"I just need to pick a time to move that group in and ambush the Hunter Corps from within their base." Zabuza forecasted, "Because without Hunters around, most of Kirigakure fucking hates the leadership currently in place. They'll turn on it too. The Akatsuki scum who's running the show—we'll decimate him after the raid."

"Why are you so sure that Mist's non-Hunter standard forces will cooperate with you?"

"They will. They need the external opportunity to strike, so I'll provide that."

"And all of this you do without Terumi Mei's help? Someone who has two Kekkei Genkai?" Jiraiya was aghast.
Zabuza chomped on a bun, "Yeah."

"That idea is top-tier shit."

He chewed in odious silence, hating Jiraiya from across the table.

"The truth is a bitter pill to swallow." Jiraiya could tell how the nukenin felt, "But really, how the hell do you expect to get anywhere with a plan that excludes major resources?"

"I don't need Mei."

"You don't want her around." Jiraiya gathered, "Because you expect the people to elect her Mizukage."

"No. I just don't fucking need her."

"No one is going to prefer you over her, when it comes to leadership. Even if you spearhead the whole operation and free the village, they still won't choose you. You come with too much baggage." Jiraiya shot him down, "Demon of the Hidden Mist."

Somehow, Zabuza kept calm enough to pour more tea. He wanted to toss the pot of hot water in the visitor's face.

"At the very least, you need to sketch Terumi Mei back into your plans. When it comes to the Akatsuki, you'll have no idea what you're getting into until you finally re-enter Kirigakure. I won't object if you use that woman as a shield, or convince her with a silver-tongue to champion you for the top job...but the more talent you go in with, the better off you'll be." Jiraiya raised a hand nonchalantly, "Another option is to petition with the other great villages to back you. If you use me as a channel, you might possibly get some extension of aid from Sand and Leaf. It'll cost you, though."

"Cost me...fuh. It'd never happen. If you applied for clearance to give me back up teams that will infiltrate Hidden Mist, they'd have you institutionalized." Zabuza rejected the idea on principle, "The Kazekage hates me because I, uh, nearly killed someone related to him. The Hokage has no reason to trust me either, since she'll go off of what the Kazekage says."

"True. You've shot yourself in the foot when it comes to applying for outside consideration." Jiraiya nodded while cleaning the bowl of his pipe with a rag, "But you'd be amazed by the strings I can pull."

"Nothing amazes me."

"Haku does." Jiraiya reminded him.

Zabuza stared at him silently, more bewildered than angry.

"Why have you bent over backwards grooming someone who is so unlike you? So unlike a swordsman." Jiraiya wondered, "You said it yourself: the Yuki clan are a bunch of cowards."

A swift counter, "He wasn't brought up with their ilk."

"No. And so I guess you took that to mean he has more potential." Jiraiya probed a new curve in the discussion, "So do you."

"I am what I am. I've plateaued." Zabuza demolished another bun in two bites.
"Is that the kind of talk that should come from someone who wants to be Mizukage?"

"I don't know what kind of talk people want to hear from me." Zabuza griped, "As it is, Haku's stronger than me now."

"And smarter." Jiraiya vouched, "Though there are still gaps in his education. Big ones. At least in this region, you know how to fill him in."

"Where are you going with this?"

"I am going to give you a set of terms, and should you agree to them, you can rest assured I will follow through on everything I've promised." Jiraiya proposed, "Or you can decline in two ways: you stay on as a consultant to get Haku up to speed on the Land of Water, accept Haku's refusal to be a swordsman, and then you leave. I'll keep Haku here for a short while as a liaison with Terumi Mei and those who will liberate Kirigakure." Jiraiya further added, "If that doesn't sit well...you leave immediately. Depending on your tone, I may or may not send Special Ops squads to apprehend you. Got it?"

Zabuza could only stare moodily and hear the Toad Sage out.

"Good. I intend to temporarily install Haku as a "kiting" shinobi down here to relay information to me, the Kazekage, and the Hokage. A spy, in fancier terms. He wouldn't be the first ninja I have doing that for me. I will send him into dangerous areas, and allow him to collaborate on a coup in Mist. I need him to collect as much information on the Akatsuki as he can, and whatever else is going on out here. When his assignment ends, he comes back to Leaf. He can apply to work in Hidden Sand, if that's what he wants. At that point, you leave him alone." Jiraiya explained, "But until that times comes, you will just as much be my informant as Haku is."

"Paid work?"

"Paid. In coin or jutsu, or a combination thereof. You can stand to learn a few more tricks, no? How about a few of mine?" Jiraiya offered, "And if you need more muscle to get into Hidden Mist, I can follow through on sending Sand or Leaf teams when the time comes."

Zabuza crossed his arms, "Great. Though I don't know how the hell you are going to word that mission request."

"I'll use some flowery language. Do I have you so far?"

"You do."

"Let's see if this throws you: the caveat is...you answer to Haku from now on."

The blank look on the nukenin's face did not bode well.

"If you want to check in with a crime syndicate for leisurely purposes, as opposed to information-gathering, and Haku pans it—you don't go. If you ask things of him that he will not do—you square yourself with that. If you attempt anything that Haku does not approve of—I will give him the means to make you wish you'd never been born." Jiraiya warned, "Are we clear?"

"I'm no one's lieutenant."

"If you want all of the handouts I just described, you will be."

After sucking down the last sip of tea in his cup, Zabuza crushed the porcelain beneath his flat palm, grinding bits of it against the table.

"You'll work with Terumi Mei, if Haku finds that alliance favorable. If you want endorsements to become a candidate for Mizukage, you face down your competitors fair and square. Treat others well. Just because you don't think you can make people like you doesn't mean it's impossible. Look at me for some inspiration." He pointed at himself with his pipe, "I'm not gonna stop you from slamming your head against the dead-end brick wall that is your life. Do that if you must. Alternatively, you can take some direction from someone who's won two wars and trained multiple Kage." Jiraiya smirked, "And see where that gets you."

"You don't think the Snake Sannin would offer me something better? I could dangle Haku in front of him." Zabuza could not help but play the traitorous chords of the song.

"Heh." Highly amused, Jiraiya tucked his pipe away, "By all means do. Tell Orochimaru about my offer and watch how quickly he kills you because you don't fit into his agenda. He's got little to provide, as hard as that is to believe. No village backs him."

Fascinated by the bloody pricks in his hand, Zabuza pulled a few shards of the broken cup from his skin, "...I will say...this is the first time I've been trusted in a while."

"It's not fond trust, but it has a purpose."

"The cliché? The enemy of your enemy?"

"All self-proclaimed enemies are going to wake up one day and realize the Akatsuki will dominate them equally." Jiraiya put a fine point to it, "I have one enemy, and you are not it. You're just a bad-tempered shit stain."

The silence of the café was interrupted by Hiroshi knocking over a stack of plastic drums in the back room. He muttered while picking them up.

Zabuza rolled his neck and recapped the terms, "You want Haku taken care of and respected? Fine. You want detailed information? Fine. A better planned and backed coup? I'll do it your way." He leaned forward and growled, "But you can't roll up in here and postpone my plans completely so that I can execute your plans. There's an auction in a month that I can't show my face at, so Haku is going to sell spoils there to fund the rebellion."

"What auction?" Jiraiya scrunched his face at the thought.

"Keiseki House."

"What a cesspool. How'd you get kicked out of that crowd?"

"By not actually following through on a sale, last time."

"Cheapskate." Jiraiya simpered, "Where's that again? The Land of Mountains?"

"Yeah."

"I've got another ninja kiting out in that area. Who'll be going to that soiree?"

"Magnates from the Kingdoms of Han and Joseon. They fund it. A few undisclosed, aristocratic houses from shinobi nations do arms-dealing there. A few Mist clans go to it, some from the Lands of Lightning, Earth, and Snow. Thieves and entrepreneurs. Scientists."
"Scientists? What's at Keiseki House that they'd want?"

"What they don't already have, and the other side of the world does." Zabuza imagined.

"Hmm. You don't suppose Orochimaru would appear there?"

"I don't know. It's not like they put me in charge of attendance lists. It's all hearsay."

"Sending Haku isn't ideal. I'll ask my guy to—"

"He's going to prove himself. If I handle everything else you demand, Haku goes." Zabuza insisted on it, "I'm not going to count on your mystery middle-man to make a sale this important."

"It's a lion's den of dangerous, rich assholes."

"Haku should be strong enough to handle himself." Zabuza crossed his arms again, "I believe in him. I don't believe in your "guy". Alright?"

"This is not a concession I'm comfortable making, but I'll make it." Jiraiya granted with a sigh.

No other points of contention were raised as Jiraiya finished the final sweet bun on the plate. He dusted the crumbs from his hands, and then offered a clean table napkin to his brutish associate. Zabuza pressed it to his bloody palm.

"I get the feeling this sucks for you." Jiraiya acknowledged, "But it could be much worse."

With a half shrug, Zabuza did not disagree.

"You've terrorized Haku and the people of Nanakusa. Even that man over there, Hiroshi— he saved Haku's life when he was a child. You've bullied him too, I bet." The Sage scanned around the space of the shop, "Coerced your fellow swordsman to work with you, most likely. Rejected those from Mist who might actually be of help to you… It must be hard when things don't go the way you intend." Jiraiya could put himself in the rogue's shoes, "When all of this is over, I never said I wouldn't put out the order to have you executed. I'm sure you've done enough to merit it."

"Mist will handle that for you. No need to waste your pen ink." A morbid forecast on Zabuza's part.

"…If you had no choice but to die or rehabilitate yourself, which would you choose?" The older man wondered as he emptied the tea pot, "Which path yields you more dignity?"

"Are you going to inflict your Sage teachings on me?"

"I've been doing that since I caught you in that alley. Try answering the question, Zabuza."

"…” He gazed up at the pendant lights of the café, softly glowing, "I don't know how to not die as I am."

"And what are you?"

"The scourge of my village."

"No, no." With a shake of his head, Jiraiya asked again, "What are you really? Not what they say, but when you look at yourself?"

The lull of the dining room was dense and noiseless. Perhaps there was an answer, or maybe there wasn't— Zabuza said nothing to affirm Jiraiya's suspicion. And so Jiraiya ceremoniously rose to riffle around a wallet, drawing out money notes in excess of the meal they had just eaten. He crossed over to the counter and set payment down beside the register, then explored past the egress of the dining room to the kitchen. Hiroshi looked up from the intense work of delicately icing a design on a pastry.

"Thanks for the pick-me-up. I left you some money on the counter. Everything's fine, by the way." Jiraiya made his appreciation known, "Also, thanks for entrusting those kids to me. Never got around to finding you and thanking you, did I? I wasn't much to look at back then, but I've cleaned myself up. I hope Haku's brought some joy back into your life."

A hearty chuckle rumbled from Hiroshi, "Like the child I always wanted, he has. Though he came with a few barnacles attached, I guess those oddballs became my friends as well...in their own grumpy ways."

"Heh. I'd love to bring Gaara and Naruto by, sometime."

"My god, they must be a sight..."

"Wait 'til you strike up a conversation with them. Naruto could talk your ear off, unless you stop him. Gaara's more refined these days."

"What are they up to while you are here on these isles?"

And so Jiraiya, who was a gabber much in the way Naruto was, got to chatting with the friendly tea shop owner. The Sage hung around the edge of the door frame, half-in, half-out of the dining room while Zabuza stewed in his seat with his eyes shut. He vacillated between the turmoil of his thoughts and eavesdropping on the gossip.

He peeked an eye open when the entryway chime signaled a new visitor, who barged in mid-way through a rant: "—you can't keep stealing boats and leaving them at docks that aren't yours." Haku was huffing, "Zabuza, move it off of Hasekura-san's—"

Whatever Haku was indignant about, he forgot. There at the far end of the tea shop was Jiraiya making small talk with the kitchen's occupant. Mere paces away, Zabuza was seated at a table, worn down and milder than he usually appeared.

Haku could not negotiate the wild surge of elation and anxiousness that hit him, or deduce the meaning of the gathering before he'd crossed the distance between them. Jiraiya's turn was slow as he beamed at the sight of a handsome young man approaching him, who then sunk into a deep, back-bending bow.

"I've dishonored you." Haku quickly addressed the mea culpa.

Jiraiya raised his eyebrows, "Your detour, you mean? It's no personal offense to me, kid."

"Please accept my apology, Sensei. To you, and to everyone I've neglected."

"Let's call it even." Jiraiya suggested, "I'm sure you weren't served well by an alcoholic escorting you and then dumping you in Hidden Leaf. Did I ever apologize to you about that?" He was smiling, "Don't worry about it, Haku."

Rising up again, he shed the formality and embraced Jiraiya with a squeeze of relief. An affectionate pat started atop Haku's head, middled at his back, and then rubbed a rough circle there. Jiraiya had not forgotten that, of his three diverse pupils, Haku was most inclined to show physical affection. So it was a high-quality, uncommon hug by Jiraiya's standards. They stepped back to look at each other, shiny-eyed.

"Whoa. You are what young manhood longs to look like in fairytales." Jiraiya estimated, "Been busy breaking hearts while you're out here, hm?"

"If so, only my own. I've made many mistakes—"

The Sage waved it off, "Lighten up a little, you don't need to confess your sins to me. But we should sit down and talk for a bit. Zabuza and I finished our discussion."

Dumbfounded, Haku gaped briefly at Zabuza who scooched aside, freeing up a chair for him. Hiroshi poked his face around the doorway's corner, "Welcome back, Haku! I won't need any help today. I think it's best if you catch up."

"Hiroshi-san—"

"Quit gawking and just sit down already." Zabuza gruffed.

He did. Haku took the space beside Zabuza, still marveling at Jiraiya looking so put-together and composed across the table.

"I've left Naruto and Gaara back in Hidden Sand, though I can tell you they desperately wanted to come along for this trip." The Toad Sage announced, "But that scenario was canned as soon as we learned about the Akatsuki's recent attack on the Tide Village. The organization is active again, so I can't let those two travel together…at least not without a heavy escort."

Zabuza sniffed at the explanation, "Why the escort?"

"Because, Zabuza, they are both jinchuriki." Jiraiya pointed a finger in the man's face, "In case you didn't notice when you fought them as children; pretty unusual for kids to tote so much chakra, right? When you got whooped on the great bridge, I'm not sure what you attributed it to. Those are just the facts."

"Both of them?"

Haku nodded, "Yes. I wouldn't want them to needlessly jeopardize themselves. I'll be fine. Tell them I'll come back as soon as—"

Jiraiya then shushed Haku with a hand gesture, "Don't make pledges to them just yet. I have work for you. Only you can do it."

That quieted the young man while Zabuza, again, was boggled by the circumstances of Jiraiya's peculiar trio. It turned out that Zabuza was so surprised by the revelation, that he missed two-thirds of Jiraiya's relaying of "the terms" to Haku.

Haku's ears were tuned into Jiraiya's every word: each detail about the Akatsuki in Mist, what happened to the Tide Village, the objectives, responsibilities, hazards, and Zabuza's own rebellion-funding request via the Keiseki House auction. When Jiraiya came to the projected afterward, when Mist's administration and ruling party turned over into new hands, Haku might be expected to liaise here and there, "But you can live and work in Leaf primarily…or Sand, if you want." Jiraiya detected that his mind was not made up between the two.

"I'm not sure. Is it possible to get clearances for both?" Haku asked.

"Gaara will probably approve the extra paperwork so you can accept missions from either. There's reciprocity between both villages' Medical Corps, if you want to start there. Though you will have to swear allegiance to just one, formally. I ain't gonna tell you which to pick.” Jiraiya assured him.

Excitement was dusted on Haku's face, eyes expressing that his mind was living far ahead of the present—grateful to be an ambassador between the villages of his two dearest friends. As Jiraiya chronicled some current events involving Gaara and Naruto, such as Naruto's success in the Chunin Exam, and Gaara's intent to educate him about civic engagement; Haku was riled. He wanted to see them. To do everything and nothing with them. To get reacquainted with life and friends there.

While Haku prattled about his expectations, Jiraiya was half-listening: he kept an eye on Zabuza. He had been warned by Temari that something was atypical about Zabuza's attachment to Haku. It was evident in the man's posture and nondescript watchfulness. Low-key as it was, he was reacting to Haku's optimism. Steely eyes were trained on the young man, studying him. So there it was, Jiraiya thought, as he witnessed it for himself. Even if Zabuza did not want to play second fiddle to anyone in this lifetime, Jiraiya suspected that he probably would for Haku. Jiraiya logged the furtive response away in his mind, just in case it needed discussing on a later date.

"How about you show me around town for a bit? I noticed that this is a charming place, in spite of its few seedy inhabitants." Jiraiya redirected Haku's babbling, "And you…” He turned to Zabuza, "Read and sign this if you truly agree with what we've laid out." He placed a scroll in front of Zabuza on the table top.

Brooding, Zabuza flicked his eyes down at the contract. He said nothing as Haku led the way out of Hiroshi's tea shop with Jiraiya in tow.

Halfway down the street, Haku observed aloud, "He's furious."

"Oh I know." Jiraiya was unruffled by it.

"How did you avoid a fight with him, Sensei?"

"It was pretty simple, actually. I got here and tried to find you— and couldn't. Had a cup of tea and read a magazine on the corner while waiting. When a few of my toads noticed Zabuza disembark from a boat…” He puffed up with pride, "I conducted a preemptive strike. That sure got his attention."

"I am genuinely shocked." Haku confessed, "And also so glad you did that."

Jiraiya clapped his student on the back, "Anytime. I get the impression he thinks I'm just going to stroll out of here with you and not abide by anything I just told him. In all honesty, I can. I'd like to see that brute try and stop me…” He halted in front of the single neighborhood liquor store on the road, "Oh, this reminds me…meant to pick up Daiginjo while I was out…"

It was only natural to follow Jiraiya as he casually shopped for wine.

"Sensei…you mean to tell me that we're following through on that agreement?" Haku verified.

"Even if we can force our way out of here…that won't do a lick of good in the long run. We need intelligence on the Akatsuki and what's happening in the Land of Water." Jiraiya confirmed, "I meant what I said: I need you to get this done. To protect Naruto and Gaara."

Heartsick, Haku hovered aimlessly between rows of bottles, and snapped out of his thoughts when Jiraiya tucked a bottle of sake in his arms, "Here. I'll get this one for you."

"No thank you, Sensei."
"It's not exactly for you, it's just that you're going to need it in a short while." Jiraiya spoke absently, and if he had a point Haku certainly did not get the message. The boy carried around the unnecessary premium sake as they traipsed two minuscule aisles, and Jiraiya picked out a few vintages for himself.

"I'll be fine, Haku. You're cut out for this sort of work, and you have good instincts. Since no one down here knows who you are, you'll be working with an advantage." The Toad Sage encouraged him as he paid at the register and picked up a new book of matches, "You know who you remind me of?"

Haku's interest was piqued, "Who?"

"My last set— the Fourth Hokage's teammate— Namba. You remind me so much of him." Jiraiya shook his head, fuzzy with nostalgia, "A charmer. Good-looking and intelligent, worked best behind the scenes...he spent much of his time roaming far and wide to resolve crises during war time." Jiraiya recalled as they exited the store, "I had a much closer relationship with Minato...ah, but Namba would show up once in a while to party."

"Did he pass away in the last war?"

"Eh? No!" Jiraiya clacked his geta on the ground, flabbergasted with Haku missing the point again, "He's not dead, Haku. He's still working. Namba is one of my oldest informants, he just doesn't live in Hidden Leaf anymore." He clucked his tongue, "He settled down in Kumogakure and has a family now. Every now and then he picks up a task for Tsunade and I."

"Oh. I see." Haku backtracked, "I'm sorry, I thought you brought it up because—"

"Because...past students of mine aren't exactly plentiful." Jiraiya then muttered under his breath, "That's what I thought."

"Are there other spies you rely on?" Haku was curious about the new role he was entering, "For other regions?"

"Absolutely. An old lady in the Apple Village...a few commercial fisherman based in the Tea Country...a new fella named Sumaru in Hidden Star...Pitekuyo in Hidden Grass..." Jiraiya rubbed his chin, "You and Zabuza, now. And Obito."

"The one who helped in the Tide Village?" He recalled the story that'd been summarized for him.

"Yep. Naruto and Gaara can tell you about him on a later date. He's a sensitive asset."

"Sensitive?"

"Anyways..." Jiraiya changed the subject, "I left some supplies on that footbridge outside town...the one in the forest. Can you pick them up for me? I didn't want to schlep everything here while I was looking out for your esteemed tutor."

Frowning, Haku did not approve of the intentional misdirection, "Did you really leave supplies on a public footbridge where anyone can take them?"

"I really did— hey. Don't snark at me. I get enough of that from Naruto...and Gaara just wouldn't let up back in Suna." The Toad Sage grumbled, "I'm bringing a bottle back to the tea shop as a peace offering. You can find me there."

No further inquiry was conducted once Haku parted from his master with a sigh, turning right off of the main avenue and toward the surrounding forest's treeline. For all of the information Jiraiya could so casually dump on others, Haku was peeved by the withholdings and evasive language he wielded. Better still, he was walking around with an unwanted bottle of sake in the crook of his arm. Because he came all the way here to help me... I feel like I can't decline what Sensei has asked me to do.' When he thought of the magnitude of the assignment, and who it benefitted, refusing was impossible. But more than anything I want to go home. I want to see them...'

At a grassy crossing near the stream, Haku paused and found that he had been hoodwinked. There was no supply bag or travel gear or anything of the sort. The bridge was empty as he set foot on it, What a cheap diversion... He could hardly believe Jiraiya sent him on a goose chase.

Movement in his peripheral vision bade him to turn, and Haku looked out beyond the bridge and upstream, where Temari was water-walking and surveying the bubbling brook. Her back was to him as she kneeled down and plucked a small crustacean from the water, holding it up to her face to examine it. No such thing existed in the desert. The white sheen of her short dress, brightened by the watercolor designs of blue and copper at the shoulders was airy and free. Temari's fan was wrapped up in a blue sash 'round her back and waist.

Seeing her there confirmed, no, Jiraiya had not exactly left supplies behind...though it was still a thoughtful gift. Haku vaulted over the bridge's railing, and his footfalls on the water's surface drew attention. When she saw him, Temari tossed the zarigani back into the stream and hurried to him.

"What?" Temari's voice lifted with satisfaction, "Missed me already?"

"Yes."

"Aww."

He noticed that her hair was fastened with the glistening pin he had sent to appease her. Haku trolled his eyes down to spot that the pilfered, priceless ring sent with it, fitted on the middle finger of her right hand. "Hm. Where did you get those?" He had to tease a little.

"Some lovesick scrub sent them to me."

"He must be rich."

"He's not, but he'll do." She was smiling.

"May I?"

"Yeah."

Unable to wait another solitary second, his hand slid up to the back of her head and drew Temari in for a kiss.

"Hmm." Pleased with the greeting, Temari then usurped the bottle of sake from his grip, "Is this for me? Thanks."

Jiraiya was two for two when it came to gift-giving, Haku noted. He then had to ask, "Temari, why did you come back here?"

"I was in the Tide Village the same time your Sensei was, so I suggested that I accompany him to Nanakusa. In case anything unexpected happened. Though I think he was just being nice…then he filled me in on this plan he wants you to work on." She explained, "And come on, you know why I'm here."

"I have an idea."

They turned back in the direction of town, and Haku only gave half a thought to what could happen if Zabuza and Temari encountered each other again. The swordsman was thoroughly occupied at the moment.

Temari added as they passed through back-end alleys of humble buildings, "Gama-sennin came up with a decent enough strategy…and the results will be valuable…but I'm honestly not feeling good about you spying on Hidden Mist. Or infiltrating it."

"Me neither, though Sensei would say someone has to. Which is true." Haku countered.

"I don't know how trustworthy Momochi is going to be…"

"He'll do what we ask." Haku predicted, "Just not with a smile on his face."

"Uh huh. But what if you're caught, or scrubbed by Mist's Intel Corps after you sneak in?" Temari had a habit of zeroing-in on uncomfortable scenarios.

"…then that'd be terrible."

Her tone was serrated, "Don't let that happen."

"I won't, I won't…" He led her up a flight of stairs toward the flat he shared with Zabuza, "Did the trip here tire you out?"

"Not quite. I had to slow my pace so your Sensei could keep up." She smirked and followed him indoors, slipping her gaze around the modest space of the home. It was a bit more disordered than she remembered: throw blankets and articles of clothing tossed around, empty bottles and shuffled periodicals on the table—not Haku's type of mess-making, she guessed. A pot of stew simmered on the stove top and warmed the air with its aroma.

Sighing happily, Temari set her fan aside, slipping her travel bag from her shoulder, and sank down on the sofa. Haku worked around her to tidy things up, smiling like an idiot.

"It's a mess in here."

"Not my typical standard of living, I must admit." Haku confessed.

"Can I eat whatever's cooking?"

"Of course. It'll be ready soon. I'll make some rice."

"And do you have wine glasses?"

"It's a bit early to—" Haku was interrupted by the sound of the woman unscrewing the bottle's cap, "I'll find some."

"Good. Split this with me."

"I don't like to drink, Temari."
"No? You must not be doing it right." She set her prized sake down on a sitting room table, and folded a stray blanket to make Haku less obsessive-compulsive. Temari then searched cupboards for rice. When she found it, she waved him away, "I'll do it. The cooker's right here. Look through my bag, Haku. I brought some things for you."

Since she clearly knew her way around a kitchen as well as he did, Haku retreated to the sitting area to curiously rummage through the satchel Temari brought with her. He extracted clothing that looked familiar.

"Those are yours." She spoke over her shoulder, "You let me take them when I high-tailed it out of here, last time."

"Ah. That's right." He simpered at how the outfit had been cleaned and folded. Haku set it aside and cheerily carried on the investigation, pulling out a large, narrow gift-box next, "What's this?"

"Open it." Not only did she have the rice going, she also found wine glasses. Temari returned to sit down as Haku lifted the lid free and discovered a dark, metal tessen packaged reverently.

His squirrely gaze went between Temari and the war fan before he raised it up and unfolded it. If he had to estimate, it was nearly 44cm in length; rather plain with the exception of a single white snowflake design etched into the centerfolds. Speechless, he looked at her again while Temari nonchalantly poured wine, unimpressed with her own gift.

"I know you can use Wind Release when you want to, so you can channel it with that." She set a glass down in front of him on a low table, "You can't exactly fly with it either…it's too small. But I felt that it was fair to get you something since you're so fond of sending me tokens."

"Temari…"

She gave him an expectant look as she raised her drink to sniff the aromatics.

"This is excellent." He was thrilled by her thoughtful gesture, "I'm truly not deserving."

"Maybe." Smiling impishly, Temari crossed her legs in a ladylike manner. When she toasted, "To your new job." Haku was compelled to raise his glass and, per the custom, he drank to it. He discovered that the wine was terrifically palatable. He would be partaking after all.

"Before I dive into some Kazekage-mandated directives…" Temari prefaced the discussion to come, "I want you to know: I think we should date."

It took Haku a beat to reply, "We should?"

"I think we did. For like a month."

"Slightly longer than that." He was crestfallen by her shoddy recollection of their courtship.

She shrugged at him and sipped.

"It won't be easy. I'll still be here doing reconnaissance work." Haku reminded her, "And I'm of the opinion you would benefit from someone who can see you more often than once a month."

"Make it twice a month and we have a deal. I can tell you this: I've dated men who I saw every day…and it wasn't so great. Time in quantity is not my primary concern." Temari corrected him, "Contrary to what I may look like right now," Haku observed her and assessed: authoritative, collected, elegant, "I've been the most susceptible to you. I try not to look it, but I don't…feel this
"I know." He understood and was very encouraged, "I've been hopeful…"

"So it's a good idea. That is," Temari concluded with a glint in her eye, "If we're still attracted to each other."

He didn't mean for a hungry look to convey his sincerest answer to Temari's bait, much faster than words could convey his sentiments. Haku was not about to beat himself up over it. She was teasing, after all. She already knew how he felt. She would not have suggested such a thing if she wasn't interested to begin with. He took a few deep breaths and his cooler head prevailed, resolving not to pounce on her even though Temari seemed to be inviting it.

They toasted again to dating because it seemed like the best (stupid) idea thus far. Temari's self-congratulatory snickering included mumblings about a hot boyfriend and emotional intelligence. She then retrieved a manila folder from her bag and handed it to Haku, "Here. Gaara wants you to have this information on the Akatsuki that he and the Hokage have compiled. We'll want you to add to it and fill in the blanks."

Right away, Haku came across a detail that curdled his stomach. Page one indicated the objectives of the organization, and the next page displayed the identifying uniform of Akatsuki members which, until that moment, Haku had not given much consideration, "This cloak…"

"Yeah…?"

He recalled his travels beyond the Land of Water, through the Land of Snow and back again. Haku locked eyes with her, "I remember meeting a shinobi who wore this."

"You met one of the Akatsuki?"

"Yes, on peaceful terms."

"How?" Temari was disconcerted.

"While I was traveling south to the Land of Snow, on a stopover island. It was a woman. I'm not sure how old…forty? She was beautiful and had blue hair. She was wearing this." Haku indicated the file's stock photo of the Akatsuki cloak, "She seemed to be in charge of subordinates and…she was traveling with a partner."

"That's not good." A tinge of suspicion crept into Temari's voice, "And what were you doing with some strange woman?"

"I was trapped by the Cursed Seal of Heaven." Haku rubbed his neck tenderly, fearful just thinking about it, "I haven't used it since…but I was attacked by someone who was sent by Orochimaru. I couldn't shed my Cursed Seal form after a seal-tag was stuck to me. This woman helped get it off of me when all else failed."

Leaning back into sofa cushion, Temari sipped sake and noodled on the tale.

"She can control paper." Haku recalled as much as he could, "And she was not hostile towards me. Which would be unusual for an Akatsuki member, no?"

"Maybe not. Some of them might be more level-headed." She then ventured, "By any chance, was it a Rain ninja?"
Confused as to how she could guess correctly, Haku confirmed, "She was."

"Hmm. Gama-sennin said he's worried that the Akatsuki may have a base of operations in Hidden Rain." Temari informed him, "I guess he's on the right track."

"I'll have to talk to Sensei about it." Haku supposed as he flipped through the file. It took some time to sift through it, and he was boggled by an extensive section on the one called "Pein" that had been compiled from various reports.

They took a break to eat a late lunch, glad not to be disturbed by Zabuza, Jiraiya, or any of Nanakusa's inhabitants. Between their combined efforts, most of the Daiginjo had been consumed by the end of the meal. Too sloppy and buzzed to clean properly, Haku committed heresy by leaving dirty bowls in the sink with no intention of washing them. He toddled back to the couch to stretch out on it lengthwise, and the trickle of his thoughts concerning Hidden Mist and spying on the Akatsuki halted altogether when Temari overlapped herself with him. Her cuddling was welcome. They were a sedate sort of drunk.

"Good food."

"Thank you."

"Did we leave any for that douchebag?"

"Yes." Haku thought so, at least.

"Hmf."

An edge of worry in his voice, "Are you leaving tomorrow?"

"I have to. Gama-sennin and I can't stay."

"You can stay."

"Not for another bloodbath. I'm taking a risk getting drunk and being defenseless here of all places." She chuckled at her brashness.

"I'll protect you." By that, he meant he would gladly kill Zabuza if he so much as stepped in her direction.

"I know." She yawned, "I think…we should wait before Gaara finds out."

"About us?"

"Yeah."

"Give it a week." Haku suggested.

She shook her head, "Two weeks, at least. He has hissy fits like you wouldn't believe when the subject comes up…"

"Alright." He let his eyes drift shut for a superb, fuzzy feeling of impending sleep, "I don't want…him to be angry."

Her head was heavy on his shoulder, "He shouldn't be, y'know. He knows that you love me, and that I love you. Gaara's got issues."
That procured a sharp snort of laughter from Haku that subsided back into his half-conscious state.

"He said he's upset that he let you go. He wanted your support when he went through all the shit in the beginning for Kazekage candidacy." Temari went on after another long yawn, "But he knows me well. I think he's just fucked up about knowing I want to do you."

Haku woke up slightly, "...is...that why...?"

Her languid position seemed more purposeful to him than it had moments ago. The way her leg draped over his, the slow exploration of her free hand over his shirt was almost beneath his notice. A flighty sensation pattered in his chest. Haku could feel her warm breath against his neck, and it was difficult to concentrate on anything else.

"Mmm." She shared her perspective on the matter, "You're too gentle and innocent." Temari could only communicate in sleepy mutters, "Virtuous people are— psh. What am I supposed to do? I've got to...handle you with kid gloves. Treat you super well. It's weird and scary."

Those observations were muddled, so Haku asked, "...what's weird and scary?"

"Not being...cavalier about it. I always was." Temari's cheek bunched as she curled into him, "I don't want to hurt you. It'll sit on my conscience if I did."

"Even if you do, I hold no grudges. And how fragile do you think I am?" Really, Haku thought, how much physical or emotional damage could she inflict?

"You are." Temari insisted, "Fragile. Better said; naïve, inexperienced. Have you ever let a woman prey on your insecurities or maltreat you before? Doesn't seem like it. That was one of my habits when it came to past guys." She added, "They kind of deserved it, though."

"Well, try not to maltreat me or abuse my insecurities." He was amused by her locution.

"Try is the operative word."

"I have faith that you mean well." He wasn't going to worry about possible disagreements. Mature communication was one of his prided extracurricular activities.

"You..." Bemused, Temari tilted her head up to glimpse him, "Why are you like that?"

"Like what?"

"You might've noticed, but your two best pals can get very hot-blooded and melodramatic."

"So can I."

She scrunched her face, "Right. But you're on a different wavelength than they are. Less bull-headed."

"I am not sure how you are measuring that quality in us. You sound biased." Haku accused.

"From what I do know, you've never been overtly masculine." Temari brought up a buzz word that Haku heard rather frequently, "Not like them. You know what I'm talking about. See, you're still a guy...but you have capacities others don't."

"Feminine capacities, you mean?" He tried to interpret where she was going with the topic.

"Would you call it that?"
"I understand what you mean, and frankly, it doesn't matter to me what it's called. Society wants to classify recreation, work, and behavior by gender roles so badly...but those classifications never did suit me." Haku smiled a little, "I might like and do many things women generally do, true, though I'm no poorer for it. While I grew up in Hidden Leaf, no one was pressuring me to be a certain way. Naruto and Gaara always accepted me as I am."

She settled her head back to relax, "Yeah, they're all about acceptance."

"They are. I've been free to express myself however I want. I'm sure others in this world haven't been as fortunate."

"So identity-wise, does it matter?" Temari rolled to adjust herself front-to-front with him, "I'm genuinely curious. It's not like I could interview you about your sexuality before this."

"Oh, so you're asking?"

"Inquiring minds want to know. I'm a woman and reasonably sure I appeal to you...but how do I fit into your preferences?" Her eyes were narrowed playfully. There was no judgement in them.

"I..." His eyes traced the ceiling and then peeked down at her, "Think..."

"Hm?"

"All." Haku said finally, "I like everything."

"I had a feeling."

"That's not to say I've met a man I like. I haven't." He added candidly, "But I could, I know that. So far I've preferred girls...it must be the mental chemistry."

"Pff. What are you doing with me, then?" She joked.

"I want to chase you. You've always challenged me to be better, braver." He was poetic, "You are beautiful in form and thought. It's hard to resist."

"Who knew I could be loved for my brain too? For a while I thought it was just being blonde and having B+ curves."

"That grade is more of an A-.."

Temari flicked his chin in annoyance, "I'll grade myself, thank you very much."

Chuckling contently, Haku played with her plaited hair and shut his eyes again.

After a yawn she wondered out loud, "Maybe it will feel good...with someone I really like."

He got fidgety again. Her casual way of expressing her intentions rattled him. Temari was interested, there was no mistaking that. If he was honest, Haku would admit that he could never rebuff such advances and would most likely enjoy them. But at present he was drunk, sleepy, and in no physical condition to impress. He was melding with the couch. His best cautionary tagline was, "It's much too soon for what you're asking."

She squashed that train of thought, "Don't get all hot and bothered, Haku. I need a nap." As good as her word, Temari was asleep after a few minutes.

Haku estimated that he only dozed off for ten minutes at most, but when his eyes batted open again the sun was setting beyond the window. And Zabuza was standing over the room's table after he had just gotten back from negotiations with Jiraiya, as tense as a tiger fit to spring on a cornered deer. Haku was not precisely sure how long the swordsman had been standing there— how long he had chosen to fester over Temari's unannounced visit. Haku sidled free from beneath the sleeping kunoichi, and rose groggily to his feet.

"Since I've been fucked back to front today in terms of free will, you had better get this bitch out of here before I collect her head." Zabuza warned. His face was uncovered and plainly irate, veins protruding from his neck.

"You didn't have to agree to anything Sensei proposed, you know." Haku reminded him, resting his hand gently on Temari's shoulder to stir her.

"I had no choice. There's no sense in declining the offer for reinforcements. But I pay either way." When Zabuza came nearer, Haku stepped forward as well, bodily barring him from approaching, "You really let that witch come back here?"

Awake and sitting up, Temari groused, "I can hear you."

"Leave."

She rubbed the crust from her eyes and did not grace Zabuza with a retort.

"If your verbal abuse is anything to go by, you've had a difficult day." Haku granted him that, "So we'll both leave. Try to relax. There's stew if you want it."

"And go where?" The swordsman wanted to keep a short leash.

"Why does that matter? Did Sensei ask to see me?"

"In the morning. He's spending the night at Roundy's place."

Roughly translated, Haku worked out that Jiraiya would probably be dining at the tea house and stay as a guest in Hiroshi's home. Unlike Temari, who had gathered her bag and fan to see herself out of the flat, Haku was marginally compelled to protest against Zabuza's spiteful banishment. If this was the only instance within which Zabuza could assert himself, and Jiraiya touted that the power balance was now to shift in Haku's favor— the young man was more inclined to put the brute in his place. He could've argued until the sun came up, but whoa, Temari was well out the door and pressing on.

He gathered his war fan from the coffee table while watching Zabuza, "Tomorrow, then." Haku left and clicked the flat's door shut behind him. The goal for the night would be for Zabuza to meditate on and accept his new position. Only Heaven knew if he could.

The pair hopped over to the next rooftop, observing a sunset that was every shade of a sherbet dessert. Temari spun the flat bottom of her fan beneath her palm against the gable she stood on. Without speaking, they lingered as the island's cricket songs gradually intensified.

"Shall we go talk to Sensei?" Haku broke the silence with a sensible offer, "I can arrange for you to stay with Hiroshi-san as well."

"No need. I don't want to be involved in any strategy discussions while I'm drunk." As Temari tottered eastbound and somehow cleared the gaps between buildings, Haku worriedly tailed after her.

"-careful—"
"I won't fall."

"Where are you going?" He stifled a burp. He was not sure where else to go if not Hiroshi's residence, or possibly convince the landlord who housed Raiga and Ranmaru down the road to let them stay for the night.

"Here." Temari landed and slid on the truss of a tall house, prying open an unlatched window. Haku swayed beside her, but he caught himself while batting at her hands, "What are you doing? You can't just break into someone's house-!"

"I didn't break anything. And we've been here before." Unconcerned, she swung the panel open and clumsily heaved herself through. Her fan stuck on the jamb so she returned to pull it free. Stomach swirling, Haku glanced around and realized that it was the office/house that belonged to Migawari. The retiree medic-nin was currently on the other side of town to gamble the night away with Oguni-san and other old gamesters. Haku half-fell into the top level room, which had recently been dusted. The lack of cobwebs was remarkable, 'He must have put Ranmaru up to cleaning…'

Temari set her belongings down on an upholstered bench, then grandly stretched her arms over her head. She watched Haku scuttle downstairs quickly to explore the house, shouting back up to her, "This is breaking and entering—"

"He's not here?" She gathered. Temari turned her ear toward the doorway of the room, hearing only drunken bumbling downstairs. No. The medic-nin who resided here was probably out. Triumphant, Temari laid cross-wise on the room's bed and yawned. She had to sleep off the sake and stew. Eventually Haku returned with a tray, noticed there was no space for it on the cluttered bureau, and so he settled on the wood floor, clacking the tea platter down. Dizzy, he sat down cross-legged beside it and poured himself a cup of tea, "Temari, get off that bed. You are an intruder in this house."

"Says the one who's stealing an old man's tea set."

"I'm not an intruder. I am an employee in this office, and I'm permitted to make tea." Haku defended, then he noted in an afterthought, "I have a stomach ache."

"Because you are needlessly worrying about stuff." Temari assessed, unmoving.

"I shouldn't have—"

"The sake didn't make you sick. That wasn't low-grade swill we were drinking." She disarmed his complaints.

He sat there and sipped ginger tea, which was the exact prescription for his malady. Yes. It was the worry, not the alcohol. Haku relaxed slightly, and gave up on being cross with his girlfriend as she laughed like a kookaburra nearby. Mischief delighted her, he already knew this. As he was not exactly a purveyor of mischief, Haku had to get his kicks by indulging in it vicariously. He poured another cup of tea and struggled across the floor. Temari slid down from the mattresses' edge and took the outstretched drink.

She had to fight back ongoing chuckles.

"Is this really funny to you? It won't be when we get caught." Haku warned, but he couldn't suppress a contradictory smile.
"He's not gonna care if we don't mess anything up. All I want…” She leaned her head back and stretched her legs out in front of her primly, "Is to not get killed by Momochi, and have some alone time with you. Then it's back to Suna and back to work." She took a noisy sip of tea.

"Back to work." He echoed with a sigh. Back to risking his life in strange places, among strange people. The payoff could be substantial, but Haku hesitated to get his hopes up.

"Blech, this tea is not my favorite." Temari poured more for herself, "But if it keeps that stew from biting back— bottoms up…"

Haku shimmied around the tray to sit side-by-side with the woman propped up against the bed. He admitted that on a few past missions with Zabuza, they had broken and entered into spaces with malicious intent, "So I suppose this pales in comparison…"

"It really does." She leaned her head against his shoulder, "Hey. Do you like my dress?"

"It's lovely."

"I got it in the Tide Village. A bit of a departure from my usual colors."

"And those are?"

"Burnt reds. Black. Navy."

"Fearless colors." Haku assessed.

"Is that what they mean?" She gulped down another pungent cup of stomach-soothing tea, "And you, in blue."

"Always blue." He confirmed.

Temari set the cup down on the tray and sat back again, "Why?"

"To remember." Haku told her, "It's the color of fidelity."

As she sat there and pondered the soft look on his face, a memory from her Genin days sifted up from the annals of her memory. When she had been a rather lonely, brusque child at the time— she recalled what it had been like to feel the first monumental push of air raise her skyward, when at last her proficiency for Wind Release lent her fan the gift of flight. A miracle of her own making. It was freedom and fear and satisfaction. The new frontier she would master for missions and battles. But above all, Temari remembered how nothing had ever felt like that again. Not the hundreds of times she took flight afterward, not her achievements, friendships, trysts or anything else could replicate that joy… Though this did. Being with him felt just like it.

'The sky.' She shut her eyes and thought that, ah, so it too reflected his color. The hue that mattered most to him. Flying home tomorrow, it would be all she could think about. Always, he'd said. Steadfast and beautiful. A vast sea.

If she could open up his head to ascertain what Haku was thinking about, she was sure the reflection would be there too. All of the same feelings. This sentimental mush she was thinking about— that she worked to suppress most days…he emitted it non-stop like a heat lamp. Though fuzzy-brained and in a stranger's home, she gladly tilted her head to reach him when he moved to kiss her. His fingertips pressed softly against the side of her face. It was a slow kiss. Temari leaned into him and enjoyed everything about it, then broke it off suddenly.
Haku watched with wide, fretful eyes when she climbed away from him, ascending to the bed and flopping down, "Get up here. Sitting there was killing my back."

Part of him knew that she had cast a line expecting him to bite. She was very good at this, so of course he wasn't going to ignore her request even if he had an idea of where it could go. Haku followed after her and reclined, noticing how the last rays of sunset cast his shadow over her as she laid parallel to him. Temari was sighing, "Ah, that's better."

"I don't suppose you intend to stay the night here?" He correctly guessed.

"Will your Medic-nin pal even notice we're up here in this dustbowl?"

"No, but I don't want to abuse his trust."

"Then," Temari scooched closer and fiddled with the neckline of his tunic, "Send me to that tea house to sleep, next door to your perv Sensei."

"In spite of Sensei's old pastimes and favorite literary genre, I can promise you he's quite respectful. Of anyone he knows well, at any rate." Haku countered with a small smile.

"Yeah, Gaara and Naruto told me that too." She rose up groggily, "Well, I'll go. A cold, empty bed works for me… I can hug a pillow."

Before she rose completely, Haku tugged her back down, slightly annoyed with her theatrics.

"Make up your mind you rulebook-thumper." Fighting back her grin, Temari settled again.

Haku palmed her shoulder to give her a small shake, "How would you feel if a drunk hooligan couple invaded your home while you were out, and desecrated one of the spare rooms of your house?"

She beamed, "Wow!"

"No, no. 'Wow' is not the correct—"

"I don't know anyone in Suna that bold, so I'd be impressed."

Harried, Haku painted a clearer picture, "You wouldn't. Think of it: mid-act. No regard for law or common decency."

"Gaara would probably find them first, honestly. Then he'd smother them with sand."

Her wild chuckling got him going for a second, but Haku tried to shake it off. He gave up on trying to persuade her to leave, and instead let his hand travel down the slope of her shoulder to the column of her neck. He wore a pensive look as he touched the soft skin there.

"What?" She was aware of how fraught he was.

"When I first met you, I didn't trust you. I even wanted to…" Tripping over his words, Haku got on with it, "I wanted to hurt you." He found the spot he had struck with senbon needles, rendering her helpless in a past duel, "I'm sorry."

"It's fine. You were trying to protect Gaara. How could you have known my actual intentions? And besides, I did participate in Leaf's invasion, however reluctant my involvement was." She confessed guilt with ease, "You were right not to trust me. I could've gotten my baby brother killed by going along with my superior's idiotic plans."
"That still doesn't make me feel justified." He murmured against her forehead.

"I appreciate that you came at me with no mercy. It made sense. You did what you had to. You were someone I could trust, given the circumstances." She tapped a tune against his knuckles, knowing the site of her old injury still bothered him, "No hard feelings here."

"Yes, there are." Haku disagreed.

This was news to her, so she raised her eyebrows at him.

"I left." He reminded her.

"Ah." She still felt lingering frustration over that fact; he knew it as well as she did, "You left."

He could not speak out loud about the disastrous mistake and its cost, though she could read it all in his eyes. What he sought to do had been utterly obstructed, his time and effort had been extorted, his life threatened repeatedly, and those who truly depended on him were left to wait and wonder. Their pain was what shamed him the most. Gaara and Naruto's pain, and hers.

"Still…" She tipped her head up to brush her lips over his brow, "No hard feelings."

"If I had stayed…"

"There's no point in speculating, is there?" Temari thwarted his contemplation, "Because you were down here mixing with the wrong crowd, it provided an opportunity. What could you do against the Akatsuki in Kirigakure if you were some clueless Medical Corps officer in Hidden Sand?"

"Something, I'm sure." He smiled wanly.

"You might've gone soft, living safely among friends…gotten weak or complacent. Imagine: Things between us might've gotten dull, and I might've dumped you if you'd stayed."

Haku was amused, "Weren't you the one who said there's no point in speculating?"

"Oh yeah."

Sometime between drinking ginger tea and curling up on the bed, the dark of nightfall overtook the room. A tranquil lull kept them from overreacting to Temari's suggestion that Zabuza could stop by later to kill them, if his mood didn't improve. Haku would not write off the risk, but he yawned and supposed, "He probably won't."

"Spoken like someone who really knows the guy."

"Better than anyone…and that's not saying much." An afterthought dawned on Haku, "Oh. I never fed Pua."

"Can't she feed herself? You let that rabbit roam free." Temari pointed out.

"She can graze, yes, but she makes trouble in this neighborhood. Pua will go door to door begging if I don't feed her." Haku sighed, "She may be cute, but she is a glutton the likes of which I've never seen. I've had reports on how bad her food thievery gets around here."

She snickered, "You're raising a monster."

"A small one."
"Hmm. Before I forget, I wanted to tell you…” Drowsily, Temari traced her fingers along his arms and front, tugging at the opening of his tunic, "I bought a place in the Tide Village, so you can meet me there when you have time off. You know, like a halfway point."

"You bought a house?"

"With my hard-earned money, that's right." Temari took pride in the announcement, "I've had it for a little while already. Just a small beach cabin. I couldn't believe it was undamaged after the recent attack when I went to check it. Phew. What a relief…"

Haku did not bat an eyelash as she slid half of his gi down, hooking a fabric belt with her pinky to undo the tie at his waist. He noted, "You weren't going to tell me you invested in a vacation home."

"No. I was still angry at you, at the time." Temari confirmed.

"How generous of you to invite me." His smile had a satisfied feline quality to it.

"It's not like I put a welcome mat on the front step for you…” She pulled the unknotted sash free, somewhat surprised that he shrugged off his open shirt just like she wanted, "And…I'm not keeping an…extra toothbrush around…"

"Right, I understand. You wouldn't want me to mistakenly get comfortable in any home of yours."

Haku watched her survey the landscape of his chest and shoulders with her hands, dipping down his abdomen toward his waist, which felt much nicer than personal attentions he paid himself on lonely days. She idled over the brutal scar below his ribcage, where a strike from the Chidori had run him through.

As delightful as Temari's expert touches were, she was still a bit too daring for his livewire nerves. His wish for a gradual introduction was more or less lost on her. This he gathered once she slipped free of her white sheath dress so swiftly it could have been a magician's trick.

Balking, words failed as he sat up, face-to-face with a woman kneeling in her underclothes. Temari plucked the hair pin and ties from her tresses, shaking her hair loose, "I don't know about you, but I don't sleep in clothes when I have the choice."

A gulp, "Ah. Good to know."

With a stretch, she reached the edge of a bedside table to set her finery down, and sort of flung her white dress into the darkness of the room. Temari then lowered herself front-ways onto the mattress, and mashed her face into a pillow. If he wasn't mistaken, it was as if she was trying to give him space. Haku's gaze may have lingered a second too long on the skintight, café-colored shorts on her impeccably round bottom.

"Relax." Her command was muffled by the pillow.

"I am." He laid back and uh, no, he wasn't exactly relaxed.

"I wanted to touch you, but it seemed to freak you out." Oh, so she'd noticed. Temari told him, "You're interested, and also not interested…so I'll err on the side of caution and leave you be."

"I'm not sure that I want you to—" Haku clarified while staring at the ceiling's wooden beams, "To leave me be, I mean."

She rotated her face to glimpse him from the corner of her eye, "I don't do things to people who aren't sure."
"What I mean is, I want to, but I don't know what I want." He was clearer with the issue, "I don't know anything about this."

"…hm." She rolled her shoulders and turned her face away again, "Sleep."

After that she was quiet, her back rising and falling slowly as she took calming breaths. Haku felt strangely sidelined by the dismissal.

It was not news to him that she'd gone out and gotten plenty of experience during their time apart, and he didn't need the numbers or specifics. Likewise, in spite of his knowledge of the body and physiology, Haku had been in no hurry to apply that education in pursuit of pleasure. Yet from what she'd said, Temari had gleaned her most valuable lessons from the failure of connection. The irrelevance of intimacy in her dating environment had made her forsake men like that. Neither did she quite know how to coach a tender-hearted neophyte, Haku supposed. Even if she couldn't figure out how to progress things, she refused to pressure him into anything.

For such demanding a person, Temari was remarkably attuned to the feelings of others. He smiled to himself, gliding a finger down the span of her bare back, noticing a minuscule twitch of muscle. She otherwise did not react. Haku shifted nearer on his side, tracing an ellipse over her skin with his fingertips. The orbit narrowed at the nape of her neck and widened at the base of her spine. If there had ever been something so exquisite to look at and feel, he'd certainly never found it. He edged closer to feel the heat of skin against skin.

Haku spoke softly in the dark, "I don't want you to leave."

Temari's weak affirmative mumble acknowledged how he felt. Her conscious mind teetered on the edge of sleep, even though she was silently preoccupied by his migrating hand along her back and neck.

He then said, "Or…it's more like I don't want to stay here. To do all of this."

"…who could…blame you?" She pressed into him more, savoring the touches, "That kind of work sucks."

Yes. It was going to be dismal, borderline thankless work. But the way Temari aligned herself against his front, golden hair furling off the edge of a pillow; she would be thanks enough for now. The last vestiges of hesitation slipped away from Haku, because there was no denying a neck so perfect, and to not put his lips there and taste dwindling sunlight on her skin. He heard the small sound she made and felt his blood get hot. Oh. Oh. It was not nearly as intimidating as he first thought; getting close to her. Perhaps her lowered guard and lake-calm state had helped. Temari had a sense of what enticed him.

###

His kisses drifted northward, where there was delicate skin behind her ears, and then down again over downy tufts of blonde hair. She smelled so vibrant and alive, like yuzu and peony and wind.

"Watch where…you put that hand." Temari's throaty warning snapped his attention back to a most inquisitive palm, which had found the curve where her thigh and bottom met. Before Haku could contritely relocate, she rubbed her backside into him, amused, "Good. You looked." She explained, "I'm joking. Thought I'd have to bribe you to touch me like that…"

"Temari…" On the inhaling breath, his voice rasped, which was a first to Haku's ears. "Don't confuse me." He moved his hand anyway, but slid it over her hip and up her strong stomach.
His memory was still fresh with the day Temari had been injured. It was hard to linger on the thought. It stung to remember how narrowly she had avoided death; the blood—how it stole his breath and made him wince. When Haku thought of how vulnerable she had been, lying naked and unconscious in his arms, the sight was burned into the back of his eyes. Though, at the time he'd been overcome with horror and panic. There had been no element of attraction nor untoward advance, not while she was blood-splattered and frail. Maybe it was wrong to have that incident as a frame of reference? For what he was doing now? Maybe he was a degenerate for recalling it at all, or to be excited by what he'd seen?

After all, he'd come to a conclusion some weeks ago that he was not, in fact, good. The revelation snuck up on him, but Haku processed the facts as they turned over in his head, certifying that really he just acted as if he were principled. He was an actor. A fine one. Prudent and honorable to the bare, untrained eye. This was his best friend's sister. What decent man did this sort of thing?

Haku rolled onto his back to grapple with the thought, staring upward and inhaling deeply. 'I still want to.' He was undaunted. If at some point he'd fully embraced being a dirty, envious, promise-breaking assassin type who dabbled part-time as a healer for some shabby cover— to veil what he'd actually become…he couldn't take it back.

Why should he? Haku smiled wryly to himself. Temari seemed to like what he was. Whatever he was. No, he wasn't going to reverse his course. To correct these transgressions or abruptly comport himself like a saint. When he turned again onto his side and wound his arms around Temari, she felt the difference. His mind was made up. So she melted into him with a sigh, more responsive than before, her back still warm against the front of his body. Haku traced a finger below her chin, down her neck, through the valley of her chest, the plane of her stomach. Everything about her lit his senses.

"That's…nice," Temari was muttering, "You don't feel nervous now, huh?"

He removed his lips from her neck for a single word, "No."

"-ah." She was feeling clearer after having tea. And jittery.

Haku had set the starting line high on her body, his lips toying with her earlobe, hands fiddling mindlessly with the front closure between her breasts. Intermingled with the heady feeling was a dash of frustration, Temari found, since she couldn't really get her hands on the strong body curved splendidly behind her. The most she could manage was to reach her arm back and feel Haku's smooth, unbound hair slide between her fingers. If she ground into the erection pressed against her bottom any more, she'd probably shove him clean off the bed. It was tougher than she thought to exercise self-restraint. As for Haku, he seemed to be innately suited for such gentle, electric attentions…but hell if he could ever figure out how to open a bra. She'd have to wait for her watch to strike never O'clock.

All along her skin, descending down between her shoulder blades, he was whispering, "Don't go without showing me…without touching me—" Peppering kisses along the way, he rolled his hips into her to feel the stellar pleasure halted only by a thin buffer of fabric, "-Temari." She had shrugged out of her unhooked bodice, a courtesy, and then placed her hand on his to direct it south along her waist. In a practiced motion, Temari slid his hand beneath the band of her shorts. They bunched before slipping free and down her hips. Haku trained his gaze on the bloom of pale, undressed skin.

"...I'm not a passive player." She issued a warning as she rolled onto her back, bare beneath his eyes, "You want to. Right?"

Fuddled and staring, it took several seconds for Haku to form a reply, "Very much."
To that, Temari rolled over to her hands and knees, setting her mouth on the smooth planes of his body. He was not tense—not like before. Eyelids fluttering, Haku felt her nip at the trapezius muscle at the intersection of his neck and shoulder, her fingertips drumming down his pectorals and stomach. Touching her was a frantic matter, the kisses short and teasing his patience. She faltered slightly when his attentions converged at her chest, palming the rounds of her breasts. Temari's whine and grinding against his groin was an equal distraction.

Restless for instruction, Haku slowed down to ask, "What do you like? I'll do it."

"We're getting to that." She was occupied by divesting him of pants, pulling them down and free with a helpful shimmy of his hips, "There. That's an improvement. Huh." Temari scratched a fingernail down the sable trail of hair middling his stomach, fine and byssine, "You know, I didn't expect any hair to be on you." His muscles jolted under her touch, eyes trained on her face, "Not after finding those three measly hairs on your chest."

"Don't understate." A breathy admonishment.

"Okay. Eight or nine." She pawed at him, scanning her eyes down again, "You've got a little star right here." Temari poked at the down around his belly button, "I almost want to turn the lights on to get a better look."

"You can if you want to be caught red-handed."

"No one can see my hands when it's this dark." Her smile was sly and almost audible, lowering herself to be front-to-front with Haku, "Neck again, please." He tipped his head back to present it to her, and she scaled the smooth column with her lips up to his jawline. Dizzy, he could only rub himself against her stomach and knead her back like a cat, hoping, praying for some relief.

Temari angled to level her chest with his face, resettling his hands on her backside while she hovered over him, "This is something I like, so start here. I want a lot of attention—" Her announcement crumbled apart when he took the offering in his mouth, hands boldly studying her.

Silk made flesh, like fragrant petals beneath his lips. Oh why had he ever shied away from this? It'd only ever been presented to him in the most obscene, unwelcome of ways—how Zabuza could partake of such a ritual, wholly impartial and unemotional.

If he had to share his opinion on the matter, Haku was now sure that the cardinal appeal of sex was the other person. Not himself. What did she feel when he tasted her like this? When his mouth roamed? It was so good, but her soft mewls made it better, made it all make sense. When solitary nights were too much to bear on occasion, his brain and his hand were enough. Yet this sweet, pliant body he tasted; rolling a budded nipple along his tongue, soft brushes and sounds... There had never been a temptation like this before. He was going to burst before long.

Fidgeting and murmuring, Temari raked her nails along his scalp and folded into his nuzzling licks. When it crossed her mind, she repositioned his hands where she wanted them to guide his caresses. After a while his mouth carried on to explore parts undiscovered, and Temari obliged his travels. Even though he only merited a scant few words of encouragement or hums, the performance echoed in his blood, boiled with longing. It didn't matter what he did so long as she wanted him to. Well. Haku wanted something for himself, but Temari was not keen on giving him much beyond stray touches.

Their bodies flattened after a while and she tested him, finding nerves along his chest and flanks, down the trail of stomach hair she'd complimented. Temari made all of him sing. What a devil she was. Death might take him soon; the withering thought in Haku's bloodless head panged, so hungry to slip past the wetness between her legs. He'd never endured such a pressure, nor the radical softness waxing all along his body. While he braced her thighs with wide-splayed palms, Temari nearly undid him by slicking along his length with the most subtle buck of her hips. He wanted to kiss the grin off of her face and beg, but she spoke first, "Haku."

Now. Yes, of course now. She was too crafty and skilled for her own good. There ought to be a shrine constructed in her honor and he'd pay tribute there daily. Her next words had to unscramble in his ears: "You can't go inside. I'm not going to let you do that."

And thus his faculties splintered while nodding to her in acknowledgment. Haku was further tormented when Temari stamped a wet patch on his leg, curved over him while determinedly kissing his mouth. No, oh no, it was no good to lay vulnerably and let her continue to tease after establishing such a limitation. He'd want in. That option was off the table.

"I won't." Haku rose up from beneath her, taking the top as she was spilled to her back, and he pinned her wrists above her head, "We can do whatever you want."

"Ah, good, but was that something you wanted?" Even breathless from his kisses, Temari was still impish. She knew full well how hard he was since she had not stopped rubbing against him.

Reassembling some of the shattered expectation of a minute ago, Haku told her, "Yes. But it can wait. Especially if you say so."

"Especially if I do." She agreed, wriggling her hand free, "Here. I need this." She brought her fingertips down to the slip of skin cowering his length, "Though...you know I still want you to cross the finish line, don't you? Whoa now," Haku thrashed at the touch, "Relax. Get down lower on your knees, it's alright. I have you."

Easing down to nearly overlap with her, he took a rickety breath, his hands seeking the sides of Temari's face and neck. He kissed her bottom lip and felt his body aching. Since when were there so many nerves to dynamize him? Were they always there? No, it must've been that another's touch bears a certain degree of magic his own can't. That was it. But then, when a bold swirl of her fingers overwhelmed his exposed tip, Haku's hackles raised at the discomfort. It was supposed to feel good, but that didn't, so he had to mutter the admission.

"I see, no, don't sulk—I need you to tell me." Temari rearranged her hand, borrowing a bit of loose prepuce to slide between her fingertips and the sensitive bulb, rolling down so slowly and getting it right, yes, that was better. Down, firmer; then the pad of her thumb so knowingly zeroed-in on the underside nerves that felt so good. Haku bowed his head to rest at the curve of her neck, small puffs of sound escaping him as he exhaled. Her free hand migrated to the small of his back, independent of her working hand.

Stopping the short bucks of his hips was not possible by then, and really, she adapted well to that pace with her strokes—equal parts talent and cue-reading. Haku's kisses along her neck were wet and decadent, interspersed with clipped moans. Temari had reliable reference notes from past hay-rolling. How fortunate for him; the idea eclipsed any remnant of jealousy that lingered in his gut. She slid the tissue with precision up and down, with an exact firmness and surety that allowed her to wander, kiss his temple, and notice other things about him while she endeavored. A few stray droplets of his dewed on her stomach.

Haku estimated he could endure the contact for a while more if she let up just a bit, and he wanted to recommend it so he could extend the sublime buzz of sensation...but Temari's right hand descended past the buttock she was squeezing, lightly skimming her nails along his thighs. By then every exhale of his was laced with breathy, astounded mutters, and it made her bold. Temari's touch traveled lower, stroking glands tightened by oversensitivity. He shook with a groan that was much too loud for a house intruder to get away with. Try as he might to nudge her, Temari did not withdraw her supplementing hand. It was too much. The feeling. He bit her shoulder and even then she did not relent. She kept pace, rubbing and prodding.

So words would have to do, somehow, "Temari, please don't—"

Her hand retreated from his underside, "Sorry. Was that no good?"

"It was…" He kissed the spot where his teeth had nearly broken her skin, "—felt…I-I can't…" Haku was less eloquent, not that she'd fault him for it.

"Nearly there?" Temari understood, "Just a second." Like a luge athlete she slipped below him, between the bracket of his legs, and gripped his bottom to bring him closer to her face. He yelped in surprise, then hissed when she acquainted her mouth with his erection. She misunderstood! his fried brain insisted. He wanted to prolong this, not expedite it. But if he asked her not to play at the rim of skin with her tongue, or disregard how she took him in so skillfully, he would have to be certified insane. If he lasted for more than three of her masterful bobs he could never know. Haku's arms were ramrod straight on the bed, holding himself in a near Cobra pose out of necessity, his neck craned to look down at her out of desperation.

And when Temari's eyes flicked up at him, so self-assured and greedy for what she was doing, that was all. Haku could bear no more. A slight bend in his arms and hunch of his shoulders helped brace him, gasping. He paid close attention to his shudders as he came, the spike of pleasure needling his core. He had to look at her face while feeling the slick of her tongue still working, and she gradually drew her lips further back with each throb. As an aesthete, Haku had to appreciate her grace while she freed him from her mouth. She concluded the act with the most perfect tongue flick as to not waste what remained at the tip. Temari held his stare while he tried to survive the full-tilt pounding of his heart.

Steady as a noodle, Haku then keened sideways and reached to caress her face. For a moment he was shocked that she swallowed the proceeds of that transaction. Temari patted his hand against her cheek as she settled on her side, "Hm. Not bad. Kind of an unexpected volume, but I guess you haven't been up to much lately." He was blushing though she couldn't really tell.

Haku encircled her in his arms, "I haven't ever…that was…thank you." His synapses were reconnecting as he added, "That was probably ill-advised. This probably breaks every rule…"

"Probably." She agreed in a chuckle, "I've never been thanked for doing that before…that's a first."

Haku felt indignant about past flippant partners she might've had, "Thanks should be in order for—"

"Calm down, Haku. Not everyone feels gratitude the way you do. I'm glad you liked that. We can try something else next time, if you like, or we can stick to blowjobs." Temari's smile was satiated.

"That is the crassest thing I have heard all day."

"You're welcome. Just get used to the terminology."

"I'll have to." He returned her smile tiredly, "I've never felt like that."

"Oooh," She stretched, "I really wanted to hear you say so."

Pressed into her body, his fingers mapped the geography of her smooth stomach, up to the underside rounds of her breasts and down again. Temari's kisses landed on random points on his face, as if to annoy him, "Don't sleep. Stay awake."

"That's…harder to do than I thought."

"We're not done." She notified him.

"…oh."

"On your back, please. I need to show you a few things, my routines…" Temari pushed him flat, clambering over him, "Can you breathe through your nose?"

"I…what an odd question." Haku was perplexed.

"Your mouth will be busy once I show you what to do."

"I can try." He fought his drooping eyes, hands settled on her waist.

Temari lightly slapped his cheek, "Don't you want to get me there? Pay attention."

"I am, I am…"

###

Morning sunlight didn't budge them. The only two things Haku was even slightly aware of were: 1) something on top of his head that didn't belong there, and, 2) his arm had numbed while wound underneath Temari. There was no need to open his eyes. He could feel her curled into him, tucked beneath his chin and snoring quietly. Since the embrace was too sublime to disengage from, Haku blearily reached up to pat his head…feeling a small, bumpy amphibian occupant there.

"Ah." Dear lord, what happened to his voice? It cracked like gravel. "Did…Sensei send you?" With a sluggish pluck, he replaced the toad at the bed's edge. The creature hopped away without comment, since, he gathered, it was not yet capable of speech. Such evidence was enough to indicate that Jiraiya expected him soon.

He sighed, puffing air against the top of Temari's head. He replaced his arms around her, recalling the things he had been taught in the night. Pale scratches on his back were a rather pleasant reminder, almost done stinging. Her taste was still on his lips. Haku peeked his eyes open, fighting off the mental and physical fog.

Maybe he would get through this.

Zabuza would cooperate and no longer protest negotiations with Terumi Mei's rebel faction. Combined, those would be solid numbers to attack Kirigakure with, and gouge out the corrupt Hunter Corps colluding with the Akatsuki. He'd sell stolen gems and line the pockets of indecisive rebels and mercenaries. As soon as was appropriate, he and Zabuza would retrieve the Master Scroll that stored the blades of the Seven Swordsmen, and he would learn how to wield Nuibari. When the day was won in Hidden Mist, and a functional republic restored there, Haku would bow out to resume life on the mainland. He could concentrate on the goings on of Naruto and Gaara's lives and safeguard them from direct harm.

It would probably take a miracle to tick off the boxes on that checklist, though Haku felt it was the most prudent and workable checklist he had thus far received. And if Temari was willing to cheer him through the hardships, these goals didn't seem so far-fetched. His blood was fresh and alive, never so willing to cut obstacles down before.

Stirring and ruffling the sheet draped over their bottom halves, Temari quietly woke, mostly aware of where she was. She tugged Haku's hand up from the space between them and pressed it to her lips, "You know…these hands might be able to do a lot of damage," She paused to place two long, reverent kisses on his knuckles, "But they are much better suited for love than they are for violence."

"I tend to agree." He scooted down lower to reach her mouth, greeting her in kind, "Did you get enough sleep?"

"No. We were up most of the night."

"I didn't either…and I can't recall hearing if Migawari-san came back. I should probably find out." He was delayed from sitting up by a fusillade of loving pecks, claiming his face, chin, and the bump of his throat. Haku dared not laugh out loud in case the homeowner had indeed returned, "Temari…ah…" He pushed back lightly on her shoulder, "Sensei will want to see me today."

"Yeah, he will." She relented and tipped back to stretch her arms, "I'll get dressed." When she rose, Temari glanced down at her stomach, "Oh. Some of it dried. Do you think I can wash this off here?"

"You can." He pushed aside the curtain of her hair to plant a final kiss on her neck, "I'll dress first and see if Migawari-san is here…then make up some falsehood about why I stayed over…"

"Heh, the truth might sound like a fabrication at this point…" Amused, Temari gained her feet, shaking sleep from her limbs and tossing her hair. Haku watched for the twelve paces it took her to walk naked to the attached washroom.

Oh, this morning felt better than all the others that had come before it. Each muscle was vibrant, bones cracking into place with a sunrise stretch, his hair half-wound in a sleeper's bird nest. He scooped up discarded garments on the floor as if he were the singular most effervescent person alive. Haku dressed and then folded Temari's clothing over his arm, waiting at the doorway as she concluded cleanup at a sink. Piece by piece, she snatched her clothing and pulled it on in front of his watchful eyes, "Uh…your hair is destroyed."

"I fear for my life trying to untangle what is on the back of my head." He admitted.

She pulled on her dress and finished tying the sash around her midsection. From her tossed satchel, Temari drew out a comb and motioned for him to approach, "Might as well get it over with…" She dropped a spare hair tie in his hand and then set to work, ignoring Haku's grunts of discomfort as his hair was wrenched free of the knot. When all was smooth again, he put it up in a merciful ponytail.

"I'll wait out front." Temari informed him as she collected her belongings, "Make the bed if it matters…and maybe get that medic friend of yours to come outside—? So I can thank him for saving my life."

He nodded, "He does deserve the lion's share of the credit." Haku trotted down the stairs to the first floor while Temari retreated out of the second story window.

He paused and got the sense Migawari had returned home, although he could not hear the heralding snores of the retiree. In the living area, winnings, knickknacks, and a depleted bottle of Shochu from Migawari's late night gambling bonanza were scattered on the low table. He was seated and folded face-first on the chabudai, and his legendary snores were absent. 'If he came back impaired, how did he remember to use an apnea mouth guard?' It was remarkable what habits some drunken folks
Haku kneeled down beside his tutor and patted his back. "Migawari-san, you shouldn't sleep like this."

The old timer started awake, feeling around the table for his glasses, then pressed his spectacles on. He spat a mouth guard out before speaking, "Pleh…what are you doing here?"

"I stayed over to avoid Zabuza. He's been in a foul mood since Jiraiya-sensei arrived." Haku maintained two-thirds of the truth.

"Really!" Migawari chuckled as he sat straight and ordered the table, "One of the Sannin showed up to punish him, heh! That's comeuppance! You actually did train under Jiraiya-sama, how about that…"

"You can meet him, if you want. I'll see him for breakfast at the tea shop."

"Eh…I should wash my face. I won by a landslide last night at Oguni-san's, but I may have celebrated too much…" The medic-nin hobbled to his feet, "I can tell Jiraiya-sama all about what a sucker his beloved Tsunade-hime is."

"Meet me at Hiroshi's shop in ten minutes. There are a few things I have to do." Haku turned to go as Migawari toddled around to organize himself into a socially-acceptable appearance.

Leaving through the back door, Haku travelled several blocks to the hideout, and was glad to see his rabbit had returned to the flat. Beside the sofa, Pua was curled up in her sleeping basket. He rubbed between her ears to wake her, "Did you eat everyone out of house and home yesterday? I'm sorry I didn't feed you."

Her yawn revealed a long set of teeth, and her nose jiggled wildly at the sight of him.

"Are you hungry?"

"Maybe." Pua assessed.

He fetched a handful of timothy hay from a container, which she gladly accepted as a morning meal. Haku pointedly did not acknowledge Zabuza as he stalked around in the periphery, freshly woken and shirtless. Haku paid loving respects to his furry companion before venturing on to his room, gathering weapon holsters and the scroll that depicted the Hokage's Yin Seal. He switched outfits, tucked the tessen in his belt, and then couldn't get past the living area when Zabuza confronted him.

"I'm going out." Haku told the brute flatly, "Let me pass."

"I can smell her on you."

"I don't care."

"Don't," Zabuza growled, "Get used to this. No matter what he says, you don't own me."

Haku regarded the man and thought that, maybe, that kind of appeal was the inverse of what he'd actually said. Zabuza seemed upset for reasons other than being strong-armed into a deputy role, Haku could tell.

"If you say I don't own you, then that must be true." With his folded fan, he flicked it against the man's arm to move him aside. Haku crossed to the door and let Pua out ahead of him, before telling...
Zabuza, "You don’t have to admit what you really think."

The man sank down on the couch with a mug of hot tea in his hand, scowling at Haku, "What I think-?"

"That you want me to." Haku said simply, "Own you."

He shut the door.

There was a chance that suggestion reached too far, Haku guesstimated as he trotted down the stairs with Pua. But if he was going to get that demon to cooperate, psychological devices might just keep him in check. By then, Haku had learned plenty on the subject of manipulation. If he told Zabuza what he wanted to hear, if that was what he wanted to hear, it could stay his baser behaviors. Hopefully.

A warm sea breeze swept up streaming koinobori suspended from rope lines across the street. The colorful carp windsocks waggled above Haku's head as he came to a stop outside of the tea shop, where a most unusual congregation was conversing. Either Raiga had no idea who he was talking to, or his aggressive tendencies had been muted by Ranmaru's outgoing disposition. It seemed as though Migawari had arrived sooner, and introduced Temari and Jiraiya to the other half of the current swordsmen troupe. Ranmaru peppered the newcomers with questions. Pua scurried around their legs, sniffing and identifying.

Haku came to stand beside Temari and greeted his teacher, "Good morning, Sensei."

"Slept in a little, did you? Hiroshi already set me up with breakfast. Nice guy…” Jiraiya handed a bento box to his student, "Here. You can take this with you and eat, before we train."

"We're-?"

"Haku-kun, Temari-san says that she has a Wind Nature just like mine!” Ranmaru was buoyant.

"You can use more than one element, so what's the big deal?” Raiga's defense of passing Lightning Release down to his student was brittle.

Temari shrugged when Haku looked between them, astonished that the meeting had been amicable.

"Nice to see you all, but frankly I didn't come here to stand around outside on an empty stomach." Migawari shooed Raiga and Ranmaru into the tea house, "You come along, Miss. Hiroshi will be delighted to meet you. And I can retell the story of my heroism when you nearly died on your last visit."

"Sure. Seems to be your favorite topic…” Temari turned to Jiraiya and Haku, "Don't be long, please. I don't know any of these people and they all seem like busybodies."

"They are." Haku confirmed.

"Have a good time. We'll be back before noon, then you and I can return to Hidden Sand later.” Jiraiya assured her.

They parted with that promise and Haku exhaled heavily, letting his shoulders rise and fall. Watching him from the corner of his eye, Jiraiya blew a small raspberry of amusement.

"Sorry that I had to shake things up so much.” The Toad Sage's apology was lighthearted, "You can manage, I'm sure. Also, you understand why I couldn't broadcast the fact that Temari made this trip
"I'm glad you didn't." Haku added, "Yet Zabuza noticed, regardless."

"It'd be tough to sneak something past him. He's quite smart." Jiraiya noted, "For a misanthrope."

Per Jiraiya's request for a more secluded area, Haku ventured toward a section of forest that bordered on the innermost reaches of beach dunes. Pua hurried toward purple-flowered clover to have brunch. Beside the clearing were six honeybee boxes, recently smoked and tended to. Seated on the grass, Haku took a few minutes to eat the morning bento he'd been given.

"It's like a little patch of paradise back here." The Sage rested his hands on his hips, looking around while turning in gentle trunk-twists, "Not to put down Gaara's home or anything, but this has it beat by a longshot."

"If one overlooks Nanakusa's tactically poor position relative to Kirigakure, then maybe you're right." Haku wagered as he finished eating.

"Well yeah, Sunagakure is more defensible." Jiraiya agreed, "Speaking of defenses, why don't you show me what you can do? Call it a skills assessment. I'd like to tailor our lesson to cover your weaknesses for now."

It was not an unexpected request. To confirm that Haku could handle the Mist espionage project, Jiraiya would need to glimpse the portfolio of techniques his student had built up.

"Any handicaps?" Haku inquired.

"Eh…just hold off on using your Kekkei Genkai against me. Other than that, anything goes—" Jiraiya was immediately bowled over backwards. It wasn't that he properly had to speak the word go before being saluted by an obnoxiously strong, single whirlwind of Wind Nature. No. Or less that he was already peeved at Haku for fanning himself with an innocuous looking hand fan—like some overheated fair-goer on a summer day. Smiling too, that scamp. Jiraiya had a few shreds of pride left though the sucker-punch technique had flattened him.

The Sage stood up and brushed his clothes off, "Yeah, nice, ya sneak. I expect it from Gaara, since it's his bread and butter to ambush me…"

"I can abstain from Wind Jutsu if it's—" Haku was punished with reciprocal retaliation as his teacher exhaled a fireball at him. He leapt and rolled out of the way of the attack, "-annoying."

From there, there was a single, test-flurry of projectiles from Jiraiya to verify that no such weapons could get past Haku's windy defenses. They plinked back and scattered once caught in a gust. He was just too quick. 'Heck, and I thought Naruto's speed was a pain before this…'

Jiraiya feared he might break his back trying to duck and weave away from the elegant Taijutsu that Haku employed. The young man was pulling his punches to be polite. And the blasted tessen was another obstruction, Jiraiya noticed. With simple gestures and flicks, Haku diverted his teacher's strikes and punches, rolling Jiraiya's wrists in useless directions. He had a keen sense of how to ward away incoming attacks with tools.

'I guess I don't want to see him use a sword, knowing that he's already this good.' Jiraiya thought to himself, 'But I still need to test him.'

Jiraiya summoned a pint-sized toad to make a nuisance of itself, and then easily blocked Haku's volley of senbon with the head-to-foot protection of Hari Jizō, hardening his hair to points. In a smooth counter, sharpened hair fired out of the conical defense en masse, forcing Haku to swing his fan for a repelling wind. There! Jiraiya was waiting for his toad to snatch his student by the ankle and trip him, prepared to disarm Haku…but it didn't happen.

"Hey, Sokobi!" Jiraiya shrugged off his needle defense while barking at the distracted toad. The animal was lollygagging beside the hive boxes, trying to eat bees, "Is it so much to ask for an assist?"

The amateur toad groved at Jiraiya, "Um…"

"If this were a real fight, Haku would've stuck me up in a tree by now and stomped you back to the Toad Valley!" He admonished the unhelpful summon.

"I'm sorry, Jiraiya-sama-!"

"That's okay," Jiraiya crossed his arms and watched Haku, who was adequately distracted by the spectacle, get tackled from behind by Kosuke the toad— lying in wait the whole time, "Even cheap gimmicks will work this morning. But seriously, Sokobi, get over here!"

He'd been working with youngster toads as of late. It was a favor to Gamabunta and his contemporaries, who wanted the newer generations to build up more practical experience on the battlefield.

Haku could not for the life of him shake Kosuke off while stumbling to his feet. The toad's knife skills were, admittedly, remarkable as he sliced the tender web of skin between the human's thumb and forefinger. Haku dropped his fan with a cry. Bouncing on the up-step, Kosuke bashed his foot into the young man's face while escaping with the folded fan. Haku had to give the speedy fellow credit while healing his injury and ducking beneath Jiraiya's opportunistic Rasengan. The assault blew over a row of decade-old trees.

And though it took a bit more effort than he would've liked, Jiraiya caught up to his nimble pupil and was rather proud that, punch for punch, he was stronger. Or at least, much less shocked by the environmental damage they were causing. It couldn't last, of course. Haku had been training with Momochi Zabuza for quite some time. A whip-fast combination of joint locks stilled Jiraiya's extended arm, and with enviable flexibility, Haku's high-kick caught him in the sternum. The man tumbled back into the crimson, leafy boughs of a pieris shrub. He had to struggle out of the bramble while Haku warned him to watch out that's a toxic plant—Kosuke was on him again, this time accompanied by Sokobi as they tried to wrestle Haku to the ground.

To the brave red toad's surprise, Haku let Kosuke's small knife stick into his forearm. He wrenched it out of the toad's grip, then pulled it free to confiscate it. There was a glint in Haku's eye, intending to retrieve his fan from the thieving toad. Unfortunately, Sokobi the distractible summon had a nerve-stinging agent on his tongue, and he'd already gotten a few good licks on Haku. And so the young man retreated and procured a Tool Scroll from his belt, watching as Jiraiya heaved himself upright again. With a dash of blood from his arm, Haku summoned the knock-off of Nuibari. He spun the needle sword once in his hand, tugging wire line loose from the spindle.

Jiraiya steeled himself at the sight. He personally had never stood face-to-face with any of Mist's swordsmen. Excluding Zabuza, Jiraiya yielded, since the bastard had been unarmed and ambushed technically. Though the same calm, gentility, and humanity was evident in his pupil, Haku had been redrawn in darker, stronger lines; calculated and predatory in a way that Jiraiya hardly even saw in Gaara at his most menacing. Maybe he had not willingly agreed to represent the now defunct division of blade-wielding vagrants, but Haku's posture and aspect whispered that he was wholly suited for it.
Clapping his hands, Jiraiya got Kosuke and Sokobi's attention, "Time for you to go, kiddos. Good hustle today…"

"Our practice is over?"

"For now. Go help Kinji reset those pavers at the theater, if you've got nothing better to do." With that send-off, Jiraiya sent the novices away before forming hand signs again. He summoned another small toad, though much older and worldlier. Jiraiya held up a hand to Haku for a time-out, "Just for a quick introduction, Haku— pay some respect to an old instructor of mine, Fukasaku. He's one of the Sages of Mount Myoboku."

Blinking wildly, Haku knew to bow and greet the visitor, "It is very good to meet you, Fukasaku-sama…"

The green toad ruffled his cloak, looking between the young man and Jiraiya, "Ah…is this another one of them, Jiraiya-boy?"

"Haku is also one of my students, yes."

Hopping closer, Fukasaku scanned Haku from bottom to top with a discerning frown, and then nudged the lowered needle sword, "Mercy me, there's nothing gentlemanly about a weapon like this! What unsavory sports young people get up to, these days…"

"It isn't a weapon I would have chosen for myself, Good Elder." Haku assured him, "I've just been told to learn how to use it."

"That's a relief. You seem like a nice fellow. Have you a warm heart like Naruto-boy?"

A chicken-headed reply, "I-I hope so."

"Here." Fukasaku reached up his hand, squeezing Haku's fingers appraisingly, "Let's see. Chilly. Clever. You've been up to trouble, lately."

The young man blanched.

"There's nothing extraordinary about that. Jiraiya-boy never grew out of his mischief, if you want my informed opinion." Fukasaku crossed the clearing again, "You would be welcomed in the Toad Valley should you ever desire to learn more about it." He gave Jiraiya a knowing look, "I take it that we are going to test this young soul?"

"Yup." Jiraiya rolled his shoulders, "I don't want to make this too easy on him. If he ends up fighting elite ninja down here, I want to know he's got what it takes to win…" He picked up the discarded tessen from where Kosuke had dropped it on a moss bed, then tucked it in his belt.

Standing prone and at peace, Jiraiya paid no mind at all to his student after that. The old toad was another matter.

Like a green bullet in the bramble, Fukasaku feinted to the left before charging at Haku, opening his maw to conduct a sound-based technique. Haku took to the narrow tree limbs above to avoid the Frog Call, which he suspected had a stun-quality to it, 'And Sensei is just standing there…' It was a familiar scenario based on correspondence Naruto had shared with him, 'That is how Sages collect natural energy to form Sage Chakra.' Such a meditative state was famously easy to interrupt. As Haku vaulted over a branch and wound a length of wire around the limb, pitching his needle sword down at his pursuer, it occurred to him that Fukasaku wasn't going to let him interrupt anything.

The toad's strikes were disproportionate to his size, hacking treetops apart, tumbling thick trunks with the strength of his punches. Haku spun and dove, pulling back on the line like a fly-fisherman to redirect the needle that skimmed but never struck the old master, Sensei fully intends for me to face him in Sage Mode! He had to muster some nerve. Fukasaku's soaring kick landed because Haku allowed it, tumbling down to the ground again while simultaneously ensnaring the toad's ankle. The old sage realized his mistake as he spilled down toward the earth's fronds and ferns—then swung up as if on a bungee-line. He'd been strung up like a piñata. He shrieked and struck the bark of a chestnut tree face-first.

Upside-down, Fukasaku twisted to get a clear view of the quick swordsman, and with a thousandth of a second to spare, the toad caught and halted the pointed tip of the needle between his webbed palms. It would have made an embroidery project of his gut.

"-ho, heh-!" He cut the wire that had snagged his foot, freed just as soon Haku reeled his weapon back, "Barbaric tools like that have no place in friendly contests!" Fukasaku ducked. Haku and a complimentary Shadow Clone of his were exchanging positions around their opponent, pitching, winding, tangling the needle and its wire through the clearing. The option of close-quarters combat dwindled as Fukasaku bounced for his life.

While he had the toad on the run, Haku side-stepped to the right as the needle sailed passed him (thrown by his Kage Bunshin) and towards Jiraiya. His stomach churned for a second, wondering if the attack had been premature. Not quite. His teacher was a sudden flash of motion imbued with energy, front-flipping up to alight upon the taught line after Haku's sword stuck fast in a tree. Jiraiya dashed across the wire toward him.

Haku might have noticed elongated red facial markings, or an unusual amber coloration of his teacher's eyes the moment before a Frog Kumite hammer arm hurled him dozens of meters back into thickets. The tree he struck at the end of his trajectory rained ripened chestnuts down, clocking Haku in the head as he wheezed, trying to catch his breath. Falling off of a tall building would have hurt less. On all fours he hacked and waited for double-vision to pass. He truly expects me...to deal with Sage Mode. Haku wasn't exactly brimming with ideas, but he'd work on it. He wobbled to stand and formulate a counterattack.

There was a high-pitched tenor of wire straining with pressure, flying and wrapping around branches and trunks; as though a violin spider had spun a web for defense in the forest. It seemed at first blink that Haku and his assistant clone had made the area nearly impassable for Jiraiya. In the next blink he could see his teacher's hair extend fantastically, a so-called Raging Lion's Mane weaving through the wire labyrinth to reach its target. Haku plucked a particular length of line that cut the advancing hair mass like a buzz-saw...but the regrowth was instant and continued to reach. When Haku turned to retreat, Fukasaku socked him in the stomach. He hit the ground hard, rolled, and was immediately on his feet again while the toad chased him.

"I am not even using my Sage abilities, dear boy! I can hit much harder!" Fukasaku formed hand seals and then exhaled a hyper-pressurized jet of water while Haku's back was turned.

Jiraiya's warning shout came a bit late for the toad.

In a perfect counter, Haku turned on his heel, fingers folded in a single Urchin hand seal to freeze the water jet. As the ice rebounded on the jutsu's originator, a frozen spike nearly took Fukasaku's head off. Leaping and descending in a panic, thick icicles rained down on Fukasaku from all sides, "Bwah! What is this? Jiraiya-boy, that jutsu—!" Haku had caught him.

There was a pained yelp as the needle sword's line wound around Fukasaku, pulling him back to be flush with a tree trunk. The wire spun round and round to trap him, arms and legs pinioned. The toad screeched for assistance, "Jiraiya-boy, I'm too old for this! You should've called Shima instead!

"I am not even using my Sage abilities, dear boy! I can hit much harder!" Fukasaku formed hand seals and then exhaled a hyper-pressurized jet of water while Haku's back was turned.

Jiraiya's warning shout came a bit late for the toad.

In a perfect counter, Haku turned on his heel, fingers folded in a single Urchin hand seal to freeze the water jet. As the ice rebounded on the jutsu's originator, a frozen spike nearly took Fukasaku's head off. Leaping and descending in a panic, thick icicles rained down on Fukasaku from all sides, "Bwah! What is this? Jiraiya-boy, that jutsu—!" Haku had caught him.

There was a pained yelp as the needle sword's line wound around Fukasaku, pulling him back to be flush with a tree trunk. The wire spun round and round to trap him, arms and legs pinioned. The toad screeched for assistance, "Jiraiya-boy, I'm too old for this! You should've called Shima instead!
A dual nature— Heaven almighty! Do you want to kill me—?

Usurping the ladder of Ice Release material remaining, Haku shattered it and fired upon the Lion's Mane, eventually buffering it with frozen projectiles. Not that he felt much safer. In a heart-pounding moment of awe and terror, Haku watched an enormous Senjutsu-fueled Rasengan tear down most of the forested area and all of his cross-hatched wire work. Dust and debris kicked up, twigs everywhere, and Haku tumbled away from the crushing force. Somewhere in the cloud Fukasaku was still clamoring for help.

Almost instantly, Jiraiya was upon him. Haku swallowed a yelp of terror, 'He could find me that fast—?' He ducked under another hammer–arm on pure instinct, since he remembered the sting of Jiraiya's previous punch. 'I can barely see anything, and he-!' Ah, yes. This predicament had also been foretold by Naruto. Visibility would become a non-factor now that Jiraiya could sense the energy of other organisms, as far as Haku understood it. 'The assumption now is: he's going to be able to catch me no matter what. I need to maintain distance! Our Taijutsu isn't equal.' The close-quarters squabble skidded in bramble and shards of shattered trees. Haku slid down an embankment, taking backwards steps in retreat as he kept his guard up. His teacher's counters were wicked, anticipating movements a breath before they were made. It was a waste of energy to stage an offensive against Jiraiya, who ducked under the point-blank jabs of the needle, side-stepped wire trap knots on the ground when Haku thought his clockwise dance could get away with such a trick.

And when his offensive maneuvers shifted to strict defense, Jiraiya stole the momentum—a toady hand cemented to a thick tree trunk to rotate about it, hooking around to kick his student in the back. The needle sword flipped and then stuck in the ground several paces behind Haku when he somersaulted to his feet, eyes watering in pain. Jiraiya was on him again, making a mockery of his arm locks, "What's the matter, kid! You can handle this, right?" A miscalculation; a sloppy strike—Haku's extended arm missed Jiraiya's elbow when he dodged with his Toad Sense, and then came Jiraiya's counter: he whirled another hammer fist into Haku's exposed forearm and smashed it flat to the island's oldest chestnut tree with a crack.

Cross-eyed with pain, Haku backpedaled and muffled a screech. That was most definitely a break, perhaps multiple fractures on both ulna and radius. Right about then Jiraiya's message got across. There won't be mercy. Mistakes won't be overlooked...'Haku had to expect only the most ruthless of encounters ahead. He had to cope.

Haku kicked the needle sword that popped up with a spin, and caught the hilt in his right hand. He dodged another massive blow and scaled the tree with Jiraiya in swift pursuit. Wire stretched and wrapped around two branches a moment before Haku slipped away from his teacher's rising kick, plummeting down with the ease of a pulley system, wire extending.

Below on a thicker tree limb, Jiraiya presumed he had the boy cornered. His lunge was a bit careless— Jiraiya could later admit; Haku ducked low, sticking with chakra as his footwork turned him 180 degrees around the branch. He correctly guessed his teacher would retaliate with a Frog Kumite right hook. It came as a small shock to the Sage when Haku successfully ducked his punch and then stabbed the needle down. Jiraiya grunted and took a few milliseconds to adjust to the awful sensation of his foot being pinned to a tree branch, immobilized.

Haku crouched so that his Shadow Clone could leap over him, racing down the limb to beset Jiraiya with a finishing tactic. Jiraiya swung a powerful arm in a wide arc, "Heh! Not today—!" The hit connected and, to his surprise, the clone erupted into a ball of ice spikes. Jiraiya sputtered a curse, barely able to launch chakra-infused hair over his shoulders to deflect the ambush of Ice Release with his Lion's Mane. "Huh, shoot. Coulda had me there…" His Toad Senses tingled. Haku had snuck up behind him and retrieved his fan, "Wha— don't you dare-!" A hasty Wind Release strike hacked the top of the chestnut tree into fifths, careening down to the ground.

Kneeling below on the forest floor, Haku took a chance to heal his broken arm, sucking in labored breaths. His ears were pricked for any activity near where Jiraiya had fallen. With his arm mended enough to function, Haku pushed to his feet and skirted around the wood pile. There he discovered Jiraiya pulling the needle sword from his foot, "jeez-! Ack!" His Sage Mode markings had vanished.

Haku asked with an inquisitive blink, "Is that...how long it lasts?"

"Yeah. When I gather Natural Energy on my own, Sage Mode will only last a few minutes." Jiraiya tossed the sword into leafy nettle, aggravated, "You are one big pain in the neck, Haku. But that's what I was hoping for..."

"Should we-?"

"Oh, no, no. We're not done." The man rose, standing tenderly on his bad foot. Fukasaku leapt up to roost on his shoulder, "I wonder what you'll do when Sage Mode doesn't expire..."

Petified by the prospect, Haku pulled back on wire that had been discreetly threaded through his sash, reeling the needle sword in rapidly with a twinge of chakra. Even armed with both sword and fan, he doubted if he could withstand a never-ending gambit of Sage shenanigans. He'd only lasted by the skin of his teeth earlier.

A preemptive move seemed advisable, and so Haku lashed out with an exorbitant gust of wind from his fan. Jiraiya avoided the move to retreat further into the grove. 'Why is he still moving if he's gathering Natural Energy? That can't work, can it? He was puzzled, dashing into shade and foliage.

Fukasaku had reappeared to directly assist Jiraiya. Could the toad accumulate energy for Jiraiya? Haku would wager a hefty sum on that bet.

Then came the proof: Jiraiya's Sage markings and toad-like features returned. As if it were a casual thing, Jiraiya began to swirl and condense another gargantuan Rasengan in his palm.

"He's going to tear down this whole forest if he keeps doing that!" Haku was not appreciative of such collateral damage, 'This time...I don't think he'll let me avoid it.' Like a charging bull locked-on to his student's position, Jiraiya rushed for him. If the Sage was going to sense wherever Haku decided to flee to, perhaps the wiser way to defend himself was to make it as difficult as possible for Jiraiya to get close. Haku created two Shadow Clones and handed off the needle sword to one of them. He then tossed his tessen into the air, and before it dropped again he completed a string of hand signs. Haku funneled as much of his Blood Limit's dual nature affinities as possible into the tool, and swung the hand fan to unleash a veritable blizzard.

A dune of snow and compacting ice washed into the battle-worn wood, whipping wind stripped most tree branches naked of their leaves and fruits. A hundred paces beyond them, bees flitted into their hive boxes to avoid the unseasonal chill. On his front-side, Jiraiya was rendered in artic textures, blanketed in crystalline white from crown to toe. His pace reduced to a slow trudge through snow banks as he pressed on, balancing a glut of spiraling energy on his hand— and Haku was a few long paces away from him. He swung his fan again, propelling a singular gust of wind that Fukasaku took upon himself to counter.

"Keep going, Jiraiya-boy! I'll handle this!" The perching toad exhaled a breath of flame that devoured the Wind Nature walling them from the way forward, heating a portion of frozen forest. Flanked on the side, one of Haku's creeping Shadow Clones pitched senbon needles aimed for Fukasaku's neck. Jiraiya handily dodged and had the misfortune of slipping on an icy patch, where a grounded tendril of needle-sword wire pulled taught. And suddenly, the Sage's inability to stick the landing pitched him forward, where the giant Rasengan crushed the sword-wielding clone back into nothingness. The resulting crater was filled with bramble and slushy mud. To the right, Haku's final clone retrieved the sword while its originator swung his fan again.

Fukasaku's fire counter to the young man's Wind Release was expected, and Haku immediately freed his hands to perform a Colliding Wave technique. It drained the empowered tornado of flames to flood the forest, too quick for Fukasaku to capture with a contrary Earth Style jutsu. Jiraiya hollered irately, "Pa! How'd you fuck that one up?" This much water was a worst case scenario when it came to battling his ice-inclined pupil.

"Jiraiya-boy, don't chide me as if I purposefully—!"

Jiraiya swirled around to launch a barrage of Needle Hell from his overgrown hair, sniping off the ambushing Shadow Clone that pounced. The needle sword was reeled in by Haku once more, tucked away in a harness on his lower back for later use. He was keeping his hands free for Ninjutsu, which had summarily turned the tables. Or, so he thought.

A second flurry of Needle Hell prompted Haku to retreat underwater, a withdrawal that Jiraiya and Fukasaku took advantage of. The pair combined Toad Oil and a fireball to ignite the flooded stream's surface. It was a quasi-Bath of Boiling Oil that lacked Shima's participation. Some oil slick washed up on surviving trees, many of which burned and became additional environmental casualties. When the underfoot watercourse froze solid, only a few oleaginous patches continued to burn. Hexagonal sheets rose up to surround the Sage and toad with ice panels.

"Great. You gave him fuel and now Haku's prepared his coup de grâce." Jiraiya stretched his senses wide, hoping that he would be able to detect Haku exiting from an Ice Mirror in time to counter him.

"Gave him fuel? He gave my technique fuel! His Wind Jutsu—"

"Was a set up! He knows elemental weaknesses better than most. Since you knew Haku is a dual nature, you shouldn't have gotten played by using an element he can still exploit!"

"Cease that disrespectful chatter you child!" Fukasaku grawped, vibrating on Jiraiya's shoulder, "What will he do now?"

"Well, he'll—"

Haku darted out of a mirror, visible for less than a fraction of a blink, and nearly crashed into Jiraiya's waiting, much smaller Rasengan. At the last moment Haku redirected his course to merge with another Ice Mirror, 'He felt me! Sensei can sense me outside of an Ice Mirror, even if only for a moment. That would be all he needs...’ He couldn't sneak by his teacher's Sensory ability. And if he recklessly charged into a jutsu Jiraiya had in store for him...that would look very foolish indeed. No. A degree of caution could make all the difference here. Just because Jiraiya could feel approaching chakra did not mean he was always fast enough to react—

Mirrors were shattering. Haku had only taken three seconds to deliberate his next course of action, but he'd tarried too long. Jiraiya amassed another sizeable portion of Sage Chakra to begin mowing down the Ice Mirrors surrounding him. The force of the spiraling sphere reduced ice sheets to dust-sized flecks, which for practical purposes would be of no use. Except that...Haku could still feel a link to those infinitesimal specks of ice. They were still live as far as his Hyoton senses were concerned. Here on this side in the white dimension, physics operated in peculiar ways. When he took the chance to move through that particle shower of ice, the mass of his body compressed and took on a different quality; not quite energy, not quite matter. Haku traveled even faster than an
Out of the ice shower and into the enfeebled forest, Haku struck Jiraiya so hard and fast in the back that the man skidded in a ferocious face-plant. Both Sage and toad were bewildered by the move. And from there, it finally made sense. The relative size of any ice mirror Haku made had little to do with being able to pass through them—it was the relationship of chakra and matter that made his transience through two realities possible. Haku materialized a small disc of ice about a pace in front of him, and formed six others to encircle Jiraiya, each no bigger than a dessert plate. I have him! Haku hurled the needle sword through the nearest disc, and willed it via chakra to exit from the left, angled perfectly to re-enter other portals of ice. It stretched and knotted line in an insanely small amount of time. The needle returned through another disc beside Haku, retiring in his outstretched hand.

The move was beyond any Sage's ability to detect. Webbed in a wild cat's cradle of metal line, Jiraiya was stuck. Wire was drawn taught from Haku's side, tightening through each mirror as he pulled back on it like an angler. It seemed to be a sorcerer's trick to Jiraiya's bugging eyes. The threat, however, was not imaginary. Haku had tapped into a frightful technique. Wire strained against the Sage with enough pressure to slice flesh.

"Don't cut me up like soft butter, please! You can let go now." With his back turned to Haku, Jiraiya gave up, "That was an impressive demonstration."

Haku let out the slack of the needle's line, and then coiled it back into the spindle. After that, he let each of his mirrors dissolve into water and recede. Fukasaku hopped down from Jiraiya's shoulder and gave his cloak a dusting, "What a mess we've made out here! Is there a community nearby?"

"Yes, and I don't think any of them will appreciate their forest looking like this." Haku stowed his weapons and crossed the muck back to his teacher, "Sensei, are you alright?"

"...I will be once you fix my foot." With a lopsided smile, Jiraiya hobbled toward more stable, unspoiled land and sat down on fallen tree trunk with Haku's help. His student then dutifully went about healing the injury.

"Haku…"

The young man looked up expectantly, his hands glowing.

"What was that?" Jiraiya asked. Fukasaku sat on Jiraiya's opposite side, staring as he too waited for an explanation.

"I…don't really know what to call it." Haku admitted.

"There was nothing for me to counter. No time. I smashed your mirrors and the next thing I knew—I had a face full of slush, watching that sword zip around, tying me up like shoelaces…” Jiraiya wiped some of the dirt from his face onto his sleeve, "When you got behind me, you moved as fast as Minato used to. As fast as Naruto can move."

"There's no way to tell how fast—"

"I know what I saw." The man stated firmly.

After restoring his teacher's foot back to its pre-punctured state, Haku rose to take a look around the space. Though there was plenty more to Nanakusa's woodland, this bit of the island grove would need a decade or more to recover from the damage.
He glanced over his shoulder at Jiraiya and confessed, "I'm still learning the limits of my Kekkei Genkai. I don't think…many other dual-nature affinities allow for dimensional transience. Or if they do, no one has ever said so."

"Transience. Dimensional…uh…? You mean when you're on the other side?" Jiraiya followed.

"Yes. I don't know if…other dual-types, like say Earth and Fire, can move through matter in a way similar to the way I can."

"Hate to break it to you, Haku, but it probably isn't strictly two elemental affinities that are responsible for something like that. So no one else with a Kekkei Genkai of other combined natures can accomplish whatever it is you can do. I suspect." He turned to Fukasaku on the log beside him, "What do you think, Pa?"

"I think the lad should show us again." The toad suggested.

Haku wilted at the prospect, "I don't know if I can do it."

"Just trying to might give us a clue." Jiraiya made a shooing motion with his hand, "Go on. There's still plenty of puddles out here."

Momentary stage fright set in. How was he supposed to recreate those circumstances? Ice that was particle-sized, wafting in air within a dense cloud— that was a structure far more complex than what he normally managed through jutsu. Haku stood beside a lingering pool of water, stretching his hands out to get a feel for the natures he needed. His chakra tapped and tested, trying to mold something that existed in his mind's eye, but had no tool or hand signs for a precedent. His first few attempts failed to manifest anything smaller than coin-sized crystals of ice, which stayed airborne until he dropped them in frustration. Haku ran his hand through his hair and paced.

"You need another component." Fukasaku supposed. He had procured a smoking pipe and held it up toward Jiraiya, indicating he needed a donation of tobacco.

"Which component? The Wind and Water elements are here, but I can't get the measurements—"

"If you're trying to manually guide the size and consistency of that Ice Release trail you made earlier, it's pretty hopeless if you direct it through thought alone." Jiraiya drew out his own pipe to join Fukasaku for a smoke, "Concentrate on breaking down the composition into smaller parts. Sift the sub-units of chakra out of Water and Wind Release to tweak the balance." When Haku looked at him blankly, the man shrugged, "Hey! It's just a suggestion."

"Sub-units?"

"You can probably feel it. Every bit of chakra inside of us is comprised of Yin and Yang."

"Well, how am I supposed to know if I'm affecting the Yin and Yang composition of my chakra?"

"Didn't you do it already? Why would I know what it feels like?" Jiraiya scoffed, "I don't have a Kekkei Genkai. Or a talent for Light or Dark techniques."

The young man flexed his hands at his sides, frowning, "It's different from this side."

"It can still be done." His teacher maintained.

Coupling effort with impatience, Haku harnessed Wind and Water natures again with a snap of his hand. Perhaps there really was something else to it. A subtle, tiny prompt. Like an itch at the back of his mind. For someone who understood how to control his chakra so well, it was maddening to fail to identify what this scintilla of internal energy was. Water crystals froze in air again, smaller than pearls now, but no, something else had to be there. Something had to sustain the fluctuation of states of matter, and it was there behind his eyelids, somewhere in his brain and fingertips. If only could he feel it well enough to identify it! Haku squeezed his eyes shut. What had he done before? Within the nucleus of chakra, a constituent part of it, there resided the axiom of balance. And it could be touched and molded even with a thought.

In the midst of his exploration of chakra in its least refined state, Haku noticed the soft gasp of his companions nearby. He had let his hands daydream their way through the puzzle. Any practical set of watching eyes would assess it was a nonsense hand-sign with no meaning—his right thumb and two forefingers looped around the left thumb, all other digits pointed up towards the sky. But it osmosed light in a way no other conduit could. That was what compressed chakra and made matter flow: tamping down on the Yin to expand the Yang. Not that he could put the concept into words, so Haku went ahead to stretch the dust-line of ice in front of him into a trail that crossed the clearing.

When he passed through it, there was no worldly delay of resistance, gravity, or any such force. There membrane between this reality and the white dimension was almost negligible with atomized portals such as these. Haku reappeared at the far edge of the glade upon exiting the channel.

Jiraiya cupped his hand and shouted over to him, "Yeah, that looked about right!"

Though the cost was workable in the way of chakra, the ice-faring technique demanded the utmost concentration. Giving it another go, Haku navigated a pristine expanse of forest through a comet-tail of ice, arrowing and cambering through the boughs of chestnuts and rhododendron. He could move dynamically, change course and redirect however he wanted. He could maintain the Ice Path with thought and subtle gestures, focusing on the upsurge of light in the jutsu. Haku exited the trail and walked back towards his teacher as exhaustion started to set in.

The toad and sage were a pair of chimneys puffing away while seated on a log. They had reserved their commentary for the end of the demonstration.

"It would appear you can do it after all." Fukasaku commended him, "You should continue to develop that skill."

"I will try, Fukasaku-sama."

Smoke tufted from Jiraiya's nostrils before he noted, "That's a teleportation jutsu."

"It's..." Haku was at a loss.

"If it's not, pfft, how else can I typify it?" Jiraiya snickered, "No one can copy it. No one else can use it, I'm supposing. Much like the Nidaime Hokage who invented the Flying Thunder God Technique on his own, I guess innovation still happens these days."

"It relies on a visible trail, which means it can be tracked. And I don't know if it's an instantaneous warp. So terming it teleportation could be a stretch..."

"Maybe it's not, since technically you're moving through a medium. Or another dimension. Whatever." The man shrugged his shoulders.

"Even if it can't be compared to contemporary techniques similar to it, that does not devalue your jutsu in any sense." Fukasaku assured him, "It's quite remarkable, Haku-boy."

"At any rate," Jiraiya extinguished his pipe, "You've got that new zippy ice thing going for you.
Keep that in your rolodex of surprises, kid. As for the rest of my assessment: you've got a clear advantage in long to mid-range fighting. Ninjutsu is still your specialty." He added gravely, "But Heaven help you if a Taijutsu expert has you cornered. You need a boost there."

"I'll do my best. I didn't use any Genjutsu today if you-

"I'm not concerned about your Genjutsu; it was always above average. I'm saying you need to double down on improving close-range combat. I found it rather easy to break your bones to impede you. You'll slow down even more when you stop to heal yourself. That's not a practical means of survival on solo-missions, or a Mist free-for-all." Jiraiya shared his criticism, "I know you won't be dealing with many who are strong as I am in Sage-Mode, but if you do come across someone on that level…"

Haku nodded his head ruefully, "I know."

"I don't know what's waiting for you in Kirigakure. I need you to be prepared. Zabuza having your back won't be enough if he ends up dead in a gutter." Jiraiya passed cleaning supplies to Fukasaku to tidy up their pipes, "So work on Taijutsu and avoid being out-muscled. It's clear that your hand-to-hand fighting has already been polished drastically from the last time I saw you, but you need to be able to take a hit—or twenty. Develop a tight defense. I've got a jutsu or two to show you that'll clean up those weaknesses."

"Thank you, Sensei. About now I think I should mention…" Haku pulled a technique scroll out of a hip pouch, "That I've also found and studied this."

Jiraiya exchanged a look with Fukasaku before he stretched out his hand to accept the scroll. He unwound it to take a look. After 36 seconds of reading it began to sink in that he was examining something eerily familiar, "This is…Tsunade's Yin Seal. I think."

"I came across it when I arrived here, and I want to return it to her so that it doesn't fall into questionable hands again." Haku explained.

"How very thoughtful of you." Jiraiya's countenance flattened in seriousness, "You didn't apply this to your head, did you?"

"I…"

"You did."

"I did."

"How? Just managing the Sealing work is a chore. Never mind what comes afterward." Jiraiya was curious.

"Zabuza helped me reproduce the formula. Though I've learned charging it with chakra is very difficult."

"No shit. It drains your normal reserves like a leech. Takes a ton of control," Jiraiya rolled up the scroll and tucked it in his belt for safekeeping, "So you fought me today with an undisclosed handicap and still did pretty well, which I've gotta give you extra points for. You don't use Orochimaru's Heaven Seal anymore, do you?"

"Never." Haku confirmed.

Such news surprised Fukasaku, who planted a dubious look on Jiraiya as if to say, What kind of calamity have you allowed your students to get tangled in?

"Good. Because I'd beat you senseless if you did." Jiraiya folded his arms, "And Tsunade's technique is no picnic either...but now that I think about it, it'll be a boon to you if you're ever in dire straits. I kind of prefer that you have that just in case a fight takes a turn for the worse."

Haku held his chin and estimated, "I might need two years or so to finish charging it. Maybe less if I can actively devote more chakra."

Jiraiya shook his head, "I don't want you burdening yourself more than you have to. Go slow. If you're spying on the Main Island near Hidden Mist, why the heck would you want less chakra to work with? Don't prioritize that seal."

Fukasaku concurred with that recommendation, "Yes, self-preservation is paramount."

With a slight bow of respect, Haku acknowledged their guidance, "I understand."

"Now, let's take some time so I can show you those jutsu I mentioned. I might run a bit late for my return to Suna, but this lesson's well worth it." The man stood and stretched, "I guess I'll have to come up with a harrowing tale to tell Tsunade when I return this scroll to her...how I found it and stuff."

"Please omit as much as you need to." Haku did not want to end up on the Hokage's bad side.

"I'll let you know what I say so you can corroborate the details. She may not be thrilled you have the seal on your head, but better you than someone else, right?"

"Right."

"Okay. On to a close-range counters lesson." Jiraiya rubbed his hands together and looked his student over, "So, how long has your hair gotten, kid? Huh. We can work with it."

Scents of disinfectant and iron wafted in his nostrils, but he couldn't bring himself to open his eyes. Kakashi did not actually have to wrestle back his conscious state to detect the few relevant details of his surroundings. Stiff linens, static quiet, dry air aggravating a nosebleed: he was most certainly laying in a hospital bed. Even with his head swirling and body inoperative these things weren't so hard to figure out. He even remembered what landed him here.

He'd surged the last of his chakra into a demanding technique in the Forest of Death, possibly hallucinated or actually saw Rin with his rebellious Sharingan eye, and had no confirmation of whether or not Asuma had apprehended the intruder that had killed Ūhei and Shiba. The dog pack had reported that Akino was critical but holding. Tenzo had been there. It was heavy and dark when he tried to plot the chronology of events thereafter. Maybe he'd dreamed it all? The probability of that was low, but he could hope.

It felt like night. That was an educated guess, judging by the lack of atmospheric activity and noise. Being awake and thinking about how two more lives he treasured were forever gone from him was godawful, so Kakashi gladly surrendered his mind to the dark.

Then, there was a gruff, impatient voice fetching him from the fog of sleep, just as a gaff collects a fish from water. He fought and fought and then finally peeked his eyes open. Kakashi painstakingly turned his head a few degrees to the left. Tsunade billowed into view as his eyes adjusted. She was sitting beside the bed on a physician's rolling stool, her arms folded guardedly.

"Kakashi."

"Hokage-sama."

"Let's talk." Her arms loosened and her hands pooled in her lap as she rolled closer, "It took you a while to respond to me. How do you feel?"

"Not particularly good. Full bladder."

"I'll get you a bed pan shortly. You won't be able to move around." Tsunade told him, "It's been two days."

A long, dusty breath escaped him. Yes, his body did feel as though it'd been dead to the world for that long.

The Hokage went on, "You pushed it very near the brink of full chakra depletion and death. Later you'll thank Sakura for the overtime hours she put in to help me keep you stable."

"I will." He moved his index finger; a tiny, bonafide miracle, "What time is it?"

"Just after 5:00AM. I've been checking in frequently. Yesterday and the day before last I reviewed the reports from Security patrols and the ANBU squadron that backed you up."

"You're up this early just for me?" He was touched.

"I haven't slept in over a day. A top-level alert was issued in response to the perimeter breach. Since a Tao Art was able to infiltrate our detection barrier and checkpoints, and we have no techniques that disarm Tao Arts, the council's hysteria has scrambled most of our shinobi forces."

"—Asuma?"

"He's alright. When I last spoke to him yesterday, he regretted losing Shimofuri Koinyu through a Shadow Gate. That's the technique they've tried to describe to me in debriefings, and so I imagine it looks much like the Tao Art we saw at the Chunin Exam." Tsunade took his pulse at the carotid and radial arteries, "You're a bit low."

"Tsunade-sama, the intruder—"

"I know what he did. I'm sorry." Her voice softened, "His escape was incredibly narrow, and there was some debate regarding the ANBU squad's decision not to pursue through a Tao-portal, though it seemed possible. Sai and Mashu very nearly made that choice before Asuma discouraged it. His wounds needed immediate attention anyway…" Tsunade recapped the events, "The way I see it… anyone who pursues a Tao-user through such a gateway has no confirmation of an exit location…or who is waiting on the other side. I'm glad they weren't so foolish."

"I don't think anyone should ever attempt something like that." Kakashi replayed a name in his head that he did not recognize, "Mashu… A new recruit?"

"Yes. Tenzo has been working closely with Yugao and Sai for the last few months. Shimura Mashu completed his practicals and was accepted into ANBU full-time, as of a few weeks ago. Tenzo felt he would be a worthy addition to the team."

Kakashi vaguely remembered the young Jounin named Mashu, who was a generational peer of Tama's and had visited her while she'd been hospital-bound. It did stick out as an oddity that a member of the Shimura clan had enlisted in the ANBU, a chain of command that answered to the Hokage. Since the obvious preference may have been to report to Shimura Danzo, one of the clan's most respected shinobi and the Director of Root, the youth's deviation was an eyebrow-raiser.

"You don't suppose Danzo-sama wants a member of his clan working in your Black Ops…or if it was an indiscriminate assignment?" Kakashi wondered.

"I've asked myself that. I really don't know." Tsunade admitted, "Both Yugao and Tenzo are watching him closely, though thus far he is an ordinary recruit lacking ulterior motives. One can't be too careful, of course."

"Hmm. It's a superficial impression…but that kid probably isn't under any Root orders. He was never qualified for or admitted into the Foundation. He's much too personable." Kakashi recalled, "He's called my nephew The White Wing of Konoha."

"Ugh! Another schmaltzy nickname."

"Did the Council request Root forces to ramp up security checks as well?" He circled back on the unnerving topic, "Because if that's the case, you may want your standard forces double-checking everything Root touches."

Her back straightened, "Are you suggesting that Root allowed this infiltration?"

"Only two groups have in-depth knowledge about sub-passage entries and exits: ANBU Black Ops and Root Black Ops. If you have every member of your ANBU scanned by the Intel Corps and Ibiki's team, I guarantee you that none of them said a word about that sub-passage to anyone without clearance. Huo may have known those tunnels existed, but someone has to disclose where the external access points are." Kakashi concluded, "Maybe I'm presumptuous…but Root has had communications with rogue groups before. Sometimes for our benefit, sometimes to our detriment."

"Regardless, every secret bypass route will have to have maximum oversight from here on out. That's stretching my stretched forces thinner…and you want me to double-check Root's security collaborations? I don't have enough shinobi, Kakashi."

"Sato and Hinata should be tested for Jounin promotions. Maybe even a few of the others—"

"It still won't be enough." Tsunade huffed, "And I don't feel comfortable requesting any of Gaara's squads from Sand as emergency sentinels. His council would notice our internal vulnerabilities if I did, which is not conducive. I also want Naruto and Haku back here soon."

"Ah, well, yes. They'd be helpful." Kakashi supposed.

"Two of the most senior members of my Sealing Corps are also dead, thanks to the Akatsuki's attack on Shiogakure." She tapped the edge of a bright red nail against her teeth, anxious, "Do I ask for a new ANBU commander to be nominated so I can move Netsuke back to the Sealing Corps?"

"As long as I'm not nominated, sure. Do what you have to."

"Maybe Kegon could handle it? Feh! What am I saying? I need Netsuke where he is. He already has a credible case building against Danzo, but I can't weigh him down with additional work…"

Intrigued by such an admission, Kakashi attempted to lift his head from the pillow to engage the matter further, but it flopped back like a bowling ball.
"Oh, right." Tsunade fetched a bed pan, "You'll still need to be monitored for the next 24 hours. I don't expect you to return to duty for another few weeks. Maybe you can be discharged in a week if your mobility returns, but I won't give you missions." She arranged the man with clinical motions and completely ignored the sound of urgent urination. Kakashi, who had been through worse debilitation in his life, was not in the least embarrassed by the leader of the village waiting on him so.

With that business finished, he announced, "I don't really care what I can and can't do this week, Hokage-sama. I'd rather know how my ninken are doing."

She didn't say anything as she cleaned up the bed space, moving to an attached restroom to empty the pan. Ah. This was standard. There always seemed to be a tart pause before someone told him a loved one was dead. Minato and Semi had been among the most jarring announcements. Here came another emotional battering-ram, Kakashi told himself.

Still drying her washed hands with paper towels, Tsunade stalked back into the recovery room and said, "Two confirmed fatalities. A third dog was stabilized. The rest have been spooked and are being watched by Tenzo. I asked him to report to me this morning. Asuma was discharged last night…" She tossed the towels into a trash bin, "Four of my Chunin guarding the northern sector were murdered. To top it off, I was told you nearly killed yourself with a Visual jutsu perhaps used against your better judgement?"

"…my judgement was hairline at that point, I will admit."

"What exactly did you do, Kakashi?"

"From the beginning or-?"

"Asuma said you used a jutsu exclusive to the Sharingan. Tell me about that." She specified.

"It isn't like the kind of Visual jutsu I know that Uchiha Itachi can use, which was Genjutsu-based… mine seems to be…uh, how do I put it-?" He had no elegant name for the technique or simple way of describing it, "Whatever I look at with the Mangekyō Sharingan I can target and warp to another dimension."

"Another dimension." Tsunade echoed doubtfully.

"Near as I can figure it. Nothing I've sent there has yet come back, although I haven't tried retrieving anything. It's another plane that the Sharingan can tear open a rift to, and I can't use it more than three times in close succession." Kakashi reported, "When I first learned I could do it, my aim was terrible and I couldn't deal with quick targets."

Tsunade was staring at his face without really seeing him, since her brain was abuzz with information, "And when did you learn you could do it?"

"Shortly after my team's mission to the Land of Rain. When I lost Sato…I felt something change."

"You didn't think that was worth mentioning to me?"

"I had nothing to show for it then. I've only just become competent with the jutsu." His head flopped tiredly to the side on the edge of a flat pillow, "If I can even be called that."

"You could have lost your life. I'm not going to gamble the well-being of one of my best ninja just because you have a kooky technique at your disposal. Be wiser from here on out."

"I need you to help me sort all of this out, Kakashi. There aren't many I'm willing to trust to drive out whoever is corroding the security of Hidden Leaf."

"Are you going to share what you told me with anyone else? About what Netsuke is doing?"

"Tenzo and Asuma have already been filled in. I've considered a few others with A-level clearances. Naturally, you'll be keeping all of this to yourself unless ordered otherwise."

The man agreed with a soft, exhausted nod of his head.

Tsunade rolled the stool back and stood, "Rest for now. I have another meeting in forty-five minutes. I'll make sure your visitors don't make nuisances of themselves, or if they must, that they'll bring your dogs to see you."

"Thank you, Tsunade-sama."

And no sooner had the Hokage passed the threshold to leave the room, Kakashi slid back into the violet deep of unconsciousness again. What periphery senses lingered afterward detected someone else stopping in briefly, though it could have been seconds or ages later. There was no telling which. It felt like his hair had been mussed.

By late morning when the sun was much brighter and the space far busier, Kakashi had little choice but to wake up again. Voices muttered around the bed in a cluster. Since he was the curious, nondescript sort, Kakashi continued to play dead, or rather, asleep, with his eyes shut.

"He's got a cow-lick."

"You would too if you were bedridden for days."

"My hair's always perfectly styled."

Sakura's voice was distinct and annoyed, "Sato, it's not. It is equally messy. You two look nearly the —"

"I look good don't I, Tama?"

"Consistently good." Tama confirmed.

"Pff. Don't stroke his ego." The sound of a saline bag being changed on the drip device filled the pause before Sakura added, "Did Tsunade-shishou give you two guard detail missions?"

"Yeah, we've got to report in less than an hour." Sato sounded crestfallen, "I wanted to stay with Kakashi longer and make sure he's alright."

"He is alright."

"What if he wakes up addled? He told me he was seeing things a few weeks ago. Maybe he's just noticing multiple personalities he's suppressed, or the PTSD flashbacks are—"

"Kakashi-sensei does not have a personality disorder or, as far as his file details, struggles with PTSD. He's going to wake up and function." Sakura was issuing more of a command than reassurance, "It's just…you know…"

"The dogs are safe now. We'll make sure Sensei is okay too." Tama caught her drift.

"Well he's not going to be okay for a while. There's nothing wrong with not being okay when something like this happens." Sato insisted, "So long as we're around we can make it better, however Sakura conceded quietly that Sato's concern was surprisingly on-the-mark.

Kakashi cracked an eye open to compliment, "All of you are so caring. It's as if I did something right as a teacher…"

They squawked collectively.

"Ah, shh, not so loud." He winced and tried to wiggle his fingers again. He could drum most of them against his sides and pleased with the progress.

Following that he had to endure a brief medical diatribe from Sakura, blood pressure and pupil response check, mobility check (spoiler: it maxed out at flopping limbs and blinking), and did he need pain meds, food, or reading material? Sato had brought a few Icha Icha copies over, ever the thoughtful nephew.

"I can probably stomach some food. Do I still need this?" Kakashi gestured with his chin at the saline drip.

"Yes, you were low on fluids and chakra. One of those is easier to restore than the other. There were even a few weird burns on you, but Shishou and I took care of those." Sakura filled him in, "I'll have another on-shift nurse bring a meal up. I've got to check on a few other patients this morning."

"Quite alright. I can manage on my own for a bit." Kakashi thanked Sakura before she hustled out with a parting wave. His eyes then flitted over to Tama and Sato, who seemed to have some unspoken, linked energy between them, "Did I scare you?"

"A little. I mean, we know you had a good reason to use the Sharingan, but you pushed it. Asuma said you were upset…" Sato was near the foot of the bed, easily mistakable for Hatake Sakumo to Kakashi's bleary eyes, "So I know why you took some risks. But I can tell you as someone who's fought while in a rage that things never actually end up well afterward."

"I was slightly worried for you…but I have to admit I'm more worried about how an intruder took advantage of those underground passages in the Forest of Death." Tama was honest, "Could someone have learned how to navigate them that quickly by participating in the Chunin Exam?"

"I think it's more complicated than that, how someone could infiltrate sub-passages…but it is a grave concern to our village at present." Kakashi agreed, "Did Kiba-?"

"He's helping his sister Hana treat Akino at her clinic." Tama reported with a small smile, "Her arm is still in a sling."

"Kiba was here and fretting about you, getting all pouty and shit." Sato chirped merrily, "But he said he had to find a more productive way of helping you and the pack. Gotta give him props for that."

"I'm very grateful to him." The man sighed, "Are the boys still with Tenzo?" By boys he meant dogs.

"Yeah. He'll bring them here when he can."

He was sort of listening to what his nephew and student were saying after that. He'd gotten comfortable and dozed off. Sometime later the pair was gone, the room was quieter, and the faint aroma of hospital food wafted in the air.
Kakashi floated through dizzy, prismatic thoughts behind his eyelids. A motley of colors. The faces he had inexplicably seen with the Sharingan. At home, all of the dog hair left behind on the sofa where Ūhei and Shiba often nestled, and how he now could not bring himself to tidy it up. Glowing darkness stretched over a pictogram ring. The scandalous centerfold in the most recent volume of Icha Icha Paradise. The fantastic supermarket sales he had probably missed while incapacitated.

"This'll get cold if you don't eat it soon."

Oh. Another familiar voice. Kakashi pried his eyes open again to spot Asuma seated beside the bed, perching an unlit cigarette on his lip. His left hand was heavily bandaged and his right foot in a splint, but Asuma was otherwise robust. Near the window, Gai was in a handstand performing vertical push-ups to pass the time.

"What time is it?" Kakashi wondered.

"Just after noon." Asuma rolled the tabletop cart over the bed, "Here. Eat."

Kakashi gave his best (read: laughable) effort to sitting up but could only curve and flop like a carp. Gai gave his typical salutations and pulled Kakashi bodily into a seated position. "You're a pitiful sight, Kakashi. Don't make me wait on you—I am already deeply offended that you didn't include me on that patrol." In spite of the admonishment, Gai leaned his rival against the bed's backrest and fastened a cloth bib around Kakashi's neck.

"There was no need to include you on a two man patrol, Gai. The Hokage assigns those anyway."

He, remarkably, managed to spoon some onion soup from a bowl and proceeded to spill it all over himself with a wobbling hand.

Disgusted and sympathetic, Gai proceeded to spoon-feed his friend, "Two-man patrols will be insufficient going forward. Intruders are using Tao Arts! Grave robbing! Perhaps mapping the inner workings of our village—!" He noticed Kakashi flinching, "Ah, is this too hot?" Gai blew on the spoonful which was indeed the fix.

"Bit of a kerfuffle between the Hokage and senior advisors this morning too…" Asuma segued, "Seems they have different ideas about how Root should be responding to an incident like this."

Kakashi looked between Asuma and then Gai, who had moved on to cram a buttered roll in his mouth.

"Gai knows." Asuma assured him, "Tsunade told both of us about what my brother is working on."

"Oh good." Kakashi said faintly, noticing both the door and window were shut. As if that were secure enough to avoid listening ears.

"I for one did not find it surprising." Gai opened a juice container and shared, "Some time ago when Neji and Lee were confronted by a nukenin in the Toi Mine…I had my suspicions. During the Chunin Exam as I watched Tenten struggle, it became clearer to me that there is indeed a connection between the offending rogue group and some contact within Hidden Leaf. All three of my students were asked to submit testimony the other day as part of an ongoing investigation."

"Seems only natural that Bi's goons would be on your radar, after what happened to Takaharu." Kakashi supposed, sipping at a drink straw.

"Tell him the other thing, Gai." Asuma suggested.

Kakashi released the straw, "What other thing?"
"Neji was promoted to Jounin rank yesterday." Gai announced, "He and I have been speaking more plainly with one another, and I was pleased to introduce him to the Jounin Council. After the meeting, he told me something that has come to his attention."

"He only told you?"

"Who better to confide in other than one's Sensei?" Gai simmered down to announce, "He believes there to be some level of surveillance over the Hyuga clan."

A slippery piece of watermelon escaped Kakashi's lips, plummeting to his lap, "What?"

"You are a shamefully messy eater." Gai gave the fruit salad another go, this time with a plastic fork, "It's as I said, Kakashi. The Hyuga clan has been scrutinized more closely after the Chunin Exam's conclusion."

Asuma clarified, "By Root."

"Root has no reason to be concerned about the Hyuga clan." Kakashi stated firmly.

"Neji feels otherwise."

"Well, why is that?" Kakashi spoke between mouthfuls of melon and banana.

"He and Tenten heard Hinata-chan's first-hand account of a warning issued by a Hyuga clan elder, requesting that they avoid the suspicion of the Root Foundation. Their promotions and election of Corps positions has been discouraged."

"A clan elder? Just a paranoid old-timer blowing hot air." Kakashi wasn't convinced.

"My clan watches its back around Danzo and his Black Ops because of the rocky history my dad had with them." Asuma contributed, "So what has one of the oldest clans in Konoha got to worry about? Root shouldn't even matter to the Hyuga. Kakashi, why would a clan elder even mention the Foundation unless there was some credible threat?"

"Hmm…" He finished the fruit salad, "Good question. The Hyuga don't care much about anything until there's imminent jeopardy."

"I will pay close attention to this development, though none of it bodes well…" Gai folded his arms and leaned against the wall, "The most pressing concern is whether or not Root has any involvement with Dintei Bi's rogue cell."

"The next most pressing concern is that I'll be having a bowel movement in about twenty minutes." Kakashi estimated.

Asuma grimaced, "Don't worry, we're not sticking around for that."

Perked up slightly by the food, Kakashi looked around the room and noticed a vase of colorful tulips on a bedside table. A large, sealed card was tucked underneath it.

"Which of you was thoughtful? Was it one of my students?"

"Nah. Your nephew thought about buying you donuts but Kurenai talked him out of it." Asuma recalled.

Gai had a better idea of who was responsible, "I have it on good authority that Tenzo-san brought those here this morning."
Kakashi managed to shakily wipe his mouth with a napkin and laid back again, covering his face with a blanket, "Good authority?"

"Hokage-sama noticed the gift and felt Tenzo-san's well-wishing was more than what was necessary. He is already caring for your ninken."

"I didn't ask him to."

"Don't forget to thank him, Kakashi." Gai pushed the rolling food cart away since the meal was over and done with.

"I won't. He's been very sympathetic for my loss."

"You know, I get the feeling it's more than just your loss that's got him buying you flowers and whatnot." While tucking away an unsmoked cigarette, Asuma ventured, "That kid's always got some sentimental gesture for you, at least when you're paying attention."

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"You've got a conveniently crappy memory." Asuma assessed.

"Two. No, three years ago." Gai could remember for him, "A book pre-release and signing where you were advanced to the front of the line."

"That's—"

"All kinds of nice dinners. Kurenai never does that stuff for me." Asuma groused.

"Various nights of drinking never at your expense." Gai added.

"And didn't you get that week-long trip to a mountain onsen? I bet Tenzo set that up too."

"He's just a generous kōhai is all." Kakashi dismissed it.

"So are you going to date him again?" Asuma cut straight to the question.

"We never dated." A swift correction.

Gai was pacing and shaking his head in disapproval, "How disreputable to lead him on like that."

"It's really a shame a nice fella like him is hung up on frosty Kakashi." Curious, Asuma plucked up the envelope addressed to Kakashi, "This is even his hand writing, there's no mistaking it. Can I open this?"

"No."

"Bet he wrote something way too nice inside." Asuma muttered an afterthought.

"If I'm frosty, the both of you are equally deluded and nosy."

"Whatever the case may be, Kakashi, you take Tenzo for granted. Such insensitivity could never escape my notice!" Gai gave him a sideways, holier-than-thou look, "I must empathize with you at a time like this, but I expect better from someone of your stature."

Asuma was nodding along and wrestling a smirk.
"Gai. Asuma. Thank you for your input. Your ability to stick to relevant topics is staggering." He tried to tune out any further nagging. Since when was any of this their business?

Sharp knocks at the door interrupted them, and in sauntered Inuzuka Tsume of all people. She held the door ajar and pointed her thumb over her shoulder, "Gents, give me a few minutes alone with Kakashi, would you? My kids and I have had a long morning."

Both of the less-senior Jounin respectfully vacated and Tsume sealed the room after them. She tsked when Kakashi tried to prop himself up for the sake of conversation, "Nah. Just lay there if you want. I won't make this too long, since we can both use a break."

"Alright then." He relaxed.

"First of all," The woman didn't ask permission before plopping down at the bed's edge to sit, "My condolences for the ninken who parted from your side. When they shed their mortal cares, our dogs return to the Pure Lands immediately; a straight shot up. Tsume pointed skyward, "It's because their spirits are heaven-sent or so my folks like to say."

Wilted, Kakashi figured, "I guess I'll have to take some comfort in that."

"I hope you will. Second, please know that Kiba and Hana have helped your hurt one, Akino. We can send him home to recover once he clears an overnight observation. If any of the others need anything while you're on leave, they are welcome in my home. Kiba can look after them." Tsume offered, "He's worried about you, Kakashi. Watching this happen to you pains him more than you can know, since he sees part of himself in his teacher. You are realizing one of his fears."

"I hate to do it to him, really." Kakashi could imagine the expression on Kiba's face when he'd gotten the news.

"Ahh, it's just a part of growing up as a shinobi. My boy's heart is softer than his hide…but he's still pretty tough." Tsume's smile curled with pride, "Now…it's a good thing you're sitting down for what I'm about to tell you next…"

In fact he was supine in bed, but hopefully that was just as good of a way to mitigate any shock. Kakashi watched the woman riffle around a pocket sewn inside of her jacket, and pulled free a modest looking correspondence scroll. "See this?" Tsume held it up to him, "Rin sent me this."

His stomach plummeted.

"To be honest, this is the first time she's communicated with me in years. I could hardly believe it." Tsume exhaled a rumbling breath, "I guess I'm happy. Overall. She's alive. I mean, I'm still mad at her, but I am so much happier than I am mad. Do you know what I mean?"

"I…" His brain was booting back up, "Know what you mean."

She stuffed the scroll away again, "Okay. This could be one of the happiest times of my life. Even Nichiyo can't ruin this for me. Rin is more or less thriving, based on what she told me. She makes stellar income as a traveling physician for a few northern towns. Sesshu is fine, which was a relief to hear. She has great friends and neighbors, a garden, and she said that she's happy. But I can tell she's afraid of something…it's like she omitted some stuff. I can see it in the empty spaces on the parchment…some hesitation. Maybe because she isn't sure what I'll think of what she wants to tell me, but I can get the truth out of her when I write back today."

"…can I-?"
"No." Tsume flattened her palms on her thighs, tensing, "Don't screw this up for me, Kakashi. I am going to keep in touch with my sister and hopefully, with some persuasion, I can convince her to come back home. Seems like she'd be receptive to the idea, what with her saying all of that lonely, nostalgic shit in her letter…"

"Could you keep me informed?" He pitched lower, hoping he wasn't going to be completely shut out.

"Yeah, sure. I'll keep you informed." She conceded, "I know this is important for you too. I need to find out more about her life first, and also make sure she isn't some longshot security risk. The whole village is on red-alert right now, so I can't be an idiot and overlook possible schemes my sister might've gotten wrangled into." Tsume pushed off of the bed, "I am not going to mention you in my letters unless she asks."

"That's fine." Yes, that was fine, there was no use in rushing it, "I really want to see her."

"I bet you do." Tsume gave the tulips a sniff and then inquisitively abducted the get-well-soon card, "Wow. You've got gifts coming in already…" With a sharp nail she tore it open and ignored Kakashi's exhausted flapping and protests, "Sheesh, look at all of this writing! Like a freakin' novel stuffed in here." Disinterested, she flipped the card at him and it landed on his face. Tsume then plucked another piece of heavy cardstock from within the envelope, "You got a little somethin' extra too."

Tsume extracted a rectangular card that had ink paw prints stamped onto it. She sucked in a breath of alarm when she understood, "Whoa, whoa, whoa. This is them, isn't it?"

Kakashi's eyes stuck to the card sheet, somewhat sickened and relieved that Tenzo had the wherewithal to preserve something of Ūhei and Shiba. Though it had to have been done after the fact, he was not opposed to the last-minute memento.

"Here." Tsume set the print down beside the vase, "I'll tell Kiba to come see you soon. When you're feeling like yourself again, the Inuzuka clan has two gifts it would like to give to you as thanks for your mentorship of my kid." She cocked a hand on her hip, "That okay with you?"

"I don't need any gifts." His body was feeling heavy. The weight of everything was smashing him. Threats to the village. Rin's correspondence. The paw prints of his lost dogs. Tenzo. So tired.

The woman sighed and moved to leave, "Oh Kakashi, don't sniff at those who know what you really need."

Chapter End Notes

The next chapter is in progress and will feature Naruto, his post-it notes, Gaara's tantrum over a calculator, and other assorted melodramas. Hey you! Thanks for reading! clinks drinking glasses

Chapter 51- Yin
Yin

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Soundtrack: "Nujabes - Hikari yon/san/ni Instrumental Remix" by TK-AR

Naruto was not especially fond of wearing the turban, but the sunglasses he could get used to. It was a ham-fisted disguise that probably wouldn't fool the eagle-eyed tattlers in Suna, though Gaara was being very strict about staying "low-key," explaining it thusly, "I've already told my advisory council I sent you back to Konoha."

"What'd you do that for?"

"Because we know some among them are dishonest at best, treasonous at worst. I need to keep you with me for now. If an informant for the Akatsuki noticed you were still in Suna and reported on it… I believe the word havoc describes what we can expect." Gaara was seated at a desk, highlighting each line of dodgy accounting on a balance sheet that the village council referred to at meetings. When councilmen weren't bullshitting with their words, they'd try to do it through numbers.

This was the building his Black Ops teams were headquartered in. It felt safer to coop Naruto up in one of the compact, ultra-modern rooms here than fritter above ground near the Administrative Building. The unidentified mole of the Akatsuki may have sighted Naruto otherwise.

Thankfully, his friend was making the most of it. Naruto had pushed together two long folding tables and unwound a technical Sealing scroll end to end. It was the kind of reading that would give even Gaara vertigo, but somehow Naruto was able to decipher most of the formula twaddle within it. Though it took him a while, and he had to stop to mark parchment sections with sticky notes, Naruto dipped back into the studies he'd begun under Jiraiya. Sporadically, he blurted out his concerns.

"What if—?" Naruto removed his convenience store sunglasses to wipe a smudge off of them, "No one recognizes me BUT a Sensor-type notices my chakra and reports me to the mole?"

"Down here they can't. There are sensory-deprivation barriers set up. And that's why I put a suppression tag on you when we go outside. Shush now, I've nearly found a discrepancy." In pencil, Gaara circled a set of assets that screamed fabricated.

"Okay." Naruto could live with that. He paused to slurp his cup noodle lunch, pacing in front of a complicated section of Sealing matrices. The structure looked gratuitous and could only be formed by prong-seals transmitted by the user's fingertips. It was not a skill he had completely mastered.

"Is it true that I look tanner?"

Gaara looked up from his work, annoyed.

"That Zeriko lady said I look like a baked custard tart." Naruto added. He tossed his empty noodle cup in the corner trash bin.

"You are a custard tart." Gaara confirmed, "Pass me that calculator."

"What? Is your village rich now?" All smiles, Naruto did as he was told and stole a peak at wild numbers on the sheet.
"That's what they want me and everyone else to think as they misallocate funding." Gaara flipped the old tape calculator on and began punching numbers like a cross-eyed bank teller.

Naruto returned to the wonky Sealing scroll section and then proceeded to stare at his fingertips. For a moment's rest, Gaara glanced up and was not sure why his friend was squinting at his fingers but it was most likely a harmless effort.

"Your brother came back with his team from Tide yesterday. When do you think Ero-sensei will be back?"

"I don't know. Kankuro is twice as quick as Sensei and he had less distance to cover."

"Do you think your sister is okay?"

"She's fine."

Silence prevailed again, punctuated by the buzz of overhead fluorescent lights. Gaara ripped a furling tape from the calculator and reviewed it, puffing angrily, then wound up to pitch the curled paper in a sad arc before it fell to the floor.

"Temper, temper..." Naruto scolded his friend. He patted a sticky note to his finger and stuck his own Hiraishin formula to it. Now if only he could visualize a complex prong-seal as depicted in the text and make it manifest the same way. It couldn't be so different.

"What are you doing?" Gaara grunted. He meant the weird hand stuff.

"Sealing studies."

"You are playing with sticky notes."

"I'm trying to figure out prong-seals, you grouch! Gosh. I told you to EAT LUNCH." Naruto barked, "You're so pissy and you said we'd only work for two hours."

"I have to re-do the tape." Gaara admitted, deflating.

"Just go slowly and you won't mess it up."

"I wouldn't have to double-check the accounting if they weren't a bunch of liars abusing our budget."

Naruto nodded, "I know, I know. They suck."

"Just you wait. You'll have to deal with this too, eventually." Gaara warned. He punched the number 5317 into the calculator, ripped the tape, and delivered it via sand granules to his friend on the other side of the room. Naruto read the paper upside-down: LIES.

"Chill, Gaara."

"I am." He cleared his throat, "Chill."

The assertion seemed about as fraudulent as the balance sheet in front of Gaara. Naruto poked his head out of the office door to shout down the corridor, "Can anyone get the Kazekage some lunch —?"

Said village leader hissed between gritted teeth, "Naruto."

"He's hangry." Naruto could not make true eye contact with the pint-sized, masked Black Ops agent who peeked curiously around the corner, not with his garish sunglasses on. So he improvised with a two-fingered hand motion, pointing from his face to the recipient's: I see you. You got this? The agent nodded to him and disappeared.

"Do not distract Black Ops units here. They have work to do— they don't run errands for me."
Gaara grumbled as he started his calculations over, "That's what Kankuro is for."

"Actually, that's not what he's for. I'm gonna tell him you said that."

"Don't tell him."

"I'm totally telling him."

Gaara pointed to the asset line he stopped on to save his place and wondered aloud, "Is it possible to strangle someone with printer tape?"

"Probably not, but if you kill me with your sand Baa-chan will turn you into printer tape."

"She would."

Naruto took the sticky note with his Hiraishin formula attached and patted it onto Gaara's back. He then returned to his work at the table and attempted to manifest a prong-seal on the tip of his index finger. A long, silent block of time passed at the end of which Gaara ripped a new tape from the calculator and proclaimed, "I knew we didn't have that municipal account on the books. It never even came across my desk for approval. No one bothered to bid for it. The Tea Country probably has it!
Whoever did this bookkeeping had better chase that account down for those funds or they are cactus mulch."

"Damn right." Naruto assessed as he continued staring at his finger.

He scrawled some notes on the sheet, marked it in red ink, attached the tape, and shoved the pile back into an accordion folder. Gaara then folded his arms on the desktop and laid his head down.
There was new correspondence from the Raikage suggesting a meeting between himself, the Kazekage, and the Tsuchikage. Gaara intended to politely reply that any sort of meeting without the Hokage present would be highly inappropriate, but thanks anyway.

Across the room, the blue shimmer of a prong-seal sparked on Naruto's fingertip. He flashed across the room to Gaara's seat and displayed his handiwork right in his friend's face, "Look! Look! The composition is dogshit and backwards but look at it!"

"I can see you did it, Naruto. Most Sealing analysts can't manifest those seals even after a year of training."

"Looks like shit." Though highly critical of his own work, Naruto was laughing triumphantly.

"Shhhh." Gaara buried his head in his arms to deal with the onset of a headache. Perhaps a quick nap would set him right before tackling more work?

Naruto was more closely examining the scroll laid across tabletops, trying to reconfigure the form of the seal on his finger. The pictogram slowly, painstakingly, was molded into what was under figure 1.B in the text. Meanwhile, the Black Ops agent that Naruto had pestered popped up with a tray of meat buns and grilled vegetables, setting it down in front of Gaara, "Here you are, Kazekage-sama."

"Oh." Gaara raised his head, "Thank you, Wamu."
"Please don't work too hard, sir. May I ask who this is with you?" Wamu glanced toward Naruto, whose frown lines were intense as he concentrated.

"That is my good friend, Uzumaki Naruto of Hidden Leaf." Gaara informed him as he sat up to eat, "Under penalty of death you may not tell anyone of his identity, understood?"

"Understood, Kazekage-sama." Unruffled, Wamu nodded and then exited the room, making the same goofball gesture that Naruto had given him earlier. The subtle display of a playful personality in a young Black Ops agent very nearly made Naruto blast through the ceiling with joy.

Gaara offered Naruto a meat bun on the condition he not tell Kankuro that he was an errand-running type, but Naruto refused. "I didn't want to share with you anyway." Gaara decided as he stuffed his face.

It took Naruto forty minutes to get the form and balance correct for his single prong-seal, but he ended up with a textbook perfect pictogram, glowing brightly. Naruto marched around the perimeter of the room like a gloating champion as Gaara ignored him in favor of writing a polite letter to other Kages. He'd cleaned his lunch plate and guzzled the juice can that came with it.

Eventually, Naruto took a seat and tried to expand the feat to two-pronged seals. The light in his hand blinked out. He wrinkled his nose in aggravation, "Shoot, I had it. I guess the balance gets tricky the more seals you use…"

The noncommittal grunt that came from Gaara as he composed his letter indicated he wasn't actually listening. In an effort to find something else to do, Naruto wound up his technical scroll, tucked it in his belt, and then crossed back to Gaara. He poked his friend's left arm, "It's this one, right?"

"Which one?" Gaara kept working to not lose his train of thought.

He did not protest or react when Naruto pressed a hand flat to his upper arm and seared chakra into him, searching for the binding seal that held Shukaku. It flushed visibly in response to the contact, and Naruto drew close to examine it, "This seal lock isn't as complex as mine. Does it leak?"

"Not as badly as it used to." He was working on his closing remarks.

"It's had some work done. Don't worry, I won't futz with it." Naruto lifted his friend's arm, "Can he still influence you a lot?"

"No, and I've been sleeping properly since I was a child. Shukaku and I still talk frequently."

"Yeah, you told me about that. This has an Elephant Seal with two prongs attached. I guess the balance is good enough, but how can you really know until you try it?" Naruto mumbled to himself.

Gaara signed his correspondence and then rolled up the scroll, "I am grateful that Sandaime-sama and Sensei took it upon themselves to help me with my seal. It gave me a chance to live normally, and also to learn more about Shukaku."

"It's so weird to hear you talk about your Tailed-Beast like everything is cool." Naruto folded his arms.

"Everything is fine between us." Gaara confirmed, pushing his seat back and scooping up his expandable folder, "We understand each other now." He led Naruto out into the corridor and added, "I have two committee meetings this afternoon, so you can keep studying at my house while I'm gone."
"You're gonna stick a suppression tag on me so no one can sense me, and you still expect me to study? That's tough to do with a tag on."

"I don't mean practice actual jutsu, I mean just read." Gaara clarified.

"Just read..." Naruto repeated, "You really won't let me shadow you at your meetings?"

"Have you looked in a mirror?" Gaara panned the idea, "Absolutely not."

"I look like your average Chunin in Suna."

"You look like the idiot someone's village put up Missing posters for."

They briefly paused to scrap, spinning, wrestling, and bashing each other into plaster walls like juvenile delinquents until a Black Ops lieutenant commander worriedly stepped out of her office and asked, "Is everything alright out here? I know you needed to use our facilities today, Kazekage-sama...but it's been rather noisy..."

"He called me an idiot." Naruto was grousing as he and his friend calmed down. He allowed Gaara to place a medium-strength suppression tag hung on a string around his neck. "I'm not an idiot— I can form a prong-seal and I'm not even a Sealing analyst. I'm not even in the Sealing Corps yet!"

"Hush." Gaara said.

"Wow!" The lieutenant chirped, "Not bad, kid."

"...not an idiot...just outgoing and outspoken..." Naruto muttered his way up the steps of the building to the ground level as Gaara followed after him.

The lieutenant glanced to her left where Wamu, her newest Black Ops recruit, was watching. He pointed his v-shaped fingers from his masked face to hers.

After a bearable de-briefing with Suna's Jounin Council, Kankuro returned home with the expectation he'd crash on the couch and sleep, then maybe order takeout later. The last few weeks had drained him of his usual enthusiasm to be productive or cook.

Instead, he passed the threshold of the mansion and froze as the door shut behind him. The sitting area had two long technical scrolls open across the floor, parallel to each other as if they had been compared. There were hundreds of yellow and green sticky notes on the scrolls, the floor, the wall, on the ceiling fan's blades. Kankuro cupped his hand and called out, "If this is a robbery you fucked up already-!"

"Nah, it's me!" A shout from the adjacent kitchen.

Kankuro shucked his shoes off and sighed. Only Naruto. How long did Gaara intend to keep him? It looked like a schoolkid's bag went supernova all over the room.

He made his way to the kitchen and freaked out a bit harder, seeing that various bottles of oil, sauces, and spices had been lined up in descending order along the counter. If Kankuro's cooking equipment was not in its designated place, any spices mishandled, or bottle caps abused, the latent OCD reaction kicked in. Kankuro quickly barged into Naruto's space with his hands waving, "What are you doing? Aren't you supposed to be studying like a good, non-disruptive house guest? This is my cooking zone, bro."
Yeah, I know, it's just I needed a change and I don't want to be a useless shut-in whose disguise is too weird to walk around outside." Naruto indicated a binder of hand-written recipes. "So I thought I'd make a marinade I found in here."

"It's awesome."

"I know."

"There was meat and lettuce in the refrigerator so I just thought I'd prepare stuff for ssambap since everyone eats it...then no one would have to come home and do anything."

"Huh." He calmed down considerably, "That's very thoughtful of you, Naruto. How's it coming?"

"I think it's right-?"

Kankuro dipped a spoon in the mixture and tested it on his tongue, "Okay. I realize now that I have underestimated your cooking ability. Go ahead and put the meat in that. We'll let it marinate for a few hours."

"I did good?"

"You did good."

Buoyantly, Naruto puttered around until he found a zip bag and the fillets of beef. He did as instructed while Kankuro ordered his precious cooking paraphernalia. He mixed a few dips while he was at it. Forget ordering out. Making a meal was easier when he had an assistant. Naruto was high-quality company too, as it so happened.

"So do you mind explaining why the hell our living room looks like a bookstore exploded?"

"Gaara only wants me studying here today. My disguise isn't very Suna-ish and he makes me wear this suppression tag."

"Lemme see that thing." Kankuro frowned at the sealing tag, "Yikes, that's heavy duty. How are you not passing out?"

"Nine-Tailed Fox?" Naruto shrugged.

"Oh yeah. I forget sometimes." Kankuro stirred a rich brown sauce, "You can go out if you want, don't let Gaara's worries hold you back. No one will feel your chakra with that thing on. And if you can still use a Transformation technique, just do that if you're bored."

"I can probably use a jutsu for a little while..."

"Great, because I need you to run to the store for ingredients." Kankuro jotted down items on scrap paper, "Get me a bag of bellflower roots, spinach, two cucumbers, the biggest eggplant you can find and some fresh shrimp. Those'll be expensive but I can pay you back and clean them myself."

"Uh. I don't know..."

"Don't make me go back out there. I need fifteen minutes to crash on my couch— I've earned it."

"If I get kidnapped then it's kinda on you." Naruto warned him.
"Guess so." Kankuro agreed as he clapped the note into Naruto's hand, "How much money have you got?"

A pause to check his frog wallet, "4,500 Ryo."

"Eh, that's more than enough. Be back quick or I might worry." He joked and moved to fix himself cold tea.

With his note in hand, Naruto supposed his life would not be in supreme jeopardy if he took a discreet trip down the end of the road to the market. He didn't bother to clean up his study materials and strode past them for the door, set out, and on the front cobbled walkway of the property he stopped in his tracks as a familiar sensation overcame him.

Naruto-kun!

"Hinata!" He hugged himself ecstatically, "Do you miss me? I'm sorry, I'll be home soon! I've just gotta do some stuff—"

Shh, not all at once. Can you give me a moment? Her smile tugged at his lips, There's something I want to share with you. Just a small something…

"A small something?" Naruto scratched his head, "Like what?"

When he settled down, he slipped into a portion of her awareness, though not thoroughly enough to see and hear. But he could taste. Naruto batted his lips when he realized he knew the flavor. He knew it better than anything since he had dined on it for over 15 years faithfully. Hinata was eating ramen.

"Oh my god, how are you this good to me?" He whimpered.

She was laughing and blowing on hot noodles.

"How can you concentrate to be with me and eat at the same time?"

It's not so hard! I am stopping for lunch before my next guard detail mission. Security has been heightened in the village since yesterday.

"You don't say?"

Yes, an intruder killed several of our ninja in the night and hurt Kakashi-sensei.

"What?!"

He'll be alright. Everyone is on edge, though. We are not quite sure how someone was able to infiltrate the village like that.

Naruto rubbed his fists, "If he tries it again while I'm there I'll squash him into pulp."

Now, now. That's why all of our teams are working so hard. There's no need to trouble yourself. He could still taste Hinata slurping ramen noodles in between her comments.

"Man, that hits the spot…they don't have ramen out here that compares…oh." Naruto was struck by an idea, "I was going to buy some stuff! Do you have a second to…if you want to see what I see?"

Ah, yes! That'd be nice. I haven't been within Suna's walls before. Hinata paused her meal to flip her senses into Naruto fully.
And to really play up the subtlety, Naruto transformed into Hinata's likeness with an approximated lavender outfit, and then put on the pair of rinky-dink sunglasses he'd been wearing to be incognito. He marched gleefully away from the house and proceeded down the street.

Why do you need to look like me?

"It's just for fun. Variety is the spice of life."

And sunglasses too?

"Don't you like them?"

Umm... She didn't answer that. At least they were good for blocking UV radiation.

"Check it out, Hinata! This is near the center of Suna, and that was Gaara's house back there. If you head a few blocks that way there's the hospital...and over there's the Administrative Building." He pointed east, "The Academy's over there. Shops and museums..."

Hinata took in the sights, Ohh, look at that little dog!

"I tried petting that one the other day but he was all yippy and bitey. His owner's a grumpy landlady."

What a shame.

"See that? That's the restaurant where Gaara likes to eat gizzards."

He eats-?

"Chicken gizzards. I know! Gross."

Naruto-kun...Her tone lilted with slight pain, I wanted to ask you...why you haven't come home yet? Gaara-kun doesn't plan to keep you forever, does he?

"No, no, no, of course he doesn't!"

It's just...I don't understand. Fujita-kun said you were promoted to Chunin Rank and that Gaara-kun decided to keep you behind. He said that after the Akatsuki's attack on Shiogakure, he didn't want you to go anywhere...

Somehow, even though it felt like his heart might stop, Naruto kept marching with the flow of traffic down the street. He wondered if she could feel the butterflies in his stomach. She could probably sense the beads of sweat gathering on the back of his neck... Why? Why was she asking him this? If she were blindfolded and told to throw for the center bullseye of a target with a dart, could she strike the truth about him just as easily?

I just...wished to know...

"Gaara's actually showing me some of the ropes of his job, and letting me borrow study resources." Naruto bent the truth for convenience's sake, "I want to join the Sealing Corps in Konoha when I get home."

Really?! Her pitch rose in a squeak.

"Yeah, really! I even practiced prong-seals today."
"That's great! I don't even know what that is!"

"I'll show you later. But also…" Naruto admitted quietly, "Gaara was worried. Since several teams from Sand and Tide were lost after the Akatsuki attack, he didn't want me getting mixed up in it… we're waiting for Ero-sensei to get back to Suna. Then I can travel again—you know, we've got to use the buddy system!"

"Yes, the buddy system. Sato-kun swears by it. She agreed, Where did Gama-sennin go?"

"Uh…just doing some covert spy stuff. I'm not really supposed to talk about it…" Naruto had to let some of it slip, "But we think the Akatsuki is the reason why Hidden Mist is so messed up. He's trying to set up a military attaché down there to get things under control."

Hinata's silent, static tizzy in his head resounded. She then said, I didn't know Gama-sennin did such dangerous things!

"Ero-sensei's not doing it alone. He has help."

Who in the world would be willing to go there?

He bit his lip, "Haku."

Haku-kun went?!

"He's, like, psycho-brave. And he's no stranger to that area. Uh. You know—missions and stuff."

Does Tsunade-sama—?

"Let's not be loose-lipped with this, alright? It's supposed to be top secret. I'm sure Ero-sensei will tell Baa-chan everything she needs to know about it."

Yes, that's true. I won't say anything, Naruto-kun.

"I know you won't."

Did he seem even a little scared? Haku-kun?

Naruto thought before answering carefully, "I think…he's more scared of what might happen if he didn't go. How bad things might get if the Akatsuki start terrorizing other villages and innocent people…how it could snowball and overwhelm us. Those things scare me too. That's why we can't sit back and suggest someone else go in our place. It has to be us."

The weight of those words plunged them back into quiet contemplation as Naruto neared the end of the road, weaving through the dispersing crowds of the indoor market. Hinata did not share her thoughts, but instead wondered if she was over-reaching with her hypothesis: that Haku was not just spying on the Akatsuki because Jiraiya wanted to gain ground in a dangerous location. Haku might have agreed to do it because he cared for and wanted to protect Naruto, and Naruto was quite possibly a jinchuriki. At least she was reasonably sure. If she brought this up while her boyfriend strolled into the supermarket, he might not have reacted well to her guess, whether or not she guessed correctly. It could wait until he returned to Hidden Leaf.

What shall we do first when you come home? Hinata asked. She continued with her lunch as she retreated from his senses in Suna.

"Oh, it's a date! If you've got nothing else going on, we should go out somewhere!" He tried keeping his voice down as he navigated towards the produce section.

Yes, I can't wait! There is a restaurant where Neji-nissan and Onee-san always go. They serve cold soba for dipping and I think you will like it.

"Pft! Sure. Heh heh! I forgot he's dating Tenten and he goes on dates and stuff!" Naruto pressed the back of his hand to his mouth, trying not to laugh out loud.

He isn't so different from everyone else, Naruto-kun. Oh! And Neji-niisan was officially promoted to Jounin Rank two days ago.

Astounded, Naruto careened into an aisle endcap of canned macadamia nuts, toppling part of the display. "Whaaaaaat?" He hissed under his breath as he frantically cleaned up. A few other shoppers took pity on the clumsy "cute girl" and helped her stack the containers again.

He had to pass a practical test and get the endorsement of other Jounin before Tsunade-sama decided to promote him. Niisan will be staying with his team, but sometimes he can take solo missions or help other squads as needed.

Naruto scampered over toward produce shelves, examining eggplants and remembering that Kankuro had specified the biggest eggplant he could find. He also kept his voice down to complain, "How can Neji move up that fast? I can still wipe the floor with him!"

He was given several recommendation letters from senior ninja. I was given a recommendation letter too!

"WOO!" Revved-up with excitement, Naruto raised a behemoth eggplant above his head while he cheered.

A passerby snickered at Naruto, "Hey girl, is that more action than you get in a month?"

"Shut your goddamn face you bottom-feeder! I can appreciate a good sale, so stuff your innuendos up your ass!" Wielding Hinata's likeness, Naruto's brief tirade made the ratty-looking shopper scuttle away, "That's right! Crawl back into your basement hideout and read an etiquette manual!"

Naruto-kun—!

"I'll break his fucking nose, I swear…" Puffing, Naruto stomped a short distance to collect cucumbers and sprouts, "Talkin' to you like that! Well, to me. But whatever! Thinks he can score points by mouthing off to women. I wanna see him talk shit when his mom's around!"

Shh! Naruto, you're talking to yourself...

"Muttering angrily in public isn't so unusual here." Naruto defended and then laughed softly, "Gaara does it a lot."

…I see. It's alright now. You sure did make him sorry! She highly approved, Is there anything else you need to shop for?

"Just some shrimp…hey wait! So you got a recommendation! Are you going to take a test?" Naruto circled back on the subject as he dropped bellflower roots into his basket.

Not anytime soon.

"Why not?"
My letter was...misplaced. At home. It's fine. And also, my elders want everyone in the clan to exercise a bit more caution for now.

"Caution? Is it because of that attack recently?" He moved towards the seafood displays.

I don't think it involves that. There is an organization in Konoha called the Root Foundation...and it has been monitoring the Hyuga clan since the Chunin Exam.

Naruto kept his voice to a whisper, "The Root Foundation. What do they do?"

Those are Black Ops units controlled by a Security Director and the Hokage has little to no control over that division.

"Security? Your clan isn't up to no good!" There was a memory that pricked at him, though, "You don't think at your final Tournament battle, when I shared my jutsu with you...if that would concern anyone?"

No one has said much about it since! But I do know that it was noticed. What I could do with the Misago Byakugan... It slowly dawned on Hinata, I didn't think...it was about me. Why should it be?

"Maybe it is." Naruto was feeling edgy again. At the counter, he ordered fresh shrimp when it was his turn and thanked the salesman afterward.

Naruto, if that organization had any concerns why wouldn't they just speak to me? I could explain things...

"Hinata, I don't know if they're actually concerned. No one else can do what you can." He dared forecast a less pleasant possibility, "When there are shinobi with unique powers in a village...and higher-ups or a Kage aren't sure they can control them...they'll do questionable things to contain 'an asset,' or Gaara said something close to that once." At the checkout line, Naruto added, quietly, "So yeah. If this is about you, and not all of your clan, then be extra careful."

Okay. Her appetite had faltered and so a third of her noodle bowl went untouched.

"Cheer up. I'll be home soon." Naruto reminded her, "You know how to look after yourself. And Neji's not going to let this slip past him either, obviously."

No, he won't. She was sure that her cousin was not going to abide by Root's unjustified surveillance.

Naruto wrapped up the payment process and marched out with plastic shopping bags, "When I get home, we'll go to that restaurant you mentioned and we can eat that dipping soba if you want. Or get one of everything! Celebrate. And then, you know, find a quiet spot somewhere..."

...I have a few spots in mind.

"Oh, you do?" He felt his cheeks get hot.

I've thought about it. Ah, I have to be getting to my post now, Naruto-kun! Can I visit you again later?

"Sure! I'll just be doing some cooking and studying this evening." Two visits in one day? He was indeed a spoiled man.

Good! I'll try to catch you when you're in the bathtub again.

"Oh, uh...each resident only gets one wash per day in Hidden Sand..."
Did you take a bath already?

"No."

Then it's a date. She was no longer compelled to conceal her mischievous side, Or I'll visit you while I take a bath.

If Naruto had been wearing a blood pressure cuff, the gauge would have exploded and popped off his arm, "Y-You shouldn't be doing things like that, you know. Clearly you're taking advantage of your mind-hop power—"

But I only do these things with you. Hinata reminded him before the link started to fade, And Naruto, you never said you didn't want me to...

He was safely back at the Kazekage's residence, unaccompanied by his girlfriend's consciousness. She already knew it, but Naruto just had to admit it to himself as he stepped inside and shed his disguise: Hinata was right. He was never going to say he didn't want her to.

---

It was an early autumn day in Konoha when Lee noticed that Tenten was staring into space. She had given up mid-way through a series of low pu bu stretches and sat on the grassy ground, losing all enthusiasm for Wushu basics. As Lee was a creature devoted to his fitness routines, he continued his stretches while watching his dear friend muse catatonically at the forest surrounding their training field.

Gai-sensei had said he would be back after checking on Kakashi-sensei at the hospital. So no, she was not anxious over his return. Likewise, Grandpa Wong Leung had been quite pleasant at breakfast and overjoyed about Tenten's improving Hanwen conversational skills. So she wasn't troubled over that either.

Lee took several toe-fist-kicks in her direction and stopped beside her, "How long has it been?"

"About 22 hours. Am I being a baby about this?" Tenten sighed.

"I do not think you are. It is natural for you to miss Neji."

"I'm acting weird."

"No. To fret about his first solo assignment as a Jounin seems reasonable to me." Lee dropped into a low pu bu extension again, "Hokage-sama has been handing out many missions over the last few days, so it's important that he do his fair share."

Tenten flopped flat to her back, "How long is our security detail today?"

"Six hours. Post 2 in the west ward."

"And we're reporting there in—?"

"Twenty minutes." He glanced at a digital watch clipped to a gear bag nearby.

"Ugh. I'm sorry that I can't seem to find my personality today, Lee. My stomach acid situation is *not good."

"Your personality is definitely intact, Tenten!" Lee planted his hands flat on the ground, leaning forward to brace himself and tuck his legs in, "Grandpa's breakfasts can be harsh on the stomach."
She sat up and was fascinated by Lee's dexterous Crow Pose, "Whoa, where'd you learn to do that?"

"Sarutobi Kakima-san is a friend of Grandpa's and she invited us to her yoga classes."

"Are they free?"

"For the trial period."

"Oh, what the heck. I want to try it out too." She attempted the pose but could not raise her feet up without falling sideways. "Maybe Hideyasu will sign up for that class with me…"

Since the pose was a bit beyond Tenten's current flexibility, Lee assisted with getting her into a hand stand which she held until Gai returned. He marveled at his pair of upside-down students. Inspired by their hard work, Gai also assumed a hand stand to give his announcement, "Lee! Tenten! Our gift was a success. Kakashi appreciated it very much."

Tenten craned her head up, "Really? A set of resistance bands and a men's multi-vitamin made him happy?"

"Very much so."

She could hardly believe it.

"And the get well soon card?" Lee was dying to know. He had filled it with energy and health-boosting wishes.

"I read it aloud to Kakashi, which also pleased him." Gai confirmed.

Now that Tenten could just not believe. They held their positions and Tenten briefly wondered what Neji would think if he could see his team now. While her boyfriend was away, Tenten was slowly being converted into another whacky fitness disciple.

"Take your guarding post seriously and be prepared to report for rigorous training tomorrow." Gai advised them chipperly, "I expect Neji will be joining us."

Again, Tenten was not so sure about that. They flipped back to their feet and parted from their Sensei. While on the way to the west side of the village, Tenten considered how there was no concrete indication that Neji would return on time. Truthfully, she had no reason to complain. Before he'd set out the day prior, she spent the morning in bed at her flat, getting delicious attention from him. She could still feel him on her skin.

Worrying felt the same as saying she did not have confidence that Neji could handle this new responsibility, so Tenten had been curtailing the fluttery unease in her chest as much as humanly possible. He could handle it. Neji would not have been promoted otherwise. He had not in the least been concerned yesterday morning while he'd been all over her. His was a challenge of freeing up his schedule so he could fill it with quality time and bedroom tumbles, now that he'd figured out how much he enjoyed them. Logical, she conceded. Neji had said he wanted this mission not just because the Hokage's forces were stretched thin, but because he paid upfront for building permits and was just about broke for the time being. Many approvals were still pending. Tenten sighed at the thought of Neji's decisiveness. Wong Leung and Lee still had no idea what they were planning.

At the west ward post, they relieved the previous pair of on-duty Chunin that dropped out the camouflaged lookout in tall trees, thanking them for their hard work. Lee and Tenten leapt up into perch and settled in. There was space enough for Lee to practice minor stretches, keeping his eyes set on the viewing space between leaves. Tenten paid attention for about an hour before intermittent conversation lulled, and she retreated into her thoughts again.

Lately, there was a surprising amount of nostalgia gnawing on her. Between her independent work at the Weapon Shop, gradual integration with the Hyuga clan, Chunin-level assignments, and occasional alone time with Neji, she'd catch herself wondering what her life would be like if none of this had happened. Better said, if her parents were still alive and anchoring her. Would she have made any of the same choices that led her here? Would her mother or father have objected? Would they have made things easier and more attainable?

She had sort of mentioned this sentiment in passing to Neji about a week ago, "I wonder...what my Dad would have thought of you..."

He tilted his head to regard her and the out-of-the-blue comment.

"What I mean is— I don't think he'd dislike you. I just wonder what he'd talk about or how he'd try to relate to my boyfriend." Tenten explained quickly, "He could be either incredibly friendly and cosmopolitan...or just silent and watchful when meeting new people. Never mean or standoffish, though. It was hard to know how he'd be in social situations when I was a kid. Dad was a mystery."

"I think..." Neji shut his eyes and smiled, "We would have a lot to talk about."

"How do you figure?"

"Around your flat, his journals and books are everywhere. If you read some of them...you'd know that he had a hard time befriending people his age. Much like I do. That he was only able to fully relax around his teammates, which I can also relate to. And that he knew my father to some extent." Neji reassured her, "A person who is so important to you is not someone who could ever be a stranger to me."

Tenten's heart pounded. Ohh yes, somewhere a small voice in her head sang, she'd chosen well.

But Neji had made a good point. If she wanted to know more, her father had left behind ample material for her to browse and learn about him. And so, the past few days she had spent toting around her father's old leather-bound journal, which had entries dating back to childish scrawl in Hanzi waggled over the first pages. Over time, the writing evolved into the kanji used in the Fire Country. Between her daily tasks Tenten could get some reading done.

Since Lee had no objection to Tenten reading while on watch at their sleepy post, she opened up to a page she had marked.

Apparently, her father Takaharu's experience in transferring to Konoha's Academy as a young child had been an even mix of joyful rollicking and enduring bullies. Right away, his aptitude for Ninjutsu and strategy had gotten him noticed by students and teachers alike. Takaharu had been advanced to a grade level above what he had entered, thus parting him from three other immigrant students he'd come to Konoha with. In turn, Takaharu's shyness had made it more difficult to connect to older, envious students who questioned such a promotion. The three Sasagaiu friends he had left behind grew more distant, two eventually dropped out of shinobi studies altogether, and the last, Chinatsu, seemed to have had a much easier time assimilating into Hidden Leaf's cultural identity.

Tenten noted that many entries at this time longingly recalled Takaharu's mother, Ziyi, who had been killed en route to the Fire Country. Though the details were sparse, he had witnessed his mother fight pursuers with help from her family and Leaf escorts. She had also died in his defense before Biao, Tenten's paternal grandfather, could reach them. Her father could not have been more than six years old at the time. Takaharu had been a highly respectful and subservient child to his lonely father once they had settled in Leaf, but that was a typical dynamic in Han families.

Biao's insistence that his son learn from everywhere had yielded interesting results. He consumed poetry and literature whenever school texts were not required reading. Takaharu's natural talent for Fire Tao Arts made channeling chakra for Ninjutsu a much simpler task. After school, he would linger around the game tables in the Han Ethnic Quarter where retired ANBU played shogi. He would fetch snacks or clean store fronts there, sometimes. And sometimes when he won a game, an oldster would teach him a jutsu as a reward. They often did so merely to satisfy their own curiosity about a shy, shrewd prodigy who liked to hang with old folks.

Before long, Takaharu's unusually advanced catalog of techniques was a talking point for many Sensei at the Academy. Many wanted to prohibit what they deemed "reckless" studies. Some wanted to forbid the use of Tao Arts, though Takaharu's application of them was no more effective than a common Supplementary Jutsu.

At the very least, an end was put to his visits at the Ethnic Quarter. He was encouraged to spend more time with classmates, which he did to the best of his ability. At the time, Takaharu also asked his father why Tao Arts were a skill independent of ninja skills.

"Because the Tao is a part of this earth and reality, and Ninjutsu invaded the earth." Biao said.

Tenten looked up and over at Lee, frowning at the back of his head in puzzlement. How could Ninjutsu be considered an invasion? It was the foundation of all that shinobi knew!

"Our people are born with an imbalance in the Tao— too sensitive. Too saturated with Yin." The quote read, "To resist it, our ancestor gave us a Fire Nature: The light always inside of us that we can share. So Ninshu has helped us in some ways, and that is why we dedicate ourselves as ninja."

Ninshu. Huh. That was an antiquated blanket term. Tenten scratched her chin. Yin was darkness. Half of the natural balance in all chakra. It was the negative, passive, and female nature in energy. The logographic character itself read "the shady side of the mountain." And so she determined that her clansmen were oriented inextricably with this Yin energy, and therefore aligned themselves with Fire Natures in their ninja professions to stabilize it. To gather more Yang. Light.

She flipped the page. Her father's close childhood friend had been a boy named Kasigi Kizo, a run-of-the-mill troublemaker, average Academy student, and smiley socializer who recognized Takaharu's warm heart and intelligence right away. They were inseparable in and out of class. Takaharu came out of his shell more during his first school year, discreetly keeping an eye on Chinatsu in the grade below. His troubles started in the second year, in which Uchiha Fugaku heard a rumor that there was a junior student more skilled in Fire Release techniques than him. This rumor did not sit well among trainees from the Uchiha clan and they sought to set the record straight. Takaharu was cornered after school on several occasions. Tenten cringed.

Her father wrote that the beatings were just a part of learning how to fit in. He'd never wanted to stand out in the first place. As per his father Biao's warning about "back-alley fights," Takaharu was made to swear he would never raise a hand against anyone from his new village. And so her father did not fight back. He also refused to show off Fire Release skills even when the angry gaggle of students demanded it and taunted him. It was not until the day that Kizo could no longer ignore his friend's black eyes and bruises that he threw himself at the bullies, fed-up, punches flailing. Once his friend was tackled to the ground and hurt, Takaharu decided to fight back.

The end of the page noted that Fugaku began to take the rumor quite a bit more seriously after that day. Takaharu had even earned a bit of respect from the senior student, who thought it was noble of him only to fight on behalf of a comrade. It made his natural strength and talent "all the more valuable” since Takaharu "had a good reason to use it.” A few months later, Takaharu and Kizo passed the Graduation Exam and were thankfully assigned to a Genin team together. The third slot of the team was filled by Sarutobi Seibi, a quick-witted fellow who made comebacks just as sharp as Kizo's jokes. Takaharu noted that some of his happiest days were those spent under the tutelage of their Jounin Sensei, Mitarashi Isogo. He flourished beside his teammates and made many more friends.

And before she really noticed the passage of time, Tenten glanced up to see the sun had sunk lower in the sky. Their watch would be over soon.

"Lee?"

"Yes, Tenten?" Somehow he was still fresh and attentive.

"When Grandpa talks to you about the Tao, does he ever mention Yin and Yang?"

"Oh yes!"

"What does he say about it?" Tenten asked as she marked her page.

"Many things. All kinds of principles of balance. It is a foundational concept for determining Elemental Chakra Natures as well."

"Does he ever talk about or…does he know if people can be more of one or the other?"

"Discerning that quality is a very subtle skill. However, Grandpa tries to make educated guesses based on clues!" Lee recalled, "He says I am perfectly balanced. That is not so common. Most people are close to a 1:1 ratio of light and dark, though it can vary. Some energy disparities are more extreme and are considered special cases."

Tenten muttered, "I might be a special case."

"Grandpa says you are."

"Mostly Yin? Like, maybe not even a speck of Yang anywhere?"

"He might've mentioned that. But it was only a guess!"

Tenten sighed and rested her cheek in her palm, staring out of the lookout. Wong Leung had a lot of insight, it turned out.

"Grandpa says that Neji is imbalanced in favor of Yang, but it is a slight surplus. That is supposed to explain his irritability." Lee stated matter-of-factly with a finger raised.

It sounded like an oversimplification to Tenten, but she could not rule out the assessment. That evening, Chouji and Shikamaru turned up to relieve them of their watch. Tenten bade her teammate goodnight as their paths forked north and east, and she continued her journey uptown towards the Hyuga estate. There was an odd swirling feeling tucked in her ribs. An uneasiness. There were parts of her father, parts of both of her parents, and herself that she had been oblivious to. As though she had never bothered to get to know herself, or had been robbed of the opportunity.

At the estate she changed clothes in her tiny box of a bedroom and ventured past Fujita's room down the way. The door was open so she poked her face inside, "Hey! What are you grinning about?"

Fujita looked up suddenly from what was obviously a letter, "Uh. My friend writes for a…satirical magazine."

That was a good save but it was still untrue. "That's from your girl in Waterfall, isn't it?"

"…yeah." He slouched from his seat on the floor atop a zabuton cushion.

Tenten smiled at him, "Does she actually write for a magazine?"

"Fū submits her joke articles, but nothing's been published so far." Fujita rolled up his correspondence, "We're just pen pals."

She leaned on the doorframe and folded her arms, "Don't sound so forlorn like you're a star-crossed lover or something…"

"I'm not!" His cheeks puffed, "It's just…she recently came back from a mission to the Hidden Star Village and told me about it. Said she wants to see the Hidden Leaf Village too…but the Hokage isn't entertaining any requests from Hidden Waterfall right now."

"Well, Tsunade-sama is up to her eyeballs in security threats. Can you blame her?"

"No, of course not. It's that…if I put in a request to see Fū it'd just get denied."

"Right. Because you need to have a good reason to travel to Takigakure. The leader of that village isn't going to let a rando mingle with their jinchuriki at a time like this. Both of our villages are on edge."

"I know. But if we formalized an agreement like the one we have with Suna, we could look out for one another!"

Tenten was amused, "Maybe. Have you ever acted as an envoy before to try to persuade foreign counselors?"

"…no…"

"Me neither. We're not exactly suited for that kind of job."

"But I want to—!"

"I know, I know. Come on. We don't want to keep Mom and Dad from dinner." Tenten took a backwards step out of the room.

Fujita hopped up from the floor and followed after her down the corridor. He was quite pleased that Tenten was comfortable enough to refer to her adoptive parents so informally. And the evening meal was a cordial affair, particularly since Kayato led off with the tale of organizing costume work for a film depicting the legendary Sanada Ten Braves. Her outfit designs from the Chunin Exam had gotten noticed by a studio executive.

"Wouldn't be the first time!" Hideyasu noted merrily as he worked around bones in a fish fillet.

Fujita poured tea for his mother, "That's great, Mom. Will you have to travel for work?"

"I might. We'll see what kind of contract they send me." Kayato sighed, "But with there being a lot of rogue ninja activity, I'm not so eager to set foot outside of Hidden Leaf right now."

Her husband echoed the sentiment as he nodded and chewed.
"Every twelve to eighteen hours we've been on watch duty." Tenten was referring to herself and Fujita, "But soon Hokage-sama will have to end the security alert. The intruder that snuck in is long gone by now. I don't think they'd double back with there being such much presence on by-pass routes and vulnerable areas. We're turning a blind eye to everything else while in this state."

"Which most certainly is a problem." Hideyasu gestured with his chopsticks, "But the Hokage thinks it is better to defend our own vulnerabilities and outsource external missions to allies like Suna. If any teams from Sand were here as sentinels, this breach would be a grave concern to Suna's counselors. They might think the Kazekage were showing favoritism if he allocated a large portion of his own forces to protect Konoha. The idea is that we should be able to defend ourselves." He took another bite of food, "But Tao Arts have proven to be a unique threat."

"Very few people can use them." Tenten reminded him.

"Even one is enough to stymie several Jounin who can't stop a Tao Art. We can't be overconfident." He held out a plate of spicy eggplant in sauce to his adoptive daughter, "Have you tried this? You're gonna love it."

She gave it a try and was impressed with the dish.

"…hey, Dad?" Fujita was popping mushrooms into his mouth one by one, a bit timid about addressing his father.

"Yes, Fujita."

"What would it take to suggest a formal alliance with a smaller village?" He asked.

"About what it took for Shiogakure to get an alliance with us: a lot of money and trade deals."

"But who pitches the idea?"

"Silver-tongued business people." Hideyasu chuckled.

"Well, it's something I've been thinking about."

Hideyasu exchanged a boggled look with his wife. Tenten sat by and ate, not driven to interrupt her adoptive brother in his mousy quest.

"I think now is a great time to reach out to Takigakure to fortify our defenses against the Akatsuki." Fujita sat a bit straighter, "And I think Kitano-sama is a better businessman than I am, so I want to ask him to help me set up an assembly with Waterfall's leader and advisory council. The Taketori clan would assist us with this sort of thing, right?"

"Whoa, well, first of all…" Hideyasu set his drink down after a sip, "You need authorization from the Hokage to approach another village, which is also reviewed by our village's advisory council. Then they get to decide which emissaries are sent to Waterfall, but since it was your idea I'm reasonably sure they'd send you and our Taketori vassals."

"So, you think maybe it could happen?"

"I don't know!" His father was smiling widely, "But it'd be cool if my kid organized an alliance."

"We already have a good track record with Hidden Waterfall." Tenten backed the claim up, "So even if there isn't a lucrative trade deal attached to it, the additional defenses might be a selling point."
Hideyasu and Kayato tittered proudly.

Fujita steeled his resolve, "How do I submit my request to the Hokage and her council?"

"In a very nice looking entreaty on letterhead parchment. I'll have Arisu-san go over it with you to spiff it up." Hideyasu offered, "Then we'll see what happens. I'll also give Magan-sama the heads up about your idea. I'm sure he'd be happy to work with us and give this project to Kitano."

"Thank you, Dad!"

The two flashed goofball smiles at each other while Kayato shook her head, always tickled by their antics. When the meal wound down and Hideyasu agreed to play a few rounds of Koi-Koi with Fujita on the porch, Kayato had a suspicious, motherly eye trained on Tenten as they retreated further into the house, "Seems to me like you don't want to chat and watch me work on embroidery."

"It's not that… I just… haven't been feeling right today." Tenten motioned at her ribcage where the slogging feeling persisted.

Kayato pressed the back of her hand to Tenten's forehead and cheeks, cool to the touch, "You aren't sick— maybe out of sorts, is that it?" She rubbed the girl's back, "Because you miss Neji."

"Nah, it's not really that either." She was handling Neji's absence rather well.

"Oh! I won't tell him you didn't miss him." Kayato laughed softly, "Get some sleep then. You'll have another long day tomorrow."

"Most likely."

"If there's anything you ever want to talk about, I've got a keen set of ears." She gave Tenten a warm squeeze before proceeding towards her work room, "Goodnight, dear."

"Goodnight." Tenten stopped at her bedroom door and watched the wonderful woman disappear down the corridor. Even though she could never get her own mother back, Kayato was a wellspring of love and wisdom Tenten hoped to one day deserve.

There was no need to flip the light switch on. Tenten sealed the door, redressed in sleep clothes, and wrestled a futon out of a cupboard to lay it flat on the floor. Her body felt like lead as she sunk onto the bedding, still cognizant of the internal twinge that had plagued her for most of the day. With her eyes shut, the dimness was calm and cloying. Everything under her fingertips felt unusually plush. Silk pajamas had been a luxurious gift from Kayato, but they hadn't yet kissed her skin like this— on a night she'd been so dog-tired.

Her thoughts circled the drain: Softness. Letterhead. Spicy Eggplant. Red leaves on trees. What was Neji doing? A weapon order was due next week. Her stomach swirling. Her dad's beautiful handwriting. Hand stands. Hand stands.

Sleep was deep and voluminous, a shade of green so dark it was nearly black like the ocean bottom, swaying with strands of deep sea kelp. Tenten could drown in it, but she held still in the pitch and breathed it in. After all, the dark wanted her there. They were made of the same thing.

Fingers touched her forehead so she cracked an eye open, though she couldn't see much.

"I'm here."

Oh yeah. Apparently he was here. You know, "he, " Her brain was jogged, The very important one.
Her eyes cooperated a bit more. Tenten blinked up in the dimness at Neji as he leaned over to examine her, as if her choice to opt for an early bedtime and not wait up for him was most peculiar. Whatever time it was, she knew it was later at night. He sat on the edge of the futon and waited for some sort of response.

A soft, cracking coo sound escaped her before she could form words, "It's still soft."

"What is?"

"Everything."

Judging by Neji's facial expression, he was happy to see her and amused by her sleep-delirious communication.

Tenten asked in a croak, "Am I awake?"

"In some capacity, you are. I wanted you to know that I'm here."

"Back from your mission. It went well?"

"It went well."

" Hmm." She scrunched her eyes, "Lee made me do hand stands."

"Ah." He hummed. It was almost a chuckle. Neji bent down to kiss her; she was slow and clumsy under his mouth.

Tenten grunted in appreciation. There was no way she could stay awake, but all the same it was great to know Neji was home safe. His kisses definitely tasted like someone who'd been away for a while and missed her. That was nice.

He sat up again and said, "I'll clean up and sleep. Don't leave for training without me, in the morning."

"Don't you want to take the morning off?"

"No. I'm not that tired."

"I am." As if it were not plain to see how worn she was.

"In the morning, usual time." It was a gentle command. Quiet like a night breeze, Neji left the room and shut the door.

Then she was back in the heavy dark. A fraction of an hour passed before her sleep became less restful, and Tenten woke to find her face pressed into the polished hardwood floor. She raised her head slowly to glance around.

Somehow, she'd rolled off of her wide futon and ended up near the wall of the room— it was no typical distance for a snoozing individual to cover. Tenten slept still as a board most nights. She rubbed a spot of drool from her lip and crawled back onto her futon, unconcerned with the random relocation. She slipped back into the dense slumber.

The midnight of her mind pooled and dripped over objects unseen, a tenuous chiaroscuro. It was an interesting, shaded dreamscape. Then, the top of her head tapped something. She was barely awake. It was hard for Tenten to move her sluggish limbs. She raised her hand to examine the object behind her head, feeling cool, flat metal. When she stretched her legs, she could feel the wood paneling of a wall beneath her bare feet.

'This is weird.' A blip of a thought. The dimensions of her room weren't like this. Though she was living in a shoebox habitation, it wasn't this bad. Had the walls closed in? It didn't feel like she had dreamt it. She'd just rolled over again to get comfortable, and then the room no longer felt right. She patted her hand again on the unknown surface behind her. 'What's this thing? Feels like a bucket or a...I don't know. Must be big. This wasn't here before...'

It was still pitch dark when she opened her eyes, as to be expected of late night. Though, wasn't there a window in her room? Not much good came of trying to move her leaden body, and since there seemed to be no life-threatening peril, Tenten shut her eyes again to drift to sleep. Maybe it was a nutty dream caused by that eggplant dish at dinner time?

A door slid aside with a clack, which was slightly jarring, but she stayed bunched in a ball because comfort levels were peaking.

"Tenten."

Oh great. That voice didn't sound pleased. She wriggled back to consciousness as best she could, blearily looking up the faint light of the hallway on her left, where Neji's silhouette blocked the doorway.

"What are you doing?"

"Sleeping." Why did she have to explain herself?

Something in his voice was sharp with alarm. Come to think of it, it didn't feel like her futon was under her anymore. She was back on hardwood. It helped that Neji bent down to scoop her up and quickly figured out she was in no state to walk due to sleep paralysis. That was another clue. She hadn't been sleep-walking.

"You," He said as he carried her through a dark hallway, "Were in the facilities closet."

"Ah, no." She was waking up more, "I'm in bed. What are you doing here? Bothering me."

"You are on the west side of the house."

Tenten entered into a half-baked state of concern, because she knew her bedroom was in the east wing, closer to where Hideyasu, Kayato, and Fujita resided. Had he said facilities closet? She'd been patting the boiler in the dark, trying to figure out what it was. 'That's just sad.' Also— what?

"How did I...?" She stopped to yawn. She didn't remember bringing herself to a closet on the far side of the mansion.

At the turn near the front of the house, Neji hesitated to continue eastbound. He was thinking. His shoulder was somewhat comfortable so she rested her cheek on it.

"If you're left alone you might Shadow Step again."

"Pff. I don't do that."

"I know you don't." His voice was low and warm, consoling, "You don't realize what you do when you sleep, but I saw you."

"...checked on me—?" Another yawn, "Before you...go t'bed?"
He back tracked slightly and decided, no, putting a sleepy, shadow-travelling person back where she started just might produce the same result. Tenten didn't seem at all aware of what was actually going on. In his room, which was on the ground floor with southward facing windows, Neji deposited her on the moonlit side of the bed. Hopefully she wouldn't roll in any shadows.

He flopped down in exhaustion beside the snoring woman and wondered what good it would do to keep watch over Tenten. He almost hadn't believed it when he saw it with the Byakugan, before settling down for the night: Tenten disappeared from view in her room, and reappeared in a west-wing closet.

Based on Hinata's descriptions of Huo's ability in the Exam, and Tenten's common lineage with the brute, Neji had always reserved the possibility in the back of his mind. That Tenten might one day use a Tao Art. What he had witnessed, however, was not by any means intentional. Tenten had tapped into something subconsciously.

Neji stretched out his arm to encircle her middle and pressed himself into Tenten's back. This wasn't exactly allowed. If the eyes of any senior member of the clan noticed him cozying up to a person he wasn't married to, he'd catch an earful over it. There were strict lines of propriety in the Hyuga clan, and bedrooms were not spaces for co-mingling. Though, he had no untoward intentions, and only sought to ensure Tenten did not wake up in the morning hugging a hot water boiler. It was just for now.

Besides, he had ran himself ragged on a reconnaissance mission. Maybe overdoing it on his first Jounin assignment was unnecessary. Most people Neji worked with were consistently impressed. He only wanted to feel Tenten breathing slowly and remember why and what he endeavored for. Even in sleep, he could remember.

Neji's waking instincts reacted shortly before morning sunlight brushed his face. He coiled and stretched where he lay and, ah, yes, there she was. Unmoved and tucked into him, Tenten's head was heavy on the edge of a flattened pillow. Where her shirt rode up, his fingertips danced along the skin of her stomach. She didn't smell like a garden or bright honeyed things, but there was something that was so unequivocally her when a lock of Tenten's unbound hair passed under his nose. How long had he known it? The scent was familiar now.

She wasn't stirring naturally like she usually did at this hour. Maybe Tenten had been serious about skipping the early morning routine? If they did, they would probably make up for training later. The shadowy journey she had taken in the night was not conducive to productivity, Neji figured. And also, he preferred holding her and mapping the layout of bones and muscles beneath her skin, tracing his hand over her slight features. He indulged in the exploration for a while, a traveler all through her landscapes, his fingers retreating when she shifted or twitched at a touch. Neji finally spread his hand flat on her hip, and waited for a persistent but unusable erection to pass.

It didn't take any palmistry on his part to know that she would stay asleep if left undisturbed. Since he had learned how naturally generous he was these last few months, Neji elected to let Tenten be. His only selfish concession was a set of cloud-soft kisses along her neck and behind her ear. That would have to hold him over. Then Neji padded a quilt around Tenten before rising up, listening to the crack of his knees as he moved across the room. His hair didn't require much brushing before he dressed, frequently glancing back at the object of his affection. She wasn't going to disappear. Whatever had overcome her in the night had ceased in his presence.

Within the house there was a frenzy of activity as cleaning and meal preparation efforts escalated before noon-time. Based on what a staff member had to chirped to Neji as an explanation, "The Head of the Aburame clan will be here for an in-house meeting with Hiashi-sama and Hideyasu-sama."

This was news to Neji, "Why?"

"To make amends for some rude remarks that circulated, and were not denied by Taketori clansmen."

"Rude remarks..." Neji muttered, wondering who in the Hyuga wanted to bad-mouth an allied clan leader. The Branch member raced away to prepare a tea room for occupation. He had a feeling he wouldn't be able to access a typical breakfast this morning.

When he rounded the corner, Hanabi stomped up to him, "You'd think the daimyo himself was coming here for an audience. Someone stepped on my foot!"

"You know better than to get in their way."

"I was just minding my own business, I wasn't in the way!" She surmised that Neji was also after a morning meal, so they circumnavigated towards a porch exit, preparing to breakfast in the ancillary house, "Did you go upstairs, Onii-san?"

"I didn't—"

"Don't. There's no need. I already caught her a third time, she's really got no shame..."

Neji was not sure he knew to whom Hanabi was referring.

She cleared it up, "Hinata, that's who. My big sis has been linking her mind with her boyfriend. Constantly! It's so annoying. Every time I tried to talk to her after her mission yesterday, it was Naruto-this! Naruto-that! Can't you tell a rival of yours to bug off for a while, hmm?"

"I would not call Naruto a rival." Neji assessed honestly, "He's my friend."

"Yeah, well I don't think you'd say that if you knew what a relentless flirt he is! Spouting romance that could gag a poet. And my sister eats it up!" Hanabi stepped up to a covered porch.

"A...flirt...?" Neji did not appreciate this update.

"You really ought to watch out for him, Onii-san. He's the determined type. I couldn't handle someone like that— not that I need attention from a boy, pff— no! I don't want to sigh and trade wistful looks, it's way too stupid."

"Hanabi..."

"...I didn't say anything." She retracted the incriminating remark as she sat at a table, "I didn't say anything..."

"You want me to police what Naruto is up to, but it sounds to me like you've got your own entanglements." Neji kept his voice lowered so his aunt Hizome's youngsters, Tsukuru and Hirokazu, wouldn't overhear the exchange as they played nearby with spinning tops.

"I have no entanglements!" Hanabi hissed quietly, "I have a dead-end interest, there's a difference! No harm, no foul! You have an entanglement in your bed right now, Onii-san!"

Neji warned her, "And you won't be speaking one word about it." Leave it to the meddlesome whip of a girl to use her Byakugan and dig up morning gossip.
"You know better!"

"Of course I do."

"Then why break the rules?" Hanabi reached for a plate of croquettes on the tea table and began pounding them back. Ha! She had her cousin cornered, teetering on the edge of hypocrisy.

Sitting straight-backed, Neji clarified the situation, "Do you question my honor? I've done nothing improper. Tenten was Shadow-Stepping in her sleep."

Halfway through a bite of food, a croquette dropped back onto a plate as Hanabi processed the claim.

"I found her in the boiler closet."

"No you didn't."

"It's true."

"But only that horrible piece of trash from the Exam can Shadow Step!" Hanabi was trying and failing to keep her voice down, "He almost killed my sister!"

"Relax. This has nothing to do with Huo. Tenten's family can use Tao Arts too."

"Hmf." Hanabi's emotional eating resumed.

"Tenten didn't go anywhere after I stayed with her."

"What'd you have to do? Tie her down?" The joke was very uncouth, and Hanabi almost regretted it, but she did adore the furious and mortified look on her cousin's face.

Neji needed a moment to gather some composure to threaten the firebrand, "Test me again and I'll have Gai-sensei tutoring you for the next twelve months."

Hanabi cleaned the plate and replied, "I'd rather plunge headfirst into hell, thank you very much."

"You'd get no such mercy from me."

"Yeesh, you're scary. Fine. So don't do anything about Naruto and my sister. See what happens!" She shrugged it off, "And isn't it weird that your girlfriend used a Tao Art? Should we be worried about that?"

"There's nothing to worry about." Neji capped it definitively as the young Branch boys came indoors for the larger spread of food that was served, and aunt Hizome also joined them at the table for a meal.

"Are things a bit busy on your side of the property?" Hizome noticed, "Alright, eat a little and then get lost! This is my family's food! Nyozeka hasn't eaten yet and he has a mission today."

They did as she asked and took a pauper's serving each before politely excusing themselves. Hanabi, somehow, caused no further mischief before she left estate grounds for the Academy.

Neji crossed the lawn back to the Main House and returned to his room through the porch door. As he stepped inside, he could see Tenten rising lethargically into a sitting position. Like a dizzy eaglet in a nest, she blinked at the unusual environment and tried to piece together what landed her in such a nicely-appointed room. An amazing, elated feeling tickled his insides. This was perfect. Seeing her like this was perfect.

Tenten fussed at the collar of her sleep shirt, "Mn. Mornin'…"

"Good morning." He bent down and balanced his arms on either side of her, taking a sleepy kiss from Tenten while he could get it. The pressure of Neji's mouth on her own nearly fooled her into looping her arms 'round his neck and reeling him in, but Tenten thought better of it.

"You're trying to get me in trouble…" She pushed back on his shoulders and kicked the quilt off, "I got the anti-cohabitation memo, Neji; didn't you? And though I may have fantasized about your bed several times, Hideyasu says don't commit the crime if you can't do the time…"

"I wasn't going to—"

"You're pitching a tent." Tenten pointed out the slant in his bottoms as she crawled away from her sleeping spot, then stood to stretch. Neji frowned at her for drawing attention to his (mostly) involuntary bodily functions.

She glanced around again, "Say…how did I get here?"

"I brought you to my room last night."

A small gasp, "Were you actually trying to put the moves on me—?"

"No." Neji halted her allegations, "You really don't remember?"

"Being kidnapped in the night—?"

"You Shadow-stepped into the facilities closet. That's where I found you." He brought her up to speed.

Tenten stilled at the edge of his bedroom, her expression calcifying with serious consideration. Her eyes shifted left, then right, before she pressed her hand against a shadow on the wall cast by Neji as he stood illuminated by a window. Tenten only devoted a few seconds to focusing, pushing and grunting before she decided, "Well, if I did, I don't know what the on/off switch for it is." Tenten tapped her foot in a shaded patch before she promptly gave up and left the room, adding over her shoulder, "I'll meet you outside in ten minutes."

In truth, Neji would have been more surprised if Tenten had instantly found the means to tap into a dormant ability. The trigger for it was still elusive, though she had not called him a liar or denied what may have happened in the night. She was more casual about her dismissal. And though he did not want to think much about what Hanabi had said over breakfast, he did feel ill-at-ease over Tenten's one-off use of Tao Art. What was the range of it? Could she transport herself unknowingly into danger? Did she make herself more vulnerable when she did so? What if he wasn't around the next time it happened?

He made his bed with military precision, and then outfitted himself with the few weapons and scrolls he needed before stepping out onto the engawa. Neji remembered some of the other curious things Hanabi had mentioned.

Hinata was in frequent contact with Naruto, thanks to the newly named Samanvaya technique she used with the Misago Byakugan. Neji had been aware that she could reach Naruto that way, but never gave much thought to how often his cousin was linking her mind and senses to Naruto's. Apparently, the answer was a lot. He was not upset by this information, nor the implication that Naruto was "a flirt" because that behavior wasn't unlike his usual extroversion, only now he'd focused that energy on one intended recipient, and, well, That's as it should be. Naruto had no impure intentions for his cousin, of this Neji was very sure.

And the other thing Hanabi had mumbled about— a one-sided affection for someone! And that she excused herself of all wrongdoing because her feelings were unrequited by whoever it was. Frankly, someone her age should not feel romantically about anyone. Even if her Graduation Test was scheduled for the end of the week, Neji would forever see that girl as a child, especially when she acted like one. Maybe his uncle needed to be informed? No. No good could come of it. Hanabi often dug her own holes and accepted the consequences when the backlash hit.

Gosh, this family kept him busy. These days Neji was exceedingly fond of them, and felt disappointed that he'd distanced himself from clan relatives when he'd been younger. The more he opened his heart up, the more genuine his desire to better and protect his clan felt. That ambition had been so half-assed back in his Academy days, to borrow a term from Naruto.

Tenten appeared again wearing her standard red and white cheongsam, weapon holsters in place, and Fujita was trotting out of the house excitedly beside her. He had official-looking Hyuga clan correspondence in his hand.

"Fujita is going to accompany us to the Administrative Building, since he has a proposal to submit. I want to vouch for his idea too before we check in and see if any missions are scheduled…" Tenten explained, trailing off into a yawn as she covered her mouth.

"What sort of proposal?" Neji asked as they walked off the property together.

"I wanted to suggest an alliance between Leaf and Waterfall." Fujita announced.

Neji did not even blink, "We have an informal truce."

"But I think something formal is better! They're a small village…"

"And so they don't have much to offer." Neji was playing devil's advocate unconsciously.

"Lee-kun said that Waterfall's leader wants to develop relationships with the five Great Villages. And it isn't so far away from Hidden Leaf!" Fujita tried again.

"Arguably, Waterfall is closer geographically to Rock." Neji countered, just based on pure observation.

Fujita's face fell. Tenten saw this and discreetly pinched the back of Neji's arm to alert him to the downward trajectory of the conversation. He frowned at the slight pain and she frowned at his frown.

"I don't say any of this to discourage you, but these are things that our council will notice." Neji tried to salvage what he could, "And your motivations to ally with Takigakure seem to be…more personal." He didn't want to bring up that he knew Fujita was enamored with the jinchuriki in Waterfall.

"I guess so. It would take time to see any real economic impact through a formal agreement, that's what Arisu-san told me. And…it might benefit Waterfall more than Leaf, which councilors may not like…" Fujita supposed, "But the overall benefit is still important. Militarily, anyway. No village wants jinchuriki to be taken by the Akatsuki. And villages that work together can prevent that from happening."

Tenten nodded, "At least that benefits both villages."
Neji was still skeptical, "Would the Hokage really want to risk the lives of her ninja to protect another village's—?"

"She already did!" Fujita grew impatient, "The Hokage agreed to the same thing with the Tide Village, so there's a precedent."

"It didn't work." Neji reminded him.

Tenten sensed that her adoptive younger brother was about to blow his lid. She watched Fujita stomp ahead of them, growling, "Onii-sama you don't know everything. There's still a chance! A chance that we can save them! What about our village's jinchuriki? Don't you think we should care about that person too? We've got to do something!"

Neji blinked as the young man crossed the street in a hurry, rushing through the building's entrance to get a head start on meeting with the Hokage. Tenten cleared her throat beside Neji to get his attention as they walked. He looked at her, realizing he'd unnecessarily incensed Fujita.

A smile of concern tilted Tenten's lips, "Why do you have to shit on him, Neji?"

"I… didn't mean to."

"He's young. If he's going to fail, don't hand him a list of all the ways he can do it. Let Fujita make his own list so he can look at it and grow from it." Tenten recommended, "Isn't that what you had to do?"

"Yes." He admitted.

"That's what I thought. I could probably fill an entire Tool Scroll if I wrote down all the things I screwed up." Tenten imagined.

This notion fascinated Neji. Tenten, as the wise and rational individual he regularly depended on, was not one he'd peg for rampant mistake-making. He could think of no example. In his mind, Tenten's record was pristine, but that was probably because love tweaked his recollection of her past errors. Neji watched her face interestingly as she led the way into the Administrative Building, and then up the main stairwell.

When they arrived at Tsunade's office and knocked once at the door, the Hokage barked for them to enter. Neji and Tenten did so and discovered Fujita beside Tsunade's desk, more composed and calm than he'd been before. Tsunade had the entreaty unwound in front of her, tapping her nail on a particular block of information.

She acknowledged the visiting pair briefly, "Just a moment, you two." Tsunade turned to Fujita, "Your reasoning is a bit shaky to say the least, but a few good points have been made. Do you know Waterfall's jinchuriki personally?"

"Yes, ma'am." Fujita confirmed.

"I see." Tsunade reached for a drawer and extracted an official seal from it, "I'll let you present this to the council this afternoon. I have no idea how they'll react but I can say that I have no objection to fortifying bonds with Hidden Waterfall. In spite of the recent attack on the Tide Village, we've made a fortune off of trade with them already. Things didn't go as planned, but the relationship is stable. Stability has value. There are also a few Tide ninja who liaise with our council, who may warm Leaf dignitaries to this idea of yours." She stamped the parchment and rolled up the scroll, handing it back to Fujita, "I hope it goes well."
He bowed respectfully without smiling too much, "Thank you, Tsunade-sama."

"We'll circle back on this tomorrow." She told Fujita as he exited the office. He flashed a stage one complete! face at his elders before hurrying out.

Tsunade then leveled her stare on Neji and Tenten, "Every time I see the two of you I think of what is possible through sheer perseverance."

"Um. Thank you." Tenten said.

"Are there any assignments you have for us?" Neji pressed on.

"Not as a team. Individually, yes. Minor tasks." Tsunade stowed away her official seal again, "The security alert has ended, though we'll still have increased patrols. I've called back two search teams that did not find any evidence of an intruder outside of the village. Thus far." She pointed to Neji, "Can you do me a favor? It isn't exactly a mission."

Neji nodded and Tsunade went on, "Sarutobi Asuma's injuries are healed, for the most part. He asked to postpone Sato's Jounin Evaluation that's scheduled for tomorrow. I want to grant Asuma time off, but I honestly don't think he needs it." She sighed, "Either you substitute for him at the Evaluation, which I am not cancelling, or convince him that he's being dramatic and he can still handle one measly test. I'm already prepared to promote Sato and I have work for him, but I need the certifications over and done with."

Wow. Neji already knew that he did not want to substitute for an Evaluation after dealing with Hatake Sato during the Chunin Exam. Neither was he sure that he could say anything to motivate Asuma, but as a fellow and novice Jounin, maybe he could gently shame the veteran into it? He could try. With that, Neji told the Hokage, "I'll do what I can to convince him, Hokage-sama."

"See that you do. Asuma is on the first floor waiting for his students. Strike up a conversation." Tsunade then beckoned Tenten closer, "You stay here with me, please. I'll send you downstairs shortly."

On the way out of the office, Neji glanced over his shoulder once at Tenten, wondering what she was needed for. When the door shut behind him, the Hokage leaned back in her desk chair and let her confident airs drop. This change tightened the muscles in Tenten's neck and back. She tried reading the village leader's expression and body language while waiting in silence, but Tenten could not decipher much.

"You can sit if you want." Tsunade noted an armchair recently set in front of her desk.

"Is everything alright, Tsunade-sama?" She asked hopefully as she took a seat.

"No. And I don't want to unload everything on you. The Hokage first and foremost should get a grip on the most alarming of threats…but sometimes these things must trickle down. I can't let you be uninformed about what's been going on." Tsunade adjusted her position to rest her elbows on the desktop, "I don't know much about Tao Arts or the ones that use them. Because of the attacks on this village, I've had to better understand why we have the attention of a rogue cell in the first place."

It was good that she chose to sit. She'd be fidgeting if she was still standing. Tenten felt her palms get clammy as she flattened them on armrests, "It's for the same reason my parents had their attention." Tenten could not deny what was now so obvious.

"The Sandaime left behind a written record that detailed Konoha's past conflict with Dintei Bi and his followers. From what I understand, they were of a cadet family to the main branch of your clan, formerly based in the Earth Country. After a coup that deposed the main… and killed most other bystanders, Bi tried saving face with the Tsuchikage by eliminating Iwa's enemies during the war. After a time that arrangement was no longer favorable, and the Third Tsuchikage called for his arrest. Naturally, Bi decided to disappear instead." Tsunade tried to condense the tale, "And he was not unaware that a few survivors took refuge in the Fire Country, which was part of an armistice trade of prisoners the Tsuchikage sanctioned. At that point, he dedicated his time and energy to hunting these refugees."

"He didn't miss a mark." Tenten noted morbidly.

"Could you please not say it like that?" Tsunade grumbled, "You're still here. For good or ill."

"We both know that it probably isn't good when Konoha has already dealt with collateral damage." A withered breath escaped Tenten, "Back when my… parents were killed… I'd already thought about turning myself over."

"You were a child."

"I still think about it."

"You were a child. And children think stupid things because every problem must have a simple solution." The Hokage bent forward and curled her fingers, "The martyr attitude can't resolve much when your willing demise would only cause more issues. For one: the weapons you have."

"Clan weapons, yeah." Tenten acknowledged what Tsunade was getting at.

"They're Tao Weapons."

"I… guess?" She hadn't given it too much thought.

"So they are only useful to a certain sort, and are potently dangerous. The Third felt it was more responsible to let you maintain ownership over these weapons as opposed to locking them away or ransoming them. If Bi acquired them, he could do far more damage to any target if they were at his disposal."

"Maybe that's one upside, but I still need to point out that I'm outnumbered."

"Outnumbered? The Leaf Village's forces can rout a band of eleven."

"But Leaf struggles to deal with Tao Arts, and Bi's subordinates rely on ambushes, not full-frontal confrontations. That's why no one's been able to counter them so far. And maybe that method is being imitated by the Akatsuki—"

"No matter their methods, they can't win. They're already at a disadvantage." The Hokage had to have her say, "Nukenin and rogue groups target individuals in this village more often than you realize, and will pick off affiliated villagers as a taunt. Turning you over, or turning those weapons over is simply out of the question. The Hyuga clan would never stand for it."

That touched a very sore spot of Tenten's, prompting her to nearly shriek, "Don't bring them into this." She sat back and apologized faintly, "Please. I don't want them to. It's bad enough…"

"What's bad enough-?" Tsunade laced her hands under her chin.

Tenten boiled over again, "—it's bad enough that Hikune's dead!"
"I know." Tsunade replied evenly.

"I won't let it happen to anyone else. I should've thought more—"

"Maybe you should've," Tsunade agreed harshly, "Thought more. Thought more about the jeopardy you've brought upon one of this village's chieftain clans. And that you have not yet openly discussed this predicament with its leadership. It's not my place to meddle in a delicate matter like that, but I've thought more than once about saying something."

Winded by the gruff reality that the Hokage had flung at her, Tenten sunk into the backrest and tried to breathe. Had she been pontificating about mistakes earlier? What would she have to say on the subject now?

"I don't want you to lead a life of solitude in the hope it spares others from Bi's wrath, because it most likely won't. Nor do I think it is fair of you to imperil the Hyuga clan without it knowing the scope of your circumstances." Tsunade made it clear, "But I want you to take more responsibility. Even if that means you preemptively strike these rats at their source, I'd rest easier knowing you'd do that in the defense of Konoha."

She felt her face get hot, her throat tight, "Of course I would."

"You have two of the three heirloom weapons, is that right? Well, I would prefer it if you had them all." The Hokage sat up straighter, "And that you make those men sorry they ever dared to look for you."

"I don't know where to find the last one…" Tenten swallowed some of her grief, "I never even thought to—"

"I do." Tsunade said.

The young woman stilled in her seat and stared at the Hokage, desperate in her attention.

"I have some intelligence from a reliable informant that the weapon, Chōten, has been tracked through the hands of various owners and is for sale. Not very many realize what it actually is, or what it can do for a particular wielder." Tsunade explained, "One of the Fourth Hokage's contemporaries has been following it. Now that he's pinpointed Chōten, I've asked him to retrieve it for me."

"How soon?"

"Within the next month or so, we'll see how that mission pans out. Though I am sure that what we've heard did not escape the ears of Dintei Bi either." The Hokage rubbed her chin thoughtfully, "So you'll stay here and I'll keep you informed of how it turns out."

"Alright." Unable to handle her restless legs, Tenten stood to fidget, "I might...be able to use Tao Arts. On my own."

"Then learn how. You're better equipped than other shinobi to deal with this threat in every sense. And as you said, this faction may have common interests with the Akatsuki. If we have an opportunity to put an end to Huo, Bihokokuni, and the rest...I intend to take it." Tsunade told her, "It isn't easy knowing how many in this village depend on you to act in their defense. I too have lost sleep over it, Tenten. So please do as I've asked and make certain that the Hyuga clan is willing to stick its nose in this conflict, and if it isn't— accept that."

"I will." The full body sweat Tenten had been fighting dampened her top considerably.
"I have no tasks for your team for the next two days, but if that changes you'll hear of it." Tsunade dismissed her after that.

Tenten woodenly walked out of the office, pondering how the most distinguished role model in her life ground her face into the mud of a crisis she had tried to ignore. She was a sweatball, breathing shallowly, hyper-aware of each person she had encountered in the last 48 hours and how she could not risk inaction. Their lives were still at stake no matter how safe she felt. All because they were bonded to her.

The stairwell was vacant as she took rigid steps down, trying to grasp something that had tormented her father his whole life. Surely she would find it in his journal if she looked— how he tried to find ways to minimize the damage. Tried not to risk the lives of those who knew him. Tenten stopped on a landing before reaching the second floor. If she returned to the lobby and saw Neji there, she might bite her tongue off. If only to avoid spilling the unfortunate truth in a public place, choked on her emotions, Tenten wished to stage some diversion to avoid bringing it up. At least until she had processed her distress.

‘If I’d… really examined the big picture when it started to come together…’ She took several breaths through her nostrils, ‘I would’ve known that… I shouldn’t have started something with Neji. I shouldn’t have gotten close to anyone, really, but it felt like if I didn’t then I’d have nothing.’ Which was the crux of it, so to speak. Having something to lose was as much of a gamble as having nothing to live for. Youth and teamwork had kept Tenten adequately distracted from the rock bottom reality, but she couldn’t unlearn what she now knew.

She turned to the window of the landing and pushed it open, ‘I just need to do something that feels normal. Just for a while.’ The shop. Handstands at the training field. A basketful on dumplings. Any of that would do. Tenten vaulted out of the window, crossed clay roof shingles, and dropped down into the alley, in full retreat.

Below on the first floor, Neji watched as she made a run for it.

Chapter End Notes

Though my soul may set in darkness, it will rise in perfect light;

I have loved the stars too truly to be fearful of the night.

—From Sarah Williams’ The Old Astronomer

Chapter 52- Haunt
Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Soundtrack: "Erase" Hyorin x Jooyoung (feat. Iron)

The day after Hatake Sato completed a Jounin Evaluation under Asuma and Raido's supervision, the positive endorsement was given to Tsunade, who then approved the promotion within minutes. I.D. and documentation updates would go through processing downstairs, though Tsunade did not much care about the final print stuff. She accepted a pocky stick when Sato offered one to her. They were examining a cork board on the wall of her office.

"See this? This map is out of date. I'm waiting on one final intelligence report before I dispatch you to the Toi Mine." Tsunade nibbled the cookie stick down, "I want you to do an ink transfer for me. The current map is at the way station there…"

"So like, it's a real solo mission?" He was also eating while speaking.

"Yes, Sato. You're a Jounin now. And the speed of your travel makes this assignment a no-brainer." She explained, "But next week I have something for you and your teammates to look into, if it doesn't clear up on its own near the border."

"Gotcha. Thanks for discharging Kakashi from the hospital this morning, by the way. He's happy he can crash at home. I guess I should tell him the good news…" Sato accepted the map Tsunade removed from the cork board.

"He probably already knows." She reached out and took another snack from the pocky box, then crossed back to her desk, "I suggest you tell Kurenai so that she can pat herself on the back, and then tell your fiancé, of course."

"Tama is gonna be so stoked!" He twirled the rolled up map like a baton.

"I heard the two of you may move to a home on the west side of the village. Don't." Tsunade advised, "The east side is much nicer. Consider the condominiums that overlook the orchards. If I weren't Hokage I'd be living there…"

"I think maybe for frugality's sake we'll start on the west side."

Tsunade huffed, "You're ruining my vicarious enjoyment of your young life."

"Is that what I'm doing?" Sato was mystified by the Hokage's complaint.

She pointed a pocky stick at him, "At least when you marry, make sure I receive an invitation."

"Sure!" He provided smiley reassurance, "We'd never exclude you, Hokage-sama. We're still in the planning phase, but once we hear back from the shrine about an open date for a ceremony I'll let you know."

Tsunade chewed her snack while commanding, "And don't skimp on the cuisine at your reception."
At the current residence of Hatake Sato; one of the flats within the concrete, decades-outdated apartment complex near Konoha's center, Maito Tama had made the bed, dressed, done a spot-clean in the bathroom and hung damp clothing to dry on the rooftop laundry line. She had begun to treat his home as if it were own. Well, perhaps not with the same manic level of care and maintenance required at her parents' house, but things were looking satisfactory. Most of the week she would spend time between the two locations, depending on her mission schedule.

'He'll be back soon, and he said he got an endorsement after yesterday's Exam...' Tama was smiling to herself as she prepared breakfast, rolling omelets in a pan. 'Sato is officially a Jounin today! I don't want to fall too far behind. I think I'll redouble my training over the winter and see if I can take an evaluation next year...'

She took the pan off of the stove and listened to a soft scratching noise at the door of the flat. Expectantly, Tama opened the door a crack to look down upon the waifish calico cat that wandered the building and begged for food. Its meow was patronizing.

"No." Tama shut the door slightly when it tried to barge in, "Go to the first floor, back to Miyazawa-san! He's your owner."

Another squeak and stare from demanding yellow eyes on its cute, round face.

"This is an owls-only pet area, Jingle-san. Go home. Shoo!"

The cat sat outside of the door with apex stubbornness, aware that omelets had been cooked. Tama blew out a long breath and exited the flat, scooping up Jingle the cat who did not wrestle or struggle as she was transported down the corridor. Down the stairwell, through the lobby, and back to the ground floor Miyazawa residence, Tama knocked twice. The door creaked open and she handed the cat back.

"She bein' a bother again? Sorry, miss." The man apologized.

"It's alright, Miyazawa-san."

Old man Miyazawa shut the door and scolded his cat's appetite. As Tama crossed through the lobby again, she noticed a lost soul trying to decide which direction to take in the building: a girl about her age with eclectic, colorful style. She was plucking at her copper hair nervously, and nearly jumped when Tama addressed her, "Excuse me, are you lost?"

"A bit! I haven't been here in a while. I think I need the...third floor. Or fourth floor?" She glanced around.

"I can help you," Tama ushered her along, "Who are you looking for?"

"I'm not sure. Bit of an odd guy, though I didn't get his name. A young shinobi, not twenty yet, I guess."

With that description, Tama supposed the young woman was looking for Sai, "I think you mean Sai-san! He's on my floor, a few doors down from me. I'm Tama, by the way."

"Thank you! Tsuchihashi Yuko, of Kusagakure."

"Oh wow, Hidden Grass? What brings you to Hidden Leaf?" Tama led the way as they scaled the staircase.

"Just stupid stuff. Pitekuyo-sama sent me here to deliver something to the Hokage, and I remembered
I bought all kinds of souvenirs for my family on the festival night before the Chunin Exam, when I was here last." Yuko sighed in disappointment, "I've been trying to remember where I left it all since that was a chunk of change to waste, and my Granny was annoyed with me."

"I see. Too caught up in the fun? I enjoyed that festival."

"Me too! There are soo many cute guys in this village. Lots of beat-faced and fang-toothed fellas where I'm from..."

"I've never been to Kusa, but I guess Konoha does have some gems." Tama kept up the small talk, "Pure probability, I'd say. We have the largest population of all the great villages."

"They should do a study on supermodels per capita here." Yuko assessed, "Since clearly you are one."

Tama laughed off the compliment and directed Yuko down the fourth floor hallway, pointing out Sai's residence, "Here you are."

"Thanks again, Tama-san!" The girl grinned and turned to the door.

Tama pressed on and returned to Sato's flat, washed her hands of cat hair, and resumed the morning ritual. She set out a coffee mug beside the percolator for when Sato returned, munching on rolled omelets as she puttered around. She glanced at the wall calendar, 'Okay. I've got a 3 hour shift at the bakery this morning, some free time, and then a team meeting this afternoon...'

There was a knock at the door. Her imagination asserted that Jingle the cat had become human and wished to haunt her in new ways, but Tama was gladdened to see an average human, Yuko, at the threshold. The girl looked uncomfortable.

"Yuko-san, is something the matter?" Tama had an unusual, serrated feeling in her gut.

"Well, uh...that Sai person...was not who I was looking for. He was strange, but I wasn't talking about a man that strange." Yuko amended, "I left my stuff with a young guy: silver hair, big blue eyes, good dancer. I know he's around here—"

Tama understood, "Sato."

Yuko snapped her fingers, "I think that was his name."

"He lives here." Tama informed her, "With me."

"Oh." The visitor's shoulders drooped, "You mean here? Where you're standing?"

"Don't you remember this place?"

"Not well. I was drunk—"

"After the festival, did you come here?" The questions started tumbling out.

"I, well, yeah...it was late. He said I could. Did he leave any of the things I bought—?"

"Nothing of yours is here." Tama told her sharply.

"...o-okay." As the awkward, queasy pause prevailed between them, Yuko seemed to have a better idea of why the conversation was shedding its cordial tone, "I didn't know...he was with someone. It didn't seem like it."
"Didn't seem like it?" Tama repeated.

"He was going home alone and instead of me getting back to the plaza inn, he, uh...he asked me. To go with him. I...I know that he'd stayed for a while at the fairgrounds and was drinking, but he was coherent. I didn't force him! I don't do shit like that." Yuko tottered anxiously on her feet, "I think he was just...ugh, how would I know? He was cute and I just met him. There was consent, but believe me, if I had known he had—"

Tama took a few backwards steps into the flat and filled her lungs once. Her vision and sense of balance were wavering, but her hearing was not impaired.

"—he had a girlfriend, I never would've gone near—!"

By the sound of it, Sato had been lucid enough to solicit a stranger right off the street. Not too long after she had gone home, if Tama's estimations were accurate.

"I am sorry! I don't even want that stuff back, it's—"

Somehow, colors in the room seemed abruptly blanched. She'd need more oxygen soon to keep trying to comprehend this information, but Tama wasn't enthusiastic about breathing at that point.

"...please, I'm sorry! If he didn't say anything— I'm nothing. I know that I'm nothing! Don't regard me as an obstacle in any sense! My whole life is in Hidden Grass, I've got no reason to ever come back here..." Yuko's apology rambled and did not have much of an effect.

Tama stepped forward again and stretch her arms in the doorway, eyes half-lidded and serious, "So you slept with him?"

"I..." The Grass kunoichi's eyes welled with tears, remorseful, "...I wasn't even...nice to him. I did. I'm sorry. With someone who's taken...that isn't something that I do...never before..."

Tama found a speck of willpower to take the other perspective, "You were deceived too."

Sniveling, Yuko wiped her nose on her sleeve, "I'm sorry...how'd I...? Why are people such good liars?" She tried to dry her face to a presentable state, "I know it's not worth anything to you, but I've never been this sorry in my life. I shouldn't have come looking..."

"Right." Tama concurred dryly, "Now leave."

In a blink, the girl had scurried down the corridor and escaped down the stairs. The air swirled with silence as Tama stood and sorted the facts. They plummeted through her brain, down an internal shaft to rip through her paper-thin heart, and landed with a soaking slosh in the acidic pits of her stomach.

How cruelly funny it felt to never once suspect a transgression until it walked up to her and slapped her in the face. Maybe it would not have mattered so much if she had not been making love to a liar all week. She could've cut her losses and kept her honor intact. Tama simpered grimly and compared herself to the visitor named Yuko. Did Sato ever think about comparing them? In his boyish daydreams, maybe? During intercourse with his overly trusting fiancé? It was a repellent thing to think.

In the thorny fog that enveloped her mind and zinged nerve endings, Tama found a freeing sensation in walking away from the flat, turning left down the hall to the fire escape, and making her way outside to get to work. She left the door of the home wide open, as shameless and exposed as Sato was.
Some fifteen minutes later, Sato arrived upon a peculiar scene as the door of the flat was ajar and Tama, after he called out, was nowhere to be found. 'Huh. I probably just missed her before she went to work...' He could catch up to her, 'Did she forget to shut this? That's weird.' He had a look around, but there were no signs of intrusion or theft. Must have been pure forgetfulness.

He ate the last rolled omelet on a plate and poured coffee into a thermos, as opposed to the mug that was set out. He intended to travel with his favorite beverage. After tidying up the space and locking his flat behind him, Sato ventured out again, excited to share the news of his promotion with his better half.

There was a mild chill in the air as autumn advanced, and he had half a mind to snap a few shots of the magnificent, crimson maples on the perimeter of a small park he passed. But no, he ought to keep a tight schedule today so everyone could be informed! That was, if the news hadn't traveled through the grapevine already. He was a Jounin, like his uncle. He had a solo assignment tomorrow. It had been a long road to this point.

Light foot traffic flowed along the main avenue, and Sato crossed over to the bakery that had only a single customer buying breakfast at the counter. Sato waited with his standard grin as Tama made change for the customer and thanked him for the visit. When the door's chime signaled an exit, he leaned over the counter excitedly, "Tama! Guess what?"

She said nothing as she turned to stock a bare shelf with a tray of specialty rolls.

Sato carried on with the announcement, "Tsunade-sama promoted me! She has me scheduled for an assignment tomorrow, so if you've got nothing going on with your team this evening let's go out and celebrate! Just the two of us!"

Tama worked without comment. He tilted his head to regard her dubiously, then took a long swig of coffee. She was clearly out of sorts. Had she not been awaiting this news too?

"Also, Kakashi was sent home this morning. When you get off your shift why don't we visit him?" Sato suggested.

The lack of conversational engagement elevated the hair on the back of his neck and arms. Never in over 15 years of knowing Tama had Sato experienced indifferent quiet from her.

"Is something...bothering you?" He set his thermos down, his eyes trained on her back as she worked, "I know I missed you earlier. I got back a little late after speaking to Tsunade-sama. You left the door open, you know." Sato's voice softened, "Tama?"

When the shelf was fully stocked, Tama skimmed a sideways look over Sato and then moved to the back kitchen of the bakery, speaking to the co-shopkeeper, "Ami? Can you make a breakfast run?"

"Sure, let me just wrap this dough up!" The other girl expertly manipulated cling-wrap over a bowl, "What are you in the mood for, Tama-chan?"

"A smoothie. From the place in the south ward."

"Oh, the new one! I've been wanting to go there. Mango flavor?"

"Yes." Tama pulled money notes from the pocket of her work apron and handed them over, "I appreciate it."

Ami dusted flour from her clothes as she walked through the front end of the bakery, animatedly greeting Sato, "Hey Sato-kun! Do you want anything from Cosme?"

"N-No, I'm good! Brought my own coffee." He waved off the gracious offer and watched Ami depart, leaving Tama as the shop's lone attendant. Sato moved toward her in the hope a reassuring hug or touch might close whatever sort of emotional gap that had opened up, but Tama stepped behind the counter again to avoid him.

"Is there something you want to tell me?" Tama was a deadly sort of calm, "Now is your chance to do it, Sato. If you want to tell me something."

"Tell you something?" He didn't like this nervous feeling. A prickle of intuition was sticking into his back like a bed of nails.

"If you did something you regret, or don't regret. That you've kept from me. I should give you a chance to explain yourself, shouldn't I? Before we move ahead with everything we've planned…you should speak honestly." The harsh look in her eyes resembled her father Ken's demeanor.

Though the exact subject was unspoken, he knew. Sato knew what this was about, even though it felt impossible to acknowledge it verbally. Because acknowledging it would also commence the destruction of all the excellent things that were in store, that he and Tama could only do together. To willfully dismantle those dreams was foolishness. He couldn't say it. Couldn't break it.

The stifling air of the shop was electrified by Tama's mounting impatience, standing with a hip cocked as she hooked her thumbs in her pockets, her face stone-like, "Can't you say something?"

"I…I'm just not sure what…you're upset about…" His face seemed to say otherwise.

"You've known it all along. Since before the Exam."

The sickening churn he'd fought some months ago after the mistake was back full force, roiling his insides. Sato stared at her, petrified, frozen, helpless like a prey animal.

"If you're not going to admit what we both know, maybe I can recap it for you? That I made breakfast this morning and then returned Miyazawa-san's cat…before I met a person named Yuko in the building. She was looking for someone." Tama's hands came to rest flat on the stone countertop, "She was looking for you, Sato."

"I don't know anyone named—!"

"Damn what you know!" Tama balled a hand into a fist and cracked the surface she was leaning on, "You do know. The girl from Hidden Grass! At the festival! She told me that you took her back to your flat! You didn't say anything about me! She had no idea you were taken before she decided to sleep with you! So what does that say? That when I turn in after a night of fun, you have free reign? You can get away with these things? What else have you been doing—?"

"Nothing! Nothing else!" He was teary-eyed and panicked.

"I don't know how to believe that. How do I believe anything I've taken at face value?" She had to remove her hands from the counter-top before she crushed the rest of it, "Back when I said you could try other things, I didn't mean you could do that after we got together! You know that, right? Not after you chose me. And I know you expected the same of me!" Tama thrashed her head, ponytail swinging, "Was it easy to let me take care of you and hold your life together for years when you were alone, then do things behind my back?"

"It's not like that! That was the worst mistake I ever made! Of course I know what you've done for me, Tama, I've thought about it every day since—"

"Since you had an easy, late-night lay! God…! That was before we did anything!" Tama paced in short, whipping steps, "…your worst mistake…you said nothing! For months, I was a happy idiot! You said nothing, but what if someone else found out? And told me? Don't you think—!"

"No one else knows and I was never going to say anything because it didn't matter! It was horrible. In every way you can imagine, it was horrible—"

"Then why did you do it?" She was bristling.

"Because," His voice cracked as he admitted, "I thought it wouldn't be. Which was stupid and selfish. I was stupid and selfish."

"You are stupid and selfish, Sato. How can you stand kissing me-? Penetrating me—all of this week? Like you had no black mark on your conscience, and deserved to do those things with me! I didn't work this hard to not be treated accordingly." With longer steps she covered the full length of the counter, furiously adding, "Shame on me for thinking there was equivalency! That I was entitled to you in some way: I know that was my mistake. I've been taught better…but I believed it. You made me believe it and I can't think of anything more unfair than that."

"I owe you everything! I know I do—!"

"Why couldn't you know it before you sniffed out a street tramp?"

It was painful in a way that made complete sense, and so Sato comprehended the value in having such a godawful conversation. Though he couldn't bear the thought initially, it felt like there was a chance to plead his case in some way. That he wasn't a repeat offender. That the shame of what he'd done choked him, truly, and none of this was brittle lip-service. That they could go forward and recover from this; he knew it could be done.

"Listen to me, Tama, please. The whole point of not saying anything was to avoid hurting you, but it happened anyway. So I am. I am every bit of the brainless juvenile who'd do something like that and learn. The result set me straight, and that is something you can believe—you can bet your life on it. I've learned. I'm not the same." He moved slowly toward the counter's end as he spoke, "I'm sorry for what I did. I always will be."

"I guess you're right." She acknowledged in a low voice, "You're not the same."

She'd derived a different meaning than what he intended. When Sato made a move to get closer, Tama hopped up and over the counter, switching to the opposite side to keep her distance.

"I'm sorry, Tama." He felt his shoulders curve, making himself small as tears started again, "You didn't deserve any of that shit. I want to give you everything that you—"

"Give me what I want—?" Tama finished the phrase for him in a disbelieving shriek, "What I want. I don't want this version of you. After-the-fact. I want the "you" from before you fucked someone else!" She got some satisfaction from roaring in Sato's tear-slicked face, "If you couldn't resist it—the need to do it with anyone, and I couldn't have stopped you; why in the very least could I not have gotten an honest admission? So I could've saved myself the embarrassment?"

His voice clattered like marbles, "I was too scared to t-tell you."

"Respecting me is the least you could do. You didn't. You whored out your honor and mine, so what's left?"

His shoulders shook and he was quite certain by then that there was not a speck of pity or sympathy within Tama as she watched him cry. Her feelings were diamond-hard compared to his own; they were backed by righteousness and dignity. Sato had none of those things.

She said finally, "I don't want to be with you."

"N-No— let's talk it over and—!"

"I mean it." The pitch of her voice rose defensively, "I know...what I'm worth. And...I don't think it's this. It's not this. Forget the engagement. Forget everything."

As the words sealed the tomb of what was once a relationship, Sato moved quickly in her direction, "You don't mean that." She stepped backwards as he reached a shaky hand, "We can work it out. I know I'm what you wanted, now. What I should've been before all this. I'm...I'm never going to—" Another evasive step, "Can't we talk to someone? I'll do anything— please. Just—!"

Tama shook her head, trying to ward him off, "Don't come any closer. I want you to go. I can't think."

He was backing her toward the glass windows of the bakery wall, fearful that if he gave up or went still that it would really be the end. One touch. Hold her hand, maybe. If that was the last piece of her he could ever get, Sato was absolutely going to try, "Please, can't we—? I'm sorry...I'm so sorry." He had to overcome a sob to say, "I know you love me. Even if everything is trash, even if that's what I am—I know you do—!"

Her back hit a panel of glass and ruffled the drawn shade. Tama told him, "I do."

He stopped in front of her and bowed his head. She'd said it.

"I do love you. Why should that mean...I can't leave?" Tama said simply, "No closer. Don't touch me."

He shook like an autumn leaf, "C-Can't say something l-like that..."

"Don't touch me." She watched him raise his hand, outstretched toward hers.

"Tama..." Perhaps he should've listened. A bright burst of white and blue clouded his vision and his head spun as he lilted backwards. It'd been a speedy and well-deserved punch to the face, which was about all Sato could perceive before he struck the wood floor. With his guard lowered and emotions at a fever-high, he'd sustained a considerable head injury from the blow.

The next thing he could detect following a 10 second blackout were Tama's hands fisting on his shirt sleeve, hoisting him up— his knees bent and wobbling. Proceeding toward the door, Tama dragged him most of the way there before he was fully conscious. When Sato came to and straightened, she out-muscled his struggle to escape her grip or dig his heels in. No. There was no way she was going to toss him like curbside trash— except she opened the door and did just that. With a powerful arm, Tama swung him out onto the pavement. Sato tumbled and a pedestrian narrowly avoided him as he rolled. The bakery door slammed shut.

Sato sprang up and tried to re-enter the establishment, but she'd flipped the deadbolt. He then rounded the corner through an alleyway to try the back door of the bakery, 'She's not gonna shut me out just like that! There's more to say! It's not over.' His head was ringing. When his hands closed around the large brass handle of the door, Tama was inside pulling against it with equal force.
"Tama, please!" He knew she could hear his shout, "I want to make things right!"

"I don't want to talk! Leave me alone!" Her howl from the other side.

The raucous did not go unnoticed by passersby on the street, glancing curiously down the alley to see who was fussing behind the bake shop. Sato froze when he felt eyes scan him, and then let go of the door handle. In the next moment, Tama had it sealed and there was a tinkling sound of keys, locking it.

If it were worth the public disruption, Sato might've stubbornly camped outside the shop until Tama's shift ended. And though he wanted so badly to make his feelings known and somehow make her understand that forever was ahead and only she was a part of it…her feelings mattered more. She had been clear about what she felt and what she wanted. He hadn't misunderstood.

Sato took a breath to oxygenate before flitting to an adjacent rooftop. The village features surrounding him melded into a thick impasto, indiscernible; his veins screaming fire in his body as he moved, his hearing drowned out by a high-frequency ting. Peppered throughout his mental scramble were the next possible destinations he could travel to. Sato did not put much reasoning into the decision making process, and instead let his legs carry him automatically toward the Aburame homestead in the next ward.

At the property edge he regretted coming to Shino's home to burden him yet again while so distraught and disheveled. Sato dropped down from a tall pine branch and landed between rows of insect-attractant plants. He stopped on the lawn beyond the great house. Shino had better things to do. This was nonsense. Deciding against it, Sato turned to leave and was spotted as Hinata popped up from behind a hedge. She was in gardening clothes.

"Oh! You're early, Sato-kun!" She cheerfully adjusted her sunhat, "Shino-kun and I are planting bulbs for next year!"

Shino also popped up and immediately recognized his friend's distress, stripping the work gloves from his hands. Hinata watched Shino rise and push through the hedge nettle before laying his hands on Sato's shoulders. It sunk in slowly that Sato's unnatural silence heralded something dire.

"Can you speak?" Shino asked as he dabbed a coat sleeve under Sato's wet eyes.

"…I….uh…." Sato tried to clear his warbling throat.

Hinata stood and dusted soil from her hands and knees, toeing through the brush toward her team.

Shino sensed what his friend could not articulate, "It happened?"

Sato nodded wearily, "Yeah, it did."

"What? What's wrong?" Hinata underwent a spike of motherliness as she patted Sato's arms and back, frowning, "Why are you crying? Today was your promotion, wasn't it? It's alright, it's alright…"

Sato sniffed and spoke with a cracking voice, "It's…o-okay. Got promoted. It's that…Tama broke things off. With me."

Hinata's reassuring motions stilled as she searched his face, devastated to hear such a thing and maybe, just maybe, he'd misspoken? "Sato-kun, she might just be busy. She—"

"No…s-s…Sunshine." He swallowed and said, "She doesn't want to…be with…me. Doesn't w-want to...get married."

She still didn't believe it. "Tama-chan does!"

"Not anymore. She knows I...was disloyal. I was, but I didn't...want anyone to know." Sato explained, "I r-regret it. Every day. Tama's the only p-person I love, so..."

Hinata's concerned pats started up again and her eyes grew shiny, "Did you really? You were with someone else?"

"Just once. Never again."

Her hands dropped to her sides and she shared a lost look with Shino, fuddled by the confession. Sato's breathing had grown shallow and he swayed on his feet, "I know...I deserve it. If you two also need some time away from me...I'd understand. I was gonna go—"

He was summarily sandwiched between Shino and Hinata, though it felt more like Shino was barring him from retreat while Hinata clung to Sato's tunic and wept openly.

"Take some time here, for now. Calm down." Shino suggested, "Kurenai-sensei is expecting us later."

"R-Right." Sato experienced an incomplete but undeniable wave of relief that came from the undaunted support of his teammates.

"I'm so disappointed! How could you do something like that!" Hinata's tearful, mild fury made her turn in a small circle, cheeks reddening, "Hurt a person so special to you! And all of those plans! Tama-chan told me about them and now what must she be thinking?" She stopped and wailed softly, "What about you, Sato-kun?"

"I know, Sunshine. I said I deserve it." He had regained a few shreds of composure.

"N-No, I mean, what will you do?" Hinata squeaked, "If you apologize, won't she change her mind?"

Shino pointed out flatly, "This is not something that is easily forgiven."

"Shino's right. I talked to Tama but...this is it. There's nothing more to it." Sato supposed dourly, "I think it's better if, you know, no one bugs Tama or questions her over this. Everything she chooses now is right. I can't...beg or persuade. I lost my chance to a while ago."

"We won't say anything." Shino assured him. Hinata nodded mournfully in agreement.

"I'm sorry to...heap all of this on you guys." Sato apologized.

"Wouldn't you help either of us, in the same situation?" Hinata wondered.

"No offense, but neither of you have this level of bullshit idiocy in you." Sato told her, "Neither of you could do anything to bring this kind of unhappiness upon yourselves. Because Shino is pretty much an angel. And we know, Sunshine, that you and Naruto are solid."

Hinata blotted her cheeks, "But you and Tama-chan were too..."

Sato shook his head. "It only looked that way." He settled down in the grass and laid back, "Feeling...dizzy. I might faint so don't...panic or anything."
"We will observe you while we finish up our planting." Shino then recommended, "Stay with us today."

He nodded wearily and covered his eyes with his arm. It felt like a breeze could blow hollowly through him due to the spiritual hole that'd been ripped open, baring him to the elements. He didn't deserve friends half as good as Hinata and Shino but that, Sato thought, was perhaps the sole reason to move forward. To repay those who were good to him.

That same morning, Kakashi sat on the sofa in his home and wondered if he was going to go into cardiac arrest due to "cuteness overload." That's what Tenzo called it.

Kiba had stopped over and brought a pair of puppies with him, balancing a pudgy, wrinkled pup in each arm. Akamaru trotted into the apartment with his master and began circling with Kakashi's dog pack members, giving salutations through sniffs. When the canine ritual settled down, Kiba sat beside his convalescing teacher and let other dogs sniff the small bundles, "Yup, be nice, introduce yourselves. These are newbies…"

"I didn't actually think your mother meant what she said." Kakashi said faintly.

"Oh she meant it. We had a few litters at home." Kiba was grinning, "Want to hold one? Here." He passed the fat, white puppy with a pink nose to his teacher. Kakashi sank back into the couch and sighed, gently bouncing the tiny dog in front of his face.

"She's cute, right?" Kiba noticed the man's heart melting beside him, "That breed's rare: Xiasi Quan. My grandpa and cousins love hunting with them, but they're great for missions too."

"Do they have names already?" Kakashi asked.

"Her name's Tolsi."

Kakashi cooed at the puppy. In the kitchen area, Tenzo stuck his neck out interestedly while working over the stove, "Do I get to see them too? I'm almost finished up over here."

"Oh yeah, sure." Kiba stood and crossed over to Tenzo, "This one's Gattsu." He lifted up a wrinkled ball of flesh with folded ears, tan fur from head to toe, its eyes and nose just as brown. The puppy licked Tenzo's chin and the man stared at the creature.

"We can keep them, right?" Tenzo whispered.

"I mean, if Kaka-sensei wants to. No pressure."

Tenzo looked longingly across the living area though Kakashi wasn't paying him any mind, too invested in the puppy named Tolsi. He continued with breakfast preparations as Kiba returned to his teacher and showed off Gattsu, "This breed is a Vizsla. Very athletic and affectionate. Don't let him get bored."

"Uh huh." Kakashi pulled the second puppy into his lap. Though it still hurt to think about Ũhei and Shiba, he couldn't deny the bubbling joy he felt while meeting young dogs again. He wasn't going to decline this offer. He could definitely find the time to train and socialize them, especially since Tenzo was willing to assist.

Kiba rubbed Akamaru between his ears as they observed Kakashi move to sit on the floor, allowing Bull to lovingly lick the weeks-old additions. His dogs gathered around to introduce themselves. Pakkun was also intrigued, "They smell like milk, Kakashi."
"Do they?"

"Yeah, fresh off their Mamas. Bet they can't control their bladders yet, but it's not easy at the start." Pakkun mused, "Are they staying with us? I'll whip 'em into shape."

"If you don't mind." Kakashi patted the pug's rump, "Kiba, how old are they?"

"About 6 weeks. I figure since you're on leave you can take some time to house break them, teach commands, and all of that."

"It's been a while since I've done this…"

"You'll have help." Kiba gestured with his head at Tenzo, who was setting a table with dishes, "And I can watch them at my house while you guys have missions."

Kakashi's voice was soft, "Thank you."

With the tabletop spread finished, Tenzo set down food bowls for the pack members one at a time as they politely took their spots. He then ventured to the sitting area to get a closer look at Tolsi and Gattsu, toddling across an area rug. As a man who was secure in his emotions, Tenzo didn't hide his eyes moistening as he handled the plushy babes, "I know someday…we'll get mad when they're older and tearing into garbage bags…"

After lollygagging for a while, Kiba set a canvas bag filled with puppy supplies on the counter, "There are some instructions in here too, not that you need 'em. I'll let you guys have breakfast and check in with you later."

Tenzo was flat on the floor, crying joyfully as the pups clambered over him. Kakashi gave his student a friendly wave, "Don't hesitate to bring me more presents later!"

"You're maxed out already, Sensei." Kiba shut the door after herding Akamaru along. Sunlight spilled over the railed veranda and covered stairs of the condo. Down the stairwell, Kiba took up a jogging pace to ensure his ninken's muscles would warm up for training. "Akamaru, you don't think it was too soon, do ya?"

His dog barked in the negative.

"Good. I think he's happy. Looks like they're both happy." Kiba snickered.

He crossed town to check in on Hana at her veterinary office, and took note of the "outgoing" bin at the front counter. Kiba scooped up brown bags filled with pet medications to deliver to nearby addresses. Before he returned to the office, he stopped at a bubble tea shop to acquire his sister's daily pearl milk tea. Hana sighed and thanked her brother when he turned up again, handing over the drink, and adjusted the strap of her arm-immobilizing sling.

"That better?"

She wiggled her shoulder, "Yeah. I can't really restrain my patients for exams with one working arm. It's been a tough morning..."

"Do you want me to help?"

"Mom said she'll come over to help me in a half hour. You have training today, don't you?" Hana smiled at him, "Go ahead. Oh! Did you bring the puppies to Kakashi?"
"Sure did."

"And?"

"And he turned into goo." Kiba grinned, "I think he'll be okay. Will you be home later?"

"Yup! Mom's making a dish we haven't had since…well. Since I was a toddler. It's weird how she's gotten so nostalgic all of a sudden."

"Nostalgic? Pff. Maybe she just wants to eat something she misses."

"I dunno. Haven't you seen her writing letters lately?" Hana sipped her bubble tea.

"Mom. Writing letters?" Kiba laughed, "Yeah. Sure."

"Really! She's been writing to someone!"

"Maybe her secret admirer." Kiba joked on his way out of the office.

He and Akamaru continued their jog through the south side of town and down a grassy path towards the team's favored training field. At the halfway point, he spotted Tama as she stood underneath an elm tree, bracing her hands on the trunk as she vomited. The sight startled Kiba and he hesitated for a moment before cautiously stepping over to her, "Um…are you okay for training, today? You don't have to push yourself, Tama…"

She shook her head as she finished and stood upright, patting her lips with a tissue, "No, no. Sorry, I'm not sick. Just got a bit worked-up."

"Worked up?" He scrunched his nose to shut out the smell.

Tama waved him along to proceed down the path, "I'm anxious. Damn, that's a shame…that was a good smoothie." She looked over her shoulder at a yellowy-orange mess on the ground, "That'll go away when it rains, right?"

"If it rains." Kiba supposed.

"Sorry you had to see that."

He shrugged, "Sakura vomited on me after testing poisons once. And Akamaru barfs sometimes, so, whatever. Are you sure you're okay, though?"

Tama fell quiet and stared ahead at the autumn-tinged forest. It was as if he could hear the buzz of anxiety and grief swarming her like bees. Kiba stared sidelong at her face as they walked, waiting for it.

"I want to…train today. Do what I normally do." Tama spoke haltingly.

"Yup. Sure. Same-old, same-old." He agreed.

"What time is Sakura-chan supposed to get here?"

"She said 3:30 the latest."

"Okay." Tama took a ragged breath.

"What's wrong?" Kiba felt his stomach twisting.
"Nothing's wrong anymore. I set it right." Tama indulged Akamaru when he nudged her hand for pats, "That's why I'm...having a rough time of it."

"Have you been to see Kakashi-sensei yet? He's home now. I brought him two puppies—"

Tama's eyes grew glossy and she held her breath.

Kiba tried to avert any stressful subjects, "Hey, it's okay! He's fine. You don't have—"

"I can't. I c-can't...see...S-Sensei. Not yet." She stopped in her tracks and tried to breathe, "He'll be...angry at us."

"Angry. At us?" Kiba asked for clarification.

"N-No...me and...S-Sato."

"Oh. But...why would he be mad? You didn't quit being a ninja or elope, right?"

And then she went silent like a midnight cemetery, trembling where she stood as she fought off whatever force was weighing on her. Kiba watched with wide eyes and sensed the emotions, though he couldn't pinpoint the source of her distress. As far as he knew, Tama's life had been buttoned up neatly as she and Sato prepared to feather a nest together. He'd accepted this trajectory of theirs long ago.

"No." Tama told him thickly, "We're not together. Anymore. I haven't told anyone...not Sakura or Kakashi-sensei. I'm still trying to...make sense of today."

Kiba waggled a finger as if this were a blatant falsehood, "Come on, that's nuts. What'd he do—?"

"I ended things with Sato." She told him again, her inflection sterile and serious, "Because he lied to me...strung me along before and after the Chunin Exam. He said he only fooled around with someone else once, but I don't know if that's true..."

"He what?"

"Cheated."

"Yeah, I heard that, but how? He wouldn't do that." Kiba went cross-eyed when he realized he was defending Hatake Sato, a person he had never, ever been truly fond of. His response felt automatic in a certain respect, since he'd witnessed the love and affection Tama and Sato shared.

"How am I supposed to know?" Tama marched off of the path toward a log, "All I know is that he did. He admitted it. I think I'm still...in shock. Trying to look back into my memories and find the warning signs...It's...it's..."

He and Akamaru watched worriedly as Tama sat down on the log, holding her head in her hands.

"Maybe I've got bad vision, or...didn't notice...but...there weren't many signs. Or any. I still...see a lot of good. Most of it was good." Tama yelped with a mixture of disbelief and frustration, "It was very good...being with him. So I'm confused and...tired. Just trying to think about...what I'm supposed to do. No one ever talked about how exhausting it is to try to...understand how this feels."

"Well..." Kiba toed over to the log and sat down heavily, "I'm sorry. I think...I kind of get it. Since my Dad did something like that to me and my Mom."

"I remember, Kiba-kun."
"Yeah, except...it's really a different kind of betrayal since he left my Mom flat out...so it was nail-in-the-coffin over for years...but he came back and pretended he didn't have a second family waiting for him another country," Kiba shrugged, "So at least Sato didn't do that. But still. What the fuck is the matter with him?"

Tama shook her head and took deep breaths.

"Did he even apologize? Grovel—?"

"He did. I still need my space."

"I'm not saying that you don't. Standing in the same room as him will incite violence. At least if I speak for myself."

"I'm not...even that angry anymore." Tama admitted, "I...for the most part...believe him. He's sorry. I know that he is. It doesn't make me feel better, but I know Sato was telling the truth."

"We can still wipe our asses with the truth." Kiba reminded her bitterly.

"Not if the truth was what we actually needed."

He sighed in a higher pitch to indicate, yeah, maybe he preferred the truth over lies in most situations. His eyes trolled after Akamaru as the dog sniffed around the brush for a spot to do his business. Kiba folded his arms and said, "So...what do you think you should do?"

"I don't really want to tell anyone else about this for now. Some time to myself would be good." Tama tried to imagine how she would tumble through the next few days.

"People are going to ask questions, eventually."

"I know. I don't feel obligated to answer in too much detail."

"Fair enough." Kiba conceded, "And I won't say anything."

"I know you won't."

"Will you tell Sakura?"

"When I can stomach repeating all of this, I will."

Kiba nodded and closed his eyes, trying to take deep breaths that Tama could match.

After a long silence Tama shared, "I feel like an idiot."

"You're not, though. We all step in it at some point. Some messes are bigger than others."

"I'm rolling in it." By it Tama took it to mean a "shitty situation."

"Nah...but it looks like Akamaru is." Kiba squinted his eyes to see what his ninken was up to beneath the fronds of a beautyberry bush.

Tama made no sound as her shoulders shook in a tiny, lackluster laugh. It was a polite formality to acknowledge Kiba's humor. The things that were supposed to feel good were not registering on her scales. She wasn't able to appreciate those things at the moment.

"You're really not mad at him?" Kiba recalled an admission Tama had made.
"I was this morning— I was furious." She sighed, "But I can't keep that mood up. Some people can, but I can't."

"Yeah, I get it."

"I feel every other emotion there is, though. The ones that make you sick and question your decisions." Tama afforded him a sincere answer. "I might be able to…forgive Sato. I don't need him, but I think it's a waste of time to try and hate him or regret anything."

"You know, that sounds like how I feel." Kiba could relate, "About Sasuke. I forgave him mostly because that's what I needed. And if he reaps some benefit from one less person in this world hating him for what he did; good for him."

"Do you…ever feel like you have to…avoid every person who might hurt you again?" Tama wondered in a small voice.

"Well, I'm no good at predicting it. When people are shits to me, it's almost always a surprise." Kiba added, "So I don't actively avoid anything. I just let it hurt and try not to let it change me." He picked up a sprig of maple and threw it, unenthused by Akamaru's acrobatic leap to catch the stick. His dog then laid down to chew on the prize.

There was only the pipping clamor of nutcracker birds feasting in a hazelnut tree beyond the thicket, while the rest of forest trail seemed to hold its breath. When Tama bent sideways to lean her head on Kiba's shoulder, he wrapped his arm around her back, "Sorry. I probably haven't said much to make you feel better."

"You did." Her nose was stuffing up, by the sound of it. Tears rolled down Tama's cheeks while she sat and contemplated things Kiba would probably never have to think about or struggle with himself, but somehow he still felt the residual sting of it. Her unhappiness and uncertainty.

Time passed and Akamaru eventually trotted up to the human portion of his team, then rested his chin on Tama's knees. Kiba thanked his dog quietly for not being theatrical or attention-seeking. He gave Akamaru a pat on the snoot and squeezed Tama a little tighter.

"S-Sorry that I'm…c-crying like a—"

"Tama. It's fine." Kiba assured her.

"But I need to…stop. We could be training—"

"Managing how you feel and taking a mental break takes priority. Screw training. It can wait! Kakashi's not even around." Kiba asserted, "You don't have to be brave and forge onward every single time. It's alright if you're stuck."

"I'm stuck." Tama agreed with a stuffy-nosed gurgle.

He riffled around his pocket and drew out a crumpled napkin from the bubble tea shop, "Here. You are super boogery right now."

"Yeah. Thanks." Tama sat up to blot her face and blow her nose, "I ran out of tissues earlier."

He watched her from the corner of his eye while rubbing a rectangular pattern over Akamaru's furry head. Once Tama had ordered herself somewhat, she drifted back into philosophical musings, "I was responsible for part of this, I think."
“Careful, you’re saying crazy stuff now.” Kiba warned.

“Okay. I know that there were many variables that made…Sato do something like that. Logically, it makes no sense to assign all of the blame to one particular thing, but…” Her shoulders rose and fell with a long breath, "I never gave him space. Growing up since we were small kids, always around each other…he didn't have any time away from me. He had no other options, really. Our families made decisions completely independent of our own wishes and goals. So…being denied any sort of free-will choice was an injustice."

"Uh, arranged marriages are pretty standard between shinobi families around here—"

"And most of them occur between two consenting adults, not children with their milk teeth who can't understand the terms of an agreement."

"Why are you trying to rationalize this?" Kiba gruffed, "He betrayed you. It's simple."

"It wouldn't feel simple if you were in my skin right now." Tama told him, "Just because I chose him all on my own never meant that he had to choose me. I knew that, too. No one is ever owed anything, even when we start to fool ourselves into thinking that."

He cocked his head, annoyed, "Even if that's fundamentally true, he did owe you."

"It would have been fine if he grew up and wanted to go his own way. I took care of him when times were hard because I wanted to, not because I was told to, or expected something back." She muttered, "Well. Maybe for a little while I expected something in return, but I realized that was wrong."

"Was it really so wrong?"

"Maybe it wasn't, but I didn't feel good about it once I was grown. Sato is a free spirit, so I decided I wouldn't…restrict him from living how he wanted to." Tama concluded wearily, "People don't always want…what they already have. Don't love what they've always had. There's no novelty to it."

"Pfft. Novelty!" Kiba scoffed, "There was plenty of that."

"Romantic love is all about novelty. The alternative is practicality, and clearly he wasn't into that either.” Tama supposed.

"Why do you say that as if he didn't love you? He's an idiot, but he obviously did.” Kiba pointed out.

She bowed her head and held her breath. Within that assertion resided the ultimate point: when love was not reinforced by other qualities like commitment, empathy, maturity, good-judgment and so on, it was too flimsy a thing to manage. Cracks spidered in it like a pane of glass. Maybe Sato had developed those capacities to some extent, but not soon enough.

"Let me tell you something," He nudged Tama with his elbow, "Years ago at some festival or another, I saw you for the first time. And learned about you. I've had a crush on you ever since." Kiba's stomach did a small flip when he admitted it, "But that's not the same thing as what you had. Was I interested? Yeah, but I wasn't on your radar. So that made me consider what was truly important: wrecking your bonds for my own gain, or actually seeing you be happy. Then I grew up and my feelings changed; you became one of my best friends. That's working for me."

Tama blinked at him with watery-eyed surprise.
"And I…might've met someone super cool…but she lives in Hidden Cloud." He shrugged in defeat, "Oh well."

Tama swiped her cheeks again, smiling in slight shock, "Kiba-kun, I'm pretty flattered."

"Are ya?" He grinned.

"Yes! But you're one of my best friends too! You and Sakura-chan!"

"I know! It'd be weird now. You and Sakura are my bros."

"We are." Her laughter was soft and hollow.

"Turns out you and I have very similar insecurities." Kiba observed.

"As it turns out, yes." She agreed.

"I just hate that…he hurt you. If I could've walked in his shoes years ago, man oh man, I wouldn't have taken so much for granted. I mean, what's the least Sato had to do? Have patience? Appreciate his fulfilled, above-average life?"

"You're making assumptions."

"I'm not. It's plain to see that he wasn't suffering that much."

"Kiba, what I gave him wasn't a replacement for the family he lost. No matter what, there would be things I couldn't do."

He shook his head, smirking, frustrated, "You sell yourself short. Sounds a bit like brainwashing."

"It isn't. Please don't argue these things with me, because it's all still fresh and hard to think."

"Alright, alright."

And though it was no small feat to reinstate some semblance of normalcy, Tama managed it for the afternoon and distracted herself with Sakura's hospital-work tales and Ninjutsu drills. It crossed Tama's mind that maybe she ought to confide in Sakura as well, but speaking on the topic was exhausting. She preferred to let it wait until tomorrow. The team refined some of their techniques in Kakashi's absence and then parted ways in the evening.

When Tama returned home for a planned family meal with her parents, she procrastinated the announcement until the end of dinner when plates were being cleared from the table.

"So I, uh…just wanted to tell you both…" Tama cleared her throat, mustering courage, "That I am… single. As of today."

Her father slowly set down the page-length coupon he'd snipped out of a newspaper and stared at her. Miako had not heard Tama clearly while she rinsed glassware at the sink, "What was that, dear?"

"I said I'm not engaged to Sato anymore. I, um…" She flinched at her father's fantastical, beacon-like face flashing with expressions, "Just something that I wanted you to be aware of."

Miako had turned the tap off and hurried back to the table, holding her daughter by her shoulders, "Is everything alright? You were planning—!"
"I know. It's...fine. It was a..." Tama held her father's stark gaze, "A mutual decision."

"How very out of the blue." Ken noted.

"Um. A-All of this...planning...gave us time to think." Tama swallowed hard as she tried to soften the context of the break up with a white lie, fearing her parents might retaliate fiercely against the Hatake family, "And we'd rather focus on...our careers. For now."

Her mother was hopeful, "So maybe someday?"

Ken continued to stare.

"Uh..." Tama mumbled, "Maybe not."

Miako's face bunched in astonished despondency. She stood up and returned to wash dishes and stew on the information, tuning out the conversation between her husband and daughter.

"Tama..." Her father was not so easily fooled, "Don't you have more to say?"

"About what?"

"Why you're not getting married." Ken dangled the subject like an expert angler, "Surely Kakashi will be disappointed. This isn't an agreement that is dissolved for such frivolous reasons."

"It isn't frivolous, Dad." Tama straightened her back, "It's just...it's over. That's that. Adults get to make decisions on their own. We don't need you to make them for us."

"I suppose not." He lifted his drinking glass to take a sip, adding, "But you gave no indication that you wanted to 'focus on your careers' over the last few weeks. Picking out property. Furniture. Consolidating assets..."

"Dad..."

"Picking a venue and vendors. Changing your schedule." Ken lightly set his drink down, "Really, you've done quite the opposite. I'm not convinced that this was some choice based on genuine soul-searching and grown-up-talk."

"Dad, you don't know every-!"

"Sato is a cowardly halfwit on the best of days, and each other day a derelict by every definition." Ken's appraisal was razor-sharp.

Miako spun around and tossed a dish towel at her husband, "Ken, don't say things like that!"

Ken plucked the towel from his shoulder, "Won't you excuse us for a few minutes, Miako?"

"You're just trying to make her feel bad!" Miako squeaked.

"She already feels bad." Ken gathered, "Just a few minutes, please, dear."

"Be nice." Miako commanded as she exited the dining room.

Tama sat at the cherry wood chabudai table across from Ken, realizing that this was in fact a showdown. That her father had something to prove. She felt stifled and corned as the investigation had begun. If she'd intended to maintain a falsified cover story to save face, it would've required significant pre-planning to evade her father's analysis. Tama had slipped up on that front. Handing over the truth to the man was giving him a sword with which he would cut down a family he'd started to disdain long ago. Ken was, among other things, a prosecutor. Tama didn't share his thirst for eviscerating an opponent.

"Don't lie to me." Ken could sense it, "What did Sato do?"

"He got promoted and ignored me afterward." A rubbery excuse.

"I don't think so."

"We haven't been talking the way we used to. I asked to end it."

"You have a reason. A real reason." Ken pressed.

"He grew up so brainless it galled me." Ken admitted as he swayed the ice cube in his drinking glass, "To think my daughter was willing to marry such a careless skunk…but I've always known you weren't foolish enough to settle for that."

"I've always been smart, Dad. That was never contingent upon who I did or didn't marry." She retorted venomously.

"You haven't always been smart, Tama. So I'm glad that you're finally starting to look out for yourself." His insults were uncomfortably casual, "Do as you must, and when you decide to share your true motivations with me for such a drastic reversal, maybe I'll start to buy it. And yet, I don't think I will."

"It's an amicable parting." Another lie she didn't choke on, "So please don't stick your nose in this and bother anyone, do you hear me?"

"I do. And I won't." Ken agreed.

"Good." Tama slammed her hands against the table as she rose. She couldn't lend her mother much reassurance as she passed through the living area, silently fuming, and climbed the stairs. Arriving in her room, anger escaped her on an exhaling breath and was replaced by despair, moths in her stomach. From every angle of her life, things would fall apart. To hurry and try to spackle the cracks before her friends and family understood the extent of things…Tama wasn't sure if she could do it.

She flipped the light switch, retrieved a large paper bag from a desk drawer, and embarked on a quest to pluck every single last photo on the wall that showcased Sato in some way. When all were collected and no other vestiges of Sato were visible, she rolled the bag's top shut and slid it beneath her bed. 'I'll burn those tomorrow.' She thought to herself.

Her movements in the bedroom were erratic. Tama rearranged objects and small, potted succulent plants. Moved a floor lamp from this corner to that corner. The sun had set beyond her room's tall window, and it felt impossible that somehow this day had begun and ended. And another was to come tomorrow. She would have to find a way to navigate tomorrow's daylight hours and interact with society as she imploded. Then the day after that, and the day after that…

Frantic in her silence, Tama moved down the hall and showered beneath scalding hot water. She then dried herself, dressed in pajamas, sealed the door of her bedroom, and laid board-straight in her bed in the dark. Every hour of the evening and late night passed her by. Sleep never came. Every second was filled with spasmodic contemplation. Milliseconds were a mystery. What to work towards? What was there to distract herself with?

In some ways she felt free, so marvelously free of the pain and humiliation. Yet she became a prisoner of possibility in a brain she could not shut off.

More than a day later, Sato returned from a solitary map-swap mission to the Toi Mine, and was uncharacteristically withdrawn when he presented the map to the Hokage. He debriefed with nary a helpful detail to Tsunade, who would have commanded him to stay and talk more if she hadn't had a council meeting to run to.

So Sato departed from the building and tried to make sense of how differently he reacted to everything in the world. The smells in the air, the temperature, the people he saw on the street. Everything triggered a flight response. There was nowhere to escape to, he knew, but his insides itched with terror while all things familiar became so unfamiliar.

In the late morning he set foot in his flat and felt his face get hot. Sato gulped, shutting the door behind him, pried his boots off, and toddled around half-numb to the pangs of spiritual pain that just refused to end. He would probably get used to it. Every few minutes he thought about Tama and was sickened again, taking time to cool down and reorganize his thoughts. He barely ate and didn't bother making any coffee. Sato bathed himself catatonically.

'Can't quite figure out how to...be myself. It's hard to be someone you hate.' He considered.

In his bedroom he dressed and stared at the bed, realizing there would be remnants of her there. Though desperate and shameful, he was glad that he could still smell Tama's scent on the pillow and quilt. It was then it occurred to Sato, 'Her stuff!' Oh god, he still had it. Belongings of hers strewn about—shoes, hair ties, a brush, clothing in the bureau, little thises and thats. He sought them out like hidden treasures to collect them, stockpiling all into a fabric basket and set it on the kitchen table.

He determined that if she never asked for anything back, he would forever keep them. He had to. As proof that she'd been there.

Perhaps this was the sad, pathetic way to react to a fractured relationship. Someone stronger or less attached might've discarded such reminders as part of the cleansing process. Had Sato not loved this person for so long and come to depend on her, he could've done it, he guessed. Tama was so essential in his life that it was unthinkable to erase any part of her that lingered.

He made tea. He opened the window for fresh air, wallowed for a time, poured himself hot bancha once it was ready, and collapsed into a seat at the table.

'This is your life now. You're just you. There's no one else. No one is going to care what you think or how you feel because it's your fault. You wake up, you take missions. Do as you're told. It's what you wanted: to be distinguished. A high-ranking shinobi.' Sato reminded himself as he sat, his hands loose around the tea mug, 'This is what you get. Mom would probably want it this way if she'd learned what I'd done—for me to eat shit. Dad did this to her, I think. He might've f*cked things up and so she managed on her own with me. I don't know if Dad actually died...he could have...just been awful.'

He sipped slowly and drowned in thought until his screech owls, Aree and Aroo, flew indoors and perched on the back of an adjacent chair to greet him. His eyes grew teary at the sight of them. They were fond of Tama. He couldn't direct the birds to stay away from her in any concrete sense, but he'd try to advise them on the change. After half a cup's worth of tea, Sato bent and folded forward onto the table to rest his head, near where the basket of Tama's belongings sat like a holy relic.

He shut his eyes and drifted. Since he had not slept adequately in over 24 hours, he'd grown drowsy. The toots of his companion birds were soothing. They fluttered around the space and made themselves at home. Sato's fingers slid on the outside of the porcelain mug. Once enough time passed, he wouldn't remember what it was like to touch her. Or anything. If they never spoke again, he'd forget the sound of her voice. He would see Tama around intermittently in the village, and that very well could be the grand extent of it from now on. All that wrongdoers were entitled to were memories, if that.

The sound of a chair sliding back brought him out of his funk, and Sato jerked his head up in surprise. Kakashi took a seat at the table and propped his chin up in a lazy palm.

"Kakashi! Aren't you supposed to—?"

"I'm still quite fragile, though I can get around a little now." His uncle informed him, "I heard something I didn't like."

"...you did."

"It was your doing."

"It was."

The man's heavy look stilled him for a long while, and Sato had nothing constructive to say. No explanations, excuses, or lamentations. He sat useless and hunched over, fiddling with a tea cup. At length, Kakashi placed something in front of him: a business card.

"That's for a therapist uptown." Kakashi clarified, "Go and get your head right. You have a lot of work ahead of you, and I won't have you screwing anything else up."

"Thanks, Kakashi…"

"To say I'm disappointed doesn't quite cover it. I'd gotten my hopes up. As she's my student, you could say I've grown fonder of Tama, maybe just as much as I care about you." He glanced over the basket of stuff imperiously, aggravated but composed, "This isn't going to blow over like it never happened. I don't know what Gai is going to say. What Tama's parents will say. Never mind what you have to deal with: I've got to explain it somehow when anyone asks me, and do you honestly think I want to?"

"No…of course you don't."

"Don't you dare date anyone else or have fun. Work your ass off. This is the time."

"I know, I know."

"If I had the strength I'd yank your earlobe clean off your head." Kakashi threatened.

Sato smiled tiredly, "I'd let you."

"Don't smile."

He smiled anyway, "I'm glad you're doing better, Kakashi. I'm sorry about all of this, more than you could ever know."

"More than I could ever know…I hope so. I still have to see Tama for team meetings and somehow not be a reminder of the misery she needs to overcome. Again, I won't thank you for that."

"Do everything you can for her."

"You can be sure that I will. As for you…" Kakashi sighed, "I want to be fair to you too. You'll suffer enough when you wake up in a decade or two and still feel shocked. It'll be terrible. So I don't need to actively make anything more terrible for you, now do I?"

Sato weakly shook his head as he sat up, sipping cooled tea.

Kakashi then asked, "Your mission?"

"Went quickly." Sato assured him.

"Good. Get up so I can introduce you to the Jounin Council. We're meeting in twenty minutes at the Standby Station."

"Does anyone else…know?"

"Kiba knows. He's the one who told me. Tama is still too hesitant to approach me yet, but I'll speak with her soon." Kakashi lead the way toward the door, unaware of his nephew's flabbergasted reaction behind him, "As far as I can tell, none of this is common knowledge otherwise. Keeping it discreet will help. Heaven help you if Ken comes knocking…"

Stumbling in the genkan, Sato pulled his shoes on again, "Ken. Right…oh god…and Kiba too?"

"He was surprisingly mature and level-headed while explaining to me. Tama confided in him the other day."

If he had been feeling emotionally gruesome before this, now Sato could hardly stomach the wretchedness of knowing that Kiba had been there to pick up the pieces. A person who had always been able to "sniff out" Sato's deficiencies, and wanted to compete for Tama's affection in the past; surely Kiba would be a sparkling prospective companion. By next week, he'd probably be asking Tama out on a date. The mangy dog. Sato hardly noticed his automatic, reactionary punch that dented the wooden frame of the door with his fist on the way out of the flat.

Kakashi tsked at him, "Your door won't shut correctly if you break that."

It still shut with a whining squeak, but it didn't look nice. Sato trudged after his uncle, simmering and despairing. He couldn't bring himself to talk again until they were well on their way and approaching the central ward of the Leaf Village. At the intersection of the most popular business and dining streets, Pakkun marched up to Kakashi. Behind him were the floppy puppies, Tolsi and Gattsu. Sato inhaled sharply at the sight of them.

"Oh yeah." Kakashi decided to announce it, "I am very lucky to have these two in my pack now. How was the walk over, Pakkun?"

"Difficult. Had to dodge snacks and belly rubs, but they're focusing pretty well." Pakkun reported. Sato bent down to pick up the white puppy, "You got new dogs! That's great, I uh— I know you're still sad, but look at them!" He rubbed Tolsi against his cheek and appreciated the small creature's joyful licks.

"If you don't mind putting her down for now, I want them both to walk the rest of the way with us. Build up some stamina." Kakashi watched his nephew set the dog down, "Training's gonna take a while." The group carried on up the street and Kakashi shared the names of his new dogs, a status update of how he was doing at home, how long he would be off from missions, etc. It cheered Sato up somewhat.

Inside the Standby Station there was a serene hum, and veterans were either welcoming or disinterested in the addition of Hatake Sato to their ranks. They gathered in an assembly room that was a skosh small for their purposes. Sato thanked the few Jounin that acknowledged and encouraged him, watching from the corner of his eye as Kakashi issued commands to get his two wiggly pups to sit still without fussing. Pakkun assisted him.

Sato made small talk with his uncle, "It's good that you've got some time off to train them, Kakashi."

"Yeah, the timing works out. In fact, mission inactivity isn't so bad. I can do other things." Kakashi motioned for Gattsu to sit, stay and then awarded a treat for good behavior, "I played a board game for the first time in a few years."

"A board game?"

"That and some card games. I changed all the light bulbs in my house, finally. Vacuumed."

"Well, don't you have to do that often anyway to keep up with the dog hair?"

"Yes, but I enjoy it more when I don't have to rush chores. It's amazing what you can do when you get some time back. Naps have also helped me recover at a better clip, and Gai's team gave me these multi-vitamins that I think actually work."

Sato palmed his face.

"I'm even going on a date later." Kakashi noted, bemused.

In a hushed voice, Sato hissed, "A date? With who?"

He didn't get an answer. The assembled group of shinobi asked for silence as Sarutobi Kakima called the meeting to order. A second later, a disheveled-looking Hyuga Neji slipped in through the door (sweaty and fresh from training with Lee and Wong Leung) and he took his place without being admonished. Gai was not present. Sato wondered about it. The conference rehashed most security threats all were aware of, but covered the prioritization of village perimeter vulnerabilities, adapting routines, and asked if any present would consider applying for the vacant positions in the Sealing Corps yet to be filled. No one volunteered, but there were murmurings of consideration.

A meeting of Jounin: it was a duller affair than what Sato expected. Or maybe it was that every aspect of his life had become duller now. The official business was adjourned and many shinobi carried on smaller conversations amongst themselves. Kurenai took a few minutes to converse with Sato, gush over his promotion and Kakashi's sweet new dogs, but then hurried along for a cross-training assignment she had.

Afterward, Sato gazed out of the second floor window and felt a wave of penitence wash over him, 'Why was this...so important to me?' He couldn't quite remember, 'I would gladly give this up if it meant I wouldn't have hurt Tama. I'd give this away in a second...'

He nearly jumped when a hand came to rest on his shoulder, and Sato blinked stoogishly at Neji who had crossed the room to see him. Sato might've wisecracked at his stern Hyuga friend on a better day, but he could hardly muster any sort of salutations.

"I wanted to congratulate you." Neji told him, "I haven't had the chance to, yet; I knew you would
"...ah...thanks, Neji." Sato felt a lump in his throat. It was weird when grumpy Hyuga Neji actually had kind words for another, more so how brotherly and sincere those words felt. "I should congratulate you again, too. You worked much harder and I still...kind of feel...I haven't caught up to you."

Nearby, Kakashi had his ear trained on the conversation, but was mostly perusing the tabletop spread of snacks for the committee and pocketing the ones he preferred.

Neji seemed surprised by the comment, "I don't think you were ever behind me, Sato. I was never ahead of anyone."

"Pff, are you sure about that?"

"Maybe I could learn certain techniques quickly, but my cooperation with others was lacking. I wasn't reliable." Neji assessed.

"Even if not socially reliable, you were still pretty cool." Sato granted him. And holy shit the other young man smiled at the remark and it was so, so strange in a good way.

Neji went on to say, "I try to attend most of these meetings, but when I'm absent—"

"You want me to find you and bring you up to speed?" Sato correctly guessed, "Can do."

Neji thanked him and then glanced down, noticing a brown puppy sitting on his foot. He looked up again and genuinely did not know what to do.

"Sorry, here...ah," Kakashi scooped up the tiny dog, "Gattsu likes shoes. He likes sleeping on them, more specifically. It was a long walk over here and I think he's tired." He picked up Tolsi as well before bidding his young companions farewell, and moseyed on out with Pakkun at his side.

Sato explained to Neji that his uncle was still barred from missions until he made a full recovery, and until then he had puppies to keep him gently occupied. Though not much of an animal lover himself, Neji did concede that Kakashi seemed entirely in his element. Dogs were his thing, Sato confirmed. Sato probably could have chatted about Lee and Tenten if he tried, but social interaction was grinding on his exposed emotional nerves. He politely excused himself, left the building, and meandered towards the address on the business card Kakashi had given him.

When he arrived at a quaint brick building set apart from the bustle of Konoha's center, Sato nosed into an empty waiting room. A receptionist immediately noticed him from her place at the desk, "Hello!"

"Uh..." He pushed the door shut behind him, "Hello."

"Walk-in? Do you have a referral?"

"Uh, yes. And...kind of?" Never in his life had Sato formally sought counseling. The sole encounter with treatment had been during his Academy days, when social workers spoke to him in the aftermath of his mother's death.

"Okay. Just please fill this form out for me and let me see your I.D." The secretary handed over a form on a clipboard with a pen, "You're in luck! We had a cancellation this morning, so Dr. Iwao can see you for an evaluation right away, if you'd like."
"I…” He wasn't sure if he truly intended to go through with it, "…sure." Sato took a seat on an upholstered, vintage sofa and slowly tapped out the characters of his name, birth date, address, and so forth.

Below were check-box questions with optional lines beside them for further details. The extent of the intake sheet made him very fidgety, "Is this going to…cost a lot?"

"Hm?" The secretary was wiping her glasses clean with a cloth, "You're a ninja. That's this office's designation, so charges and fees are billed to the Shinobi Health Association. There's no need to worry, I am going to make a copy of your I.D for the claim. Non-ninja patients have to present other insurance cards or pay out of pocket here."

"O-Oh."

"It's alright. People have a lot of questions when they haven't been here before."

His attention skittered back to the intake sheet.

Please list your current medications and allergies, if any.

Please specify your rank in the standard shinobi forces and years of professional service.

Do you have any secondary jobs outside of shinobi work? ( ) yes ( ) no
If yes, please describe.

When was your last physical? Have you sustained any life-altering or debilitating injuries due to missions? ( ) estimated date of physical ( ) yes ( ) no
If yes, please describe.

Are you having any problems with your sleep habits? ( ) yes ( ) no
If yes, check where applicable: ( ) sleeping too much ( ) sleeping too little ( ) poor quality sleep ( ) disturbing dreams ( ) other

Are you having any problems with your appetite or eating habits?
If yes, check where applicable: ( ) eating less ( ) eating more ( ) bingeing ( ) restricting

How frequently do you undergo physical or specialized training?

Have you experienced significant weight change in the last two months? ( ) yes ( ) no
Do you regularly use alcohol? ( ) yes ( ) no

In a typical month, how often do you have 4 or more drinks in a 24 hour period?

How often do you engage in recreational drug use? ( ) daily ( ) weekly ( ) monthly ( ) rarely ( ) never

Do you smoke cigarettes or use other tobacco products? ( ) yes ( ) no

Have you had suicidal thoughts recently? ( ) frequently ( ) sometimes ( ) rarely ( ) never

Have you had them in the past? ( ) frequently ( ) sometimes ( ) rarely ( ) never
Have you ever undergone a previous counseling session or psychiatric evaluation? ( ) yes ( ) no

If yes, how long ago and how many sessions?

Have you ever been diagnosed with a health condition or mental disorder? ( ) yes ( ) no

If yes, please describe.

Are there any medical diagnoses in your family? ( ) yes ( ) no

If yes, please describe.

Are you currently in a romantic relationship? ( ) yes ( ) no

If yes, how long have you been in this relationship?

On a scale of 1 to 10 (10 being the highest quality,) how would you rate your current relationship?

In the last 6 months, have you experienced any significant life changes or stressors? If yes, please explain.

Have you ever experienced any the following?

Extreme depressed mood ( ) yes ( ) no

Extreme anxiety ( ) yes ( ) no

Rapid speech ( ) yes ( ) no

Dramatic mood swings ( ) yes ( ) no

Sleep disturbances ( ) yes ( ) no

Phobias ( ) yes ( ) no

Panic attacks ( ) yes ( ) no

Frequent pain or injury ( ) yes ( ) no

Inability to perform on missions ( ) yes ( ) no

Hallucinations ( ) yes ( ) no

Unexplained losses of time ( ) yes ( ) no

Unexplained memory lapses ( ) yes ( ) no

Alcohol or substance abuse ( ) yes ( ) no

Body image problems ( ) yes ( ) no

Eating disorder ( ) yes ( ) no

Self-harming ( ) yes ( ) no

Repetitive thoughts (e.g. obsessions) ( ) yes ( ) no
Repetitive behaviors (e.g. frequent checking, hand washing) ( ) yes ( ) no

Homicidal thoughts ( ) yes ( ) no

When he came to the "Family Mental Health History" chart, Sato could not fill it out beyond any self-evident details he could share about his uncle. He had no other family to mentally profile, at least not accurately. The time Sato spent on the intake sheet's questions made him visualize the quantity of challenges he had thus far dismissed. He'd been doing fine, he thought.

What was he doing this for, anyway? He could manage. Yes, his life was far from stellar at the moment, but Sato could not stomach the idea of taking up a doctor's time with problems that he ought to sort out on his own. People with real problems needed this. Those who were victims of the universe and freak accidents, those suffering from true health issues: they needed support! Not some loser who was responsible for the breakup of his relationship.

If anything, Sato thought as he handed the sheet back to the secretary, this was an appointment that Tama could probably use. Right. Because he may have single-handedly burned her sanctuary of expectations to the ground and laid waste to her trust, happiness, self-esteem, and those other positivities she had in abundance. He robbed her of those things. So what was he doing here? Sato replayed the question in his mind as he sat on the charming sofa. What was he doing here? As if he were entitled to this extension of help?

And as far as he knew, society at large, at least in the Leaf Village, hardly ever discussed mental health and the population's management of it. Every now and again he'd hear terms like "psycho," and "manic episodes," and "anxiety," and "clan killer." Things like that. It was no secret that shinobi's minds went sour fairly regularly and for a myriad of reasons, but those headlines tended to get flip, unsympathetic responses. For such a pervasive problem, there weren't very many who actually understood what any of it entailed. Himself included.

"—you now."

Sato caught the tail end of the secretary's statement, shaking off his thoughts.

She repeated, "Dr. Iwao will see you now."

"Oh." He was a squirrel all the way to the office door on the right, unreasonably nervous.

On the other side of the door was a short woman of indiscernible age, wearing a sport coat and slacks somehow tailored to suit her miniscule frame. Her dark bobbed haircut and tiny eyes might've been intimidating if not for the granny-like smile gracing her face. "Don't hesitate, you have one foot in already…" She waved her hand to usher him along, "I just made tea if you would like some."

"…no, thanks." Sato observed the space of the orderly, stylish room and sat again in a cushy seat beside a potted sansevieria plant.

The woman resumed her preparations of biscuits and hot tea on a tray, leaving them on a low table in front of her wing chair. Her eyes scanned the intake sheet, darted up to him, back to the sheet, then back to Sato. Clearly, two and two were being put together in her head as she got the snapshot of the situation. Sato's fingers curled against the soft fabric of his chair, antsy, swallowing and trying to stay calm. Why would this person of all people make him feel like running? What could she do? There was no threat here.

"A biscuit?" She tried to offer him something again.

"No, thank you, Doctor Iwao."
The doctor shook her head, "I prefer Sumiko-san, but if you're committed to formality Doctor will do." She plucked up a cookie and crunched on it, sitting back in her chair, "This is your first time here, Hatake-san."

"Uh…" When she addressed him so politely it felt weird, felt like she was talking to Kakashi—someone worth respect!

"Sato, then." Sumiko guessed.

"Yeah, that's better." He nodded.

"We can use this visit to get to know each other and find out if you would benefit from future counseling." Sumiko told him, "But from first glance at this sheet, I think you might have a lot to unpack in one session."

"I don't know how to get it off my chest, honestly." Sato admitted, "I don't want to talk about it."

"So, you don't want to talk about what's on this sheet?" Sumiko smiled understandingly, "Then I welcome you to talk about anything else. We can even talk about me, if you want."

He looked at her quizzically.

"The point is that you can let your guard down a little here. Open up." She explained, "I'm a shinobi just like you. And I've been licensed in medicine for over twenty years. Confide in me— I might be able to relate to what you've been through."

"I hope not." He muttered.

"Try not to be hard on yourself. Not in here. This space doesn't perpetuate judgement or shame." The doctor informed him, "That's not to say counseling is easy— good counseling never is. It's work. Working on yourself. But I like to think that even when patients are challenged while they're in my office, they walk out and feel better as they go about their days."

"That…kind of sounds…like something I need." Sato admitted.

Sumiko was nodding and sipping from a tea cup. He still struggled to bring up any subject, good or bad, to begin some kind of meaningful conversation. She set her cup down on the tray again and shifted in her wingback while watching him, reading minute signals of discomfort.

"How about I start?" The doctor offered, "You should know who you're talking to, after all. I am Iwao Sumiko, Jounin, former Deputy Chief of Konoha's Medical Corps, and though I've put my most exciting days behind me I now happily serve as a psychologist for the standard forces. I also have a separate psychiatric practice upstairs in this building with another doctor." Sumiko laced her hands primly as she balanced her elbows on the chair's arms, "Why do I do what I do? Because the Second and Third Great Shinobi Wars may have spared the physical bodies of my friends who fought, but many lost their minds or their will to live on. I couldn't bear seeing anyone else hurt with no resources to turn to in our village. I've made sure they and many like them now have somewhere to go."

"Wow." Sato said faintly, "You said…the Second War too?"

"I did."

"Didn't…Tsunade-sama fight in that one?"
"She did. I was in the Academy graduating class that followed after hers." Sumiko wore a cat-like smile, "She's a woman after my own heart: trailblazing medicine, being a leader…I adore her. Can you tell?"

"That's really great." He meant it, somewhat star-struck.

"What else?" The doctor rubbed her chin, "Iwao is my married name. My husband and I have been together for seventeen years. We have no children. He serves in the Torture and Intel Corps, but plans to retire at the end of this year. We both love gardening and designing jewelry. While I sometimes get carried away with part-time home decorating with my best friend, my husband is usually off in bars with his pals and protégées. He's trained two Genin teams in his time. I'd say I admire him, but I think just a bit more highly of myself since his smoking habit led to heart and respiratory issues I warned him about. It annoys me that he didn't take greater care of himself." She was cheerful in her memoir, "My life is quite ordinary and tranquil now, but I like that. The old days were tumultuous and full of failure. Those times molded me into who I am."

"Yeah, I know about days like that." He relaxed a bit more on the settee, shoulders loosening.

"They don't last forever, Sato," Sumiko told him, "No matter how ugly it can get, we stumble through it to still waters again."

"The waves I'm riding are pretty choppy right now. I was on still water a few days ago…"

"Why don't you share a bit about yourself? The basic things that weren't on your sheet, for example."

Sumiko suggested, "I know you're related to Kakashi because he came to counseling here for several years."

"Yeah, he, uh…referred me to you. He knows that I've been…"

Sato sighed and began, "So I'm his nephew."

"You are indeed."

"Where do I start…? Um. My family? Mom was really cool. I never…got to know my Dad, because he either died or left us before I was born." The chair's padded back felt more and more comfortable as he settled and spoke, "But Mom handled it. For some reason, whenever tragedy struck, like when my Grandma passed away or when Grandpa killed himself…then when my Dad disappeared…I remember how nothing could get her down."

Sumiko was nodding, "Kakashi spoke about his sister that way. He envied her resilience."

"Yeah, I'll never forget how she could survive those things and see the silver-lining. She and my Uncle would butt heads a lot, but I know that Kakashi cared about her. He was just scared of everything, back then. When I was a little kid, I remember times when he was too freaked out to even hold my hand."

By then, Sumiko had fully invested her attention in the tale.

"Now I know why…he's like that. But he's better now, I think!" Sato amended, "So…when my Mom died while I was still studying in the Academy…we were all shocked and not handling it well. She'd been sick for a while, but we talked ourselves into thinking she'd…always be with us. I had to push myself to go to school every day and keep working. Kakashi didn't help me much. He was kind of checked-out."

Sato watched the doctor nod in silence with a placid expression, then went on, "When I was a baby, though, Kakashi and my Mom agreed to a matchmaking deal with the Maito family—one of my uncle's good friends...well, anyway—I was engaged to...to..." Suddenly he couldn't speak. It felt like there was tar in his mouth.

"That's alright, I can see this is stressful for you." Sumiko encouraged him, "Did this family help you after your mother passed away?"

"Yes." Sato confirmed, "Well. Not her parents, but...Tama did a lot for me."

"How old were you?"

"About eight."

"And how old was Tama at the time?"

"Eleven?" He tried to recall.

"How responsible for such a young age. So your basic needs were met thanks to Tama." Sumiko understood, "Not your uncle or her parents. That must've been difficult, regardless. Did you receive counseling at that time?"

"I didn't."

"Did any member of the SHA offer it to you? Or a social worker offer it to you?"

"Not that I...recall." Sato had no memory of mental health guidance beyond the kindness of Academy teachers.

"Hm." Said Sumiko archly while jotting a note on her spiral pad, "At that stage of the SHA's development, the child services department should have provided you with mandatory counseling for at least three months. It doesn't surprise me how many of our shinobi were slipping through the cracks then...nowadays it's improved. Still imperfect, but the department functions much better than it once did. Excuse my interruption. Please tell me more about Tama, if you can, and tell me about your shinobi studies."

"Um. So...I lived in the same place after Mom died and Tama helped me figure out...how to afford things...and clean and shop and feed myself and just...take care of myself. It was hard and I used a lot of shortcuts, but I kept it together. She paid for the things I couldn't. Taught me a lot...kinda...kept me human when I didn't know how to be around people. So it got better. And I had fun again." Sato explained, "She was my best friend, but I also made friends at the Academy. They're still my friends today. We joked around in school, played, graduated, and now we work together and hang out outside of missions, even."

"Not everyone is fortunate enough to maintain those bonds for so long." The doctor noted.

"Yeah, we're pretty lucky! Even some others who weren't my friends then...are now." He smiled slightly, thinking of Neji, "And I have a great Jounin-Sensei and my teammates are always there for me, they're just—the best. I don't know how they put up with all my bullshit, but somehow they do and I just love 'em so much..." Sato's smiled dropped and his eyes grew teary, "I love...Tama too..."

"Your sheet says you are no longer in a relationship. If something happened, do you want to talk about it, or would you like to talk about something else for now?" Sumiko offered.

The weight was back, squeezing his chest and throat. A full minute of silence passed while Sato slowly inhaled, exhaled, and tried to get his bearings, tried to think of a place to start…

Then bit by bit, he spoke. About the past and the present, the chronology of events sometimes crisscrossed, yet he covered the times when he'd been reluctant about being Tama’s companion, all the way up to his maturation and realization that he had been attracted to her and was acting on those desires. Other events and challenges were sprinkled into the tale, however he centralized his distress around the fact that he'd stupidly risked infidelity, said nothing about it as they progressed their relationship, and more recently watched it fall apart as the truth came to light.

Sumiko had offered some limited commentary throughout, but waited for Sato to conclude recapping the most excruciating events. When there was a lull and she could see he needed a break (he was finally eating from the plate of biscuits she was picking on), the doctor told him, "This isn't so unusual."

"Hmf?" He said, crumbs sticking around his mouth.

"It isn't, Sato. This type of event isn't rare. It's unfortunate, yes. Agonizing, no doubt. But you aren't the first shinobi to speak on being on either side of this issue. The fact is thus: maintaining a relationship as a shinobi is far harder than we realize. The burden of our work and missions is taxing enough, but relationships can capsize under the pressures of what we do. Our personal time is limited, and how we spend it on others is constrained by numerous obligations. I am not saying this as if it excuses your actions, but overall there is a trend—a correlation, if you will," Sumiko got somewhat scientific about it, "Based on my experience and studies I've conducted, myself and other counselors in this field from many villages have noticed that most relationships that shinobi are in tend to suffer—even if they stay in them all their lives. They struggle just a bit more than non-shinobi relationships and families." She poured herself the last bit of tea in the pot.

"Okay. So it's not surprising." Sato granted, "But it still sucks."

"It does. You know the value of what you lost. Not everyone I've spoken to who went through relationship failures feels remorse, but rather anger or resentment. Sometimes they think of revenge or killing. Those types require…very carefully structured therapy," Sumiko shared, "But not you, Sato. You have empathy for those you've hurt."

"Hurray, I guess." He wasn't proud of how he understood the feelings of others, since he'd been trying to avoid or suppress those feelings, after all. "Sumiko-san, it just pisses me off that I didn't realize it sooner. If I understand now, why didn't I understand then? I mean, I thought I did, but I filtered it all through a smudged lens. Couldn't see I was being immature… I didn't care how Tama would feel about what I did, because I…thought I'd get away with it. In the moment I was so sure."

Sumiko continued nodding.

"All I thought about was what I felt. That it'd be easy to do, and the opportunity was right in front of my face. So I took it. Like I was still some jerk kid looking for handouts, like my life was still so hard! Oh, poor me." Sato ground his knuckles into the chair's cushion, "At the time Tama didn't want to take things too far, so I became impatient and acted like a jackass."

"You also mentioned you were impaired at the time." The doctor added, "Which did not govern your decision, but made it easier to overlook your inhibitions. Alcohol hardly ever improves these situations."

"I haven't had any since."

"And that's a sensible decision, but you rely on other substances." Sumiko noted.
Sato looked at her like she had suggested joining a Satanic cult, as though her comment was completely off the mark.

"Let me clarify," The doctor backtracked, "Earlier you talked about what your diet is like. You avoid alcohol, yes? But you consume a lot of sugar. More so than that, you depend on coffee. Caffeine is a stimulant." Sumiko spun her pen around her finger, "You have been depending on that stimulant since your mother died."

"Uh. Well…yeah. But it's just something I picked up…"

"I won't tell you that you abuse substances to the point of self-destruction, but you use them to regulate yourself. To function. It could be a method of foisting control back from depressive behaviors that would otherwise stall you." Sumiko observed, "Some people who are depressed can conceal their emotional suffering with coping mechanisms, happy demeanors, and creative talents. It's how they maintain their status quo in society, which is not wholly supportive of or understanding of mental illness."

"Well I don't want to say that I'm mentally ill. Because I'm not. That's just an excuse—"

"For what? It isn't an excuse. It's a state of health, quite simply. It isn't the stigma that this village makes it to be." The doctor countered, adding, "Many shinobi are depressed and many have been diagnosed with various disorders. Most of them carry on well with their lives thanks to therapy and medication."

"Who wants any of that when you can lead a normal life without it?"

"Most can't lead a normal life without it. There's nothing to be ashamed of. Some even quit being shinobi, if it becomes too much. The decision is theirs." Sumiko pointed her pen at Sato, "You don't have to be normal to have value, Sato. You don't have to perfectly fit the perceptions of others. If some of your happiness and functionality is manufactured and they know it, what does it really matter? Most will never know anyway."

A heavy breath escaped him. He understood what she meant. For quite a long time he had wanted to look a certain way, appeal in a certain way to others. Sato would even point out the flaws of his peers at times, mostly in jest, to defend what was supposedly right with his image. He mentioned this to the doctor.

Sumiko nodded, "It doesn't have to rule you or own who you are. Your mental health needs to be managed just as your physical health does, and you know that a band-aid doesn't mend a broken leg. Some pains require lengthier, more thoughtful treatments."

"I guess so…but I feel like if I come here for counseling I'll just be talking about Tama most of the time."

"Then if that is what you need to do, that is what we'll do." She told him.

"But is that right?"

"It is if that is the subject that de-harmonizes you— puts you out of touch with yourself. You might find there are other things that need to be addressed as well, if you're willing to explore them." The doctor took a few last notes for herself, "Don't tell yourself that you don't deserve to get better, or need to ruin another aspect of your life as penance for how you've done wrong. Treat pain with care, not more pain."

"I want to try to do that…" He agreed.
"Would you like to begin routine counseling here? Say, twice a week whenever is convenient for you?"

"I guess that'd be good. How do I—?"

"I'll send a confidential request to the Hokage to forward me your mission schedules as she arranges them. We can mold your appointments around your activity."

"Okay." Sato sat up a bit straighter, "Thanks. And thanks for the biscuits."

"You're welcome. My husband makes them."

"That's talent. Those were good."

"Weren't they?" Sumiko stood from her chair, "I'd say this was a fine start, Sato. We send out a messenger pigeon with reminders of upcoming appointments, so be on the lookout. Once I have Tsunade-sama forwarding me your schedule, we'll begin."

He followed the woman to the door and somehow felt lighter. He thanked her, learned the secretary's name was Eri, thanked her too, and then left the office when Doctor Iwao concluded her pleasantries. For the first time in three days, Sato felt like there was something ahead that he could work towards. Something that wasn't a black, desolate landscape.

There was no excuse good enough to avoid lunch out with Sakura and Ino, so Tama put on a fake, cheerful face and followed them to their preferred cafe. If all she had to do was survive forty minutes of chit-chat and bourgeois food, well, it couldn't be any tougher than fighting Huo had been.

"Yeah, so I've started some part-time assignments at the Sensory Corps and Intel Department. It's been pretty enlightening." Ino recapped as their milk teas arrived, stirring her straw, "Sometimes we have guest brains that come in for hacking."

"Excuse me, what?" Sakura said, her lips fiddling over her drink straw.

"I mean, when we retrieve particular information from a target using... more sophisticated techniques." Ino actually meant brutal or invasive, but they could read between the lines, "We use more resilient test subjects. Tougher nuts to crack, you know! Some members of ANBU come in and try to resist us in practice sessions."

"Did you beat an ANBU brain?" Tama was intrigued.

"Well, one came in and he was...I asked him to work with someone else. He's got a steel brain like Sakura's." A noisy sip before Ino went on, "So I worked with that guy we met at the Tournament Festival."

"Sorry, I can't remember." Sakura was smiling, "That was a busy night for me."

Ino bumped elbows with her, "I bet it was, Forehead."

"You mean Sai?" Tama gathered.

"Yeah, the one Sato introduced us to." Ino confirmed. The group paused to give their orders to a waiter, then continued kibitzing. "He wasn't so bad." Ino recalled, "Not the strongest brain, but I think he gave it his best shot. He was on patrol during that recent fiasco in the Forest of Death, so I saw a lot of that...and he was kind of..."
"Kind of what?" Sakura prompted.

"Kind of brave. I mean, I saw some fucked up, unexplainable stuff when I fished around his head." Ino swirled the contents of her iced drink, "It was just a little embarrassing that I noticed— it just floated to the top…that he thought I was cute."

"Well it's a feature you make way too obvious to miss." Sakura gave her that, "But stop blushing about it, Pig. You're taken."

"I know! I was flattered, that's all." Ino tittered.

Tama was curiously quiet as she sat by and listened, sipping her drink.

"So, have you picked out any houses yet?" Ino was aware of Tama's efforts as of last week, "You said that you and Sato were shopping around."

"No, no houses." Tama told her, "Neither of us are quite ready for home ownership. The expense of it, anyway."

"But I thought Kakashi-sensei was offering you some kind of assistance with that? Like a gift?" Sakura remembered more of the discussion, "You really didn't find anything?"

"We're just not ready." Tama tried to leave it at that.

"Hmm." Ino arched a blonde eyebrow, "Suddenly not wanting a house, even if it's presented to you on a silver platter? Haven't heard that one yet."

"It's fine. Rent for a while and get situated." Sakura tried to endorse the unlikely choice, "Have you made any other plans?"

Her tongue felt cotton-like, speech fluffing as Tama tried to remain poised, "No plans yet, but I'll let you know when I have something to report."

As Ino was predisposed to taunt the truth out of a target, she couldn't help herself, "No plans you say... How about the latest and greatest, hm? Have you done anything spicy with that cutie of yours? You were telling us last week."

Tama bit down on her straw and refused the bait.

"No? We haven't seen Sato in a while." Ino noted, a faint edge of hostility in her tone, "Aren't you going to bring him around when you have time off?"

Sakura sensed the accusation Ino wanted to make and tried to intervene, "She doesn't have to, Ino. Their schedules—"

"He was promoted to Jounin, shouldn't we be celebrating?" Ino carried on, "Tama, shouldn't we? Say something."

"Ino, leave her alone."

"I…" Tama tried to clear her throat, "Don't want to talk about it."

Sakura's shoulders drooped upon hearing such an admission.

Ino leaned forward in her seat, eyes flashing angrily, "Of course you don't want to talk about it, because he's fucked something up. I can tell he hurt you."
There was a shiny film in Tama's eyes, but she confessed nothing. Sakura reacted with silent, wide-eyed horror and baited breath. No. Not those two, Sato and Tama, who she adored seeing together as if they were peas in a pod.

"How bad?" Ino tried to evaluate the extent of the damage. Tama's ragged breathing was not reassuring, so Ino handed her upset friend a spare menu to hide her face from public view as it reddened.

"Very bad, huh?" Ino ascertained sharply, "Is it splitsville?"

When Tama nodded Sakura's jaw nearly dropped. Ino was genuinely taken aback by the answer. Though they didn't say so aloud, both girls viewed Tama's healthy relationship as barometer for their own relationships. The heartache of their friend was all too relatable.

"Please, I... just want to have lunch in peace." Tama's words were thick, trying to calm down over the final sips of milk tea, "I'm not doing great, but I don't want to make a big production of any of this, do you understand? I refuse to say anything until I know neither of you will."

"We won't!" Sakura whispered. Her head nodded in time with Ino's to reassure Tama that it was safe to confide in them.

And so, over picture-perfect dishes of lunch entrées they spoke in hushed voices, and Tama retold the story to the best of her ability. Questions were answered, curses were uttered, small gasps timed perfectly to scandalous admissions; and then Tama concluded with, "I just don't think Sato wanted what he always had. It's better if he goes his own way."

"That is so wrong! It is just completely wrong-!" Sakura disagreed softly, "He loves you! He's loved you very much for a long time! Men make stupid mistakes—"

Ino railroaded the soft sentiment, "It is not up to any man or woman who has been cheated on to forgive those mistakes, Sakura. That opens the door for the perpetrator to make those mistakes again and be forgiven again." She violently rearranged her plate with chopsticks, "That isn't what it means to be a good partner. Tama should value herself! And people should suffer their stupidity."

"Ino, stop." Sakura hissed.

"You can't let him get away with it." Ino warned Tama, "Don't go easy on him by letting him ride off into the sunset! Destroy him."

"I'm not letting Sato get off easy. It's just that I don't think I need to fire any parting shots." Tama explained, "It's done. I don't need a fight. I'm feeling good about taking the high road."

"High positions are tactically suited for dropping heavy things." Ino was using her imagination.

"Please, respect my wishes and leave this be." Tama commanded, "The both of you hear me, right? I just want my friends beside me. I know it'll get easier."

When Tama motioned to put money notes on the table to pay for her share of lunch, Ino puffed up, still upset, "No. Sad ladies don't pay for therapy lunches. Put that away, we've got it…"

By the next afternoon, Sato was pleased to get an update from the counseling office that his next appointment was Friday at 1:00PM. He'd have a mission between now and then, he estimated. The idea of emotional respite in therapy had grown on him since speaking to Doctor Iwao.
His day was fairly average. Team training excluded Kurenai as she was busy moving items into her new house, which they then visited later in the day. She seemed wholly unaware of Sato's breakup and made a few uncomfortable, innocent, forward-looking comments about his marriage. Sato was able to change the subject. The house had recently been remodeled and Kurenai had plenty to say about it. He, Hinata, and Shino stayed for dinner which pleasantly surprised Asuma: "It's like a little housewarming party." He joked. Sato barely touched his food.

He went home in the dark, slept, and woke before dawn the next day. Sato was feeling slightly more motivated. He trained in the southern forest swathed in red leaves, directing new techniques his owls could use, and worked himself hard long past sun-up. When it was about time for breakfast he obeyed his empty stomach, and walked to the nearby convenience mart in town called Cosme. Sato opted for a pre-packaged hardboiled egg and rice ball, as opposed to his sugary standby foods. Then he asked for the mysterious green health smoothie advertised on the order board. The barista gave him a funny look while jotting his name down on a clear cup.

Sato ate and sipped his way across the village, destined for the dance studio to perk himself up with one of his favorite pastimes. 'I've got an hour before the first class of the day starts, so I can pop into the loft and brush up on some routines.'

On the studio's ground floor, the hawk-faced owner stopped him at the bottom of the stairs, "What are you doing here?"

"I have an unlimited membership, remember? I come here all the time to practice between classes." He felt uneasy having to explain himself to the woman who saw him almost every week.

"You don't need your unlimited privileges anymore. I heard what you did." The woman tapped her foot as she addressed him, "If you continue to practice here, then Tama may stop coming to teach classes."

If horror were like instant coffee, Just add hot water! Then Sato supposed only a stranger's comment was needed to immediately trigger fear and paranoia. He took backwards steps out of the studio and back onto the road, into daylight. 'No way. How did that lady know?' He walked briskly, 'Maybe that barista heard something? He acted weird while making my drink…'

But if two or more non-acquaintances had heard of his extremely personal and painful breakup with Maito Tama, there was a possibility that others were aware. Scuttling up the street, he couldn't help but notice people's glances at him.

'How could they know? Tama wouldn't air dirty laundry like that! It's unlike her.' Sato neared the Administrative Building, his thoughts abuzz, 'She wouldn't do that even if she's mad as hell at me.'

Upstairs in Tsunade's office, the Hokage was mercifully oblivious to Sato's struggle. Distracted with the council's draft of an official agreement with Hidden Waterfall, Tsunade simultaneously briefed him on a solo reconnaissance mission he had the next morning, "There's always a chance you'll run into a counter-operative where I'm sending you, but if not this intel retrieval should go smoothly." She sniffed at him, "Sato, do you hear me? What are you frowning about?"

"Nothing, nothing! I won’t let anyone get the better of me, Tsunade-sama."

"Good. Those are your orders in that scroll I gave you. If you see an intern on your way out, tell them to bring me something— anything to drink. I am not ready for this council meeting and honestly they are not ready for me, so it could get messy." Tsunade dismissed him.

He did as instructed and flagged down a Medical Corps intern who happened by, who dutifully agreed to fetch the Hokage something from the office kitchen. Sato trotted down the stairs, bouncing back and forth in his own head, Tsunade-sama seems to be acting normally. Who could've—? No. Kakashi wouldn't let Kiba tell anyone. Kiba wouldn't bother telling anyone, since I know he hates wasting time on me.

In the lobby, he noticed Chouji passing out fresh cinnamon rolls from a box to building occupants. He was waiting on his team to gather. Drawn to the heavenly smell, Sato smiled automatically at his friend, "Can I get one too?"

When Chouji stared at him like he was an empty glass jar, the reason why was not lost on Sato. His expression grew solemn when he amended, "Sorry. Maybe there isn't enough to go around? Save one for Sunshine, though, because those are her favorite."

"Sure." Chouji agreed faintly.

"Get one to Tama too." Sato suggested, mostly due to heartache, but the remark seemed to positively blow Chouji's mind as the young man snapped the box shut and goggled at Sato.

"Are you actually talking about her?" He set the box on a counter, pointing a finger at Sato's chin, "Should you be doing that?"

"I don't…see why I shouldn't." A hint of frustration crept into Sato's tone, "Everyone's acting weird."

"We're acting weird—?" Chouji scoffed.

"Hey! Why is it that folks in this village think it's okay to talk about someone's personal life when it's got nothing to do with them?" Sato growled quietly, "I can barely get anything done today. Can you pass that along? For everyone to knock it off?"

Movement in his peripheral vision indicated there was another visitor in the lobby, moving fast, but they both heard her coming. Arms waving and heels clicking on tile, Ino raised her voice to shriek reprimands at Sato, Hatake! You lousy piece of—!" Chouji promptly pulled her away before she could take a swing, evacuating the kunoichi down at adjacent corridor as her clamoring persisted. Others in the lobby regarded Sato curiously after the interaction, but he booked it out the door.

I get the feeling… Sato thought as his stomach sank, proceeding toward the Jounin Standby Station, 'Ino did it. No one's shouted at me so far…she probably found out and told literally every being with ears she had contact with.' He ground his teeth, Too bad we always had that in common: being huge gossips.

Society in Konoha was rather free and progressive, at least Sato could believe that on a good day. However, none of the great villages or small settlements in between had overcome the cultural cornerstone of mentsu. Face. The concept of one's prestige and honor incumbent upon the opinions of others. And the preservation thereof. In one day, it seemed to Sato, his loss of face had taken an epic nosedive the likes of which few in Konohagakure could ever boast. Perhaps it started with sneers as a few learned of the unfair "smearing" of the Maito family, and what prestige it had cost them. Upon learning who the responsible party was in this damage of "face," Sato now found himself in a gossip chain that relentlessly sought to scold and humiliate him.

And best of all? This type of ridicule was incredibly normal. At least around here, a little voice in the back of his mind noted, You can always run away if it gets too bad— if it wrecks work and your social life— don't let it! But being fresh off of his Jounin promotion and new duties to the village, Sato wasn't swayed to leave and neglect the needs of so many. That would lose him even more face.
In the Standby Station he did not at all feel like himself. His hair was on end, his stomach in knots, and Sato all but tip-toed up the stairs to the next floor. Another young Jounin brushed Sato on the way up the stairwell. Sato recognized the man to be Runruna Mion, a contemporary of Tama's. Mion scowled at him, "Out of my way, lowlife."

He barely reached the top of the stairs. Sato stood there alone after the encounter, reconsidering his plans for the day. Was it wise to show his face in a public meeting? Word of his transgression had spread like wildfire. 'No. I can't shirk my duties. I can't be intimidated.' He moved down the hall and slid open the door of the assembly room. It shut softly behind him. Within, the space was stuffed with elite shinobi and visiting Corps members who intended to give a presentation to the group. Sato took a place against a wall.

On the opposite side of the room, Kakashi and Neji could be glimpsed between the pack of bodies and flak vests. The puppies were sitting obediently at Kakashi's feet. Sato would have preferred migrating in their direction for comfort's sake, but roll-call had started and he didn't want to draw attention. As it was, attention was already drifting his way. Asuma was close enough to squeeze over to Sato and take the spot beside him, "Oh boy, kid."

"Pretend I'm not here, if you want." Sato mumbled. He kept scanning the room in search of familiar faces. Gai was absent again, which was not a good sign. Sweat begin to pearl on the back of Sato's neck.

"Kurenai's running late today." Asuma mentioned, "I'll try to do some damage control until she shows up."

Sato wondered in a whisper, "How many people know?"

"The better question is: how many people don't know?" Asuma advised him morbidly.

Perspiration begin to slick on his skin, and Sato held still, trying to remain calm as sets of eyes settled on him and stuck. He folded his arms and stared off into space, as if none of this mattered to him. As if they couldn't hurt him.

"What a view! Looks like this lot has got an abundance of judgmental assholes who forgot how to mind their own business." Asuma said it loudly enough to force a few gawkers to turn away, "For fuck's sake…I thought we'd all graduated from the Academy, but it doesn't look like it."

"Is…Gai…not here?" Sato was afraid to ask.

"I saw him briefly this morning and it did not look good. Gai was probably going to or from his brother's office." Asuma guessed.

Sato reminded himself how to control his bowels and facial expressions. It would have been too much to hope that this gossip-storm had missed the Maito family and its patriarchs.

Even more unfortunate was that Shiranui Genma stood from his seat and looked quite fed-up about something. He faced Sato while chewing on a senbon needle, "You can sit this meeting out."

"I'm already marked on the attendance list." Sato tried to brush off the veiled threat. He vaguely knew that Genma had been an old teammate of Gai's, and that he was probably aware of the turmoil going on in his friend's family. A seat away from Genma was Ebisu, the third member of Gai's old team, who was discreetly listening to the exchange.

Genma drew closer, rather formidable with his shoulders squared and pinpointing stare, "Marked down or not, you aren't needed. In fact, you're not really needed at meetings here in general…since disrespectful punks who sleep around and wreck homes don't have constructive input to give."

Asuma wore a warm, genial smile, "Mornin' Genma. Can I interest you in shutting the fuck up?"

Genma smiled back, "Hey Asuma, did you hit your head and forget not to defend a little shit who breaks vows with one of Konoha's most respected families?"

"It's not your place to judge him, Baggypants."

Sato interjected, "Look, I don't know what you've heard, but that wasn't what happened. It was a lone mistake, and frankly…it's not up for discussion."

Nearby, Ebisu agreed and fiddled with his sunglasses, "You aren't welcome here."

"Hey!" At the head of the room Kakima was shouting, "I'm still taking roll so shut up back there! I can't hear."

The standoff was neutralized when Kakashi popped over like a magician, nudging Genma and Ebisu back to their seats. He muttered to them about patching things up with Gai later. They seemed to simmer down.

It was then Sato looked across the room again and met eyes with Neji, and realized he had probably only had Neji's respect for two full days before spoiling it. In that moment Sato felt so desperately hopeless that he turned around without a word and exited the assembly room. He remembered as he hustled out of the Standby Station that he used to joke to his friends who goofed up, This is why we can't have nice things! And indeed, this was why.

The world outside was a swirl of color and undefined shapes, all lit in useless sunlight and filled with meaningless, accidental things. When Sato noticed Sakura and Kiba across the avenue with their pitying looks directed at him, he knew there was no way back up. To escape the freefall of shame. It was forever down, down, down from now on. He was too ashamed to make an emergency, drop-in visit to Doctor Iwao's office.

Sato conducted the rest of his day robotically far away from acquaintances, refused to sleep, and took off for his mission at dawn the next morning. In the southern reaches of the Fire Country Sato happened across the low level counter-operative that Tsunade had mentioned might appear, and ragefully pummeled the interloper in a skirmish, leaving him to bleed unconscious in forest nettle. Sato completed his report by night and took no breaks. When he returned to Konoha the day after that, the shattering isolation had fully set in. He'd stopped eating and sleeping. He sipped water from time to time. Never in all his days had Sato been so passionless.

Back in the village he submitted his report by messenger hawk and skipped a debriefing with the Hokage, returned home to shower off, and then curled up in his bed. It felt so soft. 'It's kind of like you're still here, Tama. I hope no one's giving you grief.'

A messenger pigeon was tapping at his window, hoping he would fill out a form to reschedule his counseling appointment. Though Sato could hear it, his mind had traveled back to the past in search of the white, electric-glass wall he'd found in death. The anguish he was feeling was a callback to that mysterious place; he'd forgotten all about it until now. 'That Akatsuki fellow…killed me. I think I've…overstayed.' Sato supposed, 'I don't want Sunshine to feel bad about…working to save me, but she shouldn't have.'

If he had remained dead, he never would have gone on to destroy the honor of so many people close to him. Sato was convinced of it, 'If taking responsibility for a mistake that cannot be undone means death...it's not that hard to die. At least, not as hard as it is to live on.'

He didn't like romanticizing the idea of death. He wanted a reason to justify sticking around, but Sato struggled to pin down his positive contributions. He rested and then re-dressed, heading back out into the village. He would talk to them—his friends. He'd explain what was going on, that he and Tama would be fine while apart, and how the loss of face was hurting him. That he was thinking of leaving and going back to the white place. Could they please make it stop?

It turned out that Shikamaru didn't even humor him when Sato showed up to greet the team, and Chouji had to restrain Ino again as she fought to take a swing at Sato's head. He took the hint and his leave. Likewise, Sato was shunned by most people his age that he approached that day. He wandered through town after realizing how futile an effort it was.

At the sloped grass bank of the river that cut through the west ward, Sato sat down and rested his head on his bent knees. If he couldn't have the person he loved, why couldn't he at least have gotten to keep his friends? Why had there been collateral damage?

The autumn breeze kind of felt good. Sato blinked, sighed, and then gazed across the stream to see Neji's team on the far side. It looked like Wushu practice with Lee's grandpa Wong Leung. He felt his heart drop into his stomach when they noticed him too. Exhausted, Sato rose to his feet to trudge away and find another spot to self-reflect. He glanced back over his shoulder when he heard a sound. A bolt of fright ran through Sato—Tenten was running full-charge across the river after him. Oh my god—! I mean, I know people are mad! But is she really gonna attack me—?

He could have tripled his pace if he had energy or a speck of food in his stomach, but Sato only managed a lilting run in what he hoped was a safe direction. Tenten's shouting behind him was indistinct. I can't take much more of this. Since when had his life been reduced to running away from friends? Nothing could be more contrary to his nature.

Both Lee and Neji crossed the river as well. Tenten had summoned a rope-bola from a tool scroll, pitched it, and tripped Sato as it wound around his ankles. He fell with a paaff sound to the grass, breathing heavily and supposing, Well, might as well let them... Sato rolled to his back to look up at the sky, sorrow replacing his momentary fear, and Tenten then came into his field of view. She bent down to undo the knotted bola around his legs.

"You can beat me up, if you want." He wasn't going to resist.

"I don't want to beat you up, Sato. I needed you to stop running away," Tenten corrected him and extended her hand, "Are you alright? We've been worried about you."

He was speechless as he took her hand and let the kunoichi pull him to his feet. Her teammates caught up and took their places beside Tenten. Lee's eyes were watering. Neji seemed rather composed, wearing the same expression Sato had glimpsed in the Jounin Standby Station.

"I'm not alright." Sato admitted.

"We noticed." Tenten acknowledged, "Everyone's heard about what happened. Ino went around talking about it."

"That's what I thought." He said in a small voice.

"Though we may be disappointed..." Lee told him, "None of us can tolerate the unconscionable behavior that's been directed at you. It is appalling. It is heartless!"
Sato sort of stared at Lee and detected that, yes, his words were sincere. But Lee was always sincere. And Lee was very good at empathizing with other people.

"I wanted to talk to you at the Station." Neji spoke up, "But things escalated and then you left. It's disgusting that those who claim to be veterans and mature adults feel entitled to punish you when your personal life is not theirs to discuss."

"Right. They don't know me so well…you guys, on the other hand…" Sato's voice was soft, "Maybe it's in your best interest to stop associating with me too."

"No." Neji said flatly, "We don't subscribe to crowd mentalities."

"You deserve to be supported!" Lee insisted.

Sato regarded them with shiny eyes.

"For the record, we care about and want to support Tama too, but we can't take sides and write you off like you're worthless. Friends shouldn't have to take sides." Tenten determined, "And it'd be arrogant for any of us to say we haven't each done something to hurt people close to us. Well, Lee never has, but he's a special case."

Lee nodded in mopey understanding while Neji gave Tenten a strange look, "You've never hurt anyone."

Sato watched the young woman stare back at Neji as if she were hiding some terrible secret, and it felt like he'd glimpsed a ticking time bomb that he shouldn't have. From Neji's perspective, he was one to freely admit he had done wrong and hurt others, but he was heretofore unaware that his girlfriend could have possibly broken faith at any point. Tenten's face indicated otherwise. Sato gulped and looked away.

"We will not tolerate your mistreatment, so please depend on us if you are ever in need!" Lee offered.

The comment snapped Neji and Tenten out of it, both nodding to back up the claim.

"I, uh…thanks. Thank you…so much." Sato took a breath, "All I've wished for is…for Tama to get all of the help and affection she needs since she left, though I didn't know…it might be at my expense. What I really want is for her to be okay. It doesn't matter what happens to me."

"It matters." Tenten reminded him.

"Right." Sato mumbled.

"I'll be at the Station tomorrow." Neji said, hinting that he would be willing to fend off any unfriendly Jounin at the next meeting.

He thanked his friends once more before taking his leave, and Sato walked up a series of streets, stopping outside of Doctor Iwao's office. He hadn't rescheduled his appointment. Did doctors ever wonder what became of their troubled patients when communications stopped? Perhaps she had heard the rumors too? Perhaps not? He kept walking and decided to skip counseling. All that he had come to want lately was sleep. Not to talk, or work, or eat, or connect. He could vaguely remember when his body wanted things. When his spirit had once craved things. Now it did not.

Sato returned to his apartment via the open window, and thought maybe he should shut it since the days were getting cooler. But that would keep Aree and Aroo out. He wouldn't do it. He unclipped his weapons and tool pouches, dropped them on the dining table, and crossed to the sitting area rug. Sato went down on his knees and then curled on his side on the carpet, as it was the nearest, most accessible comfy thing. He ended up lying flat on his back, which felt good in an odd way. He slept. He missed that afternoon's training session with his team.

The sound of knocking woke him at night, and Sato heard Sai's voice beyond the door: "Sato-san, does this cat belong to you? It keeps scratching at your door." He couldn't raise his voice even to tell Sai, No.

It didn't much matter. There was a tinkle of identification tags on the cat's collar, and Sai discovered the cat named Jingle belonged to Mr. Miyazawa on the first floor. Sai walked away to deliver the cat, "Ah. Never mind." Sato heard him go.

He did not move. Sleep took him again.

Then it was morning, and he felt someone shaking him awake worriedly, "Sato-kun?"

Sato cracked his eyes open to see Hinata half-panicked, requiring Shino's assistance to pull him upright into a sitting position.

"What are you doing? We haven't seen you…we had to check on you…” Hinata's voice was fluttering.

"I'm tired." Sato said.

Hinata sat and hugged him, though Sato quite resembled an unfeeling, inanimate sack of feathers at that point. He sat blankly while Shino moved around the flat and collected what few things could comprise breakfast. He then returned with a tray and sat beside his friends, encouraging Sato to eat something since his face was looking sunken with the starting signs of starvation.

Sato could not bring himself to move, and so Shino pinched his friend's cheeks to open his mouth and stuff a sweet bun in. Sato chewed as slowly as a tortoise. But they waited, item by item cramming the bun, a hardboiled egg, and steamed sweet potato in Sato's mouth. Hinata relaxed upon seeing he was willing to eat; just lacking the motor functions to facilitate it. She got up and made tea.

And though it seemed that "Sato" had disappeared from his body, they stayed by his side and pushed him through another impossible day.

Chapter End Notes

Why yes, there was a lot of commentary on depression in this chapter and the socio-cultural pressures that can intensify it. Breakups can be hard, though living in a shinobi society can be even harder. I bet you readers can relate to most of this; either you've been hit by the emotional truck, or you've been there to help the one hit by the emotional truck.

Thanks for reading, peeps! I'm working on a NaruHina Fluff day submission mini fic for May (it's 100 percent humor) so you can be on the lookout for that next. Will try to submit more chapters of Harbinger prior to the end of July. I might get a little distracted at that point due to wedding shenanigans, so I want to give you some story goodness to hold you over until I'm back.
Brain hugs,
tigerowl

Chapter 53- White Shadows in the Mist
White Shadows in the Mist

Chapter Summary

Low-anchored cloud,

Newfoundland air,

Fountain-head and source of rivers,

Dew-cloth, dream-drapery

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Soundtrack: "22 Love" by RUDE & "Betelgeuse" by Joe Hertler & the Rainbow Seekers

To avoid triggering the fifth trip-wire trap they had encountered in the forest, Zabuza motioned for Haku to stay back as he followed the ankle-high metal line. He stalked over moss and bramble, eyes scanning cautiously until he came to the branch it was wrapped around, and then undid the knot slowly. He pointed to an extra bit of line and directed Haku, "Hold that taught."

Haku held the wire and watched as Zabuza slackened the trap, wire sagging as its affixed projectiles slipped down to the ground. As with previous disarmed trap locations, Haku marked their path by sinking a needle into the bark of tree; a red tassel at the senbon's end was conspicuous.

"We are barely a mile in…" Haku noted, "How big is this place?"

"Huge. You're on the main island now. Kirigakure's close."

"And you're certain a patrol won't be here?"

"As certain as I can be when I really have no fucking idea." Zabuza told Haku as he marched on, "Patrols find the traps here to be an inconvenience, so they'll stick to the perimeter. They don't wander further in unless they detect something unusual."

"Your informant said we could be looking in here for days."

"Yeah. No one knows where Mangetsu dropped dead exactly." He snarked, "And we're not leaving without the Master Scroll."

"Not even if there's a confrontation? I don't want to risk my mission to oust the Akatsuki here." Haku didn't like the do-or-die conviction of his companion.

Zabuza grunted, "If there is, run if you want."

The elevation was noticeably higher than other regions of the island, stippled with the white birch trees that thrived in taiga climate. In the troughs of land where winter's snow had long since retreated from summer, small marshes and bogs were teeming with life. Birds and insects sang under the green, leafy boughs of birches. A hidden bittern's cry in the reeds drummed like drops of water in a glass jar, and Haku wondered at the odd pip-plumb sounds until Zabuza told him what it was.

As they undid the next trap, Haku noticed a portion of human skull peeking from beneath a patch of moss. It was not a rare sight in the boreal forest. Bodies and remains were littered throughout; some in undignified, exposed poses, and others melded with the earth as if they'd returned home.

Another mile into the birch haunt Zabuza said aloud, "It's weird how this place comes back."

"Comes back?"

"It's a battlefield. I don't know how many times it's been burned down, but the birches come back the fastest. Then everyone forgets and avoids it, the bodies decay, the forest grows, the snow falls again." The man noted, "Like we didn't matter."

Haku marked their place again, "Maybe it's trying to get a message across."

"'Round here, no one's listening."

Some morning mist had yet to clear, and so Haku willed it away with his Blood Limit. Haze thinned low on the slope as they hiked on, over another hill and down towards the next furrow of fresh water. The woodland soil must have been quite fertile. Between the trees there were mugworts, blue bead lilies, daises, and strawberries growing wild. He watched Zabuza pick some of the edible plants, then pull down his neck gaiter to eat them.

"Have you fought here before?" Haku asked as he plucked a strawberry for himself.

"Once, when I was young. Then I did patrols with the Black Ops in this area when I was older."

"Hidden Leaf doesn't leave battlefields looking like this." By this he meant cluttered with skeletons.

"Because Leaf moves on from its wars and buries the dead. Mist never stopped fighting." He tilted his head to regard Haku, "And do you really think...Leaf doesn't have its blemishes laying around somewhere? Even if you haven't seen them?"

"Maybe it does." Haku supposed.

"When all of this bullshit is over, this place will move on. It won't burn again. Teams might do work in here to clear the snares and mines. They won't send stupid little Genin dipshits for those tasks, maybe some bomb-squad specialists..."

"You really can imagine a peaceful village."

Zabuza pulled his neck gaiter up again, "I've always been able to do that. I just can't figure out what I'm supposed to do in a village like that."

"I can help you." Haku offered, "Figure it out."

"I doubt it."

"You have plenty of other skills. Mist's new leadership will come to depend on you, even if you aren't in the top echelon of administration."

"You're assuming that they haven't thrown me in prison in that scenario, Haku."

"I am assuming that, yes."
"Don't project too far into the future. Just focus on—" His sentence cut off when his foot stuck on something.

For a terrible, gut-wrenching moment, Haku feared that Zabuza had crossed a trip-wire and was about to be crushed or blown to pieces…but instead he'd treaded in a sticky substance. The swordsman could not free himself from the transparent, shimmering thread stretched over moss and twigs. What was more, Haku had never seen Zabuza's eyes go so wide in fright in all of his time knowing the man.

"What?" Haku chirped.

"Get out of here now." Was Zabuza's lone command.

Haku immediately took off.

It was unfortunate that they'd gone so far into the dense birch forest. Trying to follow the marked trail in reverse at great speed was risky, and he also guessed that Zabuza was not going to be able to escape with him. They had come to an agreement days ago that there would be no hard feelings if one had to abandon the other. In that event, they would come up with some way to stick to the plan and improvise.

Haku stepped lightly over the surface of a pond while in retreat…and then caught on something, tumbling abruptly underwater. He lost a gasp of air in his surprise, frantically looking around the pool for what had tripped him. No shinobi or traps were visible; only the thin glimmer of thread. Silk. It was woven between aquatic plants and sunken logs. It was everywhere. Hardly noticeable to the naked eye.

A force acting on the threads wound around Haku's arms and trunk, reeling him ashore where he sputtered and coughed. From a place unseen, the thin but powerful silk pulled him over the mossy hill and down the embankment again. At the bottom of the slope, he could see Zabuza was wrapped in sticky silk and suspended from a low tree branch, upright, struggling and cursing. The Seversword was pinned flat to his back in the snare. Haku's segment of silk went tight and suspended him next to Zabuza.

He had to ask, "Zabuza, what kind of jutsu is—?"

"Don't say anything. Don't admit anything." He had to coach the captured novice beside him, "I'll handle it and you keep your mouth shut. Don't say anything about Leaf, got it?"

"A Mist shinobi?" Haku presumed.

"One of the worst." Zabuza confirmed, "And we're not getting out of this."

Haku took a breath and tried to calm the fluttering in his stomach. This very well could crush their share of Jiraiya's strategy to interfere with the Akatsuki in Hidden Mist. Though he never believed he could avoid capture forever, Haku wasn't exactly sure what to do now that it'd happened. He was even less sure of what he thought when a stout woman in her sixties appeared from between the columns of trees. Each step she took was considered and light over the ground, the hallmark of a kunoichi. Her clothing was head-to-toe camouflage that matched birch bark; salt and pepper hair trimmed short and practical.

The old timer stopped in front of the pair swaying from silk line, squinting her black eyes at them. She poked a single finger where Zabuza's stomach ought to be beneath the bindings, and an angry snarl escaped him as he swung to and fro. Haku looked boggle-eyed between the two.
"You're dead." The old woman grinned a sharp-toothed smile characteristic of the Water Country.

"Looks like you died decades ago, you old fuck." Zabuza snapped.

"I make death look good, then." She was still smiling with glee, "You're as churlish as ever, Zabuza." She slid her sharp gaze over to Haku, "And this is?"

"None of your business, badger." Zabuza spat.

Haku recognized the not-so-endearing term and spoke up accidentally, "Your grandmother!"

She laughed.

"I mean, not me— I meant you. You're Zabuza's grandmother." Haku recalled, "Honesuki-sama."

The reverent address of the old kunoichi made Zabuza wretch, a paroxysm of rage and disbelief swirled into one as he struggled and simultaneously wanted to beat the ever loving crap out of Haku.

"It's good for you to know who your executioner will be." Honesuki nodded and folded her arms behind her back, "Yet I don't know exactly who I've caught in my web." She shrugged a shoulder and spoke quietly to something sitting there; a black diving bell spider, "Iehisa, do we know him? From any records?" She got some answer in the negative from her trained animal.

Honesuki migrated away from Zabuza and stopped in front of Haku, "What are you doing so close to Hidden Mist? I've got no background on you."

"Not only do I not want to tell you," Haku tried to keep it cordial, "But it's a long story and you probably wouldn't believe it."

"Young man, I've heard my share of crazy stories that turned out to be true."

Haku was curious about the Mist kunoichi, "Your spider helps you with this technique-?"

"Stop fucking talking to her!" Zabuza roared, "She's the enemy. She's in on it."

"In on what?" Honesuki growled.

"You're a nanny for the Akatsuki, you traitorous old bitch. You've let them have the village."

"What an accusation!" Her tone elevated with offense, "You want to blame me for the frauds holding my home hostage? You think I enjoy tip-toeing around and bowing my head to these scoundrels? They kill anyone and everyone who defies them. Why would I stick my neck out and offer it, then? Would you do that, Zabuza?"

"I thought you were a warrior who'd fight to the bitter end, Granny." He taunted.

Haku kept track of the valuable details revealed in the back-and-forth. For one thing, Honesuki had not denied the presence of the Akatsuki in Kirigakure. Rather, it seemed she had confirmed it and the hardships such occupation caused.

"I stayed to fight for it. I didn't run away like you did." Honesuki reminded him.

"You were complacent with the shadow regime that marched in and took over."

"I have to stay alive and play the long-con to win this. I can't declare my opposition for all of the world to hear." She lifted a long knife from a holster at her hip, turning it over in her hand, "I will not die in vain. All of my hard work...means something."

"So...you aren't supporting the Akatsuki?" Haku fished for particulars.

Zabuza barked at him to shut up.

"Zabuza," Honesuki treaded back to her grandson, "Do you have any remorse for abandoning your village? If not for besmirching the name of our family and our traditions, is there anything you regret?"

"No. Go on and carve me up with that knife. You've probably dreamed of this day."

She poked him gently in the stomach with her tip of her weapon and then stowed it away again, sighing, "I've dreamt of it, alright. But if I kill you here...no. I should turn you over. Then the regime won't question my "loyalty." I can work well beneath their suspicions."

"You're the one who suggested a rebellion in the first place! And you'd turn me over before I can—"

"I never started a rebellion or suggested one, you impudent grub!" She was pacing, "I wasn't going to do anything until I knew you were prepared to commit with me! And you sulked off to be a nukenin, you useless boy! Forsook me twice!" Honesuki rifled around her hip pouch and lifted a tool scroll in the air, "But I knew you'd be back to come looking for this."

Haku gasped at the sight of what he assumed to be the Master Scroll for the Seven Swordsmen's blades. The old woman waved it in Zabuza's face. He went dumb and still at the sight before he started to tremble in fury.

"You are so amusingly single-minded." Honesuki grinned again, "You want the other swords in here, don't you? Should've come long ago to collect this, like I did. I was certain I would see you again if I kept watch over the haunt."

"Give that to me."

"Over your dead body."

Haku held his breath.

Zabuza was thrashing, "There's no point in stopping me. I'm going to free the village-!"

"Lies! All lies! You selfish runt. You want this? Eh-hee-hee-hee! How funny! How deserving." Honesuki cracked up, "Say you're sorry. Beg for my mercy. Say you're sorry for dishonoring my only son— your father. Apologize to him so his ghost can hear you!"

"I've got no apologies for that fucking weakling!"

Honesuki leapt and turned in a clean roundhouse kick that knocked Zabuza down from his suspended thread, leaving him bound face-first on the ground. Infuriated, the old woman tearfully stomped on his back, "You—! You embarrassment. You ingrate. My whole world and all of my joy, in spite of the hard times— you always found a way to spit in my face! I wanted to give you everything!" She was crying. She was grinding Zabuza's face into the mud, fit to suffocate him.

"Honesuki-sama please!" Haku called out to her, "I need him! Gama-sennin and I need him!"

She stilled, "What?"
"We have a way…a way to help your village and stop the Akatsuki. I'm responsible for it, and for Zabuza." He took a chance and confessed, "My name is Haku."

"Feh!" She chuckled with teary eyes, "Why do you need my grandson? He's awful."

"He is awful, but I also think he's the only one who can help me do this."

Honesuki lifted her foot and rolled Zabuza over, mud-streaked as he gasped for breath. She crossed back to Haku and frowned, "What does a pretty doll like you have to do with Jiraiya of the Legendary Three?"

"I'm one of his students."

"Doesn't look like it. He's too young. His students fought in the Third Great War."

"I am, please believe me. I grew up in the Hidden Leaf village after I left the Water Country. Sensei trained me and my teammates as Genin. We were each unwanted rejects in our homelands. We were kept as wards of the state under the Third Hokage's mandate."

She sniffed, "Cheeky little liar."

"It's not a lie. The current Kazekage was one of those teammates, and the Fourth Hokage's son as well. They're my best friends. We're working together."

Zabuza sputtered on the ground, surprised by Naruto's identity, "Fourth Hokage's—?"

Honesuki tightened the silk line around her grandson to squeeze him back to silence. She kept her attention on Haku, "So you have friends in high places, is that what you're telling me?"

"Yes. And we know what's going on in Kirigakure. We have to stop it before the same happens to all of the great villages."

"It might be too late, boy."

"It isn't."

"I thought I had friends in high places too before they were killed. I'm down to my last hope with this Mei girl running around in the wilds…hoping she's been getting my updates." Honesuki's shoulders slumped, "If you are who you say you are, then I'd be stupid to deliver you to the Akatsuki. No one expects a collaborator like you."

"I—"

"Or…you made this tale up out of desperation, and you're just a greedy apprentice hoping to get your hands on one of Mist's legendary swords." The old woman deduced.

"I honestly don't care about those weapons." Haku told her, "Burn the scroll. It makes no difference to me."

"I might." She was amused as Zabuza wriggled and yowled behind her on the forest floor.

"I would rather be talking to Mei, and learning about how I can help." Haku clarified his intentions.

"Give me some proof. I want to believe you." Honesuki offered, "I want to know that I can expect other great villages to join us in the fight for Mist's freedom."
"I…” Haku puzzled for a moment, "I think in the back pocket of my bag we have an agreement…”

Honesuki regarded him with a sandpaper stare before circling behind Haku, "No tricks." Her knife cut through her spider's iron-strong thread. The woman reached for the travel bag on Haku's back, riffling around, "Eh? Why is there hay in here?"

"That's for my rabbit. The other zipper—"

"Ah, this must be it." Honesuki discovered the contractual agreement that Jiraiya had presented to Zabuza, and it contained both men's signatures, "Well, well, this is a rarity. My hateful grandson discards me, but accepts the terms of the Toad Sage? I could scream." She rolled up the document, "What a complex ruse this would be if it were untrue…"

"Believe me, my Sensei takes pride in what he writes. We would never fake anything like that—"

"Yes, yes, I know— those books, a pervert—" She waved away the explanation and then bent down to wipe her sleeve against Zabuza's muddy face, "So you threw in your lot with outsiders out of desperation, Zabuza? I really do find that astounding for a stubborn ass like you."

"No one's tried it yet. It could work." Zabuza defended the decision.

"I'm still not going to let you go." Honesuki warned her grandson, "You've done so much harm…I don't know if I can entrust such an important mission to the likes of you…"

She reached for the knife at her hip and lashed out with a single stroke, severing all of the spider silk that had imprisoned Haku. His feet met the ground and he shook his aching limbs out.

"Haku. You were born in this country, hm? Is that why you are romanticizing the idea of freeing the Mist Village?" Honesuki wondered, "That's a dangerous daydream."

"No, I…want to protect my friends. They're jinchuriki. This isn't only about your village or its inhabitants, not for me. I'm sorry to say." Haku admitted.

"So you are selfish…but for love." Honesuki deduced, "And he is selfish because of hate. I think it is you who I can trust."

"I hope that you will, Honesuki-sama."

"Let me tell you something, Haku, if you don't already know." She was unruffled by her spider, Iehisa, crawling over her cheek and up to the top of her head, "The one who created the fake Mizukage, the fake Yagura-sama…he rarely appears, but when he does his panderers call him Tasū. That's what he wants to be called. Quite an alias, isn't it?"

Tasū meant many or numerous. Haku did not like the significance of the codename.

"I don't know what role that masked man plays in the Akatsuki…though he is wise and tactically skilled. He spoke once to my Sealing Corps committee to keep us in line. I knew then I couldn't cross him." Honesuki went on, "His voice and presence…he…seems middle-aged. Not yet old, but I could tell that he's not of my generation or of yours. Something in-between in years. Would you know who this person is?"

"I don't. I was hoping you could tell me." The hair on the back of his neck was on end.

"I've been searching for answers too. Who is this person? How did he gain so much control? I still don't know how he disposed of Yagura-sama so quietly…” She looked Haku in the eye, "Make sure your Toad master knows. The leaders working with you—tell them to beware someone of that description. He could be anyone. He could be anywhere."

"I will, thank you, Honesuki-sama." Haku was compelled to bow to her for sharing something so critical.

"Now, we will be going." With unlikely strength for her age, the kunoichi hoisted Zabuza to his feet,
"This ungrateful man will be punished for betraying his bonds. And you, Haku…be sure you tread carefully in this land. Take this." She handed off the Master Scroll to him, "Find those who are worthy of wielding these weapons, and please help my village."

He held out his hands and accepted the tool scroll, sharing a helpless look with Zabuza as the old woman dragged him away. Haku tried to imagine Honesuki turning in her grandson to appease the Hunter Corps and fraudulent leader of Hidden Mist, hoping to distract from the fact that she was funneling information to Terumi Mei. But of course, that cover would only last Honesuki until the Intel Division tortured more information out of Zabuza, In which case she'd be incriminated anyway…

Haku caught up to them after a short sprint, "Honesuki-sama, you shouldn't turn Zabuza over. Any Intel specialist will see what you've been doing if they use—"

"They won't see anything in his mind that I lock down with my Sealing Jutsu. He won't even remember this meeting in the haunt when I'm through with him." Honesuki shot down Haku's concerns, "No Intel officer is going to find a damn thing about this day in my idiot grandson's head.
I'll even make him forget about you."

"But what if they notice an interfering Seal and question you?"

"No one is going to notice, they're all amateur scanners. All the talented Genjutsu specialists and Intel Admins were tortured and killed by the end of last year." The old woman gruffed, "So don't worry about me, boy. Go save us. Don't waste any more time here."

"I…" Haku stopped in his tracks, "I…can't let you take him."

Honesuki violently dropped Zabuza, ignoring his Ow-fuck! Bitch-! growls when she rounded on Haku impatiently, "Do you not understand that this is personal? I want him to pay for what he's done to my family. To pay for his absence! He could have helped me save this place long ago!"

"He has a chance to do it now!"

"Oh heaven, strike me where I stand! I let you off the hook, Haku! At least surrender him to me without whining. Is it the Seversword you want? Yes of course, we'll get it off his back and you can return it to the Master Scroll…"

"Keep your fucking mitts off it, hag!" Zabuza barked.

"I'm responsible for him. He's my subordinate." Haku explained, "Give me this chance. I know you don't believe in him, but could you try to believe in me? You don't know me, and I hardly know you…but he isn't exactly what he once was; we're both familiar with what Zabuza was like."

"And you really think you'll get him in line? Rehabilitate him somehow?"

"I've been trying." Haku said the words so, so wearily, "And it's been…well…I haven't given up yet."
"But you might." The old woman wrinkled her brow as if to say, I already have.

"He still made a promise to Gama-sennin. I'm going to make sure that he—"

"Does it have to be spelled out for you, Dewdrop?" Honesuki interrupted him, "This is my pound of flesh. I am turning him over personally to Commander Nigai of the Hunter Corps. That'll teach him a lesson."

Zabuza had to chime in angrily, "That psycho's got nothing on me—"

"It isn't about you, Zabuza. It's about saving my skin and convincing the regime that I'm not out to undermine them." She kicked him in the shoulder while he lay on the ground, "I am not turning you loose."

"Please," Haku's voice was tinged with desperation, "Give him to me. You can seek recompense some other time."

Honesuki's unfriendliest stare locked onto Haku, sizing him up, and signaled to Zabuza that his companion had pushed his luck too far. Before he could issue a verbal warning, the old woman pressed down on her grandson's head with her foot, silencing him in mud and moss again.

"I may have been too lenient." Honesuki decided, "I've heard quite enough."

Haku's next attempt to appeal was cut short as Honesuki drew her long knife and charged, startling him back into a pre-spun web of silk between trees. After the trap threads tangled around him, Honesuki sliced a gash down Haku's front as if she were cleaving jungle foliage. His Water Clone splashed apart.

The old woman clucked her tongue, "Huh. Well, he's quick…" She looked over her shoulder at Zabuza, "You stay here. I'm going to cut that boy's tongue out."

Somewhere beyond the next knoll patched with greenery and bramble, Haku rolled open the Master Scroll, breathing shallowly while trying to make sense of it, 'If she's serious, she just needs to trap me in spider silk again…I need Nuibari. The real sword!'

Preceding the calligraphic list of weapons was a space for the blood of "keepers." It had never been Haku's intention to assume such a role, but he could think of no other way to awaken unresponsive tool seals on the parchment. Haku cut open the tip of his forefinger on the edge of a kunai, dabbing the characters of his name on the scroll, 'I hope this works. I didn't actually ask Zabuza about the process. I thought he'd be the one handling it…'

"Dewdrop!" Honesuki called out into the forest, "Are we done here? If you've decided to run away, I'll take my grandson and return to Mist."

Over the space reserved for Sewing Needle, Haku swiped blood and tapped, gladly surprised that the Longsword appeared in a puff of smoke. He closed the Master Scroll and tucked it into his belt, 'This is it. It's not the ersatz weapon I've been made to practice with.' Haku was mildly concerned over the fact that Nuibari felt alive in his hand. Restless and humming. Some presence within the needle was searching him and trying to understand him. When it nipped for a few crumbs of his chakra, he allowed it, 'Let that be our introduction…'

Haku stood and formed hand signs, conjuring a silent curtain of snow in the hope that it would expose hidden spider threads. Snowflakes began to cling to the network of silk, which greatly displeased Honesuki as she crested the hill, "Eh? You want to give me grief, boy? That will be your final mistake…"
Though it was unsportsmanlike to do so, Haku pitched Nuibari at the woman which (to his surprise yet again) accelerated with some enigmatic, supernatural physics to pierce Honesuki's upper arm as she tried to dodge. In the next moment, Nuibari's other freakish features manifested, as it made a full turn of its own accord, mid-air, with hardly any instruction from Haku, to stick a bit of the woman's calf as it sailed back to Haku's waiting hand. Honesuki stumbled with a screech and cut herself free of the sword's wire with her knife.

Haku moved between the birches back in Zabuza's direction, keeping the kunoichi in his peripheral, 'I didn't think it could do that…' Ever curious, he slashed at exposed spider threads with Nuibari's piercing edge and snipping them apart, 'Maybe any chakra-imbued weapon can cut these… so Zabuza can—'

He side-stepped a paper bomb explosion that Honesuki intentionally set off. She was running amok with the years-old traps scattered throughout the wood, flanking Haku at a slower pace. Clearly the old woman could not move very fast, but neither could he, Haku thought as he struggled his way out of another lattice of spider silk.

Honesuki cackled as she pulled back on a thread, dragging Zabuza away while Haku cut himself free, "Honesuki-sama, stop!" He threw Nuibari again and sliced through the leash. Still face-down on the ground and wrapped from neck to toes, Zabuza was wiggling and giving indiscernible orders. Haku found it easy to ignore his ornery associate when he crossed blades with Honesuki, starting a shoving match and kicking up bead lilies.

"I thought you said you didn't care about Mist's swords!" She had some strength, pushing back against the youngblood as their weapons sparked.

"I don't!"

"And here you are using one to fight a defenseless old lady!"

"In what way are you defenseless?" Spittle flew from Haku's mouth as he shouted, both tiring of the bout and hopping away from each other.

Honesuki sheathed her knife and formed hand signs, using a Sealing jutsu Haku did not recognize. When he pitched Nuibari at her, it stuck Honesuki in her shoulder…though it gave her the opportunity to close her hand around the Longsword. At the touch of her Sealing technique, Nuibari shuddered and then disappeared in a puff of smoke.

Haku stared like a shell-shocked rabbit as Honesuki dusted her hands, "Ha! Every summoned tool has a weakness! They are tethered to seals, and all I have to do is neutralize them…then pop! Away they go." She twirled her trusty knife in her palm, "Summon that needle again, I dare you! I'll just send it back to the scroll!"

Blood splotches soaked Honesuki's fatigues. Snowflakes clung to the webs stretched between the boughs behind her, a picturesque refraction of light. Haku backed closer toward Zabuza, hoping he would have a split-second to tear the man free so they could make a run for it. As Honesuki leapt and coordinated another spider silk snare with Iehisa, Haku snapped his hand fan out of his sleeve. A gust of Wind Nature propelled Honesuki and her threads away with one swing of the fan, 'Now is my chance!' He came within an arm's length of Zabuza when the silk bindings around the man suddenly began to strain and then shred.

Haku had nary a moment to duck when Honesuki willed a cable of spider threads to collect the Seversword from Zabuza's back. The blade soared toward her and nearly took Haku's head off. He glanced back over his shoulder, shocked to see the old woman arm herself with the hefty weapon, 'Maybe that's where Zabuza got his fortitude from…'

She lashed out, pupetting the sword in a centrifugal swing by her threads, hacking the thin trunks of birches and all else that got in the way. Haku and Zabuza dove in opposite directions to avoid the reckless attack. Zabuza was sloughing off the last tatters of spider silk on him, his face muddy and scratched.

Haku wanted to reason with him, "Zabuza, don't try to get the sword back! She's trying to bait you —"

The rogue ninja rushed ahead anyway.

A fair amount of snow had accumulated, and so Haku took it upon himself to freeze the ground until it was slick. Though Zabuza managed to keep his balance as he pitched forward down the hill, righting himself in the air to land on a tree branch…Honesuki skidded on the ice and toppled backwards. Her whirling of the Seversword sent it spinning violently, cutting through the tree Zabuza landed in. Haku sucked wind several times in fright at the near-misses, all landing in a heap with a crash.

He hurried forward to find the grandmother and grandson in a tug-of-war, sliding in the snowy haunt, howling at each other. Honesuki had stubbornly attached additional threads to Kubikiribōchō while Zabuza pulled back on the hilt with all of his might. The two fell apart with startled cries when the sword disappeared.

Nearby, Haku was scowling, kneeled down over the open Master Scroll. He had returned the Seversword to its storage space to remove it from the equation.

"Don't try to play peacemaker, Dewdrop!" Honesuki roared at Haku as she got back on her feet.

"Just give it up, you fangled-toothed bitch!" Zabuza was still irate, as expected.

Impatient with the two of them, Haku unleashed a gust of Wind Nature with his fan, putting more space between them. He then tried to direct Zabuza, "We have what we need, so let's go."

He didn't have any time to see if Zabuza was protesting the order: Honesuki had changed directions and charged at Haku, prepared to drive her knife into him, "I told you that this—!" Haku swung his fan reactively, hoping to fling her away, but a shimmering Sealing technique the woman had prepared nullified the Wind Element in his attack. Honesuki pounced on him, knocking the breath out of Haku as they fell to the ground, "—is personal!"

Thank goodness he timed his dodge well— Haku tilted his head so the stabbing motion of her knife only nicked his ear. She nearly had him dead in the face. He kicked her up in a half-somersault to toss the woman away, feeling new sticky threads mat him down the ground. Honesuki rolled in snowy bramble and flowers, tiredly pushing to her feet again, panting, "Get in my way and I'll kill you! I don't care who you are! Some liar or savior…I'll-!"

A gigantic, webbed hand flattened her. Haku shrieked in spite of himself.

He hadn't expected it. He looked up slowly to see a red, house-sized toad that was curious about the elderly kunoichi it had pinned underfoot. It took Haku a moment to realize it was Gamakichi—nearly full grown. He was gawking at the summon, his mouth flapping uselessly in an attempt to form words.

"Oh, hey Haku." The toad recognized a familiar face, "What's this old lady's problem? Ouch. She's sticking me with something."
"That's Honesuki-sama…um. Why don't you let her up now?" Haku suggested, realizing, though it pained his brain to make sense of it, that it was Zabuza standing on top of the giant toad's head. Not Jiraiya or Naruto.

"Alright." Gamakichi lifted his hand, "Sorry about that, Granny."

Flabbergasted, Honesuki scuttled backwards to collapse on a mossy tree stump, then stared up at the fantastic creature. She had been looking for proof earlier, but at the moment she couldn't mentally negotiate such undeniable evidence that the Legendary Toad Sage had gotten involved with her grandson after all.

"Hey new guy." Gamakichi spoke up again, "Get off my head."

With an unfriendly grunt, Zabuza returned to the forest floor and plucked Haku up by the scruff of his tunic, "Stand up. Don't look so shocked."

"Sensei actually let you join the Toad Summoning Contract?" Up until this point, such a detail had escaped Haku's notice.

"With provisions, yeah."

"Provisions?"

"Basically, if I do anything either of you disapprove of, its license to get me killed." Zabuza recalled, "It's not like he didn't tell these things," He gestured up at Gamakichi, who was understandably offended, "About me and what to expect."

"Right, so quit disrespecting me and call me by my name. Gamakichi. The toad insisted, "Who the heck are you again? Jiraiya-sama said something about a hostile temp…"

"Momochi Zabuza."

"Ah, that's right."

Honesuki wobbled to her feet and Haku took pity on her, knowing that however much this situation overwhelmed him, she must have felt infinitely out of sorts. He apologized and set a hand on her punctured shoulder, "I'm sorry, Honesuki-sama. I didn't want to hurt you like that. We weren't lying, but that didn't seem to matter to you…"

She turned her head curiously to watch a healing light glow lantern-soft over her injury, "…how unusual."

"I'm sorry for all the trouble."

"Hmf. And I had thought you were another common assassin." Honesuki muttered, "Are you a healer by nature, Haku?"

"Not exactly. But I've admired my teachers and try to make the most of what they've taught me."

She shook her head and wore a rueful smile, "You are a contradiction."

"I think I might be, yes."

"There are worse things to be." Honesuki waved away his efforts, "These aren't serious. I'm mended for now." Her glittering eyes settled on Zabuza, "And you…hardly deserve the honor of using such a summoning contract…but I wouldn't want to step on the toes of Gama-sennin and muck with his plans, now would I?"

"You've just got to make everything difficult." Zabuza folded his arms, giving her leery side-eye, "If you've got beef with me, badger, then save it for after we settle things in Kirigakure. I never said I wasn't willing to hash it out."

"You mean let me beat you senseless?"

"I didn't say that either. Fuckin' putting words in my mouth…"

Honesuki sighed wearily, "Leave. Before I change my mind again."

Gamakichi was dismissed in a cloud of smoke, and without a word of farewell Zabuza turned around to stalk his way through the birch haunt. Haku followed after him and willed the snowfall to stop. He could only hope for an uneventful journey off of the island, preferably with no other ninja encounters or traps triggered.

Since he couldn't help but wonder what Honesuki intended to do now, Haku turned back to see her standing still, observing their retreat. There was a thin-lipped smile on her face. A thankful expression.

"You weren't at the Jounin Council Meeting this morning." Kakashi said as he stopped beside a park bench, where he'd finally found his wayward nephew, "Too many truancies there won't be excused unless you have missions scheduled."

"I do have one. Tonight." Sato defended in a strange, faraway voice.

"Well if it's tonight, then you could have showed up for a morning meeting." His uncle reasoned.

Slumped on the bench, Sato said nothing as he gazed out at the autumn molt of the forest.

Nearby, Pakkun and Bull were coaching Kakashi's new puppies through rigorous command drills. When Tolsi and Gattsu successfully responded to sit, roll-over, etc. the pups were rewarded with rope toy tug-of-war and tennis balls to chase. Kakashi's ears were trained on the dogs behind him, but kept his eyes on Sato as it seemed more and more apparent that the young man was now a shell with hardly any internal substance left.

"Kurenai thinks you're not eating." Kakashi observed off-the-cuff.

The statement did not need much clarification from Sato. He had a withered look about him. He sat without speaking to his uncle, his eyes half-shut.

"Can you try to…not worry?" Kakashi recommended as he took a seat on the bench beside Sato, "Tama seems to be alright, for now. She's spoken to me. I'll be catching up with Gai later too. He's been preoccupied…" Kakashi didn't want to get into the specifics of how Gai had been running defense to deter all of the torments Maito Ken had cooked up for Sato.

Kakashi acknowledged, "I know it's hard. Please try to keep your appointments with Dr. Iwao."

"I don't want to see her."

"You need to go."

"I don't need anything."
"I used to say that, but I didn't get better by skipping counseling appointments. That only made things worse."

"All the things you went through…" Sato said softly, "Were not of your own making. Your pain wasn't this."

"Are you sure it wasn't? That I didn't cause some of my own problems?" Kakashi challenged the idea.

"It's not the same, Kakashi. You don't understand."

"Even if what you're going through isn't the same experience as mine, don't tell me I don't understand." The man cautioned.

A long quiet prevailed as red leaves drifted down in the sprawling park. The line of dogs marched the pebbled hiking path, Tolsi and Gattsu obediently mimicking the senior pack members. Kakashi could feel it like electricity. There was pain, so much pain beside him. A renouncement of all things glowed off of Sato, as if he couldn't believe he was existing this way. As if his brain were constantly re-setting and trying to evaluate a horrific reality.

Sato spoke again in a nearly inaudible voice, and Kakashi asked him to repeat it.

"Living was a mistake." Sato said as if he were an enlightened monk, blackened by truth.

"No, it wasn't." Kakashi protested, "Call it anything but a mistake."

"You saw." Sato reminded him.

"That day—"

"I was gone."

A small shake of Kakashi's head, "You weren't."

"It was raining when I died. Far away. I wasn't here…I'm not supposed to be here. To ruin everything."

For the first time in years, there were fearful thorns prickling in Kakashi's stomach. His eyes moistened. He understood this. He understood what Sato was saying. But he couldn't let his nephew actually believe those words, which were a pure byproduct of despair.

"What makes you think…things would have been any less miserable in your absence?" Kakashi handed him a counterpoint.

"I just know it."

"You really don't, Sato."

"I can't take it anymore." The young man muttered.

"You have to keep going. Time will pass and it won't be so heavy." Kakashi knew the encouragement was probably insufficient, "I'm here if you need me."

When Sato slowly rose to stand, his uncle quickly added, "This time I am here. I know I wasn't before…and I didn't do…couldn't do most of the things you needed me to. That hurt you too—I hurt you."
Sato's blue gaze slipped towards his uncle, tired and curious.

"We can both agree that I was a no-show and my reasons weren't good enough. Not when Rin needed me, or Tenzo…not for you or Semi. I stayed away from everyone who needed to depend on me." Kakashi admitted, "I even ignored my Dad's pain because I believed what people were saying about him. Until he was gone."

"You were a kid." Sato reminded him, "It's hard to get things right when you're a kid."

"I might've saved him."

"Kakashi, if Grandpa couldn't even hold on for the sake of his own children, don't think for a second anything was going to stop him." Sato had an erudite take on the situation, "It never meant he didn't love you. It was that the things he couldn't change were insurmountable."

Kakashi stared, seated on the bench, and watched his nephew trudge away eastward through park grounds. Perhaps to meet with his team, or train, or hide, or end his life. Kakashi was paralyzed as he watched because he understood, in a ferly rush to the head; that Sato had become a mouthpiece for his long deceased father. The grandson had suffered the same missteps, and was grappling with his next course of action.

Once Sato was long out of sight, Kakashi fought off the pins and needles in his limbs to finally stand. He wasn't sure if he would see his last surviving relative later. No. That was no way to think. He could do something. He could literally do any one thing, one bit more than nothing to possibly dissuade an exit Sato might be contemplating. Heart pattering, Kakashi formed the strings of a plan while on the move, beckoning his dogs to keep up as he left the park.

"Bull, take Tolsi and Gattsu home. Make sure that Akino is comfortable." Kakashi instructed before the massive dog gamboled off with his puppy companions, "Pakkun…"

"You want me to watch him?" Pakkun presumed.

"Please make sure Sato doesn't do anything rash today."

"Kakashi, if he's serious he'll have ways of avoiding me."

"I don't know if he is serious or not. Just tail him for the rest of the day until he joins his team."

"Fine. What are you gonna do?"

"I'm going to get some help." Kakashi decided, "Do some things that I couldn't do for Dad."

Ten minutes later, Kakashi intruded upon the limited clearance area of the ANBU headquarters, politely greeting his contemporaries as he strolled into the subterranean command center. Though retired officially from ANBU, he was always warmly welcomed when he dropped by. As it so happened, there was a potluck of warm lunch trays in the break room, most of which had been provided by Captain Kegon and Lieutenant Commander Kakima, but Kakashi avoided the feast.

Rounding the corner into the locker room Kakashi loudly demanded, "Tenzo."

The other four occupants of the tiled space startled, Tenzo less so, and then evacuated the room when Kakashi shooed them away. Some dressed and some relocated to the showers.

Damp and shirtless, Tenzo's eyebrows were raised, "What are you doing here?"
"You're off duty?"

"Just now, yes. I have to do some shopping—"

"Hurry up." Kakashi plucked the jumper from Tenzo's hands and pulled it down over the man's head, dressing him, "My nephew is in crisis."

"So what has that got to do with me?!"

"I need a sidekick. An assistant. I want to violence-proof Sato's flat before he gets back to it."

Stammering, "You w-what-?"

"I think he's suicidal."

"So have a watch assigned to him! Contact the SHA!" Tenzo adjusted his clothing, flustered.

"I will, but I want to take immediate precautions."

Sighing, Tenzo rested his head against the metal of a locker before fetching his bag and shutting it, "Kakashi, you can't eliminate every risk. What would work better is to make sure Sato sees a counselor, or is under observation in a facility."

"I'll talk to Iwao-san later, maybe she'll do a house visit. Come on." Kakashi led the way out, ignoring how Tenzo longingly looked toward the break room's smorgasbord.

They departed from HQ together, heading southwest through the village, scaling the apartment complex's side to enter Sato's flat through an open window. The home seemed to be in order with the exception of a decorative pillow and blanket left on the area rug. Kakashi examined how the space had been lived in: cabinets and refrigerator were lacking in food. Tea canisters sat on the kitchen counter. No dishes in the sink. No trash in the bin. In the bathroom and bedroom, all seemed to be untouched, including a made bed that looked like it had not been slept in for days.

Back in the dining area, Tenzo was fiddling inquisitively with a box of girly items, "What's all this?"

"Leave that. That should stay here." Kakashi recommended, pointing to photo frames hung on the walls, "Can you take those down?"

"All of them?"

"All of them."

Befuddled, Tenzo crossed the room to do as Kakashi asked. Meanwhile, Kakashi ransacked the utility closet, pilfering tools and cleaners, abducting cutlery and knives from kitchen drawers. He stuffed most of it in a plastic bin, searching for bottled medications to steal as well.

"Are you really doing this?" Tenzo could hardly believe what he was partaking in, "Kakashi, these are his things. You can't just take them."

"He'll hurt himself."

"With a butter spreader?" Tenzo doubted it.

"I'm taking it. The photos can come out of the frames, leave them here."

"He wouldn't break this glass—"
"Tenzo…" Kakashi held up a hand to shush him, and his friend frowned at the gesture.

Once the living area was preposterously altered, Kakashi moved on to the bedroom and confiscated any bit of fabric or bedding that could possibly suffocate an adult. Though there were only a few spare weapons and tool scrolls in the room, Kakashi took those also. He collected all on the kitchen table and examined the pile.

"Now what?" Tenzo wondered, carefully extracting photos from frames.

"We move this to my place."

"Really?" Tenzo sniffed.

"I have the spare closet. I'll keep this there."

"This is ridiculous, Kakashi. He isn't going to do anything!"

"I'll be back shortly." Kakashi left with the most untrustworthy items first, while Tenzo continued to ruminate on what the hell he was doing here.

He had the gist of the "Hatake Sato situation," since Kakashi had sort of filled him in on the incident a few days ago. Maito Tama had been involved. Gai's family was involved. And by now most of the village had perpetuated a rumor (or five) that may loosely have been based in truth, but took on multiple iterations to slander and isolate Sato. The young man was now persona non grata.

Kakashi had tried to contain some of the tumult, but the social anguish of his nephew had reached critical mass, by the look of it. 'It must have made him think...about the White Fang.' Tenzo supposed, his heart sinking, 'He's scared. I haven't seen Kakashi this scared.' Kakashi was taking no chances. He wanted to reduce self-destructive opportunities his nephew might seek out in a dark hour.

'But how does this really help? Sato is a shinobi! He can go anywhere to off himself. He has his own weapons on him, or can steal weapons from others. He can take a trip from a cliff by the Naka River...Frankly, none of this does a lick of good.' Tenzo understood that in fact it had little to do with what Sato might decide to do. It had more to do with what Kakashi was in control of.

After several return trips with Tenzo's help, most of the "unsafe" items were transported across town to Kakashi's home. Tenzo humored the harebrained precautions, choosing not to critique Kakashi's large oversights and rationale gaps. His emotions were swinging like a pendulum. Though his eyes were open and seeing, Kakashi was staring into the past at his father's face. When he blinked at the present, he would see Sato's. That much, at least, Tenzo could guess.

The project ate up a chunk of time in the early afternoon. Then came a knock on the condo's door, riling up Tolsi and Gattsu as the pups charged about the place, barking. Biscuit the dog herded the youngsters away from the genkan so Kakashi could answer.

Tama was on the other side of the door, concerned, "Sensei?"

"Oh." Kakashi's brain recalibrated, "Tama-chan."

She peeked into the living area where the dogs sat in a huddle of self-control, no jumping or woofs, and Akino the hound was convalescing on a large, cushiony dog bed in the corner. "Kaka-sensei, you're an hour and forty-five minutes late for the training evaluation you scheduled. Did you...decide not to oversee us today?"
Tama did a double-take, noticing a mish mash of knives, pill bottles, cleaner jugs and sprays, and various other household commodities crowding Kakashi's dining table. The man stood awkwardly with no explanation as it dawned on her that none of it belonged to him. As if that were not evidence enough, Tenzo hopped through the open dinette window with an armful of cords and heavy, blunt objects, "This is the last—!" He spied Tama at the door, "Of it…" He too stood awkwardly.

Ah, Tama thought to herself; this was worse than she thought. She had quickly sought out Ino days ago to rip her a new one and rebuke her friend’s breach of confidentiality (knowing Sakura had said nothing at all). She’d also fretted over how Sato’s welfare and her own welfare had plummeted, and that the begging-for-forgiveness/too-little-too-late encounter with Ino (and her subsequent, scathing forgiveness of Ino) had not changed anything. More than she wanted to, Tama had to think about Sato as his life was very publically demolished. There had been no grace. No privacy. All of that pain was out in the open. That had been the last thing Tama wished for.

And now as Kakashi sputtered out a feeble excuse, "Sorry, Tama…I lost track of time today. Got caught up—" Her eyes welled with tears as she understood. This was some sort of preventative measure that could indicate Sato was not a very willing participant in life anymore. She had not wished that on him either.

"No, no." Kakashi noticed the tears start, "Why don't you come in for a minute and rinse your face? There are fresh towels in the washroom. I'll be done in a minute and then I'll accompany you to the field…"

Tama nodded in silent grief as she floated into the home, squeezing her eyes shut as she passed Tenzo, and hastily closed the door of the half bath behind her. She twisted the cold water tap on and tried to breathe.

Here was the terrible feeling again. She’d gone more than two days without it, almost felt normal before it started to creep back. It trickled back as she noticed the village-wide whispers about Sato and his infidelity. Though Tama corrected accounts where and when she could, and scolded those who were out of line, her time at home had been absolute hellstew. The breakup rumor had gotten around to Maito Ken’s ears.

Though her initial lie to her father had been an attempt to save some face, it had only amplified Ken’s rage upon discovering that his daughter had been wronged. He accused her of trying to cover up the perpetrator’s tracks. As if she were some accessory to the crime, she chuckled darkly as she splashed her face with water.

Her father had gone ballistic. Smashed childhood portraits on display. Overturned furniture. Punched holes in walls. He hollered at Miako when she came to Tama’s defense (like most mothers do). Ken had embarked on an epic, four-hour tirade to make sure his daughter understood what all of this meant on the macro-level, what it meant about respectability, honor, damages, and served as proof that she was just like her stupid grandfather. That Sato would pay. That Kakashi would hear of this. Not at any point had Ken stopped to ask if she was alright, or lend any type of emotional support. He’d never been good at those things anyway.

So time with her team and taking missions had been a godsend, getting her away from Ken whenever possible. Tama felt guilty that her mother was often at home, dealing with the worst of Ken’s tantrums. ‘She’s done nothing to deserve that…and I know Mom actually cares about how I feel.’ She shut the tap off and blotted her face with a towel, ‘All of this has been too much…and I don’t want to think about…what Sato might do.’

As she had explained through gritted teeth to Ino during their last conversation: This painful time would be so much easier to navigate if no one else was involved or talking about it. Didn’t you even think about that, Ino? How this might come back to hurt me again?' Trembling and tears had ensued, and Tama could only take pity on the remorseful blonde kunoichi as she apologized.

Kakashi’s home was slightly less conspicuous when Tama exited the bathroom, only able to afford Tenzo a parting wave as she walked out of the house. Her Sensei gave a weary look to Tenzo before following.

The day was a blur and eventually, after spending time with his students and confirming with Asuma, yes, Sato had safely left the village with Kurenai, Hinata, and Shino on a mission, Kakashi was wiped out. He sat at a solitary picnic table, chin propped up in his palm while indulging on a skewered, grilled saury. He chewed the fish and relished the sunset. He was too high-strung. He'd only just started to calm down.

'I have to walk the dogs.'

A bite of his snack.

'Huh. Tenzo probably already walked them. And fed them.'

Dipping the fish in a sauce cup.

'Maybe he shopped and cooked too? No. I don't deserve that treatment after what I put him through today. Tenzo must think I'm insane. Of course clearing out Sato's flat isn't going to make much of a difference…but he did it with me anyway.' Kakashi slumped sideways, splaying over the picnic table as he continued to eat, 'It just feels like that day with Dad all over again. I can barely think straight. If Sato dies, then what? Do I retire? Set up a charity? Should I join a monastery? A cabaret? I'd want to quit everything and give up.'

"Kakashi." A somber voice addressed him.

Kakashi raised his head and saw Gai standing at the table's opposite end. He chewed and swallowed another bite before addressing his friend, "Gai…I wanted to talk to you."

"I know. I apologize for not reaching you sooner. I've had to…" Gai trailed off.

"Deal with your brother." Kakashi imagined.

Gai nodded and took a seat with a heavy sigh.

"I'm sorry." Kakashi started there, "Can we still be friends?"

"Why would you ever say such a foolish thing! As if our friendship were contingent upon the lives and actions of others…"

"Well, maybe it is? I could've stepped in more to stop my nephew from making dumb mistakes."

Gai shook his head, "There's no use in dwelling on what's done."

"You're right." Kakashi took another bite of fish.

"I wish things had not turned out this way, however…" Gai plopped his chin into the cradle of his hands, resting his elbows in a triangle shape on the tabletop, "I am far more concerned about the well-being of Tama-chan and Sato-kun. The attention and negativity centered on them is truly outrageous. Tama-chan assured me she did not start those rumors…"
"Someone else did." Kakashi acknowledged, pulling his mask back up and dropping the empty skewer in a tray.

"Terrible." Gai clucked his tongue.

"So, did Ken try to do anything?" Kakashi went to the hot-button subject, "He must know."

It took Gai a few moments to fortify himself, staring into space as he recalled the last few days of pandemonium and trying (and failing) to mitigate most of Ken's punitive reactions to Sato's pre-Tournament fling. He said, "Every person close to my brother is enduring his wrath right now."

Kakashi was inquisitive, "Everyone? As in, his wife and daughter too?"

"Oh yes. He has not been gentle or considerate of them at all. My father would roll in his grave if he saw Ken treat his family so poorly." Gai confirmed, "I am accustomed to Ken's outbursts, though… he has been in rare form. To think someone so concerned with honor would behave so dishonorably…"

Gai shut his eyes for a long moment before going on, "I intercepted him on numerous sabotage attempts. He went to the payroll office to demand a freeze of Sato's wages, then to branch tellers to try to close any accounts Sato had. When he was denied there, he filed formal complaints at the civil disputes office, which I counter-appealed. I stopped him from harassing the Hokage as well. He has since contacted every retailer, sales professional, legal counsel and realtor in the village he is connected with…demanding they provide no services to Sato."

Wide-eyed, Kakashi listened to the account of full-throttle treachery Ken wanted to enact.

"An attorney from the legal office did present a legitimate civil action complaint that Ken filed, demanding restitution for all expenses of Sato's that the Maito family covered over the last nine years."

"What? Ken was keeping tracking of all that?"

"Kakashi, he's an accountant." Gai reminded him.

Distressed, Kakashi held his forehead and dared ask, "How much money was he asking for?"

"530,000 Ryo." Gai recalled, "That included betrothal and miscellaneous expenses, as repayment for damages."

Before Kakashi could try to do mental calculations to figure how long it would take to get that kind of money, or take on a shitty loan to cover it, Gai allayed his concerns.

"I paid it in full." Gai told him.

"You can't be serious."

"I felt terrible." Gai admitted, "I just cannot stand the idea of there being any bad blood between our families. And that burden was one my brother manufactured specifically to make you and Sato suffer."

"I'll have Sato pay you back right away. It was his name in those court documents, not yours, Gai."

He shook his head again, "There's no need to rush, Kakashi. I am sure Sato has enough on his mind now, apart from the monetary demands Ken might make. So far my brother has not asked for or done anything else, to my knowledge."

"Pardon my language, Gai, but your brother is a fucking creep." Kakashi announced, rising up to sit tall and stab the snack skewer vertically into the wood of the table.

"I know." Gai agreed, "But he is my brother."

Kakashi sighed, "We'll get that money back to you, I promise. I never wanted this to be hard on you either…"

"Nothing in the world is perfect." Gai acknowledged as he folded his arms, "Disappointments and obstacles have not stopped me. I could never be like Ken. Moving forward and maintaining bonds is something I must do."

"I will too."

"I have not seen Sato-kun since any of this happened. Is he alright?"

"…I can't say that he is. I'm trying to keep an eye on him and make sure he reports to Jounin Council meetings. It's a bit of a rough crowd there. Genma and Ebisu were giving him a hard time."

"I shall speak to them."

"Thanks, Gai."

"And you, Kakashi? Are you alright?" Gai was as thoughtful as ever.

"I…" He pooched his mouth and thought on it, "I think I am. I was a bit manic today, worrying over Sato…but I'm about through it. I've almost gotten my strength back since being discharged from the hospital."

"Good, good…"

Gai mentioned he had seen two young dogs running around with Kakashi's pack and, ah, yes, they'd have to be introduced! That was something worth celebrating, at least.

Afterward, Gai bade his friend "Until tomorrow…" and set out for home. As the sky darkened, Kakashi also made his way back through the ward. How strange it was to think on the days when he'd been younger, and refused Gai's extensions of friendship time after time. Back then, he never could have imagined having someone so kind and principled to call a friend. Today was a day to count his blessings, Kakashi thought to himself.

At home, he discovered his dogs snoozing peacefully in various spots throughout the house, each fed and cared for. In addition to that, Tenzo was napping on the couch with Pakkun curled up on his stomach.

This was different. Usually, coming home in the evenings did not feel serene or half so crowded.
The chaos of the dining table where Sato's repossessed household items accumulated had been quelled, cleaned. Kakashi puttered around briefly before crossing to the sofa, and lifted Pakkun like a bowling ball to relocate the dog to an unoccupied cushion on the floor. The pug hardly even stirred.
Then, Kakashi scooched his bottom onto the free space of the couch, and tapped a tune along Tenzo's brows to wake him.

"Buh…oh…Kakashi." He yawned and rubbed his face.
"Thanks for taking care of everything."

"It's, uh...no problem." Tenzo wrestled back his awakened faculties, "I could tell you needed help today. You had an irrational freak-out."

"I did."

"And your nephew?"

"Safe, I'm told. He's on a mission with his team now."

"That should keep him out of trouble, then."

"No accidents or unacceptable chewing?" Kakashi wondered of Tolsi and Gattsu.

"Nah, they behaved. I think they're going to need more toys, though."

He looked fondly over at the sleeping bundles of fluff tucked against Bull on the floor.

"I know that you can't help worrying like you did today...but try not to let it take control of you. I don't think Sato wants to leave you alone." Tenzo shared some insight, "This isn't quite like your Dad...at least I don't think so. Your nephew has you and his team and other forms of support. He can pull through."

"I don't want to have a Panglossian outlook just yet. He's not out of the woods, so I won't let my guard down."

"Fair enough, but try not to steal anything else out of his flat. Okay?"

"I can do that." Kakashi found an errant thread on the seam of Tenzo's sweater. He plucked it off.

Tenzo wore a contemplative look, "...can I ask you something?"

"Ask away."

"This is going way back. Back to when you'd just retired from ANBU."

"Hm, quite a while ago." Kakashi could reminisce a bit.

"I was starting to move up in rank, remember? We trained a lot then. I didn't have a lot of friends in those days, so I tried to go to all of those team-building nights and stupid outings."

"Yes. Do they still hold those? Sai should go to them."

"Not as often, but I've brought him a few times." Tenzo digressed, "Anyway, you went to functions like that too."

"As I was steadily growing more sociable then, yes, I did. That was when I hung around more with Gai and Asuma."

Tenzo was nodding, "That was the time. You actually showed up at Obon."

Kakashi thought back to that summer festival long, long ago, "Oh yeah, I did."

"You never used to go, you said. But I hadn't been to it either even after getting out of Root, so you said you'd check it out with me."
"Ah, right."

"It was great. Then you went to some of the team-building events."

"Mm-hmm." He wasn't exactly sure, but that sounded like something he might've done then.

"The bar in Nabezo was pretty popular for get-togethers."

"That's a great place." Kakashi was amused by memories that drifted back, and then he slowly remembered something unpleasant, "Ah. Is that what you want to talk about? All of this context…"

"Well, it's not like it was ever discussed. Years went by." Tenzo sniffed.

"I thought I was in the way." Kakashi said simply. Tenzo seemed absolutely flabbergasted by the comment and sat up, jostling Kakashi in the process, "You thought you were in the way?"

"Hm. That's…what I thought at the time." Kakashi explained, "People were getting to know you, so when you had attention—"

"Like I cared about that—!" Tenzo was expressive with his hand gestures, "Kakashi, we were together every day! Almost every night! What happened? What was unclear?" His nostrils flared, "I told you how I felt."

"Try to understand I took everything that everyone said back then with a grain of salt." Kakashi reminded him, shifting to lean back into tufted cushions, "You were still young and learning how to participate in those social circles. I didn't want to hold you back."

"I was with you by choice. You weren't holding me back."

"After all that chatter at those dumb parties they made it sound like I was a thief. Like you didn't stand a chance…"

Tenzo tossed his hands up again, "They were all drunk, chain-smoking idiots who could barely stay upright in chairs and you listened to them?"

Kakashi admitted, "I didn't want to, but I couldn't ignore what was said. As I recall, one particular night you had that Intel Corps girl, Suniti, all over you. I wasn't going to make a scene or start a bar fight. I thought it was fair to let you try what you wanted to, back then. I didn't interfere."

"Try—?" Tenzo held his head, "I wish you had interfered, Kakashi. That woman was a mess."

"But she was…" Feebly, Kakashi pointed to spots on his friend's face, indicating where the Intel Corps clerk girl had planted wet ones on Tenzo. At the time (and his memory was shoddy) it had looked like a standard fling that began in a bar between consenting, boozy parties.

"That was harassment!" Tenzo clarified for him in a shriek, "It was a nightmare trying to get that drunkard off of me, and you couldn't tell? That I needed backup? You thought that was something I'd go for?"

"I…uh…didn't want to rule out the possibility and rudely interrupt."

"I'm gay." Tenzo was visibly frustrated, "Surely you had figured that out? It took that sloppy clerk most of the night to understand! And you just left me there!"
"Oh. I didn't know you had it completely worked out at that point—"

"You really can be stupid, Kakashi." Crossing his arms and shaking his head, Tenzo added, "Yes, it took some time for me to understand. Leaving Root and entering ANBU made me question plenty of things, so when I finally realized that you weren't just a mentor or role-model to me, I actively tried to spend more time with you. I tried to find ways to reach you."

"Hm." Kakashi sat back in silence and reflected on the matter. If he were truly honest, he’d known how Tenzo felt even then. But the slightest possibility of Tenzo's wavering interest in him (which in fact was not disinterest at all) had squirreled him into retreat, as Kakashi was wont to do with most delicate things.

He hardly ever committed to anything or anyone in his personal life. Not because he didn’t care, but because the act of and consequences of caring scared him witless. Then it seemed his chance with his subordinate-turned-something-else had come and gone. Yet it seemed that chance had not in fact expired. It'd been put on hold for several years.

"I know it's not the same for you." Tenzo granted in a softer voice, "Things aren't so defined for you. How you feel— if it's love or amusement. If it's a man or a woman. Whatever it happened to be, you never stuck with it. So I knew I was gambling when I got my hopes up." He caved tiredly and let his head sink into the backrest, "I couldn't take it personally. If friendship was all you wanted, I was never going to resent that. I was grateful."

Kakashi’s long, chicken-headed silence did not give much direction. His eyes slid over each of his snoring dogs, then to the dimly lit street lamp beyond the window. His gaze settled on Tenzo, who had begun to crack under the weight of anxious embarrassment. The lack of a prompt answer from Kakashi erased his last shreds of confidence.

"Now that that's out of the way…” Tenzo cleared his throat, "I've had enough excitement for today. I should go home." He pushed off of the sofa and was a skittish mess all the way across the room, then fumbled in the genkan for footwear.

"You're just going to leave it on that note?" Kakashi was perplexed.

"I…yes." He was nodding while doing an awkward shoe dance.

"Really?"

"I don't think what I said was particularly damaging." Tenzo mumbled, "Just let it be clarification since you…clearly misunderstood what things were like back then." He added that there were now eggs, milk, and yogurt in the refrigerator. He’d gotten a few kilos of rice too, which had been running low. And also, "I'll see you…tomorrow."

Kakashi had moved to the refrigerator to investigate the new perishables, "Don't you want to hear what I have to say before you go?"

Tenzo was hesitating at the door, "I'm not sure."

"Come on, it's not so bad. Did you eat? I'm going to make omurice."

It wasn't as if a deeply appealing dish had been offered, nor much reassurance on Kakashi's part, but after 30 seconds of agonizing, Tenzo took a seat at the island counter to watch the food preparations. The rice cooker was going. While chopping an onion, Kakashi told him, "You should get a full disclaimer."
"Disclaimer?"

"So that you don't misunderstand me, since you're concerned about misunderstandings..." Kakashi began, "I do not think I am a wise choice of companion."

Before Tenzo could say anything to disagree, Kakashi made a waggling motion with a chef's knife, "Hold on. That was my honest opinion. You know better than anyone what I'm like. And it's not the Copy Ninja of myth or stereotypes that abound, not a hero or gentleman, well, not exactly. While I can dedicate myself as a shinobi, that isn't the case in the other aspects of my life."

"Kakashi—"

"I'm a bit of a fuck-up." Kakashi admitted.

Tenzo's face fell, sympathizing, "I wouldn't call you that."

"That's because you're nice. But really, you've seen first-hand that there have been things I can't handle on a personal level. I don't like people very much. Getting close to them is…" He shuddered, "I'll always think about what it's like to lose the ones I cherish. It sours the feeling."

"Then is it worth not building new bonds at all?"

"I've had time to think about that and, no, it's not worth it. That doesn't mean I find it easy, trying to get close to others. It took a long time for me to truly appreciate my students." Kakashi confessed, "It took even longer to genuinely care about my generational peers, who've always stuck by me. You've been the easiest person to get close to."

A bit too frazzled to smile at the admission, Tenzo sputtered and took over chopping the onions when Kakashi pushed the cutting board in front of him. Kakashi then went about cubing chicken breasts with a different knife.

"But you can't look at these improvements and good qualities in me without also looking at the bad." Kakashi cautioned him, "I didn't do much of anything when I saw my Dad in pain. Then he killed himself, so I decided to become a law-bound prig who treated people like shit. Obito died because of me. When Rin told me that she loved me, and I didn't feel the same way, I was very careless in my treatment of her. Once Minato-sensei was gone, I didn't do nearly as much as I could have to look out for his child. I fought with and belittled my sister pretty much all of our lives, abandoned her kid when she died…" He concluded with, "My track record is…eh…"

"It's not the best track record." Tenzo allowed.

"I also read a lot of porn."

"Well, that was never a secret."

With the chicken chopped, Kakashi added oil to a pan to heat on the stove, "There are plenty of things that scare me. For some reason, everyone around here seems to think I'm an unstoppably courageous caricature. At least friends know I can be an asshat and a flake."

Genuine laughter erupted from Tenzo, "This…is the most self-aware you've ever been…maybe…"

"Do you see those things in me?" Kakashi wondered.

A small nod. Kakashi sighed and turned to add onions to the pan, stirring lazily.
"Kakashi…"

He glanced over his shoulder to Tenzo.

"I see much more than that in you." Tenzo told him with a straight face.

Kakashi turned back to cooking, "Thank you." He added the chicken to the pan, "Just imagine: if you hadn't been commanded to kill me while you were still with Root, we never would have become friends."

"I guess not. I would probably be dead by now." Tenzo smiled ruefully, "Danzo had me on assignments until I would collapse."

"And he never let you have a haircut." Kakashi recalled.

"What? You didn't like my glorious, waist-length hair?"

"Of course I did. Every hairstyle you tried suited you, I noticed."

Aghast, "I…think you're complimenting me."

"Jeez, relax." Kakashi clucked as he added rice to the final mixture, "Get me some eggs."

Tenzo did as he was asked and procured the carton for his culinary host. Beaten eggs were poured into a second pan, spread wide to provide an omelet base. Judging by the speed and dexterity with which the meal was prepared, Tenzo figured that Kakashi ate this dish pretty often. The delicious aroma had woken a few of the dogs, who were lollygagging opportunistically.

When the rice filling was stuffed into the omelet shells and patted into the traditional shape, Kakashi even went through the trouble of designing a ketchup face on the finished product. He handed the plate off to Tenzo, "Here."

"Oh, uh…what did you draw on it?" Tenzo took a seat at the table.

"It's your face."

"I don't look like this!"

"You do. See? Those lines are the under-eye bags. I thought it was pretty good."

Tenzo aggressively tore apart the omelet mound with a spoon, annoyed, "My eyes are not that bad…"

"Hey, aren't you going to thank me for the meal?" Kakashi also sat down with his plate.

"No. I didn't even want to stay here. I poured my heart out unnecessarily and now I'm embarrassed." Tenzo took a bite, "And you just go on and on with the self-deprecation."

"Ah. You're welcome anyway." Kakashi was smiling as he pulled his neck gaiter down to eat.

"What sauce did you use in the rice?"

"Barbecue sauce."

"It's strange but good."
"I'm glad. I was eating saury earlier, but that wasn't quite enough." Kakashi shooed his dogs away with a foot, citing the fact that they had all been fed. He chewed merrily while they watched.

"Thank you for the meal." Tenzo muttered belatedly.

"Hmm." Kakashi was studying his face from across the table.

Tenzo was trying to eat in peace, maybe even preserve some of his dignity in light of the fact that Kakashi sort of held him hostage (by way of food). He'd much rather be across town in his sad shoebox of a home, curled up beneath a blanket and regretting that he'd bared his heart like plated omurice.

It had been stupid to say anything. He'd been thinking back to some five or six years ago, when they'd been younger and less jaded. He'd thought of those times when Kakashi had kissed him; that perhaps he hadn't read into it too much. That it wasn't just some initiation for Tenzo as he got a foothold in social circles—maybe Kakashi had meant it? But when years had gone by and nothing had blossomed, those memories diluted and the motivations seemed more uncertain than ever.

Moping while he ate, Tenzo cleared his plate and tried not to collapse forward onto it and die of shame. Why did he always try so hard? It'd become a joke to some of their friends. Tenzo knew that his devotion was pretty easy to spot.

"Stop acting so put-upon." Kakashi chided him, "I had to give a disclaimer."

"By saying all those awful things about yourself? Why do I need a discla—?"

"I love you." Kakashi said.

Beside the table, Biscuit and Gattsu had become energized by some bright change in human mood, circling restlessly, sniffing. From his cushion on the far side of the room, Pakkun was telling his dog compatriots to quit it and give "the two-leggers some space." Tenzo hardly even noticed the doggish behavior peaking in the house. He was staring dumbly.

Kakashi took a final bite of food before confirming, "You are the only person that I want."

"I…I-I…" Tenzo pressed his lips shut, red-faced, startled.

"I still think you could choose better, and I can't guarantee I will get any of this right."

"You can…I mean…you've done more good than you realize." It was taking some gargantuan emotional strength for Tenzo not to completely lose his cool and clam up, "Especially for me. I have to credit you with most every decent thing in my life. Don't try to…minimize that. I don't want to look elsewhere…"

"I know. I won't." While scrubbing the dishes, Kakashi somehow remained calm and Tenzo was goggling at his level-headedness.

What was he supposed to say? He didn't want to rush serious words and seem desperate or pathetic, even though there was a chance he already did, Tenzo considered. His head was fuzzy. Palms a bit clammy. Why was it that knowing someone loved him changed everything at a molecular level? He would have to renegotiate everything; breathing, sleeping, laundry, his life's purpose. He needed a glass of water. He needed to roll up like a pangolin and take a few minutes. Did Kakashi really feel unruffled while acknowledging something that had taken years to manifest? How did he do it?
This was no flirtatious crush of his bygone late teen years and early twenties. His feelings were accepted and returned. What did other people do in this situation? Tenzo wondered. Did they bellow victoriously, stutter like fools, or cry in silence? What was standard procedure? He had no personal experience or references to go off of.

At some point during his contemplation, Kakashi's dishwashing wrapped up and he moved around the edge of the counter. Tenzo had to snap out of the mental survey his brain was conducting. Kakashi was aspectant to him, not a half step away. His face was still uncovered, expressing that he was waiting for some kind of confirmation from Tenzo.

"Eh-hem." Tenzo cleared his throat again, "Sorry…I'm…a bit overwhelmed."

"Looks like it."

"…did you really mean all that?"

Kakashi assured him, "The only time I fib is when I'm making up excuses for tardiness."

"Oh."

"So, be clear about what you want. You're the one who brought up this subject, but I expect you hoped to gain something from it."

"I don't know. I don't know…what needs to change. From the way things are now." Tenzo admitted, breathing sporadically as he noticed the shrinking barrier of air and space between them, "I haven't done this before. Maybe you've dated someone, so you should lead, or…"

A flat response, "What do you think I know about dating?"

"I…er—" Tenzo watched one of Kakashi's hands reach, settling on the back of his neck.

With regards to being in a functional relationship with another adult, Kakashi wagered he knew "Close to nothing." And he optimistically added, "That won't stop me from figuring it out, though."

Tenzo managed short breaths, "Me too..." The world was a dizzy place.

Tenzo suspected the dogs were observing, naively detached from the spectacle of Hatake Kakashi leaning forward and winding his arms around the fidgety dinner guest. By their standards it was not unusual or unexpected. Nor did they think much about the two meeting lips, a slow act of remembrance and reacquaintance. Eventually, the dog pack settled down again since the opportunity for dinner scraps had passed, and the humans were plenty distracted with loving pecks.

Night trawled a veil to darken the home where no lamps had been lit. Kakashi noted that he was overdue for sleep and had a check-up scheduled for the morning to assess the reinstatement of his mission activity.

Goodnight was the idea. And it still was the idea when Tenzo lingered, caught up in his try-hard franticness and disbelief that he could solicit kisses when he wanted. He could stay. He could speak his mind. He could feel. Kakashi did discourage him from "Writing any more of those mushy sentiment cards," though, "People are nosy and try to read them."

"So what?" Tenzo lived for such things.

"Those words are for me, not them."
“True…” Tenzo yawned as he curled up on the side of a bed he hadn’t seen in a long time. It was good to know the hold of another again. The hold of the only other. To know it and not have to forget.

The next morning felt surer than all the days before it.

Chapter End Notes

And napkin spread by fays;
Drifting meadow of the air,
Where bloom the daisied banks and violets,
And in whose fenny labyrinth
The bittern booms and heron wades;
Spirit of lakes and seas and rivers,—
Bear only perfumes and the scent
Of healing herbs to just men’s fields.
—H. D. Thoreau

Note: Thanks for reading and happy Pride Month. : )

Chapter 54: United Front
Naruto did not think it unusual when one of Suna's Sealing Corps commissioners dropped by the house to tutor him, per Gaara's invitation. He did not even think it particularly offensive that she, Maki, came over 15 minutes earlier than anticipated. He'd been awake for a while that morning, eating a vegetable-heavy breakfast and sampling exotic teas that Kankuro had brewed.

However, Gaara appeared quite annoyed that the commissioner showed up earlier than expected and had been invited into the home by Naruto, and consequently Maki beheld the Kazekage trudge into the kitchen in his pajamas, half-awake, taking a droopy-eyed swig of oolong before he even noticed she was standing there at the dining table.

Gaara sprayed his drink in surprise and yelled something incoherent, mostly at Naruto.

"We've got some baked carrots and stuff, if you're hungry." Naruto offered the guest to partake of the breakfast spread on the table.

"Thank you, Naruto-san, I'm fine." Maki detected that Gaara was overcoming his startlement, "I apologize that I arrived sooner than we agreed upon, Kazekage-sama. I just thought I should start the lesson as soon as I could, since the Sealing Committee might have an unscheduled meeting today…"

"…it's alright." Gaara sat down and accepted that he was underdressed and eating mushy carrots in front of someone who ought to have the most professional view of him possible.

Naruto was more personable, "What was your name again?"

"Maki." She was smiling.

"Yeah, that's right. Kankuro told me." Naruto remembered cheerfully.

"He is a very good friend of mine." Maki confirmed.

"Yep, he said that too. So you're a Sealing Commissioner? Isn't that the highest position in the Corps?"

"Short of the Director's position, the leader who oversees everyone in the Sealing Corps, yes. I preserve the most complex Sealing Techniques that protect our village, and that may be required for delicate missions." Maki politely helped herself to some carrots with a spare set of chopsticks.

"And it's okay for you to teach me a bit more about Prong-Seals?" Naruto was hopeful.

Maki glanced at Gaara again, who was bunched up in his seat and chewing sleepily, "It is if the Kazekage says it is."

"Yes. I want him prepared before he applies for a position in Leaf." Gaara granted.

"You seem better prepared than most applicants I've seen anyway." Maki estimated, "I've heard that Gama-sennin has been teaching you."
"He has been. He would've given me extra pointers today, but he went to check on a tip with Old Granny Chiyo first thing this morning. He said he'll be back by lunchtime and then bother Suna's council again." Naruto relayed the whereabouts of Jiraiya, since he and Temari had returned to the Sand Village.

When Temari did saunter into the room wearing a pretty dress with her fan tied in a sash at her back, her jaw dropped at the sight of Gaara, "Hey, why aren't you dressed? We have company!" She turned to Maki, "I'm sorry, he's usually ready—"

"No, no, I was early, Temari-sama!" Maki was contrite.

Gaara sighed theatrically to interrupt their chatter, "I have a few things to take care of this morning at the office. I'll be going there shortly."

"Right." Temari rested a hand on her hip, "And I'm heading south for an escort detail coming from the Land of Waves. I should be back in a few hours since he'll meet me half-way."

"Half-way?" Gaara scrunched his face curiously, "Who are you escorting again?"

"I'll be back by lunch. Don't get into trouble." Temari pecked the top of her brother's head affectionately, "See you later, Naruto, Maki." She waved farewell before trotting out of the room.

Naruto noticed, "She's energetic…"

"She's hiding something." Gaara assessed flatly over a final sip of tea.

"Maybe it's not my place to comment…" Maki contributed, "But why is it when a young woman is happy it's immediately considered suspicious?"

"If you lived with her you'd know." Gaara defended.

"She looked so pretty in that dress…" Maki muttered, as if she were rethinking her own practical, muted outfit.

Naruto paused in his chewing, "What if she got a boyfriend?"

"She's sworn off that sort of thing." Gaara recalled.

"As far as you know."

"…I'm going to get dressed." Gaara did not entertain the subject, "You can begin your lessons in the sitting room now." He retreated sleepily upstairs to change.

And so a rather pleasant morning commenced, at least in Naruto's opinion. He and Maki settled in the living area to go over the fundamentals of prong-seals, how to manifest them, their purposes, and in Naruto's words, "The best way to balance a bunch of 'em on your fingers…"

"Well…" Maki smiled dubiously, "I'm not sure exactly how to describe how it's done…to make multiple seals at once…it's like balancing a stack of plates on my head."

Naruto stilled and stared at her as he sat on a floor cushion, thrown by the suggestion.

"What I mean is that it's tricky that way, managing individual properties simultaneously to create a complete technique. You know that I didn't mean you should practice balancing plates on your head, right, Naruto-san?"
"Uh…no— I wasn't thinking that!" A swift denial.

Maki's lessons got clearer, and Gaara eventually reappeared downstairs in his staple Kage attire.

Then came the knock at the door. Gaara exchanged a wordless, quizzical look with Naruto and the tutor before answering and signing for a very strange-looking package. Maki's face grew slate serious when she asked Gaara, "The postal service delivered that directly to you? Shouldn't the Intel Corps clear it first, Kazekage-sama?"

"I don't think it's a bomb or poison." Gaara gave the puffed envelope a shake and heard something rattling inside.

Naruto was intrigued, "Want me to open it?"

"No, you're several degrees more fragile than I am." Gaara tore the perforated top off of the package and out slid a battered-looking VHS tape with a label reading: Friends from Kumogakure.

"Ohh, the Intel Corps should definitely check that." Maki muttered.

"Why's Hidden Cloud sending you something outside of an official channel?" Naruto wondered, getting enthusiastic with his theories, "Gaara, whoa! What if it's a bribe? Or like a dirty movie—? Maybe a kidnapping or ransoming thing—!"

"I doubt it." Gaara crossed over to an entertainment cabinet and turned on a dusty tape player.

Maki's worrying persisted, "What if it's a broadcast of a Genjutsu technique—?"

"Maki, those never work. Illusions are transmitted through live chakra, not these stupid recordings…"

Naruto sidled up to the television screen, far more excited than he was concerned. A front-and-center recording began, showing a peaceful courtyard with mossy stones surrounding a tall kunoichi in Cloud's black and white fatigues. Beside her was a bulky, dark-skinned man dressed similarly, standing with his arms crossed.

"That's Nii Yugito." Gaara informed his companions, "The jinchuriki of the Two-Tails."

"—!" Naruto's eyes went wide as he sat and vibrated with anticipation.

Maki chose not to speak over the recording as Yugito commenced a greeting.

"Kazekage-sama, I pray that you've been well. I hope you and your Tailed-Beast are having an easier time understanding one another. I put in a request with the Raikage to pay you another visit, but A-sama forbade me from leaving the village." Yugito extended her hand to the man standing beside her, "This is my comrade, B, and the guardian of the Eight-Tails. He is also under orders not to travel outside of Kumo, or associate with the jinchuriki of other villages."

Killerbee explained gruffly, "My big bro's being a punk about this!"

Yugito nodded, "Yes. We need to be able to communicate with each other. The Akatsuki can capitalize on our dividedness, and continue targeting us as individuals."

"—we are not messin' around! I don't normally do recordings for free, and I don't shrug off orders! This is some rebel shit—"

"B, please."
"When last we spoke, you told me that you are close with the Nine-Tail's jinchuriki, Naruto-san. Make sure that he is aware of what we are trying to do, Kazekage-sama." Yugito went on, "I am horrified that we lost Utakata-san so abruptly, after he was able to open up trade and discussion channels with the great villages through the Tide Village. We also believe that the Akatsuki has extracted the Three and Four tails thus far. As our villages seek to sequester us more for safekeeping, we all know that it leaves us more vulnerable. It is unlikely that any council would ever agree to a coalition of jinchuriki banding together to defend themselves, in fear of what kind of result our combined defeat could entail…"

"No way we'd lose. They've got no sense of vision, only trust in division…" Killerbee did not agree with the assessment, "My dudes…we could even wear matching uniforms."

Yugito seemed to be mentally collecting herself after the suggestion. Naruto was squealing at the screen, as he evidently liked the idea. Gaara told him to pipe down.

"I am suggesting we take the lawful route first, petitioning our leaders to consider an emergency meeting of all Kage and jinchuriki." Yugito explained, "And if such a request is rejected or hung up indefinitely in bureaucratic traffic, we can organize ourselves in secret. Though I'm no fan of vigilantism or treason, we must consider the bigger picture. If we lose the fight against the Akatsuki, that organization will wield a force that will eventually crush all of our villages. Our way of life will be lost."

Gaara was muttering, "…Yugito. Do you really think my council is going to entertain an idea like that?"

"Like I said: rebel shit." Killerbee was grinning, "We'll do what we've gotta do, even if our leaders are fools. Ya hear me? I already sent a new rap to Han and the Five-Tails. We go way back. No way he's skipping out on our team—"

"B, there is no team yet."

"Yet? How do you hedge your bets?" He turned from Yugito to the camera again, "Yo, Sand-Tail, Gaara! There are no leaders younger than you—who see as far as you! I know you've got this. You and your pal— I know you're in this fight with us." Killerbee added, "Next we've got to find the Seven-Tails and extend our invitation…"

"Fū!" Naruto craned his neck to look back at Gaara, "We've got to tell her!"

"Tell her? What would we tell her?" Gaara sniffed, "I'm the Kazekage. Before I resort to unsanctioned, harebrained co-ops with other jinchuriki, I have to try to organize this the right way."

"But you just said your council won't listen!" Naruto barked.

Maki's eyes darted between the two of them. She was taking in way too much information.

"Naruto, I need to make the case to my advisors that their fear of confronting the Akatsuki now pales in comparison to their fear of facing the Akatsuki at a later date, with all of the power of the Tailed-Beasts behind them. Not everyone will agree. Maybe a majority vote could be reached."

"Yeah. And well…I don't know if Baa-chan would like this idea either…"

"I have to advocate for something like this properly. Even if it were approved, I don't think Suna's council would be enthusiastic about me parading around on an inter-village Counter-Ops squad and shirking my responsibilities here." Gaara imagined, "And if, in the worst case scenario, I died while supporting such an effort…it'd be prudent of me to recommend a candidate as my successor."

"Why do you have to think of that morbid stuff?" Naruto groused.

"Because I don't want my village hurled into chaos in my absence." A perfectly reasonable wish, to which Gaara tacked on, "I should put thought into who can lead Hidden Sand after me. I don't think my brother or sister would be interested, though they can handle most everything I already do."

Maki reminded them, "Uh, you're missing the video."

Gaara and Naruto snapped their attention back to the screen, watching Yugito give her closing remarks.

"We will be in touch soon, Gaara-sama. We won't give up on our villages seeing reason, and we will never stop resisting the Akatsuki." Yugito urged him, "Please, correspond with A-sama when you can. He is a proud and stubborn man, but his eyes are also trained on the future. He can't ignore this threat."

Beside the kunoichi, Killerbee began an impromptu rap:

How many times did I tell my bro-?

That the war ahead is the one ya don't see!

Idling over grudges— shit from long ago

While the biggest sacrifices are made by jinchuriki!

We'll love and bleed, build and feed our homes

'Til they let us go

Careless! Black-out! They don't see a Red Dawn

Like we do.

We're not pawns

We're born free!

Clapped in shackles

Lost shinobi.

The man then pointed a finger at the camera, "Are you feelin' me? We'll meet up soon."

When the footage ended in a crackle that seemed to suggest the video had been edited, Naruto slowly about-faced to address Gaara.

Naruto confessed quietly, "He's amazing. That "B" guy."

"Amazing is not the correct description for him. His spoken word poetry was unnecessary." Gaara disagreed as he extracted the tape from the player.

"You never really did appreciate performance stuff." Naruto nodded and folded his arms, "But that's fine, he and I can hang—"

"There will be no "hanging out" until I have this sanctioned. If I get this sanctioned…"

"Gaara, don't you feel a bit hopeful? Seeing jinchuriki much older than us— more experienced—!" Naruto's joy propelled him back up to his feet. "We've got a shot too! And they want to help us!"

"They do. Most other jinchuriki are reasonable, empathetic people." Gaara acknowledged, and he then turned to Maki, "Can you keep this to yourself for now, Maki? At least until I make any formal announcements."

She pantomimed an imaginary key locking in front of her smiling lips, then rose from her seat on the couch, "Who would I tell? I don't peddle in gossip. Besides, this is for you to figure out. I've always been willing to fight the Akatsuki, so I look forward to a more united front resisting them."

Gaara sighed, "We all do."

Naruto was a ball of eager energy, "So how do we draft an agreement? Oh! Should we make a tape of our own too? I'm stoked meet 'em—"

"You are going to stay here and study."

"Fine! But then afterward—!"

"I am not drafting this proposal until I've handled everything else waiting for me at the office." The Kazekage was striding toward the door, while Naruto and Maki waffled behind him uncertainly.

"Actually…I was thinking of bringing Naruto to the Text Office on the first floor of the Administrative Building." Maki explained, "I can show him how to use chakra paper to practice balancing multiple prong seals at once."

Gaara halted in the doorway, "You didn't bring that with you?"

"Well, not enough of it."

Gaara repeated, "I don't want him going outside without a suppression tag."

"Relax already, I've got my disguise. Ero-sensei is back in town anyway, and he said we'll be leaving in about a day…so just tell anyone who asks that I paid you another visit." Naruto fitted a pair of ratty sunglasses to his face, "No one's gonna ask."

Grumbling, Gaara allowed the two to accompany him several blocks through town to the Administrative Building, and they parted ways at the Text Office before he continued upstairs.

Maybe there was no point in fretting about Naruto being noticed in Hidden Sand. He'd been nervous while Jiraiya was away in the Water Country, but like a faithful boomerang the perverted Sage was back. Jiraiya was also making himself useful and investigating Suna's peripheries, intent on sniffing out any hint of enemy treachery. Gaara felt that they were in much safer hands at present. As it stood, Naruto needed to cram any study time he could now that he was set to leave for Leaf.

In the Kazekage's office, he flipped the light switch on, and even heard an errant comment from Shukaku in the back of his mind, Quit stressing out.

'That is easier said than done. Why don't you try handling my job?'
Heh! I've been unemployed for hundreds of years! Or rather, if you count me supplying brute force chakra to your village, then my work's been uncompensated for that long.

"Hush." Gaara said out loud as he took a seat, reaching for the stack of correspondence and documents in the inbox tray. There was sealed envelope with a return address he recognized right away: the Haruno household. Gaara opened it immediately, discovering a large photograph with a note attached.

Hi there Gaara!

I'm sure my daughter will be writing to you soon to explain her latest accomplishment, but I thought I'd send you this snapshot we took today at the celebration brunch. Sakura completed her hospital residency as a Medic-nin and can now choose a fellowship! Like a real physician! She studied until her eyes crossed, but at least in her Medical Corps portrait she looks presentable. Please enjoy this copy and celebrate with us even though you're far away. We very much look forward to your next visit, and hope all is well with you.

Fondly,

Haruno Kizashi

How strange it was to feel a constricting pang in his chest, as though being acknowledged by a father, even if it wasn't his own father, was the most meaningful thing in the world. Gaara inhaled and then examined the photo, which depicted Sakura in all of her blush beauty, donning a white doctor's coat over her red qipao. Her smile was a vision of spring. The commemorative degree plaque in her hands was gold-plated and well-deserved. His heart was fluttering and Gaara could not help but smile at the face he was missing so much.

'I would have liked to have attended her graduation ceremony at the Corps, but it's unthinkable for me to leave Suna right now...' Gaara thought as he slid the photo into a spare transparent frame, settling it on the corner of his desk, 'We have more catching up to do. Lots of celebrating to do...’ His thoughts drifted onward as he worked on auto-pilot, 'Her father does seem to like me…'

Gaara free associated from there, 'Both of her parents like me. I think...I...don't think they would object if I asked.'

'If I can marry Sakura.' Gaara concluded the thought.

Psh! Who needs permission? Isn't that something humans just decide to do?

'There are traditions that should be respected.'

Or else they won't like you anymore. Right? Who cares! Parents will always nitpick something or get ruffled.

'Did your father ever get upset with you?'

Well…not really. When he was around me and the others we were pretty docile, and he was a patient teacher.

'But you'd never want to deliberately disappoint or disobey him.'
Within the inner workings of Gaara's seal, Shukaku tittered and crossed his arms, No, but we didn't get to be with him for long! So it didn't matter. I'm sure me and my Tailed-Beast siblings have done plenty to disappoint him since— while he sits in the Pure Lands watching, shaking his head at our stupidity and weakness.

'If I've learned one thing about you, Shukaku,' Gaara told the Bijuu, 'It's that you aren't weak.'

Heh! You know, I've really grown to like you, Gaara. Keep up the flattery.

'Quiet down, now. I have work to do.'

The conversation ebbed. Fluttering sensations tickled Gaara's insides until late in the morning. Between his readings of proposals and reports, his thoughts reached for Sakura. He tinkered with the idea of what it would like to be a part of her family, and what it would be like when she was a part of his.

Gaara stopped for a cup of tea before reviewing the print copy of a slideshow to be presented to Tide's Council, explaining the extent of Suna's responsibility in the Tide Village's repairs and so forth. The head of Sustainable Gardening and Resources department stopped by with his update on the desert greenhouse, and was eventually booted from the office when several teams of Sand Genin showed up to accept mission assignments.

Once all of the youngsters were given something to do and sent away, Gaara sagged back into his seat and sighed. He glanced at the clock on the wall that reflected the hours of early afternoon. How did time escape him so easily these days?

Maki knocked once before poking her face past the door, "Gaara-sama, I have a committee meeting to get to! Naruto-san did wonderfully today! He's a quick learner."

"I knew he would do well. Where is he?"

"Still on the first floor in the Text Office. He's made himself comfortable and is practicing with two Prong-Seals now." Maki reported proudly, "The office manager likes him already. You can let Naruto stay there, or ask Wamu-san to escort him back to your home."

"Thank you. I think I'd rather pay Naruto a visit downstairs and find out what he wants to do today." Gaara pushed up from his chair, "I appreciate your help, Maki."

"Anytime!" She hustled away.

Shortly after that, Gaara did find his friend downstairs in the building and got a sense of what Naruto's daily goals were.

By the time Kankuro and Baki frittered into the Administrative Building and made the climb up to the Kazekage's office, the Kazekage was no longer seated at his desk. They did discover, however, Jiraiya settled in and scribbling a letter to his book editor whilst smoking a pipe.

"Hey! This is a no smoking area, put that out!" Kankuro crossed the room to crack a window and fanned tobacco smoke with his hand, "Gama-sennin, what the hell—are? Where did Gaara go?"

"Out." The pipe stem hung precariously off of Jiraiya's lip.

"That's not helpful." Kankuro crossed his arms and stood beside the desk.

Jiraiya held up a finger to pause the exchange or risk losing his train of thought as he wrote, "No way I'm going to allow a whole chapter deletion just because my editor felt I got redundant!

Baki, who was still at the entryway of the room, cleared his throat to remind the Toad Sage that maybe he was a bit too comfy within the stronghold of Sunagakure. And, uh, Sand ninja were within their rights to ask where the hell the Kazekage went.

"Sorry. I just got back from some reconnaissance in the desert, AND I had to rip my editor a new one for insulting me." Jiraiya set his pen down, exhaling another line of smoke, "Gaara said I could relax in here while he and Naruto went out for a bit."

"Okay, but if he said you could relax I'm sure he didn't say you could smoke too," Kankuro reasoned.

Jiraiya was not apologetic, "Didn't say I couldn't."

"Twisting things for convenience much?" The young man growled.

"Take it easy, Painted Cheeks. You know when this will be a non-smoking building? When I walk out of it." Jiraiya sassed, "Because once I leave, I'll be tempted to watch my students duke it out in the desert. And frankly I'm not excited to see the outcome of Gaara and Naruto brawling because they're like my kids, and I wince a lot. So I'm wasting a bit of time—"

"Brawling?" Baki repeated the concerning word.

"Maybe not exactly brawling." Jiraiya allowed, finally extinguishing his pipe because he was still a rule-abiding man at heart, "Gaara accepted Naruto's challenge, so they're going to have a contest of strength just outside the village gate. Supervised by some high-level ninja of Suna, of course, for safety."

Once that information passed Kankuro's ears and was processed, he was the first one out the door, making haste to locate the two supposed warring parties.

---

Beyond the sunken Buddha effigy outside the walls of the village, Naruto stretched theatrically. He was ramping up for a fight after all, but Gaara clucked that he didn't have to be such a ham about everything. The shadow of the statue stretched long over them, and several Jounin of Sunagakure gathered (at Gaara's request) to keep an eye on things from a vantage point on the next dune over.

"If you know what's good for you, you'll stretch too." Naruto gave him a toothy warning.

Gaara's rebuttal was standard, "I am well aware of what is good for me."

"Bet Sakura-chan would tell you to. You 'ol stiff."

Boggled by the statement, Gaara reconsidered his stubborn position before folding down into a runner's leg stretch. Desk work had definitely tightened him up. One false move and Naruto could probably break him in half like a board.

And it was that notion that was so distinct— that Gaara could tell behind Naruto's smiley, rambunctious exterior there was a profound talent that could trounce any unwitting opponent. It was a feeling that stood Gaara's arm hairs on end. That there was something unspoken and formidable in Naruto. He could look at his friend and just know it.

"So, uh…are we supposed to set up any rules?" Naruto rubbed his chin while he thought on it.
"Don't cause any destruction to my village." Gaara counted off sparring parameters on his fingers, "No unnecessary risks, no summoning creatures for help, no juvenile tricks…"

"What about slightly humorous tricks-?"

"None of your tricks."

"Come on, I'm not going to embarrass you in front of all the citizens who respect you here!"

"I will need that in writing." Gaara said flatly.

Naruto paced back and forth, "If you're gonna patronize me like that then I get to make some rules too: no bad attitudes, no condescending—"

"Naruto, those aren't sparring limitations—"

"-no interrupting, limit two time-outs each if we need 'em, and let's wrap this up before the sun goes down, because that's when the shave ice places closes and I want to try the blood orange flavor…"

Sun down? How long did Naruto expect to fight? Gaara rolled his head on his neck and decided he didn't need that answer.

Naruto clapped his hands, "Great! Anything else?"

"No." Gaara confirmed.

They charged.

Jounin watching from a few dozen meters away flinched at the abrupt crash of the two ninja that meet in a volley of Taijutsu combinations. It was clear right away that Naruto had the advantage of dexterity and brawn, marching Gaara backwards, careening around with blink-and-you'd-miss-it speed. But Gaara's sand was a pest. It fluttered in defensive tendrils around the Kazekage, staving off multiple hammer-arms, round kicks, and classic one-two punches.

"So your sand is quicker these days, that's nice!" Naruto gave him that, "But man you need to lift and do some high intensity training, Gaara, you hit as hard as a baby blanket-!" More sand began to angrily surge, so Naruto added, "And I'll get you an agility ladder so you can work on physical speed—"

Not standing for any more cheeky banter, Gaara popped the section of sandy ground up from beneath Naruto like a geyser to send him whizzing through the air upwards of 30 meters. The chatterbox shinobi tucked into a ball to somersault down like a show-off, softening his landing with several backwards flips.

And if Naruto was not mistaken, it seemed as though Gaara had sped up, maintaining a fortified defense that was starting to make Naruto's close-quarters efforts null. All of the environment was a traitor. Naruto realized it as the ground slipped in different directions like the trick-floor in a fair's funhouse. The subtle motions of sand nearly tripped him half a dozen times when he came too near the Kazekage. With his approaches hampered so, Naruto could no longer get a good whack at his friend, 'Crap, and his sand shield is faster and sturdier than I remember. I guess he's not gonna let me punch him anymore! Bet he was just curious to see how hard I can hit…'

Gaara had quite a time trying to accurately nail his friend with a Sand Bullet, his effort becoming a veritable barrage while Naruto kept his distance, slipping between projectiles. It would have been more efficient to coagulate the scattered remains of sand he attacked with, but it hadn't taken Naruto long to assess what Gaara’s working range was. If an imaginary circle extended around Gaara, he being the hypothetical point at its center, then Naruto wizened up enough to tread just beyond the radius within which Gaara’s attacks were at their most bothersome. Any further, and he’d be dithering chakra away at a foolish rate just to have a hope of catching Naruto in a Sand Coffin.

But Gaara did have that option in his back pocket. Something had to give, after all. Either Naruto would take the risk to get close enough for a direct strike, or Gaara would expend chakra in a burst to extend his range and speed.

’SSince traditional means aren’t serving him well, Naruto is going to use a more advanced jutsu to —’ Ah, Gaara had called it. In that same instant, Naruto let fly his Hiraishin anchor knife, sailing for Gaara before it stuck like a dud in a wall of sand. Except, what Gaara had seen was a falsified transformation; a distraction, he realized as he detected a blip of movement from behind. Naruto had snuck around, hurled the kunai, and reappeared in a flash to successfully land a sucker-Rasengan that viciously bashed Gaara’s spherical sand shield.

What a gimmick… Gaara chewed on the inside of his mouth, aggravated that such a plain ruse had caught his blind side. And what was worse: his retaliating Sand Coffin boosted with chakra wrapped swiftly around Naruto…only to snare a Shadow Clone that Naruto had seamlessly replaced himself with.

Hah! Gaara, he's zipping all around you like a fly! Shukaku was highly amused.

Withholding a retort to that comment, Gaara stretched his awareness out of his working area of effect, sensing a tremble of sand as Naruto retreated while out of sight, but whoops— Gaara shifted the underfoot patch of dune and may have rolled his friend's ankle to slow him. Naruto's yelp was the giveaway that Gaara had guessed correctly, and the Kazekage rounded about with a hefty column of sand that collided with Naruto like a battering ram. Or, it would have collided with him, if Naruto had not flashed away to safety.

"Phew! Nearly had me!" Naruto was jubilant on top of a rock pile.

"I did have you. You may be able to use the Flying Thunder God technique, but your application is sloppy." Gaara had to point out that Naruto had been grazed by the last jutsu, dusted with sand and limestone chips.

Naruto was shaking the debris off, "My application would have been fine if you didn't try to trip me with your shifty-ground bullshit."

"How do you expect me to slow you down? I can't move like you do."

"Maybe you could if you weren't so dang conservative with your chakra!"

"I don't need to match your speed to win. I just need to outlast you, and I have no doubt that I will." Gaara's smile was a small crescent of defiance.

The taunt dripped down Naruto's spine; competitive irritation sent him off speeding, and in between each breath he may have heard the faintest murmur of his inner spectator—the Nine-Tailed Fox, saying nothing as he watched the contest with perkéd ears.

He was not as liberal as he could have been with Shadow Clones, but Naruto wanted to convey that he too could operate with limited resources. That he could grind Gaara down. A few Shadow Clones proved to be a worthy, chaotic distraction as Naruto dipped back into his friend's blind spot, which was still defended by Gaara's ever-present sand shield. But it was a maneuver twice repeated, so Gaara felt it coming, and he buffed apart the clone onslaught before meeting the real Naruto's Fireball Jutsu with a fireball of his own, exhaling a sphere of flames just in time.

The techniques would have canceled under ordinary circumstances, but Naruto's spite goaded him into plunging an excess of chakra into the jutsu— growing the flame and intensifying the heat. It overtook Gaara's countering Fireball Jutsu, to his surprise, and Gaara could only resort to cloaking himself in half a dune's worth of sand to protect against the about-faced inferno. Even if the momentary euphoria of overpowering his Kage-level friend was cheap, Naruto still feasted on the ego trip as his Tailed-Beast muttered about it being a truly "childish escalation."

Following the brief gloatfest, sandy walls rose high to enclose Naruto in a tubular space, only offering a distant exit ahead and no escape to the rear. It occurred to him, 'Crap, Gaara's willing to use more chakra now...he couldn't reach me that quick before...!'

Airflow in the trap was rather good, Naruto noticed, surprised that he wasn't being smothered, 'What's he-?' At the far end of the tube Gaara exhaled another fireball, which Naruto might've called modest by their standards. But— the Kazekage added a Wind Jutsu, another foundational technique by most counts, but it combined with the rolling ball of fire to create a furnace. The residual, stomach-clenching fear and sheen of sweat clung to Naruto as he promptly flashed out of the sand trap into open air. He had only thought to mark a rock pile earlier with his formula, and as such it was easy for Gaara to anticipate where Naruto would reappear.

Before Naruto could chastise Gaara about creating a literal oven (though he was still silently in awe of the ingenuity of it), Gaara swept a huge, bulky arm of Shukaku's that he had manifested. By a hair's breadth Naruto avoided the arcing blow, flipping up and over to reach a better vantage point. Better being the hypothetical word as Naruto ended up in prime position for the gigantic, sandy tail that Shukaku had also loaned his host. Gaara thwacked Naruto with the tail like a home run ball. POW. He rocketed through the air and struck the broad cheek of the sunken Buddha's face, gouging an unsightly crack in it.

Onlookers gasped audibly from the lookout. On the ground, Gaara hung back and wondered how Naruto would respond. He seemed to be hobbling dizzily, correcting his sightline of the desert as his eyes spun in his head. It had been a serious blow.

"...that's enough time." Gaara estimated, though he'd only given Naruto five seconds to recuperate. He knew who he was dealing with. It was why he felt no remorse sending in two Sand Clones to position themselves. Gaara's precognitive inkling assured him that Naruto had a trick up his sleeve, and indeed he did— Sage Mode markings appeared on Naruto's face.

Three Shadow Clones had been hidden away behind the effigy well in advance to collect Nature Chakra. Naruto released one of the clones before engaging Gaara again, frustrated that his friend had no trouble controlling partial transformations of the One-Tail's body, 'How!? How does Gaara do that? In an instant he can change his shape with Biju chakra and flick me like a bug...'

The pair of Sand Clones harassed Naruto, drawing his attention away from Gaara as he occasionally lashed out with Shukaku's tail and limbs. To avoid the sandy onslaught, Naruto employed the help of a single Shadow Clone, weaving away on light feet, anticipating the motion of sand tendrils. Naruto propelled himself off of his clone's back, feinting in multiple directions to scramble his attackers, wheeling and coordinating with his Shadow Clone.

In the beat between two Sand projectiles that missed, Naruto seized his clone's wrist, spun, and hurled it at the nearest Sand Clone...a move which impacted the surprised replication before the Shadow Clone detonated. Gaara's other Bunshin, momentarily distracted by the kamikaze explosion, met its end when Naruto flashed behind it with a Sage Chakra-fueled Rasengan, demolishing it and gouging an enormous pit into the shifty ground.

And Gaara's counterattack came on cue, a flutter registering in air that Naruto's Sage Sense warned him of a few milliseconds before it closed in. He ducked below the swing of a large tanuki paw, racing around Gaara's defenses as he spun another Rasengan to life in his palm, I'm not messing around! At the last second, Naruto flashed away from the double hammer-fist smash Shukaku's arms tried to club him with— too slow. Gaara couldn't even see Naruto reappear or bear down on him with the Big Ball Rasengan from above… but thankfully his Sand Shield rose up to buffer the blow. The defense was incomplete, Gaara realized, as Naruto plunged downward with momentum and clipped Gaara in the mouth with a rebellious kick.

Tumbling back, the two scuffled for a few ragged breaths, Naruto's Taijutsu superior, painful, and clobbering Gaara even as Sand Armor absorbed Frog Kumite punches. When the Sand Shield closed in to snare Naruto he was gone again in a flash, earning crows of surprise and awe from watching Sand shinobi. Though only for two paltry seconds, they had seen their Kazekage get absolutely pummeled within his own defenses!

Naruto had retreated to the top of the Buddha's head to tap another meditating clone, maintaining his waning Sage Mode, 'Heh! I bet Gaara hated that. He can protect himself if I hit hard or if I move fast, but not when I can do both!'

Oh yes, Gaara had hated it.

He was stock-still, concentrating on raising a vast area of sand that stretched just beyond the effigy but short of the observation deck. He was going to enclose Naruto in a vault to impede further retreats, at least, that's what Naruto thought Gaara was trying to do. Deserting his perch, Naruto charged at Gaara as he exerted himself to raise a wide desert dome. Gaara's defenses would be reasonably lowered at this time, a fact that occurred to Naruto as he came within several meters of his friend, partly aware that was exactly what Gaara wanted. The dome was a sham—it began to rain down in a meteor-shower of Sand Bullets. Naruto flashed out of harm's way and danced around the fusillade.

Then it seemed to Naruto that something in the air was wrong; was not tingling his Sage Senses the way it should have when he was simultaneously knocked askew by a generic Wind Jutsu and into the path of a Sand Bullet. Naruto hurled his anchor knife to flee while making sense of the miscalculation, 'What the—? Gaara's trying to throw me off—!' He had noticed two of Gaara's own Shadow Clones dedicatedly stirring up the area with Wind Jutsu, distorting air flow and whipping up a veritable sandstorm, 'If he's figured out how I can feel things coming at me in Sage Mode, he's going to keep mucking around!'

By then, Naruto was struck twice more due to the same gimmick, and sand bullets accumulated to trap him in a Sand Coffin. Naruto resorted to defaulting back to the rocky outcrop he had marked for the Flying Thunder God technique. He flashed right into a waiting Shadow Clone of Gaara's as it exhaled a Wind Jutsu at him, and Naruto backpedaled in shock as he rushed through hand signs. His Fireball Jutsu ignited the windy breath and turned it back on Gaara's clone, incinerating it as the air cleared of Sand Bullets and debris. *'Gaara's quite the trickster now, I guess… that was close—' A wheeze of air escaped Naruto as the fingers of Shukaku's manifested hand caught him from behind, and shot him like a basketball pass back to the ground.

It was outlandish how far the Biju limb could be extended— long and flexing with pure energy, a cloak that glowed around Gaara as he employed more of Shukaku's strength. The other Tailed-Beast arm came down as Naruto hit the dirt, smashing the young man beneath the sandy paw of the beast. Gaara folded his arms and huffed. Whenever it seemed like he'd caught Naruto, his dear friend kept slipping away with the Hiraishin. What trouble it was to hold him still. Admittedly, Gaara was more surprised to see Naruto hold his ground and lift the Tailed-Beast's heavy hand off of him, pressing up with Sage strength to rise and stand once again.

Wobbling, Naruto dashed away from the limb when he tired, and dissolved his last meditating clone to top off his Sage Chakra.

"Naruto," Gaara issued a warning, "I don't want to hold back. Senjutsu may not be enou—"

Naruto was incredibly ruffled at that point, "Don't think for a second I can't handle you, because I can!" Spittle flew from Naruto's mouth, "Why insult me and go easy on me?"

Maybe it was better to call this off. Gaara had detected that Naruto had clear limits—that Sage Chakra wore off after a few minutes, needed to be replenished (AND Gaara was too noble to tamper with Naruto's hidden clones as they meditated.) Gaara had also seen that Sage strength could lift one of Shukaku's arms, but that, the One-Tail sniggered, was a miniature baby-weight expression of what his true body and power was. To push Naruto further could quite possibly hurt him. If not physically, it would certainly scratch up his friend's pride. Not to mention Jiraiya would be displeased.

But Naruto's eyes were fiery, odd and golden like a toad's, and his mouth drawn into a resolute grimace. He wanted this chance to test himself.

Knowing that, Gaara withdrew his extended, nebulous Tailed-Beast limbs into a glowing chakra cloak. The aura was a blend of black and red, buzzing like static…until Gaara took a slow breath and let go. Anything that divided him from Shukaku at that point dissolved away, mental barriers down, his spirit at peace, and the Tailed-Beast did not take advantage of his trust. He gave Gaara everything he had in a flush of energy so great that a gale rolled over the dunes and whipped watching Sand ninja on the lookout. Naruto shielded his eyes from the gust and observed the aura fine-tune itself into an amber light, ruddy red at the edges.

He could feel it. All of it. The insane density of Biju chakra blaring off of Gaara made Naruto's stomach sink. What was more unsettling was that the volume of chakra had not disoriented the Kazekage or clouded his consciousness—he was lucid and in control. ‘…how? How can he? Why isn't the One-Tail taking him over? I would've been tipped over the edge, stupid-mad and gone by now if that were me…’ Naruto ground his teeth while he thought.

Gaara was on him in an instant, propelled by a new burst of speed—his Sand Armor having shed off completely. Naruto dodged the punch because he could feel it coming, and Gaara's blow shattered apart the rocky outcrop. The two reeled from inertia before turning back to meet with bulldozer blows, punches and blocks aquiver with force, hooking into each other. Sand tufted up in bursts as it was displaced by their stomps and kicks. Naruto slid his palm up Gaara's punching arm for a lock, a muscle-memory move from the bout against Huo that Hinata had shared with him. He dropped his elbow on Gaara's free arm before driving his knee into the Kazekage's stomach…and Gaara tottered for a moment before shaking it off. It had by no means been a weatherable blow, but Naruto refused to be discouraged.

Frog Kumite gave him an incremental advantage as Naruto handily dodged many of Gaara's swipes, paying him back for a few of his careless blows. He had half a mind to point blank mash a Rasengan into Gaara's face, 'Let's see how he likes that!' Naruto dodged another jab and stepped right into the abrupt extension of a chakra-arm from Gaara's cloak. As before, he was batted like a line drive straight into the lookout with a crash, frightening the daylights of spectators.

Naruto's head was ringing. 'Oh. He. Got me good on that one…ow.' His mouth felt dry and his vision spun, 'I jumped into that whack. Ugh. Gaara can transform on a dime, kinda like Fū could...' Slowly, aching, Naruto rolled to his knees on the metal slats of the observation deck as Sand ninja gathered round. How he would've killed to use a combo attack with Gamakichi or Kinji against Gaara, but that option had been ruled out. They had said they would use only their own strength.

"Holy hell! You okay, kid?" A concerned Jounin was clucking at him, "What do you have to fight the Kazekage for? Are you nuts?"

Naruto staggered to his feet and waved off the concern, "Hey, I grew up beating Gaara's ass so this isn't that different..."

"He launched you just now...I mean, you're good! But why push it?" Most present were skeptics.

Something warm was running down the side of Naruto's head. He patted the sore spot and discovered a steady stream of blood. Ah. So this warranted reevaluation. Friendly contests typically excluded head gashes and other bodily damages. He waved at Gaara below to get his attention, "Hey! I'm gonna...call a time out for now."

Gaara held up the fingers of his left hand to count, "One of two we allotted. Alright. Are you injured —?"

"—don't act all concerned when you toss me around like a ragdoll, ya bastard!" Naruto barked and took a cross-legged seat on the lookout. Trying to relax was a chore. There were many sets of eyes on him. His muscles were wound like springs. Sage Chakra was slipping away, and it seemed fair to top himself off while he took a breather.

The wound on his head was rapidly sealing up too, which Naruto had counted on. It was an odd introspective moment as he wondered why he had a propensity for healing that he took for granted. 'Huh. Has it always been me? Is it the Fox? I don't know. It hurt like a bitch, but it won't in a minute...' Naruto frowned to himself, 'Gaara's on another level. He hasn't really fessed up to it when we spoke or wrote letters...but he's so strong I'm just not sure...'

There was a rumble from his subconscious, So you admit defeat?

'I'm not defeated yet, Fox. Anyone worth their salt takes a second to not fuck around with a possible traumatic head injury. Did you see what he did with the One-Tail's arm? What the hell?!

How could I have missed it? That graceless thrashing was an underhanded ambush. Though it would've helped if you didn't walk straight into it!

Below, Gaara stood at the foot of a dune, his arms folded as he glowed. His eyes were shut. Maybe he was conferring with his Tailed-Beast as well? Naruto huffed in annoyance when he stood up, patting his head to find the cut had scabbed over. 'Okay. Now I've got to watch for when he pulls that Bijū-team-up crap. He is a Kage, I get it! Gaara was never a pushover. I might've gotten more practical experience fighting in the wilds, but he said he worked on accepting himself and understanding his Tailed-Beast...'

Naruto hopped over the rail to resume the contest on the ground, still puttering in his thoughts during the last few seconds of the ceasefire, 'I know I've probably...been way too stubborn...and I just can't forgive it all...'

Forgive what? The fox gruffed.

'What you've done. If it weren't for you, I'd still have my parents! You nearly killed Ero-sensei and tried to blow up the Toad Valley while I was incapacitated—'

Why would I ever want your forgiveness for those things? I own what I did!

'Asshole. I…bah! What do you think Gaara had to do to forgive and understand the One-Tail? I don't know how they managed it. I honestly don't think I'll ever…get it.' Naruto felt his stomach twist as he confessed, 'But I think I need your help for this one.'

Ha! Kurama was amused by the entreaty. What do you need ME for? Can't you beat him on your own?

'Well, Gaara's not trying to beat me on his own! He's got assistance!'

And you don't. The Fox sneered.

Naruto exited his internal conference and locked eyes with Gaara, "I'm good to go."

"There is blood all over you…" Guilt crept into Gaara's tone.

"I'll change my shirt after this so I don't offend." Naruto shrugged light-heartedly. Red had also stained golden locks behind his ear, and a patch below on his neck.

"…I—"

"Hey! Don't get all cowed and mopey about bashing me around, you know I don't break easily." He didn't want Gaara to pity him or hold back.

Without further ado, Naruto flashed behind Gaara and successfully anticipated the projection of a huge chakra tail, bounding over it to get a clear shot at the back of Gaara's head. His round kick was lined up perfectly, but Gaara dipped to evade and counter with his own aerial kick. They were airborne for a short scuffle before a blast of sand hurled Naruto back, and Gaara took aim for another Shukaku-tail-swing. It was then Naruto planted his feet and grappled with the chakra appendage, twisting for leverage. In a burst of Sage strength, Naruto hurled Gaara by the tail like a discus.

When Gaara landed lightly, assisted by two radiant chakra arms, Naruto felt the corner of his eye twitch. He dodged a volley of sand bullets and thought, 'He's not really breaking a sweat. It'd be shitty of me to stick a prong seal on his arm to throw Gaara out of balance…but what else can I do?' He rolled and flashed away from a high tail thwack, thinking again for Kurama to hear, 'Maybe he will defeat me, and I've just got to digest that. Heh, but you know what, Fox? Gaara and the One-Tail smashing us tarnishes both of our reputations, doesn't it?'

Don't lump me in with you!

'We're a package deal, like it or not!' Naruto danced closer to his target, sending Shadow Clones ahead of him to create an opening for a Rasengan.

Never in a million years could Shukaku beat me. Never! Kurama insisted, He is beneath me in every way!

The pontificating was cut short when Naruto did connect a Rasengan, which Gaara had to hastily buffer with a Sand Shield…and one of Shukaku's glowing limbs simultaneously reached out to rob Naruto of his tool pouch. More specifically, where his Hiraishin anchor knife was clipped on his belt. In a desperate bid to retrieve it, Naruto charged a second time to make a grab for the tricky chakra appendage. A wave of sand pummeled him in response. Gaara then stowed the anchor knife in his overcoat pocket, stuffed with a nullifying seal to dampen Naruto’s formula.

Tumbling, Naruto took stock of the moment that Sage Mode expired, and also determined he could not teleport to wherever Gaara had the Hiraishin anchor. Naruto sensed that the single Shadow Clone he’d left behind the lookout was still not done gathering Natural Energy. And, another chakra arm was lashing down from Gaara’s cloak, flattening Naruto before he could sidestep the heavy blow.

His senses dimmed. Naruto was somewhat cognizant of the fact that he was pinned and rather oxygen-deprived. He also, for some reason, heard an argument. The Nine-Tailed Fox was railing angrily at someone.

You’re a filthy, single-digit crook looking for vindication! Kurama spat, You infant! You spineless groveler! As if you gain anything by serving a human!

Hee hee! You’re upset. Shukaku was pleased. Naruto realized that this was much like the instance Fū had established contact between Bijū, and created a space for them to communicate.

I’m no servant. Gaara and I help each other because we want to, Shukaku added smugly, Although it is very satisfying to grind you into dust, you fat-bottomed egomaniac.

Ego—? A breathy, infuriated inhale followed, Who ARE YOU called fat-bottomed YOU CORPULENT GREMLIN?!

Gotta have a big ass to fit Nine Tails, Kurama. A gleeful retort, Does the truth hurt? I don't mind that I'm big-boned.

YOU—!

Naruto interrupted, 'Are you kidding me right now? I might be dying or at least I'm being smothered and you're linking up to call each other fat!'

Kurama’s insecurities reached a fever pitch, Keep out of this! He KNOWS he's inferior to me!

Says YOU, the fat Bijū-baby trapped under my fist! Shukaku cackled gleefully, Heh! Gaara and I have this in the bag! You're both way more pathetic than I expected.

For a moment, Naruto had to pray because it felt like Gaara wasn’t at all participating in this pointless quarrel, remaining in the surface world and waiting for something. As if this moment were intended to incense the Nine-Tails and mobilize him in some way. Well, it might've worked. Naruto also might’ve stopped breathing and hallucinated it all. But he did distinctly feel the typical, black crackling chakra of the Nine-Tailed Fox sizzling through him, full of rage and suppressing his will.

'No…can you just…take that back?’ Naruto thought tiredly, 'We can't use that. It makes me stupid. Makes us both stupid and blind. Gaara is himself— you saw. Clear and calm and glowy.'

We should rip their ribs out so I can pick my teeth with them!

'Psh. Great idea.'

Take my chakra now! Crush that insolent—!

'I already told you I won’t!' Naruto pushed back, 'This can't be the only way. You're not listening to me. Listen to me! Work with me! Don’t push me away with that hate. That chakra doesn’t help!'
It grew still as the Fox considered the idea, anger and buzzing energy retreating in increments, Why should I…

'You want to beat them? Me too! Let's actually work together this time.'

Why should I trust you? Why should I reject how I feel?

'Because maybe it'll change something and it won't suck. You don't have to feel like you're in the blackest pit in the universe, I know you can feel other things! I try to. Try not to let the dark stuff swallow me.'

The idea seemed to have stuck. Kurama ventured, If it's just this time…if you don't double-cross me —

'Why would I, idiot?'

You said you can't forgive. The Fox reminded him. And how can I forgive?

'Maybe that is the fucking million Ryo question here! Truce?' Naruto brazenly extended his hand past the bars of Kurama's cell, 'Give me your best self in exchange for mine? If that's too hard, just think of something that doesn't make you feel like a rageful psycho. How about that?'

Moonlight. Kurama said in a small voice.

Perhaps it was a breakthrough, perhaps a fluke, Naruto wasn't sure. He felt an inexplicable reversal, as if the Nine-Tailed Fox had settled into a serene memory that took all of the bristle and bite out of him. And it felt…so familiar. The mutual feeling, whatever it was, soothed Naruto in the same instant. Chakra that Kurama exerted had a cleaner tint to it, almost overbearing in its Yang element, and Naruto made a point not to fuss at or reject what the Biju was suddenly willing to share.

That rising energy lent itself to Naruto popping up, fresh as a daisy, and tossing Gaara and his glowing loaner-arm over to the next dune. Distantly, he could hear Kankuro's voice from the lookout behind him (who had just arrived), bellyaching over Why the hell did they need to do this shit and scare the Sensory Corps with super-chakra levels?

There was a flood rushing through his veins, radiating in a chakra cloak that Naruto knew was still not as pristine as Gaara's. Prickles of anxiety, regret, and desolation still flowed from Kurama, but not at the deafening levels that Naruto had put up with before.

He closed the distance between himself and Gaara, lashing out in a whirlwind of Taijutsu, intent on snatching his stolen anchor knife back. After a flurry of punches, a chakra limb from Gaara's cloak caught Naruto's face in its palm and pushed him back childishly. Gaara clucked for Shukaku to quit messing around. Naruto still needed to get a feel for it after being out of practice with Kyuubi chakra.

'How do I make a chakra arm thingy?' Naruto demanded loudly in his head, 'He keeps grabbing me and I've had enough!'

You need more of my chakra, but I don't know if you can handle it yet—

'—we're gonna find that out!'

Though Kurama did as he was asked and flushed alarming levels of chakra into Naruto's system, he shared his doubts, Whatever you do, don't slide into the gaps…
Naruto joyfully sent a dozen Biju-chakra-bloated Shadow Clones ahead, all with Rasengans charged, to mob Gaara as he heard the Fox muttering about "gaps."

'Gaps between what?' Naruto wondered.

Us, you imbecile. This Seal still divides us. Our feelings, thoughts…many things divide us.

The Kazekage was busy defending himself and walloping the clone cavalry. And just as soon as Kurama had roughly outlined the potential problem while freely loaning his Yang-hued chakra, Naruto felt an anvil of a headache escalate with his stretching chakra supply. Tinnitus zinged his eardrums, blood pressure rocketing, as everything that was still so incompatible between Tailed-Beast and jinchuriki began to physically manifest.

Pay attention! Kurama barked. Naruto ducked beneath one of Gaara's hooking blows while avoiding the cascade of Sand pillars. Though it was only a moment of synchronization, the Fox and Naruto retaliated in unison, thinking of the same counter and thereby bringing the miracle to life—a chakra arm extended off of his own cloak, hand balled into a fist, and clocked Gaara directly in the snoot. Some sand softened the blow as Gaara skidded backwards, but his chin was definitely going to bruise. Naruto was astounded that he'd actually done such a thing. He was also feeling quite bleh.

Wide-eyed and delighted, Gaara regarded Naruto's dizzy steps, bearing the pressure of an expanding, refined chakra cloak. He'd known that his friend could get the hang of it. Practice was still key, of course. Naruto did not have the luxury of Yugito being around to walk him through the steps. But Gaara had hoped that some encouragement from one Tailed-Beast to another might get the Fox's attention. It seemed as if the Kyuubi was too proud to let Naruto lose to what it considered a junior, weaker Tailed-Beast.

Behind them on the lookout, Sand shinobi were quite riveted by the rare spectacle of two jinchuriki exercising control over Tailed-Beast chakra. Apparently, one competitor was alert and poised while the other was a hobbling mess with a half-assed, amber chakra cloak that would blink red in frustration from time to time.

Kurama could not help but backseat fight, Keep your eyes open, keep light on your feet! Naruto, move it!

'Light on my feet?! I feel like I'm gonna puke!'

And to think I didn't even give you all of my chakra…it would've flattened you. We are only two-thirds of the way through my reserves.

'...are you shitting me? The wild abundance of chakra wreaked havoc on his focus, and Naruto could not for the life of him crack through Gaara's steady defense. The rage state crept on the peripheries of Naruto's consciousness, as it only seemed natural for Kurama's influence to stir his darkest feelings. Not gonna lie…I'm a little too woozy for this. But! I've got a plan.

Are you planning to pass out and let me take over this duel?

'No! Restraint ain't your middle name, so forget that!'

Then whatever it is make it happen. I'm not going to lose to these bottom-tier potbellies, are you?! Kurama was a competitive fiend, but in many ways Naruto could relate.

Naruto grinned as he and Gaara met again in an exchange of hand-to-hand blows, sheering dunes apart, and then Naruto feinted left with a Rasengan spinning in his palm. 'Fox, watch this! I'm going to blow your mind!'

I seriously doubt that—

Gaara's priority was stopping the Rasengan, which was what Naruto had been hoping for. Behind the Kazekage, Naruto had snuck his final Shadow Clone (charged with nature chakra and in Sage Mode) up from behind to pickpocket back his pilfered anchor knife. Before Gaara could utter an obscenity and catch the blasted thing, it loosed the tool and flashed to Naruto's side in the same moment Naruto passed off the inflated Rasengan to a chakra arm from his cloak. In those precious seconds Kurama acknowledged he was having his mind blown a little as Naruto loosed the anchor knife back at Gaara, reappearing above him, and crushed the Kazekage beneath a Biju-chakra Rasengan. The ground quaked. Kankuro was howling swears from the observation deck.

Well. Kurama sniffed, trying to play off the brilliant move, His nuisance shield must have caught that…

The Sage Mode Shadow Clone had closed in to drive its own Rasengan down on the crumbling Sand Shield, hammering the dome down into the ground like an abused nail. Such a follow up was borderline gratuitous and Gaara had not even reacted to stop it. The Shadow Clone dissolved in a puff. Afterward, Naruto fretted nearby and hoped he had not seriously injured his friend, That might've been too much…'

I'd say that was just enough. It was sublime.

Naruto restrained a laugh, 'Not what I'd call it, but okay. Wow. Did we just get our shit together?'

There was some hesitation before Kurama conceded, How weirdly satisfying.

From beneath the leveled mesa of sand came a tremble, and as Naruto and Kurama mentally congratulated each other on one small step forward, Naruto looked up in disbelief as Shukaku's true towering form rose up. The sight took him back to Konoha's invasion, when the same bulky beast had revealed itself during Gaara's impairment during the Chunin Exam. This time, however, the debut was intentional. Kurama railed in aggravation inside Naruto's stupefied head.

Before Naruto could come up with a game plan, the hulking Biju lunged at him. Further disconcerting were the confounding physics employed as Shukaku abruptly surrendered control and shrunk back to Gaara's small size, mass and velocity rearranged as Gaara shot down like a comet for a pencil-dive kick that struck Naruto frontside and pulverized him into the ground.

Black out.

Naruto! Are you awake? You're a fading mess— your soul was kicked out of you—! WHAT A DUPLICITOUS MOVE, I'LL CHEW HIS FACE OFF FOR THAT!

The clamoring kind of woke him up, but Naruto could hardly breathe.

That rotund trickster SLOB. I will RUIN HIM!

'Shhh. Please. Oh god, did he kill me?'

Not yet, so let's kill HIM!

"Erg…” Naruto came to and noticed that Gaara had divested him of all weapons this time, not just Naruto's anchor knife. He was dusting his hands.
"Are you ready to surrender?" The Kazekage asked.

"...pff. No. That...was the dirtiest move I have ever seen." Naruto sat up, chakra cloak still glowing as he gurgled in pain.

"It's an original."

"Careful. The Fox wants to chew your face off now. Or he wants me to chew your face off. I dunno, but don't pull that crap again." As Naruto staggered to his feet and dusted sand from his clothes, he wilted at the sight of his defiant friend expanding again to Shukaku's full size just to taunt him.

Naruto groaned as he made an effort to dodge, his head and body still ringing from the impact, but it wasn't long before Shukaku plucked him from the ground like a delicate flower. Pinched between the Tailed-Beast's fingertips, Naruto harnessed what strength he could to wriggle, trying to pry himself free. Eventually, he was imprisoned in a closed fist.

"So stubborn..." Shukaku chortled, "Surrender! We can wait. We've got all day."

"You're asking for it, tubby! You want to throw down with the Fox?"

"I know you won't let him out. With your type of Seal, you probably can't undo it on your own." The One-Tail estimated, "Which makes you a wee little ant lipping off at me."

Naruto thrashed, "Gaara said this was a one versus one kind of fight!"

"Clearly it isn't, since you both used assistance. Weenie whiner."

"What did you just say?!"

And the squabble carried on for a surprisingly long time. Gaara sort of lost count around the one and a half minute mark. On the horizon a small blot appeared, approaching Sunagakure.

Meanwhile, during the fisticuffs outside of the Sand Village's perimeter wall...

Temari's return trip had been pleasant after catching an ocean wind to propel her back over the desert mainland, aloft on her fan. She had told Gaara that she was on an escort detail requested out of the Land of Waves, which was mostly the truth.

She had just neglected to mention that it was Haku who had met her there, and asked to be ferried to Hidden Sand to see his dear friends. She had thought it a welcome surprise, 'So why spoil it? Those two are going to absolutely lose it when they see Haku!' She was smiling to herself, nestled beside her passenger who also appeared to be in high spirits.

"Are you sure Momochi isn't going to pitch a fit while you're gone?" Temari inquired for a third time.

"I'm...relatively sure." Haku sighed, "I agreed to go to the Keiseki House auction, and since I would be travelling northwest anyway...I decided to leave a few days early so I could see Gaara and Naruto." He granted, "Zabuza wasn't thrilled about my idea, but at least he didn't threaten me or anyone in Nanakusa when I said I was going."

"Because maybe he has to trust you'll be back to help out down there. That paranoid snaggletooth." Temari scrunched her nose.

"Right. It wouldn't make sense to go back on the plans we made with Jiraiya-sensei."
"It'll suck to see you leave again," She rested her head on his shoulder, "But I'm glad you took this chance."

Her displays of affection were small and covert these days, but Temari had been handsy since she located him waiting on the porch of her beachside cabin in the Tide Village.

Haku had to admit that he too was beatific and very welcoming to such attentions. He understood when Temari decreed that she was not going to give any indication to her brothers that they were dating again, at least not until Gaara adjusted to Haku being around. That requirement did not impede them, however, on the flight to Suna. Squished together, Haku kept an arm wrapped around her waist, his front pushed into Temari's side as he tried to guess the perfumed scents in her hair. She was humming, eyes gleefully shut, relishing soft kisses along her ear and neck.

The doting stopped abruptly and Haku shifted, trying to squint over the distant dunes as an object came into focus, "Do you see that?"

"See what?" The fan's conductor was alert again, scanning for landmark desert features.

"That." Haku emphasized a dark, shaded mass interrupting an otherwise flat and unremarkable landscape, "I've never been to the Wind Country before, so I don't—"

"No. No, that's not normal." Temari confirmed for him.

The nervy sensation racing up his arms and continuing up the back of his neck assured Haku that he wasn't overreacting. Apart from the distant eminence ahead, the air felt ionized with an excess of chakra. Soaring fast for another one hundred meters, the pair could finally see the definite shape of a Tailed-Beast. Or as Temari correctly identified in a low voice, "Shukaku."

Haku gave his head a shake, "This is…the most aggressive case of déjà vu I have ever experienced."

"You and me both."

Right. Because they had been here before. Not here, in the Wind Country, but Temari and Haku were simultaneously recalling the Invasion of Konoha in which the One-Tail had been unleashed, and together they had flown towards the danger in the hope of freeing Gaara. There was a marked difference this time. Haku blinked hard as he watched the giant tanuki suddenly shrink down in size, and the force of Gaara's drop from mid-air mashed Naruto into a dune with a reckless kick.

A frustrated rumble escaped Haku, "They're fighting! I can't believe it…"

"For the record, I swear they were on friendly terms when I left." Temari vouched for Gaara and Naruto.

"Don't they know better? What if they accidentally hurt nearby villagers, or damaged the city? The two of them!" The young man was bug-eyed as he further concluded, "Did it cross their minds that two tussling jinchuriki could broadcast vulnerability to the Akatsuki? Or informants? Why do I always—?" Haku flexed his fingers, wishing he could slap sense into his friends, "Why do I always have to do this? Their safekeeping shouldn't be my burden alone."

Temari patted his arm, "It's not. Let's remind them not to take for granted all of the people looking out for them, hm?" She too crackled her knuckles, "So they don't pull this shit again."

"What made them—?"

"Probably to spar or test their strength." Temari was reading his mind, filling in the blanks.
"They aren't out of control, are they? Gaara said in his letters that he's reached a sort of equanimity with his Tailed-Beast." Haku wondered.

"Eh...it doesn't look as destructive as it could be." Temari pursed her mouth, trying to gauge why the One-Tail was full size again and trying to pluck Naruto from the ground like a clover, "There's no Nine-Tailed Fox running around, which is a plus. How do you want to break it up?"

"Not the way I had to last time..." Haku thought back to using a tremendous Water Jutsu to get the One-Tail's attention, long ago, "Would you mind flying me overhead? If Gaara is still in control, then he'll hear me. I'll talk him down."

"Are you sure about that?" She arched a brow.

"No. I'd appreciate if you stayed close in case—" He gestured a squashing motion with both of his hands.

"And if that fails and you do get pancaked," Temari hypothesized, "I'll just get a team from the Sealing Corps to neutralize them, then straight-jacket them in a Black Ops padded room. They play bad ASMR recordings in there that Old Lady Chiyo specifically made to punish people."

"That is..." Haku mumbled, "A unique torment."

"Be careful." Temari smiled at him, arcing her fan over the rounded head of the Ichibi.

Haku dropped down and slowed his descent with a surge of his hand fan, cushioning the landing on the sandy, heavy brow of the beast with wind. He hopped down again to the Ichibi's blunt muzzle to stand on its nose. When he waved his tessen in front of the Tailed-Beast's eyes, they rolled to the corners in a cross-eyed stare to get a look at Haku.

"Enough! Shukaku, let go of Naruto!" He snapped the fan shut and pointed it like a regent, "Of all the foolishness to get up to in my absence, Gaara— I'm worn out and I just got here!" Haku opted for yelling directly at his friend, "Cease the antics and do as you're supposed to, as Kazekage!"

The response was immediate, and a sizzle of Biju chakra boiled off of Shukaku as he retreated, pulling in and condensing himself back into Gaara's body. With that matter settled, Haku plummeted and was able to catch Naruto by the wrist, controlling their fall with wind gusts from his fan. Naruto looked particularly disheveled and dazed, the soft glow of a chakra cloak fading away from his body when they touched down to earth.

"Naruto, are you alright?" He patted his friend's cheek, and then let Naruto fold backwards from a sitting position to be completely supine as he gurgled, eyes fluttering shut, desperate for rest. Haku thought to himself, 'How did he get to this state...?'

Then, he glanced over his shoulder to see Gaara standing a few meters away, gaping at Haku and somehow equally mournful over Naruto's debility. He was stonewalled with disbelief. Shocked and a little heartsick, swamped with dozens of questions. Haku had the courtesy to snap the Kazekage out of that funk when he crossed the way to brace Gaara with two hands on his shoulders.

Gaara blinked like a bewildered housecat, "You're here."

"I am. Take a breath. And then tell me—" Haku's tone was gentle but chiding, "What in Heaven and Earth were you thinking? Fighting Naruto like that? Look at him!" He gestured his head back toward their collapsed friend, "He's a mess. You have more sense than this!"

"We agreed...to. It might've..." Doleful and ashamed, Gaara folded his arms behind Haku's back to cement a true hug, and to lower his guard for the first time in ages, "Escalated too much. He didn't want to surrender or let me go easy..."

Haku gave him a squeeze, "That sounds like him. Is Jiraiya-sensei aware?"

"He didn't object when we told him."

"Ah. Then a word with Sensei is also in order. I had business on the mainland and I wanted to see you." Haku's expression grew considerably warm, eyes bright, "I hope my interference didn't—"

"Was more welcome than you can imagine." Gaara visibly relaxed.

"Good! I have today and tomorrow to catch up with you." Haku took a step back, "But first..." He didn't hear the soft patter of swift footfalls when he said, "I want to ensure Naruto isn't badly injured..."

"HAKU!" Naruto had caught him in a running bear hug from behind after waking (mostly fine) and since Haku had not steadied himself for it, the two went face-first into a sand drift beside Gaara.

After the running tackle Gaara blinked slowly again, hoping that this was reality. He was overwrought with emotions; surprise, joy— visceral nostalgia over missing his friend who was several centimeters taller than he, mature and lean in the same ways he and Naruto had grown up.

It was happening. If Temari landing nearby and looking very smug was not confirmation enough, Sand shinobi who had been gathered on the observation deck near the Buddha statue were trotting over to assess the situation. Among them, Kankuro was voicing some complaints.

"Haku—whoa! Sorry! Didn't mean to wail on ya!" Naruto contritely helped his friend up, giddily switching between dusting sand from his friend and hugging him. He pushed Haku in and out by arm's length a few times to reconcile how different he looked.

Gone were the days of soft edges and youth, as Haku's features were now tempered with something sharp and cogent. Looking at him felt like laying eyes on winter's first imposing storm cloud— quiet, drifting, and never to be underestimated.

In spite of that, Haku was still smiling an eyebrow-waggling smile, positively elated. Naruto's excitement was as infectious as it had always been. All of the old feelings, the sensations from when they had last parted, took their places again in the hearts of the young men.

"The both of you should know better than to brawl with Tailed-Beast chakra out in the open like that." Haku reiterated in his mother-hen tone of days past.

"Don't call it a brawl," Naruto wanted the term to be more flexible, "It was an exercise. You know—Gaara was trying to teach me how to handle Bijuu chakra!"

"I really wasn't." Gaara panned the assertion.

Naruto silently mouthed what the fuck? to Gaara as if Haku could not read lips, and Naruto tried to minimize the amount of trouble they were in again, "Well, you can't tell me I didn't learn anything from that mollywhop shit you do with a big Ichibi arm— that was pretty lame—!"

"It can't be called lame since you told me not to hold back—"

Haku raised a hand to halt the soon to be runaway train of bickering. "Fine. No more. If you're quite done here, I'd like some shade and something to drink. It was a hot crossing."
Puppy-like, Naruto brightened again, "How long are you here for?"

"Two days is all that I can spare. Then I have work to do in the Land of Mountains." Haku explained as they moved toward Temari and Kankuro, who were speaking amongst themselves nearby.

"Why didn't Temari tell me she was going to bring you?" Gaara was still stumped.

"She didn't?" Haku looked from the Kazekage to his girlfriend.

Temari shrugged a single shoulder, "Doesn't look like you hated the surprise."

"If you lie about an assignment, how am I supposed to know how to find you if something goes wrong?" Gaara contested as they walked. Kankuro clandestinely rolled his eyes, which Naruto also felt so profoundly in his soul, as Gaara once again set out on his overprotective (little) brother campaign.

"I didn't lie, Gaara. And I told you where I was going." Temari contested.

"And neglected to mention who your client was."

"You didn't question that omission this morning. I could have said Whoever-the-fuck's face from the Tide Village and you would've bought it." And really, Temari was quite right about that.

Then came the part where Gaara got very annoyed and forgot how happy he was that Haku was there, and he fumed in silence in his sister's general direction. Her demands for autonomy and independence were not out of line, but Gaara couldn't help but consider Temari slightly more danger-prone than others after Momochi Zabuza had nearly desanguinated her.

"I for one voted for full transparency. I wanted you to know I was on the way." Haku stood between the two grumbling siblings, "As it worked out, Temari is fine. It wasn't that treacherous of a route."

Kankuro had motioned for the ninja who had occupied the observation deck to leave and resume their regularly scheduled duties. He also threw in his two cents, "Gaara, you can't be mad at Temari for trying to do something nice for you. If her neglecting a mission detail is what you consider stupid, then you stomping around in Shukaku's form beyond the village perimeter was way stupider."

Gaara inhaled to retort, but Naruto interrupted with, "Gotta call it like it is!"

A mutter from Gaara teetered on the edge of defeat, "Naruto. You saw what it was like after Temari was attacked."

"I did, but she made it here fine today. And she has her—" Naruto regarded Haku and Temari from the corner of his eye, and remembered he ought not to out them as a couple, "Uh. Eh-hem. Haku was with her which, you know, benefits pretty much anyone who could possibly ever be in danger in the, uh, you know— platonic way."

The facial expressions of those listening contorted thusly:

Haku: Oh. And there you go talking yourself into a corner again, Naruto.

Temari: Don't be so goddamn obvious. Have you ever been nonchalant in your life?!

Kankuro's small smile of realization: Shit, they're dating aren't they?

Gaara: Platonic. Absolutely platonic.
"Anyway, you'll be fully aware of the next time you see me." Haku salvaged the conversation.

"Do you plan on making time for us in the future during your continued assignment in the Water Country?" Gaara's interest took a turn in the preferable direction.

"I would like to, but I deal in no absolutes. When I have a lead, we have to pursue it as quickly as possible and get information to Jiraiya-sensei. When I have no leads…it feels like we're twiddling our thumbs. So it isn't easy to judge how best to manage my time, especially when..." Haku wilted, "I would much rather see the both of you."

"Hmm." Said Kankuro archly towards the rear of the group, supposing what Haku had meant but not said was "the three of you." No one really paid attention to that input.

"Well if you're waiting on the whatever-it-was auction to start, it was smart for you to come here!" Naruto folded his arms behind his head and then promptly dropped his arms, realizing how sore they were, "Ow. Erg, ow..."

"You usually heal well enough on your own..." Haku recalled as he pressed a healing hand to the back of Naruto's head as they walked, "Though, I don't know the specifics of that ability."

"I'm mostly fine." Naruto guessed, "Overdid it a little. Hey, thanks! You've been practicing healing jutsu a lot?"

"As often as I can."

"You know Hinata-chan's gotten pretty good at it too, for an informal dabbler. Not the way Sakura-chan can, but it's still handy!"

"It is! Oh! How have they been?" The nostalgia was making Haku bubble over.

As Gaara tuned in his ears on the conversation beside him, his frustrations began to ebb. A few steps ahead of him, Kankuro and Temari conversed purely through eye gestures at one another.

Temari's flicking eyes and crinkling nose indicated: Gaara's just wound up. He'll feel better soon with his best friends here.

A pressing look from her middle-younger brother, You're not actually dating one of Gaara's friends right? Like, didn't you swear off of that?

A narrowed, impatient stare, There is no rule that says I can't.

O-kay, I don't know Haku well enough to give an opinion on this, so... Kankuro shrugged silently.

After a very talkative march through the gates of Suna (mostly Haku and Naruto catching up), at the gate's interior there appeared to be a response team of Black-Ops ninja speaking with Baki and Jiraiya. When Gaara's gaggle drew near enough, the masked Commander of Suna's Black-Ops division respectfully stepped up to the Kazekage, "Sir, may I have a word?"

Gaara gave a harried look to his friends before parting from the group to speak quietly with the Commander. Meanwhile, Jiraiya moseyed over with a closed-mouth, furling smile on his face, "Well, well..." He gently nudged Haku and Naruto's shins with his foot, marking how they stood side-by-side, "Long overdue, isn't it?"

"You could say that again." Naruto's eyes scrunched shut in a Foxy grin he just had to let out.
"It's good to see you again, Sensei." Haku was also jubilant and accepted a fond pat on the head from Jiraiya.

"How very nice of you to stop by, Haku. I know you had that auction coming up, so I suspected you'd make the most of a trip to the mainland. Hopefully Zabuza is not running amok while you're gone." Jiraiya wagered, "Most likely not, since he knows what hell I'd rain down on him."

"Ah, right." Haku added, "Though he won't...because I have in my possession a crucial element to his plans. Our truce is a shaky one, but I don't think he'd risk losing the Master Scroll."

Jiraiya shook his head and hand simultaneously, recalibrating, "Wha-what? You? How'd you get your hands on it? Honestly I was skeptical of that goal..."

"What's a Master Scroll?" Naruto wondered.

"I can explain later." Haku assured him, "It's a bit crowded here..." His eyes skirted back to Gaara, who had finished a hushed discussion with the Commander. The Kazekage returned to his jumbled family/friend group.

"I have a few other matters to attend to. I'd prefer it if you both stayed at my home until then—Kankuro will escort you." Gaara looked from Haku and Naruto to Jiraiya, "Go with them?"

"Yeah, yeah. Don't worry so much." Jiraiya waved a nonchalant hand, "I have some updates to write for Tsunade today, so I'll stick around."

"Good." Gaara rested a hand on the side of Naruto's head, where the gash had once been, "I'm sorry. Maybe I shouldn't have pushed you the way I did."

A shrug, "It was kind of awesome."

Gaara wrestled a smile, "It was. I won't be able to do much to show you how to interact with your Tailed-Beast, at least not until you've come to understand each other more."

"Well, it was sloppy, but we sort of figured something out...so I won't be as close-minded as I was. I'll keep working on it...I know I have to." Naruto confirmed, "And I think the Fox knows it too."

"He does." Something in Gaara's face suggested he might have peeked into the subconscious conversation between Shukaku and Kurama after all.

"Did you get in trouble for that stunt? The Commander doesn't usually step into broad daylight to speak to you. I'm guessing he wasn't thrilled about mountains of chakra and liability wrestling outside of the village?" Temari ventured.

"He was...appraising me on best practices. I don't disagree with him." On that note Gaara added, "Temari, I want you to join me in a debriefing with Chiyo-sama. She has some thoughts on our investigation we need to discuss, and I guess I should mention the video to her too..."

"A video?"

The only person who seemed to light up at the thought of the recording was Naruto, but Gaara delayed the explanation. He assured his friends that he would be home as soon as he concluded his responsibilities, and Temari made no fuss as she dutifully accompanied the Kazekage for a meeting with the village's elderly puppet master. Kankuro ushered the remainder of the group along, "I'm thinking I need to pick up a few extra things for dinner. Never counted on the extra company..."
"Sorry for the short notice." Haku apologized, "My visit wasn't supposed to be short notice."

"Temari has her own definition of what notice is, and at what intervals it's acceptable."

"Accurate." Haku could certify that.

There was a small market on the way, so the gaggle stopped there briefly for Kankuro's additional dinnertime ingredients, and they then proceeded to the Kazekage's mansion. Once through the door's threshold, Jiraiya automatically reached for his pipe pouch, but Kankuro spun a plastic bag in his face to halt him, "Nuh-uh! Not in here, Toad Sage. Gaara's office is one thing, but our house is smoke free. End of discussion."

"Not even if I sit by a window?" Jiraiya playfully pushed his luck.

"Put it to you this way: if you accidentally burn our house down, or give us lung cancer, can all of your book royalties pay for that?" Kankuro inquired.

Naruto leaned into Haku and whispered, "He's savage. I'm really starting to love him." Haku nodded discreetly.

Jiraiya put his pipe away and announced, "Dibs on the couch."

"You two." Kankuro gestured to Haku and Naruto before they settled in to relax, "I'll bet you want to catch up, but no freeloading is allowed. Help me cook this. It's gonna be a big meal."

There was no dissent with the request because, as it turned out, Haku was already an avid cook dating back to his single-digit years and Naruto was a sous-chef in the making. They agreed cheerily and left Jiraiya in the sitting room to half-nap, half-compose his correspondence to the Hokage.

Sleeves rolled up, hands were washed, and Kankuro commenced his directions. Meanwhile, Naruto asked of Haku, "So what's it like being totally independent of a village? Is it nice to come back to something familiar?"

"Of course it is. For one thing, not every person and lonely street corner is suspect. I can't let my guard down when ambushes are so routine. Even Nanakusa isn't very safe." Haku halved mushrooms with a knife, hardly thinking about the task, "And I've wanted to take a break for so long...to not have to think about the people who've come to depend on me there, or being on the front line of threats."

"Signing up to be a spy doesn't give you much opportunity to take a break from that, no?" Kankuro supposed while mixing premade dashi with a bowl of other liquids.

Haku looked sidelong to Naruto, who was concentrating on slicing salmon into perfect filets, and then said, "I had a good reason to take on the role."

Kankuro was smiling to himself, "I know you did."

"But when it's all over, and we've got a solid counterattack effort in place for the Akatsuki, what do you want to do instead?" Naruto wondered, "You said you wanted to settle down, but you still need to make money. Gaara said he's already thinking about retiring and moving back to Leaf someday."

"Gaara said that?" Kankuro warbled, "He'd go back to Leaf?"

"He's thinking about it. But really, he's never going to completely move his business out of Sand is he? He'd be like a commuter. Hm." Naruto thought out loud, "Gaara should invest in one of those rail lines or something to make moving between villages easier. Crossing to Sand from Leaf gets old fast."

"Pff. He has other things to think about. Retirement! He's too young and strong to talk retirement!" Kankuro protested as he worked.

"Retirement sounds nice." Haku agreed sunnily.

"We've still got so much work to do." Naruto pointed out.

"We do, but there's no harm in planning ahead. I suppose it'd be easy for me to join the Medical Corps, or join an Advisory Council to lend expertise on Water Country affairs."

"You can make a living from either of those!" Naruto chirped. He'd moved on to other vegetables in need of chopping.

"I would probably…stay in Suna, though." Haku imagined in a soft voice.

Kankuro stilled at the stove, and Naruto's chopping knife froze. He stared in disbelief, "Would you really?"

Haku nodded, "To be with Temari."

Kankuro sighed heavily and dropped his shoulders; though not disapproving of the romance, he did not foresee the future of his sister's relationship working out so splendidly.

"That sucks. I mean, for me. Because I'd want to see you. And I haven't been able to in so long."

"That sort of relocation would have to be sanctioned by the Hokage, and there's no guarantee Tsunade-sama would allow it. In her eyes, I've been working in Suna all of this time. I'm sure it would be a test of her patience. The only other way I could think of is…" Haku trailed off, because if he said such hopeful things aloud he was sure to doom them.

Naruto decided, "I am going to actively not stress about it. And I'll assume you'll be hanging around with me in Leaf as I hustle in the Sealing Corps and get my Tailed-Beast-stuff figured out."

"That sounds perfectly reasonable. And as you said, I also hope there is investment in fast-transport between Leaf and Sand." Haku concurred with Naruto's earlier imaginings.

"You're both overlooking the major possibility of there being no peace or stability in the coming years." Kankuro brought them back to earth, "Assume that's what will happen. There won't be any rest, or travel, or corps work, or settling down. You'll be conscripted to fight all of the time, if it's war."

"A war." Naruto repeated hollowly.

"You weren't there in the Tide Village…to see what I saw." Kankuro turned his back on a simmering sauce to look at them, "Our best laid plans are going to be waylaid by this— by the conflict with the Akatsuki."

"We can stop them." Haku was insistent.

Kankuro shook his head, "On one front, maybe on two fronts, we can stall them…but they have eyes and ears everywhere. They're watching every village and needling weaknesses. When the time is right, they strike, and it'll be hard to anticipate their movements even though there's an active spy network trying to keep on top of them. Even Obito got his ass beat by Pein, and he's one of the greatest ninja I've ever met."

"Jiraiya-sensei mentioned that spy." Haku acknowledged, "He said Obito was a sensitive asset."

Kankuro carried on with the topic, "That's because he's—"

"Wait, wait, wait— I didn't actually fill Haku in on this yet!" Naruto interrupted, "I meant to, but uh, I don't know if Ero-sensei explained—"

Haku arched an eyebrow, "Explained what?"

"That Obito is an Uchiha, from the Hidden Leaf Village." Kankuro loosed the truth like a wrecking ball, "And he's been a spy for Jiraiya for a hell of a long time."

Slowly, Haku pushed away a cutting board with various piles of vegetables, staring unseeing at the wall of the kitchen as he thought back to childhood— witnessing the aftermath of the Uchiha Massacre. It had left a deep and frightful impression on him as a newly settled refugee in Hidden Leaf; knowing that a respected and powerful clan could be gone in a single night. And now there was talk of another older, independent Uchiha whose primary concern was thwarting the Akatsuki? It was going to take a moment to digest the idea. It was both heartening and terrifying.

"Way to go..." Naruto muttered to Kankuro, handing off fish fillets to be baked.

"What? He might as well know what you, Gaara, Temari, and the Old Perv and I know. None of us are going to mishandle such delicate information." Kankuro reasoned.

"...if there is such a person...who's so reliable and respected..." Haku was thoughtful on the matter, "He's taking the Akatsuki very seriously as a Leaf ninja, and so should we. With that said, I can't help but wonder how he feels about what happened to the Uchiha clan. Something like that would be incredibly distressing, if I were in his position..."

"He...doesn't know about it." Naruto muttered, drawing two sets of anxious eyes.

Kankuro shook his head, frazzled, "He doesn't? I was talking to Obito in Tide, and he said that his clan doesn't know he's alive. So which is it? One or the other?"

"Both." Naruto supposed, "Ero-sensei told me he's been keeping it a secret— what happened to the Uchiha clan. But, it sounded like Obito ended up stuck outside of Konoha a long time ago...so he just...missed it all."

"There is tremendous risk in employing someone who isn't privy to such awful information. His sentiments about Hidden Leaf might change, or his prioritization of the Akatsuki may fall by the wayside if he chooses to hunt for the perpetrator of his clan's demise: Uchiha Itachi. Look to Sasuke for an example." Haku outlined the frailty of the arrangement, "If Jiraiya-sensei lied about something like that for so long—"

Naruto tried to interrupt in a soft hiss, "—he wasn't lying, he—!"

"A relationship with such an important spy can dissolve instantly. He'd be within his rights to sever all ties, if he were angry enough. Think about it." Haku's reasoning earned a few troubled nods, "What foolishness. Sensei was right about Obito being a sensitive asset, but he could have compromised the trust this man has put in us and the Leaf Village. It could all fall apart."
"Okay. I get why you're saying that, but I've met him." Naruto countered, "And he's not a fucking asshat like Sasuke was. Obito is a real grown-up who can think things through, even when times are hard. My Dad was his Sensei, so I've got to endorse what values he holds as a shinobi. Plus, he's a good dad—I've met his kid, a cute kid! Even if he's upset and learns about what happened to his clan, would he really toss everything else aside and forget about a child who's depending on him? No way."

"Hmm." Kankuro considered it, "Probably not."

"Then there's that." Haku conceded, pointing his hand in Naruto's direction, "His priorities may realign, but perhaps not in a drastic or damaging way. All the same, honesty is key. Things will have to change."

"Tell your Sensei that." Kankuro advised with a smirk.

Naruto and Haku sighed simultaneously. Jiraiya just couldn't make things simple.

"Good. At least that may not work out as catastrophically as it could, if our estimations are accurate," Kankuro had the fish baking and was dropping diced vegetables to simmer in an aromatic broth, "But I can't forget what Obito said, about what the Akatsuki may be trying to do."

"Take Biju away from the great villages, and any other village that has one." Naruto stated it as if it were so straightforward.

"But why?" Kankuro pressed him, "Have you thought that much about it?"

"They could organize their own state, with that much power." Haku dabbled in the hypothetical.

"Why would they bother?" Kankuro scoffed, "None of our villages would be a match, by then. It's more likely they'd impose a direct rule over every village and reorganize things. That's an optimistic scenario..." He closed the lid on a pot, "But I think what Obito said is closer to the mark: they might have someone in mind...someone they want to make into a jinchuriki for all of the Tailed-Beasts."

Naruto leapt from his seat, "That's just—! THAT— It's fucking insane! One is hard enough to handle! Who'd wanna subject themselves to that pressure?"

Kankuro stewed on the same thought as he gathered table settings. While Naruto muttered about the absurdity of such a theory, Haku spoke quietly again.

"Let's be rational. Why would Obito draw such a conclusion? He's the spy who works most closely with the Akatsuki, isn't that right? Then his intuition is valuable. By that measure, we need to consider how such a goal is achievable. The level of Sealing technique required for such a thing...is unimaginable. I couldn't contemplate a combined effort of all experts in every village sealing such a volume of Biju chakra into one person. If the Akatsuki indeed intends to do that, then we have to assume they have the physical capability to do so. What does this mean?" He inferred in a grave tone, "That we are dealing with an enemy who wields a power that is inestimable; not typical to most shinobi alive."

"No fucking shit." Naruto agreed breathlessly.

"Furthermore, a power like this would not have gone unnoticed in any of the Great Villages. We can guess that such a person has deliberately concealed his or her identity, and stayed on the fringes of shinobi nations. This individual will have enough knowledge to select and attack targets, to execute plans...but this individual does not reveal much about him or herself to avoid any village detecting a rogue threat. Of course, such a person needs to delegate certain efforts to others, hence the creation..." of the Akatsuki." Haku rambled in his assertions, "Akatsuki members willingly support this mystery organizer. Is it a leader's charisma, or coercion? Is it camaraderie? Fear? Why would subordinates agree with such a goal? Do they hold any stake in the future they have planned?"

"This is seriously…some fucked up conjecture for kitchen-talk." Kankuro admitted, "I mean, yeah, it makes sense for the one responsible for that end-game to be an unknown. But how can that be? How is it possible for someone to escape notice like that? I just don't get it! How can you be that powerful, but no one is aware?"

"Kinda stands to reason…" Naruto disagreed, "That someone's gotta be aware. Like, is it that Pein guy everyone talks about?"

"I really don't know. He was strong and frightening, but he wasn't a god." Kankuro recalled, "We knew how to beat him. We figured it out. Hell—Obito hit him in the head with a shovel, okay? And it worked."

Naruto laughed nervously at the visual.

"Maybe it is. Maybe it isn't…" Haku rubbed his chin, frowning.

Naruto helped set his end of the table before taking a seat, leaning on his elbows to stare at Haku, "You've seen some shit, haven't you?"

"I have. I was near the Mist Village recently, and I am aware that the Akatsuki controls it by way of a shadow regime. Authority has been completely corrupted there and holds the village hostage." Haku explained, "And Honesuki-sama…told me something…"

The name rang a vague bell for Kankuro, who had a running list of famous foreign ninja in the back of his mind, "Who's that again—?"

"She said that on a few occasions an individual named Tasū appeared to suppress uprisings and give orders to the regime. He keeps his identity a secret and prefers to use an alias. To her knowledge, he had no affiliation with Mist or an enemy village. Though his involvement with the Akatsuki was unquestionable. So, is this a subordinate who, unlike other Akatsuki members, is not a defector or bingo-book criminal? Could it be the unknown?"

"We could be completely off-base about all of this." Kankuro reminded him, "Might as well set up a cork board, tacks, and some string to link all of our evidence before we make further assumptions."

"Even if we're wrong about the goal, it's still sketchy that a complete rando is suppressing a whole village." Naruto acknowledged, "The other Akatsuki members don't really hide who they are, right? This matters. Did you tell Ero-sensei about that? About the "many" guy?"

"I meant to." Haku recalled squirrelishly, scratching his cheek.

"It's makin' me nervous." Naruto mumbled.

"It should. The prospect is daunting, and like I said, if we've got our hands full with an enemy like that—" Kankuro reiterated, "We are going to war. I'm not talking just the handful of concerned folks who repudiate the Akatsuki. I'm talking every village. A huge force needs to intervene in one burst. Or we're dead."

"How would we…ever get village leaders to believe any of this?" Haku's voice was faint.

"Tch. One of Pein's incarnations would make a believer out of any of them." Kankuro grumbled.
"Well…Gaara said it's going to be hard to convince other Kages. They believe what they want to believe, and they're reluctant to put their asses on the front line." Naruto recalled.

"Sounds about right." Kankuro was checking on his simmering vegetables.

"But then we got that video earlier today." Naruto perked up as he recalled the delivery.

"Yeah, Gaara mentioned that…" The puppet master glanced over his shoulder, hoping for an explanation.

Haku also gave Naruto his undivided attention, and the blonde man took a deep breath before stating, "If the leaders of the great villages don't wanna wrap their heads around this…we have options."

"Oh no." Haku smiled a small, concerned smile, waiting for the other shoe to drop.

"So…Yugito and B in the Cloud Village, the shinobi who have the Two and Eight-Tails…sent Gaara a weird video tape that we watched today…"

Kankuro's disbelief sputtered in the background, "—! How was that not processed by the Intel Corps? What the—"

"AND," Naruto went on, "They said we need to be prepared. In case our villages are unwilling to respond, at least jinchuriki should be willing to work together! If there's a threat that wants to combine all Tailed-Beast chakra, why not combine ourselves as a group? See?"

"How perfectly reckless." Haku said, but he was nodding and totally getting it.

"Oh come on! You saw what Gaara could do, since he's got his Tailed-Beast relationship figured out, and those older jinchuriki— Yugito and B, have got it down! And Fū does too! And I'm working on it." Naruto championed the idea, "What I'm saying is that our best defense might be a planned and organized offense."

"You are using two words I respond very strongly to." Haku cupped his chin, zeroing-in on the words planned and organized.

"Pfft. Okay." Kankuro moved the hotpot to a small butane burner on the table to maintain the heat, "If you all team up without the permission of village leaders, the Akatsuki won't be your biggest problem. You'll all be court-martialed for treason and insubordination. That could mean prison time and being stripped of your shinobi credentials. Or worse."

"However," Haku chimed in, "A backup plan could save countless lives. Naturally, no one wants to disobey village leadership, least of all jinchuriki looking out for their homes. If Kage or other decision-making bodies stymie efforts to respond to the Akatsuki, and other villages are attacked… are you saying there's no merit to a force of jinchuriki reaching an accord to act in the best interest of their villages?"

"In lieu of a Kage's mandate? That's still treason." Kankuro had since moved on to scooping rice into bowls.

"Look, it's not our number one option." Naruto conceded, "But I've got to believe that working together is a smart fallback, since, you know, those Akatsuki shitheads have no problem combining forces."

Kankuro was amused, "Heh, well, let's see what the Toad Sage has to say. I don't think he'd support a coalition of jinchuriki jeopardizing themselves, or possibly subverting orders from their village leadership in order to form a crackpot team."

In an attempt to dismiss the poo-pooing of the jinchuriki team idea, Naruto gestured to the waiting meal on the table, "Are we going to eat, or what? This is some heavy stuff to discuss, so I say we change the subject before we sit down for a meal. Gaara and Temari are going to be here soon, right?"

Before Kankuro could share his estimate aloud, Haku, nearest to the dining room's doorway, heard a scuffle of returning siblings at the front door of the house echoing, "I think that's them now…"

"As I thought. Okay, for now, case closed." Naruto commanded.

"Are you trying to sound like my Dad? Because you're getting pretty close to his level of frantic evasion. If memory serves from my childhood…" Kankuro had entered a perpetual state of snarkiness that was eerily reminiscent of Gaara's behavior. Naruto noted the phenomenon.

The flow of traffic from the innards of the house scooped up Jiraiya (who had mostly been dozing) and transported the Sage, along with Gaara and Temari, into the dining area where the others were waiting. Most of Gaara's muted complaints about the day's work and criticisms fell on deaf ears as the family settled at the table.

"Where's Matsuri?" Kankuro asked as he took a headcount.

"When I saw her after the briefing, she told me was going out with a few friends tonight for dinner and the cinema. And I told her to make them pay for her, since kids in this village have been such asses toward her until now." Temari pulled up a chair, "She'll be home later."

Haku then mentioned as Jiraiya sat beside him, that he had a few new details to share based on reconnaissance in the Land of Water. He didn't want to outright drop the bombshell that he may have a rough idea of who was coordinating the Akatsuki's efforts, and what the group's overarching goal could be.

Kankuro returned with two extra seats for himself and Naruto, who squished themselves at the end of the crowded table. It turned out to be a charming ritual, for none of them were used to dining with so many companions and it was, as Naruto put it, pretty fun. When Naruto and Gaara once again brought up the proposition made by the two jinchuriki of the Cloud Village, Jiraiya listened as he spooned sukiyaki broth and vegetables into his bowl.

"I've already drafted a request for the Raikage, and by tomorrow I expect to have something written tomorrow for the Tsuchikage and the leader of Hidden Waterfall, Shibuki." Gaara explained, "I hope they'll see the value in a cooperative effort, even if they want something temporary as opposed to formal alliances. Jinchuriki that are prepared and unified with their villages backing them are going to greatly impede the Akatsuki's strategies."

"Hm." Jiraiya took a noisy sip of broth, "Hidden Waterfall, eh? That's the Seven-Tails."

"Yes, she resides there." Gaara confirmed.

"They'll be quite open to suggestions, I'm sure. Waterfall can use the extra protection. As for Iwagakure…they've already lost one jinchuriki, so I don't know what Ōnoki-sama plans to do to protect the Five-Tails. And the Raikage…" Jiraiya sighed heavily, "Is famously stubborn."

"I know." Gaara concurred flatly, "At least he responds to me. Sometimes he doesn't even grace Tsunade-sama with replies when she communicates with him."
Naruto made an agitated sound at the thought of anyone disrespecting Tsunade while Temari chimed in, "Why would the Raikage keep alienating the Hokage at a time like this? If she's extending an olive branch despite all those past grudges, is he just too dumb to accept it?"

"I don't think that he's dumb, but I do think that A-sama would prefer Kumo having a position to leverage its power against Konoha again. For example: he might like helping Leaf better if Naruto were kidnapped by the Akatsuki, say, to send Cloud's forces to aid in a rescue or counter the Akatsuki. That nets Cloud a weakened rival village and more bargaining power for future agreements, and also the combined effort is intended to beat back a worrisome enemy of the Cloud Village: the Akatsuki. So yes, he's probably waiting for a crisis. What can he gain by proactively striking deals?" Jiraiya put it into perspective.

"Jerk." Naruto grumbled.

Gaara added while chewing sauced beef, "I get the impression that is exactly what he's waiting for. But it shouldn't be about what he can gain. The Raikage ought to think of what might be lost."

"What about the Tsuchikage, then?" Kankuro wondered.

"Ehh…he's not much better." Jiraiya shared his time-tested opinion.

"Quite a hostile environment for Kage who want to get anything done." Temari griped.

"Okay…so if Leaf and Sand are friendly, and Cloud and Rock are friendly…and Sand is neutral to the other two but Leaf is kinda…" Naruto made a sour face, "Then another representative can help talk things out. Like the Mist Village—"

"The Mizukage is dead as a puppet struts around in his place." Haku reminded him.

"Yeah, but you and your rebel posse are working on prying the Akatsuki out of there, and then someone decent can take over, right?" Naruto restated the general idea, "Who are the contenders and do you think they can negotiate with other village leaders?"

"Well…” Haku looked up at the ceiling briefly to think about it, "To my knowledge, the most likely contenders for the position of Mizukage after a coup in Hidden Mist…are Terumi Mei and Momochi Zabuza."

Temari laughed viciously after hearing that.

Haku cleared his throat to quiet her and went on, "I have never met Mei and only know so much about her, but she is favorable. She possesses two Kekkei Genkai, is said to be ethically upright, a sort of folk-heroine throughout the land. As for how much clout she has with inter-village dignitaries…it can't be very much. But if she has a good personality, she can make an impression with the other Kage." He sipped his tea and compared, "If Zabuza were preferred by councils in Mist, and I don't know if that will happen…his ethics are slowly recovering. He will be more concerned about the internal welfare of Hidden Mist than external threats, although he has much knowledge about the Akatsuki and its connections. He might be a better negotiator at a Kage Summit…but he would be deeply disliked by citizens and shinobi who continue to associate him with the Demon of the Hidden Mist persona."

"Either way," Jiraiya interrupted, "There isn't much time. If Mist isn't back on its feet soon, there's no point in waiting on it to join talks with other Kage. The great villages will have to sort out their issues on their own."

Gaara nodded in total agreement.
"Seems like it." Naruto yielded.

Temari motioned for Naruto to pass an untouched bottle of sake, "Would you mind?"

Naruto handed off the bottle to her, and the woman wordlessly offered a drink to Jiraiya in an effort to not be rude. The Sage shook his head, "No thanks. I've been reducing my intake these past few weeks and I think it's for the best."

"That's admirable, Gama-sennin. This is just a hard topic for me to listen in on while sober." She admitted while pouring, "Kankuro, want some? Haku?"

Gaara snapped out of his deep thought processes again when he heard his sister address Haku, "You're going to exclude others at this table?"

"Gaara, you don't drink." Temari was not amused, "And Naruto, I didn't think you were interested since this was sitting right beside you."

"No, no. You're right." He confirmed while slurping noodles.

Both Kankuro and Haku did accept pours from the bottle while Temari and Gaara engaged in a vexing stare-off from opposite sides of the table. Jiraiya, who was the oldest peacemaker around for miles, waggled his chopsticks at Gaara, "You are making my dinner unnecessarily tense with your over-inflated brotherly responses. Sit back and eat, Gaara."

Jiraiya sort of knew the tension had something to do with Haku and that, perhaps, Gaara did not like these subtle indicators that Temari was displaying a preference for him. Haku had a remarkable poker face, though. He sat there eating and conversing with Naruto as if none of this was happening. As if he hadn't a clue how Temari and Gaara were feeling. 'But of course he knows he's at the center of their tug-of-war and Haku's not thrilled about it.' Jiraiya thought to himself.

The youngsters seemed to settle down when Naruto recaptured the conversation, and discussed the plans he had for when he returned to Konoha. Haku was tickled by the idea of Naruto joining the Sealing Corps, though Jiraiya cautioned that administration would most likely give Naruto a hard time during an entry interview.

"Whatever you do," Jiraiya warned him, "Don't let them trip you up and make you lose your temper. They're going to push your buttons on purpose during an interview. Sealing Corps members are required to keep a level head so that they can act during emergency situations." He added before a bite of salmon, "And they will be particularly rude to you, Naruto, since they're aware that you are a jinchuriki."

"Aren't there anti-discrimination and equal opportunity laws to prevent that sort of crap?" Naruto grumbled.

"Yeah, but good luck getting a legal team to take the case. It's not fair that the deck is stacked the way it is, or that you'll have to work harder to get your foot in the door while others cruise on in," Jiraiya explained, "But you can do it. I know you can, because I've seen what happens when you set your mind on something." The man boasted to the rest of the table, "Do you all know that Naruto set the record for becoming a Sage in the least amount of training time? No one has accomplished what he has at the same rate."

That got them going. A positive mood was restored to the table, and Gaara and Haku twittered praises over Naruto's remarkable feat. When the meal concluded, Kankuro and Temari generously waved off the other dinner guests to relax while they cleaned up. Kankuro settled at the sink to scrub a mountain of dishes and bowls while his sister frittered around, boxing up what scraps remained. The young man glanced over his shoulder a few times, curious about Temari's recent decisions and the subtle changes he'd perceived in his elder sibling. She was light-footed and efficient, wiping the table down, pleasantly quiet.

"So, is this it?" Kankuro wondered.

She looked back at him, "Is what it?"

"Are you gonna settle? It seems like you've made up your mind." Kankuro elaborated, "About Haku."

"I…" Temari waffled for a moment before retorting, "Kankuro, just mind your own business, alright?"

He laughed softly, "It's okay, you know. He's an improvement over the previous five."

Her sigh carried a hint of relief in it.

"Don't forget that I'm taking some time off tomorrow. I've got a few things to get done in the morning, then I am free and clear." Kankuro reminded his sister, "But if you need anything…"

"I'm not going to bug you on your day off." She couldn't help a smile as she moved to dry the mounting stack of cleaned cookware beside him.

As the dark of evening settled on the house, Temari exited the kitchen and stretched her arms above her head, listening for the echoes of where houseguests had ended up in the mansion. It sounded as though Gaara had taken his friends upstairs, and Jiraiya must have settled down in a guest room for the night. Also, she could hear scratching at the front door. It reminded her of the rare begging scratches neighborhood dogs attempted, and she crossed the living area to go shoo the beast, Maybe it smelled leftovers… And when she leveled her face with the crack of the door, she saw Haku's white rabbit sitting patiently.

"Oh!" She opened up to allow Pua in, "Did we forget about you? Shoot. Haku says if you aren't fed you thieve like an unstoppable monster."

"Ramen." Pua confirmed, hopping into the house.

Temari watched in bemusement as the white rabbit tracked across the floor and stopped at Haku's travel bag, sitting forgotten beside a console table. Pua took the bag's zipper in her teeth and tried to tug it open.

"Uh, hold on a second there…" Temari pulled open the pouch so that the animal could munch on timothy hay Haku kept for her, "Good girl. Do me a favor and don't eat anything else in the house, alright? I've heard about your appetite."

Pua just stared up at her with big, glassy eyes, nose a-wiggle as she chewed, and Temari sighed. That look made no promises.

"Just give him a 'sec." Naruto motioned for Gaara to sit down.

Gaara said as he sank down on the edge of his bed, "You did it too…"

"Yeah. It's a gigantic, old house. Of course Haku's gotta go look at all the rooms for the ooh and aah show." Naruto was cross-legged on an area rug, smiley and content.

"I guess I just don't feel as fascinated by this place since…" Gaara supposed in a softer voice, "Sad things happened here."

"I'm sorry you feel that way…but for us it's something cool. To us it's exciting that this is your old and your new home, technically, like—we get to see this other side of you." Naruto tried to give it a positive spin.

When Haku returned he asked, "Whose room is that with all of the sea glass and shells on display? That's something."

"Matsuri's. She collects more with each visit to the Tide Village." Gaara plopped flat to his back to relax.

"Huh. I should do that too, when I'm there again. What a beautiful effect." Haku sat at the foot of the bed, cupping his chin, "The rest of the house…sort of lacks character and warmth."

"It was my father's house." Gaara snorted.

Soft noises of understanding echoed from Naruto and Haku, who took the simple statement as the overarching explanation of why Gaara could never fully appreciate his birthplace. While Naruto lounged on the floor, patting his full stomach and yawning, Haku glanced around and drank in the details of the room. Gaara watched as Haku reached to an adjacent desk and lifted an inconspicuous scroll up. How typical—since time immemorial, there never was a scroll that did not attract Haku's curiosity.

And so Haku predictably asked, "What's this, Gaara?"

"A classified communiqué full of unpleasant things that I cannot ignore." Gaara told him as Haku was part of the way through unwinding the parchment, but froze at the word classified, "Go ahead and read it. I don't intend to keep anything from you and Naruto."

"Is this a report from Konoha?" Haku vaguely recognized it as his eyes scanned the text.

"It is. Some recent trouble that is non-Akatsuki related…near as far as we can tell."

"An attack…wait." Haku frowned, "What is a Tao Art?"

"Oooooh—" Naruto sat up and looked to Gaara, "Can I answer this one?"

Gaara shrugged with his face, mashing his pillows to get more comfortable.

Haku gave Naruto his attention as the explanation began, "Tao Arts are…not Ninjutsu."

When a silence persisted for a few seconds, Gaara decided to interrupt it with a patronizing slow clap to applaud Naruto's assessment.

"Fucking stop that." Naruto groused, "I wasn't finished! What was I saying? Oh. So, I've seen a couple…well, Hinata saw a guy using Tao Arts while I was overlayed with her, when she used her ability to link with me; you know I told you about—?"

"Yes, yes—when was this, Naruto?"

"At the most recent Chunin Exam in Hidden Leaf. The semi-finalist was a ninja from Hidden Rock…he had these abilities that didn't need Hand Seals or have the same kinds of limits that our jutsu do. They were different…like they were a part of him, expressed at-will or whathaveyou…"

Naruto recounted the experience and it even got Gaara's attention, "He could still use Ninjutsu, sure, but the Tao Arts were way obvious, just—not the same. Ninja Arts can't counter them…we were lucky to be quick enough to get the jump on him, and he was tired…"

"His name was Huo." Gaara added, for Haku's benefit, "He is mentioned in the report as an escaped detainee…and he most likely rejoined the band of terrorists he was working for. As I too watched Huo's fights at the Exam…I can say that he is not to be taken lightly."

"Terrorists?" Haku crinkled the scroll in his hands.

"A rogue group headed by Dintei Bihokokuni. They splintered from Iwagakure after refusing to answer for their war crimes before the Tsuchikage…and are deliberately trying to sabotage Leaf and Rock…We have wondered if they could be partnering with the Akatsuki for certain endeavors. Tsunade-sama and I have been trying to determine just how involved these groups may be with each other, and what sort of intelligence may have been leaked to the Akatsuki in light of a recent ambush in the Leaf Village." Gaara pulled another pillow to his chest and hugged it. "As if we needed another enemy to think about."

Setting the report aside, Haku tenderly rubbed his temples and shut his eyes while supposing, "I never gave a thought to those who may willingly aid the Akatsuki."

"It fucking sucks." Naruto agreed from the floor, "You know that Ero-sensei and I ran into him once? That Bi guy?" He drew Gaara and Haku's flabbergasted stares as he went on, "He hated my guts—mistook me for my Dad. But he didn't want to mess with Ero-sensei…though I think he seriously thought about it. We were just travelling, minding our own business when he showed up out of nowhere…but I guess that's because they move through shadows with their Tao Arts."

"Through shadows?" Haku repeated incredulously, "How can they be tracked, then?"

"With a terrible amount of effort Black Ops units have been able to trace their whereabouts, but you can understand why pinpointing this group is a nightmare. They know better than to stay in one place, and maintain their distance from adversaries with relative ease." Gaara summed it up, "Though their numbers are few, maybe no more than a dozen…they are a particularly dangerous wildcard."

"How is there an ability like this? Why is it distinct from Ninjutsu?" Haku had to get to the existential crisis-type questions, as was his specialty, "What if there are other abilities in the world we are yet unaware of? How do we—?"

"Okay, stop, because you know we can't answer any of that." Naruto held up a hand to put the brakes on Haku's guesswork, "It just is. It's a problem."

"Can anyone else in shinobi nations use Tao Arts?" Haku posed a logical follow up, "That could help at least discourage these types of criminals."

"Not anymore." Gaara recalled, "Many were hunted down and executed by Bi's cell, according to what Tsunade-sama shared with me."

"Alright. So can Tao Arts be learned? By people like you and me?" Another thoughtful follow up from Haku.

Naruto laughed from the floor, "Wha—? How? We don't even know what they are or how they work!"

"Someone must know."
"No one in these lands could really explain it. Techniques like that come from nations far to the west, most likely in Han and Joseon." Gaara shot the idea down, "Unless shinobi are willing to travel abroad to study other abilities in this world…we are going to have to solve these issues on our own."

"What a complication." Haku shifted to sit cross-legged on the bed's edge, elbows to his knees as he held his chin in his hands and thought, "Why is there so much we don't know about? Every time I think I have a grasp of what's going on, there's another revelation to saddle my brain with. I'm tired of having to think about it all."

"Well, that's our life now. Just tryin' to keep up with all of the madness. It helps when you've got other people working on it with you…but…I really…" Naruto sighed and stretched himself wide on the floor, his eyes trained on the ceiling, "When I left Leaf to train, I never thought I'd have to face stuff like this. To really have to open my eyes to what's been going on. I didn't count on it. Didn't ask for it. But what kind of a shithead would I be if I tried to ignore it or let it be someone else's problem?"

Gaara raised his hand in solidarity, agreeing, "That. Exactly that."

Haku chuckled darkly, "Is this merely a part of growing up, or is this a torment unique to us? That we just happened to be the fools clued into the truth and dangers creeping in this world?"

"Oh it's just us, I'm thinkin'," Naruto lamented, "For some damn reason, it's us. Because I'll tell ya, Teuchi-san at Ichiraku Ramen sure as hell isn't thinking about dealing with this stuff. Which is good, I guess."

"Then if we are meant to combat the threats and injustices in this world," Gaara put a point to the line of thinking, "We had better not mess this up."

The young men collectively sensed a portent of calamity ahead, and though they may have been blind to it when they were younger, they were each absorbing the obligation in those quiet moments. That responsibility, by whatever probability and means, had fallen to them. To defend their homes and future from hegemony, devastation, and evil, unknowable forces.

"Hmm." Haku was the first to snap out of his processing, "The stakes have been raised. There is much to be done and dealt with, however…I'd like to remind you both of what we promised when we first met each other."

Sheepish, Naruto scratched his cheek, sitting up as he asked, "Uh…what did we promise each other, again? I mean, it was a long time ago!"

"That we would protect each other." Haku clarified.

"Pff. Well that's a given!" Naruto simpered.

"No, it's not." Haku disagreed, "Not anymore. The context of our lives is very different. We don't all live in the same place and do the same things. We have different needs and wants than we did. Gaara, for example, is a village leader. It would be unfair to ask him to compromise his commitment to Suna for our sakes."

"I do have a degree of flexibility in my decisions, when it comes to you both." Gaara said from his place surrounded by cushions.

"Even so, these times are turbulent. Within reasonable means, if it doesn't jeopardize a village or critical mission…we should prioritize each other." Haku suggested, "If anything were to ever happen to either of you, I would drop everything. You know that. You are my family first. That's the way it has always been."

It seemed like a silly thing to reiterate, after all, it was so fundamental—such a part of who they were! Naruto didn’t think it bore repeating, but it made his eyes shiny regardless. Haku reached out a hand which Naruto took automatically in his own. He didn’t have to say he understood what Haku meant. They both felt it. To Haku’s left, lounging in pillowy comfort, Gaara did not stir but had heard the proclamation.

"You too, Gaara." Haku motioned with his other hand.

"I'm comfortable. Don't make me move, you know that I agree."

"Yeah, if things go sideways...I'll always put you guys first." Naruto cleared his throat, tacking on, "Gaara, the deal isn't sealed if you don't hold hands. It's like a magic bonding-thing."

"That is utter," Gaara over-pronounced his words, "Non-sense."

"Here, then." Haku wrapped his hand around Gaara's ankle, which was nearest to him since the lazy Kazekage was not willing to sit up and enter the friendship circle. At least they could tap Gaara’s energy somehow, and that seemed to satisfy Haku and Naruto.

The sentiment pressed down on Gaara's chest like an anvil, and eventually he grumbled and scooched nearer, lending his hands to them as well. There. Another sacred pact—this time forged as young adults, hoping that someday in a bright and distant future they could look back on this moment and thank each other for it.

In the back of his mind, Naruto could hear the Nine-Tailed Fox muttering, If vows and hand-holding save the world I swear I will shave myself bald. This naïve pledging would make me die of secondhand embarrassment if I, you know, had the ability to die independently right now.

'Ooh would you shut your face, you lonely asshole-' Naruto mentally scoffed.

Your love alone can't save them.

A sharp retort, 'I'm not going to bother taking advice on that subject from someone who hasn't actually loved. '

Who says I haven't?

'Alright then. Go ahead and tell me about your loved ones, Fox. I'll listen.'

Tell you— I...ERG. You are the biggest blister in my life, Naruto.

'Just shut up and listen. Do you feel them?'

Feel who?

'THEM.' Naruto redirected Kurama's attention to the internal space that jinchuriki and Tailed-Beasts shared, where the fox finally noticed Gaara and Shukaku were also present.

How dare you goons eavesdrop! This is between me and my blister.

Gaara pointed out, 'I believe it makes more sense to call you Naruto's blister. Better said, Naruto has been an annoyance to me lately. So you are my blister's blister—'
'Okay, time for you to shut up too.' Naruto requested cheerily.

Wait, then what does that make me? Shukaku had gotten confused.

'You're my friend. Relax.' Gaara soothed the One-Tail, who settled down as both Naruto and Kurama clamored at the notion.

'Wow. Way to downgrade me, Gaara! I'm willing to put my life on the line for you and you—'

Gaara interrupted Naruto's blathering, It was a joke. You are my best friend. There is nothing I wouldn't do for you and Haku.

'Ah.' Naruto simmered down, 'Okay.'

'And you,' Gaara addressed the Kyuubi, Need not be excluded from this. Shukaku and I saw how strong you and Naruto could be together. Your life may not seem so bleak and empty if you were willing to forge new bonds.

As if I'd consider the dithering words that come from Shukaku's container, you condescending polyp!

_Don't_, Shukaku growled in warning, _Mouth off to Gaara. You'd never know a good thing happening to you even if it came up and punched you in your shitty face, Kurama!_

Aww, do you want to hold hands and make friendship bracelets with them, Shukaku?

Naruto stepped between the quarreling beasts, waving his arms like a baton-wielding ramp agent, _Enough. Goddammit. Enough. Thought it'd be worthwhile to link up and have a sincere talk, BUT NOPE. I guess what we figured out earlier today didn't matter, Fox._ He paused to apologize to Shukaku and Gaara, who nodded coolly to Naruto before retreating from the dim, conscious space.

'Kurama.'

The Nine-Tails started in surprise upon hearing Naruto speak his name.

'That's your name, isn't it? The one your father gave you. Gaara told me.' He stood alone in the watery dark, _Gaara's like a brother to me. And Shukaku is supposed to be like a brother to you. If you insist on pushing everyone else away, as if you know better than them or whatever…then the end of the world is going to be pretty dull for you. Just sitting around without all of the dumbasses you didn't need. That sounds fun._ Naruto's expression of disappointment put a twinge of regret in the fox's stomach, and he watched as the young man faded completely from view.

In the upright world within Gaara's bedroom, Naruto blinked and shook his head. He laughed in delight to see he'd only zoned out for a few seconds, and was still holding hands with his friends.

Haku gave him a perplexed smile, _What's funny?_

"We talked to our Tailed-Beasts for a second!" Naruto confessed, "It's easier when we're close together. Could you hear it? You were touching us, so I wonder if you could get there too. Maybe?"

"No, I didn't experience anything." Haku withdrew his hands and tucked them in his lap, "But I think…I can still feel a little of what you feel."

"How?" Gaara was gathering his pillows again, "You aren't a jinchuriki."
"I don't know." Haku rubbed his chin and thought about it, "Call it intuition. Or empathy. I've always been able to feel some of what you and Naruto feel."

"Yeah, that's about right. And Hinata can do that too, but literally with her powers. Some people can tap the frequency." Wagging his fingers beside his head, Naruto tried to illustrate.

"Some can. Though it may take a miracle to tap the frequency of the Nine-Tailed Fox." Gaara sniffed, "He's an insufferable brute."

Naruto sighed heavily.

"Naruto can do it." Haku encouraged.

"I don't know if I can. I've been trying to crack that nut for years, and he's still obstinate." Naruto twitched his nose, "I don't know if there's anyone he likes or is willing to listen to. I mean, sometimes at night I can feel him get calmer, but never when I'm trying to talk to him. It feels like something else is going on."

Gaara narrowed his eyes at the suggestion, "Something else?"

"I don't know. Maybe he thinks about when he was small, or when he was happier. Not that I'd know how to remind him of those things..."

"Maybe it's not you." Gaara muttered.

Before Haku and Naruto could further speculate, Gaara switched gears, "I want to sleep. You should both get some rest too. We can continue catching up tomorrow."

"I like the sound of that." Naruto stood and stretched, hearing his joints crack back into place, "So should I share my guest room with Haku? There aren't any spare ones left right now."

"If Matsuri weren't coming home later, I'd set up a futon in her room, however..." Gaara once again leveled a solemn stare on Haku, "I don't want you on the second floor."

Haku didn't know how much more assurance Gaara needed, "I just want to—"

"You sleep downstairs, on the couch." Gaara commanded, "I'd put Jiraiya there, but he'd be complaining all day tomorrow and I don't want to hear it."

Naruto also tried to placate his suspicious friend, "Haku can share a room with me—"

"No. Not on this floor. Period." Gaara said as he made no attempt to hide how he was keeping Haku very separate from wherever his sister went to sleep at night.

"That's fine." Haku rose up, "I don't mind. I'm exhausted and it makes little difference to me." At the door of the room he wondered, "Are you free in the morning for training, Gaara?"

An intriguing question to which he answered, "I can be."

"Please try to, if you can. If you're willing to test your strength against Naruto, why not me as well?" His smile was deceptively docile. Haku bid them goodnight before setting out down the corridor.

"Oooh, don't fall for it. I think he's super strong now." Naruto whispered.

"He's gone, he can't hear you. Stop whispering."
"Sorry. I mean, he's still the Haku we love, but there's something scary about him now."

"He doesn't scare me." Gaara said.

One thing Haku liked about the first floor of the house was that it was sufficiently dark. He preferred to sleep in dark, quiet places. It was about the only thing that helped his busy brain shut off. He had nestled on the wide sofa, adjusted pillows and a throw blanket and then clapped his hands softly, "Pua." She hopped up on cue.

"How was your trip out here? Did you eat?"

"Maybe." The rabbit meant this as an affirmative answer.

"Say: Yes." Haku corrected her, "I know you can say it."

"Y-y…ye…"

"Yes." He repeated.

"…yes."

"Good." Haku balanced his rabbit on his stomach and rubbed her ears, "I'm proud of you. You've learned so much…" He paused to yawn and Pua mirrored the gesture, revealing her long teeth.

He began to doze off, feeling the rustle of Pua's movements and nibbling on his shirt, doting on him in rabbity ways. Haku patted her absentely, "Sleep now. I can't play. Tomorrow we can play…"

Before long he was snoring and Pua bunched herself up on his stomach to rest.

Deeper into the night, Haku stirred when he felt rustling again, and assumed Pua had begun chewing again out of habit. When he sleepily tried to bat at the rabbit with his fingertips, he felt a human hand instead. He snapped a wary eye open.

"It's just me." Temari assured him.

"Oh. What time is it?"

"Just about midnight now. Why don't you come upstairs?"

"I was told not to." Haku informed her.

"By Gaara?" Temari sniffed, "He is just…" A sigh, "It's fine. This house is mine. Matsuri went upstairs and was surprised to see you down here. You can stay in my room."

Haku's chuckle was rough with sleep, "No, I can't. That…constitutes blatant disrespect of your brothers."

"I am the eldest and I set my own rules. No one gives a damn about any of the other guests staying here—"

"That's because they know I am the one interested in you, which makes a difference." He reminded her after a yawn.

"How nice of you to care about what they think. But if you'd rather stay down here, that's okay. Only if you want to, and not because of what my brothers said." Temari conceded, "My bed has the space and honestly…I just like feeling you there."
He could understand that; there was something irresistible and calming about falling asleep next to the object of one's affection. Since Haku had done so himself when Temari had last visited Nanakusa, he couldn't say that he thought she was being silly, irrational, or suggestive. He shifted to sit up and gently moved a snoozing Pua aside, "Alright." He watched Temari blink at him, half-surprised, "Just until dawn, and then I'll come back here before anyone else wakes up."

"Hm." She was amused, padding softly across the floor as he followed, "Are you sure you can wake up in time?"

"Yes. It's a skill I've picked up."

And while all of the house was snoring and unaware, the pair scaled the stairs with catlike treads. Temari felt a pang of triumph as she watched Haku toddle past her into her room, half-asleep, and then crumple frontways onto her bed and shimmy beneath the quilt like a flounder into seabed sand. She was about to pull her pajamas off when she thought better of it, 'No...this is a safer bet in case I have to explain myself later to anyone who gives me grief about a co-sleeper...’ She sidled in beside Haku, sweeping long strands of hair away from his face, and pecked his lips. He was asleep again.

'Well, if you can wake up just as easily as you fall asleep, then it definitely is a skill.' She thought. The surge of excitement and satisfaction kept Temari awake for a bit longer before she too batted her eyelids shut and drifted off. Her dreams were the marvelous kind that rediscovered flight and joyful things, the kind of dreams that no one could ever remember when they woke again. All glistened back into light the next morning.

Upon waking up, she acknowledged that it was a good sign that Haku's space beside her was empty. That had been the deal, after all. She ran her hand along the mattress and pillow recesses left imprinted by his body. Ah, how nice. Just as she thought: his presence lingered around her like it always did. Echoing ripples of love. She smiled and rubbed her eyes, sitting up to toss her blanket off.

'I want to get used to this. I know he won't be here with us for long...’ Temari fished through her closet for a dress to change into, 'When all of his spy business is over...I wonder if Haku would stay in Suna with me? I haven't asked. Maybe I shouldn't ask. He has his own home and friends to return to, so should I be keeping him from that?’ She wilted as she pulled her outfit on, trying to project a future in which she did not selfishly dictate Haku's decisions, 'I don't really know what he wants. He loves me, I know that. I'm just afraid to ask where he sees himself down the line...'

She fussed at her reflection in a wall mirror, dabbing ointment beneath her eyes and along her nose, patting tinctures onto her face to protect against the desert's dry heat, and then tied her hair in its usual style. Temari huffed at herself afterward, 'If someday Haku and I part again...I think I'd rather just stay alone. I need to make my own way. There's plenty to keep me occupied.’ And though she did believe those words to be true, she still felt the potential for disappointment gnawing at her stomach.

The aromas of breakfast food carried through the house. Temari collected her weapons holsters and fan before venturing out and hurrying down the stairs. In the sitting room, she discovered Jiraiya and Naruto sitting at a low chabudai table, cups of tea steaming between them as Naruto held up his hand in an attempt to manifest a prong-seal for his master. Temari greeted them in passing and received distracted salutations in return.

In the kitchen, Matsuri was alone at the table set with omelets, soup dishes, and other elements of a morning meal. She brightened at the sight of Temari, "Good morning, Temari-sama!"

"Hi, Matsuri." She slid into a seat across from the young kunoichi, "You were out late last night."
"The movie ran so long! And it was sad." The girl pouted, "I wish I could get my money back."

Temari snickered at her, "What did you think when you saw Haku sleeping on the couch when you came home?"

"I thought...he was a pretty girl." Matsuri admitted haltingly.

Temari cackled even more as she helped herself to food.

"He was very nice! I realized this morning that he, um, wasn't a girl." Matsuri explained, "And he made this breakfast for everyone! Naruto-san and Gama-sennin already ate."

"Yes, I saw. They're goofing around with Sealing practice in the other room." Temari tipped the teapot over her cup, "So where did Haku go?"

"He went out with Gaara-sensei a short time ago." Matsuri reported.

"Hm."

The girls munched. Temari cut up an apple and shared it with her companion. Between crunchy bites she inquired, "Did Gaara assign you any missions?"

"I have to be to the armory in 20 minutes for an appointment...Then I will be on surveillance duty at the outpost this evening, and I might accompany a team for a mission tomorrow." Matsuri recalled, "But I'm most looking forward to the weekend."

Temari guessed, "You'll be going to the Tide Village, then?"

"Yes," She wiggled in her seat, "Menma has been recovering from his injuries, so I hope he'll be able to do more when I get back. Rebuilding efforts are nearly complete..."

"It's kind of hard to believe how many times that village has had to rebuild. None of the Great Villages have had to deal with that kind of stress since the last war."

"That's true. Large villages like ours can forget what hardship and violence are like after long periods of peace." Matsuri moved her place setting to the sink, "That's why Inari said he doesn't want to take any crap from other villages. Tide may be small, but it is very tough!"

"Like someone I know." Temari gave her a fond look, "I'll see you later?"

"You will!" The girl gave her role model a swift hug around the shoulders before darting out.

With most of the dishes empty and a single piece of apple remaining on the plate, Temari decided it was time to pack up. She called out to Pua to come over and dispose of the remaining apple slice. After what felt like an age the rabbit did not turn up. Temari rose from her seat, "Pua? Eat this apple. Where are you?" She glanced about and wondered if the bunny had accompanied Haku out.

Stalking past the sitting area and into the wide living room, Temari did notice the white rump of the animal sticking out of a shelf hutch on the floor. Temari crossed to the sofa to see what had preoccupied Pua and oh, oh no, the nicest throw pillow they had was in absolute tatters. The rabbit had torn it apart with her teeth to steal stuffing out of it, and was arranging the fluffy fill into a nest in the hutch.

"What are you doing, you destructive little marshmallow!" Temari snatched Pua up in her hands, prying fibers from her mouth, "I loved that pillow! What's compelled you? You don't need to make yourself at home here since you'll be hitting the road again tomorrow." She frowned at the rabbit's sweet face, "I could've gotten you a shoebox or something." Beneath her fingertips something felt off. With great care, Temari gave the rabbit a soft squish around her middle, trying to figure out if she was ill or had ingested anything she ought not to.

'This feels like...a bunch of grapes.' Thinking on it as she palpated the rabbit, Temari deduced possibilities, 'She doesn't seem sick. Didn't eat anything that I saw...what if...?'

"Oh. Great." Temari had a hunch of what the problem was as she arranged Pua in a football carry in the crook of her arm, and kicked the tattered pillow's remains into the hutch. She stormed out of the house and circled around to the back of the property, correctly assuming that Gaara had taken Haku to the courtyard there.

There she could see Matsuri concluding her pleasantries with Gaara and Haku, who looked as though they had paused their sparring to speak with her. With a wave, Matsuri was off again, and before the young men could resume training, Temari marched forward to interrupt them.

"Good morning," She greeted them both before setting her eyes on Haku, "Haku, did you intend to take Pua with you to that auction in the Land of Mountains?"

"I did." He confirmed with a wary lilt in his voice.

"Well, have you noticed that your rabbit is knocked up?" Temari held up the animal who was otherwise ignorant of what conversation was being had.

The revelation crashed over Gaara first, who flinched at Temari's words; just the mere suggestion seemed to send his mind swirling, free-associating other worries. Pregnancy betokened responsibility, and by God, he really did not need another stressor. Even if it wasn't his problem, or the fact that the single mother in question was a rabbit— it was still a sort of mental attack on the Kazekage. While Gaara stood in dubious silence, Haku reacted with acute, mortified disbelief, reaching out to take Pua into his hands, "What do you mean? She isn't—"

"Squish her middle a bit."

Haku's mortification escalated as he did so, "Nothing seemed unusual!"

"That is the quintessential thing a man would say right about now. Your rabbit is pregnant. So think twice about taking her on a mission." Temari leveled with him coolly, "I'm no animal expert so I don't know how far along she is or what she needs. But I can tell you she destroyed one of my favorite cushions in an attempt to make a nest."

"I..." Crestfallen, Haku locked gazes with Pua in his first moment of true parental concern, "Did you...really bring this unto yourself?"

Abruptly, Gaara scoffed beside him, "Are you actually asking an animal that?"

"Forgive me, Gaara, but until your pet does something like this I don't need your input." Haku sidelined Gaara's remarks, turning in a small circle as he held Pua in front of his face, "What have you done? We have work to do! Hold still." He tried feeling around the rabbit's abdominal area with a glow of green chakra, as he would on a human patient for a System Survey. There definitely seemed to be stowaways with beating hearts in there, just from a cursory check. He groaned in frustration.

"Anyway," Temari turned to her brother, "Do you have any assignments for me today, Gaara?"
His miffed look suggested that Haku's irresponsible pet ownership was grating on his nerves, but he pulled himself together to tell Temari, "I'll be going to the office in a short while and you should come with me. I have a few Chunin-level prospects who will be taking a Jounin evaluation in an hour and a half, if you don't mind overseeing them. Baki will be taking them out for a mission if they pass their initial practical." Gaara added, "I have no mission for you at this time, so you can take the day off." In between the lines she also read: You're welcome.

"Great. Thanks." She was pleased. Temari plucked Pua from Haku's hands as he muttered at his rabbit, complaining about how Pua had gallivanted with a common buck rabbit in the forest. "Let me take her for now. If you two were training, do you mind if I stay to watch for a bit?"

"I suppose not." Haku tried to shake off a sullen haze, "This is…so unexpected…and inconvenient."

"Pregnancy in a nutshell." Temari confirmed with a shrug.

"I never thought to get her spayed." Haku admitted, "Though in part that was because there are hardly any trained veterinary professionals in the Water Country."

"It's too late to fret over it now."

"It is my opinion," Gaara said as he and Haku faced off once again, "That this reckless disregard and proliferation, though by your rabbit, reflects poorly on you."

A mildly insulted gasp, "I've been working. Risking my life and limb for missions-!"

"You'd probably be a terrible fa—"

"I would be a neurotically attentive father, do not conflate pet ownership problems with parenting!"

Nearby, Temari was rolling her eyes as they argued.

Gaara's famous temper was right on schedule that morning, "Why are you even thinking of that sort of thing?"

"You've thought of such things too, Gaara!"

"My relationship is stable." As if it were fair to create a comparison, or that in saying so Gaara didn't think it would make Haku angry. But oh look, it did.

"—my relationship will be fine." Haku dared to say it.

"So you admit it." Gaara's nostrils were flaring.

"I don't need to admit anything."

Tufts of sand shivered around Gaara as he warned, "You do."

"Uh— how about you don't bitch about relationships while I'm sitting right here!" Temari barked a reminder at her brother, "What is with this hot-and-cold tough guy act? Haku is your friend!"

Gaara turned to bark back at her, "You haven't been very forthcoming either, Temari—!"

And then he whizzed backwards, suddenly propelled by a burst of Wind Nature that Haku hit him with. Gaara landed on his feet, stamping like a bull, and set his eyes on Haku again. The knave had his new war fan outstretched, poised for Wind jutsu.
Where before the contest had been cordial, Gaara let frustration get the best of him and allowed Shukaku to drip chakra into his limbs. He sped across the courtyard like a beast, divested of his sand armor, and crashed into Haku with terrible Taijutsu. Temari contained a yelp of fright, observing the tumult of kicks, fists, and light steps. An airy leap and low bend saved Haku from a crushing blow of Gaara's that gouged a hole in the ground. He kicked Gaara away and spun his war fan in his hand, conjuring a small dust devil of wind.

Gaara rounded on him and charged, determined to give Haku at least one good smack—to get his point across. Instead, he dropped to the ground flat on his face, straight and still as a wooden plank. Two senbon needles had sunk into the back of Gaara's neck.

Blinking rapidly, Temari was not sure how Haku had done it. No one had seen him handle throwing needles, however she suspected the ruse was a sleight-of-hand, distracting Gaara to be faced in one direction while Wind Release propelled the needles (cast airborne and unnoticed) to their intended target from behind. The task of aiming correctly with a Wind Nature did concern Temari. What if Haku had missed and seriously injured Gaara? Of that she was still unsure as her baby brother laid there unmoving. She did not need to direct Haku at that point; he was already crossing back to help Gaara.

This, Haku could admit, was not a friendly sparring session. Far from it—he had used techniques he would use against an enemy or assassination mark. A roiling guilt ate at Haku's insides as he knelt down beside Gaara, 'What did I need to prove to him, anyway? That I can end a battle before it even starts? None of this was fair...and I know he's been upset since I arrived...''He murmured an apology to Gaara, 'I'm sorry. Let me remove these—'

A gritty, bestial claw seized him, wide enough to wrap full around his shoulders and neck as Haku looked on in pure bewilderment. Gaara may have been paralyzed by the attack, but Shukaku could express portions of his body through chakra alone. And, it seemed, the Tailed-Beast perceived Haku as a threat. As sand whipped wildly around Gaara's immobile body, Shukaku's manifested arm squeezed its captive.

Pua pelted frantically hither and thither in the yard as if to distract the menace that had taken her master hostage. It wasn't working. Temari descended upon the mess without an ounce of hesitation as she set her hands on Shukaku's limb, trying to pry it free, "Gaara! Snap out of it! You're not in danger-!

Tilted, black and gold eyes peered up at Temari, "What do you know about danger?" Perhaps it was Shukaku who had done the talking, and maybe too had coiled sand around the kunoichi in an attempt to pull her away from her not-yet-publically-acknowledged boyfriend.

Where Gaara's feelings ended and Shukaku's began was an unknowable front, a confluence of frustration. It was not hatred for the two people sloughed in sand—it was a determinedness to part them. To prevent future heartaches or losses, all the likelier if they were bonded again.

From what little Shukaku could see through Gaara's eyes, prostrate on the ground, the Biju did see the desperate, haptic response of the captive, barely able to move—as Temari's hand reached and found Haku's, fingers sliding far enough to secure around the other's wrist. It was an emergency of touch, ruling out jutsu or violence completely, and their eyes stayed trained on Gaara all the while. Though Shukaku's education on bonds of love was limited, even he recognized the triptych of devotion before him. None of these three silly humans had any good reason to jilt each other, and nary a speck of true anger for one another.

So the Tailed-Beast retreated in a sudden and complete pop, chakra vanished, and sand slipped away from its hostages as if to sulk. Haku coughed violently before folding over, immediately plucking the needles from Gaara's neck to unchain his stunned pressure points. He rubbed the skin there and between Gaara's shoulder blades, "Are you alright? I'm sorry, I'm sorry—"

Gaara was but a few inches off of the ground as he regained mobility when Temari pulled him into a sitting position to hold him in a tight hug, "Gaara? I never thought I'd...have to worry about you being out of control again..."

A raspy answer, "I really wasn't."

Gaara moved to sit properly and couldn't help patting the two, who were dithering worriedly over him. Never mind that he could have crushed them with his sand, they were more worried about his defensive response and aggressive use of Shukaku's chakra.

"Gaara, forgive me. I never should have done that." Haku shook his head ruefully, "It made you feel unsafe."

"Haku..." Gaara told him flatly, "It was not fear so much as a matter of pride...Shukaku didn't like me being flat on my face."

"Ah, well..."

"My reaction was about as careless as your needlework. Stop apologizing." Finally, Gaara had worked up the nerve to explain himself clearly, "I've been frustrated. The two of you acting secretively— why not tell me if you're seeing each other? Even if you know I don't want you to?"

He punctuated his feelings with, "Doing this means you might hurt each other again, which is the last thing I want."

Haku looked at him owlishly. Gaara's reasoning was quite sound, though he lacked the propensity for communicating his true feelings about matters right away.

Temari leaned back from the embrace with her brother, a resigned smile on her face, "I hear what you're saying, and I need you to know that I want to date him. I decided to. He decided to. Please try not to panic. Things are much better now."

There was something in Gaara's gaze that whisked her back into childhood, remembering the wateriness of her youngest brother's eyes, lit like a shallow sea, tightrope-walking to build trust with the one he was looking at. He had to digest her decision now that it was made plain.

One of the rear, ground-floor windows of the Kazekage's mansion opened once Naruto figured out the latch, and he began to climb out, "What the heck is going on out here? Ero-sensei and I felt a big spike of chakra!"

"Naruto, stop." Temari stood and crossed the yard to shove him back inside, "Don't leave the house like that— it's embarrassing—"

"—is everyone okay?" He was indoors again but still a-flutter with questions.

"Everyone's fine." Temari lowered her voice to whisper to him, "Those two just need to talk. You know?"

"Psh. About time." Naruto sniffed. He sealed the window again to return to his practice at the tea table.

The nervous rabbit had scuttled under the courtyard bench and Temari bent down to pet some reassurance back into the animal. She called over her shoulder, "I'm going to head to the office a bit early to see about that evaluation. Why don't you guys say what you need to say, then Gaara," She eyed him, "You'll meet me there?"

"I will." He agreed.

Temari set out from the property and Gaara sighed wearily as he watched her go. Haku stood beside him, contemplative.

"Gaara…why is it…” He rubbed his chin, frowning in thought, "That long ago when Temari first wanted my companionship, you thought nothing of it?"

"It seemed harmless then." Gaara rubbed the tender spot on his neck where needles had pricked him.

"And now—?” Haku wondered.

"Your absence hurt her. She changed." He didn't like explaining something he thought was obvious, "Haven't you noticed? I was the one who had to watch her struggle, and watched her go through phases of self-disparagement and pointless flings. I wanted to let you leave to do what you had to do…but at the time I didn't think of what would happen to her." Gaara snapped, "You didn't either."

These were the fumes of all that had gone unsaid over the last two years, omitted from their written exchanges back and forth. It had never gotten too blunt or bitter, but the implication had been laced through the words of Gaara's letters. To hear it aloud with his whole heart felt like a judge's gavel striking him right atop his head, miring Haku back in the guilt that had built up in him like plaque.

"If that weren't enough, maybe you could understand the anxiety I have for my sister's well-being, after she was nearly killed by your associate." Gaara poured another boiling pot of facts on his friend, "None of this is about me, understand that. I do not resent you, but I fear being put in a position where I will feel that way, if you cause Temari any hardship again. I want our friendship to be untouchable, and that is most easily facilitated by you not being in a relationship with her."

To finalize his point, Gaara's face capped it off with a There you have it look.

"I…do understand." Haku's acknowledgement was soft. His eyes drifted down to the ground, thinking, and Pua hopped over to rest on his booted foot.

"All of those things…I am responsible for. If not for me, she wouldn't have…” He waffled and cleared his throat, "I don't know exactly why she wanted to try again."

Me neither, Gaara's face said as he listened with his arms crossed.

"It did become very evident to me that…I operate in a morally ambiguous, crime-riddled field with little chance of career advancement…and most of this time my absence has been covered by lies, or the pain of friends who look out for me. My behavior was accordingly dismal." Haku shut his eyes and waved a hand, "And I failed miserably at what I originally set out to do. With that track record, even I wouldn't like me. I want love, but so what? Since the day I left the Water Country, I had a feeling I could never have such a thing. When I watched…them…die—I didn't know how I could ever do better."

Gaara held up a hand, "Leave it at that. I didn't invite you to self-immolate."

"You didn't." Haku smiled at him, "You can leave it to me. Believe me, I've struggled with this too. It might be misguided or ill-fated, but still, Temari asked me to try again. So I did. And I don't want her to be hurt, above all other things. So help me God—I would pull the sea aground if she needed me to. My other goals stultified long ago and she is, by far, the most important thing to me."

The flagrant honesty was a bit much and curses, Gaara thought, his squared jaw was softening and so was his heart. Yes, the risks and inconveniences were evident to them both, but Haku's self-awareness, though morbid, was a winning feature in Gaara's book.

"Just," Gaara turned away from his friend, "If it can't be helped...please. Don't fall short or disappear." A command, "Be there."

Haku wasn't precisely sure, but it sounded as if Gaara changed his mind. He was stilted and wanted to ask for clarification, but he figured he presumed correctly once Gaara made a dismissive motion with his hands. The Kazekage's irritation had evaporated.

"Look after Naruto today. I'll return by the afternoon." Gaara said before he left to assume his leadership duties.

Boggled, Haku motioned for Pua to fall in step and they rounded the house to enter at the front door, and discovered Jiraiya and Naruto hooting in delight as two prong-seals on Naruto's fingertips blinked as three prong-seals. Naruto lost his concentration and stopped when he noticed Haku,

"Haku! Wow, I'm getting good at this! So what happened out there?"

"Well..." Haku joined them at the chabudai table, sitting on a cushion, "We had a bit of a spat."

"Meaning you and Gaara, or you and Temari were fighting?" Jiraiya furrowed his brows, "Because with those two, I've found them to be equally temperamental."

Haku nodded to his teacher's point, "True. I meant with Gaara."

Naruto's mouth formed a surprised "o" shape, listening with a riveted look.

"He's been...acting...a degree more passive-aggressive than I'm accustomed to." Haku began.

Jiraiya and Naruto nodded in unison.

"And I thought that perhaps it was because he realized Temari and I are seeing each other." He went on, "Which was correct. I finally got him to explain why it bothered him so much."

"So it's basically that you were in violation of the Bro-Code." Naruto surmised.

"No, not quite that. If it were, he would've objected years ago when Temari and I first went out." Haku tipped the contents of the teapot into an unclaimed cup, "He was concerned that I would be negligent again in some way that could hurt her. Which is a perfectly reasonable thing to think."

Jiraiya fished for more details, "Was that part of why we felt Tailed-Beast chakra coming from the back yard?"

"Our sparring did get...a little intense."

"It was fast though! Like it was there and then poof, he cooled off." Naruto recalled.

"Maybe because I didn't try to fight, then." He hovered his tea cup beneath his chin, "I just...tried to show them how I felt. That I won't abandon anyone, not in favor of any other person important to me."

"Huh. Who knew that would've worked a trick on a fella gassed up on Biju-chakra?" Jiraiya chuckled before sipping his tea.
The three gradually turned their attention to a ripping sound, and watched in stupefaction as Pua began to tear apart another cushion with her teeth in pursuit of stuffing.

"Is…something wrong with Pua?" Naruto asked.

With one hand Haku scooped the rabbit into his cross-legged lap to bar her from any further destruction, and with his other hand he palmed his face.

Chapter End Notes

I am alive! My apologies for such tardiness— I got married, worked on my graduate studies, and moved to a new home since the summer, so I've been preoccupied. Resuming a more regular update schedule is my goal, so please look forward to more juicy reading. I hope this chapter pitched some fun surprises at you, good reader.

Chapter 55- Keiseki House
"The inner tie has to be done first, Naruto." Haku set about knotting strings to close the unusual top he had put on. Naruto twiddled with the jeogori, quite stumped about how it was meant to be fastened. No instructions were included in the satin bag Haku had retrieved it from.

It was the morning of Haku's departure, post-breakfast, and prior to attending the auction he had been told (by Zabuza) to establish a convincing disguise first. He neglected to tell his friends that the opulent hanbok that had been loaned to him had come from Koseki Inagawa, one of the most notorious gangsters in the Land of Water. As it happened, no one had asked. When Kankuro peeked in on their progress, he just marveled at the garments and imagined what it was like to walk around looking like a real aristocrat.

As it was described to Haku, his sale at the auction would go much better if he blended in with the affluent crowd. So there he and Naruto were upstairs in Gaara's home, trying to discern how the outfit was meant to look. Hell. None of them could even put on kimono correctly without assistance, never mind jeogori or baji from another country.

"It's really bright." Naruto noted as they finally started to figure it out, patting and tugging the attire into place.

"Bright colors are worn by the upper class." Haku recited a tidbit of what he'd learned at Inagawa's hideout.

"So you've got to pretend to be rich?" Naruto gathered.

"I suppose so."

"What if they figure out you're a ne'er-do-well, former farm-kid?"

"Perhaps I might give subliminal peasant signals, but how could anyone guess an agricultural background? That was long ago!"

"Rich people can smell that stuff!" Naruto insisted superstitiously, "They can look at you and know you've never been spoiled, and that you've worked at least one hard day of labor in your life."

"Oh please, Naruto. No one is going to realize." Haku batted his friend's hands out of the way to tie a final belt.

Naruto stood back and titled his head. The outer collar of the jeogori was an eye-catching turquoise that contrasted ocean blue and black of the top. Other features were subtle; flowing jacquard sleeves of white silk, embroidery sewed at the shoulders of the vest depicting snowing clouds above deer, pheasants, and rabbits. Once dressed, Haku pulled on boots and asked Naruto, "What else does the list say?"

He glanced over the checklist of how to prepare, "Talk to an appraiser…"

"No, no, before that. Appearance-wise."

"Oh! Put your hair up. Like, way up on top of your head in a top knot, with some of it loose. See? There's a sketch here." Naruto fished around the clothing bag, "Here's the fastener."

"It says that?" Haku's hand wavered over his long, customary ponytail.

"Yeah, it must be some bougie style thing."

Sighing, Haku shook his hair free and pulled it smooth again, preparing to tie it as recommended.

"It also says put on a horse-hair hat." Naruto kept reading, "What the hell is that? Did one come in the bag?"

"Just this, I'm afraid."

"Oh, here's a headband." Shaking the bag to determine it was finally empty, Naruto gave the last piece of blue silk to Haku, "You're supposed to wear it like the picture." He held up the paper again and watched as Haku replicated the style as best he could.

Haku had transmogrified into a handsome, patrician-class man from a fairytale land. He then stuffed the clothing pouch into his travel bag, felt around for the precious gems and baubles he was meant to sell, and fetched a few additional knives and senbon quivers to hide in his outfit for protection. The Master Scroll was clipped to a holster on his leg, trousers hidden beneath long robes, and his tessen was hidden in his left sleeve.

"Okay, so my biggest question is…" Naruto began as they exited the guest room, marching down the hall to head downstairs, "Why not just wear hakama like every other guy does at fancy outings? That's standard around here!"

"Exactly. I don't want to seem as though I am from a shinobi nation. A hanbok is foreign enough to at least outwardly diffuse suspicion, and from what I understand…this will be a very international, multi-cultural event."

"Meaning—?"

"People from all around the world will be there. Not just the great nations, or the Kingdoms of Han and Joseon, but the other far continents as well."

Naruto squinted an eye, wary, "What do foreigners want that's in the Land of Mountains?"

Haku replied with a full-body shrug as he had asked himself that question at least 20 times already. What indeed? Why would any person from the other side of the world come to an auction such as this, if Haku were merely dropping in to sell stolen riches and jewels? That couldn't be what they were after. He had a gut feeling about it.

Downstairs, Jiraiya got one look at Haku and assessed, "That is one whacky getup. What's with the colors?"

"Rich people love colors." Naruto declared. He and Haku blew raspberries at the thought while Jiraiya shook his head.
"Just seems a bit weird since it's not a common fashion in our area, or practical for, you know, stealthy ninja missions."

"It's more practical than you may think." Haku stopped in a slant of sunlight that shone through the sitting room window, "Do I look like a ninja?"

"Well…no." Jiraiya conceded, "Not to burst your bubble or anything, but Keiseki House is going to have a lot of people that aren't ninja who are still quite dangerous. So just as you are masquerading around…beware other revelers who might want to get the jump on you or anyone else."

"I will attend with the utmost vigilance," Haku confirmed, "Where did Gaara go?"

"Pretty sure he evicted your rabbit after she started going after the sofa cushions too. Notice the stuffing everywhere." With a hand, Jiraiya gestured pretty much all around the room.

"Ah." Haku followed after Naruto through the egress of the house, and sure enough Gaara was outside, having gently corralled the pregnant, nest-obsessed rabbit in a ring of sand.

The Kazekage moodily glanced over his shoulder, "Why did it take you so long to get changed?"

"I apologize for the mess she made." Haku contritely plucked up his rabbit, "I can replace—"

Gaara held up a hand to interrupt him, "It's fine. Just get her away from here. Until the destructive urges pass."

Naruto was chuckling, "Won't be too much longer now, I'm guessing. Are you taking Pua with you?"

"I am. I'll probably need her on this mission…and I expect she can handle it." Haku said with dubious certainty as he looked Pua in her whiskered face, as if to ask: Can you? Jiraiya snickered disbelievingly from behind him.

"You really can't stay any longer?" Naruto tried to weasel out additional quality time with Haku.

"Not without risking my entry to this auction, and Zabuza would be hideously uncooperative and belligerent if I did." Haku forecasted.

"How is that different from any other day?" Gaara asked. Without looking, he raised his hand to accept a silent high-five from Jiraiya.

The sigh that came from Haku could have propelled a sailboat. The gaggle proceeded towards the village gate together, chattering about was on their agendas for the next time they met.

Jiraiya tossed in a cryptic footnote for Haku, "Oh, did I mention—? You ought to be on the lookout at this thing, uh…I know I said Keiseki House is chock full of unsavory types, but you might run into a friend there." Jiraiya smiled, "A friend of mine."

Gaara and Naruto exchanged wary looks while Haku canted his head, hoping to extract more information, "Which friend?"

"You'll know this friend when you meet 'em. If you make it look like you're deliberately in search of someone, then that might be counterproductive…Let him come to you. I gave him the head's up." Jiraiya explained, "I never had any intention of letting you traipse into a lion's den solo just because Zabuza demanded it like a whiny bitch. If anything goes haywire, you'll have some extension of help."
"I appreciate that, Sensei." Haku gave his master a small bow when they stopped at the entrance of the village gate. From a sentinel post above on the gate, Temari drifted down after sighting them.

"O-kay." Naruto loudly expelled a burst of anxiety, stepping forward to pull Haku into a hug, "Don't do any dumb stuff that requires rescuing. You hear me? Also…come back soon…" His smile tilted between joy and heartbreak.

"Please try not to worry, Naruto. I've gotten good at infiltrating dangerous places." Haku assured him with a squeeze, and he moved to Gaara who was dawdling on the periphery, "I know you're not quite so worried, Gaara."

"You do?" With his famously flat expression, Gaara insisted, "This is my worried face."

"So very fretful." Haku appreciated the Kazekage's subtle humor, and gave Gaara a warm scrunch about the shoulders as well. "Both of you be well, and stay far away from our enemies. Sensei," He said pointedly to Jiraiya, "Be on your guard."

"From now on, I am in a semi-permanent state of on-guardedness. More vigilant than even my last decade of paranoia and freelance investigations." Jiraiya gestured moodily, "I oughta have a funeral for my leisure time and carefree days, since those are dead and gone… But I guess you punks are worth it." When he grinned, Haku smiled back at him.

Haku turned to pass through the behemoth walls of the gate where Temari was waiting. He could hear Naruto's mutters as he moved on: "I'm not choked up— I'm not!"

Temari fell into an easy step beside Haku, "I'll escort you close to the country border, but no further."

"You don't have to—"

"Sure I don't, but for my own peace of mind I will. Every time we part it's been so abrupt… there's no harm in dragging this one out."

"Ah, well I can't disagree with that." Rather genial despite the occasion, Haku found himself smiling more. He noted Pua hopping in the gap between him and Temari, paws touching down gingerly over hot desert sand.

In companionable silence, they moved westward, further inland over gentle slopes that were being rearranged by intermittent, yawning winds. Haku would take a northwestern route to his destination, out of desert and into rocky, pine-swathed mountains.

His eyes darted to Temari beside him, whose churning energy was barely concealed beneath her otherwise impassive affect. He suspected that he could prompt her to share some of her cares.

"Temari…"

"Mm."

"You can tell me what you're thinking."

"I don't know if I should." Her eyes were trained forward when she spoke, "It's the first time I've thought about…things like this. I'd come off as a killjoy."

"You won't." Haku vowed, "I live with one of those, and he is absolutely superlative in his worst qualities. Whatever you have to say can't be as bad as what Zabuza routinely spews."
"Ha! Well..." She folded her arms and smiled, "I thought...what I want...might not be good for you. Might not work for you..."

"And what is it that you want?"

"For you to— eventually...stay. With me, here. But that's—"

"I intend to." Haku offered the plain truth.

"But," Temari repeated, "That's not necessarily going to make your life as a shinobi easy."

"Why would I care if my life is easy?"

"If you lived here, how would you use Water Ninjutsu?"

"I wouldn't." He found the simple answer digestible. She did not.

"What a waste! You can't be serious." Temari gestured at him like he had copped out, "That's a part of who you are! And you'd just squander it here in the desert...at most you'd do fun tricks in a sink or tub if you stuck around."

"That's fine. I would still be content to live with you and Gaara."

Temari was not taking kindly to his line of thinking, "Maybe you should stay in Leaf. So you don't have to sacrifice—"

"It doesn't make any material difference to me what kind of jutsu I am using. Not to sound conceited, but when I take the time to, I can develop new jutsu. I have before." Haku wanted to laugh at her angry face, "Why do you think that trade-off is so terrible?"

"When Gaara lived in Leaf, he couldn't use the full scope of his powers."

"He was still perfectly happy. And capable." Haku could testify.

"But when he came here, it was different. Everything was at his disposal, and he could be a Kage. Considering that he was literally in his element."

"Temari, forgive me, but this is a trivial concern."

"Think of what you could be, elsewhere." She suggested, hands pointing out the dry barrens all around them.

"I don't want to." Haku turned his chin up, "I have no anxiety about what it costs to have a life with you. Were you worried about that?"

Temari gave no response, stewing in silence.

He let the quiet persist. It wasn't as if he couldn't understand where she was coming from: that it could be considered unnatural to immigrate to a place where one of his elemental natures was scarce. Not that he would let that become a disadvantage; Haku had since learned to depend on other skills. But, he supposed, maybe Temari had thought further ahead. If she had entertained the idea of children— and a father to them he might someday be, how could they be taught if they dwelled in the desert, if the Hyōton were passed down to them?

It felt ridiculous to think of such a thing. That likely was not what she wanted, or was even remotely what Temari was trying to infer by this conversation. Haku glanced down to his rabbit loping beside him as they hiked, You've made me think of such strange things now, Pua. I never thought you'd put me in such a predicament!

Haku fished for other possible concerns Temari had, "If that were the only thing I would have to renounce while in Suna… it would be a pittance to pay. To be with you." He could tell she was watching him from the corner of her eye, "To have to travel, conduct secret missions, and be away from you… well. That's much more difficult, and that's the price I'm paying now."

She turned her face away as her cheeks pinkened, "Nice of you to say that…"

"It's true."

"Though you might just… hate living in Suna. It's not relaxing. Have you ever had to rush home before a sandstorm rolls in, and Gaara's not around to stop it? Gotten stuck in one?" Temari aired some of her complaints, "How about when there's a food or resource shortage? And water rations are required, meaning that even if you stink after a mission, and the council declares an emergency cap on daily limits— sometimes you can't bathe. Plus, every other place you'd like to be is a two day's journey at minimum, even the Tide Village."

"Ah." He was nodding, "Where is the part where you tell me something that changes my mind?"

"Every village has its pros and—"

"My dad would've disliked you." Temari imagined, "Not that it matters what a dead man thinks. But I swear he haunts the house, and if you lived with us he might—"

Haku gave his head a shake and listened as Temari circumlocuted her actual fears. He tried to reason with her, "Your-? Haunting? Temari, that's nonsense, and if it happens to be true, what on earth would stop us from living in a place of our own?"

"I'm just—"

"Why not tell me what actually makes you think…" Haku leveled his gaze with hers, "It wouldn't work?"

Again, Temari was not very prompt with a response as she wrestled with whatever was rankling at her. They scaled a tall outcrop of basalt and stopped at the peak. Temari waffled for a time before looking at him again, "I… just haven't started to believe that you actually want to."

He smiled softly, "Feel free to start."

"If it were that easy! I… still… don't know for certain that you'll be back. That you won't end up in a ditch, bash your head and forget all of this, get captured or blackmailed— that you might find someone you like better." Temari confessed the cynical ideas that had been dogging her, "Because of what you're doing, I've got to be a little skeptical of everything. You burned me once and I can't forget that. I wouldn't do that to you… I don't think I could."

Haku's face fell as the words sunk in.

"I've never needed to fall back on anyone thanks to my dad's stubbornness— that quality rubbed off on me. I always looked out for Kankuro and my team, and now Gaara… I've led squads and I answer to councils. If things get fucked up, I have to deal with it on my own." She blinked her eyes hard, refusing to cry, "If I could choose who I want to catch me when I finally go down, I want it to be you. So say that's what I choose. Am I as good as caught? Is this where I put my trust even when it is one of the hardest things for me, to do that?"

Between their feet, Pua had slumped sideways and begun eating some mystery desert grass. Temari held Haku's stare and watched him process the mental sledgehammer she had deployed. She drew the line in the sand here. If he bungled it, or expressed any doubts of his own, Temari expected that she may never see him again, or something close to it. After having laid all of her cards on the table like this, she had promised herself she would only do it once.

Haku's fingertips slid beneath her hands, enfolding them in his own as he spoke, "You are all I need."

'Ah shit, he didn't bungle it.' She puffed her cheeks slightly, now so sentimental that she was almost sick of herself. It had been a gradual transformation, converting her into sappy dreamer with a tough-looking exterior. Wow, Temari thought. She actually ate this romantic hooey up.

"I've had plenty of time to learn what I don't need." Haku clarified, thinking back to when he had rashly parted from Gaara's group when they had originally set out for Suna years back, "Though if I'd listened to you from the start, it would have saved us much time."

"Thank you for finally admitting that." She wore a satisfied smirk.

"Oh, not at all. I should be thanking you for humoring such a stupid person."

"Heh! You wouldn't be the first one I've put up with." Her mood improved.

He bent to kiss her and Temari angled herself into him, thrilled to put her hands on him, and that he was dressed like some faraway land's prince. Hake palmed the side of her face and relished the feeling for as long as he could. She could have confidence in him. He could hand-deliver every single reason she needed to be sure that he would return, and hold her, kiss her just like this. She could fall and never know the ground, because he would be there.

"I will..." Haku promised her, "Be back as soon as I can. Or rather, it would be quicker and more efficient to meet you in the middle."

"The Tide Village is perfectly suited for a casual date night."

"Didn't you say you have a vacation property there?" Haku recalled.

Temari nodded, "I already put a slip with the address in your travel bag. Of course, I would've told you to burn it if you'd messed this up."

"I am not," He kissed her, then continued, "Messing anything up."

"Mnn." She believed it and tilted her head up for another kiss.

The greatest misfortune of the moment was that the day would not wait, and Haku had to move on and reach the cover of foothills beyond the Land of Wind by nightfall. He set out after fond parting words and lingering touches. Temari took flight on her fan, following Haku for a distance as her shadow trickled on the ground beside his own. Near the border, she turned 'round as she had said she would.

And Haku's heart felt so light and free through dark footpaths and valleys, climbing up and up. His rabbit was a sheen of white on the first mountain's spine, and his own spirit a glowing blue.
It was a full day's journey before the towering peaks and faces of the Land of Mountains crowded the skyline.

Autumn cold had set in fully here, frosting the ground and dimming the sky above tall, murky conifers. Streams rolling down divots in rock were ruthlessly chilled to the touch. Haku camped beside a rushing brook overnight, huddled up with his rabbit, and was woken by a sunrise that pierced the dreary landscape, assailing his eyelids. He refilled a canteen, checked his inventory of valuables for sale, secured weapon holsters, and then reviewed his instructions.

'It is key that I do not give vital information about myself in a place like this. And Zabuza said it would be inevitable that people will ask.' He recalled as he hiked on, 'Those attending this auction are incredibly well-connected with contacts and information channels. However unlikely it is that someone recognizes something about me…I have to ensure that no one knows what village I am affiliated with.' The premise seemed easy enough. He looked so totally other at the moment, and could act as ambiguously as he wished. The trick was, hopefully, not encountering anyone he knew at this event.

Jiraiya had advised, 'If you see or sense Orochimaru there, leave. I don't care if you walk out with the money or not. Don't use your Cursed Seal, obviously. Actually...don't use any Seals if you can help it.' And also, 'Try to stay away from the really foreign people. Some of them have more mercenary ambitions than most shinobi, and what's worse, you'll probably have no idea what they are until it's too late.'

He was no xenophobe, but Haku could not help but be rattled by such an assertion about the exotic folk he might encounter. What could they possibly want? Wasn't he going to this place to sell some heirloom jewelry and baubles to make a swift profit? 'If other transactions take place here, I don't want to know about it…'

Pua seemed to be in excellent health and kept pace very well over the final ridge. On the far side of a mountain, terraced from top to bottom with tree cover and gigantic, glacier-deposited stones…there was a glimpse of a magnificent estate. Between pine boughs Haku could see the genesis of a network of buildings so immaculately constructed that it seemed a mistake to place them in such difficult terrain. Sprawling, walled gardens with flowers that seemed sprung from dreams—copper and gold gilded roofs, replete with statues and enormous shachihoko…white stone, massive timber beams supporting a house that could fit an emperor and all of his court.

As Haku drew nearer, he could then see a few visitors climbing up the winding path from the mountain's bottom, proceeding to the front gate of Keiseki House. He too made his way there and instructed Pua, "Get past the retaining wall and then go to one of the gardens. Wait for me there, Pua. Do not attract anyone's attention, alright?" His rabbit obediently did as she was told, disappearing into the bramble of the forest.

Stepping lightly down the slope, Haku finally arrived at the entryway of the estate, and was acknowledged by a well-dressed greeter, "Good morning, sir. Are you here for the exhibition and auction? If you did not reserve in advance, and intend to sell any merchandise today, please follow the signs to our appraisers' office. They'll help set a starting price and confirm the authenticity of your goods."

"Thank you." Haku then asked, "What time does the auction begin?"

"You're quite early! The exhibition begins just after noon with a banquet and refreshments. The auction is scheduled for 4:00 this afternoon."

Haku thanked the greeter again before moving on over a cobbled walkway hedged with flowers, ficus, and fruit trees. As prospective buyers moved leftward up a staircase into the building proper, Haku followed a directory towards a ground-floor office on the right, entering on that level to find servants scurrying about the place. A man in a suit spied him from across the room, and beckoned with his hand. Haku crossed the lavish space to a counter equipped with lamps, velvet trays and delicate tools. He was taken off-guard to be greeted by a handshake, as opposed to a traditional bow.

How are you today, good sir?

Ah. Oh gosh. What was the business language here again? Haku kept his breathing steady as he realized that he could not understand the appraiser at all.

The suited man detected Haku's reluctance and then tried again in Nihongo, "How are you today, good sir?"

"Oh! Very well, thank you."

"I apologize. Many of our vendors speak Hanwen at this event." The man adjusted soft gloves on his hands, "How can I help you? What sort of product are you offering today?"

And on that cue Haku presented the remaining treasures that Zabuza had stolen from a rich dignitary in the Land of Water. If the appraiser, who introduced himself as Kunizo, found the items at all suspicious, nothing in his face or actions suggested it in the slightest. He methodically turned the pieces over in his hands one by one, examining each with a glass eye piece, searching for identifiers like creator, age, metal, geography, occasionally jotting notes onto a pad.

After what felt like fifteen minutes or so, Kunizo tapped numbers into a calculator and then scratched totals down. He worked with virtually no verbal feedback to Haku. When the appraiser picked up an ornate collar necklace, he gave a pressing look to Haku, "This is hard to price."

"It is?"

"It could be priceless, in today's market. It may be worth keeping, as this will only increase in value over time. Jade is extremely valuable and sought after, and you won't see many pieces at the exhibition nearly this fine. These here?" Kunizo pointed out smaller stones set in the metal with a tweezer, "These are sapphires. And here, diamonds." He pointed out the row of inlaid gems, "This gold is a high carat weight, and the mix of green jade with mutton fat jade is guaranteed to draw every eye here. You could ask whatever you wanted for it and be sure to sell…"

"How much for the rest?" Haku wondered, as if he had any reason to keep an heirloom piece.

"This here," Kunizo motioned over a velvet tray of jewelry he'd examined, "Altogether, could fetch between 500,000 and 800,000 Ryo. Offers may go slightly higher. I have each piece priced and they will be categorized accordingly on the exhibition floor. This tea cup…" He motioned to a jade teacup, "Could fetch 600,000 by itself, considering its age and condition, but there are many others available like it today. The necklace…” Kunizo exhaled, thinking, "15 million Ryo, easily. In the future, much more."

"I intend to sell it today."

Kunizo smiled, "Not interested in an investment, I see. But that's well enough, considering its rarity and exquisite craftsmanship. This bracelet," He pointed out, "Is counterfeit. It is not permitted to be sold here."

Haku smiled and extended his hand, "Thank you for telling me. I can give it to a young girl at home who would like it."
Kunizo returned the fake bracelet to Haku, sorted the rest, and hovered his pen over the pricing sheet, "Your name, sir?"

"...Yuki Haku."

Kunizo took down the details, "Selling as a proxy, or yourself?"

"Myself." He could not implicate Zabuza.

"Very good. The auction will begin promptly at 4 o'clock. Would you like to make these items," Kunizo indicated the tray of less valuable jewelry, "Available on the exhibition floor? Should you set a maximum price that is met or exceeded, you can permit an automatic sale my office will transact for you. The jade cup and necklace are better suited for auction bidding."

"I would prefer that, yes." It sounded like the best way to save time.

"Very well." Kunizo finally smiled a fake, close-mouthed smile that almost reflected goodwill. He seemed to have picked up on the fact that Haku was not the handshaking type, and instead bowed slightly, "Please follow that staircase at the edge of the room to our exhibition upstairs, Yuki-san. It won't be completely set up until noon, but please make yourself comfortable in our atrium or gardens if you wish. An attendant will bring you anything you ask, if you wear this." He handed Haku an amber stone pin, "To indicate you're a vendor. They are treated with preference."

Haku bowed in kind, "Thank you, Kunizo-san." He fit the pin to the front of his vest and carried on upstairs.

How surreal. He had no idea that the politician in the Water Country who had been traveling with a pathetic excuse for a guard, could have the gall to carry such expensive valuables where a shinobi like Zabuza might stray into his path. Though that dignitary had escaped with his life after being ambushed and robbed, he had probably wept every night since. That's what Haku imagined, at any rate.

To his surprise, it was already quite crowded on the palace's main level, and it was only morning. Many guests must have arrived days in advance and secured accommodations. Haku supposed those must have been more high-profile visitors.

He tried not to whip his head wildly around to take in his surroundings. The ceilings must have been 15 meters high, with two levels above the main floor railed off so that guests could look down on the atrium he stood in. Skylights poured morning sun into the space.

Flowering trees grew from recesses in the wood floor, and a large koi pond with charming masonry and stonework had gathered many delighted guests who tossed feed into the water. He reminded himself he was still indoors, though so many natural aspects had been incorporated in the home's interior. Haku calmly surveyed from the edge of the atrium, mapping the wood beams, terraces, stairways, exits and corridors in his mind's eye.

Had he not been warned that awful people would be present, Haku might've assumed this to be a glamorous, enchanting venue. It was unlike anything he had ever seen in great shinobi nations.

On the north side of the atrium, he found huge wooden doors into which mythological creatures had been carved. Beyond that was the sprawling exhibition hall, filled with glass cases of all sizes, demarcated by the types of items being sold. Haku peeked in but did not enter. He could see antiques, jewelry, historical artifacts, texts, books and scrolls; ostentatious, rich costumes set on full body mannequins—all facets of aristocratic bliss and indulgence. He slipped away from the heavy doors and crossed back toward an exit, where gardens awaited beyond the stone steps.

Haku marveled at birds perching overhead in the eaves of the roof, narrow beams and nestboxes deliberately placed there to house them. Peafowl roamed without borders. Finches, cotingas, and topaz swooped to land on garden keepers stooped in flowerbeds, pestering them for treats. When he glanced to a fence on his left that supported fronds of wisteria, a modest, brown lyrebird perched there and observed him. Haku stared at it and then gaped when the bird reproduced the sounds of a koto, the first movement of a song it had heard and committed to memory. It was a pure mimic of the instrument.

'This is absolutely…' Haku wandered around and thought, 'The most gratuitous place in existence.'

He kind of loved it.

It catered to his appreciation of nature and the arts. Fine pottery and sculpture abounded. The building itself was a masterpiece. By God, if he hadn't vowed to live a humble life, he might've worked his way into this circuit if he had known of it.

Being born to impoverished farmers had certainly lowered his chances of ever seeing a place like Keiseki House, but Haku supposed all odds could be conquered, even those worse than his own. He had even thought for only a moment that he ought to keep the priceless jade necklace for himself, and to return one day when it had doubled in value.

That, of course, ignored the short-term consequences of electing such an investment. The lack of a sale could mean less funding to attract the rebels Zabuza was desperate to recruit. A lack of shinobi forces meant less of a chance of retaking the Mist Village, and ousting the Akatsuki there. To that end, such a choice could negatively impact Gaara and Naruto.

So Haku had only been tempted for a moment, and the idea passed when he thought of the people he loved and what threatened them.

He spent the morning in the wilds of the garden, silently reuniting with Pua there as she lounged in the clover beds, gorging herself. Watching his voracious pet made him hungry too.

Haku requested something for a meal, anything simple like rice and fish, but nothing was simple here. He was led by a servant to a veranda that overlooked the garden and its circus of birds, and at a small tea table he was served a pretentious meal that even a daimyo could get flustered over. Haku savored every bite as he watched two peacocks in the garden challenge each other, fanning their tails in an attempt to curry favor with a neighboring peahen. Shortly after noon, he was refreshed, delighted, and prepared to explore the estate more. The exhibition was underway.

Haku left through the vast garden’s opposite end, into another sector of the house where he discovered a lofty room outfitted with the most boggling formations of stones and minerals that could be extracted from the earth. Gigantic quartzes of all colors as tall as human beings, some unrefined and others polished. Obelisks of striped onyx stood nearly the height of the ceiling. Agates, citrine, lazulite, azurite, rutile of all sizes, bismuth crystals grown to uncanny volumes… Polished faces in petrified wood, endless rows of fossils, geode halves that could house a grown person, if one chose to climb inside the jagged crystal. Truly, nothing was simple here. It was all too much. No normal collector would know what to do with such superfluous mineral curiosities.

Keeping to himself as collectors fawned over the displays, Haku circled the room twice, choosing his favorite stones and gems before noticing a corridor perpendicular to the mineral exhibit. No one had come from or ventured into the hall, though signs pointed out that the show continued into the passageway. He treaded through the corridor and immediately noted how it was unlit. Devoid of lamps or windows. It was completely enclosed, and as he ventured further he realized why.

Shortwave ultraviolet lamps were positioned all about the rectangular room Haku arrived in, setting the fluorescing specimens within aglow. A dozen pedestals on one side of the room displayed impressive, spherical stones polished to a high gloss, radiating different colored light. On the room's opposite side, spheres of immense size were seated on a dais, emitting a jade-green glow. It was as if celestial bodies had been pulled down from the sky to be put for sale.

"Quite something, aren't they?" A voice came from the dark.

Haku was puzzled when he squinted around, unable to spot another occupant. Rather than assume he was contacted by a ghost, or that he'd gone mad, he replied politely, "These are magnificent! What are they?"

A presence appeared beside him, setting Haku's hairs on end when he got an explanation, "These are Yemengzhu, luminous pearls that came from a mine in the Kingdom of Han."

"Perhaps a misnomer? These are no pearls." Haku pointed out, trying to discretely get a look at the other guest.

"Right. This is fluorite and it will glow unassisted in the dark. My family has always said that simply touching it will bless you with years of luck." The voice sounded amused, "You should touch this one if you plan to sell anything. You'll make a better sale."

"You think so?" Haku patted the giant orb, "Isn't there a story that says dragons gather these?"

"There is and they do." The voice chuckled, "I am a dragon."

Surprised again, Haku turned to see the specter in the dark and beheld a man about his age, dressed in a fine tang suit. He was faced away from Haku, eyes settled on the largest sphere, arms folded. He was smiling.

"I don't suppose dragons can afford these, then?" Haku quipped.

A laugh in reply, "Hardly. What my parents have at home is small and cherished. Why would I waste 205 million Ryo on Yemengzhu so preposterously large—? When the smaller is just as lucky?"

"I would think the same." Haku agreed.

"There's more exhibition to see. I've been here a few times before, but the glowing hall is what I gravitate to." The young man said, "Care for a tour? Mister—?"

"Haku."

"This way, Haku-san." He moved to the far end of the room, "I am Huo."

Haku smiled in fright and simultaneously began to sweat more. No, surely not that Huo, the one his friends had spoken of? Not the dangerous one that used Tao Arts. Not that one.

Out in the light, passing through the gem hall once again, Huo stopped at a table of jaspers that came in every color of the rainbow. He then took a closer look at Haku, assessing him, and his narrow eyes widened slightly, "Hanbok."

"I didn't think it was too formal." Haku reasoned playfully, trying to be as friendly as possible. So his odd attire had become a conversation starter. Wonderful.
When Huo spoke again, it was in another language, What family are you from? Do you speak Joseon-mal?

"Ah…" Haku was crestfallen by the codeswitching, "I don't understand."

"Dressed like that, I thought you were from Joseon. I don't speak that language so well. Hanwen is my mother-tongue." Huo explained, "You are from neither Han or Joseon, nor Sindhu, no…not with your look." He scrunched his face to make a determination, "Your Nihongo is perfect."

"Perhaps because I," Haku moved down the table, "Am from Nihon."

Haku heard a clatter as a piece of jasper was picked up from a tray, and he detected a spike of movement. He turned quickly and caught the rock thrown at his head.

Huo was startled that he hadn't knocked the pretty boy in the hanbok senseless. His mouth pulled into a half-smile, "Ninja."

"Huo-san, has anyone ever told you it's rude to throw goods that are for sale?" Like a scolding mother, Haku dared take Huo’s hand and placed the jasper in it, "Put that back or they'll call you a thief."

Oddly, Huo did just that. He followed Haku as they proceeded through the gem exhibit to the next, where large art installations were arranged in a gallery.

"Several of these are my father's." Huo noted, eyeing the submissions of contemporary, three-dimensional art, "My adoptive father. I wondered if he would be here today, but he is selling through an agent again."

"Do you not see him often?" Haku examined the sculpture; some kind of beautiful, polished resin of transparent to opaque white tones, forming a human eye. Within the pupil (a hollow feature) was a butterfly carved from crystal. Haku could not think about what the art was trying to convey, but rather, what did it say about the man who made it? And what his son thought of him?

"It's been a long time." Huo acknowledged, "I imagine they would like me to come home, after I've been gone for so long…but my obligations no longer allow me to see my parents in Iwagakure."

"If they are involved in the arts, is that why you are here? Hoping to see them?" Haku guessed.

Huo smiled ruefully at the observation, "They are also collectors. But I didn't have much of a hope that they'd travel this far. Besides, I have other business to attend to here."

"I am sorry to hear that you must stay parted from them." Haku could actually lend a bit of sympathy, "I know how difficult that can be."

Huo raised his brows, "Oh? Can you relate to…being part of a despised clan?"

Haku was not sure how to answer that as they walked beneath an archway made entirely of seashells.

"That your birth parents believed things that were fundamentally wrong, and refused to recant those beliefs. Then when they were killed, you were an infant spared from bloodshed, and given to a childless, affluent couple who were overjoyed to have you?" Huo continued to stare at his father's eye sculpture, "And that you loved them deeply, but knew the sins of your birth parents weighed on you, so you agreed to atone for them? And learned from a master who showed you the true way?"
"…no, I…can't relate to those particulars."

"No? That you couldn't stop the witch who perpetuated those evils in your clan, stop her from returning life after life, or secure the weapons that could stop her? That she and her lackeys dishonored you? Tried to kill you? That you fought for your freedom and learned who your true friends are, in spite of it all?" Huo added, "And that you won't fail again?"

Like a deer in headlights, Haku stood there and understood why people were afraid of Huo.

"Then, Haku-san…" Huo treaded towards the westward exit, to a veranda outside of the house, "You don't know how difficult it was. At all."

When Haku did not initially follow, Huo was surprised. Haku thought it comedic. Did he not realize how he made other people feel? He seemed to be perfectly relaxed again, motioning for Haku to follow, "It's tea hour. Don't just stand there. There's no better tea in the world than what's served here."

How supremely odd it was to sit at a tea table with someone who swung wildly from mood to mood. Haku sat and made conversation, attempting not to say anything triggering or suggest that he understood Huo in some way, because clearly Huo didn't like that. They had an appreciation for the arts and history in common, which didn't require deeply personal information, thank goodness. And yes, the tea was an experience. They downed large pots of Dragon Well and Master Mountain Silver Needle teas consecutively.

Disregarding tact, Huo eventually asked, "Which clan are you from?"

"That's not something I feel at ease talking about in a place like this." Haku wanted to steer away from the subject. It wasn't his clan, after all. He knew he was descended from the Yuki clan, but they had no actual claim to him, and vice versa. Was there any use in explaining that?

"I am of the Sa Gou, the Sasagainu clan, as it's called here. Though my clan is virtually nonexistent, these days." Huo dangled his heritage as if to indicate there was no harm in doing so, though no one really believed that. He was just too cavalier about, well, everything, Haku figured.

"Is that right?" He delayed with a sip of tea.

Huo motioned to refill their tea cups, "Come now, don't be a coy tiger. If you have claws then reveal them. Shinobi need not hide who they are."

"It depends on the shinobi."

"You're not a native of Iwagakure. Not Kumogakure either, judging by your complexion."

"How can you be so sure?" Haku was bemused.

"I can be so sure. I am well versed and well-traveled."

"How unfortunate for me." Haku thought.

"What do you think I care about such trifling information?" Huo scoffed, "If a Kamizuru clansman or descendant of the Senju sat here, what more would I do other than tell them to fuck off?" He reasoned, "And you are neither of those."

"I suppose…it would be announced at the auction anyway, since I am a vendor." Haku recalled, "Yuki is my family name."
There was a silence as Huo sipped tea and stared unseeing into the gardens, as if the name had dissipated into thin air and been wasted on him. Haku did not truly expect anyone to be familiar with such an obscure, reclusive clan anyway.

"No wonder." Huo muttered.

There was a moment in which Haku nearly went into full cardiac arrest, astonished that someone could actually recognize the name or perhaps know more about it. Know more than he did.

Haku probed carefully, "Oh, so you've heard of us?"

"Your situation is not so different from my own, then. From one member of a diminished clan to another." Huo acknowledged and added, "It would explain while you are here to sell goods. Times must be hard."

Haku nodded wearily in an attempt to play along.

"Those wars in Hidden Mist did the Water Country's clans no favors, yours least of all. Are you still nomads?"

Nomads! Haku wanted to exclaim, but he had to contain himself. "At present, yes." He supplied answers he hoped Huo could believe.

"What a shame. My comfort for the loss of your leader. I see you've been named after him. I suppose Kahyō took up the mantle in his place?" Huo began to drop names and again, Haku wanted to pitch a fit as he was presented with incalculably rare information.

"You know her?" Haku inferred Kahyō was a feminine name.

"Not very well. Her brother is that big man, Rahyō. We've met before. As far as I know, they are the only warriors in your clan brave enough to show their faces internationally." Huo smiled wickedly, "The rest are timid and talentless."

"Do you wish to insult me?" Haku cautioned him.

"I don't. It's curious to see someone young like you here. How were you trained? You must be… especially gifted." Huo supposed.

"To be homeless and scraping by to survive…I've learned that I have to relentlessly better myself."

"And that you did." Huo agreed.

Though he would've paid any insane price to do so, Haku could not keep the subject on the Yuki clan, try as he might. It was too treacherous to navigate conversation as if he knew them, and not give any hints to Huo that in fact he did not. Huo had only gleaned superficial information about the clan in his brief encounters with them, but the nuggets of information he shared made all of the difference in the world to Haku. He was named after the leader of the Yuki clan! He had relatives he could now name and search for. He could confirm the clan was transitory, most likely without a permanent residence.

'And what would it have taken...to actually wring this information out of Zabuza?' Haku thought darkly.

Conversation returned to their opinions on the mineral exhibit and the art gallery, and Huo suggested that Haku visit the vintage fashions gallery at least once before the auction was in full swing.
"Few here actually come for the gemstones, clothing or, really, any cultured exhibit that Keiseki House has to offer. It's sad." Huo sniffed, "Year after year there seems to be less interest. These rich fools care not for their roots or ancestry."

"Then what does capture their interest?" Haku wondered.

"The weapons." Huo stated simply, "Have you seen that exhibit? It's a disgrace. So small and specialized. The technology gallery too, enthralls them. All of modernity and the future excites them like schoolchildren— money burning a hole in their pockets."

Raising his brows, Haku noted, "I don't think I've seen those exhibits yet."

"No?" Huo clacked his cup down, "Let's go look. So you can see the absurdity for yourself."

They rose from the table to re-enter the building, moving eastward through doorways and corridors, bypassing the atrium and arriving at the most crowded gallery of all. Indeed, the displays were fewer as Huo had said. Only a single glass case contained what Haku considered relevant shinobi weapons. A few chokuto swords shined; hilts and guards inlaid with unnecessary gold and gems. Beside those were jian and rare assassination weapons more commonly found in the Kingdom of Han. Aside from those, there was nothing at all that a ninja could be interested in.

There were display stands on tables crowded with people, allowed to touch and examine whatever was for sale. Small devices controlled by tactile screens, lightweight in the hand. Huo lifted one to ridicule it.

Haku was dubious over the contraption, "What is that?"

"A mobile. They're all the rage in Orbis, Euroa, and Sindhu. Han and Joseon are producing these and advancing them, as all of society becomes obsessed." Huo roughly dumped the device back on its stand, "It's for civilizations that lack jutsu, and can't comprehend a division of shinobi who can communicate thoughts and orders through their minds. Or Seal complex ideas, physical matrices and energy for outcomes that," He jabbed his thumb at the mobile, "No little screen can perform."

"Well, shinobi are not the sort to proliferate in this world. They've kept to the great villages and lands of Nihon." Haku reasoned, "Other nations need to find ways to progress and improve themselves too."

Huo turned for the gallery's exit and reasoned, "They're all brainwashed. You'll see."

Haku wished to linger, "Huo-san, do you mind if I stay here a while to look around?"

"Do as you like. I have to meet with my master and prepare to bid for auction items." Huo bowed respectfully to him, "I appreciate your company today, Haku-san. Perhaps we will meet again later this evening."

Though it felt sort of wrong, Haku smiled at him, "Thank you for showing me around, Huo-san. Take care."

Once Huo had vacated the modern gallery he detested, Haku allowed himself to be more inquisitive about the world's technological offerings. He dithered over displays, poking his face between shoulder-to-shoulder crowds. The "tech" here, or so guests referred to it, was top of line as far as they were concerned. It wasn't like the cathode ray tube televisions that some shinobi villages had around, landline telephones that were gradually being introduced, or radios that ninja squads relied on (though those were advancing rapidly as well.)
This was something else. These communicated through transmissions, through air, faster than radio waves. These things were bright screens and convenience and a network of intelligence and communication that so far shinobi were oblivious to. Or perhaps not. Maybe some villages were aware of this tech, and wished to harness it?

Haku puzzled over a row of box-like machines that were sleekly designed, had few inputs and sparse blinking lights, internal fans whirring to keep them cool. "What are these?" Haku asked another guest.

The man chuckled at him, "Have you ever seen something like this? It's the newest hardware for servers. Something like 100 terabytes, my brother said."

"Terabytes." Haku repeated. He glanced around, wondering if there was material to review that actually explained all of this.

His drifting eventually brought him beyond the small and medium screens, past the recondite hardware and accessories, and to displays with curious products that could be handled. When Haku stopped at the standing table in a free space, he met eyes with another guest on the opposite side.

'…Rock Lee?!' Haku could not believe it.

No, he couldn't.

What the devil would Lee be doing in such a grandiose exhibition that did not overlap with his ambitions in any way? Haku made a quick determination he was not looking at Lee, however this person was in most every way the spitting image of him. The eyes and prominent brows, the dark hair, complexion and facial features, down to the physical frame and body type— though this man was most certainly older and was dressed to the nines. Furthermore, he'd noticed Haku wasn't blinking.

"…ēn…?" The man said uncertainly.

"Ah, I apologize." Haku reinstated his manners, "I just thought…I knew you from somewhere?"

"Maybe you do!" The man was instantly cheerful, "If you noticed any new cinema posters, then maybe. I just wrapped my last shoot."

"A film star? Here?" Haku acted surprised but was not even remotely.

"Celebrity." The man corrected with a sparkling white grin, "Damn, I thought I wouldn't be recognized out here. Nǐ huì shuō Hányǔ ma?"

To the best of Haku's knowledge, he'd been asked again if he spoke Hanwen.

"No, I don't."

"Méi wèn tí. You really don't know who I am?" The man pouted, "Just a vague thing, eh? Well I am much bigger in the west, so that's not unusual. Nihon has no taste at all."

"If that were so, local nobles would not be throwing their money away in Keiseki House." Haku disagreed.

"Right, right!" The man laughed, "Then let me indulge and introduce myself as an ordinary man, then, to a non-fan. The name's Wan Kam." Again, Haku had to deal with an informal hand shake as opposed to bowing, but he was quickly getting used to it.
He replied in kind, "I'm Haku."

"Xīnɡ huì, xīnɡ huì!" He was very friendly, in spite of slipping in-between languages.

"Have you ever been to one of these exhibitions before, Wan Kam-san—?"

Wan Kam flicked his hands disdainfully, "No, no, no...honorifics...ugh, that's so stuffy. I won't be calling you Haku-san or whatever they say around here."

"Ah." This level of informality was weird, Haku thought. The whiplash could have been caused by speaking to Huo, who was very formal in his speech...while also being shockingly rude.

"Yeah, I've been here a few times." Wan Kam confirmed as he perused the display table, "Every other year or so, I like to come back here."

"It is an irresistible place." Haku agreed, "You're from the Kingdom of Han?"

"I am. I live and work there now, though I used to..." Wan Kam lifted an item from a display to turn it over in his hands, "Live in the Fire Country, for a short time."

Oh.

This was not a cosmic coincidence.

This person was probably related to Lee. Very closely related. Haku was sure of it.

Wan Kam flagged down a passing servant, "Ah! Xiǎojiě, qǐng gěi wǒ lái yī bēi hóngjiǔ—" He amended his order when he considered Haku was present, "Èr bēi! Èr bēi hóngjiǔ. Xiè xie!"

The young woman nodded politely and scurried off, and Wan Kam explained, "I ordered us something to drink. It's afternoon now."

"You're too kind. I didn't need anything." Really, Haku thought, alcohol was not going to help him get through this.

"Don't be so polite." Wan Kam waved the display product in his hand, "Nice outfit. Are you from Joseon?"

"Thereabouts."

"I'm no good with Joseon-mal. There's plenty of people here who'll speak it, though." He changed the subject, "So! Have you come here to see these?" Wan Kam indicated the for-sale item in his palm.

"I can't say that I have. What is it?" Haku asked.

Wan Kam flipped his hand with ease and pressed the barrel to Haku's forehead, a sharp twinkle in his eye, "It's a pistol."

"A what?"

"A gun! To kill people with!" Wan Kam explained merrily, drawing the weapon back, "Much quicker than the old-fashioned weapons people use out here."

Haku rubbed the tender spot on his forehead, alarmed by Wan Kam's disregard for boundaries.
"Sorry, Haku. Didn't frighten you there, did I?"

"Ignorance shielded me." Haku admitted.

"Heh heh! Someone from Joseon who doesn't flinch at guns..." His smile grew shadowy, knowing, "Don't you try to fool me, young fella. I know what you are."

Haku was undaunted, "What am I?"

"A ninja, of course. I've met those types. Like I said, I was stuck in the Fire Country for a while." Wan Kam spun the pistol in his hand, "Got out of that dump as soon as I had the chance..."

"Should you be toying around with that?" Haku now had a greater respect for the weapon.

"Nah, none of these are loaded on the exhibition floor. If you want to try them out you have to go downstairs to the firing range and be supervised. I like this model." Wan Kam explained, "I'll be buying it today. And another. Can't wait to see what else the auction has to offer..."

"Is this what people are interested in?" Haku tried to veil his disgust.

"Oh sure! That and the tech. It's funny because Nihon really doesn't have systems to support all of this stuff yet. Tch! As if they'd work on infrastructure while they're busy waging war with their shuriken and caltrops!" Wan Kam snorted with laughter.

Unwilling to even pretend to smile, Haku reserved his reply and let his eyes scan the room again. Maybe he would glimpse Huo and his associates, or find some reason to excuse himself. "You know..." There was a lilt of caution in Wan Kam's voice, "You don't want to get near that one...Sasagainu Huo."

Haku gave Wan Kam an unimpressed look as the man played with a different model of firearm.

"Ha! I'm one to talk, right?" Wan Kam jokingly positioned the gun under his own chin, then set it down again. "I saw you come in here with him. Guess he doesn't seem any more threatening than the rest of us...but I've heard a thing or two. Huo's a fanatic. He believes in some pretty crazy things."

"Such things were briefly discussed." Haku granted.

"Did he make you a believer?"

"There are few people in this world who make me believe in anything." Haku wagered, "And he isn't one of them."

The attendant returned with two glasses of wine, and Wan Jam gratefully accepted them. He passed a glass of the red vintage to Haku, raising his cup in a small toast, "Then bless the few you believe in! And damn the many you see straight through." He took a gulp after that while Haku hovered, unsure of how to interact with someone he saw little reason to trust.

"Huo isn't wrong about everything he says. I've overheard him years back, prattling on to his companions and whatnot. The Tao is a part of this world, and he does understand its path and purpose in the Three Realms, the convergence of spirituality and karma..." Wan Kam acknowledged, "And it's true that some folks can take advantage of Tao Arts...and cultivate powers or immortality. But the balance of the Tao will exact a price for those things. I bet he and his pals hate paying the steep prices for the gifts they so badly want to have."
"Are Tao Arts inherent to some people...only a privileged few?" Haku asked a question that he'd thought of back in Suna, "Or is anyone able to learn?"

"Wouldn't you like to know?" Wan Kam smiled above his wine glass.

"It'd be silly not to ask."

A titter of squeals and excitement interrupted them, and Haku sidestepped a gaggle of young women who had spotted Wan Kam and rushed up to him, fawning over him in Hanwen. His debonair cooing seemed to placate as the group ordered themselves, throwing up v-signs with their fingers to pose for photos. Some wished for autographs and some exchanged contact numbers. One particularly attractive girl lagged behind her peers as Wan Kam whispered something in her ear, and Haku did note how her eyes flicked to the egress of the room where accommodations for guests were located. She had been instructed where to appear that night, he supposed.

Once the girls had moved on, Wan Kam came to stand beside Haku, facing away as he clapped his hand on the young man's shoulder, "Listen up, Mr. Shinobi..."

Haku could detect the man's phony congeniality evaporating.

"I think you and all of your kind are trash. And the people who live in your ramshackle shinobi villages are trash too. You can repeat the cycle of war, ceasefire, rebuilding, and fucking it all up until the end of time while the rest of this planet moves on without you. I learned that long ago. I wait for no one." Wan Kam seemed joyful in his condescension, "You're not worthy of Tao Arts and you'll never learn. You're as pretty as you are dumb, so next time, you swat the gun out of the other man's hand, got it? Bèndàn."

When he patted Haku's shoulder again, Haku batted his hand away, hatred creeping into the soft lines of his face.

"Ha! What an expression. The sneer of a true non-fan. Been a while since I last saw that..." Wan Kam swirled wine in his glass and sauntered away, "Don't you dare fuck up my evening with your shinobi nonsense."

Haku walked calmly out of the gallery, down an attached corridor towards a far garden exit. He picked up speed to pitch the drinking glass out of an open window and into greenery. Flushed from his ears down to his neck, Haku simmered in anger. What a poisonous man.

How? How could such a person be related to Lee? Or be divided from him? Wan Kam was a product of affluence and drama, instead of sparsity and martial discipline, in Lee's case.

The foot traffic of guests began to flow towards the interior, bound for the auditorium where the auction was to take place. Gradually, Haku worked his way there, but could not stomach the prospect of being seated near any of the people he had met earlier. He stood near the back of the room to observe. The auctioneer at the front podium was robotic with his smiles and introductions, thanking sponsors and partners, and leading off with the sale of a gigantic, flawless diamond displayed in a case. It was also projected on a screen behind the podium.

Frantic bids began, curious sign language and bobbing cards directed the auctioneer's attention, while vendors and non-participant guests stayed on the peripheries to watch. The diamond, and many fine gemstones featured after it, sold for a scandalous sum, and numbers seemed to blur together as new items were offered. Old literary works, books, and texts fetched impressive bids. Those offerings were followed by an ancient urn adorned with historical paintings and poetry, various screens with classical artwork on each face, modern and antique master paintings, impressionistic sculpture.
Indescribable, small technologies whose function Haku was uncertain of were also hot-ticket items. Then a sequence of precious jade ornaments, pottery, and other items were introduced. The collar necklace Haku had put up for sale was brought out in due course.

"This piece is estimated to be less than one hundred years old, and possesses stunning cut diamonds and sapphire embellishments. The green and mutton fat jade incorporated in this necklace have no rival that can duplicate such exquisite beauty. Originally crafted in the Kingdom of Han, this piece has called Nihon home for some time now…” The necklace was briefly described before the auctioneer announced, "Bidding will begin at 15 million Ryo. Do we have fifteen—? Ah, thank you. Sixteen—?

The numbers ticked up and gave Haku a high, half shocked that bid cards were being raised to signal interest. Could anyone tell this was an ill-gotten piece of jewelry? Did no one care? How many other items here were stolen? Haku began to wonder. Bids exceeded 21 million and began to slow.

"Thank you. Do we have twenty-two? Twenty-two for this magnificent work?" The agent fished for a higher price, scanning those gathered with beady eyes, "Is there— ah!" He noticed a single bid card rise up, which Haku zeroed-in on as well. It was Huo who making the offer. Haku's stomach did petrified flips.

"Thank you, young sir! Twenty-three?" The auctioneer continued, "An offer of twenty-three? Thank you!" He acknowledged a man who seemed to hesitate, but his offer was trounced when a woman raised her card, "Ah! Twenty-four, thank you ma'am. Do we have twenty-five? Anyone here for twenty-five?" Bidding had halted entirely, "Going once, is there twenty-five? Twice…and— sold. Thank you!" The woman in a cape adjusted her fur collar, dithering as her companion leaned over to whisper congratulations.

Immediately afterward, the jade cup Haku had brought was also sold quickly for 700,000 Ryo. And that was that. He had accomplished his task as promised and maybe in those moments, far away in the Land of Water, Zabuza's palms started to itch now that he had become a richer man. Haku slipped silently from the auditorium to get air in the atrium, where crowds were slightly less dense than they had been.

He flagged down an attendant and requested a glass of water. Nearby on a bench beneath a mango tree that grew between slats of the wood floor, Haku sat down and gathered his thoughts. 'I think I can return to the appraiser's office for payment. I don't know how long that will take, but I'll leave as soon as they money is in hand.'

He considered again how Zabuza would feel about this, 'He never did care about getting rich, now that I think of it. He's never used money to secure himself luxuries or shelter. Not that that'd be very wise, considering his wanted status.' Haku concluded, 'If this plan works...and we do secure the cooperation of rebels that have been supporting Terumi Mei...what will his life be like afterward? I know what I want for myself. But maybe Zabuza will pursue wealth and an easy lifestyle after all the trouble he's gone through. He even told me he doesn't know exactly what to do, once the goal is accomplished.'

Really, Haku thought, Zabuza would make a terrible rich man. He'd probably forget to buy himself a home and just spend money on prostitutes incessantly.

A different server stopped by Haku and bowed in greeting before extending her hand, "Good evening. A gentleman asked me to give this to you."

Puzzled, Haku reached out and accepted a small, velvet pouch. She departed before Haku could ask any questions.
"What in the world…?" Haku mumbled to himself as he fiddled around, opening the pouch and finding it to be empty. He prodded and flattened it to make entirely sure, but indeed, he'd been given an empty sack. "Is this an insult?" He frowned to himself. What was the purpose? Was he missing another cultural nuance here, so that Wan Kam could call him bèndàn again?

On a whim, Haku turned the pouch inside out and discovered characters embroidered in the fabric. The words read: Make this flat and then fold it in half, then in half again. Squash it in your left hand…and then see what happens!

Certainly this was a joke. Just so some mystery person watching him could observe as he made a fool of himself, following nonsense instructions. But Haku's gut instinct did not quite agree. There didn't seem to be any kind of shinobi Sealing technique or otherwise on the pouch…but there was an intention present. Not quite malicious, and not quite trustworthy. Haku folded the velvet bag as instructed and squeezed it in his fist. When he opened his hand again—his skin could tell first—the bag had become something else. A piece of cardstock, no larger than the bag had been.

He felt a little nauseous. He hadn't imagined it. He had performed a magician's trick, made ever the more wild when Haku flipped the card and read the words on the reverse side: Huge fruit bowl.

'There is NO WAY,' Haku reaffirmed as he glanced around, 'One object just BECOMES something else. Material and all. And the words! What on earth—if it were POSSIBLE, it may as well have been a detonator for a bomb.' He flushed his head space with chakra in the hope a Genjutsu had caught him unawares, but no. He was untampered with. Haku squeezed the business card between the pads of his fingers, searched for any hint of velvet. It was well and truly paper. How could his perceptions betray him this way?

When his eyes fell upon the banquet area, Haku recalled the fruit bowl message. It so happened the banquet was abundant with produce. He stalked over to the dining area, shoulders tensing, and stopped once the large fruit bowl in question came into view. It was situated on an oak table banquette, and a lone man sat at there, his face turned downward, attention fixed on a mobile-type product. Haku had half a mind to ready senbon needles between his knuckles as he approached. The man seemed totally heedless. He had a cut up orange on a plate in front of him, and tapped away at the screen in his hands. Haku cleared his throat to get attention.

The man looked up and Haku beheld a rather handsome fellow, middling in age. He smiled so that the corners of his eyes scrunched with crow's feet, "Sit down, Haku."

Flabbergasted, he refused to sit, "I've had enough of people speaking to me as if we're old friends. Who are you?"

"Sit, good grief. I'm just trying to work this thing out. Gotta set up passwords and junk." The man typed with a tiny keyboard on the screen, "This'll be unsupported back at home, but I guess I can use it sometimes when I travel and have connectivity."

Warily, Haku sat on the bench but kept a wide berth from the occupant.

"Orange?" The man offered without looking up again.

Haku glanced at the plate and asked, "How did you…do that? With the pouch and card?"

"Hm. Well." The man put the mobile down and stretched his arms, "Firstly, it wasn't two objects I gave you. It was one."

"Don't be ridiculous."
"Really! Look!" The stranger lifted the mobile and pressed it between his palms flat-ways, obscuring it for a moment before it transformed into a round, white porcelain ornament. He set it down on the table, "Go on and touch it. It's real."

Haku dared not. He must've been losing his mind.

The man sighed, a bit disappointed. He lifted the now-ornament to work it between his hands again, changing it back into a mobile. "It's easy to fear the things you don't understand. But trust me, this is a pretty innocuous trick of mine. I would've gone a different route if I intended you any harm." He tapped the central button on the mobile and lit up the screen. When he held it up for Haku to see, there was a cartoonish depiction of Gamabunta in the background, beneath a military time clock reading.

A gasp stuck in his throat as Haku realized who he was speaking to: one of Jiraiya's old students!

"You're…Namba?" Haku asked.

"Yes, I am Namba. Now kindly keep your voice down." He too lowered his volume, "It can hurt to say too much out loud here."

"I had no idea if— Sensei said that—"

"I know he gave you some kind of warning that you'd find a friend here. It would work out better if you weren't actively looking for me, because…I don't want anyone actively looking for me." Namba smiled pleasantly, "Though I am very pleased to make your acquaintance, Haku. Sensei wrote to me and told me all about you…and Gaara and Naruto, of course."

All of the sour feelings that Haku had accumulated from his social interactions that day began to flake away, replaced by elation and curiosity. A veteran! A contemporary of the Fourth Hokage! What should he say?

"It's excellent to meet you." Haku smiled back, "It's a relief. I thought that no one trustworthy could be found here."

"Generally, no. Our meeting would be the rare exception to that rule. As it is, I'm technically not here. Not on official business, anyway. The Raikage would never allow me to investigate a place like this." Namba explained, "But I am inclined to help Sensei and Tsunade-sama when I can keep quiet about it."

"Oh yes, Hidden Cloud. You live there." The information was drifting back to Haku.

"It hasn't been easy. I've been treated like some backstabbing traitor for nearly two decades, even after I married, had children, and completed missions in Cloud. I suppose they'll always suspect I want to run back to Konoha, but what for?" Namba began chomping on orange slices, "I don't have to betray either of the villages I love to see them do better. Try as I might to promote that concept…some will nevertheless doubt me."

"Are you involved in diplomacy or councils-?"

"You bet. Heh heh! If you get into that kind of work, don't expect them to come up with nice nicknames for you. When it's my turn to speak, someone usually retorts with a "Leaf Scoundrel" or "Toad's Wart" or "Ass Clown" thinking I can't hear them chiming in from the back of the committee." Namba chewed more fiercely, "Such is life. I can tolerate it. It's when they try to insult my kids that my fangs come out." His eyes flashed dangerously.
"I've thought of doing something similar in my life. Settling down in Suna, possibly."

"Sensei mentioned that. A lateral transition in which an alliance already exists is bound to be easier."

Though it had taken a while, a frazzled-looking server darted over to Haku and presented him with a glass of water. He bowed apologetically, as if he'd lost track of Haku in the room after he'd wandered off. Haku sipped the drink gratefully as Namba ordered some sort of coffee beverage. After that, he re-thought his order, "I probably don't want all that acid in my stomach, but I just can't resist…"

"Namba, how did you change the mobile into an ornament?" Haku just had to know.

"Oh yes! Well…” He rubbed the corners of his mouth with his thumb, collecting orange rind bits, "You have a Kekkei Genkai yourself, so you understand what most needs to be understood. Though…my family has no history with this power. I'm the first to have it." Namba gestured at himself, "A genetic anomaly occurs and then…boom. New technique. If you think on it, most bloodline gifts resulted from mutations that were favorable, that, coupled with jutsu or affinities that clans already strived to work with. Then, those clans selectively bred to increase the frequency of characteristics they wanted to express. It's just much weirder when you're the first one expressing your anomaly. Or call it a quirk, if you're a Horikoshi fan."

"I can understand that." Haku agreed with the gist of it, "It doesn't seem like a fusion-type ability."

"It isn't. Not as far as I can tell…but tampering with the physical composition of things…by way of Yang element…very teensy increments I'm talking about here— it's something like that. I call it Revise." Namba filled him in, "I can't revise anything big. I can work on objects about a meter or less in length, but beyond that it wipes me out…or I can't get the composition right and it'll come out wrong. Super wrong. Most of the time I can't change things back when I mess them up that bad."

Eyes goggling, Haku listened about the strange ability Namba possessed.

"Also, I don't revise anything organic or alive. Ever." Namba nodded to himself, "Not to say that I couldn't change something small that was alive…but reconstituting matter even in tiny increments hurts something that can feel. I tried to revise a mouse once when I was younger…and when it started screaming I couldn't go on with it. I vowed never to try it again."

"That is fascinating." Haku yielded, "Even so…an ability like that could be incredibly valuable to espionage and object-focused missions."

Namba tried not to be too haughty about it, "I do tend to get top marks there. Everyone has a specialty."

"By that line of thinking…I might assume you came here for something." Haku reasoned.

"My, my, you are sharp." Namba was delighted, "Indeed. I wouldn't come here without a good reason. You saw the first segment of the auction, yes? Up until you made your own sales?"

"I did."

"Did you notice anything strange?"

"I…don't think so." Haku thought back on it.

"Good!" Namba said sunnily. He accepted his coffee drink when it arrived, nipping at the foam top before he went on, "What you and probably everyone else overlooked was a bid made during the introduction of those old texts and scrolls. I don’t think many people came here looking for ancient records or literature. They want jewelry, technology and weapons," He took a deeper sip of his drink and a line of foam clung above his lip like a mustache, "And the uninformed would never suspect a powerful weapon hidden within a scroll."

Haku pointed to his own mouth to indicate to Namba that he was now mustachioed. Namba removed the foam with a swipe of his tongue and went on, "A Tao Weapon was sealed in one of those scrolls."

Again, Haku endeavored not to shout in disbelief when he heard the news. He kept his voice down, "Did anyone know? Was it sold?"

"Someone certainly knew that Chōten was disguised among those old scrolls. No appraiser would be able to deduce exactly what it was, given its unique Sealing properties." Namba said quietly, "But Dintei Bi knew, and he was the one that won that bid. It's as good as his."

Now would not be an opportune time to scream, Haku thought, or overreact to the fact that he had been lollygagging about as a top-ranked criminal made a strategic move. He only knew so much, after all. Though he had heard enough from Jiraiya to know that Bihokokuni was not someone even a Kage would choose to oppose one-on-one, and that Bi likely colluded with Orochimaru and the Akatsuki to some extent.

"Yeah. 12 million Ryo bought Chōten, if you can believe it. And they mistakenly labeled it a Taoist text. Bi won that bid, but what he'll actually be picking up tonight is this—" Namba pulled a book from his tunic sleeve.

Icha Icha Paradise.

"Oh. O-Oh…" Haku was deeply concerned, "Did you—" He whispered, "Swap them?"

Something in Namba's grin echoed Jiraiya's mischief. Dear God it was true. He absolutely was a student of the Toad Sage, and Haku could not deny it after seeing such a dastardly smile.

Muffling a wild chuckle, Namba gulped his coffee again and then said, "I did it very carefully! I disguised Icha Icha as the scroll that Chōten was contained in— I had a good look at it in the gallery and could replicate it. As for the real Chōten…" He handed the smutty book to Haku, "I gave it a new dust jacket."

Haku muttered, "You do realize that if he finds out there will be pandemonium-!"

"No one is going to find out, Haku. What I revise does not convert back to its original form until 48 hours have passed. Or, if I've set instructions for it to change back. Or! Until I manually change its appearance. We'll be long gone by then."

"How does this not conflict with the object's original properties? Do you know for sure this scroll will still summon a weapon once it changes back?" Haku hissed.

"I am damn sure it'll work just as it's supposed to when it changes back."

"Then tell me this," Haku ventured further, "Will the copy of Sensei's book, as you've revised it, be able to produce a fake weapon? If Bi tries to summon from it?"

"Well…no…" He downed the last of his drink, "It'll be a dud."

"A summon won't work?"
"In reality it's merely a book. It won't have any Tao Arts or anything attached to it. It's just a lump of matter, linked to protocols I design." Namba twiddled his fingers for emphasis, "I can't create any kind of property that doesn't already exist in the object I affect. Certainly not a Tao Art! But it's a moot point, currently."

"So we need to get this out of here as quickly as possible." Haku concluded.

"That goes without saying." Namba concurred, "And I need you to transport it."

"No." Haku said flatly.

"I have no discreet means of getting this to the Hokage." Namba countered, "You do."

"I did not come here to engage in a high-risk retrieval, or provoke a ninja who is wanted dead by every nation!"

"Half the battle was showing up. Besides, Bi's cronies are probably going to notice when I leave this banquet and follow me out of here. It'll give you the chance to escape while their attention is on me."

Haku wondered, "Is this what Sensei had planned for me as well? To retrieve this?"

"He might've suggested it as an extra credit project for you."

"I will have his head." Haku took the fake book and concealed it in the layered folds of his vest.

"That's a good sport." Namba commended him, "I understand this is an imperiling inconvenience, but you have my word that Bi won't come after you tonight. Even if I have to face him myself, I'll make sure he doesn't follow you. Alright?"

"That doesn't necessarily make me feel better." Haku admitted, "You could be killed."

"Could be." Namba nodded.

"Why would you agree to this? You have a family waiting for you to return."

"I know..." Staring out into the atrium, Namba was quiet for a moment before he went on, "There are many problems...many loose ends, still dangling after the last war. Even the previous wars. And some of those things can rip the foundations right out from under the villages I care about. If Minato were still alive, I know he'd be working tirelessly to stop these things. Now that he can't, I know that I must. Because I'm his friend." Namba smiled sadly, "I had the chance to live and be happy. If I need to give that up, I know I have a good reason to."

Haku surveyed the room in silence. He'd have to wait for the lump in his throat to pass. He could relate to those feelings perfectly.

"Anyway, the auction is ongoing. Now is the time to move. Go to the appraiser's office and collect your money." Namba advised, "And then disappear. Many are going to be up all night partying here and celebrating their excess. While they do, you run and, hopefully, I run."

"Alright." Haku accepted the plan.

"Thank you." Namba breathed a long sigh, "I apologize for complicating things. I hope you know that the Hokage has been searching for this weapon for a long time. With it out of the markets, it means Bi will have none of the Tao Weapons he's been searching for."

"How many are there?"
"Three. They're all in Hidden Leaf." Namba explained, "The only other person who can wield them lives there."

Haku accepted the information with a nod, and briefly free-associated to Tenten and her mastery over Bukijutsu. If any soul seemed fit enough to wield such weapons, it would certainly be her. Though that was only intuition talking and not concrete facts, Haku knew. In time, he'd probably find out who in Leaf stood opposed to Bi's faction.

"Goodbye for now, and be cautious." Namba bid Haku farewell as he stood from the table, "I'll take a short while to try to figure out this Tube app." He tucked back into his mobile device, looking like every other face-in-screen patron in the palace.

With not a moment to lose, Haku backtracked through the grand building toward the appraiser's office downstairs. There was an accumulation of vendors and appraisers independent of Keiseki House cramping the space. It was excruciating to wait in a short queue to be seen by a clerk.

"Are you here to confirm your sales?" A woman in a suit asked Haku, once he was finally able to reach the counter.

"I am." He provided his name, "Yuki Haku."

"Ah yes, one moment. An agent already came by to pick up those auction items for the winning bids. One of your pieces on the exhibition floor has yet to receive any—"

"Unfortunately, I won't be able to stay this evening. I've been called away on short notice." Haku fibbed, "Is there any way for me to leave that lingering piece here?"

"Certainly, you can donate it to the Keiseki House, if you like. Or leave it for sale to return at next quarter's auction."

"I'd like to donate it." It was the fastest solution.

"How generous of you." The clerk bowed her head, "Thank you, Yuki-san. The other pieces on the exhibition floor met their minimums, for a total of 785,000 Ryo. Please allow me a moment to calculate. Do you have account information to wire this to?"

"I do not." He was trying to be even-keeled and not tap his foot as if he were in a rush.

"If you prefer a cash payout, there will be a 2 percent fee." The clerk tapped on her calculator, "On your winning bids, 25,485,000 Ryo, that would be assessed a fee of 509,700 Ryo."

He could not even be upset about that. It was a mere papercut of a setback monetarily, if it meant he could be out of here with both the money and stolen Tao scroll in hand. Haku agreed to the fee and the clerk continued processing, tapping out numbers, and she ripped a page from her transaction pad to hand him the carbon copy receipt. Another clerk had to watch her count out the packets of money notes to ensure no mistake was made, and double-count it down. Each stack was re-strapped afterward.

"Thank you for visiting us and come again soon." The clerk bowed again after presenting the payment over the counter, and Haku echoed the pleasantry before exiting the bottom stairwell, and then sending a diversionary Shadow Clone back into the house. He would have it keep watch from high rafters and the eaves of the roof, in the hope it could detect a problem if indeed Bi's group realized they had been swindled.

Like a trespassing cat, Haku slipped through a hedge of ficus, through a servant's footpath below an adjoining building and then leapt up. He scaled the gigantic house to cross over the roof, dropping down to the other side and into the garden where he had last seen Pua. His rabbit was still there of course, loafing around. Haku ducked down into the cover of flowering bushes, thankful for the absence of any humans in the garden.

"What a day it's been, Pua… I knew it was right to bring you. I need help." Kneeling, Haku retrieved spare tool summoning scrolls that he had primed, and first pulled the fraudulent Icha Icha paperback out of his vest, laying it down on parchment, "This must be brought to Tsunadesama immediately." With a hand sign, Haku contained the revised Tao scroll for Chōten into the tool scroll. He also jotted down a note to the Hokage explaining what she would find, then rolled up the tool scroll and fitted it to the harness hidden beneath his rabbit's bandana.

Next, he took the obscene pile of money he had walked out with and sealed it into the other tool scroll. He tucked it away in his vest again, trying to take deep breaths.

"Pua," He rubbed a spot between her ears as he instructed, "Take the scroll I gave you directly to the Hokage, in the Leaf Village. Don't stop for food or for any distractions until you arrive. Do you understand?"

"Yes!" She chirped.

"Very good." He gave her a final, loving pat, "I'll be with you again soon."

The rabbit licked and nibbled the back of his hand to declare her love in return, and then scampered into the dark of the garden.

What crazy fortune had led him to plunder Keiseki House on two accounts; once for selling stolen treasures, and again for thieving a treasure right out from under a buyer's nose. Haku hardly could fathom even signing up for the first task, and yet, he thought as he snuck into a much larger, anterior garden, that may as well have been his luck as the child of destitute farmers.

In the dark, he took care not to scare up any creatures or sleeping peafowl. He was feeling confident that he would make a clean getaway until the sound of steps followed him across a red footbridge.
They stopped when he did. Haku looked over his shoulder and spied two young men, hesitating on the far end of the walk.

"You're that Yuki guy." One of them spoke up. He was the taller of the pair, dressed in Han-style clothing.

Beside the stranger was a shorter teenager, a lookalike who could be the brother, in fact. He tugged on his companion's sleeve and kept his voice down, "Qin, come on. Just don't. You don't know for sure—"

"I am." Haku turned around to face them fully, maybe 10 meters away from the duo, "And who are you?"

Qin cleared his throat, "Kuang Qin! And my bro, Ga-Fen. We're patrons of Keiseki House…"

"Qin, quit it." Ga-fen hissed, and then muttered something in Hanwen.

"I saw you talking to that trashman from Hidden Cloud. I have it out for him. Thinks he's so smart…" Qin was grinding his teeth, "You better not be an accomplice of his!

are paranoid. Stop wasting time out here!"
"He might've taken it."

"How? You didn't see it happen."

"He was talking to that freak."

"No one in the Sect is concerned. Don't you think they would've?"

"I'm not gonna ignore my instincts." Qin rubbed his nose and looked back toward Haku, "I think you have something that belongs to us. If you don't want trouble, you'll give it back."

"You're the one looking for trouble." The frigid temperament he often took on around Zabuza settled in his features, and Haku narrowed his eyes at the blathering teens, "I have nothing of yours."

"Turn out your pockets, then." Qin spat, ignoring his brother's protest in Hanwen.

Haku turned his back on the pair and warned, "Return to your party while you can."

There was a shuffle of feet as Ga-Fen attempted to hold his brother back; Qin was spitting mad, "Yeah? While we can—? You fucking cut-sleeve! I'll go back after crushing your head—!"

The piercing sting of killing intent silenced Qin and halted him just a few steps onto the footbridge. Ga-Fen quivered a few paces behind his brother, goggling as the feeling seared through them both like a liquid firebrand of hate.

In the past, Haku had experimented with condensing and weaponizing his worst emotions when the Cursed Seal had been a viable option. Though he was not a proponent of scare tactics and cheap shots, training with Zabuza had further demonstrated to him the utility of freezing an enemy where they stood. It drove home a point that few words could adequately capture; that he wouldn't be fucked with. That they didn't stand a chance. Most importantly, Haku had experienced his all-around worst day of socialization in recent memory, and could inject exactly how he was feeling into the two unprepared snitches.

Qin's knees were knocking as he tried to rustle up some nerve, "No way that y-you're…innocent. Definitely…up t-to something…"

Ga-Fen's breathing was shallow and he was unable to communicate with his brother beyond soft squeaks of terror.

"I told myself that I wouldn't create a mess in my wake, after leaving Keiseki House." Haku slowly turned and pressure mounted on his targets, "Why did you have to change my mind?"

Qin remained convinced, "…y-you s-stole—"

"Stole what? I am no thief."

"I know…he switched it. H-He was watching…"

With a sleight of hand Haku readied two senbon between his knuckles, "If you insist on harassing me, I'll respond in kind."

While Qin sputtered, the pair of needles were pitched past him and sunk into his brother's kneecaps. Ga-Fen screeched and collapsed down to the boards of the bridge, more terrified than he was hurt.

Surprisingly, the sight tripped something in Qin, and he regained mobility in his leaden limbs, "*Don't you fucking touch him!" He charged forward, teary-eyed and salivating, profoundly frustrated by the stranger he had to confront for Chōten.

Haku reacted to Qin's attack as he fired sooty dust from his sleeves by way of Earth Style technique, and in a single movement, Haku pulled a jet of pond water from beneath the bridge to consume its inferior element, soddening and splaying Qin spread-eagle on the wooden planks. With no mercy left in reserve, Haku snapped open his war fan and burst a small gale on Qin and Ga-Fen, who went a-tumbling back to the far end of the walkway.

Harried, Qin wheezed and regained his feet, yanking on Ga-Fen as he pulled the needles from his knees and winced, realizing the effects on his nerve endings still lingered. "Together, come on!" Qin growled, "We can take him together!"

"What for-?" Ga-Fen rasped.

"You have to trust me. We can't let him leave."

"You could be completely wrong about this!" No sooner had the words left Ga-Fen's lips, his brother jerked and slackened, eyes rolling back into his head. Qin fell forward onto his face, and it was then Ga-Fen could see Haku stuck needles into the back of his brother's neck.

"He was just confused! What did you—? Why did you do that?" Ga-Fen shrieked, bending over to take Qin's pulse, which was decidedly absent to the young man's horror, "Did you…kill him?"

Taking catlike steps, Haku raised more senbon to take aim, "I have had enough of you people."

"H-Hey, wait! I won't say anything!" Ga-Fen teetered and fell to his backside as he recoiled, patting his unresponsive sibling, "It was a mix-up, right? Just forget it! I've got to help—"

"I never said I wasn't involved. I just assured him I wasn't the thief." His glare was compassionless, "Since he knew more than I'd like anyone to know…I ought to quiet you too."

Ga-Fen's pupils shrank as he stared up at the throwing spines, about to be plunged who knew where as Haku poised himself. The jig was up. He had his brother to thank for their unwitting demise.

Or, he thought that was the case even as a figure darted out of a stone statue's shadow, and kicked Haku clear to the other side of the bridge. The senbon clattered uselessly out of his hands.

Haku had to collect his wits as he rolled back to his feet, watching none other than Huo bend down to examine the Kuang brothers. He was scrutinizing Qin's injury, and carefully pulled the needles out of his teammate's neck. Qin did not come to.

"Is he dead?" Ga-Fen was distraught, "I didn't know what to do…"

"It's Shinjutsu. It can produce a death-like state, but he should wake up later." Huo assessed and asked, "Can you use your Guanyin Hell Song to pacify him?" By him, he meant Haku.

"No, my legs are messed up…" Ga-Fen wobbled to his feet, hauling Qin's arm over his shoulder, "I'll take Qin back to the Sect and tell Master!"

"Tell him what? That you provoked an attack?" Huo scoffed, glancing back at Haku, "Haku has every right to defend himself."

"He doesn't!" Ga-Fen had learned otherwise and declared, "He admitted it! That he helped steal Chōten."

Huo went silent.

"That shifty-handed clown must've given it to him, must've swapped our scroll with something!"

"Bi-sama's scroll." Huo corrected, "Why would he? He knows nothing of the Tao and can't use it."

"He has a reason. Look at what he did to Qin! He doesn't want anyone to know. Ain't that guilt?"

Ga-Fen reasoned.

Huo rose up from his crouch and rested a hand on his hip, cocking his head at Haku. He was ruminating on the matter. He then motioned for Ga-Fen to move it, "Return to the Sect. I will make him return Chōten."

"Huo…"

"I'm not a pathetic weakling like you. Will you stay and burden me with protecting you again?" Huo huffed at him, "I won't repeat myself."

Tension seized Haku's muscles as he watched Ga-Fen obediently hobble away with his unconscious brother, and Huo appeared truly aloof when he extended his open hand toward Haku, making a give it here motion.

"I have to believe that if you willfully attacked my friends, then you do have something to hide. Ga-Fen thought you had Chōten. Well, do you? Don't be foolish. Give it to me and all is forgiven." Huo assured him, "I like you well enough, Haku. If you were tricked into some scheme, I wouldn't blame you for participating in a heist here if you thought it might improve the station of your clan. You Yuki miscreants are desperate enough to do the craziest things…"

"I don't have anything to give you." Haku tried to recall the layout of the giant garden, prepared to rush toward the nearest exit, "I don't have it."

"Lying tires me." Huo drawled.

"I don't have it, Huo."

"Were they mistaken? No. I doubt it." Huo frowned, "That Tao artifact is of prime importance to my Sect and my Master. You are neck-high in peril and I offer you the opportunity to peaceably disengage yourself from this situation."

"I understand, but I have nothing to give you. I don't know what you're talking about." Haku tried to play the ignorance angle, even if it was a bit late for it. Huo seemed to think he was stupid and manipulable, like everyone else did around here.

"This is the last time I pity a pauper." Huo decided. He melted down into the shadow of carved masonry that framed the rails of the footbridge.

Haku had thought his eyes were deceiving him. Naruto had said that Huo was known for moving through shadows, an ability that had made the most recent Chunin Exam in Konoha calamitous. His eyes darted in every direction, dismayed that lantern light and the glow of the house cast hundreds of shadows throughout the garden. He would never know from which one Huo would reappear. His most educated guess was that he would be attacked from the rear, where blind spots lurked on the edge of his peripheral vision.
And true to form, movement from behind tweaked Haku's senses and he turned, spinning to block the incoming strike. A stone \textit{paffed} against his \textit{jeogori}. Terror flumed through Haku's veins as he realized Huo had tossed a rock from the shadows to distract him— a repeat trick. So simple! Haku braced for the ruthless kick that \textit{did} connect with his back and flattened him again. From there, several strikes battered him, sending Haku spinning. Huo was quick, illuminated by lantern-light, melting in and out of the dark.

In the seconds after Haku gathered his wits to bounce up and block punches to his head and torso, Huo's face twisted with something akin to exasperation. He didn't want a serious fight. He wanted to pummel Haku down without mortally wounding him. Then he'd pluck the contentious item away from him and march off with a clear conscience. Huo had no qualms with killing, but he was the sort to ask: \textit{What was the use in killing someone you actually got along with?}

Not to mention, Huo had no idea that Chōten was not actually on Haku's person. It had been sent away with a ninja rabbit into the deep of the night, and there was no way Haku was ever going to confess to that. So a fight it was— a struggle far more serious than even Huo realized. After Haku had been thoroughly bruised, he'd managed to stick Huo with three senbon needles while his guard was down. Huo backed away and unstuck himself, tossing the needles into underbrush, clicking his tongue angrily that Haku had the gall to try to immobilize him. Nearby, Haku slowly hauled himself to his feet again, pressing a hand to his bruise-splotched face.

"Ridiculous." Huo sneered, "Truly 	extit{ridiculous}. Have you any idea who you are challenging? Your tricks won't work on me. I can counter Shinjutsu. I can control \textit{all} of my meridians. Don't be stubborn."

"I don't think you understand…how desperate my situation is." Haku charged forward with speed; a complete miss once Huo dove into a shadow.

Huo reappeared beneath the bridge, emerging from the dark to stride across the pond, "Desperate? No circumstance of yours will have ever been as desperate as the moment you decided to cross \textit{me}, Haku. If you take a single step more, I will not hesitate."

The threat had not even completely left Huo's mouth by the time Haku was fleeing at full-tilt speed. He sought to position himself somewhere darker in the garden, where light could not cast shadows. It was his only fighting chance, he thought, catching glimpses of Huo chasing him in a fury. A shining array also briefly illuminated itself around Huo in what Haku could only assume was a Tao Art. 'Oh. \textit{Perfect}. 'He felt his heart folding up like origami paper, courage wavering.

Within striking distance of Haku, Huo turned to wheel around in a meteoric kick, and Haku lashed out with his war fan at the last second. Huo was knocked airborne, whipping through night air and tree branches before crashing into the magenta fronds of a rhododendron below. Consequently, he wrenched himself out of the shrub and tore the damn thing out of the ground with freakish strength, hurling it angrily in Haku's direction.

When Haku blocked the plant projectile with a burst of Wind Release, Huo instantly closed the gap and swept Haku's legs out from under him. The first blow came, then the second, third, fourth, and fifth in rapid succession. Haku could hardly track the punches and palm blows Huo delivered. At some point during the hand-to-hand tumult, Haku's fan was dropped in the garden clover.

"How desperate…" Huo asked as he ducked under Haku's Taijutsu, retaliating with a Long Fist punch, "Is your situation now?"

Haku struck the garden wall, wheezing, tasting blood in his mouth. Somehow, he was quick enough to side step the next swing Huo threw at him, shattering a span of the rampart when the blow missed.
They were far enough from the house and lit paths for Haku to assume that Shadow Step was not presently a threat. He'd endured enough of Huo's Taijutsu to anticipate a few of his go-to attacks, though he seemed to be getting more creative with his combinations. Huo bounded off of the wall for a heel-drop kick while Haku was staggered, dizzy and bloody.

An abrupt Ninjutsu counter caught Huo as Haku completed hand signs, "Needle Jizō!" The black surge of Haku's hair was unavoidable, snaking, billowing into a spire to surround him with razor-sharp points. Huo crashed into the counter and his Tao barrier ate the impact with charged energy, protecting him from impalement. Likewise, Haku was also perfectly defended by his technique.

Huo's aggressive brand of curiosity was on full display as he pounded ruthlessly on the hair-spike mass, since he could afford to with a barrier that prevented bodily harm. He tried to upend Haku, searching in vain for a weakness to exploit, "What is this…porcupine defense?" He was puzzled, maybe even impressed. Huo back-flipped away to conserve the cultivation energy stored in his barrier.

The moment Huo's guard lowered, Haku took advantage, "Needle Hell!"

What had seemed like a defensive jutsu was now offensive, firing a million-dart rain of hair at Huo. Each needle struck a golden ripple in the spherical barrier Huo employed, like blinking fairy lights whittling away at his defense. He'd never seen such a bizarre technique. It did thoroughly hamper his Wushu strikes, Huo granted as he slipped away into the cover of garden foliage. However, Haku's odd hair techniques seemed to render him immobile, and so were not conducive to his escape.

'H's going to make a break for it and drop his defenses.' Huo smiled to himself, 'And my defense can move with me.'

Doubt was cast on Huo's prediction when sharp hair spikes wound all through the garden, manipulated by sublime chakra control or perhaps some other-worldly ability. Huo jolted in surprise, dodging backwards from the continuing needle hair technique, wrenched past a young sapling's stuck branch that bent and snapped back as he escaped. He watched the branch pass through the creeping hair, alerting him to the fact that it was illusory. Fuming, Huo dispelled the Genjutsu that had caught him, 'That was well-woven for me to miss it! Overstating his capabilities in an illusion to fool me!' He gave chase again.

Free from his spike defense, Haku had reunited with his tessen and unleashed a timely windstorm, thrashing plants, leaves, and garden creatures alike that scattered in all directions. Huo was elated.

Without hand signs, Huo exhaled flames from his mouth; a terrible, blinding solar-flare that lit the dark landscape and fed on the Wind Nature that Haku had contributed. The decorative brook that cut through the garden and beneath the footbridge was the sole means of escape Haku had, dropping into the water to be fully submerged as fire feasted on everything above. Even the water was uncomfortably heated, hissing steam at the surface. Underwater, Haku propelled himself just short of the red bridge before surfacing.

Again, Huo was upon him, a black, lithe silhouette against the blaze consuming the periphery of the garden, spreading towards the grand house. Light and heat tongued the air and shadows danced. Close-quarters snaps and eye-spinning blows resumed in a frenzy. His thoughts matched the rhythm of the struggle, and Haku registered as he flitted and blocked that Fire Tao Arts were Huo's ace for fighting at night. If no shadows existed in full dark, he could manufacture them with fire. Huo moved as freely as ever, and Haku cursed his brainless move of relying on his Wind Nature, 'I was even told that he relied on Fire Techniques!' Zabuza may have said something like Quick hand, slow mind to sum up his mistake.
The perfectly timed kick to the solar-plexus that Haku would have landed only met Huo's defensive Tao Barrier, which absorbed the shock with energy and glimmer of light. Like everything else, that technique would expire, right? Haku could not plan much further on how to dismantle the shield, because his arm was caught and twisted, his torso pushed one way as Huo tripped his legs in the opposite direction to off-balance him. Paff, Huo's back hit the dirt, and his hands splayed to push himself up again in a rebound. Meanwhile, Huo charged down with an elbow-strike, cracking violent force down on Haku's left hand and shattering bones.

Had anyone in the house heard him scream, there was no indication of it. Servants at the rear of the house were scurrying to helplessly toss basins of water on the garden fire until someone came along who could properly douse the threat. They hadn't even noticed one young man pinned beneath another on the far bank beyond the bridge, screeching in pain.

Haku squirmed as Huo sat his full weight down on him, like a hunter on a captured beast, "You stupid fool." His hand slipped beneath the first fold of Haku's jeogori, sliding down into clothing in search of something. A signal of horror blinked through all his nerve endings, deadening the pain in his broken hand. Haku watched as Huo lifted a tool scroll, examining it archly and wondering, "Did you hide Chōten in here?"

Not quite. Chōten was in a different scroll, being transported via rabbit to the Hidden Leaf Village. Furthermore, Haku could not admit that Huo was holding almost 25 million Ryo needed to fund rebels for a coup on Hidden Mist. Haku's panic carried in a trill, "That isn't what you're looking for!"

Huo slowly ground his foot on Haku's broken hand, cutting off his speech as he shrieked in pain.

"It's not?" Huo was abruptly calm and patient again, inquiring, "Where is it?"

"…I…I…d-don't…have it…"

"Then what is this?"

"—it's—!"

"Scurry back to your clan, and do not cross the Dintei Sect again." Huo warned him as he stood, illuminated once more by firelight. He raised his free hand and willed the flames still, extinguishing them. Frantic servants of the house stared stupidly at the garden's sudden lack of an urgent fire. They inspected the area again in puzzlement before retreating inside to report the phenomenon.

In no conceivable scenario would Zabuza forgive such a failure. Such a setback would derail most of their other plans, and there was no other way to so easily come by funding to coerce mercenaries. And so, as Haku flooded his broken hand with chakra from his own Palm Healing jutsu, he slipped his legs beneath him to sway and stand. The beat-down had felt familiar— felt like when Jiraiya had thoroughly whooped him, 'But the more time I spent facing Sensei, the better I got at countering him…' Huo's tactics had not been so different.

The bright idea came. If Huo thought him a stupid fool, then he'd better use that to his advantage. He attacked once more with Wind Release, lashing his tessen and pouring chakra into the technique. It unleashed a veritable hurricane at Huo's back as he walked away. Never one to be caught pants-to-ankles, Huo spun, deadly quick, exhaling his Fire Tao Art in his usual counter to absorb the Wind Nature. And oh. Were his eyes deceiving him? It seemed Haku's hand was functional again, helping him form hand signs.

A perfectly timed Water Jutsu launched from the brook to meet the wind-and-fire hellstorm behind the house, devouring the empowered Fire Nature faithfully. Huo uttered a yelp and was swallowed by the surge. The raging torrent rose up to the height of the roof for a few wild seconds, water smashing him into the side of Keiseki House and nearly drowning him there before the technique waned. It was mortification repeated— much like what he'd experienced at the Chunin Exam in Konoha.

'This garden is already ruined...' Haku reasoned as he froze over the surplus water swamping the courtyard with his Kekkei Genkai. Trees were iced top-to-bottom, waves along the building's outer walls frozen upright in cold crescents, icicles hanging from boughs and roof eaves… Huo gaped at the sight as he ordered himself and stepped onto solid ice, his breath puffing vapor into frigid air.

"...the Hyōton..." Huo grinned, "It's true. I'd thought you'd fibbed about that as well— being one of those Yuki chickens..."

He could not dignify that with a response. Any doubts Huo had about him were to his advantage, or so Haku hoped. Huo charged over the slick surface of the ground, steady on the ice as he closed in to batter Haku once more with Taijutsu. His solid punch met nothing but air, an insult to Huo's eyes as he witnessed Haku disappear into a mirror-like surface of ice beneath his feet. He was there, and then he was everywhere— reflected in a myriad of ice mirrors melded into the landscape.

"Ahh, and who taught you this?" Huo was amused, fire-breathing recklessly at each reflection, searing ice wherever he could as he flitted in the dark yard. Flames failed to stick to any kindling that was by then damp or frozen. Until the space dried out, Huo could only slip through shadows nearest to the house, where light glowed from windows. He Shadow-Stepped until he caught up with Haku as he exited an Ice Mirror, though it seemed to be a deliberate encounter.

Haku blocked several of Huo's recycled Wushu blows, anticipating them, and when Huo's frustration mounted his ferocity increased, forcing Haku to counter once again with Needle Jizō. Damage and defense clashed against the orb of light that guarded Huo, and he leapt backwards to retreat from the spikes, reassessing, "Hmph! And that! Where did that come from? What members of the Yuki clan know how to travel through ice? Those dolts! Since when?" He growled, "Making hair a weapon? None could be so clever. You're too well-taught. All these tricks..."

"I am largely self-taught." His confidence was rebounding, and Haku was compelled to boast, "Though I've had quite a few skilled teachers outside of my clan."

Huo nearly caught him in a blindingly fast pounce, and his kicks smashed the nearest mirrors with incomprehensible force before his Fire Tao Art followed. Haku was in one mirror and out another, but he was caught again, and this time Huo's soul-crushing jab struck true. Haku was bent in half from the blow, the force of it rattling the air as Huo connected…and what Huo thought was his opponent revealed its true composition; a Shadow Clone. Or worse, a Shadow Clone imbued with Haku's Ice Nature, and the horrid thing emulated its maker's earlier porcupine defense by ballooning out into a ball of ice spikes.

The damage had whittled Huo's Tao barrier more than what he could tolerate, infuriated as he wrenched himself away from the frozen urchin with a struggle, "What sick mind—?"

He felt himself patted down from behind, a gentle touch that didn't warrant his barrier's protection. Haku stole back his tool scroll and ducked beneath Huo's retaliating round kick, disappearing into another Ice Mirror before they came to blows again.

"You HAD BEST," Huo announced with crazed eyes, "Rethink your actions, Haku, for I am so weary of these games." He exhaled fire that was fortified with resentful energy, and it tinged green to Haku's infinite surprise, decimating and melting down the Ice Mirrors nearest to Huo.
At this rate, Haku thought, he'd be wasting chakra to create more mirrors if Huo could simply destroy them. Yet, his mirrors had been an invaluable means of escaping harm and keeping up with such a fast enemy. He had to go on the offensive somehow. Haku crouched on the far side of the garden, his eyes glued to Huo's glowing, fiery presence while he retrieved a scroll from a holster strapped to his leg. The Master Scroll was intended for last-resort situations, though Haku felt his current plight applied. He summoned Nuibari and spun it several times over his right hand, letting it wake up for him.

"How shameless." Huo snorted, "I come here with no weapon of my own and you dare—"

Nuibari nearly stuck him through the back, rattling his barrier from behind. Haku had pitched the needle sword through an Ice Mirror and directed it to exit from a sneakily made Ice Mirror behind Huo. Of course, Huo was further incensed by the deceitful tactic, "Ack! What's this?" He was growling as he dove away from Haku's ranged needle sword, evading the thin razor wire that was strung around by the blasted thing.

"...Sewing Needle?" Huo acknowledged what kind of weapon Haku was wielding. At the last possible moment, he phased through a shadow before Nuibari could sail through the air and pierce him—and the sword moved freely through an Ice Mirror that Haku had created previously. Trajectory altered by the dimensional warp, Nuibari exited from another random mirror and soared for Haku. He merely reached out his hand and the sword landed neatly in it, obedient.

Huo indeed knew many things, for he recognized Nuibari for what it was. Huo managed to catch Haku in close-quarters once more, snarling furiously as they fought.

"Desperate! Ha! So you were desperate enough to become a Swordsman of Mist? You really are a lowly criminal, Haku!" Huo jeered, weaving away from Nuibari's swipes, responding with whirlwind kicks and locks, "Only a reprobate does such a thing! Ugh, I can't believe I socialized with the likes of you!"

"And you are no such criminal?" Haku spat, their footwork sliding and skidding; a Long Fist punch grazed his side as Nuibari punctured Huo's upper arm as his Tao Barrier weakened—then they darted apart.

Huo's fire breathing could maintain a comfortable distance between him and his target, until he found another shadow to move through. Several times he ambushed Haku this way, often prompting Haku to dash through an Ice Mirror to escape. Twice more, Nuibari was able to breach Huo's failing Tao Barrier, though it only split skin in glancing blows as Huo bent and contorted himself out of harm's way.

The deadlock of exchanges grew fevered as Huo sought a means of immobilizing Haku with a crippling blow, his movements growing erratic. He couldn't seek out his Sect and request help. He had to deal with this nuisance on his own! There was no explanation for how a member of the Yuki Clan could be formidable in battle, or adapt to his fighting style so quickly. This was no amateur, for sure, but Huo was at a loss for what exactly Haku was in actuality. He fit no mold.

He had to prove himself. He had to dispose of this threat and reclaim what belonged to his Shifu.

In a wild charge, Huo got in Haku's face and allowed his forearm to be pierced, narrow point perforating, wire sewn through his flesh as he kept moving, getting a grip on Haku's hand to force the blade down—and Nuibari cut its own wire free. Haku was kneed in the gut with such force that he flew, tumbling over the icy ground. He barely escaped through an Ice Mirror that Huo smashed after him with a battering-ram blow, shattering other mirrors he could find in the garden until at last—Haku flashed at the far end of the bridge and he had him. Superior speed got him there, and Huo's combination had him dead to rights, clobbering Haku in the head, face and chest before his knees were kicked to buckle him. As Haku spilled to the ground, Huo leapt to come down with a spinning kick to crush more of his bones. Instead, he broke a Shadow Clone apart in a puff of smoke.

Boards of the bridge had splintered apart, dust and flecks drifting in air. Huo swung his head left and right to look for the escaped rascal. It was an agonizing moment of uncertainty, his breaths heavy for several moments prior to him thinking to look upward. He had good instincts, at least. Haku had dove down from a mirror suspended much higher in the air, plummeting at a rate such that Huo could not even blink before he'd be struck.

In his hand was a dense, spiraling orb of blue chakra, and Haku pitched it down at Huo with a cry, "Rasengan!"

It was all so familiar—the volume of destructive, spinning chakra grinding him into the ground and dissolving the last bits of his Tao Barrier. The residual energy of the blow clobbered him, leaving him spread-eagled, and it aggravated some of the old complaints of his body from the last time he'd been hit and wounded with such a technique. Huo was able to push himself up to his hands and knees in the dust cloud, his brain tilted madly with a sensation of déjà vu and bile rising in his throat. How could it have happened again? By another's hand!

For Haku, it had also been a familiar experience. He had employed many of the strategies he had needed to use against Jiraiya to win their sparring match. In compensation for his efforts, Jiraiya had bequeathed several techniques to him. It was only prudent to make use of what he'd been taught.

To Haku's dismay, Huo staggered to his feet, trembling as he turned to face Haku. He was seething.

Haku reached his hand up toward the Ice Mirror he'd used for his ambush and Nuibari fell free of it, returning to his hand. Huo's deranged laughter rang in his ears.

"That." Huo slurped saliva back into his mouth, sick with fury and disbelief, "That. Is from Leaf. I know plenty of other lands, but that…I know from a first-hand encounter."

How had Huo's small eyes blown so wide? Haku felt a wave of killing intent so fresh that it nearly had him stuck, and it was an endeavor to keep his limbs loose as all of him wanted to clamp up in response to the roiling hatred Huo ached to pin him with.

"What a picture you paint for me…you try to hide what you are and what you're doing…but I think I know." Huo tilted his head, his teeth peeking out from between his lips, "A down-on-his-luck mercenary joins the Seven Swords…but accepts tasks from any paying village. So that's how it is? You agreed to deliver Chōten to Hidden Leaf. And as thanks you receive training there—to learn that damned jutsu!" Strings of spit flew from his mouth as he roared, "Like that BITCH USED TO HUMILIATE ME!"

Maybe it had been too optimistic to think a direct blow with Rasengan would have put Huo down. Certainly, his application of the technique could never be as dense or as damaging as Naruto's version of the jutsu, or even Jiraiya's when he used Senjutsu. Fear dripped down Haku's spine as he watched Huo unleash a torrent of energy in some kind of Tao Art that illuminated him—a corona of power that glowed gold, green, and vermilion; his Phoenix Tao Art exerting pressure on the air around them. Huo's braid lashed wildly behind him as he stared at his quarry, possessed.

It was enough of a cue for Haku to make break for it when Huo raised two fingers in half a Ram Seal, concentrating, and then erupted in a Fire Tao Art from his mouth and every pore in his body. The area of effect was monstrous, a violent green heat incinerating the landscape, vaporizing remnants of ice, and catching the back half of the house alight— just a hair's breadth short of an explosion. Haku had thrown himself off of the rampart of the property and dropped into forest, eyes trained upward to witness the thunderhead of flames rolling through the air as he fell. He would be a charred skeleton if he'd been foolish enough to stay.

Burning debris floated down, catching a few pine boughs on fire. His mad rush through wilderness liquefied the contents stomach, breathing haggard as Huo closed in on him with unthinkable speed; a bright comet in the dark. Haku could barely dodge the strike when Huo struck down and gouged a giant pit in the ground. Seamlessly, he stood and formed hand signs for Ninjutsu, not allowing Haku an inch to escape.

"Stone Press!" He had uprooted more than 20 square meters of earth, a deep piece of rock that rose up beneath Huo's feet as he flipped and hurled the slab at Haku.

Haku narrowly avoided the crashing jutsu by sliding into a ditch, however the fragments of the Stone Press broke apart and pelleted him in the back and head. As he'd feared, when he popped out of the eroded ditch on the mountainside, Huo's fist met his stomach immediately. From there, his mind ceased to register what was happening. It was the precipice of death. The cracks and fractures, the ruthless twists and snaps— metacarpals, wrists, arms, shoulders, ribs, cheekbone, vertebra, hips and legs: nothing was spared. Even if he had trained nonstop in Taijutsu from youth up until that moment, Haku knew he still would never have stood a chance against the brutality inflicted upon him with Fènghuáng wushu.

When all was still again, Huo lifted him up by the collar of his hanbok, calm and inspecting him like a broken toy. The light radiating from him helped Haku see, though his vision was swimming with spots. His hands weakly tried to pry at Huo's grip.

"Beg." Huo demanded.

A sputter escaped Haku's lips with a trickle of blood.

"Beg for your two-faced, thief life, Haku." Huo callously tossed him to the rock and pine litter, watching him limply roll.

His faculties were short-circuited by waves of pain, breathing laborious and coming in rasps. If he stayed for a few moments more, his life was absolutely forfeit. On the off-chance his legs worked— oh! By some miracle he'd wobbled to his knees...though he could never run away fast enough. Huo would catch him; grab him by his loose hair or tattered hanbok and reel him in for a killing blow. It'd take guts to escape. It would take something that Huo couldn't counter, but what was beyond his control at present? Haku struggled to mold chakra and focus. The night air out here was cool and humid. His attempt to condense water with a hand sign went unnoticed by Huo.

Huo's attention was faced away, looking up the slope toward Keiseki House as screams and frantic activity responded to the fire on the other side of the rampart. The damage was regrettable. He raised his hands to tamp it down, but it took significant effort for him to suppress the Fire Nature that was consuming the exterior of the estate. Once that was done he looked back and saw Haku had hauled himself inside of a pitiful Ice Mirror— his last ditch trick. Huo laughed in earnest, "What do you think you're doing?" He stalked closer, "Return the scroll to me and appeal to my mercy. Cry. Curse me. Scream out your clansmen's names. But don't be so stupid that you think you can fight!"

When Haku did none of those things, Huo's temper flared once more, and he rushed with a running kick that shattered the mirror into specks. Within the scattering, frozen detritus, in what Haku called the white dimension, he had enough chakra to stretch the trail of fragmentized ice with a manipulated tendril of Yang element. It formed into the Ice Path he had first created under Jiraiya's guidance. Matter compressed so that he soared through the kaleidoscoping, tiny mirrors, and shot through an ice-dust trail before Huo's disbelieving eyes. The warp trail escaped into the dark of the wooded mountains and Haku dared not exit. He took the risk and moved through the far dimension's space to relocate in his proper reality, where Huo bayed like a bloodhound and pursued.

All sensation was dulled by adrenalin and the need to put distance between himself and this horrible place. The field of view from within the distending, light-prism path only afforded Haku short glimpses of Huo pursuing by foot at his top speed, keeping up. Where shadows were born from beams of moonlight, Huo bridged himself between them. His roaring tapered off when he decided to hunt in silence. At the edge of the mountain ridge, Haku's Ice Path continued on into open valley air as land ended in a sheer drop. Stubbornly, Huo descended into the valley to follow him along the ground.

The ache of fear, of not knowing if the chase would ever end, pushed him—willed him to plunge his chakra into the technique. He might have celebrated the fact that he was flying, Haku thought, if he ignored the fact that whenever he descended he'd be killed on the spot. Unknowable stretches of time passed. Pain crept back. His vision was failing.

Below, the Land of Mountains had given way to the Land of Earth, and then to the eastern reaches where the coast lay beyond. Haku told himself as the sun rose that Huo was no longer there. That Huo wouldn't be able to follow a flickering trail of ice and light through the clouds all night. The hard reality was that he couldn't keep it up. He would have to surrender and thank fear for its heavy dose of motivation. By dawn, nothing was left. His conscious mind closed up shop. Haku let the jutsu lapse and plummeted from the sky, hair and robes whipping, wind whistling in his ears.

He'd fallen for quite a while before he groggily cracked his eyes open, and then realized he was plunging to an alternative, certain death. Haku allowed himself a hoarse scream as tree tops grew dangerously near, scrounging the last dredges of his chakra and concentration to make a hasty Ice Path. He flashed through the trail, approaching the slopes of a new mountainside, through branches bushy with leaves, and finally met the earth again. Dropping only a meter off the ground, he thanked his lucky stars when he hit moss and weeds...though he'd nearly fallen onto a fence.

Weary, Haku peeked at his surroundings while prostrate, surprised that he had reached some vestige of civilization. Or...not really. Chance had delivered him into the fenced grounds of a large Shinto temple on a mountaintop. He was behind the honden, the main hall of the temple's cluster of buildings; in dim morning light, God only knew where. He could not even care if Huo found him like this, 'I can't move. I'm exhausted.' Every part of his body seared in pain, with a few odd exceptions that he could attribute to numbness or nerve damage.

He would have to heal himself...but that would require chakra. Of which he had precious little.

'Sleep. I just need sleep. I'll stay here until I have enough strength to use the Palm Healing jutsu.' His most serious injuries were the ones that made it difficult to close his eyes, breathe, and relax. Haku was acutely aware of multiple, horrific breaks in his left leg. Certainly his other limbs were worse for the wear, but judging from the number of fractures in his worst leg, Huo might've taken sadistic pleasure in repeatedly attacking his injuries. Broken ribs made every little movement of his torso a nightmare. The taste of iron in his mouth—he'd been punched and his teeth sliced open his lip, crusted over with dried blood. His arms, hands, and back...he was in disrepair. Defenseless.

'...whatever kami resides at this shrine...please.' He closed his eyes, 'I wish for safety. Whatever you can give a wretch like me...' Haku had been agnostic for most of his life, but if convenience and faith intersected somewhere, he had likely landed smack at the crossroads.

He was unconscious for several hours. Daylight was bright and direct overhead by the time he heard murmuring voices. Well, he reasoned, if those sounds were quiet and confused it probably wasn't Huo.

Haku cracked an eye open. A nettle of weeds obscured the view, but he could see the faces of the head priest and shrine maidens stealing a look from around the corner of the building at him. To say they were surprised was an understatement. They debated among themselves: Who is this? What happened to him? Is that a hanbok? So, some kind of foreigner? Look at all that blood! Was he in a fight?

They elected to be careful, their conversation carrying far enough for Haku to hear, "We've had too many attacks here by Iwa nin, so why take a chance on this stranger? It could make for trouble. Let's have a ninja investigate."

Oh great. They were going to ask a local shinobi to inspect him.

He slept some more.

The next thing he knew, a wet nose stamped his forehead. Haku drowsily opened his eyes and beheld a massive dog sniffing his hair. The animal eventually backed off. Then, two fingers attached to a person beyond his peripheral vision poked the carotid artery in his neck, proceeding to gently feel along his arms and the back of his neck. Haku shifted weakly and croaked, "Please don't mind me. I just need…a bit of rest…and then I'll be on my way."

"Doesn't look like it, fella." It was a woman's voice, "Your injuries are pretty bad."

"I can heal myself…once I have a bit more chakra." He strained to look up at whoever was leaning over him, "Please tell the shrine attendants I am very sorry for the inconvenience."

"Oh psh!" She was amused, "The shrine keepers were concerned, that's why they asked me personally to check on you. Besides, my son is more of a bother around here! You're nice and quiet. And you said you can use Healing Jutsu, huh? Good news." The kunoichi carefully righted him to his back, "So can I. If I have your word that you don't mean anyone in Shincha harm, I can help you. How does that sound?"

His sincerest answer, "That sounds wonderful."

With the deal struck, the woman beckoned over the watching priest and asked him to assist with lifting Haku. Due to the seriousness of his injuries (and frightening yelps of pain) the pair ended up carrying him like a horizontal log, and delivered him to the shamusho, the priest's living quarters and office. One of the shrine maidens had arranged a few drop cloths on the tatami floor to prevent blood from smearing, and Haku was set down carefully.

"Let me bring some water and a washcloth, Rin-san." The priest hurriedly exited the small building and ushered the maidens along. Though just barely, Haku registered the name of the woman who was scanning his body for injuries with the System Survey technique.

The large dog took a seat beside Haku, sniffing inquisitively, "Something beneath the blood and sweat…I've smelled before. But I don't know what…"

Haku jerked in surprise, "It speaks!"

"Relax." Rin pushed him back down.

"That's a ninken!"
"I know. Sesshu is my trusted partner." Her smile was tilted with worry, "Try not to move anymore."

Healing light began to work fractured ribs back together and Haku laid flat, eyes closed again, thoughts running wild in his head. A talented medic-nin here, in the middle of nowhere? With a ninja dog companion? He just had to ask, "Excuse me, Miss… but… are you from the Hidden Leaf Village?"

Her hands stilled in their work.

"I don't mean to pry." Through slitted eyes he could see tension tugging at Rin's face, "That village has—"

"What's it to you, stranger?" Rin never approached the subject carelessly.

That seemed like an affirmative. Also, how in the world could this gigantic dog lazing about beside him, with its capability of speech to boot, not be the product of breeding from Leaf's own Inuzuka clan? Haku had taken enough risks in the last 24 hours to perhaps take one more.

"I am from Hidden Leaf." Haku outed himself, "I'm Haku, one of Gama-sennin's students."

A small gasp escaped her, and Rin's hands did a frightened dance over him after hearing such an explanation.

"Oh, so that's what I smelled." Sesshu supposed.

"…Haku?" She knew the name and felt like panicking, attending a bit more diligently on worrisome leg fractures after she'd addressed torso injuries, "Yes… I've heard that name. Gaara's teammate."

"Yea—" He tried to acknowledge that statement but instead hissed in pain as Rin worked.

"Well, that explains it. This outfit threw me off… but I guess those working for Jiraiya-sama have to dress up strangely to avoid suspicion." Rin smiled ruefully, "My husband does too, when he's on assignment."

The priest returned with a basin of water and a cloth, and Rin thanked him before he saw himself out. She blotted bloody wounds while Haku's mind spun, putting these meager facts together. Her husband was working for Jiraiya? Since Haku had heard the official list of spies working covertly for the Toad Sage, he deduced that Rin was talking about Obito.

"My family isn't living in Leaf right now, but we're going to have to return there soon. Things have gotten dangerous." She explained, adding, "Please keep this to yourself, Haku. We've been trying to lay low. When I was told you were behind the temple, for a minute I thought you might be Kirin."

"…oh…" He wondered in a weak voice, "Who is Kirin?"

"He's a shinobi who's been stalking my family for quite a while, but… he doesn't seem to have any malicious intent. He's supervising us, as if he's warding away threats. My son told me that he keeps Sound ninja away from this town."

"That's… unusual." Haku offered.

"You're telling me. Every day I fear he might snap and hurt us… but he just… watches."

He didn't like the sound of that. Was Jiraiya aware of this situation?

"What luck you came to Shincha! If you'd gone any further, no one would've been able to help you.
And if you'd ended up further west, you'd be detained by Iwagakure.” Rin reasoned, "Now do you mind telling me how you ended up in this state? This wasn't the Akatsuki's doing, was it?"

"No, no…it…was an unexpected task that Jiraiya-sensei put me up to."

Rin ground her teeth, "Really? He needs to stop doing that to his subordinates. My husband almost got killed on his last mission and Gama-sennin had the audacity to show up late for the upheaval."

"If he could, he'd be everywhere at once. Please don't think badly of Sensei." Haku told her, "He did his best to reach Obito-san in time."

"—eh! How do you—?"

"I've been told about the other spies working for Sensei, since I'm one myself now. I…only know as much as I need to know." He waffled slightly on that because, well, he unfortunately knew too much about Obito. He did not want to speak carelessly on the subject of the Uchiha Clan.

"I see.” Rin relaxed again, her hands glowing as she addressed other wounds, "It's alright. I don't think badly of him. Much of what goes wrong…is beyond our control anyway."

"You said you want to return to Konoha." Haku prodded at the subject, "Do you have…any family to talk to there? Or a place to live?"

"I've been corresponding with my big sister. I think she'd be happy to help us transition back."

"Oh! That's good.” He sighed a little, hoping not to be obvious, "Speak to her as much as you can. Many things…have changed in the village.” For one thing, the Uchiha Clan did not exist anymore. Not that he ought to be the one to speak such a terrible truth aloud.

"I'm sure they have since I left so long ago."

"I've changed a lot too. I hope…my old friends…still accept me. Accept me and my family." She shook her head and then resumed her Palm Healing jutsu, which had flickered out while she was distracted, "How's the leg?"

"Which one?” He wanted to laugh. Everything was broken.

"Left leg, I mean."

"Not excruciating, but I can tell it's still not quite right."

"I did some touch ups, but I'll need to set it. Please hold tight for a bit while I fetch some of my supplies, alright? How's your breathing?"

"Somewhat better."

"Good! Sesshu, look after him.”

The dog didn't even twitch on the mats, unruffled by the events that had taken place.

"Because I have something important to live for, I will resolutely work for it and dedicate myself to it.” Once he had learned his course, Haku strove to achieve the end goal, particularly since his efforts now defended the lives of his friends. There are times, though... ‘He shut his eyes, breathing slowly, It feels like...I've done this before. Dedicated myself to something.’ But he couldn't have, of course. He was only just coming of age and entering the fray. The fight ahead could be a long and bitter one, and there were no struggles behind him, save for the tragic fates of his parents.

When in the Water Country, the been-here, done-this sensation could get overwhelmingly strong. He'd noticed it happening more often. A feeling of having been to certain places— having certain experiences before. He'd been living as an outlaw for too long, Haku assumed.

"Hello!"

Haku turned his head and beheld a young boy tottering through the door with a heavy basket. He politely removed his shoes before crossing to the tatami floor.

"Hello." Haku greeted in kind.

"I'm Yuma. Mama sent me up with our lunch basket since we were gonna eat, but then she got called to the shrine. She says you can eat with us." He plopped the basket full of food down, then dropped down to his butt beside Sesshu.

"Oh, how very nice. Thank you—" Sheepishly, Haku told him, "I'm afraid I can't move at all right now, so I don't know how I could join you for a meal..."

"Whoa. You have got a lot," Yuma frowned at Haku's ragged look, "Ouchies."

"A lot." Haku agreed.

"I'm also supposed to tell you...Mama might take a bit longer since she was gonna try to find you some clothes too." He gestured at Haku, "Your dress is all torn up."

"Yes, I know. It's called a hanbok."

"Want me to put blueberries in your mouth?" Yuma offered, "So you don't have to move."

"I'd hate to distract you from your lunch, Yuma-chan."

"It's fine." He began fishing around the basket, "What's your name again?"

"Haku."

Because he couldn't wait, Yuma shoveled a handful of blueberries into his own mouth from the container, chewing when he spoke again, "Nice to meet ya."

What a messy kid. He was exceedingly friendly, though. Haku felt further scandalized as the child dropped blueberries one by one into his open mouth, and he endeavored not to choke. There was no doubt in his mind that the "cute little kid" of Obito's that Naruto had described was this one, treating this bird-style feeding like a game.

"How about some meatballs? Oh— Sesshu, this is for you." Yuma distractedly set a container on the floor for the dog, and then plucked meatballs out of a lunchbox with chopsticks. Judging by sight, Haku supposed they were small enough to consume without accidentally lodging in his airway. Yuma clumsily dropped a sauced meatball on his face.

"You know...maybe this isn't a good idea. I'm not that hungry." Which wasn't true. He indeed was hungry, but Haku wasn't feeling so enthusiastic about eating after Yuma five-second-ruled the fallen meatball from the tarp and back to his mouth. He had sort of forgotten how gross children could be. It was a moot point, however, since he was a foul sight himself.

"Sorry about your face, Haku-san. I'm not supposed to talk to strangers, but it sounded like Mama knew you…so do you wanna hear about my school? And my jutsu? Oh! And I can tell you about the garden too—I helped it grow a lot this year." He air-dropped another meatball, "Are you a ninja? Can you tell me about your missions?" A gasp, "Do you know my Dad?"

"Slow down, please."

Again, Yuma took the opportunity to shovel several more lunchbox morsels into his own mouth.

"There are…only a few things I can tell you." Haku offered, "I'm not supposed to talk to strangers either."

"That's okay, then."

"Good. Well, where to start?" Haku took a moment to think, "I grew up in the Hidden Leaf Village with my two best friends…"

That evening, far to the west in the Land of Mountains, Huo returned to Keiseki House empty-handed.

The stink of the burned garden and rear porch of the estate wafted all through the grounds, and Huo searched vainly for signs of his Sect, though he was already quite certain they had abandoned the auction house. Shame gnawed at his guts. He had given it his all last night, but Haku had slipped through his fingers and into the night sky as nothing more than a shimmer of ice dust. How could he have known the whelp had such a trick up his sleeve?

He left the estate and traveled northwest up mountain slopes, out of the cover of the pine wilderness, and beyond exposed faces of rock and plateaus. His limbs ached. The skin of his knuckles had split open, raw from hitting Haku so many times, 'I never should have let him take that scroll back. How could I let my guard down?'

The answer was already clear to him. At first, he had not been serious about stopping Haku at all. He'd taken quite a shine to the dignified rogue. Their interactions had been pleasant and thoughtful, unlike most of Huo's exchanges over the last six months. He'd endured failure and struggle repeatedly. Lost Susumajin to that witch, had his treasured sabre broken apart, been beaten and interrogated by an enemy village, lost contact with his parents, and had been labeled a nukenin, officially, by Hidden Rock. The auction was supposed to be a relaxing, elegant affair, and an easy victory for his Sect. Another victory for Hidden Leaf to snatch away.

The thought stuck like a needle in his brain and Huo was incensed again, punching apart a column of limestone that shattered and skipped down the slope. It tore open the worn out flesh of his hand again, bleeding fresh.

No. How stupid could he be? Expecting to make an authentic friend? Of course Leaf wouldworm its way into his path again and ruin that. The only source of friendship he had ever had were the Kuang brothers, though their support felt more like hero-worship than the respect of peers.

Then, at the top of the mountain pass, he finally spied a small red sparkler fizzling on a bluff. It was a telltale signal that he was close to the group, who marked the trail for him to reunite with them. Huo scaled the ridge, stamped out the sparkler, and crunched across gravel tiredly, revealing himself to those seated and lounging at the edges of the stone patch. Near the center, a tea pot was set atop a flat stone beside the tree stump Bihokokuni was seated on, who poured a cup for himself. On the ground was a charred book. He did not bother looking up when he greeted, "Huo."

At the edge of the yard, Koinyu glanced over his shoulder while rummaging through his travel bag. His eyes went a little wide, trying to get a read on why the Sect leader's most gifted pupil had been gone overnight.

"Do you have the new emeici or not, bolts for brains?" Another Sect member grunted at Koinyu, "Give 'em here."

Koinyu passed over the needle weapons he'd stored in his bag, "You only paid me half for these, Tsunetane."

"Right. Because I bought some very nice company last night. I'll pay you next week."

"Tch." Koinyu's eyes scanned the space again, stopping briefly on Huo as he sat across from his master and accepted a cup of tea. He then looked around at the other occupants, shouting out to them, "Jué, Yu; you both owe me half for what you bid on yesterday."

"Yeah, yeah…" They waved him off.

"Kanshou, you owe me the full amount for that new jian…"

The man didn't fuss and instead fished around his satchel for money notes.

"Liang, Takami, and Sō, you all paid me in full yesterday, so you're off the hook…" He rattled off debts, "Huo pays for himself, like always…Cheng?" Koinyu scowled at a final Sect member on his immediate right, "Did you get anything?"

Besides your mother's fat ass? Cheng snarked in Hanwen, which incited an uproar of laughter from the group. Bihokokuni raised his hand to quiet them all again, not keen on giving away their position to any ears in the mountain range.

After a moment, Cheng hurled a wad of money notes in Koinyu's face. Since Koinyu was more shinobi than anyone else, lacked most Tao talents others did, and played double-agent for Orochimaru, he tended to receive poor treatment from Sect members. He put up with the treatment stonily.

"Where are Qin and Ga-Fen?" Huo asked at length.

All went silent.

Bihokokuni tipped back the last sip from his tea cup and set it down, rising to cross the tract of gravel and overlook the valley from the cliff's edge. "Before that," He spoke with his back to Huo, "Where is Chōten?"

Put on the spot, Huo ignored onlookers and steeled himself when he answered truthfully, "It escaped in the hands of a thief."

"And was retrieved?"

"I…" He felt many gazes watching him, "I pursued, but the culprit escaped."

"Very well." Bihokokuni accepted the explanation with ease, "Where was the scroll being taken?"

Huo felt his tongue stick in his mouth, finding it harder to reply, "To…Hidden Leaf."
The murmurs started. How are they doing this? How can Leaf have all three Tao treasures in its possession? Surely they could not be so well-informed?

"That thief was a match for you, I see." Bihokokuni glanced over his shoulder.

"He was no match. He barely escaped with his life." Huo spat, "A no-account swordsman with The Seven, a young one. He's one of those Yuki degenerates— Yuki Haku."

"Why was he accepting a mission from Hidden Leaf?"

"I do not know."

Koinyu chimed in with a grin, "Because he's from Hidden Leaf, you silly child!" He laughed at Huo, "Did you decide to trust him because he seemed like a sympathetic stray? Hidden Leaf adopted him when he was orphaned, so I hear. Not even wanted by his own clan! Orochimaru has had that boy marked for quite some time! He's as clever as they come."

"You shut your disgusting mouth, you insect." Huo rounded on Koinyu.

Packing away the collected money notes into his rucksack, Koinyu kept smiling, "Does my disgusting mouth remind you of your shortcomings, Huo? Should you speak like that to someone who laid the Copy Ninja flat on his back, and pilfered Hidden Leaf's cemetery—?"

"You're proud for a coward." In a flash of shadow, Huo was in front of him, glaring eye-to-eye with the braggart, "You'd be dead without Shifu's Shadow Gate to retrieve you. Worthless louse."

"You must give Leaf so much credit because they defeat you time and time again." Koinyu could not relent, his eyes gleaming with satisfaction. He'd practically invited Huo's fist to his shirt collar, dragging him to his knees.

Huo bared his teeth, where a few gleamed gold in the daylight, "Your cultivation is pathetic— your Tao Arts unfit even for the dime store sales bin-!"

"Why," Bihokokuni had turned around and asked, "Do you take pride in your cultivation level, Huo?"

Silence prevailed again, and the other members of the Sect discreetly fidgeted in their seats among stones. Huo's hand loosened and Koinyu wriggled away, lifted up his pack to retreat several steps.

Huo explained himself, "Tao Arts are an invaluable tools—"

"They are tools. They were her tools." Bihokokuni acknowledged, "We are shinobi. Sworn to defeat Tian Tian and her faction with their own heretic arts. It is the only way to counter them, you understand this." He folded his arms behind his back, "We adapted the discipline she founded to cut her down with it, as Lord Indra asked."

Nearby, Cheng and Yu muttered ecstatically while listening to the mission statement: Deliver the ultimate insult. Give her a taste of her own medicine.

"Just as he asked." Huo agreed in a soft breath.

"Your cultivation energy is too high. You depend on Tao Arts too much." Bihokokuni observed, "It was you who burned Keiseki House."

"Haku was—!"
"Could you not defeat him with your Ninjutsu? Your Taijutsu?" Bihokokuni pressed.

"I fought him fairly, for the sake of our Sect! Why should the methods matter?" He was careful not to raise a disrespectful tone with the Sect Leader.

"Why should it matter?" Koinyu echoed in a shriek, astounded.

"The methods matter, Huo, because dedicating oneself to _cultivation_ means that one is no better than Tian Tian herself, the deviant." The Sect Leader was perfectly calm as he illustrated the point, "She harnessed chakra that was given to us from the Shinju, and she selfishly enriched herself with the _cultivation qi_ of this world as well—a student of two conflicting schools…and then renounced Ninshu altogether. Will you do the same? To hoard power that isn't yours? Power that should be returned to Lord Indra?"

Huo swallowed the lump in his throat. He could not deny that he often relied on Tao Arts, even though doing so was principally discouraged by his Sect unless absolutely necessary. He flaunted his unique abilities. He took pride in something that the witch once took pride in, long ago. So indeed, what did that make him in the eyes of his Sect? Many here only used the bare minimum of Tao Arts, most especially in efforts to stymie targeted ninja villages that had no hope of countering them. Huo used his techniques as a matter of course, for whatever the occasion. This habit had not gone unnoticed.

"All that we do…aspire to return to Indra what is rightfully his. This is our way. Not for the sake of any Ôtsutsuki eminence other than he. The rest are false, pliable…and take pity on the ignorant."

Murmurs of agreement started up again, and Huo dared glance around at Sect members he had always thought himself superior to. His philosophy had taken a backseat to improving himself, shirking the communal goal of the Sect. Maybe his peers could be struck down in a fight against him, but was he a worthy servant when he acted in his own self-interest? No one here thought so.

"I bet your _jindan_ is nearly as developed at Bi-sama's." Koinyu jeered, "I bet you have more _cultivation energy_ in your body than shinju chakra! You'll stop aging before long—try to make your sword fly-!"

Huo whirled around and tried to cuff Koinyu in the face, but Cheng caught his wrist to restrain him, preventing a brawl. Huo shook free and began pacing.

"It's nothing like that!" Huo's humiliation was cresting, eyes glassy, "Me? Rely on those aberrant techniques! For what? You would accuse me! When I risk my life over and over to confront our enemies?"

"Huo," Bihokokuni drew his attention once more, "Each time, you have failed."

His heart crumbled to dust in his chest, trickling down into the acidic pits of his stomach. Those words had left his Master's mouth. For all to hear. He stood in silence and tried to overcome the apex moment of dejection, of being taken to task for his repeated disappointments.

"Shifu," He swallowed his pride and dropped to his knees, "I beg your forgiveness. I will not lose my way. Everything I do is for the Sect and for Lord Indra's awakening."

"You are forgiven." Bihokokuni crossed over to his teapot again to pour a new cup.

Huo rose and ignored the titters of amusement from those watching. He asked once more, "Where are Qin and Ga-Fen? Did they not accompany-?"
Bihokokuni flicked his fingers, signaling to Takami and Tsunetane to handle it. The two ninja stalked off into bramble and boulders beyond the gravel patch, leaving Huo to stare dumbly. When they returned, Qin and Ga-Fen were boneless, floppy and unresponsive, and were dragged into the clearing and roughly tossed to the ground. Huo bolted over to them and crouched down to examine them. Their throats had been slit.

"You may have them." Bihokokuni granted him.

Shaking, Huo frantically tried to make sense of why his friends had been killed. They had committed no offense! They had frequently found reliable shelter and resources for the Sect each time they relocated. They had forsaken their lives and responsibilities in Hidden Rock to help him. Why had they been disposed of? He rolled each boy over to slide their eyelids shut.

Koinyu and a few other Sect members snorted in amusement.

"You laugh." Huo launched to his feet, tormented, "The deaths of your own comrades are entertaining?"

Kanshou spoke in a deep voice from beside a withered tree, "They were never a part of us."

"They were a liability!" Yu agreed.

"Just your young, dumbass tag-alongs from Hidden Rock." Cheng explained it for him, "If they were caught and interrogated they'd only slow us down. Like you did. We cut the dead weight while you were gone."

"Who did this?" A furious sheen of tears glinted in Huo's eyes.

When no one answered and Bihokokuni sat leisurely sipping tea, Huo looked to each one of those smirking, unremorseful faces. Finally, when he settled on Koinyu, the man could not keep up his façade. His shoulders began to bounce as he laughed wildly, "Ha, ha, ha! Who do you think?"

Huo was on him in an instant, screaming as he beat Koinyu into the dirt, frenzied in his violence. Sect members scrambled to pull the two apart. After several seconds of tussling Bihokokuni demanded they knock it off, as if it were some casual scuffle. It took four men to hold Huo back as Koinyu limped away angrily, leaning on Takami as they put distance between themselves and the outraged disgrace.

Writhing, Huo escaped the grip of other Sect members, hocking and spitting at them, "All of you act without a shred of honor! Complacent in the murder of juniors!"

Shouts of protest, "They weren't even disciples! They were useless!"

"Enough." Bihokokuni's voice pierced the clamor.

Huo faced his Master, "Do you tolerate the—?"

"I ordered it." The truth came in a deadpan statement from their leader.

Going still again, Huo swallowed and blinked, trying to make sense of this horror.

"We've no time for rescues or unnecessary clashes. The weak aren't welcome here." Bihokokuni told him, "I wanted to give you the opportunity to redeem yourself, Huo. Your strength is promising. Your follow-through is not. Koinyu succeeds at most every task I give to him—"
Blatant disrespect dripped from Huo's interruption, "He's a murderer with no honor!"

"Be that so, he hasn't failed me."

"I will retrieve Chōten, with your leave."

"You will fail again."

Crazy-eyed, Huo screeched, "I won't!"

"I will make it so that you cannot fail again." Bihokokuni assured him.

Recognition flickered on Huo's face as he pieced his situation together, and immediately called upon his Phoenix Tao Art, preparing himself as Bihokokuni drew the dao from the scabbard at his side. It was all a crock of shit, not that any of them knew it. Huo was exhausted from his time fighting at Keiseki House, and he could not defend himself for more than a few minutes before his technique expired.

"No student's achievement has ever rivaled yours. But please don't give your Master any more grief." Bihokokuni placated him, "In death, you will never disappoint me."

"I could never do anything while dead." Huo retorted, "So I refuse."

"You're wrong about that." Bihokokuni corrected him.

All around, Sect members shrank back in bewilderment as their leader prepared to root out their most gifted trouble-spot. They knew better than to interfere.

Huo struck first and had his blow reflected back at him, rebounding off of Bihokokuni's Reversal Array. He was splayed on his back for a moment, heaving himself back to his feet with effort.

"We shall contribute to a powerful technique that can stall any force that might rise against Lord Indra's will." Bihokokuni spun the dao in his hand, raising half of a Ram Seal to focus cultivation qi instead of chakra, "The dead can be controlled with cultivation, but it is an imperfect practice. With Forbidden Ninjutsu, one can exert full control over corpses, and even command them to use techniques they used in life. Only one question remains…"

Huo scoured the space for the nearest shadow, prepared to make an earnest run for it.

"…and that is…can a corpse controlled in this way use Tao Arts?" Bihokokuni wondered.

Oh. So that was the meaning of this nonsensical betrayal. It was to experiment with some kind of Reanimation Jutsu that Huo had heard whispers of, based on Koinyu's machinations with the Snake Sennin. He was going to be used to test if Tao Arts were viable after death. That's what he thinks!" Huo had little left to lose.

He dashed through a long shadow at the edge of the bluff, disappearing into the dark. In the same moment, Bihokokuni had let go of his dao as it was suspended in the air, manipulated by qi. With his will and a thought to direct it, the sabre flew into another shadow, and within that realm, connected with its target. Huo was stuck front to back on the blade, falling backwards— back into daylight. He hit the ground with a puff of dust.

Unruffled, Bihokokuni crossed the patch and pulled his sword free, ignoring Huo's helpless rasp.

"You will be much more than you are now— you shall become a valuable tool in his service. Do not fret, Huo. Your karma will be restored. Your pain will end.” He struck down with the sabre's point, down through his student's heart, "Embrace vacancy and the void."

That principle of the Tao— of empty space and non-action— was one Huo had hoped to grasp in life, not in death. Once he had gone still and his light went out, Sect members spoke quietly again, in concert with their leader's mantra.

Emptiness.

Emptiness.

Emptiness.

Chapter End Notes

Did that last bit fk you up? It hurt a little bit to put it to paper. Or, word-processor, in this case. Don't join cults, kids! Thank you for reading and let me know what you thought in the comment box below!
Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Soundtrack: “Gravity” by Sara Bareilles

Hiking back through the Nara clan’s woodland preserve, two sika bucks stared at Shikamaru from their hiding spots in the tall autumn grass, the kusamomiji copper, the trees a sea of red.

He smiled slightly at their guardedness. Their does were probably nearby. Before long, he was out of the forest and winding down the path into the village proper. Asuma had asked if he could join him for lunch after his surveillance shift ended. It had been too long since he last had any quality time with his Sensei.

Maybe if they’d chosen a different day Chouji and Ino wouldn’t have been forced to miss out, since many of their responsibilities had multiplied in recent months. Since Chouji wouldn’t be present, and therefore barbecue would not be a must, Asuma had asked to meet at a café he’d grown partial to. Shikamaru depended on his half-honed sense of direction and a guess to find the place near the heart of the village.

About five blocks up, Asuma eventually fell into step beside him, “Hey, I wasn’t sure if you’d make it.”

“My survey only took a few hours.”

“Nah, I mean you don’t usually come along this stretch looking for places to eat. It’s too populated and noisy.” Asuma teased.

“A playful look on his face, “Tch. I know where I’m going.”

“Yeah, yeah. I just left the Standby Station so you have perfect timing—” As Asuma spoke those words, Shikamaru automatically looked across the street to the Jounin Standby Station, his brain merely connecting the dots, and his eyes went a little wide when he saw Sato exiting the front of the building.

The stone-faced expression on the young Hatake’s face, his downcast shoulders and body language — it took Shikamaru’s good mood down a few notches.

“What’re you-? Oh.” Asuma followed his student’s gaze.

They continued their trek to the café, going in silence for a full block before Shikamaru finally said, “It’s hard to watch.”

“Asuma? Yeah. Try standing in a committee meeting with him while he’s routinely harassed.”

“That…that shouldn’t have happened.” Shikamaru admitted haltingly, regarding the rumors flying around, “I’m just as guilty as everyone else. Ino, Chouji, Sakura, Kiba, and everyone who’s shunned him. It’s got to end.”

Asuma gave Shikamaru a dose of disapproving side-eye, “Just sayin’…Neji’s team never did that, and neither did Sato’s teammates.”
“I know.” Shikamaru would not deny it, “Maybe they’re the only reason he gets moving every day. I don’t know how I’d do it, if I were him.”

At the entrance of the café a hostess directed them to a small booth to be seated, and Shikamaru continued his commentary, “He looks so damn sad. He’s not supposed to be that way. Vivacious, insufferably annoying—that’s Sato.” Shikamaru gestured with a hand flick, “Now he’s more antisocial than Kakashi.”

Leaning back to stretch, Asuma assessed, “That might actually be an accurate statement. Kakashi’s had a rough time lately, but he’s happier than he’s ever been in quite a while. Opposite effects on him and his nephew, it seems like.”

They placed orders for beverages and lunch specials, and all the while Asuma was rather laid back, watching Shikamaru fret about something yet unspoken, grumbling to himself as he watched pedestrians outside from the booth’s window. He had seen the pain in someone he had called a friend and could now feel that pain, acutely, as if it were his own. Unfortunately, he’d contributed to Sato’s ostracism.

“Shikamaru,” Asuma called the young man back from his thoughts, “Do you know how the White Fang died?”

“The White Fang…Hatake Sakumo.” Shikamaru had heard vague details about the affair, but gave his teacher his attention since he did not want to misspeak on the matter.

“Long story short,” Asuma fiddled with an unlit cigarette he had pulled from a vest pocket, “Kakashi’s dad bailed on a mission objective in order to rescue his teammates. That mission’s success was critical, and so the consequences of his failure prevented Hidden Leaf from getting the leverage it needed in the war. His own teammates rejected him, even after he’d saved their lives. His friends and many others in Konoha wouldn’t so much as spare him a glance, after that…” Asuma snapped the cigarette in two, frustrated, “Sometimes we’re faced with an impossible choice. We have to choose. The man didn’t even get a thank-you, or any kind of acknowledgement for how fucking incredible he was on every prior mission he’d overseen. He was a legend, and they reduced him to nothing overnight.”

Shikamaru shut his eyes and took a breath, uncomfortable with the parallels.

“He must’ve thought…what with Kakashi excelling as a shinobi, and his eldest daughter looking out for her brother…that death was a reasonable escape. His wife had also died before her time, so that might’ve motivated him too. But above all, the shame marred every aspect of his life. So he took it.
People in this village are ruthless. Don’t get me wrong, I’d defend Konoha until my last, but…”
Asuma sighed, “We are stuck in this mindset. If you lose all your face, you cease to exist. Doesn’t matter what you got right up until that single moment you did something wrong. I really hate that.”

Shikamaru opened himself up a bit more, letting the anxiety and hopeless feelings from the story educate him, “Sensei, I know you feel that way. I didn’t…before. Totally…just blew Sato off.”

“It was easy, right?” Asuma supposed. Their drinks arrived and Asuma stuck his straw through the beverage lid a bit violently, to relieve some stress.

Lolling his head in irritation, Shikamaru groused, “Yeah, it was. And it wasn’t so easy to make a call, okay? Tama’s our friend too. It’s tricky to stay impartial and not pick a side.”

“Right. But no one had to open their mouth to actively make things worse.”
“Ino and I went around telling people to shut up about it. For the most part, that worked. Couldn’t go back in time and tell her not to lose her mind all over town once she found out, so I did what I could.” Shikamaru explained, “It was a screw-up. I don’t expect you to go easy on us or excuse what we did…but don’t think I want him to suffer. I want Sato to get better.”

“Huh.” Asuma laughed softly, “Who knows if that’ll ever happen. He’s making a better go of it than his grandfather, at least. Still hanging in there, somehow.”

Shikamaru sipped his tea, nodded thanks to the server that put a lunch tray in front of him, and then his eyes scanned the entrance of the café. There, he spied Maito Tama walking in with a man about her age; he had dark, curly hair, a friendly face, wore a Chunin vest…what the-?

He managed not to spurt his mouthful of tea everywhere, but some of it dribbled down his chin and it grossed his teacher out. Shikamaru blotted his face and directed Asuma’s attention with subtle hand gestures: Look that way! Over there!

Discreetly, Asuma took a peek to see what the hubbub was about. He faced front again, perplexed, and then stole a second, more obvious look.

“Who is that?” Shikamaru asked in a whisper, “With her?”

“Oh shit.” Asuma said.

“Oh shit what?” Shikamaru echoed.

“Oh.” Shikamaru enunciated, “Shit.”

Stressed out, Asuma took the two broken halves of the cigarette he’d left on the table and perched them on his lip, pretending he could take a cleansing drag.

Shikamaru plucked them away in annoyance, “Stop. Don’t even tempt yourself, you’ve been doing really well.”

“This is not good, Shika. Not good. One of my own kinsmen, making a move…”

“Can’t you do something?”

“No.”

On the far side of the café, Banri and his date were seated and for all intents and purposes had what appeared to be a normal, sociable lunch. Meanwhile, Asuma and Shikamaru tried to downplay their nosy idiocy as they ate their own meal.

It was after they split the bill and parted ways (Asuma had to check in with his brother) that Shikamaru tried to get his swirling brain under control as he continued to walk uptown. Wow, he never thought he’d see the day Maito Tama decided to play the field. Apparently she had refined taste in men. It was surreal. Seeing things he never expected to change actually change, at the snap of his fingers. There was no brake pedal in life. They careened on and on.

He stopped in a convenience store to buy some junk, ‘It’s not my business anyway. I was just surprised. Things have been the same for so long—it’s just too damn weird.’ His conscience was inflamed. Maybe he had nothing to do with the breakup between his friends, but had he offered a supportive hand? A listening ear? Had he safeguarded the privacy of either party? Not even close.
Shikamaru groaned, marching through the snack aisle, ‘I’m not even the kind of friend I’d want to have.’

And how the devil did it turn out that Neji’s team, which used to be a functional circus on a good day, maybe a year or two ago, prove to be the most mature and not instigate any further hardship when the Maito/Hatake rift began? Shikamaru would sometimes think to himself that Tenten and Neji’s relationship was a series of flukes that had not yet backfired on them. After all that shit, and the whispers, and the lack of progress, suddenly it was overcome and they had each other and then, what? They were mature adults? ‘That the rest of us can consult with them, like they have their acts together?’ He still couldn’t buy it. ‘I’m not comparing myself to them. No way.’ Ah, but he was, and he felt lousy.

He paid the shopkeeper and then proceeded uptown toward the Administrative Building, following his hunch. If Shikamaru could get nothing else right today, he resolved that there was one small thing he could do.

At a light jog, Shikamaru entered the building and paused in the lobby to look around. Headed down the east wing, he spotted the back of Sato’s silver head. He resumed his jog until he caught up with the young man, “Hey!”

Initially, it did not even occur to Sato that the address might be directed at him. He kept walking until Shikamaru spoke his name, then he stopped. Dumbfounded, Sato turned around and tried not to let apprehension blare off him. Shikamaru stood there with his hands in his pockets, his head canted in a way that read non-threatening, though Sato wasn’t sure of how to read anyone anymore since his senses were always screaming.

“I’m sorry.”

“Hm-uhh?” To Sato, this could have been part of a hallucination. Sometimes he got loopy after not eating for long stretches.

“I’m an asshole. I know I am.” Shikamaru went on, “But… I can learn. And move on. We all have to.”

“-uh, Shikamaru, I don’t-?” Sato still couldn’t apply this apology to his exile; it was too deeply rooted in his psyche.

“I wouldn’t let you talk to us, or to me, when you came to us. That’s what I’m sorry about.” He explained it clearly, “You were in a world of shit and you still are, I think. I am done with being on the sidelines like some stooge in the crowd, going along with how people treat you.” Shikamaru watched the expression on Sato’s face change into something more human as the words registered, “I don’t want you to keep thinking you can’t come to me if you need to talk. You can. I’m telling you that you can. I didn’t prove myself as a friend before.”

Sato shook his head, smiling ruefully, “It’s… okay. Besides, haven’t I always annoyed you?”

“You always have. Though to be honest I got a kick out of it.”

There, just for a brief second, was a flicker of light that was the Sato that everyone used to know, smiling appreciatively, “Well good! Thank you, I… I can’t stay to chat now. I’d like to, but I have a skills assessment.” He pointed to an office a few doors down, “But maybe later, if that’s cool?”

Shikamaru withdrew his hand from his pocket, offering a box of pocky to Sato, “Whenever is fine.”

Sato closed his hand around the box, smiling a tiny, heartened smile, “Thanks, Shika.” He ventured on with his once-favorite snack, and was compelled to even open it and chow down.

When he’d gone, Shikamaru finally reversed course out of the building, feeling a bit better about himself finally. He’d dusted off his conscience. Taken some initiative. He probably wasn’t going to tell anyone about this extension of friendship, since opinions were still so divided, but Shikamaru would only act how he saw fit. Not according to how others howled and heeled.

He hadn’t really needed Asuma’s lecture to arrive at this decision either. He planned to do it no matter what. His Sensei had only underscored what Shikamaru had already realized— that he had to grow up.

He moved downtown with the foot traffic of the village, enjoying the bright autumn day and cool air. Shikamaru arrived at the Yamanaka Flower shop after a pleasant walk and entered, intending to pay Ino a visit on her management shift. Who he found, seated on a stool in front of an easel off to the side of the showroom, was Sai.

The still life of flowers consumed Sai’s attention, and he didn’t spare a look to see who had walked into the shop. He kept painting heedlessly.

Maybe the lack of acknowledgment was for the best. It was an itchy, slow-boil of anger rising in him as opposed to an explosion, since, Shikamaru reasoned, he didn’t truly know what this was about. But he did know that Sai was a pest, and weird, and he just kept turning up. He moved to the back room of the shop and discovered Ino there, apron on and hair tied up, piled on top of her head as she mixed fertilizers in separate small pots.

Sans a greeting, Shikamaru gruffed, “What is he doing here?”

“He is a thorn in my side.” Ino hissed at the valid question, “Sai comes here every day.”

“Every day?” Shikamaru was further perturbed.

Ino bent her hands to rest her forehead on the back on her wrists, exhausted, but unwilling to get soil on her face, “ERG. Shikamaru, he found out that I work here, sometime just this week. I guess. So he checks to see if I’m around! And if I’m covering a shift and he finds me? He’ll buy a flower from the front display and then give it to me.” She shook her gloved fists, “He’s a complete idiot!”

“Then tell him off.”

“I did. In no uncertain terms, I said: Please piss off and go away. Didn’t do any good when he came back for my Dad’s shift, and they got to talking, and then my dumbass Dad commissioned some flower paintings that we can hang in the shop and possibly sell to patrons.” She thrashed her head, “Come on, Inoichi! Head of the Intel Corps my foot!”

From all this Shikamaru gathered, “So, Sai likes you?”

Ino was flustered, “No he doesn’t! He’s socially inept. He’s a boomerang that can’t take a hint.”

He could look into her and see past the words. See that maybe the attention was not 100 percent unwanted.

“Hey, don’t give me that look.” Ino knew it too well, “He won’t address me by name, says very weird shit in an effort to get to know me, and barely retains anything I say. I’m thinking of finding this Tenzo friend of his and demanding an intercession.”

“Ino, if you were really so determined to get him out of here, he’d be ass-up in the middle of the street by now, beaten.” Shikamaru imagined, “Am I wrong?”

“…why are you trying to pin this on me?” Hurt flashed in her eyes, and shit—he felt bad. But it was too late to backpedal and apologize for his insecure comment, because Ino told him, “I’m…fuh. Worn out. Just go. I’m trying to work.”

“Ino, I—”

“I’ll see you later, alright?” The weary smile faded from her face as she hefted a large sack of soil, and relocated it to a shelf.

This was new. This felt horrible. Shikamaru retreated from the work room and back through the gallery, where he was inclined to communicate with the nuisance, “Sai.”

“Oh!” Sai looked around the canvas at him, “Pineapple.”

“That’s Pineapple-san, to you.” He was rolling with it, “Don’t bother her.”

“Bother who?” Judging by that blank look, maybe he really didn’t get it. But then Sai doozied a guess, “Miss Lovely?”

Oh. Had fire just replaced blood in his veins? Sure felt like it.

“Her name is Ino. Yamanaka Ino. Anchor of my team and the pride of her clan.” Shikamaru corrected him, “And she’s mine.”

“Oh.” Sai said.

The door chimed behind Shikamaru, and he wrestled with the awful feeling in the pit of his stomach.

More than two hours later, Tsunade’s eyebrows danced in confused, delighted astonishment when she beheld a white rabbit hop through the open door of her office. The Hokage paused in the middle of tapping a stack of reports into order, watching the creature cross the floor, round her desk, and stop by her feet. Ton-Ton rose from her cushion to approach the rabbit, meet her snoot with it, noses wiggling, and then give it a pass grade. The pig settled down to nap again, and Tsunade picked the rabbit up.

“Ton-Ton had no problem with you. What are you doing here? What’s-?” She fiddled with the bandana fastened around the rabbit, beneath which a scroll had been hidden, “Oh, so you’re a messenger? How unconventional.” Tsunade took the scroll and set the rabbit down.

She unwound the parchment to find a message in slanting script on the left, written in haste.

Tsunade-sama, please summon the tool stored within. You will find the scroll for Chōten in here, retrieved before Dintei Bi could secure it.

Her heart nearly twirled her chest. Namba had managed her request! ‘Bless him, I expected him to decline! I suppose Jiraiya also reached out to him.’ Tsunade eyed the rabbit that was inquisitive about her sleeping pet pig, ‘A tad unusual for Namba to communicate through a rabbit, but he’s always discreet…’ Tapping parchment and holding a hand sign, Tsunade procured the old tool summoning scroll for the Tao Weapon called Chōten.

“There’s only one way for me to be sure this is genuine…” She muttered, examining the Hanzi characters and old contractor names within the scroll. They were not something she could authenticate by sight. She would need Tenten to summon from it to prove what it was.

“Shishou!” Sakura’s voice snapped her out of it, and Tsunade blinked at her student as she hurried into the office. “There was a rabbit running out of here—”

“Yes, yes, just a messenger delivering something to me.” Tsunade assured her, “Were you on call this morning, Sakura?”

“I was…and then I took some time to speak to the hospital administrator.”

Brow arching, Tsunade asked, “What for?”

“I had some questions about founding health clinics.”

“Oh.” Tsunade set down Chōten’s scroll and leaned back in her chair, “Have you given some thought to what can be improved here, Sakura? Health organizations now are much better than what they used to be.”

“I have no doubt about that, but accessibility and range of treatment is a bit…” She tossed her head and searched for a word, “Not as care-oriented as I once thought.”

“More profit-driven.” Tsunade agreed, and her student nodded, so she went on, “It’s hard to fight the economic current as it is, young lady. If you want to demand meaningful changes from those who hold all the cards and make health systems a reality, you’re in for quite the fight.”

“I know, Shishou.”

“I was never much of an advocate so much as an expert in caregiving. If you’re going to be both…” Tsunade smiled, “You’ll have surpassed me.”

“I never-!”

“I want you to.” She placated her student, “Carry out your ideas, Sakura. There’s so much more that I can’t teach you, and you’ve sponged up nearly everything I have to give. Since there is little left for me to impart, I’ll be turning you over to Kakashi full-time for missions very soon. Retain what schedules you can handle at the hospital, but don’t burden yourself.” Tsunade glanced down at a desk calendar and flipped between the end of one month and the next, sighing, “There’ll be no rest for me either, once they get back. They’re a bit overdue.”

In response to the curious look on Sakura’s face, wondering Who? Tsunade explained, “Naruto will be here soon. And Haku, if Gaara is willing to part with him. Though he’s been exceptionally pushy about that. If he wants to make Haku a Sand ninja, I wish he’d outright tell me about his intentions… hmf! Those boys stretch my patience thinking it’s limitless…”

“You’ll just have to test their patience when they come home then, now won’t you?” Sakura teased.

“Ah! I like how you think!” The Hokage tittered over the suggestion.

“As am I. Come back later this afternoon when you’re free, Sakura. We can discuss your idea a bit more then.”

With a bubbly nod, Sakura excused herself. Tsunade discovered she too was in buoyant state of mind, shuffling mission requests and memos around, responding to a letter requesting an extension on payments for a loan Hidden Leaf had provided to a construction magnate, within which her Pay up, chump message had the bare minimum of professionalism in it. Shizune came and went with tea and a container of dumplings, off to oversee her own tasks as Tsunade worked and chewed and sipped.

When things went right, it put her in a much better space to be productive. Her flow paused when there was a soft knock on the frame of the doorway, and she bid the visitor Enter before she even glanced up from her work, and Tsunade gasped at the sight.

Sato had the look of what the cat dragged in. To the right of his face was a large bruise, cuts and bumps all over him, hair and clothing very disheveled. Tsunade had to backtrack in her mind to think on what the cause of it could be, if she had assigned him any arduous missions.

“Sorry about how I look, Tsunade-sama.” He could see Tsunade’s eyes vibrating.

“Oh don’t. I just can’t remem— ah.” She thought of it, “You met with your ANBU evaluator today?”

“Oh. Yeah.” Sato confirmed faintly.

“How was the practical? I hear that they’ve changed some standards to test possible recruits.”

“Well…he asked me a few questions in the office downstairs. I answered as best I could, though some of it was strange.”

“It’s supposed to be. It was Kegon, right?”

“Yeah, Captain Kegon.”

“Oof.” Tsunade said, now having the full context of Sato’s apparent beating.

“After that part I followed him everywhere, did all the stuff he asked…sort of. Tried to keep up, and fight, and do those crazy challenges.” Sato recollected, “But it was…” He shrugged tiredly, “I failed and I’m kind of glad.”

“Never in my life would I dare take such an evaluation. Ice your face when you take a break, it looks terrible.” Tsunade clucked, “With that aside, tell me how your day-to-day is going now.” She was interested to hear about how Sato was faring since the rift, and she had heard most of the story from acceptable sources.

Sato went with, “I’m adjusted.”

“Go on.” Tsunade angled for the details.

He sighed and then expounded, “I keep up with Dr. Iwao’s appointments three times a week. I stay on schedule. My team helps. Don’t have much of an appetite, but it’s better than it was. Also, I had to put up with Kakashi stealing a bunch of stuff from my apartment, but I guess he had to deal with his own end of it, you know? I keep trying to reassure him that I am working and staying alive. He’s been giving me half an anti-depressant pill every day.” Sato reported, “I think it works? I’m less crappy on it. What I really notice is that…I feel closer to him. I know my uncle cares and I don’t want him to worry.”

“Good. Has half a pill done anything positive by itself?”

“Hmm. Well, yeah.”
Tsunade jotted something down on a stationary pad, ripped the page and then handed it to Sato, “Please give that to Iwao-san for me, for her to approve. It’s for a week’s supply. If you feel better, you’ll be adjusted accordingly.”

Frowning, Sato took the script, “I don’t really like everyone doing so much for me.” Tsunade gave him a puffed face so he went on, “The exclusion isn’t as bad as it was. I can handle it and I don’t want to be pitied.”

“I don’t pity you, Sato.” Tsunade told him flatly, “I trust you without question.”

The sensation of shock, appreciation, and confusion gummed up his throat, rendering Sato speechless.

“Do you think I haven’t been through my own share of shitstorms?” Tsunade asked him, highly amused, “I am the biggest coward I know. Look at me. What do you think of me?”

His response came out in a babble, “Y-You’re…my leader.”

“Even if I’ve fucked up so many things in my life?” Tsunade pressed.

Sato smiled, composing himself, “Well, I don’t know about that…but I would follow you no matter what, Tsunade-sama.”

She smiled back, “Feel better.”

Being thrashed and rejected by an ANBU evaluator had been an unexpected motivation for Sato. He had not thought much about trying out to begin with, but had been inspired after a few conversations with Kakashi. Tenzo had been around at the time and told him, “You can certainly try. We’re always scheduling evaluations to find qualified recruits.”

“Do you think I’d be any good?” Sato asked him.

Tenzo exchanged a look with Kakashi, and then said, “It doesn’t really matter what I think.”

“So…no?”

“You’re still a bit green yet.” Kakashi estimated, “Apply and see what it’s like, and don’t expect anything. Experiencing it for yourself can tell you more than either of us can.”

“Ah.” Sato thought that was a very good point. So he gave it a shot and got whooped. At least it had kept his mind off of other things.

The evaluation had been physically grueling, forcing him to travel at break-neck speeds through forest and terrain all through the Land of Fire with Captain Kegon, responding to prompts and traps. Sometimes handicaps were thrown in to increase difficulty and gauge his problem-solving. The “break” they took from the travel and tracking drill was more or less a bludgeoning, and though Sato’s swords skills, Genjutsu and spit-shined Taijutsu held him off for a short time, Kegon beat him purple before ordering him to book it for another 20 kilometers.

On the return trip, there had been some sort of obstacle course near a ravine carved by the Naka River, where another gauntlet had been unleashed upon Sato. Then, Kegon beat him senseless a second time before calling it quits. All in one afternoon. At best, Sato figured, he’d demonstrated a few of his best jutsu, but it hadn’t been near enough to even scratch a competent score. Or maybe it had. Either way, Kegon had thanked him for his interest and curtly advised him to go home. It wasn’t much of a positive indicator.

The takeaway from that experience had broadened his perspective on what Black Ops units required, and moreover, gave him a glimpse of the role they played in the defense of the village. Kakashi and Tenzo could only explain so much to him. When Sato made hair-pin turns and life-or-death leaps that demanded his utmost effort and concentration; a personal meditation of his skills and responses, he’d gotten a clearer grasp of what they couldn’t put to words. To be in the ANBU was to truly know oneself as a shinobi.

This felt like a good direction to go in, since he’d been adrift for quite a while. Everyone in Konoha seemed to have an opinion on who he was although the gossip had declined, but Sato then wondered: Did he actually know himself? The person who he would claim they had all wrong?

Kakashi’s mission activity had been restored to light duty, and he kept more in the company of his students. On off days, he was glad to spend time with Sato and polish up his skills. If his nephew had set any kind of goal for himself, well, he preferred to keep him on that track as opposed to a self-destructive plunge. There were some days in which Sato did not turn up, and those days made Kakashi’s stomach lurch. Sometimes, the dark caught up to hogtie Sato in hopelessness.

“I have a mission. Can you keep an eye on Sato today while you’re off?” Kakashi felt bad about putting his boyfriend on alert, “I’ll be back in two days.”

Tenzo waved a hand at him, “Stop worrying. You don’t even have to ask.”

“He didn’t show up again like he—”

Tenzo held his face, stilling him, “He’s going to be fine. I’m here.”

Kakashi took a breath.

As promised, Tenzo monitored the state of affairs in Kakashi’s absence. He remembered Kakashi describing the last occasion Sato had shut himself in for a while, during which Kakashi had poked his nose into Dr. Iwao’s office to investigate. She had advised him not to hover, “I ought to keep this confidential, but Sato does come to his appointments with me even on his worst days. So please don’t snoop around here, Kakashi. He’s just starting to wrestle some control back in his life, and you ought not to exert too much control. Encourage independence.”

It didn’t just mean leaving Sato to hash things out on his own. Dr. Iwao had also meant for Kakashi not to fall prey to his anxieties.

Most every day, Tenzo helped fetch him out of doubtful waters and remind him that Sato was, if very slowly, improving. Kakashi’s supervision relaxed to acceptable levels, reeling in his imagination so that he could instead run his puppies through agility courses, or grind his students down at the training field. If any concerns lingered after that, they fluttered off when Kakashi went home to find Tenzo, usually, who had gotten things in order and maybe started dinner. And maybe he’d left some of his belongings around Kakashi’s space. But not always. Sometimes he was out: called away on a mission, a committee meeting, or reporting on Sai’s societal integration.

It was a delicate balance that Tenzo had struck, rearranging his life incrementally to edge nearer to Kakashi. Though the rare bits of hysteria and anxious fretting wore him out, Tenzo could say it was a welcome change of pace. He’d learned more about Sato in the process, and had begun to feel protective over the youngster whilst on once-in-a-while check-ins; through windows, atop buildings, round corners and so on.
Without getting any background info from Kakashi, Tenzo had eventually figured out that Sato liked photography and had a sweet tooth, but was not very indulgent these days. He noticed where the boy shopped and distracted himself; locations on the street where Sato would stop and stare at businesses he used to frequent, where he was no longer welcome. Tenzo made note of those places, sometimes ventured into them to learn more about them. He’d see how Sato reacted to those who hurled callous remarks at him (hardly reacted at all), and how he interacted with teammates who would join him for training or missions. Over time, Tenzo had collected enough intelligence to be sure that Sato truly was doing well enough on his own. He kept watch because of his promise, but he never agonized over Sato’s welfare.

Reciprocally, Sato noticed him more as well.

“You’re here again?” Sato brightened at the sight of Tenzo who was exiting the Cosme convenience store with two latte-style beverages.

“Looks like it—we might be on similar schedules now. I won’t be on duty until this evening.” Tenzo handed one of the drinks to Sato, who was startled, “Here.”

“Are you sure-?”

“I got it for you. Doesn’t the store owner give you grief? So you don’t have to go in and put up with that.”

“Wow, thanks, let me give you some money for this at least.” His expression lightened even more. Sato sipped noisily and passed money notes to Tenzo, who graciously accepted. They walked in a concurrent direction towards the large south-central park of the village.

“The dogs are out here today. Just a bit more training and then Kakashi thought he might take Tolsi and Gattsu on their first mission, if it’s C-Rank.” Tenzo filled him in.

“He doesn’t think it’s too soon?”

“When it comes to ninken, he knows what he’s talking about.” Tenzo smiled to himself as they progressed down a gravel park path.

“When did Kakashi say he’ll be back, Tenzo?”

“Later this afternoon or evening, if all goes well.”

“Hm.” Sato sipped his drink again and watched Kakashi’s dog pack a few meters ahead of them, scuffling and playing, “You might just miss him when you go to work. When does your shift end?”

“It’s only an eight hour rotation. Though I’ll probably have a more involved mission in a few days.”

There was a companionable silence between them, harmonizing with the sway of trees in the breeze.

“I know Kakashi worries a lot.” Sato observed quietly.

Tenzo looked sidelong at the young man, “He’s gotten better. I’m sorry about all those things we took from your home.”

“It’s fine. Every once in a while I need to use something that’s missing, but it hasn’t been a big deal.”

“I can bring a few things back.” Tenzo wagered, if he did so discreetly.

“That’d be nice. To, you know, clean my toilet bowl properly with cleaner.” Sato chuckled.
Akino, who had since recovered from his grave injuries, was racing with a serious case of the zoomies, which had infected the puppies and triggered them to chase. The dogs ran in a high-speed ellipse, curving around Tenzo like an obstacle then bolting away again.

Tenzo was chuckling. Because Sato was funny and lighthearted when he wasn’t distraught, and also because the dogs were behaving like complete dingheads unfit for any mission, barking, prancing, and tug-of-warring. When playtime was over they’d be regimented once more.

“I know that you met Kakashi when you were in the ANBU together. You’ve been his friend for a long time.” Sato swirled his straw around the cup, “Why didn’t you retire when he did? Do you like what you do that much?”

“I…it isn’t quite that.” Tenzo yielded, “I was just getting my start, and he was tired of that line of work. You see, I came from Root before Sandaime-sama accepted me into his Black Ops.
Everything was beginning for me. I couldn’t leave the profession that I was most good at, because I didn’t want to think of starting over. Maybe I could’ve, now that I look back…” He sighed, “When Kakashi quit, it felt like he was leaving me.”

Eyes flicking to his left, Sato gave him an odd look as he interpreted the words.

Tenzo stammered an amendment, not inclined to out himself, “Uh! W-What I mean is— I might’ve misconstrued his reasons for leaving, because back then I didn’t understand. I hardly understood anything in those days.”

“You do it because it’s what you know. I guess career switches aren’t for everyone once you build up momentum.”

“Right. My abilities are well-suited to protecting the village, so you could say that I want to put the needs of the many before my own.” Tenzo tacked on, thinking of the Mokuton, “The ANBU is fine, but I think that the prestige associated with its membership is overstated. If you want to work toward it, Sato, I can help you. Though I’d rather you not think of it as an achievement so much as humbling service. Joining ANBU is to bow down and be stepped on, so all in the village can live and be secure as you act as their foundation.”

“Yeesh! What a way to put it!”

“That’s only my take.”

“Heh! I’ve got to hear how Kakashi describes it.” He dissolved into chuckles again.

Tenzo finished the last bit of his drink before disposing of the cup in a trackside waste bin. Sato lined up and tossed his own empty cup in an arcing shot, sinking it dead-center into the trash.

“When he left you…” Sato wondered, “Did it feel like you had no idea what you were doing?”

“Wha—? You’re referring to our service time—?”

“Uh…no. I think you meant…something else.” Sato hazarded a guess, “That’s why you’re with him so much now, right? Because you made Kakashi apologize?”

“You’ve got it all wrong, Sato!” Oh goodness, Tenzo felt like his head was deflating, and he would go flat and die from embarrassment. He wasn’t having this discussion with a kid!

“Well if I do you can clear it up for me!” A small laugh, “I don’t know, to me it sounded like there was a misunderstanding; something went unsaid. He didn’t leave because of you or because you Tenzo shook his hands wildly, “Stop speculating. Gosh, it was bad enough when he talked about it!”

“Everything scared him back then. Even his own family. I hope it didn’t shed a negative light on Kakashi, whatever happened…” Sato steered the subject so that Tenzo stopped squawking, “He takes too long to set things right.”

“No, there was no negative light. I didn’t resent him or anything, I just…” Tenzo’s shoulders sagged when he spoke, “I didn’t know how to tell him, or when I’d tell him, what I was feeling. It was stuck for years on the tip of my tongue until I believed I didn’t deserve to say anything.”

Sato gave him that peculiar side-eye look again and Tenzo flexed his hands uncomfortably, since this kid could definitely sift out the subtext. He couldn’t say I’m in a relationship with your uncle, and ruin this fledgling friendship/guardianship he had going. Sato might label it creepy and dust his hands of him. As a practice, Tenzo did not tell anyone what was going on lest it become widely-circulated information that precipitated unintended consequences.

Breaking off from the dog pack, Bull trudged over to sit beside Tenzo and lean against his leg in silence. An offering of support after he’d sensed unease in the human.

“I think it’s good that you love him.” Sato said enthusiastically, ignoring Tenzo’s unnecessary screech and stuttering, “It’s mutual! I think. I’ve never seen Kakashi feel that way about anyone, so I’m just guessing.”

“I…I…I haven’t talked about this with anyone. Or, I don’t want to, yet.” Tenzo told him, “You don’t…think it’s unacceptable?”

“Why would I? I’m the most unacceptable person around.” Sato verbally flagellated himself.

“No…I’m pretty sure Sai still holds that record.”

“Heh! Not if he hasn’t socially imploded yet—”

“In spite of what the public may say, I don’t think badly of either of you.” Tenzo offered.

Without celebrating outwardly that Sato had accepted him, he saw the young man off with a wave when he went to find his friend called Shino. Tenzo called the dog pack to gather, doled out treats when he had their attention, and led the way home.

The sun was setting as Kakashi’s team returned through Konoha’s gates. He graciously let his students scatter to return home and have meals with their families, unpack, wash-up, and all that. “I’ll debrief with the Hokage.” Kakashi told them.

Kiba and Sakura extended their gratitude before running home, but Tama walked alongside Kakashi, not inclined to join her parents. Not that he blamed her.

“No in a big hurry?” He observed.

“No hurry at all.” Tama smiled wanly, “I don’t know if my dad is home or not.”

“Things aren’t improving?”

“No. My relationship with my father is just…friction. We argue so much now, even over meaningless things…at least I try to avoid tension and not pick fights. Poor Mom.” Tama rubbed her temples and took a breath, “Other than that, life if good.”

“Good is good!” Kakashi’s eyes were closed, merry crescents. So she was enjoying herself without Sato—he was heartened to hear it.

“I’ve been able to spend some time with graduates from my old Academy class. They’re great. I’ve introduced Sakura-chan to some of them.”

“Ah, yes. I remember that bunch. I heard you went out to lunch with Banri.” Kakashi probed a subject that Asuma had relayed to him days earlier.

Tama gave him a suspicious look, “Yeah…”

He provided a superficial description, “He’s nice.”

“He is nice.” She confirmed.

“Kind of boring.” Kakashi added.

An irritated bark, “Sensei!”

“I’ve met him since he’s civically engaged on councils and with the Sealing Corps. I’m just sharing what I think.”

“He’s stable, polite, pleasant…”

“I’m not saying that he isn’t.”

“He’s boring.” Tama finally agreed, “I’m not going on another date with him. He’s cute, but he’s…”

She shrugged, “He doesn’t have a lot in common with me, and it feels like I bend over backwards to meet in the middle with him.”

“Then don’t.” Kakashi advised, “Pick someone dangerous and eccentric. Like that Mashu kid.”

“He talks like he’s in an imperial court! It’s too much!”

“He’s in ANBU and handsome enough, so that should work—”

“Sensei, why are you trying to set me up with people? Should you even be doing that?”

Kakashi rubbed his chin, “To tell the truth I’m not really trying. Just making conversation.”

“Erg. I think I’m going to enjoy a solitary existence for now, like Uncle Gai.”

“Gai’s had girlfriends.”

Tama have him a You’re full of shit face.

Kakashi tacked on, “I think.”

“What does it matter? Things finally feel normal now! I get great sleep again and I got a haircut and…” Tama heaved a sigh, “I never thought I’d feel better. But I’m so much better.”

“I never thought I’d feel better either. Strange how these improvements creep up on us, no?” He agreed.
Her smile put him at ease, “It’s about time, Sensei. Thanks for submitting our report. Will we see you tomorrow?”

“Tomorrow, if a bit late.”

“Alright.” Tama bid him farewell at her specified turn, back in the direction of her home.

At the Administrative Building, the Hokage was winding down for the day and hurried his debriefing along so she could bustle downtown to her favorite tavern. Kakashi delivered his main points and avoided small talk.

On the way home in dusk light, a crow called out its idiot cry on the wing, aho, aho! It passed right over his head, floating on a breeze to neatly perch on a tree bare of every last leaf. Above the crow on a higher branch, Sato’s owls Aree and Aroo were scanning the alleyways below for any unsuspecting mice. The world was feeling sparse now, Kakashi thought, as fall would give way to winter soon. He picked up the pace to escape the chill.

It was dark at home, and the dogs did not scamble down the hallway to greet him when the door clicked shut behind Kakashi. He guessed they were snoozing on the bed in the guest room, which was more or less their room.

With automatic motions, Kakashi journeyed around the flat, switching lights on, unpacking his travel bag and putting odds and ends away. He put water on to boil for tea. He washed his hands and face in the bathroom. As he reached for a towel to pat himself dry, Kakashi noticed two towels hanging on the rack. A firework of happiness warmed his chest, reminding him that another was here with him. ‘Tenzo will be doing surveillance all night, unless something’s changed. He didn’t leave a note.’ He made himself comfortable and shuffled around in house slippers.

By the time he returned to the kitchen to fix tea, Pakkun appeared and leapt up onto the counter to be eye-level with Kakashi, “Welcome back.”

“Pakkun, you know I don’t like you putting your butt down where I prepare food.”

“It’s a clean butt. And hey, say hello to me first.” The dog gruffed, “Everyone’s gonna be hungry when they wake up.”

“Tenzo didn’t feed you all before he left?” Kakashi scooped tea leaves into a strainer.

“Didn’t have the time. The pups got muddy and he had to give them a fast bath, before running out for work.”

“Ah.” He wanted to award that man a medal for not letting small, undisciplined dogs dirty his house. Kakashi went about distributing food into bowls, setting them down on mats, and as he worked members of the pack sleepily padded into the living area. They all waited patiently until Kakashi directed them by name to take their place and eat.

He sipped tea and had a light meal of leftovers, glancing over the newspaper on the table to see what he’d missed while outside of Konoha. Awards ceremonies, business ads, clan affairs, heartwarming local stories. A headline reading KEISEKI HOUSE BURNS surprised him, ‘That place in the Land of Mountains? They have more than enough money to patch it up, though.’ He wondered what mischief transpired at the auction house, since the article lacked details on motives or suspects.

All meals and clean up concluded, the dogs lounged around or went back to sleep. Kakashi turned in early, glad to be back in his own bed as opposed to inns or a bedroll in the forest. He let his thoughts trickle slowly as he nestled beneath his quilt.
‘I haven’t seen anything weird with my Sharingan lately. Which is good. That, or I’ve been too distracted by Sato to notice anything.’ Kakashi shut his eyes but was curious, and tried to see—see the way he had when Pein had attacked the Tide Village. Nothing. Only darkness behind his eyelid, and the darkness of his bedroom. ‘It always feels so real. How is this happening? Is it some kind of prophetic vision, something all in my mind? Do I see what someone else sees? See something someone wants me to see?’

Then it hit him.

‘I should test it.’ Kakashi decided, ‘If what I experience is all me, and not due to outside interference, then what I do can’t get a response or create an effect…can’t influence what I see. But if I do something that does affect what I see…then my vision might be connected to something.’ Part of him was afraid of this possibility. What if other users of the Sharingan had found a way to control him? Or if someone in the Akatsuki had? If he reached out and rocked the proverbial boat, indicating to a potential enemy that he was aware of such a link could be very foolish indeed.

That was a task for another day. Maybe it was worth waiting for Tenzo to get back and watch over him, when he next used the Mangenkyo Sharingan and put his theory to the test. It took a long while for Kakashi to fall asleep, and when he did, it was a listless, tossing-turning sleep.

He couldn’t wake up. The dreams were adhesive, murky and turbulent. Had the door to his bedroom been left open, one of the dogs might’ve taken the initiative to wake him. But they respected the division of space. Hours passed. No time passed at all.

When he felt a hand slide along his shoulder and neck, eventually the restraints of sleep broke. Kakashi whipped up into a sitting position and narrowly avoided headbutting Tenzo.

“Howa! Kakashi, are you alright?” The man had removed his mask but was still in ANBU attire.

“I…” He sat there childishly, “Yeah.”

“I came back and the dogs were pacing. You were having nightmares, Pakkun said.”

“Sounds about right.” Kakashi estimated. His hand snaked up to reach Tenzo’s. He looked the man over and asked, “You’re still in uniform?”

“Yes, my shift just ended. I would’ve gone back to HQ to change, but I saw something and I came here directly to tell you—”

Kakashi did not do a good job of concealing the fright in his voice, “What did you see?”

“Sato’s been out for a while. It’s still dark. I noticed him near the Hokage monument—” Tenzo flopped backwards on the bedspread when Kakashi bolted up and out of the room, “Hey wait! Don’t panic—!”

Kakashi was panicking. His default settings seemed to go that way wherever his nephew was concerned. Somehow shoes had gotten on his feet, and the black pullover and joggers he wore were enough to run out into the dark of pre-dawn in the direction of the village’s stone faces. He’d leapt off the balcony walkway and shot over rooftops. Several buildings passed underfoot before Tenzo caught up to him, trying to corral him and slow him down, but Kakashi wove away to keep moving.

“You’re overreacting, you’re barely awake right now! It’s a good thing that I saw. He’s been training!” He tried to talk Kakashi down, “Stop for moment, will you?”

“Training at the monument? He’ll jump off of it—”
“I swear to you he won’t. I’ve been watching over him and he’s okay!”

“Sato is not okay!” Kakashi’s spirit echoed more loudly: I’m not. I’m the one who’s not.

Since stopping Kakashi didn’t seem to be an option, Tenzo kept pace beside him, opting to give him more context, “Alright. Think what you want, but I’ll tell you what I know. He’s been training hard since that evaluation. He’s asked me for pointers, wakes up early. This is normal!”

At least out loud, Kakashi did not agree. Maybe deep inside somewhere he knew that Tenzo was being sincere, and that all was probably well.

“I wanted to ask if you’d like to watch, since he was practicing a very interesting technique.” Tenzo explained, “But not if you’re like this! You can’t appreciate it unless you relax, so please—”

Kakashi kept moving and had covered the northernmost sector of the village, dropped down off of rooftops to leap up stone bulwarks and stairways leading towards the monument’s observation area. Kakashi’s manic movements were remarkable, though Tenzo was disconcerted as he kept up. He’d hurt himself at this rate. It was as if he was still dreaming. The pair bounded off the metal railing of a lookout, moving up the sheer rock wall of the eroded mountainside, attaching themselves with chakra.

And just as Tenzo had forecasted, Kakashi’s faculties were not operating at full capacity. He slipped on a crumbling foothold and fell back, but he was already caught. Tenzo had extended his arm, melded with Mokuton chakra to reach Kakashi and pull him up. Several meters above was a landing for the stairway proper, the one that sane people would use to climb to the top of the stone faces. Tenzo set Kakashi down there and stood face-to-face with the man, glad he wasn’t racing blindly anymore.

“I just wanted to share something good.” He gave Kakashi’s hand a squeeze, “So trust me. Not everything is going to turn out badly. Not for you and your family.”

Kakashi took a deep breath, “…sorry about that.”

Tenzo shook his head.

“Is it still a family if it’s only two people?” Kakashi asked as he proceeded up the steps.

“Hm. Yes, and also, you have dogs— and dogs are the trademark of contented families. That’s what cultural convention suggests, anyway.” Tenzo reasoned.

“Heh… that’s what it suggests. I undercounted. Two of us, eight ninken,” Kakashi listed the components, “And you.”

“-!! And me?”

“Are you not letting me count you?”

“It’s! -I’ve—” Tenzo wanted to play off the honor as if it didn’t mean the world to him, as if it didn’t make him blush and tuck his head down, averting his eyes. Oh, and it was so much harder with Kakashi’s fingers laced with his, leading him forward by the hand.

“You what?” Kakashi was more relaxed. Because his face was uncovered, Tenzo’s eyes tracked the degrees to which Kakashi’s smile tilted up, so satisfied-looking; free of the alarm that had gripped him just before.
“…I’ve…never been counted before.” Tenzo shook his head, “Well, the Iburi clan thought I was one of them when I was young. Though I haven’t been acknowledged since…”

“Clan heritage does not a family make.” Kakashi teased with an adage.

“You’re embarrassing me.”

“I think you like it.”

Red-faced, “You think I like it?”

“You should see your face. Ah, this feels good. What was I so worried about?”

“Your nephew.”

“Oh yeah.” Kakashi’s stomach dropped again.

From the top of the stair they continued along the flat top of the earthwork, approaching the edge where the likenesses of past leaders had been carved. Still connected by their hands, Kakashi turned left and right but saw no sign of Sato, “How long ago did you spot him?”

“It couldn’t have been more than twenty minutes. I thought he’d be at it for a while.” Tenzo rested his free hand on his hip, pondering, “He might’ve taken off.”

“Hmf. What a shame he quit so soon.”

“No, I mean literally.” Tenzo told him, turning his eyes skyward, “Took off.”

“Oh.” Kakashi also turned his face up.

What a hunch that proved to be. The deep color of the night was retreating from the sky, tinged teal and honey-colored on the horizon. Directly overhead, Kutaiku was a huge shadow circling at a harrowing height. It was a pretty sight to take in with his beloved one right beside him, and Kakashi was at peace up until he saw Sato take a deliberate leap off of the owl’s back, and the creature made no move to fetch him.

Hand wrenching from Tenzo’s grasp, Kakashi cut loose once again. Because of course he’d have to witness each blood relation he had die in some awful way. Fate-afflicted or self-inflicted, his loved ones left him. How dare Sato give up and put him through this shit again. Under a beautiful dawn, no less.

Tenzo wasn’t running to stage some kind of intervention to catch the jumper, which might’ve miffed Kakashi more if he had not noticed that Sato made his leap with a rather large utensil.

Kakashi squinted and skidded to a stop, trying to understand. It was one of Kutaiku’s contour feathers. The white, striped plume was about two meters long, and it appeared that Sato was trying to work with it in mid-air. It seemed inadvisable to do so, but Kakashi stood rooted to the spot, riveted by Sato’s attempt to channel chakra into the feather. Had it worked? If not, well, he was still falling much too fast.

Sato’s body balled into a crouch, feet meeting the feather, white chakra condensing down and flushing the plume rigid and it— Kakashi blinked— caught on air. It ended the dead drop and commenced a controlled float, so that all he could do was stare, amazed and grateful that his nephew had done it. Sato bent for a lower center of gravity, legs and lower body leaning and twisting for stability as the feather surfed.
Good grief was he dense. This was what Tenzo meant! Sato had been developing an unprecedented feather-boarding kind of technique that still appeared much too wobbly, but hell, it was magnificent and finally laid his fears to rest. Kakashi looked back at Tenzo, indicating through posture and expression that he felt dumb. His boyfriend crossed his arms and shook his head: No more overreacting.

Kutaiku sunk lower to trail after Sato’s glide, skimming past the stone faces with him in the morning light. Ah, so Sato had a coach. Kakashi wondered briefly if Sato’s father, Riei, had ever accomplished such a feat with his Owl Summoning.

Sato soared nearer and finally spotted Kakashi, a distant form in black growing closer, and if Sato was not mistaken his uncle also had his face uncovered and was just about grinning. It lit Sato up. He hadn’t meant for anyone to see. Never thought anyone could believe in him or appreciate him ever again, but Kakashi was balancing on the edge of the Yondaime’s head out on a stone spike of hair. He reached out his hand to Sato.

They exchanged a high-five as Sato flew by.

---

“Are you gonna go to that cultural exchange festival coming up?”

Tama’s ears perked up as her old Academy rival, Yurie, directed the question at her. She looked around the table at her age-mates: Yurie, Mashu, Aiko, Inohei, Kojika, and Choukoki.

“Are any of you going?” Tama turned the question back on them.

“Yes! I can’t wait to bring my daughters!” Aiko chirped.

“The Ethnic Quarter will be packed with people, since Han culture got more popular after the Chunin Exam.” Yurie supposed, “But if the weather’s good I think we should all go together.”

Choukoki added beef strips to the hot pot at the center of their lunch table, “The food’ll be out of this world…”

“Naturally that’s the first thing you’re concerned about…” Kojika mumbled, resting her cheek in her palm.

Tama decided then that, yes, she would definitely make an effort to go if she was not needed for any missions. Lunch was a pleasant affair, and her group’s Ino-Shika-Chou trio contributed more to the bill since they’d ordered extra dishes. After paying, the group filed out of the restaurant and into the brisk air.

Inohei gave Tama a sly smile, “Isn’t it unfortunate that Banri couldn’t join us today?”

She pooched her lips in annoyance, “Not really.”

“Aww, don’t be like that! He’s had a crush on you for so long!”

“Does that mean I owe him something?” Tama’s temper flared in a Ken-like manner, and her friends all ooohhhhed at her heated comeback.

Fair enough. She wasn’t a big fan of Banri. They left it at that.

The subject was changed when Yurie advised Mashu to get Banri and his teammates on board with the cultural exchange festival, “Talk to them when you see them, and I’ll work on getting Shoda and Mion to join us."

“Do you always need our whole group to go on outings with you? You know how hard it is to coordinate our schedules now.” Mashu’s protest was weak.

“Come on, ANBU amateur, make it happen!” Yurie gave his friend’s back a brotherly slap.

Mashu sighed while Aiko, their team’s kunoichi, giggled at them. Then, a shadow passed over the group, and Kojika was the first to look up for the source as she was ever alert for threats. When her eyes went wide in stupefaction, her friends followed her lead. Some 15 meters above them in the air, Sato was taking his feather across town to his team’s training area. Tama stared mutely as her brain processed it, not listening to the verbal clamor all around her.

“-oo-waah?”

“Holy shit! Look at that asshole!”

Aiko was kinder, “Hatake-san can fly!”

“Aiko! Don’t get so excited! We’re not supposed to acknowledge him!”

“Who says?” Kojika sniffed at Yurie, “Who seriously gives a whoop after you’ve seen that?”

Choukoki quietly tried to rein the gaggle in since Tama was standing right there, even if nothing seemed to be registering on her face.

“I told you already,” Mashu sounded a tad vindicated, “The White Wing of Konoha suited him. Even if it doesn’t speak for his character, then at least it does for his ability.” He gave Yurie a smirk and then carried on up the street to locate other members of the friend group.

Tama turned away, and when Inohei asked if she was alright, she nodded as if a hundred sandbags had dropped on her.

“I told my Mom I’d be back home to dig our winter clothing out of storage. Don’t mind me. Go find everyone and see if they want to attend the festival too.” She departed from their gathering spot, winding slowly through passageways between buildings, toward emptier streets. If anyone saw what Sato was doing and then spotted her afterwards on the main avenue, they were bound to make pointless associations.

‘Huh.’ She thought, ‘It’s been a while. He’s stayed low-key. Hasn’t bothered me.’ For that, Tama supposed, she should be grateful, ‘I don’t really want to think about…if we’re ever assigned a mission together…or need to cooperate for something. I’m just going to…’ She stewed over the fact that her father’s temper problems had stained her since their fighting became more frequent, and Tama had been working to control her newfound bursts of anger.

‘I’ll bite his head off if I talk to him. I want to hurl a trashcan lid up there and knock him down.’

Tama ceded to the dark ideas bubbling up, ‘Not so that anyone can see. Just to confront Sato one-on-one and be honest about how I won’t play nice. I’m forgetting how. I was easygoing for so long, then I…think about how I am now. How did I do it? How do I get back to that?’

A little voice suggested that maybe she wouldn’t. Cheerful and laid-back Tama was a relic of another time. A fossil. To make do, she would have to accept this evolved version of herself.

Oh, it was such a cold day.
Two days later, Leaf Village Jounin gathered once again that afternoon in the Standby Station for a meeting. The temperature had dropped dramatically before storm clouds rolled in, and many groaned in dismay to look out of the station’s windows and see snow squalling. Some were not dressed appropriately for this weather. Sato had taken his uncle and Tenzo’s recommendations seriously the day before, and put on another layer beneath his tunic. He glanced over at Neji beside him, who was also dressed in heavier Hanfu, looking quite majestic.

“Why are you always dressed so nice?” Sato whispered as the attendance roster was being called.

“Hm. I like how Tenten dresses.” Neji kept his hands tucked in his sleeves, “So I find ways to match.”

“Oh…my god.” Sato tittered at the honest explanation, “You are so whipped.”

“Your style is also largely imitation. I am not whipped.” Neji’s calm was undisturbed.

“Okay, let’s call it something else. You are transformed. She has transformed you—” Sato’s name was called, and he replied with Present! before continuing to whisper, “Nothing’s really wrong with that, Neji. It’s just very obvious.”

After a beat Neji said, “Transformed sounds good.”

Sato was delighted. “We agree on that.”

“You have changed too.”

Upon hearing that observation, Sato swallowed thickly and did not want to get into the specifics of how much of his development was inspired by misery and loneliness. His eyes scanned around the room at the Jounin Council that had generally come to accept him and make no mention of his reputation anymore. Neji’s name was called and he responded.

Then, Neji added to Sato, “You’re stronger.”

“…I’m not strong. I’m fortified just enough so that I can survive.”

“Nothing’s really wrong with that.” Neji repeated his words back at him.

Wow. Okay. Neji was a good friend. Sato reveled in the feeling for a second and did not make a big show of it.

“So…I heard from Sunshine that Naruto will be back soon.” Sato dangled another pertinent subject, “Are you excited?”

Neji’s eyebrows elevated imperceptibly, “Of course.”

“Hee hee, you can get a rematch-!”

“I’d rather just talk to him.”

“What the heck? Why are you so sedate? Isn’t old, prideful Neji still kicking around in there?” An accusing whisper.

“Don’t invoke that side of me unless you wish to deal with it.” A fair warning.

Sato sighed softly, “Right, right. I’m not trying to tease you. I…never really mentioned before…that I was jealous of you…”
Neji’s surprise heightened a few more ticks, “Jealous?”

“That you got your relationship right. For so long, we all thought you were going to botch things, but you worked hard and honorably. I shouldn’t have picked on you for going slow and protecting the person you care about at each step…” Sato explained.

“I didn’t do everything perfectly.” Neji told him, “It was nearly a failure on my part.”

Sato concluded, “But it worked out.”

“It did.” Neji yielded, gratitude clear in his voice. Ah. He understood this part of Sato very well. He had lost the person he loved, and he assumed that Neji could understand what that would feel like.

The roll call ended and their conversation tapered off. Because Sarutobi Kakima was preoccupied with other duties, Kakashi acted as the moderator of discussion for the meeting.

After an hour and a half of some minor disagreements and various updates, the meeting adjourned and Neji wished Sato well before setting off for the Hyuga Estate. Several other Jounin trickled out of the room, but those that lingered dawdled around to converse with one another.

“Ah, Sato,” Kurenai beckoned him over to where she stood with Asuma, “Tell us more about that technique you’ve been using. I was just talking about it.”

He ended up staying another hour, to his surprise. Not only had Asuma and Kurenai gotten him chatting, but after they’d excused themselves Gai drifted over to speak with him as well, “How have you been, Sato-kun?”

“Gai.” Sato shrunk a little, eyes watery, “I’m fine! How are you? How is everyone?”

They talked for a long time. The dreary afternoon slipped by and evening hastened. Gai was alright, in spite of his careworn look. He only briefly addressed Tama and her family, summing things up as “stabilized” and forecasting that no further trouble would come to them or Sato. The subject turned to Gai’s students and his mood improved as he boasted about them. He also seemed to have some idea that good things had come Kakashi’s way as well, though Sato avoided directly name-dropping Tenzo as the catalyst for that.

“I’m glad that you’re doing well.” Gai patted his shoulder, “When you can, I encourage you to join my team for sparring. The cold weather will make things particularly challenging!”

Kind of uncertain if he wanted to dive back into Team Gai beat-downs, Sato agreed in a warble and parted with pleasantries when Gai excused himself, citing the late hour. The building was almost completely empty. Sato wandered around and relished the silence.

His mind echoed back to his days as a student, when he sometimes lingered after-hours in the Academy for cleanup. After his mother had passed away, Sato developed the habit. Traipsing down long, empty hallways lined with windows; peering out into the world beyond that guaranteed him nothing. Poking in and out of classrooms, scaling stairwells and finding secret niches, all for the sake of avoiding the journey home. For nothing and no one was waiting for him there. In the Standby Station, Sato idled around much the same way.

On the third floor, Sato paid for a sweet apple bun at the vending machine, nipping small chunks of it as he lollygagged. He’d thought he could wait out the snowfall, but that outcome seemed less likely now. The squall persisted, framing windows in white. Sato stood beside the double doors of the top floor balcony, staring mindlessly out the window at the inhospitable weather.
“Haven’t gone home yet?” Kakashi’s voice came from behind him.

Over his shoulder, Sato saw his uncle also slipping money into the vending machine, “Eh? What are you still doing here?”

“I had a number of people I needed to speak to. Then I like to have my snack before I leave.”

“You like the sweet apple too?”

“It’s the best flavor.” Kakashi said as he unwrapped the bun. He crossed over to stand beside his nephew, zoning out, eyes trained on the spiraling bands of white on the wind.

“It’s easier to talk to everyone now, isn’t it?” Kakashi had noticed Sato’s social gains, “I told you it wasn’t going to last forever. The rumor mill nonsense.”

“Well…in a lot of ways it’ll never really stop. The damage was done.” Sato pointed out, “But I do feel relieved that the reasonable people speak to me, and the less reasonable don’t go out of their way to say nasty things.”

“Eventually they’ll come around too.”

“Whatever. I won’t hold my breath. Oh, did you know Shikamaru’s been speaking to me? Chouji and Ino don’t know, but sometimes I meet him at the tea house.” Sato smiled, “He’s helped me.”

“Another valuable step forward. Tell me something…” Kakashi inquired before taking his next bite, “Have you apologized to Tama yet?”

“—er…I…uh…no…”

“Now that you’re talking to people, it’s about time you made a serious apology.”

“Kakashi, I can’t. I haven’t even looked for her, looked at her! She doesn’t want anything to do with me or hear what I have to say.”

Kakashi dusted crumbs from his fingers, “I know.”

“I’ll freak out—”

“No more excuses. Don’t avoid it or put it off. If it feels like you’re stretching your neck on the chopping block— maybe it should. Just once more: make yourself vulnerable and do the right thing. If it scares the daylights out of you once it’s done…” Kakashi reasoned, “Then that’s the time to avoid her. If you need to be sure you never cross paths, do it after you’ve said you’re sorry.”

Sato’s breathing grew heavier, and it was hard to swallow the last of his sweet bun. No. He still wasn’t ready to do that. To see her. To say what absolutely had to be said.

“Do you hear me, Sato?”

“I…hear you.” He cleared his throat, fretting, “I don’t know if she’ll listen.”

“She will. I’ve been with Tama this whole time, and I estimate you’ll get at least a minute to speak your piece. But don’t push it.” Kakashi told him.

“O-Okay.” Feeling very low again, Sato leaned his head against the glass of the window, “When I talk to her…it’ll remind me of how scared I am. I almost completely covered that feeling up.”
Kakashi asked, “And what actually scares you, about this?”

“That…it’s proof. Everything is gone. I’m scared that I’ll end up alone.”

“There are worse things than that.” His uncle didn’t sugarcoat the sentiment, “Even if you do end up that way, at least you took the time to apologize to the closest friend you’ve had for all of your life. If you squander time, you may not get the chance.”

Sato nodded shakily.

“Also, remember I told you about that 530,000 Ryo that Gai paid towards the restitution Ken demanded? Save and be sure to pay Gai back as soon as you can.” Kakashi reminded him.

“I’m already working on it.”

Kakashi gently patted the back of the young man’s head, knowing that it was hard to reopen this wound. But honor demanded it be done. They descended the winding flights of stairs in the station, and before stepping out into the dark, frigid evening, Kakashi did not object to a hug when Sato wrapped his arms around his uncle. Resolve must’ve leaked out of Sato and left him slumping, head bowed, dreading what he had to do.

Kakashi tried to instill some confidence in him, “If all you have in you is 30 seconds of bravery, it still counts. Say what you can; speak over the fear. And if it’s especially awful afterward don’t hesitate to come find me.”

Sato leaned back and slipped his arms away, saying nothing as his eyes tracked his uncle’s face and wondered why he hadn’t always been loved and supported this way. No matter. He was now.

Out the creaking door and into the whiteout, Sato made his way.

On the affluent east side of the village, Tama was sequestered in her bedroom for the night, propped up on bed pillows to thumb through a book of poetry that would hopefully put her to sleep. Plush pajamas helped abate the unexpectedly wintery cold creeping into her family’s house. A quilt was bunched over her lap, her eyes scanning the page tiredly.

...And you learn to build all your roads on today

Because tomorrow’s ground is too uncertain for plans

And futures have a way of falling down in mid-flight.

Somber but relatable, she found this one. The meter was an easy pattern to follow.

After a while you learn...

That even sunshine burns if you get too much.

Tama bent her head back on a pillow, feeling slightly attacked by the words. She recuperated for a moment.

So you plant your garden and decorate your own soul,

Instead of waiting for someone to bring you flowers.

And you learn that you really can endure...
That you really are strong

And you really do have worth...

And you learn and learn...

With every good-bye you learn.

A suspicious thump snapped her out of the flow, and Tama’s eyes darted, ears perking to detect some kind of disturbance in the night. She held still and silent until there was another faint rustle beyond the window of her second-story room. She shut her book and slipped out of bed to strafe flat against the wall, approaching and listening. ‘Break-in’s virtually never happen in the village, but I’d bet someone dumb would try to hit a house like this.’

Tama made up her mind that she would put her visitor in a head lock. In one motion, she reached for the window and began turning the latch to swing it open. She froze when she saw Sato on a tree branch outside, as solitary and spooky as one of his owls. A brief debate raged in her head, Let him in and wring his neck! No, leave him out there. Let him in and excoriate him! No, pretend he doesn’t exist. This went on for a long little while as her hand slowly moved, finger pads pressing to swing the pane open and allow the draft and snowflakes entry. And him too, if he was foolish enough.

Tama moved aside and could hardly believe the man had the audacity to charge in. She shut the window, huffing at the swirl of cold in her room, directing her undisguised scowl at Sato as he stood at the floor’s center and shivered, “W-W-Who-a…it-d-d-d—it’s w-way w-worse th—”

“What the hell—?” Her lips peeled back over her teeth, and she was very much her angry father’s daughter, “Are you doing here?”

“-owe y-y-you an exp-p-p-lanation.” Sato was tugging his soggy boots off.

She could’ve flipped her whole house she was so outraged, “No— NO. Stop. You’re not staying. Keep your shoes on and GET OUT. I had a lapse in judgement. You startled me—”

“Your f-floor’s getting wet! J-Jeez! Give me 30 seconds!”

“NO.”

Sato’s face was slate serious, “I need to apologize. I’ll go straight after.”

Tama inhaled to fill her lungs so she could scream in his face, but the air stuck there when she opted not to. It wouldn’t be worth making a scene or waking her parents up. Instead she bit her lip and stomped to her closet, pulling a fresh towel down from a shelf and very nearly strangled him with it when she pulled it down over Sato’s head, “Dry yourself.”

He endeavored not to topple over as he shucked his boots free, then his snow-slicked tunic which Sato hung on the back of her desk chair. It made Tama grind her teeth— the sight of him going through these make-myself-comfortable motions. Sato patted ice chips and water from his person, keeping his eyes on the one who was profoundly scary and also in mint green pajamas. When he finished, Tama ripped the towel from his grasp and threw it down on the damp patch on her area rug, hoping to absorb some moisture.

Ah, her energy level was much too high. She’d never sleep now. For the sake of her own blood pressure, Tama sat on the edge of her bed and tried to breathe— get oxygen back to her brain. Sato stared at her for several seconds. Her eyes would meet his, then flit away, glaring at various items around her room.
Achingly slow, he sunk down for dogeza, bowing prostrate and touching his head to the floor in humility. It was only the second instance he had ever used the gesture in his life. It held Tama’s attention.

“I’ve brought shame to you and your family. I’ve brought hardship to you and your family.” Sato listed the offenses he had committed, “My careless actions exploited your trust in me. I denied what I did for selfish reasons. Someone who loved you the way you deserved would not have done that. And I’m sorry, Maito Tama.”

He elevated his face slightly from the floor, thinking his words might be muffled in this position, “For not expressing my gratitude, for my impatience, arrogance, and impulsiveness…for not being able to give you everything you wished for…I apologize.”

Sato rose to sit on his heels, kneeling, looking up gingerly and hoping a fist wasn’t coming for his head. There was no violence; only a strange expression on Tama’s face.

“I…took so much for granted.” Sato strayed out of the formal mea culpa, “Not that it matters, but I haven’t behaved that way since, and never will again. I’ve been working towards enlisting in the Black Ops, to better protect the village. I don’t qualify yet, but more solo missions have been assigned to me lately.” What was he saying? Why was he telling her all of this? “I…” There was no point in saying more, but it tumbled out, “I really did…want it all with you.”

Though he didn’t know it, Tama’s chest constricted and rendered her incapable of speech as she was confronted with the most horrible thing she had tried to forget.

We loved each other.

No amount of festering in her anger, or socializing in new circles, or missions, or pastimes; none of that had well and truly erased that fact from her heart. The frog in Tama’s throat wouldn’t allow her to utter the defensive phrase I forgive you so that she could speed Sato on his way and not prolong this torment. Anyone who had bowed in dogeza would expect his or her apology to be accepted. But if they didn’t hear it, how long did a person stick around to receive that pearl of forgiveness?

“I don’t…” Sato spoke softly again, “Want it to be impossible for us to meet eyes, or to be able to talk when we meet in town. Maybe—” His voice cracked, “Maybe we’re…meant to be rivals. Just like Kakashi and Gai. Maybe that’s the only way for us not to hurt each other. We can…be good sports when we lose.”

His breathing grew shallower, grief weighing down on Sato, “No one ever understood me the way you do. Your friendship is the strongest and wisest influence in my life. So I can’t…burn that to the ground like it never existed…”

Finally, a peep of sound escaped Tama, as she fought off her own snare of heartache, “…we…can talk in town a little.”

Sato refused to blink, hanging on her quiet replies.

“I…appreciate what you said.” That was all she could give him.

He was reading the jammed, minuscule expressions morphing on Tama’s face as she tried to hold it together. She might burst. In sadness, or rage, or who knew what emotion, Sato could not tell. With the official matter seen to, he pushed up to his feet and pulled on his still-damp tunic, then lifted his boots off of the towel. It was time to retreat.

He’d done it. Said exactly what he needed to say, what he had thought he’d be too spineless to face her for and admit. Dare he think it: it wasn’t so bad! He did not need to take Kakashi up on his offer and run to his uncle and have a breakdown.

Sato approached the window and felt a tug, felt a boot get yanked from his hand, and he watched in astonishment as Tama tossed it to the far side of the room. ‘What the-?’ Was this a trap or some kind of insult? Wide-eyed, Sato gave her a puzzled look before backtracking to collect his shoe. No harm came to him.

He was startled when Tama stood up and moved to him, her eyes shiny, mouth tugging down in a miserable way. When she had him cornered, it occurred to Sato after a long moment that she wasn’t trying to get back at him, hurt him, or commit any other petty deed. She wanted to touch him, and she did— Tama rested her hands tenderly on the sides of his face. She shook like a leaf.

“Uh…” Sato reached up to pull her hands away, “…no.”

That drove a dagger into her. Her head hung forward in anguish, brushing his chest, and the wilting motion forced him to handle her like a glass artifact, gently trying to move her as he said, “You know…it’s over.”

Ah, he’d thought this apology was not so bad. It was now much worse, because Tama was crying openly, helpless, and wow, she still had a pull on him so magnetic he wasn’t sure how to cope. He gave her a soft pat on the arm, “You shouldn’t take back a well-known dirtbag, you know that. We have to stop feeling that way now.”

“I…” Her voice bubbled and popped like a stream, “I want to…”

“You can’t—”

“W-Want to resolve…this. Want that more than I…want to move forward w-without you.” Tama ran the back of her hand beneath her eyes, “Maybe p-perfect isn’t w-what I’ve been after. It was never perfect after all.”

An all-consuming, choking sensation roiled in his chest, because those were the words he had once said not so long ago to her, as if to explain away imperfections they could accept. But no, she was wrong, and confused, and there was no way to accept any kind of repair in this ugly snarl between them that used to be their bond. Something hideous was left over, that others could not understand or approve of. It had to be left to die and be forgotten. Sato slipped away from her hold with a grimace and crossed the room again.

He began to bend down and tug on a boot when he felt Tama wrap her arms around him from behind; an air-like hug that almost wasn’t there. When he tensed she let go, but her crying was as pure as a Buddhist sutra and he’d been stupid to look back at her and see that pain. He squeezed his eyes shut. Now him. He’d been a blubbering wimp all his life, but had fought off that disposition for this meeting. Sato felt the grief surge from his crown down to his toes, making his arms go slack at his sides, and Tama then slapped the boots from his hands in a final bid— don’t go, don’t go.

As she intended, Sato’s energy was sapped and he dropped to his knees, shoulders heaving in a sob. She too sank down and reached again to hold him from behind, chorusing the soft, hiccupping sobs and pitiful sniffles that came from him.

“Please…” Sato’s mouth was tacky, making it hard to speak, “Please don’t…love me anymore.”

Tama had pressed her face into his shoulder, restraining a weak, snotty laugh. Sure. That request sounded like the easiest thing in the world to fulfill.
“Tama…there’s no use in making this harder. I can’t fix things for you now.” He tried to explain, rubbing his wet face on his sleeve, “I don’t know how to protect you from the derision, all those callous words they’ll say…how they’ll judge you if you…stay…with me.” Uttering that left his heart pounding, his nose running, as Sato just couldn’t entertain the idea before, “…I could…be a loyal and amazing husband…but that won’t change public opinion, even if you’re happy. They will condescend to you and mock you—say you’re weak. I hate that. Not to you— that can’t happen to you—”

Her fingertips drummed against him to get his attention. He was being hysterical and making too much noise. Sato stifled his mournful sounds and shifted around on his knees, facing Tama properly as tears streamed down his cheeks. They folded in a hug.

“Sato,” Her voice was raspy, “I think it will be worth it. If that’s what happens, then let me be judged.”

“—no!”

“Shh, please listen. I’ve been…so angry. It started a while ago. What made me most furious…what I couldn’t say to anyone…was that I went along with how everyone told me to feel. Went along with how I was supposed to react. I couldn’t even behave how I wanted to, naturally. The pressure came from every direction and that’s how I was really weak.” Tama told him, “I forgave you a while ago. I was told not to. I wanted to run back to you and talk, even when it was all fresh and awful. I was told not to. I recovered, but then had to assuage the masses. I’ve always done that, especially for my Dad. I won’t do it anymore.”

“I know you think that’s bad, but I am telling you it can get much worse.” Sato warned, his arms squeezing her shoulders protectively.

“Maybe.” She granted, “And just because…I want you…doesn’t mean I’m not still mad.”

He was wracked by a rogue hiccup, “That’s a no brainer…”

“When I saw you fly a few days ago I wanted to use you for target practice.”

“Oof. That definitely would’ve surprised me.”

Their sniffling lessened, interspersed with chuckles and stuffy-nosed breathing. Sato ran his hand up and down her back, pressed into the embrace and consoled to be so close.

“I just need you to understand that a reputation is a very fragile and necessary thing around here.” He could not stress enough why reconciliation was perilous, “I don’t want you to bang up yours, Tama. I’d never be able to help salvage it.” His hand traveled, settling at the back of her head, carding fingers through her loose hair.

“I do understand, and if I wasn’t prepared for what could happen, I wouldn’t have thrown your shoe.” The side of her face pressed against Sato’s cheek, and she kept her arms snugly around him.

“That was weird. But I get it now.”

“Would you let me kiss you? To see if it’s the same?” Tama asked.

Scarlet-faced, Sato gave her a bug-eyed look, “Y-You…want to?”

“Only if you do.”
“I…” How quickly he had gone from despondent to schoolgirlish nervousness, “I don’t know if it’s a good idea…”

“None of this probably is, but that’s okay.” She still seemed content to be draped over Sato while his hands roamed all over her back and through her hair, saying hello endlessly.

She had asked to kiss him and thus directed Sato’s attention back to the selfish part of his consciousness, the part that he had squashed and pruned, thinking he’d never indulge or enjoy anything again. Because if he did, wouldn’t that eventually lead him to the place where it had all gone wrong? Was it right to want someone, and to wish he be wanted by another? For so long, Tama had been that wellspring. Desire drummed in his veins. He couldn’t deny it. As she had said, probably none of this was right. So what?

Sato slipped his voyaging hand up to the side of her face to carefully turn Tama and fit his lips to hers. Oh. How silly of him to forget. There was the universe, all around her and through her, binding and breathing with him. Tama set one hand on his thigh and the other on his chest to steady herself as she leaned in. She needed more than the gentle pressure, needed his bottom lip between hers, drawing in his taste. Sato made a soft sound when she deepened the kiss.

There was no keeping track of time or the snow duster outside. They parted dizzily after a series of kisses, and then Tama said, “It’s different. And so good.”

“Yeah…it was.” When Sato felt himself smiling, it shocked him again and his face tried to reject the expression as if it wasn’t permitted.

“Let’s get off the floor. Come on.” Tama wobbled and rose, pulling Sato up by his hand.

He was still feeling very hesitant to relocate to her bed, or let her pull off his damp tunic and wrap him in a spare throw blanket. ‘I should offer to go home and we can discuss this more tomorrow. Propriety was never something I was good at, but now it’s important…’

She seemed to be reading his mind, “You don’t have to leave.”

“I really should.”

“It’s bad out there, and I still want to talk.” Tama sat just as she had before, propped up on pillows.

Sato sat cross-legged and fluffed his blanket cocoon, “I know it is, but I think the adult thing to do would be to continue this conversation tomorrow at the tea house instead of your bed. ‘Cuz I’m not your boyfriend or anything.”

“You’re right.” She crossed her legs at the ankles, a smug twinkle in her eye.

“So tomorrow-?”

“No. You’re already stuck. You’ve accepted a blanket.”

“Uh, that’s a cheap tactic.”

“If you’re determined to freeze your ass off out there, I won’t stop you.” Tama said as she wrestled her own quilt up.

Sato hushed up and fell sideways like a sack of potatoes. No, he honestly preferred this. Tama smiled down at him, holding his gaze, lumped beneath blankets and parallel with each other.
“Remember a little while ago,” Sato mumbled, “You told me to get out? That you only let me in because you had a lapse in judgement?”

Her eyebrows raised, “Did I really say lapse in judgement?”

“Totally.”

“That’s great.”

He bit his lip so he wouldn’t laugh, “Are you sure this isn’t just…a huge lapse?”

Tama snorted.

“We’re lapsing.” Sato whispered.

“-hee— stop, stop!” She wanted to giggle, but she also wanted him to be a bit more serious.

Sato slipped his hand out of his microfiber cocoon, holding it palm up so that Tama could enfold her hand in his.

“Do you want me to stay?” He asked.

“Forever.”

“Of course, but I mean overnight?”

“Oh. Hm. Yeah.”

“Not gonna get mad and snap my neck when I least expect it?”

“I won’t.” Tama assured him, “I’m not that much like Dad.”

“I know.”

Tama reached for her bedside lamp and switched off the light. They settled in silence, holding hands, warming up.

“Do we pick up where we left off?” Tama wondered.

Mouth quirking as he ruminated on the question, Sato concluded, “No, that wouldn’t be right. That’s not to say I don’t want you that way, I do—but this is going to have to be played out carefully. Slower...with physical stuff, if that’s what you mean. Right?”

“That’s what I mean.”

He gave her hand a soft squeeze.

“I’ll always be a little scared that you’ll be unfaithful again.” Tama admitted.

“I know.” He acknowledged the barb in her heart, “All I can do is live and do right by you. There’s no other way to reassure you, because words will never mean as much as actions. It can only be blind trust.”

“Honest, blind trust.” She concurred.

“Trust that I will not break.”
“So…” Her voice hung in the dark room, “If we are together, it’s back to level one stuff.”

“Kinda—?”

“We’ll see what works.” Tama supposed.

“Reemerging in society together is going to be…” Sato shuddered, “Well. We should brace for impact and criticism.”

“Maybe some strategy can help.”

“What…” He yawned, “…do you have in mind?”

The pair rose with the first rays of the sun the next day, and deserted Tama’s bedroom long before they could be discovered. Across town at Sato’s flat, Tama glanced all around to find it largely unchanged, if a bit dusty.

Her eyes reacquainted with the space as Sato disappeared into his home for a minute, and then returned to the kitchen with a large whiteboard. He set it down on the counter and asked, “Want some tea?”

“What is that?” Tama inclined her head at the board, “And yes, tea sounds good.”

“It’s a whiteboard. Dr. Iwao says doing visualizations is good for me, so I decided to get one of these.” Sato went through the motions of putting water on to boil and fetch tea leaves while Tama hovered nearby.

The board was a bit messy, so she took the liberty of erasing smudged patches with a rag.

“Okay.” Sato turned around and reached for a marker, “Let’s address the big problem.”

“The being-together-versus-public-perception problem?”

“Bingo.” In a T-chart, Sato created columns for pros and cons, “If we hash this out enough, we can decide whether we’re going to charge head-on into the lava pit of Konoha’s opinions, or if we prefer disappearing to parts unknown and living as we please beyond that shit.”

After a soft, inhaling hiss, Tama winced, “Oooh that is a tough one.”

They worked for quite a while, sometimes branching off into discussions about their families, shinobi careers, emotional states, and so on, eventually sipping tea as they jotted considerations onto the chart. And damn, both columns were about equal when it came to benefits and consequences.

“This…this is good.” Sato motioned at the board, “See? Basically, this shows us we don’t have many doubts about each other. Notice that? This is loaded down more with face-losing stuff.”

“I agree that is good, but we’re still going to have to deal with reality if we do this. To what degree do we want to scandalize ourselves?”

“Well, what do you mean by that?” Sato wondered about the term scandalize.

“If milder, we just visibly do not hate each other in public. We can communicate and spend time together. If a bit more scandalous, we go out there and demonstrate we are dating in spite of, well, everything.” Tama broke it down for him, “Or for maximum scandal we get married, like we wanted to.”
“Well yeah, but eloping is option A, B, and C at this point. I would literally be decapitated if I tried to marry you at a shrine.”

“That’s if anyone shows up…”

“They’d show up to destroy me and show you the error of your ways.”

Tama scoffed at the prediction, and then rubbed at a corner of the whiteboard with cloth, “Can I erase this section? I need to make some line graphs.”

“What are you graphing?”

“Let’s just compare rates of approval over time. This line will be if we run away, and this line is if we stick around. These both assume we’re unmarried. Let these dotted lines represent us when married, versus staying or leaving. Okay. Let’s see how negative the trends are over five years…”

“Those all look pretty freakin’ negative…”

“Look, it bumps up slightly after a few years—”

“I see that, but if it’s all a mess why don’t we do things exactly how we want to? Remember what you said about assuaging the masses?”

“Can’t we mitigate some damage?”

“How?” Harried, Sato tapped his empty tea cup on his head while fretting, “Plastic surgery? Convoluted schemes?”

“How about…” Tama twirled the marker in her fingers, “We act in a way that is unexpected, but maybe still kind of believable—?”

“Not even gonna try to imagine that-”

“You can. The cultural exchange festival is tomorrow in the Han Ethnic Quarter. If everything melts and dries out it won’t be rescheduled. Let’s do all of those crazy competition games and make it look like we’re trying to outdo each other. It’s a competitive acknowledgment of one another, even if it’s a bit dishonest.”

“That’s all Wushu stuff isn’t it?”

“Not all of it. Have you ever gone to this kind of a festival before?”

“I’d remember if I did.”

“Uncle Gai and Kakashi-sensei will have a field day there, if they want to compete. You said maybe we’re like them, so let’s just try projecting an image people might buy into.”

“That’s…worth a try.” Sato agreed.

“Good! Let that be tomorrow’s plan, but…what do you think we should do today? My team doesn’t meet for training until the afternoon.” Tama looked him over and determined that Sato was waffling over something, gripping the tea cup in his hands tightly. The morning light catching in his eyes scattered in an indigo color, and his gaze shifted to her, then away, then to her. This behavior was still familiar to Tama. She could guess what he wanted.

She held up her hand to signal here, and he moved only after the invitation. Sato fitted his cheek to her palm and sighed. ‘I guess this is bound to be confusing. Things between us will move slowly… and then sometimes fast. I want to touch him a lot, but we shouldn’t escalate things too much.’ Tama drew him in closer to meet in a kiss. She let him flood her senses again, slow and exploratory.

It was a new dance, all very tentative, and as such Sato did not pretend to know all of the steps yet when he leaned back with a low sound in his throat, indulging in some space when it felt like they could have gone on forever. He told her, “About today— I’ve got to meet with Shino and Sunshine for training mid-morning. But it’s still so early, we can do something together. If you want. Uh…” Sato scratched his cheek, looking up so that his eyes squinted with the hint of a smile, “Want to get started on that Hatake-Maito competition stuff?”

“At 6:00AM?”

“When is there a better time for pointless rivalry?”

Tama nodded, “Yes, this is prime time, you’re right. Let’s see who can shovel the most storefront sidewalks before breakfast.”

“With lots of goading and shouting?”

“Goading sure, but not too much shouting.”

And so, Sato rummaged through a closet to find an old snow shovel, and Tama borrowed another from a business owner before they began emulating the antics they had grown up seeing their uncles take part in. Not many souls were out in the cold at that hour to witness the taunts and street-clearing, frenzied passes, but the few who did vaguely recognized the pair.

Shoveling hadn’t really attracted any attention, and neither did their breakfast at the café over an hour later. Hardly any other locals ventured outside for a bite to eat. This, Sato thought, was fine. It wasn’t as calamitous as he’d been expecting, to tip-toe back out into the open and perhaps be seen with Tama. At least for today, their accompanying one another was not turning any heads.

Sato departed to train with his team, deciding not to explain anything at so sensitive a time. Tama worked a brief shift in the bakery before leaving to train with her own team in the afternoon.

It felt like business as usual. Their moods were lighter. There was, however, a screen of secrecy that filtered the things they spoke about with friends and acquaintances. Late in the day, the earth warmed enough to reduce most snow drifts to muddy puddles, only a few broken tree branches and messy streets left as evidence of the autumn snow squall.

On the day of the cultural exchange festival, Konoha had dried out; air chilled and sky cloudless.
The Ethnic Quarter of the village was outfitted with all kinds of unusual, popular attractions.

Tama had absorbed Sakura and Kiba into her Academy peer-group as they roved, and the shinobi a few years their senior made fast friends with them. Socializing politely and keeping a low profile, Tama noticed Sato appear with Shino and Hinata, gravitating towards Neji’s team and even getting acknowledgment from Shikamaru, though Chouji and Ino did not attempt to exchange pleasantries with Sato. A few Jounin floated around: Kakashi, Asuma, Kurenai, Gai, Hayate, Yugao, and Shizune, distracted mainly by curios and snack stands.

Lee’s grandfather was also cruising the stalls, keeping to Lee’s side for a short while before kibitzing with Ethnic Quarter residents he recognized. After being challenged, Wong Leung shuffled over to the badminton court to give an unwitting neighbor a schooling.

Two long chains of children, maybe ten to twelve in each, rushed at each other as they played Catch the Dragon’s Tail, as each line leader attempted to reach the “tail” end of the other line’s chain. Stations for tangram puzzles, jump rope boxes, stick games, and Hanzi calligraphy were quite crowded. Stilt-walking performers also caused a buzz.

When anyone seemed unsure about what to try first, Tenten was the most knowledgeable at matching visitors with activities. Lee had gotten caught up trying to decipher lantern riddles with Gai-sensei, and thus was not making recommendations anymore. Neji, Hanabi, and Fujita had taken an interest in a Tai Chi demonstration.

While Sato tried to make up his mind on whether to get his own order of tangyuan treats or to share an order with Shino, Hinata abruptly chirped in alarm, “Sato-kun, duck!”

He dipped his head at precisely the right moment as a leather kick ball soared for his head. Whipping around, he saw that Tama had kicked a cuju ball at him. Well, Sato and everyone else realized this at the same moment, and there seemed to be a communal gasp at the inflammatory gesture. Tama did not look at all remorseful. Ah, he could’ve kissed her for selling it so well. Sato tried not to grin.

“Thanks, Sunshine.” He patted Hinata’s arm and handed money notes to Shino, “Why don’t you try the tangyuan and tell me if they’re any good? I can eat some later.” Sato marched across the courtyard to confront Tama, and there was an even louder gasp from all those watching.

“Is the game you’re trying to play all about hitting people in the back of the head?” Sato made sure to give his smile a condescending tilt.

“I get bonus points for that, but no.” Tama’s acting was also on point.

“What is it, then?”

“Cuju. Kids play it a lot in this neighborhood. I wouldn’t expect someone like you to pick it up.” Tama folded her arms, motioning her head toward tall goal posts positioned around the ball court, “You’d just embarrass yourself, Sato.”

“I don’t get embarrassed anymore, and since you’re being so high-and-mighty I can’t help but to offer to hand your ass back to you after I completely stomp your score.”

Was she pretending or actually mad? It was hard to tell when Tama clenched her teeth, grinding out, “You really think you can get away with talking like that to me—?”

Sato was merry, “Only if you’re too chicken to play!”

Tama stomped to the court’s edge without a word, ignoring Sakura and Kiba’s horrified looks, and picked up another cuju ball. She slammed it down on the ground so hard a small mushroom cloud of dust wafted up.

“You’re not better than me. Not in a single thing.” Tama warned, “If you insist— it’s the first to 15 goals.”

“All kicks?”

“And body, but no arms or hands.”

With that, they approached to stand on either side of the ball and not a soul dared act as a judge to begin such a hair-raising match. Nearly all of Tama and Sato’s peers stared in astonishment. It wasn’t a friendly contest, no, but they were talking! They were not ignoring one another’s existence.
Not one to tolerate hesitation for very long, Tenten eventually got fed up with everyone’s gawking. She raised a hand and shouted, “Start!” This mutinous act turned many wary eyes on her as Tama and Sato violently scrambled on the court.

“What?” Tenten sniffed, “Aren’t the rest of you morbidly curious? I know I am.”

Skidding, bending, and body-checking, the pair ran after the cuju ball and lined their kicks up with the circular goal post openings, keeping count of their points, occasionally snarling at each other. Tama’s kicks were more impressive, accurately rocketing the ball through hoops. Sato was slightly more creative, however, using his head and back to bounce the ball into goals and keep it out of reach. Points ticked up quickly.

After a time, Kakashi and his companions came to stand at the edge of the court with the rest of the crowd. He stood beside Gai who was slack-jawed and at a rare loss for words.

“My goodness…” Kakashi spoke sidelong to Sakura, “I didn’t expect this. If it doesn’t come to blows or draw blood, I don’t see any harm in it.”

“But it might, Sensei!” Sakura’s eyes tracked Tama’s movements, “I don’t know what’s gotten into her! Tama-chan just saw him and instigated it. I know she’s been in a bad mood lately, but…”

“If she’s got to vent, let’s let her vent. She didn’t actually hit him in the head.” Kiba pointed out.

Kakashi nodded, “Let’s. Gai, doesn’t this remind you of all those ridiculous contests? We might be overdue for another challenge.”

When the score evened out at 14-14, and the tussling got more aggressive, Sato kicked the ball deliberately in Gai’s direction to interfere with Tama’s goal shot. Shouts clamored. Kakashi had reacted on instinct before his friend was struck (not that Gai needed the help), and lashed out to kick the ball away. As it so happened, it sunk cleanly through a goal post. Sato cheered and claimed that point for his own, since his kin had participated.

Tama pointed a finger in Sato’s face, thundering, “You call that legitimate?! You almost hit my uncle!”

“Well my uncle saved him!”

“You can’t count Kakashi-sensei’s goal, it wasn’t yours!”

“I’m counting it! Nyeh!” He pulled down his eyelid and stuck his tongue out.

Sato ducked her swinging fist right on schedule and retreated to another area, where he continued acting to “deescalate” the situation and challenge Tama to high-stakes jianzi (hackey sack). Their contemporaries were still thrown for a loop. Gai had been frozen in time for about ten minutes, mentally processing, before his voice processors finally launched at an unnecessary volume, “YOUTH!”

“Oh no.” Kakashi was smiling, “This…may not be a good thing, Gai—”

“How in the world is hot-blooded, borderline contemptuous rivalry a bad thing, Kakashi? It’s constructive! Look at all the attention they are bringing to these ethnic sports!”

“Should this really be about the sports-?”

“Other villagers will become interested and play afterwards, look! More cuju players! It’s as I said.”
Gai pointed out the evidence, “Bear witness! Even if this is a bloody springtime in their youth, is it not still springtime?”

“No, no, we can’t endorse bloody seasons—”

“Come along now, this is a team game I believe.” He dragged Kakashi into the hackey sack circle whereupon they were briefly accepted until Tama got into a shouting match with Sato again, and scared Kakashi away. Gai continued pontificating as the youngsters ignored him.

On the sidelines, the Ino-Shika-Chou trio observed the commotion.

“What the heck—” Shikamaru was mystified, “They’re playing with each other.”

“I don’t think play is the correct verb.” Ino disagreed.

“Clashing. Vying. Tilting each other, maybe sounds about right.” Chouji assessed.

“I thought Sato was just deleted from her life. If I were in her shoes, I sure as heck wouldn’t be doing this.” Shikamaru rested his hands on his hips, “He might start to think he has a chance…”

Chouji gave his friend an odd look, “Why do you think Sato would think that?”

“Eh, no reason.”

“One thing I can tell you is that none of us really know what it’s like to be in Tama’s position. I thought I was empathizing a while ago and I got it wildly wrong.” Ino informed them.

“That’s in the past now.” Shikamaru didn’t want her to continue rolling in the flames of guilt over her fueling gossip and the backlash it generated. Some days Ino agonized over it.

She leaned against her boyfriend and relaxed somewhat, watching the festivities. Ino then said, “Don’t worry, Shikamaru. No one’s trying to break your heart. You don’t have to try to sympathize with what they’re going through.”

“I know, I know.” He slid his arm around her waist.

When the game of jianzi ended in a virtual stalemate and Gai was expelled from participating, Tama and Sato moved from game to game, pitching insults and playing janken to determine game order.

Later, they ended up on an endurance-test obstacle course that Wong Leung had designed and hoped he could get Neji and Lee to run through. Instead, his grandson and his teammate ended up eating their way around the festival, enjoying gentler activities thanks to Tenten’s intervention. Wong Leung was shocked to see the insane pace of Double Dutch jump ropes that Sato and Tama endured as course operators went especially hard on them. The rivals transitioned without a break into designated lanes for backflips over a lawn, at the end of which was a light body obstacle course of tall wooden posts and rope walks, and the pair climbed and leaped, neck-in-neck the whole time.

Wong Leung had cordoned off a makeshift racetrack all through the park, which began at the light body course’s end, circled through a wooded area, and positioned the finish line near the mouth of the Ethnic Quarter’s festival. Tama and Sato stampeded through the track. It never occurred to Wong Leung that they “hated” each other. He felt as though they were competitors taking his work very seriously, and it puffed up his ego a bit. Ah yes. Now he definitely had to get Lee and Neji to race each other.

The victory decidedly went to Tama who was finger-lengths ahead of Sato across the finish line, and those watching even let out pleased hoots upon seeing it. But the competition did not die down after that; their taunts continued and Sato demanded another race to prove himself. The next pointless challenge was not even within the confines of the festival, instead meant to be a full lap around the village’s perimeter. They took off, and from what Kakashi could see of their retreating forms, they picked up random objects along the way to throw at each other. He rubbed his head as Sato and Tama disappeared from his sightline, “Oh boy…”

If this was the new normal, then there was a chance these silly, antagonistic contests could be a daily occurrence. Kakashi would know. Back in the day, he was competing against Gai on a routine basis merely to pad his own ego with no prizes at stake. Though those competitions still happened occasionally, they were nowhere near as riotous as they used to be. As it was, he had a suspicion that there was something else drawing Sato and Tama together again, apart from a need to outdo each other.

He’d seen them smile before they ran off.

The next day, in Suna, Naruto just barely managed to stuff the extra belongings he had accumulated into his travel bag. More tool scrolls, technical Sealing scrolls, various baubles from Suna’s markets, gifts for Hinata and the Hokage, his orange jumpsuit rolled up and likely never to be worn again—since Jiraiya had asked him to keep a lower visual profile. Naruto was dressed in draped black and pale grey garb (a more local fashion), the deep ‘v’ of his shirt showing off tanned skin and the necklace Tsunade had given him. He pulled on his Sage cloak for good measure, then strained to zip up his bag, “Jeez! Maybe… I should have bought a new one…”

Gaara poked his face past the guest room door, “You packed the endorsement I wrote for you?”

“Yes. It’s in there…somewhere.”

“Remember to give that note to Tsunade-sama right away. Once you have a recommendation from her, apply as soon as you can to the Sealing Corps. You’ll be in for a rigorous application process.” Gaara reminded him.

“I won’t forget. I’m so excited it’ll be the first thing I do.” Naruto slipped his crappy, beloved “disguise” sunglasses on top of his head, rethinking his statement, “No, I’m lying. It’ll be the second thing I do. I’ve got to see Hinata first.”

“Second is still a high priority.” His friend allowed it.

“Will you carry my bag downstairs?”

“No.” Gaara walked out and he followed.

“Not gonna ask me a million questions about what I packed, like Kankuro does? He asked about deodorant.”

“He always asks about it. No. I trust you have everything. If you leave something behind I’ll send it later.”

They trotted down the stairs of Gaara’s home.

“Did you hear from Haku yet? He’s got to be done with that mission.”

“Nothing yet. I have all channels open and waiting to get a response.” Gaara updated him, “It hasn’t been that long, but I feel uneasy. There was a headline in the newspaper…”
“You read newspapers? Pfft!”

“You should too. You’ll be more aware of the climate we’re in, when it comes to conflict.”

“Maybe at a newsstand, but I’m too cheap to buy ‘em.” Naruto adjusted his bag’s straps on his shoulders, “Tell me right away when you hear about Haku, though. I’m sure he’s alright.”

“I wish I could be as sure as you.” There was a careworn, fond look on Gaara’s face. He didn’t really want Naruto to leave. Though he had no intention of keeping him in Suna, it was much harder to part with him than he’d expected.

Naruto’s hug was bearlike, reassuring and strong, bumping his head with Gaara’s and trying not to sniffle, “If I’m not sure then I get lost. It’s okay. Everything’s okay, Gaara.”

Gaara agreed softly, “…it is okay.”

“I appreciate you treating me and Ero-sensei to lunch. It was a nice way to say goodbye to you and your brother and sister. Thank them again for me, will you?”

Gaara nodded, the same wistful expression on his face.

“And thanks for putting up with us for a while. We imposed…”

“You didn’t. I wanted you here.” Gaara crossed over to the sofa to give Jiraiya a small shake, to rouse him out of his nap.

Jiraiya mumbled and batted his lips, “Hnff…eh. Time already?” He sat up and cracked his back, “I was digesting. Better have a big canteen of water for this trip, because I’ll be moving at my slowest speed and I don’t want to suffer…”

Naruto didn’t like the forecast of their travel pace, “Come on, Ero-sensei! I need you to move it so I can get home and see everyone!”

“We get there when we get there.” Jiraiya waved him off, procuring a large water pouch from his travel bag on the living room floor, and moved to the kitchen to fill it.

Gaara went over a safety checklist with his friend, “Stay on the marked path and in view of the sentries I stationed at desert checkpoints. They’re on watch for rogues and Akatsuki members.”

“I will, I will. You don’t need to worry yourself sick over it. I’m gonna be extra careful.” Naruto vowed, “And…you’ll reach out to Fū, right? About the plan to team up?”

“I don’t know if I should instigate such a dramatic scheme when my council still hasn’t approved the idea I put forward. There’s been a lot of debate.” Gaara informed him, “I also wrote to the Hokage about it.”

“You what?”

“Not in full detail, just as a nebulous idea. Tsunade-sama told me something surprising, in her reply. Hidden Leaf is already acting to solidify a formal alliance with Hidden Waterfall.”

“Are you kidding me? How? When?” Naruto was goggling at the news.

“About a week ago, Leaf’s council officially ratified the motion. Everything will be formalized when diplomats meet in Waterfall to approve the agreement. Then exchanges of information and techniques may begin, and team co-ops will monitor for the Akatsuki. Overall, very worthwhile “progress.” Gaara summed it up, “Your friend set it up.”

“My friend—?”

“From the Accelerated Exam.”

Naruto blinked and searched his memory, “Fujita?”

“Yes, the young one from the Hyuga clan, that Matsuri defeated.”

“Holy shit, I didn’t think he had that much influence!”

“Apparently he does.”

“Heh heh! This is awesome! So I’ll be seeing Fū again before I know it!”

“I hope so. If Tsunade-sama doesn’t have other plans for you. Remember that you’ll be under heavy observation and may have limited mission opportunities because of the Akatsuki. Try not to let it discourage you.”

Naruto flicked his shabby sunglasses down over his eyes, “No one’s stopping me when I get home.”

It was still too much effort to even try to open his eyes.

Haku laid on his back and gradually gained awareness, wherever he was. Sounds and sensations returned to him, dark, all dampened by the pervasive pang of his chakra stores running much too low. His body was mended to an extent, but still weighed down by exhaustion. Whatever he was laying back on, it was cushy. Nice. It felt kind of familiar.

Haku visited what memory he had of the turbulence he encountered after escaping Keiseki House. He’d blacked out behind a Shinto shrine. Keepers of the shrine and a local kunoichi, who he had learned was in fact Rin, formerly of Konohagakure, had been kind enough to help him. And little Yuma had dropped meatballs and fruit onto his face while attempting to feed him, injured and held captive to the child’s ramblings. A fortuitous meeting, to be sure.

From there, it was a bit hazy. Haku could admit he’d been too proud to stay and recover fully, or burden the small family in Shincha. With his limbs functioning and other wounds, for the most part, tolerable, he’d left in the night with a note of thanks addressed to Rin. Haku traveled southeast and made a point to avoid the Rice Country at all costs.

It had in part been on foot, and in part been through Ice Path that he made the return journey, and eventually tired out and hitched an unpaid ride on a commercial shipping vessel sailing south. When he neared the smallest islands of the Water Country’s archipelago, Haku made the final stretch with his Ice Path to the beaches of Nanakusa. That was all that he could remember before falling unconscious again.

He kept his eyes closed and listened to the sounds of the space around him. For a while, there had been an unusual tapping noise he could not place. Then it stopped. It sounded like a gas stove was on and heating a pot. Haku was rather proud of his discerning ears. When a warm, wet cloth suddenly ran down his face to wipe off travel grime, he dared not move an inch. Where was he, exactly? Had Hiroshi collected him to dote on him above the tea shop?

Once his face was wiped clean, silence prevailed again. There was rustling and movement in the space. Oh how his body ached. He probably looked foul, in spite of the fresh change of clothes Rin had provided. Haku cracked an eye open a sliver and immediately squeezed it shut to avoid overpowering daylight. He wanted to know who was taking the time to unknot his hair and run a brush through it. Hiroshi would. More likely than that, Ranmaru or one of Tomo’s children would. How thoughtful. Haku enjoyed the attention like a possum, feigning unconsciousness.

A low, gruff voice was annoyed, “…what? What?”

Haku’s heart nearly stopped.

It was then he understood. He was not at the tea shop or Migawari’s residence. This was the flat he shared with Zabuza. And it sounded as if Zabuza was currently aggrieved by Pua, whose soft footfalls scampered madly around the living area, demanding food. Eventually, Zabuza grumbled and rose to stand as he searched for timothy hay to feed the insufferable animal.

‘This isn’t…he wouldn’t…” This scared him. Those touches had been too gentle. It had to be someone else.

Though the flood of light scrambled his sight momentarily, Haku still opened his eyes. Indeed, he was stretched out on the sofa of his shared flat, gazing at Zabuza’s back as he crouched down to drop a handful of hay in Pua’s dish. He stared at the animal for a moment, contemplative. Zabuza reached out and rubbed the pad of his thumb between Pua’s ears.

“Now quit chargin’ around…” Zabuza commanded.

Soundless and eyes wide, Haku observed as the man circled around the coffee table to take a seat in an armchair. He hadn’t spared Haku a glance to notice that he was awake. Zabuza resumed what he’d been doing before— the source of the tapping sound. There was an open Sealing scroll on the table as a reference that he fiddled with, and then he called over a previously made Shadow Clone from its task in the kitchen to assist. The brute had his clone pull the skin of his forearm taught and repeatedly prod an inked, sharpened bamboo tube into flesh, creating the Sealing formula depicted in the scroll. If the process was painful, there was no indication of it on Zabuza’s face. The work absorbed his concentration for a while.

Haku’s eyes swept over the coffee table. The scroll containing the spoils from Keiseki House had been undone, and over 24 million Ryo in notes were stacked upon it. Beside that, the Master Scroll for the swordsmen’s blades was also open, and being used as a reference for whatever Zabuza was tattooing. At length Haku asked, “What are you doing?”

Zabuza looked up while his Shadow Clone ignored the comment, focusing on the irezumi work.

“What’s it look like I’m doing?”

“You’re…tattooing a Seal?”

“Yeah. Division matrices can be used to pull from a Tool Scroll without the scroll being on hand. Like a direct link, but usually only for one specific kind of tool. If someone wants more than one tool type on hand, it’ll take more inked matrices.”

Haku understood, and also did not understand, “So you only want the Seversword…? But then… why are you keeping it in the—?”

“Mind your business.”

“What are you doing?” Haku raised his voice, wiggling to sit upright, “You could just take it. I was unconscious. Take the Master Scroll for yourself.” That was the aspect he couldn’t understand, “Why be so roundabout? I won’t stop you, Zabuza.”

“You don’t need to stop me. I don’t fucking need it. The badger gave it to you.” The man growled.

A small, incredulous laugh escaped Haku, “You are so full of it. You were obsessed.”

“Here’s a thought.” Zabuza simpered, “Anyone would expect the Master Scroll to be with me. Who the hell is gonna expect it to be on you?”

That was a rather clever point, but it still did not jive with Zabuza’s usual level of selfishness.

“Fine, then.” Haku would not push the subject, “Do that instead, if you’re so proud. Doesn’t that hurt?”

“Hurts like absolute fuck.”

“Then why do it?”

“I’ll do it to keep the Seversword stored for a change, and so I can summon and not depend on you every damn time I need it.”

“Wouldn’t it be more typical of you to keep the Master Scroll for yourself, and then force me to apply an auxiliary Seal on my body, for convenience?”

Even the Shadow Clone stopped to look up from its work, grimacing, irritated. Likewise, Zabuza was frowning at Haku’s inability to accept that he could be accommodating.

“Typical of me, huh?” There was a rueful look on Zabuza’s uncovered face, “Guess so. That’s what I’d do. Though you made it through Keiseki House and honestly exceeded my expectations. I didn’t think you’d…” His eyes roamed around the room, “Get hurt like that.”

“It was stupid of me to undertake another task. I provoked Dintei Bi’s group and paid for it.”

“Still could’ve been prowlers jumping you for your profits. What do you think I used to do?” Zabuza pointed out.

Haku sighed at the suggestion. Of course he used to ambush vendors after they’d made their fortunes. Classic.

“Anyway, you’re too injured to handle a Division Seal application now. I’m not gonna bother. If you want one when you’re better, then whatever. I’ve got to test to see if this works first.” Zabuza took the bamboo tube from the Shadow Clone to jab the far side of his arm with ink.

“Why not…just use a brush?”

“Needs blood to connect to an outside source. Irezumi takes care of that requirement.”

“Oh.” Haku calmed a little, “You’ve learned a lot more about Sealing.”

“Tch.”

“It’s a good thing. That’s something you could do, when all of this is over.” Haku reminded him.

“Don’t go daydreaming about how I’ll spend the rest of my days…”
“What? If not that, then maybe you’ll be a disciple in the Toad Valley and take up Sage Training?” He had to tease about Zabuza’s admittance into the Toad Summoning Contract.

“They’d never have me. No one wants me.” Zabuza muttered, “Even in Mist, when this is over…I know what’s gonna happen.”

Haku was a bit defensive over the pessimistic remark, “What will happen?”

He met eyes with the young man, devoid of hostility, “You already know.”

“They won’t execute you.” Haku insisted.

“Hmf. They will.”

“At worst you’ll be locked up, but you’re more useful if you’re alive. For your service in freeing Mist you could be pardoned, depending on how you’re received by other Mist ninja. There’s even a chance you’ll be nominated for Kage candidacy, in which case you won’t have anything else to worry about.”

“None of that’s going to play out.”

“If you don’t believe there’s something good ahead for you, then why are you doing this?” Haku sat up more, wincing at his body’s complaints, “Zabuza, why? If you’ve begun to think this spells the end for you, then why go through with it? Will you run away again, when Kirigakure is liberated? Don’t you want—?”

“I don’t know what I’m gonna do.” The man halted him, “I thought if it doesn’t go my way, then fuck it. Never thought I’d come this far anyway. Might as well go down as a demon…”

“You’ve changed.” Haku caught himself speaking the words too forcefully, almost in a shout. As if he wanted to get the idea through Zabuza’s dense head this one time.

They stared at each other, and the Shadow Clone tap, tap, tapped.

“If I have, then it’s not the way you think.” Zabuza told him, “What I’ve done differently…I had to. To not re-create what happened before. Doesn’t mean I know what happens next…if it’s worth it…”

Haku frowned, “What are you talking about?”

“You won’t,” Zabuza growled and shut his eyes, “Understand.”

“Try me. Just try me.” Haku found this comical, “I’m a savant when it comes to understanding you. How that can possibly be, I don’t know, but I do.”

“This time I left you alone. Last time, I didn’t.” Zabuza delivered a cryptic explanation, “And that’s what killed you.”

Alarmed, Haku felt a thread of something unknowable stirring it the deepest recesses of his mind, “Killed me? Wha…I’m fine.”

“You weren’t the first time. There’s no way you’d know— none of it stuck. Thought I’d fade out too like the dumb fuckup I was…but then it all…just repeated. I grew up again, but knew things.”
His heart was racing. Haku had no clue what gibberish Zabuza was speaking, but somehow it moved him. It explained something he could never have thought to ask.

“Since I knew, I couldn’t do it all again…the same way.” He ground out the difficult words, “When I modified my choices...all of it was different, and I tried to navigate...thought I could handle it. Anticipate stuff. But I can’t. I’d trade it away, if I could get some things back…”

“Maybe I was wrong.” Haku wore a small smile, “I don’t understand at all. What you’re trying to tell me.”

“I shouldn’t tell you. There’s no use. Everything is way better for you now, and much, much worse for me. I didn’t know it’d be that way.” A long sigh escaped Zabuza, “Can’t fucking undo it now. Can’t force anything. I tried…”

“You’re scaring me a little.”

“You’ve got no reason to be scared. I won’t let it turn out like last time.”

At a loss, Haku let the clueless expression on his face linger as his brain tried to piece together the jumbled messages Zabuza had relayed. He was fine! He’d come back from Keiseki House and had a string of good fortune. Zabuza was aware of his past failures and had learned much from them, but something seemed off about how he was conveying his journey. Last time? Was he referring to his first attempt at freeing Mist? What did he really mean?

“When I...tried to force things...to be how they were…” Zabuza listed his offenses, “To force you. Intimidate you. Steal you. None of that worked. I am actually…” He choked on the word sorry and refused to say it aloud, “I won’t hurt you again.”

“I don’t really know what you mean when you say you want things to be how they were, but thank you.” Haku acknowledged what was a very strange apology, “I’m sorry too.”

“For what?”

“Trying to kill you.” Haku reminded him.

“Oh. Kind of deserved that one, all things considered.”

“All things considered.” Haku agreed, “But if you mean what you say, that you won’t do harm again...I can let all of that go.”

Zabuza nodded in silence and would not look at him.

This development was perhaps the most worrisome of all, Haku thought to himself. After he had joined forces with Zabuza a few years back to receive training and search for clues about the Yuki clan, Zabuza had been a miserable tyrant. He demanded things be done his way. Forced Haku into awful situations. Tested him. Occasionally abused or solicited him. Took so much from him without giving. A time had come when Haku had begun to think Zabuza would always be that way. When he’d nearly killed Temari, Haku felt even more certain of that conclusion.

Who was this person sitting across from him? Someone who was surrendering to the possibility that he might be put to death by the village he was trying to save. Someone who owned up to the fact that he’d treated his apprentice like shit. Someone who had incrementally let others into his life at last, and maybe could consider them his friends, however weird they all were.

Haku asked him, “Do Hiroshi-san and Migawari-san know that I’m back?”
“I told the pipsqueak to tell them.” Zabuza took a moment to wipe a sheen of blood from his arm with a cloth.

“Ah, good. Thank you. I need to tell Naruto and Gaara as well…”

“I already sent a toad.” Zabuza told him flatly.

“You did?” His head could’ve exploded.

“What’s the big fucking deal?”

“Well it’s! It’s just-!” Haku’s smile was tinged with humor, “You have so much in common with Naruto now!”

“Fucking what?” About then, Zabuza’s head could’ve exploded.

“He relies on toads frequently for communication, and he too has been studying Sealing Techniques. You can also put away as much food as he can—”

“Don’t compare me to the Fourth’s twerp!”

“It shouldn’t embarrass you, Zabuza.”

“Maybe if you shut up it won’t.”

Haku’s merry chuckling dissolved into wheezes of discomfort as he tweaked a rib. Nothing hurt nearly as bad as it had when he’d landed in Shincha, but he would need a few more days of rest before he could laugh without flinching.

It took him about ten minutes to rise from the crouch and hobble to the bathroom. He was rickety, but thank the heavens he was up on his own legs again, even the left leg that’d been broken was surprisingly strong. Ugh. How long had it been since he’d brushed his teeth? He underwent basic routines of care before showering, which also took an agonizing amount of time. Afterward, Haku reached his bedroom to dress in his own clothes, wondering what to do with the attire Rin had loaned him, ‘I think these belong to Obito, and it’d be rude not to send them back to Shincha…’

Haku wandered around at the speed of molasses after that, investigating the kitchen and the rich smells wafting from it, “What’s this?”

“Curry.”

“Who taught you to make curry?”

“Pipsqueak did.” Zabuza wiped blood from his arm again.

“Ranmaru knows how to make curry?” Haku lifted the pan’s lid to find the simmering stew, “Better yet…you had the patience to learn how to cook something?”

“That old fuck Miga made me cook him dinner to repay him for the busted floor and window. So I did. I burned his fucking asshole, but he can’t tell me I didn’t do anything for him.”

Frightened, Haku asked, “Just…how spicy is this?”

“This one’s mild.”

“Oh. Phew.” Haku relaxed. He went about preparing rice to accompany the dish, and then returned to the sofa. Haku tsked at the sight of Zabuza wrapping up his freshly tattooed (and completed) arm without dressing the skin first, “That’s no good.”

“What is?”

“Your arm. That needs ointment.”

“I don’t have any.”

“We do have ointment here, because I made it. I’ve told you many times before. In the supply closet, third shelf from the top.” Haku gestured authoritatively with his head at the Shadow Clone, which became very aggravated after being directed so. The clone stomped to the closet, located the antibiotic ointment, and then pitched it at Haku, who scarcely had the reflexes to catch it.

Then, the insolent clone dissolved itself with a cloud of smoke that may as well have read Go fuck yourself. Even Zabuza’s face was contorted in astonishment, “That’s…never happened. I’m not even mad.”

“They take on natures of their own, sometimes. I guess I’m very good at bothering you.” Haku surmised smirkingly, making space for Zabuza on the sofa. The man sank down tiredly beside him and pulled the unacceptable wrappings from his arm.

Haku set to work dabbing the balm over the marked skin, inflamed from the hideous tattooing method Zabuza had used. Neither said anything all the while, and as Haku took it upon himself to wind the roll of gauze wrappings around his companion’s forearm, he dwelled in his own thoughts. He said absently, “After a day, uncover this so it has fresh air to heal…”

“Why are you smiling?”

Haku blinked rapidly and raised a hand to his mouth, as if to correct its blunder. His eyes slid up to see Zabuza giving him a measured, lion-like look; steadfast and distant. His chest and throat suddenly felt tight.

“I smiled?” Haku asked dumbly.

“You were doing it a lot.”

“There’s nothing wrong with it.” Haku defended. He ripped the last binding from the roll to tie off Zabuza’s bandage. When he passed the gauze back and their fingers touched, he was much too aware of it. His heart had no reason to race the way it did. None of this should have mattered, but simple sensations were unexplainably magnified and he couldn’t shut it off.

“Never said there was something wrong with it.” Zabuza gruffed as he flexed his hand, feeling the sting in his skin, “I just asked why.”

Ah, that’s right. That was what he asked. And Haku knew he ought not answer, because he couldn’t precisely define what was going on at the moment. Color glowed high on his cheeks.

“Why…well, it must be because,” Haku exercised some poise in that moment, wielding the truth, “You made me happy.”

He drew his hands back, took a breath, and shifted away for some space. Haku watched as Zabuza slowly stood without a word, shutting his eyes to think. The corner of his mouth curved up. Zabuza gathered supplies to put them away, then set out into Nanakusa for a survey of the town.
Haku laid back and fought the sharp, bright escalation tumbling inside of him.

Chapter End Notes

What if Zabuza’s do-over actions and decisions caused the events in Forlorn, the previous fic? And also much of this fic! Though that is only one ingredient of the alternate reality pie of this AU. tap dances on the time paradox The earlier excerpt came from Jorge Luis Borges’ poem “You Learn.” Share your thoughts below if you wish.

Chapter 57- What the Truth Builds and Breaks
What the Truth Builds and Breaks

Chapter Notes

Reader Beware: You will encounter a graphic sex scene in the third quarter of this chapter, marked ### for your convenience to peruse or skip.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter Soundtrack: “Slow Dancing in the Dark” by Joji

Things recalibrated after the cultural exchange festival in Konoha. Nearly a week afterward, sighting Tama and Sato together again had become commonplace, and no one really had much to say on it. They butted heads much in the way their uncles used to, which most considered an amicable parting, perhaps even a blessing. Though this assumption came into doubt shortly before the weekend, as Chouji was happening by a tavern around noon that day.

He’d merely looked up to squint at the posted menu in the establishment’s window, and beyond the glass he noticed Sato was seated inside. Chouji returned his attention to the special of the day before snapping his eyes back, realizing that Maito Tama was sitting across from Hatake Sato. The two had their arms folded on the table, leaning towards each other, smiling as they spoke!

“That’s not rivalry!” Chouji saw through the ruse, “This is THE REAL THING. They don’t dislike each other at all. WHAT THE—’ He flattened his hand on the window with a thud, getting their attention. He was compelled to intervene, giving the pair a What the fuck? expression through the glass to demonstrate that the jig was up.

‘That’s not rivalry!’ Chouji saw through the ruse, ‘This is THE REAL THING. They don’t dislike each other at all. WHAT THE—’ He flattened his hand on the window with a thud, getting their attention. He was compelled to intervene, giving the pair a What the fuck? expression through the glass to demonstrate that the jig was up.

Initially, Sato was spooked: ‘Oh shit. Oh shit. OH SHIT.’ Caught red-handed! He’d known it was bound to happen eventually, but why did it have to be Chouji; the brick wall of justice and lunch specials? He felt Tama’s fingers tracing the back of his hand to get his attention. Sato looked to her.

“Well, it was a good effort, but I think this is the part where we take on the ugly side of the public view.” Tama suggested, “Chouji-kun’s pretty understanding.”

“Ehhh…yeah.” Sato yielded, his eyes still glued to their flabbergasted contemporary outside, “What do we do? Invite him to lunch?”

“No, no! Let’s kiss.”

“That’s about as awkward as my lunch idea.”

“The kiss is cheaper.” Tama noted.

“You’re right!” Sato leaned full across the table to meet her in a lip-lock and Chouji, briefly, went ballistic outside. Then, he hurried off to locate his teammates and any other friend who was going to listen to this wild tale.

“Good grief…I think we might be in trouble.” Sato hung his head, laughing anxiously, “Now what?”

“We stick to today’s plan.” Tama was undaunted.
“Are you sure? It’s drastic.”

“If worse comes to worst, people still like you in the Star Village. Let’s go live there and renounce everything in Leaf.”

“Whoo! That is cold! Also, I’m not sure it’d work out the way you think. Official clearances and all that…”

“It’s kind of a plan C. I’m not counting on it.”

“Okay. Stick to today’s plan.” Sato nodded and picked at his lunch, “I’m…kind of nervous.”

“Me too.”

The village council meeting adjourned at 1:00 on the dot that afternoon, and Tsunade was still chafed that her presence had been required. Said meeting had been an outlet mainly for complaints and bad news, centered on topics like Naruto’s delayed return (and precautions needed to guard the village’s jinchuriki), another one of Orochimaru’s decoy hideouts being discovered, friction with the Raikage, overwork and stretched security schedules, temporary trade decline with the Tide Village, and so forth.

Perhaps the only high note of the meeting was the ratification of an alliance agreement with Takigakure, for which the official documentation would be presented in-person by Leaf Village representatives. In this case, Hyuga Hideyasu and his son would be going to Hidden Waterfall to finalize talks with Shibuki, and possibly bring vassals of the Hyuga clan with them. Tsunade had not expected the endeavor to succeed at first. But with other great villages giving Leaf the cold shoulder, many councilmen agreed that any friendly association was beneficial at this point.

Wrapped in a scarf and heavier shawl, Tsunade made the trek from the council’s secondary building to the Administrative Building uptown through the cold. ‘I’ll make a stop at the liquor store first and pick up a lunch from the café…’ Her agenda was derailed as two familiar faces appeared outside of the liquor shop, as if to catch her indulging in her worst habit. But then the encounter felt reversed, since Tsunade had discovered it was Sato and Tama leaving the place. Her brain scrambled to recall birthdates and be sure they were of age to purchase alcohol, ‘Ah. Well, Tama is.’

And then: ‘WHAT ARE THESE TWO DOING TOGETHER?’ Tsunade briskly made her way towards them with a frown on her face. Unless these alleged rivals were going to challenge each other to a drinking contest, something seemed terribly amiss here.

“Oh! Tsunade-sama! We were just coming to see you.” Sato greeted her chipperly.

“Were you now?” The woman arched her brow.

“Yes, we stopped in here to get a gift.” Tama confirmed.

“That is what I’m skeptical of.” Tsunade clucked.

“Because we aren’t.” Tama clarified, “Everything is fine now.”
“We, uh…made up.” Sato pitched in his lousy explanation as well.

“Don’t think such a decision will be well-received, because it won’t be.” Tsunade warned, “Though I for one don’t particularly care, as long as you can both be counted on for missions.”

“Of course!” They chorused.

Tsunade folded her arms, “You’re not running away from the village are you?”

“We did consider it, but we want to try to work things out here first.” Sato admitted, “If we decide to leave, we’d do it through the proper channels and clear it with you—”

“Who says I would?” The Hokage bristled.

“That isn’t what we wanted to request of you anyway.” Tama assured her, “If it isn’t too much trouble, we want to ask you to help us with something else.”

“Ask for my help?” Both of Tsunade’s eyebrows shot up.

Tama and Sato exchanged a look with each other before Sato offered up a tall gift bag to the Hokage, “Whether or not you agree to, we got this for you as a token of appreciation.”

It sort of rubbed her the wrong way that these youngsters thought to get her such a gift, and it indeed was an exquisite vintage of sake when Tsunade peeked into the bag, wincing at the rarity and price tag of the selection. What did they want? She felt somewhat shamed by this exchange, but she certainly wasn’t going to decline and let the couple go home with the bottle.

“We can’t get the approval of our families or go to a shrine, since we’ve been blacklisted from most local shrines,” Sato informed the Hokage, “So we wanted to get married in a civil ceremony at the administrative office. We just weren’t sure if any officiants there would be willing to do it…”

“Then…you mean to ask me.” Tsunade observed.

Tama nodded, “Could you please consider it? We don’t know who else to ask that’s an official.”

“No.” Tsunade clicked her heeled shoes on the pavement, annoyed, “I can’t. Or rather, I can, but I won’t. This is poor decision-making on both your parts.”

“We’ve really put a lot of thought into it.” Sato appealed, “Really! Discussed it for a while, made plans…we even have a whole white board—”

“Don’t you understand that going through with such a thing will permanently blemish the both of you, and you dare think I want any part of such an arrangement? I will bring no harm upon you.” Something in Tsunade’s face was wavering, her eyes shiny, “I’d rather surrender you to Hidden Sand, if you can’t be reasoned with. If you mean to go away. I’d rather…”

“I-It’s alright, Tsunade-sama…” Sato was alarmed by their leader’s emotional state, “You don’t have to. We’ll figure something out.”

Tsunade tipped her head back and puffed a vaporous breath into the autumn air, releasing some frustration with it. Dumb kids. Wishing to get married in spite of all the vitriol and bad blood between their families? Why did they have to put her in the middle?

Except that she always did have a soft spot for the two, and had gone out of her way on many occasions to preserve them and advance their careers. Tsunade had enjoyed their antics and camaraderie, and had even been mildly hurt by their falling out, though she had nothing to do with their personal lives whatsoever. It seemed that, nowadays, a fair portion of Tsunade’s experience was living vicariously through younger generations. Her heart saw through the lenses of Sakura, Gaara, Tama, Sato, Tenten, and all of the young ninja who had bloomed before her eyes. She no longer roamed the world or threw herself directly at conflict. Tsunade sat back and guided those who did, and oftentimes she found herself wondering how she would feel if she was still in the thick of it all.

And damn her yearning heart. When she looked at Sato, she saw flashes of Dan. She saw flashes of Nawaki. Bits of herself shined through Tama, who’d endured pain and hardship but marched on—a possible version of herself if she hadn’t fallen prey to fear and heartache, and avoided the Leaf Village for so long. Tama kept charging at adversity head-on. Tsunade could not say the same of herself.

“You won’t figure anything out. You’re always going to be clueless.” Tsunade spoke softly with a sigh, “Just as clueless as me.”

Sato and Tama gave her quizzical looks.

Tsunade’s grip on the gift bag’s handle tightened, “This in exchange for my lunch hour. Another working lunch…” She began walking again at a fast pace, “Move it. Before I come to my senses.”

Silently shocked and a bit thrilled it had worked, the pair scurried after the Hokage and entered the administrative building with her. Tsunade directed them, “Go straight upstairs to my office and wait. I need a few things…”

They bounded up the stairs obediently while Tsunade took a left through the lobby, navigating towards the civil office, grumbling to herself. She pilfered filing cabinets and desk drawers, reaching around confused secretaries who asked if she needed any help. “No, no, I need a registration form and certificate. I can notarize this without another witness, right?” When she got a nod, Tsunade continued shuffling around, “Good. Where’s that script for performing a marriage?”

“You’re officiating for someone today, Tsunade-sama?” The office workers brightened, smiling. Little did they know who was being married.

“Ah.” She found the script booklet and added it to her pile, “I am.” Tsunade held up her gift bag, “I’m marrying this sake bottle. All of you can pipe down and get back to work!”

The group deflated after her shut-down and Tsunade bustled on through the building, realizing she was perfectly deranged to do this.

‘Maito Ken may come for my blood, once he learns who performed the ceremony. I really don’t want to deal with that. Also, I don’t know how Kakashi and Gai are going to feel…’ She took a fortifying breath, ‘Why do I care? I was set to marry Dan, then he died in my arms. Am I expecting these two to be casualties in the struggle to come? Do I pity them? Am I hoping they endure, and in a decade I’ll watch the next young Hatake graduate and become a ninja?’ Tsunade blew a strand of hair out of her face, ‘What is it that I’m hoping for?’

She climbed the steps and supposed she truly didn’t know. All that was clear was that she had hope. For what, Tsunade couldn’t say. All the same, she felt it and knew she had to trust it. The way she had let her trust in Naruto bring her back from the edge of a Faustian bargain with Orochimaru, and not allow contempt, regret, and bitterness to drain away her remaining days.

‘I might as well.’ Tsunade smiled darkly to herself, ‘However this turns out, I’ll know I acted decisively. Put something in motion. My days might be numbered because of who I am and what I know. I had to sit at today’s meeting while staring Shimura Danzo in the face. I had to listen to council members debate what the Akatsuki’s next move will be. There are worse things afoot.’

Down the third floor hallway Tsunade swirled in her own thoughts until she reached her office, finding Sato and Tama there. She shut and locked the door behind her, heaving another heavy breath. Tsunade set her gift bag down on her desk and laid out the documents that would need to be completed, “You can fill these in afterward and I’ll drop them off…”

“Thank you, Tsunade-sama!” They were jittery.

Tsunade glanced around the space, “Hm. It’s a bit of a mess in here.” She moved a few file boxes to the side of the room, then shortened the few tall stacks of paperwork on her credenza so that more light could enter the room through windows, “There. It won’t get much better. Just so you know…”
She turned around again, “I haven’t ever actually officiated before.”

Tama told her, “That’s alright. We’re just so grateful that you’re willing.”

“If you’re sure about this, face each other and I’ll get it done.” Tsunade waved a hand at them and they did as instructed. The Hokage glanced over the script and sniffed at it, “Very well…hm. Maito Ta— ugh. I can’t believe I’m doing this.” Tsunade gave her head a shake and continued, “Maito Tama and Hatake Sato, you have come here today to make your commitment to each other iron-clad and true in the eyes of the law in Konohagakure. To build a life together tempered with love, effort, and support…”

As the Hokage recited the words, she noticed the two connect their hands in silence, listening.

“Marriage is perhaps the greatest and most challenging adventure of human relationships. No ceremony can create your marriage; only you can do so through dedication, perseverance, and patience. Believe in each other and listen to each other. Appreciate your differences, and learn to treasure what matters while letting go of the rest. Today I act as your witness and intermediary, to confirm your choice to stand together as partners…”

Tsunade took another shaky breath, “Do you both vow to develop your hearts and minds, and walk a path of equanimity?”

There was a beat of silence before the young pair responded, “We do.”

“We do.”

“Do you both accept that…” Tsunade modified the line as she understood Sato and Tama’s circumstances, “The road you walk will be fraught with challenges? That you must overcome obstacles and uncertainties, even those encountered in service to your village, as two of its shinobi?”

“We do.”

“Do you, Hatake Sato,” She addressed him directly, “Promise to cherish, understand, and bring joy to Tama? Knowing that this marriage can only be as good as the two of you make it, do you promise to treat her with compassion and respect for as long as you live?”

“I do.” Sato promised, “For as long as I live, even then after.”

Tama shut her eyes for a moment to absorb the sincere vow into her being.

“Do you, Maito Tama,” Tsunade continued, “Promise to cherish, understand, and bring joy to Sato?
Knowing that this marriage can only be as good as the two of you make it, do you promise to treat him with compassion and respect for as long as you live?”
Tama watched Sato’s face light up as she said, “I do.”

“Huh-hrm.” Tsunade endeavored not to get choked up. “By the power vested in me by the Village Hidden in the Leaves, as Hokage, and through your own wishes, you will now be called upon as Husband and Wife. May your…” The sentence stuck in Tsunade’s throat, and she closed the booklet as she concluded, “Please. May your days together be blessed.” She seemed to be imploring a higher power for them, genuinely invested in their welfare.

Staring at one another, joyful but somewhat shell-shocked, Sato and Tama continued to hold hands and did not know if there were any further cues. Tsunade gestured wildly at them, bothered, “Well! Kiss each other if you want, but I’m not going to look!”

Tsunade turned her face away when they leaned toward each other, grinning, and managed to not see a single millisecond of the kiss. She could not face them again. Something in her chest had shattered. ‘What did I do?’ Her lips trembled as she thought to herself, ‘Why did I do that…? I’m not this stupid. I know where to draw the line. I’ve…’ Tsunade kept her eyes squeezed shut as she tried to wrestle back her composure, ‘…Dan. I’m pathetic. I’ve been waiting for you and wishing. My life could have been so different. Would you have done all of this with me? Here I am meddling in the affairs of others while I keep thinking about myself…’

“Tsunade-sama?” Sato was google-eyed, able to see the unbroken trail of a tear sliding down the Hokage’s cheek.

“Don’t.” Her voice warbled, eyes shut, and she raised the stupid booklet in her hands to hide her face, “Look.”

Tama tried to console the Hokage, “Oh, Tsunade-sama…we shouldn’t have asked and you were so kind—”

“It’s not really…” Tsunade swallowed hard, refusing to snuffle or blubber, “About you. It’s…me.”

It took a moment to process that the Hokage was bereaved over something, and her performing a civil ceremony for them had exacerbated the feeling. Tsunade felt the two nincompoops circle their arms around her in a quasi-group hug, “…no. You two…” It made her feel slightly better and her shoulders drooped, “Don’t you know…why I did this?” Her voice cracked again, harder, “B-Because…I w-wanted…” A hard sniff, “I was thinking of Dan. Gosh, I’m so stupid…”

“Someone special to you?” Tama gathered.

Tsunade shook her head to deny it, then slowly nodded her head yes, hiding her tearful face.

“We’re all a little stupid.” Sato reassured her with a heedless smile, “Don’t forget who’s important to you. You made sure that we won’t.”

Getting her shit together, Tsunade tossed the booklet over to the desk, wiped her eyes and nose on her shawl, and then squeezed her arms around them.

“You’re fools.” She said, smiling.

“Thank you.” Tama repeated, “For doing this.”

Sato nodded, “Yes, thank you.”

“Enough already. You won’t speak a word of this to any soul or I’ll imprison you. I never cried.” Tsunade freed herself from their hold, “Now finish that paperwork for your registration. I might… still have time for lunch.”

They rushed to the desk to find pens.

Within 48 hours, knowledge of Sato and Tama’s mended relationship had spread only amongst their peer group. What Chouji had initially passed along was a retelling of the short glimpse he had gotten: that he had seem them dining together, seemingly lovey-dovey and not exactly trying to hide it. In addition to that, Chouji had not raised an objection to it either: “If things are good, then what do I have to say about it? Maybe we should—”

“Act like nothing bad ever happened?” Ino’s interruption was razor-sharp.

Shikamaru and Chouji gave her uncomfortable looks. Standing with them around a secluded picnic table, Shino, Hinata, Sakura, Kiba, Tenten, Lee, and Neji were also gathered and listening.

Chouji cleared his throat and summoned some courage to speak again, “Ino…I’m not saying that. But there was never any point in us rejecting—”

“I won’t do it again.” Ino said quickly in her own defense, “I don’t like this, but I won’t treat anyone badly.”

“That’s kind of beside the point now.” Shikamaru held up a piece of cardstock, “They’re married. And they want to know if we’re interested in celebrating with them at this little party they’re throwing. So that’s the awkward matter at hand. If we do go, how weird is this going to be? They didn’t give us any warning.”

“It’s not about us.” Neji shared some wisdom.

“True.” Shikamaru did not disagree, “And I’m fine with keeping things friendly from here on out, but I can’t pretend I am not a bit annoyed about this. Or the fact that if we go, and their families are there, we can expect some unpleasantness.”

“There’s always been unpleasantness when Tama’s parents go anywhere. That’s just the way her dad is.” Sakura rationalized, “It makes sense to support them. I’ll go.”

“I’ll go, and believe me, I don’t like Sato.” Kiba made his feelings clear, “Though there’s no family drama that can scare me away from a party after what my own family has put me through.”

“We are going.” Hinata had a determined look on her face as Shino nodded beside her.

“Okay, then if all of you have buried the hatchet, I don’t want to be the one to miss this.” Ino reasoned, “So I’m going too. Chouji, Shika?”

“It could be weird, but yeah, I’m not sitting out.” Chouji confirmed.

Shikamaru gave a curious look to Tenten, Lee, and Neji, “What about you?”

“Oh, it’s a yes.” Tenten was unflappable.

Lee was rubbing his chin, “Did the invitation state what the dress code will be?”

Shikamaru palmed his forehead.

“We will go and give our support. I don’t think this was intended as a formal reception.” Neji interpreted what he guessed Sato was aiming for in terms of social outreach, “Not many people will be there apart from those they are comfortable with.”

Most nodded along with Neji’s estimation. Some muttering continued as uncertainties and grievances floated around. Their perception of Sato and Tama’s restored relationship had only gone as far as believing they were rivals and saw each other to trade insults and compete. Yet the truth had at last reared its head. They still cared about each other and had moved past what had first parted them. This might have been easier to digest if the couple had been honest with their friends and explained it to them, say, a week ago. But the surprise was still as fresh as a ripped band-aid.

Slowly, a smile spread on Sakura’s face, “I know it’s kind of sudden, but I still suspected…” She sighed, “I’m glad. I know why they hesitated to tell anyone what was really going on. I’d be scared to. Everything was a mess.”

“It could be an even bigger mess, after word of this starts to get around.” Shikamaru wagered.

“If that’s what happens, then this time more of us can help with damage control.” Tenten aimed a snide remark at him, “So it’s not just me and my team, or Hinata’s team, showing what friendship means to them.”

“Hey.” Shikamaru’s eye tweaked, “What’s this unspoken rule about damage control? That’s a personal choice. None of us are obligated.”

“Friends are obligated.” Her arms folded, Tenten did not budge in her disagreement with Shikamaru. Neji and Lee gave her alarmed looks.

Shikamaru wasn’t going to push the subject with a kunoichi who had once whooped his behind in the past, “Okay then. We’ll see what happens.”

Sakura kindly changed the topic, “Good! So if we’re all attending, let’s pitch in for a small gift or something! It can’t be a grand gesture since this is short notice. Oh! Ino, Hinata, what are you wearing? Tenten, what are you wearing?”

And conversation took a turn for the better after that. Across the village, things were not going nearly so well in the front yard of Maito Ken’s house. Since sending an invitation via screech owl was not an option for Tama’s parents, both Sato and Tama had appeared in-person to come clean about what they had done.

Sato had bowed in dogeza on the stone pathway in front of the house to appeal to Ken and Miako, trying to make an honest apology. It wasn’t going over well. At the onset of Sato’s bowing and uttering even a few words, Ken had lunged at the young man with his hands outstretched, desperate to crush whatever he could. In an act of ultimate defiance, Tama snatched her father’s wrist to restrain him and hold him back with strength. Ken stared at his daughter with wild, stupefied eyes.

“Listen to him, Dad. Listen to him!” Tama demanded.

“I will not.” Ken’s mouth was small, his words seething, “There’s nothing he can say…”

From his place on the ground, Sato looked up and understood it was futile.

“Mom,” Giving up on her father completely, Tama spoke to her mother instead, “We came here to tell the truth. Things are okay now and we made up a while ago. Sato and I got married.”

Miako’s face lit up, astonished, but she had taken it rather well, “Dear, you—?”

With a roar, Ken hurled himself sideways to break free of his daughter’s grip, stumbling to the ground and spitting like a mad cat. Spooked, Sato leapt to his feet, wide-eyed beside Tama as Maito Ken tipped over the edge in a way he never had previously in his life. Likewise, Miako was terrified by the sight, standing back by the entryway of the house. A bizarre scene unfolded when Ken stood and charged again, tackling something he thought was there as he struck empty air, wrestling with a target no one could see. Tama understood.

’Sato’s using Genjutsu on him…’ She held her breath. Her father thought he was getting the satisfaction of beating the insolent Hatake to a pulp while Sato, in fact, was behind him, bowing and apologizing to Miako. Tama’s mother was not sure what Ken was doing, but she directed a quiet reprimand at Sato before hugging him and accepting his apology. She then asked softly, “You won’t betray Tama again, will you?”

“No, never again.”

“Alright. There’s no way to convince Ken of that. You’re not hurting him—?”

“No, it’s just an illusion. I won’t ever hurt him.” Sato assured her.

When Tama approached, Sato ushered for her to lean in so he could whisper, “I’m going to keep up the Genjutsu to make it look like I’m beat-up. He’ll probably stop if you hold me.”

“He might not.” Tama offered a counterpoint.

“Well. Let’s try. Just to see if there’s any way to talk to him at all…” Sato held a hand sign to alter the illusion, making it seem as though he’d escaped Ken (only in Ken’s mind) and rushed to Tama. When Ken stood again and about-faced, laying eyes on his daughter holding her waste of a husband, he saw a version of Sato that was bedraggled and injured that no one else did. It temporarily stayed his hand.

“You…” Ken sneered, “You’re always going to hide behind my daughter, you useless rat. You don’t even deserve to draw breath. I wish you’d disappear like the White Fang. You have the nerve to do this. Don’t ever think you can make it right. Not even if you drop dead! I’d hate you in every lifetime I have, forever!” Ken was hysterical, “No grandchild begotten by you will ever be acknowledged by me! Forget it! I’ll hate them just as much!”

Miako gasped, inching forward to stand beside her daughter, unsure of what she could do.

“You know better than to defend them, Miako!” Ken’s hands were fisted at his sides, staring down the gaggle in front of his home.

“I am the one who gets to decide who has a place in my heart.” Miako protested, “And if I can make a place for you, Ken, then don’t think I can’t consider others!”

Ken was stomping and spitting, incensed. He’d never raise a finger toward his wife, but he was not fully reconciled with the fact that Miako didn’t bend each and every time he wanted things a certain way. She’d be perfect if she did. No one in his family was perfect. It was a pain that whirled inside him endlessly, ripping at him. No one could do anything right except him. They were fully capable of acting with dignity, but they didn’t time and time again and it made him miserable.

Finally, Ken directed his attention back at Tama, “You chose this.”

“Dad…”

“I’ve taught you better. I did everything I could to help you be brilliant, so you could do anything.” Ken reminded her, “Even when you chose to be a shinobi, I couldn’t try to stop you. Even that was something you were wonderful at. You brought us honor, Tama. You are my shining jewel. The pride of our family.” His eyes were glossy, “Why did you throw that away? Our family’s honor? Yours, mine? He’s not worth it. None of them are.”

Tearing up, Tama readjusted her position to hold Sato’s hand, answering her father, “They are. I get to decide.”

Ken’s face went flat. He had to process that his family continually refused to align their views with his, no matter how rational he was, no matter how much he loved them. They were determined to throw themselves off the ledge of good sense and into a sea of chaos. He couldn’t save them.

“Sato is not reliable. Tama, you must be fully accountable for any misfortune that you bring unto yourself from here on out. When it goes wrong, I cannot be blamed.” He warned her, “Whatever happens is not my fault. I’ve done everything I could to prevent you from floundering like your worthless grandfather.”

Tama took offense to the low-blow comment about Maito Dai, “You can’t insult grandfather’s memory like that—!”

“HE WAS WORTHLESS!” Ken screamed. All of the neighborhood could hear it.

Sato stupidly tried to say something to retrieve some civility, “No one in your family is worthle—”

“You shut your scoundrel mouth and go die already.” Ken marched up and got a handful of Sato’s tunic collar, and when both Miako and Tama intervened, Ken pulled back and hurled Sato down to the pavers again, trying to part him from the Maito family.

Ken rounded on his daughter, ignoring his wife as she tried to coax him indoors, “You get to decide, Tama? Is that what you’re saying? No. You humiliate me. You and Gai humiliate me. I will never, ever approve of this. People who make catastrophic mistakes do not deserve to be forgiven—they need to be cut out of our lives completely and forgotten.” He shared his manifesto with his daughter, as if she didn’t already know it, “Anyone who says otherwise never had a brain cell to speak of.”

Scowling, a tear ran down Tama’s cheek as she allowed the brunt of the words to destroy what specks of dignity she had left. If her father insisted on taking refuge in his anger, then she would always be a mirror to reflect it back at him. If one day he looked and saw that he was truly alone, perhaps she had demonstrated why in that reflection. The prospect of him seeing was doubtful.

Maybe it was a bid for sainthood or just a selflessly compassionate act: Miako wrapped her arms around Ken’s trunk, gently kicked his bad ankle to buckle his leg, and heaved him indoors as she shouted, “Tama! I’ll come find you later! Never you mind this! Later, I promise!” She kicked the door shut.

Thankfully, Sato had his faculties intact so he could anticipate nosy neighbors venturing outside to discover what all the commotion was. He used Genjutsu to fool any eyes that might have glimpsed them; he and Tama appeared not to be there as they walked out of the manicured community and back to the heart of the village. They didn’t make it as far as Sato’s building, stopping several blocks away just beyond the Han Ethnic Quarter near the senior game tables. The area was unpopulated when Tama finally slumped onto a bench and wept.

He didn’t let go of her hand. Sato sunk down on a knee, peering up at Tama as she sat curved over in sadness, hiding her face in the crook of her arm as she bawled.

“We knew it’d be bad. I just…Tama…I want you to know,” Sato spoke to her softly, “What he did — what your dad did to make you feel small and stupid and worthless, that is exactly what I don’t want to do. Ever. I’m sorry that I was foolish enough to do that once. He might be right about me, but he definitely has everything wrong about you.” With his free hand, Sato held the side of her face and swiped at tears with his thumb, “You will always shine no matter what you decide. You’re good at so many things and the person you’re with can’t change that. I don’t want to take anything away from you. I want to give you the things you wish for, and the things you don’t already have, if you want me to. There will never come a day when I change my mind or try to yell you down.”

“I know, I know.” She choked out, patting her hand against his as he cupped her face, “It’s just so hard to hear him say those things. It’s more about…him…than it is…about me.”

Sato nodded, “Yeah. He’s kept that chip on his shoulder his whole life like a badge of honor. Like it’s his excuse to squash others.”

“What if Dad and I never speak again?” Tama wondered, sniffling.

“You will.” Sato predicted, “It may not be very nice for a while, but he’s got to accept that if you’re one of the people he said who make catastrophic mistakes and need to be forgotten…he’ll never be able to do it. He’ll eat his own words. Because you’re his daughter.”

Snuffling, Tama stretched out to wrap her arms behind Sato’s neck and bend in a hug. He rubbed soothing circles on her back.

“I’m sorry I’ve made everything so hard.” Sato gave her his thousandth apology.

Her hands carded through locks of his hair when she said, “It’s not just you who’s made things hard. Don’t be sorry. I knew someday it would be like this with my Dad, whether or not you were in the picture.”

“I wish I could have done everything perfectly. Made all the right decisions back then.” Sato sighed and imagined what could have been, “It’d be easier.”

“Everyone wishes that exact thing, at some point.” Tama supposed, “If you had, eventually, Dad still would have blown up. If he always thought those things about me and you, even if we’d taken every proper step…he was going to make it known sooner or later.”

“Jeez…” He gave her a slight squeeze in their hug, and then stood up again, “Are you going to be okay?”

“I’ll be okay.” Tama wiped her face and also stood, “So…what else was on our to-do list for today?”

“Well, we already moved your stuff to my place. The stuff that mattered anyway…”

“I think Mom kind of knew what I was secretly relocating my belongings yesterday, and she covered for us.” Tama recalled.

“She’s very intuitive.”

Tama nodded, thankful for her mother, “Yeah.”

“Apart from that, we just need to make sure that garden we rented is set up for the party. Move tables and seats over there, hang some lanterns and streamers. I bet my uncle and Tenzo will help us.”

“Didn’t they already handle catering food? Don’t ask so much of them.”
“They said _they’d be happy to help_ after I told them!” Sato led her along, “I’ve got to take them up on the offer. It’s the least Kakashi can do, really…”

That evening, the gathering was a quaint affair beneath string lights, tucked behind tall shrub hedges and garden boxes of kochia and cosmos. It had been a healthy turnout of guests: Miako, Gai, Kakashi, Tenzo, Asuma, Kurenai, Iruka, Shizune, Tsunade, Hinata, Shino, Sakura, Kiba, Lee, Tenten, Neji, Chouji, Ino, Shikamaru; all floating around the space peaceably. Tama’s cohort had also appeared: Mion, Shoda, Yurie, Mashu, Aiko (and her husband and children), Inohei, Choukoki, Kojika, Michiko, Nogo, and Banri (looking a bit crestfallen himself).

Maito Ken had tried to make an appearance and maybe even contain his pyroclastic rage, but he could only walk into the garden to immediately turn around and walk back out without his wife. Miako had a feeling he wouldn’t be able to handle it. She let him return home so she could enjoy the evening without his fussing.

Dressed in modern, western-style outfits, Tama and Sato moved around the packs of guests to thank them and socialize. Tama’s maternal uncle and aunt, as well as her grown cousins, were chatting with Tama when another small group of guests arrived, and Sato was perplexed for a moment before rushing over to greet them, “Holy crap! Grass ninja!”

“Hey shithead.” Noé greeted him with a big grin, “I didn’t think you’d invite us to something like this!” He was accompanied by his teammates who had also competed in the Chunin Exam: the kunoichi Guena (who Hinata had defeated in a prelim round), and Yanagisawa Aota, the sole Final Round participant from Kusagakure.

“Hey, hey! Congratulations!” Aota was enthusiastic with a handshake and was sharply dressed, “Thank you for inviting us, Hatake-san. Here, this is for your bride. I grew them myself.” He handed a basket of lotus flowers to Sato, “Now where is that lovely dragon? Excuse me.” Tactless, Aota wandered off to find Tenten and flirt.

A handsome, brunette man middling in age stepped up to Sato next, “Hello Hatake-san, I don’t believe we’ve met in a formal sense. I am the Jounin Sensei of this team, Mahoto.”

Sato blinked wildly, “Mahoto…” He knew that name from somewhere, “How nice of you to come. Do I—?”

“I’m Toshisue Anyo’s old teammate.” Mahoto explained with a smile, “That’s my son, Shigeyuki, over there.” He pointed out his adult son (a near carbon copy of Mahoto, but younger) somehow wrapped up in conversation with Akimichi guests at the buffet table.

“Oh my— heck! Yes! I know.” Sato laughed ecstatically, “It’s great to meet you! Anyo told me about you. It’s such a small world. Wow, and when Anyo talked about your kid he made it sound like he was still a baby. But he’s all grown up now!”

Mahoto nodded blithely, “That’s just how these things go. When we tell our stories, children will always seem to stay children in our memories. Even once they’re out of the house and active ninja.”

Sato was tickled pink by the meeting, “I’ve got to say hi to him! But tell me, how’s Anyo doing? The last time I saw him he said he was looking for Sarincha. Is everything okay?”

“I think so. Yes, that was some time ago. He searched all over for her once she went missing. Anyo even went to Nanakusa to see his father in law, to make sure she wasn’t there. But he found Sarincha in the Tide Village, helping out the Medical Corps there.” Mahoto explained, “She is well.”

“Good, good! But, uh…like, are things bad in the relationship? I don’t know why she’d run off…” Sato was still missing a few details.

“That’s not something you should ask me!” Mahoto chirped bashfully, “They’re here, you know. Go ask them yourself.”

Sato yipped in elation as he looked in all directions, and yes, he did spot Anyo accepting a glass of wine from the barkeep while simultaneously holding a plate of food for Sarincha to eat from.

“You guys!” Sato stopped just short of crashing into them, “I haven’t seen you in so long! What gives? How are you?”

“Sato!” A morsel nearly flew out of Sarincha’s mouth. She hugged Sato while happily rocking side to side, her overcoat puffing out as they scrunched, “We’re good! Anyo, look at him! Doesn’t he look so handsome?”

“He looks like me.” Anyo assessed with a smirk.

She batted her husband’s shoulder playfully. Sarincha kissed Sato’s cheeks in greeting before passing him to Anyo, who gave him a fond hug.

“Congratulations to you and your bride. Where is she?” Anyo skimmed his eyes around the garden.

“Ah, Tama’s aunt and uncle are kind of monopolizing her right now. We’ll go see them in just a minute so I can introduce Sarincha, but first…” Sato gave Sarincha a concerned look, “Where did you go? Anyo said you were missing for a while.”

“No need to bring that up…” Anyo tried to deflect the subject. Sarincha’s face indicated she was going to offer a true account of events to Sato out of courtesy. Knowing it was imminent, Anyo took a long gulp from his wine glass.

“I’ll summarize. In what was…not my most considerate move as a spouse…I arranged for someone to replace me as the Director of the clinic in Kaido…and I didn’t tell Anyo.” She winced as she spoke, “Then I packed up and went to the Tide Village to assist their Medical Corps. Again, I didn’t tell Anyo.”

Her husband looked very miffed about it.

“Why?” Sato was perplexed.

“It was a dumb, selfish decision. 100 percent.” Sarincha confessed, “We agreed to never have kids, but when I found out I was— accidentally— expecting, I panicked and knew I couldn’t fulfill such a promise…so I buttoned up all of my responsibilities in Kaido and disappeared. I didn’t tell him anything, and I thought I could raise a baby on my own in Shiogakure. Easier said than done, what with that village recovering from a serious attack…”

Bug-eyed, Sato looked to Anyo who had his head tipped back, pouring a stream of wine into his mouth.

“And it was truly a hateful thing to do not to offer any explanation to Anyo about what was going on, but I just couldn’t face him. I was a traitor and promise-breaker. I sought to fulfill my dream at the expense of every vow I made to him. I felt horrible about it a few weeks later, though I couldn’t go crawling back and admit what I’d done.” Sarincha continued stuffing food in her mouth, getting emotional, “So here’s a piece of advice: don’t do anything like that. No disappearing acts. Disappearing is a no-no.”

“That’s what you’re calling it?” Anyo drawled.

“Anyo.” She gave him a sassy neck-roll, “Relax.”

He shoved a prawn in his mouth and chewed aggressively. Sato could not believe what he was being told.

“I am at fault. I did wrong. You should’ve seen me trying to hold down a full-time job at Tide’s hospital in my first trimester blubbering like an idiot and wallowing in guilt. I don’t know how anyone could stand to work with me.” Sarincha went on, “And how stupid was I to think my husband would never find me? I mean, I was less than 80 kilometers from the town I used to live in even though I had crossed a body of water. He’s a Jounin and of course there were details I missed that gave him a trail to follow. Eventually, Anyo found me in the Tide Village…”

“But everything’s okay? You didn’t fight or break up or—?”

“I thought she was dead.” Anyo inserted himself into the tale, “Or, woefully lacking in tactics when it came to running off with some secret lover, which wasn’t the case. I was furious when I found her. It was neither of those things. She’d just resumed her life in another village like she hadn’t left me behind!”

“Shush! There are a lot of people here…” Sarincha hissed.

“I thought about getting back at you or doing something dramatic, and it didn’t help that I could see you were pregnant. And alone. And just so…pitiful and forgetful…walking into things.”

Her eyes teared up and she nodded, “I was pitiful. I was a disaster. No wonder you didn’t try to mess with me.”

Anyo recounted, “You were falling over things…”

“Yup. Outside of the flat I rented, I was always tripping on the walkway…”

“You absolute…” Anyo kissed the side of her head, “Idiot.”

She sniffled.

Sato was speechless.

“I watched Sarincha for about a day before I decided to approach her peacefully, without any theatrics or accusations.” Anyo explained, “She wasn’t handling things well on her own…and I missed her.”

A wobbly smile spread on the woman’s face, tears clinging to the corners of her eyes. Sarincha was vacillating between sassy confidence and teary klutziness that were likely triggered by wild hormones. Not that Sato really meant to look, but he could see the roundness of her belly beneath her coat.

“We worked it out.” Anyo summed up, “Having and raising this child doesn’t make me any less worried about what could happen—”

Sarincha interjected, “There is no curse on your family. We’re going to be fine—”
“We are quite old to be first time parents.” Anyo went on, “But we can make the most of it. We moved to the Hidden Tide Village and enlisted in the standard forces there. We won’t be able to serve Hidden Grass or Kaido anymore, but employment opportunities are much better in Tide, and we are closer to Migawari-san for visits. I’m sure he’ll want to see his grandchild when he can.”

Sato waffled on the name, “Migawari-?”

“Eto Migawari is my father.” Sarincha calmed down again, cramming the last of the appetizer snacks into her mouth, “I’m pretty excited to live closer to him! I bet he’s bored in retirement. We let him know that we moved. Oh! And Sato, you and your wife can come visit us there and play on the beach!”

“—! That’d be amazing! Be careful offering things like that to us, or we’ll be hanging out with you every weekend.” Sato’s excitement was making him shimmy.

“Your Hokage is never going to let you loaf off that much.” Anyo supposed, glancing at Tsunade as she absconded with an entire bottle of sake for herself from the bar.

“Come on! Introduce me-!” Sarincha pushed Sato towards Tama and her mother’s family, with Anyo tagging along.

Interactions began to incorporate food and many took seats throughout the garden as sunlight dwindled. Since Iruka wasn’t sure where to go after interviewing every last former Academy student of his, he dropped down onto a bench across from Gai, Kakashi, and Tenzo at a picnic table. Iruka’s assessment was, “This is just the weirdest thing…”

“I’ve seen weirder.” Kakashi refrained from giving an example.

“No, well, I mean it’s beautiful! It’s that these were all the knucklehead kids I had to train at the Academy— it’s weird to move past my memories and see them as adults!” Iruka clarified, “Sato and Tama are married now, though it felt like I just saw them graduate…and all of my former pupils here, looking so mature and strong…”

“Yes, yes, even in the few years since I first met my Genin students…they grew up right before my eyes!” Gai agreed, “What a splendid privilege it is to witness such a thing!”

“It is a privilege.” Iruka agreed with a far-off look on his face.

“You’re all so sentimental.” Kakashi was amused. He’d long since stopped eating and had pulled his mask up again. Beside him, Tenzo was slowly sipping Shochu over ice, remarkable in his restraint so that he could work the next day without a hangover.

After chatting pleasantly with Gai for several minutes, Iruka turned his attention to Tenzo and said, “I know we’ve met somewhere before—”

Tenzo sat up straighter and totally ignored Kakashi’s merry eyes, clearly thrilled that his boyfriend had to jump through social hoops like everyone else, “Ah, I’m Tenzo.” He extended a hand to Iruka who shook with him, nodding and smiling.

“Right! Yes, it’s sad to say, but I remember seeing you at the Sandaime’s funeral. I remember.” Iruka recalled, “Umino Iruka! I’ve been talking to everyone who now trains my former students, and I didn’t mean to be rude—”

“No, no, it’s not like I initiated conversation either.” Tenzo waved it off.
Kakashi’s attention darted between the two, and Gai was also trying to be nondescript as he watched the interaction. Gai had pounded back two full bowls of stew just so he wouldn’t say anything. He was privy to Kakashi’s past and present in the way most close friends were. He recalled an occasion years ago when Kakashi had spoken to Iruka to get a feel for what graduating Academy students were like, since the Third had forced him to mentor a Genin team. Iruka had given Kakashi the scoop. And a date, once, per Kakashi’s curiosity. It hadn’t gone anywhere as far as Gai knew.

“How do you know Sato-kun?” Iruka asked innocently.

“I…know him because of Kakashi.” Tenzo’s smile was small, “We were in the ANBU together, back in the day.”

“Oh, I see!” Iruka understood, “That’s excellent that you stay in touch—” He didn’t hear Kakashi’s humorous pffft, “—and get to see new generations come up like this! You should see some of the rising talent in the Academy now. One in particular could make for one of the best shinobi this village has ever seen…” Suddenly, Iruka’s face fell, “Or, maybe not.”

Tenzo canted his head, “Or not? What kind of trainee?”

“It’s a sensitive subject.” Iruka lowered his voice, “I haven’t really spoken outside of faculty about it.”

Even Gai and Kakashi leaned in, telling him to spill.

Huddled like idiots, sipping alcohol and munching food, Iruka spilled the beans to the gathered Jounin, “I’ve never seen someone score so high on aptitude tests. Not even Shikamaru-kun. It’s unsettling, actually…” Iruka sipped from his drinking glass and said, “I don’t know who’d be up to the task of training this student…or if she’ll even graduate. She excels at practicals and has flawless grades, though I feel some doubt over how she interacts with other students. There are many psychological issues that make me wonder what Council officials and the Hokage will think…if it’s better to continue evaluations, or deny her entry into the standard forces.”

“Deny entry?” Gai was baffled, “Does this child pose a threat?”

Iruka shook his head, “That’s just it. It’s too early to tell. We wrapped up entrance exams for our newest students and have begun the school year. Other Chunin Sensei have agreed that we can’t judge so soon. In the past no one had been able to foresee…” He hesitated, “What kind of future Uchiha Itachi would have…”

Collectively, their stomachs sank after hearing such a comparison.

“Is this student from a prominent clan?” Kakashi asked, “If so, a clan can give better guidance. Well, that’s how it’s supposed to work.” He wouldn’t cite any of the Uchiha clan’s failures.

“About that…” Iruka rubbed his cheek, “Her clan has not acknowledged her. This is the eldest of the three illegitimate children that Yamanaka Inoshishi had. You heard about that, right?”

“Inoshishi-san passed away in the attack on the Tide Village.” Gai recalled.

“Yes, and that’s created further issues. His clan never accepted these children, since he refused to wed their mother, but he always provided for the children. A good man, but stuck in a bad romance.” Iruka summed it up, “His partner hounded Inoshishi up until his death, wanting to be married and have her children legitimized. But now she and those kids have no leg to stand on with him gone, and the Yamanaka clan continues to ignore them. There won’t be any guidance. And the children are growing up in a highly dysfunctional, single-parent home while training at the Academy.
Or at least, the eldest is in training. I’m not so sure about the others…”

“This is kind of scandalous.” Tenzo murmured, “Can you disclose the name of the student?”

“I’m worried you’ll repeat it and then this’ll be a village-wide rumor.” Iruka admitted.

Kakashi raised three fingers for an honor-code swear, “We promise we won’t. It’ll be kept in confidence, and maybe we can help somehow.”

Iruka sighed before relenting, “Arimachi Isae. This student could be the smartest ninja in the making this village has ever seen, however…some test results suggest she exhibits Avoidant Personality Disorder, Obsessive-Compulsive Personality Disorder, Depression, and is generally withdrawn from most other people, especially other children. Some health tests found she is a tetrachromat, which I didn’t even know someone could be. There haven’t been any signs of Sociopathy, but teachers have been wary. It isn’t right to assume a child who’s been through so much could go rotten…but we’ve seen such patterns before…”

“Be careful.” Kakashi recommended, “If this one turns south, it’ll be a fast and dangerous turn.”

Iruka nodded, “Of course. We’ve been trying to work out some educational accommodations for Isae with her mother, Arimachi Masumi, who is…uncooperative to say the least. Sensei at the school routinely make more time for this student, and even arrange for extracurricular activities which seem to keep Isae stable.”

“What sort of extracurriculars?” Tenzo wondered.

“Well, anything really. Any department that will tolerate a seven-year-old. Lately the Civil Department and other Administrative branches have put her to work with small tasks. It gets her out into the community, which is what we want. Contact and social exchange.” Iruka explained, “But really, I don’t know the way forward. I suppose by Final Examinations this year we can prepare a strategy and educational path…but after that?” He shrugged with a lost expression.

Gai asked astutely, “Has this been brought to the Hokage’s attention?”

“Once, over a month ago. Tsunade-sama hasn’t revisited this matter because of other incidents requiring her attention,” Iruka looked over his shoulder to where the Hokage was sitting, “And I’m not dumb enough to bother her with this at a wedding reception! She’d knock my head off.”

“Go ahead and try it.” Kakashi could imagine the brouhaha that would follow.

“Heck no.” Iruka hissed.

“I wonder if Commander Netsuke and my unit are aware of such a child? If anything escalates, Black Ops…er…I hope Black Ops wouldn’t be needed.” Tenzo sipped his drink again, “But they should know.”

Glumly, Iruka nodded along to that.

“It’ll probably be fine.” Kakashi guessed, “The key is to not let this student be an outcast, or allow the student to force others away. Neither was allowed to happen to me, for example. Look how I turned out.”

“Picture perfect.” Tenzo snarked. To challenge that assessment, Kakashi moved to pull up his open copy of Icha Icha Paradise from beneath the picnic table, and Tenzo wrestled the offending hand back to its hiding place.
“Oh look.” Kakashi said, pointing to the garden entrance to blatantly distract Tenzo.

“Put that away, you’re at your nephew’s—! Reception. Whatever this is.” Tenzo groused.

“No really, look. Aren’t you responsible for Sai?” Kakashi gestured with his head.

Tenzo was surprised to see Sai wander in, dressed as plainly as ever, taking in the sights and moving counterclockwise around the space.

Tenzo sighed, “I’ll bring him over here so he can’t cause trouble.”

Thank goodness he had done so, because Sai nearly honed in on Ino’s location on the far side of the garden. Courtesy of Noé’s DJ-ing expertise, the Grass ninja piped music throughout the yard’s stereo speakers, and tempted quite a few guests to sway and step away from tables.

Having taken a leaf out of the Han-fashion book, Sakura was dressed in red and pink silk cheongsam, the crook of her arm linked with Hinata’s as they turned in lazy circles to nostalgic, crooning music. Likewise, Hinata was dressed in kimono for the occasion, resplendent in white, violet, and lavender, her cheeks pink from a few sips of wine she’d taken from her gal-pal’s cup.

“Good thing it’s not too cold out. Garden parties are so nice…” Sakura spoke in one long sigh, “I’d like to get married and have a party outside too, but, you know, in summertime.”

Hinata nodded tipsily, “Mm-hmm, summertime.”

“Lots of flowers.”

“You should get married in the garden I keep at the Hyuga estate.” Hinata imagined.

“Can I do that?” Sakura chirped in amazement, “Wouldn’t I need special permission?”

“I give you my permission.” Hinata was giggling with her eyes shut.

“…I don’t know if that’s enough, Hinata-chan.” Sakura began to grin, “Should we get another glass of wine to split?”

“No, no…I don’t want to be scolded by Father when I go home.”

“Fine, you’re right. We’ve had enough. Thanks for dancing with me.” She squeezed her friend’s arm, “I wish Gaara-kun could have made it here. I think he would’ve liked this.”

Hinata agreed, “Of course! He would’ve danced with you too.”

“Pff! Gaara never dances.”

“Well, we’re just spinning and it’s quite easy. He could’ve done that.”

Sakura had a loud laugh as she pictured it. Buzzed twirling was a step below beginner level, so even Gaara couldn’t decline such a dance. As the music began to take on a more up-tempo beat, neither girl attempted to modify their slow orbit that was mostly conversation.

Hinata noticed Sato bring Tama into open space, “Ah, there they go. I was wondering when they would dance.”

“The bride and groom always have to greet each of their guests. It takes a while!” Sakura said as their eyes tracked the newly-married couple that seemed to be, finally, at ease, and for the moment free of judgement that would saddle them with guilt and otherwise render this occasion pointless.

But, Sakura’s brain echoed that thought, this won’t last. By tomorrow, the naysayers would be whispering, and Tama would be confronted by the people who casually intersected with her life for work, missions, and leisure, who would ask with a smile if she had lost her goddamned mind.

And Tama would only be able to smile back. Sakura’s heart twisted as she imagined what was to come. Small, trite volleys of shame disguised as concern and sociability.

Nearby, Sato led Tama in a beautiful box-step to a rosy tune, their minds and movements synchronized as they ignored everything else. Sakura and Hinata were mildly shocked to see Tenten appear among a handful of other accompanied dancers, as she had accepted Aota’s invitation after chit-chat. Neji remained seated on a bench, impassive, and Lee may or may not have been acting on instructions when he promptly cut in to steal Tenten back with a polite excuse me. The Grass ninja stood there with a vexed look on his face.

“Onee-san’s dress looks so nice! Auntie Kayato made it for her.” Hinata reported on Tenten’s attire while people-watching with Sakura.

“Really? So that’s new? I like the watercolor designs.” Sakura noted that, per usual, Tenten was also wearing cheongsam but with a different color scheme. Blue and black hues—dark and floral, lacking her preferred reds and maroons. Rotating, Sakura and Hinata migrated towards Lee and Tenten and were summarily greeted.

“You two are having fun.” Tenten smiled at them, “Did you see Aota try his luck again? I didn’t want to be rude and tell him to buzz off.”

“We are and we saw.” Sakura said as she and Hinata switched arms, slowly whirling in the opposite direction.

Lee lifted his hand to make his teammate spin in a turn, “Perhaps you should have been more direct with Yanagisawa-san, Tenten. Neji seemed a little upset…”

“He’s just sitting there! He’s not upset. And he won’t dance, so…” Tenten shrugged, “Neji knows he’s my number one.”

That earned a heartfelt sigh from Hinata. When Kiba turned up to borrow Sakura for a dance and gossip in hushed voice about what he’d overheard veteran Jounin discussing, Hinata ventured over to her cousin and plopped down beside him on the bench. Neji was picking at a plate of grilled herring, and Hinata took a stick for herself when he offered it.

“You know you can dance with Onee-san if you want to.” Hinata reminded him, “No one will care if your dancing is good or not.”

Neji gave her a sidelong look, “Maybe they won’t. Though I said no before, when Tenten asked. She might think it strange if I changed my mind.”

“Change your mind, Onii-san!” Hinata encouraged. She took a big bite of fish and scrunched her eyes, shimmying her shoulders to nudge him and maybe get him to his feet. Neji chuckled softly. Hinata was more gregarious with a drink in her. He took another sip from his own wine glass, and hoped it would dull his reluctance to participate in an activity he had snubbed for most of his life.

“Naruto-kun’s dancing was never very good, but I was always happy that he chose me…” Hinata reminisced about days gone by at festivals, “It’ll be wonderful to dance with him again. We talked about that in our letters. Whatever chance we can get…” Hinata sighed, took a bite, chewed some
“When he comes back, you should speak to Hiashi-sama.” Neji advised, “To make your intentions known.” It was a sort of unspoken fact that Hinata had eyes for no one but Naruto, and she would endeavor to make him the most central part of her life. Neji knew it and had known it for a long time.

“Father seems to be aware of our intentions even before we say anything. I know…it won’t be easy…” Hinata set a finished skewer down on a refuse plate, “I think Father would be understanding, but our Elders…are almost never understanding. Naruto-kun has always been treated differently by people in the village. That won’t be overlooked.”

“Certainly not. To overcome, you need to play our Elders’ games.” Neji nibbled fish and added, “However I can advocate for you, I will.”

She shook her head, “I don’t want you to get into trouble, Neji-niisan.”

“The only way things will change is if we invite trouble. Without risk, the doctrine of the Hyuga clan is going to be what it always was generations before. Elders hope to prevent mishaps and loss by that method, but when they do, nothing can ever be improved upon.” He was feeling a little philosophical, “There will be friction. If Naruto’s companionship is something that Elders object to, we have every reason in the world to dispute that.”

“Onii-san…”

“You deserve to be happy.”

“Onee-san!” Hinata pressed her sleeves beneath her eyes, resolute in not shedding tears, happy though they may be.

“Let’s not drink anymore.” Neji decided, setting his empty glass down. They were both way more emotional and outspoken than usual.

“Let’s not. Come on.” Hinata rose and tugged him by his hand, “I will teach you how to dance.”

“Hinata-sama…” Neji was still in no mood to attempt it.

“No more stalling. You need to learn, so you can dance with Onee-san! You’ll be with her all your life and she likes to dance.” Hinata reasoned, “She needs to dance with her number one!”

Neji’s ears reddened after hearing such a declaration, yanked upright by his determined cousin who then tugged him to the patio area where other attendees drifted. Hinata found that Neji, though a bit rigid and not very enthusiastic, was quick to learn steps. It was more a matter of teaching him how to relax. The lesson did not garner much attention as more gathered to dance, and Kurenai passed by in Asuma’s arms, signaling with a wink her approval of Hinata educating Neji in the social arts.

Dancing and drinking prevailed for the rest of the night. Laughter peaked when Tsunade agreed to share a brief dance with Hatake Sato, who was a good sport about the many times she stepped on his feet and turned in the opposite direction or without prompt. She was intoxicated, but happy. Meanwhile, Kakashi danced with Tama as if to substitute for her father, though neither mentioned the significance of it. She was surprised by her teacher’s aptitude, complimenting him before he departed to drag Tenzo to his feet for a spin.

And as Hinata had wished, eventually she had gotten Neji calm enough to realize his skill with movement was innate, and dancing was merely a set of patterns he could repeat. Tenten mouthed a thank you to Hinata before turning back to Neji, trying not to give away her explosive satisfaction as his hand found the small of her back and pulled her close. She was probably smiling too much. She’d asked Lee to keep Gai-sensei occupied so he wouldn’t fawn over them, though it had only amounted to Gai and Lee tearfully rejoicing on the sidelines in their general direction. Somehow Neji ignored it.

One by one, Tama and Sato’s peers trickled back to seating to recuperate, returning to drinks and snacks. Several had accumulated around the table where Ino, Shikamaru, and Chouji sat, though Hinata and Shino drifted away as conversation began to take on a negative tone. Lee continued to keep Gai company as they socialized with Kakashi’s table, and Tama and Sato hardly ever departed from the dance-floor. Shikamaru’s drooping eyes were trained on the couple.

“Ridiculous.” He muttered.

“What did I say before?” Ino tried to regulate her boyfriend’s drunken temper.

“You said not to say anything unkind, or in other words, just not to speak my mind.” Shikamaru groused.

She’d already taken away his wine glass and poured it out on the ground, watching as he leaned on the table top, his cheek resting in the palm of his hand, plainly dissatisfied with the event. Or, how alcohol had made him perceive the event.

“Just for tonight, that’s what you have to do. Don’t speak your mind. If it makes you feel any better I'm not either.” Ino granted him, “You can’t be at a wedding reception and criticize the guests of honor. This might be the one day they don’t have to deal with that.”

“Right, the one day they won’t have to. Because this is the most blatantly idiotic thing…and maybe it merits criticism?” Shikamaru ventured, stifling a hiccup, “Since Tama is fully aware of Sato’s indiscretion, like pretty much the entire village is, you’d think she’d know better than to marry the guy? He’s just going to let her down again.”

“Shikamaru.” Ino’s nostrils flared, “Stop. Talking.”

“Give it three months.” Shikamaru held up his free hand’s last three fingers.

“Shika, please. You had way too much to drink.” Chouji rubbed a circle on his best friend’s back, “You don’t mean any of this. It’s not for us to discuss. We—”

“Not for us to discuss? No one got that memo a month ago.” Shikamaru scoffed.

Ino held her forehead as if to suppress a headache, mumbling to Chouji, “I swear if he doesn’t stop —!”

“Hey!” Shikamaru’s attention was drawn to the next picnic table, where Sai was seated and vaguely paying attention to them, “Didn’t I tell you not to sit with us?”

“I’m not at your table anymore.” Sai pointed out, “I am now at a different table.”

“You are still within a meter of Ino, so it’s insufficient.” Shikamaru nearly bared his teeth, “What part of get lost is so hard for you to understand? You aren’t welcome to hang out with us. You’re an unwanted barnacle.”

Though he took a bite of a dessert pastry and said nothing, there was a hint of despondency on Sai’s face.
“Wow, for once Sai barely even says ten words to me and he’s still a social outcast? He was trying to talk to Chouji before!” Ino pounded her fist on the table, “What is with you, Shikamaru? Sai is allowed to hang out with us, even if I’m present. Get over yourself.”

He retorted quickly with a justification, “He has no respect for you.”

“Seems like you don’t either.” Her blue eyes were gleaming, furious.

Alarmed, Chouji rose from the bench and collected Sai (somewhat defeated-looking) to bring him around to kinder parts of the party. Chouji added to his teammates before leaving, “Shikamaru, I’m bringing you a pitcher of water and then you’re going to drink it. Then calm down or go home, alright? Be right back. Come on, Sai.”

“Tch.” Shikamaru wasn’t pleased to see his best friend to show compassion to the one trying to snatch Ino. He managed not to talk for almost a full minute, relaxing slightly when Ino scooped his hand from the table and rubbed it between hers, prodding accupoints.

“Don’t get so riled up.” Ino spoke to him quietly, “Please try to enjoy yourself.”

“It hasn’t been so easy.”

“Maybe because you haven’t really taken a good hard look at how hot your girlfriend is this evening,” Ino taunted pleasantly, “See this dress? I’m a modern goddess. Look at me, I could’ve come in a boring kimono-!”

“Ino,” He watched her from the corner of his eye, “I know. I just…can’t stand when he looks at you.”

“You really need to let that go. Sai is a non-factor.” Ino lifted a sprig of grapes from a bowl, popping one into her mouth and one into Shikamaru’s.

When Sakura happened by, Ino’s face beseeched her to detour and stop at the table. Sakura understood the nonverbal command and she sat down, “You two look kind of sloshed! How’s it going?”

Ino tried to maintain the cordial mood, “Pretty good for some sloshed people.”

“I’ve been better.” Shikamaru was still cradling his chin in his hand.

“Maybe you should call it quits soon.” Sakura advised, “Did you see me dancing? Sato danced with me! I laughed so hard when he let Lee dance with him…”

Chomping on grapes, Ino tried to not to laugh again and choke, “I saw that…”

“Hee hee, see they’re still at it?” Sakura grinned and pointed back over her shoulder, where Neji and Tenten rotated dreamily, “I can’t believe Hinata-chan set him to it! He’s pretty good, and you can see Tenten is just melting. She’s wanted to dance with him for so long—”

“Don’t even start with them.” Shikamaru rumbled.

Ino dropped grapes back into the bowl, “Don’t you start.”

“What?” Sakura asked faintly.

“Man…it’s one thing that Tama and Sato stuck to a bogus family oath and arranged marriage, but it’s probably worse seeing Tenten walk on eggshells for the Hyuga clan just so they can end up telling “Don’t. Not again.” Ino’s congeniality was replaced by ferocious caution, “Wait for Chouji to bring you that water. Then you chug it, got that? Stop picking on people.”

Sakura’s concern was triggered, “What do you mean about Tenten? It’s obvious that Neji—”

“It’s not gonna last.” Shikamaru gruffed, laying his hands flat on the table, “Anyone can see it. Neji’s got no say in it, even if he thinks he does. Her background is the issue.”

Sakura tried to process Shikamaru’s nonsense while Ino quietly uttered threats, reminding him of where he was, and at last Chouji returned with a pitcher of water and several drinking glasses. He noticed Ino’s distress and asked, “Should I ask Asuma-sensei for help?”

“Yeah, just for a minute. Just to talk him down.” Ino requested.

Chouji faithfully navigated through the garden again and Sakura remained at the table, pouring glasses of water for everyone. She was wondering to herself out loud what could possibly thwart Tenten’s position in the Hyuga clan, “I don’t get it…”

“Did everyone forget? Tenten is related to Huo.” Shikamaru then promptly took a swig of water before Ino poured it forcibly down his throat.

A quiet fell over the table as the fact sunk in. Sakura could admit she had forgotten, and had never spared a thought that perhaps the Hyuga clan might disapprove of such an association. Huo had tried to kill his competitors during the Chunin Exam, Hinata included.

In a dramatically bad case of timing, Tenten departed from the dance-floor to help herself to water at the table her friends were seated at. Ino tried to signal to her to vacate, but Tenten did not pick up on it, still high on endorphins, “Mmm! Ah. I was so thirsty. What’s up guys?”

Before Sakura could come up with any kind of believable lie, Shikamaru point-blank asked Tenten, “Does the Hyuga clan know you’re related to Huo?”

The smile on Tenten’s face inched away and she instantly retreated into herself, absorbing the question as multitudinous thoughts burgeoned in her mind.

“Dammnit, Shikamaru.” Ino held her head again, “Can’t you restrain yourself for a little while? Drinking doesn’t excuse you— we’re going to hold you accountable for the things you say!”

Sakura touched Tenten’s arm in some show of bewildered support while the woman reeled.

Shikamaru kept talking, “What I say? Doesn’t do any harm. How about what you don’t say to your clan?” He directed it at Tenten, “Were you honest about it, or did you hide it from the Hyuga clan’s leadership? Huo’s a part of a fanatical group of mercenaries that have it out for you. There’s no way that the Hyuga elders will ever be comfortable with that.”

Sakura snapped back to herself, angered, “Shikamaru, shut up already!”

He didn’t, “You can’t simply ditch your identity. People can still die because of it. How would you feel if—?” Shikamaru sputtered; Tenten had tossed her glass of water in his eyes.

Face red with rage and humiliation, Tenten turned on her heel and stormed out of the garden.

“Oh for the love of fuck.” Ino popped up from the bench, her stress off the charts, “Did you really think you could say that kind of shit? I’m glad she doused you. Honestly, I’m glad!” She wrung out a part of her skirt that had gotten damp from the water-toss. Ino glanced around and hurried to a food table behind them in search of cloth napkins to dry her ass of a boyfriend.

None of this had escaped Neji’s notice from where he was speaking to Tenzo, keeping an eye on Tenten across the way. When he saw what she had done to Shikamaru, and how Tenten had immediately left without him, Neji was highly aware something was amiss. He excused himself to confront the witnesses, beginning with Shikamaru.

“Why did Tenten leave?” Neji asked.

Still dripping, Shikamaru now found this domino-effect hilarious, “She doesn’t like the truth, I guess.”

“You need to stop.” Sakura warned, vainly attempting to silence Shikamaru, “Neji, ignore him. He’s plastered and saying cruel stuff about everyone.”

Eyebrows elevated, Neji was taken aback, “Why would you say something cruel to Tenten?”

“Why do you think? She could get you and your clan killed.” He said it so nonchalantly, “And she’s trying not to think about it. The Chunin Exam was just the start. What happens when assholes like Huo come back? They nearly got Kakashi. If they look for her, she’ll be among your clan.”

“She will be safe.” Neji was unruffled on that front.

“Keep telling yourself that, Neji—”

“—Shikamaru!” Sakura considered putting him in a head lock, and waved at Ino to hurry up after she’d found napkins.

It was hard not to think about the struggle that Hinata had gone through in the final round of the Chunin Exam, or the fate that had befallen Hikune when he had encountered Koinyu. Neji had to view those incidents through the lens of experience, as awful situations to learn from, knowing they wouldn’t be so unprepared in the future. After all, Tenten was worth it. She had never asked to have a target be put on her back. She’d lived a humble, solitary life.

“So if it’s not unendurable to know that she’s a magnet for violence, then maybe you’re less thrilled about how she lied to your clan’s leadership?” Shikamaru supposed, “That can’t feel good. She wouldn’t have had a shot with you otherwise, if she’d been honest from the start.”

“You’re drunk and wasting your breath.” Neji observed.

“Wake up already. She’s a liar! Tenten lied.” Shikamaru ignored Sakura batting at him, but slowly acquiesced to moving as she pulled him up from the bench.

Neji’s eyes got sharp, “Tenten is not a liar.”

“She fooled your uncle, her adoptive parents, elders, you name it: I guarantee none of them know. That means it was a lie.”

Ino returned, putting a towel on Shikamaru’s head and attacked his face with a cloth napkin, “That’s enough. Shut your mouth and let’s get you out of here…”

By then, Neji was obviously seething. Sakura wondered if it was time to flag down Lee and Gai to assist, but, sadly, Shikamaru yanked the napkin from his face and prodded, “Did you want her to lie ―?” Then he was flat on the ground, struck in the face so lightning quick that Sakura would swear she hadn’t seen Neji punch him.

‘But he did, oh no, he did.’ Sakura wasn’t sure if there was any way to control Neji when he was angry and Tenten was absent. She craned her neck around to yelp for Hinata, trying to block Neji as he moved to circle around the table to scrape Shikamaru up so he could vacuum-wave him across the garden. But Neji did no such thing.

Beside them, Ino’s body cascaded to the ground and Shikamaru sat up, looking frantic, “Don’t! Don’t! It’s me! I’ve got him. I’m…so sorry about this.” Ino had to communicate through Shikamaru’s badly abused body and cope with his discomforts, “Sakura, please apologize to Sato and Tama for us, alright? I’ve got to get Shikamaru home.” She, through her Mind-Body Switch control of Shikamaru, then also apologized to Neji, “I’m sorry, Neji. He was out of line.”

Neji let go of a rattling breath before he nodded to her and left. Shikamaru (under Ino’s control) gathered Ino’s body into his arms, and Sakura, like a good friend, tucked Ino’s evening bag into the unmoving girl’s hands. Tears brimmed in Sakura’s eyes, “Ino…”

“I’ll be okay. I can handle this.” Ino/Shikamaru assured her, “Sorry you had to see that, Forehead…”

“Do you need help?”

“Not yet.” Ino/Shikamaru smiled somberly, “But find me tomorrow and ask me again. I think I’ll need you.” Carrying her own body like a helpless maiden, Ino puppeteered her uncouth man out of the reception and onto darkened streets to his home.

She didn’t look back to see Chouji, Lee, Sai, Shino, Hinata, Kiba, Sato, and Tama clustering around Sakura to figure out what the heck had happened. Ino marched on, relishing some silence and cold night air.

‘Are you even knocking around in here, Shikamaru? Can you hear me at all?’ Ino thought within the mind she had captured, ‘Say something. You were so talkative before.’

A long walk and many deep breaths later, Ino gently set her body down upon arriving at the Nara household, and released her control over Shikamaru. He swooned on his feet while Ino rose up with a miserable expression. Her hair was disheveled, mascara smudged around her left eye. One look at her jarred Shikamaru out of his foul state, and he wearily sat on the veranda of the house. His words caught up to him, recalling the hurt he had inflicted.

“You’re an anxious wreck.” Ino assessed, folding her arms, “Not a fun drunk.”

Shikamaru held his head in his hands, “I’m sorry—”

“Tell them that. I should’ve stopped you sooner. Silly me to think you’d stop when I asked you to.” Ino tapped her foot, “Thank God Sato and Tama didn’t hear you. But now what about Neji and Tenten? You stirred up some major shit with them.”

“-I know—”

“You’ve been this way since…” Ino trailed off.

His voice was so soft she nearly didn’t hear him, “There are a lot of reasons why you should like him better.”

“Sai?” Ino exhaled harshly, “You’re saying I like him better? Well, right now I do! He didn’t embarrass me in front of friends or make me drag him home!”

Shikamaru remained hunched over and did not say anything, stewing in his insecurity.

“I’ll try not to wake your parents, but heads up: I’m about to shout.” Ino inhaled, furious, “You insecure jackass. Coming after people you think have it bad—or are inferior! Shikamaru, how do you think you’ve made me feel? Like I’m an untrustworthy woman who’s going to cheat on you with the dimwit whose gestures I routinely ignore! Like my loyalty means nothing to you now and I can’t be relied on. That fries me. I am ground down. I love you, but you’ve made me feel like what I say and do don’t matter anymore.”

“Ino, it does matter. I’m the one who says and does shitty things—pretty much hacking apart my appeal, right? I know you’re exhausted with me—”

“Stop.” She sat down beside him, winding her arms around him mostly because she was tired and needed to lean on something, “I don’t want to say this again, so listen. Get the idea out of your head. Why do I put up with Sai? Because I ostracized someone once and it hurt that person badly. So now I’m more tolerant.” Ino let her head loll on his shoulder, “It’s unfair to make me defend myself over something I would never do. I chose you. I still do, even after your asshat-ing around.”

Shikamaru wrapped an arm around her and leaned into her, “—sorry. I get it.”

Ino yawned, “Ahh, I’ve got to go to bed. Alright now, make it up to me. Bring me home and tuck me in.”

She still planned to give him an earful for the next few blocks.

When Neji set foot on Hyuga clan property, he used the Byakugan to look ahead to see where Tenten had gone. Her movements were agitated on the first floor of the house, bustling through empty hallways, rubbing a wet washcloth on her face to remove makeup. Between the bathroom and her tiny closet of a room, she traveled like a trapped tiger, sometimes turning and hesitating, finally sealing the door shut behind her. Clearly she wanted to undress, but the zipper at the middle of her back was just out of her reach. She would struggle alone.

As he often did, Neji bounded up and through the porch door of the house to his room. He stripped off his tang suit jacket, tossed it on his desk, shucked the shoes from his feet as he moved to the door of the bedroom. Before he could get to the hallway, Tenten reappeared, having forsaken her claustrophobic room. She startled at the sight of him with a small jump, “—! I…thought you were still at the party…”

“I saw you leave.” Neji stepped aside to allow her entrance, sliding the door shut behind her, “Without you there, I had no reason to stay.”

“Oh…you could’ve stayed.” She moped and tried for her dress zipper again.

“We’re both tired.” He felt it was time to conclude the night.

Neji motioned for her to turn, which she did, and he slid the zipper down to free her. Tenten let out a long breath, making up her mind not return to her own quarters to change and sleep. She wiggled the cheongsam down and off her hips to step out of it. Neji seemed to have anticipated her decision and handed her a long tunic of his. Tenten thanked him with a mumble and slipped the garment over her head. She sat at the foot of the bed and watched as Neji ordered things, hung and smoothed the Hanfu they’d worn, undressed to change into his own sleep clothes.
Tenten watched in a daze. He’d never been more relaxed around her. Standing there briefly nude, in profile, before her eyes that stole seconds of that beauty before Neji dressed again. The intensity, the insatiable thirst that made her stare, that made her want to touch and squeeze and pin him down; to convey the things for so long she’d kept to herself… She’d become more acutely aware of this desire and its selfish undertones. Ah, she wanted him so much, but what would such want cost?

‘He must think I’m going to sleep here. It’s late, no one will see…and I hate my room. I…’ Heat crept at the rims of Tenten’s eyes, her throat getting tight as she thought, ‘I want to stay and feel safe…but I don’t know if I should anymore.’ The words spoken to her at the party were an infection, spreading dread all throughout her being.

“Tenten.” Neji got her attention again, pointing to the hairpins and baubles in her hair, “Take those out before you sleep.”

“…o-oh…” Sluggishly, Tenten slid hair ornaments out of the singular, braided chignon on her head. Her thoughts nearly stole away with her again, in a bid to distract her from the present moment.

“I know what Shikamaru said to you.” Neji told her.

Tenten’s hand stopped on a brass and crystal dragon pin, foisted back to reality. Neji added as he collected the pins she set down on the bedspread, “He didn’t get away with it.”

“There was no need to discipline him, Neji. He was drunk. Besides…” With a cracking voice, Tenten pulled the last hair ornament free, “Everything he said was right.”

Baffled, Neji took the pin she handed to him and hoped his face was conveying even a fraction of the confusion he felt. She shouldn’t agree with the man bad-mouthing her. She should be glad he was reprimanded and brought home. Tenten sat there, her hair unfurling in long waves down her back, her eyes downcast.

“I’ve known about all of those things he said…and what did I do? What measures did I take?” Tenten stared down at her cross-legged lap, “I tried to forget.”

“None of that is important. Shikamaru was a raving drunk.” Neji left the pile of ornaments on the desk, then crossed back to sink down on his bed.

“An observant, truthful drunk.” Her voice wobbled, “Unlike me.”

“Don’t take any of his comments to heart. You belong here.” Neji insisted.

Tenten shook her head weakly, “But I still don’t feel like I belong. They don’t let me feel that way.” Tenten stared down at her cross-legged lap, “I tried to forget.”

“None of that is important. Shikamaru was a raving drunk.” Neji left the pile of ornaments on the desk, then crossed back to sink down on his bed.

“An observant, truthful drunk.” Her voice wobbled, “Unlike me.”

“You belong here.” Neji insisted.

Tenten shook her head weakly, “But I still don’t feel like I belong. They don’t let me feel that way.” She meant the elders who only offered her scraps of consideration, seeing her as a means to an end, “I don’t fit in the Hyuga clan. Still independent and unrefined after the lessons. A laborer. How does that even—?”

Neji scooched closer, magnetically drawing her eyes up to his own; wide and pearlescent, “Remember that you are admired for those things. No one else can boast what you can, Tenten. You break the mold to make it into something better, and that is inspiration this clan needs.”

“Well they haven’t said that. I’m glad you think that, Neji, but what we think and do is wrong in the opinions of elders and that, that…that’s the least of it!” The sheen in her eyes was tempered with frustration, “I’m here as a convenience. A blemish on their record, but Elder Haburo said he’d make do with me being around. Let you vent sexual frustration—”
He scoffed at the venting explanation, “Whatever they really think— why should we care to know? It’s always twisted and intolerable. Hyuga elders are never satisfied with anyone. Don’t let that bother you. You are not just what they say you are, and you know that.” Neji reminded her with a tiny bit of ferocity, “Tenten, you are more. And so many things that I am not.”

Tenten’s fingers curled into the bedspread, closing in fists, “…so what?” She ignored Neji’s pained look, “What I am…is the worst part of all…”

Before he could think of something to say to retrieve her, Tenten went on, “You know…I’ll admit it. Going to that reception was like a stab in the gut for me. I’ve just…all day…been filled with envy and disgust. It’s embarrassing to see them together when their personal business is out there for all of the world to see. They’re insane to get married.” She was speaking about Sato and Tama, “So maybe they’re crazy, but that still takes courage. I’m too cowardly to do something like that. They might be…the two bravest people I know.”

Sitting with one leg folded, Neji sat there and listened to her. He didn’t know yet how to help Tenten, but with enough of an explanation he was bound to come up with something. For now, he needed her to talk.

“I know that I…intentionally…obfuscated who I am and what happened to my family.” She said quietly, “But I never meant any harm by it…”

Neji echoed gently, “No harm will be done.”

She shook her head again, “It’s already been done.” Tenten did not fuss when he raised a hand to stroke her cheek, the caress descending down her neck to her back. It didn’t do enough to calm her.

“I only ever set out to be…minimally noticed by you,” Tenten admitted in a cracking, soft laugh, “To be appreciated by you, Neji. That was what I allotted for my personal wishes, back then…I never…” She swallowed and said, “Expected to be loved. Or to have anything serious with you…it just didn’t seem possible.”

“I’m sorry that I ever made you doubt.” He continued his thoughtless touches, curling his body against hers, “I will not make you doubt again.”

“…I’ve had second thoughts.”

The precise statement that Neji never wanted to hear stilled him and made him nauseous. This wasn’t something he could deal with. By nature, it was something he would never accept.

“I didn’t plan much of a future for myself because I’d assumed I would be dead before long.” Tenten shared her morbid rationale, “Dintei Bi will come back. If my Dad, who was strong enough to be a Kage— and my Mom, who was also Black Ops— couldn’t stop these people from killing them…there’s nothing I can do. I’ll never be on their level. I don’t want you to see…the grisly conclusion…”

He tamped down on some anger that returned, sparked by her pessimism, and wrapped his arms around Tenten, “You are so grossly mistaken about that. It’d take all night to explain how. You have all the encouragement in the world for others, but did you save any for yourself? Tenten. You don’t have to accept that fate.”

“This burden that I inherited isn’t meant to be shared. Like Shikamaru said— it’ll get people killed. Make anyone close to me a target.” She rested her head on Neji’s shoulder as he held her, “I don’t want you to feel like you have to get involved when I’ve taken advantage of your love and your clan’s protection.”

“Well that’s too bad.” Neji’s tone was flinty, “No matter what you say, I will be involved. Expend whatever efforts are necessary to combat a group that is not just your problem. How can you expect so little of me?”

Choked up, Tenten squeezed her eyes shut, her fingers tugging wrinkles into the back of his shirt, “No…no…more than enough…you’ve done more than enough…”

“I wasn’t good for much when I was younger.” Neji conceded, “I’ll never return to that. I know I’ve improved, and that you are largely responsible for it. I want you to take a chance on me. However tall the odds may seem to you, face them with me. If that feels like a selfish thing to do…to stand against something together…then let it be. We can only do it once.”

She bent and rested her forehead against him, “A-Alright…but…” Tenten sniffed and cleared herself, “I still need to be honest with your clan. If I’m a danger to others because of Bi’s group, I have to say so—”

“Don’t.”

She went rigid, surprised by Neji’s demand. He squeezed her tighter.

“Don’t say anything about it.” Neji repeated.

Flabbergasted, Tenten sat back a little to see his face, where she saw true anxiety creeping into Neji’s expression, “Neji…I can’t keep up the deception. This clan is not perfect, but it means a lot to me…the people in it…” She gave him a pressing look, “I need to tell the truth to your uncle, and Hideyasu and Kayato, at least.”

“A noble thought, but if Elders are made aware—”

“If our Elders learn about it and cast me out or punish me, then that’s what I deserve.” Tenten was stubborn about justice, “But continuing to be dishonest is worse than that.”

“If you say nothing, I’ll always be able to help you. If they know then I—”

A disagreeing shake of her head, “No. If a single other person gets hurt or dies because I kept my mouth shut, don’t you dare tell me you’d be okay with that, Neji.”

After a long stare-down, Neji wilted. He wasn’t okay with it. Neither was he okay with Tenten potentially jeopardizing her position in the Hyuga clan.

Perhaps what he had said to Hinata earlier was coming back to bite him. His idea about “inviting trouble” in order to create change. It was much easier to talk about the idea than put it into practice himself. Nerves frayed, Neji keened over and pulled Tenten down with him. They shifted up until they reached pillows, pressed into one another, rearranging their arms for comfort.

“You shouldn’t say anything until Hideyasu gets back from Hidden Waterfall.” Neji’s voice was a low rumble, “Please. A few more days. Wait until he can be here to help.”

“Alright, alright. It’s fine, Neji.” Where his shirt rode up, Tenten’s fingertips traced along the span of his stomach and hip bone, “There’s no use in worrying.”

He exhaled, slowly surrendering to the weight of the day and what was ahead.
She pressed her lips to his and then whispered, “…thanks.”

“Mn.” He provided sleepy sound of accord with his eyes shut and adjusted the quilt.

Tenten knew very well that if she was dissatisfied with her shoebox habitation at the Hyuga estate, it was much wiser to cross town and sleep at her flat. Neji’s space was off-limits, even if he never indicated that was the case. If she were ever caught spending the night here, Tenten wasn’t exactly sure what the consequences would be, ‘No one noticed last time…but we shouldn’t keep pushing our luck. Especially now that I have to drop a truth bomb and face the possible fallout…’

Her hands became immune to sensibility and consequence, mapping the man beside her. A nail skimmed up the slope of his waist and along his ribcage; Neji twitched under the tickle and settled again. The situation might be bleak, but it was not lost on Tenten how heartfelt Neji had been while she fretted. For the whole evening, in fact, he’d devoted himself to her. The mere thought pooled heat in her belly, made her rub her thighs together.

She ought to leave him alone and let him rest. Ought to halt her hungry, wandering hands that searched for the person she might lose. It wasn’t good to do this here, where she could break a plethora of rules in one go, adding to her list of crimes. Chutes of moonlight streamed through the room’s window, cutting the dark, and Tenten wondered what Neji was thinking or if he was awake at all, lying beside her with his eyes shut. There was no way to know.

Each prod along his hip, and every nonsensical trail Tenten’s fingers tracked along his stomach; those touches contributed to the frenzy in Neji’s mind. He put up a good front, hoping to seem relaxed and reliable in the face of Tenten’s worries. He was still a bonfire of anger over Shikamaru’s careless words, of excitement for daring to dance, of terror in thinking Tenten may lose her place among the Hyuga clan. Those feelings alone would keep him from sleep, but when she touched him it was all too much.

Neji couldn’t keep still, couldn’t feign rest. He cracked his eyes open to slivers before mouthing her neck, looping his arms around Tenten’s back to pull her close. She uttered an Ah! of surprise and tipped her head back in offering, hands bunching in his top. His teeth pricked along her throat, then roved southward.

###

In a shuffle of frantic movement, Neji had slipped the tunic up and off of her, anchoring a hand on Tenten’s naked hip, pressing firebrand kisses down her chest— listening to her contain a moan in tiny, whimpering fragments. “Mn…hng! Oh, oh…” Her back arched off the bed, her hands fumbled with his clothing.

It was no use— Tenten’s hand-eye coordination was depleted by the time Neji rolled a pert nipple in his teeth, closing his lips around it to suck, using his free hand to dip two fingers into the wet space between her legs. He’d long since learned of the places where she longed to be touched, and now strove to master each pressure and motion.

And it was so much better to do this while it defied propriety, in his own space, on their own terms; even if Tenten still endeavored not to make a sound, her cries seemed to vibrate out through her eyes and expression. No one was going to tell him that she didn’t belong. That she had to go. Here was right where he would keep her and his bloodless brain could think of nothing else. Every touch Tenten raked down Neji’s flanks and back stoked him, distracting him with long, open-mouthed kisses before he descended again to her chest. Up and down and up again, migrating between sweet landmarks.
She batted his hand away from its clever work, muttering, attempting once more to divest him of his sleep clothes. This time Neji elevated himself to assist, and Tenten managed to slip his pants off; his unnecessary shirt following.

He heard the slap of his aching erection on her stomach, felt it already weeping from the tip. Neji exercised all the restraint he could, moaning softly against her mouth as he dragged his hand along the smooth vistas of her body. Tenten did not seem to need much more preparation as far as he could tell. She had eagerly angled her hips, drawing him closer with her legs as she cupped his face in her hands and kissed him, whispering, “Now, now…stop trying to be polite.”

A breathy acknowledgment, “-I didn’t ask before—”

“Ah? Well here I am asking,” She slicked herself against him, “I want— hng! Haaah…” Neji pushed into her with a single, fluid motion. With intentional, slow rolls of his hips, he was hyper-aware of her tight heat and the sounds Tenten made. He muffled her pitchy noises with kisses, lest the whole house be woken.

Neji kept rhythm with languid thrusts, aiming to be gentle and keep sound to a minimum. Though it was a slow and tender act, interspersed with soft croons and caresses, neither could shake the unspoken fear of what turbulence lay ahead. Trying to squash that feeling with closeness was no easy feat. He pushed himself as deep as her body could accommodate, relishing Tenten’s soft whimpers and her legs clenching around his waist. She was smooth warmth all over and within, searing him into oversensitivity. Her nails sunk into his back, walls clenching around him, lips sucking at the pulsepoint of Neji’s neck— he had to move; more, quicker, deeper.

Try as she might, Tenten could not quite get herself to the threshold of release. The environment was not ideal and she hadn’t done enough to steer herself down that avenue, but even so, grinding into Neji’s thrusts offered a symphony of pleasure that was almost entirely as good as crossing the finish line. He was a marvelous sight: wide shoulders bowed over her, gasping into their kiss, hands anchoring her as he pistoned faster into her body. Tenten kept her eyes on him while she burned with him, rolling her hips up to meet him again and again.

Her habit of kneading his ass in her hands, when she could get them free, seemed to be a tipping point of touch— his nerves couldn’t take any more input. Squeezing and pulling him close with her hands, planting kisses along Neji’s face and temples, her mouth curving up with satisfaction as he made a throaty, strangled sound when he finally let go, twitching and filling her. A few more erratic thrusts escaped him. The brief calm that followed as they held themselves like that, observing each other with some fleeting, transcendent understanding, let their heart rates drum back to a normal beat.

Neji realized out loud, apologetically, “You didn’t finish.”

“Does it look like I’m dissatisfied?” She rolled her hips, pleased with his low, keening whine, “I wanted that. Exactly that.”

Wrapping his arms around her more tightly, Neji gave a cue to move, and Tenten hooked a leg around him so they could shift to their sides. He stayed inside of her since she gave no indication he was unwelcome to, enjoying the intimacy for a while. Tenten folded her arms up, rubbing the pads of her thumbs against Neji’s cheeks while watching his eyes droop, his whole face relaxed. He wouldn’t let go. She acclimated to the firm hold, tucked beside him, and fell asleep.

###

In the dark of the morning, only a short time before dawn, Tenten opened her eyes and shut them. Then she cracked them open again, only to look upon Neji’s sleeping face. Ah, she thought, what a perfect person to make mistakes with. No matter what, some internal voice reasoned, he was worth all the nonsense.

Blissful in her groggy state, Tenten drifted off again.

What registered when she next woke, as sunlight finally glinted into the room, was the depression in the bed beside her where Neji was seated. He carded his fingers through her unbound hair, gently raking his nails along her scalp. “Nnnnnh…aaah.” Tenten’s vocalization was not completely voluntarily, but positive according to her boyfriend’s ears.

“It’s 6:00.” He said, and she could hear the smile in his voice.

“No.” Tenten was still unprepared to open her eyes again.

“No, what?” Neji was amused.

“It’s sacrilege to interfere with…how comfortable I am.” She declared, adding, “Keep scratching. Feels good.”

“You can’t stay in bed. The rest of the clan rises at this time and may spot you in here.”

Tenten opened one, bleary eye, “Erg. You’re dressed already?”

“Yes. I agreed to train with Lee and Shifu. Then Gai asked us to join him at our training ground later in the morning.”

“It’s too early for all of that.” Tenten groused.

“You always wake up at this time, sometimes earlier.”

“And I don’t always get fucked so well, hmph. Let me sleep.”

He was a bit rattled by her crudeness, hand stilling in her hair, “We shouldn’t have…” Neji sighed, then said, “Was it good for you?”

“Extremely.” Smiling, Tenten opened both of her eyes.

He couldn’t help but smile back, “Ah.”

“I didn’t think you’d be such a rebel.” She teased.

“It can’t be avoided anymore. You bring it out in me.”

Tenten relished the last few seconds of her head rub before Neji took his hand away, bending to peck her forehead and face.

“Wake up now, or at least return to your room if you need more rest. Do you want me to bring you —?”

“No, no, Neji. You don’t have to keep carrying me all around this house. I can get there on my own.” Tenten gradually pushed herself up into a sitting position.

He stole a full-on kiss from her and then advised, “Alright. Act casual. I should be back shortly after noon, and we can expect to be assigned a mission later…if the Hokage is functioning today.”

“Hey! Have a little faith in Tsunade-sama.” She was chortling at the thought of seeing how bedraggled the Hokage would look after drinking at Sato’s reception.

With another parting kiss, Neji stood and retrieved a few weapon holsters and Mo-Ye from its place in his wall arsenal, then stepped lightly out of the porch door of the bedroom. Off he went.

With a soft groan, Tenten rubbed her face in her hands and struggled to her feet. Oh, oh, oh. She was so pleasantly sore. Memories from the night before came back to her, and she squared herself with the fact that she needed to maintain a holding pattern until Fujita and Hideyasu returned from Hidden Waterfall.

Fine. Just another puzzle to work through, like the many that had come before it. Tenten pilfered a tunic and pair of pants from Neji’s wardrobe to put on, poked her head out of the door to look up and down the corridor, and set out when she found it empty. She scampered back to her room without incident, and changed into her own attire with sluggish movements, ‘Hideyasu and Kayato most likely won’t be upset when I explain…and I don’t think Neji’s uncle will be either…’

Huh, there was a thought. Kayato ought to be home, and she was the preeminent, most level-headed mother figure in Tenten’s life currently. Why not run this I’m-a-target-of-rogue-assassin-cell business by her in the privacy of Kayato’s work room and get some practical advice?

With her internal compass pointing in that direction, Tenten ambled through the east wing of the house and found Kayato’s studio empty. She poked around, finding an open planner on a desk with the day’s date circled, and note that read: Meet client for discussion 6:30am

“Shoot. Why is everyone up so early around here?” Tenten tapped her foot, “I should just…go to the forge and catch up on some weapon orders. I can do that until noon, then regroup with my team…”

Oh. Early morning. Her stomach did a flip. If no one else was around, she could be sure that the Main House courtyard would be reserved for Hiashi as he routinely did warm-ups on his own, and very occasionally, sometimes accompanied by his daughters. Tenten had been around long enough to memorize the timetable.

‘Would it pay to tell him first, since Hideyasu and Kayato aren’t around? I know Neji said to wait, but this is eating at me!’ She tipped her head back, stewing in her thoughts, ‘Hiashi-sama isn’t going to take it as well…probably. But he won’t take it horribly. He’s never been rageful or acted thoughtlessly as far as I’ve seen.’ As a leader of one of the most prestigious clans in Konoha, Hyuga Hiashi couldn’t afford to rashly act in anger. When it came to what repercussions she could expect upon admitting her association, Tenten could not predict much.

Nevertheless, she marched through the house and arrived at the central courtyard, sliding a door aside to discover it was unoccupied. ‘Huh. It’s either here or the tea room, so I guess he’s in the tea room…’ Tenten backtracked into the house, arriving at the tea room that was most often used for the Main Family to take meals in. She knocked once on the door frame and received a soft bid to enter.

“Good morning, I…” Tenten paused as she slid the door open and discovered she was not looking at Hiashi, “Wanted to speak to…” She trailed off and gulped, discovering Elder Haburo and the younger Elder Hichida seated at the tea table. Her lips sealed shut.

“Lady Tenten.” Hichida acknowledged her, “Whom do you wish to speak with?”

“With…Hiashi-sama…I see he isn’t here.”

“He is having a discussion in the Branch House, at the moment.” Hichida noted.

Tenten shook her head, “It isn’t urgent.”
“If it needs to be said to the Head of this clan, it bears some importance.” Haburo supposed, “Enter.”

Tenten lingered in the doorway, “I really don’t mean to impose…”

“Rude girl! The Great Elder gave you a command and you just stand there?” Hichida sniffed, “How lacking in etiquette. You haven’t been taught nearly enough. Come in, don’t dally!”

Surrendering to the order, Tenten stepped into the room and sealed the door, fighting the melting sensation that dripped dread from her brow and downward. She took a poised seat at the table across from Haburo, perpendicular to Hichida. Deep breaths siphoned through her nose.

“What did you wish to speak to Hiashi about?” Haburo was, unfortunately, very direct.

“Just a…matter that…wasn’t brought up at my introduction…” How could she word it? Bend it? She had to come up with something fast.

“A matter? Of what sort?” Hichida asked before blowing the steam from his tea cup.

(Of…) Her heart stuttered, realizing that if she spoke any untruths she would only make things worse, “Of my lineage.”

“Why would that be relevant?” Haburo was unimpressed, “Your previous ancestry is of no concern, now that you are a child of the Main House. Hiashi judged well enough, and Hideyasu had no misgivings about your origin.”

“That’s because I omitted something.” Tenten drew another shaky breath.

“What did you omit?” Haburo’s eyes narrowed slightly.

“I…” Her eyes bounced between Hichida at the end of the table, and Haburo, who did not seem to be in a state where she could catch him off-guard today.

“Speak, for Heaven’s sake.” Hichida clucked, pouring Tenten a cup of tea, “Here, to wet your lips. Drink some tea, young lady.”

She stared down at the tea cup in front of her. After a long pause, she raised her eyes and said, “I am related to Sasagainu Huo. He and I are descendants of the Main line of the Sasagainu clan, formerly of Iwagakure. It has long since been destroyed by Dintei Bihokokuni, its disaffected Cadet member and known criminal—”

“Bihokokuni?!” Hichida screeched, “Descendant? That crushed clan that was scattered? Stragglers came here during the war, I know. Eh! Oh, Haburo-sama, what do we—?”

Haburo held up a hand for silence, “Young lady. Sasagainu Huo nearly killed Hinata.”

“I know.”

“He escaped Hidden Leaf’s security forces to return to his crime syndicate.” Haburo also relayed some common intelligence of Huo’s last known whereabouts.

“I know.” Tenten repeated.

“And because of that, he can tell his leader, Bihokokuni, that you have been found. Is it right that Bi murdered most refugees of that clan? Surely his task is not finished.” Haburo quickly pieced it together, “How long have you been aware of this association? Were you aware prior to the Chunin Exam?”
Somehow she confirmed it in a steady voice, “I was aware.”

“And you disclosed this to Hiashi, upon his first meeting with you?” Haburo asked.

“I did not.”

Hichida slammed his hands on the tabletop, knocking his tea cup over, “Outrageous! What profound disrespect! What disregard!” Hichida was rattling with fury, making gurgling sounds as he tried to find words to capture the gravity of what he’d been told. He seemed even more perturbed that Tenten said nothing further.

Haburo gave his younger counterpart an annoyed look, “Hichida.”

“Great Elder! This was willful deception! A tactic to enter the Hyuga clan and avoid proper screening, perhaps to infiltrate and ruin us! Or use us as a shield!” Hichida extrapolated and ignored Tenten’s harried hand waving—no, no, no, the man went on, “Paramount impudence. Would we ever accept such a liability into our fold? Never! We have more than our share of peril to deal with as it is—!”

“Stop talking.” Haburo gruffed at Hichida. The other man went silent, a stricken expression on his face.

“What peril?” Haburo sniffed, “If that rogue group dares set foot in this village, and somehow bypasses the manifold layers of defense erected against such threats…I imagine Black Ops and Jounin will intercept them first.”

“But if we—”

“Now that we are aware, disaster is far less likely.” Haburo noted airily, “When I was a young man, the Dingtei Sect had a more robust and trained following. Now they total less than a dozen members, and will only confront their targets by ambush. This is a distant threat. Trivial, compared to threats that exist within the confines of this village.” He gave Hichida a pointed look, and Tenten wondered to herself if he was indicating the tense surveillance situation with the Root Foundation.

“A distant threat though it may be, she should be expelled!” Hichida insisted, catching Tenten wincing from the corner of his eye, “We can’t mark her with the Caged Bird Seal, it would make her no more obedient. And I doubt Hideyasu would renounce his own child, adopted or not. Expel this thorn to mitigate the threat—”

“Hichida, if this young woman were cast out of the Hyuga clan, would it make a difference to that group?” Haburo employed straightforward logic, “The connection will never be undone in the eyes of criminals. As a punishment, banishment is much too clement.” Shadows fell on Haburo’s face as he glowered, “Discipline for lying to the Head of the Hyuga clan requires a much firmer hand. It is deceit that this clan will not tolerate.”

Though Tenten was rarely ever one to bumble or beg for mercy, the impulse bolted like lightning through her, making her bow her head, press her hands together to plead, “Please excuse my stupidity. I never meant for it to become a lie, at the time I—”

“I care not for your intent. If you truly cared about this clan, you’d have had the forethought to treat it with as much care as you would have your own kin and family. Instead, you’d bring harm to it for your own benefit.” Haburo had absolutely nailed her with the truth, “Do you wish to injure the Hyuga clan? Damage it with falsehood, selfishness, and violence? Hardships that this clan has struggled to suppress since time immemorial…”
“I don’t, I don’t…” She’d bowed in half, her forehead almost touching the table top.

The tea that Hichida spilled had spread wide on the chabudai, and before it could drip down to the floor mats he began to mop it up with a handkerchief, grumbling to himself.

“I will settle this.” Haburo informed Hichida, “Take your morning meal in here and do not trifle in this matter further, Hichida.”

“Yes, Great Elder.” He bowed his head slightly and threw a discreet scowl at Tenten.

When Tenten tried to take stock of where her heart had sunk to, somewhere down in the deepest pits of her stomach, she hardly registered rising at Haburo’s command and following him through the wings of the Main House. She couldn’t process it. Couldn’t imagine what punishment the old tyrant believed would be more fitting than casting her out. If he meant to keep her in the Hyuga clan, then surely he’d cooked up a way to make her miserable now.

Why was she compelled to confront things; injustice, in particular? She just could not keep a low profile the way Neji had asked her to. Now that she had botched her chance to make a more favorable case for herself, what was Neji going to think?

“This way.” Haburo slid a porch door open and ushered her onto the veranda that surrounded the Main courtyard.

Ah, how odd that she was back here so soon. Tenten scurried ahead of the elder, stepping down from the porch as directed. Beneath the shade of the roof’s eaves that blocked morning light, Haburo folded his arms behind his back and stared, a glare that bored straight through her. Tenten held still, anticipating physical or verbal attacks, her mind racing. She would not resist. If she had any chance at all of recovering from this, under no circumstance could she rebel against what was done to her.

If he beat her bloody in the courtyard, or directed someone else to…

“What are you thinking so hard for?” Haburo interrupted Tenten’s wild contemplation, “This won’t take long. I don’t have the strength or patience to beat you. If that’s what you were expecting? In my younger years, maybe…” He circled around her, moving toward the house again, “Wait here. If you move an inch, you will regret it.”

She didn’t turn to watch him re-enter the house, her back facing the door she’d come from. Tenten heaved dry, ragged breaths. If she were lucky, perhaps Hinata or Hiashi would come along and ask what the matter was— intervene, somehow. Surely her offense would be forgiven if they had a say, but, Tenten reminded herself, Haburo almost never wanted to give them a say in anything. She’d stuck her head in the mouth of a lion and thought she could make the best of it. What had she expected would happen?

Something inside had told her to do it. A funny, wispy tickle; a tendril running from her heart to her stomach— some unknowable halation of confidence that she’d ignored for most of her life. Even in this uncharted territory, Tenten entrusted her next steps to the small warmth inside that her father had always called attention to. ‘Pff. Dad and his philosophical sayings…is that what’s going to get me through this?’ He’d had a million proverbs, back when she was an Academy student. One such favorite being the words of a fairytale, Taoist prince who surmounted great hardships, asserting: Body in the abyss, but heart in paradise.

In other words, her conscience could be clear. Though a mess had been made of her surroundings, she could at least take refuge in righteousness and know she hadn’t compromised her morals.
Returning footsteps caught her attention, and Tenten’s meager trappings of hope flagged at the sight of Haburo returning with three Branch House members. Oh. Maybe this was intended to be a beating.

What was worse, she recognized these people since she had grown acquainted with many members of the Hyuga clan. The youngest, a nine-year-old girl, Hyuga Nene— was the picture of innocence and good behavior, blinking rapidly in confusion. Beside her stood Nyozeka, a year younger than Tenten, looking strong and sure; Aunt Hizome’s firstborn son and thus an adopted cousin of Tenten through Hideyasu. To their left was Takuma, the eldest, a full-fledged adult, who before anyone else, seemed to have realized what was going to happen before Haburo explained. Takuma’s face fell, his eyes meeting Tenten’s.

“You’ve no regard for harming the Hyuga clan, young lady.” Haburo told Tenten, “And so I will make you see, help you acknowledge what pain you can inflict. You’ve led a soft life so far. It’s time to grow up and witness suffering, the same suffering you should strive to prevent at all costs.” He demonstrated a hand sign that had been taught to Tenten months ago, reminding her how to subjugate anyone with the Caged Bird Seal.

“Choose one. Better this than one of those assassins running them through with a sword. This pain will only be temporary— unlike what you could have wrought.” Haburo stood beside Tenten and crossed his arms behind his back again, “Then you will be the picture of truth and fealty. As a member of the Main House, after all, this is your duty. If you or any member of this clan steps a toe out of line, fit to throw us into chaos, then you must be able to correct such conduct.”

He didn’t want to hurt her. Haburo wanted her to hurt them.

Heart accelerating, nearly stampeding plumb out of her chest, Tenten could hardly draw breath. This was unthinkable. This was the precise thing Neji would not forgive. He never wanted any Branch member to be subjected to such pain and humiliation again. If she complied with what Haburo was demanding, she would betray Neji’s most profound wish.

Not a single Branch member made a sound. Tragically, this treatment was nothing new to them. Though they did not have the full context of what was going on, it was plain to see that Tenten was being indoctrinated in order to meet Main House standards.

“Choose.” Haburo repeated the word.

Tenten weakly shook her head, “I can’t…”

“Cannot decide—?” Haburo’s frown deepened.

Nene was obviously terrified. She’d never had her Cursed Seal activated before, and looked helplessly at Tenten, then to Nyozeka and Takuma. Nyozeka gave her back a small pat, not permitted to speak, but hoping to ease her nerves.

Breaking protocol, Takuma spoke up, “Great Elder…”

“Silence.” Haburo didn’t want to hear it.

“Please, I wish to volunteer. I offer my service to the Main House for whatever purpose it requires. Nyozeka-kun and Nene-chan—”

Nyozeka was hissing under his breath, “-don’t be stupid!”

Takuma kept speaking, “- they have many duties to fulfill today, and I do not. Allow me, I humbly ask.” Whether that part about him having tasks to accomplish or not was true, Tenten could not judge.

At any rate, Haburo flicked his hand in agitation at Nene and Nyozeka, signaling for them to leave. Tittering in fright, Nene hurried away and Nyozeka slowly trodded out of the courtyard, heartbrokenly looking back at Takuma.

So there. It had been decided for her. At least the other participant in this despicable act was a long-established ninja who knew what was coming, and in all likelihood could handle it.

All the same, to use the Seal against a man she’d gotten to know and had been amicable with, for no good reason at all, merely to appease Haburo, was not something Tenten could do. It would suggest that she was superior or entitled in some way. ‘I’m not.’ It would lend credence to Haburo’s belief that sacrificing the well-being of Branch members was for the good of the whole of the Hyuga clan, ‘It isn’t!’ She knew all of this in her heart, as strongly as Neji knew it. She could not deny these truths.

“It does not require much chakra.” Haburo advised in an ice-calm voice, “Get this over with, young lady. I don’t have all day.”

Tenten tried to negotiate, “Whatever you want me to learn…I can’t learn it this way. I already understand.”

“You do not.” The elder’s nostrils flared.

“He didn’t do anything—”

“He? It’s you. This concerns you. Should I ask you to chop him with one of your many weapons?” Haburo’s temper boiled over, “Does that suit you better? You’re no flower in this clan, your father and I agree. You are a sword. You are destined to discipline members of our clan, but how can you if you have no discipline yourself?”

“I do-!”

“SILENCE.” Haburo boomed over her.

She was shaking. Takuma gave her an encouraging look, permitting her to activate the Seal. He was highly sympathetic and did not take offense to any of this. He also wanted it to be over with. He would not hate Tenten for being forced to do such a thing— he knew she had no desire to.

Fed up, Haburo circled around to stand behind Tenten and raise her hands, grappling with her. She squawked in horror, trying to resist, rather astonished that such an old man still had strength to puppet her into a position.

“When I say for you to do something…” Haburo snarled, “You DO IT. Stupid girl.”

“I…” Tears clung to the corners of her eyes, “I…won’t.”

“Who do you think you are?” Haburo kicked the back of her leg, and Tenten dropped down to a knee, her arms restrained, “You are no one. You are a remnant! A stray piece to fit on our clan’s board to serve one purpose, since dear Neji-kun is so difficult he’d elect to lead a celibate life otherwise— you do as we say and perform your duties!”

“Please, I’m begging—!” She screamed and couldn’t speak, her right arm twisted back to an angle that nearly pulled it out of his socket, much like it had been during the Chunin Exam.

Takuma was fidgeting, highly alarmed, “Haburo-sama, I…!”

“Not one more word out of you or else!” Haburo roared at him. Takuma stilled and watched in shock as Haburo thrashed Tenten, jarring her bad arm, striking several of her chakra points with his free hand, “Eh? Is this what you want? You take pain unto yourself? What for—? You’re pathetic! Now you couldn’t even activate the jutsu if you wanted to, with your chakra blocked. Weak!”

“I…w-won’t…” Trembling terribly, Tenten scraped up the audacity to speak, “Ever…u-use…that s-seal…”

“You’re a fool like the rest of them.” Haburo callously tossed her, unconcerned with Tenten heaped on the ground, sluggishly pushing herself up.

The old man rounded on Takuma, who was rooted to the spot in bewilderment.

“If you are incapable of seeing through this task, you are still able to watch.” Haburo spoke sidelong to Tenten, raising his hand to form the necessary seal.

Terror and desperation braided into a rope of adrenalin-fueled action in Tenten’s gut. She was up on her feet, light and fast, buoyant in spite of her crippled chakra circulation. In fact— she felt something else. It felt so very light, that thread between her heart and stomach…like a second furnace her father would preach about back in the day. The lightest energy she’d ever sensed, burning gold, lending speed to her outstretched hand that settled on Haburo’s upper arm as she dove at him in the half-second before he could apply chakra to the technique.

There, in the shade beneath the house’s awning, they sunk and were gone. Takuma leapt up in heart-stopping astonishment upon seeing Tenten tackle the Great Elder and plunge with him through a shadow.

“OOOF!” Haburo grunted.

Tenten was breathing heavily and trying to get her bearings. They were now inside the house in some dark space, and she scrambled to make heads or tails of what had happened. ‘Ah! Oh no. I Shadow-Stepped! Did I hurt him?’

The Great Elder was slumped over on the floor, also trying to assess how he’d been transported to the interior of the house. Tenten rose to stand, patted around, and then felt the give of a sliding paper door. She opened it to peer out into the hallway. She mumbled the location out loud, “The boiler closet…”

“Heaven and Earth…” Haburo grumbled and extended his hand, “Help me up.”

Half-petrified, Tenten did so, and hoisted the old man to his feet.

“That jarred my bones. If you meant to attack—”

“I didn’t! I had no idea I would do that at all.” Tenten insisted, “I wasn’t even sure I could.”

Haburo dusted his clothes and exited the facility closet, perplexed. He turned in a small circle. He looked left and right, used his Byakugan to spy Takuma still standing in the courtyard.

Then, Haburo settled on Tenten, mystified, “What jutsu was that?”
“It wasn’t Ninjutsu.” Tenten was tenderly rubbing her shoulder, “That…was a Tao Art.”

“Tao Arts…” Haburo wrinkled his nose and looked away.

“…I apologize, Great Elder. I didn’t mean to cause problems. But what you asked is something I won’t ever do.” Tenten explained, “I would rather die than do that.”

“If you die…how will this clan be led? Who will teach future generations, and carry on the legacy of the Hyuga clan? Don’t you understand what all of this is for?” Haburo sighed heavily, “So much is at risk. The gifts and secrets of this clan can be stolen, don’t you realize that? You must act as a steward to protect what is ours. Or it won’t be ours anymore.”

“Then, I won’t die.” Tenten decided, “But I’ll find a better way.”

“What astounding naiveté.” Haburo palmed his face, grumbling, and then said, “Come along.”

Though she really didn’t want to, Tenten complied. She’d pushed her luck much too far. They arrived at Haburo’s personal study, which did not make Tenten feel any safer when he shut the door and moved around the office to hoist the blinds at each window. He then ushered her over, his gestures communicating a sort of weariness. Tenten approached and was surprised when the old man gently prodded her chakra points, opening them again.

“You still must be punished.” Haburo determined, “Actions must have consequences. If you intend to resort to such antics whenever Branch members are concerned, I’d rather not bother. But if you remain a part of this clan, you must accept responsibility for what you have done.”

Tenten nodded somberly, “…I understand.”

“Your shoulder?” He wondered in a tired voice.

“Oh! It’ll…be alright.” She didn’t want him to fuss anymore. The attention was uncomfortable. She was still deeply upset. Haburo did not look delighted either, for his part. He hobbled over to his desk chair and sank down into it. He massaged his temples with his fingertips and brewed in his thoughts.

“Great…Elder?” Tenten wondered if by some miracle she could be excused and deal with this at a later time.

“You may not leave. I am reaching a decision.” Haburo dashed her hopes, scowling down at the mess of his desk, trying to order it, “You need to learn respect, young lady. You dare lay a hand on an esteemed elder of the Hyuga?”

“I did it to protect Takuma—”

“Takuma’s duty is to protect the Main Hou—”

“He’s a person just like you and I! He’s not worth any more or less!” Tenten bit her lips shut after shouting.

Haburo splayed his hands flat on the table, “You simply do not know your place. I have NEVER been pushed to my wit’s end like this.” He glanced down at the desk calendar, and noticed an appointment, “Ack! And I wasted much too much time…I’m expected at the pavilion…”

Phew. Maybe she could—?

“You’ll be going with me.” Haburo stated with finality.
Tenten’s face went sheet white. Accompany Elder Haburo to, what, a pavilion? What pavilion? She couldn’t stand this man! He was so set in his ways. Had insulted her! Injured her! Put the welfare of Branch members on the line for a rubbish reason, and had even implied she was kept merely for the purpose of ensuring Neji would not end his days an heirless man. To top it off, she could still expect some kind of punishment, and how could she be sure it wouldn’t be as bad as or worse than what had nearly transpired?

She realized Haburo was squinting her, as if struck by an idea. He tapped a thin stack of documents into a folder, neatening the disarray within reach before he stood again. He pushed the folder into Tenten’s hands, “Here, you hold this. Come along. To the Peony Pavilion.”

What, was she a footwoman now?!

There was a possibility, Tenten feared, that she may have inadvertently, personally indentured herself to Hyuga Haburo. Because she was acquiescing, walking a few steps behind the miserable old man until they finally exited the house, crossed the lawn, and were out of the front gate of the Hyuga Estate. Well. This was a shitpie if she had ever stepped in one.

Where were they going? Was more strife around the corner? Who was going to tell Hiashi, Hideyasu, or Kayato where she had gone? Heck, who was going to tell Neji? It wasn’t even 8:00AM yet. If she disappeared off the face of the planet, would they ever suspect Haburo was responsible?

“You have no family.” Haburo observed out of the blue.

Tenten shook her head, frazzled, “Uh…pardon?”

“Apart from your adopted family, you have no living relatives?”

“I don’t…” It was a bit of a sore spot for her.

“No wonder. Your filial piety is virtually nonexistent.” The old man got rather talkative, “You must have some role models you respect, don’t you? Well, not if it conflicts with your independence. Respecting elders can’t be prioritized above your convictions— feh! Do geckos hunt in packs? No, so naturally they’d have no idea how to behave when introduced to the rest of their kind. You need to be taught. I might have the solution…”

Tenten’s eyes flicked to the side, grimacing as she walked, ‘He just called me a gecko.’ And before he had called her a pathetic, weak remnant. Such descriptions really bolstered her self-esteem.

“Ah, we turn here.” Haburo made an abrupt turn, down a narrower lane that bisected a brief subsection of residential homes just off of the central thoroughfare of Konoha. Tenten moved with the same, dejected synchronization, her eyes lazily scanning rooftops when she saw it— the masked face of a Root agent ducking down.

Haburo moved with surety, looking no more agitated than he had before. They walked southward, not straying too far from the most populated vein of the village.

Tenten at length whispered, “Great Elder…”

“Hmph.”

“How long have we been watched?”

“Since we left estate grounds.” The old man gruffed, “This is now commonplace. You think they’d take greater care not to be noticed, though I suppose they find concealing themselves a moot point, when the Byakugan could so quickly detect them.”

“Would Root…do anything to us?” Tenten was genuinely curious.

“For now…no.” Haburo imagined, “Though it seems to me…they are looking for something. For some kind of evidence or action…that they might deem a security threat.”

“That is ridiculous.” Tenten hissed.

“Isn’t it? I wish I could say more…” There was a melancholy in the old man’s voice, “I wish there was more I could do. But those days are behind me now…”

Tenten asked, “What can I do?”

Haburo stopped for a long moment. He’d never entertained such a thought. She nearly regretted her words, irked by the old man’s pale, far-seeing gaze as he considered the circumstances.

They continued on down a manicured promenade, at the end of which was an enormous, splendid building encompassed by trees and gardens. Haburo responded to Tenten’s question with another question, “The…Tao Art you used…how does it work?”

She wanted to withhold such information, and yet Tenten sensed sharing it might benefit the clan, “I’m not exactly sure yet, but I think I’m beginning to figure it out.”

“It does not need chakra?”

“I’m pretty sure it doesn’t.” That in and of itself was a bizarre observation that Tenten could scarcely wrap her head around.

“That ability…” Haburo surmised in a low voice, “May be something that can aid the Hyuga clan…should times become difficult.” He cleared his throat and added, “So, learn more about it and master it. The same way you will learn about filial piety.”

Filial piety. Oh great. Apparently that was the trajectory of her punishment.

This impromptu excursion slowly but surely began to make more sense as Tenten noted the sign outside of the grand building, Peony Pavilion: Senior Care Center. A home for older citizens, it appeared. Though she was aware such places existed, Tenten had never spared a single thought about them. The closest she had ever gotten was checking up on Wong Leung at least once a week. Haburo took the folder back from Tenten when they ventured inside, and he told her to wait in the lobby, proceeding on his own to a small office with glass windows, sharing words she could not hear with the Center’s administrator.

Glancing around, Tenten immediately judged this place was inaccessible for people who were not of means. Tile floors shined, rich potted plants and artwork abounded, bright colors and light made the space welcoming. Corridors and gathering rooms within her line of sight were filled with comfortable furniture, tables, bookshelves, and various forms of entertainment—from painting easels to musical instruments. If an old person were lucky enough to retire here, Tenten told herself, they paid a hefty sum to enjoy such luxuries. Most senior residents that she could see were accompanied by uniformed workers, patiently assisting.

On a large, framed plaque on the lobby wall, Tenten read a dedication that explained the center’s mission and that it had been founded 90 years ago, ‘In honor of the Senju clan…’
Huh, how nice of the village’s founding clan to create a space for elders. In its original incarnation, back when Konoha had been a hardier patchwork of huts and post-battle restorations…had this place been so ritzy? Was this the result of capitalistic complacency?

“Tenten.” Again, Haburo’s voice snapped Tenten back to the present. He motioned to a middle-aged, suited man who had left the office to greet her, and Haburo introduced, “This is Chigashira Koki, the director of the Peony Pavilion.” When the man bowed with a smile, Tenten returned the courtesy.

“This is where we will part for today, on the condition you give your utmost effort to assisting elders.” Haburo proclaimed, ignoring Tenten’s troubled expression, “I am here to visit a dear friend of mine. I will keep an eye on you.” He warned, “In compensation for your…eh…for everything this morning…you will work here.”

“Part-time.” Koki assured her, “We are already quite well-staffed, but I’d be happy to have our best manager show you the ropes.”

Tenten gulped. No, no, no. This was not her forte. This was not something she’d agree to, and yet if she didn’t, what alternative punishment would Haburo toss in her face?

She nodded woodenly, “Alright.”

“Work hard and learn.” Haburo demanded, “When we return to the estate, explain yourself to Hiashi. I will confirm that you’ve done so tomorrow.”

Just like that, Haburo toddled on and to Tenten’s amazement, she saw another old fellow at the end of the hallway brighten at the sight of the Hyuga elder, clambering out of a wheelchair to greet Haburo in a hug. She was going to have to jumpstart her brain again to get through this day.

“Eh-hem, so, Tenten, was it?” Koki genially addressed her, “Haburo-sama is a trustee of the Pavilion, so anyone that comes recommended by him is most welcome. You’re a member of the Hyuga clan?”

“Yeah.” She refrained from adding, Just not in the ways that count to Haburo-sama.

“Wonderful!” His steps clip-clopped over tile, delighted and energetic at this hour of the morning as Tenten chose not to vent her frustrations or roll her eyes. He had no idea what a fracas she and Haburo had narrowly avoided.

And thus, to her chagrin, she was promptly introduced to other staff members outside of administration. Tenten’s personal details were taken for security purposes, she was provided a uniform, hygienic shoe covers, and a face mask before sanitizing her arms and hands in hot water at a sink. Chigashira had dumped her off on a manager named Ogase, and was likely never to be seen again.

“Did ‘ol Chigashira tell you what you’ll be doing here?” Ogase asked.

“Taking care of old people…?” Was about what Tenten had gathered.

“Ding! You got it. And the definition of that statement can vary. It may look sunny and nice on the outside, but you get a spectrum of awfulness here, okay? Sometimes a resident is just lonely and has no friends or family left. Other times they have no idea who they are, where they are, and can’t take care of themselves. You’ll see it all.” Ogase warned her, “If you care about human beings, this job is going to demand a lot from you. Admin doesn’t hire people who don’t give a damn. Top quality care means only the best are allowed to handle these seniors, but even then, it takes a lot out of us. I’ve been here eight years, and every time I lose one I tear up.”

A slight ache panged in Tenten’s chest. Yes, this definitely was not her wheelhouse. Not to say that she couldn’t perform the work, but she didn’t want the emotional drain that came with it. ‘No turning back now. I’m lucky I didn’t have to fry Takuma’s head earlier just because Haburo is a heartless bully. This is just what I have to do.’

“We’ll start our rounds on the first floor and I’ll show you what to do, let you know about our policies and such. When can you work? You’re a shinobi, right? I work seven days a week here, and I’d like you to come in for a few hours at a time for at least five of those days.” Ogase squiggled initials and times on a wall-mounted schedule. He regarded Tenten’s crestfallen face.

So much for getting work done at the forge. She could forget about it while this task ate up her time.

Tenten haggled, “Can you do four days a week?”

“I can do four.” Ogase nodded, “Here, how do these days look?” He tapped on the schedule for what was upcoming, “I can be flexible. I get it if you have a mission, but I’d like to know when I can usually expect you. It’d be a big help.”

“Yeah, that works…” She relented.

“Good, good…” His marker squeaked on the board.

Tenten observed other employees coming and going from the staff room, all rather droopy and worn-out. Some made bee-lines for coffee pots on the counter.

“Everyone looks so…” She got a sense of what was to come, “They, uh, don’t look as happy as Chigashira-san.”

“Heh! That’s because the director gets to dress nice, greet people out front, and set up programs…”
Ogase snickered, “He’s never had to spend his entire day frantically prepping meals and medications, or conducting treatments. Bet the only ass he’s ever had to wipe is his own…”

Balking, Tenten ventured, “His own…?”

“A lot of residents are weak and need help cleaning up. Get used to it. That’ll be 60 percent of your time here, I wager.” Ogase estimated.

“Can I be a janitor?” Tenten asked.

“No. Hey, have some compassion! Someday you’ll be old too.”

She pitched back a sassy counter, “I have the option of dying on the battlefield, so I don’t have to watch the last bit of my dignity dissolve.”

“Great, but for those that don’t have that option, have a bit of deference. They’re not a waste just because their last days are a struggle. That’s something you’ll see here too.” Ogase smiled and adjusted his glasses. “It’s not easy making a ninja do this kind of work, but I think you’ll be better for it when you do.”

“Yup, mm-hmm, whatever you say.” Tenten shook off the urge to crawl out of her skin, then requested, “Ogase…in about two weeks, can you write a letter for me that states you’ve seen me demonstrate exemplary filial piety?”
He snorted, “Only if you actually demonstrate it.”

Chapter End Notes

Goodness, there is a lot of emotional whiplash in this chapter. Hey there reading champ, thank you for getting through this installment! Feel free to leave your takeaway thoughts below in the collection box.

Chapter 58- Behind the Waterfall

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!