?”

“I even read that dumb book.” Yuma confirmed, “It would’ve been better if I read it with Dad.”

Rin ventured to the kitchen, “He can read the next assigned book with you. Where’s Sesshu?”

“Outside. Said he had to go.” He made a face that indicated potty-business, “I’ll let him in soon.”

And so the afternoon faded, Sesshu came inside and slept on his favorite rug, while Yuma respectfully kept his distance as his father convalesced in the bedroom. He was entrusted with cutting up some vegetables at the table, recounting his stay with Yoshige and Nozomi, school, and how he’d spent his free time.

“Yeah, Yoshige-san showed me how to trim the hedges. We made a good team.” Yuma gathered chopped peppers into a pile, “Then after that there was nothing left to do around their house, so I went to Char-san’s shop to make those truffle candies, you know— the fancy stuff in the case? He let me eat some of the messed up ones. And then…” He smiled gleefully, “I made a friend.”

Rin stilled at the stove, hopeful to hear such news, “You did?”

“Yeah!”

“Is Fumitake spending time with you?” She nearly added the word finally, because that little scamp from the Hirano family was an indifferent butthead towards her son. Sometimes miracles happened, though.

“Nah. His name is Kirin. He was sitting under those umbrella-picnic tables outside. I finished my snack out there and he talked to me.” Yuma explained.

“Oh. Did he and his family just move here? How old is he?”

“I dunno…he was alone and didn’t say anything about moving.” Yuma snuck a pepper piece to chew, “He’s, like, not as old as Tonushi…but kinda close.”

Rin looked over her shoulder, “Tonushi is a grown up now.”
He kept chewing, unconcerned.

“Then, you mean a teenager?”

“I think so.”

“It’s not always good when teenagers talk to younger kids. Sometimes they’re up to trouble.” Rin advised.

There was something about the expression on her son’s face that proved he understood. Young as he was, Yuma was starting to grasp the nuances of social interaction— that it was not always benevolent.

“He stole.” Yuma announced flatly.

“He stole?”

“He told me he did, but then I said: That garden belongs to my family, and we work hard for it! So he said sorry and that he’d pay for the tomatoes.”

“Ahh.” She nodded and dribbled oil into a stovetop pan, feeling fire in her chest.

“I told him thanks, and that no one was home, so the tomatoes would’ve gone rotten after a few days anyway. He should eat them! Kirin had some in his bag and we shared one. It tasted weird after having candy…” Yuma’s story prattled on, “He wanted to know if I knew jutsu, and why you weren’t around, Mama.”

“How much did you tell him?” Rin kept her cool as she slid diced vegetables into the pan off of a cutting board.

“I know you wouldn’t…want me to tell.” He wiggled in his chair, half-guilty, “I said I couldn’t show him jutsu or anything. And you go out to help patients, so I said that…”

Rin turned around and braced her hands on the table, meeting eyes with the boy, “Is Kirin a ninja?”

“…yeah.”

“Did he tell you where he’s from?”

“No.”

“Yuma.” An edge of impatience crept into her tone, “We’ve told you it’s dangerous to talk to people you don’t know, especially shinobi. If you know better, why would you disobey me?”

“Because he didn’t say much, and he was nice to me! All the kids here don’t let me play…or they get bored of me.”

“None of those are good reasons.” Rin said with an icy look.

“He wasn’t going to do anything, Ma—”

She pounded a fist on the table, “What do you know about the intentions of real ninja? You’re a kid! The fact that you didn’t get hurt or stolen is not something we take for granted— you’re smart enough to know—”

Tears welled in his eyes, “I know.”
“You have to listen to me!”

“I…do.” Yuma squeaked.

“You didn’t this time.” Rin paced a little, haphazardly stirring the contents in the pan, “I ought to punish you for a week! You’ll till the whole garden, deliver medicine, read a stack of books and then I’m telling your Dad.”

The child crumpled over the table, burying his face in his folded arms to cry. Rin did not crack her hard-line display to comfort him. If only to instill the gravity of the situation in her son, she’d have to let him suffer a bit. At least among her family, reprimands and consequences were indispensable when it came to parenting. Now that she and Obito had discussed saving the world while juggling child-rearing duties, she was in no mood to sugarcoat anything.

Sesshu plodded out from the main room in an automatic good-dog response, ready to lay his head on Yuma’s knee and solicit pets. Rin made a clipped noise and sent her hound away.

“Mama…” Yuma sat up and wiped his face, “I’m sorry.”

“I know you are.”

“Kirin told me we’ve got to be careful too. So I know you…mean it. Pay attention and be careful.” He muttered.

Rin frowned, “He told you to be careful?”

“Yeah. ‘Cuz the bad ninja from the music place come snooping sometimes. He makes them go away.”

“Music?” She had to interpret the message, “Are those Sound ninja?”

“They look for Dad.” Yuma reached to pluck a tissue from a box.

“Oh.”

He was blowing his nose and calming down.

“So…Kirin stops them?”

“He said he has jobs and travels, but he makes sure they don’t get close to the mountain. He’s got…” Yuma motioned with his hands around his head, “Genjutsu.”

She gave the contents of the pan a chef-like toss, then shut the heat off shortly after. Rin prepared the rice cooker in silence, feeling her child’s eyes glued to her back as she worked. With that done, she crossed over to him and kneeled down, resting her hands on his shoulders, “Thank you for telling me, Yuma. You’re still in trouble.”

He nodded.

“Can I talk to Kirin?” Rin asked, “Will he come back?”

“Uh…” Yuma considered the possibility and came up with, “Probably! I said the picnic tables are a good spot.”

“They are.”
“He stays away when Sesshu’s around.”

She rose up to set the table, “That would explain a lot.”

Yuma assisted her with the task before being sent to the utility room to stuff his dirty laundry in the washing machine. As a reward, Rin let him peek into the bedroom to check on his father, on the condition he did not wake Obito up. Yuma managed that too.

They ate dinner without Obito, since Rin suspected he’d prefer to eat in the morning. After cleaning up, Rin found she had a bit of strength to play in the yard. She snuck some tracking lessons and self-defense routines in, hoping they would stick in Yuma’s brain. By the time night fell, household bath time was complete, Sesshu was fed, and Yuma went to sleep without a fuss.

In the dark, Rin locked the house up, ‘This feels sort of pointless now. I know that someone is still watching us. He could get in if he wanted…’ It took her bottled anxieties and shook them, set to blow from carbonated pressure, ‘Why? Why is someone interfering with Sound ninja? Orochimaru might want to know what’s going on here, he’s not that dense…but who is Kirin?’

She drew the shades of every window. Sitting innocuously beside her potted Clivia plants was the small bag of money that Kirin had left. She twitched her nose at it, then departed for her bedroom. ‘I’ll have Sesshu memorize the scent on that purse. No one is going to play games with me…’

Smells of the wilds and travel still lingered on Obito, who had not changed out of the tattered clothes he wore. Rin caught a whiff of it when she stepped into the pitch dark room. She bumbled around and undressed, trying not to make too much noise, and then leaned on the edge of the bed to peer down at her husband. Even as she tugged his touristy sweatshirt off, clumsily slipping his arms free, undershirt and pants following; Obito’s head lolled as she removed the offensive clothing…his slumber undisturbed. ‘That…is impressive.’ She balled up the garments and tossed them in a hamper. Exhausted, Rin slipped beneath the blanket and mashed her face into her pillow.

On the days when she thought merely being a parent was a lot to handle, Rin would wonder how she managed the other half of her life—the toils of shinobi affairs. Topping it off with medical responsibilities in Shincha and neighboring towns did not simplify things either. Her brain raced with intersecting thoughts, even as her eyes shut and breathing slowed. Muscles in her back and arms hesitated to relax. Rin was poised to spring up and fight at a moment’s notice, more alert than she could afford to be.

Then, the sunshine of late morning was the next thing she was aware of. Though the start of her sleep cycle had been rough, eventually it all went dark and quiet. She woke up and tasted how parched her mouth was. Rin cracked an eye open. She was too comfortable to abandon the conforming indent of the mattress to fetch a glass of water. She laid there and reveled in the silence of her snoozing household. ‘Before long…Yuma and Sesshu will both be up. There’s no school today…’ Grumbling, she rolled over to get an eyeful of her husband.

Obito slept on his side with his back facing her. She examined the new, crescent-shaped scar on the triceps of his left arm. He mentioned he’d been impaled there by a jagged piece of metal during a building’s collapse. ‘How did he make it out of that…? I’m still not sure.’ Rin traced her fingertips on the mended site of the injury. Her touch traveled to reacquaint herself with the skin of a man who had been away from home for too long.

There was something about him so intangibly captivating, something not quite explained, that rooted Obito to her thoughts and nerves. Rin supposed it had to do with her relationship being born from true friendship and equality, or perhaps it was his virtue, principles, and general brightness that were so attractive. Even when he got things wrong or struggled, she longed for him. It didn’t feel anything like the yearnings she knew in her youth. Here in this moment, she could ponder without interruption this rare, super-magnetic quality. She wanted to appreciate him.

Snuggling closer, Rin pressed against his back and sighed. There was no use in imagining what things would have been like if she had been more cognizant or receptive to Obito’s feelings when they’d been kids. She thought about it at times, but acknowledged it had little bearing on the present. She walked her fingers down the ladder of his ribs; felt the rise and fall of his breathing. He shifted slightly under the touches without waking. She snuck butterfly-light kisses up each knobby vertebra between his shoulders. While she had him, she had to have him and know him. Before long he’d be gone again: watching, fighting, or risking himself.

The morning sun landed a direct hit on Obito as a consequence of his proximity to the window. It warmed his skin up, to the point where he ought to be clammy or tossing the blanket off. He did not. He snored softly while Rin adventured down the incline of his side and hip. While her hand investigated the lovely, imperfect body beside her, Rin’s thoughts soared to faraway places again. ‘Since I finally conceded on moving us back to the Leaf Village…I didn’t really think about other logistics until now. Such as taking time to get new accreditations to work in Leaf’s Medical Corps…or if our marriage is legally recognized.’ She imagined Obito and Yuma tearfully trying to reason with obstinate, unsympathetic Uchiha clan members who rejected Rin’s presence as a family member. Or even better, those among her clan who objected to her unsanctioned union.

‘Yikes. I really need to write to my sister and confess some things in advance. At least then Tsune will be able to give me the heads up about what problem areas we might run into…’ Her elder sister would probably get naysayers in line for her.

“Hmm…” Obito stirred unexpectedly, “…mornin’.”

“Good morning.” Rin cheerily echoed.

“Hey, Rin?”

“Yeah?”

“Why are you giving me a handy while I can barely move?”

It was about then she noticed what she had unconsciously been doing.

“Oh. I uh…you know. I missed you. I’m being indulgent.”

His chuckle was throaty, “Indulgent.”

“Yes. There’s no need for your participation. You can just enjoy it and not concern yourself with reciprocating and all that.” She assured him, amused with herself.

He accepted the terms with a soft murmur. Lately, he had gotten used to waking up by himself in strange, dangerous places. Today was a marked departure from that routine. His eyes slid shut and he inched closer to Rin, savoring the sensation of her smooth body grinding into him from behind. What bold salutations this was, Obito thought for the single moment he could think. Though she was sweetness incarnate, time and again Rin would pounce on him at home. He couldn’t complain. She was voracious and crafty. Her fingertips played over receding skin that firmed and charged every nerve.

It was not surprising to Obito when she eventually rolled him onto his back, climbing over him to fit her lips to his while her hand worked. Touching her was always a half-satisfying act, since his right side lacked feeling. For that reason he let his left hand be twice as greedy, roaming down the rounds of her breasts and her silken stomach. Morning light colored Rin in sharp contrasts—so bright. He could see flecks of bedroom dust floating in the corona around her, her shadow stretched over him. She had a body that could be the subject of divine paintings. Oh no, no. It wasn’t enough. To just see her and surrender to her.

He had to plead in-between kisses, “Rin. Why don’t…we-?”

“Shh. Just hold still.”

“Oh, what?” Rin was contented with dominance, “Want to flip me over? Remember? Like before you left—”

“Yeah, and we can do that all day…”

“We definitely can’t.”

Obito had to grit his teeth and tip his head back, on the edge of a delicious limit, “—okay. We’re short on time. I need to be in you.”

She smiled like a thief, “How will you survive otherwise?”

“-really— how will I-?” He tried to muffle a loud groan, helpless.

All that was left as his hands roamed over her, his breath hitching and hissing, was the on-the-brink feeling. It had not been for him to decide, Obito knew, not even if he’d had all of his strength. He was very much a ‘what the wife says, goes’ kind of man. He kept his eyes shut for an existential second of pleasure, then the feeling flared when Rin slid down on him, her knees bracketing his hips. She watched him with a sovereign gaze as she won and took what she wanted. The soft wail that escaped him might’ve woken up other occupants of the house, but no matter. Being alive was all about this. The kisses she stole from him afterward dripped with euphoria. Yes, it was good to be home, but this was even better.

Rin gracefully spread out beside him to rest, pleased.

“I promise I’ll get you back when I’ve built up some stamina.” Obito was compelled to compensate her.

“I know you will. Don’t worry about it. I don’t concern myself with what I get back when I do these things for you.” She poked her pinky finger at his belly-button to tease him.

He batted at her hands but she was quicker, trapping his fingers in her own. He sighed contently.

“So…” Rin said, “If you’re feeling up to it, can you show me the jutsu you talked about? We can get dressed and go outside.”

“Uh. Actually…I think here works fine.” Obito sat up and looked around the room, gathering his wits. He was feeling a heck of a lot better.

“In here?” She was not sold on that suggestion.

“Yeah, it’s not exactly a big production or destructive sort of jutsu…it’s weird. Come on, sit up and I’ll show you.” He yanked Rin upright again, ignoring her chuff of annoyance. She arched a brow at him as he cleared his throat and stretched his arms.

Tilting his head at her, Obito suggested, “Hold up your hand.”

“Why?”

“Just for a second.” He raised his own hand in invitation, and after a moment hers rested flush against it. Rin appraised Obito’s face during the innocuous exercise, waiting for some kind of result. Then she saw it.

“The Sharingan?”

She leaned in close to stare, “It changed shape.”

“I think that’s because it sucks up way more chakra. Wait ‘til you see this…”

“See wha-?” Rin stopped speaking when her hand fell through her husband’s as if it were transparent and untouchable. Of course at that point, she only had minimal morning faculties to work with, so she panicked with a small scream, lurched forward, and fell through the rest of him in a terrified somersault. She rolled off the edge of the bed and landed on the floor, hyperventilating.

Contritely, Obito tried to reassure Rin as she scuttled around the edge of the bed, google-eyed, “Rin! It’s okay! You can touch me now, it was just for a second. It’s like I can, uh, manipulate local matter and its tangibility—I guess?” He reached out to pat her arm comfortably, “That’s how I describe it.”

Her voice was small, “Oh.”

“Told ya it was weird. It saved me from some major injuries.”

“You did say that.” She confirmed as she wobbled to her feet.

“What do you think?”

“I don’t know what I think.”

“I’m still not exactly sure what it is…or why my Sharingan changed.” Obito admitted.

Exhaling deeply to relax, Rin stood in the buff and crossed her arms, grappling with the new information, “If it…takes a lot of chakra…don’t use it too often.”

“I already figured that one out.”

“Maybe we should test it a little more later?” Rin suggested, “Just in case you overlooked any other harmful drawbacks.”

He nodded in agreement, “Good idea.”

“Alright. I am going to digest what just happened and get over it.” She announced as if she had to convince herself.

Brisk rapping sounded at the door, and the two naked parents froze as they heard it.

“Mama? Dad?”
“Wait just a moment, Yuma!” Rin wrenched open a dresser drawer, seized a pair of pants, then threw them at Obito—they collided with his face. She quickly fetched her favorite floral robe off of a closet hanger and pulled it on. Only after Obito recovered and was also adequately dressed, she opened the door for the bouncing boy on the other side.

“Good morning, Mama!” Yuma hugged Rin around her middle and she bent to kiss the top of his head in greeting.

Cross-legged on the bed, Obito reached and was ecstatic when his son raced over to him, folding into his arms. It was a fiercely happy embrace that made Rin tear up slightly when she saw it.

The child gazed up at his father, aware that he had been through much, “You okay, Dad?”

“Much better now. Thinking about you got me through it, Yuma.” Obito tucked the boy against him as they hugged, “Mom and I have some things to talk about with you, later…about some changes. They’ll be good changes, though we expect you to take them seriously.”

Yuma pursed his mouth, emulating what he thought was a serious expression, “Got it, Dad.”

“Good.”

He then turned to his mother, “Hey Mama, should I pick vegetables for-?”

“Yes, please, since you’re so full of energy—go find us things we can have with breakfast. I’ll get it started.” Rin grinned down at him, “Take Sesshu with you and come back fast.”

With a bound, Yuma was off the bed and down the hall, “Fast like Kirin!” He shouted at the giant ninken on the living room rug to wake up and get a move on.

That comment was out of left field for Obito, who turned to Rin expectantly, “Who’s Kirin?”

“That’s what I want to know.” She countered, “Yuma told me about some things we should investigate.”

“Not the lurker who watches us and sometimes steals food?”

“That one.” Rin confirmed.

“Great—now he’s talking to our kid?”

“I think…and I know this will sound ludicrous…he might be looking out for us.” The subject was broached carefully as Rin went on to add, “Don’t hold me to that, but I get that impression based on what Yuma said.”

“Huh. Let’s cook and then try figure out what the hell that guy is up to.”

When evening came and darkened the land, considerable cloud cover obscured the rosy sunset over the Leaf Village.

Asuma made sure he found a comfortable spot to wait beside an old teahouse in Konoha’s central ward. He was on time for patrol duty, but it was guaranteed that his patrol partner would not be. The man sighed and watched the village’s foot traffic dwindle; string lanterns and neon signs illuminating the square. Across the street was the restaurant that his father visited most frequently in life. ‘Hm.
Remarkably, Kakashi was only twenty minutes late.

“You sick or somethin’?” Asuma couldn’t help an impish smirk.

“What, do I look sick?”

“No. Prompt.”

Kakashi noted, “You’re speaking in relative terms.”

“With you, I have to.” Asuma pushed off the wall, starting off on a northbound street, “How many checkpoints on this patrol?”

“All of them.”

“We have enough people to man all twelve posts?” He could scarcely believe it, “I thought Tsunade said she sent four teams to the Tide Village and three into the Rice Country.”

“That, on top of all the standard forces’ assignments.” Kakashi estimated, “Even if tonight’s patrol posts are on high alert, we’re still very short-staffed for now.”

“Yeesh. When are those kids getting promoted to Jounin? We need all the help we can get.”

“When Tsunade approves it.” Kakashi flitted up to a rooftop, and 30 meters to the left was one of the initial posts manned by a near-retirement age tokobetsu Jounin. Their gazes met briefly in acknowledgement, confirming no news was good news at the start of the night. Kakashi led the way with practiced ease, winding through darkened alleys and ‘sensitive areas,’ so termed by shinobi charged with village security.

Time marched on as they made their rounds at several checkpoints, making small talk.

“Did you buy that new place yet?” Kakashi wondered.

“Our offer was accepted, but the closing isn’t until next week.” Asuma was mildly annoyed, “And the lease ended on our shithole place, so Kurenai and I have had to crash at my brother’s until we can move into the house.”

“What are brothers for?” A merry chuckle.

“Pretty much that.”

Dry leaves rattled on tree branches as the breeze blew through Konoha’s north-central cemetery. It was then Kakashi slowed their pace somewhat, sweeping his gaze back and forth across the stone dais where memorials were held. Somewhat distracted with his father’s grand headstone, Asuma paid little attention to the quiet graveyard.

“This post’s shift changes every four hours.” Kakashi spoke the fact aloud.

“Yes.” Asuma agreed.

“Chunin stationed here are never late.” His eyes darted around, “Where are the guards?”

“Maybe the cemetery’s southside?”
“No. There’s another post there.”

“Then let’s check with those guards and see what the deal is.” Asuma suggested.

There were no explanations for lateness nor guards on the opposite end of the cemetery either. No shinobi to be found anywhere in the vicinity, which Kakashi declared alarming.

“Alright…” A tense growl escaped Asuma as he tapped on the bottom of a cigarette carton, “Never seen this before in my life.”

Kakashi was prowling between rows of headstones, moving east with his companion, “These posts are never abandoned.”

“Fuh…and I’m supposed to stick to a limit of three per day…” Asuma lamented as he perched a smoke on his lip, “Here’s number four.”

“Now, now…don’t throw your health goals out the window just because we may have stumbled onto something.” His friend chided him, “We’ll look around, and if nothing turns up we rat on delinquent sentries at the standby station.”

“Are you telling me this doesn’t look suspicious to you?” Asuma grunted.

“I’m trying to be optimistic. This is textbook suspicious.”

They explored the grounds in silence, sleuthing for any clues or lurkers. Nothing was out of the ordinary until Kakashi passed beyond the hedge line and down an acute, grassy slope at the property’s edge. Asuma trudged down the small knoll after him, and stopped to stare in wonder at a perfectly symmetrical, excavated doorway in the hillside. He exhaled a long line of smoke and inquired, “That looks new, right?”

“Right.”

“Wanna go in there?”

“No, but that’s what we’re about to do.” Kakashi informed him.

“Just figure I’d check that we’re not doing any surprise emergency drills tonight, are we?” Asuma verified.

“Who has time for drills when there’s an emergency every other week, these days?” Kakashi kneeled down and concluded hand signs, summoning his faithful hounds in a semi-circle when the smoke cleared, “Pakkun, we may have happened upon an intruder. Two patrol posts are missing.”

“You don’t say?” The pug yawned and stretched, “Good thing I just finished my beauty nap.”

“I want Tenzo notified. He’ll be picking up his next shift right about now, so head towards ANBU headquarters. Tell him and any others there to report to the cemetery for a search.” Kakashi commanded, “Take Biscuit and Guruko with you, in case you’re followed.”

Pakkun glanced over his shoulder at the human-sized, dark hole in graveyard soil, “Sure…eh…you’re not going in there, are you, Kakashi?”

Asuma continued puffing away while Kakashi nodded in confirmation.

“Watch yourself, then.” The dog warned, and with his two small ninken companions, Pakkun raced off with his orders.
Kakashi added to the remainder of the dog pack, “Bull, Urushi…wait here to direct any reinforcements that arrive. If someone tries to escape from this hole to avoid us…make them heel.”

A soft bark in the affirmative answered him.

“The rest of you,” Kakashi regarded Shiba, Akino, and Ūhei, “Are coming with me. Get in there and find me a scent.”

And so the party of dogs dispersed accordingly, with three ninken leading the way into the dark as Asuma flicked his lighter on, following the underground tunnel. Kakashi riffled around a supply pouch as he walked.

“Based on what Netsuke said about my dad confronting Orochimaru…the snake’s done plenty of grave-robbing in his time.” Asuma tried to pin down the rationale of mischief in a cemetery, “Though I think we have an alert that goes up with the Sealing Corps whenever Orochimaru’s chakra is detected.”

“We would’ve known a while ago if he was here.” Kakashi confirmed.

“So what’s up with…?” The man stopped in his tracks, noticing disturbed earth along the tunnel’s edge. Several extension paths had been dug beneath the graveyard, towards plots where bodies had been laid to rest. Asuma held his lighter beside a tributary hole, “Shiba…wanna look in there and see if a body was taken?” The dog trotted in fearlessly.

Meanwhile, Kakashi had drawn out five chemiluminescence sticks, snapping the tubes to produce a soft light. He fastened two to the collars of his present dogs, one to himself, and handed another to Asuma. Shiba returned and kicked his back paws at the extension tunnel, indicating there was no body remaining at the other end. Kakashi affixed a glow stick to Shiba’s bandana as well.

“Bodies were definitely stolen…although most buried here were interred ten years ago or more.” Kakashi observed, “So that begs the question why anyone wants bodies that are in such a late stage of decay…”

“Pretty fucked up.” Asuma agreed. He patted his hand against the soil wall, “See how this was dug? Not by hand. It’s too smooth…like it was automated. Not sure what kind of jutsu…”

“Me neither.” Kakashi noticed that strange detail as well, due to most Earth Jutsu being rather untidy in excavation projects. That, or someone with skill in that chakra nature had dropped by to thieve in the night.

They carried on into the narrow tunnel, following behind the ninken that pressed their noses to the ground. Abruptly, the dogs gained momentum, excited by a smell. Kakashi and Asuma kept up. The underground path extended on and on, which Kakashi estimated to be nearly a kilometer, to his shock. Silence and damp earth pressured the tunnel’s occupants from all directions, venturing further into uncertain pitch. Akino slowed, as did Shiba and Ūhei when the constricting earth tunnel ended in a perpendicular cross-section with a much larger, recognizable shaft.

The dogs burst out in the wide, spacious underground, circling and sniffing. Kakashi lifted a glow stick to get a look around, “You know where this is, right?”

“We went so far…I have no idea where we ended up.” Asuma stamped out his spent cigarette.

“This is one of the Jounin passages used for exams and drills…” Kakashi reminded him, “Beneath the Forest of Death.”
Fiddling with the carton of cigarettes he had with him, Asuma groaned in frustration and then stuffed the box in a hip pouch, “Who the fuck is using these tunnels without our patrols noticing? They dug all the way the hell up to the central cemetery!”

“I have theories.” As Kakashi dawdled about the space alongside his ninken, he glanced around for markers, “I think this is sub-passage A. It has three exits. Might as well check them and see what the boys can smell…”

When Ŭhei broke away suddenly in one direction, Akino and Shiba yipped, then took off in the opposite direction. Flummoxed, Asuma and Kakashi exchanged a look before mutually deciding to split, darting after the dogs. Asuma did not have to go far. In about 15 meters, he and Ŭhei discovered the dead body of a Chunin guard crumpled in the dark. Upon feeling the victim’s skin, Asuma found he was ever-so-slightly warm to the touch. Freshly killed.

“Kakashi!” He chanced a shout in the unknown space, “See any dead guards down there?”

A call back, “Three. You?”

“One. Looks like we found ‘em. This is Bekkō, actually. Just saw him at a meeting the other day…”

He stood up and muttered curses, motioning for Ŭhei to lead him toward Kakashi.

They reunited further down the tunnel, identifying the three other Chunin guards who had been killed. Thankfully, none of their students were among the victims. It was still a damn shame that veteran Chunin had been lured into a trap, throats slit in the dark. Asuma briefly wondered if it was “an inside job.”

“Possibly. Only Jounin and proctors know about these underground passages.” Kakashi said as the ninken pack led him south, on the trail of the mystery scent.

“No, that’s not true.” Asuma corrected him, “Students know about it too. From the last Exam.”

Kakashi halted.

The peril they had wandered into dawned on Kakashi, “We need to get out of the dark.”

Asuma did not grasp the urgent need for escape right away, not even when they arrived at a hollow tree-trunk exit at the tunnel’s end…but then a patterned ring of pictograms lit up beneath their feet. The patch of floor they set foot on had triggered a trap. A latent Tao Art belched hellfire into the enclosed space, and though the dogs had made it outside, Asuma and Kakashi were a tick behind. Somehow, some way, the burst of bone-scorching flame was pinched off, allowing the two shinobi just enough space to tumble out of the exit into the Forest of Death.

They rolled for a while to put their clothes out, and the dogs rolled with them in the dirt out of solidarity. The entryway to the tunnel was charred, wafting smoke up into the above-ground world.

Asuma asked in-between hacking, “How the- -? Heh-!” He sat up and rubbed embers out of his beard, “How did we get out of that?”

Panting, Kakashi heaved himself onto his knees, pointing to his exposed Sharingan, “Thank Obito, if you want.”

“—what?”
“The Mangenkyo Sharingan,” Kakashi clarified for him, “I’ve learned how to transport matter and energy with it, for lack of a better term. If it’s within my line of sight, I can target it. Even fire, turns out.”

“Oh. Brilliant.” Asuma was thrilled, “Thanks for saving my ass, Kakashi. And thanks too to Obito, I guess.”

The pair hobbled to their feet and dusted themselves, watching bits of their burnt fatigues flake off. Kakashi then examined his ninen, all unscathed, and then glanced back at Asuma, “That was a Tao Art.”

Asuma followed the line of thinking, “Do you think that was set by Huo?”

“I don’t know. He’s familiar with this area, unfortunately. Since he escaped… anyone in Bi’s rogue group might know how to navigate this sector now.”

“So how’d they get in?” Asuma folded his arms, hounds sniffing circles around him, “The Sealing Corps has a barrier up. We’d know.”

“There are some underground bypass routes into the village…and those are monitored by Root Black Ops.”

“Root?”

“Well, I don’t know if they’re monitoring in earnest or lying dead somewhere.” Kakashi supposed as they followed the pack into foliage and bramble, “It wouldn’t surprise me if village entry routes were given as a tip to Dintei Bi in exchange for something.”

“I thought Root’s main function is to covertly negotiate the security of our village.” Asuma grunted, “Not undermine it.”

“Most of the time, the Foundation’s definition and pursuit of security does not align with the consensus reached by the standard forces.” He ascended into tree tops and his ninen followed.

When Asuma landed on the branch beside Kakashi, he kept his voice low, “This seems like a punishable fuck up to me, if Root really did share the location of a bypass.”

“There will be nothing to punish unless we find who did this,” Kakashi added sunnily, “And get out of here alive to report it.”

With no sky visible through the dense cover of the canopy, Asuma reaffirmed their course with a compass. They decided against marking their path through the forest, in the event an intruder caught onto their trail and staged an ambush. It seemed as though the scent had gone stale—the ninen pack drifted between tree tops and the ground, trying to detect what was lost. The night felt heavy and unbearable, as wild creatures in the woods peered from thickets and perches as the Leaf shinobi fluttered past in silence.

They maintained as straight a course as they could, arriving at the outer reaches of the preserve. The dogs went tense. Instinct goaded them to dash into the brush, but training compelled the ninen pack to stay when Kakashi made a soft sound. Shiba and Akino’s ears lay flat against their heads, teeth bared, while Ūhei made his body rigid to point in the direction of the trespasser. With a hand signal, Kakashi and Asuma moved in toward the edge of an open glade ringed with giant trunks and roots. The dogs crept after them without so much as a whimper.

And there in the dimness, with only shreds of moonlight piercing through canopy cover, were two rows of stolen coffins stacked two boxes high, about a dozen across. Crouched beside the pilfered caskets was a figure in violet, Han-style clothing— vaguely slim and youthful in the dark. His palms were pressed together in concentration as a Tao Art ring extended beneath the contraband.

“Try not to jump on me.” The man warned as he worked, not bothering to turn around and confront the lurking Leaf ninja, “You have no idea how long it took to organize them neatly.”

“You get one warning— quit what you’re doing and back away.” Asuma raised a trench knife as he and Kakashi inched forward.

The man stood slowly and kept his hands facing out, where they were visible, “Are you sure I can’t Shadow Step? What good is your warning if I can move anywhere in this forest?”

“He can’t.” Kakashi assured his partner, “This one’s in the bingo book— Bi’s subordinate, Shimofuri Koinyu. You’re not like the rest of them.”

Koinyu stole a look at them over his shoulder, “The Copy Ninja comes informed, I see. I may lack some talents, but I got all the way over here, no?” He smiled, “And you just barely managed that.”

The Tao Art at his feet glowed and condensed, gradually swallowing the stacked coffins to transport them to an unknown exit point. Koinyu was pleased with his timing, “I can’t Shadow Step, no. It’s true. But my master can lend me Shadow Gates from time to time. For now, we part—”

Quick as wind, Ūhei leapt and sank his teeth into the man’s leg, pulling him off balance. Akino and Shiba charged half a moment later as Koinyu stumbled, driving a kunai down through the top of the attacking dog’s head.

In the confusion of it all, Kakashi dove in for an offensive counter while Asuma blasted a few caskets free of the shadow gate with a Wind Nature strike. The coffins smashed against the ground, rattling the bodies within, and Asuma spun ‘round to whirl another cutting strike at Koinyu as he gained his feet and slipped between Kakashi and his ninen. All were forced to duck under Asuma’s attack. It was then Koinyu substituted himself and made a break for it, only to be tackled again by Akino and Shiba.

With Ūhei lying dead behind him, Kakashi could not help a furious cry as his two other ninen were stuck full of knives after the shrewish ninja used a Magnet Release jutsu. Koinyu’s squeals of laughter incensed the Copy Ninja, and Kakashi hurled a barrage of projectiles that were captured in a magnetic field, stopping short of Koinyu to hover around him as an expansion of his own arsenal. He slipped away from the fallen dogs to disappear into tree tops. Asuma flanked Kakashi as they tore after the slaughterer.

“Kakashi, don’t—!” He caught up to his friend, “That gate’s going to swallow the rest of those bodies if we chase him—”

“It will anyway. We can’t stop Tao Arts.” Kakashi reasoned, “But I can stop him.”

They moved fast, almost blindly, having close shaves with magnet-propelled kunai and shuriken fired from the shadows as Koinyu noisily avoided them. Twigs and branches snapped, roosting birds scattered.

Asuma wanted to apologize for the loss, yet he knew Kakashi was not going to respond to sympathy. Killing intent radiated off his friend, who otherwise looked as normal and collected as he always did. Ahead, a Shadow Clone of Kakashi’s that had been lying in wait handily surprised Koinyu, hurling him down several stories with mighty Taijutsu.
Below, Kakashi and Asuma closed in on the projected point Koinyu would fall. With little verbal direction, Asuma readied a Wind Release attack as Kakashi’s Chidori flared, and allowed his Lightning Nature to be absorbed into Asuma’s cutting whirlwind. Their synchronized chakra leveled 50 meters of forest—chopping apart ancient trees and toppling all obstacles before them. No scream came from their target when he met the ground. Instead, Koinyu stood in shock, genuinely cowed by the tremendous combined jutsu that destroyed his Tao Barrier defense in one hit. It was the first and only time he would go unscathed. He was a naked target without a place to hide, locked in the sights of two veteran Leaf ninja.

They charged, and Koinyu reacted in pure fear, lacking rationality or strategy. He fired every last floating weapon at his disposal; a wall of metal sailed for the incoming ninja. Asuma’s Wind Release tore the volley apart as they bore down on the shrieking intruder. Koinyu had been quick with a follow up; a Fire Nature Tao Art latched onto the lingering Wind Release Asuma had pitched forward. Kakashi and Asuma descended upon the shrew as a wheel of empowered fire enveloped them all.

Heat unlike anything Asuma had ever felt blistered every bit of skin on his body. He was not sure if his clothes and hair had burned off. The experience only lasted a second: Kakashi had been able to contain the tornado of flames with his Sharingan’s transdimensional ability.

Then, Kakashi dropped to his knees. Skidding in embers and dirt, Asuma rushed over to his partner to deflect another small volley of projectiles that Koinyu pitched, covering his retreat.

“You okay, Kakashi?” He could see the man folding in exhaustion.

“That just about…leveled the last of my chakra.” Kakashi admitted in a wheeze, “Go. Follow him and be careful with Wind Release…I’ll be right behind you when I catch my breath.”

Suggesting such a naïve plan galled Asuma, “You’re probably not catching your breath for the next few days. The Sharingan—” “Go.” Insistent, Kakashi wanted some justice for the beloved ones he lost.

It was a solid order, so Asuma took off. He vanished into the dark as Kakashi crumpled on the ground, ringing with the hollow, pervasive hurt of chakra exhaustion. It squashed his lungs, tightening and slowing every bodily process. He had known that liberal use of his Sharingan’s new technique was risky. Now, he’d have to have some insane luck in order to stay conscious and somehow get out of the Forest of Death on his own. Following Asuma to assist in the hunt seemed the least likely goal of all. He said a brief prayer in his head, hoping that his friend would be unharmed.

He stretched onto his back and tried to focus on breathing. His vision was washed out. Kakashi spread his arms wide and felt tears sting the corners of his eyes. He had raised those ninjen from when they were pups. He’d been introduced to them as a serious, know-it-all kid. His dogs were a connection to his father. And for his father, so too they had connected to Sakumo’s mother, their family’s most talented dog-trainer. With a trembling hand, he pulled down the mask from his face to suck in a breath of cool air. The pain was worsening. In heart and body.

When next he batted open his eyes, Kakashi could see his vision had slipped again. It was not an alarming, life-or-death struggle he was witnessing, this time. Though only for a few heartbeats, he could see the interior of a home he did not know. He saw Rin’s face lit with surprise that soon melded into stern interest. She was learning something. She was looking right at him.

‘I knew you were alive. You’ve stayed away from me because I hurt you.’ The thought was a confession he had avoided for years, finally dislodged from the dam of emotions he’d built up, ‘I need your help. Rin.’

Shortly after that, he saw no more. Salt slipped down his cheeks. The quiet of the forest made Kakashi wonder if Asuma had been successful, or if he was struggling on his own.

Swift footsteps crunched over debris and nettle, and a comrade suddenly kneeled down beside him, “Kakashi?” His hand was plucked up and squeezed, the newcomer leaning down to confirm if he was responsive, “I brought your pack with me. They’re waiting beside the…” The voice trailed off, referring to the unfortunate trio of dogs found in a nearby glade.

The touch was familiar. When his foggy sight cleared up, Kakashi could see Tenzo staring down at him, owl-eyed with concern.

“Ah.” His speech rumbled in a phlegmy throat, “Glad you could drop by…”

Pakkun must’ve broken away from the rest of the pack. He was vigorously licking Kakashi’s face.

“I’m alright…I’m alright.” Kakashi tiredly assured them, “My Sharingan wore me out. Asuma went ahead. We have an A-Rank intruder from Dintei Bi’s group stealing bodies from our shinobi cemetery. He took most of what he dug up, I think.”

“I sent Sai and three of my subordinates to convene. They’ll find him.” He pulled Kakashi into a sitting position, “When I saw Ūhei and the others…I thought you might be dead too.”

Pakkun whimpered in agreement, “Yeah…”

“I’m a bit of a cockroach. Takes quite a lot to stomp me out.” Kakashi joked before adding, “But I want him dead. No one touches my kids.”

“We’ll get to it.” Tenzo supposed, “Can you stand?”

“No.”

The younger man smiled, “Alright, then.” Tenzo shuffled to scoop his long-time friend onto his back to be carried, “Let’s retrace our route and mark the site where those caskets were transported. There’s evidence of an expired Tao Art there…and some damaged caskets as well. I’ll get you to the hospital and then look after the dogs.”

“I want them to stay with me.”

“They’re stressed. So are you. I think a vet-nin needs to check them.”

“I want you to stay with me too.”

Tenzo paused before noting, “It’s been a while since you told me that.”

“I’m sorry.”

“For avoiding me?”

“For all of the pretext. I’m not…” Sad laughter dampened his admission, “Not really that aloof. I do care.”

“I always knew you did. Don’t worry about it.” Tenzo did not need the apology.
Kakashi kept his arms secure around Tenzo’s shoulders with what little strength remained, “You know…I might be going crazy. Just slightly.”

“That wouldn’t surprise me, given the circumstances. You need a head scan—”

“I mean I’ve been seeing things for months. With my Sharingan.” Secrets were of no use to Kakashi at that juncture, “I might need to tell the Hokage…that I can see the Akatsuki. And I just saw Rin.”

“You can see them?” Tenzo was doubtful, “Or is it a hallucination?”

“Debatable, at this point. I think it’s real. I could be wrong…but I’ve got a very strong feeling it’s real.”

No further convincing was needed for Tenzo to buy it, “I believe you.”

“I don’t know what to do.”

“To start: rest.” Tenzo recommended as they arrived at the initial forest clearing. He formed hand signs to produce two Wood Clones molded from the ground, rising to stand and collect Ūhei, Shiba, and Akino. The remainder of the pack was antsy, restlessly pacing beside Akino.

Pakkun reunited with his ninken brothers and raised the alarm, “Akino’s breathing!” He ran in a pugish circle, clamoring with the pack.

Though it was only a tiny sliver of hope, Tenzo shrugged Kakashi on his shoulders, his expression lightening, “Kakashi, I think we can…save him.” His passenger was unconscious.

Undaunted, the ANBU veteran organized the group and mobilized to exit the forest, “Let’s go, boys. I’ll get you home.”

Chapter End Notes

So my pondering of Kishimoto’s treatment of the dead in Naruto canon, and what shenanigans can be conducted with said deceased shinobi, has led me to believe that the literary decision to have intact bodies buried underground was deliberate. In Japan, cremation is (most often) the first step prior to burial, though this cultural norm was disposed with in the Naruto manga on account of, well, most every villainous plotline. As much as I can, I try to fold authentic cultural traditions and ideologies into this fic. That’s why I got to thinking about it. I suppose somewhere out there there’s an interview with Kishimoto speaking on this subject.

Chapter 50- Knife and Toad
Eleven children scampered around the preschool's yard, released from a small classroom and into the autumn air to play. From the corner of his eye, Zabuza watched them as he stalked past. What rare creatures they were. They were probably the sum total of all people under age five in this lonely hamlet on the tip of the main island. Children were a fragile commodity in the Land of Water, particularly within Kirigakure's walls, but on outskirts such as these they seemed to do better.

At the rear of the preschool building he came to a metal door, marked as the entrance to a utility room. He glanced left and right, confirming that no witnesses were watching, and then pounded on it four times. The door swung open, and after Zabuza entered it lumbered shut behind him.

The sole occupant of the utility room was a handsome man—peachy and young in manhood, dressed in a dark blue uniform and a preschool smock splattered with paint and stickers. He was unenthused by Zabuza's visit, and resumed his work at a large hydraulic press installed in the corner of the concrete, pipe-patchwork room. Without exchanging formal salutations of any sort, the swordsman dropped a stack of money notes on a wooden workbench.

And then Zabuza posed one question, "Did you go to Hidden Mist?"

"How about…?" The man huffed as he pulled down on the machine's lever, "Nice to see you, Do-yeon. Or, Glad you're not dead, Do-yeon…"

"Sure." Zabuza agreed, unflappable.

"Keep your money." The school worker spat over his shoulder, lining up sizeable, white bricks beneath the press.

"You got another job in a better location, and you're still going to be pissy about what happened in Moji?"

"Three of my friends died because you made an unwelcome appearance and a Mist hunter-nin noticed. How do you make up for that?" Do-yeon wondered.

"That's twice your annual salary sitting there, plus a thirty percent bonus."

"Oh, so you know some math? Inagawa's put you in front of a chalkboard for practice."

"Take it and feed the kids with it." Zabuza suggested.
Do-yeon froze in his work, then turned slowly to face the nukenin, "Fine. I'll feed my students and their families with the money you got from killing people. I can expect to launder filthy money all my life, so long as I'm here…"

"Did," Zabuza repeated harshly, "You go to Hidden Mist?"

They stood in rigid, unfriendly silence, watching each other.

"I did." Do-yeon admitted, "All of the standard forces there are looking rather dour and underfed. About half as many as I remember seeing a year ago. They've been purging whoever they deem "disloyal." So I didn't really talk to anyone; I just made my sales and left."

"The report?"

"It was cheap, surprisingly. It was on record that Hōzuki Mangetsu was attacked and mortally wounded in the east marshland." Do-yeon went on, "But he didn't die there. The archived report said the ambushing squad retreated and saw him flee into the birch forest."

Such a place, as far as Zabuza remembered, was an old battleground littered with unclaimed corpses from Mist's civil war, and strung with thousands of fatal traps that had never been disarmed.

"So it was assumed that he succumbed to his wounds in the birch haunt. No one tried to recover his body, or…puddle seems more accurate." He quipped, "I don't see why you want to attempt it in such a dangerous place."

"It's not like I'm mourning that know-it-all." Zabuza corrected, "I just need what he had with him."

"Your undying affection?"

"The Master Scroll, you fucking idiot."

"Of course. How can you give something that was never given to you in the first place?" As if remembering a silly truth, Do-yeon gaped in mock-mortification.

"That scroll acts as a container for all the other blades."

"Yeah, yeah. I know that's what you want." He muttered under his breath, "I always know what you want."

Zabuza pressed on, "And the auction?"

"The most recent rumor is that is was scheduled for the end of next month, the 31st. It will be hosted at the Keiseki House in the Land of Mountains. Do you—?"

"I know where that is." Zabuza snapped.

"Everyone will be there."

"Which means every piece of shit not behind bars will be there."

Do-yeon heaved again on the press's lever, smirking with the effort of the task, "Give or take a few."

"I need to sell some ill-gotten baubles." The swordsman leaned against the workbench, "Otherwise I wouldn't bother."

"Obviously. Black market auctions are not your specialty."
"Any other news of consequence?"

"Pft. About how wonderful the Mist Village is?" Do-yeon moved several of the bricks to a packing pallet in the corner, "Well, it's worse off than it was, like I told you. Anyone even suspected of dissenting from the Mizukage's rule is locked away, tortured, or executed. It's really thinning the numbers and padding the forces of the Hunter Corps. And the Hunter Corps are just a bunch of spineless killers who'll do what they're told to lead a comfy life." He returned to the press, frowning as he went on, "But the kunoichi…not so much."

"…kunoichi." It was not quite what Zabuza expected from an update.

"Not a single one of them joined the Hunter Corps after…" Do-yeon glanced over at Zabuza, "You know about Karatachi Kaigara, right? The Fourth Mizukage's wife? People said she went crazy, spouting nonsense that Yagura-sama was replaced with an imposter— that he was killed in secret. She insists that a fake is being puppetted around. Many of the kunoichi in the standard forces believed her tale."

While Zabuza listened in silence, Do-yeon continued, "They support Kaigara fully. A miller told me close to 30 kunoichi have been executed for trying to help her and her son escape captivity. It's like a Joseon drama, I tell you! And he said that those kunoichi are alleging the shadow cabinet was installed by the Akatsuki. There's even a shinobi who appears every so often…giving directions to hunters and threatening Kaigara when she fusses."

"Which one?" Zabuza was familiar enough with the Akatsuki to identify a member or two by name. Do-yeon shrugged, "No one could tell me. This Akatsuki director stays out of the public eye and wears a Hou-ou mask. Not someone you could pick out of a bingo book anywhere…" He pulled down on the press lever again, "I heard a rumor that he has white hair. Nothing else was recognizable."

"So he's the one using the fake Yagura as a figurehead?"

"That's what they say." He pushed another pressed brick to the side, "Though how can you and I confirm any of that? Could be pure bullshit."

"Doesn't sound like it."

"Nah, it doesn't." Do-yeon agreed, "But no matter what happens, I am never going back to Kirigakure. It's too risky now."

"Suit yourself." Zabuza pushed off of the workbench, "I'll come back before the auction."

"Bring more money." Do-yeon called after him as he exited, "I need to pay my dealers for deliveries."

Out in the sunshine, Zabuza took a less-traveled route away from the school. Do-yeon had always been a good informant, even back during the days he'd worked in the pleasure house in Moji. It seemed that he was putting his information peddling days behind him. Not that secretly prepping cocaine bricks in the back of a preschool was more wholesome of a profession, but Zabuza yielded it was a change of direction.

Down the beach hills beyond the seaside town, Zabuza returned to a small motorboat where it had been moored earlier. Above the engine's starting purr, he could hear the last peals of laughter from schoolchildren across the dunes. He unmoored and pushed off, preparing for an hour-long crossing back to the small island of Nanakusa. He strayed into his thoughts.
It was a relief to hear that the Master Scroll would likely be tucked away in one of the most deserted, treacherous areas of the main island. Few ninja dared set foot there, though he supposed Kirigakure ordered patrols to skim past the perimeter to make sure no one was lurking. 'Just to avoid getting caught, I might have to instigate a diversion and draw Mist's attention away from that area.' He had the kindling of a plan on his mind, prepared to retrieve the hosting scroll for the Seven Swordsmen's blades. And of course, he would have Haku come with him. Though Haku would be unfamiliar with the perilous terrain, he was endlessly helpful.

What was most surprising to learn was that Kirigakure was experiencing internal pushback from its kunoichi population. Though it was only a hunch, Zabuza suspected that the group was galvanized by Terumi Mei's open rebellion against Hidden Mist, and was trying to emulate her resistance. Doyeon indicated the movement began thanks to Karatachi Kaigara's revolt against false leadership, but surely the causation was a multi-faceted. Until today, Zabuza had also had no idea that Yagura welcomed a child before his untimely (alleged) demise. Such were significant hostages for the Akatsuki to take while oppressing Hidden Mist.

'If the women are courageous enough to die for the Mizukage's widow...then maybe they are the ones I need for a coup.' Zabuza thought to himself. It would be a matter of contacting them, and then organizing an attack. Arresting that idea was the possibility that Terumi Mei had already beaten him to recruiting such a population. From any angle he looked at it, Zabuza found that he could only take silver in this race. With Mei in the lead, it was starting to feel inevitable that another tense, contrary meeting with her would have to take place... wherever she was hiding these days.

He had enough money to buy out Mei's current men, an estimated 105 shinobi of Chunin and Jounin level. That, unfortunately, did not count the dozens of kunoichi that had joined Mei's ranks, and Zabuza doubted there was anything he could give them in exchange for forsaking their woman-leader. Even if he paraded around Haku and his virtuous grandstanding, few would bat an eyelash at his bid. He would forever be other and untrustworthy to those seeking a brighter future...even though he was every bit as thirsty for it as they were.

After crossing the bay and landing on Nanakusa, he moored at a small private dock that did not belong to him. Zabuza pushed the defeatist thoughts from his mind. It was making him sick. The deep-seated frustration and helplessness curled within the pits of his stomach scratched closer to the surface. There was nowhere he could belong. No one would listen to the likes of him. Even Haku was too smart to trust him to be something decent, for even Zabuza could scarcely see such conduct in himself. At least he'd not started any fights or made threats in the past week. Haku and Migawari were tolerating him again, for the most part.

His gut growled and clenched, 'I'm hungry as fuck...' He turned left down the lane that would take him towards Main Street, where Hiroshi's café was located. The foot traffic ahead was minimal, and flea market stands were just being set up in the center of town.

He was only able to take two steps on the gravel walkway when something sinewy and powerful wound tight around his midsection. Barred from continuing, Zabuza's eyes skirted down in a moment of dubious recognition, taking in the sight of something fleshy and pink. It had snared him from behind, whatever it was. Before he could even attempt to wriggle loose or form hand signs, the fleshy lasso pulled back with force, flattening him to the ground. Then, he realized it, 'A tongue.' He was wrapped up in a tongue.

With a whoosh, he was pulled back again by a power he could not place, and daylight disappeared. All of Zabuza's mental capacities scrambled, trying to make sense of the unexpected predicament. For the time being, he'd been swallowed by whatever thing the tongue belonged to. Fantastic.
This motherfucking animal never thought it'd get dissected from the inside...' He reached for a leg holster, hoping a kunai could be of use, but, no. The pressure of esophageal walls coated in mucus was smothering him— crushing him. An apex moment of lost dignity collapsed upon Zabuza. He had never suspected he was about to die while minding his own business. Or what ate him. Or why. 'I didn't work this hard just to blink out without a goddamn explanation—!' He was going to be unconscious in a second.

Then, the digestive pressure let up, and some daylight squeaked in. He was pushed from fleshy innards just a bit, still bodily constricted…but his face was free to see out of the open maw of, well, whatever it was. From there he could see the sidestreet's gravel and garden boxes. He also saw a man leaning down to take a gander at him— hair long and white, a face distinct with age and experience. There was a lit tobacco pipe in the voyeur's hand.

"Didn't think that I'd swing by to fuck you up, did ya?" The man announced merrily, "Well I did."

"—who are—"

"Jiraiya." The old ninja exhaled a line of smoke in Zabuza's face, "Of the Legendary Three. Not so pleased to make your acquaintance, Momochi Zabuza."

Oh.

The insane circumstances made far more sense. Zabuza was a well-informed individual. He had been trapped and swallowed by a toad, unable to defend himself or escape. The Toad Sage must have heard about some recent misfortunes that had befallen his student. More specifically, Zabuza's recent extortion attempt against Haku.

Perhaps this had been his most epic misplay on the game board yet.

Default response was set to intimidate so Zabuza went with, "Do you want me to kill this toad, Old Man?"

"Hey. I've been eaten by toads before, so I know you can hardly move." Jiraiya shut down the bluff, "And really, I'm not so old. Have a bit of respect for someone who grinds your types into dust on a regular basis. I might've had more respect for you if I didn't hear about how you've been messing with Haku." He added pointedly, "He's one of my shining star pupils. He's probably your star pupil too. Why treat him like garbage?"

"Because his philosophy doesn't get very far in the Land of Water." Zabuza was willing to protest, even though it was starting to feel like the toad's digestive fluids were nipping at his feet.

"Ah." Jiraiya hung the pipe from his lip and puffed, "So your philosophy works better around here? Hmm. Where are your adoring comrades? The glowing testimonials? How about honor? Got that tucked away somewhere?"

"If you're going to kill me, I'll skip your allocution, Toad Sage."

"Wow. I got a formal address out of you." This time, Jiraiya exhaled smoke away from the peeking face in the toad's mouth.

Jiraiya interrupted Zabuza when he tried to issue another feeble threat, "Listen. If I wanted to kill you, I'd let you stand on your own two feet with that stupid-big sword of yours in hand, with all of your strength. And I'd squash you in your prime, Momochi. That's what you deserve." He was as sincere as could be, "That'd be a wrap, but, I've noticed some disturbing trends in the Land of Water…and I have a feeling you've got your finger on the pulse. So I would prefer to hear your take on what's going on down here before I issue a punishment befitting of Haku's mistreatment. If that sounds reasonable to you, what do you say this toad spits you out and we discuss that matter over tea?"

"It's a deal." Zabuza felt his feet stinging. Abruptly, the toad heaved him up and out, splattering gracelessly to the stony walking path. He slicked what mucus he could from his arms and torso. Then, he goggled up at the sight of a huge, canary yellow toad. As Jiraiya thanked it for its help, the summoned creature disappeared in a puff of smoke.

"Might want to dry yourself off before we go to a sit-down place for lunch." Jiraiya suggested, "You look gross."

"I can't be blamed for how I look right now." Gritting his teeth furiously, Zabuza marched into a neighboring backyard and pulled down a dry towel from a laundry line. He mopped up the saliva while contemplating just how foolish it would be to try to take on the Legendary Toad Sage in a fight without the Seversword. It was sitting in his bedroom at the hideout. He did happen to have a Tool Scroll filled with reliable weapons, however…good sense assured him it was a duel he could never win.

Tossing the soggy towel aside, Zabuza led the way toward the Main Avenue as Jiraiya tagged along beside him fearlessly. It was bizarre to have a living legend appear unannounced, and more so to be effectively trounced by said legend in all of three seconds.

"So, where is Haku?" Jiraiya asked, "I looked for him."

"He went out to train. Comes back around noon to help the old folks, eat, medical training, then usually I put him through his paces." It was true. Zabuza saw no reason to lie about the schedule they established, "He's going to inherit the Nuibari sword, as soon as I get it back."

"Is he?"

"He agreed to it."

"Haku agreeing to be a swordsman doesn't mean that he volunteered." Jiraiya noted.

"What? So you want to override his commitments? I'm not just going to mosey up to the Yuki clan and introduce them for free." Zabuza sniped, "It's nearly impossible to track that clan down. They hide like door mice and change locations. It'd take weeks."

"You've had ample weeks to do that." Jiraiya pointed out, "And you've taken even more of Haku's time in exchange. I don't appreciate you demanding so much of someone you are not even fit to kiss the boots of."

Zabuza established, "I don't bow down to his goody-goody disposition. He's benefited from my training, and that isn't free either."

"If it isn't, it should be. It's not like apprentices flock to you these days."

"In here." Zabuza ducked into the tea shop and Jiraiya followed.

Behind the counter of the shop, Hiroshi was replacing display signs and prices. He barely looked over his shoulder, "You got back late, Zabuza. I can't promise fresh rolls at this hour…"

The beleaguered swordsman dropped heavily into a seat at a small table, "It doesn't fucking matter, Roundy. I'll eat whatever. And a pot of tea, too."
Hiroshi was rattling off the specials menu as he turned around, then stopped dead in his tracks. His beady eyes darted between Jiraiya and Zabuza, trying to grasp the purpose of such a conference. Hiroshi’s memory was sharp, and since Jiraiya did not look much older than he remembered, he bowed reverently for the visitor, "It's nice to see you again, Gama-sennin."

Harried, Zabuza slammed his hand flat on the table. If he rolled his eyes they might roll plumb out of his head and out the door. He could hardly believe so many people were familiar with and willing to kiss up to the Toad Sage.

"It's Hiroshi, right? My memory is a little foggy on our first meeting, but Haku always talks about you fondly in his letters." He smiled warmly at the man, "I appreciate you putting up with these knuckleheads. I've come by to provide some counseling to this basket case here. Do you mind if I-?"

"Please, please have a seat and relax!" Hiroshi gestured to the free seat across from Zabuza, "Let me fetch that tea. I'll just be a moment." His dark clothing was streaked with white flour, which Jiraiya found endearing as the stocky man retreated to the kitchen.

Once seated, Jiraiya got a read on the antisocial, embittered body language Zabuza was displaying. He was slouched back and away from the table, eyes narrow and glittering. Clearly, he was livid that violence was not a viable option. And though Zabuza may have thought himself clever on a good day, there was no way he could outmaneuver Jiraiya in verbal negotiations.

"Before Haku comes back and I go to speak with him, let's get a few things straight." Jiraiya offered. "Better than being eaten." Zabuza allowed.

Jiraiya dove into it, "Is it true that the Akatsuki are controlling the Mist Village?"

There was a long pause of thought before Zabuza answered, "To the best of my knowledge, that's the case."

"Are you aware that the Tide Village was attacked by the Akatsuki less than a week ago?"

"No. What the fuck village is that?"

"A new shinobi village that was established in the Land of Waves. One of Hidden Mist's former jinchuriki, Awa Utakata, was living and working there. After a tremendous fight, he was captured by the Akatsuki." Jiraiya took out pipe cleaner wire from a linen bag tied to his hip, "Did you know him?"

"Not well."

"We fear after this much time has passed, and after losing four search party teams..." Jiraiya sighed, "He's dead."

Zabuza grunted in acknowledgment, but his reservoir of sympathy was nearly bone-dry. He didn't say anything.

"If you knew Utakata, you probably know about Hidden Mist's other jinchuriki." Jiraiya steered the conversation smoothly, "What can you tell me about him?"

"I can tell you that he's a small shit-turtle with some nasty reflective jutsu, the Coral Palm technique, and moderate control over his Tailed Beast." He said that with certainty, "At some point he got married and had a kid. That's what I hear. What I've been told more recently is that Karatachi Yagura is dead." Zabuza added in a low voice, "In all likelihood the Akatsuki is responsible. They've been parading around a cipher that looks and sounds like him to keep up the ruse…but it's not fooling everyone in Mist. Certainly not the missus…"

"Another proxy, eh?" Jiraiya wondered, "I wonder if Pein is controlling it."

"Who?"

"The leader of the Akatsuki. He's the one who attacked the Tide Village."

"Never heard of 'em."

"I'd be surprised if you did. He's been very secretive until now. He can use the Rinnegan to control up to six repurposed proxy bodies at once to fight." Jiraiya shared what he knew, "Pein is a threat that has many of the great villages on edge right now. I think he might be hiding out in Hidden Rain, but I'll have to confirm that before I put it on the record."

"For the uninitiated, what the hell am I supposed to make of the term Rinnegan?"

"It is the ancestral Kekkei Genkai from which the Sharingan is descended. Those are some powerful eyes and jutsu that, quite frankly, shouldn't exist in these times." Jiraiya finished cleaning the stem of his pipe, "And yet here we are discussing it."

"Fuck. Might as well give that new dipshit village some credit, taking that on."

"They fared better against Pein than I anticipated, but the toll it took on Shigakure was much too steep." Jiraiya stopped to thank Hiroshi for bringing a teapot and sweet buns to the table. The café owner then politely excused himself to count a cash drawer, not inclined to insert himself into the conversation.

"The Akatsuki's making moves elsewhere, meaning less of their attention will be on Hidden Mist." Zabuza interpreted the news, "So now would be a great time to pull the rug from under 'em."

"I agree whole-heartedly." Jiraiya poured his companion tea, "How do you intend to do that?"

With that cue, Zabuza outlined his plan to buy off as many of Terumi Mei's rebel force of Mist ninja as possible. He also listed the complication of the kunoichi faction's loyalty and likelihood of sticking with Mei. He included his intention to fully train Haku, have Kurosuki Raiga and Raiga's apprentice, Ranmaru, assist in the coup. Zabuza extended the possibility of recruiting disgruntled mercenaries in the area, as well as mercenaries from the mainland for added muscle. He had access to an intelligence network observing weaknesses in the Hunter Corps' patrol routines, and Zabuza was confident enough to disarm the alert barrier on Kirigakure's fringes.
