Sakura and Gaara finished their meals before Kakashi; the man was struggling to get to the end of the long Han noodle. Sakura spoke about current events in Leaf, such as Kiba’s father and his health scare, and also Hinata’s rebuffs of every suitor her elders threw at her. While listening, Gaara snuck Sakura’s hand out of her lap and held it beneath the table. She faltered in her story only for a moment before blazing onward; mentioning some of Tsunade’s harshest training methods and how she coped.

After Kakashi gave in and stopped eating he replaced his mask, noting the time, “Sakura will need to be at the hospital in ten minutes.”
“We should be on our way then.” Gaara agreed, catching a server’s eye. The man gave Gaara a thumb’s up and then waved them out. Kakashi ‘tsked’ at the young leader’s pampered treatment as they left the restaurant.

The hospital was located at the center of the village and all roads seemed to lead to it. Gaara notified Sakura that the class hours and frequency were at her discretion and that she could teach as she saw fit. Upon arriving at the lobby, he introduced her to a gaggle of Medic-nin who were on the younger, friendlier side. They fawned over the Hokage’s apprentice.

“Are we only learning one technique today?”

“Is it true that you have Tsunade-sama’s super strength?”

“Your hair is so pretty!”

Sakura tried to take it all in stride, “Thank you, everyone. I’m here to teach you about how to extract poison from a victim’s system and derive antidotes. If you’d like to get started let’s go to the test lab…”

And so she was hurried along by her new Sand protégées. Gaara watched them disappear down a long hallway with folded arms. A moment passed before he turned and nodded for Kakashi to follow.

“I bet you wish she didn’t have to teach a class.” The Leaf Jounin observed.

“I’m grateful that she can. I’m even more grateful that I had an opportunity to see Sakura.” Gaara admitted, “I was shocked by the Hokage’s kindness.”

“Were you? Where’s your sense of entitlement?” Kakashi chuckled, “For a Kage, you are very humble.”

“No one owes me anything. My duty is to serve now.”

“My Sensei said things like that. Every day he woke up amazed that he was a village leader…he never wanted to let anyone down,” Kakashi recalled, “But in your case…you are still incredibly young…” He scratched his cheek, “Your maturity scares me a little…”

“Don’t be alarmed. I can horse around when Naruto prompts me to.”

He elicited a true laugh from Kakashi, who had nearly forgotten how Gaara and his team had some famous pranks in their past. They walked down a street and passed by the Academy, greeting curious students in an outdoor Taijutsu lesson.

“To be honest,” Gaara went on, “I don’t think I have done the right thing.”

“By becoming Kazekage?”

“Quite often I regret it. The burden of these responsibilities…has made me imagine what it would be like to have stayed in Konoha. I’ve asked Jiraiya about what he advised the Fourth Hokage to do when he had doubts.” He somberly added, “Yet I am aware I cannot undo my decision. I vowed to help Suna…”

“Of course it is difficult. Minato-sensei had tough days too…and Jiraiya-sama checked in on him frequently to make sure he wasn’t overloaded,” Kakashi recounted, “Your feelings make sense. You never meant to stay away from Leaf, as I understand it. It was not truly an obligation of yours to serve your birth village, even if they tried to convince you of that.”

“I was convinced for a time.”

“I also suspect that it has not been easy hardly seeing your friends.” Kakashi rightly determined, “If it’s any consolation, Sakura has every intention of returning here…and she’ll pester Tsunade-sama for assignments.”

A small smile, “It’s more than consolation.”

“She has improved drastically. The Hokage has been sharing some intimate knowledge with her…and I have not yet taught Sakura a technique that she couldn’t master.” He paused, “She’s not suited for the Chidori…but she has options.”

“I knew she was a genius from the first moment I met her.” Gaara announced, “I should be the one bragging.”

Two training dummies had been set up in the lab that Sakura was escorted to. Although she was among shinobi who had about six to ten years of age on her she immediately took charge. Sakura noted how the simulation tools on the counters and shelves were jumbled or in disrepair, ‘Konoha orders new kits every year…’ She would be sure to drop a hint to Gaara to send some funding towards the decrepit Medical Corps.

After inquiring where the mock-fluids were and getting a resounding, “We don’t use this lab often…” Sakura tore open cabinets until she came across an unopened box of poison simulations. She ripped the packaging open and set the tools down on a rolling trolley between the tables.

“Okay…” She sighed, lifting up a plunger, “Does anyone here have experience with this sort of thing?”

One solitary hand was raised. Sakura called on the older man and he explained, “My sister was a puppet master who trained under Chiyo for many years. She and I spoke often about the poisons she used. I learned a few techniques to help in case she accidentally harmed herself.”

“Great! So you already know how to extract poison from a shinobi’s system?”

“No.” He admitted, “But I can slow it down and treat it.”

She was a bit discouraged, “That’s fine; this just means you’ll be adding one more jutsu to your countermeasures.” Sakura injected the first dummy with a neon-orange liquid. Per her instructions, a student used the doll’s manual pump to circulate the fluid in the pseudo-bloodstream. The transparent top of the dummy showed where the orange “poison” was creeping.

She lectured briefly before demonstrating the jutsu they would be using. Talented Medic-nin were no strangers to the ability to “feel around” a wounded individual’s system with their chakra. Sakura clarified that the System Survey Technique that detected internal injury was the basis of a more advanced jutsu; one that could lock on to a suspicious substance within blood, and with a Medic’s poised chakra, redirect and extract it. With her flawless chakra control, Sakura showed how she could move the orange liquid around the doll with a glowing palm, “Of course, you won’t be able to see where it has spread within a real body. You’ll need to survey first and feel how far it’s gotten. Always check if there are multiple wounds…contact poisoning is trickier than ingestion. It can be in more than one area…”

It was a long afternoon of practice with Sand’s Medics. She gave practical guidance and scenarios that they should keep in mind while each student took turns with the jutsu they had learned. While she had made it sound quite simple, most of the Sand shinobi had trouble “latching on” to the faux poison in the dummies. Sakura took extra time to help those who struggled.

By evening they wrapped up, having a fundamental grasp of the technique. Sakura requested that they return to the lab for another lesson at 9 in the morning. She received plenty of thanks for her patience and dedication to teaching. Only after the last trickle of students had escaped into the dark streets outside of the hospital had Sakura realized she had forgotten to ask for directions, ‘Damn. I don’t want to risk getting lost on my way back to Gaara and Kakashi-sensei...’ She opted to ask the sleepy-looking desk receptionist nearby until she heard her name being called.

Sakura stepped out of the automatic door and onto the road, looking left and right. Gaara gave her an amused look from where he stood on the sidewalk, “You took your time.”

“Were you waiting here for me?” She was startled, “That was almost five hours!”

“I’m a shadow clone. I didn’t mind watching your class.” The clone Gaara pointed to the second floor of the building, “There are observation balconies up there.”

“Oh.”

Gaara closed his eyes and bent his arm, offering it. Without a word Sakura looped her arm with his and they set out under the illuminated streetlamps. The roads were now scarce of people and had grown quiet.

“So where are we off to?”

“My house.” There was a hint of pride in his voice.

“And the real you is there?” Sakura confirmed.

“Yes, and Kakashi was fed dinner and sent to bed already. He was trying too hard to make conversation.” Gaara added, “He’s probably occupying himself with that book.”

“There’s no doubt about that. So...does that mean you ate already?”

“I waited for you.”

“Thanks!” She grinned, “Will it be just us?”

“It will.”

“So that means Kankuro is on a mission as well?”

“He and my student Matsuri are on a mission in the Land of Waves.” Gaara confirmed it.

“Wow. I keep forgetting you have a student.” She bopped her head with the heel of her hand, “I want to meet her! You’ve told me she’s making great progress.”

“She wants to meet you too. She’s a decent kunoichi, for a beginner,” The corner of his mouth curved upward, “But nowhere near as talented as you.”

“You know...I think this is the most I’ve ever seen you smile.”

“You’re the one who’s smiling.” He frowned reflexively.
“I know I am, but at least I can admit it.” She gave his arm a light squeeze, “So… I need to talk to you about the sad state of that training lab…”

“This place technically belongs to my sister.” Gaara explained as he welcomed Sakura into the mansion, “My father could only assume I was dead, and so Temari inherited most of his property after his passing. She was in line to do so anyway.”

“That was thoughtful of him.” Sakura supposed, “It’s good she lets you stay in her house.”

“I could argue that, as Kazekage, I have a stake in it now.”

She laughed, “You’ll need to get that in writing…”

Village leader or not, Sakura thought, it was not entirely Gaara’s to claim. Temari would flash the deed to the home in her little brother’s face and win the argument. Yet there need not be strife. It certainly was big enough to comfortably fit a dozen residents. ‘So they sure aren’t fighting over space…’ As they passed through the vast, furnished atrium that qualified as a “living room” Sakura estimated it was about the same square footage as the entire Haruno house.

Just off of the formal dining room was a homier kitchen with appliances, and Gaara flipped a light switch and motioned for her to sit down. A chair was scooched back at the table, most likely where Kakashi had been seated earlier. Sakura took her place and gave Gaara an uncertain look, “You don’t want me to do anything?”

“You’re my guest. Sit.” He commanded in a surprisingly sweet voice, “Now… why am I spending money on that lab again?”

“It stinks, that’s why! All of the kits are outdated… you should be replacing and updating training supplies annually,” She folded her arms and leaned back in the wooden chair, “Come to think of it… those Medic-nin didn’t have a clue how to use their own lab. It’s one thing if you don’t buy supplies… but at least tell them to use it weekly and be familiar with it. I had to show them how to use their own test center!”

“That truly is shameful,” He agreed, procuring a covered pan of food from the counter, “I want to keep things at the standard that Konohagakure enforces, at minimum.”

“And well you should, especially when I stop by to teach.” Sakura smiled proudly.

The pan was put into a preheated oven and Gaara offered the pink haired girl a glass of cold, sweet tea. He took a seat across from her at the table after he set two plates down.

“What are you heating up?” She asked, taking a sip, “It smells good.”

“I made okonomiyaki.”

Her mouth hung open, “You cook?”

Gaara frowned slightly, “My brother and sister taught me.”

“I’ve tried making okonomiyaki once before on my own… but my mom said I added too many ingredients to the batter.” She huffed, “She called it a freakshow-pancake.” Sakura sipped the tea again, “The most critical woman in the world shouldn’t have asked me to solo dinner if she was only going to hate it…”
Gaara was studying her face when he spoke, “More than likely…it tasted fine.”

“It sure did.”

“Mine was passable. Your sensei didn’t vomit.”

“Full points.” Her pink eyebrows rose in delight, “You get double points if you put kimchi and shrimp in it.”

“I didn’t.” He laced his hands under his chin, “I apologize.”

“That’s my favorite.”

“But not your mother’s preferred style?”

“No. I don’t think she has any understanding of what flavor is.”

The corner of his lips tugged upward again, “I’ll try it your way, next time.”

“I hope you’ll like it,” She tilted her head, charmed by his flattery, “If I recall…you and I like to eat a lot of the same things.”

He closed his eyes and nodded. Thirty seconds passed in silence as the two remembered Konoha; in those brief days together as students when they didn’t have real worries. Sakura’s eyes absently took in the sight of the chilled glass in her hand; it was sweating with condensation. Her chin rose again and she looked at Gaara, startled, “You didn’t want any tea?”

“I do, but I’m a shadow clone. It would be impolite to take what the real me would enjoy.” The clone reminded her. The ice-filled pitcher nearby was less than half-full.

“Oh yeah…I completely forgot. It feels like I’m talking to the real you.” Her hands folded, trying to warm up from the icy drink she’d been holding, “How courteous of a clone not to impose like that!”

“Well,” His smile was impish, “It doesn’t always work.”

Sakura adopted a curious expression, “It doesn’t?”

“No. And one day, Sakura, when you make use of shadow clones you will come to understand that even if you reason with them…” The clone stood from the table, “They are solely invested in the desires and mannerisms of their creator…and don’t always have the capacity to obey.”

“Ah.” She voiced her understanding.

Her green eyes widened a fraction when the clone leaned down, putting one arm of the back of her chair and the other on the table in front of her. The shadow clone’s face hovered in front of hers; the same sharp, ice-eyes, cheekbones and red hair as her boyfriend…the same everything, down to the smug expression.

“It would only be impolite to take something that can’t be replenished, but since you’ll still be here in a few minutes,” They shared a breathless gaze, “I will enjoy.” And the brazen clone kissed her with every bit as much conviction as his originator would have.

Without giving much thought to the “moral correctness” of her actions at the time, Sakura shut her eyes and reciprocated. It was a kiss that heralded the end of the drought she had endured. Memory did not evoke any kiss with Gaara nearly so adult or bold, and the newness of it all flooded her senses, hot, quivering, and it stripped away the façade of civility she had put up. He tilted the seat back to kiss her more deeply and Sakura moved automatically, raising her hands and settling them behind his neck. They were cold from the glass.

It shocked his skin and he made a soft noise against her mouth. Before they could get carried away in the manner they so badly wanted to, a kitchen timer dinged from the counter, signaling attention to the food. They parted when he set the chair straight again. The clone held the sides of her face, concluding a deep kiss, and then looked her squarely in the eyes, “Maybe I will not share…”

“While I…” Her breathing was ragged, “Really liked that…” She pushed the clone back gently, “I think I would prefer my real boyfriend at this point…”

The clone looked a tad dejected, “If real is something you can touch…” He stroked the back of her hand, making a nonverbal point.

“Oh, I mean…real as in original,” Sakura smiled, planting a kiss on the lips of the frisky Kage Bunshin, “Thanks.” Her super-punch connected with the clone’s stomach and a cloud of smoke erupted, eliminating the temptation.

“Phew.” She stood and moved to the oven, extracting the pan with an oven mitt and setting it atop the stove.

Sakura stole a peek at the okonomiyaki, which had a lovely geometric design drawn into the sauce and mayonnaise. A few pieces of the pie were missing: Kakashi’s portion, she presumed, ‘This looks so fancy! Nothing like my…freakshow dinner…’

It would have been too pretty to eat if not for the fourth of the circle that was missing; its slightly jagged edges made the masterpiece less memorable…more edible. She considered helping herself, but she had no idea when Gaara would turn up. ‘I should have asked where Gaara actually was before I destroyed that clone…’ She took her seat again to wait.

After a full minute of being alone with her thoughts Sakura had finished her tea. She stared blankly out the open window on the far wall, noting the silence of the night in Suna. ‘No crickets…not like in Konoha…’

“You,” Gaara strolled in the second entrance of the room, “Punch much too hard.”

Her brows danced in confusion, “Oh! Uh…how…did you know I punched that shadow clone?”

“They transmit information to the user of the jutsu once they dissolve. I remember what we were talking about,” His faint smile was replaced with a serious, apologetic look, “I am sorry that the clone was not well-behaved.”

“I forgive you…er…it.”

Gaara took the plates from the table and fetched two pieces of the okonomiyaki. Sakura was trying to keep her rubbernecking discreet. It was plain to see that he had just bathed: his hair was tousled and still drying. He had traded his day attire for loose, gray and black clothing, ‘I want to call them pajamas.’ And his shirt hung open just enough to demand the attention of her eyes. The glimpse of the smooth plain of his chest was the first she had ever seen of it. Whether he meant to stir her curiosity or not Sakura was feasting her eyes, at least while his back was turned.

He set the food on the table alongside chopsticks and then shared the last of the sweet tea with her. Gaara took a seat across from her, completely relaxed and unaware of Sakura’s distraction.

“Let me know if it has flavor.” He asked playfully, “I trust you as a capable judge.”
“Hold on.” Sakura quickly sampled a piece of the grilled treat, “Hm. Very good. Onion.” She paused, frowning in thought, “Potato. Some kind of meat…”

“Don’t overanalyze. Just tell me it isn’t horrible.”

“Like I said, it’s very good.” She smiled, “It just needs more cabbage.”

“I prefer less of that.”

“Ham.” She identified the last element, “Everything goes well. I guess this combination doesn’t need anything more…but I’ll make you one of mine sometime.”

He smirked while he chewed. Gaara kept his eyes shut and listened to her speak, savoring her voice more than the food.

“You should…come visit me in Leaf when you can…” Sakura suggested carefully, “Cooking for you would be fun.”

“I would like to do that…but I’m afraid that I can’t do it anytime soon.” A faint sigh escaped him, “Until the shinobi I sent to the Tide Village return I need to be mindful of Suna’s vulnerability.”

“Right…”

“When I get there,” He balanced a tiny green onion on the end of his chopstick, “Would you want me to stay with your family?”

“Uh…” She swallowed, alarmed, “The major reason I would advise against it is…well…I don’t want you to see any ugly arguments. My mother and I can be…” Sakura took two fists and bashed them together, “Destructive. My dad is immune to it…but for your sake you might want to stay at your place.”

“Thank you for the warning.”

She brightened, “Your apartment is in great shape, you know! Hinata dusts every week and waters the plants.” Sakura snickered, “Naruto gave her a key. He probably never wants her to return it…”

“I should have given you mine.”

She blushed and tried to hide her embarrassment with a gulp of her beverage.

Gaara qualified the statement, “I don’t live there anymore. At best, I would only be able to stay for a few days at a time. You should keep it if you need a place to decompress after an altercation.” He mimicked the fist-bump motion she had made earlier.

“Wow. You are really generous.” Her cheeks were still pink, “Honestly, I’d kill for a closet to hide in when Mom loses it…” She propped up her head with one hand while she imagined it, “I’ll scream into a pillow at your place.”

“Very well. I’ll find that key for you later. It’s upstairs.”

Sakura polished off her meal and declined when he asked her if she wanted more.

“Do you plan to spectate at the Chunin Exam? Tsunade-shishou should have asked if you were interested.” She wondered.

“It’s a ways off still, but I will be there.” He finished one last bite, “I’ll have the best seat at the final ronds."

“Good! Then you’ve already got a place to stay.”

“Speaking of which,” He stood and took the empty plates, “I can show you to your room here. You need to rest.”

“I’m fine.” She chuckled.

“You crossed the desert for the first time today and then taught a five hour class.” Gaara gave her a skeptical look, “You’re fine?” The plates clinked when he left them in the sink.

“Okay.” Sakura stood, knowing she couldn’t dispute it, “I just don’t want to go to sleep right away. I like talking to you.”

“We can…for a little while.” He agreed to it, shutting the light off, and in the dimness of the mansion he led her onward.

Up a tall staircase and past many windows, the landing of the second floor was flooded with moonlight. It gleamed on the antique wood furniture and cabinetry. While it was certainly the home of a well-to-do family, most of it was understated and practical. Sakura observed her surroundings thoughtfully as they proceeded to a long corridor. Every bedroom door was shut and Gaara pointed them out while labelling their owners.

“That’s Matsuri’s room.” A room nearest the staircase was indicated, “We invited her to stay here because she was orphaned a few years ago. Her previous home was in bad condition.”

Sakura hopped a step forward and hugged his arm, “That’s good! I hope you’ve made her feel right at home.”

“I think so,” Gaara pointed to the room next door, “Temari’s room.” Four doors down from that, “Kankuro.” At the very end of the hallway on the corner, “This one is mine.”

He nodded to the room diagonally across the hallway from his own, “That was my uncle’s room. Kakashi is staying there for now.”

“Your uncle doesn’t live here anymore?”

“He’s dead.” Gaara clarified, “Except for my siblings and me, everyone else has passed on. We’re a much smaller family now.”

“Oh.” She glanced around at the many doors, “Where can I sleep?”

He opened the door to the room next to his own and motioned for her to take a look. Sakura poked her head in and regarded it in the faint moonlight. Aside from some furniture, a carpet and some wall scrolls, it was quite austere. She had been expecting a futon, but there was a bed off to the right of the window. Her travel bag had been dropped off and was leaned against a chest of drawers. Gaara did not follow her inside and lingered at the doorway.

Sakura turned to give him an approving look, “This will do fine.”

He nodded to her silently. The pink haired girl removed her shoes and then hopped onto the bed, testing it, ‘Twice the size of mine at home…’ She patted the sheets, ‘These linens are fresh. It really feels like I am a guest of honor around here…’ Sakura smiled and sat cross-legged, fiddling with the nearest fluffy pillow. She did a double take when she noticed Gaara had not moved.
“Won’t you come in?”

“I should leave you be.”

“You said we could talk for a little while.” Sakura reminded him.

“I did say that,” He confirmed, turning to the hallway, “Come with me.”

Without questioning his change of direction, she followed. Two doors down from her room, she was shown to a bathroom. Sakura flipped the light on and found that it was appropriately spacious and modern. She padded across the tiles in bare feet, taking the hint, “You think I should wash up?”

“It is a courtesy that I did not want to forget to offer you.”

“Well,” Sakura took a towel from a wooden shelf, “Thanks. But…what will you do in the meantime?”

“Dishes.”

“Oh.” It was really taking her aback that the Kazekage was responsible for his own home, “So later we can-?”

“I promise we can still talk.” Gaara assured her, moving to leave, “For now make yourself comfortable.”

She thanked him again before he shut the door. Not wanting to waste time, Sakura ran the tap to fill the tub, ‘This could take a while…’ It was family-sized. She looked over her shoulder again at the door, a nervous tick, and then undressed. Sakura cocooned herself in the fluffy towel, trying to get a grip, ‘It’s been a waltz of the two of us trying to be proper.’ She thought, ‘I think that shadow clone had the right idea. We both wanted that…’ But the presence of her sensei warded away any inappropriate behavior, and Gaara, as a village leader, was more likely to exercise restraint.

Echoes of dripping water bounced off of the walls. She slowly rinsed herself, discovering that sand had stuck to her skin in a thin sheet. ‘Well there isn’t any rush. I know that I would really like to get close to Gaara…but this mission demands a lot propriety. I’ve got to respect that.’ Sakura shut the running water off after the tub filled, ‘But man! I’m going to need to secure myself some real vacation time, eventually. Tsunade-sama will need to give me a break, especially after I become a Chunin!’ She was counting on being promoted, ‘I don’t want to hold back every time I visit Gaara…’

But until then, she supposed, this would become a routine. While they were both aware that they wanted to move things along, neither would be able to act on the desire. Each meeting would be formal, tasks would be accomplished, conversation would be dignified, and most likely, Sakura guessed, they would be scrutinized by teammates or some type of chaperone. Ino would classify it as “mission cock-blocking.” She puffed her cheeks and grumbled at the thought.

“At least I got one good kiss out of this.” She muttered, stepping into the warm bath. It sure as heck wasn’t the Sand Medic-nin she’d taught that made the trip worthwhile.

Sakura leaned back and shut her eyes. For now, silence was comfortable. The bath was a welcome relief from the surprising chill of the desert night. Bit by bit she relaxed. Sleepily, she surveyed her surroundings, ‘Gaara sure does have a lavish place…but even if he was living in a shack right now and we had been sipping broth for dinner,’ She smiled to herself, ‘I’d still be happy that I got to see him.’
She had been delighted that he was still as sharp as ever when it came to conversation. It had been one of the first things about him she liked, Sakura recalled, back from when they had entered the Academy. While he often came across rude and coarse, she considered Gaara very keen of mind and forthcoming with his opinion. She could also go toe to toe with him, or really, anyone, when it came to witty insults. These days he was more polite and mellow, but he would always have that underlying acuity that she admired.

Aside from his personality, which was intact, he was physically quite different. Gaara had the unmistakable leanness of a man, and when her thoughts began to focus on his shoulders that were distinctly broader than she remembered, Sakura slapped a washcloth on the top of her head. There was no way to combat the attraction she felt. It was the explorative curiosity that automatically made her stare whenever Gaara’s back was turned, and it had even made her test boundaries with a Kage Bunshin, ‘Which is an event I plan to keep to myself.’

She began to doze and after a few minutes woke up in a slight panic. The water had cooled off and she was unsure of how much time had passed. Sakura drained the tub and stepped out, drying off tiredly, ‘I guess I am pretty beat after today…’ She combed her fingers through her hair and it turned out fine, ‘Love short hair.’ And she skittered from the bathroom to the bedroom she had been offered.

After dressing in the “mission-downtime-clothes” she had packed, Sakura rolled onto the bed and stayed there. If Gaara had meant what he said then he would stop by later to talk, ‘And if he doesn’t…’ She yawned, ‘I’m getting shut eye.’

A nearly-full moon poured in light through the window. Sakura had nested with a few pillows around her head and was, essentially, asleep by the time Gaara had turned up.

She stirred after feeling a finger trace across her cheek. Gaara was seated at the edge of the bed and looking down at her with a serene expression.

“Sorry,” Her voice was husky with sleep, “Bath made me…tired…”

“Don’t apologize. I wondered if it was better to let you rest.”

She shook her head weakly, “I wanted to you to tell me about what…it’s been like for you…” She yawned, “Now that…you’re Kazekage…”

“Not too exciting. The work is similar to what you see Tsunade-sama do, day to day.” He was not too fond of the subject.

“I guess that’s true,” Sakura folded her hands under her cheek, “But what do you think of it?”

“What do I think of it…” Gaara repeated quietly. He shifted over and folded his legs to sit, pondering a suitable answer.

She shut her eyes and listened when he spoke, “It is an honor. Many people have come to depend on me. To be appreciated in a village that once feared me has been enjoyable.” Gaara fell back on a pillow and sighed, “At least, all of that is what you would expect me to say, isn’t it?”

“Some of it must be true,” She mumbled, “But I know you better than that. I bet you’re worn-out.”

“It’s been exhausting.”

“I could tell.”
“Should I be honest?”

“I won’t judge.” With her eyes still shut, she smiled.

“If I could do it over again I would have declined.”

“And why would you do that?”

“The work is not thankless, but it is incessant and impersonal. At every committee, mission briefing, official visit…I appear as more of an object than a real person to most people.” He amended, “A well-respected object, of course.”

“Well your brother and sister don’t see you that way. Neither do Haku or your student.”

“And I’m grateful for that. But as a Kage, it can’t be helped that people will think you lack flaws. Like how a child looks up to a parent, villagers have set expectations of what I will do for them. It’s overwhelming.”

“And you’re sixteen.” She observed.

He folded his hands on his stomach, staring at the ceiling, “Yeah.”

“Seems like you becoming a Kage at such a tender age…” She stopped to yawn, “Was a hasty undertaking.”

“I won’t argue with that.”

“You’ve always worked hard, and I always knew that it chipped away at you bit by bit, all of your life.” Sakura opened her eyes a margin, “I’m glad you’re Kazekage…but you’ll need a break soon.”

“I miss Leaf.”

“I know you do.”

“And…” There was a hint of frustration in his voice, “It seems we unintentionally built barriers between one another, you and I.”

“They don’t seem to be a problem at the moment.” She countered.

“No. But because I am apart from you here in Suna, as a leader,” He elaborated, “And you are the Hokage’s apprentice, and an instrumental part of your team…the times when we get to see each other will be limited.”

“That’s true, but I guess that’ll just make me look forward to seeing you more.”

“I was worried that when you first arrived here…that you would treat me as a stranger.”

Sakura was surprised, “Did you really think that?”

“I am never sure how anyone I care about will react to me these days. Even Naruto.” His apprehension was miniscule, but she could still hear it, “I fear that formality will take precedence over friendship.”

“It hardly ever does. And sheesh! Remember who you’re talking about!” She laughed lightly, “Naruto will never let anyone forget that he’s their friend, no matter their station in life. He’s probably going to tease you more than ever.”
Gaara turned his head to look at her appreciatively, “You’re right.”

“Of course I am.”

“Perhaps the Hokage sent you here with the intention of providing me therapy.”

“Hey, don’t give Shishou the credit. This is all me,” Sakura corrected in a sleepy warble, “Only a girlfriend can know…how to get into a man’s head during stressful times.” Her eyelids drooped against her will.

“Only you know.” He agreed. His smile began to reflect mischief, wholly agreeing with her statement.

The pink haired girl was beginning to drift from consciousness again and the conversation came to a lull. She did her very best to stay awake and watch Gaara; keep their eyes connected to communicate without sound.

The young man shifted to reach her. He fit his lips to hers; sincere and possessive, then touched her face gently. Sakura made a small sound of approval and was almost immediately asleep after that. Though he lingered for a few minutes more to adore the creature curled up in front of him, Gaara pushed himself back and retreated. It was prudent to maintain decorum. Sakura was a guest.

But, he thought, as he shut the door gently behind him; he really, really loved this guest.

Class the following day went a bit better. Sakura deemed that after four hours of practice following the initial lecture, most of the Medic-nin were able to perform the jutsu she had taught. It was easier to show them how to test poison correctly after extraction. By noontime they were synthesizing antidotes together, with the Sand ninja congratulating themselves for not being too dense for Leaf’s techniques.

Gaara was very pleased to hear of the achievement. He walked with Sakura back across the village to where he had dumped Kakashi at a bookshop. Without a doubt, he was searching for Jiraiya’s newest volume, though neither man said a word about it.

After greeting a Jounin sensei and his students for the sole purpose of introducing Sakura, they stopped at a nearby bench beside a small pool. Chiyo frequently went fishing there for the few carp they stocked. It was a secluded spot off of the main road and offered some shade.

“I guess Kakashi-sensei will want to leave immediately, now that the training’s complete.” Sakura observed sadly.

“Perhaps for your next mission you won’t need an escort?”

“I won’t,” Her eyes flashed, “I memorized the way.”

Though it need not be discussed aloud, both wanted to be sure that future visits would not have third-wheels or interruptions. Sakura took a seat on the bench, resting her hands beside her. Gaara took the place next to her and stared out down the long, narrow alleyway that connected the niche back to the main road.

“I didn’t have the chance to tell you yesterday before I fell asleep,” Sakura hesitated, “I…think you look really grown up.”

His head did a three-quarter turn when he looked at her, interested, “You do?”
She gestured to his outfit ambiguously, “Yeah, you’re dressed for the part and you…carry yourself with dignity…” She added, “You became more…”

His mouth was pursed as he awaited her opinion. When she trailed off shyly Gaara fully faced her, unabashed, and lifted her hand from the stone seat, “I’m more what?”

Sakura struggled to speak while her inner-self had a third party chorus resounding in her mind, “You look…”

He pressed her hand to the side of his face. His smile was a deceptive mix of gentleness tinged with smugness. Gaara knew what she was trying to get across as she failed miserably at articulating. He had, for most of his life, a much easier time telling people what he thought of them.

Gaara’s other hand settled behind her head, pulling her close, “I can see that you’ve changed a lot as well.” His fingers played with strands of pink, “And I never would have thought…that you could be more beautiful than when I first met you.”

“I was-” She continued to speak even while he kissed her, “Six. I think.” She began to smile, remembering, “No…”

“What?” Gaara murmured against her mouth.

“It’s been that long?” Sakura’s grin was halting the fun, “That you liked me…”

“Well,” His lips delicately touched the corner of her mouth, “It’s not the same as it was.” His swift hands pressed her flat on the bench, “Not even when I left Leaf for Sand…I wasn’t…consumed this way,” Her hands traced his neck, “I refuse to believe that I can’t have you just because I am here.”

Gaara folded over her, savoring the smooth texture of her lips. His role as a Kage seemed miles behind him, forgotten just as soon as he was bewitched by the quiet but titillating sounds she made. Sakura held him steady for a deep kiss, and for a time the balancing act continued uninterrupted.

At one point, while Gaara had captured her hand again and was pressing avaricious kisses on her wrist, a nervous voice came from behind them.

“Um, excuse me…sir…”

The Kazekage’s head snapped towards the passageway. The turban-wearing Chunin from the day before stutter-stepped in fright, not daring to come any closer; his voice trembled, “Please forgive me, Gaara-sama…I would never intrude if it wasn’t important…”

Gaara calmed down after a moment and was genuinely surprised, “How did you find me here, Enoru?”

“Hyoshigi-sensei was out on the street with his students! H-He said he saw you go this way-”

“What do you have to report?” Gaara demanded, not really concerned by then. He carefully parted from the pink haired girl before they quickly preened themselves and stood.

“A message arrived by messenger hawk from Kankuro-sama.” Enoru explained, “There’s trouble in the Tide Village.”

Alarmed, Sakura observed Gaara from the corner of her eye. He had gone tense.

“Of what sort?”
“He is requesting support to help locate and defeat the Shin clan, who were discovered to be operating near the village. They’ve abducted at least five Tide students with the intention of assimilating them as clan members.” Enoru explained it concisely, “He has done all that he can to safeguard other students and track the perpetrators…but his forces are limited.”

“I will deploy two teams there to assist,” Gaara began to walk, but shepherded Sakura along, “Did he say anything else?”

“A follow-up report did come in a few hours later,” The Chunin added quickly, keeping up with them, “It said that your student was reported missing.”

Wide-eyed, Gaara stopped to look at his informant in disbelief, “Matsuri?”

“Kankuro-sama indicated she did most of the investigative work to uncover the student’s abductors. He fears that her efforts may have attracted the enemy’s attention.”

Gaara’s gaze traveled from Enoru to Sakura, “Sakura.”

“I want to help.” She announced firmly, “I think you were going to ask me to, anyway.”

“Yes. Are you and Kakashi available?”

“Shishou won’t mind.” The kunoichi kept up with his pace, “She’s got no reason to object this time.”

“Send a reply to Kankuro.” Gaara commanded over his shoulder to Enoru, “Tell him that in addition to those cells Hatake Kakashi and Haruno Sakura will be arriving shortly. And it is advisable that he find my student unharmed before they get there.”

With an affirmative cry the Chunin darted off towards the aviary to send a message.

“Even if Kankuro can’t find her, I promise we’ll get her back, Gaara.” Sakura vowed, “Kakashi-sensei and I can track her, so don’t worry!”

“I won’t,” There was a wild edge to his voice, “I’m going with you.”

Electric silence hung over the Hyuga compound for several days. Members of the Cadet Branch whispered among one another, truly shocked by the unrest in the Main Branch. Witnesses had identified the heir of the clan, Neji, as well as his older relative, Hikune, as the combatants. Older, wiser Branch members pointed to evidence that suggested the two young men who had brawled had fought for reasons that often concerned young men in general, And not because it had anything to do with clan matters, a man wisely put it.

The clan elders, who had these days only concerned themselves with Hinata’s woebegone matchmaking, swept the indiscretion under the rug. This was the first outburst that the prodigy Hikune had ever had, they contended. And though it had not been Neji’s first outburst, they pardoned him as well. All told, they just didn’t want to deal with it. Hiashi had been instructed to keep the youngsters under control and preserve the immaculate reputation of the Hyuga.

So Hiashi kept his comments to himself and returned to his nephew, who had been healed by the clan Medic, and asked him for his opinion.

“Do you feel that Hikune deserves to be punished?” The man asked Neji.

Neji, bandaged and on the mend, contemplated it, “I don’t know.”
“You and Hinata explained to me that he was frustrated by a rebuff from a young woman, your teammate,” His tone suggested it was kind of a big deal, “And he saw fit to harm you in response. I do not know the particulars, nor do I wish to hear them, but…” Hiashi sighed, “His behavior is not fitting of this family.”

“I won’t demand…any further correction for him.” Neji spoke softly, “I was told Hideyasu dealt with him.”

“That is a parent’s duty…” Hiashi reminded him, “If Hikune’s offense was serious enough to involve the Hokage, by your estimate, then—”

“No.” Neji said flatly.

“He attacked you savagely.”

“I recall.”

“You are my brother’s child and heir to this clan. I will not allow anyone; not a member of the Main House nor any other clan…not even our esteemed elders to disrespect you.” Hiashi’s voice was sharp, “You should not tolerate it either, Neji.”

“I didn’t tolerate it. I distinctly remember my retaliation, and by that measure…” He frowned, “This matter seems settled to me. I see no reason to humiliate Hikune further.”

What Neji did not tell his uncle was that aside from not wanting a more serious punishment for Hikune, he did not want to make it a public matter for the village to discover. It had been two days since the beating. Tenten and Lee, mercifully, were not aware of the altercation. If he could keep it that way, Neji had every intention of doing so. They had once questioned his wounds the day before at their training ground, but he had attributed it to rough practice with his clan. He had showed up lacerated and bruised before for such reasons, so both Lee and Tenten readily believed it.

“Very well.” Hiashi let it drop, “I’ve been doing all that I can to support my daughter through these troubling times,” Referring to her forced courtship that he had little power to stop, “And I will not let you face adversity either. It’s my hope that this confrontation is settled, but if it isn’t, Neji…” He looked the young man squarely in the eyes, “He must be dealt with. You will lead this clan; the Main and the Branch House. Hikune cannot be allowed to oppose you.”

“I understand, Hiashi-sama.”

His uncle excused himself after that. The next order of business was to speak to Hanabi’s Chunin Instructor who had spoken of her aggression towards antagonistic classmates. While Hiashi knew that he would never get his youngest daughter to curb her belligerent attitude, he could at least save face with fed-up Academy teachers. Off he went.

Neji stood and left the room as well, swirling with emotions. He was grateful that he did not pass anyone in the corridor, because his face was freely expressing every detail of his mood-swing.

There was a passing moment of pride he felt that Tenten had pledged fealty to him. It had rubbed Hikune the wrong way, of course, and it had gotten him beaten up too, but he would not have it any other way. He had been angry enough when Haku had caught her eye long ago, but she had discarded that admirer as well for his sake. The ego-boost faded when he realized she had been out perusing in the first place.

Every inch of him seared with rage at the thought of her secretly cavorting with anyone. A Hyuga clan member. A stranger. Other shinobi their age. It didn’t matter who. While they had not established this as a taboo, nor were they romantically involved in any way, he expected Tenten to know better. He tried not to think about whether or not she had been intimate with anyone. That possibility existed, and it ought not to tarnish his opinion of her so long as he was her impartial teammate, but…it wasn’t his business. He shed the thought. She belonged to no one and he belonged to no one, therefore they certainly didn’t belong to each other.

But more often than not he was angry anyway, almost unable to help it.

A strange new feeling, a gentle one, came over him as he stepped outside into the daylight. He had quickly forgiven every party involved. After all, there had been some truth to Hikune’s garbled, crazy words. There would be no point in blaming himself, or Tenten, or even the man that had been heartbroken. He wanted to resolve the problem without fanfare or attention.

He had not approached Tenten yet, deciding that if he ever did discuss this mishap with her, it would be better to do it with a clear mind. He was mostly lucid in spite of the sparks of emotions that flared up, trying to accuse someone or make sense of it all. Neji followed the veranda to the end and turned the corner before pausing at a lonely room. Hikune was inside this one.

They had not spoken since, well…

He knocked once and then slid the door open, letting himself in. Hikune was having tea at a low table and was unruffled by Neji’s arrival. He had probably seen the Hyuga heir approaching. Neji took a seat across from him and didn’t blink when Hikune shifted to bow on his knees in greetings. At least now he could show the proper respect.

“Please afford me this moment to apologize once again, Neji-sama.” Hikune sounded completely normal, “I regret my words and actions.”

“I think you regret your words less than your actions, but rest assured, your message was relayed.” Neji told him, “I came here to tell you something.”

Hikune was silent. He was expecting an extension on his house arrest and mission inactivity. Or, perhaps by prodding the elders, he was about to become the newest member of the Branch House.

“Let’s forget all of this.”

Hikune’s tea nearly went down the wrong pipe.

“It’s disappointing that Hinata-sama had to see it. I would prefer if no one else learned of this, not even your brother.”

“Neji-sama…you are in a position to destroy any and all credibility I have. It wouldn’t make much sense to merely forget what I did to you.” Hikune pointed out, “And even if we did put this behind us and pretend that we get along…” His voice was a dark as a storm cloud, “My feelings are unchanged.”

“There’s no need to change how you feel. I’m asking only for your self-control.” Neji stood from the table, “This will be the last time I ask for it. Going forward, I will command it.”

“I promise to be civil. Though I don’t suppose you have any reason to trust me in the future…”

The young man moved to the door, “I may be a fool for doing so, but I will continue to depend on you as I always have.” And as he forcefully shut the door behind him, he thought: But I don’t have to like you.
Hikune observed with his Byakugan as Neji stalked away. Only a few years ago, Neji had been known to throw tantrums and look down on others. Today he had a level-headedness that was uncommon among Hyuga heirs. Hikune imagined that he might make a good clan Head after all.

He stood to leave the tea room, entering the main hallway of the house, and Ko watched him carefully as Hikune returned to his room. He nearly jumped out of his skin when he found his father there waiting. He stood with his back turned and arms folded while looking out an open window at a wind-chime. Clearing his throat, Hikune shut the door behind him.

Hideyasu glanced over his shoulder, “I watched Neji go to speak to you. Were you punished?”

“No.” He lowered his chin, “He forgave me.”

“He forgave you,” A dubious laugh escaped him, “What incredible mercy that boy has, don’t you think? You could have crippled him for life over something as petty as rejection…and he absolves you…”

Hikune took a seat on a floor cushion and his father, not his benevolent self today, turned to face him, “Well I for one don’t forgive you, Hikune. I did not raise my children to act this way, whether or not you were from a noble family, whether or not you were justified…I will never turn a blind eye to such shameful acts.”

“Father-”

“I’m not finished,” Hideyasu growled, “You owe Neji your allegiance. Before anyone else in this world, he needs you the same way Hiashi leans on me, don’t you understand?” His voice was furious, “It is disgraceful to take out frustration on clan members; our Branch house or our Main house. These are the steps we are taking to abolish the Caged Bird Seal: to first treat all of our clan with compassion. We’ve discussed this.”

“I know, Father.”

“And what’s worse is that you should be setting an example for Fujita. Do you think your mother and I want him to emulate an older brother so foolish?”

“I know you don’t.”

Hideyasu paced for a few moments, brow furrowed, almost comical in his anger which was rarely ever expressed.

“You’re fortunate that Hiashi-sama is understanding! He vouched for you before our clan elders and he left your fate up to Neji.” The man’s voice softened, “He too was understanding. He didn’t have to be.” He sat down across from his eldest son, “Tell me why you did it, Hikune.”

“You haven’t heard already?” His eyes were trained on the floor, degraded.

“There were vague indications that this started because of a girl. Hiashi was trying to make sense of it, but you know him…it’s like playing the telephone game…”

“Neji’s teammate Tenten and I were very close.”

“Ah, and did he discover and object?”

“No, he didn’t. She turned me down.” Hikune added quietly, “She loves him.”
His father looked childishly enlightened, “Oh.”

“I reacted very poorly, I acknowledge that.”

“Ugh, Hiashi-sama really didn’t have a clue what he was talking about.” Hideyasu ran a hand through his hair, “He had his lines a bit crossed…” He smiled slightly, “I know that it’s hard to have your heart broken, son.”

Hikune was silent so his father reached over and tugged him, pulling him into a hug, “Nothing that feels this bad stays this way forever. You’ll feel right again before you know it. And remember, when I first fell in love with your mother she dumped me twice…it took three years for her to come around!”

“I’m not so sure that this is that kind of situation…”

“Well there’s no way to be sure it isn’t.” He chuckled, “Now if you’re not going to be a brat or beat anyone to death, please go to the Hokage’s office and take a mission. A Jounin should not be sitting on his laurels.”

Hikune squeezed him briefly before standing. Hideyasu followed a few paces behind his son as he strolled out into the yard, with Ko still shadowing. Fujita could be seen practicing forms in the courtyard and Hikune called out to him. His little brother came scrambling.

Matsuri awoke with her face pressed roughly into grass. With a groan she fidgeted, realizing her arms were tied by complex knot-work behind her back. She could see the feet and legs of shinobi walking about the forest clearing, not paying any attention to her at the moment. They conversed urgently in low voices.

Her eyes scanned along the ground to a refuse pile of assorted garbage including beverage cans and foodstuffs. She contained her outrage when she saw her Jouhyou and tool-summoning scroll had been discarded as trash. ‘I’ve been disarmed! But they didn’t even want to keep my weapons…’ She was immediately aware that she was a captive of the Shin clan. While frustrated by her predicament, she did not despair, ‘Maybe I can find a way to draw Sand’s forces here…’

“Ongakare-sama! The little runt woke up!”

Matsuri rolled like a log in a futile attempt to make a break for it, but her legs refused to cooperate. She was still under the debilitating effect of Sound ninjutsu.

A hand grabbed her roughly by the shoulder and hoisted her to her knees (since she couldn’t stand) and then released her. She saw before her a pale man with narrow, empty eyes; he seemed to be estimating her value. He rolled back a long sleeve and tapped a finger to his chin, “I wonder how experienced this kunoichi is?”

From off to the left a Shin clan lackey suggested, “She’s just a Genin, Ongakare-sama. She won’t be causing us trouble.”

“Hm.” The clan leader seemed intrigued, “She won’t? I was informed she was the one who turned Menma against us.”

Another voice spoke, “We can’t make her one of us. She’s a stuck-up Sand ninja and she prevented me from recruiting a student. Our ways won’t appeal the same way a cozy life in Suna does…” Matsuri quickly recognized the voice of Nobu, the man she had chased after a near-kidnapping.
“So you can’t be very useful to us,” Ongakare turned his attention to Matsuri, “At least, not without persuasion. Menma was a promising student…I’m very disappointed that he’s become a traitor.”

“He has a conscience,” Matsuri spat, “He knows that it’s wrong to take children away from their homes!”

“We provide them with a new home. Even Menma can’t deny that he would have perished if not for the generosity of our clan.” The man frowned, “Those students who wish to train as shinobi…surely they can decide for themselves what kind of future they want. If they seek to serve this so-called Tide Village I won’t stop them, but I can offer training in prestigious arts that Sand grunts can’t.”

“You’d be welcome if you helped the Tide Village; they appreciate support! But your reasons for being here are selfish: you’re only training ninja so you can go after Orochimaru!” Matsuri accused.

Ongakare looked amused, “Did Menma tell you that? Well there is truth in it; however my goal is very far down the road…these children will be seasoned adults with real skill before I even consider striking against my enemies. Just think…” His glare was cold, “What could I accomplish with stupid trainees of your caliber?”

The kunoichi gritted her teeth furiously.

The clan leader smiled, “Now, now, young lady! You know I’m right. Nobu seems to think that we can’t trust you…that you’ll never acquiesce to becoming a member of the Shin clan.” He chuckled, “But a decade of imprisonment can change people’s minds. I hope you look forward to it.”

The trill of a wooden flute plunged her back into sleep.

“Hey! Pst! Wake up!”

Matsuri felt a nudge. Young voices whispered over her face while she lay on her back. She cracked an eye open and saw a child looking down at her, clearly worried.

“You’re awake!” His voice was quiet, “Try to sit up…”

Woozy, Matsuri opened her eyes fully and saw three Tide students crowded around her. Her hands were still bound which made her movements clumsy, but she righted herself and took stock of her surroundings. Seated several yards away at the base of a tree there was a Shin clan guard. His chin was tucked to his chest; he had dozed off.

All of the Tide students had their hands bound with rope as well. Matsuri even recognized the girl among them to be the child gifted with perfect chakra control. The two boys with her had bruised faces, ‘I don’t think they came willingly…’ They appeared to be in the same forest clearing as before, but most of the Shin clan was absent.

“You’re the captured students?” Matsuri asked quietly. They nodded and so she continued, “I’m Matsuri. I’m a Sand tutor. I’m going to help you escape.”

“Did you plan to get captured so you could find us?” A boy asked hopefully.

“Not…exactly,” She furrowed her brow, “But I know I can help you. Where are the other students?”

She recalled five had been reported missing.

“They wanted to be here,” The other boy said disapprovingly, “Those two really believe they want to join this clan! They didn’t seem to care that these weird ninja were beating up Gemba and me when we resisted!” He looked to the girl with them, “I’m glad they didn’t hurt Miki, though.”

“It’s only a matter of time.” Miki wisely surmised.

“Okay. And what’s your name?” Matsuri asked.

“I’m Hisao.”

“Alright…” Matsuri peeked over her shoulder at the sleeping guard, “So the Shin clan isn’t here?”

“They went with the willing students into the village. Sagi and Jiro are going to help lure other kids away from the Sand ninja and into town.” Gemba explained, “I hear the Shin clan talking about using their jutsu to blend in and using sewers to escape…”

The Sand kunoichi pursed her lips, thinking, “While they’re gone…how many are here supervising you?”

“Two guards.” Miki reported, “One hasn’t been around for a while and the other just fell asleep. Should we do something?”

Matsuri nodded, “Yes. But with my hands bound I can’t do much.” She eyed the guard, “I need to get a kunai off of him…”

She wobbled to her feet and silently padded towards the slumbering shinobi. She came to a good position to kneel down and reach for a holster when the man started and stretched his arms. While trying to think of an alternate strategy she hopped backwards, trying not to be too blatantly suspect.

“Hey! What are you doing over here?” The man barked.

“I…I need to use the bathroom.” It was the lamest but most believable excuse she could come up with.

A short distance away Hisao chimed in, “I’ve gotta go too!”

Gemba feigned sleep while Miki kneeled beside him, deciding not to join the bathroom-break train.

“You rodents think I believe that crock?”

“You don’t have to believe it…I just hope you have a change of pants for us.” Matsuri prodded, “We can’t be kept waiting all day…”

“Bah!” He was clearly frustrated, “Fine!” He grabbed Matsuri and shoved her in Hisao’s direction, “Get a move on you two! I’m supervising. Don’t try a damn thing or none of you will be shitting for a week!”

When they had marched to a secluded thicket of trees a few paces away, they began to clamor to have their hands freed. He only permitted one to be free at a time, and so he untied Matsuri first, grunting, and pointed to an oak tree where she could do her business. Once out of sight, the kunoichi seamlessly replaced herself with a clone and scaled the tree in silence. A believable sixty seconds passed before the guard saw her again. Her doppelganger returned without a fuss to be tied up with rope. His suspicion had been avoided.

Matsuri watched from a tree branch as Hisao was freed. While the guard’s back was turned she positioned herself carefully. In the same moment the Tide student below complained for toilet paper she swooped. Matsuri landed a cruel kick on the back of the man’s head and he collapsed with a small sound of shock. Hisao dove in to help her bludgeon the guard senseless and then search for weapons. He had no kunai. She took a spare length of rope and tied his hands and ankles before dragging him into a bush to be hidden.

“Untie them and then follow me.” Matsuri advised Hisao quietly, “That other guard might be here any moment…”

Matsuri’s replication dissolved as she rushed to where the guard had been sleeping. A small hand drum was at the base of the tree, and beside it was an empty bottle of wine, ‘No wonder he was vulnerable…he’s liquored up…’ She picked up the drum and ran back to the refuse pile where her rope-dart had been thrown away. Matsuri retrieved her belongings and then stuffed the hand drum into a dirty paper bag, ‘They won’t look for things they care about near things they don’t care about…’ She nodded to the gaggle of students before rushing into the forest with them.

“What’s the quickest way back to the village?” Matsuri demanded.

“It’s the same path the rest of the Shin clan will be taking.” Miki informed her, “There is a main road over a foot bridge that leads to the business district.”

“Then the next best way?”

“Along the side of the river.” Gemba replied, pointing to the calm waters held back by a levy, “It takes longer but it can bring us really close to the barracks!”

They raced across the footbridge and the Tide students hurried down a small hill to the water’s edge.
Matsuri had no time to join them at the walkway below; the second guard was on her heels, howling furiously. He drew a short sword while he charged.

She wheeled her Jouhyou around to keep the newcomer at bay. Matsuri kept the man’s eyes trained on the red cloth that was tied eight inches above the metal tooth of the rope-dart. This was a very common trick with soft weapons, she had learned. Brightly colored flags caused enemies to misjudge the distance of the dart at the end of the rope. He dodged clumsily, getting tagged once in the ear, now bleeding, and a second time on the chin; hideous purple from the impact. Matsuri was too fast for him to close in with his blade, spinning and whipping her weapon round and round. The frustrated member of the Shin clan finally leapt off of the bridge, abandoning his fight with her. He ran across the water’s surface towards the children.

‘Turning your back on me is a mistake!’ She swung like an acrobat from the bridge, using the momentum to send her Jouhyou streaking like a rocket to its full length. It coiled around the neck of the ninja who was just short of catching the escapees. With a gag he fell backwards, splashing in a panic before he was abruptly released from the chokehold. When he surfaced the metal dart hit him squarely between the eyes. Matsuri hooked the rope with her foot, spinning it in a final arc, and then lashed the metal tooth down on the crown of the man’s head. Unconscious, he sunk like a stone.

Her Tide student companions gasped at the barbarity of the tiny weapon in Matsuri’s hands. She hurried across the stream with chakra and caught up to them.

“Jeez! You made those guys look like amateurs!” Hisao was thrilled.

“I’m lucky they underestimated me.” The kunoichi observed, “They gave me every opportunity to overwhelm them, and my Sensei taught me to never squander those moments.”

The children absorbed the lesson. They ran along the stone path and then followed Gemba into a wide drainage tunnel. Light was limited but the boy seemed to have a grasp of where to step and when turn, unafraid of the sprawling shadows. It was nearly fifteen minutes of navigation and consulting with Hisao and Miki (who had also eluded adults in the tunnels) before they decided to breach at a particular manhole cover. Gemba peeked through before deciding it was safe, and hoisted the metal plate aside. They scaled a ladder into daylight again.

Matsuri looked around, unable to recognize their location, “This is…the suburban part of the city?”

“Yeah, there’s only houses and lagoons.” Gemba began to run again, pointing to a dockside residence, “That’s Inari’s house!”

“Oh!” Matsuri was glad to hear it. She doubted Tazuna would be resting at home at such a critical time, but it couldn’t hurt to stop by.

Miki knocked on the door and it was briskly answered. Tsunami looked shocked to see the children, “Miki! Matsuri?” She stepped onto the porch, “My father said you were all captured!”

“We busted out! We’ve got to help the Sand ninja stop the Shin clan!” Hisao updated the woman, “Are Inari and Tazuna-san okay?”

“I’m sure they are, but the sooner you find them, the better. They told me they were going to be in the Academy yards that just opened today.” The woman urged, “Please hurry.” She gave Matsuri a thankful look, aware that she was responsible for the safe return of the students.

The group took off again with Matsuri at the front. She spoke to the children with her, “Listen to me, I’m going to the center of town. You three go straight to the barracks and warn the first shinobi you see about what’s happening. I need to find Kankuro-sama or Tazuna.”

They agreed to do as they were told. Once within the city limits the group divided. The Tide students entered the barracks and Matsuri rushed down the main avenue, keeping tabs on the alleyways and sewer entrances in her peripheral. ‘I hope they haven’t taken any more students! I want to make sure Tazuna and Inari are safe and then ask Kankuro-sama to track the Shin clan with me!’ She hesitated to drag Menma back into such messy business, ‘I don’t know what they plan to do with Menma if they see him again…”’

“Stop!”

She paused when a voice from the passing crowd implicated her. Matsuri turned and was confronted by a member of the Sand Sensory corps. Chiyo was puffing tiredly beside him.

“Matsuri, you’ve been missing for over a day. Kankuro said that you were captured on your way to find me. He wanted to blame me for neglect!” The old woman huffed, “I knew that the Shin clan couldn’t contain you for long…”

“How did you get away? We still haven’t pinpointed the enemy’s chakra signal.” The sensor with Chiyo asked.

“We weren’t well guarded because the Shin clan is here in the city; they’re trying to lure more students.” Matsuri told them breathlessly, “I brought three students to the barracks, but the remaining two are helping the Shin clan trick students!”

“That’s no good. Many students are visiting the new training yards today.” The sensor then took a moment to check the area a few blocks away, “We might be in time if we go there now.”

“If you insist on running for the rest of this jaunt then you should carry me on your back, Muta.” Chiyo proposed.
“Chiyo-sama…”

She took off at a feeble jog, “Ahaha! You sucker! I’ll beat you and the little lady there!”

They sighed in response to the juvenile gesture. Matsuri and Muta overtook Chiyo in a few seconds and she cursed under her breath. They had clear passage down the adjacent road as they made for the Academy. Matsuri watched as Chiyo drew a scroll from within her sleeve and tucked it in her sash.

“I’ve never felt so lively on vacation….” Chiyo decided with a liver-spotted grin, “Matsuri…I’m going to show you my collection today…”

“Are you serious, Baa-sama?” The girl was shocked. She had never seen the old crone lift a finger to fight.

Chiyo cackled, “Oh yes…and these fools will learn why I am known for clearing the fields of war with a sweep of my hand…”"
Hinata was seated beside Kurenai on the low-hanging limb of a maple. The girl had her hands customarily folded in her lap while her sensei, far more relaxed, had her hands at her sides; legs crossed. She was smiling as she looked out over the training field.

Sato and Shino were nearby sparring. It would appear that Sato was back to his pre-Star-mission health. He whirled over the grass, dodging swarms of insects. Shino exchanged volleys of shuriken with him, holding back just a hair with his throwing speed. He and Hinata were both aware that Sato’s energy and athleticism distracted from the numerous wounds he had sustained. His maiming was not very far behind him. The scars on his hands and arms, and, revealed with the Byakugan, scars that scored his back and chest frightfully, were sure to be permanent. Sato had said that he didn’t mind them, “It makes me look a bit tougher…”

“You did very well today, Hinata.” Kurenai’s voice was warm, “I may have only nicked you once.” She recalled that when Genjutsu failed to ensnare her student, a hail of weaponry was not much more effective.

“Once.” The girl nodded, “I hope…that I did not hurt you, Sensei.”

Her teacher chuckled, “The pain has passed,” She glanced down at her bruised arms where Jyukken had broken through a defensive block, “I think it was wise of me to ask you for a rest.”

“I’m sorry, I should have held ba-”

“Do not apologize for outclassing me in hand to hand combat.” Kurenai said sternly, “I was hardly a match for your Taijutsu when I first took you on as a pupil. I have no right to complain now that you’ve grown so much.”

Hinata’s smile was small. Kurenai had always been a practitioner of positive-reinforcement, with her, at least. The woman had other methods of communicating with Sato and Shino. At the moment, she was haranguing Sato from a distance for using kodachi when he had been expressly warned not to. In retaliation, Shino thought it fair to use a pole-arm. The boys had at each other and Kurenai sighed with a shake of her head.

“Their punishment will be the injuries I wanted them to avoid.” She decided.

“Sato-kun is feeling much better. Today may be a good day for him to practice with swords again.”

“Maybe…” Kurenai glanced at her, “So while we have this moment, may I inquire about the unrest in your clan?”

“Um,” Hinata hesitated, wondering which particular issue she was referring to. There were several occurring simultaneously.

“You’ve had suitors.” Kurenai provided an example.

“Oh.” She then understood, “It’s…not something that I enjoy dealing with, but I am free to decline every offer a visitor makes.”
“I hope your father is advocating for you.”

“He is.” Hinata reassured her.

“Good. Such an asinine tradition is tragically typical of the Hyuga clan, forgive my criticism. Many clans within the Leaf Village no longer subject their children to matchmaking and other foolishness…”

Hinata nodded silently.

“If at any point you feel that your rights have been violated by your elders, or if your freedom is not adequately safeguarded by your father, I will vouch for you.” Kurenai declared, “I would happily take it up with the Hokage. Your clan may claim to have unquestionable influence over your duties as a Lady of the Hyuga,” Her tone was sharp, “But as a Sensei, I have influence over your career as a shinobi. No one will jeopardize it so long as you are my student.”

“Thank you, Kurenai-sensei.” Hinata was relieved, “I don’t think I will be forced to marry anyone. It’s just unfortunate that I have to humor so many guests…”

“We can take more missions if you like, if sabotaging your schedule will help,” The woman was clever, “Just as soon as Sato is cleared for it.”

“I’d like that.” She watched as Kurenai turned her attention back to her male students. While no one could replace her mother, Hinata felt that her Sensei often protected her in the way a parent would. She liked to imagine Kurenai that way.

A short while later the training session wrapped up and the team members went their separate ways, intending to meet again the next morning. Hinata ventured into town and considered how she wanted to spend her afternoon. Since she was not immediately needed by her father or relatives, she wished to default to a favorite pastime. The garden was looking a bit dull these days.

Hinata had a light spring in her step as she cut across town. She anticipated a letter from Naruto soon. She was also glad she had at least a full seven days that would not include entertaining suitors. For now it was business as usual with her team and it was a lovely feeling.

Ahead of her, Chouji was parting ways with Ino and Shikamaru, trading their company for his father’s. He and Chouza ventured in the direction of the Akimichi estate while Shikamaru followed a half-step behind his girlfriend down the street. Ino’s radar quickly picked up on Hinata approaching. She altered their course, partially dragging Shikamaru, and then met up with her.

“Hinata! I heard this rumor-!”

Shikamaru’s subtle nudge stopped her, “You said you were cutting back on perpetuating the rumor mill, Ino. At least give Hinata-san a proper greeting first.” His said pointedly before adding, to great effect, “How are you?”

“I’m fine, thank you, Shikamaru-kun.” She smiled sedately when Ino put an arm around her shoulders, steering the group towards the flower shop.

“Hi Hinata! Shika got that greeting out of the way for me,” She said while ignoring his sigh, “So now I’m going to go ahead and tell you the latest gossip…”

“Of course. After you do I would like to buy some flowers.”

“Sure!” Her voice lowered slightly, “Shikamaru said that he heard about a fight at the Hyuga compound.”

Hinata wilted, “Yes…that did happen.”

“Was it really Neji? Was it about a-?” Ino was interrupted by Shikamaru again who reminded her that it was a sensitive matter.

“I…” Hinata hesitated, “I know that Neji-niisan did not instigate anything. But he was attacked by a member of the Main House. It may be wise not to discuss what motivated it.”

“That’s the best part!” Ino whined.

“I’m surprised,” Shikamaru commented, seeing Hinata wasn’t especially tight-lipped about the event, “It happened at the Main House…that makes me wonder if it was…” He trailed off, rapidly deducing that Hikune’s comings and goings from the Hokage’s tower and Shogi tables indicated some kind of distress. Giving Ino that bit of information would feed the insatiable monster, though.

Upon arriving at the flower shop Ino relented and gave up on the mystery, for the time being. She knew she could extract a hypothesis later from Shikamaru with certain persuasions.

Hinata was magnetically drawn to purple irises that were on display. She inspected them briefly before taking two small pots over to Ino at the counter. Ino rang her friend up with a discount, “How are you holding up? I hope they cut it out with the omiai business your elders mandated.”

Shikamaru leaned on the countertop, lost in his thoughts while the girls chatted.

“It’s not so bad. I’m free for most of this week.”

“Thank goodness. I hope you didn’t meet any real weirdoes…”

“Well…some were…blatantly incompatible…”

Ino cocked an eyebrow, “Aside from being way older than you?”

Hinata nodded, “Yes. Many of them couldn’t even hold a conversation…some had strange pastimes…” Her brows knitted in disdain, “And there were a few who said they expected me to cease all ninja activity if they married me.”

“Ass…” Ino elongated the word, “Holes. Why would they say that? They’re trying to marry a kunoichi! You’d think a man would do that because he liked how you can defend yourself.”

“No. I was told it was unbecoming of a quiet lady.”

“You abandoning your shinobi career was probably the only way those guys could feel good about themselves.” Shikamaru supposed, “A secure man would never ask for such a thing.”

Ino gave him a brief, appreciative smile before turning to her friend again, “I’m sorry you’ve got to put up with that garbage. It’s a good thing Naruto would never flat-out tell you: quit being a ninja, it’s ruining my confidence!”

“He never would.”

“How about we all do lunch sometime? You’re free this week and Shikamaru is getting two days off.”

Hinata brightened, “I would like that!”
“Good! I’ll swing by and get you tomorrow.”

They parted on a happier note and Hinata waved to her friends before ducking out of the shop with her potted irises. On her way out, she could see Shikamaru catching Ino before she nearly toppled from the top rung of a footstool. She smiled to herself, ‘Ino seems so happy. Shikamaru does treat her very well…even though he doesn’t make a big show of things.’

Hinata returned home without incident and switched into her “serious gardening outfit”. It was kept in the bottom-most drawer of her bedroom’s armoire. She used the same pair of brown-kneed pants and weathered apron for every venture in the garden. Naruto, who often knew where to find her on Hyuga grounds, had once told her that she looked very “cute” dressed in raggedy clothes. Hinata tied her hair up with a white handkerchief before she and her new plants arrived in the garden. She set down a wooden tool basket before scanning the flowerbed for spots to dig holes.

‘I haven’t had a chance to do this for some time.’ Hinata thought to herself, ‘Mother was here every day, back then.’ She could remember the woman’s dedication; the way she was stooped over azaleas and white aster for hours, pruning, ‘And Father used to watch her quietly.’ Hinata looked over her shoulder to a window, ‘From there. It made him happy.’

In the back of her mind, Hinata knew that the undeniable similarities she shared with her mother were the exact things that made her father’s heart ache. Her appearance and demeanor; even her taste in food and hobbies, ‘I know he misses her so much. I think he always wanted me to be more like him…so he didn’t have to think of her whenever he saw me.’ While Hinata had adopted her father’s fortitude over time, she would forever be a carbon-copy of her mother.

She re-homed the first iris in damp soil, humming to herself, and then heard voices coming from the house. While patting the dirt around the flower’s base, Hinata watched as Hikune and Fujita emerged from the veranda door. The older boy was clad in his Jounin vest and had a travel bag with him.

‘So his mission inactivity is over.’ She noted. She was surprised that it had gone quickly. In all likelihood, Neji had not been enthusiastic about punishing him.

Hikune accidentally shared eye contact with her for a moment, sending a bolt of awkwardness through them both. Fujita swept him along while begging to be taught a new jutsu, oblivious to the tense moment. Hinata turned back to her work and excavated the second hole a bit more, ‘I am still unsure of how to feel. Hikune is a very caring person and is close to his brother and parents…’ She frowned sadly, ‘But I can never forget what he did to Neji-niisan…’ She had to witness about a minute of violence with her Byakugan before she arrived to break up the fight. It had been dreadful.

What was most puzzling to her was TenTen’s involvement. Neji had explained, with his limited knowledge, that TenTen must have been visiting Hikune frequently. ‘Why would Onee-san spend time with Hikune when I know that she…?’ Hinata was a stalwart believer that TenTen had a deep-seated and romantic love for the Hyuga heir. There could be no other explanation. Yet there was no way to determine why the kunoichi had grown close to another member of the Hyuga clan. While Hinata was sure that it hadn’t been a serious relationship it had still caused unintended damage.

And she would never feel quite right about Hikune again. Every gentle smile he gave could barely conceal Hinata’s memory of swiftly sealing his tenketsu; hearing his wails.

She looked once again to see Hikune joining his teammate, Mion, before bidding Fujita farewell at the gate. Hinata paused in her work and sat on her heels; her eyes met with Hikune’s once more. There was a true apology communicated in his gaze. It made her heart lurch.
Naruto had no trouble waking when Fukasaku asked him to. After quietly stretching and then dressing he could hear the distinct protest of Jiraiya coming from the next room over. ‘This is the first time we’ve woken up Ero-sensei early since he was injured…’

Peeking out of his doorway, Naruto observed as the small toad and Jiraiya had a verbal altercation.

“Jiraiya-boy, you’ve healed significantly. Eventually you’re going to have to resume a normal schedule.” The toad reasoned.

“Eventually never meant now, did it?”

Fukasaku seethed, “You asked me to help you with Naruto’s training, so that’s what I’m doing!
Wake up and join us at the Toad Oil pool.”

“Sure. In an hour.”

The toad hopped into the room and slaps could be heard. Naruto slinked past in silence and exited the house, not wanting to be involved in an argument between two old geezers.

The majestic sunrise bathed the valley and its vegetation in soft light. Naruto lingered in the grassy yard for a short while before Jiraiya emerged from the house, defeated. Fukasaku followed after him, carrying a cane as if to discourage any further mutiny from his old student.

“Mornin’ Ero-sensei!” Naruto was a bit cheeky with his greeting.

Jiraiya snorted at him before mumbling, “Hey kid…”

“So you wanted me to start training today? You’re not exactly…all better…”

“Yeah, I definitely know that, but I’m not participating in strenuous activities today…Pa is doing the physical demonstrations.” Jiraiya smirked, “I’ll just stand around and lecture.”

“If that’s all you plan to do, then you best not complain while doing it.” Fukasaku remarked sharply.

“That request would make sense if I wasn’t, you know, injured.”

The toad raised his cane in warning, “Mark my words, Jiraiya-boy…it could be much worse.”

“Uh…right.” Jiraiya’s attitude did a self-preserving 180 and he lead the way to the training pool. It was a slow procession as the group walked beneath giant banana leaves all the way to a courtyard surrounded by toad statues. With a relieved groan, Jiraiya took a seat in the grass and Fukasaku hopped to the top of stone steps beside the pool. At the center, a toad fountain was spouting oil.

“And here we are!” Fukasaku announced, “Would you care to begin this lesson, Jiraiya-boy?”

“No, we didn’t discuss how to do it.”

“It’s tricky business. Feeling the chakra in nature all around you takes patience and discipline. It won’t feel the same as the chakra within your body.” Jiraiya scratched his chin, “I can’t properly describe what natural chakra feels like…but we can help you discover it for yourself.”

Naruto astutely glanced at the pool, “It has something to do with that oil?”
“You bet it does. Toad Oil is a great tool for helping a shinobi become more sensitive to natural chakra. If you hold still and focus, with a bit of practice…you’ll be able to feel it. From there, you’ll have to learn how much is appropriate to absorb, because if you take in too much,” He nodded towards a behemoth statue, “You will quickly transform into a toad statue if you’re saturated with natural energy.”

“How do I…” The boy looked perplexed, “Not do that?”

“I’ll give you a good smack that’ll bring you back to your senses,” Fukasaku announced, “I can prevent that transformation.”

“Oh. Phew…”

“Yeah, so you don’t need to worry about that. Pa will keep an eye on you.” Jiraiya assured him, “If you take in too little natural chakra, it’ll barely make a difference. Once you strike the proper balance of mental energy, physical energy and natural energy within your body…” He smiled, “You will reap the incredible benefits of Senjutsu.”

“Your speed and strength will become exponentially greater!” Fukasaku added.

Jiraiya continued, “And you’ll have a tremendous, external source of chakra to tap into.”

Then we can teach you some time-honored techniques…” The old toad was getting excited.

Naruto was quickly revved up, standing between the two sages. The prospect of having a reservoir of chakra that did not come from the Kyuubi was too good to pass up. The pride of mastering jutsu his teacher was famous for was also enthralling. He rushed up to the steps where Fukasaku was settled, and was about ready to douse himself in oil.

The toad’s cane barred him from the pool, “Not so fast, Naruto-boy.”

“Yeah…I need to mention the realistic outlook of this training,” Jiraiya informed him solemnly, “Naruto, you are very likely to spend most of your days patted down with oil…and getting the shit beat out of you. Then you’ve got to learn to accumulate nature chakra without oil and practice…” He squinted his eyes, estimating, “Probably for the next five years.”

Naruto whipped his head around, aghast, “What?”

“Well that’s how long it took me to get the balance right. I meditated my ass off!” He pointed accusingly at Fukasaku, “And Pa and Ma beat me over the head until I was cross-eyed, regularly, for pretty much five years. It was nearly ten years before I had mastered all of the techniques…”

“No, no, no…there’s no way I’m staying away from home that long!” He crossed his arms, fuming, “I’ll miss the exam! Hell, I’ll miss a lot of exams! I might as well tell Baa-chan that she can’t count on me as a Leaf ninja!”

“Relax.”

“No! And what about Hinata? Or Gaara or Haku? All of my friends!” Naruto’s nostrils flared angrily, “We agreed that two years made sense! Why would you encourage me to start training like this when I’m getting prepared to go back to Konoha?”

“Someone had to go and forsake Kyuubi-chakra.” Jiraiya nagged, “Need I remind you that the Akatsuki will be after you? Quite soon, might I add. You need to be able to at least escape them, or better still, clean their fucking clocks!” The sage raised his voice, “I am not losing you or Gaara to criminals like them.”

“I…” The boy hesitated for a moment, “I…understand all of that. But is training more important than me living my life and accomplishing what I want to do?”

Jiraiya looked at him with a stone-faced expression, “You won’t get to live or accomplish things if they kill you.”

“Okay.” Naruto accepted that argument, “So…what if I really train hard…and then when it’s time for the Chunin Exam I take a month off to return to Konoha?” He brightened with another idea, “If I make enough progress maybe I could travel between Leaf and Mount Myoboku? I’ll keep up with Sage Training!”

“No.”

Naruto scowled at his teacher, “Why not?”

“Because I know that once you’re in Konoha you won’t leave again.”

“Sure I could if I-”

“I’m not an idiot, Naruto!” Jiraiya was furious, “It will be hard enough for you to rationalize that shitty, turnaround trip as soon as you see your friends and start missions,” He was bristling, “You’ll tire of that routine. You won’t take this training seriously. And forget it if you carry on dating that princess of yours! I know you well enough to be absolutely certain that she will wipe that cockamamie plan of yours right out of your head!”

“Ero-sensei-!”

“I’m putting my foot down.” Jiraiya announced, “If you’re going to take on a member of the Akatsuki, you’re going to need all of the chakra and training you can get. I won’t always be around to protect you. That anti-Fox chakra stunt of yours was the last straw. You’re going to master Senjutsu or bust. Got it?”

Wide-eyed, Naruto stared at Jiraiya and wracked his brain for a solution. He wasn’t going to pass over Sage Training, but he wasn’t willing to sacrifice the next few years of his life either.

“Then I’ll stay here. I’ll train.” Naruto relented, “But I’ll finish early.”

“That’d be impressive.”

“In less than a year!”

“That’d be pretty goddamn impressive!” Jiraiya ground his teeth at the declaration, “You have no idea how intense this gets! I trained for ten years to learn all that I know now! You can’t make light of it, because-” He gestured his thumb towards a toad statue, “That’s gonna be you.”

“I can do it.” Naruto insisted.

“You can’t.”

“I will because I really need to.”

Jiraiya brought his uninjured arm down and slammed his fist on the ground, “You need to listen to me! This isn’t like the Rasengan or the Hiraishin! No amount of your inherent talent is going to speed you along…if you screw up there are severe consequences. I don’t want you to get captured and killed, but I sure as hell don’t want to walk up to a statue and say: hey Naruto, how’s it going?

“Enough, Jiraiya.” Fukasaku finally intervened, “Before this argument starts to circle in on itself, I suggest we give Naruto a taste of what he is to learn.” He motioned for Naruto to approach him, “Come here, Naruto.”

He knelt down beside Fukasaku and got a comforting pat on the shoulder. Some tension escaped him, but Naruto was still not quite returned to his amicable mood. The length of Sage Training was an issue he would need to revisit later. Fukasaku scooped a handful of toad oil from the pool and rubbed it onto the back of Naruto’s hand.

“Jiraiya is right. This training is long-winded.” Fukasaku explained, still rubbing, “No one who has ever studied Senjutsu has ever mastered it in so little time.”

“What’s the record?”

Fukasaku chuckled, “I’m not sure. Jiraiya was the fastest learner I’ve met. I suppose past disciples were not in as great of a hurry as the two of you…”

There was a tingling like static electricity, but far more faint, seeping in through the spot on his hand. Naruto noted that the sensation then coursed through his whole body, a rich, profound, organic energy that was at the same time gentle and fleeting. He thought his eyes were deceiving him when he watched his fingers fuse into the webbed hand of a toad.

“What the-?”

He was clubbed over the head by Fukasaku’s cane. Jiraiya laughed vindictively.

While whimpering in pain, Naruto could see that he had returned to his human state. Fukasaku sighed and hopped over to the nearest stone statue, “I expect that you felt something?”

“Yes. You’ll be able to feel natural energy more easily with more training. A master such as myself can feel it whenever I am still, without the assistance of toad oil.” Fukasaku told him, “You may think it foolish to endeavor to learn a skill like this, at least for now…” He paused for a long minute, still and silent, then spoke again, “But you’ll be glad you did once you can do this!”

The small toad heaved, getting leverage on the bottom of the towering stone statue, and with a grunt of effort, the toad lifted the effigy over his head. Naruto’s mouth hung open in shock and Fukasaku slowly turned, balancing tons of stone over his head. His arms wobbled slightly.

“Jiraiya-boy,” Fukasaku called, “Catch!”

Jiraiya screamed in terror when the toad let go of the statue, but was relieved when it was set back on the ground harmlessly. The ground trembled. Fukasaku cracked himself up, “Ha! You really thought I would throw it at you? Ho ho…no, I respect these disciples far too much to break them over your head…”

“That wasn’t funny, you damn prune!” Jiraiya barked, “I’ve been through enough!”

Naruto had found it entertaining. When Fukasaku returned to the steps he asked for Naruto to take his shirt off. A bit fearful, Naruto complied, and was splashed with more toad oil.
“It’s time for you to give it a try, Naruto-boy. Be still and calm. Be one with nature!”

He folded his legs and took a seat, ‘Is it really that easy, Gramps? If this is gonna take me years…I doubt I’d know nature even if it came up and punched me in the face…’

The prickling, delicate chakra surrounding Naruto began to find its way in again, by far more rapidly. Almost immediately he was bashed on the head. Without opening his eyes, Naruto lurched over and groaned, massaging the sore spot.

“Off to a great start!” Jiraiya chortled.

“Quiet!” Fukasaku warned his former student, turning back to the blonde teen, “Sorry, Naruto-boy. Let’s resume.”

And they resumed and resumed for hours.

It was a dismal, tedious morning eclipsed entirely by pain and frustration. By noontime Naruto was wondering if Fukasaku could see the growing, scarlet lump that was rising up from the crown of his head. He could feel nature chakra well enough, Naruto estimated, but his mentors insisted he was moving too fast or absorbing too much. Since “too fast and too much” was the only speed Naruto had ever been comfortable with, Sage Training, he concluded, was utterly foreign to him, ‘Never mind Pa and his hate-stick…’

By early afternoon Naruto experienced a small breakthrough. He had held back, concentrating more deeply, honing in on the delicate tendrils of energy all around him. Ever so slowly and cautiously, he let the vibrant rays permeate him, mixing warily with his own chakra. Then there was a warm, creamy substance on his face. It was most assuredly not nature chakra or anything of the sort. Naruto opened an eye and then, with a sigh, relinquished his sharpened, meditative state.

He wiped his forehead with the back of his hand and inspected, ‘Okay. This looks a lot like—’

Jiraiya was peeling with laughter, “Ha ha! First time’s a real bummer! Ha!” Naruto confirmed that it was bird excrement trailing down his head and cheek as Jiraiya continued, “Better get used to that! The more in-tune with nature you are, the more frequently animals and other wildlife will approach you. There will be plenty more birds where that came from!”

“Aw will you shut up, Perv!” He flicked his hand in Jiraiya’s direction, shaking the poop off.

While Jiraiya hooted mirthfully from the grass, Naruto turned to Fukasaku, pleading for assistance, “Please tell me he won’t be here every day when I practice?”

“I assure you he won’t, in fact,” Fukasaku shouted to Jiraiya, “Get lost already! You’ve given all the input we can stand!” And Jiraiya happily retreated, “There…now he will sleep and you and I can avoid further antagonizing.”

Frowning, Naruto watched as Jiraiya disappeared around the bend, “Hey, Pa…”

“Hm?”

“I know Ero-sensei told me that I can’t treat this training like any other technique of tried to learn, but,” He made a hand sign in preparation of making Kage Bunshin, “I think I would do better if I was getting more experience. That’s just what works for me, you know?”

“So you wish to use Shadow Clones?”
“Is that cool?”

“Well,” Fukasaku rubbed his chin, “The trick is that while they can relay their experience to you they can also absorb too much natural energy. You should not make more clones than I can smash, or we risk turning you into a statue in double the time!”

“What, okay…how about four?”

The toad approved of the suggestion and Naruto proceeded, letting four clones materialize beside him with a puff of smoke. Without protest the doppelgangers sat and closed their eyes, preparing to meditate deeply.

“Naruto-boy.”

He cracked an eye open.

“Jiraiya is not trying to discourage you. I suspect that he has a mountain of worries…and it seems to be most palpable when you are near. While I can’t approve of how he has been trying to impress upon you the seriousness of Sage Training and how your life can be in jeopardy…I do believe he has said those things because he cares for you.” The toad reasoned, “To be quite frank, I am on your side, child. You can pursue this training as quickly and intensely as you see fit. After all, if you can achieve it in a year’s time, why in the world wouldn’t you?”

“Ero-sensei doesn’t think I can.” He pointed out sullenly.

“Naruto…he was not the brightest student in the world.” Fukasaku grinned, “Jiraiya-boy was downright hopeless! Look how far he made it! I am confident you will surpass him…and maybe that is what grates on his ego. He must expect that you will.”

“Sheesh! I’m not doing it to be better than him! I’m doing it because I want to stay alive!”

“A perfectly sensible motivation.” The toad nodded.

Naruto closed his eyes again and relaxed, ‘At least Pa thinks I can do this.’ And he got the sense that, once he had the opportunity to ask Hinata, Gaara or Haku what they thought of his endeavor, ‘I guess…they’ll plan to see me soon.’

Two days later, a few miles beyond the perimeter of the Leaf Village, Hikune and his teammate were completing their return journey. Their mission to escort a terminally-ill young lord and his family to a seaside palace was successful, albeit very sad, they had conceded. The journey home was a bit more pleasant.

“I’m telling you, I didn’t say a word to her,” Mion insisted, “I just went to the forge and picked my sword up. She didn’t even charge me as much as I expected.”

“Are you certain Tenten doesn’t know about it?”

“Just chill already. If your cousin wanted to sweep it all under the rug and forget about it, what makes you think he’d be inclined to tell her?”

With a deep sigh Hikune acknowledged news of his tantrum had not spread very far. His teammates had safeguarded him adequately and had happily resumed missions with him when the Hyuga elders gave permission. He counted himself lucky that his outburst had not gotten back to the young lady who had caused it.
Mion commented on how the forest always smelled different, smelled better, the closer one came to Konoha. While Hikune agreed distractedly, he heard the faint snap of a tree branch behind them. His trained ear registered that it had a distinctly human quality to it, and so he held out his hand to his teammate, signaling caution.

Without a word, Mion waited for directions as Hikune surveyed their surroundings with the Byakugan. The pair dropped down from the treetops to the ground, watching the undergrowth knowingly.

“We already know you’re there.” Hikune warned, “Come out.”

A long, eerie pause ended when a man stepped out of the leafy thicket, holding his hands up helplessly.

“I need some help.” The stranger told them.

“Apparently. You’ve been following us for quite a while.” Hikune observed, “What do you need?”

“I have friends in the Leaf Village. Since I don’t know my way around very well, I thought it’d make sense to ask Leaf shinobi.”

The precise moment they lowered their guard, the man’s arm snapped, hurling a kunai that landed between the two and sunk into the tree bark behind them. Mion laid his hand on the hilt of the sword at his back while Hikune pulled the knife free and read the message tied to it. ‘What is this? It’s…’

There was no demand, no threat, nor any kind of intimidation conveyed through the note. It merely had three names scrawled on it, ‘These are the members of Team Gai.’

Hikune’s suspicion was rapidly evolving into alarm. He folded the note and tucked it into his belt, surmising it may need to be presented to the Interrogation Corps, ‘This man might need to be brought in for questioning if he does not explain himself right here and now.’ Two people Hikune was very concerned about had been named on the list, and he highly doubted it was for cordial reasons.

“You can’t be friends with people you don’t know.” Hikune told the stranger, “Otherwise you’d have recognized me.”

Mion gave his friend a confused sideways glance, whispering, “What’re you-?”

The man was delighted, “Oh! So I found a friend I’ve been searching for,” His eyes narrowed, “Your features would suggest that you’re my Hyuga friend, are you not?”

“I’m Neji,” Hikune’s lie was almost panned by Mion’s stupefied expression, “And you are a nukenin.”

“See? We know each other quite well already.”

“I don’t know why you’re searching for my team, but I suggest you quit while you’re ahead. We have no business with the likes of you.”

“But I’m sure you’re at least a little curious about why I stopped by,” The nukenin prodded, “I’m Koinyu, by the way. I’ve been so rude! We ought to get better acquainted.”

The name was familiar but the young Leaf ninja could not exactly place what significance it held.

“So you’re a Rock outlaw.” Mion spat a toothpick from his mouth, gripping the sword hilt firmly, “I think we can guess why you’re looking for Leaf ninja to torment…”

“You can?” Koinyu raised finely-groomed eyebrows in surprise, “I thought I’d need to give an oaf like you a few minutes to figure it out.”

Hikune had to order Mion to stay put and not cut the insolent rogue’s head off. He returned his attention to the instigator, “Either you tell us what you need from your ‘friends’ or I will personally escort you to our Interrogation center,” He fell into a Jyukken stance to illustrate.

“Where’s the kunoichi of your team?” Hikune nearly lost his nerve when Koinyu continued, “She’s the only one Bihokokuni-sama is troubled by. There’s no need for us to quarrel if you’d be willing to exchange her.”

“Forget it.” Mion hissed.

“What do you want with her?” Hikune demanded.

“What do we want? We want to make a statement!” Koinyu smiled, “Though…you two shall serve as a decent introduction. Your severed heads will look especially good, I must say.” He did not delay a moment more and unleashed a tremendous storm of magnetized kunai and projectiles. They rained down with ferocity from all directions.

Koinyu flitted about, weaving hand-signs as Mion was cut up like a schoolyard target. Hikune rotated to defend against the assault and immediately countered. He rushed after Koinyu, dodging traps, and came close to cornering the nukenin for a 64-Palm strike. A wall of knives separated them, and while Hikune dealt with it Mion dove in, bloodied as he was, and used a Fire jutsu to steer Koinyu back in the direction of his teammate.

Hikune’s Air-Palm hit their adversary squarely in the back, knocking him across the clearing and into the trunk of a tree. Mion descended first, preparing a mighty swing of his sword, and was greeted with Koinyu’s visage dissolving into a substitution: a substitution comprised of a shrapnel-bomb. He had no time to escape, and, while rolling away behind the cover of trees, felt metal slice into the back of his vest and legs when it detonated.

Hikune had his opportunity to engage the nukenin in hand to hand combat. He was not very skilled at all, and had taken substantial punishment from several palm strikes. Hikune reeled back as his hands began to bleed profusely. His Byakugan picked up on the issue, seeing Koinyu’s skin was capable of producing sharp edges as if it were comprised of iron.

“People have never been comfortable with getting close to me.” Koinyu droned; taking the offensive before Hikune could retreat properly. He directed another typhoon of kunai and weaponry, forcing Hikune to rotate. Mion charged at him from the right, cutting down on Koinyu’s impervious shoulder with a clang, and was then quickly ensnared by a cable. The nukenin had produced the wire from a trigger up his sleeve. Hikune was swift enough to cut his friend free with a Jyukken strike and they regrouped, flanking the enemy on either side as his weaponry darted by like a flock of birds.

Mion felt the sword in his hand shudder after Koinyu completed another jutsu. Magnetized, it wrenched free of his hand, “Wait a-!” and shot forward, missing Koinyu handily, and then impaled Hikune as he was readying a Lightning Style technique. His hand-signs faltered and he paused, eyes wide, swooning where he stood. He had been skewered from front to back through the center of his chest. Mion moved to catch Hikune, barely functioning with his own metal-battered body, and ignored Koinyu’s quip about “the uselessness of teammates”.

Another storm of knives came down on them, rendering them pincushions, and then they were still.
The cawing of a crow echoed in the distant reaches of the forest. Koinyu put his hands on his hips and observed his fallen targets, “Well now…you two were all bark and no bite! I really do appreciate that you didn’t waste much of my time,” He walked out of the clearing, dusting off his shirt, “I don’t want to keep the lady waiting.”

An eternity passed within the span of a minute after Koinyu had left them to die. Stuck full of blades, Mion struggled to prop himself up on his arms, looking over to his wounded friend, “Hikune.” He slipped his knees beneath him, feeling a cascade of blood rush from the punctures in his back. The man hauled himself closer to his teammate, sliding across the stained grass, repeating Hikune’s name.

A soft cough answered. Petrified, Mion laid a hand on Hikune’s arm, “You’re awake? Good! I thought he’d double-check us.”

Hikune’s breath was a shuddering rattle. His eyes opened and shut for a few moments, as if the nerves firing in his brain could no longer process commands. He only said, “No.”

“No- what? Come on, we’ve got to-”

“I won’t…be awake much longer,” His eyes shut again, resigned and calm, “Can’t move.”

“I’ll get us some help.” Mion valiantly tried to stand and collapsed, “Just give me a second.”

“Shoda.”

“I know…I wish he came with us this time. He was busy at the hospital.” Mion lamented, believing that the medic-nin of their team would have made all the difference in their dire situation.

While Hikune lay still on his side, Mion struggled to move or do anything practical in nature. He extracted some of the knives that limited his range of motion and hastily bound up his leg with cloth ripped from his shirt sleeve.

“Take it out.” Hikune’s words were nearly inaudible.

Mion’s voice cracked, “You’ll die if I do.”

“I will anyway.”

Hating himself, Mion did as he was asked. The blade was removed quickly and Mion began to weep, despairing, having never imagined he would have to do such a thing. Hikune’s vest was saturated and the man no longer had his faculties. Behind closed eyelids he pictured his father’s face and then his younger brother, his mind conjuring images with impressionist features; soft color and light.

Concluding that there was no escape or possibility of help, Mion stopped struggling. He slumped over right beside his friend, no longer crying, and breathed more slowly.

“You know, the Hokage has such a big crush on you.” Mion said in all seriousness, “I can just tell. It’s good she’s single. If you asked politely I’m sure she’d keep you secret.” He laughed in spite of himself.

Hikune’s silence was expected. Mion stared at him for a long moment and then wondered if his wife and unborn child would be angry if he didn’t try to get up and be there for them.

He drifted off.
Tsunade scanned over two notes: one was from Yuuhi Kurenai and the second was from a medical examiner. With a ‘hmph!’ of annoyance she settled her eyes on Hatake Sato, who stood expectantly in front of her desk.

“You do look a lot better.” Tsunade conceded.

“Does that mean you’ll clear me?” The boy smiled excitedly.

“It’s just an observation.” She glanced over the notes again, “Shino.”

Shino had been waiting without comment beside his teammate. He respectfully obliged the village leader, “Hokage-sama?”

“Is Sato keeping up well?”

“Just as well as he did prior to his injury.” The young Aburame confirmed.

Sighing, Tsunade set the documents down, “Kurenai is vouching for you as well. I suppose I can give you permission for D and C ranked missions with a clear conscience, however,” Her tone sharpened, “If you experience any complications or set-backs while performing your duties you must report it to me. There is no guarantee that you are at full strength yet.”

“Let me find out. I promise I’ll be honest, Tsunade-sama.”

“You damn well better be honest! After all the work I put in fixing you…” She gripped the arms of her desk chair, “Don’t expect me to be your personal physician should you sustain injury again. I don’t care if Kakashi cries or begs.”

Without warning, an ANBU agent materialized in the room and kneeled about a pace away from Sato. He flinched in fright but regained his composure, miffed that Shino had not spooked in the slightest.

The masked shinobi spoke, “Hokage-sama, I have urgent news that I need to share with you.”

Eyebrows raised, the woman stood from her chair, “You’re cleared, Sato. The both of you are dismissed.”

Inquisitive and a little uneasy, Sato and Shino both left the office and shut the door behind them.

“I get the feeling this is bad news,” Tsunade murmured, “What is it?”

“My squadron was beginning a patrol of our third sector, about two and a half miles outside of the village,” The agent explained, “We discovered two Leaf shinobi fatally wounded in the forest. The attacker has not yet been determined and I sent three of my subordinates to begin tracking whoever was responsible. One of the shinobi, the Chunin, is still alive. He is being cared for at the hospital.”

“Which pair was this?”

“Hyuga Hikune and Runruna Mion.”

Tsunade sat down again, shocked. She had been quite fond of them and had even had a pleasant conversation with them days before.

“Hikune is dead then?”

“Yes.”
“You retrieved his body?”

“Affirmative, ma’am.”

She twisted her chair around to face the window and stared out at the horizon, dotted with treetops and patchwork buildings. Her mind raced before she could come to a decision, rising to her feet, and then addressed the Black Ops ninja, “I need to speak to the survivor. Was he conscious?”

“In and out.”

“Alright. I’ll be on my way now. Prepare another team and survey the perimeter. I want the Sensory Corps notified as well.”

“Right away.” He vanished.

Tsunade briskly made her way out of the office and down the hallway. She passed Shizune and beckoned her to follow, “Walk with me.”

“What is it, Tsunade-sama?”

“A team of Leaf shinobi was attacked just outside of the village. One fatality.” She began descending the stairs, “I want to get to the bottom of this before I lose any more of my ninja.”

“Right!” Shizune followed and Ton-Ton kept in single file behind her.

Feeling that the incident with the Akatsuki was not too far behind, Tsunade could not help but suspect another attack. She reflected on Hikune; she had been the one to approve of his promotion to Jounin, trusted him with several high-profile missions, fancied him in her afternoon daydreams, and appreciated him just as much as other shinobi that had found a place in her heart, ‘He had such promise.’ She wasn’t listening to whatever Shizune was saying, ‘On my watch… this will never happen again.’

By the time Chiyo had plodded into the Academy training yards behind Matsuri and Muta, their presence seemed wholly unnecessary. A more experienced class of students was doing demonstrations for a younger, newly accepted class. Tazuna and Inari circumvented the crowd of students and met with the Sand ninja. Inari grasped Matsuri’s arms, wide-eyed, “You’re back! Are you okay, Matsuri? They were saying you got abducted!”

“I did. I helped some of the students escape.” She clarified, “But we have to be careful! The Shin clan has moved into the city in an effort to take more children.”

Tazuna raised a bushy eyebrow at Chiyo. She was doubled-over and trying to catch her breath.

“She’ll be fine.” Muta assured him, “Chiyo-sama is here to provide protection.”

“Golly-gee, we’ve got superior security today don’t we?” The old man nearly rolled his eyes, “Where the heck is Kankuro? If there’s a problem I expect him to get his butt over here and watch these kids! Not your Sand grandma and grandchild.”

Matsuri opened her mouth and then shut it, not wanting to speak out of turn. Muta estimated that Kankuro would arrive at the school after doing a sweep of the city.

Chiyo waggled a finger at Tazuna, righting herself, “Now that’s no way for a grandpa to talk! If a granny can’t make a difference in these children’s lives then why are you standing here, you old “You’ve got twenty years on me.”

The old woman strode past him into the fenced-in yard, motioning for Matsuri and Muta to join her. She called over her shoulder, “It seems to me you’re just jealous that I’m a Legendary Ninja!”

“Keep dreaming.” He gruffed and then turned to yell at a pair of latecomers, “I told students to be here at 10am! You’re going to make up whatever you missed.”

The two boys shouted an apology before joining the audience. The lesson continued for another ten minutes before the majority of both classes ventured inside to the lobby for refreshments. There was a lull as Matsuri and Muta took a seat at a picnic table. Chiyo stifled a yawn.

Tazuna’s stomach twisted in horror when two adult shinobi suddenly vaulted over the fence and pounced on the gaggle of students that had lingered outside. Two more Sound ninja ambushed the students, tossing a net over them with a practiced motion.

“Oh! I love it when they rush in without thinking...” Chiyo made a hand sign and flicked her wrist, revealing ten of her puppets that had been disguised as students. Hacking the net apart, several of her puppets swung forward and stuck the attackers with bladed arms. Bloodied, the men fell backwards and dared not move.

Shrieking in fright, the remaining two darted about, trying to regain some control with Sound Ninjutsu. While Chiyo and her Sand companions scrambled after them, Inari cautiously led his grandfather out of the training yard and around the back of the building. He kept a kunai steadied in his hand, reflecting on the situation, “You know what, Grandpa? That old lady can probably handle it.”

“I don’t want to take that chance, Inari. We need to stay clear of the fighting.” Tazuna peered into the lobby through a window, seeing there was mayhem inside, “What the-? What’s going on?”

Tazuna opened a disarmed emergency exit door just a fraction. He and Inari stuck their heads in and beheld the rest of the Shin clan wrangling up over a dozen students, binding the screaming youngsters like prisoners and dragging them out the double-doors of the cafeteria. The two boys who had arrived late were assisting in the harvest. Inari recognized them and hollered, “You rotten traitors! I’m gonna have you kicked out of the program and-!”

A hail of kunai and shuriken shot towards them, and Tazuna shut the door fast enough to deflect the strike. He and his grandson took off running, hoping to inform Matsuri and her esteemed elder of the trickery.

At the front of the building they found it was not going so well. A Sound Genjutsu had put Chiyo to sleep and her puppets lay scattered around her. Muta was trying to shake her back to consciousness while Matsuri scared off the last able-bodied enemy. With a sigh, Tazuna gave Muta the update while a platoon of extra Sand ninja arrived at the Academy just a minute too late.

“What am I paying you people for?” Tazuna roared, pointing to Chiyo, “If this lady is what you consider elite then I hope I can get a refund! Go get my kids!” Inari directed the squadron towards the back of the building.

When Kankuro and Menma rounded the corner onto the grounds Tazuna held up a hand, halting them, “No. I don’t wanna hear it. Honestly, I want to fire you.”

Kankuro smiled, “You sure? I’m having them funneled into a trap.”
“Bullshit.”

Alarmed, Menma vouched for him, “Tazuna-san, Kankuro disguised one of his puppets as a hostage and lured three members of the Shin clan. We’ve captured them.”

“Where? Back in town?”

“Yup. We extracted the truth from them about where their rendezvous point was. I’ve got my Jounin waiting there now.” Kankuro filled him in, “If the rest of the clan brings the kids there while my tracking platoon is following them…they’re gonna be right where we want them.”

Frustrated, Tazuna criticized the dangers of the rescue plan. Menma spotted Matsuri and hurried to her, enclosing her in a tight hug, “Matsuri! I was told that-!”

“I’m fine.” She was very pleased that he cared, “Thank you for helping Kankuro-sama! I knew I could trust you.”

“I’m sorry that I didn’t do more to prevent this…”

“You’re making up for it.” Matsuri assured him. They followed after Kankuro and Tazuna who were moving along to the ambush site. Muta was stuck with hauling Chiyo away while she snored.

It was exhilarating to finally coordinate with her allies, Matsuri thought. Kankuro was at the head, storming down a series of memorized alleyways and streets, and Menma and Matsuri tagged along, aware of Inari and his grandfather trailing behind them. Overhead, Baki had flashed by over brick rooftops, positioning another squad. ‘Now we have the opportunity to overwhelm them! There are three times as many Sand ninja here than there are Sound!’

The group halted, feeling the earth beneath their feet rumble. People scattered away from a small building’s collapse and then they about-faced, avoiding another explosion near a footbridge. Screams of panic intensified as smoke bombs peppered the streets. Kankuro continued on, calling to his subordinates, “They’re trying to create a diversion! Stick to it! The Sensory Corps are onto them.”

Wind jutsu cleared the smoke on the road, restoring visibility, and Matsuri sighed happily to see about ten students rushing back to the protection of Sand Academy teachers. The Shin clan, it seemed, had used the last of their explosives. Sand ninja dove in and met them boldly. Matsuri looked over her shoulder to scold Tazuna on his cynicism and then glimpsed him being bodily dragged into passageway. With a gasp, Matsuri tapped Menma on the shoulder, “We’ve lost Tazuna and Inari!”

Without notifying Kankuro, who was using Karasu to discipline his enemies, the two turned around.

“What happened?” Menma had his ocarina in hand, “They were just with us!”

“I don’t know. I saw Tazuna’s feet and then-“ She was interrupted by combative shouting, “This way!” Matsuri leapt up, crossing over an awning, a tavern sign and then stone edging, keeping pace with the retreating Sound ninja and his captives. Menma barreled down back to the pavement, tackling the shinobi from behind. He dropped Tazuna, who was much too heavy of a hostage, and then raced away with Inari tucked under his arm.

Tazuna pulled a cloth gag out of his mouth and struggled to his feet, “Get Inari! I’ll find some help!” He hobbled back to the main road while Matsuri and Menma flew on, keeping the lone Sound ninja in their sights.

Disoriented, Tazuna returned to the main drag’s sidewalk and found that the avenue was a mess.
'Unbelievable! This damage is going to cost a fortune!' He held his nose as he passed through the fading gas of a smoke bomb, trying to flag down a Sand ninja. No one seemed to hear his impassioned, indignant demands, “One of you bums has to go help my grandson! Come on already!” He didn’t have the heart to take the Academy Teachers’ attention away from their frightened students, and so he popped into every unlocked shop door and eatery, screaming for a shinobi’s consideration. After six failed attempts, he got someone’s attention in a café.

“Hey you!” Tazuna rasped at a Mist ninja seated at an antique table, “We’ve got a crisis on our hands! You like this town, right? If you think it’s worth stopping thugs from screwing with the Tide Village then lend a hand!”

“It’s nice here…but I’m not a resident.” The young twenty-something was hip and well-dressed; “I just arrived here a day ago.” He sounded utterly disinterested.

“So, you’re not the motivated sort, eh?” Frustrated, Tazuna gnashed his teeth, “Well the Sand kunoichi who is chasing down a criminal to save my grandson has only been here for a few days. She thinks it’s worth fighting for.”

The man gave him a long, even look. He balanced his chin on his left hand regally, “I really don’t like fighting if I don’t have to.”

“Who the hell does?”

A tense 30 seconds passed as onlookers (bewildered coffee-drinkers) watched the old man and the shinobi engage in a stare-off. The young man reluctantly stood up and pushed his seat back, finishing his last sip of tea. He walked over to the demanding old man, “You’re Tazuna, right?”

“Yeah.”

“I’ll help,” The ninja offered, “But I don’t want anyone to know about this. I’m trying to lay low,” He moved to the door, rolling up the sleeves of his yukata, “Oh…and I want a gift voucher to this restaurant when I get back. You can do that for me, I’m sure.”

“Fine, you stingy bastard!” Tazuna relented, “The youngsters ran into the forest near the canal. Please…just go help them.”

“Very well.” With the matter settled, the shinobi went ahead and ignored the waitress’ complaint of an unpaid lunch bill.

“Hang on a second,” Tazuna followed him out the door and onto the smoky street, “What do I call you?”

The man raised his eyebrows as if surprised by the question. He swirled a pipe around in a small detergent cup and a smile spread on his face, “I’m Utakata.”

“Matsuri,” Menma kept his voice down as they stalked through treetops, “We need to be careful. This is the leader of the Shin clan.”

“Yes, I recognize him. He spoke to me a day ago.” She recalled, “I don’t think he’ll be so tough when he’s not surrounded by his precious clan!”

He shook his head, “Please don’t misunderstand. Ongakare is not physically strong…but if he separates us from each other we won’t stand a chance. Stay close to me.”
“Will he hurt Inari?”

“He won’t.” Menma frowned, “But I don’t think he’ll hesitate to punish me.”

A surge of adrenalin coursed through the girl, ‘That’s not happening! I know we can do this. As soon as I have the chance to get Inari back...’

Fortunately for them, Inari was cursing up a storm and being as difficult as possible. The two young shinobi were able to follow his incensed babbling to a grove of cedars. Ongakare had dropped Inari, fed-up, and was thinking about silencing him with a jutsu. Matsuri and Menma leapt down from the canopy, weapons poised, and were both swiftly pummeled by a cloth sash that arced up to meet them. They landed in the undergrowth nearby and Ongakare clucked his tongue, drawing his sash-whip back into his sleeve.

“Your calling in life must be to pester me.” The man groaned, “I have bad taste in trainees. Why do I always find whiny, disobedient children?”

“Have you ever thought it’s because we don’t want to join you?” Inari was struggling with the tie around his wrists and ankles, “You’ve gotta learn how to take no for an answer!”

“I can’t afford to. Not anymore.” Ongakare turned his gaze back to Menma, “You are exceptionally disappointing. I thought I could rely on you...my last devoted student. You’ll throw away your heritage for some mock-up shinobi village full of mediocre charlatans...”

“I don’t want any part in your way of life. You helped me survive, but...you have no regard for others. I was taken in not as your family, but as your pawn; that’s what a clan is to you. You have never cared about the harm you inflict!” Menma was bristling, “I would rather stand alongside the friends I made here.”

“Hm. Well...that is the typical language of a bad investment...” Unimpressed, the man made hand signs and then clapped in Inari’s ear; the boy went rigid and then toppled like a wooden plank.

Tense, Menma muttered to Matsuri, “He’s using Sound Ninjutsu.”

Ongakare cut Inari free and then whistled, looking smug when the bewildered boy rose to his feet again. He patted Inari on the shoulder and gloated, “You children seem to think that if you don’t come willingly then you will not be subject to my commands.” He took a step back, aloof, “But you’ll wish you came of your own accord after I’ve made you dance.”

Hollering, Inari warned his friends to avoid him as he charged. His movements had been high-jacked by each whistle and trill Ongakare made, directing him like sheep dog. Matsuri was grateful that Inari only had about three or four kunai on him, which she capably deflected. Inari’s close-combat was virtually harmless, but it did drive a wedge between Matsuri and Menma, who were both concerned about hurting the innocent boy. While dodging and defending, Ongakare’s sash coiled around Matsuri’s leg and tripped her. A blink later, Inari had punched her several times in the face, “Oh gosh! I’m so sorry!” The boy was inconsolable as his mutinous body engaged in terrible violence.

Several melodious notes reverberated from Menma’s ocarina as he flitted from the branches above, hoping that Ongakare would not interrupt his song. Matsuri quickly noticed the effect it had on her, ‘Wow! It’s as if I could-’ She caught Inari’s hand and then hurled him like a Frisbee into a tangle of ferns, ‘Oh! I hope I didn’t hurt him!’ Matsuri hopped up, pulling Ongakare by his sash and mightily flung the man with a cry when she wrenched herself free. Menma landed beside her, continuing the jutsu.
“I feel like…” She tried to put the sensation into words, “Like a bull. A stampeding bull.” He laughed at her description but could not waver. Chakra flaring, muscles alert, Matsuri took off after the lone Sound ninja and summoned from her scroll, procuring a chain-scythe.

While the kunoichi went back and forth with Ongakare, avoiding his sash and slashing sections of it with her weapon, Menma located Inari. The small boy announced his imminent spring but was freed in the nick of time; Menma had countered the jutsu with a few hand seals and clapped for him.

“Thanks,” Inari wheezed while slouched over, “That took a lot out of me…I hope Matsuri’s okay…”

“I’ve got to get back to her. The Rush Melody is going to wear off! Stay here.” Menma pushed his friend down into the cover of greenery, “If you have the chance you need to get away.”

“I can help!”

“He’ll use the same jutsu on you if he gets close enough.” Menma warned, “Return to your grandfather and let us handle this.” He darted away before Inari could protest.

The momentum Matsuri had built up was fading. She and the Sound ninja dueled with their ranged weapons, evading each other, ensnaring their weapons and tugging. They had a tug of war before their respective whips broke apart, snapping against tree trunks. Menma started up his melody again from behind Matsuri, bolstering her.

The girl grinned as she rocketed down, looping her scythe dangerously as she would a Jouhyou’s dart. She hacked through tree branches and then sunk the blade into her enemy’s back. He collapsed and then the substitution broke, revealing a small tree stump. A panicked sound came from behind her and the music abruptly ended.

Matsuri turned to see Menma’s throat snared with Ongakare’s sash. With his free hand, the Sound ninja tossed his second cloth whip at her, knocking her off her feet. She reached desperately for her weapon when she felt the sash wrap around her neck, squeezing tight. She and Menma flailed as they were ruthlessly choked and dragged around the grove. Ongakare fell backwards in surprise and Matsuri watched as the section of sash imprisoning her was also burned through. If she wasn’t crazy, she was sure that she saw a bubble eat through the fabric as if it were acid.

Matsuri staggered to her feet and was relieved to see Menma heaving in the grass, finally able to breathe. A man in a long, blue yukata strolled past, blowing bubbles with a pipe. He regarded her curiously and then asked, “You two are friends of Tazuna’s, right?”

She nodded stupidly, unsure of whom her savior was.

Utakata glanced over to Ongakare, “And you are annoying villagers here…” Before the Sound ninja could begin a witty retort, a huge bubble enveloped him from behind. His screech of shock was muffled within the sphere.

“You know,” The Mist ninja was conversational with Ongakare, “Many scoundrels have tried to take over this land before you…they’ve tried to coerce and intimidate people here. Have you learned nothing from witnessing their failures?”
The clan leader’s screaming intensified. The liquid of the bubble was alkaline, burning the man while he was trapped. Utakata let him writhe in agony for a short time before setting him free. Ongakare howled while he rolled in the dirt, trying to relieve the chemical burn that was devouring his skin.

“There.” Utakata folded his arms, satisfied, “He should hold still for you now.”

Menma, who was on his feet again, exchanged a look with Matsuri. It had to sink in that the stranger intended them to finish what they started. The boy began another tune on his instrument and Matsuri, invigorated, completed the Sound ninja’s beating.

Menma and Matsuri had tied Ongakare up in his own sash and dragged him back into town. They thanked Utakata as he walked ahead of them, incredibly nonchalant.

“Oh, it was nothing.” He shrugged, “All I really did was stand there and talk.”

While that was certainly true Matsuri thought of how the man’s odd jutsu could wreak havoc, ‘It seems to me that there are many shinobi around here with unusual talents.’ Menma’s music, an elderly puppeteer, and now a gloomy bubble-blower; she was feeling very normal in comparison.

After arriving at the main avenue near the Academy they stopped to rest. They were greeted by Sand ninja who had defeated the rest of the Shin clan and were inspecting the well-being of all trainees. Inari had returned to Tazuna’s side and was taking stock of every single displaced brick and shard of broken glass. Even from several blocks away, she could hear the old man’s furious, penny-pinching grievances.

Baki happily took the unconscious clan leader from Matsuri and sent her over to Kankuro. She and Menma observed as he used smelling salts to rouse Chiyo, who had been left on a bench. The old woman’s head snapped up, “Woo! Ha ha! Take that you pigs!” She was waving her arms as if her prized puppets were still at her command.

“Chiyo.” Kankuro snapped his fingers in front of her face, “You’re not fighting anyone!”

“Of course I am, you fool! I’ve just whipped every last one of them!” She cackled.

“You’ve been asleep.”

Chiyo regarded him quizzically for a moment and then looked around at the wreckage and smoke. “I did all of this…while I was asleep?” She stood up and dusted off her tunic, “My word…Ebizo will have my head if he sees this.”

“That’s not what I mean.” Kankuro sighed and gave up after the old woman tottered away. He smiled when he saw Matsuri, battered and bruised as she was, “Hey kid…it’s good to have you back.”

“I’m glad I made it back.” She agreed.

“Did you take the leader down?”

Matsuri indicated Menma with a tilt of her head, “I had help!”

The Jounin’s unyielding stare fell on the blonde boy, “Huh. So you’re definitely with us?”

“I am.” Menma nodded, wondering when he would no longer have to affirm it.
“Well then, you owe Matsuri a lot. She stood up for you since the start.” Kankuro rolled his neck to relax and then froze, bewildered, when other shinobi appeared at the far end of the road, “Oh you have got to be kidding me.”

“What’s the matter, Kankuro-sama?” Matsuri quickly realized what the problem was. Gaara had turned up with Leaf ninja at his side, walking slowly between the devastated store fronts, his face revealing plainly how he did not have money to fix this.

“Rescued the kids. Stopped the Shin clan.” Kankuro shook his head, dismayed, “Gaara’s gonna kill me anyway.”

“Sensei won’t do that! We did what we had to do!”

“We’re gonna go broke paying for this and Temari is gonna rub it in my face…” He trudged to his doom. ‘We didn’t need backup after all…and Matsuri was just fine. I kind of shot myself in the foot by asking Gaara for help and then letting him see this disaster…’ He prayed that if he kissed up to the Kazekage and apologized for his blunder he might escape with minor injuries.

Matsuri kept her distance for the time being, watching as Gaara seemed to reanimate and begin speaking to his brother in the coldest, severest tone she had ever heard. Even the Leaf ninja who had tagged along shrunk away in fright.

“Matsuri…”

She turned back to Menma. He blushed when he told her, “I really do owe you a lot. I owe you everything.”

She was flustered, “D-Don’t be silly!”

“If it hadn’t been for you…I doubt I ever would have had the chance to make this place my home. I couldn’t have escaped the Shin clan on my own.” Menma furrowed his brow, resolute, “Allow me to make it up to you! I want to thank you by taking you out.”

“You…do?” Her voice was faint, “Out where?”

“On a date.”

Matsuri wasn’t sure exactly what she said while sputtering in the affirmative, but she noticed that it made him smile.

Afterwards she asked if he wanted to meet her sensei, “That one over there with Kankuro?” He shuddered but with her assurance he consented to it. They passed by Tazuna and Inari who were seated on the edge of a fountain (its spout now crooked) and Tazuna gave them a half-hearted wave of thanks. His grandson sighed.

The old man looked up when a hand was extended to him. It didn’t seem like it was held out to help him up either. Utakata, as casual as before, had stopped in front of him with an expectant expression.

“What?” Tazuna rumbled.

“My voucher.”

“You greedy little snoot!” Tazuna slapped his knee, shouting, “I didn’t even buy it yet!”
The following morning, in one of the Leaf Village’s most heavily abused training grounds, Tenten and Lee had joined their sensei to begin a weaponry drill. Lee had grown proficient with nunchaku thanks to the kunoichi’s weekly lessons, and so Gai had necessitated that they train as a group. This would mark the third practice session that, in Tenten’s opinion, had gone rather well. For about a half hour they went through forms and listened to Gai’s critiques.

To show off, Tenten summoned a three-sectioned staff that was fundamentally similar to nunchaku. She wheeled around with the longer weapon and continued the exercise. Gai stopped what he was doing, intrigued, “Tenten! Why don’t you let me have a go at that?”

Lee looked devastated when his mentor stepped away to try something new. Tenten stood beside him and watched as Gai proved that he was rather gifted with a variety of melee weapons. ‘Wow. He’s a natural.’ It was one of the few, if not the only, real way she connected with her teacher. She just didn’t have it in her to wear the jumpsuit or run hundreds of laps.

“Lee, if you want,” She grinned, “I can teach you three-section staff next! I know you can do it.”

He hugged her tightly around the shoulders, close to weeping.

Gai’s very impressive and unexpected flaunting of Tenten’s weapon stopped when Neji arrived. He was over twenty minutes late but everyone greeted him happily anyway.

“I should have come earlier,” Neji told his team apologetically, “I cannot join you today.”

“Ah, do you have clan duties to attend to?” Gai asked understandingly.

Neji’s expression was miserable, “There has been a death in the Main House.”

Lee dropped his nunchaku after hearing the announcement. After a few brisk steps closed the gap between them, Tenten got a firm grip on Neji’s arm, apprehensive, “Not Hinata-?”

“No. Hinata-sama is fine.” He clarified, “Hiashi-sama requested that I assist him throughout the day with arrangements. Also,” His voice lowered, “I need you to come with me, Tenten.”

She was sincerely perplexed, “Oh. Can I…be helpful…in some way?”

“I’ll explain.” Neji muttered.

“Well, if the two of you have such matters to attend to I have no choice but to cancel training,” Gai regarded Lee, who was distressed, “Never fear, Lee, we can continue if you wish!” He looked back at his gloomy student, “You have my condolences, Neji.”

It was odd how Gai’s words truly did convey just the amount of compassion that Neji needed. Even though he hadn’t disclosed much about what had happened, Gai instantly knew how heavily it weighed on him.

They parted ways and Tenten was confused as to why she was necessary in this event. She pondered if it had been a clan elder, one of Hiashi’s compatriots, or heaven forbid one of the youngsters. It did not surprise her that much that Neji wanted her around. She did have an affinity for calming his nerves and getting his temper back in check. She also had a very well-rounded knowledge of his clan.

The silence between them persisted. Tenten was too afraid to ask for particulars when they crossed into town and then entered the grounds of the Hyuga estate.
The Hyuga clan’s grief was very apparent. Tenten had never seen anything like it. Near the steps of the main building Hiashi had dozens of Branch Members beside him, speaking softly with their heads bowed.

“Over here.” Neji instructed, leading her around the mass of bereaved clansmen.

They took cover beneath a tall tree to the left of the house. It shielded them from the sporadic but large raindrops that swept down in the breeze. The clouds overhead were rolling by on a rushing wind.

With a clear view of the veranda of the house, Tenten could finally see Fujita curled up on the corner of the porch. He was seated with his knees pulled up and his arms folded to hide his face. She understood.

‘Hikune.’ Her stomach sunk. It seemed as if the ground under her feet had disappeared and a vertigo-like feeling made her head spin.

Neji stood to her left, also watching, “He hasn’t been talking. He doesn’t want to accept it.”

Tenten watched silently as Hinata and Hanabi hovered nearby the small boy. They were encouraging him to eat snacks, what looked to be fresh cookies, and Hanabi was eating whatever Fujita turned away from. Hinata sat beside him and hugged him, resting her head on top of his.

Neji had not explicitly said who had died, but he didn’t have to. He now grasped that Tenten was cognizant of his close relatives.

“When?” Tenten asked.

“They were found two days ago. His teammate barely survived.” Neji elaborated solemnly, “The Hokage refuses to explain who attacked them or why. She did not have enough information.”

After her throat had gone dry and tight her ability to speak was gone. A mountain of guilt came crashing down on Tenten, ‘I should have treated Hikune better than I did. If I had known what was going to happen…I would have at least said that I appreciated what he did…”

Hideyasu took a spot beside his son and tucked him under an arm. Fujita pressed his face into the man’s shoulder and shook with soundless sobs. Hideyasu nodded his thanks to Hinata and Hanabi and relieved them of their sympathetic efforts.

“How well did you know him?”

Tenten stared blankly ahead, unable to answer the question.

“I wasn’t performing any clan duties or training during my last absence,” Neji admitted, “I was recovering from injuries.”

She snapped out of her stupor, “What?”

“I’m telling you the truth so that maybe you will do the same. Hikune and I had fought.”

“Why? You two got along!”

“He was angry with me. He spoke about you several times.” Neji met her gaze assertively, “Hikune knew you very well.”

Terrified, Tenten held her breath for a moment and wondered how in the world she ought to go about explaining herself. He waited for her reply.

“It’s true.” She said simply.

“You were seeing him?”

It was humiliating to recap the events, “No. We became friends after we brought you home and then I trained Fujita.”

“He made it seem as if he knew you as more than a friend.” His voice was smooth but had the faintest edge of accusation in it.

“That’s what he wanted,” She confessed, “But I refused.”

“You should have said something.”

“Maybe I should have.” Tenten agreed.

“If Hikune was bothering you, why not notify me?” Neji asked, insulted, “Did you think that I would be indifferent?”

“I had no idea what you would think.”

His eyes softened slightly, but she could tell that he was still displeased, “Friends like us can often tell what the other is thinking. I’m quite sure you had an idea.”

“I still chose not to. I can’t change that.”

“And I cannot change how he and I subjected each other to violence shortly before his death,” Neji observed, “It was not a fitting way to honor someone I respected.”

She turned to face the opposite direction, hoping that he hadn’t noticed her lip quiver. Tenten had become a master of hiding sadness and she was not about to crack now. The flimsy rainclouds overhead were cleaved apart by a beam of sunshine.

“Tenten.”

‘Don’t look at him. If I look at him I’m going to lose it.’ She took a deep breath, regaining a shred of composure.

“You’ve done nothing wrong.” Neji reminded her.

Like a true fool, she looked over her shoulder, teary-eyed. Her face declared that she disagreed, that she had gone about it all wrong. Though she couldn’t say it aloud, at least he could see that she was despising herself.

Neji was processing. Comforting people was by no means something that he excelled at. She turned away again before he could initiate a pat on the back or anything akin to it. Tenten cleared her throat and then inquired, “Is there…something you want me to do?”

“I think you should attend the funeral.”

“Isn’t it supposed to be private?”

“Hiashi-sama did not object to it when I asked.”
She shook her head, “It won’t feel right.”

“I don’t see why it would.” Neji figured the whole clan would be in turmoil, “It would be appropriate for you to be present.”

“I’m sorry.” It was the only phrase she could utter without blubbering. She left briskly, unwilling to let the iron façade she had proudly sustained to crumble away in front of someone who prized strength.

Neji watched her retreat. Maybe it had not been fair of him to request it, or maybe he had not asked because her attendance was something Hikune would have wished for; but he had wanted her there. Since Tenten could not abide such a thing, perhaps it would be better to let her sulk and continue feeling whatever it was that she had briefly revealed with that single glance. He supposed that now was an ideal time to return all of the courtesies and empathy she had given him during his troubled days.

In the spring sunlight he strode towards the Main House, ‘If I am truly worthy of my friends…then now is the time for me to prove it.’

On a morning like most other mornings, Haku awoke, dressed and then assisted Hiroshi in opening the tea house.

While the portly man heated a tall kettle on a burner and prepared fresh treats, Haku swept the floors before taking the stacked seats apart and setting them up. There was scratching at the door of the shop. Haku unlocked it and allowed his rabbit to hop inside, “Pua! I haven’t seen you in a while. You’ve been travelling a lot.”

The rabbit perched on a stool and then pushed three scrolls onto a table with her nose.

“What a haul!” Haku was thrilled, “Well done!” He took a dandelion top from his pocket and offered it to his hardworking pet. It was not often that he received correspondence from Jiraiya, Gaara and Naruto simultaneously. Haku concluded the opening routine for the storefront and then took a seat, intending to read until a customer stopped by.

Pua re-settled in his lap while he began with Jiraiya’s message.

Hey Haku,

I know that it’s been a while since I wrote to you, but I can chalk that up to being seriously injured for these past several weeks. It’s a legitimate excuse. It was kind of my fault, too. Getting up close and personal with Naruto’s Kyuubi chakra while training is no picnic, and I know that I pushed him too far. I’m lucky to be alive.

As I recall what you told me in your last letter, I’m starting to see that you are lucky to be alive as well. You are deep in dangerous territory. Never mind that Zabuza is training you, which ought to have its benefits, but you don’t want to get mixed up in the fighting between Mist Village factions in that area. You’re more likely to stumble across rebels than you are supporters of the Mizukage. You’ll know them when you see them: rebels are kind of like Zabuza. They are dissatisfied, battle-hardened jerks who are fighting to have some stake in a village that can’t seem to get its act together. Oh, and if you are up to any funny business or illegal activity down there I suggest you knock it off. You are not a sword-for-hire and if I see your face on a bounty poster I will put my foot SO far up your ass.

Haku looked up from the parchment, astounded, ‘This sounds like how he normally threatens...”
Naruto…’ He felt that he should think twice before accepting another mission from Inagawa, for his posterior’s sake.

Now that I’ve established that, I’ll lighten up. I had an existential crisis when I woke up here on Mount Myoboku. The Toad Sages here have been looking after Naruto and I, and I couldn’t help but reflect on how cruddy of a mentor I’ve been to you all. I was in and out of your lives when you really needed consistency. I wasn’t enthusiastic about being your Sensei when I know I should have been. I am a dirty old man whose books don’t sell and his students always seem to have a life of hardship…

While I may regret many of my past choices, I have never felt more proud than when I think of our team. You, Naruto and Gaara are among the most outstanding, responsible and virtuous shinobi I have ever met…not to mention talented for your age…I take comfort in that. I truly do want you to find your clan, Haku. It’s a tall order. It could take many years or it could happen tomorrow. They may not be quite what you expect them to be either, but when it happens please know that I look forward to hearing all about it.

Keep being there for your friends; do not lose sight of who you are. I can’t forget about my bright, friendly bookworm and I sure hope that when I see you again you’re still the nice farm-boy I saw last. You have a great future ahead of you just as Naruto and Gaara do. Oh, and when you wrap things up I think you ought to visit the Toad Mountain. Your bunny loved it here.

Take care of yourself, Haku.

Jiraiya

By the way, Gaara and I are lying to Tsunade to cover your tracks. You’re welcome. We do it because we love you, now show us some love.

Smiling contentedly, Haku chuckled to himself, ‘His trip seems to have reformed him! Sensei is being awfully affectionate in his letters.’ He quite liked it. It was also heartening to read that Jiraiya fully supported the search for his clan. So long as he stuck to wholesome activities and made honest money, Haku believed he could stay in Jiraiya’s good graces.

He moved on to Gaara’s submission while he stroked Pua’s velvet-soft ears.

Haku,

You and Naruto had very different advice to give me regarding my insecurities as a village leader. For as long as I have known you, I have relied on your understanding and logical approach to things. I never had to tell you much in order for you to see things from my perspective, however cynical I could be. I did as you asked and reached out to Jiraiya about how I felt. It was surprisingly cathartic. I expect to hear back from him soon. And as you suggested, I made short-term goals for myself. I know what I hope for in the future, but I am not in the best position to engineer most of the important projects I have in mind. No, I have not made many new friends in Sand, though you were optimistic about it. It is most likely because I have been too anxious and short-tempered to seem… approachable. Forgive me; I will make a better effort after the Suna Training Program ends. I am cooking frequently. You’d be impressed.

Naruto had already heard about my doubts from Jiraiya. His only counsel for me was this:

He had none.

How dare someone who aspires to be a village leader not have one single suggestion? Surely he’s turned it over in his mind? What he plans to do when he is made Hokage? What impudence. I don’t even think Naruto tried to put himself in my place, or if he had, he did not quite like what he felt! I am disappointed in him, to say the least.

Haku laughed at Gaara’s tirade. He understood his friend’s irritation, but he could not condemn Naruto’s lack of an answer either. Hiroshi poked his head out of the kitchen in the back, spying Haku’s reading material, “Oh! Is that a good one?”

“It is!”

My mood has not been completely horrible. Yesterday, Sakura arrived in Suna to impart some of her healing expertise to the Medical Corps. I think you would have enjoyed that class. Despite the fact that she worked with students for more than five hours, she was unfailingly pleasant. While she was gone I had to accompany her sensei, but he was abundantly aware of my desire for space. He left us alone that evening. She looks different.

I had not dwelled on it much; how our time apart could give us a shock with respect to our change in appearances. When Sakura arrived I am certain that I stared. Her shape and her voice were almost entirely new. Right away I schemed about a dozen ways that could have given me a moment alone with her. I am glad that I stopped myself. After all, my lack of control has never in the history of my life been safe. Restraint did not help much when I sent a Shadow Clone to retrieve her from the hospital. It tried seducing her.

“How bizarre!” Haku mumbled, fascinated that clones could think and act independently, even in inappropriate situations. He was slightly worried by the fact that Sakura had to deal with such a nuisance.

She quickly destroyed it, Haku sighed in relief, But I could tell that she didn’t mind kissing it first. Haku’s stomach churned. It was weird to think of Sakura, a childhood friend and fellow intellectual, in such a way.

I wanted more. I loved talking to her and being close to her. Everything felt right in the world. Tomorrow she will be returning to the Leaf Village when she finishes her second lesson. I’m half tempted to sabotage it and find other ways to occupy her time. Kakashi won’t appreciate it, but I am the Kazekage. He can fight me if he doesn’t like it.

While it may not be my place to discuss this, you may want to know what Temari has been doing.

His eyes widened thirstily while he read.

She has, and I use this term very loosely, “dated” approximately three men since you parted from us. They were all trash. Well, as a brother, that was my take on them. Thankfully she stopped humoring anyone who called on her after she became a Jounin, and more recently she has become hostile towards males in general. I really approve of this. She stated that “all men infuriate her” and, at least for the time being, she’ll have nothing to do with them. Kankuro and I agreed and were spared her wrath.

I am sure it doesn’t please you to hear that she has had her pick of men here, but maybe that comes as no surprise. Your abandonment is something she grapples with to this day. I care about you on a personal level, but as Temari’s brother and village leader, I have plenty of reason to kill you.

Haku gulped.

I will spare you at Jiraiya and Naruto’s request. I suspect that Temari may even care for you still, but it won’t do to get your hopes up. Like me, she is capriciously violent.
I hope your training and your search continues unhindered. Do not put yourself in needless peril. And be aware...when my training program expires in the Tide Village, however many more months it takes...I will set my sights on you. If the quest for your clan appears to be in vain, I will relocate you to Hidden Sand as you agreed. You ought not waste your time in the Water Country when I have found several jobs here that could use your skills. I would rather send an investigative squad of mine to track your kin than watch you cavort with a nukenin. It's reprehensible.

Outraged, Haku’s mouth hung open in preparation of a retort. It was pointless. He would need to write back some scathing words, because he wasn’t about to take that criticism lying down!

Though I know you’ve stopped trying to contact her, if you wish to get a message to Temari you may send it to me. I have no interest in examining it before forwarding it to her. Now may be a better time to reach her. I should get some rest now. I feel like I will be able to sleep. Stay well and do the right thing.

Gaara

“My goodness...he is brutal even on paper.” Haku huffed, rolling up the scroll and then set it beside Jiraiya’s message.

A customer poked his head into the tea shop, friendly and inquiring, “Hi Haku! Did Hiroshi-san tell you what today’s lunch special was going to be?”

“He did. Pork dumplings in broth.”

“Great! I’ll be back later!” Cheery, the man zipped right back out and the bell on the door chimed after him.

With a deep breath, Haku moved on to Naruto’s letter.

Hi Haku!

I’m doing better since last time. I know that I wrote to you immediately after Ero-sensei got hurt, but I just wanted to tell you that I’m not trying to jump off a cliff anymore. He’s feeling good enough to bitch and moan, so I don’t feel that guilty.

What I should say is that I really miss you. I wish you and Gaara were here. Mount Myoboku is pretty amazing and it’s not too bad having bugs for breakfast, lunch and dinner.

“Naruto-kun, I don’t know if I have the constitution for it…”

When you guys aren’t around it’s like I don’t have a foundation. No backup. No way to get bailed out. I’m sorry that I took that for granted. I feel...sad...a lot more often. It’s so weird. Things feel heavier and more lonesome. And I was scared that if Ero-sensei didn’t make it...what you and Gaara would think of me...

Haku shook his head, ‘We would never blame you, Naruto!’

I’d like to tell you that I’m happier, but that’s not true. Ero-sensei worked up the gall to tell me that he knew my parents! He’s my godparent or guardian or whatever.

“What?” He muttered in disbelief.

So my parents are either from the Hidden Eddy Village or the Hidden Leaf Village or it could be a mix. He’s too damn scared to explain it. They were good friends. I want to kick Ero-sennin in the
When he gets around to telling me the complete truth I will tell you all about it. It’s just…I never really worried about where I came from. A kid who only remembers an orphanage and then living on government assistance can’t really get a straight answer about their parents, even though I think I asked a few times…I stopped caring. I had you and Gaara and I felt fine. I didn’t research it. I didn’t check cemeteries. I didn’t even look for people who resembled me! I had everything I needed. Why is learning about my parents so frightening? I feel like once I know…it’s going to change me. I mean, if you found your clan and then discovered you were supposed to be their cleaning guy or something…wouldn’t you feel upset?

“I guess I would.” Haku agreed.

I just hope that…they didn’t leave me. I hope they loved me.

Haku felt tears well up, ‘Why is everyone so emotional now? Good grief!’

Okay, enough of that. In case you didn’t already know, Hinata is amazing. She and I get back to each other really quick using the Enshinsui. Toads here use it as a portal to the Leaf Village! Her family is annoying her…although she wasn’t very specific about what they did. She said Sato is doing great and that she’s working hard. I can’t wait to see how gorgeous she is when I get home! Also...

He rolled his eyes. Being single was a bit underrated, as it turned out.

Have you had sex?

Haku knocked his knees on the table painfully, blindsided by the question. Pua leapt away from him in surprise.

What I’m trying to say is, I don’t know if you or Gaara would skip over stuff like that when you write to me. Ero-sensei is trying to talk to me about it. I guess I have to listen. I was wondering if you’d done anything and if you’re willing to describe it. Otherwise I’m stuck with this old Perv and his creepy books. I want to know because it’s something I have been thinking about a lot.

Haku had thought it inappropriate to imagine Sakura earlier in Gaara’s tale, but poor Hinata, the object of Naruto’s affection and the untouchable princess of her clan…

Sorry if that was uncalled for, I guess I just thought you’d have more experience than me! I hope you find your clan soon! It’d be awesome if we could both learn about our families. I’ll keep my fingers crossed.

Talk to you soon, Haku!

Naruto

Haku gathered up the scrolls and mulled over what his team had told him, ‘We are all experiencing a great deal of change. I have no idea how Gaara could be hostile towards me while simultaneously wishing me well…and Naruto thought that I might have…’ He shook his head in embarrassment, ‘Does he really think that I’d know something about sex? And if I did, that I’d discuss it?’ Naruto had naïvely thought that because Haku had mingled with girls and had a brief relationship with an older kunoichi that it indicated some kind of experience. ‘Not by any stretch of the imagination…’ He supposed that if he did engage in such activities, he would only choose to do it with someone he cared for deeply. That was a personal preference.
“Haku, will you help me for a moment?” Hiroshi asked. He was at the store window hanging up an advertisement for holiday specials, “Step outside and tell me if it looks even. I always set these up cock-eyed!”

“Of course.” He left his messages on the countertop and then went outside. Hiroshi had managed to hang up his sign properly, but before Haku could return to commend the man’s handiwork he spotted a disconcerting pair down the road.

Raiga was stalking up the sidewalk with Ranmaru a few paces ahead of him. The small boy was happily pointing to shops of interest. They hadn’t noticed him. Haku’s eyes fell on the Thunder and Lightning blades strapped to the nukenin’s back. Haku bolted inside the tea house, bell jingling, and turned in a small circle. Hiroshi gave him a quizzical look, “What? Does it look alright?”

“Your sign is perfect, Hiroshi, but I…” He picked up his rabbit and made for the kitchen, “I need to stay out of sight!”

“What are you talking about, Haku-kun?” Hiroshi was annoyed, “You said you’d help me this morning with customers!”

Haku answered from the backroom, “For your safety and mine, I don’t want to be seen for the time being!”

“This is ridiculous! There’s no danger at all.”

The bell chimed again. Haku pressed himself flat against a storage cabinet and listened anxiously as a small voice greeted Hiroshi. A bead of sweat formed on his temple, ‘Of course I invited Ranmaru to visit Nanakusa before Raiga attacked me…’ At least Zabuza was not a player in this production; today was one of the man’s weekly 24 hours of uninterrupted sleep. That left only one loose cannon to steer clear of.

There was an amicable exchange of words and then a pause before Hiroshi stormed into the kitchen, twitching his mustache, “What are you doing, Haku? You know I need to finish steaming the red bean cakes! I can’t serve a customer right now.”

“Hiroshi, I-”

“Get out there or I’ll-!” He furrowed his brow, “I don’t know what I’m gonna do. But you had better hurry up and see what that child wants!”

Haku put Pua down, sighing. ‘Fine. I’ll help as I promised, but I’m not foolish enough to show my face and have everyone around here electrocuted!’

Haku transformed into the likeness of a young, short-haired girl; apron intact. Hiroshi scratched his bearded chin, still not comprehending, “Why do you need to parade around as a lady? You could do that anyway with a bit of chest padding!”

“I don’t want to be recognized.” Haku whispered, “That ninja and I have met before and he knows what I look like.”

Hiroshi peered from the doorway discreetly, “That teeny little boy is a ninja?”

“Yes; an apprentice to another swordsman.”

Hiroshi considered it, looking back again to see the angelic child flip over a menu and marvel at it.
“Is he friendly?”

“Quite.” Haku conceded.

“Then he’s welcome! Quit acting so weird!” Hiroshi waved his hand, indicating the henge, “And who is this supposed to be? A girl you know or an original creation?”

“It’s not original. This is what Naruto-kun’s girlfriend looks like…”

“She must be a sweet young lady.” The hefty man pushed Haku back into the restaurant, “Now get to work!”

Haku contritely scurried into the dining room and the round man set back to work making snacks.

His impression of Hinata was fairly good, at least he thought so, and he took Ranmaru’s order without fear of Raiga bursting in. Ranmaru disclosed that his friend had dropped him off so he could shop and explore town. The sign in the tea shop’s window got his attention and Ranmaru wanted to know if the sweet bean buns were available. Oh, and the oolong tea too.

Haku fetched the snacks and returned with a pot of hot tea. He set it down on the table, pretending that the white rabbit hopping around the shop was not his.

While pouring a cup of oolong, Ranmaru politely interrupted his small talk, “I know it’s you, Haku. It’s okay.”

Disguised, Haku stared at the small boy and elected to give up the ruse. He ditched his transformation and then folded his arms, “Ranmaru…you should know better than to come here after seeing how Raiga and Zabuza interact.”

“I was going to be careful.” He looked a bit sad, “Well…you were being careful too. You transformed!”

“It would only stop Raiga from finding me. You’re lucky that Zabuza isn’t around.”

“Raiga doesn’t know! I didn’t say anything.” Ranmaru chomped on one of the buns, “Mmm. Besides…I can see people coming from far away and make illusions. We don’t really have to worry.” He washed it down with tea, “Ah! I just want to make a new friend.”

Quizzical, Haku took a seat across from him, “What do you mean by you can see people coming?”

“My Kekkei Genkai.”

“It’s a doujutsu?” Haku was astonished.

“I think so,” Ranmaru shrugged uncertainly, “But I don’t know what it’s called. I’m the only one who has it.”

That quickly ruled out the Sharingan and the Byakugan in Haku’s mind. He relaxed a fraction and Ranmaru asked if he wanted a red bean bun. He declined politely and ruminated on the situation.

“I want to visit this place a lot. It’s nice here and I like the food!” Ranmaru explained, “You’ll let me if I don’t let Raiga cause trouble, right?”

“You would have to keep a low profile. If Zabuza notices either of you around here I don’t think I would be able to stop him.” Haku added, “It would be irresponsible of us to risk the safety of townspeople if those two started fighting again…”
“We can keep them distracted.”

“Zabuza catches onto things quickly.”

“I’ll keep Raiga away. Your teacher won’t get mad if it’s just me visiting, will he?”

“That is a very good question.” Haku folded his arms, thinking, “I suppose he isn’t actually threatened by you…”

“Good!”

Hiroshi had emerged from the back and stopped at the table, glad that Haku was no longer masquerading as a girl, “So you aren’t a troublemaker, little shinobi?” He laughed when Ranmaru ruefully shook his head, “That’s fine! You’re welcome here. I’m Hiroshi, Haku’s friend.”

“Ranmaru.”

“Pleased to meet you.” The shop owner looked to Haku, “Now tell me…is he going to be a regular?”

Haku was inclined to say yes. If Ranmaru intended to frequent Nanakusa, then some conspiring and caution ought to keep their ruffian companions from crossing paths.

In a private chamber in the basement of the administrative building, Tsunade was reclined on cushions and reading by candlelight. She had needed to knock back some wine to get through the grisly details in the files she looked over.

She had been winding down from her inter-village endeavor with Hidden Star and then calamity had struck close to home. What had initially been a senseless slaying of one of her Jounin was appearing more and more to be a deliberate act. The notes from recent ANBU investigations, along with older documents that her sensei had handled years ago, had painted a coherent picture of what treachery was afoot.

The Chunin, Mion, had identified his assailant as a rogue Iwa shinobi: Shimofuri Koinyu. He was connected with a notorious war criminal from Rock by the name of Dintei Bihokokuni, a man who Jiraiya had given her ample warning about. From what she could decipher from dusty files and reconnaissance reports, Bi had been a bastard child of the renowned Sasagainu clan in Iwagakure. When his persistence to ascend in leadership and inherit clan treasures were rebuked time and again, he had taken several decades to eradicate any who opposed him, most especially descendants of the main line. The clan proper was virtually extinct.

He had been branded as a traitor by both Rock and Leaf, one of the rare bits of common ground they shared after a bloody war. Tsunade had no difficulty digesting all of this information, prying open a sealed file from Leaf archives regarding refugees from the decimated clan. They had not been any safer in Konoha than they had been in their homeland.

[Sasagainu] Withhold surname, Takaharu

[Sasagainu] Withhold surname, Chinatsu

Tsunade looked over their stats, birth dates, personal information and rank, noticing that they had been particularly accomplished ANBU under Hiruzen’s command. She did not know them well, but she had heard about their acts of good will throughout the village. Three other members of their clan, excluding their parents who had died of old age, had also been killed. She glanced over the cause of After responding to a distress message near the border of the Fire Country, Squadron 1, i.e. Team Hikki, was ambushed, resulting in three causalities and two shinobi hostages. Three days after the attack a response team discovered two decapitated bodies, that of the captain and the second-in-command, heads removed from the scene. This method of killing is consistent with other deaths perpetrated by Dintei Bihokokuni and his following.

Her eye twitched when she read a note scrawled beneath, added in by the Third:

A tip off was provided to me by the Root ANBU who had surveyed that area a week prior. I had been told a missing team could have been taking shelter in this expansive region, but it was misinformation. I sincerely hope Root was not involved with this incident. Shimura Danzo denies this, but I fear I made a grave mistake of assigning this mission to Team Hikki.

She flipped the report over to its final page, her thoughts racing with the possibility that Root had participated in the tragedy. ‘Not that I’ve much cared for Danzo and his sniveling…or how he was always a thorn in Sensei’s side…’ She bit her lip, ‘He may have been getting away with murder…and the Third had no real way to prove his guilt.’

[Sasagainu] Withhold surname, Tenten

There were no vital statistics aside from personal information and birth date. The photo provided showed the girl at a young age, still attending the Academy. It was noted that after the ambush the Hokage had provided the aspiring kunoichi with a government stipend to support herself; a week later she had graduated and become a Genin.

Tsunade shut the file, exhaling, and then tipped back the last of the sake in her glass. ‘If Sensei couldn’t prove Root was involved…how the hell can I? This is a cold case.’ She lowered her eyes to a report on Hikune’s death, ‘And just how was that young man involved so that he could become a target? This doesn’t add up.’

She would like to believe that the only person in danger would be a Sasagainu descendant, but that was evidently not the case. Other shinobi were at risk. Mion had told her while still confined to a hospital bed that Hikune had pretended to be Hyuga Neji in order to extract information from Koinyu.

“Why do such a thing?” The Hokage asked, her nails rapping on the railing of the bed.

“Because…that man was looking for the members of Team Gai. He said he wanted Tenten.” Mion expounded, “Hikune would never let anyone hurt her.”

Names had been named. The culprit had all but vanished, and was undoubtedly ready to pounce on any target that ventured beyond the walls of the village. With this in mind, Tsunade was contending with the tough decisions she had to make in order to prevent new attacks.

The Hokage stacked the reports on a small lamp table and acknowledged the Black Ops shinobi who had arrived and kneeled respectfully.

“Were the files insightful, ma’am?”

“Thank you for organizing them. I’ve seen enough.” She rose to her feet, “As soon as Tenzo returns, send him to me.” The hard look on her face added, Now move it.

The ANBU agent nodded and then promptly exited the chamber.
Tsunade climbed the stairs of the building and felt energy seep out of her as she tried to imagine how she was going to tackle this problem. She needed more scouting teams. She needed to have a word with Jiraiya.

‘And with Gaara borrowing Kakashi and Sakura to assist in the Land of Waves,’ She sighed at the thought, ‘Most of my go-to cronies are tied up for now. I can only hope their issues are resolved, otherwise I’m probably going to get a request to help the Tide Village.’ She frowned, ‘I really, really don’t want to. Gaara needs to deal with it. I’m not going to hold his hand for everything!’

Luckily, there was at least one assistant remaining who could shoulder some of the stress.

Shizune held the door of the office for her, smiling slightly, “You were gone for so long. I put on some tea for you, Tsunade-sama.” Tsunade nodded her thanks, “I can tell you already have a headache.”

“Shizune,” The Hokage fell into her desk chair, “You are a saint.”

As if to drive the point home, Shizune moved to the desk and picked up a packet of forms before Tsunade could touch it, “Don’t worry about these! I’ll fill them out. They don’t require your signature.”

“Oh. Thank you…what were they for again?”

“I said don’t worry about it,” Shizune snapped her fingers so Ton-Ton would follow her, “I’ll bring you the tea in a few minutes. Just do what you need to do, Tsunade-sama.” She was out the door.

‘Hm. She’s probably looking for a pay raise.’ Tsunade thought, ‘And she’ll get it.’

She wrote another long and beseeching message to Jiraiya, hoping that he would not be gone too much longer. More than ever she needed a reliable teammate and friend, and it didn’t hurt that he had a thorough knowledge of her new enemy. A short time later Shizune returned with her tea and poured it, preparing to go back out.

“Shizune, come back as soon as you’re finished with that paperwork.” Tsunade instructed, “My next appointment is going to be awful…”

“Of course.” She shut the door behind her.

Tsunade sat in silence and sipped her tea. She stole a peek at the clock on the wall and noted that she had less than ten minutes of solitude remaining. The woman had enjoyed two cups before her tranquility was disturbed by a knock at the door. She called for the team to come in.

Gai entered merrily and was followed by Lee and Neji, who had been at the tail-end of a conversation. She cleared her throat to signal she wanted everyone’s undivided attention.

“Hokage-sama, is this perhaps an update on the mission you assigned to us for tomorrow morning?” Gai was curious, “I had heard you are sending many teams out for reconnaissance. Would you prefer us to do that?”

“No, you’re best suited for the mission I gave you. I need to go over a few things with your team.”

“Ah, then we need a few minutes. Tenten is running late!” Gai was a tad disapproving.

Tsunade rested her gaze on Neji, “I have not yet given you my sympathy, Neji. I’m sorry for your loss.”
He thanked her quietly.

She continued, “One thing I should make clear now is that, because of an ongoing investigation, from here on out your team can only be assigned missions that are executed within the borders of the Fire Country.”

“Investigation?” Neji was guarded, “Does it concern what happened to Hikune?”

“It concerns several parties, including but not limited to his death,” Tsunade confirmed, “You and Lee, no matter whose team I allocate you to, I expect you to abide by this stipulation until further notice,” When they nodded in acceptance she added to Gai, “You are the exception, Gai. I will keep you on regular activity.”

“Yes, ma’am!”

“Now to the next order of business…” She took a deep breath, “Tenten is not late.”

The men stared dumbly and so Tsunade pressed on, “She is following an order. I apologize for not giving you advanced warning,” She seemed most apologetic on Gai’s behalf, for he was just as mystified as his students, “For security purposes, I have officially unassigned Tenten from your team and Maito Gai’s mentorship.”

The news crashed over Gai and his facial features turned upwards, contorting in absolute despondency.

“None of you may contact her in any fashion until I permit it. What I am investigating is a serious, classified crime that implicates Tenten’s welfare, as well as the safety of all of my villagers.”

Neji was quick to ask, “How long will she be gone?”

“Indefinitely.”

His eyes flashed furiously, having suspected such a response, and he thought back to how he had spoken to Tenten the day before. She had stood at the back of the funeral. He thanked her. They later trained and things seemed to be back to normal. Neji could only assume that she had been given short notice as well.

“I will comply with your regulations for our mission assignments and limitations,” Neji stated, “But I refuse to observe a no-contact order. It serves no purpose.”

“It isn’t optional.” Tsunade bristled, “No one is going to jeopardize my investigation.”

“Tenten is not at fault.”

“This has nothing to do with what she did; it has to do with an unpredictable, outside issue.”

Gai and Lee stood, stunned into silence, and watched as Neji insolently and verbally unhinged on the village leader.

“What kind of outside issue produces a gag order on a team? It’s illogical. Clearly not a single one of us knows what you’re talking about, albeit we’d be inclined to obey if we had at least an ounce of information,” At some point he inhaled between the words, “We are entitled to know if your investigation involves any of our personal safety. Surely you’re aware of the disclosure laws in your own village? It seems to me that you don’t. Such a thing reflects your competency. If you-”
Tsunade stood and brought her fist down on the corner of her desk, hacking it off with super-strength. Her odious glare halted him and she roared, “Shut that arrogant mouth of yours and do as I say. I am the Hokage!” With a wave of her arm, she flipped the desk over and hurled it into a wall. The scroll intended for Jiraiya was mercifully plopped to the floor, “I can kill you a thousand different ways right now if I wanted some peace and quiet, which I rightfully deserve! I’d rather spare myself your objections! Is it too much to ask for a proper: yes ma’am?”

Gai and Lee flinched behind Neji. The young man was still outraged, but had shut his mouth as she had demanded.

They engaged in a stare-off and were equally matched competitors. There was no mistaking their mutual abhorrence. After several tense minutes Tsunade’s shoulders relaxed and she cocked her head, hand on her hip, and regarded Neji like she would an adversary, “I will humor your whining, but this is not negotiable. You are all completing your mission tomorrow as scheduled.”

Her icy gaze went to Gai and Lee, “Are you two going to give me grief as well? You’re lucky I didn’t reassign all of you!”

Sad and very scared, they accepted her orders. Neji was still seething.

“I expect more of you,” Tsunade told him, “I don’t care if you hate me. I don’t care that you don’t understand any of this…or that you think I am an incompetent leader. You are one of my shinobi and you take orders from me, no matter what they are.”

His silence was the only appropriate reply. Neji would have called her many ugly things if he had spoken again.

“Dismissed.” She said severely.

Team Gai turned around and ventured out the office door while Tsunade watched them. She had not wanted to make it any harder for them than she had to, but Neji’s rebellion had been totally unexpected. If Tenten was a sore spot of his; fine, she understood, ‘But shut up and don’t talk back to me!’ She stared at the open doorway for a few moments, clearing her head, and then stomped over to the wreckage of her desk.

With a powerful arm, she set it upright and returned it to its original position. She fetched her list of daily appointments and Jiraiya’s message. Tsunade then sat down and ignored the debris and papers that were scattered about the room. The teapot had shattered.

She looked at the appointment list, ‘Hmm…I need to drop by the hospital at 2:00 to check on Nichiyo.’ He had received a donation of Kiba’s bone marrow and was on the mend, but she wanted to make sure of it. Tsunade scanned down the schedule and blinked when Kotetsu and Izumo announced their entry. The best friends stepped gingerly over the papers and other paraphernalia on the floor.

“Oh good! Will you two please pick this up?” Tsunade asked pleasantly, “I almost killed someone.”

“Sure…Hokage-sama.” They dubiously walked around the room and retrieved her items. While they worked she reminded them that they would be on lookout duty at the village gates that evening.

She enjoyed her downtime and thanked Shizune when she returned will a stack of finished forms. Her former apprentice took a look at the crater in the wall, frowning worriedly, “Tsunade-sama… was that the awful appointment?”
“It was, but I got it over with.”

After everyone cleared out of the office again and it was restored to order (mostly), she leaned back and groaned. Was it better to let Team Gai roam free and loose-lipped while a hunter lurked, or was she right to hush them up and hide them until she caught the perpetrator? ‘Both options are unattractive…but I had to make a choice. I don’t have everything under control just yet.’ Maybe her sensei or Jiraiya would have done the same.

She daydreamed for a while and began to feel better. A shinobi entered the office without knocking. Tsunade sat up straight and held her chin in her hand, “You’re fast. I sent for you not too long ago.”

The ANBU agent was wearing a colorful cat mask, “How can I be of service, Hokage-sama?”

“I had originally thought that I would assign you to some light overseeing. I just separated a team and I knew that they would dislike it…but one member in particular was belligerent.” She pointed to the damaged wall, “I don’t think Hyuga Neji is going to follow my orders. I will not have anyone interfere with the inquiry I am conducting, and so I would like to you specifically watch him.” Tsunade pushed a folder forward on her desk.

The Black Ops shinobi picked up the file and thumbed through it to get an idea.

“Tenzo, I need you to keep him away from the kunoichi of Team Gai. I included her photo for reference.” She folded her hands, “The criminal I am dealing with can capitalize on her being near any of her team members. Until I have a grip on this situation, I would like you to keep vigil and report back to me.”

“Understood.” He nodded, holding up the folder, “Shall I keep this?”

“Yes.”

“Hokage-sama…”

She acknowledged him by pursing her lips impatiently.

“The damage to your office…this young man didn’t cause it, did he? Otherwise you ought to take different steps to deal with erratic behavior.”

“No…actually…I did that,” She wasn’t proud of her reaction, “He had a few choice words for me…and I chose to break an inanimate object instead of his neck.”

“My! What a confrontational Genin!” Tenzo chuckled.

“You won’t be laughing when you have to deal with him,” She warned, “He’ll give you shit too.”
Chapter Soundtrack: "Best Friend" by Foster the People

"Wait, hold on a second…" Obiyo reordered Yuma's knuckles in the proper position, "There. That's a perfect Horse seal now."

The boy studied his hands, the Sharingan flashing in his eyes, and then committed it to memory.

"So then what's next? Do you remember?"

"The last one is Tiger!" Yuma grinned. He had no problem with the final seal required for their clan's staple jutsu.

The man proudly nudged his son's cheek, "Great job! We're just about ready to use chakra and start practicing!"

"Yeah!" Yuma jumped like a happy lamb. He settled down and then turned his head in all directions, assessing the budding, mountainside forest, "Dad…why did we come all the way out here?"

"Well…remember when I gave you the first demonstration, a few days ago?" Obiyo reminded him and the boy nodded affirmatively, "Your mother was watching. She said she didn't want any fireballs near the house…and she's right. We don't want any accidents." He gestured to the lily pond, "When I think back to how I was taught, long ago, the Uchiha clan always trains children near a lake at first. That way you won't set anything on fire…"

"I won't do that, Dad."

He laughed at the declaration, "You probably will, even if you don't mean it."

"I'm going to practice 'til I get it right!"

"I know, Yuma, and once you have the hang of it then you can go where you please."

Yuma puffed in reluctant agreement. His mother always sent him out into the woods when she didn't trust him to not to destroy things. Kunai and shuriken…Inuzuka-style Taijutsu…and now Fire Jutsu; he was banished to the mountainside whenever there was a possibility of shattering glass or wrecking the porch. Rin never chanced it. Six-year-olds, you know? They explode.

"Okay then! Now you've got the hand seals to use the Fireball Jutsu. We're going to work on molding your chakra properly next," Obiyo pointed to his abdomen, "In here you've got that furnace we talked about."

The boy poked his own stomach, "Yup."

"I know that you've been using a bit of your chakra already…but you don't want to overdo it with this technique. You don't need all that much. You'll feel a twinge, or something like it, when you've used enough. Measuring chakra is mostly about intuition, but I bet you'll know it once you do it. So…" Obiyo traced a path lightly from Yuma's solar plexus, up his stomach and throat, then to the mouth, "While your hand seals direct the jutsu, chakra that you build up will funnel this way through your pathways. It's gonna be a little weird the first time since you haven't done this before."

"It won't hurt." Yuma supposed.
"No, your chakra won't hurt you." Obito's brow furrowed, "But breathing fire might. That's what you need to be careful about."

The child moved through six seals quickly, imagining the next step. His face belied some anxiety. Frowning, Yuma folded his arms, "I want to see you do it again, Dad. You know...before I use my chakra."

"Sure." Obito stepped over to the pond and stood on the water's surface, "Watch carefully! I'll try to do it slowly."

"Okay!"

There was no need to move through the sealing slowly; Yuma had grasped that aspect of the lesson. But Obito lingered on the inhale and viewed his son from the corner of his eye; filling his lungs, holding the Tiger Seal, carefully stringing chakra along... The boy was watching studiously and breaking it down in his head. When there was no point in delaying the exhale any longer, Obito breathed out, guiding the flame with a cupped hand beside his lips. The sphere of flame smoldered over the pond and singed cattails at the water's edge. He stopped and turned to Yuma who was tapping his foot.

"How was that?"

"You did it so slow..."

"You don't have to do it that slowly. Use the pace that feels best."

"Okay." Yuma stood beside his father who had returned to the grass, "Maybe...could you do it again? I'll try it...at the same time."

"Together?"

"Yeah."

Obito was amused that he had butterflies in his stomach while watching the boy's first attempt at Ninjutsu. He moved through seals again, noticing Yuma had performed them just as quickly, then inhaled, 'He's looking good!' And Obito breathed out a healthy fireball while his son sputtered a rather sad one, which was evidently a mixture of apprehension and inexperience.

"Ow!" Yuma had ceased the jutsu and hissed, shaking his hands, "I think I got a little-!"

"Let me see." Obito kneeled down and held the child still, inspecting the minor burns and heat-wear to Yuma's shirt, "This is okay. It can be worse! Do you want to try again?"

He nodded. Without waiting for his father's guidance, Yuma made his second, more confident attempt. 'Huh, he's using more chakra...he's pretty close!' Obito thought as the child's fireball was substantially larger but spewing stray embers. Yuma stopped with another screech of pain.

"Ooh, ouch..." Obito could see there was a glossy patch of skin on the boy's chin and hands, "Do you want to call it a day? I'll get you fixed up."

"Wait!" He caught his breath, "Show me how you do that..." Yuma gestured with his hands towards his mouth, determined, "After the Tiger seal! I saw you made the fire skinnier, or something! Can you show me again?"

"Skinnier?"
Yuma cupped his hand next to his mouth, raising his eyebrows as if to say, This! Do you remember when you did this?

"Oh! Okay, yes, if you can't get the hang of it simply by breathing it out," Obito mimicked the hand gesture, "You'll see shinobi narrow a breath of fire with their hands like this. It's a subconscious thing that happens with Ninjutsu."

"That means...you don't know you're doing it?"

"Right. It's called channeling. I think teachers often forget to mention it." Obito explained, "Let me show you again."

And again, after the final seal, Obito made sure to emphasize that he could direct the flame further away from his face with the simple motion. The spout was narrow for a few feet past his lips and then ballooned over the water into a sphere of fire. Yuma pointed and nodded, "Yeah, that's what I meant!"

Obito stopped and chuckled, "Give it a try. It's pretty easy. You're just taking more careful aim at your target with that kind of channeling...but you can still do it if you hold a hand seal too."

"Well it was burning my face that way..."

"You'll figure it out."

"I'm going over here, Dad!" Yuma ran around the circumference of the pond to its opposite end, "I'll try it again and you watch, okay?"

"You got it."

It was like reliving a moment of his childhood. Obito watched as the boy moved through the seals, channeled and exhaled, producing a better-than-average fireball that did not sear him. What was a rite of passage to bear the clan crest of the Uchiha, in Obito's day, was now just another technique Yuma had learned for survival training. He picked it up faster than I did. They'd make a big deal of him! Though...no one really congratulated me when I did... Obito thought, Well, I also didn't have my Sharingan at the time. Yuma isn't as mediocre as his Old Man.

Yuma generated another fireball, no longer fearful of being burned. It glowed with the same childish exuberance the little boy did. Obito waved him over and Yuma scampered back to him while laughing triumphantly.

"Dad! I can do it!"

"I know!"

"So is this," Yuma indicated the channeling hand motion, "Something we only use with Fire Jutsu?"

"Hm. Well no...channeling goes with all parts of Ninjutsu. Like I said, most ninja don't realize they're doing it," He stood back and made hand seals for an Earth Jutsu. Obito laid his hands on the ground and overturned a linear portion of rock and soil, "See? Earth Release is another common example. Sometimes it's just easier to perform jutsu this way, but there are some people who can focus so well that they flat-out direct it with a thought!"

"Can you, Dad?"

He smiled proudly, "Sure I can."
"Show me!"

"Fine, but please understand that this is more difficult. Don't you dare try this kind of thing yet," Obito made seals for a fireball but bent at the knees, freeing his hands as if they had something better to do, and roared a jet of flame over the pond with a gaping mouth. He actually had to try a little, Or I might burn the hair off my head doing this kind of shit... Vapor rose wearily from the water while Yuma clapped in amazement.

"Seriously...don't do that." Obito warned him again, "That's something only a seasoned ninja should try and they can still mess it up!"

"I got it."

"Good! Now come here," He scooped Yuma up and settled him on a bed of moss a few paces away, "Let me take a look at you..."

"I feel okay! I want to keep practicing..."

"We'll practice more tomorrow. I just wanted you to get your toes wet today." Obito gently shot the idea down, "Though I was impressed by what you did, Yuma."

"Thanks, Daddy."

Much like how his child was learning a new jutsu, Obito had been taught an important technique by Rin. After a discussion about accidents, emergencies and how to handle them on their own, Rin proposed, "Why don't I teach you the Palm Healing Jutsu?"

"I don't know if I have a knack for it..."

"You're chakra control is..." She refrained from laughing, "So much better than it was when we were kids. You've got a better chance now."

"Thanks."

"So do you want to try it?"

And he did. Or at least, he was still trying. Obito had a full day of explanations and lessons from his wife, who was a very good teacher (he told her). The days that followed were filled with little tests and exercises. Rin made him practice all the time on small, meaningless things: paper cuts, puncture wounds, bruises and such. She told him that he ought not to tackle a broken bone or any severe injury without her supervision, Because it is possible to screw up, she warned him. The precision and care he needed to take with his chakra was utterly unlike breathing fire and destroying things with powerful Ninjutsu. But he was getting the hang of it.

"Hold still, Yuma," He wrapped an arm around his son and pressed his hand to Yuma's chin, erasing a sting-pink burn. Faint green, glowing chakra wiped away the marks on the boy's skin as Obito passed his hand over them, and Yuma sighed in relief while hugging his father.

"I'm glad you can do what Mama can do."

"Me too." Obito took a seat and just held him, enjoying how Yuma was neatly tucked under his chin, "She's much better at it than me...but it's good for when I stub my toe, I guess; or when you knock me over during Taijutsu practice."

The boy giggled wildly.
"You've gotta be gentle with your Old Man. I'm getting frailer every year."

Yuma shook his head, "No way. I can't go easy on you!"

"Really? Not even when I ask nicely?"

"You're the strongest ninja there is, Dad. I want to be better than you!"

"Oh, I see," Obito nodded in understanding, "Then that's okay. Don't get mad if I win, though. I've got my precious reputation to defend."

"Ha! Mama can beat you too!"

He grinned, "In more ways than one, she can."

"Two versus one!"

"You guys would beat me to a pulp. That's no fair."

"Fair."

They cuddled and mused beneath the golden trees.

"You're much more talented than I was at your age," Obito observed, "The Uchiha clan will welcome you."

"They'll like me?"

"Without a doubt."

"Will I get to see my grandma and grandpa, just like Fumitake does?"

"Well…" Obito sighed, "Your grandma and grandpa have been dead since I was a little boy. You can meet your aunties, though. They're my big sisters. There are many people in the clan who will want to meet you."

"Oh!"

"And the leader of the clan too, Fugaku-sama."

"Hmm."

"You'll definitely get to meet everyone from Mama's family. Gosh…there's going to be a lot of people who will want to see you."

"When can we go? Can we go soon?" Yuma's eyes were pleading, "I don't want to be lonely anymore. No one around here really likes me."

"Hey! There are plenty of people who think you are super cool!"

"But…kids my age…"

Obito stared out into the sea of straight tree trunks ahead of him, deep in thought, "I don't know exactly when…but we'll get there. I promise you that we will. Your mother and I don't want to coop you up here forever, so don't worry."

A soft sigh, "Okay…"
They lounged until Obito heard the distinct gurgle of Yuma's empty stomach, 'Oh. It's lunch time.' And they marched home along the forest path.

"Dad! Which jutsu can I learn next?"

"You just tried out the Fireball Jutsu. We can think about that after you've mastered it."

"Oh, come on…"

Obito smiled slightly, "You're being pushy. There isn't much you need to learn right now. If anything, your mom and I might teach you Supplementary Jutsu. Remember that we said we only teach you things that can keep you safe?"

"So no more fire jutsu?"

"When you're older, sure. And not a moment before you've gotten all the Supplementary techniques down."

"I bet Mama will teach me!"

"She will," Obito winked at him, "When you're older."

"Bah."

He lifted the boy up by his arm pits and helped Yuma avoid the coiling vines of a thorn bush. Obito set him back down and watched him cross a log carefully, 'He's at about the age when he could take the entry exam for the Academy. Yuma would be accepted in a heartbeat.' It was another fleeting daydream of his, 'I just don't know how I'm going to go about it. Rin promised she would take Yuma to Konoha if something ever happened to me...but otherwise she won't entertain the idea.'

Obito often wondered if her reluctance stemmed from not wanting to face her family, 'Or Kakashi…' He had vowed that he would stand by her side and make the process easier; after all, he was due for a lot more harassment than she was. No. Rin hated the idea. She insisted that there was no way their peaceful life could continue in the Leaf Village, 'Everything will be ripped apart all over again. Even if we did our best to rebuild there, people won't understand.'

He worried a little bit that she could be right.

'Maybe I can ask Jiraiya-sama for advice. He suggested that we go back anyway…' Obito frowned anxiously, 'Though I haven't heard from him in a long time. I hope he's alright...I may need to track him down to make sure he's still in one piece.'

The forest thinned out as they approached the house. Beyond the line of trees that stopped at their front yard, Obito could make out a shape lying down in the grass. A bit closer still he could see that it was Rin, asleep on her back with her hands folded on her stomach. Sesshu was slumbering beside her.

Yuma turned to his father and gave the "shhh!" signal before sneaking over to his napping mother. He stopped and crouched beside her, trying to hold back his giggles.

Rin stirred, keeping her eyes shut, "You're laughing."

The boy hovered over her face, "Mama! Only babies take naps."

"Oh?" She opened her eyes, smirking, "Well you should tell your father that."
"Hey!" Obito had settled on Rin's opposite side, "If that's true then that makes the two of us babies."

She smiled at Obito, sat up, and then began to look Yuma over. Rin had been expecting a burn or two after the first day of practice but he appeared to be unscathed. She plucked at his crispy t-shirt that had a few holes in it, probably caused by the heat, "You'll need to change, mister. Go put a new shirt on and then have some blueberries. I put them on the table for you."

"Okay Mama." He pressed a wet kiss to her cheek and then took off again, leaping over Sesshu.

"Hmm." Rin's chuckle resonated in her chest, "I thought maybe the Fireball Jutsu would have left that boy worse for the wear," Her chestnut eyes met her husband's, "But he was in capable hands. You did a good job healing Yuma."

Obito sighed quietly, leaning back on his hands, "Thanks for the compliment. I'm not nearly as good as you though, Rin."

"Oh. Then would you like some extra training?" She had turned towards him on the grass, wearing that puckish smile of hers. Obito could tell that she was not referring to medical techniques.

Intrigued, he bent down over her, "You've got something to show me?"

"I do."

"Can you show me out here?"

"Maybe." Rin pulled him gently by collar of his shirt and pressed her lips to his. A warm rush rolled down his neck and back and Obito pressed against her, tracing down her tunic with fingertips that were curious about the skin beneath.

The harsh breaths of their kissing disturbed Sesshu and the dog flattened his ears. With a short growl, he rose and then stalked off, seeking his favorite rug back inside the house. After tousling briefly, Obito lifted his wife up and proceeded across the yard, deciding it was time to bring things inside after all.

Rin, who was compliant with this unspoken decision, smiled to herself while she kept her arms properly looped around Obito's neck as he transported her. They passed Sesshu at the entryway who muttered in annoyance at the sight of them.

Yuma was seated in cross-legged fashion at the kitchen table with a green t-shirt on. He looked at his parents curiously while he scooped blueberries into his mouth by the handful. 'Sometimes Dad just picks up Mama like that and takes her everywhere. He won't put her down.' And of course, Obito did not set Rin down again. He liked her where he had her.

"I'm glad you changed," Rin addressed her son, "Yuma, would you mind giving me and your father an hour alone? Sesshu will take you into town."

The dog protested weakly in the background.

"Well...okay." He chomped one last handful of fruit before hopping to his feet. As an afterthought he asked, "Hey Mama, what do you and Dad do while I'm gone?"

Rin opened her mouth to answer, stopped herself when she thought better of it, and then burst into a fit of wild laughter. Yuma stared with wide eyes, not comprehending. Obito shook his head at Rin's hilarity.
"Just husband-wife things." Obito assured him, "Totally normal."

Yuma nodded. That was the answer. If anyone ever asked him, that was the explanation he could use. He was not a child who desired details; at least not yet.

Rin composed herself for a moment, "That's right. Have a good time in town, sweetie."

The boy grinned at her before darting through the living area and shouting for the ninjen to wake up, "Race me into town Sesshu!" The golden dog sluggishly complied.

"He had…blueberry bits in his teeth." Rin lamented, "Oh…I don't want him walking around looking like that! I should have told him to brush first…"

"He's a kid." Obito reminded her, progressing down the hallway, "Kids are messy."

"Yeah."

A few minutes after sunrise beside the Toad Oil Pool, Naruto was seated on the top step, drifting harmoniously with nature and the energy all around him…

"You moved."

Naruto held still, keeping his eyes shut.

"You definitely moved."

"No."

"Well now you did, because you spoke." Gamakichi teased him from where he lounged a few feet away on a large mushroom top.

The young man's head snapped towards the antagonizing toad, eyes fiery and nostrils flaring, "Gamakichi, I told you before to stop talking. Seriously."

"Jeez! I just want to hang out with my best human friend."

"I am here to work on tranquility. Pa asked me to relax and try meditating without oil," Naruto added pointedly, "OR distractions. We can hang out later."

Gamakichi propped his head up with a webbed hand, "Fine."

He did not wish to leave, but it was best not to pester Naruto any further. Fukasaku had explained to many of the toad residents in the valley that they were not allowed to hinder Naruto's training. It was hard enough without interference, but due to Naruto being very friend-minded and attentive, he was sure to be distracted by any type of companionship. It had to be cold-turkey, silent work.

By calling upon some inner-strength, Gamakichi managed not to disturb Naruto for a full hour. The sun gradually crept upwards over the valley. Naruto had not moved a muscle all the while. The toad found his concentration truly remarkable.

"Naruto!"

Gamakichi glared across the clearing at the offending newcomer, Kosuke, who was shouting as he hopped towards the pool.

"Keep it down! He's trying to meditate, you twerp!" Gamakichi hissed.

"I'm sorry," Kosuke stopped on the steps, distraught, "I know Pa said we shouldn't hold up Sage Training but, but…"

Naruto had snapped out of his trance and addressed his small friend, "What's the matter?"

"I was in the Leaf Village the other day, checking out the comic book shop and all that…then Hinata-sama came looking for me. I don't know how she found me so fast…"

Naruto suspected she had used the Byakugan to find the toad.

"She was upset! I couldn't tell why but I promised that I would get her letter to you," Kosuke offered up a scroll apologetically, "I'm sorry, Naruto. I know you're working hard…"

"Hey! It's okay! I'll take that," He accepted it, "It must have been important. This is a situation where it is totally fine if you interrupt me, just so you know."

"Gotcha."

Naruto laid eyes on the words that had been scrawled in a frantic rush:

Naruto,

I am so frightened. I wish you were here. The past few days have been absolutely terrible. My eldest cousin was killed just outside of the village as he was returning from a mission. He was mistaken for Neji-nisan, and my father was told that the attacker introduced himself as an outlaw from Iwagakure, Shimofuri Koinyu. Most of my clan is in shock and even I am unsure of why this happened. My cousin's teammate told me that Neji-nisan and his team were targets.

Why on earth would someone want to hurt them? I feel so worried, like we all need to look over our shoulders now. Father says that this kind of grudge is unheard of these days, because the Rock Village and Leaf Village are no longer at war. I just don't understand. Perhaps you can ask Gama-sennin if he knows about this person? And please…

Her writing had a small cross out and what looked like a water-droplet mark

Be very careful, Naruto. I was fearful enough of the Akatsuki, but it seems that our village still has many more enemies than we thought. I don't want you to be so far away. I don't want you to encounter people like this who can hurt you.

His chest felt tight as he read about her heartache.

I know that when I am by your side I won't let anyone hurt you. Not with their words or actions, I will always stop it from happening. It sounds selfish, but all I can think about is you coming home to me. I don't think I could go on in this world if anything ever happened to you, Naruto. Please be safe. Please come home.

Love,

Hinata

Dizzy, Naruto looked up from the parchment and got his bearings. His skin had gone cold. The Akatsuki was not the only coalition trying to sink its claws into the Leaf Village. Hinata's alarm had dislodged his peaceful mindset and essentially halted any progress he might make with meditating that morning.

Naruto stood and spoke sidelong to Gamakichi, "I'll see you later."

"You're not going to keep going? Is your girlfriend okay?" "She's not, but I want to make sure that she will be." Naruto rolled up the scroll and thanked Kosuke for notifying him.

The toads blinked and Naruto had teleported back to his anchor in Fukasaku's house.

Naruto found Jiraiya seated at the dining table, drinking tea while editing a draft of Icha Icha Paradise.

"Ero-sensei," Naruto took a seat across from him, still frazzled, "Can I bug you?"

"Sure, you're doing it already so feel free," The man chuckled, "Do you have a question about Sage Training?"

"No. Hinata sent me this," Naruto handed the scroll to his mentor; "It's not good. I was hoping you could weigh in on it…"

Finishing a sip of tea, Jiraiya opened the scroll and flattened it, scanning over the short but pleading message. He looked up again after a minute and sighed, "Oh boy…"

"Well?"

"I was aware of this. Tsunade sent me a message too, although she's piecing together a lot of reports. She was hoping I could tell her more about these assholes and how they've messed with us in the past." Jiraiya fidgeted his bad arm, which was not nearly so bad anymore, "This fellow from Rock is a servant of Dintei Bi's, without a doubt. He's not really hunting down Gai's team, because it's the girl that he wants. Tsunade can probably already tell."

"Tenten? Why just her?"

"She's Takaharu's only child; a loose end. Those lunatics will do anything to wipe out the true line of succession to put themselves on top." Jiraiya scratched his chin, "They probably won't kill her until they have what they want…but I wouldn't put it past them to execute any Leaf shinobi they suspect might be affiliated with her. They've done it this way for years. They smoke out their targets until they're inescapably cornered."

Naruto sat in troubled silence, staring at the flower vase on the table. Jiraiya casually sipped his tea. He had a better hold of the crisis than his student. Jiraiya had always known that the list of Konohagakure's enemies was a few miles long, but now it seemed that the overlap of threats and violence was overwhelming Leaf. In his opinion, Tsunade had chosen a decent time to make new allies, We're going to need Sand and Star to be on their toes when this shit hits the fan and blows all over us.

"You were right." Naruto spoke suddenly.

Jiraiya, wide-eyed, regarded the teenager in delighted bewilderment, "I was?"

"Hinata will make me forget. As soon as I'm back in the village with her…I won't be able to leave." He confessed, "When I read all of that…I wanted to get to her. Just for a second, I thought I might make a run for it. I don't want her to feel like that. I'm never gonna let her feel so low all on her own like that!"

Jiraiya patted his shoulder, "I know it's super hard for you, kid. Think of it this way...her clan is supporting her. She's safe and she won't feel crappy and scared forever. And you? When you finish up here you can look forward to being with someone who really does love and connect with you back at home. I didn't have that. It'll be worth it, you'll see. Sage Training will save your ass and then neither of you will have to be paranoid like this."

He poured Naruto a cup of tea and pushed it in front of him. The blonde took a tentative sip of it, absorbing Jiraiya's words, "You can write back to your princess this evening. Do me a favor...and relax. Please try. Tsunade and I are still a team, and I am going to work on this with her. There's nothing you can realistically do at this point other than master Senjutsu." He smiled, "Go back to the pool and meditate."

Naruto groaned, releasing some pent-up stress.

"Let it all out, kid." The man nodded in approval, "Yeah, go and master Sage Training in record time, like you planned. I want to be astounded. I want to be dazzled."

A small laugh escaped Naruto, "I've already done that."

"Well, yeah, I'm pretty impressed. But like you said, you're not going home until you get this right...since you're so excited to put on the old ball and chain for your girlfriend."

"Damn right." Grinning, Naruto flashed away to the Toad Oil Pool.

Kakashi had the distinct look of having finished a marathon. Disheveled and slightly dehydrated, he walked beside Sakura down the road towards the center of the Leaf Village. He listened as his resilient student recapped the few events of the Tide Village he missed.

"I finally got to meet Matsuri after the whole, you know..." She was wincing at the memory, "Gaara losing his temper thing."

"It was spectacular, wasn't it?"

She frowned, "Don't joke! I was worried he'd make headlines when he started screaming. It just did not go how it was supposed to. Honestly, I'm glad that the Sand ninja didn't need help stopping those bandits...and that the students were safe. It was all we could hope for when we hurried to the Tide Village." Sakura shook her head, "But if Kankuro had somehow resolved everything...inexpensively...it would have been the perfect outcome!"

"Yes, that one little detail..." Kakashi agreed, "Better that he prevented casualties than fret about a pristine thoroughfare."

"Gaara said it would cost Sand a bit less than half of what is spent on funding a Chunin Selection Exam."

"That was just the first estimate. That's only if Tazuna doesn't choose to fine them."

Her chin dropped for a moment, troubled, but then Sakura livened up again, "Matsuri was great. She seemed so happy...and Gaara said that she was the first shinobi to track down the Shin clan."
"So that's why she had that little Sound ninja following her around?"

The girl grinned, "I heard he took her on a date! Gaara wasn't very pleased about that."

The pair detoured down a side street and stopped in front of Sakura's house. She sighed, hesitating to go up the steps, "Thanks, Kakashi-sensei. If Tsunade-sama needs me to debrief for a mission report I'll stop by her office later. My parents aren't going to be happy I was gone for an extra three days…"

"I don't think you'll need to. Take it easy for now, Sakura."

Before he set out again he could see Sakura fiddling with a key on a lanyard around her neck, That isn't for her house… The pink haired girl steeled her nerves and went inside, "I'm home!" and then endured a string of complaints from her irate mother. The woman pounced like a wildcat when Sakura tried to make a break for her bedroom.

Kakashi returned to the main road and was debating whether or not to catch lunch. Asuma caught his eye as he appeared, traveling in the opposite direction. They stopped to greet each other.

"Hey. Where have you been, Kakashi?" His friend wondered.

"All over. First I was in Suna with Sakura and then the Kazekage asked me to help him neutralize a threat in the Land of Waves," He let out a long breath of relief, "I need a day off."

Asuma tossed a spent cigarette butt to the ground and extinguished it, "You're not the only one."

"You too?"

"Nah, I'm fine. It's Gai." He clarified, "He's been very out of it since the Hokage splintered his team."

"She what?"

"It was a huge debacle. I saw him for a minute just before he left for a mission with Lee and Neji. Looks like he aged thirty years in one night…" Asuma sucked in his cheeks to appear gaunt, "Not good. The Hokage's not talking either. She said she'll have a meeting with the Jounin Council after the next report that comes in. Maybe in a few days."

"She removed Tenten without telling Gai?"

"Yeah."

Kakashi stared blankly down the avenue as citizens strolled by, carefree and content. His stomach churned. When Sasuke had detached himself from the team, not too long ago, Kakashi had gotten a very unique feeling after the Retrieval Mission failed. If evisceration had an emotional equivalent, that's what it felt like to watch a student disappear.

'Of course, if Tsunade-sama is trying to get a handle of an emergency implicating Gai's team, then she obviously doesn't care how Gai feels about it,' Kakashi supposed, 'I ought to drop by and make her care.'

It's what his friend deserved, at the very least. Hokage be damned, Kakashi thought. Students were so much like children to him and his fellow Jounin, and it hurt to be apart from them.

Kakashi thanked Asuma for the warning and then continued. He poked around the plaza for ten minutes and got a sense that Gai had not returned yet. He went home.
When the door of the apartment chunked shut behind him, Kakashi could hear the yawning of his ninken from their bedroom. The clattering of dog nails on the wood floor followed. Pakkun and Biscuit arrived first to welcome him home.

"Hello boys. Is everyone else napping?"

"Yeah. Bull rolled on top of the rest of the pack, so don't expect them to come out here anytime soon." Pakkun reported, "You were gone for longer than you said you'd be, Kakashi."

"Sakura and I got sidetracked. We ended up going to the Land of Waves as Gaara's backup." Kakashi explained, kneeling down to scratch Biscuit's chin, "I left plenty for you guys to eat, right?"

"We were fine." Pakkun assured him.

"Good. Will you please do me a favor and hang out around the Administration Building? I want you to let me know when Gai gets back. I need to talk to him."

"Sure," Pakkun turned to his floppy-eared companion, "Come on, Bisky." He trotted over to the door and pulled on the rag tied to the handle. It clicked open and the two dogs let themselves out.

Kakashi moved down the hall and stopped at the dogs' room. As expected, Bull was nestled happily on top of his smaller companions on the large, cushioned bed they shared. They were sleeping through it, and maybe being slowly crushed to death. Kakashi smiled happily. His dogs were his other children.

He arrived at his bedroom and unpacked his travel bag, lost in thought. 'Why would the Hokage do something like this? Asuma made it seem like it was a response to some kind of threat…but Tsunade hasn't told the Jounin anything yet.' It perturbed him immensely. For the most part, Kakashi quite liked the Fifth Hokage and agreed with her policies. She had made admirable strides to improve the village. There were also some habits of hers that did not go over well with him. For example: not sending replies or being courteous with low-priority (in her book) clients and communications. Hiding alcohol in the bottom drawer of her desk. Taking her temper out on the shinobi who worked closest to her. And severing teams unexpectedly. He could not give her top-marks for any of that.

After putting clothing and tools away, Kakashi migrated to the bathroom. He took a hasty shower and then redressed. 'Gai probably didn't fight her orders.' It was difficult to speak out against a superior's command, much less the Hokage's, and Gai had never in all his years combatted authority. A good-natured competition was customary, once in a while, but he never outright objected orders. While he may have wanted to speak up, Kakashi knew that Gai had bottled up his concerns instead. He was respectful to a fault.

'And arguing with Tsunade is a Herculean task.' Kakashi noted. The Hokage was very aware of the fact that she was a woman, and that, initially, she had caught flak from stupider members of the village council because of her sex. She didn't put up with it. Well, she didn't put up with any type of argument, truth be told. Her defensive reflex was so inflamed from critics and village crises that Tsunade was quicker to slam a door in someone's face than show even the remotest bit of sympathy.

And he totally understood.

Pakkun barked from outside the front door and Kakashi opened it, letting him and Biscuit inside.

"We just scented 'em. Gai and his team entered the Hokage's tower. You can catch them if you go over there now." Pakkun informed his human.

"I'll find him now. Thanks, boys."
"No prob. We're going to the dog park later for some exercise. Don't wait up."

Kakashi set out again. He passed by his favorite tea house and longed to stop for a pick-me-up, but he walked on dutifully. The aroma of snacks tempted him all the way down the street. As he passed shop windows, the glass reflected the tower-high cumulus clouds suspended in the blue sky. It didn't feel like a tragic day, but Kakashi prepared himself.

When he reached the entrance of the tower Team Gai was leaving. It was a sight to behold. Today, Gai stood behind his students, looking just as defeated as what Asuma described. Wilted. Lee was in front of him, looking far too timid by Springtime-of-Youth standards and was supremely aware of Neji, who was at the lead. His anger was razor-sharp and permeating the air. Lee was absorbing it and converting it into grief.

Kakashi wanted to shake his head; reproachful of how they had fallen apart, but instead he waited on the sidewalk as they exited. Neji's stone-faced expression harkened back to his Academy Days. He had become an island again.

Without a single word to the rest of his team, the young man stalked off towards the west side of town, towards the Hyuga Estate. Lee paused on the road; his expression had gone from sad to contemplative. Kakashi could see the boy draw a conclusion, watch how the idea brought him back to life, and then he waved goodbye to his sensei. He ran after Neji.

For once, Gai did not have a spirited greeting for his rival. Kakashi stopped beside him and they observed the foot traffic of the village circulate for a few moments.

"I heard that the Hokage subtracted a student from your team," Kakashi began, "What happened, Gai?"

There was a hard expression on the man's face. A little bit of rage had drifted to the top of the pool he had been drowning in. Gai settled down and exhaled, "From what I understand…the Hokage thinks that we are in danger at the present time. Tenten most of all, it seems. She has forbidden my students from participating on missions outside of the Fire Country. Communicating with Tenten is also prohibited."

"This feels like a reaction to something." Kakashi pointed out.

"A young Jounin from the Hyuga clan was killed recently by a rogue Rock ninja. My team was the original target."

"Hm." He nodded, getting a grasp of the tale, "Did the Hokage have a briefing with you before she made such a major decision?"

"No," Gai's thick eyebrows furrowed, "She blatantly cut me off! The Hokage doesn't trust me. She rendered me powerless before I could do anything to protect my students. Really…it was a shameful thing to do."

"I agree," With his hands in his pockets, Kakashi strolled towards the building, "Let's go give her a hard time about it."

"Don't be a fool, Kakashi."

"I'm serious. You really won't stand up to her order?"

"Tsunade-sama said I can't appeal it. She'll terminate my activity and reassign me if I try."
"She won't bust your chops if I'm around." Kakashi asserted, "Now come on."

And so they went together, as two good friends often do, to a dangerous place.

Kakashi hoped, as they climbed the staircase, that Tsunade would not punish Gai harshly if he personally took credit for the visit. It just didn't seem fair. He got the feeling he could squeeze some information out of her if he held on and pissed her off just enough. That was the Hatake method, Sato would attest.

The door to the Hokage's office was open and so they stepped inside. Kakashi cleared his throat to get Tsunade's attention.

Without looking up from a push-hole ballot, she spoke, "Back again, Gai?"

"Yes ma'am." He uttered her favorite phrase. It was probably a smart idea.

Tsunade regarded Kakashi with a short glance and then went back to voting, "You're overdue, Kakashi. Shut the door."

Kakashi shut it and then approached her desk. Gai worked up enough bravery to do the same.

"What have we here? The dream duo. What can I do for you?" The Hokage quipped.

"I'd like to ask a few questions, Hokage-sama." Kakashi took the reins for the time being.

"Fine. But first, answer mine: How is the Tide Village?"

"Stable. All students accounted for and no casualties. Gaara's paying out of pocket for cosmetic damage to the city, though."

"Delightful. His first lesson in accountability. And Sakura?"

"Outstanding."

"Good." Tsunade looked up from the paper and smiled slyly, "Now what do you want to know?"

"Do you honestly believe…that I would stay silent if you removed a student from my team without a proper explanation?" Boldly, Kakashi added, "And how could you expect Gai to do so? If it's serious, a Jounin has the right and level clearance to be told what you know. Just send the Genin away."

The irritation she had been concealing inched back into her features, "Are you telling me how to do my job?"

"No. Those were questions."

Her eyes fell on Gai, "I already explained that I won't hear your objections to my order."

"I haven't objected, Tsunade-sama. Kakashi has."

She gritted her teeth, "You two!"

"Though I do believe Kakashi is right…you should not have denied me information." Gai worked up a backbone.

"YOU are too close to your students. You would have tried to prepare them for the worst. Am I wrong? If I had told you beforehand: I am removing Tenten from your team, would you or would you not have braced your students for the change?"

Frowning, he admitted, "I would have."

"That's why I couldn't disclose much right away, Gai." She folded her hands on her desk, "Please try to understand...I didn't want to do that to you. I just knew I had to."

Kakashi was slightly surprised that he saw her point.

"As an apology, let me tell you what I know now." Tsunade offered, "Since I have the both of you here, I might as well keep you in the loop."

Finally, some cooperation. They listened.

"This kind of attack fits a pattern that has existed for nearly 30 years. Targets are taunted in various ways, but it isn't unusual to see friends or loved ones killed should they step outside of the village. Then these rogues work their way in," She took a steadying breath, "I'm not sure how they do it. Nukenin like this should not have an intimate knowledge of Konoha...but I am starting to get the impression they have contacts on the inside." Tsunade lowered her voice, "But you didn't hear that from me. I don't have the evidence I need yet."

"Is this the same group that killed Takaharu?" Kakashi had a hunch.

The Hokage folded her arms, "I have no illusions about that. It must be so. Jiraiya has warned me to be wary of this faction's movements."

"And this blood feud involves my student?" Gai was distressed. He could draw a connection between Tenten and her father.

"It does. That was why I had her relocated. Forgive me for not explaining it to you sooner, Gai."

"Keeping her hidden will not work for long. Everyone of that blood line who sought refuge here was killed." Kakashi had to express the facts, even if they were morose, "The sooner the Jounin Council knows about this, the better. We don't need anyone else getting caught in an ambush."

"Leave that to me, Kakashi." Tsunade's voice became gentler, "I trust that you won't reveal this information to your students, Gai. They can't be involved in this matter presently, but in the future I know I will have to depend on them to counter this menace. Take care of them for now. I know it hasn't been easy."

Some of Gai's fire returned, "Understood, Hokage-sama. I don't want them going soft on me at a time like this..."

The Hokage fiddled with the ballots on her desk and then organized them into a pile, "There are a few other Jounin I want to speak to about these disquieting circumstances. I think they may know just as much about this enemy as you do, Kakashi. The two of you are free to go," The men looked relieved up until she continued, "But I have a D-Rank mission I want you to complete together."

"Tsunade-sama...I just returned from a mission." Gai pointed out. Moreover, such a low-level task was not befitting of a pair of Jounin.

"I know. Kakashi, I realize you meant well by coming to Gai's defense...but that condescending tone of yours was not conducive."
He smiled, thankful that it was not a cruel punishment, "Sorry. I couldn't help myself this time."

"Thank you for your candor, gentlemen. I'm glad we had this talk." Tsunade smiled, "Go scrub the bathroom on the first floor. There's a utility closet down there you can use. I feel that is a fair trade-off for your heckling."

The very first friend Lee had ever had in the Academy had been a boy in his class named Ageru. Lee, young and impressionable as he was, was truly ecstatic to have a friend. They attended class together and shared lunches. Though they were not part of the popular crowd, their social standing while together sustained them in the child-hierarchy of the school.

Ageru was by all accounts as average as they came. He was a dark haired fellow and the only child of two well-meaning, non-shinobi parents. He had been a friendly and welcoming boy.

Even while it became increasingly clear that Lee was falling behind with each course in basic Ninjutsu, Ageru encouraged him and always chided, "Don't worry!" He had thought Lee would catch up. They sat through History and Strategy class together in the beginning. Ageru fended off bullies who had called Lee "talentless" and the two initial years at the Academy were not nearly as awful as they could have been.

The day that Lee found out that his only friend had left the program was sudden. That solitary day of class, transitioning into "singlehood" made him feel terribly uncertain. More uncertain than Lee had felt about his own obvious lack of ninja gifts, or that he did not receive letters from his parents anymore while they were abroad. His only confidant was gone. Lee had sought Ageru out at the lobby of his father's business one day and asked why he no longer attended the Academy.

"Your marks were very good! You would have graduated near the top of the class!" Lee, with his long braid thrashing, made clear how upset he was.

"I think I would have been a decent ninja, but I decided that I don't want to grow up and be one."

The boy shrugged, "My Dad says I can take over his business so I need to start learning now. Go make more friends at the Academy, Lee. They'll help you practice."

The average boy proved that even he did not have the time to spend on a below-average friend.

Ageru fell out of touch, and Lee, desperate to survive the days of preliminary training and near failures, completely forgot about him. He forgot what it felt like to have a companion; to hear kind words from children his age.

The relentless bullying reached a fever pitch. His determination was mocked. Teachers went easy on him and lowered their expectations with every test. He was aware of how out-of-place he was in an environment that demanded excellence.

It turned out that being rejected by classmates sometimes worked in his favor. One day in class, a boy denied him a free seat, "Beat it, loser!" and so Lee went to the available chairs in the middle row. It was the first time Tenten had ever spoken to him. He took the seat next to her quietly and set his books down.

"I like your Han braid." She told him just before a lecture began.

"You know what it is?"
"Sure. My mom ties my hair like that sometimes. Our family has those traditions too."

He smiled and then faced front, nervous, fearing that she would make a remark about how he'd lagged at the back of the jogging troupe that morning. He recalled seeing her closer to the front. Not a good sign.

"Look at him." Tenten whispered, indicating a boy in the front row. His right arm was in a cast, "Habara is such a klutz. He promised he would practice shuriken throwing with me today. Now he's weaseling out of it."

"Well…his arm is broken."

"So use the other! I can do it. He told me that he didn't want to try." Tenten scoffed, "If he just tried, he'd probably find out he could do it." She looked at Lee, her pretty eyes questioning, "Will you practice with me later, Lee?"

He accepted the invitation, wagering his aim was quite good compared to his other abilities.

And from that day on, even though Tenten was critical of his throwing technique, she spent every afternoon with him at the target practice yard until her father brought her home. She was not malicious like the other children, Lee theorized, she just disliked nonsense. When he didn't give her nonsense she was actually a pleasant companion. She never said a word about his struggles. He had plenty of people discussing his failing marks already.

Mercifully, at Graduation time, the Chunin Instructor who was organizing Genin cells noticed that Lee (who had against all odds passed) was compatible with the kunoichi who spent afternoons practicing with him. By "compatible", he clarified to his Instructor peers; he meant that Lee would not be wickedly ridiculed every few minutes by this particular trainee. He then paired the oddballs with the student who had graduated at the top of his class and dusted his hands; mission accomplished! A balanced squad: sure to function.

At any rate, it wasn't the school's problem anymore.

Neji was the embodiment of Lee's many Academy torturers compiled into one, compact, snobbish teammate. He did not filter himself. With simplistic, scathing language, Neji frequently knocked Lee down. When words did not suffice, Neji would physically knock him down when they sparred together. It was only natural to prey on Lee's weakness.

Had Gai-sensei not been nearly so enthusiastic with his tough-love training, Lee might've given up. Even Tenten, who was his friend (as they had mutually established over dumplings one morning) could not protect him from Neji's malice. All she could do was distract him by becoming the Hyuga prodigy's dedicated training partner. It reduced the assaults just enough for Lee to thrive under Gai's tutelage.

Lee and Tenten fostered their friendship through their shared heritage. They went out to eat and spent short amounts of time (he was preoccupied with laps) and generally nurtured their bond off of the training field.

By the time Lee had learned Front Lotus, Neji was not exactly a tormenter anymore. He had cooled off.

No one on the team would use words like "nice" or "outgoing" to describe him, even during his improved days, but he had become a trustworthy teammate. It made the missions more workable. It strengthened communication and productivity. After another year of training together, growing up and surviving close-calls, they had all achieved a balance and become "comrades," as Gai put it with a jubilant laugh.

'And now,' Lee thought as he followed the heir to the Hyuga clan across the village, 'It feels just like old times. Neji is behaving the same way he did when we first became a team…'

Lee was sure that he would be bearing the brunt of Neji's misery. He was mentally fortifying himself for the attacks. What was different this time around, Lee decided, was that he would choose to put himself in harm's way. He had a gut feeling that his teammate would not benefit from being left alone. They had barely functioned as a team on the brief, D-Rank mission they had finished that morning.

'The channel must be left open!' Even if Neji only had negative things to say, at least he had the ability to voice them. After all, Lee had an incredibly clear picture of what was irking his friend the most. If the person who understood his pain walked away from him at a time like this, who in the world would truly be able to listen?

When he passed through the gate of the Hyuga estate, Lee spotted Neji taking his shoes off at the veranda of the Main House. It would stand to reason that he wanted to shut himself indoors and mope. He swiftly slid the door shut behind him.

'What is my next course of action?' Lee cupped his chin while he walked across the courtyard.

He simply wanted to convey the message: I am here for you! It seemed straightforward enough, but Neji's disappearing act could silence any and all supportive comments. Neji also wanted to go somewhere he wouldn't be followed. Lee knew better than to waltz into the Main House uninvited.

Staying outside on the gravel path, Lee bypassed the front of the building. While Lee debated how he could gain access to the house, or just storm inside (he knew where Neji's room was) he entered a yard that was green with grass and clover. Just beyond the lawn, a meticulously kept garden was fragrant with gardenia. He blinked. A small red toad with goggles on its head hopped out of the flower patch and towards the porch of the house.

Toads were a telltale herald of Naruto, Lee recalled. He rapidly deduced where the little creature was headed, "Excuse me!"

The toad stopped; surprised that it had been addressed, "Huh? You mean me?"

"Yes, I do. Are you a friend of Naruto's?"

"I am! The name's Kosuke."

"So then perhaps you are delivering something to Hinata-sama?" Lee deduced.

"You're sharp! That's right. She told me she would wait for me in that tea room over there."

"Ah, I see! Maybe she will not mind two visitors?"

Through a door that had been left ajar, Kosuke made a noisy appearance into the sitting room. Hinata was by herself with a stack of books, pressing flowers between pages. She looked up with a small smile, "That was so quick, Kosuke-chan!" She chirped in surprise when Lee appeared at the doorway, "Lee-kun, hello."

"Good morning, Hinata-sama! Do you have some time to spare?"
"I do. Please sit down." She turned to Kosuke and accepted the scroll he offered up, "Thank you," And patted a cushion beside her so the toad could rest. Kosuke made himself comfortable and Hinata regarded her human visitor curiously, "Is everything alright?"

Lee took a spot on the opposite side of the table, "I am not sure. Neji is distraught and I do not know what I can do about it."

"Did something happen?" Her shoulders were rigid. She had known from the start that Lee's presence meant something serious. Typically, it was Tenten who gave her updates.

"Tsunade-sama removed Tenten from our team," Lee announced, his hands gripping his knees tightly, "It is part of an investigation. Gai-sensei and I are upset about it…but Neji is the worst affected."

Hinata stared at him for nearly a full minute. She was working out the problem in her head.

"I know that he has become very close to her. I think…that Neji wanted to be closer to her," Lee figured it was safe to discuss it with Hinata, who was more than likely aware of her cousin's feelings, "He is frustrated that the Hokage has forbidden us from speaking to Tenten."

She nodded slowly, "That is true. I could tell. Did he talk to you at all, Lee-kun?"

"He has not."

Hinata used her Byakugan to check the house and spotted her cousin. She pursed her lips, "He needs someone to talk to."

"Neji might prefer speaking to you more than he would to me." Lee presumed.

Her eyes fell on the scroll that Naruto had sent. She glanced back to Lee, sympathizing with his plight, and then she stood, "Kosuke-chan, will you please wait here for a while? I am going to pay my cousin a visit." The toad was happy to oblige.

"I will try to help him feel better, Lee-kun," She was smiling hopefully, "And then maybe he will be comfortable opening up to you. In the morning I will let you know how he is doing."

Lee thanked her profusely and asked Kosuke to wish Naruto well for him. Lee departed from the house, optimistic that he might have found a way to soften the shell that Neji was retreating into.

The next day, Lee had spoken to Sato, who had heard from Shikamaru (and he from Asuma) that there was some strife between the Hokage and Team Gai.

"More specifically, Neji." Sato announced.

Lee, who had been in great need of some therapy as well, spoke about how they barely even knew how to speak or make eye contact without Tenten around. Shikamaru and Chouji listened from a picnic bench as Lee orated the sad tale to Sato (and Shino too, though he had not solicited the story from his place against an alleyway fence.) Lee got it out of his system. He had even selfishly wondered if he cared more about Tenten's absence because he had been her friend for a longer period of time.

"You can spout blasphemy like that in front of us," Sato comforted him with a pat on the back, "But Neji might kill you if he heard that. He's got a thing for her, after all.”

Downtrodden, Lee nodded, which was tantamount to confirmation in Shikamaru's opinion.

He held up a finger to halt the conversation, "Hold on a second."

Lee, Sato and Chouji gave him their attention. Shino might have, but behind those glasses who knew?

"Sato just said he has a thing for her."

"Yeah." The Hatake nearly rolled his eyes, "Why do you think he's so pissed?"

"Because they're friends?" Chouji supplied.

"Sorry, but I'm right this time. Even Lee would tell you that's the case." Sato insisted, nodding as if he had some authority on the matter.

Lee felt his friends' gazes shift back to him. "It is possible," he conceded, "But Neji does not possess the emotional vocabulary to articulate such a thing. If he does feel that way, then we may never see evidence of it."

"There's evidence." Shikamaru assured him, "Tenten is the only unattached kunoichi of our group. That's not an accident."

"It's Neji's fault." Sato agreed.

Chouji interjected, "She could just, you know, not want to date anyone."

There was a pause as they considered it.

"Well, whatever the problem is, Neji needs to know that he's welcome to come to us," Shikamaru offered, "It's a huge burden on you, Lee, to put up with him all on your own."

"We'll meet with you whenever you guys want." Sato's affirmation came with a thumbs-up.

Lee was most appreciative of their support. Feeling superbly equipped to deal with his teammate's wretched mood, Lee dropped by the Hyuga compound to see how Hinata had fared.

He found her in the garden he had passed through the day before. She held up her hands apologetically, which were covered in large, dirty work gloves, "It did not go as well as we hoped…"

"Why not, Hinata-sama?"

"Neji-niisan…did not want to discuss it at all. When I pressed him, I think it made him more upset. He told me to leave." Hinata explained, "I'm sorry, Lee-kun. I will try again later today. Maybe he needs a little more time."

"I see. I am grateful that you tried." Some of his confidence ebbed. If Neji wasn't meeting people halfway in terms of feeling better, then Lee couldn't do much for him, even if he was bursting at the seams with support and compassion.

He consulted with Gai at their training field…which was looking woefully empty that day.

"Lee, it is simply a matter of being present." Gai proclaimed, a bit more sedate than usual, "There was a time when Kakashi was withdrawn...when he too was lamenting the loss of his team." He folded his arms and continued, "I did the opposite of what others did. When they told me to give him space I tracked him down on every corner. Every street and hole in the wall! He didn't like it...but after a time Kakashi told me that I had helped him."

With wide eyes, Lee was captivated by the advice.

"Yes...Kakashi told me I was a bug up his butt. That I was insufferable. That he hated seeing me. He practically never accepted my invitations out to be with friends. For a time I thought I had done more harm than good..." Gai grinned, "But my dour rival worked his way out of it. When his sadness became more exhausting than my challenges he decided to free himself of it. Kakashi valued my friendship and he told me so."

"Gai-sensei..." Lee covered his eyes with his arm, choked up, "Will I...be able to do that?"

He clapped the boy on the shoulder, "Without a doubt, Lee! It will be painful. It will seem pointless...but you must do this for your teammate. Tenten would want us to."

Lee nodded and let his tears dry up. He was fortified. He and his teacher shared an optimistic hug before spending the rest of the day sparring. Kicks only.

Shockingly, Neji turned up for training the next morning. Of course, there was a scowl plastered to his face.

Lee frantically tried to summon up the wisdom that Gai had imparted. How to be "present," even if he came across as annoying; he scrambled to extend some form of goodwill that was not overtly youthful.

"Neji! You're joining us today?"

With a hand on his hip, the Hyuga remained mute. His face indicated that it may not have been his idea to participate, but he had showed up nonetheless. Lee had an inkling that Hinata had succeeded.

"Are you feeling better?"

Neji arched an eyebrow at him. No.

Gai would arrive in a few minutes, Lee estimated. He shifted gears, hoping that reinstating the routine, i.e. training might help his friend feel things were like business as usual. When he asked if Neji was interested in sparring he did get a verbal response.

"What else would I be here for?"

Lee was wounded by the comment, but he soldiered through it and took a stance. Neji commenced. He had feinted and spun, coming from Lee's left, and a flat palm shot towards him like a bolt of light. Lee blocked appropriately, anticipated Neji's counter, and then leapt back. His kick was perfectly level with Neji's cheekbone when the Hyuga brought his arm up in time to stop it, buffering the hit. They skidded in the dust where grass no longer grew on the field, escalating the furious close quarters match.

Gai came upon the scene and was surprised to see that his students were early. He was tempted to greet the boys sunnily but stopped himself. Lee had a black eye and a swollen lip. Neji looked nearly untouched. Gai stood by and watched in silence as Lee, at a plain and stylistic disadvantage, kept up with Neji.

Lee took every blow graciously. The Jyukken was the most painful that Lee had ever recalled experiencing, and while he certainly wasn't pulling his punches, he could not bring himself to inflict true injury to Neji.

'I am not only listening with my ears…but my heart can hear as well!' He endured for a while, losing track of the time, and had barely noticed that Neji had slowed down and was straining for breath. There were intermittent pauses every twenty minutes or so. The boys used them to uncross their eyes and get the proper amount of oxygen to their brains. Then they dove in again.

After a heated exchange in which Lee took a clean shot to the stomach, he rallied, dropping his elbows down on Neji's forearms. It might've broken a bone and was essentially an illegal move, but Lee could see as Neji retreated, at last injured, that it probably hadn't done serious damage.

Without agreeing to it out loud they took a break.

Gai approached them while soaking a towel with cold water from a bottle. He folded it up and pressed it to Lee's purpling, bruised face, "Well done, Lee..." He turned to Neji, "I'm glad that you came here today, Neji. I'll have you know that I expect you here every day at our regular time, in spite of recent events. I am sure you can manage it." Neji didn't dispute it so Gai added, "For now, I will beg your pardon. The Jounin Council is having a meeting at noon that I must attend."

He reminded them to not kill each other while they trained and then Gai was off.

Lee held the cold cloth to his face and sighed. This was essentially what he had imagined would happen. Just like the old days, Neji would blow off steam and beat him until he was unrecognizable. Lee was feeling a little dizzy and so he took a seat on a fallen log at the side of the field. Neji crossed over and took the spot next to him. He looked much calmer.

The quiet spring day was punctuated by songbirds weaving melodies in the forest.

"This could be our new normal." Neji suggested. He didn't sound happy about it. His voice carried a tone of resignation.

"I hope not." Lee told him, lifting the cloth from his face to reveal his darkening bruise.

A tiny flash of humor buzzed on Neji's face, tilting the corners of his mouth up, and then he was sullen again. "I apologize for hurting you." Neji told him. He really did mean it.

"You have been upset. This is not something you would normally do."

"It is something that I used to do." Neji noted.

Lee smiled. He recalled vividly. "Did Hinata-sama speak to you?"

"Last night I heard her out. She was insightful." He conceded, "She wished that I would not take my anger out on anyone who was going through the same trauma that I was. I could only assume she meant you."

"I did ask her to help me." Lee acknowledged.

"I saw you do it," Neji sounded slightly amused, "She even tried to get me to cooperate by using leverage. It was a poor excuse for coercion, though."
Lee's thick eyebrows rose, "She did?"

"Hinata-sama said she would not read Naruto's reply to her until I returned to my team again. I don't think she understands how to properly threaten people."

"Ah, but it worked, did it not?"

Stymied, Neji admitted, "It did."

Lee removed the cloth since it had gotten warm. Deciding to take a risk, Lee thought he should extend an invitation now that Neji appeared receptive. It was one of Gai's methods, which of course boded well. Training wasn't doing either of them a whole world of good, but Lee knew that Shikamaru and his counterparts wanted to console Neji too. It might distract just enough from the fact then Tenten was not hurling weapons at Neji's head, and wouldn't be doing so for a long time.

"Shikamaru asked us to stop by and-"

"No."

Crestfallen, Lee prodded, "You do not want to see our friends?"

"They'll ask questions."

'At the very least Sato will.' Lee thought to himself, "But Neji-!"

"They already know, don't they?"

"Well-"

"You spoke to them."

"I had to speak to someone. I miss Tenten and the Hokage has prevented me from seeing her." Lee elucidated; a bit ruffled, "Being with friends is a natural thing to do at a time like this."

"I would rather see her." Neji tilted his chin up, still protesting the Hokage's mandate, "I planned to find her later today."

Lee felt a headache starting at the very center of his forehead. Neji was out to make trouble again.

"You cannot-"

"The Hokage wouldn't seriously stop me, and there's nowhere she could hide Tenten from me." He stated matter-of-factly.

"You will be punished for it."

"She won't know."

"The Hokage has a way of knowing things! Gai-sensei once said that Sarutobi-sama had a crystal ball that-!"

"Those are just stories. Tsunade is all bark." Neji insisted, "She won't follow through."

"You are not thinking clearly!" Lee chucked the cloth, frustrated, "If you cross the Hokage again she might reassign you, or worse!"
Neji was quiet for a time as he thought it over. Part of him knew that Lee was absolutely right, and that there was always a decent chance someone might rat on him to the village leader. If Tsunade didn't javelin-toss him into the next century in retribution, he very well could get shuffled into a new team. While reflecting on that, he realized that it turned his stomach. Gai and Lee, for all of their silly, hyperemotional passion, were the only teammates he was comfortable with. They were trusted people.

A paradox deep within his mind exploded upon thinking it.

But no, there was no way he was going to learn to put up with new people all over again and try to pretend he liked them. It could permanently transform him into a snooty, hotheaded, and malcontented jerk. The Hyuga clan wouldn't thank him for that reputation. And also, he leveled with himself; he did not want to live his life as that person. Part of him truly desired…dare he say it…to be happy.

He conjured up two plans. The first was that he would stick with Lee and try not to be an asshole. The second plan was to secretly find a way to reach Tenten without risking punishment. Solid.

"You're right." Neji conceded to Lee's point and nearly stopped the boy's heart, "Let's find something to do." He reminded Lee that something to do meant he still didn't want to hang with Shikamaru's group.

And so Lee proposed lunch. At his place.

What followed was by far the strangest and nearly the most eye-opening experience of Neji's young life.

One would hardly bother to remember that at the end of every long day of training, after hundreds of pushups, laps, forms, jump rope hops and other flimflam; that Lee went home to sleep somewhere. What a concept, Neji thought as they arrived at Lee's small, wooden, box-like house downtown. At least he wasn't paying for lunch.

He followed Lee inside to an unfamiliar, three-room living space. He used his Byakugan only for a moment to acquaint himself with the immediate room. Odd, velvet upholstered armchairs were to the right of the room on an oriental rug. On the opposite side was a small table with folding chairs, a teensy kitchenette with a steaming tea kettle, and a cabinet full of porcelain dinnerware. Hung decoratively from the walls were scrolls with characters that Neji could not read. Beside them were red tassels tied to gold medallions and a paper lantern suspended from a string. There was a tall, twist-neck floor lamp in the corner.

Seated in the armchair beside the lamp was a tiny old man. His brow was heavy with age and it folded over his squinted eyes, concealing them under tufted, snowy brows. At first glance he looked bald, but Neji had spied a long white braid on the back of his head, where the rest of his hair had receded. He was wearing a black brocade jacket and matching pants. Motionless in his chair, the old man's lips moved.

And Neji had no idea what he was saying.

Neji stood beside Lee, perplexed beyond measure, as the boy began speaking to the old man in a foreign tongue. He delivered the words with such sublime diction, alien though they were, that was stark-bare proof of his fluency. Lee was bilingual.

Before Neji could start scratching his head and pondering how he had never noticed this trait, Lee turned to him, providing an explanation, "Neji! This is my grandpa, Wong Leung."
Stilted, he managed, "How do you do, sir?"

The old man regarded him blankly, unaffected by his words. Lee parroted the same greeting in the appropriate language and then Wong Leung nodded.

"It's alright." Lee assured him, "Grandpa understands most Nihongo, but not that phrase, I think. He only really likes to speak Hanwen."

"Hanwen?" Neji muttered under his breath.

"Han is where my entire family is from. I am the first generation to live only in the Fire Country." Lee filled him in, motioning for him to move towards the kitchen, "Let us eat." He fetched a basket of dumplings and pickled vegetables resting on the counter and then set it on the table, uncovering it. Lee poured two cups of tea and took a seat across from his friend.

Neji thanked him for the meal and helped himself. The boys tucked into lunch together. Wong stood from his chair and crossed the room with short steps towards the table. The old man's interest had been piqued. He stood about a foot away from them with his arms folded behind his back, and he took stock of Neji's appearance.

He then turned to Lee, inquiring, Where is she?

Who do you mean, Grandpa? Lee wondered, setting his tea cup down.

The young lady.

Oh! Tenten. She is not with us because of the Hokage's order.

Hmph! She needs to come around more often. She'll make you a good wife. And she understands me when I talk!

Flushing bright red, Lee objected, She is my friend, Grandpa!

Neji, clueless about the exchange, kept eating while they jabbered.

Who is this boy? His eyes are strange. Is he blind? Why is his hair loose like that? Real men tie it back tight so they can fight properly. Tell him that. He frowns too much. What's his problem?

GRANDPA. Lee cut him off, raising his voice slightly; Do not be rude to my friend. His name is Neji.

Neji perked up at the mentioning of his name. He got the gist that maybe Wong was not giving him a rave review.

I thought Tenten was your friend. I like her.

Neji is my friend as well. We are all teammates! He is most upset that Tenten cannot be with us. He does not know what to do without her. That is why I am keeping him company. I want to make sure he is alright.

Wong stared at his grandson, or at least, he was probably staring from beneath that brow. The old man went back to his arm chair. He was out of Lee's hair for the time being.

"You call him Yéye." Neji observed, "Does that mean grandfather?"

Lee nodded cheerily, "That is what it means."
"You used my name. Was he saying something about me?"

"Uh…” He hesitated, "He was interested in you. I told him why you are with me today. He wanted to see Tenten."

"So he has met her?"

"On a few occasions. Grandpa likes that she can understand him."

"Does she speak Hanwen too?" Neji had to stop eating. The news was rushing in so fast he wouldn’t be able to swallow safely.

"Tenten does not speak it well. She understands whatever we say, but she does not practice conversation as much as she should." Lee rated her ability, "She has ancestors from Han. I know that her parents spoke it very well, whenever they came to the Academy training yard."

Neji was floored.

"Would you like some more tea?"

"No,“ Neji waved the teapot away, a touch affronted, "Why didn't you mention any of this?"

"I…did not think that it would matter." Lee replied sincerely, "We had to focus on training! No one ever asked about Grandpa before. Not even Gai-sensei."

Gradually comprehending it all, Neji finished his last dumpling. He could feel Wong watching him from behind.

"So is he a shinobi?" Neji asked, "What made your family come to the Leaf Village?"

"Our people immigrated here a long time ago. Merchants found better business in these lands, taking care of services that ninja could not," Lee explained, "Grandpa is not a shinobi…but he is a master."

"Of what?"

Lee stole a peek at his grandfather who had busied himself with a newspaper. He whispered, "We should…discuss that outside…it is a sensitive topic in this house."

Lee cleaned up the table and thanked his grandfather for cooking the food. Wong did not look up, almost as if he had not heard Lee’s acknowledgment. As he and Neji went outside, Neji asked about it.

"Does he ignore you often?"

"Han grandparents are like that. Grandpa is strict with me." Lee divulged, "Ever since I was young, Grandpa reserved his caring comments for two times during the year. My birthday and the New Year."

"You're…serious?"

"Yes. Even you have a greater frequency of kindness than him."

It was both flattering and disconcerting. Neji knew without people having to tell him that he was no peach. Lee had most likely built a thick skin because scornful comments were typical in his daily life. 'It's no wonder why he worships Gai…' Their sensei was far and away the most sanguine creature in the village.
They stopped underneath an oak tree on the side of the property. Its long limbs shaded the house and sidewalk.

"So what is he a master of?" Neji repeated.

"Grandpa, long ago, was a master of Wushu. Those are the martial arts practiced in Han. He owned two schools as a young man and trained many students. He told me that he retired and came here with his son to help with business. That was my father." Lee summed it up, "When my parents…did not come home…Grandpa raised me and sent me to the Academy here. He wanted me to learn Ninja Arts."

"Why didn't he train you in your family's techniques?"

"He said I was unworthy."

Neji glanced over his shoulder back at the house. He was indignant for Lee. The last thing he needed was to live with a person who belittled him.

"It is alright, Neji."

"Surely he believes that you are worthy now. Has he seen your Taijutsu?"

"Grandpa says Taijutsu is heathen Wushu."

"Why would he encourage you to learn heathen arts?" Neji growled, "He should be proud that you are a shinobi."

"Grandpa thinks that warriors of this country are more barbaric than in his homeland. He used to say that he only intended for me to learn to defend myself and work hard." Lee smiled, "But I know that he cares about me. He just longs for his former life."

It was not entirely unlike Neji's situation. He wanted things to be the way they once were…and at times he would lash out. He killed the thought. Neji was no foreign grandfather; he was a young shinobi forging his career. And at the very least he would give Lee a bit more credit. His Taijutsu was something to be proud of.

The two boys jumped in surprise when Wong cleared his throat behind them.

Grandpa! When did you get out here? When Neji heard Lee speak he only heard frenetic, indecipherable, multi-tone phrases.

You two are gossiping about me. My nose was itching.

Neji wanted to know about my life.

What's it to him? Why does he care?

Some fiery youth trickled into Lee when he replied, Grandpa...when I talk to him it makes him feel better. He cares about Tenten and he does not want to be apart from her. I need to keep him company. I do not want Neji to turn back into what he once was...someone who was lost. And unhappy. As his friend, it is my duty to stand by him and prove that his feelings matter!

Good. Wong said, folding his arms behind him. He strode forward and then eyed Neji up and down again.

While observing the confused, frowning Hyuga, Wong sidelong asked Lee, What does he do? Can He fight?

He is the heir of the Hyuga clan. Neji uses Jyukken.

Fuh! The old man laughed, amused, What a watered down technique that is...those oafs. Tickling each other! It used to be the Not-So-Gentle-Fist style at its inception! I remember it. Make him fight me. I'll teach him.

Grandpa...

Lee, Wong's eyes were tiny crescents on his face, commanding, I will teach both of you. It is time I taught you what I know.

What? He cried, shocked.

Tell him what I am about to tell you. I want you to understand. You silly ninja almost never grasp such important lessons...

Lee turned to Neji, "Grandpa wants to teach us."

"Why the sudden change of heart?" Neji grimaced, "Perhaps I do not want to learn his contemptuous ways."

I KNOW what he's saying! That conceited mousefart!

Lee quickly did damage control, "Neji, please listen. He wants to tell us something."

Reluctantly, Neji gave them his attention.

As I was saying...I will teach you now. Why have I not done so already? It is because you were unworthy. I watched you pathetically stoop and flap in that confounded Academy. You tried to become what they are. A ninja. You were desperate! All you could think about for the longest time was yourself! Your failures! I was disgraced.

Lee's face dropped, abashed.

Go on and tell the mousefart that. Go on!

"Grandpa says...that he did not want to teach me because I was desperate. All I cared about for so long was becoming a ninja." The words did not come easily, "I thought of nothing else."

Lee gave his grandfather an inquiring look, Why am I worthy now?

You are not thinking of yourself anymore. You are protecting your friend. Whenever you begged me to teach you my techniques, you only had your own interests at heart. Now that you are caring and protecting others selflessly...I would be honored to teach you our family's prestigious style.

"He says that I am worthy now because I am thinking of others."

Neji still did not buy that the old man had a nice bone in his body. He was wary. He nodded to show that he understood.

Lee...your father was obsessed with his own betterment. He used my Wushu to act despicably and pursue his interests. He found a woman who was just as self-absorbed as he was! Then the pair of them shamed my house. And when they left you behind...I vowed that I would raise you to be a worldly person. No matter what, I would not let your heart become black like his. Your precious people are the greatest fortune you will ever know. There is no other treasure worth chasing.

Grandpa… His eyes moistened at the proclamation. Lee had always suspected that his parents, who he had nearly no memory of, did not have respectable professions. He could agonize about how they had not looked back so much as to blink at him when they ran away, but Lee never could have asked for a better caretaker than his grandfather.

"What did he say?" Neji asked.

Lee shook his head, "I will tell you…some other time…"

Hmph! Wong flicked his braid over his shoulder and bustled across the quiet road. Now tell your friend to come along. The two of you hurry up!

The boys followed him to the narrow river that cut through the upper quadrant of the Leaf Village. Lee frequented the river's edge on sunny days, sometimes to do handstands. After walking upstream to a more private patch of grass, Wong faced them expectantly.

I will test you later to see which style you are best suited for, Lee. For now, let's see what this milk-eyed child can do. I bet he hits like a newborn kitten! "Gentle Fist". That's what these shinobi call it nowadays. In our land it is called Baguazhang; the way of the Eight Trigrams and the canon of the old religion. Sifu Dong taught me for eight years, and I taught my disciples for another sixteen…

"Neji, Grandpa wants to see you use Jyukken."

He was incredulous, "And when I am held liable for hurting a seventy-year-old man-?"

"Seventy-nine."

"Whatever. I'll be imprisoned. I know better."

Wong sensed his hesitancy. He bent his knees, his stance lighter than air, and positioned his hands with dignified purpose. His palms were relaxed and facing outward. Neji recognized it as a Gentle Fist stance of some kind but it totally lacked energy. There was no tension in his upper body. His arms too loose. With his guard lowered so, Neji felt that it would be a crime to attack an elderly man's chakra points.

I dare this mousefart to try to hit me.

Grandpa, he is hailed as the genius of my generation…

You know what else is genius? Toilet paper. And I wipe my butt with that.

Lee balked and then grinned. He took a few steps back so that Neji was directly facing his grandfather. Perhaps he was not as frail as his short stature made him seem.

"I do not think you will hurt him, Neji. He is too proud to report you to police anyway." Lee encouraged.

It was not a good reason, but Neji fell into a stance. He'd give it a go. He might need to explain to Hiashi why there was a warrant out for his arrest later, but he was curious to see if Wong did indeed have something to teach him. He swooped forward for a traditional Jyukken slap, Byakugan and all, with a side of guilt.

The old man treaded as if there was a floor mat guiding his steps, offsetting Neji's movements. They had the look of a spinning, lazy-wheel on a dinner table. Neji would strike and Wong would step, rotating away with the perfect ease of pollen in wind. Wong circled, without attacking or defending. Neji could hardly believe the nimbleness of the grandfather. He was goaded into keener attacks.

Like a kitten. Wong assessed.

He moved faster as Neji picked up speed, whirling, watching the chakra points revealed by his Kekkei Genkai dance away from him as he drew near. It was maddening. He was striking as if Tenten was about to run a sword through his throat; as if Kakashi would lobotomize him with Raikiri. It was the most effective and vicious Jyukken he could muster against anyone who might possibly kill him. Thankfully that was not Wong's intention, but his predictive motions made a mockery of his Taijutsu.

Certain that he was prison-bound, Neji rushed in for a Sixty-Four Palm strike. Lee's grandfather seemed to recognize his goal, slid his hand cleanly along Neji's arm, below the elbow and up to his chest, avoiding the boy's lunge for his chakra points. Swiveling his hips, Wong's feet followed beautifully, completing the stride, and folded Neji's arm up like a letter to dear mama. Wong directed Neji's other arm up, useless; his face was aghast like a schoolchild's, and then pushed the boy down like a plaything. All in one breezy motion.

While Neji recovered safely in the grass, trying to replay the exchange in his head, Wong gave his comments to Lee.

Does he not feel Chi?

He can see it, Grandpa.

Well you'd never know, with how aggressively he attacks! He's blinding himself. He obviously doesn't understand how a body moves. This kitten wasn't countering me; he was watching my Chi flow! What good does that do? I can project my energy and trick him. I know how to move around silly children...what to expect... Gracious, these clans don't know a thing about fighting...

Neji rose to his feet and dusted blades of grass from his backside, "Is he done criticizing me, Lee?"

"Almost."

If he wants to learn the true way...I will have to put a lot of work into him. He's as stiff as a wooden plank. And he doesn't really see. He needs to see with more than just his eyeballs!

Do you wish to tutor him?

If he is a willing learner, I certainly can. But one ought not to compete in a shit-throwing contest with a monkey. There's no winning that.

*Right... He addressed his teammate, "Neji, Grandpa says that he would like to help you refine your technique."

"That's not all he said." He pointed out archly.

Wong came up beside Neji and hooked his foot around the young man's ankle, pulling it back half a pace. Neji shifted his weight, disgruntled by the geezer's method. Wong rearranged Neji from his feet up to his chin (his arms were pretty good) and then poked him roughly in the back between his shoulder blades; Lee, make him relax.

"He says you need to relax."
Neji tried.

Melt like butter. Sink down into your stance, softly. Be as soft as the mochi people stuff their faces with around here!

"Be soft like mochi!"

He didn't get it.

But for the rest of the day, Lee shouted bizarre translations while his grandfather puppeteered Neji's body into a classical style of martial arts long forgotten in shinobi nations.

At the same time as Neji's Baguazhang lesson, across the village, Ino was having her morale boosted in the Yamanaka flower shop by her cherished teammates.

Five simultaneous flower orders: about 60 blooms each. Three orders were from the same customer. Those were going to the Hyuga estate. If she remembered what the invoice said, they all were.

"When is this going to stop?" She was seething. "Hinata had one free week and now those middle-aged men have lined up again! That clan is turning into a circus; putting her on a pedestal like some sacred savior or whatever! Just leave the girl alone!"

"Chill, Ino." Chouji advised while tying ribbon to a flower basket, "You're doing a nice thing. It's like you're sending flowers to your friend…"

"In the hands of creepy men, I am."

"You should know…" Shikamaru chimed in from the far end of the prep-table, glancing at a clipboard, "That those two other orders we haven't filled yet…those are condolences for the Jounin that died."

"Oh." Ino fluttered her lashes, taken aback, "Let me start those now. Thanks for helping me, guys."

Chouji smiled, completing a bow, "No problem!"

Ino scurried to the greenhouse and then returned with two armfuls of uncut flowers. She set them down on the table and then retied her apron, focusing on the order that really mattered.

"Chouji told you what happened to Team Gai, right?"

Ino nodded, "Yeah, he said you spoke to Lee. I have no clue why that happened...I feel so bad for them."

"It has something to do with Hikune's death. The Hokage is looking into it," Shikamaru lowered his voice, "She removed Tenten from the team as a precaution and then Neji lost it. Lee was having a nervous breakdown when he found us."

Chouji agreed, "Neji was stressing him out."

"Well did you help him?" Her voice rose in pitch, "When Neji stresses people out, sometimes they wind up in the hospital!"

"We offered. They can come to us anytime. Sato was cool with it. Shino and Kiba probably won't mind."

"Good, because we kunoichi won't do much good consoling him. He'll just be reminded of her." Ino tapped her chin in thought, "Actually, Sakura and I should talk to Tenten. She's probably not doing any better."

"Have you seen her?" Shikamaru asked.

"No. Not for a few days."

"Jeez."

"We're pretty lucky, when you think about it," Chouji mused, "We form the Ino-Shika-Cho trio. The Hokage couldn't find a good enough excuse to divide us even if something bad happened."

Ino smiled faintly at the idea, "There are other ways...we could lose each other..."

"Stop." Shikamaru said crossly, "You go straight to the macabre these days, Ino."

"It's not because I regularly think about any one of us dying, it's because..." She fumbled over the words, "I-I'm grateful, for the two of you. I love you both so much."

The boys wore deer-in-the-headlights expressions while she resumed flower arrangements.

After a minute Chouji skirted the tall table and along the way he pushed Shikamaru, who was seated on a rolling stool, towards Ino. The three collided gently and immediately stretched out their arms for a wordless hug.

---

_Meanwhile, in Sato's apartment:_

The silver haired teen was looking out the wide-open window of his living room, bent slightly to peer down at the units below his own. He and many of his friends were concerned for his neighbor downstairs. His teammates had joined him for a mini-meeting and fresh cinnamon buns.

"She hasn't stepped outside in days! I bet she's started decomposing." Sato wagered.

"Sato-kun!" Hinata screeched, "That is _not_ funny. Do not say things like that!" Hinata only displayed two types of ire: Byakugan-fueled rage and scarlet-cheeked, adorable anger. Today it was adorable.

"One of my insects detected her alive a few minutes ago." Shino reported, "There is no need to worry."

She was not pleased that Shino had interpreted Sato's statement literally.

"You both know that Tenten-neesan is alive." Hinata reprimanded quietly, "But this is a sad time. I know that she is just as upset as Neji-niisan. I was watching her earlier and she looks terrible..."

"I heard from Lee that Neji is unraveling. And we wanna help the poor man, of course, but you know...he's got to promise not to knock our heads off. I guess Lee will bring him around when he's ready."

"Lee-kun is doing his best." Hinata agreed.
"So…is it wrong to spy like this?" Sato wondered.

Shino had the answer, "It isn't if the objective is to determine whether or not the target is deceased."

"Shino-kun!" Hinata peeped.

A Kikaichu insect floated in through the window and landed on Shino's cheek. He relayed its report, "Someone is visiting her now."

Surprised, Sato suspended himself out the window again and Hinata shamelessly used her Byakugan.

A caller was knocking at Tenten's door.

And about fifteen minutes later, after a stalemate of one person knocking and the other refusing to answer…the deadbolt lock was turned with a loud clack and the door thrust open. Tenten stood in the entryway, her eyes frenzied, frustrated with the visitor.

"How rude…" Hayate told her.

"Not answering the door of my home? That's rude? I think it's rude when you can't take a hint!"

"Your father didn't raise you to keep a guest waiting at the door."

"He's dead." Tenten said dryly.

"Oof. Tsunade-sama said you'd be petulant. It's been two days. You need to stop being such a crybaby and rejoin the world of the living." Hayate admonished her, "Worse can happen to you than simply being removed from a team."

"You're wrong. They are everything to me." She hissed in disagreement. She slammed the door shut.

Tenten turned and leaned back against the heavy wood, exhaling deeply. Some wrath seeped out of her. The rest of her anger quickly turned into shock when she laid eyes on Hayate standing in her kitchen, fixing himself a glass of peach juice at the refrigerator.

He glanced over his shoulder at her, "Are you going to keep yelling at that Shadow Clone? You sure do know how to waste time."

Unwilling to surrender her privacy, Tenten stomped into the dining area and seized a chair roughly. She thought about hurling it at him. She insisted, "You need to leave!"

Hayate held her gaze while he sipped his beverage, then he spoke, "The Hokage had a talk with me. About you…and your situation."

"Wonderful. Get out."

"You don't have the luxury of dismissing someone who was assigned by the Hokage to train you." He informed her unflappably, "If it really is a point of contention, Tenten, then you can take it up with Tsunade."

She eased up on the chair a little, realizing his visit had a purpose beyond merely antagonizing her.
"I am not here because I personally feel I need to be. I was ordered to be here." He took another sip, "Hm. The Hokage wants you to be able to protect yourself from assassins. Training with a melee combat team just isn't going to cut it for you. You need to learn from someone who's dealt with them before."

"And you were at the top of Tsunade-sama's list?"

"Yeah. No one else can teach you the techniques your father knew, because he's dead," He repeated the dismissive phrase she had used before, "So Tsunade-sama picked his student. It makes sense, doesn't it? If you want half a chance of surviving an ambush by a notorious crime group, you should take the time to learn jutsu that your family used." Hayate set the empty cup down on the table, "Quit your bitching."

Tenten settled down. It was completely reasonable. At any rate, if she could not be with her teammates until the Hokage approved it, she ought to do something constructive with her time.

Hayate took stock of her disheveled clothes and hair and then regarded to the clock on the wall. He sighed, "So when do you want to get started?"

"You mean now?"

"I've got nothing better to do. The Hokage froze my mission activity because of you." He grumbled, "At least it's paid leave…"

Tenten smiled to herself, "I wonder if she'll compensate me for my relocation?"

"She might if you pester her about it. That's what I did. Anyway," Hayate gave her a critical look, "You should clean up and change. You look like hell."

"Thanks."

"I'm just saying that if you go outdoors you might want to look like you belong there."

"Fine! Just sit down. I'd offer you something to drink but..." She pointed to the glass he had procured, "You're all set." Tenten moved on and down the hallway, picking up fresh clothes from her bedroom and then ventured to the bathroom attached to it. She was sure that leaving Hayate alone with the last of the fruit juice would do no harm. She rinsed herself off and then washed her hair (which had been neglected for a while) and got herself back to her previous standard of care. Tenten had wallowed for a few days without eating, devastated that the village leader she so adored had wrenched her away from her team. She had cried once, much like the singular, loud, and teary tantrum she'd had after the Third Hokage had sent her home with the news of her parents' murder.

As a girl who cried once a year, Tenten knew she always saved it for the appropriate occasion. Being separated from her close friends felt marginally worse than the loss of her mother and father. Tenten supposed that was because she had replaced her parents with her teammates, focusing all of her energy and love on them. While the substitution was not complete and certainly not equal, it sufficed, bringing her happiness and purpose.

Tenten lathered up.

'Now look at me.' She mentally sneered, 'I never tried to be on my own. I can't handle it. I need Lee and Neji. This is the first time I have been away from them and I am not the picture of composure anymore...'
She had been whittled down, she conceded. Hikune's death had emotionally weakened her, but losing her team had tossed Tenten from the 'bridge of security' into the 'waters of the unknown.'

'What do I even do by myself?' She wondered while scrubbing.

Well, she took showers alone. She also ran the forge and shop on her own. Sometimes dinner was a lonely affair.

But nearly every other activity involved a friend, and more often than that, her team.

She rinsed once more and then shut the tap off. She towel-dried quickly. The last person I need right now is Hayate. He's coarse and indifferent. He was cooler when he was younger...now he's a rock. She remembered when her father had trained him how he had been sprightly and even friendly, but in the years since he had seen things as a Jounin. He never would have shown his face if Tsunade-sama hadn't told him to! He barely checked in even after Mom and Dad died!

Alas, they were stuck together now. Tenten threw her clothes on and tied up her damp hair.

She was startled to find him rooting around her parents' bedroom (now her bedroom) and examining the wall-arsenal they had proudly assembled. Tenten put her hands on her hips, miffed, "Are you looking for something?"

"Yeah." He took two, dusty Ninjutsu scrolls from the top shelf and tucked them under his arm, "Have you seen your dad's black scroll?"

"What?"

"The one that stays in your family? The contract? He must've told you about it."

"No." She then admitted, "I don't know where it is...but I know he wanted me to have it."

"Come on, you've got to help me out with this junk. I'm not in charge of your life and well-being. I'm just a supplement." He lifted her mother's famous Han sword, Hok, from its display, "Get looking dammit."

"I did look! I've turned this place inside-out three times! Then the forge twice!"

Hayate walked up to her and dumped the items he had collected into her arms, ignoring her indignant bark. He got down on his knees and checked under the bed, cursing, and then opened every drawer in the dresser, "Hey! That's for underwear! Beat it!" And then with a grunt he exited the room and stormed down the hallway.

Tenten followed, frowning, "What are you doing?" She located him in her former bedroom. Its use had been discontinued since she passed the Graduation Exam.

Hayate was standing on her bed from her childhood, messing up its pristine, untouched innocence. The pink-duvet was mucked up. She shrieked. Then she noticed that he was ransacking an old, forgotten shelf of children's stories, dust blowing everywhere, until finally he stopped. He withdrew a seemingly ordinary scroll, most definitely black, from a nook nestled in with the literature. Hayate brushed it off and then hopped down from the bed. He handed it to her, "You need to think more like your dad. Where is he going to put something important for his little girl? In her room."

"O-Oh...thank you."

The man brushed dust from his shirt and vest as he proceeded into the corridor again. He stopped, declaring, "Here's what we're going to do, Ms. Can't Cope. Clean up that sword. You'll be using it from now on. Then you're coming with me to my training spot and I'm going to help you learn those jutsu. The black scroll is absolutely last."

Tenten held up the Ninjutsu scrolls, supposing that's what he meant.

"Yeah, those." He turned, hoping to get another glass of juice, "They're classics."

Following Neji's enlightening introduction to Lee's grandfather, the whole afternoon had been spent on Baguazhang lessons. As the sun set it was supper time at the Hyuga house, and so Lee and Neji parted.

He made sure to thank Lee for his determination. It had helped. It had also showed him the glaring weaknesses of modern Jyukken. At the very least, Neji knew that he was not alone and that Lee was a very good listener.

At the evening meal with family, Hinata was positively overjoyed to hear that Neji had spent the day with Lee. When she asked if he would be spending more time with him he confirmed it. Neji then went on to recount Lee's heritage and his immigrant grandfather.

Hanabi had quickly labeled foreigners "weird" and proclaimed "I can barely understand them!"

Hiashi had been intrigued, "His grandfather tried to teach you Han Arts?"

"He claimed it was the origin of Jyukken."

The clan Head raised his eyebrows while finishing a bite of fish, "Well then…by all means learn it. Their kingdom predates ancient shinobi ancestors by nearly two thousand years. I would be surprised if there wasn't some similarity between our Taijutsu and an antiquated forme."

With his uncle's blessing, Neji became even more interested in learning what Wong Leung had to offer. Hinata and Hanabi then chimed in, requesting lessons at a later date.

Night fell and the Main family scattered after dinner. Neji killed time in his room, intending to wait until late before sneaking off to begin his secondary plan. He picked up the novel The First Shinobi from his desk, thinking that perhaps he would like to continue with it. He recalled the plucky protagonist, Tian Tian, and imagined that she looked much like Tenten. When a feeling of deep irritation overcame him, tightening his chest, he set the book down again. It was difficult to find any object that did not remind him of her.

He went through the porch door of his room to the deserted patch of grass outside. While the moon rose higher, he practiced the forms that Wong had showed him.

Neji sort of understood what Lee's (his grandfather's) remark about being soft like mochi meant. He had swapped tension for lightness. He stepped in elegant circles and prevented his body from moving or responding as it would with traditional Gentle Fist. He was mindful but free.

Some Jyukken forms, according to Wong Leung, were completely wrong. He had watched Neji and shook his head in great distaste. They probably only work for people who can see Chi, the old man asserted, referencing the Byakugan, Those that cannot see the body's energy flow…they learn the true way and can feel it through motion, through air, through intuition…
He was truly very impressed. The man had a mouth on him (Neji could tell even though Lee edited the comments) and he was the scrutinizing sort, but he was obviously wise. It was not every day a near-octogenarian beat the pants off of him.

After a couple of hours he went inside for tea, enjoyed it, ignored the novel on his desk that was beckoning him, and then went to his closet. He shed any costume-evidence that would link him to the Hyuga clan. Neji redressed in all black, including ninja tabi that were rare but still circulated footwear in his generation, and concealed his face with a tall-necked sweater that stopped at the bridge of his nose. Once he was disguised he set out into the dark.

Neji supposed, as he slinked southeast through low-traffic alleyways, that Tenten may not be expecting him...least of all suspiciously dressed head to toe in black. It might startle her. Or she might just comment on it sarcastically. No matter how she reacted, he was sure that they would both be happy to see each other after the initial shock wore off.

He took a hard left into the business district and avoided the street lamps. He leapt up an awning and to the roof of a building, deciding that he would not be noticed if he skirted along carefully. Neji crossed over the top of the forge and then leaped, catching a sturdy, horizontal flag pole protruding from the adjacent structure. He hoisted himself up in silence and scaled the brick face of an apartment building. Two blocks away, the next building was the one Tenten lived in. Not too far away. He wasn't sure which floor she dwelled on, but he was confident he could weed her out among the other residents with his blood limit.

It was at the top of the first high-rise that Neji felt a pair of eyes on him. He had been cautious. He slipped behind a metal air duct and used his Byakugan to confirm if he had been spotted. His instinct had been correct. On the next building over, a Black Ops agent was perched in a crouch on top of a billboard. Red neon on the advertisement glowed beneath him, illuminating a cat mask. Neji's Kekkei Genkai, from that distance, could make out the indistinct features of a male face beneath the guise. The agent was waiting patiently, most likely expecting him to 'pop' back up again so he could be tailed.

So the Hokage had been sincere.

Neji smiled to himself, gratified that a member of the ANBU Black Ops had been tasked with stalking him. Any other rookie might have shrugged and gone home after realizing such an elite ninja was watching…but Neji was delighted. What an electrifying challenge.

If he was going to be chased, he wanted to make it tremendously difficult for the pursuer. The Hyuga heir took off like a shot.

Watching his back with the Byakugan, Neji could see the agent spring from his position, hurrying after him. Blood surging, he dove off the stone trimming of the building and caught a rainspout, his hair whipping in the wind, and slid down the pipe until he was level with a telephone wire. He ran across it like a shadow. Agile and well-acquainted with his surroundings, Neji soared over obstacles of the patchwork city.

The agent was slower but was keeping him in his sights.

He was starting to forget what he wanted to say to Tenten. Neji supposed he would remember once he had the chance to see her. He needed to shake the masked shinobi off his trail.

Coming in from his right Neji spied what he could only assume was a clone. The duplicate of the Black Ops ninja was engaging a standard pincer-movement, hoping to drive him closer to his hunter. It nearly worked. Neji raced across a tin and tile overhang, jumping to safety, avoiding the clone, and was confronted on the next roof by the annoyed ANBU agent.

"Hyuga Neji, you are disobeying a direct order from the Fifth Hokage." The shinobi warned him, standing tall on the building's ledge, "If you do not comply and return home immediately I have been instructed to take necessary action."

Neji got a clear, frontal view of the man's face beneath the mask, studying him with the Byakugan. He looked tired. The man had bags under his eyes, but there was not a trace of malevolence on his face. He simply looked like a person trying to do his job. Neji would have felt sorry for giving him a hard time, but then he reminded himself that he never felt sorry about giving people a hard time. It was one thing he and Tsunade had in common, strangely enough.

Thanks to his spherical field of vision, Neji could see the clone inching forward carefully from behind. He also saw the ANBU agent in front of him folding his arms, exasperated, giving Neji his rights and whatnot. Then there was Tenten's apartment building diagonally ahead: a healthy, 12-foot leap away from the rooftop they had all gathered on. The wide open window into a stranger's apartment, handily enough, was home to a man who was trying to air out the smoke caused by his burning bag of popcorn. He was fanning a towel to disperse the smoke while in his kitchen. With the Byakugan relaying all of this tactical information, Neji had almost instantly mapped out his escape route. He took flight suddenly.

Tenzo immediately got an upset stomach when Neji bolted, doing the unthinkable; a true taboo of society's good manners...Neji leapt into the window of a random person's home. 'That brat!' The ANBU veteran hurled himself after Neji, realizing that he had already escaped the stranger's apartment through the front door, carrying on into the building and was most certainly headed upstairs to the next floor.

A confused, "Hello?" sounded from the kitchen as Tenzo rushed after the reckless Genin, extremely embarrassed he had no alternative route to choose. He ran out the door of the apartment, slid on the corridor's linoleum and then threw himself forward, afraid that he was going to actually lose the rascal.

Rather than taking the stairs, as the rookie had done, Tenzo leapt up and used his blood limit, melding with the ceiling as he simplified his cells with the Mokuton's power, and he passed through to the next level into the third-floor hallway, cutting Neji off from Tenten's home at the end.

Genuinely surprised, Neji skidded to a halt when he arrived at the top of the stairs. He regarded Tenzo interestedly.

Tenzo heaved a sigh, "Well now...you clearly have no regard for the trouble you are causing residents!" He was like a disapproving parent, clucking his tongue.

"No one noticed me. That man probably saw you, though." Neji replied, stepping forward guardedly. Tenten was close. He needed only to get around the Black Ops agent. Second to last door on the left. She would hear him if he shouted. She'd come to the door. She'd stop all this nonsense!

"He did," The masked man was ashamed he had been spotted, "For a moment...but the point is that no one would need to see anything if you would just do what you were told. The consequences will be greater than you expect, if you continue this."

"This is the worst consequence."

"Children can be so dramatic." Tenzo observed, almost as if he had to recall a time when youngsters horsed around.
"I'm not a child."

"You most certainly are," He put a hand on his hip, "No adult would behave like this."

"Some would."

"Those that do," Tenzo told him pointedly, "Are the ones I put in jail."

"If that makes me an adult…then just try it." Neji taunted. He was riding a wave of pride that he had not known since shortly before his fight with Naruto at the Chunin Exam.

The Black Ops shinobi stamped his foot, shouting in frustration, "The Hokage was right about you!"

Neji was giving him shit. Tsunade had predicted it.

And Neji dove ahead, ignoring the fact that his opponent had a sword, and circled around the masked man who swatted at him. Taking Wong Leung's lesson to heart, Neji stepped around the veteran like a spore in the breeze and made a break for it. The doorway was in his sights…the walls were transparent with his superior vision and he could see the outline of…

Something wrapped around his leg.

Neji tripped, catching himself like a cat on the floor, and saw that the hunter's arm had shifted into what could only be a tree branch. It had ensnared his ankle and stopped him from going any further.

"Just knock it off already!" Tenzo hollered, "Do you really want me to-?"

The door to his immediate right opened and a hunch-backed old woman marched out of her apartment. Her glasses, which hung from a chain around her neck, were fitted to her beady eyes so that she could see what raucous had erupted in the hallway.

"What the devil is going on out here? You boys shout at all hours of the night!" Her voice was scratched with age, "Are you fighting out here, young man? I bet it was you!" She lifted her cane and began to whack Tenzo viciously.

"Ma'am! Please!" The ANBU agent struggled to shield himself. She had taken aim at his mask and proceeded to flog him with all the might a grandma could muster.

Taking advantage of the distraction, Neji tore himself free with a spike of Jyukken. He slipped his legs beneath him like a starting track-runner and then launched himself into a final sprint. Behind him, Tenzo was begging for the old woman to "Return indoors" so that he could complete "the apprehension of a juvenile delinquent." Since he was doing all of the shouting, however, the old lady insisted he was the problem. Folks just wanted to sleep!

The door. Neji could see her within, still awake and seated at the table, polishing a sabre. Tenten didn't seem to hear the calamity outside yet. Neji reached out, thinking that maybe he wouldn't knock and just blow the door down at this point, and was cut off by another Mokuton branch. At the opposite end of the hallway nearby, a window beside the fire escape had provided entry for the Wood Clone. It caught Neji around the middle and squeezed the air out of him, silencing his cry before he could make it. Then it reeled him in and they plunged from the window together.

They ricocheted painfully off of the metal of the escape ladder and fell into the leafy treetop of an oak, snagged in the fork of a topmost branch. Neji writhed furiously, knowing that this time he was caught.
From above, Neji could see Tenzo leaving the third floor of the building through the same exit. The old woman was tossing things at him through the window. A few moments later a door slam was heard.

Panting from the exertion, Tenzo and his clone hefted Neji from the canopy and to the ground again. The clone melded with the tree trunk and kept him secure in a binding of wood. Tenzo bent over and gave him a scolding look from behind his dented cat mask.

He shook his head, "You've done it now…"

Neji gave him an even stare. He wasn't scared.

Tenzo tugged his captive to his feet, secure in a ring of timber, and pulled him along the street beyond the earshot of any residents. They sat down on a bench that overlooked a memorial fountain. Tenzo caught his breath and leaned back to stretch. Then he sat with his hands on his knees, trying to relax before giving Neji any explanation of how he was to be processed.

"I read your file. You're the heir of the Hyuga clan. How can you act so irresponsibly?" The ANBU ninja asked reprovingly, "A whole clan depends on you, Neji. As a servant of the village, the least you can do is respect the orders of the Hokage."

"There are other people who need me." Neji retorted, "Just as I would take risks to protect my clan… my teammates are just as important."

"Your teammate is alright. We've been watching over her."

"I don't care what all of you do."

"You can do it better?" Tenzo smiled, "And why is it that you know best?"

"Because none of you…" He trailed off. Frowning deeply, Neji looked away down the street.

"Because…we don't care like you do."

"You don't." Neji agreed pithily, "You would only fulfill the needs of your mission. Beyond her physical well-being, the Black Ops have no other concerns."

"We are supposed to be detached and unseen. It is our role in this village." Tenzo confirmed.

"That is why I can't depend on you. I should be there for her."

"But you can't, the Hokage forbids it." The veteran reminded him, "You need to be patient. You need to trust someone."

"The Hokage doesn't trust us."

"Yes." Tenzo nodded, "Otherwise you and I would not be sitting here. If you were not an unruly individual, she would not have assigned me to watch you."

"I won't trust someone who does not trust me." Neji vowed.

The masked shinobi chuckled, "There are times when you have no choice. It's called putting your faith in people."

"And what do you know about that?"
"I'm an expert."

Neji puffed in disbelief.

"Contractually, I can't give you my name." The ANBU agent explained, "But I can tell you that I have gone through a crisis much like your own. I was probably the same age as you…"

His eyes were shut and he was glowering, but Neji was still listening. He was inquisitive about the life of an ANBU agent.

"I was raised in the Root organization since I was very young. It was not the most hospitable environment." Tenzo glanced at his captive, "Do you know what Root is?"

"It is the 'foundation' that my uncle mentions from time to time. They are ANBU not controlled by the Hokage."

"Yes, they answer to another senior officer. Root performs different duties to protect the village." The veteran went on, "Anyway…when I was a kid, I met someone named Hatake Kakashi."

Neji’s eyes flew open in astonishment.

"He was dealing with his own troubles. His teammate had left Hidden Leaf after an argument…and his sensei passed away after battling the Nine-Tailed Fox. Kakashi had dedicated himself to work for the Third Hokage as a member of the ANBU," Tenzo recounted, "He was very unhappy then. When I was a small child and met him for the first time…I saw how gloomy he was."

He continued, "When we met again, years later, he was healthy. It seemed as if he had discovered something new to live for. I was a bit jealous that he was doing so well. I wasn't." Tenzo sighed, "Within Root, I had no real friendships. I had no idea how to enjoy life. Though he and I…clashed initially…in the end I decided that I preferred the way he lived life. I left the foundation and enjoyed the friendships I found as a servant of the Hokage."

He poked Neji's shoulder, "But what I'm getting at is that we do care, Neji. We of the ANBU Black Ops definitely care! We cherish our friendships and bonds. We are not heartless or cruel people simply because we are anonymous. The Root is another matter…"

"Then I suppose…you are capable." Neji muttered.

"Just try to believe that." Tenzo encouraged. He stood up and adjusted his arm guards, "Let's see now…typically I would bring you before the Hokage to answer for your defiance. Or I would knock you unconscious and bring you to the ANBU detainment center…"

"Hn." Neji was unflappable. At least at the ANBU HQ he could scope it out and consider future career prospects. As for the other option, Tsunade would spout the same doctrine she had before, if a tad more angrily now. He wanted to get knocked out. Maybe the agent would give him a choice?

Tenzo exhaled and released Neji from his Mokuton snare, "But…I will let you go with a warning, this time. You really shouldn't tarnish your record, Neji. Please go home and leave the rest to us."

Wide-eyed, Neji regarded the beleaguered veteran who was apparently a kind-hearted ninja, despite his profession.

"All I ask is that you do not defy Tsunade-sama's orders. I won't mention any of this if you don't cause trouble." Tenzo promised, "I understand how you feel. I see no point in punishing you."
"Even after you were-?"

"Forget about that." Tenzo added tersely, thinking of the old lady, "I plan to."

"Thank you." Neji said sincerely, "I will not forget what you told me."

The ANBU agent nodded. Neji used his Byakugan again and memorized the man's face before they went their separate ways. If they met again, he hoped that the anonymous ninja's compassion could be repaid in person.

The next morning, when the sun rose over Mount Myoboku, Naruto was not at the Toad Oil Pool.

He had slept in.

Jiraiya had mentioned the night before that "One day off never set anyone back that much! Sometimes it actually gets you ahead…"

Naruto had taken the advice and was still nestled beneath a blanket as the valley's sounds of woken toads commenced. After laz ing about for a long while, half-conscious, the boy got to his feet and dressed. He discovered Shima and Fukasaku at the table in the dining room. He wished them a sleepy "Good morning!" before taking a seat and helping himself to some bugs.

"Ah! Are you well rested, Naruto?" Fukasaku greeted him, "Jiraiya-boy mentioned that he wanted you to take it easy today."

"Yeah! Where's Ero-sensei?"

"He said he would be waiting for you at the lily pond. It's just beyond the hill," Shima instructed, "Why don't you join him? Pa and I were reminiscing and making fun of what a silly child he once was."

"I don't know…I don't want to miss that."

"You can join us later for round two." Fukasaku offered.

Naruto liked the idea. After a protein-packed breakfast he set off through the toad encampment and up an incline dotted with mushrooms and ferns. The morning air was a bit muggy, heralding the warmth that the mountain would experience later in the day. He made it down the opposite side of the hill and arrived at a lake that was at the foot of a charming waterfall.

Out on the water, several gargantuan lily pads floated beyond the rumbling crash of the waterfall's base. Jiraiya was seated in the curve of an enormous lotus petal, where the behemoth, magenta flower was emerging between the huge green disks. The man was comfortably scribbling notes for his draft; his arm adequately healed.

"You're looking like a fairytale princess over there, Ero-sensei!" Naruto called out to him from the shore.

The lotus bobbed slightly when Jiraiya turned to look at his student, "Well thank you. It smells just like a princess in here too…it put me in the mood…to write."

"You're gross." Naruto reminded him casually.
"Take a dip! The water's great. I was trying out my arm earlier and I actually stayed afloat." He stated proudly, "Watch out for the bottom of the toad-pads, though. They're prickly."

Removing his shirt, and not concerned with the state of his shorts, Naruto dove into the clear end of the pool. It was still tinged with cold, but Naruto decided that it was warm enough. He paddled around, grateful that he wasn't sitting still for hours on end and getting sores on his rump. Naruto stopped beneath the crashing falls and let it pound on his head and shoulders. It was heavenly.

He let a loud, heartfelt sound of relaxation escape him before submerging again. Naruto surfaced around the lily pads, taking care not to get stuck on the spines beneath them. He slipped up onto the waxy, smooth top of a pad adjacent to his master. Naruto folded his arms behind his head and laid back contentedly. They floated silently in paradise as clouds rolled past and dragonflies flitted around. His thoughts roamed.

Naruto turned inward, curious as to what the Fox was up to. He stole a peek at it, getting a glimpse of the Biju snoring gently behind his bars. 'He's asleep!' Naruto regarded the peaceful giant for a moment more before quickly retreating. 'I guess he can't be awake and crabby all the time. Huh. Maybe he overheard that I was taking the day off and so he's sleeping in too?' It was possible. The Fox wasn't on alert for a chance to escape or to defend Naruto's (and his own) life for any reason.

The Nine-Tails presented a perplexing issue, Naruto thought. Now that he planned to master Senjutsu, he had anticipated a complete dissociation from the Fox. If he didn't use Kyuubi chakra, then Naruto ran no risk of being overwhelmed or injuring others. Though the Fox had called it a waste and predicted that the Akatsuki would force Naruto's hand at some point, Naruto also felt that it was a missed opportunity; it was not the chakra he was concerned with.

There was another being inside of him, and it was clearly unhappy.

'He tries to act tough and he hates everyone...but he's smart. And he's strong. And he's saved my butt before...' Naruto was conflicted, 'Even though he hurt Ero-sensei...I still want to do something for him. If I can't get him to lighten up, then I at least want to find a way to let him out.'

The rational half of his brain leapt at this supposition, clarifying that his wish to be free of the Fox was selfish on an entirely different level. It would free him of the Akatsuki's torment, of course, as well as the Fox's acts of wickedness, but as the Nine-Tails lumbered away on the horizon, more than likely to be captured anyway, Naruto could tell that the Leaf Village wouldn't be supportive of handing over a powerful force to a criminal organization.

In other words, even if he did find a way to undo his seal safely, it was ethically incorrect to let the Fox go. After all, he had not sealed the Biju inside of him. He could not be blamed for their circumstances. Naruto had never given much thought to his village's military standing and so forth, but now Tsunade would probably shake his hand and say, "Thank you. Thank you from the bottom of my heart for seeing it from my point of view! You're so responsible, Naruto!"

'Sheesh.'

He was stuck. He and the Fox were stuck. 'I am damned if I do and damned if I don't...' Naruto kept his eyes shut and twitched his nose, 'I want to do something. But it's like the only thing I can really do besides train is...try to be nice to him.'

That one topped the list of "crazy tasks" he had been compiling.

Did the Fox even deserve compassion?
'He's an ass! He's a liar and he would rather kill people than busy himself with talking to them.'

They made a pretty good team sometimes.

'He made me hurt Ero-sensei!'

Kyuubi chakra had won him several critical battles and even saved lives as a result.

'He treats me like garbage!'

Gaara was also a jinchuriki, and more than likely had to contend with his cranky guest as well.

'Gaara!' Naruto's eyes snapped open, 'I've got to ask him what he thinks! I mean, I know he's got to do something so that the One-Tail keeps cool...he'll probably give me some suggestions!'

He didn't want to get his hopes up. When Gaara had previously asked Naruto for a suggestion with regards to being a Kage, he had not provided Gaara with a single stitch of advice. He deliberately did not reply; his reason being that he was somewhat fearful of answering. That didn't sit well with his friend. If Gaara was the spiteful sort Naruto remembered him being, he was probably going to tell him to eat shit and deal with it.

'Nah! He'll probably have an idea or two.' He was cautiously optimistic, 'And I wonder if he's...if he's ever...'

His thought process came to a grinding halt. A question arose that Naruto would definitely include in his next letter.

'Did he tell Sakura that he's a jinchuriki? That would be a game-changer. If Gaara had, it was not an unequivocal essential that he have that talk with Hinata.

Was it?

Naruto peered at Jiraiya from the corner of his eye. The man had dozed off in the flower petal and his notebook was tucked in his lap. Naruto felt like he needed several opinions on this.

'If Sakura was okay with Gaara talking about it...Hinata should be okay with me telling her.' He presumed, 'Hinata understands me so well now! We write to each other daily! It's awesome.'

Even from afar, they had bonded on a deep emotional level. She had become a unique type of best friend that had romantically enchanted him. It was a complex feeling. Naruto wanted to believe that Hinata could handle any admission he put before her, but a large part of him was absolutely petrified that he would be rejected if she learned of his secret.

He had invested far too much of his time, love and faith in that remarkable girl only to be labeled a monster...and have his whole world come crashing down. It would ruin him for life. He would never again trust a woman, or really anyone, who claimed to love him without knowing his identity as a jinchuriki. Just as the Kyuubi posed a risk to his physical well-being, so too did Hinata jeopardize his carefully reconstructed spirit and humanity. To think she could save him as a young girl and then destroy him effortlessly as an adult!

Naruto shuddered.

'I don't think that's what would happen...that she'd leave me...or hate me.' Again, he leaned towards the positive side of things, 'But that's not something I'd write home about. As if I could just slip it in there: Hey Hinata, I have the Nine-Tails inside me. Don't worry! You are perfectly safe!' He rolled face down on the lily pad, anguished, 'Psh! If only I could promise her that!'

No, he probably wouldn't bring it up that way.

A crane fly paused on top of his head and Naruto brushed it away in annoyance. He shifted again to his back and looked at the sky, taking a deep breath. 'Hinata might not mind.' He ventured.

There was a decent chance that his position as the container of Kyuubi would not weigh on her thoughts at all. Part of it could be contributed to the fact that she may not fully comprehend the gravity of his burden, or Hinata might simply not see it as a major influence on the way he treated her, etcetera. The bottom line he reached was that her love for him could be unconditional.

The hot rush of elation shot down from his head to his toes and back up. His brain went on a tangent after having the thought.

Well, a component of his psyche, orbiting around the ego, acknowledged the prospect of unconditional love, That IS something special! Your whole life won't be perfect, but it'll get pretty close, won't it?

Naruto imagined he would wake jovially each day after the declaration. He would sit up in bed and smile. He would be humbled and happy to be alive. She would probably be curled up beside him. He tilted his head back in ecstasy. The teenager's mind could clearly visualize himself kissing her without holding back, envision himself making love to her at every opportunity, accompanying her to any significant or insignificant event that demanded her time, bragging to friends, kissing her again, living overcome with that rapturous feeling of acceptance…a gaggle of children with their hues of hair and eyes…

"Naruto, you okay over there?"

He jolted out of his daydream and nearly flipped off of the lily pad. Jiraiya got a good laugh out of startling Naruto.

"Ha! I caught you. Those must've been some dirty thoughts you were having!"

"No way you Perv! Shut up!" Naruto was red-faced, 'I…thought you were asleep.'

"Yeah, but I woke up! I took a look at you and I thought, well…" Jiraiya shook his head understandingly, 'You'd need some privacy…or maybe an interruption. It's not surprising a young man's thoughts would get carried away out here in this bliss!'

"I wasn't-t!"

"Sure you were! You've got a boner for crying out loud!"

Naruto rolled off of the pad and sunk into the water to hide.

"Come on, kid. It's cool. I'm not judging you, honest." Jiraiya told him, nodding self-assuredly, 'I am a hundred times worse than you.'

Naruto blinked at him, intimidated for an entire two seconds. Jiraiya was right. This kind of thing didn't even phase him. Naruto swam over to the gigantic lotus flower, lost his erection and then climbed out of the water. He settled on a petal nearby his teacher and sighed, relieving some stress.

Jiraiya nodded, *'There you go. You don't need to freak out about that stuff.'*
"Sorry, Ero-sensei."

"It's fine. Just don't try to lie about it to me, Naruto…I know. I always know." He chuckled.

"Right."

"So what's on your mind?" The man amended, "That isn't M-Rated? I don't need to hear any of that."

Naruto stayed quiet for a time. Birds and insects sang, with the occasional solo crooned by a toad.

"I was wondering if…I'd be allowed…" He hesitated, "Ero-sensei…do you think I can marry Hinata?"

"Uh," Jiraiya scratched his upper lip, stewing on the question, "You're a little young to be considering that sort of thing, no?"

"I won't be forever. I was thinking about it."

"That is true."

"I was worried that…that I won't have the chance. I'll never have a family. All those things down the road that people assume they'll have…I can't just expect that I will. I can get rejected at almost any time! What am I supposed to do about that?" Naruto postulated, a bit frantic, "And kids! I realized that I want more than one! Can jinchuriki even have kids?" He made a quizzical face, "Am I like, chemically balanced? Or has the Fox-?"

"Okay! I'm gonna stop you there," Jiraiya announced, "Take it easy, Naruto. Those are all good questions. A little out of the blue, sure…" He paused, "Actually, I think I know what you were imagining before, so this isn't that strange."

The blonde boy grunted, hoping he'd drop the subject.

"Let's see…well first of all, jinchuriki absolutely can and do have children. Remember our history lesson? The First Hokage and his wife? She was a jinchuriki of our village and those two had a million kids!" Jiraiya cupped his chin, "Well it was more like three…I guess. But it's true! Uzumaki Mito certainly could do it," He smiled, "And other containers of the Nine-Tails have also had children. I know that for a fact. I daresay they have some of the strongest and most impressive kids that a parent can make…"

He exhaled, feeling better about it.

"On the other hand, I don't know how kindly Hyuga Hiashi will take to you marrying his daughter. I mean, you've got your work cut out for you there…winning him over."

Naruto gave Jiraiya an alarmed look, "Does he know the truth about me?"

Jiraiya nodded, "He certainly does, but you know what, Naruto? I don't think he cares so much about that. I think he is more concerned about Hinata being taken care of, and if you can keep her safe. Things of that sort…"

"I will." He was determined to do so.

"Yup. You just need to convince him."

"So how do I-?"
"You have just reached the question that occurs to so many men in your position, dear boy!" Jiraiya interrupted teasingly in the voice of a game show host, "The question is: How do I get her Dad to like me?"

Naruto nodded feebly, losing his resolve.

"I have no fucking clue." Jiraiya admitted, "Look at me. I'm over fifty and still single. You sure as hell don't want to ask me that…"

Later that same day, Tenten had appeared in town in a slightly different style of dress.

She had exchanged her typical pink frog-clasp top for a black cheongsam with blue nemophila designs down the front. Slim, black pants stopped mid-calf, a bit tight (her mother had been a petite woman,) the heeled shoes fit well, and she had her standard weapons holsters with her. Tenten had left her large scroll at home. Hayate said it was unnecessary for the time being. The sword called Hok was fitted in a baldric and slung across her back.

It had taken Sakura a few moments to fully recognize her as she proceeded down the street, supposing Tenten would get lunch before training with Hayate.

With thrusters set to good-friend-mode, Sakura rushed into the bakery, signaled for Tama to follow her, and then made a dash for the barbeque restaurant on the adjacent street. She flagged down Ino who was about to enter the establishment with her teammates, "Sorry boys! Go ahead without me!"

And Ino met her pink haired friend without hearing a single groan of annoyance from either Shikamaru or Chouji.

The three girls followed Tenten down the road from a distance. The bun-haired kunoichi was debating on which eatery suited her.

Tama turned to her teammate, "Sakura, are you sure that Hinata will find us? I haven't seen her all day."

"Oh she'll find us! Her little toad friend is her spy today," Sakura elaborated, "I just saw him going to report to her."

"She's kind of an evil genius." Ino assessed, "The nicest one you've ever met, anyway. Now keep up! We don't want to miss this chance!"

Tenten was about to ask the greeter at the door of a café to be seated when a cacophony of delightful greetings sounded behind her. She turned slowly; feeling cornered at first, but then guessed that human interaction would do her good. "Wow! What are you all doing here?" Tenten asked, feigning some social propriety.

"You probably don't feel comfortable right now. That's okay." Ino told her up front, seeing through the façade, "Just let us have lunch with you and if it sucks you never have to do it again, Tenten."

She raised her eyebrows and then smiled, "For the first time in a week…someone has actually given me that option."

"You're welcome."

Tama revised the seating arrangement, "A table for five, please!"
"Five?" Tenten was puzzled, "Please realize that I was ordered not to-

"We know. No boys. None of your boys, is more like it." Ino agreed, "We're saving a spot for Hinata."

"Oh." Tenten was fine with that.

They went inside and were led to a round table in the corner. The restaurant was for the most part empty, and so the waitress was thrilled to hand out menus to the herd of kunoichi. Tenten politely stowed her sword beneath her seat. Tama complimented the handsome weapon.

"Thank you! It belonged to my mom." Tenten replied proudly, "Hayate has been teaching me sword techniques."

"I wanted to ask you about that," Sakura piggy-backed on the subject, "How is your training going? What's Hayate like?"

"It's…fine. He and I don't get along that well. I can tolerate him, though."

"Correct me if I'm wrong, but I was under the impression that you already knew how to use a sword." Ino tacked on, "And just about everything else that's sharp…"

"I thought I knew how." Tenten conceded and then shook her head, "But I'm learning a lot. Hayate learned from my father…and I never had the chance to."

"He learned from your dad?" Ino was enlightened.

"Yes! He would spend a few days away from his Genin team so that he could learn swordsmanship from Dad, as his apprentice. Kind of like what Sakura is doing with Tsunade-sama."

"Ah." Sakura understood, "That's awesome. It's good that he's teaching you."

"I'm appreciative." Tenten pouted, "I just wish he wouldn't remind me of how he used to babysit me when I was a kid. He constantly complains of what I pain I am!"

"Sometimes, that's the only way men can make conversation." Ino observed, "They complain."

The girls nodded and sipped their complimentary glasses of water.

"You must miss your teammates." Tama approached the subject in a gentle voice, "Do you want to talk about it?"

Tenten's eyebrows waggled as she fought the urge to make a sad face. Just thinking about Neji and Lee caused excruciation.

"I don't know if I can talk about it yet." She yielded.

"That's okay." Tama soothed her, "Do you want us to stay in touch with them and relay information to you? That doesn't contradict the Hokage's order; at least I don't think it does…"

"Please."

"Whoa. How come I didn't think of that?" Ino was surprised, "It's good that you have an in with Lee, Tama."

"Then maybe Hinata can also—" Sakura stopped herself when she saw the aforementioned girl peeking into the café, "Hey Hinata-chan! We're over here!"

"Ah!" Hinata had Kosuke secured in her arms. She released him after an affectionate squeeze and then scurried inside, "Hello everyone!"

She took a seat beside Tenten and gave her a quick side-hug, "You look beautiful, Onee-san!"

"Thank you, Hinata." She laughed quietly.

"Kosuke-chan showed me the way. Thank you for waiting for me!" Hinata turned to the pink haired girl, "Sakura, this arrived while I was in the Hokage's tower. Tsunade-sama said it was for you."

Tenten could not help but follow with her eyes as Hinata passed off the scroll to Sakura. Without a doubt it was from Gaara. The jubilant look on Sakura's face confirmed it. A pang of jealousy gripped Tenten as the waitress returned to take their orders. 'It must be nice to have a guy devoted to you like that…’ She hid her face with a menu, concealing her discomfort, ‘Everyone at this table is lucky. Their boyfriends would do anything for them.’ She paused, considering that Tama was the least fortunate of the gathered kunoichi, with a fiancée who had only recently, she had heard, learned how to kiss. 'It still beats what I've got.'

A whole lot of nothing.

On two occasions Tenten had daydreamed that Lee or Neji, maybe even the two of them, would have made an effort to reach her. Knowing how stubborn the boys could be, she half expected them to defy the Hokage and meet with her secretly.

'Nope. Nothing. I stay up late at night thinking that they might show up...I'm so stupid.' It was a puerile wish. And it was difficult to ignore how her heart had longed for Neji to appear, somehow, if only for a single second, to prove that he thought of her.

Tenten ordered rolled rice noodles and tea. While her companions chatted amicably, she dwelled in her thoughts and scolded her own foolishness.

She shouldn't expect them to go against the Fifth. She certainly had not tried to, as she did possess a healthy fear of the village leader. Tenten longed for high-quality companionship, because Hayate was not cutting it, and the resounding ache of loneliness subjected her to more silly-girl fantasies in three days than she had ever humored in her life.

"Hey Tenten, do you think those crullers will be good or should I get something else?"

She was snapped out of her contemplation, giving her attention to Sakura, "Oh. You ordered the Zhaliang?"

"They looked good." Sakura felt comfortable trying out Han food in Tenten's presence. The girl always pointed her in the right direction.

"They're amazing." Tenten assured her, "Make sure you share!"

They were served their tea and the girls twittered excitedly. A small smile tugged at Tenten's lips. It then occurred to her that the high-quality companionship she was craving was available to her after all. It was the expertise of her fellow kunoichi.
At the very same time, across town, Kiba had finally finished the doctor-ordered reduced activity he'd been slapped with. No missions or anything entertaining, Tsunade had warned him. Donating bone marrow to his father had taken a lot out of him. He had required nearly two weeks of rest to build his strength back up. Kakashi had visited him a few times at his family homestead, but Kiba had been irked that his friends were all too busy to pay him a visit.

'Well, Sakura visited...' But Tama had not. And that was really upsetting him.

Sakura had also seemed to drop some hints that, quite possibly, Sato was now romantically reciprocating Tama's advances. If that was true, Kiba thought, he'd need to brush up on some assassination techniques. Kakashi probably wouldn't object.

He dropped by the Hokage's office and Tsunade quickly looked him over, "Excellent! You are at the peak of health again, Kiba. By the way, your team has a mission tomorrow."

"Finally! Thanks, Hokage-sama."

"Huh. Thank you," She replied, "You're the first person who's thanked me in a long time…"

Kiba didn't understand. At the time, he still had no idea that Tsunade had been driving his peers nuts.

Kiba left the administration building with the intention of picking up his father's favorite dessert from the bakery, but was sidetracked when he noticed Fujita bustling up the street. He had not seen his young friend in a while. Kiba altered his course, accompanied by Akamaru, and followed the small boy uptown.

After a long walk, Kiba began to doubt that Fujita would be interested in idle chit-chat. They had arrived at a guarded cemetery for shinobi.

He approached and then stopped, waiting alongside his dog near a fence as Fujita arrived at a grave. The boy dusted some soil from the epitaph and then stuck a red and orange pinwheel in the grass. He crouched down and spoke softly in a voice that Kiba could not make out.

Ten minutes passed before Fujita stood again, his conversation with the departed over. Kiba gave him a small wave as he advanced, "Hey kid."

"Hello, Kiba-kun..." His eyes were sad.

"If you're not done visiting I can catch you later-"

"It's fine! I was leaving anyway. Hikune-niisan probably wouldn't like it if I wasted the day here."

Kiba was baffled, "Your brother-?"

"Yes." His small shoulders drooped when he sighed, "He died on a mission." Fujita's lip quivered, "It was sudden...every day that I wake up I wish I had dreamed it all."

"I'm so sorry, kid."

"Thank you."

"Do you have any plans today?" Kiba inquired. Akamaru had pushed his head beneath Fujita's hand, soliciting a head-pat.

"Well...Sensei is going to be at the Medical Lab until two 'o clock, but he promised we could train later."
"What do you say we hang out until then? My Mom made a ton of food," Kiba suggested, looking at his hound, "Right, Akamaru? You would have demolished that whole spread on the table if the three of us didn't tackle you."

The dog wagged his tail.

Fujita smiled faintly, "I would like that, Kiba-kun. If I'm welcome-"

"Of course you're welcome! I invited you, kid!" He steered the small boy away from the gravesite, "We just need to stop for chocolate cake first. My Dad has been praying for it."

"Okay!"

And he and the young boy got to talking about life's twists and turns. Kiba had revealed that he never had expected his father to re-enter his life, much less save the man's life when he had the chance. Fujita understood. He commented on how Hikune had always marveled at the whimsy and luck of ninja who lived to achieve old age. He had predicted that he would not last long, and Fujita was disheartened to remember the prognostication. Hikune had made it in jest, but he had turned out to be right.

"The one thing you should always remember is that your brother loved you." Kiba advised him, "Not everyone has that."

"You're right. That always did make me happy."

What Kiba didn't elaborate on was that he could not stop thinking about Sasuke's parallel predicament. He too had lost an older brother...though "lost" acting as a very figurative word. Perhaps he would have preferred Itachi dying suddenly at a young age than him becoming a murderer for no reason, continuing his life as a criminal. He'd have to ask him, next time.

Like his mother always said: youth is wasted on the young. They live too fast and mess it all up! They forget to enjoy what they have... Tsume would laugh and add, And shinobi are just asking for a tragic end, so we might as well go out with a shit-eating grin!

Kiba brought his new friend home so they could stuff their faces and forget their sorrow for a while.
The Replacement!

Chapter Soundtrack: “Thousand Knives” by Ryuichi Sakamoto

Gaara was dreaming. He was partially aware that the images in his mind were fictional, subconscious nonsense. He rolled over in bed, still unable to wake up from the peculiar visions.

He knew where he was. With surprisingly precise detail, Gaara recalled where he was standing, as he had visited the spot once in reality: the Star Notojiso Resort within the Tide Village. He was outside of the hotel on its vacant beachfront. The sand felt warm and smooth under his bare feet, quite unlike the blistering heat of desert sand. Gaara had no idea where the swim trunks came from, why he was wearing them, or why on earth they were pastel pink. He didn’t swim.

No matter. It was a beautiful day with clear skies over the rolling whitecaps. It was a good decision to get involved in the Land of Waves, he concluded.

The sounds of laughter and play drifted into his ears. Gaara turned and looked down the stretch of beach far to the east, where he spotted his loved ones and friends romping happily. ‘As it should be.’ He wondered if he had put them up in the ritzy hotel behind him, but his rational mind noted that he probably couldn’t afford it. Repairs to the Tide Village’s main avenue had cost him a small fortune.

When he looked over the inlet water again Gaara recognized a red and white cloud pattern on black. The uniform of the Akatsuki registered for a moment before his visitors rushed at him. They struck with speed, pinning him flat on his back, and Gaara realized he had no faculties. His near-psychic manipulation of sand was absent; his muscles unresponsive. He was paralyzed as he stared up at several indistinct assailants, crushing his windpipe in a hellish grip. He had once thought himself fortified and ready to deal with this looming threat.

Tears welled in his eyes as he asphyxiated. Familiar screams of onlookers at the far end of the beach rattled in the salty air. Gaara knew they were too late to help, but as darkness swallowed him he was grateful at least to hear them clamoring for him. He may be defenseless, but he was never alone. It was a small comfort.

Gaara jerked awake.

His panicked eyes settled on an alarm clock on the bedside table. The digital readout indicated it was 5:45 in the morning. He adjusted to reality and then his taut muscles relaxed. He was fifteen minutes early, but Gaara elected not to go back to sleep. It wouldn’t be restful.

The blanket slipped back as he sat up slowly. Gaara lingered in bed and rubbed the crust from the corners of his eyes. What an ill-mannered dream, he thought. Gaara had hoped that his worries would have the decency to stay in his conscious mind and let his dreams be. After several sleepless years and intermittent bouts of insomnia, Gaara had more than earned his right to slumber security. Nightmares ought to know that his unconscious mind was not fair game, but there was no helping it. His stress levels had been alarmingly high as of late.

Gaara rose from the bed and neatened it. He dressed himself at his wardrobe while watching the window across the room, not yet illuminated by the soon-to-rise sun, but he knew the dawn was hastening. It gave him an odd feeling. Usually his routine began in the light, not in the dark.

He left his room and switched on a hallway light before proceeding down the corridor. The silence of the mansion was dense. The only other occupant of the house at the time was Temari, and she was still comfortably asleep. Gaara entered the bathroom and waded back into the contents of his dream as he began to wash his face.

‘I’ve never really given much thought to…how I might be killed.’ He mused. His sand-shield had always been just enough to safeguard him for most of his life. Yet if Jiraiya’s warnings proved true, the brute force of the Akatsuki would probably wriggle past his wit, strength and defenses and go straight for the jugular. He had heard Tsunade’s tale about the Akatsuki members who had a chance encounter with Kakashi’s team and the Star students. He also plainly recalled staring down Uchiha Itachi when Naruto had been confronted on the rooftops in Tanzaku Quarter.

‘Jiraiya said that once the Akatsuki removes the Biju from its host, death is certain.’ And Gaara had learned from collected intelligence that other villages had already confirmed this, by losing their jinchuriki. ‘I don’t expect anyone to protect me. The council here once presented a contingency plan for a strike by the Akatsuki, but there was no justifying the creation of those teams as a counterforce. My efforts need to be for the sake of others while I am Kazekage, and not for self-preservation.’ He thought of the Tide Village, which he had deemed a much better investment than his sole well-being, ‘I should take responsibility for my own safety.’

Brushing his teeth was next. ‘I ought to take some time to train.’ Gaara conceded, ‘As I am…it’d be foolish to think I would survive a pair of those criminals…and heaven help me if there are more.’ He knew his limits. He knew that Naruto and Haku were no slouches, wherever they were in the world; they were honing their skills. Gaara had not had a terrible amount of time to focus on advancing his techniques in-between his duties.

His dream underscored that it would not do to wait.

He spat out the last bit of toothpaste and rinsed. He went downstairs and had noticed stirring in Temari’s bedroom as she had begun her daily preparations as well. At the kitchen, Gaara put on a kettle for tea.

‘Yugito of Kumogakure had offered to help me whenever I send for her.’ He recalled, thinking of how the Raikage, who had since sent two trade agreements (both approved) had tried to be friendly, ‘I may need to consult with her.’ She had showed him fundamental techniques during her visit: how to contact the One-Tail inside of him, how to erect mental blocks when needed, and a few pointers on how to ‘bargain’ for chakra.

“Sometimes,” She had said, “The Biju within you can be persuaded. There are times when your enemy is their enemy too. It never hurts to ask.”

Gaara sliced an orange into wedges and fixed himself oatmeal. He sat alone at the table and contemplated how he would squeeze in this potentially life-saving training into his hectic schedule. The Tide Village, and soon the Chunin Exam too, were going to siphon away his time and resources whether he liked it or not.

Kankuro was still in Tide, busy smoothing things over with Tazuna and completing the Stage One training program. Matsuri had returned to Sand with Gaara after the Shin clan circus, at his request, to take a few missions (and also to keep her away from her new Sound ninja pet.) Gaara had not directly addressed it with her, but he was worried about his student getting involved with a Sound nin whose ilk, in the past, had only represented misery and deceit. Well. That was his opinion. Kankuro had advocated favorably on the young musician’s behalf.

‘But Kankuro also let the center of the city get blown apart and I had to pay for it.’

Points off. He finished his meal, tossed the orange peel and then decided to take the garbage out. It was not a task above his position, least of all in an empty house. When Gaara returned, his sister had arrived and helped herself to some tea.

“Good morning,” Temari wore a curious smile, “You’re up early, baby brother.”

“Good morning.” He sat down across from her and accepted the tea cup she had poured for him, “It’s not that early.”

“I heard you moving around in the dark. Couldn’t sleep?”

“No.” He took a sip and then said, “Dreams.”

“Not the good variety, I take it?”

Gaara shook his head in the negative.

“Well, you’ve been juggling so many balls in the air lately; the stress is bound to get to you…no matter how cool and collected you look.”

“I can’t deny that.” He agreed.

“I heard you screamed at Kankuro in front of a congregation of people.” Temari added airily, “Does that make me your favorite sibling for now?”

“At least until you screw up, it does.”

“Oh, but you know I won’t.”

“Don’t get overconfident, Temari. The Tide Village will challenge you.”

She rested her chin on her hand, with red-manicured nails glimmering, “Kankuro broke them in. They have their fundamental skills down and I get to choose who among them is ready for advanced training. My job is easier. I evaluate them and then set them up with the Special Ops divisions,” After a thoughtful sip of tea, she added, “What was the name of that Resort again?”

“Star Notojiso. Chiyo and Ebizo are there.”

“I want to stay there too.”

“I can’t afford that.”

“I will. I’ve got my vacation money set aside. Relax!” Temari chuckled, “I guess Sand can’t pay for anything anymore, huh? How was your verbal boxing-match with the council yesterday?”

“Peachy.”

“Did they approve the money for repairs?”

“They did.” Gaara confirmed, frowning at the memory, “But they took it as an opportunity to tell me how stupid I was. They claimed that my compassion for a fledgling village was a pointless effort from the start. I shouldn’t expect them to vote in favor of my ‘pursuits’ for quite some time, I was warned.”

“They’re all old people who have never tried putting themselves in your shoes!” She dismissed the criticism.
“Some of the Jounin and Clan Heads aren’t that old…and they came down on me just as hard.”

“There’s nothing stupid about fortifying inter-village bonds! Our village needs that kind of support the most! You’re doing better than Dad did. He sided with the Sound Village when it first debuted, and we all saw how that worked out.”

“A good argument,” Her brother conceded, “But money talks. I promised them a finite budget at the start of all this. When the city came under attack I could no longer keep that promise. They have a right to be unhappy about it.”

“What right? It was an incident beyond your control! Fuck them.”

“If I said that…” Gaara paused and laughed quietly to himself, “I wish I could have said that… without getting indicted or replaced.”

“They wouldn’t dare. I hate how they treat you; as if your age constitutes their right to condescend and piss and moan!” Temari put her teacup down with a sharp clack, “You’re the Kazekage. They need to respect you, whether it costs Suna 100 million ryo or their pride, they owe their allegiance!”

He smiled gratefully, “Thank you.”

“You are very fucking welcome. Invite me to the next council meeting.”

After a moment of deliberation Gaara said, “I’ll add a seat for you. You may need to sit beside Chiyo, though.”

“Perfect. Then the two of us will set the record straight.”

“If you can keep her awake…”

The sun had risen and was gleaming through the windows and portholes of the house. In her anger, Temari had downed another cup of tea and a sweet roll.

“So…how are we coming up with the money?”

“Raising taxes; with the Wind daimyo’s approval. Two internal programs had their funding slashed…but I wouldn’t let them touch the Medical Corps.” Gaara elaborated, “Sakura won’t let the Medical program get any cheaper here. She said it was pathetic and I am taking that assessment seriously.”

“Huh. Who knew that girl would be affecting foreign policy at this stage?”

“If I let her run the village unchallenged she would probably get it into utopian condition.” He speculated, “I will be the first to admit that she is much, much smarter than me.”

Smiling again, Temari declared, “She’s a keeper.”

A large shadow passed over the kitchen window, making the morning light blink, and the siblings turned to look at the suspicious activity outside. Gaara crossed over to the window and lifted up the screen before poking his head out. On the immediately adjacent rooftop he beheld Pua, who was seated happily on top of Gamakichi’s head. The toad was now enormous: roughly the size of a small cottage.

The summon creature waved at Gaara pleasantly, “Hope it’s not too early, Kazekage-sama! Me and my little buddy wanted to drop off some mail for ya!”
“Hm.” Gaara’s surprise faded, “Now is a fine time. I don’t know if there is any entrance big enough for you-”

“Nah, don’t worry about it. I’ll just hang out here if that’s okay.” Gamakichi lifted the small white rabbit up towards the mansion window, where she effortlessly hopped inside, “Pua’s got my delivery with her. It seemed like Naruto really wanted to talk to you.”

Gaara thanked the toad and estimated he could get a reply ready by the evening. Inside, Pua was on the kitchen table untucking three scrolls from her bandana. She left them in front of Gaara and then approached the fruit bowl interestedly.

He inspected the mail: one message from Naruto and two were from Haku. ‘That’s different.’ Gaara opened both of Haku’s scrolls and quickly discerned their purpose, ‘This one was intended for Temari.’ He resisted the urge to examine it and comb it over for anything inappropriate. He set it on the table and then took a seat to read his own message.

“Why do you have three?” Temari was inquisitive, “Does your sensei write to you as well?”

“Sometimes he does, but this time he hasn’t.” He gestured to the scroll he had set aside, “That was meant for you.”

She frowned. It could only mean one thing.

“You don’t have to read it.” Gaara reminded her, “It’s yours to do with it what you will.”

Pua had absconded with a pear and settled in front of Temari. The rabbit nibbled on the fruit while Temari looked down at her, mentally debating whether or not Haku’s message would amount to anything more than a steaming pile of shit. She began to stroke Pua’s plush soft fur while keeping her eyes trained on the offending scroll, conflicted over what to do with it.

Gaara dove into his correspondence:

Gaara,

If Temari refuses my letter I completely understand. I thought I might take you up on your offer. I have also thought about your warning. If you deem the search for my clan futile, I should expect to see a team of Sand shinobi whose purpose will be to reclaim me. I don’t know if you and I have an analogous definition of ‘futility.’ I am willing to look for as long as it takes, but you expressed that my homecoming should be within the next year or less. I can honestly say I have no idea how long this search will last, but I promise that if a Retrieval Team arrives and asks for my cooperation, they will have it. I also promise to try to shed Zabuza as soon as humanly possible. That may be for the benefit of the retrieval team, as he will not be so inclined to return me.

‘And why not?’ Gaara wondered before he continued.

Zabuza has finally made his intentions clear. He has been training me in preparation of a coup of the Mist Village. I do not know much about his plans at this point, but he expressed that I will be taking part in an ambush on the village leader. Could you imagine? As terrible as the state of Kirigakure is, I would never be so foolish to tread there, much less challenge a Kage. The sooner I can escape Zabuza, the better. My life may depend on it.

On the other hand, he has still refused to share anything he knows about my clan. At this point, I have turned to other sources of information. If his only intention is to share that knowledge with me after a successful coup d’état, then it’d be best to strike him from my list of counsel. Jiraiya-sensei advised me not to be involved with any criminal activity in these lands, and in view of that, I would like to try to put a stop to it when possible.

‘Godspeed.’ Gaara thought.

As Naruto aptly put it, there is no way I will ever return in time for the Chunin Exam. It is a sacrifice I am willing to make for now. If I am fortunate enough to find any of my relatives here, then it was time well spent. If not...I have given some serious thought to what I want to do with my life. With Tsunade’s consent, and yours as well, I think I would like to permanently relocate to Sunagakure, when all is said and done. I would very much like to be a personal guard of yours.

Gaara looked up from the message, stunned and excited all at once. Temari gave him a strange look, “What?”

“Nothing.” He lied. Gaara was rather fond of the idea of his friend being local again, at long last. He had a spare room to keep him in, and it sure would be nice to have Haku monopolizing household chores again as he had for many years.

The time is drawing closer to when you and Naruto may need to expect clashes with the Akatsuki, and my training and time away may be best applied in your defense. I asked Jiraiya-sensei what he thought of this, and he recommended that I stay near you as often as possible. He intends to keep watch over Naruto in Konohagakure, at least until he feels it is safe to leave. He instructed that I stay with you, and if I desire to visit home I should get used to commuting between Sand and Leaf. Should this arrangement be precluded, I will stay in Leaf and help however I can. I don’t want to be inaccessible to my friends anymore.

But until then, I have a few puzzles here to work out. I had the strange fortune of meeting another Swordsman’s apprentice named Ranmaru. He is being trained by Kurosuki Raiga...one of Zabuza’s least favorite people. This boy is a lot like me in many respects. He is quite amicable and has a natural healing talent...and a Kekkei Genkai as well. I have never seen a Doujutsu as unique as his before, and it would be wise to conduct some research on it. Its physical characteristics are drastically different from the Sharingan and Byakugan. Aside from that, I have been tutoring him in some jutsu while avoiding his mentor at all costs. Raiga has tried to kill me once before.

Gaara snickered.

Ranmaru may serve us as a valuable ally. He is already well-acquainted with Team Gai and he looks forward to seeing them again.

The look of humor on Gaara’s face morphed into bafflement.

I was surprised to hear that too. He has expressed interest in helping me search for my clan, and so that may help speed this process along. With respect to Zabuza’s demands...I will do my best to avoid the conflict between Mist loyalists and rebels, as well as any suicidal coup on the Mizukage. I doubt he has any information valuable enough to risk that catastrophe. I sincerely will try not to take too long, and forgive me if I do; you know that I don’t want to stay away from you and Naruto. I am tired of this journey that has scarcely begun, and I feel it would be better to return to my team.

Stay well, Gaara, and please consider instating me as one of your Black Ops. I have no intention of disappointing you.

Genuinely,

Haku

He looked up from the parchment to see that Pua had devoured most of the pear, twitching her white whiskered nose. Haku sure did know how to persuasively pitch an idea or two. Gaara was about ready to endorse the position appointment before he stopped himself, carefully reading between the lines.

‘I believe Haku when he says that he wants to stay here and guard me from a criminal organization.’ Gaara then thought acidly, ‘But I don’t believe that is his only reason for being here.’ His eyes flicked over to his older sister, who had not noticed his glance, ‘Haku is too nice to be a scoundrel…but he’s still a scoundrel. He’d come here for Temari. Then I would have to break his legs…what good would he do on a Black Ops team after that?’

He thought that maybe he and Tsunade would need to roll a dice on it. Whoever rolls highest keeps Haku! It would be a perfectly reasonable decision-making method for Kage who were evenly matched in terms of irritability. Leaving it to chance might minimize any resentment (on Haku’s part) that Gaara was indeed, and always would be, cock-blocking for the sake of his older sister. At least if Haku was based in Leaf, Gaara wouldn’t have to worry every waking minute if Temari’s honor had been compromised. If he was a resident of Sand, well…it’d be more difficult to keep track of him. It was a nightmare waiting to happen.

“Tsunade should take him.” Gaara muttered.

“What?” Temari looked over her shoulder from the sink as she washed a bowl, “Did you say something, Gaara?”

“Just thinking out loud.”

“That sounded more like plotting out loud.”

He gave her the ‘drop it’ look and Temari shrugged, reaching for a towel to dry her bowl. Gaara checked the clock on the wall to see he had another ten minutes to kill, and so he looked over Naruto’s letter as well.

Hey Gaara,

I heard that you’ve been pretty busy in the Land of Waves! Ero-sensei keeps talking about how important it is that you support Tazuna and the Tide Village, and I keep thinking about how I can’t wait to get back there. I bet it is looking way better. I want to walk across my namesake bridge and check out what Tide ninja are like! But seriously, if there was ever a good way to start off your career as a Kage, helping the Land of Waves has to be it.

‘I am glad you think so, Naruto. Not everyone would agree…’ Gaara thought wryly.

So Senjutsu training is going about the same. There’s a lot of sitting and concentrating…it really makes your butt go numb. I get that it’s supposed to be worth it once you’ve mastered Natural Energy, but this is hands-down the most monotonous training in the world. It’s driving me nuts! All the other techniques I’ve learned barely scratch the surface of the time and energy I put in at the Toad Oil Pool. It isn’t easy to concentrate either when I’ve got so much on my mind. Half of the time, the reason I can’t concentrate is because you or Haku or Hinata pop into my head…and other things too…

Like the Nine-Tailed Fox. He was a supreme dick-bag when we first came here to Mount Myoboku, but for now we’ve been leaving each other alone. I was wondering about what I’m supposed to do with him now that I don’t technically need to rely on his chakra. Well, when Sage Training is done, I won’t need to. I can’t let him go even if I found a way to. Then it’s like a practical guarantee that he’ll wind up in the wrong hands…and then Baa-chan will turn me into a doughnut by shoving my head up my ass. On the other hand, I can’t really trust the Fox ever again. If I use his chakra I will always be paranoid that he’ll hurt someone again.

The One-Tail has hurt you before. I remember when we first met and traveled to Konoha you were too afraid to sleep. Then, when you lost control during the Chunin Exam and we had to chase you... I realize now that I did not understand how important it was that you didn’t transform in that stadium. A lot of people might have died. Did you feel yourself slipping? Could you tell it was going to happen? I guess what I really want to know is...what do you do these days to stay in control? Is there something you can do or say to the Ichibi that helps? You’ve got to tell me if you have a suggestion, because I am about ready to pull my hair out. I can’t keep arguing with this Fox!

Sorry, I am just assuming that you’ve got your situation under control. If you’re having just as hard a time as me with your Bijuu...then we should probably start a focus group or something. There are other Jinchuriki out there and we need to talk to them!

‘Way ahead of you...’ Gaara noted, ‘But no...I am not suffering as acutely as you, Naruto. You have my sympathy.’

While I’m on the subject...it goes without saying that your brother and sister know, and Haku and I know...but does anyone else know that you’re a jinchuriki?

Gaara shut his eyes and inhaled softly. This was a more sensitive area.

Did you tell Sakura?

He looked up and stared blankly at the window. Sunshine was spilling inside with the full-force of morning. The sounds of shop-opening activity could be heard outdoors. Pua was following Temari around the kitchen as she put clean dishes away.

He most certainly had thought about it. Maybe if there had been more time during Sakura’s last visit...and maybe if the Tide Village hadn’t been rough-housed by the Shin clan, Gaara would have broached that topic with his girlfriend. Gaara was a very up-front kind of person, and as such, he had every intention of telling Sakura the truth.

Curiously, timing was a fickle, fleeting thing. What seemed like a fine moment to confess and discuss his identity would instantly seem inappropriate a second later. He was a busy man who had all the time in the world to take care of his official duties...but not so much to spend on matters of the heart. It definitely was a concern of his, but Gaara was hopeful that he would find a free pocket of time to calmly speak to Sakura...maybe over a decadent dinner and entertaining night out. No one said he couldn’t employ some enticement.

Truthfully, Gaara was expecting that she would let it roll off of her shoulders. ‘I could be wrong.’ He conceded privately, ‘But I don’t think I will be.’ He had been given an encouraging clue.

While he, Kakashi and Sakura had made haste to the Tide Village from Suna some days ago, they had taken a few breaks for water and rest. Teacher and pupil had shared some anecdotes from their adventure to the Hidden Star Village, and one such heartening tale was told by Sakura, who had studied the origins of Chakra and Bijuu while in the Hoshikage’s library.

“It was fascinating!” She gushed.

Gaara was surprised that such a text existed. He was less surprised that his girlfriend had read it cover to cover in less than a day. She had held her hands about a foot apart, estimating the thickness of the tome, “It was about this big, I’d say. I think that was because the print type was so large...”
And she went on and on about the First Sage, his wily, chakra-greedy mother, the Sage’s determined and gifted brother, their children and descendants, etcetera, etcetera. Gaara’s eyes had glazed over as she relayed the details…but he woke up when she explained the creation of the nine Tailed-Beasts.

“The Sage of the Six Paths was their parent. At the end of his life, the chakra inside of him was born into the world as living beings with thoughts and feelings, although…I’m not sure how that’s possible.” Sakura explained, “He named them all! Just like his children. It said in the book that they loved and respected him,” She smiled cleverly, “That makes them seem a little less frightening, doesn’t it? They started out small too…and grew into these huge beings that we no longer understand. It’s a shame people have forgotten.”

He had agreed with her quietly.

Gaara was now rather confident that Sakura might even be enthusiastic about his role as a jinchuriki. Her highly-educated mind could probably make sense of it, or at least, not hate him for it. He needed only to find a proper time to have that conversation.

“Did you finish?” Temari asked, snapping him out of his memory.

“Oh. Not yet. I was just thinking.”

If you did, please tell me that she took it well! I was kind of debating whether or not I should tell Hinata. I probably have to. It’d be selfish not to say anything about it and then start a life with her in Leaf…and then let the Akatsuki crash my party. She deserves piece of mind. I know I owe her complete honesty…I just wish I wasn’t so damn scared to talk about it. I don’t know if there will ever be a right time to do it, but if you’ve got any good advice I am begging for it.

Gaara smiled and thought to himself, ‘Eat shit.’

Naruto would figure it out. Hinata and Sakura were much too different to even try finding a one-size-fits-all solution to their problem. Gaara was sure his friend was going to recognize it soon enough.

I’ll try calming down now. I got pretty worked up on my day off! If I just keep cool and meditate maybe I’ll master Natural Energy by tomorrow. Who knows? I’m pretty sure I’ll be able to kick your ass the next time I see you, so don’t get comfortable! The Kazekage shouldn’t be losing to a guy like me, right? Take care of yourself and thanks in advance for any advice!

Naruto

“Pft.” Gaara wanted to laugh. Losing to Naruto seemed like a truly implausible scenario, but as he set the scroll down and stood up from his seat, he felt heaviness on his shoulders. The lethargy reminded him of his unsettling dream and that, indeed, he should worry of whether or not he was a match for Naruto. Naruto was being trained specifically to deal with the Akatsuki, a common threat of theirs. It was no laughing matter. He let the idea settle in the back of his mind, alongside confessing to Sakura and wondering if it was true that the Tailed Beasts could love someone. He would return to these musings after his daily drudgery was out of the way.

“I’m off, now.” Gaara informed his sister while gathering up his correspondence, “Be prepared to go to the Tide Village this afternoon. Matsuri should be back from her mission by then…and she implored me to let her go with you.”

“No problem. I like travelling with her.”

“Also,” Gaara stopped at the door, “If you want to reply to Haku, feel free to send Pua ahead. I can always wait or send something with Gamakichi.”
An intense look lit her teal eyes but the young woman nodded, still uncertain what she was going to do with the message. As her younger brother ventured to find a pair of shoes, Temari silently tucked the scroll into her sash.

A short time later, Gaara switched on the light in his office and then cracked open a window behind his desk. He took a seat and then rolled his shoulders, preparing himself for the day’s tedium. He eyed several reports that had been left in the incoming communication bin, noted the empty outgoing bin and sighed happily that his desk was, more or less, clear today. Other reports would arrive throughout the day, but he was hopeful that he would not be exceptionally busy.

He reached into the inbox and examined the memos, ‘This one is from the Council…lovely. We have officially scheduled a meeting with the Wind Daimyo and it is our wish that you personally attend the rendezvous…to thank him for his generosity and his ongoing resolution not to favor the Land of Fire’s services as he has in the past…Suna cannot afford to displease-’ He crumpled up the paper and tossed it in a trash can, ‘Pandering bureaucrats.’

Gaara understood the context of this entreaty and did not make light of it. Sunagakure’s darkest times were fueled by the village’s inability to curry favor with the Wind Daimyo. As Kankuro and Temari had once explained, the daimyo had chosen to outsource missions to the Fire Country, chiefly the Leaf Village, to avoid the brittleness of local Sand ninja, who had declined in strength a decade or two ago. Desperate, Rasa, the Fourth Kazekage, initialized his plan to seal the Ichibi into a host and above all fortify the military of the Sand Village. It had not gone very well.

It was only up until recently, upon Gaara’s debut and Sand’s newfound might that the Wind Daimyo had started to shun outside help and call upon the aid of Sunagakure. The council was terrified of the prospect of another economic downturn, should they lose missions and revenue to other villages again. These days they regularly prostrated and catered to the wealthy lord’s whims, hoping he would never again abandon them.

Gaara did try to point out that Sand’s alliances and popularity had now garnered mission requests on an international scale, chiefly from the Fire Country, the Land of Waves, the Lightning Country, and, on a superbly rare occasion, the Land of Earth as well. Suna had come into its own and didn’t need to worry as much about what the daimyo thought, but of course old habits die hard, and the council would forever tread lightly.

He marked the date of the meeting down on a calendar and moved on. Another memo was a mission request from a business owner in Hidden Sand, down the road, by the look of it: Lord Kazekage, do you have any Genin teams to spare? A desert owl got loose in the shop’s attic and I need some quick kids who can catch it and set it free! Also, could they repaint the walls while they’re at it? Thanks!

“In fact I do…” Gaara said, half to himself. He set the request aside and then went to the last memos in the bin, which were typical blotter and not very urgent. He filled out a brief questionnaire about water quality and then dropped it in the outgoing box. Gaara glanced over his calendar, which had notes scrawled on several week days, and saw which task required his attention next.

He got up, taking the mission request with him, and then went downstairs to the administration building’s lobby. There were two Chunin attendants waiting for him at the panel table, and Gaara took a seat between them, sighing quietly.

“Good morning, Kazekage-sama!” The pair chirped.

“Good morning.”
One of the Chunin, a young man with pierced ears, accepted the request scroll Gaara handed him, “Oh! Is this one open to Genin teams, Gaara-sama?”

“It’s perfectly suitable in my opinion. When will the teams start arriving?”

“In about ten minutes. You’re early today!”

“I know.”

A new crop of freshly graduated Genin who had just been assigned to their respective Jounin Sensei would be arriving for their first mission assignment. The whole stack of requests on the table consisted of local D-Rank activities. They had more than enough to supply the fifteen new teams who would be storming the lobby in due time.

It was a long-winded affair. In the first hour, six teams trickled in, two of which took their sweet time with questions and other time-wasting banter. The kunoichi of the first team had given Gaara a serious, analytical look and asked, “Can you tell me what a tree looks like, Kazekage-sama?”

He gave her an even look, “I can.” Gaara gave a small smile to the girl’s abashed Jounin sensei, “I wonder why you ask that, Tae.”

“I’ve never seen one. No one in my class has! Kino said you could tell me because you lived in the Hidden Leaf Village for a while.” Her teammate made a face, not wishing to be referenced.

“Words will fail.” Gaara stated plainly, but sand crept from his gourd and created a very convincing replica of a tree, despite the off color and texture, “I think this is accurate. A tree.”

The girl was silent while she reflected on it like a museum art piece. Tae’s sensei described her as the “investigative type” and that she was inclined towards information gathering.

“She will have a future in reconnaissance, then.” Gaara wagered, “But I suggest you read more. Any person in this land could have learned about trees from literature.”

“Tae hates books.” Kino added emphasis by nodding simultaneously with his other teammate.

“Perhaps photography.” The Kazekage suggested, “Dismissed.”

The following two teams did not dawdle, but the most recent team of three boys was jubilant and chatty. One trainee in particular, who seemed to be the ringleader, fancied himself a comedian.

“Hey, Gaara-sama! What do you have when a Rock shinobi is buried up to his neck in sand?” The boy joked.

Gaara frowned and attempted to figure it out. The Chunin beside him were also stumped.

“Not enough sand!” The boy roared. His teammates guffawed with him while their master told them the gag was in bad taste. Iwagakure was the butt of a lot of children’s jokes; though they ought not to be so quick to look down on Rock ninja should they meet in battle.

“I have one for you.” Gaara told the boy, “How can you study the fossil record of Sunagakure?”

“Uh…” The child blinked, taken aback.

“Watch Chiyo.”

Both Chunin snickered while the Genin boys laughed happily, nodding to themselves as if they planned to adopt the witticism. Their sensei only slapped his forehead in disappointment, knowing he would be hearing dumb jokes for quite a while. Gaara asked them to be on their way after they were assigned a mission.

After all of the teams had been given something to do for the day, Gaara dropped by his office and discovered several new messages waiting for him. He sat down and replied to a few pieces of mail until a female Jounin arrived with a new scroll in hand.

She was a beauty with a sharply angled, narrow face, made more intense by how her white-blonde hair that was cut short against the scalp, “Hello, Kazekage-sama.”

“Zeriko.”

“You may want to take a look at this.” She seemed perplexed, “It arrived twenty minutes ago and is addressed to you, from Tazuna.”

Gaara shut his eyes tight and dropped his pen. The news was a psychological attack. He dearly hoped it wasn’t another fee for damages, because he would not be able to squeeze one single ryo out of the council at this point.

“Thank you, Zeriko.” He accepted the message when she handed it to him.

“My lord, I don’t think this is a serious issue.” Zeriko cautioned him, “At the very least, it has nothing to do with money. Forgive me for checking.”

“Forgiven.” Gaara’s eyes widened with a thought, “Is Kankuro-?”

“Your brother was not mentioned at all. Everything appears to be stable…though it seems your friend Tazuna made a strange discovery.” She bowed and then took her leave.

Gaara opened the correspondence and read the hasty communiqué:

Gaara,

It’s Tazuna. I need to bounce something off of you. No, relax; you’ve paid for all the supplies we could possibly use down here to rebuild. Thanks.

Fill me in on this shinobi-hierarchy bullshit: we have trained Genin, Chunin, some Medical and Sensory Corps…and your sister will be rotating down here any day now to begin the training of the Jounin and the Special Ops. I get all of that. The Tide Village is currently under the control of a civil council, but any ninja who makes a bid for power as “Village Leader” is stipulated by our laws to be democratically selected by all citizens. Progressive, huh?

Well, some retired Mist ninja in Tide suburbia told me there’s a component I’ve never heard of before. What the hell is a jinchuriki? And why do these people whisper that we HAVE one here already? That doesn’t make a lick of sense. My ninja neighbors described a jinchuriki as a monster-like shinobi person, and that they can serve as an ultimate line of defense for a village. I say to hell with it because it’s probably expensive. But seriously, what is it? And do I really have one hidden under my nose? Help me investigate.

Tazuna

Gaara tossed the parchment onto his desk and groaned. He leaned back in his chair and held his head, feeling neurons and synapses in his brain squealing like tire wheels in an attempt to understand. This had to be a mistake. A misunderstanding. A dirty, dirty lie. There was no way a military trump card could have accidentally ended up in the Tide Village’s cradle.

“Unless…it wasn’t an accident.” Gaara was wary not to dismiss the idea too fast.

If a jinchuriki had been suffering mistreatment in their home village (which was a reality Gaara could grasp) there was, at least, substantial plausibility for said sufferer to settle in a nontoxic, more comfortable village. The prosperity of the Tide Village would be appealing. Everything was so new and healthy, and ancient prejudices were almost entirely absent in the Land of Waves. It would be a good place, theoretically speaking, for a jinchuriki to nest.

‘And the resident Mist ninja have caught on to this new occupant,’ Gaara noted, ‘There could be truth to it. I’ll need to advise Temari to keep her eyes and ears open, in the event they cross paths.’

He was curious about this incident. He might even make a cordial, personal visit to meet this mysterious Tide inhabitant. Gaara would by no means encourage Tazuna to think the jinchuriki was Tide’s property, or any backwards thinking like that, but he would reassure Tide citizens that their esteemed guest should be treated no differently than anyone else: for better or worse. A normal life and a peaceful home is probably all that a wayward Sacrifice could ask for.

‘Naruto…I think I know where we can start that focus group you spoke of.’

Gaara wrapped up his paperwork and then checked the clock on the wall: a few minutes until noon. He left the administration building and crossed the street to a small diner for lunch. He had the usual: salted, grilled gizzards and rice. Hot sauce on the side. Only in the absence of Naruto and Haku could he enjoy his favorite, albeit unattractive, meal.

Today, Gaara got away with paying for his meal, but only because the first-day-on-the-job waitress did not know any better. On his way out, Gaara overheard the young lady’s manager chastising the new recruit about “courtesies we always extend to the Kazekage.” And sometimes, people with empty wallets.

Back at the office, he had a short meeting with a Jounin and his sidekick/best-friend Chunin companion, and got a patrol update. After their appointment, Matsuri bounced into the room with a grin on her face.

“Gaara-sensei! Is Temari-sama ready to go?”

“I think so,” He added in annoyance, “Won’t you say hello to me first?”

“Sorry! Hello, Sensei! My mission went well!”

“That’s more like it. Where is Maki? She should be here for the debriefing.”

“She went to the ladies room. I ran all the way back here so we didn’t stop for a bathroom break…”

“Please,” Gaara rubbed his forehead, noticing a faint ache still lingered, “Do not let your enthusiasm for the Tide Village…or any particular person…prevent your teammates from using the lavatory. It’s impolite.”

“Sorry, Sensei…” Matsuri was apologetic, winding down from the excitement of her next mission assignment.

When Maki, a Jounin level Seal-Master who had accompanied Matsuri to a desert outpost, returned from the bathroom, she smiled wearily at Gaara and gave him her report. Nothing at all interesting. She had high praise for Matsuri, though, “She is so energetic! You have a fantastic student, Gaara-
“Thank you.”

Maki left for home without having any idea that Matsuri’s energy was motivated by a boy. That might have influenced her opinion a tad differently.

After chatting with his cheerful student for fifteen minutes, Temari finally arrived. Matsuri noted out loud how the woman’s manicure matched her blood-red dress, “And can I get an armor breastplate too?” Matsuri turned to her teacher curiously, seeing the practical and fashionable use of such outerwear.

“Sure. Return after two more successful missions, and then you can get fitted for one at the armory.” Gaara told the girl, “And of course, follow every order that Temari gives you.”

“I will!”

“Gaara, I’ll send a message to you after we reach the Tide Village.” The blonde woman established, “Kankuro will give me his updates and connect me with other officials.” She smiled, “I bet Tazuna will be happy to see me.”

“Let’s hope so…”

“Take it easy.” Temari advised smugly, “I’ll have everything under control.”

He nodded, anxious that she might just be right about that. He bade his sister and student farewell and then they were off. Gaara completed any remaining paperwork and then sat in silence, staring catatonically at the wall of his office.

Maybe now was a good time to write reply messages to Naruto and Haku?

‘I don’t feel like it.’

Maybe he could take an hour break and try that Biju-chakra training he ought to get around to?

‘I don’t feel like doing that either…’

But he knew what he did feel like doing for an hour.

Gaara rose from his seat and exited the office, heading to the narrow, emergency-exit staircase to the roof of the building. And there beneath the unyielding desert sun, suspended between two radio antenna poles, was his trusty nap hammock. It was one thing he was still grateful to Kankuro for.

He got comfortable in the hammock and then folded his hands on his chest. Sand crept up in a small half-dome to provide some shade for the young man, and Gaara allowed himself to drift.

His muscles gradually relaxed. In his pre-sleep minutes, slipping away from consciousness, Gaara thought of the letters his friends had sent him.

‘If I do allow Haku to stay here as one of my Black Ops…I am going to keep him on a short leash. A tight regimen. I’ll make sure he’s so exhausted after every mission that he won’t have the energy to utter Temari’s name…’ The thought made him feel better, even if he was pretty sure he would fail to enforce the strategy.

‘And Naruto is still troubled by the Nine-Tailed Fox.’ He wasn’t exactly sure how to relate. Gaara hardly ever paid much attention to Shukaku, and when he did meditate he purposefully avoided contact with the Bijü. For curiosity’s sake, Gaara felt that now was as good a time as any to visit the giant, grumbling tanuki that dwelled within.

Behind closed eyelids, he came to see the huge chamber that housed his sandy resident. An enormous, wooden cube of bars kept the tanuki imprisoned, with not even a smidge of space for the creature to unfurl its long tail. Surrounding the cage was a shallow plane of water, only a few inches deep. Ripples raced as Gaara walked up to the prison, calm and inquisitive.

What are you doing here? Feral, golden eyes shifted to look down at the visitor, surprised.

“I had time to stop by.”

How very considerate of you.

“I’m trying.” Gaara folded his arms, and after several moments of staring at the beast, he spoke again, “I don’t have much reason to talk to you at all. I dislike you. The beginning of my life was a travesty because of your manipulation.”

I had to pass the time somehow. Besides, your improved seal has hardly given you reason to complain these past few years. The tanuki scowled, Today, you are my manipulator. Two wrongs don’t make a right, or so they say. Now I am the one abused!

“And you feel that you don’t deserve it?”

I NEVER HAVE! The bijü roared, Never, in my whole life, did I do something to deserve this!
Getting locked up! Treated like property! The Sand Village made me what I am when they threw me in a dungeon never to see the light of day. The only company I’ve kept were the miserable shinobi they used as sacrifices, and they too were treated worse than cattle…

Gaara blinked, latching on to the detail, “You can sympathize with your jailors?”

It was easier to sympathize with them than with anyone else. Most of them were fools…but the priest wasn’t so bad.

“A priest?”

Bunpuku, the old one. He took the time to get to know me, at least.

“I suppose by comparison I’m dreadful.”

Waggling its tail to get comfortable, the bijü sat to face Gaara while they conversed, Not dreadful.
Just young. Young and foolish.

Gaara’s smirk was comprised of shock and appreciation.

What are you smiling about?

“You’re not as bad as I remember.”

Are you sure? I would still kill every man, woman and child in this village if I had the chance!
They’ve had it coming. It’s the pound of flesh I demand for how I was treated!

“Punishing people now will not be proper retribution for those who have wronged you in the past.”
Gaara pointed out, “The only person who really wanted to use you was my father. The council and all of the other villagers…would prefer not to wield you as weapon. Doing so has never improved the condition of Suna, and none of us expect it to.”

The tanuki was amused; Maybe you aren’t so foolish after all. But truly, what am I supposed to do? How am I supposed to feel? Someone’s head needs to roll for what was done to me!

“You need a better outlet than senseless killing.” Gaara recommended.

You enjoy killing people too, Gaara.

“You made it pleasurable. It was tempting. But often…I would only try to kill those who threatened innocent people.”

If I don’t kill…then what in the world do you expect me to do? Shukaku growled, It’s all I’ve ever been used for. That’s all I know.

Gaara conceded with folded arms, “That’s a good question.”

Indeed it is.

“Well then,” The young man postulated, “I should not be the one to tell you how to live. But if you could choose anything that would not harm another…what would you want to do with your time? If I set you free right now on oath not to kill, what seems right to you?”

The biju did not answer. It stared at Gaara incredulously, as if he had been asked an impossible math question.

’Perhaps I overwhelmed him?’ Gaara wondered.

I would… The tanuki hesitated, closing his eyes in an expression of authentic nostalgia, I would go home.

“Where is your home?”

I used to live in a nest on the side of Mount Daisen, near the sand dunes…and sometimes Kokuo would visit me. We were good friends, once.

“Kokuo?”

The tailed beast, Kokuo, you nincompoop! The Five-Tailed, you would say. Odd looking fellow, but very smart.

It was Gaara’s turn to stare in dumbfoundment. The tanuki began to laugh merrily at the sight of Gaara’s face.

“And so…when you are referred to as Shukaku…that is your name? Your given name?” Gaara verified.

The name I was given at birth! It has been tossed around so carelessly that people forgot to address me by name! They treated it like a title! Clueless pups. It was synonymous with ‘monster’ after a while, but that’s just what my father called me.

Gaara scrambled to recollect what Sakura had shared about her investigation in the Star Village, “You father…the Sage of the Six Paths.” At least, that’s what he recalled his girlfriend saying.
Yes. So you aren’t stupid after all. How did you learn about him?

“Sakura.”

Shukaku grinned, I will thank her.

“You will do no such thing.” Gaara warned.

But she already knows about me! We should be introduced.

“So…if you were all given names at birth…what is the Nine-Tailed Fox called?” Gaara asked, curious about Naruto’s inhabitant.

Shukaku sneered, That arrogant, overinflated, vulpine sack of shit is named Kurama! And I definitely need to kill him.

Gaara was intrigued, “Why is that?”

I hate him! He acts like he’s the strongest and always puts me down for my single tail. If I blew his head off then he wouldn’t be so quick to patronize!

Gaara came closer to the prison, his nose a hair’s breadth away from the wooden bars. It had never occurred to him that the One-Tailed tanuki could have relationships with its biju brethren, or have any type of complexity at all. It was the first time that his proximity to Shukaku was not dangerous. The pot-bellied tanuki regarded him without an ounce of contempt; rather, he just continued to complain about how intolerable the Nine-Tailed Fox was.

And with his full attention Gaara listened, nodding from time to time.

At one point, Shukaku snapped out of his moody rant and looked up, finally noticing that Gaara had gotten comfortable on top of the wooden cage, Huh…when did you get up there?

“At about the part where you were insisting you could prove all Biju have the same potential power.”

Ah, that’s right. Well that’s what I think, for whatever my opinion is worth. So what if Kurama has eight more tails than me? Give me a clean shot! I’ll win.

“Have you ever met in battle before?”

“No. Tragically.”

“Would you like to?” Gaara teased.

Sure I would! But when is that ever going to happen?

“Naruto is the jinchuriki of the Nine-Tailed Fox, and I highly doubt he would turn down a contest of strength if I challenged him.” The young Kazekage mused, cross-legged above the biju, “That might be a suitable opportunity for you. I’d like to see if your theory is correct.”

Quick! Invite that kid over here!

“I have some projects to finish for now, but you can trust that I have every intention of testing myself against him.” Gaara assured the beast, “However…I often wonder if I’d be a match. I’ve been quite lax…and Naruto has not stopped training since he left Konoha. He might make a fool out of me with his jutsu.”

Is that so? A rumbling growl shook the cage; You really believe that twerp and Kurama would win?

“If I am fighting on my own, I don’t expect to.” He clarified, “With your help, I at least stand a chance.”

The tanuki furrowed its brow up at his visitor, suspicious, You’re only trying to bait me…you just want my chakra.

“I want to be able to rely on you, just as I hope you will try to rely on me.”

What do I need your help for?

Gaara shut his eyes for a moment, “I think…maybe the time is nearing for you to go home. If the Akatsuki are stopped…and when my life is over…there is no reason for you to be held captive in Suna. I promise to let you return to your former life.”

Shukaku blinked in surprise, Do you mean that?

“I do.” He nodded, “And I apologize…I had no idea that you had a place to call your own and live in peace. There seems to be a general lack of education when it comes to Tailed Beasts…and it’s regrettable. As Kazekage, I want to do as much good as possible…and there is no reason for me to not extend that resolution to you as well, provided that you aren’t trampling us all.”

Well, I’ve thought about it. Shukaku admitted, But maybe I need to forget it. He then added, Though that doesn’t make up for how shitty I feel! I hope you know!

“I know.”

And your plan won’t mean a damn thing if the Akatsuki are still around…they’ll just be waiting at my doorstep.

“They are an issue that many nations are trying to deal with. Believe me; I would not, in good conscience, send you anywhere knowing they would have an opportunity to take you.”

Hmm. The tanuki mulled it over for a few beats, In that case…thanks.

Gaara shrugged, “It’s what any decent person would do.”

If that’s true then I haven’t met many. Shukaku supposed, But you…are like Bunpuku. But you’re free! You’re lucky they don’t keep you locked up. You have a much better chance of making changes.

“Thanks, I think.”

Now about that fight with the Fox and his wee little container… Shukaku smiled devilishly again, You have a point. That boy might whip you good if you’ve been slacking like you say, but we can count on one thing…

“What’s that?”

That Kurama won’t help him! Count on it. He is prideful and reluctant to help anyone but himself! There’s the key. The crafty tanuki spun his plan, rubbing his paws together, He won’t expect to meet you in battle and watch you flood with every last drop of my chakra! I’ll light you on fire! I won’t hold back and I won’t regret watching that rotten Fox’s face as he gets pulverized. He’ll never see it coming!

Stupefied, Gaara looked down at the excited, cheering beast below, “What…are you talking about? I’m not sure I-”

Do I need to spell it out for you? I’ll give you all of my strength! Ha ha! Kurama might think I’m too proud to do it, but dammit I will!

“All of it?” He was actually a little frightened by the proposition, “That might be excessive.”

Exactly. It’s excessive. You’ll win in a heartbeat! He laughed again before acknowledging, But it might be rough. You will need to practice, Gaara. Harnessing my full power won’t be easy.

“It was on my to-do list.”

Put it at the top! You need to work hard! I’m no cake-walk. Shukaku warned, But…I think I can trust you. I think I might even like you.

“I’m flattered.”

You should be. I don’t like a lot of people, but I probably like more people than Kurama does. A stingy jerk like him is far too set in his ways…and if I see that you end up sucking or acting like an idiot, He rattled his cage, I’ll rue having had this conversation with you. I will stick it to you if you let me down, mark my words!

“Marked.”

Ha! Good. The tanuki folded his thick arms and nodded, I feel…kind of happy. How strange is that? It’s been so long. Usually I only get excited while torturing or eating souls.

“It’s not that strange. Bonds are supposed to feel good.”

That must explain why you go to such lengths to make friends and all that junk.

“You have solved the riddle.” Gaara commended him.

Sometimes I can figure those out. Oh! I can’t wait to rearrange that damn Fox’s face… He looked up at Gaara again, And getting to go home…that’ll be glorious. I really hope you mean it. I hope this isn’t lip-service just to get me on your side.

“It really isn’t.” The young man guaranteed, “Whatever is necessary: classes, legislation, meet-and-greets…I will see it done.”

What is: meet-and-greet?

“Introducing people to you at public meetings. They need to see that the only reason they are afraid is because they don’t understand.”

How am I supposed to meet a bunch of teeny humans?
“I’ll let you out and you can take over.” Gaara was casual about it, “You’ve done it before.”

Yeah, but that was when I was laying waste to your beloved Leaf Village.

“Do you think I would keep my promise if you did something like that again?”

Of course not.

“Right. Then you simply need to sit still. Talk to them if you want.” He laughed quietly to himself, “You are surprisingly talkative.”

The only time the other biju took me seriously was when I argued with them. I had to get good at it.

“I understand that feeling.” Gaara agreed, thinking of the village council.

Hey, do you know how long you’ve been asleep for?

“I’m asleep?” Gaara was baffled.

You are. Our link is always stronger when you’re asleep. It’s been two hours. You’re late!

With a lunge, Gaara dove straight from his rendezvous with Shukaku back into the conscious world. He got tangled in the hammock and flipped, falling face-first onto the warm stone roof of the building. Somewhere in the back of his mind he could hear the internal laughter of the tailed beast observing his graceful awakening. The conversation had exceeded his one-hour break from office work and was probably creating a traffic-jam of appointments downstairs.

Gaara stood up and brushed himself off irritably, ‘Thanks for the warning…’

You’re welcome. Get to work, you slouch.

The following day in the early afternoon, Temari and her rallied group of veteran ninja were making good time towards the Land of Waves. Matsuri was unstoppably chipper the whole time.

They had cut through the southern portion of the Land of Rivers by way of a new trade road. By the end of the next day, Temari estimated her unit would be crossing the Great Naruto Bridge from the mainland to the island. ‘I still can’t believe that’s what it’s called.’

The Sand coalition stopped for lunch at the top of a forested cliff near the crest of a waterfall. Every shinobi hunkered down in the grass and on logs to unpack their meals. While Matsuri passed out water rations to older ninja (except for one Black Ops representative, who was her age) Temari stole away to a grove of pine trees for some peace and quiet.

‘Alright. There’s probably no harm in reading this. It’s just ink and paper. Meaningless.’ The woman told herself as she inspected her correspondence, ‘And when I’m done I can toss it over that waterfall…’

She got comfortable on the smooth face of a boulder and nibbled at her lunch, letting her eyes scan over the message:

Temari,

Please do not feel obligated to reply back to this, and after reading please do not feel obligated to think of me any differently than you have for the last year.

I hardly know where to begin.

Currently, I am sitting in the tea house of the man who saved my life when I was a small child. Hiroshi was the merchant who implored Jiraiya-sensei to bring me, Naruto, and Gaara to the safety of the Leaf Village. I pass the time here in-between training with Momochi Zabuza and searching for my clan. Unfortunately, it’s more of the former than the latter. At the moment, I have not come across much evidence that could point me towards the clan I am descended of.

More and more, everything you last said to me has proven true. My chances of successfully locating others with the Hyoton are much slimmer than I had originally thought. I am alone with a barbarian who obsesses over the recapturing of Kirigakure. And I have also gravely hurt the people who have the only right in the world to be called my family. You told me so, and you probably are not thrilled for me to acknowledge it now. My failure and isolation is deserved.

I know that I should be protecting Gaara and Naruto. It should be my highest priority. Even when I know what is important, I somehow find a way to defer these things in favor of selfish pursuits. The same way I left you that day, I knew that it was you who was substantially more precious than any clan or relative I might meet. I left anyway, foolishly thinking I could make it a short trip, and yet more foolish than that; believing that I could still be loved after your abandonment. It only makes sense that I be shed and forgotten, because I did not give you what was so plainly owed. Your hatred is justified, and what’s more, I would have reacted no differently if I had been in your place.

What a wretched and sickening character flaw; in which I have so many people that I love, and that I consistently and unfailingly distance myself from them. Would I be any stronger, wiser, or worldlier had I stayed by your side as opposed to training here? Would it matter? I truly doubt I’ve chosen the best option. While I reflect on it, I can only conclude that no matter how much you or Gaara may resent me, it can never compare to how much I hate myself.

I left you in pain. I was stupid to think that you would recover the way Naruto and Gaara did. That you would be able to manage. My friends were well prepared for our separation, but you were anticipating the opposite. It was a cruel and thoughtless thing to do to you, Temari.

And what I did may not deserve to be forgiven. How could I believe that there was ever a reason good enough to leave behind the people I love? In the same way that I helped our Retrieval Team try to deter Sasuke, I too should have been stopped. I likely would have seen the error of my ways the next day if you had all tackled me. But there’s no use in speculation now.

I want to be someone better than I am. On the surface I might seem pleasant and sincere, but I have hidden jealousy, hopelessness, selfishness and hate. All of these feelings have been intensified in me while I have stayed here, making me even more certain that I can improve when I stand by my friends once again.

If Gaara allows it, I will stay with him as a guard in Sunagakure, when all of this foolishness is behind me. And there need be nothing more than that. We shouldn’t speak, and I will stay out of sight whenever you are near. All the respect that you deserved from me I will pay many times over, and if it can only be from the shadows, I will always be devoted to your happiness in life. To tell you that I am sorry scarcely approaches the magnitude of what I really mean, but it will have to do.

I love you.

Haku
After reaching the end Temari popped a rice-and-mackerel roll in her mouth, chewing ferociously. The scroll slipped from her hand, bounced off her leg and then dropped into the wild forest grass. It had not been what she was expecting. She stood and stared thoughtlessly into the tangle of conifers ahead of her, and for a second wondered if what she had read could be erased from her mind. Her chin dropped and she helped herself to another roll.

To her great consternation, Temari noticed the tears that had welled in her eyes and left two warm trails down her cheeks as she ate. Nearly nothing and no one could evoke such a reaction from her.

Temari swallowed the last of her lunch and then let out a sound of profound discomfort. She picked up the scroll and shut it, stowing it away again in her belt. Perhaps words truly were the greatest weapon of all, she supposed.

Leaving her stone seat, Temari traipsed slowly through the forest grass until she entered a wider clearing. She believed there was no point in cleaving the pines apart during her next order of business. She reached for her fan, poised to snap it open, and then hesitated when she was prepared to toss her correspondence into the air and shred it. Temari held the scroll firmly, frowning. She wanted to destroy it. She wanted to not believe what she had read.

Cursing her inability to cut the heart-sundering message apart, Temari jogged over to the cliff-edge of the mountain, where the river they had camped near cascaded down into clear falls. She could hurl it with all of her might and then regret no more. She pulled her arm back and then stopped again. With wide, anguished eyes, Temari began to accept that even if she did dispose of Haku’s letter; his meaning had successfully reached her. It could not be undone.

She wanted to see something fly off of the ledge, so she kicked a pinecone down to its doom.

Temari stowed the letter back into her belt with a sigh and returned to where she had left her lunchbox. It was an exercise in futility. She had been foolish enough to read it, and so, logically, she ought to expect consequences.

‘What does he want me to do? Forgive him? Forget him? Kick his ass?’ She debated furiously, ‘The only thing that he really got across by writing all of that…was saying that I was right.’ Temari slowly smirked in satisfaction, ‘I. Was. Right.’ The validation did kind of feel good, but her smile faded and she began to cry quietly again. She used to weep into her mother’s lap as a small girl, overwhelmed with childish worries, but after Karura’s death Temari had hardened.

Now her heart had learned to ache again. Haku’s admission couldn’t reverse their suffering. All it did was acknowledge it.

“Temari-sama?”

The woman jumped a little and wiped her face, turning to find Matsuri. The young kunoichi pushed past the skirt-like pine branches in her way and then touched Temari’s back, immediately empathetic, “Are you feeling alright?”

She chuckled, recovering, “Now I am.”

“You look like you’ve been crying!”

Temari cleared her throat, “Herm! Well…sometimes you have to cry. You don’t have to let anyone see, but I was taught to feel how I feel and not deny it. I just want to keep my dignity.”

“I see. Did someone say something to you?” Matsuri was curious as they returned to the riverside camp.
“Don’t worry about it,” Temari have her companion a small smile, “I’m going to be fine.” She looked ahead with a sigh, “As soon as I get to that beach…I will be totally fine….”

After another day of traveling, Temari and her company of Sand shinobi had crossed from the mainland into the Land of Waves. The Great Naruto Bridge was a bit congested that morning: two groups of tourists had blocked the center of the causeway for photographs. They were eventually herded aside.

From the corner of her eye, Temari noticed Matsuri quaking beside her as they approached the Sand Training Program barracks. The girl was fit to burst from excitement. The woman smiled to herself, pleased that the younger kunoichi had something to look forward to. Matsuri’s happiness was slowly drawing her out of her own melancholic funk.

When they rounded the corner past the perimeter fence they found themselves a skip and a jump away from Kankuro. He was having an animated discussion with teenage Tide students in the yard outside of the Jounin Station. Temari noticed that his face paint was looking particularly tribal. He noticed their presence and glanced over his shoulder with a grin, “Well aren’t you a sight for sore eyes!”

“And a sore ass, because I know Gaara kicked yours.” She snarked.

“He did,” Kankuro confirmed as he walked up to them, “But I guess that just means that you’re next, Big Sis.”

“Keep dreaming.” Temari put a hand on her hip, “I plan on running a tight ship around here.”

“You do that.” He turned to the young shinobi with him, “Everyone, this is my sister, Temari. She is going to be the Jounin in charge after I leave. Please, do not piss her off.” Kankuro added, “Temari, these are the top students from the training program. Most of them are projected to test at Chunin level or higher.”

She raised her eyebrows, “Not too shabby.”

Matsuri quickly skimmed the dozen of students circled around Kankuro but could find neither hide nor hair of Menma. She did not see Inari either, but she was less surprised about that.

While Temari was giving orders to the arriving coalition behind her, Matsuri stole a moment to speak to Kankuro, “Kankuro-sama! I hope you’re doing well.”

“I’m better now. How are you, kid?”

“I’m fine.” Her smile proved it, “Do you know where Menma is?”

“I do, actually. He works a day job until 4:00. He joins the practice drills in the evening.” Kankuro smirked, “But he doesn’t really have to. He’s also considered the top of the class, if not the top, but technically he isn’t from Tide. Tazuna said he wants him to be an official shinobi of this village.”

“Really?” She squeaked, “That’s amazing!”

“Yeah, I bet that makes you happy.”

“So…he’s working right now?”

“He should be. That kid’s dirt poor and he told me he’s trying to afford his own place.” Kankuro shrugged, “I told Tazuna about his situation and I think they’re going to arrange something for him.”

“Good! Where can I find him this afternoon?”

“Hm…I think it’s a shop on the Main Avenue, but I’m not sure. We’ll find out later.” He motioned for her to follow as Temari and the Sand veterans moved towards the common area for an assembly, “Let’s get Temari set up for now. It’ll be nice to have Tazuna breathing down someone else’s neck for a change.”

There was an hour and a half long session held by Kankuro and other program advisors to get the new Sand group up to speed. They covered important topics, security measures and goals before meeting up with Inari, who was once again the certified tour guide for the Tide Village. He walked them through the important parts of the (rebuilt) village and pointed out training fields and facilities they could use later.

Matsuri fell in step beside the boy as he shepherded the Sand ninja along.

“Does your grandpa pay you for this job?” She teased.

“Minimum wage.” He grumbled, “It’s okay though. Grandpa says being this up-close-and-personal with experienced ninja is a good way to learn.”

“He’s right. You’re the first person they’ll be talking to.”

“So how did your missions go? I heard Gaara told you to go home to get work done too.”

“I finished them quickly,” Matsuri had to substitute a word for light speed, because she had been hell-bent on getting back to Tide, “I try to make Sensei proud.”

“I can tell that you do. I’m trying really hard to make my grandpa proud.” Inari brightened as they marched closer to the Academy, “Menma has been my tutor since the whole Shin clan thing, and I think my jutsu are way better now. He said he’ll even teach me Sound Ninjutsu, maybe sometime next week!”

Matsuri was beaming, “He’s so generous.”

“Yeah, and you know…” Inari smiled mischievously, “He’s always talking about you.”

She blushed.

“He said he couldn’t wait for you to come back! Menma swears up and down that you turned his whole life around! Heh heh! That guy’s a pushover!”

“I wanted to see him too.” Matsuri conceded quietly.

“That’s obvious. You weren’t gone for very long…” He folded his arms behind his head, “So are you two, like, in love or something?”

“I…I…” She blinked rapidly, trying to wrap her head around it, “I don’t know.”

“Well Menma really likes you. I’m a dude, so I can tell just by how he acts and talks.” Inari stated matter-of-factly, “He’s in love and he goes to all of the romantic cafés and pagodas and stuff to get ideas…I’ve seen him do it.”

“Really?”
“Sure have!”

She risked a hopeful smile, “I like him a lot too…and I am so happy that Menma has a home now. I hope that I’ll have more opportunities to visit this place.”

“Sunagakure isn’t very far away. You can probably come by if Gaara lets you.”

“I think he tries to stall me from doing so, but I’ve been keeping up with my assignments.” Matsuri observed happily, “Sensei will get used to it.”

“Yup. Hey, check this out!” Inari gestured to the Academy yard they were passing through, “Kids always want to play here now because they know there was a ninja battle here!”

“Who knew that would bring good publicity?”

“Only because no one died, I figure.” He supposed, “And the best students are idolized these days! Menma is the most popular. Lots of girls give him presents and stuff.”

“Oh?” Her face dropped.

“Don’t worry! You’re his angel,” Inari teased, “I don’t think he cares about all of them. He works pretty hard and I think he’s a cool guy. I like him as much as I liked Naruto’s team.”

“Gaara-sensei’s teammates.” She nodded in understanding, “I look forward to meeting them someday. He’s very fond of them.”

Shouting interrupted their conversation. The pair stopped at the target practice lawn and the crowd of touring Sand veterans behind them halted as well. They watched as Tazuna got into a verbal altercation with one of the newer student tutors: the visiting Mist ninja named Utakata. Matsuri remembered the handsome man from when he had assisted her and Menma in Ongakare’s takedown.

Tazuna was seething in a low voice, “Now you listen up! If I catch you berating another student I’ll-!”

Utakata’s expression was skeptical, “You’ll what?”

“I’ll fire you.” The old man hissed, “Who’s gonna hire a jerk like you around here? I’m the only crazy person who thought it was worth a try! You can forget about living in the Tide Village if you don’t have any money!”

“Oooh, I am terrified.” He rolled his eyes, “And I wasn’t berating anyone.”

“I just caught you yelling at a student. We’ve warned you several times to go easy on them! This isn’t like that shit-hole Mist Village that you knew.”

“Of course it isn’t, but why aren’t students held to the same standard? How many times do I have to tell them not to refer to me as their sensei? That child wasn’t getting the message.”

“That’s all he did?”

“I find the term offensive.” Utakata clarified.

Inari shared a puzzled glance with Matsuri.

“You…” Tazuna shook with outrage, “You are a goddamn basket-case! It’s just a word! A respectful one! He called you sensei by mistake; so what? See that kid over there?” He pointed to a spiky-haired student in a hoodie, “He tells me I’m an ugly old man, but do I let that offend me?”

Utakata silently stared at Tazuna, frowning as he listened.

“No! It’s because he’s a stupid little turd! Kids say things that are gonna piss us off sometimes and you need to shrug it off, man. If you have Mommy-issues, Daddy-issues or Sensei-issues then check ‘em at the door. I already paid you so you better do your job, dammit!”

The innocent Sand ninja congregation stood at the edge of the yard and watched as the Mist ninja huffed, folding his arms.

“I will,” Utakata lowered his voice, “But you tell them not to call me that…or I’m as good as gone.”

“I won’t cry about it.” Tazuna growled.

Utakata stalked over to a screened porch and the bright-eyed Academy bunch with him followed. They were hoping to learn how to use Water Clones before the Mist shinobi lost patience with them. The tutors always taught better techniques than Academy teachers.

Tazuna turned around and heaved a cleansing sigh. He then motioned for the Sand ninja to approach, “Sorry about that…I’ve got a new pain in the ass to argue with.”

“It’s okay, Grandpa.” Inari assured him, “He’ll come around.”

“I’m not holding my breath for that, kiddo, but it’s good to see fresh faces.” He cracked a smile, “I see Matsuri is back with some mature-looking folks!”

Matsuri gave Tazuna a friendly wave before slinking away with Inari. Kankuro stepped forward with his sister and introduced her to Tazuna. They chatted cordially before bringing Tazuna into the fold of veteran ninja who were glancing around curiously. Tazuna gawked at the 13-year-old Black Ops lieutenant who bowed politely to him. While the adults mingled, Inari and Matsuri hit the road again.

“I don’t have class today! Want to stop at the beach?” The boy suggested.

“Maybe not yet…I’m a little tired from traveling.”

“Let’s go to my house, then. Mom will make us something to eat and then you can nap or whatever.”

She warmed up to the idea, “I’d like that.”

And after an early-afternoon meal with Tsunami, as she fawned over Matsuri and told nostalgic stories, the Sand kunoichi relaxed. She would report back to Temari by evening, so she allowed herself to get cozy on a lounge chair and dozed off on maritime pillows while Inari and his mother hung laundry to dry. The family dog, Chokaro, romped and sniffed around the yard.

Matsuri awoke a few hours later, unsure if she had dreamed or not. She was feeling refreshed. She popped into the sitting room and found Inari and Tsunami practicing calligraphy together.

“Thank you so much for the meal, Tsunami-san. And for letting me sleep on your couch…”

“Not at all, dear! Is it time for you to go?”

“Yes. I wanted to find Menma before I check in with Temari-sama.”

“Tell him I say Hi!” Inari grinned.
Nodding jovially, she was off again. The sun was sinking in the sky as Matsuri wound her way off of a suburban road to the Main Avenue of the city. The street was long and still had some scaffolding from rebuilding projects. She had many places to check before she might find Menma’s workplace. Matsuri began the tedious poke-ins and questioning of employees.

Most people didn’t even know who she was talking about, but she found she had more luck with the youngsters.

“Menma? Yeah, he’s my favorite tutor at school!” An orange-haired boy insisted at a book shop, “He’ll be on the left side of the street at the Bubble Tea Café! I hope you find him!”

“Thank you!” Matsuri pressed on quickly descended upon the eatery. The bustle of customers was somewhat distracting and so she decided to sit down and be approached by the wait staff.

A pretty girl in an apron came up to her with a notepad, “Good afternoon! What can I get for you?”

“I might order something in a few minutes. I’m actually looking for someone who works here.”

“Oh! You’re a shinobi!” The waitress deduced by spying her hitai-ate, “Who can I find for you?”

“I wanted to speak to Menma. Can you tell me if he’s here?”

“Sure I can tell you! He’s my boyfriend after all!” The girl tittered, “He left work already and was going home. I’ll find him for you tomorrow if you want. Was this for official Tide Village business?” Matsuri’s mouth hung open in horror.

“Um…are you okay, Miss Kunoichi?”

“I…I have to go.” She stood up in a fog and scuttled off, “T-Thank you.”

The waitress didn’t have a moment to reply before the shop’s door shut with a bell jingle.

The world around her swirled; the details of buildings and townspeople blurred together and burned with color like an expressionist painting. Matsuri struggled to keep calm as she hustled towards the Suna Training Program barracks. Luckily, as she passed through the vestibule into the Jounin Station lobby, Temari’s sharp eyes caught her.

“Hey, Matsuri! Where have you been? I wanted to-” The woman paused, “What happened?”

Matsuri tried to speak but an ‘eep’ sound passed her lips. Her eyes watered and she covered her face with her hands, shaken up. Temari looped an arm around her shoulders and directed her to a break room where Kankuro and Baki were having tea. She gently sat the girl down in an empty chair.

“What happened, Matsuri?” Temari asked again.

The girl lacked the ability to speak and wept quietly.

Kankuro and Baki looked at the small kunoichi with great concern. Kankuro crossed over to her and with a rare amount of compassion, patted her head, “What’s the matter, kid? Is it an emergency? I can get to Gaara if-”

She shook her head ‘no’ vigorously.

“Okay…” He held his chin in his hand, trying to devise a solution, “You’re upset. Let’s play charades if it’s too hard to talk. Temari’s pretty good at guessing.”

The blonde woman gave him an irritated look.

“Come on! We need to figure it out.” Kankuro demanded.

Exhaling, Temari put a hand on Matsuri’s shoulder, “You can just nod ‘yes’ or ‘no’ and we’ll ask you about it. First, did someone injure you?”

Matsuri indicated no.

“Did someone get injured?” Temari ventured.

No again.

“Did someone say something to you?” Kankuro asked.

She nodded yes.

“Did it criticize you?” Temari added.

No.

“Was it about someone else?” Kankuro wondered.

Matsuri nodded yes.

“Who?” The brother and sister asked.

With great effort, Matsuri moved her hands from her face and pantomimed an instrument near her lips.

“Menma!” Kankuro immediately understood, clarifying off-handedly to Temari, “He’s a former shinobi from the Shin clan who plays music. Tazuna employs him now and Matsuri likes him a lot.”

“Got it.” The woman noted.

“What happened? Is he okay?” Kankuro asked, “I just saw him this morning!”

“He’s…alright…” Matsuri attempted to speak, “But he…he has…”

“He has a what?” Kankuro pressed.

“A girlfriend.” Temari guessed.

Matsuri broke down into sobs again.

Kankuro gave a dubious look to his sister while Baki shook his head from the table.

“No way!” The puppeteer roared, “I’ll kill that kid! He was a total puppy around you…so then he goes and finds another girl? Gaara will-!”

Temari silenced him with a glare and Kankuro stopped. She lifted Matsuri up, steadying her on her feet, and then spoke softly, “Come with me. You can tell me more about it before I go to the next meeting.”

Matsuri nodded weakly.
Turning to Kankuro, Temari whispered, “You already know how timid and emotional this girl is. You can’t rub it in, you dope! I’ll look after her and then get back to the committee when I can. You and Baki should return to Suna.”

“But what about-?”

“Don’t. Do not tell Gaara.” Temari warned him, “That’s just another lawsuit waiting to happen…”

---

That same Spring evening, within the secure forests of the Leaf Village, Tenten walked towards a training area that Hayate had designated. The girl recollected a pleasant visit to Hayate and Yugao’s home earlier that day.

At the time, Hayate had stepped out to drop something off at the Jounin Standby Station, thus leaving Tenten alone with the ANBU veteran.

Yugao smiled at Tenten from across a low table, “Is my husband bothering you yet?”

“Yes.” Tenten deadpanned, “I can’t believe you married him.”

“We planned to get married for a while. He acts differently around me.” She explained, “But I know how he is around other people. He tends to be short and direct.”

“Oh. I would call it uncarining.”

Yugao laughed as she arranged flowers in a vase and nodded, “You could say that.”

“I remember that he wasn’t always like this. He used to be a lot nicer when Dad was alive.”

“He misses his Master very much. I recall what Hayate was like back then…” The woman agreed, “That’s when I fell in love with him, while he was still training to become a Jounin. I was already with the Black Ops. He was a Kenjutsu instructor I visited often. He stopped me one night at the footbridge and said he heard a rumor that I liked him.”

Tenten chuckled, “Huh. So he listened to those?”

“Once. I told him it was true…” Yugao grinned, “And then he confessed that it wasn’t a rumor. He said he just wanted to find out before risking his heart. Of course, I had been teasing him for days beforehand…and then we dated after that.”

Tenten blew a strand of hair out of her face, disenchanted with the story.

“Don’t you have a romantic bone in your body, young lady?” Yugao chided.

“If I did, they’re all broken these days.” Tenten supposed.

“How awful.”

“How does a nice woman like you get into the ANBU?” She wondered, genuinely perplexed.

Unabashed, Yugao explained, “I was invited by the Third. I used my talent to assassinate people since I was your age. I may be nice, but I was very good at what I did. I take great pride in serving the Hokage.”

That declaration made Tenten smile, “I like you twice as much now.”
“I like you too, Tenten. If Hayate ever wears you out, please stop by and visit me on my days off. We can talk about whatever you want. I’ll also braid your hair and do your nails.”

“As you serious?” It was a glittering offer.

“As a heart attack.”

Tenten laughed quietly to herself. The upside to training with Hayate would most assuredly be spending time with Yugao. She wouldn’t tell him that and risk ruining it, though.

She had been disappointed that Hayate told her she would be training at night. It wasn’t quite sunset, for now, but Tenten was a bit apprehensive of the possibility of being ambushed in the dark. She had noticed that Hayate dueled unfairly at times. He liked to jump out of blind spots and see if she could parry his sword, and if she didn’t, he would hold it an inch above her face to mock her.

‘He wouldn’t catch me off-guard if Neji was watching my back!’ She thought bitterly.

Just about the only thing she appreciated so far, of the dozens of lessons he had imparted so far, was a subtle difference in sword types she had never noticed. He had talked about it as soon as she arrived at the glade. His introduction to Shadow Clones and fortifying her chakra reserves, in the days past, had left Tenten looking like a dopey child. Sword theory was less of a struggle.

“What kind of swords do ninja use?” Hayate asked her.

She frowned in confusion, “Um…all kinds?”

“What a brilliant answer.” He scoffed, “No. Forget about the exotic. Forget about zanbato. I am talking basic sword. What kind of a sword do most ninja use?”

“Well…the standard issue straight blades.” Tenten yielded in annoyance.

“There. You got it. Chokuto, commonly called Ninjato: a straight sword that’s typically 48cm, give or take.” Hayate told her in a textbook-reading voice, “Now tell me, what sword do you have there?”

Quizzical, Tenten unsheathed the sword Hok at her back and examined it. Straight, well-maintained, with an ornate brass hilt and red tassel. It looked like a standard straight sword, but she figured that wasn’t the correct answer judging by how impatient Hayate was getting.

“It’s straight. And it’s probably 48cm, maybe less,” She groused, estimating the length, “You obviously don’t want me to say it’s Ninjato. What do you want me to call it Hayate? My grandmother?”

“The sword you’re holding is the grandmother of all modern swords. It’s called jian. It’s the prototype that shinobi received as an import from the Kingdom of Han, but that was a damn long time ago,” Hayate expounded, “Jian aren’t quite the same as what ninja use. They are smaller and faster. Rare these days…”

“Why does it matter?” Tenten ground out, “Are you going to teach me something or not? The sword that you use is standard Ninjato, so why point out the difference?”

“Because…what you have there is much better suited for your dad’s techniques. Your mother and father used jian because it’s been passed down in that clan since…” He shrugged, “Shishou also used dao, which you won’t be taught.”

“That’s a curved blade.” She recognized the sword type, “And why not? I’m good at just about
“You are good at everything, but now you need to get amazing at just a few techniques. Specialization will protect you. Trust me.” He retorted, “Dao are heavy and only have one sharp edge. They’re good for chopping. Your dad used them to counter jian, but like I said, you don’t seem ‘em much anymore.”

“I get it.”

“Good.” Hayate walked over to the open grass, away from the training posts, “Hok is a great sword. It has a good reputation. It’ll work for the Dance of the Crescent Moon.”

“So that explains why I’ve been working on Shadow Clones.” She observed, aware of her father’s specialty, “But why can’t I use any weapon I want? It’s my jutsu. I should do it my way.”

“Don’t ruin a good thing.” He warned her, “That technique needs you to move fast. To be accurate. Not every weapon affords you that. The whole point of it is to stab your enemy and bring them down before they can find a way to counter you.” He strolled near a large pond, “So before we get into technical positioning and how you’re supposed to attack…let’s go over Shadow Clones again.”

“You’ve been killing me this week. I feel like I’ve got no chakra left.”

“That is complete exaggeration. You’ve got plenty. You’re just feeling the burn as you build up reserves.”

With a reluctant hand sign Tenten produced two Shadow Clones. They stood on either side of her and did not look very enthusiastic.

“Your chakra control is spot-on,” Hayate praised her, “That’s a relief. That means we’re getting somewhere.”

“Are you teaching me yet?” She prodded.

Hayate drew his sword and in the same motion, as he leapt to be silhouetted by the setting sun, two of his own clones materialized and dove down with him. The afterimages that accompanied them made her eyes untrustworthy. Taken by surprise, Tenten defended herself from a sword strike and hollered in rage when her clones were cleaved apart. Hayate and his replications stopped and he pointed out what had occurred, “I’m teaching you. You just saw me produce clones while I was attacking you. Think you can do that?”

“I don’t know how.”

“Let’s review.” He came closer and showed her the hand sign for the technique, “When we mold the correct amount of chakra with the appropriate seal…we often let go and let the jutsu commence. Your Shadow Clones appear just as soon as you spend your chakra, no?”

“Yes, but that’s how jutsu work!”

“No. That’s not how they work. You can control the timing with channeling. With some focus, you can halt that clone from materializing so that you’re in position with a sword, and then let it join you when you move in.” Hayate explained, “There’s no time to form seals when your hands are full. It’s critical that you get the timing right, otherwise you’re not fooling anyone.”

“Huh. Now it’s making more sense,” She conceded, “So I need to work on delaying my jutsu like you do?”
“Yes. You can get it with a bit of practice…but the Dance you’ll find much harder.”

Tenten smirked, “Then I’ll feel really good when I put people down with it. Gai-sensei said that hard work makes victory sweeter.”

“He’s not wrong about that.”

“Show me that channeling crap one more time! I can do it!” She leaned in to watch Hayate form the seal. He leapt away to show off, his hands free, and then two Shadow Clones ‘popped’ into being beside him several seconds later.

“That will really be useful…” She muttered.

Hayate dismissed his replications with a serious expression, “Then let’s get to it.”

Lee and Neji had an atypical week together.

For the sake of bettering their skills, as well as finding a way to pass the time (Tsunade had reduced mission activity by 70 percent), they had divided their training hours between Gai and Wong Leung. Gai had been very understanding. As a matter of fact, he had been positively enthralled to hear that Lee and Neji were endeavoring under the same master. Gai and Lee had only cried excitedly about it for a few minutes before Neji insisted they get back to work.

And it was work. It was terrible work. Wong Leung had saddled the both of them with identical Wushu training regimens. Lee had anticipated it would be strenuous, for he had heard stories about how Wushu exercises were often synonymous with torture. It was a prerequisite Wong had demanded before they begin the specifics of Baguazhang, and in Lee’s case, an appropriate introduction to Drunken Boxing.

At about noon, when the two boys had parted from Gai at their training field, they met Wong near Lee’s house and were immediately told to run around the perimeter of the Hidden Leaf Village. Lee was accustomed to such a request, but Neji dragged a few paces behind while they jogged. Upon meeting with Wong again at the end of the run, the old man snorted and told them to run again in the opposite direction.

Slightly troubled, Lee agreed and relayed the message to Neji. The Hyuga heir cursed under his breath and they took off again.

With the completion of the second lap, starved for air, the boys stopped in front of Wong once again. The grandfather had four 15-gallon pails filled to the brim with water. He instructed them to stand in the grassy field by the stream and hold the buckets up until he returned for them.

As they outstretched their arms, desperately trying not to fold from the excruciating weight, Neji thought about why he was willing to participate in this hogwash. ‘Lee has done exercises like these occasionally at Gai’s request.’ He felt it would unnecessarily damage his pride if he too did not make the attempt to survive silly training tactics, ‘But this is still utter foolishness…’

About an hour or more later, Lee had puffed through labored breaths that maybe his grandfather was a tad malicious. Neji glared in response.

Wong Leung dropped by with a newspaper tucked under his arm and clucked his tongue at them, Lift those arms up! You too, Lee! Do you want me to make you start over?

No! Lee hollered.
Good. Ten more minutes with those arms straight. Then we'll move on. He took a seat on an overturned milk crate and began reading his newspaper.

It was a long ten minutes until they were permitted to set down the pails and rest their quaking arms. Wong dove directly into the next exercise, marching downstream with them towards the local distillery. A long brick wall lined the back of the brewing plant and they halted, listening as Wong explained, Shinobi are stiff. They are also bad listeners. Wushu requires flexibility and awareness. I am only putting you through what is expected of eight-year-olds in our homeland.

Is that true, Grandpa? Lee was dubious.

From the beginning of their education and into adulthood, disciples of Wushu will train this way. It fortifies values over strength, not strength over values…like how you ninja prioritize…the balance of mind and body is never quite right in these lands. Wong stood in front of Neji, meeting his eyes; My masters told me that limitations, much like desire, grow within the mind. This training will release them. It will unburden you.

“Grandpa says that limitations exist only in the mind. This training will unburden us, and that all Wushu disciples are taught to balance the mind and body.” Lee recapped to Neji.

“The balance of physical and mental energy is a fundamental principal of Ninjutsu. We know this already.” Neji retorted.

Wong understood what the Hyuga heir had said, Ninjutsu is a product of Ninshu: the way that shinobi understand themselves, others and Chi. In my homeland all of these things were conceptualized by Tao. Virtue comes before all else. You will learn, Kitten.

Grandpa, his name is Neji.

I know. The old man replied with a small smile. Then he turned to the wall of the distillery in a near hand-stand and balanced on the crown of his head, hands at his sides, leaning the heels of his feet on the brick above. He spoke to Lee who was blinking in shock at him, I have seen you walk on your hands around this village, Lee. Your head must be as strong. I am confident you can do this. Your mousefart friend probably can too…

With an inaudible growl, Neji got the gist of what was next. He and Lee mimicked the precarious balancing stunt and held still. Wong rolled to his feet easily and dusted his jacket off, adding; Stay like that for three hours.

Three hours?! This is basic, Lee! No complaints! What I teach is no joke, surely you know. I will fetch you for supper afterwards.

Wong walked off and left them to test their endurance.

“How long will this take?” Neji asked with a hint of concern. The blood was rushing to his head in a distressing manner.

“Three hours.”

“Charming man...” His sarcasm had barbed-wire attitude in it.

This regimen repeated for several days. A few additional exercises were included periodically, such as: slapping basins of water with their bare hands for hours, balancing on their heads in a variety of positions, sweeping sidewalks, balancing on each other, and Neji’s favorite…four hours on top of Tsunade’s likeness at the Hokage monument. He and Lee were made to stand on the stone head, crouched in a seated squat on one foot with hands folded in prayer. He conceded that the view of the village was so pristine it was nearly worth it. Lee agreed.

Wong was happy to prepare meals for them and watch as the chopsticks slipped from their hands. Water-slapping was an ancient way to build stamina, and he had thought it wise to task them with it each day. The pain had made eating food a terrible challenge, but the old man let the boys take their time.

Gai was a little disturbed by the methods employed by Lee’s grandfather, but when Lee assured him the results would be worth it the man relaxed. The training hours with their sensei were by far much easier, and the rare D-Ranked mission provided welcome distraction.

One morning late in the week, Lee had reported to Gai that Neji had taken the morning to train at the Hyuga compound. Naturally, Gai was fine with the request. He confided in Lee that he was feeling much better about Tenten’s absence now that he and Neji had become so close.

“Not as close as Neji was to Tenten.” Lee contended, “But I do believe that Neji trusts me more! What you told me seems to be working, Gai-sensei!”

“Like I said, Lee, all you had to do was be there.” The man grinned, “Neji values the friendships he has. I knew he could depend on you.”

They practiced wielding nunchaku together after the conversation. To Lee’s happy amazement, Gai later procured the three-section staff that Tenten had left at the field before her removal. Lee recalled how she had proudly demonstrated its use to Gai before letting him have it. The boy wiped at his eyes, realizing he had gotten choked up at the thought of her.

“It’s alright, Lee!” His sensei assured him, “I was glad that she forgot this! It feels like Tenten never left.”

Lee sniveled, trying to get a grip, “I just worry that she will…she will not—”

“I won’t tolerate negative thoughts from you!” Gai thundered while swinging the sectional staff at his student and the force could have beheaded the boy.

With a yelp, Lee blocked the strike with his nunchaku, and the two darted around with their weaponry, imagining what Tenten’s commentary would be.

The Hyuga estate was tranquil early that morning. Neji had discovered an odd thing had occurred while working on Wushu prerequisites with Lee the day before.

He had accidentally cut a broom in half.

He and his teammate looked at the wooden debris on the sidewalk in true bewilderment. Shards of the instrument drifted down from Neji’s hand to the pavement, where the tattered brush head was splayed.

Lee gave him a curious look, “That was not intentional?”

“Not at all.” Neji admitted.

Lee picked up the top section of the severed tool, “It does not look like you crushed it. Look here! It’s a clean split."

Neji shrugged.

“You were very focused. You have been performing well with our forms today.”

“I was trying not to fall unconscious and take a spill off of the Hokage monument.”

“Well, yes…” His friend noted, “But your chakra cut this broom in half. Remarkable.”

“I wasn’t trying to.”

“Can you do it again?” Lee wondered.

Neji frowned. He had no idea.

The next logical step in understanding his unintentionally destructive skill was to inquire with his clan, Neji decided. He had asked his uncle if there was any reason he should be able to cleave things apart, or if Jyukken was related to this ability.

“Quite a while ago, I had tested you and your cousins with chakra paper. I was curious about your elemental affinities.” Hiashi reminded him, “You are a Wind Type, Neji. That is why you can do these things.”

The boy was wide-eyed.

The clan head continued, “I’m not surprised. Hinata expresses her Water Nature often. I spar with her now and again to check her progress.”

“Hinata-sama developed that skill on her own; however…I am not so sure where to start with my affinity.” Neji acknowledged, “What do you recommend, Uncle?”

“I suggest you learn more with a friend of mine. He is a Wind Type like you. I don’t have much advice to give you, considering that I am a Water Type, like my daughters.” Hiashi explained, “Go to the Pebble Yard near the Branch House and wait a few minutes. I will send Hideyasu.”

Neji’s stomach flipped. The prospect of training with Hikune’s father seemed awkward, in spite of Hideyasu’s forgiving disposition. Yet he did as he was asked and went to a small courtyard filled corner to corner with beige stones.

At the center of the plot was a strange installment. It looked like a clothesline suspended between two poles, almost shoulder-high, but it was only large enough to hang two or three garments at best. Neji assumed it was not for laundry. He examined it more closely.

A spool of thin, braided rope was wound up on a small wheel. It appeared to have been drawn out time and again and fitted to the adjacent pole through a tie-loop, maybe because earlier segments had been cut away. Neji had an inkling of what the purpose of the line was.

Hideyasu greeted him merrily from a nearby porch and strolled out to join him, “Neji! You’ve been out for a week! The Hyuga clan missed you. Welcome back, young man.”

“Good morning, Hideyasu-san.” He was heartened by the man’s unrelenting kindness.

“So! Hiashi-sama reached me with news that you are expressing a Wind Nature,” The veteran ninja smiled, “That is special stuff. Hardly anyone in our clan taps into such internal talent. It takes years of disciplined training…”
“I have had my fill of disciplined training in six days.” Neji announced.

Hideyasu was inquisitive, “Oh? Is that where you’ve been?”

“Training with a Wushu master.” He confirmed.

“Holy smokes…” The man breathed, “That kind of teacher will run you ragged.”

“He has.”

“Your hands look awful.”

“I’m aware.” Neji sighed.

“Well! The silver lining to that training is that it helped you tap into your elemental orientation.” Hideyasu determined, “How about we refine it a bit more?” He pointed to the suspended string, “This is an absorption rope. Its properties are similar to chakra paper but it’s a bit less sensitive. Focus chakra into this and it will assist you in expressing your elemental Nature.”

“I suspected as much.” Neji stood in front of the line and grasped it in a closed fist. He plunged chakra into it, flooding the whole length of the cable. It remained inert. He back away in confusion. Maybe that had been too much.

“Nature Transformation is a whimsical thing.” Hideyasu mused, placing two fingers on the rope, “We all have one elemental type that comes naturally to us…and yet we are all equally capable of mastering the five elemental natures. At times, it is easier to learn a new jutsu than it is to ‘feel’ our own latent Nature. You might pick up the Fireball Jutsu faster than you would feel the Wind in your veins…but who knows?”

The rope snapped. Hideyasu chuckled, “A little bit can go a long way. Balance is of dire importance here. Though you told me you’re getting a hard lesson in balance through Wushu.”

“Indeed.”

“Try again. Breathe slowly.” The man added, “It might help if you try to sense your energy flow directly from tenketsu and outward, moving through your coils. The Hyuga have an advantage with respect to monitoring chakra, while others frequently focus it in their hands to feel it.” Hideyasu pulled a new piece of rope free and secured it, “Go ahead, Neji.”

It was a stunningly simple piece of advice. With his eyes closed, Neji calmly laid two fingers on the rope, detecting the miniscule rush that faintly echoed in his own chakra. The subtlety of his own Nature had become more and more apparent to him. It was a sensation he had recalled experiencing earlier during moments of Wong Leung’s ridiculous training.

“Well done!” Hideyasu laughed.

Neji blinked at his accomplishment. He had snapped the rope.

“Phew! Not bad at all for a genius…” The man praised him, re-stringing the absorption rope, “Try once more and I’ll see if you’ve really got it.”

With two hands and serene focus, Neji immediately snapped the string at both ends.

“That answers that question.” Hideyasu conceded.

“I know the feeling now.” Neji shared his take on it, “And I know that I have felt this several times before, but I never understood.”

He was clapped on the back when Hideyasu spoke, “You are naturally intuitive. It’s amazing. Truly, the only thing that bars you from many of your intrinsic abilities is probably that you don’t know what they are yet,” The man chuckled, “Very good, Neji. Even Hikune needed a week before he could express his Lightning Nature in that rope.”

The Hyuga heir wilted, still mildly discouraged by his older cousin’s death.

“Now, now, don’t fret. My son did his best and he always made me proud,” He took a few steps away from the Nature detection tool, “I don’t hold anything against you, Neji. I don’t hold you accountable in any way for what happened. The honest fact is…I believe you are a worthy choice as a successor of the Hyuga…far more worthy than me or my children. Hiashi chose well.”

“Thank you, Hideyasu-san.” He answered quietly.

“And I miss Hizashi just about every time I look at you.” Hideyasu went on, “I knew that he never deserved the Branch. No one does…but I had wished that he and Hiashi had both belonged to the Main House. He had such good taste in food…and he never gave up. He was the quintessential shinobi who shined with honor.” He shut his eyes and relived a memory, “He would have had a fit if he got to see how talented you are now, Neji. Whenever he was happy he would raise his voice and—”

Neji made a sweeping motion with his hands, remembering how his father could get excited.

“Exactly!” Hideyasu nodded, “That’s what he did. He would just flap and run his mouth! Very excitable…” He hitched the string up again.

Neji chuckled, amused by the description. For quite a while, it had been difficult to remember his father and feel happy. It was getting easier.

“Hm…maybe we should have an application of Nature Transformation. What do you say?”

Hideyasu volunteered, taking a Jyukken stance, “I bet you’ll get this too.”

Neji took a pace back and beheld as the man dashed forward for a traditional Gentle Fist strike, combining his Wind affinity as the chakra exited his palm and then, in an odd instance, slashed at the two poles. It cut everything to smithereens. He had not expected it either.

“Damn.” Hideyasu reached down and lifted the scarred rope-wheel from the gravel, “We’ll need to replace it again. Technically we don’t use combined techniques on this tool because…well…it’s too much. I knew better so it’s on my wallet.”

“I should take aim at something that won’t be missed.” Neji gathered.

“Right. That is a courtesy. You and I could hack our house apart if we horsed around with Wind Transformation…”

They left the devastated absorption rope behind and ventured towards a thicket of woods behind the building. Hideyasu surmised that Hiashi probably wouldn’t care if they wrecked things beyond the well-manicured grounds. It took about a dozen earnest attempts before Neji had the proper feel for combining Wind Nature with a Jyukken slap, but when he did get it right he had leveled a sizeable oak.

While Hideyasu commended him and dawdled in the background, Neji was poised to strike again at the yawning, shady woods. He had worked on his Air Palm while Tenten had been away, and since it was a functioning technique at last he was sorely tempted to flood it with his elemental affinity. He should have warned Hideyasu first.

Neji lunged, skidded over twigs and grass, and then let the customary ‘canon’ of chakra barrel free from his hands, dripping the Wind Transformation into it like a meddlesome scientist, and watched in fright as the flying bolt of energy (now beyond his control) swirled into an unstoppable gust…and cut everything.

Hideyasu swallowed a howl of bewilderment as the dense woodland was decimated and reduced to woodchips.

“That…was not advisable.” The man said after a minute of staring, “It’s all compost now. Imagine if that was the house…oh my…”

“I apologize. I didn’t think that…” Neji frowned, “That would be the result.”

“Now that you know, you mustn’t aim such a technique at anyone you care about…or anyone you might be incarcerated for chopping to bits.” The man warned, “There’s no way to stop it. You’re wielding more power than you realize, young man.”

And so, at Hideyasu’s behest, he promptly removed himself from the Hyuga grounds for safety purposes.

Lee and Gai were impressed with Neji’s Nature Transformation, but after seeing a demonstration of it they both opted to stand as far back as possible. Gai also suggested that Neji give fair warning when his Wind Release was going to be used and, of course, “Not to bring such cataclysm down on your comrades.” Neji promised he wouldn’t.

When noon rolled around and training with Gai was wrapping up, the man pulled Neji aside, “Ah, Neji, I need to ask a favor of you.”

He gave his mentor his full attention.

“I had intended to make this request of Tenten; however that is no longer possible.” Gai went on, “Lee has been excelling with melee weapons but cannot tote a repertoire of them on missions…as you already know,” He gently cited Lee’s inability to use Ninjutsu, “I wished to ask Tenten to seal his preferred tools in a scroll on Lee’s behalf, but I expect that you can accomplish this.”

“I can.” Neji volunteered. It was a skill he very sparingly used (since Tenten had that base covered) but he understood that Gai wanted to afford Lee every opportunity to be a successful shinobi, even if that mean relying on teammates for certain things.

Gai thanked him and handed over a few types of nunchaku as well as the three-section staff. Neji dropped the items off at the Hyuga estate before joining Lee and his grandfather for training.

They were instructed to begin balancing on the Hokage monument and then run three laps around the village. Once that is done, Wong Leung said to Lee, We will approach our family’s style of Drunken Boxing.

It was something to look forward to, Lee figured. He gave Neji fair warning, fully aware that if the consumption of alcohol was involved, there was the possibility of mayhem.

The boys completed their assigned tasks with less difficulty than days past, and then met with Wong again. The old man strolled with his arms behind his back and had them follow him downtown.
They arrived at the ethnic quarter of the Leaf Village, which had ostensive Han dominance with regards to shops, eateries and services.

Wong pointed to a bench and intonated to Neji, Have a seat.

Neji didn’t need to know what Wong had said to get that he was out of the picture for now. The Hyuga sat down and watched as the old man circled his grandson expectantly. Without warning, he reached up and pinched Lee’s earlobe in a vice-like grip. Howling with pain, Lee bent backwards as Wong pulled and then abruptly released him.

You have excellent flexibility. Wong commented.

Lee protested while rubbing his ear, Grandpa, I would have done that if you had asked me to.

Some things cannot be demanded with words. Your honest reaction is the only truth I will concern myself with. The old man retorted, Zui Chuan has been taught in our family for hundreds of years, passed down from my mother’s side. Drunken Boxing is an advanced style of Wushu that requires you to be soft and heavy. You are naturally acrobatic, Lee, and so I always knew that you could obtain this ability.

I will not need to drink anything, will I? Lee asked, stealing a glance at Neji, Neji and Tenten have had to stop me from-

Zui Chuan is best used when sober. I am sure your skills manifest quickly when your inhibitions are lower, dear boy, but make no mistake! This style is an imitation of a drunkard’s movements, and its complexity is lost when the user is inebriated. The results are pitiful! I’ve seen it. You will not imbibe on my watch while you are still underage. I have respect for our laws.

Lee privately found that tidbit surprising. Wong was okay with crushing their heads and hands, but would corroborate that he was a law-abiding citizen. Lee wasn’t about to argue with him.

Neji was essentially tuned out of the conversation as he observed Wong Leung exhibit fundamental forms of Drunken Boxing to Lee. The movements were outlandish and absurd: staggering steps from side to side, hobbling, flopping limbs, bending and splits with the occasional somersault. He could admit that he would never have the ability to perform such stunts the way Lee could, but he certainly didn’t want to. He was appreciative that Lee wasn’t stinking drunk while attempting the exercises. It would have escalated the danger level.

But mixed in with frivolous movements were strikes with truly horrifying momentum and tenacity. Wong dislodged a towering power pole from the ground with a flapping-knuckle strike and then replaced it with a swing of his foot, secure in the ground again, and rolled around bizarrely as he did so. Lee seemed to have the hang of it from the get-go, but was getting the formalities from his grandfather.

Wong appeared to have gotten into how to manipulate the environment and use common objects offensively. A shop owner simply smiled without complaint as Wong borrowed a wok from a sale stand and showed how it could be used as a shield…or a blunt force object to incapacitate someone. Lee took many mental notes.

Two hours passed as they perused the ethnic quarter of town and practiced with Neji as a spectator. Two or three times Wong Leung asked Neji to attack Lee to test his evasion. Neji had barely skimmed his teammate with a Jyukken strike, but wasn’t shocked that Lee was capable of avoiding him. When Wong was satisfied he pointed to a picnic table and made Neji sit out again.
As the afternoon wore on, nosy patrons of the local shops lingered to watch Lee and his grandfather shillyshally about. Their reactions were mostly positive. Neji was even offered some tea (no charge) while he waited at a table but he politely declined. Another store owner began speaking to him in Hanwen, presuming he was privy like Wong Leung and Lee were, but again, Neji respectfully clarified that he couldn’t understand.

“Oh? That’s fine. Sorry that I just assumed!” The mustached man was contrite, “Why don’t you invite your friend and the Master for lunch? My diner is serving a crab special today!”

And so Neji relayed the message to Lee who parlayed with Wong and then got a confirming nod of the head that they would love to drop by. Shortly thereafter, the consensus was that lunch was delicious…and that woks were just weapons in disguise.

Another week passed and the training intensified on those warm spring days.

Wong divided up his attention between Neji and Lee evenly, and the boys kept pace as the demands of their training changed. Wong had eventually necessitated that they wear short-sleeved shirts and martial arts slippers he provided (with correct sizes) because he felt that their “shinobi appearances” distracted him too much. Neji reluctantly complied and Lee enthusiastically obliged. Lee refused when Wong asked if he would grow his hair out in a braid again. There were just some things that couldn’t be negotiated.

Early one morning at the team training field, Gai apologized for being required on a two-man cell with Kakashi. The boys had no complaints about it, and a short time later reported to the Hokage’s office after Gai stated that they had been summoned.

Tsunade regarded their outfits with an interested gaze, “Working hard, gentlemen?”

Neji grunted and Lee nodded fervently, “Yes, Hokage-sama! My grandfather’s lessons are grueling!”

“Superb.” She smiled, “I have a C-Rank mission set aside for the two of you. This will be the first one I’ve assigned you beyond Leaf Village limits, with regards to the investigation, but it is extremely simple. You’re more than capable.”

“What does it entail, Tsunade-sama?” Neji made an effort to extend an olive branch.

“All it requires is that you-” She fumbled over her words as she looked at the open doorway. An older man with a cane stood there in silence before Tsunade acknowledged him, “Good morning, Danzo.”

“Good morning, my lady.” He entered and Neji and Lee stepped aside dutifully, “May I interject?”

She had bristled for half a second but remained calm, “I suppose. I can continue this mission briefing after you tell me how I can help you.”

“No need. As it so happens, I am here on behalf of these two Genin. This regards the hold put on the students of Team 13 and a policy about three-man cells. I wish to discuss it with you now. Their presence is permissible.”

Lee inclined his head very slightly towards Neji, and their eyes reflected the same question as to what relevance this newcomer had. They listened in silence as Tsunade tried to steer the situation.

“Then let’s discuss it.” She invited, “It is my opinion that these two young shinobi have more than enough combined skill, intelligence, and fortitude to handle the mission I’ve selected. As Hokage, I personally vouch that two team members is all that will be required.” Tsunade folded her arms, “And I would like to know what concern it is of yours what Hyuga Neji and Rock Lee are doing in the next 72 hours.”

“It is of direct concern. You have tasked my division, as you have several other Black Ops platoons, with increased security measures. A two-man cell comprised of ninja below Jounin level is contradictory to a mandate you authorized twelve days ago. To make an exception would be inexcusable and jeopardize young Leaf ninja.” Danzo countered, “To resolve this matter, I will cover the disparity on Team 13 with one of my own shinobi. It will assure that this team is in compliance with mission standards.”

Her eyes were sharp, “Don’t trouble yourself. I will summon one of their peers to join them.”

“A summons isn’t necessary. For the sake of saving time, let me take this opportunity to introduce you to my subordinate. He’s waiting outside.” Danzo added respectfully, and on cue, a pale young man stepped into the office, “This is Sai. His age and skill level will be sufficient in balancing this team.”

Neji and Lee took stock of the shinobi who had been presented. He was ghostly white with dark hair and eyes, and his outfit was well-tailored save for the crop top that exposed a chiseled midriff. It was off-putting, at least in Neji’s opinion. Lee didn’t seem to find it obnoxious and Neji read the small, nonverbal signals coming from his teammate. He had learned to interpret Lee in a whole new way.

Sai bowed, “Please allow me to join this team for now, Hokage-sama. I will do my best.”

Tsunade arched a blonde eyebrow critically, “I would expect no less.” Her eyes fell on Neji and Lee, “In this case…I should abide by compliance regulations. I apologize for not having foresight on this matter, however,” She smiled, “Please know that I have the utmost confidence in you, Neji and Lee.” Turning to Sai, she added, “And I imagine that Sai won’t hinder you in completing your mission objective.”

Neji found it reassuring that the Hokage was so vocal about her support of them. He had four-fifths of the way forgiven her for sundering his team, and was, for the most part, content with the Hokage again.

Danzo waited on the side of the room as Tsunade provided the three boys with mission details and expectations. She then whisked them along so they could leave immediately.

After the team had exited her office, Tsunade frowned at the old man, “Your timing is impeccable.”

“For good reason. You nearly sent two ‘watch-listed’ Genin into gray area territory, where there is still no confirmation that Dintei Bihokokuni’s servants are not hiding in wait. Until the ANBU Black Ops complete monitoring of those regions, it is foolish to put those boys in harm’s way, and moreover, at such a disadvantage.” Danzo criticized, “The Hokage should know this.”

Tsunade’s hands fist in her lap, “They are by no means disadvantaged.” She cocked her head angrily, “And as the administrator of the Root organization, that danger you just described to me…that is exactly what your association should be diffusing on a daily basis. My ANBU are working exceptionally hard. From what I gather, the Root should have snuffed out Bi’s faction long ago.” The Hokage added icily, “It’s been ten years of hunting and you have nothing to show for it, Danzo.”

“Root ANBU have perished at Bihokokuni’s hands as many have…ten years of loss can cause setbacks.” Danzo replied evenly, “That man is one of the craftiest ninja outside of the Fire Country. Underestimating our village’s plight will not do.”

“I have not underestimated anything.”

“That is a relief to hear. So tell me, have you submitted a framework for the next Chunin Selection Exam to the council? I wish to be sure that security standards are satisfactory.” The old man inquired.

Grudgingly, she replied, “I have not yet done so.”

“I have submitted one already. You can review a copy if you wish and determine if you would like to adopt it or make changes.” Danzo offered, “Your advisors have agreed with me that it is in the best interest of the village if the next selection process is not conducted as a bi-annual exam.”

“Why in the world not?” Tsunade asked, appalled, “It affords many trainees their chance to advance!”

“Put simply, a bi-annual exam is what threatened our village previously. It was discovered that Orochimaru infiltrated the Leaf Village and learned of weaknesses during the first exam, making sure to strike those weak points and attack during the second exam.” Danzo explained, “The council will value eliminating this possibility, aware that both Orochimaru and Bihokokuni seek to subvert KonoHagakure whenever possible. A singular exam will remedy this conundrum.”

“I don’t want to deny any Genin their chance to be promoted.” She reminded him.

“I will bring you a copy of the framework. Make your changes, Hokage-sama. But please, for the safety of the village, let us prevent our enemies from repeating their strategy.”

Tsunade thought to herself that it would explain how Orochimaru and his Sound and Sand compatriots had entered undetected during the Chunin Exam Invasion. He had more than likely stalked the first exam so that he could pounce on the second one, aware of the bi-annual tradition.

“Very well.” She submitted to the stipulation, “One exam it is, then. However, I would like to add a new feature. I will present it to you and the council at the next committee meeting.”

“Of course.”

“Now that all of that is settled,” Tsunade sighed softly, “Is there anything else we should catch up on?”

“One small matter.” Danzo acknowledged, “With your blessing, I would like to interview Takaharu’s child.”

“What is the purpose of such an interview?”

“She is called Tenten, no? I examined the file. She can make a potentially excellent addition to the Root organization.”

Tsunade smiled, “No. A hundred times no.” She added, “Will that be all?”

“That is all, Hokage-sama.”

“Lovely. Please shut the door behind you.”

Even after Danzo had taken his leave, the hair on the back of Tsunade’s neck was on end. It was unfathomable how her sensei had ever put up with such a spider of a man.
She only had about a half an hour to herself, stamping documents and reading memos, before the door of her office blew open forcibly. Shouting was coming from the hallway. Tsunade beheld in hushed confusion as Inuzuka Tsume stormed inside.

The woman marched up to the desk and slammed a scroll down on the Hokage’s desk with a clawed hand. Her chest was puffing, probably because she had run out of air from screaming in fury. Tsunade blinked at her rapidly. The women regarded each other before the Hokage asked, “Tsume? Are you well?”

“No. I’m not.” She gnashed her teeth, “I just wanted you to have a look at that scroll so you could see why I am about to commit murder!”

“Oh.” Tsunade picked it up amicably, “Let’s have a look.”

Kiba and Sakura ran into the office a moment later, having hoped to stop Tsume from destroying doors and sections of walls. The administrative building was in need of a tune-up anyway. The teammates hovered anxiously while Tsunade skimmed over the message. She determined that it was from Nichiyo, Tsume’s husband.

The gist was that he was apologizing and that he was leaving once again. He had known of his condition prior to returning to Konoha, and had been seeking a matching donor for months. He was overjoyed that his son was compatible. He was glad he could catch up with his daughter, and was more or less unaffected by his time with Tsume. Nichiyo explained that he could not stay because he already had a new wife in the Tea Country and had to take care of their 14-month old child…

“Oh.” Tsunade said.

“With your leave, I will now go and track him. I’m debating where to sink my teeth in to make him bleed the most.” Tsume growled, “That man stole Kiba’s health! He took advantage to save his own life! He took advantage of my son and I am going to make him pay for it!”

Tsunade held up a hand, remaining the rational figure, “Take a moment, please. Before I allow you to go anywhere, I will assign you a team. And recall: Nichiyo only had that transplant a few weeks ago…but bone marrow recipients typically need 100 days or more to recover properly. Wherever he went he may have collapsed on the way. You ought to check local hospitals because I imagine you might find him travelling clinic to clinic. He’s not fit enough to escape.”

“Get me that team. Pronto.” Tsume said lowly. She stalked away to find more things she could crush with her hands.

“My goodness.” Tsunade sighed, turning to Sakura and Kiba, “I must be a therapist or something. Oh and, Kiba,” She was empathetic, “I’m sorry about this.”

“I’m coping.” He said with a weary smile, “Mom definitely took it worse than I did. I’m sorry that she was so rude.”

“I’ll overlook it. This is a terrible offense.” Tsunade remarked to her apprentice, “Sakura, go with Kiba and make sure that woman doesn’t take off. I need to throw a team together on short notice…”

“Yes, Shishou!” The pink haired girl was energetic.

After dismissal she and Kiba walked down the hallway quietly as Akamaru led them along Tsume’s scent trail. Sakura patted Kiba’s back in silence.

“It’s okay, Sakura.”
“Is it? He did a horrible thing to you and your family.”

“I know he did, but…” He shrugged, “I won’t miss him. Not this time. I have you and Tama and Kakashi-sensei.” Kiba smiled slightly, “And I know all of you aren’t going anywhere.”

With an hour break to collect travel supplies, Neji made sure to seal the weapons Gai had donated for Lee into a summoning scroll. He would rather be over-prepared than to regret. He then arrived at the village gate to wait for Lee, and five minutes after Lee turned up, Sai hopped down from a rooftop to meet with them.

“So your name is Sai?” Lee verified, “I overheard it in the office.”

“That is my codename.” Sai nodded, “In Root we do not have real names.”

“You’re from Root?” Neji asked. He simpered and looked away. It was just their luck that a cultureless sociopath ninja would be assigned as Tenten’s replacement.

“Yes. And you are…” Sai pursed his lips slightly as he assessed Neji’s appearance, “You are Ladyhair.”

Neji took offense. He gave an extra-strength scowl to the blithering idiot who wanted to incorporate nicknames into this sad mix.

“And you should be…” Sai made a strange effort to smile, “Superbrows.”

“Actually,” Lee corrected innocently, “My name is Rock Lee! And this is my teammate, Hyuga Neji.”

“Nicknames are a good way to solidify friendships.” Sai repeated what sounded like a tutorial quote, “I know your real names, but I will refer to you by nickname.”

“It is in your best interest not to use nicknames, and do not expect any friendships to begin on this mission. You’ve gone about it the wrong way.” Neji advised.

They had set out down the road leading away from the village.

“You need only be open-minded, Ladyhair.” Sai chided.

That was when Neji knew for certain that Sai was a victim of the precise malady that the Mokuton Black Ops shinobi had described. Root was not a wholesome environment and Neji had been warned. Sai was a product of a dysfunctional organization. Neji could grasp Sai’s unfortunate upbringing, but he still hated him. Unequivocally.

With the hope of easing tension, Lee suggested, “If you insist on using nicknames, perhaps we should give one to you?”

“Imbecile suits him.” Neji proposed.

Lee backtracked, realizing where it was headed, “Um…well then…how about no nicknames? Sai-san, please make a conscious effort to refer to us by our given names.”

“Okay, Superbrows.”

There were deaf ears and then there were socially deaf ears. Sai had a set of the latter.
Lee valiantly began the politest argument in the history of the world as Neji recapped the mission’s parameters in his head, tuning the chatter out.

Tsunade had given Neji a map with up-to-date cartography of the Fire Country. She had instructed them to take it to a cabin outpost used by Leaf ninja where they would find a second identical map tacked up on a cork board. If they laid their map over the wall-map, a special ink would seep through the paper and mark points of interest. The data could not be transferred or seen in any way other than map to map contact. That way the Hokage could have recent intel and leave the original atlas where her scouts could mark it while out on the range.

That was about all she was willing to share. Neji didn’t know exactly how important the marked geographical locations were or what their significance was, but he had a gut feeling that Jounin and Black Ops shinobi were probably using it to track the movements of a “target of interest.” Or it was just Tsunade’s sneaky way of pinpointing new gambling houses. Both were viable.

The cabin was about 41 miles away due east from Konoha. If Sai continued being a nuisance, Neji imagined that it could take a day or two to complete their task.

They circumvented the village limits through the forest and then took to the treetops on an easterly route. Neji stayed at the front and for brief intervals used his Byakugan to be sure the way was clear. At one point while he faced forward, Neji glimpsed Sai giving him a most unsettling look. It was a stare of contemplation aimed at the back of his head. As if Sai desired to slice into his neck with that tanto on his back…

Neji halted. The moment he turned around to address the menacing expression, Sai had slipped back into character. He smiled blithely while talking to Lee, who was too friendly to detect wickedness at times.

“Why did we stop?” Lee asked him.

“We didn’t arrange a bathroom break. Take one now before we move farther out.” Neji suggested conveniently.

Sai had no need to go, and so Neji and Lee moved several yards away to find denser underbrush. With his back to his teammate, Neji said quietly, “I don’t trust this person.”

“Sai?” Lee asked over his shoulder.

“My impression of him…leads me to believe that he knows more about us than we think. He may even know the location we are going to.”

“That is merely conjecture.” Lee reminded him, “It is far too early for us to be suspicious of him.”

“It isn’t too early.” Neji disagreed, “Watch him closely, Lee.”

Lee’s face revealed that he fully believed Neji and had taken the caution to heart. He nodded, finished his business and then they returned to the thicket Sai was waiting in.

They moved on and set a fast pace with Neji at the lead. Lee was mindful of Neji’s warning, but he asked Sai questions while they traveled.

“I do not know much about this foundation called Root. What is it for?” Lee wondered.

“It is a subdivision of Black Ops shinobi under the command of Danzo-sama. Our first duty is to protect the Leaf Village no matter the cost.” Sai revealed, “We do not participate on missions the “way most ninja do, and Danzo-sama requires us to meet strict criteria.”

“Of what sort?”

Sai smiled, “Can’t say.”

“Ah.” Lee accepted the answer, “What is your rank in that organization?”

“Quite low. Root has different rankings than the ninja of the standard forces.” He added, “I imagine I am close in skill level to you and Ladyhair.”

“If you say that name again,” Neji called over his shoulder back to them, “I will make you incapable of speech.”

Sai kept smiling but he was beginning to get it. Neji was the no-nonsense type and would probably make good on his threats.

“Do you have a specialization? Neji and I are most skilled with Taijutsu.” Lee continued.

“Ninjutsu.” Sai answered simply.

“Hm, that is good…” The boy was thinking about it, “Maybe after our mission you might be interested in sparring with us? Springtime is an excellent season for new challenges!”

“Maybe we should.”

“Can you also wield weaponry?” Lee inquired, citing the small sword at Sai’s back.

“Just tanto. It’s enough.”

“Our teammate Tenten can handle any weapon with tremendous skill.” Lee announced proudly, “I imagine you would have difficulty dueling her with a dagger…”

Sai smirked, “I would, but I rely more on my Super Beast Scroll. She would have difficulty with me.”

“I have serious doubts about that.” Lee replied innocuously.

“So do I.”

Neji’s ear was honed in on the conversation but he said nothing.

Lee went on, “I am certain that Tenten has gotten stronger while she has been away from us. She is one of my most hardworking friends!”

“Why isn’t she with your team now? It’s no good to slack off.”

“The Hokage had her removed for safety purposes. An ongoing investigation has required that we be apart.” He explained.

“If she were stronger maybe you wouldn’t have to worry so much.” Sai prodded.

“What a foolish thing to say…” Lee frowned, “You know, Sai-san…strength does not win every fight.”

Neji felt vindicated by Lee’s profound rebuttal and defense of Tenten, but it wasn’t quite enough. He felt compelled to gouge Sai’s eyes out and claim it was an honest accident. His willpower helped him maintain his course as Sai vexed Lee with injurious comments for the rest of the day.

By the dark of evening they stopped, having covered three quarters of the distance to their destination. They shared the responsibilities of making camp and a fire before settling down to eat packed meals. Lee had migrated back to Neji for conversation. He had grown weary of Sai’s badgering and insensitive remarks.

“I know that it has been difficult for these two weeks, but…” Lee sighed quietly, “I miss Tenten so much now. I wish she was here. This replacement is abominable.”

“Sai is not a replacement.” Neji bit back sharply, “There could never be a replacement for her.”

“True. There never could.” Lee granted, “It seems as time wears on and she is not here…I will…just feel more and more sad.”

Neji did not reply as he chewed a mouthful of rice. He was experiencing a feeling like that but far more intense. He wasn’t sure how to talk about it.

Within a clearing between tall sycamores, Sai was settled farther away from the fire, propped up comfortably on a tree trunk. He was doodling contentedly in a sketchbook. He was also entirely unconcerned with Lee and Neji, for the time being.

“I am sure that you miss her.” Lee wagered.

“I do.”

“Did you ever…have that opportunity to see her?” Lee wondered, “I know I told you not to do it… but it would have been good for the both of you.”

“I was unsuccessful.” Neji admitted, “A member of the ANBU stopped me.”

“Really?” Lee chirped.

“Yes. He was on assignment to prevent me from disobeying Tsunade. He chased me through town and the apartment building before subduing me,” He reported with a hint of pride, “But for now I will heed his warning. He set me free without punishment.”

“How unusual!”

“He was kind.” Neji assured him, “I too found it unusual.”

“Even if you had been caught later…would you have been happy to see Tenten?” Lee asked curiously.

“I would have.”

“I know it would have made her happy as well.” Lee nodded, finishing his dinner.

Neji stared at the fire and tried to let his mind go blank. It wasn’t going so well. Mentioning Tenten had sparked memories of her that flashed through his mind like an old film reel. There was an acute ache somewhere in his ribcage, but Neji had felt it spread into his limbs and even manifest as a headache. Gradually, emotional suffering was starting to convert into physical suffering. How could the absence of one person do such a thing?
“Tenten has been my good friend since I was ten years old.” Lee began anecdotally, “She was never cruel to me, as far as I can remember. Not always encouraging…but she understood me in ways that few others did.”

Neji listened sidelong to his teammate in silence. Tenten had also understood him in ways that no one did. Lee had that privilege first.

“I was so relieved that she trained with you when we first became a team. It was frustrating to try to stand up to you.” Lee chuckled softly, “And it was always preferable to work with Gai-sensei, no matter how tough the training was! You were worse.”

“I apologize.”

“There is no point in apologizing now, Neji.” Lee told him, “You have changed.”

“Sometimes I wonder if I have, or if it’s all been in my head.”

“You have changed.” Lee insisted, “For the better.”

“I didn’t treat her well.” Neji acknowledged.

“Tenten understood. She told me that she knew you were struggling even though you never said so. She has a way of collecting and interpreting subtle signals…”

“She does.”

“At times, she needed to go above and beyond to help you, even if it hurt her.” Lee added, “And on rare occasions, I had to do the same.”

Neji knew it to be true but could not vocally confirm it. There were some things he was ashamed of and most of those things had to do with how wretched he was to his teammates in the past.

“But you can see all that she has done for you.” Lee supposed.

Neji set his lunchbox down and nodded. Confiding in Lee was a strange but surprisingly safe thing to do. He was willing to let it happen so long as he didn’t come across as ridiculously vulnerable.

“Recently…I noticed how you reached out to Tenten more often.” His teammate ventured, “I was under the impression that you were not doing it as a friend.”

That comment jostled him and Neji frowned, taking it as a jibe. These days he was a somewhat decent friend and he didn’t want to hear otherwise.

Lee quickly amended, “What I mean is, I know how I talked to Tenten as a friend…but you approached things much differently. You hardly ever had boundaries like the ones she and I respect. These past few months you have been reducing them and I started to wonder…”

“Wonder what?” Neji rumbled.

“I wondered what it meant.”

“What could it mean?” He said with a hint of acerbity, “That I improve as a person when Tenten is present. That’s it. When she isn’t around I become a certifiable desperado who aggravates the Hokage and everyone close to him. What indeed does it mean…”

“You could be in love.”
For the first time in a while, Neji made eye contact with Lee. His initial intent was to demonstrate his typical irritation and maybe some denial, but he had likely slipped. There was that pesky vulnerability again, and even if Lee wasn’t attacking it or capitalizing on it, Neji was very uncomfortable with it. The two had stopped speaking after that. Lee did not want to force the issue. Neji’s disconsolate facial expression said enough.

A short time later, Lee somehow managed to fall asleep in a sleeping bag. Haunted, Neji stayed awake and stared; sometimes at the fire and sometimes at the vast dark in the surrounding woods. Late in the night, Sai stood up and crossed over to be close to the fire. It had gotten cold. He resumed his inkbrush sketches in the book.

“You’re an artist.” Neji observed.

“It’s a hobby.” Sai acknowledged after a moment, “Well…it is more of a way of life.”

“Your techniques involve drawing.” Neji guessed.

“They do. You are a clever one.” Sai nodded.

Neji stole a glance down at the sketchbook and noted the cartoonish depiction of a young man, “Is that someone you know?”

“My brother.” Sai told him, “I draw him so I can remember him.”

“I wish I had better ways to remember the people I care about.”

The new teammate blinked at him, making some rapid deductions before he said, “I didn’t hear very much earlier…but I can tell that you miss the kunoichi of your team very much. You and Superbrows both do.”

“We do. We no longer feel as strong or as formidable as we had been as a complete team.” Neji tried to inject a lesson in human emotion into Sai, “Separate, we are much weaker. We are the best of friends made most powerful by our bonds.”

“That is…” Sai trailed off in a faint voice, “Very impressive.”

“It is to be envied. But our apparent strength is also our weakness,” He drew inspiration from Wong’s lessons, “That is how we can be sure that we are balanced.”

Genuinely astonished, Sai looked at him as if he had experienced a eureka moment, “In Root…we are made to kill our emotions…but…” He shut his sketchbook, “Once I did…I always felt weaker on the inside.”

“Your instincts don’t lie. Shinobi cannot be an impartial force, no matter how hard they try. Our emotions are the most important guide that comes naturally to us.” Neji concluded, “They can never be cut away.”

Neji settled down to sleep and Sai stayed awake as a watch for the night. He would not have gotten any rest anyway. Everything he knew, at least from Neji and Lee’s perspective, was utter horseshit. All along, the emotion-reduction training Sai had underwent in Root, that he had oft suspected of hampering him in some ways…it was most definitely not improving him.

A recovering grouch had confirmed that.
In the first rays of morning light, Neji awoke and saw that Lee was still asleep. The fire had burned down to cinders and Sai was missing. He used his Kekkei Genkai to get a grasp of the forest and spotted the Root ninja a few dozen yards away. Neji silently got to his feet and prowled out into the forest, keeping the Byakugan focused on his suspicious teammate.

He witnessed from afar as Sai crouched down and painted on a scroll, applying chakra, and his drawing of a rat came to life. It hopped off of the paper and squeaked up at its creator. Sai spoke quietly to it and then the rodent was off, scurrying into the twigs and bramble never to be seen again. Sai stood and stowed his tools.

“What were you doing?” Neji asked, coming up from behind him.

Sai smiled, “Just a restroom stop. I’m glad you didn’t arrive any earlier.”

“Hn.” Neji did not call him out on the lie. He returned with Sai to the camp as Lee was stirring. After a hasty morning meal and chugging (in Lee’s case) a canteen of water, the group replenished water stores at a nearby stream and took off once again.

Lee shared more anecdotes with Sai on the way, and by late morning they had arrived at an abandoned quartz quarry. Moss and trees were growing over old divots and tunnels, and at the top of the hill was a wooden cabin encompassed by flowering rhododendron. They chose their footing carefully. Neji reported that the ground beneath their feet had scores of hollowed and collapsed tunnels from the mine. Some areas were unstable and he could pick the safest route with the Byakugan.

After a silly, winding trek they climbed the hilltop and cautiously peeked into the cabin. It was uninhabited and had a table and chairs, a bed, a sink and pantry, and of course, the cork board that Tsunade had described. The map was pinned up as expected. Lee and Neji entered while Sai hesitated at the doorway.

“I’ll keep watch.” Sai volunteered, “You take care of that, Ladyhair.”

Neji slammed the door shut in his face.

He turned on his heel and approached the wall, pulling the rolled-up map from his satchel. Lee took down the pinned map and laid it flat on the table. The boys aligned the paper charts and waited as deep blue marks began to bleed into the top map. After ten minutes no changes occurred and the ink had dried. Neji rolled up Tsunade’s copy and Lee replaced the scout map on the wall, as featureless as it had seemed earlier.

“Maybe we should take a rest?” Lee asked, “We will not see shelter again for at least a day.”

“Never mind shelter. We should be going.” Neji advised.

When he and Lee stepped outside there was a distinct quiet, save for the chirping of crickets and the sparrows nesting in the rhododendron. Wary of the fact that there was no sign of Sai, Neji used his blood limit to survey the area.

“We are not alone here.” Neji reported.

“No? Where is Sai?”

Neji pointed at the excavated ground below, “In that tunnel. I can see him speaking to someone.”

“Perhaps a hermit?” Lee offered.
“No. A correspondent.” Neji determined, “I watched him send his Beast Imitation rat into the woods this morning. He has been communicating with someone and I do not know what for,” He turned to Lee gravely, “But he didn’t want us to know about it. He lied to my face.”

Lee was concerned, “I see…”

“I was right to suspect him.”

“Suspect him of what? What crime can he commit, Neji? You have no evidence!” Lee pointed out.

“The stranger in that mine may want the information we collected.”

“Then why not ambush us for our map sooner and then copy the cabin atlas for himself?” Lee suggested.

“Lee, you have to accept that even if I can’t prove it right now…” He exhaled grimly, “Sai is attempting to sabotage us.”

“If that is so then what do we do next?” Lee asked, “Do we leave him?”

“We confront him.” Neji decided.

Down below in the mine, old portholes and cracks allowed sunlight to pass through and illuminate the tunnel. Sai had followed the main vent all the way to its crossroads with another path and found a man waiting there. He had an impatient look about him. He was dressed in dark grays and wearing a thick flak vest. While he lacked a headband he was most assuredly a shinobi.

“Well?” The man growled.

“Yasuya-san, I didn’t expect you to be here so early.” Sai commented, “Danzo-sama said that you were in the North.”

“I had another tipoff of when to arrive. You’re not the only one in touch with me.” Yasuya sniffed, “Bihokokuni-sama sent me as soon as he learned of this opportunity. Koinyu reported on it as well.”

“I had no idea everyone was so well informed…”

“Because you, Sai, are low on the totem pole.” Yasuya reminded him, “You’re just the delivery boy. Now where are those brats? We need some good bait and we heard that these two will serve nicely.”

“I left them in the cabin.”

“You’re supposed to lure them down here immediately.”

“I sent a lure. An ink beast is on its way to tell them I’m in distress. Neji has the Byakugan, and so he will see that I am not alone down here. He probably already knows what I have been doing. It won’t be long.”

“That’s no good.” Yasuya noted, “I don’t need that kid to be onto us.”

“Even if he is, he is the type who will absolutely confront this situation.” Sai predicted, “We should wait.”

“No. That’s not what I was told to do. If they’re up there, then that’s where I’m going. I smash their heads together and then take them to my master.” Yasuya took a step forward and Sai tensed,
“What? Am I speeding things up a bit too much?” He added darkly, “Are you…trying to buy them time?”

“You could blow everything if you leave now.” Sai warned, “Be patient.”

“Fuck that.” The Rock nukenin snarled, “I won’t blow anything except for when I’m ripping organs out of bodies. No one wastes my time; not even my master. We of his elite guard complete every task early.”

“If someone told me that I might have accommodated you.” Sai countered.

Yasuya smiled and summoned a weapon from a tool scroll, procuring a menacing halberd with a freshly sharpened blade, “I see through you, Sai. I don’t know why…but you’ve flipped. None of Danzo’s pets stall or make excuses to us…but I’ll make sure you’re the last one that does.”

Sai reached for the tanto on his back, “You have no reason to mistrust me. I’ve done exactly what I was told!”

“Maybe you did, but…” Yasuya grinned, “Your face says that you care…and Root isn’t supposed to care.”

While in the tunnel Neji navigated the quickest route with the Byakugan. Lee flanked him closely on the right. After rounding a bend nearly halfway through, an ink beast dog trotted up to them. The boys stopped and evaluated it.

“Maybe…he wants to trick us?” Lee wondered, believing that Neji’s theory was right, “He wants us to go to him!”

“Either way he knows that we will.” Neji observed, “What would be the point of sending this?”

The dog spontaneously sloshed back into a murky puddle. Neji and Lee watched in surprise as the ink spelled out a message on the slate floor:

Get away from here. This man wants to capture you and I will have no part in it.

“Neji!” Lee hollered, “He is a comrade! He warned us of an ambush!”

“He still tried to bait us into one in the first place.”

“He changed his mind!” Lee protested.

“Sai is the one instructing us to leave. We should leave.” Neji retorted, “We have no idea what kind of an enemy we would be up against.”

“But then Sai might-!”

The ringing of metal against metal echoed in the caverns. Lee exchanged another pleading look with his teammate before Neji grunted in frustration. The Hyuga heir then led the way into the dark of the mine.
Vigil

Chapter Soundtrack: "Seven Swords/Battle of Wits" by Kenji Kawai

Neji had taken a hard left off of the main tunnel and Lee followed, shouting his inquiry, "Why are we going this way? Sai must be-!"

"That passage is blocked off. His correspondent used an Earth Jutsu." Neji's Byakugan had noticed the obstacle in advance, "We can detour towards him through this channel."

The boys ran pell-mell through the dusky passageway, up and over a loading dock with empty carts and then exited through a narrow, wooden-framed doorway. The path let out into an enormous cavern with a high ceiling, where all of the tracks for the pushcarts converged.

At the center of the echoing space was Sai, hopping frantically over the rails with his scroll and brush in hand. Ink Beast after Ink Beast was cleaved apart by the double-crossed nukenin, Yasuya, expertly thrusting his halberd. The man had noticed Neji's incoming Air Palm from the corner of his eye and leaped back to avoid it. Sai had his chance to retreat as his teammates arrived.

"So they're gluttons for punishment?" Yasuya sniffed, "I thought you wanted to get them out…but they probably thought they could save your sorry ass." The man laughed in deranged delight, "Three stupid teenagers…it's like my birthday came early!"

Sai hissed at Neji, "I thought you'd be smart enough to read that message. I can't help you at this point!"

"Lee and I are literate." Neji assured him, "But we make our own decisions. If you were left here by yourself your chances of escape would be slim."

Lee had his eyes trained on Yasuya as he stabbed his deadly spear into the ground, freeing his hands for sealing, "He is about to attack!"

Another Earth Jutsu rattled the mine, dislodging sections of the ceiling and walls. Stone slabs careened down over the Leaf ninjas' heads and, unfortunately, had landed with a dusty crash at each of the four exits of the cavern. With every doorway blocked, Neji had to concoct an alternative means of escape while he and Lee dove at Yasuya, keeping him away from Sai. The Root ninja maintained his distance and covered them with Ink Beasts; lion-like, fanged entities that swiped at Yasuya until he split their heads apart with the halberd's steel edge.

Lee was effectively avoiding the spear that was spinning in the nukenin's hands, but Neji found that getting in close for Jyukken would be easier said than done. His opponent quickly interpreted his movements and then swiped with the halberd, countering his efforts. The tip sliced open his right cheek and Neji backed off, figuring he too needed to provide ranged attacks. Lee remained handily untouchable, but could not safely land a physical blow on the opponent.

Sai had relocated quickly, trying to come up from behind Yasuya as he dealt with Neji and Lee's furious combination-battering. He sent out an ink-viper that lunged and successfully wrapped itself around the mighty halberd. Yasuya about-faced and locked his eyes with Sai. The Root ninja understood that his intention was to kill him for his betrayal and hinder the soon-to-be-prisoners from escaping.
Plunging chakra into the halberd, Yasuya made it spring to life. Neji warned Lee to back away as the weapon manifested an unmistakable Fire Nature Transformation. The Ink Beast coiled around the shaft disintegrated in the flames and the nukenin, impervious to the fiery aura, swung the spear and set free a turbulent wave of fire that crashed over Sai. It burned the length of scroll in his hands and knocked it loose, lighting up everything flammable. Sai tumbled into the cave gravel and rolled, putting himself out.

He noted the position of his burned Super Beast Scroll on the floor and then dashed to avoid another flamethrower, drawing his tanto in defense as he sprinted to safety.

Neji was recalculating and giving his thoughts to Lee, "We need to remove that weapon from this battle. We won't be able to deal with it."

"What do you suggest?"

"I'm arming you." Neji informed him whilst summoning a set of nunchaku from the tool scroll, "Disarm him. When he's unguarded I'll attack."

Lee caught the threshing-chain that was tossed to him and he took off with the speed of the Second Gate, opened for some added swiftness. Sai dove in with him and was quickly scared off by the wheel of fire, and Lee had to dodge with ludicrous bends and leaps to avoid Yasuya's assaults. He could smell his hair and clothes beginning to crisp.

"You wanna go Caterpillar Face?" Yasuya roared; clashing his weapon against Lee's with a resounding ring.

Sai remarked from Neji's left, "I did not think of that one…"

Neji threatened to drown him for the comment and then launched a distant, nature-less Air Palm at Yasuya as Lee somersaulted away from a jousting thrust of the spear. Lee was too close for Neji to risk Wind Release, knowing that it would mince Lee like an onion if he was hit with it. The blast of chakra landed, knocking the man back, but he had weathered the blow with unusual sturdiness as he skidded on his feet, growling in annoyance. Neji was hastily deducing that this man had stamina and reserves that dwarfed an average shinobi's.

Lee's skin was red from the opening of the Third Gate and he rushed around Yasuya like a gymnast, the sound of the nunchaku clanging against the enemy halberd resonated sharply off the walls. An eruption of fire forced him to retreat, and Lee put enough distance between himself and the hulking nukenin so he could concentrate on his next Inner Gate.

Neji took a more assertive role, hazarding the blasts of fire and rotated to avoid the smoldering assaults. In-between Yasuya's strikes Neji employed Baguazhang, defending himself in small circles as a spearhead was prodded at him. With the Byakugan, Neji could see that both Lee and Sai were a safe distance away, and so a burst attack could cripple the enemy in that moment.

He rotated again, combining his chakra with his Wind Nature, and let the horrific, ripping twister of energy sweep over Yasuya as if he were a hapless tumbleweed. But the man roared with laughter, countering with his weapon and then let his Fire Nature halberd absorb the Wind Nature. Abruptly, Neji's technique drained and he had a single second to evacuate as the tidal wave of empowered flames coursed up to the height of the ceiling and down again, filling the cavern.

Neji witnessed Sai retreat into the adjacent ditch as Neji had to fling himself into a crevasse to avoid incineration. Lee, far off in a high corner of the cave on a stone pillar, had boosted himself to Five Gates. Then, in a flash, he had deserted the perch.
He exploded up from beneath Yasuya's chin, skirting his guard entirely, and his uppercut impacted the nukenin's jaw, hurling him vertically into an iron support beam above. Oddly, the destructive attack only dizzied him, and before Neji could believe his lying eyes (as he climbed from shelter) Yasuya was trying once again to fry Lee. He was by then much too slow to catch him, but Lee's nunchaku whirled defensively until another opening cropped up.

The threshing chain snagged the pole of the spear in the brief absence of heat, and Lee heaved, wrenching the halberd free with his nunchaku as both weapons soared through the cave, fell, and then stuck into the ground. With a cry, Lee wrought Taijutsu fury on his unarmed opponent the likes of which Sai had never beheld. Neji positioned himself to assist in the finisher.

Glowing green, Lee burst into the air with his bellowing enemy; using blows that he was certain had been made stronger by his grandfather's lessons. At the zenith of the climb, Lee lashed down with a comet-kick that sent Yasuya to meet the earth…straight into Neji's whirling Wind Release Rotation below.

The man was cut apart. His severed left arm plopped down beside the Root ninja. Half of a foot landed elsewhere. Sai couldn't help a disgusted gasp from where he was salvaging his charred scroll, observing as Neji was splattered with blood from head to toe. Lee had landed with his Gates safely shut, and was catching his breath on the rail cart tracks.

Yasuya's body was akimbo on the floor. The three Leaf ninja breathed in the echoing quiet of the cave, relieved that the ordeal had come to an end. Sai had carefully unwound the last bit of parchment in the Super Beat Scroll. There was precious little space he could work with; maybe one last drawing if necessary. He would need to replace it after returning home, and then maybe consider carrying spares for the future.

A grunt of pain startled all of the recovering shinobi.

Mostly intact but lacerated beyond mortal coping, Yasuya pushed himself up to his knees, shaking with rage.

"You think I'd let...amateurs like you...humiliate me?" The man snarled.

Meters away from the near-corpse, Lee sat paralyzed in terror. His body was still struggling to fight through the pain of the Inner Gates recoil. Yasuya was between him and his teammates, and the nukenin had eyed him like prey as soon as he had staggered to his feet. What was worse…the halberd was a few steps away from Yasuya's reach.

Panicked, Sai elected to let his last drawing be an ink-bird. Escape was the wisest choice at that point, he thought with a pounding heart.

Neji watched in stunned amazement as Yasuya breathed fire, cauterizing his wounds and stubbed arm. He was un concern ted with the pain. Neji found it difficult to comprehend what kind of unstoppable resistance the enemy possessed. He had determined that the Fire Nature Transformation they had fought against was not contained in the spear; it had been inside the nukenin all along. He had funneled it through his weapon, as Neji realized all too late.

Yasuya charged while picking the halberd up along the way, and pounced on Lee who cried out, commanding his body to dodge. The metal spear tip came down and Lee rolled, avoiding a fatal stab, but had the back of his left hip sliced. His body was too shocked to allow him to stand. Lee somersaulted again, avoiding another jab, and then was pinned in the upper arm when Yasuya's blade caught up with him. A fraction of a second before fire could be employed; Neji's timely Air Palm blasted the nukenin from behind.
Yasuya soared into the nearest wall front-first with a rock-crunching smash. Neji rushed over to his teammate and hoisted him up, "Are you alright?"

"Yes, but how is he moving?" Lee was aghast, "Anyone else would be dead!"

Neji had figured that part out. He assisted Lee in hobbling towards Sai, who was waiting with a Beast Imitation eagle. He handed the wounded young man off to the Root ninja, who compliantly pushed him onto the back of the bird. Yasuya was stirring with a hell-raising roar in the background.

"It's time to leave. I'll fly us out of here." Sai offered, adding glumly, "But I had no idea that this person would be so stubborn…"

"There's a lot that you don't know, Sai. You don't know your comrades and you are an even poorer judge of your adversaries." Neji hissed, "You should pay dearly for this. For putting Lee in jeopardy…I should kill you." He turned and looked up at the stone ceiling, "But I will spare you this time. You need to get him out."

Bending at the knees and taking aim, Neji shot a robust Air Palm at the roof, shattering a hole in the top of the cavern. A placid blue sky shone through the circular opening and Sai took the hint. He joined Lee on the back of the eagle and then the ink-bird took flight.

Worried, Lee called, "You should be leaving too, Neji! Why must-?"

"I will be just behind you." Radiant with angry resolve, Neji faced the nukenin who was upright again, "This one needs to learn that I am no amateur."

Lee's shout of protest faded as he and Sai rose higher, away from the confrontation. Neji stared at the battle-scarred man who was entirely consumed with fury at that point.

"I'll just tell my master that I couldn't help killing you all. Accidents happen." Yasuya sneered, "Your bodies might fetch a price with your hag Hokage if we can't make a living purchase!"

Neji dashed towards him and came as close as he dared. Yasuya was clumsier with his weapon now that is was being brandished with one hand, and the Hyuga heir's evasion, which had been honed non-stop for weeks, frustrated the nukenin to the point of profanity. Eventually, one Jyukken strike connected and Yasuya seemed to absorb it, much like he had earlier blows.

Unrelenting, he swung the halberd down at Neji and cut his hair tie. In a splay of hair, Neji whirled, balanced, his center of gravity low, and effectively avoided the weapon. Fire began to filter into the surrounding air.

Boldly, Neji caught the spear with two hands in an attempt to wrestle it free. Yasuya spat in his face, called him a superlative pussy, and then promptly received a close quarters Wushu high-kick in the face that Neji had never been flexible enough for, save for that instance. Reeling, Yasuya's grip loosened. A cloud of fire had enveloped the two of them, but Neji had taken control of the halberd as it slipped from Yasuya's hand.

He plunged his Wind Nature into the weapon not with the intention of channeling it; Neji overloaded the spear and hacked it into pieces with his cutting chakra. It fell to the floor in segments and he stepped backwards gracefully as Yasuya took a swing at his face with his remaining fist. Neji dodged as if he had turned into dandelion tufts, waltzing in wind.

Changing his strategy, Yasuya backed up and inhaled deeply. He planned to exhale a plume of fiery chaos that could disgrace the Grand Fireball Jutsu. But the twerp of a clan prince who he had mockingly likened to genitalia was stooped low, his arms held diagonally to measure his field of divination. He was too fast.

Neji launched into Yasuya, assaulting tenketsu like a hurricane. Reaching his defensive limit, Yasuya's body could take no more, and the man was finally affected. With a burp, Yasuya's Fire Transformation puttered away without exiting his mouth, and he turned into moldable dough as Neji struck. Without hope of countering, the nukenin was subjected to 64 closed chakra points within two blinks, but the young Leaf ninja hadn't stopped there.

He shut 128 points and then took a step back, narrowing his eyes, and then shot a point-blank Wind Release: Air Palm at the flailing man. Yasuya was hurtled back and lost his legs and head during the attack. His disassembled parts scattered over the rail cart tracks.

The force of the technique had knocked Neji off his own feet, and he landed in the gravel on his backside. Tired, he fell flat on his back and looked up at the hole in the ceiling. He took a few slow and deep breaths, finally detecting how his muscles were screaming for oxygen. He had not noticed it earlier. All that had mattered was stopping the nukenin from pursuing his team. His hands trembled slightly while he rested on the ground. A bit of adrenalin was still taking effect.

After a long silence, a voice echoed down from the escape hatch, "Neji?" It was Lee.

"I finished it, Lee." He called back up, exhausted.

"Thank goodness! Do you need assistance?"

Neji snorted. He did need a bit of help getting out of the godforsaken; blood-and-limb peppered mine they had been trapped in.

"Yes. Tell that imbecile to send his bird down here."

The flight home was awkward. Beast Imitation birds, they had learned, only comfortably seated two people. Three was a bit of a squeeze. Yet all had agreed they were too exhausted to make the trip by foot, and so they had made due.

While coasting over tree tops, Neji slathered some of his cousin's healing ointment on Lee's wounds. Sai had a cut or two on him, but Neji refused to share with the traitor. He was in a very bad mood. He had dried blood all over his skin and clothes, even in his hair. The battle with their would-be kidnapper had been horrific and violent. What was supposed to be a simple mission had turned into a fiasco and Neji was not about to forgive Sai, even if he had prevented a worse fate for them.

Lee asked Neji if he had remembered to pick up the nunchaku that had been discarded on the cave floor. Neji assured him that he had retrieved it. They shared the last of their water stores and sat soundlessly for a while. Just a little paranoid, Neji checked their surroundings with the Byakugan every ten minutes or so. It looked to be clear.

"I made a mistake." Sai noted softly.

"Everyone makes mistakes." Lee consoled him.

"No. I should have handed you over. I never should have wavered." Sai concluded, "I failed my mission."

"Do you realize I could push you?" Neji said through gritted teeth, "I can no longer come up with a reason not to snap your neck."

"Neither of you can see the big picture. Your capture would have been in exchange for a truce. It would have offered Konoha protection." Sai elaborated.

Lee frowned, "Truly? Why was the Hokage not informed?"

"Danzo-sama says the Hokage is too weak to make such a decision. Village Leaders always fall short when it comes to securing the safety of their people. They always fail."

"In case you have forgotten, Lee and I are people of Hidden Leaf." Neji retorted.

"Sacrifices are sometimes needed. The well-being of the majority is always more important than that of the few." Sai quoted a Root lesson.

"Be that as it may, you are just as much of a failure as the Hokage, then, with respect to protecting Konoha. You couldn't go through with it." Neji snarled, "You are an embarrassment to your organization and also to our village. You too lack the ability to defend the lives of everyone in Leaf. Sacrifice is never justified."

Sai was silent.

"What I do not understand is…why did you falter?" Lee asked, "What made you warn us of the ambush?"

"I…" Sai trailed off, "I…for a brief time…forgot about the greater good." He shut his eyes, "I was tempted by your stories. The way you were close to each other…it was like me and my brother. I should not have given in."

"Your sense of the Greater Good is completely warped." The Hyuga scolded.

"I am sorry about your brother." Lee was still too compassionate to be angry, "Was he in Root as well?"

"He was."

"The Hokage values lives; all of our lives. Seeing that your senior officer did not respect ours speaks volumes for his intentions in this village. If he could justify it, he would probably sacrifice every life in Konohagakure if he found a good enough reason. Someone who is given an inch sees fit to take a mile." Neji warned, "Sai…if you want to believe that a successful trade would have helped Leaf…you would only be lying to yourself."

"Part of me…accepts that fact." His voice was small, "But it was a command. As a shinobi I must obey."

"We do not always obey." Lee remarked, glancing sidelong to Neji.

Neji grunted at him.

"Shinobi who cannot follow orders are failures. They dishonor everything they stand for."

"On occasion…" Neji looked ahead at the unending forest, "Doing the opposite of what you are told…is the only way to honor what you stand for."

Lee nodded and Sai did not speak. The conversation lulled after that and there was the singular sound of the rushing wind as they flew over the wilds of the Fire Country.

Neji could feel the cut on his cheek beginning to scab. He ignored it and tried to relax while he was pressed shoulder to shoulder with Lee. Late afternoon was hastening.

Within a few miles of the Leaf Village, Sai finally verbalized, "I'm sorry."

"Good. You owed us that." Neji rumbled.

"I had to think more. Putting aside how I feel, which is much more than I should be able to..." Sai observed, "The village would have been less safe if you had been removed from it. Regarding the overall picture and not my orders...I may have done the right thing."

Lee smiled, "Thank you, Sai."

"Don't thank me. No one should." His shoulders sagged, "I must still take responsibility for botching the truce exchange. I will be disciplined."

"How does Root punish insubordination?" Neji asked.

Sai said nothing.

"If it is a severe consequence then we should inform the Hokage. Tsunade-sama will be able to help you." Lee speculated.

"No. I already told you," Sai shook his head, "The Hokage can never protect everyone; someone in my position least of all."

The next day at exactly 1:05 in the afternoon, Neji was walking to a hang-out. He had promised Lee that he would. While he made his way down an unpopulated side street, Neji could not help but remember what had happened after they had landed in Leaf after their mission.

Sai had been eerily quiet. Neji could tell that the young man was steeling himself for some kind of torture or beating as penance for his actions. The three had entered the administrative building together and on the landing of the third floor Gai greeted them in a booming voice. He and Lee traded pleasantries and then roped Neji closer, commenting that a change of clothes was in order. The blood was unfashionable.

When Neji turned around Sai was gone. It was a hair-raising moment as he and Lee gazed at the empty space near the stairwell, both guessing that Sai had been retrieved by Root counterparts. Gai asked them what the matter was and they couldn't properly reply.

In the office, Neji handed Tsunade her map and she jubilantly thanked him. She blinked in confusion and asked where their third-wheel had gone.

"He may have been reclaimed by the Foundation." Lee supposed.

"They jumped the gun with that." Tsunade stated, apparently not hung up about it.

She debriefed with Neji and Lee while Gai waited in the hallway. Neji had carefully recapped details about the fight in the mine, stressing that Sai had orders to hand them off. In tense silence, Tsunade pressed her lips to her folded hands, considering the treachery and what motivated it. Of course
Danzo would gladly exchange Genin for the promise of an armistice with Leaf's enemies, and of course he wouldn't give her a head's up about it.

She wanted to schedule a flogging for the old man, but Neji snapped her out of her fantasy.

"Sai may be in danger." Neji reiterated, "He suggested that his disobedience won't be received well. Is there anything you can do about it, Hokage-sama?"

Tsunade's ears picked up on the fact that Neji sounded genuinely concerned.

"I don't know." She admitted, "The most stalwart subsidiary in the history of this village has him and can legally do with Sai as they see fit." Tsunade added with a tiny smirk, "I have an idea though."

Lee and Neji looked at her expectantly and she frowned at them, "Enough. The ball is in my court now, boys. You need to stay out of it." As an afterthought she added, "And I am relieved that you were not needlessly dropped into the hands of the enemy. That would have ruined my whole week."

Lee seemed pleased with the announcement until he realized she planned to grieve for about seven days. Tsunade asked Lee how his wounds were on a scale of one to ten. He gave them a two (thanks to the ointment) and she nodded. "Go home now and rest, please. I will do what I can." She assuaged them.

They did just that.

The very next morning, Lee had gotten an invitation from their cohort to spend some time. He had contended that Neji was mentally fortified to visit friends now. They told Gai of their intentions to take the day off, which he lauded, and then the pair dropped by Lee's house.

Wong Leung forbade a day off…at least in entirety. They would complete their training before doing anything for diversion. Reluctantly, they agreed and took a few laps around the village.

The routine was switched up a little. When they returned Wong had them follow in a line behind him doing high-kicks while traversing stone steps near a garden. It wasn't making their rundown legs or muscles feel great. Immediately after the kicking-march, he had them doing splits in the grass while the sun rose. Once or twice Wong pushed down on Neji's shoulders, and the Hyuga heir refused to acknowledge how his groin muscles had possibly ripped apart. A bead of sweat rolled down the side of his face.

Then, instead of doing any incredible feats of balance as they typically did, Wong stood in the yard and took a stance.

We're going to do forms together, just like how I drilled my students back at home. Lee, make sure he keeps up. Do exactly as I do.

Yes, Grandpa! Lee turned to his teammate, "We will copy his forms now."

Without complaint, they mimicked the old man's movements which were sharp and precise. When either of them occasionally lagged Wong would stop and slap them, usually on the back of the head. Then he would resume. He threatened to bring out a switch he kept in his closet if they didn't get it right.

And then they were free shortly after noon. Lee and Neji cleaned up but did not change out of their Wong-designated uniforms. Thus, by 1:00, Neji was making his way to the meeting place.

While he had never been there before, Lee had described a picnicking area beneath cherry trees as the location they would meet with friends. Neji could navigate. After rounding the corner and (through a window) ignoring Kakashi looting the shelves of a bookshop for new volumes, Neji spotted Lee near the blooming grove. He was seated at a table beside Chouji and Shikamaru. Across from them, Sato was holding a photo up to Shino's face and critiquing it.

He came within a few feet before the group hooted and welcomed him. Well, Shino said nothing, but that was to be expected. Sato moved over to give him a spot, smiling widely, "Hey! We weren't sure if you would really show up!"

Neji took a seat, "I had no excuse."

"Apart from being antisocial." Sato reminded him.

"Apart from that." He sniffed.

Sitting next to Sato could potentially turn this into a button-pushing extravaganza. If all else failed he could pinch a nerve in the Hatake's neck and put him to sleep.

"We heard that you and Lee had a crazy mission." Chouji offered a more suitable subject, "He just started talking about it, actually."

"Yes! We had a substitute join us." Lee announced, "His name was Sai."

With his head propped up on a hand, Shikamaru inquired, "That was probably weird. What was he like?"

"Artistic." Lee supplied.

"Ignorant. Sociopathic." Neji added.

Lee then recalled, "Oh! And obnoxious, traitorous, and very rude."

The boys stared at them in hushed shock.

"Cool." Chouji said at length.

"Tenten may have been preferable." Shikamaru gathered.

"Right, five thousand times more preferable." Lee agreed. Neji nodded in gloomy silence.

"Tama visited her the other day. She said that Tenten's working hard and…dressing more mature…" Sato had gotten the attention of the subject's teammates, "All of the girls are doing that these days. They're becoming magnetic."

"By that do you mean…the kunoichi are expressing magnetic fields?" Lee furrowed his thick brows, prepared to be astonished.

"No, Lee," Shikamaru sighed, "He means that our women are becoming more attractive."

Shino finally spoke, "The term 'our women' is an objectification of our intellectual and physical equals. Correct yourself."

"Jeez, excuse me…" The Nara flashed his eyes sarcastically, "I meant our esteemed female colleagues." He added just for annoyance, "They're hot."

"He meant it in a fond, non-offensive way." Chouji defended his friend, "But Shino's still right."
"Alright already. I got it."

"It's fine. After all, we're the ones dating them. I'm sure they refer to us as their menfolk." Sato postulated.

"Well, only you and Shikamaru are dating anyone." Chouji pointed out, "Naruto's team are the guys in relationships, mostly."

"Oh yeah." Sato conceded sunnily. His face resembled the thousand-yard stare of a Shiba Inu, unaware and pettable.

"To be honest, Sato barely qualifies. You should only count me." Shikamaru recommended, "He's engaged. That's a different situation."

"Is it? I take Tama out and get to know her and all that!" Sato puffed up, "You're the one who's too comfy on his ass to take Ino on a date."

"We have indoor dates."

"We all know what that means." Sato responded with an eye roll.

"Yeah? What does it mean?"

Mercifully, Lee had covered Chouji's ears so he wouldn't be subjected to any unwanted visuals or facts.

The Hatake slammed his hand on the table, his expression deadly serious, "It's something only men in my position should consider. Not even!" He gestured to his teammate, "Shino, tell him."

Disassociating, Neji sat and imagined that he had achieved a higher level of consciousness, completely forsaking the boyfriend banter.

"Intimacy should be reserved for marriage." Shino supplied, "That is what Father says."

"Is it safe yet?" Chouji asked, still deaf.

Lee held the Akimichi's head and shook it 'no' indicating he could not yet be set free.

"Maybe so, but it's not like we can turn back time. Ino solicits me more than I solicit her."

"That's a dirty lie." Sato insisted.

"No. You just wish it was." Shikamaru jabbed, "You wouldn't know the first thing about it, Sato. You've never had the thrill of the chase. Never will."

Sato stood, pushing back the bench, "You wanna go there, huh? I bet your chase is like how flowers get it on. You need a go-between, you lazy polyp!"

"Do not slander the precious pollinators of nature." Shino warned, "You are perverting their reputation."

"That is quite enough." Lee cut in, "We shall now talk about something else." He freed Chouji who was happily clueless about the current topic.

Lee turned to his teammate, "Neji?"
The Hyuga gradually slipped back from enlightenment, "What?"

"You have not said anything."

"Should I have? The subject matter is terribly lacking so far."

"What were we talking about?" Shikamaru quizzed him.

"Magnetism." Neji guessed.

"That's about as far as I got." Chouji concurred.

Sato grinned, "You can't pretend like you're above all of this, Neji…"

Lee mouthed to the Hatake, No, please don't.

"Even you think about women and their charms at times." Sato pressed on.

"I have better things to think about."

"As men, we all do. You can't deny it!"

"I can't deny something that doesn't occur."

"You have the Byakugan!" Sato brought his fists down on the table, "You get to look for free!"

Turning his face to scowl at the silver haired boy, Neji replied, "Try to imagine someone who has seen and manipulated countless bodies in various stages of disrobe, particularly during battle." He then said, "Now try to imagine that person is me. Did that help you?"

"You're a bastard." Sato accused him, "There's no use in pretending! We know that you want Tenten and-"

Everyone at the table jumped up in alarm when Neji poked a pressure point in Sato's neck and the boy cascaded down to the ground, unconscious.

There was a full thirty seconds of wordless concern before they all sat down again. Shino had positioned Sato to be comfortable and completely supine in the grass.

"That is better." Shikamaru acknowledged.

"Where does everyone want to go to lunch?" Chouji asked.

No one really had a preference and so they agreed that Yakiniku Q would do fine. Moments later, Kiba had stopped in between two flowering cherry blossom trees, taking in the sight of the gathering. Confusion glanced across his face upon spotting Sato, but then he shrugged and approached his friends. Akamaru stopped beside Sato and sniffed him.

"Kiba! You showed up just in time! Want to go to lunch with us?" Chouji extended the invitation.

"Uh, sure." The wild-haired nin asked, "What about Doofus down there?"

"That's up to Shino." Shikamaru declared.

All eyes went to the hooded Aburame, who deliberated briefly, "We can leave him. Neji's maneuver should allow him to wake up within an hour."
"Great." Kiba was pleased.

"There's no way that we couldn't have found out, and sorry to bring it up, but," Shikamaru gave a sympathetic look to the Inuzuka, "Sorry about what happened to you. I won't pretend to know how you feel."

All gathered gave their sympathy and Kiba waved it off, "It's fine. I know I should be traumatized or something like that…but I'm adjusted. It won't kill me. There's a tracking team looking for my dad now." He patted Akamaru's head, "So…are we going to lunch or what?"

And they happily left Sato beneath a picnic bench.

A few hours later at the Hyuga estate, Hinata was hanging potted plants from rafters on the porch of the house. Ino and Sakura were assisting, holding a footstool steady and handing the next suspension respectively. Springtime called for festive decorations and Hiashi had not objected.

While chatting and cooperating, the girls had been able to complete the entire surrounding walk of the estate. Ino jumped in surprise a few times when Hinata willed jets of water up from a watering can and into the suspended flowers.

"You scare me when you do that!"

"I-I'm sorry!"

"No, its fine, I just…" Ino flipped her hair out of her eyes, "Would appreciate a little warning…"

"I think it's brilliant." Sakura grinned.

"It is brilliant, but she can shoot it right past my face!"

"I will warn you next time, Ino-chan."

"How did you learn how to do that, Hinata?" Sakura wondered.

"I've been practicing for a long time. I was able to manipulate water since shortly after the last Chunin Exam." She explained, fastening a hook, "The Hyuga clan has tools that help us learn about our Nature Transformations. Father is quite good at it."

"Runs in the family." Ino noted.

"It does. Though…I am not good at adding my Nature to other techniques yet. Father is still trying to encourage me to use Eight Trigrams Air Palm…but it's very tricky."

"You'll get the hang of it! You still have plenty of time before the Exam." Sakura bolstered her.

"Thank you, Sakura-chan."

"Asuma-sensei said we won't get into learning about Chakra Natures until after we're Chunin." Ino grumbled, positioning the stool for the next beam, "It was a letdown."

Sakura nodded, "Yeah, Kakashi-sensei said the same thing…only Tama expresses her Nature easily so he spoke to her about it. He suggested that it would take too long to demonstrate it to me and Kiba."
"They play favorites, I tell you!"

"It is hard work and it takes hours of practice." Hinata reminded them, "To harness that ability quickly someone would have to be a…"

Footsteps sounded over the gravel beside the porch. The girls turned and observed as Neji passed by, eyeing the fresh, decorative flowers that had been hung. There was an infinitesimal smile on his face as he approached them.

He came to a halt near his cousin and her friends, "Our grounds look exponentially better, Hinata-sama."

"Niisan! I am glad you think so!"

He acknowledged the other kunoichi, "Sakura. Ino."

"That's some outfit you have on there." Ino marked, taken aback by the black, collared clasp-tie, sleeveless shirt. She could not award points for the simple black pants, but the Han slippers were a daring, unconventional choice. Her fashion meter settled on an eight. Eight-and-a-half, really, because both of his arms were wrapped in tape up to elbow. It looked like Neji could kill someone with his pinky.

"It is attire that Lee's grandfather makes us wear."

Hinata giggled quietly, aware of the arrangement.

"Yeah, I saw Lee the other day wearing clothes like that." Sakura recalled, "Are you two getting along okay?"

"We're fine. We finished lunch a short while ago."

She smiled, "Good! I know it can't be easy for you and Lee."

Ino handed another potted plant to Hinata, who was still going about her task.

"You all…spend time with Tenten?" Neji inquired.

A small, excited jolt shot through the girls simultaneously.

"Almost every day." Ino claimed.

"How is she?" His voice had a near imperceptible edge of desperation in it.

"She's fun. I try to hang out with her whenever Shishou sets me free!" Sakura was jovial, "Ino and Hinata keep an eye open for her so we can catch her before training."

Neji's ears perked up at the word training. Before he could ask, Ino completed the thought, "She is learning jutsu from Gekko Hayate. He was an apprentice to her dad a long time ago. They don't like each other very much."

Neji closed his mouth and nodded, digesting the news.

"One other thing." Ino added, "She's miserable."

Hinata and Sakura gave the blonde girl unappreciative looks. That information wasn't going to make Neji feel like this was a worthwhile conversation. At least, that's what they feared.
Neji was listening.

"We're looking after her and that probably helps a bit. When we talk about you and Lee sometimes she gets antsy." She smiled, "She'll hold on. Just keep thinking about her."

In a deep and sincere voice he thanked Ino for her honesty. Neji continued on after a curt farewell and, unknown to them, contemplated another forbidden trip downtown soon. If the ANBU agent was still on the prowl after two weeks, Neji thought, he deserved a medal for his service. He highly doubted it.

When he had entered the Main House the girls picked their conversation up again.

"He's tough enough. I just got the feeling he would prefer the truth." Ino shrugged, "If anything, knowing that Tenten is unhappy will motivate him to do something about it."

Hinata smiled uncertainly, "Neji-niisan could get in trouble for it."

"I know! That's the point." Ino brushed loose petals from her skirt, "It'll make for a great story later when your Dad bails him out of jail, or when I can take credit for the ensuing, whirlwind romance."

Sakura warned, "You are entering delusional territory."

"Let me stay there. I'm not hurting anyone."

"Not yet." The pink haired girl folded her hands and chuckled, "But did you see the size of those arms?"

"Niisan works hard so his heart aches less." Hinata provided her evaluation.

"I've got to admit, they are above satisfactory." Ino nodded thoughtfully, "But how do they compare, Sakura? Can Gaara's arms bust measuring tape too?"

"I don't know. He wears long sleeves." She grinned mischievously, "I'll get back to you on that."

Hinata was blushing, pointedly trying not to bring up Naruto's arms. She imagined they would be perfect for embracing her, but she would only let her thoughts go so far. Her friends assisted her with putting up the last plant before they were greeted by other members of the Hyuga clan.

Fujita and his mother poked their heads out of a ground-level window, catching Hinata's attention, "Good work, Son! You found her. Hinata-sama, my sweet. Come here please."

Hinata hopped down from the stool and joined them at the open window, "Kayato-san! Fujita-kun! Will you join us for dinner tonight?"

Fujita's mother was sprightly and beautiful; her black hair was streaked with gray on the sides. She was holding her son's shoulders affectionately while she spoke. Fujita complied happily.

"I'm afraid we can't, dear. I wanted to share some news with you, before any of the older generation do." Kayato warned, lowering her voice, "Another suitor will be stopping by tomorrow to call on you. I will prepare you a kimono. I asked Hide-chan if there's an end in sight and he believes that no one else will come by to bother you after this."

"Finally!" Ino breathed, "If I fill one more flower order I'll have to start denying service."
"Alright." Hinata wasn't entirely enthusiastic about the update, "Thank you for telling me."

"Not at all!" The woman smiled, "And I heard the elders say this one is under thirty."

As the sun sank lower in the sky that day, across the wastes and fields and gnarled woods beyond the Fire Country, there was stirring in the gloom. Concealed by illusions and seals, a battered storm door on the forest floor was only accessible to adherents of Orochimaru.

Knowing that he wasn't the snake Sennin's favorite person at the moment, Koinyu entered cautiously.

He had only followed half the length of the torch-lined hallway before a voice came from behind him, "That's far enough."

The man turned slowly, supposing that Orochimaru had slipped through a crack in the wall to startle him…or he had just exited a known restroom on the right. Either way, the white-faced man looked peeved.

"Orochimaru-sama. Bi-sama sends his regards."

"Delightful. I suppose I should give condolences for your fallen brother-in-arms, but I hardly knew him. I've heard he's resting in pieces."

Koinyu shut his eyes and smiled, liking the dark humor.

"You did not turn much of a profit for me, other than filling empty cells in the hold." Orochimaru considered, "And I am not going to thank you for tagging Haku-kun. It quite obviously didn't work."

"That just goes to show what a crafty young man you'll inhabit in the future."

The snake smiled, "Maybe it does. He'll be a better investment in a few more years, I expect. But for now, I imagine you are here to learn how to enter Konohagakure."

"Precisely."

Orochimaru turned in the opposite direction and began walking. Koinyu followed as the sennin explained, "This will be my last effort in helping you. Should you or your master need further assistance," His slitted eyes were intense, "I expect substantial compensation."

The violet haired man nodded coolly.

"There are three entrances particularly good for avoiding the village barrier that the Sensory Corps uses to detect intruders." He was smug, "I made them myself. I am sure at least one of them has been tapped and is watched by Black Ops, but the other two…are undiscovered."

Orochimaru gave details about the secret routes Koinyu had been waiting for. He was also informed that Danzo used these passages from time to time and that it would be wise to either involve Root in their machinations (so there would be no surprise encounters) or avoid the organization altogether. Danzo had a habit of conveniently flip-flopping sides when a cause was deemed "in the village's best interest." Bi's commune might find that front to be a crapshoot.

The two rabbled on as men are wont to do when scheming, and some time went by before Koinyu passed Sasuke silently in the hallway, travelling in the opposite direction. A red haired girl was keeping pace with the Uchiha clan survivor, trying to stimulate conversation. It wasn't going well.

"Karin." Orochimaru called out to the kunoichi, "I'd like to have a word with you."

Koinyu and Sasuke had disappeared into darkness on opposite sides of the corridor. The redheaded girl frowned but compliantly went to Orochimaru's side near an open doorway.

"Yes, Orochimaru-sama?"

"Are you pestering Sasuke-kun again?"

"Why, of course not," She smiled, "We were having a discussion."

"About what?"

"His tastes." Karin jested.

"Hm." The snake sennin tucked his hand under his chin, "An intriguing topic. I didn't hear much input coming from him."

The girl just kept smiling.

"I want you to be aware that you'll be transferring to the Southern Hideout. My previous warden there was a disappointment…and I expect that you can keep prisoners and experiments on schedule." He dropped a bomb on her, ignoring her shocked expression, "You will be assigned there permanently."

"I…" Karin gaped like a fish before getting a hold of herself, "I see."

"You leave tomorrow." Orochimaru added sweetly.

Karin did have an unhealthy, vast respect of the Snake Sennin, and though she wanted to, she would not object to such an order. She had almost always been treated fairly while in Orochimaru's care, and she was not about to squander his good graces.

"I will, Sir. I will contact you when I arrive there and get things in order."

"Excellent." He carried on down the hall after Sasuke. It would deter the girl from following.

At the top of the stairs within an atrium, Orochimaru set free a small white snake, commanding, "Keep an eye on that boy."

He had attempted to pass by the experimentation lab without being noticed, but Sasuke could hear Suigetsu's voice calling after him.

"Don't be a dick! Come over here and talk to me!"

On a whim, he turned back to waste time in the lab. Sasuke came to a stop in front of a holding tank. The white haired young man was partially liquefied and suspended in water. His face remained visible and cheeky while his trunk and limbs were transparent.

"Well now, thank you for stopping by!"
"What do you want?" Sasuke's tone lacked amusement.

"I've seen you pass this place a lot lately, probably on your way down to the rest quarters, huh?" Suigetsu observed, "You know what else I see going that way?"

"What?"

Suigetsu grinned, "Kitties."

He arched an eyebrow, "Your point?"

"I don't think it's coincidence that those ninja cats are gathering here more often... when there are much better places to be than this dump." He held his chin with a partially dissolved hand, "You, sir, are collecting information."

"Why would that matter to you?"

"Heh! I get bored! I notice shit! Who are you getting dirt on?" Suigetsu smiled, "Need to off someone? Maybe one or two?"

With folded arms, Sasuke turned and walked back towards the lab entrance.

Suigetsu's voice warned him, "Don't think he won't notice. I won't tell Orochimaru...but you don't take great care in hiding your intentions, Sasuke."

He looked over his shoulder, "Suigetsu."

"Yeah?"

"They never let you out of that tank, do they?"

"Never." He bared his sharp teeth, "Assholes."

"So you're swimming in your own waste?"

"Pretty much." He confirmed, "It's quite cruel. This water only gets flushed twice a day." He added longingly, "I can't wait to kill those attendants when I get out of here."

And without further ado Sasuke departed, continuing his journey down the dim corridor.

It turned out that Suigetsu was one-hundred-percent correct in his assessment. The ninja cats belonged to a weapon and accessory supplier of the late Uchiha clan, an old hermit woman named Nekobaa. As a favor to Sasuke, the speech-capable felines Denka and Hina had been discreetly doing reconnaissance in the Wind Country...for several months.

Sasuke had not wanted to believe what Kiba had told him during their escapade in the Lightning Country. Likewise, he dreaded any confirmation of it. Sure enough, Orochimaru had one day sniggered at the thought of Gaara becoming the Fifth Kazekage (proving Kiba's statement true), and, consequently, Sasuke's silent, spiraling rage had splintered his goal into two new objectives.

'Become strong enough to kill Itachi' was still at the forefront of his mind, but Sasuke had added Gaara's inexplicable and quiet demise to the list as well. And, to the surprise of his two cooperating cat friends, he planned to murder the Kazekage first. He was confident it could be done.

He already had three solid months of intelligence.
This rendezvous with Denka and Hina served only as a check-in that Gaara was still in Hidden Sand and would be staying put. Recently, Gaara had made an unexpected trip to the Tide Village when a crisis with the Shin clan erupted, Hina reported. The same Shin clan Sasuke had decimated before their flight from the Rice Country. Go figure.

He met with the cats in a lounge with rectangular sofas. They meowed happily when he arrived.

"Sasuke-kun! Did you bring us treats?"

"Yeah! Did ya?"

"No." With a frown he admitted, "But in the north wing kitchen someone left jerky out."

"Woo!" The cats were thrilled.

"Now tell me," Sasuke's eyes were narrow, "When's the best time?"

"Tonight is perfect. That redhead napper is taking it easy at home! He sent his sister to work on his Training Program." Denka conveyed the state of affairs, "He works hard and it tires him out."

"Typical bed time of target is 10:50pm." Hina added, "Asleep by 11:02pm."

He didn't ask how the cat had determined that statistic, "He doesn't have to be asleep. He just needs to be alone."

Together, Denka and Hina assured, "He is alone."

The cats leapt off of the couch and onto the stone floor, trotting out to find the kitchen.

Hina turned back to give one last instruction, "His friends and family are away on missions. He's a sleepy fellow. Strike by dark and leave quietly, Sasuke. Like it was all a dream…"

And as the striped she-cat sprang away nimbly, Sasuke felt a rush of expectation and even marginal excitement. If the circumstances were so plainly in his favor, maybe this night was fated to be Gaara's last.

Without alerting the Sound community or its leader, Sasuke had snuck off. He made a hasty exit from the bogs near the hideout and pushed out into the farmlands and paddies of the Rice Country. To avoid detection from any of the local farmers stooped over harvesting in the dying light, Sasuke had employed Genjutsu to disappear, passing by residents without hassle.

In the early dark of the evening, he had left the country border and entered the northwestern quadrant of the Fire Country. When running lost its appeal, Sasuke took advantage of his Cursed Seal form and leapt from a sheer drop on the leeward side of a mountain. He could glide on the gentle winds of the valley with ease.

It did cross his mind that Orochimaru may notice a twinge of suspicious activity while he used the Heaven Seal, but he didn't care. He had covered enough distance to disregard that possibility. He could explain his actions to the snake later when he had fresh blood on his hands.

Late in the night, he had avoided any and all suspicion of Fire Country patrols. He had maintained considerable altitude before descending a bit over the crags and falls of the River Country. The unsettling, moon-less dark of the witching hour was wholly appropriate for his landing in the Wind...
Sasuke touched down and shed his Cursed Seal form. The air was frigid and still over the dunes. He had purposefully put himself just out of range of a perimeter watch nearly six miles away from Sunagakure. He moved swiftly in the brisk climate, passing over sand like a wraith.

In his mind's eye he focused on the quaint, thatch-fenced entrance Denka and Hina had told him of. It was a small back door of an exporting station at the village's surrounding wall, and it was almost never properly guarded. The cats had encouraged him to sneak in that way and carefully approach the administrative district. He could get to the mansion, locate the third floor; last window on the left side, Hina had stressed. Always open. Always quiet.

The lack of light pollution enabled a swatch of clustered stars to shine down on the desert. With his eyes trained forward, Sasuke slipped out of his mental instructions and back into his weak justification of this whole operation. Kiba had made it clear that if anything happened to Gaara that Sakura would be devastated. Kiba had accurately claimed that Sasuke did not want to bring the young woman unhappiness, surely not after their awful parting…

But inside, his emotions and their equivalent rationales were out of sorts. Like a jigsaw puzzle with sections partially assembled, the loose pieces could sometimes fit in the incorrect spot. It would dislodge the other 'intended' pieces, of course, but that was just how it worked.

Even if he killed this young, worthless "Kazekage" that Sakura loved, certainly he could restore her. He could be everything that comprised her joyful world…because she truly was his motivation, in that respect. It was possible. Even Sasuke, as damaged as he awarely was, could attest that any heartbroken person can rediscover love.

Rather than focus on the pain he would be inflicting, he would be concentrating on the happiness he could bring Sakura later. She needed only to have patience.

In fact, all of his close people should respect that he didn't want to stay gone after he had settled his business with Itachi. They should wait. They should understand! He frowned at the idea; they should condone it! Few others could comprehend his need to settle the score and avenge his kin. His team ought to. Kiba had indicated that he did, and that was an incredibly precious admission.

Yet also…on a raw, undeniable level…killing Gaara was not going to settle any score or avenge any relative. It was an impulsive desire. The aloof rival he had passive-aggressively squared off with in his youth, and to his revulsion, had been rescued by during Itachi's previous visit…in supreme honesty…Gaara's expiration would feel good. It would bring simple satisfaction. It would illuminate the fruits of his training and, if Sasuke wasn't caught as the perpetrator, he could get away with the dark deed as so many hedonists like him did in this world. Fixating on the positive would undoubtedly lead to the positive, some life-coaches might preach.

In the turmoil of his mind, somewhere, the quest for happiness marched on. On and on down all the wrong roads and turns…

A tremor shook the ground. Sasuke stopped and listened attentively to his surroundings. Meters ahead of him the dunes split apart, the sand parted like the sea, and a gargantuan, silver serpent reared up; ten stories tall. Motionless, Sasuke stared up at it in frustration. The snake bent down and opened its mouth, unfurling a pink, forked tongue, and Orochimaru strolled down as if it were a runway. He stepped out onto the sand and folded his arms, clearly angered.

"This is no place for a young man to be so late at night..." He chastised in a mocking tone, "And for such...reckless purposes..."
"I would be back by morning." Sasuke snipped.

"Really?" Orochimaru narrowed his eyes, "How do you expect this task of yours to end? Think it'll go off without a hitch? Gaara-kun is the Kazekage for a reason."

Frustrated, Sasuke saved his comments for himself as Orochimaru went on, "Those cats of yours didn't mind telling me of your intentions after I fed them jerky. You silly child! It isn't difficult to decipher what you've been festering about for three months!" He simpered, "Don't you...have someone more important to eliminate?"

He gritted his teeth, "In the near future..."

"Don't give me that..." The sennin huffed, "You are a capricious vigilante and I am in no mood to humor your boyish whims...particularly when they can jeopardize my plans." He scowled, "I won't prod at Sunagakure. I won't beg for their attention when Sand has so happily distracted itself with its new satellite in the Land of Waves. Things are just as I need them to be right now, and I won't tolerate your trifling enterprises. You've already risked far too much exposure..."

"I'll make a deal with you."

"No." Orochimaru's eyes widened furiously, "Did I not make myself clear? I'm not entertaining any bribes or bargains. You have no sense of risk assessment." He turned back to his giant serpent and beckoned for it to come close, adding to Sasuke, "But now...I think it's best to put your energy towards something constructive."

"Like what?"

"Like someone who is really worth hunting..." He smiled darkly, "I have an informant...yes...one who is curiously stupid..."

"Tobi?" Sasuke figured, appalled at the mentioning of such an insignificant pawn.

"He was rescued from a near fatality, long ago...and suffered extensive physical and mental damage..." Orochimaru explained, "But lately...I suspect my dopey friend to be engaging in activities worse than that of a double agent..."

Surprised that his attention had been essentially high-jacked, Sasuke listened with raised eyebrows.

"He is funneling information into Konoha." He announced harshly, "And I seriously doubt that what he reports is being sent to Danzo of Root. He has been in contact with Tsunade or Jiraiya. I know it." Orochimaru patted the giant snake's snout, "That is why Leaf has been much too alert for my liking. The Black Ops couldn't have learned so much in so little time..."

Sasuke stared in disbelief, "A triple-agent?"

Orochimaru was glowering at the horizon, "Not for long. Leaf has no business knowing what I know...and I intend to keep it that way." He turned back to Sasuke, "Don't bother returning to Sound. I am sending you directly to the north through the Land of Earth. I want you to do a sweep of the suburbs...the small valleys and hamlets tucked away near the coast."

"And then what?"

"You keep vigil." Orochimaru smiled, "Those are his haunts. Watch Tobi. Learn his routes: His stops. His friends. His home. And if you see any indication that he is meeting with a sympathizer of Konoha..." He tapped the serpent's nose and it opened its jaws, "Kill him."
Sasuke stood in silence, taken aback by the task. He had not expected to be redirected so.

"Take your time. I can send friends to check up on you…or you may send updates my way whenever you wish." Orochimaru offered, "I'm sure this is an undertaking perfectly suited for you, Sasuke. See that it gets settled. If Tobi isn't guilty as charged, then leave him be," He chortled, "But his association is rather obvious now."

He returned to the maw of the silver giant and then the beast burrowed underground again. In the minute after Orochimaru had casually departed, squashing Sasuke's efforts, the young Uchiha blinked at the nearby Sand Village. By all accounts, it would be predictable for him to go ahead with his murderous plan anyway. His steps toward Suna were halting, conflicted, until finally he about-faced. Orochimaru had only expressed that now was not the best time. He had never said he had a problem with Gaara's assassination.

Resetting his priorities, Sasuke darted northbound in the dark.

---

The following day, the sun shone brightly over Nanakusa. The picturesque town was perhaps the most underrated, overlooked spit of land in the Water Country. And that was something two groups of people had capitalized on: nukenin and retirees.

On this day in history, in this exact location, Zabuza only wasted four minutes arguing with Haku about whether or not he would be joining the Demon of Hidden Mist for a mission assigned by a lucrative mob-boss. Haku had declined nineteen times in a row all while preparing a morning meal, and he shoved the food in front of the brute's face to shut him up. It was working.

"You need to sharpen your skills. That's reason enough to come along." He added between mouthfuls.

"I'll train here."

"There ain't shit to do here."

Haku frowned, "I told you I'm not going. Jiraiya-sensei warned me not to."

"What's he going to do about it? Send a toad down here to spank you?" Zabuza taunted, "Who gives an actual fuck?"

"Go without me. If I need money then I will consider assignments in the future…"

"Suit yourself. You don't make much doing that waitressing job of yours."

"It's not called 'waitressing' if you're a man, you know."

Zabuza cleaned his plate, "It is if you're deceiving customers with long hair and a china-doll face. Get over it."

Haku puffed in annoyance but was relieved when Zabuza quickly vacated after that. He ate a light breakfast before heading out into town; wary of whom he might meet. Ranmaru and Raiga had settled down in the area as well, and the two apprentices were careful not to cross paths with an "opposing master" or be caught together. It would spark an all-out brawl. So far, their caution had prevented such incidents and their companions were none the wiser.
Occasionally, Ranmaru had a late start. He was most likely still trying to find a good enough excuse to shake Raiga from his side. As soon as the boy had finished cooking and/or his supplemental training and began talking about boring things, like shopping or chatting with townsfolk, Raiga checked out and defaulted to naps. Haku found this practice oddly similar to Zabuza's lifestyle. Today was one such day in which Ranmaru needed extra time. He had not yet appeared at the tea shop or out on the roadside.

Since Haku was not scheduled to work, he followed a dirt trail out of Nanakusa and into the surrounding cedar forest. It was bursting with springtime bustle and the chirping of paired animals expecting their young. When Haku found a quiet patch to work in he relaxed, taking a deep breath.

Whenever he had time alone, Haku poured most of his effort and concentration into refining his Ice Release techniques. In recent weeks, he had developed a tremendous version of his Crystal Ice Mirrors. It had four levels of reflective panels and enough space to encircle a sizable battalion, but of course, it would be too much for him alone to strike from every surface. So far, four shadow clones had been sufficient. With compatible chakra, they could flash, warp and dive through the same surfaces he could.

It was a curious talent. Haku had taken a few days to ponder and experiment with what exactly was on the opposite side of an ice mirror. Once inside and not facing out at the shinobi world, eye to eye with an adversary…he would stare at an entirely white and blank space. It was, as best as he could describe, a three-dimensional, oxygenated zone, and after walking deeper into it (during one terrifying episode) he had determined that it went on infinitely. Or at least, he wasn't sure if it was worth searching for the end.

'It's another dimension.' He thought, perplexed, 'How can I explain that to others? Is there really such a thing?' Never before had he given it thought about what he was technically doing when he performed the jutsu.

He was grasping at straws while trying to describe what the functionality and physics were. Haku's capable brain had drawn up one justification in that, with enough chakra, he could create an innumerable amount of ice mirrors if he so desired, thus explaining all of the wide, white, chilly terrain available to open "gateways" between. He scratched his head while working on it. In addition to that, he knew at least one thing for certain. The chakra necessary for an ice mirror was directly proportional to its size, shape, and composition in the "shinobi realm." On the rare occasions he had used less chakra, focused on fulfilling what was just enough for a mirror the size of his hand…

It was almost effortless. Rudimentary, even. Maybe he had just gotten used to creating them, but Haku had learned that a small mirror had just as much application as full-sized crystals did.

While toying around with 25cm mirror suspended in the air, Haku had reached into it all the way up to his shoulder, positing scientific explanations. Since he had not yet found anyone to explain who he was and what he could do, he needed to discover it for himself.

"Haku-kun!"

He peeked over his shoulder to see his violet-haired friend scurrying through the ferns, "I'm sorry I'm late!"

"It's fine. You do what you need to do to avoid suspicion." Haku smiled reassuringly.

Ranmaru's small chest heaved a sigh, "Sometimes Raiga makes it hard work..." He brightened, "Oh! Are you using your Kekkei Genkai right now?" He was looking at the mirror.
"Yes. Though this isn't much…"

Ranmaru poked it with his finger, only contacting a solid surface, "It's cold."

"The Hyoton creates ice for a wide array of jutsu."

"Hm." He blinked thoughtfully, "But you said that you…don't know about your clan either."

"I don't." Haku admitted.

"So we need to work hard to learn about our abilities." Ranmaru was determined, "No one can teach me what to do, but at least you know what I'm going through!"

He chuckled, "I do."

"Can we go back to Hiroshi's shop and work on the Palm Healing Technique?"

"You're already very good at it."

"As good as a medic-nin?"

"Well…no," Haku conceded, "Neither of us are that good. I never had the chance to apprentice under an expert."

The tiny boy's hands fist when he had an idea, "We should find one."

"You know that Zabuza and Raiga won't approve. We're already teetering on the edge of being discovered." Haku admonished, "We shouldn't push our luck, Ranmaru."

But just to make his wee friend happy, they ventured back into the village and stopped in Hiroshi's tea shop. They were welcome for a short while before the establishment became busy, and the Hiroshi kindly shooed them out to make room for customers. They went down the street and ended up under an awning near Tomo's street-side stand. Haku had voluntarily cut the back of his hand (to her aversion) and the woman watched as Ranmaru quickly mended it with a glowing, green light

"You know…" She said while tapping her chin, "I've seen that before."

"What do you mean, Tomo-san?" Haku asked.

"That light. That jutsu or whatever you call it…" She turned and pointed down the road, "Uptown there is an old man who can do just what Ranmaru did. I've seen him use it on travelers sometimes."

The boys perked up, eyes wide, "Really?"

"Yeah," Tomo smiled with her hands on her hips, "He's not the most sociable old man around…but he's always nice to Hiroshi. Maybe you two should meet him?"

"Yes! What's his name?" Ranmaru inquired.

"He's Eto Migawari, and he's from out of town." She explained, "He's lived here for a few years now in that stylish house on the corner."

Haku thanked the young mother for her input before going after Ranmaru as he sped towards the specified house.

Ranmaru had uncovered a strange feature of the building with his talented eyes. Even before opening the door, he had seen that the front of the large house was converted into a doctor's office. It even had an "open" sign in the door-side window and a plaque conveying Migawari's education and qualifications. Haku followed his friend inside to an empty lobby. Soft music was playing on a radio.

"This suggests that he is the village doctor." Haku presumed, "But Tomo-san thinks she saw him use a jutsu."

"Maybe he did."

Haku frowned, "Where is everybody?" He glanced at a receptionist's station that was unoccupied. The office seemed entirely unattended.

"Ranmaru, can you see-?"

"He's back here." The small boy tottered towards an open doorway and then followed a corridor lined with examination rooms to its end.

After a sharp right into an actual, residential sitting room, they found an elderly, bespectacled man asleep at a low table. He was supported by a tall-backed floor chair and had his legs tucked under the blanket of a kotatsu. Haku didn't think the warming table was seasonally appropriate, but he wouldn't question the needs of the elderly.

"Um, excuse me, Eto-san..." Ranmaru kneeled beside the table, "Is your office not open?"

The old man gradually regained consciousness and wiped his lip. Blinking his tiny, black eyes, Migawari pushed his spectacles up the bridge of his nose. His lips were in a calculating pout when he beheld Ranmaru and Haku.

"What do you youngsters need, eh?"

"Is the office closed?"

"It sure is closed! What are you doing in my house?"

"If it's closed...then maybe you should lock the door and change the sign." Haku recommended, "We came back here to make sure you were alright."

"I'm fine! And if I locked the door then how could I take walk-in appointments?" The old man warbled, confusing them.

"That would mean you aren't closed." Ranmaru assessed.

"Then we'll call it like it is: I'm on duty when I'm not napping. I am retired, you know." Migawari rubbed the side of his nose, "Well...I was. I had to come out of retirement and make some cash. I incurred a bit of debt when I came to Nanakusa." His eyes snapped back to them, "So what's the matter? Ya sick?"

"No." Haku took a seat beside Ranmaru, "We were told that you can use Medical Jutsu."

With wary eyes, Migawari looked them up and down, "And who said that?"

"Tomo-san."

"She's a lovely girl." The old man nodded, "Hmph! Don't look so surprised! Medic-nin retire here all the time! When I left my clinic in my daughter Sarincha's hands, I had an amazing pension from Kusagakure, so I had my pick of real estate down here!" He smiled happily, "Tomo's right. Now and again I use my skills for supplemental income."

"Grass ninja really do retire here?" Haku was astonished, "I thought those were just stories."

"Ha! Stories. Well it's no fairytale. I blew through my savings much faster than I thought…” He added in a fearful whisper, "Please don't tell my daughter."

Ranmaru assured, "We don't know your daughter…"

"Phew! I always worry that she's watching me. She'd have a conniption if she knew I was still taking patients…after I gave her that sob-story about not being able to manage the hospital. Hee hee!"
Migawari wobbled to his feet and peeked out the blinds of a window, "Now that job is keeping her busy, and that husband of her's is too…"

"That doesn't seem fair." Haku muttered to his friend.

Migawari had sharp ears, "Huh? Not fair? She's got youth on her side! It wouldn't be fair to let an old dog like me suffer for a paycheck until my dying breath! You know how many people I've saved during my career?" He bent over to scold Haku, "A war's worth of wounded. I did my job!"

"Why are you still working, Eto-san?" Ranmaru asked.

"I…” He sighed, "I've…got an expensive passion."

Ranmaru and Haku blinked in bewilderment as Migawari lifted a heavy wooden chest from a display case. He set it down on the kotatsu and flipped the lid back, allowing them to peer inside.

Decks of cards, sets of dice, cups, game boards and pieces, spinners, a coin purse and what looked like a tiny boxing ring for insect-fighting or something like it. The old man grinned proudly at his collection.

Clueless, Ranmaru supposed, "You like to play."

"You bet I do, kid!"

"No. You're a gambler." Haku understood the issue, "Which would put any retiree at the mercy of chance and risk losing their livelihood! To think we were going to ask you to teach us healing techniques…” Disgusted, he stood to leave, "Come on, Ranmaru. We can learn from someone else."

With a sad nod, the violet haired boy stood as well.

Affronted, Migawari gaped at them, "What am I? A criminal? It's just a bit of fun! I'm not going to let a pair of brats judge me like I'm a piece of trash."

"You're insulting your daughter who imagines you having a peaceful retirement while she has inherited your duties." Haku said in a low voice, "If I had a daughter I would never dishonor her like that…"

The old man gasped, "Cut me to the quick, why don't you? You boys are ninja, huh? Want to learn Medical Jutsu, is that right? You don't hear that request everyday…” He acknowledged, "I have cut back and keep to a budget, you snoots. I'm not a waste of time. I'm a master of what I do and I won't take any guff from kids."

"What makes you a better choice than any other shinobi specialized in healing?" Ranmaru wondered.
"We might do better to learn from your daughter." Haku added, driving the point home.

"Alright! Enough with those wisecracks!" The old man's frown lines were pronounced, "I've gotten around quite a bit! Gambling can connect you to all kinds of people! And you wanna know something else? I have a famous arch-enemy who I have never lost to." Migawari cackled, "Have you heard of…Tsunade-hime?"

Haku's train of thought was ransacked and he instantly surrendered his attention.

"Yes that's right! Who doesn't know about Tsunade, the current Hokage of the Leaf Village?" Migawari laughed, "She and I have clashed in many games in countless gambling houses…and I have whooped her every single time."

"Haku is from the Leaf Village!" Ranmaru blurted out.

"Are you now?" The old man wrinkled his forehead, gloating, "Bet you couldn't get an apprenticeship under her, huh? She's always passed out drunk or busy yelling at people! Rest easy, because you've found someone who can go toe to toe with her! I'm just not famous."

"You could be making all of this up." Haku noted keenly.

"Yeah?" Migawari reached for the top cabinet of the display case and pulled out a woven basket filled with books and scrolls, "See these? These are my most precious winnings." He licked his thumb and paged through a small journal, "Forbidden Jutsu."

Ranmaru and Haku leaned forward, fascinated, but Migawari pulled the basket back, "Uh-uh! I got these from defeating my arrogant shinobi opponents who thought they could best my lucky streak!" He retrieved a medium sized scroll and waved it proudly, "I even won Tsunade's most prized technique when she bet it in a high-stakes game! Heh! I never bothered with the Yin Seal…so it's just sitting here gathering dust."

An urgent need to defend Leaf's secrets overcame Haku. What was supposed to be a jealously guarded secret known only to the Fifth Hokage was sitting in the trophy case of a senior citizen's house. He took a seat again and fixed his gray eyes on Migawari, serious, "If you don't plan on studying that jutsu…then maybe you'd be willing to bet it?"

Ranmaru gave a sidelong, astounded look to his friend.

Migawari got settled by the kotatsu again, sighing, "I don't know if I should. Many of these techniques don't need to fall into frivolous hands."

"I'd like to return that scroll to Tsunade-sama when I get back to Leaf." Haku explained, "Something like that shouldn't be adrift in the world."

"Hm." Migawari scratched his chin, "You're Hiroshi's boy…the one he sent off with Gama-sennin, he said. Heh! A Leaf ninja in my house! Maybe it's at least worth a game of chance to see if you can regain the princess' secret jutsu. Some items change hands all the way back to their intended owner…" He frowned, "And just as often…they'll end up with the wrong crowd."

"I'll challenge you to any game."

"Hold your horses! We haven't set any stakes," Migawari notified him, glancing to Ranmaru, "Will you be trying your luck too?"

"I guess so." Ranmaru sat down and folded his hands in his lap.
"So…you want this?" The old man asked, lifting up the scroll, "Well you can have it if you win! But what do I get if you lose?"

Ranmaru lit up with an idea, "A free lunch!"

"…"

"You'd want something of value?" Haku asked.

"Depends. What have you got?"

Worriedly, Haku tried to come up with an offering. He had been saving money, but it would not be prudent to bet all of it in a high-risk game. He had jutsu he could exchange, and maybe, if Migawari was the bounty-seeking type, he'd accept Zabuza as payment; unconscious, of course.

"I can trade the Shadow Clone jutsu." He offered.

"Pff. I don't want jutsu! I'm done with all of that!"

"Two free lunches." Ranmaru had put his hands flat on the table, now playing hardball.

"No, kid! I don't need food!"

"100,000 ryo." Haku ventured.

"Cheapskate." Migawari smiled, "I'm to the point where you'd really have to shine my shoes with an offering of cash."

Haku's internal budgeting system would not allow him to put down any more.

"Then what will you accept that the two of us can offer?" Haku folded his arms, "We might as well walk out the door and give up."

"Ho now! There is something two young-bloods could give me," Migawari assured him, "How about this? We'll play a game of dice. You and Shorty each get a cup with one die, and I'll have a cup with two dice. Shake 'em and then roll 'em! If you roll a combined number higher than mine I'll give you Tsunade's jutsu…if not…” He shut his eyes and smirked, "The two of you will become unpaid receptionists in my office four days a week! Until I've had enough of ya!"

Ranmaru, knowing that his stay in Nanakusa was not guaranteed to be long-term, considered the stakes. He could always bail and ask for Raiga's intervention if he was unable to bear the working conditions. He looked to Haku who nodded gravely, and then the match was set.

Migawari gave them two ordinary dice, which they inspected, and then tall, opaque cups to use for the game. He prepared his own dice and leaned over the table, smiling deviously, "Are you sure you want to do this? You might win this scroll, but if I win I get your time. That's something you can never get back!"

Haku smiled, "Let's begin."

"Alright then! Roll!" The old man hooted happily.

And the three of them spastically shook their cups and clacked them down on the table top, lifting them up slowly to reveal the results. Haku had gotten a five and Ranmaru had gotten a three. They looked over to see Migawari's outcome…a six and a five.
Wide-eyed, the two friends felt a shadow of devastation fall across them like a veil. The old man chortled and then clapped his hands, "How about that? That's just how the chips fall!"

He cleaned up the table and then hobbled out of the sitting room into the office. Haku and Ranmaru followed reluctantly until they came to the receptionist's station. Two desks were on opposite walls, tucked amongst filing cabinets and potted plants.

The old man rubbed his hands together, "Have a seat! So you silly boys, what're your names? I'll put them on the board."

"Haku."

"Ranmaru."

"Hmm! I see! Welcome aboard, suckers." Migawari was positively jolly, "We'll work out your schedules to be however flexible you need them to be…but I need you to know the ropes of admitting patients. I'll even show you how to treat them…just so I don't have to."

"Oh! So you will show us Medical techniques?" Ranmaru was pleasantly surprised.

"Why not? It'll reduce my workload. But for a practice session I need to see what you can patch up with the Palm Healing jutsu. I want to know what I'm working with!" He put his hands on his hips, stern, "And now…I'll be breaking your fingers for the demo! Who's first?"

Within the Leaf Village, the day arrived at the Hyuga compound when the last suitor would have a chance of currying favor with the Clan Head's eldest daughter. It was a busy morning of preparation.

As promised, Fujita's mother Kayato, the master seamstress, had taken great pains and care to fold, wrap, pat, and tie an elaborate furisode onto Hinata. The fabric was a midnight blue at the shoulder and chest, fading down into lighter shades; a metaphor of night becoming day. White flecks scattered across the dark blue resembled stars and flower petals. The obi was silver with violet and lavender ornaments. Kayato had stressed that this was one of the most priceless kimono the Hyuga clan owned, and there was a reason she was expected to wear it.

The final guest was a prince of the Taketori clan, one of the closest friends clan-wise to the Hyuga. They resided in a humble palace within the Fire Country and visited the Leaf Village from time to time for diplomatic reasons. Likewise, ambassadors of the Hyuga paid visits to the Taketori as well. It was a small wonder how they had gotten an appointment after inquiring with Hyuga clan elders. It would have been an insult to decline.

Kayato had tied Hinata's hair into an attractive up-do with a white lily. All the while, the young woman sat in silence and tried not to scream.

The spectacle and efforts that were being made to impress a man (and a stranger) were grinding her self-esteem to bits. If she had been given the chance to say "no thank you," Hinata truly would have been delighted. Her heart was tender and longing for Naruto to be the visitor, receiving all of the consideration that her family could muster. She would die of happiness if her boyfriend could be treated to such a welcome.

But that hope was dashed. It was her understanding that this entire affair had started because the elders were aware of her romance with a young shinobi who, for some reason, repelled them.
"Just be yourself. You don't have to do or say anything to beguile this guest, you know." Kayato reminded her, "If you don't want a husband, least of all one that is appointed to you…then just break that fact gently to Taketori-sama. This will all be over soon." She was a woman of tremendous understanding…not unlike her empathetic and peppy husband.

She was allowed to have a light breakfast of pears and oatmeal accompanied with tea. Then she was instructed to wait in a tea room on the east side of the house until the company arrived. It was tricky business to sit properly in a long, elaborate kimono like the one she had been cloaked in. When an hour dragged by and her legs had gone numb, Hinata stood up and peeked at her surroundings. Her attendants had migrated to the front of the house, anxiously awaiting the Taketori to show up.

She exited through a sliding door and stepped onto the polished wood of the porch. Wisteria trees were bursting with fragrant flowers on every vine. She watched them sway in the breeze as her mind wandered.

'Naruto-kun…I never had the heart to tell you about all of this. I was always afraid that it would hurt your feelings or discourage you.' Her eyebrows knitted in worry, 'But…it has been a burden to keep this to myself. Bottling this up has been one of the most painful experiences…and I need your reassurance so that I might feel relief. Though…I…I couldn't. To tell you about how I feel and what has been happening…may hurt you in a way that is not equal to how upset I am now.' She was determined to keep it to herself, especially if this was due to be her last trial.

It stung that the idea of her ever wanting a husband in the future, more specifically, one of her choosing, could plunge her through this process all over again. As she understood Hyuga tradition, a candidate of her choice had to be introduced and approved by her father first. Then, in what was a common standard among many clans in Leaf, the "selection" was to be naturalized and made to live among the Hyuga for an extended period of time.

It was a compatibility test. Sometimes, significant others ran screaming when they found the Hyuga too prickly to put up with. Others weathered the stone-faced storm well for the sake of their loved one and often married successfully, receiving the Hyuga name. Hinata was aware there were other odds and ends that needed to be respected, depending on if the newcomer was a man or woman. Unfortunately, the majority of success stories were marriages within the Branch family, one such free-will choice being Neji's father finding and courting his mother.

Her own parents had been members of the Main Branch. Serendipitously, Hiashi had fallen madly in love with his intended (who was indeed an eligible woman) and had enjoyed his marriage up until becoming a widower. Raising two daughters without the direction of his wife was not something he excelled at. He tried.

If things continued down the winding and painful course that the elders were paving, they would probably betroth her to Fujita. Or worse.

She shuddered violently.

'I may need to seek asylum in Sunagakure.' She considered seriously, 'They won't need me if they have Neji-niisan…and I refuse to be with anyone but Naruto!'

She could probably find someplace to hide safely until they left her alone or surrendered to her demands. Adulthood wasn't supposed to be something to dread, but her clan could not make life easy for her. Hinata was preparing to deal with that reality.

She blinked in surprise when an unknown young man walked by on the path beneath the wisteria branches. He was in quite the hurry; looking over his shoulder to be sure he had no pursuers.
The young man stopped beneath a tree and hid amongst the vines. Then, curiously, Hinata watched as he flapped his arms in an "I give up" gesture. He relaxed after a minute and then admired the blooming trees.

'He must've realized that even if he hides...anyone with the Byakugan can find him.' She supposed.

His mouth was drawn in a small frown of disdain. He was pale with dust-brown hair pulled into a regal ponytail, with eyes of tourmaline yellow. Judging from how sportingly he was dressed in black and pearl-grey kimono and hakama, Hinata's best assumption was that he was someone from the Taketori clan. And he wasn't enjoying his visit.

She was contemplating her return indoors in the same second the young man looked up. Their eyes met and they simultaneously jumped in surprise. Hinata stayed where she was and opted for a friendly smile, hoping that her clansmen had not frightened him away from the front of the grounds.

Appreciative, the Taketori visitor scurried over to her and bowed quickly, "Excuse me, I'm a-"

"An honored guest from the Taketori clan. Welcome!" She observed keenly, "Have you gotten lost? I can take you to my father."

"Ah, no thank you...I just..." He sighed quietly, "I needed a break. The greeting was so stuffy and formal..." The visitor added, "Oh! My name's Kitano. I'm sorry; I should have properly introduced myself."

"That's quite alright. I know how stressful these official visits can be." Hinata replied understandingly, "I am Hyuga Hinata."

Kitano stared at her for a moment, bewildered, and then looked away shyly, "It's a pleasure to meet you, milady."

The surreal instance of the tables turning dawned on Hinata. She was now far more outgoing than the days of her youth. She had also inadvertently happened upon another shy person. Hinata noticed that he had glanced over his shoulder again nervously, but he was attempting to play cool.

"Would you like to come into the tea room, Kitano-san? You can join me there until other guests arrive." She offered.

"Yes! Thank you..." He was plainly relieved, "Hinata-sama."

Kitano followed her inside quietly and took a seat across from her. He smiled uncertainly, "You are much nicer than the greeters at the gate..."

"I can't help it. Just like they can't help being rigid." She deduced, "Are you an attendant?"

"Well, no..." He was reluctant to answer, "I know that I probably shouldn't have snuck off. Members of the Hyuga clan can find me in no time..."

"Why did you leave the entry party?"

"I...I was...feeling a bit overwhelmed." Kitano admitted, "This is my first time in the Leaf Village. It's a little far from home."

She smiled, "I see."

"I asked my father if maybe we could cancel this appointment, but he insisted that we visit our associate-clan to meet the Lady of the House." He added somberly, "I was uncomfortable with all of this... but," Kitano grinned, "You're nothing like what I imagined!"

"W-What?" Hinata blinked, rapidly grasping what he meant. She had judged him as a hand servant or caretaker, maybe even a young ward, but the man in front of her was the prospective fiancé the elders had invited! At least fifteen years younger than the average caller, to boot. She had not expected it.

"You're the-?"

"My father is the Head of the Taketori clan." Kitano elucidated, "And you are the daughter of the Head of the Hyuga clan. You're so young!"

"So are you!"

He was shocked, "Has this happened to you before? The set-ups?"

"Yes! And you?"

"Maybe fifteen people! Mostly clan spinsters..." Kitano wailed, "I've had enough, but Father was frustrated with me. He promised that this-"

"Would be the last visit?" She finished his thought.

He nodded, bright with happiness, "Yeah."

Hinata felt like laughing at the coincidence. Somehow, a person had come along who could relate to her agitation with forced courtship. What a beautiful way to cap the wooing trials off, she thought. Moments later, the door off of the hallway opened and Ko appeared, looking a bit ruffled. He stepped aside and let Hiashi enter with a tall, sandy-haired man. His hair was pulled back in the same style as Kitano's; dressed lavishly in red kimono beneath black and silver armor.

Hiashi regarded his daughter's company curiously, "Hm. Ko noticed that the young master slipped away. I did not expect you to retrieve him, Hinata."

"Nor did I." She admitted.

Hiashi turned to introduce his companion, "This is Magan-sama, the leader of the Taketori clan and an esteemed comrade of the Hyuga. He is Kitano-sama's father."

"It's wonderful to meet you, Magan-sama." Hinata's pleasantries were almost automatic.

"Oh, the pleasure is mine, young lady." He smiled genuinely, "Kitano was chafed the whole way here... but he seems much more relaxed now."

"Dad..." The boy muttered under his breath.

They were all whisked away to a strictly timed meal by Ko and his Taketori acquaintance. Lunch was served in a formal dining room and the caretakers were excused, leaving Hiashi and Hinata seated side-by-side on one end of the table, and Kitano and Magan on the other. Most of the banter was the same, Hinata noted. Magan pitched his family's breeding, relationship with the Hyuga, and proximity to Leaf as the great motivators of a match. Previous visitors had come up with convincing arguments too, but this one was a cut above the rest. For once, Hiashi was listening intently.

This stirred Hinata somewhat as she listened and answered questions politely, but for the most part,
Magan and Hiashi did the talking while their children ate, participating when necessary.

Towards the end of the meal, Hiashi became pushy. He was only humoring the elders’ selection because Magan was a friend, but if he was even going to consider offering his daughter’s hand in marriage he had several demands. His stipulations included:

A) Hinata's position as a shinobi of Konoha could not be compromised, and the Taketori must allow her to resume her career, unless she should choose otherwise. They must also accommodate her commute.

B) If her well-being is assessed to be neglected in any form, upon inspection by Main House overseers and family, Hinata may dissolve her marriage without penalty and return to the Hyuga.

C) If any of her demands were not met, Hinata could bring issue against her husband or the Taketori as a whole.

D) If in the exceptional but not impossible event that Hinata is selected as a candidate for Hokage in the future, the Taketori must support the appointment and send her spouse and family to Konoha for accommodations. (Magan only nodded in amazement at this.)

E) Her dowry could not be negotiated and must be accepted upon its first bid.

And other matters pertaining to her Kekkei Genkai, in text, were handed to Magan who raised his eyebrows at the complexity of the young woman's circumstances. Hiashi briefly explained that her Blood Limit was highly evolved and could possibly be passed down to children. The Hyuga clan elders would have strict rules about evaluations and the Taketori's maintenance of gifted progeny. Hiashi also gently added that it was a load of codswallop and not worth worrying about.

After that, Magan and Hiashi elected to speak privately and sent the children off for a walk on the estate property. They were asked to "get to know each other." Hinata was astounded that the discussion had made it so far. Often, Hiashi dismissed prospective grooms halfway through lunch. She was beginning to fear that he really would try to cement a deal.

Hinata and Kitano walked in silence for a while, chins drooping, wondering if the matter was out of their hands officially.

"I am worried that…our parents might find this favorable." Kitano said softly, "And I mean that as no offense to you."

"None taken."

"I don't want to get married." He said bluntly, "Not yet. I want to find someone I like when I'm older. My clan never gave me the chance to explore the world. They won't let me make my own decisions."

She looked at the boy sadly, knowing how he felt. They walked along a garden path that wound around the building, stewing over the predicament.

"How old are you, Kitano-sama?"

"Sixteen."

"I'll be sixteen at the end of this year."

"Do you know how old your parents were when they got married?"
"I think my father was eighteen. I am not sure how old my mother was…"

"My father had all the time in the world before he married, and he got to choose someone he loved." Kitano frowned, "I thought he'd understand that I want the same. I didn't think he'd put me through all of this."

"I didn't think so either. But…the friendship between our families could dictate a match like this." Hinata observed, "It's problematic that…we're compatible."

"I know. I couldn't even try to hate you. You're beautiful and you're a talented shinobi. You're father said he anticipates you to become Hokage!" Kitano laughed, "How could my Dad resist that? How am I supposed to?"

Her shoulders sagged, "Please try to."

"I promise I will."

"Are you a shinobi?"

"I'm a Chunin, but I don't expect to be much more than that. We're only trained so that we can defend clan secrets. The Taketori don't take very many missions."

"Ah, I see. I will be participating in the upcoming Chunin Exam."

"Good luck to you," He shook his head and smiled, "But you probably won't need it."

As they passed by a vacant lot behind the house, Hinata paused. She could have sworn there was a patch of woodland here before. It was now a vast pile of chips and sprigs, and she couldn't figure out how it had gotten there.

"This doesn't seem to fit with the landscape." Kitano commented.

"There used to be forest here."

"Huh. What happened to it?"

"I'm not sure." She said as she kept walking, "Neji-niisan might know."

"Who's that?"

"My cousin. He's like a big brother to me." Hinata explained, "He is now the heir of the Hyuga clan. He will succeed my father in leadership when he decides to step down."

"Wow. That's odd. Why wouldn't your father choose you as an heir when he was going on about how powerful you are?"

"I was the heir, once." She admitted, "But…I think I always preferred Neji-niisan assuming that responsibility. I know I could if I had to…but he worked hard to be recognized, just as I did. Things are just as they need to be."

"Yeah and when you're Hokage you don't want to be too busy! It'd be a load off your shoulders if you aren't in charge of the Hyuga." He imagined, folding his arms, "But…if you married me…you might still be a little busy."

She pursed her lips, "We would be very unhappy together."
"Why? I promise I would abide by everything your dad said and I know we can get along! I'm not a bad person-
"

"It has nothing to do with that." Hinata assured him, "I am already in love with someone."

"Oh." He had a moment to think about it and then smiled, "Of course. He's very lucky."

She shook her head in embarrassment.

"Do you want to marry him?" Kitano wondered.

She nodded and he chuckled in amusement.

"It's alright. He must be special. I don't want to get in the way of that, you know." He stopped and looked at her with strange, honest eyes, "How about…we just put this off? If you're still available ten years down the line…I'm interested. If not, don't worry. I refuse to agree to anything until I'm ready."

Hinata nodded, "I…think that's a good idea. I know I'm not ready either."

Kitano seemed very pleased that they had come to an agreement while they closed the circuit of the walk. While they were passing by the front of the house, Hiashi and Magan had stepped outside together. The two men approached their mingling children and were vaguely content.

"So!" Magan smiled at them, "What do you think, kids? Hiashi-sama and I know how we feel, but we'd like to hear your opinions first."

Hinata and Kitano exchanged a glance.

"For now, we don't want to go for it." The young man responded. His father appeared shocked by the words.

"We don't feel prepared." Hinata added, "Kitano-sama said he won't consider this arrangement until ten years have passed."

Hiashi gave a scathing look to the boy, initially insulted, but gradually began to sense the wisdom of the reply. He had always been against Hinata's mandated courtship from the council of elders because his daughter had been, in his eyes, much too young for marriage and what came with it. Luckily, Magan's child had been prudent enough not to say "no" but rather had chosen "later."

"A lot can change in ten years." Magan reminded them.

"That's the point." His son chuckled.

Hiashi closed his eyes and sighed, "Do you wish to postpone any agreements with the Taketori clan, Hinata?"

"Yes, Father."

"Very well." He turned to his companion, "Then this matter is settled. It is an auspicious match…and it is undesired presently."

Magan shook his head, amused, "I won't start an argument. I'll admit, I was enthusiastic about this get-together…but I want Kitano's wishes to be respected."

"Thank you, Dad." He slipped, and then amended, "F-Father."
Hiashi inclined his head towards attendants waiting patiently across the yard. They noticed the gesture and briskly made their way over.

"This is farewell for now, Magan, but I will stay in touch with you. We have a conference scheduled in one month, irrespective of this decision." He gave a short, professional bow to the father and son, "I appreciate your consideration, Kitano-sama. You've had more regard for my daughter's future than any other suitor, and I will not forget that."

The boy returned the bow and then uttered a hushed goodbye to Hinata. He and his father were ushered along by their caretakers with somber looks, as they had presumed the young master's meeting to be a failure, not knowing it had all been well-met.

Hiashi walked alongside his daughter slowly as they returned to the house.

"Father?" She gave him a concerned, sidelong look, "You don't mind that I turned him away?"

He continued gazing straight ahead, "I don't. And I never will, no matter who the guest is."

She chanced a small smile.

"He was an ideal match for you, but I will try to downplay that fact when I report to our elders this evening." Hiashi mused, "They could very well harangue me no matter how you interacted with Kitano. This invitation to the Taketori was their most sincere effort."

"I…I hope they don't."

"I'm accustomed to it." He opened a door and extended a hand to help her step up so that she wouldn't trip over the length of her kimono, "It will not get any easier after this. I did not expect it to."

She quietly thanked him and blinked as he steered her towards Kayato's dressing room. Hinata wore a questioning expression as her father remained nonchalant.

"I'll send Kayato to help you undress. Change out of that gaudy thing…and then go do something you really care about."

Three days later, Tsunade was finishing up a memorandum for Jiraiya. It was mostly an update about how her ANBU agents were putting in some serious overtime. She had eyes everywhere on her causes for alarm.

It was not only her Black Ops keeping busy, though. She had her "priority" generation of Genin attending to nearly every mission that was available. Tsunade had increased their workload as a preamble to the Chunin Exam (not yet verified by the council) to be sure that they could handle more serious tasks. Their overall performance was optimal or outstanding, which boded well.

Tsunade put down her pen and exhaled deeply, setting the message aside.

The day before, she had sent Shino to the Tea Country with Ino, Chouji, and Sato to intercept a black market caravan. At the same time, a request had come in demanding a group with a similar skill set. Knowing she would prefer to send her Genin than "otherwise preoccupied Chunin," she pulled together a special group, beginning with Shikamaru.
He had been informed to round up Kiba, Neji, and Lee before reporting to her office, which was handily achieved.

"I'm glad you all made it," The Hokage smiled, turning to the team leader, "I apologize for the short notice, Shikamaru. You were unreachable at your clan's research facility for a few days, and I would have preferred sending you to the Tea Country, but the timing didn't pan out. I'll have you working on this C-Rank mission, if you don't mind."

He shrugged with his facial expression, "I guess I don't."

"This assignment is relatively standard, however it will require much of your time and attention. Perhaps a week or so…" She began, "I was contacted by retainers of the Oga clan, who reside on the southern gulf coast of the Fire Country. In preparation for a wedding, the clan is seeking supplemental security for their grounds and attendees," Tsunade leaned back in her chair, "More specifically, the bride and groom. Your group will be equal parts detection and brute-force peacekeeping, as they itemized."

"The Oga clan can't defend itself from…wedding crashers?" Shikamaru was trying to interpret the data.

"Beats me. They're a bunch of wimps. Their clan head made an attempt to marry into the Hyuga recently, I've heard." She replied, noticing that Neji had bristled at the memory of when 34-year-old Moritsune had showed up with a boatload of flowers for Hinata.

Tsunade continued, "I'm sure they could use some help. They have no shinobi background and solicit Konoha for aid frequently. The leader's younger brother, Sanomune, is getting married. The event has garnered an unusual amount of attention for whatever reason."

Lee raised his hand.

"Yes, Lee." The Hokage acknowledged him.

"Tsunade-sama, does this suggest that we are invited to a wedding?"

"Hm. I suppose it does."

"Then perhaps we should bring formalwear?"

Her eye twitched, "Lee…I don't advise that any of you weigh yourselves down with fancy attire. Of course, don't show up looking like slobs, but don't stress over glamor. Just go as shinobi. That's what they called for and so that's what they get."

He nodded in understanding.

"No plus ones, I guess?" Kiba joked.

She smiled slyly, "There are four of you. Decide amongst yourselves how you will pair off."
The trip south was pleasant, particularly for Neji and Lee, who were grateful to have trusted comrades on the team. Though they had wondered what became of Sai, their Root acquaintance had caused too much anxiety and mayhem for them to ever request him as a teammate again.

After a two day's journey they reached the magnificent residence of the Oga. It was an ostentatious castle within an ishibei: a tall, stacked-stone perimeter wall. The fortress was tucked in and among ancient trees and topiary plants on a hill that overlooked the sea.

The Leaf team was stopped at the outer gate by two armed guards, and after providing their identification, they were propelled into an inner wall where they were met again by a grounds warden. They were greeted warmly enough and brought into the main palace yards.

Shikamaru listened with half a mind as servants lead them on towards the lord's favorite pond. He had tuned out Akamaru's heavy panting beside Kiba, as well as Lee's curious comments to Neji. His mind had honed in on one alarming detail about the castle.

It was enormous. If any hooligans planned to crash the party, Shikamaru suspected that they had probably already found a place to hide. He would need to do a sweep with Neji's eyes and Kiba's nose to be sure no undesirables were lurking.

"Ah! Hello."

"Hm?" Shikamaru snapped back to his present environment.

"You are the team leader, correct?"

"Yeah," His eyes went from the uniformed attendant to the man seated regally beside a pond, "The Hokage sent us to supervise the upcoming nuptial."

The man stood from a bench and smiled weakly, "Thank you for coming early. I was hoping I could go over my security concerns with you."

"Are you the groom?" Shikamaru asked.

He shook his head, "No, I'm Moritsune. My younger brother Sanomune is getting married." He looked left and right before adding, "He should be here to be properly introduced to you good Leaf ninja…but I suppose I'll be managing things again."

Moritsune indicated for them to follow him into the towering house after removing their shoes. He led them along a hallway lined endlessly with traditional rooms. A servant had briefly fussed about Akamaru's indoor visit but Moritsune immediately gave his consent and sent the bellyacher away. Shikamaru mentally mapped the layout of the house as they proceeded. He then divined the reason for Sanomune's absence.

'Ritzy place. Bet I can call what kind of a situation we've got going on here…' The Nara watched the back of Moritsune's head as he followed, thinking, This is a prototypical big brother who caters to a younger brother. Probably bends over backwards to take care of his needs…and Moritsune's the leader of this clan too, which means he's been busy to begin with. All that caretaking has resulted in this gentleman having no time to find a respectable wife and marry, thus affording his pampered...
brother every opportunity to meet eligible women.'

Shikamaru clucked his tongue and Kiba gave him an odd look.

"I'll give you the lowdown later." Shikamaru told him in a quiet voice.

"About what?"

"How sad this is."

"What's sad? We're in a gorgeous house full of rich people who are about to have a huge wedding," Kiba remarked.

"It's sad because all of that pomp isn't for the guy in front of us. And he's not getting any younger."

Kiba nodded sagely, seeing the valid point.

Lee got in on the evaluation in a whisper, "I see! Neji, is Moritsune not the same man who visited-?"

"Don't bring that up." Neji said shortly.

"Ah. Very well."

They were brought to a garden-viewing room with tatami mats and asked to sit and relax. Moritsune quietly asked a servant to locate his brother before joining them on floor cushions.

"I'm terribly sorry. He should be with us shortly. I apologize for not asking your names when you already know who I am." Moritsune was contrite, "Please tell me about this team."

Shikamaru leaned back on his arms and recited the usual spiel, "Nara Shikamaru. I'll be coordinating your event security." He turned to indicate his companions, "Inuzuka Kiba: tracking and detection. Hyuga Neji: detection and attitude. Rock Lee: perfect manners and muscle."

Neji gave Shikamaru a mildly annoyed look, but couldn't argue with the description. Kiba and Lee found their introductions reasonable.

"What a capable group!"

"You've got that right. So, I suppose you don't want us on active lookout only on the wedding day?" Shikamaru continued.

"Right. I'd like you to get acquainted with the manor and be sure no one can sneak in. Servants have a bad habit of leaving doors and windows ajar. We've had…unwelcome visitors in the past." Moritsune waved his hand, "Not to worry! I have a feeling you can do this. I've already warned staff repeatedly to seal entrances for the rehearsal tomorrow. The wedding is the day after, so you'll have some time to prepare."

"Where should we position ourselves during the ceremony?" Shikamaru wanted particulars, "Should we stay out of sight?"

"I would recommend that you don't show yourselves. I don't want guests to be alarmed. Though…my brother has shinobi friends who will be allowed out in the open…We should discuss it with him and see what his preferences are."

The Nara added, "Any areas of concern?"
"The roof."

The boys gave the man a strange look.

Moritsune clarified, "Well…that's how they enter. Some intruders have climbed the surrounding trees to get over the outer wall. Our top level is not very well guarded and some have managed to sneak in that way."

Shikamaru made note of it, "Alright. We'll stake out the top floor at night and set humane traps during the day."

"I appreciate it."

"If we capture a trespasser, do you expect us to turn them out of this estate immediately or should they be detained?" Neji asked.

Moritsune was debating it, "If you toss them out they might just sneak in again…you can tie them up, I guess."

Lee interrupted politely, "Forgive my asking, Moritsune-sama, but why would someone try to disrupt the ceremony?"

"I'm not sure. My brother was worried about it and asked for guards." The man replied, "But as soon as he shows himself we can find out more."

"He's taking his sweet time," Shikamaru commented, peeved, "We can find him for you, if you like."

"Really?"

"Yeah; Neji can spot him without leaving this room." He inclined his head towards Neji, "Do you mind?"

He shrugged and activated his Byakugan.

Moritsune advised, "He looks like me but his hair is shorter. I think his robes were violet today…"

"Located." Neji frowned, "We won't be having a discussion with him anytime soon."

"Why not?"

He phrased it considerately, "He is…occupied with his intended."

While most of the gathered men blanched at the announcement of Neji's discovery, Kiba merely laughed, "Ha! Some guys just can't wait."

The day passed as they took a tour of the castle and its central tower, and Akamaru sniffed scents to identify typical visitors to each section of the building. Moritsune answered Shikamaru's questions to the best of his ability all the while.

They rounded a corner past a communal bath towards a residential wing and stopped. Moritsune greeted a servant with mild surprise.

"Kim! I didn't know you were back." He told the girl, "My brother said you had left on-"

"A wilderness sabbatical." Her monotone voice was unsettling. She was a short thing with bobbed, orange hair and a permanent frown. Her uniform and apron were a bit untidy.

"Oh. How was it?"

"Not satisfying."

"You'll be managing the first floor again?"

"Yeah." Her sharp eyes settled on the shinobi behind him, "One, two, three, four…what do they want?"

"Can you show them to our guest quarters? These are the Leaf ninja who'll be part of the wedding security force."

Her tangible hatred was making Kiba's skin crawl and he shrunk behind Lee. Neji and Shikamaru were impervious to the odious aura.

"Fine." She turned on her heel and began walking.

Moritsune didn't seem phased by her rudeness and explained, "She's our best worker, but also a misanthrope."

"How does that balance out?" Shikamaru wondered.

"She detests my brother but she accommodates me well enough. Ask her for whatever you need. I'll tell Sanomune to quit loafing around so he can meet your group."

And they split off from the Clan Head to follow the cynical maid. They were taken down a long hallway with lacquered wood floors and, after sliding open a rice paper door, Kim frowned and gestured with her thumb. Lee peeked into the space.

It was an exorbitantly large room with wide, southward-facing windows. They entered and beheld the rustic artwork, porcelain vases and lamps; as well as the low, antique table and a stack of futons on the side of the room beside a folding screen. Shikamaru turned to the servant, "Thanks."

She had sensed a kindred spirit in the Nara, "Do you ever…think about death and get sad and stuff?"

"Uh…like once a month." He estimated. Then he went inside and shut the door, proclaiming to his subordinates, "She is one freaky bitch. We'll probably have to keep our eyes on the staff too."

"Is that freaky behavior?" Lee asked as he set his travel bag down, "She reminded me of Neji."

"By comparison, I'm an optimist." Neji disagreed, "And I can change the tone of my voice."

Shikamaru got comfortable on the floor mats, "He has a point."

Akamaru trotted around the room, nose-first, becoming acquainted with the smells of their surroundings. Kiba collapsed to the floor opposite Shikamaru and breathed a sigh of relaxation, "Gotta love neurotic, wealthy clans…" Neji's nostrils flared and he added, "I don't mean yours, promise!"

Lee took a seat beside Neji and complied when the white dog nudged him to be pet.

"So did you really catch that guy doing it?" Kiba continued the conversation.

"It's hard to mistake." Unabashed, Neji added, "I have seen worse things unintentionally."
"Hopefully it was the woman he planned to marry." Shikamaru mused, folding his arms beneath his head, "I never sign up for drama like that..."

Distraught, Lee gasped at the suggestion of infidelity.

"What, Lee? It's something that does happen."

"To trample on the institution of marriage-!" Lee's eyes watered.

"At least as far as I could tell, Sanomune and that woman were not strangers." Neji reported, "Don't get worked up about it."

"Yeah, I'd like to see someone beat my dad's track record," Kiba said mordantly, propped up on a single elbow, "He's an institution-demolitionist."

The height of Neji's eyebrows belied a bit of sympathy, "Has he been caught yet?"

"It's got to be soon. A tracking squad went after him and he walks at about the speed of molasses." He supposed, "Unless he can vanish into thin air, he is so dead when my mom finds him."

"And I thought my mom was scary." Shikamaru snickered.

"What about you guys?" Kiba asked, turning to Lee and Neji, "I bet you've got tough mothers."

"We are parentless." Neji deadpanned.

Shikamaru shifted his eyes to Kiba in a "shit, why did you say that?" expression while the Inuzuka gasped at the conversational faux pas.

Lee's sympathetic remark rescued the discussion, "That is why we are close to the rest of our families. My grandfather has raised me all my life, so I have never felt lonesome."

"Oh yeah, you said he was training you these days." Kiba recalled.

Shikamaru added, "Ino told me she saw you both doing splits in the park with some old dude."

"Really? She didn't stop by to say hello." Neji snipped sarcastically. He was not a fan of splits.

"Nah. She was afraid if she did that he'd make her join in."

"Grandpa is considerate of ladies. Unless she was a student, I do not think she would have been asked to participate..."

"I've never tried doing one of those." Kiba noted.

"Allow me to demonstrate!" Lee offered and executed a perfect pose on the floor. He nudged Neji's shoulder so that he'd join the exhibition.

"No." He said flatly.

Shikamaru frowned, "No way you could get me to do that. That's a woman-exclusive skill."

"You have a tendency to be semi-sexist, Shikamaru." Kiba observed, carefully positioning himself on the mats, "And you know that statement is a load of shit because Lee can do it. I think maybe I can..."
"Good luck. And I'm not sexist."

Neji snorted in amusement at the assertion.

"What, Neji? You beg to differ?" Shikamaru grumbled, "Even you've shared that perspective a few times in your life, I'm sure."

"I am not sexist." Neji smirked, "I am equally critical of everyone."

"Completely true." Kiba agreed, "Hey! I got it!" He had miraculously done a front split, balancing his arms on either side of his body on the floor, "This is a small accomplishment…"

Akamaru laid down beside him and stretched out, trying to mimic the maneuver.

Shikamaru was further irked when Neji rather easily performed the stunt beside Lee, maintaining his bored expression. "Seriously, why do you all have to do that?" He growled.

"Solidarity." Neji replied evenly, "This is not a feminine skill."

"Jeez, I already said that I'm not sexist."

"What he means to say is…" Lee had decrypted the source Shikamaru's off-color comments, "Shikamaru is lazy and does not want to try. That is why he claimed it could not be done."

Kiba and Neji seconded and thirded the opinion and their team leader was quickly incensed. Total mutiny. Even Neji, who was frequently disinterested in participating in silly tiffs, had went ahead and made an example of him.

Though he kept it to himself, Shikamaru understood that Neji's firm belief in the power of women was reflective of his personal experiences. Tenten and Hinata had made a lasting impression on him. 'And now Lee, who can bend his body like a pipe-cleaner, is corrupting Neji's once unshakeable aloofness. I don't have anything against women. I don't.' He frowned to himself, 'I am just terrified of my mother.' Hopefully they couldn't tell.

Without any preemptive knock, the door of the room slid open. The boys simultaneously looked up at the visitor, still in their respective splits.

Shikamaru smirked, 'Now I am so glad I did not attempt it.'

There stood a shabbily dressed look-alike of Moritsune. He was a bit shorter with curly, dirty blonde hair. Neji quickly recognized the visitor as the man he had accidentally spied on earlier, albeit with some clothes on. Well. A T-shirt and brown pants. Tremendously odd.

"Well, uh…" He batted his lips together uncertainly, "Cool! Splits? Are you guys the entertainment or something?"

Cross-legged and arms folded, Shikamaru set the record straight, "No. We're your security team. That is, if you're Oga Sanomune?"

"That's me." He nodded with a friendly smile, "And if you were the entertainment troupe I'd be impressed."

"Don't be. We were getting bored waiting for you to show up." Shikamaru added.

Neji, Lee, and Kiba returned to seated positions and gave reserved looks to Sanomune…who was giving off a vibe similar to that of the eccentric maid's. That and his outfit was not befitting of a young clan lord. ‘But what do I know? I don't dress to impress.’ Shikamaru thought.

"Sorry! Thanks for coming. You made it before everyone else. I'm still waiting on the rapper I hired. Ramo-chan enjoys his music."

Shikamaru was deciphering the babble. He assumed that Ramo-chan was the bride, but it just as likely could have been a pet parrot.

"What's a rapper?" Neji breathed quietly.

"If you don't already know…" Kiba told him in a hushed voice, "There's no way we can explain it, Neji."

"Come with me!" Sanomune led the way out of the guest room, "So I'm Sanomune. Hi. You already know my big bro…and you guys-?"

Shikamaru repeated the same introduction he had given earlier.

"Oh. Nice." He enjoyed the descriptions, "You guys have totally got this."

Lee whispered to his teammates a half-step ahead of him, "He seems very enthusiastic."

In a low voice, Shikamaru assessed, "It could just be the drinking water here. On that note, I expect all of you to boil yours first. I'm not letting any of you go on a trip to crazytown."

They took an incredibly steep and narrow staircase to the upper level of the castle. The top floor was rather bare; a wide open space of polished wood floors and support timbers. Many of the windows were open.

"Not this again…" Sanomune growled, "They're compelled to leave these open, but I'm telling you that's how clowns get in here." He turned to Shikamaru, "Would you mind keeping an eye open for intruders up here? It might be a handful. Some servants don't shut-"

He fell silent as Kim materialized behind him. With a terrified squeal Sanomune hopped back and listened as the maid explicated, "Some servants dust your house. Then they air out rooms. In your house."

"R-Right! I only meant that these w-windows don't get shut…now and again."

"Not my fault. Not my problem. I'm back from my vacation, if you couldn't already tell. And I've got some bad news." The maid reported.

"What's that?"

"I hate you."

Shikamaru was grateful they were a few paces safely away from the hair-trigger servant.

Sanomune thought on it, "But Kim…you hate everyone."

"You're part of everyone." Her eyes skimmed over to the team of Leaf ninja, acknowledging Yes, you too, before she picked up a rag and a broom and stalked away.

Kiba broke the silence, "Can't you just fire her, man? She's horrifying."

"One time I tried that and then my entire staff rebelled." Sanomune explained, "I've got to live with
"It's my fault she's like that."

"What'd you do?" Shikamaru inquired.

"She and I were once…" He trailed off, but the Leaf team got the gist of it, "And then I met…"
Sanomune shrugged, "You know. Time marches on."

The young lord stood by and watched as Shikamaru directed his team to stake out portions of the roof and all portals of entry. Neji had devised some particularly nefarious and inescapable traps that earned a thumb's up from Shikamaru. They set plenty of trip-wire; a butt-ton of it, Kiba had estimated. Akamaru sniffed around the exit hatch of a dumbwaiter before trotting back to his master's side. After securing the level they moved down to the second floor again, following Sanomune to each zone of concern.

"This water closet." Minutes later they stopped again, "This cupboard, " And meters away, again, "This coat rack is suspicious!"

"No one can hide in that." Shikamaru said glumly.

"Just put a trap close to it, then. I'll give you extra."

"Sure." Shikamaru sighed, muttering, "You're nuts."

Staff were kindly warned of the hazards and asked to be alert. They passed the afternoon in a fog of stupidity and paranoia, and were finally deposited back in their guest quarters. Ever the ditz, Sanomune had completely neglected to ask them if they needed anything or desired a meal. He strolled off to find his bride, as far as Neji's Byakugan could tell, watching the man bustle towards a woman in a craft room.

"Yay for us." Kiba fell back on the floor mats, "We're getting paid extra because he's paranoid, but we've got to starve in the meantime."

"I am famished." Lee agreed.

"We're ninja. We could steal that oaf's entire kitchen stock and he'd never realize it." Shikamaru observed, "I am not going hungry."

"That would be disrespectful of Moritsune. This is his property, not his brother's." Neji argued.

Shikamaru flattened himself on the floor, groaning, "We need to eat."

"Be patient."

A knock at the door. It slid aside partially and a dark haired male servant poked his face in, "Supper, courtesy of Lord Moritsune. Is now an appropriate time?"

Shikamaru looked to Neji, "You saw that coming."

"I did."

"You could've just told us. We were on the verge of losing it."

Kiba invited the servant in who expertly set out a spread of food and baskets of treats on the table. After leaving cups, flatware, and a huge pot of tea the retainer hurried out, wishing them well. The boys gathered 'round and gladly helped themselves. Akamaru sat politely behind Kiba and was promptly gifted a basket of roasted duck and vegetables.
And it was decided over dinner that Neji would take the first watch of the third floor that night. It was because he had given the team leader the most sass.

The crescent moon was low in the sky when Neji made himself comfortable on the vast tile roof of the castle. He had found a nook beside the enormous, golden shachihoko motif where he could keep out of sight if, heaven forbid, a party crasher snuck by.

He noted that the mythical shachi, a tiger-headed fish beast, was an ornament often placed on roofs to protect them from fire. Purely superstition. Castles still burned to the ground, regardless. They'd be better off with a fire-extinguishing seal. He thought, but that was a tool that ninja employed, not aristocrat families. Shachi ornaments came in pairs. On the left side of the building where Neji was seated, the male beast would be installed; and on the right side, the female.

He stared across the sloping rooftop towards the distant, complimentary sculpture. He thought that Tenten might settle herself there if she had been a part of this mission. She was always a perfect counterbalance.

Neji exhaled through his nose harshly into the chilled, spring air. These days she had become an apparition; a figment of his imagination. With his eyes alert and body paused in a comfortable crouch, he allowed his mind to wander a little.

She was definitely getting stronger. He had been told that she was training with Gekko Hayate. Neji smiled a little at the thought of how her personality was clashing with her new mentor's. That was the girl he knew. Unyielding. Tenten would take heed of her lessons and spin them into deadly techniques. Maybe, someday, he would have the pleasure of seeing those results for himself if he was permitted to train with her.

Neji's slight smile faltered and then disappeared. She might never again be on a team with him or Lee. Tsunade's investigation and defensive efforts were highly ambiguous with no end date in sight. She may feel the need to put Tenten elsewhere…where she could very well adapt and grow and shine; befriend a new team and balance them as she so effortlessly did theirs.

The ease and security he felt when she was near…it would be gone for good. It would be stationed on another team with other people. The idea sunk into him like a hook into fish flesh.

Neji conceded that, in spite of the circumstances, Lee had found a way to balance him through alternative means, and proven himself an irreplaceable friend. Yet, it was not the same as the days Tenten had stood by his side. He was uncomfortable with the seismic change. It also soothed him, if by way of distraction.

It had not occurred to Neji at all that, in the old days, he spent most of his waking minutes with Tenten. By choice. After she had gone, Neji had finally noticed a shift in the company he kept. Lee had gradually introduced him to the companionship that their friend group offered. In particular: the young men he had often thought himself superior to.

He was quickly realizing that his contemporaries had quite a lot to share with him. Even more to teach him! It was enjoyable at times. In other words, he knew he would get used to it.

A flock of bats flittered through a beam of moonlight and then roosted in a tall tree. The flock's soft squeaking was a sweet tune in the night.

But underneath this newfound strength and comradery was a misery unlike any he had ever felt before. The death of his father had acuity like it, but that loss was dulled due to time. It made every other obligation in his life; whether to friends, or his clan, or Lee's relentless grandfather, seem like cotton candy in the hand. Air-light and fluffy and gone in a nip. More or less.

The yearning he felt was a cinder block of lead on his chest that never let up. Day or night. Training or dreaming. It pressed. It reminded.

It was unbearable to be apart from her.

Something crossed the lax path of his eyes and Neji blinked. A striped, gray cat stalked across the rooftop and along a gutter on silent paws. He watched as it crouched, zeroed-in on an unsuspecting mouse near a pantry window, and then it burst forward with stretched claws. The mouse scuttled to the safety of the cracked window, but the cat did not give up. It dove over roof timber and into an inactive stove vent, infiltrating the house, and then resumed the chase indoors.

"Hm." He was mildly impressed.

Neji watched the cat's hunting path in the castle with the Byakugan for a short while before growing bored. He continued his vigil until, some hours later; Shikamaru turned up to relieve him of the watch. They had agreed that Kiba and Lee would alternate and stand guard the following night, thus affording them an entire night's rest.

"See anything interesting?" Shikamaru asked.

"Wildlife. No activity, otherwise."

"Alright. Get some sleep. I'll watch until morning to make sure no one tries to squeeze behind Sanomune's coat rack…"

In the morning, Shikamaru had to avoid hustling servants in the halls after descending from his post. He returned to the room, opened the door, shut it behind him, stepped over Neji and Lee, asleep, and then fell face-first onto the futon beside Kiba. Akamaru perked up for a second at the disturbance, but then curled up again.

Nothing at all. Silence all night, except for local bats and insects.

'Stupid.' Shikamaru thought. Then he went to sleep. At least they were being paid handsomely.

Some dozens of minutes later, Lee stirred. He allowed a servant inside and thanked him for dropping off a morning meal and tea. Kiba and Neji arose at the smell of food, but even that wasn't enough for their team leader. They left Shikamaru where he was so that he could catch up on rest.

"Today is the rehearsal." Lee announced with a pointed finger, "This means that we may experience more serious attempts from party crashers."

"I doubt it." Kiba yawned, "Neji and Shikamaru didn't see anything last night. Why would they bother now when they know more eyes will be peeled?"

"The entire third floor will detain any trespasser for quite some time." Neji added while pouring tea, "They've missed their chance."

"Maybe." Lee relented, helping himself to some food.

Shikamaru slept the whole morning away. Neji took over and led his teammates towards Moritsune's sitting room on the first floor. The lord of the Oga clan was contrite, "Forgive me. I was not able to check on you last night. I've been scrambling to keep in contact with a caterer and a no-show musician."

"You mean the rapper?" Neji assumed.

"Yes. But I have no idea what that is." Moritsune admitted.

Kiba shook his head at them.

"Did Sanomune cooperate?" The lord asked.

"He did." Lee confirmed.

"He's a little paranoid." Kiba pointed out, "What's up with that?"

"I've asked him several times, but he always tells me not to worry." Moritsune rubbed his chin, thinking, "He's put his mischief-making days behind him…but even now he still acts so jumpy!"

"What did he used to do?" Neji inquired, figuring it could provide a key detail.

"I don't know. He would leave the castle for days on end. He never spoke of his adventures." The man frowned, "But he always had this gratified look on his face when he returned! I worried that he was a moonlighting bandit or prankster…"

"We should ask him." Lee ventured, "If he was an aspiring graffiti-artist in his youth, then it will not do to have vandalized property owners take vengeance on him!"

"Of all the things he could do at night," Kiba sniffed, "I bet that wasn't it."

"I have my suspicions." Neji affirmed, "But it wouldn't be appropriate to voice them in front of his honorable older brother."

"Thank you. I fear I don't have the constitution for it."

Kiba turned around, "Let's find that guy. It could save us a whole lot of trouble."

They returned to the corridor and saw Kim approaching from the right, going after antiques with spray-cleaner. The boys hurriedly moved to the left, funneling down the hallway and around the corner.

Akamaru barked in a panic and leapt backwards.

"What's the matter-?" Kiba's question failed as he felt the unmistakable pull of a string, tugged taught as he took a step forward. Ahead of him, Lee hollered in surprise when he too triggered a trap.

They ducked in cover and Neji, at the back, shot a small Air Palm to knock away a hailstorm of darts, sparing his friends. Unfortunately, his technique sailed down the corridor and snapped the triggers of innumerable, hidden traps which he had noticed after the fact. The team gasped together in stupefaction and watched as wary servants ran for their lives, ducking and rolling away from swinging blades and clubs, firing projectiles, and other hazards.

"I didn't, I mean, we didn't…" Kiba turned in a small circle, "We didn't set anything up down here! Right? That could've killed someone!"

"Nothing at all!" Lee clamored.
Neji narrowed his eyes, "We're checking the third floor. Now." He bolted off and his companions followed, trusting that the Hyuga's eyes were now carefully scanning for errant traps.

It was a mad rush upstairs as the hysteria in the building spread. Neji halted the party at the narrow staircase for the top floor, scrutinizing it closely with his blood limit.

"Everything has been re-arranged. All of it…reset." He turned his head, getting a precise read on another location, "And Shikamaru is not in the guest room."

"Bathroom?" Kiba asked hopefully.

Neji looked closely in all directions, working through the dense details and woodwork of the house, "He's not anywhere that I can see."

Lee was ferklempt, "How? He would not leave without telling us!"

"He didn't leave." Neji rested his eyes, "He was taken."

Kiba and Lee stared at him with pounding hearts. They were rapidly deducing, just as Neji had, that the party-crashers were by no means ordinary.

Neji resumed slowly, picking a decent route, and then darted out of an open window and along a safe stretch of roof. He reasoned that they would avoid many of the snares that had been mysteriously and inconveniently set. They entered the building again at a balcony, down a landing with steps, and took a sharp right into Sanomune's bedroom; bursting inside unceremoniously.

The man shrieked in shock, startling his fiancé beside him in bed. Upon seeing who his visitors were, Sanomune covered his wife-to-be with the quilt and pulled a robe on. He stepped into the hallway, livid, "You can't just-!"

"I already did." Neji growled, "Our team leader is missing. Your entire castle is littered with traps. It took twenty minutes. Twenty. Minutes. Our attention was occupied with Moritsune-sama and someone was able to turn this fortress into a funhouse."

Helpless, Sanomune looked to Lee and Kiba, who were equally furious.

"Explain." Neji demanded.

"Hey! Keep your voices down!" Sanomune hissed, "I don't want Ramo-chan to hear…"

"Hear what?"

"About what's going on! I want her to feel safe." His shoulders slumped, "I should have mentioned…what was really bothering me…but you ninjas looked so cool and you had it together and I just thought…you'd handle it."

"These aren't party-crashers. They re-rigged our traps. Akamaru didn't scent 'em and Neji didn't see 'em." Kiba huffed, "What's the deal?"

Sanomune hesitated to say, "They're…"

"They are what?" Lee encouraged.

"They're…my…ex-girlfriends."

Neji looked at him blankly.
"Ex-girlfriends. The women I dated…before Ramo-chan." Tears welled in his eyes, "I was afraid they'd get angry if they learned I was getting married. They found out…I don't know how…"

"How are they doing all of this?" Kiba gestured wildly about.

"They're kunoichi."

Neji's handling of the situation collided with a cognitive brick wall. The ubiquitous you-asshole look he gave to Sanomune translated excellently.

Lee's eyebrows sloped in dismay, "All…kunoichi?"

"All of them. They hate me now." He whimpered, "Please help me!"

"Help you? What are they gonna do?" Kiba scoffed, "Kill you?"

"I…don't know. I just don't want them hurting my wife!" Sanomune confessed, "If they get away with killing me, then maybe it's deserved. I suck. Well I used to suck. Please protect Ramo, won't you?"

With folded arms, Neji raised his chin a bit. From the corner of his eye he exchanged a non-verbal idea to Lee, who clearly got the message.

"We'll guard you and the bride." Neji determined, "But first we need to retrieve Shikamaru. To do that you need to share with us as much information as you can."

"Okay."

"How many of them are we up against?"

"Well…" He furrowed his eyebrows, "Excluding Kim?"

"Excluding her. Unless you believe she is a threat as well." Lee clarified.

"That's an even seven."

"It isn't even considering that seven is an odd number." Neji's teeth barely parted when he spoke, aggravated, "I've checked twice, but it's unclear if you brain is fully formed."

"Don't mind him. He's got an attitude," Kiba interrupted, "So there are seven of them?"

"I've only dated eight people. Whoa, hold on. Ramo-chan makes nine…but she wouldn't hurt me." He smiled stupidly, "Just this morning we were-

"Stop." Kiba commanded, "Before Neji kills you. Before I kill you. That'd make all of this counterproductive."

"Right."

"How skilled are they?" Lee presented a practical question.

"In what respect?" He asked defensively.

"Are they Chunin-level? Jounin?" Kiba threw words at him.

"I don't speak your language."
"You do. Selectively." Neji pointed out.

"Okay! How about this? How quickly could they kill you?" Kiba posed, "And in what way?"

"Hmm…like a second. And…a hundred ways?" Sanomune pursed his lips, "Maybe."

"Highly skilled." Lee determined.

"Seven kunoichi." Kiba sniffed.

Neji looked out a window, brooding, "And an idiot to protect."

Again, Lee was insightful, "Are you sure they came in from the top level?"

"Seventy percent sure," He nodded, "But there's also the servant's quarters, the love tunnel, the dumbwaiter, the supply stack, the stage door, and the basement." He paused and regarded Neji and Kiba who were trembling with anger, "But they came in from the roof last time."

"Maybe…in an evolutionary sense…" Kiba murmured, "He's got it coming."

"We won't get paid if we fail." Neji put it in perspective, "Now to set priorities." He turned to Sanomune, "Hide yourself and your fiancé. Give your brother warning so that he isn't captured and used as leverage. We need to get to Shikamaru."

"Yes!" Lee echoed the sentiment, "Make your staff and family aware. Guests as well."

"Fine…but…" His eyes were wide as saucers, "What about Kim?"

Kiba followed after Neji and Lee as they took off down the corridor, "Tch! Just hope she doesn't point 'em straight at you!"

Meanwhile, in a poorly lit, subterranean room…

Shikamaru's eyes batted openly slowly and he yawned, 'Ah. Not bad. That was some pretty decent sleep after a night's watch…'

He sat up and bashed his head on something. Then, he immediately fell backwards again, supine.

"-the hell is this?" He murmured.

After his eyes focused Shikamaru observed that he was inside a barred, wooden crate. It was a near perfect size to fit him lengthwise, but when he tried to sit upright he would undoubtedly smash his head on the top of the container. His lips were pressed in a thin line of annoyance, 'Which one of those idiots is responsible for this? Is this some kind of practical joke?'

He glanced around without a word, noting his location. He was alone in what he guessed was an underground room, 'Basement of the castle, most likely.' It smelled damp, and the stone-lined walls and dirt floor were kind of a giveaway. Two incandescent bulbs wheezed light tiredly from both sides of the room. Some storage shelves and boxes were stacked around hither and thither. Behind the crate, Shikamaru marked the only entrance: a doorway that fed into an upward staircase. 'Basement.' He asserted.

Maybe this wasn't a joke. Maybe this was something to worry about.

"Pff. Great." He grumbled, rolling flat on his stomach. He rested his chin on the backs of his hands and took more time to think. There was nothing else to do.

He was probably moved without his team knowing. Shikamaru presumed that Neji or Kiba would have quickly noticed his absence, and, being aware that he was an avid sleeper, would have been surprised by his disappearance. They were probably looking. Or dealing with a problem. Or with the creepy housekeeping and idiot groom.

During his relocation he hadn't noticed a thing, 'I slept right through it.' It had been done carefully and judging by his cage, purposefully.

'So someone doesn't want me around.' Shikamaru smiled to himself, 'Crafty party crashers. They planned to bust in here and make sure that shinobi couldn't interfere. And they didn't hesitate to lock me up in.' He paused to shake the crate, which was padlocked at the top, 'A pretty sturdy box. All the way down here.' He also noted in frustration that if he couldn't stand, he wouldn't have an easy time of Shadow-Binding anyone to unlock his prison. 'I'm gonna have to cook up an alternative, then.'

If he was lucky, Kiba and Akamaru would be able to track his scent…in the event Neji didn't spot him first. But it didn't seem like it was meant to be. He heard the distinct tapping footsteps of a pair of heels descending the steps. Tense, Shikamaru prepared a hand sign in the hope of snatching his visitor in a shadowy strangle-hold.

The lights snapped off and plunged the room into darkness.

He heard a woman's voice, "You're a Nara. A handsome one too." The stranger entered the room and stopped; a black silhouette in the dark…and vaguely voluptuous.

Shikamaru was mildly fascinated the intruder was aware that an absence of shadows would nullify his attempts to use jutsu. It wasn't a good thing, but it was interesting. The woman retrieved several objects from a box, stored them in a hip pouch, and then rounded on the prisoner.

"I checked the idiot's attendance records and saw that a team from Leaf was called in." She chuckled, "It might've been a problem…if I didn't plan for things ahead of time."

"Wedding crasher?" Shikamaru guessed.

"Destroyer." She corrected.

"Ninja?"

"Most definitely." She purred.

"And a jealous bitch." He added shrewdly, "You, like everyone else, have got a problem with Sanomune."

"We all do. I came with backup. How do you think I got you into that tiger crate? It took more than one person."

"This is for holding tigers?"

"I set one loose in the dining hall." She added sadistically, "I love cats."

"Oof. You are making my mission fun."

"Oh? So you like it in there?"

"Not really. I bet your 'backup' is comprised of cats or jilted women."
"Both." She was more visible as she bent down to look at him, "You could say one and the same."
A small tabby prowled past the crate and rubbed against the woman's leg, "This is Gidion. He's my angel." She stood up and folded her arms, "And I am Haka. I dig graves and put people in them."

"Like stupid guys?"

"Yes. Like stupid guys who didn't seem stupid in the beginning...but then he just can't help showing it and he leaves you after promising to spend his life with you." She managed it in a single breath,
"Then he marries a common woman instead. It stings. It really does. Do you know what I mean?"

Wide-eyed, he admitted, "Nope."

"He was so taken with kunoichi...and then he insults us by settling with some skinny, hair-color-changing nobody!" Her rage shook the small room, "Sano thought he could get away with it! Ha! Of course he did...he'd just hide in his big castle and throw money at his problems..."

"I hear that's how it's done." Shikamaru agreed, eyeing the sword at her hip.
She looked at him critically from over black-rimmed glasses, "Cheeky boy. The best way to deal with problems...is to take them into your own hands. He'll never learn." She scooped up Gidion, "My friends are looking for retribution as well. I trust that you and your team won't get in the way. I don't have beef with you now...but so help you...if you resist or hinder us I will cut your dick off."

He put on a good I'm-not-scared front, "Sure thing, lady. I am not going anywhere. Just leave me and mine be."

"Good." Haka turned around, "Oh, and don't expect your team to find you. I'm keeping them busy."
She and her companion cat climbed the stairs, "Do you mind if I keep the lights off?"

"I'd prefer them on."

"Ha! Suck it." And she slammed a door shut on the upper level. The light switch hadn't been flipped.

"Archetypal..." Shikamaru rolled over again, "Nasty..." He kicked the lid of the box with both legs,
"Scorned..." And kicked again, "Cow." He got tired and stopped. It was tiger-proof, "Ugh. It smells in here..."

He glanced around, fully accustomed to the dark. 'Ino would've slapped her in the face. Probably would've kicked that cat too...'

Shikamaru felt around the corners and bars of the crate, 'I need to find some hinges...' A rattling explosion shook from upstairs and he watched as dust pittered down from the ceiling. Screams and panic followed as castle-folk ran to safety, 'Keep it together up there, Neji! You know what you're doing.' His hand stopped on the cool metal on the corner opposite of the padlock. 'There we go.,'

Poking around, the clever shinobi had thought to locate the pintle of the hinge. Since the tiger or whatever had been thrashing around in the crate so often, the joint of the door was loose. He wouldn't bother with a lock that couldn't be opened.

Shikamaru tapped, mapping the design in his head as he could not see what the outside of the container looked like. He nudged the back of a pintle, which slid easily through the pivot hold and out, plopping with a chime to the floor. Scooting back, Shikamaru worked on the second hinge, which was gummed up. It took quite a while to push the pintle free, but once it came unfastened there was nothing holding the hinge joints together.
He casually pushed up on the lid and it flopped over to the padlocked side of the box. Shikamaru stood up and brushed his clothes off, stepping out of the prison. I've thought longer and harder for board games than working on this great escape...'

He leapt up the stairs, flipped on the light switch and was stopped at the door. Locked. I could probably get out of this the same way, but... Shikamaru crouched down and peeked through the gap between the door and the floor of the first level. As soon as he saw a pair of feet go by, he captured the person with his Shadow Bind.

A screech of terrified confusion was cut short as Shikamaru orchestrated the step towards the door. The old servant reached for the latch, turned it, and then skittered away in fright as the shinobi released his hold. Shikamaru barreled through the door and into the free air again.

Taking in his surroundings, it was clear that the resentful band of kunoichi had unleashed havoc in the palace. Staff and residents were evacuating to the eastern portion of the manor, although Shikamaru suspected it wouldn't be much safer. Traps and flash grenades had been tossed and triggered ad nauseam to scare everyone off, They're probably trying to flush out Sanomune and the missus...'

In an uncharacteristically swift run, Shikamaru covered the distance of the long hallway. He took a sharp left around a corner and then tripped and fell over Akamaru. The dog barked joyously.

Kiba whipped around in shock, "Holy-! You made it!"

"Yeah," Shikamaru pushed himself up, his face flattened by the floor, "Made it."

"Neji saw that they captured you! We figured we needed to rescue you after dealing with all these bombs and junk."

Shikamaru dusted himself off again, "You were taking a little long."

"There are seven kunoichi after Sanomune!" Kiba brought him up to speed as they moved on, "He and his lady friend are hiding. Not sure where his brother is...and I got separated from Neji and Lee when a wall came down."

"I spoke to one of them: scary lady in heels and glasses. Has a sword and a cat," Shikamaru replied, ducking under a toppled beam, "Let's cut through the courtyard and find-"

Kiba held out his arm, barring Shikamaru from running headlong into a barrage of senbon needles. They skidded to a stop and traded glares with their assailant. The woman strolled along the railed, second-floor walk above them, flipping chestnut hair off of her shoulder. She was done up extravagantly, maybe for the occasion.

"Back off," She sounded bored, "Haka-sama already warned you not to interfere. You people just can't take direction, can you?"

"It's kind of hard to do when directions are given to me while I'm locked in an animal cage," Shikamaru added sidelong to Kiba, "Long story."

"Luli..."

A shorter, younger woman came to stand beside the brunette: on the husky side with short, blonde pigtails and war paint on her cheeks. She added to her comrade, "They screwed up once so let's just punish them."
The woman droned, "They should do what they're told…" She rolled her neck, "Or we'll just be wasting time and energy, Roxi."

"Men are pussies who don't listen. You know that."

"Say that like we're not standing right here!" Kiba shouted up at them.

"It's true. You all have a serious lack of balls and brain matter. Sano had a major deficiency."

The feisty short one bit back, "And Luli's a movie star. She knows how to take direction. You scabs can learn something from her!"

"I've got a direction for you then," Shikamaru snarked, "Stick to movies, doe-eyes! And you!" He indicated the short woman, "Your kindergarten class called. They say they're missing a toddler. Better hurry back."

After grinding her teeth at the insult, Roxi hefted a precariously large, iron-emblazoned mallet, which had initially looked like a cane for walking. Her partner dove gracefully from the walkway and hurled needles down at the Leaf ninja. They dodged in opposite directions, preparing for the inevitable melee.

While a swing of the mighty hammer came at his head, Shikamaru bent backwards, and from the corner of his eye, noticed Lee rocket past the window outside, 'Looks like he's got his own welcoming committee…'

After losing Kiba in the smoke and rubble of a wall collapse, Lee had been promptly kicked in the chest by a screeching woman. The blow had shot him through a window, shattered glass, and the kunoichi dove after him with her twin sister.

When the confusion of the ambush wore off, Neji thought it wise to go outside and help Lee, but was confronted by a third vengeful ex. She seemed to float above the ground before touching down. His skilled eyes noticed that it was in fact a wire trick, and also unnecessarily flamboyant.

"Oh look." The platinum haired, rockstar-esque woman smirked, "You must be the bride."

"No, actually," Neji was sick of jibes directed at the length of his hair, "Security."

"Are you just going to let Kata and Yana kick the shit out of your boyfriend?"

"I am debating putting you through a window. And I don't have a boyfriend."

She grinned and rode a wire back up to the next floor, "Don't worry! There's a someone for everyone. I've even had two at the same time…just make sure they don't find out."

His brain violently expunged the recommendation as he hurtled outside, pinpointing Lee's position with his blood limit. His teammate was making use of his Drunken Boxing Evasion, avoiding brutal assaults as the two kunoichi chased him along the top of a secondary roof. It seemed like they had agreed to aim for his eyebrows: a most prominent feature. They swiped and kicked like cyclones.

The twins had matching outfits, long hair (black and white) in pigtails, and furious war-cries as they attacked in unison. Neji might have called their Taijutsu impressive, but they had not successfully touched Lee once. Therefore, Lee was impressive.

Neji scaled the slope of the roof in a bound. He slipped his arm through Yana's block as Lee took a jab at her. The woman blanched in surprise as her arm lifted and exposed her ribcage plainly. Lee's timely second jab hit her. Her squeak of pain was rubber-duck like and she slid down a patch of tile. Her sister, Kata, leapt over her and shouted in aggravation. She aimed for Neji in unfair places, but it did afford her twin a moment to recuperate as Lee sprang again.

Both pairs were searching for opportunities to divide the opposing duo. Several times the twins had singled out Lee (or his eyebrows) and used combination assaults. The women swatted and struck with shocking ferocity until Neji's Jyukken strikes had all but crippled Kata. The girl bent double in pain, reached up as she fell, and grabbed a handful of Neji's hair. She tugged, upending his balance, and hurled him down into a courtyard below. Then she rolled up like a pill-bug and tried to recover in the safety of a rain gutter.

Now in a one-on-one brawl, Lee was about consider the Front Lotus as an option until a weighted wire lashed out, looping several times around his neck. He had the sense to bring his hand up and prevent a death-choke. Another wire snared his ankle, tripping him, and Lee looked up to see the rockstar woman as she left her perch, almost levitating. She had thought it prudent to keep the odds in favor of her female colleagues. Yana leapt at the chance, bringing her elbow down in a pile-driving motion. She missed Lee as he rolled down the opposite slope, and gouged a hole in a portion of roof with the blow. Lee stopped at the siding of the house lined with windows, struggling to breathe.

"Hold him still for me, Ingri!" The wrathful twin hollered, taking a stance.

The accomplice held the wire taught from above, and Lee tried to negotiate opening any of his Inner Gates while trying to oxygenate. Neither was working well. Fortunately for him, Neji's long-distance Air Palm had snapped the length of cord between Lee's neck and Ingri, freeing him. He gasped for breath and ducked as Yana's flying kick nearly had him. She soared into the house through an open window with a resounding crash.

Lee coughed and then gave a thumbs-up to his friend who was rushing up rails and timbers, "Thank you, Neji!"

Lee then jumped up the height of the inclined roof, pursuing Ingri as she retreated. The woman squealed in terror when she was cornered near the female Shachihoko motif at the edge of the building.

"Please don't hurt me!" She begged, falling to her knees in front of him, "I have three kids to provide for!"

"You do?" Lee's compassionate heart could not abide the idea of hurting a mother. He stopped.

Ingri promptly swept Lee's legs out from under him with a round kick. "Stupid ass!" He toppled off the edge, "None of us have kids!"

"Good." Neji remarked from beside her.

The lying woman drained of color. Neji had no qualms with folding her like a piece of paper with Jyukken strikes. For good measure, he planted a right hook to Ingri's face and watched as she plummeted an unsafe height down into a water feature.

Neji glimpsed over the sheer ledge of the roof, seeing that the broken length of cable knotted around Lee's leg had caught in a slot between tiles. Lee hung upside down, swinging to and fro gently. Neji reached down and caught his outstretched hand, hoisting him up, and then snapped the wire that had spared his teammate from a terrible fall. Lee appeared devastated.
"What?" Neji rumbled.

"She lied to me!" Lee threw up his arms, at the peak of offense, "My sympathy was preyed upon!"

He nearly rolled his eyes, "And a woman pulled my hair and tossed me off a roof. Those tactics are not above them." He shepherded Lee along, his Byakugan wary for booby-traps as they backtracked, "I can see Shikamaru and Kiba on the first floor. Let's go."

Neji and Lee returned to the skirmish on the first floor just in time to partake in a flashy yet unexpected victory. Kiba and his ninken (transformed) had overwhelmed the movie star; the woman was disheveled and bruised beneath a pile of plaster-and-wood rubble. Shikamaru, on the other hand, had not been faring well against the short, pudgy kunoichi. He already had a broken finger and several welts. She had nimbly avoided his shadow and tricks.

Neji held back and watched what would have been a textbook perfect "Dynamic Entry," but Lee missed. Roxi had anticipated the ambush and grabbed Shikamaru about the shoulders, spun around, and let the signature kick land squarely on Shikamaru's forehead (Forgive meee). In the same motion, the kunoichi had raised her mallet and brought it down over Lee. He rolled, slippery as an eel, and avoided the weapon while continuing his apology.

Shikamaru was out cold for three seconds before he woke up on the floor, sucking wind as he sat up.

"I am concussed." He decided.

Shikamaru blinked twice to make sure he was not imagining the skittish tiger slinking by. It was terrified of its surroundings. He confirmed with Neji in a hasty glance, seeing that the Hyuga had acknowledged the odd element in the room with a face that said: This isn't strange anymore.

While Neji and Kiba moved in to surround Lee's opponent, who was now swinging in circles, Shikamaru got his shit together. He stood up, rubbed his head, and then caught the cowering tiger in his Shadow-Bind, "We're putting you to work, Scardey-Cat!"

He turned on his heel, aiming his technique for Roxi, and Scardey-Cat lunged.

There was an ear-splitting scream as the tiger bore down on the woman, catching her face in its jaws. The mallet slipped from her hand and fell with a heavy thud to the floor. Lee covered his mouth to prevent a revolted gasp as his opponent was mauled.

When Shikamaru thought the brief but violent assault was enough for surrender, he released the tiger. It scampered away in fright and looked for something to hide under. Roxi, incapacitated, was still alive, but lay skewed on the floor. She sputtered curses. The team of Leaf shinobi regrouped.

"There will be more of them." Neji warned Shikamaru, "What is our next action?"

"We should find the idiot and Moritsune. Once we can secure their safety then we'll go to work disarming traps and…" Shikamaru frowned at the state of the castle corridor, "Cleaning all this crap up."

Kiba couldn't tell if he meant the petty kunoichi goons or the debris.

Neji's Byakugan could not spot any of their intended clients in the castle, but for better or worse, he could spot Kim. She appeared unscathed and was even dismantling traps that had not yet been tripped. He relayed this sighting and behavior to Shikamaru.
"I don't know if she's trustworthy." The team leader was hesitant.

"It may be worth inquiring that she is not an enemy, at the very least."

"Alright..." Shikamaru relented.

When they had made it to the eastern hall they caught up with the cranky maid at a castle exit. She looked over her shoulder at the team, disgruntled.

"Aren't you, like, supposed to be stopping death and destruction?" She complained, "I'm trying to keep my staff members alive. It's not my job to take down traps. You guys are shit ninja."

"Thanks." Kiba retorted, "You're a shit maid."

"No. I'm awesome. I'll clean up later. This is a six-person job, and we'll need more dustpans."

"Are you allied with the...ex-girlfriend coalition?" Neji had a hard time arranging the words, "We would like to rule you out as an antagonist."

"I hate everyone, but I would never kill anyone." Kim illuminated, "They're all idiots."

They accepted the answer and sighed in relief. It was nice to have someone on their side. The maid pushed the double doors open and gestured with her head, "Come on. My bookkeeper told me the caterer and entertainment arrived. They'll be waiting."

"Is now an appropriate time to let them in?" Lee wondered.

"Sure. They bothered showing up." She walked ahead of the team briskly, passing through castle yards and into the surrounding fortress.

From a distance they could see Moritsune leading a caterer and chefs (with a wagon of delicacies) towards a decorated building. Kim said it was the Theater Hall, "And that's where we're going."

Once inside they caught up with Moritsune, who had successfully sequestered the heedless chefs to the kitchen. He shut the door and exhaled, laying eyes on Kim and the security team, "Thank God you're all alive! I was scared the servicers would see the house and just leave!"

"I'll clean it. Promise." The maid murmured.

"The intruders were kunoichi." Shikamaru informed Moritsune, "Hence the state of your castle. Sorry. If we had known, we probably could have prevented some of the damage."

"It's alright. It's my brother's fault for not being forthcoming. Speaking of which..." The clan head hustled towards a door at the end of the lobby, "He and Ramo should be here. They already brought the musician inside!"

Kiba corrected, "You mean the rapper."

"Yes! But I don't know what that is." Moritsune repeated, entering the theater ahead of the team.

Beyond the heavy doors was a wide and spacious room, filled with tables and seats fit for a reception or gala. The grand stage was equipped with screens and a perpendicular catwalk that protruded out for ten meters. At the foot of the stage was the table at which Sanomune and his fiancé were seated. In the chair beside them sat the entertainment.

Dark skin with formidable tattoos, white, corn-rowed hair, dark sunglasses, with swords at his back…the team gradually realized, by indication of a headband, that the man was in fact a Cloud ninja. Kim assessed from beside them, "That's a sick goatee."

Shikamaru frowned at her, "The performer is another shinobi? Am I missing something?"

"He was hired as entertainment, not for security. Don't ask me. Sano's a fan."

Neji fell into step with Moritsune as he went to his brother, hoping to get to the bottom of his shenanigans. Kiba made a motion to follow but stopped. A table away from Sanomune and his company were two, blasé-looking young Cloud ninjas. They were leaned back in their seats while they stared at the ceiling. Akamaru's tail wagged.

Kiba had to stare for a moment with squinted eyes before recalling the kunoichi's name, 'That's Karui…' He wrinkled his nose, 'And her sidekick.'

He followed Lee and Shikamaru ahead towards the soon-to-be-weds, watching the familiar Kumo nin from the corner of his eye. Neither of them budged; wholly unaware of the people popping in and out of the theater.

"Sano!" Moritsune stopped in front of the table, hands on his hips, "Several shinobi infiltrated the house! If you were afraid of a threat like that why didn't you tell me?"

"Totally told you." Sanomune blinked, "And I hired a team. It's cool."

"It is not cool." Neji assured him.

Shikamaru added, "Turns out…the women who are attacking were all-"

Sanomune made a cutting motion against his throat, indicating that nothing be said. Shikamaru fell silent. A magenta haired woman sitting beside Sanomune smiled uncertainly, "Crashers got in the house?"

"Moritsune just likes to worry, you know that." He tried to play it off casually, "Detail-oriented kind of guy. The Leaf team is doing a great job. Check it out: they're all sweaty and stuff."

Ramo regarded them, "Yeah, I guess."

"You know Crash and the Boys are headlining for Killerbee tomorrow?" Sanomune added.

The woman brightened, "For real?"

"Yeah."

"I haven't seen them in ages. You're pretty thoughtful," She kissed his cheek and then turned to the rapper, "Do you mind doing another one for us, Killerbee-san?"

The man who had been sitting stock-still beside them raised his arms, gesturing while he spoke, "Straight up, pink-headed girl! Imma 'bout to spin your world!"

The woman beamed happily. A hush fell over her companions.

"This is it." Kiba poked his head through the gap between Lee and Neji, "Behold a new genre."

Lee was listening with an open mind, but Neji's face had become a sounding board of discomfiture.

Killerbee established a beat:
This real shit
That I spit
Made you want
To kick it
Your big day, gonna be sick
A triflin' rich-ass picnic
With Karui
And Omoi
Purebred ninja pedigrees
Sitting, stanking, they hate it here
But kids I thought I made it clear
I came back to rip y'all some rhymes
Never gonna waste your time
Def 'gon fill 'yo theater pits
And teach some whiny ni-ta-wits

Killerbee stopped and glared his students, "One day ain't gonna kill you."

"This is completely stupid." Omoi hissed in response, crunching down on a lollipop. He tipped back his chair and it slipped, dumping him to the floor. He laid there unmoving.

Karui frowned down at her teammate, "Have some dignity. This is a wedding."

"Weddings are stupid."

"Generally, they're not." She sighed, "But this one is."

"Yo, Karui," Killerbee pointed a flattened hand at her, "Sit his ass up."

She glanced over her shoulder with narrowed eyes, "I think Omoi wants to stay down there…where no one can see him."

"We're guests! So sit 'em up!"

Karui blinked, seeing Kiba among the additional people gathered around her sensei's table. She immediately recognized him. She pulled Omoi's chair upright and murmured, "The escaped Inuzuka is here…"

"What?" He peeked over at the other side of the room, "You sure?"

"Positive," She reported, patting Akamaru's head in her lap, "This dog just appeared. And I'm pretty sure I remember it."
"Yeah... you're right." Omoi reached over and mussed Akamaru's head, "Hey boy. You're that friendly dog, huh?"

Akamaru's tail wagged with enough force to wobble his entire backside.

Killerbee continued rapping for the enchanted couple. Shikamaru, Lee, and Moritsune didn't seem to mind it much, and Lee had likened it to "very original poetry." Kim had drifted towards the stage to look for microphones.

Neji stood in chagrinned silence, feeling as though he was trapped in a waking nightmare.

Kiba had only been paying half-attention to the performance, as he had turned to face Karui when the kunoichi coolly made her way over to him. She stopped beside him and folded her arms, "Long time no see."

His smile was wolfish, "Hey, Karui."

Shikamaru's ear discreetly tuned in to the unexpected conversation behind him, 'No way! They're acquaintances?'

"You remembered my name," She looked pleased, "Sorry. I don't remember yours."

"Kiba," He reminded her, "But you called me dog-breath."

"Oh yeah."

"So you're here for the wedding?"

"Our sensei was hired to entertain." She sulked, "But he dragged me and Omoi along. He said he wanted us to get out and trip more."

"Well it looks like he picked a good location," Kiba's eyebrows rose cheekily, "You found me."

"I wasn't actually looking."

"Sorry if my escape caused you any inconvenience."

"Nah. I got over it," Her face was coy, "This is better timing now. My sword's been fixed."

Shikamaru nudged Lee, muttering, "Something weird is happening."

Accordingly, Lee and Neji gave their unnoticeable attention to Kiba and his red-haired confrère, feigning interest in the bizarre lyrical routine in front of them. It was a rare thing to get any kind of non-violent interaction from a kunoichi, at least these days.

"Oh, so you want a rematch?" Kiba teased.

"I've thought about it." Karui smirked and rolled her shoulders, conveying the sword at her back.

"That means you thought about me."

Her cheeks reddened but she was steadfast, "In the way that involves cutting your dog-face, I have."

"It's Kiba."

"I got that already."
"I thought about you too." He conceded, leveling the field.

"What do you want? A trophy?"

With nothing to lose, Kiba went for it, "How about another opportunity?"

Their tête-à-tête was in the background of the conversation going on between Kiba's teammates.

"He is…quite self-assured." Lee whispered to his teammate, "I would never be confident enough to speak to a beautiful woman!"

"You might find they're trouble later on." Neji opined, "Look at the position we're in: seven women after the blood of one man."

"Neji, you're not one to talk about troublesome women. That's my gig." Shikamaru replied quietly, "Sheesh! And your woman is trustworthy and loyal. You have no idea what trouble is. Don't preach."

Lee amended with a pointed finger, "Tenten is not an object, Shikamaru. We have discussed-"

"Shaddap!"

Meanwhile, in Neji's head, he had received a weird, unanticipated boost of elation that Tenten was indeed a faithful partner…and other men were picking up on it. Not to say that he had any official stake in Tenten's heart, as far as he knew. It was nonetheless a good feeling.

All pleasantries were disrupted by an incoming fireball.

It soared across the room, scattering Shikamaru's team and the Cloud students. Killerbee remained contently seated while Sanomune ducked under the table, coaxing his confused fiancé down with him.

Two kunoichi that the Leaf ninja had not yet encountered had appeared in a puff of smoke. Shikamaru, for one, had spoken to Haka in the dark, but was surprised by her immodest appearance in the light of day. 'Way too much cleavage...' And next to the ringleader was a scowling, dark-skinned woman with black rings around her eyes, 'Kind of like Gaara. Huh. I wonder if Gaara does his with eyeliner?'

"Matti, look!" Haka was tittering with laughter, "They invited a circus for the wedding! How about that?"

"Too bad we weren't invited." The dark woman gnashed her teeth.

Shikamaru confronted them, "Exes don't get that privilege, besides; you brought the circus. Why don't you pack it up and scram?"

"You've got a mouth on you." The leader smiled, "But we're not leaving without exacting the payback we deserve, Nara."

Abruptly, Omoi, Lee, and Neji had been pounced upon by replications. Kiba had darted back after snatching up Karui, sparing her from a swipe by one of Matti's clones. While evading, Neji took a reading with his Byakugan, 'Fire Clones, like the technique that Sato uses. These won't last long…'

Before a Fire Clone could grab Moritsune and use him for leverage, Lee had kicked the bunshin squarely in the back of the head, dispensing it with a burst of flame. He carried the Lord of the Oga to the table his brother was taking shelter under. Lee returned to the fracas as Kiba and Karui, in attempts to impress each other, swatted and smashed incoming clones.

Neji and Shikamaru were having difficulties with Haka, who was keeping them at sword's length. Omoi had come up from behind her to assist, parrying her swordstrike, trying to position her for the Leaf ninja. Shikamaru's shadow had pitifully missed several times, and Neji had nearly taken Omoi's head off with an Air Palm he had stepped in the way of. The woman laughed at their frantic cooperation and tossed a food pill to her cat, Gidion.

The tabby growled, his fur standing on end as his chakra soared, and Haka used seals to transform the feline into a Beast Copy of herself. Kiba was mildly outraged by the stunt, and hurriedly followed suit with Akamaru. He and Neji traded adversaries, and Lee found that Neji was more suitable in the clash with Matti, whose use of Fire Jutsu and clones was tearing the dining room apart.

Surrounded, Haka substituted when her enemies leapt for her. She wheeled away with impressive flips before settling on the stage, snickering, "You kids kind of made this fun…"

"Wah!" Sanomune screamed as he was dragged out from under the table by a wire. Ingri had returned, worse for the wear, and reeled him in from her position behind a screen. All of the other jilted women descended from various balconies and windows of the building, surrounding the united forces of Leaf and Cloud.

The groom was hoisted up so Haka could catch his chin and squeeze his face threateningly, "You know what I'm going to do, Sano?"

"Apologize?" He replied through fish lips.

She shoved him, pushing him down to the polished wood of the stage. Haka brandished her Ninjato sword, "I'm going to cut your dick off."

"I need that." He protested, "Please! Just leave everyone alone!"

"Why should I? You obviously don't know how to leave people alone; you've passed through the hands of eight women and rubbed salt in our wounds!"

"Nine, actually."

"The truth is…" She stomped on his stomach with a pointed heel, pinning him, "I want to kill everyone here. Your Leaf pals, your pink-haired whore, the entertainment…even the caterers. I want you to watch them die after I neuter you."

His eyes were wide, "You bitch."

"You're the bitch! You shouldn't have forsaken me-!" Her words trailed off.

In the span of a moment, tentacles had grown out from Killerbee's back and wrapped around the unsuspecting, would-be-avenged kunoichi. The women screamed in unison.

Killerbee continued to sit with his arms folded, "Bitter ladies need to cool it, fool ya fools!"

An eighth tentacle freed Sanomune from his hog-tie, and the groom was able to scamper back to his Leaf guards. The captured women struggled in panic when Killerbee stood, toting the prisoners along. Haka whistled for her transformed cat to come to the rescue, but the Cloud ninja brushed it aside when it came bounding. The cat hit a wall, released its transformation, and then slid down into "Gidion!" She began kicking in a rage, "Let go of me you freak! You're like some kind of porn monster!"

"That's just low…" The man replied, "But you should know…"

Eight Tails, that's me

Da rappin' Killerbee!

Makin' beats and rhymes

And makin' 'em live

It's what a Jinchuriki needs

To survive

A Tailed Beast resides

In my hide

Step aside

And prepare to be petrified

Cause it's hard out there for a Jinchuriki

When you're fightin' and recitin' and your rhymes are freaky!

My vanquished foes do the dance of defeat

And we celebrate my win with these ice cold beats!

He whirled the howling kunoichi around in a vortex, a few vomited from the spin, and he tossed them like ragdolls. They rocketed across the room and crashed into the screens of the stage, knocking the set over.

A moment later, Kim poked her head out of a stage door, looking around curiously. She noticed the pile of defeated kunoichi to her left, "Oh. I missed something." She turned and called for backup and several other janitors joined her in extricating the unconscious women, "Get this cleaned up. Watch out for that puke on the floor…"

Sanomune hugged one of Killerbee's beefy arms, not afraid of the receding tentacles in the slightest, "You're like my actual hero! I loved your music, but now I really love you."

"I'm dope." Killerbee agreed.

Shikamaru was assessing the abrupt and single-handed (or eight-tentacled) defeat of the party crashers. He gave a suspicious look to Karui and Omoi, "So…about what your sensei said before…is he really a jinchuriki?"

"He really is." Omoi confirmed.

"He's the Eight-Tail's container. He also thinks he's a superstar." Karui added, "Sensei is skilled and we trust him with our lives…but he never shuts up."

"Ah! The octopus arms that emerged from his body…" Lee was astute, "That was the Hachibi?"

"Yeah. They're buds." Omoi unwrapped another lollipop, "Not every jinchuriki is on good terms with their Tailed Beast, but Sensei made it work. He's one of the strongest shinobi in our village."

"Good to know." Shikamaru yielded, "He saved the idiot's wedding."

Moritsune arose from beneath the table and dusted his robes off. He crossed over to Shikamaru's team and also gave a grateful look to the Cloud ninja, "I would like to thank all of you! My brother would have been maimed if you hadn't intervened!"

"Just doing our duty." Shikamaru shrugged, adding, "But you may want to give us a little extra for our trouble."

Moritsune nodded, "I can accommodate that. Well! We have to get on with the rehearsal now…so would you mind helping us set these tables and chairs back up?"

"We're not getting paid." Karui nagged, motioning for Omoi to follow her, "Count us out." She located an intact table to relax at.

While Sanomune and his intended were still preoccupied with Killerbee's lyrics, Shikamaru and his teammates reluctantly cooperated in restoring the theater hall. A few times, the team leader caught Kiba glancing back at the red-haired kunoichi who had refused to help. Shikamaru flicked his ear.

"Hey!"

"Quit making eyes at her, Kiba."

"I wasn't making eyes at anyone, you grouch."

"We don't have time to mingle. We need to finish the security detail and get out of this hellhole."

"I know that. Jeez! Don't get annoyed just because I have game." He grinned mischievously. Kiba had moved over to the next row of dismantled furniture to work on his own, where, as luck would have it, Karui was watching him with a carefree expression.

Peeved, Shikamaru set up a chair and took a seat, reasserting his usual lazy-mode. He sighed, "I need a break. His ego just exhausted me."

"You deserve a rest, Shikamaru." Lee assured him, and then his voice lowered, "But what is game? Is that like rap?"

The next day, correspondence had been sent by messenger hawk from the Oga residence to the attention of the Hokage. Tsunade opened the scroll in amusement, supposing that Shikamaru had something to tell her before coming home.

Hokage-sama,

Nara Shikamaru, checking in. It might be worth mentioning that we arrived at the Oga homestead and were quickly attacked by a group of seven kunoichi. They wanted to get back at Oga Sanomune for rejecting them. Needless to say, we had our hands full.

The rapper hired to entertain the bride and groom happened to be the Eight-Tails jinchuriki from the Cloud Village. He also easily neutralized the threat. Don’t get me wrong, we deserve some credit for the work we did. Neji, Lee, and Kiba made a great team. Regarding the Hachibi, I have never encountered a jinchuriki as far as I know, but this shinobi from Kumogakure made a good impression on us. I could have done without the rapping though. It may be worth staying on Cloud's good side, whenever possible.

Unfortunately, we were asked to stay an extra day to participate in the wedding. Sanomune thinks we're friends now. If Neji turns up in your office all by himself it's probably because he couldn't stand the awful music they're playing here. He looks about ready to run for it. Lee and Kiba are happy, otherwise.

Consider this mission a success. On that note, I'd like to request a day off this week. Can you mark me down?

Tsunade finished the message and snickered, "Sure! I'll let you have a personal day. But then I have every intention of assigning you as a proctor for the Chunin Exam."

She set the scroll aside and stretched, cracking her back. The door to her office opened after a single knock, and she frowned at her visitor, "You're late, Tenzo."

"Forgive me, Hokage-sama. The team briefing at HQ ran long."

Tsunade stood, skirted around her desk and then exited the office, inclining her head so that the ANBU agent would follow, "We shouldn't be wasting any time right now. I had some of the veterans keep an eye on Root for the past few days. We have a bit of a problem. Keep up!"

Tenzo kept pace with her down the hallway, "A problem?"

"Danzo recently donated a subordinate of his to fill in the gap on Maito Gai's team. His name was Sai." Tsunade explained, "And Hyuga Neji informed me that Sai hesitated to obey orders to exchange them for an armistice. Since the failure of that endeavor, which I was not alerted to…" She grimaced, "That shinobi has been held in some rather inhumane conditions."

"The veterans reported on it?"

"They did. I had concerns that mistreatment continues in Root these days, even after the Third's reforms." Tsunade hurried down the stairwell, "At the very least, I intend to call Danzo out on his unauthorized instructions…and to I want to pick up a few things."

"I see. Do you intend to visit the Root command center now? I can arrange guards."

Tsunade smiled, "You will suffice. We'll be meeting up with Kakashi along the way as well." She pushed through a back door and left the building with Tenzo at her heels, "Take that mask off for now. Danzo may think twice about crossing me after he sees your faces."

Bonus Soundtrack: "Another Winter" by Anamanaguchi
How to go Home

Chapter Soundtrack: "Bloom" by ODESZA
& "Memories that you Call (ft. Monsoonsiren)" by ODESZA

Often, when people are asked to think of the last time they felt happy, they may mark an instance within a few hours of the present, or maybe as far back as a day or so. Happiness is not a permanent state of being, nor is any emotion, for that matter, but in its cyclical way, it rebounds from time to time and sustains the human condition. There is always something to appreciate in a day: waking up with good hair, finding money on the ground, a decent joke, a blue sky, the aroma of street food, time with friends, and so forth.

But if one were to ask Sasuke if he could recall his last recognition of happiness, he would certainly tell you it was several months ago.

Of course, no one was around to ask him silly things as he hiked over Mount Daisen and then into the stone valleys beyond in the north. It was worth mentioning that Orochimaru had ordered him to embark on a mission without any supplies or travel gear. He had set out straight from the desert wastes. Sasuke had the sense to bring a container for water and tool scrolls before his departure from Sound, but was otherwise traveling much too light.

The first day of the journey had no complexity to it. He was far enough from civilization to avoid most shinobi patrols and concentrated on picking a route into the Land of Earth. Once at the mountain range on the country border, Sasuke had access to fish in the freshwater streams. He ate well and replenished his stores before moving on.

And as he moved through the plateaus and peaks of the Earth Country, in its sparse plant life, he found that he quite enjoyed his solitude. Getting away from Orochimaru’s hideout was a welcome change of scenery. It was nearly as pleasant as his trip into the Land of Lightning, when he had accidentally encountered Kiba and his small companion. That was the last time he had felt remotely happy.

Right away he had observed how Kiba had advanced. He had shed his headstrong stubbornness for strategic thinking; he had approached Sasuke carefully, asked all the right questions, and had not once made a bid to pounce on him or return him to the Leaf Village. Kiba had been annoyingly persuasive during their few discussions, but was generally supportive. The words were still clear in his mind: ‘Sasuke, look…I’m not gonna try to bring you back. I actually want you to do what you have to do.’

Those words had uplifted him. Maybe he shouldn’t be surprised that Kiba was able to relate. He too was part of an influential clan of Konoha that, if decimated by one of its members, Kiba may also desire revenge if he had the chance to pursue it. It was not outside the realm of possibility.

Despite his flaws, his annoying, high-ground speeches, and his mediocre skills…Sasuke felt it was only right to call Kiba a true friend. It wouldn’t do to bring him along on the quest to obliterate Itachi, but he was a person to rely on if everything else turned to shit.

By the third day of travelling, it was getting a little old hunting for food. Luckily, Sasuke had passed through a small trading village and was able to buy what he needed. He kept his eyes averted and his voice dull when he made purchases.
Miles beyond the trading post were rolling mountains covered in untouched forests and wilds. Small towns and settlements were scattered throughout. These were the lands close to the coast that Orochimaru had specified. Sasuke wagered that it would be best to stake out the clustered hamlets, rotating his watch between them until he spotted that swirled, orange mask.

After a day of careful planning, he had discovered that three small villages: Nashi, Shincha, and Ine, were all within an hour of one another. They formed an acute triangle; Nashi at the dip of the valley, Shincha at the mountaintop, and Ine situated on the coast to the east.

He entered Nashi through back alleys and empty lanes, examining the layout of its buildings. From rooftops, he looked down on the streets and studied them. Sasuke became familiar with people’s faces, their voices, the shops and residences… He stalked and flitted about like a hawk watching pigeons waddle below. The following day, after taking shelter in a hotel loft (he had broken into during the night) Sasuke set out for Ine in the east.

It was a much busier town. He learned that he could blend in completely with the bustling crowds at the marketplace. In a harbor filled with voyaging ships there was a call for migrant workers to cross the sea for mining work. The first month paid double the going wage, and a burly man had asked Sasuke if he was interested. He declined quietly. Once again, he found a suitable perch and watched the flow of citizens in the roads. By night, he watched them moor boats in the port and then file into their cottages.

When the next day yielded nothing in the fishing village, Sasuke set out for Shincha. The trip up the mountain was steep, and the town was nestled on a series of plateaus and hills mid-way through the climb. The forest there was dense. The air was thin. It was a pristine location and Sasuke watched from the cover of tall tree branches, scrutinizing villagers as they hiked up a trail to the Shinto Shrine. After he entered the town there was a lull of activity. An old man took a seat on a bench across the street from where he lurking, sighing softly as he rearranged parcels in a basket.

Sasuke took a break to eat before resuming his watch. It was just as empty and unassuming a place as the first town had been. Sasuke debated returning to Ine, wondering if the lively crowds had concealed Tobi during his first visit. He hopped from his seat near a chimney stack and crossed over to another roof; an elementary school, and then froze.

Below in the schoolyard, etched into the dirt by what had probably been a stick…was the insignia of the Hidden Leaf Village. It was poorly drawn and not definitive evidence that he could use…but Sasuke intuitively felt that it was not yet time to leave the stakeout. The school bell rang and marked the end of the day. Children scurried from classrooms, bidding their teachers farewell, and then changed at shoe lockers. As they trickled two by two into the yard, Sasuke watched. Voices drifted up from the gaggle of students.

“Don’t you think Tonushi-kun is cute?”

“Well maybe a little…”

Boys’ voices:

“Mokuba, knock it off! I have homework!”

“You promised you’d come out today! Everyone wanted to play in the good weather!”

“Who’s everyone?”

“Uh…”
Tittering and laughter. Squeals of play-fights.

“Won’t you show me a jutsu?”

Sasuke glanced down again, tipped off by the request.

A young girl was following a dark haired boy towards the picket fence. The two had textbooks clutched in their arms.

The boy smiled uncertainly, “I shouldn’t. Mom and Dad said I can’t unless I’m in danger.”

“But Koko said you can make a fireball! Please?” The girl pressed, “Just this once.”

“I’m sorry. I can’t! If Dad catches me he’ll get mad, and he’ll be here to pick me up any second.”

“He’s been gone for like a week! How do you know he’ll catch you?”

“He promised he’d be here.” The boy explained, “And he always makes it on time to get me. I won’t fool around and get in trouble!”

A child who could use jutsu was a damning discovery, made more serious by the depiction of Konoha’s symbol in an unassociated settlement. Sasuke could not say how a little boy was able to do such things without the instructions of a shinobi academy either. A village on the outskirts of the Earth Country, by all accounts, should not have inhabitants with such gifts.

“Yuma-chan! Please! You won’t get in trouble!”

He shook his head and then a grin spread slowly on his face, “Maybe…when Dad’s out of town again…I could show you and the rest of the class.”

“Oh! I guess that’s a better idea.”

The children continued to chat while they waited. Sasuke remained still in his place behind a roof exit of the building, his eyes fixed on the boy. Parents popped by and then whisked their children off. It was hard for Sasuke to conceal his surprise when Tobi did show up, mask in place, stopping at the gate with a wave.

Yuma bid his friends farewell and joined his father, “Hey Dad!”

“Hey Short-Stuff! Oof!” He was squeezed tightly around his trunk, “How was school, Yuma?”

“A little boring.” The boy fell into step beside Tobi, “But Sensei let me write on the board during math, though!”

“Ah. Good for you! That’s your forte.”

“Uh huh.”

“Did you participate in your other subjects?”

Guiltily, he admitted, “Not really…”

“You can’t just raise your hand for the one thing you like. You need to put some effort into everything, even the boring stuff.”

“Other kids do it. Everyone else hates math so I get to go up all the time.”
Tobi laughed, “Yuma, that’s kind of interfering with their learning. They need to learn how to participate too!”

“Well their parents don’t yell at them as much about what they do in class. They just have to do their homework.”

“I don’t yell at you. Neither does Mom.”

“Well you guys are pushy sometimes…”

“It’s because we love you and we want you to do well.” He held out a hand, “Here. I’ll carry your books.”

The small boy passed the textbooks off to Tobi. The pair walked side-by-side down the street, chatting in a manner most typical of parent and child. Sasuke was thrown for a loop.

At first glance, Tobi was by all accounts not the idiot he had portrayed while in the presence of Orochimaru. Even more ludicrous was that the buffoon was a father! It was surprising, but still not very much to go on to determine whether or not he was an informant for Leaf.

‘It wasn’t easy to tell by just looking what this guy does when he goes home,’ Sasuke noted as he stalked through shadows of buildings, ‘What’s the point of being shocked by this? Any second now he’ll prove that he’s guilty…’

Then he’d plunge the Chidori through Tobi’s neck.

The little one and his father traversed a dirt road through the town that wound up the mountainside, through the bramble and forest. Sasuke maintained a healthy distance, keeping sound below minimum, and watched from tall branches as the suspect laughed at the little boy’s school-day observations. It was fortuitous that the hike had brought them away from the ears and suspicion of other townspeople. The lone, mountainside house that Tobi and his child were moving towards was properly isolated.

Sasuke peered through the gap in the dense thicket of magnolia leaves. The oblivious duo had entered the house and shut the door. Their voices were still clear as they playfully fussed at each other. Cautiously, Sasuke slowly circled around the home into the shade of pines, getting the view of a window. The boy was the only one visible; seated at a table and reaching for a bowl of fruit. His father must have still been close by; they were talking.

He nearly jumped out of his skin when a loud sneeze came from the left, below his perch in the trees. A woman rubbed her nose in annoyance and adjusted a tote bag on her shoulder. It was full of vegetables. She hurried into the house and, luckily, she had not noticed anything out of place. Sasuke deduced that she was the mother in this family equation. He could hear her shout, ‘I’m home!’

A resounding Welcome back! answered her. He kept his eyes on the kitchen window, watching as the occupants shuffled around: washing hands, putting bags and school books down, trying to put everything away…

“You were gone for too long, mister…” The mother accused. She seized Tobi by his shirt collar and pulled him close.

Tobi suddenly removed his mask, chuckling his apology, and kissed the woman. Sasuke instantly memorized the face he was looking at, for fear he would forget it if he one day passed the faker on the street. He waited for the man to step back for air, learning the scars on the right side of his face, the pale skin, the dark, mismatched eyes, the merry grin…that had a familiar quality about it. The smile made creases on the sides of his nose; maybe that was it. Sasuke dismissed it. He looked away when they kissed for a second and third time.

“Mom! I thought you said the garden wasn’t ready!” The boy whined, “You said you’d bring me along to pick…”

“I had to pick these or they would’ve gotten over-ripe. Everything else needs a few more days, Yuma.” She smiled, “And I’ll need your help.”

“Those are for dinner?” Tobi guessed.

“That’s up to you. I need to run or I’ll be late for those appointments in Nashi. Three families with the measles. I want to nip it in the bud and vaccinate people before it spreads too close to home…”

“Dad’s cooking?” Yuma was surprised, “It’s been so long! He probably forgot how!”

“Hey you, I’m a great cook!” Tobi asserted, and then turned to his wife, “Rin…that’s a lot of people to take care of.”

“I know.”

“You won’t need help?”

“There’s a local doctor there. She’ll assist me.”

“How long will it take, do you think?”

“Two days. Tops.” Rin curled into the man’s arms, “I don’t want to stay away long now that you’re home. I’ve missed you…”

“I missed you too.”

She muffled another sneeze and then accepted a paper napkin that Yuma handed to her.

Her husband chuckled, “What’s the matter?”

“Allergies. I removed some ragweed that was growing near the garden…but my nose is a faucet now!” Rin dabbed at her watering eyes, “I can’t smell a thing.”

“Hey Mama,” Yuma had opened a notebook to practice penmanship, “Where’s Sesshu?”

“He’s tracking Jiraiya-sama. Your Dad and I haven’t been able to get a hold of him in weeks. It’s like he disappeared.” Rin hustled down the hallway towards her bedroom, shouting, “Don’t worry! As soon as he picks up the scent and finds him, Sesshu will come straight home.” The sound of drawers opening indicated that she was gathering supplies for her medical trip.

“I miss him.” Yuma decided, balancing his chin on his hand.

Tobi sat across from his son, “Me too. But we just wanted to make sure everything was okay. Sesshu is very good at finding people.”

“I know.” He glanced down at his assignment and then back up, “Dad, will you help me with these characters?”

“Sure.”
Outside, Sasuke had crept closer. He had heard all that he needed to hear. The little family was allied with the Toad Sage, just as Orochimaru had suspected. As soon as the sneezing woman left for her house calls and the little boy strayed from his father’s side, Sasuke would be in position to deal with Tobi. He did not intend to make a big show of it, but he was growing impatient while waiting for the bystanders to get out of the way.

His eyes stayed fixed on Tobi, not blinking for a long while. The man sat beside the small boy, reaching an arm around him to guide the strokes of an ink brush. A few times they set the brush aside and practiced with a ballpoint pen. They had gone quiet with concentration. After a while, Tobi had stopped guiding the boy. Yuma was able to form characters perfectly on his own.

Rin returned with a packed travel bag and kissed her son on the top of his head, “Off I go! Be good Yuma!” Her next kiss caught the corner of her husband’s mouth and he grinned, “You too! We have some catching up to do.”

“I know we do.” His eyebrows danced playfully.

Sasuke watched as the woman darted out the door, rubbing the tip of her watering nose with the back of her hand. She settled into a run that was uniquely characteristic of a shinobi. He drew a loose connection that the woman could be a medic-nin, but whether she was one or not, it didn’t matter. She was out of the way.

Time dragged by. Sasuke kept his position, watching in still silence as the father and son refused to part. The little boy was attending civilian school, which only covered core academics. He breezed through his language and math assignments before huffing in disdain at a required-reading book. Tobi was chopping vegetables at the counter, and heard the rebellious sound from his child. He glanced over his shoulder, “Is something the matter?”

“This book stinks.”

“Not all books are good. At least that one is pretty short.”

“Sensei keeps asking us questions about this story and it’s, like, the most boring thing in the world! I asked if I could switch.”

“Did she let you?”

“No.”

“Hm. Good. If she made an exception for you, then she’d have to make an exception for any student who asked.” Tobi wisely stated, “It doesn’t matter if you don’t like that book. What matters is that you can understand it. Sensei cares about your comprehension.”

“I don’t see what the big deal is.” Yuma spun the small hardcover on the tabletop, “When I become a ninja I don’t have to worry about reading stuff.”

“Ha!” His father cracked up, wiping his hands on a towel, “You think so? I don’t know about you, but I’d be pretty embarrassed to be a shinobi who couldn’t read and understand files and mission requests…scrolls to learn jutsu too…there’s no use in trying to be a ninja if you don’t know your basic subjects, kiddo.”

“Ack!” In grumpy agreement, Yuma flipped open the book and paged over to his current spot, “Fine, Dad.”

“I finished the food prep, so let’s go inside and work on that book.” Tobi suggested, “I’d like for you to read it to me."

The boy made his way out and was followed by his father. Sasuke lost track of them as they ventured to another room in the home. He changed position, slinking up stealthily alongside the house, and noted that even though he couldn’t watch them through a window, he could still easily hear what they were saying. Sasuke was cautious not to express any chakra, step on a wayward twig, or breathe too loudly. The ninja-father was, obviously, too experienced to ignore any of those things.

Yuma’s voice carried for quite some time; childish and high-pitched. He only stumbled over a few words. The folktale was told from the perspective of a little boy, who hoped to win a gardening contest to impress the emperor of his country. The winner was promised to become the heir to the childless emperor’s dynasty, but the protagonist was disheartened by his inability to grow the seed he had been given. For a brief and terrifying second, somewhere in the third chapter, Sasuke had lost concentration. He had begun listening to the story.

Sasuke shook his head and snapped himself out of the trance. How incredibly irritating. He would be made to wait for his chance to strike. A child devoted to his studies and worse still; a father that was inordinately fond of his small son. Logically, Sasuke could understand that Tobi would be eager to spend time with the child after a long period of being away from home. But it took most of his patience not to burst in and skewer the man who was, probably, curled up on the couch with the innocent youngster. A true predicament.

When they came to a stopping point Yuma insisted, “I’m done now! Can we go outside and play?”

“Oh? Are you sure you have no more assignments?”

“Positive!” There was a sound of a book being tossed and a rushing of feet, “Let’s go!”

Sasuke could hear the boy pulling shoes on in the genkan. With little time to spare, he retreated into the surrounding forest to watch from a distance.

Frustration tempted him to pounce, but focus kept him still. Sasuke watched from a shady perch as Tobi and the little boy kicked a ball around to each other. They transitioned into an epic, chest-heaving, breathless game of tag that circled around the house and front yard several times, abandoning the ball altogether. If anything was a giveaway of the shinobi talents of the target family, it was likely Yuma’s screeches of ‘you’re it!’ and then disappearing in a blink. He was nearly as fast as his father, that was, until he was caught.

The pair wrestled and rolled in the grass; for a time, the same personality split into two separate bodies of contrasting ages. One small, squealing merrymaker and one large, giggling merrymaker. Their laughter was what began to sink Sasuke’s mood. The corners of his mouth tugged down, agitated; affronted by their enjoyment of one another. This exact pleasure: the carefree frolicking of family…it had been utterly denied of him.

His own father, as Sasuke distinctly recalled, had not been the playful sort. Occasionally, his mother had made time to play games and challenge him. But his designated, faithful playmate, best friend, and idol…

His brother had demolished the sanctity of their family in the most catastrophic way conceivable. Sasuke supposed that was achieved by the deep love he and Itachi had for one another, which abruptly disintegrated after his slaying of the entire Uchiha clan; their parents included, for a reason that, quite frankly, made no sense. Itachi had said that he was testing his abilities, but Sasuke could still not reconcile such a response. Soon, the reason wouldn’t matter. Itachi would be dead and justice would be effectively served.

“Hey! Cut that out!”

Tobi shouted in disapproval when the boy breathed out a miniature fireball in the front yard. Sasuke’s eyes widened in shock: it was true. Seeing was believing. Yuma protested when his father grabbed him from behind and hoisted him over his shoulder, ceasing all play and roughhousing.

“No jutsu! We talked about this!”

“Ha! I almost got you…”

“Not even close.” Tobi scoffed, “You’ll light the house on fire and then your Mom will kill me! She was serious.”

“How come Mom only beats you up when I do something I’m not supposed to?”

“Because you’re her precious baby, and I’m responsible for teaching you to behave when she’s not here.” The man snickered, “Just you wait! Once you have brothers and sisters, Mom will come down on you much harder! You’ll be held to a high standard as a big brother.”

“Nooo! Dad! Please don’t let her!” Yuma pounded on his father’s back, “Put me down already.”

He set the child down in the grass and Yuma laid on his back, puffing tiredly. The games had worn him out. Tobi sat down with a gentle sigh, relieved that he could take a break. Yuma shifted to lay his head on his father’s knees as if they were a pillow, “I’m sorry, Dad.”

“It’s alright. But you know better; don’t do that again.”

“I won’t.”

“Are you tired?”

“A little.”

“Take a nap if you want. You finished all of your work, so we can take it easy today.” Tobi chuckled, “Your Mom loves napping.”

“Yeah, she’ll sleep anywhere…”

He stroked the boy’s hair, “It’s because she works so hard. She’s always looking out for others.”

“Well…” Yuma paused to yawn, “You do that too, Dad.”

His eyes were trained on the ground, lost in thought, “Yeah…but I don’t get to look out for…all the people that need me.”

Yuma drifted off to sleep while his father waded in and out of memories, caressing the child’s head absentely. The quiet afternoon was only interrupted by lone, trilling bird calls that marked territories in the forest. Tobi was motionless for a long while, staring at nothing.

Sasuke estimated that he would be just out of range of sticking a Chidori Spear through his target. There’d be no guarantee that he wouldn’t hit the child with it too, so he refrained. Trying to sneak closer could alert Tobi to his presence, who didn’t have a chattering child to distract him at the time. It was difficult to wait.
This deceitful, shirking, drop-out of a ninja deserved it, Sasuke thought. He walked through pain and suffering like a ghost, slipping past the suspicions of the Akatsuki and Orochimaru. And all the while, he had been one of Jiraiya’s pets...going home to play house with mother and baby when all of his faux-buffoonery was complete. Someone like this was getting away with laughing in the faces of S-Ranked criminals. Someone like this was enjoying a happy life, while others had to run for their lives, grieve over slaughtered family, plot a far-flung revenge mission, pander to body-snatching psychopaths, and scrape up the pieces of a shattered future.

Since he was forbidden from murdering Gaara in his sleep, impaling Tobi when he least expected it would serve as a decent substitute.

The man laid back in the grass and shut his eyes. Sasuke tensed. He could dart down and cut his throat. The rage boiling inside him escalated to an alarming level, irrationally linking Tobi to his woes, more specifically; having to be reminded that his family was dead and gone.

Tobi’s eyes snapped open.

With his hand poised over the flat hilt of his sword, Sasuke watched with narrowed eyes. The man on the lawn below shimmied carefully from beneath his son and then stood up. He removed his jacket and folded it beneath the boy’s head. He went inside the house quickly. Sasuke wasn’t sure what to make of the sudden disappearance. Was he aware that he was being stalked? Was he leaving the child as bait? Not as if he’d take it.

Descending from the lofty leaves of the trees, Sasuke touched down on the ground. He rounded the bend towards the back of the home, creeping without a sound, and had peered into a window. Tobi walked by briskly with an armful of supplies and a wooden box. Sasuke wasn’t sure what to make of the behavior. He treaded gently up cement steps, reached for the back door, and touched his hand to the cool brass of the doorknob, turning it gradually. It was unlocked. He let himself in with perfect stealth, and shut the door behind him, crouching on the floor. He had not been detected. A table, a wall, and a sofa sectional stood between him and Tobi. His thumb slid the kusanagi sword up a centimeter from its sheath as he prepared to spring. Then, a sound…

The front door chunked shut behind Tobi. He was outside again.

“What the hell is he doing?” Sasuke slipped forward, bent low, cautiously approaching the living room window which had blinds partially drawn. His eye level with a horizontal gap, he observed Tobi setting himself up beside Yuma, arranging items from the box on the ground. He took a seat and settled a board across his lap, laying a piece of parchment over it.

Sasuke continued to watch in confusion as the man poured dark ink into a bowl and then dipped a brush into it. Then he tapped it to the paper softly, letting his eyes dart back to the sleeping boy in front of him. It took a short while for Sasuke to understand what he was witnessing. ‘He’s painting.’

He was painting the sleeping child. He was sitting there with sublime carelessness, concentrating solely on the fine lines of the rounded face and eyelashes and bow lips. He was capturing the moment. It was an immortalization of love that Sasuke would never bother to imagine, but after seeing it he could never forget it.

Sasuke stepped back from the window, sliding warily from view. He was left at a bizarre impasse. Not only was Tobi unlikely to be caught on his own, but Sasuke was also currently standing in the abode of a complete stranger. The same book that Yuma had complained about earlier was innocently teetering on the edge of a coffee table. It made him decidedly uncomfortable.

He retreated, passing by a corridor with bedrooms, which he was briefly interested in exploring. He passed it by and exited through the back door, certain to not make a sound. And when Sasuke had hidden himself in the tree line once again, watching from the woods that surrounded the secluded, patchwork home, he watched Tobi with an aggravated expression. It was curious that his murderous aggression had been immediately diffused. At the very least, it would help prevent him from rashly launching an attack and screwing up.

The man painted, totally unaware that he had nearly been pounced upon in his own home. Over the course of an hour, Sasuke repositioned himself four times, trying to discern if there was a way to handle the killing delicately. At about the time he considered creating a diversion and blowing cover to cut the man’s head off, the little boy woke up. Yuma sprang to life and asked his father what he’d been doing.

“Take a look.” Tobi held the artwork up.

“Is this me?” Yuma took the paper into his hands gingerly.

“Yes. Do you like it?”

“Why do I look so chubby?” The boy set the parchment down and frowned.

“You’re not chubby. You’ve just got a round face. A kid’s face. When you’re older you won’t look nearly as cute.”

“Hey!”

They tousled.

Sasuke’s nostrils flared as he watched yet another opportunity slip away. When the duo finished their scrap they picked up the painting supplies and returned to the house. From an angle, Sasuke stole a glimpse of them through a window. Yuma had settled at the kitchen table to try his hand at painting, and his father had returned to the food that had been set aside. He bumbled around looking for a pan. The sun was setting.

Sasuke sniffed. It was later than he thought. Thick clouds rolled in over the mountaintop, and the violently orange sunset burst through gaps in the gray cover. He retreated to think and not have his attention so wholly occupied. The young man descended from high tree branches and followed a dirt path through the forest, winding down the slopes to a field below.

He had not expected Tobi to have a companion, and certainly not one that was such an effective shield. Sasuke would never deny his aptitude for killing, but he was a tad too morbidly noble to harm a child. Similarly, it wouldn’t be prudent to murder the traitorous informant in front of his son. Either way, the boy called Yuma was going to see his father crumpled up somewhere at some point, and ultimately be scarred by the event. A small kindness would be to do the deed without him standing by as a gaping witness.

Sasuke hopped down a ridge of stones and came to a sprawling garden with neat rows. He stopped and looked at it blankly, consumed in thought. The solution was quite simple. He would wait until they were asleep. He could do it at night. It was a much more traditional route to choose, and maybe not his style per se, but it would do the trick. He had been more than ready to decapitate Gaara in his sleep days before. Then again, he might’ve woken Gaara up for the fun of it and then attacked.

Sasuke treaded alongside a garden row that was tufted with green tops, stalks, and leaves. It was an impressive agricultural assemblage for a town in the middle of nowhere. The woman must have cared for it. Maybe Tobi did too. Sasuke halted at the center of the column: a familiar sight. The tomato plants shocked his brain straight back to childhood. He used to stuff his face with them voraciously.

He picked one off of the plant. The tomato had a pale vermillion tint, nearly ripe. Sasuke absconded with it and settled himself beneath an enormous oak tree on the side of the clearing.

With a cocked eyebrow, Sasuke glanced over the tomato again before tossing it. He cut it in half with a swing of his sword as it fell through the air, and then caught both pieces in one hand. It’d be easier to eat. He stowed away the blade and ate quietly, staring at nothing.

Something at the back of his mind was nagging at him. It was a dastardly little thought: Why would you unquestionably do what Orochimaru told you to, in this instance? Tobi was helping Konoha, after all. It was not something Sasuke was personally opposed to. People he cared about lived in the Leaf Village. It was still a place he could call home, or at least, his legal residence was there. And also, though it was a bit of a stretch, he could assume that maybe Tobi was or had been a Leaf ninja at some point in time. In conclusion, killing him to protect Orochimaru’s precious secrets was not a great motivator. He very begrudgingly obeyed the snake anyway.

But as Orochimaru had guessed, and the mother of the family unit had later confirmed, Jiraiya was the recipient of Tobi’s reports. It struck a competitive chord. Jiraiya was not only Gaara’s mentor, but he had been Naruto and Haku’s teacher as well. At minimum, the Toad’s three were his rivals and benchmarks for progress. Sasuke would even concede he had a jealous resentment of the team that had nearly succeeded in stopping his defection. It still wasn’t sitting well that Haku, the gentle, kind pretty boy, had nearly dissected him during their Cursed Seal fight.

Tobi had picked the wrong side.

If it meant wrenching away another rung of security from Gaara’s team as they scaled the “ladder of success,” Sasuke would gladly sacrifice Tobi to watch them all fall.

He finished off the tomato with a harsh bite. Sasuke stood up and returned to the tomato plant for more. His mother would cluck her tongue at him for taking what wasn’t his. She also always made him wait for other dinner guests before reaching for seconds. She’d probably be mortified by his selfish, jealous, murderous demeanor nowadays, he thought. He ought to be ashamed. ‘But she’s dead. Who cares?’

Sasuke plucked two more tomatoes and returned to his seat by the tree. The sky grew dark with swarming clouds, heavy with rain.

By the time night had fallen, Sasuke had returned to the mountaintop home and lurked outside. Lamps were still lit inside the house. He circled around in a watchful stalk until the rainclouds overhead poured down, with hardly a drop of warning before the deluge. Sasuke slipped into the shed behind the house to take shelter. The wooden door was slightly ajar, and within were shelves of various tools, gardening supplies, boxes and a dozen bottles of alcohol. He guessed that either Tobi or the missus liked to imbibe once in a while.

He pulled the door shut and watched from a tiny, framed window of the shack that faced the home. It would only be a matter of time. He merely needed to stay dry and keep focused.

Thunder rolled and shook a small spade on the shelf near his head.

Sasuke’s eyes remained trained on a light source emitted from the kitchen. It was a long wait. His thoughts would stray like popping embers from a fire, shooting off in arbitrary directions.

He could acknowledge that Tobi’s association with Jiraiya was still not a good enough reason to kill the man. After all, confronting and dealing with his jealousy of Jiraiya’s team would be much better served by challenging them, not by punishing a spy. But there was something else; an offense that was hard to identify but nonetheless evident every time he sighted Tobi.

He was probably a good person. And he was probably a talented ninja. He had a happy wife and child and a quaint life tucked away from the cares and clashes of shinobi villages. These were all priceless, intangible things that could not be bought or taken by force. And they were also things that, as Sasuke was rapidly beginning to see, he could never secure for himself.

Sasuke shut his eyes and exhaled slowly. He was a have-not. An outsider. An untouchable. A killer. Had he resisted his personal woes and thirst for vengeance a bit longer, he might’ve come out on the other side of the “tunnel” and entered society as an acceptable human being. He might have become someone worthy of honor and friendship. He might’ve been that man that a wife could kiss three times in a row in greeting, or play for hours with a child who was enamored of his father. The opportunities to become that person had absolutely presented themselves to him, though in a covert and subtle manner.

And with his mind so set on one desire, Sasuke understood that he had brushed off and trampled those opportunities. He could only recognize them now. He could not reach back into the past to retrieve them. They were gone, and there was no guarantee that such good fortune would meet him again in the future. Many of his age mates in the Leaf Village had made efforts to be his friends; his teammates and sensei had tried to understand his pain (even if they came up short), and Sakura would have been happy to build a future with him. His recklessness had shredded those blessings. They had all moved on. Slowly but surely, Sasuke knew he would become an extraneous fixture that people would no longer know what to do with.

Except stay away from him.

Beyond killing Itachi, it was quite possible that there would be nothing left afterward. Every sense of purpose he would try to cling to would evaporate.

He stared out of the window, suddenly feeling helpless. He had done it to himself. Itachi had backed away and let the yarn ball roll and unwind, leaving Sasuke to dictate his own destiny. It was terrifying that he had ensnared his thread of life so irreversibly. There was no undoing this knot.

Tobi had a simple life. He didn’t have fame, wealth, or any kind of glamour. But it was the fact that he had that hurt worse than anything. Sasuke did not plan ahead for things he might wish for down the line, and essentially forfeited all good outcomes in the process of exacting revenge. A twinge of sadness crossed his face and his chin drooped. Lightning arced over the mountain, and was followed by a tumble of thunder again.

That was why he wanted Tobi to suffer. Maybe it would spread the ‘disproportionate savagery’ of the world a bit more evenly if he killed Tobi. It would make things ‘fair.’

Sasuke looked up and cleared his head, casting aside his doubts. Through the window he could see Tobi turn the lamp off. After a time, all of the lights in the house were extinguished. His muscles tensed. For a long time there was nothing but the sound of the rain and thunder colliding with the mountain peaks.

When the night was deep and still, Sasuke crept outside again. The rain had quickly soaked him through, and he stepped across the slick, soggy grass to the side of the house. He looked inside a low bedroom window, in which the room was dark. The black plane of glass in front of him reflected his face like a taunting mirror. Sasuke stood and looked, verifying the position of his target.

Lightning blinked again with follow-up strikes and illuminated the room he was peeking into. Tobi was indeed fast asleep in bed. And there, like a humorous barb from the gods, was Yuma tucked under his father’s arm, swaddled in a blanket. They snored peacefully together. The child had probably been frightened by the storm.

The window went dark again. Sasuke stood in the rain, the rims of his eyes stinging, and observed the face staring back from the reflective surface. The person in front of him seemed to say, You knew you wouldn’t. You didn’t want to.

Of course he didn’t. Tobi was a success story whether he killed him or not. If Tobi did meet his end tonight, the little boy could grow up one day, track him down, and give Sasuke an ironic lesson in vengeance. It was a vain effort. The appeal of killing someone in cold blood had faded after seeing just how close the little family was. It wouldn’t be an effective release for all of the tumultuous feelings he’d kept inside. And it wasn’t even his idea, Sasuke reminded himself. Orochimaru had only redirected his rage with the expectation that he could get a loose end tied.

He watched the sleeping pair in the bed as a bolt lightened the room again. The hilarity was that if he killed Tobi, he would actually be destroying the core of a family. The mother would obviously be devastated, and so too would the child. It wouldn’t matter how Tobi felt about it. It was the people left behind who had to live with his decision. And what was more, it would be no different than Itachi’s heartless execution of his own clan. Very pointedly, Sasuke did not want to identify with that kind of villainy. ‘I won’t be like him.’

But what then? What was the answer? Orochimaru wanted Tobi dead if he was ‘guilty’, and he was going to accomplish that goal by any means necessary. It’d be just as insane to try to befriend a private, three-person family who would have no idea who he was. They’d never trust him.

After wracking his brain for a solution Sasuke began to walk away, ‘It’s up to me. If I am the only thing standing between you and imminent death, then maybe you really are an idiot. Maybe I need to save you.’ He concluded, ‘Orochimaru may not believe me when I tell him you’re useless…that you weren’t responsible for those reports.’ It would be quite the undertaking. If the snake sent henchmen to the mountaintop to determine the truth, they’d have to be done away with. If Orochimaru began to ask questions, Sasuke knew he would have to keep him off the scent.

It was a task that could have steep consequences. There was a considerable chance of failure. But as he trekked through the storm into the dark woods, approaching the lonely slopes of the highland, Sasuke supposed that this endeavor could very well be more worthwhile than his intent to destroy Itachi. Should creating his own family or having a normal life be an impossibility, it would feel nearly as good to watch someone else have that chance. It would feel even better to know that he’d been responsible, in part, for their safety. A tiny portion of his soul would admit that he had started to like them. He even remembered their names. They were innocent and happy, and try as he might, he just couldn’t hate them for it.

Sasuke mulled over a few harebrained ideas as he moved on, drenched to the bone, and then disappeared before the next lightning strike.

The next morning Shincha and its surrounding mountaintop were soggy. Scores of earthworms had poked up from between blades of grass to begin water-assisted journeys to parts unknown. Consequently, songbirds were ransacking their choice prey all through the forest.
Yuma was on a rescue mission with a tin can of dirt, picking up worms as he strolled through the yard. His mother always encouraged the gathering of ‘nature’s helpers’ to perk up the garden.

Obito had poked his head out the front door to call his son in for breakfast, but instead got a demand from the small boy, “Hi Dad! Will you go with me? I’m going to put these in the garden.”

“This early? Come on. Eat some eggs first, Yuma.”

“I’ll eat later!” He was running off with the can.

“You’ll forget!” Obito stepped outside, “Hey! I told you that you can’t go to the garden by yourself!” He slipped shoes on and followed the disobedient youngster down the hill to the forest path. His cooking apron was still fastened.

It was just a day like any other, chasing his son around...

At the bottom of the slope Obito caught up to Yuma and stopped beside him, seeing that his son had set to work making entry holes for worms near each vegetable plant. ‘He’s so much like his mother. A dedicated worker!’

“Don’t put them in right away. We need to make sure they burrow where we want them to stay.”

Yuma nodded, “I know. I’m just getting ready.” His hands were filthy.

“Why are you digging like that? You should’ve gotten a tool first.”

“Sometimes Mama digs like this.”

Obito sighed, “That’s because she and her clan…can’t help themselves…”

“Well I already started!” He pressed on.

“Fine. I’ll go get you a spade and bring it to you. You can only do the first row, and then you need to come inside for breakfast. Alright?”

“Okay, Dad.”

Obito marched back up the hill, grumbling to himself. Children. It was always a rush. Or a mess. Or an argument. Then again, he had been no different at that age, with the exception of his persistent late-streak. While passing under low tree branches, sodden leaves dripped water on the top of his head, ‘That was some storm last night…Yuma was frightened.’ He frowned to himself. It was the first time he had ever heard his son utter, “Ghosts.”

‘Someone was there.’ The boy insisted. It was unnerving.

He passed through the sprawling acre of the backyard and arrived at the toolshed. As always, the old, creaky door had swung open again. Obito bustled inside, collected a child-sized gardening shovel and then paused. The shelf was wet. His eyes scanned around. ‘That’s weird. Did this spring a leak?’ An overturned barrel was partially wet, and he gazed out of the small shed window to look at the house, curious, ‘I’d swear I keep up with this old thing.’

The floorboards were also wet. His breathing quickened as he noticed an entry floor mat he had barely made contact with. A heel print was distinct on the front of the mat, as if someone had exited not long ago. No. Certainly it was his imagination. ‘It’s a leak.’ He stared, furrowing his eyebrows, ‘But since when do leaks leave marks like that?’
Obito walked outside slowly, eyes to the ground, and gradually began to pick up on imprints that had been left in the soft mud of the yard. His heart rattled in his chest. The trail turned the corner and made a straight line for the side of the house. He followed it and stopped again. Dread filled his lungs and made it impossible for him to draw breath.

He was not imagining the two side-by-side footprints stationed directly outside his bedroom window. Terrified, Obito laid his own foot beside the track, measuring it, ‘This wasn’t Rin. They’re bigger. Like a man’s…’ His head turned sharply, looking out of the yard, ‘A villager?’ No! What would they be doing standing outside of his house at night? His heart rate was mimicking a freight train over tracks, hammering and clacking.

Obito skirted around his home, glancing around, picking up trails here and there of footprints that had been revealed by the rain. Sometimes the tracks disappeared, deepened, as if the person had sprung. He glanced up at the trees, ‘Taking cover up there…’ He could only assume the visitor was a shinobi. ‘Why here? Why at night?’ The ninja must have lingered for over a day, judging by the sporadic, coming-and-going trails all about.

‘Rock ninja? There haven’t been any here since Deidara blew up Junichi’s house…’ He had circled the home with the spade clenched tightly in his hand, ‘And Rin told me that she only fought a few Iwa Chunin just beyond the garden when she helped that Sand ninja…’ It was a sound assessment. No one ever came here. No one knew about this place.

But someone did.

He had been stalked and watched. He had been totally oblivious.

Obito’s blood ran cold. This threat was far beyond anything he was prepared for. With his guard lowered and his son young and defenseless, he was as good as dead in such a position. He raced from the front yard faster than wind, cutting through the forest back to Yuma. Being separate even for a second could spell disaster. Thankfully, the child was stooped over the garden row, safe and sound, gouging up pits as he had been before.

He looked over his shoulder expectantly, “Did you get it, Dad? What took so long?”

He approached his son with a hollow, pensive expression on his face. He handed the spade to Yuma without a word.

The boy observed his father shrewdly, deciphering this odd phenomenon. He pursed his lips, stuck his shovel into the ground and then stood, brushing dirt from his hands. “What’s wrong, Dad?” He asked.

Obito’s mind was elsewhere. What would Rin think? She’d have his head when she found out that he hadn’t noticed an intruder. He relied so much on her sense of smell, as well as Sesshu’s attentive watchfulness that he hardly ever looked for things that were ‘out of the ordinary.’ He’d have to promise her extreme diligence forever more. But his thoughts rounded the corner, trying to identify the ‘who’ in this situation. Who would be watching him?

Who could find him? Or know that he should be found? When he worked it out, he could only derive one, awful answer. ‘Deidara’s been here and Zetsu-san knows about every town in this valley. The Akatsuki might be watching me.’ He shut his eyes and tried to calm down, ‘I’ll need to warn Jiraiya about this. And if I’m really unlucky, others might know too. Maybe Koinyu noticed something…or Orochimaru. Someone may not be buying it anymore.’

And yet, he had only been observed; like a wildlife surveyor examining an animal in its natural habitat. If any of his criminal affiliations had a reason to stalk him or suspect him, wouldn’t they do something? Set a trap? Attack? I doubt it would be routine reconnaissance if they found me. What would they be trying to figure out? He was thankful that he and Yuma had not come to harm, but it was a head-scratcher.

He felt a small hand wrap around his fingers. Obito glanced down.

“Dad? Are you okay?” Yuma inquired firmly.

“Oh,” He bent down and squeezed the boy affectionately, “I’m sorry, Yuma. I’ll be alright.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yeah. We just need to be more careful around here.”

“Why?” Yuma picked up his spade, “Did we get something dirty when we painted?”

“No. It’s not that.” His father rubbed his chin, thinking, “Do you remember seeing anything yesterday?”

“Like what?” He was on his knees digging again.

“Like last night, when you came to my room because of the lightning. You shook me awake and said there was a ghost. Remember?”

“THERE WAS.”

“Where did you see it?”

“Outside your window.”

Obito’s stomach twisted in horror, “And…do you remember what it looked like?”

Ever the practical child, Yuma paused in his work and gave a skeptical look to his father, “Ghosts don’t look like anything, Dad. Why do you want me to talk about it anyway?”

“I’m curious. I was a little scared too.” The man yielded.

“Well…” He sighed and began dropping worms into the holes one by one, “It was dark. It looked like a boy.”

“A boy?”

“Yeah, Dad.” Yuma confirmed, “It looked sad.”

Tsunade’s morning was exhilarating. She was hoping that neither Kakashi nor Tenzo had noticed that she was dealing with a severe case of ‘stomach butterflies.’ They followed behind her on both sides after she had collected them, respectfully silent as they made their way to a rocky alcove on the edge of the village.

She had been taking steps all of her life to confront wrongdoers and even people who pissed her off in general. Back when Jiraiya and Naruto had begged her favor in a bid for her candidacy as Godaime Hokage, she had worked up the courage to tell Orochimaru to shove his offer in an unmentionable place. From time to time she had brief arguments with Homura and Koharu, her elderly (inherited) advisors. She also had to put Kakashi in his place when he got smart. When Neji had more recently defied her, she had barely been able to contain her temper.

Now, someone who was genuinely subversive needed a talking-to.

By that, she explained to Kakashi and Tenzo, she had meant Shimura Danzo. They quickly understood why she selected them to accompany her to the Root Headquarters.

She had looked over a file kept by her late sensei, the Sandaime Hokage, which chronicled his own difficulties with Danzo. For a time she had thought her dislike of the Root administrator was a personal bias, but Tsunade had discovered that Hiruzen had a multitude of conflicts with the man as well.

One particularly hairy incident went back many years, during which Hiruzen had uncovered an experiment headed by Orochimaru in an effort to create a modern shinobi with the Mokuton blood limit. Tsunade had been disgusted to read about dozens of kidnapped children who had perished during these trials. Orochimaru fled after his lab had been uncovered, leaving the children to wallow and die.

One such young child had been the boy called “Tenzo,” so mistakenly named because a young girl from the Iburi clan had recognized him as her brother. The name stuck, even if the identity didn’t. Both Hiruzen and Kakashi had referred to the sole survivor of the experiment by that name.

Sometimes Tsunade liked to codename him “Yamato,” in an allusion to how he got along so well with others. But whatever he was called, he had endured a childhood under the tutelage of Danzo in Root. It had been a grueling experience that strained his fledgling friendship with Kakashi. Once he was a young teen, Danzo had tasked Tenzo with a mission to kill Kakashi, who had been in the service of Hiruzen after the death of the Fourth Hokage. It had been a close encounter, but fortunately, Kakashi’s persuasion had spared the unlikely friends from violence.

‘That’s where these two incidents match up.’ Tsunade thought. In retaliation of Tenzo’s insubordination and failure to eliminate Kakashi, Danzo locked the boy up and had operatives beat him senseless. The commander wanted to cleanse him of his progressive, selfish thoughts and realign him with ‘Root’s standards.’ Before such brainwashing could be accomplished, Kakashi, Hiruzen and a company of ANBU shinobi had dropped by the Root command center, demanding Tenzo’s safe release. After a brief and tense discussion, Danzo had left Tenzo in the care of the Third Hokage.

Because Tsunade was a betting woman, she would wager that Sai was now experiencing the same harsh treatment. She would also gamble on the chance that if she flashed Kakashi and Tenzo in the old man’s face, now closely-bonded veterans under her command, that Danzo might finally consider her criticisms. After all, he didn’t want to take her seriously, but her donning the Sandaime’s fortitude and practices like armor might at least make him listen.

“We’re close by.” Tenzo notified her quietly, “We’ll be under their surveillance now, unless you would prefer to enter by trap door.”

“No. There’s no need for the Hokage to sneak around. Root shinobi are still constituents of my village, and so their allegiance is to me.” She asserted in a hard voice. Kakashi got a kick out of her attitude and smiled to himself.

The group proceeded to a cement-lined stairwell in the face of a rock formation, following the steps down. It was a long descent. Within the giant, echoing chambers all walls were lined with cement or metal duct work beside various staircases and walkways. It was a sterile and uninviting place. The path took them into the underground atrium, where suspended catwalks with rails intersected. The thin bridges went in four directions, leading to different locations of the command center.

While on the main walkway, a small Root ninja who looked maybe 10 or 11 years of age stopped them. His eyes stayed only on Tsunade before he slowly sunk to one knee, customarily, “Hokage-sama. No one was notified of your visit.”

“I know. I didn’t have an appointment, all the same…” She smiled warmly, “I would like to talk to Danzo. Would you please fetch him for me?”

“Right away, ma’am. Please wait here.” The little Root ninja dashed away.

“See? That was a polite greeting.” Tsunade remarked to her guards.

“He was faking it.” Kakashi surmised, “He was startled to see you, Tsunade-sama. Don’t expect the welcome wagon to arrive after this.”

“I don’t.” She added softly, “Are your hounds in position?”

“Yes.”

She rolled her shoulders, “Good.”

They weren’t kept waiting for long. After a few minutes, Root ninja began to trickle into the atrium, watching from perches high above the perpendicular pathways. They froze like statues when Danzo appeared from a stone-decorated doorway, seeming as expressionless as ever. He crossed over the first half of the suspension and then stopped a few feet away from Tsunade.

“To what do I owe this visit, Hokage-sama?” He asked gently.

“I wanted to have a discussion with you at my leisure, considering that you enter my office uninvited whenever you see fit. Forgive me for dropping by so suddenly.” She began, “Can you please tell me what orders you gave to Sai when he joined Neji and Lee’s team? I seem to have missed something, according to that abysmal mission report.”

“He had no orders at all, my lady. Only to serve that team well, I assure you.”

Her eyes flashed impatiently, “I am not at all assured. Hyuga Neji gave me precise details of when and where Sai was in written contact with a rogue ninja. They were accosted in the abandoned Toi mine, where both Neji and Lee were able to defeat their prospective kidnapper.”

“I had no knowledge of this.” He replied passively. His visible eye fell on Tenzo and his mouth pulled into a disapproving scowl, “You seem to imply that I organized such an encounter.”

“I’m not implying it. I am telling you what we both know to be true. I will warn you now to never again attempt such a foolish exchange or give orders that compromise a team under my command. So help you… I will replace you faster than your slippery fingers can bribe each member of the village council.” Tsunade confidently rested a hand on her hip, “But I’m not here to get details on that mission. I am here on behalf of your subordinate called Sai.”

Danzo balanced a cane beneath his palms, “What of him?”

“I am here to inform you of my intent to transfer him. His performance on the Toi Mine mission was outstanding.”
The old man scoffed, “Outstanding, you say? It was really quite the opposite. He disappointed all involved parties.”

He was calling bullshit. Kakashi noticed a few more Root agents popping up along the perimeter of the wide, square room. His senses prickled as he prepared himself for possible hostility.

“You’re entitled to your opinion. However, I would like your verbal consent on this transfer so that Sai can be escorted to ANBU HQ for an evaluation. I can send you the paperwork later for your signature.”

Danzo was silent for a long moment, his discontent swelling far enough to make his Root subordinates antsy, “Tsunade…I cannot give approval for that. He will remain here.”

“So you object?” She raised her eyebrows, “Why?”

“He has been detained in our corrections facility.”

Tenzo winced at a distant memory of the place. It was a cellblock that doubled as a torture chamber to save space.

“I am ordering this transfer. Unless you can give me a reason why he cannot be physically transported, I must insist that you retrieve him immediately.”

“He has proven himself an unreliable shinobi, the likes of which completely lacks value.”

“That’s not very specific…”

“He does not follow orders.”

“Ah,” She nodded, “Regardless, I stand by my command. Release him to me now.” She added sweetly, “Please.”

“Hokage-sama, you are trifling in a matter that doesn’t concern you.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about. How am I trifling? I came here to complete a very simple withdrawal.” Tsunade concealed a sly smile.

“If you consider this visit to be transactional, then you should deposit a shinobi before I release one to you…” He recommended, “I will have one less operative in Root, and as such have an inadequate number of ninja to ensure security.”

“Root already has a deficit. You told me that Sai is undisciplined. If he’s as disposable as you say then do as I ask.”

“Trade me a shinobi. I already made this request of you days ago.” Danzo countered boldly, “The foundation needs to make a sensible exchange.”

“You’re referring to Tenten?” Tsunade confirmed before saying, “Preposterous. I could not trade something of great value for something worthless. You said it yourself. It’s in your best interest to clear your cells and have no shirkers to deal with. Let it be my problem. You can train new Root agents according to what the Sandaime’s reforms stipulate. It’s all that I will allow.”

“All that you’ll allow…” He repeated in a sharp, low voice.

“There is only one shinobi that would be suitable for such a trade.” Tsunade announced, “You can have Jiraiya. I’m sure he’d be welcomed as a new recruit.”
Danzo shut his eye and sighed quietly. She had made her point.

“Do we have an accord?” She asked calmly.

The old man was aware that since their conversation had begun, veteran ANBU agents had crept inside the chamber from several locations. They took unthreatening positions beside their Root counterparts, not likely to attack unless Tsunade was in distress. At the same time, a small dog with a bandana tied around its neck padded up beside Kakashi. His presence, as well as Tenzo’s, was intentional. Danzo felt like he was reliving the day Hiruzen had made his hardnosed request.

He couldn’t deny that she was a clever woman. Tsunade came fully prepared and backed him into a bureaucratic corner so that he could not refute her demand. And the only exchange he could get out of this was that perverted, washed up old Toad. He’d be at an even greater deficit than before with that oaf roaming around.

“Please, keep Gama-sennin in your service.” His voice carried a haughty tone as he turned and walked back down the bridge, “Consider this transfer…approved.”

He stepped through the stone doorway and disappeared, having nothing more to do with the Hokage’s ultimatum. Kakashi relaxed a little and beside him Tenzo finally took a breath. Their anxiety abated. Tsunade had been able to talk her way to victory.

The sentinel Root agents remained where they were, but after what could have been 10 minutes or more, a new guard exited from the left doorway, pushing Sai onto the suspended bridge. The small Root boy from earlier was also sent out with a package in his hands. He passed Sai, who was tottering dizzily, and handed the folder to Tsunade with a small bow, “Here you are, Hokage-sama. Danzo-sama promised you this framework for the exam, but he neglected to give it to you. Please accept his apology.”

“It’s fine. Thank you.” She took the documents, grateful that Danzo had not made a stink about anything else.

The nameless boy continued on down the eastern bridge and was long gone before Sai rounded the corner. His pale skin had erupted with hideous bruises in several places. He was disheveled and tired-looking. What was most noticeable, upon Kakashi’s first impression of the now ex-Root subordinate, was how dejected he looked. Tenzo picked up on it as well. Root operatives loomed and watched him pass by in silence. Though their expressions were plain, some looked mildly malicious, as if Sai had become an example of what they would never hope to be: a reject. They were glad to see him go.

Sai stopped in front of the Hokage, skillfully concealing his shame. It was harder to bend for a respectful bow, as his back had been mucked with from correctional beatings. He accomplished it and spoke quietly, “Thank you for inviting me into your service, Tsunade-sama.”

“You’re welcome. I was eager to fetch you, Sai. Is that what you still wish to be called?”

“I have no other name. Please call me Sai.”

“As you wish. Come along! We have appointments to keep,” Tsunade raised her head to look at the Root ninja surrounding them. “And to all of you: have a most pleasant day!” She pressed on and her ANBU veterans retreated in a timely fashion.

Tenzo ushered Sai along to follow behind Kakashi and his canine companion. Sai could hardly lift his head up as he walked slowly. The only organization and community he had ever known found him obsolete, and Danzo had quickly decided to hand him off to the Hokage. His sense of worth had reached a new, all-time low.

As they climbed the long staircase to leave the subterranean command center, Tenzo spoke to him softly, “I’ve gone through this too.”

Sai glanced at him, “You have?”

“Yes. The Third Hokage retrieved me from Root in nearly the exact same way.” Tenzo’s smile was small, “Do not feel ashamed. I am much better off now.”

“I don’t know if the same can be said of me…I have no life or family or belongings. I will have nothing in your world.”

“You, he says. Like he’s never been a part of Konoha…” Kakashi thought while chuckling to himself in front of them, listening to the conversation.

“You will have all of it and then some, once you start over. Tsunade-sama and your comrades in the standard forces will help you.” Tenzo spoke light-heartedly, “Try to recognize that this is the best day of your life.”

The morning was just as productive and agreeable for Tenten. She was very narrowly missing Hayate’s head with sword strikes while they trained at his preferred field.

He dashed away too late. She had already used Dance of the Crescent Moon, and when one of her clones phased into vision beside him, it was the only sword swing he could parry. She and her second Shadow Clone had caught him and held their blades near his throat, hinting that he surrender. He sighed and lowered his weapon.

“Not bad. I’m not even going to ask you to do that again.” Hayate sheathed his sword and crossed over to a basket Yugao had prepared for them. He took a sip from a water bottle before adding, “You’ve been almost cutting my head off for three days now. I appreciate your restraint.”

“No problem.” She replied happily.

He had expected her to pick up the technique quickly. She was easily as intelligent as her father, and equally as industrious as her mother. But there was plenty more she needed to learn. When Tenten performed well, as she had been doing this week, he liked to give her free time to sharpen her other skills. He had been nice enough to set up two targets for her at the edge of the lawn, but they had since been hacked apart. She had conceded it was a nice gesture and she had liked using them up until they broke. Hayate thought to himself he should’ve asked Gai how often he replaced targets for his team beforehand, but he had already gotten an estimate of Tenten’s destructive output.

Similarly, Hayate was not crazy about letting her aim scores of deadly projectiles at him, as he was not very good at deflecting them en masse. Takaharu had done the same thing to him when he was younger, and blocking exercises had been difficult when the man could empty two tool scrolls in a few seconds. Today, Hayate had set up a new target circle for Tenten in the hope it would hold her over for a while.

In a twist, she had summoned a weapon he had never seen her use before. It was a golden-lacquered bow that, as far as he could tell, had no arrows to accompany it. Tenten took a position about 70 meters away from the target, quiver-less, and steadied the bow with her right arm. Hayate leaned against a tree and watched from the sidelines in fascination. He blinked hard when he watched the girl manifest an arrow made of pure chakra, notching it to the string which absorbed the blue glow.
She aimed and fired.

The dart of energy swirled into a fiery bolt shortly after it launched, and it exploded into a ball of flame when it struck the target. Charred chunks and cinders remained after the attack. Tenten looked at her teacher apologetically, “Sorry. I haven’t used this in a while.”

“It’s okay; just understand that I am not setting any more up. It’s a waste.” He warned her, “What the hell is that?”

“The Hiyumi. The Third Hokage let me keep it after I picked it up on a mission.”

Hayate crossed over to her to look the weapon over, “Never heard of it. But that also has a Han design. We don’t have bows that shape in shinobi countries.”

“Yeah, I could tell it was different.”

“It’s a beauty. Can I hold it for a second?”

Tenten compliantly handed it to the man and he turned it over, reading the inscriptions and subtle, engraved designs. After a moment he held it up and was successful in generating a chakra arrow at the bend, notching it, and then let it fly. The sad chakra projectile petered out halfway across the field and did not transform into anything. He gave her a puzzled look.

“I can’t…explain why it lights on fire.” Tenten admitted haltingly, “It just always did that when I used it…”

Hayate tried again with the same result. He handed it back to her and scratched his neck, thinking it over, “That’s weird. It doesn’t like me. It could be a technical issue.”

“Technical?”

“I’m a Lightning Nature. I’ll go ahead and guess you’re Fire. Your mom and dad could generate Fire Transformations.”

“How do you know that?” Tenten was astounded, “I didn’t even take a test!”

“I don’t. I’m assuming. There are weird rules about the clan you’re descended of. Shishou told me about them when I was a kid.” Hayate explained, moving back to the basket, “Let’s eat. Then we’ll practice more later.”

Tenten returned to their break area and unfolded a box of rice and blackened chicken. “What kind of rules? He used to tell me things too.” She prodded.

“Unusual things. Superstitious. Hard to prove…” Hayate muttered and unwrapped a rice cake, “He said that everyone in your line will be a Fire-type Nature Transformation, no matter what. They always have been, and descendants will be as well.”

“Why?”

“His explanation sounded like a fairytale, but if you want to know I’ll tell you the same thing he told me.” The man shrugged, “Maybe it’s true.”

“Try me. I’ll listen.”

“Well…” He chewed his food and then continued, “Shishou talked about…your namesake. The founder of your clan had the same name as you, a heck of a long time ago.”
“That’s not surprising. Dad was way too sentimental.”

“They often went by Han names, because many people began settling here and mixing in with the local populations. Try to imagine an era when the concept of a ninja was new… it was a historically dark time. Lots of competitive shinobi clans were trying to one-up each other while they wandered around. They weren’t shy about finding foreign, skilled warriors to join their ranks.” Hayate opened a thermos of tea, “The woman who founded the Sasagainu clan married a man who had Han heritage, which became a common occurrence. That clan married and accepted them to learn new techniques.”

“Huh. So those people possessed Ninjutsu?”

“Of course not. Only shinobi can use Ninjutsu. These strange new people brought over Tao Arts. And I’m sorry, but I don’t know much of anything about it other than what we might call it…” He snickered, “Magic. We can’t explain how it works. Long ago people used to understand. Shishou said he wondered if maybe some of his jutsu were nonconforming because of abilities your clan passed along.”

“So you’re trying to tell me that’s why everyone is a Fire Nature? That’s not very convincing.”

“I’m not trying to convince you, missy. I’m just repeating what I was told.” He corrected, “That woman, Tenten the First, whatever… she commanded that her clan would only align their chakra with Fire for some stupid reason or another. The point is that it stuck. Forever. No one can explain how she did it.”

Tenten paused in her eating and frowned, “I’ll admit that is pretty strange.”

“That’s hardly the strangest thing she did. Did your Dad explain the daughter-limit to you? That’s a freaky one.” He pointed a chopstick at her, “You’re his one and only. Every family from your clan can only produce one daughter. The clan founder made it that way.”

“That is complete nonsense.”

“It’s completely true.”

“How would that even work?”

“I already said I don’t understand how it works. It just does.” Hayate shrugged, “That’s why your Dad was reverent of your ancestor. It was a rare thing. Your namesake went through something that made her institute that limit. If anything, it just made girls more special in that clan. Boys were pretty average.”

“Let’s say I believe all of this… because it does sound a bit familiar,” She yielded, “Does it mean that the jutsu I use won’t be normal?”

“Nah. You’re just better suited for Fuinjutsu and Bukijutsu. You’re as modern and capable as any other ninja around.” He assured her, “You might just discover some quirks like your Dad did.”

Hayate set aside his thermos, “For example, he had many tricks up his sleeve. It wasn’t just the Dance of the Crescent Moon. That’s only as far as I got. I can’t use its parent-technique.”

Her eyes widened a fraction, “There’s another?”

“Sure there is, it’s what your Dad was famous for, in part. The Dance of Lunar Phases. It’s a hell of a lot more draining and complex, and to be honest, I don’t think there’s any chance you can get it. Not without your father’s guidance.” He unwrapped another rice ball, “That opportunity is lost.”
“And why not? You never learned it?”

“I learned about it and watched as closely as I could, but I can’t use the same Nature Transformations that come naturally to your clan. I’m not compatible. Tao Arts specialize in Yin and Yang Release, and that’s one thing that is seldom achieved in shinobi training. It’s always ridiculously difficult. Sage-level shenanigans, usually.”

“…you lost me.”

“I could never get that hang of Yin Release. Your Dad could rather easily manipulate the Dark element within chakra, which is the backbone of his jutsu. It’s not really something that can be taught. You have it or you don’t. It’s heritable.”

“I might safely count myself out.” Tenten agreed, “I wouldn’t even know where to begin! In fact, I didn’t know that chakra was broken down into light and dark.”

“Congrats. Now you do.”

“How did he do it?”

“A person has to be very talented and maybe just as lucky. Only the most skilled shinobi utilize Shadow or Light styles. Typically, Kage can use them to great effect, but there’s evidence of it in this village’s clans too.” Hayate divulged, “The Akimichi clan, for one. Their techniques harness Yang Release to change and regulate physical composition. And on the other hand you have the Nara, who use Yin Release as the basis of their shadow skills.”

“Holy-!” Tenten put her food container down, thrilled, “All this time? That’s how they did it?”

“Yeah, you putz. Didn’t you ever wonder? Non-elemental jutsu often extract light and dark properties to function. In your case, you would take after your Dad. He used both from time to time.”

She was let down that Hayate would not be able to guide her, “And you definitely can’t help me learn about it?”

“Sorry. You’re on your own. Figure out Yin Release and apply it to the jutsu you just mastered. That’s about all I can advise.” He snorted in addition, “And forget Yang Release. Shishou was disciplined enough to harness both, but forgive me if I don’t give you that much credit.”

“I guess I can.”

“Finish your lunch. It’s about time I get you prepped for our next project.” Hayate directed her, “You’ve got no problems with the Dance of the Crescent Moon, and you’ll only get better with time. But now we’re going to talk about what’s in the black scroll.”

“A weapon?” She perked up.

“Not in the traditional sense. I figured since we’re covering topics that include the weird and wonderful, it might be worth bringing up.”

“Can I summon it?” She was anxious.

“Finish chewing first, sheesh.” He smirked and handed the scroll to her, “You tell me. Can you?”

Tenten excitedly unwound the scroll and laid it flat, observing what was definitely not a tool summoning scroll. The design had a similar appearance, but the calligraphy was foreign. She stared in the hope she could make heads or tails of it.

“Calm down. You can’t read Hanzi so it won’t make sense.”

She arched an eyebrow, “Can you read it?”

“You flatter me. No.”

“What is this?”

“This is a kind of summoning scroll you don’t normally work with, miss. This is a contract.”

She instantly understood and nodded, “Of the foreign variety?”

“More like the old variety. As old as the day is long. Dating back to when your clan got into…sticky situations…in the beginning. They came up with something that could defend against the most terrible powers ninja wielded in those days.”

Tenten had to consciously relax and steady her breathing. This was not the kind of jutsu she would expect to inherit, but it was reassuring that her father had imagined her capable enough to be entrusted with it. As she had learned about summoning contracts roughly in the Academy and by word of mouth, Tenten wanted to reach for the scroll and sign up.

Hayate halted her by waving a cut stick of squash, “Hold on. We’re still eating lunch. You’re not doing anything until we finish up our talk.”

She sat back and relented, “Alright then. Talk to me.”

“When was the last time you saw someone contractually summon something?”

“Sato can summon owls and I’ve seen Naruto use toads.” She added thoughtfully, “Gai-sensei hardly ever asks Ningame for help…”

“So what do you suppose this does?”

Tenten sipped from a beverage can and thought about it, “I…don’t want to assume…it’s an animal.” She decided, “It’s not an animal.”

“It isn’t. That’s why this isn’t your run-of-the-mill contract.”

“A weapon.”

“Great guess. The trouble is that contracts are formed only with sentient beings. I hope you’re starting to see why your postulation is logically unsound.” Hayate took a moment to chow down on vegetables, “But knowing your Dad and all of the things we spoke about previously…maybe you’re not so shocked.”

She asked brightly, “This is a sentient weapon?”

“Sure. As bluntly as I can put it, that’s all it is. It’s a product of Fuinjutsu, which handily enough, can bind souls, chakra and other curious states of matter into objects and so forth. That’ll explain why this contract can be in agreement with anything.” He waved his hand, “I’m no expert, but I’m glad I asked my Master questions when I had the chance. I can at least give you the background of it.”

“How nontraditional.”
“That might as well be your middle name.” He sniffed, “This contract will only summon one thing: a jian. And while you don’t need to refer to it by name, this sword is called Susumajin. It’s unique and it’s not very safe. It wasn’t made for the present day. It was made for war in a time when chakra was more abundant and volatile.”

“And I still have your blessing to work with it?”

“You sure as hell don’t want anyone else using this thing. Maybe your Sensei has told you about the Seven Shinobi Swordsmen and their weapons?”

“Well it wasn’t much, and my team did fight Raiga, you know.”

“And you probably wouldn’t look forward to doing it again.”

“I wouldn’t.”

“Right: because no one wants to tango with a soul-forged weapon. They carry too much chakra, they can seal things, they conduct nature transformations, they eat chakra, etc. So can this. Weapons like that were made to deal with ancient clans that made those qualities necessary.” He elaborated, “In this day and age, we might call that overkill. But if Hoshigaki Kisame came around for a fight, he wouldn’t think twice about letting his sword devour someone’s chakra. It’s an easy way to win.”

“In other words, I should use this wisely?” She muffled a laugh, “Lest I become a hated tyrant.”

“Don’t joke about that.” He narrowed his eyes, “You’ve got the potential to be among the worst of the worst rogue nin, if you ever went bad. I won’t shun my responsibility to take you down as a former teacher either.”

She was contrite, “Sorry! You know I wasn’t serious, Hayate. Come on.”

“Good. We can get into its properties and abilities this evening, but for now, let’s just learn about summoning it to start.”

Hayate commanded her to finish eating her lunch which she had barely touched due to anticipation. She nibbled while he demonstrated hand seals that would allow her to use the Summoning Technique. It wasn’t difficult to memorize. She continued eating while he pointed out a space for her to sign the contract.

“Your signature needs to be in blood. It’s the only way.” He instructed, “After that, using seals for the summoning jutsu will call the sword to you. A few words of advice…” Hayate packed up his lunch stuffs in the basket, “Susumajin sleeps underground to avoid contact with humans. That’s where it breaches. Keep your summoning matrixes on the ground as opposed to air, because it will shoot up to reach you. Shishou has done it. Also, keep it in its sheath until I instruct otherwise. I don’t want to get sent to the hospital, got it?”

“Understood.”

“Thanks. Jeez…it’s such a pain teaching a prodigy. You need to jump through all kinds of hoops for them…”

“I’m not a prodigy.” She protested, internally comparing herself to a teammate.

“Don’t try to argue, Tenten. Geniuses are the people who are exceptional in one or more regards, by shinobi standards. You fall under that category. You’re not some generic foot soldier. There’s no use in imagining that you are one.”
“…I think I should thank you…but you were only justifying your complaint.”

“Exactly.”

She tilted her head to appraise him, “You know…I don’t recommend that you teach anyone else in the future. You’re too crabby.”

“That’s fine by me.”

By the early afternoon, Tsunade had treated her Root-infiltrating companions to lunch. She had even sent a catered meal to the ANBU HQ to feed any shinobi on break to show her appreciation for their participation. She’d be expecting their thank-you notes later.

Sai ate timidly, but judging from how rapidly his plate emptied morsel by morsel, Tsunade supposed he had been starved for many days. Tenzo and Kakashi had relaxed considerably and joked around as they typically did. Tsunade hoped that their interaction would provide Sai with an example to go off of. The boy hardly spoke or made eye contact, but he made his gratitude known at the end of the meal.

Afterward, Tsunade asked Tenzo to accompany Sai to government appointed housing (two options available) that Sai could choose from. Then he was expected to bring Sai to an evaluation at the ANBU reception center.

On the way back to the administrative building with Kakashi, she explained, “He really does have nothing at the moment. His home was subsidized by Root and so were his worldly possessions. They have since been cancelled and recovered by the foundation, I was told on the way back. How prompt…”

“Do you think Tenzo should stay with him?”

“Only for a short time. I expect Sai to assimilate and live on his own.” Tsunade replied, “Tenzo can advise him on many things, but I won’t allow him to become a crutch. After all, Tenzo is still overseeing a project I tasked him with.”

“Oh?”

She gave him annoyed look, “It’s none of your business, Hatake.”

Kakashi chuckled. He had an inkling of what the ongoing assignment was.

After arriving at the office, Tsunade gave Kakashi a verbal pat on the back and tossed a scroll at him. It was a mission requiring that he lead the entirety of Team 7 to protect Prince Michiru on his way back to the Land of the Moon. “Wait until Kiba returns from the Oga castle, and then you may depart when you are all packed.” She advised, “Watch the Prince carefully. He’s a big spender and he has his critics.”

“Understood, Hokage-sama.”

Tsunade settled in her desk chair and sighed as Kakashi made his exit. She was able to tick at least one thing off of her conscience bucket list. Rescuing a wayward member of Root was not something she would independently choose to do, but after hearing of Neji and Lee’s concern for the boy even after they had nearly been captured…she made up her mind. Hopefully, Sai would become a trustworthy shinobi she could one day depend on, ‘Much like how I rely on Tenzo now…’
Shizune came and went, delivering documents and afternoon tea. After a brief, solitary period, Tsunade was visited by a white-cloaked ANBU agent whose greeting was unusually chipper.

“You heard the news?” She guessed.

“Yes. One of my teams told me that Danzo was visibly embarrassed.” The man was amused, “Tsunade-sama, your bravery inspires me.”

She feigned a humble expression, “Oh Kegon, it’s just routine checks and balances. All in a day’s work…” She used his name when they were in private meetings, much like how she addressed Tenzo by name.

“As you say, my lady.”

“I thought you’d still be out scouting near the Toi province.”

“Reconnaissance is complete. I expect my assessment will herald some good news you have been waiting for.” Kegon announced, “The rogue ninja Shimofuri Koinyu, alleged slayer of Hyuga Hikune, was located and engaged in combat on the border of the River Country. He retreated in defeat from Team Izu, who I have asked to continue tracking him. Team Ro, under my command, was able to locate Dintei Bihokokuni as well.”

With wide eyes, Tsunade folded her hands and asked, “That outcome?”

“He was able to avoid combat and detection by penetrating further into the Rice Country. It appears that he keeps in frequent contact with Orochimaru, and by that measure, he will continue to evade scouting teams when possible.” The agent added, “This presented my team with two concrete facts: he avoids all Fire Country patrols and is not in direct contact with his servant, who has been isolated in the River Country. We maintain the upper hand.”

Tsunade exhaled in relief, “We need to keep it that way. I suspected Orochimaru was assisting him in one way or another, but Bi is shorthanded and not liking the attention he’s getting.” She continued, “I apologize for making all of you work so hard. I’ve felt guilty about keeping many teams on patrol for such a length of time…”

“Tsunade-sama, please do not regret your decisions. I speak on behalf of all of my comrades when I tell you that we do not resent our duty to secure the safety of Konoha,” He tilted his head playfully, “And we certainly don’t mind the overtime pay.”

“Ha! Of course you don’t, you rascal.” She grinned, “Go home and buy your wife some flowers. She probably won’t remember who you are after all of this time.”

“I’ll remind her.”

Hinata was excused from training with her father after the sun set. She humored Hanabi’s demands and sparred with her sister for a short time before they were called in for supper.

Tomorrow she could look forward to a mission with her team, she noted. Hinata was always searching for ways to occupy her time. She trained with her family, her team, went out with friends, and generally dallied in her hobbies so that her mind was not so absorbed with the one person she missed most.

While sitting through dinner, she noticed that she was not the only one quietly thinking. Across the table, Neji sat blankly and chewed, hardly concerned with the food in front of him. Hanabi kept up an unnecessarily loud conversation with her father, preventing Hiashi from questioning Neji or Hinata’s lethargy. As it stood, Hinata knew full well what Neji was dwelling on. ‘Neji-niisan has done a lot of growing up in a short amount of time. I’ve never seen him like this before.’ She nipped a bit of mushroom, ‘He must think about Tenten all day long...’

She could relate. Hinata devoted at least twenty minutes of each day purely to imagining what Naruto now looked like. All of her friends and family had grown and changed around her, so it only made sense that Naruto had matured as well. Goosebumps would rise up on her skin just at the thought of him being taller. She ate her meal in silence, retreating into her thoughts.

Hinata wanted to see him. Immediately. She wanted to know what he looked like, what his voice sounded like, the roughness of his hands, to see the blue light in his eyes unchanged...

It was terrible to wait. The thoughts consumed her, and she worried that there would be no relief after setting her sights on him again. What if a glimpse couldn’t satisfy? What if she needed everything he was? To touch and taste and hold. Hinata conceded she was not the child she once was. His personality alone transmitted through written words bewitched her. Naruto sounded almost too good to be true in his letters. But to walk beside the person who thought of her so tenderly and trusted her above all others…it would be an overwhelming privilege.

Hinata looked up and beheld Neji giving her a curious look, Are you alright?

She nodded sullenly. Neji must have suspected what made her swoon and daydream so.

At the end of the meal, as always, the Main family parted ways to enjoy private time before sleep. Hinata absently prepared a travel bag to be used for her next mission, and then stored and labeled containers of healing ointment for wounds. Her friends and teammates used them up so quickly...

Once her shinobi-related concerns were attended to, Hinata crossed over to her desk and lifted her mother’s old sewing basket. Nothing soothed her nerves more than taking up the tools that her mother had once skillfully worked in her hands on cool nights. She took a seat on her bed, dressed in pajamas, and prepared to knit until she fell asleep. Today’s project was a continuation of the fingerless gloves her sister had wished for. They were coming along.

She worked serenely until the night was deep. Her eyelids drooped. ‘Nearly finished...’ She thought, but tomorrow she could add the finishing touches.

Hinata set aside her creation and the basket before tugging a lamp string. She slipped beneath the covers of her bed and made herself comfortable. Her head felt unusually heavy on the pillow.

With her eyes still shut, she indulged in a habit that many members of the Hyuga clan did. She used her Byakugan to survey the house and her family. Her sister had even admitted to doing the same thing regularly. It was reassuring to go to sleep knowing that everything and everyone was in their place. Her father and sister were settling down as well. However, there were a few people awake and lollygagging. Some were absent on missions. And one room was vacant when it shouldn’t have been. ‘Niisan...’ Neji had snuck off and it wasn’t the first time she had noticed him do such a thing. Of course, he had a perfectly good reason to set out and stay unseen.

With a knowing smile, she relaxed and gave in to sleep.

Neji had relocated to a lookout on top of a newer high-rise, lingering in the shadow of the adjacent building. He had no intention of getting anyone’s attention, and thus kept his distance from lights and bright structures. He had not bothered with a change of clothes to disguise himself. He wore what he typically did around the Hyuga house: a teal gi and gray pants, with the Hyuga crest emblazoned on the front of the shirt.

Even now, he was hesitant to disobey the Hokage. Certainly he knew better, and he most definitely trusted the kind ANBU agent who had advised against his defiance. But even if they could not meet face to face or speak to each other, simply seeing Tenten from afar wouldn’t jeopardize anything, Neji supposed. Nothing provided adequate distraction these days. Not time with his friends, training with Lee and Wong Leung, not even the mayhem at the Oga castle could stop him from thinking about her. His only reasonable solution was to steal a gander and then be on his way.

He gazed with his blood limit into the apartment complex beside his perch. The floor she resided on was a few degrees below his line of sight, and so he looked down into her home as it unfolded in a transparent collage of rooms and items. The household was lit and she was awake, even at a late hour. Neji wondered if she habitually stayed up. If he could, he would tell her in a most authoritative tone that she get proper rest.

She was chicly dressed in a traditional white cheongsam and dark pants, keeping her back turned to his position. Maybe it was an optical illusion, or maybe it was due to the passing of time, but she looked taller, slender, and her eyes (which he saw for a brief moment) were wiser and more beautiful. She was pinching dumpling dough shut in her hands, standing in her kitchen in pink house slippers.

Well, that ought to have sufficed. But he did not look away. Neji found it hard to swallow, keeping his line of sight steady, and watched her perform the menial task of cooking as if it were the key to salvation and Heaven. His short peek converted into a full-blown stakeout.

It had been physically and mentally painful to be away from her for weeks on end. Neji had lost count of the days. It was truly wondrous how the neurotransmitters in his head instantly balanced themselves, and at long last, he felt a surge of happiness that he nearly forgot he was able to feel at all.

After getting over the initial, joyful shock of viewing his teammate, Neji did question why she was cooking so late at night. She was steaming the dumplings in stacked bamboo baskets on top of a boiling pan of water. Tenten waved a hand fan to disperse the vapor that was filling up the small kitchen. She took care of other tasks while she waited for the food to heat. There were scrolls scattered around the living area as well as tea cups on a tray. Maybe she’d had a visitor? She cleaned up odds and ends, followed a hallway to her bedroom, and returned everything to its place.

Tenten lingered in the room and rooted around in a dresser drawer. Neji nearly didn’t look away fast enough before she started to undress and change into street clothes. He respectfully ceased the use of his blood limit, hearing Sato’s irritating jibe in the back of his head, ‘You have the Byakugan! You get to look for free!’ He also remembered rendering Sato unconscious; but a pricking inquisitiveness was setting in, and maybe he used the Byakugan again a little too soon, as she had barely completed pulling a silk blouse over perky, unrestrained breasts. After that, Tenten was essentially decent again, but the impression had been made.

Neji stood like a statue on top of the building, mildly appalled with his actions. He had seen her naked before even without the Byakugan, he asserted in vain. The town called Katabami had been his first brush with her nudity. But there was no use. He had deliberately looked because he was undeniably attracted to her, and he could not say he disliked what he had seen. It was the first instance of rudimentary, sexual interest Neji had ever recorded, save for the things he couldn’t recall while sleeping. He was otherwise, to the shock of his peers, chaste. What Sato didn’t seem to get was that, in spite of his self-control, he did want to look and partake, but chose not to do so out of respect for the one he desired.

His thoughts got carried off in a cerebral current, and while trying to explain away his momentary breach of decorum, Neji noticed that Tenten had bagged up the containers of dumplings. She slipped on sandals and then silently left her apartment.

His heartbeat quickened.

Neji observed as she moved briskly down the communal hallway, raced down the stairwell, and exited on the opposite (front) side of the building. Tenten then proceeded at a casual walk, with a plastic bag swaying from one hand. Neji acknowledged at this point in time that he should go home and quit the game; for fear that the next agent to catch him would not be so forgiving.

But, as was genuinely characteristic of him, he pushed the threat of punishment far from his mind. Neji followed after Tenten from the rooftops. Clouds that rolled past the moon would black out all light for short intervals, but he kept the young woman firmly in his sights.

Corners and turns, long stretches of alleyways and paths unfolded before Neji began to recognize which quadrant of the village they were passing through. ‘Of course.’ It should have been obvious. Tenten came to a stop outside of Lee’s house in the middle of the night.

There was an unfamiliar pang of jealousy and admiration he felt for Lee as Tenten stooped, arranged the bamboo container on the porch, and then immediately ran off. She too understood that it would not do to defy the Hokage.

After bolting down a long street and turning a corner, Tenten halted and caught her breath, pressing against a wooden fence. Neji had perched on the rim-like, tiled rooftop of a circular building. He debated calling out to her. Or tipping her off to his presence. Subtler still, letting her glimpse his moonstruck shadow on the road beneath her feet, if he decided to stand up.

And then she was off again. He was surprised by her swiftness.

Neji continued to trail behind her, not thinking much at all as the quiet accompaniment turned into a meditative exercise. He felt better. He felt together with her again.

It was a peaceful walk northwest up several streets and through a plaster tunnel (he loomed above) before Neji stopped in his tracks. She was a block away from the Hyuga estate. Tenten’s course was sure as she continued on towards the front gate. He pieced together the meaning of her visit.

She wanted to see him. Tenten had not brought him food or anything like that, but her appearance would have been more than enough. It appeased the kindled light of hope inside him. In so far as what his imagination allowed, Neji believed they were equally in need of each other. He looked left and right and saw the way was clear. He leapt from the top of a small cottage, crossed a power line, and then dropped down on the opposite side of the estate wall.

While on the lawn, Neji estimated it would only be a matter of seconds before she passed through the gate. He wondered which action he should take next. Run to her? Sweep her up? Casually call her over? He elected to stay where he was, not wishing to startle her. She would notice.

The night air was calm and filled with the songs of spring wildlife. He waited longer than he expected to before using his blood limit. He spied Tenten frozen in front of the entrance in hesitation. Then, just as soon as she had arrived, Tenten departed with a shake of her head as if to scold herself.

He was taken aback by her flight. Neji had to collect his wits before rushing after her, not likely to catch up after her head start. But he had a good idea of where she was running to. Why wouldn’t she follow through? She was stronger than that. Even she had the ability to test Tsunade’s boundaries, but maybe that was not why she had wavered.

She was racing back to her home. Her knowledge of streets and shortcuts was far keener than Neji’s navigation. He trusted that was because she visited friends more often and knew how to reach them. When she blended into the thin, late night foot-traffic of a main road Neji slowed down. After a right turn she was only a few dozen steps away from her apartment complex. He could still catch her. He sped up and prepared to drop into a back alley where he would meet her half way.

“Neji!”

He halted. From his immediate left, the same ANBU agent had hurled himself onto a department store rooftop and held up a hand. He bent double for a moment and panted. He must have run all the way across town after detecting him.

Knowing that it was foolish to challenge the interceptor for a second time, Neji relented, watching as Tenten reached the entrance of the building down the way.

“How do you know…” The masked shinobi caught his breath, “We’ve been over this already…you put your faith in me and promised you wouldn’t cause trouble…”

“Where were you? I nearly spoke to her.” Neji quipped, “The Hokage would not have been pleased by your tardiness.”

“Don’t get me started on what pleases the Hokage.” The man growled, standing upright, “Neji, please do not test me. I have been very lenient with you.”

He nodded slowly, watching with the Byakugan as Tenten scaled the stairs, “I know. I appreciate that.

“You have a fine way of showing it…” The agent grumbled, “So are you going to make me watch you all night?”

“No. I won’t contact her in any fashion. I only…” His voice lowered, “Wanted a short time to see her.”

“Well, I suppose that’s alright.” The veteran ninja crossed over to a stonework ledge and took a seat, “But no tricks.”

Neji stood nearby with folded arms, observing as Tenten finally made it back to her home. She locked the door behind her and sighed, removing her shoes. She moved about the house and shut lights off. She cleaned up the kitchen and stored away cooking tools. Tenten seemed defeated.

“Ahhh…” The ANBU agent yawned and then said, “Excuse me.”

Neji gave him a strange look, “Are you tired?”

“Yes. ANBU are tired half of the time they are on duty. But Hokage-sama has kept me so busy lately that I haven’t had a regular sleep schedule.”

“Is that why you were late?”

“In part. I am looking after a new recruit.” Neji could see the man smile behind his mask, “A friend of yours.”
“Is that so?”

“It is! Sai was released from Root.”

Neji stared at him in astonishment, unsure of how to take the news.

“If you had never said anything after your mission report…Tsunade-sama would not have paid him any mind. Sai was in dire straits when we picked him up.” The agent went on, “He’ll live much better from now on. He’s learning quickly. I’ve been helping him sign up for programs and shelter and such…”

Puzzled, Neji spoke after a moment, “What does he call you?”

“Pardon?”

“Sai gives everyone he meets nicknames.”

“Oh! He did call Kakashi…Mr. White Fang. That was odd.” The man recalled, “But he calls me Tenzo.”

“That’s…”

“My real name.” Tenzo shrugged, “You’d learn it sooner or later. There’s no way I could stay anonymous when you can plainly see me and recognize me on the street.”

Neji’s small smile was good-natured, as he had thought the exact same thing.

“So she tried again?” Tenzo asked, “She’s done this before. I have seen Tenten bring things to your other teammate’s home twice, and then an old gentleman took them inside.”

Neji nodded. She had a closer relationship with Lee and his grandfather. It came as no surprise that she would find ways to interact with them.

“Sometimes she was on the lookout for you.” Tenzo chuckled, “On the streets uptown late at night… I knew where she was headed. I politely asked her to go home when I found her doing that.”

“Polite and professional.” Neji mused, “I could learn something from you.”

“It isn’t easy, but it is quite gratifying.”

“Teach Sai well.”

“I intend to.” The man sighed softly, “But he will be a tough nut to crack…”

Neji turned his all-pervading gaze back to the building. Tenten had settled on the sofa in the living space of the flat, turning her head to stare at a framed photo on a lamp stand. Maybe it was a picture of family, but more than likely, Neji believed, it was a team photo. They took one each year with Sato, and Lee and Tenten coveted the memories.

“Tenzos.” Neji said at length, “Go get some sleep…or attend to something else. You can trust that I won’t do anything.”

“Should I?” The man was amazed.

“Yes. I don’t want to make your job any more difficult than it is.”
“Huh!” He was thrilled, “Then I think I will…” He stood and shook out his limbs, warding off exhaustion, “Thank you, Hyuga Neji. I can say that you have been a very pleasant assignment.”

After a quiet goodbye, Tenzo moved on, judging that Neji would not abuse his trust.

Tenten carelessly fell asleep on the couch she had nestled on. It was tempting to move her to her bed, or maybe even communicate with her in some way, but Neji refrained. He kept watch as the moon continued its slow trek across the sky.

The same moonlight flooded the Toad Valley.

Naruto had worked until a late hour with Fukasaku’s assistance. He had made some headway in sensing and absorbing natural energy with Toad Oil. He could more or less blend it with his own chakra safely, seldom transforming into a toad while he did so. Fukasaku was impressed.

“Now I’m off to bed!” The old toad declared, “You should be too, Naruto-boy. Don’t horse around and become a statue while I’m a sleep.”

“I won’t, Pa.”

After the elder had hopped away back to his house down the sprawling hill, Naruto abandoned his spot near the oil pool. A knapsack of items had been left on the edge of the stone courtyard, and Naruto took it with him as he proceeded along a narrow footbridge. He crossed over a nearby pond and followed the light of lanterns hanging from whimsical, twisted tree branches.

Naruto stopped and made himself comfortable on the cushiony top of a giant toadstool. ‘Yeah, there’s enough light here…’ A glass lantern containing a small swarm of fireflies was hanging just above him. He retrieved a blank scroll and an ink brush to write. He shifted to lie on his stomach, letting the light fall only on the parchment in front of him. Before he forgot the things he had thought about during the day, Naruto wanted to compose a letter before retiring for the night.

‘Okay, let’s see…’ He exhaled slowly.

Dear Hinata,

I’m sorry that I am a few days late getting back to you.

Naruto twitched his nose in annoyance. Jiraiya had been particularly pushy that week. He had plenty of criticism to give about how “ready” Naruto was to move past training with Toad Oil. The arguments had delayed him from replying to Hinata’s most recent letter.

Ero-sensei is cycling back into a mid-life crisis. Every time he watches me train he gets upset or needs to disparage me somehow. One minute he’s supportive, and the next he’s whining about how he misses being young, and that I’m stealing his limelight. At least he’s honest about his feelings.

But there’s something else. Jiraiya told me that he’s my godfather and was asked by my parents to look after me. How about that? I never had any idea that there could be a link between Ero-sensei and my family. It explains why he’s stayed with me when no one else would. He also promised that he would explain soon, but I still have a hard time accepting it. My parents are dead. All of this time he never spoke up.

Tension escaped him in a short breath.

I’m sorry. I’m not trying to weigh you down with any of those facts. It just feels better to get it off my chest. I feel so frustrated when I have to look at him every day and try to forgive him. I hope that the more I learn, the less it’ll hurt. But I’m not so sure that will happen. It’s kind of a relief to know that there is one person who can tell me about my parents. It gets me thinking about what I want to do someday when it’s my turn.

When we have kids-

Naruto’s hand froze and he stared at the characters he had formed. He edited the idea by drawing a strike-through line, and reworded the concept.

If I get to have kids, I would do anything and everything to make sure they weren’t alone. I don’t want them to go through what I did. I want to watch them grow up smiling, and be confident and proud that I was their Dad. I think that when I get that chance, every day will feel like the best day of my life.

He then carefully added:

Did you ever think about having children?

It almost felt silly to ask, but Naruto feared he might come across too forward if he asked her what he was really thinking. ‘With me! Let’s have it all! Whenever you want! I’ll take time off from missions, hell, I’d even forget about becoming Hokage if you’d take me as your-’ He shook his head, ‘Gosh…I am losing it. I’ll sound like I’m nuts. I shouldn’t be worrying about any of this. She’s probably never even let it cross her mind! I’m sorry, Hinata…’

So he simply continued:

I have.

Naruto paused and cleared his throat before changing the subject.

I’ve thought about a lot of things I want to accomplish in the future. Really, I put together a tentative schedule! Although when I think about it…the waiting part kind of sucks. Here’s a bit of it:

The likelihood of me getting back to Leaf in time for the Chunin Exam is pretty low, so I’m not going to let that discourage me. I may need another year or so to finish Sage Training, and I promise you that I’m doing my best. I’d say I have made some decent progress! But I don’t want to draw it out. Then I’ll come home as fast as I can and take you out to dinner or whatever you want, because your patience is something I might not be able to repay ever. But I’ll try! Then I’ll put up and shut up and do whatever Baa-chan says. I’ll take crappy missions because beggars can’t be choosers, and now that Gaara is Kazekage, I will need to find a new normal. I’ll register for the test with any team that will take me. I hope it doesn’t sound conceited, but I’m not worried about the Chunin Exam. If I am worthy then Baa-chan will know it, won’t she? What matters to me is that I feel confident in myself. I can tell that you’ll be promoted soon. Don’t hold back in the next exam, alright? I’m just sorry that I won’t be there to watch your matches, Hinata. The world is your oyster. And when it’s my time to move up I’ll keep my head down and work hard. It won’t matter how long it takes. I can go as far as I want. From what Ero-sensei and Gaara have been telling me, becoming a candidate for Kage is half dedication and half politics. We’ll see where that goes. My point is, no matter how it turns out, I will never have a reason to be disappointed. As long as I’m with you I have what I want.

Naruto heaved a heartfelt sigh.

So I was wondering if maybe you could tell me how you see the future… If you let me stay by your side nothing would make me happier. I will fight for your dreams. I promise I’ll help you achieve them, Hinata. I have exactly what I need out of life right now, and I would never trade you for anything. I don’t know how significant it is coming from a guy who has known you since we were little kids, but...no man will ever love you more than I do. I’ve never stopped, not since I met you. That was an honest appeal, for whatever it’s worth. I won’t be the only person in life who tries to catch your eye...but I know there is no one more precious on this earth than you, Hyuga Hinata. And that’s a truth I live my life by.

All my love,

Naruto

He finished and went back to read it over. Naruto made a soft chuff of approval, “Heh! This didn’t turn out too bad…”

The young man rolled up the correspondence and stowed away his tools in the bag. He rubbed at his eyes and then teleported back to his room for some shuteye.

Naruto did not get to sleep in for long before Jiraiya’s voice was booming throughout the house. He sounded happy.

Naruto winced and retreated beneath his blanket when the door to his room slid open, allowing a wall of sunshine to cascade inside. Jiraiya stood in the doorway, overjoyed, “Wake up, student!”

“Erg…” He coiled beneath his cover.

“Ha! Today is a perfect day to have a functioning arm!” The sage crowed, flexing both arms with zero difficulty, “I am a complete man again.”

Naruto muttered something that Jiraiya could not make out.

“What was that, kid?”

His mouth poked free, “I said that you’ve lost some bits you’ll never get back, you old Perv.”

“Huh. Hearing that come from a horny bundle of testosterone like you…” Jiraiya smiled, “Assures me that you’ll be in my position someday.”

“Bye. You were just leaving, right?”

“Pff. Shut the door behind you.”

“I’m serious!” Jiraiya insisted, “I’ve got a clean bill of health. I can spar with you, Naruto.”

Naruto rolled over and frowned up at the man, “Remember the last time we did that? It wrecked your shit.”

“Well we can take a different approach to it this time. After all, you’re the one who’s consciously abstaining from Kyuubi chakra. What do I have to worry about?”

Naruto sat up, “Plenty!”

“Ho ho! Then prove it.” Jiraiya turned around and joined Fukasaku and Shima for a morning meal. Their voices drifted into Naruto’s room, encouraging him to join them.
‘Ahh fine…’ He sat up and had a satisfying stretch. Naruto dressed quickly before stepping out to join the toad family.

He took a seat at the table and thanked his hosts for the food set out. Jiraiya dropped a scroll in front of him, “Sorry that I took a peek at this. I didn’t realize it was for you. But hey, there’s good news in it.”

“Well? Who’s it from?”

“Gaara.” Jiraiya took a sip of tea, “I’m pretty proud of my Kazekage.”

Naruto rolled his eyes and then glanced over the message while he ate.

_Naruto,

Your concern about controlling Bijuu chakra is not unfounded. It was a subject that occupied me as well. I will first begin by saying that I have not told Sakura anything yet. I have every intention of doing so, probably if an opportunity arises around the time of the Chunin Exam. While I’m in Leaf I think I could provide her with an explanation. Sakura will handle it well. Her studies in the Hidden Star Village have actually made her curious about jinchuriki, so in that respect I am sure I will be just another vehicle by which she will educate herself.

Naruto nibbled on a wheat roll, ‘Lucky jerk…’

What I am about to tell you next may bring some comfort. It might be hard for you to believe, but Shukaku and I get along. We speak regularly and have come to an official agreement about how we will support each other. I have promised that after my death and subsequent release of the One-Tail from his seal, Shukaku will be set free and protected from capture or abuse in the future. I was surprised to find out that he has a home that he would like to return to, and I do not plan to keep him from it. In exchange, Shukaku will help me learn how to master all of his chakra and associated techniques. He expects that I will challenge you to a duel one day, in the hope that his power will overwhelm the Kyuubi. It is a genuine dream of his.

Naruto dropped the roll in shock while he read on.

_I never imagined that an entity that once terrorized me actually had feelings and hopes for the future. He admitted that he took out most of his frustration and aggression on me. He wanted to direct it at the Sand Village and those responsible for imprisoning him, but he has since let go of that resentment. He was not opposed to friendship; he just didn’t know how to take the first step. I am optimistic that Shukaku and I can take significant strides together. By the way, that is his birth name and I habitually refer to him as such.

Similarly, I am certain that you and the Nine-Tailed Fox can make amends the same way. If Shukaku was aggrieved by his treatment and exploitation by shinobi, without a doubt, the Fox will feel that way too. Maybe even more so… But believe that it is possible, Naruto. I am not lying to you when I say that two days ago while training Shukaku unuestioningly lent me all of his chakra. I was not prepared for such a ‘jolt’ and I lost consciousness…which resulted in my transformation into a giant tanuki. A few of my Black Ops guards panicked as they stood by. As it turns out, Shukaku immediately surrendered control to me and woke me up. There was no threat of violence or destruction. He just mocked my weakness. I will continue to practice a safe distance away from the village just in case, but I am telling you this so that you understand it isn’t impossible. With some effort, you and the Fox will be able to find a middle ground.

Naruto asked Jiraiya, “Did you _read_ all of this?”
“I did. I was curious.”

“Did you believe it?”

“Sure I do! What Gaara was saying was by no means nonsense. He took a chance and it paid off! Maybe you shouldn’t push relations with the Nine-Tails off the table, Naruto.”

“Feh!”

Naruto, the only suggestion I can give you is that you take your time. Do not rush into a discussion with Hinata, but when you have returned to Konoha and feel the time is right, you should be honest with her. Additionally, there is a place to start should you decide to speak to the Kyuubi. It might help referring to him by name. Naturally, he wouldn’t appreciate being condescended to or treated like an object. His name is Kurama. I hope that helps.

If there is anything else I can do please let me know. I look forward to hearing from you.

Gaara, Fifth Kazekage

Oh, and beware. He and Shukaku do not get along. Isn’t it strange that we do?

Naruto looked up from the scroll, completely bemused, ‘Kurama? So he’s got a name just as most things do…but I don’t think me calling him that will make a bit of difference’

“Come on, kid. Eat up!” Jiraiya pushed an omelet on a plate in front of him, “I actually made this for you. You know that Ma and Pa don’t eat this junk.”

The boy returned to the food, “Sorry. I’m just trying to believe what Gaara told me.”

“Give it a while. It’ll sink in.”

“It was good tidings, I hope.” Shima wondered.

Jiraiya nodded, “It was, Ma. One of my other knuckleheads, Gaara, is a jinchuriki as well. He was encouraging Naruto to not dismiss the prospect of cooperating with the Nine-Tails.”

“That’s easy for him to say. He didn’t actually injure anyone…” Naruto muttered.

“Eh? Don’t go there. He ballooned into a fat, sandy beast during the Chunin Exam finals!” Jiraiya reminded him, “That was a classic shit-show, if there ever was one. A few shinobi saw it happen, infrastructure was destroyed, and lives were risked…the whole nine yards. Just because no one was hurt or killed doesn’t mean it was not a disaster.”

“And it seems he has made incredible progress.” Fukasaku determined over a bowl of broth, “Naruto-boy, surely you can do the same.”

“Everyone is…riding my back about this…” The blonde shinobi’s voice was low, “But don’t any of you forget that it’s my burden. It’s more work and worry for me! Another chance to screw up!” He took a breath and reeled himself in, “I’ll listen to Gaara. I know that he’s telling me the truth…but I’m not going to let this get in the way of Sage Training. It’s gonna have to wait.”

“Fair enough.” Jiraiya shrugged. They continued eating in relative silence.

After ten minutes or so, a great clamoring came from outside of the house. Many toads were shouting and passing by to look at something. Naruto looked over his shoulder inquisitively, “I wonder what’s up?”
“If you’re all finished, go on and find out.” Shima instructed, “I’ll clean up.”

Naruto was followed by his two mentors as he left the home barefoot. He stepped off of the porch and crossed a stretch of grass before being stuck behind a crowd of gathered Toad Valley residents. Some were making “ooh” and “aah” sounds.

Miffed, Naruto nudged Gamakichi, who was tall enough to see over the mid-sized toads, “Hey Kichi! What’s going on?”

“Mornin’ Naruto. We’ve got a visitor!” The toad was jubilant, “This kind of never happens.”

“Who?” Naruto leapt up to get the view from his toad friend’s head. Below, his eyes fell upon a monstrous golden dog whose size was nearly equivalent to a horse. The dog took a seat and wagged its tail, sniffing at his toad greeters innocently.

“A dog?” Naruto was astounded.

The canine looked up at him, “Yes! But I have a name, you know.”

Surprised, Naruto slid down from Gamakichi’s back. It seemed that the more animals he met, the more often they could speak.

Jiraiya had finally pushed through to the front of the congregation, “Sesshu! How the hell did you find this place?” He gave the golden beast a pat on the muzzle when Sesshu trotted up to him.

“Rin trusts my nose. I have been tracking you for a long time, Gama-sennin.” Sesshu explained, “We were beginning to worry that something had happened to you. Obito had tried to contact you several times.”

“Ah jeez! I’m sorry. I fell out of touch with him while I was recovering here.” Jiraiya conceded sheepishly, “I had a…training accident. I didn’t mean to cause any worry.”

Naruto stood beside his teacher and inspected the tracking ninken, “You’re Obito’s dog?”

“Partly.” Sesshu tilted his head, “Rin is my master. And she is Obito’s master, in certain ways.”

“Uh…”

“His wife, Naruto.” Jiraiya explained, “Rin is from the Leaf Village too. This is her trusty partner, Sesshu. I knew you’d get to be introduced eventually.”

“I swear that name sounds familiar…” The boy scratched his chin.

Jiraiya sighed, “It’s…a bit of pickle. I don’t want you talking about this with anyone. Not your knucklehead teammates or your princess, got it? Obito’s family…is a responsibility of mine that not even Tsunade knows about.”

Naruto frowned, “What do you mean?”

“No one knows that they exist. Long ago, Obito was reported KIA on a mission while Minato was still his Sensei. His team did not realize that he had survived. Years later, after Rin left Konoha…the two reunited and have lived together ever since.” The old man’s tone was stern, “But their teammate, Kakashi, has no idea that any of this has happened. It’d come as a complete shock.”

Naruto merely stared at his mentor.
“It’s not my job to patch every communicative hole our village has! It isn’t!” The man’s eyebrows furrowed, “I made it very clear to Obito that he owes his friend a true apology, but I’m not getting tangled in that web.”

“That is crazy. So…no one knows about Yuma?”

“No. No one has a clue.” He waved his hand towards the ground, “Have a seat. You might need to sit for this…” Naruto sat down and Jiraiya added to all of their animal companions, “The rest of you might want to sit too…”

Only the dog sat. It was a command, after all.

“What? What’s the problem? You know, other than people lying to Kakashi!” Naruto grumbled.

Jiraiya attempted to speak but shut his mouth. He looked at Sesshu, “Could you please do me a favor and…go way over there, boy? I’m sorry. Some of this just doesn’t need to get back to your family.”

“Very well.” The dog stalked off.

Naruto gave his teacher and impatient look after the ninken had departed.

“The problem…is that I have kept them a secret to protect them, Naruto.” Jiraiya explained calmly, “This isn’t a normal shinobi family. Obito…well…the three of them…”

“What?” Naruto folded his arms and sniffed.

“They are all that is left of the Uchiha clan.” The man admitted, “They never learned about the massacre, and likewise, Sasuke and Itachi don’t know about them. If keeping them safe means keeping them away from the rest of the world…then it’s going to have to stay that way.”

The explanation had effectively silenced the young man. It was a shock, and at the same time, it was some incredibly happy news. Even now his dreams were still haunted by the carnage that he and his friends had discovered at the Uchiha homestead. Maybe it wasn’t so strange to treat survivors with the utmost care, ‘Seeing how Sasuke and his brother turned out…’

Naruto looked around him at the toads that were quietly digesting the information. His eyes passed over the dog at the far end of the settlement, and then stopped on Jiraiya, “I…didn’t know that you were trying deal with so much.”

“It’s okay, Naruto. But that’s the truth. My hands have been pretty full…”

“Will you try to bring them back to Konoha?” He was interested, “Or would that attract the wrong kind of attention?”

“I’ll have to talk to Tsunade about it. She won’t like it, but she’ll help me come up with something to protect them. As soon as others find out that there will be shinobi with the Sharingan back in Leaf… it’s going to be a real party…” Jiraiya sighed and shut his eyes as he thought, “I don’t know how villagers will react. I don’t know how Kakashi will take it…or Sasuke, for that matter. I’ll go ahead and guess Itachi wouldn’t come back just to bump them off…but there’s no telling what might happen.”

Naruto let Kosuke settle next to him and patted the small toad’s head, stewing over the information, “Yeah. It’s a big deal…” A small smile spread on his face, “But I can tell they’re not the types to…go crazy.”
“Don’t jinx it, kid. That’s my hope too.” The man took a seat on the grass, waving goodbye to the toads that had left to return to their morning routines, “Their little unit could begin to restore that clan after a few generations…and I’m not going to hold my breath for the two nutcases.”

“I’ll help you look after them.” Naruto announced assertively, “They’re a nice family and I’d hate to see them struggle.”

Jiraiya’s smile was a bit lopsided, “Thanks, kid.”

“And I won’t mention this to anyone.”

“Good! Or I’d have your head!”

Naruto stood up and brushed his pants off, “Ha! That’s if you catch me, Ero-sensei. You said you wanted to train with me, right?”

“I believe I did, punk.”

“Whoa, don’t use your fighting words yet.” Naruto teased with a grin, “Go tell that doggy to go home…or he’s going see you get your butt whooped.”

That same morning marked the start of blossom-viewing season in Konoha. Citizens and off-duty shinobi had gathered in parks and forest clusters with picnic blankets, settling beneath the cherry and plum trees to enjoy the lovely atmosphere and throw small parties.

Ino had smoothly wrangled together her kunoichi friends to join her viewing spot. The majesty of the pink plum blossom she had set up beneath had attracted other admirers, but they set their blankets down on the far side of the tree. Hinata and Sakura arrived together and brought refreshments with them. They didn’t need to wait long for Tenten to show up as promised, but Tama was not as prompt as usual.

“She’s still at work.” Tenten updated them, “It might be a little while.”

“Alright, and if I know her she’ll bring some baked goods with her.” Ino indicated a free spot beside her, “Sit down, please.”

Tenten complianitly took the spot and accepted a bottle of sweet tea from Hinata. She felt naked without any weapons or equipment on her, but Ino had pointedly told her days before that “nothing happens” at Hanami festivals and she could “relax.”

“So…” The blonde woman’s smile was devilish, “Explain yourself.”

“What?” Tenten felt put on the spot.

“Your hair.” Sakura added helpfully, “I like what you did to it.”

“It wasn’t me.” The girl shrugged, “Yugao cut it. I let her do girly things with me because she’s surrounded by guys all of the time.”

Hinata covered her mouth to giggle. Tenten had blunt bangs and braided buns which were, most obviously, the efforts of another woman’s hairstyling. Typically, the weapon-specialist was not concerned with her hair so long as it wasn’t in the way. Yugao, who had been ‘on a roll’ after the makeover, had pierced her visitor’s ears as well. Again, Tenten was rather neutral about the alteration.
“You look girlier.” Ino assessed, “That’s a good thing.”

“I was girly enough.” Tenten insisted.

“But you like the change, don’t you?” Sakura asked.

“It’s fine. I’ll keep up with it I guess.” She sipped her beverage, “Honestly, I’m much happier with my jutsu and the sales in my shop. If someone wants me to look pretty…then they can fix me up.” She simpered, “You girls are the pretty ones.”

“It’s my specialty.” Ino nodded. She made sure that Sakura and Hinata had complementary nail colors and trimmed hair ends weekly. If they didn’t keep up with maintenance she took offense to it.

“It’s good that you’re training hard, Tenten. Tama and I are giving it our best effort too. Tsunade-sama was reading about plans for the Chunin Exam, so it won’t be long now.” Sakura then added, “But she wants aggressive advertising for it. I wonder if she’s worried that no one will enter or show up to watch?”

Hinata agreed, “That could be a problem.”

“How will Hokage-sama reassure people?” Ino scoffed, “Serve alcohol?”

“That would definitely make it worse.” Sakura countered.

Tenten was confident, “She’ll come up with something.”

“Tama should cater it.” Ino suggested.

“Then how will she participate?” Hinata chirped.

“Hm, that’s a tough one. Her dad is a finance man so maybe he can get sponsorships…”

Sakura’s eyes widened, “I need to tell Shishou that!”

Ino smirked and then helped herself to a chocolate from a container, “There’s a million ways to make it work…besides having gorgeous women competing in the final rounds.”

“It might be hard competing against each other…or our teammates.” Hinata said softly.

“If I have to sucker punch someone, then I have to sucker punch someone.” Ino proclaimed, “We’ll all get over it later.”

Tenten nodded, “She is absolutely right.”

They relaxed and enjoyed snacks for a while before Hinata asked her pink haired friend, “Sakura-chan, do you have any plans for your birthday tomorrow?”

All eyes fell on the Hokage’s apprentice and Sakura sheepishly admitted, “I…might take a mission.”

“Unacceptable.” Ino deadpanned.

“Come on! It’s my day so I can spend it how I want.”

“At least let your teammates take you out to celebrate first.” Tenten advised, “My birthday was weeks ago and…I would have killed to see Lee and Neji.”
Her companions made devastated sounds of sympathy and she told them to “can it.”

“They have been thinking of you, Onee-san!” Hinata tried to assure her, “Once the Hokage lifts her order I am sure they would do something special for you!”

Tenten’s smile was small, “It’s okay, Hinata. I’ve been thinking of them too.”

“Yeah…your birthday, Miss Forehead…” Ino’s expression was shrewd, “Surely the Kazekage is aware of it?”

Sakura shut her eyes and smiled in warning, “Don’t go there.”

“I plan to. You know why? Because you got a key to his place.” The girl grinned, “That’s a very special present.”

Hinata and Tenten gasped in unison upon hearing the news. After a moment Tenten unexpectedly peeled with laughter, “Ah, who cares? Heh!”

Hinata blanched, “I have a key too…but I only water Naruto’s plants there.”

“It’s…it’s just for me to decompress after my mom screams in my face. So I can be alone and have some quiet!” Sakura asserted, “Don’t be ridiculous, Pig. I’m not constantly looking for hiding spots like you and your boyfriend do.”

“One day you’ll have to. Privacy is a commodity.”

“Spoken like a true expert.”

“There’s no need to be salty, novice. Your time will come.”

“Please don’t argue!” Hinata squeaked.

They girls settled down and finally laughed at each other. Tenten’s mirth was infectious. She hadn’t been happy or expressive in so long that her friends had been afraid to emote around her. The mood had definitely lightened.

“But seriously, if he shows up…” Ino smiled at her friend, “That would be a tale for the ages.”

“He said he’s been busy. I’m not going to explode if he can’t be here.” Sakura reminded them, “I did want to take a mission, remember? I won’t always have free time for my team. It’s because Shishou has been working on other things that I can go where I want.”

Ino heckled her for a little while longer until Tama appeared at the entrance of the park. Filing in behind her were Shikamaru, Chouji, and Sato, who had a small basket of bakery items in his arms.

Tenten nudged Ino beside her and inclined her head towards their approaching friends, “Careful now. You might need to censor yourself, Ino.”

“Oh, you know you love my imagination.”

“As long as you don’t start ragging on me, I love it.”
Threads that Stretch 'Round the World

Chapter Soundtrack: “Kids” by Childish Gambino

With the recommendation that mid-Spring was an ideal time to enjoy the beach in the Land of Waves, Temari had settled herself on a reclining chair on the sandy shore that morning. She was promised that there would be no tourist crowds and the weather would be at the peak of loveliness. Temari had concluded preliminary advanced-placement exams as well as kept timely correspondence with Gaara each morning. With nothing urgent pending, she decided that she could afford a short break.

‘This is the first time I’ve worn one of these.’ Temari acknowledged while fiddling with the tie of a simple black bikini, ‘Luckily no one gets to see me in it.’ She had been very liberal with sunscreen and had tugged on a wide-brimmed sunhat before laying back in the recliner. Her trusty fan was beside the chair, just in case she needed to deal with a peeper.

As she had explained to Gaara before leaving Sand, she had every intention of staying in a luxury suite of the Star Notojiso hotel while she oversaw the training program. ‘I paid for it myself and I have to admit…’ She smiled smugly, ‘It was completely worth the money.’ The private beachfront behind the inn was included and she was taking advantage of it.

While she had settled in the hotel lodgings away from the barracks, Ebizo and other Suna shinobi had to extricate Chiyo from the prestigious boardinghouse. She had been most reluctant to leave. After much hassle, Chiyo was escorted home with the first wave of returning Sand ninja Kankuro had supervised.

The initial ‘changing of the guard’ had been a tad awkward. Matsuri had discovered that a boy she was smitten with likely did not return her sentiments. The girl had recovered from her bout of despair and reappeared the next morning entirely blank. She was slate-like and serious, but her compassion for others was still evident in small ways. What was markedly different, Temari noticed, was that the girl refused to speak about her personal thoughts or feelings. Matsuri had not attempted to contact Inari or Menma before returning to Sunagakure. From an update Temari had received from Gaara days later, he confirmed that Matsuri had entirely invested herself in training and nothing else. He was happy to oblige her, but he worried that his student’s ambition to improve was for the wrong reasons.

For a brief time, maybe a whole ten minutes, Temari had thought about sticking her nose in the young kunoichi’s business. She could have gotten to the bottom of it all. Quickly. She would have had no problem marching up to the ninja called ‘Menma’ and inquiring ‘what the hell his problem’ was. Maybe it was all a misunderstanding. Or maybe he was a tried-and-true schmuck. But after considering her involvement in mending Matsuri’s crush problem, Temari had thought better of it. She had spied Inari walking with the blonde haired, heart-breaking suspect a few times, but she had never said a word. ‘It’s not my place to meddle in other people’s relationships.’

Though she remained mildly curious as to whether or not Menma had genuinely misled Matsuri, Temari kept her distance and went about her duties.

‘What do I know about relationships anyway? I’m terrible at it.’ She thought while closing her eyes, ‘I am not the kind of person who’s qualified to vouch for the hearts and feelings of others. I barely know my own.’

The breeze trickled across her bare skin as Temari dozed, setting aside her cares. She had put in motion the beginning stages of the second training program, and soon enough the Tide Village would be in control of its own affairs. So long as she did not repeat Kankuro’s escapade and damage the city while rooting out miscreants, she would call it a job well done.

A soft sensation that was decidedly not wind traced along her right leg below the knee. With a jerk, Temari tipped the hat up for a clear view of her surroundings and stretched out her hand for her fan.
Then she stopped. Nosing around at the foot of the chair was a rabbit. It looked an awful lot like the white rabbit that delivered mail to Gaara sometimes.

After the creature had her attention it hopped closer and nudged a scroll towards her across the sand.

“I’m on a break. Come back in an hour.” The woman grumbled.

The rabbit remained stationary.

“Hmph. What’s your name again?”

After a beat of silence the animal replied in a soft voice, “Pua.”

“Huh, that’s right. I remember that Gaara said you can talk.”

“Pua.” The animal agreed.

“Not all that well, though…” Temari picked up the scroll, “What is this? Is Haku sending correspondence again? I thought he said he’d stop. Tch!” She opened the parchment to see that it was blank, “Oh…”

The rabbit fussed at one of its long ears.

“What’s the deal? Is he expecting a reply?” Annoyance pricked at her voice, “He said that I didn’t have to.”

“Ramen.”

“Wow, you really can’t talk. I bet he put you up to this.”

Pua looked at her with an expression of unfettered innocence.

Temari laid back and adjusted her hat again, “I was trying to enjoy this morning before going back to Say that one to Haku.”

Silence prevailed again for several minutes as the ocean winds swept down from blue skies. When Temari suspected that she still was not being left alone, she glimpsed down beneath the rim of her hat again, noticing that Pua had not budged.

“Did you follow me here all the way from Hidden Sand?” She rolled to her side, letting her irritation ebb away, “That was a long trip for a little puff like you.”

“Pua.”

“Yeah, I know.” Temari sighed, “You’re probably used to it. You go between Gaara’s teammates to deliver their letters. You might be the only example of a rabbit worth your salt.”

Upon receiving the praise, Pua procured a ballpoint pen that had been pinned beneath her bandana.
She replaced it on the armrest of the chair with her mouth, to Temari’s surprise.
“It seems like…you’re a pet of many talents.” The woman yielded, “But I already told you I don’t want to reply. I’ve got nothing good to say.”

The rabbit’s nose twitched as if to indicate: even if you respond as scathingly as possible, Haku will still appreciate the knowledge that you read what he wrote.

“It’s nothing against you, bunny. I planned to disappoint him from the start, because that’s what he did to me.”

She had a lengthy stare down with the animal in which Temari realized she was wasting precious sunbathing time.

“Alright.” She lifted the pen and sat up, positioning the scroll flat on the stretch of the chair, “I’ll disappoint him with words then! The only crime is that I’m not as eloquent a writer as he is. If you bring this back…then that should be the end of it.” Temari frowned down at the parchment. Words would not come easily.

The rabbit’s quiet voice came again, “Maybe.”

From the corner of her eye Temari glanced at Pua, “Unless you can tell me what to write, don’t distract me, cotton-tail.”

But of course, Pua was no such distraction. Temari knew full well that she was getting in her own way. Her brain raced for a short while, reviewing possible worthy answers to the heartfelt letter she had read. It covered the spectrum all the way from, ‘Please don’t bother me again’ and ‘Go die’ to ‘I accept your apology and I am relieved that you told me.’ Nothing seemed quite effective enough when she hesitantly pressed the pen to paper.

She scribbled a response with handwriting that was not her best. She only needed one line to get her feelings across. Temari closed the scroll and returned it to the courier rabbit, “Here, Pua.”

Temari settled down again and added, “That ought to shut him up.”

While on their way to Tanzaku Quarters for a mission, Neji iterated to Lee in a quiet voice how he learned of Sai’s fate. The boys followed behind Gai who was gradually picking up the pace of their trek.

“The ANBU agent told you about Sai’s reassignment?” Lee was genuinely surprised, “Is that not something that should have been kept confidential?”

“Tenzo told me about it in the hope that you and I would help facilitate Sai’s transition into…” Neji searched for the word, “Citizenhood.”

“Wah?” Lee was aghast, “And he told you his name? What an unprofessional agent!”

“I do care, Neji.” Lee clarified, “But I cannot imagine why a Black Ops agent would so easily confide in a Genin who defied him multiple times…”

Neji snorted at the thought, “I was not in violation of the Hokage’s request. I just needed fresh air.”

Lee nodded. Fresh air was synonymous with getting a glimpse of Tenten, he knew. Lee then went on to suppose how they could possibly assist Sai after taking into consideration their first encounter with the uncouth ex-Root. Lee guessed that introducing Sai to their extended group of friends would be a fair start.

“He’ll insult them all.” Neji warned.

“Yes, he will,” Lee acknowledged, “But you have insulted all of our friends many times over, and they still spend time with you, Neji.”

Peeved, he replied, “…then it’s of no consequence…”

“Exactly. With time Sai will surely become as dependable as you have.”

Lee did not realize that was raking his friend over the coals, but as a more self-aware person, Neji discovered that he was force-fed humble pie whenever friends shared their opinions of his former attitude. He was a recovering jerk and he knew it, but Neji didn’t want to hear Lee say it every day like it was the only topic of discussion.

“My, you boys are awfully chatty back there!” Gai remarked in a lilting voice, “Your bonding is getting me fired up!”

Of course Lee was quickly inspired by the declaration and rushed forward, joining his Sensei for overly enthusiastic musings and a pre-mission pep talk. Neji was still listening and kept his irritation in check. He had no right to object to their youthful outbursts and he was becoming more tolerant of them. Reciprocally, Gai and Lee were more careful these days not to get on his nerves as Neji was, still, slightly hair-trigger without Tenten around.

While proceeding through thick forest towards their destination, Gai reviewed what Tsunade had explained to them earlier. The mission to Tanzaku Quarters was to address some growing unrest between an original founding family of the tourist town and the mortgage lenders they were quarreling with. Gai had glazed over the financial furor because it so happened that his brother, Maito Ken, was already visiting the office in Tanzaku to provide legal counsel. Team Gai had been sent to preside over discussions and dissuade any violence.

“The Shibusawa family may have monetary troubles, but I was told that they have many friends throughout Tanzaku Quarters and shinobi nations far and wide. If they are in distress, it would not be out of the question for them to ask shinobi to intervene on their behalf.” Gai elucidated, “And if any strife erupts we will extinguish it like a storm!”

Lee liked the sound of it and was impressed that his mentor’s brother was involved. Neji recalled that Ken, Tama’s father, was a generally unfriendly and stubborn man. He was also an unrivaled businessman in Konoha.

By late morning they had arrived and did not make their presence known to the warring parties. From an observation deck near a landmark building, the team peered into a window and watched Ken duke it out with the head of the Shibusawa family. Neji was no lip-reader, but he could tell that the portly bald man in lavish robes was making liberal use of profanity. Across the desk from the Shibusawa head, Ken remained calm and used an acid tongue to eat through his adversary’s arguments, citing law and regulation. The family, no matter how big or influential, had defaulted on multiple loans. The Shibusawa estate was bank property now.

“What do you suppose he is saying?” Lee wondered after a while.

“My brother likes the words delinquent and foolish.” Gai spoke from experience.

‘It’s because he deals with Sato.’ Neji thought to himself.
The stakeout persisted for nearly an hour until Gai excused himself for a bathroom break. Neji watched him enter the office building and ask a secretary to point him towards a lavatory.

“Missions have been uneventful lately.” Lee remarked.

“ Compared to Oga Castle, we could nap through our assignments now.”

“Gai-sensei said that he would try to persuade the Hokage to give us higher-ranked missions.”

“I doubt that Tsunade-sama will revoke her limitation. We don’t have a fourth teammate.”

Lee’s eyes glimmered hopefully, “Do you think she will return Tenten to us?”

“I have no idea.” Neji was somber, “Fujita told me the other day he was nearly considered a replacement for our team, as he is waiting to receive teammates as well. The Hokage only denied him because his abilities are too similar to my own.”

“I see…”

“Perhaps Sai…” Neji shrugged, “But Tenzo indicated he met qualifications to join the ANBU Black Ops.”

“He may still be interested.” Lee tapped his chin.

“Even if he was interested, even if there was someone else who could join our team,” Neji was resolute, “I will never accept it.”

Lee’s sidelong smile at him was small, “I know. Neither could I.”

Neji scanned over the building with the Byakugan again and was shocked to see Gai had reappeared on the third floor. He was making haste towards the office his brother was negotiating in. Before Neji could begin articulating to Lee that there was a possibility of danger, Gai had engaged in a four versus one brawl in the hallway. Thugs had been discreetly lined up outside of the loan department office, but Neji was unsure of how Gai realized it before he had.

What was more remarkable: Gai had managed to quietly subdue the would-be interlopers. Ken and the Shibusawa family head continued their argument without an ounce of concern for the muffled sounds outside the door. After about a minute, Gai had either knocked out or choked out the hired brutes and piled them neatly at the end of the corridor in an unconscious heap.

Neji tapped Lee’s shoulder before moving, “We should probably go inside.”

“Why?”

“Gai just omitted us from this mission.”

“He did?” Lee was puzzled as he followed Neji, descending towards the street to enter the bank, “Did you watch something happen?”

“He just thwarted an attempted ambush. It took about sixty seconds.” Neji explained, “Everything appears stable now.”

The look of bubbly admiration on Lee’s face made their exclusion almost worthwhile.

In the lobby, the secretary at the front desk let them by without a fuss and Neji led the way upstairs. When they reached the third floor office, the Shibusawa patriarch was sheepishly apologizing for the ‘confrontational youths’ in the hallway. Gai stood beside his brother, not convinced by the apology, but his presence allowed Ken to serve the man his papers and to ‘settle his affairs legally.’

Ken added as he pushed his chair back, “Should you refuse to comply, rest assured that force the Hidden Leaf Village employs can easily overpower any of your coercions. Do not harass your lenders again…or expect the authorities at your door by tomorrow morning.”

“Understood, sir.” The hefty man bustled out.

Neji and Lee waited outside of the doorway interestingly, beheld as Ken quietly thanked his brother for the intervention, and then he briskly stepped out to the stairwell. Gai sighed heavily before regarding his pupils, “I would have notified you of the threat sooner, boys, but I did in fact have to use the men’s room. I was interrupted.” And with that he proceeded towards the nearest bathroom.

Lee was still intrigued, “Gai-sensei hardly needed our help for this mission…”

Though Neji did not say it, he completely agreed with Lee. Gai’s skills as a Jounin had become tremendously clear to Neji, at least on the last few missions they had been on. While the man could not help his impassioned speeches and motivated attitude, he could neutralize threats with all of the grace and speed expected of a Jounin. His fighting style was incredibly adaptable, his timing precise, and his leadership consistent. Beyond that, Neji had come to silently admire Gai’s ability to glean details from minimal information and react swiftly. While he waited in the hallway, Neji was still stumped as to how Gai knew that danger was present without confirmation from a sweep of the Byakugan.

When their Sensei returned he advised that they keep watch in the first floor lobby from then on. Neji decided to ask, “How did you know they were in the building?”

“Ah, you mean the mercenaries?”

“That you bludgeoned, yes.”

“Hm,” Gai restrained a grin and cupped his chin, “Sometimes intuition serves me well. I know my brother backwards and front, even if we can’t get along most of the week…” He explained, “I saw him signal me through the window. He knew about the intruders before any of us did.”

Lee gasped in awe.

“He didn’t signal.” Neji disagreed.

“It was the face he made.” Gai elaborated, “He only makes that face when he needs me for something.”

“Then naturally we would not recognize it!” Lee concluded.

Gai added, “Never fear, Neji. I expect we will have to deal with more persuaders out on the road, while escorting my brother home. Your boredom will abate!”

Unfortunately, as they made their way back to Leaf with the stone-faced and prim Maito Ken, the remaining thugs hiding out in Tanzaku Quarters all promptly fled in terror. It left Neji terribly bored as they met no resistance while returning to Konoha. The Shibusawa family had not gotten top-quality help, apparently.

So timely was their trip that Tsunade was a touch shocked by their reappearance in her office, “This one was too easy for you, eh?”
Lee took it as a hopeful sign she would give them a more challenging mission, but she turned up her hands, indicating nothing else needed to be done. She dismissed the team after a short debriefing and hurried them out, “I’ve got a long train of appointments today. Don’t bother me until tomorrow!”

The team politely exited before the Hokage’s temper ticked up any further. Gai announced that he had a few matters to attend to and that he expected them at the team’s training ground at 4 o’clock sharp that afternoon. Judging by the competitive edge in Gai’s voice, Neji and Lee could assume he had another silly score to settle with Kakashi. After their sensei had departed, it only seemed right to capitalize on the remainder of the morning. They agreed to get changed and meet Wong Leung.

Once Neji returned in proper attire he got the sense that Lee’s grandfather was in a bad mood. The old man raised his chin, grunting, and then commanded the two of them to work on a balancing exercise.

Wong positioned the boys into back-bends that made their shoulders meet like a bridge. He scolded them when their heads bumped together initially. Neji and Lee found that it was a struggle to keep their shoulders pressed for stability. Wong strolled off to pick up magazines from a shop down the street. Lee reported on how long they were expected to hold the non-traditional pose, “He said an hour. That does not seem quite so bad…”

“Most likely because he didn’t tell you what he had planned next.” The Hyuga retorted, wobbling.

A long silence prevailed as time trickled by without definition or measure. Thoughts passed through Neji’s mind as he and Lee got the hang of the exercise and struck a perfect balance. ‘I keep returning to this training even when I have clear memory of how onerous it is. I never would have agreed to such a thing if…’ He pictured Tenten’s face for a moment, ‘No. I would never have learned anything about Lee. I would have remained comfortable within my own limitations, and I’d never have the capacity to recognize that I had limitations back then.’ He had learned much from Wong’s lessons and embraced this new ‘sense of self.’

His application of Wong’s approach to Jyukken, as well as the development of his Wind Element chakra, was shaping him into a shinobi that would never wince at a Jounin opponent. He was more inclined to spend time with friends, converse occasionally, be more personable with members of his clan, and had acquired tools to cope with his emotions. Most of the time.

Lee had probably benefitted the most from Wong’s training. His skills were honed sharply and his evasion and speed were unmatchable, Neji admitted. Gai was hard-pressed to challenge Lee these days, and his handling of weaponry would certainly have made Tenten proud. But what may have been the most decisive improvement of all, Neji noted, was that his perception of Lee had changed.

He had once balked at the thought of being on a team with Rock Lee. The dead-last student was thought to be talentless. Hopeless. Neji never viewed him as an equal in any respect. While it had been a covert occurrence, the moment Wong Leung had been introduced was when Neji had stopped doubting Lee altogether. Quite suddenly, Lee was the one to turn to for answers and guidance. He understood every word and task and did not shy away from the unknown. When nothing made sense in a world without Tenten, it was Lee who listened and unscrambled his brain, navigating their new environment. Wong’s training bordered on punishment, but Neji returned each day because Lee’s presence made all the difference. They were both undeniably better for it.

Aside from the figurative support they gave each other, Lee also provided literal support, thirty minutes into the balancing act. Wong made sure to give them exercises that frequently required two people.

Lee made a puffing sound, snapping Neji out of his thoughts.
“What?” Neji’s eyes rolled up to get a glimpse of Lee’s scrunched face.

“Your hair. It is tickling my nose.”

“The wind must have blown it.”

“I do not know if…”

“Do not knock us over. He’ll make us do it again for twice as long.”

“I know, but, ah…achoo!” The hair strand remained after the sneeze and their maneuver had nearly capsized.

Neji had the decency to shift his head until Lee was no longer tormented by errant hair.

“I apologize for sneezing on you.”

Neji only sighed.

“I find this easier than prayer-crouches.” Lee mused out loud.

“Perhaps by a tiny margin.” Neji yielded.

“Maybe Grandpa will let us try something else today?”

“He looked irritable. Would he allow it?”

“I cannot say. He may have been annoyed that we took a mission before this.”

Neji shut his eyes to scoff, “Ninja activity is so off-putting. Aren’t you the only one with income in your house?”

“Yes, but that is irrelevant. I do not think Grandpa is bothered that we are shinobi…I suspect it is because…” Lee permitted himself to speculate, “He enjoys spending time with us.”

Neji’s eyes rolled back again to look at his friend, “How did you draw that conclusion?”

“It is a feeling I have when I speak to him. He is a very nostalgic man…” Lee supposed, “He must miss having students. Grandpa looks forward to training us.”

“He is a wretched teacher.” Neji added, “And very wise.”

When an hour was up Wong returned with his magazines. He immediately offered criticism, What is this? Why are you talking? I never said you could speak during this training!

Lee countered, You did not say that we couldn’t, Grandpa. Neji and I have a lot to discuss.

Like gossiping wives, the two of you! Stand up now.

Lee notified his teammate and they disentangled themselves, glad to be upright again.

No more chatting from here out! When I am not here you practice your mindfulness!

Yes, Grandpa.

Wong stepped up to Neji and gave the space above his heart a solid poke, So…this kitten has improved a bit. He’s stronger in the mind than he was. We shall brush up on Baguazhang today to see if he is meeting my standards…

Lee passed the message along to Neji, “Grandpa wants to review Ba Gua forms with you.”

“I don’t object.” It still beat prayer-crouches.

He will not be using his Bloodline Gift either. He must feel the energy and momentum of an adversary.

Lee relayed that as well.

Neji consented and mimicked the circling motions that Wong approached with. It was a fairly decent effort and he did not make the old man correct him too much. For a while Neji was confident that he could keep up even without the Byakugan. Then Wong commanded Lee to attack from the rear and Neji got annoyed. Turning and wheeling away from two people was tremendously difficult, ‘But maybe that’s the point.’ He would not always be pitted against a single opponent.

When Wong was mostly satisfied with testing Neji’s evasion he asked Lee to sit out again. The old man appreciated Neji’s sincere attempt to strike him. They batted and spun, and Neji had prioritized turning Wong’s momentum against him rather than actively trying to drill tenketsu shut. The defensive strategy worked well for a little while until Wong got in close, using clever footwork and a brush of his arm to sweep Neji’s block aside like dust. With his pinky finger, Wong poked a fleshy spot behind the Hyuga’s ear and watched as he dropped to the ground on liquefied legs.

Spooked, Lee rushed over to his friend to help him up, but Wong stopped him.

Relax, grandchild. He’ll be up in a few moments when the nausea wears off.

What did you do, Grandpa?!!

I used a Tao Nerve Strike. A small one, I assure you. This one very handily shuts one-fourth of the chi points below the left hemisphere of the brain. It is a reactive closing. I bet his right side feels like jelly! Ha ha!

Lee kneeled beside Neji and asked quietly, “Do your limbs feel like jelly?”

Neji sat up with a very aggravated expression, “I did not assign this feeling a specific quality yet, Lee.”

“Grandpa used a Tao Nerve Strike! He said it can close many tenketsu at once!”

“Terrific.” Neji growled, and with the Byakugan proceeded to locate his violated tenketsu in order to open them again.

Give him a moment. Wong insisted; He’ll be up. He’s very sturdy.

And sure enough, after Lee patiently waited a few paces away, Neji was able to mend himself and stand. He was still irritated that he had been schooled again, but he managed to keep his comments to himself.

Wong’s mood was much improved. He gently rotated Lee around to reveal the back of his grandson’s head, indicating that Neji move in close to inspect it. Lee made an uncertain sound but did not protest. Neji understood with slight astonishment that Wong intended to demonstrate to him what had happened, and maybe even how to perform the strike himself.
Wong gestured at his eye orbital, suggesting what Neji took to mean: use your Blood Limit. He obliged.

Good, you’re a smart boy after all. I know you don’t really understand me, but Lee will help. Look here. Wong said, pointing out the bundled nerves near the top of his grandson’s neck, This is what I did to you. I bet your clansmen don’t take advantage of this area because of the high margin of error. If you mistakenly touch a cranial nerve…it doesn’t end so well. But right here is a ‘lock’ that you shinobi don’t pay attention to. These connect our ‘Gates.’ Lee uses these, no? It is one of the few ninja talents that overlap with Tao teachings.

While observing with the Byakugan, Neji asked Lee for a translation.

“Grandpa is explaining that locks stand between the Inner Gates!” Lee, who was turned away from them, was excited, “He is saying that they are not frequently used because of the margin of error. I suppose the Hyuga clan does not attack them?”

“If we did, Jyukken that is not precise enough will damage all the nerves in this area, and will likely result in death.” Neji reported, “I imagine a bad track record is why this isn’t taught in my clan, if it was ever taught at all.”

But if you see with more than just your eyes, you will not make a mistake. Wong encouraged, privy to the youngsters’ discussion, We will talk about this lock and look at it today. In the future, I will help you strike it with confidence. Then you can learn about the others.

Lee passed the message to Neji, “Grandpa can teach you how to correctly manipulate them. He can introduce it to you today. He is certain you can learn it!”

It was somewhat flattering.

The right and left hemisphere locks will free or restrict the Opening Gate and Healing Gate above. It will signal chi points and ‘lift’ bodily limitations. Wong went on, This is a way to assist my grandson, should you ever need to. His Capitate Locks have been shut since he was born. His parents should have taken greater care…

Stunned by the diagnosis he had never known about, Lee looked over his shoulder at Neji, “I have…fauxtly locks.”

Neji blinked curiously at him, “Meaning what?”

“My ability to use jutsu is hindered by it, I gather.” Lee was a bit dismayed, “Grandpa never explained it to me before.”

Now, now, Lee…a tremendous warrior like you should not be insecure over something as trivial as two closed locks. Ninjutsu is not a vital skill. But if you must talk about it with Neji, as you two have a proclivity for conversation… Wong folded his arms, Then we’ll do it over lunch. Let’s go inside for now.

The old man abruptly interrupted the start of the lesson and spun on his heel, walking back in the direction of his home.

Stupefied, Lee stared at his friend.

“Why is he going inside?” Neji was confused; he also responded to Lee’s expression, “What?”

“He said your name!” Lee moved to follow, “He usually calls you something else…”
Lunch was informative. The stewed cabbage and beef was filling. All the while they talked about Neji’s opportunity to learn about locks, which acted as connectors between chakra points and the Eight Gates. Wong lectured through Lee’s translations about “chi flow,” better known to them as chakra, and how it was not too distantly related to the physical changes stimulated by Inner Gates. Formerly unrelated subjects were sewn together through old Tao ideas. Neji was amused to learn that Jyukken and Gouken were not mirror-image approaches to combat as he had thought. They were expressions of the same ‘way,’ as Wong described the styles as two adjacent spokes that supported a ‘wheel.’ Nothing could be definitively different while everything is connected, the old man put it.

Lee’s handicap was briefly discussed, but Wong had a ‘could-give-a-fuck’ attitude about it. Lee was a spoke on a wheel like everyone else, Wong insisted, and there was nothing broken about him.

When the meal was over and the old gentleman was tired of expanding the minds of young people, he commanded them to take their questions elsewhere. At least for today…I haven’t had my nap yet.

That made them right on time for Gai’s 4 o’clock rendezvous as they crossed town in Han clothes. The two boys had never felt their camaraderie so strong, nor had they ever expected a friendship like it had. Though it went unsaid, both Neji and Lee had thought about it at different times. Life, while not perfect, was still quite enjoyable these days.

Gai commended them for their promptness. He was eager to announce another arm-wrestling victory against Kakashi that had secured them a double-training session at the end of the week. Team Gai’s students versus Team Kakashi’s students. Neji had a suspicion that Gai was aware of the impending date of the next Chunin Exam but was not at liberty to announce it. Their sensei wanted them prepared regardless.

Added to the itinerary was more melee weapon testing and, after that, hand signal review for stealth missions. Team Gai was fond of radio communications, but Neji had astutely pointed out that Gai and Lee could not be shouting at each other during every mission.

“I believe we do need new radio headsets.” Lee announced, “I recall that mine has not worked in weeks.”

Gai made note of it, “Very well, Lee. And you, Neji?”

“I suppose I could use something more current.”

“It seems I have a bit of shopping to do then. I don’t suppose we’ll need a fourth…” Gai trailed off sadly, “A set of four is fine.”

It occurred to Neji that he had left behind the Tool-Summoning scroll that housed Lee’s nunchaku. He would have to fetch it before proceeding with their lesson. He tried alerting Gai to this minor blunder, but the man paid him no heed while gawking across the grassy field. Neji slowly followed the gazes of Gai and Lee to determine what was so distracting.

Gekko Hayate had stepped into the training area while blowing his nose into a tissue. He was prone to spring allergies. What was the actual subject of concern was the kunoichi following behind Hayate. The men of Team Gai were at a loss for words, although Tenten did not look nearly as flabbergasted as they did.

“Hey, Gai,” Hayate cleared his throat, “Sorry. I was given a mandatory evaluation day for my student. I already matched her with Kurenai’s team but they weren’t enthusiastic opponents. Do you have some time for a combat test?”
Gai inhaled a large portion of air through his mouth before managing a reply, “Of course we have time!” Then added cautiously; “Is this arrangement approved by the Hokage?”

“I guess it is when she demands that I get out of her office.” Hayate shrugged, “Other teams were preoccupied so I thought I’d check with you.”

Neji registered Lee’s transitioning facial expressions for a few seconds before looking back to Tenten. She was dressed in the new attire he had seen her in before: a white cheongsam dress over dark pants and her customary weapons holsters at her sides. Her hair was more elaborate, her posture relaxed, and she had a large weapon’s scroll secured low on her back. Above that was the scabbard of a small sword he had not seen before. Her eyes and mouth were serene, distant, and Neji could not help but feel like he was looking at a stranger.

She was here for nothing more than a training assessment. It was almost cruel to parade her around as someone else’s student, Neji thought, and watch Gai struggle to remain pleasant. While his blood pressure assured Neji that he was excited and astounded to see the girl, he was unhappy that she was a wholly separate entity now.

Gai approved his team’s participation for a one-on-one test and Hayate gave a nod of his head, prompting Tenten to step forward. She had zeroed-in her attention on Gai, which was immediately perplexing.

When Gai stepped back uncertainly Hayate clarified, “I always pit her against Jounin first. Have at it!”

Maito Gai quailed for a moment before pulling himself together with a stupendous burst of gusto. This former student was still his student, and he could not think of the last time Tenten had been willing to challenge him.

With a roaring laugh Gai charged. Neji and Lee remained at the edge of the field, silent and mouths hanging open in dumbfoundment. There was no previous recorded confrontation between Gai and Tenten to serve as a precedent, and so naturally they had no idea what to expect.

Without a quip or emotional signal of any kind, Tenten executed a cartwheel towards the charging bull of a Jounin, pulling open the tool summoning scroll with her heel. Her free hand conjured up a chain-bola while she tumbled and flung it in the same motion. The weighted chain struck Gai’s legs, snaring him. He began to topple and rolled out of the way of the follow-up onslaught of projectiles. With pent up momentum Gai went in for a sliding-tackle, but the kunoichi leapt cleanly over him and kept throwing.

Gai took evasive actions while freeing his legs. He about-faced quickly enough to see the girl’s silhouette against the sun as she sprang. He had the foresight to pick up a discarded kunai from the ground as Tenten bore down with the jian that had been at her back. Metal rang as the weapons met, and there was a tearing sound of fabric that followed, tipping Gai off to a second sword that was slicing through his flak jacket from behind. Eyes wild, Gai quickly identified the clone behind him. He had no idea when or how Tenten produced it, but he was barely fast enough to knock it back with a superficial elbow nudge to the chest. Its hardiness revealed that it was a Shadow Clone, ‘Amazing! I might’ve fallen for it if Kakashi hadn’t done something similar to show me up! Ha!’

He then smartly ducked when the Shadow Clone swung in during another pounce, and in a concerted act of coordination, rolled across Tenten’s back and away as the original kunoichi slashed forward. The speed with which she struck and dashed would have easily cleaned even Lee’s clock had he not stayed on his toes. Grinning, Gai countered as appropriately as possible with a kunai, blocking the two circling kunoichi. He would have blinked and missed the third copy that snuck in from, well, he didn’t know where. The mounting pressure called for a bit more aggression, but the moment Gai took the offensive with his single kunai he was immediately punished for it.

Part of his bowl-cut was hacked by a brush of two jians, and the third sword nearly went straight through his foot while he hollered in outrage. He had to hop away and watch his back. The Shadow Clones were too fast to predict, lacking any kind of pattern he could exploit, and Gai realized that he was not facing a basic Kage Bunshin barrage, ‘The Dance of the Crescent Moon! This jutsu gives purpose and direction to clones that far surpass a traditional attack- whoa-!’ That was nearly his head again, ‘A fourth?’

He was mildly alarmed. Two was the typical cap, but to pigeonhole Tenten as typical at this point would not make sense.

At about the point he felt a drop of sweat streak down from his temple; he thought it proper to counter more seriously. Gai drew out his nunchaku from a holster and tossed it over his shoulder, below his elbow and let it smash viciously into the nearest Shadow Clone’s head. It exploded into smoke and Tenten changed directions, her replications staying at the front while she provided covering fire with projectiles. Gai blocked everything that was tossed at him but had to retreat from the advancing clones. It was a bit of a goose chase until Gai found another opening, somersaulting over clones, hearing the ring of sword metal against his nunchaku. He came within a few feet of the real kunoichi, who had swapped out projectiles for her jian again in an instant.

After pummeling a clone that wedged itself between him and Tenten, Gai took advantage of the brief smoke buffer. With a burst of speed, he worked his way around Tenten’s back, looped the threshing chain around her neck and pulled it taught. There was a hiss of breath as the kunoichi froze, recognizing that she had been caught unaware.

“Hm, hmm, hmm!” Gai was laughing to himself, very pleased, “What incredible fortitude! Tenten you have-” He stopped speaking self-assuredly when he felt the tip of a jian press threateningly against his throat. The clone that had been caught in the nunchaku was dispelled.

“I know you are probably quick enough to block and keep going, but…” Tenten’s voice was stern, “I don’t think you should.”

“Oh! Hmm!” He laughed again, “Well met on a spring day! You have bested me, Tenten.” It was a sunny surrender and the sword was withdrawn, ending all hostility.

Tenten sheathed Hok at her back again and the dip in her eyebrows suggested sadness. Before Gai could offer any more booming congratulations, Hayate had come up beside the kunoichi, “Not bad. The two of you took advantage of the same moment of distraction. Great minds think alike, huh?”

She gave Hayate a sidelong look, “That’s how students and teachers are supposed to think.”

“Hey, don’t get snippy with me again.”

“I am not.”

“You’ve been bent out of shape about this evaluation. You were dragging your heels with Kurenai’s team too. Can you stop giving me a hard time?” The man groused, “Are you going to continue the assessment or do you refuse to fight those two basking sharks over there?” He was referring to Lee and Neji, whose mouths were still agape, “You declined to fight Hinata earlier and that pissed me off.”
“She’s my friend!”

“Aren’t they all your friends?”

Tenten puffed her cheeks, “She’s different. I couldn’t hurt her even if the Hokage ordered me to…”

“Psh, what a softie. Looks like you’ve got a way to go…” Hayate grumbled, “So I’ll take that as a ‘no’?”

“No, I refuse.” She affirmed.

Across the way, it was a bit hurtful to her friends that she was unwilling to test herself against them. It was a short encounter. Just like that she would be on her way again, probably to apply her skills against other Genin who she didn’t mind clobbering.

“Alright, fine, listen up then.” Hayate folded his arms and frowned, “I had to put up with a lot and follow strict rules while working with you. I cleaned you up and pointed you in the right direction, Tenten. I guess I shouldn’t expect a thank-you, but the reason why this evaluation was slated for today was because I delayed it to be today. The Hokage only said it had to be completed within the suspension period.” He sniffed, staving off an allergic sneeze, “Remember when I got kicked out of Tsunade’s office earlier? That was her confirming the suspension is over. I could complete the evaluation and then turn you over.”

After giving the man a long, critical look she nearly screeched, “Why didn’t you tell me that? I…I wouldn’t have been so stubborn about all of this if I had known!”

“Yes you would have. And you know…there are these things called surprises,” He grunted, “I was trying to be nice.”

“The Hokage approved it?” She asked again, paranoid.

“She did. Jeez, what am I a liar now? You don’t have to train with me anymore.” He muttered thanks under his breath, “I don’t know if you can take missions because that’s for the Hokage to decide tomorrow, but you can return to your team.”

Gai withheld an excited sob and, meters away in the background, so did Lee.

“I…you…” She struggled to find fitting words, “Thank you.”

“Yeah, yeah, I know. You can still visit if you like. Yugao was worried she wouldn’t get to see you after this.” Hayate nearly rolled his eyes, “Don’t let her down.”

“I won’t! Tell her not to worry!”

“Sure.” His lips folded in an impatient smirk.

She dared let happiness bloom in her features, “I’m sorry I was stubborn, Hayate. About as stubborn as you, I guess. You really did help me…”

“Alright, that’s enough.” He made a shooing motion with his hand, “Off with you. I want to return to my regular mission activity, and I know that you want to return to all those grinning idiots over there.”

Hayate gave a short wave to Gai before lumbering off, drawing out another tissue from his pocket. If he stayed any longer Tenten might find more to say, and he frankly did not need to hear what he was sure he already knew.

Lee could no longer hold in his scream of joy, “Tenten!”

She turned around to look at her teammates, not dreading the distance between them (which was considerably smaller) as she did for weeks. She felt the heaviness of Gai’s hand on her shoulder, welcoming, and watched Lee and Neji approach in a great hurry. They were on the cusp of being difficult to recognize, ‘They’re going to be as tall as Gai-sensei! And what’s with those clothes?’ She would swear Wong Leung had something to do with it, if she knew that old man.

Lee raced up to her and scooped her into a lift. Tenten did not fight the automatic need to laugh in elation while he kept her raised, shouting incomprehensible things, and then slowly lowered her back down to the ground. ‘Woo! Oh boy, he’s almost a whole head above me!’ She estimated, ‘And I’m in heels.’

Then she was squeezed into a youthful hug, “Tenten! I knew that you would come back to us! We were willing to wait as long as it took and we worked hard hoping to make you proud!” He sniffled, “Why are you so beautiful and-?” Lee sobbed, “Why did you almost kill Gai-sensei?”

“Lee! I didn’t! I would never hurt anyone!” She assured him in an urgent chuckle.

The hug had bunched her shoulders up, one of which Lee was weeping onto, and the other was being patted by Gai who had also begun to cry with joy, “I have never been so happy about anyone coming that close to slicing a major artery!” He added with a tearful, “Welcome back, Tenten.”

“Gai-sensei!” She admonished, “I wouldn’t. Come on, guys, you know better…”

It took a few minutes for the two of them to dry up, but by then Lee had gently released her. Tenten peeked around her childhood friend to get an eyeful of Neji, who she had only glimpsed from over shoulders and heads during her greeting. Something was decidedly different about him.

Aside from his height and the more muscular broadness that was evident in the clothes he wore, there was a radiance that had not been there last time. It occurred to her that Neji seemed friendlier. Tenten was sure her prediction was accurate when Neji shut his eyes for a moment, overcome by a tiny smile of relief.

“You were gone for too long.” He informed her.

“I’m sorry I made you wait.” She took a step closer, “I know that Lee has been keeping you company.”

Neji nodded in confirmation. He came a bit closer, and as the sounds of Lee and Gai’s blubbering quieted down, he too reached to pull her into a sincere embrace. Since he had initiated it Tenten felt she was within her rights to hug back, chin about level with his shoulder, and was entirely aware of the contrast between this hold and Lee’s squeeze. Neji’s hands had settled in the space between the sword scabbard and summoning scroll at her back. Maybe it was a sympathetic response, but she had mirrored the gesture.

‘He must’ve missed me.’ That was certainly a good feeling, ‘I wish I could be absent for weeks on end more often…’ The sensation of welcome and happiness, while it had been acute with Lee, was exponentially more noticeable with Neji’s voluntary touch.

He probably did not mean to brush his face against hers. A rosy flush crept over the bridge of Tenten’s nose when Neji spoke again, “Tell me everything.” He added, “Later. Gai was about to go over signaling with us.”
“Oh!” She took a step back and returned her attention to her sensei, “I can join in, right?”

“Yes! We have not yet begun!” Gai was sanguine, “And you are also right on time for a melee weapon review, Tenten. Lee will be keener to take part now that you’re here…”

After a successful review of hand signaling, nunchaku, and then a trip to a ninja equipment store, Gai could say that he felt revitalized. Tenten’s giddy participation upon her return had assured the man that she was thrilled to be a part of the team again. And also, thanks to a suggestion made by Lee, the team celebrated Tenten’s recent birthday as well as her return. They dropped in at their preferred restaurant and caught up on what they had missed. The laughter was loud, the food impeccable, and no alcohol was ordered or accidentally ingested.

Gai was overjoyed to share this news with Tama the next day on an early-morning jog around the village. His niece was an occasional cardio-companion when she had free time.

“I knew that she would be re-assigned! I had a feeling…” The girl smiled thoughtfully, “Tenten was so out of sorts for a while…she butted heads with her tutor and was in such a bad mood…”

There was a spring in Gai’s step, “Ah yes…all is as it should be! I am giving my students some space to reconnect for now. We can resume missions again in a few days with the Hokage’s permission.”

“It’s about time!”

They proceeded uphill towards posterior steps near the Hokage monument.

“And how is my rival? I suspect he is very pleased to be your sensei!”

“He is. Kakashi-sensei is always checking to see if we’re available for training.” Tama reported, “Sakura-chan has a hectic schedule, so we wait up for her whenever we can. Kiba-kun is bouncing back.”

Her uncle frowned, “I heard that his family is in turmoil.”

“Not exactly. Kiba-kun told me his father was arrested two days ago at a rest house. He was trying to leave the Fire Country, but he didn’t make it far. He’s been hospitalized again. Tsume tracked him for nearly a week, I was told.” Tama explained, “They’re trying to hold it together until the court hearing.”

“Such deception deserves firm justice!” Gai was climbing the stairs three at a time while he fumed, “Who could ever scheme to use their child that way?”

Tama hurried to keep up, “There are…a lot of rotten people in the world, Uncle Gai…”

“Real men take responsibility!”

“They should-!”

“His karmic track record is ruined!”

“Wait up, Uncle Gai!” She was panting, trying to scale the top of the staircase as he had in a matter of seconds. When Tama arrived at the top her uncle had slowed down to accommodate her.

“I apologize, pretty gem. The thought of such dishonor maddens me.”
“That’s alright…” She took a deep breath, “It bothered me too.”

“Of course. The blood of our family is thick with contempt for disgrace and cowardice. My brother too…” A switch seemed to flip in his head and Gai noted, “I forgot to ask Ken something.”

“What did you want to ask?”

“He might’ve known…I expect Sato must be considering places for you to live. He doesn’t have the proper space for you…” Gai grinned, “Kakashi should be able to give him guidance about home-hunting! You two don’t have enough room to cohabitate for marriage.”

“Oh, Uncle Gai…” Tama was shamefaced, “Are you seriously thinking about that right now? We still have time!”

“It’s borrowed time you speak of; that’s all that shinobi have!” Gai reminded her, “Tama-chan, surely you are looking forward to the merging of our two esteemed families!”

“I do. We just…don’t imagine the future much.” She was a tad disappointed to admit, “Short-term goals are about all that we work towards.”

“Your betrothed needs to step up! I’ve seen the maturity of my students grow by leaps in these last few months. All of your comrades are young adults now! Certainly Sato-kun must be prepared?”

“He’s…attentive.” Tama supplied a word, “But I don’t think he’s prepared, Uncle Gai. Sato just doesn’t think about getting married.”

“That kind of attitude won’t give me grand-nieces and nephews!” He boomed indignantly.

The idea shocked Tama somewhat. She had to mindfully shut her mouth to be sure bugs would not fly in as she ran. Her uncle’s grand vision of the future packed on a lot of pressure.

“Uncle, my attitude has nothing to do with grand-anythings you want to play with.”

“Naturally, it’s at your discretion, Tama-chan, but what better way is there to bind the Hatake and Maito families?”

“I don’t know,” She wore a small, impish expression, “Why don’t you and Kakashi-sensei get married, then?”

“HA!” That comment stirred Gai up, “We are too competitive for married life, Niece!” He added more seriously as he vaulted over a roadblock, “And I have a dog allergy.”

Later that same morning, because it was difficult for them to be prompt, Sato and Kakashi had also gotten together for training away from their respective teams. It was a common practice nowadays to meet at the training field.

Kakashi was astounded that, after their close shave with members of the Akatsuki, Sato’s jutsu and performance had advanced vastly. On multiple occasions, Kurenai had quietly remarked to Kakashi that she was unable to challenge any of her students lightly. She was nearing the end of personal knowledge she could share with Sato regarding Genjutsu, which he aptly applied thanks to her direction and tests. They would have ‘mind battles’ at their training field and attack each other with vicious illusions.
“You’re a brave woman.” Kakashi reminded her.

She had smiled slyly, “It’s about time you challenged him. He’s employing totems and gestures now, which are among the most advanced ways to cast Genjutsu. You ought to be able to handle it.”

So Kakashi had acquiesced to the idea and evaluated his nephew when he could. He was surprised that Sato was able to use a sneaky verbal suggestion tucked within meaningless conversation, and it made his uncle happily stroll over a trap even when his rational mind knew better. Sato’s seamless weaving of illusion and tricks made Kakashi grateful that the Sharingan was at his disposal. He was not ashamed to use it.

His nephew had improved in other ways as well. While still a button-pushing extrovert, Sato had gained an unexpected sharpness in his personality. Kakashi had no doubts that his near-death experience had provoked it. This quality carried over into the way Sato fought, decidedly more brutal with Taijutsu and weaponry, and far less shy about melee combat than he had been in the past. He had become well-rounded thanks to his newfound motivation.

“It’s a work in progress, but…” Sato announced proudly, “I invented a new type of clone.”

“That’s nice.” Kakashi was taking a five-minute break with a paperback book.

“Want to see it?”

“Not really. You’ll probably make it hurt me.”

“When you finish reading that section, then, I’ll show you what I have so far.”

“You know, I doubt you’ve made something new and original when scores of shinobi who have preceded you, long ago, invented most of the techniques we use today. There are only so many methods of generating a clone, Sato. I don’t think it’s really new.”

“It’s new. You can cry about it later.”

‘He’s as cheeky as ever.’ Kakashi mentally noted, ‘I wondered if it is out of the question to write him a Jounin recommendation letter…but Tsunade wouldn’t accept them this early. She’ll likely want to read those over after her Exam concludes.’

Sato took a seat beside his uncle on a log, glancing over the erotic page Kakashi was reading, “I bet you’ve heard already…”

“About Gai’s team?”

“Yeah! They looked ridiculously psyched! Tama was talking about it before I stopped by.” He looked upward and smiled, “I’m glad for them. They’re not supposed to be apart.”

“As Gai’s friend, I couldn’t be happier for him. I’ve felt the same pain and disappointment he did.” Kakashi agreed while flipping a page.

“I can’t imagine what it’d be like to be forced away from my friends.” Sato mused, “Just about everything I do involves them…”

Kakashi solemnly closed his book, “…it’s terrible.”

“Huh?”

“Being apart from…Rin…and Obito.” His sigh was soft, “Nothing was the same after that.”
“Crap, I’m sorry.” Sato realized he had approached the topic carelessly.

“It’s not your fault.”

“I know it isn’t,” The young man acknowledged, “But it hurts you. It hurts you every day so I try not to bring it up.”

“Relax. Many things have hurt me that haven’t ruined me,” Kakashi patted Sato’s shoulder as he stood, “I was thinking about stopping by the Memorial Stone later to say hello.”

“I’ll go with you.” Sato offered.

“If you like. I go to keep Obito current on what’s happening in my life. I like to think that Rin is still safe out there somewhere.”

“That’s fine. I’ve wondered if it’d be right for me to visit when I…” He hesitated to finish, “Think about my dad.”

“I’m not so sure of that. We never could confirm what happened, Sato.”

“I just wish he had something, like a gravestone or whatever, that I could visit.” Sato elaborated, “Mom said that he took a mission one day…and then was gone without a trace. They don’t think he even made it out of the Fire Country.”

“To tell you the truth,” Kakashi replied, “As a favor to my sister, I tracked Riei. We really couldn’t find a trail since I suspect he had flown most of the way. There was no body or evidence to be found. Maybe if his summoned owl had been killed we would have spotted something…but we had no way of knowing what happened.”

Sato smiled to himself and left his seat, “I think…that I’m getting close to not caring so much about it anymore.”

Not much more than a week after Haku’s bet had gone awry, he and Ranmaru were still conscripted for work at Migawari’s office. The two friends cautiously darted into the doctor’s office day in and day out, making up excuses to their swordsman mentors for their absences.

For the most part, Raiga had bought Ranmaru’s tales of jaunts around town. He did not question his protégée’s whereabouts so long as he was on time for training.

Haku had more difficulty keeping Zabuza convinced. While not assisting in Hiroshi’s teashop, as he was still expected to do, Haku’s time was divided further between training with Zabuza and clandestinely learning from Migawari. When the Demon of the Hidden Mist had heard the sixth explanation of why Haku was not taking a mission, Zabuza decided to stop asking altogether. He doubted it was because the Toad Sage had told him not to. Haku was clearly distracted by something, but the brute stalked off and took missions on his own, supposing that the façade Haku had constructed would eventually fall.

Early one afternoon, Haku had once again evaded suspicion and joined Ranmaru for medical jutsu training. Migawari had ushered them into a room where a young patient was seated.

“You’re late for practice. That’s one less bathroom break,” The beady-eyed man warned, “Ranmaru cared to make it on time!”

“I apologize. But unless you want a famous nukenin to pay you a visit, I suggest you let me sidetrack him first.” Haku replied evenly. He then greeted the patient who was waiting quietly; a middle-aged woman on crutches.

Migawari gave brief instructions to his new assistants before standing back, allowing them to mend the lady’s leg fracture. He had deduced that while Ranmaru had a more natural talent for healing, it was Haku’s exceptionally precise chakra control that made him a candidate for healing. Migawari had taught them ‘skills of necessity’ that Medic-Nin relied on, but nothing too advanced. Migawari had hesitations about investing in their studies when he was well aware two swordsmen were down the street, and that they might have reason to object, ‘I’m too old to get murdered. It just ain’t right.’

Haku surveyed the site of the woman’s injury with his chakra; laying a gentle hand over her swollen leg. His eyes unfocused while his concentration shifted to the internal mapping of the body, chakra brushing over the fibula, quickly illuminating a hairline fracture above the ankle. Haku had identified the spot and ceased the jutsu, looking up with a small smile, “May I ask how you hurt your leg?”

“I told Migawari-san before, but it’s just so embarrassing. It’s the same work I do every day.” The woman admitted, “I move shipments off of pallets into the depot downtown, but I jumped off of a stack carelessly and…” She sighed, “I’m more fragile than when I was a kid, I swear.”

“It’s alright. This is a very small break.”

“I can’t miss work! I have a double shift in three days.” She added urgently, “Can you fix it by tomorrow?”

Migawari rumbled with laughter, “We fix worse than this in less time. Shinobi can rarely afford a day to heal.”

Ranmaru took a turn to use the System Survey Jutsu, scanning over the injury with his chakra to identify it. When he had a satisfactory image the small boy scooted over and allowed Haku to heal the lady’s broken leg. They chatted cordially while the soft glow of chakra bonded bone and soft tissue, the pain remained minimal, until finally Migawari stepped forward to inspect the handiwork. He commended Haku’s prowess and waived the woman’s medical fee. She thanked them sincerely during another chat, and later was able to leave on her own two legs.

“Migawari-san, you don’t pay us for this work because you don’t charge patients, is that it?” Ranmaru wondered.

“No. I don’t charge people who can’t afford to be charged.” The old gambler added, “And I don’t pay losers for anything.”

“There’s no need to be rude. You said yourself that you consider our mastery of these techniques to be an achievement.” Haku chided.

“Sure, but neither of you can gamble to save your lives. It’s no fun.”

“There are other ways to have fun.” Ranmaru assured him, “Like eating spicy foods.”

“…no. I have peptic ulcers.”

Haku reminded, “I can take care of those, if you like.”

“And then you can try spicy foods.” Ranmaru added excitedly.

“I may just have to fire you two after all, since you’re trying to sabotage my stomach…”
“Then you might actually have to get some work done.” Haku pointed out as they returned to the front of the building, single-file down the hall.

“Damn, you’re right. Scratch that. I’ll never fire you.”

They sighed collectively before rounding the corner to the waiting room. Ranmaru stopped in his tracks and squealed in fright. He quickly ducked behind Haku. The group looked ahead to see Zabuza seated on a cushioned chair, his arms folded in annoyance, glaring ahead without a sound as soft music played on the radio.

Migawari’s tiny eyes widened as far as they could go, “Oh my god.” He cleared his throat, “Er-hem! Are you in need of medical treatment, sir?”

A growl answered, “Huh…so you want to play dumb?” His Seversword was leaned against the exit of the waiting room, preventing anyone from running outside to save themselves.

Haku stepped forward to take responsibility, “Please don’t threaten these people, Zabuza.”

“I won’t. I don’t give a rat’s ass about the midget or the old gamester. You are the one who’s been lying to me, so my problem is with you.” Zabuza clarified, “What the fuck are you doing here, Haku? I suggest you don’t bullshit me this time.”

“I am learning Medical jutsu.”

“You could’ve just said that from the start.” The brute pointed out.

“I know, and you would have called it a waste of time.”

“It is a waste of time.” Zabuza added with a tilt of his head, “Isn’t that Raiga’s twerp?”

Ranmaru made a small sound of fear when he was acknowledged.

“So…Raiga’s here too?” Zabuza deduced, “Could you fuck up our situation a little more, Haku? If you don’t want me to kill anyone, that merits a head’s up. Keeping me in the dark won’t work the way you hope it will.”

“Right…” The apprentice agreed weakly.

The wrinkling of Zabuza’s brow indicated great distaste when he observed the tiny, violet-haired boy, his eyes were narrow with criticism, “There’s no way a runt like that is going to succeed a swordsman.”

“He has a better chance of it than I do.” Haku countered boldly, “I’ll make this up to you. But whatever you do, please leave Ranmaru and Raiga be. He doesn’t even know that we’re here.”

“That’s awfully convenient.” He considered it for a long moment, “Fine. I have better things to do than provoke a stupid asshole like him, but…if he so much as blinks at me with the idea of a fight, all bets are off.”

The word ‘bets’ attracted Migawari’s attention, “So that’s all you care about, eh, Momochi Zabuza? Never imagined the day I would see a monster like you in my office.” The old man puffed up, no longer intimidated, “What about the townspeople? Or these two studious boys? Aren’t they reason enough not to cause uproar around here?”

“You want to think you have a point, but you don’t, Old Man.” Zabuza sneered, “There’s unfinished business between the Swordsmen, and don’t pretend that you understand. Our coup d’état in Mist would not have failed if idiots like Raiga didn’t flee from critical battles. The first possibility of loss was enough to change his mind, and I will never let a shinobi with that reputation shit on my plans again.”

“You are tremendously self-centered!”

“Tch. Why is that an issue?”

“There’s more to life than your half-baked plans to oust the Mizukage, you damned fool.” The retired Grass nin huffed, “There are other forces at work! Even you can see that.”

“Watch your tongue.” Zabuza’s hand traced over the hilt of the gargantuan sword beside him.

“Oh believe me, I will. I’ll come out and say it: you ought to take the advice of someone like me, a man who’s seen a lot of success in his lifetime, ho ho!” Migawari waggled his spectacles, “If you are so dedicated to seeing an apprentice rise and meet your expectations…and thereby help you realize your dreams…Haku can do much better than learning the fastest way to destroy the human body. He ought to learn to fix it too! The next time you’re in a tricky battle, you won’t regret that he is of both worlds, will you?”

“He’s a decent enough healer.” Zabuza sniffed, “He’s a reluctant killer.” He added angrily, “And Haku sure as hell can’t heal his way to a new regime.”

“Shut the fuck up. You’re no Hokage.”

A poisonous retort, “Neither was she. Tsunade-sama grew into it.”

Migawari waved his hands, “Enough of this! Are we hostages or have you concluded what you had to say? You implicated that you need more time to train with Haku, is that it?”

“Yeah. At least you pay attention.” He moved the sword aside to unblock the door, “Haku needs more training, and I’m not going to let you get in the way of that.”

“Fair enough. I don’t intend to cross you.” The old ninja yielded, “But I ask that you don’t start trouble around here.”

As Zabuza rose to stand, his dark, rumbling chuckle unnerved them, “Cheap layabouts don’t usually tell me what to do…unless they can afford it.”

“Leave him alone, Zabuza-san.” Haku intervened, “Seeing that you haven’t gone out, I can train with you for the rest of the day. I won’t be much longer.”

“Good.” The man grunted and turned to leave, glancing over Ranmaru, “And you. Not a word of this goes back to that stooge.”

“Uh-huh.” Ranmaru nodded meekly.

There was a tense stillness as Zabuza exited and left Haku with a lingering glare, and the young man bravely returned it. The office door slowly creaked closed when a white rabbit dashed inside just before it shut. Migawari sat down on a chair to catch his breath, surprised that he had used most of it to argue with the Demon of the Hidden Mist. ‘These boys will keep me young whether I like it or not…retirement was supposed to be relaxing…’
Calmer than before, Ranmaru crouched down to pet the rabbit, “This is your messenger, right Haku-kun?”

“Yes,” He scooped up Pua and spoke to her directly, “You’ve been gone for so long. Did you get any responses, girl?”

Pua brandished a particular scroll of the three she was toting and Haku found it odd. He wondered if Jiraiya had written to him again, but upon unrolling the parchment he discovered foreign handwriting. It was not addressed to or from anyone. The message was extremely brief. It dawned on Haku after a moment of consideration that this reply was from someone he truly did not expect to hear back from.

His eyes hurriedly re-read the message:

I don’t know what to say to you.

An invisible wrench and socket twisted his torso, making his chest tight with regret and curiosity.

“What is it, Haku?” Ranmaru wondered. Migawari was puffing in the background, trying to return to his senses.

Haku gently set Pua down on the floor and took a seat in the waiting room as well. His best guess was that this was Temari’s response to the letter he had sent her. More than likely, it was the only reply he could ever expect from her. ‘But she answered when she didn’t have to…’ Haku noted in astonishment, ‘It wasn’t a very favorable sentiment…but Temari knew that she wasn’t obligated.’ He quickly inferred that she might have felt a hint of appreciation that he reached out.

While Haku sat, flummoxed, Ranmaru peered over at the message, “If someone doesn’t know what to say to you…then why would they bother writing?”

Haku snapped out of his thoughts and sighed, “It’s…complicated.”

“Who sent it?”

“Someone I love. She’s angry with me.” Haku summed it up.

“Oh!” Ranmaru was mildly impressed.

Pua hopped up to take a seat on her master’s knees.

Ranmaru sat down between Haku and the wheezing gambler, deliberating on the matter, “Hm… maybe she doesn’t want to be mad at you.”

“Maybe so, but I don’t know how to change things. I am in no position to ask for her forgiveness, let alone a second chance.”

“Even Raiga got a second chance.” Ranmaru swung his short legs off of the chair, still thinking, “No one will ever forgive him except for me, and he used to do bad things to people.”

“This is different.”

“It probably is.” His small friend agreed, “But you’re not bad, Haku-kun, no matter what you did in the past.”

Haku’s smile was wistful, “I wish that were true, but I have realized that I am not nearly as good as I thought I was.”
Ranmaru paused to look at him, “That’s okay.” He continued kicking his legs, “If you write again and she doesn’t answer…then you know for sure that it won’t change.”

“I shouldn’t.”

“But you want to know!”

“And I don’t want to make her upset.”

“You already did.” Ranmaru reminded him, “I had to reach out to the person I cared for, and I had no idea if it would make a difference when I tried. All I know is that…if I hadn’t done it, we would have been stuck under those storm clouds forever. I never would have seen the world or met my friends…”

“Hm.” Haku shut his eyes and took the thought to heart.

Unexpectedly, Migawari stood and hobbled across the room, “Come on, boys. To the treatment room…”

“Why? Is something the matter?” Haku asked.

“Yeah. I’m going to take you up on that offer to treat my ulcers.” Migawari replied, “Your conversation gave me horrible acid.”

At about roughly the same time, far off in the wilds of the Toad Valley, Naruto was also spending time with a mentor. He was seated once again beside the Toad Oil pool, legs folded in a position of meditation, and his eyes lightly shut. Jiraiya was nearby keeping watch as his student absorbed natural energy.

‘This is going to be a long day.’ Jiraiya thought to himself, ‘He’s on the verge of getting it. I wanted to help Naruto out and speed this lesson along, but that went and backfired…’ Earlier, Jiraiya had asked Fukasaku to bond himself to Naruto’s shoulder and attempt to gather natural energy. It was an excellent way to keep Naruto on his feet in battle while an assistant did the meditating for him. ‘It looked great on paper…’

But in practice it had failed. As soon as Fukasaku had nestled onto Naruto’s shoulder and tried to quiet his mind, a thundering roar echoed up from inside the boy and hurled the toad across the yard. Alarmed, Naruto quickly apologized for the rejection.

Still not completely convinced, Jiraiya asked his toad mentor to give it a second attempt. Again, Fukasaku was expelled by the Nine-Tailed Fox, staking its claim of space inside his vessel.

Fukasaku rubbed his backside after he had landed on stone steps, “It seems we won’t be able to aid Naruto the way we aid you, Jiraiya-boy.”

“That’s how it looks.” Jiraiya rubbed his chin, mulling over the next option. He advised the toad to go home for a rest while he watched after his pupil.

As there were no other methods to indirectly harvest natural energy, Jiraiya set Naruto back to work with his personal meditation. He and a shadow clone focused side by side as Jiraiya kept watch.

Naruto was tapping into the natural energy of the environment more rapidly than he had before. His eyelids were tinged red like the skin of his toad-friends, but almost immediately after that, the shape of his face would widen and his hands slowly developed webbing. Jiraiya was sure to bop him on the head as soon as the transformation passed that threshold.

Over the course of a few hours, he had to interrupt several dozen times. Remarkably, Naruto was not frustrated by any instance of intervention, and occasionally thanked Jiraiya for his swiftness. ‘I don’t want to end up a garden decoration. Ero-sensei would probably make fun of me every time he walks by…’

As the day progressed, Jiraiya could not shed his desire to chat. He took a seat on a step and fiddled with his pipe, “So… I was thinking…”

“About what?” Naruto opened an eye.

“Fukasaku and Shima might be able to bond with your body after all.” Jiraiya suggested, “We just need to persuade the Fox to allow it.”

Naruto shut his eyes again, annoyed, “I’m not talking to him.”

“Gaara already told you that it was a good idea.”

“It won’t get me anywhere. I’m better off training on my own.”

Jiraiya sighed, “Fine. Today isn’t the day. But, down the line you’re going to realize that you can’t do everything yourself. The Kyuubi doesn’t have to be a burden, Naruto.”

Naruto said nothing and returned to his quiet state. His mind was restless, unfortunately, “Great. Now I’m distracted.” He exhaled roughly, “Ma and Pa don’t need to help me. I’ll use Shadow Clones to gather energy. They can use jutsu too. It won’t make much difference.”

He could hear Jiraiya walking around to stretch his legs. The Fox doesn’t want to change. Even if I had a heart to heart with him, he’ll still have it out for me…’ Naruto then acknowledged, ‘I guess eventually, though…there’s gonna be a time when I can’t avoid him. We’re going to have to reach an understanding or truce. Something.’ He knew for certain it was not a conversation he wanted to have at the moment.

“You’re not focusing at all.” Jiraiya noticed out loud.

“You don’t make it easy, Ero-sensei.”

“Yeah, I know.” He took a seat beside his student and patted Naruto’s shoulder, “Take a break. I can tell you something encouraging for a change, if that’ll calm you down.”

“Really?” Naruto unfurled and stretched.

“Sure. I think now is a good time to discuss the life of someone who had to deal with the Nine-Tails long before you did.” Jiraiya began, “I mentioned this to you before, but the jinchuriki who came before you did not have it easy either.”

The blonde young man gave a measured look to his teacher, “Of course she didn’t. Can you tell me about her?”

“I promised you I would. Let’s see, where do I start? Hm, back to the time when she first arrived… it was the Third Hokage’s prime. Huh. I was still a little wet behind the ears then.” Jiraiya chuckled at his memories, “Around that time, Uzumaki Mito requested that we begin looking for her replacement. She had been alive for, phew, a very long time while containing the Kyuubi. She outlived her husband by a couple of decades. Naturally, my sensei agreed with Mito’s preference to find someone of Uzumaki descent, but, unfortunately, the Hidden Eddy Village had been ransacked shortly before this transition. I won’t get into those political details, but you can imagine how it made the search for a successor difficult with refugees scattered to the winds.”

“But they did find someone.”

“Yes. They found three, actually. Two middle-aged ninja, a brother and sister, and that woman’s small daughter: Uzumaki Kushina. After they arrived in Leaf at a safe house it was decided that the girl would become a jinchuriki.” The man went on, “Everyone agreed that her mother and uncle were not as suitable. They settled down and tried to adapt as best they could, but Kushina had to endure a lot of bullying and attention at the Academy. She was colorful and unique, so the jealous kids liked to pick on her for it.”

“Colorful and unique?” Naruto was puzzled, “Are you talking about personality or…?”

“Figuratively and literally: Kushina was the reddest redhead in red-town. Very pretty. Almost all of the Uzumaki clan had that crazy, scarlet hair. That’s how we used to spot them in the old days. Anyway, she also dreamed big and made sure everyone knew what her intentions were.” Jiraiya clarified, “Who could forget that girl running around the school and village, proclaiming that she’d be Hokage one day? I never did. She wanted to gain people’s respect and have a sense of belonging in Konoha.”

“I can relate.”

“You sure can. She did great in school and made a few friends…but her torturers relished getting a rise out of her. Kushina fought back hard; more than likely she was struggling to accept her mother’s death…and her uncle was a pretty apathetic and useless guy before he bit it.” Jiraiya sighed, “Mito consoled her when she could, but soon after the Nine-Tailed Fox was transferred to Kushina, that support was gone too. She probably felt like she was alone most of the time. She had to care for herself, study hard, fight bullies, and try to hold onto her clan’s identity as it slipped away. I bet she knew more about Sealing Techniques as a kid that most Jounin do these days, but it still didn’t make her life easy. No one knew that she was a jinchuriki, save for the few that needed to know…but it was still an uphill battle.”

Naruto lowered his head a fraction, feeling empathy for the girl.

“When she graduated and became a Genin, she had the good fortune of becoming a student to a caring sensei; a member of the Aburame clan. He had more than enough patience for her and her teammates. They all got along quite well, as I understand it. That team was able to survive clashes during the war that had bumped off other young teams. They looked out for each other as best they could, but I know for sure that two of them died. The bullying let up enough for Kushina to make a name for herself. Although, it’s not always a good thing when people know who you are…”

Naruto blinked hard, waiting for the other shoe to drop, “Did something happen to her?”

“More than once. Kushina had to stay on her toes to avoid anyone who was ‘poaching’ for Tailed Beasts, usually other hidden villages. Because the Cloud Village has such a fondness for military fortification, they were hoping that when they ambushed Kushina at her home and escorted her away in the night…that no one would notice.” The man laughed, “Heh! It almost worked. They picked a time when the Hokage was distracted and most shinobi were occupied.”

“She got captured?” Naruto was horrified, “That’s just…”

“Part and parcel of being a jinchuriki: sometimes they’ll catch you with pants down around your ankles, kid. That’s why we are preparing too, as you know. I’ll say this, at the time I was a sensei and sometimes I told my students to bugger off and quit asking so many questions. Minato was the worst. He was always reading and observing things. What I didn’t know at the time was that he was watching whatever Kushina was up to.” Jiraiya shrugged, “And he noticed when she went missing. ‘Course he wasn’t especially her favorite person either, because, like I’ve said before, she had opinions about him…”

“He must’ve told someone.”

“He didn’t tell anyone.” The Toad Sage corrected, “He followed the trail and saved her himself. That’s the man I trained.”

“Oh.” Naruto raised his eyebrows, “Kind of risky.”

“I won’t argue with that. Minato had to beat the hell out of that ambush team, but he was happy to do it. He had such a big crush on Kushina that he probably could’ve made the sun rise in reverse for her. It wasn’t until I inquired after the fact, because he did get in trouble for that stunt, that I learned just how bad Minato had it for her.”

The young man tilted his head in shock, “He…”

“Yeah. Pretty much as nutty as you, I’d say. Kushina was fine after all of that. It certainly changed her mind about my student! By the end of the next year the two of them had become Jounin and, shortly after that, Kushina was kind enough to teach Minato some Sealing jutsu.”

“Whoa! Wait a second; you’re saying that the jinchuriki before me was…” Naruto lifted his pinky finger, “Like that with the Fourth Hokage?”

“Naruto, he wasn’t the Hokage at that time. Minato was just some blonde chump who impressed her.” Jiraiya shut his eyes and snickered, “She still had to fight most of her own battles.”

“Were they-?”

“What I wanted to arrive at was this…Kushina put up with the Fox somehow. I don’t have much insight as to how she accomplished that, but she went through it too. It’s been said that she used its chakra to great effect in battles long ago, and she was by no means afraid to do it. She stayed in control.” Jiraiya concluded, “I don’t want you to give up yet, Naruto. Just remember that you’re not the first person to go through all of this.”

“I get that, Ero-sensei.” Naruto sighed and leaned back on his hands, “I won’t give up on it. I guess I just need to get over how I feel about it.”

“Then you work on that. This isn’t a bad place to do some thinking and feeling.”

“Alright, so tell me the rest of it.” He nudged Jiraiya interestingly, “That probably went somewhere! I know you know about it.”

“Nah. That’s a story for another day.” Jiraiya stood and cracked his back, “Ah…I’ve got to go write some erotic scenes now to get the romance out of my brain.”

The next morning in the Leaf Village, Neji was promptly informed that before he could leave Hyuga estate grounds his presence was required at a meeting of clan elders. Hiashi added that he was not told the particulars of why the Hyuga heir was slated to join the old folk that morning, but Neji would be free to return to his team after the conference.
Hiashi reminded him to keep breakfast quick before joining the elders in the formal meeting room. He returned down the corridor from whence he came and Neji sat by himself in the tea room, completely detached from eating the meal in front of him. He was absorbed by his thoughts again.

‘This is sudden.’ Neji noted, curious if his role as a successor of the Hyuga might be in question. Or, the opposite; ‘I don’t expect that I will be replacing my uncle as leader for…quite some time.’ But he had never given it too much thought. The occurrence always seemed to be ‘down the road.’ It was tomorrow’s endeavor. What Neji did not doubt was that his time as leader would be filled with challenges just as Hiashi’s had been. He would be the representative that all other clan heads spoke to for matters of cooperation. Neji would need to keep relationships with allies strong and maintain the clan’s distance from threats. His overseeing of these sacred responsibilities would have made his father proud, he supposed. ‘If I had half an idea of how to do it…’ Neji had still not hammered out all of those details.

By the time his train of thought pulled into station, the bowl of food had been emptied. Neji wasted no time in venturing to the far side of the building. He was the last to join the meeting.

The gathering room was where all of the clan, Branch and Main House alike, had space to meet; and did so about once a month, usually the last week of every month. It was that obligatory meeting that Neji was accustomed to attending, not so much the private awkwardness of retired Main House elders. Six of them (all that remained) were seated in a line on tatami mats. To their right, Hiashi was settled beside Hideyasu, still looking annoyed that a morning meeting was necessary.

Neji respectfully took the space in front of the old men, nearest to where his uncle was seated. He bowed his head to the floor in greeting, making sure they could all hear him say, “Good morning.”

The man on the far left was mostly deaf these days.

“Thank you for coming, Neji.” The man who spoke, Haburo, had a quality of coldness that completely outclassed Hiashi at any given time. It seemed that he would be doing most of the talking while his fellow elders spectated.

“It is my honor to be here.” Neji said as he rose.

“It is. This meeting was called to address some of our concerns. To start, however, I wish to discuss a subject that is unrelated to our concerns.” Haburo inclined his head towards Hiashi and Hideyasu, “Neji’s training has recently yielded significant results, I have heard.” He was anticipating some kind of explanation, but not from Neji. The young man knew better than to speak unless an elder’s eyes were firmly planted on him.

Hiashi had his reply ready, “That is correct. I have endorsed his training with a local Wushu master, which has considerably furthered his prowess with Jyukken. Hideyasu can also confirm Neji’s ability with Wind Element chakra.”

Haburo’s frigid gaze fell on Hideyasu.

“I can confirm it. I ought to mention that is the reason why we don’t have the back panel of forest anymore behind the property.” The man added sheepishly, “I apologize, but it serves as proof of a Wind Nature Transformation, if you’re looking for it.”

“It will satisfy. We have no intention of replanting that area, at the moment.”

There was an odd moment of quiet. Another elder, Hosuke, spoke up in a quaking voice, “This council of elders’ wishes to announce…our complete confidence in young Neji.”
Other old men nodded in agreement. Haburo continued the statement in a trenchant tone, “Neji is the clear choice as a successor for leadership. His dedication and skill will undoubtedly bring prosperity to the Hyuga clan.” He then spoke directly to Neji, “You are nearing the age at which you must assume this role in its entirety, should anything ever happen to Hiashi-sama. Normally, if an heir is underage or unfit to serve, the standby of the Main House would act as steward.” Haburo was referring to Hideyasu. “Understand that this plan will not go into effect with respect to your qualifications, Neji. Be aware that the council believes you to be capable.”

“I understand.” Neji answered calmly. This was better news than he expected.

“And now we will address our concerns,” Haburo went on, looking towards Hiashi, “The council would like to make known their disappointment in Hinata-sama. Her unwillingness to respect the wishes of her elders is most unbecoming.”

Neji, upon hearing the statement, was glad that his uncle was in good health with little to no clogged arteries. Otherwise he might have had a stroke just then.

“In what way has she disrespected you?” Hiashi’s response was clipped.

“She has denied the appeals of many eligible clansmen and lords who would secure her future with marriage. While the council agrees this outcome is no grave offense, the disrespect we speak of is the rejection of the young lord of the Taketori clan.” Haburo explained, “As our most distinguished ally and friend, the Hyuga cannot afford to distance itself from the Taketori. We expect conditions with the Taketori clan to fray because of this decision.”

“I saw no such repercussion.” Hiashi disagreed, “Magan-sama completely understood.”

“Magan’s elders will not.” Haburo retorted.

“Forgive my ignorance,” Hiashi leashed his anger as best he could, “But I find it difficult to understand why marriage is the only reasonable future this honored council of elders can imagine for Hinata. Your great concern is reserved for her advanced Kekkei Genkai, which you expect to manifest in future generations. In the event it does not, her unnecessary squandering of a shinobi career would be most unbecoming.”

“Hiashi, we have no intention of forcing your eldest child to neglect the duties of a shinobi. She is a tremendous asset to the Hidden Leaf Village, after all.” Haburo countered, “Nor is our concern only for her Bloodline Gift. Your elders seek to strengthen bonds with our close friends in the Taketori, as well as lead the Hyuga clan down the path of prominence. In the history of our clan, our ranks have not seen such talent and power since the times of our ancient forefathers.”

“Understood. However, I do not wish these goals to be at my daughter’s expense.”

“You seem to imply she would suffer if she were to fulfill her obligations to this clan.”

“I cannot help but to champion her own decisions.”

“Shes free to make her decisions based on the guidance of her elders; as do you, Hideyasu, Neji, and all of the Main Branch. Our supervision benefits all of the clan, not just one individual.” Haburo lectured, “If we went by such senseless logic…we would be no better off than the Uchiha clan, in which one foolish child was spared from a massacre.”

Hideyasu balked at the hurtful comparison but said nothing. Hiashi was not too pleased with it either. Neji kept his mouth firmly shut for fear of an incredulous sound escaping.
Hosuke spoke again, “We elders believe that Hinata is obligated to preside over a family one day, whether or not her children inherit her gift…we expect excellence from them. While there is no strict timeline, we will enforce the choice of a suitable match for her.”

“Very well. Let’s revisit this matter in a few more years.” Hiashi recommended.

“You should be informed…” Haburo cut in, “That the council has deliberated further and recognized another potential spouse, apart from Magan’s son. It should be taken into consideration before you postpone this discussion, Hiashi.”

“I recall this council assuring me that there would be no more suitors on Hyuga grounds.” Hiashi retorted evenly.

“There won’t be. A worthy candidate is here with us now.” Haburo’s lofty eyes went back to Neji, “Your responsibility to this clan may very well include a covenant with Hinata-sama, should she fail to humor our requests.”

The weight of eyes on him was an intangible force, but it pushed Neji to the brink of his tolerance. For once, he had thought that he could receive a bit of good news from clan elders and be on his way. He should have known better. He should have expected them to drag him into such petty nonsense.

Neji dared to speak, as he had been given the floor, “And if I fail to honor this request as well?”

“You will not fail. You are in no position to do so.” Haburo warned, “If an arrangement cannot be made, you will wed Hinata in accordance with the timeline we set. It is tradition for the Main House to make matches like these; while not always favorable by related blood…it is an option we rely on when certain parties remain stubborn.” Hiashi was grinding his teeth furiously off to the side while listening to the pompous comments.

Neji replied, “You will find both parties to be stubborn, Haburo-sama.”

The old man was provoked, “Neji, please realize that with certain persuasions…neither of you will remain stubborn. It is in your best interest. I advise that if you care for anything or anyone dear to you…that you do not defy this demand.”

Neji detected the threat and decided that, no matter his audience; he could be his genuine self and make use of that attitude Shikamaru always poked fun at.

“You have certain expectations about what a marriage between my cousin and I would entail. Please try to make them more realistic. While we are on good terms, it stands to reason that our relationship would be dysfunctional at best, and at least, it would be a miserable embarrassment for the entire village to see.” Neji added, “Such a union would be unhappy and childless. You will forever regret arranging it.”

“Silence.” Haburo held up a hand, “Your disrespect is incomprehensible.”

While he did not want to, Neji quieted down. Thankfully, his uncle intervened.

“Neji is correct. It is true that the Main House has counted on such matches in the past, but make no mistake, these two talented young people have no desire for each other. They are nearly siblings. That is a problem.” Hiashi explained, “Furthermore, it makes little sense to afford my daughter a variety of options without extending those same courtesies to Neji. If he were to choose a partner from the Taketori or other noble family, it would eliminate any hostility you fear can occur.”
“Enough, Hiashi. This council knows very well what it is asking.” Haburo was losing patience, “Neji should heed this resolution or face consequences.”

“Death seems gentler.” Neji remarked out of turn. His casual suggestion triggered Hosuke and the elder beside him to backpedal on the plan, squawking in panic, fearing a shameful suicide or other such propaganda-storm. Haburo was pressed to get the meeting back under control.

“Perhaps a compromise?” Hideyasu suggested innocently.

“There is no need.” Haburo declared adamantly.

“I disagree. There is a great need for compromise here.” Hiashi glanced at Neji briefly before saying, “Both Hinata and Neji are entitled to make these decisions themselves.”

“If that is so…and they prefer alternatives to what the council suggests…” Haburo was aflame with agitation, “Then so be it. Choose as you will and who you will. However, the council demands prosperity for this clan, and they are both obligated to confer their greatness to a new generation. They will abide by our terms, at the very least, or join the Branch.”

Neji could scarcely interpret the growling old man, but he took it to mean that singlehood was out of the question. If he was strictly obligated to find a spouse and have children, it was comforting to know he did not have to do so through incestuous means. It was a tough enough pill to swallow without that detail.

“Neji will abide by the same benchmark you did, Hiashi.” Hosuke concluded, “Before he assumes leadership, whether you should perish or abdicate the position, Neji will make a match.”

“There should be no great hurry then.” Hiashi supposed.

“Hinata must also comply.” Haburo chimed in, “While she has no deadline the way Neji does, I expect her to at least avoid old age.”

Hiashi nodded woodenly and then had a short, vivid daydream of knocking Haburo’s probably-false teeth out.

The hum of tension in the room was broken by Hideyasu’s comment, “Ah, look at that…it’s already 10:30 in the morning…”

Hiashi capitalized on the statement, “Let us adjourn this meeting.”

Most of the elders agreed, disregarding Haburo’s storm cloud of rage as the men in the room began to stand and exit.

As Neji entered the corridor his uncle and Hideyasu filed past him, both worn-out, and Hiashi merely shook his head with disdain. Hideyasu smiled wanly, “I did not think that would take a turn the way it did. I hope none of that was too damaging, Neji.”

“I now understand…why no one can enjoy those assemblies.”

“It is a perpetual nuisance.” Hiashi agreed, striding away, “Ignore everything they told you, Neji. I will settle it.”

Hideyasu patted Neji’s shoulder amicably before following after the Lord of the Hyuga. What a strange relief it was to know that they were on his side, however unlikely a pair they were.
Running a bit late, Neji set out to join his team at their training field, but he did not have an easy time putting the elders’ words out of his mind.

At the field, Gai was giving parting words to Lee and Tenten. He and a few other Jounin had been tasked with neutralizing a border dispute in the northwest. Landowners-turned-thugs had taken issue with the Hidden Grass Village’s domain over the area they operated shady businesses in, disputing calls to cease and desist. When gangs threatened a public bridge with destruction it all went to hell in a hand basket. Tsunade thought she ought to lend helping hands to the Grass ninja in the area.

“You will also report to the Hokage to take a mission, in the meantime.” Gai advised, “Be sure to bring Neji along when he arrives!”

Their sensei had been gone for a while before Neji finally turned up. Tenten could immediately tell that he was in a horrible mood. The contortion of his face, simmering with frustration, more than likely had something to do with his clan. ‘They can’t give him a moment’s peace, can they?’

It was a shame. For the past few days that she had been reunited with her teammates, Tenten could say that it had been an especially joyous time. Neji divided his time between training with Lee and Wong Leung, and training with Tenten. She was appreciative that he still went out of his way to work with her, even when she could tell he and Lee had become close in her absence. Challenging each other with new techniques certainly made it exciting.

She could get away with ambushing Neji with Shadow Clones when he did not use his Blood Limit. Tenten got a sense that he enjoyed the task of brawling against multiple opponents, while she simultaneously accosted him with weaponry. It was also fun to demonstrate that Neji did not have as easy of a time hitting her either, since Tenten had become slippery and fast during her time away. ‘It’s like we’re getting to know each other again.’

Even after training, they were compelled to spend time together when they could. There were anecdotes that needed to be shared. Tenten was quite amused by Neji’s recounting of the mission to Oga Castle, and was interested in this new person called ‘Sai.’ Tenten made a point of mentioning her expanded arsenal without demonstrating the deadly effects of her newest sword. She had grown closer to other kunoichi as well. They spoke until late one night before parting, and it had felt perfectly natural.

‘Well, he’s going to have a hard time talking today.’ Tenten thought to herself.

Neji came to a halt near his teammates, frowning deeply.

“What happened?” Tenten asked sedately.

With great annoyance, he made the problem clear, “A pointless meeting.”

She took it as a sufficient answer. The team proceeded to the Hokage’s office while Lee informed Neji of their sensei’s absence. The quality of mission they could get without a Jounin present, if the Hokage’s limitation was still in effect, would probably not permit much.

Tsunade seemed pleased to see them reunited, “Ah, here you are! You’re slightly behind schedule, but I have something you three can do for me. It will be time-consuming.”

Lee made a point to ask, “Are we still confined to local areas, Hokage-sama?”

“No. For now the possibility of danger has decreased, and I know where to keep you away from, at this point.” Tsunade reported, “You might have noticed, but your peers’ teams are dispatched at the moment as well. You’ll be the last to learn that the official announcement for the next Chunin Exam is going out. I’ve got three months to advertise for it.” She smiled thoughtfully, “And that’s where you come in.”

It was sounding like another bothersome, pack-mule mission but Neji refrained from objecting.

“I’ve sent every other available team out to spread the word and distribute fliers. Everywhere.” She leaned back slightly in her desk chair, “And I mean everywhere. Countries in each direction, stopping at big commercial towns… I want every person who derives entertainment from Final Round battles to stuff that stadium. They need to spend money…it’ll help our budget deficit.”

“So where would you like us to advertise?” Tenten had been itching for a mission for weeks; even one so simple was enough to get her blood going.

“Well, Kurenai’s team is covering a western route into the Land of Wind. Kakashi’s team went south and Asuma’s north…but there isn’t much interest to be found in the west. Another team was moving through the Lightning Country last week…and the Land of Water will attract the wrong kind of spectators to our village.” Tsunade tapped a finger to her lip, “But I feel comfortable putting your team on the seasonal labor route.”

Neji sensed they might have drawn the short straw, “And what is that?”

“That route extends northeast over the sea. Please board a ship at the coast, preferably the port at Funabashi. If you hand out pamphlets to passengers they’ll bring them around to ports they stop at. I want you to disembark in the Marsh Country and put a few fliers up along the harbor. Then, while you’re at it, you can do some reconnaissance for me. I’ve needed eyes over there for a few days now, but no one has been available to go.”

Lee was nodding as the Hokage spoke and Neji perked up a little. This sounded more interesting that he had initially thought.

“A report came in last month about a secretive project in the Marsh Country. I don’t know when or if it has taken place, but I can confirm that nukenin and thugs have responded to this venture, probably for money.” She looked fondly at the team, “Stake out the area and get visual confirmation of what’s going on. It should be a brief check and do not confront any ninja you find. Once you have intel, board the ship again and return to the village.” Tsunade added with a pointed finger, “And advertise some more! Get those locals over here!”

“Yes ma’am!” Lee was revved up.

Tsunade pushed forward a small stack of folded fliers on her desk and Tenten picked them up, enthusiastic, “We’ll get this done for you, Hokage-sama! How much time do we have?”

The Hokage handed out vouchers for ship travel they could use and said, “As much as you need. Just be thorough and cautious.”

The teammates gave affirmative answers, bowing respectfully, and then exited the office. They parted ways to pack and prepare for a long journey.

That evening, Kakashi and Kurenai’s teams concluded their respective advertising ventures. All six students went home, moderately tired, and buckled down for some time off. In Sato’s case, he still had pep leftover, and he was quick to reunite with Tama after not having seen her in over a week.

“Ah, I missed you…” He admitted as they walked side-by-side down the road from her house, “You look shorter, Tama.”

“I’m not. You’re just taller.” A smile tugged at her lips, “How was your mission? Did you see anything interesting?”

“A lot of tourists! We must have spoken to a couple hundred people, and we ran out of fliers. Your team went west, I heard.”

“Yeah. The Land of Rivers and then the Land of Wind…” Tama sighed at the memory, “It wasn’t very busy out there. And the desert was just oppressively hot.”

“Oh, I would have hated that trip.”

“I know.” She chuckled, “But it was sweet when the Kazekage stopped by to see Sakura-chan.”

“Really? You know that you can call him Gaara. We grew up together!”

“Kakashi-sensei always refers to him as the Kazekage, so I guess I can’t help myself.” She gave a slight shrug.

“Well that doesn’t hurt, I guess. Did you have dinner yet?” Sato changed the subject, “I was going to pick up some food for home and then cook.”

“Hm. That must be an invitation!”

Tama looped arms with him and changed directions, veering left towards the fish market. They prattled for a while before agreeing on snapper, and then moved on to a nearby supermarket for mitsuba, daikon, rice, and the lengthy list Sato had in mind. The sun began to set as they walked back to Sato’s apartment with several grocery bags.

“Do you want to know what Uncle Gai was asking me about a few days ago?” Tama asked as they climbed the stairwell of the building.

“If you’d finally wear the jumpsuit?”

“Surprisingly, no.” She noted, “He asked about when we’ll start home hunting. He said that you don’t live in a space that would fit the two of us.”

“Sure it would!”

“Not… the way he imagines it. He thinks we’ll multiply.”

“Oooh.” Sato pursed his lips thoughtfully as they crossed a landing, “Then it definitely isn’t enough space.”

“We’ve never really talked about this before.” The young woman pointed out, “What do you think? Is it worth looking for a new place?”

He sighed quietly before acknowledging, “Realistically speaking… it’d be good to find a new house or something. I know I can afford it now.” His shoulders dropped slightly, “But this is the place my mother raised me. It’d be kind of hard-”

“To let it go.” Tama concluded, “I don’t know how I feel about it either. Whenever I visit your home it reminds me of your mom. I miss her too.”

Sato turned his head slightly, intending for her to not see a quivering, emotional smile that overtook him. “Thanks…for saying that.”

“I think we should keep your flat for as long as possible.” Tama elected, “And…let’s not rush to get married either.”

“ Totally. You’re, like, reading my mind right now.”

As they scaled another staircase Tama suggested, “I think we can get into more detail after the Chunin Exam is over. I’ve wanted to talk about the future with you for a while, but you were never quite grown up enough.”

“I can handle it now.”

Upon reaching the fourth floor, the couple stopped mid-way through the corridor, regarding what looked to be a new resident.

A pale young man wearing a black, gakuran uniform was standing in front of an apartment door. He had a large scroll tucked under one arm as he fiddled with a key in a lock. On the floor near his feet was a wooden artist’s box with various supplies, several canvases, a folded easel, and a large duffle bag.

Sato raised his hand in greeting, “Hi! Did you just move here?”

The resident at the door turned to look at him, almost embarrassed, “I suppose I have.” He continued futzing with the key, “Although…I have not yet seen my living space.”

Without a word, Tama took the bags from Sato’s hands so he could help the new down-the-hall neighbor.

“I’m Hatake Sato.” He shook the newcomer’s hand and then motioned for the key, “Looks like you’re an artist! What’s your name?”

“Sai.” His smile was small, “You’re Kakashi’s relative.”

“Youp!” Sato managed the old doorknob’s lock and then manipulated the deadbolt with the key, using half a revolution, “These stupid things don’t open with a full turn. You’ll get used to it. I’ve meant to yell at the property manager about it, but now it’s just a force of habit.”

“Thank you.” Sai said as the keys were dropped into his hand again.

“Can we help you bring all of these things inside? You’ve got your hands full.” Sato offered.

Sai nodded gratefully and allowed the affable Hatake to take his few precious possessions into the darkened flat. After a moment, Sai turned to Tama curiously, “Are you a neighbor too?”

“Not exactly. I plan to live here someday, though.” She tilted her head for a friendly salutation, “It’s nice to meet you, Sai. I’m Tama.”

He stared at her for a long moment, “Legs.”

She smiled in shock, completely nonplussed by the word. Sai then turned to watch Sato hefting the duffle bag inside, “And he is Sugar.”

It occurred to Tama that Sai was assigning nicknames, “Oh! Well, our regular names are fine, if you don’t mind.”
“He’s sweet and friendly…and you look like the front page of those magazines.”

“Right…” Tama thought to herself as Sai moved his belongings inside, ‘He’s got a weird way of doing introductions…’

She peeked inside the see the sprawling darkness and dusty condition of the apartment. No one bothered removing their shoes in the genkan; the home was too filthy to be barefoot in. Judging by the resounding echo made by Sato setting items down, the place was empty.

Abruptly, a flashlight snapped on at the far end of the room. It illuminated a mysterious face and frightened the youngsters who had entered. They adjusted for a moment and Sai remarked calmly, “Tenzo-san…what are you doing in here?”

“I came by to inspect this place for traps or paranormal phenomena.” Tenzo explained, keeping the flashlight level with his chin, “But it turned out to be really boring and dirty.”

“How did you get in?” Sai approached the wall to locate a light switch.

“This window.” Tenzo pulled back a drape and temporarily blinded the youngsters, “Whoops.”

After regaining vision, Sai flipped the overhead lights on. Sato squinted his eyes and regarded Tenzo. For once, the man was in regular Jounin attire and had not concealed his face with a mask.

“You’re my uncle’s friend.” Sato determined, “He talks about you sometimes…and says that you can act unnecessarily creepy to get attention…”

Tenzo illuminated his face again, “Is that what Kakashi says about me?”

Tama nudged her fiancée worriedly when Sai took a seat on the dusty floor, as if he accepted the condition of the apartment, “I don’t think he…has anything. Or knows that he should have furniture in here…”

“Yeah…” The Hatake turned back to the veteran, “Is Sai going to be okay here? It looks like this is all the stuff he has.”

“It is.” Tenzo confirmed, “We’re still working on getting him what he needs. I can bring a futon over in a short while.”

“That isn’t a good idea.” Tama disagreed, pulling Sai back up to his feet, “At least, not until this place is cleaned.”

Sato leapt at the notion, “Would you like us to-?”

“No, that’s quite alright.” Tenzo smiled warmly, “Sai is my responsibility for now. Once he’s settled in here I expect he can look forward to getting to know his neighbors.”

“Of course,” The Hatake brushed a gray spot of grit from Sai’s sleeve, “Are you sure you don’t want us to help?”

“We will clean. You two have all of that food with you.” Sai replied, noting the groceries they had, “It’s better if you do something with it.”

“Then you clean…and we’ll bring you something to eat in a little while.” Tama offered, “To welcome you to the community, Sai.”

Sai stared at the benevolent duo as if they were too good to be true.
Sato broke the silence, “So were you like a missionary? Or a starving artist?” He added as Tama gently slapped her forehead, “You don’t have possessions so maybe…”

“He was part of the Foundation, prior to joining the standard forces.” Tenzo rubbed his chin in thought, “I guess you could say…the shinobi equivalent of a starving artist, indeed. They have nothing in Root.”

“But he’s also literally an artist.” Sato pointed to the easel.

“And starving.” Sai added.

Tama bowed respectfully before walking back to the door, “Then I’ll get started. It was a pleasure to meet you both!” She added, “Are you coming, Sato?”

In a whisper, Sato explained to his new acquaintances, “She makes me work and wear the apron. Tama just stirs and measures stuff.”

With a chipper goodbye he hurried after the young woman to begin dinner. Sai and Tenzo stood for a minute after that, glancing around to assess how much needed to be swept and mopped. They would have to go acquire those domestic trappings, though.

While following Tenzo to the nearest supplier of cleaning products, Sai asked earnestly, “If the man wears the apron…this means that the woman is dominant, no?”

“I don’t want to teach you things based only on generalities, but…” Tenzo shut the door with a shrug, “That could be the case with those two.”
Before leaving Konoha, Neji had been thoughtful enough to pick up a map and trace a route to the Funabashi seaport. He went over it with Lee and Tenten before they set out, although it was evident that Neji was still not in the highest of spirits.

Tenten kept pace with Lee as they traveled, thinking it would behoove them to let Neji race ahead and get some crankiness out of his system. Throughout the day she conversed with Lee about Wong Leung’s training methods, and how his grandfather had warmed up to Neji.

“Grandpa was hopeful that you would join us for practice too, when you can.” Lee informed her.

Tenten smiled nervously, “You think he’ll go easier on me?”

“Probably not. Grandpa will just make you focus on different areas.” He figured, “And he will also try to make you speak Hanwen more often.”

“Those are two opportunities for me to disappoint him. You’ve got to convince him to let me do something I’m good at, Lee.”

“I should not. He will ask you to cook all the time, if I did.”

“On second thought…training and speaking is fine.”

That night they made camp far in the west of the Fire Country, rotating shifts for sleep, and by mid-morning the next day they had arrived in Funabashi. It was a small sea port at the southern tip of the Land of Hot Water, just a few steps outside of the Fire Country. The city was bustling with tourists and migrant workers. It was a chore to squeeze through a crowd of people towards a tavern to get something to eat.

After a meal, the team went to work pasting fliers to every surface and handing them out to curious natives. It eliminated half of the stack, but Tsunade had wanted the whole seasonal labor route covered, and so they dutifully stopped in the harbor to find the next ship to the Marsh Country. They spoke with a ticket agent near the main dock to learn when they could set sail.

“The Marsh Country? Aren’t you all dressed a little too nice to do mining work over there?” The man at the booth inquired, “That boat is leaving in 40 minutes, but they’ve already got plenty of laborers on board.”

“We’re shinobi. The Hokage sent us to advertise for the upcoming Chunin Exam.” Tenten corrected.

“Oh! How about that? Heh, well in that case there’s space for you.” The agent accepted their vouchers and then asked, “Do you mind if I get one of those fliers too?”

Tenten handed over a pamphlet before they received boarding passes.

The team continued down a long pier towards a large, commercial ship. A few bored attendants ushered them along, “Move along…greeter’s up there…” And they crossed the gangplank of the ship to enter the vessel.

A beefy man in an ill-fitting shirt accepted their boarding passes and spoke in a rumble, “Welcome aboard the Fog Skipper. I’m Chief Mate Ondo.” He glanced over the tickets, “Your cabin is on level one, starboard side, number 24. For any labor-coordination questions please see our rep on the forward deck. Have a nice trip.” Ondo handed Lee an odd-looking cabin key.

Lee thanked the mate with a sunny smile before they ventured down the corridor to locate their room. It was easy enough to find, but after poking their heads inside they discovered the size was not satisfactory.

“It’s a closet.” Tenten frowned in aggravation, “Is this all those vouchers were good for?” She pushed the door in roughly and it struck the wall with a hollow bang.

Neji and Lee followed her within, gazing in disappointment at the space that was barely two meters across, and not much deeper. Two, cramped bunks were available for sleeping; otherwise there were no furniture or amenities to speak of. The exposed pipes of the ceiling had hangers and carabiners attached, from which previous occupants had probably hung their belongings. At the “far” side of the room, a porthole let in sunshine.

“I did not expect luxury, but…” Lee was turning in a very small circle, “This room does not even look to be…up to code.”

“We can dispute this with the Chief Mate, later.” Neji offered, “This ship will not reach the Marsh Country for another three days.”

“Three. Days.” Tenten breathed quietly, “And two nights.” She smiled bitterly and then hung her travel bag from a carabiner, “Might as well try to advertise before we go insane.”

She and her teammates sighed collectively in agreement.

They stored their possessions in the teeny space and Lee locked the door behind them. The ship lurched with a metal creak as it slowly pulled away from shore. The team followed stairs to the top deck for some fresh air. Luckily, many of the laborers aboard were up and about, and Tenten estimated they had plenty of fliers for them.

Because Neji was not sociable enough to sell anything, he stayed by Lee’s side as he hyped up the Chunin Exam. The passengers took a shine to Lee and accepted the pamphlets, asking if he could demonstrate any ninja skills. On the other side of the deck, Tenten was also trying to encourage another group of travelers.

“The Hokage expects this Exam to be a huge success, and no one will want to miss the Final Rounds…” Tenten put on a coy smile, hoping they would buy it, “I’ll be participating, as a matter of fact.”

“Will you now, little lady?” A gap-toothed man chortled, “I’d happily go to that tournament just to see you in action.”

His friends roared with laughter and chimed in:

“This is one lovely kunoichi!”

“Do you have other skills?”

“Can you show us?”

“Yeah, can you show us below deck? Ha ha!” Many of them hollered excitedly at the idea, clearly not the type of viewers Tenten wanted to invite to Konoha, “Well come on now! Give us a demonstration!”

“Sure.” Her wry smile twisted into an expression of scorching fury as she leapt, unfurling a tool-summoning scroll. Tenten unleashed an aesthetically pleasing array of pointed weapons, and made sure to miss all of the screaming laborers (though she did not want to.) Knives thacked down into the wood of the deck in a perfect arrangement of the Hidden Leaf symbol; then she landed and shut the scroll, eyeing them all with disapproval, “Still want to watch?”

The dozen men who had earlier harassed her were hushed into daunted quiet. Cowed, they nodded and held out their hands for advertisements. Tenten passed fliers out before stomping back to her teammates.

“Was your display necessary?” Neji asked her curiously, “They’re terrified.”

“None of these men are going to take me seriously. They think I’m some…floozy plaything.” She ground out her explanation, “It’s not that I want to have a man standing next to me just so they’ll listen to a word I say…” Tenten took a breath, “But do you mind walking around with me, Neji?”

He said simply, “I don’t.” He perfectly understood her indignation. This was not his type of crowd either.

They parted with Lee, who seemed to have connected with the friendliest sailors, and they roamed about the perimeter of the deck to speak to laborers. In between the pockets of somewhat-interested sailors, and those willing to distribute fliers, Neji conversed with Tenten in the hope it would dispel her outrage.

“Consider that none of these men have probably ever seen a kunoichi before,” He reminded her, “And of those that have, probably not one of your caliber.”

Tenten’s eyebrows raised an increment, “Well…they could only get a superficial impression of me. So do you mean…how I look?”

“I mean that you are top quality in every respect.” Neji assured her.

She smiled authentically, “Thank you. I appreciate that.”

And after that she seethed no more, and was generally more pleasant to each person they talked to. While Neji had not been entirely aware of it, Tenten had become buoyant after hearing his appraisal. As they came around the bend at the stern of the ship, Tenten stole glances of her reflection in the glass of promenade windows. ‘He said I’m top quality. Hm! I guess this new look even appeals to him.’ She shut her eyes blissfully as they came to a linear stretch of deck again, ‘Neji can say that about me even when we haven’t been around each other in months!’

“Over there.” Neji’s voice snapped her out of her thoughts.

Tenten followed him to where the Chief Mate was leaned against crates, smoking a cigarette. Neji addressed the subject of their cabin not being ‘of adequate size,’ and asked if there was a possibility of switching to something suitable. The man, Ondo, merely shook his head and exhaled a line of smoke, “Sorry. I couldn’t upgrade you even if I wanted to. Some families are traveling with us and they booked up all of the superior rooms.”

“I see.” Neji turned his head and stewed over their plight. He handed the mate a pamphlet, “Here. You might enjoy attending the Final Rounds of the Chunin Exam.”

“Oh.” Ondo balanced the cigarette on his lip and examined the flier, “Thanks, bud. I’d love to go to this thing. They said the last one was nuts.”

“It was. Hopefully, it’ll be more controlled chaos this time.” Tenten predicted, “Thanks.”

They carried on around the ship for a few hours, occasionally handing out leaflets, and sailing farther and farther out to sea. By the time they came to the bow of the ship again, they discovered Lee had been more or less adopted by the passengers he spoke with. Lee was seated on a bench, surrounded by his new pals.

Neji was rightly surprised to see a stranger pressing a bag of ice to Lee’s head. He and Tenten approached their teammate, asking if something was the matter.

“I think I have…” Lee paused, pressing his fingers to his lips for a moment, “Ugh…I could be…motion sick.”

Tenten took the spot on the bench beside her friend, “You’re seasick, Lee?” She took the bag of ice from a bystander and replaced it on the inside of Lee’s wrists, “This might help more. It’s a temporary cure, though…”

Neji looked out over the deck, seeing that the shoreline had completely disappeared from view. Without land as a point of reference, it would be difficult for Lee’s sense of balance to recover from the, admittedly, rough waves the ship was bouncing on. It would get worse the further out they went.

They opted to keep him above deck for as long as possible. The laborers who made the journey overseas often recommended that Lee get as much fresh air as he could. A ship hand volunteered to look for Dramamine tablets to settle Lee’s stomach, but cautioned, “We never have enough of that stuff…”

The congregation of passengers grew inquisitive and asked about the team of shinobi they were sailing with. The afternoon turned to night as they spoke, fascinated with Lee and his companions. If they had not been convinced before of watching the Chunin Exam finals, they were now compelled to do so and find out how this team would fare. They kept Lee stable even without medication, and the ship’s cook brought out several kettles of stew to feed passengers.

Later, the sky above was so clear that, as Tenten leaned on the railing of the deck, she could make out the wisped arm of a spiral galaxy. A pool of stars stretched endlessly in all directions overhead. She was tempted to stare at them all night long, but from across the deck Neji gave her a shout. They were going below deck for rest. She peeled herself away from the relaxing night breeze and sky.

The cabin was still as disappointing as it had been earlier that day. The teammates stood in silence for a moment, deliberating on the bunks that were suspended out from the wall.

“I prefer the bottom bunk.” Tenten announced, “But at this point, I’ll take anywhere I can fit.”

“We can squeeze in together.” Lee offered, “Or the floor does not seem too uncomfortable to me.”

“No, Lee. There’s room for two.”

They sidled in and attempted to negotiate space. As Neji snapped the light of the cabin off, Lee and Tenten found enough room so long as they lay pin-straight. Neji hauled himself up to the top bunk, settling on his stomach. With his chin balanced on his folded arms, Neji looked out the porthole and watched light play over the crests of dark waves. Silence prevailed in the room for a while.

Gentle breathing could be heard from below. Neji could not tell how much time had passed, but he knew that his friends had fallen asleep. There was nothing remotely upsetting about the fact that they were nestled together, but it pricked at him. He would have liked if Tenten had chosen the top bunk instead. With him. ‘It doesn’t matter.’ Neji reminded himself. Lee wasn’t like that. He and Tenten had been bosom buddies since childhood. What was more, Lee was quite aware of Neji’s feelings. He would never seek to trifle with them in any way, Neji expected.

With a soft grunt, he finally shut his eyes and drifted off.

Hours later, the panicky sound of shuffling woke Neji. He initially believed that an intruder might have entered the room, but in the pitch dark of the cabin he witnessed Lee and Tenten rushing out. His next thought purported a fire, yet there were no flames or smoke. Neji willed himself back to consciousness and slipped down from the bed to move to the doorway. Peering out into the dim corridor of the ship, he could see Lee bent over a mopping pail, hurling his guts out. Tenten stood beside him and held his shoulders, concerned that he would topple head-first into the mess.

Neji then noted how unsteady on his feet he was. The ship was swaying as if tipped, like a teeter-totter. The water must have gotten rougher during the night. Without a doubt it had churned Lee up.

Tenten walked Lee back to the room and handed him off to Neji. “Hold him for a second.”

The young woman bolted off into the dark of the corridor. Lee was a gurgling, incoherent mess. Neji repositioned him on the edge of the bottom bunk, quickly scanning him over with the Byakugan. He was hopeful that if he prodded at a few trusty pressure points that Lee’s nausea would pass. That would help avoid a night of constant vomiting on a rocking boat. Neji began methodically poking spots along his teammate’s spine without consulting with him. Tenten returned swiftly with a second bucket, placing it below Lee’s face just in time for him to puke again.

She and Neji exchanged distraught glances.

“I sent a Shadow Clone to clean out that other pail at the facilities closet. It should be here soon.” Tenten’s voice was barely above a whisper, “It was all I could think to do.”

“Better than what I thought to do.” Neji yielded.

“If he didn’t wake me first, he probably would have gotten me…”

Neji continued poking Lee’s back and apologized quietly as his friend began retching again. Minutes later, the clone returned with an empty bucket and handed it off to Tenten, exchanging it for the full pail. The Shadow Clone made a face of disgust before marching out of the cabin.

Lee accepted the pail and made a sound that conveyed great humiliation. Tenten unlatched the window and swung it open, intending to air out the room. The sea outside was choppy, by the sound of it, tossing the vessel around. Neji concluded his frantic, impromptu, care for Lee and stood back. Lee’s voice was a soft rasp as his thanked his friends. He handed off the bucket and curled up on the bottom bunk again. He was asleep moments later.

“I don’t know…how that’s possible.” Tenten whispered, “I thought he’d be up all night?”

“I might’ve helped it. Maybe some equilibrium was restored…but I can’t tell you that it will last. It probably won’t.”

“That’s fine, Neji. He’s asleep.” Tenten turned to the door with the bucket, “It’s a start.”

She departed again in the dark. Since no smell had lingered in the cabin, Neji shut the porthole for some quiet. He looked over Lee one last time before returning to the top bunk. After what seemed like ages, Tenten returned with two clean buckets, and shut the door behind her. She set them down... beside Lee’s bed and then stopped. She exhaled in slight annoyance before she moved to climb up.

Taking the hint, Neji quickly shifted over for her. Tenten collapsed beside him, exhausted.

“Thanks.” She muttered.

“You reacted so quickly I thought we were under attack.”

“No. I just didn’t want Lee to hurl all over me. That made me move fast.”

Neji smiled to himself, “I might not have been so fortunate.”

“Heh. If you’re feeling lucky you can sleep down there.”

“I prefer this.” He spoke to her back as she was turned away.

“Me too.” She agreed quietly.

And when they fell asleep again they were not woken for the rest of the night.

The next morning was peaceful. Sounds in the room were muted save for the ocean swells bashing against the ship’s side.

With his eyes still shut, lying flat on his back, Neji began to stir to the feeling of lips meeting his own. A hand brushed over his chest and down his arm, stopping at his fingertips. The hand that caressed him moved down with intention. He wanted to cry at the top of his voice with pleasure. Consciousness shot through him in a confusing bolt as Neji realized that he had been dreaming. It was a rather graphic dream, as he recalled while sitting up.

‘Shameful.’ He thought reproachfully. It was not often that he had sexual dreams so straightforward and vivid. Having them while sleeping beside the girl he desired, particularly while she was unaware, was extremely ill-advised. Neji groaned tiredly, upright, and rubbed at his eyes with one hand.

He was alone in the room. Lee and Tenten had already ventured out.

After gathering his bearings, Neji also left the cabin and ascended above deck. His teammates had been making idle chit-chat with the friendly passengers from yesterday. Breakfast was served, and Tenten glanced over to the top of the stairwell just as he stepped through. She waved him over, “I was just going to wake you! Did you sleep alright, Neji?”

“Fine, all things considered.”

“I apologize for my woeful illness last night!” Lee added, unable to resist a formal bow of atonement, “Never in my life would I ever want my friends to see something like that…”

“Think nothing of it, Lee.” Neji told him.

“Let’s get something to eat. The line is forming over there.” Tenten shepherded the men along to a serving table. She then showed Neji a small paper packet, “Look! One of Lee’s laborer pals spoke to the captain and got this! There’s enough Dramamine here to get Lee to the Marsh Country and back. He won’t be sick anymore.”

Neji nodded and to thought himself, ‘Thank the gods.’
They ate well and kept Lee properly medicated. He shed his sea sickness completely and was effective at rallying more interest in the Chunin Exam that day. Many passengers asked for mock battles and eventually, with Lee’s insistence, his teammates consented to showing off a little.

The men who had antagonized Tenten the day before found it wise to apologize for their behavior. Her fearsome display from yesterday paled in comparison to the hail of weaponry she tossed at her teammates. While Tenten appeared to have forgiven the inappropriate laborers, Neji kept a wary eye out for them. The first impression they had made had condemned them in Neji’s book.

Early in the afternoon, Lee discovered another passenger who was fluent in Hanwen. This rapidly associated another potential speaker in their conversation, namely Tenten. She was very hesitant, ‘I haven’t practiced in so long. I don’t really care now since Mom and Dad can’t speak it to me.’

Neji stood by cluelessly, occasionally glancing over at fishermen who had cast rods over the edge of the ship.

Lee urged his teammate, Tenten! I know you can do it! Say anything. Anything you remember!

No. She managed.

Very good! Lee was thrilled.

She understands what we’re saying. The laborer remarked.

Tenten always understands. Lee added to his teammate, Please; do not be reluctant to speak.

I…have terrible pronunciation. And your Grandpa is always correcting me. Tenten huffed, I want to wind up.

I think you mean “give up.” The passenger decoded her jumbling of words.

She turned to Lee, See? I’m awful.

Lee rubbed his chin thoughtfully, You know, that was really quite good.

That’s enough. It’s dinnertime.

You mean lunchtime. Lee understood.

“Yeah, that’s what I meant!” Tenten folded her arms and moved up in the line, “I don’t want to embarrass myself anymore.”

“You speak it better than my mother.” The laborer complimented, “And she grew up with it. I think she just disregards grammar entirely.”

Tenten shrugged off the praise and accepted food from servers. She and her teammates ate together before continuing to push the advertisement agenda, locating some of the families that were traveling aboard. They skipped over a family with very small children who they deemed, “too young” to appreciate the theme of spectating final rounds.

Lee’s suffering had quelled, and so he explored the ship and challenged mates to push-up contests. After handily winning every competition and earning more respect, Lee tried his hand at fishing and rope knot-work. By the afternoon, the old captain of the ship had even let him take the helm briefly. Lee’s steering was sub-par and he quickly had to surrender control to the skipper.

Neji and Tenten passed the day by not exerting themselves. Passengers came and went to visit them, but while alone that afternoon they found plenty to talk about. The only subject Neji did not bring up was his uncomfortable meeting with Hyuga clan elders.

It did not come as a great surprise to either of them that they had disobeyed the Hokage’s no-contact order while it had been in place. Tenten did find it intriguing that Neji had managed to befriend the ANBU agent who had to intercept him multiple times. Tenzo had also stopped her once.

“He was a nice guy, now that you mention it.” Tenten acknowledged.

“I saw you bring food to Lee’s home one night.”

She took a moment to compose herself, feeling cornered, “I did. His grandfather really appreciated it…” Tenten noted the expectant expression on Neji’s face, “I wanted to do the same for you, really.”

“What stopped you?”

“I don’t know.” Slightly defensive, she replied, “What stopped you?”

“Incarceration.” Neji supplied simply, “I hardly left your side.”

She shook her head and smiled, “I had a feeling you were around.” Tenten sighed, “I don’t know if I could have gotten away with finding you, Neji. Not the way you did. The Hokage said it was for our own good.”

“Perhaps it was.” He agreed, “And I hope it never happens again.”

Lee rounded the bend of the ship with a handful of mooring line, and demanded that they try their hand at tying knots. Tenten felt the connection with Neji snap and slip away after the interruption. What a rare opportunity it had been.

‘Maybe this won’t be the last time we can talk like this.’

She and Neji humored their teammate as he tried to keep them engaged for the long journey. And that is just what he did for several hours; Lee as his youthful, energized-self once again.

That night, they made sure that Lee was medicated as they sailed through rough waters again. He retired to sleep after feeling drowsy. Tenten and Neji had stayed above deck for as long as possible before the ship passed beneath a storm cloud. They went below to avoid the rain.

With a yawn, Tenten stretched and turned down a separate corridor, “You go ahead, Neji. I’m stopping at the ladies room first.”

Neji continued through the starboard bulkhead towards their minuscule cabin. Before entering, he used his Blood Limit out of habit to confirm Tenten’s position. She had just entered the restroom. She was not the only one in that stretch of the ship, unfortunately. Neji backed out of the room while watching two passengers he mentally blacklisted. They were nosing around a corner, poised to slink down the hallway after the young woman they had earlier antagonized.

Neji was blessedly quick and discreet, moving to the annex that connected with the hall he had his eyes on. As soon as the two oafs crossed at the doorway, they were struck with an Air Palm blast and squashed against the composite wall. They fell in a heap, their heads terrifically rattled.

He returned to the cabin with a sense of vindication. Neji knew they were scoundrels. And on the off chance he had mistakenly attacked two men who had no vile intentions whatsoever, they still would have no idea what happened or who to blame.

Lee was sound asleep in the room. Neji made himself comfortable on the top bunk and shut his eyes.
While it was sometimes a round-the-clock job, he was always glad to look after his teammates. The pattering of rain was a dull hum.

The light of the room was snapped off and Tenten sealed the cabin. Neji could hear her tiptoe over to Lee and assess his health. He then remained motionless as Tenten returned to the top bunk and took the spot beside him. She poked his shoulder. Neji opened an eye in response.

“There was a loud bang when I was in the bathroom.” She said quietly, “Can you see if the boat is sinking?”

He restrained a smirk, “This ship is not sinking.”

“You didn’t even check.”

“You’re safe.” Neji assured her.

“You mean we’re safe.” Tenten rolled over and folded an arm beneath her head. She had not noticed the unconscious men in the adjacent bulkhead, but Neji felt that was for the best.

She spoke again while facing away from him, “Do you care that I’m up here? I know that Lee will sleep better tonight.”

“I have no objection to it if you don’t.” He answered. In the past he had shared sleeping spaces with her before, granted there had not been nearly so much overlap of their persons.

“I think this is better.” Tenten determined, “Get your rest for tomorrow. It’s going to be a busy day.”

He replied with a low sound in the affirmative and made a true attempt to fall asleep. His thoughts ran rampant even as he held still. Neji found it remarkable that Tenten was able to drift off after a time.

‘This isn’t the same as it was.’ Neji tried to be honest with himself, ‘I’m distractible. Talkative. Informal.’ Whether he meant to or not, he was showing a new side of himself to Tenten. She, by and large, seemed as professional as she had always been. That did not include the moments in which Tenten would lock eyes with him without flinching, or discuss the intimate details of her life that she had otherwise been tight-lipped about in previous years.

He had never conceptualized before, in his young life, just how good it felt to get to know her. Neji had taken those learning opportunities for granted in the past. But he had become greedy for time with her. Moreover, it was totally unreasonable that he wanted to wake Tenten up so he could ask more questions during the night. Only after his mind had exhausted the trails of possibility, meandering along the banks of desire and doubt, did he finally fall asleep.

Sometime before dawn, Lee had begun snoring on his bunk.

The grating noise had pulled Neji out of dreams, ‘Hopefully Lee isn’t smothering himself down there…’ It sounded as if Lee had rolled face-down; his nostrils doing battle with the mattress for oxygen.

Neji’s other senses detected something was amiss. He did not need to open his eyes to decipher that the warm length of body pressed into his front was Tenten. The tickle of hair shaken loose from a bun, below his nose, still carried a hint of fragrance to it. He was immediately aware that his arms had formed a secure loop around the young woman’s mid-section, inadvertently spooning with her while they had been asleep. None the wiser, Tenten had draped an arm over his while slumbering serenely.
A filament in his waking mind suggested panic and reasserting propriety. Standard. It doubled back; alleging that moving suddenly could wake her, and as such was not a sensible way to react. Neji made no effort to shift or awaken. Tenten was deeply asleep.

What had he expected from sharing such a confined space? That they would repel as like poles of a magnet do? It would be futile to convince himself that he did not want be close to her. For the entire trip, Neji had done little else than be near Tenten or keep her attention. He had not purposefully tried to hold her, but Neji could not ignore the symphony in every cell that spoke of how right it was.

His uncooperative, early-morning brain veered off course, unable to concentrate on rectifying the situation. It only acknowledged the pleasantness that was felt. It prioritized the feeling…and then slept again.

Time passed, the sun crept up, and Tenten woke gradually from what was a surprisingly decent rest. She opened her eyes and tilted her head, noticing the extreme, unintentional close-up of Neji’s face. 'Oh.’ His sleeping-expression was about the calmest she had ever seen him, ‘Here’s looking at ya, Hyuga Neji.’ She slowly extricated and unwound herself from the curve of his body, unalarmed. It was nearly a shame to leave such a warm and divine space. Neji did not stir as she inched away carefully.

‘This has been a small victory.’ Tenten thought to herself. She had anticipated something like it could happen, and she was indeed very pleased that it did. ‘Better move it before he wakes up and freaks out...’ They would be making land soon and Tenten had little interest in canoodling the morning away. ‘But tomorrow looks good. If we can hold it together for the last leg of this mission... maybe I owe it to myself to finally say something to him. I don’t know what I’m waiting for anymore.’

Tenten stepped out of the cabin and proceeded down the hall system towards the restroom. A mirror would be beneficial. ‘I need to fix my hair. It feels like a mullet right now!’ On the way, she passed by two men asleep on the floor of the corridor, and beside them was a suspicious dent in the wall.

By mid-morning, the ship had pulled into the brackish inlet of the Marsh Country’s great harbor. Prior to disembarking, Chief Mate Ondo bade them farewell, cautioning that the next vessel available for a voyage to the mainland was five days away, at best. The team of Leaf ninja filed off of the Fog Skipper alongside the seasonal mine workers. The laborers flashed their Chunin Exam fliers as they passed, promising that they would attend.

Lee’s sea-legs were not very well suited for solid ground, which he discovered while walking down the long wharf with his teammates. They stopped here and there to post advertisements, noticing that townsfolk were virtually non-existent in the small, bayside settlement. A handful of residents traversed the docks and sand paths between quaint, wooden houses. After the last flier was glued to a power pole, the team regrouped to determine their next course of action.

“Are you feeling okay, Lee?” Tenten asked, “That trip did a number on you. I can’t figure out how you could be sick and still introduce yourself to every person on that ship.”

“Youth is on my side! I would not have prevailed otherwise.” He determined, “Though I feel it would be wise for us to take a break soon.”

There was a seaside inn just up the hill from the harbor. When they stopped for lunch, Neji acquainted himself with the map while Lee and Tenten ate. Lee was still slightly ‘green around the gills’ while seated, and Tenten advised him to take small sips of the broth they had been served. A waitress came by their table to give Tenten the dumplings she had ordered.
“There you go! Don’t mind my asking, but do you happen to be Leaf ninja? Chichiya-sama says they’re the best allies this country’s got.” The waitress asked, wiping her hands on her apron.

“We are.” Tenten said after thanking her, “This place is quite far from home, though.”

“If you’re going out into the woods, just be careful. You see odd ninja popping in and out of there. The rumor is that something is buried deep under the mountain and everyone wants to know what it is.” The woman whispered, and then giggled at the thought, “Well, you have a nice day now!”

Tenten found the information redundant. Lee let out a soft groan of misery before deciding he was feeling slightly better. Tenten encouraged him to have a little more, and then pushed some food in front of Neji as well, “You’ve got to eat something before we go, Neji. It sure won’t ruin your figure.”

He eyed her with annoyance from behind the map, “Ha ha.” He said dryly, but he accepted one of the rolls anyway.

After lunch, Lee vomited violently behind the building in a weed-filled garden. He felt better straightaway and was prepared to go on, fully adjusted to land again. The time came to begin searching for the suspicious shinobi Tsunade had spoken of. Neji directed his team to a forest path that extended into the wilderness. It was teeming with wood frogs and reptiles that filled the forest with song. They eventually took to the canopy to travel more quickly.

As the day progressed they penetrated further into the climbing jungle of the Marsh Country. The emergent layer above them was so tangled with leaves and branches that most daylight was blocked, making it difficult to tell what time it was. Neji stopped occasionally to allow them a drink of water or to reaffirm their route with the map.

Sometimes a strange silence would come over the woods, as if it was all one giant organism holding its breath. In those strange and unnerving beats Lee would bring up a story from their Academy days. Though it seemed to help distract Tenten from their eerie surroundings it did not help Neji. He was too aware of their environment, as always. His face was pale with anticipation.

“There might be other ninja in this area.” The Hyuga eventually warned, “I can’t see any now, but…” He trailed off, hesitating to say more.

“What’s that matter, Neji?” Tenten knew the last bit of information would be crucial.

“I will not see far in this forest. It’s extremely dense and compacted, so it takes longer to work out the details.” Neji admitted, “When we’re out in the open again it will be safer.”

“Understood.” Lee said. They grasped that Neji had his limitations. The team of wayward ninja continued on, heading north.

They skirted a tree that was being guarded by an unusually large snake and rushed through the treetops. Small animals in the bramble watched the three soar by, confusing them for birds of prey as their silhouettes passed beneath the leafy ceiling. The chirping suddenly died off again and the tension came back. They stopped and Neji motioned for them to be still. He used his Byakugan, staring into the silence. He saw nothing and rested his eyes after a bit.

Tenten took a drink from her canteen. Neji, for form’s sake, used his Byakugan again. He could see a lone drop of water tracing down from the kunoichi’s chin to her smooth neck. His thoughts strayed as he stared at her from behind, and then looked away abruptly when a horrendous snapping noise reverberated through the jungle. Tenten and Lee froze, unable to pinpoint where the rolling crash was coming from. Neji nearly noticed too late.

An enormous tree, rotted with age, was careening down, smashing all in its path. Tenten watched Neji spring, executing a perfect rotation in the air that diverted the falling behemoth away from his team. It was such a gallant move she wanted to kiss him for it, except that the giant crushed other trees in the understory, sweeping their footholds out from under them.

They cried out in unison.

Tenten tumbled and landed on a more secure branch. Lee fell close by on his back. She drew Hok and slashed debris that might have impaled her stunned teammate. Neji had fallen a long way down, and without much thought, Tenten and Lee followed voluntarily.

There were a few vines that slowed their descent, but eventually snapped under their weight. They fell a good way into a bog, but the landing was soft. The forest shrieked and moaned after the ancient tree had finally settled a distance off. Tenten did not bother sheathing her sword. She, along with Neji and Lee were covered head to toe with thick, pasty mud. Tenten held Hok above her head and waded to shore with her teammates as they groaned in aggravation.

“Was that not a fantastic adventure?” Lee laughed, sloughing off grime from his outfit into the underbrush.

Tenten relaxed a fraction once the danger had passed. Neji came up to her and she thought about actually kissing him for his quick-thinking, even though his face was streaked so that the mud looked like war paint. Instead, the Hyuga removed a leech that had latched onto her exposed shoulder. “You’re not hurt are you?” He asked a bit sullenly.

“No. How about you?” She thought she should return the gesture. She wiped some of the mire from his cheek. He closed his eyes at the contact, which she found oddly adorable. Like a child acquiescing to a mother’s need to fuss.

He and Lee, predictably, were fine. Neji directed them to the nearest source of running water, though it did slightly remove them from their previous course. They entered the shallow rapids, which were warm enough, and scrubbed off. Ignoring each other’s nakedness, they also washed out their clothing and supplies, waiting in their underwear on the rocky bank for their belongings to dry. It wasted an hour or so of daylight, but Neji did not have many complaints since it had been a close thing.

They were only able to travel a bit farther in the evening hours. Thankfully, they arrived outside the thick of the jungle and were on the spine of the mountain, where bare-faced rock and crags were abundant. Birds called out haunting melodies in the sunset. They made camp in the hollow of a stone ledge, and the fire was comforting as the temperature dropped rapidly outside the incubation of the forest. Tenten was first to sleep. She had not eaten much and let Lee have her dinner since there had been no food in his stomach anyway. Neji watched her from across the fire pit, his eyes steady but tempted with sleep.

He caught Lee chuckling lightly.

“What is so entertaining?” Neji demanded before taking a sip of his tea.

“Nothing. I think you see as clearly as I do just how beautiful Tenten is when she is asleep.” Lee replied thoughtfully. Neji snorted at the comment, not trying to deny it, and finished his tea. Neji made Lee take the first watch so he could rest. The two of them alternated for the rest of the night, deciding not to wake Tenten.
In the morning they made much better time without the forest’s perils to slow them. Tenten had developed a small limp, since she had apparently been jostled while evading the falling tree the day before. Their pace slowed, but not by much, since she was determined not to be a burden.

“You could never be a burden.” Lee promised her, “Truly, Neji and I would not know what to do without you, Tenten!”

It was around the time they were thinking about stopping for a mid-day meal that Neji halted them again. With his Byakugan focused on a sheltered valley below, he reported, “There are shinobi here. They haven’t sensed us.”

They crept slowly over the crest of the hill, low against the boulders, remaining unseen while they spied. When they were close enough Neji started with the more detailed findings, “A variety of nukenin, from what I can tell. It looks as though they’re just talking. Laughing, some of them. They are friendly with each other.”

“Can you see where they might hail from?” Lee asked in a whisper.

Neji strained for glimpses of hitai-ate, “Grass, Moon…several from Sound. There’s Mist and Cloud with them too, and a few others bear no mark.”

“How many altogether?” Tenten checked.

“Seventeen visible.” Neji answered, “There could be more that aren’t present. We should keep looking.”

They moved on, taking the long way around to stay undetected. During a pause, Tenten tried rest her ankle properly, and while they had lunch they discussed what had been found. “What do you suppose they are doing out here?” Lee wondered, “It is not as if this country is too involved with ninja squabbles.”

“Sometimes they join out of a common purpose, like the Akatsuki.” Tenten pointed out, “Maybe this faction has a collective goal in mind? That woman back at the inn said there’s something under these mountains.”

“I doubt they’d be able to find it unless someone has a bloodline talent like the Byakugan.” Neji interjected, “And whatever it is they can only achieve it when their numbers are solid. It may be potentially harmful to the Marsh Country.”

“Or any country.” Lee agreed.

“We’ll have to do more recon to find out.” Tenten added, “That means getting in closer to actually hear about their plans. What do you think, Neji?”

“We’ll shadow them today and get in close tomorrow.” He decided.

“What if we have an opportunity today?” Lee asked.

“Then we take it.” Neji said.

They finished eating and Tenten felt well enough to go with them. The team stalked down into the valley, cautious, depending solely on Neji’s blood limit to avoid exposure. When they were close enough they saw about nine of the seventeen ninja they had detected earlier. It became strikingly clear how some of them were ill. At least three were displaying flu-like symptoms. One of the women handed out something that could have been medicine to the ailing shinobi, speaking in an encouraging tone. “We’ll get there.” She kept telling them.

“How did they get sick?” Lee whispered.

Neji shook his head. It was unclear how it happened, but he also did not want to talk. Not this close to the enemy; there was too much of a risk. There was a man among them who had provisions out and was feeding their companions. He turned to the medic and asked when the others would be back.

“They’re scouting the area so it could be a few hours. Keshin said he thought he smelled outsiders close by. They could be lost, or they could be meddlers.” The woman told him, “Without Keshin’s group here we’re still weak, so I hope they don’t find us first.”

Tenten smirked at the irony. Neji withdrew silently and his teammates followed. This was clearly the more vulnerable half of the congregation, and they did not want to start trouble with them. “The other group most likely has the information we want anyway.” Neji reasoned.

They followed the valley up to the backbone of the mountain pass. Neji scanned the area before finally spotting the other half of the nukenin faction. Tenten and Lee followed him northeast through a patchwork of conifers, and after coming out on the other side they stopped. The mountain looked to have been carved into by an ancient river, and along the canyon a line of ninja could be seen tracing the lip of the gorge.

The Leaf ninja kept low and moved slowly. Neji did not let them proceed until they were downwind. They had to bear in mind that the ninja named ‘Keshin’ had a heightened sense of smell that they would be wise to avoid.

“I have a bad feeling about this.” Tenten confessed, “Maybe we should wait for them to go back to their camp before we listen in?”

“If we do that they will have a greater advantage of numbers. There are less of them now.” Neji told her.

Lee agreed with Neji. They stopped at a ledge that overlooked the path the nukenin faction was following. Laid flat against the limestone, the teammates listened and watched without moving a muscle. The group below stopped for a drink of water and, sure enough, they began to chat.

“I hate it out here.” One of them said, smacking his arm, “I’m always getting eaten up by mosquitoes.”

A man with a long face and squinted eyes looked at him, “Quit your whining, Isso. We’re close to the tomb now. Once we locate it we can get back to the Demon Country and report it.”

“That isn’t stopping the bugs from biting.” Isso muttered.

“Demon Country?” Tenten mouthed to Neji. He figured it was enough information for one sitting, but before they could steal away the breeze shifted. The Hyuga cringed as the wind abruptly changed direction in the valley and gave away their scents.

A hulking man with a long, black mane leapt up. His eyes were wide with alarm. Neji made Tenten and Lee keep still.

“What’s wrong, Keshin?” One of his companions asked.
“Here. I smell people here.” He looked up to the ledge, narrowing his eyes, “Sneaks…”

He hurled a kunai with an exploding tag attached at the ledge, and Team Gai scattered before it detonated. It was a free-for-all with nukenin filing off and attacking whichever of the three they pleased. Neji dove ahead, knocking five of them down to the next steppe of the plateau with an exorbitant rotation. His teammates descended on the stragglers. It was one of their most reliable strategies: divide and conquer.

Hok was singing as it hacked off one of the nukenin’s arms, and he flopped over in defeat. Lee dislocated another’s elbow with a knee-kick, followed by a dizzying uppercut that left the poor fellow sliding down the gravel slope, unconscious. Keshin had gone straight for Neji, almost immediately recognizing him as the leader. He had some bear-like quality about him, no doubt from clan breeding. His punches wrecked boulders into dust, and the Hyuga danced away from him, waiting for an opening.

The other five scaled the slope and joined the fray again. Tenten and a pair of shadow clones raked two of them apart with Dance of the Crescent Moon. They were hurt badly enough to crawl over to their teammate with the missing arm.

Lee was fighting three-on-one, and forced his adversaries away after being stabbed with several senbon, “Konoha Senpuu!” They were knocked back, and one of them skidded off the slope and over the side of the gorge with a yelp.

Tenten sent one of her Kage Bunshin to help Lee fight off the last two, while she and her other duplicate rushed to help Neji.

The Bear-ninja was struck with several Jyukken strikes but resisted them dutifully. Neji could only keep Keshin and his devastating hammer-punches away with his rotation. His opponent’s speed was worrisome and Neji was quickly worn down. Tenten’s clone sliced at Keshin with her the replication of her jian. She skimmed his right flank, opening a superficial gash, while the man spun and clawed apart the clone. Neji attacked his exposed back but Keshin turned again, using pent-up momentum to send the smaller ninja tumbling.

With no traction on the unsteady gravel to slow him, Neji took a hard spill off of the gorge’s edge.

Tenten opted for aggressive tactics in that moment. She summoned the Hiyumi from its scroll, and with a screech of fury, fired point-blank at Keshin. He leapt aside nimbly, expecting an average arrow, but was blown back by the resulting explosion. Keshin rushed to escape, realizing he could not defend himself against the ranged attack. He crossed a thin log bridge across the chasm, and just after reaching the other side, the dead tree was blown to bits by another fire-arrow. Tenten stabbed the Hiyumi into the soil, letting it stand, and rushed to Neji.

For a moment she lost sight of him and panicked, calling Neji’s name; then he responded. She found him hanging onto a gnarled root jutting out from the side of the cliff. It was a good meter drop from the ledge. “Hang on a second!” She called to him. Tenten dug into the shifty earth with her knees, and then shimmied on her stomach off the side of the gorge. Her arms extended to their maximum length, and she reached for the Hyuga.

Neji took one of her hands and kept the other secured around the root. “If I let go I’ll pull you down.” He informed her, his voice oddly calm.

“So?” She snapped angrily, “Give me your damn hand, Neji!”

He stared at her with his pearly eyes, weighing the chances, and then reached for her. The earth crumbled, falling off in unstable shards, and Tenten grunted with effort as she fought to stay up. Neji’s weight was pulling her forward, but before her leverage was lost she planted her aching feet with chakra. “Yeah…you got a bit heavy…” She puffed, struggling to breathe.

Neji tried to pull himself up independently by latching onto the cliffside with his feet, but his chakra only tore up the fragile soil. “No, don’t do that!” Tenten panted, “Just wait…I’ll…get you…”

“You won’t.” He told her.

She shook her head, infuriated, “I’m gonna punch you right in your pretty face if you don’t can it, Hyuga!”

There was a sudden, white-hot pain in her shoulder. Tenten looked up, and across the far side of the canyon could see Keshin hurling kunai. His accuracy was not nearly as quailing as hers, but he had nicked her shoulder and the blood began running down her arm. She watched the red stream reach her hand and begin to make her grip on Neji’s wrist slip. “Aw….shit.” She exhaled harshly.

“Tenten.” There was some sort of desperation in Neji’s voice that she was not familiar with, “Tenten!”

She could see he was watching Keshin with his Byakugan. Then she saw the fuuma shuriken being launched through the air with its menacing, hooked blades.

This time it was going to do more than nick her shoulder. She looked down at Neji, entirely focused. “It’s alright.” She told him.

He shouted again, his warning a millisecond in length. He then recognized the resoluteness of Tenten’s hold, and stabbed her with twin Jyukken strikes. She screamed and reeled back, her hands slipping, and Neji plummeted from view. The fuuma shuriken missed by mere inches.

Tenten could only hear the sound of rushing blood in her head in ears, frantic, understanding perfectly what had happened in the span of the last two seconds. She picked up the Hiyumi again and Keshin was running for the hills on the opposite bank of the ravine. She let several shots loose, tearing up the forest on the other side and lighting it ablaze. Her wrath had yet to be unleashed on the bear-fool.

She let another low-chakra arrow ring out towards Lee, where it burst on his remaining foe. The nukenin hobbled away, patting at his burning clothes and shrieking. She un-summoned the bow, crying pathetically, and ran to Lee.

“Neji…” It was the only word that could pass her lips before she turned back. Tenten considered rappelling down the side of the gorge, but could not ignore the danger of the unstable rock. She was still bleeding while she ran along the edge, looking for a place to descend into the canyon safely. Lee caught her, his arms barring her from going any farther.

“You are hurt!” He informed her, looking at her shoulder, “Please just take a moment, Tenten.”

“Neji fell…” She sucked in a shuddering breath, “He wouldn’t let me hold on…he forced me…” Lee rubbed a soothing circle on her back, shushing her.

“We cannot despair now. We need to be mindful if we are going to get him back.” Lee told her matter-of-factly. When she got a grip he released her, “I am going to check the west end of the ravine and you can check the east. We will meet back here in an hour or less, alright?”

She nodded anxiously, restraining her despair. They separated and Tenten flew on her legs, fear giving them speed she had not known before. As she scanned the cliffside for possible footholds her thoughts whirled, ‘Why did he do that? I was going to...he just made me let go...’ It was proof that he cared, surely, but enough to let his life blink out? After all she had worked for? ‘You don’t have the luxury to walk out of my life anymore!’

Shock and relief hit her when she spotted a sure-footed slope descending into the canyon. Tenten slid down, carefully holding herself at an angle, and once at the bottom began her search in slight hysterics.

Oh how she wished they had brought radios with them! Usually they did, and Gai had bought new ones for the team; but this time they had gone without. There was a chance that the nukenin they were following might be carrying them too. It would be a disaster if they were able to pick up one of their channels. Tsunade would not appreciate such an obvious blunder. Still, Tenten would have killed to have had open communications with her team right then.

She followed the stream west, back towards where she had lost Neji. It was a fairly deep stretch of water, so he may have had a more fortunate landing than she was expecting. Tenten ran faster, hating how her eyes could only take in so much at once. Then she began to think more rationally. She knew that it was a strain for her chakra reserves, but she created four Shadow Clones and made them scatter across the canyon floor. One of them almost instantly discovered a body, but it was that of a fallen nukenin. Her remaining three clones kept searching.

Lee was nowhere in sight. He probably had not found a way down yet. Heaven permitting, they would be able to get out of the ravine without Keshin showing up to take advantage of their turmoil. Tenten felt the wound on her shoulder beginning to clot. She stopped only for a moment, washing off the dried blood on her arm with the creek’s crystal-clear water. Abruptly, after what seemed like an endless search, a transmission from a dissolved bunshin connected with her brain.

Neji had been found. Her other clones disappeared with a pop, and Tenten quickly descended on the scene, her heart beating a hole through her chest.

He was half-in, half-out of the stream. Maybe Neji had landed in it, but it did not look like he had. He was bent at an odd angle and was not moving. Tenten kneeled beside him, touching him gently. He was freezing. She knew the water was cold, and with evening upon them she would have to get a fire going soon. What she would not do for a radio…

Neji’s breathing was deep and slow. Tenten pulled the boy onto her back, as she had done on several other occasions, and then located the nearest route back out of the canyon. He was heavy against her shoulders while she climbed: completely inert with no signs of stirring. ‘Did he break any bones from that fall?’ She would have to check. He was not bleeding, which was good. ‘What happened to you?’

Back at the top, Lee, by some stroke of luck, ran into her. “Thank goodness you found him...” He said tiredly.

The sun was setting in a grim pink-violet wash, worsening their plight. “We need to make a fire. Neji’s freezing and I think he might become hypothermic…” She need not repeat herself. Lee was off snatching up bramble and kindling as they crossed back to a more sheltered area, beyond the reach of the nukenin faction.

After finding a decidedly safe nook in the side of a precipice, Lee struck up a fire in the cave and helped Tenten strip Neji down. He was starting to shiver, and Tenten only had one blanket to try and dry him off with. The Hyuga’s pale skin was lined with a few bruises, but he was not seriously injured. She willed herself to be professional around the young man’s ivory body. Lee snapped her out of her momentary struggle.

“Where is his bag?” Lee asked with a frown.

“Oh…I guess he must’ve lost it when he fell.” Tenten ground her knuckles against her temple in frustration, “I was down there too and I could’ve looked for it!”

“It’s alright. We will just have to use our supplies to support him.” Lee recommended, “It would be far too dangerous to go back and look after…all of that.”

“We weren’t even supposed to engage…” She recalled glumly.

“We did not have a choice. If we did not fight back they would have killed us.” Lee justified it, as he knew Neji would have.

“Yeah. This just…it’s going to make it a lot more difficult getting back home with the information.” Tenten sighed, sitting back. She watched Lee arrange Neji so that he was closer to the fire. He was not shaking as much.

After making sure the Hyuga was resting easy they tended to their own wounds. Lee only had minor puncture spots from where senbon had stuck into his arms. He helped Tenten disinfect the cut on her shoulder and bandage it. They ate little, for neither of them were terribly hungry. They reflected on what was lost.

Neji’s map was gone, which meant they would have to find their way back with Lee’s compass. His rations were also lost, as were medical supplies, his cowl, and spare weapons. It was a heavy blow, and when he woke he would probably demand to fetch his things himself as repentance. They could flee back to the coast without the provisions in a day or two; hopefully with some speed they could avoid the remaining nukenin as well. It would be hard to last that long without enough food for everyone, though.

Tenten fidgeted, trying to get comfortable in her seat against the cave wall. Outside darkness had fallen, and the night creatures had begun their concert. After a long while, Neji’s clothes were dry. She asked Lee to help her dress Neji again. He seemed oddly light in their arms when they handled him. Tenten had run her hand unthinkingly over the crown of his head and found something worrying.

“His head…” She observed, tucking aside some strands of hair to find a small amount of drying blood.

Lee’s prominent eyebrows rose only with slight concern, “If Neji knocked his head during that fall it would explain why he was unconscious for this long.”

Tenten pressed her lips briefly against the Hyuga’s temple. ‘Feel better.’ She thought, ‘I’m sorry that happened. I won’t ever drop you again like that…ever.’

Lee seemed touched by her loving behavior. He had fleetingly believed that when she had returned to the team, after training under Hayate, that she had lost interest in Neji. Of course she hadn’t, after all, Neji was too much a part of who she was. ‘I just hope he realizes one day how much Tenten sacrifices for him…’

Tenten told Lee to get some sleep, “I’ll wake you when it’s time for your watch.”
He thanked her and then rolled over on his mat. Lee was positioned parallel to the cave entrance, so that if there was danger he would be the first to encounter it. Tenten thought it very noble of him. ‘Noble. Yes…that’s the perfect word for Lee.’ She smiled to herself. Her friend drifted off into a deep sleep, and his soft snores began to lull her.

Tenten distracted from the dull night hours by touching Neji. For the most part, she ran her palm over the smooth contours of his arm, from his shoulder down to his wrist, then knuckles. Again, she found it silly how she expressed her affection only when he was asleep. Tenten used to think it was so gutless. Now she realized she did it because she needed the tender contact. How many years had it been since she had last seen her loved ones?

‘It feels like a long time. Not since before Mom and Dad…went out that day and never came back.’ Tenten thought, feeling the automatic tightness of grief in her throat. Thinking about how they had been murdered hurt so intensely that she seldom did it.

She glanced at the digital lanyard-watch that was perched on top of her travel bag. Close to one o’clock in the morning. Tenten crossed over to Lee and gently shook him awake. He sat up without a word and took over the vigil. Tenten laid down on her own mat, quickly falling into a dreamless sleep.

In the morning Tenten woke with stiff muscles. She stretched for a few moments before looking over at Lee. He must have fallen asleep during his last shift. Since they had not encountered any peril during the night, such an oversight was forgivable. Across from Lee, Neji lay quietly behind the smoldering embers. Tenten called to Lee and he rose immediately.

“Did Neji wake at all during the night?” She asked him.

“No. Neji did not budge.” Lee told her, rolling his shoulders sleepily, “I am sure he will wake when he smells breakfast, though.” He smiled thoughtfully.

Tenten agreed with the idea. Since the cave provided good cover they stayed in it, revitalizing the fire. Lee put water on to boil for tea. Tenten took out some of the rolls from her bag, scraping the seeds off of one of the buns; just how Neji preferred them. After that she crawled over to him, pulling the blanket away from the dozer. She patted his shoulder gently and said, “Time for you to wake up.”

He did not stir.

Tenten bent down, closer to his ear, “Neji…”

A shift...slight but evident. She spoke again, “Wake up now, Neji…”

He was very groggy. His gypsum eyes opened a crack beneath thick lashes. Tenten smiled; this was the very one she so deeply adored. Neji opened his mouth to speak but only managed a moan. He sat up a little. Lee greeted him with a friendly wave from where he was boiling water, “Good morning! Would you care for some tea, Neji?”

“What?” He muttered, still unintelligible.

“Tea, Neji.” Tenten repeated for him, “It’s time for breakfast.”

Neji was silent for an unnaturally long moment. He sat up fully, first observing his attire as if he had expected to be naked. Neither of his friends understood, especially when he reached up and touched his hair, seeming stupefied by its length.

“Um…are you okay?” Tenten asked softly.

“I…” He looked at her, “I don’t know you.”

Tenten blinked. She examined his eyes and facial expression, and read that he was not lying. He, in a state like this, did not have the capacity to lie.

“You…don’t know me?” Tenten asked, her voice shaking, “What about him?” She pointed to Lee across the fire.

Neji shook his head. Lee dropped the cup he was holding as if he had been stung.

Tenten inhaled a steadying breath, rapidly analyzing the situation. ‘He banged his head…now he’s super-muddled. Let’s try to figure out what he does know.’

“Okay…let’s start from the beginning. We’re ninja from the Hidden Leaf Village, and we’re all a team.” Tenten said, asking, “Is that ringing any bells?”

“No.”

“We were on a mission and you were hurt…you hit your head so you don’t remember…” She gulped, “Us…I’m Tenten, your best friend. That’s Lee over there, he’s your pal too.”

Neji looked between them, seeming to believe the information fully. He was like a new student in a Social Studies class. “You called me Neji.” He said perceptively, “That’s my name.”

“Alright.” He said, as if accepting it to be the only truth available, “You’re both…taking care of me because I was hurt…”

“We’re happy to.” Tenten told him, “But it looks like your memory is…in the gutter. You need to tell me if there’s anything you do remember, like…” She thought on it, “How long have you been training as a ninja?”

“I’m a ninja.” He repeated, dumbfounded, “I know what they are, but…I can’t be one. I don’t even know how to fight.”

His disarming honesty was ripping Tenten’s confidence to shreds.

“Actually, you’re arguably the best fighter on this team, with your Jyukken and all…” She answered hastily, “But okay, we’ll work on that… What else? I hope you still have basics. Writing? Math? Navigation?”

“I think that’s…” He sounded so embarrassed, “All there.”

“I guess if you don’t remember being a ninja you can’t perform supplementary jutsu either…” She mumbled, “Well…you definitely understand what’s going on…so it looks like you’ve just lost… your defense mechanisms. Hopefully your brain will kick in soon and you’ll be back on track.”

Neji nodded, the state of his condition dawning on his anxious face, “I’m sorry…you seem like you really care about me. I apologize if I’m inconveniencing you.”
Tenten could not hide her amazement at his humiliation. Neji was such a proud person that she did not think he was capable of it. Then another thought struck her, “Do you…remember your family, Neji? Or where you live?”

His eyes searched along the floor of the cave. “No.” He said, ashamed, “Is that why I can’t remember anything else?”

“Maybe. I mean, your crazy family is the main reason you became a shinobi.” Tenten reasoned, “The Hyuga clan caused you a lot of pain when you were younger. Do you recall what they did?”

He did not answer. He didn’t have to.

“Your father was confined to the Branch Family, and your cousins had many more opportunities than you did because they were born into the Main House.” She hoped the explanation would jog a memory, “You’ve always hated the segregation. You were resentful for a long time…”

“I don’t feel…angry. Not right now.” He admitted.

“Your father’s dead.” She added

“He is?” His eyes widened momentarily. Then Neji realized he did not know his father so it didn’t hurt at all, “Oh…”

Lee handed him a cup of tea and the roll Tenten had prepared for him. “Eat this, Neji. Tenten and I are going to have a small chat.” He said. Neji thanked him and watched as his two friends exited the cave to speak privately

“I cannot believe this is happening…” Lee said sadly, “It is as if…the chalkboard of his mind has been partially erased!

“I know. And Lee, did you hear all that? He doesn’t know anything about the Leaf Village or the Hyuga clan…” Tenten told him, “It’s like he’s a normal person now. Balanced, you know?”

“That is still bad for us as a whole. How are we going to get out of this country while we need to defend him? He cannot fight, Tenten!” Lee wailed despairingly, “He might get killed if those nukenin come across us again…”

“Well, we’ll just have to write up the information that’s not on the chalkboard anymore.” Tenten proposed, trying to keep her cool, “We need to train him on our way out of here, that’s the only way this is going to work. You start him on basic Taijutsu. I’ll handle chakra control and ninjutsu…maybe weapons, if I trust him with them.” She sighed, “I know some Jyukken from Hikune but I’ll be a cruddy teacher.”

“Do not worry about that right now.” Lee said, “What is most important is that Neji is protected. We may have to avoid open areas since there are still many of the rogues left.” He paused, his face lit with hope, “Maybe his memory will come back when we start training him?”

“I’m counting on it.” Tenten agreed.

They returned to the cave and Neji had finished eating. What was subtly surprising was that he had spread out their own food for them and poured them tea. “I really appreciate you two looking out for me.” He said, looking at them, “Tenten and Lee.”

Tenten felt her heart break a little. He was almost like a child. It was almost like they had become his parents. What was most unusual about it was that Neji was making his best effort to please them, because he must have realized already how much he had already disappointed them.

A short while later they decided they would remain at the cave for one more day. Any longer than that and they ran the risk of being discovered by Keshin. Tenten took Neji out of the shelter into the sunlight, and he seemed instantly refreshed, just like his clan namesake foretold.

She spearheaded the effort with friendly conversation, simultaneously fishing for what Neji still understood. Tenten discerned that Neji had a complete concept of what ninja were in society, a rough idea of jutsu; he recalled his birthdate and age, a place he assumed was home from memory: a foggy description of the Leaf village. He even had a lone recollection, for some reason, of a cutting wind that shot from his hands and hacked all of the trees behind his house. It puzzled him immensely.

‘Not the worst place to start.’ Tenten figured, ‘He isn’t running on empty.’

“Okay. I’m going to start teaching you how to be a ninja again.” She laughed at the absurdity of the idea for a moment, and then continued, “I’m your chakra-sensei. Lee is going to be your combat-sensei. You’ll need both of us to get your abilities back so make sure you pay careful attention.”

“Alright.”

“Don’t be upset if you don’t get this stuff right away, okay?”

“I won’t get upset.”

“Well then…” Tenten scratched her cheek, “Before we start do you have any questions?”

“Yes.”

She smiled, “Go ahead.”

“You said we were all friends. It isn’t as if I can’t tell, but I want to know…” He trailed off for a moment, “Has it been that way all our lives?”

“That’s pretty deep.” Tenten pointed out.

“I feel…some things are left over.” Neji said, making a circular gesture beside his head, “I’ve known you all along.”

“No. No we met in the Academy. That’s where trainees first begin to learn; maybe that’s why you associated that with this. It’s because you’re starting to learn again.” She felt bad about it, “Maybe we met once or twice when we were little, but we were just classmates really.”

“We became friends when we were put on the same team, then?” Neji asked.

“No. You kind of looked down on us.” Tenten sighed, “You were uptight back then. Lee usually just trained with Gai-sensei because you were such a bully. You weren’t so bad with me, though.”

“I’m a horrible person.”

“Of course you aren’t!” Tenten snapped, “You just wanted to know how things were back then. You aren’t that way now. You have fun with us and joke around…infrequently. You, um, well…you…”
Neji was silent.

“We are friends. Please don’t doubt it. We’d do anything for you.” Tenten promised, “So what if it’s kind of recent? Things worked out.”

“Was I cruel to you?”

“No.”

“I think you’re lying.”

She gulped, “You could be harsh sometimes, but I think that’s what made me stronger. You pushed us to our edge.”

Neji sat on a rock that was ringed with laurel. He seemed very down on himself, and Tenten suspected that Neji might have sensed his usual behavior: how he normally reacted to things, versus how he was reacting to them now. Not a good way to start training.

“Hey…” She sat down beside him, patting his back, “What’s wrong? Don’t be sad. You’ve done a lot of good things too. Your cousins really look up to you.”

“My cousins?”

“Yes. Hinata-chan and Hanabi.” She grinned, “They call you their big brother.”

“I… I know a face.” Neji frowned in concentration, “Her hair used to be short…but it isn’t anymore.”

Tenten smiled, “That’s Hinata.” She added optimistically, “Your clan also has a ton of respect for you, since you’re going to be head of the family someday.”

“A clan leader?” He was mystified, “Me?”

“Yes. You’ve given them hope. When you become leader you’re going to abolish the Branch House and give them equality.” Tenten could only report the sunny side of it, as she was aware of the political chokehold his elders maintained. If she had mentioned how there was only a snowball’s chance in hell of Neji accomplishing his goal, he might have broken into sobs.

“We have lots of friends too. Fujita is also one of your cousins. He looks up to you too.” Tenten tried to pile on the positives, “All of the other Genin also respect you. You’re almost always chosen to lead teams on missions by the Hokage because you’re so wise and reliable.” ‘Laying it on a little thick, ain’t ya?’ Tenten ignored the small voice in her head.

“The Hokage?” He asked.

“The leader of the Hidden Leaf Village.” Tenten clarified, “She’s one of the Legendary Three, Tsunade-sama. My mother and I have always looked up to her.”

“Your mother.” Neji looked at her curiously, “Can you tell me about your family, since you seem to know so much about mine?”

“Oh. Well she’s…” Her eyes lowered, “She was amazing. Pretty famous for a kunoichi herself! She was a singer.”

“Can you sing?”

“No.” She laughed, “But I don’t think I’ve ever tried.”
Neji looked at her expectantly.

“I’m not going to sing for you. That’s ridiculous.” Tenten told him, “My mother. She and my dad were in the ANBU together. They were definitely soul-mates, so they had the fairytale life, I guess you could say.” She smiled to herself, “When I think about it…it makes me so jealous.”

“Jealous?”

“I want what they had. I want to be that happy but I…can’t.” Tenten rubbed at her bandaged shoulder, “Some things just don’t work out, you know, Neji?” She chuckled, “Gosh. I’ve never talked to you about this sort of stuff, not even back when you could remember.”

“Why not?”

“Why not?” She repeated, frowning.

“You said you were my best friend.” He reminded her, “You can tell me anything.”

“I just…I didn’t want to tell you certain things so that you wouldn’t get upset.” Tenten admitted, “You had lots of worries back then. They were always stressing you out, so all I could do was try and help you overcome all the nonsense.”

“I have no worries now.” He told her, smiling genuinely. It melted her heart.

‘He’s just so different. ’ Tenten thought to herself in astonishment, ‘He’s free. Without all the bullshit weighing him down…he’s happy.’ That amazed and alarmed her

“Have I met your parents?” He asked curiously.

“No, they’re dead.” Tenten said quickly, “In fact, this team is painfully deprived of parentage. Your parents are gone too, and Lee’s…well, I think something happened to them. They might’ve left him but I’m not sure. He lives with his grandpa who’s the nicest guy ever.”

“Are you sad?” Neji asked her.

Tenten did not answer.

“Am I sad?” He couldn’t remember if he had been.

“I think you were…you just never said so.” Tenten told him.

“And Lee?”

“I think he doesn’t remember his parents. Why would he want to? He’s such a good person all he knows is how to find joy.” Tenten smiled at the thought, “I don’t think Lee gets sad unless something bad happens to one of us.”

“Like me?”

“Like you, Neji.”

“Is he sad that…I’m like this?” He sounded worried.

“A little. We’re worried that something might happen to you, because we might not be able to…protect you. We’ll do our best, we always do…” Tenten glanced at the sky, “You mean a lot to us. We’re not going to give up on you.”
“Thank you.” He said. It was heartfelt.

“That’s enough for now. We can catch up later.” Tenten decided, standing up and dusting off her pants, “You are now going to get the crash-course in chakra.”

Neji stood up and asked, “What’s first?”

Neji trying to contact his chakra after severe head trauma and memory loss was not as far-fetched as she had previously expected. He was so familiar with his chakra, it seemed that it was constantly ready to be put to use, just lurking beneath the surface. He discovered it swiftly, but he did not understand it. He picked up concepts easily but with a cautious air she could not place.

It was almost like putting someone who was accustomed to riding a regular bike on one with training wheels. Of course there would be some awkwardness there, not because they didn’t know how to ride, but because there was a different mechanic; a different balance was involved. Neji was on a new bicycle now, as far as memory and shinobi education went. He would adjust, but Tenten feared that she would not.

Just watching him try to run up and leap into trees unnerved her. It was so basic! So elementary! It terrified her to see him reduced to such a novice level. She encouraged him, though, hiding her mounting anxiety.

“I know you can focus your chakra already, but it’s too much. That’s why you can’t make it all the way.” Tenten told him, already a few hours into their training. “Keep it balanced! Too little and you’ll fall again; too much and you’ll snap off the tree like you did just now…”

Neji was on the ground, dusting his pants off. “Maybe you should show me one more time.” He requested.

Tenten stepped up to a tree, setting foot on it, and walked the rest of the way up with poise. At the top she called down to him, “See how I didn’t get a running start? You don’t need one.”

“Ah. Well, you have very good control.” He conceded, looking up at her perch.

“I have to. With the way I summon I can’t afford to waste my chakra, otherwise my techniques would be thrown out of whack.” She hopped down, light as a snowflake.

“You talked about summoning. What is that exactly?” Neji asked, not acquainted with it.

She laughed, “Just don’t move.”

Tenten gave him a very brief demonstration of Soushouryu, missing him deliberately but he still flinched. When the rain of weaponry ended, he was stunned.

“How could you be so strong?” He felt even more inadequate.

“That wasn’t even my best, and trust me, you…” She poked his chest pointedly, “You pretty much embody strong. You and Lee. I’ve gotten better because I had extra training. You are naturally talented.”

“Pfft.” He didn’t believe it.

“No seriously! They call you a prodigy.”

“Then why is this so difficult?” Neji muttered, walking up to the tree and running his hand over the bark, “I want to know why…why I know what to do but I can’t do it.”

“Don’t push yourself too hard, Neji.” She put a hand on his shoulder, “We should take a break soon.”

He made a soft sound of agreement. To her surprise, he rushed at the tree again, adjusting so that he finally stuck to the tree. Neji ran up and did not stop. He nearly took a spill after his first leap, but he boldly tried to prove himself. He flew through the canopy into the next tree, and then the next, trying to mimic her agility. ‘But he’s going to break his neck while doing it…’

“Whoa! Slow down there partner!” Tenten chased after him, catching him by the scruff his shirt before he slipped, “You know, if you fall from up here it’s going to hurt a lot more…”

“I’m sorry.” Neji followed her down to the ground. After he had shown fair proficiency with scaling surfaces with chakra, she later introduced him to water-walking. This was more of a challenge.

Tenten settled for practicing on an unmoving pond on the roof of the precipice. Lee eventually came out to watch. He stood by silently as Tenten explained the concept and then demonstrated. She stood out at the center of the pool and told Neji to give it a try.

The Hyuga took one step on the water’s surface, gingerly, and then another. He did not say it, but with Lee watching he felt like he was being judged. His chakra wavered and he fell knee-deep in the fishpond. Tenten calmly told him to try again. Neji waded out and repeated the process. At one point Lee went over to stand beside Tenten on the water, flabbergasting Neji.

“What is wrong?” Lee asked.

“I thought you said Lee couldn’t use his chakra.” Neji directed the statement to Tenten.

“I didn’t mean he couldn’t in this way.” She corrected herself.

“I have control over my chakra, but only to a point. It is true that my chakra coils are underdeveloped.” Lee admitted, “But that has never stopped me from anything.”

“What does that mean?” Neji asked.

“It means he was born different.” Tenten replied succinctly.

Lee walked off, explaining on the way resignedly, “I cannot use Genjutsu or ninjutsu.” He looked at Neji, “So I will teach you Taijutsu.”

Once Lee had gone Tenten told Neji that it was a sensitive subject on their team. He wanted to know why, as usual.

“Because Lee is a bit self-conscious about it. He almost didn’t become a ninja.” Tenten told him, “He takes his combat skills very seriously, so when you start training with him you better watch yourself.” She smiled, “You better watch yourself with me too, later on…”

“I don’t see why he would feel ashamed. He still has his abilities.” Neji pointed out, “I have none of mine.”

Tenten did not want him to continue sulking. “Get over here already. Are you going to walk on water or not?”

Neji tried again. And again.
At lunch time Lee and Tenten told Neji all about Gai-sensei. He was their esteemed, ever-enthused, perpetually youthful mentor who taught them tough-love and perseverance. Lee embellished on a few details, but for the most part Tenten had good things to say as well.

“I can’t wait to meet him.” Neji said, “Once we go home.”

Tenten held her sides as she pealed with laughter. Lee restrained a chuckle as well. Neji had never been a particular fan of Gai-sensei. It would be a strange meeting indeed if the new Neji actually could identify with their master, finally. Neji did not get the joke, of course.

They ate lightly and Neji asked if there was a problem.

“We lost your supplies, so we’ll have to find a way to get more food soon.” Tenten told him.

“I can hunt.” Lee volunteered. Tenten was hesitant with the idea, but acknowledged how it was one of their only options.

When they had finished with lunch Tenten resumed training. She wanted Neji to be able to keep up with them as they traversed the mountainside and its geographical perils. He had tree-jumping and water-walking under his belt, but his speed was not what it used to be. She taught him how to focus chakra in his legs to move faster, and also how to improve his reaction time. It took him a while to catch on.

By sunset his speed was much improved, and he could avoid (with some trepidation) the knives that Tenten hurled at him. He made it through the day with a few minor bumps and scrapes, which Tenten glanced over when they called it quits. “You’ll live.” She told him, slapping his arm encouragingly where there happened to be a greenish bruise. He groaned, a sign that her training was working.

They sat around a glowing fire, eating the last of the dumplings Tenten had. They told Neji about their likes and dislikes, which he listened to very intently.

“I own a forge.” Tenten told him, “I make most of my own weapons. And most of your weapons too, believe it or not.” She looked at Lee and Neji, “My mother also rubbed off her belief in astrology on me.”

“I didn’t take you for a spiritual type.” Neji told her.

“We are all like that, I think.” Lee informed him, “In different ways. You used to be very concerned with fate, Neji.”

“I was?”

“Yes, but Naruto helped you overcome that, er, phase.” Tenten grinned, “That guy is infectiously empowering.”

“Who is Naruto?”

Lee and Tenten exchanged a glance. It took a very long time, perhaps an hour and a half, to explain or at least outline who their boisterous friend was, moreover what he was (a delinquent/hardhead/inspiration) to Neji. Even then, their descriptions did not truly do justice, but when they were through they had Neji pretty convinced that Naruto was the future Hokage.

“I would like to meet Naruto.” Neji decided.
In the morning they set out. Neji at first had trouble keeping up with his team as they soared through the treetops, though he had no choice but to struggle along with their pace. On the wing, they explained the mission’s current status.

“We got rid of five of the enemy ninja, but...there’s at least ten more out there who are really going to be pissed.” Tenten updated him, “One of them is a specialized tracker who has a sharp sense of smell. He’s the reason they discovered us...and why you were hurt.”

“What happens if we run into them again?” Neji spoke the dreaded question.

Tenten remained silent, fearing the outcome.

“Do not worry about that.” Lee told him.

They traveled a good distance, circumventing the jungle and bogs for higher ground. It was a bit chilly on the mountain trail. Lee stopped, looking at his compass. “We are going the right way, but it will take much longer to reach the coast.” He said.

“They’ll probably try to cut us off before the harbor, since that’s the only way out of here...” Tenten growled at the thought. Another confrontation was imminent, it was only a matter of time.

There was a river that cascaded down the valley, and they decided to make the area their temporary camp. It was quite a distance from where they had last seen the enemy, and secluded behind the dense jungle. The nukenin were most likely trying to avoid such an area in favor of open road and coastline. In order to save on their rations, they went down to the water’s edge to prospect for food.

Neji hated the idea of not being useful, so he took everyone’s canteens to refill them. Lee waded into the stream in search of fish. Watching from the shore, Tenten was very impressed with his aptness for fishing. With his bare hands, Lee snatched up trout and tossed them ashore. ‘We’re going to eat well today!’ Tenten thought. Lee finished and went to a thicket where their belongings were kept, ready to cook his catch over the fire. Tenten helped him for a while, but became nervous when Neji did not return promptly.

She set out to look for him and found him pacing the water’s surface. “You scared me.” She told him, “You were gone for too long.”

“I’m sorry. I just wanted to practice.” He apologized.

Tenten assured him it was perfectly fine, and instructed him to take the water back to camp and let Lee know that they were going train. When Neji returned, she drilled him more on his basic chakra control. He could not get enough of it, which pleased her. Neji was more than eager to learn and seek new challenges. Tenten did not have an easy time supplying them.

They stopped occasionally to eat, but for the entirety of the day they trained and talked. Lee sometimes came by to join them, but he had found an enjoyable pastime in napping on the sun-warmed stones near the river’s edge.

During a break Neji expressed discomfort. “What is it?” Tenten asked.

“This hair...how did I live with it?” Neji complained, running his hand over the back of his neck that was slick with sweat, “It’s miserable.”

“Oh, I wouldn’t say that. Your hair’s beautiful. It’s the traditional style of your family.” Tenten informed him, “Don’t complain. It got lopped off once and took forever to grow back.”
Neji drew out a kunai from his leg holster, “That’s preferable…”

Tenten quickly snatched the knife out of his hand, “What? You’re going to cut your hair off and regret it when you remember everything! Then you’ll blame me for not stopping you…” She eyed his holsters, “I should take your weapons away from you.”

“Because you think I’ll use them?”

“No, because I’m afraid you’ll try to use them for something dumb.” Tenten corrected, “You might do something rash, Neji. Like now, for instance.” She sighed after a moment, “But if those nukenin turn up I’d rather that you were armed, so…wield responsibly, please.”

Neji nodded, smiling.

“Do you want to put your hair up?” Tenten suggested.

“Yes.”

She scooted to sit behind him on the sandy shore, and undid the hair tie that was set too low. Tenten gathered the silky tresses from the base of his neck and upward, pulling his hair into a high ponytail, and secured it with the tie. He turned around to face her and thanked her, “That’s better.”

Tenten blinked stupidly. With his hair back his defined cheek bones were no longer shadowed, and his widow’s peak showed slightly behind his hitai-ate. It was a sort of regality that went beyond his normal, pale, aristocratic look.

“You’re handsome.” Tenten told him, biting her tongue immediately afterwards.

She stood up and tried to pass off the comment as something trivial. Neji stood up, shaking off sand. “You think so?” He inquired.

Tenten noted that she did not really need to agonize over her behavior because Neji lacked any set etiquette for her, currently. “Yeah, you’ve always had that…look.” She replied carefully, “It charms people.”

“Does it charm you?”

She smiled and admitted, “You in general delight me.”

He looked uncommonly happy with the answer. Tenten avoided the subject after that and had him continue with his exercises. By nightfall they regrouped, and since they were all too exhausted to stay up and chat they went to sleep early. They did not watch in shifts, fairly confident the enemy was out of reach.

In the middle of the night Tenten woke, mouth dry, and groped around for her canteen. She found it, but not without tapping Neji who was resting beside her. He seemed terribly jostled by the contact. She sat up, bottle in hand, whispering comfortingly, “Calm down, it’s just me.”

“Oh.” He rolled over to meet her eyes. He did not look so well.

“Are you okay?” Tenten felt his forehead but it was cool.

“I’m fine.” Neji said; his voice was not tired.

She took a few satisfying gulps of water. “I’m sorry if I startled you. Usually you don’t scare that easy.” She pointed out.
“It’s okay.” He rolled over, “Goodnight.”

Tenten laid back again, “Goodnight, Neji.”

For two more days they trained, periodically moving further down into the valley. The river began to trickle into a stream during their travels, making water-walking practice less practical. That was when Tenten decided Neji should begin training with Lee.

“He’s a great teacher. Very patient.” She assured the Hyuga. She would know, after all; Lee had taught her several battering techniques in the past.

“You’ve been a good sensei.” Neji told her, “Can we still train sometimes?”

“Whenever you like.” Tenten pledged.

In an open field Lee began his lessons. Tenten had to stop watching after the first fifteen minutes because Lee employed the same tough-love training that Gai did. Neji got plenty of tough-love all over his face before he figured out how to block properly. During that time Tenten tried her hand at hunting.

Using one of her standard bows, she set out into the forest in search of prey. She shot a wild boar squarely between the ears from her treetop lookout. By noon she had the beast plucked, skinned and turning over a fire, slathered with a hodge-podge of herbs. The lovely smell beckoned her teammates back to camp in a tree hollow. To her shock they approved of the taste, although she was convinced she had made an abomination of the meat. They might have been just hungry enough to ignore the flavor altogether. After trying it she found it was quite agreeable.

By evening, Neji was sporting several new bruises and welts. She treated his educative wounds with some soothing salve that Hinata had given her before they left. Tenten also made sure to credit Neji’s cousin with the ointment, “Make sure you thank her when we get home.”

“I will.” He promised.

Lee was very proud of Neji, “You did superbly for the first day, and I look forward to tomorrow’s progress!” His compliments didn’t count for much. Neji had learned plenty, but could not necessarily apply it when Lee was always twenty steps ahead of him.

As the evening hastened, Lee reported to Tenten that Neji seemed to have muscle memory to guide him. “He remembered how to do a prayer-crouch all on his own, from when my grandfather taught us.” Lee cupped his chin in puzzlement, “But he hates that exercise.”

“Maybe that’s why it stuck with him?” Tenten postulated.

That night, Tenten woke after hearing something. The register was within her light-sleeper range. She sat up, sensing no danger (probably just a mouse) and took a habitual sip of water. She glanced over to Neji and realized he was in the exact same posture as the night before. His breathing was not restful. He was awake.

“Neji.” She was concerned.

He turned, and with a sigh sat up. Tenten did as well. Her brows furrowed with worry, “What’s wrong? Are you in pain? Lee did give you a typical beating…”

“No.” Neji closed his eyes, “It’s not Lee.”
“Are you feeling well?”

“As well as I can.”

She caught on, “You…aren’t sleeping. When was the last time you slept, Neji?”

He looked uncomfortable with discussing it. After a moment he replied, “Probably since before I forgot things.”

“You haven’t gotten any sleep?” She was horrified. It had been days.

“I close my eyes and rest at night. I recover fine from the training, and I’m not tired during the day.”

He tried to dispel her frets.

“Oh…Neji…” Tenten held her head in her hands, greatly dismayed.

“You startled me last night. I thought you were…something else.” Neji told her.

“Are you afraid that the enemy might find us?”

He frowned, “You and Lee…you’ve been doing so much for me and I feel like I’m not contributing. I want to look after you too.”

“Nuh-uh. Sleep is imperative. Out of all of us, you need it most!” She hissed softly, “Why didn’t you tell me sooner?”

“I wasn’t going to tell you at all.”

“Until you dropped one day of exhaustion?” She snorted, “Fuh! At least you’re honest, Neji.”

Tenten riffled around through her bag, looking for anything that might tranquilize the young man. Nothing. She reached over Lee, who was snoring blissfully, and searched his bag. He had some antibiotics in preparation for illness, but they would not do any good for sleep. Tenten turned back, seeing that Neji was already down again, his back facing her. She had another idea in mind but it was not particularly acceptable. She went for it anyway.

Tenten laid back down after one last gulp of water. She stashed the canteen back in her bag and then sidled up beside Neji, spooning him. He went rigid with surprise. “Relax, please.” She told him, “You need to get to sleep.”

“I don’t understand…how this helps…” He paused, “Not that I don’t appreciate it.”

A smirk tugged at her lips. This was the kind of thing he would never admit to remembering, even if he hadn’t bumped his head. Neji had consistently been, for the most part, averse to contact. Since it had already occurred while he was unconscious in their ship cabin, Tenten expected he could associate it with sleep on a subliminal level. Any method that might calm the panicky Hyuga was worth a try.

She slid her arm over his, reaching past his shoulder, and rubbed tiny, gentle circles on the nape of his neck. Based on scientific findings discussed among kunoichi peers, she had heard this could work. Neji did seem to be loosening up just a bit; or maybe he was over the initial shock of it. “You don’t need to do this.” He told her meekly.

“No talking. No thinking. Sleep is your friend.” She spoke calmly, fragmenting her words so they would register like a fog.
He sighed. Tenten felt a wave of tension seep out of him. She moved her deft fingers up from his neck to his scalp, running her nails lightly through his hair. His breathing evened out. She strayed from crown, to neck, to shoulders periodically. She distantly recalled hearing about endorphins that the body produced. His breathing began to follow a pattern, and she did not know how long it was before she got an authentic snore out of him. When she was sure he was asleep, Tenten withdrew carefully, rolling back onto her own mat.

She hoped that Neji would not be such high maintenance in the future. Not that she minded it particularly, but she could use the extra sleep too.

In the morning they ate quickly before setting out. They followed a route east up and out of the sheltered valley, hoping to reach the harbor. It was the long way round, and the landscape was chopped up into hazardous pillars of rock and slopes, intermingling with forest. Neji had finally found his footing, and could keep up with the team despite the new geological obstacles.

Lee led the front of the group, slowing down when the forest became too tricky to navigate. “This was always so much easier when we had the Byakugan…” He said dismayed.

“What’s that?” Neji asked him.

Tenten was sheepish, realizing she had forgotten to tell Neji about one of his most prized abilities. “Neji, the Byakugan is a special ability that belongs to the Hyuga clan. With it you can see through solid objects, and can also see far in every direction, minus one degree.” She explained briefly, “Hopefully you’ll figure that out, because it sure is helpful.”

“It’s something I do with my eyes?” He asked for confirmation.

“Yeah, but unfortunately we can’t show you how to do it. It’s something only you know.” She told him, “Sorry…”

Neji told them he would try his best to remember. It seemed these days he was doing nothing else other than training and desperately trying to jog his own memory. Nothing significant ever came up, no matter how much his friends explained, and it frustrated him. He was a shadow of his former self. Compared to what Lee and Tenten told him he was able to do, he felt like an infant.

A kunai sailed past his head by inches, shaving off a few strands from the end of his ponytail. Neji leapt back, warning his teammates, though they were already aware of the ambush. Lee descended on them first. There were only two nukenin present, who must have been away from their counterparts scouting. Lee plowed into one who was taking cover in a tall oak tree. The other dropped down, singling out Neji, since his reaction time had been slowest.

Before the Hyuga could even so much as throw up a defensive stance, Tenten leapt in. The nukenin also had a sword, and the kunoichi clashed with him by drawing Hok. A shadow clone appeared but it did not assist Tenten. The replica stood beside Neji, guarding him with watchful eyes. “I want to help.” He said to the bunshin.

“I won’t let you.” The clone replied, “You’ll only get hurt.”

Lee’s foe was a Sound ninja. The ninjutsu he possessed created sonic waves that snapped apart thick tree branches like toothpicks. Lee avoided the surges with his superior speed. He wheeled around behind the masked enemy, and connected a double-kick to his back. The Sound ninja was knocked from his perch. As he fell from the tree, he used another jutsu to take advantage of Lee’s open guard. A short-range blast hit Lee squarely in the front, sending him careening into a tree on the other side.
Neji reported the mishap and Tenten knew it was time to finish up. She snipped Hok’s edge point into the other rogue’s throat and he collapsed in front of Neji. He did not have time to quail at the sight of killing, because Tenten was dragging him by his wrist to where Lee was. “I can’t do much against Sound jutsu.” She explained on the way, “We have to leave.”

Lee was very disoriented after he stood up, flailing, and Tenten pointed to a stone ridge just above the canopy. Sound waves wrecked trees in their wake. Lee hurried up the incline, and Tenten followed him with equally powerful legs. Neji lagged behind.

“Chakra, Neji, chakra!” She reminded him. After that his jumps matched their own. They disappeared over the crag and the foe’s jutsu died off. The masked nin was unwilling to pursue the wild team.

They ran for nearly a half hour, not trusting to stop until they had put comfortable distance between themselves and the battle site. There was a hilltop lined with willow trees that they finally halted at. Again, they had been knocked off course, and it would take much longer to reach the harbor. Tenten also feared they had made their intended destination clear to the enemy by where they had reappeared. The group slipped into the sheltering vines of an ancient tree to rest.

Tenten leaned against the trunk, heaving a breath. Neji plopped down beside her in the grass, still shaken by the encounter. Lee still stood, rubbing at his ears.

“You okay, Lee?” Tenten asked him.

He was looking at her strangely. She repeated herself, frowning, “Are you okay?”

His eyes went wide. “Tenten! I cannot hear you!” He shouted, pointing to his ears, “That last jutsu might have-!”

She clapped a hand over his mouth, “Why are you so loud? They’ll hear you!” Lee shut up, but only because of the contact.

“I…cannot hear anything.” He said, his voice still raised slightly.

Neji stared at his friend and asked him something, but Lee watched his lips move with no audio to accompany them. Lee looked at Tenten, seeing she was in the middle of a rant, but the world was consumed in silence. He frowned, truly perplexed. What was going on? He hadn’t the foggiest idea what they were trying to express.

“Okay…” Tenten muttered to herself, not getting any responses from Lee, “Okay…” She turned and paced the space around the tree, wracking her brain for a solution.

“He doesn’t understand anything we’re saying, Tenten.” Neji told her, “Is he hurt?”

“You could say that. He was hit by some jutsu, remember? It messed him up.” Tenten sighed, “Just…let me think…please let me think…”

Lee took a seat in the grass, keeping still and doing his best to listen in. It was futile, he quickly realized, and with a deep sigh he stopped paying attention to his panicking teammates. After a few minutes of contemplative pacing Tenten halted. “I got it!” She said aloud, startling Neji.

She crossed back to the tree trunk, where she dropped her bag, and began rummaging through it. She pulled out an old training scroll that still had a good deal of blank parchment. Further in was a brush and black ink typically used for mission notes, or in her case, hasty sealing techniques. Tenten jotted on a blank space on the scroll before holding it up for Lee to see.

“We are going to use this to communicate.” Lee read the message aloud, and then grinned at Tenten, “Well…as innovative as that is, Tenten, it might still be a little difficult.”

She wrote something else down and let him see it: But it’s all we have for now.

He nodded in understanding, and Neji was very pleased with her idea. “Can I talk to him for a moment?” He asked.

“Sure. Just take this and you two stay put.” Tenten handed him the parchment and marker, “I’m going to get us some more water. When I come back we’ll have to pack up and keep going, alright?”

“Be safe.” Neji told her.

Tenten departed, looking over her shoulder and watching as the two interacted. Neji would write a question and Lee, in the cover of the vines, would half-shout an answer. She zipped up her bag after cramming all of their canteens into it.

‘This…’ She thought to herself, ‘Is the bat-shit craziest mission I have ever been on…’
In the afternoon they made good time, avoiding another swamp, and eventually landed in a peaceful birch forest. The thin white trees did not provide much cover, but Tenten estimated they had put a safe enough distance between themselves and the nukenin group. She brought back two wild pheasants for lunch, and afterwards sent Neji off to train with Lee. Even with his hearing impaired, she figured Lee could still teach Neji plenty.

While the two boys sparred Tenten stole away, crossing through the birch rows and tangles of rhododendron. She backtracked to a small rivulet she had earlier been following, and sat beside the stream on the grassy bank. For a long moment she stared ahead into the forest, supposing she should be devising some sort of plan to help her team survive. The trouble was that she could not be struck by inspiration even when their lives depended on it.

‘This is about as close to worst-case-scenario as I am willing to cut it.’ She thought bleakly, ‘God forbid I get my head knocked off, then deaf and tone-dumb Lee will have to guide poor amnesic Neji home somehow…’ There was little hope for the two, she noted, especially if she was killed or debilitated in a future fight. Even now things were hairy, and putting Lee’s new deafness aside, Tenten’s thoughts strayed back to Neji.

‘There’s no way I can handle this. He’s learning fast but it isn’t going to be enough…’ She cradled her face in her hands, ‘And if Neji stays like this…what do I do? For so long I’ve depended on him and now…he’s not the same. He’s lost. He’s different. He’s…’

Tenten looked up and black dots swam before her eyes. Her breath became ragged. The realization that the entire mission depended on her, teammates and all, swept over her like a hurricane-force gale. The panic that gripped her left her heaving dry breaths, shoulders shaking furiously, and she quickly made a grab for her weapon holster. She drew out a kunai and let the tip of her thumb glide over the edge. The skin split apart, and the pain was just enough to snap her back to her senses.

After her hyperventilating passed Tenten wiped her brow with the back of her arm. She was clammy. She could not afford to let her teammates see her this way. She reached into her hip pouch and drew out a swath of gauze and stemmed the bleeding. Tenten stood and brushed off her pants, reasserting her leadership mindset.

‘Stay focused. We need to get to the harbor, but cutting southeast through the mountains is too dangerous.’ She recalled, ‘The best solution would be…continue south through this forest until we hit the shoreline, and sneak up the coast so we don’t run into those assholes again.’ It was the best she could do for the time being, but she was fairly certain the enemy would not be expecting them to take a longer route.

She could hear Neji calling her name after a while.

‘Oh right…they’re probably wondering where I am…’ The Byakugan was still unavailable to the team right now, she acknowledged, and that was also a disadvantage. She quickly returned to the campsite and the Hyuga looked absolutely perturbed.

“Where were you?” He asked sharply, but concern was more evident in his voice than anger.

“I went somewhere quiet to come up with a new plan, and I have one now.” She told him, and waved to Lee vaguely to let him know she had returned, “Sit down and I’ll tell you about it. I’ll have to write it out for Lee.”

They sat in a sunlit glade near the camp, and Tenten wrote down what she was relaying to Neji on parchment for Lee. “So here’s the deal…if we keep trying to pass over the mountain heading east, well…it just isn’t going to happen. We’re going to get caught up in another scrap…”

“What’s the alternative?” Neji asked.

“We keep heading south like we are now. It’s going to take us a long way out of the way…but it’ll be safer to travel up the coastline than risking another run-in with those nukenin.” She explained, finishing her notes, and then passed them to Lee.

He read them quickly and nodded to her, speaking in an almost-normal volume, “That is the wisest course of action, Tenten. It will also give us more time to teach Neji to defend himself if we continue this way.”

“Good point.” She said, looking back to the Hyuga, “How’d the training go today?”

“Better. Though I’m not sure if it’s because I’m getting stronger or Lee just can’t hear anything.” Neji admitted, “I suppose it could be both.”

“Do you want to train with me for a little bit?” Tenten asked.

“Yes.” He stood to go, and Tenten quickly jotted down for Lee where they would be for a while. He nodded to them and curled up to take a nap in the warm grass.

Neji’s chakra control was close to flawless now, much to Tenten’s relief. He had no problem picking up the supplementary jutsu he had been lacking. When he showed proficiency in basic techniques, she then demonstrated proper use of weaponry. “You usually use kunai or tonfa.” She told him, “But tomorrow I can show you how to wield a sword if you like. It’d probably be better for the situation we’re in anyway.”

He liked the idea of becoming a swordsman, “I would be honored if you would teach me.”

A short while later he had nearly put one of her eyes out with a shuriken, but she waved off his terror and simply sent him back to practice more. By evening he handled all past weapons he had ever utilized and then some. They settled down for a meal with Lee and Tenten wrote out the next day’s agenda by firelight for their deaf teammate.

Neji had no issues getting to sleep that night. Tenten settled between the two, considering keeping watch for enemies, but was too drained from the day’s chaos to do so. She fell asleep, hoping that a higher power was guiding them through their struggle.

For three days they continued on the altered course, training Neji as they went. He was advancing rapidly in Taijutsu thanks to Lee. Tenten had begun instructing Neji in the way of the sword (a very modified lesson,) and let him practice with a spare blade from her scroll. He picked it up quick, but was often sloppy and not as sure-footed as she would have.

In their free time she also encouraged him to meditate, which he had fewer issues in understanding, and occasionally Lee would join in for a group spar. The three of them tussling together was a bit reckless, but afforded Neji invaluable experience for a real battle.

Neji slept through the nights soundly and recovered more quickly from his injuries. Tenten was gradually beginning to regain hope for her team. Lee’s deafness was also becoming less of an obstacle. They had established many hand signals and signs to represent particular ideas, and Tenten estimated they were up to about 100 signs in two days. Lee’s adaptive ability was incredible, although there were certain messages she had to write down for him anyway, too complicated to convey.

Neji had warmed up to them unbelievably fast, Tenten also noted. He especially loved laughing with them, even though it was Lee’s soundless plight that was found most comical. The fourth night they had stayed up telling stories around a fire, re-educating Neji on the Leaf Village. At one point, Lee had ended up doing his impressions of their fellow Genin, a number of which were hilariously accurate.

The Hyuga was overcome with side-splitting laughter after a very slanderous impression, one which Tenten was desperate to contain her giggles from. “Who… who w-would say something like that? So insensitive.” Neji asked when Lee had finished.

“Uh…” Tenten was chuckling, “That was actually you, Neji. You said stuff like that all the time.”

Neji stared at her for a long moment, but then bubbled over with mirth again. They enjoyed themselves until it was time for sleep.

They woke refreshed the next day, and things looked promising as they set out. Gulls soared overhead and the air had a salty tang to it. “The coast can’t be far now.” Tenten appraised, “Just a few more days and then we’ll be out of this stinking country!”

Lee did not know exactly what she was shouting about so he gave her a thumbs-up. They traveled through the treetops until the forest was exhausted, and they had to brave several treacherous crags before the ocean came into sight. It was still a fair distance off. They stayed close to the river, knowing it would be one of their last sources of fresh water for miles.

Tenten sent Lee off to take a bath when they had finished making camp, and Neji would go next after they finished some light training. He was brushing up on certain forms he had learned with his ‘rented’ sword, and Tenten was fairly convinced he had a better chance of defending himself with it than he did with Taijutsu.

She had pulled his hair up into a ponytail again and they settled for a break, sitting on top of a hill that overlooked the crashing waves. There was a wonderful calmness, and Tenten dared not speak for fear of breaking it.

“You’ve lead us so far.” Neji said with his eyes trained on the sea, “And in such…troubling circumstances. Have you always been this strong?”

“I’m not sure. I only become strong when you guys need me, I guess.” Tenten told him.

He gave her a sidelong look, “I can’t thank you enough.”

She laughed lightly, “Stop that already. This is nothing, Neji. When we get back home then the real fun starts, you could say. You’ll get reintroduced to everyone and it’ll be pretty hectic. I promise I’ll help you, though.”

“So do you think we’ll run into the enemy before we reach the harbor?”

“Probably not, but just in case…” Tenten slipped the baldric from her shoulder and passed it to Neji, “I want you to hang onto Hok. It’ll keep you safe, and it handles much better than that rusty old sword you’ve been practicing with.”

He had to protest the offering, “But you–!”

“I have hundreds of other weapons, many more lethal than that sword, so don’t sweat it.” Tenten smiled widely at him, “Just take care of yourself. You’ve done me proud, Neji.”

He was silent for a long moment, and his knuckles were white as he held the scabbard to his chest. Neji then looked back to her and said, “Thank you.”

She smiled again and looked back to the inlet. ‘We are definitely going to make it.’ She had a good feeling about getting home. Seeing Neji hold his own only reinforced the notion.

“Tenten?”

She glanced over to him and was a bit unnerved by his stare, “What is it?”

“I…need you to tell me something.”

“Of course.”

“Before I forgot everything when I was hurt…” Neji’s lunar eyes were searching her face, “Did we…have feelings for each other?”

Tenten felt her head swim, “E-Eh? What makes you think that?”

“It’s the way things are between us. The way you treat me and…” He lowered his eyes, “The way you touch me.”

She flushed an award-winning shade of crimson. “Well that’s…all decorous contact, I assure you! I give Lee a pat on the back once in a while too, you know.” She explained feebly.

“But that night when I couldn’t fall asleep…”

“Won’t be repeated.” She said bluntly.

He frowned to himself, deciding to pursue the matter from a different angle. “I know there’s… something.” Neji said lowly, “It’s the things you do for me. The small things and…the big things.” He lifted the baldric Hok was slung in, “You would not do anything like this if you didn’t have an important reason.”

“I think you’re reading into this a bit too much.” Tenten told him passively. Somewhere in her head a voice was screaming, ‘Liar-liar-liar!’

He was visibly upset, “Why are you acting as if it isn’t true? I may not remember much but I’m not stupid, Tenten.”

“Because it isn’t true, and by the way, you can say you aren’t stupid now, but you were dumb enough to overlook me when you could remember. There wasn’t anything there, and you’re the reason why.” She regretted her venomous retort immediately. She had said it so bitterly…

“But that can’t be.” He protested, rubbing the side of his head as if scrambling for a memory; any kind of evidence. There was nothing, but still, he felt it so certainly he wouldn’t allow her to say otherwise.

“Look…I’m sorry, Neji. Maybe there was going to be something…maybe. It just didn’t turn out that “You want the truth? The truth is you didn’t care about me, Neji. Not that way.”

“I don’t believe that.” He said stubbornly, “And even if I didn’t then…I do now. I’m sure of it, so please listen to me when-”

Tenten covered her ears, “No. I can’t listen to this. Don’t talk like that.”

He scowled, “What is wrong with you? I’m trying to tell you that I-”

“It’s not the same! You’re not who you used to be! You’re not that person who I used to cherish. I’m waiting for him to come back; you see…waiting for you to remember so you stop acting like a puppy dog!” Tenten exploded, “You’ll forget all about this…little infatuation. You will! I won’t allow myself to fall for someone who’s not even going to be around for very long!”

“What? You expect me to just remember everything one day?” Neji’s voice was rising, “What if that doesn’t happen? What then? You told me you were going to help me get my life back together when we reached the Leaf Village!”

“Yes, and then hopefully that’ll jog your memory and I can have Neji back.” She said pointedly.

“I am Neji!” He roared furiously.

“No you’re not. The real Neji would never…” She trailed off, unsure of how to put it. ‘Care about me? Romantically? Devotedly and loyally?’ She did not have to continue the argument. Neji had snatched up Hok and stormed off back towards camp.

The anger and embarrassment in his posture was very clear. Tenten suddenly felt like a quintessential hypocrite. There had been times in the past in which Neji had trampled all over her feelings, but was it really fair to do the same when he wasn’t even the same person? Physically he was Neji, but mentally, she conceded, he was a young man who was in love with his friend; and she had just filleted and gutted him with barely any provocation…

She glared up at the blue sky overhead, ‘Okay up there. I get it. I’m a complete jerk.’

Neji passed through a ring of bulrushes and returned to their camp where Lee was boiling water for tea. A seagull was perched nearby on a boulder. Neji kicked a stone that bulleted for the bird, sending it scrambling from its roost in surprise. Lee looked up at the movement. “Hello Neji! Where is Tenten?” He greeted.

Neji pointed his thumb back up towards the hill wordlessly. Lee understood, but was alarmed by the Hyuga’s furious expression. It didn’t help when he carelessly tossed Hok and its sash to the ground like a broken play thing. ‘Oh dear…he seems very distressed.’

Rather than having a one-sided conversation with his friend on the matter (that obviously had to do with the kunoichi) Lee decided to speak to Tenten instead. He poured tea for Neji and offered it to him before heading off to find their other teammate. Neji sat near the embers, staring moodily at the ground while he sipped his drink. His eyes strayed over to where Hok lay a few times.

Lee marched up the hill and found Tenten resting in the grass leisurely. She looked to be deep in thought. “Um…Tenten?” He began, taking a seat beside her. She gave him an attentive look.

“Neji looks very…upset. Did you offend him somehow?” Lee got straight to the point.
Tenten cupped her hands to form a ‘zero.’ It was equivalent to saying, “I did nothing.”

Lee did not buy it. “He was training with you. Did he do something wrong or…was something said?” He checked.

Tenten sighed and drew out her marker and parchment. She scribbled down an answer and let Lee read it: He was saying silly things.

“Hm. But I say silly things quite often.” Lee pointed out, “And it would help if we were lenient with him, seeing that he has amnesia.”

Tenten threw him a dirty look that said: Must you be so perceptive? She scrawled another message beside the first and held it up again: Butt out, Lee. It’s settled.

Lee laughed out loud, “It does not look settled to me, Tenten.”

She sighed and said something, and then caught herself, ‘Oh right…he can’t hear.’ She wrote her verbalization down: I’ll apologize later, okay? I was out of line and he was just being naïve and innocent like he is. Just don’t try to get involved, fair?

Lee saluted her, seeing he had gotten a better answer, “I trust you to it, then. Now do not create any more strife, if you please.” He smiled and stood up, “I will train with Neji for a little while so he has a chance to relax.”

She signed the word ‘thanks’ to him. He nodded pleasantly and walked away. Tenten stowed away her writing implements in her hip pouch and fell back to the grass with a huff.

After training with Lee for a while Neji stalked off to the river. He picked a secluded spot and stripped off his clothes. He learned from Lee and Tenten how bathing during a mission was a luxury, so he proceeded as they had instructed earlier in the day. He rinsed out his fetid clothes and hung them to dry on a tree branch. He briefly wondered at his stark nudity out in nature, but then settled on the bank and began to wash himself. The water was very cold and unpleasant.

He was still thinking about what Tenten had said. She had made a very good point in that he was definitely not the person he had been before. How could he expect her to return his sentiments when she was thinking of him in a completely different light? What was most frustrating was that even though her words had been cruel and thoughtless, they hadn’t changed his feelings one bit. He was still determined to at least get her to acknowledge him. It was difficult for him to picture how he was going to do it.

After he was thoroughly rinsed he toweled off and waited for his clothes to dry. Neji watched the churning water, and could see where the fresh and saltwater met a dozen yards away. The ocean was near, and that meant their journey was coming to an end. He only hoped that Lee and Tenten’s friendship with him would stay as strong when they were back in their home village, when they did not need to look after him so fiercely. He tried to imagine the Leaf Village but could only conjure vague images, if any. All Neji saw were vast forests, crags and bogs of the Marsh Country.

It seemed there was still much he had to learn. Neji dressed when his clothes were dry and chose not to be angry any more. It was too much work, and he cared too much about Tenten to keep up the argument. He went back to camp with an improved mood.

When Tenten saw Neji exit the forest after washing up, she slinked off to take a bath herself. She went about it quickly, standing waist-deep in the water, leaving her clothes on the shore, and ignored her chattering teeth. She let her hair down and washed it after discovering a twig had been tangled up in one of her chignons.

She was fully aware of how she owed Neji an apology when she returned. She had been derisive for no reason, and she hated how she’d let her bitterness get the better of her.

A water snake coiled past her on the water’s surface and she watched it, reflecting on the situation. ‘Let’s weigh the consequences here. On the one hand, I can hold out and ignore Neji’s feelings. Well, the new-Neji’s feelings. That should be easy enough…but it’s an extremely backwards policy for me.’ Tenten thought to herself, ‘And on the other hand: I could reciprocate.’

It was strange and almost unfair. Tenten considered that, since she had returned to the team, Neji had seemed particularly warm and fond of her. He had become strong and mature, appreciated his team more than he had ever appreciated them…and all of that progress had been lost.

‘It ticks me off! I want Neji to be who he was! I don’t want him to be this…stranger…’ She splashed her face with water, ‘But he isn’t. Not really. I’d be stupid to call him weak. After everything he’s done and what he’s been through…’ After all, even when he could hardly remember details of his immediate life, Neji nebulously remembered her.

Tenten smiled to herself, ‘That has got to count for something.’ She began to wring her hair out, ‘And when I think about it…the things he forgot were the things that…generally made him unhappy.’ She noted that his shinobi career had been sanded-down to the basics, his recollection of his clan was limited to Hinata’s smiling face, and Neji had forgotten how miserable he had once been; ‘In spite of that, he kept us close. He didn’t have to trust me or Lee when he woke up. But he did! Neji did not hesitate to believe us when we said that we cared…’

She blinked hard, surprised by her conclusion. ‘He’s innocent. He’s all of the things that he never let himself be before.’

The young woman waded back to shore and quickly dried off, still thinking, ‘If my problem is with accepting the parts of Neji that are gentle and kind…then I’m going to have to get over it. I got used to when he was rough-and-tumble, so I don’t see why I can’t care for this side of him too.’

Tenten redressed and wondered aloud, “And…I guess I’m just a bit curious.”

Back at camp Lee and Neji were talking…as best they could. The Hyuga proved very clever at substituting ideas with signals, and Tenten suspected he would be skilled in a game of charades. ‘I’ll save that for another time, though…’

When she appeared Lee quickly stood, grinning at her, “Good! You are back, Tenten. I am off to fish for our dinner, so would you and Neji please revive the fire, if it’s not too much to ask?”

She pressed her thumb and index finger together in a sign for: OK. Lee walked off, suspiciously chipper about something, and Tenten took his seat near the fire pit.

Neji was prodding at the fire with a stick when he looked over at her. His eyebrows raised in surprise to see that her hair was down.

Tenten noticed his reaction. “You know…you used to do the same thing back then too.” She said with a chuckle, “Whenever my hair was down you’d just stare, like it just occurred to you that I was a girl.”

He looked back to the fire, “I see. Though I figured it was just easier to tie it up since you handle “Weapons so much.”

“Exactly.” She told him, “When I was younger, and first learning from my dad, I accidentally hacked one of my own braids off. I’ve kept it up ever since. That’s a true story.”

He smiled slightly at her, catching the humor in her tone. Neji tossed a sprig of pine on the fire and watched it snap and hiss as flames ate up the dry needles. Tenten stuck a few more branches into the pit in an effort to help.

“I’m sorry about how I acted before.” She said at length, “I was being a killjoy. You were just trying to be honest with me and I couldn’t handle it.”

Neji shook his head, “I don’t think it was my place to-”

“No, listen; I like you, and that’s the truth.” Tenten said, managing not to flush, “I suppose I just couldn’t wrap my head around what you were telling me, since…you’ve never done that before.”

His cheeks were pinkish.

She smiled as she continued, “You know what? Let’s let bygones be bygones. I can’t hold you to all the crap that happened before since, technically, it wasn’t you who did it. It was your nutty, over-stressed, alter-ego.”

“That’s one way of…putting it.” He muttered, a bit flustered, “Does this mean we’re still friends?”

“Neji, don’t be ridiculous. That never changed.” She admonished lightly, “No matter how pissed we get at each other, and this has always proved true: we can count on each other.”

Neji was smiling again, completely at ease. He moved to lift Hok from where it sat beside him, but when he tried to hand it to her she shook her head.

“I’m not taking that from you until we’re back in the Leaf Village.” She told him adamantly.

“Alright.” He appreciated it, and then thought to ask, “When I told you before about how I felt…you’re not bothered by it? It’s only been a few days that I’ve really known you.”

“A week, actually.” Tenten corrected him, “And I…well…I kind of enjoyed it, honestly.”

There was something bright and emphatic in Neji’s eyes. Tenten was unable to identify it exactly. He remembered what she had said a few days ago, ‘You in general delight me.’ It had been a very benevolent thing to say. Now he was fairly certain she had meant it.

Lee returned moments later with several fish speared on a pointed stick. “Are we getting along now?” He asked as he sat with them, distributing the catch.

Tenten gave him another OK sign and Neji mimicked it. Lee was satisfied, but not because of their sign language.

Their contentment was written all over their faces.

The next day, after replenishing their stores of freshwater, the group set out with speed along the beach. There was absolutely no sign of shinobi on the coast, or people in general, for that matter. They had covered several miles by the afternoon, and stopped only briefly to eat. Tenten led them on, her blood pounding with anticipation. ‘Won’t it be just a regular triumph to fill out this mission report for Tsunade-sama?’ Defeated several enemies, discovered their whereabouts and intent: all while teammates are deaf and suffering from memory loss.

“Huge brownie points…” Tenten murmured excitedly to herself.

Neji glanced over to her curiously, “What was that?”

“I’m just excited, is all.” She told him, grinning, “We don’t have much further to go.”

He smiled back, equally happy.

They scaled the dunes up onto a stone bluff that overlooked the ocean, racing past nesting seabirds. With the sky and sea stretching blue all around them, it made for an excellent and uplifting run. Their journey was abruptly cut short. Tenten nearly lost her footing on a ledge that crumbled out from under her. The flimsy limestone had been savagely eroded and was unfit for travel.

Worse still was that there was no more coastline. The cliffs had been eaten away by the waves, and a churning inlet stood in front of them. Tenten turned back, cursing loudly, and kicked a patch of dandelions. The spores hovered off in the breeze. Lee and Neji looked at her, aware of the setback and hoping for guidance.

“I really wish we still had that damned map, maybe then I would’ve seen this coming!” She groaned, stomping around in a circle, “Even if we had the Byakugan we could’ve accounted for the…” She looked at Neji and then sighed, “Oh, never mind…”

“Tenten, we should just continue inland until we’ve circumvented the bay.” Lee suggested, “Then we can head straight for the harbor.”

“But that’s exactly what I was trying to avoid Lee...those nukenin…” She trailed off, realizing her reply fell on literally deaf ears. She didn’t bother writing her reason down this time, and just crossed her arms in a large ‘X’ to signify her reluctance. He got the idea.

“We have no choice now.” Neji told her, “And if we go quickly they may not catch us at all.”

“If they do catch us you’ll have to fight.” She warned him tiredly.

His face was stern, “I want to fight. I’m able to now, Tenten.”

She heaved a sigh, but inwardly conceded that he was right. Tenten motioned for Lee to move along and they continued inland, crossing back over the crag and into the forest. They traveled by canopy, following the curvature of the bay. The detour was going to take them out of their way, and this time, put them back in danger. Tenten knew it could not be helped, but was cross with herself for expecting their return to be so easy.

Later on they stopped in a sheltered and defensible part of the woods. Tenten mandated that they not make a fire, “The smoke could attract their attention if they’re close by…and that goddamn tracker of theirs will smell anything we try to cook.”

“Maybe we should just gather plants to eat, then, at least until we are out of here?” Neji asked and Tenten agreed with the idea.

Lee set up camp and a perimeter of the area while Tenten agreed to train Neji for a short while. She was surprised by what he wanted to learn.

“I know you can’t show me, but could you at least tell me how I did it…the Byakugan?” He asked her, “If I could use it...things would be easier for the team, and we could anticipate the enemy’s movements.”

“Neji...” Tenten frowned, about ready to decline, and then said, “Aw, what the hell...”

She gave him a brief lesson on the chakra circulatory system and then added, “But you’ll understand it better if you see it for yourself, I’m sure.” Tenten (poorly) demonstrated to him some of the Jyukken forms she had learned by watching him and training with Hikune. “I can’t use Jyukken; not the way you do. I could give somebody a nice whap that might seize up a muscle... but you can kill with this.”

“With the Byakugan?” He guessed.

“It's your specialty!” She laughed, “You do damage you can scarcely even believe. There’s more to it, though. You can also make a shield through a rotation, by forcing chakra out of your tenketsu.

“I have...many abilities.” Neji said, aghast.

“I could go on and on, but the most basic skill is your bloodline limit.” Tenten walked up to him, gently touching her fingertips to his temples, “Behind your eyes there are chakra pathways. They control your Byakugan, and it’s up to you to give them a wake-up call.”

“So I should focus chakra in my eyes?” He checked.

“That would be my educated guess...but don’t quote me on that.” Tenten told him, taking her hands away, “Give that a try, but feel free to switch it up. You’ll definitely know when you have it right.”

“How?”

“For starters, you’ll see right through my clothes.” She prompted.

His eyes went wide in shock. Tenten laughed at his reaction, “It’s alright, I’m used to it. You’ll see a lot more than just that, though. Chakra pathways are what you’ll be looking for.”

He nodded, “Right.”

Tenten fell silent and took a seat against an oak tree, watching him focus his chakra. It was a predictably fruitless endeavor. He worked at it for nearly an hour, exhausting his chakra, unsure of how to go about it. For something he knew how to do instinctively he was beginning to think Tenten had a better chance of using the Byakugan than he did. Lee had stopped by at one point to ask what they were up to, and Tenten wrote down the sorry answer for him.

“Do not let him work too much at it.” Lee advised.

She nodded in agreement, but still knew that it was something the team sorely needed. Later on they stopped to gather up something to eat. They were in a hospitable area that actually had an orchard of wild fig trees, and they dined on those fruits in the evening.

“I’m sorry I couldn’t do it.” Neji apologized to Tenten, “I’ll work harder next time.”

She put a comforting hand on his shoulder, “I don’t want you to push it. Take it easy, Neji.”

That night they slept huddled closely together to overcome the cold. Tenten missed having a fire, but she understood that they couldn’t risk it. She slept lightly, always on edge in preparation for the enemy.
The next morning arrived and they gathered plenty of figs before setting out. They ate as they traveled, and covered half the distance of the bay by noon. They rested near a small brook to gather more water, and Tenten scouted briefly ahead for any good spots they could train in. She was unnerved by what she found.

A tall tree was lined with a number of kunai which were not their own. Tenten quickly returned to her team.

“They’ve been through here...” Tenten told them anxiously, “We have to keep moving.” The Leaf ninja proceeded without a second thought, straying from the treacherous forest and back to the coastline.

Lee eventually pointed out a discreet route down one of the cliff sides, at the bottom of which they discovered a series of tide pools that had scored caves in the rock. After carefully surveying the area and where the tide would reach in the next six hours, they settled on the best shelter for the night: a cavern that had been carved long ago and was beyond the water level’s reach.

They were very pleased to be able to make a fire that evening. Lee made a move to leave but Tenten stopped him on his way out. “I will catch us some dinner.” Lee told her.

She shook her head, glowering.

Lee gently moved her to the side so he could exit the cave. “I promise I will be back soon!” Tenten was against it but she let him go anyway. Her stomach was twisted with hunger, and they had run out of things to eat.

She took a seat beside Neji in front of the fire. “You’re still at it?” She asked him, surprised.

His face was set with concentration, and he nodded silently. Come hell or high water, he would figure out the Byakugan.

Tenten smiled tiredly, “Okay then. Wake me when Lee gets back...or if you get it.” She shoved her bag up against the cave wall, and after making herself comfortable, settled down for a nap.

She almost immediately began to dream. In her vision she realized that Lee could hear and Neji was fighting with Jyukken. Their enemies had them surrounded but their numbers were dwindling. ‘Whoa! We must’ve ambushed them!’ Thrilled by the imminent victory Tenten made a move to run to her teammates, but was unable to budge.

She looked down and could see one of the blades of a fuuma shuriken had pierced her stomach. She was bleeding out far too quickly, and Tenten realized that the damn bear tracker had successfully wounded her. Yet still...Neji and Lee were safe! Neji had his memory! ‘But I’m...I’m...’ She flopped backwards, realizing the fatality of the situation, and woke up with jolt.

Tenten rubbed her head as she sat up, quite disturbed by her dream. Could that have been the result if she had not released Neji in that battle? ‘I...don’t think so. The wound didn’t even look like it was in the right spot...’ All the same, it was symbol enough of her mortality.

“How long was I asleep?” Tenten asked groggily.

“Not long.” Neji told her, “Barely twenty minutes.”

“Gee...” She sighed, scooting closer to the small fire to warm up, “How did you manage, Neji?”

“I stopped. It actually starts to hurt when I focus that much chakra.” He confessed.
“I’ll bet. Don’t worry about it.” She patted his arm soothingly, “We’re almost out of here.”

Neji glanced at her and then looked back to the fire, “Could you tell me something?”

“Most likely I can.” She said, rubbing her palms together to generate some friction.

“How did I get hurt?” He asked.

“You mean when you lost your memory?”

“Yes, then.”

“Well…I’ll sum up. We were noticed while we were spying on the enemy and you ended up fighting this bastard named Keshin.” Tenten explained, “You took a tumble off a ledge, and I went to pull you up. That guy kept attacking me while I was trying to help you, and I suppose you…wanted to save me. You forced me to let go and I dropped you.”

She turned and jabbed his shoulder moodily, “By the way, don’t ever do that again! Self-sacrifice is just stupid, especially when I’m busting my ass for you!”

He nodded in compliance. “So I must’ve gotten hurt during the fall.” Neji surmised.

“You hit your head.” As she spoke the words guilt crossed her face, and she reached out and stroked the site of the injury, “I’m…so sorry. We could’ve avoided a lot of hassle if I’d just held tight. I won’t let anything like that happen again, just so you know.”

Neji smiled to himself, “The way I see it…it was meant to be this way. If I did it to help you, well, it was really the best decision.”

“But you scared me half to death!” Tenten growled.

“You’re more important.” He answered, “You’ve proven that these past few days. Once Lee was hurt…you took charge. There’s no doubt that this team hinges on you.”

She shook her head, “Believe me; I’m not too happy about it…”

Neji was watching her face steadily, “Without you…I’d have nothing. No way to go home or to defend myself…no joy.” He chuckled, “Hitting my head was a blessing.”

“You’re nuts.” She retorted shortly.

He stroked her cheek with a tentative finger, “Maybe. Just as much as you, I’d say.” Her eyes were fixed on him, questioning, and he added, “I think I’ll always depend on you. I want to…” Neji leaned in closer with his eyes half-lidded.

Tenten moved into the touch, her heart beating a tune against her ribs, and nearly jumped out of her skin when Lee returned very loudly. “It’s raining!” He called to them, unnecessarily, since his voice echoed in the cavern.

She snapped back and away from Neji, who gave Lee a very put-out look since he had unintentionally interrupted what could’ve been a perfect kiss. Lee paid the expression no mind, and set three small rabbits in front of them.

“One for each of us! Please help me skin them, will you?” He requested.

Tenten gave him her most reluctant OK signal yet. She set to work, shearing the poor dead creature in front of her. She glanced over to Neji who was still staring at her intently. Lee was saying something but they paid him no mind.

“No worries.” She told Neji, “We can work on it tomorrow.”

He looked at her with an eager expression, and then drew out a knife of his own.

The next morning Tenten rose with an inexplicably sunny mood. She woke and there was Neji, curled asleep beside her, and she knew it was something she could get used to. The fire had died off in the night, and scraps of their dinner were charred in the embers. She kicked some gravel and sand over the fire pit to put it out fully. Lee awoke shortly after her.

He stretched his arms over his head, yawning sleepily, “Good morning…ahh, Tenten…”

She waved at him with a smile and he chuckled, “Good morning to me too? Thank you.”

Tenten scooched over and brushed her hand against Neji’s cheek, “Time to wake up…”

The Hyuga stirred and then sat up. He plucked her hand from his face and held it in his own contentedly. They sat wordlessly for a minute until Lee cleared his throat. Tenten glanced back to him, forgetting that their teammate was not aware of the new development.

“Ah, well…if we are all prepared I think it would be best if we set out.” Lee suggested, regarding Neji curiously.

Tenten nodded in agreement and stood, taking her hand back from her clingy teammate. They picked up their bags and set out into the sea-salt air. Gulls cried out overhead, and Neji was surprised to see a whale breach and take a breath just off shore. He looked at Tenten and said, “It’s amazing. Have I ever seen one of those before?”

“No.” She told him, “I don’t think any of us have. It is pretty neat.”

Once on the topside of the cliff they continued a short distance along the ledge, and eventually turned to the forest in search of food. There were no figs around, but there was a grove of citrus blossoms. Unfortunately, none of the fruits were mature or ripe, but they picked them anyway along with the blooms, willing to eat anything. The fruits were very sour, and Tenten suspected they were tangerines. They ate briefly and continued to find a source of water.

They passed another grove before entering a shaded forest. The trees towered into the sky, and they passed beneath the behemoths in reverent wonder. The Fire Country had some impressive forests, naturally; but Tenten doubted she would forget the magnificent geography of the Marsh Country either.

Some deer scattered unexpectedly and they avoided the startled creatures, leaping up into the nearest tree. “Do you think we frightened them?” Lee asked.

Tenten wasn’t sure. She had thought they had been treading lightly. There was a gasp from Neji behind her and suddenly he was on bent-knee on the branch, clutching his head. She turned back to him worriedly, “Neji? What’s wrong?”

“There was…so much to take in.” He mumbled, shaking his head.

Her eyes brightened, “Did you…was it the Byakugan?”
“For a moment, I saw…” He trailed off and then looked up, “There!”

From a few branches above them, a ninja hurled a fistful of shuriken at the unsuspecting Leaf shinobi. Neji had spotted the danger just in time, and he and his teammates ducked back to avoid the projectiles. The foe’s back up descended quickly.

With Lee and Neji safely behind her, Tenten summoned rapidly, hailing the treetops with a tempest of weaponry. She killed their hasty attacker since he was nearest, but the other three scattered to avoid the assault. One of the nukenin happened to be the Sound ninja who had injured Lee, and pointed out the weaknesses of the team to his comrades, “The Taijutsu kid can’t hear a thing, I got him with a sonic wave. For some reason the other one can’t fight, so just focus on the girl!”

Tenten signed an express command to Lee and he immediately obeyed. He unclipped his leg weights and disappeared into the forest.

Neji was astounded, “What just-?” He was thrown forward when a flashbomb detonated behind him. He righted himself in the air and landed on the ground. Neji drew Hok and clashed with the nin who had ambushed him, adrenalin giving speed and precision to his attacks.

Tenten felt sick to her stomach. Lee was after his previous Sound ninja opponent, immune to his jutsu thanks to his untraceable speed. He plowed into the nukenin from every direction, delivering relentless hits.

Tenten concentrated on her own enemy who had grown an alarming set of sharp claws. She summoned the great-cleaver, Chinigui, and dove ahead, side-stepping the nin’s raking talons. She swung her giant blade in a calculated arc. She clipped her foe’s arm but only drew a drop of blood as he evaded. He rounded on her, slashing furiously, and gored her in the side. He balked when the Leaf kunoichi dissolved into smoke.

She took advantage of her Shadow Clone’s distraction to catch him from behind, and hacked into her opponent’s back. His spine severed with a crunch, and he fell to the ground lifelessly. Lee was still busy throttling the Sound ninja, and so Tenten quickly went to assist Neji.

There was a cut on his cheek that was bleeding freely, but he had kept up well with his enemy. Neji had scored several hits on the nukenin, who obviously was not used to defending against swords. Tenten took advantage of the opportunity and leapt, plunging Chinigui down. The hooded nukenin barely avoided the assault, rolling, and the massive sword stabbed into the earth beside him. Unscathed, he lashed out with his chain-scythe, and snagged Neji’s arm in the cable.

Tenten managed to free her blade, but was taken by surprise when the hooded shinobi turned back to her, dragging Neji with him. The Hyuga dug his heels into the ground to resist, but was flung forward by their adversary with the intention of impaling his own teammate. Tenten skirted the devious move, watching Neji tumble, and she gave him an apologetic look. She cried out when something split open her back at the shoulder blade.

The hooded nin had cut her with the scythe of his weapon. He shook Neji loose from the chain with the intent to snare Tenten in it instead. For a beat, Tenten groped for Chinigui, but pain surged down the length of her arm, leaving her incapable of lifting the sword. Neji was on his feet again, but too far away to intercept the inevitable attack.

Lee shot feet-first like a comet from the treetops. He slammed down on the hooded shinobi with blinding speed, smashing their enemy’s face into the nearest tree. The force had cracked his skull, and the nukenin crumpled at the foot of the tree in defeat. Tenten fell to her knees, seeing the danger had passed.
Neji sheathed Hok and rushed over to the kunoichi, “Tenten!”

She tapped a seal in her scroll to un-summon her weapons, and quickly scribbled a message for Lee. He read it while he snapped his leg weights back on. “No, Tenten, there are no more.” He assured her, “It seems as if these four were assigned to keep watch for us…which leaves about six more out there somewhere.”

“Good.” She panted, dizzy with pain.

“You’re hurt.” Neji’s voice belied fear that she had never imagined him capable of. He lifted her gently onto his back and they retreated a short distance away from the battle site.

Yards away and seated on the ground, Tenten wiggled out of her shirt, hissing at the sting of her back. She sat shaking and unable to speak. Lee had retrieved medical supplies from his bag and set to work. Tenten was temporarily angered that Lee cut away her chest bindings without any warning, leaving her immodest. Her teammates were respectful enough to face only her back as it was, so she conceded that it was not a big deal. She could sense Neji’s tension over her current state.

After disinfecting the gash and putting a stop to the bleeding, Lee threaded a sterilized needle, his tongue poking from his mouth in concentration. Neji frowned at him, guessing what he was about to do, “You aren’t actually going to-?”

Lee looked at him, not certain of what he said. He then held up the needle questioningly, “Oh this? But I must Neji! She’ll be alright…”

Tenten nodded weakly where she sat. “Lee knows what he’s doing, Neji…” She said, totally exhausted, “Lee, just make sure the stitches are small…I don’t really care how many it takes; goh! Ow! Ow!” He had begun without hearing her and it was awful.

Neji’s brow was knitted with immense anxiety, and he watched in horrified fascination as Lee sewed the kunoichi’s skin back together. Tenten had stopped making sounds of pain and just sat still, her breathing very labored.

“Hey Neji…” She spoke up after a few minutes, “You want to do me a favor?”

“Anything.” He answered.

“It might be…a little nasty.”

“I don’t care.”

“I want you to go back to where we were fighting and pick up their supplies. Not so much their weapons, but if they have food and equipment…” She inhaled sharply when Lee had hit a tender spot, “Go pick up that stuff so we can use it, alright?”

“I’ll be right back.” He told her, and stood to leave.

Lee looked over his shoulder, “Where is he going?”

Tenten gave him an OK sign that dispelled his concern. Lee was very thorough with his stitches, and once he’d finished he knotted and snipped the string, disinfecting the area one last time. A rectangle of gauze was taped over the site. She wanted to tell him thank you, but couldn’t sign to him while he was facing her back. Lee rummaged around through his bag again and drew out binding tape. “Do you want me to help you, Tenten?” He asked carefully.

She shook her head, “No, I got it…” He obviously did not hear her reply. She took the tape from him and began to wrap up her chest one-handed, but it was too difficult. When she tried to use her stiff arm she shrieked with pain and dropped the tape. Lee reached around to help her, ignoring her breasts. “You’re a pal.” She sighed. He didn’t hear that either.

He was finished after a minute and she signed her thanks to him. He nodded cheerily, “It was no trouble at all, Tenten. Just please feel better.

Rather than pulling her ripped and bloodied shirt back on Tenten tossed it. She reached into her bag and drew out a spare: black with an embroidered silver tiger on the back. She would hate to ruin this one too, so she elected not to get carelessly injured again. She pulled it on and Neji returned, carrying the spoils of battle with him.

“Oh! An excellent idea!” Lee said, kneeling down where Neji set down the supplies. They leaned in and examined what found: another blanket, some depleted water and food rations, bowls and utensils, first aid necessities and painkillers, soldier pills (What a find! Tenten cheered,) a detailed map, a contract from the actual people who had assigned the mission to the nukenin, some money, and cigarettes. Lee tossed the latter into the bushes since they had no use for them. They packed the rest of the supplies with their own belongings.

“We should keep moving before the others decide to show up.” Tenten recommended, and staggered to her feet.

“You should rest. You don’t want to jar your injury.” Neji told her sternly.

She shook her head, “I can rest once we’re somewhere safe. Let’s go please.”

Of course Lee also protested. After a short-lived argument Tenten got her way. Neji ended up carrying her on his back while Lee managed their travel bags. They covered considerable distance, and eventually reached the opposite end of the inlet. There they found shelter near the cliffside again, and stopped under a ledge that overlooked the rolling waves.

Tenten settled in the nook, laying on her side, and tried to hold still so she wouldn’t tear any of her stitches. After surveying the cavern Lee deemed it safe and defensible, and then turned to Neji, “I will go find us something to eat. Can you please go find kindling for a fire?”

Neji nodded and Lee set out to hunt. The Hyuga sighed deeply and crossed back to Tenten. He kneeled beside her and stroked her uninjured arm. “Lee and I are going out. We’ll be back soon.” He bent and touched his forehead to her’s, “Please get some rest.”

She made a soft sound of accord, and Neji then stood and left the hollow. The sound of lapping waves washing in and out lulled Tenten into a dreamless sleep.

Tenten awoke to the tantalizing smell of fish cooking over a fire. It was then she realized how hungry she actually was. She sat up slowly, very stiff and uncomfortable, and her teammates perked up at the sight of her.

“I am glad you are awake, Tenten!” Lee greeted, handing her a speared and grilled fish, “Please eat this.”

She thanked him sleepily and accepted it. She glanced to the entrance of the grotto and could see the sun had not yet set. “Was I out for long?” She rasped.

“I am.” She admitted, shifting slowly to lean against him. He was much more comfortable than the cave wall.

He handed her a canteen and two pills. “Take these, they should help.” Neji told her. She downed them with a gulp of water and then took another bite of fish.

“Are you going to eat?” She asked Neji.

“I finished.” He told her, “Lee wanted to wait up for you, but we weren’t very sure how long you’d sleep.”

Tenten finished off her first fish and watched Lee set up their small tin kettle for tea. “Are we somewhere safe?” Tenten asked, still blinking off sleep.

Neji nodded, “Yes. On the other side of the bay, actually.”

“What a perfect time for me to get hurt…” She grumbled, and then remembered something, “Oh! Back in the forest! Didn’t you use the Byakugan?”

“I think I did, but just for a second. I’m not really sure how.” He told her quietly, “I think it had less to do with my eyes and more to do with…” He tapped the side of his head, “It went a little bit deeper. I’ll try again tomorrow.”

“I’m so glad that you’re figuring this out…” She sighed, hugging him with her good arm. He made a very pleased sound deep in his throat, and it sent butterflies fluttering in her stomach.

Tenten reached for another skewered fish and continued to eat. Neji watched her quietly, much more relaxed now that she was showing signs of improvement. Lee squeezed juice from one of their leftover tangerines into their tea and then handed it out. It was delicately sweet and delicious, and Tenten commented on his thoughtfulness only to recall how he couldn’t hear it.

She handed Neji her parchment and brush. “You’ll have to be my scribe until this arm works again.” She informed him, “Could you please tell him that I love the tea?”

“It would be my pleasure, since I was about to say the same.” He took it from her and wrote the compliment down. He showed it to Lee and their friend chuckled.

“Thank you very much, Neji.” He said.

Lee’s arm bindings were slightly marred from the earlier fight, so he set to work unraveling the old bandages, intending to re-tape them. While he worked, Tenten leaned her head against Neji’s shoulder. She had finished eating, and with a full stomach she was sated. “You fought pretty well with Hok.” She told him, “Make sure you keep it with you.”

Neji glanced over to the decorated sword that was leaned against one of their travel bags. “It’s protected the both of us very well.” He agreed, “Thank you for trusting me with it.

She laughed, “Why Neji, I trust you with my life. What’s a donation of a sword?”

The following day it became very clear they could go no further. Tenten’s injury was severe enough to inhibit her ability to wield weapons, and there was the constant threat of her reopening the gash with a sudden movement. They left their belongings in the grotto, knowing it would have to serve as a temporary shelter until Tenten was healed. After feeding his teammates, Lee went out again to create a perimeter and set up traps.

Neji had stayed behind with Tenten, helping her sterilize her aggravated wound. “I don’t want to sit around here all day…” Tenten complained sourly, “Could we please go outside?”

“Not until Lee comes back.”

“We could leave him a message to let him know where we are.” Tenten suggested, “That hill just across the way. The one with the flowers; it’d be nice to train there.”

“Train?” He scoffed in disbelief.

“Of course not me, I meant you.” Tenten told him, “I’d rather help you out than sit on my butt and wait to get better.”

Neji could see her point. “Alright.” He said, and wrote down a short message for Lee. Neji slung Hok onto his back and followed Tenten out of the cavern into the sunlight. She was smiling with relief to be out of the dank and musty grotto.

She treaded carefully, taking her time as she picked her way up the slope. The hillside was in full bloom, and she was surprised by the number of swallow-tailed butterflies hovering about. ‘I didn’t think these were native to the region.’ Tenten looked at Neji and told him, “I don’t think you’ll be needing Hok if you’re working on the Byakugan.”

“Point taken.” He slipped the baldric from his shoulder and set it down. Tenten sat in the grass and observed as the Hyuga tried to contact his blood limit.

A breeze swept up some of the loose flower petals on the ground, giving the illusion of flying blossoms. Tenten relaxed completely, letting the atmosphere sink in. The combination of the ocean’s distant roar and the periodic birdsongs were so soothing it nearly put her to sleep. Neji’s concentration was broken after a while and he breathed harshly. “Is something wrong?” She asked him.

“Maybe.” He took a seat beside her, resting an arm across his knee, “I think there’s a possibility that I’m hurting myself.”

Tenten blinked, “How do you figure?”

“When I focus chakra it becomes very clear where it isn’t supposed to be, in a matter of speaking…” He explained, “It’s persistent, and since I’ve been trying so often the pain stays.”

“Oh…” Tenten rubbed her neck, troubled, “You’ve said a few times before that you’ve needed to rest your eyes. I didn’t know it could…be that bad.” She remembered something Sakura had said once, “A friend of mine told me that chakra pathways can get damaged and worn down. They’re like arteries, kind of.”

He seemed to understand. “I’ll take a break then and try later.” He decided.

“You…you don’t have to. Not if it’s hurting you.” Tenten told him.

“But we need this more than ever, especially with how you are now.” Neji countered, “I’m going to do this.”

She heaved a sigh. It was a necessary evil. She spread out on the flowers, laying down carefully on her side. Neji glanced down at her, and was amused when a pair of butterflies had perched on one of her buns. He shooed them out of her hair. Tenten closed her eyes and tried to will herself to heal faster.

Neji noticed one of her hands strewn across the grass lazily, palm open and facing upwards. He did not resist the impulse and reached down, taking that delicate, weapon-wielding hand in his own. Her eyes flickered open and she looked up at him. “Hm…what are you thinking?” She asked curiously.

Their fingers laced and for a moment he wasn’t sure. It had been the right thing to do, he thought simply. She was beautiful, wise, and courageous. Tenten had adapted to his handicap as well as Lee’s, and she said that she cared about him. What more reason was there? “I want to be with you.” He told her softly.

Tenten’s eyebrows shot up towards her hairline. “Oh…well, um…what do you mean?” She asked, taken off-guard by the statement.

“I would like very much to be your boyfriend.” Neji clarified for her.

“Eh!” She felt fireworks go off in her stomach, “I-I…I can’t say that this is the…best time or place…for that.”

He chuckled at the reply, “It isn’t?”

Tenten let out a shallow breath, “I just don’t know what your rush is…”

“Well…something could happen to one of us.” Neji made a valid point, “Even if it’d only be for a little while, we could be…” He trailed off, staring uncertainly at the swaying chrysanthemums.

Tenten frowned inwardly. ‘Don’t be an idiot, Tenten.’ She self-reprimanded, ‘Can’t you see what he’s trying to tell you? He wants you and you’re acting like a middle-aged spinster!’ She felt like one sometimes anyway. Her grip on his hand increased slightly and he looked down again.

“Fine,” She was smiling. “Then I’m yours now.” She took a moment to marvel at her own audacity.

Initially, Neji looked confused, or maybe even taken aback that he didn’t have to debate it with her. A very relieved smile crossed his face before he leaned down and kissed her mouth.

And it was not what she had imagined it would be, nor was it like the kisses that Hikune had tried to trap her with. It went beyond, to a place in her mind where there was stillness, and it destroyed the ugly, uncertain longing that had filled her for so long and replaced it with contented affirmation and heat. These are Neji’s lips, her brain logged the event for the first time, ecstatic that they had found her’s willingly. His scent, his taste and his smoothness had surpassed all of her expectations.

Their mouths parted for a moment, and after a pause, met again with the same curious gentleness… but definite certainty that this indeed was the partner that was desired. With the second kiss Tenten understood that she could never again doubt the man beside her. Whole or in pieces; in joy or despair. They drifted apart again and looked at each other, realizing that survival had become imperative.

A short while later Lee started calling for them. Neji insisted he stay and work on awakening the Byakugan, so Tenten parted with him and returned to their shelter. Lee greeted her and showed her some gnarled, wooly looking fruits he had with him. “These are almonds.” He told her, “We can eat them later.”
Tenten smiled and gave him a high-five of approval. She followed him back into the grotto and he asked her where Neji had gotten to. She tapped her temple near her eye and he understood. “The Byakugan…” He said, “We should call him in soon. I do not want him to overdo it.”

Tenten nodded in agreement, and then rushed to her pack. She snatched up the parchment and very gingerly wrote down a note for Lee as he struck flint for a fire. When she finished she held it up for him to read.

After seeing it Lee could not contain his surprise, “Ah! Neji asked you to be his girlfriend?”

Tenten nodded, grinning.

Lee grinned back and asked, “So…what did you say?”

Tenten held up her fist and signed yes.

Lee cheered for her. If anyone had been rooting for Tenten in her romantic endeavors it had most certainly been him. He had always wanted to see her happy, and even if they were on a mission (and in dire straits,) Lee was glad that things were going well for her. “Is he going to take you on dates when we get back home?” He asked, eyes gleaming.

She shrugged. Tenten certainly would not mind if he did, but she wasn’t sure if she would be able to explain to the rest of their friends Neji’s sudden change in attitude. Once Lee had the fire going he poured the water they had acquired from the defeated nukenin and tipped it into a makeshift pot to boil. “This is all very exciting…” Lee said, crossing over to his pack and rummaging through it, “Wait until Gai-sensei hears this!”

Tenten shrieked, crossing her arms in a very combative ‘X.’ Lee laughed at her, and drew out some plundered supplies from his bag. “Relax, I will not say anything unless you want me to. You will have to explain yourself.” He smiled mischievously, “We are having soup tonight, since it’s one of the things we happened to pick up yesterday.”

She gave him an approving sign, but Lee’s cheerful expression wavered. “Tenten?” He asked after a moment.

She looked at him and he then asked, “When we get back home…after all of this…can things ever go back to the way they were before? For us and Neji, I mean.”

Tenten signed the word no. Lee looked disconcerted by the thought, but she scribbled a better explanation for him: It’s going to be different, but I don’t think in a bad way. We’re just going to have to repeat a few things, but I have a feeling it’ll all be fine.

Lee relaxed and nodded, “You are probably right.”

Neji returned when the soup was ready and sat beside Tenten. To her astonishment he announced, “I have it now.”

Tenten gave him a questioning look, “But?”

“I can see there’s no fooling you…I can use it now, but I…” He hesitated, “I’m not exactly sure what I’m supposed to do.”

“Jyukken. I’ll start showing you tomorrow, I promise.” Tenten said.

“You’re still injured, Tenten. I don’t want you-”
“I’m feeling a lot better already, and besides, we need to get moving by tomorrow at the latest.”
Tenten overrode him, “And remember, I can only teach you basic maneuvers since I’m not a Hyuga.”

He smirked at her, “I can change that.”

Tenten gave him an admonishing look. “Don’t even start thinking about that sort of thing. It’s not a good idea.” She laughed quietly at the absurdity, “And you know that it would just be a name change, it’s not like I’d get any special powers or anything.”

He pulled her against his chest, mumbling, “I just want you by my side.”

Tenten frowned slightly, “That’s all I’ve ever wanted too. But you know…when we get back…you might find someone you like more-”

“Never.” He said tersely.

“We’ll see.” Tenten said with a sigh, “Just save these things for when we get back to Leaf, alright?”

“Alright.” He agreed.

Lee, though he could not hear a word they were saying, was very amused by just watching their exchange. He served them soup and said it was their “congratulatory dinner.”

Neji took up the parchment and scrawled a note for Lee. His friend read it and frowned at the message, “Pardon? I am not corny!”

The next day they packed up and set out. Now with the assistance of the Byakugan, Tenten was much more confident about cutting through the wilderness. Neji was a bit intimidated by his ability, though, and frequently stopped using it because he felt his blood limit was ‘voyeuristic.’

“It’s alright, Neji.” Tenten kept telling him, “Lee and I, we really don’t mind. It’s just bodies, and it never used to bother you.”

“Was I a pervert, by any chance?” He asked crossly.

Tenten laughed, “Quite the opposite. In your clan you don’t take the human form seriously. Or, yes, you’re all a bunch of secret perverts.”

He cracked an amused smile. Neji continued on, leading them through the forest with Tenten’s combined knowledge and direction. Shortly before noon he stopped them after spotting something. “Up ahead…they’re still a way off.” He reported, “It’s a woman and two men…they look like they’re sick. They’re sitting around and trying to rest.”

“Yeah, I remember them. Wow, that group must have caught something bad if they’ve been ill for this long…” Tenten answered, “Can you see the other three anywhere?”

“No, they are not here.” He told her certainly.

Tenten signed to Lee how there were three nukenin due north of them, but they did not pose a threat. Lee thanked her for the update. They continued on unnoticed past the ailing shinobi, and found the mountain path they had first set out on. It would lead them straight back to the inn they had stopped at on their first day, but Tenten determined it was too risky to put themselves in plain sight of the town.
“They’ll definitely be expecting us.” Tenten theorized, “We should hang tight for one more day and camp out. We’ll make a break for the harbor, and if it’s just the three of them, well…” She grinned, “That shouldn’t be a problem.”

Neji liked the plan, and after Lee reviewed the written version he also agreed to it. Outside of the bayside town they set up another camp in an overgrown forest. Tenten had Neji do one last sweep of the area before being absolutely sure Keshin and the others were not around. The cedar trees provided good cover, and Lee went off to hunt one last time while Tenten led Neji off to train.

“For starters, I’m going to need you to look at me with your Byakugan.” Tenten told him, and watched him quail in reaction, “Not in the dirty way, Neji, the fighting way. You need to get a sense of the chakra circulatory system again.”

“I don’t know about this.” He said quietly.

Tenten huffed in exasperation. “Look,” She said pointedly, “You’re going to be seeing a lot of semi-naked people from now on, the only difference is that they’ll probably be trying to kill you. Please pay attention.”

She pointed to the center of her ribcage, “Solar Plexus.” Then above her breast, “Heart.” Then at the point where her neck and skull met, “Brain stem.” Neji nodded and took note. “These are three kill-zones, if you drill them with chakra; you can say see you in hell.” Tenten summarized it, “You usually are less direct. You can shut off their tenketsu so they can’t use chakra…or just make them pass out by attacking their organs.”

“That’s brutal.” He said.

She smirked, “That’s Gentle Fist.”

He smiled at her, intrigued.

“I want you to get a good look at my system, for reference.” Tenten told him, “Then we’ll work on forms. I’m not going to let you hit me, but you should be able to visualize it.”

He understood. Neji ventured another look, getting over the awkwardness, and accustomed himself to the sight of chakra pathways. Tenten proceeded to demonstrate forms, although it took a while to get his stance correct. They were basic but essential moves that he copied accurately, and the ones Tenten could not show him she spoke about.

“Your rotation keeps all attacks at bay, it’s very impressive.” She told him, “It kind of looks like this.” Tenten spun in a circle, palms outward, her feet skidding in the dirt.

Neji laughed, “How would that protect me?”

“Well when you do it you’re releasing chakra from your tenketsu and moving so fast that you create an actual shield.” She added, “I can’t duplicate that.” Tenten paused in thought, “Oh! And the new technique you perfected: Air Palm. You can hit someone even if they’re not nearby.” She frowned, “I hate it when you use that one on me.”

He looked puzzled, “I’ve used it on you?”

“When we were training, a while ago.” Tenten told him, “You need someone to help you with your jutsu, you know.”

He touched her cheek tenderly, “But I don’t want to hurt you.” Tenten sighed at the contact and took a step back, ready to continue.

“You won’t hurt me anymore, Neji. You don’t even know half the things I’ve been talking about anyway.” She told him, and attempted to mimic the ‘Rotation’ again.

“I’m sure it must look cooler when I do it.” He suspected.

“On a good day. Sometimes it messes your hair up.” Tenten said playfully. She then took an offensive stance and said, “Now show me what you’ve learned.”

Neji raised his hands, circling her for an opening.

Later in the day they found Lee at camp. He had been able to find some peaches in an orchard that belonged to one of the locals. “I helped myself.” He explained.

They sat around and ate, and Lee was pleased to read that Neji was working on Jyukken. Tenten predicted that Neji would be back to his low-average fighting level within a week or two of training. She would prefer it if they were in the Leaf Village when they did it, though.

Lee sat across from the two, unable to hear a thing. He was not sure what to make of the new interaction between his teammates. To date, Lee was not sure if he had ever seen Neji smile so much at one person in the years he had known him. Lee was beginning to feel like an intruder in their space, “Um…should I leave you two alone for a while?”

Tenten frowned at him and signed no. After lunch they asked Lee to train with them. He was a good match for Neji, pushing him to get creative with his Jyukken, and Tenten sometimes cut in when she felt she would not be hurting her shoulder.

For the remainder of the day they rested and ate lightly. At night they slept in a huddle, as it was still unwise to make a fire, and they took watches in shifts.

Early the next morning they took the soldier pills they had won, and set out before the townspeople would be on the streets. They passed through cautiously, but Neji reported no sign of the nukenin whatsoever. Tenten found it extremely unusual. It was when an older woman poked her head out of the front door of a house and beckoned them over that things took a bad turn.

“Can we help you, madam?” Lee asked politely.

“Are you those Leaf ninja who came through here a while ago?” She asked nervously.

“We are.” Neji confirmed it.

“You’ve done a fine job, getting my husband kidnapped!” She hissed at them, “Those damn forest rascals came in here and said: There’s no way those Leaf brats can sail out of here if the ship’s captain isn’t around! And they took him away! Just like that…”

“Where are they?” Tenten asked quickly, “Ma’am, we’ll bring your husband back to you. We never wanted to cause trouble.”

“They’re at the harbor. I don’t think they’d hurt him, but…” Her eyes reflected sorrow, “They’re not going to let you leave this place alive. I would understand if you fled to save yourselves…but I don’t think they’ll return him to me so easily.”

“We’ll help you.” Neji said, “This is our responsibility.”
Tenten gave the Hyuga an uncertain look but she too agreed. The old woman thanked them breathlessly and they departed, Tenten scratching down the situation on parchment for Lee. He read about their predicament and was troubled, “If they have leverage on us…they will not be easily defeated.”

“We need to ambush them.” Tenten announced, and then smiled at her boyfriend, “And with Neji here we can do just that.”

They crept up a forested slope that overlooked the harbor below. The breeze blew in from the ocean, which meant tracking-ninja, wherever he was, would not be able to smell them.

With his Byakugan, Neji reported the positions of the three enemy ninja who were holding the old skipper prisoner. “The dark haired one you were talking about, Keshin, he is there. Right now he’s talking to his companions.” Neji said, “The old man appears to be safe.”

“Good. Do you see any way we might be able to sneak up on them?” Tenten asked.

“No.” He told her, but thought about it, “Maybe if we create a diversion back here, though, it will lead them away from their position. We could do it that way.”

“Let me just tell Lee.” Tenten said, but Neji grabbed her arm, “What is it?”

“Behind us!” He warned.

She and Neji leapt back to avoid the nukenin who had discovered them, but Lee had not heard the cry. Tenten watched helplessly as Lee was struck in the back by one of the enemy shinobi, and sent tumbling down the sandy slope, in clear view of Keshin and his companions. Neji rounded on the newcomers, his Byakugan active, “I didn’t expect this…”

“What? That they’d notice us?” Tenten said, standing back-to-back with him.

“No.” He smirked, “These are the sick ones.”

Then it hit her: the medic nin and her two ailing friends had come back to help out the rest of their group. Tenten sprang, summoning a storm of weaponry that her enemies scattered to avoid. Their reactions were sluggish. Neji caught one of them, not dealing any severe damage with his Jyukken, at first, but after a scuffle struck his opponent in the gut. The sick man crumpled, out of energy to fight as it was.

Tenten had beaten the other into submission with a Bo-staff, and only the medic remained. She had no obvious talent in fighting, and immediately surrendered. “Listen!” She said fearfully, “Keshin’s the one who’s got the real problem with you. Just leave me and my friends out of this!”

“Then get them out of here if you know what’s good for you.” Tenten snarled.

The medic quickly snatched up her teammates and made herself scarce. The two Leaf ninja exited the forest, and could see Lee was already fighting against the final three nukenin. His leg weights were off, and though it was an impressive sight he would not last long on his own.

“We need to get down there.” Neji continued to observe the fight, “Lee’s strong but he can’t take all of them.”

Tenten’s expression had stilled with seriousness, “I want you to stay here, Neji.”
Shocked, he gave her an uncomprehending look, “Why?”

“I don’t want you fighting Keshin again. He knows your style and he’ll go right for you if he sees you again.” Tenten warned him, “If you stay here Lee and I can take care of it.”

“I won’t let you do this alone.”

“I want you to be safe!” She protested, “I couldn’t do that for you the last time.”

Neji cupped her chin with his hand and gave her a stern look, “I have to go down there. We can’t help what happens.” Tenten was scowling, but not because she was angry. She let him pull her against his chest in a sincere embrace.

“I can’t shrink behind you forever. I’m a shinobi and I need to fight. That’s what you taught me.” He told her, “And if something happens…however bad it is…wait for me. I know how to get back to you.”

Tenten was still against it, but her grimace faded. “I’m holding you to that!” She warned him.

Neji took it as a valid answer. He leapt down the crumbling slope and Tenten had no choice but to follow.

At first Lee thought he had the advantage of surprise. He had an unpleasant fall down the slope, but once at the bottom, Keshin and the others looked genuinely startled. They could hardly believe he was by himself. Lee needed little more reason to attack.

No one anticipated his speed, which also helped, but Lee’s audio black-out left him vulnerable to the directions they shouted amongst themselves. He smashed one of the nukenin in the face with a flying kick, but noticed Keshin approach from behind a fraction too late. The tracker had decked him with a powerful arm, and Lee soared across the clearing like a rag doll.

The old man, from where he was tied to a docking post, hollered in Lee’s favor…however bleak it appeared. “Give ‘em a left, sonny!” The captain squawked, “A left!”

Even without hearing the encouragement, Lee staggered to his feet anyway. He was about to take off running again when a ninja had hit him with a weighted chain. The side-swipe tripped his feet out from under him, snaring around his ankle, but Lee was free to run. The nukenin cried out as he was dragged across the shipyard by his own chain, and Lee proceeded to do battle with the other two thugs.

“Get up, Jessa!” Keshin snarled at his teammate, “Don’t just let him drag you around!”

Jessa caught the chain around an unused anchor and it snapped, detaching him from Lee’s stampede. “I could use another weapon, Pejite!” The fire-haired nin called to his friend. Pejite summoned an iron-tipped spear and tossed it to Jessa as he tailed after Lee.

The three nukenin coordinated their attacks, attempting to surround Lee, but a storm of kunai and shuriken forced them back. Lee was appreciative when his teammates had arrived. Tenten dove straight for Keshin, intent on distracting him from Neji. A relentless barrage of weaponry, with the help of a Shadow Clone, poured down from her airborne scroll. She effectively cornered the tracker with a wall of metal.

Lee had reset his focus on Jessa; meanwhile Pejite directed his attacks at Neji with a hachiwari he summoned.
The Hyuga drew Hok and countered Pejite’s sloppy strikes. He was a mediocre ninja at best, compared to how Tenten made use of tool-summoning scrolls. Neji was comfortable enough breaking his foe’s guard, catching the crux of the hachiwari, and pried it out of his enemy’s hand with a sword-flick. Their weapons flew a distance before sticking into sandy soil. The coward made a break to run towards the wharf, but Neji reacted on reflex. He pummeled Pejite with the rudimentary Jyukken he had been tutored in. Lee attempted to assist before Jessa chased him off again with his spear.

Meanwhile, Keshin had used a strange jutsu that had amplified his strength, and Tenten struggled to avoid the lumbering brute as he tore apart the shipyard with his bare hands. Tenten could hear somewhere behind her Lee opening his chakra gates. His foe tried to interrupt the attempt with Fire Style techniques. Plumes of flame danced across the harbor, and Tenten feared her teammates would not fare well against the enemy’s Ninjutsu. Keshin came crashing down next to her and Tenten was thrown back. ‘Ugh! I owe this bastard for ruining everything! I think I know how to thank him…’

She had only made two previous attempts while in Konoha, and under Hayate’s supervision, at that. Even so, Tenten could not come up with a reason not to summon a volatile weapon in defense of her team, ‘I’m bleeding anyway.’ With a swipe of blood and the appropriate hand signs, Tenten pressed her hand against the grit of the seaside road.

Her summoning matrix spread an unusual pattern on the ground, and Keshin caught up to her, somewhat curious about what strategy she had adopted.

“Ha! Getting tired, you wee little bitch? What’s that you got there?” He grinned a crooked smile, “And how’s your friend after you dropped him?”

Tenten fixed her eyes on the man furiously. The ground split apart and erupted. Keshin leapt back, caught off guard, and observed in silent wonder.

The old jian called Susumajin rose up in an ornate sheath, and then rested at the lip of the fissure. The kunoichi walked by calmly and lifted it up. While her foe took an extra moment to wonder what sort of jutsu could pull weapons out of the ground, Tenten unsheathed the short sword. The blade metal had an obsidian tint to it, and while the young woman took aim at the nearest throat in sight, the sword had already begun its wicked work.

Keshin was aware of the feeling; abrupt, like an invisible gust that struck and then ceased. It had taken a considerable amount of his chakra with it. The pulse had shaved away the chakra of anyone near it, paused as if to analyze what it took, and then Tenten rushed at her enemy while he scrambled to gather energy again. A beat later, another ‘chi-stealing-wave’ swallowed an exponential amount of chakra from its target.

For fear of losing another third of his energy, Keshin charged, wanting to get the first strike in, but Tenten swung her sword before he had a prayer of attacking. A corrosive, leeching chakra soared off of the blade and hacked into Keshin, carving a deep gash in his chest. He fell back with a scream, burned by the attack, and Tenten needed only to drive the point of the jian into his jugular notch to end the threat finally.

Before Susumajin could begin mathematically (and indiscriminately) decimating the chakra reserves of Tenten’s own teammates, she sheathed it and threw it back into its burrow, and the ground closed up after receiving it.

Lee had hit Jessa with a hammer-punch that sent him streaking like a comet into the lagoon. Tenten looked past her teammate as she ran, and was alarmed to see one of six Water Clones disarm Neji. She watched in horror as Hok was knocked from his hand and the bunshin closed in. Somehow, without it even looking rehearsed, the Hyuga took a textbook perfect Gentle Fist stance.

Tenten felt her mouth hang agape when Neji threw himself into a rotation and destroyed the water clones surrounding him. Pejite stumbled back, but could not counter as Neji descended on him with merciless stabs of Jyukken. The last nukenin was promptly defeated. Lee closed his gates and began looking around for his leg weights, having forgotten where he ditched them.

Tenten crossed the shipyard and picked up Hok. She heaved a deep sigh. Neji turned around and faced her. ‘He doesn’t have a scratch on him!’

She beamed, “That was amazing!” Tenten threw her arms around his shoulders in a loving hug, managing not to clip him with the sword.

Neji did not return her embrace. For a moment she thought maybe he had gotten hurt, but she could feel tension in his muscles. He was rigid and uncomfortable, and it slowly occurred to her that he didn’t like being touched. Tenten took a step back and looked at his face. He appeared very confused.

Something in her chest wrenched. Neji took Hok from her and slid it back into its scabbard. He slipped the baldric from his shoulder and handed it back to her, “Here, Tenten. I’m not sure what I was doing with this.”

She took it back from him with a shaking hand. Tenten inhaled deeply before asking, “Are you alright, Neji?”

“I am.” He told her as he glanced around, “Although…I can’t say I know how we ended up here.”

“Ah.” She laughed faintly, and then looked over her shoulder for Lee. He was untying the captain, who was singing Lee’s praises even though he could not hear them.

“Lee’s deaf right now.” Tenten informed Neji, “Do you remember why?”

He gave her an odd look, “He can hear perfectly well.”

“No, he can’t…” Tenten rubbed her temples, trying to relax, “What do you remember last, Neji?”

“We were fighting Keshin near the gorge.” He told her, “And then, inexplicably, we fought here back where we started.”

The entire week had just gone up in smoke. ‘Neji’s brain just did a total reboot.’ Tenten noted, ‘And here I thought it was never going to happen.’

Lee crossed over to them with the skipper. “Neji! You fought very well today!” He commented, “We should bring the captain back home now, what do you think?”

Neji looked completely perplexed. Tenten patted his shoulder and promised, “I’ll explain everything.”

After disposing of what remained of their vanquished enemies, the team returned the captain to his wife. The old woman invited them for tea to show her appreciation. They sat on the front porch of her house, and Tenten first explained to Lee, on parchment, what had happened to Neji.

Lee gave her a worried look. “Does he remember what happened between…you two?” He asked quietly.
Tenten signed no. Lee looked away from her. He did not speak for the rest of the afternoon.

Tenten then elaborated for Neji how he had been injured, how she and Lee had worked to help him, and how Lee had eventually been hurt as well.

“I’m hoping Tsunade-sama will be able to do something for him when we get back home.” Tenten told him.

“Why was I carrying your sword before?” Neji asked her.

“I gave it to you.” Tenten answered, smiling, “You handled it pretty well.”

Neji took a sip of the tea and she watched his face, waiting for a sign of recognition. There was nothing. He only recalled how they’d crossed through a jungle and begun spying. The rest he had to take her word for. He said he appreciated everything she and Lee had done for him. “I am indebted to you.” Neji told her.

Tenten waved it off, and then theorized how his brain was compensating. “It must have been the fight…you see, once you’d forgotten things I wouldn’t let you get into any battles. Not really. I didn’t want you to get hurt.” Tenten explained, “Your instincts must have kicked in back there and helped you remember your most recent…memory?” She was no psychologist, so she lacked the scientific terms to make it sound sophisticated.

“Or it was sheer dumb luck.” Neji pointed out. Even he counted himself fortunate in such a dangerous situation.

“Tsunade-sama will have to check you too when we get back. There still might be something wrong with your…wiring.” Tenten added, “But other than that, I’m glad you’re back with us!”

He nodded. The smile she had gotten used to seeing was absent. Tenten glanced over to Lee and could see he had not touched his drink. He sat in silence while staring at the harbor.

“Is he well?” Neji asked her.

Tenten had a sinking feeling that Lee’s heart had broken even before hers had. In fact, she was surprised that she felt no remorse at all.

The Fog Skipper had actually been prepared to sail since the day prior. Due to the captain’s kidnapping, mates postponed the return trip to the mainland. Only a few people boarded the ship, and when Chief Mate Ondo saw how filthy and worn-out the team of Leaf ninja looked as they crossed the deck, he ushered them along, “Whoa! You three were here for over a week! Were you fooling around in the jungle?”

“You could say that.” Tenten replied tiredly.

“That’s crazy dangerous, but you probably realized that. Follow me. There’s a nice room available on the port side and I think you guys will need it.”

With muted thanks, the team followed Ondo to a room they supposed would be, optimistically, twice the size of their former closet. It was a startling delight to find that it was a spacious and well-kept suite with a bathroom attached. The single bed was quite large and, further into the room, was a sofa fitted between cramped furniture. A wide window faced the ocean.

“This is the nicest cabin we have. If you need anything else just give me a shout.” The muscled man advised them.

Lee observed out loud, “Much better! The mate did not ask us to pay for this?”

Tenten signed no to him.

They set their bags and supplies down, grateful for a comfortable room for when their beaten bodies and minds needed it most. Tenten, ever the proactive one, fetched parchment and scribbled a note to Lee as he took a seat on the edge of the bed. She handed it to him and then spoke to Neji as he lingered near the window, “If you two don’t mind I’m going to wash up. Please look after Lee, for now.”

Neji nodded slowly, finally noticing that her white cheongsam had been replaced with a black shirt. He had clearly missed things. It was still a muddle when he attempted to pry open his memory, seeing a plethora of odds and ends, but nothing that recalled a wardrobe change. Tenten retreated to the restroom with a few items from her bag.

There was a familiar lurch as the ship began to pull away from shore. ‘There.’ Neji thought. The ordeal was over, ‘Whatever it was.’ Tenten had given him a rough overview of what occurred, but he felt a few more details would be beneficial. He came to stand beside Lee as his teammate gingerly laid back, allowing his muscles to relax after days of struggle.

“I want you to tell me-” Neji was interrupted when Lee quickly handed the scroll to him without looking. Miffed, Neji took the parchment and brush to express his thoughts as he had seen Tenten do before.

After a moment, Lee was nudged with the scroll. The boy sat up to read the message:

Are you angry with me?

Lee frowned in confusion, “What do you mean, Neji? I am not angry at all.”

On paper, Neji continued, You have barely spoken to me since we fought those nukenin. You’re clearly upset about something. Did I do anything offensive that I can’t remember?

“No, Neji. Nothing offensive. I suppose I am trying to get used to you being yourself again.” Lee explained.

I wasn’t myself?

“It could not be helped. You had no recollection of anything, as Tenten told you. What I meant was that it changed your behavior.”

Neji blanched at the thought. How dramatic of a change did Lee mean? He asked for his friend to elaborate.

“Well…you tried very hard to please us. You were aware of what a challenge it was for us to protect you without your abilities. You wanted to make up for it, Neji.” Lee tapped his chin, “You also laughed a lot more.”

Horrified, he wrote, What did it sound like?

“It did not sound annoying.” Perplexed, Lee added, “You do not know the sound of your own laugh?”
Wouldn’t it be stranger if I did?

Lee cracked a smile, “Maybe.”

Neji sighed in mild dismay. So he had acted foolishly, albeit he had not known any better.

“Because I feel we have grown closer as friends…I can give you an honest assessment based on how you normally are…” Lee wagered, tilting his head to think, “Your laughter and the sounds you made were by no means out of the ordinary. You asked many questions but they were perfectly valid. You were quite optimistic and forward-looking. You also…”

When Lee paused for too long Neji inquired in ink, What? What else did I do?

“You spent as much time with Tenten as you possibly could.” Lee announced, “You were very attached to her.”

Neji stared mutely as he processed the information.

“You wanted to know about her life and the things she liked. As I recall, she had no problem sharing those things with you. But…oh, how do I put it?” He furrowed his prominent brows, “When all of that stopped satisfying…”

“What?” Neji growled, knowing that Lee could at least visualize what he had said.

Lee finally reached a fitting description, and with a pointed finger he announced, “You solicited romance.”

Neji returned to his processing. While the silence hung and he stared at a wall, Neji abjectly flailed his mental self for acting inappropriately.

“It is alright!” Lee assured him, “Tenten was not upset by it.”

Then you can confirm that I acted like a fool?

”Not in any sense, Neji.” Lee disagreed, “I feel that…you merely acted as you would have if you did not have your-” He gestured at Neji’s scowling face, “Tremendous pride filtering your every word. If you stopped fearing the possibility of Tenten rejecting you-” Lee stopped speaking and dodged when Neji lashed out angrily, barking words that he couldn’t hear.

When he calmed down Neji managed to write out, I do not fear rejection.

“Of course you do.” Lee stated matter-of-factly, “I know how you feel, Neji. We have spoken about it already. If Tenten for any reason distanced herself from you while we are together as a team, it would risk the precious friendship that you value above all else.” He nodded wisely, “That may the one thing you cannot be careless with.”

Your inability to hear has made you shockingly bold.

“If you did not trust my opinion then I know you would not have asked for it.” Lee stated simply.

Neji groaned in aggravation, unable to contest his friend’s claim. Lee patted his shoulder reassuringly before asking, “Is there…anything that you can remember?”

They sat side-by-side on the edge of the bed in silence. After fishing for anything significant, Neji reported on paper, There was fruit.
“Yes!” Lee chuckled in disbelief, “Those were figs.”

Neji nodded. That was about all he could recall.

The door of the bathroom opened a crack and Tenten’s voice sounded, “Can someone…take a look at my back, please?”

As Neji was the only person who could hear the request, he stood and crossed over to the small compartment. Before he could form words to ask what her concern was, Neji laid eyes on a wound on Tenten’s shoulder that had begun to fester. He inhaled after a moment, shocked, “What happened?” He pushed into the room as she was reasonably covered with a towel.

“I was injured in a fight a few days ago. I thought I had been going easy and it wasn’t hurting…” Tenten glanced over the gash in the mirror, “Looks like it got infected.”

“How were you hurt?” Neji asked.

“When we were fighting those rogues I got tangled in a chain-scythe. You did too, actually.” She smiled, “Lee made him pay for it.”

Neji’s practical nature reasserted itself. Without further acknowledgment, he crossed back to Lee and wrote him an update. Lee reached for his travel bag (now containing extra spoils from fallen foes) and rummaged through it, “Ah ha! This bottle has enough antibiotics for two weeks. And…” He retrieved a small plastic box, “There is some ointment in here too.”

Neji accepted the items and returned to Tenten, placing the bottle of medicine in her hand, “You’re going to need this.” He examined the angry red patch of skin surrounding the cut on her shoulder blade, “Hold still.”

She restrained a hiss when he dabbed antibacterial ointment on the wound. While working Neji noted, “Lee did these stitches.”

“Yeah.” She peeped, breathing laboriously.

“They’re very good.”

Tenten exhaled through pursed lips. Neji did not overlook the numerous cuts and scrapes that lined her exposed skin. When he concluded the care of her wound, Neji bowed his head in disappointment, “I burdened you. If I had been able to defend myself, you would not have-”

“It’s fine.” Tenten cut him off, “You would have done the same for me, Neji.” She gently nudged him out the door, “I’ll be ready in a little while!” The compartment shut before he could express his regrets.

While Tenten had a point, Neji was not thrilled that she could not at least hear out his apology. They would have saved considerable time and energy if he had not taken a thoughtless plunge off a ravine ledge. Tenten had protected both him and Lee while they were weakened, but she had sustained significant injuries. On top of that, he could hardly understand how she had maintained an upbeat attitude through it all.

He returned to the space where Lee was sitting and his teammate flagged him down, “Neji! You must read this!” He held up a scroll that had been retrieved from a travel bag, “This document specifies what those rogue ninja were looking for!”

With a raised eyebrow, Neji accepted the scroll and looked it over.
Compensation: 30,000 Ryo a participant

Objective: Confirm coordinates of the tomb containing the seal of the Demon Moryo. When located, avoid contact with tomb guards. Do not alert retainers or High Priestess of the Demon Country. Do not alert daimyo of Marsh Country. Execute any bystanders or shinobi who choose to interfere. Report findings at headquarters to accept reward; no substitutions. Zero liability for injury sustained by interference or terrain.

Issuer: Lord Yomi

“Hm.” Neji was slightly impressed by the scale of treachery in the document, “The Hokage will appreciate us forwarding this to her.” He added, “And it seems prudent to notify the lords of the Marsh and Demon countries.”

Lee observed Neji uncertainly, having made an attempt to lip-read. Neji transcribed the idea on paper and Lee got the message, nodding in agreement.

Tenten reappeared with her hair tied up, fully dressed, and gestured towards the bathroom. “It’s free. You both should get cleaned up before we find something to eat.”

“I agree.” Neji handed her the shady mission request, “Read this for now. Tsunade-sama will find it invaluable.”

While Neji took his turn to bathe, Tenten was enlightened by the scroll they had pilfered from fallen rogues. ‘How about that? The whole time we were close to a tomb…but we ended up playing tag in the jungle with mercenaries.’ It was an exceptional waste of time, yet somehow they had fulfilled their mission parameters.

She and Lee sat down on the armchairs near the window to discuss the mission.

“Are you going to tell Neji anything?” Lee inquired.

With ink she replied, I don’t know if I should. At least not now. He probably wouldn’t believe me if I told him what happened.

“He would.” Lee insisted.

Alright. Even if he did believe me, it doesn’t change the fact that he may not feel comfortable agreeing to the things he agreed to when he wasn’t in his right mind. I don’t plan on forcing him into something he does not genuinely want.

“I feel that it is something worth talking about. Neji has come a long way.” Lee disagreed, “And I thought that you…might be upset about him forgetting.”

Tenten took a pose of contemplation, crossing her legs, “Well…” She wrote another response, It’s a minor setback. I don’t have anything to be sad about, considering that we’re all here in one piece.

“True.” Lee yielded.

You still can’t hear anything?

“There is occasional tinnitus.” He shook his head, “But nothing so far.”

I really hope Tsunade-sama can help you!

“I hope so too. Though, I think I can get along quite well with this handicap if I must.” Lee seemed determined, “I wanted to ask you about something else, Tenten.”

She nodded as she listened.

“I saw you use it very briefly: a sword that came out of the ground.” He recalled, “What was it?”

Tenten hurriedly penned her answer, _I was going to tell you about it. It’s called Susumajin. That sword is an heirloom weapon passed down from my ancestors. I am pretty sure the Hiyumi is an heirloom weapon from the same line, too._

“Ah, I see. Why did you not continue to use it?”

_It’s dangerous. I can’t feel the effects, but when I trained with Hayate he explained that it didn’t take long for most of his chakra to be eroded. The sword siphons chakra away and stores it. I am not sure what else it does, but it isn’t appropriate for battles with teammates nearby. It helps end things quickly, I’ll give it that._

“And you must summon it with hand seals like a contract summon?”

She nodded.

“How odd.” Lee rubbed his chin, “Is there a person inside it?”

Tenten gave him a dumbfounded expression, unable to answer.

“What I mean is, do you know if anyone was sealed with it?”

_How am I supposed to know that, Lee?! And more importantly: how could YOU know that?_

“I have read about it.” He said simply.

_WHAT are you talking about?_

“The book you gave to Neji as a gift.” Lee elaborated, “I have read it. I do not know if Neji has finished it yet, but I returned it to him…”

_Are you trying to tell me that this sword was in that history book?_

“That is exactly what I mean.” He confirmed, “And…maybe you will benefit from reading about it. That book was kept in your family, and I imagine there was a purpose.”

Tenten leaned back in the chair, puffing, finding it hard to digest that Lee was so good at paying attention.

“When we return home, ask Neji if he has finished. I think you need it more.” Lee determined.

She nodded tiredly.

Neji returned after a short while and Lee was able to wash up. They ventured above deck to be served a meal. Afterward, Neji decided it was worth asking around if anyone had ever heard of the Tomb of Moryo.

The only person who had a remote idea of what they were referring to was the old sea captain. While at the helm, he explained, “Yes, that monster was sealed a long time ago by the Priestess Miroku. Her family resides in the Demon Country. That’s about all I’ve heard.” He twitched his mustache, “It would not be easy or smart to try to find that vault…but I guess some greedy knuckleheads will try “Do you know where the tomb is?” Tenten asked.

“Nope. I don’t think anyone around here does, for our own safety.” The man speculated.

They thanked the captain for his honesty and for ferrying them home. Tenten began her regimen of antibiotics while Lee took Dramamine at the first sign of motion-sickness. The team could not spot hide nor hair of the other few passengers aboard.

While observing the ocean by rails at the bow of the ship, Tenten looked at Neji critically, “I never did ask you if your head has bothered you.”

“Not at all.” He confirmed.

Lee was on a bench meters behind them, practicing knots with loose mooring line.

“Tell me if you remember anything, alright?” Tenten requested.

“I will.” He shut his eyes to concentrate on the sea breeze, “Though…I do think I know what we ate.”

Tenten laughed at the thought, “Well, that’s something at least. How about trying to cut your hair off? Remember that?”

He looked at her incredulously.

“I stopped you, of course.”

“Thank you.” Neji leaned his chin on the heel of his hand, “That might explain the way my hair was tied.”

“Oh yeah. You wanted it in a ponytail.” She added, “It looked good.”

He glanced at her from the corner of his eye. A few of the things she spoke about sounded familiar, in a distant sense.

Later in the evening, after a meal and enjoying more fresh air beneath the stars, the team retired to their cabin. No one made a fuss as the lights were snapped off and they sorted themselves. Tenten happily collapsed front-ways onto the bed, overjoyed to have space. Lee made a motion to Neji across the room, encouraging him to join the kunoichi. With a sound of annoyance that Lee could not hear, Neji ignored the suggestion and took the sofa instead.

Foiled, Lee settled down for sleep in the free space of the bed and attempted to minimize his snoring.

The next day was punctuated with a gentle drizzle of rain. Gray clouds loomed as far as the eye could see, but the captain steered them away from the worst of the storm.

After waking, the teammates ate below deck in a mess hall, virtually devoid of passengers with the exception of cooks.

When the morning dragged by uneventfully, the bored ninja wandered around the ship. They even passed by their previous cabin, which was a sorry sight. The group stumbled across Chief Mate Ondo who was escorting a tiny old woman around.
“This is my Grandma.” The burly mate introduced, “She’s got some shopping to do in the Fire Country.”

The old woman was a firecracker who demanded entertainment. If the so-called shinobi could not fight each other to the death for her enjoyment, then she would settle for their life stories.

They shared brief anecdotes about their lives as an alternative.

“She might really like watching the Chunin Exam Finals.” Tenten suggested.

“Grandma was there last year. I don’t think she’d miss it for the world.”

Rain began to fall in a torrential curtain and the passengers quickly retreated below deck. The day resumed uneventfully from then on, and Lee held a conversation about the impending Chunin Exam with his teammates through paper.

“I expect we will pass this year.” Lee speculated, “What did the flier say the date was?”

Tenten scribbled, June 26th. It’s a week before Neji’s birthday.

He nodded, “Hm. So we will have two things to celebrate in that case.”

They ate dinner in the mess hall again, and Lee retired to sleep early when his stomach felt unsettled. Tenten made a venture above deck again, but the rain fell steadily. She and Neji lingered in the sheltered doorway of the stairwell to keep dry.

Tenten broke the long silence, “Do you still have that book I gave you, Neji?”

“I do.” He confirmed, “Do you need it back?”

“No, no.” She raised her hands, “I was just wondering if you read it.”

“I am part of the way through.”

“Will you tell me if it gets weird?”

“It already did. The protagonist is a character with your namesake, although that isn’t the part…that’s strange.” Neji elaborated. He still was not over the fact that the shinobi named Tian Tian had married a student nearly ten years her junior.

“Yeah. Lee mentioned it.”

“I will tell you when I read something significant. I understand why you’re interested.”

They returned to the darkened cabin later in the night. Tenten stopped in the bathroom to examine the progress of her shoulder’s healing. Neji stood in the center of the room, silently cursing Lee who had stretched out on the sofa in a deep slumber.

On the first leg of the trip, Neji had been eager to get close to Tenten. However, when told that he had behaved like a lovesick fool during a bout of memory loss, he felt a nagging reluctance to say or do anything in Tenten’s presence. She had not made a single mention of his actions days ago. Even so, Neji could scarcely reconcile the new, uncomfortable sensation of embarrassment.

He settled on the right side of the bed and lay rigidly on his side. The sound of rain pattered against the wide, rectangular window of the room. Tenten exited the restroom and took the space on the left with a yawn. She made no remarks as she positioned herself on her good shoulder. Neji’s frantic awareness lasted for a stretch of time before switching off abruptly. In sleep his mind quieted down.

Then came a dream that was not a dream, but a memory: Seeing sky between the open spaces of his fingers, free from any hold at the top of the ravine; Tenten’s petrified face shrinking from view as he experienced the rushing breeze from the fall. He contacted a rock face and rolled, bludgeoned by stone, dizzy when he fell again. A hard splash into water at the bottom of the gorge…

Neji could hardly keep his eyes open under the frigid stream. His limbs were not responding and his thoughts were sluggish. The pool could not have been more than ten feet deep, but it would be a great task to escape it with an uncooperative body. Happily, he was not sinking like a stone; the travel bag looped around his arm was buoyant. Above, the water’s surface trembled, light passed through in various shapes and shades. Neji could make out a face on the plane above as it stilled; perhaps it was his reflection?

But it was an older face with creases at the corner of the mouth, fair skin with a narrow jaw, a wide forehead wrapped in black cloth, and white eyes looking back at him with incredible fondness. ‘Are you going to save me?’ Neji wondered of his father, ‘Or will you leave me on my own again?’

He woke with a small start, realizing that he was flat on his back. Neji stared up at the ceiling to make sure there was not a volume of water above him. He had forgotten about meeting his father there in a canyon of the Marsh Country, at a watery window that provided a subtle glimpse of the afterlife. The next sight he could recall, though fuzzy, was Tenten and Lee sitting beside him in a cave.

Neji turned his head to observe the girl next to him. Tenten was asleep and facing towards him, with her hands curled beneath her chin. Her hair never weathered pillows well when she tied it up, but Neji quite liked how her chignons unfurled in brown tresses during the night. ‘You are the one who defends me…when he can’t.’ He thought wistfully, ‘Whenever I expect I might finally die and see him again, you stop me.’

She had become so proficient in saving his life, Neji wondered if there could ever be a proper way to repay Tenten. In the dark stillness of the cabin, he watched her face for a time before slipping his arm out and replacing it behind her. The young woman did not stir as she was pulled in carefully and shifted against Neji’s side. Her head automatically rested on the crook of his chest and shoulder while his arm folded around her.

Within moments, he was asleep again.

The teammates slept until late the next morning, and were jostled back to consciousness by the ship’s tossing and tilting. For fear of getting ill, Lee immediately rose and went above deck in the hopes of settling his stomach. Shortly thereafter, Tenten’s stirring woke Neji from sleep. He kept his eyes cleverly shut as Tenten calmly extricated herself from his arms. When he felt her stand and begin to root around her travel bag, Neji took his cue to rise. They decided to follow after Lee.

Upon observing the state of the sea above deck, the rough waters were stimulated by a whirlpool on the starboard side. After using his blood limit out of curiosity, Neji determined that they were passing through a column of water that had nearly seven whirlpools surrounding them within a square mile. Concerned that the captain had lost his mind, they decided to pay him a visit at the helm.

“Ah, you whippersnappers have no sense of adventure.” The skipper criticized, “Take heart, I use this route home all the time. I practically forged these waterways during my career!”

“And during that time have you ever sunk a ship before?” Neji queried.
“No, you smart-mouth. Why, I bet you wouldn’t believe me if I told you that it’s you Leaf Ninja that made me nostalgic for these parts.” The captain ventured, “This is the territory of your old comrades: the Land of Whirlpools.”

The name rang a bell from their Academy days, citing a textbook lesson about an allied village that had long since vanished.

“I’m eighty-nine now, but sixty years ago I would sail into the harbors here and have myself a very good time.” The old man laughed, “The Hidden Eddy Village was a center of the arts. You could catch a theater production or concert any day of the week. Oh, and the food… Oh! And the women…they were lovelier than red roses. My wife used to say this place had the most handsome men this side of the world has ever seen.”

Lee asked for a translation and Tenten set to work writing down the tale.

The skipper pointed out a window towards a landmass dotted with toppled buildings and ruins, “There it is now. When other ninja villages got scared of ‘em…the combined forces of the Eddy village and Leaf…” He clucked his tongue, “Their enemies destroyed it, down to the last toy shop. It was one of the first horrific acts of war that I witnessed shinobi commit. Mind you, I’ve seen a lot.”

In silence the passengers observed the magnificence of a derelict society. It took the lesson from their childhood and twisted it with an amplified sense of loss.

“You three seem to be…the upstanding type of ninja that I admire.” The skipper commented, dusting off his hat, “I just have one favor to ask. Whatever you do, build things up and make them better. Don’t tear something down just because you’re in competition with others. That’s the mistake that ninja keep making time and time again.”
My point is, no matter how it turns out, I will never have a reason to be disappointed. As long as I’m with you, I have what I want.

So I was wondering if maybe you could tell me how you see the future... If you let me stay by your side nothing would make me happier. I will fight for your dreams. I promise I’ll help you achieve them, Hinata. I have exactly what I need out of life right now, and I would never trade you for anything. I don’t know how significant it is coming from a guy who has known you since we were little kids, but...no man will ever love you more than I do. I’ve never stopped, not since I met you.

Hinata let out a long sigh of unencumbered relish. She was stretched out on her bed in the late night hours, reading a letter from Naruto beneath the light of a lamp. She set the scroll down and pressed it flat on the mattress, smoothing the parchment with her fingers, taking a moment to rest her face on a pillow and make small sounds of triumph.

Years ago, she was a timid girl: a mere classmate or, at best, a confidant of Uzumaki Naruto. She made no attempts to imagine that the young man would one day turn his eyes on her and see something more than that. Based on the correspondence that had arrived earlier in the day (which she had saved for an evening read,) Hinata was enthralled by the words that indicated Naruto truly understood her feelings and valued them...and he reciprocated eagerly.

‘He had so much to say...’ She recalled his mentioning of Jiraiya’s guardianship of him, and the confirmation that his parents were deceased. Naruto assumed he was not on track to attend the Chunin Exam, which she grudgingly accepted, and then he speculated about the future. While he had a more objective view about becoming a village leader someday, referencing Gaara’s experience, Naruto was surprisingly insistent on fatherhood. ‘Oh! He really gave it thought.’ He had even asked for her expectations of the future, which provided a subtle clue. Hinata, who could detect the subtext in his ramblings, breathed steadily while realizing that he was asking if she was interested in his companionship as a parent.

She folded the pillow around her head and bumbled happily. It certainly would not be an easy path to follow, but with some persistence, Hinata expected that Naruto could overcome Hyuga clan politics and become an eligible spouse. Or, with some creativity, she could manufacture a loophole and escape her clan-obligations. She decided it paid off more to be optimistic than it did to give up before trying.

Footsteps creaked on the wood floor outside her bedroom door. Hinata promptly switched the lamp off and rolled over, aware that her father made a few passes by his children’s rooms before retiring to sleep. She relocated the scroll to a bedside table and pulled her covers up, rejoicing in the dark.

‘I could. He could.’ Hinata thought, ‘We can have what we want if we try.’

She had an idea of what to tell him in a reply. She wanted those same things that he was consulting her about, and she was supportive of his goals to improve as a shinobi. Waiting for him from afar was not easy, but Hinata was certain it was worthwhile. On paper, Naruto was aflame with desires and ideas, and she could only imagine what he would be like in person when he returned.

‘Naruto-kun will be as outspoken and sociable as always, and he will work hard...’ She visualized him to be as tall and fit as the rest of her generation’s male friend-group, ‘He is wiser and more organized. There are many things he is looking forward to, and I am sure that when he sees me…’ Her eyes fluttered shut.

Thoughts of him bending down for a kiss rushed to the forefront of her mind. Hinata imagined herself backed against a wall or surface, flustered and excited; noting the way he bent an arm behind her head, and his opposite hand cupping the side of her face gently. Behind her eyelids she could see him leaning down, never setting her parted lips free, her heart on the verge of failure…

A quiet commotion of noise came from outside. Hinata stole a brief glimpse of the grounds with her Byakugan, and spotted the bedraggled Team Gai escorting Neji home. Lee and Tenten dropped Neji off tiredly, waving farewell, and reminding him that they needed to see the Hokage first thing in the morning. Neji agreed quietly and went indoors.

Hinata rested her eyes and, after a long while of musing over the possibilities in Naruto’s letter, was lulled away from consciousness. Paradoxical sleep overtook her, a vision of Sakura seated beside her in what was roughly the Star Village surfaced. It was a friendly conversation that she would not be able to recall in the morning, but they laughed and reminisced in various locations: Upon Kutaiku’s feathered back, the damp canyons of the Land of Rain, and a bench beside the cobbled main street of Hoshigakure.

Later, she would distinctly remember the devastated expression on Sakura’s face. How the girl wondered if she was not an adequate match for the man she loved. Hinata’s determination overwhelmed the dream, Don’t think that way! They were in the Leaf Village again as her friend’s morale improved. You’ll be late, so hurry. Sakura informed her, directing her towards the northbound avenue of the village. The disjointed chronology and space of her dream brought her through several recognizable locations, and though she was lost, she continued briskly.

When she finally took a moment to reassess her destination, Naruto walked casually past her, taking her hand, and guided her along. It’s alright. I know you were going this way. Elated, she stepped lively beside him, crossing through the gardens of her residence, and afterwards arrived at a not-so-familiar place.

It was inside a home; a well-lit room with a stone countertop in front of a wide mirror. Naruto stood to her left, naked and lean, peering into the looking glass as if he was inspecting stubble on his chin. Her momentary surprise abated upon acknowledging, yes, she too was entirely nude, also evaluating herself in front of the mirror. She looked into it curiously, asking sidelong of her boyfriend; Is this… are we allowed to be here? He laughed lightly, We live here. Hinata nodded in understanding.

She turned back to the glass and, in a moment of terrified wonder, observed a man’s face staring back at her. White eyes were narrowed, a mouth pursed in slight annoyance, and from beneath the bangs of white hair atop his head, two curved horns protruded. With a cry of alarm, Hinata staggered sideways into Naruto’s arms. He had no idea what startled her, but quickly comforted her. She spoke quietly, Who was that?

It’s just you. Naruto reasoned while keeping his arms secured around her.

It didn’t look like me.

No? Naruto thought on it before asking, Were you looking at every part of yourself? Like we meant to?

I don’t know how to do that. Hinata admitted.

I do. He grinned at her ravenously, I’ll show ya.
Her heart was thundering again, magnetized to his kisses, and she shed any bit of bashful hesitance that remained. Her fingertips traced over the strong planes of his body, roving up and down his neck, fiddling with the chain of the necklace that hung there. His hands responded in kind, the pad of his thumb touched lightly over her bottom lip whenever his mouth moved away; his free hand explored the smooth curves of her front and waist. Her hands stopped in his hair as Naruto’s breath whispered past her ear, his arms hoisting beneath her bottom to relocate her to the countertop.

The reality of it, though fabricated in her young mind, was so intense that Hinata could perceive the pressure and taste of his mouth as they kissed. She knew hardly anything about making love, but she did know that she felt him inside of her. Trembling sounds and emotions of every color leapt out of her, free and adoring, and Hinata dreamt of her wide-eyed stare at the smiling young man as they finished. He asked thoughtfully, Did you see? She frowned as she tried to think. After that, Naruto led her along again through the invented abode. She could see the horned man in every reflective surface as they moved past.

Then it was morning.

Hinata sat up, having a near-complete recall of her dream, and felt the heat radiating from her cheeks, ‘We did that…’ Her hand covered her mouth in delighted shock. Ino had once said, ‘A young woman’s brain works in mysterious ways…oh, the amazing stuff that happens there!’

Fortuitously, today was one of the days off her team had scheduled. In the coming weeks, training would intensify for the impending Chunin Exam. Today, though, she got away with sleeping in a little.

She had booked important bonding time on this free-day. Hanabi had demanded it.

Slowly, Hinata sat up in bed and stretched her arms over her head. ‘A satisfying rest!’ Color crept onto her cheeks again when she thought about it. She began her routine by neatening her bed and then carefully storing Naruto’s letter in a cabinet drawer. Hinata took a minute to brush her hair out and then dress, bustling out of her room and towards a sitting room for breakfast. If she kept her sister waiting, Hanabi would grouse about it for the rest of the day.

The morning meal was spread out on a low table when she arrived. Hinata took a seat across from her little sister, “Good morning, Hanabi.”

A strand of hair on top of the girl’s head stood up in a cow-lick, “Morning.”

“Um…did you sleep well?”

“No.” Hanabi announced, “I’ve been shorted. I won’t sleep properly until I know the Academy sets things right.”

“What happened?” Hinata’s meter of concern crept up an increment.

“I have to wait six months.” Hanabi stabbed her chopsticks into a piece of fish, “The Academy says I am not allowed to take the Graduation Exam prior to that…” Her expression reflected fury, “Because my good-for-nothing classmates can’t keep up! What kind of an excuse is that? Huh!”

Her elder sister was confused, “I have heard that the Academy does make exceptions for gifted students, so why-?”

“Because, the only way to administer the exam to me would be if I had been moved up into the next-level class. I’m better than all of them anyway, but the dumb sensei of that group refused to accept me.” Her fists rattled the table, “Dad spoke with them and everything! Those teachers hate me!”
“No, they don’t…”

“Of course they do! I’m difficult, they say. I don’t work well with others.” Hanabi blew hair away from her face and then crammed more food in her mouth, “They will hold me back because they don’t know what to do with me.”

“Maybe Father could speak to them again?” Hinata began to pick at her food.

“Like that’ll change anything. They’re intimidated by Dad too, but the superintendent said that no changes are permitted unless Chunin Instructors consent.” She gave her sister a genuinely desperate look, “Onee-san, I want to be a Genin! I know I deserve it.”

“I agree.” Hinata nodded calmly, “But it seems the only thing you can do now is wait.”

“Ugh. I can’t believe…I’m behind that guy…” Hanabi grumbled, continuing to eat.

“Who do you mean?”

“Forget it.” The girl muttered.

Hinata polished off a small bowl of egg and rice, “You said that you wanted to spend the day with me on your break from school. Do you still want to?”

“Yeah.” She replied with a full mouth.

“Good.” Hinata smiled, “We haven’t had an opportunity like this in a while.”

Hanabi sighed in mild irritation, releasing the pent-up stress before asking, “So does that mean…you got it?”

Hinata knew of what her sister was referring, “I did! Tama-chan said we can borrow it.”

“Ah, I wish we were allowed to have one here on the grounds. Our elders forbid the stupidest things…”

“I know.” Hinata acknowledged solemnly

After breakfast Hanabi tidied herself up and dressed, and the sisters then set out into the village. Their first stop was outside of the bakery that Tama worked in, and Hinata poked her head into the store to greet her friend, “Good morning, Tama-chan!”

“Oh! Hinata!” Tama smiled widely while fastening an apron and headscarf, “You’re right on time.”

“I wanted to let you know before we borrowed your bicycle for the day.”

“Sure. Here, catch!” She reached into her pocket and then tossed a key on a beaded lanyard to her friend, “That’s for the lock. Why did you need it again, if you don’t mind my asking?”

“They are not allowed on Hyuga clan grounds and…my little sister enjoys them very much.” Hinata explained in a lowered voice, “She only has the chance to ride them…when she steals them.”

“Oh! Well, today is a rental and I hope that she finds it to be just as much fun.” The older girl chuckled.

“It will be. Thank you!” She stepped out again and moved to the bike-rack at the side of the building. Hanabi was waiting there with her arms crossed, tapping her foot.
Not a moment after Hinata had undone the bike-lock, Hanabi reached for the handle bars and hopped on. She informed her sister, “I’m driving. You’re on the back, Onee-san.”

Without complaint Hinata stepped onto the bicycle pegs, held tight to her sister’s shoulders, and balanced as Hanabi took off. The only speed her sister seemed to ride at was fast, regardless of whether pedestrians were quick enough to get out of their way. In order to make the sharp left off of the main avenue, Hinata leaned to the side and assisted with the turn. From there, the course was straight down a dirt path and away from the urban area.

“Where do you normally go?” Hinata asked, “When you, um…have the chance to ride?”

“Huh, you mean when I steal some loser’s bike.” Her sister corrected, “The park on the east side of the village. No one bothers me there.”

The trip was short, considering the distance, as Hanabi stood on the pedals and thundered past the green countryside and forest. Her strength and momentum even propelled them up an incline with Hinata aboard, although chakra may have helped facilitate the climb.

At the top of a grassy hill they dismounted and walked the bicycle across a field, stopping beneath an old gingko tree. Hanabi pulled the kickstand out with her foot and then plopped down to the grass with a loud breath of relaxation. Hinata took a seat beside her, ‘It’s a beautiful day.’ The blue sky was abundant with cotton-tuft clouds that sailed by on a gentle breeze.

A peaceful quiet persisted between the pair, and Hinata at length asked, “Is there any time for Father to vouch for you again before the next Graduation Exam?”

“No. It’s two days from now. The instructors won’t budge.” Hanabi replied shortly, “I’m not a part of their class.”

“Two days.” Hinata repeated in disappointment.

“I know I’d pass.” The younger girl muttered, folding her arms behind her head, “But it looks like my rival is going to get a head start.”

Hinata perked up at the statement and glanced over at her sibling, “Your…rival is graduating?”

“He’ll probably pass the exam.”

Hinata smiled, “I didn’t know that you had a rival.”

“He talks big, like he’s some kind of star in his class…” Hanabi scoffed, “That never stopped me from kicking his butt.”

“Who is he?” Hinata was curious, holding her folded knees as she listened.

“He’s the Third Hokage’s grandson: Sarutobi Konohamaru.”

The elder sister tapped her lips in thought, “Hm. The Sarutobi clan…”

“You know what he said to me last week?” The girl seethed, “He said that the Hyuga clan doesn’t have shinobi fit or responsible enough to become Hokage, and that’s why it hasn’t happened. He said it will never happen.” She smirked at the memory, “Then I made his face bleed.”

“What a proper way to prove him wrong…”

“Well, what he said wasn’t true. I don’t have to prove him wrong.” She shrugged her shoulders on the ground, “I just wanted to show everyone that he’s too damn slow to block.”

“I see.”

“Besides, Dad told me that he thinks that one day you can be Hokage.” Hanabi recalled, “You should do it.”

“It would put me in a…awkward position.” Hinata sighed, “And I know that it is not a simple task.”

“Yeah, but our clan has a lot of political connections and money. Getting the vote for candidacy isn’t something you would even have to think about.” Her sister sat up for the debate, “All you would have to do is become as strong as you can be, Onee-san.”

Hinata smiled again, “You are very encouraging.”

“I never used to think you would amount to anything as a shinobi. Even Dad was worried sick about it…” Hanabi admitted, “Pff! Back then, there were probably dogs with better judgment than us.”

“I did not have the most graceful beginning, I know.” Hinata acknowledged, “But I had to change. I had to help my team and my friends.” She shut her eyes and surmised, “No one would have been able to believe in me if I didn’t believe in myself to start.”

“You do now, and all of our clan knows better than to doubt you these days.” Her younger sister reminded, “So…do what Dad says and become the Hokage. Then I’ll watch that stupid grin melt off of Konohamaru’s face.”

“You say it as if it’s so straightforward; to just accomplish it.”

“It is.” Her sister pressed in annoyance.

“It isn’t. I would have competition, naturally. There are always competitors for the position.” Hinata reminded her sister, “And I don’t know if I would ever have the constitution for challenging Naruto-kun.”

“Is he still on about that?”

“He would be a more sensible choice, I think.” She tilted her head to picture it.

“Your boyfriend.” Hanabi said mockingly, “You would let him get in the way? I bet he’s not even as strong as you.”

“That has nothing to do with it.” Hinata corrected, “Naruto has always planned to be Hokage someday. I never have.”

“Do it anyway!” Hanabi grumbled.

Hinata patted her sister’s back before the girl fell to the grass again in protest, refusing contact.

“Don’t be upset with me. I want to achieve my own dreams. Maybe in the past…I would have wanted to do it for you and Father; to make everyone proud.” Hinata laid back as well, “But my decisions are the ones I prioritize now. I never understood the value of choice until our clan tried to make it impossible for me.”

“Well…I understand that.” Hanabi agreed, “I would want to do what I want to do, too. I guess.”

“I’m glad.” Her sister added, “And I will always try to help you achieve the things that are important
“Hmm.” The younger girl made a sound of minuscule bother, then she shifted to lay her head on her sister’s knees, “You sound like Mom.”

“I don’t know if I can help that.”

“It’s alright. When I start to forget about her…you remind me of what she was like.” Hanabi replied soberly, her eyes skyward, “Dad appreciates it too.”

Hinata confessed quietly, “Even I worry that I will forget, sometimes.”

The sisters lounged on the secluded hill and spoke, free from scrutiny or interruptions from clansmen. Hanabi even expressed a mild curiosity about Naruto’s exploits in the Toad Valley, and wondered if his residency in the legendary dale was a sign of greatness. “He’s still way too loud.” She tacked on.

“Oh, hey!” A voice sounded over the fields, followed by a sweeping shadow. Hinata tried to diminish her sister’s surprise when her teammate swooped in for a landing nearby. Hanabi quickly sat up, on guard at the sight of a tremendous, black summoned owl.

Sato trotted over to them and grinned at Hinata, “Sunshine! How’s your day off going?”

“Very good! Hanabi and I are catching up,” She then wondered, “Are you going somewhere, Sato-kun?”

“Yeah, I have friends who live in Kaido. That town is a few miles south of here, and sometimes I like to fly out.” He rested his hands on his hips, “It’s been a while, so I thought I should use my time off to visit them. Didn’t think I’d spot you on the way…”

The gigantic owl behind them, Gyorai, stood tall like a tower, and ruffled his feathers in annoyance, “I was the one who spotted them, Sato-kun.”

“You’re right. Thanks buddy.”

Hinata gestured to the fixed-gear bike beside the tree, “Tama-chan let us borrow her bicycle. Did you see her today as well?”

“No yet.” He winked an eye, “But I will tonight.”

“Ugh.” Hanabi turned away, losing interest in the newcomer.

Hinata momentarily wondered what her friend was implicating before he turned back to Gyorai, “Well, I won’t interrupt here any longer, ladies. Enjoy the day!”

“I will see you soon, Sato-kun.” Hinata waved before he took off again, the gust of a huge wing-beat swirled leaves off of the gingko tree.

The girls settled down again after the short visit. Conversation dwindled away to silence for a stretch of time, and Hinata was coaxed into a nap. She woke when Hanabi nudged her, “Come on, Onee-san. There are things I want to do in town.”

Hinata stretched sleep out of her limbs and followed her younger sister. Hanabi then pointed at the bike seat, “You drive.”

“Really?” Hinata knew how rare of an offer it was.
“Yeah,” Hanabi confirmed, “I want to stand on the back when we pick up speed down the hill.”

By noon, Sato had touched down in Kaido outside of the Toshisue household. He knocked on the door to determine whether Anyo and Sarincha were home, but received no answer. Based on previous experience, he deduced they were occupied by their day jobs. ‘So Sarincha-san will be at the clinic, then… ’ He did not want to disturb her during a shift.

He knew for a fact that Anyo’s place of work was a bit more accessible. Gyorai departed in a puff of smoke as Sato continued on his own, following the trimmed-garden side street to the main avenue.

He arrived at the municipal building and entered, glancing around at the quiet offices and darting clerks. ‘This place is looking way more organized now.’ Since the former Mayor Seung had been investigated, arrested, and later tried in the Leaf Village for his crimes; the city was under new, anti-corruption management.

And he found Anyo in the corner office, stewing over file folders on a desk. Sato rapped on the doorframe to announce his presence.

The white haired man quickly looked up and then pushed back his seat to stand. He was delighted to have a distraction.

“Well enough. We haven’t seen as much of you as we’d like, but then we assumed you were preparing for the exam.” He added sternly, “If you don’t pass this year we will be pretty disappointed.”

“I wouldn’t want to do that to you guys.”

“Good.” Anyo shuffled around some of the stacks on the desk, “We already bought second-row tickets to watch the Final Rounds.”

“Eh! Are you serious?” Sato was shocked, “I didn’t know they were for sale!”

“Your Hokage’s advertisers and merchants are everywhere. I took advantage while I could, because I have the feeling her strategy will pay off handsomely.”

“It would…probably be the first time that’s happened for her.” Sato imagined.

“Before we get too comfortable here, allow me to finish up some work. I can leave the office and take the code book home with me for later research.” Anyo offered, “And I have no wife around for dinner tonight. You can join my table.”

Hours later, that same evening, Anyo concluded his office-related work and met Sato at his residence. He had a bag of take-out food with him. “Sarincha doesn’t eat this stuff.” He explained, supposing a teenager might not be put off by it.

They settled at a dining room table and feasted, catching up on what had occurred while they had been apart. Anyo was alarmed to hear about Sato’s brush with death while facing an Akatsuki affiliate, while at the same time awestruck by his bravery. The young man followed up the harrowing tale with more wholesome stories about missions, friends and teammates.

“I even got a new neighbor who retired from the Root Foundation.” Sato added.

Anyo raised his eyebrows, “Retired? At what age do those wolves retire?”

“Well, technically he was expelled and then recruited into the Hokage’s ANBU Black Ops.” Sato corrected thoughtfully, “We helped him get some furniture for his place. He’s not very good at anything social or…normal. But I think he’s making the effort. He’s nice to Tama.”

“Ah I see. So he’s about your age?”

“Give or take.”

“And who is Tama?” Anyo inquired, nipping at a bit of pork held at the end of his chopsticks.

“Uh. Eh-hem! She’s my…” His words failed so Sato took a hasty slurp of tea.

“She’s your girlfriend.” Anyo assumed.

“Not exactly.”

“Another neighbor?”

“Ah, well, not that either…”

“Then spit it out.” The man ordered.

“She’s my future bride.” Sato had to say it quickly before the reality of it stuck him like daggers.

“My, my…don’t you move fast?” Anyo chuckled in entertainment.

“Hey look, my uncle and her uncle set us up in an arrangement, back from when we were babies. Okay? We didn’t get much of a say.” Sato explained with a huff, “Two ‘esteemed shinobi families of Leaf, uniting their friendship’ or Gai said something like that…”

The white haired man was perceptive, “Hm, so the Hatake family has a close bond with another family in Konoha? It’s no surprise they would be so picky about matchmaking.”

“Yeah, I guess.”

“Is your famous uncle married?” Anyo asked playfully.

“No. He’s got his bachelor-pad made up…” Sato pinched his fingers to signify it, “Just so.” He added more food to his plate and said, “A woman would mess everything up for Kakashi.”

“I used to think the same way.” Anyo nodded in whole-hearted agreement, “Part of me still does.”

“What’s that supposed to mean? Sarincha is awesome!”

He shut his eyes and smiled at a memory, “I didn’t always…realize that. But yes, it’s true.”
“So what was it like back then? When you were an active Grass ninja?” Sato leaned back to stretch, wondering about his friend’s youth, “Were you always the Kakashi-type?”

“I assure you, your uncle is far nobler than I ever was.” Anyo warned him, “We might have a few things in common, but I’m about a decade older than he is.” His expression darkened, “And the war back then…was raging fierce.”

“The Third Great Ninja war?”

He nodded gravely, “Yes. Those battles shook my homeland as Rock and Leaf were at each other’s throats. We Grass ninja…dearly hoped we could avoid confrontation as they marched on our borders.”

Sato’s curious expression wilted, and he was sorry that he had asked.

“I have no grudge against anyone, just so you know, Sato.” Anyo informed him, “Yes, Rock and Leaf did unspeakable things in order to gain the advantage, but what I learned during those times was that…I was my own worst enemy.” He finished eating and began to pack up boxes, “Are you sure you want to know what it was like for me?”

“If I said no now it’d be kinda rude.” Sato quipped.

“Then I’ll tell you.” He rumbled with quiet laughter before continuing, “I was the fourth boy born to my parents, and my brothers and I were all gifted with our Bloodline Talent: the Banryoku.” Anyo poured himself some more tea, “Kusagakure depended on clans and families like us for defense, as we were almost always under attack by the powerful ninja of the Five Great nations. Small skirmishes erupted in the Second War, which killed many of my clansmen, and then the Third War…that killed the rest of my family.”

“I was five years old when my father died in battle. Eight when my eldest brother perished, my mother fell ill and passed away shortly after that…” Anyo tilted his head to recall it, “By the time I was a Genin, I only had one surviving brother left. This situation left me…terribly cynical. I acted out and caused mischief at every opportunity. I wanted to feel alive when I could, because I believed I would be dead before long…”

“Jeez, that’s awful.” Sato muttered.

The man sipped his tea and continued, “That’s how it was. Many families were wiped out while trying to defend our territories from the invading Nations. I was fortunate to have such a supportive sensei and teammates at the time my last brother, Toma, died in battle. My team became my new family.” He nodded when he said, “And I refused to trust anyone else.”

“I feel that way about my team too, except…I have many more friends that I know I can count on.” The young man assessed.

“It’s good that you do. I pushed many people away. I hated how I felt; I wanted to kill my feelings. Knowing that, it would not come as a surprise to hear that I behaved shamefully when Sarincha spoke with me one day.” Anyo sighed at the memory, “She was training to become a Medic-Nin, adding extra studies on top of the missions she took. I never once noticed her until the day she stopped me and said that she understood what I was going through.” He laughed to himself, “My brain, at that age, could not reconcile with such a sentiment. I thought she was taunting me by saying something like that. Truly, who could understand the pain I was in? No shinobi had been through suffering like mine.”
“Yeah…you needed to think outside the box just a little there.”

“I didn’t. What was worse was that she chose that time to confess to me, admitting that she had always loved me and admired my heroism.” As an aside he clarified, “On those missions, it wasn’t heroism, but stupidity. Somehow I came out looking like an intentional strategist for salvaging missions with risks…but I was a complete idiot. If only I had known.”

“What did you tell her?” Sato was preemptively cringing.

“I told Sarincha…that it was embarrassing to look at her. Someone so generic would never interest me, and that surely she had hit her head or something. I knew that I was saying hurtful things with the intent to watch her kind and genuine aura crumble and die. Right there. That way, I could test to see if she really understood what I had gone through.” He added somberly, “I…laughed at her when she wept.”

Sato lifted an empty take-out box and hurled it at Anyo’s head, “You son of a bitch! I know Uchiha who are less shitty to women than you!”

“Don’t talk about my mother like that. And please, try to realize that I was a monster of a teenager. I was hateful and selfish in an effort to forget my sorrows.”

“Yeah, but still! That poor woman was going to be your wife someday!” Sato reiterated.

“It was never supposed to happen.” Anyo confessed quietly, “We became mortal enemies after that day. Sarincha hardly spoke or looked at me for many years. I cared only about Fumio-sensei, and my teammates, Mahoto and Isumi. They were my family, and to hell with everyone else.” He scratched his chin, “It was strange when Mahoto and Isumi fell in love, but I adjusted. I personally never felt a desire for love or attachment, and watching those two sufficed when I was curious.”

“Teammates.” Sato grumbled.

“Isumi was the most beautiful kunoichi in our village. Mahoto never stood a chance.” Anyo expounded, “And the two of them were such nerds. They were perfect for each other.”

“Huh.” Sato privately wondered what qualified as ‘nerd’ in Anyo’s opinion.

“The trouble with that war was…many groups took advantage of it; none more so than drug cartels. They sold to the most miserable, desperate people they could find.” He opened his arms for clarification, “Such as yours truly.”

“Sarincha mentioned that, I think.”

“Yes. This was a group that gained earlier experience from battles in Hidden Mist and sold near that region. They wizened up and began to hang around Kusagakure, covertly, selling to shinobi who were at the end of their ropes. I was a young man who had a taste for recreational anything: stunts, alcohol, sex, gambling, danger. It didn’t matter what it was as long as I didn’t have to think much.” He snorted in disgust, “I knew many of those dealers by name and refused to turn them in to authorities. What they gave me were the bumps I would reward myself with after successful missions.”

Sato leaned against the table, mouth open, fascinated by the debauchery, “I had no idea just how grubby you were…”

“I’ll spare you the gross details, but it was a very ugly time. Mahoto quickly found out I was a recreational user, but by the time Fumio-sensei was chasing away dealers and confiscating drugs from my tool scrolls…I was a full-blown addict. There were days I laid uselessly and refused missions if I couldn’t get a fix. I knew I was letting them down, but I was a slave to it. Mahoto and Isumi helped me resist for about a year…but I began again in secret and hid it from all of them. They never knew.” Anyo shook his head, “I wanted them to have confidence in me, but I couldn’t abandon my coping mechanism.”

He and Sato stared at each other in silence, sipping tea for nearly a minute.

“Hmm. When I think about it, functional addiction is not the easiest thing to manage when the drug of choice is an injectable.” Anyo reflected, pouring himself more tea, “I lied, denied and hid. The days I blacked out I made excuses for. By the time Mahoto and Isumi were expecting their baby, at a young age, I will say…they had begun to mistrust me. They couldn’t prove what I was doing, but they didn’t have to. I became a Jounin to avoid their accusations and take separate missions from my team.”

“This is some crazy shit.” Sato evaluated, “How are you alive?”

“ Barely.” Anyo said gravely, “My family is cursed. Everyone with the Banryoku dies in battle. I suppose I wasn’t helping my plight much with how I acted…but truthfully I didn’t care if I lived or died. I won battles for my village and handed my hard-earned money over to those scoundrels.”

The young man folded his arms on the table and rested his chin on them, absorbing the tale.

“Simultaneously, Sarincha was becoming the hero that I pretended to be. She and her father were the most renowned Medical Ninja in all of the land, save for Tsunade. They could heal mortal injuries and were just as fearless in battle. Sarincha had lost both of her teammates long before she became a Jounin…but many people in our village looked up to her like a big sister. She was never alone.” Anyo emptied his cup and slowly said, “All I ever wanted to be was alone, around that time. I liked that she had all of that attention. It made me invisible. I used to tell myself I was the better shinobi, that I could go unseen and assassinate targets. But she killed just as many opponents and saved comrades on almost every mission…and I didn’t want to consider myself a slacker.”

“Must be that denial problem.”

“It consumed me. I was so blind. Mahoto and Isumi were raising their son, Shigeyuki, as best they could without support from their relatives. They never let me near him. Mahoto told me finally to quit or he would never speak to me again…and I remember just leaving him there on the street. I had stopped caring about my best friend.” Anyo went on, “One day, I was added to a squadron with Isumi and some other surviving members of our generation. I was completely high at the time we were stationed at a construction site for a new bridge. Half of the group died when we were attacked.”

“And Isumi-?”

“I brought her body home. I was certain Mahoto would kill me and I was prepared to let him do it…but he didn’t do anything. He took her and buried her, and then got on with his life, cherishing every memory and photo he had of Isumi. He smothered Shigeyuki with love, as if the focal point of the universe migrated into that little boy.” Anyo balanced his chin on his hand, “And I finally stopped. I was a patient in Migawari’s clinic and was successfully rehabilitated. I knew that it was much too late…but at least Mahoto was willing to speak to me again.”

Sato’s lip quivered sadly as he held back his emotions.

“I was healthier and stronger, and I could visit Mahoto and his prince whenever I liked. I became a reliable shinobi at long last.” Anyo recalled, “The leader of our village, Pitekuyo, took an interest in me. He trained me as his apprentice and perfected my sword techniques.”

“Everything turned around when you took that step!”

“Not everything.” He smirked, “I still had a mortal enemy.”

“Oh yeah…”

“Sarincha had become very successful and she assisted in crafting an alliance with Konohagakure, for a time. Her father was a very wealthy man to boot…although…” Anyo lowered his voice, “He’s an insatiable gambler. Anyway, they were the pillars of our village, and I had only just learned how to be a trustworthy person. I watched her and tried to be more like her.”

Sato smiled at the idea.

“It wasn’t easy. She still avoided me at all costs, but by then…I knew that I didn’t hate her. I didn’t even remotely dislike her. I understood that I had said untrue things and had been a fool to stand beside those words for years.” Anyo overturned an empty tea cup and slowly spun it on the table top, “But the same could not be said of Sarincha. I don’t know exactly how she felt, but she never had a reason to speak to me.”

“Well who would blame her?”

“Exactly. I was able to afford a decent home, since,” Anyo laughed darkly, “I was spending my money properly. I was assigned as a team captain for critical missions. I stayed close to my Master, my Sensei and Mahoto…and watched the tide of the war shift. Things calmed…and Sarincha was later engaged to a man who was…” He grinned, “Not as good-looking as me.”

“Phew, you sure are full of yourself.” Sato rolled his eyes.

“Not nearly as much as he was.” Anyo informed him, clacking the cup in his hand, “He was a haughty, phony, controlling ass. He was a businessman, not a shinobi. He never understood the woman he was with beyond telling her how to dress and to socialize and to paint her face to satisfy his expectations. For her part, Sarincha knew very little about love. She chose that man when she could have had anyone else who would have worshipped her.”

“Did you?” The boy retorted.

“By then, I did. I was twenty-three and even a bit optimistic.”

Sato waggled his eyebrows, “So how’d you break them up?”

“I didn’t. He had a mistress on the side and, as we learned later, he was a felon on the run. I had great fun threatening him, warning that I’d expose the truth, but in the end Sarincha walked away on her own.” He sighed at the thought, “She knew better than to trust a criminal.”

Anyo tapped a beat on the overturned cup, “She also knew better than to trust a former drug addict too, so she kept her distance from me when she moved out of her old house.” His lips curved upward, “She moved into the flat across the street from me.”

“Yeesh, you weren’t, like, peeping…were you?” Sato confirmed.

“No. But she did leave the drapes open frequently. I guess she liked to look at the manicured gardens out front. I would return home from missions and see her knitting through the window…or doing something else to unwind.” He added in amusement, “Sometimes yoga poses. She’s good at handstands and all of that.

Sato snickered.

“Naturally, when I tried talking to her, things fell flat. She was hostile. Taking missions with her was a nightmare, some days. And others…when truces failed or fighting flared up again…we worked better together.” He let out a soft breath, “What I learned after a time was that she had befriended Mahoto as well, and she was looking out for him and Shigeyuki whenever she could.”

“She sure is nice…”

Anyo smiled to himself, “She tried to hide her acts of kindness from me. Sarincha worried that it was a sign of weakness if I witnessed her generous or caring deeds. She never let her guard down around me. It was Mahoto who first told me how much she had done for his family. She became Shigeyuki’s god-parent, in the event anything ever happened to Mahoto. My friend explained to me that she was a ‘safer’ choice than I was. I didn’t object.” He refilled Sato’s tea cup as he said, “I did everything I could to be considerate around her, but she was always suspicious of my motives. Her break-up with that criminal didn’t boost her confidence much either.”

“That would’ve messed me up too, honestly. It’s a lot to go through.”

“At best, I had achieved an arm’s length tolerance from her. We cooperated rather well during an attempted sack of the village, beating back intruders. That was the event that motivated her father to look elsewhere, hoping to find a safer area to operate a hospital in. He founded the clinic here in Kaido, at that time. The stress of his late-in-life decision weighed on Sarincha, and it may have helped her speak to me more…” The man concluded, “But I am quite certain Pitekuyo-shishou’s carelessness resulted in our relationship.”

“Carelessness?”

“He smoked like a chimney. We villagers were always teasing him for leaving burning cigarettes on the ground, on lawns, in offices, in stores, in people’s hair. He burned down a dojo once…and he had to pay for its renovation. As talented as he is, our leader has his vices.” Anyo explained, “And one night while Pitekuyo smoked outside of our apartment complex, he flicked a cigarette butt aside before he went home. We deduced that it landed through the open window of Sarincha’s home, and it lit her room up quickly.” The man laughed, “I will never let Shishou live it down.”

“That is a really dumb thing to keep doing, if one claims to be a responsible leader!”

“We made him quit afterwards.” Anyo assured him, “Sarincha nearly didn’t wake from her sleep, but neighbors raised the alarm. She wasn’t happy to see me fetching her in the middle of the night…or watching her home burn like a bonfire…” His expression saddened, “I felt terrible for her. She had no possessions, clothes, or anything. She and her immediate neighbor lost it all in the fire. And because her father had relocated to the south…she had nowhere to stay. Mahoto put her up for a week, but her evening-work hours woke the toddler up from time to time.”

“Please tell me she got a break! What about your leader? Did he do anything about it?”

“He reimbursed them as best he could, and while we all suspected he was responsible for the accident…it was still an accident. Sarincha received insurance money and a hefty property deposit, not to mention Shishou’s apology-bribes…but real estate is not booming in Hidden Grass. There are not many places to live.” The man smirked proudly, “So I rented a room out to her. She had no other choice.”
Sato tapped his fist in his hand, concluding, “Ah-ha! That’s how you did it.”

“She didn’t like me, but she got to know me.”

“She didn’t want to leave the village?” The boy inquired, “You ought to have been enough to scare her off.”

“Please, we were rational adults at that point. Her duties and job were all located in Kusagakure. She was never the type to pick up and run.” Anyo noted, “And whenever I could, I tried to be the complete opposite of what I once was. I may have overcompensated a little, but I worried that I would be judged again. Defaulting to kindness made me far more easygoing, and while it lost me several arguments…I was better for it.”

“I’ll say. I never would have wanted to get to know the old you.”

“The war dragged on. While we suffered fewer casualties, parts of our village fell into disrepair. Many businesses closed, the Academy was outdated and underfunded…the beautiful promenade in the center of Hidden Grass was unkempt, and its gardens withered. It used to be Sarincha’s favorite place. Over time, the village had grown coarse and scarred…just as we had.” He added brightly, “Even if everything was drab and battered, it was still fun to live with Sarincha. I had been on my own for so long that sharing space was a novelty.”

“I can relate.”

“With Tama?” Anyo guessed.

“Not quite yet, but she hangs around a lot. Her house can be scary.”

Anyo continued, “About a year passed before I could say that we were close friends. She wasn’t actively seeking out other accommodations, and she was relatively content. I tried to bring up how I had behaved in the past, but Sarincha dismissed it. It seemed to me that she wasn’t rejecting me, per se, but she detested her former self. She hardly ever reminisced about her youth around me.” The man was quiet for a moment, “We don’t always know right away…how profoundly we affect others.”

From his comfortable spot leaned against the table, Sato nodded gravely.

“I was a better cook than she was, but her meals always looked nicer. Her presentation was impeccable. Eventually, I gave up and stopped challenging her. We did more than just eat together, though. We spent time doing trivial things. Some days it was training and others it was knitting. She made me appreciate the fact that I wasn’t dead and buried.” He laughed lightly to himself, “I never knew that there were so many things I was good at.”

Sato smiled reflexively, keeping his eyes shut as he listened.

“We were terrified of each other.” Anyo concluded.

“Huh?” Sato opened an eye.

“Life together became too enjoyable. It wouldn’t take much to ruin it, and we both comprehended fully how unfortunate our past had been. Neither one of us said a thing for nearly another full year; frightened to admit how deeply we cared about each other.” The man fixed an intense stare on the boy, “It’s what you might call a great waste of time. I think there were instances in which we tried to be honest, but we never took anything too far. All that hesitation…and ultimately, Sarincha’s father wanted to retire. The only fitting replacement for him, of course, was his daughter.”
Sato shut his eyes again, “You had to do something.”

Anyo sighed, “I returned home from a mission and politely asked her to reject the offer. Though… she had already accepted it days before.”

“Jeez!”

“She was prepared to leave, but I could tell that she was upset. She didn’t have the emotional fortitude, at that juncture, to disclose her feelings for a second time. Sarincha moped all around the village as if to say goodbye…and our friends noticed. They asked me what I thought about her decision, and I couldn’t properly answer. I didn’t know if it was right to be happy for her or to be a raging maniac.” He rubbed his chin in thought, “I spotted her sitting on a bench by herself on the promenade, and I remember…all those dead things around her. The once-pristine garden of Kusagakure; sad and departed like her childhood.”

“Hm.” Anyo chuckled softly, “I thought it’d be nice to rejuvenate it. For me, it doesn’t take much chakra to grow a lawn.”

“It’s a wonder you’re not a landscaper.”

“I know.” Anyo agreed, “But I just…did it on a whim while I kept out of sight. I didn’t stop at that block, of course, I filled up the whole esplanade with zinnia and plum trees and whatever that garbage is that makes me sneeze…” He smiled happily, “All Sarincha saw…was the world come to life for no reason. She didn’t say it, but I think it made her hopeful again.”

“What a guy…”

“I disposed with the mystery after that. I had a seat on that bench with her…and we talked.” A toothy grin spread on his face, “And that’s how I ended up here, married to a very smart, compassionate, but battle-hardened woman who, in fact…knows exactly what I’ve been through.”

For a moment, Sato covered his face with his hands, combatting the desire to cry and laugh at the same time. It had felt as though he had lived another life for a short while.

Anyo stood from the table to begin cleaning up. “Come on now, Sato. My story wasn’t that special.” He bapped the boy on the head with a dish rag, “I’m sure yours will be much better.”

The following day, it was particularly muggy and hot in the Toad Valley. Naruto kept quiet composure beside the Toad Oil pool, while Jiraiya supervised nearby from his seat on a stump.

A sweltering, misty downpour began to fall mid-way through the morning. Aggravated, Jiraiya stashed away the manuscript he had been editing, trying to keep it dry under his jacket. At the same time, he kept a wary eye on Naruto, knowing that even a few moments of distraction could turn his pupil into amphibious statue. ‘Nah. He’s still lookin’ good.’ The man thought to himself, his face sullen, ‘But now I’ve got to sit here in this hellish weather!’

Naruto did not react at all to the precipitation or temperature. Jiraiya scuttled under a huge banana leaf in the hope it would shield him from the rain, ‘Naruto must be getting close. I haven’t seen him transform in a while…’ It was steady progress that shamed the efforts he had made in his youth, ‘And I thought I was working hard!’

After a time, Naruto’s hands had begun to look a little too webbed. Jiraiya scuttled over and gave his pupil a light shake, “Sorry, kid. You need to snap out of it.”
“Hmph.” The young man immediately broke his concentration and assumed his normal appearance, “I was doing pretty well.”

“Yep, you were.” Jiraiya put his hands on his hips, marveling at the torrential shower, “This weather blows!”

“Yeah, and I think it’s washing the toad oil off of me…” Naruto surmised, “Maybe I should pick this back up when it calms down?”

“Not a bad idea. Of course, I was totally fine with sitting out here in the rain for you.”

“Of course you were.” Naruto agreed with a hint of mischievousness.

They retreated from the stone steps and followed the muddy trail back to the toad settlement. Once at Ma and Pa’s house, Shima asked them to wait in the genkan before she returned with two fluffy towels, and she tossed them onto her guests’ heads, “Dry off! Wet feet will ruin my floors.”

In unison: “Yes, Ma.”

When sufficiently dried, the two parted for their rooms to change into dry clothes. Jiraiya stepped out and settled at the table, dabbing at his slightly soggy manuscript, “Please…if any gods can hear me…save my precious work!” He muttered.

“Jiraiya-boy, there are more important things to worry about than your dirty books.” Shima admonished him from the doorway, “Are you and Naruto-boy staying in for today?”

“We are, Ma. At least until the storm calms down.” Jiraiya countered, “And you know it took me over a year to compile this…”

Naruto ventured out and joined his master at the table, reaching for a plate of bugs that was set out, “Did something happen to your pervvy-story?”

“It’s a bit drenched, is all. Still readable.” Jiraiya assessed his student’s outfit, which for some reason included a black fishnet shirt, “Normally you dress more modestly, kid. Where’d you get that thing?”

“It’s an undershirt I’ve always had. It’s hot today.” Naruto protested, “What’s the big deal?”

The old man shrugged, “I don’t care. Some girls might, though.”

“Good grief. You’re a horndog.”

“Heh! I know. But hey, your princess will like that one!”

“Shut it, you Perv!”

“She will.” Jiraiya defended, setting aside his in-progress book.

Naruto grumbled in annoyance while enjoying a snack. His mentor added thoughtfully, “You should know…you’re right on track for mastering Senjutsu. It won’t take you very long to finish at this rate, Naruto.”

“You think so?” A glimmer of excitement crossed his face, “I wondered if…I was imagining that I was picking it up.”

“No, don’t sell yourself short. You’re moving fast.” Jiraiya folded his arms and nodded.
“Maybe I can finish by the end of this year…”

“Sure, if you felt like not eating or sleeping and just meditated non-stop. Though, that could turn you into a toad statue in no time. That’s why Pa and I supervise you.” Jiraiya replied smugly, “Don’t go too fast, kid.”

Naruto agreed, “I won’t. Trust me; I’ve gotten a lot better!”

Shima returned with a pot of broth and bowls and set them down on the table, “You two young men must excuse me. I’m running late for a Toad Assembly, and I’m sure Pa is already there.”

“Thanks, Ma. Watch out, it’s pouring out there.” Jiraiya warned her.

The old toad pulled on her poncho before hustling out of the house.

Naruto mused while spooning soup into his bowl, “It’s kind of funny that she considers you to be young too.”

“It makes sense, at least from my perspective. They can’t differentiate between youthful people anymore. Ma and Pa aren’t exactly spring chickens.”

“Neither are you.”

“True, but they’re pushing one-hundred-years-old easily, and I haven’t had the bad manners to ask.” Jiraiya clarified, “And the Great Toad Sage…he takes elderly to a whole new level.”

“Speaking of which, when do I get to meet him?”

The man said simply, “When the time is right.”

Naruto may have once contested the point, being the active, curious type that he was; but he let the subject drop and ate in silence. Jiraiya would most certainly know when it would be time to refer Naruto to a super-ancient, prophesizing toad.

“There’s a lot I still need to tell you, Naruto, but I get the feeling we have more than enough time here in the valley for me to address it.” Jiraiya supposed and added, “I figured I should tell you what the plan is for when you do finish Sage Training.”

“You thought of that already?”

“Yeah. I care a little bit about the future.” The man conceded with a small smile, “When your time here is done, I’ll bring you back to Konoha, and I’d appreciate it if you stayed there and laid low. The Akatsuki will be on the lookout for you, and Gaara too…” Jiraiya went on, “Which brings me to my next goal. Before I consult with Obito about how we plan to counter the organization, I want to spend some time with Gaara and Haku. Separately, if need be.”

Naruto raised his eyebrows, pleased, “Huh! It seems only right.”

“Well, sure! We’ve been apart for a while, and the fact is I’m still their sensei. I have techniques and such to pass on to them. You got the lion’s share of my knowledge, and for good reason…but they deserve my time too even if I can’t give it to them right this very moment.” Jiraiya concluded, “A few of my jutsu…can probably be mastered only by Haku. And Gaara, heh, I have no doubt he’ll pick up most of what I show him.”

Slurping soup, Naruto paused to agree, “Good! It’s like you’ve been taking responsibility-pills or something. When we first started out I was worried that you genuinely didn’t want to teach!”

“Nah, I do. I have my share of baggage and it got in the way. It won’t anymore.”

“Hey, even if it does, you’ve gotten your act together.” Naruto assured him, “And I’m glad that you told me as much as you did.”

“As am I. Actually, I should probably tell you more about Minato’s life today, considering that we’re waiting out a typhoon.” Jiraiya observed, “After lunch.”

The front door of the house slid aside and Kosuke entered. He politely blotted himself with a towel hung on the coat rack, and then hopped over tatami mats towards Naruto.

“Hey boss! I brought something for you!” The red toad reported. He presented Naruto with a scroll he had been keeping in a messenger bag, “Didn’t want it to get wet…it’s raining in the Leaf Village too…”

An ecstatic smile dawned on Naruto’s face, but he restrained it after catching Jiraiya’s knowing smirk. After thanking Kosuke, Naruto opened the scroll and set to reading it while he occasionally sipped at his meal.

There is so much I want to tell you, Naruto,

Your last letter made me very happy. Many things are happening, and I must confess that I am most surprised that Gama-sennin has been dishonest with you for so long. Since we were small children, I could tell that Jiraiya-sama loved you…I wish he’d had the courage to tell you the truth sooner. As your god-father, there is so much more he could have done. You deserved to be looked after. Also, I know that we have spoken before about you never knowing your parents. Will Gama-sennin be able to tell you more about them or what happened to them? Or at least give you their names? If he seems to withhold information, I would not mind doing research for you here if that’s what you want.

He sighed quietly to himself and thought, ‘Hinata, you’re the best…’

You also mentioned how you felt about becoming a parent. It sounds to me that your children will be very lucky to have someone who will love them so much. I know that you will be a wonderful father, Naruto. And yes, to answer your question, I have thought about the same thing. It is not something I contemplate very often, but…when I do feel hopeful about the future, on the days my clan isn’t badgering me…I imagine little ones of my own. It’d be so exciting to teach them, play with them, watch them grow into shinobi, and be there with them on a happy journey. I could not ask for much more than that; except for maybe one thing.

‘She said it! So she did think about it too. Then I guess I feel less crazy now.’ Naruto noted.

I really am afraid to admit this. It seems a bit less difficult to put it on paper, but the truth is…I do not see myself having children with anyone other than you. I simply could not do it. I know that you didn’t say so specifically, but I hope that’s how you feel about me as well.

In the same moment Naruto read the revelation, his body jolted as if to stand up, shoving the low-table roughly. It tipped over a partially emptied bowl of soup, and Jiraiya barely had time to move his beleaguered manuscript away from the liquid trail, clamoring, “Hey! What’s your problem? This is some of my best work here, kid!” He mopped it up hurriedly with a decorative napkin.

“Sorry,” Naruto exhaled, upright and frantic, “I was only…” He sat down again and distracted himself with reading.
Jiraiya puffed in irritation, “What? Was that some good news?”

“It’s good news.” He confirmed, short of breath.

“Heh.” His master snickered.

I’m embarrassed. I’ve never told anyone before, but I dream about doing it. I want to be touched. I only ever think of you. I want all of those things with you.

Naruto’s eyes narrowed into a foxlike expression of cogitation. A silence like no other gripped him, and maybe his pattering heartbeat could be heard by the entire world. He wasn’t sure. Naruto fell back to the floor with the scroll clenched in his hands; eyes squinted, mouth pursed, and withdrawn from reality. Kosuke and Jiraiya regarded him worriedly.

Jiraiya snapped his fingers above his student’s face, “Whoa. Naruto, is this some kind of medical condition? Give me a sign here! Are you dying?”

“No.” He managed, “I’m…fine.”

“Really?” The man quirked an eyebrow at him, “People who are ‘fine’ don’t usually look like that.”

Naruto opened his eyes fully and got a hold of himself, “I know. It’s okay, Ero-sensei. I…” He deliberated for a moment before saying, “I never thought I’d feel much happier than I did, but now I know that it’s possible.”

“Something your princess said?” Jiraiya inferred keenly.

“Yeah.”

I hope you don’t mind. Oh, and please don’t worry about the Chunin Exam, Naruto. It was officially scheduled for the end of June. I promise that I will do my best, and I am feeling far more confident about passing this year. What you said is true, Tsunade-sama will definitely know if you are worthy. There is no harm in being patient when it comes to promotion, considering the difficult training you have undertaken. That’s far more important than becoming a Chunin. I don’t know if the world really is my oyster, as you said, Naruto. It feels like it is when you imagine it, though. I am so grateful that we can still communicate easily while you are away, and I never doubt that I am loved. Everything you have told me gives me strength, and sometimes it even keeps me awake at night. In a good way.

I love you too, and I hope that you know it, Naruto. We have so much to do when you finally come home! I don’t think I’ll ever be bored again after that! Please let me know if there is anything I can do for you.

Love,

Hinata

Naruto let out a long breath he had not realized he held. He set the scroll down and slapped at his cheeks, affirming that he was conscious. Her words had been bold and honest. It was so unlike how Hinata had been in the past, only a few years earlier, hardly ever able to express her opinions and feelings; not to mention the provocative ones.

Kosuke had located the plate of insects and helped himself from across the table. Jiraiya rested his chin on his hand as he observed Naruto, “I can kind of tell…what she said to you.”
“You’d like to think that, huh?”

“Seriously. She’s a young woman, and they aren’t all that much different from young men, when it gets down to it.” Jiraiya grinned, “I’m the authority on the subject, after all.”

“I’m not gonna deny you are the authority on it, but that’s not what she told me.”

“Well sheesh, it’s not like she was talking dirty to you. If she was, you’d probably be wearing this boiling pot of soup on your head.” The old man estimated, “It was just a tickle. Ha! She wants to keep you interested.”

“Knock it off, Ero-sensei, I swear-!” Naruto was bristling.

“Easy does it. It’s not like I’m going to read it, I just want some validation that I’m right.” Jiraiya teased, “Would it kill you to do that?”

“Okay. You’re right.” Naruto conceded, “Now shut your perverted mouth, will ya?”

The man rumbled with laughter after that, and Naruto made an effort to ignore him while reaching for more broth. He wanted to change the subject.

“Hinata also kind of confirmed that I’ll miss the Chunin Exam. It’s going to start in a couple of months.” Naruto announced, “I know that I’m not supposed to be upset, but it’s…getting to me.” He added quietly, “I’m being left behind.”

Jiraiya regarded him incredulously for a moment, “So…that optimistic talk of yours was a front?” He then ventured, “No one on your team will have the privilege to participate; you do realize that? Gaara is not eligible because he’s Kazekage…” Naruto rolled his eyes at the excuse, “And Haku’s in east-jabib training with an assassin. It’s not like this should surprise you.”

“Right. I’m not surprised. I’m just bummed, okay?”

“If it’s really eating you up inside,” Jiraiya began, “I’d like to remind you that you have options. If you bitch about it a little, there’s a chance you can get your way.”

“Sorry, but Baa-chan isn’t like that. You’ve seen what she does when people nag her.”

“I’m not talking about Tsunade.” The sage corrected him, “If a promotion is something that you can’t live without for another year-ish, which I assure you isn’t that long…remember that one of your best friends is a Kage. Naruto, if you really want to compete in a selection exam, what’s stopping you from asking Gaara to arrange one on a date that’s convenient for you?”

His eyes widened after hearing the idea, “I guess…nothing. I didn’t think of-!”

“Bear in mind, Gaara has got his limitations as well. I’m just saying that before you rule out the possibility, at least ask him,” Jiraiya wisely advised, “He likes you a lot. He’ll probably want to help you in that respect, if he can.”

“Heh! I can’t believe I didn’t think of that!” Naruto laughed.

“It was too obvious. Sometimes someone just needs to spell it out for you.”

Kosuke had finished his meal before hopping over to a window. Peering outside, he could see that the weather was still severe, “Do you mind if I stay here for a while with you guys?”

Jiraiya assured him that he was welcome to stay. The small toad curled up on a cushion to relax.
“So…if you’re done eating and you’ve got time to talk, you said you’d tell me more about Minato.”
Naruto segued, “How about it?”

“Ah, well…” Jiraiya rubbed his neck, glancing around, “I guess there’s really nothing else to occupy me. Hmm…” He scrunched up his face to think, “I’m not sure where I left off with you, with regards to Minato.”

“I remember you talking about how it annoyed you when he asked questions and read about things.”
Naruto provided the baseline for him, “Which was pretty much all the time. He was too smart for you. And he saved Kushina!”

For some reason, Jiraiya began chuckling wildly to himself.

His student was peeved, “Was something about that even remotely funny?”

“You made it sound like it was your favorite serialization or something.” Jiraiya rubbed at his watering eyes, “Heh! I’ll explain some other time why that cracked me up.”

“Good, then get to it old man.”

“Ha…let’s see. If I look way back to when I was initially inspecting the profiles of Academy students…an all-male team was arranged. Minato: a quiet bookworm with marks way above average, Gensu: the lucky underachiever; and Namba: the middle-ground, somewhat popular boy.
There was a shortage of kunoichi that year. At the time, the Sandaime wasn’t forcing me to choose from the prearranged teams right away. He said I could observe them first.” Jiraiya recounted, “So that’s what I did. I scoped out the Academy and watched from afar. They were well-behaved, intelligent, friendly…In the end, the reason why I chose them was because they didn’t outwardly seem like assholes.” He nodded thoughtfully, “Not like some of the other kids…”

“Not a bad way to go about it, probably.”

“I thought so. Of course, once you get to know people…their true colors shine through.” Jiraiya sighed, “Gensu wasn’t very motivated to learn anything unless it a new technique. His aptitude for whining and leisure blew me away. And heaven help me…Minato wanted to know everything. If I started talking about one subject, sometimes he’d run away with it. It took everything I had to satisfy that kid and shut him up. And, er…I suppose…Namba behaved himself. Kinda like Haku did, but not as good looking.”

“Heh!” Naruto was amused.

“They were all pretty strong, but…I had a feeling about Minato. It was the way he asked questions about the village, about our history, and the war…he always initiated those talks. He wanted to understand and fix things.” Jiraiya smiled and folded his arms, “And he liked being around me even though he couldn’t relate to my perverted ways. Gensu and Namba came and went, but Minato hung around. Not much different from how you and I get along, Naruto.”

“I could kind of tell he liked you.”

“It was mutual. He ended up spending some time here on Mount Myoboku and brushed up on summoning, after I taught him. And I need you to know something, kid.” Jiraiya gave him a serious look, “I introduced Minato to Senjutsu, and while he certainly was bright, it didn’t come easily to him. He worked for over fifteen years to figure it out…”

Naruto was shocked, “Did he really-!”
“Shush,” Jiraiya stopped him, “There are some aspects where, comparatively, you have him totally pegged. You pick certain things up quick, Naruto.” He amended, “But Minato was more learned, observant, and worldly; an absolute innovator when he noodled on things. Your strengths are different.”

Speechless, Naruto sat quietly and pondered his mentor’s admission.

“So, my knuckleheads became Chunin. It felt like I had only blinked and they grew up. Of course, those teenage years were challenging, what with them assuming responsibilities, finding their identities, the harsh battles, the women they loved, disappointments, and managing their finances… Minato was the only one who was not consistently broke, pretty much.” Jiraiya went on, “One fine weekend while I was out of the village, on a bout of phenomenal peeping, might I add…that was when Kushina had been kidnapped by Cloud shinobi. I only got the story after I returned home.”

Naruto was beaming at the subject.

“The Third Hokage was pleased with Minato, and simultaneously furious with our faulty border patrols. It was a misstep on their part. Regardless, I was proud too. Minato was a bit shy about explaining his process and the rescue to me, at first, but I got the truth out him. I just steered that kid in front of a ramen bar and fed him. Got a lo-ooong story. Later, when I felt he didn’t share certain details, I bought him a beer down the street.”

“What’s the matter with you? He was underage!”

“Isn’t everyone when they have their first beer?” Jiraiya snarked, “Anyway, he spilled his guts after that, going on about how he always wanted to be around Kushina, and that he was terrified when he realized she was gone. He had to follow a trail of her red hair through the wilderness to track that squadron. If she hadn’t been pulling it out in the hope that someone would spot it, Minato imagined she’d be long gone.” Jiraiya continued, “He said it felt great to beat the hell out of her abductors, but Kushina was exhausted and in bad shape when he reached her. She hardly recognized him. I swear; I watched that boy nearly weep just thinking about it.”

“What’s wrong with worrying about someone you care for, huh?”

“He admitted that he got a kiss afterwards.” Jiraiya recalled, ignoring Naruto’s delighted gasp, “And then I said: Well that’s all well and good, but she didn’t flash you for your trouble? Ha!” The man paused after Naruto lashed out with a kick, knocking him down to the mats, “Relax, kid! You’re gonna shatter me.”

“What do you have to ruin those moments, Ero-sensei?”

“It’s what I do. Come on.”

“Erg.”

“So where was I? Oh yeah. Things snowballed after that. Kushina’s opinion about Minato did a one-eighty, and the two became inseparable. I caught them sucking face a few times and I used to give them hell about it.” Jiraiya laughed to himself, “They were good for each other. It was the emotional support system they needed, and the both of them grew into outstanding shinobi while working together. Once they were adults, I think they finally got my sense of humor.”

Naruto yielded, “That’s hard to believe.”

“Don’t I know it.”
“So…you told me back at the Maple Village that…he and…well they…like, all the time?”

“Pretty much whenever they didn’t take a mission. They were doing it.”

Naruto shut his eyes and muttered; wondering if that could be his bright future, eventually.

“Now, now. They still had responsibilities. Minato became a Jounin Sensei, eventually, and Kushina was an administrator of the Sealing Corps. Not to mention the two of them played critical roles in beating back advances from Iwagakure…” Jiraiya elaborated, “They were heroes. Ah, I sure was proud, by then. Gensu and Namba were part of the common forces and did their own thing. Gensu perished on a mission, though he saved several comrades doing so. Huh, and I think Namba got hitched a while back…”

“Was Minato a decent sensei?”

“Better than I was.” Jiraiya crinkled his eyes in amusement, “His students adored him, and he loved them too. Now, if you haven’t already worked it out, the three youngsters he taught were Kakashi, Obito, and Rin. You’ve met two of the three.”

Naruto held his breath for a moment, frowning, “That team…is kind of a mess right now.”

“It could always be worse.” Jiraiya warned him before adding, “Kushina liked them too. She enjoyed doting on those kids. They were thrilled when Minato was sworn in as Hokage.”

The boy grinned, “Then?”

“Then what?” Jiraiya prompted.

“Minato and Kushina, what happened?”

“Well, they got married, obviously.

“Knew it!”

“Kid, it wasn’t like you had to divine the answer.” Jiraiya snorted, “Theirs was not a fleeting romance.”

“Then they…well…what happened was…” Naruto scratched his chin and thought aloud, “The Fourth Hokage…died…” His words faltered as he understood the vague parameters, “Fighting the Nine-Tailed Fox.”

“Yes.” Jiraiya nodded somberly, “He did. They both died.”

Naruto’s eyes dropped to the floor, unseeing with devastation. He clutched at his stomach, aware of the seal there that was restraining the Kyuubi. Surely he hated the Fox for trying to harm Jiraiya, but the beast had claimed other precious lives as well. The pain was intense. To overcome so much adversity only to be cut down…

“Why?” Naruto demanded, his eyes glossy, “Why did that happen to them? Kushina was a Sealing Master, you said.”

“I did say that.” Jiraiya replied almost inaudibly.

Naruto grew louder, “Was it an attack? Was it an accident? Why didn’t you stop it?”

“I wasn’t there.” He confessed faintly.
“What happened to her?” Naruto repeated, “Ero-sensei, how did the Fox get loose? From Kushina? Will it happen to me?”

Jiraiya fell silent, overwhelmed.

Impatient, Naruto slammed his fist on the table, clattering its settings. Kosuke awoke in bewilderment.

“You’re not telling me.” Naruto’s temper flared, “You can’t sweep this one under the rug! I need to know this. I need to know that I’m not going home just so I can fuck up everyone’s life by setting the Nine-Tails loose! That I’m not gonna end up dead!”

When his mentor’s lassitude persisted Naruto reached out and seized the man by his collar, “Hey. Why aren’t you saying anything? Huh? Was it your fault?”

“No.” Jiraiya assured him softly.

He gave his master a rough shake, “But it happened anyway! Goddammit!” Naruto violently hurled him aside, outraged, “That’s it then? You know the reason, but you won’t tell me? You’re afraid that I can’t handle the reality of it?” His chest puffed, “Or that you know that one day you’ll be burying me too?”

Jiraiya heaved himself up and raised a hand, “Stop.”

Naruto sat back again, boiling with anger. It took him a long moment to acknowledge the tears streaming down Jiraiya’s face. It extinguished most of the rage that made him act out.

Alarmed by his previous reaction, Naruto carefully touched the man’s shoulder, “I’m sorry… Sensei.”

Jiraiya shook his head, squeezing his eyes shut.

“I’m sorry. Did I hurt you?”

“Nah, kid.” Jiraiya choked out, “Don’t…worry.”

Naruto’s eyebrows sloped upward, devastated, “How can I not? How can I not worry about any of this? Or about you?”

Jiraiya cleared his throat, trying to settle down. After a moment he replied, “Naruto…I’ll explain. It won’t be what you want to hear. And I couldn’t even try to tell you now when I…keep blubbering like the joke I am.”

“Don’t say that! You’re not.”

His exhaling breath trembled with grief, “It’s awful. Just to think about it…” Jiraiya rubbed at his nose, “Give me a day. Let me get over hating myself for a little bit before I tell you. It’s going to make sense, for the most part, but…” His disconsolate eyes unsettled the boy, “It’ll hurt.”

“It already does.” Naruto conceded.

Jiraiya nodded in understanding, “I know.”

Without another word, Naruto snatched up Hinata’s correspondence and retreated to his room. Jiraiya turned his attention to the messy table, intending to clean it up before proofreading his book some more.
In the darkened bedroom, Naruto laid flat on the floor, his limbs spread wide as if they were antennae for the signals of the universe. His stared listlessly at the ceiling. The sound of heavy rain helped him breath more easily. He could not tell how much time passed before the dreadful thought came to him. The horrible thought.

Please no.

‘It was...probably them.’ Naruto admitted to himself, ‘I’m not a jackass.’

Certainly, his parents hadn’t disappeared. They hadn’t died arbitrarily in battle. The Fox had killed them. It explained why his infant-baby presence and subsequent sealing was necessary at the time.

Tingling in Naruto’s fingertips made him clench and flex his hands, ‘She was an Uzumaki just like me...and...I kind of look like that guy.’ He figured, recalling the formal portraits of the Fourth Hokage in the Academy and the Administrative Building.

While he lacked the details and an explanation of why the Nine Tailed Fox had been released, Naruto could safely assume that Minato and Kushina had been his parents. If Jiraiya was appointed as his god-father, no one else would be motivated to choose the Toad Sage other than his beloved, young friends. The infinitesimal satisfaction Naruto experienced as he reflected on this truth was overshadowed by anguish.

‘Why couldn’t I have just...met you? I wanted so badly for someone to care that I existed...and you were both the kind of people who would’ve...’ A warm tear slid down his cheek, ‘Totally got me. Loved me. Been there, every day.’

He sat up when his chest began to feel tight. ‘This stupid shirt and this stupid, stifling heat!’ Naruto stood and exited through the door of his room, aimlessly entering the rain. He walked across the deserted lawn, unfazed by the weather, and he continued for a long while before stopping at a far-off toad statue. Sheltering palm leaves had overgrown the effigy, providing some cover.

Naruto took a seat beneath the shelter and gazed at the gray rainclouds that had funneled into the valley. Water slipped from his bangs and onto his face, and he sat with his arms draped over his bent knees. ‘Ero-sensei will tell me when he can form those words without crying, but...’ It was mildly cathartic when he took a deep breath, ‘I’ve never felt...less like myself before.’ Oddly enough, his parents had been some very important people, if indeed that’s who they were.

‘Maybe this is research I shouldn’t put Hinata up to. I bet...she’d be pretty surprised. And I ought to get some confirmation first...’ Naruto wondered to himself, ‘Here I was looking forward to my future, being optimistic and all of that...but what if...? No matter how good I have it...what if it’s over in a second? Just like them.’

At the same time, many, many miles away, Gaara was having a productive day.

He had concluded most of the documentation and paperwork in his office before 10:00 in the morning, and so he left a Shadow Clone behind to oversee things while he trained with Matsuri.

Gaara ventured to the outskirts of the village, west of the sunken Buddha statue, and located his student practicing soft-weapon forms by herself. It was about the third time in 24 hours he thought to himself that the girl was very different now. Her metamorphosis had only taken two months, approximately, but the results were dramatic.

Since she had returned with Kankuro from the Tide Village, Matsuri had made no mention of her experiences or friends there. She requested more intense training and guidance. Gaara could not fault her ambition.

They agreed to begin with her worst techniques, chiefly Taijutsu. For a week, Matsuri devoted herself to the drills that Gaara had once practiced in his early days of being a shinobi. Building muscle memory was critical, and Matsuri kept up for several consecutive hours without complaint before she began to wobble on her feet. Because she was not so inclined to take the breaks Gaara suggested, he mandated days off for her to recover. Stubbornly, Matsuri would make time for strength-training and increasing her speed on those days.

Her commitment to improve was tested after a few weeks when Gaara started free-spars with her. While he went easy on his student, Gaara was never the type to go too easy on anyone. Matsuri was absolutely clobbered for a few days. She returned every morning in bandages, concealing scrapes and bumps, making no mention if she was ever in pain. Her teacher was slightly worried that her determination was not entirely beneficial, but when Gaara wavered Matsuri would obstinately demand they continue.

After a time, she would no longer tumble and eat sand during the trials. She could stay on her feet, evade with speed, and counterattack after blocking. On the hotter days, Gaara would sometimes need a break, retreating to the shade to watch Matsuri dance around a summoned scorpion, dizzying it with her assaults.

She had also made a point of mastering the Jouhyou, and also gained proficiency with a chainscythe, as well as the three-section staff. While challenging other weapons specialists of the Sand Village, it was undeniable that her skill outclassed some of her Chunin counterparts. Hard work alone was responsible for that.

And so, as many shinobi that specialized in Bukijutsu often did, Matsuri relied on a tool-scroll to summon her prized weapons. When another scroll joined her inventory, she explained to her sensei that she was expanding her Ninjutsu on her own, “I don’t want you to see the jutsu quite yet, Sensei.”

He didn’t argue with her. Gaara would happily admit that Matsuri had found her own way as a shinobi, irrespective of the things he taught her. Her personal style shined through.

This morning, Gaara recalled a small warning Kankuro had given him before he sought Matsuri near the Buddha statue. “Listen, you’ve probably heard, but our village weapons-dispenser, Yirigama, took a liking to Matsuri. She talks to him a lot and she’s enthusiastic.” His brother spoke quietly, “So he gave her something special.”

“Special?” Gaara did not follow.

“As in, a Genin probably shouldn’t be using it, special.” Kankuro clarified, “Just make sure she doesn’t hurt herself during practice.”

“You worry too much.” The Kazekage replied calmly.

“Hey, I like that kid. I’m not saying I don’t have confidence in her; it’s just that she’s learned a lot in so little time. Don’t you think she could get ahead of herself?”

“No. I don’t, actually.” Gaara admitted.

“Either you know exactly what you’re talking about, or you’re a crap-teacher for saying that.”

“Agreed.”
After arriving at the statue, Matsuri concluded whirling around in an impressive display before acknowledging Gaara, “Ah! Good morning, Sensei.”

“Good morning.” His smile was small, “There’s some news I want to share with you, Matsuri.”

Matsuri looped her Jouhyou to her belt and walked over to him, “What kind of news?”

“It’s related to the Chunin Exam. I inquired with other officials, but it seems we are a special case when it comes to your participation. The committee in Leaf was not comfortable with me registering as your Jounin-chaperone, considering it would remove me from Hidden Sand for a time. In addition to that, it is mandatory that you participate as part of a three-man cell. I checked around Suna and found a team that can take you. Their third teammate is unable to participate this year, due to temporary disability.” Gaara explained, “I’ll introduce you to Hyoshigi and his students tomorrow. I recommend that you take a mission or two with them to build up rapport. Knowing and trusting your teammates is critical during the exam.”

“But I won’t be a permanent addition to that team, will I?” She asked.

“No. You’re my student. Once you are a Chunin, I’ll be appointing you to various teams anyway.” He reminded her, “We’ll adjust from there.”

She nodded happily.

“As for training today, I had something different in mind.” Gaara went on, looking south, “You and I will be visiting the coast today. We’ll pass the time training near the water until a tutor arrives.”

“A tutor? Is it someone who can help me?”

He chuckled softly, “It’s a tutor of mine, actually. You can stay and watch if you’re comfortable.”

“I’d love to!”

“We’ll see. You may change your mind.”

Shortly after that, they set out on an express route through the desert. The temperature was relatively mild. By the early afternoon they set foot on the white beaches of the south, where tall, rocky dunes overlooked turquoise waters.

The pair took a rest and after that, Matsuri chased her mentor around with twists and dives, nearly putting Gaara’s eyes out with the tooth of her rope-dart. He tested her defenses as well with blasts of sand, and she scattered the bolts with a whirl of her Jouhyou. After winding down, master and student concurred that it would be a waste not to enjoy the unspoiled beach. They stripped down to undershirts and shorts and waded into the rolling waves.

Gaara did not go in past his waist. He stood with folded arms, eyes closed, blissful in the warm water.

“Sensei, it’s not so deep over here. Won’t you swim out?” Matsuri wondered.

“No. My last experience with the ocean…” Gaara sighed at the memory, “I nearly drowned.”

“Oh!” She covered her mouth in surprise, “I didn’t know that…”

“It’s alright. My friend was able to retrieve me.”

Matsuri paddled around while her teacher lingered in the shallows. Overhead, a messenger hawk was circling. Gaara supposed it had a communication that needed prompt attention. He splashed back to the beach and took a seat on a flat stone. The bird landed beside him and Gaara untied a small scroll from its leg. ‘Temari sent this…’

Hi Gaara, I have an update for you,

I appreciate that you gave me some warning. Apparently, Tazuna didn’t need much help finding the jinchuriki that’s been hanging around the Tide Village. They’ve already met.

I spoke with some former Mist ninja (they’ve integrated here) who recognized a man who’s been working as a supplemental teacher for the Academy. His name is Utakata, and he used to be a shinobi in Kirigakure as well. From what they described, he had a bad experience with his Master some years ago that caused him to flee the village. Hunter-nin have been tracking him for quite some time, and he’s been avoiding detection while in the Land of Waves. No one has tipped off Hidden Mist yet, but I honestly don’t know how long that will last. The ninja who confirmed this for me said that Utakata is the container of the Six-Tails, and has remarkable control over it.

It seems to me that everyone is getting along so far. I explained what I found to Tazuna, but he either didn’t understand me or he doesn’t care. He told me that Utakata has earned his keep, and they’re on better terms than they were previously. I personally think that you’ll get along with this jinchuriki. He hangs around cafes and relaxes when he isn’t working. It may be worthwhile to make another trip down here when you have time to meet him. The Training Program is progressing steadily. Evaluations and wrap-up are predicted to go as scheduled, but if something starts to take a nosedive I will take care of it.

I hope Matsuri’s doing well. I was wondering if she was interested in coming down to the Tide Village again? Please let me know. I’ll be in touch.

Temari

Gaara looked up from the parchment, bemused, “Hm.”

If Temari’s report proved anything, it was that they indeed lived in a small world. Provided that Utakata kept a low profile in Tide and did not attract unwelcome attention from Mist, he could become a boon to the fledgling village. Gaara did not personally know the man, ‘But I might someday soon.’ He already had a rendezvous planned for the day.

After a while Matsuri scuttled out of the water and retrieved a towel from her supply bag. She sat down across from her sensei as he scribbled a reply to Temari.

“Did that come from Suna?” She asked.

“Temari sent me this from the Tide Village. Just an update.”

Matsuri’s inquisitive expression dissipated, “Oh.”

Gaara’s eyes glanced toward the girl, “Aren’t you looking forward to going back to the Tide Village? You did the last time.”

“I…I prefer training for now. I’ve gotten a lot stronger.”

“You have. However, I want to rely on you as an ambassador. You made many friends there.” Gaara told her.

Her shoulders drooped, “It might get uncomfortable.”
“Did something happen on your previous trip?”

“Nothing terrible…but I…” The girl tucked the balled towel beneath her chin, “I was disappointed.”

“You don’t want to share it with me?” He asked.

“It’s alright, Sensei. I’m getting over it.”

“Good.” Gaara sealed his reply and tied it to the messenger hawk’s leg, “Then I don’t want to hear your complaints when I send you there again.”

Matsuri winced, but did not object. The courier bird took off.

The two dried in the sun, and though slightly damp, redressed when it was bearable. From their seat in the shade, Gaara created amorphous shapes with the white beach sand. He was struck by a thought before telling Matsuri, “I ought to prepare you.”

“For what?” She wondered.

“For what you will see.” Gaara elaborated, “You’re already aware that I am a jinchuriki. The reason that I am here today is for a private lesson from another jinchuriki.”

“Oh! Outside of the village?”

“I don’t want to be close by Suna if we start to cause damage. I am being advised on how to harness Shukaku’s power.”

“Right, that’s what it’s called.”

“Him.” Gaara corrected, “Shukaku is his name.”

“Oh.” She blinked, “You know a lot about…him, then?”

“We talk just about every day.”

“You talk?” She squealed.

“Yes. We’ve reached an understanding. Though, I won’t pretend to know anything about Shukaku’s power or how to control it. When I used it in the past, I did so in less than ideal circumstances.” Gaara explained, “He even recommended that I learn from more experienced jinchuriki. That’s why I’m expecting a visitor. You may…see things today.”

Gaara formed a likeness of Shukaku in the beach sand, scaled down, “This is what the Ichibi looks like.”

“Wow.” Matsuri tapped her lip, “He’s a bit tubby.”

Gaara sighed to himself.

“Ah, should I have not said that?” The girl amended.

“He’s saying that he doesn’t like others commenting on his figure.” The Kazekage relayed an internal message, “And a larger gut helps him facilitate Wind techniques.”

“Oh, I see.” Matsuri added, “I didn’t mean it like that, um…Shukaku. If you can hear me…”
“It’s fine, Matsuri. He doesn’t care that much.”

When a shadow appeared on the beach, the silhouette of a newcomer stalked along until Gaara and Matsuri turned around, squinting into the sunlight. A smiling woman stood at the top of a rock formation, with her hands on her hips, “It took me a while to find this place! I didn’t think there’d be two of you here.”

She hopped down lightly to the beach. Gaara rose to greet the kunoichi with a small bow and Matsuri mirrored the gesture, “Thank you for coming, Yugito.”

“No at all, Kazekage-sama. I offered you my help, after all, and I am glad that I can make good on it.” Yugito’s eyes fell on Matsuri, “And who is this little one?”

“This is my student, Matsuri.” Gaara introduced, “Matsuri, this is Yugito of Kumogakure. She is the host of the Two-Tails.”

“It’s so nice to meet you.” She bowed her head again timidly, “I’ve never met a Cloud ninja before.”

“I assure you, we’re not as bad as everyone says.” The woman purred, “So, you have one student? I do not see such arrangements often, but I am sure that you picked the most worthy learner you could find, Kazekage-sama.”

“Gaara is fine.” The young man requested.

“Gaara, then.” Yugito agreed, “Today, your student will be a spectator of your efforts. I suggest you do you very best to avoid disappointing her.”

Gaara pursed his mouth for a moment, irritated, “Do you think that I will make a fool of myself?”

“Most likely. What I aim to teach you won’t be easy.” She grinned sidelong to Matsuri, “If you don’t mind, shall we find ourselves some space? We are due to get…much larger.”

Matsuri chuckled nervously as she followed after her superiors. Hardly a year ago, she knew virtually nothing about Biju, jinchuriki, and the relationships therein. While it was a relief to hear from Gaara that Tailed Beasts were more than just mindlessly destructive forces, Matsuri was still having difficulty reconciling the old tales about them. The fear lingered, but it heartened her to see Yugito and Gaara so relaxed. They would not likely choose to let her witness a confrontation that could jeopardize her life.

At the top of the adjacent sand dune, the tall, blonde woman halted them, “This is fine. Oh my…I should have remembered some sunscreen before I dropped in…”

Matsuri quickly snapped open her bag, “You can borrow mine! We take it everywhere since we…live in the desert.”

Yugito was amused by the mousy girl and accepted the bottle that was handed to her. “And you, Gaara? How do you maintain your pale complexion?”

“I bathe in sunblock most mornings.” Gaara injected a touch of sarcasm, “My sand armor protects me as well.”

“Hm, the Kazekage divulges his beauty secrets…”

Matsuri tittered at the comment, but swallowed her laughter when a frown tugged at her mentor’s face. Yugito concluded a hasty application of sunscreen before returning it to Matsuri.
“I’m going to tell you something just so we can all be sure that we are on the same page.” The woman announced, “What you are about to learn may end up saving your life. However, please remember that in the end, none of this training is for the sake of you staying alive. The Great Nations can all agree that it is of the utmost importance that we do what we can to prevent the Akatsuki from securing the Tailed Beasts. This isn’t about us. It’s about them.” Yugito placed her hand over her heart, “It’s about Matatabi. It’s about Shukaku. They were alive long before we were, and they have been hoping for a peaceful world for much longer than any of us have.”

Matsuri and Gaara fixed their attention on the Cloud kunoichi.

“The Akatsuki does not care that the Tailed Beasts feel. That they think. That they were born. Or that they dream…” Yugito elaborated, “That organization is singularly concerned with harvesting them for unimaginable amounts of chakra. With all of that power, they intend to bring about calamity that only ancient sages could contend with. The great skill of our predecessors has been absent for generations. Our only recourse is to prepare ourselves and deny the Akatsuki the opportunity that they wish to prey on.”

“I have been given intelligence that other jinchūriki have been captured already.” Gaara then asked, “Is there no way to retrieve the Tailed Beasts that were taken?”

“For now, that isn’t possible. In communications between the Raikage and Tsuchikage, they confirmed that there is no record of a current Akatsuki stronghold or base. Abandoned bases leave no trace evidence to track, and the method that is used to extract Tailed Beasts and store their chakra…no one has determined that either.” Yugito explained, “How could we rescue them when we have no idea where to look?”

“We ask a member of the Akatsuki.” Gaara resolved.

Yugito and Matsuri gave him curious looks.

Gaara elaborated on his statement, “My mentor is the Toad Sage. Jiraiya told me that he has a spy who has infiltrated Orochimaru’s hideout as well as the Akatsuki. This is the information we should be requesting.”

“That poor spy will not easily obtain it from either source.” Yugito warned.

“But what if the spy did?” Matsuri wondered.

“Then our villages should plan the retrieval of those Tailed Beasts accordingly. With that being said, there is nothing that can be done at the present time…other than safeguarding the Bijū we are responsible for.” The Cloud kunoichi tossed her long braid over her shoulder, “I would like to address the best way to go about that now, Gaara, if you’d be so kind.”

The Kazekage nodded in the affirmative.

“I am one of the two jinchūriki of Kumogakure. The container of the Eight Tails has just as good of a bond with the Hachibi as I do with Matatabi, if not better.” Yugito went on, “He would have happily come here to assist with this training, but I felt that his personality…may not be a good fit for yours, Gaara.”

“I still would have done my best.”

She chuckled, “I’m sure. Perhaps some other time you can learn from him on the Island Turtle…but I will start you off.” Yugito folded her arms, “If Shukaku is willing; we will first work on controlling the chakra he provides for you. If you’re not prepared for it the surge will overwhelm you. After that, we can explore techniques that Biju help us achieve…and maybe even the Tailed Beast ball in the future…”

Matsuri whispered sidelong to her sensei, “Would that turn you into…a ball?”

“Quite frankly, I am not sure what any of this will do to me.” He replied quietly.

Yugito tapped her chin thoughtfully, “Or, it may be beneficial for you to practice switching consciousness with Shukaku. In certain situations, his form and consciousness being at the forefront can change the tide of battle.” She added slyly, “He’s a bit older and more experienced than you, after all.”

Gaara nodded, “It’s happened before.”

“Oh?”

“With both good and bad results.”

“I see…” Yugito thought for a moment, “That is a project as well. The level of expression a Biju makes through its host depends on several factors. How easily can Shukaku get through?”

Gaara frowned, “Easily…is not the word for it.”

“Maybe it isn’t. A multi-lock seal often makes it difficult for Biju to express themselves when they please. I don’t know if you have one. Do you encounter such a buffer?”

“Not really.” He admitted.

She lifted her hand, “A demonstration, please.”

Matsuri smiled as she backed away, preferring to be safe than sorry if things did not go as planned. Gaara only sighed before turning his mind inward.

'Did you hear that request?'

I did.

Can you do it?’

If you let me. The hefty beast shrugged, I’m here to learn too. It’s not typical for you and I to flip like we’re on a revolving door.

Gaara swallowed and shut his eyes, making a true attempt to relax, ‘Take it slow.’

Ha! Slow. Heh heh!

Gaara began to rumble with laughter.

From a distance, Matsuri notified Yugito, “He…doesn’t usually do that.”

“It’s alright.” The woman assured her.

The young man opened his eyes, revealing black sclera and tiny, golden irises. A pointy-toothed grin unsettled Matsuri from her position on the dune.

As Shukaku settled into his minimal influence over his host he laughed again, startled by the sound, and then covered his mouth with his hands, “I sound so weird.” Shukaku looked over Gaara’s body interestedly, “I’m like a toothpick. I feel so light!” He glanced all around, “And this place seems bigger."

“You get used to it.” The woman fiddled with her braid, entertained, “I find having this hair to be fun, when Yugito lets me visit. Mine is so unruly, but hers is perfection.” That cat-voice rolled the ‘r’ sound.

“That’s because yours is on fire, Whiskers.” Shukaku simpered at his Two-Tailed counterpart.

“Please do not call me that if you don’t wish to be aptly named yourself, Shukaku.” Matatabi warned.

“I want to feel my tail.” Shukaku decided, “It’s freaking me out to not... feel anything back there.” He patted his human bottom, “Weird!”

Gaara commented from his subconscious place, ‘Do not touch that.’

“You can express it if Gaara is comfortable with it.” Matatabi explained, handily displaying a blue, forked cat tail that sprouted from behind Yugito, “Whatever the jinchuriki does not limit, we can do it. If he lets go completely, you’ll take your true form. It might scare Gaara, though, so be patient. Wait until he says that it’s okay.”

Shukaku titled his head back, inquiring loudly, “Well is it okay, Kazekage?”

‘A tail.’ Gaara confirmed, ‘Fine.’

Shukaku was thrilled to produce a sandy, tiered tail that wound behind his body. He gave it a welcome shake.

“Before we get too carried away,” Matatabi instructed, “We should let them practice drawing on our chakra. That won’t be as simple for them to do as it for us to express ourselves.”

“I just got out here. Do I really have to go back?” Shukaku grumbled.

Yugito shrugged, her features returning to normal, “I don’t know. What is he saying?”

Shukaku gave inner-Gaara a listen: ‘I’m switching back. I promise I will bring you out again when I can.’

“Ah, fine...” The tanuki muttered, surrendering his brief control.

While watching, Matsuri muffled laughter with the back of her hand. It was humorous watching her teacher (granted, an alternate consciousness) act surprised about buttocks.

Yugito rested her hands on her hips, “Well done. Both you and Shukaku will have no trouble with that exchange. Just remember to be courteous to one another. In battle, you may end up shouting demands to confirm who is in control. Remember it is only the heat of the moment, and to not take comments personally.”

“Right.” Gaara acknowledged. Somewhere inside, Shukaku echoed the sentiment.

The cloud kunoichi devoted over an hour to patiently guiding Gaara through what she described as the ‘proper way to adapt a Biju’s chakra.’ Her understanding was that, willpower and a healthy seal permitting, a shinobi could tap into the reserves of the Tailed Beast within. “Of course, the more you try to take it by force, the more you open the door to expression.” Yugito added, “And when they express themselves in this instance, Tailed Beasts are usually quite upset...or viciously angry.
Seizing their chakra without consent is not cooperation. It will hinder both parties.”

A blue halo of chakra began to emerge from the kunoichi as she spoke, “When you communicate with the Tailed Beast inside you, on equal terms, chakra is more readily given. As it stands, Biju are aware that the death of their host is a potential hazard. They are often recaptured and sealed again into an object or jinchuriki, following the demise of their host. It is uncommon for them to be free for long. Or, death can be a result if the Tailed Beast is bound in an active multi-lock seal. Such sealing jutsu are designed to deconstruct the balance of chakra within the Biju, as a…repercussion of letting their jinchuriki perish.”

“Would that happen to Shukaku?” Gaara wondered.

“I don’t know.” Yugito admitted, “Most seals are comprised of one lock, and they can vary in strength. Anything more is considered rare. It is essential that the Nine-Tails be kept in a multi-lock seal, for he can command the most influence over a jinchuriki in anything less.”

“I believe that to be true.” Gaara agreed.

Yugito asked him to reveal how much of Shukaku’s chakra he could accept before experiencing difficulties, “If your focus slips even for a moment, you can lose consciousness, your senses, or become confused. In a compromised state, jinchuriki who are overwhelmed by chakra will express the most negative emotions within themselves and their Tailed Beast. Only a poised mind can avoid such an event.”

The Kazekage made his attempt. He estimated that Shukaku had volunteered all but a quarter of his chakra, and Gaara held firm while his teeth rattled in his head as it flooded him. A rushing, red chakra cloak wrapped around him with a trashing tail. Yugito nodded and then turned to Matsuri, waving at her to retreat farther away.

“Let’s see how you handle that chakra under pressure.” The woman spread her arms, entirely calm, and was enveloped in a gust of energy. Her chakra cloak rapidly condensed until Matatabi stood on the dune in her true form. The cat titled its head, sizing up Gaara with mismatched eyes. Then Matatabi lunged with snapping jaws.

Gaara noticed almost immediately that he was disoriented. He could only manage two barrages of sand to slow the Two-Tails before his vision swirled. A giant paw nearly flattened him like a pancake.

Come on! Don’t be a wuss, Gaara. You can handle it.

The Kazekage shook his head, clear for a few seconds, and then reared an unprecedented tidal wave of sand to hurl Matatabi several hundred yards. The cat tunneled her way up to the surface again and shook vigorously. She paced, side-stepping sweeps and spikes of desert sand. From a distance, Matatabi generated three bolts of energy and fired them at her target. Gaara’s sand shield was prompt, but his reactions were hindered by his wavering concentration. He slipped back into a space that was somewhere between his mind and Shukaku’s domain.

His surroundings spun. Gaara was able to produce the bulky arm of Shukaku from the coastal dunes, pinning Matatabi when she closed the distance between them. A sand coffin would logically follow, but Gaara was not present to witness the follow-up. The burden of chakra sent his stream of consciousness tumbling, and he found himself in a shelter made from a tree hollow. He could see Haku and Naruto beside him, savaged from their struggle against Orochimaru in the Forest of Death.

Inexplicably, as if beside his ear, Yashamaru’s voice was distinct, “Can you feel my pain?”
Startled, Gaara turned to look for the source. He saw people; the people closest to him. His father’s furious face was the first of many expressions of disappointment: Jiraiya, Sakura, Kankuro, and Temari were taunting him as well. Flinching away in shock, Gaara’s vision returned, and as his mind surfaced once more he could hear Shukaku’s voice calling him back, Don’t look at that shit! You’re not seeing what’s right in front of you!

With a sharp intake of oxygen, Gaara was fully aware again, lying flat on his back. A partial dome of sand was protecting him from the Two-Tail’s extended claws. A limb and tail of Shukaku were grappling with the other beast, ‘Shukaku took over while I was incapacitated…’ It was a relief that his companion was reliable, but Gaara’s instant regret was that he wasn’t.

Before Shukaku could encourage him to hang tough and counter, Matatabi ceased her attack. The cat took a seat, licked her paw, and then briefly washed her face. In a swirl of energy she disappeared and was replaced by Yugito.

The woman gave a small wave to her tutee, “Enough. You were absent for over 60 seconds.”

Shukaku retreated, mumbling, and Gaara staggered to his feet. It was mildly embarrassing to fumble like he had when he was considered a competent village leader. Both Matsuri and Yugito returned to his side.

“Are you alright, Gaara-sensei?” The young kunoichi asked, pulling nervously at her bag’s strap.

“I’m fine.” He rubbed his head, “I hope I didn’t worry you.”

“Well…” Matsuri looked between him and Yugito, “There aren’t many ways to feel relaxed while watching what you two just did.”

“Certainly not.” Yugito agreed, “I may have jumped the gun a bit with this task.”

“No.” Gaara said firmly, “I will be prepared now that I know what to expect.”

“I know that you will. For now, let’s take a break. Meditation will help stave off negative emotions and slipping, like what you experienced.” Yugito told him calmly, “This practice isn’t meant to be completed in a day, Gaara. You’ll need a few weeks at least.”

“I don’t have much time to budget on myself.” He informed her, “I have obligations to my village and my student. The Chunin Exam is nearing as well.”

“You’ll have to make the time.” The woman insisted, “This training is an obligation to your village and friends.”

‘On a grand scale, it is.’ Matsuri thought to herself.

Gaara closed his eyes and breathed deeply to calm down. It would be so much better if he could grasp the skill right away. “Then I will. How do you intend to keep training me?” He inquired.

“I have two days to myself. We’ll practice during that time before I return to Kumogakure. If I am not punctual, the Raikage will be very cross with me.” Yugito laughed airily, “But I will be given permission to return again. Your training is in the best interest of the Five Nations, after all. We can play it by ear.”

As Matsuri walked beside the senior shinobi, she winced after hearing Yugito’s last statement. It reminded her of Menma. She shook off the stab of heartache and kept up with her acquaintances.
“I have a close friend who will benefit from these lessons. He is the jinchuriki for the Nine Tails.” Gaara mentioned cautiously, “Would this opportunity be extended to him as well?”

“Of course, however, your friend’s pursuit of mastery will be quite tricky.” Yugito smiled to herself, “Matatabi and Shukaku will be able to testify.”

Yeah, Kurama will act like a glorified ass hat in a situation like this! It won’t go well.

Gaara replied, ‘Naruto can make a connection. He’s always does.’

“Here we are.” Yugito made them halt on a ledge overlooking the south sea, “Ocean waves are a fine background for meditation. Let’s have a seat.” She motioned to the small kunoichi, “You too, Matsuri, you’ll benefit.” They all settled down and Yugito added, “This will set us right.”

That same afternoon, in an east coast port of the Water Country, Haku followed Zabuza towards the mob-controlled underbelly of the city. Zabuza was drawn to the area for work with high risk, high monetary incentives. Haku tagged along as he was told, but had his own agenda in mind. Days before, his faithful messenger rabbit had returned with two highly unusual pieces of correspondence.

‘I can’t believe it!’ Haku had been stunned to find a short message from Temari. She had earnestly told him weeks ago that she ‘didn’t know what to say,’ and Haku had then replied with curt thanks, informing her that he was still alive. Please let me know if there is anything I can do, he had also written to her. Temari jumped on the offer in her second reply:

Here’s what you can do. Because you’re in close proximity to the most depraved nukenin and criminals on a regular basis, try to collect information on the Akatsuki if you can. You said you wanted to protect Gaara and Naruto, so you might as well be knowledgeable about their enemies. While you’re at it, find out what’s really going on in the Water Country. Gaara says that he’s had an intelligence black-out in that region, save for meager reports from the Black Ops. We don’t know what the Mist Village has been doing, or if it has ties to the Akatsuki or other criminals. Whatever you learn, send it to me or Gaara. I’m located in the Land of Waves for the next few weeks. Pua knows how to find the Tide Village.

Haku had nearly thrown the scroll and dashed out of Hiroshi’s tea shop at the time, but he finished reading the letter.

No. I don’t want to see you, so don’t come here. Oh, and props to you for showing your rabbit how to travel by boat to leave the islands of the Water Country. I was wondering how she got over here. And please, remember that we are pressed for time. If finding your clan is really your goal, then ask for adequate help and conduct a serious search. You’ll be disappointed, more than likely. Should Zabuza prove to be an obstacle when you try to return to us, just drop a hint of where you want your back-up. You said yourself that you need to be with your team. Don’t let a beast like him get in the way of that.

Temari

She had concisely brought to his attention what should be his most imperative goals. Temari had also shut down Haku’s hope of reuniting with her, ‘I should expect as much…’

Discouraged, Haku moved on to the next piece of correspondence.

Haku, saw your rabbit in one of my stopovers. Thought she’d bring you this. I didn’t learn much about your clan while I did business on the mainland, but I saw someone like you. With your Blood
As luck would have it, some thirty minutes later, when Haku inquired about the aforementioned port called Moji, Zabuza informed him that it was a great place to rustle up cash.

“Who’s asking?” The brute grunted suspiciously.

“No one! I just read about it.” Haku explained, and it was partially true.

“I’ll take you there. It’s time for you to get off your ass.” Zabuza decided, adding, “But don’t draw attention.”

Haku agreed and did not reveal his exchange with the ninja from the Land of Snow. He intended to keep Zabuza in the dark about his pact with the shinobi he had befriended. Haku was thankful that the swordsman was not a conversationalist, and neither did he wish to know much about Haku’s life. As a result, it was easy to keep secrets from a rogue ninja with a one-track mind.

Before departing, Haku warned Ranmaru and Hiroshi that he would be out for a few days. “Please tell Migawari-san I apologize. I’ll be back when I can.” Haku added, thinking of their mentor in Medical jutsu, “For all of our sakes, I shouldn’t object to Zabuza’s jaunts too often.”

Ranmaru nodded animatedly.

Pua tagged along as Haku followed Zabuza’s lead, taking the two-day journey to the eastern isles of the Water Country. Long silences stretched between the two and Haku pittered around in his private thoughts, growing more curious as to why Zabuza was anxious to complete tasks for rich gangsters. While the nukenin was undoubtedly a cold, selfish man, Haku did not see how he really benefitted from material wealth.

“How do you take these missions?” Haku finally asked, “I can’t understand why you choose to earn beyond your…spare means of living.”

“Why do you care?”

“You live in an abandoned flat in a retirement town on the rural outskirts, where no Mist hunter-nin can find you, naturally. You take highly compensated missions with a frequency that, I estimate, has made you wealthier than most local lords…” Haku concluded, “What’s the point? Why aren’t you using your time or resources effectively, and rallying Mist shinobi to your cause? You want to retake the Mist Village, but you waste your time on meaningless tasks.”

Zabuza paused on a tree branch and turned to the young man, darkly amused, “You think someone like me is going to rally anyone to a cause?”

“You did, once.”

“They were swordsmen like me. We had something in common.” Zabuza told him, “What’s left of rebel-forces near Kirigakure won’t look to the Demon of the Hidden Mist for leadership. I’m the villain of the stories they tell their children at night.”

“Then why try at all? You can’t do it with just the two of us.” Haku pointed out the obvious, “And you’d be lucky to get Raiga and Ranmaru to help.”

“I don’t need those two shitheads.” The man growled, continuing on their route, “I can’t expect someone like you to see the big picture.”
Then enlighten me.”

Zabuza chuckled wickedly, “The fact is, the shinobi who have rebelled against the current Mizukage have already banned together. Their base is hidden. They chose a leader who they believe in, and they’re formulating their own tactics and strikes to take Kirigakure.” He elaborated, “The only thing that makes desperate people like them more secure than hope and a brave figurehead…is money.”

Haku frowned at the thought, “You want to buy…rebels?”

“I can. A few times over. Their leader doesn’t seem to have a price, though. If I can’t buy her, then I’ll cut her out of the picture.” Zabuza huffed, “She’s not getting in my way.”

“Really?” Haku was agitated by the selfish notion, “And who is she?”

“I like her already.” The boy snarked.

“A lot of guys do.” Zabuza warned him, “But don’t get attached. She’s a liability; too afraid to risk the lives of her precious supporters. She’ll never get the job done.”

“She sounds entirely competent to me.”

“In many ways she is, and she’s mastered two Kekkei Genkai she was born with.” Zabuza took stock of his competitor’s talent, “But if she won’t take directions from me, I’ve got no use for her.”

“Have you tried contacting her?”

“Once.”

“And?”

“Most people need a very long pole before they decide to touch me. She’s no different.”

“Perhaps someone ought to advocate for you.” Haku proposed.

“They’ll think you’re on drugs if you try.”

“If you both have the same goal, why not cooperate?”

“She rejected the offer. We’re working two different angles.” Zabuza concluded, “We’ll see who makes it there first.”

Haku pondered the situation in silence for a while, descending from the forest tree tops to take a rocky path towards the coast that Zabuza had found. ‘So Zabuza had asked for help and was denied. It seems only right. Someone like him hardly deserves support…and he finds it fair to pay off rebels to have them fight for him.’ He shook his head in distaste, ‘It’d be a great shame if he overtook the Mist Village.’ Objectively, however, Haku could not assume that Mei was a safer bet either. He knew nothing about the talented kunoichi other than her surplus of Bloodline Gifts.

“Why are rebels necessary?” Haku asked at length, “Why did they break away from Mist?”

“That’s too long of a story.”

“Then summarize it.” Haku requested, “I’d be lying if I said I understood anything going on in this country.”
“Summarize, eh?” Zabuza snorted, “Then you ought to know that civil war has been in these lands for nearly one hundred years. No one can get along; cease fires failed. Nobles, the working class, the impoverished, blood gifted shinobi, and murderers…No one lives a wholesome life here. The majority of the war was fought by hired clans, and the devastation whittled their numbers down, as well as gave them a reputation here for being unapproachable, untrustworthy shinobi. They were treated with suspicion and hatred ever since.” The rogue ninja gestured vaguely at him, “Which is why oddballs like you are around. Shinobi from clans fled to where they thought they’d find peace and start new lives…but you’re all just leftovers scratching for some space.”

“Thank you.” Haku’s nostrils flared furiously, “That about describes my mother and I perfectly.”

“To a fucking-T.” Zabuza agreed callously, “The fighting continued, and a call for strong leadership in Kirigakure eventually landed us with a four-foot-six-inch, bloodthirsty, lunatic-Mizukage who was the jinchuriki for the Three Tails. He ran the show spectacularly.” Zabuza scratched his chin, “Made me kill everyone in my graduating class; that fuck. He looks like a kid…but that man’s atrocities outweigh mine and all the hunters of Mist combined.”

“Why would the Mizukage be that way, in spite of such turmoil?” Haku was alarmed, “He knew that wasn’t going to help the village, surely!”

“He probably did.” The man agreed, “But rumor has it…at least from what Terumi and the gang leaders told me…Yagura isn’t really doing it.” Zabuza’s sidelong glance pierced Haku, “His puppet-master instigated the animosity and fear. The killing. The waste.”

The young man took a breath of sea-salt air, trying to remain calm, “Someone was controlling the Mizukage.”

“Still is, I bet.” Zabuza declared, “Someone wants Mist weak and scattered. That’s some epic interference, I have to admit. But what it comes down to…is that the Mizukage needs to die. Whoever has him by his Napoleonic balls needs to die too.”

“I gather that Mist ninja who stay loyal to the Mizukage and the village…are only doing so in the hope that he doesn’t kill them.” Haku wagered.

“You catch on quick.”

“Who is controlling him?”

“Don’t know.” Zabuza admitted, “But Terumi probably does.”

“Then ask her! Clearly you need her.” Haku insisted.

“Sure. When she agrees to do it my way, I’ll ask.”

“Is it really impossible for you to cooperate with someone? If you had combined forces you may have succeeded already!”

Zabuza passed a roadside shrine, cresting the hill that overlooked the Moji seaport. He merely grunted at the idea.

“Zabuza.” Haku stopped where he stood, “You need to work with others. Nothing will change if you continue this way.”

“I don’t.”
“You overestimate yourself, and you underestimate the force you’re up against.” Haku spat boldly, “What if Yagura is being controlled by the Akatsuki? He’s a jinchuriki. That organization concerns itself with dominating all shinobi nations by way of possessing Biju; what if it already has sway over the Mist Village?”

“You are going out on a thin limb there, Haku.” Zabuza notified him, speaking over his shoulder, “Keep up.”

Haku leapt down the slope, returning to the nukenin’s side, “At least confirm it with Terumi-san. You can still contact her, can’t you? It’s critical.”

“What, pray tell, is so fucking critical about it?” Zabuza snarled, his hands thrashing, “I don’t give a single shit if the Akatsuki is involved in Mist or not. If it happens to be their influence that has that village bent like a pretzel, I’m going to set it straight no matter what. No matter who it is.”

“You’re no match.” Haku spoke gravely.

“Go fuck yourself.” Zabuza replied self-assuredly, “I don’t tell you that enough.”

“Hoshigaki Kisame. Uchiha Itachi.” The young man taunted, “Are you prepared for that? S-Ranked criminals against the likes of us? They won’t be unprepared. They won’t be surprised.”

Incensed, Zabuza drew the Seversword on his back and swung it in a mighty arc, nearly bisecting his mouthy apprentice before the boy ducked away. Haku maintained a healthy distance from his companion, aware that he had pushed a few key buttons.

“Even them.” Zabuza’s voice rumbled, “Kisame was never a concern. The Uchiha isn’t either. I’ll bring down anyone who gets in my way.”

“You won’t win. With me at your side, or a few others, at best…we can’t deal with a threat like that.” Haku warned him, “A mere brush with the Akatsuki has left my friends and me in dire straits in the past. I have reason to suspect they are involved in all of this, and I am telling you that you are misguided in thinking you’ll be victorious.”

Zabuza hitched his sword to his back again, “What makes you so sure it’s them? You’re the one who doesn’t know jack-all about this place.”

“The evidence is compelling.” Haku replied, “This issue is formulaic, and all my life I’ve had a knack for problem solving. Just ask Gaara or Naruto.”

The nukenin snorted in frustration, but kept the idea in mind. Haku, for his part, was rather bright. If he pieced together a potential identity of an enemy, it was favorable to learn more and prepare. Zabuza still did not wish to give him too much credit, ‘He can be so goddamn annoying…’

After entering the seedy city called Moji; Pua kept by Haku’s side as they traversed the streets. At the corner of a harbor warehouse and a line of brick buildings, Zabuza stopped.

“Stay close by. I’ll find us some local work to do and we’ll have cash by tonight.” The man added, “Don’t make a scene and attract any Hunter-nin that could be around. For diversion: women are fine. Alcohol is fine. Do not buy drugs here.”

“Are you serious?” Haku muttered, mortified.

“Tch. You’ll want something to do until I get back, and that’s all there is to do around here.” Zabuza retorted. “Try one.” With that settled, he entered a guarded doorway and the attendant waved him along in boredom.

Haku stood on the sidewalk and exchanged a perplexed look with his white rabbit.

With a quiet sigh he turned to begin walking. “We should find Roga-san, if he’s still here.” Haku supposed, “Pua, can you track his scent? I need to speak with him.”

“Maybe.” The rabbit posed, twitching her ears. Her whiskered nose went wild for a moment, puffing air, analyzing, and then she hopped her way down the street in a southerly direction. Haku followed his pet through parts unknown and suspect, careful not to stand out among the coastal inhabitants.

Down a soggy alleyway and into another business district, Pua arrived at a closed door of a tavern and scratched at it, sniffing frantically. Haku opened it for her and continued to follow. The rabbit skirted the half-occupied bar and turned right, arriving at a booth table. Haku came to a halt beside her. Sure enough, the lavender haired Snow ninja was seated and having a conversation with a suited man. He paused when he noticed a visitor.

“Ah, Haku.” Roga was surprised, “I didn’t think I’d see you so soon.”

“I appreciate that you reached out.” Haku told him, “I can come back later, since you’re occupied.”

The man in the suit rose hurriedly, “No, no! We wrapped up our business. I don’t want to impose on a shinobi heart-to-heart.” He added as he left notes of money on the table, “Thank you, Roga-sama. It was a pleasure, as always.” The man bustled out.

Roga lifted a hand, motioning towards the free seat, “Join me.”

Haku sat down and gathered Pua into his lap, quietly thanking her for her assistance. Roga appeared pleased with the rabbit as well.

“She’s very quick, that little one of yours.” The Snow ninja told him, “So you recall what I told you; about what I found here?”

“Someone with the Hyoton.” Haku nodded, “How did you do it?”

“It’s quite simple, actually. You see, Moji seaport is a hub for nukenin and criminals who take advantage of business operations. I’m more involved with the business-side of things here, to be honest. Others act as hit-men for substantial pay, typically.” Roga explained, “Not too long ago, when I was here last to attract some funding…I didn’t mince words with a shinobi who was looking for work at the office. It sparked an argument. Later, we had a brawl near a loading dock since he was the…confrontational sort.”

“Fubuki mentioned that as well.” Haku recalled.

“Only because I lived to tell about it. I didn’t realize just how strong he was.” Roga confessed, “I took my leave after that fight when he tired of me, but I could never forget how his Blood Limit trumped my Ice Release jutsu. This past week I wondered if he still haunted these parts for work. I asked around the office before I set up appointments, and sure enough…” Roga unfolded a sheet of paper and pushed it across the table, “He’s one of the preeminent nukenin of Moji. Many mobsters have his details in portfolios they keep, which is where I got a copy of this.”

It was a black and white photograph of a man. He appeared pale and lean, with a face framed by dark, chin-length tresses. His mouth formed a thin line, and his eyes revealed a tempest of aggression. He wore heavy dark clothing and the helix of his left ear was pierced with numerous studs.
Haku’s heart sunk. He could only detect minimal resemblance to the man, if that. It would be a long shot to determine what their blood relation truly was. Haku was unsure if he wanted to associate with another battle-hardened nukenin.

“He’s called Ikazai.” Roga told him in a low voice, “And he isn’t what you’d call nice. Not like you are…”

Haku sighed deeply, trying to tread a sea of disappointment, “Thank you for telling me this, Roga-san.”

“I wish I had better news to give you.” The Snow ninja admitted, “I don’t know much about this person other than how he fought. You can probably ask around employment offices and find if anyone recognizes him.”

“I doubt I will hear anything encouraging.” Haku supposed, folding the photograph up.

“Here.” Roga twisted a cap off of a bottle of beer and poured it into a glass, “Gomo-san didn’t bother opening this. You have it.”

“I’m not of age.”

The Snow ninja smiled wryly, “No one here cares. You just got bad news. Have it.”

Pua perched on the edge of the table and sniffed curiously. She allowed Roga to affectionately pat her head. Haku lifted the glass and tasted it, “Dry.”

“Yes. I always get this one.”

Haku set it down again, “I don’t think this will make me feel better.”

“Of course the first few sips won’t fix anything. You’ll understand when you get to the bottom.”

A short while later, Haku reminded Roga that he did not want to clue Zabuza in to their brief visit. The Snow ninja gladly made himself scarce. Haku returned rosy-cheeked and mildly dispirited to the roadside where he had seen Zabuza last. It was another ten minutes before his companion appeared outside and regarded him curiously.

“I half expected you not to try anything.” Zabuza commented, getting a whiff of him, “Ale. Huh. I bet you’d do better with wine.”

Haku shook his head in disagreement, “I don’t think I’ll need either in the future.”

“How many did you have?”

“One.”

“Good. You can still work.” Zabuza determined, “Follow me.”

They passed the afternoon acting as sentinels for a crew bringing in contraband from a docked ship. Occasionally, regulators from the Mist Village came by to inspect shipments and report any illegal activity. Such watchdogs were lenient on most days, but to avoid citations of obvious infractions, mobsters would have shinobi clandestinely cast Genjutsu or knock harbor supervisors unconscious. It was the better way to do business.

Their employer picked them just in the nick of time. Two straight-laced regulators stopped in the yard, pulling open a wooden carton of stolen goods. Before they could point out the violation and begin an investigation, Haku flanked them from the side and cast a medium-strength Genjutsu. The two men were moved by a crew member from the shipyard to a bench, left alone in their stupor. Haku felt rather bad about impeding the law, but was glad the men did not have to pay with their lives.

Late in the afternoon when Zabuza returned to pick up their reward, Haku stopped into an office several blocks away. He took Roga’s advice and asked the workers present if they recognized the man in the photo.

“He looks angry.” A secretary at a desk assessed, “I don’t think I’ve seen this fellow.”

“Eh… I don’t know. I think he’s been around. I’m not sure who he is.” Another chimed in.

A portly thug in a leather jacket pulled the photo from their hands, looking it over. “Ikazai.” He said before handing it back to Haku, “That’s Yuki Ikazai. Not to be messed with around here. We’ve spoken before and he does good work.”

“Yuki.” Haku repeated the name in shock, “Is that a clan name?”

“Sure is. That’s where Snow Devils come from.” The man in the jacket told him, “You don’t see them much anymore, but they can be trouble. Watch your step, kid.”

Haku thanked them for their input and briskly returned outdoors. Something inside him felt lighter at the prospect of finally securing his surname. It was unfortunate that the relative in question was a dangerous criminal, but he had at least gotten a prominent lead on how to go about his search. ‘I need to find other members of the Yuki clan.’ He frowned to himself, ‘And I don’t think Zabuza would want me to do that.’

When the swordsman returned he handed Haku an envelope of money. Haku steeped in his thoughts as he trailed behind Zabuza along the avenue with a view of the sunset. Pua kept pace with them as they approached a traditionally styled building. Haku believed it was an inn.

“We won’t go back tonight.” Zabuza informed him, “I need a break first.”

Not objecting to the simple demand, Haku followed the nukenin into the bukeyashiki, removing their shoes before they entered. An old woman peered at them from a low table, “You staying the night?”

“Yeah.”

“My rates are different for two.” The spinster warned them, “Pay up front and then I can show you to a room.” She regarded Zabuza’s sword and added as an afterthought, “Since you’re shinobi, don’t forget: no fighting or any other nonsense. Your type have messed my establishment up before. I’ll have the top crime boss make you pay up for damages.”

Zabuza laughed quietly at the warning. The old woman was about to forbid the rabbit that was nestled in Haku’s arms before the nukenin handed her substantial payment, which she quickly accepted, and tucked it into the sash of her yukata. She scooted along, “This way.”

Down a long hallway with polished floors and screen doors, the old woman escorted them to a stately room and ushered them in. Upon entering, Haku had a quizzical feeling as he beheld the odd choice of decoration. It was a room with tall ceilings and an enormous window facing the ocean, blocked off with wooden bars. Futons were set up at the far end of the room, bathed in the light of the sunset. Throw pillows and floor cushions were scattered hither and thither, and the selection of traditional wall scroll artwork was scandalous. ‘Maybe nude paintings aren’t so unusual here in this Haku settled on a floor cushion and rested his head on the wooden display case behind him. The day’s events had worn him out. Pua sat beside him and preened her fur.

The old woman hovered at the doorway and asked Zabuza pointedly, “Comforts?”

He set his sword down and replied over his shoulder, “Yeah.”

“Very well. I’ll bring those by shortly. Help yourself to the kiseru there, but be sure to use the tray.” The woman pointed a gnarled hand at a low table, covered with various items, “If you want to order something special that’ll cost you extra.”

“This is enough.” Zabuza replied.

The innkeeper observed Haku skeptically, “And for you?”

“I don’t need anything. Thank you.” He assured her. Peeved, the old woman slid the door shut immediately.

Haku closed his eyes and leaned back again, setting some tension free. Minutes later, he noticed Zabuza had undone the wrappings around his neck and face. He observed as the man handily took a pipe from a brass stand, inspected it, and then proceeded to prepare it.

“You smoke?” Haku wondered aloud.

Zabuza gave him a bored look, “There isn’t much I don’t do to pass the time.” He lit the pipe without further thought, “If you come to a place like this and they give you kiseru, you take it. Doing it once in a blue moon never got me sick.”

“Fair enough.”

“There’s another one here.” Zabuza gestured to the stand, “You enjoyed one of Moji’s diversions today. Might as well try all three.”

“I didn’t enjoy drinking and certainly not those other things…” Haku admitted, “But thanks anyway.”

Zabuza stared at him for a long moment from across the room, exhaling a line of smoke as he thought. He asked abruptly, “How old are you?”

“Sixteen.”

“Pff.”

“Does that matter?”

“I guess it doesn’t. You look your age.” Zabuza added as he made himself comfortable on throw pillows, “But your brain is decades ahead.”

“Was that an attempted compliment?” Haku verified.

“You think too much.” The man told him, “Sometimes good can come of it, though.”

Haku smiled to himself, amused, “I hope so.”
Pua settled down for a nap on a cushion while the two men sat in silence.

Zabuza spoke up again as Haku began to drift off, “I’ll contact her.”

Haku blinked tiredly, “Who?”

“Mei.” His eyes were fixed on the ceiling rafters as he continued to think, “She’ll probably know something.”

“Would she tell you?” Haku wondered, “It seems to me that you are competitors.”

“She probably will.” Zabuza exhaled, “And I don’t have competitors. I just have hurdles to clear.”

“My mistake.” Haku conceded and then added, “Zabuza…if we can confirm that the Mizukage is being influenced by the Akatsuki…how do you want to proceed?”

He answered with certainty, “I’ll finish your training. We need to find the Master Scroll so I can get you Nuibari. That’ll get us ahead. I’ll buy out Terumi and her ninja. And before we commit to a coup…” Zabuza’s sigh was a rolling, aggravated growl, “We’ll need to contact villages that have dealt with the Akatsuki before.

Haku brightened at the prospect, “Would you request aid from Leaf?”

“I just need info. I don’t need their fucking aid.”

“You might, in the end.”

“Will you quit trying to cram me into your inter-village-friendship-box?” Zabuza snipped, smoke escaping from his nose in tendrils, “I’m doing this my way.”

“But…you took what I said into consideration.”

“It’d be much stupider not to.” The man replied evenly.

The arrival of dusk prompted Haku to light several of the lanterns throughout the room. Zabuza’s smoking reminded Haku of the days Jiraiya would laze about and light up his pipe. He longed to visit his sensei and teammates again. When there was a knock at the door, Zabuza extinguished the pipe in a tray and he grunted for the visitor to enter.

The old woman had returned. When she stepped inside she was followed by a line of relatively young women, and Haku was quickly perturbed. Earlier, he had thought that they were staying the night in a run-of-the-mill hotel. It rapidly occurred to him that Zabuza had picked a more sordid location.

Somewhat alarmed and intimidated, Haku shrunk in his spot on the side of the room while Zabuza approached the lineup. He folded his arms while the madam gave her suggestions.

“You three. Out.” She shepherded the novice girls away, deducing that Zabuza was interested in creatures of substance, “You’ll want someone your age. That’s what you ask for every time you stop by here.”

“Give or take a few years.” He agreed. His gaze stopped on a dark haired woman with a far off expression on her face.

Haku averted his eyes, flinching when Zabuza tugged the shoulder of the woman’s tunic aside. He wanted to flee, terrified of the environment; overpowered by his ethical opposition to prostitution overall. Haku was stunned by his helplessness in objecting or interfering with Zabuza at that point. Beginning such a confrontation would be foolish, and not likely worth defending the honor of strangers.

Zabuza pulled aside the dark haired woman and a fearsome, grinning brunette. As they retreated to the back of the room the old woman droned, “Thought so. Consistent like always.” She motioned for her lineup to exit, but stopped a young woman, “You stay. For him.” The madam pointed at Haku, “You’ve been paid for.”

The young lady turned around and regarded a very out-of-place teenager near the smoking table. The old woman nudged her forward before shutting the door. The young lady stepped lively towards Haku, her smile reflecting some concern, “Good evening.”

“Please, don’t mistake me for a customer.” Haku spoke quietly, shamefaced.

“I’m Aosako.” She sat beside him with her legs primly folded beneath her, “What’s your name?”

He hesitated to give it. There was no need to converse or witness such debauchery. Haku expected he could make a clean escape by rendering her unconscious, but he didn’t know how Zabuza would react to a harebrained exit.

“You’re a deer in the headlights.” Aosako said softly, “Don’t worry. I’m not like those two over there.”

“Even so, I want to make it clear I have no interest in this. I was tricked into coming here.” He repeated.

“I see.” The young woman peeked towards the trio as they began to disrobe, and then turned back to Haku, “If you’re uncomfortable in here, and I know I would be too, I’ll take you to a spare room.”

“For some sleep.” He established.

“That’s what I thought.” She nodded keenly, “Your name?”

“Haku.”

“Come with me please.” Aosako lead the way and paused inquisitively when Haku scooped up a rabbit before escaping to the hallway. “It won’t be as spacious as the other room.” She warned as she escorted him to a small offshoot at the end of the corridor.

Haku followed her inside to the dimly lit quarters. He set Pua down. There was space for a large futon, and a small table against the wall with a lamp and ashtray. The window had a clear view of the rising moon. He heard the door slide shut behind them, and he gave the girl a confused look, “You don’t need to be here.”

“I must, Haku-san. If I am caught not doing what Auntie told me to, I’ll be punished and have my pay docked.” Aosako explained, “You can do whatever you want. I have to wait here until morning.”

Haku held his face with one hand, mortified, “You really have nowhere else to go?”

“Don’t you?” She replied sharply, “I live here.”

“I could go home, but it’s a two day journey.” Haku took a seat and sighed heavily. Aosako sat beside him, smiling at the rabbit that explored the perimeter of the room.
“You might as well stay and rest, then.” The girl recommended. She truly was very pretty, Haku noticed. Pale and slender with a long neck, her hair was mint green, trimmed extremely short like a boy’s. It flattered her face and huge blue eyes. Her yukata was simple with green and violet designs.

Aosako sat near the edge of the futon, taking the second pillow for herself. The young woman settled sideways on the floor with a yawn and rested her head. She seemed genuinely pleased to not have to pander to a customer. Haku looked at her strangely from a few feet away, unsure if it made sense to let his guard down. Pua nestled beside him as he reflected, ‘It was kind of her to take me away from there.’

In the dark of the room Haku slowly lowered himself down; timid around someone he did not know. He lay on his back and watched the girl warily. Pua adjusted again to fit in the warm space between his side and arm.

With her eyes still shut Aosako spoke, “I won’t do anything to you. Relax.”

“That’s easier said than done.” Haku replied, “I’ve never been in a place like this before.”

“I can tell.” She smiled and batted an eye open, “You have some decency. And you’re a shinobi. I rarely see that.”

“Many shinobi have compassion the way I do. I imagine you haven’t had the good fortune of meeting any of them.”

“No. Never. People only care about themselves here in Moji. Everything has changed since I was a child.” Aosako kept her voice low, “Gangs took over. The university closed. Even after we begged for help and for the authorities to step in…no one took action. Not even the Mizukage.” She rolled onto her back and added, “No one is concerned for the lives of people like us.”

A lulling quiet filled the room before Haku said, “I am.”

Aosako responded with a curt, inaudible laugh. She turned her head towards him, “So one person cares. What can you do about all of this?”

“I’m not sure.” He admitted.

“Tell someone to change it. My city has been suffering.” Aosako demanded with narrowed eyes, “I have no choice but to leave it soon.”

“You’re leaving?”

“Yes. I have a man who says he can’t live without me, and we’re going to the Land of Waves together soon.” She smiled triumphantly, “I’m only here to save up extra money for the time being. I have family who will let us stay in the Tide Village until we get on our feet.”

“I have friends there too.” Haku noted, letting his eyelids droop.

“What can you do about all of this?”

“A boy or a girl?”

“Girl.” He sighed with an afterthought, “Did you think…that was why I wasn’t interested?”

“Hm. I can tell you’re a little bit interested. Sometimes customers come here who like both.” Aosako explained, “I never try to assume I know their preference.”

Haku shut his eyes and calmed down significantly. Simple conversation could do no harm.

“I think…I look less feminine than you do.” She observed with mild amusement, “Your face and hair…”

“I get that a lot.” Haku replied sleepily.

“I see. We have appeal, in our own ways.” Aosako decided, “Shinobi aren’t usually as attractive as you, Haku-san, at least from my experience.”

He laughed softly before drifting off. After a short while, the young woman settled down for sleep as well, stretching out on the opposite side of the futon. The moon’s journey across the sky filtered light into the room, stretching shadows across the compact space. Sometime in the night Pua stirred, circled around Haku, and then snuggled against her master’s warm back while he slept on his side.

A lark’s piercing whistle heralded the sunrise hours later.

Haku managed to disregard the arrival of dawn, bound by sleep, with a hand strewn carelessly behind a pillow. Pua, who by then was curled up on his chest, was gently lifted and set aside. Aosako patted the rabbit’s soft fur and then leaned over the dozing guest.

“You should wake up. Your friend is already out in the lobby.” The young woman warned, “If you stay much longer he’ll buy someone else’s company, I bet.”

Haku’s eyes opened a sliver, “Zabuza may have done that already. I’m in no rush.”

Aosako’s smile was sprightly, “I like you, Haku-san. I should teach you some things before you go.” She bent gracefully and pressed her mouth to his, startling him.

Haku quickly pushed back on her shoulders, “No, I said that-!”

“Calm down. You’re not paying attention.” She admonished, “You have someone you care about, you said, but I can tell you’re not good at kissing. Just let me teach you something good. You don’t have to thank me…”

A soft sound of unease escaped him before Aosako moved in again, fixing her mouth on his tenderly. His hands found her shoulders again, poised to roughly shove her.

The woman spoke, “Feel that? It isn’t forceful. That’s the kind of kissing you’ll like.” She sucked his bottom lip gently. Decisively, Haku pushed her back again.

Aosako shook her head, regaled, “You’re a boy. Acquire this skill and become a man, won’t you? I promise there are much more unpleasant ways to learn.”

He frowned, “I never said I wanted to learn.”

“When you see her you’ll be glad you did.” She assured him, tracing her fingertips lightly across his hairline, kissing him again. This time he did not resist as much.

Weakness coupled with inquisitiveness made him permit Aosako’s advances. To Haku’s relief, the young woman would pause and explain after she did something, “Are you getting this? It’s my specialty, after all. You’re quite the sheltered one.” She only asked him to kiss back once, which he did adequately, “Good.” She moved away and sat, stretching her arms over her head.
A crimson blush spread over Haku’s face, “Aosako-san, I wish you hadn’t done that.”

“You’ll forgive me.” Aosako raised a pointed finger, “Before you go, I’ll tell you some other useful things. I won’t let you peek at me because you are far too shy…but you really should know what to do.”

Curiosity willed him to stay. He sat across from the mint-haired woman and listened to a bold, salacious account of what love-making should be, in her humble opinion. Like with most subjects, Haku absorbed the information and committed it to memory.

“You can always ask your friend if you want to know about something,” Aosako reminded him, “He’s very experienced.”

“I’d rather not.” Haku smiled dubiously, “But thank you.”

“See? I didn’t hurt you.” Aosako stood and patted her yukata smooth, “Come along now. If you stay longer Auntie will charge you extra for spending time with me.”

Haku promptly stood, ignoring the popping sounds of his limbs, and followed the young woman out and down the hall. Pua bounced happily beside him, as if detecting his good mood.

The lobby in the front of the building was empty save for the madam of the establishment in the corner, reading a newspaper; and Zabuza seated on a sofa, staring catatonically in wait. Aosako accompanied Haku as far as the doorway before giving a polite bow, “Thank you for staying with us, Haku-san. Please have a safe trip.” She smiled impishly, “Maybe I’ll see you again sometime.”

“It was…nice to meet you.” Haku replied with a touch of embarrassment.

The old woman did not so much as spare a glance as the two men left. Pua kept pace with her companions, frequently chirping “Ramen,” indicating she needed to be fed.

It was not until they were a kilometer outside of the city, travelling in silence, that Zabuza made a comment to Haku, “You picked a good one.”

“Nothing happened.” His tone was sharp, “Don’t ever bring me to a place like that again.”

“No need. You know how to bring yourself there.” Zabuza answered casually, “I waited too long. Training you got in the way of my routine.”

Haku turned his nose up, asserting, “Someone like you needs to substitute a real relationship with a convention as despicable as that.”

“It’s simpler.”

“It definitely isn’t. That place should be burned to the ground.”

“Hey, it’s not my fault that’s a staple of the economy here. Don’t forget, a lot of them have no other means to survive or shelter themselves. This country isn’t fair to anyone, least of all women.” Zabuza countered, “Guys work there too, come to think of it.”

“So be it. But I’m never going back there again.”

“Yeah. Sure.”

“I’m serious.” Haku hissed.
“Look, you’re the one who woke up late, horsing around with minty-head-girl.”

“I didn’t! She kept trying to…” He huffed in aggravation, “I don’t need to explain myself.”

“You don’t. Me paying for that was a small gift to you, which you’re obviously ungrateful for. I’d expect nothing less from a square like you, Haku.” Zabuza grumbled, “From here on out, you aren’t getting any more handouts from me. We have work to do.”

Later that morning in the Leaf Village, Tsunade had spent some time pitching objects at Sakura in a private training yard, keeping the girl on her toes. Try as she might to accost her apprentice, the pink haired kunoichi was too quick to be caught. They threw equally powerful kicks and punches at each other. The Hokage take a breather when her empty stomach rumbled.

“We shouldn’t neglect breakfast.” She abruptly suspended the practice, “Come on, Sakura. Shizune will have something waiting for us at the office.”

“Right!” She hurried after her mentor, “And we have a joint check-up as well. It’s better if we’re early.”

“Oh, I nearly forgot about that.”

They returned to the administrative building and graciously thanked Shizune as the woman left rolled omelets on the Hokage’s desk, “Protein! I know you two are working hard.” Warm tea and pear wedges accompanied the egg. The two crammed them into their mouths.

Tsunade chewed as she looked over a new report. With a sound of annoyance, she chucked the documents into the trash bin. Shizune retrieved them and dusted the parchment off, “Wait, Tsunade-sama…these were relevant.”

“Nope.”

“But Gaara….”

“No.” Tsunade stood firm, “He’s not getting support for the Tide Village until this Chunin Exam concludes. I have enough to deal with right now.” She eyed her apprentice, “Make sure you remind him of that, Sakura.”

“Understood.” The girl smiled knowingly. She was not going to sway matters one way or the other, and she felt confident that Gaara could handle things on his own.

“Speaking of which, I want you to know that I believe you are completely prepared for the Exam.” Tsunade announced to her student, “Even now, Sakura, you are a shinobi I can always depend on.”

“Shishou…” Sakura set her tea down, appreciative of the proclamation.

“Don’t get mushy on me.” The woman chided, chomping on her last piece of pear, “Those are just the facts. You and all of your peers are ready.”

They finished eating and Shizune removed the tray, followed out of the office by Ton-Ton. While Tsunade discussed a recently-acquired technique with Sakura, two Chunin came and went with reports. Sakura reprimanded her teacher when she attempted to toss them straight into the trash again. Sakura salvaged the reports and read them over, “Tsunade-sama, these only need short replies.”

She pouted, “Once I respond then they feel entitled to send all of their other requests. It’s always the same.” Grudgingly, Tsunade accepted the scrolls with a sigh, preparing ink and a brush.

“Good morning!” Lee’s greeting from the open doorway drew their attention. He was followed by Neji as they stepped inside.

“Good morning!” Sakura was equally chipper, “Are you both feeling better?”

“I most certainly am.” Lee declared, “I have never treasured music and the human voice half so much.”

Neji gave a small nod, not nearly as sociable as his friend.

Tsunade beckoned them over, “Both of you, let’s make this quick. You’ve made great progress in healing since that mission.” Lee lined up first, letting the Hokage pass her hands over the sides of his head and ears with a hum of chakra, “Hmm. You’re in better shape than most. I’ll clear you, Lee. If you have any problems going forward please tell me.”

“I will, Hokage-sama.” He stepped away so Neji could bend down.

From her seat, Tsunade inspected the Hyuga more critically, prodding, eventually pressing her palm flat to his forehead. She shut her eyes and sensed for any abnormalities or trauma, “Likewise…” She smiled, “You’ve also improved. It’s a good thing that you got to me when you did. The damage could have been worse.”

“Thank you, Hokage-sama.” He stepped away respectfully.

“Alright,” Tsunade rotated in her chair and stretched her arms over her desk, “All of you please be on your way. I’ll give out mission assignments later. Train hard in the meantime.”

The youngsters promptly evacuated the office and went in separate directions. Sakura was swift to locate the rest of her team, and Lee turned to Neji expectantly, “Tenten said that she had some work to do in the forge, but she should be done soon. Should we forgo training with Grandpa?”

“Just for today. There isn’t enough time.”

“I will return home and tell him, then.” Lee determined, “I will meet you both at our training field shortly!” And he was off like a shot.

Neji followed the peaceful streets toward the Hyuga estate in the daybreak sunshine. It boggled him that Tenten had already been up for several hours, crafting weapons for other shinobi of the village. He had a hard enough time waking up for his early-bird schedule. Of course, Neji imagined it was not an easy task for the Hokage either, who was up and about for some reason. She had been surprisingly alert for 7:30AM. He supposed that Tsunade was using her time wisely before the Chunin Exam arrived.

Neji was also grateful that Tsunade had mended what remained of the traumatic brain injury he sustained in the Marsh Country. She did not care much if he had any recall of events, since Tenten had given quite the lengthy report. Tsunade only asked for him to return if he experienced complications.

The only complication he was experiencing was prolonged embarrassment. He had not told either of his teammates or the Hokage, but Neji was able to remember a laundry-list of things that had happened in the wilds of the Marsh Country. While somewhat jumbled and rooted deeply in emotion, the flashes of memory flustered him at random points throughout each day.
Once back in Leaf after their mission, Neji was able to recall clearly how Lee beat the daylights out of him, trying to reacquaint him with Taijutsu. Lee had also been a capable hunter, a diligent guardian, and had even achieved the rare task of making Neji laugh. It almost made his skin crawl that such a thing had happened, but he was able to recover from it.

What made a most lasting impression was his time with Tenten. She had been very patient and considerate. He remembered her tying his hair up in a ponytail, her clever answers to his many questions, learning how to harness his chakra from her lessons, how Tenten had killed several enemies to preserve him and Lee without an ounce of regret. He also remembered staying close beside her each night, huddled for warmth and a brush of her skin.

And, in his naiveté, he asked if she cared about him on the seaside hilltop. Even today, Neji was surprised by how angrily Tenten had reacted. Though they had resolved their quarrel shortly after that, it still stung him to think about how they had screamed at each other. He believed their days of vicious disagreements were behind them, but maybe that was not the case.

At the Hyuga estate he sat in the tea room and ate a meal from the spread that had been untouched by Hanabi. These days, his younger cousin seemed to be moping about her lack of a headband. Hinata informed him of the girl’s plight. After eating, Neji returned to his room to dress in Wushu attire. He knew that Lee would be able to postpone their training with Wong Leung, but the old man always had them make up for it later in the day. Neji preferred being equipped for when the old man demanded their participation, swinging a switch threateningly.

He tied his hair slightly higher than normal. It was a habit that had stuck. Neji stepped out the sliding door of his room to the porch, stooping over to tap his shoes on. His eyes strayed over the vibrant green lawn of the compound, and then his mind jolted.

Grass on the knoll by the bay, a cool breeze. Tenten had laid still there, grimacing in discomfort from her injury. There she was, picturesque in an assembly of indigo butterflies, trying to catch her breath. Her back had been sliced open because he wasn’t fast enough. She had willingly stood between him and certain death. The feeling filled Neji as he stood upright, shoes on, stepping out onto the lawn in dumbfoundment. She was perfect. He was yearning. He could remember negotiating a relationship with her, anxious, his heartbeat drumming.

Neji stood stupidly in the morning light. Tenten had laughed at his brashness. She accepted. He kissed her several times. The journey wore on as she tried to introduce him to Jyukken, and while he had barely grasped it, he remembered Gentle Fist anyway when it was time throw down the last of their pursuers. It felt like an invisible barb in the center of his torso. He had been so happy. That feeling had not lingered by the time his team boarded the ship home. Strange, for the emotion inside him seemed big enough to fill three oceans full and was not likely to disappear.

What was most astounding, Neji thought, as he took a slow step forward; Tenten had said nothing. She made no demands and no searching remarks on the way back to Leaf. She had let all of it dissipate as if she anticipated he had not wanted any of it.

She still smiled, though. She didn’t look sad.

His breathing quickened. It was fortunate that it was early; few of his clansmen were around to see him rush out of the yard.

In town, Tenten had cleaned up from her work at the forge and set out on the road. She had put on a new white cheongsam with maroon embroidery. For the day, she only carried Hok on her back and side holsters with summoning scrolls. ‘Less is more. I hope we can take it easy today...’
She rounded the corner to the main avenue, seeing that it was beginning to bustle with morning traffic. Ino and Chouji stopped across the street from her, spotting her, and then bounded over together. Tenten greeted her friends warmly.

“Hey there! Hinata told me your team had one heck of a mission!” Ino had a spark of gossip in her eye, “You handled it all, Tenten. Did the Hokage give you a bonus?”

“No. I just did what I had to do.” She smiled sheepishly, “I think Tsunade-sama expects me to be a good leader, by now.”

“Yeah, I guess you’re right.” The blonde girl conceded.

“Are Neji and Lee doing better?” Chouji asked thoughtfully.

“They are.” Tenten was beaming, “You boys should spend some time this afternoon, if we don’t have missions. I noticed that it’s working wonders for the both of them.”

“No problem. Shikamaru should be free by then.”

“And how about you?” Ino inquired, “The girls will want to know about your heroics overseas.”

“Uh…” Tenten folded her arms and held her chin, “It’s not going to…delight everyone.”

“What does that mean?”

“You won’t like how it ended.”

“I won’t?” Ino was perplexed, “You’re all alive. Can’t complain about that, right?”

“My thoughts exactly.” Tenten agreed whole-heartedly.

Chouji interrupted by pointing to the top of a tiled building to their left. The girls swiveled, looking up at Neji who wore a concerning, stern expression. On the stone ledge he locked eyes with his teammate and called to her, “Tenten. You’re late.”

“I’m late?” Tenten muttered, glancing sidelong to her fellow kunoichi, “I swear I was ten minutes ahead.”

“You’re running on Neji-time. You’ll never be early now that you’re on his team again.” Ino grinned, “Good luck! We’ll see you later, Tenten.” She and Chouji proceeded on to meet with Asuma.

Tenten had virtually no chance to get a word in with Neji, trailing behind him as he hurtled over the rooftops towards their destination. ‘This is typical. Doesn’t he know that I just slaved over a furnace for a sword order? For three hours! Or that I left a Shadow Clone to work on it so that I would be on time? I thought Lee told him…’ She exhaled roughly. It was better having him be his normal, bossy self than it was to see him struggle without memory of who he was. It was what she had hoped for. ‘But I am setting the record straight: I am early.’

At the field, dew clung to plants and blades of grass. Neither Lee nor Gai had arrived yet, ‘Of course, because unlike some people, Neji doesn’t care what time they show up! Fuh.’

She rested her hands on her hips, irked, “Listen, Neji. Don’t give me crap about being late! I was working my-!” Tenten fumbled with her words when he charged at her from the side, reached, and in the same motion drew Hok from its sheath.
Tenten had the sense to duck before he severed her head with a sword-swipe. She skidded over wet grass and bramble, shocked, “Hey! What are you-?” He dashed again, nearly driving Hok’s point into her ribcage. She rolled, securing a kunai from the holster on her hip, “Are you nuts?”

Neji attacked again, his face ice-cold, and terror briefly flooded her, ‘Is this an imposter? Did I follow a fake across town just to get murdered?’ As she recalled, Neji did not know a damn thing about swords. Perhaps she was about to meet her maker.

She parried a strong blow that knocked her back. She took out a second kunai, wielding with both hands as she spun and rushed though the clearing. One of the frog-clasp ties of her collar had been cut, ‘This is new!’ Tenten parried again and kicked him viciously in the stomach. Neji folded backwards, rolled impressively, and was on his feet again.

“Just stop it!” She shrieked, “What did I do to you?” Tenten tossed one kunai vertically into the air and launched the second one at his hand, hoping to disarm him. He blocked with Hok. She suspected it really was her teammate, and that he had just reverted to his past asshole-tendencies.

“Can I not even get a ‘good morning’ before you pull this?” She roared indignantly. With her hands free, she summoned from a tool scroll and let loose a storm of weaponry. She did not feel guilty about it.

The onslaught nicked his arm and upper right leg harmlessly as Neji parried skillfully, running to evade, and closed the distance as Tenten landed on the ground after her jump. The kunai she had first thrown fell neatly into her hand as she executed an aerial cartwheel, aiming the knife for his hand again. When he deflected it, her rolling kick crashed into his chin and knocked him backwards. He fell with Hok still secure in his grip.

Tenten stood up, panting, and with wild eyes demanded, “Give that back.” She thought about sneaking a Shadow Clone behind him from the tree line to retrieve her prized weapon, but she supposed that he would spot it.

Neji rose slowly but had disengaged from the fight. With the jian lowered, he winced in pain and he rubbed his chin, spitting out blood.

Furious, Tenten repeated, “Do you hear me, Neji? Give that back!”

His eyes skirted over to her and he turned his head, still massaging the site of his injury, “Take it, then. That’s enough practice.”

Tenten marched towards her teammate, livid, “Practice? You put me through that just to try it out?” Her hands balled into fists, her arms held straight at her sides as she came within inches of his face, glowering, “If you don’t give me warning, then I can’t promise I’ll let you keep your extremities.”

He seemed much too casual in response to her anger, “Next time I’ll warn you.”

“Is it so much to ask? I’ve been working since four; then you complain about my perceived lack of promptness…and try to kill me.” Her expression was twisted with resentment, “I don’t put you through anything like that, Neji.”

“You try not to.” He agreed, reaching around to steady the scabbard on her back. With his right hand, Neji returned the jian to its proper place. Tenten was a bit mystified when he made no motion to unloop her from the encirclement of his arms.

She regarded him as her anger began to ebb, “Sorry about your face.”
“I deserved it.” Neji said genuinely, “I wanted you to see that I remembered what you taught me.”

“You-?” She blinked hard, teetering on the edge of confusion and further annoyance. Tenten peeked left and right, intrigued by the odd embrace as Neji held both ends of Hok. It contradicted his usual personal-space-bubble rule that, she had noticed, he stopped enforcing lately. Indeed Neji did remember some swordsmanship, from what she could see. ‘That’s…probably not the only thing he can recall.’

A spike of excitement kicked neurons on faster than a direct injection of caffeine, which she probably needed. Suddenly, Tenten was aware that Neji was subtly communicating with her. As Lee had once said, she was very good at picking up signals. ‘There’s half a chance I’m wrong about this, but…’ She fought the urge to grin, ‘I think he remembers it all.

Beneath his chin an ugly, purple-gray bruise had appeared. She gently slipped her hand over the battered skin as if to apologize. Neji shut his eyes for a moment, sedated. The young woman had an internal conference for a few seconds, ‘Ah. I definitely should. More importantly, I want to.’

With half-lidded eyes, Tenten indulged the impulse and leaned forward, adroitly kissing the ornery man who still had not let go. In fact, the grip he had on the sword at her shoulder tightened. She could hear Neji take a cleansing breath before pulling her in. Her well-intentioned gesture was veiled by his reaction, kissing fiercely, his hand quickly finding the side of her face.

A blip of rational thought may have stuck with her briefly, but Tenten lost track of it as they tousled. Open-mouthed and burning, honesty had prevailed, and she moved her hand from his chin to the back of his head without thinking. The two stayed there for quite some time, taking advantage of the privacy of the early-morning hours.

While studying her lips and the small of her back simultaneously, Neji detected a radiant heat coming from Tenten’s skin; a thin layer of sweat. He halted halfway through another kiss, inspecting her with concern, “Should I have waited?”

Tenten struggled to regain satisfactory brain function, “Waited? To be honest, you never should have, Neji. I mean, even before we set sail you had the-”

He interrupted, “I meant this morning. You were in the forge.”

“Am I sticky?” Tenten peeled back in distress, evaluating her state, “Oh, a little bit. It was hot in in the workshop but I was feeling fine when I closed up.”

“Then I did it.” Neji assumed, kissing her earlobe where a red tassel earring swayed.

“You did.” She confirmed, unable to stifle a new sound that came from her throat. He tilted her head and kissed his way down, trying to coax the sound out again.

All of it was very nice, Tenten yielded, but she was trying to decipher if Neji had some knowledge of loving touches or if it was just instinct. She felt flimsy and unskilled when she kissed back, pushing back on his chest to make an announcement, “I think we should…not surprise Lee. He’ll be here soon.”

Neji acknowledged her with a nod, stealing another lip-lock before taking a step back. He let a heavy, gypsum gaze settle on the young woman. Tenten's smile had a touch of caution in it, “You probably would have done better by just talking to me.”

The pull to touch her again was difficult to resist, “There was no way to accurately express it.”
“But with fighting? We wasted ten minutes with that, Neji.”

“It could have been longer.”

She shrugged lightly, “Yeah, I suppose.” Tenten flinched at his intense stare, “What?”

“What we established is still in effect, Tenten.” Neji informed her.

“If you’re referring to me being your girlfriend—”

“And no one else’s.” His said with an apical tone.

“Exactly.” She confirmed, “I wasn’t going to look elsewhere whether you remembered or not.” Tenten restrained a chuckle when he nodded seriously, “You should take me out somewhere to spend some time. That means no work or training can be involved.”

Neji filtered the idea through his customs and substrata of willingness before he replied, “Is that what you want?”

“Yes. It’s a rather typical request.” Tenten explained, “I just want to be around you.”

He wrestled a smile but it inched into his features anyway. Tenten captured the extraordinary expression in her mind’s eye and then turned on her heel, crossing the field that was still littered with her weapons. She shouted over her shoulder, “We should probably break this gently. Don’t look too happy in front of Lee or he’ll figure it out.”

Lee’s impeccable timing allowed him to stroll onto the scene and overhear the comment, “I am supposed to figure something out?” He glanced Neji’s way, seeing a scowl was firmly in place. ‘Normal.’ Lee deduced. He then observed Tenten as she retrieved scattered weapons. It appeared to be a classic day of training that was about to begin. He crossed over to Tenten first.

“Hey, Lee, what I meant was…” Tenten scrounged for a substitute answer, “Look at Neji’s chin. You’ll be able to tell.”

“Ahh.” Lee exchanged a stare with his good friend, who seemed to be in an emotional flux. What was plain to see was the purple patch on Neji’s jaw, “He misbehaved.”

“He did, actually.”

“Did he apologize?” He asked quietly of the kunoichi.

Tenten fought a smirk, “He did. Sincerely.”
Into Adulthood! Primed Exam Participants

Chapter Soundtrack: “Thousands” by Kenmochi Hidefumi

Obito followed the stone steps up the side of the mountain towards the town’s shrine. A friend and fellow father, Mister Hirano Seike, had handed him a crinkled paper advertisement before Obito began the hike. He read over the flier as he walked distractedly, remembering Seike’s upbeat greeting on the roadside.

“I picked that up while I was in Ine. A lot of laborers in the harbor were handing these out.” Seike told him, “I thought because you’re a ninja that you might like to watch it, Tobi.”

“Thank you.” Obito smiled wistfully, having forgone his mask that day, “I probably won’t be able to make it, but I’m happy that you gave me this.”

He re-read the advertisement while he climbed:

Announcing the annual Chunin Selection Exam, hosted by Konohagakure and its esteemed partners! Last call for registering Genin is April 30th, no exceptions. Three-man cells only with valid identification may enter. Stage One of the Exam will commence on May 20th with subsequent stages concluding within one week. Mandatory one-month-layover for Stage Three participants spans May 26th to June 26th in preparation of Final Rounds and Stadium opening.

Visitors and guests from far and wide are welcome! Valid photo ID and security check compulsory upon admittance. Arrange your accommodations in early June! Hotels will be overbooked. Some reservations are non-refundable. Tickets sell out fast, so contact your local agent today!

Only the most worthy, young shinobi will be chosen to compete in the Third Stage Tournament! Do not miss this year’s clash! Betting booths open June 26th promptly at 8:00AM.

“Hm!” Obito said to himself, “This one sounds like it’s a big deal.”

He would regret skipping it, but he had little choice in the matter. Obito followed the forested staircase to its top, where a well-kept shrine sprawled over the plateau. Every time he ascended it he recalled the day he got married, scaling the old stairs in the blistering heat of summer, years ago.

Across the courtyard he could see Rin and Yuma washing their hands at the cold water scoop. Obito had fallen behind them while he read. He stayed to the right as he passed beneath a torii gate, picking up the pace.

“What took you?” Rin asked in amusement. Obito was rapidly rinsing off his hands at the purifier.

“Seike gave me something.” He explained, pointedly not mentioning what it was. Yuma would have a fit if he learned that he would miss such a spectacle in the Leaf Village.

The boy had hopped up wooden steps to the shrine bell, urging his parents to hurry up. On the way, Obito explained quietly to his wife, “It was an advertisement for the Chunin Exam.”

“Wow. That time of year already?”

“Yeah, several weeks away.”

“Do you think anyone will try to take advantage of it again?” Rin wondered.
“I don’t know.” Obito admitted, “But I’ll find out.”

He would be leaving soon to check in with the Akatsuki. Thankfully, he had useful information to share with Jiraiya, including three out of the five Akatsuki hideout locations. With that in mind Obito thought, ‘Now we just need to figure out where Jiraiya-sama went to... Sesshu’s been tracking him for quite a while.’

A niggling feeling in the back of his mind feared that Sesshu had been hurt or apprehended during his search. Losing their faithful ninKen would not only shatter Rin, but he would be devastated as well. Each day they waited was another drop in the pail of Obito’s uncertainty.

What was becoming clearer to him, in light of recent events, was that his little family had an unacceptably fragile support system. He and Rin had maturely discussed the unknown watchman’s visit and how they had been observed. Naturally, Rin had demanded that they take proper measures by informing other residents, setting traps around the property, and even preparing Yuma for the worst. She was anxious for her dog’s return as well; hopefully Sesshu would arrive with some good news.

‘There aren’t many ways we connect with the outside world now.’ Obito thought, ‘Some townspeople. Sesshu. Jiraiya. We really are cut off... We’re not equipped to deal with emergencies or threats.’ It was this vulnerability that had him seriously considering a communication to Leaf, or at least, to the people who may wish to help them.

‘Maybe for Rin’s sake, Kakashi would try to help. Even if he decided to hate me for playing dead for so long. And...I don’t know how my clan would react to learning that I’m alive...’ His optimism spurred another idea, ‘Jiraiya’s students will help us. Naruto was every bit as friendly as Sensei was when I met him. Rin said that she met one of his teammates, Gaara. Maybe we aren’t as alone as I thought.’

“Ready?” Yuma’s voice snapped Obito out of his contemplation. He reached up to a thick rope and rang the shrine’s bell.

He gestured for his parents, on either side of him, to simultaneously bow twice. They did as Yuma directed in easy synchronization, although the two sets of claps that followed were slower than their child’s. They bowed once more together, with wishes in their hearts. Rin and Obito, of course, had implored the shrine’s god for the same thing.

“Keep us safe.” Rin whispered, as she was the last to turn away from the altar. She descended the steps with a worried look. Obito discreetly laced his hand with hers as they walked.

“Don’t worry.” He smiled sidelong at his wife, “We came up with a good plan. And we’ll ask Jiraiya about it when we get back in touch.”

“I’ll try, but when you and Sesshu are both gone I always feel...” Rin sighed, “Like the world is a much scarier place. We’ve taken a lot for granted.”

“I know.”

They walked slowly as Yuma trotted ahead, reveling in the late-Spring colors of the mountainside.

“I don’t think a prayer will protect us.” Rin’s expression had become stern, “If that stalker comes back while you’re gone...I’ll be ready to end him.”

“Rin, you probably won’t have so much as a mouse squeak by our house these days. It’s been a few weeks since it happened.”
“That’s not enough time to put me at ease. If anyone goes near Yuma…” She repeated in a severe voice, “I won’t hesitate and I won’t regret. The nice, little girl inside me is gone.”

Obito nodded in understanding. In the years they had been together, he had witnessed Rin undergo a transformation into a much tougher, more skeptical person. She had a lot of qualities that her older sister Tsume did, as he recalled. While Rin maintained her intrinsic compassion and dedication, Obito conceded that, these days, Rin was the wrong person to pick a fight with.

The family followed a path through sloping woods back to their home. They popped into the house, hopeful that their beloved family dog had returned. There was neither hide nor hair of Sesshu. Deflated, the family ate lunch together before Obito changed into his disguise. He and Yuma squeezed each other in a loving hug before Obito stepped outside to the porch, followed by Rin.

His mask was tilted to the side of his head, exposing his face as he grinned, “Are you going to miss me?”

“Yes.” She smiled and folded into his embrace, “I just want to know…how much longer do you think you’ll need to keep this up?”

Obito looked at her, his mouth pursed, reluctant to answer.

Rin went on, “Something’s got to give, Obito. One day, those criminals you are watching are going to be on the move again. When that happens, does Jiraiya-sama expect you to chase after them and keep track of it all? You doing that may not help the Leaf Village as much as you want to believe it will.”

“Someone has to.”

“Let Jiraiya do it.” She insisted, “He put you up to this. He has his act together now, you said. His students are growing up and will be out on their own…Jiraiya can make the time to follow the Akatsuki.” Rin lowered her eyes, adding, “If you were here…it’d be safer. We could spend time. Yuma and I would be happier…and…”

“I know, Rin.” He touched his forehead to hers, “I know that I’ve got to talk to him about it. It’s taken up a lot of our time…since I’ve gone away. It’s something we never would have chosen to do on our own.”

Her voice was quiet, “Don’t you…want more children?”

“Yeah, I keep thinking about it.”

“We’ll never get around to it, at this rate.” Rin replied somberly, “And what’s the point of having a family who’s going to miss Dad all of the time?”

“You have a point.” He conceded, “I need to tap out and switch with Jiraiya-sama. This isn’t fair anymore.”

“Be careful, please.” Rin pecked his lips before reconsidering, and she leaned in again for a second, longer kiss, “I’ll keep everything under control until you come back.”

“You always do. Say…” Obito’s expression was mischievous, “Do you want to try again when I come home, Rin?”

She slowly composed her answer, “That depends. The quicker you can get Jiraiya-sama to take over your watch…” Rin smiled again, “I think I’d like to try all day, every day.”
Thrilled, he kissed his wife full on the mouth again, chuckling wildly, and then Obito set out into the rolling green of the forest. Rin stood and let out a long breath, folding her arms as she thought, ‘I hope I don’t regret making that offer! Knowing Obito, he’d probably want five or more kids if I didn’t stop him. Sheesh! Where would we put them? This tiny cabin…’

She tapped her chin as she turned around and entered the house, ‘Of course it’s just a long-shot wish. We would probably have to return to Leaf before our family could grow. It isn’t wise to stay out here in the middle of nowhere and expect security. Things have gone wrong before we were watched…’

Yuma was waiting patiently at the kitchen table beside a spread of herbs and tubers, “So you’ll teach me to make medicine now? You said you’ll let me watch.”

“Sure. If you’re careful with the knife, I’ll even let you cut some of these up.” Rin offered, taking a seat beside him, “Let’s work on the big roots first. We need to grind them up.” She reached for a worn mortar and pestle.

The two began the painstaking process of smashing tubers into goo on top of wax paper. Yuma seemed to genuinely enjoy it. Rin’s mind wandered as they worked.

‘We were nearly dead a few years ago. It’s funny that we can get over these things so quickly.’ She shut her eyes for a moment, ‘A watchman? Well, that’s fine. I can beat a person up. But there are some enemies we have that we can’t really fight. Even when I tried my best…we nearly lost everything.’

Rin glanced sadly at her son, still thinking, ‘I’ve been selfish. Staying here. Hiding. If Obito and I die here in Shincha, where will you go, Yuma? I could only hope Sesshu comes back. That he’d help you get to Konoha. That you’d persevere and thrive in the place you always wanted to be…’ Her mouth curved upward, ‘With all of those talented Uchiha to call you one of their own. I want you to have a vivid, adventurous life…even if one day we won’t be in it.’

While she and Yuma worked on preparing herbs from their garden, Rin was swept back into a memory from nearly four years prior. It had been winter. Back then, Yuma was a toddler learning how to speak and express his wants and needs. She remembered how Obito had delighted in bundling up the child and romping in snow drifts with him. How Yuma had obsessed over snow and even brought it into the house by concealing it in his coat pockets. His parents could tell what he was doing, of course.

Rin recalled the sound of Yuma’s soggy boots squishing down the hall as he tried to outrun his father. He screamed shrilly when Obito caught him, promptly turning out his pockets.

The memory progressed vividly. Then Rin was by herself for house-calls, discovering multiple families with seasonal influenza. At the end of the day, more than half of Shincha had been infected, by her estimate. Though Rin scrambled to produce vaccines in her small office in town, after three straight days of work, even she and Obito were not spared from the epidemic.

Rin continued to chop up a handful of herbs, lost in the terrifying feeling of being too sick to move. It still haunted her. She had despaired. Fifteen people died within three weeks. She had supposed the vaccine she distributed to townspeople was ineffective. Though immunized, Obito had fallen ill anyway. Only Yuma had been spared, thankfully. She and her husband had drifted in and out of consciousness, barely able to care for the baby, relying on Sesshu to fetch them trivial things like water or food to eat. They had been prisoners in their home, crippled with fever, unable to tend to Yuma properly.

When Rin wondered if death was certain, Obito was fortunate enough to bounce back. He regained some strength and nursed his family as best he could. By the skin of their teeth, they recovered, weak and underfed; they returned to the village to find others had survived.

‘To this day, I still don’t know where that virus came from or how it spread so rapidly.’ She added to Yuma’s pile of crushed tubers, ‘It was like a dream; waking up in the hallway of our house, too sick to move. Collapsing anywhere. Obito thinks it was a miracle, like we were destined to make it…’

Rin shuddered at the thought. Danger always felt like it was lurking. Back then, it had been an aggressive strain of the flu. Now, it was a mysterious ninja watching their home. ‘And while Obito’s away, I’m on the front lines fighting. I want to protect my family, but is it going to be enough?’ Part of her constantly feared that her efforts would come up short, and her family was going to pay the price for it.

“Am I helping?” Yuma asked curiously, gesturing to his work, “Mine look messier than yours, Mama.”

Rin glanced over to her son’s handiwork, realizing she had lagged behind. He had prepared almost all of the plants spread out on the table.

She smiled wearily, “You’re doing great. You know…I’m going to need you to help me a lot more from now on, Yuma.”

“No problem!” He grinned back at her confidently.

When Rin was about to begin scooping morsels into her mortar, a sound caught her ear. She quickly stood up from her seat, rushing to the front of the house without a word. Baffled, Yuma hurried after her.

Rin flew out the door and across the lawn, greeting her tired ninken as he trudged up the hill. She ran to the bulky hound and kneeled down. Sesshu wagged his tail in greeting as Rin flung her arms around his neck, hugging him fiercely, “You’re alright! Oh, Sesshu!”

“Yes, I am. And so is Jiraiya-sama.” Sesshu reported happily, “I found him in a very peculiar place…”

Recently, a few members of the Hyuga clan had noticed that Neji was in a good mood.

As to why that was, most were unsure. He didn’t smile or talk much more than he normally did, but his eyes were clear and he seemed more attentive to the people around him. While it was a subtle change, members of both the Branch and Main families quietly agreed that it was easier to be in his presence nowadays.

And certainly, Hinata noticed the change but could not put her finger on what had caused it. Neji’s routine was as unassuming as ever: going out early in the morning with his teammates, occasionally stopping home for mission supplies, training with Lee’s grandfather later in the day, and then joining his family for an evening meal. ‘Well, no matter what it could be, Neji-niisan deserves to be happy.’ Hinata thought to herself. She couldn’t shake the feeling, however, that it was not merely her cousin feeling arbitrarily content; it was that it seemed someone was making him happy.

She chose not to jump to conclusions, but Hinata was hopeful that Tenten had something to do with it. ‘I want to ask Onee-san about it. Oh…I haven’t seen my friends in a few days. I’ve had two missions back to back. I’d like some company…’ ‘Hinata decided it was high-time to make plans with her fellow kunoichi. There was plenty to discuss.
While Hinata prepared for an evening visit with her friends, elsewhere in the Hyuga abode, her cousin has chosen to stay in.

Down the corridor in the Main house, Neji had retired for the night in his bedroom. He had finished a bath and redressed in simple clothes. His wardrobe, since he had gotten older, had adopted many whites, blacks, grays and teals. Hiashi had said those were the same colors his father always wore. Coincidentally, they had the same taste.

Training with Wong Leung that afternoon had been particularly challenging, Neji thought to himself. Tenten had dropped by briefly, making an attempt to mimic the exercises he and Lee performed. It was a tremendous effort for her to last thirty minutes in a prayer-crouch. After Tenten gave up she muttered under her breath to Neji, “Now I know why you hate those…”

Wong Leung clearly had a soft spot for her. He made idle chit-chat in Hanwen with Tenten before she politely departed and returned home. He then seamlessly resumed his brutalizing of Lee and Neji when she had gone. While his body’s ability to maintain balance teetered, Neji’s mind was calmer. Overall, he felt much better; about anything and everything. Free.

Now in his room, laying stomach-down on his bed, Neji thumbed through the old novel that Tenten had given him. Lee, a more avid reader, had already finished it. On their past mission to the Marsh Country, both of his teammates had brought up the book out of curiosity.

‘I gather it contains more pertinent information than any of us would have thought…’ Lee and Tenten had briefly discussed the unusual sword she could summon from the ground, explaining it to him.

Neji cracked the book open at the page he had saved, and then, after a moment, he let it rest parchment-down on the bed as he groaned quietly. It seemed foolish to try to learn more about Tenten by reading an old legend. It was more satisfying to speak to her and ask her things in person, anyway. He was better at talking than he used to be, and he very much liked talking to her. Except that, lately, Neji could not hold a conversation with Tenten long before he was compelled to place his hands or mouth on any part of her within reach. The latter was, by far, the most unusual behavior he had ever exhibited in his life.

And by some normal humans’ accounts, his behavior would not at all be regarded as “strange” or “inappropriate.” That was, if anyone knew that he was attracted to his trusted friend and teammate. Even Lee had not been made aware of their relationship yet, and Tenten promised that Lee would be the first person she would tell.

He felt. He felt so much all at once that it became a chore to make sense of his actions or crazy thoughts. Tenten had seemed so calm about it. She didn’t gush or swoon when he became that… that vulnerable, affectionate being that would appear in sporadic bursts. She didn’t criticize him for any of the unfamiliar things he did. She consciously kept her cool, even now that, sometimes, he wanted to watch her get excited. It did occur to him why Tenten was not prone to overreacting to his changes.

Neji made her that way. Their years as a team had installed him as the de facto leader. When he chose not to be openly callous or unkind, Neji had to admit that he was strict, aloof, and officious. He was in charge, and there was little time for friendship or any other soft things that many of his shinobi brethren succumbed to. Tenten settled into the arrangement. She was a harder, more threatening ninja than any of her kunoichi peers. She did not burden the team with weakness or sensitivity.

And then he grew up. He became more insightful. Neji sensed that Tenten did feel tender things; that they were buried, soft-spoken, unacknowledged emotions. He was smart enough to take notice when she interacted with Lee, how she was gentler and more outgoing with him.
She had grown up too. Tenten wanted to go out with boys, mingle with her friends, and generally be social in ways Neji was unable to. He watched from afar, never quite sure how he could learn to do the things that Tenten seemed to do effortlessly. Indeed, Neji recognized the time he became aware of her affection for him. After the first Chunin Exam, he presumed, was when he detected it. That too, of course, was something he could scarcely understand.

Then, at a crossroads, after enduring compromise and change, Neji discovered that it was no good to be apart from her; that there was no use in asking her to suppress feelings now that, truly, he wanted them all to himself and wanted them all of the time. At last he could appreciate those things that he once thought were weak or ineffective. Yet…Tenten dutifully remained cautious. She remained professional and even somewhat skeptical of what had happened. She had not yet let her guard down completely. Neji had to confess that he had not done so either.

It would take more time to learn how to be entirely carefree, he was sure. She must have known that too. It was not a hopeless situation, thankfully. Early morning trysts on the training field had revealed to Neji that, despite her cultivated exterior, Tenten would still walk away trembling after intense kisses.

With a low grunt, Neji rolled onto his back, remembering what it was like when she shuddered and made those pleased little sounds. Moments like that. When her eyes opened and she looked at him; and she looked at everything there was inside of him, good and bad, and adored it. It was a pleasure to think that he did the same when he looked at her, though his powerful eyes could drink her in faster.

Just thinking about it made him hard. He rolled over again, face-down on the mattress, and from the corner of his eye he glimpsed the novel at the edge of the bed. Neji exhaled roughly. He would be lucky if he could ever focus properly again. His brain was constantly trying to re-negotiate how to concentrate on mission details and shinobi business…as well as making sense of the blurred territory of deep affection and sexual desire. He was surprised by how much these qualities blended, in his case.

Like most men his age would say: he would figure it out. Neji steadied his breathing and relaxed; then he reached for the book again. He resumed the tale of The First Shinobi.

In the time after Tian Tian had rediscovered her student, Yuanjia, they discussed the political climate and how quickly time had gone by.

While Tian Tian had been withdrawn from the world, sulking from country to country, Yuanjia had been in frequent contact with her father as well as his own tribe. He explained that many of his relatives had travelled from the Kingdom of Han and settled in the free lands surrounding Ukigaru’s estate. The arrival of these exotic and talented people had been generally well-received. And, naturally, Yuanjia learned many things from them in his teacher’s absence. He was just as skilled a warrior as any veteran ninja in her father’s service, but with a few oddball tricks to use against practitioners of Ninjutsu.

“How is my father?” Tian Tian asked. “I would imagine that he is disappointed with me.”

“Ukigaru-sama only wishes to see you safely home, someday.” Yuanjia told her, “My impression was that he does not believe in smothering your fire. Even if your travels take you far and wide, he wants to see you glow on the horizon.”

“How terribly poetic you are.” She chided, “My mother and sister most likely do not feel that way.”

“They do not.” Yuanjia confirmed, “They are the sheltered, fearful sort.”
“I have no interest in returning.” Tian Tian said flatly.

“Understood. However, if you do not see fit to return to your homestead in the mountains, my people have settled close by in the steppe. I beg that you consider meeting my tribe, and grace the stories of my master with truth, Sensei.”

“Do not call me that.” She objected, “You are grown and taught. That time is behind us.”

“That may be so, but you imparted on me the most valuable lessons. My respect for you is chronic at the least, Tian Tian.”

She only replied, “That’s better.”

The swordsman entertained the journey to the prairie lowlands where the Han people had joined the people of the Land of Earth. Tian Tian was keen to notice how the students of Ninshu had increased noticeably all throughout the lands. Clans of “ninja” were plentiful and, on occasion, combative. She snickered at such posturing, “Surely they known that their internal squabbling is the exact thing the Sage condemned? My father told me that Rikudo Sennin created Ninshu as a way to accept the chakra that is in the world now, as well as how to accept each other.”

“Not every student completely understands what they are taught. Ninshu can be interpreted many ways.” Yuanjia supposed, “They don’t wish for war, but for distinction. Many such ninja admire the Sage’s children and aspire to be like them.”

“Why is that?”

“They were born with his greatness and inherited his power.” He explained, “Juranda has many friends now. His elder brother, Tasaisha, is an esteemed prince of his country. He is so powerful, it is said, that he needs no guards, no friends nor a clan. He relies only on himself.”

“What brazen falsehood.” Tian Tian laughed, “No man truly exists on his own. I’ll bet he pays someone for the food he puts in his mouth…that fat-headed prince.”

“That is certain, but madam, do not speak so profanely of an honorable young lord.”

They continued to speak while crossing grasslands.

“Yuanjia, look carefully for when the profane overlaps with the truth.” She warned, “The lords Hamura and Hagoromo were only men, after all. You can see their descendants everywhere these days, like those white-eyed fools, or the wood-keepers. Ninja are merely people, in the end. Don’t let anyone think otherwise of that man called Tasaisha.”

“Your father knew him, is that right?”

“When he was young, yes, my father met that boy. He was quite the talent.” She added, “And as stuck-up as they come. I have heard that Hagoromo-sama trusted little Juranda with his will instead.”

“Yes. That action has chafed many. Although…I do find it a sensible choice. Just as you have said, Juranda feels quite firmly that all ninja are foremost people, and worthy of friendship.”

“Why all of this attention on them? Have I really missed so much gossip during my sabbatical?”

Yuanjia was surprised, “Do you not know? The Sage of the Six Paths had passed on.”
The kunoichi was taken aback by the news.

“It’s true. Not long before he died, the Sage released the Juubi’s energy from his body and created life. That chakra took the forms of beasts with many tails; just as innocent as children, all named and cared for until the Sage’s life expired.” Yuanjia explained, “The Tailed Beasts are roaming peaceably and learning about the world…but Tasaisha and Juranda can use the chakra inside of them, if they so wish.”

“Well of course, that power was once a part of their father. They should not tamper with it; after all, the Great Sage would not have done such a thing so that fools could interfere with new life.”

“Sometimes princes feel entitled.” Yuanjia observed, “We mustn’t turn a blind eye to their decisions. If they choose poorly, they can tear apart this prosperous world that we enjoy, thanks to Rikudo Sennin.”

Tian Tian wholly agreed. She was pleased that her beliefs corresponded with those of her former student’s. Believing that Yuanjia made a fine companion, she was more than happy to be introduced to the people of his tribe. Though they seemed strange at first; with queues of long black hair on their heads, colorful silk clothes, and their whimsical goods…Tian Tian felt the tribe was authentic and charming.

They were welcomed into the village on the plateau and stayed there for many months. It was there that Tian Tian was shown that Ninshu was not as new a concept as it seemed. An analog of that “way” existed in the Kingdom of Han for over a thousand years, and they called it the way of the Tao. When they spoke of chakra they called it chi. When they spoke of jutsu they called it shoufa. And when they spoke of dumplings, it was a food so delicious that it negated any food that Tian Tian had ever eaten in her homeland.

What she absorbed from everyday life with Yuanjia’s people was that balance was essential. The balance of light and shadow. Male and female. Life and death. They spun stories and doctrine that Ninshu had yet to employ. The great masters of Tao Arts did not make an attempt to teach Tian Tian anything until they saw true appreciation and humbleness in the woman. It was not long before she had adapted the new way of life, becoming a neighbor to Yuanjia in a small cabin, as well as a fellow disciple of the Tao.

She learned that the relatives of Yuanjia, masters of binding spells, elements, and Wushu, referred to themselves by the family name Sa Gou. Emblems and crests they had brought over were emblazoned with a dog surrounded by peonies, the foremost symbols of honor and loyalty in their culture. Tian Tian enjoyed learning about their lives, and, over time, was taught about their techniques as well.

She and Yuanjia trained as equals, participating in tasks as meaningless as drawing water, and sometimes learning the complexity of Yin and Yang techniques that Tao Arts emphasized. As their efforts wore on, Tian Tian had no choice but to accept that Yuanjia was not the clever boy under her mentorship she had once known. He became a scholarly warrior who stood taller than she, gentlemanly-mannered, and swifter with a sword than her on most days. She was no longer too proud to admit it.

While living with the Sa Gou people calmed her restless spirit, Tian Tian’s ambitious, outspoken nature remained intact. She enjoyed teasing Yuanjia during lessons to see if he could keep his focus. She criticized food he cooked even when she found no fault with it. He was quietly abashed by her attention, but every so often retorted with his own quips. Tribesman poked fun at their inseparable friendship, but after nearly a year they asked Yuanjia to send the shinobi woman on her way. She was scaring away potential wives who had interest in him.
“She taught you many things, but there is nothing left you can learn from her.” His auntie advised, “Don’t remain ineligible just for her sake. She burns a bit too bright for the Sa Gou people, and she might scorch us into the ground if she stays.”

Yuanjia stubbornly refused to dismiss Tian Tian, keeping his relatives’ wishes to cast her out a secret. His timidity had made it difficult for him to express the great love he felt for his once-teacher. More than that, he was troubled that she might consider such romantic feelings unacceptable, and if Tian Tian learned of it, that she would excuse herself from his company.

He persisted, ignoring complaints from impatient family, and would watch with great admiration as Tian Tian mastered stepping through shadows. Her skill with bending light and shadow was the talk of her mentors. As she excelled with Yin and Yang abilities, she had noticed a small melancholy that had overcome her companion. Though Yuanjia denied it, Tian Tian had begun to suspect that she had worn out her welcome. Washer-women were not shy about telling her that she was a distraction to a fine young man.

The revelation made her restless. It was quite plain to her how Yuanjia felt, despite his modest manner. Aware that he feared social stigma that villagers were already circulating, Tian Tian thought that her impetuous demeanor could bring about a favorable solution. She had few qualms with telling the young man that she returned his sentiments.

She stepped through shadow one evening to confront Yuanjia behind his home, as he poured water into a trough for livestock. He was startled by her abrupt appearance.

“I was told you would be under the master elder’s tutelage tonight.” He then asked, “Was I required for a lesson as well?”

“No, the elder does not feel well.” She wore a small smile.

“How unfortunate.”

“Will you invite me inside?”

He politely did so, mildly nervous, and was further alarmed by her straightforward remarks.

“I’ve been told I should leave.” Tian Tian announced, “A man your age needs to consider building a future and family. You should not be accompanying a vagabond shinobi.”

“Pay them no mind.”

“For your well-being I must respect what’s being said.” She stated as they sat near a hearth, “Yuanjia, you should give your attention to Sa Gou women and let me travel again. I am better-informed than I was. You needn’t worry.”

“I have no desire to give my attentions to them, most especially when I am forced to.” Yuanjia replied sharply.

“No desire? Then do you mean…that you desire me?” She was a cunning wolf of a woman, coyly smiling.

His countenance wavered at the suggestion, “That wasn’t my meaning, Tian Tian. And surely you would find such a passion to be entirely incorrect.” To prove his point he bowed his head to the thatched-grass floor, submissively, “You who I called teacher…should not be affronted that way.”

“Heaven help us, sit up won’t you!” She snapped, pulling him upright, “How old do I seem? How worthy of respect do I seem, to you? Eh? One who shirks responsibility and fights ruffians on the moorland, homeless and ungrateful. Do not think so highly of me.”

“But I will.” Yuanjia insisted.

“You are much too devoted, it would appear.” Tian Tian observed, “Any true student would be wiser than you and agree with what I said.”

“But I am no longer that.” He acknowledged.

“We are no longer that.” She agreed, “It was only for a short time. And as I am an individual well-acquainted with things incorrect and obscene…you ought not to be surprised that I feel as you do.” She shut her eyes with a soft laugh, “That I love you in a way that maybe I shouldn’t.”

Eyes wide with astonishment, Yuanjia accepted the words in silence. Excitement and uncertainty filled him when the woman reached to touch his face lightly with her fingertips.

“I won’t deny it. I do not want you to leave, no matter how the Sa Gou feel about it. Or what they think…” He took a kneeling step towards Tian Tian, “We can always leave this place. I love you and I want to please you.” He held her hand firmly to the side of his face, “That is what I have been thinking all along.”

Tian Tian pressed a long kiss to his mouth before informing him, “Good. But you don’t know how to please me yet. You are too inexperienced. Han people are so formal and strict with relations, and here in these lands men roll in haystacks long before finding a wife.”

“That isn’t our way.” He admitted in embarrassment.

“Then I’m going to teach you the way.” She decided, “And it will be the last thing I teach you.”

Neji slipped a page marker into the book and shut it. He was a tad disoriented by the passage he had read.

If he recalled some time ago, Lee had warned him about the plot twist. He expressed that it was a curiously honest depiction of a relationship, for ancient times. Lee said he had liked it.

He stood and snapped the light off in his room. Neji settled on his bed again, letting the back of his head fall heavily on a pillow. Just as soon as he had begun reading, the story felt a little too personal.

If merely by coincidence, Tenten had been teaching him all she could in the Marsh Country a short time ago; by extension, so had Lee. Like Yuanjia, Neji was also learning the way of the Tao from an old master.

He thought he could be relating to Yuanjia because he was a more reserved, formal kind of character. ‘Like myself.’ Maybe it was because the young man was simmering with deep emotions that he wasn’t sure how to express, or it was as simple as Tian Tian being so alike to the girl he knew.

Whatever the case, it had tipped the scale of resemblance more than what Neji was comfortable with. It would be better to stop reading for now, even if the protagonists were about to fornicate in a scene too sensational for historical storytelling. Neji did not often read; least of all gratuitous romance.

There were other things to think about to drive the imagery out of his mind. For instance, Tenten had told a ‘white lie’ to Lee and their Sensei the day before. It was something she did every once in a blue moon in order to secure herself extra free time. Neji and Lee tended to forget that Tenten devoted a large portion of her day to weapon-making and sales, and consequently she would remind them that she “wanted a life,” even if it meant robbing time. Business was better than usual, thus decreasing any leisure she could enjoy.

She had told Gai that she would be negotiating with a material vender who could become a supplier for her shop, and maybe even help her open a second location. Before Gai could happily excuse her and wish her luck, she added that Neji would not be available for team training either. He had an obligation with his clan. Gai granted their time away without question. All of the excuses were completely false, of course. Tenten was obtaining an opportunity they could use to get to know each other.

Neji was not entirely sure what they planned to do yet. His mind automatically went to training, missions, and other serious matters. Then he recalled how he had relaxed and spoken with Tenten on the deck of the Fog Skipper, and that seemed more like what she had in mind.

It was also inconvenient that they had to substitute truth with plausible fiction, primarily because they were unprepared to make their relationship known to the world. Without a doubt, it would garner attention from their peers and perhaps even family. A defiant, minuscule voice nested in Neji’s ego protested that even if people did learn about it, that they should have the decency to keep their opinions to themselves. More than anything, if felt good to acknowledged by Tenten. It satisfied him in ways that nothing and no one else could come close to. That was all that should really matter.

At some point, while his thoughts slowly spun, his eyes had drifted shut.

The next morning Neji went about his normal routine, minus his early arrival to their training field.
He had agreed to meet with Tenten for 9:00 at the corner of the Main Avenue and the Jounin Standby station. He dressed and ate, and then took advantage of the vacant inner courtyard of the estate.

Neji did light forms to wake up. After a while a pre-teen boy from the Branch House also stopped in the courtyard. He began Jyukken forms rigidly from the opposite end of the plot.

For one exercise, Neji held a low horse-stance, his arms parallel, straight, and poised in front of him.
He was facing the Branch youngster, whose name he knew was Hirokazu. Neji’s facial expression softened as he realized the boy had stopped and was watching him curiously.

“Good morning, Neji-sama.” The boy greeted quietly, “I did not ask permission if I could share this space with you.”

Neji broke his stance and stood, “There is no need to ask for my permission. This is a shared yard.”

“I understand. It’s just that…I’m in the presence of the clan heir.” Hirokazu pointed out.

“I’m just a person.” Neji chided, thinking of the moral from the book, “Use this space regardless of who is in it.”

The boy nodded shyly.

Neji added, “I appreciate that you’re here. I have seen you at clan meetings each month ever since you were small, but I know that we have never personally spoken.”

Hirokazu brightened, “Yeah. Mom said she didn’t think it was appropriate for us to inconvenience members of the Main Branch, even though you, Hinata-sama, Hanabi-sama, and Fujita-sama never use the Seal on us.”
“We never will.” Neji was aghast at the idea.

“Mom told me that when Hiashi-sama was young he said that he wouldn’t either. But when he grew up he started to…”

“Circumstances are different. I don’t know why my uncle chose to subjugate Branch members. I would sooner die than do such a thing.” Neji vowed, “I cannot speak for my cousins in the Main Branch, but I promise that you can trust me.”

Hirokazu smiled, “Alright.” He took a Gentle Fist stance once more, “Why are your forms so different from mine? Is that a style taught in the Main House?”

“It isn’t.” Neji clarified, “I receive supplemental training from a Wushu expert; my teammate’s grandfather. He is a master of an ancient form of Gentle Fist.”

“You don’t say…” The boy was star-struck, “It seems so…fluid…when you move.”

“Do you want to learn?”

He was startled, “I…I mustn’t impose on a member of the Main Br-!”

Neji raised his chin and interrupted him, “I offered.”

When Hirokazu nodded hesitantly he came to stand beside the young man who, many Branch Members had said, was one of the few champions of mercy in the Hyuga clan.

Neji calmly gave the youngster a demonstration of Baguazhang that morning.

Later, when he was off to meet with Tenten, he thought that his willingness to spend time with Hirokazu might have assured the boy that he indeed was able to access the expertise and courtesy of the Main House. ‘Contrary to what most members of the Branch believe. It isn’t surprising that they are too wary to let their guards down, but they still feel that even I cannot be completely trusted.’ Maybe because of his entitled behavior in the past, or his public brawl with Hikune, the Branch was uncertain of his dependability.

As Neji walked down an alleyway lined with tall wooden fences, a strange, sudden thought struck him like a flying dart.

He had not thought of Hikune in a long time. Since his elder cousin had perished, he had maybe remembered him in passing once or twice. He too had been someone the Branch looked up to, yet had still resorted to activating the Caged Bird Seal. Hikune had been a respectable shinobi and a loving older brother. And though Neji had not believed it at the time, back when Hikune had verbally belittled him, he had in fact been a rival for Tenten’s attention. What was concerning was that this doubt felt more real now. It hurt today far more than it did many months ago.

‘Because she…had the option not to choose me. She was persuaded not to choose me.’ Neji considered. Several feelings welled up that he was utterly unfamiliar with, but they resonated with stings of guilt and heartache.

Some anger was leftover, he realized. Jealous anger. He did not want her to socialize with other men who were interested in her, not then and certainly not ever. However, the real crime was that he never bothered to explain that wish. Neji could not fault Tenten when she had no concept of how he honestly felt; that he had been mentally and emotionally too far removed to voice something so important. Neji came to grips with the reality that he was not the only one who looked at her and saw something incredibly precious.
The anger and regret was not focused directly on her anyway, he noted. But now these prickling feelings made him question what and who she had experienced before him. Nowadays Neji was perfectly willing to kiss her but, oh, what if she had enjoyed that with someone else? With Haku or Hikune? Someone he never learned about? What if she had done more serious things? While he had bumbled away time and energy, frustrated and chasing his own tail, Tenten had gone out and lived a life. Neji, nearly an adult, still hardly understood the most prized social functions that his companions did. How could he ever blame her if those things had happened?

Neji nearly walked head-long into a metal flag pole strung with advertisements. He side-stepped it at the last second. ‘I am thinking too much. I’m close to sabotaging a day that I may actually enjoy…’

No. It would not do to think about Hikune again. Or the possibilities, or anything negative that could shed an unfair light on Tenten today when all he truly desired was her. Good or bad, that was what he was asking for.

The side street let him off about a block away from his destination. He rounded the corner and continued without appearing too suspect to the people crowding the main road. Neji stopped beneath the awning of a stationary shop to wait, leaning against the stucco wall of the building. He was early, as was his nature. He made sure to stay beyond the line of sight from the windows of the Jounin Standby station. Neji had no intention of letting Gai learn about their deception from a passing comment made by a Jounin associate.

He watched villagers go by as he waited. So this is what was happening back in civilization while he trained with his team. Sometimes Neji felt detached from the life-rhythms of Konoha when he was too wrapped up in his own business. Today, he felt as if he had been pulled back down to earth again by a string.

A strange walking-tour of foreigners went by, following a guide from the Akimichi clan. The visitors had white t-shirts on with abstract, red-rectangled flags on the front. They were almost all blonde and pale, wearing sunglasses, and wielding cameras; disrupting the flow of foot traffic.

On second thought, maybe he was not missing much while he was out training every morning.

Neji’s gaze moved to the right, looking down the line of shops on the side of the road. Still a distance away and slightly obscured from view by other villagers, Tenten had appeared. He continued to watch as she drew closer, and almost immediately he was alerted to something quite different.

First, he noticed an utter absence of weapons, tools, and other shinobi paraphernalia on her person. It was nearly sacrilege; however Neji conceded it made more sense for her to be unarmed for a friendly rendezvous. His eyes trolled over her standard white cheongsam trimmed with red, dark pants that stopped at her calves…but those clothes, today unadorned by weapon-holsters, made her seem smaller and delicate as she walked.

Her hair was in its new style, but had obviously been tied by someone else. The braided chignons were too intricate; her fingernails painted an oxblood hue. He wondered who had taken the time to prepare her, and was unexpectedly glad that someone did. These small details were not flamboyant, but he could notice and appreciate them. There was a green jade ring on the middle finger of her left hand. Neji stared and deliberated its significance.

When Tenten came within range of hearing she smiled uncertainly at him, noticing his thinking face. It had close resemblance to a frown. “Hi, Neji.” She greeted as she came to a stop, “You beat me here, like you usually do.”

Neji nodded as her eyes scanned him from top to bottom. Of course he had not tried to doll himself up, and Tenten was glad that he hadn’t. It was the same, sleeveless teal gi he often wore in the summer with black pants. She did immediately notice he had not wrapped his hands or arms in tape.
It was a rare, welcome sight.

He was aware that he was being ogled, although he suspected his simple appearance may not have impressed her much at all. Neji lifted a hand and gestured for them to walk. The tourist crowd was starting to get noisy.

“It’s busier here close to the summer time, especially on the main street and near the stadium.”
Tenten observed, “Maybe I should have picked a quieter place for us to meet up?”

He gave a small shrug, “Its fine. It was geographically the mid-point between us.”

“I’ve already been thinking about a place I want to go.” She announced in a tone that was more excited and playful than normal, “Unless you had something else in mind, is it okay if I take you there?”

“Lead the way.” For now he would remain passive about decision making. Tenten had a better idea of what she was doing than he did.

She carefully chose a route downtown so that they did not stick out like sore thumbs. A short time later they arrived at the Han Ethnic Quarter of the village. Neji was neither surprised nor off-put by the location, and he followed Tenten around as she flitted about the not-so-densely packed storefronts.

“Have you been here before?” Tenten asked curiously.

“I’ve been here with Lee a few times.”

She grinned, “Did he speak Hanwen?”

“Consistently. He’s very good.” Neji looked at her critically, “Can’t you speak it?”

“I’m awful.” Tenten insisted, glancing over a produce stand, “Lee tries to engage me in conversation, but I’m not as good as I used to be.”

“Who taught you?”

“My parents.” She replied simply, turning over a large ginger root in her hands. She decided she wanted it and picked up a woven basket beside the stand, dropping the ginger into it as she continued to shop.

Neji had an indistinct memory of when Tenten described her parents to him in the Marsh Country, but it did not paint much of a picture. While she added thin, dangerous-looking chilis to her basket Tenten said, “I’ll tell you more about them…some other time. They’re not easy to talk about.”

He nodded again and then began to pay attention to what she was doing, “This is where you get food?”

“Most of the time. They have all of the things I’m used to eating.”

“Did you eat this morning before you found me?”

“No, I thought it’d be more fun to go out to eat. All of this is for later.” She explained.

When Neji gave her a pressing I-don’t-get-it look Tenten clarified, “I’ll cook this afternoon.”
Gawking, he was stupidly and wonderfully shocked. She felt she was within her rights to laugh at his reaction.

“I’ll let you decide if you want to eat anything I make. It’s probably different from the fare the Hyuga clan eats.” Tenten raised her eyebrows as another question occurred to her, “Hey, don’t you have all of your food served to you, Neji?”

“Yes.” He admitted stiffly.

“Have you been taught how to prepare or cook anything?”

“I can boil water.”

“Then I guess you can’t make me any meals.” She teased.

“I can if I’m taught.” He protested.

Tenten reached for a bottle of five-spice powder, intrigued, “If you want that to be a part of your quest for knowledge, then I don’t mind showing you a thing or two.”

Neji thanked her and then glimpsed over the top of her head, noticing a shop keeper who was analyzing the two of them. Neji steered Tenten along until she took a hard right towards a meat vendor. She seemed completely unaware that a host of Han expats were now watching them instead of minding their own business.

Tenten shuffled around a head of cabbage, eggplant, and black soybeans in the basket, hoping to make room for a package of chicken feet. Neji gave her an incredulous look after she had chosen it.

“It’s not for us.” She assured him, “Wong Leung loves these. He has an obsession with my mom’s recipe.”

“Ah.” He was relieved.

“And they’re not so bad, you know.” She smiled impishly, “I eat them from time to time.”

Neji privately thought of how the mouth he wanted to kiss, occasionally, dined on the feet of poultry. It brought about a fresh perspective. Tenten really was worldlier than he, and Neji had yet to find out just how much more.

She added a whole duck to her basket along with oddities in jars, and then paid for her purchases. The cashier told them to have a nice day when he finished sorting the goods in a smiley-faced plastic bag.

It felt like wandering through another world as Tenten showed him around. There was a verdant, unusual garden fenced-in by chicken wire. Supposedly, Tenten said, it was used to grow the most uncommon vegetables people liked in the ethnic quarter. There was a hat store, a book store that sold absolutely nothing he could read, a store devoted only to selling sets of chopsticks, a shop for lacquered furniture, and then a store full of things Sato might like: like cameras and skateboards.

When they were too hungry to keep talking and wandering, they exited the lower district back into the heart of the Leaf Village. Tenten deliberated on where to eat out.

“You like herring.” Tenten stated brightly, “Let’s have herring soba.”

“Only if you want to.” Neji said, wondering how she knew what his favorite food was. After a moment, he reckoned that he should never again be taken aback by the things Tenten had noticed about him.

If Naruto had been around, he definitely would have scolded them for giving their business to a noodle shop other than Ichiraku Ramen. Tenten merely chose the eatery because it was a block away, and she was a bigger fan of convenience than brand loyalty. The bar was empty and so they took two seats side-by-side, giving their orders to the chef.

“This is kind of nice.” Tenten decided aloud, “I like not having to throw things at you in the morning.”

“Likewise.”

“Was there anything you wanted to do today?” She asked.

“Nothing in particular. I’m not very imaginative.” Neji took a sip from a tea cup, “And I like that you are.”

Tenten blinked twice, and then a wide, pink-lipped smile spread on her face. Neji regarded her and somehow, though he could not fathom how he did it, he absorbed her feelings just from that expression.

He reciprocated with a small smile and then turned his head away quickly; baffled by the weird things he was doing. Tenten was kind enough to banish awkwardness by resuming the conversation. The chef set bowls and utensils in front of them and they thanked him for the food.

They ate and talked, unaware that they were being scrutinized from across the street.

“So…” Ino whispered, “Tell me how this happened again? How we’re seeing this?”

Shoulder-to-shoulder with the blonde girl, hiding behind a stack of wooden crates near an alleyway, Hinata shed some light on the situation.

“This morning after I ate breakfast, I was ready to find Shino-kun and Sato-kun…but I noticed that Neji-niisan was still home.” She explained, “He was training with a member of the Branch family, a nice boy name Hirokazu. After onii-san had left the compound, I wondered why he was not early to meet with his team like always…”

“You followed him?” Sakura asked quietly from the opposite side, “That’s not very like you, Hinata-chan.”

“I was curious. I noticed how happy Neji-niisan has been lately, so I suspected something…had happened.” Hinata admitted softly, “I watched him cross town and then he stopped in front of the stationary shop for a time. I nearly left without realizing that he was waiting…for onee-san…” She covered her mouth and squeezed her eyes shut, muffling squeals of joy.

“The other day when Chouji and I were talking to Tenten, Neji came by and interrupted us. I had a feeling something was up.” Ino agreed.

“Did you see where they went before this?” Sakura continued, “I mean…I can hardly believe my eyes. Maybe it’s some kind of elaborate prank?”

Hinata shook her head, “It isn’t. They walked downtown together and that’s when I hurried to find you both.”
“And by the time we got here, the two of them are cozy eating noodles for lunch, talking up a storm. It definitely isn’t their typical routine.” Ino live-reported what she was observing, “Whoa! He just, like, smiled at her! A real-person smile!”

“She did it first.” Sakura noted in delight, “Ugh! We’ll get diabetes if we keep watching this.”

Hinata tapped her friends’ shoulders as she stood between them, ducking down lower behind their cover. Ino and Sakura followed suit as Hinata told them, “I believe…onii-san just used his Byakugan.”

He did? Ino mouthed.

Hinata nodded solemnly.

“Then he knows we’re over here.” Sakura peeked over a box, “A-aaand…now he’s telling Tenten right this moment.” She quickly ducked down again when, from across the road, Tenten’s head snapped around on high-alert for spectators.

In the moments before the spying trio could make an escape via the alley, the pile of boxes they were hidden behind was burst apart by an inorganic gust of wind. They shrieked in terror, retreating briefly, and Hinata was the first to grasp that her cousin had only spooked them with his Wind Affinity. When they looked back across the street, notes of money had been left on the counter beside half-empty bowls.

The seats were vacant.

---

Many miles away in the Toad Valley, Naruto had spent a few days reeling from the story Jiraiya told him. He had spikes and dips in productivity when he tried to train; at times his laser-point focus helped him draw Natural Energy in, and sometimes he was a hopeless mess, lacking the energy to even sit upright or go about the day.

That morning, Naruto was experiencing an uninspired slump. He had basked in the sunshine out on a wide lawn in the hope it would make him feel better, but his thoughts tinkered obsessively with the possibility of his parentage. He would feel sickened and happily thrilled all at once.

Jiraiya had yet to confirm anything, Naruto noted in annoyance. He had sulked and asked Fukasaku and Shima to supervise Naruto’s training near the Toad Oil pool. At meals or other such activities, when Jiraiya would open his mouth as if to confess it all to his godchild, he quickly clammed up. There had been multiple opportunities for him to speak truthfully, and each time Jiraiya had hesitated. Though Naruto found it incredibly hard to be patient, he chose not to pressure his mentor into providing a story he could barely articulate.

When the grassy lawn no longer felt relaxing, Naruto stood and set out to find distractions. He easily spied Gamabunta near the shore of a large lake, seated across from his children: Gamakichi and Gamatatsu. The young toads were growing rapidly, and were also learning how to play cards from Gamabunta.

Naruto greeted them with less enthusiasm than usual, but they still asked him to join them. He scaled Gamabunta’s mighty back and then settled on top of the Toad Boss’ head.

“How is Sage Training going, boy?” The giant toad asked, “You’re starting to look worn-out.”

“I’m getting there. It’s Ero-sensei who has me stressed.”
“Really?” Gamabunta replied, and after winning a hand began gathering the house-sized playing cards to be shuffled.

“Fukasaku-sama says that you two get super emotional.” Gamakichi pointed out.

“Well, that’s because he keeps bringing up my…” Naruto trailed off and then amended, “Minato.”

“Oh.” Gamabunta made a sound of understanding, “I see; we all miss that boy, you know. He was the Hokage when I saw him last. I gave him some help when the Kyuubi was ransacking the Leaf Village.”

“Say…Chief Toad…” He was sprawled on the behemoth’s head, relaxing, “Do you remember seeing me that night?”

“I remember. You were in Minato’s arms for a little while.” Gamabunta amended, “But I didn’t know who you were until Jiraiya later told me.”

“Yeah.” Naruto agreed, “I didn’t know who I was until Ero-sensei told me either.”

“Ah, so that’s what this is about.” The boss toad acknowledged. He drew out his trusty pipe and lit it, “Jiraiya is a storyteller, but I’ve come to learn there are some tales he’s too afraid to share.”

Gamakichi and Gamatatsu clamored for their father to deal the next round of cards.

When smoke began to waft up and condense around Gamabunta’s head, Naruto took to a coughing fit. He slid down the toad’s back to get some fresh air, reached the ground, and then bent double to inhale deeply. Gamabunta’s yellow eye rolled down to look at him, “Naruto, go to Jiraiya now and have a talk with him. Make him tell you exactly what you need to know, with no substitutions or delays.” The toad asserted, “Or I will bring you before the Great Toad Elder so you can learn about your past and future all at once.”

Gamakichi was startled, “Wha-? Dad, didn’t you say that no one is supposed to disturb the Great Elder without being summoned first?”

“That’s the rule, but if we bring Naruto there it will at least give the Great Elder something to do, for a change.” Gamabunta puffed smoke from his nostrils, “And a proactive threat is the kind of thing that always gets Jiraiya to cooperate. I know him.”

“Thanks, Chief Toad.” Naruto expressed his gratitude before setting out in the direction of smaller toad residences.

When he approached Fukasaku’s house, Naruto spotted his teacher on the porch with a stack of books at his side. ‘I guess this time I’ll probably get my answer.’ Naruto supposed, ‘Gamabunta knows how to deal with Ero-sensei.’ He came to a stop in front of Jiraiya and said nothing, trying to resist the moody frown creeping onto his face.

Jiraiya looked up and regarded his student, “Uh. You okay, kid?”

With a soft sigh, Naruto took a seat beside the man, “Not exactly. Chief Toad sent me over here.”

“Oh, did he?”

“He told me to tell you that you need to explain it all to me now.” The young man announced, “Or else he said he’d bring me to the Great Toad Elder to have my questions answered.”
“Whoa now, that’s unnecessary.” Jiraiya waved a hand, “I already planned to tell you,” He patted the pile of books beside him, “I just wanted to get my facts straight. I didn’t want to skip over details that might matter.”

“Details?” Naruto quirked an eyebrow, “How much is there to say?”

“I don’t want to give you a one-liner and think that it’ll suffice. Like I’ve told you before, you need context.” The man elaborated, “But you caught me at a good time; I think I’ve worked out just how to put it…”

Naruto folded his legs as he sat, “Then I’m listening.”

“Let’s see. Try to use your imagination for this, kid. Back when Leaf was winding down from the Third Shinobi war, but still not quite in peacetime…Sarutobi-sensei started bitching a lot about arthritis, his hips, this and that…” Jiraiya recalled, “He was real subtle about how he wanted to look for a successor. When we talked about it, he immediately counted me out. I wasn’t reliable. Then he went into his existentially conflicted diatribe of why Orochimaru had not inherited the Will of Fire, and was for all intents and purposes a psychopath…the Sandaime did not want to consider us. Period. I totally understood.”

Naruto nodded in agreement, “It was a great call.”

“He was looking towards a younger, more hardworking group.” Jiraiya went on, “While he had a few people in mind, he asked Takaharu first. He was an ANBU captain at the time and a good friend to the Sandaime. That idea didn’t fly. My sensei told me that Takaharu quickly declined, saying that while he loved the village and he would always protect it, it probably wasn’t the best idea to make him a leader. He had plenty of enemies, and he and his wife were expecting a baby at the time.”

Naruto had a brief moment to imagine what could have been if Tenten’s father had become Hokage. ‘That would’ve been cool. But sheesh…those are the shoes I’m in, aren’t they? It feels so unreal.’

“Sarutobi-sensei’s next and most fitting choice was Minato. He was just as skilled of a shinobi, and thankfully, less shy than Takaharu was.” The man held his chin and smiled, “Minato was in a good state of mind to accept the position. He and Kushina had just gotten married, and he was feeling pretty confident with his abilities.” Jiraiya glanced sidelong at Naruto, “But he still asked me to stop by, now and again. It made him feel better to know that I was there, and that I would be honest with him when I thought he was going off the tracks.”

Jiraiya lifted a thin novel up and handed it to his student, “Here, Naruto. Take a look at this.”

He accepted the old hardcover and inspected it. ‘The Tale of the Utterly Gutsy Shinobi.’ Naruto frowned to himself and then asked, “What’s with the title?”

“It was my first published work, okay? Cut me some slack. This was before I realized my calling was for smut.” Jiraiya explained quickly, “I want you to know about it because Minato said it was his favorite book.”

Naruto’s eyebrows jumped, “He said that? He must have read a lot in his lifetime, so…I doubt it.”

“Shut up and look at it.”

The young man made a gruffling sound before turning to the title page. The formatting and font were simple, unlike the flashy, provocative stories Jiraiya worked on nowadays. Naruto settled into the third-person narrative, propping up his chin with his hand. He relaxed as he gradually gave his attention over to the story, and Jiraiya watched his face without a word

Time passed as he read in silence, and Naruto kept his surprise contained as he was introduced to the protagonist of the book. ‘His name is…Naruto.’ He rubbed his temple as he paused to think, ‘Ero-sensei named a character “Naruto” years ago, in his debut book…’ He concluded a scene in which the main character defeated an opponent in a one-on-one duel with cunning and a Shadow Clone.

He folded the book shut over his thumb, feeling anxious, ‘Is this…about me? It could be a coincidence. The guy in this book seems smarter and more put-together…’

While Naruto stewed over the possibility, Jiraiya slipped the book from his hand and slapped him over the head with it.

“Don’t think so hard!” The man barked, “Minato loved this character. He told Kushina all about it and convinced her that it was a good name for you, before you were born.” Jiraiya smiled warmly, “They were so excited that they were going to become parents, and I was honored that they thought of me. They asked me to look after you, if anything ever happened.”

Naruto exchanged a long stare with his mentor, unable to speak, until finally a film of tears threatened his eyes. Jiraiya laughed softly, feeling relief as he finally shared an integral bit of history. He tapped Naruto’s head with the novel again before setting it aside.

“I kind of…named you.” Jiraiya went on, “I didn’t mean to. I had no idea what to call the hero of my book, so I just thought up that name when I was eating ramen one afternoon. Minato didn’t care, though. He insisted on picking that name. As for the book, about the character’s life and accomplishments, all of that came from my heart. That’s a longer story and we’ll talk about it with the Great Toad Elder.”

“So they…” His mouth felt dry. Naruto wetted his lips to speak, “They were my mom and dad.”

“Absolutely. And they were cool.”

“So I look a lot like Dad did?”

“You’re about, oh I don’t know, kind of an even mix of the two? Fifty-fifty. Sixty-forty? In favor of Minato, I guess. If you had your mom’s red hair you’d look like a typical Uzumaki.” Jiraiya squinted his eyes and imagined it, “You’re just you, kid.”

“Yeah.” Naruto shut his eyes. His mouth bobbed between a smile and a heartbroken grimace, trying to accept that the truth, while tragic, had some beauty to it. Knowing where he came from made him feel more grounded and substantial as a person.

“Now, I recall how you were trying to get me explain last time; about what went wrong the night you were born…” Jiraiya continued, “But the problem is I don’t know exactly what happened. The Sandaime and I did not have many clues to work with, and no one who witnessed the events is alive today.”

Naruto cleared his throat, calming down slightly, “Er-hem…you said that the Fox escaped, for one thing. How would you explain that?”

“Ah, well it’s a problem you, fortunately, won’t have to deal with in your lifetime. A jinchuriki’s seal that restraints a Tailed Beast will deteriorate when a woman-host goes into a labor. There’s a very technical explanation of it authored by Uzumaki Mito, and her treatise was passed down for posterity so other jinchuriki would know what to expect. Anyway, Sarutobi-sensei told me that Minato was familiar with the danger and had studied up on it. He shouldn’t have had any problem with keeping that seal in check while your mom was trying to give birth. The Sandaime’s wife, Biwako, was also there to keep everything under control. As was her disciple…”

Jiraiya sighed heavily and rubbed his neck, “My sensei told me that ANBU guards had been found murdered nearby. Biwako and Taji were killed as well. It had occurred before the Kyuubi was freed. With all of those things considered, he and I agreed that someone had interfered that night, hoping to take advantage of Kushina while she was weakened.”

Naruto was wide-eyed, “But they never caught anyone?”

“No, they never did catch anyone, but officials did try to blame someone.” Jiraiya recounted, “The Uchiha clan was accused of releasing the Fox in an effort to revolt against the Leaf Village. You see, there were some political controversies that kept the Uchiha clan segregated from everyone else. I won’t get into that right now. And don’t think I didn’t research and interview damn near every last one of them to catch even a whiff of foul-play. But Naruto, I swear, they just didn’t seem to be involved.”

“Why would they want to blame the Uchiha?” Naruto asked.

“The Sharingan, when strong enough, can control the Nine-Tailed Fox.” Jiraiya elaborated, “And I’d bet all of my published-work earnings that it can control other Bijuu too, when given the chance.” He made a gesture towards the sky, “In ancient times, Sages that possessed doujutsu were powerful enough to do just that. The ancestor-trait of the Sharingan is the Rinnegan, the ability that the Sage of the Six Paths had. However, that power no longer exists in modern times…” He trailed off.

“What if Itachi did it?” The boy muttered suspiciously.

“Heck no. He was…what? Maybe ten years old at the time, and, I have it on sworn record that Itachi was babysitting his younger brother that night.” Jiraiya shot the idea down, “It was someone old enough to coordinate; to know who and when to strike. The facts point to someone who had the Sharingan, probably, but it wasn’t a member of the Uchiha clan. You follow me?”

“How is that even possible?”

“Kakashi has the Sharingan.” Jiraiya gave an example, “That’s because Obito gave it to him. Do you understand? I’m trying to keep the door of possibility open, for this case.”

“I get it.” Naruto nodded solemnly.

“I guess you could say…Obito and I are hoping that we’ll find a clear lead. That we can find out the truth about who attacked Minato and Kushina.” Jiraiya added darkly, “And neither of us would be shocked if the Akatsuki had something to do with it. Of course, it’d be ideal to find the one responsible…and tear that guy open from the asshole-up.”

“It’s been a while.” Naruto pointed out keenly, “If someone has avoided you for this long…and they could ambush my parents and everyone else that night…” His eyes locked with Jiraiya’s, “Do you think that you’d want to face someone like that? That’s no pushover.”

“Eh…well, no. That doesn’t sound like a pushover, you’re right.” The man groaned softly, “Sounds like I’d be on the losing-end of a fight if I picked it with the shinobi who could take down Black Ops sentries, the Fourth Hokage, the Jinchuriki for the Nine-Tails, and then leave everything in tatters.”

“Exactly.” Naruto agreed, “That’s why you’re gonna leave it to me.”

“Pfft!” Jiraiya laughed, “Look, Naruto, I know how strong you are. But this isn’t an enemy you could deal with on your own either. Just by looking at the facts, we have to know better than that.”

The young man stared out over the yard, brooding, “It’s not easy to do.”

“Easy or not: play it cool. If you get swept up by the desire for revenge, you and Sasuke can be neighbors in psychoville when all is said and done.” He added, “You’d never get anywhere by taking that route.”

Naruto refrained from speaking after that, and Jiraiya’s hand fell heavily on his shoulder, holding tight.

“We’ll get justice for them, Naruto, and you can count on that. We’re going to do this the practical way, and we’ll know our enemy before we take action. Please don’t assume I’ve been alright with letting this sit. I wasn’t alright with it. I am still not alright with it.” Jiraiya explained, “I was a depressed alcoholic for years after that, at a time when you could have used a caretaker. I was the most heartbroken fuck-up there ever was, and I felt like I could never get anything to change. Like I’d never improve anything again.” He brightened, “Now look at me: I’m training up a new crop of Kages. I’m a well-known author and I’m aging gracefully!”

An incredulous laugh escaped Naruto, “Heh heh! They’ll put you on a magazine cover sooner or later, right? Pft…”

“It’s gotta be soon. I am so goddamn amazing.” Jiraiya put his hands on his knees, excited, “There is a lot I can do. Have some faith in me, this time, and I promise I’m going to get you right where you need to be.”

“Sheesh, I never doubted that, Ero-sensei.” Naruto assured him, “Even when you were a disgusting schlub.”

“Thanks. I hope Gaara and Haku feel that way too.”

“I’m sure they do.”

They sat without speaking, serenely smiling, happy to be in each other’s company on a day in late spring. Naruto gave a curious look to his teacher after a while, “Ero-sensei?”

“Yeah?”

“Do people know?” He asked, “Who I am? Do you think…I mean…I honestly feel uncomfortable about who my parents are. Well, Mom’s fine. Dad…”

“Relax. Minato was Hokage, so what? Some people are accountants. No matter what they do for a living it should not affect the fact that your father is your father. Before anything else, he was just a half of you. A human being. He was really nice and intelligent. He was the type who’d throw on an apron and bake you a special birthday cake every year, kid. You know why? Because that’s the kind of thing that would make him happy. His job was only a job.”

“But I…I feel like I’m…” Naruto gestured with his hands as he identified a word, “I’m not representative of the people who made me. They were awesome. I’m just a-”

Jiraiya clapped a hand over his mouth, “Quit talking like that. Take it from someone who can actually testify: you are. You’re just like them, Naruto. Feeling inadequate? It’s okay; you’ll get over it.” He added, “I don’t know who in the Leaf Village is actually aware; save for a few people like Tsunade and Kakashi. Namba might know, but he’s never around.”
“Do you think it’s alright if I tell Gaara-kun and Haku-kun?”

“Sure it is. They’re your friends and they’ll be thrilled about it.” Jiraiya stood from his seat on the porch and stretched, “But…you’re kind of the status-quo, now. Gaara never cared or maybe even hated that his dad was a Kage. He may not give much of a shit, in your case. Not to fret, though, Haku will happily congratulate you.”

“Yeah, maybe.”

Jiraiya looked down at him and extended an arm. Naruto reached for his hand and was pulled to his feet, and then wrapped in heartfelt hug. It was a parent-like hug. The young man breathed out and felt at ease after many days of distress.

“There you go.” Jiraiya smiled and released him, “You’ve got your identity all sorted out, and please, don’t dwell on it, Naruto. It’s time to get your butt back to the Toad Oil Pool.”

“Fine! I’ll need a spotter, though.” Naruto set out across the lawn briskly.

Jiraiya’s limbs made creaking sounds as he tried to keep up, “Yep, I know. I’m movin’…”

The following morning in Nanakusa, Haku had been asked to assist around the tea shop. Travelers were headed northwest towards the Fire Country to spectate the Chunin Exam, and many had chosen to take a stopover in the small town. Hiroshi was up to his neck in customers at his café, and had kindly requested that Migawari postpone Haku’s medical tutoring for later.

“For you, Hiroshi, sure.” The retired medic-nin allowed it, “You’re a good soul, feeding all of these lousy tourists!” He turned to Ranmaru at his side, “Come on, Shorty. We’re going to take a closer look at soft tissue injuries today.”

After they had left, Haku had thought to himself how it might have been better not to be conscripted for tea shop work. His head was spinning as he tried to serve the noisy folk crowding tables. In the kitchen, Haku was about to ask Hiroshi why he had not considered hiring at least a temp-employee when he devised a simple solution. ‘If there’s no time to hire someone new, I can have Kage Bunshin transform to make it seem like we’re better-staffed.’

He sent several disguised shadow clones out into the dining room, all featuring different appearances. Thankfully, it helped streamline orders, and Hiroshi was quietly grateful his young companion was clever under pressure.

When the morning rush calmed down, Tomo dropped by with her children, “Good morning!” She arranged the youngsters politely at a table as she greeted the tea shop owner, “Hiroshi-san, I only need about an hour. Do you mind watching the kids while I go to speak to a new patron? This is a big-time pottery company that could be a career jump!”

“Certainly, do what you need to do!” He ushered her out the door, “Do they need breakfast?”

“Yes, if you don’t mind. Let me pay you when I get back!” She hurried off.

No sooner had she walked out the door, the children began to fuss. Sachirame and Pua had appeared at the table, sharing a seat, also sniffing around for food. Hiroshi sighed softly to himself before calmly assuring anxious Katsu, the youngest, that his mother wouldn’t be gone for long. A shadow clone came by and set food out for the children. It then plucked up the two mischievous, white rabbits and brought them into the back room.
After eating, the three adopted siblings began to fidget with boredom. A few more travelers filed into the tea shop for morning meals, and as Haku exited the kitchen to see how he could help, he found Hiroshi sweeping broken pieces of porcelain from a teapot that had shattered.

“Sorry.” Hotaru was shame-faced, “Nagisa pushed me and then it fell over.”

“It’s alright.” Hiroshi picked up the last specks of ceramic, “Do you kids want to stretch your legs outside for a while, until your mother returns?” He gave a sidelong look to Haku, begging: Please take them somewhere.

Knowing the shadow clones would be enough help in the shop; Haku quickly wrangled up the antsy children and led them outside.

“It’s busy. Hiroshi-san just needs some time to serve customers.” Haku explained to them, “So, what would you like to do in the meantime?”

“Don’t know.” Katsu replied dimly.

“Everyone’s been so busy today that there’s no time for us.” Nagisa, the eldest, noted sadly, “I know mom needs to work, and Hiroshi-san too…but even you’ve been gone a lot more these days, Haku-kun.”

“That is true. And believe me; most of what I’m doing is not enjoyable.” Haku admitted.

Hotaru proposed that they observe the stream from the footbridge in the forest. Katsu seconded the notion, “Maybe the frogs are out so we can catch ‘em!"

A few steps beyond the town they had entered the majestic woodland, where many trees were still flowering vibrantly. Pua had apparently escaped the tea shop’s kitchen through a backdoor and caught up with them, plodding innocently beside Haku as they walked. The children ran ahead when the wooden bridge came into a view. They peered over the rail, alert for any kind of wildlife they could chase after.

The clear water trickled past stones and pond-grass. Katsu ticked off a list of animals he wanted to see, but his siblings concluded nothing was around, not even a single fish. Disappointed, the small boy scooped Pua into his arms and stroked her ears. He muttered about “his frogs.”

“They may yet be tadpoles. We should wait a few more days.” Haku suggested.

“But that means there’s nothing to do today...” Hotaru mumbled, hanging lethargically from the bridge’s handrail.

Nagisa continued up the path a bit further and stopped to pay her respects at a small shrine. Her brother groaned in boredom as they paced the footbridge.

Haku took a moment to consider how difficult it was to be a kid with nothing to do. At that age, he had never run out of things to keep him occupied. He had Naruto and Gaara and all of their friends. The Academy and the Leaf Village had been a vast playground.

Here in Nanakusa things were slow, discreet, and isolated. Children did not have as much to look forward to in a retirement haven.

Haku made no comments as he stood at the center of the bridge, smiling to himself. He watched Katsu and his older brother sit with the rabbit between them.
“Maybe we can sneak into something…”

“Oh! Let’s have ice cream. The old lady will give it to us.”

“Mom said it’s too early. She’ll punish us if we try that again.”

“She won’t know. Nagisa won’t say anything.”

“Haku-kun will tell her.” Hotaru surmised blandly, “He doesn’t break rules.”

“Oh yeah.” Katsu furrowed his brow and patted Pua. He then touched his hand to the top of his head, surprised, “It’s cold.”

“No duh ice cream is cold, Katsu.”

“No. My hair…” The boy mussed the top of his head and beheld as snowflakes fluttered free.

“Whoa!” Hotaru jumped up, glancing around at the mysterious snowfall that had begun. He turned in a circle, “This doesn’t happen in spring…” He hoisted Katsu to his feet.

Haku pretended as if he hadn’t noticed the phenomenon, watching from the corner of his eye as the boys regrouped with their older sister, trying to make heads or tails of the weather. After a while, though, enough snow had accumulated for a wild play-fight. The children stopped questioning their good fortune and began chasing each other, hurling snowballs.

The morning progressed and Haku’s technique had allowed a sizable snow drift to build up in the forest, making sure it did not extend past the bridge into town, ‘The older residents would not appreciate it…’ By then the children had attempted to construct a figure out of snow, but the torso slid off and fell apart on the ground. Haku assisted them with fortifying it.

Nagisa had been wondering about their strange luck and eventually asked their babysitter, “Haku-kun…is this a kind of ninja technique?”

He raised his eyebrows, “The…snowman?”

“No. You made it snow.” She corrected.

“Oh, well…I did.” He scratched his cheek, “I wanted you all to enjoy yourselves.”

Nagisa smiled as she fitted a patch of moss on the snowman’s head like a hairpiece, “Thanks. Hotaru and Katsu would have complained all day, otherwise.”

Haku took a step back to frame the creation with his thumb and index finger, advising the boys on where to fit twigs for the arms to look right. As Katsu and Hotaru followed directions, a steel dart shot through the back of the snow sculpture and straight into Haku’s thigh.

His eyes moved up towards looming branches as he quickly removed the knife, speaking calmly to the confused children, “You need to go back to the tea shop, now.”

Nagisa was concerned about his bloodied leg, “Haku-kun, did something-?”

He pushed her and her brothers down to the ground when several more knives were thrown at them. Haku raised a dome of ice to deflect a supplemental volley of darts that came from the rear, some interspersed with senbon needles. Judging from the directions the attacks came from, and the variety of projectiles used, Haku concluded he was being targeted by more than one shinobi.
The children squealed in wonder and fright, seeing their reflections in the planes of ice that shielded them. Though it consumed a costly amount of chakra, Haku derived two Ice Clones from their shelter and sent them out to contest the assailants in the forest. He then parted the dome and shepherded the children out, ‘I have no idea what kind of enemy this is, yet…’ He thought, hurrying after the youngsters towards Nanakusa, ‘And that dart was poisoned.’ He noticed a stinging pain creeping upwards that made it difficult to move.

He had no weapons at the moment. Haku resorted to blocking the rain of weaponry with ice shields, making sure his charges were properly defended, ‘These ninja have no qualms with hurting children!’ It disgusted him. At the border of the town he witnessed two shinobi, still yards away, drop from the tree tops.

One was wrestling with an Ice Clone, and the bunshin shifted its shape into a spiked mass of ice, urchin-like, and impaled the Hunter-Nin before he could react. The second ninja was approaching fast, the swirl of a white and red mask tipping Haku off that these were certainly Black Ops ninja of Kirigakure.

Haku wanted to thank heaven above that the children were fleet of foot. The brothers had ducked into the long rows of a covered produce stand, however Nagisa had continued racing out in the open down the street. The Mist-hunter threw a poisoned dart at her which sunk cleanly into her shoulder. The girl dropped with a shriek. Haku had enough speed to pick her up and roll to the side when their assailant followed up with another barrage of darts.

Haku had rolled beneath a picnic bench, speaking quickly, “Nagisa, go around the block and tell Migawari-san you’re poisoned. He can heal you right away.”

“Poisoned?” She squealed, “The thing in my shoulder!? What about your leg?”

“I can take care of myself. Hurry.” Haku lightly tossed her into a pile of burlap sacks filled with buckwheat.

Not a moment later, the Hunter-Nin bore down on the picnic table with a palm strike and snapped it in half. On his back, Haku lashed out with a kick that knocked the tanto from his enemy’s hand, rolling to his feet as he did so. Their melee exchange was witnessed by residents nearby who scurried to the edges of the street to safety.

One of Haku’s comet-punches sailed through the Hunter-Nin who seemed to have vaporized into mist. Before he could counter the strange jutsu, Haku felt a small blade stick deeply into his back between two ribs. The enemy had repositioned behind him. Haku braced himself as he tried to block, and was ruthlessly pummeled in the side of the head by a ninja who, he conceded, was stronger and faster than he. Hunter-Nin were professionally brutal.

Haku managed to pull the dagger from his back before a right-hook to the face knocked him to the ground. He lost his grip on the knife and it skidded across the stones on the street. Adrenalin and instinct built up in him, desperate for survival, and he had nearly enough chakra to manifest a carousel of ice pillars before the Hunter-Nin pounced. The masked ninja sat on his chest to flatten him and, like a viper, seized both of Haku’s hands in his own. He pinched the space below the middle finger of each hand, holding tight, and eliminated the possibility of using jutsu.

“Listen up.” The Hunter-Nin spoke in a gravelly voice, “I don’t want to waste time on a goat like you. Where is Momochi Zabuza?”

With a bloodied lip, Haku replied pleasantly, “Who?”
He was promptly head-butted for the dissatisfactory answer.

“You were sighted twice in Moji by our Intel officer. You’re an unknown. Captain assumes you’re an apprentice to be trained as a Swordsman. I’ll tell you one thing: quit while you’re ahead. I don’t need to kill you. I’ve got an antidote and I’ll hand it over as soon as you tell me what I need to know.” The masked shinobi offered.

Haku felt his limbs getting stiff from the poison. He scowled up at the Mist ninja, “I don’t know how inclined I am to speak when I saw that you intentionally poisoned that little girl.”

“All the more reason you get the antidote off of me, right?”

“The information you seek is not worth an innocent life!”

A shadow fell across the pair as a third Hunter-Nin stopped beside them, peeved, “He’s not quacking? He impaled Number Five, back there. Five will be alright. He’s taking some time to recover.”

“Huh…I hurt a kid.” The Hunter-Nin reported, “Captain, could you give the antidote to her? She’s probably down the street.”

“That was your error, Number Three.” The captain answered, “We focus on the task at hand.”

While the Hunter-Nin called Three tried to negotiate with his squadron leader, something miraculous happened. The thoughts of one of Haku’s dissolved Kage Bunshin in the tea shop reached him. He had witnessed Hotaru and Katsu screaming at the top of their lungs to Hiroshi, alerting the shop owner and the working clones to the peril. In response, two shadow clones were now en-route to their originator’s location, while a third had gone to warn Zabuza.

Haku kept calm as blood flowed in a steady stream from a cut above his eye. The injury to his back was severe, and he had doubts that he would be able to resist Hunter-grade poison for much longer.

A voice sounded from a storefront to their right, “Hey! I think you’ve got the wrong guy!” The villager spoke up bravely, “He just works in a tea shop! He’s Hiroshi’s kid.”

Without turning his head to look, the Hunter Captain pointed a single finger at the man, “Stay out of this. Our target is not mistaken.”

“He’s a tea boy!” The man insisted finally before retreating into his store.

Across the street was the fish market, and a tank of fresh-catch was blown apart when a Water jutsu was used. One of Haku’s shadow clones had directed the glass-flecked attack at the Hunter-Nin on the street. They evaded it handily, but Haku was able to race away and take a much needed breath. His second shadow clone was assisting with the distraction while he hid and attempted to heal himself, ‘I hope Nagisa is alright…I need to buy more time. Zabuza is likely to confront this situation…but I wouldn’t put it past him to run away either…’

With his Kekkei Genkai, Haku plunged the temperature of the town, observing frost crinkle across the windows of residences. Haku was prepared to use the most vicious jutsu he could muster against the Hunter-Nin. Steeling his nerves, Haku and a shadow clone abruptly broke cover and rushed from opposite directions to combat their adversaries. The Mist ninja evaded as lithely as dragonflies in flight, timing their own jutsu to counterattack. Haku was able to shield fleeing townspeople from a water bullet that had gone astray, but the Captain took advantage of the kind act.

Using an odd technique, the Captain manifested a water-whip that was several meters in length. The Mist nin lashed his weapon and it wrapped securely around Haku’s neck. He pulled the young man down to the dirt again. After a brief struggle, Haku was able to nullify the whip-jutsu with a twinge of Water Affinity chakra and free himself, but he could barely muster the strength to get to his knees. It was difficult to see and breathe as the poison’s effects worsened.

“You put up more fight than I’d have given you credit for.” The veteran hunter noted, “You don’t see Yuki ninja anywhere these days. Did that clan sell you to Zabuza for his rebel force? How desperate are they?”

Haku did not reply. With the last drop of chakra he could part with, he opened an Ice Mirror portal beneath him on the road and slipped through it. He exited about a block away to the east where a barrel of water had frozen over, tapping it as a secondary mirror. He collapsed in the space between two houses and coached himself to inhale through his nostrils. His insides were burning.

Haku then heard a clamoring from the street. He turned his head toward the end of the alley where a tornado tinted with red dust flew by. Haku shut his eyes thankfully, ‘Ranmaru.’ Bolts of lightning shook the road a second later, amplifying the Wind jutsu that Ranmaru had used, ‘Ah, so Raiga isn’t pleased with our visitors either…’

He passed in and out of consciousness for several consecutive minutes, unsure of exactly how much time went by. He was flat on the ground beside garbage cans, utterly incapable of moving. His head swam. Haku felt the whiskers of Pua’s nose tickling his face and he smiled weakly. A moment later, he could hear Migawari’s irritated voice. The retired medic-nin rolled him over, stuck him with a syringe full of something, and then applied both hands to his chest to commence healing.

When Haku’s hearing improved he could unravel what his medical tutor was prattling on about, “The girl will be fine. Your bunny showed me to this dumpster and I said, Well maybe Haku is just trash, but then you were actually lying over here like a hobo…”

“Is Ranmaru…fighting them?” Haku asked tiredly.

“Sure is. I never knew that munchkin was a scrappy son-of-a-bitch. I told him: Even if you go out there with your tall stooge to fight, those Hunters will kill you. Then Ranmaru shot a windstorm at them from his hands that, quite frankly, looked like a natural-disaster.” Migawari concluded, “Young ninja sure are surprising.”

Haku was able to sit upright, beginning to feel well again, “Migawari-san, those hunters are here for Zabuza.”

“No kidding.” The old man nearly rolled his eyes.

“They knew that I was connected to him.”

“It’s the job of a Hunter-ninja to know exactly who is affiliated with rogue-nin and snuff all of them out.” Migawari chastised him, “It was going to happen sooner or later. Zabuza isn’t the company you want to keep, if you don’t want those brutes from Mist haunting your every step!”

“It may be too late now.” Haku rose shakily to his feet, “Thank you for helping me.”

“It was only a patch-job. I didn’t completely fix you, yet.” The medic-nin warned, “Here’s some advice: if those hunters kill you, well sure that’d be bad…but if they escape and take intelligence of this village to Kirigakure, we are all going to have major problems.”

Haku nodded, “I won’t let them.” Significantly recovered, he moved to flank the Hunter-Nin on the main street from the rooftops.
He flitted across a power line and looked below to where Zabuza had cornered the Hunter captain. Raiga and Ranmaru were keeping Number Three divided from help as well. Haku formed a dome of Ice Mirrors around Zabuza and the Captain, sequestering them, and though Zabuza’s Seversword swung with wicked purpose, the Hunter-nin was too quick to be caught. Haku dove into a mirror from above, prepared to attack, but the Captain was aware of his arrival.

After rapid hand signs, “Ninpo: Pressure Boil!” The Captain used a technique that drove atmospheric pressure up to an insane level, temporarily. It shattered the Ice Mirrors surrounding them and Zabuza was hurled back, singed, but leapt to his feet. The Captain made a dash towards his subordinate.

As shards of ice continued to fall in a curtain, Haku realized he was still in the “white dimension.” He charged recklessly through the rain of ice, through which he could see the physical world, and he shot through the curtain like a phantom. Haku was unable to judge the speed of the attack, or understand why he could move through ice portals that small, but Haku caught the Captain by the shoulder. His high-speed, vaulting flip flung the startled ninja face-first into the edge of Zabuza’s waiting sword. Shortly after that, the Captain had half of a face as he collapsed on the street.

From a distance, Haku witnessed the other Hunter-Nin keeping both Ranmaru and Raiga at bay with a breath of poison. The noxious gas cloud filled the lower half of the avenue, forcing many to retreat, but before Number Three could escape undetected he began acting erratically. He lunged towards empty air, snatching at nothing with his arms. Haku determined that Ranmaru had created some kind of illusion.

Three snapped out of the Genjutsu just in time for Zabuza to cut his legs out from under him. The Hunter-Nin fell and attempted to use seals for a jutsu in anticipation of his demise. Raiga quickly stuck the hunter’s forehead with the point of a sword and channeled lightning into his brain. Number Three crumpled in the street after that.

There was a long silence as Zabuza and Raiga looked at each other. Raiga broke the stare first, clearly irritated by Zabuza, “Tch!” He stowed his swords at his back and returned to Ranmaru’s side as the boy carefully used gusts of wind to part the poison fog.

Zabuza turned back to Haku, “Were there others?”

“There’s one more hunter in the forest. I injured him.” Haku reported. Before he could say another word, Zabuza bolted for the woods with his sword drawn.

He took a step, wondering if he should follow and assist with the clean-up. Haku noted the stinging stab wound on his back and other various injuries would not permit it. He limped towards Ranmaru for a few seconds before he felt winded, then gave up and sat on a public bench. Haku rested a healing hand on the puncture wound in his leg and leaned back.

‘I’ve done enough. Those hunters wanted Zabuza, then let it be his responsibility…’

Haku chuckled darkly as he thought, ‘If I’m lucky…that hunter-nin will get the better of Zabuza.’ But a small voice reminded him, And if he’s dead, that will be one less person to fight against the oppression of the Mist Village.

‘Ugh.’ Haku groaned with a mixture of pain and resentment. What difference could one, miserable rogue ninja make?

“Haku!”

He turned his head slowly and saw Hiroshi bustling towards him. The large man flinched at the sight of bodies on the road. He stopped beside the bench and caught his breath.

“Thank goodness…the kids were shouting their heads off when they told me…” Hiroshi patted his shoulder and Haku winced in pain, “Oh! Sorry, it looks like you took a beating.”

“Better it was me that got hurt instead of the children.” On that note Haku asked, “Are they all safe?”

“Yes. Tomo picked up Hotaru and Katsu. They’re staying with Nagisa in Migawari’s office right now.” Hiroshi shook his head, “I can’t believe Hunter-Nin would try to drag them into this! Isn’t the point of capturing rogue ninja to secure the safety of citizens?”

“I should think so, but I don’t know at what price they are willing to achieve that goal.” Haku nodded towards his defeated enemies, “They paid dearly for it.” With his leg mended, he then began working on his stab wound, “Overall, Zabuza is less of a threat to these people than the Mist Village is.”

“For now.” Hiroshi agreed gravely, taking a seat on the bench.

Haku observed Migawari exchange words with Raiga and Ranmaru. The three of them then approached Haku, although Raiga did not seem entirely pleased.

Concerned, Ranmaru pressed his fingertips to Haku’s face to seal up several cuts, “Are you alright, Haku-kun? When Migawari-san said you had been ambushed I wasn’t sure if I’d make it in time.”

“I’m fine, thank you.” He smiled sheepishly, “I didn’t know that you can use Wind techniques like that, Ranmaru.”

“It’s how I spread my dust.” Ranmaru replied.

Haku exchanged a puzzled look with Migawari, wondering if he heard correctly. Migawari shrugged and sat in the space on the bench beside Hiroshi, taking off his spectacles to wipe them clean.

“We need to move and dispose of those bodies before townspeople think we’re murderers.” Migawari announced and then looked at Raiga, “I don’t suppose you know if Hunter-Nin go missing often? When they do, does the headquarters of Mist Black Ops send out an alert?”

“After a few days, it will. If this squadron was told to come here directly, they’ll look here first. If they were doing an island-wide sweep…then it might take longer.” Raiga drew upon his former experience in the Black Ops, “It might be smarter to go elsewhere before they come looking again. Next time, we’ll all be six feet under.”

“I don’t want to leave Nanakusa.” Ranmaru protested.

Raiga frowned in disapproval, “You will when they do to you what they did to him.” He pointed to Haku, “If you want to stay here then we should hand over Zabuza when they come again. He’s not good for much anyway.”

“Are you?” Haku countered pithily.

“They want him dead before they want me dead.”
“They want anyone dead who defies the Mizukage.” Haku clarified, “And the Mizukage is only a puppet.”

Silence punctuated the conversation. Everyone present gave Haku looks that were a mixture of incredulity and fascination.

“Zabuza and I have evidence that the Akatsuki may have taken over Kirigakure without anyone realizing it.” Haku explained, “The village itself is a hostage. Rogues who leave Mist who may realize what’s going on…are strategically being eliminated.”

“Even if that’s true, not all of the rogue-ninja from Kirigakure care about the well-being of that village nor are they trustworthy. Some of them ran away and never looked back.” Hiroshi critiqued.

“There’s no disputing that.” Haku acknowledged.

“Hidden Mist has been crippled by violence for decades.” Migawari pointed out, “Until you have a bona fide indicator that the Akatsuki has anything to do with it, don’t assume anything. No matter what’s happening in that village, it won’t matter at all if those hunters return and mince us for dinner.”

It fell quiet again and Haku looked at Raiga uncertainly, who had crossed his arms.

The man glanced at Ranmaru and patted the boy’s head as he spoke, “I believe it. I knew something was wrong when I was there, but I couldn’t figure out what.” He added, “The Akatsuki contacted me twice and tried to get me to do some work, a few years back. I guess that’s how they recruited Kisame when he left.”

Haku’s gaze travelled to the road’s end where Zabuza had reappeared. The Seversword was neatly stored at his back and there was not a scratch on him, although he did look severely annoyed. He stalked over to the oddball group near the bench. For the moment, it seemed as though his hostility with Raiga had been conveniently dismissed.

“First of all…” The man’s growl was directed at Haku, “Someone snitched on you in Moji, obviously. Good fucking job. I appreciate how sociable you are, it really keeps a low profile.”

“Did you get the hunter?” Haku pressed, sitting up straight.

“Yeah. I was too polite; cut his head off before he noticed me.” Zabuza recounted, “How did they locate you? Did you use a jutsu?”

“They may have noticed when I made it snow.”

“Why the fuck would you do that?”

Haku regarded his companions and saw that they too wanted an explanation. He replied in defeat, “It won’t happen again.”

“Fine. Whatever.” He grabbed a fistful of Haku’s shirt and pulled him from the bench, walking him towards the bodies that had bled out on the street.

“What?” Haku hissed an annoyance, feelings his friends’ eyes at his back as they watched him interact with the belligerent nukenin.

“This is probably going to happen again in the future, so I’m going to show you mop procedure.” Zabuza told him as he procured a summoning scroll, “Everyone in the Black Ops is expected to destroy evidence efficiently. They collect heads sometimes, but they get rid of everything else. I don’t want Hunters to be able to trace what’s leftovers here.” He cut his thumb on the edge of the Seversword and then thrashed the scroll open. It spun like a tendril as he swiped blood across seals, and with a puff of smoke, a murder of crows erupted and fluttered about the area.

The cawing birds swooped over the bench and Hiroshi ducked down with a panicked yelp. Migawari muttered for him to settle down.

With a short whistle, Zabuza directed the carrion-eaters towards the bodies they had left. The crows immediately landed and began disassembling their lunch.

“They usually leave bits of clothing and other junk. You throw that out or bury it.” He explained to Haku, “I’ll make a copy of this summoning scroll for you so you can mop next time.”

Haku did not object, but he was not overtly thrilled about it. It would be a practical tool.

“Now we start a moratorium.” Zabuza decided, “We keep our heads down and stay put. Don’t talk to anyone who might be connected to Mist. Don’t take a mission or do anything to tip off hunters on alert…don’t even fart too loud. We can wait it out.” He looked over his shoulder and amended, “And tell them not to attract attention either. They’re at risk too.”

“I will.” Haku nodded.

“Haku, just so we’re clear…If we deal with Hunter-Nin again, you take them down first, no matter what. They won’t kill you right away because you aren’t a primary target. But people in your position get interviewed and they will extract information from you by any means.”

“One of them tried that.”

“He was being gentle.” Zabuza warned him, “When they’re serious, they tote you off to a hideout and begin removing things from your body until you cooperate. I don’t want you squealing on me. Make sure you kill them, or there’s always hell to pay if you don’t.”

“I understand.”

“Good.”

The crows had finished up and Haku took a moment to rinse off the street. The town was restored to normal, more or less, and Raiga and Ranmaru followed Hiroshi into his tea shop for a meal. Haku was flabbergasted to see Zabuza enter the café as well, ‘I didn’t think he wanted to be in their company…but maybe after today’s incident he feels they’re worth keeping close.’

Before Haku could follow suit, Migawari inclined his head, “Not so fast! Come back to my office with me, please.”

He obliged and followed the retired medic through town as villagers began peeking out into the open again. As expected, he followed Migawari through the back door of his house and straight into a treatment room. With a sigh, Haku took a seat and allowed the old man to mend his back.

“That needle I stuck you with before didn’t neutralize the poison.” Migawari said as he worked, “I’ve got to give you a medication to follow it with for the full effect. Made it myself while I was in Kusagakure! We know our poison, over there.”

“Thank you.” Haku murmured.
“Ah, don’t thank me. That medicine will probably make you crap and vomit for the rest of the day, but it’ll keep you alive…”

Haku’s shoulders sagged in distress after hearing the side effects.

“But let’s just say, hypothetically…if you were to get this badly injured and there was no help in sight for you…” The old man posed, “What would you do?”

“That’s what they call a loaded question.” Haku pointed out.

“Well, knowing how deep in shit you are right now, because of Zabuza and these other barbarians…there’s no doubt that you’ll get into a brawl again. Then you were talking about the Akatsuki, and I just thought to myself: Haku is asking for it.” Migawari bounced with laughter, “You want to help too much. You’re going to make too many enemies.”

“Do you mean to say that I should stand by and do nothing while terrible things happen here? Things I could help stop?” Haku was frustrated by the implication, “If it weren’t for the deplorable condition of the Water Country, I would not be an orphan. I would not have had to travel to another land to avoid persecution. How can I ever ignore what’s going on here?”

“You don’t have to ignore it.” Migawari told him as he stepped back, “You just need to prepare to get throttled.”

He motioned for Haku to follow him across the hallway and into the sitting room. “Hold on a moment…”

Puffing, Migawari used a stepladder to reach a high shelf and pulled down a basket. He riffled through it before procuring a scroll. He dusted it off and handed it to Haku, “Here.”

Haku stared at him for a long moment, “What is this?”

“It’s your Hokage’s Yin Seal.” Migawari enlightened him, “Remember when you told me you wanted it? Well here you go. If you can master this, there’s a better chance you’ll survive some nasty battles.”

“But you-!”

“You’ve earned it, Haku. I know that you’re not just another scrub only looking out for himself. You want to end the suffering of the people here, and you’d rather die than see little kids get hurt.” The old man’s tiny eyes crinkled when he smiled, “I like that about you. And I’d bet…that you really can make a difference around here.”

Haku nodded silently, lowering his eyes. The statement stirred a feeling in him that reminded him of Jiraiya’s heartfelt talks.

“Also, use that wisely. It’s quite the rigmarole to create and apply the seal to your head, and then you need to devotedly charge it with chakra.” Migawari cautioned him, “You’re smart enough to figure it out.”

“Thank you,” Haku said with a small smile, “I will return this to Tsunade-sama as soon as I am done studying it.”

“You might as well.” Migawari agreed as he exited the room and walked down the corridor. Haku followed him out to the lobby where Tomo and her children were relaxing in armchairs.
At the sight of Haku, the family jumped up and surrounded him in a group hug, animatedly thanking him for his bravery. He assured them that he needed no thanks, considering he created the danger in the first place.

Abruptly, Katsu broke away from the embrace first and rushed over to the window, “My frogs! Hey! My frogs did get to come out today!”

Hotaru and Nagisa craned their necks to look at their brother, baffled by his excitement. “I thought there were only tadpoles in the forest?” Hotaru muttered.

They crossed over to the window and were shocked to see a red toad the size of a cat pressed against the glass. A pair of goggles was strapped to the creature’s head. It said suddenly, “Hi!”

“Ahh!” The three children fell back and onto the floor, startled.

“It’s alright!” Haku assured them as he crossed the waiting room and opened the door, “This is one of Naruto’s toads.”

In marched the red toad, followed closely by Pua. The rabbit stopped in front of Haku and tapped her hind foot.

“Oh, so this is Haku,” The toad spoke to Pua, “Thanks for showing me the way, pretty lady.” The toad hopped forward, “Hi! I’m Kosuke. Naruto would have sent Gamakichi to find you, but he’s been training with the Chief Toad a lot. And he’s too big to fit in this room…”

Haku bent down to give Pua an appreciative pat and said, “It’s good to meet you, Kosuke. Thank you for coming here. I know I probably should have sent Pua off to get mail, but Naruto beat me to it.”

“He did. The boss had something important to tell you.” Kosuke handed a scroll to Haku, “Here you go.”

‘Everyone has impeccable timing today.’ Haku thought. With a scroll in each hand, Haku looked between them and felt mildly overwhelmed. Hadn’t he nearly died twenty minutes ago? The exhaustion that he tried to resist finally walloped him, and he resorted to taking a seat in a waiting-room armchair.

Tomo took the cue, as did Migawari, and she herded her children along and out the door for homeschooling. Katsu stubbornly stayed behind and solicited a hug from Kosuke. Though confused, the toad let the little boy squeeze him like a stuffed toy. Satisfied, Katsu then ran out the door after his family.

“He likes animals.” Migawari explained to the toad as he too sat down in the lobby, “So I suppose it’s true that Haku trained with Gama-sennin, if I’m seeing toads appear in my office.”

“Of course it’s true.” The toad said and then gestured to a seat, “Can I rest here? That was a long trip.”

“Sure, small fry.”

Kosuke bounded up onto a cushion. He and the old man noticed Haku had gone quiet. His head had drooped tiredly and his chin rested on his chest. Pua was nestled comfortably on his knees. Migawari snickered, not surprised the young man had dozed off after such calamity.

He inquired of Kosuke, “Well…it seems you and I have a wait ahead of us. Are you any good at Gaara was also napping. He had taken time off from overseeing the village and training with Shukaku. That day, he had personally escorted Matsuri to the Tide Village. He did so expecting to catch up with Temari, as well as uncover why his student was reluctant to visit the village she had once adored. Upon his arrival, Gaara was welcomed into the barracks of the Sand training program and offered a spot on a break room sofa.

He took a seat and almost immediately drifted off. He was a little tuckered out from all of the running around.

Good grief. You just got here, you useless sod. Don’t say that you can handle office work AND a cross-desert trip all in one day, and then crap out when you get here!

Gaara was not even present for a snappy reply. Sometimes this happened, Shukaku noted.

Gaara…

Matsuri gently shook her teacher’s shoulder. She pursed her lips in slight apprehension when Gaara’s eyes snapped open, but they were gold and frightening.

“Is something wrong?” She asked quietly, “Temari-sama will be here for a briefing soon…” She knew who she was speaking to.

“Your Kazekage is asleep. He works like a dog and then makes a fool of himself.” Shukaku replied.

“Can’t you wake him up…” She whispered, “Shukaku?”

“He’s ignoring me. Gaara doesn’t always hear me.” He shut his eyes and was silent for a long moment.

Matsuri’s shoulders sagged in dismay. Ever since Shukaku had become an “ally,” to use Gaara’s words, he had become a part-time babysitter whenever Gaara tired himself out. The Kazekage’s ambitious work ethic had a high correlation with burn-out, and as a result Matsuri had already had several awkward conversations with the frustrated Biju who took the reins.

Suddenly, Gaara jerked awake with an uncharacteristic snort.

“Ah!” She smiled, “The One-Tail is so helpful.”

Gaara wiped his lower lip, “I did it again…”

“You shouldn’t try to do so much in one day. This visit could have waited, Sensei.”

“Nonsense. I want everything to be concluded before I begin Chunin Exam preparations. It’s only a few days away.” He informed her, “That work will be on top of my regular duties. I also want to test you one last time before you’re escorted to the Leaf Village.”

“I understand.”

Many subordinates and Sand ninja of all ages dropped by and bid a quick hello to their village leader. It was not long before Temari jogged into the break room, looking contrite.
“Hi Gaara, Matsuri…” She took a breath and adjusted her hair, “I had to run over here from a drill I was overseeing. I didn’t think you’d come by today.”

“Gaara-sensei insisted.” Matsuri said as she matched Temari’s bemused expression.

“I really just couldn’t stand looking at my desk anymore.” Gaara admitted, “I didn’t mean to rush you, Temari. How have things been going?”

“Great, actually. Every division is on schedule. We’re just doing a statistical analysis of the first-approved Jounin and Black Ops. The average age of both groups is nineteen, which surprised me.” Temari continued, “They’re working with what they have around here, but Shiogakure won’t be a village to cross once it’s functioning on its own.”

“I am pleased to hear it.” Gaara crossed his legs while he sat, “I hope you haven’t been missing home too much.”

“Are you kidding?” She sniggered, “I wake up in a luxury cabana and then lay out on the beach every morning.”

“Point taken.”

“How has Inari’s training gone?” Matsuri asked curiously.

“Very well. He passed the Genin Graduation Exam. Once the stat recorders complete the analysis of all the Tide Jounin, the new trainees will get matched up with Jounin-sensei. There will be five teams.” Temari smiled, “It’s just like in Suna, except that everyone here is shiny and new.”

Matsuri made a peep of joy.

“Have you spoken to the jinchuriki here at all?” Gaara wondered.

“I have. Utakata is not nearly as temperamental as he used to be.” Temari told him, “If you’re willing to part from the couch, Gaara, I can take you over to him right now.”

With unusual enthusiasm, Gaara stood up right away. He motioned for Matsuri to tag along, and the three exited the barracks and set out for the bustling promenade. The damage that the town had sustained during the Shin clan’s attack had been beautifully repaired, and Gaara could at least be grateful the money Sunagakure had allocated was put to good use. He and Temari made small talk as Matsuri followed a few paces behind them, somewhat distracted.

Several blocks away from the Academy, a dense congregation of people had gathered at a flea market. One person separated from the crowd after spotting the visiting Sand ninja. Inari squeezed himself between the browsers and hurried over to Matsuri when he spied her, “Hey! Where have you been, Matsuri?”

The girl stopped as Gaara and Temari continued on without her.

Matsuri rubbed her elbow nervously when she greeted her friend, “Hi, Inari. I apologize; I’ve been busy with missions.”

“Yes, but I thought you said you’d try to come back as often as you could!” The boy pointed out, “You missed my graduation ceremony. This stinks!” Inari flipped his thumb beneath the navy blue headband on his forehead. The etching in the metal depicted a retreating wave.

“I’m very proud of you.” Matsuri smiled genuinely at the sight of it, “I wish I had been there Inari!
Please know that I’m sorry.”

“Ah, it’s alright.” He waved off her concern, “I knew you’d get back here when you could. But poor Menma’s been freaking out this whole time…”

As Inari glimpsed over his shoulder to observe the crowd of market-goers, Matsuri felt a fearful tingling in her fingers and toes. Menma punctually appeared from behind a booth, removing an apron and handing it back to a stand attendant. Another part-time job, probably. He must have seen us… Matsuri’s suspicion was proven correct when the blonde young man started running towards them.

Her knees quaked. ‘I don’t want to talk to him. I didn’t even want to see him.’ She turned her head and observed a long stretch of empty pavement on the far end of the street, ‘He’s only going to keep pretending…so why should I have to?’

Turning back to his friend, Inari halted mid-sentence when Matsuri bolted across the boulevard and skirted around a public water fountain. “Hey!” He held out his hand and raced after her, “Matsuri, wait! Menma asked me to find you!”

It was at about this point, from a block away, Gaara noticed the bizarre commotion. Before he could look back and consider an intervention, Temari made him face front and continue.

“I didn’t want to bring this up to you, but…” She spoke quietly, “Matsuri has been avoiding her friends. I know they’ve missed her and want to make things right. Try to stay out of it so they sort it out, Gaara.”

“It does not look like they are sorting it out.” Gaara replied matter-of-factly.

“I haven’t gotten involved and neither should you. There’s no way we can fix it.” She stated, “Matsuri needs to build up some confidence and stop running away from the things she’s afraid of.”

Gaara attempted to piece it together, “If she is avoiding her friends, then I take that to mean she isn’t getting along with them?”

“Sort of.”

“Elaborate or I’ll dismember them.” He issued a mild threat, “Then my student can concentrate on other things.”

“Cool your jets, you maniac.” Temari chided in annoyance, “She has a crush on Menma, one of Tazuna’s favorite ninja. He’s the taller one. He was made a Jounin for the Tide Village, and you should know that he likes Matsuri too.” She added, “But he has…something on the side.”

“I have no idea what that means.” Gaara told her, “Unless he has a deformity.”

“Eh, never mind. Matsuri is timid and doesn’t know how to talk to him about all of this.” Temari said as they arrived at the Academy training yards, “If you want her to build a thick skin and be prepared for the Chunin Exam, the least you can do is let her work this out on her own.”

“Very well.” He agreed and then shut an eye, resting his hand over it, “I won’t interfere, but you have not given me a reason to trust the deformed person.” From a distance, he created a Third Eye from sand and positioned it over the walkway his student was running towards.

“Just call him Menma.” Temari insisted tiredly.
“Menma.” Gaara repeated.

“Good.” She guided him along by his arm while he was half-sighted, “Let’s go meet with Tazuna and the teachers, little brother.”

Matsuri hoped that her sensei would excuse such uncouth behavior. She ran at top speed down the main street before coming to an area dense with people, and then she propelled herself up an awning and onto a rooftop. She could hear Inari yelling frantically for her to stop.

‘I’m sorry, Inari.’ She rationalized her desire to flee, ‘I don’t want to leave you alone too, but when you’re always talking about Menma like that…I can’t stand listening.’

Ahead, what she supposed was a Water Clone of Menma had appeared atop the bricked edge of a building. It held out its hands, its facial expression confused and dismayed. Matsuri palmed the Jouhyou at her hip and, with a whirl, cut the clone in half as she ran. She leapt the gap to the next rooftop, noticing that Menma was trailing below, still trying to get her attention.

She pressed on as far as she could until the melody of Menma’s ocarina began to sap her strength, ‘He’s slowing me down!’ Matsuri felt as though a block of lead had been laid across her shoulders. She wisely descended to the street again and made it to the entrance of the Great Naruto Bridge, eventually coming to a sweaty halt, ‘I need him to undo this jutsu…’

Matsuri waited for Menma and Inari to catch up. She stood in silence as Inari began to scold her, yet his words were drowned out by the heartbreak and frustration buzzing in her ears. She kept her dark eyes trained on the ground until Inari gave up with a huff.

Menma used two hand seals to relieve the heavy sensation the girl had endured. He then worriedly held her shoulders, “Why did you keep running? You know how badly we’ve wanted to see you, right Matsuri?”

“I know more than that.” She muttered.

“Come on, you’ve been gone for too long and you ran off! That’s just plain insulting!” Inari puffed his chest.

“I am sorry.” Matsuri spoke woodenly, “Inari. I’m sorry I wasn’t there to see you graduate; or to visit you. I just can’t stand being around Menma.”

The boys shuddered in a shared moment of ultimate surprise. They stared and tried to make an assessment of what could possibly be upsetting the Sand kunoichi.

Inari turned slowly to his friend, “Did you…do something, Menma?”

The young man was still completely mystified, “I have no idea…but if I have done something…” He gently prodded Inari, “Would you please excuse us for a short while? If I have offended it’s up to me to address it.”

“Right, right…” The Genin nodded in understanding and then pointed at Matsuri, “Now stop running away! You’re one of my favorite friends, and if I haven’t made you angry then I think you should spend some time with me, for crying out loud!” He stomped off to give them space.

Beside them on the bridge railing that overlooked the bay, several seagulls perched. Menma stood in front of Matsuri, patient and attentive, knowing that she would find the willpower to speak. The breeze swept a strand of her hair and she uncomfortably tucked it behind her ear.
“I just don’t want to see you anymore.” Matsuri said with finality.

“I don’t know why that is. Matsuri, I don’t understand what I could have done to warrant any of this.” He objected sadly.

A frown pulled so hard on the corners of her mouth she feared it would stick until the end of her days. She had always been the type to get discouraged and clam up. To retreat. She had already proven to Temari and Kankuro how she lost the ability to articulate when on the verge of tears, but today was a rare exception. Indignant anger broke through remorse like an eggshell and freed her to speak her mind.

“I stood up for you when no one would have been willing to trust you.” She said at length, “But that’s all I did. You were the one brave enough to defy the Shin clan, and to work with Sand ninja you hardly even knew. I was just skating by so I could be around you. I couldn’t have helped anyone if you weren’t with me.”

He smiled at the memory, “No, you accomplished far more than I did.”

“We nearly got killed.” She sounded morose, as if she regretted her choices.

“It’s alright. I’ve thanked Utakata-san for saving us. I’d like you to meet him, Matsuri.”

She shook her head in solemn silence.

“I…decided I was in love with you the day after you took me on a date.” Matsuri announced calmly, “That’s why I was so excited to come back here.”

The bewildered expression on his face slowly morphed into elation, “You…? I was hoping…oh Matsuri, I wanted to tell you-” She batted his hand aside when it brushed her cheek.

“Don’t misunderstand me.” She corrected, “That’s how I felt that day. Today I only have questions.”

“Questions?” Menma was perplexed, unsure if he had to raise or lower his guard for the conversation.

“Do you work for a bubble tea shop?”

“I did for a few weeks.” He replied quickly.

“And do you still spend time with coworkers from that place?”

“Of course I do.”

“The waitress.” Matsuri got to the point, “I was served by her when I visited.”

“I see. I couldn’t find you that day, but Inari said you were looking for me.” He recounted, “What happened? Did Rika tell you I wasn’t at the café?”

“Her name…is Rika.” Matsuri noted dolefully before asking, “Do you see her every day?”

The young man was quiet, stewing over the question before he said, “Almost every day.”

“And you and I have only met a few times.”

“I’m not happy about that.” He took her hand, “I’ve missed you and I’ve wanted to talk to you.”
“But I’m not the one you care about.” Matsuri reasoned.

“When you say something like that…it sounds as if someone wanted you to believe it.” Menma drew a conclusion, “That’s not true, Matsuri. I feel the same way as you.”

“It’s pointless. I’m in Sunagakure. I’ll be taking the Chunin Exam soon, and I’ll be busier than ever. I watch Gaara-sensei mope every day about how Sakura-chan is a whole country away, and I wondered what good I’d be if I tried to live like that.” Matsuri shook her head, “I’m not special enough to wait for. I’m a mouse. Everyone here is new and vibrant, like you. You’ll pick someone better.”

“No, I won’t.” He lifted her hand and pressed a kiss to the back of it.

“You’re a Jounin.”

“Because this village needs me to be one.” Menma clarified.

“All my life I’ve finished last. My parents coddled me and kept me cooped up, and then they died. I was pathetic in the Academy, and everyone in Suna has used me as the butt of a joke at some point. They still don’t care. They look at me and only see Gaara-sensei standing behind me. I’m clear as glass.”

“Is that what you think I see?”

She pulled her hand back, “I’ve done my part here and I don’t need to come back. You should just keep spending time with Rika.”

“If she said something to hurt you, please know I won’t let it happen again. I don’t want you to deprecate yourself like this. I think you’re the one who’s mistaken…because I’m not special at all, Matsuri. I’m homeless. I won’t be forever, but you see someone better than who I really am.”

“Even if that’s the case, we’re too far apart. It’s not worth it.” She stood a bit straighter, “It’s all water under the Great Naruto Bridge, Menma. Please don’t worry. You need to do your best to help the Tide Village.”

He spoke with an edge of panic, “Matsuri, I care about you more than Tide!”

“That’s not something you should be saying. You have too much responsibility.” Matsuri said firmly, “Please don’t talk to me anymore. I have my own responsibilities to take care of.”

She feinted left to pass him, and as he reached out an arm to catch her, Matsuri ducked to the right. The seagulls on the rail spooked and took off with piercing squawks. Menma chased after her down the stone path, aware of the strange looks they had drawn. The girl did not slow even for a moment as she charged headlong into the barracks of the Sand Training Program.

Menma stopped short at the gate where two Sand shinobi were watching him. It was clear that he had upset Matsuri, and he would not be let by without being questioned.

He waited for a long while and stared blankly. How could sincere feelings fail to reach someone? Someone who so badly needed to hear that they were loved and needed, ‘A person can still fail to accept it. Matsuri, I don’t want you to be afraid of me no matter what it is that you’re thinking. I am never going to hurt you.’

He smiled wanly at the guards before turning away, walking back towards the center of the village. ‘I will wait. I don’t believe you when you say that you want to stay away from me. And if you Tazuna twitched his mustache.

“Good to see you, Gaara.” The old man commented with a hint of sarcasm. He was irritated by the Kazekage’s blatant distraction; almost staring off into space while keeping one eye covered.

Temari was at her brother’s side, having brought him to a pavilion where Academy students had lunch at picnic tables. Tazuna and Utakata were seated side by side on a bench.

From the corner of her mouth Temari gently warned, “Gaara, Utakata and Tazuna are here. You need to stop watching Matsuri now.”

“Hm. I have no idea what she and that boy are arguing about.” He mused aloud, “I should take some time to develop the audio-equivalent of this jutsu.” With a hand still on his face, Gaara turned to Tazuna, “Hello, Tazuna-san. I apologize. I’m monitoring potential conflict between the Sand and Tide Villages.”

“The only conflict I can think of would be either a financial crisis, or you offending the hell out of me.” The old man gruffed.

Gaara made a move to stop the technique, but suddenly balked at the sight of Menma kissing his student’s hand.

“What?” Temari hissed in aggravation, “Did they kill each other?”

“I can’t watch anymore.” Gaara concluded. If two youths were going to shamelessly profess love and quarrel out in the open, he was never the recommended audience for such a thing. He cleared his throat and gave his full attention to Tazuna, “You’re now the official Head Elder and Councilman of Shiogakure. I would prefer to send correspondence only to you, Tazuna, but keep me informed if you have shinobi counterparts who need to contact me.”

“Will do. Now, there’s someone I’d like for you to meet,” Tazuna gestured to the man who was bent over the table in boredom, “This is Utakata. He’s a former Mist ninja who was sub-contracted by the Sand Training Program to teach. He’s still mostly a bitch-and-moan nukenin, but he’s taught our kids a lot. Also, he’s asked that we do not tip off Mist to his whereabouts.”

Gaara nodded politely, “It’s good to meet you.”

Utakata’s head moved a fraction so he could get a look at the red-headed Sand ninja, “Excuse me, Lord Kazekage. I was denied a day off today because of your visit. I guess it’s nice to meet you too.”

“You’re a jinchuriki.” Gaara stated plainly for all to hear.

Utakata’s arms tensed on the table and he raised himself up, frowning, “You’re…the direct sort.” He sat properly on the bench and tapped a bubble-blowing pipe against his chin, “That isn’t something you should speak so freely about. I imagine the Mist ninja retirees over here must have announced it to everyone when they noticed I was in Tide.”

“I will not be careless with such knowledge.” Gaara promised, “I’m a jinchuriki too.”

“Is that so?” The man cocked an eyebrow, “The Fourth Kazekage murdered his own child when he deemed the power of the Bijuu too great for him. So I’ve heard…”
“Father made an honest attempt to do that, yes.” Gaara acknowledged, “But I’m still here and he isn’t.”

Mildly amused, Temari took a seat at the table to watch the exchange unfold.

“So you became a village leader just to spite him?” Utakata observed, “What a coincidence. I became a teacher to spite my old Master…” He put his pipe away, deciding that there was no danger, “The man who taught me everything I knew had me dragged into the chambers of Mist’s Sealing Corps and tried to extract Saiken from me.” His face twisted into a scowl, “I suppose I should’ve thanked him for demonstrating what fate awaits me if the Akatsuki stop by.”

“Is that why you’re such a diva?” Tazuna felt more informed, “It’s time to bury that hatchet.”

Utakata rested his chin on the heel of his hand and sniffed at the old man, “That’s easy for you to say. Even though Harusame-shishou is dead and I survived, the Black Ops have been after me for years. Do you think I want to return to a village where life is cheaper than dirt?”

“That’s not what I mean.” He corrected, “I just want you to be nicer to kids. Stay here if it makes you happy, but don’t take your bad attitude out on students.”

“I’m trying.” Utakata sighed.

Gaara chimed in, “His name is Saiken?”

Utakata blinked in surprise when Gaara had picked up on the detail, “Yes.”

“I think you and I will have plenty to talk about.” Gaara allowed Shukaku, who was listening gleefully to the conversation, express his rattling tanuki-tail. It thrashed behind Gaara as he folded his arms, “Rather, we have a lot to talk about.”

A tiny, incredulous laugh escaped Utakata and he mussed his hair, ‘So I’m not the only one. Saiken, do you see this? There are other Bijuu and jinchuriki who understand each other!’ He suspected that this meeting with another jinchuriki would be a beneficial experience.

Tazuna frowned in thought at the sight of the raccoon-like tail whipping around. Temari had to affirm that this transformation was not a herald of imminent peril. When she decided that it wasn’t, she chuckled nervously, “Ah, that’s new. He doesn’t usually do things like this…but maybe we should excuse ourselves before this conversation gets weirder.”

The following day in the Hidden Leaf Village, the tempo of life had sped up. More visitors were crowding into the city by the hour, store owners hustled for business, and anything related to the Chunin Exam captured the people’s attention. As for Konoha’s preeminent Genin group, something unusual had sidetracked them from exam preparations.

Not long after Hinata and her kunoichi compatriots had caught her cousin on a date, Tenten presumed the news had become a ticking time bomb. To avoid unwanted scrutiny from the people closest to them, Neji agreed with her that it would be prudent, at the very least; to inform Lee of what was going on. Of all their friends, Lee deserved to be made aware first.

After trying to keep everything as normal as possible, from their style of dress to the timing of their arrival on the training field, Tenten pulled Lee aside. Gai had challenged him to a push-up contest as a warm up, but Lee graciously excused himself to have a word with his friend. They stood off to the side of the clearing. Neji casually did forms near battered tree stumps while Gai brushed up on handstands; both respectfully minding their business.
“Yes, Tenten?” He leaned in and lowered his voice, “You seem very pensive. Is anything the matter?”

“No. Everything’s good, Lee. I’m just going to ask that you keep what I am about to tell you confidential.” Tenten gave a preliminary caveat.

“Yes, of course!” He spoke quietly.

“I don’t want you to be surprised, and I don’t want you learning about it from anyone else, so…” She cupped her mouth and whispered, “I’m in a relationship. I meant to tell you sooner because I knew you’d actually be supportive.”

“Ah.” His lips turned into a frog-like pout as he thought about it.

“With that guy.” Tenten added for clarification, pointing her thumb over her shoulder at Neji in the distance, “There’s no way he’d ever tell anyone about it, but he did say he wanted you to know. Neji remembered most of what happened when we came back from the Marsh Country.”

“That is right…” Lee concurred in a low voice, “Neji has been acting differently, most especially around you. I was unsure if he would ever find a way to act on how he felt…”

“Well, when he did act on it I ended up kicking him in the face. He was a bit rude about it.”

“That is what I would expect…” Lee raised his eyebrows and smiled, “I am happy for you, Tenten. I was trying to help him, you know.”

“Sure I know, Lee! I know what you did for him.” She smiled back, “And truly: thank you for everything you’ve done. For being there for Neji…and for me too…”

“It is thanks enough to see Neji return your feelings.” He held up a hand modestly.

As they parted to begin their training routines, Tenten did notice the widening, wobbling grin on Lee’s face as returned to Gai for a warm up. It was a look of restraint and delighted shock.

Tenten approached Neji and he paused in his practice, somewhat dubious, “He must have taken that well.”

“He did, Neji. Lee seemed happy about it.” She rested her hands on her hips, relieved, “Can I take you up on that offer to work on Taijutsu?”

“You may.” When he said it, Tenten noticed his head did a strange little tilt, like he was getting a better look at her.

‘He must be happy too. Or maybe I look good today. Possibly both...’ She mimicked Neji’s posture and arm positioning as he demonstrated.

He went through the motions of basic Wushu exercises that Wong Leung had ingrained in him and Lee. Neji had slowed it down for her, figuring that was preferable to smacking her in the head if Tenten did not get the stance perfect. That was Wong’s method. There was a solid three minutes of peace before the shouting began.

Dreading what the commotion was about, Tenten and Neji about-faced, watching as Gai covered his face with an arm. He was grinning and blubbering simultaneously. It was hard to distinguish Gai’s emotional blathering, but they could get the gist of it. Lee faced them with an expression of both guilt and joy, and Tenten speedily deduced that her friend had not been able to keep a secret for more than five minutes.

She shouted across to him, “I said confidential, Lee!”

“Forgive me! I was so excited…I thought it was alright to share it with Gai-sensei!”

Tenten pressed a palm to her temple and shook her head in disappointment. Gai’s volume rapidly increased until he was shouting, and he made a running charge toward his students. Tenten only had time to think, ‘I guess he doesn’t disapprove.’ Before Gai collided with her and squeezed her in a hug that was fit to be an illegal wrestling move. Neji wisely kept his distance.

“Lee tells me that this is a day for celebration! My two students, for whom I was perpetually concerned by your lack of enthusiasm and enjoyment during your Springtime of Youth…” Gai took a deep breath and thundered, “I am assured that you have found love!”

Airless, Tenten could only mouth the words: let go of me. Lee continued being innocently unhelpful by cheering in the background.

Gai went on as he set Tenten down, “Darling girl…you beautiful, deadly flower…you have gotten through to the most cantankerous young man I have seen in three generations. That is heaven’s work!”

Neji was scowling from a few meters away. Maybe it was only natural that Tenten be given credit for inspiring change in the Hyuga heir. It wasn’t as if it had taken any effort on his part to reciprocate or communicate or anything.

Tenten nodded absently as she got her breath back, pressing down her clavicle as if she had just escaped a stranglehold. Neji certainly was not going to join the conversation and so, to remove himself from it, he went on with forms and tuned the banter out. Their sensei took this as a cue to keep talking.

“I want to extend heartfelt congratulations to you, my pupils, on achieving such a momentous landmark in your lives! May your passions remain stoked, your success mutual, your sorrows shared, your pockets heavy, your children many-!” At Gai’s words, Neji slipped with a Wind-charged Air Palm and accidentally cut down an oak tree, “Your family be distinguished, your grandchildren accomplished-!”

Tenten stomped her foot and waved in front of the shouting man’s face, “Hey! You’re getting ahead of yourself, Gai-sensei!”

“Oh.” Gai stopped, “Pardon me. Perhaps that was more congratulations than what was due…”

Even after Tenten had managed to reel in Gai and Lee, and Neji turned his red face away to calm down, the day deteriorated from there.

Everyone knew. Of course everyone knew.

Hinata had probably not been responsible for circulating the news, but there was no doubt that Sakura and Ino had immediately informed their respective teams. Sato would definitely have learned of it from the girls thanks to his tattletale disposition, and Shino may have heard of it because Sato never shut up around him.

After training with Gai that morning, Tenten joined Lee and Neji for a training session with Wong Leung. Even the old grandfather was suspicious of something, although he could not put his finger on what exactly was out of place. That was the last semblance of privacy they had, for after Wong
Leung dismissed his disciples, Tenten was forthwith kidnapped.

By friends, thankfully. Ino had commandeered Tenten’s body by way of Mind-Body switch-ambush, and offered her up to the rest of the kunoichi congregation as a new source of gossip.

“Why are you leaving her?” Lee asked quietly as he followed Neji down the street, “Should we not try to help?”

“If we attempted to stop them now, they’d find other opportunities to interrogate Tenten later. It’s better to get it over with.”

“How cold.” Lee observed.

“The same could happen to me.” Neji informed him, “But I will be taking shelter to prevent such a thing.”

“Meaning you expect that our brothers-in-arms will have questions for you?”

“They’re worse than washerwomen. Shikamaru and Sato have proven that.”

“I suppose that is true.”

He and Lee promptly made for the Hyuga compound, and at the gate Neji had the great misfortune of having his shadow captured.

“I’m sorry.” From a lateral position, Shikamaru spoke, “Hope you’re not busy or anything...You’re needed at a conference, Neji.” He looked to Lee, “You can come along if you want, Lee.”

Lee exchanged a look with a frozen Neji, wherein nonverbal thoughts were conveyed.

Lee: Now do you want me to help you?

Neji: Help me.

Lee: Maybe I should not. You made no effort to assist Tenten. Perhaps, as you said, it is “better to get this over with.”

Neji: How dare you.

Lee smiled, “Please continue without me, Shikamaru-kun.”

“Suit yourself.” Shikamaru walked Neji like a shadow-bound dog down the side street to where Chouji and the others were waiting.

At that point, Lee had to decide what to do with the sudden abundance of free-time he would have that day. While he rubbed his chin and deliberated on it, Fujita came up the walk and brightened at the sight of him.

“Lee-kun!” The younger boy dashed up to his role-model, “How are you? Were you with Neji-sama this morning?”

“Fujita!” He gave the boy a thumb’s up, “Yes, but I heartlessly abandoned him a few moments ago.” Fujita gave him an odd look but accepted the answer.

Lee continued, “Did you just return from a mission?”
“Yes, and now Sawako-sensei is going to confirm my registration for the Chunin Exam.” Fujita pulled on his backpack straps excitedly, “Because I have no formal team I was arranged as a substitute to Asuma-sensei’s team. I will report to them tomorrow.”

“Ah, I see. How fitting.”

“You know, as a treat before the exam I was going to visit Sancho-baachan’s Curry Shop.” Fujita recognized the opportunity, “Usually no one wants to go with me, but you like that restaurant, don’t you Lee?”

“I do! And it just so happens I have no other obligations today, as my teammates are being catechized this very moment.” Lee grinned, “Fortuitous!”

He waited on the porch of the Main House as Fujita put away his belongings and changed. Shortly after that they set out for the curry shop just beyond the Fire Country’s border in the Land of Rivers. By the early afternoon, they were seated and warmly welcomed by the tiny old woman.

“Welcome back, Lee-kun! Fujita-chan!” Sancho chirped, “Ah, it’s so good to see you. It’s been far too long! Are your teammates not joining you today, Lee?”

“They have both been confiscated by our friends this afternoon, but I am sure they would have been delighted to drop by.”

“Ah, well, next time then. Would you boys like to try today’s special?”

They gladly accepted the offer and the old lady poked her head into the kitchen to set Karashi and Rishan to work. Sancho returned and took a seat beside her favorite customers for some chit-chat.

“Business has gotten so much better since you drove the Kurosuki family out! I cannot thank you enough.” She sighed happily, “I have a new employee who is quite the innovative chef, I must say. And now that the Chunin Exam is a day away, there have been droves of travelers stopping here to enjoy curry!”

“That’s wonderful, Baa-chan. I’ve been telling lots of people in the Leaf Village about this place.” Fujita asked her, “Have any Leaf ninja dined here on my recommendation?”

“Hmm, let’s see…” She adjusted her spectacles, “Not recently. Oh, but some months back I remember a Leaf ninja who came by and talked about your team, Lee. He was a bit funny.”

“How so?”

“As I recall he ate that day’s special. When I spoke of how your team had helped me, he said that he was only familiar with Tenten-chan.”

“Really? How old was he? Perhaps I know him.”

“About thirty years old, by the look of it.” Sancho estimated.

Lee frowned in confusion, quite certain that Tenten did not know many people that age. Hayate was a potential candidate, but the man was not the outgoing sort who would want to talk to chefs.

“All of that was not out of the ordinary. It was when Karashi pointed out that patron had been dishonest with me.” Sancho went on, resting her hands in her lap, “Karashi had injured himself in the kitchen, so he went outside to the ice box. Hit his head and foot…He said he saw the Leaf ninja release a disguise.” The old woman tilted her head back, “He was considerably more handsome than what I saw in the restaurant.”

“Why would he do that?” Fujita wondered.

“I don’t know.” Sancho admitted.

Rishan came by the table with plates of curry and set them down in front of the guests, “Enjoy, gentlemen!” The young woman stood by to watch.

“This is a new recipe. She likes to see how customers react to it.” Sancho informed them, “Dig in!”

The boys did as they were advised. Fujita promptly started sweating as he ate, but Lee was thrilled by the unconventional, spicy-sweet flavor of the dish. He looked up at the young woman, “I would like another order please. What do you call it?”

“It’s the Curry of Heaven.” Rishan smiled, “The Curry of Life energizes people, but this recipe can make anyone happy. It will be our new specialty!”

“That is marvelous!”

“I know! I worked so hard.” She darted back to the kitchen, “I’ll return with some more!”

Fujita had to take a break and sip his glass of water. He exhaled to cool off and then asked, “So did the handsome man return to the Leaf Village?”

“Oh no. He said he had a mission. Curiously, he came back the next morning without a disguise. We knew who he was, of course. He ordered the same thing.” Sancho explained, “I was cooking that day so I had Karashi take his order, and…Karashi said his headband changed.”

This got Lee and Fujita’s attention.

“Was it from Iwagakure?” Fujita asked quickly.

“I think so, if that forehead protector has stones on it. Of course, why would I question it when he knew about you children? Surely he was a friend.”

“That was not a friend.” Lee told her gravely, “Months ago, a rogue ninja was hunting my team.”

“My word!” Sancho clutched at her apron.

“That must be the person who killed Hikune-niisan.” Fujita’s eyes glazed over, “It was about the same time…”

“Goodness, I had no idea I was feeding a killer!” The old woman lamented.

“Baa-chan,” Lee pushed himself up from the table, “Would you object if we escorted you to the Leaf Village? Any information you can give in a statement to the Hokage may help us find this shinobi.”

“I…I suppose that would be my civic duty.” She agreed gloomily, “Forgive me, boys. I never meant to cause trouble.”

“It isn’t your fault.” Fujita stood after leaving money on the table, “I am glad that you told us about this.” Sancho informed her son and Rishan that she would be gone for the evening, and then followed the two Leaf ninja out of the restaurant.

“It’s alright, Baa-chan.” Fujita reassured her, “This won’t take long. And you know, I think that new
The following morning, prior to the First Stage of the Chunin Exam, Hiashi had asked Neji, Hinata, and Fujita to line up at the central porch of the Main House. He wanted to have a word with them. They gathered as instructed and Hiashi ventured outside a few minutes later, sizing them up in the morning light.

“At some point, this test may pit you against each other as enemies. Never forget that before you clash as competitors, you are family. You are the pride of the Hyuga clan.” Hiashi told them, “I believe in you all.”

Hinata covered her mouth to restrain a joyful cry. She gave her father a light squeeze and then waved to Hanabi at the window, who had just woken up. Neji and Fujita thanked Hiashi before they set out for the Academy. On the way, Fujita told his older cousins about what he and Lee had discovered at the Curry of Life shop.

“Sancho could not help but be trusting of anyone who claimed to know us.” Neji deduced, “Going forward, it may be wise for us to advise acquaintances from missions that they do not speak about who they contracted from Konoha.”

Both Hinata and Fujita agreed, as they did not wish tragedy to strike twice by the same mistake.

Outside of the school building, they followed other entrants through the open double-doors. The Hyuga participants sincerely wished each other luck before filing off towards their teammates.

Neji fell into step beside Tenten and Lee. His girlfriend playfully nudged his arm, “I can hardly believe there will be three people from your clan competing this year! Just make sure you’re nicer than you were last time.”

“I will be more considerate.” He then lowered his voice teasingly, “And what am I to do if I face you in the Third Stage?”

“Surrender.” She grinned.

Lee added on, “Ah, a good recommendation. Tenten, Neji; be sure to surrender to me if either of you are pitted against me in battle!”

They told him fat chance.

Security was stricter than it was at the previous exam. At the end of the hallway, each Genin was stopped at a table and compared to photo credentials on file. Predictably, every person continued on, having no need to falsify their records. The young ninja then passed into a newer, much larger lecture hall with an abundance of free seats. There would be a few minutes of time before Chunin Evaluators would give them assigned seating.

Neji found an open space on a wall and stopped to lean against it, staying huddled with his teammates. He peered over at Hinata’s team, where the mischievous look on Sato’s face suggested they were fully prepared. Sakura and Ino’s teams also appeared rather carefree. Fujita was sharing a bag of chips with Chouji.

“Leaf will have the strongest competitors during this exam.” Neji expected, “And I am sure other villages are aware of that.”
“Is there anyone you think that we should look out for?” Tenten asked softly.

Neji scanned around for any oddities. There was a team of all strawberry redheads from Hidden Grass, possibly triplet siblings. Plenty of Grass ninja competing. Plenty of Sand ninja too. Nothing overtly unusual, save for one team with aesthetically pleasing, light armor that bore an unusual village symbol.

“Look there.” Neji directed his teammates’ attention to them, “Those are Dream ninja.”

Tenten and Lee studied the headbands with a ‘ZZZ’ mark. Lee was impressed, “I had no idea that Yumegakure was a real village, or that they would qualify to compete!”

“Maybe Tsunade-sama encouraged them to. A lot of the more isolated villages are represented here, today.” Tenten supposed, “I was kind of hoping that we’d see Star ninja…”

“I see none here.” Neji reported.

“That’s a shame.” Tenten sighed, “So Neji…thanks a lot for leaving me to the wolves. Those girls are the nosiest, most tactless people I know! I would have appreciated it if you stepped in.”

“My apologies,” He frowned, “Likewise, I too was cross-examined.”

“No. By force.”

“Men can be surprisingly meddlesome too. Didn’t Lee ward them off?”

Lee just smiled.

“He made no attempt.” Neji recounted miserably.

“Our friends were curious about this new development in your life! It was good for you to talk about it with them.” Lee figured.

“I was told and asked things that I can never un-hear. What was interesting to those fools was detrimental to me.”

Tenten nodded, “Well said.”

Exam evaluators began herding Genin to seats and dispersing groups. Neji was planted in the second from the front row, aware that Tenten and Lee were several rows behind him. He discreetly checked the room for any giveaways or weaknesses that could be exploited. Nothing seemed obviously out of place. Once all of the entrants were settled down and hushed, Shizune scurried to the front of the room.

The Hokage’s assistant set down a tall stack of papers on the front desk, “Oof! There we go.” She motioned to a few Chunin Evaluators on the side of the room to give her a hand. They began distributing written tests face-down in front of trainees. Pencils were already provided on the tabletops.

Shizune turned around and smiled at the congregation, “Good morning everyone! Welcome to the Chunin Selection Exam! I’m Shizune and I will be your proctor for the First Stage. Please give me your full attention as I explain the rules and conditions of this test.”

Her friendly demeanor was surprisingly effective. All eyes faced front.
“The first stage entails Genin taking a written test. Questions on the test have point values from 1 to 3, and there are 100 questions on this test. Each question will denote how many points it is worth, so you can strategize on which ones you want to prioritize answering. Unanswered questions do not deduct points, but incorrect answers will deduct points based on the 1 to 3 scale.” Shizune elaborated, “Every team must have a combined score of 280 points or more. 279 points or below will make you ineligible to proceed to the next stage. If you are caught once copying someone’s answers, you will automatically be disqualified.”

Neji noted to himself, ‘This test demands that an entire team coordinate and pay attention. Unlike the first exam, this is not about gathering information from other test-takers.’ He had a hunch there was something that needed to be noticed, though. He continued to look for it.

“Good news! Simply writing your name at the top of the test paper awards you three points.” Shizune added sunnily.

An overeager Genin to the far left flipped his page over. A Chunin Evaluator hurled a sharpened pencil at him and pinned the paper to the desk top, “You’re out, buddy.”

Shizune wore a remorseful expression, “And…if you look at the test before I tell you…you will be disqualified. Sorry.”

The Genin was bad-mouthed by his first-timer teammates and the three were ejected from the room.

“There is no talking during this exam. You may not ask supervising evaluators any questions, as that would constitute an unfair advantage. If you need a restroom break raise your hand so you can be personally escorted to and from the lavatory. I will announce how much time is remaining on the test as we progress.” The woman put her hands on her hips, “And now…you can begin!”

A cacophony of flipping papers filled the room. Shizune stood serenely with her hands behind her back, watching Genin begin to devour the test.

Neji had almost immediately calculated in his head that he would answer thirty-two of the 3-point questions, as it would allot his third of points needed to pass. It would also save time and give him a chance to look for clues. He still did not buy that a piece of paper was actually standing between them and the Second Stage. Within ten minutes, he had all 32 short-answer questions completed, plus his full name, for 99 points. He expected Lee and Tenten’s sharp math skills would also indicate to them the minimum points they needed.

When Neji glanced up in boredom at that time, he finally did notice something peculiar. There were three clocks spaced out on the frontward wall. The time was synchronized. It was when he watched an evaluator look up at them, and then another evaluator take a gander, that he pondered why one clock was not good enough. He spied three clocks on each side of the room, realizing that the evaluators were keenly watching the time, not the test-takers.

‘While I did notice some significance, time will be a big factor. I do not know the reason yet, but it will affect the test somehow.’ He wanted to pat himself on the back for being smart enough to do the minimal amount of work on the test.

Not a moment later, Shizune piped up in an apologetic voice, “Excuse me everyone, but I was just informed that we are not on schedule…an evaluator noted that the time in this room is ten minutes slow. Right now, a watch confirms there are only ten minutes left to complete the test. The Second Stage will begin as planned in fifteen minutes.”

A twitter of panic erupted in the room. Most Genin had no hope of accumulating points or correct answers in so short a time. Pencils began to scratch more fiercely.

With his eyes shut, Neji took a look at Tenten with the Byakugan. She appeared calm and deep in thought. She was also trying to derive the meaning of the time element. Lee was finishing up a few more questions and did not look as perturbed as the people beside him.

Neji decided that the unthinkable was the solution hidden under their noses. Squander the time for one task to prioritize time for another. He raised his hand for the restroom.

An evaluator nodded to him and allowed him to leave his seat, guiding him in silence back towards the hallway. Neji found it was a little too obvious, and that maybe others would come to their senses. The points on the test did not matter nearly as much as getting to the true objective. On his way down the corridor, he used his blood limit to watch Tenten and Lee quickly be excused as well. Other privy ninja raised their hands when they decided what was most important as well. They drew judgmental looks from test-takers, as if they had given up.

Near the entrance of the men’s room, an evaluator waved him along, “If you don’t want to use the bathroom you don’t have to. Just follow the signs to the next stage and keep quiet.”

Neji exited the Academy and waited out front, where he was joined by Lee and Tenten shortly after that. Sakura popped outside next, smiling to herself.

“Well, would you look at that…” Tenten commented snidely. Dead ahead on a bench, beside a folding sign with an arrow pointed towards Stage Two, Hayate was eating a boxed lunch.

As they walked by he motioned with his chopsticks at her team, “Go. Don’t mind me. I’m just doing part-time supervision to make sure all you dumb-shits look at the signs. Some who make it this far can still screw that up.”

“It was nice seeing you too, Hayate.” Tenten told him cheerfully as they left.

Moving along, two teams burst ahead in a run to get to the next stage first: the Dream ninja team and a Rock ninja team. Signs were periodically placed along the path.

“I do not think there is any added benefit of being the first team there.” Lee assumed.

“There isn’t.” Neji affirmed, doing one last check with his Byakugan, “These boards indicate that we will be gathering at the restricted area at the Forest of Death.” He could see the other Leaf teams catching up behind them.

“Huh, you’d think Tsunade-sama would try to arrange something different from the last exam.” Tenten folded her arms, “Unless budgeting was a concern. Hokage-sama did say that she wanted to make a profit on the Chunin Exam.”

“We shouldn’t assume it will involve the same requirements as the previous exam did.” Neji replied, “Traditionally, the Forest of Death is the favored locale to test Genin seeking to become Chunin, since the founding of this village.”

After a leisurely but not-too-long stroll, they arrived at the tall, intimidating fences of the restricted wood. “Please proceed to Gate 1 and await instructions,” the signs said.

There was a tent over a folding table with an attendant relaxing in a chair. As time went by, all of the thoughtful teams had gathered on the grass in front of the primary gate. A digital clock readout situated in front of the tent indicated that time was up for the First Stage.
Sakura’s team stopped beside them, looking smug.

“There was no way that you would use the bathroom. It was a giveaway.” Sakura said lightheartedly to Neji, “I had thought of taking a bathroom break at the beginning, but at that point I wasn’t sure if Tama and Kiba would follow my lead.”

“Sakura, if I saw that you weren’t coming back I’d figure it out.” Kiba assured her.

“I feel bad for all of those Genin still trying to answer the questions...” Tama added.

“Shizune-san is most likely explaining the point of the First Stage to them right this moment.” Lee suspected.

The teams were alerted by a new exam proctor’s shout. A man garbed in black stepped in front of the gate and slid a pair of black glasses further up his nose. He wore a bandana hitai-ate and was a Jounin, by the look of it.

“Congratulations on making it to Stage Two.” The man spoke, “I am Ebisu, and I will be your proctor for this stage of the Chunin Selection Exam. This will be considerably more difficult than leaving behind a piece of paper, I assure you, so prepare yourselves.”

The gathered teams edged closer to hear out the new proctor.

“Each team will be required to make it to the center point of the Forest of Death and enter the tower. Once inside the tower you will be given further instructions. You will have five days to reach it. Every team will be given one scroll, most of which provide an invaluable clue for completing the Second Stage. Some teams will discover that they have been given dummy-scrolls, which provide no valuable information at all.” Ebisu explained, “You may not open the scroll your team is given until you are inside of the forest. If you do so before that time, you will sorely regret it…”

“The Forest of Death is a challenging place to navigate. The vegetation is dense and dark, with many plants that are both safe and unsafe to consume. There are wild beasts of sizes and shapes that can put you mortal peril, but there is also an abundance of fresh water to drink and safe places to rest. Those with adequate skill will not falter here, and those with exceptional skill can move on to the Third Stage in less than 24 hours.” Ebisu estimated, “Before this stage, each team must sign a waiver at the registry tent. You will not hold the managers or associated providers of the Chunin Exam responsible for any injury you sustain beyond this point.”

He tapped his chin thoughtfully, “Oh, and lastly, bear in mind you must enter the tower before five days pass. If you cannot do that you will fail. I ought to mention that you may not enter the tower by using any of the doors or windows, or rather…you’ll find that impossible.”

Many of the Genin gaped at the warning, perplexed with how they were supposed to succeed.

“Very good.” Ebisu clapped and then pointed to the tent, “Line up and provide your signatures. You will receive a scroll and be assigned a gate to report to. When the buzzer sounds you will be permitted to enter the Forest. Good luck!”

All of the teams began moving again.

‘Neji seems...more enthusiastic than usual.’ Tenten thought to herself as the de facto leader lead the way to the tent to sign away their lives. ‘I bet it’s because he’s focused on Stage Three, and all the rest of this is redundant.’

She turned to Lee who was behind her in line, “What do you think, Lee? Did any of that proctor’s
“I wonder if maybe the scrolls we are given will tell us more. We are allowed to read them, this time.” He answered, “I was prepared to come to the Forest of Death, so I am not in the least concerned.”

“Me neither.”

Each team that signed up was then ushered along by supervisors and sent to the far reaches of the perimeter fence. Neji lead them around the circle to Gate 6. They had a brief discussion of who should keep the scroll to open and assess it. Neji would need to concentrate on looking out for other teams and threats, Tenten wanted her hands free for fighting, and so Lee volunteered to take it. He could still make use of his legendary kicks while he read the scroll, if need be.

It took longer than expected for each team to be situated at their respective gates. Team Gai waited calmly until the horn of the fence-mounted megaphones blared and the access points rolled open. They rushed inside with Neji at the head.

Lee dutifully opened the scroll and kept up as his team ascended to the tree tops, moving towards the center of the thick wood.

Lee’s voice carried a tone of concern as he observed the parchment, “I would like to ask you two a question…”

“What?” Neji growled back toward him.

“What do you suppose a dummy-scroll is? Something that lacks…information? Sense?” Lee held up the scroll to them as they halted on a branch.

The paper was adorned with whimsical, six-year-old scribble drawings in delightful crayon colors.
"Of course, it is very important to be sober when you take an exam. Many worthwhile careers in the street-cleansing, fruit-picking and subway-guitar-playing industries have been founded on a lack of understanding of this simple fact." — Terry Pratchett

"Now, just to be clear." Tsunade rapped her red nails on a tabletop, "You are all cleaning this disaster up."

Sai nodded, wholly unperturbed from his place at a work table. He was eating a lunch of grilled fish from a carry-out box. Tenzo was across the table from him, working out a hand cramp before he too could take a break and eat with chopsticks.

"Thanks for all of your help, gentlemen." The Hokage smiled, "I would have hired someone else to make the clues for the Second Stage of the exam, but it would have been expensive. The framework didn't leave much for a labor budget."

Tenzo returned her smile tiredly, "We are always happy to provide you with cheap, part-time labor, Hokage-sama."

"I know. It's your honor and privilege. Can you believe the Sealing Corps clerks wanted double-time for this project? Pff."

"They allowed us to use this work room for free." Sai noted.

"Yes, so long as they didn't have to help." Tsunade snickered, "That's a criticism I'll save for the next administrative meeting."

The Hokage stood by watching as Tenzo and Sai began their lunch.

Across the room, Ebisu's new Genin students were struggling with winding up scrolls that had spilled from a shelf. Long lengths of blank parchment crisscrossed the floor as the children scrambled to clean up the mess. All manner of art supplies, childish and professional, still covered the work table. Tsunade figured clean-up for a Chunin Exam-related project was worthy of a D-Rank mission.

"I wonder why you called me in to help at the last minute, Hokage-sama." Tenzo mused while he chewed, "Sai was perfectly capable of drawing clues for every team, don't you think?"

"That's the point." Tsunade folded her arms and sighed, "Anyone would trust this. I don't need ninja who blindly accept what they are told and then march to their deaths. Likewise, I don't want ninja who assume important info, no matter its source, is worthless."

"I agree that each team should be able to make critical decisions like that." Tenzo frowned to himself, "But...why ask me to draw these clues?"
"You're the most miserable excuse for an artist I know!" Tsunade cheered, "No one will trust the junk you drew! Even if it is accurate, your work, Tenzo, is the most abominable thing I have ever seen."

His head bowed in shame above his lunch box. Sai felt a strange tingle of what could be the fabled feeling "humor" and it widened his smile just a bit.

"Now, now, don't feel bad." Tsunade attempted a bit of sympathy, "That's why I wanted you to work on this. It serves a purpose. Just the other day I had my own personal example of this sort of thing. I had no idea if I should or shouldn't take the word of a tiny old woman that Rock Lee brought into my office…but if I ignored her testimony I might've regretted it." She rubbed her chin as she remembered, "That lady did have a strong odor about her. Like curry."

"So a person who has an unpleasant odor is considered untrustworthy, by common standards?" Sai was looking for a teachable moment.

"No. Not necessarily." Tsunade replied, "It just makes it difficult to stand by and listen properly."

The socially inept ninja nodded in understanding.

"When you finish eating and cleaning up here," The Hokage went on, "I would appreciate it if you two reported to the Tower Passage next. As you know, that is the hidden route that Jounin chaperones take to enter the tower in the Forest of Death and observe preliminary matches. Please make sure it's clear before tomorrow morning." She fussed at the sleeve of her jacket, "I have to send Shikamaru through there tomorrow and he specified he doesn't want to see any garbage or cobwebs."

"Yes ma'am." They answered in unison.

"Good. Now I'm off to ask Shizune how the First Stage went." Tsunade turned towards the door and then called back to the Genin, "Oh! Konohamaru and friends."

Konohamaru and his teammates, Moegi and Udon, stood bolt upright when they were addressed, "Yes, Tsunade-sama?"

"When you finish cleaning here please come to my office for your next assignment." The Hokage smiled, "I'm going to keep you all busy today."

It was early afternoon on the same day that the Second Stage of the exam had commenced.

On a lofty branch in the canopy of the Forest of Death, Hinata stood sandwiched between Sato and Shino as they examined the scroll they had been given. The girl grimaced and then rested her eyes, reporting, "There is nothing revealed that I can see with my Byakugan. I'm sorry."

Shino added, "My insects have confirmed it as well. There is nothing unusual about this scroll." Kikaichu insects retreated from the parchment and back into the young man's sleeve.

"Then it's for certain," Sato concluded quietly, "This scroll…is useless."

And that was because it was completely blank. Clean, white, and unmarked.

Sato's expression was the most foolish-looking, dubious frown that had ever graced his face. He was thinking on it. Hinata and Shino were also deliberating in silence about their plight.
After rushing into the dark woods to begin the next phase of the test, the team had never suspected that they would be unfortunate enough to get a dummy-scroll. Moreover, that they would have no information whatsoever to guide them on how to enter an entry-less tower.

"We could... just go there." Sato proposed hesitantly, "March right up to the building and figure out why no one can supposedly get inside. Right?"

"That is far too reckless and would waste time." Shino disagreed, "Is it important to learn what kind of impediment stands between teams and the tower? Of course it is. But the answer will be in a scroll. It is better to find a clue before we go anywhere."

"We will have to take a scroll from another team." Hinata deduced.

"Looks like we've got no choice." The Hatake folded his arms behind his head, "Maybe there's a better way to do this so that we don't squander time." He looked sidelong to Shino, "Why don't you have your insects look around? I'll send some owls towards the tower to see if they spot anything of consequence."

Shino nodded silently.

"There could be a key or password that we need to collect before we can enter." Hinata wondered aloud, "We would not want to miss a detail that could be out here beneath our noses."

"In the meantime, we will track another team." Shino reminded them as he loosed a small cloud of insects. They scattered in all directions to begin reconnaissance of the forest.

Sato summoned two pint-size screech owls, Aree and Aroo, and asked them to kindly scout ahead for obstructions. After the birds took off, both young men looked at Hinata expectantly.

She activated her Blood Limit before about-facing, bracing herself against the trunk of the tree with her hand. Hinata frowned to herself as she scanned around.

"The team of Sand ninja is about half a kilometer away from us." She reported, "But there is a team even closer than that. We should move to the southeast, ahead about 90 meters, and then wait. They will pass right by us."

"They're in for an early surprise..." Sato chuckled, "What village are they from?"

"Hidden Grass. They all have the same color hair." Hinata tapped her chin thoughtfully, "Maybe they are siblings?"

"Good. In the event they also possess a dummy-scroll, we should bear in mind that another ambush may be required in the future." Shino advised, "We need to conserve our energy and gather as much information as possible."

They all agreed that is was the best course of action. Hinata lead the way as she leaped into the leafy thicket towards the bowels of the forest.

On the far, opposite side of the wide circular enclosure, Sakura's team was also formulating a plan. They had stopped in a tight clearing hedged by overgrown hawthorn shrubs. The team's scroll was laid flat on the ground as all three shinobi looked it over. Akamaru sat in dutiful quiet beside them.

"I would just like to say that this brushwork is amazing." Tama was the first to speak.
"Yeah, it looks like something out of the books my grandpa keeps in his study." Kiba noted, "Old school."

Sakura's eyes scanned critically over the black ink drawings. After a few minutes of silence she stood cupping her chin, deriving the meaning, if any, of the traditional forest scene.

"At first glance this means nothing." She began softly, "Going on what we already know; that we're going to have problems getting into the tower, we could assume that this may be a clue for a scavenger hunt or something like that. We would possibly need to locate an item or key to get us inside. That's what we're supposed to think." Sakura pointed a finger skyward when she announced, "But I can personally vouch for that being completely wrong."

Tama and Kiba stared at her in bewilderment.

"The second proctor made it clear we would find it impossible to get inside the tower by traditional means." Sakura went on, "And I know Tsunade-sama would not want a test to be something as obvious as a dime-a-dozen scavenger hunt. I'm confident that there is zero chance of us getting into the tower. I don't know if they physically eliminated the doors, or if they put up a barrier we can't take down, but it isn't going to happen. It is impossible."

"What are you saying? We were warned that anyone who doesn't get inside fails!" Kiba reminded her.

"Right," Sakura smiled, "That's why we won't try to enter the tower the way we normally would. We're going someplace else. Look here." She lifted up the scroll and brought their attention to the drawing.

The illustration was set in a forest, framed by tall trees. The tiny body of a person was juxtaposed to the massive body of a burrowing centipede, which was proportionately the size of a train. The locations of the tower and sun above, in the drawing, gave a reference of space and location. To the 'east' of the giant bug was a curtain of dense jungle vines dotted with flowers and kunai.

"This wants us to find a huge bug, from what I can tell." Kiba surmised grimly, "I'm not really going for it."

"The clues here will at least help us find it." Tama noted optimistically, "But after that."

"I have a hunch." Sakura assured them, "Wherever this thing lives is probably the back door that we want. It has to be a way in...or an alternative arena for the next stage, whatever the case may be." She angled the scroll to catch light filtering down through the treetops, turning about twenty degrees west of their position, "Let's start looking for our hints."

Tenten stood across from Neji and Lee, who were shoulder-to-shoulder and examining their odd scroll. She was not one prone to overreacting to things the way her teammates were. Neji had taken personal offense to a scroll so poorly illustrated and lacking sense. Lee, on the other hand, was disappointed and quietly trying to interpret anything that could be gleaned from their clue.

"There is nothing relevant in this." Neji determined firmly, "We cannot use it."

"Neji, try not to be hasty." Lee chided, pointing out details on the parchment, "These forms on the ground and hanging upside down from tree branches, are most certainly human bodies. Notice how they appear to be the meal of this large, hunch-backed bear. This is a rock formation and these are pine trees, see? Distinct."
"You are advocating for a clue that suggests we sacrifice ourselves to a bear that stands four stories tall."

"Well, I do not condone the suggestion so much as the clarity of what we are looking at." Lee illuminated.

TenTen had her arms folded and watched in silence as the young men had a tense but harmless argument. She turned their situation over in her mind and tried to be objective about it. Neji was being completely subjective, judging the content of the scroll, deeming it unreliable based on appearance and crudeness. Lee was abstaining completely from forming an opinion, but was reluctant to cast aside what they had been given.

"Can you two stop analyzing that for a second?" She asked, finally making eye contact with them. "Thank you. You're both trying to establish the value of what we've been given. The problem is that it may only be a matter of opinion. What if there are other teams worse off than us?"

Neji nearly contested the notion but stayed silent, humoring the idea.

"Do you think we should take the time to find out, TenTen?" Lee asked, "To compare what we have against the scroll of another team?"

"That could work, but what if they have the exact same clue that we do? I'm just saying that before we decide to waste time, maybe we should pretend we have exactly what we need and go from there." She took a crack at pragmatism, "The worst thing a team could receive...is it nothing? Or maybe a childish or deceptive clue? We are being tested on how we judge information."

Neji took a moment to reflect on how she had indirectly labeled him a "poor judge." That was an accurate description, at least for now. Maybe he was a bit too wound up about proceeding to the final stage that he was far less aware of the present. He exhaled softly and then turned to Lee, who seemed to be in favor of TenTen's idea.

"I think we should trust what we have been given." Lee agreed, "At least until we learn more. Although, I do not think this clue makes it clear why we cannot enter the tower."

"Maybe we aren't supposed to know that yet." TenTen came to a stop beside them to look at the illustration, "Yeah...this is pretty bad. What is that behind the bear?"

"It could be..." Lee stopped himself. The mound behind the beast in the picture, drawn with suspicious amounts of brown crayon, could pass for either stone or fecal matter.

"More than likely it is a land formation or cave." Neji interjected, "The next course of action should be to find this place. The information that we need could be there."

"Or it could be nothing...or not even exist." TenTen smiled, "But chances are that we'll come across something that resembles this."

Before Lee closed the scroll he memorized the pictures, finally forming a complaint about it, "I doubt we will see bodies or human flesh that is blue like this...though I imagine that was creative license."

Sakura was cross with herself that after traveling most of the afternoon with her team, they had more than likely gone off course. She had stopped to re-affirm their route based on the position of the tower and giant insect in the drawing. Cardinal directions were barely evident, but she had made some educated guesses.
"I thought we might have found it by now." The pink haired girl muttered.

"Don't worry about it, Sakura-chan. I don't think we really believed it could happen that fast. It is a pretty big forest." Kiba crouched down, "This was probably skewed a bit. Could have been northwest, actually."

"It's just a bit farther. We've covered a lot of ground." Tama passed around a canteen of water, "And there haven't been any incidents."

Sakura knocked on the bark of a tree to prevent her friend from jinxing it, "I'm glad about that…but the longer we're out here the more likely we are to run into other teams."

From the portion of sky visible from a break in the tree tops, sunset was hastening into night.

"Now may not be a bad time to make camp. We can try again in the morning when we have the light again." Kiba suggested, "Let me and Akamaru scent around to make sure it's clear, and then we can eat and get some rest."

While Kiba and his niniken prowled off to make sure they were alone in their section of wilderness, Sakura and Tama rustled up twigs and kindling for a fire. The two girls also concurred that some mushrooms they discovered were perfectly safe to eat. Sakura playfully nudged the older kunoichi as they foraged.

"Even when we're all the way out here, Sato managed to say hello." She grinned at Tama, "That was adorable."

"He didn't send those owls specifically to find me." Tama replied, fighting a small smile.

"I'm sure he didn't, but he'll be happy to know that you're safe and well during your first time in the Forest of Death." Sakura imagined, "When those little guys swooped down and landed on you…I almost screamed. And I don't startle easily."

"Me too. But they're so soft and they just nuzzled my cheeks." At the memory, Tama held her face, "Aree and Aroo are his cutest birds, by far. I like when he sends them."

"For what?"

"Sometimes Sato will send me a message from across town, before we go out somewhere." She explained, "They come straight to my window."

"Aw!"

"Sakura-chan, please. You should see how enthusiastic he is about things he used to have no appetite for." Tama restrained her laughter, "Sato shops and cooks now. I think I eat more frequently with him than my own family these days. He asks to go with me when I have somewhere to be. He even got his own membership with the dance studio too. Though, he prefers to wait for classes to let out so it's just him and me."

"Hmm. Sato certainly is more involved than he used to be." Sakura observed shrewdly, "Does Sato ever, you know...sneak over?"

Her cheeks reddened.

"Oh, so he does."
"Sakura! We don't do anything..." Tama relented and said, "Like that. I don't go too far because...I really do want to wait. You know what Uncle Gai and my parents are like. Honor is at the core of their mantra, and I guess I can't deny that I'm the same way."

"There's nothing wrong with that." Her friend assured her as she located a new patch of mushrooms.

"It's still hard to believe that Sato finally...noticed. You know? It took a while, but he looks at me now and suddenly he wants to touch and kiss." She sighed, "It's such a relief. I was afraid that he would never want me that way."

"Of course he would, he just needed some time to grow up a little." Sakura acknowledged with a nod, "From what Ino tells me, most of the boys our age are that way now. And try to remember." She gestured at Tama from top to bottom, "Sato does have one of the most beautiful women in this village to go home to. As dumb as he can be sometimes, I'll bet he at least realized that."

"Thanks, Sakura-chan."

Sakura stopped and handed off the mushrooms she had collected to Tama. She ran her hand over the spindly green top of a plant before pulling up a super-large scallion from the ground. "Ah! Who wants a wild onion for dinner?" The pink haired girl draped the plant over her shoulders as they walked back to the thicket.

The two girls settled on the spongy forest floor, careful not to sit and flatten wild orchids. Before any preparations, they agreed to wait for Kiba's "all clear" first. The woods grew dimmer as the last sliver of a magenta sun surrendered to the blanket of night.

"I'm really happy for you." Sakura spoke quietly to her friend, "I know you've been waiting for Sato. You're in love with him."

Tama tucked her chin to her chest, smiling again, "I am. I'm much happier than I was. Things are so much better now."

"I can tell." Sakura shrugged so that the giant onion stalk slid from her shoulder, "I try not to talk about you and Sato in front of Kiba."

There was a silence as Tama gave the girl a strange look, her dark eyebrows furrowed, "Why not? I know that Kiba-kun doesn't really get along with-"

"Don't worry about it!" Sakura covered her tracks, surprised that Tama lacked even a faint inkling of how Kiba felt.

After a sharp rustle of foliage, Akamaru came bounding out of the darkness. The happy dog circled the girls twice before laying down between them. Kiba appeared after a moment, "Looks and smells good. I set up a couple of traps, too."

Sakura and Tama greeted him and dropped their findings, setting up a space for rest with near automatic motions.

"You found some things to eat too? Akamaru helped me dig up some potatoes." Kiba contributed four spuds to the pile, "We're pretty lucky this time around!"

"Oh!" Tama was intrigued, "You two never really told me what it was like during your first Chunin Exam."

Kiba exchanged a wordless glance with Sakura as he helped arrange twigs and kindling for a fire.
The pink haired girl smiled tiredly when she turned to the other kunoichi.

"It was...a good experience, in some respects. It also had its low points," Sakura conceded, "We always hesitate to tell you about the time Sasuke was with our team. But if you're really interested in knowing, I see no problem with telling you what it was like."

"I would like to know." Tama confirmed.

"Well then," Kiba skewered the potatoes on pointed sticks, "At first it was great. When we started the Second Stage, which was also in the Forest of Death the last time...Sasuke was a thoughtful leader. We worked very well together." He chuckled darkly to himself, "I think we were all feeling pretty confident after we promptly collected a Heaven and an Earth scroll."

Sakura used a breath of flame to light a fire and then sat back. She rested her arms on her knees when she spoke, "But that Exam coincided with the Invasion, if you remember, Tama. Orochimaru was already here in the forest. From what I know, he was trying to test Sasuke...but he tormented all of us. He burned our Heaven Scroll. He threatened to kill us. We were too scared to move." She corrected herself sheepishly, "Actually, I was too scared. Kiba somehow got his nerve back and so did Sasuke."

"I didn't put up much of a fight." Kiba recalled glumly, "Sasuke nearly did, before that freak bit him on the neck."

Tama gasped, "So that's how it was!"

"Not like it helped any," Sakura remarked scornfully, "After the Exam he drove our team straight into the ground and disgraced us all."

"It's not like he intended to make us suffer." Kiba defended as he watched the potatoes and mushrooms crisp over the fire.

"Kiba, he was unable to empathize with us. He was so obsessed with his own suffering and getting even with Itachi, that he was utterly incapable of seeing how much we were hurting." Sakura wrung her hands as she spoke, "I could have died trying to follow him when he left. You could have died on the Retrieval Mission; any of our friends could have! He was never sorry about the damage he caused as long as it meant he could get revenge."

In dead quiet, the teammates avoided each other's gazes uncomfortably. Tama removed the food from the fire and distributed it, "It was very hard for you both. I wish you didn't have to go through that pain and doubt when you were desperately trying to be his friend."

Kiba's wane smile was illuminated by firelight, "You are a much better friend than he ever was. You've only ever tried to help us feel better, like we're a real team." He looked at her with sincerity,
"Thanks for everything, Tama. You make things so much easier."

Sakura nodded in agreement, "I couldn't be more grateful that you're here, it's true. Sorry to make you listen to all of this...but I prefer if you knew what it was like. Why you're so important to us."

"Thank you. But I know he's still a part of you, even if he's hurt you and Kiba. When Sasuke comes back I hope that you'd accept him as your true teammate." Tama requested, "He's going to need friends when he returns. He'll need you both."

Sakura shook her head solemnly, "He's not a true teammate. That's the problem. We'll always care about him, but I honestly don't know what I would do or say if he ever came back." Her breath trembled as she exhaled, "All I can ask for is that he never hurts anyone again. Except for maybe his brother, I won't ever let it happen. I won't let him."

"Tama, I think we want you to stay. Permanently." Kiba clarified, "If Sasuke does come back to Konoha he probably wouldn't even have the clearance to participate on a team or missions. I'd try to help him, but I know nothing would ever be the same."

"I see." Tama murmured. She blew on the potato before taking a bite.

They ate dinner and talked about happier things, or rather, the subjects Sakura was most comfortable with. She clammed up and nearly had a bout of depressed introspection, but Sakura snapped herself out of it and marveled at what an incredible listener Tama was. They reduced the fire to a low smolder of cinders and then huddled up to sleep.

With Tama at the left, Sakura settled between her and Kiba in the cover of darkness. Akamaru had stretched out at their feet, only half-alert to the sounds of the woods. After a length of time passed, only Tama was able to fall asleep. Kiba spoke softly to Sakura.

"He really was sorry." Kiba assured her, "When I saw Sasuke in the Lightning Country...I could tell that if he had the chance to save either of us, he would."

"No he won't. He would leave us high and dry again."

"Sakura, he will." Kiba pressed, "I think I reminded him that he can't do it all alone."

"I don't want to talk about him anymore." Sakura lowered her voice, "Go to sleep, Kiba-kun."

And somehow they slept.

At an unknowable, pre-dawn hour, Aroo the screech owl returned by himself. He landed beside Tama's head and fussied at strands of her hair until she stirred. She was not waking quickly. Determined, the owl hobbled ungracefully over the forest floor and arrived at Akamaru's muzzle. Aroo nudged the dog and then proceeded to walk across the large canine's body like it was a bridge. The owl thought it important to inform the group that a shinobi was watching them from the bushes.

Akamaru roused in time to hear the near inaudible crunch of a footstep, and with a murderous growl, alerted his human companions to the danger. There was a piercing screech before Aroo darted into the undergrowth and hooked his taloned feet onto the face of a lurking Genin.

"Wuh-holy-shi-!" A rustle and crash followed, "Get offa meee!"

By then Kiba was fully awake. In elegant synchronization, he was flanked by his two teammates as they dove into the tangle of ferns and orchids beside their campsite. They quickly apprehended the foolish spy who hoped to take advantage of a sleeping team.

He collapsed to the ground with a bloody face, and the young Genin sputtered his surrender.

"I just don't know what we're supposed to do!" The Rain ninja raised his hands submissively, "My teammates and I have never been in a Chunin Exam before, and our scroll was blank…we split up to find someone else's."

"You picked the wrong someone. I'll break your legs." Kiba warned, grasping the collar of the ninja's shirt in his fist, "We have done this before and we eat newbies like you for breakfast."

"It's almost time for breakfast now." Tama pointed out innocently, "I just mean that it's morning. Oh. No, we'd never eat a person!"

"Please let me go." The Rain ninja peeped, "I barely got out of a fight last night…and I've got no chakra left. I've got nothing."

"He's full of it." Sakura chuckled, "I can tell he's perfectly healthy. He's just wasting time so his teammates can catch up to ambush us."

"Look for another team's scroll if you're having bad luck." Kiba told him, "But you won't get anywhere by challenging us." With fearsome strength, he hurled the chirping wimp of a shinobi into the thorny tangle of a juniper bush.

The Genin wailed as he retreated.

Kiba then elected that they should get going since they were already wide awake. Orange light began to saturate the dim edges of the forest. Akamaru was happy to receive praise for his quick reaction, and wagged his tail wildly as they began another trek. Aroo remained perched on Tama's shoulder.

"I think…Sato wanted Aroo to watch over us. Aroo must've told him that he found our team." The girl surmised.

"What a guy." Kiba grumbled.

"I couldn't be happier that he did that." Sakura folded her hands in thanks, "Thank you, cutie pie! We might have been robbed in our sleep!"

"Akamaru would have stopped him." Kiba insisted, patting the dog's head.

At daybreak, they continued on a northerly route through the forest.

By the shreds of light infiltrating the Forest of Death, Team Kurenai would occasionally stop and read the new scroll they had absconded with. They had to confirm their position a few times before feeling confident in the direction they had chosen. In order to obtain the clue, the team forsook sleep and hunted by night for unsuspecting Genin.

The triplet siblings from Kusagakure that Hinata spotted had somehow, purely by accident, eluded them until nightfall. In the darkness, the youngsters woke with shrill, petrified screams to find Kikaichu insects clambering over them to feast on chakra. Hinata and Shino both had identified the brother rolling in the dirt as the carrier of the team's scroll. Sato pounced on him and ruffled the ginger's hair as he pulled the scroll from the Grass nin's hip pouch, "Sorry, Carrot-Top!"
Sato leapt away in the dark, and the Grass team tottered around the clearing in bug-covered distress, unable to do anything about the theft. The Leaf team put considerable distance between themselves and their victims before examining the scroll they had taken.

"This looks about right." Sato murmured as he rolled it open, "Huh. Kinda looks like what Sai paints."

Hinata blinked at him curiously, "Who is Sai?"

"Oh yeah! I forgot to tell you guys that I have a new neighbor. He's an entry-level ANBU agent, but you didn't hear that from me. It's supposed to be classified." The Hatake rambled, "Shino, do you remember when Lee and Neji were talking about their artistic, obnoxious, substitute team mate? This is the guy! He really is that bad."

"I recall." Shino stated as he slipped his glasses up the bridge of his nose.

"Yeah," Sato turned back to Hinata, "He' adapting. You should meet Sai sometime, Sunshine. I'm trying to help expose him to nice people. He may say weird things, though."

She clasped her hands in thought, "Maybe after the exam."

"You've digressed." Shino warned Sato, "What is on the scroll?"

"Oh, uh...it's still kind of dark."

The three of them squinted to get a look. Picturesque trees and deer in the scene surrounded a large circle with markings. Eventually, they agreed it was a clock. It seemed completely out of place in the wilderness. Something seemed off about the circle and its symbols. A tiny, ink footprint was just below ten o'clock.

"Ha! I'm stumped." Sato laughed, "What is this supposed to mean?"

Hinata accepted the scroll when he handed it off to her. She pursed her lips and deliberated, "Its meaning could be figurative or literal."

"It is literal." Shino confirmed simply. His team mates gave him surprised looks.

"Rather, it's physical. The main arm of that clock is sloped and there is a shadow beside it, so one can infer that it is set by the time of day." Shino went on, "A sundial. Why should we expect it to be physical? Someone has stepped on it." They looked back to the footprint in the drawing, "We will find one in the forest somewhere."

"And when we find it...maybe the time of day reflected on it will tell us something important." Hinata tried to build on the idea.

"Perhaps." Shino agreed.

"Then it's a good thing we're getting started at dawn. If that thing goes by the height of the sun, then there's a chance we might miss something and need to wait for the next morning." Sato observed, and he wilted as he added, "But that means...we'll be awake for a whole day again..."

Hinata sighed softly in disappointment, "It may not be wise to rest even when we need it. At night we can, but until then we have to search."

"We can rest inside the tower." Shino asserted.
"You really think we're going to get there that quick?" Sato snickered, "Shino if I gave you a whip I'd bet you'd crack it at us!"

Shino said nothing while he and Hinata giggled. Just then, Aree landed on Sato's head.

"Hey girl." He held out his arm for her, "Where's your brother?"

The tiny owl hooted as it perched on his sleeve.

"No way! Tama's team? Good!" Sato nodded happily and held a conversation with the bird.

Hinata whispered sidelong to Shino, "How does Sato-kun understand?"

"He doesn't."

Somehow, the language gap was a non-issue. Sato had learned that Aroo was escorting Tama and her team, that Aree had witnessed several nasty fights, and had even learned that a high-level barrier was surrounding the tower and preventing anyone and everything from getting within five meters of it. As she was the inquisitive type, Aree tested it by dropping a rock on the barrier and watched it bounce off. She turned back to find Sato after that.

"I think he does understand." Hinata whispered.

Sato let Aree glimpse their scroll, "Seen any areas with deer or a sundial? That's where we're headed."

The owl tooted an affirmative and then took off.

"Alright then," Sato spun on his heel and ushered his team mates along, "We may be tired, but at least we know where to go!"

They started out strong, but as the morning wore on and they followed the bird zipping through leaves and bramble, the lack of sleep began to catch up with them. For fear of exhausting herself, Hinata only used her blood limit sparingly. At one point during the hike, Shino asked them to halt and take cover.

A coat-tail of moss that hung over a toppled tree concealed the Leaf team briefly as they watched a trio of Dream ninja race by. They also appeared to be searching for something.

"Hmf, looks like they got some rest..." Sato muttered enviously, "They're hauling ass in that armor of theirs."

"A confrontation with that team would have been unfavorable." Shino noted, "Once they are out of range we can continue."

Aree waited patiently until it was clear again, and then pressed on to guide her shinobi companions.

By noon, Shino estimated that the owl had brought them a quarter-way down from their position in the circular forest. They were standing exactly halfway between from the surrounding fence and where the central tower was located.

Although the deer from the drawing were nowhere in sight, the owl did deliver them to a clearing that was ringed with pine trees. A huge and conspicuous sundial was fitted to the ground. The team took a moment to catch their breath. Aree flitted from Sato's shoulder into the underbrush after a mouse.
"So now what?" Sato rested his hands on his hips.

They walked around the circumference of the time installation, which was about five meters wide. The thing was littered with pine needles and cones, dirty and weathered, as if it had sat there untouched for decades. The noon shadow was nearly at its peak.

Shino allowed a few Kikaichu insects to explore and see what they could learn about such an oddity.

"I don't see the point of something like this being all the way out here in the wilderness." Sato announced as he began to sweep debris off of the sundial with his foot.

"It isn't something that would be especially helpful to Genin." Hinata agreed, "But surely it was put here for a purpose."

"Genin are not the only ones who enter the Forest of Death." Shino reminded them.

"Well yeah, Kakashi did say that Jounin are permitted to come here whenever they want. They can train and participate in secret drills." Sato folded his arms, "Do they use this thing?"

"Maybe...but sundials only stay in one place and are not extremely accurate with time." Hinata added.

"This one is." Shino noticed, "It has been maintained, possibly reset this past spring."

"Why bother?" Sato gruffed as he began walking around the circle again.

Hinata observed the fixture with her Byakugan, hoping to rule out the possibility of hidden messages. Instead she saw an off-center hole hidden beneath the stone slab. It provided an entrance to a dark space far below ground, which, she could only assume, was a place they ought to get to. There was a track beneath the sundial that facilitated the movement of a hidden door. Finding the means to open it would be their next goal.

"There is a passageway beneath it." Hinata reported, "But I am not sure how the door opens."

"Whoa! This thing has got some inner cogs or something?" Sato was excited.

"A few of them." She concluded her analysis, "I think we'll need to move the arm."

They gathered around to look for grooves and other structural hints. After brushing aside a blanket of pine needles they discovered divots in the stone. From what they could tell, they would need to push the sloped gnomon arm from its position at twelve towards ten. That detail had also been alluded to in the scroll, as they recalled the footprint at that position.

Sadly, the gnomon would not budge. It trembled and resisted with a squeaking whine. Hinata puffed tiredly after pushing on it. She backed away to let the two young men ram it with their combined strength, but the arm stood unfazed. Frustrated, Sato wrestled with it for a short time before giving up. Shino inquisitively poked around the decorative support bar beneath the gnomon.

He decided to pull it loose just as Sato leaned back to rest on the arm. Abruptly, the narrow appendage collapsed without its support, and it fell almost flush into a groove on the stone face. Sato landed hard and bumped the back of his head.

"Shino...would it kill you to warn me?" He pouted up at his friend.

"It will move now." The Aburame assured them.
"Everything lined up!" Hinata confirmed, stealing a peak at the mechanism below with her Byakugan.

Hopeful once again, Sato rolled over and got a grip on the exposed tip of the arm. Slowly, it slid with a squeak towards "ten" as he pushed it. A grating sound of stone rumbled behind them, and Hinata and Shino turned to watch a quarter of the sundial slip aside to reveal the passage below.

"Phew!" Sato stood up and wiped his brow, "Secret Jounin tunnel!"

Hinata peeked over the edge into the absolute dark that lay underground.

"I will be able to see very little." She admitted, "There are no torches or overhead lights."

"I'll give us some light." Sato assured her. He turned to his best friend with a grin, "So Shino, why don't you lead the way? I bet there's nothing down there that can scare you."

Without a word, Shino plunged into the hatch without a second thought.

Team Gai was mildly discouraged. After doing a sweep of a whole third of the Forest of Death, their search yielded nothing. By nightfall they had stopped to hunt and gather food. Near the bank of a stream, Lee had constructed a lean-to with some assistance from Tenten.

They built a fire and tried to look on the bright side. While they had not found a single crumb of a hint that related to their scroll's drawing, the team was in good health. They'd had no encounters with other teams or perils of the forest. It had been rather boring, actually.

By evening of the first day, Neji's frustration had been made clear by his sharp comments and frantic, scowling survey of each area they passed through. Lee counteracted his negativity with suggestions and cheerfulness, and Tenten had made a few attempts at optimism before she went quiet for the rest of the day. Neither Neji nor Lee understood what Tenten's silence was about.

That night as they ate grilled fish off a fire, Lee asked how she was feeling.

"I just lost confidence in our group today, that's all. It seemed like every time I made a suggestion, at least after the idea I had this morning…I was ignored every time." Tenten replied bluntly, "The both of you sometimes…I don't know. You go into this frenzy. Like you couldn't waste a single second in order to find the way ahead! You both try to solve a problem while practically orbiting each other."

Neji and Lee exchanged a bemused glance.

"You need to learn how to back off and breathe; the both of you." She scolded, "And try listening to me more. We might have found that stupid bear if you took some of what I said into consideration."

"Please know that I am very sorry." Lee apologized sincerely from his seat, bowing slightly, "I never meant to exclude you, Tenten!"

"It's alright."

Neji looked at her with the same expression he always wore when he believed he was not at fault. But slowly the reality sunk in. He was aware that Tenten had been trying to communicate with him since the start; that he was not behaving nearly up to the standard she expected. He was back to his irritable, hair-trigger ways. He sighed heavily. It was Neji's hope that he had vastly improved since the previous exam, and even if he had, his attitude certainly hadn't. Tenten would not let it stand.
"Your input will not be ignored again." Neji promised her.

Even when he said it, she still looked severely annoyed. Tenten chomped on skewered fish and made no effort to talk to him.

As the night grew deeper, Neji had the distinct feeling that Tenten had taken his behavior personally. She responded to Lee when he discussed a plan of action, but her shoulders were tightly shrugged and her mouth pursed. If he'd had some foresight, Neji may have curbed his cynicism a bit more to avoid his girlfriend's disapproval. Never mind that he could not afford to have poor team communication at a time like this; he had actively been trying to please Tenten and become closer to her. But her having to spend the whole day with a pessimist had probably curdled the romance, he guessed. It was quite the stumble on his part.

When it was time to sleep, leaves and moss had been arranged beneath the lean-to as a cushion. Lee dozed off with ease. At the center of their huddle, Neji laid flat on his back and stopped thinking about the Second Stage for the first time in eight hours. He turned his head slightly to the left where Tenten was bunched in a ball. Her weapon-scroll and sword were piled beside her and within reach, in case of an attack.

He looked at her like that for a while and felt calmer. Neji reached out and touched her back.

She grunted in annoyance at him.

He replied quietly, "I know that I disappointed you."

"Well that's good." She snarked.

"I won't continue to." Neji added helpfully, "Since the Second Stage began I have been thinking too far ahead. I've been impatient." His hand relocated to her side, "Before the exam began you could already tell that I wasn't concentrating enough, and you tried to warn me."

"I did." Tenten agreed.

Neji shut his eyes and said, "I will only listen to you from here on out."

She rolled over, surprised, "Uh." She felt his head, "Are you well?"

"I will be. Tomorrow you can expect better from me."

"I think I already knew tomorrow would be easier, it's just…don't worry too much, Neji. I understand. I know what's going on in your head." Tenten said quietly.

He nodded and then stretched out his arm. She got the idea and shifted over to rest there, closer to him.

"I didn't like what you did before."

"What? When I wouldn't talk?" Tenten smiled slightly, "To you?"

"That." Neji confirmed, pulling her closer.

"I was only a little mad. I would have gotten over it."

"I don't want to make you feel that way." His voice was the softest she had ever heard it. Neji's mouth was level with her forehead, touching the cool metal of her hitai-ate.
"I know, and I don't want to make you upset either. Especially not out here." Tenten acknowledged, "And remember we've been much, much angrier at each other in the past...on some occasions. Those were knockout fights."

Oh, of course he remembered those. The biggest fight had been over Hinata, after the previous Chunin Exam. His poor treatment of his younger cousin had incensed Tenten, resulting in a violent duel and then a furious reprimand from Gai.

Neji carefully slipped up her headband and kissed the skin there. He was sorry. He would always be sorry about that. How Tenten had been completely right about Hinata, about standing up for her, and Neji was entirely insulted that she had not sided with him instead.

He felt her fingertips trace the side of his face, and her other hand pressed into the warmth of his shirt. She murmured indistinctly before fitting her lips to his. Neji only remembered kissing her for a long while before falling asleep.

At dawn, Lee shook them awake. He had found his teammates entwined and snoring softly.

"Neji! Tenten! It is light out and I think we should spend as much time as possible on our search." He had a hand on each of their shoulders, "Please wake up and try not to fight today."

Tenten raised her head up, fussing at the crust in the corners of her eyes, "Lee...of course. We won't fight, promise."

"Neji is squeezing you." Lee observed innocently.

"I know. I think he'll be in a better mood today." She pried her boyfriend off and gave his cheek a light pat, "Hey fearless leader, up and at 'em!"

Neji made low sounds of reluctance. While he stirred from a deep sleep, Lee notified Tenten that he had packed a few pieces of dried fish and replenished their water stores. She thanked him for his thoughtfulness as she pulled on the sash of her sword and weapon-scroll. They took a short while to prepare and then set out.

As Tenten had expected, Neji was far less irritable than he had been the day before. While using his Byakugan later that morning, he could see that they were on a collision course with a team of young Sand ninja. Not interested in a scuffle that could delay them further, Neji led his teammates along a small ridge to avoid the other team.

On the opposite side of the land formation, the Leaf team dropped down into the tawny cover of a sequoia grove. No sooner had their feet touched the chips and mulch of the forest floor, a piercing, otherworldly scream rang out and was silenced. The three ninja paused and attempted to identify the sound.

"I think we may have avoided a puny team only to walk into something worse." Tenten speculated, "Can you see anything, Neji?"

He was already on the lookout, holding his head very still as he regarded the forest ahead of them. "A lot has been going on here." Neji reported as he began to walk forward, "And I recommend the two of you be prepared. I don't know if the danger has passed yet."

Without questioning Neji's assessment, Lee and Tenten followed him without speaking, tense, and carefully approached a battle site laden with mangled trees. Towards the center of the forest glade, a singular, gargantuan sequoia tree still stood, complete with a huge nest in its topmost branches.
Everything surrounding it had been bent and cut, providing evidence of an earlier fight. Near the edge of the tree line, Neji held out his arm and stopped his team. He pointed out a pool of hours-old blood and the spattering that led away from the clearing.

"Someone retreated." Neji supposed, "With extensive injuries. If not one Genin, then probably the whole team."

"Looking at this." Tenten gestured to the mess, "I'm thinking wounds like that would force any team to retire early from the exam. It'd be a death sentence otherwise."

"Yes, though it seems as though this attack happened long before we got here." Lee observed, "If that is so, then what was that sound we heard a short time ago?"

Tenten gave him a mystified look.

"A second attack which occurred recently." Neji said as he turned to look towards the opposite side of the grove, "And some carnage is left over from it."

They followed him towards a heaping mess. The team discovered the once-resident of the lofty nest in the sequoia tree: an enormous eagle had been cut apart.

"This beast may have attacked another team." Lee rubbed his chin, "And…they retaliated savagely."

Tenten stared into the open, glassy eye of the recently decapitated eagle, "The first team was chased away by this lug and then the second one..." She shuddered, "So now we should worry about who did this?"

"Maybe we don't have to worry." Neji ventured, taking steps towards the central sequoia. He laid his hand on the trunk and stared in silence. "This tree is hollow." Abruptly, his head snapped up and he made a chakra-fueled leap to reach a branch, "This way." Neji prompted his team.

Lee and Tenten followed him for the ascent. Near the top, the team paused beside the empty nest and noted a conspicuous, person-sized hole in the bark of the tree. It was not a natural feature. Neji finished determining the strange phenomenon as a breeze swayed the highest branches.

"This is an entrance to a hidden passage." Neji explained, "The trunk leads down into an unlit chamber, with a tunnel that continues underground. The team that was here shortly before us is now proceeding through it."

"Can you tell which team it is?" Tenten wondered.

"I cannot."

"Now that we have arrived at such a critical juncture…is it wise for us to keep searching for the clue in our scroll?" Lee asked, holding up their scribble-drawing, "It may save time to use this passage, provided that we do not come to blows with the team ahead of us."

"I would rather not do that." Tenten agreed gravely.

"We will use this chute. The tunnel's end will feed into the basement of the Forest's tower." Neji announced, scrutinizing with the full strength of his Byakugan, "Considering that we're already here, there's no point in searching for another entrance. However, it would be best to avoid the other team and let them stay ahead of us."

They agreed it was the best course of action. Lee tucked away their scroll, silently apologizing to the poorly drawn clue they were unable to locate. It only made sense to take advantage of a path directly in front of them.

Lee lined up first to squeeze through the gap in the bark into the hollow of the tree.

"Do you suppose the bear's cave was the entrance we might have used?" Lee pondered, bracing with his hands and feet as he shimmied down the cylindrical space.

"It might have been." Tenten figured, "That, or it was the bear's stomach."

Neji followed after Lee, making sure the descent was stable as they carefully made their way down. After he had climbed down several meters, he asked Tenten to follow. Though Neji kept it to himself, he preferred Tenten having a cushioned landing in the event of a fall more than her being the cushion. It was a tiresome task to clamber down the chute, growing darker as they went. They took their time with the climb.

Lee yelped in the blackness and, by the sound of it, slipped and fell. A moment later he informed his team that he was fine.

"Ah, I lost track of the wall. The opening widened! Please mind your step." They could hear Lee's footsteps on a floor below, "I have made it to the bottom but it was quite a drop!"

Neji was able to anticipate it as he felt the tree hollow sloping away from his hands. He took a calculated leap from the funnel opening and landed successfully on concrete. He nearly toppled onto Lee in the dark. The tunnel was uncomfortably narrow. A minute later, Tenten shrieked as she lost her footing.

During the fall she propelled herself blindly in the dark and latched onto the tunnel wall with chakra. They could only hear her ragged breathing before she spoke, "I think…I'm out. Where's the floor?"

"You are not far above it." Lee assessed unhelpfully. He had his hands out in the pitch, trying to get an idea of where the tunnel would lead.

Neji located her with an outstretched hand, inadvertently brushing her thigh. Tenten made a small sound before realizing that there was no danger of breaking her neck if he could reach her. She sheepishly hopped down and identified Neji with her hands, prodding his shoulder, hair, and face, "Ah, I thought that was you. So what do you think, Neji? Stay in the dark, or not?"

"For now," Neji gently tugged her along to where Lee was patting stone walls, "The dark. It's better not to alert the other team."

"I wonder how they got through here?" Tenten mused, "They were quick."

They bumped into Lee's back and all folded like an accordion.

"This space may not be booby-trapped if they passed without difficulty." Lee speculated.

"From what I glimpsed, it isn't." Neji assured them, "It is a long path, however."

Tenten linked arms with Lee as he continued his wall-crawl through the passage, "Then we don't need to rush." She laced her free hand with Neji's and pulled him forward, "Being blind isn't so bad when you're ahead of schedule, huh?"

By the afternoon, Kiba's tracking skills had allowed his team to locate what could be their desired location. He and Akamaru had stopped in a patch of forest littered with burrows.

"This doesn't have a giant-mammal smell to it, so it's more than likely an insect." He assessed, "Now we just need to figure out which of these is our way into the tower."

"It would be a shame if we have to check each hole." Tama lamented.

"It would." Sakura agreed, referring back to their scroll, "Or maybe the centipede in this clue will point us towards the one we want."

"Well, where is that thing?" Kiba leapt down into a hole and his voice carried up to his team, "Akamaru and I don't smell it. It's either way underground or it's gone on vacation."

Tama pointed out the thicket of vines depicted in the scroll, "This is the only other feature we can look for. Maybe the bug won't go beyond this point?"

"I'd rather check there first before we begin diving into every burrow we see. Just to be thorough." Sakura agreed, "The area we want should be just over that hill, due east."

Kiba returned above ground to help them search, and Akamaru's nose worked overtime as they began to pick through dense vegetation. It was not the scents so much as the sounds that coaxed them onward. It began to get noisy as they entered a jungle-like grove, its curtain of vines cascaded down from the canopy as the scroll depicted.

"That," Kiba recognized, "Is shouting."

It was another team. Akamaru confirmed it as they skirted around creepers and roots. They took a good look at the team that had accidentally come across the mammoth centipede before them.

Fujita looked infinitesimal beside the gigantic creature, scurrying bravely through brush. The burst from his small Rotation knocked the bug face-first into Chouji's Human Bullet Tank technique. With a clicking screech, the insect was thrown across the clearing and tangled in tree vines. Kiba's team was noticed after a few moments.

"Hey guys!" Ino called down to them cheerily from a tree branch, "Want to join us for some exercise? I let the boys have at it first."

"Ino!" Sakura leapt up to join her, frantic, "We need that thing! It's part of the clue in our scroll."

"Oh?" The blonde kunoichi immediately accepted the idea, "I see. Right, I'll tell-"

They watched in horror as Chouji effectively squashed the giant insect with his Multi-Size Technique.

"Chouji!" Ino roared, "Sakura's team needed that bug! You just killed it!"

Chouji and Fujita turned around slowly to face her, abashed. Ino gnashed her teeth at them, "We just ruined their clue for the exam, so now we're going to owe them. What do you have to say about that?"

Chouji and their first-timer companion returned to the gathered teams and apologized sincerely. Kiba merely shrugged, "Eh, it's alright. We know where to go. We wanted to use it to narrow down which path was the right one."

"There's a path, Kiba-kun?" Fujita asked curiously. He nodded calmly and patted the boy's shoulder.
"Yes, Sakura-chan determined that we will find an alternative entrance to the tower somewhere."
Tama informed them, "Ours is most likely in that insect's burrow. One of them, anyway."

"Oh...we didn't quite figure out what our clue meant yet." Chouji admitted.

"Well," Sakura gave them a proposal as she tapped her chin, "If you three don't mind helping us look around, I don't see why you can't use the tunnel we're looking for. How about it?"

Team Asuma happily agreed to the terms. They returned to the field of endless burrows to begin the hunt for the correct hole. After perusing, the teams determined that some holes were shallow and interconnected. Akamaru loped about with his nose pressed to the dirt, and began turning in odd directions. Kiba and Fujita followed the hound closely.

The path they chose began a downward slope into darkness. Fujita took a gander with his Byakugan, "There is a passageway further down! We won't have any light, but it's paved and empty."

"Good enough for me." Kiba grinned before calling back to their friends, "Get over here, everyone. We've struck pay dirt!"

After a time the large group assembled again. Kiba and Akamaru headed the expedition as the rest followed behind with slight apprehension. Other than the scent-driven leaders guiding them, Tama was the least afraid. Ino had taken her and Sakura by their wrists and held tight, making sure Chouji was no more than a step behind her in the pitch black.

A short way into the underground stroll, Sakura admitted that there was no way of knowing if danger awaited them in the dark, "Other teams could be using the same route as us...and we don't know if traps were set up."

Further into the newly discovered passageway, Ino considered aloud, "Could you imagine if we had to fight down here?"

"I don't want to." Fujita replied timidly.

"It wouldn't go well." Sakura agreed, "Then again, we probably outnumber any threat that we could run into."

"Don't jinx it, Sakura-chan." Tama was laughing softly.

"Oh great!" Ino whimpered at the notion, "Now we're going to get a swarm of who-knows-what or a pack of rats."

"That would be the least of our worries." Kiba said from the front, "I'm only trying to sniff out shinobi. We'd be in trouble trying to not take friendly fire down here. We could beat the hell out of each other and not realize it."

"Or to avoid that, I could plug up the tunnel and mow enemies down." Chouji suggested.

With that, Fujita and Ino pushed Chouji ahead to be positioned beside Kiba. The Inuzuka-Akimichi pair seemed the most capable of dealing with an unseen threat.

Sakura sighed at the chicken-livered maneuver, "You do know that leaves our rear unguarded, right?"

"I'll protect everyone." Tama assured her friends, "I've never been afraid of the dark, and I know Kiba-kun would smell a problem in advance if there was one. I will cover the rear if there's a threat."
"You're too brave, Tama..." Sakura chided her. Ino and Fujita were clinging to Tama's arms by that point as they proceeded.

And they discovered, after picking up the pace, that their walk would be a long one. Sakura took a guess that it would be nearly sunset above ground. They all elected to make a run for it when several people reported needing a restroom, "And we probably shouldn't do something like that down here." Tama noted.

Kiba deemed the way clear and then asked Akamaru to hurry ahead. The group began a race towards the end of the tunnel. For a time they continued without interruption. When something dropped from the cavern ceiling onto Ino's shoulder, a riotous, echoing-scream-conniption ensued.

"Ino-chan!" Fujita managed to locate her in the dark and corralled her towards the group.

"It's okay!" Tama and Sakura restrained her. Everyone came to a screeching halt.

Whatever had landed on Ino leapt away in fright and began circling Tama's feet. In the dimness Tama could barely make it out, but the kunoichi bent down to scoop up a field mouse, "Ino-chan...it's just a--"

"Don't say it." Ino cut her off, "I humiliated myself enough. Let's just...keep going."

Tama set the mouse free and they moved on. Kiba and Chouji chuckled about the ordeal for the rest of the way until a shred of distant light became visible. Motivated, the group nearly sprinted towards an exit which was, surprisingly, underwhelming when they arrived.

They were in the bottom-most portion of the Forest of Death's tower. Torches blazed on the walls of the room and support pillars, casting long shadows on the floor. The musty air was stifling. The group walked into the atrium in silence, somewhat confused by the environment.

"Look." Sakura spoke up, pointing to another tunnel exit further away, "I had a feeling there would be other passages that would lead here."

Kiba bent down and rubbed Akamaru's flank, frowning to himself, "Other teams got here before we did. Smells like it, anyway." He stood upright and gestured his head towards a staircase wedged between pillars, "I bet we'll see them on the next level."

Both tired and determined to find the restroom, the combined Leaf teams trudged up the long flight of steps to the ground floor. Akamaru perked up and excitedly bounded over to familiar faces. Welcoming hands patted the dog's head, mussing at his floppy ears.

Hinata and Sato were relieved that their comrades had made it. They clamored for their friends to join them while they pet the happy ninken. Shino stood nearby and did not say a word, but he was vaguely amiable as well.

"So you beat us!" Sakura marched up to Hinata and embraced the girl happily, "I want to know how you did it! Were you the first team here?"

"We were." Hinata confirmed it with a nod, "Our team began with a blank scroll, so we needed to consult with another team’s clue."

"No way!" Kiba was dumbfounded, "We had a clue from the start and it still took us forever."

"We put in double-overtime with our tracking. We even skipped sleeping." Sato informed them with a grin, "Shino only let us get some rest after we made it here."
The Hatake warmly regarded Tama as she pointed Fujita and Ino towards a doorway marked “lavatory.” She turned around with a soft sigh and caught Sato winking an eye at her.

Kiba refrained from gagging at the sight. He folded his arms and glanced around. He noticed Neji, Lee, and Tenten seated a few paces away and eating what looked like leftover fish they had caught in the forest. Chouji had noticed Team Gai as well and also decided to check on them.

“How did it go for you guys?” Kiba wondered, “I’m not surprised that you were on the early side.”

“We are glad that you made it, Kiba-kun, Chouji-kun!” Lee greeted his friends with a wave, “We were the third team to arrive. Your teams are tied for fourth place, I suppose.”

“Third?” Chouji was puzzled, “Who was Second, then?”

Neji inclined his head, ushering them to look at the far side of the room. On the wall opposite them were three young men standing clustered together, seemingly repulsed by their Leaf ninja company.

“They’re the team from Iwagakure.” Tenten kept her voice down, “We actually used the same tunnel that they did.”

“And judging from the amount of damage they inflicted on one of the Forest’s beasts, it would be wise to avoid them.” Neji recommended, “They are dangerous.”

Lee added, “Yet we say this in spite of the fact we have not properly introduced ourselves. I remain hopeful that they are a civil team.” He dusted his hands of crumbs, “I will introduce myself now.”

“Lee, you can’t seriously want to talk to them!” Tenten was mortified, “They didn’t try to approach us. I’m sure they have their reasons.”

Kiba’s smile was cocked and he rumbled with laughter, “If anyone should try saying hello to them, Lee is the only emissary fit for that job.”

Chouji politely inquired if they had any leftover fish to spare and Tenten handed him a skewer. Lee stood up and began to cross over to the second-place team. Tenten merely shook her head as Neji calmly continued eating. There was no point in trying to talk their teammate out of it.

Lee stopped a short distance away from the Rock trio and raised a hand in greeting. “I wanted to extend congratulations to you for making it into the tower so quickly! My name is Rock Lee.”

The team stared at him suspiciously.

“Why not introduce yourselves? We may be waiting here for a few days before the Second Stage terminates. You could join me and my friends if you like.”

With a heavy foreign accent the shortest Rock ninja replied, “Ga-Fen.” He extended a hand to shake and Lee delightedly did so, “Kuang Ga-Fen. This is my big brother, Qin.” He gestured to the taller, brawnyr young man beside him, “We won’t be joining your group, sorry to say.”

“That is alright. I wanted to tell you that you were welcome.” Lee replied, noticing the dark quality of the third member of their team who stood behind them.

He stared back at Lee, resembling a regal leopard with his narrow face and posture. Oddly, the Manchurian hairstyle of the last team member was highly characteristic, if antiquated, of Han customs. The front of his head was shaved bare, and jet black hair was left at the back in a long, tight braid. It was all too familiar. Lee took a chance and asked in Hanwen, I am sorry, but I did not get
The unnamed ninja stared at him for a moment before a sly smirk spread on his face, And I am Huo. It is a pleasure to meet you.

If you say so, Rock Lee. Huo’s smile widened.

Ga-Fen cleared his throat to excuse the testy remark, continuing the conversation in their mother-tongue, Are you a descendant of Iwa’s Han people?

No, in fact my family came directly from the Middle Kingdom.

So you must be a weak ninja. Huo supposed, The Kingdom’s vagrants always struggle to learn Ninjutsu. What a waste they are...

Qin added his two-cents, It’s better to be born here in the shinobi nations.

I was born in the Fire Country, Lee defended politely, And I do not agree with your assessment.

Qin, you fuckhead, Mom is from the Kingdom of Han. Ga-Fen muttered angrily, You respect her as a ninja, don’t you?

Everyone should respect their mother. Qin concurred, Just not this dumbshit in front of us. I can tell he’s a wuss by looking at him. Huo could tell right away.

It’s his name. Huo determined, It is profoundly stupid.

Lee gently clasped his hands and drew upon the last semblance of dignity in his soul, concluding, I seem to have made a poor impression. Please excuse me for now, and best of luck to you...

Huo folded his arms and sniffed, Where do you think you’re going?

To return to my team.

Ah, well if you’re going to do that, ask all of your Leaf comrades what they will miss the most. I would like to know. Huo requested.

Why do you care to know that?

Is it their eyes or their heads? Their fingers? Before I kill each of you in the next stage, it’s only prudent to collect mementos. He said it in all seriousness.

Lee looked from Huo to the two brothers standing beside him, marveling at their undisguised malevolence. Perhaps they did share a degree of patriotism, if he squinted, but Lee felt as if he was having an interview with barefaced sociopaths.

He turned smoothly on his heel and crossed back to the safe side of the room. Surely, Lee thought as he walked, shinobi from Iwagakure were not so bad. These Genin may have been outliers among their population. He had found it strange that they were all speakers of Hanwen, a discovery which went from happy coincidence to catastrophe in a matter of seconds.

By then, Neji and Tenten were standing and extremely aware of the horrified look on Lee’s face. He stopped beside his teammates, making sure to keep his back facing towards the Rock shinobi. Lee could feel them watching.
“What happened?” Tenten asked softly.

“That went far worse than I ever could have expected.” Lee announced.

“You didn’t have to talk to them.” Neji pointed out.

“I know, but they spoke Hanwen. I believed we had something in common.” Lee admitted, “But we could not be more different.”

“It figures. There is something about them, at least the long-haired guy…” Tenten muttered, “He looks familiar to me, but he…has a vibe.”

“A vibe.” Neji repeated to himself, half-amused.

“I’m serious.” The kunoichi grumbled, “He’s the one who killed that bird. Probably.”

Lee nodded somberly, “I think he is the one. Huo. He was astoundingly unkind and threatened to kill all of us in Stage Three.” He added flatly, “He truly meant it.”

“He has no weapon that could have sundered an animal so large.” Neji noted the gaping hole in the theory.

“Some people don’t need weapons to cut things.” Tenten poked Neji in the ribs, “Remember, Wind Nature prodigy? We don’t know what kind of jutsu any of the foreign teams can use yet.”

“Forgive me for not wanting to give them any credit.” Neji replied, “When do I ever?”

She chuckled at the notion. Lee was still having difficulty returning to his light-hearted mood. Tenten walked him over to the other Leaf teams to cheer up, patting his back gently. Neji watched as they departed and stayed in his place on the wall. His eyes strayed towards the Rock team again. They were loitering and he could see their lips move as they conversed. Then, the one Lee had called Huo began staring across the room. His gaze rested on Lee and Tenten, and then it remained on Tenten as she parted from the group for the restroom.

Neji would have liked to have thought nothing of it, expecting other teams to size up Leaf competitors while they could…

But when Tenten returned Huo was watching. When she stopped to speak to Sakura and Hinata, when she squeezed past her group of friends and returned to Neji’s side…Huo looked at her as if she had a neon sign glowing above her head. There was no explaining it. Disturbed, Neji stared back and mustered as much intimidation as his reputation and lineage could afford him. It seemed as though the Rock shinobi did not notice. Even when Huo’s teammates took their turns for the restroom, leaving him alone, he stared with the same tenacity that a guillotine blade had when regarding an exposed human neck.

After ten minutes of relentless scrutiny from the hateful Rock shinobi, and a poor attempt at conversation with Tenten, Neji felt a body-block might at least deter the awkwardness a little. In a businesslike manner, Neji held her by her upper-arms and swiveled Tenten, flattening her against the wall. Then he leaned over her like what he saw men do in those sappy magazines, bracing an arm above her head.

There. The rotten Iwa nin could stare at the back of his head for all he cared. ‘Feast your eyes you degenerate.’

“Neji-?” Tenten snapped him out of his inner spiral of anger, “Not like it’s an issue, but I don’t find this very like you.”
“What?”
“Standing like this.”
“Endure it. You’re being watched.”
“Oka-aay. Care to explain why that’s bothering you so much?” She raised her eyebrows a margin.
“The Rock Genin.”
“Oh.” Tenten understood, “So you finally felt that vibe? I told you.”
“He wants to kill you.”
“Hm. Lee said he wants to kill us all.” She reminded him casually.
“But he will start with you, Tenten.” Neji cautioned her, “And I cannot determine why that is.”
“Well I hate to make this a pissing contest, but I bet I could kill him faster.”

He did not want to smile so he only let the corner of his mouth slant up a little. Sometimes, Neji acknowledged deep down inside, he found Tenten’s sense of humor absolutely essential.

“And never mind that,” Tenten went on, still completely relaxed, “He’s outnumbered, he’s being cocky, and I have never seen you this protective before. You could wind-chop him just by blinking too hard at him.”

“I am being protective.” Neji agreed, decided he could dial it back a bit. He moved to lean away from her but she shook her head.

“No, no. Stay where you are or you’ll ruin it.”

He didn’t understand what she meant until he glimpsed their friends from the corner of his eye. There was Lee, along with Team Kakashi, Team Kurenai, and Team Asuma rivetedly observing him in his magazine-ad position with his publically acknowledged girlfriend. It had become a spectacle.

Sato cupped his hands around his mouth and shouted, “Shit, Neji, don’t just stand there leaving us in suspense! We want to see you ki-!”

The Hatake ate a full-force Air Palm.

By nightfall, only one additional team had arrived in the tower and trudged up the stairs. It was a team of young, worn-out looking Sand ninja. Neji watched the group enter the restroom to splash their faces with water at the sink. After that, they too settled down to sleep for the night.

The Leaf teams had circled the wagons and huddled together to rest. Earlier, Lee had kindly warned the other Leaf teams to be wary of the team of Rock ninja. After that he had told Neji and Tenten of the deranged things that Huo had said. They took the warning to heart.

While the group slept, Neji stayed awake and alert. He was a naturally vigilant individual, but tonight his utmost attentiveness was required. Neji was not about to let his guard down just because they had arrived in the tower early. They were, after all, accompanied by some very unsavory competitors.
Diagonal beams of moonlight shined down through overhead windows. The Leaf groups breathing and snoring arranged a sort of symphony. After a long while of peace, Lee had woken twice in the night, highly anxious. Neji reassured him without a word, pressing the heel of his hand against Lee’s shoulder until his friend settled down again.

Neji sat in silence beside Tenten in Lee, his arms lax at his sides and his head heavy. The errant tip of his finger traced the skin of Tenten’s arm while she slept. In the late hours past midnight, Neji felt the atmosphere of the place change. The stillness in the air and traces of light shivered in the room. On the far side of the hall where the team of Iwa ninja lay, Huo’s eyes had opened. He stared in silence at the same objective he had fixated on that same evening.

‘I wasn’t imagining a murderous lunatic on the lookout after all.’ Neji thought to himself, ‘And what Lee said was not comforting…’ He had been as protective and cautious as he needed to be, Neji assessed. He had no way to tell if the prowler had been feigning sleep or not, or had actually gotten some blessed shut-eye before resuming his disturbing watch.

The night dragged on and so did the staring match. Neji’s stubborn disposition may have won out. Huo looked away a few times and skimmed over the other sleeping occupants of the tower. Eventually he seemed to fall asleep again, but Neji refused to buy it. When the sun rose again and shinobi began to stir and awaken, he was not feeling nearly as stalwart.

Tenten quietly reprimanded him when she woke up, “Neji, you should have rotated with someone if you were going to keep watch all night.”

He shrugged it off.

She sat up beside him and stretched, “You don’t do well without beauty sleep. You’ve got two black eyes and no one punched you.”

“Are you sure?”

“Quite.” Tenten smiled, “Why don’t you get some rest now? Everyone else is up so we should be fine. You don’t need to be the watchdog.” She pointed over to Kiba and Akamaru, “I mean we have enough of them as it is.”

He considered it before he nodded, adding, “Wake me if anything significant happens.”

“Sure. Here,” She positioned him so that he was leaned comfortably against her. It was not long before Neji’s head lolled, hair falling in his face, and he was fast asleep.

Lee came by with a soundless thumbs-up so as to not wake their teammate. Then he pointed to the staircase where non-Genin shinobi had appeared. Tenten’s mouth dropped open at the sight.

Shikamaru appeared and was joined by a few other Chunin who were carrying boxes of supplies. Lee joined the rest of their Leaf peers, sans his teammates, to learn more about the development. Shikamaru sighed and rubbed the back of his head when his friends surrounded him excitedly.

“Yeah, I’m here. Teams got to the tower earlier than expected, so the Hokage supplied rations while you wait for the rest of them to show up.” He explained, setting a box down, “Jounin Chaperones don’t need to report here until tomorrow.”

While food and water was handed out, Shikamaru mingled with his teammates. He even patted Fujita’s head after seeing his pint-sized replacement, “Thanks for looking out for my teammates, kid.”
“Oh, I…didn’t do much.” Fujita confessed, “I feel like Chouji-kun and Ino-chan were looking out for me, mostly.”

“Sure they did; it’s your first time taking this exam.” Shikamaru simpered at Ino beside him, “But Ino needed some saving down in that tunnel.”

“How-?” Ino puffed her cheeks, “You saw that? Don’t tell me those paths were under surveillance!”

“They were under surveillance.” He shut his eyes and restrained a grin, “You and your little mouse…”

Ino whacked his chest while Chouji chortled.

Shikamaru slipped an arm around her back and held her nonchalantly, “It’s not like those cameras caught anything damning. Everyone who got in wanted out of those tunnels fast. That’s why they were designed to be dark and uncomfortable.” He added, “And I was the only person in the control room watching the progress of teams. It got boring.”

“So if you’re here who’s watching those cameras?” Ino asked.

“The proctor for the Second Stage took over. We were told to swap so I could oversee…” Shikamaru trailed off, “Well, I shouldn’t mention that yet.”

“We already know Shikamaru.” Chouji reminded him.

“Yeah, I know. Just don’t go broadcasting that I’m the proctor for the next stage.” He kept his voice low, “Right now I’m just doing food delivery and tower inspection. I can’t make an announcement until all of the required Jounin chaperones are present.”

“Ah, got it.” Ino grinned, “So if that’s your only task, deliver my breakfast. Please.”

Shikamaru’s pout wavered before he turned back to the distribution line to find something for her. While shinobi gathered around to be fed, Sakura noticed the Sand team at the side of the room and Matsuri was waving at her. She had an urgent look on her face.

The pink haired kunoichi excused herself from her team and trotted over to Gaara's student. Ino had crossed her arms and tossed her hair, disgruntled by Sakura's promptness when it came to helping the team of Sand ninja.

“What's up, Ino?” Chouji was perceptive, "You huffed at her."

"Oh, I didn't mean to. I do that sometimes when I think too hard."

"About what? Sakura checking on the Sand Genin?"

"It just makes me worry a little." Ino shut her eyes and shook her head, "Not that Sakura is doing anything wrong, of course, or even that those noobies are competition for us, but..." She gave Chouji a sidelong look, "I suspect that she's been thinking. Sakura's been thinking about Hidden Sand."

"Well, Gaara's there. It makes sense." Chouji accepted a bowl of delivery-food from Fujita and then the boy scurried off to sit with Hinata while they ate.

"Yeah, it does. It just scares me that she's invested. That she works so hard." Ino covered her mouth with the back of her hand and added shakily, "I will not handle it well if Sakura decides...to go there to be with Gaara."
Chouji snapped chopsticks apart to begin eating and then stopped, giving his teammate a long, severe look. "You think she would actually do that?

"Call it intuition. It freaked me out a little. And I think Gaara is somewhat, you know," Her eyebrows waggled with emphasis, "Persuasive, in his way. They'll want to be together, even if she has to stay in Hidden Sand." Ino huffed again, "I would hate not having her at my beck and call every day."

"Hokage-sama would too."

"I may have taken it for granted that I’ve had her for so long." Ino managed a smile, "But I’ve been trying to look at the big picture lately, and it won’t behoove Sakura to stay away from the guy she’s crazy about."

"Don’t start saying your goodbyes just yet. Even if that’s what Sakura-chan is planning, it has got to be pretty far down the line." Chouji gently bumped elbows with her, "Ino, if it's bothering you that much, just enjoy your time with her now as much as possible. That's what best friends should do, right?"

"I will." She muffled a sniffle, "Chouji, I don't know how you got so good at talking about these things. You should charge by the hour for therapy."

"Nah. I need to keep it free otherwise no one could afford me."

Shikamaru returned to find the two of them rumbling with laughter, "What'd I miss?"

The day dragged on and by afternoon only one new team had arrived; a team of Grass ninja plodded up the stairs and straight towards the station set up with food. Shikamaru supposed that some teams had more difficulty finding things to eat in the Forest. Chouji shuddered at the notion.

As they had been advised to do so, the Leaf teams grouped together and kept their distance from the Rock Genin. Sakura moved back and forth between Matsuri’s team and her own, troubled by the Sand team’s misfortune.

“Her teammates aren’t doing well.” Sakura explained quietly to the other kunoichi, “Whatever they’re sick with is going to need strong medication, and there’s nothing I can do about it right now. I healed some of their injuries. Matsuri seems to be healthy.”

“Why are you so worried about her?” Ino whispered, “She’s just a little Sand ninja.”

Sakura raised pastel pink eyebrows, “She’s Gaara’s student. I can’t just leave her hanging.”

Ino made an incredulous sound while Hinata chirped in surprise.

“I didn’t think Sakura-chan was arbitrarily helping a team.” Tama confirmed, “But this clears it up.”

“So you wouldn’t want Gaara to be disappointed if his student didn’t make it to the Third Stage?” Tenten concluded, “You can’t interfere too much, Sakura. She has to make it there on her own power, like we all did.”

“I absolutely agree,” Sakura nodded, “And I know she can do it. I’m just saying that it’s likely her teammates are going to have to drop out. They will not be fit to fight.”

“They aren’t her official teammates, then?” Ino gathered.
“No. Gaara is only training her. Matsuri was filling in as a substitute, like how Fujita is with you and Chouji.”

“Ah, I got it.”

“She looks so small. It reminds me of the first time we competed here.” Hinata remarked distantly.

“We really had no idea what we were doing.” Ino added, “The great shame was that only Tenten was able to make it to the Final Rounds at the last exam. All of us need to represent this time!”

The idea stoked Tama and Sakura who were both wild-eyed and clenching their fists. Even Hinata frowned with determination as Tenten laughed quietly at them, “Yeah… I get the feeling none of you will sit out this year’s Finals…”

“There’s no way I’m going to miss it. Tsunade-shishou and Gaara are going to be there.” Sakura was beaming.

“Right. We should all do what we can to make Tsunade-sama proud.” Tenten agreed, “At least from what she’s said, she is trying to make this exam her crowning achievement. She’d be upset if any of us flaked on her.”

“It does seem inevitable that we’re going to end up facing each other as opponents, or at the very least our teammates.” Tama pointed out, “But I don’t think that’s going to stop me…”

The girls discreetly looked over their shoulders to where the men of their teams were relaxing together. It was food for thought.

“Not even if you have to fight Sato?” Ino teased Tama, “Or Kiba or Sakura?”

“Not even you, Ino-chan.” Tama grinned, “We don’t pull punches in my family.”

“She’s not lying.” Sakura confirmed.

“I’m glad, then… that Naruto-kun isn’t here.” Hinata spoke softly, “I might not find the willpower to fight him in the Third Stage, if I had to. Or Gaara-kun or Haku-kun, if they were here.”

“Yeah, that’s true. Well, Gaara-kun couldn’t even if he wanted to. And Haku’s so polite he’d probably surrender.” Sakura imagined, resting her chin on her knuckles, “But Naruto does not and has not yielded in battle, as far as I know. Any of us would have trouble with that match up.”

“And he’s learning Sage Arts.” Hinata added with a smile, “It’d be scary!”

All of the kunoichi present nodded collectively, disliking the disadvantage, imaginary though it was.

“I would actually love the chance to fight Neji.” Tenten mused, “Since he’s so focused on the last stage of this exam, I know he wouldn’t go easy on me if it was an official match. Lee would be a great opponent too…”

“Do you hear yourself, Tenten?” Ino hissed, “They are your teammates! And by the way: you are dating one of them. Are you aware that they can level buildings with their fists?”

“I know. That’s exactly why.” Tenten assured her.

“Then I sincerely hope you get your wish, because I certainly don’t want to face them.” Sakura concurred.
The conversation was interrupted when Shikamaru stopped over to bid them farewell. He had to report to the Hokage once more before returning as proctor of the Third Stage.

That evening, the team of Dream ninja arrived in the tower. They were a pop of color and glamour among plainer-looking peers. Like most teams had before them, they used the restroom and then helped themselves to rations of food. They strolled over and sat down in an empty spot to the left of the Leaf ninja group, where others were settling down and preparing for sleep.

One of the Yume ninja glanced over and made eye contact with Sato. They smiled stupidly at each other.

“This is a good sign.” Sato whispered directly into Shino’s ear, “I think that guy is friendly!”

“Lee thought that of the Rock team as well. We are now informed otherwise.”

“Jeez, Shino, quit killing my buzz.” Sato pushed up on his knees and stood, adding to Hinata and Tama, “I’ll be right back. I’m gonna talk to the guy wearing pink over there.”

The girls made no objection, but watched as he made his way over and stopped by the newcomers. The Dream ninja had a fur-trimmed, ornate gi of bright red and pink. He had red markings beneath his eyes, probably permanent, because they crinkled when he smiled again.

“Your team is unique to say the least. It’s a good thing you made it here.” Sato told the stranger, “You’re gonna make this exam interesting.”

“Thanks, man. We’ve never done something like this before, so we didn’t want to screw up.” He replied.

The kunoichi beside him, in intricate armor, added glumly, “We almost didn’t figure out our clue.”

“But you were still in time and that’s what counts. Oh,” Sato held out his hand, “I’m Hatake Sato.”

The Yume nin put his boxed meal down and stretched out his hand to shake, “Uh…like the Copy Ninja, kind of Hatake?”

“That kind.”

The Dream ninja grinned, “Sick. I’m Tenro Masugama.” He turned to his girl teammate, “Here’s Amagiri Eifa,” Then to the hooded ninja beside him, “And Hirasaka Agehanto.”

“Those names sound familiar.” Sato noted.

“That’s because we’re from famous clans too.” Eifa updated him, “We just don’t trifle in international matters much. It was great that your Hokage let us participate. My father nearly fell out of his chair when he heard about the Chunin Exam being hosted in Konohagakure. We haven’t entered a team in decades.”

“Same.” Agehanto commented, “My parents thought it was all a joke until we were registered.”

“So does your village have anything like a Chunin Exam in-house?” Sato wondered.

“We have promotion trials but we failed them last year. Enzo-sama said it would be good for us to participate against shinobi of other villages and find out how much we’ve grown.” Masugama explained, “Our Sensei also thinks we can pass.”

Sato nodded, “Probably. Or just show up and look good.”
They twittered happily at his assessment.

Within the congregation of Leaf shinobi, Kiba scooched over and remarked to Tama, “If you don’t pull back on his leash Sato’s going to befriend all of our competitors.”

“Let him. He’s a social butterfly.”

“More like a social lemming.”

“Hey, don’t be so critical, Kiba-kun.” She chided him, “Sato being outgoing and social is one of the things I like about him most.”

“And what about the part of him that unnecessarily tempts danger?”

“No one is perfect. Besides, those Dream ninja seem nice.”

“It’s totally an act.”

“If it is,” Sakura interjected, “I’ll take that over Rock ninja openly threatening to kill us any day.”

Tama nodded in agreement. A short time later, Sato returned and sat down with his friends.

“The Dream ninja are great! They’re nervous because this is their first time in a foreign village.” Sato brought them up to speed, “They also want…my uncle’s autograph.”

“Tch. See?” Kiba snickered as he leaned back onto Akamaru like a pillow, “I told you it was an act.”

Overnight, Team Gai slept in shifts to keep watch and even traded off with Team Kakashi. No incidents occurred and the environment was copacetic well into the next morning when more food and another team arrived. It was a team of Cloud ninja. They were rather irked that so many teams had reached the tower before them.

The day passed and teams had begun to get antsy. The health of Matsuri’s teammates was concerning, as Sakura assessed them periodically. Huo watched other teams in stony silence from behind his teammates. Lee’s mood had improved as he and Sato chatted up the friendly “Dream Team,” Sato labeled them. Tenten did have to admit that they had great style.

Things remained peaceful but the influx of Genin teams reduced from a trickle to nothing. Not even a whisper of spelunkers came up from the underground tunnels after the fourth day. By the morning of the last day of the Second Stage, no one new had appeared. Around noon, Jounin sensei popped up one at a time from the basement staircase, and then met with their trainees in the atrium.

The first Jounin had been Hyoshigi, the sensei of the Sand team. He quickly darted over to his ailing students, Koji and Tamsen, and looked them over. Sakura watched from afar as he patted Matsuri’s shoulder and asked her not to feel guilty. They were not quite as “tough” as she was, he said. Hyoshigi shared a laugh with the two wheezing boys, imagining that her training with Gaara had made her superbly sturdy. Matsuri blushed in embarrassment.

Kurenai and Gai appeared consecutively, and Kurenai was especially proud that her team held the record time for entering the tower. She flashed a smug smile towards Gai, but it did not discourage him in the slightest. He was too busy rejoicing with Lee and patting Tenten’s shoulder. Neji avoided being touched.

The sensei of the Rock team was a stern-faced kunoichi is the deep burgundy garb typical of her village. She joined the three malicious boys at the edge of the room and began speaking to them
Asuma arrived a short time later and was immediately spotted. Ino and Chouji rushed over to him and were quick to praise their little Hyuga companion. Fujita denied most of the accolades blushingly. Asuma commended him anyway as he lit a cigarette.

A tan-skinned, handsome man emerged from the staircase minutes later, and was loudly met by his Grass Genin, “Ah! Mahoto-sensei!” They scurried over and overwhelmed the Grass Jounin with their harrowing tale of the Second Stage. By the look of it, these Genin were older and near their Leaf peers in age, close to sixteen or seventeen.

Simultaneously, a hideously bedraggled Genin team had clambered up the stairs. Groaning and stooping, three Rain ninja made their way into the room. Kiba prodded Sakura and Tama to look, identifying one of the Rain genin who had once attempted an ambush on them.

“I can’t believe those losers made it!” Kiba snickered.

“They look exhausted and filthy.” Tama nearly sympathized, “That’s probably what they deserve.”

Sakura agreed, “I highly doubt they’ll last long in the Third Stage.”

Time passed and the Jounin joined their students for lunch. Some discussed the challenges of the Second Stage while others strategized about what lay ahead.

As teams ate their meals and conversed, a violet-hooded Jounin ascended the stairs in silence. An intricate outfit of orange and oxblood red made him stand out, and Sato muttered to his teammates, “Maybe that’s…a Dream Jounin…”

“They are colorful.” Hinata acknowledged.

The Jounin’s piercing eyes scanned around before settling on Masugama’s group. The Dream students met their teacher half-way and bowed with respect. Curious Leaf ninja watched as the colorful team brought each other up to speed. Eventually, the Genin led their teacher towards Sato’s group.

Masugama was eager to introduce their mentor, “Sato-san, this is our sensei, Hirasaka Yomito.” Sato gave a wave of greeting to the grave-looking man, “Much like you are a relation of Copy Ninja Kakashi, he is Agehanto-kun’s uncle.”

The two hooded ninja exchanged a peaceable glance with each other before regarding the young Hatake.

“Small world.” Sato gestured towards Sakura’s team, “And my uncle is actually their sensei. These fine people are Inuzuka Kiba, Haruno Sakura, and Maito Tama.” He muttered behind the back of his hand, “Tama is going to be my bride someday.”

“Leaf ninja...have many connections to each other.” Agehanto observed.

“Kind of like how it is in our village.” Masugama agreed.

Eifa seemed to be hitting it off with Tama and Sakura as the girls inquired about her armor. Hinata politely introduced herself as well. Kurenai stood beside Shino and was highly amused to see ninja of a once-isolated village mingle with Leaf genin.

Kakashi did not bother showing up until late in the day, for he seemed to be allergic to schedules. It might have killed him to be on time for the close of the Second Stage. He and the sensei of the Cloud and Rain teams were the last to show up.

“I did not believe you at first.” Yomito told Sato upon seeing his uncle apologize to his annoyed students, “Though Kakashi of the Sharingan really is here. You bear a slight resemblance to each other, I think.”

“Thanks! He may be famous, but I hear I’m better-looking.”

The Jounin stayed until dusk and then departed for the night. They would come again in the morning and herald the beginning of the next stage. The strange fullness and noise of the atrium made it difficult to sleep.

Team Gai continued to keep watch in shifts throughout the night. Lee claimed that they were used to it, and so everyone else was encouraged to relax and get rest.

While Hinata tried to find a way to sleep comfortably on the hard tile floor, she shut her eyes and wondered how the end result of the exam would affect her life. She had confidence that she would pass. It would be almost outrageous, in her opinion, if she had not improved enough to be promoted to Chunin rank. But what then? She rested her head on folded hands.

What expectations would her father have of her when she became a Chunin? Her clan and the Hyuga clan elders? What types of missions would the Hokage task her, Sato, and Shino with? And how odd would it feel to know that she had pulled ahead, even for a brief time, of her own very talented boyfriend?

It would be better not to invite that stress in, for the time being. ‘All of that will come later. I still need to concentrate.’ She acknowledged, ‘I don’t think it will be so bad to have more responsibility…and I know that my friends are here by my side, going through the same trials.’

After what felt like an age she finally began to feel sleepy. Behind her, she could hear Sato whispering in a near inaudible voice to Tama. It sounded positive. They were sharing fortitude in preparation of the next day. Hinata then heard the soft peck of lips meeting. Embarrassed, she tried to ignore the sound by covering her ears with her arms.

The next thing she knew, she was being woken by friends shortly after sunrise.

“Sunshine! Time to get up. The Jounin are already here…even Kakashi.” Sato informed her, astounded that his uncle was on time.

She batted her dry mouth as she sat up and rubbed her eyes. Her neck felt sore.

Sakura was chuckling at her, “You slept funny! Almost like a contortionist. Are you okay, Hinata-chan?”

“Um…I-I…” Hinata remembered curling in a ball to block out sounds, “I think I will be fine…”

Sakura muttered to her, “I had to ignore them too…”

Teams had wobbled to their feet and hastily crammed breakfast into their mouths. Before long, the teams filed off with their Jounin chaperones and proceeded through a corridor towards the central room of the tower. At the far end of the auditorium was a large shinobi statue with hands folded in a Ram seal loomed. Railed walkways were positioned above along the perimeter of the room.
The Jounin parted from their students to stand near the statue, where Tsunade was waiting with a hand on her hip. Each Genin team lined up single-file, parallel to the teams beside them. The room was hushed into silence to listen to the Hokage’s announcement.

“Welcome to the Tower; and to those of you from other villages, I bid you a sincere welcome to Konohagakure. I am Tsunade, the Fifth Hokage.” There was a twinkle in the woman’s eye, “I must admit it is unheard of to see ten teams successfully pass the Second Stage of the Chunin Exam. There is no denying the aptitude and strength of Genin teams competing this year…so let that serve as your warning. This is no ordinary competition. The opponents you will face here, from this moment on, will challenge you more than any test this Exam can throw at you.”

Sakura realized after a moment she was holding her breath. She was hanging on Tsunade’s every word.

“Look around you. Note the fantastic diversity of shinobi standing to your left and right. Ninja from the Leaf Village may be the most abundant contenders, but there are shinobi here representing an impressive range of nations.” Tsunade pressed on with rhetoric, “This is the essence of the Chunin Exam. No matter your walk in life or where you come from, nor the adversity you’ve faced, divides you…you join us here as up-and-coming ninja. Equals. There is a unity here that you must never forget as you continue to forge your careers as excellent shinobi.”

Tsunade added to the speech, “With that said, there are far too many of you to host a streamlined Final Stage. Because of this, I have mandated that preliminary matches will take place to determine which ninja are qualified to proceed to the Final Rounds. These matches will randomly select from the Genin present and pit you against each other in one-on-one duels. It goes without saying that your dependence on teammates, at this point, is not a determining factor of success. Accordingly, you are permitted to drop-out individually at this point if you believe you are unable to continue to fight. You will not be penalized or prevented from participating in another Chunin Selection Exam if you do so.” She looked at them expectantly, “Any takers?”

With sad reluctance, both Tamsen and Koji of the Sand team raised their hands. Hyoshigi nodded to them from the front of the room while Matsuri stood in silence, beginning to tremble with anxiety. As the feverish boys walked off to join medic-nin at the back of the room, the girl stood all alone, sandwiched between a Leaf team on her left and the Rock team on her right.

One of the Iwa nin, Ga-Fen, scoffed quietly at her, “What are you still doing here? Just give it up, you wimp.”

“Someone as pathetic as you is a free win for another ninja.” Qin whispered.

Matsuri swallowed and stared ahead, feeling beads of sweat streak down the side of her face. She would not raise her hand. She could not quit. Not only had she promised Gaara that she wouldn’t, she had promised herself.

Tsunade quirked an eyebrow at the whispering ninja, “Hey, the chatters over there! Yes, you. I am addressing you.” The Iwa Genin gave the Hokage their attention, “I trust you aren’t trying to intimidate a gutsy kunoichi now, are you?”

They fell silent but smirked at the village leader.

A voice suddenly came from behind Matsuri, directed at the Rock ninja, “Anything you have to say to Matsuri can be said to me as well.”

The Kuang brothers (and not the unshakeable Huo) turned their heads and gawked at the sharp-looking, black-attired Kazekage. Gaara’s arms were folded and he was scowling furiously.

Matsuri nearly jumped out of her skin when she noticed him.

“Sensei!” She peeped softly, “What are you doing here?”

“Technically, I am a member of your team. I can stand here.” Gaara elaborated, “And Tsunade-sama demanded that I be present for the remainder of the Exam. Public relations, and all that…”

Gaara’s Leaf shinobi peers gave a rolling cheer of excitement to see he had joined them. Sakura’s grin was particularly wide. He couldn’t help a small smile when he informed them, “I cannot compete. I can only watch.” He gave them a small, Kage-like wave, “Good luck to all of you, my friends.”

Matsuri bent in a tiny bow of respect for her teacher before he parted from her to join Tsunade at the front. As he passed the chuckling Leaf jounin Gaara grunted at them, dismissing their entertained reactions.

“Be it resolved, then. The remaining twenty-eight Genin here are consenting to randomized, preliminary duels for the chance to proceed to the final rounds.” Tsunade announced, “Even the finals will be substantial…” She muttered to herself, “But that’s how we’ll make good money…”

She motioned for the next proctor to take over. Shikamaru removed his hands from his pockets and stepped forward, giving a long look to the Genin teams in front of him, “I am Nara Shikamaru. I will be the proctor for the remainder of the Chunin Exam, as well as the referee for all of your matches. Listen closely to the rules of one-on-one duels.”

Shikamaru went on with the narration, “Genin are permitted to surrender at any point during or before their match. Any activity that constitutes cheating, such as the assistance of a teammate or other ninja, will immediately disqualify you. You will fight until you are unable to continue. While in the arena, it is against the rules to flee or kill your opponent. I, as referee, will judge when a match is over or when a Genin cannot go on.”

There was quiet acknowledgment of the rules.

“Right. If you got all of that…” Shikamaru turned and pointed to a doorway, “Jounin, please escort your teams to the top floor.”

Tsunade made for the doorway of a staircase at the side of the room. Gaara followed after the Hokage quietly once Matsuri was by his side, continuing on.

Quizzical Genin bobbed around, inquiring of their mentors about what was to come.

“Wait. What?”

“This isn’t the venue for duels?”

“Where are we going?”

Kakashi pointed a finger at the ceiling when he told his students, “Up. This room was not approved for preliminary matches this year. We’re taking you to the chamber that is.”

Teams marched behind their teachers to parts unknown, highly confused. And it was almost a disappointment that there were ten minutes worth of winding staircases to climb. There was heavy breathing and annoyed moaning along the way. The air was thin by the time they scaled the tower to a circular room in the topmost area.

Like the ground floor, this room had a railed walkway around its circumference to watch matches on the floor below. The round room’s floor, however, was unusual. The architectural design had cutouts of slim, acute angles that allowed light to pass down to levels below. And, of course, any ninja who missed a step or slipped could take a plunge to the next level, which was stories down.

Above, glass panel skylights allowed light to pour into the room. Pale, metal support beams arched along the ceiling. The blue sky above served as a reminder that there was little to hold onto and nowhere to hide. A sophisticated, digital screen was mounted below one of the high windows on the wall. Tsunade and Gaara stopped to stand below it. Matsuri peered over the rails to examine the strange and treacherous layout of the floor.

Teams settled for a few minutes and spaced themselves out along the walkway. Team Kurenai was situated between Team Gai and Team Kakashi, not far from where the Hokage was located.

Hinata examined the room with awe, amazed that the location was so dramatically different. She turned to Neji and Tenten, who were also glancing about.

“Neji-niisan, Tenten-nee-san,” They both looked at her with the attentiveness of parents, “I hope we... don’t have to face each other. Not here, I hope. I want you both to watch me get to the Final Stage. This time I know I can do it.”

Tenten bit her lip and reassured her, wrapping an arm around her shoulders, “Hinata... you will. Neji and I definitely won’t get in the way of that. You’ll be in the Final Rounds.” She turned to Neji, “Isn’t that right?”

He nodded confidently, “If we should be pitted against each other again today, however unlikely, you can be sure that I will not be an obstacle for you. The same must be of Tenten. We will not surrender, but neither will we be a hindrance to your advancement.” Hinata sort of understood what he was hinting at. Neji wanted her to go all-out and wreck them, or anyone, if the occasion called for it. It was a bullet he and Tenten, at least, were happy to take.

Shikamaru stood off-center on the floor of the arena, gesturing to the screen above, “The preliminary bout will now begin! Direct your attention to the screen for the contestants of the first match.”

All eyes followed the screen’s readout as it flashed rapidly, tumbling over twenty-eight names over the course of a few seconds. It abruptly clinched the name Kuang Ga-Fen. Below, it had also stopped on the name Tenten.

Tenten sucked in a small breath, surprised. She felt the tension radiate out of Neji beside her. Lee and Hinata were looking at her in wordless shock.

“The first match will be between Kuang Ga-Fen and Tenten.” Shikamaru announced in a clear voice, “Competitors, please meet down here in the arena.”

On the opposite side of the room, Ga-Fen cackled happily and leapt down from the rail. He landed lightly on his feet and his Jounin sensei, Sekieima, was smiling with confidence. Ga-Fen’s teammates remained impassive, as far as others could tell.

Tenten glanced over to Gai. His serious expression melted away and then he grinned at her. For some reason, it began to feel completely fine. Tenten could only think to say, “Watch me.”

She did not need words of encouragement. With a swift turn, she proceeded down a narrow stairwell that led to the arena floor. ‘Neji and Lee are here. All of my friends are here, and Tsunade-sama is a Tenten’s mouth was pulled taught, gearing up mentally for the duel, ‘I bet they’ll want a good show.’
'Calm down, girl. Lee had the first match at the previous Chunin Exam. He won! That sets a pretty good precedent for my team.' Tenten considered as she descended down the private stairwell, 'And it's probably best to get this out of the way…'

She was surprised by the number of thoughts that were drag-racing in her head. The clop of her heeled sandals echoed in the narrow space.

'I've dealt with Rock ninja before.'

Well, if bisecting them and blowing them up counted, she definitely had.

Tenten frowned thoughtfully, 'I don’t know if that’s the tone I want to set in the first match. Killing is against the rules anyway. The quicker he folds the better.'

It probably mattered that Lee had reported the Rock Genin team to be “highly unstable and dangerous.” Even Neji had been overly concerned about it and that, of course, never boded well.

But hell, after the year she’d had Tenten would bet her opponent might think better of pushing her too far, if he had a clue. She survived a great multitude of things. Like rent. Working hand-to-mouth. Small business operations. Orphanhood and ill-advised romance. Teamlessness. Clashing with nukenin in the Marsh Country while Lee and Neji were disabled in ways only a comedian could envision, and perhaps worst of all, she shuddered; the interrogation and demands of her kunoichi friends. It didn’t get much scarier than that.

'He’s toast.' She decided as she stepped through the doorway.

Tenten squinted in the bright light of the arena, timing her breaths calmly as she entered. Shikamaru looked bored and she took that as a good sign. Ga-Fen stood a few paces away from him, a leg tapping anxiously for the word start to be spoken. His crazy eyes locked onto Tenten and he grinned again.

Something about him seemed big for his britches, Tenten estimated.

Shikamaru glanced between the two competitors, “If you’re both ready,” He raised his hand for a signal, “You may begin!” He was prompt about darting away and returning to the safety of the observation area.

About as fast as Tenten could snap open the large scroll at her back, Ga-Fen was flashing through hand signs, ‘We’re starting with Ninjutsu, eh?’ The kunoichi made an acrobatic flip to avoid the… ‘I hope that’s dirt.’ Mud. It was surely mud that the puckish Rock Genin was spitting out in a stream. Tenten summoned a volley of kunai and shuriken, clipped his shoulder once, and watched the rest of the projectiles stick into the Earth Release debris.

Ga-Fen took a breath and then unleashed another jet of earthy muck. Tenten leapt with nearly the full stretch of her scroll in an arc, letting a barrage of weaponry slip from paper and off her fingertips. In the same moment her opponent spat and hardened a shell of rapid-drying mud, Tenten tapped a seal for a chain-net bomb, ‘Good luck trying to hide from this!’ She let it drop, bounce on the top of the crusty dome, and it detonated with a rumble.

The rattling tink tink of empty chains warned her ears that Ga-Fen had not been caught. As the smoke settled, Tenten landed on her feet and braced a fold of the tool-scroll over her arm. The dome was reduced to rubble, but Ga-Fen had crafted several wall-like structures and paths with his spitting technique in a moment of distraction. He charged from the blind spot on her left, too close, and as he lashed down with an axe kick Tenten let a point-blank burst of razor darts loose from her scroll. The young man was shredded like a doily, but a second later loped over into a pile of sludge. He’s quick with Earth Clones…

From the cover of a dirt wall behind Tenten, Ga-Fen sprayed a length of scroll parchment with mud. Before she could attempt to salvage her prized encyclopedia of weaponry, he dove in with merciless Taijutsu in the next instant. She backed off with a frustrated cry and abandoned it, pulling Hok free at her back, ‘Oh he is SO paying for that! That compilation took a month to seal and two-thirds of my arsenal!’

“Heh!” The Rock Genin’s grin was simmering with satisfaction.

He held a Seal of Confrontation as he gathered chakra and it was then Tenten noticed the steel-tipped claws on his hands. They were not the decorative rings she recognized from dance performances of the Thousand Hand Guan Yin at childhood festivals. They were anchored firmly to the knuckles and each wrist, equipped specifically for ripping, ‘Those sure could hurt…and I know he put those on while he hid behind me…’ She frowned in concentration, ‘But I have longer range than him using my sword.’

The footing and evasive maneuvers between the earthy structures Ga-Fen had created was treacherous. Tenten easily outmatched his attacks with her jian, the red hilt-tassel whipping widely as she slashed. When the Rock nin lacked space to counter her he continued spitting jets of mud to keep her at a distance. ‘So much for my range advantage…’ He was fast. Faster than most of her peers, save for Lee, she estimated.

Ga-Fen had gotten behind her in the Mud Labyrinth and nearly stuck his claws into her like a rake in a leaf pile, but she was thinking of Lee and his first match. His victory and his quickness. He’d set the precedent, so surely she could honor her team and do equally as well. Tenten deflected the strike she sensed from behind and fell into a backwards somersault. She kicked a foot up with force, barely missing the young man’s groin, hitting the hip bone, and then stabbed the tip of her sword neatly into the back of her opponent’s calf. While he screamed she continued to roll, ‘Be proud of me, Lee!’ so her second kick knocked him off balance. Tenten almost had him splayed out, miserably caught by the acrobatics, but he defended against the next thrust of her jian. His steel nails krang’d off of her blade.

She did not dare to look, but could tell that Gai was crowing excitedly from up above. She’d cut a line across Ga-Fen’s cheek as he ducked frantically away from her, cursing in Hanwen, and then she was tackled. The Mud Clone’s ambush sent her headfirst through a dry earth wall, crashing through it, and the kidney-punch that followed made her eyes water in agony. The real Rock Genin and his bloodied leg were hastily closing in. ‘Ugh. Nostrils. Breathe. Can’t mouth-breathe, too much dirt.’ Another kidney-punch. ‘Air! Now!’ Somehow she inhaled and bucked free from the hold.

Tenten punctured the Mud Clone’s stomach with Hok and hauled herself to her feet, spying her ruined tool-summoning scroll a few meters away. Oh mercy, what a waste… Such a shame she couldn’t use that new fleet of morning-star spike balls to rain down on him. ‘It would’ve been beautiful.’ The clone dissolved and Ga-Fen came barreling at her with a new bombardment of Earth jutsu, folding the walls and collapsing them around her. A jet of pressurized mud nearly took her head off, but she tumbled out of its way.

As Tenten skidded, she realized she had played into exactly what he’d been hoping for. At the edge of the arena, one of the acute-triangle gaps in the floor was a mere step away from her. She had been corralled by Ninjutsu towards the hole. Before she could oxygenate enough to leap away, jets of mud careened for her, and the painful, filthy splash shot her off the ledge.

Be aware of your environment, bitch. The Rock Genin scolded in Hanwen, And we thought you Leaf shinobi were the biggest threat!

From the railing above, Gai and Lee were fit to burst with indignant howling (Lee especially, having heard the comment.) Neji held up an arm to them while he watched with his Byakugan, “Easy now. Falling does not constitute loss.” He reminded them and they deflated a little, calmer, so he added, “She’s going to make this very painful for him now.”

And on cue, Tenten had swung up from the gap on the opposite side; as did three Shadow Clones from each of the arena’s gaps. She certainly did look angrier. Ga-Fen did not immediately understand that her clones were solid replications and not a Supplementary farce, that was, until they began to dash and swirl around him. Blades caromed against his steel claws and his heart began to pound, ‘They’re real! I got stuck in a match with someone who can use Kage Bunshin?’ With proper timing, he severed the head of a shadow clone with a deadly claw-strike.

Unfortunately, he stepped right into a counterattack as her Dance of the Crescent Moon concluded. Two shadow clones stopped their swords at the front and back of his neck. Tenten stood in front of Ga-Fen, expecting his surrender, but he had prepared another jet of mud to spit at her. She ducked away from it. One of her clones prudently pinned Ga-Fen with a blade through the foot. He screeched and swung at it, foolishly, as the second clone’s sword cut in an upward motion beneath his right hand. Three of his fingers were severed and plopped to the floor, the steel rings falling away uselessly. Right about then his fighting spirit evaporated.

Very appropriately, Shikamaru had returned to the messy arena floor with his thumbs jammed in his ears to block out a 101 decibel scream.

Ga-Fen had fallen to his knees and Tenten dismissed her Shadow Clones, wondering if she had perhaps disqualified herself. ‘I don’t know…Shikamaru said nothing about maiming in the rules. And all of us did sign those waivers a few days ago…’

The referee squatted down beside the crumpled Genin, “Yo…I’m going to call it unless you get up and defeat her.” Shikamaru inclined his head towards Tenten, “That was legal, by the way.”

“Oh. That’s good.” She kept Hok ready in her hand.

Ga-Fen tilted his head to look at Shikamaru, rasping, Get fucked you ugly motherfucker, you and this bitch. If it wasn’t against the rules I would have killed her at the start!

Shikamaru blinked at him and then stood, “Great. Didn’t know we’d have to call in a translator for any of these matches. What’s he speaking?”

“Hanwen.” Tenten informed him, “He called you ugly. And some other things…”

“Eh?” He was mildly surprised, “Right. You and Lee speak that, I’ve heard. Got it.” Shikamaru raised his hand towards Tenten, “Tenten is the winner of this match.”

Ga-Fen’s wailing grunts got the attention of the uniformed medic-nins rushing into the arena, but not the attention of his team. His sensei, Sekieima, and his brother Qin watched him from the rails but made no move to go to him. Huo was too busy staring at Tenten to give a damn about what had happened. One medic collected the discarded fingers and the other escorted Ga-Fen away.

Tenten stowed Hok at her back and retrieved her now useless tool-scroll, ‘Well I did it…but I kind of had to. He wasn’t the type to give up without some serious persuasion.’ Her back ached from the brutal punches, ‘God, what an asshole. I don’t feel that bad about it…but I wonder if they can reattach his fingers?’ She was genuinely curious if it could be done. Tenten climbed the staircase back towards the top floor, dusting dried mud from her white cheongsam, ‘This probably won’t wash out.’

She emerged at the observation deck to the loud, excited utterings of her Leaf compatriots. Lee, of course, was the loudest as he squeezed her shoulders happily.

Hinata was tugging on her sleeve and looked to be near tears, “Onee-san, your back…”

“I’ll be fine, Hinata.” She smiled at the younger girl, “But do you mind looking at my head? I hit it pretty hard.” Tenten bent to let the Hyuga princess press healing hands against her scalp. ‘Ah, that’s better. No more wall diving for me.’ The fall had also messed up her chignons and her hair was all over the place, half-tied, ‘I’ll put it up again in a little while…’

Gai probably did not realize he had stepped in front of Neji and cut off his comments. “Excellent form and showmanship, Tenten! That was precisely what I expected of my student.”

“Thank you, Gai-sensei.” She said as Hinata worked.

The man took the muddied and destroyed scroll from her hands, “Hmm. I will have this replaced prior to your final matches.”

“I’ll replace it sensei, it’s expensive.”

“Accept my gesture or I will take it as an insult!” He warned.

Tenten gave in, “Fine.”

Gai moved on to gloat directly in Kakashi’s face (The first match was my team’s triumph once again!) and Neji finally got a word in edgewise to his girlfriend, “Let Hinata-sama examine your back as well.”

“Really, I feel okay. Just my-”

“There is damage.” His tone got stern.

Tenten let her shoulders sag and she gave an imperceptible nod to Hinata. The younger girl finished her work at the crown of Tenten’s head and moved to her lower back, laying her hands over the area gently.

“He throttled me a little.” Tenten admitted quietly, “He was faster and stronger than I expected.”

“He adapted quickly to your style and tried to sabotage your techniques and ranged attacks.” Neji shrugged, “He was outclassed, regardless.”

“Thank you. Did I look beautiful crashing into things and getting covered in mud?”

He grunted, “Hardly.”

“Yeah.” She sighed, mentioning, “Thanks, Hinata. That’s a lot better.”
“I’m glad. Let me know if it starts to bother you again.” Hinata straightened and patted the older kunoichi on the arm, whispering, “I saw Neji-niisan flinch when you were struck.”

“Did he?” She kept her voice low, seeing that the Hyuga heir had turned back to lean on the rail and watch the screen as names cycled.

'It’s been a long road, but here you are, Neji…letting people witness empathy we never thought we’d get out of you. Not even Naruto could make you do that.’ A smile tugged at Tenten’s lips, ‘Thank goodness your improvement has been cumulative; otherwise you’d probably think people combust when they kiss. Now you know better, don’t you?”

Over the top of Hinata’s head she could see Sakura, Ino, and Tama down the length of the walkway, waving and pantomiming congratulations to her. ‘We can do it girls. We may have to castrate some people today, but we are going to the final rounds.’ She grinned back at her friends.

Shikamaru’s voice drifted up from the arena floor, “The second match will be between Akimichi Chouji and Korekiyo Kimori.”

Tenten squeezed herself between Neji and Lee at the hand rail, all craning their necks to watch Chouji hand off a bag of chips to Fujita and give assurance to his team. Once he entered the closed stairwell, Tenten looked across the room to the team of Cloud Genin. It was evident that the toothpick-thin boy, Kimori, was nervous, likely more because of stage fright and less because of the appearance of his portly opponent. ‘Watch out there, Chicken-Neck, Chouji can pick you up and play croquet with you.’ Tenten thought to herself.

Beside her, Lee deduced as he held his chin, “Chouji-kun will win.”

“You seem so sure, Lee.”

“Attitude reveals much about a match. That Genin has been sulking since his team arrived. The Forest must have given them difficulties.”

“Hm. I suppose you have a point there.” Out of curiosity she asked, “Hey, how was my attitude before my match?”

Lee turned to her with a smile so wide it crinkled his eyes, “Courageous.”

That did it. Tenten hugged his arm tightly and thanked him. On her opposite side Neji spoke, “There was no one better to lead us into these matches. Even I did not feel prepared.”

“Now that I don’t believe. You’ve got…they’re like…carbon-steel nerves.” Tenten insisted, “You’d have been fine, Neji. Shikamaru just announced it abruptly, was all.”

He made a soft sound of disagreement before they turned their attention to the arena floor.

Chouji had arrived first, and though Shikamaru made a valiant attempt to restrain himself, he smiled at his best friend. A low chuckle rumbled from the hefty young man. They had both deduced that the wafer-thin Cloud Genin was a first-time participant. Kimori had lollygagged and hesitated all the way down the stairs, eventually turning up to stand face-to-face with his older, larger Leaf ninja opponent.

‘Seems to me…” Shikamaru thought to himself, ‘This kid’s biggest threat is his own nerves.’

He flagged his hand down, “Begin!” And then he returned to the observation area to enjoy Chouji’s imminent thrashing of the inexperienced twerp.
Chouji waited for Kimori to make a move, grimacing in confusion when the boy slipped his hand to a thigh holster, palmed a kunai and then froze. His knees were quaking as he stood.

‘Shit, Chouji’s not that scary is he?’ Shikamaru glanced over to Asuma and then Tsunade, noticing that they were plainly puzzled too, ‘The Cloud kid has stage fright to the max…’

Chouji took a moment to reflect on an appropriate way to handle a terrified first-timer in a fight. As he was a compassionate soul, he wanted to end it mercifully, ‘I don’t exactly want to snap his fingers off like Tenten did earlier…’ But waiting for an awkward signal to attack was going to draw out a tooth-crtingingly bad match. ‘I’ll give him a free shot. Yeah. Poor kid could probably use it…’

“Hey,” Chouji waved at the other genin, whose eyes had glazed over, “It’s your first match ever, right? I totally understand.” He pressed his thumb against the swirl on his cheek, “Go ahead and try to hit me. I won’t make a move until you do.”

He heard Ino groaning reproachfully in the background.

In response, Kimori went wide-eyed with shock. A moment later, as if it were an involuntary action, he hurled the kunai with force and it pinged off of Chouji’s armor chestplate, clattering to the floor. Chouji stood there and glanced at the wasted weapon, discouraged. ‘He just squandered a free shot…’

Shikamaru covered his face with a hand, beginning to feel embarrassed by watching, ‘If he can’t capitalize on Chouji letting his guard down then he deserves to lose…’

While the proctor was chagrinned by the young Cloud Genin wobbling and sweating in the arena, other spectators had a healthy dose of schadenfreude. The older Grass team was hooting in delight.

“Grow some balls!” The Grass team’s tallest young man jeered.

The Grass kunoichi chimed in, “Need a change of pants down there?”

They guffawed wildly until their sensei, Mahoto, angrily shushed them.

Many of the Leaf Genin were sympathetic but watched in respectful silence. By the time Chouji made a running charge towards Kimori and prepared his Multi-Size technique, the infectious laughter of the Grass team had spread to other spectators.

Kimori was on the verge of tears as he hurled a full barrage of kunai, which Chouji blocked as a true professional blocks; with a giant arm bracer. The Leaf ninja was now over six meters tall and it appeared hopeless.

“For fuck’s sake! You’re faster than him, Kimori!” One of his teammates shouted down from the rails, “Don’t think about what you saw before—look at what’s in front of you!”

That encouragement was the spark of sense that motivated Kimori to dive out of the way of a sweeping, meters-wide palm strike. It stamped a hand-shaped crater in the arena floor, crumbling the last of the Earth jutsu debris from the first match. Kimori rushed hand signs and produced a crackling static field that stretched the length of the room. All it seemed to do was stand Chouji’s hair on end.

Kimori’s teammates were hollering encouragement, trying to combat the laughing of other teams. When another palm-strike came careening down the Cloud Genin leapt like a grasshopper, grew a spine, and ran up the giant’s arm, ducking beneath another behemoth hand swiping at him.

Shikamaru was impressed that some bravery had mobilized the newcomer.
Chouji got a grip on Kimori a mere moment after two paper-tag nodes were slapped on his mammoth neck, and the resulting Lightning-Style shock stunned him. Kimori slipped out of his grasp and fell to the floor, retreating as his enormous opponent toppled. Chouji’s Multi-Size jutsu wore off, and as he shrank he was still clearly in control of his faculties after Kimori’s attack. The zap had not been strong enough to stop him. Chouji rolled forward in an effect of his Bullet Tank technique, built speed, and then propelled himself behind Kimori.

The younger Genin was swiftly contorted into an arm-lock at his back (the next shock-tag fluttered to the floor) and Chouji flattened Kimori, pressing his face into dirty tiles until he wheezed. Actually, Shikamaru thought, Chouji looked quite elegant right there; having pinned Kimori as he waited on bent knee, holding a kunai in warning to the boy’s throat, ‘Stylish! Chouji’s obviously been working on his flourish while I’ve been away. I don’t give points for that though.’

Kimori slapped the floor with his free hand, turning blue. His teammates above were clamoring in frustration while Shikamaru called the match, “The winner of the second match is Chouji.”

Chouji stood and released the toothpick-Genin who rolled over, gulping down air. The laughing spectators had quieted, and that was probably because Kimori had at least tried, in spite of his predictable defeat. Of course his team was going to be disappointed he lost to a fat guy, but as Kimori trudged out of the arena he noticed a friendly wave from his Leaf opponent as he returned to the stairs. Maybe there were worse people to fight, he figured. Chouji had not wanted to humiliate him, and Kimori planned to keep that in mind.

Shikamaru’s mood elevated slightly. It was a bit of an ego trip to see his best friend have a fast and flashy win. He caught Asuma grinning and muttering excitedly to Ino up above. Fujita was still clapping. ‘These matches will probably all be relatively one-sided, I bet. Leaf has the strongest competitors.’ Shikamaru tapped a small remote in his pocket to cycle through participant names again on the screen.

By the time Chouji and Kimori had reappeared on the floor above to spectate, two new names were selected on the digital readout. Shikamaru made the announcement, “The third match will be between Tenro Masugama and Rock Lee.”

The “Woo!” of excitement was piercing, and immediately followed by Lee and Gai shouting words of fortitude at each other. Tenten watched them with a sheepish look as Neji tuned out the youthful warbling, looking across the way to where the Dream Genin, Masugama, was calmly adjusting his belt and bracers. Shikamaru could tell by the look on Neji’s face that, more than likely, Masugama was not among weak candidates of this round.

‘I don’t know much about Dream ninja. They obviously like bright colors.’ It was a very private and secluded hidden village. Shikamaru had heard a statistic prior to the First Stage stating that the chance of encountering a Dream shinobi on a mission within the Fire Country is about 3 percent, and outside of the Fire Country, less than 1 percent. ‘They don’t get out much.’

He watched tepidly as Lee did an acrobatic, vaulting somersault off of the rail and landed neatly beside him. “Shikamaru-kun, I hope to be representative of our village’s distinction in this match! Please wish me luck.” Lee was making a fist, wide-eyed and hyped.

Shikamaru sighed softly, “Lee…you probably won’t need it…but good luck.”

Masugama descended the stairs in a red and pink, fur-trimmed gi. He was a rather handsome fellow; brunette, pale-skinned, and amber eyes with red paint swiped across the bottom lid. His Yumegakure headband was fitted on a black, happuri-style face plate, with the top prongs rising above his head as if they were animal ears. Masugama smiled amiably at Lee for all of one second before the Lee faced his opponent with calm confidence and a tiny smile on his face, like always. Shikamaru kept his eyes on them as he retreated from the arena, “Begin!”

And they met like two battering-rams an instant later, vibrating the room with force.

‘Well shit.’ Shikamaru thought. Lee had gotten himself a serious opponent.

He observed Lee’s full-powered punches and kicks, which were the stuff of legend these days, be countered blow-for-blow. Masugama was a Taijutsu expert.

The regulation Leaf Whirlwind was aimed squarely for Masugama’s head, but the Dream ninja took the blow, buffering it with an arm, and as he tumbled his own kick caught Lee’s shoulder. They parted, recovered, and then resumed their mirror-like brawl. There was a long period of exhausting, bone-crushing blows that made the less experienced Genin spectators cringe in fright. The techniques used told the Leaf and Dream combatants a lot about one another.

Ah, this one is strong. He has trained for a long time!

Wow, great kick.

He has a youthful spirit!

He’s fought someone like me before. He isn’t making mistakes…

I can already tell he wants to use Ninjutsu! He looks stressed!

Yeesh…this person needs a shower. Or…is that me who stinks? Damn that Forest of Death.

Without warning, Lee assessed that the match up was unfavorable, and thusly swapped his Iron-Fist style for something far less conventional. Shikamaru gawked in shock when Rock Lee bent almost 90 degrees to avoid a wall-shattering punch. He flattened, rolled, rose up on his shins, and then spun the Dream genin like a top with a twin-knuckle strike. Masugama was spread-eagled on the floor for a moment and his teammates gasped. Surprised, Masugama leapt back to assess his now-tottering opponent, who swayed as if intoxicated.

Shikamaru was somewhat privy to what was happening, ‘Ino told me about this. She said Lee and Neji have been training with Lee’s grandfather…who is a master of the most bizarre martial arts this side of the world has seen…

His ear perked up when he heard a titter of laughter from Tsunade, who was not expecting Drunken Fist to be employed while sober. ‘She better not offer Lee that sake flask in her back pocket or I’ll expel her from the tower…’

Unfortunately for Masugama, none of his attacks came close to landing after that point. Lee shimmied and whirled around him with ease. Masugama’s teammates roared in a fury from above, demanding that he “make mincemeat” of the silly Leaf ninja.

Neji was watching with a smug expression, as if he knew something that no one else did. Tenten’s grip on the handrail was tightening, and she tried not to blink for fear of missing one of Lee’s gymnastic miracles, ‘Holy-! He’s like rubber! And Lee didn’t even drink anything.’ She chuckled excitedly to herself, ‘Wong Leung…I wish you could see Lee in action right now…’

Masugama was twice bashed in the face in quick succession after Lee capably evaded him. It stoked his anger. After being tripped, kicked, face-planted, and nearly getting trapped in Lee’s attempted chokehold, Masugama let out a cry of rage, “If I’m gonna fight a noodle then prepare to get eaten, you scrub!”

Masugama pricked his thumb on the sharp edge of his armor and swiped a blot of blood onto Lee’s jumpsuit. The Dream ninja then snapped a scroll off of his belt, and front flipped away from his Leaf opponent as the parchment unfurled. Lee rapidly deduced it was intended for a kind of Ninjutsu. The notion was reinforced when he heard some chattering erupt between Kakashi and Gai from the observation area.

Lee kept his distance, but made Masugama dance and evade with well-aimed kunai. Of course, by then, Masugama had added blood to the scroll’s parchment. It swirled and then rolled shut as the Dream ninja pressed it to the floor, “Doton: Tracking Fang jutsu!”

There was a soft rumble, and the way the tiles of the arena floor cracked and displaced was surely a sign that something was on its way up from below. ‘Troubling! But I will try to avoid it!’ Lee could have sworn he heard something about “it’ll bite you” from the rails above before he made a circus-leap away from the eruption in the floor, where a set of jaws shot up in an effort to catch him.

A tawny, white-footed wolf exploded onto the scene and locked-on to the scent of blood on Lee. It raced on a path parallel to its master’s, synchronized with Masugama as they charged.

Lee was reminded of Kiba’s combined efforts with Akamaru, albeit the wolf was wearing a vest with two large axe-blades secured to its back. Pretentious, Lee wanted to call it. He could guess why Masugama had not strutted around with a weapon-strapped companion canine throughout the Exam, ‘It would have left very little to the imagination…’

Lee evaded with all of the speed and flexibility he could muster, bending away from Masugama’s furious punches and the wolf’s spinning blade attacks. For all of his grandfather’s training and guidance with Drunken Fist, it was no longer enough to avoid his opponent completely. He was forced into close-quarters against two threats. Masugama finally landed a punch to the stomach just as Lee dropped a heel-kick on the Dream ninja’s head, watching with slight satisfaction as the happuri face plate was knocked akimbo; the headband slid down over Masugama’s eyes. In the embarrassing moment Masugama retreated to clear his vision, he got a mouthful of Lee’s second kick. Masugama skidded over the floor, bloodied, but made a yip sound to his wolf.

The summoned creature stopped its twisting attacks and lunged at the opportune moment. It bit into on Lee’s left hand. Lee swallowed a cry of hellish pain, eyes watering, and with his free hand reached into the storage pouch at his back, ‘Agh! This is no disrespect to you, majestic creature!’ He drew out his nunchaku, rotated it around his arm, and cracked the bar over the wolf’s head. The jaws tearing into his flesh loosened a little. Lee could hear Tenten shrieking up above.

He could tell Masugama was on his feet again and ready to take advantage of his entrapment. With precise timing, Lee fell to his back and somersaulted; the wolf still attached to his hand, and let Masugama run headlong into the blades on his wolf’s back. All fell in a tangled, bloody heap, devoid of elegance. The Leaf ninja had to smash the wolf between the ears once more before he was free.
Bleeding profusely, Lee staggered away. At that point, the wolf was suffering some significant cognitive damage.
“Beppu!” Masugama was snapping his fingers in front of the wolf’s face, “You okay boy? Oh man, just stay down! I’ll finish this!” The dizzied wolf stayed on the floor, whimpering.

The Dream ninja stared at Lee furiously, “I’m not letting you get away with that! You hear me?” He flashed through hand signs rapidly, chakra flaring, and began to undergo a transformation.

Lee turned inward for a moment to reflect on his foolishness. The first two matches he had watched had lured him into a false sense of security, thinking he would not have to expend too much energy in his own fight. He had felt confident that the new skills he’d acquired would be sufficient for a preliminary match, ‘I should not have underestimated an opponent I have never faced before. He is a tremendous shinobi!’ Lee meant that literally too: Masugama had expanded his form and bulked up into a pink-and-purple wolf beast; ears, teeth, muzzle, tail and all.

It had been a good call to open two of his Inner Gates by that time, as it afforded him just enough speed to avoid the wrecking, colorful hulk that came baying for him. Lee bent and slipped through the beastly Masugama’s legs, lashing out at his ankles with nunchaku, and then rolled away when deadly claws thundered down beside him. Lee wrapped a leg around the transformed ninja’s beefy arm and sidled up, Drunken Fist grace sparing him from harm, and pulled the threshing chain taught around his enemy’s neck. It was a very thick neck and Masugama was not struggling to breathe at all. Not a wise move in this instance, Lee determined too late.

The man-beast rolled, squashing Lee flat on the floor on his back, and then reached to pull the winded Leaf ninja off. Masugama snapped his pink and super-powered arm, hurling Lee across the room like a play thing. He hit a wall and slid down slowly to the floor, barely staying on his feet.

Lee’s vision was blurry. He remembered to breathe, pushing past physical pain and threw open the Third Gate, his skin flushing red. ‘I must push back against this opponent! Like Tenten did before, she could not expect to be handed a victory in her match! I must take it.’

When Masugama came loping, closing the distance between them, Lee took off at an untraceable speed. He zipped along a wall, flitted to the opposite side of the room, and then came crashing back, using Masugama’s head as a springboard. He rocketed off, knocking the wolf-nin sideways, and Lee scaled the height of the room towards the tower’s ceiling. Growling, Masugama made a mighty, pink-furred leap, ignored the terrified squeals of the Rain team as he passed them at the rail, and climbed after Lee.

Neji still knew what few others in the room knew. He had a good idea of what Lee planned to do next, and that was because he had spent many weeks with Lee as they honed their skills without Tenten’s company. Gai had provided several melee weapons for Lee to reward his practice in their handling. Accordingly, Neji had sealed a few of those new tools into a scroll for his friend, which of course he was prohibited from providing Lee with in a one-on-one match. But Lee was not using a standard-issue nunchaku, Neji recalled. He had packed a modified version for the first day of the exam.

While monkeying around in the top rafters, too fast and nimble for the lumbering Masugama to catch, Lee tenderized his opponent with aerial kicks. As soon as a retaliating claw came swiping for him, Lee made his move. He extended the chain between the nunchaku’s bars, and snared the Dream ninja’s large wrist in it. Lee vaulted from a support beam, too slippery to catch, and secured the beast man’s other arm. Half a moment later, they were flying into a Drunken-Fist-Front-Lotus as Masugama thrashed, and just made his entry into the tiles of the floor more painful. The impact rattled the room again, and a cloud of dust and crumbled plaster wafted up.

Sounds of awe punctuated the quiet of the dusty room. Below, one of the combatants was still moving.
Lee untangled his weapon from Masugama, his transformation broken, and stumbled away from the small crater. Shikamaru descended curiously and fanned the dust cloud from his face. Lee bent double and caught his breath. Nearby, Masugama was unconscious. Shikamaru noted the wolf named Beppu a few meters to the right, panting tiredly on the floor as blood trickled from its ears. ‘I hope Lee didn’t hurt that thing enough to end its life…he’d be morally devastated. Better hurry this up.’

He crossed over to Masugama and crouched down, speaking loudly, “You awake?”

No answer.

“Hell of a fight, though.” Shikamaru conceded to the colorful ninja, then stood and announced, “Lee is the winner of this match!”

Lee laughed jubilantly. Many Leaf ninja were cheering with residual excitement, all except for Neji. With folded arms, he was watching his friend with a look of approval.

A medic-nin checked Lee’s bitten hand and took a minute to doctor it up. Two other medics scurried over to Masugama and used smelling salts to wake him. He jerked into a sitting position, sputtering, and a medic-nin braced his neck and asked him to hold still while he was examined. Beppu was taken out of the tower to receive treatment for severe head trauma. Once the third match’s combatants were cared for and cleared, they both returned upstairs to the observation deck.

Shikamaru frowned at the disheveled and chipped arena floor, ‘They’ve made a mess already. By the time these matches are over we’ll have to do a complete renovation…’

He cycled through names on the screen again and waited before making the next announcement, “The fourth match will be between Yanagisawa Aota and Paik Minho.”

Shikamaru paused and glanced around. They were obviously the names of newcomers and not Leaf ninja he recognized. He could see one of the older Grass Genin moving towards the stairwell and, a short distance away, another of the Cloud Genin was also preparing to make his way down. From what he could glean with a superficial look, Shikamaru guessed that the Cloud team were trainees that had only just left the Academy maybe eight to ten months ago. The Grass team, on the other hand, looked as though they had the same amount of experience as Leaf genin participants, or potentially longer than that. ‘They’re cool as cucumbers. They were kind of acting like assholes to the younger Genin too, which means they probably have the chops to back it up.’

The Grass ninja, Aota, arrived first. He was tall and olive-skinned, dressed in a dark forest-camo gi, black pants and boots. He had an easy smile and odd pearl-pink eyes. At his back, Shikamaru noted, was a stack of four different tool scrolls, ‘Yeah. That’s no Academy graduate…’

The younger genin, Minho, descended with a determined look on his face. To his credit, he was not as wimpy-looking as his teammate Kimori had been, but he wasn’t much bigger. His pale hair stuck out under from his bandana. Minho’s track suit was the typical black and white of Kumogakure.

Shikamaru looked between the two as they stared each other down, assessing, letting ego flood them with resolve and adrenalin. Making sure he would not trip over a dislodged tile on the floor, Shikamaru signaled to them, “Begin!” And then took his leave of the arena.

Minho immediately hurled a smoke bomb. He disappeared into a dense cloud of black gas that consumed the entire arena floor. Some spectators complained about the visual blackout that lasted for over a minute, but the faint chinks of kunai clashing could be heard. Neji reported sidelong to his teammates that “nothing interesting” was happening.
When the smoke cover had cleared, the Grass genin, Aota, was still attacking wildly with a long dagger. Any spectator would guess that he had been ensnared in a Genjutsu, and that Minho had used his cover to layer an illusion within it.

Before Aota had the chance to snap himself out of it, Minho had been able to slink up behind him. The smaller boy plunged two kunai into his opponent’s back with a war-cry. When he pulled his knives free, the older boy fell to his knees and crumbled into a tower of pond lilies. Within the smoke distraction, Aota had left behind a Flower Clone.

A sharp whistle sounded from across the room.

Mouth agape, the Cloud genin whirled around when he was addressed. Aota was standing confidently and poised to strike, “It’s Minho, right? Weren’t you paying attention, Minho?”

The older genin leapt high from his hiding place in a floor gap. He thrashed open a tool summoning scroll and let weapons fly down en masse at the youngster. Minho blocked a fair portion of the barrage, but weapons that scattered down all around him were wrapped with small green buds. The buds burst into sprouting, thorned vines, and wound quickly up Minho’s legs. The Cloud team was hollering its concern, futilely, as the young Cloud ninja fumbled in his next attempted jutsu.

With a playful laugh, Aota leapt again, clearing out the full volume of a second, crueler tool scroll. A variety of expertly aimed weapons shredded the helpless Cloud nin. The room was hushed into silence after witnessing the decisive attack. The jounin sensei of the Cloud team gave a pointed look to Shikamaru, imploring that he step in. Below, sounds of pain squeaked out of Minho as he fell at an awkward angle, stuck-full like a training dummy in a weapon practice yard.

Aota walked calmly across the room, rolling the scroll shut, “Kid, that’s what happens when you get into a fight over your head. You ought to know when it’s better to surrender. You’re lucky I wasn’t serious…”

Shikamaru held an arm up in front of him, “Stay back for now.” He approached Minho who was groaning, slouched over, “Can you continue?” He got an eeerg in response.

Shikamaru supposed, “Guess that’s a no.” He turned around and extended a hand towards Aota, “The winner is Aota.”

Aota waved up at his grinning teammates while proceeding to the stairwell. Medic-nin carefully guided Minho from the arena, who just barely had strength left to walk.

On the observation deck, Tenten had pressed her thumb to her lips, thinking hard about what she had just seen, ‘He’s…well, he’s obviously a Weapons Master like me. AND he modified his weapon summoning with some kind of plant jutsu…’ She tapped anxiously at her mouth, ‘That was inspired. Great…maybe I need to work on my own technique, which was honestly sub-par today. I don’t want to lose another scroll because of a competitor again. It was careless and stupid! Aota made it all look so easy.’

Neji nudged her silently, coaxing her out of her contemplation. She noticed his knowing look, with a single eyebrow arched, advising her to not fretfully compare herself to another Weapon-Expert. Tenten let out a cleansing breath, muttering her thanks to him.

Shikamaru had begun the selection for the next match’s opponents. As soon as Sato’s name blinked up on the board a huge smile spread on his face, and he patted Hinata and Shino’s shoulders on either side of him. “I’m gonna look hot.” He decided.
Hinata replied in a soft reprimand, “Sato-kun, please focus! You might have a difficult opponent like Lee-kun did.”

“That’d be even better, Sunshine, honestly.”

Shino indicated who his competitor was with a turn of his head, “You are fighting that foreigner over there.”

Hinata and Sato followed his line of sight back to the Grass team, who had gotten a consecutive match to compete in. The genin who had just parted for the stairs looked to be a capable ninja. Maybe what Shino meant by “foreigner” could have had something to do with the genin’s unusual name; simply, Noé. No surname was visible on the digital board beneath the characters reading Hatake Sato. Or maybe it was that tall Grass ninja’s appearance: light hair and eyes, strong and lean, with clothing that was oddly reminiscent of a pirate. In any case, Sato was excited.

Kurenai stood behind her three pupils, exuding a tranquil energy, “You’ll be just fine, Sato. Bring back our team’s first victory.”

“I will, Sensei!” Chipper, he hopped over the handrail and into the arena below.

Upon his arrival, Shikamaru gave Sato a: don’t do anything unnecessary look, as he often did. Though he had discovered in the last few months that he got along well with Sato, and on some days even had the same sense of humor as the Hatake… ‘He has a way of putting his foot in his mouth if he isn’t careful. Do NOT disappoint me here.’

“Gotcha.” Sato breathed quietly. He got the message.

Noé stood tall and sturdy in the arena, with a vertical sword scabbard on his back. One could make an educated guess about how he liked to fight. Likewise, Noé had the same consideration of Sato while spying the two short chakra-sabers tied at his hips.

Shikamaru looked to them both briefly before raising his hand, “Let the fifth match,” And dropped it, “Begin!”

Noé pulled a zip-string from his leather coat that shot a clip of small razor kunai at the Leaf ninja. Typically, Sato took evasive maneuvers and elected to fight passively. He was better at responding to attacks than initiating them. He blocked and rolled as projectiles came soaring for his head. With two hand seals and a sneaky finger-waggle suggestion, Sato had cast a subtle Genjutsu, letting it steep slowly into Noé’s consciousness.

After ducking beneath a deadly sword swipe, he spared a hint of chakra to summon Aree and Aroo. The two tiny owls hooted in greeting but did not put themselves to immediate use. They circled around and swooped, aware that Sato would signal when he needed something. Noé initially paid them no mind.

As ranged attacks with weapons had gotten him nowhere, Noé drew his worryingly long sword and charged. His Grass teammates were barking reminders at him from up above. Sato accordingly parried with a short sword and let his illusion strengthen. White, downy feathers began to float in a swirling storm around the arena. Noé could see them fluttering down from the ceiling like snow, and also puffing up in tufts from gaps in the floor. He felt them brushing his cheek. He mistook it for a Ninjutsu, ‘Shit! Did those birds do this? I should take them out…’

Sato flitted in and out of sight, blended and distorted by the feather illusion. It only reinforced Noé’s mistaken notion of what the problem was. With impressive speed and footwork, Noé successfully knocked Aree out of the air with a slash of his blade, severing a few contour feathers. She plopped to the floor, alive, and her brother owl circled in tooting fright.

Before Noé could skewer Aree, Sato flashed forward to parry again in her defense. With his free arm he pulled Noé into a pseudo-handshake, “Hi there!” And tripped Noé in a dance like move across his extended leg. Noé went crashing to the floor on his face, listening to the Leaf ninja scold, “Be nice to these birds, please. They’re like my kids.”

Aree had hopped away to safety, grounded. Noé hurdled to his feet and swung his sword with two hands, “Don’t bring precious lives into battle!”

“Dude! Sometimes you have no choice!” Sato countered with both of his sabers, “What about your teammates, huh? They aren’t precious?”

“They watch their own backs.” Noé struck with a blow so hard it flung Sato across the room a ways, “When a team is able to take care of themselves separately, that’s what makes it a great team.”

Sato conceded, from his spot on the floor, that he kind of had a point. He gave a hand signal to Aroo above.

His feather illusion had granted him a few seconds of safety, as the not-so-astute Grass ninja was still having difficulties spotting him through the Genjutsu. Aroo flew in circles, releasing bursts of real feathers to mix with the imaginary storm. It was what Sato liked to call a practical illusion, a term Kurenai had coined after she had seen it in use. Layering real distractions with Genjutsu made it harder for an opponent to judge what was false. Eventually, Noé did find him and took another swing as his head.

And while in the middle of the fight, to Shikamaru’s disdain, Sato did stick his foot in his mouth.

“So, are you really a foreigner? What does your name mean?”

Noé’s temper ticked up a fraction.

Sato ventured, “Looks like you’re dressed for one of those geek conventions…”

And then Noé snapped, roaring furiously, and landed an unexpected, tall-person kick that leveled Sato. The chakra saber slipped from Sato’s hand and spun across the floor. Noé took a flying leap in the hope of chopping him as one does a wood stack. Sato back flipped several times to avoid the vicious sword swipes, and after a round-off he rushed hand seals. He was preparing a new clone technique he had wanted to demonstrate for his uncle.

Noé took that millisecond to pull a dastardly-looking mushroom from his pocket, and in a practiced motion, used the tip of his sword to fling it into Sato’s open mouth. Noé kicked him again, lost sight of him in the feather-whorl as Sato tumbled, but could hear Sato choking on what he had accidentally ingested.

“Enjoy that, you tactless dishtowel…” Noé sneered.

Hacking, Sato cleared his throat and stood, “…it’s Sato, actually. Maybe you misheard…”

Eyes furious and wide, Noé swore in terms the Hatake could not decipher, Bête comme ses pieds!

The clone that Sato had produced with seals earlier pounced on Noé from behind. He swung his broadsword and cut it down the middle, balking in shock when the clone burst on him like a broken water balloon. It degraded in to a black, sticky mass. Weighed down with a sword coated in the stuff,
Noé made the effort to run and break loose, but found himself stumbling in the substance.

Aroo flew by and let a dusting of white down feathers fall on the trapped Grass ninja’s head. Sato finished choking and stowed his blades away. He spoke directly to his opponent, “I’m sorry if I made you angry, but give up now. You can’t get away from a Tar Clone.”

“Foutre le camp, abruti!” Noé continued thrashing, “I’m not losing to an uncultured fuck like you!”

While Sato took a moment to let the insult sink in, Aree had clambered up to his shoulder and perched. He was frankly amazed that Noé had still not realized he was under a Genjutsu. ‘I mean, it’s okay for him to be upset, but if he overlooks something so crucial how does he expect to win?’ By then, Noé was tarred and feathered and many Genin watching were laughing their heads off. Noé’s self-esteem was plummeting.

“Surrender, or we can do this the hard way.” Sato warned him again, holding a hand seal.

“You think you’re going to live after swallowing that mushroom, you idiot?” Noé hissed, “That came from Hidden Grass’ poison forest. Let’s see who drops dead first!”

And Sato thought, ‘Well that does it.’

He completed hand signs for a miniscule fire jutsu, “Katon: Lighter Thread!”

The burning spark lit up the tar that Noé was coated with. The Grass ninja continued to be stubborn for a few seconds before he began screaming bloody murder, essentially a human bonfire.

Shikamaru descended quickly to call the match, “The winner of this match is Sato.” He turned to the Hatake and added sternly, “Medic-nin are to your right. Don’t die. You left me a big enough mess as it is…”

“No…” Sato gave an apologetic wave before meeting a medical professional at the edge of the room. His owls both poofed back home at his request.

Shikamaru realized the burning genin was going to be a problem because:

A) Stop, drop, and roll via Shadow Bind was not working while Noé was stuck to the floor.

B) The Grass team’s sensei, Mahoto, had used a water jutsu that failed to put out the flames (Guess not all tar is water soluble, fuck, Sato, why did you do that?)

C) Other concerned Jounin were puzzling about what to do.

D) Tsunade was not doing much of anything to help.

E) Gaara was about ready to douse the kid in sand (Which could accidentally kill him anyway, Kazekage-sama) and…

F) Kakashi said he had a weird, new technique he could try, which did not make Shikamaru feel any more comfortable with people trying to get close to assist.

Chouji spoke sidelong to Fujita at the rails while watching the mayhem, “Sato screws things up sometimes.”

Abruptly, the flames flickered and went out.

Noé’s screams ended. All heads turned to follow Shikamaru’s gaze as the proctor had sensed who had gotten involved. They noticed Huo at the observation rail, glowering as he lowered his hand. An eerie silence hung as many realized he had extinguished the Grass genin, but hardly anyone knew how.

“Did you want him to keep burning?” Huo sniped at the incredulous looks directed at him, “You’re all wasting time. Let’s get on with this.”

At about that point, Shikamaru felt a niggling, wary feeling about that particular Rock ninja. ‘How the hell did he just do that? He barely even moved a muscle…’

Things calmed down and medics were able to escort Noé away on a stretcher. His sensei, Mahoto, worriedly followed after the medic-nin and left the room. Aota and the kunoichi of his team remained, speaking in hushed tones to each other.

Tama had begun fidgeting between Kiba and Sakura. After Sato had been escorted away to be treated she felt a tightness in her chest. ‘I know he’ll be fine, but...I’ve always found it difficult to watch Sato-kun fight. I worry even when I know better!’

Kiba could tell what she was thinking about, “He’ll be back in a few minutes, Tama. Poison sure as heck isn’t as bad as being burned alive, don’t you agree?”

“Kiba-kun,” Sakura spoke testily, “We’ll all do whatever it takes to win these matches. That Grass ninja is going to live too, you know.”

“It was still gruesome.” Kakashi chimed in behind them, flipping a page of Icha Icha Paradise, “I need to have a talk with my nephew about the concept of excess.”

“I said that Grass ninja will be fine.” Sakura repeated, hoping to prevent a wave of guilt from crashing into Tama, “So that tar will be hard to clean up— but treating burns is one of the first things medic-nin learn to do around here. We live in the Fire Country!”

“It’s alright.” Tama assured her quietly, “I guess I’m a little nervous. I’ve never done this before and these matches are nothing like what I expected.”

“They never are.” Kiba agreed.

Tama reached down to pat Akamaru’s head, starting to relax. Sakura went on to discuss how Noé would have fared better if he had poisoned Sato at the start of the match. Kakashi concurred that it was a blunder, and that Sato had distracted Noé at the beginning of the fight; likely making Noé forget about his option to cripple a strong adversary. And, not surprisingly, Sato’s prodding remarks had also goaded Noé into stupid mistakes.

“If someone is still susceptible to trash talk at this point in the Exam, and messes up because of it, I don’t think they’d make Chunin anyway.” Kiba observed, eliciting a nod from his sensei.

The announcement for the next match made Tama reach out and hold Sakura’s arm in surprise.

“The sixth match will be between Srisati Tio and Haruno Sakura.” Shikamaru called.

“That’s a Rain genin.” Kakashi updated Sakura quietly, subtly pointing out a small boy in a rebreather mask to the far left of the observation deck, “And if I do say so...he looks like a greenhorn to me.”

Kiba chuckled in delight.
“Well,” Sakura tugged on one of her gloves, “I better teach him a thing or two.” She gave Tama a confident smile before walking towards the stairwell. She was also certain she could feel Gaara and Tsunade tensely staring at her.

‘Don’t worry Gaara-kun, Tsunade-shishou…’ Sakura raced down the steps, ‘I won’t give that guy a chance to set up against me. Watching all of the matches before mine…gave me an idea of how to do this right.’

She and Tio entered the arena at about the same time, and Shikamaru was there with his hands in his pockets, looking slightly careworn after officiating Sato’s match. He only spared a short glance towards Sakura from the corner of his eye. Sakura determined his lack of concern was a good thing.

“Begin!” Shikamaru quickly excused himself.

Tio drew a kunai, his voice garbled by the mask he wore, “Gosh you’re pretty! Miss, I wouldn’t want to-!”

She was already flashing through hand signs for a Grand Fireball. With a chirp of alarm, Tio threw the kunai, missed as she rolled aside, and Sakura exhaled a plume of flame at the Rain ninja. He was quite acrobatic, using a high leap to avoid the attack and forming his own seals. Sakura aimed another fireball at Tio, positioning him close to a gap in the floor. Interestingly, he had enveloped himself in his own Water Prison orb, and defended against the next fire technique that struck him.

Still steaming, Tio made the mistake of charging at Sakura for close-quarters combat.

Above, Kiba flinched when Sakura’s chakra-precise punch connected with Tio’s stomach. The force of it made particles in the air tremble. The Rain genin gurgled in horror at the pain, momentum reversing, and he was catapulted across the room and into the wall, shattering the plaster and stone behind it. Tio then slipped through the triangular gap in the floor, falling towards the next level stories below. Shikamaru cursed quietly and dove down to rescue him.

A minute passed and Sakura adjusted her gloves again, silently enjoying the whispering and looks of spectators. Many were blatantly aghast that a pink-haired beauty had just knocked the soul out of another genin.

“Hey, excuse me!” A brazen and very muscular Cloud genin called down to Sakura, “Are you single?”

She frowned reflexively, refusing to answer, and stole a glance at Gaara who stood placidly beneath the digital display with Tsunade and Matsuri. Sakura was relieved that he let the crude comment go. ‘Very mature of you, Gaara, thank you.’ It was Kakashi who had politely asked the Cloud sensei to “Shut up his trainees and save their socializing for after the Chunin Exam.” Asuma and other Leaf Jounin snickered at the Cloud Jounin’s mortified face. His student was promptly silenced.

Eventually, Shikamaru returned with Tio slung over his shoulder. The boy was weeping, his broken ribs causing him to gasp in pain with each breath. Shikamaru ushered over the medic-nin hovering in wait, speaking after a heavy sigh, “That was too fast for my taste…Sakura is the winner of this match!”

Ino was the first to cheer, “Yeah, Forehead Woman! You beast!”

Tama and Kiba had also gotten noisy with their excitement.

She could not help but smile as she walked. As Sakura reflected on Shikamaru’s quip, she hoped that he understood her haste. Surely he knew that she had no desire to drag things out when it was the Final Round that would determine her promotion. She was far too practical, at this point in time, to delay her own success. Sakura waved at the Hokage who grinned lopsidedly at her, and then ascended the stairs with her chin held high.

Simultaneously, Sato returned to the observation deck with a plastic cup in his hand. He looked okay, by most standards. He stopped in the space between Team Kakashi and Team Kurenai, greeting, “Yo! Who just fought?”

“Sakura-chan won with a single punch!” Hinata filled him in.

“Damn. Good thing none of us had to fight her.” Sato then turned to Tama, “Are you still feeling okay, Tama? Don’t have the jitters about your match yet?”

“Not yet.” She then asked him, “Sato-kun, how did the treatment go?”

“Like you’d expect it to. I got taken to the breakroom and spoonfed some ipecac syrup. I missed the trash can at first and the medic got mad at me. It was a lot of puke.” He shrugged, tipping the cup back to suck on ice chips, “You know they have a refrigerator back there? It’s only filled with ice pops and other frozen stuff.”

“How strange.” Tama tapped her chin.

“Glad to have you back.” Kakashi patted his shoulder, “Please, refrain from torching people in the future, Sato, unless you have a way to put them out.”

“Shoot, you guys couldn’t put him out?” Terrified, Sato looked around wildly for Noé.

“He was eventually extinguished, but you did cause him unnecessary pain.” Kurenai informed her student, “We’d appreciate it if you did not do that, going forward.”

“10-4, Sensei!”

Kiba rolled his eyes.

Sakura returned and was quickly squeezed into a hug by Tama and Ino. A few teams down, Lee was also giving her a thumbs-up, and he had convinced Tenten to do the same to congratulate their friend. Neji stood by peacefully and seemed to be pleased with the outcome of her match.

“Well done, Sakura.” Kakashi commended her, “You struck fear into the hearts of all the young contenders here.”

“It was my pleasure!” Really. It was.

Hinata had quietly sidled up to her friend and expressed her admiration, “Sakura-chan, you reminded me of Tsunade-sama, a little bit.”

“Thanks! That’s the idea. All of my hard work wouldn’t have paid off if I didn’t resemble her by now.” She adjusted her headband at the top of her head, fixing her pastel hair, “I bet you’ll be way more impressive than me, Hinata.”

“I don’t think so.” The girl disagreed, “I just hope I don’t have to fight anyone I know. I want to keep my match short, like you did.”

“You will, believe me. It’s easier when it’s a stranger.” Sakura added softly, “Much easier than I thought, actually. I almost never do that to people…”

“Thank goodness.”

They shared a laugh as names were cycled across the board on the wall. Neji’s name appeared.

Shikamaru announced, “The next match will be between Hyuga Neji and Kuang Qin.”

Hinata and Sakura swiveled to take a gander at the team of Rock ninja across the room, holding stock-still at the rail. The little brother, Ga-Fen, was still missing and would likely be staying in a hospital henceforth. Sakura wondered how Qin would feel fighting another member of Gai’s team, perhaps thirsting to avenge his brother’s injury by Tenten. ‘They aren’t pushovers, that Iwa group… and Neji’s one of the strongest ninja on our side...’ She noted Tenten who was sending Neji off with pride, ‘I want to say that Leaf has the advantage again…but I’ll need to wait and see!’

The whole assemblage of Leaf ninja in the observation area was simmering with support for their one-and-only notorious grump and genius prodigy, Neji. Most Leaf comrades had taken a shine to him in spite of his antisocial tendencies; he was considered a caring big-brother type nowadays. Gai had reined himself in and saw Neji off with a considerate volume, knowing how easy it was to irritate his Hyuga pupil. Neji appreciated it, and proceeded down the stairwell calmly.

Shikamaru got the feeling that Qin was very, very mad even if his face betrayed no trace of emotion. He stood like a statue, hardly breathing as he waited for Neji to cross over to him. ‘Ohh there is definitely some resentment here,’ Shikamaru deduced, ‘The likelihood of this being a more destructive match...is pretty high.’ He looked right and left at the combatants and then raised his hand, ‘I’ll stand closer to the Hokage for this one.’

Shikamaru signaled for them to start, “Begin!”

Qin only just let Shikamaru get out of the way before he thrust his arm forward, echoing Wushu style. Black soot shot from his sleeve like a magician’s trick, only on an ominously large scale. Within a fraction of a second, the thought process in Neji’s brain went as thus: The soot could probably be used to disguise another attack OR facilitate a successive technique. Solution: deflect it. Counterattack: Air Palm, to stun Qin against a wall; Follow up with: Sixty-Four palms. Win.

He rotated to force the black substance away, but when Neji’s defense ceased the soot floated down and stuck to him anyway. While it did not go as he planned, Neji kept to the agenda and launched a form-perfect Air Palm towards Qin.

But his arms felt heavy. Rather, everything felt heavy. It delayed his counter and Qin was able to avoid the vacuum blast that careened across the room and tore a hole in the tower wall. ‘As I assumed, this powder has the effect of a jutsu.’ Neji tried to dust off the soot but it clung stubbornly. Qin had no problem emptying more ash from where it was concealed inside his jacket.

Within fifty five seconds Neji was by far much dirtier than Tenten had been during her entire match. Maybe he should not have poked fun at her for it?

Forcing chakra into his limbs merely to move at average speed, Neji closed in on Qin just as the Rock genin completed sealing for Ninjutsu, “Doton: Golem Shell!” In an unsightly twist, Qin’s skin had hardened and expanded into blocky, grayish plating all over his body. Neji was distantly reminded of his life-or-death brawl with Kidomaru and his golden armor. Thoughtful, he chose to modify his attacks based on how he had defeated the spider-limbed Sound ninja long ago.

Qin’s jutsu were unexpectedly problematic. For one thing, his Golem armor had also amplified his strength, and Neji was having a terrible time of avoiding his blows. Neji’s Wushu blocks, though not up to speed, prevented most harm that Qin tried to inflict. Neji had locked a foot behind Qin’s neck with the fastest high-kick he could muster and flipped him. While Qin’s defense was lowered Neji struck with Jyukken to test its effectiveness, and noted the Golem armor buffered the strike, protecting Qin’s tenketsu, ‘I’ll break through it shortly, but first…’ He needed the soot off.

Neji flushed himself with chakra, hoping Shikamaru would not disqualify him for the wind tunnel he had produced in the tower, his Wind Affinity lashing wildly from his next rotation. The burst had bowled Qin over. Neji twice used the method to cleanse himself, launching an Air Palm to test his ability to move, and was glad when his mobility was satisfactory again.

“Don’t think you’re free and clear, I can coat you with dust all day long!” Qin crowed joyfully, “You’ll be a lump of coal by the time my Heavy Rock Technique is through!”

Neji had not taken the bait for close-quarters. He shot a Wind Release: Air Palm that broke on Qin even when he raced away, chopping him with a fury that would have otherwise julienned him without armor. Said armor was notched and most of Qin’s hair missing after the attack. The Rock team’s sensei, Sekieima, spoke up only to scold him, “You can do better, Qin.”

Neji was unsure if it was his teacher’s jibe that humiliated him or his vanity after receiving an uncalled-for haircut: Qin’s blood boiled. His concentration wavered as he charged, honing immense strength, and he bore down on Neji with a punch that could give both Sakura and Tsunade a run for their money. In fact, it blew out the entire floor when Neji evaded it. The tiles of the arena jerked, cracked, and then fell away in segments, detaching from the tower’s sides. Neji and Qin retreated to the walls, hanging on with chakra, and the floor cascaded down for hundreds of meters before collapsing on the next level.

Shikamaru was not pleased by the new open-air feature of the arena, ‘Fucking hell what a mess! I REFUSE to get wrangled in for clean-up. This is troublesome enough!’

Qin leapt in a rage and became a human cannonball. In response, Neji artfully swept another Wind Release: Air Palm over him, scoring and weakening his Golem Shell again. Qin’s attack missed; his hair and clothes were massacred again, and Qin knocked another hole in the tower wall when he crashed. Shikamaru was cursing out loud at that point.

The soot containers for Qin’s Heavy Rock jutsu had broken in his sleeves, spilling their contents all over the tower and down into the rattling depths below. Neji seized the opportunity and was on him instantly.

Qin was pulled off of the wall, hit point-blank with a Wind Gentle-Fist blow, and as the Rock ninja’s armor crumbled, Neji took a leaf out of Lee’s youthful book. He segued into a Sixty-Four Palm strike as they both plummeted down the tower shaft, Qin hollering and made helpless by his own heavy form. Neji drilled through, finally striking chakra points, and though that may have been enough, he still chose to slam down on Qin at the next level as if he had adopted the Front Lotus.

Qin nearly shattered, his eyes wide and unseeing, mouth gasping like a trout’s, and then slipped from consciousness at the tower bottom. Neji stood over him and dusted his hands.

There was distant cheering far above.

He looked up and could see Shikamaru carefully descending along the wall for a check. He gave a brooding look to Neji, muttering, “Well, the arena got royally fucked up…though you weren’t entirely to blame.”
“I did not give much thought to the matches after mine.” Neji admitted apologetically.

“Yeah, thanks a bunch.” Shikamaru knelt down to examine Qin, “Jeez…is he alive? I don’t think he’s breathing.”

“He is. It’s faint. I can see his heart beating.”

“Shut off your Byakugan, for God’s sake. You won, you ass.” Shikamaru hefted Qin up, “You know what? Help me carry him. He’s dead weight.”

It took a while for them to return to the observation area, and a medic-nin retrieved Qin from the walkway for emergency healing. Shikamaru marched woodenly towards Tsunade after announcing Neji’s victory, wondering how the hell they were supposed to proceed without a floor.

Tsunade made a shrugging motion, asking sidelong of Gaara, “Will you kindly provide us with a new floor for now? I hate to bother you, Kazekage.”

Gaara huffed softly, almost amused, and then released sand from the gourd at his back. It took a while for him to replicate what had been in place earlier and fortify it. To keep the matches fair, Gaara included the same gaps that ninja had taken advantage of in previous battles. Once condensed, he exerted a minimal line of chakra to keep it afloat. Tsunade thanked him warmly.

The Hokage turned back to Shikamaru, “Let’s continue.”

Breathing easier, Shikamaru resumed his duties and clicked the transponder in his pocket. The selected names appeared shortly after that. “The eighth match will be between Mizushima Nurega and Aburame Shino. Please report to the arena now.”

Shikamaru watched interestedly as the kunoichi of the Rain team feigned complete confidence, hurrying down as if she had grown impatient to fight. Odd. Earlier, he had spotted her looking anxious while watching the more vicious battles. Shino, predictably, was as stone-like and unflappable as he always was, even with Sato and Hinata’s cheers. When the two combatants faced off on Gaara’s new floor and Shikamaru signaled them to begin, the kunoichi’s resolve cracked.

Nurega made a move to charge towards Shino and then stopped, petrified, and used a low-powered water jutsu that she spat from her mouth. Shino evaded, and maybe out of pity, threw two kunai at her. A swarm of Kikaichu insects had erupted from his body and were slowly gathering. Nurega was plunged into rookie stage fright, shrieking and ignoring the guidance of her shouting team as the insects crept closer.

Shikamaru noted that Shino was not as compassionate as Chouji, at least when it came to a one-on-one duel. He offered no free shot, no recourse, and no soft words when the swarm gathered around the screaming girl, wholly unprepared for an adversary she knew nothing about. Nurega attempted another water jutsu that missed, knocking a portion of the Kikaichu swarm off. Shino raised his arm and replenished the dark, buzzing cloud.

Nurega flailed, crying frantically, “Just stop! What kind of jutsu is this? Eeek!”

Sato cupped his mouth with a hand and shouted, “Get a clue, little lady! The Aburame clan is one of the most prestigious clans in our village!”

Shikamaru thought to himself, ‘I guess Sato is gunning for his best friend to win too. Although, this girl had no idea what she was getting into, it looks like.’

Shino’s insects made lunch of the girl’s chakra and Nurega collapsed to her knees, begging, “Please stop! I give up!”

Shikamaru clucked his tongue quietly and motioned to Shino to back off. The insects retreated as Shikamaru raised his hand and announced, “With Nurega’s forfeiture, Shino is the winner of this match.”

Sato shouted again, “Lame! How come she didn’t put up a fight? Shino was robbed!”

“Of what?” Kurenai asked him quietly, “A destructive match with a worthy opponent? Be glad. That girl’s reluctance to fight saved her from a worse fate, had Shino mistaken her for a serious competitor. She is clearly not ready to be here.”

“Right…” Sato deflated a bit, “You’re right, Sensei.”

“Of course I am.” Kurenai smiled.

Perfectly unharmed but mostly scared, Nurega left the arena and returned to her team. Shino rejoined his teammates and slipped his glasses further up his nose, “Perhaps the Final Round will be a proper test of my skills.” Sato and Hinata agreed whole-heartedly.

The Leaf teams were starting to get very optimistic about their standings in the exam, jabbering and talking while many non-Leaf teams sulked. Most were not as prepared as Konoha’s participants, or they were first-time entrants.

While the room buzzed excitedly, Shikamaru watched the board as names rapidly generated once again. He made his next announcement, “The ninth match will be between Maito Tama and Jeon Tun.”

Sato’s head snapped to the side, startled, and he set his heavy gaze on Tama, a first-timer in her own right. She looked back at him with her brows furrowed, smiling, urging him: Don’t get wound up! I can handle it. Kiba and Sakura were giving her all the encouragement that one could possibly need.

Her opponent, Tun, it so happened, was the same huge Cloud ninja who had catcalled Sakura earlier.

“Hit him where it hurts.” Kakashi suggested blithely.

Tama nodded, “That’s what I do best.” As Lee and Sato had done before her, she took a graceful leap off of the rail and into the ring below.

Sato watched in unusual silence with a hammering heart. He had been the one to encourage Tama to seek the shinobi career she had been told to forsake. To put it lightly, he was extremely invested in her happiness and advancement. ‘It won’t feel right if she doesn’t make it as far as the rest of us…’

Tun lumbered down to the arena and Tama observed him carefully. His wide and built physique could be an indicator of Taijutsu, ‘It looks like his muscles have muscles.’ He seemed nice, despite his beefhead appearance. Tun was smiling, calm, and probably the size of his two teammates (Kimori and Minho) combined.

“Hey cutie.” He winked at her.

Tama got an impression from the gesture, ‘Either he’s trying to lower my guard…or he genuinely wants to pick up women from this exam…’ Playing along, she smiled back and said nothing. Thank goodness her back was to Sato; otherwise he may have been outraged by her reaction. Shikamaru allowed them to begin.
Tun wasted no time hurling shuriken at her, stored on magnetic arm bracers, that were electrified upon launch with what she suspected was a fancy hidden gadget. She cartwheeled to safety as the knives and stars flew by. Maybe he already knew that all the women on her team could punch like trucks...or maybe Tun had no idea and thought her a dainty flower. ‘Hmm. If he is expecting my Taijutsu it could be a problem...’

She countered with her own projectiles and got a nasty surprise from shuriken discarded on the floor. Small electric bolts arced between the scattered weapons, sending a zap through her body several times via her fingers and once through her feet. Her eyes watered as she raced away from the nuisance, ‘That’s a cheap trick!’

“Sorry sweetcheeks, you know I don’t want you to get hurt,” Tun advised from afar, “Why don’t you just give up?”

She gave him an incredulous look, “That...wasn’t much more than what happens when you plug an appliance in an outlet.”

He took mild offense, “Hey! I just learned Lightning Style so don’t talk sm-!”

With terrific speed, Tama had closed the gap between them, using her Kakashi-trained southpaw to strike his face with a solid left hook. He crashed sideways, attempted to kick her legs from under her, but Tama leapt and sent him rolling with Leaf Hurricane. She quickly deduced his techniques were barely beyond Academy level. Even his Taijutsu was not as up-to-par as she had anticipated, after judging all of those muscles. He fought frantically, and probably could have clobbered her, but Tama danced around him, a svelte boxer toying with a trainee. She ran circles around him and his eyes crossed, unable to keep up.

With hand signs, the gadget on his arm released a miniature lightning discharge. At close range it hit Tama in the side and she staggered, quickly overcoming the pain, but was displeased with the hole burned in her halter top. She disappeared and Tun blinked, bumbling left and right to spot her.

Tama exploded up beneath his chin with a ferocious kick, rocketing him up and up with strength that nearly defied physics.

Sakura did comment from the rail that it was peculiar seeing a willowy woman batter a hulking bodybuilder like a ragdoll.

“Shadow of the Dancing Leaf!” Tama was airborne, hovering beneath her opponent, but she had not bothered to open any of her Inner Gates. She figured one of Kakashi’s E-Rank pranks could do the trick. He had said to hit Tun “where it hurts.”

“One Thousand Years of Death!”

It was hard to watch...so hard to watch. Tun howled louder than Beppu had during Masugama and Lee’s fight. Akamaru nearly sang along when he heard the sound. Gasps of shock sounded like a cacophony in response to the bizarre technique. Kakashi hid his face with his book, not expecting his new student to take his recommendation literally. ‘I shouldn’t have taught any of them that one...’

Tun landed head-first on the floor and clutched at his backside. He kneeled in agony and would not move. Tama landed softly and wondered if the Cloud newbie had no tolerance for pain, ‘I can’t believe...that’s all I had to do...’ She frowned worriedly, ‘Please get up! I’ll be embarrassed if that’s how I end my match.’
She looked up at her team to see Kiba’s mouth hanging wide open. Sakura, likewise, had a similar surprised expression mixed with a hint of approval. Kakashi locked eyes with Tama and shrugged at her. She shrugged back. Maybe it had been a rude move to make?

“It’s legal.” Shikamaru assured her, having stepped into the arena, “But who the hell taught you that?”

“I’ll never tell.” She replied, knowing her sensei would not want it disclosed.

Shikamaru asked Tun if he could continue. A spark of pride compelled the Cloud genin to action, and with a shout he propelled himself up and rushed at Tama. Shikamaru retreated to let the match resume. Tun’s Taijutsu was as inferior as it had ever been, but his ambush-launch of a metal wire net caught her off guard and snared her. She was all legs as she tumbled, thrashing in the net on the sand floor. Tun was plainly angry when he threw electrified shuriken at her with abandon, cutting her up and shocking her while she writhed.

At that point Sato started snarling and cursing at the Cloud genin whose attitude towards kunoichi competitors had done a complete 180, “She can’t even fight back, you fucker!” Shino coolly restrained him by his arm. Hinata stood beside Sato as he carried on irately, filled with fear that her friend could lose the match or come to great harm.

It took the First Inner Gate to give Tama the boost of strength she needed to tear out of the tightening net. She was still frazzled from the electrical shocks, so Tun did land a sucker-punch to the face that flattened her again. The off-put Cloud nin pulled her by the ankle towards the gap in the floor and dropped her through it, following her down to finish her off.

Many teams had quailed at the disconcerting sight. Both Shino and Hinata had to hold Sato back, who was beside himself with terror and rage. Kurenai reminded him that if he interrupted the match it could disqualify Tama and/or himself. Hinata watched the action with her Byakugan that most other spectators could not see.

Thankfully, Tama had opened two of her Gates and gained some control again. It was a consummate slugfest between her and Tun, both attached by chakra to the reverse of the arena floor.

Tama’s speed outmatched Tun’s anger-fueled strength, and after some impressive upside-down footwork and dodging, the third Inner Gate helped Tama use a clutch jutsu the way Lee had been able to earlier. She bounced from the walls, too swift to follow, and struck Tun numerous times before a savage barrage of kicks knocked him through the arena floor, up through its surface with an eruption of compressed sand, “Blooming Lotus!”

Tun collapsed with a thud, groaning in pain. Tama exited through the hole in the floor and shut her gates, the red of her skin quieting. She took deep breaths and waited as Shikamaru looked over Tun, who was slurring his replies to the proctor’s questions.

“You okay to keep fighting?”

“Yessir-erg.”

“What was that?” Shikamaru frowned and held up four fingers to Tun’s face, “Tell me how many this is.”

“Threef.” His eyes were blinking open and shut. Tun could not move much at all.

“Close, but I’m gonna have to call this.” Shikamaru notified him, standing upright again, “The winner of this match is Tama.”
A smile slowly spread on her face, as if she had not completely expected to be victorious. Tama chose to take the stairs on her way up as many people cheered.

Sato’s panic had morphed into elation. He left his place at the rail and hurried to the stairwell, meeting Tama halfway. He caught her gently by the wrist and pulled her close, valuing some rare privacy in the tower. Sharing the same step, she settled her chin on his shoulder as they embraced and Sato spoke her name softly.

“I was freaking out! Great job out there, though.” Sato praised her, “Your first one-on-one victory of the Chunin Exam and I got to watch.”

“Did you ever think you would?” She chuckled.

“I never tried imagining it before.”

“My opponent decided part of the way through the match that he did not want to give up easily.” Tama sighed, “I shouldn’t have underestimated him. He hurt me a bit.”

At her words, Sato lifted his hand and noticed his fingertips were stained with blood. He had accidentally touched the cuts on her side where shuriken had sliced her. He observed it in a moment of horrified wonder until she took his hand in her own, “It’s okay.”

“I kind of…wanted to kill him…when he pulled that shit.” He admitted rigidly.

“You knew you couldn’t step in, and really, I didn’t need you to.” Tama concluded, “I think I made him mad when I used Kakashi-sensei’s stupid jutsu.”

“…you’re telling me Kakashi came up with that?”

“Yes, he did.”

“You’ve got to be kidding me.”

She frowned in confusion, “He never used it on you during practice or a bell test, Sato?”

“No! Never. My uncle used that on your team?”

“When I joined, we retook his famous ‘bell test’ to find out how well we worked together. I guess Kakashi-sensei wanted to have fun with it.”

“He’s demented.” Sato scoffed, “And he taught you how to use it.”

“I asked him to teach me as many jutsu as he thought I could use.” She confessed, “Maybe I should have ruled out the stupid gags?”

“Well…it did work.” Sato noted.

She was still high from her success. When Tama smiled again he had to kiss her. Her lips were supple and warm, smooth against his own, and he liked it when her hands laced behind his neck when she got into it. Once he had parted her mouth just enough, the hot wetness of her tongue, the quiet sounds she made; ah, it stoked the fire in his stomach that had been consuming him for weeks. Sato carefully pressed her against the wall of the stairwell, trying not to jar her wounds, and kissed her fiercely. ‘She’s so…’ Tama was pure magic in his hands, good and evil. The ultimate distraction and singular goal he had overlooked for too long. ‘So fucking beautiful.’

Oh, she must have felt it too. That pull. That haunting drive for touch and desire that they were no longer immune to, not as they had been as innocent kids. Her hands roamed over the young man.

Strange half-thoughts bobbed in Sato’s head while kissing, trying to calculate just how precious she was. Tama was stronger than he had ever thought she could be, wiser and more responsible, seducing him sometimes with a small glance, though never intentional. She could torture Sato with her cheerful spirit and a flip of her hair, in so many ways that devoured his heart whole. But truly, Tama was more heroic and treasured than he could ever find the words to describe to someone if he had been asked, Who do you love?

At about the point their hips had met and their motions became more adult in nature, a voice echoed down from the top of the stairs, unseen around the corner’s turn, “Sato…” It was Kurenai’s voice.

They parted with a jerk, embarrassed. It sounded as though Kurenai was not on her way down to catch them, but she probably knew well enough what was going on, “Please let Tama-chan come out here to have her injuries be treated by medic-nin. Also, Hinata’s bout will be starting shortly. Considering that she was a spectator of your match, you owe her the same courtesy.”

“Oh!” Sato turned his head between Tama and the top of the stairs, conflicted, “We’ll be right up!”

“I expect so.” Kurenai’s tone was authoritative.

He managed one last lip lock before Tama pushed back on Sato’s chest gently, chiding, “We sidetrack easily. Let’s go support Hinata-chan now.”

“Alright, fine.” He stroked the side of her face, “But tell me…”

She gave him her undivided attention.

“Did you like that?” Sato wondered.

“Very much.” With a grin, Tama led him by the hand up the stairs and back to the spectator’s walkway. Kurenai stood by with her arms folded, giving them both a pointed look.

Hinata smiled knowingly at the pair and thanked them when they wished her luck. She trotted down the stairwell with relative confidence.

Tama was shepherded away by a medic before she could rejoin Kakashi and her group. She gave them a look from over her shoulder, hoping to make it back in time for her friend’s match.

Sato stood awkwardly beside Kurenai. He made a bid to change the subject, “So…who is Sunshine’s opponent?”

“The last member of the Grass team: their kunoichi, Guena. That team is more competent than many other entrants in this stage.” Kurenai assessed, “Hinata, however, is a very good judge of any adversary she faces.”

“Yeah, this shouldn’t be too difficult for her.”

From Kurenai’s opposite side, Shino spoke, “You had more trouble in your match than you should have.”

“Yeesh, Shino! That guy was way taller than me and not half bad with a sword.”

“You had the tactical advantage with a Tar Clone but you delayed in using it.”

“I’m more comfortable setting up Genjutsu first. It’s not easy making Tar Clones outright; it takes way too much chakra.”

“And what if your opponent had been able to break your Genjutsu?”

“The both of you-” Kurenai interrupted them, “Need to stop speculating and pay attention to your teammate.”

The two boys looked down into the arena immediately. Hinata stood across from the Grass kunoichi who was impeccably clean for someone who had trekked through the Forest of Death days before. Guena, Kurenai had said her name was. She was willowy and good-looking, and also appeared self-assured about her duel. Her thick, golden hair was held in a long braid that reached to the backs of her knees, tied with vines and a multitude of colorful flowers.

Guena was also glaring dangerously at Hinata, which Sato felt could not be a good thing. The girl looked very thirsty to win.

No sooner had Shikamaru spoken the word “Begin” Guena had stuck Hinata’s shoulder with senbon, landing a second needle above her left knee. With ungainly evasion, Hinata had avoided the precisely aimed projectiles and pulled the needles out, wobbling. Guena had certainly been going for important pressure points, Hinata assessed, ‘She could have immobilized me with one more senbon…’

Hinata took great care in avoiding more flying needles as she hurried towards Guena. With an elegant Jyukken stance, Hinata skidded over the floor as she turned, aiming a forceful palm at the other shinobi.

“All these Leaf kunoichi…” Guena blocked and let the strike shut a chakra point in her upper arm, stabbing Hinata’s hand with two needles in retaliation, “Are so very fond of their Taijutsu, aren’t they?”

Hinata’s follow-up blow only grazed her opponent’s shoulder as Guena slipped away, predicting the Hyuga girl’s moves. In a moment of respite Hinata pulled the senbon from her hand and used a rotation, deflecting the fusillade of senbon that came for her again. Whether near or far, Guena was going to be tricky to corner. ‘I will have to commit to ranged attacks too if I cannot get close enough to hit her.’ Her frown of concentration resembled her father’s, though she did not know it at the time.

“Kunoichi of Konoha…punching and beating their enemies. It’s so barbaric.” Guena tittered, making hand seals, “Where I come from we stun and kill with grace.”

Guena shook loose her braid, scattering the buds and flowers that she had kept tied up. When they landed on the floor, the chips and seeds burst, chakra-saturated, as she completed her jutsu, “Doton: Fresh Soil Spreading!” Most everything on the ground was rapidly growing and climbing, and Guena handily kept Hinata back with senbon. Trees, shrubs, fruits, vines, ferns and all manner of woodland diversity were transforming the arena.

Thinking quickly, Hinata honed a point of molded chakra in the tip of her finger to create a cutting edge of Jyukken. She sliced a watermelon in half on the floor, cannibalizing it as a water source. Her Water Affinity easily pulled the water free from the fruit. With hands quicker than light, Hinata had shot Guena full of water needles before the girl rolled to the side with a pained yelp. Hinata created a Shadow Clone that pressured Guena to retreat; both the originator and copy could avoid her senbon attacks.

“I can’t deny that you’re a freak of nature!” Guena crowed, flipping away, “But you won’t be able to use my own jutsu against me now…” With more hand seals, she added, “Hiden: Lush Jungle Trap!”
The growth in the room surged up and out; the plant diversity had become so tall that the green tops were level with the railing of the observation walk. Spectators began complaining again that they could not see what was going on.

Tenten tapped Neji’s back, “Keep Lee and I informed, please! This is a crazy one...”

“I will.” Neji observed with his Byakugan, aware that Hinata was also using her Kekkei Genkai to navigate the impromptu forest below. Hidden Grass, as it turned out, had plenty of jutsu in its bag of tricks.

Hinata darted around through the roots and plant matter, cutting herself out of snares as vines reached for her. She recalled the winning Grass ninja, Aota, and his subtle skill with plant jutsu as well. ‘This technique is built off of the last technique she used, and I am sure that it cost her a great amount of chakra. I doubt she will try to confront me directly at this point!’ Hinata had zeroed-in on Guena, who believed that she was safely hidden on a tree branch behind a thicket of leaves and fruit.

Hinata positioned her Shadow Clone where Guena could see it, and then snuck the long way around carefully through the bramble and trees. She would have to create her own opportunity to ambush the Grass kunoichi and pummel her with Gentle Fist.

The clone darted around and resorted to using a rotation to rip off vines while simultaneously blocking thrown needles. “Oh! You’re good!” Guena called, leaping to the safety of another branch. The shadow clone made its move, racing up a tree trunk with chakra, closing the gap as it launched itself palm-first at Guena.

The Grass kunoichi substituted herself with a bushel of durian fruits. The clone’s attack squashed them apart, thorn-pricked. The foul stench of the fruits made the shadow clone gag and stagger. Guena reappeared in a flash and wrapped a vine ‘round the clone’s neck while it wretched. She pulled the lasso taught and decapitated it, pouting when smoke signaled that she had only gotten a doppelganger. “Shoot...that usually works.” Her eyes darted around wildly to spot the lurking Leaf kunoichi.

Guena held still, detected the rustle and displacement of leaves. She snapped the vine-whip down, skillfully catching Hinata’s ankle, and hopped down from the branch. The makeshift pulley system dragged Hinata into the air by her foot, and Guena landed on the ground, scoffing merrily. “Seriously? You need to be quieter!” She laughed.

Hinata cut herself down from the snare just as Guena kicked up a broken bamboo stalk from the forest floor, catching it, and skewered the Leaf ninja through her middle. When that shadow clone also dispersed into smoke, Guena only had a moment of horror to realize she had played into a distraction.

She felt chakra points in her back being shut at a concerning speed, and though Guena swung her bamboo-spear to stave Hinata off, the Hyuga girl broke it into segments with two, well-timed palm strikes. Guena shrieked, staggering back through the jungle hazards she had laid, unable to protect her chakra points.

“‘We ninja of Konohagakure, men and women alike,’” Hinata raised a glowing hand, chakra radiating from it in the shape of a lion’s head, “‘Do excel in Taijutsu.’”

Hinata blasted Guena through a tree and to the edge of the room. The Grass kunoichi came to a rolling stop, tangled in plant matter. The jungle began to wither and die as it had required more chakra, but Guena lacked the strength to sustain the technique.
Muttering in annoyance, Shikamaru ventured into the arena to locate the combatants when he noticed the ‘jungle jutsu’ collapsing. When he did find Guena she had already come-to, battered and bruised. She quietly admitted that she could not go on, but the Grass kunoichi scowled at Hinata as she stood nearby.

“Due to Guena’s forfeiture, the winner of this match is Hinata!” Shikamaru shouted up from the nettle. The cheers intensified as the trees and leaves receded.

The victor of an earlier match, Aota, leapt down into the arena to help escort his teammate away. He congratulated her hard work while Guena complained under her breath, hobbling back to the stairs with him.

Hinata peeked at the observation area before leaving the arena, seeing her kunoichi friends celebrating boisterously. They were also nudging Neji, pestering him for his thoughts on the match. It was only natural for him to be proud of his cousin’s triumph. Hinata let nervous giggles escape her as she entered the stairwell, pulling debris off of her clothes and hair, ‘I did it. I can compete in the Final Round of the Exam!’

Hinata climbed the stairs slowly, ‘If only Naruto-kun had been able to watch this match. I know it would have made him happy…’ She wrung her hands, considering it, ‘Well…it’s a shame he is not here to compete either. Naruto would have wanted to advance with the rest of us…to feel the excitement…’

Gaara was able to watch and was hopefully enjoying himself. With that thought, it did strike Hinata as odd that Haku had not entered the Chunin Exam at all, although his new attachment to Sunagakure could have something to do with it. Had Gaara informally taken him as an assistant, in the way that Tsunade relied on Shizune? Hinata frowned. She had not seen Haku in so long. She had heard various excuses from Gaara that made her wonder what could possibly keep a social sweetheart like Haku away from his friends. ‘It's suspicious…’ She decided. Haku should be here. Naruto, too, deserved to be here. It did not feel completely right that their voices were not mixing with the cheers of other Leaf teams.

‘I miss them so much.’ Her shoulders drooped as she climbed, ‘All I can do now is get through this exam. I have to do it for myself. I always felt confident having Naruto and my friends by my side, but now, even on my own…nothing scares me. Nothing makes me feel small anymore.’ Hinata smiled to herself, ‘I will make everyone proud this time.’

She reveled in her warm welcome back at the observation area. Her own team and Kakashi’s team surrounded her, and even Lee and Tenten joined in, all clamoring and talking over each other. Ino was drowned out in the noise when she tried to remind everyone that Hinata could probably use some fresh air, “And all of you are crowding her and sucking up oxygen!”

Neji stayed back as he typically did. There was a genuine, closed-mouth smile on his face. Hinata had spotted it before it disappeared, too fast for her to point out the rare phenomenon to her friends. Thankfully, Kurenai managed to push the mob back a little and give her third victorious student an excited side-hug.

“You did very well, Hinata. Your opponent was certainly a challenge, but you kept a level head. From what I was able to see, I was most pleased.” Kurenai estimated, “At this rate, Kakashi and Asuma’s teams should also be entirely victorious. Don’t you think?”

“I hope so!”

“You freaking attacked someone with watermelon juice!” Sato exclaimed, getting a word in edgewise, “I am a fan for life now.”

“It was improvised.” Hinata admitted with a squeak.

“Ugh…I think I can still smell those durian fruits…” Sakura added, fanning her face with a small frown, “I guess a stinking substitution does have some utility.”

“It would have ruined me.” Kiba and his hyper-sensitive nose concurred.

Tama returned to the walkway after being treated by the attending medic-nin in the breakroom. “I missed it!” She threw her hands up in frustration, but pulled Hinata in for a hug anyway, congratulating her, “I was sure you’d do great! It must have been exciting!”

Across the room, beneath the digital board cycling through names, Gaara spoke to his student, “There are only four matches left, Matsuri.”

She nodded anxiously, “One of them will be mine. The pool of competitors…thinned out a lot. All of these Leaf ninja are so strong.”

“They are. They’ve worked very hard to prepare for this exam.” He motioned his head towards the celebrating Leaf group, “There is a 3 in 8 chance you will be facing a Leaf opponent. 1 in 4 a Dream shinobi, or 1 in 8 either Rain or Rock.” His mouth curved into a slight smile, “But I believe you can win.”

“Oh.” Matsuri clasped her hands and replied softly, “Thank you, Sensei. I really don’t want to disappoint you.”

“No matter what happens, you won’t. You’ve improved greatly, and I am glad that you made it this far.”

The board above settled on two names and Shikamaru made his announcement, “The eleventh match will be between Togano Tetsuya and Inuzuka Kiba. Competitors please report to the arena!”

Gaara said sidelong to his student, “Make that 1 in 3 Leaf or Dream; 1 in 6 Rock. I’d prefer if you didn’t fight that Rock ninja, to be quite frank.”

“Why not?” She wondered.

“He is trouble.” Gaara said nothing more on the subject.

Kiba and Akamaru arrived on the floor below just as the Rain genin, Tetsuya, did. Compared to his inexperienced teammates, Tetsuya looked a bit wiser and more steadfast.

Kiba quirked an eyebrow at the boy, ‘He’s smiling at me. Kind of.’ Akamaru sat patiently beside his master while Kiba reflected on the uncharacteristic expression on his opponent’s face, ‘I want to say it’s because I look good. He’s digging my style…or he’s damn sure he can kick my ass.’ Kiba took his hands out of his pockets and cracked his knuckles, ‘My team is two for two. We’re gonna be three for three.’

Shikamaru looked between them and then dropped his hand, “Begin!”

Right off the bat, Tetsuya used hand seals to weave a Genjutsu. Kiba had to hand it to the first-year trainee that it was a quality illusion, complete with swamp scenery and sounds of wildlife to boot.

But he could very easily smell Tetsuya as he tried to sneak in for an ambush.
Akamaru sat calmly and scratched his ear while Kiba shut his eyes and dove at the Rain ninja, relying on his keen nose to catch the twerp. Then, Tetsuya punched him in the jaw so hard Kiba reconsidered the strategy entirely. ‘Oh! So this ain’t a pushover I’ve got here!’ He whistled for Akamaru.

In that moment of recovery, Tetsuya used a jutsu that produced a small rain cloud. The vapor puff rose up and up until it stopped at the glass ceiling, and it began to pour down into the arena, appropriately not dousing spectators.

While Tetsuya produced a few Water Clones, Kiba released the Genjutsu with a seal (as Sakura had demonstrated to him many times,) and then allowed his dog to perch on his back for a combination transformation, “Follow the original, Akamaru!”

The ninken transformed into his master’s likeness and the two spun with claw-like nails extended. Tetsuya evaded to the best of his ability as water clones were hacked and splashed apart. His resolve wavered when a chunk of the sodden sand floor was gouged up by Kiba’s Taijutsu.

That moment of uncertainty motivated the Rain genin to take more drastic action. He used ninjutsu to convert the state of two water clones that Kiba and his dog were about to shred. “Suiton: Geyser Burst!” The clones liquefied and boiled, blasting back the Leaf attackers.

The hot water was too much to take. Kiba and Akamaru shook themselves and tried to cool off, ‘Aw, kid, I’m going to pay you back for burning me…’ Two more of Tetsuya’s clones were raked apart when Kiba charged, skidding over the floor with Akamaru. Tetsuya used another water blast to shoot one of his assailants through a gap in the floor, and then he pounced.

With some unexpected gall, Tetsuya reached for his waterlogged opponent and utilized another jutsu, “Suiton: Water Prison!” An orb of water rose up with a spin and then encapsulated Kiba. With only a moment to react, he had thought to hold his breath. One last Water Clone prowled the arena while the real Tetsuya hoped to drown his captive.

Sakura and Tama were hollering for Kiba to find the weak point of the technique to exploit and escape, but Kakashi had calmly returned to his book. He had noticed Tetsuya’s mistake where his students had overlooked it.

After several seconds, the ‘Kiba’ inside the Water Prison reverted back into Akamaru. The ninken had wide and concerned puppy-dog eyes, aware that his situation was less than optimal. Luckily, Kiba had burst out of the hole in the floor that Tama had created with Blooming Lotus. The single kunai he had thrown sailed through the Water Clone’s head, dissolving it, and the knife continued on cleanly until it sunk into the center of Tetsuya’s stomach. With a wail, the boy pulled his hand free of the water orb. The prison squelched apart and Akamaru leapt away, shaking himself rigorously once again.

At that point, Kiba had closed the gap between himself and the Rain ninja. He returned Tetsuya’s punch to the face with twice the force, snapping his head to the side. As the boy toppled, Kiba felt no remorse in smashing him with one final, spinning attack.

Shikamaru had hustled to get between him and the beaten Rain ninja, asking Kiba to step back, “It’s getting to be a bit much.” He bent down to examine Tetsuya. The boy was conscious but bleeding liberally. Shikamaru had advised him not to remove the kunai from his stomach just yet, “Let a professional handle that.”

“I can go on, proctor…” Tetsuya rasped. He struggled to stand and then slipped in a puddle of rainwater.
When the Rain nin collapsed again, Shikamaru advised quietly, “Learn your own limits.”

He stood upright and announced, “The winner of this match is Kiba!” As cheering erupted Shikamaru added to Tetsuya, “Now stop this damn rain…”

The jutsu ceased per the proctor’s request, and Tetsuya was escorted away by medic-nin. A little drenched, both Kiba and Akamaru returned to the observation area to bask in praise.

“Three for three.” Kiba told his sensei with a grin.

“I know. I didn’t picture it any other way.” Kakashi was smiling under his mask, “Well done, Kiba. It was a balance of poise and violence.”

Kakashi had put away his book with the intention of watching the last three matches. Truly, it was a relief that his team had broken even with Gai’s team in terms of victories, or he would never hear the end of his rival’s pontificating. He did feel a swell of pride that his unorthodox team, with kunoichi outnumbering a male peer, was the subject of admiration for many defeated first-timers. Even Sato had made him proud, though his win had come at the expense of badly burning a Grass genin.

Fujita had an opportunity to commend his good friend, “Kiba-kun…congratulations on your match!”

“Thanks, kid!” He mussed the small Hyuga’s head, disordering his ponytail, “Are you pumped up for your match?”

“Yes! My heart hasn’t stopped racing. I’m not sure how to keep my head clear…”

“If it helps,” Kiba suggested, “Try thinking about when you saved me from the Cloud Jounin’s Kekkei Genkai, back in the Lightning Country. Remember that? It took some major balls to jump into that fight.”

Fujita’s smile widened and he subconsciously rested his hands on his hips, as Lee often did, “I do remember that.”

“Good. Stay in that mindset. You were clear and dependable that day, and I still thank God that you were there.” Kiba informed him.

The conversation was interrupted by Shikamaru’s declaration, “The next match will be between Hyuga Fujita and Sometani Matsuri.”

Kiba watched his young friend’s surprise convert into a cool expression. Fujita had the encouragement needed to think and win. ‘He can do it. Neji and Hinata blazed a path for him here, and I’ve seen what he can do. Fujita has what it takes. He’s the same age as other newbies, but they can’t hold a candle to him!’ Fujita patted Ino and Chouji’s arms before bustling down the stairwell.

Gaara’s only comment to Matsuri before she ventured down was, “Expect Taijutsu, Matsuri. Don’t forget what we reviewed two weeks ago.”

“I won’t, Sensei.” She took a few deep breaths and then walked briskly down a long stretch to the stairs.

There were muttering comments noting that three members of the Hyuga clan were competing. In a worrying trend, two of the three Hyuga shinobi had advanced to the Final Stage. Many foreign teams could only expect a similar result. The Kazekage’s student was plain and mousey-looking. Though she was well dressed in a navy wrap top beneath an armor chestplate, she was short, gangly, thin, and was certainly too young to have been in many serious battles. Fighting another Byakugan user was going to be an uphill struggle.

Kiba felt Sakura tense beside him. He turned to her, inquiring, “Is something up?”

“I’m wondering if…” Sakura frowned and lowered her voice, “This could be an even match.”

“No way. Fujita’s got Hyuga skills and his personal tricks of the trade. I’ve seen it.” Kiba insisted, “That girl looks like buttered toast to me.”

“But Gaara trained her.” Sakura reminded her teammate, “Gaara. Trained her. Don’t tell me that we can’t expect her to have some tricks of the trade too. Assume her aspect is purely for deceit. If Gaara had taught a male student, do you think any of us might just be a little concerned?”

Kiba hesitated before he confessed, “Yes, and I hate to say I didn’t consider that angle, but…I guess I’d worry.”

“Then worry.” Sakura concluded.

Kiba did not feel so sure of the outcome after that point. Both competitors were, as Sakura had described, more formidable than they looked.

Below in the arena, Fujita looked up at Hinata and was comforted by her pep and friendly waving. Neji was nearby, composed, but also appeared supportive despite his stillness and silence.

Matsuri stood as the sole Genin representative of the Hidden Sand village, her posture straight and her countenance serene. Her nerves had coped with worse, she recalled. Becoming Gaara’s student had not been a simple matter. A cavern full of giant scorpions had not been a comfortable experience. The Shin clan had been a doozy for her as well. The Chunin Exam, while it had thrown curves and bumps at her, was not nearly as bad as Matsuri was prepared for it to be.

She faced front to stare at the small Hyuga boy. He was going to make a serious attempt to add another victory to Leaf’s cache of conquests. Matsuri suspected that this attitude in her opponent was going to make her fight more difficult, ‘He’s not going to surrender. I’ll beat him outright before he can force me to quit.’

Matsuri stole a glance at the proctor from the corner of her eye, ‘The proctor is kind of good-looking.’ Her eyes snapped forward again, ‘And my opponent’s name is Fujita. He has the Byakugan like the other Hyuga do.’ His hair looked like someone had tousled it. Fujita’s frown also looked an awful lot like the older Hyuga boy’s expression. She kept her hands at her sides, waggling her fingers in preparation to reach for her weapon, ‘I think I know exactly what to do, this time.’

Shikamaru permitted them to begin. Matsuri pulled the jouhyou from the clip on her back and let it whirl threateningly. Fujita only balked for a moment before he raised his arms in a traditional Jyukken stance, the veins at the corners of his eyes bulging.

Revved cheers of spectators resounded from the walkway above.

The boy charged and prodded at Matsuri’s defense with a Gentle Fist slap. The red flag of the rope-dart lashed down, quick as wind, and the tooth of the jouhyou smashed his chin. Fujita’s eyes watered with pain as he reached, nearly catching the rope to pull the weapon from her grasp…but Matsuri hooked the cable with her foot and swung it clockwise, snaring it ‘round Fujita’s leg. She pulled back and tripped him, and as the Hyuga genin hit the floor he hurled a volley of senbon at her.

Two needles sunk into her thigh, and the rest pinged off of her chestplate. Matsuri freed the rope before Fujita had the chance the cut it, and she spun it while pulling the needles out, ‘I won’t let him do that again…’ But he tried to. Fujita was up in an instant and besetting her with senbon thrown in threes or fours. Matsuri spun and twirled her weapon, knocking every projectile out of the air with the metal tooth of her jouhyou.

The standoff lasted for over a minute. Fujita had nearly exhausted the senbon quivers at his hip and up his sleeves, frowning in concentration, ‘I have nine needles left before I need to collect them from the floor. She will not give me that opportunity unless I make her…and she can block them without much effort.’ It was a matter of getting in close to stab a pressure point with a needle, or attacking her chakra points with Gentle Fist. Her defense was troublesome.

Fujita charged again without a sound, his eyes brimming with his bloodline talent. When his mock-attack was met once again with the speedy spin of the jouhyou, Fujita threw himself into a rotation, “Kaiten!” The revolving shield of chakra tore the jouhyou from Matsuri’s hands and flung it across the room, tangling it wildly against the metal posts of the spectator walkway.

In the same motion, Fujita ended his rotation and charged forward, landing his first hit on her arm as she put it up to block. Matsuri screeched, frustrated, and rolled to the side when another Jyukken strike painfully grazed her side. She reached for another weapon clipped to her belt and wrenched it open, swinging it in a wide arc at Fujita as he stood two meters away. It drew blood that splattered across his face and shirt. Fujita winced and stepped back cautiously.

Matsuri’s second jouhyou was entirely metal, the tiny chain links of the cable were fortified steel, and the end she had thrown at Fujita had a small, double-edged dagger. It had cut the lobe of his ear open when she tossed it. Matsuri stood and resumed her routine, spinning and defending; the opposite end of the steel jouhyou was fixed with a tooth and red flag like the original.

In a blink, Matsuri had smashed the rope-dart’s tooth once against Fujita’s injured ear, and then a second time behind the knee. He fell, somewhat stunned, but launched himself up defiantly when Matsuri moved to attack again. Fujita used another rotation and Matsuri swung her jouhyou away, not keen on losing another weapon.

‘I can force her to back off with Kaiten…’ He threw a senbon that landed in the flesh that joined her clavicle and shoulder, ‘Shoot, I was a few millimeters off!’ In retaliation, she swung for his injured ear again. They savaged each other in attempt to wear down the opponent, attacking weak points and injuries.

Gaara watched without batting an eye, one arm folded beneath the other as he cupped his chin. He had been the one to teach Matsuri the importance of defense and breaking one’s defense. She would likely work on Fujita’s ear and knee until he slipped up or became distracted. In that singular moment of diversion, Matsuri would then use the jutsu she had been perfecting. For her part, Gaara acknowledged that she could not afford to take more than a few Gentle Fist strikes or a blow from a Rotation. Both he and his student played a patient game in battle.

Matsuri avoided Fujita as he charged time and again, flipping and leaping, directing the rope-dart’s whirl with her feet, shoulders, arms, and neck. She retreated when he dared to rotate, and counterattacked when he left himself open. Eventually, as Fujita felt his purpling, injured ear be impacted by the jouhyou’s tooth once again, he caught the rope-dart chain. He let a spike of his chakra channel through it and wham Matsuri with a Gentle Fist strike at the opposite end. She collapsed on her back, winded, and dust rose up from the floor in a puff. The chain weapon rattled to the floor as Fujita discarded it.

Up above, Neji recalled using a similar tactic long ago on Kidomaru.

Breathing heavily, Fujita made his move to pounce on the girl, eyeing the exact chakra points he intended to shut. There were cheers and sounds of dismay from spectators.

Then, the Sand kunoichi waved her arm, and a length of beige fabric shot free from the sleeve of her tunic, snaring the Hyuga boy’s legs. With a cry, Fujita fell and slid face-down across the floor, hog-tied. Matsuri was promptly on her feet again, and retrieved her jouhyou with her free hand.

Before she could crack Fujita over the head with the rope-dart’s tooth, Fujita funneled chakra from his tenketsu in a semi-rotation. It tore off the fabric snare and simultaneously propelled him up, gouging a trench into the sand floor. He wobbled to his feet, tuning out the sounds of other shinobi watching, ‘She almost had that chance to get me! Ah, so she can use multiple types of soft weapons.’ Fujita observed her carefully with his Byakugan, spying the features on her person that he had overlooked earlier, ‘She’s concealing that throwing sash in both of her sleeves, but I thought it was only clothing before…’

Matsuri had been inspired by fighting the Shin clan’s leader a few months prior. He had aptly used a throwing sash to batter both her and Menma when they had least expected it. After consulting with her sensei, he agreed that it was worth experimenting with new ranged tools.

Fujita fluttered his eyes in confusion when Matsuri leapt up, reaching above her head with the fabric sash. It knotted itself around the rail of the spectator walkway before she climbed up gracefully, casting the sash again to snare the support beams of the ceiling. Matsuri pulled herself up, wrapping and unwrapping herself in the sash to scale higher. She had very quickly gained altitude.

Fujita took another moment to process and rethink his course of action, ‘I only have…eight senbon now…and I don’t know how to use Air Palm yet.’ He frowned to himself, ‘I will have to take the fight up there before she finds new ways to attack me!’

The Hyuga boy debated which was the best path ‘up.’ Matsuri had fixed several fabric sashes to the rafters, no longer needing them concealed in her sleeves. She had only tested the aerial routine a few weeks prior, but both Gaara and Kankuro agreed after seeing it that it was ‘an asset for the Chunin Exam.’ Matsuri wound herself down and around two cloth ropes as Fujita leapt, and he clung onto the bottom-most end of a sash.

Shikamaru rubbed his chin out of nervous habit, wondering which genin would fall and break his or her neck first. His Shadow Bind could not help much in mid-air, ‘I’m not crazy about having to catch one of these scamps…’

Holding on with her feet and legs wrapped in cloth, Matsuri’s hands were free to use her jouhyou. Fujita was curiously nimble, she had to hand him that. He had adapted and learned how to climb, albeit less effectively than Matsuri. She was only able to strike him once with a glancing blow from the rope-dart’s knife end. A breath later, he had gotten a hold of the jouhyou again and surged a Jyukken blow through it. Before it could connect, Matsuri looped the rope-dart’s chain around a hanging sash and leapt to the safety of another cloth rope. The Gentle Fist strike shredded the sash Fujita had been holding onto, and he managed to clamber to another cloth suspension.

With his Byakugan, he could see Matsuri had scaled higher, just beneath the glass of the ceiling’s windows. She had pulled a small tool scroll from her hip pouch and whipped it open, hastily summoning, ‘She has another weapon!’ Knowing she would descend with speed, Fujita tried to time his Rotation correctly. Matsuri tumbled down with a third soft weapon, much like the one before it, but the weights on each end of it were hazardous. She swung it with practiced momentum off of her shoulder and the side of her body, gravity-assisted, and let it fly as Fujita’s chakra shield whirled below.

Kiba spoke to Sakura as he watched in amazement, “She’s definitely better than I thought.”
“Agreed, but what is that?” Sakura was puzzled.

Poking in-between the two, Kakashi enlightened them, “That’s a Meteor Hammer. It’s barely legal for this exam, if Shikamaru does not disqualify her this very moment.”

When the two asked “why” in unison, Matsuri’s meteor-hammer ricocheted off of the Rotation shield, its trajectory whizzed along the cylindrical wall of the tower arena, gaining sickening speed…and crashed into Fujita on the rebound with a flash of the Sand kunoichi’s chakra.

It knocked Fujita, shield still spinning, into the tower wall. With the resulting crash, Fujita felt his head rattle as he ended his defense and avoided the spectator walkway on his way down. He could not plummet to floor nearly as fast as the two-ended hammer could. The lead-core, steel-wrapped sphere rocketed down with ferocity, catching around Fujita’s ankle. Trapped, he was pulled up again as Matsuri descended with the other end of the spinning meteor-hammer. His Jyukken strike looked like it had come from a dizzy kitten. It missed, and after Fujita hit the floor on his back, the other hammer-sphere slammed into his stomach with wall-shaking force.

Horrified gasps echoed in the room as dust and plaster settled.

Kakashi pointed out quietly to his students that maybe Shikamaru didn’t know if the terrible weapon was tournament-sanctioned or not. They would review it with the Hokage later. Kiba watched with a slack jaw as Matsuri rose up and backed away, looping the chain of the meteor-hammer around her shoulder. Shikamaru tip-toed over to the crater, worried about what was left of Fujita.

Above, Tsunade gave Gaara a peeved look from the corner of her eye. Had it become a trend for Kage to turn their female apprentices into super humans?

Shikamaru crouched down and examined the small, crumpled Hyuga. ‘Damn. It looks like he attempted to make another chakra shield when she hit him just now, so it blocked some damage…but this isn’t something he’ll stand up and walk away from.’ He patted Fujita’s cheek and the boy’s eyes blinked open, “Can you hear me?”

“…yes…sir.”

“Can you continue?”

His breath came in a wheeze, “No…sir.”

“Sorry, kid. We’ll get you out of here in just a second.” Shikamaru stood and pointed his hand to Matsuri, “The winner of this match is Matsuri!”

Some pleased cheering sounded, but many were still stupefied by the conclusion of the duel. Both Hinata and Neji had respectfully descended to check on their second-cousin. Fujita could only speak to them in fragmented sentences, expressing his hope that nothing in his chest or stomach was extensively injured.

Neji assured him, “You will live and recover. We will find you at the hospital as soon as we are finished here.”

“Thank you…Neji-sama.”

Hinata squeezed Fujita’s hand sadly before he was hauled off on a stretcher.

Not intending to instigate further discord, both Neji and Hinata avoided looking at Matsuri and returned to the next level. While they were certainly irked by the girl, she was still Gaara’s student.
On the other end of the room, Matsuri took the stairs back up as well.

Ino looked at Hinata when she returned to the observation deck. She could immediately tell by the look on her friend’s face that they would have to visit their beloved little substitute later. ‘Poor Fujita…in my book, he was anything but a pushover…and he was smashed.’ Ino looked around at the last few contenders, ‘Two matches left. I’ve got to be in the next one or the last…it’s the two Dream ninja and the…the…’ Her eyes settled on the last Rock nin standing on the other side of the room, ‘Lee and Tenten said that guy is a psycho!’

“Ino.” Chouji squeezed her in a one-armed hug, “Do not panic. Fujita will be okay. You’re going to be okay.”

“Everyone remaining is strong.” She muttered.

“So are you. Keep your head right, woman!” He replied in a hiss.

Shikamaru had stopped in the observation area to briefly converse with Tsunade, trying to stall in case Ino needed a moment to collect herself.

“So…” Shikamaru looked between the Hokage and the Kazekage, “Was that an official win, or did I call it incorrectly?”

“You were correct.” Gaara said flatly.

Shikamaru frowned, “Your student used a…I don’t know what it’s called. How can I confirm that it was permissible?”

“I understand your concern, Shikamaru. Let me see what the Exam framework says; a moment, please,” Tsunade paged through a laminated booklet she had kept at her side, JUST in case Danzo wanted to rain on her parade rules-wise, “Ah, Section G, acceptable weapons and tools…part two, Soft-Weapons. It’s a chain or rope dart with weights attached, also called a hammer. Legal. In fact…” Tsunade circled the tip of her finger on the page, “This here says that all legally-acquired weapons brought into battle by Genin can be used. There are maybe three or four types of exceptions, but this isn’t one of them.”

“Really?” Shikamaru bent his head to read it, astounded.

“Yes. Most anything goes, as long as it isn’t stolen or given by a teammate or third-party during a match.” Tsunade advised, “Props to the little girl for her…dexterity.”

Gaara made a sound that came out of his nostril, half-amused, half-annoyed.

“Allright. Thanks for the clarification.” Shikamaru sighed, turning around as he clicked the transponder in his pocket, ‘Please. If there is a higher power or God…don’t let Ino have a match that rough…’

He leapt down into the arena and swallowed hard before looking up at the screen, “The next match will be between… Sasagainu Huo and Hirasaka Agehanto.” Shikamaru was overcome by instant relief. That meant the final preliminary match would be between the last kunoichi competitors of Dream and Leaf. Not everyone in the tower felt relief, though.

Tenten stood with her hands wrapped around the rail, staring without seeing. The name on the board could not be correct.

Pearls of sweat started behind her ears and the nape of her neck, rolling down her skin agonizingly... slow. There. She saw him walking tranquilly, the Rock ninja: Huo. He trotted down the stairs for his match. ‘That surname…’ She shut her eyes hard and then opened them again. The board’s readout was the same, ‘That was the clan name my parents left behind when they fled Iwagakure and came to Konoha…as refugees. The name they said I could never use.’ The pits of her arms and palms of her hands grew clammy, ‘I don’t understand why anyone would use that surname in the light of day…’

Neji softly nudged her with an elbow, tired of being ignored. Tenten swiveled her head toward him.

“What are you doing?” He asked in a low voice.

“Nothing! These…last two matches are going to be intense, I think.”

“You weren’t breathing.” Neji pointed out archly.

“I just….” She exhaled, “I know that Rock ninja is out for blood. I know it more than Lee, now.”

“And how do you figure it?” Neji was minutely intrigued.

“I’ll…tell you when we get out of here.” The look in her eyes assured him that was a promise.

Below in the arena, the Dream ninja named Agehanto was as vibrantly colored as the rest of his team. His violet hood emerged from beneath a pop-collared gi. The ombré dye of the top faded from crimson into canary yellow, and Ino had snapped out of her nervous funk just enough to comment on the fashionable look. Chouji agreed with her quietly, snacking on the half-finished bag of chips.

Huo looked stark and bland standing across from his opponent. Ino recognized the clothing to be Wushu attire similar to what she had seen Lee and Neji running around in. The black fabric was offset by white piping and trim, tailored to Huo’s slim frame. ‘And that face…’ Ino observed, ‘It makes you want to cross the street to stay away from him…’

Shikamaru removed a single hand from his pocket as he stood nearby the competitors. The wary feeling in the back of his mind persisted, but he dutifully pressed on, “If you are both ready…you may begin!” He leapt to the safety of the observation area, surprised that neither Huo nor Agehanto had moved a muscle.

After the initial stare-off, which persisted for about fifteen seconds, Huo folded his arms behind his back. There was a dull expression on his face.

This small action piqued Agehanto, who spoke, “Are you trying to surrender?”

“No,” Huo assured the Dream nin, “I am relaxing.”

“Really?” Agehanto’s lip quivered, irritated, “I suggest you raise your arms now.” He held a Tiger Seal and charged his chakra. Huo did not flinch or move, not even when Agehanto began to levitate, glowing with radiant dark purple chakra.

From what spectators could discern, it seemed like an unusual telekinetic ability. Kakashi noted this to his students, no longer distracted by his book, and he figured that this was a jutsu that the Dream sensei Yomito could also use as a member of the Hirasaka clan.

Agehanto looked as though he would float clumsily with the technique, but he propelled himself with a burst of speed, tapping a foot once on the floor. The flurry of punches he unleashed on Huo’s upper body looked to be as quick as what Tama or Lee could deliver. Huo kept his arms behind his back, tilting and rocking, sedately dodging the attacks. Huo stepped backwards lightly, his face solemn, and his nimble feet guided him away from Agehanto’s strained strikes.

From then on, Agehanto chased without a single move of retaliation or true defense from Huo. He zipped and floated low over the sand floor, crying in frustration each time he missed. The Dream ninja pulled a small carousel of knives from his back belt and let them fly, directing them with his purple-telekinesis technique. When Huo evaded the projectiles, Agehanto flipped the knives around in mid-air and redirected them with a thought, missing Huo time and again despite his lethal talent.

Agehanto’s outrage escalated when Huo casually plopped through the hole in the floor Tama had made. He had attached himself to the underside of the arena floor. Agehanto followed in a rage, still floating, and spectators were largely unaware of what occurred beyond their sight. Agehanto had used a summoning technique, made evident by the remnants of a smoke cloud rising from the floor gap. While rumbling and sounds of impact could be heard, no one save for the Hyuga participants saw a thing, that was…until a large, violet, bi-pedal creature crashed through the floor with terrible strength.

That too had missed Huo. Back on the upside of the arena again, he backed away calmly as the earth monster pursued him. Kakashi guessed sidelong to his students that the floppy-eared beast was a Nuiba, and it blundered forward towards the Rock genin. The bulky Nuiba swung its thick arms down to strike its target, and Agehanto simultaneously attacked Huo from behind.

Though he had no visual confirmation of it, Huo was able to step away from Agehanto’s kunai barrage once more. The knives stuck into the Nuiba, which squealed in response. The Dream genin had lost patience, stamping his foot as he shouted, “You’re not willing to fight me, eh? Is that it? Why’d you enter this Exam in the first place?”

Huo looked over his shoulder at his opponent. After a long silence he admitted, “I only make an effort against worthy opponents.”

“I don’t think you know worthiness when you see it!” Still hovering off of the floor, Agehanto used a jutsu to launch several arcs of his chakra across the room, “Chakra Slicers!”

The aggressive move drew clamoring from the team of Dream shinobi at the observation deck. Since his defeat at Lee’s hands, Masugama was bandaged but cheering loudly for his friend below. The kunoichi was pounding her hands on the guardrail.

The slicing attack collided directly with Huo. He had not bothered to evade, allowing the strike to stagger his stance and untidy the queue at the back of his head. Following that, Huo did side-step the slow moving Nuiba’s fist as it came careening down. At that point, Agehanto was both astonished and furious. It was not as if Huo had taken a direct attack because he could not avoid it…he had taken it merely to disrespect his opponent. Huo unfolded his arms momentarily to dust off his shirt and fiddle with the cuffs of his sleeves.

“Don’t you get it?” Agehanto warned as he floated nearby, “That jutsu sealed your chakra! You willingly let me do it; just because you’re convinced you’re better than me?”

It was as if a switch flipped. Some spectators blinked a few times, confused, unable to follow where Huo had gotten to when he started to move. Kakashi observed that it was genuine Body Flicker speed, but he didn’t need to explain to his students what they were witnessing.

Using only his feet, Huo maneuvered himself behind the Nuiba, kicked it towards Agehanto, clipped the back of the creature’s knee so that it folded, and then with footwork that forgot gravity mattered, Huo forced the beast’s arm down to pulverize its own summoner. Agehanto rolled out of the way, evading the super-fast strike by a hair, but the rebounding blow from the Nuiba’s other arm struck him. Agehanto skipped like a pebble across the arena floor before rolling to a stop.

“It’s kind of like a great, big toy.” Huo assessed the Nuiba. Then, he lithely collapsed to the floor in a tumble, and with that momentum he used a single kick to launch the hulking beast up the tower and through the glass ceiling. As glass shards rained down, most spectators could see the Nuiba had hit the protective Sealing Barrier Dome that surrounded the tower for the Exam. It was immediately incinerated.

“Why don’t you…summon another?” Huo suggested as the Dream ninja struggled to his feet, “I’d like to do that again.”

Agehanto wiped his lower lip and pulled his disheveled hood up. “I know I did…I know my jutsu sealed all of your chakra…” He muttered.

Huo was back to straightening his shirt again.

The Dream genin charged at his opponent, levitating, with purple chakra expressed like a sickle in his hand, “Get serious you piece of-!”

Again, Huo used a single kick, but it looked like a premature move. He had only hit air, and yet, Kakashi let his Sharingan track it to watch an odd, half-transparent seal lift off of the bottom of Huo’s foot. Surely it was manifesting from Huo’s chakra, dim and difficult to spot…but the translucent, glowing character hung in empty space long enough for Agehanto to crash into it.

It looked as if the Dream genin had smashed his face into a shield. His own levitation power slipped him up, and with zero traction against the floor Agehanto fell backwards, the back of his head impacting the sandy ground once. He had nearly blacked out, hovering inches off of the floor with a bloody nose.

“You would pay dearly if I fought you seriously.” Huo counseled, slowly lowering the kicking pose he had held, “I do not need to use my chakra to defeat you. This is the time for you to give up.”

‘That hardly makes sense.’ Kakashi reflected on the Rock genin’s warning. He thought he had watched Huo leave a physical seal in the air that could block an opponent. But if that was actually what it had been, it would have required chakra to use, ‘And that’s beside the fact that sealing of that level is not something Genin, Chunin, or even most Jounin can do…’ Only Jiraiya came to mind, off the top of his head. ‘So then,’ Kakashi deduced, ‘That was something else. Not purely physical, but…a different kind of technique.’

The stubborn Dream ninja rose to his feet again, preparing his next course of action, “There’s just…something wrong with you. Something missing. I don’t plan on surrendering to an empty shell like you.”

Kakashi thought three things when Agehanto spoke his last words. 1) If he had been the proctor, Kakashi’s instincts were telling him to jump in and interrupt the match right that second. 2) Huo already knew the Dream ninja was too angry and insulted to surrender to a condescending adversary. 3) Huo would use Agehanto’s words to justify what he was inevitably going to do next.

With the same unknowable speed, Huo had worked his way around Agehanto. His kicks had that same, strange property that Kakashi could not recognize, not even from all of his many years of experience. Maybe the brute strength and discipline reminded him of Lee and Gai, Kakashi supposed. Perhaps his speed and poise resembled that of the well-trained Genin of Leaf that were assembled, but Huo’s form was so utterly unique in its fluidity and exactitude… ‘That’s not Taijutsu or Ninjutsu, to my knowledge. More importantly…I don’t know if that is a Genin.’
Without using his hands, Huo had again turned one of Agehanto’s techniques against him, taking advantage of the Dream nin’s levitation to kick him around in a friction-less state. The single time that Agehanto had crashed against a wall, Kakashi estimated that it shook the tower down to its foundation. After that, Huo kept him in the air and treated him like a colorful footbag.

Soaring up into the height of the chamber towards the ceiling, Agehanto’s teammates could see for a fleeting moment as he was kicked past the rails. On his face: distress, humiliation, tired anger, and the absence of pain because his feeling had gone. It was too much for the team of Dream shinobi to allow the cruelty to continue. Masugama reached out his hand as his friend whizzed by in the air. He felt the fabric of Agehanto’s shirt against his fingertip, and then suddenly Huo had kicked the Dream genin to the apex of the tower. Their sensei, Yomito, leapt into action a fraction of a moment too late.

Huo descended after kicking Agehanto down, and when the Dream nin hit the floor of the arena, his head and neck were level with the edge of a floor gap. Huo landed on Agehanto’s back with a soft crack, and then stepped away lightly. It was definitively over in that moment, Kakashi felt.

Huo had wisely put distance between himself and the jounin Yomito, who was grimly fuming when he hurried across the floor to his fallen nephew. Shikamaru called a time out as he entered the ring as well.

The proctor and jounin kneeled on either side of the unresponsive genin. Agehanto was still face-down on the floor and, upon Shikamaru’s inspection, had a neck injury that did not look as simple as fractured vertebrae. “Don’t move him.” Shikamaru suggested to Yomito, “I’ll get the medics over here.”

“Quickly.” The man advised.

Shikamaru returned with two medic-nin who ushered Yomito away from the boy’s side. While their examination commenced, Shikamaru had some foresight on the matter, ‘I don’t know if I can call the match yet. If this Dream genin dies here in the ring, it’ll immediately disqualify Huo.’ He snuck a look at the Rock genin on the far side of the arena, ‘And that’d probably be a blessing.’

“Nara-san,” The female, uniformed medic-nin gave her assessment, “My partner, Ryuta, can stabilize this child’s vitals for now. Unfortunately, he needs emergency surgery to survive this trauma. I may even need Tsunade-sama’s guidance on how to approach the procedure.”

“The Hokage?” Yomito was alarmed by the necessity of Tsunade’s expertise, “What’s happened to Agehanto?”

On the floor, Ryuta had his hands carefully positioned on the Dream genin, “This is classified as an internal decapitation. There is substantial ligature detachment and spinal detachment from the skull base. An uncommon but severe shinobi injury, all things considered.”

‘Savage.’ Shikamaru thought to himself, “But he’ll live?”

“It’s uncertain.” The woman medic replied, “If surgery goes well he can live, although with major functional issues. We shouldn’t waste time.” She and Ryuta proceeded to cautiously replace Agehanto on a specialized stretcher. Both of Agehanto’s teammates had descended to demand answers and see their friend off with great concern.

Shikamaru placed a hand on Yomito’s arm as he turned to stare at Huo, “Please don’t. At least not here. What he did was intentional, I’ll give you that, but all Genin are protected by their Exam contracts.”
“Not him.” Yomito asserted, “Killing is against the rules.”

“Huo did not kill your student.” Shikamaru pointed out, “I’m sorry. I can’t allow you to approach a Genin during this stage of the exam.” He lowered his voice and whispered from the corner of his mouth, “Wait until he’s alone in a dark alley when all of this is over. I can’t begrudge you anything out in the contract-less world.”

“Well spoken, Nara-san. You have more understanding about this than I would expect from a proctor.” After that, Yomito had to extricate Masugama from the arena before he could get violent and attack Huo. The kunoichi of the Dream team, Eifa, wept quietly and stayed to the side of the ring. Her match, inevitably, was the last match of the preliminary rounds.

Tsunade descended to have a word with the two medic-nins before they hurried off with the incapacitated genin. She passed Yomito and Masugama as they wrestled, both undoubtedly struggling to obey the rules.

Tsunade paused for a moment and gave a critical look to the pink-clad, wolfish boy, “You. That’s enough. Your sensei has an excess of anguish to deal with right now. Return to the observation area immediately or escort your teammate to the hospital. Since you aren’t required to stay here after losing a match, the choice is yours.”

Masugama stilled and his sensei was finally able to release him. The boy rested his conflicted gaze on the Hokage, “Hokage-sama…that Rock nin tried-”

“I know what he tried to do. I know what he didn’t do, and I know the rules. Listen to what I am telling you.”

“Yes ma’am,” He was compelled to acknowledge her, “I’ll stay with Agehanto.” Masugama gave one last parting look to both Yomito and Eifa. He hustled into the downward staircase.

Tsunade regarded Yomito, “Give some encouraging words to your student over there. She’s going to need them for her match.”

It seemed that the Dream jounin already had that in mind. He swiftly went to the girl’s side and braced her shoulder as she began to tremble terribly.

Shikamaru cleared his throat softly from beside the Hokage, “Ma’am…”

She huddled in with Shikamaru and conversed with him so that no other occupant of the tower could hear, “That was a fiasco. Any of the Jounin here should have been able to intervene and stop that blow.”

“He was too fast. One of the fastest goddamn living things I have ever seen.” Shikamaru assessed quietly.

“Huo’s offense does not constitute disqualification; all the same…pushing a boundary like that makes me want to wring his neck.” The Hokage admitted, “That boy, Agehanto, is not going to survive. Whether he expires on his own in a few minutes or languishes over the next few days…that injury was too severe. Those medics gave an optimistic assessment with which I did not agree.”

“Couldn’t you have-?”

“I wouldn’t have saved him with my healing.” Tsunade’s tone was frigid, “If you count being able to breathe without moving, seeing, sensing, feeding or caring for oneself for the rest of one’s days…that isn’t a life. To live through that kind of injury…it would have to be the least serious occipital dislocation it could possibly be. His was not that.”

“I understand. So…should I declare Huo the winner?” Shikamaru whispered.

“If it were a matter of personal opinion and not the rules, I would ask you not to. However, this match was undeniably won.” Tsunade excused herself to return to the upper level.

While hardly even looking at the Rock genin who was waiting, Shikamaru gestured towards Huo and announced, “Huo is the winner of this match.”

A mortifying silence hung in the room. Unabashed, Huo cleared out of the arena and Shikamaru turned about to take a few cleansing breaths. ‘Easy does it. Proctors keep a level head during official Exam matches. I can’t screw up now just because I am sick to my stomach. There’s only one match left…’ For consistency’s sake, Shikamaru let the board select the two names of the final match’s participants: Amagiri Eifa and Yamanaka Ino.

By then, Yomito had emboldened his student as best he could before he was forced to return to the observation rail. The Dream kunoichi stood silently in her colorful armor in the middle of the arena. Glass from the ceiling’s shattered windows was scattered about the floor. She stared into a broken piece near her boot and mused at her own reflection, lost and tormented.

Ino had also absorbed the traumatized reactions of her Leaf peers before she went to the stairwell. When the final blow had been struck on Agehanto earlier, Ino noted the reactions of her friends.

Sakura and Tama had looked away, leaning into each other as they stood side-by-side. Hinata had covered her face with both hands as if to prevent a shriek. Many of the young men of her group watched with gaping mouths, disapproving of what had been done. Lee had covered his mouth with a closed fist as he watched with a furious frown. Ino wondered if Huo’s style and chakra-less fighting had bothered Lee simply on principal, apart from Huo’s brutalizing of another competitor.

‘Tenten had a weird reaction too.’ Ino recalled as she slowly took the steps down, ‘She was fidgeting. It looked as if she wanted to fight. Or flee. She wanted to do something…at least that’s what I thought.’ Eventually, Tenten had also squeezed her eyes shut. It was hard to willingly watch a tragedy unfold, and then see it go unpunished by the Exam proctor and the Hokage. ‘We all knew that guy wanted to kill other participants, he said it himself! While it wasn’t an idle threat, he stopped just short of murder so he could continue to compete.’ Ino exhaled harshly, ‘What’s going to stop him from doing that again? Most of my friends are competing in the Final Rounds!’

Before she had completely snapped out of her thoughts, Ino found herself standing in the arena across from the Dream kunoichi. Close by, Shikamaru gave a very serious look to his teammate-turned-lover. Ino knew what that look meant.

‘Get it over with and don’t feel sorry about what I have to do!'”

Yet still, it was difficult to not sympathize with Eifa as she stood like a small tree trying to weather the storm. Her posture was poor, her eyes swollen from crying, lips still quivering… Someone she cared for had been disrespected and robbed of his life. The image of it was trapped in her brain and demoralized her. Knowing that, Ino could not be more certain that capturing Eifa’s consciousness would ensure victory.

“Begin!” And Shikamaru leapt away.

Few spectators were still invested in watching, although those that did could not at first tell which kunoichi would come out ahead. A small spark remained in Eifa, and she used what anger and frustration she could to hurl and direct a fuuma shuriken with wire. Ino’s easy ballet of acrobatics made Eifa’s use of weaponry look amateur. The Dream kunoichi’s patience wore thin as Ino capably evaded her attacks, countering only with kunai. One projectile nearly succeeded in taking Eifa’s eye out, but she tipped her head to deflect the knife with her helmet.

When Ino charged with unexpected speed, Eifa freed her hands to use a jutsu, and spat out a jet of poison mist. The Leaf kunoichi stumbled in the violet fog and then collapsed. After a moment of confusion, Eifa was disappointed that she had only stunned a clone with the technique. Before she could pull back on the wire for her giant shuriken, Ino had gotten behind her and used an upward kick to knock the samurai-like helmet off of Eifa’s head. The Dream nin overreacted with poison again and missed, exhaling a plume in the wrong direction. Ino’s follow-up kick spiked the helmet down and cracked it over Eifa’s head.

Hissing sounds of sympathetic pain sounded from those watching at the rails. Eifa staggered, seeing triple, and reeled in her flying fuuma shuriken just in time to ward Ino off and avoid close-quarters combat. When her vision returned to normal, she spied a corsage of flowers at her feet, ‘What the-?’ For some reason, the small bundle of flowers had a lit fuse.

The flower bomb went off and sent Eifa flying across the arena. The kunoichi’s armor buffered the blow as she hit the floor and rolled, and her giant shuriken was snapped loose. Coincidentally, the fuuma shuriken sailed straight for Ino by pure chance, but she swiveled her body to let it pass harmlessly by. ‘Phew! That was close!’ She prepared her clan’s staple hand seal.

Eifa had to take a moment to get her bearings again, letting a sob of frustration escape her. She was not fighting like her normal self. She was quicker and more precise than this sorry display she was giving in her match, ‘I just can’t stop thinking about Agehanto-kun…’ Suddenly, her thoughts and lament over her teammate felt compressed, slipping to the edge of her consciousness. Then it went dark.

‘Oh man, is it sad in here…’ Ino observed her adversary’s mind, ‘She’s so upset. She’s known that boy since they were small kids…’ While in control of Eifa’s body, she stood upright and dusted off, ‘I’m sorry that this happened to you and your team. But please try to think: that could have been you or me in that fight. Neither of us would have been spared unless we surrendered, and I’m not even sure of that…’

Eifa, with Ino’s persuasion, raised her hand and looked directly at the proctor, “I forfeit the match.”

“I had a feeling you would.” Shikamaru muttered as he descended back to the arena, and then nodded, “Alright. The winner of this match is Ino!”

He pointed towards Ino as she had only just returned to her body, rising to her feet and reordering herself. When Eifa came around, she made muddled sounds of protest to accepting the outcome as she looked around. No one on her team had been successful. Only the Leaf cohorts were cheering, and she considered that they would not stay very happy when they later would be pitted against each other.

Eifa confirmed with Shikamaru that she was no longer required to stay in the tower.

“If you and your sensei want to go the hospital and be with your teammates, you can.” Shikamaru assured her. Without a moment to lose, both Eifa and Yomito exited the top of the tower without looking back. Their first-in-decades participation in a foreign Chunin Exam had been, in Masugama’s words, an unrepeatable clusterfuck. Shikamaru knew that it had been unfair experience for them, as truly strong and respectful competitors, ‘I wouldn’t be surprised if we caught flack for this from Yumegakure…’
Before Ino could go to the stairs, Shikamaru halted her, “Stay here for now. All victors need to get down here anyway for the lot drawing.”

“Hm. You calling me a victor has a nice ring to it.” Ino agreed.

An infatuated smile nearly overtook him before Shikamaru shook his head and made the next announcement.

“Eh-hem! This concludes the preliminary matches of the Third Stage. All victors please report to the arena floor now for further instructions!” He added thoughtfully, “Jounin may also report to the floor with their students. Those of you who did not advance may report to Stairwell B and meet with the assistant who will escort you. You can wait at the observation level to join your teams after the last directions are given and then leave together.”

Unsuccessful Genin filed off to the designated stairwell, some of whom stayed to wait for the victorious members of their team still waiting on instructions for the Final Stage.

It took a few minutes to congregate below, Genin and Jounin alike assembled in rows facing the proctor. Tsunade and Gaara loitered to the side (Matsuri standing anxiously beside her sensei) appearing adequately worn out and both in need of naps. The large digital board on the wall was now displaying brackets for a tournament, beginning with seven initial matches. Shikamaru glanced around at the antsy Genin who eyed the board up above, and he controlled the screen with the remote in his pocket.

“It goes without saying that you can all expect to compete with each other in the Final Stage of the Exam. First off, let me explain how it’s set up,” He orated as a graphic and Exam images flashed on the board, “In past years, Final Rounds are structured to be one-on-one knockout matches that facilitate winners to proceed to the next match. There are usually only a handful of competitors, though. This year we have a high volume of participants, which was anticipated.”

Shikamaru stole a look at Tsunade before he continued, “This Exam’s final round Tournament will be held in the sports stadium for an estimated 9,000 spectators. You heard that correctly. Your performance and skill will no longer be privately witnessed from this point on, as it is traditional for Genin with great ability to enjoy the limelight briefly and represent their villages. The Tournament will narrow down victors of matches until there is one champion. That champion will publically be named a Chunin in front of stadium attendees by our very own Hokage.”

Tsunade waved half-heartedly from her position, trying to keep focused. She was starting to daydream about locking herself in an office for some undisturbed rest.

“Please note that winning your match is not a condition of being promoted to Chunin rank. Evaluators and the watching Kage will score your aptitudes and judgement, win or lose, to determine your promotion eligibility. The utmost propriety and discretion is required for this stage, as the Tournament is a tourist attraction that will feature…complex betting on competing Genin…and their projected odds for advancement.” Shikamaru nearly bumbled over the words as he read them from a flashcard Tsunade had given him.

“It’s a sure thing that Tsunade will be placing her bets at this thing…if she had to emphasize that feature…” He mentally grumbled, stuffing the card back in his pocket.

“The same rules are in effect. No outside interference or killing is permitted. Your binding contracts and waiver for the Exam is also valid up until the Exam’s conclusion. There will be a mandatory one-month period of preparation before the Final Round matches commence, ensuring that you are all given time to recover and train as you see fit.” Shikamaru held up an opaque, hemp sack, “You will all draw a single number from this bag to randomly determine who your opponent will be in the initial round. Your names will populate on the board above to give you an idea of how the Tournament will begin, and what you can expect.”

With that, Shikamaru approached the Genin who had formed a line and made his way past with the lot-drawing bag. As ninja selected their numbers, Shikamaru controlled the screen on the wall to build brackets.

Most everyone gathered glanced up and down again to see who had been pitted against whom. Shikamaru covered a few more minor rules of the Tournament, such as the prohibition of rigging matches for betting profits and the like. He also glazed over the updated security detail that could easily detect and snuff out threats, preventing an invasion like the one that had occurred at the previous exam.

Shino was the last to choose a ball from the bag, but by then his place was secure in the brackets as everyone had plastered their attention to the completed chart. Shikamaru looked over it as well, ‘Let’s see, how did this pan out? Huh! Sakura and Ino are 1 and 2. Looks like a long-lost wish of theirs was granted for Match 1. Heh! Match 2 looks like that Grass fellow, Aota versus Tenten. Match 3…will be Tama against that Rock nin, Huo.’ Shikamaru frowned deeply at the prospect, ‘That’s…as troublesome as it gets. Match 4 will be Shino versus Kiba, and Match 5 will be Neji…fighting Sato.’ Again, he restrained any commentary, ‘Match 6 is Hinata versus Chouji, oh man…I don’t feel good about that either. And Match number 7 is between Lee and Gaara’s student, Matsuri.’

As Shikamaru looked over the Genin who were considering the board, he could plainly see some of them were flabbergasted by the outcomes.

He made his last announcement, “Please note who your first Tournament opponent is and prepare accordingly. Based on the matches you watched today, you should have enough information to work on the skills that will best serve you in the Final Round.” Shikamaru looked over to Tsunade, “Are there any closing remarks from the Hokage?”

“Yes.” With her arms folded, Tsunade cocked her head at the trainees, “Respect your opponents, and respect this Exam. Certain behaviors…are unbecoming of honorable ninja. Certain behaviors are unacceptable of Chunin. Oh, and also, get plenty of rest. That’s what I’ll be doing. You few non-Leaf-shinobi who may be looking for accommodations during your one month stay here, you’ll be happy to know that there are a few hotels with discounted rates for you and your teams. Meet Shizune at the exit if you’d like to inquire about that.” The woman turned on her heel, “Now let’s all be on our way. The clean-up crew has a hell of a job to do in here…”

By early evening that day, the effects of the Exam were still rattling the Leaf genin. All were unwashed, hungry, dirty-clothed, sleep-deprived, and tremendously anxious about what was to come.

Based on the conversations they’d had on their way out of exit tunnels, Hinata figured that the first thing on everyone’s mind was a bath. Ino was loudly inviting all kunoichi, including Matsuri, to an onsen where they could clean up and decompress. Many had accepted the invitation with tired groans, including Tsunade. Shizune impatiently sniped in the woman’s ear, reminding her that a mountain of work was waiting at the office. She shepherded the Hokage away dutifully.

The idea was fostered by Sato and Shikamaru (who was at that point free from his proctor duties) and they gathered up their brothers-in-arms who were also stinking and wishing to relax. Gaara’s ears perked up at the offer. It had been a long while since he had spent time with his friends.
“May I accompany you?” And no sooner had he spoken the words, he was hauled off by the by the Leaf Bro regiment. Of course, most would make stops at home to pick up fresh clothes and then proceed to the nearest ryokan.

Just as her friends had, Hinata had retrieved clothes to change into and then met them at the check-in desk of the Konoha Hot Springs. She had to laugh softly as Sakura animatedly introduced Matsuri to the group, keeping an arm wrapped around the girl’s shoulder, “Matsuri! Let me introduce you to the girls! This is Ino, my good friend. She’s a pig-”

“Sakura, if you want to have our Final Round match here, we can start it here-!”

Sakura went on, ignoring the threat, “This pretty lady is Tama, my teammate.” Tama greeted Matsuri with a customary, How do you do? “Here is Tenten, our big sister/weapons master. She looks about ready for a bath.”

“I was born ready.” Tenten assured them, aching all over, “Hi Matsuri. I felt bad about Fujita’s match since I’ve tutored him in the past…but I can’t deny that you impressed the pants off of me.”

“Thank you.” Matsuri squeaked, “Gaara-sensei wanted me to do my best.”

“If it’s Gaara’s standard of best, of course it’ll hurt.” Tenten imagined.

Sakura steered Matsuri towards Hinata as they were nearly done with the check-in, “And this is Hinata, another very good friend of mine.”

“Oh, it’s nice to meet you.” Hinata gave a slight bow and tried to deter the small girl’s shyness, “Your match was very exciting, Matsuri. I’m glad that you get to enjoy the hot spring with us.”

“Me too…I’ve never been to one before.” Matsuri admitted, “I’ve swam in the ocean a few times…but we don’t have many water activities in the desert.”

“Then let’s get you set up.” Ino encouraged, leading her around the bend towards the women’s lockers, “Once you try this you’ll keep coming back!”

They stored their clothes and belongings in coin lockers, and then proceeded to a line of spigots in the ladies shower area. The group of Leaf kunoichi hardly acknowledged their nudity around each other. Matsuri was mystified by their casual attitudes, and followed behind the older girls to the stools stationed in front of taps. She took a seat and was glad they were wrapped up in their own conversations for the time being. She had contorted herself to be less visible and fumbled around with soap bottles.

Matsuri timidly scrubbed herself as she sat on a stool, ‘I’ve never bathed in public! I feels embarrassing…’ She kept her eyes averted as she soaped up, ‘They’ve been friends for years and probably do this all of the time…and these girls are more mature than me.’ She glanced down at her mosquito-bite chest, ‘I need to make a wish at a shrine…soon. It’s like my boobs refuse to grow no matter what I try!’

Sakura was seated beside her cleaning up. She spoke sidelong to Matsuri, “Are you still feeling shy?”

“A little. I don’t know if there even is a communal bath in Suna, and if so I’ve never been to one.” Matsuri tried shielding herself with a rinsing bucket, “It’s easy to keep to myself back at home.”

“It’s always awkward the first time you come to a place like this. Imagine: On my first visit I was forced to go to a public bath with my mom. I was nine or ten. I thought I would go insane…” Sakura was taking time to lather and rinse her hair, “Even now I still get embarrassed, but that’s usually because Ino delights in making fun of my chest size.” Sakura sighed, “Bit by bit I am learning to let go of that insecurity, but this place always reminds me…”

Matsuri patted her chest sadly as she considered the tale, “I guess…that makes two of us.”

“I wish I had your problems.” Tenten commented from the next seat down, “I bind my chest every day so I can train and fight to my team’s standards. Whenever I tried not to, mine would get in the way. I learned my lesson. It’s a shame they aren’t large or beautiful or worth showing off. They’re just annoying.”

“The struggle is real.” Tama agreed, further down the line.

“Well they say the grass is always greener…” Sakura sighed.

At the far left, Ino piped up, “Has anyone seen how green Hinata’s grass is?”

A round of playful laughter erupted while Hinata crossed her arms, peeved, “Why do you have to say something like that every time I come here?” Her face was beet red. She was hurriedly concluding her shower routine.

“Because we envy you, and also…admire you, Hinata. Some people have all of the luck.” Ino explained, “When I rip on you it’s perfectly okay to mock me back. I’ve seen store mannequins better endowed than me.”

“Then next time I will call you a mini mannequin.” Hinata decided. Her smile was too naively innocent to be truly sly.

Proud of her docile friend’s jibe, Ino pressed a finger to her own arm and made a hissing sizzle sound.

“You set yourself up for that one, Pig.” Sakura crowed. In relation, Ino hurled a soggy washcloth that landed squarely on the pinkette’s face. It clung comically.

Ino stood and motioned for Matsuri to follow, “If you’re all clean let’s get you to the hot spring, new girl. You’re gonna love it.” The same washcloth was thrown at the back of Ino’s head, contacting with a wop and then it slid off. Ino tossed it into a laundry bin, “You too, Forehead Woman. You wash slower than a grandma!”

In due time, they had all rinsed off and ventured to the women-only hot spring. Tenten was the last one in, assuring Sakura that, “If anyone goes at grandma-speed, it’s me. I’m beat.”

“You did have a difficult fight today.” Sakura acknowledged, “Do you want me to look over your injuries again?”

“Nope, just give me a spot.” Tenten entered the steaming water faster than what her friends could tolerate, who were still slowly acclimating, “Mmm. If I had to choose the way I had to die, I’d pick boiling. I love it here.”

“Tenten, I swear…sometimes I wonder if a crazy old person was trapped in a young woman’s body when I hear you speak.” Ino proclaimed, “Do you remember who’s Obaa you were?”

“I would tell you a Your Mama joke to retort, but Sato tells those too much. It’s annoying.”

“Yeah, thanks for not doing that.” Ino relented.
“For the record, I don’t remember if I am a trapped old person, but my dad used to believe I was a reincarnation.” Tenten scoffed as she leaned on the side of the stone pool, “Pft. He was the crazy one. The only genre of story he subscribed to was bananas.”

“Reincarnation?” Hinata was intrigued, “Why did he think that?”

“It’s a long story.” Tenten hoped to dismiss it, “No, really. It is a story. Neji’s reading that book right now.”

“Oh! Maybe your father thought that you took after a character!” Hinata smiled at the idea, “It’s sentimental.”

“Maybe.” Tenten rested her head on her folded arms and relaxed. Deciding that Tenten’s position looked comfortable, Matsuri mimicked it and kept listening to the women’s banter.

“Well…if your dad was right and you did have a past life, maybe you do have grandkids running around somewhere.” Sakura had folded her modesty towel and balanced it on her head.

“I don’t even like children.” Tenten announced, “If they’re around somewhere, I’m not really dying to meet them.”

“You wouldn’t even know if you were talking to them this very moment.” Tama joked, “Maybe they aren’t so bad?”

“Ah, well…I guess they wouldn’t be…”

Ino shuddered at the idea, “Thinking of you being my grandma made me think about becoming a grandma someday.”

“I’d personally be okay with it, so long as I could keep up my shinobi career.” Sakura speculated.

“It’s good to stay ambitious like that, Sakura-chan. That’s how I feel too.” Tama agreed, “Tsunade-sama is still working hard at her age.”

Sakura’s face paled at the idea, “You…are so lucky Shishou did not hear that.”

“Hokage-sama is still young. We have elders in my clan who are nearly one hundred years old…and I still see them use the training yard sometimes.” Hinata elucidated, “Even the grandmas.”

“Huh.” Tama and Sakura took that as food for thought.

“That’s because the Hyuga clan are too proud to quit.” Ino considered, “In my clan, the most stressful things my elders partake in are drinking games.”

“How about you, Matsuri? Do you have family that work and play up until that age?” Sakura wondered, hoping to coax her into conversation.

“Well…” She fiddled with the towel at the edge of the pool, “Maybe at one time, I did…” Matsuri swallowed hard before adding, “I don’t have any family, really. Most of them left Sunagakure a long time ago, and some died in the last war. My mom and dad were killed when I was young.”

The dip of silence was ended at the next beat, in which Matsuri clarified, “But it feels like…Temari, Kankuro, and Gaara-sensei made me their little sister. They’re kind of like my family now.”

“Ah! I see.” Sakura grasped her meaning.

“When I think of them, I know that all of them work too much. Especially Sensei; he falls asleep at his desk all of the time, like a grandpa.” Matsuri giggled as she went on, “Oh! And you know, Temari-sama and Kankuro-sama play this game with a ball and cups of beer. They get so competitive some nights...”

“I played that once at my older cousin’s house.” Tama chimed in merrily.

“Do they get Gaara to join in?” Sakura asked, brows raised.

“No, he prefers sleeping.”

Ino snickered as she wetted down her arms in the hot spring, “I guess there are plenty of people who have the spirit of a senior citizen locked inside them…”

“Hey, mini-pig-mannequin, or whatever we’re calling you now,” Tenten responded over her shoulder, “You’re hurting my grandma feelings.”

On the opposite side of the partition, the menfolk of the Leaf Rookies had also washed up and entered the hot spring.

“I bet they’re talking about us.” Sato insisted.

Shino begged to differ, “Unlikely. There is plenty of other subject matter to cover.”

The other young men were edging into the spring carefully as Sato and his best friend debated the possibility of the kunoichi worrying about what was “on the other side of the wall.”

After sliding guardedly into the hot water, Gaara resembled the mercury in a thermometer. His skin turned lobster red from bottom to top. He said nothing as he folded his arms across his chest and shut his eyes, trying to stay nonchalant. Being a desert dweller with fair skin made a dip in an onsen uncomfortable, at least initially.

Shino was to his immediate left in the spring. Sato hovered near them in the open water while most of the bro squad had lined up with their backs against the edge of the pool. To Gaara’s right he saw Neji (his long hair clipped on top of his head,) Lee, Chouji, Shikamaru, and Kiba (Akamaru had been left at home.) Dead ahead was the wooden wall that divided the men and women’s baths. Gaara imagined that by now, had he been present, Naruto would have already been teasing others about stealing a peek. ‘Sato would join in on that…’ He thought, imagining Haku castigating the immature idea. ‘This seems somewhat incomplete without Naruto or Haku being here.’

“I needed this.” Shikamaru confessed aloud, “Those matches took a lot out of me…”

“Considering that you didn’t have to fight in one.” Kiba snickered.

“Shika did have to rescue a couple of people, and run around…” Chouji observed, “We only had a single fight and then we were allowed to relax.”

“Well, by the end it was tough to unwind.” Kiba noted, “That Rock guy is a freak. He didn’t even have to use his hands to win his match.”

“Please do not call that a victory.” Lee advised, “It was cruel! He should have been disqualified.”
Shikamaru caught Lee’s eye and recognized his opinion, “I know, Lee. I tried to weigh in on it, but Tsunade said he didn’t break a rule. And vague intent just isn’t enough to go on to expel someone from the Exam. Then it’d be possible to misconstrue accidents with intentional, mortal injuries.” He added, “Which could be a problem with all of you knuckleheads, later.”

“We would never go that far.” Lee protested, still disturbed by the heartless, Wushu-styled beat down Huo had wrought on the Dream genin.

A silence hung as they all considered it. Huo was a problem, and Shikamaru was likely waiting for him to legitimately incriminate himself at the Tournament.

“Phew, we need to lighten the mood here. We’re supposed to be relaxing.” Sato reminded his friends, “I mean, check Gaara-kun out. His skin and his hair match.”

“For now.” Gaara acknowledged.

“Quit while you’re ahead, you can’t tease the Kazekage.” Kiba warned, “Besides, he’s already ghosting up again.”

“Just so you know that wasn’t very respectful either.” Chouji informed Kiba.

Gaara merely shrugged it off, “It’s true. I haven’t been to an onsen in a very long time.”

“Yes, I remember a few years ago when Neji also flushed bright red in hot water.” Lee nodded his head thoughtfully, “Not so much now, however alcohol has a similar effect.”

“I suggest not discussing those topics.” Neji recommended calmly. His eyes were shut and he had propped his arms up on the ledge of the pool.

Since Gaara was off-limits, Sato could not help but to poke fun at his soon-to-be Final Round adversary, “If we’re not going to discuss that sort of stuff, Neji, then maybe you’d care to explain what I saw you do in the shower room?”

Immediately, Sato had everyone’s undivided attention. Kiba, Shikamaru, and Chouji shared this is gonna be good expressions while Lee tried to silently implore Sato to reconsider his course of action. Gaara stood by in silent fascination as Shino, behind his glasses, did nothing to avert the impending crisis.

Eyes still shut, but slightly irked, Neji tried not to take the bait, “To what are you referring?”

“Well…just that you stayed behind after we had all finished cleaning up, so I thought I’d go back to fetch you…” Sato wore an unrestrained smirk, “But there was no mistaking you using the Byakugan!”

Raucous splashing and indignant yelling erupted. Lee was shouting at the top of his lungs declaring the falsity of the accusation. Kiba howled with laughter while Shikamaru tried to talk over people to extract the truth from the hubbub. Even Gaara was stymied, and turned to the Hyuga heir beside him to quietly ask, “Did you?”

Sato had his hands on his hips, staring as intently as a prosecutor. The noise died down as they waited for a reply. Instead, Neji said nothing. He leveled an even glare with the Hatake.

Lee started shouting again. It was false. Untrue! So unlike Neji and his unshakeable honor. Sato was compelled to shout back with a finger pointed at Neji, “I’m not lying, Lee! This is not something I’d joke about! This sumbitch is guilty!”
Shino concurred as he wiped his glasses dry with a towel, “I can attest that Sato is not lying, in this instance.”

Lee’s head snapped toward Neji, his face devastated, “You did not.”

The prideful look on Neji’s face was adopting a hint of compunction, merely over the fact that Sato was a human broadcasting system for all things that need not be said. “Perhaps you all want to be reassured about…what I was looking at?”

The din of calamitous shouting that followed Neji’s admission had alarmed the women on the other side of the partition. Even Gaara had to scold him, in a normal volume of voice, expecting more of Neji. Shikamaru was also quite displeased that Ino may have been peeped upon. In contrast to others, Kiba was congratulating Neji on using his bloodline talent the way they all wished they could. Lee was on the verge of tears, having never been so deeply disappointed by Neji after developing new, very high esteem for his good friend. Shino advised that they lower their voices before an attendant threw them out.

Sato and Kiba had started a smaller, argument within an argument about the moral correctness of Neji’s actions. Eventually, Shikamaru managed to get them all to shut up. He looked pointedly at Neji, “What’s with you? You’d never do something like that.”

“I never have frivolously.”

“The hell does that mean-?” Shikamaru nearly scraped his teeth together.

“I had no designs to observe all of our colleagues in the women’s bath. They weren’t there.” Neji pointed out, “They reached the onsen before any of us did, if you had been listening to them converse on the opposite side.”

“That I did catch.” Shikamaru was slightly relieved, “But even when you knew that their washroom was unoccupied, what were you looking for?”

He answered with silence again. Gosh, was it uncomfortable to talk about these things. Tenten had been the last one to exit on the women’s side. The beautiful sight would forever be burned into his retina.

“It stands to reason…” Shino deduced, “That one person stayed behind in that room. Does that lessen the severity of this gross abuse of power? Not necessarily.”

Sato turned to his best pal, “Wait, Shino…are you saying…he was peeping at-?”

“Please,” Lee begged tearfully of Sato, “Do not…do not say…”

“Get a grip man, it was bound to happen.” Kiba half-comforted Lee.

Neji did have to confront Lee’s obvious discomfort with what he had done. “Would denying it make you feel better?” He frowned and folded his arms across his chest, “Or would it be worse?”

“Neither makes me…feel better…” Lee sniffled, keeping his runny nose over the stones of the pool’s surround, “You would do that to Tenten…who is like family to me! And you, my best friend…would comport yourself so!”

“Lee.” He was wondering what in the world this strange sensation was, ‘Not…guilt?’ He felt bad about upsetting Lee. Though really, Lee was usually more upset or excited by things than most human beings were.
“I cannot…even look at you right now, Neji.” Lee turned his back, folding sadly onto the edge of the spring.

“In Neji’s defense, I am surprised to say,” Shikamaru cut in, “That checking out one’s naked girlfriend is kind of normal. Sorry, Lee.”

Lee wailed in response.

Gaara tended to agree with the statement, “However I would not attempt something like that here.”

“Gee, great.” Kiba grumbled, trying not to think about what the Kazekage’s intentions for Sakura were.

Chouji turned to Sato, “See what you did? You made Lee cry.”

“Neji made Lee cry.” Sato defended, “I was the poor schlub who had to catch him in the act!”

“You didn’t have to say anything.” Chouji retorted, “Or maybe you could’ve waited until later?”

“Chouji, I was born without a filter or general regard for delicate subject matter. Just ask Shino.”

“Correct.” Shino confirmed.

“Troublesome…I hope it was worth all of this noise.” Shikamaru muttered to Neji, “…was it?”

“It was worth a bloody brawl in this spring, if that’s what it would’ve come to.” Neji assured him.

“Hmm.” Shikamaru was mildly happy for him.

Gaara looked between the bickering of Chouji, Sato, and Kiba, Shino’s statue-like presence, Lee’s heartbroken, crumpled bumbling, and Shikamaru engaging Neji on the joys of girlfriends.

Gaara blinked and resolved to himself, “It’s good to be back.”
Hinata had not woken until noon the next day. Her father and the attendants of the Main House had not wished to disturb her.

She sat up in bed with a metallic taste in her mouth. Hinata could still smell the minerals on her skin from the spring water she and her friends had bathed in the night before. ‘I do feel much better…uh…ah! What time is it? Everyone else must be up already!’ She tossed her blanket aside and darted around her room, ‘Fujita is still in the hospital and we promised we would see him! Oh, and what about Father? He probably thinks-!’

When she nearly tripped over her own sweatshirt on the floor, Hinata elected to calm down a bit. It stood to reason that if her father had not come looking for her account of the Exam by noontime, he had probably not bothered Neji either. ‘How understanding of him…’ Maybe it was because the two Hyuga finalists had come home the night before and gone to sleep without a word to anyone. People could take a hint.

Prior to their onsen visit, Kurenai had reminded Hinata and her teammates that they would have a free day to catch up with their lives. A day or so after that, she expected the team to meet and discuss which training regimens best suited them up until the Tournament. With this in mind, Hinata gladly pulled on and buttoned up a sundress. Beyond her bedroom window, it looked like a mild, summer day outside.

After completing her morning routine, Hinata ventured around the house hoping that there was still a hot pot of tea and sustenance somewhere. She had a word with a kind housemaid who asked her to wait in a tea room, “I’ll bring a meal out for you, milady!” Before Hinata could take a seat in the unoccupied tea room across the hall, Hanabi came stomping around the corner.

“Must have been a strenuous exam if you had to sleep that much! I’ve been waiting all morning.” Hanabi tugged her sister into the room. She sat down at a low table and gave her elder sibling a pressing look, “You advanced just like Neji-niisan, right? Who are you fighting? When? Who was at the-?”

Hinata held a quieting finger to her own lips, signaling her sister to tone it down. Hanabi fell silent, but her stare was unwavering.

“We both advanced.” Hinata smiled when a grin spread on her sister’s face, “My first opponent in the Tournament is Akimichi Chouji, four weeks from now. Almost all of the shinobi competing in the final round are Leaf ninja. I should be telling Father all of this as well; do you know where he is?”

The younger girl used her Byakugan on reflex.

“We both advanced.” Hinata smiled when a grin spread on her sister’s face, “My first opponent in the Tournament is Akimichi Chouji, four weeks from now. Almost all of the shinobi competing in the final round are Leaf ninja. I should be telling Father all of this as well; do you know where he is?”

The younger girl used her Byakugan on reflex.

“Speaking to Auntie Kayato, I think. We’re all going to pay Fujita a visit soon.” Abruptly, Hanabi stood and briskly slid open the porch door, “Wait a second while I get Neji-niisan. He just got back! Don’t go anywhere.” She hurried out and left the door ajar.

Hinata muttered to herself, “I’m not leaving yet…” Apparently, her family had the same agenda in mind that she did. Surprisingly, Neji was awake and, by the sound of it, returning from a Mercifully, the housemaid dropped by with a tray and set it on the table. Hinata thanked her profusely and asked that she not shut the porch door, “My little sister should be back momentarily…” Green tea, a small bowl of miso soup, onigiri, a croquette and several orange wedges; her preferred fare, and the maid surely knew it. No sooner had Hinata folded her hands to thank god and good fortune for the meal, Neji and Hanabi returned with raised voices.

Neji stepped inside, shoes off, wearing his black and teal Wushu attire. Hanabi was talking over him as he tried to satisfy her questions, but not nearly fast enough. He looked sweaty.

“How does he have the energy? He must be exhausted too!”

“How does he have the energy? He must be exhausted too!”

“Hanabi, come have some oranges.” Hinata suggested, patting the cushion beside her. She gave a strained look to Neji, “Niisan…you were already out training with Lee-kun this morning?”

“At sunrise.” He confirmed with a sigh. Neji sat down and began tidying his hair. Wong Leung had disdained the week that Lee and Neji took off for the Chunin Exam, and so he quickly reinstated their training program.

“You had time to train with that old-Wushu-grouch, but no time to tell me about the Exam?” Hanabi sniffed, “That wasn’t considerate, Niisan!”

“First off, he is Wong Leung-shishou, or Shifu; and you should address him as such if you should ever meet him.” Neji corrected her disrespect, “Also, you were asleep when I left. I thought it better to tell you of those events later in the day, Hanabi-sama.”

“Hmf.” She chomped on an orange wedge, “Alright then.” She said with a full mouth.

Hinata delicately balanced food at the end of her chopsticks, “The slacker I am…I only just woke up. Niisan was up at dawn after going through the same test I did…and Lee too!”

“Lee managed it.” Neji confirmed glumly, “I barely managed it. He came to fetch me in the dark.”

“Oh.” Hinata finally understood. No wonder he looked so haggard.

Sympathetically, Hanabi passed an orange wedge across the table to Neji and he accepted it. He bit the fruit away from the peel after thanking his cousin. Guessing that he was starving, Hinata handed the croquette over to Neji which he also ate in one bite. The sisters made small sounds of concern, wondering how he would keep his temper in check for the day.

Hinata softly asked Hanabi if she could fetch something to sustain their big brother while they waited for the adults to drop by. The young girl snatched another orange wedge before bustling out to conduct the task.

What sounded like a volcanic roar rumbled from Neji’s stomach. He shut his eyes and languished across the table from Hinata while she remarked, “My, that was a loud one.”

“I am deficient in strength and sleep…and abundant in hunger.” Neji confessed, “I apologize that you have to see me like this.”

“It’s alright, Niisan! We’re all tired after yesterday’s matches.” She sipped her soup briefly, “Mmm. Did you enjoy visiting the hot spring last night?”

He looked thoughtful for a long moment, “I did.”

“We heard a lot of shouting and arguing on the men’s side.” Hinata recalled, “Do you know what “I can’t get into detail, but…Sato started it.” Neji illuminated the matter.

That was all Hinata needed to know in order to fill in most of the blanks. She recounted her own experience and the fun she’d had.

Gaara’s student Matsuri had been good company, though shy. Ino and Sakura engaged in their typical level of mud-slinging while Tama arbitrated. Tenten had also had a bit of fun poked at her, “If she had to, Onee-san said she would pick death by boiling.” Hinata chuckled at the thought. Only grandmas loved onsen more than she did, if Tenten didn’t already count herself among them. They had to harangue Tenten to leave the spring later that night before she pruned up like a raisin.

Neji had to stop himself from saying I know, trying to play off the fact that he had kept track of his girlfriend’s movements the night before. Eventually, Hanabi returned with breakfast morsels, most of which she passed off to Neji. She kept some sweets for herself. The group ate in peaceful silence.

At about the time they had finished their meals, Hiashi stopped in to bid them good day. He wasted no time in asking for their accounts of the Chunin Exam. Neji and Hinata gave simultaneous testimony, speaking in equal parts, and Hiashi nodded as he listened. Though pleased, he was largely unsurprised by the outcomes of their matches. He commended them, “So too will you prove yourselves again in a month’s time.” Without saying it, Hiashi indicated that he was confident they would be promoted to Chunin. The Clan head ushered them along to meet with Kayato and Hideyasu before going to visit Fujita at the hospital.

On the way, the Hyuga Main House gaggle drew only a few stares from other villagers. Hinata imagined what it must have looked like to them. She and Hanabi were dressed as comfortably and girlishly as they respectively saw fit. Neji’s Wushu uniform was probably the most impressive, or perhaps most concerning sight, ‘He’s still just a little irritable...’ And passers-by would probably assume the adults with them to be as haughty and unlikeable as rumors purported.

‘But they really are nice...at least to me and most of the clan.’ Hinata acknowledged. Her father was a stickler for dignity and all things formal, but so help him, the widower had two daughters to raise… holding out hope that he was not making them hate him each day. Hideyasu and Kayato, perhaps the most laid-back couple to ever make their home among the Hyuga clan, were by no means weak or slighted for their outgoing natures. What villagers couldn’t see, Hinata supposed, was how broken this strong-looking family was, ‘Hikune-niisan is gone, and I know Hideyasu and Kayato will never be the same since his death. And without Mother...Father struggles to get through each day...’ Then there was Neji, parentless from a young age, who had hardly ever known what a typical family unit was like.

As they entered the hospital’s doors Hanabi muttered to her sister, “You think so hard I see steam pouring out of your ears.”

Hinata jolted out of her thoughts and the younger girl smirked at her.

“Come on. We’re going to room 343.” Hanabi pulled her along by her wrist, following behind Neji and the adults.

They elected to use the stairs as opposed to the elevator. (No one brought up Hiashi’s dislike of confined spaces.) On the third floor, they quickly happened upon Fujita’s room, inside of which the boy was awake and upright in bed. Sheets of unfolded origami paper were on a bed tray in front of him, and it looked as though he had nearly finished a green-checkered dog. Fujita greeted them all by name happily.
“Whatever you do, please do not say or do anything funny.” Fujita gave them a proviso, “It hurts too much to laugh.” His ribs were on the mend, but it was going to be six weeks of non-stop pain ahead. Pain medication was only sparingly given to him.

“Alright, son. I’ll try to be boring today.” Hideyasu held back a grin.

Kayato took the seat beside the bed and began doting on her youngest, stroking his hair (free of its ponytail) and inquiring about what had happened. He gave her his recollection of the exam and the Kazekage’s student hurling a meteor hammer at him. While Kayato winced, Hideyasu folded his arms and whistled, “Ha, Fujita, you challenged the Kazekage’s protégée and gave her a run for her money! Hm.” He fell quiet as the cogs in his head turned. ‘Hmm. Maybe he could marry that girl… he needs a strong wife someday!’

“Not long ago, the Kazekage was a peer of Neji and Hinata.” Hiashi noted, “Imagine the progress he underwent to so quickly become the head of a village.”

“He still is a peer.” Neji amended, “Rather, a very loyal friend.”

Hinata agreed, “A wonderful friend!”

Hanabi tossed in some gossip, “Fujita, I heard that Gaara-sama went with them to the onsen last night.”

Fujita was crestfallen, “You all went to…the hot springs?”

“We’ll take you there as soon as you are well again.” Neji assured him, “Gaara did not particularly enjoy it.”

When Hiashi gave him a pointed Why not? look, and Hinata was equally perplexed, Neji went on, “Hatake Sato enjoys teasing he and I.”

“Ah, Hinata’s teammate.” Hideyasu nodded knowingly, “A more lighthearted fellow than Kakashi, isn’t he?”

Neji could only describe it as “an assault of lightheartedness.”

Hideyasu cackled at the thought and Fujita was enticed to chuckle, but tears pricked at his eyes as he restrained laughter. Kayato frowned over her shoulder at her husband, “No funny business, please. I know we all want to laugh at a time like this, Hide-chan, but Fujita is in no condition for it right now…”

They stayed for two hours and attempted more serious talk to avoid any sort of mirth. After that, Hiashi excused himself, as well as his daughters and nephew, leaving Fujita in the company of his lingering mother and father.

At home, Hiashi announced that he would be meeting with a few veteran Branch members to discuss promotions and other subject matter he preferred (relieved it was not an assembly with Main House elders.) He added to his oldest child, “Hinata, please stay on the grounds today. There is a technique I would like to go over with you this afternoon.”

She perked up, intrigued, “Oh! I will, Father.”

Hiashi redirected Hanabi’s mounting frustration over her own personal lack of attention. The girl was puffing her cheeks and scraping her feet on the gravel of the front yard.
“Hanabi…”

“Dad, can I join the lesson?”

“Not today.” His voice was softer, patient, “Perhaps your elder brother will have time to practice with you?”

Neji’s furrowed brow silently implied: Thank you, Uncle. I definitely didn’t have plans…nor do I feel tired after the last six days I’ve lived through.

“Neji-niisan!” Hanabi rounded on her cousin. Hiashi slipped away before he could be held accountable for anything.

Lips resisting a grimace, Neji gave a short, imploring look to Hinata.

“I’m sorry. I am not dressed for training right now. I was going to trim and weed the garden, actually.” Hinata smiled contritely.

“You heard her! Train with me!” Hanabi added as an afterthought, “Please, Niisan. I just want to get as strong as you.”

“I was supposed to meet someone…but I can spare an hour.” Neji relented, turning towards the south side of the compound, “We’ll use the pebble yard.” Hanabi trotted after him victoriously.

As the last of her immediate family trudged off for more enthusiastic/reluctant training, Hinata fetched her hat, work gloves, and gardening tools. She practically sauntered through the eastern garden, delighted to have free time for her hobby. Bees floated by the dozen amongst the coneflowers and yarrow, but they did not bother with Hinata as she stooped over the plants with her trimmers.

‘I feel a bit bad that I...stuck big brother with Hanabi…’ She thought, yanking at the roots of a stubborn weed, ‘I knew he was tired and that he probably wants to see Tenten-neesan.’ But it was a moot point. Hanabi was pushy. She would not settle for standing around and watching Hinata in the garden, because she certainly wasn’t going to get her hands dirty. It would be such a bore. Furthermore, Neji had to put up with the strident, pre-genin hardhead like everyone else in the Hyuga clan did.

Gardening consumed more than an hour, and Hinata had noticed Neji later, slinking out of the estate, ‘Ah. He escaped.’ She spotted Hanabi still practicing the forms she’d been taught. ‘I wonder what Neji-niisan does with Tenten-neesan on days like this? I saw them eat noodles once…and they shopped in the Ethnic Quarter too. I’m sure they don’t want to train today. Maybe…’ She blushed and fumbled with a small rake, ‘Maybe they-!’

Hinata shook her head and muttered to herself, “Don’t think about it…”

After putting down the last of the mulch, Hinata returned indoors and changed. She thought about it again. ‘No! It’s none of my business! They have privacy away from the clan estate, though, where Tenten lives…ohh. I wish I could have some privacy…’ She thought with rosy cheeks, ‘With Naruto.’

It was a subject that her mind wrestled with frequently. ‘Alone-time’ with her boyfriend would probably not be easy to come by, once he came home. Her father would most certainly be watching her like a hawk, as he had become somewhat aware of her relationship with Naruto prior to his departure. ‘And Father has no idea that Neji-niisan is dating anyone…’ That gave Neji an added bonus of freedom. How long it would last was anyone’s guess.
Knowing her father, he’d probably be watching Naruto’s haunts and apartment whenever his daughter failed to return home promptly at night. Hinata rapped her head with two fists, frustrated, ‘No matter what I do, I may not have a chance! I don’t want to get Naruto-kun in trouble just because I…want that so badly. I may have to wait.’ She considered it. Waiting for her relationship to be legitimized by the Hyuga, ugh, heaven help her. Marriage, even, may have to take place. She was projecting her first intimate opportunity to be at least a decade away, by that measure.

Hinata marched heavy-footed through the halls of the house, feeling resolute, ‘If that’s what I have to do…if I have to fight for Naruto and stand up to my clan and their supervision, I will!’ At least clan elders had a bit of respect for her, these days. She had to be worth more than a breeding sow-- only good for inter-clan marriage…or so she hoped. Those old men sang the praises of her Misago Byakugan and what it could mean for the future of the clan. ‘They should listen to me. I want to make my own choices just as much as I want to look after the Hyuga.’

Another idea hit her, as it had once been suggested by Sakura, ‘Or I can wait until we are assigned on a mission together.’ Unless her father was heading the team (an occurrence which would probably herald doomsday,) all bets were off. They could probably procure some time to themselves on an assignment. The likelihood of getting away with that scenario, unfortunately, was also quite low. ‘I don’t want to disrespect my teammates either…’ Maybe she ought to ask Naruto what he thought about it? Their letters had gotten very candid as of late.

She spotted her father in the Main House courtyard. Hinata cleared her head and pulled on sandals at the porch’s ledge before joining him.

The man wore a so-small-you-could-miss-it smile as his daughter stopped beside him. “I am sure you are already thinking of ways to prepare for the last trial of the Exam. For now, I would like to personally guide you before you make plans with your team.” He inclined his head and raised his arm, motioning for her to do the same, “You should master Eight Trigrams: Air Palm before the Tournament.”

Hinata made a small sound in her throat, mostly in agreement with her father’s wish. Her previous attempts with the technique had been underwhelming and pitifully short-ranged.

Hiashi spared her another sideways glance, “Do you recall what we covered last?”

Hinata rotated her hand a few degrees, frowning, “Channeling in Taejutsu.” It was a core shape-manipulation principal that took a close-range Gentle Fist strike and transformed it into vacuum wave, capable of blasting distant adversaries aloft like scattered bowling pins. Applying the principal was toilsome. She had failed several times before.

“The post over there: aim for that.” Hiashi reminded her as he took a few lateral steps, “Give it your best attempt and then we will streamline our efforts.”

Hanabi would translate his words as: He wants to see how much you suck and then instruct you on the million little things you did wrong!

She held her arm and looked down past her tilted wrist, as if it were a sight aligned with the target across the yard. As was good form in Jyukken, Hinata bent slightly at the knees and relaxed, breathing out, ‘I have not tried to do this in a while.’ It was among the final few high-level techniques taught in the Main House she had yet to learn. Neji had conquered it some time ago.

Hinata went down a mental check-list, modifying her stance from her feet and up, recalling the components her father had described weeks ago. Hinata snapped her arm forward, shaping the chakra away from her palm and out (Channel it!), forward, not strong enough—she knew...but the small bolt sailed for two meters before dissipating. Her father quickly reached over and raised her arm a fraction, bending it back for the spring, and traced two fingers along chakra pathways that extended down to her hand. Then he let go. “Again.” His tone was clipped.

She took the hint that he wanted her to channel, at the very least, where he had indicated. It went slightly better. Her vacuum wave was a meter short of the target. “Once more, with all of your strength.” Her father encouraged.

Hinata repeated the process, striking the target, but the post rocked on its two legs without a scratch of damage. Hiashi stood beside her and pantomimed the “best form” again for her. She mimicked him for several minutes, copying until they were nearly mirror images. Her head emptied of all other thoughts until she was confident in the motion. Hinata attacked again with a cry, and hacked a portion of the circular target off.

Hiashi tapped her shoulder approvingly before he walked away, “Good. Hit the target again, and then we will move on.”

With another small shout, Hinata toppled the target with a well-aimed Air Palm.

“Have you not been practicing this technique?” Hiashi wondered.

She admitted, “Not as often as I should.”

“You’ve been otherwise occupied, as of late.” He noted and then added, “Make two Shadow Clones and direct one to the edge of the yard.”

Hinata collected herself after a moment and then produced two shadow clones as she had been asked. One waited timidly at the end of the Main House courtyard, expecting what fate was in store for it during practice. Hinata watched as her father executed an impeccable version of the technique, bloated with his great chakra, and like a shot it cracked across the yard and dissolved her waiting shadow clone.

With a hand on his hip, he explained, “As far as form and shape manipulation are concerned, you are a natural craftsman, Hinata. You seem to have an instinct of how to shape chakra with little guidance from others...” Hiashi drew closer, sighing, “But you need to become comfortable with expending more chakra. This technique demands more than a traditional strike.”

“I understand.” She peeped, rather surprised. It was true. She recognized her own habit of conserving chakra—using less when possible, or using only the exact amount for a jutsu that required a hefty contribution, ‘Like the Shadow Clone jutsu, for instance.’ Hinata generally avoided making more than four clones in a sitting unless she absolutely had to. ‘Sometimes I wonder how Naruto could be so liberal with making Shadow Clones...he has the most radiant reservoir of chakra I’ve ever seen!’ She had witnessed him using powerful jutsu on several occasions.

When Hiashi told her to “Watch,” Hinata assumed that he meant with the Byakugan. With her Kekkei Genkai, she observed as her father concentrated chakra, boiling it up from his impressive reserves. It coiled out from his abdomen through the pathways of the arm and his left hand, and then he struck again with a ferocious chakra bolt. She watched in admiration as it was shaped into a spatial wave and travelled at a blinding rate of speed. It crushed the second clone at the end of the courtyard.

‘I can do that.’ The young woman estimated. With a bit of concentration and pure Hyuga-audacity, she could work up that strength. Suddenly, Hiashi rounded on her. They assessed each other with their respective Byakugan before the Clan Head charged.

Her father’s unprovoked attacks were supposed to “educationally motivate” his youngsters. Well, that’s what he always said after the fact. It produced results. Hinata rolled out of the way of an incoming Air Palm and determined that to be the name of the game. She had to put the new technique into practice. Her father’s missed jutsu had struck the edge of the porch, shattering it.

They darted around the yard, attacking and evading each other with ranged wave-attacks. Hinata progressively molded more chakra, lashed out more boldly as she failed time and again to strike her father. Some portions of the veranda and outer support beams of the Main House were collateral damage of the crossfire. Had Hideyasu been around, he would have snappily reminded them that any and all “affinity-combination OR ranged Taijutsu take place in the yards furthest from the house.”

Hiashi had not been going easy on his child. Eventually, one of his consecutive strikes flew across the clearing and clipped his daughter’s legs as she ran. She tumbled and skidded in the dirt at high speed, and after Hinata fell front-ways he briefly paused. Inside, his heart screeched with the sound of his departed wife’s voice,

Give her a moment! Oh! Is she hurt?

Hinata swayed back to her feet and shook it off, dust-covered. Though a fragile flower like her mother had been, on most days, Hiashi knew he was looking at a part of himself when Hinata stood determined, grimacing at him. Just as he was gentle somewhere deep inside, so too Hinata could be hot-blooded like all the rest of her clan. When her retaliating Air Palm missed him, Hiashi had still been done proud; Hinata’s Air Palm had blown away the corner doors of the house—collapsing a portion of tiled roof.

Hiashi was unsure if he would have kept all of his teeth if he’d been struck by it. ‘She certainly has a feel for it now…’ And it was a little scary…though he would never admit it. He rushed around with his daughter until she blocked another wave with a rotation, and then Hinata countered immediately with the strongest vacuum wave she could muster. Wide-eyed, Hiashi was late when it came to rotating in defense, and he was rocketed inside the house into the interior of the busy kitchen, and landed with a coating of rubble. Workers hollered in fright after the blast and quickly helped the man up.

Hanabi’s part-time babysitter, Natsu, dropped the tea strainer she had been washing. She frantically dusted Hiashi off, “My lord, are you alright? It looks like you were attacked!”

“I provoked it.” He admitted calmly, waving off the concerns of attendants, “My eldest child has grown very strong.”

“Ah!” Natsu smiled widely in understanding, “With all due respect, sir; training with Hinata-sama… should probably not take place in the Main courtyard.”

“Agreed.”

She added, “I’ll put in the order to repair the wall and doors.”

“Thank you, Natsu.” He muttered, just a tiny bit sheepish. When his back and hips stopped ringing with pain, Hiashi exited through the door (more of a gaping hole) while brushing his robes off.

Hinata was teetering anxiously from foot to foot in the yard, terribly upset, “Father, I-!”

“You did exactly what I asked of you.” He held up a hand to still her, “I’m not angry.”

“But the-!”
“That wall will be repaired.” Hiashi assured her, “Let’s go to the back-property yard before we continue.” He ushered his daughter along and stayed half of a step behind her, trying to conceal a small limp.

That evening, after a warm bath and friendly chat over a family dinner, Hinata retired to her bedroom. She had definitely earned the soft comfort of her pajamas after a wild day of training.

‘I have some improvements to make with my Air Palm, but Father said it was satisfactory today. He also wants to go over combining jutsu with Nature Transformation…’ That subject, she felt, would be cumbersome in the short time she had to prepare before the Tournament. ‘I also wanted to train with my team…’ Hinata thought as she slipped beneath the covers of her bed, ‘Maybe I can divide my time equally?’ After all, Shino and Sato probably had their own personal lessons to cover with their families. They could rotate their training.

Her head felt heavy. There was too much to think about. Too much to do.

Lights switched off throughout the house as many retired to sleep. In the dark of her room, Hinata still had tension radiating in her muscles from the day’s training. It felt like her arms would involuntarily snap up to perform another Air Palm. She breathed slowly, shutting her eyes, and after a long while felt as though she would melt into her bed.

‘I…I meant to write to Naruto.’ She acknowledged sleepily, ‘But I just don’t have the energy to do it.’ Hinata had thought about having correspondence ready to send when Kosuke returned, but she would have to pen something down on borrowed time. These next four weeks would be chock-a-block with activities. ‘I just need a moment to myself. For him. Naruto is still waiting in the Toad Valley, wondering how I did during the first stages of the Exam…’

Hinata pouted sadly. Naruto, who worked hard every single day; he found the time to reach out to her. No. No matter how busy she was, there was no excuse good enough to exclude him from her routine. He needed contact with the outside world. She provided the periscope for him to glimpse what life at home was like.

All she could do was roll to her side and reach for the pen on the table. Hinata stared mutely at a blank scroll sitting in a bin on the floor beside her bed. It was as if her brain had disconnected from her hands. She was unable to function, and certainly not able to form coherent thoughts on paper no matter how hard she tried that night. It would have to wait. She drew her hand back, curling it beneath the blanket.

‘As soon as I wake up in the morning.’ Hinata resolved. She had to be fair to herself. She was already spread thin before commencing all of the demands the pre-Tournament routine. Laying on her back in the dark, her thoughts trickled through the last bit of consciousness she had left.

Her father had been pleased with her today. It was so unlike the days of her youth, in which he averted his eyes to her mediocrity, passing her over to take pride in Neji and Hanabi. Now, Hinata owed her achievements to pure stubbornness—the inability to quit, the gift that Naruto had imparted on her. She suspected that her father would credit Uzumaki Naruto with her boosted confidence. Her ability to speak with her chin held high, soft but clear, and her ability to forget the promise of death in battle against even the Akatsuki. Oh yes, she had changed, and Hiashi would never deny it. He would also never personally take credit for it. He couldn’t, but he was truly very happy that it had happened.

Apart from that, Hinata’s hyper-developed Byakugan seemed almost arbitrary, as if it was merely a roulette of genetics that had done her no favors in the early years of her life.
Hinata pondered if, had none of these good things come about, would her father have responded in kind? If his disinterest and disappointment in her would have lasted until the end of her shinobi career, or until his deathbed? Or was his cold attitude in fact the guise of his fear? His knowing that the elders of the Main House would create and enforce consequences for her lack of progress? That, perhaps, he was a desperate parent who could do little to save his child from pain, and was praying that she would somehow save herself? Quite obviously, Hiashi did take comfort in her strength and repaired reputation.

It felt good that her father did not measure her worth based on her Bloodline Talent. If she had to guess, Hinata would wager that her father probably gauged her success based on her happiness and safety. He never said these things outright, but he acted that way. Her honorable elders, on the other hand, were obsessed with the Misago Byakugan. The random product and uncontrollable development of their doujutsu, unseen by many generations of the Hyuga clan.

Hinata adjusted the quilt beneath her chin. Out of genuine curiosity, she tapped into the Misago to wonder again at the strange and undefined power of hers that her elders worshipped. Even with her eyes closed, she could see the intricacies of her room, the house, the grounds, and a quarter of the village, in a full 360 degrees, dimmed by the quiet night. Her attention was drawn to the pool of stars in the sky, made noticeable past the roof above her head. Transparent silver energy hummed through her chakra pathways as she lay calmly.

‘I wonder if I will need to use this during the Tournament?’ She tried to have foresight on matches beyond the first round, if she would be matched against a tough opponent, ‘Like Neji-niisan. I would do anything not to lose again. I need to do my absolute best!’ The trouble was that she still had very little understanding of what she could do with the ability. For the sake of avoiding accidents or unintentionally harming others, Hinata did not tinker with it much at all.

She felt less sleepy. A drop of concentration let her gleam a bit of the astral plane, though faint. It was entwined with her reality of flesh, grass, water, and sky. All around, she could see the hint of primitive symbols; maybe they were as old as the world was, or as old as her ancestors had been when they came to understand more than the physical world.

The character she was familiar with, a pictograph she had tampered with before to overlay with others, responded to her attentive stare. It felt a bit like a plunge, a rush of backwards and inwards movement as she laid unmoving…and then her surroundings seemed a bit different. ‘None of this looks as though I am seeing it with my Byakugan…’ She could have sworn she did not intentionally return to her normal level of vision. It was average sight at best.

The room went dark momentarily, her eyes sleepily blinking, before Hinata noted that the sensation seemed different. Like she was a spectator…’I’m…I’m not seeing out of my own eyes!’ Trying not to panic, she conceded that it did feel like she had travelled a bit far from Hyuga grounds. It looked like she was in a different room and environment. Hinata went on to infer that she had carelessly overlapped her consciousness with another’s.

Then a yawn sounded familiar.

In pre-sleep moments, people see and think things they almost never remember. Naruto is no exception, he knows this. But what happened in the moments just before he slipped away from the awakened realm that night were just too weird to forget by morning.

‘Kinda feel…overheated…all of a sudden.’ He tossed his blanket off. His limbs were spread wide on the futon in Ma and Pa’s guest room. Eyes fluttering tiredly, his mouth cracked open childishly to exhale.
Abruptly, Naruto felt a tug. From the inside. Or maybe it was some crazy dream. Or gas. He had labored all day to absorb Natural Chakra, and Fukasaku had whacked him over the head at a rate of six-bashes-per-hour to prevent him from becoming a Toad Statue. He wouldn’t be surprised if he was regularly hallucinating after such treatment.

Naruto!

Eyes shut, he smiled to himself.

Naruto-kun!

‘Sounds like Hinata.’ The distant call registered as a blip on his awareness-radar.

The second blip he registered was when his hand moved without his (its owner’s) volition. Naruto peeked an eye open to see his right arm raise, hovering a hand above his face and turning it over to examine it. As if he did not know what his own hand looked like. More confused than alarmed, he regained control and set it down. Whether it was a ghost playing tricks or a freak muscle contraction, he was too exhausted to care.

Except that his eyes were not willingly shutting anymore. ‘…the heck is wrong with me tonight? I’ve got to ask Pa to let up…’

He was hearing things again too.

Naruto, I’m sorry, I tried this once before and it was too difficult…and now I’ve picked a terrible time to do something like this, but…I want you to wake up! I’m here! I have never reached someone so far away before.

He slurred his words aloud, “What’re ya talkin’ about, Hin…Hina…ta…?” He started falling asleep even with his eyelids peeled back.

You’re not asleep and you’re not dreaming! I don’t know how long I can hold this technique. The uninvited occupant of his body raised both hands and patted his face, I’m doing this. See? Forgive me; it is a bit rude…

Naruto found that his dreams almost never had detailed explanations or apologies from Hinata. Sometimes there was conversation, but it was mostly…action. ‘This just ain’t right…’ He sobered up a bit, raising his head to glance around.

Oh… The hands on his face traced across a prickly, stubbled chin. The little dream voice in his head sounded fascinated. At about that point, he put five and five together, or, voice-in-head plus lucid-consciousness equals…

“Wah-? Eh? Whoa!” Naruto sat up, fully alert and acutely petrified.

From what all of his senses could detect, he had an unexpected visitor, complete with a mind, disembodied voice, and chakra system maxing out the capacity of his already-home-for-two body. But in the seconds that followed, as the high-pitched, familiar, and apologetic voice rambled about bad timing and overlaying or something, Naruto felt that the presence was extremely comforting and, though invisible, making his heart race in the dead of night.

He held up a finger to the moon-lit, empty room, halting the voice in his head. Naruto willingly suspended his disbelief and spoke to himself, “Hold on a minute, you’re going too fast. Restate your purpose, uh…whoever…this is?”
Hinata!

“Hinata?!” He hollered much too loud in a house with two sleeping elderly toads and one older pervert. For now, the shocked cry had not woken any of them.

I was telling you that I did not mean to use this technique at such an hour-!

“It’s not a dream?! It’s a jutsu?” Naruto was incredulously touching his chest and pinching himself.

Yes, I’m sorry!

“Why are you sorry?” He lowered his still mostly raised voice, chortling, “I didn’t know you could do this!”

I’m still learning how to put it into practice. It’s easier when someone is right beside me.

“Do you feel okay? I’m not close by and I don’t want you to hurt yourself.”

Once before I tried to reach you when I was in the Land of Waves, but it was much too far. I hurt myself. For now I think I’m alright.

Naruto covered his mouth to muffle laughter that would irritate his housemates. He fell to his back on the soft mattress and rejoiced, glad that he was in the presence of his most important person, and also, not certifiably insane. Hinata’s tinkling laughter was ringing in his head.

When the gleeful fit passed Naruto wrapped his arms around himself, smiling from ear to ear, “I missed you. I was waiting to hear from you.”

I know. I wanted to write to you but I was falling asleep!

“Well you probably had to be awake to do something like this…”

It was not intentional. I was thinking about you, Naruto. Ohh…it was a bit careless to test the Misago Byakugan before bedtime.

“I’m not complaining.” Naruto relaxed and folded his arms behind his head.

His voice was warm and sounded deeper. Her perception of the body she was visiting had become sharply aware of its dissimilarity to her own. She felt taller, springier, and sturdy. The center of gravity was a bit higher. The arrangement of muscles, the feeling of a firm flat chest beneath a worn t-shirt…though dramatically different, was really quite pleasant.

It would take some getting used to; specifically, the feature of inadvertently commanding Naruto’s body. Hinata had made him roll to his side, curling into a ball on the futon as she would have. He shook off her control awkwardly.

I’ll try to stop doing that, Naruto. I just keep fidgeting.

“It’s alright, you said you don’t do this much. Relax and just hang out with me.” He sat up and stretched, “As long as you don’t make me walk all the way home or send me to my death, we’re good.” Naruto brightened with an idea, “Wait a second, Hinata…do you…want me to show you around?”

The Toad Valley?

“Yeah, just locally. It’s pretty well-lit at night!” He propelled himself to his feet.
Oh yes, if it’s not too much trouble! But…don’t you need some sleep?

“Sleep-shmeep.” He exited from the bedroom’s porch door into the dark, bare-footed. She could feel grass underfoot, and the air was dewy and thick. Before Naruto’s eyes had fully adjusted to the dark outside, Hinata could smell (by his keen nose) the notes of flowers and plants she had never experienced in Konoha: the tang of pink-flowered euodia, the pungent aroma of gardenia germinating at night, paperbarks, and tall, leafy trees furling around the property.

Eventually, she could spot other small houses and hutches ensconced at the edges of the wide lawn. At the brink of the yard was a footpath littered with toadstools that wound over a hill and into the wild tangle of the valley. Naruto set off on said path at a slow pace, grinning, his hands folded behind his neck, “Smells nice, right?”

It’s like a giant garden!

“It kind of is.”

Is anyone else awake, do you think?

“Nah, it’s just you and me. I haven’t met many nocturnal toads here, and they usually just stay inside drinking and philosophizing all night.”

He found his footing carefully over slippery mulch and vegetation, and then politely side stepped a hog-sized millipede. In his head, he could hear Hinata tittering in bewilderment. His breathing quickened a bit—her doing, most likely, and Naruto tried pointing out the fireflies putting on a lightshow along the path.

“Yeah, sorry! There are tons of bugs. It’s not so bad at the house or by the pond. Here, look.” Naruto trotted toward the lakeside a few meters off the path, “There are lotus flowers out here, but they close and go underwater at night. They’re big enough so sit on during the day, though. Ero-sensei likes to do that.”

Ah, how nice! I think I hear a waterfall…

“Yup! On the opposite side, I dunk my head under that thing regularly.”

Naruto peered down at the smooth plane of darkened water, noting the curved glimmer of their galaxy’s arm reflected in the pool.

The sky is so clear here. In the village there are too many lights on even at nighttime, and it’s difficult to get a good view of the stars.

“You can always see ‘em out here. There’s a great view at the Hidden Star Village too, it’s so dark in those mountains.”

You’re right! I remember Sumaru and Hokuto pointing out every constellation on our way back to Leaf.

“Whoa! I keep forgetting you met them too,” He chuckled, taking a cross-legged seat beside the pond, “It’s weird. It’s like we’ve been traveling all over without actually going on a trip together.”

It does feel like that. A few times I wondered if I would ever get to visit the Toad Valley, someday… When they talk about letting your mind wander, I never thought it could wander this far.

Naruto rubbed at the tip of his nose, excited by the prospect, “Heh! They’re gonna have to put you in the dictionary for redefining that phrase.”

Oh no! No!

“Why not? Just let them take your picture; I’ll bet yours will be the most beautiful face in there.” He cackled at Hinata’s bashful reaction, which was ongoing, “But I will definitely get you here, Hinata, for real. I want you to see this place.”

But visiting a sacred place calls for strict—

“You’ll be welcome here. Think about it: they let Ero-sensei come in and spend all that time.” Naruto reasoned, “It could be a short trip or a vacation…or maybe later if you feel like becoming a Sage…” With his insinuation, she laughed at the thought, “Either way it takes getting used to. The Natural Energy here is so dense that when I first arrived all I could do was lay around. It can be exhausting.”

Do you really think I could acclimate to the environment?

“Sure, anyone can. It just takes some time.” He scratched his chin, wondering, “And maybe eating bugs helps. I dunno. The more in tune with nature you are on Mount Myoboku, the better off you are.”

Yes, I can understand that.

“So, before we plan vacations and stuff like that…” Naruto leaned back on his arms and requested, “How about you tell me what the Chunin Exam was like? It started recently, didn’t it?”

It did, and the first stage was a written test again. The rules seemed suspicious and there was a time constraint that would have made earning the necessary points impossible for most Genin. Many of us realized that we could be excused from the room without penalty, which was odd for a time-dependent test, don’t you think? I don’t remember if we could take bathroom breaks at the last Exam, but at any rate, most teams left the building to move on to the second stage.

“Jeez, that’s so underhanded…making all those goody-goodies who wanted to finish the test feel stupid for staying behind.”

Well, they were convinced that points were more important than time. But on a mission there is no such thing as points.

“Very well said, Hinata.”

Thank you, where was I? Oh, and at the second stage we were required to sign liability waivers to enter the Forest of Death.

“Damn, they made you all go through that again?” Naruto could hardly believe it.

The objective was different this year. We were instructed to enter the tower at the center of the Forest, but it was impossible to get inside by normal means, or so it was said. No one really understood what that meant initially, the proctor was so vague… But every team was given a scroll that could be a potentially useful clue, or a ‘dummy scroll,’ which was meant to be unhelpful. We were forbidden to check our scrolls until we were inside the Forest…and my team’s scroll was blank.

“Eck, that’s rotten luck…”
For a moment we were discouraged, but we came up with a plan to steal another team’s clue and then forgo sleeping that night. Naruto, we did it! We actually found a useful clue and worked through the night. I was tired, but we figured out that we were meant to search for a specific landmark in the Forest. When we did, there was an underground tunnel we followed directly to the tower’s basement.

Naruto was intrigued, “No kidding! Do you think those tunnels were there when we first took the Exam?”

I am quite certain they have always been there. I don’t think any Genin ever noticed them or used them, previously. Sato-kun thinks those passages are what Jounin use for training drills.

“Huh…that makes sense.”

We were the first team to arrive in the tower! It was so nice to sleep after that.

“You came in first?!”

We did! Later the next morning the second team arrived. They were Genin from Iwagakure and hardly spoke or looked at us.

“Yeesh…”

And then Neji-niisan’s team arrived third. That made me happy! Then Sakura-chan and Ino-chan’s teams… All kinds of different teams made it in the days after that. We had to wait a while before the 5-day limit expired.

“Yeah, gotcha, so administrators probably fed you and stuff?”

Yes, rations were brought into the tower for waiting teams. All of the Jounin-sensei arrived on the last day, and when the third stage began, even Gaara-kun was there! His student made it and was able to compete in the last stage.

“Hah! Was Gaara smiling about it? I bet he was proud…”

I could tell he was proud. His student, Matsuri, was the only Sand Genin capable of going on. Her substitute teammates had to drop out to recover from illnesses. Oh! And Shikamaru-kun was the proctor for the third stage. It was just so exciting to see Gaara-kun there with Tsunade-sama… I don’t remember hearing all of the rules, exactly. I was a bit distracted. There were so many participants that a preliminary round was necessary before final matches were determined.

“So did they make everyone duke it out in the tower again?”

Yes, but we were escorted to the top floor of the tower where an observatory and arena had been set up. We could see the ceiling windows and sky and everything… I was a little bit worried that I would have to go first, and I was preparing myself for it… but Tenen-nee-san had to fight the first match against a Rock Genin.

“Wow, must’ve been— wait a second. Why do you talk about her like she’s your big sister?”

Well… she is. She’s always looked out for me.

“Yeah, but I’ve never heard you talk about Tenen like that. Not out loud.”

I know and… there’s… the other reason…
“Another reason? Are you like long-lost relatives, or best friends or-!”

Of course we’re very good friends, I see her almost every day! Well, I used to, but now she spends most of her time with…Hinata found a way to mentally stammer, With Neji-niisan.

“Hm. But that’s not weird. Haku says they were always hanging out.”

Not like that. More like…how you and I are. When Naruto still didn’t seem to get it she added, Neji-niisan is in love with her.

Naruto slapped his hand spiritedly on the grassy ground, hooting in delight, “That guy-? Hohohoho, heh, hold on…hee hee…” He cracked up, “Neji. Hah! Your cousin? Are we still talking about the same person?”

We are!

“Ha-haa!” He fell back and continued slapping the ground, his sides nearly splitting with laughter, “But he…he used to be…” Naruto inhaled air again to get his idea across, “Neji used to be so uptight, remember? Ugh. I mean, even when he lightened up a bit he was still kind of a crabapple.”

He’s much better now, Naruto-kun. You have to see it for yourself! He spends lots of time with Lee-kun, I think…he appreciates Lee much more as a friend now. And it’s true! I always suspected that Tenten made him happy, but he never knew what to do or say. He had to grow up and understand his feelings before he could be honest with her. Niisan has…mostly figured it out.

Genuinely pleased, Naruto quieted down, “That’s great! That’s a marketable rehabilitation story. I’ll congratulate him when I get home.”

You can, but maybe you should congratulate Onee-san too? She had to wait a long time, feeling the way she felt, and Neji-niisan put her through so much. No matter how badly he behaved around you and I in the past…she had to put up with him on his worst days.

“Dang…you’re right…” Naruto folded his arms behind his head again, “I never made you miserable, did I, Hinata?”

No, never. You never argued with me or lashed out at me, you’ve been…my greatest friend and supporter. I only ever felt sad because, I suppose…I made myself miserable. I doubted and worried. I didn’t trust my abilities or that I was worthwhile in any sense…

“Sounds crazy now, doesn’t it? But I can relate to that feeling too, a little. Worrying that I wasn’t good enough to be respected or loved.”

I loved you so much. I always did. During a pause, Hinata made small sounds of apology, Eh-! Oh, what I mean is, that is to say-! I…I still do! I didn’t stop, Naruto-kun, I just…I feel different now. Stronger and more confident…because you feel the same way…

There it was again. His pulse was pounding just at hearing those words—that sincere admission of hers that, when he thought about it, had been completely and utterly true for years.

Hinata had never wavered and never strayed as a friend; had never discouraged or hurt him…and had only ever been a slightly brighter beacon in the dark than Gaara and Haku had been to him. Though he could never put his finger on the reason why when he was younger, now it made sense.

Naruto took a rough breath and tried to ignore the fact that Hinata was probably cognizant of his physical reaction to her statement. His skin felt hot and there was a rattling feeling in his stomach and chest, as if he’d become a rocket set for launch.
“You…saying that…” He had to sigh to relieve some pressure in his ribcage, “Makes it good to be alive.”

I want to say it all of the time, then.

Smiling with closed eyes, he warned, “Hey you, don’t tempt me. Do you know how hard it is not to run home every single day when I want you? How much I miss you?” Naruto fittingly added, “I love you. I’m a little crazy, though. This feeling makes me crazy. I may act a bit…you know, overzealous, when I see you. I don’t wanna—”

That’s…okay. Her tone sounded shy but encouraging.

“Not really.” He disagreed, cooling off a bit, “You deserve a level-headed guy who respects your space. That’s what I want to do. It’s what I owe you. I’ve been taught better, not to be handsy or entitled. I mean, Ero-sensei has his vices, but he’s got this gentlemanly side he uses too. His explanation was pretty clear. That stuff matters to me.”

Naruto…

Her voice in his head was appreciative but contradictory, as if she were deliberately inching her way closer. It was almost as if he could feel her hands on him, her smooth skin, the tickle of her hair—somewhere over the great distance.

“Is it like…you’re here, but…you’re not really here?” He wondered softly, “This jutsu is a bit scary, if that’s the case.”

No, I’m not trying to scare you or anyone else. I cannot fully control the person I overlay with, and the person knows when I am present. I guess it’s that…I can use this technique to help or hinder someone, but never to hurt.

“Cool…but,” Naruto rested his hand over his heart, “It does hurt, you know. For me, anyway.”

I understand, I’m sorry! Should I stop?

“Don’t.” His voice was thick.

I do not want to upset you or become a distraction, Naruto. Your training here is so important and I shouldn’t…I just…I want you to know— She struggled to stay coherent, I want to touch you and be around you. I feel grown up. If you knew what I think about every night…oh…no. I can’t invade your privacy this way to say things like—

He held up his hands to halt her, staring up at the swath of stars overhead, “It’s alright.”

She calmed down marginally.

Naruto added, “And just so you know, I need to kiss you. In a bad way. I’m not mad that you’re telling me all of this, Hinata, really. It’s an itch I can’t scratch, but I need to shut up about that since I meditate daily. Can’t scratch anything when you’re meditating…”

He smiled and realized she was the one who was smiling.

“Now let’s save this heavy stuff for when…when I can get the heck out of this valley.” Naruto suggested, “Can you finish telling me about those preliminary matches?”

Yes, of course! What was I saying? Ah, Onee-san had the first match and won. Then Chouji-kun and Lee-kun won their matches. Oh, Lee-kun had a very strong opponent from Yumegakure. Let’s see…
Sato-kun and Sakura-chan also succeeded, and then Neji-niisan fought one of the other Rock Genin.
Gaara-kun had to replace the floor after they destroyed it in their match.

“Whoa, sounds like Neji got wa-aay stronger.” Naruto noted, “And what’s this about Yumegakure?”

It’s a tiny little Hidden Village near the border of the Land of Fire. All of the ninja there dress colorfully and are descended of powerful clans. They were quite friendly too.

“Huh! Neat. Maybe Gaara had a fun time watching those duels. Well, up until he had to reconstruct stuff.”

He did not seem bothered by it. After that Shino-kun won his match because his opponent was frightened and forfeited…and then Tama-chan defeated a Cloud ninja! Hinata remembered happily, She did very well for her first time in the Chunin Exam!

“Time out,” Naruto gestured for a break with his hands, “Did I miss something? Are you talking about Big Fuzzy Brows’ niece? Sato’s-?”

Yes! She is now a part of Kakashi-sensei’s team.

“Holy-! I didn’t even know she was a ninja!”

She is a Taijutsu specialist and fights much like Lee-kun does. I think Kakashi-sensei has also taught her Ninjutsu… She became a Genin about a year ago, and Sakura-chan and Kiba-kun seem very happy to have her.

“That’s awesome. I can hardly believe it though, like, how old is she? She passed the Graduation Exam after we did…”

She turned 19 in April. When I spend time with my kunoichi friends she acts like a big sister to all of us.

“Wow. That just proves it’s never too late!”

And then…I had my match. My opponent was a kunoichi from the Grass Village and her jutsu were impressive. She used techniques to grow plants and create an environment in the tower. I had to do bide my time before I could beat her.

“Damn, I didn’t want to miss it…but I knew you’d be fine this year.” He rolled to his side and grinned.

After that Kiba-kun won his match and then…my cousin Fujita was defeated by Gaara’s student, Matsuri.

“Oh, one of your younger cousins, right? That was probably a rough match.”

It was. He’s still in the hospital recovering.

“Oh boy. I guess we don’t want to mess with anyone Gaara trains…”

Definitely not. Ino-chan won the final match, but in the second to last fight…things took a bad turn.

“How so?”

The last member of the Rock team terribly injured his Dream ninja opponent. He used…so little effort. The way he fought was not normal, he did not use his chakra...and I have never seen anyone fight like that before. That young man from Yumegakure was taken to the hospital, but I don’t think he survived... That Rock ninja wanted to kill an opponent, but because he stopped short of it he wasn’t disqualified.

“Someone like that is progressing to the final rounds? He did it on purpose!”

They could not prove that he meant to. Tama will be his opponent in the first round of the Tournament.

“Eh…I don’t know about that. She’s a first-timer and it sounds like this guy is dangerous. I’d feel worried even if Neji had to take him on.”

That’s the problem, Naruto. None of us really want to, but we have to wait and see what can be done. I think Tama-chan will seriously prepare for her match.

“Keep me posted about it…and hey! Who are you fighting in the Finals?”

My first opponent is Chouji-kun.

“Don’t go easy on him!”

I won’t! My father has been training me to master higher level techniques of my clan. Today went rather well.

The conversation tapered off into peaceful silence. The stridulate sounds of a grasshopper sounded occasionally in the dark. The vast stretch of starry sky was a portrait of ancient light and dark space painted by heaven’s brush, only reaching their infant eyes after traveling for millions of years. Lying on his back with Hinata permeating his consciousness, Naruto felt young and alive; a star only just igniting. In time, he too would be an old light that others would look back to for comfort and guidance. ‘Like Ero-sensei is to me, only I’ll be less perverted.’ He figured.

Naruto-kun?

“Hm?”

Would you please do something for me?

“Sure, whatever I can do.” He assured her, sitting up, “What would you like, Hinata?”

Well…I can do it. She added, testing the corners of his mind for control, spreading down and out to his fingers and toes. The result of her conduction only led him a step towards the pond’s edge again, and Naruto knelt beside the body of water.

He looked down at his reflection on the smooth surface. He frowned, unimpressed with his wild hair, ‘Good grief it’s getting long…’ And after a moment he could have kicked himself for not realizing sooner that he was not the only one looking. Hinata was totally silent as she regarded his appearance.

“Sorry that I’m looking a little messy! It was a long day, and Pa just kept whacking my head like he’s getting paid to do it…” He trailed off, somewhat self-conscious.

Still, Hinata made no comment. While continuing to stare at the image on the water’s surface, she directed Naruto’s right hand to his face and timidly stroked his cheek. With baited breath, he stayed a spectator as she traced the line of his jaw, ran a fingertip up his nose and over his brow, along the edge of his hairline, and then finally pressed three fingers to his lips.

You grew up.

“Yeah, I…we all did…” His speech stammered when his hand dipped along his own neck, stopping at his shirt collar. It was odd and enjoyable all at once, ‘And it’s kind of…it’s…’ He pondered how many beats per minute would herald his heart exploding.

Naruto...

“Yeah?” His teenage brain ventured that things could turn serious in a way he had not been expecting, that was, if he did not object to anything Hinata did.

I can’t stay. I think I’ve exhausted myself.

“Oh. Shoot…” Naruto snapped out of the seconds-long fantasy, “Please don’t strain yourself, Hinata. We can stop for now and I’ll wait for you to write me.”

I don’t really want to stop, She admitted airily, But it’s almost sunrise…we’ve talked most of the night! I know I’ve used more chakra than I should have. I’ll get some sleep.

He nodded in full agreement.

When I am strong enough I will try this again. Maybe at the end of this week I will visit so I can tell you more?

“A-Are you sure that’s a good idea? You might wear yourself out.”

I won’t know that until I try.

Naruto patted his own cheek, trying to get through to her, “Hinata, get some rest. I really am so happy that I got to talk to you. Though I would like to do this again sometime, you should be saving your strength for the Exam. So…let’s not make this kind of thing too frequent. What do you think?”

Well…alright. Hinata made a reluctant but tired sound, But I… She yawned with his mouth, I will write to you soon, Naruto…

And the last thing he noticed as her presence faded was a swell of affection and contentment, a faint heat radiating down from his ears, tingling. It lingered even after Hinata had retreated from the recesses of his mind and body. Naruto sat in stupefied quiet. It felt like the impossibly relaxed comfort he felt after waking from a good night’s rest, the same feeling that made him refuse leave his covers and seize the day. ‘Though I know this has nothing to do with sleep’ ‘He noted as he stood, and he moved slowly back towards the Toad Sages’ home.

Naruto wondered if he was supposed to feel sad that she had gone. But he couldn’t. He could not feel sad at all when he felt so relieved and grateful that she had come to him at all. What sense would it make to replace such a wonderful feeling? ‘I hope she randomly uses long-distance jutsu whenever she can, definitely, but I won’t be devastated if she can’t…’ Call it serendipity, he thought, and also, ‘Bed.’

He toddled back into the house, slid the door shut behind him, and collapsed on top of his covers. Then he slept.
In the morning as he woke, Naruto had the vague impression he was in trouble.

Before his eyes had fully opened he heard Jiraiya’s voice drifting into the room, “Kid. Hey. Naruto. What the hell did you do last night? Hey.”

“Mmm. Nnn…nothing.” He rubbed at his eyes with the heel of his hand. Naruto was not yet equipped for conversation at that hour.

At the doorway, Jiraiya stood expectantly with Fukasaku and Shima beside him. The toads only seemed mildly curious while Jiraiya, conversely, meant business.

Before Naruto could nod off again, Jiraiya snarked, “You were up most of the night, kiddo. You remember? Up all night talking to yourself.”

“Ugh, buzz off you ‘ol…” Naruto pressed a pillow into his face as he grumbled.

“So you aren’t denying it?” The man confirmed.

Naruto sat up, miffed, “No. I wasn’t talking to myself, Ero-sensei.” He looked apologetically to his toad hosts, “Ma, Pa…I’m sorry if I bothered you at all. I might’ve been loud before I went outside last night.”

“It’s quite alright, Naruto-boy, we have no trouble sleeping with a bit of noise.” Shima assured him. “We did wonder why you were having a full-blown conversation in the dead of night, though.” Fukasaku conceded.

Naruto scratched his head and tried to devise a good way to explain it. Jiraiya was highly suspicious, “Tell me you invited someone out here and I’ll-!”

“How would they even get here?” Naruto interrupted him, “I don’t know the secret paths to the Valley that you do, and any outsider who would attempt it gets lost, right? Jeez. And the Natural Energy on this mountain would have squashed them to the ground for a while until they got used to it…”

“Fair.” Jiraiya noted calmly, folding his arms, “But then what the hell, kid?”

“It was Hinata.” Naruto announced firmly, “She used a jutsu…that kinda…put her inside my head.”

Jiraiya stared at him with a leaden expression. “How would they even get here?” Naruto interrupted him, “I don’t know the secret paths to the Valley that you do, and any outsider who would attempt it gets lost, right? Jeez. And the Natural Energy on this mountain would have squashed them to the ground for a while until they got used to it…”

“Take it or leave it, but that’s the truth! I could hear her talking in my head, like I was thinking it, and she could even steer me around a bit.” Naruto motioned with his arms as an example, “It’s part of her new power, Ero-sensei. She tried it out last night and she had no idea I’d be on the other end of the line.”

Jiraiya said nothing as he rubbed his chin, mulling it over.

“Well…I have rules in my home.” Shima spoke up during the silence, “And my biggest rule is no girls in the house. Naruto-boy, you’ll have to ask her not to do that again.”

“But Ma, she wasn’t technically here!”

Fukasaku seemed to agree, siding with Naruto, “Shima…the child’s right. This is no guest we could clean up and prepare for. That technique is a mental trick at best.”
“Kind of sounds like the voodoo that the Yamanaka clan can pull on people.” Jiraiya determined quietly, still aghast, “But over such a long distance? Well that takes a lot more chakra and precision for them to get right…”

“Ero-sensei, it was more than that. I felt her chakra…like it was in me. And her consciousness didn’t squish me or push me out. I was still awake. She, like…overlapped with me…or she said something like that…” Naruto attempted to explain it, “It was weird but not in a really bad way.”

Jiraiya regarded his student loftily for a moment, “Alright, I hear you. So…let’s say I believe all of this…”

“Come on—”

“You’ll have to request her to try it out on me next time for—” Naruto pounced on the man, kicked his knees out from under him, and pulled him into a rage-fueled headlock. Jiraiya wheezed an amendment, “Fff…for e-e-erk…e-empirical…evidence…” He tapped frantically on Naruto’s arm before he was released, gasping, “Buh! You wicked animal! Choking an old man out at this time of morning…” Fukasaku and Shima had stepped safely out of the way before the attack.

“Don’t even joke about Hinata doing something like that to give you proof!” Naruto stomped back into the room, beginning to put away the bedding and futon, “Take me at my word, you Perv.”

“Bit of a touchy subject, I see. Naruto, you know I didn’t mean it like that.”

Shima had entered the room and took the folded blanket and pillows as Naruto handed them off, placing them in a storage closet. Naruto spoke over his shoulder, “You are not going near my girlfriend in any capacity. Period.”

At the notion, Shima clucked her tongue disapprovingly at Jiraiya.

“Kid, get real. She’s like a daughter to me! I watched her run around with you twerps all those years ago, and I witnessed her look after your stupid ass.” He added with a pointed finger, “Which, by the way, I expect she will continue to do.” Jiraiya went on as Naruto pointedly frowned at him, “That’s the jutsu she used to save her team in the Land of Rain, isn’t it? That, my boy, is why I care to know.”

“Well…yeah.”

“She brought Kakashi’s nephew back to life, remember? And she warded off a member of the Akatsuki. All I mean is that ability is worth learning more about. I will never muscle in on, no offense, the space of someone who I will always platonically consider a black-sheep princess who treats you like gold. I’m indebted to her.” Jiraiya concluded with a dismissive wave of his hand, walking back out to the sitting area of the house, “But don’t take me at my word, or anything! I’m just a professional pervert. Nothing more.”

“Quit bellyaching, I get it.” Naruto grumbled before exiting his bedroom.

“Yes, that’s enough quibbling.” Fukasaku announced, spreading out an arrangement of broth and insects for breakfast, “If you two keep arguing about a young girl you’ll just make Ma grouchy. Why don’t we discuss Naruto-boy’s next haircut?”

Jiraiya and Fukasaku looked to the young, golden haired man at the table before simultaneously agreeing, “He’s overdue.”
That same morning, many leagues away, Tsunade had summoned a particular group of Jounin to her office, expecting them just as soon as the Jounin Council meeting at the Standby Station concluded. Today, she knew, was going to be a long day. ‘There are way too many people to talk to…I need technology to advance faster so I can say fuck it and send out mass-memos.’

To steel her nerves, the Hokage had helped herself to her 8:00AM cup of sake before futilely rinsing her mouth with a swig of water. Willpower wavering, she took a second, slightly-smaller shot before concealing the bottle in her desk. ‘Jiraiya calls it liquid courage. For me it’s liquid patience.’ In the privacy of her office during Shizune’s absence, Tsunade glanced over a document with bullet points listing her concerns. She let the page flutter back down to her desk.

With a small breath, she turned to stare out of the window over the rooftops and signage of her village.

A knock sounded once at the door before the group of Jounin Sensei she had called for filed into the room, chatting quietly amongst themselves. Tsunade half-turned and sniffed, finally getting the greeting she was expecting.

“You’re all proud as peacocks, I bet.” The Hokage smiled wanly, “But let’s not get ahead of ourselves, hm? Your students have a huge challenge standing between them and promotion.”

Gai started rattling off proclamations of confidence, but Asuma drew nearer to the Hokage’s desk to be within her earshot, asking, “I take it you wanted to speak to us about the competitor from Iwagakure, Hokage-sama?”

Gai quieted down at the subject. Tsunade nodded and returned to hear seat, “Quite right. I didn’t expect such a damper on what I’d hoped to be my debut achievement, as Godaime…but not all Genin take this Exam with good intentions.”

After hearing the word Genin spoken, Kakashi interjected, “About that—”

Tsunade held up a hand to stop him, “Let’s not speculate. I have a meetings with Black Ops and counselors today, and that’s where the speculation will take place. Now, I want to make it clear about what I need from all of you…” Her ample bosom came to rest on the desk as Tsunade fitted her hands beneath her chin, “You will all keep your distance from Sasagainu Huo.”

At the uttering of the notorious surname, both Gai and Kakashi made a motion to debate the matter, but Tsunade hushed them again, “You will all maintain your distance and keep your eyes and ears open for me. If that boy has any ill-intent for the Tournament, it’s likely that it won’t be completely concealed for the next four weeks. Stay sharp. Also, none of your students are to have any contact with or may approach Huo before the Final Rounds. Is that understood?”

A diligent chorus in the affirmative answered her.

“On a lighter note, I have great expectations for all of your students. Provided that they do not contradict the terrific qualities I’ve seen in them so far, and that they score well in their aptitudes at the Tournament…I imagine I have many new Chunin vests to order next month. Oh, and get their sizes while you’re all at it. Discreetly.” Tsunade rubbed her chin thoughtfully, “Where necessary and appropriate, make sure that you provide one-on-one training. Some of our Rookies will be facing wild-card adversaries, and you can provide invaluable guidance in what little time they have to prepare.”

Kakashi especially took the suggestion to heart.
“Questions or concerns?” Tsunade added, clasping her hands.

“Are there any techniques you wish to prohibit by level or rank?” Kurenai wondered, “My students have a variety of jutsu that, while effective, may not be judiciously used in a sports stadium. I can speak to them about it if you recommend it.”

With that, all of the Jounin began chattering again, noting that most of their students had some kind of jutsu that could damage the arena or otherwise create havoc.

Tsunade replied simply, “There is no need. The framework rules for the Exam widely permit any type of weapon, Taijutsu, Ninjutsu, or Genjutsu. Unless any attack is deliberately aimed for spectators, no Genin will be penalized for abilities they use in the arena.”

Kurenai had a moment to process the stipulation. She recalled Sato’s utterly irresponsible use of Forbidden Jutsu and Summoning at the last Tournament, those jutsu which had the potential to turn the stadium inside-out. While flashbacks of such carelessness blinked before her eyes, Tsunade qualified her meaning.

“My counselors and Shimura Danzo did explain to me some of the reckless endangerment that occurred during the previous Exam. While it isn’t encouraged, such jutsu are accounted for in the rules. And also, the Sealing Corps has been conscripted to set up a barrier to protect the audience at the Tournament.” She went on airily, “It was expensive, but we all agreed it was a worthwhile provision.”

Kurenai took a steadying breath.

Asuma wondered at the pricey demands of the Sealing Corps, “Why do they charge so much? I should have my brother talk to those pinchfists.”

Tsunade snorted at the idea, “I already asked Netsuke to put in a word with them, as a former member. They wouldn’t budge on their hourly rates…they all felt that because no one else in the village offers the services they do, the price is fair. Honestly…I feel that since I took office all I’ve ever done is butt heads with the Sealing Corps.” She added under her breath, “And a few dozen others…”

“It’s hard to believe they won’t negotiate with the Hokage or Sarutobi Netsuke. If anyone in Leaf deserves a discount, it’s the two of you.” Kakashi also disliked the monopoly on Sealing techniques, “That’s a topic to bring up at the next Village Council meeting, Hokage-sama. Left alone, it could get out of hand.”

“Right, right…” Tsunade tapped papers on her desk into a pile and then looked to Gai, “Gai…”

“Yes, ma’am?”

“Speaking of brothers, is yours still a financial regulator?” Tsunade asked, “With a stubborn, mercenary heart? Ken, I believe it is…”

“Indeed, milady, and he also finds work as a small courts attorney, entrepreneur, public accountant, and referee of children’s sports.” Gai confirmed.

“Ugh…” Tsunade felt physically ill at the concept of one willingly doing so much work, “Ask him to visit me tomorrow morning, at his leisure. Maybe Ken’s voice needs to be heard at the Council Meeting when the Sealing Corps tries to justify its pricing to us all.”

“I will ask him this afternoon.”
“Much appreciated.” Tsunade thanked him, “Anything else?”

Asuma ventured, “Jounin with students competing in the Tournament can still place bets. If I’ve heard correctly?”

“Oh yes you have. Even I am permitted to gamble.” Tsunade smiled slyly.

“And that is not a conflict of interest?” Kurenai was doubtful.

“In the official rules, it isn’t. The Hokage can still win or lose money; for I, like everyone else, have no idea who will and will not perform sensationally at the Final Rounds. It is one-hundred percent fair.” Tsunade explained.

“And what about Gaara?” Kakashi chimed in, “Will he be raising any stakes?”

“Well of course he can’t gamble! He’s underage.” Tsunade groused.

“He is the Kazekage.”

“And a law-abiding citizen. Though he and Hidden Sand could use the money after what he ponied up to repair the Tide Village, Gaara is also subject to the rules.” The Hokage pontificated, “In two more years he will be perfectly eligible to piss his cash away like I do.”

With that, Tsunade humored a few more trivial questions before rising up and excusing her Jounin guests. She stepped out of the office with them, bade them farewell, and then rushed to the ladies restroom. ‘Whew, I just barely made it.’ Appointments always ran long and punished her bladder. After a short break she resumed her tasks.

Tsunade expected that Shizune would hold things down if anyone came sniffing around the Hokage’s office. She descended to the second floor of the building and into a chamber at the end of the hallway. ‘Two more appointments, the next of which will be the least pleasant…’ She stepped inside and located a free space on the sofa beside Shimura Danzo. Across from him on another couch were Mitokado Homura and Utatane Koharu, sipping tea in boredom.

As the door clicked shut behind the Hokage, Homura pointed out, “You are tardy.”

“I am.” Tsunade sighed softly as she took a seat, “I don’t think I kept you waiting for long. Did anyone here have a conference prior to this? Mine stretched out a bit.”

“We did not.” Koharu assured her.

“Then you were not inconvenienced.” Tsunade surmised.

Homura grunted in irritation and Koharu continued sipping her tea. Danzo was utterly unaffected by the pithy statement. He flipped open a file on the tea table between them, spreading out photographs of foreign Chunin Exam contestants. The most abundant snaps were of Huo.

“This one here,” Danzo indicated the Rock Genin, “Concerns you?”

“Does he not concern you?” Tsunade retorted, “His name, at the least, should ring some bells.”

“It’s an old clan name. Sasagainu: that which declined in the Third Shinobi war…and splintered from its Cadet branch that mutinied and murdered its main line. Though a rare name…it suggests very little to me other than one child’s good fortune to survive those days.” Danzo remarked, balancing his palms on his cane, “His temperament has caused anxiety for other Exam participants, so I am told.”

Koharu thumbed through a report, adding, “All of his documentation is legitimate. It’s been reviewed four times by administrators before falling into my lap. What’s all of this fretting about?”

“Aside from his assault on another Genin that resulted in Hirakasa Agehanto’s death after the preliminary rounds…Huo is not the only participant of Sasagainu lineage in this Exam.” Tsunade explained quietly.

“What of it? There are two Hyuga clan members competing in the Final Rounds.” Homura was disinterested, “These things are coincidence.”

“I don’t want to assume it’s a coincidence while that brute walks freely in my village.” Tsunade asserted, “As Danzo mentioned, the loyalty and purposes of clansmen from the Sasagainu who still exist in Iwagakure…it’s idiotic to pretend that they have no grudges against their kin who settled in Konohagakure. There will be no interaction between this stranger and Tenten of Team Gai, not while this Exam is ongoing.”

“And at no point after that.” Danzo concurred, “Such interchange will not be in the best interest of Leaf.”

Homura innocuously reminded them, “Peace has been made between our villages.”

“That armistice never guaranteed anything from Dintei Bi’s regime, which operates independently of Hidden Rock.” The Root director illuminated, “Should he have any operatives residing in Iwa, they are assuredly no friends of their clan’s main line, nor friends of anyone in the Leaf Village. Tsunade is indicating this possibility, and indeed we should remain cautious.”

Koharu held up Huo’s Chunin Exam entry application before sliding it across the table, “This admission file excludes so much as a hint of the affiliation you fear could exist. He is a seventeen-year-old raised since infancy by a foster family of Iwa’s preeminent artisans, and he graduated at the top of his class…with accolades from the Tsuchikage, already.” The old woman tittered, “And this child is a soldier of Dintei Bi, you suggest? He who has never known war or grudges?”

Homura also scoffed at the idea. For a wild moment, Tsunade had to digest the fact that Shimura Danzo was on her side for once. Well. It looked that way. ‘It’s probably to his benefit…’

“It has been suggested. I will see to it that Root keeps surveillance over this boy.” Danzo decided, “This scrutiny shall in no way interfere with his Exam preparation or eligibility. However, should any incriminating activity be discovered…it will immediately be reported to those gathered here.”

Reluctantly, Koharu and Homura accepted the measure.

Tsunade added, “Keep watch over his Jounin Sensei as well. His teammates have already returned to Iwagakure to recover…but I want to be sure that his chaperone is innocent.”

Danzo echoed the idea before Koharu and Homura rose and took their leave. Cradling her chin, Tsunade poured over the open files and photos on the table, “How does a talented Genin of Huo’s background avoid being promoted to a higher rank for so long? At age 10 he graduated. Seven years is a long time to dally…”

“Not for being a poor-test taker, certainly. No Genin willingly avoids ascending in rank unless they are told to do so.” Danzo wagered, “They are simply too ambitious to burke that desire. For that reason alone I would suspect this young man’s motives…and yet…” He pushed off of the sofa, teetering over his cane, “Until we have evidence, we are merely quailing at fantasies.”
“Oh believe me,” Tsunade said severely, “I do not cower at the likes of that sort of ninja.”

The threat in her eyes promised: I would have his head, though.

They concluded the session and Tsunade pressed on to her third engagement, stopping at the building’s kitchen for some sustenance. It was wrong to take the convenience store boxed-lunch that was sitting unwatched on the counter, ‘But if its owner cared they would not have left it where the Hokage could find it…’ Tsunade helped herself, taking the canned tea and chopsticks with her in a plastic bag. ‘If anyone complains about this I’ll confess to it, but I just don’t have the time to stop for lunch now…’

She was not due to visit the Academy for another hour, so she made haste uptown and then along a winding, unpopulated route towards the ANBU command center. Tsunade puttered down a tunneling, stone stairway, and entered a code for a locked gate that stopped any wayward souls from wandering further. She tapped the buttons sleepily before trotting down the last of the stairs, noting the reverent pauses and greetings of Black Ops agents in the underground atrium.

“Good morning, ah yes, well it’s afternoon just about.” She gave them a small wave, appreciating their respect and good manners. As the Hokage crossed the dried clay quad that stretched before the command center’s building, she frowned at the blown-out neon sign precariously hanging over the doorway. ‘They had better fix that. It’s unsightly!’

While stepping inside she softly greeted off-duty agents and the secretary, skirting the bustling locker room before stopping in the break room. Inside it was quiet with a single large table and many chairs, with a pantry, sink, radio switchboard and security camera screens. Tsunade took a seat beside Yugao at the table who was already eating lunch. The violet haired woman froze before taking another bite, “Hokage-sama, no one said that you’d—”

“I know. I had the time to drop in and get away from my desk.” Tsunade drew out the bento and opened it, “How are you, young lady?”

Yugao smiled a small, flattered smile, “Rested. Commander asked me to do a check-in at the daimyo’s castle this afternoon. Then I have a date with my husband this evening.”

“Hm, then you’d better not be late. I heard the Oga clan dignitaries were visiting the daimyo. I highly doubt there’s any conflict those clowns could unleash that you couldn’t erase in a few minutes.” Tsunade swirled medallions of chicken in sauce before popping them into her mouth. “I thought about asking Hayate to sign up as a substitute proctor for the Exam in case of unforeseen events… but he hasn’t gotten back to me.”

“I know for a fact he isn’t fond of that role.” Yugao assured her, “I apologize for his avoidance, my—”

“I really don’t mind. I’ll just keep Shikamaru on duty even if he calls in sick.”

“Ah, well, Nara-san is young and strong. He’s done a good job so far.”

“I think so too.” Tsunade agreed, cracking open the can of tea, “Tell me, Sai is in today, isn’t he?”

“In the locker room changing, I expect.”

“And Tenzo?”

“He also just got back.”
“Good. I want to have a word with them. Just a small assignment…” Tsunade spoke between bites of food, “What do you think of Sai?”

The woman looked thoughtful as she wrapped up the refuse of her finished lunch, “Reliable. Well… he’s learning. He is also very entertaining.”

“Entertaining?” Tsunade wondered if she had misheard.

“He refers to everyone here by nicknames, except for the Commander and Tenzo. It helps him make positive associations.”

“He is smart not to do such a thing with me.”

“Not to your face, milady.” Yugao teased her, “I’ve gotten used to being called Plum.”

“How strangely fitting.”

“Don’t you think so? Hayate hates it.” Yugao threw her trash out and then offered, “I’ll fetch Sai and Tenzo for you, Hokage-sama. Please wait a moment.”

Tsunade cheerfully continued eating. She perfectly understood why the Sandaime Hokage had favored Yugao so much. ‘She’s a genuine pleasure to be around.’

Come to think of it, most people in the Black Ops were easy to get along with. Tsunade felt that at least in her case, members of the ANBU were conditioned to respect the Hokage and serve the village. Right there: that was already preferential treatment. ‘The complete opposite of how I am looked at when I visit Root…like I’m some kind of beast that came prowling in and they go on alert, with their fake words and fake consideration.’ Her ANBU agents felt truly warm and selfless. Not a perfect bunch, of course, but they were authentic, ‘Sure they’ve got their quirks, but haven’t I got those in spades myself?’

Tenzo poked his head into the break room, “Tsunade-sama, you take lunch in here?”

“No, I do.”

The tall man loped inside and Sai followed a few paces behind him, both still damp from showering. They were dressed in simple black sweatshirts and pants, standing expectantly beside the table as Tsunade munched on rice and vegetables.

“I have a task for you two,” Tsunade informed them, “I’ll run it by the Commander so you can fit this in between missions he assigns.”

Tenzo smiled knowingly, “Does it concern the Chunin Exam’s security, ma’am?”

“In function, it does. There is a Genin participant from Hidden Rock who is now under Root’s surveillance. That should essentially quell any threat this boy poses to others, however…” The Hokage put down her utensils and grew serious, “I can’t even trust that Root won’t facilitate something shady if Danzo believes it is to the Leaf Village’s benefit. Sai was part of such a bait-and-switch tactic in the past, and I want to be sure that Danzo isn’t dealing under the table.”

“This may not be an ideal time for him to do so.” Sai pointed out, “But that does not preclude Danzo-sama from trying to organize future arrangements.”

“So you want us to keep watch over Root…who is watching over this Genin suspect?” Tenzo verified, his face scrunched up as he followed the idea, “And report any type of communication or agreements between those parties?”

Tsunade nodded, “If you see anything remotely cordial between them, come straight to me. If it is nothing more than run-of-the-mill reconnaissance on that Genin…then I’d be relieved.”

“Understood.”

“With that out of the way, how’s life?” Tsunade asked, “I’ve heard that most of Black Ops is warming up to you, Sai.”

“I think so.” Sai assessed, “Recently, Tenzo tells me when I act or speak in ways that are considered ‘rude’ and ‘unacceptable.’ This happens most often when I try to be truthful.”

Tenzo lightly slapped his cheek with his hand, “Sai, when you point out the flaws and insecurities of others, even if you’re accurate, that doesn’t foster goodwill with your acquaintances.”

“Some of them do have small penises.” Sai defended.

“At the very least, don’t make comments like that in the locker room.” Tenzo sighed.

“Fibbing is a new concept for him, eh?” Tsunade leaned back in her chair, “White lies help. So do compliments. Focus on the positive aspects in others, and avoid the negatives when you can.”

Sai had a spaced-out look, “That is difficult.”

“Exactly. Get good at it. That is, work on your charm and friendliness.” The Hokage recommended, “Heaven knows I’m still endeavoring on that subject.”

Meanwhile, above ground in the heart of the Leaf Village…

Gaara was nostalgically touring the streets.

Earlier, he had thanked the team of freshly post-Academy Genin that Tsunade had assigned to escort Matsuri around. Though Gaara had promised his student that he would personally take her to points of interest around the village he had grown up in, he lacked the time. He was required to return to Suna for the week and manage his duties. When Kankuro and Temari returned home from the last few days of closing work in the Tide Village, they could oversee many of Gaara’s responsibilities while he stayed with Matsuri in the Leaf Village.

Down the road, he could see Matsuri in step with Konohamaru and his teammates, Moegi and Udon. They had taken to the older girl and admired that she had made it into the Final Round of the Exam. Matsuri waved off their fawning as they went to lunch. Gaara thought to himself, ‘She’ll probably have fun with them this week. Once I return here…I will double her training.’ Gaara wanted her seriously prepared to face Lee at the Tournament.

Before departing for Hidden Sand, Gaara had hoped to have a word with Sakura. It would be downright inconsiderate to leave without giving her any kind of warning. He had wandered around in search of her, having no luck finding his girlfriend at home nor at the Hokage’s office. Tsunade was also absent, he discovered. She may have known where he could look. ‘No matter. The Hokage already knows I’ll be gone for a few days.’

The many sights of his former home were distracting. The many spots he had gotten into mischief with his friends, their favorite eateries, social hubs, and training yards. He had loitered on a few rooftops, remembering his younger days of slacking off and staring at the sky. Gaara closed his eyes and breathed in the soft forest air. He had missed it. He had missed the gentle weather and green life of this country—longed for his precious people here. How had he stayed away for so long without going insane?

“I should move my office here.” Gaara daydreamed out loud. With a small sigh he leaned back on the stucco of the building he was perched on top of, appreciating of the mild summer breeze.

He caught himself lollygagging again. ‘I need to return to Suna,’ And before that, ‘Sakura.’

Gaara set out again and passed by the Academy, staring over the heads of gathered children. Oh. There was Tsunade. She was out in the Academy yard giving a demonstration of her bulldozing strength and taking questions. Gaara took a moment to watch before crossing past the yard’s gate and circling ‘round the youngsters (twittering in surprise at the sight of him) and he came to a halt beside the Hokage. A nearby Chunin instructor snickered at his squealing students.

“Good afternoon, class.” Gaara acknowledged the children who boomed back in unison happily, “Tsunade-sama…”

“Everyone, this rude interruption is being made by the Kazekage.” Tsunade pointed out before turning to Gaara, “What do you want? You’re pretty easy for me to guess, hold on…Tide Village funding? Letters from your team? Upset stomach? Exam questions? Lunch date? Or Sakura?”

Gaara just frowned at her.

“The last one.” Tsunade sighed and then motioned with her hand, “I spoke with her early this morning. I know Sakura should be about done with her hospital tasks, and then she mentioned errands she had to run. Check the Pailü Weapon Shop or the Green Mart. You’ll find her, Gaara.”

He nodded in gratitude “Thank you, and I apologize for interrupting your lesson.”

“Yes, well, you were looking a bit desperate.” She shooed him away, “I’ll see you next week.”

As Gaara exited the yard he did catch the chatter of students as Tsunade tried to recapture their attention.

While the Weapon Shop was buzzing with activity, he did not find Sakura there. Gaara had better luck in aisle 9 of the supermarket. At the far end of a row of toiletries, Sakura was stooped over and scrutinizing the labels of two comparable boxes. He blinked and took in the sight of her civilian clothes: a pale green t-shirt and white shorts; her slim legs teetering above heeled sandals. Gaara had a self-conscious moment in which he wondered if his long-sleeved overcoat qualified as overdressed in the summertime, ‘I should come back next week with simpler clothes.’

So focused was Sakura that she did not notice another occupant in the aisle until a voice greeted her from behind.

She flinched and held back a startled shriek, rapidly comporting herself, “Gaara!” Sakura turned and hastily crammed items in a basket, “I was, uh, going to see what you were up to after—!”

“I know how many responsibilities you have. I thought it was better to come to you, Sakura.” He assured her.

It was as if he had caught her committing a felony offense. Sakura seemed to stretch herself out in an attempt to distract him from the consumables on the shelf behind her. She spoke with a cadence that was nearly too fast to comprehend, “It’s nice to have a free day, isn’t it? Ah, that is, Tsunade-sama still asked me to do rounds at the recovery ward before I did today’s errands. Got through that quickly but shopping for Mom takes a while, she’s so particular—"

Gaara scrunched his face at her. This diversionary dialogue was not normal. And there, in the puzzling moment she had somehow talked him into walking, Gaara glimpsed the items stocked behind her as they vacated the area. Side-by-side displays of condoms and women’s sanitary products.

He had looked away before he could determine which of those items she had picked up and Sakura, of course, slapped his hand away when he offered to hold the basket. Ignorance was probably bliss, Gaara determined.

Sakura relaxed gradually as they proceeded through aisles, acquiring the last few items she needed to bring home.

“Matsuri isn’t with you today?” Sakura asked while inspecting the sell-by date of a milk carton.

“She’s in the care of a Genin team that will be showing her around.” Gaara informed her.

“So…” The young woman roamed towards the produce section, “Then maybe you and I could do something?” She clarified as she hovered over turnips and daikon, “Maybe lunch?”

He smiled wanly, “I’d like nothing more, but I should be going soon.”

Gaara replied to the questioning expression she wore, fumbling over vegetables.

“I have to leave and resume my duties as Kazekage. My siblings will be able to take over for me when they return at the end of this week.” Gaara explained, “I wanted to tell you before I left. Once Temari and Kankuro are available to manage the office, I will be here for the rest of the month to train Matsuri.”

“Oh, I see.” Sakura nodded in understanding.

They got in line at a register, only drawing a single curious look from another shopper. Gaara liked that his popularity in Suna was more or less absent in Konoha. Hardly any common folk could recognize him as the current Kazekage, or would distinguish him as a noteworthy person in general. It was nice to go through his day without being harried.

“Some other time, then,” Sakura figured, “In the near future.”

“Yes. Keep me informed of your schedule. I will work around it so I can see you.”

She beamed at the notion as she set to pay the cashier, who then thanked them for shopping at Green Mart. With her groceries unseen in doubled-up plastic, this time Sakura let Gaara carry a bag. He insisted on walking her home before his departure. They opted for side streets.

“I sure do miss this…” Sakura sighed, “Even if it’s as simple as walking around with you, I miss the days when I took it for granted.”

“As do I.”

“You’re handy for when it rains too. I used to forget my umbrella on purpose, so I never had it when class was over.” She gave him a sly, sidelong look, “You walked me home from the Academy no matter what.”

“Ah, so you purposefully took advantage.” He absolutely revelled in the fact that she had wanted his attention even back then.

At his hip, Gaara unthinkingly patted a small, hyper-condensed gourd of sand that was secured to his belt. It was much less cumbersome than his former accessory. Gaara then noted, “The forecast did call for rain…”

“Yeah, but you’ll be gone by the time it starts.” Sakura’s voice faltered and she fell quiet.

They silently traveled a deserted block that ran parallel to the main avenue. In those quiet minutes under a partly cloudy sky, his free hand folded over hers and held, even as they rounded a corner. Sakura made a small appreciative sound and kept her eyes squeezed shut, internally fighting off her worries. Even if he would only be away for a short amount of time this week, missing him was still as sharp a feeling as it had always been. ‘I’ve got no real reason to be disappointed, but I might’ve gotten a little too excited to see him here…’

When they arrived at a narrow back alley that served as a cut-through to the busy street beyond, the two came to a stop, lingering in the privacy between brick walls. Around the corner was home, and of course, so was Gaara’s inevitable parting. Neither said a word as they automatically set their bags on the ground and wound arms around each other, stealing the last bit of time they could.

In the back of his mind, Gaara could hear Shukaku whispering curiously, What is she upset about?

‘We want to be around each other, and we are both equally preoccupied with other things. It’s frustrating. I feel the same way Sakura does.’

Hn, then why are you both so responsible if it’s frustrating? Just do what you want.

‘We aren’t like that.’

I do what I want.

‘I know.’

Show up late to whatever you have to do, or kill whoever she has an appointment with. Gaara could almost hear the approving nod the tanuki accompanied the statement with, That’ll cheer her up. Free up some time…

‘If it was acceptable for a Kage, or anyone, to kill appointees just to save time…the Hokage would have close to zero contacts.’

So I guess that’s a no.

‘Absolutely a ‘no.’ You and I need to review the things that warrant incarceration in this day and age.’

Yeah, I know I’m a bit behind the times. Shukaku stilled and took in the same scent Gaara did as he pressed his nose to pink tresses. Sakura had tucked her head beneath his chin and held him tightly.

She smells good. The Tailed-Beast acknowledged, Show her.

Trying not to focus on his inner-dialogue, Gaara grudgingly replied, ‘You don’t make any sense. Stop talking.’ But with that comment he had lost track of when he had sandwiched Sakura between his body and the wall, feeling her hands snake up and behind his neck.
She wants you to, see? Show her how good she smells and feels.

He could not answer back anymore. His attention was fixed on Sakura; with her head tilted up toward him, eyes half-hooded, rose hued lips parted as his mouth slanted over hers, and, There... The sounds she made, stirring him with want and closeness, they were criminal, Just a little. Gaara slipped a hand beneath her shirt and pawed at the silken skin of her stomach and hip, Soft! Wow. You said you had something important to do? Don’t bother!

By then Gaara had certainly forgotten. The third-party voice in his head made suggestions that, for some reason, he immediately acted upon. Sakura did not discourage the behavior; her hands roamed up to his hair, tugging at red locks, her kisses growing urgent while his fingertips slipped 'round her hips and stroked the small of her back.

How perfectly she fit against him with her petite frame. When Sakura had last visited the Sand Village, he had wanted this, these motions and touches that they could have used to discover each other. Desire simmered in his blood, coursing down every limb, convening low in his belly as he pressed against her... Good, now, turn her around and have at it.

The bubble of disconnected fantasy in his head burst, and Gaara blinked hard as he pulled back and stopped himself. Doing everything he was told would lead to trouble. Shukaku was miffed, What’d you stop for? Conditions are perfect!

‘No, and what do you know about any of this anyway?’

I’ve got news for ya, Gaara: you’re not the first jinchuriki I have dwelled inside of. Really...do you know how many dalliances I’ve spectated? I know more than you for sure, ya cherry-red virgin...

Oh. Input like this was going to complicate any form of intimacy a hundred-fold, especially with Shukaku pitching insults like that.

While Gaara was reeling, Sakura gently patted his cheek and tried to snap him out of his weird and abrupt trance, “Gaara?” She snapped her fingers in front of his eyes and it somehow retrieved him, “Are you okay? I’m sorry if I—”

“Whatever you do, do not apologize.” He cut her off, reaching for her hands again and securing them, “I was having a mild episode.”

“An-?” She trailed off, adopting a concerned smile, “I didn’t know you suffered from things like that.”

“Anxiety.”

“Huh, you too?” Sakura kissed him a final time, tenderly, “What a time for that to strike...it was getting good...”

Gaara agreed with a sigh, “I know.”

Their fronts were still pressed together suggestively, but Gaara stepped away and recommenced the formalities. He lifted both shopping bags with one hand and led Sakura along with the other.

“Can we do more of that when you come back?” Sakura asked, “I didn’t want to stop.”

On the main road and in view of society, Gaara gave her a pained look, “I—” Shukaku’s voice was still ringing in his head, nosy and clamoring for attention, “I think we could.”

Sakura quirked an eyebrow at the response as they proceeded southbound towards her home. About a block away from the house, Sakura halted and pointed out the open front window. It had definitely been unbolted by her watchful mother, “Mom’s got the eyes of a hawk and if she sees you with me…” She shook her head in dismay, “She’ll invite you for lunch and hold you hostage.”

“Next time, I won’t mind that so much.”

He let Sakura take the bags from him, appreciating the small smile she tried to conceal, “It could be hours that you’ll never get back, Gaara.”

“Worse things demand more of my time on a regular basis.” Gaara assured her, “Meeting your parents is something I have meant to do.”

Her eyes were wide and glassy, and she nodded as calmly as she could. This man was serious.

“And also…” He went on, “There is…something I want to talk to you about when I return.”

Somewhere in her clever brain the buzzer went off again, and Sakura loosely connected the suggestion to Gaara’s mental block from earlier. She wondered, “Is it something bad?”

“No. It’s something personal. Something about myself that I haven’t told you yet.” He leaned in and kissed her temple, “But now I want to.”

“Oh!” How often did people hear those words come from the Kazekage’s mouth? “I look forward to it.”

He promised, “I won’t be long.” Then he turned and set off; back to trekking the desert paths and back to prosaic tasks and paperwork. Sakura watched until Gaara was indistinguishable from the foot traffic on the horizon, and then she turned back towards her house.

In timely fashion, Ino had pounced on her within seconds, “Oooh!” She caught Sakura by the shoulders and matched her walking pace, “What was he doing here? Forehead-woman, I heard the Kazekage had work to do in the Sand Village…”

“He wanted to say goodbye.” Sakura justified simply.

“Right…and also, I was told that you did some shopping today; some of that shopping involved what you and I discussed, hm?” Ino probed with a knowing look, “Well? Did you buy any?”

“I did, but he snuck up on me!” Sakura wailed quietly, frustrated, fishing through a plastic bag towards the contents in question.

“Jeez, it’s like Gaara has a sixth-sense when anything involves you.” Ino tapped her chin, “Ah, let me see what you got…” She reached past Sakura to read over the box’s packaging. She quickly frowned, “Sakura.”

“What? I’ve been embarrassed enough for one day…”

The two halted while Ino pointed out, “This box…had better be for your mother. A probiotic feminine supplement? What the hell…”

Alarmed, Sakura seized the box, “What? I didn’t-!”

“Were you even paying attention? These aren’t condoms. They’re superfluous merchandise companies want women to think they need.” Ino rumbled in great annoyance, “Turn around and bring these back to the store. You can’t spend money on stuff you can’t use!”

Sakura covered her face with a hand and continued walking home, “Sure I can. I’m too ashamed to even care at this point.”

“Sakura. Stop. You goofed, but so what? He probably didn’t even notice or care what you were buying.” Ino pulled back on her friend’s wrist, “Easily fixable. Just go back and return it.”

“Can’t.” The pinkette shook her head sullenly, “I can’t handle anymore today. Just let me go home, Pig.”

Pushed to the end of her patience, Ino snatched the bag with the offending box. She retrieved the mistaken product and the receipt, “Go home you wuss. I’ll do it myself. And because I’m nice, I’ll disguise the real goods when I bring them to you.”

Sakura nodded in humiliation.

“Oh, and don’t leave without me for this afternoon’s meeting!” Ino called over her shoulder as she started out towards the Green Mart, “Everyone’s going to be there.”

And indeed, everyone had piled into Tsunade’s office.

An hour and a half after Ino returned with condoms and secretly passed them off to her friend, the two young women tarried a little before setting out for the Administrative Building.

They were among the last to congregate for the summons of the Hokage. Tsunade was slumped over her desk tiredly by the time all of her final Leaf Genin had arrived, and she asked Shikamaru to to kindly shut the door and quiet everyone down. The volume in the room decreased.

“Welcome,” Tsunade pushed herself back into an upright position, “Thank you all for making it. I know that you’re all about ready to begin devoting each and every day to uninterrupted training before the Tournament…but I ask that you lend me your ears for a few minutes.”

When respectful silence answered her Tsunade continued, “I have a mission I want you all to complete.”

Then the noise returned.

“What?!”

“What mission?”

“I thought we don’t work during the Exam…”

Shikamaru, effectively the moderator of the forum, raised his hands and calmed the room again.
Sakura was given the floor when Tsunade nodded to her, “Tsunade-shishou…we were told by you and our Jounin Sensei that all mission activity is suspended for students competing in the Chunin Exam.”

“Correct, Sakura. However, I would like to advise you that this is not an ordinary request, and I count this as an activity outside of the suspension parameters in place for the Exam. Really…it shouldn’t be that much work.” The Hokage defended, “It’s a simple matter. If you complete this, you will all be awarded three basis points on your Final Round evaluation.” Tsunade smiled, “Your aptitude and judgement at the Tournament is scored; do not forget. It’s how evaluators decide who is Chunin material and who isn’t. I’m offering you all a little nudge in the right direction.”

“Three points on a scale of what?” Kiba wondered.

“That’s not something we are able to disclose to Exam participants.” Tsunade replied, “Regardless, you should all do your best.”

If it was a simple task and they were being spoon-fed points, it seemed like a home run to most everyone. The youngsters asked the Hokage what it was they had to do.

“I want you…” Tsunade leaned back in her chair and announced, “To look good.”

She got many blank stares in return, and so the Hokage elaborated, “This is a mission I am personally assigning all of you: dress to the nines. Be impeccably groomed and prim, as flashy and eye-catching as you can all possibly be when you set foot in the stadium…”

They were slowly starting to understand.

“I want you to incite furious betting on the hottest looking teams. I want those gambling suckers to spend an obscene amount of money at this event, and you are the ones who are going to make it happen!” Tsunade looked positively thrilled.

Shikamaru wisely added to the incredulous Genin, “To clarify the rules here…rigging bets is forbidden and a punishable offense, but being attractive is perfectly legal. I already read over the rule book for this one. It checks out.”

“Shishou!” Sakura was not very pleased with the idea, “Are you using the Tournament as a platform to make quick cash? We talked about this!”

Tsunade waved her off, unabashed, “Sakura, please, don’t scold me. It’s worth three points. This isn’t uncompensated work.” She added, “Besides, a huge percentage of the betting proceeds are going back into public programs in our village.”

“Is that stimulus funding confirmed in writing?” Shino was curious.

Tsunade slid a document across her desk and let the astute young man look it over.

Sakura pursed her lips, glancing around at many of her stupefied friends.

“I want you all to be seen and adored. Of course, it’s optional. Show up as plain as you want to be, that’s fine: but don’t expect me to award you anything for that.” Tsunade warned.

Sato raised his hand.

“Yes, Sato.”

“Just confirming that this definitely isn’t illegal?” The young Hatake asked, “I’m going to do it anyway, of course, because you’re the Hokage.”

“In my extensive knowledge of gambling, eligible picks that are well-dressed are completely acceptable and will only influence bets superficially. At best.” Tsunade concluded.

“Good enough for me.” Sato nodded and folded his arms.

This statement seemed to win over most of the room’s occupants. Many began to laud the idea, growing excited, and after Tsunade dismissed them and advised they get right on it, the room emptied out.

The teams filed out of the tower and went their separate ways, discussing how they intended to “look good.”

Tenten was cringing.

Walking ahead of her teammates, she muttered worriedly to herself as she realized this task was not as easy as it sounded…especially not for her team.

“We can’t. We. Can’t.” She shook her head violently and then rested her sad gaze on Lee, “Sorry. Sorry…” Tenten muttered and stalked onward as they followed.

“Why is Tenten so discouraged by this mission?” Lee asked Neji worriedly, “I am sure we can accomplish this!”

“It’s…” Neji looked at his friend sympathetically, unwilling to comment on Lee’s prominent features and Tenten’s concern about them.

They finally stopped uptown and Tenten faced the boys, frowning, “We have to do something. We’d be crazy to pass over free points.”

“Then I suggest we go shopping.” Lee nodded.

“Everyone else will be doing that.” Tenten pointed out, “We may need to try a different approach to…find new looks. I can consult with Yugao. She knows how to make me pretty, at least.” She scrutinized Lee and Neji, “And she can probably get your hair under control too.” Tenten was speaking about the both of them.

“It will take more than grooming.” Neji reminded her.

“Yeah, I know that, but I…” Tenten’s head lolled on her neck dejectedly, “I know this team never really concerned itself with how it looked. We don’t care. It’s all about performance and skill…”

Lee added jubilantly, “And determination!”

“Yeah.” Tenten sighed.

Neji rescued the situation by stating, “We are going to the Hyuga estate. Kayato-san is a master seamstress…and I know it’s time that I asked her for a favor.”

Tenten wondered if she was imagining a chorus of angels sounding at the news. She never would have thought that Neji had the solution to looking good. Then again, the Hyuga clan had an abundance of resources that, until recently, Neji had not really let them tap into.

During the walk, Tenten then thought to herself, ‘Well, he probably doesn’t want us dragging him down in this endeavor. Of all the people on this team, Neji is certainly the most…good-looking.’ She caught herself staring from her lateral position, shaking off the thought and kept her eyes forward.

A few street lengths away from Hyuga grounds, the slow pattering of rain drops began. The team hurried and arrived at the covered porch of the Main House moments before the shower began to fall torrentially. All politely removed their shoes and followed Neji indoors.
After a quick scan with his Byakugan, he found that Kayato was in a craft room with several Branch members, meticulously dying the fabric of a new kimono. Neji reminded his teammates that Kayato was Fujita’s mother, and that she may wish to visit her son in the hospital sooner than take up another tailoring project. They accepted the notion and moved quietly down the pristine hallways of the house.

Neji knocked once before sliding the door of the craft room open. Branch members quickly greeted him, “Good afternoon, Neji-sama!”

“Good afternoon,” He gave them all a warm look before turning to Kayato, “Kayato-san, do you have a moment?”

“For the Prince? I surely do.” The woman stood and patted her ink-stained hands on an apron, “How are you, Neji-sama? Oh, and you’ve brought your teammates with you!”

“We have a request to make. It involves a task that the Hokage assigned us.”

“You don’t say…come on in, then.” She ushered them inside, greeting Neji’s friends, “I remember that you are Tenten and Lee, yes? Watch your step. We’ve made a bit of a mess in here, spreading out supplies. This kimono was commissioned by a wealthy family…it’ll take weeks to finish…”

The group carefully stepped over the buckets, pans, threads and measures, taking a seat on the clear side of the room. The Branch members continued detailing work on the sleeves of the garment.

“Now, what would a mission assigned by the Hokage have to do with me?” Kayato shrewdly questioned.

“Tsunade-sama asked those competing in the Tournament to look their best. She decided that our public appearances were important enough to award or deny points over.” Tenten explained ruefully, “And…all of our peers are probably flocking to shops as we speak.”

One of the Branch members snickered, “Tsunade-sama demands the strangest things…”

Neji and Lee agreed with a simultaneous nod of their heads.

Kayato grasped the situation, “Hmm, so I see. You three sought me in the hopes I could assist? At least with outfits I can. How much time do I have?”

“Just under four weeks.” Neji notified her.

“That’s not much time at all…” The woman cupped her chin and thought about it, “Haruhi and Himitsu here can continue this kimono without me,” She looked to her Branch associates, “If you two don’t mind taking over? You can split my share of the commission payment.”

“No, Kayato-sama, we couldn’t—”

“I insist.” She pressed, “I want to help Neji-sama with this assignment. I am glad that he has faith in my work.” Kayato grinned, “But I will need to devote as much time as possible to this project.”

Tenten felt a smidge regretful about their demand, “We can always look—”

“No, no. Please do not try to look elsewhere. I’m the best at what I do in this village.” The woman untied and removed her dirtied apron, very confident, “And as you are all friends of Fujita, I am more than happy to help you.” Kayato gestured to an adjoining door with another room, “Come with me.”
They passed through the door to the adjacent room, but not before Lee gave a gracious wave of farewell to the toiling Branch needle workers.

It was a makeshift studio-room that was bursting with stacked rolls of fabric and tools, fitting mannequins, drawers of supplies, and a table for standing work. Kayato leaned over the table and tapped a pen on a pad of paper, letting her eyes drift left to right across Lee, Tenten, and Neji. They stood in awkward silence.

“Do any of you watch movies?” The woman asked out of the blue.

Neji looked at her for a long moment before responding in the negative, “I do not.”

“Films? Sometimes Lee and I go see them with friends.” Tenten replied, displaying their elevated participation in society, “Why do you ask that?”

“I do a lot of costume work for films that are shot in the Fire Country and our close neighbors.” Kayato enlightened them, “Lee reminds me of a great film I enjoyed working on.”

Neji and Tenten exchanged side-eye glances with each other, wondering if their jaws were going to hit the floor.

“That was a fun one. I also worked on costumes for the Middle Kingdom series, did some shoots in the Land of Iron many years ago, some theater costume design…and now I get requests for the new Fujikaze Yukie movies, from time to time.” Kayato smiled at them, “I think I can make you stand out, is what I mean.”

She moved around the table and fussed at the collar of Tenten’s cheongsam top, “I like the idea of this garment…Han-style…very regal…” Kayato leaned in and inspected Lee’s face, “He has good features. Bright colors will suit you, Lee. Not this drab green…” She motioned at his jumpsuit dismissively. He whimpered sadly at the opinion.

When she stopped beside Neji she chuckled, “You avoid most color, Neji-sama. You probably just don’t know what will complement your complexion…” She fussed at his sleeveless gi, “It’s summertime. We’ll go for shorter sleeves, tailored fits…I think I want your team to have a cohesive theme…hmm.” Kayato returned to her table and scribbled on her pad, jotting notes and sketching crude lines.

She looked up, “Do you have a few minutes? I’ll take your measurements to start and then ask you to come back tomorrow. I need to find the materials I want to use for you, because I do not have them here at the moment.”

“Of course!” Tenten stepped up first and let Kayato wrap a tape measure around her while the woman chattered excitedly. Tenten kept thinking in amazement to herself about how Kayato had valued Lee’s…er, strong, features. She sounded as though she knew exactly what to look for aesthetics-wise.

While Neji and Lee waited for their turns, Lee whispered sadly, “This shade of green is not so bad…”

The next day, as the Tournament-bound Genin met with their teams and respective sensei, the groups scheduled how and when training would take place.

Lee was eager to spend the next few weeks under Gai’s harshest tutelage, but also mentioned that his grandfather had reserved his time every morning Tuesday through Thursday for the next month. Gai agreed that it was a workable schedule, and afterwards confirmed that Neji and Tenten did not mind depending on each other as training partners.

Neji noted that since they had been partners in training since time immemorial that it was no bother at all, “However, Wong Leung has also asked that we study with him Tuesday through Thursday.”

Tenten wilted at the thought of extra Wushu labor to top off a heavy workload. In contrast, Gai boomed with pride that they were all willing to push themselves.

Neji had learned from Fujita (during another hospital visit) that he had also requested of his mother outfit commissions for Ino and Chouji. At first Neji had wondered if it was even possible for Kayato to accomplish so much in the limited time they had, but Fujita assured him, “She was excited! She’s going to make a lot of money this month. She really loves what she does, you know.”

Then Neji conveniently remembered yes, he would be covering the outfitting expenses for his team. The cost was probably more than what Lee and Tenten combined could afford.

“Also,” Fujita added, “When it gets busy Mom makes Dad help her sometimes. He’s learned a thing or two.” Neji was not all that surprised that Hideyasu was willing to contribute.

That same morning while the Hyuga youngsters had been assembled, Hinata had listened interestedly about Kayato’s participation and spoke of what training arrangements she had heard about. She would be spending two weeks with Shino improving jutsu while their time was not otherwise occupied by their fathers and clan techniques. Sakura and Kiba had arranged to train together when they could, Hinata had been told.

Sato, she recalled, had immediately volunteered to work with Tama, but Hinata heard that Kakashi had muscled in and reserved evening lessons with her, to Sato’s great annoyance. Hinata imagined that Kakashi was concerned about Tama’s upcoming Final Round’s match, and wanted her to be fully prepared.

“Oh, and Sato-kun will be upcycling his grandfather Sakumo’s old clothes. Kurenai-sensei thought it was a good idea.” Hinata chirped, thinking of when Sato had proclaimed: vintage wins! Three points here I come.

With these things in mind, Neji recalled that Sato would be his first opponent at the Tournament. He stewed on this particular turn of events, knowing better than to underestimate an opponent as he had at the last Exam. When last he did that, Naruto had furiously walloped him with a sucker-Rasengan.

In many ways, Naruto and Sato were quite alike. Outgoing, sociable, talkative, fast friend-makers, and occasionally mischievous; but with fighting styles that were understandably different. All the same, Neji did not intend to let his guard down again. Neji had known since the visit to the Konoha Hot Springs that Sato had been keeping an eye on him, watching for any weaknesses he could exploit. That could be Sato’s great strength, Neji supposed. He used his gregarious nature to camouflage his discerning, hyper-critical perception of others. He was good at manipulating things in his favor, and was indirect in every sense that Naruto was direct.

‘If I go off of that fact, Sato will not bother using Genjutsu or other ineffective techniques against me.’ Neji thought, considering Sato’s preferred methods of beguiling opponents, ‘He is going to use something that I am less likely to deal with.’ And so, Neji concluded that White Chakra Sabres, the Chidori, owl summons, and other melee hazards could come into play.

Neji ran this idea by Tenten that rainy morning, asking what she thought of it.
“Oh make no mistake,” Tenten assured him, “Sato is more likely to stab you into submission than anything else. It’s all he can do against you, really, Neji. The problem is that he’s gotten really good. He’s been tutored by a Grass ninja for the last year.”

“Better than you?” He wondered.

A breathy scoff escaped her, “Pff, no! At least, I haven’t sparred with Sato recently enough to know that. But I wouldn’t expect to lose against him, as conceited as that sounds.”

“Then I want you to prepare me.” Neji decided.

“…we were going to train together anyway.” She gave him a puzzled look, “Do you want sword-specific drills?”

“Yes. The only way I could stop his attacks presently is with a rotation, or by using Wind Release counters against him.” The look on Neji’s face suggested that if he chopped Sato apart with Wind Release, Shikamaru would probably disqualify him. “He will be expecting me to do that.”

Tenten smiled brightly, “You’re right. Everyone will expect that from you.” She jangled the hilt of Hok at her back, “I take it that you’re interested in one of these?”

He nodded and his girlfriend snickered, “It’ll cost you.”

Neji wore a very put-upon expression, ruminating on how he was already paying out of pocket for her and Lee regarding Kayato’s commission. Before he could bring up that point, Tenten poked his cheek and walked off, “Relax, I’m kidding! I think I’m the one who owes you. Let’s go to the shop. I’ve got spare swords you can try out.”

He trailed behind her for a few steps to watch her stride off confidently, silently relishing the sway of her hips. Training was going to be all well and good, Neji thought, provided that he could actually concentrate. At least for the next few weeks, they would be spending a lot of time exclusively with each other.

The rain fell lightly as they relocated. At the northeast central section of the village, Tenten stopped outside of the Pailü Weapon Shop and unlocked the front door. She kept the ‘Closed’ sign in place at the window but flipped the lights on.

“My Dad liked literature and poetry a lot. I never asked him, but I think that’s why he named this shop for poetic style,” Tenten glanced around before moving inside, “He thought that poetry and weaponry were alike in ways.”

“A profound thought.” Neji offered.

Tenten shrugged, “I never really got his artistic sense. I’m always trying to figure out why he did things the way he did.”

She led him towards a display of swords for sale and pointed her palm at the chrome racks, “Take your pick.” Neji stepped forward and regarded the variety before him: single and two-handed swords, broad and slim, some precarious in length and others with hybrid functions. There were a number of standard issue Chokuto straight-blades that most shinobi favored, with sheaths and ornaments in many colors.

Neji looked back at her, “What about something like you have?”

“A jian?” She raised her eyebrows, “I don’t sell those.”
“I don’t think that means there aren’t any here.”

“Well,” Her smirk morphed into a thoughtful expression, “There are, but I can’t guarantee the shape they’re in. Over here.”

They passed into the back room beyond the counter, where the initial entryway was storage for a plethora of weapons and projectiles, and further into the building was the sooty work station where several small, unlit furnaces sat.

Neji wondered aloud, “You’re the only person who works here?”

“Yeah. Dad didn’t hire employees. It curbed his overheads.” Tenten heaved open an upright, wooden chest, adding, “For years he was saving for a house, otherwise he could’ve justified having apprentices salaried under him.”

Neji noted, “You were an unpaid apprentice.”

“I was just happy to learn. Look here,” She tapped the scabbards of two different jian, “Dad kept these for himself and Mom, usually. They used them on missions.” Tenten lifted one and drew it from the sheath, “These haven’t been used in a while. They were probably kept for a rainy day—” The comment slipped out, and she hoped that it did not matter to Neji that it was raining today and probably would for the rest of the week. Stupid coincidence.

He got a firm grip on the handsome weapon and was reminded of her sword. Neji distantly but fondly remembered handling Hok in the Land of Marshes. He was more inclined towards this type of weapon than he was towards those sitting on the ‘for sale’ racks.

“This one.” Neji said with certainty, passing it back to her, “If you’re willing to part with it.”

“Sure I am. Dad can’t use it anymore, so…” Tenten ripped a blank page from a supply ordering journal and made to cut it with the jian, but the paper was untouched by the dull blade, “Yowza… This poor thing has seen sharper days. Let me file and clean it up for you.”

She shuffled around and set the sword down on a work table, passing the sheath off to Neji. When he stood directionless and was fit to get in her way, Tenten pleasantly steered him towards a stool on the opposite side of the table and made him sit.

Then, she rifled around in wooden drawers, inspecting flat, rectangular stones. She retrieved one and set it atop a non-slip mat on the table, “Natural whetstone is best…and…” Tenten took a bottle of oil from a cabinet and drew a liquid line across the stone, “Some honing oil.” She informed Neji. She used a soft tool brush to disperse it across the whetstone.

He watched curiously as she easily freed the pommel from the hilt with a small wrench. It was all done with experienced ease; she unfitted the hilt and guard and slid them away from the blade. Tenten pointed to a metal extension and explained, “This is a tang. It holds the hilt steady, as you can see. This sword’s tang was shortened a bit…” She fussed at nicks and scores, mumbling to herself, and then finally lined up the sword’s edge carefully with the stone.

She skated the blade’s edges back and forth for a very long while, meticulous, frowning as she worked. Neji said nothing during that period and stared nearly without blinking. Tenten stopped after a time and soaked a small sheet of sandpaper in water she ran at a faucet. She told Neji, “This sandpaper has a much lower grit than the stone, so I’m going to use it to finalize the edge.” She smiled at his expectant face, “I’ll let you try it next time. This sword needs extra help today.”

Slowly, she ran the rough paper along the edges, her eyes narrowed, sharpening the blade from shoulder to tip. When that was done Tenten set the sword aside and cleaned the leather elements of the hilt with wax, rubbing away at it with a fluffy cloth. She then shined the sword’s metal with polish before reassembling the guard, hilt, and pommel. Tenten sighed, swiping a last, thin layer of oil over the blade, “I hope that didn’t bore you…it can take a while, I know.”

He still seemed to be alert, “It didn’t.”

Tenten lifted the sheet of paper again and the jian cut it more easily than soft butter.

“It has recuperated!” She announced, handing it to Neji, “This is yours to keep, Neji. I’ve got to clean this mess up so please excuse me…”

He watched Tenten pittle around with the odds and ends she had scattered. While he truly did appreciate what she had just done for him, he could not peel his eyes away to look over the refurbished sword she’d given him. She was by far more interesting.

“You father,” Neji said at length, “Did he buy it?”

“Huh?” Tenten looked over her shoulder, “Buy what?”

“You said he was saving for a house.”

“Oh!” Tenten washed her hands at the sink, “It was more than that. I mean, when I was a baby he and my mom did have an awesome house…but the Nine-Tailed Fox crushed it just after we got out.
Ever since then we rented and Dad meant to buy property and build on it. He wanted to make something better for us.” She dried her hands with a towel and added, “I think he bought the land about a week before he died. I still have that title lying around somewhere, if I ever need to sell it.”

“You shouldn’t do that.” His faced was shadowed with grief. She didn’t see it. Tenten did not look back at him as she continued to tidy up.

Why was it that he could learn new things about her on a daily basis? Neji disdained how Tenten knew most everything about him, and how he lacked imagination, hobbies, special skills, at least in the respects that she did. She knew plenty about his family and clan, his aspirations, and what he had been through. It stood to reason that he had not asked frequently enough, or not cared enough in the past, to learn about her life.

She was multi-faceted and unique in ways that Neji would struggle to emulate. He spoke one language, he couldn’t cook, he didn’t own property, he didn’t own a shop or create things, he didn’t do much more than read in his free time, his lineage was by no means exotic, and his clan cared for him and paid for most anything he required. ‘I’m boring.’ He thought. He had not attempted much of anything outside of his comfort zone, aside from Lee and Tenten’s whimsies and Naruto encouraging him to respect others and forge friendships.

He slid the jian into its sheath and lowered his eyes. Just what had he done, or what was it, exactly, that Tenten was intrigued by? Never mind his terrible temper and barely-forgivable actions of the past, ‘How do you care for someone like me? Even I find that hard to do.’

“Hey, did you eat yet?” Tenten asked from somewhere within the bowels of a supply closet.

Neji gazed at the doorframe, where all that could be seen was her foot and ankle, tapping impatiently while she reached for things. Tenten dug through shelves and spoke aloud a list of chores she had just thought about tending to. That small action, however trivial, had captivated his attention.

Maybe, he ventured, it wasn’t worth fretting over what Tenten saw in him. If she ever took the time to explain it, he probably wouldn’t entirely believe her or agree with what she considered positive or attractive in him. Then hell, what did it matter? Why did he need the specifics of how he had somehow, impossibly, become a precious person to someone else? Despite his shortcomings and flaws, somehow he was loved by her. Though he did not think he deserved such a thing, dense emotions flooded his senses; things like gratitude, admiration, worry: things that made his blood hot in a way that he had never felt.

“Hello over there?” Tenten had poked her head out, “I asked did you eat, Neji?”

His unwavering gaze was still set on her but he did not answer. She gulped. It kind of looked like he was some sort of predator, yes, seated on a stool, studying how best to consume her.

She smiled worriedly, “That looks like some intense thinking. Is everything alright?”

He stood up suddenly and she yipped in alarm. They stared at each other for almost a minute.

With her arms full of once-closeted supplies, Tenten advised, “Blink if you’re alive.”

Neji blinked.

“Good. What’s the matter?” She approached the table and set the items down, assessing him as he set the sword down as well. Neji admitted in a quiet voice that he had not yet eaten.

“Let’s go out and get something, then...” The suggestion stilled on her tongue when his hand slipped beneath her elbow and along her arm, drawing her close. She let her eyes drift up curiously towards his face as he loomed; Neji reeling her in by her arms before she was squashed into him. It was quite nice all considered, she thought. ‘Neji doesn’t do normal affection. This I know.’

Then Tenten heard the words; they were spoken softly beside her cheek, “Thank you.”

And her stomach did some strange acrobatics while she let her hands bunch up the front of his shirt. Tucked against him, Tenten shook her head slightly, “Don’t mention it.”

He squeezed hard, and she contemplated if he could possibly be angry for some goddamned reason, but Neji went on to explain, “I never mention it. How do you know when I am grateful for anything?”

“I just—” She did not have a real answer to that, if she was perfectly honest, so Tenten only pressed her forehead to his shoulder and said nothing. But then she understood: he was cross with himself. Neji was having a tense moment of psychosocial recognition.

“For this and for everything else…” He murmured. She grew more relaxed in his hold, and made a soft chirp sound when he brushed past her earring and kissed the skin of her neck below. His lips worked slow and deliberately. Tenten wanted to curse Neji for his intrinsic skill, yet at the same time praise him for choosing the time and place to wield it so well. She was able to lay her hands just about anywhere on him without even the slightest objection, and by the time he passed her jaw and finally kissed her mouth, Tenten was ready to jump out of her skin.

‘Dear honored parents...please do not be haunting this shop or watching what I am about to do.’ She hoped to heaven, assisting Neji as he hitched beneath her thighs, lifted, and replaced her on the tabletop. Their kisses were insistent, and Tenten was emboldened to gently nip while his hands drifted from her hips to the curve of her bottom. If her keen ears were not mistaken, Neji had made a near inaudible sound or two, but she looked forward to drawing more out of him.

He pushed on her stomach, carefully laying her back, bending so he was not out of reach of her mouth. In the seconds after that Neji had a lone thought that cautioned against further action without consent, but he did not verbally articulate the suggestion of removing clothes before Tenten yelped, fidgeting below him. Panic-stricken, he stared down at her while she shimmied and sat up again, “It’s alright, it wasn’t you…it’s whatever this—” She extracted a solid object that she had dumped on the table earlier, holding it up, “Whatever this is. It stuck my back…”

Neji paused and leveled his attention to the object in her hand, “Why did you take it out of storage?”

“There was a lot of old junk in that closet that I thought I should throw out.” She admitted, frowning at the solid-fiber ring, “I don’t even know what this thing is for.”

He gave her a you really don’t know? look before plucking it up, demonstrating, “It’s a spinner.” The outer casing spun smoothly across tiny ball bearings. It looked like it was meant to be worn as a bracelet.

Annoyed, she corrected, “It’s garbage.”

“This unwinds summoning scrolls.” Neji elaborated, “It’s something that you could use.”

“Not interested.” She tried to swipe it, but Neji easily held her wrist and slipped the spinner over her hand, “This was likely not your father’s size. It does have its place in your dispensary, though.”

“Maybe…Mom used it?” Tenten wondered, lightening up, “She did a lot of tool summoning in her day…and she was, uh, petite.” She curiously spun the device and imagined paper flying free, weapons bursting from seals.

“It’d be less cumbersome than that huge scroll Gai wants to replace for you.”

“Yeah, but it’ll take me more time to seal my arsenal in parchment this length and width…”

“One on each wrist would be optimal.”

She pouted, “You want to double my work, huh?”

“I’ll help you.” He offered, “You were more than happy to help me.”

While considering the offer, Tenten confessed, “I appreciate it…but today I…I just tried to get you alone while I could. I always have an ulterior motive when it comes to yo—” Neji had pushed her down again.

The roaming and groping resumed, and they kissed heavy, demanding kisses. It was clumsy and unsophisticated, but Neji had found a way, somehow, to magnetize himself to the places that felt best; and she was writhing under his ministrations, her fingers curling into the neck of his shirt. With a single tug, Tenten had accidentally pulled loose the collar of his sleeveless gi, the usual teal he wore, glimpsing pale skin beneath. Her eyes danced, ‘Like a marble man-statue, he is…’ Neji used a practiced motion to pull it entirely off right before her wide eyes, and Tenten determined that maybe he had learned mind reading in the last five minutes.

Having carte blanche with his chest was delicious fun, she decided as she touched and skimmed. She nodded bleary-eyed assent to Neji when he held her legs just so, fingertips brushing her bottom again, their hips meeting readily as he folded over her for more devouring kisses.

A soft clang sound came from somewhere in the shop but they ignored it, both in utter and complete agreement that relations were about to ensue. Prior to Tenten’s intended removal of her now unnecessary attire (her shirt clasp-ties popped) another quiet, repetitive sound came from the entryway of the workshop room. A dog panting. Tenten patted Neji’s shoulder with the heel of her hand, coming down from the high, “Am I imagining that? That sound-?”

They craned their necks to look behind them, where Akamaru stood in the doorway, his tail wagging amiably…with Neji’s discarded shirt dangling from his maw.

Tenten uttered the word shit before Kiba dropped in, his voice raised in greeting, “Yo, anyone here? It was unlocked and we need to pick up…sa-some…uh-er—” He halted and blinked in shock.

Neji’s glare of instant death froze the unsuspecting visitor for a few terrifying moments before Kiba recovered, clearing his throat, and he took a shot at being understanding, “So…gotta say I’m sorry. The sign said closed…but! You left the door unlocked and the lights on. My team is here to buy stuff and I hope you can forgive an honest mistake.” He had turned around to not look at them, “Should I just tell Tama and Sakura…we’ll come back later?”

Tenten raised an arm like a flag of surrender, frustrated, “Nope. No…this isn’t…it’s…I’ll be out front in a minute. Check the re-supply sale bins before you look at the full-price items.”

“Thanks.” Kiba restrained a snicker while he commanded his dog, “Drop that, Akamaru.”

Akamaru left the shirt on the floor and trotted to the front of the store with his master.

Tenten had effectively snapped back to reality. She sat on the table and looped the clasps of her cheongsam shut (which had nearly been removed) while Neji stood in odious silence with his forehead leaned onto her shoulder. She stroked the back of his head and smoothed his hair, ‘There, there…” Listening as a growl of proposed murder escaped his throat.

“It’s kind of Dad’s fault that this happened…” She sighed and then expounded, “I need employees up front. Or Shadow Clones. Anything to watch the store so that this does not happen again…”

Neji finally moved to collect his shirt and put it on, “You’re suggesting this will happen again…”

Alarmed by the heart-crushing thought that he would forsake any advancement in the relationship, she leapt from the table and scattered the items she had pulled from the closet. “Neji. Maybe not here, and maybe not until we tackle the training objectives we set…but…but we…” Her tone trickled with distress.

Laughter was coming from the front of the store.

Neji gave her a lofty look as he turned towards the doorway, “It has little to do with time and place. It’s that I did poorly.”

“P-Poorly?” She sputtered.

“I can do much better.” He decided aloud, a self-assured smirk appearing on his face.

‘If that was him performing poorly I can’t imagine what he’ll do when he’s really trying.’ Her brain spun a little. Tenten exhaled a shaky breath and then scooped up the restored jian, returning it to him with a grumble.

She recommended, “Let’s get our minds out of the gutter.”

“For now.”
“And don’t come on to me in my place of work anymore.” Tenten added, pushing against his back and directed him out of the room, “You’re going to interfere with my sales, Hyuga.”
Wavering Eyes

Chapter Summary

Bada-boom. Friendship, implied training, actual training, Scott Pilgrim, fried foods, and a lot of sin. To elaborate, the 'sin scenes' are sexy teenage flirtations and pawing that does not tip the scale towards explicit, but you may now consider yourselves warned.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Soundtrack: "Ends of the Earth" by Lord Huron

In the span of the first week, training rolled out at a grueling pace. Entire days were spent flexing muscle, spending chakra, and meals were forgotten or skipped. The only mission that the group of finalist Genin had been tasked with was not really a mission per se, and Tsunade's "look good" assignment had not taken up too much time or attention. The 'wake up, work, sleep, repeat' routine had caught on.

One sunny morning, Gai was unnerved when Kakashi dropped by to ask for permission to leave the village with Tama.

"For training." Kakashi explained casually, "There's an uninhabited canyon a few miles shy of the border with the Land of Rivers. We're working on a technique."

"Surely you could train within the safety of our village?" Gai was stumped.

"Ah…no." Kakashi was not very forthcoming with information.

Grudgingly, Gai gave his blessing, provided that Tama cleared the suspicious request with her parents. Whatever it was, Kakashi did not want his other students, or anyone for that matter, observing what he taught the next generation of the Maito family. Gai could read between the lines. Anything that Kakashi did not say actually said quite a lot. If he did not want to discuss which technique would be practiced in a location such as a desolate canyon, far from civilization, Gai could make an educated guess. 'Without a doubt, he will try to hone her Taijutsu. Perhaps Ninjutsu as well. Her opponent is guaranteed to be a difficult one…' He rubbed his chin in thought after Kakashi had left, The Inner Gates? Forbidden jutsu? My niece is not suited for the Chidori, but…I have no idea how Kakashi seeks to equip her against this adversary…'

Gai huffed to himself, knowing that Kakashi took just as many risks with students as he did. They had criticized each other heavily about it in the past. Now, it was standard practice to pass on high-level techniques without worry.

He looked up at the clock near the bulletin board of the Jounin Standby Station. Lee's practice with his grandfather would be wrapping up soon. There was about enough time to jog around the village before they were set to meet at their training grounds. Gai did a few warm up stretches before taking off, greeting Genma in the hallway as he literally hurdle over his old teammate's head.
When Kosuke the small, red toad delivered amaryllis bulbs from Mount Myoboku, along with Naruto's most recent correspondence, Hinata nearly did a jig. The toad merrily exited from the window to go lounge in the garden and wait for her reply.

Hinata set the paper-wrapped bulbs on her desk and took a seat in a chair, ready to devour the letter with her eyes, but Hanabi's whine sounded from the doorway of her room.

"Onee-san…"

Hinata fumbled with the parchment, rolling it up as she gave a squirrely look to her sibling, "Good morning, Hanabi. What's the-?"

"No one spends time with me anymore." Hanabi marched in and collapsed on her sister's bed, "Not you, not onii-san, not Dad…everyone's busy and caught up in Exam preparations…” She brought her fist down on a pillow.

"It's only for a few more weeks." Hinata gently reminded her, smiling.

"I know that, but how am I supposed to not be tempted to steal bikes or smash Konohamaru's face while I wait?" The girl groaned, "Even when he stops by he doesn't want to spar as much as he used to."

Curious, Hinata spun in the desk chair and gave Hanabi a long stare, "Your rival comes to visit you here?"

"When he and his team don't take missions—" Hanabi stopped herself before she revealed more than she was willing to discuss, "So what? I just want something to do. Every day I have to go to the Academy I resent being there, and I resent all the students who ask, _oh, you haven't graduated yet?_" She sat up and pouted at her sister, "Hmf! Hey, what's that?"

"What's what?" Hinata blinked.

"In your hand."

She glanced down at Naruto's message, "It's from—"

"Yeah, I know what it is— lemme see it." Hanabi stood and held out her hand, "I want to know how that buffoon keeps you interested in him."

Now, there may have been a time when Hinata would have readily handed over a sappy letter to disgust her younger sister with; maybe a few months ago or last year…but today her written exchanges with Naruto had evolved into something private. Sacrosanct, she might say. Certainly not the topics a moody twelve-year-old ought to read about. _'And since I spent time with Naruto at Mount Myoboku recently, well—'_ Technically, _kind of_, she had liaised with him in the dead of night, _'What would Hanabi think about reading his reaction to that?'_ In his body. In the realm of sages that did not welcome outsiders, far beyond the watchful gazes of her family and clan…

Hinata slipped the scroll off of the desktop, stuffing it in the kangaroo-pocket of her sweatshirt, replying simply, "No."

Hanabi was wide-eyed, "No?"

"It's not meant to be read by anyone else. _I_ haven't read it yet."

"Read it with me, then, Miss Secretive." Hanabi snorted, leaning over her sister's shoulder.
Hinata lurched forward and resisted when her sibling made an immature grab for her pocket. Hanabi's interest and temper escalated, palming Hinata's face and pushing her askew to reach for the scroll, "What's in there, huh? Oh my gosh! What does he say to you? What do you say to him?" Hanabi cackled madly, "Give it to me! You know I won't tell Dad…"

"I know you will tell!" Screeching, she tripped Hanabi and let her face-plant on the fluffy area rug. Hinata made a break for it out into the main hallway, running as fast her legs could carry her as Hanabi bayed after her like a bloodhound.

Members of the Hyuga clan noted it was kind of noisy in the house today.

By the grace of a higher power, the chase was interrupted. Hideyasu halted Hanabi when she nearly mowed down two, very full-handed Branch servants trying to clean sullied futons. The man grabbed Hanabi by the scruff of her tunic while she writhed, and he chided her recklessness. Erstwhile, Hiashi had given his steward free reign to discipline and punish Hyuga Hanabi whenever she acted out; most especially in ways that jeopardized her hapless peers.

Though Hideyasu had apprehended her sister, Hinata did not stop. Not even for breakfast.

In ten minutes, she was expected to attend a lesson. Since she knew she could not safely read her correspondence at home, Hinata intended to read it during a break in practice and then burn it afterward. If I bury it in the garden Hanabi could probably find it anyway… She pulled on her shoes and proceeded to the riverside training ground she had been summoned to.

Off to the right of the training area, Hinata laid eyes on Neji. As she approached his back was facing her, and he appeared to be in the midst of a long-winded explanation to Tenten. She was seated in the grass priming a very long, thin scroll with ink, nodding absently as she listened. A merry grin spread on her face when Tenten saw Hinata crossing the lawn, and she paused in her work. With that cue, Neji looked over his shoulder.

"Hey! You're not late." Tenten assured the girl as Hinata scurried up to them, "We're just always early. That's kind of Neji's rule."

"Good, I see…" Hinata took a calming breath, "Good morning Onii-san, Onee-san…" She was on time and Hanabi was not chasing her to the ends of the earth. It was time to relax. Hinata then looked curiously at the scroll Tenten was winding up. The older girl off-handedly mentioned that she would be would be employing one of Neji's ideas for the Tournament. Hinata noted the fact interestedly.

"How much time can you spend on Nature Transformation today?" Neji gave his cousin an expectant look, "I know that Uncle has demanded some of your time as well."

"For today he won't, but this afternoon I should join my team." Hinata noted, fidgety at the prospect of testing her Water Affinity.

"We can meet up like this briefly a few days a week, if that works." Tenten stretched her arms over her head grandly as she stood, "So…who's Affinity do you want to see first? Maybe a demonstration would be a good idea."

Hinata's lips puttered like a goldfish, "A-Ah…you mean to say…you have one too, Onee-san?"

Tenten quirked her face, partly abashed, "It's…not well-developed."

"If incinerating an opponent does not qualify as developed, then consider it unrefined. It has its uses." Neji snorted, "Her's is a Fire Transformation."
Hinata gasped, "Oh, like Tama-chan's!"

"Yup. Too bad Tama couldn't be here to join us. She told me that she was training outside of the village for a bit..." Tenten retrieved a scroll from her hip-pouch, "Tama suggested that we ask Sato if he wanted to practice with us, but, well..." She looked knowingly at Neji's sour face, "Neji was in no mood to humor your teammate, Hinata."

"I understand." She caught herself glancing down at her feet in mild disappointment, snapping her chin back up, "But if Sato-kun is interested in developing his Lightning Style with my help, I suppose...it is best we work together during our team hours."

"I would prefer that." Neji concurred. It was settled, and he turned with a slight gesture of his head to his girlfriend.

There was something organic and spellbinding in the way her cousin interacted with Tenten, Hinata felt. From a slight distance, she watched without a word as the two had a brief brainstorm, their gazes placidly locked, and then agreed they would perform a simultaneous demonstration for Hinata. 'Neji-niisan does not act like this around anyone else.' She fiddled with the chain of her necklace peeking from beneath her sweatshirt. Neji's guard was lowered, his countenance at ease, 'He is completely in tune with Tenten.'

Hinata's mouth curved into a pleased smile. It was a Godsend. Her cousin, finally, seemed to be in his own element; away from scathing remarks and posturing in the Main House of their clan, or the chin-up bravado and coolness Neji displayed with peers and friends. This new, authentic self he was comfortable showing around her and Tenten (and Lee too, she ventured) was a marvel. It was impossible not to feel happy for him and his circumstances.

She looked back and forth on the field between the two, observing as Neji and Tenten spaced themselves out with paces measured for a duel. In spite of what they intended to do, they remained utterly calm. Hinata busied her hands in her front pocket, 'I hope that...I will be like them. When Naruto is home, I can be my true self around him...he and I can be easy and peaceful like this. Maybe Naruto-kun will finish my sentences for me, after enough time!' Naruto was getting dangerously close to it in his correspondence, and when she had met him in the Toad Valley.

The summoning scroll whirled in Tenten's hand as she conjured out a beautiful longbow. Hinata puzzled at the sight before looking left towards Neji down the pitch, where he held up a single palm aimed for his girlfriend. The fuzzy feeling in her stomach curdled as Hinata considered that, since time immemorial, Neji and Tenten had zero hesitation when it came to attacking one another.

A small eep escaped her as Neji struck first during a fraction of a moment, with an assuredly unsafe Wind Release Air Palm that soared directly at the girl he loved. Tenten responded in kind with a shot that glowed momentarily blue before igniting mid-air. Hinata's hands clasped in terror inside of her pocket.

The Fire Release bolt ate the vacuum wave that was charged with Wind, and Hinata peeped in alarm and awe as the flame became a horizontal tunnel of burning devastation...turned back on Neji as he waited with an unconcerned look on his face. Ah, right, Hinata's brain blipped, Elemental weaknesses. She shrieked in panic. Earlier, Neji had not been exaggerating when he used the word incinerating to describe it.

Neji propelled himself into a timely rotation, diverting the empowered Fire Release with a shield of chakra. Though a safe distance away, Hinata fell into a crouch and covered her head. She marked that her cousin's rotation was as grandiose as her father's, the diameter of the dome well past five meters by her estimate, hurling away dragon-tongue flames without a care. Hinata deduced that in the eyes of the clan's elders, or perhaps by anyone else's judgement, Neji had all the capability and prowess of veterans among the Hyuga.

She stood and sniffed the singed smells of the field—the grass scorched away from the soil, the crater around Neji smoking…and perhaps some of his hair was singed. Hinata glanced to Tenten who was at the far end of the yard, shielding her eyes with her hand as she whistled, impressed. She tucked her bow beneath her arm and Hinata hurried over to her cousin who was, somehow, completely fine.

"That demonstration was excessive." Hinata declared.

"It was not the first time we've attempted it, so we knew what to expect." Neji was picking at the burned tips of his hair, "Based on what you've witnessed, I expect that you understand why it is not favorable to clash with your elemental opposite in battle."

Of course they had tried this before. Because that was what Neji and Tenten were wont to do with their free time—discovering ways to unleash new levels of destruction while using each other as test dummies. Hinata did not approve of it, but totally got that they would never dare do such things with anyone else. Their sensei may have had a conniption if he'd seen it!

Hinata agreed in a squeak, "I do not wish to press my luck against my elemental opposite."

Tenten nodded in agreement as she strode past, positioning behind Neji to pluck the last bits of ruined hair from him, "For what it's worth, I promised to never use my bow on him even when I'm furious at him, Hinata."

Oh, that was reassuring to hear. Hinata bet that Neji had to proactively get that promise out of Tenten, as he likely knew what havoc she could wreak on him if provoked. His Wind was at a disadvantage to her Fire, plain and simple.

While the couple chattered about Affinity jargon, Hinata was half-listening as she measured the length of the impression Neji's rotation had left. Her small feet lined across the crater in what Sato may have labeled the 'most unfair field-sobriety test' he had ever seen. Thankfully, Sato was not within joking distance. Hinata could not whistle like Tenten could, but she would have after discovering her cousin's rotation easily stretched two-and-a-half times as far as her's.

After hair-damage-control was completed, Tenten happily invited Hinata to try out Water Release, "We reserved this training area for you, you know! Show us what you can do and then I'll let you school my Fire Release with a free shot." She looked cheekily at Neji beside her, "At least someone will be able to do it."

His mouth quirked into a half-amused, half-challenged sneer, but Neji reserved his rebuttal. He'd show her later, oh he would show her.

Neji stayed back a ways while Tenten stood at the bank, hooting and fawning over Hinata's water walking (more like dancing) talent. With little prompting, the girl could wrap water round herself in shapes and orbs, directing it with gestures. It was much more precise control than Neji or Tenten could boast.

Balancing on the slow moving creek's surface, Hinata frowned to herself. Her father had been encouraging her to perfect Air Palm, and Hinata noodled on the idea that she could combine her Elemental Affinity with it. Well, she could attempt it. The theory was there, she acknowledged, remembering how she had combined Water Release with small Jyukken strikes in the Preliminary Round of the Exam. 'I just need to stretch it farther, if I can lead that water-feeling in my chakra into it as I manipulate the shape into a wave…' She paused, owl-eyed, wondering to herself what it might "Hey, I didn't say you could quit dancing and showing off, Hinata-chan." Tenten grinned devilishly at her, holding her bow up, "Don't make me make you dance!"

Neji's scoff came from behind her but the girls ignored him.

After a few more cartwheels and water acrobatics to appease Tenten, Hinata returned to the shore. She spoke quietly to the older girl, low enough to go unheard by her cousin, "I wonder if I can use techniques…the way that Onii-san can?"

Tenten dropped her voice as well, "He makes techniques look sophisticated…but really Neji is just good at quickly assembling pieces of jutsu. Then it's rinse and repeat." She added in a chuckle, "No pun intended. I think you can do it, Hinata. Today is just a day to try, after all."

"You're right!" She beamed at her confidant, "I'll give it a try."

Behind them, Neji was not enjoying being ignored and excluded from conversation.

With a long breath, Hinata took a stance and raised her palm, taking aim at the tree line across the river. Her father's lesson was still fresh in her mind, and Hinata capably molded her chakra with force, concentrating on expanding the energy just so.

And she may have been a bit hasty with her Water Affinity attempt, not entirely calm or poised enough to feel that droplet, that ripple, that tidal wave inside her blood and bones…she felt a whisper of it, and mistakenly applied that little bit to her vacuum wave.

Her Air Palm soared, easily clearing the river and striking a tree. It had also childishly splashed her in the face, soaking her hair and front. Hinata's grumbling whimper cracked Tenten's façade of maturity. The older girl held the stitch in her side and keened with laughter. Neji finally came to stand beside them, and instead of lauding Hinata's effort, he dove into a technical explanation of what to do better.

These two. 'I know it didn't come out right…but they…' Though she adored and respected them, Hinata could not deny the combination of Neji and Tenten and training definitely had the ability to chafe her juuuust a bit.

So when Tenten continued to chortle and Neji continued to teach, Hinata felt she was within her rights to snap them out of it. With a flick of her wrists, the younger girl willed up two threads of water from the creek and splatted her companions in their respective faces. Both Neji and Tenten fell into immediate silence.

"See?" Hinata smiled happily, "It wasn't that funny. I was doing my best, you know."

Tenten immediately apologized, squeezing Hinata in a one-armed hug, "I know! Sorry, I guess I was just excited to see you in action and I was a giggling mess." She shot a sharp look at Neji and procured a soft apology from him as well.

With the next few tries that further splashed and soddened Hinata, Neji was more constructive with his suggestions. Hinata well understood the feelings and the nuances her cousin was articulating, but it was trickier than threading a needle from a distance; drawing in her whispering Water Affinity into the chakra she molded. 'Onee-san said that Neji-niisan makes things look easy at times, but...this isn't—this just isn't as simple as it sounds! The balance is so exact and fleeting...' Her lapse of timing, maybe, or the strain of forming a vacuum wave made it so much more difficult to echo Water Release into the technique. Catching a swift butterfly by its feet would be easier—she would have sworn it. It was further testament that Neji absolutely had a grip on what he was doing when it came to high-level jutsu, but Hinata often believed he sought to achieve out of necessity and not out of curiosity.

No one kept track of how much time passed, but eventually Hinata stopped, rattling with heavy breaths. She did take Tenten up on her offered "free shot," and with a simple Jyukken strike successfully fused with Water Release, a wave of water consumed the bolt of fire from the Hiyumi with a hiss of vapor, and bowled Tenten over and down the pitch. Hinata squealed her apology, but the older girl waved off her concerns as she stowed away the golden bow.

Tenten wrung out her sleeves and swiped her slick hair out of her face, "You applied it perfectly just then, so don't apologize, Hinata. I'm sure you can sync that with your Air Palm after enough practice." She motioned for her two Hyuga companions to follow her, "Let's take a break so I can dry off. Good hustle, you two."

Neji wondered at her vague, Gai-like praise. Some things from their team communication would inevitably stick.

They bought lunch from a street-side stand on the way into town. Grilled, marinated eel on sticks, boxed-up, with bowls of fresh vegetables chopped and tossed in vinegar. Tenten was already three-quarters dry by the time they had reached the street that housed her Weapon Shop. It was there that the distressing incident, that which would long be etched into Tenten's memory into her older years—occurred in a quiet, ephemeral moment:

An old man with a wheelbarrow was traveling in the opposite direction, and as he passed the young trio he lost his coordination; tipping the handcart and its brick and tool contents onto the sidewalk. Hinata handed off their bagged lunches to Tenten, and she and Neji graciously assisted the senior citizen. Tenten had half a mind to put their belongings down and help, but she stood straight as a compass-point, staring down the unpopulated avenue to its end. Staring at the intersection where Huo was alone, gazing back at her.

The details and emotions flooded Tenten, oblivious to her companions while they were preoccupied behind her.

Without a doubt, the plastic bag dangling from Huo's hand came from a shop in the Han Ethnic Quarter of the village. What he had been doing there was anyone's guess, and he had been passing by in earnest likely to return to his Exam-appointed guest habitation. They had then seen each other, in some twisted instance of Koi no Yokan, that encounter that her father had described so many times about her mother…but it was evil and inverted and acrid. A singular moment of knowing that they could never be comrades. That they could never understand each other, despite what they shared. That there was only destiny that would bind them as two, and then ultimately subtract one.

Her head and stomach delivered this hideous fact to her heart, and that was when Tenten saw the young man's mouth pull into a delighted smirk. His eyes had strayed to her friends behind her. He had seen into her, somehow, and knew instantaneously just how much they meant to her. He knew exactly what to take. He knew exactly how to win.

Horrified, Tenten whirled around to Neji and Hinata behind her, mouth contorted in a near scream…and found them seeing off the old man with pleasantries, utterly unaware of danger. She whipped her head 'round again to spot the slinking leopard of a ninja down the lane, but it was as if he had never been there—the space he had occupied now empty air. She inhaled a few shuddering breaths and tried to reconcile with the fact that she understood now, more than Lee had, more than Neji had, that Huo was, by design, unique, hostile, and ready to end them.
Neji's hand on her shoulder made her jump.

She looked into his and Hinata's concerned faces, unable to form words as she clutched at the bag in her hands.

"What is it?" Neji asked, but he had mostly asked the question with his expression and how he had closed the gap between them. Hinata took the bag from Tenten and also crowded in, compelled to touch the older girl's arm comfortably.

"I thought I—" She shook her head roughly and steeled her nerves. The last thing she needed to do was put Neji on alert as he had been in the Forest of Death's Tower. Neither of them needed to fret about Huo any more than they already did, at least not when they were enjoying their time together this much. Tenten would hate to waste the geniality they had built up.

Her laugh was dry and dismissive, "I saw a ghost. I thought I did, well—" Tenten blinked her eyes to make her point and patted her two treasured friends, "It must be nothing. Sometimes I feel like my father…lurks around me."

Hinata latched onto this immediately, tittering on the sentimental notion of a guardian parent as they continued walking. Neji; not so much. He was proficient in sifting lies and truths from Tenten's words, but he was never in the habit of calling her on her fabrications. He preferred to let it linger until she was ready to admit it to him.

They took lunch in the shop with the front door locked (as Tenten had learned a hard lesson about that) and they settled on the tall-backed stools behind the counter. Neji ate and simultaneously examined the scroll Tenten had primed earlier. Tenten sneaked a look to her left, where Hinata was huddled in a seat against the wall, burying her face into correspondence.

"Is that from Naruto?" Tenten wondered.

Hinata's eyes shifted up when she replied, "I-It is. I wanted to read it at home, but Hanabi was pestering me."

Neji did not look up from his reading but snorted in understanding. Hanabi had two states of being: bothering her family or bothering her acquaintances. She had no other operational settings.

"This is as well-made as the best tool-summoning formulas I've seen my clan write." Neji informed her, giving Tenten a side-eye smirk of approval, "And you wrote it in one morning."

"It cramped my hand up something fierce." She noted.

"I'll seal your weapons into this if you want to work on the second scroll." He offered.

"That…might take you all day. Maybe even all of tomorrow…"

"That's still twice as fast as you could accomplish it on your own. And at any rate, it was my idea."

Neji retorted, "My sealing skill is still shy of yours, but I hope that you'll accept my—"

"No, no, I know that you can do it." She leapt up from her seat, "I appreciate it, Neji. I really do. Wait a minute while I get the first arsenal." Tenten disappeared into the back storage room to retrieve the weapons she wanted to seal.

He ate contentedly until his girlfriend returned with an organized; rolling shelf of metal racks stocked with tools and weapons that even made Hinata's jaw drop.
"Do you make them all yourself-?" Hinata chirped in wonder.

"Of these here? I've forged twenty percent of them, and then thirty percent I bought from weapon-makers I admire." Tenten explained, rolling the arsenal to a stop in front of the counter, within Neji's reach, "The other half were my Dad's weapons. Nearly all of those he made himself."

Tenten skirted around the counter and plucked an ink dish, brush, and a clean towel from a low drawer. She set them down beside Neji as he reached for a bottle of ink from the top of a doorless cupboard. By then Hinata had resumed her letter-reading and so Tenten took her seat beside Neji once again, sighing knowingly as he filled the ink well. She flipped open the locked cash box beneath the counter and procured a razor blade, one which served a singular function in her shop.

She had cut her left thumb for a previous sealing a few days ago, so Tenten opted for her right thumb, swiping the blade over skin before Neji could say a word. He watched in surprised silence as she hovered her hand over the dish, letting generous droplets of blood mix with the ink. The level of sealing they intended to use needed an identifying trace for summoning.

"That's sufficient." Neji noted, cloaking her finger in the towel to stem the bleeding. He called Hinata over to briefly patch her up, and she hopped up and tottered over to heal Tenten who mumbled her thanks. Tomorrow, Hinata would likely not be around to restore her after they worked on sealing for the second scroll, 'But it doesn't matter to me, I have a bottomless box of bandages that work just fine.'

What was clear was that Neji was not fond of seeing Tenten in a state of disrepair, no matter how trivial. These days she would still catch Neji observing her back with his Kekkei Genkai, where her shoulder had been split open on their mission to the Marsh Country. He moodily assessed that scar some days as if he were responsible for the injury. With all of that in mind, Neji had become prone to asking Hinata for healing favors.

Hinata returned to her seat by the wall and buried her face in the letter again. Neji set to work carefully writing identifying seals over the primer, those which would serve as labels for what was stored in the scroll. Tenten stretched out a thin length of blank parchment at the far end of the counter, readying herself for round two of priming. She kept her ink well at the edge of the table top and let her thoughts roam as she worked on auto-pilot.

'I didn't want to ruin it. This...this is great. Neji has been so eager to help and, honestly, he IS amazing help with this sort of project.' She smiled to herself, 'So if I go ahead and make a fuss about Huo stalking around this part of town, Neji will lose it. He wouldn't keep the mindset to continue working on this, let alone get a wink of sleep at night. He'll wind himself up about it. Lee, too...he'd panic if I mentioned what I saw.'

While it was nearly a rational thought, Tenten pondered if she should at minimum be reporting such things to Gai or Tsunade. It was probably the kind of sighting they were looking out for post-Preliminary Matches. 'Yeah, that makes more sense. I can't pretend I'm not terrified or willing to deal with this on my own. I need to squeal to the higher ups, like sensible ninja do.' She nodded to herself as she swept elegant lines and calligraphy onto paper.

Her eyes skirted to the right where Neji held a hand seal, and tapped an identifying mark which consumed the scimitars on the page with a puff of smoke. Tenten could not resist a grin. 'And I thought I liked him years ago, back when he was uninvolved with anyone or anything...' The man was now selfless and thoughtful, more understanding of the feelings of others, 'Not to mention that deep voice...and he smells pretty good, most days. Maybe he'll age like fine wine, if his looks are anything to go by...' She determined that yes; she was unquestionably more attracted to him now than she had been as a tormented pre-teen.
Tenten dawdled in her thoughts, restraining a satisfied grin that threatened her face as she primed her scroll. She was on the cusp of irreparable carpal tunnel by that point and she did not care: she had a first-class boyfriend and it minimized all of her nagging concerns.

What she was not privy to was that Neji had become highly aware of her simpering, eyebrow wagging, and shifty glances. His best guess was that Tenten was pleased with him. He could read her spectrum of emotions and micro-gestures far better these days.

Surely she must have known he was willing to assist with an endeavor that he had suggested in the first place. Neji had a keen recognition of potential, and when Tenten had wrestled old summoning spinners from a closet, he suspected that her parents had not become elite ninja by avoiding innovation. Tenten was suited for hyper-efficient summoning, and he had been quick to embrace it. All told, any way that she could better prepare and defend herself became a priority of his. She would pay him back with swordsmanship drills, he knew.

He held another hand seal and snuck a look at her, noticing how her bottom lip was tucked beneath her teeth, her cheeks flushing. He returned his attention to the two-handed mace he was sealing. Not to read into it too much, but Tenten appeared stirred up and he was not truly sure what about. She rolled her sleeves up her arms and his eyes followed the motion. Her skin had already taken on a faint golden tan from their time outdoors. After being pummeled by Hinata's Water Release, her top sat slightly crooked from drying, resting higher on her full hips, a bit of the skin there peeking above the waist of her pants…and by the time Neji was conscious of his gaze trailing down she had caught him.

Tenten raised her eyebrows at him animatedly and said nothing. She had seen him pause in his work beside her and realized that he was ogling.

She might have told Neji that they couldn't do this here, least of all with his sweet, innocent cousin nearby, but Tenten was not a subscriber of Propriety Weekly.

Feigning a yawn, she stretched her arms above her head to hike her top up. The move was deliberate and unfair, and Neji's face slowly adopted a frustrated pout. Tenten continued scrawling ink over her page and let him fester. The plane of her stomach was exposed beneath the bunched fabric. Neji looked away perhaps for all of one second before he gave up and glanced down again, past her belly button and down…to where the sliver of black spandex shorts was visible beneath her waistband.

"You should have changed before we came here." He muttered out of the corner of his mouth, re-dipping his brush in ink and blood. He had to concentrate to write properly.

"There was no need. By the time we got here I wasn't wet anymore." She tilted her head and dropped her voice below a whisper, "Not so much now."

It did not register.

Tenten counted to five and still got no response. She supposed that his mind just could not go there, or if it was a term beyond his straight-laced vocabulary. 'Ino warned me about this. She said mine may be an uphill battle in terms of flirtation.' She had to agree on that front, 'But I'll be damned if all of the tips and taunts my friends have kindly shared...have no effect on tall, dark, and dense next to me.'

Adjusting the subtlety meter, she gave it another shot, tapping the back of her brush against her bottom lip, 'You...look good today.' Her mouth curved up a little, and she wondered why it was then and only then he seemed to get it.
A nervous flick of his eyes assessed that, thankfully, Hinata seemed to have forgotten they were across the shop floor, working and whispering. The girl was slack-jawed as she read her letter, which in itself could not have been a good sign.

Neji sniffed at the minx beside him, "Do not expect anything from me while we entertain my kin."

"I would never." The success of the attempt made her impish.

He gruffed in annoyance but was undeniably on the hook. His characters zig-zagged in sad ink splotches on the parchment. With a defeated sigh, Neji moved to the next primed circle to try again, but found that thought process and motor function had gone out the window. He would be a liar if he claimed he did not think of the things Tenten was suggesting, and twice a liar if he alleged that he disliked what she was doing.

If Sato knew how to push a button or two of Neji's, then Tenten had an entire switchboard she was curiously prodding as time went on. Were she kinder about time and place, he might actually have thanked her for the advances.

How had she found a way to speak below a whisper? Or maybe his hearing was just that sharp when Tenten added, "Right now…we aren't doing anything a Shadow Clone can't do."

Hell is described as a place, but Neji thinks this is erroneous. Hell is whatever this agitation is; this ludicrous game Tenten decided to play because all she wants is a silly reaction, and maybe to embarrass him. Or, maybe not at all. Maybe she was serious?

That was neither here nor there when Hinata stirred from her seat and stood, frowning worriedly. Immediately, the parent-like attentions of her companions returned full-force, and both Neji and Tenten asked what the matter was.

"Onee-san…may I speak to you in the back room?" Hinata requested softly.

For a moment Tenten assumed that the flirtations had been noticed and that they had made the poor girl uncomfortable, but Tenten soon doubted it as she followed Hinata to the work room while the girl gestured wildly to the correspondence in her hands.

"I need to get rid of this." Hinata chirped.

"What?" Tenten's mouth quirked in confusion, "You finished reading it?"

"Yes, and this is not something I can bring home. Hanabi was trying to read it…and I knew…I just knew it would have gone badly if she had." Hinata seemed to wilt in relief, "Will you please burn it for me?"

"Are you sure-? Ah…then…" Tenten crossed her arms and gave the girl a wary look, "I don't really want to know what Naruto wrote to you…and neither of us would want Neji to find out—"

"N-N-No it isn't l-like that…" Hinata stammered and rolled up the scroll frantically, "There are just some things I can't…explain…or," She muttered in clarification, "I don't want to explain…if anyone asks."

"If that doesn't sound like guilt then I don't know what does."

Hinata nearly yelped in dismay, but Tenten held her hand out for the scroll, "Give it here, if you're sure you won't miss it."
No sooner had Hinata nodded and passed it over; Tenten flipped the ignition of a furnace and tossed the scroll into the jet of flame.

"And we will never speak of this," Tenten smiled warmly at her, "Because we have each other's backs. Sorry that I teased you before. If it helps…I understand." She added with emphasis, "I really understand."

Hinata's nodding bordered on apologetic bowing. Once the scroll was reduced to ash Tenten shut off the machine.

"Stop now, Hinata, it's fine." She ushered the girl along, "Let's just…behave for the rest of the day…"

The week flew by. It had taken Hinata several days to compose a response to Naruto's very detailed thoughts about their rendezvous on Mount Myoboku. She was grateful that Tenten had helped prevent unsanctioned eyes from reading such a personal message.

By that time, Tenten had two new summoning spinners at the end of that week, fully-equipped, and she delighted in testing their functionality against Lee every afternoon. In the mornings, Neji divided time between swordsmanship with Tenten, and grueling Wushu forms with Lee and his grandfather.

Neji had learned from Hinata, who had returned to practice her Water Release applications, that she had seen Ino and Shikamaru using the riverside training ground several times. Kiba and Chouji had also joined them for practice and rotated opponents, as none of them were pitted as first-seeded combatants at the Tournament. Hinata had been inclined to join them, but was roped into training with Sato and Shino at their usual forest training area.

And Hinata may have muttered to Neji (over breakfast) that Sato's Lightning Release, which had been honed with Kakashi's instruction, was not something he should dare take lightly. Neji was highly skeptical, as his Wind Nature was guaranteed to weaken Lightning techniques. Hinata had fidgeted anxiously in front of Neji as they discussed it, insisting that Sato was well aware of Neji's strategies.

"He has been working very hard Onii-san, and I ask that you please take care." She wrung her hands and added, "When Shino-kun tested an Earth Release jutsu he had learned from his father, I…" Hinata dusted her sweatshirt at the memory, grimacing, "I had trouble with it."

"That Nature is sure to challenge you."

"And the insects…" She peeped, holding her face in her hands, "My team is taking training very seriously. I feel like I need to prepare myself before I go back tomorrow…"

At the thought, Neji suggested that she spend some downtime with her kunoichi companions, if any were still available. Hinata took the idea to heart and set out from the Main House with a cheery wave of farewell to him.

Of the friends that she had been able to locate, not a single one had much free time to spend. Hinata was able to sit down with Sakura around noon in the third-floor break room of the Administrative building. Sakura skimmed her hands over a variety of welts and bruises she had gotten during training, explaining to her friend, "Tsunade-shishou has been pushing me to my limit…" She leaned back on an old sofa and groaned.

"The training period has only just started." Hinata said as she took the seat beside her, helpfully healing a bruise on Sakura's back that was beyond her reach.
The girl sighed in relief, "Thank you, Hinata-chan…it's a miracle that you stopped by. I haven't seen anyone since we all started getting busy."

"What about Kiba-kun and Tama-chan?"

"When Shishou lets me have time with my team, I've only gotten to see Kiba-kun, so far. Tama-chan has been going outside of the village with Kakashi-sensei for training…and by the time she gets home at night, she's too exhausted to do anything other than sleep." Sakura rested her booted feet on the coffee table in front of them, "I know she and Sensei aren't playing around. Tama's opponent isn't the type to restrain himself in a fight."

Hinata nodded solemnly in agreement. As it was their friend's first time participating in a Chunin Selection Exam, Tama had rotten luck in the Third Round lottery for opponents.

The two girls stared up at the whirling ceiling fan above and tried to think of anything other than their aching bodies, or what the final bout of the Exam had in store for them.

Sakura broke the silence, "Gaara-kun came back this morning. I haven't seen him yet…I know he wants to train Matsuri as much as possible."

Hinata smiled thoughtfully, "He will come find you as soon as he is able."

"He always does." Sakura shut her eyes and relaxed, "I'm sure Gaara will love seeing me covered in bruises, or with this lump on my head from when Shishou—" She grumbled again, pressing a healing hand to the egg on her scalp, "Tsunade-shishou is a piece of work. She insists that this Exam is reflecting on her and her ability to help our village recover…but she's beating me into the ground."

"She knows you can handle it."

"And to top it off, she wants us to look amazing in three weeks, but in the meantime we're all pulverized from training each day. Seems counterintuitive to me…" Sakura snickered, "But Ino says that's what makeup is for."

"I suppose it is. I've never worn makeup." Hinata looked sidelong to her friend, "Do you know what your team will be wearing at the Tournament?"

"We bought our outfits. I asked my mom to take in a few hems and fit things to us…but what we have is going to have to be good enough. We don't have any more time waste on fashion."

"I agree. I am sewing a few things for my team, but we are making due with things we had on hand." Hinata also put her feet up with a sigh.

"Hmm. I forgot that sewing and knitting are some of your hobbies. That's handy."

"It is, but it's a little stressful when I have to make time every night for alterations. Sato-kun and Shino-kun have grown so tall…I hope they don't outgrow the things I've fitted for them."

"Yeah, three weeks can go by and the guys could go through another growth spurt. What a hassle…"

"I think…I'm as tall as I can possibly get in my lifetime." Hinata presumed, chuckling as Sakura agreed with a tired nod.

"You know, I heard that Tama is 175cm tall. It's gotta be those legs."
"Wow!"

"I want to hate her but I just can't. That hair and those muscles…and she's as statuesque as a runway model."

"Do you remember when Ino-chan said the grass is always greener on the other side? I really do believe that now. I've accepted the way I am." Hinata stifled a yawn as she added, "I have always thought you were pretty in a way that no one else is, Sakra-chan. Ever since I was small, I thought so."

Sakura grinned and squeezed her friend's hand where it rested on the sofa between them, "Hinata…you're the best."

"So are…" Another yawn, "You…Sakura-chan."

And they snuck in a nap in the break room, which lasted about twenty-five minutes before Tsunade crept in to look for a boxed lunch to steal. She snickered in amusement when she discovered the girls hand-in-hand and snoring.

"Eh-hem! Before I take a photo to sell to local tabloids," Tsunade crossed behind the sofa and ruffled their heads, "You girls had better wake up and get back in the proverbial saddle! The hard work has only just begun!"

The next few weeks had all but eliminated leisure time, at least by daylight. The Leaf Rookies had intersecting schedules and training regimens; always in each other's business even when they were not training and sweating together during practice hours.

Ino had gawked in surprise one afternoon to see Sato casually exiting the dance studio with a duffle bag on his shoulder. She summoned Chouji with a finger snap and they promptly confronted the Hatake, whose tank top and joggers suggested he had forgone battle preparations that day.

"Dance practice?" Ino roughly poked Sato's (now muscled) shoulder, "I thought Tama swore to me you two had put that off until after the Exam."

"Not entirely."

Chouji noted, "If he wants to get his money's worth out of a membership, maybe skipping isn't cost effective." He looked to Sato pointedly, "Right?"

"Yup, I have to go. I don't want to waste a month's tuition. And Ino, I know you're gonna ask: Yup! I took a day off." He confessed merrily, "Kurenai-sensei made me."

"Let me guess! You were starting to grate on her nerves." She jabbed Chouji gently in the side with her elbow and they both made tee-hee sounds.

"How'd you know?" His face dropped in embarrassment, "I asked Shino and he said I wasn't being too abrasive…but I guess all this time together is like cabin fever, except we're outdoors…and I was starting to recycle jokes."

Ino and Chouji winced.

"Yeah, I guess Sensei needed a break…" Sato admitted, rubbing the back of his neck.

"We're meeting Shika for lunch," Chouji said as Ino silently mimed for him not to extend an invitation, "Do you…want to join us?" It was too late. It had slipped out.

"Heck yeah!" He clapped Chouji on the back and squeezed between him and his blonde teammate, "You're buying ri—!"

Ino wrenched him aside with a furious sneer, "Hatake…I need a peaceful end to this day, and if you are going to weasel in and tell shitty jokes, you will not in good conscience let Chouji pay for you."

She warned in a growl, "Pay up, shut up, and put some deodorant on."

That night at a late and unwholesome hour, two Black Ops agents stopped on the roof of the same humble dance studio the Rookies had met in front of.

It had been weeks of uneventful surveillance at Tsunade's request, as both Tenzo and Sai had spent days and nights watching Huo roam back and forth through the village, eat at various restaurants, socialize in a foreign language, and occasionally spar with his Sensei in a designated training area.

Root had kept tabs on Huo from a distance and with sensory jutsu, never interacting with their target, from what Tenzo could discern.

The Hokage had been concerned that Danzo was not genuinely suspicious of the violent Exam participant, but her two trusted stooges had uncovered no evidence to contradict the old counselor.

It had only just developed that morning: Huo had become more flighty and less focused on training. His actions seemed defensive; as if he was aware of being watched.

"It's because you smell like garlic." Sai suggested to his Black Ops supervisor, "You ate that horrible meal earlier and now the boy suspects—"

"He can't smell me, Sai." Tenzo ground his teeth in annoyance, "More than likely he was tipped off to Root watching him."

Sai frowned as he sipped water from a canteen, then pulled his mask back into place, "Root has not yet made a mistake. He cannot know they are watching. They have been extremely cautious, so far."

"We can't be sure of the Root's detection level while we're on break, so it's possible they had a lapse in stealth or judgement." Tenzo surmised, "They'll be passing through here very soon. Keep it down and we'll get to the bottom of this."

They crouched in wait for ten minutes before Huo did pass by on the empty street below, avoiding street lamps. He was blocks away from his guest-habitation and looked believably tired. Tenzo indicated with a two-fingered point where Root operatives were tailing carefully from rooftops.

Sai watched as the three cloaked agents gave no indication of their presence, not by sound, or shadow, and certainly not by the stink of garlic.

As they turned their heads slowly, stock-still in their positions while watching Huo stalk south down the road…Tenzo noticed another source of movement. From where Huo had come from, likely the Han Ethnic Quarter he had frequented…two hooded youths were following, and not with enough care to go unnoticed, at least by ANBU standards. Tenzo used hand signals to communicate to Sai that they would tail and observe the two careless stalkers below.

The odd, sneaking parade proceeded downtown, with Black Ops agents of both affiliations curiously watching what seemed to be a pair of idiots pursuing the Rock Genin. At the turn of the lane into a dead-end industrial sector, lined with wired fences around a shadowy alleyway with no outlet, the two inexperienced ninja sprang for an ambush. They lunged for the brick-laid passage after Huo, their killing intent clear, certain that he was trapped in the manufacturing stock bay he had wandered Root operatives dove down and stuck the two pursuers' legs full of senbon, stunning them and splaying them out on the pavement face-first. Tenzo gave a single nod to Sai before they too descended to investigate.

A Root ninja gave Tenzo and Sai a questioning head tilt and Tenzo quickly explained, "We were passing by on a patrol when we noticed the commotion. What's going on here?"

"Two suspects were trying to harm a Chunin Exam Finalist." The voice of a woman came from behind a plain Root mask, and she pulled back the hoods of their captives, "These are Dream ninja. Your names?" Another operative was extracting the needles from the backs of their knees.

"Eifa."

"Masugama." The young man clenched his teeth and snarled, "Let us do to him what he did to our teammate. He doesn't deserve to go unpunished!"

"That is not your decision to make." A Root commander had their hands bound behind their backs, "You'll be taken to our detainment block until our Director or the Hokage can respond. You are in violation of Exam policy, as disqualified participants. Yumegakure confirmed your return weeks ago, and agreed your visas here expired."

The Dream Genin said nothing, keeping their eyes down as Root operatives informed them what would come next.

Sai had departed from the group for the dead-end alley to coax the frightened finalist out of hiding. Tenzo followed with a lumbering stride, not surprised that heartbroken Genin wanted to settle a score. Then Sai tensed. Tenzo followed his stare into the dark, exit-less stocking bay only to find that Huo was not there. Tenzo had to remain logical and venture that Huo may have used a jutsu to disguise himself, or was taking cover in the single dumpster nestled against a wall, but his stomach twisted with veteran intuition.

"Commander." Tenzo called over his shoulder for the Root supervisor. The cloaked operative stopped beside them and peered into the passage.

"Are you a Sensor-Type?" Tenzo asked.

"I am." The commander walked calmly into the alley and turned in a circle, "He's not here. In fact, he's not anywhere near us. His chakra is not felt to me at all."

"He couldn't have disappeared. Or gone anywhere." Sai asserted with a hint of frustration.

"He couldn't have." The Root commander agreed. He ran his hand along the brick wall and gazed in deep thought at the sprawling shadows in the far corners of the stocking bay.

The commander exited and was flanked by the Hokage's ANBU as they followed behind the arresting Root operatives.

"He is odd: Sasagainu Huo." The Root ninja determined, "I should not like to explain to Danzo-sama that our objective and near-victim has no reportable end location. Unless either of you know why a Genin can go unnoticed by five members of Black Ops..." He shook his head ruefully, "That boy was never in danger in the first place."
Less than one week of training remained.

Sato was inspired to celebrate when Tama returned after what seemed like an age, following a long bout of semi-exclusive training with her Sensei. That day, after Kurenai had banished him again (on account of her joke-induced headache) Sato picked up fresh crab from the market, Tama's favorite! And returned home to steam the seafood. He had sent his wee screech owl, Aroo, ahead to make sure Tama came by his place.

An elapsed time of eighteen minutes passed from when Sato had pulled on the apron that had been gifted to him (Mr. Good Lookin' Is Cookin') to clean and prepare the kani, and Tama knocked once on the door of his flat before stumbling inside. Aroo was perched on her shoulder.

"I'm home!" She paused as she yanked her shoes off in the genkan, reconsidering, "I mean, I'm here, Sato-kun!"

His voice drifted from the kitchen, "Nah, you had it right the first time!"

Aroo flitted from Tama's shoulder to perch on the back of a chair. Then, the owl rotated his head to spy the open window of the living area, and then zipped out to hunt for his dinner.

Sato watched as she trudged into view, dirty, disheveled, and beaten, and she set a tall paper bag down on the kitchen table. His silver eyebrows elevated, "Hey Tama…"

"Hey." Her smile conveyed genuine exhaustion.

"What's that you brought?"

She tipped the bag and spilled a pile of ice packs onto the table.

"Oh." Sato set down a strainer full of crab into the sink and pulled open his freezer, "I'll cool those down for you. Do you…think you'll need all of them?"

"As many as we can velcro to my body, I'll need." She all but whimpered.

The couple stowed away the gel packs into the mostly empty freezer, meeting a few times for pecks on the lips. "Ooh, ouch." Tama scrunched her eyes and drew back, "Even my face hurts…"

"I'm sorry." He said clownishly, kissing the apples of her cheeks as lightly as possible, "Looks like we're going to be icing your face today too."

Her chuckle was weak, and he held her in his arms for a moment before snapping the refrigerator shut with a nudge of his back. "Kakashi…did he go overboard with your training or-?"

"I think it was just what I needed, and we're going to stay in the village from this point on." Her head drooped and she rested her forehead on his shoulder, "It destroyed me, but maybe that's about what I can expect from my match."

"A valid point." Sato spoke into her hair and planted one last kiss on her head, "Go take a bath. I'm making crab for dinner."

She grinned, "That's thoughtful. It's proof that you wanted me to stay here."

"Well I know your parents have probably missed you too."

"I checked on Mom. Dad's away on business for a few days, and Mom doesn't expect me home later." Tama wobbled away as Sato gave her a truly astonished face, "I said I would be staying Inquisitive, he followed her down the hall to the washroom, "Like…she's really okay with you staying here?"

"She really is. After I found out you were inviting me over, I explained that I was too tired to go back across town tonight. Mom understood."

Sato turned his head away from his fiancée and crammed the top of his apron into his mouth, muffling a cheer, Thank you, Maito Miako. I need to buy that lady some flowers. By then the bathroom door was sealed and Tama had the water running. Sato fetched a worn t-shirt and shorts from his wardrobe and set them down on the edge of his bed. Did I leave a fresh towel in there for her? I'm pretty sure I did. He steered himself back into the kitchen to start rice, steam the crab, and make whatever vegetable or addition he had lying around.

He certainly was not the best cook around, but Sato decided that he set a mean table. It's like I was a restaurant host in another life… Even if it did not taste particularly good, it would still look good. Not that he expected dinner to be tasteless. After all, it was hard to mess up crab, as there were few opportunities for him to interfere with flavor between steaming, cracking, and eating.

Tama returned a short while later with her damp hair clipped up, looking damn near perfect in the raggedy old v-neck and three-years-retired boxers. She referred to them as "the soft clothes," and it was not the first time she had borrowed them from Sato. He had a mind to throw them out since they were not to his liking or size anymore, but he kept them for her.

When she made a move to assist in preparations he shook his head and plopped her down into a seat. A moment later, he tested an ice pack and found it was still not cool enough, "These will need a bit longer. Think you can eat in the meantime?"

"I can out-eat anyone in the Akimichi clan, after the week I've had."

They grinned at each other and commenced dinner.

And Sato noted that she did not use her claw-cracker, at least not anymore, because she now had enough physical strength in her fingers to bend iron bars, from the look of it. They feasted and chatted, "Take that apron off, Good-Lookin's not cookin' anymore…" Made a mess of the table, and generally enjoyed each other's company.

He excused her from clean up in favor of flattening her on the couch and cocooning her in ice-packs. Tama let her hair down and sighed, "Ahh, thank you…" She had nearly eaten herself into a coma, which seemed a fair reward for killing herself with training for weeks on end. The sofa was her usual place to lounge after dessert or a long day. It may have been Sato's apartment, but she was the couch's sovereign ruler.

It was heavenly to freeze the pain and aches away, up until her teeth started to chatter, and she could no longer hold a conversation with Sato as he cleaned. A long while passed and she longed for a nap, as was her custom, but it was not possible to fall asleep while glaciating.

After everything had been neatened, he stood over her beside the couch, amused, "Chilly?"

"Yes, and it-t-t's t-terrible and w-wonderful at the s-same t-time…"

Sato pressed his hand to the pack on her chin, "Huh, this is warm already. Want to swap them for new ones?"
"N-Not as m-much as I w-wanna b-blanket…" She admitted.

He interpreted this wish his own way, she noted, as he could have simply found a throw-blanket or something to toss over her and let her continue her reign over the couch. But Sato had scooped her up, packs and all, marched to his bedroom, and deposited her in the bed. He grinned down at her as he pulled the quilt up to her chin, "It's kind of getting late. Get comfy."

Tama noted the alarm clock askew on the bedside table, "Uh…it's e-eight."

"Yup! And it's dark outside. Bedtime."

"B-But I don't want t-to—"

"Easy there, I know. Just stay warm here and I'll be back so we can catch up. I'm going to get the new packs." As he was departing with the old wraps in hand, Tama requested he return with only three, as the nine she had been wrapped up in were just too much to bear and not at all sensible.

She laid there in the dim silence of the bedroom and let her hair fan out across the pillow. 'I haven't done this in a long time. I used to spend nights when we were young, and he was stressed and anxious…but now,' Tama exhaled and pressed the heel of her hand to her forehead, 'This means something different. To me, at least.'

Three ice packs were brought to her and Tama pressed them where she needed them most, thanking Sato again as he settled cross-legged on top of the blanket beside her.

"So inquiring minds want to know," He began, balancing his chin in his palm, "What you were really doing so far from Konoha?"

"Training with the Inner Gates." Tama replied simply, shifting to fluff her pillow, "And other assorted tricks your uncle asked me not to speak about."

"Then I guess I shouldn't ask. Maybe it's just better if I see you in action."

Her puff of breath was almost a laugh, "Yes, no spoilers."

"I figured your uncle was more skilled with the Eight Inner Gates. Was there really no opportunity for you to train with Gai?"

"Maybe he could have made time, but Kakashi-sensei feels responsible for me, and he said that he didn't want Uncle Gai to take time away from his own students."

"Hm, I get that." Sato stretched out beside her, wumping down onto a pillow, face-to-face with Tama. "I'm glad he took this seriously. I felt…worried about you going to the Final Round…just in general, I mean. Most of us are friends and we have no choice but to compete…" His nostrils flared with another thought, "And that jerk…might really try to hurt you."

"Or anyone of us." She noted, "I have worked specifically to not give him that chance."

His smile was small but slightly more assured, "You're a boss."

"Heh, we'll see."

"I mean it."

"And do you feel prepared for your own match?"
"Quite." It was dark, but Tama could make out how bright and playful his ultramarine eyes were.

"That can't mean you just stand there and tease Neji, you know."

"Are you sure I can't?"

She puffed her cheeks and Sato amended, "I know. I'm ready. Sunshine kind of couldn't keep it a secret that she and Neji were improving their Water and Wind affinities, respectively." He brought his hand up and softly tapped the tip of Tama's nose, "And I've worked to make sure 'ol Neji won't get the better of me."

"I sure hope he doesn't." Tama brought her hand up as well and let him twine his fingers with her's.

"Yeah well, Yang Release took forever to get the hang of, and he had better not know what to do about it." Sato dropped his voice apprehensively, "Or I'm shit outta luck."

"That's different. You didn't tell me you were working on that."

"I had to. Pretty much all of my other staple techniques don't affect him at all."

"True."

The ice pack around her chin drooped and he reached to adjust it for her. Tama tiredly shook her head, "No, leave it. My face is just about numb now."

"I'm sure it's not."

"Hm. That, or I have a tingling ice beard. You tell me."

He leaned in and she was able to feel the soft tickle of his breath just before he pressed his mouth warmly to hers, and Tama marveled at the plush feeling of his lips. Chilled or no, she felt it.

Sato drew back with a soft, scratchy sound as he exhaled. They were nose-to-nose, Tama staring in appraising silence at the steep slope of his jaw, the starlight silver of his eyelashes up-close, his virile, clean scent filling her nostrils. No, not even a year ago had she been affected like this, hardly aware of how it had taken no time at all for her to blink and see him, smell him, feel him as an adult. Their friendship stretched between them as a soothing, unbreakable hammock, but new, tenuous threads had formed between them.

Her eyelids were halfway shut when he leaned in again, carefully pulling the ice away from her face and setting it aside. She lost the thought she tried to mutter as Sato slanted his mouth over hers again, his hands searching, and she guided his fingertips to the places that did not sting or scream from bruising. 'He tastes like mint.' He must have brushed his teeth before he had returned, she thought, momentarily lamenting her probably shellfish-y breath. If he cared about that he certainly didn't show it. He had snuck back the quilt and slipped beneath, pressing against her with a comforting heaviness.

Tama trembled, cords of muscle in her arms, back, and stomach trying to relax in the embrace. Slowly, she felt him shift and the fog-headed kiss she had been lost in traveled down and away from her face. She tensed again at the motion, but Sato made reassuring sounds between gentle kisses, scooching back to bracket her legs between his knees.

He loomed over her in a way that looked utterly feline, his eyes glittering, his body lean, and he asked, "Where does it hurt?"
The equivalent of a neurological firework went off in her brain, and Tama was not able to communicate much to him aside from removing the bag of ice from her left flank, where a violet-yellow bruise captured his attention. He bent and pressed a cautious kiss there, and Sato felt a twitch of muscle under his lips as she hissed with a mix of approval and pain. He sought her other injuries, careful and attentive, spying vague shoe and punch marks from combat that blossomed into various purples on her sand-hued skin.

A sound escaped her that stilled him, and Sato balanced over her, electrified for an endless second, and he became deaf to anything but that noise as he leaned down again. He kissed up her arms, to nowhere particularly injured, but she let him, oh god she let him touch and trail along her willowy limbs, hoisting up the shirt to access her stomach that tensed and contracted under his lips. She smelled like the soap from his bathroom. She smelled like him, in his clothes, in his bed, saying his name like small prayers with her eyes trolling over him. Liquid fire was coursing up and down his spine, out to his fingertips as he slid them over her skin.

He kissed her mouth again, her lips soft as flower petals, listening distantly to her nonsense-talk, "Nothing hurts, nothing hurts…you made me…" Tama murmured satisfied, throaty sounds between kisses.

Sato braced himself above her on one forearm while he rested his other hand at the dip of her waist, 'Calm. Stay calm.' He was not calm. He was as taught as a bowstring, harder than he had ever been in his young life, pressed into her thigh after she had gotten the bright idea to hook a leg around him. Maybe Tama had not been precisely aware of his state until she shimmied to reach for a kiss, not knowing the rub of her body against his erection, through pants, elicited a fugitive moan from him. She stilled and stared at him, as if to get visual confirmation of the phenomenon. Sato merely made frustrated, aroused grumbles as he pressed his face into the juncture of her neck and shoulder. She could look. It wasn't as if he could deny what was happening.

"I'm sorry." His tone wavered, struggling, "Don't get…the wrong idea. I didn't plan to do this, I sw —"

"Shh, I know." She brought one of her hands up to card her fingers through his hair, "This is good. I've…always wanted to get close."

Absently, he closed his hand around her wrist.

Tama added, "I feel better."

"I can make you feel better than better."

"I bet, but this is enough."

There was an edge of desperation in his voice as he lay on top of her, in some spots that were painful for her, "How long will it be enough? How long…until you want more?" Sato's face was possessive while he was bargaining, "You've wanted…"

She slipped her wrist free and held his shoulders, allowing the kisses and the press of their hips. Truly, Tama did find it sufficient. She approved that he was a shaking, taught, growling mess, and to go further and risk losing this precious landmark memory would infuriate her.

His voice was saccharine like syrup and it made her shiver, "You've wanted me. I know I made you wait."

"You did make me wait," She gasped to inhale air while he pressed hot kisses to her wrist and the cup of her hand, "J-Just a little longer."

"How did I waste time…not knowing how you'd look, like this?" He seared his lips onto her collarbone, "Not knowing what you can do or how you taste..." Sato's mouth ghosted over the peaks beneath the shirt material, "Tama."

The feeling that pooled low in her belly could not be mistaken, not when he said her name like that. Trembling, she let her eyes flutter closed, savoring when he pressed against her.

"I need to feel you," He whispered harshly, "I can't spend another moment not knowing what you feel like."

His shirt was hitched up and Tama became conscious of her hands flat against his stomach in a warding gesture, wordlessly pleading for space. There was a shocking amount of scar tissue, she felt; the ridges of flesh that had been mended from his traumatic injuries were jagged and noticeable even against her roughened palms. And muscle; there was tense muscle there too. Tama let herself imagine how rugged he would look naked before determining that, yes, she still needed that space. She kissed him and pushed him off with strength.

He was breathing heavily and made no move to encroach upon her again. Sato curled up and faced her, waiting for the other shoe to drop.

"Not yet." She spoke as her chest rose and fell, "I'm not ready yet. All I ask is that you honor the time you made me wait for you, and just lend me a bit of the same courtesy."

He nodded with an unnerved look, not daring to break the eye contact.

"Sato," She cracked a smile, "I want to. You really should know that I want to."

"Then why not?"

"For one thing, I'm not in the best of shape." She raised her arm and pointed to a black-and-blue elbow, "I'm exhausted. We would be much better served if we were, you know, healthy."

"Ah. Right."

"And I don't want to have to think about anything else, like the Exam, for instance. I'd only want to focus on you."

"Yeah, but afterward we'll have to think about our schedules as Chunin, so I guess…well, what I mean is…I don't think we really have to wait."

"Well I think we should wait."

He grinned cheekily, "Even though you want me?"

"Yes, even though I want you." A small, exasperated sigh.

"I'm a fine piece of ass, right?" Sato propped his head up, winking at her, "And I cook."

She blew a raspberry after trying to restrain a laugh, "Oh, a fine piece indeed. And I taught you how to cook." Tama rolled to lean into him, pulling the blanket up, "But you also understand me, and you treat others with kindness and make them feel included. There are things you do that I admire. There are a lot of things about you that make me…" She trailed off, sighing again.

"I hear ya," He pressed his forehead to hers, "I didn't mean to go so fast. I just really want to."
"I know you do."

"Think you can sleep?"

"Maybe. Where did all of the ice packs go?"

"I have no idea. Do you need them?"

"Eh, maybe in the morning." She yawned and tucked herself into his side, happily ignoring the still very obvious erection.

"Hm." Sato secured his arms around her, "Sweet dreams, Tama."

After drifting in a sublime state of cuddling, letting consciousness trickle away, Sato was able to dream with sharp clarity. He dreamed of something he had forgotten many months ago in the Land of Rain. He could recall a unique feeling he had purged from his memory.

He could remember dying.

The pain had not lasted. Maybe it was a small mercy that the man with the piercings, that soulless, odd-eyed Akatsuki member had been quick about it. That when he had been crushed into the earth with ferocious force, Sato remembered his senses had all blurred into one sense, and that sense rattled in a high frequency ring that petered off as his brain and its accompanying chemicals could no longer service his heart.

And the high frequency absorbed him into an unknowable place where, a few scant centimeters from his face, there was a giant wall of white light. It stretched up, down, left, and right infinitely. Sato wondered if he was really seeing it, or was close enough to seeing the wall of light with whatever sense dead people could boast in the beyond. But he first noted the lack of feeling: no feeling of the rain and mud on his skin, not his wounds, nor anything of the sort. For the longest time it had felt like he had stood in the vast, bright void wondering at the wall and the nothingness that echoed around him.

He touched the wall and it felt like glass and water and electricity, or something he could never describe as a mortal, only to know that it could be experienced in one or more senses. It was impassable. Sato realized it would not let him pass because he saw, on the opposite side, himself with his hand pressed to the wall of light: a living reflection.

He looked with all of his might at his reflected self, able to see the man there age; see the microscopic cell-turnover, hair growth, steadily growing taller and changing as time no longer mattered in the dimension he spectated in. And the 'reflected Sato' lost interest, walking along the mortal side of the wall, growing older, grinning and joking, stopping to cavort with friends as their images came and went, fighting battles and leading others.

It was maddening torture, running along the wall of light, his hand skimming, trying to keep up with what had been left behind, or what was leaving him behind. The possibility outpaced him; that life kept living without him, seeing his reflection walking as a middle-aged adult alongside Shino, cooler and more level-headed. Watching that reflection of his run and scoop up a small, silver-haired girl onto his shoulders, and Tama beside them with her hand raised for a high-five from their daughter, keeping a toddler boy tucked on her hip.

And their lives spun on and on, their cells multiplied, the children grew, they became older and frailer, and there were flaws, pains, regrets, and imperfections in that life…and he still wanted it. Now faced with the impossible, the dead boy wanted that life as it flickered away and disappeared. from the wall. And there was only vast white to feel, see, smell, and hear. Nothing at all worth wanting.

He would become the void, and it was peaceful and perfect, and it was also none of those things. It destroyed identity that mortals frantically tried to craft with their borrowed time, and molded all life back into its primordial state.

Then, as suddenly as he had appeared in the vast, empty, full place, he had left it. He was screaming, because no human body could interpret the landslide signals of pain that welcomed him back to life. Bones broken, organs sundered; bled and destructed to a point that addled his brain and spirit so fiercely that staying awake was a silly task. His brain had been too kind. It shut off.

Sato sat up without opening his eyes initially, first rubbing at them vigorously with the backs of his knuckles. He dropped his hands into his lap and stared into the darkness of the room, making absolutely sure it was not that damned wall of light and the nothingness that came with it. He wished he could forget it again, but Sato knew he never would.

Tama's head rose sleepily from her pillow, assessing his anxious state, and she pawed at him until he flopped down again with a quaking breath. She pulled him close and he pressed his head into the hollow of her neck and chest, gradually calming down.

He was asleep for no more than ten minutes before the pounding on the apartment door started up.

Groaning in aggravation, Sato reluctantly peeled himself away from Tama, replacing the quilt around her as he hauled himself to his feet. The clock readout shone 11:51PM as he padded down the hallway, through the living area, and wrenched the door open. Sai was standing there with a fist raised to knock again.

Sato blinked blearily, "Something the matter, Sai?"

"No. No matter at all." They stood in an enduring, awkward silence before Sai guessed, "Were you asleep, Hatake-san?"

"I was." Sato rubbed his chin and stifled a yawn.

"I apologize. I don't know anyone who goes to sleep at this hour."

"Damn right you don't. You need to socialize with normal citizens for a change."

Sai handed Sato a laminated flier and explained, "For the party, tomorrow. I was asked to invite finalists and other diverse guests. I just finished speaking with Buns upstairs."

"Buns?"

"The kunoichi Weapons Master."

"O-Oh! Tenten."

"She agreed that she would be in attendance with Ladyhair and Superbrows. It is a celebration the Hokage put together to thank finalists for their hard work, prior to the Tournament."

"Wouldn't it make more sense to celebrate after the Exam?"

"Hokage-sama explained that if you and other participants were in states of incapacitation or other injury after your matches that not much celebrating could occur, and so she moved the date up."
"Huh." Sato managed to read the text of the flier with late-night eyes, reading that the festival was set two days before the Final Rounds commenced. He held up the paper and inquired, "Are you going to this, Sai?"

"I am. I was appointed to supervise and prevent unsanctioned activities."

"That'll be good, I guess. You can meet some people this way."

"Hokage-sama said that too."

A sound caught their attention and they craned their necks to see Tama emerge from the corridor of the apartment: all legs and a bit of t-shirt, and she was curious as to what had stolen her bedmate.

Sai gave a flat look to his neighbor, "Sleeping, you say?"

Peeved, Sato warningly hushed Sai as they greeted Tama politely, apologizing for the late night disturbance. She was intrigued by the idea of a Chunin Exam meet-and-greet, glimpsing over the flier.

"This park is close by the Han Ethnic Quarter. I've performed there before." Tama noted, "It's advertising food, games, and music…but…you don't think this could escalate or cause visitors to act crazy? A lot of out-of-towners will be in our village to watch the Tournament."

"Well, Sai said he was part of the security detail, so they probably won't allow alcohol or illicit substances. We're not going to see a rave or anything like that." He lingered on the thought longingly, "But…it would be cool if they had glow-sticks."

"I could put in a request with the Hokage." Sai suggested, "For alcohol, illicit substances, and glow sticks."

Sato nearly balked, "Uh…we can go without the first two, Sai."

"The Hokage has an appetite for alcohol and illicit substances, and she confirmed she will be attending. The third request is for you."

In the daylight hours that followed, Sakura capitalized on the free time her friends had recovered. She rounded a corner with Ino in tow and pointed her towards Matsuri. In the precious few moments before Gaara could descend the stairs of his apartment, Ino had snatched his student and swept her off to lunch with kunoichi peers. Sakura would have to thank her later.

Gaara stood on the side walk and swiveled his head left and right, perplexed. It was unlike Matsuri to rush off without alerting him first. He might have dwelled on this unusual occurrence had he not spotted Sakura ambling on the opposite side of the road. As was only natural, he crossed over to her. He thought to himself that maybe Sakura's appearance was not a coincidence.

"Good morning, Gaara." Her smile morphed into an expression of disbelief as she beheld his rare change of outfit: the dusky crimson shirt he had changed into tapered into short, fishnet sleeves. She could just barely detect, beneath the white fabric sash draped and tied 'round his shoulder and hips, the deep 'v' of the top, and the glimpse of pale skin. The black pants and sandals were practical, purposefully casual, and she discerned that Gaara was actively trying to shed his Kazekage persona for the time being.

He tapped a finger against her chin, "Good morning," Gaara added astutely, "Have you disposed of my student, Sakura?"
"Not quite. I saw Ino shepherd her off for lunch, though."

"We only had time to train early in the day. Matsuri agreed to visit the novice Genin team she befriended this afternoon."

"Then give her a day off, hm? You ground her down for three weeks. Just trust her." Sakura encouraged, and as she set off walking he tagged along. "Besides, Matsuri will want to go to the festival tonight. Finalists were invited, and some others were too, I heard."

"By extension I assume I am welcome?"

She tilted her head in delight, "I hope you'll go! If you can make the time..."

"I'll go." He consented, "Though what purpose it serves is beyond my grasp."

"Tsunade-shishou wanted to thank us for our hard work. We get to socialize with participants who dropped out of the Exam but still have their visas to spectate the Final Round."

"That may reduce any lingering hostilities...or it might not."

"We'll see. Shishou will be there too."

The sun was blisteringly bright. Squinting past the window glare of shops and eateries, Sakura made an attempt to direct Gaara to a luncheonette (their hands entwined) and then stopped dead in her tracks.

Gaara looked at her curiously, "What is—?"

"Sakura!" A woman had spotted them. Gaara half-recognized her.

A strangled noise escaped Sakura as she bowed her head and her shoulders tensed, caught in her mother's sights as the woman darted over to them with a canvas bag full of groceries.

"So, today must be the day..." Her mother, Haruno Mebuki, grinned at them and judged them simultaneously, "This is him, isn't it? Well, Sakura, go on and introduce me!"

"Mother." Sakura hissed. Her brain was snarled, having taken as many measures as possible to prevent an awkward encounter, 'Murphy's Law...’ and unwittingly walked into one as if it were destiny. Mebuki had once seen Gaara up-close when he delivered Sakura to safety after the Retrieval Mission, 'And she screamed at him to get lost, Dad said.' But of course she wanted formalities to be respected now that her daughter was, ah-hem, the object of a Kage's desire.

Gaara's expression was even and unperturbed.

He waited until Sakura worked out of her internal tantrum and she spoke again, "Hi Mom, well... since we're here...this is Gaara; my boyfriend and the Fifth Kazekage of the Sand Village." Sakura exhaled when she added, "Gaara, this is my mother."

"A pleasure to meet you." His eyes shut as he briefly inclined his head. "I have wanted to meet you for some time now, Haruno-san, but my duties have detained me."

"Oh Kazekage-sama, don't be silly. I was looking forward to this, but I understand how busy you've been. And please," Her tone straddled the knife's edge of acerbic and sugary, "Call me Mebuki."

Sakura's soul nearly left her body. Her capacity for humiliation was blown-out, the meter shot of the scale, kaput, and Gaara was sportingly pleasant and cool as he stood beside her, speaking to her mother as if she was not the most embarrassing person in the universe and everyone knew it.

'How does he do it?' Sakura was trapped in silence, and somewhere in her mind she was hugging Inner Sakura tightly for moral support.

"Gaara-sama, would you please join me and my family for lunch? I just picked up a few ingredients and my husband is home. I know Sakura has no responsibilities scheduled, either…"

'Make a sound. Any sound. Protest!' Sakura couldn't. She couldn't stop it.

"Of course."

'Gaara has lost his mind.' She turned her head rigidly and leveled a glare at her boyfriend's face. He was pointedly not reading her signals. Why was he okay with this? Why could they not enjoy a private meal in peace?

Then, insanely, they were walking. They were walking to the Haruno household and Sakura could not muster up the strength or indignation to stop it.

Her mind rushed through a kaleidoscope of uncomfortable sequences she was unprepared for. They then set foot in the house, Mebuki first, and removed their shoes while sharing an agonizingly slow glance. Agonizing for Sakura, at least. Gaara, with his black-ringed eyes, made a face at her: You need to stop fretting. Everything is alright.

She shook her head at him. As she was the foremost authority on her mother's overbearing behaviors, Sakura truly begged to differ.

"Come inside, welcome!" Mebuki ushered her daughter and the Kazekage over to a low table, turning to Kizashi who was seated there with a deer-in-the-headlights expression, "Dear, look! Sakura's brought by the Kazekage, Gaara-sama—"

A weak intervention from Sakura: "Actually, you invited—"

Mebuki continued speaking over her daughter, "We were just talking about how we wanted to have him over, weren't we, Kizashi?" She gave a nonverbal cue to her husband as if daggers would fire out of her cornea.

"Uh, y-yes…I believe we were." Kizashi smoothly, and confoundedly, confirmed, "It's nice to meet you in person, Gaara-sama, if you don't mind me calling you that." He bowed his head without moving to stand, and ushered for the youngsters to sit, "It's a bit short-notice of you to stop by, though. I thought you might be preoccupied at a time like this."

"My schedule opened up unexpectedly." He sat beside Sakura, still composed, "For that I am grateful. Please call me Gaara, Kizashi-san."

"Sure, but only if you scrap the formalities. I'm just Kizashi." The pink-haired man turned to his wife, who was hovering anxiously, "Mebuki, would you like Sakura to help you prepare lunch, or-?"

"Oh, no, no! I only need a bit more time to finish up. All of you relax for now and get to know each other." Her smile crackled with electric energy, and then she hustled into the kitchen with her canvas bag.

Sakura finally took a breath and dropped her forehead into the palm of her hand.
Kizashi lowered his voice and asked, "Did she drag you back here?"

"Yes." Sakura muttered.

"Yeah…she's been dead-set on this introduction for weeks." His expression was playful as he whispered to Gaara, "That's Mebuki for you. She runs a tight ship. Sakura sometimes says that she a-sails people with her personality."

Sakura flattened her hands on the table, "Dad. Please, even if it's just for today…don't make any puns."

"Too late! Already did." Kizashi turned brightly to Gaara, "You liked that one didn't ya?"

"I didn't hate it." Gaara was roundly ambivalent. Sakura thanked her lucky stars for that.

"Right, I can do better." Kizashi frowned to himself and scratched at his beard, "So I suppose you're here to spectate the Tournament, am I right? Who looks after Sunagakure while you're away?"

"I appointed my older sister and brother to manage the office while I'm here. They are very capable." Gaara added, "I look forward to watching Sakura and my student compete in the Final Round."

"Ah! Your student is also a finalist? Very impressive. And your siblings sound like they know their stuff…” Kizashi chuckled to himself and folded his arms, "But I wonder who you'll root for if Sakura has to face your student in a later match?"

Gaara did not take the bait dangling in front of him and said nothing, not willing to confess to favoritism.

"Dad, that isn't fair." Sakura warned, "There's no reason for him to choose."

The man simpered, "Sure there is! He's only dating you, as far as I know. You should be the preference! But I get it. I won't stir the pot. Just poking a bit of fun..." He turned back to Gaara, "You seem very calm and collected, Gaara. It's no wonder that you're a responsible leader." Kizashi rubbed at his chin again, "I can see why Sakura likes you so much."

"Thank you." He accepted the compliment.

And while the two chatted peaceably, Sakura canted her head and regarded the two most important men in her life. They're...mostly compatible. They can talk. Ugh, I went into a panic when Mom was, well, Mom…but Dad…he's really easy to get along with. She dared take a breath of relief, 'And Gaara's more social and glib than he was a few years ago. He's grown so much. Gaara probably won't be bothered by Dad's jokes...especially if I take into account he had Naruto for all those years!'

"I'm a bit curious, since you didn't mention it, but…” Sakura's attention drifted back to the conversation as her father asked, "What's your surname, Gaara?"

It gave Gaara pause. His family's name almost carried like a title, at least where he came from, and when Gaara thought a bit more on it…his surname had a ring to it not unlike the Haruno family name. He realized, a bit late, that just as Sakura's name was a play on words, so too had he been named.

"Sabakuno." Gaara supplied simply, "My father was Sabaku no Rasa, the first of our line."

"Ah…a newer family name, I see. Yes, that's right." Kizashi thoughtfully snapped his fingers, "Your father was the Fourth Kazekage. Hmm…and that name…” A grin tugged at his lips, "Would be kind of funny…"

Sakura pointed a finger in the man's face, hoping to halt him, "Don't-!"

"It'd be funny if Sakura went from a spring field to sand, wouldn't it? Merely a change of scenery-!"

Sakura stood on her knees and seized Kizashi by his shoulders while he laughed, "Quit it, Dad! I swear—"

"Heh, heh…Sakura, if you got married, imagine! Your name wouldn't change syntactically—"

Before she could lunge forward in a newly ignited fit of embarrassment, Gaara placed his hand on her arm and eased her back into her seat. He shrugged it off. She sat and wondered if her ears were smoking like a chimney stack.

"Yes, she would become a desert flower. Not to put ideas in your head, of course." Kizashi gave a blasé nod to Gaara.

Gaara appeared to be thinking about something, but Kizashi pressed on whilst Mebuki summoned Sakura into the kitchen with a harpy-like shriek.

"Sorry. I am told that I'm a chatterbox, and I can get on my daughter's nerves sometimes. Probably not as much as her mother does, but…” The man smiled warmly, "This is our family. It's a bit silly, don't you think? But we are all that is left of our spring-loving, pink-headed kinfolk. My younger brother died long ago on a mission. Ah, and Mebuki has two sisters, if you're wondering. One married and moved to Tsukigakure, some years back. She lost touch with us…” Kizashi rested his chin on his folded hands, "And my sister-in-law who remains in Konoha, Kaika…she's a real spitfire." He began to laugh wildly and Gaara wondered if he would, or more thoughtfully should, meet the person Kizashi was describing.

"That's all of us." Kizashi nodded, "Now tell me a little about your family."

"It's…a very broken family." Gaara admitted.

"Doesn't matter to me. It's still yours, isn't it?"

They fell quiet and listened to the sounds of Mebuki and Sakura bickering in the kitchen, finalizing the meal.

"My eldest sibling is Temari, and my brother, the middle child, is Kankuro." He relaxed gradually as he spoke, "I was the third child born to my parents, Rasa and Karura. My mother's brother was Yashamaru, and my uncle looked after me for a time after my mother died."

Kizashi nodded thoughtfully, his face serenely propped in his hand.

"Without mother…I could tell that no one was happy. Not my siblings, my father, nor my uncle. I was a constant reminder of the gaping hole she had left." Gaara was surprised by the statement, as if he was only just discovering it, "For that, and some…other reasons…my childhood was turbulent. I ran away from my village."

"You must have been young…” Kizashi supposed, stroking his beard.

"Not quite old enough to attend the Academy. I was discovered by Jiraiya of the Legendary Three in a tourist town in the Fire Country, and he delivered me to Konoha, where he hoped I could thrive."

He omitted some details but rounded the tale off, "And while I lived here, my two friends and fellow orphans became my brothers as well. Uzumaki Naruto and Haku."

"Yes, I know. Sakura speaks of them very fondly!"

"Now that my father and uncle have passed on…the support of my brother and sister has reunited us in Suna. We are glad to be together again."

Kizashi shook his head, a bit stirred by the story, "Hm, that's a heartfelt memoir, I'll say…the Kazekage has had a long journey. I don't think it ends there, either." His eyes twinkled, "I'm sure…Sakura is special to you as well."

Gaara nodded in reply because there was no use in forming words to try to describe it. Sakura's presence in his life was a tremendous and treasured privilege.

Following that, Mebuki and Sakura began to make trips to the table with bowls and dishes of food; not speaking in the dining room and then resuming their hushed argument in the kitchen.

With the table set, the women sat down beside their respective male companions. Mebuki gave a sharp look to her daughter which conveyed a message, and with a restrained grumble, Sakura reached for a pitcher of cold tea. She poured for Gaara first, muttering, "Chilled oolong and lemon…"

He thanked her as she poured for her parents next. They expressed thanks for the meal, and then Mebuki rambled on about the dishes she had made.

"I hope most of it is to your liking! That's cold soba in front of you, and I set the dipping sauce there, try it! Perfect for summer. Hm, hm! Oh, and my sister grew these vegetables. They're my favorite marinated with this sesame flavor—"

Sakura tried to derail it, "Mom—"

"And here, some octopus, at Kizashi's request—"

"…Mom."

"—do you care for edamame? I grilled some chicken and onions—"

There was a slightly worried look on Kizashi's face. No one was eating yet.

"Also there's-!"

"Mom." Sakura barked, and a vein bulged near her temple as she spoke, "Let him eat. Please, just let him try something first!"

"Oh." Mebuki settled down and shrunk into her seat, "Goodness, I'm sorry. I got worked up."

"Don't worry dear; we're all going to enjoy it." Kizashi's smile was genuine and disarming.

Almost immediately, there was a noisy slurp as Gaara tried the noodles as instructed. It drew three surprised stares.

He gave a quick assessment, "Indeed…perfect for summer."

Mebuki beamed at him.
After lunch and conversation about achievements, work, leisure, family, hobbies, and ‘does the desert have any seasons at all?’ the meal ended, and Sakura proceeded to clear the dishes from the table. Mebuki politely excused herself and asked Kizashi to meet her in the study at the end of the hall. She seemed contemplative.

Gaara was not sure what to think of the abrupt departure of Sakura's parents. To keep busy, he assisted in putting away leftovers and reordering the kitchen.

"Thank you." The pinkette sighed, "I hope they weren't overbearing…"

"They pale in comparison to the attitudes I deal with at my Village Council."

"Huh! And I thought I had a thick skin."

He supposed, "Not as thick as sand armor, but I could lend it to you if you wished."

"No thanks. That'd tire me out." She scrubbed a large serving bowl at the sink and looked over her shoulder at him, "Is it heavy? I mean, when you cover yourself with sand for defense?"

"It is."

"You don't get tired?"

"I'm used to it." Gaara stood beside her and dried plates as they came clean, "Other things tire me out."

"Like what?"

"Overdoing it at the office. Genin that protest the missions I assign. Elders." He added sincerely, "And not being able to see you as often as I'd like."

"I know. But you can always request me for a mission, when there's an opportunity. I'd never object."

Gaara smiled to himself, "I know. That only works if the Hokage is willing, of course."

"Yeah…Shishou can be a pain in the neck about it."

A piercing shout made them slow in their work. Mebuki and Kizashi's discussion at the far end of the house had increased in volume. Sakura groaned in dread, hoping to never know what it was about, or that her parents had not outright condemned her choice of a boyfriend.

Perhaps the choice to update the Haruno's home last year to central heating and cooling made this moment in time worse. The voices of two sparring parents carried through the ventilation and echoed out from an air vent on the wall. Sakura beseeched Gaara with her eyes to please, please go to the restroom, go to the family room, go stick his head in between sofa cushions to drown out the noise. Anything so that he wouldn't listen to this…

But they stood near the refrigerator like two masochists, as the voices drifted up from a low vent for them to hear.

"Mebuki, there's no need…"

"-don't pretend. Kizashi, that you do not understand what I mean! What will happen if this continues? A Kazekage can't just leave his post to come live here, just because he loves our daughter. He won't do it. We can't ask him to."
"Then surely Sakura can—"

"No! It's absurd. It's cruel and selfish to ask our only child, our child, Kizashi— to settle down in the desert, where she has no immediate family to support her. Who would help her if there's a falling out, hm? Who will care for her then? Who is there for her when she's sad and alone, or when she's too exhausted to make herself a meal after a mission— and her spouse is stuck in an office! What kind of life is that? She'll be sitting in empty rooms most days, and we'll be here... here m-missing her!"

"Mebuki..." Kizashi's tone was consoling.

"Please know... that I'm happy. I'm happy Sakura has a stable relationship, with someone truly remarkable. But I can't. I can't abide the idea of missing the events of my daughter's life because she lives in another country. I always dreamed of being there to see her happy. You know how hard it is... for me... when she goes away. Even for a little while, on her missions... I-I..."

"Now, now... it's so easy for you to worry when you don't have your hands guiding every little thing, my dear. This is not something you can control and you know it. It's hard. Of course it is, because I feel the same way."

"H-How... can you not... worry?"

"I do. I just do it a bit more quietly. By the way, try to keep it down or they'll hear... that'd be embarrassing."

Mebuki was hiccupping.

"It seems to me... that Gaara is very accommodating and generous, especially when it comes to our daughter. Don't be so sure that he won't arrange something to make it easier for her, and us, to be together as a family. If that is the decision they make at some point in time, try to have some trust in someone like him." Kizashi chuckled, "Really... Sakura could have chosen much worse here in Konoha."

A sniffle, "She could have..."

"He's a bit unusual looking, isn't he?"

"Those eyes." Mebuki agreed.

"Quite unique. I didn't feel it was polite to ask but I sure am curious!"

"Well, you're the man with pink hair. You: trying to comment on other's appearances. At any rate... save those questions for another day." Mebuki exhaled and composed herself, "I'm sorry about this, dear. I just had to get my feelings out. I nearly exploded before the end of lunch; so many emotions had built up."

"I understand. Sakura's a lot like you, in that respect."

"But really... she's most like her father..." Her voice was tender.

The door down the corridor clicked open and Sakura mechanically resumed doing the dishes, not saying a word as Gaara continued the drying next to her. Somehow, they'd have to play it off like they weren't eavesdropping pieces of trash worried about what parents thought of them.

Mebuki hurried over to interrupt Sakura's work, "Darling, I'm sorry, please let me wash these. You've done more than enough today. I just had to share some thoughts with your father."
She looked at her mother with shiny eyes, "Is everything alright, Mom?"

"Everything is." Mebuki smiled warmly, "I guess I'm just excited." She turned to look at Gaara, "Maybe I assumed too quickly that the Kazekage would be aloof and proud...that we'd have to posture and impress today...but he's quite a bit like us!"

Gaara set aside one last, fully dried dipping bowl, "I want to be. If you meet the rest of my family...you will discover they act like clowns."

"Thank goodness." Kizashi chorused at the thought.

Mebuki asked Sakura to accompany her across town to deliver food set aside for Auntie Kaika, hoping it would not inconvenience Gaara. For once, the request seemed optional.

Gaara could see that Sakura had softened, that her empathy had compelled her to touch and hug her mother, to react to her with understanding and sensitivity.

He noted, "I will be at the festival this evening and I can rejoin Sakura there. Don't let me interrupt any tasks you need to finish today."

Sakura thanked him and assisted her mother in packing a basket before they set out. Shortly afterward, Kizashi cheerfully led Gaara to the door as he was set to be on his way.

Bowing was customary, but Kizashi extended his hand and firmly shook with Gaara.

"Don't worry! Mebuki likes you. She's just an emotional bottle-rocket."

"Understandable."

"Hope you didn't hear our chat back there. It got a bit loud."

"Not at all. Sakura and I were talking while we cleaned."

"Ah, good." Kizashi twitched his nose, "Honestly, I like you too. I'm really glad you were able to drop by. Come over anytime! I could talk all day."

"Perhaps tomorrow. There will be a lull before the Tournament, which commences the day after."

"Good, good! Hmm, the Kazekage's been a real sport about all of this. And you know..." Kizashi opened the front door and lingered in the doorway, thoughtful, "I've really known you since you were a school kid. I came by the Academy all the time to watch Sakura train in the yards. I knew who you were."

"Ah." Gaara was not sure how to respond.

"You wanted to spend time with her then, too."

"I did." He would never deny it.

"So..." He grinned, "Did you always have a crush on my little girl? Was Sakura the only one for you?"

Gaara regarded him blankly for a long moment before he exited the house, stopping on the top step. He turned around and finally confessed to favoritism, "Even before the Academy...she was the only one."
"Hah! You have good taste, my man. She's my pride and joy." Kizashi was bubbling with laughter, "And I just can't help but like you because she likes you. Sakura and I are very similar, as you know. I hope someday you'll let her be your pride and joy too. You know…show her off for the entire world to see."

Gaara nodded slowly, the corners of his mouth curving up at the notion.

He pointed a finger at Gaara, suddenly serious, "No funny business at that festival, though. A Kage has quite an image to uphold."

"I'll be sure to tell the Hokage that when I see her later."

"Ha!" Kizashi was bubbling over again and wiped a tear from his eye, "I know, right? Sakura has told me…ho, ho," As he shut the door Gaara heard him say, "This guy's a riot."

Evening sunbeams skipped over rooftops like stones across a lake. The park that was south of the Han Ethnic Quarter began to bustle as the sun sank; its paths illuminated with hollow, glowing sculptures and string lights criss-crossing above stands. Though not a proper summer festival, some depictions of deities, animals, and shinobi had been pulled from storage and set aglow, lining the walkways and lawns.

Shikamaru asked Chouji to mind his step when he nearly tripped over wires laying across pavement, not yet secured by gaffing tape.

"What's all of this for? I thought we'd have taiko drums and flutes, you know, like usual?" Chouji wondered at a distant stage where amplifiers and band instruments were being tended to.

"It's not time for Leaf's Obon festival yet. The Hokage meant for this to be a smaller celebration." Shikamaru eyed the stage, unimpressed, "Something tells me there was no budget for quality entertainment."

"We got here early; don't be so quick to judge." Ino shooed them along towards game and food stands, "The music probably won't suck."

"Psh!" Shikamaru stuck his hands in his pockets, doubtful.

They were side-tracked briefly by the endless selection of food-on-sticks at a small, tented vendor, then proceeded past some juvenile games: "Hm, Shika, want to scoop me a goldfish?"

"Not particularly."

Chouji pointed out other scoop-it or throw-this-ball kiddie attractions…until down the line of games the tasks became more suited for ninja.

"Hit a target on a motor-spun wheel with a shuriken, win adorable knick-knacks!" Ino's face lit up. All three of them successfully attempted the game and walked off with porcelain idols and statues to stick on a shelf in their bedrooms and forget about.

"Huh, looks like Lee won't be leaving that chin-up test game anytime soon…" Chouji noted as they passed it by, overhearing as Lee was up to 109 chin-ups, and had probably just arrived minutes before them. Chouji supposed, "I guess Tenten and Neji should be here too?"

"I'll bet. Look! There's Hinata at the seating area." Ino hauled her teammates along by their wrists, full-steam ahead towards friends gathering at picnic tables situated beneath tall maple trees.
They passed a large, covered pavilion that had several fans blowing to keep guests cool. Naturally, Tsunade was seated there in a comfortable chair, lining up a variety of drinks, snacks, and diversions on a table that she would enjoy (and probably not share) that night. Tenzo, in his civilian garb, loitered near the entrance of the tent and made small talk with other veteran ninja inquisitively poking around the festival.

The picnic tables to the left of the pavilion had attracted the Finalists as well as many Exam drop-outs who had returned to socialize and watch the Tournament. Beyond a wide space for dancing and foot-traffic was the band stage, and beside it was a raised booth for a DJ, "That's a low vote of confidence in the band they hired…" Ino appraised. She took a bite of a chocolate covered banana on a stick and then greeted their friends, "Hinata! Cute dress. Hi Shino."

"Thank you, Ino-chan." Hinata scooched over, closer to Shino, ushering Ino to sit. Chouji and Shikamaru took the seats across the table from them and continued inhaling fried foods, "I'm happy to see you here! It was a bit awkward with so many…" She trailed off.

"What?" Shikamaru picked up on it, "All of these Exam participants you guys have creamed are back and trying to make nice? Yeah. It's only natural for them to kiss some ass at events like these."

Ino and Chouji had a good laugh at the thought, and Hinata cupped her mouth in her hands and looked around shiftyly. The Grass kunoichi she had defeated, Guena, was at the next table over beside her Finalist teammate, Aota. They seemed to be making friendly conversation with Leaf inhabitants who had dropped by, also stuffing their faces. Their sensei Mahoto was in attendance and had a small boy riding atop his shoulders, likely his child.

Ino took it upon herself to get visual confirmation on the rest of their cohort. Neji and Tenten were now trying to usher Lee away from the game he was dominating while a line of complaining festival-goers had accumulated. Eventually, they had whisked him along to a balance-the-plate-on-a-pole game where, judging by Tenten's expression, the prizes were not worth the stupidity. Neji veered away towards grilled herring and squid. Tenten cursed as Lee dragged her onward.

Gaara's student, Matsuri, appeared in a fit of laughter as she spoke to Konohamaru and his teammates, joined by younger peers and— "No," Ino tapped Hinata's shoulder, "Is that your sister over there? Socializing normally?"

Hinata nodded, "Yes! Hanabi will be competitive and blunt with them…but she does try to make friends."

"Huh. I thought I was going nuts." Ino accepted the cup of lemonade Chouji handed her, "Thanks Chouji. And…where is…?" She craned her neck around in search of her own rival. Hinata giggled and pointed toward a crowd-favorite game.

A wide-mouthed, shocked smile spread on Ino's face, "That's not! That is. What is Sakura doing?"

She stood up to take a look at Sakura squaring off against Kiba in mock sumo suits, lambasting each other in faux-pudgy buffoonery as they laughed and squealed like school children. Akamaru circled the ring while barking. Shikamaru glanced towards the attraction and snorted quietly, amused.

"Oh my gosh." Ino took a seat, grinning, "That kind of…no, that definitely looks fun."

"I want to try it too!" Hinata chirped in delight, "Shino-kun, will you please consider joining me for that game?"

"Sato would be better suited." Her friend peeked at her over his glasses with sharp hazel eyes, as if to implore: Do not make me. For your sake I would agree, but I would hate every moment of it…
Hinata understood. She sighed, "Sato-kun isn't here yet, and neither is—"

"Hold up! They're over there!" Chouji pointed out the couple who was last to arrive, rounding the corner of a storage tent. They were dressed for summer weather as everyone else was, but their clothing was what Chouji described as "That edgy, Hip-Hop stuff."

"They must plan to dance." Hinata tapped her lips with a finger, "I hope music will start soon. I'd enjoy dancing."

Shino breathed a sigh of relief, expecting that she would not coax him into the sumo game.

Sato reached them and loudly greeted his friends, while Tama was more reasonable with her wave and smile.

"You all got stuff to eat, I see…" Sato noted, eyeing each morsel, "What's recommended?"

"Anything on a stick." Ino advised, "Shika got mackerel somewhere, I don't know, but that's what he always wants. Check it out over there— it's like Neji can't quit it with the herring. Huh. It's got to be good." She glanced down at the beverage in her hand, "And not to alarm anyone, but…this is spiked. Good, but spiked."

"Excuse me?" Chouji sputtered, surprised, "I got it at the pavilion that Tsunade-sama is sitting in! Are you sure-?"

"That just makes me more sure." Ino shook her head, "Do you know how much booze she has hoarded in there? Her security guard must have rounded up everything 'unapproved' and given it to her. Seems like some of it got back into the wrongs hands…” She took another merry sip, "Hm! I'm not going anywhere tonight. Might as well savor this!"

Shikamaru and Chouji leveled stern expressions at her that lasted a full six seconds before they too partook of the unsanctioned lemonade. Shino declared something in his cup was not even close to what he had asked for, and he handed it off to Sato to test it.

"Yeesh." Sato batted his lips, "I'm not sure…"

When passed to Tama, she readily identified it, "Whiskey. Whoa, how are they slipping this out? This isn't even mixed well."

Sakura and Kiba joined the group after their skirmish and were greeted, given snacks, and promptly informed to beware of liquids. Shikamaru voiced that if they chose to drink, "Do it responsibly. Don't play any weapon-throwing or other risky games later. Sumo's probably fine."

"Probably hilarious." Ino concurred.

Unceremoniously, Sai approached the table and dropped a cardboard box onto it. They hastily saved their snacks and drinks from tipping. Sai then stood there like a well-animated mannequin with limited manners. "Hello." He managed.

"Sai!" Sato was a helpful liaison, "Everyone, this is Sai. He's my neighbor from across the hall at our apartment complex. I don't know if he's met most of us, so…” He pointed down the line at his friends, "Sai, these are my friends! This is Hyuga Hinata, but I just call her Sunshine."

Sai nodded at Hinata, "Hello Sunshine."

"Then my best friend, Aburame Shino. And here we have Nara Shikamaru, Akimichi Chouji, Yamanaka Ino…" Sai's stare lingered on Ino as Sato went on. "Inuzuka Kiba, and this is Haruno Sakura. I think Neji's team is still hanging by the games, but you've said you've met them already."

"It is good to meet you all." Sai parroted a phrase that Tenzo had taught him to use. Eventually, he would be able to superficially judge each of his new acquaintances to come up with nicknames that suited them.

While his eyes were still magnetized towards Ino, Sakura grimaced and waved a hand in front of Sai's face, "Is he alright? If he'd been staring at me for that long I would have stuffed him into a kick drum by now."

"Sorry. He's not well-socialized yet. Sai just joined the standard forces after being raised and trained by the Foundation." Sato elaborated, steering Sai away from Team Asuma before Shikamaru could begin to bristle. Kiba and Akamaru gave Sai a curious passing sniff each.

"Tsunade-shishou mentioned that to me." Sakura acknowledged, nodding, "I didn't know ninja from the Root Foundation…were like this."

"They might be worse." Tama supposed in a whisper, "Sai calls me Legs."

Sakura snickered.

Tama changed the subject and addressed Sai, "It's good to see you, Sai. What's in that box?"

Sai reached over and pulled the cardboard flaps back for all gathered to peer inside. It was filled to the brim with glow-sticks and glow-in-the-dark accessories.

"Kind of unexpected, but cool." Chouji decided.

"Oh yeah! You got 'em!" Sato was pleased.

"Yes, and Hokage-sama is now in possession of everything else requested." Sai noted, meaning the illicit substances.

"Well, so are we." Shikamaru clarified, "Who's sneaking alcohol out of the pavilion?"

Sai shrugged. He really did not care.

Kiba pointed out that glow-sticks would be of no use until after sunset, but spread the word to other guests in the picnic area that they were welcome to take what they wanted.

And in the few minutes after that the park became busier, more densely packed with people, and Sakura had begun turning in circles hoping to get a glimpse of Gaara, 'Where is he?" Kiba had begun muttering with Shikamaru and Chouji about "this Sai guy" while Sai had approached Shino to engage in the most stilted, awkward conversation that had ever taken place. Ino rescued the Aburame by giving Sai an intrigued smile, quickly gaining his attention again.

"I thought only Sato liked to use nicknames." She carded her fingers down her ponytail where it cascaded over her shoulder, "Tell me how you met Sato and Tama, Sai. And how about Neji and his team?"

Shino was shocked to find that Sai became a bit more eloquent with his responses while speaking to Ino. He then batted futilely at Sato when the Hatake had begun layering glow-in-the-dark rings around his neck and head.
"You'll be the life of the party later. Just go with it, Shino." Sato assured him. He turned and began fixing glow-in-the-dark accessories to Hinata as well, "Perfect!"

"Oh!" Tama hopped in place as two grown men rushed over to her from the stage, shouting, and then wrapped their arms around her in a group hug, "You're here!"

"Little lady!" A tall brunette man in green flannel squeezed her and then stepped back, "Ready to watch our set, Tama?" He turned to Sato, "Ah, and our favorite Hatake, good to see you, man!" Sato was acquiescent with the hug given to him as well.

"Sutībun, your band's playing?" Sato's excitement was forced but believable, "And young Niiru too…you play now?"

"Nope, I sing." Niiru, in his t-shirt and jeans, spoke shyly, "Better than the rest of the band, anyway."

"Good for you, man. Nice wristbands." Sato gestured at him, "And puka shells. And stuff."

Niiru smiled and revealed he was, apparently, even younger than Sato.

Sakura held up her hands and wedged herself between Tama and the men, "Excuse me, but…who are these people?"

"They're my cousins." Tama explained sunnily, "Fudōshin Sutībun and Niiru; older brother and younger brother. They are my mother's nephews."

"Wow." Sakura blinked at them in surprise, "Nice to meet you! It's neat seeing more of your family, Tama."

Tama introduced her cousins, "Sutī-kun, Niiru-chan, this is my teammate and good friend, Sakura." The men nodded to her, "Over there is my other teammate, Kiba-kun, and there's Shino-kun, Hinata-chan, Shikamaru-kun, Chouji-kun, Ino-chan and Sai."

"Ah, great. I hope you all enjoy our set. It's just a few songs…and we can play longer if the Hokage likes it." Sutībun wilted, "But she's not crazy about our drummer and bassist, so…we'll see what happens."

"How does Tsunade-shishou know your band, exactly?" Sakura was flummoxed.

Sutībun pointed out a man and a turquoise haired woman nearby the stage, "See that guy? That's Sano. He plays bass. Sort of." He turned and noted a game stand where two women were hurling darts, "And that's Kim, our drummer. Oh hey, Niiru, look. She brought Knives tonight. Make sure you say hi."

"I-I will. Later."

Shikamaru had overheard enough and pressed Kiba down below the table, and he also ducked for good measure, "Sano…as in…Sanomune? Oga Sanomune?" Shikamaru gruffed at Chouji who was bemused by his need to hide, "He's the dumbass we had to protect for that wedding. Remember? I told you about it."

Kiba added, "Yeah…that's him alright. Damn, I can't believe he's here. To play music. This is gonna be a nightmare…"

"You don't know that yet." Ino chided them in a sing-song voice.
"Yeah, well…I just don't want to deal with him again. Make sure he doesn't see us or he'll try to be all buddy-buddy."

"Don't sweat it. He's preoccupied with Ramo and he's only here to play." Sutibun assured him, "Speaking of wives…where's Senbō gotten to?" He scratched his beard and looked around for his spouse, his eyes scouring the flow of festival revelers, "I should have said something to her before I ran over here…"

"Well as soon as you start playing…you know she'll be front and center to cheer for you." Tama encouraged, "Is it almost time?"

"Yeah, I guess." He patted Tama's muscled arm and motioned for Niiru, "Come on. Better do a sound check and get rolling." Sutibun turned to the group of Finalist ninja, "Nice to meet you and good luck at the Tournament. Have fun, Tama, Sato!" They hurried back to the stage and shouted for Sanomune to quit loafing around.

"Your cousins seem very nice." Hinata stood on Tama's opposite side, her head tilted in a puppy-like manner, "And they get along with Sato-kun!"

"Yes, Sato is kind of their crowd anyway. Maybe not musically, but for celebrating, absolutely."

Sato whispered behind the back of his hand, "It's just…their music is unrefined. It's garage-band stuff. I can't dance to it!"

Sakura and Hinata chuckled but he shook his head at them.

"Watch out." Sato warned, "It'll give you a headache."

The band assembled on stage and curious festival-goers began to accumulate. From the corner of her eye, Hinata spied Tenten and Neji entering the pavilion and greeting Tsunade. Lee was still by a game booth, his arms already full of stuffed animals he had won. She took a seat at another table with Sakura, Tama, and Sato as the low tremolo of a guitar rumbled from speakers.

The crowd made sounds of excited anticipation, and as many settled their eyes on the small front man Niiru holding onto his microphone for dear life, the drummer, Kim (the Oga clan's faithful maid) raised her sticks and bellowed into a microphone of her own. Tama smiled warily while Sato discreetly plugged his ears with his pinky fingers. Sakura's stomach dropped at the sight.

After the screamed introduction, an assault of electric trills and overpowering drums commenced, rattling the ground and the unsuspecting crowd that had gathered. Somehow, from somewhere within the pavilion tent, Sakura could hear Tsunade decrying the show and expressing her regret of hiring a (nearly) free act.

Hinata pressed her face into Sakura's shoulder for solace, asking, "What is a…Sex Bob-Omb? And why do they call themselves that?"

Sakura had to shout her reply over the din, "I think it's an obscure reference!"

"Told you!" Sato added in a shout.

There was no respite between the first song and the second, which was so shrill in its guitar riffs and weak, inaudible vocals that the crowd in front of the stage began to dissolve and set out for other parts of the festival. Tsunade's tirade continued, prompting Neji and Tenten to evacuate the tent as the Hokage's tantrum got physical. Others exited the pavilion and fled to the far side of the park to avoid the uproar.
Ino was cackling madly when she turned to Tama from her seat, shouting, "This song is called Garbage Truck? How appropriate!"

Tama sighed in weary agreement, feeling bad for her cousins, but simultaneously praying for the end.

When an empty sake bottle soared like a bullet from the pavilion, hit the stage backdrop, and exploded into a million glass shards (thankfully not striking any of the bandmates) Tenzo rushed to restrain Tsunade. Abruptly, the song was cut short and Sutībun wheezed an apology into a microphone before wrestling Sanomune off of the stage.

"That was quick." Shikamaru noted in a normal volume of voice. His friends answered in a ensemble of groans.

A minute later, Tenzo was ejected from the tent and ordered to escort the band away, "Get that other guy up there! The volunteer who knows what he's doing!" Tsunade added in a screech.

Tenzo scrambled to mediate. The band was now back stage and Sanomune was still stubbornly playing a bassline until a cable was ripped out of an amplifier. Visitors in the picnic area began talking amongst themselves and criticizing the letdown performance.

When the way was clear, Tenten and Neji joined their friends at the tables. Lee was a few paces behind them, passing out stuffed animals to revelers who were interested in them. Tenten set down a tray of takoyaki and a very large cup, "Was that supposed to be a try-out or was there a mix-up? That might have been the worst thing I've ever heard."

"That was my cousin's band." Tama confessed sadly.

Tenten tried to backpedal, "Oh! Well, not exactly the worst-!"

"I saw Oga Sanomune was playing." Neji noted, "It was hardly her cousin's fault."

Shikamaru and Kiba seconded the notion.

Lee was down to one last toy, a stuffed fox, and Hinata gladly accepted it. He added his two cents on the performance, "Sutībun-san and Niiru-san were quite good. Oga-sama may have needed a bit more practice."

"You are too gentle of a critic." Neji insisted. Lee just smiled sedately.

The team munched on the last of their shared octopus treats Tenten had the first sip of her beverage and sucked wind in surprise, setting her giant cup down. She glanced around until Ino made direct eye contact with her, smirking, "Whoa, what...what's in this? It was supposed to be some fizzy peach thing!"

Shikamaru noted, "You must have gotten that at the pavilion?"

"...yeah?"

"Someone is distributing the Hokage's booze right under her nose. Stick to the vendors outside." Ino recommended as she stole a sip of it with her straw, "Hm, seems like they confused your order with sake and a splash of fruit. Pretty good, actually."

Lee approached curiously and Tenten batted him away, "No! Er— Lee...sorry. Like Ino said, it's best if you get something to drink from a stand near the park entrance. If you had any alcohol you might…well…you know."

He sighed and nodded.

Tenten allowed Tama and Sakura indulgent sips before she whapped Sato in the face, telling him to get his own. When he turned around in defeat, Sato gasped as he watched a familiar face fill the DJ booth and begin tinkering with electronics.

"Hey! That's the, uh, Grass kid that I…I…" He pursed his lips and trailed off.

"The Grass ninja you roasted, Noé." Shikamaru recalled, "Why don't you go over and say hello? He's looking surprisingly healthy after the stunt you pulled."

"Quit it! I never meant to put him through that. Huh. It doesn't look like there's a mark on him! He got patched up pretty well…"

"He does look better." Tama agreed, "Maybe we can expect more from him as a musical talent?"

"I'm not about to get my hopes up at this point." Kiba chimed in.

"Well he seems like a knowledgeable guy." Sato defended, "I mean look at his clothes— he's like a cosplayer, or whatever those people are called. He speaks French and uses poison and swords. He's a classy guy."

"Classy?" Kiba repeated, stupefied, "He tried to poison you."

"You've tried to do worse." Sato provided an innocent reference to their past brawls.

"Yeah, you're right."

While Noé continued setting up, a lilting pop tune pinged and bounced from speakers, calming the frantic, distressed mood of the festival. Stage hands were packing up the band's instruments with dispassionate expressions. Sato and Tama ventured forth to secure their own festival food, bobbing along to the melody out of habit. Hinata helped herself to Neji's final bite of takoyaki before springing away from the bench, joining a small flock of optimists willing to shimmy to the (comparably) bearable music. She had left her fox toy beside her cousin.

Matsuri and her companions had also drifted into the open space to dance and gossip, and Hanabi had sidled up to her sister, stepping just as skillfully as Hinata.

"It was worse before," Hanabi noted, "But now this music is too happy."

"I think it's just to hold us over." Hinata supposed, "He is still preparing his…um…"

"That's a turntable and mixer." Hanabi droned in boredom.

"How do you know what they are?"

"I know about cool things that you don't."

"Ah." Hinata was tempted to press her fingers together in shame.

"But like I said, it sounds too happy. Do you want to play that sumo game with me until the DJ puts on something better?"

Sheer joy illuminated Hinata's face as she quickly raced off with her sister, who bullied others in line to make way and 'find something else to do!' so she and her sister could pull on the pudge-suits and duel. From afar, Hinata's friends watched the humorous spectacle.

"That is just..." Sato and Tama returned and sat down with food across from Neji and Tenten, "This is the best. I love watching people put those stupid things on."

"I had no idea that Hanabi would be interested in a game like that." Tenten could not look away.

"Any activity that can let her boast being the victor interests her." Neji explained. When Tenten hovered the straw of her drink beneath his face he narrowed his eyes at her, but he still took a sip. His facial expression suggested that he did not dislike it.

"It's not bad. I'll share." She set it down between them.

Tama began giggling wildly as Hinata took a running charge at her sister, "She still looks so cute! Mmheehee! Look at her go!"

Sato split that last bit of chicken on a stick with Tama, "Maybe we can play that game later?"

"I don't know. The line got so long..."

The DJ, Noé, made no announcement before testing the waters with a bubbling tune over deep bass. The syrupy pop tune faded into a heavy track with a smattering of suggestive lyrics, and Noé glanced around in concern, wondering if he had completely misinterpreted what the youth of the festival actually wanted to hear. His moment of anxiety abated. Two had left their picnic table and skipped over the open space, and as Noé squinted he recognized them.

'It's that twat who burned me!' Noé was tempted to shut the sound system off and have a hissy fit, but he continued to watch his former opponent, the Hatake, flirt and strut around the beautiful, tall girl beside him, 'This is...' Such willingness to dance actually made him, the panicking DJ, look more competent in his selection, 'Maybe I'll just...stick this one out.' The gesture of goodwill made by his Leaf opponent would not be overlooked, 'Either that or he likes this track.' And, graciously, his two teammates Aota and Guena were busy wrangling up more guests to dance and enjoy themselves.

By the time Gaara had arrived at the festival, as lanterns and string lights glowed against the hastening dark, he witnessed a strange migration of people away from the games and the ever popular sumo ring towards the space below the DJ's booth. He noticed that the only break in the dense crowd was just in front of the Hokage's pavilion. Gaara imagined she did not want to miss what everyone else was watching, 'And this music is...' Was it ever loud. A passer-by had described it as bangin.'

Gaara slipped into the pavilion tent, past some squawking, merry veterans, a pseudo-bartender and waiter, some overheated guests in front of the fan, and then stopped beside Tsunade. The Hokage was leaned over the table, watching a performance in fascination as she sipped wine. She had several unopened bottles beside her.

"Are you enjoying yourself, Hokage-sama?" Gaara folded his arms and was tempted to ridicule her.

She waved at him foggily, "'Bout time you showed up. Look at this." Tsunade motioned with her cup towards the break in the thick ring of revelers (she had ordered them to move over,) and Gaara then noticed dancing.

There was some, he would call it conformist swaying and head-nodding, among those gathered. But those were merely spectators with their eyes fully fixed on the two at the center, flitting with such skill, angling themselves with practiced, rhythmic beauty...all in synchronization to a catchy song... that would, admittedly, make him a fan too.

Gaara sighed as an afterthought, acknowledging that it was Sato, and also his comely fiancée, blatantly showing off. Tsunade was thrilled.

"If you had heard what shit the band before this DJ tried to subject us to..." She shuddered, "It would have been bad. I nearly knocked the bassist's head off his shoulders, but I ju-uuust missed." Tsunade illustrated with a pinch of her fingers, indicating her lack of aim with an empty bottle.

"Tsunade-sama, I should tell you that a Kage has an image to uphold, and you appear to be struggling."

"Oh?"

"Yes. I was advised to remain dignified as well this evening."

"And who..." She stifled a burp, "Is spouting nonsense like that? As if we Kage need to be reminded..."

"Haruno Kizashi."

"Ah." Tsunade paused and then her lips stretched into a grin, "That is indeed some advice you should take." She slapped his arm with painful strength, but his sand armor buffered it, "Good for you, you scamp! When did you meet Sakura's parents?"

"Today."

"And how did it go?" Tsunade began pouring him wine.

He made no movement to sit or accept the drink, "Very well. I think Sakura was anxious about the introduction, but they are hardly the most excitable people I've met."

"Well sure. You have that cuckoo councilman Soi in your village, and the puppet master Chiyo too, that old bag." She rumbled in amusement, "And Jiraiya and Naruto. Hm! Say, does Haku count? Has he ever acted crazy and I've just never—" A hiccup, "Noticed it?"

"Not crazy, but he does irritate me."

Tsunade nodded and her head threatened to swing off of her neck and fly away.

"Good, then...I am glad you are taking such an important step." She took a hissing breath and then nudged him along, "Now get a move on. I'm missing the entertainment. Go make out with my student or something!"

"Good night, Hokage-sama." He respectfully took his leave.

When he arrived at the sitting area his friends were clustered in (also apparently imbibing) Sakura must have spotted him from the corner of her eye. She wriggled out from between Ino and Tenten to reach him, pecking his cheek in greeting. She was decidedly sober but still enjoying herself, "You made it just in time! I haven't seen these two cut a rug like this since...I don't even know."

"A few years ago." Gaara recalled. The first time he had seen the pair's unexpected talent his jaw had dropped.

Another dance track bled through the previous before consuming the speakers, the sound of it a tug-of-war between a sweet, cotton-candy chorus and a sinister, sneering electronic refrain of lyrics rebelling against marginalization. The rave tune had rustled the crowd, many of them jumping and obscuring the performing duo from view. Sakura was about to puff in aggravation of missing out on the display, but a timely beat-drop, frenetic and nightmarish, had emboldened Tama and her silver haired hellcat to clear a picnic table and continue dancing on top of it. No one was going to miss out.

"Well!" Sakura laughed in nervous exhilaration, "They can party."

And then the two spun around and proceeded to booty-shake more fearsomely than any soul on that side of the world had ever shaken. Sakura could no longer narrate what they were seeing. Gaara watched with genuine appreciation for the athleticism necessary to go from low, butt-flexing crouches back to full height for their complex footwork. He heard Tsunade shrieking ecstatically in the pavilion.

Ino had located Hinata (timidly returning through a throng of bodies) and reeled her back towards the group, "In case you haven't heard it's called twerking. No. Normally it doesn't look this good!"

Hinata squealed and shielded her eyes. Shikamaru and the young men surrounding him (excluding silent Shino) were vacillating between hysterical laughter and true, slack-jawed admiration every few seconds. Neji was quietly processing the scene while Tenten hollered her approval, allowing him to hold onto the cup and drink as much as he needed.

Gaara leaned over Sakura's shoulder and spoke beside her ear, "Can you and I go somewhere quieter?"

"Sure! You don't want to stay a bit longer?" She would be sad to miss any escalating insanity.

He shook his head, "There is something I wanted to talk to you about. Just us two."

Sakura's eyes widened a fraction and she nodded, patting his back before scurrying over to Ino. Her whisper was more of a scream in Ino's ear, just to be sure her point got across, "Ino! I'm leaving with Gaara-kun!"

"Already?"

"Yeah! I think he'd be more willing to stay if it wasn't so…ridiculously loud here."

"I gotcha! So..." The blonde smiled slyly, "If anyone asks, like your mother, let's say...you stayed over my house tonight. Right?"

Blushing, Sakura squeezed her friend's face in her hands, "Ino!"

"I'm serious! Get 'em girl! You've been planning to." She winked, "I'll cover for you."

Relenting, Sakura gave her insufferable but true friend a tight hug. She said farewell to her friends without providing an explanation, hugged Hinata as well (Where'd your little sister go in all of this?) and returned Kiba's wave goodbye before hurrying off.

She joined Gaara at the edge of the picnic area that was thin with people, and after passing beneath the park's maples they set out on a tranquil footpath, breathing sighs of relief.

After they had gone, Sai finally moved and shouted only loud enough for Ino and Lee to understand, "Was that the Kazekage?"

"Yes!" Both confirmed.
"Leaving with that flat-chested girl?"

They smacked him.

As the core-rattling party anthem ebbed away into chiming beats, Noé transitioned with a smoother, more cerebral song which the congregation readily accepted and bobbed to. Tama and Sato took a recess to finish the food they had nearly forgotten about, receiving praise from spectators they passed. They were heartily welcomed back to their table.

"As to not raise the collective blood pressure of anyone else at this festival," Shikamaru advised them, "Avoid doing any of that again. Tone it down, jeez."

Sato waggled his eyebrows, "You liked it?"

"That is not the word I would choose. I watched it. I can never unwatch it."

"No you cannot." Sato plopped onto the bench beside him, munching, "Tama and I have practiced that routine at the studio and the music was pretty close to what we use."

"It's fun." She added, also chewing.

A short time passed and most everyone was illuminated by glow-in-the-dark trinkets by the new cover of night. Tama readily instructed participants who gathered for group dances.

Tenten was not willing by nature, but she was pliant and buzzed when Ino and Hinata pulled her to her feet. Neji made no move to intervene and watched as the girls toddled towards Tama and Sato teaching steps; Lee, Chouji, and Kiba had joined as well. Shikamaru, a dedicatedly lazy soul, remained at his table while Shino observed the activities, calculating and considering.

Neji's sip on the drink straw sputtered when Sai leaned in unexpectedly from behind, thunking his hands down on the picnic table, "Ladyhair."

"Sai."

"I think we must be on better speaking terms now. The Hokage considers me more trustworthy."

"I am not one to agree with anything the Hokage believes, not on principal alone. I'll be the judge of what I think of you." Neji asserted, "And I think your insistence on calling me that name warrants retribution."

"Tenzo uses a word called cranky." Sai noted, taking a seat.

Neji grunted at him.

"That may be a more fitting nickname for you, as I have a clearer understanding of your character."

Neji scooched down the bench a bit.

Sai continued and slightly elevated his choice in topics, "I have not yet had the opportunity to properly apologize to you or Superbrows about that mission. Please know that I am grateful that we met." His smile was practiced, "My life has improved. It is strange thinking and feeling whatever I want to, but I do prefer living this way."

"Bear in mind, there are limitations to what you can think and feel without offending or obstructing those around you."
"Yes, I know that." He added softly, "I am beginning to understand."

"Good." Neji relaxed a bit.

Sai looked out over the crowd now stepping and turning in time to music, with its two instructors at the lead, "That is Buns, there beside Superbrows."

"Tenten." Neji corrected him.

"She was the teammate that you were missing during our mission to the Toi mine."

"Yes."

"When I spoke to her yesterday I found her to be pleasant and intelligent."

"She is."

"She did not object to the nickname I gave her. She only did this." Sai imitated Tenten's eye-roll, "What does that mean?"

"It means she did not take what you said seriously." Neji elaborated.

"Ah."

"Lee and I told Tenten about you. She had an idea of what to expect."

Sai nodded and then said, without an ounce of tact, "You two are lovers."

Neji gave him dangerous side-eye.

"It is apparent because of your pining on that mission. Also, she allows you to drink from the same cup, which is generally considered unhygienic, I am told." Sai pointed out, "Buns accompanied you around the festival this evening. I only seek to know more about my neighbor who lives on the floor above mine."

"All of that is true." Neji conceded.

"If so, why are you not over there, where your teammate and potential rival for love Superbrows is dancing with Buns?"

"Lee is our mutual confidant. He considers Tenten a part of his family." Neji was completely unruffled by the suggestion, "He enjoys events like these. I choose not to dance."

Sai reflected on the statement while staring at him for a short while, and then raised the cup in Neji's grasp a bit higher, "Drink more. Tenzo said that makes people dance."

"I would sooner pour this in your eyes."

"You do not always react to suggestions this way, do you?" Sai's face was beginning to adopt human emotion, or at least, bewilderment, "I seek to be helpful."

"The day that you are helpful to me is long down the road, or perhaps even in another lifetime."

"I have perceived that you are tired of our conversation."

"I am."
Sai stood from the bench and nodded, "I understand, Ladyhair. Also, I imagine that the one Sugar calls Sunshine is your cousin, or a relative of yours in the Hyuga clan."

Neji quirked his face in annoyance, "To whom does the name Sugar refer?"

"Hatake Sato."

"Yes, he does call my cousin that." Neji sniffed.

Without much of a farewell, Sai traipsed away to find Tenzo at the pavilion and possibly report on his continued studies of society and how to piss society off.

The music was milder in tone as the night wore on, and Lee was sent by friends to a central picnic table where a volunteer baker and food-fryer had set out a generous spread of desserts. Lee sampled bits of the treats as he picked up selections for the group.

He returned and set a tray down that was piled with confections, announcing as Team Asuma (rather buzzed) huddled in to eat again, "This is called a 'berry tart.' I found it palatable. These taiyaki have red bean filling in the center, and these taiyaki have custard. I have kept them separate. These dango are all the same flavor…"

Chouji was picking up one of everything.

"Miniature crepes, small cups of flavored ice…" He frowned, "The brownies were taken by other guests so quickly that I could not bring any to you. My apologies."

"Those must have been delicious." Ino supposed, leaning on Shikamaru for support as they nibbled at taiyaki, seeking the gooey center.

Lee nodded, "They were. I had a piece."

Shikamaru shrugged and assured him, "All of this is enough. Thanks, Lee."

When Lee returned to his teammates, they were seated a bit further back than other revelers, nestled together and watching the festivities like flies on the wall. Lee delivered crepes to them which they gladly accepted.

Hinata ushered Lee away towards the boogying crowd to dance again, explaining quietly, "I think Onee-san and Onii-san are a little drunk. We'll just let them sit and eat until they feel better."

"Of course! The night is still young."

Fifteen minutes passed and the night was not so young anymore. Nor was Lee feeling quite right enough to dance. He was feeling something, wholly unexplainable and unanticipated, and as Kiba paused to ask him if he needed to rest, Lee shook his head.

"I am well, Kiba-kun. I am simply experiencing several new emotions, about six or seven, I estimate. They do not yet have names and have not been classified by human beings at this point in time."

Kiba was mildly suspicious, "That's great. Your emotions sound…totally original. By the way, you didn't have anything to drink tonight, did you?"

"Nothing other than water, as Tenten instructed." Lee confirmed.

"Maybe you should sit down?"
Lee pursed his mouth and thought hard to himself, "I do not know if I have the ability to do that right now."

"Okay…"

"Excuse me." Lee patted both Kiba and Akamaru on their respective heads. He made a bee-line for the dessert table. He only took two treats for himself, but Kiba watched with concern as Lee somehow fit two large taiyaki pastries into his mouth and proceeded to ingest them as a snake took in prey. How Lee did not choke was miraculous, and Kiba lost sight of his friend when Lee began to dart around and was lost in a shuffle of people.

"Akamaru, please keep track of him. I think I need to tell someone about this…” Kiba muttered and split up with his ninken, returning to where his friends were seated.

Shikamaru and his teammates sat in a row on a bench, chuckling to themselves and making fun of festival guests in varying volumes of voice. Kiba stopped in front of them and put his hands on his hips, "Did you guys witness Lee drink or eat anything… we wouldn't want him to drink or eat?"

"Pffft!" Ino shattered into laughter and slapped her knee. Chouji was giggling uncontrollably.

"For fuck's sake, you three! Answer the question." Kiba grumbled, "Lee is messed up."

"He might have." Shikamaru pulled himself together to reply, "Not that we saw him do it. He didn't drink anything, I'm sure. Tenten advised us not to let him, as Lee is a sloppy and destructive drunk." His mouth cracked into a grin and Shikamaru's head drooped. He snorted with soft laughter while Chouji and Ino braced his shoulders, twittering with hyena-like cries.

"Sorry." Shikamaru cleared his throat and continued, "Maybe he ate something? Where is Lee, anyway?"

"I don't know. I sent Akamaru to sniff him out."

"Poor Lee." Chouji meant it. He giggled again, but he meant it.

"Hee hee h-hold on." Ino tried to catch her breath. They gave her a full minute to simmer down.

"Lee said he ate some desserts a little while ago." She recalled, "All the brownies were gone before he could bring us anything."

"Shit." Kiba swerved around and strained to spot his dog or their friend.

"What?" Chouji snickered.

"Brownies are the peerless chow choice of stoners." Kiba announced, frustrated, "He ate one of those, you said?"

"Just a piece, he claimed." Shikamaru noted, wobbling to his feet, "This could actually end very badly unless he's supervised. Lee has no tolerance for anything like that."

"An innocent lamb like Lee on drugs…” Ino clucked her tongue, "What'd he do to deserve this?" She and Chouji roared again and held each other in a drunken hug.

"Leave them." Shikamaru said, "They won't be useful. They had more to drink than I did." He glanced around and rubbed his head, trying to reinstate his leadership settings, "I'll ask Hinata to look around for him. Go tell Tenten and Neji about this, for now."
Kiba thanked him and proceeded towards the next table. Initially he did not spot Lee's teammates where he had last seen them, and that was likely because they had rolled off of the bench and ended up in the grass on their backs, where Tenten was neatly tucked in Neji's arms. Kiba stood over them and restrained a laugh. Neji's eyes were shut, but he still seemed to be awake, super relaxed, and stroking the pad of his thumb over Tenten's lower lip.

Tenten was awake, her eyes were open, and with kitten-like satisfaction she had taken a loose strand of Neji's hair and balanced it beneath her nose as if it were a mustache.

"So guys, we have a problem." Kiba announced, trying to ignore their abnormally carefree appearances, "I lost Lee…and Lee is high."

Recognition flickered across Tenten's features, "Lee is what?"

"He's high." Kiba sighed, "I should've realized it sooner, but he slipped into the crowd. He told me some crazy stuff that tipped me off."

Neji sat up with a moan, displeased with the news. He and Tenten had a difficult time finding the strength to stand, and also the willpower to address what potential hazard lost-and-high Lee was.

Kiba explained the situation briefly and Neji scanned the fairgrounds with his Byakugan.

"He is eating." Neji reported, "At this moment, he is leaving a vendor on the east side of the park."

Tenten shrugged her shoulders, "That's not a problem. He's just…really hungry."

"He said six or seven unclassified emotions." Kiba reminded her.

Neji led them around the back of the pavilion to take a short-cut towards food stands, "We should watch him. How Lee reacts to alcohol is predictable, but we do not have a precedent for—"

A towering, glowing tiger sculpture was knocked over. People cried out and ducked for cover. Lee had pulled the sculpture's tethers loose accidentally, and Akamaru had stopped tracking him after being distracted by fallen food on the ground.

They picked up the pace. Neji could not intercept Lee quick enough before he had merged again with a dancing crowd, trampling enough feet to incite a furious mob. Lee attempted to join Sato who was tutting his fingers to a jazzy hip-hop tune, and Lee attempting to replicate the dance was about the same as Lee beating the daylights out of Sato. Horrified, Tama tried to pry the two apart and was unsuccessful.

Neji was watching with his Byakugan and pressing through the crowd, Tenten and Kiba close behind.

Tama was unable to snap Lee out of his babbling, and before he squeezed the life out of Sato (while describing starburst feelings close to his Inner Gates) Tama used her outstretched, iron-bar arm to remove Lee with a lariat.

Neji was watching with his Byakugan and pressing through the crowd, Tenten and Kiba close behind.

Tama was unable to snap Lee out of his babbling, and before he squeezed the life out of Sato (while describing starburst feelings close to his Inner Gates) Tama used her outstretched, iron-bar arm to remove Lee with a lariat.

Neji and his recovery team halted in the open space to behold Lee soaring through the air, and he struck the pavilion's top at an angle. The jostled tent began to sag and collapse, dumping Lee to the ground. Tsunade howled furiously as she was forced to save what sake she could before making a run for it. The tent imploded and Lee was buried somewhere beneath the tarp.

The Leaf finalists all convened once again near the ruined pavilion, digging Lee out of the rubble. Tama was apologizing profusely as Sato, beside her, rubbed his neck tenderly; glad that he could breathe again.

"Lee?" Tenten (pretending not to be drunk) pulled him into a sitting position, "Are you alright? We heard you…ate something…and now you aren't feeling well."

"Forgive my carelessness." He whimpered in her arms, "Flying is so tricky and I…I…"

"Shh…"

"The takoyaki vendor says I owe him 150 ryo."

"You probably do." Kiba imagined, "How did you eat that much in ten minutes?"

Lee's eyes were watering as if to weep, "What do you mean? I did not eat anything! I am famished."

Tenten sighed. His breath stunk of seafood.

Lee pressed his hand to the side of Tenten's face and made uncomfortable, searching eye contact, "Do you feel that?"

"I'm…not sure." She swallowed a drunken hiccup, "Is it like a spinning feeling?"

"Yes, but it is internal. This section of the universe inside of me is turning clockwise."

"Lee…" Tenten struggled to stand and handed him off to Neji, "No. Mine is definitely external. Everything is spinning around me. I think it's time we brought you home. Okay?"

"Okay."

"It's not your fault." Neji tried to comfort his friend but his knees felt like they might buckle as he lifted Lee. What good he and Tenten would be to their badly tripping friend was questionable.

Most everyone was still angry and the Hokage was pointing her finger and stomping. She demanded that Lee's team leave the festival. While it was not the best idea, Tenten and Neji accepted their responsibilities and hauled Lee away, each taking an arm of his around their shoulders to support him as they walked. Tenten mentioned a takoyaki vendor needed to be paid for the food Lee had eaten, but Tsunade whisked them along, growling that she'd take care of it.

Shikamaru took Tsunade aside to explain, emphasizing that Lee did not voluntarily consume a mind-altering agent.

"All the same, he ruined my set-up!" Tsunade's head snapped towards Tama, "Actually, this vixen over here ruined it!"

"Hokage-sama, I'm—"

"Shush! I'm goin' right over..." The Hokage plopped down on a bench, a bottle clenched in her fist. Tsunade made a sound-effect as her bottom met the seat, "Pshoo. Here." Then she motioned for the crowd to part so she had a clear view, "You!" She pointed at Noé in the DJ booth, "Keep playing," She pointed at Tama and Sato, "You! Dance. Refrain from…beaming people."

They did as instructed.

It was not much longer before Shikamaru recommended to his friends that they turn in for the night. While gathering their belongings, Ino teetered beside the picnic table and discovered an odd item. She stared at Sakura's mini-purse in her hands, "What's this doing here? She left…without it."
She turned to Chouji, stymied, "You know, I just...can't remember why this was so important. I am fuzzy inside and out right now...but I am sure Sakura needed this tonight for some reason."

"Not if she didn't take it with her." Chouji bumbled.

Ino released her apprehension and was content again, slinging the bag's strap across her shoulder with the intention of returning it the next day. She hobbled home arm-in-arm with Shikamaru and Chouji.

Hinata had shepherded Hanabi off to return to the Hyuga compound, asking Matsuri and her companions to get rest as well. Kiba barely got a word in edgewise to Tama before he departed, not so inclined to interrupt or witness her rather intimate dance with the Hatake. He and his ninken took off for home.

In the meantime, Shino had enjoyed leftover snacks and un-spiked lemonade. At the table adjacent to him, Tsunade was leaning with her head propped up, sipping the last of her celebratory sake. They were both content to sit quietly and take in the sights.

The dense pack of people attending the festival had dispersed; music maintained a dreamy mood, easing into the darker stretch of night. The majority of those who continued to dance were couples, prospective sweethearts, or those who had no intentions of going home alone.

And in-between the drum beats of one track and the plucking, gentle notes of the next, Sato had maneuvered Tama through the gap between a storage tent and the stage, towards the rear of the platform that was devoid of watching eyes.

They tottered like unstable fawns as they walked, tired out, bumping into the reverse stage wall a few times until coming to a complete stop together, kissing noisily. Sato's hand ringed around her wrist and pinned her arm above her head, fitting the line of his body against Tama's. She made soft sounds that brought him to the brink. Dancing was a ritual of theirs, a single, perfect talent they used mainly to resonate with each other, occasionally to boast, and on some days they could get carried away a little, of course, But it's never been like this. Sato trailed his free hand up her sleek waist, brushing smooth skin. She had lost her jacket somewhere and it gave him more to touch.

She kept no secrets when she moved; Tama danced and it spun a story, told him where she'd been, where she'd go, and what he had to do; and everything she had communicated was an amalgam of need and joy and intrigue that wrapped around him and he could feel nothing else. She, so impossibly, darkly beautiful, that Sato wanted to pay tribute to every inch of her, including the flaws and bruises, his breath hitching when she touched him back.

Tama snaked her hands up his front and around his neck, sighing against his lips, every nerve ending she had flaring with sense and want. He had been magnificent, lithe, and coveted. She had heard women in a tizzy from the crowd, piqued, impressed, and objectifying Sato and how he looked like starlight, like fragments of night sky assembled into a man. He was luminous under her fingertips; he was exquisite beneath her mouth. She paused, at last conscious of how her shirt was lifted up and bunched above a fitted, black sports bra he could do nothing with. Sato instead moved to her waistband, and Tama patted his chest to get his attention.

"Consider...the time and place," She mumbled, still accepting his kisses, "The festival is over and..."

He stopped and pegged her with midnight blue eyes, exigent and pulse-pounding.

"Come home with me."
Tama answered slowly, "To…"

"To do this. To be us, together." His voice was husky, kisses feather-light along her jaw.

"We danced all night."

"Night's not over." Sato reminded, taking her pinned hand down to plant kisses on her knuckles, "Our dancing is never over. We don't have to—"

"Sato-kun," Her voice was clear, "I can't go with you. I promised my mother I would be home, and you know she waits up." Tama presented the sobering facts, hiking her shirt down, "I need to—"

She resisted a kiss, still trying to speak.

He pulled back, his face crashing with need, devastation, impatience, "We both—"

"Yes, we both want to, but let me honor the promises I make." She smiled at him, trying to neutralize the disappointment, or whatever cloudy feeling she felt come over him. It did not seem to work so well.

"Fine, then." A bit forcefully, he let go of her wrist and hip, "We're always a trapeze act, going back and forth. I get it already."

"Sato, I'm not trying to—"

"I said it's fine." Sato's voice switched to be soft and gentle, "I'll be alright."

She gave him a long look before kissing his cheek, then mouth, caressing the side of his face, "Don't be upset. I'll see you tomorrow— whenever you want."

He nodded, weighed down with a sickly, blundering feeling as Tama gave a sweet goodbye and jogged out into the dark in the direction of home. His imagination never accounted for such an outcome, not after reeling and reaching, not after the fantasies and an evening of fun and togetherness. It was crushing to return to the front side of the stage and act as if music mattered in her absence.

But the sting and the heaviness subsided, bit by bit, with the minutes and sounds, with the fresh air, with the sake, with the shochu, with the drop-outs and friendly conversation, with the games and all those distractions…that should not have mattered in her absence.

