Season of Light and Shadow

by EldritchMage

Summary

It's the week before Thanksgiving. In an apartment building somewhere in the middle of New York City, the mood is far from festive.

Upstairs in Apartment 5B, an injured ballet dancer is having a rotten day. He's lost his job, he's had to walk home in the snow and rain, getting thoroughly soaked and frozen in the process, and the radiators in his rooms are as cold as the New York City streets. He limps downstairs to vent his fury on the night super who didn't fix the heat.

Downstairs in Apartment 2A, the night super is also having a rotten day. No money, three overtired and cranky children, a slapdash boss, and not nearly enough sleep. And now someone is pounding on the door like a SWAT team.
When an angel knocks on the door of a saint, neither finds what he expects. But with a little luck, the upcoming holiday season might give them both something to treasure.

Notes

Every holiday season needs some unapologetic romance, and a little reminder that the best gifts are not bought with money. I hope you enjoy this one.

Thanks to scythe_lyfe for encouraging me to try a slow-burn gay romance. I hope all of you reading along fall as hopelessly in love with both of my protagonists as I have. They are both wonderful souls.
“We’ll see about a new contract once you’ve healed, Thran. Take this time to do some thinking, too. We’ll all be in a better position to renegotiate once the holidays are over.”

He hadn’t even dignified that with a response. What they meant was that they didn’t think his injury would heal. They’d tell him to rest, then use that as an excuse to say he wasn’t working, had lost his physical edge, was no longer worthy to be principal in the troupe. Maybe they’d offer him a second tier position, or maybe they’d try to ditch him altogether. None of those alternatives was worth so much as a sniff or a curse, much less a thank you, and a very Happy Thanksgiving and Christmas to you, too.

He’d turned on his heel – the uninjured one – and swept out of the director’s office, out of the elevator, out of the lobby, out of the entire repulsive building, out onto the street.

Snow fell in thick, inelegant, wet gobs, like slushy, sloppy snowballs. Perfect. Even the sky wanted to dump on him. Not a cab in sight, either. There wouldn’t be, not this late. It was long past rush hour, less than a week before this strange American holiday called the Day of Giving Thanks, and all the cabs would be stalking the good fares uptown in the business and shopping district, not here, half a mile away, in front of a darkened ballet house. He turned his collar up and pulled it close. Why hadn’t he worn his heavy coat and a hat? His leather jacket cut the wind well enough, but he was all long torso and even longer legs, and he was far from warm. He set out slowly towards his apartment a mile away. If he were slow and careful, he wouldn’t aggravate his sprained ligaments any more than they already were.

He refused to think about how walking home that night two months ago had resulted in those sprained ligaments. Why he’d forgone a warmer, more cumbersome coat and scarf for clothing that didn’t hinder his mobility. Or the snow, either, which was rapidly turning to sleet. It’d be steady rain before he got home. Or ice, which would slow him even more. He couldn’t risk another injury on the slick concrete.

Shivering, Thran tucked his braid of long, white hair into his jacket. He’d have to wait to get warm until he reached his apartment. He’d alerted the building super this morning that the radiators needed fixing again. The last time it had gone cold, the super had fixed them while Thran was at work, not that dancing had ever been work. No matter how wet he got out here; he’d soon be warm and dry again. Gods, he hated New York weather! The damp cold stabbed right through Thran’s jacket and sweater as if they were made of tissue paper. He’d left his gloves in the studio, but nothing could make him go back for them. He slogged along as fast as the slippery sidewalk allowed.

By the time he reached his apartment building, Thran was shivering so badly that his teeth chattered, and swearing at the icy water that soaked his hair and ran down his neck. His hands were so numb and stiff that he fumbled the entry key, long enough that he scanned the street nervously, hoping he hadn’t attracted the wrong kind of attention. But on such a miserable night, the sleet had chased everyone off the streets but him. When he finally got the key into the lock and pushed the heavy door open, he shouldered his way inside and leaned back against the door, relieved to be under cover. Even the entry hall felt warm compared to outside. He flexed his foot a time or two to ease it. Only the stairs remained.

This building was old, one of many such in the city, and small. There was nothing about its architecture or its provenance worth mentioning. It had no elevator. In fact, its only asset was its location. It was a ten-minute walk to the ballet studio in one direction, and another ten-minute walk to a fresh foods market in another, so he didn’t need a car or a bicycle to get around. He had little free time for shopping or sightseeing, so it didn’t bother him to be so far away from the museums or theatre district. He went from his rooms – comfortable, but too Spartan to be called a home – to studio to market and back again. That was his life.

Until now. Half of his life – no, more than half of it – and all of his heart had just been ripped away.

He pushed himself away from the door, and started up the stairs. Most days, Thran would bound up the five flights of stairs, reveling in the springiness of his legs. Not today. Not with sprained ligaments. Never had five flights seemed so long.

The super’s apartment was on two. There was a din and a roar coming from the place; some domestic row, he supposed, snorting in distaste – a snort that quickly ended in a cough. Gods, gods, how fitting would it be to come down with a cold or worse, the flu, after everything else? He shivered again, this time painfully so. He pushed his ankle gingerly just to get up the last flight of stairs, so desperate was he to get warm and dry again. He had his door key ready. At least he got this lock open faster.

At last! He shut the door behind him, so relieved was he to shut out the cold, frozen outside world. Sniffling, he pulled off his coat, and draped it on the back of the lone chair in the living room. Oh, to be warm again, he exhaled –

His breath gusted out in a visible cloud.

It was freezing. He was freezing.

With a curse, Thran crossed the room and put a hand on the large radiator that hulked under the window. Colder than Siberia.

How perfect. How utterly, utterly perfect. Even his rooms were cold and indifferent.

He stood, shaking with cold and fury, until he wanted to throw something. But there wasn’t much to throw, and he wouldn’t risk bashing his barre through the window to vent his frustration. That would only make him colder, and risk his lifeline. He snatched a towel from the bathroom to swipe the water from his face, then limped back and forth, back and forth, back and forth. Why hadn’t the damned super fixed his heating? Or at least texted him that he couldn’t? Thran fished his mobile from his jacket pocket to make sure he hadn’t missed a message. No, no message. He put the mobile down before he threw it – that wouldn’t get him warmer, either. Why couldn’t someone have left a message? If he’d known the heat was off, he’d have holed up in a hotel rather than risked the weather and frigid rooms for the night.

The only thing to do was to march down to the damned super’s apartment, interrupt whatever drivel still raged behind the door, and demand that he fix the broken radiator gods-damned now!

Thran grabbed his apartment key and stormed downstairs.

The racket still radiated from the super’s apartment at levels that made Thran’s head throb. He pounded on the door furiously, as if the anger inside had met his and jacked it higher. How dare that bastard super indulge in screaming at his wife/woman/girlfriend/female harpy/whore/bitch instead of doing his fucking job –

The door opened while Thran still pounded on it. His next blow smacked it open wider, almost hitting the face of the man who opened it. The man jumped backwards and caught it in his hand before it banged into the wall. Thran pulled his next blow, managing not to hit the door again, flustered at the sudden appearance of the man facing him.
He wasn’t as tall as Thran, but he was much more powerfully built. Dark, messy hair curled over his shoulders. The light brown eyes that met his were tired, yet patient. That powerfully built body was dressed in a rumpled work shirt and heavy jeans, with black, steel-toed work boots that were well scuffed. The rolled-up sleeves of his shirt showed muscled forearms, and his hands were grimed with ground-in dirt. The vee at the neck of his shirt revealed the suggestion of dark hair, and he had a shadow of the same thing on his cheeks.

“Why has my heat not been repaired?” Thran snarled. “I called this morning, I just got home, the suka blyad radiator is ice cold, and so am I! It is a refrigerator!”

The man didn’t change expression. In fact, he wasn’t even angry, merely resigned. Behind him, a small figure stomped, then a taller one. In one blinding moment, Thran realized that the screaming wasn’t a domestic argument, but outraged howling of a small girl and unimpressed, snarky retorts from her older brother, spiced with irritated attempts of the oldest sibling, a girl, to moderate the dispute. All three children were dark haired like their father, perhaps nine, twelve, and fifteen. All were fair faced, even when angry.

“Which apartment, please?”

Thran’s gaze flitted back to the man at the door. He was... handsome. It was a quiet, subtle beauty, but arresting enough that Thran felt even more flustered.

“Five B. Thran Oropherson.”

The man sighed. “Come in. I’ll check the log.”

The man held the door open, so Thran edged inside. The man snared the little girl who still wailed, kneeling beside her and shushing her softly.

“Til, take a deep breath. Bain didn’t know you wanted the last orange, little doll. I’ll bring you another one home tomorrow and you can have it then.”

“But it was MINE!” the girl howled, inconsolable. “He knew it was MINE, and he ate it on purpose.”

“Yes, you did,” the older girl shot back as she passed from one room to the next.

“Shut up, Sig!” the boy snapped. “You don’t know –”

“Yes, I do,” she snarked back.

The man looked up at Thran apologetically, then back at his children. “All of you, quiet down. Mr. Oropherson is our guest, and he doesn’t want to hear you shouting. Sigrid, you and Bain get back to making supper, and I’ll be right there. Tilda, why don’t you get Mr. Bun and read him the next part of your story?”

“I don’t want to! I want my orange!”

Tilda dissolved into tears, tired and inconsolable. The man gathered her into a hug and rubbed her back soothingly. In a few seconds, he turned the little girl’s face to his, and brushed the hair out of her face. “I know you do, little doll, but we can’t help that until tomorrow. Now, help your Da and read your book for a few minutes. Supper will be on soon, and we’ll all feel better after that.”
Tilda nodded reluctantly. He gave her a small smile and a squeeze, and she went into the next room. Thran saw her climb into an old chair by the window with a well-worn stuffed rabbit and a book, and quiet descended.

“Sorry about that,” the man said, standing and meeting Thran’s eyes. “She’s not the most patient little one this close to suppertime. Now, let me check the list. Be right back.”

When he picked up a sheaf of papers from a table under the window and glanced at them, Thran looked around. This apartment hadn’t been modernized the way his had, and the floors were scuffed linoleum and battered carpet instead of smooth, polished wood. The kitchen, just visible through the door, was industrial green walls, dingy steel cabinets, and more cracked linoleum, and the small gas stove looked to be thirty years old. It was probably a two-bedroom unit, but that wasn’t much room for three children and at least one adult. The place was crowded with mismatched furniture and littered with the accouterments of children – backpacks, books, jackets, an odd shoe – and an orderly collection of tools was nested in a battered bookcase by the door. There was a small television and a game console sitting on a chest, the controllers strung across the old sofa. Nothing in this apartment was new.

The man turned back slowly, shaking his head. Apparently he didn’t find what he wanted, for he reread the couple of pages a second time.

“You said you called this morning?”

Thran’s aggravation returned. “I did call,” he snapped.

“Did the person you talked to give you a name?”

“No. It was a man. I thought it was you. He said he would put me on the list.”

The man’s face didn’t change from his tired regard. “I didn’t get the message. I’m sorry.”

“What in hell am I supposed to do, then?” Thran spat. “It freezes, and it is too late for me to get a hotel room!”

The man nodded. “I sympathize, Mr. Oropherson. Let me get my children’s supper, and I’ll be up. Half an hour.”

Thran’s fury died in the face of that calm, that faint, measured accent. Welsh, he thought. The man had the face of a saint, albeit a weary one, that somehow remained serene regardless of the upset. “That will be fine. Thank you.”

The man walked Thran to the door, and shut it quietly after him.

Thran walked back up the steps. Despite how cold he was, he felt ashamed. Clearly, he wasn’t the only man struggling to get through a difficult day.

He thought about how gently the man had comforted his youngest child.

He missed his son.

He missed more than that.

* * *
It was one of those days where nothing had gone right. Bard’s day job had run an hour longer, and he’d had to scramble to get to Tilda’s school in time to pick her up before the place added late charges to his account, charges he couldn’t afford. He’d scraped in just as Mattie had been about to add the note to his account, but she’d reluctantly let him off. She was scraping by on fumes just as he was, and while she hadn’t liked staying late, she knew the realities of construction jobs and sketchy paychecks as well as he did.

He’d brought Tilda home, chewing his lip when he saw how low the truck’s gas gauge read. Did he have enough to fill the tank tomorrow, or would he have to go with half a tank so he could pay for another week of Bain’s soccer league? The high-rise complex where he currently worked was close enough that he might be able to get through the week on just half a tank.

He got Tilda started on her homework while he ran through the list of repairs slated for him to fix around the building. This was his second shift, the night super, which kept a roof over his head, crummy roof that it was. It was the only apartment in the building that hadn’t been renovated, and parts of it were grotty, but at least there were no rats or roaches, and chicken stew tasted just the same whether it was made on an ancient gas stove or an Aga. There was the master bedroom for Sigrid and Tilda, the second bedroom for Bain, and an alcove – misleadingly called “the den” in the apartment literature, but it was really a closet without a door off the living room – for him to put a bed for himself. The remaining space was enough to hold what was left from the house, barely, if everyone remembered to put things away.

He’d gotten through two leaky faucets, a jammed sink disposal, a running toilet, and four broken light bulbs before the disaster in 7A. The damned fool had pulled an entire electrical outlet out of the wall, which had taken the floor off the grid. It hadn’t been the easiest thing to rig a trouble light from another floor so he could see to replace the outlet. But he’d managed it, collected his tools, and flipped the breakers back on, then retreated to his apartment in peace.

Except he hadn’t found peace. He found three overtired, hungry, frustrated children sniping at each other fit to beat the band, even the normally calm Sigrid. She’d snapped at Bain, who’d swiped Tilda’s orange to throw at Sigrid, which had splatted on the wall, which Bain had eaten to cover up his theft, which had caused Tilda’s flood of tears and howls of fury, which had started all three of them shrieking and shouting and crying, which had halted the supper prep, which had delayed the food that would calm everyone down. And if all that wasn’t enough, someone started to pound on the door like an avenging repo man –

He opened the door on an angel of ice and snow. Sodden, bedraggled, furious, and wingless, but an angel nevertheless, so luminescent and electric that he took Bard’s breath away. Tall and elegantly lean, with piercing grey eyes and a heartbreakingly stunning mane of silky white hair that draped over his shoulder and traced down his chest like a caress. A silver grey sweater of soft, silky something clung to his torso, and form-fitting black pants and soft black boots accentuated long legs and narrow hips. He was so incredibly pale, yet so incredibly alive.

The angel’s radiators were cold. He’d called it in this morning, and Steffen had either blown him off, or forgotten to tell Bard, or who the hell knew what had happened. Steffen was the landlord, and more than a little slapdash. Bard didn’t dare push him too hard about anything, or he’d be out of his apartment in a heartbeat. It wasn’t easy finding a place in the city so close to his construction jobs in a neighborhood with good schools for his children, and at such a reduced rate. Steffen knew it, too. Bard was the one who kept the building running, but Steffen wasn’t about to cut him any more slack than he already did. A building super with three children was always pulled in five directions at once, and as long as Bard got things fixed as fast as he could, Steffen was happy to put stuff off from his day shift onto Bard’s night shift. So what if Bard missed a few nights’ sleep?

Bard didn’t remember the last time he’d had a full night’s sleep.

So here he stood gaping at the soaking wet, infuriated angel for longer than he should. He'd fixed the angel’s heat before, though he’d never seen him in person before now. The radiators probably needed to be bled again. The pipes really needed replacing, but Steffen wasn’t willing to spring for that yet, so Bard would have to keep the ancient radiators working as best he could. So he told the angel he’d get his children’s supper on the table, then come up to bleed the pipes.

He got the supper on the table, settled the children, parcelled out the food, made sure that everyone knew what to do to clean up the dishes and start homework, chased a few mouthfuls of chicken and vegetable stir fry down his throat with a gulp of milk that Tilda had left, then got his tools and headed up to the fifth floor.

He was too tired to face an angel with the dispassion he should. He’d just keep his eyes on the radiators and hope the angel left him to do his work in peace.

He knocked on the door. The angel answered so quickly that he must have been standing beside the door waiting for Bard to knock. He looked a little drier, and he had a heavier sweater clutched tightly around his lithe body. He let Bard in silently, who murmured a brief hello and went right to the radiator under the window. The first time he’d come here, he’d been incredulous at how little was in the apartment – the living room held little more than a sofa, a chair, a couple of small tables holding lamps, a white, fluffy rug, and a ballet barre by the window. No books, no TV, no music system. The kitchen looked as if it had never been used. The two bedrooms appeared almost as stark. He hadn’t seen the master closet, but imagined it held only a few garments, but all of them as fine as what the angel had on now. There was very little color in the apartment, mostly shades of grey and white with touches of black. Everything was beautifully made and very expensive.

Mr. Oropherson must be a very well-paid ballet dancer.

“It’ll take me a few minutes to bleed the air out,” Bard explained as he stooped by the living room radiator.

The bedraggled angel shivered so much that Bard winced, wishing he’d brought a blanket to wrap around him. That pale skin and those long, elegant fingers didn’t help, for they made the angel look even more ethereal. Bard focused on the radiator, sticking his screwdriver into the vent until the hiss of escaping air turned into the bubbling of hot water. He closed the valve again, and was rewarded with the first twinge of warmth seeping through the metal radiator. He stood up.

“I’ll need to check the bedroom radiators,” he said apologetically. Gods, he didn’t want to go into the bedrooms. It’d be such an intrusion.

The angel sniffed, but not like a snot. He sounded like he was getting a cold. Someone so lean had very little body fat, and would feel the damp cold much more than Bard would. The angel’s boots were wet, so he’d clearly had to walk some distance to reach his apartment. It was no wonder he was so chilled.

“Fine,” the angel agreed, waving his hand at the bedroom doors. He wasn’t so angry now; he looked very subdued. Bard went into the first bedroom quietly, turning on the light and stepping in tentatively. Everything was tidy and put away, almost military in its neatness, so Bard carefully skirted the soft rug at the end of the bed, not wanting his work boots to leave dirt on the white fibers. The bed itself was huge, likely because the angel was so tall. The mattress was thick and well padded, the finest quality, and clothed in grey silk sheets and cashmere blankets. It was a far cry from Bard’s narrow bed in his living room alcove with its patched cotton sheets and thrift store quilt. The thought of the angel’s pale body contrasted against the darker silk sheets... better not to think about it.

This radiator took less time to bleed, for it was not quite as old as the one in the living room. Bard was glad to leave, because it was easier to put aside his imaginings once he left. He bled the radiator of the other bedroom - a guest room, given how Spartan it was - and came back into the living room. He met the eyes of the angel without revealing how entranced he was.

“The radiators are getting hot now. I’m sorry this didn’t get fixed before you got home, Mr. Oropherson. Next time, call me directly, and I’ll make sure it gets on the schedule.” Bard handed the angel a small business card with his name and mobile number on it.

The angel took the card, read the name on it, and swallowed. “I appreciate that, Mr. Bowman. I am... I am sorry I yelled at you. I... lost my job today, and I was upset. I was wrong to take it out on you.”

Bard hummed sympathetically. “Understandable. I’m sorry that happened. It’s not easy out there.”

The angel shook his head slowly. “No. It is not.”

He turned away, disappearing into the kitchen. Bard sighed. Artists weren’t the most socially adept creatures, so he assumed he’d been dismissed. He hefted his bag and opened the door.

“Wait. Please.”

Bard looked around. The angel held out a box – expensive chocolates, he thought. Unopened.

“This was a gift, but...” he waved a hand up and down his body, drawing Bard’s eyes to follow that graceful hand. Bard swallowed, trying not to think about the gesture, or the body behind it. “I cannot eat it, of course. I am sorry I interrupted your children’s meal. I would like them to have it in apology. I hope they enjoy it.”

Bard took the box, though the present made him uncomfortable. Still, the angel looked as if he’d be even more uncomfortable if Bard turned down the gift, so he nodded.

“That’s very kind of you. I know they’ll enjoy it very much.”

The angel ventured a tentative smile. “I hope so, Mister...” he checked the small card again, “Bowman.”

“Let me know if the heat acts up again, Mr. Oropherson. Good night.”

“Good night.”

The door closed behind Bard, and he headed downstairs.

He stopped on the third floor landing, remembering to breathe again, before he went back to his children.

Much later, when the dishes were done, the next day’s lunches were made, the homework was finished, the baths were taken, and the bedtime goodnight rituals were observed, Bard lay down on the old sofa and listened to the rare quiet. The angel’s box of chocolates – Belgian – sat half eaten on the cluttered fruit crate that served as the living room catchall. The sweets were rich and dense, and Bard had had a job holding each of his children to just two pieces to keep the usual frantic bedtime routine from soaring on a sugar high. He took one for himself, a rich cream that was vanilla with a subtle hint of something, perhaps coffee. He savored it, and tried not to think about the evanescent creature who had given it to him.

* * *

Three floors above Bard, Thran got out of a volcanically hot shower, dried his hair, and ate his usual boiled chicken breast and steamed broccoli. He brushed his teeth and crawled into bed. The apartment was warm now, but he still shivered as the silk sheets warmed around him. It took a long time before he was warm enough to relax.

He refused to think about the aching ligaments in his left ankle. Or how he’d hurt them. Or how they’d cost him his job.

Instead, he thought about the man three floors below with three overwrought children, the gentle patience of a saint, and a powerful body that made him tremble with something other than the cold.
Chapter 2

Chapter Summary

Both the angel and the saint woke up with something other than their troubles on their mind this morning. Which of them will do something about it first?

Morning came too early. Bard woke on the sofa, the taste of expensive Belgian chocolate tainted with morning breath and dry mouth. Sigrid’s alarm went off, so he got up to start the children’s breakfasts, set out the lunches, round up the backpacks, spot the leftover homework that needed to get into the backpacks before anyone ran out of the door. Sigrid left first, a piece of peanut butter toast in her hand and a smile for him on her face. She’d catch the bus to her high school a block down. Bain was next, wolfing down oatmeal and raisins, finishing the math worksheet he’d forgotten with frantic scribbles, then clattering to collect backpack and soccer cleats and a signed permission slip for next month’s field trip to the MOMA for eighth grade English class. Little Tilda was last, her stolen orange forgotten as she busily mixed pieces of apple and a sprinkle of cinnamon into her oatmeal. Her assignments were already done and neatly tucked into their folders, and Bard walked out into the rain to hold the umbrella over her as they waited for her bus. She went off with a wave and a reminder to get more oranges.

His mobile rang. His welding job was held up until the rain stopped. That was always a mixed blessing. He needed the money that welding brought, but having the day free meant he could work on the building repairs all day and maybe get an evening off, barring emergency calls. Since he was already out, he walked to the market, got Tilda’s oranges and enough ground beef and onions for tonight’s meatloaf, and came home. He put the food in the fridge, got a quick shower, and made himself a cup of tea while he reviewed the repair list for the day.

As soon as he picked up the list, he thought about the angel who had pounded on his door last night. He walked down to the electrical room to turn off the circuit to the building laundry room so he could repair one of the dryers again. It was old, but a huge industrial model that was better than any newer replacement. The door circuit just needed a bit of solder now and again.

He got through the list by lunchtime. So he thought about the angel again. He’d looked so bedraggled and pale last night that Bard hoped he’d recovered by now.

He walked up to the fifth floor and knocked on the door to 5B.

There was no answer, so Bard turned and headed down the stairs –

“Yes?”

Bard paused on the third stair, and looked back at 5B. The angel stood there, bundled in the same thick grey sweater he’d worn last night, but the boots and fitted trousers were gone. Instead, thick tights, ragged leg warmers, and those strange little dancing shoes replaced them. The angel’s feet were long and elegant like the rest of him, and the close-fitting tights revealed muscled curves that were as sensuous as anything Bard had seen. His white hair was beautifully braided, too, in an exotic fishtail braid.

“Good morning,” Bard said politely. “I wanted to check that your radiators were working again, and that you were warm enough.”

The angel blinked in surprise. “They are. I appreciate that you fixed them last night, and checked this morning.”

“You’re welcome,” Bard shrugged. “My children enjoyed the chocolates, by the way. You earned yourself a trio of fans.”

A pale but pleased smile crossed the angel’s face. “Did I? I am glad that they liked the treat. I hope they left you some.”

Bard grinned. “I managed to get one before I fell asleep. Maybe I’ll manage another before they get home.”

The angel hesitated. “Would you... like to come in for a cup of tea? It is the least I could do to make up because I yelled at you last night.”

Bard swallowed. He had four or five hours before the Sigrid came home, and he’d done all of the day’s repairs. It wouldn’t hurt to have a cup of tea.

“Sure. I’d appreciate that. Haven’t had any since breakfast, and it’d taste good.”

The angel smiled. “Good. I have Earl Grey, oolong with mint, Darjeeling...”

* * *

Mr. Bowman stood just inside the door as Thran shut it behind him. He looked around the room, his gaze lingering on the ballet barre under the windows.

“I... think I’d better leave my boots by the door. They’d make a mess of your rug.”

They were the same heavy, steel-toed things, well scuffed and worn, that he’d had on last night. The rugs would withstand their assault better than the wood floors would. Thran was careful to keep the floors, especially under the barre, well swept, and not just because of the wear and tear on the finish. Grit under his thin ballet slippers was hard on his feet as well as his shoes.

“Thank you.” He indicated his boots and shoes lined up neatly by the door. “This is where I practice when I am not at the studio, and I keep the floor as clean as possible. What kind of tea would you like?”

The super bent to untie his bootlaces. “I’m not picky. You said you had Earl Grey?”

“I do. I will make us a pot.”

Thran went into the kitchen to put the kettle on. He ran warm water into the teapot, and set out a pair of cups and their saucers.

“Milk or sugar?”

“Just plain for me, thanks.”

When Thran came back into the living room, Mr. Bowman had shrugged off his jacket and laid it carefully on top of his boots. He stood easily, looking about the spare room. It was certain that this man had never seen the inside of a ballet studio, but he had his own unstudied, natural grace, as spare and as balanced as his nature. Despite his rough attire, he wasn’t uneasy or awkward in the incongruent setting, merely observant. His eyes strayed to the barre again.

“Please, sit,” Thran invited. Mr. Bowman chose the edge of the grey velvet sofa. His fingers touched the pile gently, considering the touch. Thran swallowed at the slow, gentle trace of the man’s fingers across the pile. He sat on the chair to wait for the kettle to boil.

“So you’re a dancer,” the super said, waving at the barre.

“I am.” Thran winced, remembering yesterday’s disaster. “Was. I lost my job yesterday.”

“You’re still a dancer,” Mr. Bowman said. “Just between gigs, that’s all.”

Thran shrugged. “That is a good way to look at it. I am just not... often between gigs.”

“What happened, if you don’t mind me asking?”

The kettle started to whistle.

“I will get that.”

Thran made the tea, and carried the teapot into the living room. He fetched the pair of cups, and sat them on the glass-topped table. He glanced at Mr. Bowman, but looked back at the teapot. The man was... so self contained? No, self-confident? No, nothing so blatant. Self-assured? No, even that was too strong a name for it. He was centered, but not aggressively so; quietly so. There was likely little that flustered him. Thran lowered his eyes, not wanting to stare. That air of quiet, coupled with those dark, tousled curls, and those calm, light brown eyes... Thran had to look away.

“I sprained the ligaments in my left ankle a few weeks ago. They have been slow to heal. I was the principal male dancer, so... the corps manager decided that I should... and they’d get someone to replace me for the foreseeable future.”

Mr. Bowman hummed and nodded, smiling bitterly. “Right out of ‘Animal Farm.’”

Thran looked up in confusion. “Excuse me?”

“‘Animal Farm.’ The book by George Orwell.”

Thran shook his head. “I have not read it.”

“It’s an allegory. A fable. Some farm animals set themselves up as a communist collective, and it goes about as you’d expect. Boxer is the horse who gives it his all, and once he’s worked himself nearly to death, the pigs in charge send him off to the knackers as a reward.”

Thran smirked. “They did not quite send me to the knackers, but close. They say I can audition again once I heal, but that is merely another way of saying they do not expect me to heal.”

“Will you?”

Thran poured tea into the cups. “I should. It has taken longer because of this suka blyad New York weather. Cold, frozen...”

“It’s not even winter yet,” Mr. Bowman shook his head ruefully. “Still another month to go.”
Thran snorted in a most inelegant fashion, drawing Mr. Bowman to chuckle.

“It’s no fun, I grant you. Kept me out of work today – too rainy to weld. At least it lets me get through the job list here early. Maybe I’ll have the evening off.”

“I hope my radiators cooperate,” Thran returned.

He wasn’t prepared for the eyes that met his. “If they don’t, call me. It won’t help your ligaments to freeze.”

Thran swallowed. “That is kind of you, Mr. Bowman. It must not be easy, to have two jobs and your children.”

Mr. Bowman rubbed his hand through his hair. It made Thran’s mouth water when he thought about doing that himself. “Um, call me Bard. Everyone does. Mr. Bowman was my father, and he’s been gone a long time.”

“I am Thran.”

Mr. Bowman – Bard – nodded. “Thran. Um, my children... they’re a handful, but I wouldn’t be without them for anything. Even when they’re snarky, like they were last night. I’m sorry for the racket.”

“Treasure their racket,” Thran said without thinking. “Be glad you have it. I have a son I do not get to see very often. I miss him every day.”

“With his mother, then?”

Thran shook his head. “His mother died. A bomb in a train station. In Saint Petersburg. My son was with her, but was unhurt. We left the country soon after to come here. It was a great opportunity for me, to dance with such a good company, but the travel, the hours of practice... Legolas is in a boarding school outside the city.”

Bard winced painfully. “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have blundered into that.”

Thran shrugged. “It was good to tell someone. You have children. You understand what it is like to miss them.”

“I do,” Bard nodded. “It’s not easy, because I have to pick up Tilda at school every day, and my construction jobs have to accommodate that. Not a lot of them do, so work is piecemeal. The super job is a big help – it cuts the apartment rent by seventy-five percent, and I’m here if something goes wrong with the children, so we get by.”

“No mother, either?”

Bard shook his head. “Car crash. Drunk driver. Tilda was just a year old. She doesn’t remember her mother.”

It was Thran’s turn to murmur sympathetically. “So you had three young children to care for, and no chance to grieve.”

Bard rubbed his forehead. “I had to keep working if I wanted to take care of them. Day care’s expensive. Not as much as boarding school, I guess, but it all adds up. Sigrid, my oldest, is past that, finally, and Bain more or less is, depending on whether you consider his soccer league to be day care. Tilda’s in an afternoon program that gives me a little more leeway in the afternoon.”
“Soccer, not American football?”

Bard laughed. “No American football. My family came from Wales when I was fourteen. Soccer for me, and a spot of rugby.”

“I played soccer as a boy in Latvia. I was very small. Soon after, I had progressed with the dance to the point that I was sent to Russia, to one of the youth schools. No more soccer from then on. Only the dance.”

“You must be very good,”

Thran shrugged and belatedly sipped his tea. “I have done well. Then the bomb, then here, and now...”

“You’ll dance again,” Bard offered. “Take it easy on your leg, and I’ll make sure your radiators are up to snuff, and you’ll ace your next audition.”

“Thank you,” Thran nodded. He coughed a little, more out of nervousness than anything else. “You are kind to say so.”

Bard swallowed the last of his tea and put his teacup down. “Thanks for the tea. The chance to sit for a minute, even more. I’d better get back to it.”

“I am glad you came in. I enjoyed it. I hope you would like to come back.”

Those calm eyes warmed a little, and the smile beneath them was pleased. “I would. Eh, stay warm, now. Make yourself a big pot of chicken noodle soup to make sure you don’t catch a cold after getting soaked last night.”

Thran shrugged. “I do not know how to make chicken soup. My diet is very restricted. Weight on a dancer is never good.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “A good chicken noodle soup wouldn’t hurt you. You could leave out the noodles, and then it’s just chicken, vegetables, and broth. Nothing to add to the rib cage.”

“It comes in a can, yes?”

“Ugh. The canned stuff’s too salty and too fatty, and everything in it’s mushy. It’s better to make it. You can let it simmer while you...” Bard pointed to the barre, “do dancer things.”

Thran nodded. Maybe since he wouldn’t be going to the studio for a while, he could learn to make a few simple things. “I should get a cookbook, then.”

“Sure.”

“What would I need? Chicken I have, but what vegetables? Broccoli?”

Bard grimaced. “Um, that’d go pretty soggy. An onion, a couple of big carrots, some celery, maybe a little ginger if you like Asian style. The ginger would be good to stave off a cold, too.”

Thran cocked his head. “That sounds easy enough. I would like to try it. It is very tiresome to eat boiled chicken breast and steamed broccoli every day.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up again. “Every day? That’s what you eat every day?”

“Not for breakfast, of course. Congee, or porridge, with fruit and milk. Salad for lunch. Chicken and broccoli for dinner.”

“That must get old.”

Thran draped his braid over his shoulder. “I live to dance, not to eat.”

Bard shook his head. “It... sounds like you haven’t gotten to do much except dance.”

“That is what is required to dance well.”

“But boiled chicken breast and steamed broccoli, every day? Look, I was going to make meatloaf for the children tonight, but I’ll make chicken soup instead. I’ll bring you a bowl.”

The offer surprised Thran. That Bard would do this for a near stranger was more than a kindness. That he’d offer a meal out of what were likely sparse commodities was even more so. “You would do this?”

Bard dropped his eyes and shrugged. For the first time, he seemed awkward. “Why not? The children need the protection from catching a cold, too. Might as well offer a dancer the same medicine, if you’d like some.”

“That is a very generous thing you offer. I would like to have some of your soup. But I know how much children eat. I have lots of chicken. Let me give you some for the soup. And for your kindness to a wet dancer.”

Bard hesitated. It was likely important to him that he was able to care for his children without charity, but he nodded. “All right. Um, you want to come downstairs? I can show you how to make it for yourself. Might let you vary your meals from now on.”

Thran swallowed. He couldn’t remember the last time he spent time with anyone. Likely not since Vileria had died. For once, his apartment seemed stifling despite its elegant sparseness.

“It’s okay if you don’t want to,” Bard was saying. “Our place is a mess, so...”

“No,” Thran said quickly. “No, I would like to come, if it is not an intrusion.”

“It’s not,” Bard shook his head. “Come on.”

Thran got up quickly and went into the kitchen to open the freezer. “The chicken is frozen. Is that a problem?”

Bard got up, too, went to the door, pulled on his boots. “Not at all. We’ll just throw it in the pot as is, and it’ll be fine.”

“How much? Three pounds?”

“More than enough. You’ll have enough for a couple of days, plus supper.”

Thran held the wrapped package of chicken out to Bard. “I will change into something warmer, and come down.”

Bard took the chicken. “Just come on in. Door will be open.”

The super let himself out, shutting the door quietly behind him.

Thran shut his eyes and let out a long breath. He was going downstairs to Bard’s apartment, and he was going to learn to make chicken soup from a saint. The thought made his stomach flutter, and his hands shake so badly that it was all he could do to peel off his leggings and slippers, find soft black pants and a long sweater of pale grey heather, and fumble them on. The neck of the sweater was wide, so he found a deep red cashmere scarf to wind around his neck. His favorite soft suede boots were by the door. His hair –

He ran back to the bedroom to unbraid his hair and run a brush through it. Should he braid it again? Or leave it loose? Probably a braid, since Bard was going to show him how to cook. His fingers were still fumbly, so he had to do it over before it was smooth. He remembered to stuff his key into his pants pocket before he shut the door behind him.
Chapter 3

Chapter Summary

The saint moved first, but it's the angel who will take the bigger risk.

Bard tramped down the stairs to his apartment, feeling distinctly strange. There was a flutter in his stomach, and three pounds of frozen chicken breasts in his hand. Did he just invite the angel from the classy fifth floor apartment down to make chicken soup in his dingy, cluttered, wreck of an apartment? Why had he been so stupid? That long, elegant, pale, creature of the air had no place in the dregs of the building. The sink was full of dirty dishes, his bed was probably still unmade, and there wasn’t a clear place to sit in the place. Maybe the angel wouldn’t come. Maybe he’d just said he wanted to change to get Bard out of his apartment –

The door opened above him. Oh, hell, Thran was on his way down.

Bard fled into his apartment, dumped the chicken on the counter, ran back into the living room to sweep Tilda’s toys and the game controllers off the sofa, kicked Bain’s shoes down the hall and into his room, yanked the quilt on his bed straight –

“Hello?” Thran’s head – gods, that beautiful white hair was like silk – appeared around the door.

“Come on in, Thran,” Bard said awkwardly. “I hope you can stand the mess. It’s a disaster, plain and simple, but it’s home.”

Thran came in, looking around. The deep berry red of his scarf was beautiful all on its own, but the warmth it cast on Thran’s cheeks was radiant. “It is a home. Well lived in.”

Bard laughed. “That’s putting it mildly. Give me a minute, and I’ll clean off a chair in the kitchen.”

He led the way in, Thran trailing behind him slowly. There seemed nothing that didn’t draw Thran’s eyes – Tilda’s construction paper mosaic on the fridge, Bard’s soccer schedule pinned to the wall over the table, Sigrid’s schedule for the days she stayed late at school to tutor other children in math. A pear lay on its side on the counter, evidence that Bain had forgotten to put it in his lunch. And yes, the sink was full of the morning’s breakfast dishes. The whole place was such a stark contrast to Thran’s nearly empty apartment that Bard almost couldn’t look at the dancer. Why had he done something so stupid as to invite this elegant man into so much chaos?

“There is so much life here,” Thran said thoughtfully.

Bard forgot to breathe when he heard that soft voice. He glanced at the angel, and ventured a rueful smile. “I appreciate the kind words. It’s hard to keep three children and all their stuff straight. Even on a good day, this place won’t come close to being tidy. It must be a shock, coming from your place.”

Thran was still looking around. “My place, as you call it, is just rooms where I sleep and practice when I do not work. It is not really a home, as this is.”

Bard pulled out the big soup pot and put it on the stove. “Too busy to make it a home, then?”
Thran finally met his eyes. They were thoughtful, but not sad. “I went to live in a state-run dormitory when I was six. I did not have a lot of things. But I did not miss them, as I was completely focused on the dance. I was rarely alone, and free time was even rarer, so any bed was as good as another, as long as it let me get the sleep I needed. Little of that has changed.”

Bard paused. “What about when you and your wife were together? You didn’t live in a dormitory then, did you?”

For the first time, Thran’s face turned cynical. “No, we did not live in a dormitory. We had a small flat. But... it... was a lie.”

“The state... owned it, then?”

“Of course.” Thran offered Bard a smile. “So... this chicken soup. How do you start it?”

“You want to pass me your chicken? Let’s see if it’ll fit in the pot as is.”

Thran duly passed the package to Bard. He unwrapped it, and it fit in the pot with room to spare, so Bard hefted the pot to the sink, ran water in it to cover the block of frozen chicken, then set it on the stove. “You can use broth instead of water, but water’s just as good. You put in enough water to cover the chicken, then you turn the gas on high until it boils. We can get the veg ready while the pot heats.”

Bard ducked into the fridge for the carrots and celery, then into one of the bottom cabinets for the onions. He set them on the cutting board and dug the big chef’s knife out of the drawer. “Do you want to wash or chop? Uh... maybe I should chop? You shouldn’t mess up your hands.”

When Thran laughed, the sound stirred the flutter in Bard’s stomach again. “My hands will survive. I am quite familiar with knives. So, you wash, and I will chop.”

Bard handed over the knife. “Good enough. Here’re the carrots. Rounds about a quarter inch thick are good.”

Thran pushed up his sweater sleeves and set to slicing carrots quite deftly. Bard set out a bowl to hold the pieces, and it was soon full of sliced carrots, celery, and onions. While Thran chopped, Bard washed the breakfast things and set them to dry in the dish rack. The pot soon boiled. Bard shoveled in the vegetables, and set the heat to simmer.

“Give it an hour, and we can put in the seasonings,” Bard explained. “We can relax in the living room, once I shovel off the sofa.”

Thran helped him gather up Bard’s collection of soccer trading cards and set them on the coffee table, and Bard stowed Mr. Bun on Tilda’s bed.

“I can make some more tea,” he offered, to forestall having to sit on the sofa next to the angel. “No Earl Grey, I’m afraid, but there’s straight black tea, or green.”

“Either would be fine,” Thran replied. He seemed almost shy.

“Black, then?” Bard asked, and at Thran’s nod he put the kettle on, washed a couple of mugs, and got the tea caddy. But all too soon the water was hot, the tea was in the pot, and he carried it and the mugs into the living room. He sat down in his usual spot.

“So... what was it like in all those dance academies?” he asked, just to get Thran to talk. He was a thoughtful conversationalist, soon picking up on the things that most interested Bard, and elaborating.
Before he knew it, he was telling Thran about what he remembered of Wales, then the emigration to Canada, and then to the States for school, and working construction. When the oven timer beeped, it hadn’t seemed like an hour had passed.

“Time for the seasonings,” Bard said, and they went back into the kitchen. Bard was very aware of the tall, lithe body leaning behind him to peer at the pot, but Bard kept his eyes on the soup.

“Just needs a little ginger, some pepper, some parsley, and some chives.” He tossed a small plastic container to Thran. “You’re the ace with the knife, so dice a couple of pieces of this while I get the other stuff.”

Thran reduced the candied ginger to crumbs. “Fine enough?”

Bard nodded. “Throw it in the pot.”

Thran did so.

“Here’s the rest.” Bard added a good dash of red pepper flakes, a couple of shakes of black pepper, a good dollop of parsley flakes, and just as many chives.

“How much did you put in?”

Bard shrugged. “I’m not the most exact cook. Daphne was a lot more precise than I am. I put in this and that, and it usually tastes okay. Less of the red pepper, because it’s hot. More of the parsley because I like parsley.”

“How long before it is ready?”

“A few minutes, that’s all. It’ll be done by the time I make the biscuits.”

“Biscuits?”

“Yes, the children and I like biscuits with the soup. They’re fast.”

He turned on the oven, then grabbed the flour bin, the shortening, the salt and milk, and quickly mixed them in the bowl that had held the vegetables. Fascinated, Thran leaned at the end of the counter to watch him.

“This is the fun part,” Bard grinned, putting a hand in the bowl to squash the mixture together. He didn’t overwork the dough, only kneading it gently until it came together.

“There’s a cookie sheet in the drawer under the stove. Would you hand it to me?”

Thran leaned over with unstudied grace to retrieve the cookie sheet. He was all leg, impossibly flexible and supple. Bard’s hands paused as he watched surreptitiously, and when Thran’s hip brushed his, he had to swallow.

“This one?” Thran asked softly.

Bard managed to nod. “That’s it. Now. Just have to pat this into a round, and slice it so...” He made two rounds of the dough, cut each into six sections, and separated them a little on the sheet. “Ten minutes, then we eat.”

He put the pan in the oven, careful not to bump Thran who was watching closely. “I’ll clear off the table so we can sit down.”
By the time they got the table cleared, and bowl, spoons, and water glasses arranged, the biscuits were done. Bard fished butter out of the fridge, turned off the stove, and ladled out the soup. They sat down to eat.

“If you don’t want the biscuits, I’ve got some crackers.”

Thran shook his head. “Thank you, but no. The diet, again.”

“Do you have food allergies, or is it just to keep your weight down?”

“Always the weight,” Thran admitted. “Dancers are supposed to look like they are chiseled out of marble, yes? As much training as is required, this is not as much of a problem for some as others. But it is true that many dancers practice unhealthy things to keep their slender bodies.”

Bard refused to look at the slender body sitting at his kitchen table. It would have made his mouth water for more than chicken soup. “Anorexia, you mean? Bulimia?”

“Both. Other things, too. None are wise. They ruin the body in only a few months or years. I am careful about what I eat, but I do eat. Mostly chicken —”

“And broccoli,” Bard supplied, offering Thran a wry grin.

“And broccoli,” Thran chuckled. “And I think now chicken soup. This is much better than boiled chicken breast.”

“Thanks. You make a great sous chef.”

“Does that mean I have the honor to wash the dishes?”

“I’ll spare you that. We’ll leave them for the children. They do the supper dishes most nights. Another couple of bowls won’t hurt them.”

Thran hummed and sipped his soup in silence for several mouthfuls. He glanced at Bard. “I think I would like one of the biscuits after all. They smell wonderful.”

“Have at. There’s grape jelly in the fridge if you’d rather have that than the butter. Or if you’d really like to tempt the devil, you can have both.”

Thran nibbled a corner of the biscuit. “Mmm. Tastes as wonderful as it smells. Perhaps just a little butter.”

Bard passed the dish. “Enjoy.”

Bard watched those beautiful, pale fingers wield the knife to slice the biscuit open, then the butter, then slip the pat inside the biscuit. How did Thran make such a mundane gesture look so... divine?

“Daphne was your wife? The one who was the more exact cook?”

Bard nodded. “She was. I met her at... art school. She was a painter. Very good, but she had a better head for the business end, so... we did all right. She had this fire, you know? She was always open to new things, to different things...”

“You miss her still?”

Bard thought about shrugging and merely answering with the expected response. But something made that seem worse than lying. He wasn’t sure whether temptation or his conscience goaded him more.

“I... don’t think about it anymore. It’s been almost ten years. The children... Sometimes. It’s... complicated.”

Thran nibbled his biscuit, and considered it as if it were something profound, or perhaps dangerous. He took a breath as if marshaling something. Courage, perhaps?

“I do not miss my wife.”

Bard paused in his chewing. “You didn’t get along?”

Thran’s face wore that uncharacteristic cynical smile again. “In many ways, yes. In the most obvious of ways, no. That was the lie, you see. Not the flat. Us.”

Bard didn’t know whether to ask or not, so he merely waited, offering an ear to listen if Thran wanted it. Pale grey eyes met his, so deep that Bard wanted to drown in them. But he kept a tight rein on himself and sat still.

“The state was very... particular about the image of the company, of their dancers. You know, of course, the old cliché about the nature of all male ballet dancers, yes?”

Bard knew. “That they’re all gay, you mean?”

Thran nodded serenely. “They are not, of course. But the state was homophobic, and so it could not abide even a single dancer of either sex who preferred something other than a straight relationship. It often chose to arrange marriages between dancers to give the illusion of their approved preferences. This happened even for dancers who were not gay or lesbian.”

Thran paused, eyeing Bard to see his reaction to his words. Bard nodded, then tried to defuse his tension by taking another spoonful of his soup.

“So... you had an arranged marriage?” Bard ventured, when Thran didn’t resume his explanation.

The dancer nodded. “Vileria and I were good friends, you understand. Both of us were in the ballet. We understood what was happening. In a way, it was a compliment to both of us, if the state thought we were good enough to attract enough attention that our... preferences might be a concern. Vileria was very tall, very elegant. Very dark hair and eyes. Fiery, perhaps like your Daphne. We made a striking couple – she so dark, and I so pale. But the lie of our marriage... we both laughed about it, even as we went along with it. At least we would share this lie as friends, yes? Vileria, you see, preferred her own kind. And...” Thran met Bard’s eyes directly, “so do I.”

Bard swallowed. He felt his face flaming. He froze, willing his heart to stop racing, his body from moving. “Oh,” he managed. He swallowed again. “That... that’s enough material for a film, right there.”

Thran grinned, and dropped his eyes to his soup bowl. “So it was. It made us both laugh, especially when we managed to conceive Legolas. We used to tease each other about it. We were of a type, our bodies, so it was not so hard. We did care about each other. I do not miss Vileria as my wife, though. I miss her as my dear friend. My best friend.”

Bard glanced at that pale mane, those grey eyes, that lithe body, and had to shut his eyes. When he went to spoon up more soup, his hand trembled.

“That’s the way I miss Daphne. That complication. We did love each other, very much. She was a great mother, and the best partner in so many ways. I was lucky to have her, because she was so open to everything. She had to be. I mean... I’m... Oh, hell, Thran. You’re a lot braver about it than I am. It’s more complicated for me. I’m not straight, but I’m not gay, either. I’m...”

“Bi?” Thran said, as casually as if he were talking about the weather.

Bard nodded.

With a shrug, Thran finished the last of his biscuit. “There is as much to be said for women as men. Vileria and I used to talk about what attracted us to our own kind. Those were funny, funny conversations. She would tease me that men were too bony and angular, where women were more softly rounded, more voluptuous. I would tease her that men were beautifully muscular and taut, where women were too rounded and short. We spent many hours laughing about it.”

“She sounds like a great friend.”

“She was. I miss her very much, if not sexually.” Thran took another bite of soup. “Vileria would get so angry at the state sometimes. A good portion of the government bureaucracy then did not follow the state’s prescribed ideal, yet this insistence on unreality was rigorously enforced. Vileria would say that because there was so much hatred and violence in the world, we should embrace what love there was, no matter its form. She was very wise, I thought.”

“Daphne said almost the same thing. She was wise, too. I miss her as a companion, a wife, the mother of my children.”

Bard’s mobile chimed softly. He grabbed it, startled at how late it was. “I have to go, Thran. I have to pick up Tilda at school. Here, let me put a lot of the soup in a bin for you.”

Thran shook his head. “Save it for your children’s supper. If there is any left after they are through, I will come and get it.”

“You’re sure?”

“Of course. I have plenty to eat for supper, so perhaps you can call me tomorrow and I can come get it whenever it’s convenient. I will give you my mobile number.”

“That’d work,” Bard said, getting up to find a piece of paper and a pencil for Thran to write down his number. He had to make do with one of Tilda’s crayons, which Thran took with a chuckle. “I can’t predict when that’ll be. If the weather improves, I’ll be on site welding.”

“I will be at the barre – oh, that is the worst ballet cliché. I will be at the B-A-R-R-E, not the B-A-R. Whatever time is convenient for you will be fine.”

“That’s great.” Bard took the paper with Thran’s number on it. “Look... Oh, about your ankle – you walk to the market, I’m guessing.”

Thran nodded.

“If you want to ride along sometime, give me a call. It’s on the way to Tilda’s school, so I can stop there most days.”

“I would like that.” Thran got up and carried his empty bowl and utensils to the sink. He found the dish sponge, the liquid soap, cleaned his things neatly, and set them in the rack to dry. “There. Less for your children to do tonight.”
He went to the door with Bard. “I thank you for the soup. It was delicious. And I enjoyed the time with you. I hope we can do so again.”

Bard nodded. Should he offer to shake hands? No. If he touched that long, pale, elegant hand, he might want more.

“We will. Thanks for coming down. I’ll see you soon.”

Thran let himself out. After Bard shut the door quietly, he leaned on it heavily, his eyes closed, and his fist clenched.

He already wanted more.

* * *

Thran held his composure all the way up to the fifth floor. He opened his door. He shut his door. Quietly. Then he stuffed his red cashmere scarf in his mouth so that no one would hear him moan. The afternoon had been nothing but an intimate pas de deux with a saint, albeit in a cramped kitchen rather than on an expansive dance floor. How he had moved, how he had sounded, how he had smelled, and those calm, weary brown eyes...

He pressed the scarf harder over his mouth.

How long did he stand in the middle of his Spartan, sterile living room, savoring the taste of Bard’s chicken soup and biscuits, and the way those muscles had moved under his worn work shirt, flexing and extending and beckoning? After so many years of ballet, Thran knew the human body so intimately that he had no trouble visualizing what Bard’s muscles looked like under his clothes. To imagine that powerful body, velveted only in dark hair, beside his, those strong hands on him, was unbearable. Thran’s body trembled in response as it hadn’t in years. Not since long before Vileria’s death. In some ways, his reaction was terrifying—he was such a master of his body, but not now. Now it burned and froze and trembled despite anything he told himself.

He almost thought about masturbating just to reduce the ache to a dull roar. But he didn’t want to ease this ache, this fire. He wanted to savor it for as long as he could. He wouldn’t wish for more, not yet. To think of what might be possible, then never to see it come about, would be torture. But there had to be something he could do other than try to burn out his want at the barre...

He got his laptop out of the nightside table. Against his better judgment, he typed in B-A-R-D-B-O-W-M-A-N. That was dumb—all he’d get from that would be the usual social media entries posting silly pictures of kittens, or business networking entries. Still, it was the obvious place to start.

The search engine rolled. Thran blinked in surprise. Then he began to read.

* * *

Bard picked up Tilda, got the children through supper—they liked the soup and biscuits—supervised homework for Bain and Tilda, and left Sigrid at the table to work on her homework while he jockeyed Tilda and Bain through their baths. He even got a shower for himself while the two younger children played a video game. He shooed the two younger ones to bed, and settled on the sofa. Sigrid still worked on her homework, so Bard didn’t turn on the TV. He settled Bain’s laptop on his lap, noodling through the soccer websites to check on the progress of the MLS cup finals, but given that the Welsh Dragons weren’t in it, Bard’s interest was only cursory, and he read little of any of the articles.

T-H-R-A-N--O-R-O-P-H-E-R-S-O-N, he typed without realizing it. Before he could shut down the browser, the search results displayed. Bard blinked in surprise. Then he began to read.
Chapter 4

Chapter Summary

When the saint dares to ask the angel to visit, the angel's answer is easy to predict. But the saint faces a battery of questions before the big day. Once again, children prove that some of them are more perceptive than others.

The next couple of days passed calmly. Thran took cabs to his physical therapy appointments and the market. He carefully watched his diet. He practiced his yoga. He did his usual ballet workouts that didn’t require him to use his left ankle.

The next couple of nights passed far from calmly. Thran thought so often about Bard’s strong hands kneading biscuit dough that his body hated him for driving it to such a fever pitch. He wondered if Bard was as distracted. Likely not, not with three children, two jobs, and not enough time to breathe, much less eat or sleep. The weather had improved, so Thran hadn’t heard from Bard. He was surely at his construction job during the day, and toiling through the building repairs all evening, if not later.

Thran tried to imagine what his life would be like if he were reduced to a different kind of manual labor, without the time or the wherewithal to dance. He would not be nearly so patient as Bard was. If that uncomplaining acceptance didn’t speak to the love Bard held so deeply for his children, nothing did. That understanding helped to keep him from ringing the mobile number on Bard’s card, or knocking on Bard’s door. The man was working to see to his children. Thran had the upmost respect for that; there had been nights when he had danced with a fever or a niggling injury, keeping to his contract for Legolas’s sake. Children deserved that from their parents.

His mobile rang. Bard’s number appeared. His heart thumped.

“How’s the ankle?”

“Thran? It’s Bard.”

“Hello!” Thran gulped, then cursed silently. He sounded like a giddy chorus boy. “Hello, Bard. I hope you are well.”

“I am. How’s the ankle?”

“It does well. I have been to the physical therapist twice, and it is not nearly as sore today.”

“That’s great. Look, I’m sorry about the soup. I didn’t get it to you because of one thing or another, and the children finished it off last night. I’m sorry.”

Thran smiled, thinking about Bain gulping down his chicken soup like any other ravenous teenaged boy. “That is okay. I am glad they enjoyed it.”

“So I owe you a meal or two.”

“It is well, Bard. I do not mind. I was well paid for my cooking lesson.”

A second or two of silence, then, “I enjoyed it, too. But I still owe you a couple of meals, okay? So... it’s Thanksgiving this Thursday. I don’t know if you celebrate it, or if you have plans, but if you don’t, I wondered if you’d like to have dinner with us? It'll be loud and chaotic with the children, but if you’re feeling brave, it’d be nice if you could come.”

A wide smile spread across Thran’s face. “I do not have any plans. It is very gracious for you to ask me. I would be delighted to accept. Should I bring more chicken?”

Bard laughed. “We’ve got plenty of turkey. That’s the traditional dish for the holiday, in case you didn’t know. It’s poultry, so you can eat that, I hope.”

“I can eat turkey.”

“Good. If you want, you can come early and watch the parade on TV with us. There’s a dog show on after that, too, which Tilda loves. We’ll eat about two or so.”

“I would like to bring something to your feast.”

“I know you’ve got broccoli, right? Broccoli’s good.”

From the sound of Bard’s voice, he was smiling. Thran smiled thinking of what that expression must look like. “You are a funny welder, Mr. Bard Bowman. But if you want broccoli, I will bring broccoli.”

“Great. I’m glad you can come.”

“I am glad you asked me. So... if I want to see this parade, what time should I come down?”

“It runs from ten to twelve. The dog show’s on after it. But if you come early, I might put you to work cutting up... broccoli.”

Bard was laughing this time, drawing Thran to join in. “I think I might like to come early. But not just to see the parade or cut up broccoli.”

Bard went quiet, and Thran wondered if he’d gone too far. But after a second, Bard’s voice came back, softly.

“I’d like that.”

“Until Thursday, then.”

“Bye.”

“Bye.”

Thran thumbed off his mobile, let his hand fall onto the sofa, and leaned his head back against it. He shut his eyes, exhaled, and savored the smile twitching at his lips.

He’d just been asked to meet the family.

* * *

The next two days went by in a blur – welding both Tuesday and Wednesday, and Steffen with a list two miles long of things people wanted fixed before the holiday. Some of those Steffen actually had to do himself when tenants were out, rather than at three in the morning when Bard had rewired the lobby chandelier. Pick Tilda up at school. Run to the market. He managed to get a small turkey in the fridge and a couple loaves of stale bread for stuffing, and a bag of yams. Cranberry sauce, the canned kind, but fresh cranberries were too expensive this year, and Bard didn’t have time to make the relish, anyway. At least he’d have a long weekend to recover – Thursday through Sunday. He could work Friday for double pay, which was very tempting. But his children needed time with him, and...

And he wanted time with Thran.

Gods, how could he say that? Not after what he’d read on the Internet. Why an artist like Thran would...

Better not to think about it.

If it were better not to think about it, then why in all the hells had Bard called the angel and invited him to Thanksgiving dinner?

Because if the angel had said no, Bard would have an easier time forgetting everything other than his children, his jobs, and the money – or lack thereof, if he were honest. He’d close his eyes, grit his teeth, and find the strength to keep going for Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda.

But Thran had said yes. Not reluctantly, either. As if he were as preoccupied as Bard was.

Oh, gods. This was a mistake. Such a huge mistake.

His shift ended Wednesday, he picked up Tilda from school, and he came home to another round of niggling jobs that Steffen had been too lazy to see to himself. He mixed up meatloaf, stuck it in the oven, asked Sigrid to keep an eye on it, and dashed out to replace the burned out light bulbs, fix the sticky door, replace the closet door knob.

He got through the list and came back into the apartment just as Sigrid was taking the meatloaf out of the oven.

“Thanks, Sig,” Bard smiled tiredly at his daughter, dropping a kiss on her hair. “What else needs doing? I’ll wash my hands and make the salad.”

“I made it, Da.” Sigrid took a bowl full of greens and carrots and florets of broccoli – a jolt went up Bard’s spine when he saw those – out of the fridge. “I opened a can of pineapple, too. And mashed some potatoes.”

“You are a gem, sweetness.” Bard enveloped her in a grateful hug. “Even set the table, too.”

“Tilda did that,” Sigrid smiled at her sister reading with Mr. Bun on the sofa. “Didn’t you, Til?”

The little girl looked up with a proud smile. “Sigrid was making the potatoes, so I got the utensils and put them around. And the napkins.”

“All that’s left are the glasses, then. Milk for you, little doll?”

“Me, too,” Bain called from his room.

“Wash your hands, then, Bain,” Bard called back. “Til, we’re ready.”

Tilda set aside her book and Mr. Bun and came to the table with her brother. Once everyone was seated, the bowls went around and everyone set to hungrily.

“So,” Sigrid said after a while. When Bard looked up from his plate, his eldest daughter had folded her arms on the table and leaned towards him. “Tell us about this guy you asked to lunch tomorrow.”

“He’s that guy from 5B,” Bain said, still shoveling in mashed potatoes. “The guy who banged on the door the other night.”

“He has pretty hair,” Tilda said to no one in particular.

“He’s that dancer guy,” Bain went on.

“Dancer?” Tilda looked up brightly. “Like on the TV? With the plum fairy?”

Tilda had watched the Nutcracker Suite last night on TV.

“I liked the mice. And the cookie children who hid under the dress,” Tilda confided.

Sigrid grinned at her sister before skewering her father with a sharp eye. “I like how you’re not saying anything, Da.”

Bard winked. “The three of you seem to be saying quite a lot. I’m just along for the ride.”

“Hmm,” Sigrid narrowed her eyes. “So he’s a ballet dancer? What’s he coming to our house of chaos for?”

“Dinner,” Bain intoned helpfully, but he was too pleased with his quip to hold his deadpan delivery for long. A lopsided grin ruined the effect, making Bard chuckle.

“Maybe he’s coming to dance for us? Can he tell us about the mice?” Tilda asked.

“Maybe he could. You can ask him. He’s not dancing right now, though, little doll. He hurt his leg and has to rest it so it’ll get better. He doesn’t have any family with him, and I thought he’d like to spend the holiday with some people.”

“Some crazy people,” Bain inserted, dishing up more potatoes. “We ought to cure him of wanting to be around ‘some people’ in about an hour. Want to bet, Sig?”

“Be nice,” Bard glowered at his son. “He has a son of his own, but he’s away at school. Thran misses his son a lot. So after supper, I want you all to clean up your stuff so there’s room for him to sit down somewhere.”

Most of the groans came from Bain, but Tilda mewed a little as well. Sigrid, however, remained impassive, considering Bard with disconcerting maturity. He ignored her as he quelled Bain’s groans with a look.

“You don’t have any homework tonight, so you can take fifteen minutes to put your stuff away.”

“Just fifteen?” Bain pounced, always the first one to negotiate the difference between the spirit and the letter of the law.

“No,” Bard shot back just as fast, grinning. “As long as it takes to put your stuff away. If you don’t need that long, great. But if you need more, you’ll take more. And when I say put away, I don’t mean thrown in the closet, stuffed under the furniture, or crammed behind the bookcases. I mean hung up, on the shelf, in the hamper, in the dishwasher, in the box, and so forth and so on. I’ll be inspecting. So do it right the first time, or you’ll do it over.”

Bain groaned, but it didn’t stop him from shoveling in more mashed potatoes. “We don’t have to vacuum, do we?”

Bard put an exaggerated look of surprise on his face. “Great idea, Bain! Good thing you thought of it. You can do the honors once everyone’s tidied up.”

“Da!” Bain screeched. “Not vacuuming! I hate to vacuum!”

Bard and Sigrid laughed, but Tilda wrinkled her nose. “It smells funny.”

“The bag needs changing,” was Sigrid’s diagnosis.

“We don’t have any other bags,” Bain said.

“I’ll clean out the old one again, and it’ll work fine,” Bard said. “So finish your suppers, and then we’ll get to it.”

“Are you going to clean up your stuff, too?” Bain challenged. “I’ve stepped over your sleep pants six times this afternoon alone, Da.”

“Ew, Da!” Sigrid made a face.

“My stuff, too,” Bard said mildly. “So hop to it. Bain, you’re on dish duty. Your sisters took care of the supper and the table – ”

“Da!”

“Now, Bain,” Bard said quietly, with a long look at his son. “Now.”

Bain subsided with a resigned nod. “Yes, Da.”

Tilda handed her plate over the table to Sigrid, who put it in the sink. The two girls went into the living room to start on their tidying while Bain and Bard stacked the rest of the dishes. While Bain scraped the plates off and loaded the dishwasher, Bard straightened the kitchen, wiped off counters and the stove, stacked the pots by the sink, and put away the spices he’d used in the meatloaf. Bain got the dishwasher going with the little jiggle it needed, and took the scrub sponge to the pots. Once Bard neatened the kitchen, he found the dishtowel and dried the pots for Bain. His son scrubbed out the sink, and rinsed out the sponge. The kitchen garbage can went in the living room for the girls to add all the detritus from their cleaning, and Bain moved around his father to collect his things. Bard straightened his tools in the bookcase, picked up the sleep pants Bain had complained about, straightened the quilt on his bed, and cleaned out the old vacuum cleaner bag. In less than twenty minutes, the place looked good. It’d never rate a photography spread in a fancy magazine, but it looked better than it had in weeks.

“Good job, you three,” Bard nodded. “There’s the vacuum, Bain.”

“Do I have to, Da?” Bain whined.

“No,” Bard said, straight-faced. “You can scrub the bathroom instead.”

“Thought so,” Bard grinned, nodding at the vacuum. “Have at.”
With the sound of Bain and the vacuum in his ears, he went into the bathroom to chisel the dirt back to the realm of decency. To his surprise, Sigrid was there, and the tub was already scrubbed back to its original weird aqua. She looked up from scrubbing the toilet.

“You owe me for this, Da,” she grinned, shaking the toilet brush at him.

He grinned. “Why do I have the feeling that I won't like paying that debt?”

“Just tell me about the guy coming to dinner tomorrow. Mr. Oropherson.”

Bard shook baking powder into the sink and attacked the soap scum. “What’s to tell? You know his name and what he looks like and why I asked him to join us.”

“And?”

“And what?”

“Gods, Da! Just answer the question. Or I’ll make up my own story to explain why you’re being so evasive.”

“You’ll come up with a better story than I would,” Bard grinned.

“Probably. Or maybe I’ll ask Mr. Oropherson why you asked him, and why he thought it was a good idea to spend Thanksgiving Day with a load of loonies.”

Bard swallowed. “You won’t do any such thing –”

“Oh, so this isn’t just my Da being the kind soul he usually is.”

Bard sighed. His daughter didn’t just look like her mother. She had Daphne’s persistence, too. “He misses his son. I know how that feels. He lost his job. I know how that feels. He can’t do what he loves. I know how that feels, too. So if spending a couple of hours with our load of loonies helps him feel better, I can offer him that.”

Sigrid’s laughing exasperation faded into a fond smile. “You’re so predictable, Da. And I love you for it.”

Bard smiled, crookedly. “Nice of you to say so, Sig.”

“If there’s any other reason you invited him, that’s okay, too. Now get out of here so I can scrub the floor. Should I put out guest towels, too?”

“Do we have any?” Bard teased.

“There’s a Christmas one somewhere. Or maybe it’s for Halloween. Which holiday does Mr. Oropherson celebrate?”

“I’ve no idea. You’ve got all your stuff in the hamper? I’m putting in a load of laundry.”

“All in the hamper.”

“Hold down the fort while I commandeer the washer.”

“Aye, aye, Captain Bard,” Sigrid winked, waving the toilet brush.

Laughing, Bard checked on Tilda – straightening her books in her room – and Bain – slumped on the sofa playing a video game. He shooed Bain off the game system and into his room with the vacuum, then took the clothes hamper and the garbage bag down to the basement. Whatever gods there were granted him the rare favor of two idle washers, so he threw darks in one and lights in the other, tossed the garbage in the disposal, and settled down to wait for the clothes to cycle through. The big industrial machines were done in half an hour. Everything went into the dryers, and before long Bard piled the clothes back into the hamper and hauled it back upstairs. The children were quiet when he returned, though Bain had abandoned the vacuum in the middle of the living room floor. He was sorting his soccer cards in his room, and Sigrid was reading a story to Tilda and Mr. Bun in their room.

“All vacuumed?” he asked, carrying the laundry hamper in to dump it on the floor. “Bain, come get your clothes.”

“All vacuumed,” Tilda nodded, hopping down from the chair. “All washed, too.”

“All but me,” Sigrid amended. “Bain and Til are done. The bathroom’s still clean, too.”

“Miracles never cease,” Bard feigned surprise, as Bain came in to help sort through the clean clothes. “Let’s tempt fate with another miracle – put all the clean stuff away.”

“Geez, Da,” Bain snorted. “I’ll break out in a rash any second now from all this clean.”

“Better not,” Bard tossed a clean soccer jersey at him. “The wait at the ER will be hours, and we’ll be too tired to make turkey tomorrow, much less eat it.”

“Eh, I guess I won’t break out in a rash, after all.” Bain piled his clothes into his arms and went into his room to put it all away. The girls were already working on theirs, leaving just a pile of Bard’s work pants and shirts and underwear – “Gross, Da!” was Sigrid’s announcement, tossing a pair of underpants at her father – on the rug.

“Gross, Sig,” Bard riposted, tossing a pair of panties at his daughter, laughing when she stuck her tongue out at him. He carted his stuff into his alcove, folded it, and stowed it in the underbed storage drawers.

When he’d put the last bit away, he looked around at the unfamiliar tidiness. At least they wouldn’t die of ptomaine or rug fuzz for the next few days.

While Sigrid took her shower, Bard settled on the sofa, and found a nature documentary on the TV to watch. Tilda came in to settle in his lap, then Bain to his left, and Sigrid to his right. They laughed at the antics of the meerkats running to and fro, though Tilda was yawning before it was over. When the program was over, Bard settled her in bed with Mr. Bun, and she was soon asleep. Bain went next to read himself to sleep. Sigrid stayed up with him to watch the next documentary about UK castles, chortling when Beaumaris Castle in Wales appeared on the screen. Soon after that, Sigrid kissed his cheek.

“I’m for bed, Da. See you in the morning.”

“With turkey pan in hand,” he smiled, kissing her hair. “Sleep well, sweetness.”

“You, too, Da.”

Bard turned off the TV. He got into the shower, impressed at how nice it was to wash in a clean bathroom, and scrubbed until he was just as clean. It was good to dry off with a clean towel, put on the sleep pants that had so outraged his son, and sit for a moment on the sofa before he lay down to sleep.
The apartment was clean, quiet, and ready for tomorrow. Then, and only then, did Bard let himself think about the angel who would descend from on high tomorrow. That pale hair, that pale skin, those pale grey eyes...

Bard shut his eyes. He was such a fool.
Chapter 5

Chapter Summary

It's Thanksgiving Day, and time for the angel to descend to earth. The saint will be more than tempted.

So will the angel.

Today was Thursday. Thanksgiving Day. Today Thran would walk down three flights of stairs and enter another world. A world with a home in it, and three children, and a saint with tired, gentle eyes, and a body that was an unstudied yet divine work of art.

First, however, there was still yoga to do, basic barre, breakfast, shower. Even if such things had not been ingrained so long ago that he’d forgotten when they weren’t ingrained, Thran would still do them. The yoga would help him focus, and the barre exercises would force him to carefully stretch his injured ligaments. They would keep him from thinking so much about things he wanted more than the dance.

Nothing had ever drawn him as much as the dance. That something had finally done so was a terrifying development.

Sun salutations modified not to stress his ankle. Headstands, arm balances, backbends, splits, seated asanas, and on and on and on...

All à terre – pliés, battements, arabesques, tendus, développées; then ronds de jambe, and on and on and on...

Two hours later, Thran’s body was well stretched and refined, but his mind was focused only on the saint residing three floors below his ballet barre and yoga mat.

He made his porridge, chopped his fruit, poured his milk, brewed his tea. Ate quietly. Showered. Checked the clock on his nightside table.

Good. Ten-thirty at last.

Thran put on his favorite black velvet jeans; black silk tee; long, plushy, shawl-collared tunic in his favorite heathery silver grey knit. Combed his hair smooth. Pocketed his apartment key. Slipped on his favorite suede boots. Gathered up the huge plastic bag of broccoli and the box of chocolates.

He leaned against his door and took a deep breath. He held himself there for a long moment, savoring just how badly he wanted to see Bard again. Enough to taste it. Enough for his body to tense, just as it had every night since they’d made soup.

Remember to breathe, he told himself, as he pushed away from the door and opened it.

He locked his door behind him and paced slowly down the stairs, teasing himself with his anticipation.

Fourth floor.
Third floor.

Second floor. Apartment 2A.

He knocked.

A flurry of muffled voices rumbled behind the door, then footsteps pounded near. The door opened. There stood Sigrid, and beside her, Tilda.

“He’s here, Da,” Tilda called towards the kitchen, then turned back to Thran.

“Hi, Mr. Oropherson,” Sigrid nodded, a welcoming smile on her face as she stood aside to beckon Thran inside. “Welcome to the house of chaos.”

“I am glad to be here,” Thran smiled as he offered a little bow to the older girl, then the younger. “You are Sigrid. I am pleased to meet you. And you are Tilda. I am pleased to meet you, too.”

“Are you really a ballet dancer?” Tilda looked up at him consideringly. “You have pretty hair.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. Both the gesture and Tilda’s question drew a chuckle from Thran. “I am a ballet dancer, yes. And thank you for such a nice compliment.”

“Can you tell me about the mice?” Tilda asked.

At Thran’s confused expression, Sigrid explained, “Tilda saw the Nutcracker on TV a few days ago. She liked the mice.”

“I can tell you about the mice,” Thran said to the little girl, as she led him to the sofa. He sat down on the corner so that he could look at her eye to eye. “What would you like to know?”

A head appeared in the kitchen door – Bard. Thran met his eyes calmly, trying not to tense, but he saw the same tension in Bard’s posture, and smiled in commiseration. Bard’s lips curved up in a half smile, and they shared a private look about the absurdity of it all.

“Hi, Thran. Be right with you. Bain and I are just getting the turkey in the oven.”

Thran held up the bag of vegetables. “I have the broccoli,” he said in a deadpan voice, drawing Bard’s snicker.

“We’ll deal with that in a minute, you. First, the turkey. Sig, grab the broccoli from the funny dancer.”

Relieved of his vegetables, Thran looked back at Tilda. “I will tell you about the mice, and then perhaps you will tell me about this parade.”

“It’s for Thanksgiving,” Tilda explained, sitting next to Thran. She pointed to the TV, where several clowns cavorted down the street in front of Macy’s. “See, it’s floats and bands and clowns. There are some dancers, too. The people on the TV talk about a lot of nothing, so we turn off the sound so we can see the pictures without all the blather.”

Sigrid came back into the living room. “Da says we can make up our own stories about the floats and things that are a lot more interesting than what the TV heads say.”

“Your Da is a wise man.”

“Will you tell me about the mice, now?” Tilda asked.
“Of course. What would you like to know?”

“What’re those heads made of?” Bain stuck his head out of the kitchen.

“Hello, Bain. I am pleased to see you again. So, the heads – I have seen several kinds. Some are merely cleverly sewn cloth hoods. Others are more cumbersome papier mâché. Some productions use headdresses that make the ears, and then use long false noses for the snout and whiskers.”

“Were you ever a mouse?” Tilda asked.

Thran nodded. “A long time ago, when I was a small boy, I was one of the mice. Never the Mouse King, though.”

“Did you have to wear the papier mâché head, or the cloth hood?” Sigrid asked, smiling.

“I had the ears and the nose. It was much easier to see during the fight that way, without a bag over my head.”

“How did they make the Christmas tree grow so large?” was Tilda’s next question.

“Oh, you must have seen the Nutcracker with the great Baryshnikov, yes? Mikhail Baryshnikov?”

“That’s the one,” Sigrid nodded. “It’s my favorite version.”

“The wonderful Gelsey Kirkland is in that one, too. They were both superb dancers. But to answer your question, little Tilda, the stage has a very large lift on it, and the back of the tree is fastened to it. It begins folded up small, like a concertina, and then unfolds when the lift goes up.”

“That sounds cool,” Bain allowed, coming into the living room. His face was flushed from the heat of the oven. “I’d like to see that from the other side, to see the how the lift worked.”

“Bain is a bigger fan of those ‘Making Of’ features than of the films they’re about,” Bard said, following his son.

Thran nearly gasped when he looked up. Bard had on worn jeans and a faded blue cotton tee, but the jeans were form fitting, and the tee left his arms bare and caressed his broad chest as closely as Thran wanted to. The work boots had been replaced with a pair of marled ragg socks, which let Bard move easily and quietly around the crowded apartment. The soft, faded blues suited Bard very well. Thran couldn’t meet Bard’s eyes without revealing... well, never mind what Thran didn’t want to reveal. He looked back at Bain instead.

“It is one of my interests to see such things, too,” Thran said. “A dancer’s career is never but so long on the stage, so one must prepare for what comes after that. The traditional path for many is to choreograph, to create the steps that the dancers dance. I enjoy that. But to design a set is to make a puzzle, how to get all of the scenery to fit. That is a satisfying challenge, also.”

“Make sure you let Thran see some of the parade, little doll,” Bard cautioned his smallest daughter. “Maybe he’s never seen it before.”

“Have you?” Tilda turned her face up to Thran’s.

“I have seen parades. I was even in one once. But no, I have not seen this one before.”

"I'll tell you all about it," Tilda said confidently, drawing Bain to roll his eyes and Sigrid to chuckle. Bard chuckled, too, as he sat down on the chair beside Thran’s end of the sofa, facing the TV. Sigrid “Before you tell me, I would like to give you this,” Thran held out his box of chocolates to Bard. “For after the turkey. To bring only broccoli did not seem to be very festive.”

“That wasn’t necessary,” Bard said, taking the box. “But thank you. The children don’t like chocolate very much, but —”

“Da!” all three children chorused in various stages of outrage, making both their father and Thran laugh. “Can we open it now?”

“After the turkey, just as Thran said —”

“It’s three hours until the turkey’s done, Da!” Bain protested.

“Only two.”

“Still, that’s two hours! Come on, Da.”

“One each, then, but that’s all. We’ve got a big lunch coming,” Bard relented. He opened the box carefully, perused the grid, and turned the box around to the three children who crowded around him. “The round ones are the creams. The square ones are the caramels.”

“Mmm, caramel for me,” Bain pounced on his piece. Sigrid took a peanut chew. Tilda considered for some seconds before choosing a raspberry cream.

“Thran?” Bard offered, holding out the box.

Thran’s initial reaction was to demur, but it struck him that he wanted to be part of the Bowman family’s festivities, so he took a small piece of chocolate toffee. Bard took an orange cream, then put the top back on the box and set it aside for later. Thran considered the rare taste of the sweet on his tongue, and then settled to hear Tilda’s commentary about the parade.

On the other end of the sofa, Bain sorted through his soccer cards, looking up only now and again as some of the floats went by the cameras, and then more to speculate about how they worked than what the floats depicted. The procession of similar-looking pop singers and cartoon balloons was impressive.

“How do you tell them apart? They all look alike,” Thran confessed, when Sigrid commented about one of the boy bands.

“They all sound alike, too,” Bard agreed, grinning when Sigrid poked her tongue out at him. “I have no idea who any of them are, anyway. But then Sig claims that Alexander Calder and Joan Miro’s art look the same, too. I think she says it just to get a rise out of me.”

“Nothing does that,” Bain muttered, drawing Sigrid’s sniff. “Well, it doesn’t, Sig, so you should just stop trying.”

“I know how to get a rise out of him,” Sigrid declared, eying her father with an evil smile. She cut her eyes to Thran. “All I have to do is to ask Mr. Oropherson —”

“No,” Bard said quietly, with emphasis, giving his daughter a stern look. Thran’s eyebrows went up in surprise, for Bard looked very uncomfortable.

“Ah,” Thran said into the silence, smiling perversely. “The young lady wants to ask me something horrible, such as the color of my underwear or whether my hair is dyed.”

“Is it?” Tilda looked up with alarm.

Thran laughed. “No, Tilda. It turned white when I was about your brother’s age, all but my eyebrows, for some mysterious reason. I like it, so I leave it alone. As for the color of my underwear —”

“I don’t think we need to ask Thran that,” Bard jumped in, giving Thran an incredulous look.

“Good, because I don’t want to know,” Bain muttered again, giving his sister a disgusted look. “Gods, Sig.”

Thran offered Bard a small smile, but as fast as those light brown eyes warmed, he knew that Bard sensed his genuine amusement.

“On that note,” Bard said, smiling back, “I have more prep to do in the kitchen.”

“May I help?” Thran offered politely.

“You like that stuff?” Bain asked incredulously.

“I know very little about cooking, and to help is a good way to learn.”

“All help cheerfully accepted,” Bard said, rising. “You’re so good with knives that we’ll be done with the sweet potatoes in record time.”

“Knives?” Bain looked up from his cards, eyes wide with interest. Tilda looked no less fascinated. “You’re good with knives? What does that mean? Like... fighting?”

Thran laughed at the expectant eyes glued to his. “There was a dance I learned once that called for knives. Many of the ethnic traditions throughout Asia have such dances. So I learned it at a young age. One of the choreographers who specialized in ethnic influences for the classical ballet made an intricate dance with knives. I enjoyed learning it very much. It was a popular ballet, so I danced it for many years in Russia.”

“Cool!” Bain pronounced it. “Real knives, with sharp edges?”

“Real knives, yes, but not very sharp edges. But one still had to be very careful. Even the thin edge of a common butter knife, or a single sheet of paper, can cut. Any thin edge, even an unsharpened one, requires care.”

“So let our local knife expert see to the sweet potatoes,” Bard said. “Or lunch will be late.”

“Should I take off my boots?” Thran asked, as he got up. “I promise that there are no holes in my socks.”

Bard gulped down laughter. “As long as doing so is okay for your ankle. Don’t want to undo all that PT you’ve had in the past week.”

“It will be fine. It is already much better with the week off.”

Bard snorted as he disappeared into the kitchen. “I bet you didn’t take a single day off.”

Thran put his boots with the collection by the door. After consideration, he took off his sweater and put it with his boots; between all the people and the cooking, the apartment was quite warm. “I worked every day, yes, but nothing that strained the ankle ligaments. My doctor says it comes along well.”

When he turned back to the kitchen, he found three sets of eyes regarding his feet. He looked down at the plain black socks. They were thick, soft, and made of very fine wool, but the children didn’t know that. He lifted his hands in an exaggerated shrug and mimed apology.

“Only black. No stripes or polka dots.”

Sigrid giggled, and Bain rolled his eyes and went back to the parade, but Tilda gave him a big smile. Chuckling, he slipped into the kitchen. Bard had the big cutting board set out for him, and a pile of peeled sweet potatoes waiting next to it. He had his back to Thran, running water into a small saucepan.

“Slices?”

“Half inch thick is –” Bard turned around, registered Thran in his black tee, and gulped. Oh, did the saint with the tousled hair and the soft brown eyes quail inside as badly as Thran did? “Gods – good, I mean. Half an inch is good. You... you don’t have to be neat. They’ll end up mashed.”

It took every crumb of Thran’s will to keep his face serene as he hooked the single stool under the end of the countertop with a foot. He drew it out and perched on it while he chopped. He worked in silence for a minute or two, glancing at Bard a few times just to watch him work. He’d recovered his composure, and was dumping the turkey neck, heart, and liver into the small saucepan, then setting it on the stove. He moved economically, without wasted effort – a ballet of his own that was well worth watching.

“What do you make?”

“Stuffing for the turkey,” Bard replied, stooping to get another pan out. He studiously did not look at Thran. “Here, you can put the potatoes in this. Um, the stuffing. Some people actually stuff the bird with it, but that makes a mess, so I cook it separately. Make sure you get some before it gets to Bain. He loves it, so it doesn’t last.”

“What is in the stuffing?”

“Mostly bread, then onions, celery, and the turkey liver and heart. Seasonings. Especially a lot of parsley.”

“Ah, parsley. That is not a surprise.”

Bard gave him a sharp glance to catch him chuckling, so his lips curved in a crooked smile in response. “Was there too much in the soup, then?”

“Not at all,” Thran said, eying him as he chopped. “I enjoyed the soup very much. As I enjoy to tease you now.”

Bard’s expression didn’t know whether to reveal disbelief, hilarity, or embarrassment, so all three appeared in short order, and he looked away. Then he put his elbows on the counter and leaned towards Thran. “Should I tease you about the color of your underwear, funny dancer?” he murmured softly.

Thran leaned forward over his elbows to whisper his reply. “You do not have to. I will tell you. They are –”
“Stop,” Bard gulped, straightening. “Just... stop. Gods.”

Thran grinned at Bard’s discomfiture, but took pity on him. “Then tell me what seasonings go in the stuffing. Besides parsley.”

“Um, sage, mostly. That’s sort of the traditional one. Pepper, too. Not much else.” Bard gave Thran a more composed look. “I use a lot of them. I don’t have the leeway to use a lot of prepared things –” Thran translated that to mean that Bard didn’t have the money, “– so seasonings keep things from getting boring. I can cook chicken the same way six times, but it’ll be different every time because of the seasonings. A few might let you vary your boiled chicken, too.”

“That would be good. Which seasonings are good ones to start with?”

Bard described some of his favorites as they chopped and stirred. Once the potatoes were on the stove, Thran chopped the onion and celery for Bard’s stuffing, and then watched while Bard sautéed everything together in a big skillet. That would finish in the oven once the turkey had finished cooking. Once Thran cut up the broccoli for the steamer, they went back out to the living room.

“The dog show is coming on,” Tilda announced excitedly from the sofa. “You’re just in time.”

“Did you see Santa at the end of the parade?” Bard ruffled Tilda’s hair affectionately. What Thran would have done to have Bard run fingers through his hair like that bore no considering.

“And the reindeer.” Tilda nodded. She looked at Thran. “Are there reindeer in Russia where you lived, Mr. Oropherson?”

“If it is all right with your Da, it is all right with me if you want to call me Thran.”

Tilda looked at her father, who shrugged and nodded agreement. “That’s very nice of Thran, Tilda. So say thank you, please.”

“Thank you, Thran. The reindeer?”

“There were none where I lived, no, either in Latvia or Russia. But there are a lot of reindeer in the coldest part of Russia, and in Finland, too. Canada, also.”

Tilda pushed the remote button to restore the sound for the dog show, and everyone watched in silence as the announcer said a little about each breed. Thran couldn’t keep from glancing at Bard now and then, just to savor the jolt that went down his spine with each glance. Bard had an easier time of it, for he had only to move his eyes from the TV to Thran to indulge himself. Thran liked the faint half smile that kept appearing on Bard’s lips.

“Oh! Look!” Tilda pointed at the TV. “The man said that one is an Imperial Russian Wolfhound!”

“A Borzoi.” Thran leaned forward towards the TV. “That is right, Tilda. They used to be called the Imperial Russian Wolfhound. They are very beautiful.”

“Did you ever have one, Thran?” Sigrid asked.

Thran shook his head. “I travel far too much to have a pet. And those are very special dogs. They need a very large, safe place to run. They are very gentle, though. Very beautiful.”

Tilda giggled. “That one looks like you, Thran. With long brown hair instead of white.”

“That one’s an Afghan hound,” Bain supplied, as said dog trotted elegantly across the ring with long,
Thran chuckled. “They are very sweet, and very beautiful, but not very smart. I do not mind to look like one, but I hope I am smarter than one.”

Bain sighed. “You must be pretty smart. You spoke Russian in Russia, right?” Thran nodded. “And now you speak English. I’m taking French in school, and it’s a pain. I don’t think I’ll ever get it right. All this masculine and feminine. I mean, it’s just a table, or a knife. Who decided a table is feminine, and a knife is masculine?”

“Better than German,” Bard said, smiling. “It’s got masculine, feminine, and neuter.”

Bain dissolved into groans.

“English is easier in that sense,” Thran said. “But all the idioms and the words from other languages... it is not easy to learn.”

“Will you ever have to go back to Russia?” Tilda asked.

Thran shook his head. “I am an American citizen now. I am very proud of that. So here I will stay.”

Laughing, Thran obediently got up and followed Bard to the kitchen. Once Bard got the roasting pan out of the oven and onto the counter, he put a big platter beside the pan.

“This is the four-hand part. The turkey always sticks to the cooking bag. So when I pick up the turkey, you have to pull the bag off the bottom and stick the platter underneath.”

Thran regarded the roasting pan dubiously. “You... cooked the turkey in a plastic bag?”

“It’s a special kind of bag, just for cooking. Keeps the turkey moist, and cuts an hour off the cooking time. A great invention, it is.” Bard slit the bag open to reveal the turkey, then picked up two large meat forks. He stuck the forks in either side of the turkey. “Ready?”

“Ready.”

“Up she goes, then. Be careful; the pan’s still hot. Just get the turkey loose.”

Thran had to press close to Bard to free the turkey from the plastic. Even through their clothes Thran was exquisitely conscious of the warm body against his. It was all he could do not to press closer to feel the play of Bard’s muscles against his. “It is loose.”

“Okay; hold onto the platter so the whole thing doesn’t go on the floor.” Bard angled the turkey onto the platter, and Thran kept it anchored on the countertop. “There. Not a spill. I’ll just put the stuffing in the oven, and in fifteen minutes, we eat.”

He stuck his head out of the kitchen. “Table crew, you’re up.”

Bard and Thran slid out of the way to let the three children troop into the kitchen to fetch plates and flatware and glasses. Once again, he was painfully aware of the man at his back, and had to press his hands against his thighs to keep them from pulling Bard closer. Bard must have felt just as charged, because he moved away to supervise the children. Thran stayed by the stove while he remembered to breathe again.
“Thran, would you turn on the broccoli, please?” Bard asked as the children laid the plates and flatware around the table.

Thran thought about what he’d rather arouse than a pot of broccoli, but duly peered at the control knob for the burner under the broccoli. He met Bard’s eyes with a mischievous half smile. “How high?”

“Um, all the way up,” Bard replied, swallowing, looking away. Thran turned back to the stove to turn on the heat and grin to himself. What a ridiculous pas de deux this was!

In ten minutes, everything was ready. Bard hauled the turkey platter to the table, and the stuffing and potatoes and broccoli followed. Thran found himself at one end of the table facing Bard, with Tilda and Bain on one side and Sigrid on the other. Bard sliced turkey and passed the plates around, and then everyone helped themselves to the rest.

At first, Thran settled for only turkey and broccoli, but when he noticed the children looking at his bare plate, he took a little of the stuffing, the potatoes, the cranberry sauce. Everything had so much more flavor than his plain boiled chicken and steamed broccoli! But the pleasure of sharing the meal with others was even better. The easy rapport that Bard shared with his children was another kind of dance that ebbed and flowed. Thran was happy to listen to the conversation flow around him.

“Time for dessert?” Bard asked, when the food had been nearly consumed.

“Yes!” Tilda exclaimed. “It was my turn to pick the dessert, Thran.”

“Your turn?”

The little girl nodded vigorously. “Each holiday, one of us chooses the dessert. Sigrid did Easter, and Bain did Fourth of July.”

“So no pumpkin pie,” Sigrid explained. “Tilda chose angel cake.”

“With chocolate syrup,” Tilda supplied.

“So does your Da get to choose the next dessert?” Thran asked.

“It’s Sig’s turn next,” Tilda shook her head.

“Oh, so your Da does not get a turn?” Thran teased her. “That does not seem fair at all. What if he does not like any of the desserts you choose?”

“Da says he likes everything we choose,” Tilda protested, drawing Bard’s chuckle.

“Not that he eats much dessert,” Sigrid said, giving Bard a look.

“I eat my share,” Bard protested mildly. “Sig, you collect the plates, Bain, you help Til with the cake and the syrup, and Thran and I’ll get the food put away.”

With everyone working, cleanup didn’t take long. The dishwasher got loaded, the food went into bins and then into the fridge, and Tilda and Bain had clean plates and the cake ready on the table.

“Who wants tea?” Bard asked the air.

“Me,” Sigrid called.

“I, too,” Thran added.
“Tea for three, then,” Bard said. “Bain? Tilda? You want anything?”

“Milk,” both children chorused, so Sigrid poured the glasses while Bard juggled the kettle and the mugs.

“Come on!” Tilda called impatiently. “I want my cake!”

“Yes, Miss Impatient. Right away,” Bard teased, bringing the teapot and cups to the table. He glanced at Thran. “Pass the knife to the expert so he can do the honors.”

Sigrid handed Thran the knife. He made the first cut, but wasn’t sure how big to make the slice. When he made the second, Bain said, “Oh, can you make mine bigger than that, please?”

“No,” Bard gave Bain a quelling look. “That’s plenty.”

Thran sliced two other pieces of the same size, and Sigrid passed one to Tilda and took the other for herself.

“What, don’t I get one, too?” Bard asked plaintively.

“I thought you didn’t like dessert, Da,” Sigrid protested.

“I like it now and again,” he allowed, keeping his eyes on his daughter rather than Thran, but the very avoidance made Thran’s stomach flutter. He cut one more slice for Bard, and a small one for himself, though he didn’t indulge in the syrup. It was an airy confection, a fitting end to a bountiful meal.

“Dishes, you three,” Bard said, when everyone was through. “Make sure you start the dishwasher when you’ve got everything in it.”

“Yes, Da.”

Bard took his mug of tea into the living room, gesturing for Thran to join him. He waited for Bard to settle in the chair before he sat on the corner of the sofa beside him. For the first time, he found Bard’s eyes waiting for his when he glanced over. Bard smiled ruefully, shaking his head slightly as he indulged himself with a long look, turning Thran’s skin into gooseflesh. Bard leaned over to put his mug on the table, and took up the TV remote to give his hands something to do.

“You’re a bastard, you know that?” Bard whispered.

Thran laughed silently. “I have been called worse.”

“Lately?”

Sobering, Thran shook his head. “Not for a very long time.”

Bard exhaled. “Know the feeling.”

He clicked on the TV, but left the sound off, and put his finger to his lips. Thran gave a slight nod, cutting his eyes to the kitchen. Bard nodded in reply, and only a second before Sigrid stuck her head out, a plate and dishtowel in her hand.

“You need more tea, Da?”

“I’m fine, Sig. Just looking for something on the tube other than American football.”
“Hey, you’re not eating Thran’s chocolate, are you?” Bain appeared after his sister. “Because you said we could have some after dinner, and it’s after dinner.”

“One more. Let’s make it last a couple of days, okay?”

The dishes done, the children scrambled in to jockey for a good spot around the chocolate box to choose their treats. When the candy had been suitably oohed and aahed over, Bard put the box away in the kitchen. When he came back, Thran got to his feet.

“I thank you for the delicious turkey dinner, and even more for the company. It has been a long time since I have had such a good time.”

“I didn’t get to ask about the cookie children in the ballet,” Tilda protested.

“That will be a good tale for next time, then,” Thran promised her. “It was very kind of you to explain the parade to me. I liked that quite a lot.”

Tilda dimpled. “You’re welcome. There’s a parade on New Year’s Day. Maybe I can explain that one to you, too.”

Thran finished pulling on his boots. He offered Tilda his hand, which she took. He brushed a kiss on the back of it. “I look forward to that.”

He offered Sigrid his hand, and he brushed a kiss on hers as well. When he offered his hand to Bain, though, he grinned.

“I will not kiss yours, only shake it.”

“Oh, okay, that’s good,” Bain agreed, and gave Thran’s hand a firm shake. “Come back again, please? I’d like to hear more about the stage building stuff.”

“Of course. Until then.”

Thran picked up his sweater, but he didn’t put it on as Bard opened the door for him. He turned back to the children and offered a wave. “Thank you again.”

“Bye, Thran.”

Bard followed him out.

“You were great with the children. Thank you for that.”

“They are wonderful children, and very kind to a stranger. Like their father.”

“So are you going to shake my hand, or kiss it? Not that I didn’t enjoy the view all afternoon.”

Thran laughed. “I savored my view well, too. But I do not think it would be wise to shake your hand or kiss it. So I will leave you with something to think about instead.”

“What?” Bard growled, leaning on the doorjamb.

“Black silk.”

Thran started up the steps, but he was still close enough to hear Bard’s muttered curse.

“You really are a bastard.”
Thran looked back, smiled, and then continued leisurely on his way.

Once he got into his rooms, he let his sweater drop on the chair, and leaned against the door with his eyes closed. He didn’t know if he’d given Bard reason enough to lie awake tonight. But he’d certainly done so for himself.
Chapter 6

Chapter Summary

The saint ponders the temptations of an angel, but it takes the blessing of a worldly innocent before he does more than that.

What the angel does in response is not very angelic, but it is nevertheless divine.

Chapter Notes

Dreamworks Animation SKG and Aardman Features own the copyright to "Flushed Away."

Paramount Pictures and Hasbro own the copyright to the Transformers films.

After the angel flew back to heaven, Bard played board games with Tilda and Bain while Sigrid worked on a term paper due for her nineteenth-century world history class. Once lunch had settled, the four of them ventured outside to horse around the local small park, kicking Bain’s soccer ball back and forth until everyone was breathless and ready for turkey leftovers. As expected, Bain finished the stuffing, and the turkey was so reduced that it was ready for the soup pot. Bard broke up the carcass and put it on to simmer for an hour or so while the children negotiated between themselves about what film to watch. Bain wanted what Bard had dubbed “more stuff blows up.” Sigrid wanted fantasy. Tilda wanted mice. None of them would budge until Bard stuck his head out of the kitchen to suggest the old reliable “Flushed Away.”

“I’ll get the DVD,” Bain said into the silence, smiling.

Roddy St. James from Kensington duly sparred with Rita, the slugs stole the show yet again, and derring-do thwarted the evil Toad and his Frog minions. Sigrid went back to her paper, Tilda and Bain showered, and Bard deboned the turkey stock and cleaned up the kitchen. Bard read Tilda her bedtime story, and kissed her goodnight. Bain said goodnight, then went off to read while Sigrid showered.

Bard exhaled. Quiet once again. The apartment was still reasonably neat. Maybe they could keep it this way for a day or two, at least until he had to go back to welding on Monday. When he worked two jobs, it was tough to get through even the basic chores – laundry done, food bought and made, dishes washed, homework completed. He sat down in his chair, determined not to fall into that same, never-ending thrash of worry about money and everything that needed doing, not on a holiday. There’d be time enough for that on Monday, too.

He’d shut his eyes, just for a minute, just until Sig finished her shower, and then he’d take his turn. Until then, he’d think about nothing.

His thoughts abhorred a vacuum just as much as nature did. What slipped into his vacuum was the devastating angel who had graced his home, and charmed his children with his quiet regard. He hadn’t talked down to them, he’d put up with their examination and their joking, and he’d been an easy guest. As for what else he’d been... Thran hadn’t had to offer his parting shot about underwear. Bard still savored the soft, black silk tee that had clothed that beautiful torso, that narrow waist, those sculpted shoulders; and bared those alabaster arms. And that hair...

“He’s gorgeous.”

Bard started awake hard enough that his shoulder twinged in complaint. Sigrid looked down at him, smiling. “Gods, Sig. Give your Da a little warning.”

“I said, he’s gorgeous.”

“You know who, Thran.”

Bard shut his eyes and shifted deeper into his inelegant slouch. “Uh-huh. It’s the hair. The ladies love the long, white hair.”

“Da.” Sigrid sat on the end of the sofa beside Bard’s chair, in the same spot where Thran had sat earlier. She put her elbows on her knees and leaned towards him. “He’s nice. He was really sweet with Tilda. It’s okay.”

Bard blinked again. Was he dreaming this surreal conversation with his daughter? “Okay? Of course it’s okay how good he was with Til. She can’t wait to ask him about those cookie things.”

“The two of you were mooning over each other all afternoon. It was kind of cute.”

Bard shut his eyes. At least his daughter’s characterization of cuteness gave him a legitimate reason to blush. “Do you know who he is, Sig?”

“He’s a gorgeous ballet dancer who likes us, and who likes my Da. I like him, too.”

Bard told her what he’d read on the Internet. If he expected her to blanch or to look surprised, she did neither. Instead she shrugged.

“I read all that, too.”

“ ‘I read all that, too.’ What does that mean?”

“It means I checked him out, of course. He could have anything he wants, like a fancy penthouse and a posse and fifty assistants to run around and do for him. He doesn’t. He lives here, for gods’ sakes. So...”

“So what?” Bard said tiredly.

“So maybe you ought to give him the benefit of the doubt, and yourself a break.”

Bard chuckled ruefully as he wrung a hand over his face. “Are you trying to give your Da dating advice?”

“I was going to say ‘friending’ advice, but it sounds like you’re past that point.”

“Past what point?” he growled, finally waking up enough to be chagrined.
Sigrid shook her head. Her smile was part resignation, part exasperation, but completely loving. “Gods, Da. You’re so dense sometimes.”

“I think I’ve just been dissed.”

“’Mam’s been gone a long time, Da. I miss her, too, but... she’s not coming back. Thran’s nice. Whether he becomes a friend or more than that...” She shrugged. “You always tell us to keep an open mind. So follow your own advice.”

“Thank you very much, Dear Abby,” he said wryly, but Sigrid saw right through him.

“You’re welcome,” she said pertly, reverting from the yenta to his sixteen-year-old daughter as she brushed a kiss on his cheek. “Sleep well.”

“As if I can, knowing my daughter’s setting herself up as a therapist. You know you can get arrested for practicing without a license, right?”

Grinning, she stuck her tongue out at him, but relented with a smile as she patted his knee. She got up and went back to her term paper things spread out on the table. Bard stayed in his chair, eyes shut, until Sigrid closed her computer, tidied her papers, and put them in her backpack so the table would be clean for tomorrow’s breakfast.

“G’night, Da.”

Bard got up to hug his daughter and kiss her hair. “G’night, Sig. Sleep well.”

“You, too.”

After Sigrid closed the door to the room she shared with Tilda, Bard shuffled into the bathroom, showered, and pulled on his sleep pants and tee. He climbed into bed, pulled the quilt up, and shut his eyes.

What would it be like to lie next to an angel in his huge, silk- and cashmere-clad bed? To feel the warmth of that pale alabaster skin, and savor the caress of those long fingers and silky white hair? To be close enough to discover what he smelled and tasted like?

That kept Bard awake for some time.

* * *

Breakfast was a splurge. Rather than the usual oatmeal and toast, Bard made the concoction that Sigrid had dubbed the Egg Puff when she’d been Tilda’s age. It was a simple, frothy soufflé, nothing more than eggs with a little water and flour, then sprinkled with cheese and herbs, so easy to make that Bain could make it, and Tilda soon would be able to, though someone would still have to help her get the heavy iron skillet in and out of the oven. It looked festive, and paired with biscuits and some cut-up fruit made a good holiday breakfast. Today was the day that traditionally the children worked on their homework so they’d have the weekend free, especially Saturday.

“What do you want to take to the house tomorrow?” Bard asked.

Tilda looked up from the table. “I’m invited to Sarah’s tomorrow. Can I still go?”
“Your sleepover,” Bard remembered. “I’d forgotten. Of course you can still go, Til. What time are you supposed to be there?”

“Eleven. We’re having pizza and films all afternoon, then a hayride and the sleepover.”

“You have to wrap the books you got for Sarah.”

“I will, after I finish my homework. You’ll have to help me with the bow.”

“That’ll make me Bard the Bow Man, won’t it?”

“Oh, Da!” the groan went around the table. “That’s so old!”

“It still gets a groan out of you,” Bard pointed out with a smile. “So Bain and Sigrid, tomorrow’s lunch?”

“I... think I’m going with Jackson and Luke,” Bain hedged. "We want to see that new ‘more-stuff-blows-up’ film.”

“Sig?”

“Chicken sandwiches, clementines, and fig bars.”

Bard nodded. “Sounds good. Til, Sig and I’ll drop you off at Sarah’s when we head out. Bain, you know the drill – home before dark, and no friends over until Sig and I get back.”

Bain nodded, his mouth full of Egg Puff. “K, Da,” he garbled, then stuffed another forkful into his mouth. Bard shook his head. Given how much his son ate now, he didn’t want to think about how much would go down his throat in another year or two – likely as much as the rest of the family combined. Their meager budget would have to find leeway somewhere to accommodate.

Breakfast consumed and dishes done, quiet settled as the children started their work. Bard took out the pot of turkey stock and added potatoes, carrots, celery, and the leftover green beans and corn he’d stashed in the freezer a couple of weeks ago. He sat with Tilda in the living room to explain fractions to her by drawing circles cut into wedges like pies. Bain and Sigrid tapped away on their computers, giving Tilda reason to comment that they sounded like the mice running around in the first act of the Nutcracker. Bard’s mobile rang, Steffen telling him to look at the fourth floor hall light that was sputtering. Bard went out, tightened the fixture wiring, replaced the bulb, and came back to add parsley and sage to the soup. Tilda finished her homework and packed it neatly away. Bain was next with his.

“Essay done?” Bard asked.

“ Mostly.”

“How mostly?”

“I wrote the whole thing,” Bain assured him. “I just have to check it for spelling and stuff.”

“Everything else done?”

“Half a geography worksheet.”

“After lunch, then,” Bard said. “You know the rule.”

“I know,” Bain exhaled. “No film until the homework’s done.”
“Good,” Bard gave his son an encouraging smile. “Finish those, then you’ve got two whole days to do whatever you want until Monday.”

“The last free time until Christmas, probably,” Bain shook his head.

“Exams are coming up,” Bard agreed, drawing Bain’s grimace and Tilda’s groan. Sigrid frowned, but kept typing. “How’s your paper going, Sig? Close to a stopping point so we can have lunch?”

“I might as well stop now,” she grimaced. “I just realized that I made a big assumption that I don’t have any citations for. It’ll take a while to sort that out.”

She cleared off her papers and the computer, and lunch was duly laid on – the soup, cheese and crackers, and their favorite holiday fruit, the small clementine tangerines. There was half a bowl of soup left when everyone was done, which Bard scarfed down once it was clear than no one else wanted it. Thran’s chocolates were for dessert, two apiece. They’d have enough for one more lunch, since the last of the angel cake would disappear tonight after supper.

“Any requests for supper?”

“Pizza!” Bain replied instantly. “We’ve got time to make the dough, right?”

“Yes, pizza!” Tilda agreed. “I can cut up the carrots!”

“Carrots don’t go on pizza!” Bain made a face. “Where did you get carrots?”

“Because we always have carrot sticks and celery sticks with the pizza. I can do them.”

“We’ll leave that for Sig, Til. You’re not quite ready for the chef’s knife yet,” Bard said, thinking about who was very good with a chef’s knife, half appalled and half amused at the jolt he felt in his solar plexus. “You can put on the pepper strips.”

“All right,” Tilda agreed. “The park first, please?”

They headed out to the park in short order. The sky was growing overcast, but the sun was still intermittent enough to keep the temperature comfortably chilly rather than frigid. Sigrid and Bain passed the soccer ball back and forth while Bard watched Tilda hurtle up and down on the swings, then laughed when she hung upside down on the jungle gym. He ignored the stares of a couple of mothers shepherding their children when he climbed up after Tilda and hung upside down next to her. To his lights, the sound of his youngest child laughing at his antics was well worth any social comment. It wasn’t as easy for him to flip himself down the way Tilda did, given that the gym was sized for children, but he extricated himself neatly enough, taking a facetious bow to Tilda’s applause.

“Look out, Da!” Tilda exclaimed, pointing in time for him to field the soccer ball Bain sent hurtling towards him. He kicked it back between Sigrid and Bain, sending them scampering after it.

“Race you,” he challenged Tilda, and they ran after the two older children pell mell. Bard let Tilda edge just ahead of him as they caught up to Sigrid. Tilda kept running after her brother, but Sigrid snared Bard’s arm.

“Da, I don’t think I can go with you to the house tomorrow,” she confessed with a look of guilty regret. “I made a mistake in my paper, and I can fix it, but it’s going to take me a lot longer than I thought. I need to stay home tomorrow and fix it. Please?”

“It’s okay, Sig. You know schoolwork comes first. If you have to stay, you have to stay. There’s not much to do out there this time, anyway. Shut off the water, check the usual stuff, make sure the windows are tight.”

“Why don’t you ask someone to go with you?”

Bard gave her a long look. “This is a very convenient homework misfortune.”

Sigrid didn’t look away. “I did make the mistake, Da. I really did. It’s not fatal, but I’m going to need most of tomorrow to fix it. If Til and Bain are off with their friends, and you’re at the house, it’ll be quiet for me to work. Then I’ll be home if Tilda needs anything, and home when Bain gets back from the film. So... why not?”

Bard didn’t have to think about it, but he felt guilty about wanting to do just as Sigrid suggested as badly as he did.

“Oh, ye gods and little fish hooks, Da!” Sigrid exclaimed, throwing her arms wide. “I’m sixteen! I don’t have but so much maturity in me, and this is pushing it. So say yes before I say I’m going to tag along and forget about the social ramifications of the emerging working class in late nineteenth century England.”

Bard laughed and looped an arm around the shoulders of his daughter. “I don’t know whether to tease you about turning into a matchmaker or a social scientist.”

“I think they’re the same thing,” Sigrid snickered. “So call him when we get home, okay?”

Bard grumbled, but nodded. “I’ll call him.”

“Good.”

They trooped home from the park. Bard made pizza dough and set it in the oven to rise while Sigrid retreated to her room to work on her paper, and Tilda and Bain perused the DVDs. When one of the Transformers films cranked up, Bard went into the bathroom, shut the door, and pulled out his mobile. He punched Thran’s number in and waited for the call to connect.

“Bard. Hello.”

Bard gulped at that warm voice. “Hi, Thran. Um... are you busy tomorrow?”

“Just my usual work in the morning at the barre.”

“Would you be interested in an outing?”

“Of course. Do you take the children somewhere?”

Bard gulped again. Gods, this was worse than high school! “Um... the children will be busy with friends or school. It’d just be you and me.”

The silence on the other end of the line was deafening. “I would like that, very much. Where do we go?”

“Um... can you trust me to let it be a surprise? It’s something special to me. I’ll tell you about it when we get there. I’ll stand you a picnic lunch, too.”

“I am honored that you want to include me in this something special.”

“We’ve got to walk maybe a couple hundred feet, all told. Is that okay for your ankle? Do you have hiking boots or something so your ankle isn’t stressed?”

“I do. Dress warmly, yes?”

“Do. Chicken and fruit okay for lunch? Maybe you’d like to bring some salad?”

“That sounds good. I will bring salad for two. Maybe a treat, too.”

Bard thought about all the things that might mean, and couldn’t resist a smile. “Um, you do have something to wear other than silk and velvet and suede, right? Don’t wear anything good. It might be muddy, and it’ll definitely be dusty.”

Thran’s chuckle was warm, even over the mobile. “You have piqued my curiosity very badly, Bard. Battered jeans and hiking boots it shall be.”

“Great. I’ll come up once I get Tilda to her party. Maybe around eleven?”

“I will be ready. I look forward to the adventure.”

Bard rang off. And looked at the mobile.

He’d just made a date with an angel.

* * *

When Thran put his phone down, his fingers were trembling. He had a quick look in the refrigerator — yes, there were plenty of salad ingredients. He found one of his studio bags, cleaned out the stray towel and tights and dancer’s belts and leg warmers, and set it on the kitchen counter. He found the large plastic box he used to carry his lunches to and from the studio — it was big enough to hold a two-man salad — and put that beside the bag. He looked through the stash of wine that he rarely drank. What did one drink with chicken? White? There was a nice bottle of champagne that would suit. He put that in the refrigerator to chill. He found a couple of glasses, a kitchen towel, and a corkscrew, and put them in the bag.

He went into the bedroom closet and found his hiking boots. Thick socks. A pair of very old and comfortable black denim jeans. A dark grey Henley. A black silk tee. His ancient grey naval pea coat with the arctic-quality interlining. His red scarf.

Then he thought about eleven o’clock tomorrow morning.

* * *

Bain was the first out of the house at ten the next morning. A couple of his mates came jumping into the living room to chatter about the upcoming film and some pickup soccer games and maybe a trip to the arcade. He waved goodbye to Bard and his sisters, grabbed his soccer ball and cleats, and sprinted out after the two other boys. No sooner had he headed out than Bard’s mobile rang. One of the other parents taking a child to Sarah’s party offered to pick Tilda up so that Bard didn’t have to take her. Bard had given lifts to the other little girl several times, so this was a nice gesture on behalf of the other parent. In fifteen minutes, Tilda and Bard were waiting outside the apartment building with Tilda’s present and backpack. Nicole and her mother drove up calling a greeting, and Tilda piled inside with her friend.

“Buckle up, remember?” Bard reminded Tilda. “Thanks, Morgan. I appreciate you giving Til a lift.”

“Glad I can for once, Bard. You’ve been a lifesaver so many times.”

“Glad to do it. Do you want me to pick up tomorrow morning?”

“I’ve got it, but thanks for offering. I should have Til home about ten or eleven.”

“I’ll be here. Thanks again. You girls have a great time, and Tilda, remember your manners.”

“Of course I will, Da! See you tomorrow!”

“Bye! Love you, little doll!”

“Love you, too, Da! Bye!”

Morgan waved as she pulled away from the curb, and was soon around the corner. Bard took the steps back inside two at a time, and came back to his eldest daughter already ensconced at the table with her computer sitting amid her books and papers.

“You’re sure you don’t want to go, Sig?” Bard asked.

Sigrid rolled her eyes and gave him a typical sixteen-year-old’s look of exasperation. “Don’t get cold feet now, Da. Pack your lunchbox and get out of here.”

Bard rolled his eyes back at her, earning a snicker, and went into the kitchen. His work cooler was already on the counter. In went an ice pack, the plastic bin of chicken, the small block of Swiss cheese he’d splurged on, the bag of clementines, a couple of apples, and the fig bars. A bag held French bread; plastic plates, utensils, and cups; a jug of water; and napkins.

“I’m off,” Bard grinned, waiting.

Sigrid filled in the rest of the joke with a giggle. “Yeah, and you’re leaving, too. Hope nothing major’s up with the house this time.”

“Me, too. I won’t worry about it until I get there. Hope the socio-economic whatchamathing about the late nineteenth century British invasion of the Beatles straightens itself out.”

“Social ramifications of the emerging working class in late nineteenth century England, Da,” Sigrid gave a longsuffering sigh. “But to be honest, what you called it sounds a lot more interesting.”

Bard spread his hands wide. “That’s why I was never very good at history. My stories were always better than what I read in the books. I’ll be home for supper. I got out the meat for hamburgers, or we can do bean skillet.”

“Okay, Da. Now go. Don’t forget your tool bag. Remember last time when the hinge froze on the front door?”

“Got it in the truck already. See you soon.”

He kissed Sigrid’s head, she gave him a hug, and he was out of the door with cooler and bag in hand.
It was only ten-thirty, but he started up the stairs anyway. When he reached the fifth floor, he knocked on the door of Apartment 5B.

“Bard?” Thran called from behind the door.

“Yeah, it’s me.”

“Come in. The door is open.”

Bard shifted the bag to his other arm, grasped the doorknob, and let himself in.

“I’m early,” Bard said, shutting the door and putting down his things. “Tilda got picked up by a friend, so –”

He turned around. Thran was still at the barre. Cream leg warmers and shoes. Cream tights, so formfitting as to disappear into the muscles and curves beneath them. Ratty, pale grey knit top with a wide, torn neck and raveling sleeves pushed up above the elbows that left absolutely nothing to the imagination about what was underneath. That white hair in a messy braid. The left hand lightly on the barre. The most elegant arch of the back and neck, the full extension of the right arm as the right foot made very small, very controlled circles on the floor. The right leg lifting into the most impossibly effortless stretch back until it was parallel to the floor. That erect, still back, arched like a swan. Thran’s face was in profile, but his gaze slid sideways to meet Bard’s.

That beautiful face warmed into the smallest, most self-possessed smile.

“You are such a royal bastard,” Bard whispered.

The right leg fell perpendicular to the floor. The foot circled. The leg went up. Fell. The foot circled. The leg went up again.

“How many of these must I do?” Thran murmured.

“You’ve done enough,” Bard breathed.

In a heartbeat – a thunderous one – Bard crossed the white rug, wound one arm around Thran’s waist, twined his fingers in the white, silky hair at Thran’s nape, and pulled him close to engulf him in a kiss. Alabaster arms went around his neck. Long, elegant fingers scraped through his tangled hair. A taut, muscled leg wound around his legs. The embrace was so overwhelming that Bard forgot everything but the feel of the warm, hard body straining against his, the scent of sweat and excitement, the sound of a soft, breathless, nearly silent moan that might be Thran’s, or his.

“Gods, you bastard. You fight dirty.”

A soft chuckle. “And you knead biscuit dough as if you massaged your lover, and wear tight blue tee shirts, and press close when you put a turkey on a platter, and look at me with warm brown eyes that make my breath catch. What do you call that?”

Bard buried his face in the crook of Thran’s neck, breathing in, tasting salty sweat on his lips. Just the feel of another body against his after so many years threatened to drown him. He had to draw away to catch his breath. What on earth had possessed him?

An angel had. An angel that he had no business even touching.

“Don’t,” that soft, Russian-accented voice whispered. The lips that had spoken those words kissed his ear. “Don’t say you are sorry. I am not. I very much am not.”
The hands wound in his hair tilted his face up to bear the angel’s regard, and the angel's lips kissed his again.

Bard kissed back, refusing to think about all the reasons why he shouldn’t. He stroked the white, silky hair. Caressed the strong back and tight buttock above the leg wrapping his. Bit at the soft lips seeking his. Wanted to drown in all of it and never surface again.

He found the points of Thran’s hips and eased him away. The angel sighed in want, tightening fingers on his shoulders so that Bard couldn’t push him away but so far.

“We can’t do this. Not yet.”

Thran’s eyes met his. “Why not?”

Bard fought against every piece of him wanting nothing but to pull Thran’s body against his. He shut his eyes, struggling to resist so compelling a need.

“Because. Because of today. Because of what I want to show you.”

“It is important?”

Bard nodded.

Thran stroked Bard’s cheek with long, elegant fingers, the touch lingering, then tracing over Bard’s lips. Bard nipped at them, drawing breathy laughter. “Then I will get dressed, and we will go out.”

Thran’s fingers traced down Bard’s arms as he eased away. His grey eyes held Bard’s, then he disappeared into the bedroom. Bard stayed rooted to the spot until he heard the shower going, then he shut his eyes, wrung his hands over his face, and sat on the sofa. He put his face in his hands.

He was mad. He was totally mad.

Apparently Thran was, too.
Chapter 7

Chapter Summary

The saint has confessed to madness. Will the angel be as consumed, and what mysteries will be revealed in the aftermath?

This was exactly the way Thran had imagined he’d meet Bard this morning, in well-worn practice clothing, at the barre. He’d imagined it as soon as Bard had seen him in his black tee. He would stay late at his morning ritual for no other purpose than to hear that knock on the door, to see shock transfigure the face of the saint who entered, and then to brace for that moment when the saint gave up hope for anything but salvation in his arms.

When Bard came in, just as he imagined, when Bard’s eyes widened in disbelief, just as he imagined, adrenaline flooded Thran with fire. His skin felt raw, as if electricity burned it. His muscles, usually so completely under his control, quivered. He traced each rond de jambe à terre into an arabesque à la hauteur in slow motion, each one a seduction, each one a beckoning call, until Bard flung himself at Thran, wrapping desperate arms around him, actually lifting him off the floor, as if he were one of the ethereal creatures that Thran so often lifted across the stage. How easy was it to relinquish all control, all connection to the earth, and let Bard embrace him there suspended? Just as easy as it was to revel in Bard’s hands as they roved over his body, twined in his hair, and pulled him close for a deep kiss. It was all Thran could do not to spasm in release as he was held above the earth, his hands full of unruly dark hair and his lips nearly crushed under Bard’s.

When Bard let him slip back to the floor and drew away, it was like having a limb hacked off. Thran’s breath stuttered at the loss.

“Oh,” he pleaded. “Don’t say you are sorry. I am not. I very much am not.”

He kissed Bard again, reveling when Bard’s arms tightened hard around him again and his lips returned every caress with another. The slow trace of Bard’s hands over his back, his buttock, was intoxicating. Fingers kneaded his hips in slow, sensuous strokes until Thran was about to beg Bard to strip the clothes from them both, then deliver them out of misery and into ecstasy.

But those hands didn’t venture past his clothes, or continue their stroking. Thumbs caressed the creases of his torso where it joined his hips, then eased him away.

“We can’t do this. Not yet.”

Thran’s eyes met his. “Why not?”

Bard’s breathing was ragged. His eyes were shut. He trembled. “Because. Because of today. Because of what I want to show you.”

“It is important?” Thran said softly. A whisper was all he could manage.

Bard nodded.
Thran didn’t know where he found the discipline to force his body to relax, to turn away from the bounty before it. He stroked Bard’s cheek, his lips, delighted when Bard nipped at his fingers. Oh gods – the way his eyes were downcast, hidden behind dark lashes; the way Bard’s tousled hair fell into his eyes, as if he’d just come from bed... Thank all of the gods that this saint wore armor, a heavy coat that veiled his powerful, beckoning body, or there would have been no possibility of Thran stopping.

“Then I will get dressed, and we will go out,” he promised, and backed away so that he looked as long as possible at Bard before he had to turn away.

That was only the first promise he hoped to make to the saint with so much longing in his tired brown eyes.

A hot shower didn’t calm Thran much, but given that a cold one in cold weather was risky for lean dancers, he made do. He hated to wash Bard’s touches away. Rather than washing, he wanted to smell Bard on his skin, to smell both of their scents comingled, but he was too rank with sweat. He dried, wishing Bard held the towel, not him. He dressed in jeans and tee, combed his hair, and pulled on his socks and hiking boots. The Henley was waiting on the bed, but Thran was too warm to put it on yet. He stuffed his wallet and key in the back pockets of his jeans, picked up the Henley, and took a deep breath before he went back to the living room.

Bard sat on the sofa, his head in his hands. He looked up at Thran with such a panicked expression that Thran scrambled to sit at his side, crowding close, hip to hip, shoulder to shoulder. He put one arm around Bard’s shoulders, and twined his fingers with Bard’s.

“Stop. It is all right. It is.”

“I know,” Bard gulped. He wrung the hand that Thran didn’t hold over his face. “That’s the problem. Oh, gods, Thran... it feels right, it feels so much more than that, but it... it can’t be. It’s mad.”

“Why is it mad?”

Bard wrung a hand over his face again, but he didn’t try to extricate the other from Thran’s. He did glance at their entwined fingers, though, before he looked away.

“Look at you. You’re...” He gestured at Thran with his free hand. “You’re... you. An angel.”

Thran chuckled, and rested his chin on Bard’s shoulder. “Shall I tell you how I think of you, at night when I cannot sleep, which is your doing? You are a saint. A beautiful saint who is patient, and kind, and brave.”

Bard’s chuckle was embarrassed. “My children would disagree with you.”

“No, they would not. They know what their father is even better than I do.”

Something about that made Bard laugh. He shook his head in wry amusement.

“What?”

“My daughter. Sigrid. She made me call you last night.”

“Did she?” Thran’s laughter was silent, but pleased. “I am grateful to her.”

“It’s not that I didn’t want to on my own,” Bard said. “But I thought... eh. Then she said that she thought it was cute the way you and I mooned over each other on Thanksgiving Day, and that I’d better call you.”

“We were that obvious? I thought we were both quite subtle.”

Bard snorted. “Says the man in the black silk tee, who has the same thing on today.”

“Your blue shirt was no less mouthwatering.”

Bard grimaced. “Gods, listen to us. We sound like a couple of teenaged girls.”

He’d said us. Not you and I, but us. Thran brushed a kiss on Bard’s ear. “Then let us go to see your important thing, out in the world where we will act more sedately.”

Bard rubbed a hand through his hair self-consciously. “I wonder how far we’ll get?”

“Let us find out.”

Thran drew Bard up with a tug on his hand. Gods, how much effort was it to resist when Bard’s fingers tightened on his wrist? To pull the Henley over his head when he really wanted to strip the black tee off, then Bard’s heavy coat and faded blue Henley?

“Should I braid my hair before we go on our adventure?” he managed to ask in a light tone.

“Either way,” Bard said, looking at Thran’s mane, then shaking his head and looking away. “Gods, Thran. Stop making me look at you.”

“Perhaps I should braid it, then,” Thran said, his fingers already twisting the long white strands into a quick three-strand plait. “I must tie it off.”

He fetched an elastic from the bathroom and wound it around the end of his braid as he returned to the living room. Bard watched him come, shook his head, and looked away.

“Mad. Totally fucking mad.”

Thran allowed himself a wicked grin as he fetched his bag of picnic things from the kitchen. “Not yet. But I hope soon.”

Bard shot him an incredulous look. “I don’t believe you. And put on a coat, funny dancer. You’ll catch your death outside.”

Thran pulled on his coat and scarf, shouldered his bag, and pointed to the door. “If that happens, I hope you will think of some way to keep me warm.”

“Enough, okay?” Bard protested, half laughing. “I’ve got to drive, and I can’t if you’re going to distract me all the way.”

Thran gave an exaggerated sigh. “If I must.”

They forged downstairs and into the street. Thran jammed his hands into his coat pockets so that he didn’t link his arm in Bard’s as they walked down the street. For now, the change in the way they looked at each other would have to remain private. Half a block down, Bard pointed to a heavy-duty tradesman’s pickup truck, old and well worn, but well maintained.

“It’s not a limo,” Bard warned, unlocking the driver’s side door.
“I am not fond of limos,” Thran confessed, as Bard stowed the cooler behind the seat, then the bag. He leaned into the cab to unlock the passenger side door, then jumped out to take Thran’s bag to stow it. When it clanked, Thran remembered the bottle inside. “Make sure that does not fall over. I brought champagne.”

Bard turned a mock glowering look on Thran. “It’s chilled, too. So you plotted last night what you’d do to me this morning.”

Thran laughed as he circled to the passenger side of the truck and climbed in. After he shut the door and fastened his seatbelt, he watched Bard do the same, start the engine, and check the gauges. “Would you rather I say that the champagne has nothing to do with you? That of course dancers subsist only on the finest French champagne, and never deign to let soda or mere water pass our lips?”

Bard laughed at Thran’s imitation of a flighty ballet dancer as he maneuvered the truck away from the curb and down the street. “Of course, I should have realized that the champagne was for you. The poor welder will have to make do with water.”

“I brought two glasses.”

Bard snorted. “Real glasses, too, I’ll bet.”

“It does not taste the same in plastic.”

“I wouldn’t know. Though I grant you that water doesn’t taste the same in plastic, either.”

“Nothing does.”

Bard concentrated on getting them through the crowded streets. Before long, they were on the highway, heading west away from the city.

“Why don’t you like limos?”

The dark windows. I cannot see out of them. My stomach does not like it when I cannot see where I go in a vehicle in motion.”

“Been in a lot of them, I guess.”

“More than I prefer.”

“Are you warm enough? I can turn up the heat if you’re not.”

Thran gave Bard a smile. “I am fine. I will not break.”

“You looked thoroughly miserable the night you banged on my door.”

“I was soaked, and frozen. And rude. I am sorry.”

“You had a right to be angry. And it all worked out.”

“I hope it does.”

Bard swallowed, but kept his eyes on the road.

“May I ask where we go now?”
Bard’s face was shadowed with something intangible. Were they making a pilgrimage to a cemetery, perhaps? To the grave of Bard’s wife? Wouldn’t that be an important place to Bard?

“It’s... not far. I’ll explain everything when we get there. But it’s something I want you to see first, before I say anything.”

Thran nodded acquiescence. “All right.”

“May I ask about your son? Legolas?”

“Of course. He is fourteen, perhaps the same age as your Bain. He has very blond hair, rather than white as mine is, and his eyes are blue. He looks more like his mother than me, and he shares our slender build. He is a good student, but he excels at fencing and archery. His dream is to make the Olympic team in one of those disciplines, but he is not yet old enough to try out.”

“Does his boarding school give him the chance to do the fencing and archery?”

Thran nodded. “It is a good school, and Legolas likes it well enough. I am the one who wishes it were not necessary. But to travel with me, or to be at home alone with a tutor, is no life for a child. The boarding school allows him to have friends of his own, a stable base, the athletic training he loves, and the chance to do many other things well.”

Bard nodded in understanding. “But you miss him.”

“Very much. One day, when I no longer dance on a regular basis, perhaps we will be together. But he will be old enough to go to college soon, so perhaps we will never live together again as a family.”

Bard’s face tightened. He knew better than Thran about the rigors of parenting children alone. It was surely a much direr, hard-scrabbling worry for him than a well-paid dancer. Thran thought he was about to speak of that, but Bard forced the worry from his face and glanced at him with a shrug.

“It’s never easy,” was all he said. “It’s never easy trying not to worry about it every second, either. But today, we’ll take a breather from the real world. Today we have a better way to spend our time.”

“This morning was very nice,” Thran grinned, trying to ease Bard’s mood. He was glad when Bard reddened. “Ah. I think you thought so, too.”

Bard shook his head, smiling. “Nice is not what I’d call it. An ambush is a better term for it.”

“It was a very nice ambush. I have not had the pleasure of being swept aloft in the arms of a beautiful saint before.”

“It was you ambushing me, not the other way around.”

“We were both entranced. It does not matter who started it.”

Bard sighed, but kept his eyes on the road. “We’re almost there. Next exit.”

When they’d left the highway, they were in a small community, not quite rural, but far from urban. The sign off the exit ramp read Greenwood Dale on the Lake, 3 Mi. Thran’s eyes flickered in recognition. Ah, the mysterious saint’s story was becoming interesting – this was no cemetery they were about to visit. He recalled what he’d read online when he’d typed Bard’s name into the search engine, but held his silence. Let Bard tell his tale in his own time.
Two miles on, a small cluster of upscale touristy shops fanned out on both sides of the road, an eclectic collection of art galleries, artisan clothing boutiques, the requisite coffee shop, a rustic mountain-themed bistro, and so forth. It was nicely laid out and blessedly free of ubiquitous chain eateries, with spacious car parks off the street to encourage strolling. It was quite busy, perhaps with holiday shoppers. Bard drove past the collection, not looking to either side as they went. He was on familiar territory, then.

Past the tourist mecca, Thran saw signs directing travelers to wineries, art galleries, and so forth. Another mile further on, Bard turned down a narrow track, pulling off to the side about fifty feet in. He turned off the engine and gave Thran a glance.

“Here we are. Almost.”

“Almost?”

Bard pointed out the right side of the windshield, past a locked gate and up a small rise. “Where we’re going is about fifty meters that way.”

“Let us go, then.”

They got out of the truck. Thran walked around to the driver’s side to take his bag from Bard. He took the bag of picnic supplies, too, for Bard hauled a big canvas duffel of what sounded like tools over his shoulder and hefted the small cooler. He locked the truck and crossed to the gate, fishing a key out of his pocket. When he’d freed the padlock and let them in, he locked the gate behind them, then led Thran up a slight rise along an overgrown path.

“Watch your footing. It can get muddy near the top,” Bard said, looking back at Thran. “Don’t hurt your ankle.”

“My ankle is fine, Bard.”

Thran followed Bard up the rise, which steepened just below the top. Bard held his free arm out to him, so Thran grasped it as dancers often did, fingers around wrists. When Bard’s fingers tightened against his wrist, Thran marveled at how such an innocuous touch sent so much adrenaline rushing through him. It was such a jolt that he wondered if Bard were right about madness.

If it were, so be it. He knew what he wanted, who he wanted. If Bard felt the same way, then Thran wouldn’t let anything stand against them or their madness.

Bard pulled Thran up to the top of the rise without effort, his easy strength only adding to his allure, giving Thran more than enough to smile about. Bard caught his expression, and smiled back for just a second before looking away. He nodded at the building ahead of them.

“We’re here.”

The building was a house. It was large, but well proportioned, with a porch around the front and sides. The front door was beautiful with carved panels, and stained glass sidelights and transom. Other panels of stained glass topped the many windows across the front, and the trim around the windows was intricately carved. But it was clear that the house had seen better days, for the white paint was chipped and peeling, and a piece of plywood covered one of the upstairs windows. Dried leaves cluttered the porch, and one of the balusters was broken. Another baluster was gone completely. The roof looked sketchy, and the ground around the house hadn’t been mowed in weeks.

“It doesn’t look like much, I know, but...”
“On the contrary,” Thran shook his head as they walked towards the house. “It has a beauty about it, even now. It must have been unbelievably beautiful at one point.”

“A long time ago,” Bard mused, looking up and down at the house. “Come on. The inside’s in better shape. I’ve got a couple of things to do, then we can eat.”

Bard let them in the front door. A wide entry hall lay before them, with a big room off to each side. The floors were dusty, but they were oak, with bands of lighter and darker wood beautifully inlaid around the edges. The two side rooms were bright with light, even on this mostly overcast day, and one had a figured plaster ceiling, though the central chandelier Thran expected to see was missing. Facing them was a wide wooden staircase with a broad landing a dozen steps up, where the staircase split to either side to go up to the second story. Looking up, Thran saw that there was a third story as well. The balusters were twisted iron, some threaded with clear, lobed glass spheres.

Bard nodded, his face easing into a smile.

Had he worried about what Thran would think? He looked around at the beauty still peeking through the ruin and thought about what he’d read, then turned to Bard.

“This is a great treasure. Your great treasure.”

“You understand, then,” Bard murmured. “I’ll tell you the secret now, not that it’s much of one. Daphne and I bought this when it was an even bigger wreck than it is now. We fixed it up as we had the time. It was coming along well; we actually lived in it for a couple of years. Then...”

“The accident.”

Bard nodded. “It’s paid for, at least, because it was such a wreck when we bought it. There was no baluster. With everything that needed doing, it was frivolous of me to spend so much time on replacing it, but... you see it. I don’t regret it. Moving away, into the city, nearly broke my heart, but I had to, to be near whatever work came my way. I can’t keep up with it now, so it’s going downhill faster than I can fix it, and the property taxes are painful. But... the children played here. I put a lot of work into it. So did Daphne – she did the murals upstairs, and all of the faux finishes. I keep hoping that one day I’ll find a way to get us back here. But I don’t know if that’ll ever happen.”

Thran wanted to offer Bard more than just the comfort of words – a hand on the shoulder, or the presence of another at his back. But this morning would muddle his offer of comfort between friends, so Thran held off. There was something he could offer, though.

“I would like to see the rest, if you would show me.”

Yes, that was the right thing to say, for Bard’s lips curved up. “Come on.”

Bard led Thran through the dining room to the expansive scullery kitchen, where they left their bags. It was only partially restored, but the cabinets had been stripped and repainted white, and the butler’s pantry had a satiny walnut countertop. There were no appliances – maybe Bard had had to sell them at some point – and the floor was scuffed and dull, but the potential was there for epic cooking. A wood-paneled sitting room with a fireplace followed, and off that was a small solarium, which would be magical with the plants Bard talked about keeping there. Off the center hall was a main room with a grand fireplace, though it lacked a mantle now. Upstairs were several bedrooms; the colorful murals of animals, plants, and the planets revealed which room had belonged to each of Bard’s children. The third floor had had no work done on it, so the plaster was in poor shape, the floors looked worse, and the window trim was hacked and gouged. But the two rooms would make cozy studies or playrooms when restored.

They went down into a dark and dingy cellar, typical of such houses, only long enough for Bard to close the valve to the outside water line, to protect it against freezing. They went back upstairs for Bard to replace a window latch so that the double hung window could be locked rather than remain ajar as it was now. There were a few other minor repairs, then checking that the chimney flues were all closed, and the roof gutters were clear, and the attic hadn’t let in any mice or squirrels. Then they circled the house outside to check the foundation. Looking around, Thran spotted the barn he’d read about, but so far, Bard hadn’t spoken of it, nor did he before they came inside.

“The children and I come out here several times a year – more often in the summer,” Bard explained as they went back to the kitchen to make their lunch. “We clean out the dust, and I fix whatever needs fixing, and we have a picnic like you and I are about to. Tilda doesn’t remember living here, but she still likes being here. So every time I think about selling it, I think about her, and Bain and Sig, too, and then I scrape up the property taxes one way or another.”

Thran knew how Bard had scraped up those property taxes, but as that was part of the tale that Bard hadn’t revealed yet, he held silence.

“I understand why,” he nodded, as Bard spread a towel over the marble top of the kitchen island and unpacked the cooler onto the towel. “It has good bones, and so much light. Restored, it would be a gem. And to hear your children laugh and run through the rooms...”

Bard nodded. “I still remember what that sounded like. And that’s why I can’t sell it.”

Thran winced at that quiet voice. When he came behind Bard and put hands on his shoulders, it was to comfort them both. Bard started, but Thran was rewarded when Bard relaxed, even leaned against his chest. Thran dared to ease him closer, close enough to wrap his arms loosely around Bard’s shoulders, then shut his eyes to savor their closeness. Bard seemed to appreciate it, for his hands came up to grasp Thran’s wrists. How easy it would be to get used to this closeness...

Bard’s hands tightened after some seconds. “Let’s make a plate, and then we’ll eat in style.”

Thran loosed his hands enough to catch Bard’s eyes. “This is a very stylish kitchen, indeed.”

Bard chuckled and unpacked the bag containing the plates, utensils, and napkins. “We’re not going to eat in the kitchen. I’ve got one more room to show you. The folly.”

“The folly? What is a folly?”

“This house,” Bard said, handing Thran a plate, “has a ballroom.”

“A ballroom, as in a room where one holds elaborate parties?” Thran asked, taking out his box of salad, the glasses, and the champagne.

“Very elaborate parties, from what the local historical society said,” Bard grinned, opening the box of chicken and putting the French bread on a plate to slice it. A small block of Jarlsberg cheese went beside it. “Bain would rather hold very elaborate indoor soccer games, which he and Tilda have done a few times. So however you want to characterize it, we’ve got it covered.”

Thran found the corkscrew and deftly uncorked the champagne, offering an amused bow when Bard murmured appreciatively. He poured the two glasses, held one out to Bard, and took the other one himself. He held up his glass. “Lyubov.”
“Cheers.”

They clinked glasses, and sipped. Thran thought this was one of the better champagnes he’d had, but the company likely colored his impression.

“What’s Lyubov mean?” Bard asked, contemplating his glass.

Thran’s grin was sly. “To love. It is usually offered to a beautiful lady, but you are no less worthy of it.”

Bard grimaced as he helped himself to chicken, but it was half of a smile as well as a grimace. “You’re the beauty, Thran. I’m the beast.”

“I will be the judge of that for myself. As you are for yourself.”

When they’d shared out the food, Thran looked expectantly at Bard. “Now. This stylish ballroom.”

Bard offered him a tongue-in-cheek bow, and pointed back towards the front hall. “Right this way.”

With glass and plate in hand, Bard led Thran back through the hall and into the main room, through the door at the far end, and into the ballroom. The ceiling was at least fifteen feet high, with another elaborate plaster ceiling and places for three chandeliers. A wooden floor laid in an intricate herringbone pattern was dusty, but intact. A huge fireplace flanked by two windows stood at the far end; bowed windows stretched across the near end, revealing the dead and tangled remains of an overgrown flower bed outside. Incongruously, an iron garden bench, pair of chairs, and table sat opposite the fireplace, which was where he and Bard arranged their plates and glasses. Bard took one of the chairs, but Thran straightened to survey the ballroom again. He could easily visualize a scene from Anna Karenina in this airy room, with a pianist at a grand piano, or a string quartet, playing opposite the fireplace for elegantly dressed dancers...

Or for a troupe of ballet dancers as they practiced their grand jetés and pliés...

That was not his vision to have.

Before the thought was complete, he found himself aloft in one of those grand jetés, if a gentle one in deference to his healing ankle, and his lack of warmup. The split was easy, and he did a half twist in midair so that he could launch and land on his right leg.

“You make that look so easy,” Bard marveled, as Thran landed without too much of a clunk, even given his hiking boots. “Gods, Thran. You are an angel. I can see your wings.”

Thran put his hand to his heart and bowed. “That is the highest compliment. Thank you.”

He came to sit by Bard and take up his plate, but Bard considered him with such awe that he reached forward to stroke that dark hair.

“Do not stare, gentle saint. Or I shall be forced to kiss you again.”

Bard blinked. “I’m sorry.”

Thran sipped his champagne. “Do not be. It would be a pleasure to kiss you again. I resist the urge only to respect your sensibilities.”

Bard swallowed, then a smile began, but just as quickly, it faded. He ducked his head to his plate and concentrated on his lunch. Something clearly tugged at him, but Thran was patient. The afternoon was not over, so perhaps Bard would unburden himself without prodding before they returned to the city. He ate his lunch quietly, appreciating the beautiful setting and the welcome company.

They took their time, talking quietly of less charged subjects, until the angle of the sun told them that it was time to leave. There was little other than the half bottle of champagne to pack back in the cooler and bags, and Thran was sorry when Bard locked the door behind them, dropped the key in his coat pocket, and headed back towards the truck. Thran, though, didn’t follow.

“When will you tell me the rest?” he asked softly, putting his bag on the porch.

Bard looked back at him with a frown. “What rest?”

Thran nodded towards the barn behind the house. “That rest.”

Bard stilled, as if he’d felt a trap fall over him. Thran went to him quickly, stroking his arm. “Please. It is all right.”

“You know what’s in the barn?”

Thran nodded. “The Internet knows many things. That you are not merely a tradesman welder, for example. You are an artist, as your wife was, but in metal rather than oils. I saw pictures of your work – it is quite good. I would like to see some of it in person, if you would show me. Please.”

Bard’s jaw tightened. “I’ve had to sell most of them.”

“To support your children.”

He nodded. “And pay the property taxes.”

“Tell me.”

With a sigh, Bard put down the cooler and his bag of tools beside Thran’s bag on the porch. He looked at his boots, then towards the barn, his posture hunched. “I told you that Daphne had a good head for business. Thank the gods for that, because I don’t. We bought this house not just because it was beautiful. There was an artist’s colony forming here, and she was hired to manage a lot of it. We were doing well enough with her income as the colony manager and a rep for several of the artists, me included, and the money my pieces brought in. I worked on my commissions, and did most of the childcare. But after Daphne died... everything fell apart. The colony didn’t get someone as good to replace her, the artists lost our rep, and after a year or so I had to move to the city to find work. It was a scramble to find childcare – not just warehousing, you understand, but good childcare. Then to find work around their schedule... I won’t lie, Thran. We live hand to mouth. I’m not with my children as much as I want because I work two jobs to keep a roof over us and food on the table. At least I don’t have to worry about the state stepping in, now that Sigrid’s sixteen and Bain’s thirteen. Tilda’s just ten, but as long as she’s with someone older than twelve, it’s legal, so either Sigrid or Bain can step in if I get caught late somewhere.”

“But it is a constant worry.”

Bard swallowed hard. “The understatement of the year. So far, everything’s hanging together. But... Sigrid will want to go to college in two years, and I can’t afford it. I have no health insurance. Sometimes I’ve had to work scab jobs because I need the money, and if the union finds out, I could lose a lot of work. Everything’s balanced on the edge of a knife. It can fall apart at any second. If I get hurt at work, or the union finds out, or one of the children gets sick....” He looked nervously at Thran. “Do you understand why I’m so leery about... us?”
“No.”

Bard laughed, a bitter sound, and looked away again. “You’re not the only one who knows how to use the Internet. Here’s what I found out about a certain Thran Oropherson. You’re not just some ballet dancer – you’re one of the best dancers working today. You’re sought after all over the world. That dance with the knives you told Bain about? You didn’t merely learn it. It was commissioned just for you. It’s your signature piece. Your sprained ligaments? You got them when two muggers with knives tried to rob you and another dancer. You gave one a broken leg and the other a punctured lung with his own knife, and the ballerina you were with wasn’t touched. Maybe your dance company doesn’t think enough of you saving one of their ballerinas and yourself to hold your job for you, but half a dozen other ones are jockeying to offer you another one at a salary I can hardly imagine. Unless you’re a fool with your money, which judging by your apartment contents, you aren’t, you’re already worth millions, and you’re likely to make a few more. So that makes me look like a poor starving artist trying to snare a sugar daddy. I won't go there. Not even for my children.”

Thran put his hands in his coat pockets and looked down at his boots, then looked askance at Bard. “If you prefer, you could be the boy toy of a frivolous artiste.”

Bard’s eyes snapped to his, so startled that Thran laughed openly. “Ah. Outrage. That is a good sign.”

Bard half opened his mouth to curse, but clamped it shut and turned away. Thran sobered, then came slowly to Bard’s back.

“I tease only. But... I think perhaps you need to learn more about how to surf the Internet.”

“Why?” Bard said shortly.

“Because it also should have told you that I am something of a recluse. I dance, and do little else. I do not party, as many dancers do. I do not engage in... liaisons. I do not live in the insulated world of the primo, but apart, in a building that is close to the studio and the market and nothing else, because I have no use for most of the world outside of the dance, other than the food that allows me to dance. If someone tries to ingratiate himself, they find that I am just the Prince of Ice I am often called. Neither am I Rudi Nureyev, who mechanically had too much sex merely to have it. I have not had a lover since before Vileria died, seven years ago. I understand that this makes me an oddity. I understand that your worry only confirms that you are a decent man. So... if you put aside money, could you consider that we might be two artists who fall in love?”

Bard swallowed convulsively. “We’ve known each other less than two weeks!”

“Bard.” Thran turned his companion around to face him, and tapped his chest. “What is in here?” When Bard swallowed hard, Thran nodded. “I feel it, too. It is full of fear, sometimes. But also full of excitement.”

But Bard looked no easier. He shook Thran by the shoulders gently, as if wondering if he were real.

“It’s more than that. You’re someone I could drown in, Thran. Without a second look back. But I can’t. Neither can you.”

“Why not?”

“We’ve got children.”

That stopped Thran as nothing else could have. Legolas. Of course. How could he have forgotten, no matter how much Bard drew him?

“Oh, gods,” Thran flinched. “My son. For the first time in years, I did not think of him. Why did I not?”

Now it was Bard’s turn to jostle Thran in commiseration. “You just had a reason to want something else for the first time in a long time. You would’ve remembered him in a minute or two.”

Thran grimaced. “I am still ashamed of myself.”

“Give yourself a break. You have to let down every now and again.”

A chuckle. “If nothing else convinces you that there is something between us, then this should. You made me forget about Legolas for an entire minute.”

Finally, Bard lost the hunted look in his eyes, and he shrugged. “If all you managed was to forget him for a full sixty seconds, then he’s in good shape, and so are you.”

“What about our children concerns you?”

“Legolas isn’t here. He doesn’t see you often, but when he does, he’s used to having you all to himself. He may not like his father having a... companion. He may not like my children, or me. Assuming we find out that what’s sparked between us isn’t just a flash in the pan, we owe all of our children a chance to get used to it. Does Legolas come home for the holidays at all?”

Thran nodded. “He does. We will have a month together, starting in two weeks.”

“When he comes home, then, you do all the things with him that you usually do. After a week or so, maybe we meet at the park, or something easy. Maybe we have supper together. But mostly you have to remind him that you love him, and you’re there for him, first and foremost.”

Thran nodded. “You are a wise saint, as well as a beautiful one.”

Bard laughed.

“So... please, would you show me the art you have made?”

Bard nodded. “I will.”

They left their bags on the porch. At the barn door, Bard fished out another key, opened the padlock, and slid the wide door open, flooding the interior with the pale overcast light. The space was mostly empty, for only a few pieces remained out of the many Thran had seen on the Internet. There seemed to be the machinery of a workshop in the back, but the front housed several metal sculptures. He recognized a graceful stylized antelope with curving horns from pictures he’d seen on the Internet, and a tall pillar of intertwined fish. Behind them was a pine tree that seemed to blow and tremble on the breeze, for all that it was made of bronze. A more modern piece was a hollow sphere made of intertwined rings, undulating in shades of copper and purple and blue. Next to it was a piece made of humble black iron, an intricate knot of thin rods with a patina that varied between the blackest black and the rustiest red. Despite the weighty material, all of them had a quality of lightness and nimble rhythm.

“I have never seen hard metal look so fluid or so light. So graceful. So beautiful.”

Bard nodded in appreciation. “These are the ones I’d hoped to keep for myself. It’d kill me to sell any of them, but... we’ll see how things go.”
“If you have to sell any of them, offer them to me first. What is the appropriate idiom? ‘I am good for the money.’ ”

Laughing, Bard brushed a fleck of grass off the iron knot. “I’ll do that. At least I know they’d go to someone who saw the magic I tried to put in them. Just... don’t get your hopes up yet. Everything may hold together a while longer.”

“I hope so.”

Bard locked his treasures in the barn again, and they walked together back towards the house. They sat on the porch steps, hip-to-hip and shoulder-to-shoulder.

“Are there any more secrets to be revealed?” Thran asked with a smile, leaning into Bard.

“I used to be a corporate spy,” Bard deadpanned, wrapping an arm around Thran’s waist. “All that illicit welding I did? It was really to install listening devices in half a dozen stockbroker houses to overhear all the insider trading.”

“Ah,” Thran deadpanned back, his hand wrapped around Bard’s thigh. “I suppose I must confess that I was a trained assassin, then. My targets were all hated ballet critics.”

“I bet you had no end of work, then,” Bard grinned.

“I did not. So, if we have revealed all our secrets, then we must negotiate terms.”

“Terms? Of what?”

“To court. For I intend to. We have our children to respect, of course. We will want to reassure each other that neither of us carries HIV, not that I do, nor that I think you do, but it is a courtesy we should grant each other. We will not be flagrant about our affections in front of the children because that is disrespectful, or in public, because that is crass. We need time to learn about each other before we cloud it with sex, delirious though that sex would be, for it is better to be friends first and then lovers. If and when we decide that ours is not an infatuation that passes, we must discuss what follows, and whether a prenuptial agreement is called for. All of that will come. But first, I want to know whether you consider this spot on which we stand a public place or a private one.”

Bard had started laughing halfway through Thran’s recitation. “You’re serious? You are. Gods, Thran – do I what? Is this a public or... why?”

“Answer me first.”

Bard shrugged. “This is still my porch, so I guess it’s private.”

“Good. Then I intend to kiss you again, because we are in private. As cold as it is, we will not get ourselves into further trouble, so you have nothing to worry about.”

Bard looked away, shaking his head, still laughing. When he looked back at Thran, though, his eyes softened, and he reached out to stroke the end of Thran’s long white braid. “You might, though. What if I offered to unlock the door and ask you back inside?”

“I would accept,” Thran breathed, turning Bard’s face towards his to stroke his hair. “I would bring the rest of the champagne with us to celebrate.”

“I wouldn’t need any champagne,” Bard shook his head. He leaned into Thran to brush a kiss on his lips. “I’d have an angel in my arms, and no champagne could top that.”
Thran slipped fingers into Bard’s coat pocket, fished out the house key, and held it out. Bard eyed him until Thran jingled the key. When Bard finally took it and got up to unlock the door, Thran crowded hard behind him. He had Bard’s shoulders in his hands before they were fully inside, but it was Bard who kicked the door shut and pressed Thran against it. Widening his stance to lessen his height, Thran pulled Bard’s hips hard against his, holding him there. Bard leaned into him, stripping off his coat, then grooping to unbutton Thran’s to press them chest-to-chest. His elbows rested against the door at Thran’s shoulders, so he could twine his hands in Thran’s hair as they kissed. Thran fell into their embrace without resistance, rubbing himself against Bard, biting those seeking lips, nipping that throat, kissing that hollow at the base of his throat. He found the back of Bard’s jeans, pulled the hem of his Henley free, and slid his hands under it and up Bard’s back, around his ribs. When he found Bard’s nipples, already hard, he stroked them with his thumbs and bit Bard’s lower lip, tearing a moan from his lover.

“Gods, Thran!” Bard gasped. “Gods, you greedy bastard –”

Thran grinned as Bard pushed himself away and tried to master himself. Had he teased enough to send Bard over the edge? No, Bard wrestled his arousal down, if reluctantly. Thran stayed leaning against the door, his legs still wide. He rubbed his hands against his thighs as he appreciated the turmoil before him, as well as what raged inside him.

“I assure you, you have given me nothing to worry about yet,” he teased, panting. “So far, everything has been delicious.”

Bard brushed another kiss on Thran’s lips, a kiss that Thran met without resistance, without trying to tease Bard into more. “So far, you have been no angel, and all devil.”

“I enjoy both roles. But that is enough of both for today, perhaps.”

“It’s not nearly enough. But it’s all I can handle.”

Thran nodded. “Then kiss me once more, to last me until the next one.”

This kiss was slow and lingering, less frantic passion than affection. When it was over, Thran eased away from the door to pick up Bard’s coat. His lover was shoving the tail of his Henley back into his jeans, so Thran held out the coat for Bard to slip on. Once outside, Thran rebuttoned his coat while Bard locked the door, then they carried the bags back to the truck, and climbed in for the drive home.

They were silent most of the way, but it was a comfortable silence, occasionally punctuated when a hand strayed to touch a thigh, or a smile passed between them. When they arrived back in the city, it was almost dark. Bard parked across the street from their building, and they walked up to Thran’s apartment with their silence still intact. At the door, Thran took Bard’s face in his hands and pressed a kiss on his lips.

“Today was perfect.”

Bard nestled Thran’s hips against his. This time, he was the one who widened his stance to ease Thran closer. “I can’t even tell you what today meant. So I won’t try.”

”Tell me that you want to us to spend more time together as much as I do.”

“I do.”

“Then we will.”

Bard kissed him again, and went downstairs without a look back.
Thran let himself into his apartment. He dropped his bag by the door, then his coat, and sat in the middle of the sofa. He stretched his legs out before him and leaned his head on the back of the sofa.

How would he survive until they were together again?
Chapter 8

Chapter Summary

The saint has dared to fly to the heights, but the price for those few moments of ecstasy is high - so high that not even the solace of an angel can ease the resulting despair.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

suka = bitch (Russian) blyad = motherfucker (Russian)

Bard didn’t look back at Thran when he went down the stairs. He was afraid that if he looked back, the angel who had upended his life would be gone, vanished into the same oblivion that had claimed everything else he’d hoped for in the past decade. He didn’t think he could bear to regard the door to Apartment 5B closed and silent, without a tall, graceful, beautiful angel standing before it with beckoning eyes, smiling lips, and a body that drew Bard like nothing had in years. Better to treasure the warmth that still lingered on his lips than look back and find the vision had faded before the warmth of his kiss did.

When he got to Apartment 2A, he almost didn’t want to go in, not because his children were there, but because the weight of the rest of his life was.

It was late. Sigrid and Bain would be hungry.

He went inside.

The clock on the bookshelf that held his tools read 5:20 p.m. It wasn’t as late as he thought. The overcast sky had made him think it was later. Sigrid looked up from the dining table, still in front of her computer, still in the middle of papers and books.

“Da?” she asked, eyebrows raised.

“Hi, sweetness. How’s the paper?”

The smile on her face was relieved. “I finally got it worked out. I’ve actually got a better premise now than I did originally, so I’m happy, even though it was a lot of work. I think I’ll get a better grade.”

Bard finished stowing his tools. He hung up his coat, left his boots by the door, and came to press a kiss on the top of his daughter’s head. “That’s my girl. I had no doubt that you’d sort it out. Where’s Bain?”

Sigrid straightened a stack of her papers. “He and his mates couldn’t get the early tickets to the film, but they got ones for the last matinee. He texted me first to find out if it was okay. I said yes, so I
“That’s fine. Thanks for taking care of that. Wonder if he’ll be hungry when he gets home, or did he blow the last of his allowance on popcorn?”

“He’s a teen-ager, Da,” was Sigrid’s dismissal. “He’ll be ravenous.”

Bard chuckled as he went into the kitchen. “You’re right. Tilda didn’t call?”

“She texted to say that the hayride was fun and that a goat wanted to stick its nose in her pockets, but that’s it.”

“So you’ll get the room to yourself tonight. You can stay up all night reading if you want.”

Sigrid tsked. “I’ve done nothing but stare at the printed word all day. Maybe I’ll watch a DVD or something, unless there’s something on you want to see.”

“Help yourself. No hockey or soccer on tonight. Steffen didn’t call with anything, did he?”

“For once,” Sigrid sniffed.

Bard should’ve reminded her about the reduced rent, but after today he was more inclined to mind how Steffen took advantage, so he didn’t say anything.

“Was everything all right at the house?”

Bard looked in the fridge, found the ground beef, and put it on the counter by the stove. “Replaced the broken window lock, shut off the water, cleaned the gutters, refastened the squirrel baffles in the attic, and checked everything over. There’s still that broken window upstairs. I forgot to get the glass to replace it.”

“How was lunch?”

“Fine. Hamburgers or bean skillet?”

“Fine?” Just ‘fine?’”

Bard looked out of the kitchen door at her. “It was chicken sandwiches, clementines, and fig bars. They were all fine.”

“Da!” Sigrid glared back in exasperation. “How was Thran?”

“He brought salad. That was fine, too.”

“What’d he do, hold the torch?”

“And a fine job he did of it. Held the ladder when I checked the gutters, too. Pretty handy for a ballet dancer.”

“And?”

“And the question’s still open – hamburgers, or bean skillet.”

“Hamburgers. Now what about you and Thran?”

Bard stuck his head out of the kitchen door again, a can of beans in his hand. “Does this mean that I “get to ask you about your dates from now on?”

“Oh, so it was a date. Did you show him the barn?”

A long silence stretched, long enough that Sigrid got up and came into the kitchen. “Da?”

Bard swallowed. “It was hard to see the house, Sig, that’s all. A lot needs fixing.”

Sigrid laid her hand on Bard’s forearm. “I’m sorry, Da.”

He gave her a smile. “Eh, I couldn’t have done most of it today, anyway. Too cold. Better to start on that in the spring.”

Sigrid mustered a smile for him, took the can of beans, and moved around him to get the can opener and saucepan. It occurred that he wasn’t the only one dissembling. He pretended that the spring would find him with the wherewithal to make the repairs, and his daughter pretended to believe him.

Not being able to stop the house from decaying wouldn’t have bothered him so much if he hadn’t spent the afternoon with an angel.

Sigrid seemed to sense his melancholy, for she didn’t ask about his afternoon again. Instead, they talked about Sigrid’s upcoming exams, what to get Tilda for Christmas (where would he find the money for much?), and whether Bain would eat two or three hamburgers for supper. At five minutes before six, when Bain clattered in smelling like the outside and teen-aged sweat, the conversation was more lighthearted. Supper was duly cooked, eaten, and cleaned up.

Bain never asked about the house.

After the children went to bed, Bard sat on the sofa, relieved to be alone, no longer required to keep a mask over his feelings. At least now he could think about kissing an angel, having him in his hands, feeling the urgency that strained against him...

Gods. It was painful.

Madness was always painful, but this was too painful to bear. All he wanted was to be three flights above his dump of an apartment, above his constant worry of three children, two jobs, only one of him, and no money –

His mobile buzzed. Steffen. The heat was off in 7A.

Sigrid was still awake, so he told her where he was going. He put on his boots, got his tools, climbed the stairs, and endured Lotho and Lobelia Sackville-Baggins giving him an earful about how the heat had been off since noon and how poorly maintained the heating system was. Theirs was one of the double-size apartments that took up the whole floor, and it was so crowded that it took half an hour just to clear enough room for him to reach the radiator valves. His mobile buzzed before he was through. Apartment 8A had the same heating issue, plus a clogged kitchen sink. So he went from 7A upstairs where the Ur brothers, Bom and Bo, were in the middle of some arcane holiday cooking ritual. They were decent sorts, if eccentric, and Bom was enormously fat. Bard bled the radiators, then fished out a wad of potato and apple peelings and from the sink trap. He had a hellacious time trying to get the sink trap reconnected, but finally, after an hour, he convinced the PVC pipes to align well enough for the epoxy to hold. The brothers were very appreciative, unlike the Sackville-Baggins, and pressed a couple of raisin cookies on him before he left.

His mobile buzzed again. Heat, 8B.
If he wasn’t already suspicious about the rash of radiators that needed bleeding, Mr. Dori confirmed it. He was a fussy hairdresser, but another decent sort. At least he left Bard alone to do what was needed, so blessedly it took only a few minutes. The poor man was most appreciative as he pulled the blanket wrapped around his shoulders closer.

“It’s been off since noon. I called, but given how late you are, I imagine a lot of people have had the same problem. I’m sorry you’ve had to work on it so late.”

Steffen had known about the problems, then, and hadn’t done anything about them himself. He’d waited until he could get Bard to do it.

His mobile buzzed. Another clogged garbage disposal. Was half the building up after midnight cooking like the Ur brothers? This one was in 9A.

It wasn’t a clogged garbage disposal. It was a toilet, which had clogged hours ago, and the owner was getting desperate. By the time Bard had snaked it clear and cleaned up the mess, it was nearly two a.m., and he stank like the nearest water treatment plant. He came out of the apartment and into the stairwell feeling numb.

He carried his bag of tools down the stairs.

When he reached the fifth floor landing, he paused by the door to Apartment 5B.

He reeked of fermenting apple peelings, something gamy – with the Ur brothers, there was no telling what the gamy stuff was – PVC epoxy, and sewage. His clothes were much the worse for the wear, and he was exhausted.

He swallowed.

Which was worse – the mad desire for an angel, or knowing the angel was out of reach? Neither the angel’s words nor his ecstatic temptations changed a brutal truth.

A tall, elegant, pale creature of the air had no place venturing into the dregs of the building.

He shut his eyes.

He took his bag of tools and went back to the dregs of the building.

* * *

At length, Thran unlaced his hiking boots and toed them off his feet. He slipped off his coat, then got up to wipe the mud off his boots and put them in the closet. He hung up his coat. He recorked the champagne and put the bottle in the refrigerator. He washed the empty salad container and the champagne glasses and put them away. He put his muddy jeans in the hamper for launderers to pick up on Monday, and dressed in loose sweats to do his PT exercises. It felt good to stretch, even if gingerly. A hot shower followed, then a light supper of chicken – boiled, but with some of the spices Bard had told him about – and broccoli.

Then he thought.

A once-beautiful house was in his thoughts, and so was the man who owned it, but they were the roots of much more. He opened his laptop, and found the articles he’d read a week ago about Bard Bowman, artist in metal. He read new ones about Greenwood Dale by the Lake, the artists’ colony that had begun there, and what had happened since. One article led to another, and another, and another. Before long, Thran had a list of things he wanted to discuss with his agent about his current contract. He had a similar list of questions for several other people, including his banker.

A familiar step on the outside stair brought Thran out of his dispassionate reverie with a jolt. Thran glanced at the clock by his chair. Nearly midnight. No matter – time was immaterial when it came to Bard knocking on his door. Thran sprang out of his chair to reach the door –

The steps continued upstairs. Thran winced. Bard had been called out to see to something – another cold radiator, perhaps. He settled back on the sofa with his computer, keeping one ear cocked for the sound of Bard coming back downstairs. But more than an hour passed, then nearly another. He’d heard boots on the stairs going upstairs, then again, and again. Eventually he pieced together what was going on – either a rash of outages, breakages, or clogs had seen fit to plague the building all at once...

Or the landlord had left the days’ repairs to the night super, when the residents would be desperate, and just as furious as Thran had been when he’d confronted Bard about his cold radiators.

“Suka,” he growled under his breath, and savagely added another line to his growing list. “Suka, blyad!”

Thran stayed on the sofa, listening for those boots to come back downstairs. At nearly two a.m., the sound came, but by the time Thran woke and registered it, Bard had passed his floor. Thran eased his door open to look down the stairwell. The door to 2A had just closed. At least Bard was going into his apartment, rather than having to make another call.

Thran shut his door. Where was his mobile? He called up Bard’s number to send him a text.

What should he say? What could he say? That he loved Bard? That he was sorry he’d been called to work so late? He gulped – he had to send something quickly or not at all, before Bard fell into much deserved sleep.

I am beside you wherever and whenever you need me – Thran.

* * *

Bard’s mobile buzzed yet again. It was all he could do not to swear. He was desperately tired, filthy, and depressed. He almost didn’t pull his mobile out. If Steffen would just leave him alone until the morning, just until the morning, he’d take care of all the things Steffen couldn’t be bothered to do –

I am beside you wherever and whenever you need me – Thran.

Bard’s throat closed.

He set down his tools, got a quick shower, and found his sleep pants and tee. He crawled into bed and pulled up the quilt.

He looked at the text again.
He didn’t reply.

* * *

Thran slipped into bed with his mobile in his hand. But it remained silent.

He wouldn’t blame Bard for turning his mobile off – or throwing it against a wall, for that matter. Or maybe Bard didn’t have texting capabilities? No, he’d seen Bard scroll through it at the house when they’d come in for lunch, checking that his children hadn’t left him a message. So maybe Bard had merely turned off his phone.

He hoped nothing else had happened.

He felt it in his bones. Something had.
Chapter 9

Chapter Summary

While the saint despairs, the angel marshals his forces. When the moment comes to strike, though, the angel proves that a denizen of heaven can be a real badass.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

blyad = motherfucker (Russian) сука бляд = motherfucking bitch, more or less (Russian) лобов моя = my love (Russian)

“– quiet, Bain! Da was up until after two last night.”

“That rat Steffen?”

“Who else?”

Bain muttered under his breath. “What was his excuse this time?”

“Da didn’t say,” Sigrid said. “Just got his stuff and went.”

“Just like he always does. That’s why that fat bastard keeps doing it. He knows Da can’t say no.”

“Even if he could, he wouldn’t.”

“Maybe he ought to.”

“You know why he doesn’t. Trying to take care of us.”

“And that house.”

“He loves that house,” Sigrid said sharply. “I love it, too.”

Bain made conciliatory noises. It sounded and smelled like he was making toast. “He say anything about going out there yesterday?”

“Said he fixed a lot of things, but not much else. He was kind of down.”

“Like there’s a lot to look forward to out there.”

“He’s doing the best he can, Bain. What else do you want him to do?”

“I don’t know, Sig. I don’t know.”
Conversation lapsed. After a few minutes, Bain got up to wash his dishes, then tiptoed past Bard’s alcove to disappear into the bathroom. Bard turned over and sat up, rubbing his eyes, pretending he’d just roused. He pulled on the clean tee he’d put by the bed last night, then picked up his mobile to check the time.

_I am beside you wherever and whenever you need me – Thran._

He’d left Thran’s text on the screen last night. Swallowing, he thought about deleting it, but something kept him from doing so. Maybe he couldn’t be with an angel, but at least he had something tangible to remind him that he’d flirted with one.

Tangible – that was a laugh. The arrangement of pixels on a screen was about as tangible as thinking he had anything to offer anyone. He stabbed a finger to banish the text.

He didn’t delete it, though.

It was near nine, so he got up, murmured good morning to Bain as they passed between the living room and the bathroom, and he took care of necessities. At least he had a clean pair of jeans to put on so he didn’t have to don yesterday’s filthy pants. Sigrid was still in the kitchen, looking over her paper while she ate her usual peanut butter toast.

“Morning, Sig. Does the paper still make sense?”

She grinned. “Yeah, thank the gods. It really does. Ms. Blanca had better like it. It’s amazing how you have an idea, then once you start writing, the idea changes, and you come up with something cooler than you thought you would. So keep your fingers crossed that Ms. Blanca thinks so, too.”

Bard held up both hands, all fingers crossed, drawing Sigrid’s laughter. “So what’re your plans today?”

“Bain and I are doing our Christmas shopping. You can’t come.”

Bard gave his daughter a mock sad face. “Not being able to go to a hot warehouse full of cranky people fighting over some bit of overpriced something that no one can use? I was so looking forward to it.”

“Maybe you ought to come,” Bain offered as he came from his room, arming his way into a clean flannel shirt. “Then Steffen can’t palm any more of his stuff on you this morning.”

“He’d just do what he did yesterday,” Sigrid said cynically. “Just wait until everyone’s furious and it’s too late for anyone but Da to fix it.”

His children were right, but Bard hated to see and hear so much bitterness from them. He opened his mouth to remind them about the rent, but Sigrid turned a sharp gaze on him.

“I remember about the rent, Da. But honestly, he’s getting the bargain, not you. He doesn’t pay you, and he doesn’t work, either. You do your job and his for nothing – in fact, you still pay some rent to him, so that’s worse than slavery.”

Bain made noises of agreement, but he looked embarrassed.

Bard swallowed. “It’s what gets us by right now. What I want you both to remember is how angry you feel about it. Then make yourself a promise that you won’t ever act like Steffen.”

Bain snorted. “Like I’d ever want to.”
Sigrid’s response was more measured. Still, the way her lips thinned and she crossed her arms over her chest were just how her mother would have reacted. “Honestly, Da. You’re a saint to put up with the way Steffen treats you.”

Someone else had called him a saint, someone Bard couldn’t bear to think about. “He’s not going to think I’m a saint this morning,” he managed to say.

“What’re you going to do?”

“I’m going to spend the morning bleeding the rest of the radiators I didn’t do last night, then I’m going to send Steffen the bill for the lot. Then I’m going to hope that bleeding the rest keeps me from having to do it after midnight tonight.”

“You ought to come with us to the mall, Da,” Bain coaxed.

“Tilda’s due home at eleven, and she’ll be exhausted. You two head to the mall, and the apartment will be quiet for her to sleep. I might do a little of that, myself.”

Bain and Sigrid exchanged inquiring glances, then nodded. “All right, Da. You want us to bring you anything?”

_A million dollars_, Bard thought, but he didn’t say it. “I’m good.”

“What about the market? Do we need anything?” Sigrid asked.

Bard looked in the fridge. Nothing was out for tonight’s supper, so he looked in the freezer. There were still two whole chickens from the bulk package he’d gotten on sale at the discount house, so he took one out and put it in a bowl of cold water on the counter to thaw. “Chicken for supper, with...” he looked back in the fridge, “rice and broccoli. There’s still stuff for your school lunches tomorrow, so we’re good for the market until Tuesday.”

Broccoli. It was the last from the huge bag Thran had brought for Thanksgiving.

He had nothing to offer that angel of light. Nothing.

“Make it with the rosemary, please?” Sigrid asked.

Bard nodded impassively. “Rosemary it is.”

Sigrid stood up. “Then we’ll head out, then. Good luck with the radiators.”

Bard waved a hand. “I’ll tackle that early. I’ll bet our little doll comes home with a roaring case of the sugar highs and the no-sleep cranks. She’ll crash and burn as soon as she hits the door.”

His children laughed in commiseration. “Just like we did when we were ten,” Bain had the honesty to admit with a sheepish grin. “We’re off, then.”

“And you’re leaving, too,” he gave his usual exit line, walking them to the door. "Come home safe."

"We will, Da."

After a hug from them both, he shut the door behind them, and then confronted the silence of the empty apartment.

_Don’t think of anything. Just don’t._
He made himself some ramen noodles, which saved the oatmeal and toast for the children. Then he dressed, got his bag of tools, and started at the bottom of the building, knocking on doors to see to the radiators. Most tenants were home, and glad to see him. He made steady progress, finishing the first six floors before eleven when Tilda was due home.

He didn’t look at the door to Apartment 5B when he went up the stairs.

At eleven, he was down in his apartment to wait for Tilda. She came in as excited and overtired as he expected, and she crashed with Mr. Bun as soon as she finished brushing her teeth. Bard saw her solidly asleep, then risked heading back upstairs to finish the radiators of the last three floors of the building.

Steffen lived in the so-called penthouse on the tenth floor. He could see to his own damned radiators.

He went back downstairs to watch over Tilda. The chicken was thawed, so he drained off the water and put the bowl in the fridge. He gathered up the laundry hamper with his filthy jeans, found an open washer in the basement, threw everything in, then went upstairs for the thirty minutes it’d take for the clothes to cycle through. He got everything in the dryer, then made himself more ramen for lunch. Down to empty the dryer, up to fold the clothes, and then finally he could sit on the sofa for a few minutes.

When he looked at his hand, his mobile was in it.

I am beside you wherever and whenever you need me – Thran.

How could he reply to that?

I’m fine.

Thank you, no.

Go away; I have nothing to offer you.

You’re everything I wanted, and I know I can’t have you.

Gods, just cut me a break.

The last one was closest to the truth, but it wouldn’t help to send it to Thran. The ones who could help had never answered.

That left him with nothing to say to an angel.

* * *

Thran slept poorly all night. When he gave up trying to sleep, it was only seven o’clock in the morning. He dressed warmly for his morning rituals of yoga and barre, and proceeded methodically through both without ever feeling the calm centeredness that they usually brought him. He did his PT exercises. He showered and dressed, then had his breakfast.

Throughout breakfast, boots thumped up and down the stairs, boots that didn’t stop on the fifth floor.

He retrieved his mobile from under his bed pillow where he’d cached it last night, and tapped a familiar number. When the line connected, a gruff voice answered.

“Mr. Nori, please. Thran Oropherson.”

The voice didn’t reply, but Thran was used to that. In time, another gruff voice came over the line.

“I have work for you, Mr. Nori. Several items. The first concerns a city landlord, Mr. Steffen Masters...”

Thran told Mr. Nori what he wanted him to pursue for each item, which the ever-efficient Mr. Nori duly noted. He provided the additional information that Mr. Nori needed to begin his inquiries, discussed contingencies on a few of the items, then hung up.

Thran went to his laptop, and perused his accounts to further refine the lists he’d made last night.

He went back to the barre. There was nothing else to do until tomorrow, when his banker would be in his office, and other businesses would be open to make more inquiries. His mobile stayed maddeningly silent - no chirp signaled a text or call from Bard - and so did the stairway outside his door - no familiar footfall echoed on the stair. He wouldn’t press, no matter how much he wanted to know what had happened. Bard was already harried enough without Thran adding to his burdens.

He thought of Saint Sebastian. Like the martyr, his saint in Apartment 2A suffered from so many arrows. He hoped Mr. Nori could complete his inquiries before the next one struck Bard’s heart.

He hoped that hadn’t already happened.

The day dragged on. He heard nothing from Bard. On Monday, the weather was sunny, so he assumed that Bard was on site welding. He called his banker and had a lengthy discussion. He did not call Mr. Nori. That individual would call when he had something worth saying. He went to PT, then his doctor, who cleared him to resume class, so he spent the afternoon at the school, doing little other than the basics, but just to move again was a great relief, and the need to pay attention to the dance master and the other students kept him from thinking about Bard. After class, he had a long discussion with another pair of dancers who passed along some interesting gossip.

Tuesday. More of the same.

Wednesday. Entirely too much more of the same.

Thursday. Mr. Nori called to relate several things, but Bard still had not surfaced. Thran was so distressed that at eleven that night, he texted Bard again.

I am not an angel without my wings. Please text me. Thran.

There was no answer.

After a restless night, Friday dawned to reveal the city as a miserably cold and rainy mess. Bard would not be welding today. The public schools, however, would still be in session. Since Tuesday morning, Thran had watched Tilda’s bus roar down the street, stop to pick up the little girl and several other children, and then roar away. When the bus had rumbled out of sight, Bard had shouldered his bag of tools, gotten in his truck, and driven off. Today, though, because of the weather, once Tilda got on the bus, Bard would not drive off to work. He’d come back to the apartment.

Thran was already dressed and standing by the window, watching for Tilda’s bus. When it trundled into view, Thran dashed down five flights of stairs and out of the apartment building’s front door. He stuttered to a stop, waiting until the children were on the bus and the bus pulled away. As the parents scattered, Thran scanned for Bard. Oh, gods, yes! There he was - he turned, and slowly paced towards the apartment building, eyes downcast, oblivious to the weather. Thran scrambled down the stairs and sprinted through the rain and down the sidewalk. He was nimble and swift enough to be right in front of Bard before the man looked up. At Thran's unexpected appearance, Bard flinched badly, and his eyes went wide with shock.

“Tell me what happened,” Thran pleaded softly. “Please, do not do this to me any more. Just tell me what happened. Did I hurt you?”

“You do not have to lie. I know something happened. I have been so worried about you.”

Bard looked away, swallowing so hard that Thran’s throat hurt in sympathy. “Reality happened. That’s all. Saturday was... I thought... oh, gods, Thran.”

“Saturday was wonderful, until that suka blyad landlord treated you like a slave. I heard you labor up and down the floors until two in the morning. Whatever he had you do, it was terrible, because it let him steal you from me, and me from you. I won’t let him do that.”

“There was nothing for him to steal.” Bard finally met Thran’s eyes, but his expression was bleak as he spread his arms. “Look at me, Thran – I have nothing to offer you. I didn’t before Saturday, and I still don’t.”

Hissing, Thran grabbed Bard’s upper arms and gave him a rough shake. “Don’t you dare let that fat blyad make you believe such a fucking lie! Don’t you dare!”

Bard’s eyebrows went up, and he glanced at Thran’s hands clutching his arms, and unaccountably a pale smile touched his lips. “Huh. The angel curses. He’s got a pretty strong grip for a ballet dancer, too.”

“Don’t make me show you how I put two muggers in hospital, you bastard,” Thran spat. “Now, it rains like a mother, and you know I am not at my best when I am cold and wet. So do you want to come to my apartment, or do you want me to come to yours?”

Bard looked down again for long enough that Thran tsked in exasperation and gave him another shake. “Hell, Bard! I do not get any warmer or dryer. So. Mine, or yours?”

Bard sighed, but met Thran’s eyes with a little more warmth. “Some Earl Grey would taste good right now.”

“Mine, then. Come.”

Thran linked his arm with Bard’s to pull him up the rainy sidewalk and back to their apartment building. Inside, Thran pushed Bard ahead of him up the stairs to the fifth floor. By the time Thran pulled out his apartment key, Bard was smiling a little. Once inside, Thran shrugged out of his leather jacket, letting it drop to the floor, then drew Bard’s off his shoulders to fall beside his. He stroked the wet hair out of Bard’s eyes, wiped the rain out of his eyebrows – that drew a smile from Bard – and put his arms around Bard to hold him close.

“Please, lyubov moya, don’t do that to me again. I have not slept for a week.”

It took a very long time, but Thran was determined to stand there until Bard melted. Slowly, slowly, Bard’s arms went around Thran’s ribs, and his head fell onto Thran’s shoulder. Thran nestled him close, rubbing his back slowly, pressing a kiss on his temple. He was content to let his body reinforce just how relieved he was to have Bard back, without words.

Thank the gods for rain.
Chapter 10

Chapter Summary

While the angel has delivered the saint's body from hell, his spirit has yet to be revived. How persuasive must Thran be before Bard rediscovers his hope?

If you'd like some atmosphere as you read, try some Russian ballet music in your choice of media. It's been my inspiration for the past couple of chapters. Or maybe it's just all the versions of The Nutcracker floating through the air at this time of year :-).

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

- lyubov moya = my love (Russian)
- lyubov yego = his love (Russian)
- fy nghariad = my love (Welsh) (pronounced fing gariad, more or less :-)

Out on the sidewalk, Thran had abandoned his usual elegant grace to shake Bard so hard that Bard still felt the force of Thran’s grip on his arms. Then he’d pulled him through the rain and into their apartment building, and pushed him upstairs with firm hands on his hips. Once the apartment door shut, however, Thran’s insistence faded, and Bard was enfolded softly in his arms, as if wings encircled him. The steady stroke of hands against his back comforted him. A quiet plea revealed that Thran hadn’t treated last Saturday as just a tease. Slowly, slowly, despite everything he’d feared and everything he’d told himself in the last week, the salve of Thran’s touch grew too much to resist. He inched hands around Thran, and laid his head on Thran’s shoulder to nuzzle the hollow at the base of Thran’s throat. Why did this feel like redemption instead of the travesty it was? The unexpected kiss on his temple was an overwhelming grace.

Bard didn’t move for long moments, soaking up the solace that Thran offered. In time, though, Thran grasped his shoulders to hold him at arm’s length.

“We both need a towel. Then you need a dry shirt and tea, lyubov moya. So, off with the boots.”

Thran pulled his off, then left Bard to unlace his boots while he fetched a dry shirt and towels. He draped one towel over his shoulder, then rubbed the other over Bard’s head vigorously, drawing Bard’s chuckle.

“I can do it, Thran. You make me feel like Tilda,” Bard protested with an embarrassed laugh as he took the towel. He wiped his face before rubbing the towel over his tangled hair.

Thran tsked as he mopped his face, and squeezed his braid in a fold of the towel. “No one has done anything for you in so long that you have forgotten what a grace it is when someone does. Please, Bard. Off with your wet shirt, before you get sick.”
Bard laughed self-consciously. “It’s not that wet –”

“Off. Now.”

Bard swallowed, drawing Thran’s glare.

“Oh, for all the gods, Bard! I have no intention to seduce you this morning, though on another morning, that will not be true. This morning, though, it would be evil to take advantage of you when you hurt so much. I merely want you to be warm and dry. So. Off.”

It wasn’t until Thran feinted at him, threatening to peel the shirt for him, that Bard held his hands up in concession. “All right, all right. Gods, Thran. You’re a force of nature when you’re pissed off.”

Thran grinned. “A Russian is no Russian without attitude, especially when he swears.”

“What did you call Steffen?”

Bard rolled his eyes, but pulled his Henley over his head. When he stood bare-chested, Thran was not eying him, but the clean grey Henley he’d brought out. “This one is too small for you. The one I have on is the biggest one I have, so you will have to wear it. It was clean when I put it on a few minutes ago, and it is not wet.” He peeled it off in one smooth motion, and handed it to Bard. As Thran pulled on the clean shirt, Bard pulled on the blue-grey one, unexpectedly comforted by Thran’s faint scent that clung to the soft waffle-weave cloth. The thick, plushy fabric was better quality than anything Bard had bought for himself before, and it was strange to pull up sleeves that weren’t frayed and unraveling, or pull down a hem that had no ragged threads adangle. The shirt was still warm from Thran’s body, too, which offered another comfort.

“Good. Now, tea.”

Thran led the way into the kitchen. He filled the kettle, set it on the stove, set out cups and saucers and teapot, then took the tea caddy out of the cabinet.

“Ast, fwcar.”

Thran cast him a considering look as he measured loose tea into a sleek black porcelain teapot.

“What is that?”

“Welsh for bitch, fucker. The closest I can come to your Russian curse.”

Thran grinned as he capped the tea caddy. “I am glad you know how to curse. It is one thing for me to call you a beautiful saint, and another for you to bear the ills dealt to you like one.”

The shock of Thran’s confrontation was fading, and everything Bard had told himself in the past week settled back into his chest like a stone that he couldn’t choke down. “I’m not a saint, Thran.”

“No more than I am an angel. But you are my saint, as I am your angel.”

“Is that what you called me? Your saint?”

Thran put the tea caddy back in the cupboard, then looked over his shoulder at Bard. He seemed to debate with himself, but reached out to stroke Bard’s damp hair.

“Lyubov moya. My love.”
Gulping, Bard turned away to stare out the window. He wrung a hand over his face, then through his hair, combing the wet strands from his face. Thran moved behind Bard to rest hands lightly on Bard’s shoulders. His chest just brushed against Bard’s back.

“You said you had nothing to offer me. But that is not true.”

“Yes, it is.”

“No, it is not.”

“I have nothing good to offer you, Thran. I have not one but two lousy jobs, I barely put enough food on the table for my children, I barely put a grotty roof over their heads, and I have zero prospects of that changing.”

“Must I remind you of what you showed me Saturday? You are a talented artist, you have a beautiful house, three wonderful children, and more generosity and compassion than can be described.”

“The house is a wreck, I don’t have the wherewithal to be the artist, my children are barely hanging on, and my so-called generosity and compassion don’t put food on the table.”

Hands tightened on Bard’s shoulders. “So much depression! I have half a mind to kneecap our landlord because he brings you so low.”

Bard twisted to look Thran in the eyes. “Stabbing muggers and kneecapping landlords? You must have done a stint with the Russian mafia.”

“Not personally, but I have connections,” Thran quipped, smiling so perversely that Bard wasn’t sure if he joked or not. “But we will not waste time on our suka blyad landlord now. Let us go back to the scene of the crime and reconstruct.”

“What crime?” Bard asked, looking at Thran askance.

Thran snickered as he jostled Bard’s shoulders. “Forgive me. I have a weakness for that crime drama that is spent mostly in labs. The labs are for crime fighters what ballet school is for me – both teach techniques from which one solves a crime or makes a dance. So I will reconstruct Saturday night.”

Despite the weight in his chest, a smile tugged at the corners of Bard’s lips. “This I’ve got to hear. The Russian Sherlock.”

“Tea first, Watson.”

The teakettle had began to steam, so Thran turned off the burner, poured the water into the teapot, and put the teacups and saucers into Bard’s hands. With teapot and trivet in hand, he beckoned Bard after him to return to the living room. He arranged the pot on the table before the sofa, then the cups and saucers. Taking Bard’s hand, he sat them down on the sofa side by side. He sat close, as he had on Saturday morning after their first kiss, his long fingers entwined with Bard’s.

“So. Saturday. You and I began something good, something that we both wanted very much. We came back here. Those are just the facts, as the crime drama so often says. But I can deduce what came after. Late that night, several emergency work orders appeared on your mobile, and you had to leave your children to traipse up and down the stairs until two a.m. to fix one thing or another. I imagine also that several of the tenants were no kinder to you than I was when we first met, because Steffen had received the complaints hours ago and ignored them until he could dump them on you. After many hours of such treatment, and likely several nasty repair jobs, you were exhausted and filthy, and you could bear no more, and you fell into the pit of self doubt that Steffen’s abuse had dug for you.” Thran sat back. “How well did I do?”

Bard slipped his fingers out of Thran’s. He leaned his elbows on his knees, and rubbed his hands through his hair, and clasped his hands behind his neck. “Got it in one.”

“I should have realized then, and not offered only the comfort of a text. I should have followed you downstairs to tell you in person.”

When a hand stroked over Bard’s back, he shut his eyes. It was so easy to sit silently and enjoy the comfort that Thran offered. But Thran deserved more than that.

“I stood outside your door. I almost knocked. I did. But I was even filthier than you imagined, and I... I didn’t want to see your face when the smell of shit hit you. I’m surprised the stench didn’t wake the children when I came in.”

“I might have made a face, yes. But only because of the smell, not because of who had suffered it. Shit washes off.”

Bard exhaled. “Until I have to do it all again.”

“Don’t worry about that yet. We will sort that out soon enough. First, I want to restore the spirit that was yours when we had our Saturday. Please, I hope that you do not tell me that we cannot continue what we began then. I want it, very much.”

Bard sat back against the sofa, both hands full of his hair, pulling it in frustration. “But Thran, I still don’t have anything to offer –”

“No, lyubov moya. Put aside material things. Think about intangible ones, for without them, material things do not matter. Look in here.” Thran tapped Bard’s chest. “What is in there about us? Think of that only, and tell me what you find.”

Bard had tried not to think of that all week. He’d concentrated on why Saturday had been insanity, because that kept him from admitting how much he wanted the pale angel who had descended upon him in such fury just three weeks ago. It wasn’t mere lust or infatuation that flooded him, though who wouldn’t treasure Thran’s beautiful body; or adore the way he moved, or the gleam of that pale hair, or the flash of those intense grey eyes, or the caress of that soft, exotic accent? All of those were all-consuming, but none were as intense as the enticement that beckoned to him most. It was the caressing look that Thran had given him when they’d cooked on Thanksgiving Day, then offered him again half a hundred times on Saturday, a light that he’d despaired of ever seeing again after Saturday night’s ordeal. When he stole a glance at Thran, though, the angel’s eyes still held that light, and if he stared at it for long, it would melt the stone in his chest.

How had an angel come to love him?

How had he come to love an angel?

Gods. This was madness. This was a cliff that offered only wrack and ruin at its bottom.

No, it wasn’t. The light in Thran’s eyes proved it. The ache in Bard’s heart proved it. It was a cliff, but they were poised above it together. An angel’s wings would carry them gently past it, and a saint’s strength would make sure they made the most of whatever they found at the bottom. He had only to be brave enough to accept it.

Marshaling his courage with a deep breath, Bard took Thran’s hand in his, and pressed a kiss on the back of it. “Fy nghariad.”
Thran’s smile was small, but for him alone. When he traded Bard’s kiss for one of his own, the soft touch on the back of Bard’s hand sent the rest of his skin into gooseflesh.

“It sounds as good in Welsh as it does in Russian,” Thran murmured, stroking Bard’s hair.

Bard took the end of Thran’s braid and gave it a tug. “It sounds good in any language.”

* * *

To see Bard unwind from his tight knot, to visibly relax, flooded Thran with relief. At last, at last, the damage had begun to slip away. He so wanted to engulf Bard in a tight hug, but Bard was still too fragile for that. The last thing Thran wanted was for lyubov yego to feel manipulated, used, taken advantage of. Better to restrain himself now, to ensure that Bard’s faith in himself and the two of them together stayed strong and steady.

Still, when Bard’s skin flexed into gooseflesh, a sympathetic tension stirred in his abdomen, his loins – the first moments of arousal. Soon, soon, when they had washed the dregs away, when their lives began to blossom further, he wouldn’t restrain himself, and he’d show Bard how easily an ethereal angel could embrace far more earthly pursuits.

“I regret that the rest of our champagne went flat,” Thran said lightly. “Else I would bring it out to celebrate.”

“Tea is fine,” Bard allowed, smiling, tightening the pressure on Thran’s hand for a second before releasing it. “I’m still on call today.”

“No, you are not,” Thran protested, belatedly pouring the steaming tea in their cups. “You are the night super, if only for the moment. Let Steffen stir his great bulk on behalf of his tenants.”

“He won’t,” Bard shook his head as he leaned forward for his cup.

Thran spread his arms wide. “Then I shall call him and demand that you see to my radiators at once. I will make sure that the job takes all day.”

Bard’s smile was lopsided. “We’d have to be careful not to set off the sprinkler system.”

Good; Bard was recovering enough to banter. “One day soon, we will. But you recover from a grievous wound, and to immolate ourselves now would not be wise. We have other things to do first.”

Leaning back to sip his tea, Bard played back their last few exchanges and mulled what Thran might mean. His gaze sharpened into a frown.

“Um... what did you mean, I’m the night super, ‘if only for the moment?’”

“We will not be here all our lives, I meant.”

Bard’s expression was mild. “I have three children, Thran. Three good children, but they’ve all told the biggest lies in the city when it suited them. I hope you aren’t trying to do the same thing. I can smell a lie from a long way off.”

Thran chuckled as he curled one leg under the other. “No lie intended. Remember that I have worried about you all week, Bard. You have emerged from a terrible place. I want you to understand what a bastard tried to do to you, and to know that I have your back, and to believe that nothing else matters as long as you are my saint, and I am your angel. Until you know those things in your bones, I am your protector against the rest of the world.”

“I’m all right, Thran,” Bard protested, then amended his rebuttal with a sheepish shrug. “Eh, I am now. I’m not going to snap in the breeze.”

“Says the man who worries about me to get caught in the rain, or whether my ankle will crumple at the slightest touch, or if the slightest breeze will turn me to ice.” Thran sipped his tea. “It is very sweet of you, but I will ask you to visit one of my dance classes soon so you see just how unfragile I am.”

“All right, maybe both of us need to worry less,” Bard conceded, but he turned a wry expression on Thran as he sipped his tea. “Though Sigrid would think it was cute.”

“Your eldest daughter is a wise and compassionate soul.”

“What about our children, Thran? We said we’d hold off until your son came home, but after today, it looks like we haven’t. You and I have become... us. We’ve become a pair.”

To his credit, Bard mulled that over in silence for some time. He drained his teacup, set it with careful deliberation on the table, and leaned forward with his elbows on his knees and fingers steepled and pressed against his lips. He nodded to himself before looking back at Thran.

“That I can believe in. As long as I bring something to the table, not just you. Good enough?”

Thran nodded. “Good enough. So good that I want to break today’s prohibition against the physical and kiss you.”

Bard leaned forward and kissed first. Thran shut his eyes to better appreciate the caress, and teased himself by threading his fingers through Bard’s hair. “Mmm.”

Bard grinned. “I didn’t have a prohibition to break, so I thought I’d save you from breaking yours.”
“You recover fast,” was Thran’s sly assessment. “Almost you tempt me away from my consideration for you. But to describe my activities of the past week will relieve your worry better than a dalliance would.”

Bard sobered, but he was reflective, not brooding, which reassured Thran. “You’re right. So what have you been up to?”

Thran grinned. “Do you want to hear about the morally ambiguous parts first, or the straightforward ones?”

Bard’s expression was unsettled. “I take it you haven’t been someone’s angel this week.”

“Yours, entirely. Others, not at all.”

Slowly, Bard’s expression came to mirror Thran’s mischievous grin. “This had better be good, funny dancer.”
Chapter 11

Chapter Summary

The angel reveals some serpentine maneuvering, then tempts the saint with a vision of the future. Is the vision madness, or Nirvana? Perhaps the saint will find them to be one and the same.

“I will tell you the morally ambiguous parts first, to dispense with them,” Thran began. “They do not bear on us in the long term. I considered them only because they eased our journey.”

Bard sat back against the sofa. One eyebrow went up, and his lips pursed. “Go on.”

“I had an acquaintance look into the business interests of our suka blyad landlord. Did you know he owns several buildings in addition to this one?”

Bard nodded. “Three or four, I thought. This one’s the smallest. They’re all in good locations, but aren’t in the best of shape; this one’s just the second he’s renovated. It’s a hard choice for him – he wants the higher rents he can get from the renovated spaces, but he hates to shell out the money to do the renovations. That’s why the heating system is so touchy in our building. It needs to be replaced, but that’s a big expense. He’d have lead paint abatement to worry about, displacing the tenants while it’s done, and so on.”

“So my acquaintance tells me. He also told me that some of the work Steffen has already had done is questionable at best. Perhaps it has not been done to code despite his protestations. His maintenance record is not so good, either.”

Bard clenched his fists against his thighs. “Gods, Thran. Don’t push him on that. I’m his maintenance record in this building, and if there’s any question, it won’t be Steffen who takes the blame. It’ll be me, and that’ll cost me the apartment for the children.”

Thran laid a calming hand on Bard’s shoulder. “I will not put you or your children at risk, Bard. There will be no mention of maintenance issues at any point. There may, however, be mention of our suka blyad’s habit of stealing.”

“What’s he stolen, and what mention will be made of it?”

Thran savored the thought of exacting revenge on the lowlife who had made his saint so miserable. Mr. Nori had been quite animated as he’d described the “accounting anomalies” he and his brother Ori had unearthed one night while having a clandestine perusal of Steffen’s double set of ledgers. “The less you know of this, the better, I think, but it seems that perhaps the delineation between business and personal funds is not one our Steffen is inclined to respect.”

“Embezzling?” was Bard’s shrewd guess. “Ah. Why am I not surprised?”

“No more than I. So that is the morally ambiguous part.”

“It sounds like Steffen’s the one with the ambiguous morals, not you.”

Thran shrugged. “I was not motivated by a sense of justice. He reminded me of certain officials in the old regime. It pleases me to see one such fall, and for what better reason than to avenge the cruelty done to the one I love?"

“Hmm,” Bard rumbled, but he was smiling a little. “You did do a stint with the Russian mafia, didn’t you? Have I fallen in love with a ruthless gangster?”

Thran smirked as he held up his hands in denial. “Only an angry dancer.”

“You’re sure?”

“I swear on the grave of my mother.”

“I’ll bet your mother is a babushka somewhere in Latvia, happily cooking goulash.”

“My mother is dead. No, it was many years ago, when I was Tilda’s age, so do not concern yourself. I had not seen her often since I left home for the dance school at six. But that is another story. So no, I have never worked for the Russian mafia. They have no need for dancers, even ones who dance with knives. And Latvia is not known for goulash. That is Hungary, another country entirely, far southwest of Latvia.”

“If you’re sure, then,” Bard said warily, but from the twinkle in his eye he was teasing. Yes, it was good to see his saint revive. “Maybe I’ll just think of you as an agent of karma. That sounds less... dire.”

“If it is more palatable, I am happy to be your agent of karma.”

“So what is the point of digging up dirt on Steffen Masters?”

“The point, lyubov moya, is to persuade him to cooperate. He will see the error of his ways and bring in fulltime repair teams to address the ongoing needs of his buildings.”

Bard didn’t flail into the obvious panic about losing his position as the night super. “And?” was all he said.

“Along the way he will be persuaded to offer you your apartment for the next six months rent free, and you will not be on call as the night super.”

“What will I be doing all night instead?”

“It is not for me to say, but I imagine that you will sleep in your apartment, and care for your children.”

“And will I still weld all day, oh, pale agent of karma?”

“Perhaps.” Thran sat forward to put his arm around Bard’s hips, and to rest his chin on Bard’s shoulder. “I have some other ideas, but they are only ideas. I offer them, but it is you who must say if they are acceptable or not.”

Bard took Thran’s hand in his, and leaned his head against Thran’s. “Hit me with your best shot, fy nghariad.”

“All right. I would like you to lease your beautiful house to me. But only for six months.”

That wasn’t what Bard had expected to hear. He drew away from Thran enough to look him in the eye, and his brown eyes were startled rather than affectionate. “You want me to... the place is uninhabitable, Thran! You can’t live in it for two days, much less six months!”
“No, I cannot. No one can until some important repairs are made – the roof, likely the furnace...”

“The plumbing’s got to be completely replaced, the kitchen has no appliances, it needs new light fixtures –”

“I have no doubt that you know exactly what needs to be done and in what order, Bard. So let me explain myself. You said that your wish was to live in that house with your family one day. Yes?”

“Yes, but –”

“My wish is that we live in that house together. With all our children. Our family. Is that something you would wish for, too?”

“Of course, but –”

“Please, lyubov moya, hear me out just for one moment more. If we wish to live there together with our children, we must make the repairs. If you lease it to me, then I can hire you to oversee the repairs. The general contractor, it is called? Six months will not be time enough to repair everything, but perhaps it is enough time to fix enough that we can move in? All of our children can finish the school year where they are now so as not to disrupt them, but there are several excellent schools nearby that they can attend next year. While you work on the house for us, we can have others come in to see to the roof and the pipes and the appliances so that you can devote yourself to the artistic pieces, and then when the work is done you can begin on your sculptures again. I have heard of an artist’s agent who might help you promote your work –”

Bard stared, eyes unblinking and mouth slightly agape. Thran had blurted this part quickly, because he was worried that Bard would negate the idea if Thran couldn’t get it out all at once.

“But I get ahead of myself. House first. All right, you can tell me what you think now. Go ahead. Tell me I am crazy.”

Bard folded his arms over his chest and covered his mouth with one hand as he skewered Thran with an incredulous stare. He shook his head, still staring. “You are. I think you are, Thran. You are what my children call bat shit crazy when they think I’m not listening.”

“Does that mean that you do not want to try this? That it is impossible?”

“It’s you fronting all the money, Thran. I can’t let you do that.”

“Why not? I have more money than all of the gods, and nothing to spend it on but a new life to replace my old and empty one. You are the one who will have the far harder job – to put in most of what they call sweat equity, and to manage the headaches to renovate the house. If you like, I will write you a clear contract so that you know the house will remain yours, regardless of what happens between us, and you will renovate the house as you see fit. If you think that your sweat is not as good an investment as my money, then when you are paid for the commissions that will come to you, you can pay me for the Aga. Or you can become the boy toy I suggested before, and I will take whatever amount you think you owe me out in trade.”

Thran’s deadpan joke didn’t make Bard laugh as he expected. In fact, he seemed to pale. He passed a hand over his eyes. “I’m, um, feeling a little lightheaded. I swear you just said you wanted us to move into my house and...”

“I did.” Thran narrowed his gaze on Bard. “Lightheaded? Have you eaten today?”

Bard didn’t look up.
“Have you? Bard, you have not, have you?”

“No.”

Thran tsed furiously. “Why is it that saints are always so determined to kill themselves through lack of food? They are as bad as dancers!”

Thran ducked into the kitchen, scanning for what he had to give Bard. Eggs. He had lots of eggs. He ate them hardboiled on his lunch salad many days. He had several cold ones he’d made yesterday, so he dumped them in a bowl, fetched the salt and pepper, and carried them out to Bard.

“Here.” He thrust the bowl at Bard. “Eat.”

Bard put the bowl on the table and took an egg. “Have you eaten?”

“No.”

Bard pointed to the bowl as he peeled his egg. “Then follow your own advice. Eat. Did you skip your morning dance stuff, too?”

“That is not material.”

Bard grunted, then took a bite of egg. “Yes, it is. For a dancer, I’d say it’s worse than not eating.”

Thran put his arms akimbo and favored Bard with an exasperated frown. “If a certain artist had seen fit to answer my texts, I would not have had to stand at the window all morning to watch for him, then pelt down five flights of stairs and sprint the length of the street to rescue him. I could have done my morning work and eaten breakfast; instead, I must perform what the Special Forces call an extraction.”

“Oh, gods, you are the Russian mafia.” Bard’s lips slid into a rueful, lopsided smile. “You’re cute when you’re mad, too.”

“Cute?” Thran drew himself up, and icicles dripped from his single word. “Am I?”

Bard chuckled. “Hell, no. The beautiful Prince of Ice is damned intimidating. So come down from the mountain, and have an egg. I hate to eat alone.”

Thran sat beside Bard, silently growling. Bard’s smile widened as he leaned into Thran, holding up his half-eaten egg. Relenting, Thran engulfed the rest of the egg in a single bite. They sat chewing for several seconds. Thran took up another egg, peeled it, and sprinkled it with salt and pepper. After taking a bite, he held the rest out to Bard, who managed to get most of it in his mouth without making a mess.

“So, will you think about it?” Thran murmured, his hand coming to rest on Bard’s thigh. “You do not have to say anything now. But please, I ask you to think about it. It is your decision.”

Bard swallowed his egg, peeled another, and stuffed the whole thing in his mouth. He must be famished. How long had it been since the man had eaten a decent meal? He chewed his egg hungrily, washing it down with the remains of his tea. Then he regarded Thran.

“What about your dancing? How does that fit in to all of this?”

Thran smiled. “How you choose to renovate the house, I defer to you. But I have some suggestions for the ballroom. When we get to that point. First, you must think about whether my madness matches yours, and whether we can make it our madness. There is no hurry. I do not want to force you into anything you do not want, and of course you can choose to do nothing. So take the time you need to consider.”

Bard’s hand tightened on Thran’s knee, and he tilted his head up to nuzzle Thran’s ear. “I have a better idea.”

“What?”

“Why don’t we talk about what we’ll need tomorrow when we take another look at the house? We have a lot of work to do in the next six months.”
Chapter 12

Chapter Summary

A little naughty, a little nice, and Legolas. What more could you want?

Happy New Year to one and all! May 2016 bring you happiness!

Chapter Notes

I hold no rights to Aga or La Cornue stoves.

Translation Notes:

mon cher, ma chère = my dear, meant in a friendly, nonromantic way, a term of respect (French) synok = son (Russian)

For the first time in years, visiting his house was a joyous experience. The day was bright, cloudless, as crisp as fresh apples, and in the bright winter sun even fading white paint and untrimmed landscaping couldn’t keep the house from looking beautiful.

Then again, maybe Bard’s hopes for the future saw past the neglect for the first time. Gods, how many times had he hoped to do exactly this, to restore his life as well as a house? This had to be a dream –

Bard stiffened his spine. This was no dream. It would not evaporate. What was the point of holding back when something so good had graced him? He would throw himself over the cliff, into the arms of an angel, and devil take the rest.

The children had come with them in the back seat of Bard’s truck, all of them excited. Bard had said nothing to them about what the future held, but his happiness was obvious, and all three of them had picked up on it, consciously or not. As he and Thran spread their lists and papers across the kitchen counters, laughter drifted to them from the ballroom, where Bain and Tilda had quickly put the soccer ball into play. That sound, so long absent, was overwhelming, and Bard’s eyes stung. He kept his gaze on the papers, but a slender, understanding hand slipped under his coat to rub his back.

“That’s the sound,” Bard whispered, swallowing hard. “Gods, Thran. That’s the sound I remember.”

“We will hear it many times from now on, lyubov moya,” Thran murmured. “Perhaps soon we will hear Legolas practice his fencing there, too.”

Bard nodded. “That’s a great idea. When does he come from school?”

“This Thursday, I am happy to say. I thought it would be later, but the luck of the exam schedule favored him this year, and so he finishes two days early. I am eager to see him.”

“Remember what I told you,” Bard said. “Spend every second with him for at least a week. Then we’ll have you down for supper in the house of chaos.”

“I hear and obey, my saint,” Thran teased, giving him an indulgent look.

“Like hell, you do,” Bard snarked back softly, grinning. “So are you okay with white appliances? I’ve never liked stainless steel. Too industrial, and they show smudges.”

Thran hummed agreement as he studied Bard’s rough drawing. “I have lived in too many institutions full of that soulless metal. White is good.”

“Are you sure you don’t want me to do the kitchen in black? Just to give you a properly theatrical stage to highlight your ethereal paleness when you get the urge to make chicken soup?”

Thran’s lips curved in a sly smile. “Hmm. That sounds perfect. What will you do if I say yes?”

“Tell you that a black kitchen means you’ll do most of the cooking. I can’t see in a black kitchen.”

“I hope to learn to cook, but perhaps not every meal. So we must forgo your perfect theatrical setting to allow for practicalities. A white kitchen it is.”

Bard snickered. “White appliances, then. Big fridge – we have four hungry children. Gas stove – there was one here before, so the line’s already in place, so that’ll be easy to install. Agas and La Cornues aren’t worth the price to me, but we’ll need a big one, whatever it is. Double sink, maybe a work sink, too. Microwave. I don’t drink enough for a wine fridge, but we can get you a small one to keep your French champagne perfectly chilled, if you want.”

Thran smiled slyly again. “I think lyubov moy is as funny a general contractor as he is a welder.”

“So says a funny dancer.”

“I do.”

Bard looked up at Thran. “Do you?”

Thran leaned his elbows on the counter, and turned his pale grey eyes on Bard. He nodded. “Very much, I do. Do you?”

Bard glanced right and left, then leaned close to Thran to brush a kiss on his lips. “I do.”

Silent laughter rippled through Thran. “You are not supposed to kiss the groom until after the vows.”

“I never liked that tradition.”

“You two are awful,” Sigrid said. When Bard tore his eyes away from Thran, he found his oldest daughter standing in the doorway to the hallway, arms akimbo and a fond but exasperated smile on her face. “Sappier than a pair of teenagers.”

“We are celebrating our agreement on white kitchen appliances,” Bard said mildly, straightening as Sigrid inserted herself between them to curl her arms around their backs.

“Whatever.” Sigrid pecked a kiss on Bard’s cheek before offering the same to Thran. “I’m happy for you. And don’t worry – Bain’s clueless, Tilda isn’t old enough, and Legolas isn’t here yet, so I’ll keep quiet until you’re ready to say anything. Is it okay if I call you Ada, Thran?”
“Ada? What is Ada?”

Sigrid’s smile was mischievous. “What, you haven’t seen all those Hobbit films? You kind of look like that bratty Elf king with the long blond hair, though you’re better looking and a lot nicer. You two saps are going to get married, right? Since that’ll make you my stepdad, I looked it up – Ada is one of the Elvish words for Da. So I’d have Da, and Ada. I like it.”

Bard had never seen Thran so flustered. He actually blushed, he seemed to have forgotten how to breathe, and he certainly found no words to say. It was so atypical for Thran to look anything but calm, self-possessed, and confident that Bard couldn’t smother a laugh.

“You’ve never had the pleasure of a teenaged daughter who lives to unnerve her parents,” Bard informed Thran. “This is just the start.”

“I’m not trying to unnerve anyone,” Sigrid protested. “Did I unnerve you, Ada?”

Leaning his elbows on the counter, Thran cocked his head to look at Sigrid askance. “I believe you did, ma chère. I am quite speechless.”

Sigrid glowed with triumph as she pressed another kiss on Thran’s cheek. “Cool! I bet not many people can say they unnerved the great Thran Oropherson.”

“So far, only those who call him Ada,” Thran exhaled wryly, finally rallying.

“And Da when he calls you that Welsh thing,” Sigrid riposted. “So, what’s the kitchen going to look like?”

As Sigrid scanned the kitchen plan, Thran’s eyes met Bard’s over her back. Bard shrugged, mouthing, “Get used to it.”

Thran’s lips trembled in a bemused smile. Did he realize what a boon he’d been given? No teenaged girl was easy to live with, but it was much easier when the one in the family loved her parents. Both of them.

* * *

The day continued like the best dream – not a dream, Bard firmly reminded himself again. Reality, not a dream. He and Thran moved through the house, discussing and listing what they wanted to do. They had few disagreements; both liked calm, serene surroundings, though Thran tended to like more streamlined furnishings than Bard. Thran was not fond of dark colors in a house, which suited Bard, as well. He’d lived in too many dark and dingy places to want to cast any darkness in his own house. So the kitchen would remain white with black granite countertops under the cabinets, and white marble atop the kitchen island. The dining room would get a new coat of pale green, and the main room would remain white until they figured out what else it should be. Upstairs, the children decided to keep their old rooms, leaving three others for Legolas to choose from. The master suite was large enough to accommodate Thran’s huge bed with room to spare. When Bard thought about slipping into that refuge, knowing what awaited him there, he had to spend a few minutes thinking about that most boring of sports, American baseball, before he could think straight about anything else. The soccer game in the ballroom after lunch dispelled the last of that, for it vigorously pitted Thran and Sigrid against Bard, Tilda, and Bain. While it was not stellar soccer, it was hilarious soccer.
Perhaps the clearest reassurance of what the future held was Tilda’s doing. She looked around the ballroom, and tugged on Bard’s sleeve.

“So we’re really going to live here, Da?” she asked.

Bard stooped beside her. “Not for a while, little doll, but soon.”

“By next Christmas?”

“By next Christmas.”

She pointed to the end opposite the fireplace. “Can we put the Christmas tree there?”

Bard gave the space a considering smile, then her. “That’s a good place for it. A tall one, with a star on the top.”

Tilda’s eyes widened. “It’ll look just like the ballroom where the mice danced.”

Thran looked back at her. “In ‘The Nutcracker?’ You are right, Tilda. Perhaps we can dance here on Christmas Eve, just as Clara did.”

Tilda smiled. “That would be nice. I’ll have to learn, though. I don’t know how to dance.”

“It is not so hard,” Thran offered. “Just a simple step or two. Would you like me to show you?”

Tilda looked at Bard, who nodded. “Go ahead, Til. Thran’s a good dancer.”

“I know. Sigrid told me,” she said as if that explained everything, and took the hand Thran held out to her. Sigrid came to stand beside Bard to watch Thran guide Tilda through a simple waltz step, then dance her around the room slowly. Their heights were so disparate that Thran had Tilda put her hand at his waist while he put his on her shoulder, rather than the other way around, but he managed them gracefully. Bard and Sigrid decided to try it themselves, and were soon laughing as they attempted to imitate Thran and Tilda.

“Look, we have inspired your Da and your sister to try, Tilda. But they do not look as elegant as we do, I think,” Thran said as he escorted Tilda around the room again. “What do you think?”

“They look okay,” was Tilda’s measured opinion. “But no, not as good as we do.”

“We should help them, yes?” Thran led Tilda to Sigrid’s side. “Show Sigrid where to put her hand as I put mine, and I will show your Da. There, better? Now, around you go.”

Bard and Sigrid duly proceeded, Sigrid laughing when Thran gestured for her to raise her chin. “I don’t know, Da,” she laughed. “Maybe by Christmas we’ll get better.”

“You’d better let the master show you, then,” Bard grinned, twirling her into Thran’s arms. “Come on, Tilda. You can help your Da.”

So they went around again. Bain looked on with skeptical consideration, finally shaking his head as he bounced his soccer ball. “I don’t know; it looks silly no matter which of you do it.”

“Ah, you would prefer a more vigorous dance?” Thran teased. “Which of the dances in the Nutcracker did you like? The Chinese dance, perhaps? Or the Russian one?”

Bain’s face pricked with interest. “Which one had that cool kicking and jumping thing? You know, the one where they looked like they were sitting down and kicking?”
“Ah, the Russian one. To do that one, I have to take off my boots. Do you want to try it? It is very vigorous.”

“Oh, try, Bain!” Tilda clapped her hands. “I want to try, too!”

Thran unlaced his hiking boots, then took the broom they’d brought and swept the floor clean in the middle of the room. “First, a few stretches to warm the legs…”

They all watched in fascination as Thran stretched this way and that to limber his muscles. Bard made no attempt to duplicate them, though Bain and Tilda did. Even Bain, a good athlete, wasn’t able to stretch so completely bonelessly as Thran did. Even though Thran wore old jeans and a ratty Henley – oh, gods, Thran had put on Bard’s old shirt that he’d left in Thran’s apartment yesterday – he still made the moves look fluid and elegant. So much grace and control coiled in that long body...

In just a few moments, Thran folded himself down into the position Bain had remembered. “So, here we are in the crouch. The kicking goes like this…” he folded his arms in front of his chest, and kicked with each foot.

Bain gave it his best shot, managing a few before he lost his balance and fell over, laughing. Tilda’s lower center of gravity helped her manage a few before she fell over, too.

“Not so easy, is it, Bain? You got a few in there, though,” Bard said. “You, too, Til.”

“It’s hard!” Bain agreed. “You ought to try it, Da. It’s really hard.”

“I believe you. You’re doing a lot better than I would,” Bard assured his son. “Look at him. Still kicking away.”

“Then comes the hands,” Thran demonstrated, “and then the leaps.” He bounced to his feet, doing a pair of split jumps. He landed in an exaggerated stance, smiling as he offered a silly bow to acknowledge the applause from Tilda and Sigrid. He took an exaggerated deep breath. “A very vigorous dance, indeed.”

“I’d like to see your knife dance one day,” Bain offered, sprawled back on the floor. “I saw it on YouTube. Have you seen it, Da? Splits and everything.”

“You can do splits?” Tilda asked, interested.

Thran slid effortlessly into a split.

“Is that hard to learn?”

Thran shook his head. “I did not think so, but I started very young, perhaps five or six. I like the technique I learned in yoga, to stretch down as low as possible without strain, prop oneself up on a block, then merely sit. The muscles and tendons gradually stretch. The key is to be very careful and very patient, and to relax.”

Thran levered himself up on his hands to carefully turn the other way. “One must do both sides. That is something else I learned in yoga class, to learn balance.”

“How do you get out of that?” Bard shook his head. “If I ever got down into that, I’d never get up again.”

Thran turned his body to the center, curled his feet inward to cross his legs, and stood smoothly. That fluid control made Bard’s mouth water. What he wouldn’t give to wrap that elegant, effortless body around his, in the middle of dark grey silk sheets...

Baseball, baseball...

Thran’s smile was not the slightest bit wicked, but his pale grey eyes held laughter as they met Bard’s. The angel hid a devil behind his wings, and not very well, the bastard. He probably divined everything that went through Bard’s thoughts. While his children all were intent on Thran, Bard glowered at him.

“That was amazing,” Sigrid shook her head.

“Very.” Bard said. Let’s see – were the Mets in the American or National League? “Very impressive, indeed.”

Thran put a hand to his heart and bowed. “You are generous. So, enough dance, perhaps. More soccer?”

“Go ahead,” Bard waved at them. “I want to check the windows upstairs, and the bathroom plumbing.”

“Then I call Thran and me against Til and Sig,” Bain announced eagerly, bouncing the ball to Sigrid. “You kick off, Sig.”

Bard left the quartet as he climbed the stairs to the second story, list in hand. Two windows in Sig’s room, both needing stripping and reglazing...

Thran in splits, with his Henley stretched across that broad chest...

Sig’s closet door needed stripping and painting...

To strip that Henley away, in the middle of those grey sheets...

Two windows in Bain’s room, glazing still intact but needing new paint and a new sash weight, and the floor needed stripping... hell, forget that; all the floors needed stripping and refinishing...

A certain ethereal bastard needed a good stripping, and damned soon, as badly as he deviled Bard. Gods, gods, an ache settled in his solar plexus, then lower...

Which team had won the World Series last year? He knew it wasn’t the Chicago Cubs. They hadn’t won the title since 1908...

Tilda’s room needed some plaster work in the corner by the window. And ditto for her windows; they all needed reglazing and...

Bard sighed in exasperation. Even the repair work conspired against him – floors and windows all needed stripping, and he knew an angel who did, too. If he didn’t find something to distract him, he’d start thinking about exactly how to strip Thran down to nothing but his smile and lowered eyelashes –

“How do the windows progress?” Thran called, coming up the stairs.

Bard swallowed a plea to the gods for mercy. “Um, just fine. How’s the soccer game?”

“Exhausting,” Thran said, following the sound of Bard’s voice to find him. “Even ballet training is no match for the energy of children.”
“What are they doing now, without their ringer?”

“They went out to see if the gazebo still has a bird’s nest in it.”

“Good.” Bard looked over his shoulder at Thran just coming through the door. He turned, took Thran’s shoulders in his hands, and urged him against the wall before Thran was fully in the room.

“You’re wearing my shirt.”

Thran’s smile was entirely too feline. “Of course I am. It smells like you, and I like to have your scent on me. You must feel the same way, because you still wear my shirt. Shall I tell you how much I like to feel a piece of you caress my skin?”

Bard swallowed, his hands tightening on Thran’s shoulders. “One day, you bastard, you are going to tease me past all control, and get us into so much trouble,” he growled, drawing Thran’s silent laughter.

“One day? Maybe today,” Thran teased, widening his stance. He had Bard’s hips in his hands, holding him tightly against him. “If this is what teasing you gets me, I will never stop, lyubov moya.”

Thran twined a hand in Bard’s hair at the nape of his neck, pulling him into a kiss. The caress was silent, but not gentle. Bard surfaced panting, wanting nothing but to drown in another, but he pushed away to look up at the beautiful face of an angel bent on unangelic things.

“If I ever figure out how to tease you as badly as you do me, you’ll be the one past all control.”

“I will tell you how to do it,” Thran whispered, brushing another kiss on Bard’s lips. “Pick me up, the way you did last Saturday morning at the barre. Take me off the earth, and I am yours.”

Bard had Thran off his feet, pinned between his hips and the wall, without thinking. The light in Thran’s eyes sparkled as he wound his legs around Bard’s waist; his breath stuttered; his hands convulsed on Bard’s shoulders. This time, it was Bard’s hands that went under Thran’s Henley to stroke his ribs, knead his back, dare to run around his chest to knead his nipples. Thran couldn’t keep silent any longer, gasping as Bard pulled up his shirt to nuzzle first one, then the other nipple –

“What are they doing now, without their ringer?” echoed up the staircase.

Bard let Thran slide to the floor, grinning ruefully. “That’s great, Bain! What about the one in the holly bush out back?”

“Hey, Da! The bird’s nest is still in the gazebo!”

Bard surveyed Thran, still leaning against the wall, panting. “Saved by the bell, you are.”

Thran’s grin was pleased as he pulled his shirt down. “Finally, the saint takes off his leash.”

“Finally, the angel gets a taste of his own medicine.”

Thran hummed. “And very tasty it was, too. Monday morning, we will get that blood test.”

“Yes, we will.”

Thran straightened, and put a hand out to stroke Bard’s hair. “It is good to see you restored, Bard. I am so relieved.”

Bard gave Thran’s braid a tug. “I haven’t felt this way in a long time. So help me with the rest of the windows, before we get caught again.”

Bard held out his hand, his skin tensing into gooseflesh when Thran clasped his wrist with the warmth that was for him alone.

* * *

Thran was glad that the drive back to the city was after dusk. It was hard enough to keep a serene demeanor in the dark, and would have been impossible in the light. He was not concerned about revealing his agitation to Bard, but to his children was another matter. He and Bard had agreed not to make a public spectacle of themselves to anyone, but especially their children. Still, Thran hadn’t felt so delirious for so long that it was hard to master his feelings. He managed well enough by the time they reached the city that he could share pizza and salad with Bard and his children at the small corner pizzeria near their apartment building. He managed to get the bill before Bard did, and the excited chatter of the children at the rare treat was worth bearing Bard’s glare. When he bade them goodnight at the door to their apartment, it was with a pang of regret, and not just because he and Bard must part. He’d enjoyed being with the children, too.

“Thank you for today,” he bade all of them with the little bow that the girls liked so much. “I will see you all again soon.”

“Come for supper tomorrow. Chicken, or something,” Bard asked, and he nodded gladly. It would be hard not to see them all day tomorrow, but with supper to look forward to, he would manage.

“I’ll find something to bring other than broccoli,” Thran smiled, as he went up the stairs. “Perhaps... Brussels sprouts.” When the children made the expected faces, he snickered. “No, I hate them, too. Perhaps something else.”

“Garlic bread!” Bain suggested.

“With the cheese?” Tilda added.

“I shall find it,” Thran agreed. “Until tomorrow, then.”

“Bye, Thran,” the children chorused.

“I’ll text you about the garlic bread,” Bard said, holding up a hand in farewell.

“I’ll look forward to it,” Thran nodded, and went up the stairs.

He opened the door to an empty, silent apartment, sighing.

Be patient, he told himself. This empty silence won’t last much longer.

He busied himself with a shower, then a distracted perusal of his computer, but even a new episode of his favorite crime lab show didn’t tempt him. He put his computer aside and crawled into bed. He thought about the room in Bard’s house that would hold this bed before too many months had passed, and what the light would look like in the morning when it fell across Bard’s bare chest. Then he thought about what the chest basking in the sunlight would look like...

His mobile buzzed. He’d left it in the living room, so got up naked to retrieve it. Yes, it was a text from Bard. He settled against down pillows, under silk sheets and cashmere blankets, before he displayed the text.

_In bed?_

Thran grinned. _Naked. Shall I send you a picture?_

_Bastard_

_You love it, lyubov moya. Where are you?_

_In bed. In plaid flannel sleep pants. You don’t want to see a picture_

_I want to see you against my silk sheets, naked_

_So do I. Mamma Leonora’s Herbed Mozzarella Garlic Toast_

Thran blinked. _What?_

_The bread. For tomorrow. About five_

_Ah. Is it at the market?_

_Aisle Six, freezer case, halfway down on the right. Two loaves_

_I have my orders. I cannot wait to give you a few when I get you in bed with me_

_I’m not good at following orders_

_Even better. Unruly lovers are gems_

_Be careful, or I will pick you up again_

_You did it divinely. If you don’t do it again, I’ll tease you until you do_

_Then we will both be in trouble_

_I don’t care who’s in. Either is ecstasy_

_Fucking bastard_

_I hope you are, too_

_Only with an angel. Gotta go. Children. Fy nghariad_

_Lyubov moya_

Thran put his mobile on the nightside table with a sigh. Sexting did not make up for sleeping in an empty bed.

* * *

It was just as well that Thran didn’t see Bard until supper on Sunday, as he spent most of the day marshaling resources. He had his morning rituals to perform, of course, and because he had not gone to class on Saturday he added extra work to compensate. He walked to the market to find the children’s preferred garlic bread. He appreciated Bard being so specific in his instructions, as simple carbs were something Thran knew only to avoid. Bard’s biscuit had been the first such thing he’d had in years. Once he was home from the market, the talented Mr. Nori had words for him, and his banker had a few more. Suppertime came before he realized it, and the ensuing silliness spent the evening in seeming seconds. He and Bard had only seconds outside the latter’s apartment door for a hasty kiss, then Bard had to dash back in to deal with Tilda’s homework.

At least Bard wasn’t on call as the night super anymore. That was one of the matters he’d discussed with Mr. Nori. Bard wouldn’t be the only night super in Steffen Masters’ crumbling fiefdom who wouldn’t bear sleepless nights anymore. All of them would see a nice few months of free rent, and those who wanted to continue as supers would even receive a stipend in addition to their free rents.
That would ensure that Steffen wouldn’t target Bard as the cause of his troubles.

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday blurred into a spate of goings and comings. He had morning rituals and class and the last PT sessions for his ankle. He and Bard kept their clinic appointments for their blood work. Bard had lists of appliances for them to look at. They hired a roofing contractor, a plumber, a furnace technician, and an electrician. He helped Bard stock up on many bewildering things necessary for home renovation – various pots of sticky substances, packets of pins and nails and screws, bags of steel wool, and sheets of sandpaper.

“All of this has a purpose, I am sure,” he said dubiously, handing Bard the heavy bucket of grout compound.

“It does.” Bard took the bucket and stowed it in the back of the truck. “We need it all, I’m afraid. I won’t be able to start on much until the plumbing and heating are done. At least we don’t have to deal with the full lead paint abatement process, which is expensive. That’s one reason Daphne and I were able to get the house so cheaply. The previous owner went broke just after doing it, and wanted to sell fast. So once the plumbing and heating are done, the kitchen can go in. After that, we can spend the weekends out there, and I’ll get more done.”

Bard jumped down from the back of the truck, and they got inside for the drive home. “About this weekend, Thran. Legolas comes home tomorrow. The children and I will likely be up at the house for a lot of that, so take the time with your son. If things go okay with him, maybe the two of you can come with us next weekend.”

“You are right, Bard. I just... hate to lose our time together. We have so little of it.”

“I know. But Legolas needs you. I don’t want him to think that I’m taking his father away. Once he knows you’re still there for him, he’ll feel better about joining the chaos.”

“Agreed. And I am very eager to see him again. I haven’t since September, and I have missed him very much. I want to take him to skate at Rockefeller Center. We do that every year.”

Bard glanced at him as they pulled out of the car park. “It doesn’t surprise me that you know how to skate – you’re from a cold country, after all. But I’m surprised that any ballet company lets you skate.
Too risky for their star dancer?”

Thran grinned. “I suppose technically I should not, but life is too short to worry about it. I have skated for a long time, and I do not attempt any jumps or exotic spins, so I am reasonably safe. Can you skate?”

“I haven’t in years. I used to in Wales as a lad, though. A long time ago.”
“Perhaps next year we will skate together.”

Bard nodded. “Bain will love it. He wanted to play hockey, but thank the gods he liked soccer more. Hockey equipment’s expensive. I can afford the soccer stuff without so much overtime.”

“No more overtime,” Thran said firmly. “You are my general contractor for the moment, and soon to be a full time artist in metal. Next year, you will have money for Bain if he wants to play hockey. One of the schools near the house has a boy’s hockey team. A soccer team, too.”

“What’s Legolas’s school like? I’m a little worried about what’s going to happen when a lad from an elite boarding school and three children from a grittier world try to find common ground.”

“I have thought about that, too,” Thran admitted. “Your children are all good natured, and you have passed your kindness and generosity to them well. My son is quieter. He was only seven when the bomb killed so many in Saint Petersburg.”

“Was he hurt in the explosion?”

“Superficially. A few cuts and bruises only. A very large man in front of him on the platform took the full force of the blow. Vileria was not so well protected, and died under my son’s eyes. He did not speak for some weeks afterwards. I did not dance for some months to be with him. He was close to both his mother and me, and so he gradually recovered enough for me to dance again. I have not liked to send him to boarding school, as I think he spends too much time alone. But there is nothing else to do. I cannot be at his side every moment, nor would he want me to be.”

“The balance is never easy,” Bard agreed, as they drove home. “After Daphne died, I sometimes thought that my life was nothing but a series of choices between bad and worse. Never the right choice or a better choice.”

“I have felt that way many times, too. I hope that Legolas finds that a home with our combined families offers more comfort.”

“So do I,” Bard exhaled. “I don’t want to give you up.”

“Nor I you.”

“Does Legolas know you’re gay?”

Thran nodded. “Vileria and I did not parade our choices before him – before anyone, given the state’s position, but even in the privacy of our flat, we did not. Before Vileria died, Legolas was too young to understand, at any rate, and so it did not arise. But two years ago when he was twelve, he asked, and so I explained. I made sure he knew that both his parents loved him very much, and that we were very proud to be his parents. I suspect that he asked because someone in his school made cruel remarks about male dancers, but I found a way to address that.”

“Oh?” Bard looked over with interest. “What did you do?”

“I danced at the school’s next Career Day,” Thran grinned smugly. “They were used to an occasional ballerina who appeared in a frothy tutu. I took the opposite approach and danced part of my knife dance, but in a Cossack’s pantaloons, boots, and tunic; the original costume for my knife dance is minimal, and would not have helped me make my point. I embellished with a few gymnastic extras, so as to leave no doubt as to the strength a dancer needed. It was a success, for Legolas heard no more comments about the prissiness of male dancers.”

“Well done,” Bard mirrored Thran’s satisfied smile. “Sigrid knows about me, obviously. Bain’s almost as oblivious as Sig says he is, but I have had The Talk with him. Tilda’s getting close. I expect she’ll ask questions before long, just because of us.”

“I hope it will not be a difficult conversation.”

“It’ll be awkward. The first two were. But we’ll get through it. And my little doll likes you, so that will make it easier.”

“She is very sweet,” Thran agreed.

Once home, Thran and Bard made soup in Bard’s kitchen, and then spent the afternoon nested together on the old sofa to watch a film before the children came home. This would be Thran’s last private time with Bard for several days, until Legolas had eased into being with him.

“I could get used to this,” Bard murmured. He leaned comfortably back against Thran’s chest, both their feet propped up on the fruit crate coffee table, Thran’s arms around him. “Just to feel another body...”

“Just any body?” Thran teased, rubbing Bard’s arms slowly.

“Just yours, funny dancer. Just yours.”

Thran took his urges in hand, not wanting to arouse either of them this close to their looming separation. Bard was right to soak up the warmth of their closeness, for that would sustain them better than running amok would. For the next few days, they would bank the fire between them to focus on their children.

“We will get used to this. Very soon.”

“The roof contractor’s already started, and the plumber’s coming Friday. I’ll be out there after Tilda goes to school. I hope the furnace company will be there, too.”

“So it progresses. Perhaps we will be able to move sooner than we expect.”

“The children need to stay here to finish the school term,” Bard reminded Thran. “But maybe we can spend weekends there, once the lead paint assessment clears. I think I said the previous owner did the abatement, but it’s still got to be cleared given all the renovation that we’re doing. Keep your fingers crossed. If we come up short, that’ll be expensive.”

“The price of safety for our children,” Thran waved a hand, as the film credits rolled. “Oh, lyubov moya, I should go. It’s almost time for Bain to come home.”

Bard squeezed Thran’s hand, then pressed a kiss on it. “Just keep reminding yourself that you won’t have to go much longer. What time do you pick up Legolas tomorrow?”

“Not until two. I will meet his train then.”

“Then do your morning rituals, and eat your porridge, and then be Da for the next week. Text me about how it’s going, and we’ll figure out how to make the introductions.”

Thran hugged Bard against his chest, kissed his temple, then let Bard slip out of his hands. As Bard turned off the television, Thran slipped on his hiking boots and got his leather jacket.

“Have a happy reunion with Legolas. I’ll text you goodnight every night.” Bard tugged Thran’s braid, then touched his own chest. “Know you’re in here.”
Thran touched his own. “You are quite firmly in here, too. And one day soon, you will be quite firmly —”

“Don’t say it. I already miss you, and your unangelic teasing will make it worse. Have mercy on me, just this once.”

“For my saint, anything, even no teasing.” Thran kissed him quite gently, drawing Bard’s fond smile. “See you soon.”

“Not soon enough, but it’s for a good cause. Take the best care of Legolas.”

Thran’s journey up three flights of stairs seemed much longer today, and even the prospect of seeing his son tomorrow didn’t shorten it.

* * *

Legolas’s train was on time, but Thran fidgeted on the platform all the same. He found himself by an advertising kiosk, out of the way of busy travelers, bobbing up and down in pliés while he waited — how funny to revert to that old habit. That was how he used to stay focused at auditions, counting the repeats of up and down, up and down, up and down, to better ignore the bustle of other dancers around him. In a way, he shouldn’t be surprised to fall into his old habit. If all went well, Legolas’s homecoming would shortly lead to an audition for them both into new circumstances. But that would not be his focus today. Today, it was only to find his son, and tell him how glad he was that they were together again.

For the tenth time, Thran craned his neck to peer up and down the track. He had no need to do so. At his height, he had no trouble seeing the entire platform. He checked his mobile for the time. Another three minutes. Gods, he hadn’t been so eager to see a train in years, and not just because of Bard and his children who were busy in another part of the city. He had missed his son very much in the past three months.

The train was here! He spotted Legolas’s pale hair behind one of the windows.

I see him on the train. Love you, he typed hastily.

Enjoy, Bard sent back at once. Thran smiled at the sentiment, then thrust his mobile in his pocket and angled up the platform to Legolas’s carriage.

There he was, stepping off the carriage and onto the platform. That long swath of pale blond hair — were those tiny braids by his ears? Green ones? — and that slender figure, already tall for a boy of fourteen, were unmistakable. A backpack was slung over one shoulder, and he stood tall to look up and down the platform. Thran threaded quickly through the crowd towards his son.

“Legolas!” he called, waving and smiling.

At the sound of his name, Legolas turned, spotted him, and his solemnity vanished in a wide grin. He strode towards Thran as fast as the crowd allowed. They met in the middle of the platform, engulfing each other in a hug.

“Father!”
“I have missed you so much, Legolas,” Thran hugged his son tightly. “I am so glad to have you back again.”

“I am very glad to be back.” His son squeezed Thran hard. “How is your ankle? Better, I hope?”

“It is well, and I am back to the dance again. And you? How were your exams?”

“I think I did well, all but the literature one. That one was hard. You know we had to read Moby Dick this term. It was boring. Every time I picked it up, I fell asleep. So I hope I scraped by on that. I’m sure I did much better on the Julius Caesar part. I liked that.”

“We will keep our fingers crossed. Now, you have baggage?”

“Mostly sports equipment – my bows and blades, as you call them. A big suitcase of clothes.”

“The contents of which must be laundered, yes?”

Legolas gave a sheepish shrug. “I’m sorry. I didn’t have time to wash them after my exams. I would have had to take a later train.”

“A small price to pay to have you home earlier. But what are these?” He twitched one of the small, dyed braids by Legolas’s ear.

Legolas’s smile was both self-conscious and satisfied. “I like them. They’re different.”

“So they are. Will they be green forever?”

Legolas grinned at his father’s tolerant tone. “Maybe blue next?”

“Anything but orange, please.”

“Or pink.”

“Agreed. Pink would look like you had candy floss stuck in your hair. Hardly a good fashion statement.”

“Ugh. No.”

“Come, let us find your things, and go home. I want to hear everything.”

They made their way down to the baggage car, collected Legolas’s case of fencing blades; the other pair of cases holding bows, quivers, and arrows; and the immense suitcase. They piled everything into a taxi and sped home, then hauled the lot up to Thran’s apartment in two trips. Thran did not look at the door to Apartment 2A; the children were at school, and Bard was likely at the house. By the time they were settled, it was after four, and Legolas was hungry.

“What are you hungry for, synok? This is your first night back after many exams, so you choose where we will celebrate the end of them.”

“Perhaps that seafood house with the shrimp and scallop pasta?” Legolas looked hopeful.

“That is perfect. Let us go.”

Out they went. Legolas wolfed down his favorite seafood pasta and two baskets of bread in addition to his salad, reminding Thran of Bain’s all consuming appetite. He was quite content with his baked salmon, steamed vegetables, and salad. He opted for spiced tea when Legolas worked through a huge slice of coconut cake.

The best part of the meal, though, was the conversation that sparked between him and his son. The restaurant was not too loud, so they were able to talk unhindered in between bites of their meal. Legolas did most of the talking. He’d continued to lose his Russian accent, sounding as American as any other fourteen-year-old as he talked about school. His favorite topic was archery – even fencing didn’t compare. He had progressed quite well, even earning a place on his school’s first team. That was quite an accomplishment, given that Legolas was just a freshman student, and juniors and seniors usually made up the first team. Thran smiled proudly as he complimented his son on his honor.

“The fencing is not as interesting, then? It is never easy to move to a new school and a new coach,” he ventured.

Legolas sobered as he chewed another bite of cake. “I love it just as much. But... I miss Master Finn from my old school.”

“In what way?”

“He was always very demanding of his fencers, but we never minded, Father, because when you did something well, he made you feel like all the hard work was worth it. Even when you tried and didn’t get it, he still encouraged you, so you wanted to keep trying.”

“And the master at your new school is not like that.”

Legolas shook his head. “He isn’t as well trained, I don’t think. Master Finn seemed to be more nuanced. Not that I’m an expert by any means, but... Master Schroeder isn’t... encouraging the way Master Finn was.”

Thran read between the lines. “So does he merely yell at you for general principles, or does he yell at you for specific ones?”

Legolas dipped his head. “Both. But it isn’t just me he yells at. It’s everyone. He yells even more at the best fencers, and the things he says are not kind. In fact, he has a mean streak. It’s hard to fence well when you’re braced for getting yelled at for anything. Some boys have left the team. Others of us have tried to practice on our own, but it’s hard to find a time where we can all meet.”

Thran hummed. “That is not good. I do not want anyone to turn your love of your sport sour. As long as you love it and want to pursue it, then we will decide what to do. Perhaps I can speak to the head of the school. Or we can find a coach for you.”

Legolas’s smile was gratified. “That would be great. I do want to get better, Father. But I don’t think I’ll get better with him.”

“Nor I, from what you say. So, are you finished?”

“I am. It was delicious.”

“Mine was, too. Let us go home.”

They walked home swiftly. They made a good pair; for all that Legolas was still four or five inches shorter than Thran was, his son kept easy pace beside him as they covered the few blocks to their apartment building. As they passed the corner pizzeria where Thran had eaten with Bard and his children, Legolas sniffed appreciatively.
“That smells so good, doesn’t it, Father?”

Thran gave his son an incredulous look. “You just ate! How can you still be hungry?”

Legolas gave him a sheepish smile. “Um... because I’m fourteen?”

With a laugh, Thran slowed outside the pizzeria. “We can take a pizza home, if you would like. They make a very good pepperoni and onion one here.”

Legolas looked at him in astonishment. “Since when have you eaten pizza?”

Thran smiled proudly. “I had some once, in this very pizzeria. It is very good. Should we get a large one?”

Legolas’s laugh was delighted. “Could we get onion, peppers, and pepperoni?”

Thran pulled open the pizzeria door, then offered a theatrical bow inside to his son. “After you, synok.”

Legolas eagerly went inside, leaving Thran to follow him, chuckling. Clearly, the first order of business after tomorrow morning’s rituals would be a trip to the market. That was likely going to be a common errand as long as Legolas was here.

As Legolas hurried to the counter to peruse the menu, Thran recalled that his son was not the only boy who loved pizza. Bain loved pizza, too.

Friendships had begun on less.
Chapter 13

Chapter Summary

The angel cares for the young, the saint labors in the house of promise, and both of them try to subsist on the crumbs of affection conveyed via text messages. It is a spare diet.

Sounds like time for a pizza extravaganza. Will there be more in the offing?

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

As each day of the following week passed, Bard had no lack of distractions – on Saturday and Sunday, he took the children to the house, and while they completed homework or played outside, he swept and cleaned the inside, then trimmed back the unkempt landscaping, such that it was, until the place didn’t look so abandoned. On the following weekdays, he made breakfasts and lunches for the children, then saw them off to school, then flew down the road to the house to oversee the work that had begun, as well as do a large share of it himself, then flew back to the city to get Tilda, make supper, and oversee homework. He was busier now than when he’d welded by day and overseen the apartment building by night, though he was getting more sleep. He didn’t mind – this was the best kind of busy, because it meant better times were coming.

Still, he wasn’t nearly busy enough that Thran ever left his thoughts. He missed his tall, ethereal angel so badly that his bones ached.

At least he was working on their future by reclaiming the house. The roof and gutters were almost finished. The plumbing was involved, but was proceeding well. The lead paint abatement assessment had been done, and the house had been cleared, which relieved Bard immensely. Not only did that spare Thran a huge expense, but it also saved a delay of at least a month, for no work could take place as long as the house was enclosed to attend to the lead paint. Consequently, he’d had the electricians start to replace the wiring. The results looked terrible –snarls of wire waiting to be snaked through the walls, and protruding wires that waited for fixtures to be installed. The junction boxes and switches would soon be in place, though not many of the light fixtures. It would be better to repaint the walls and ceilings before he installed the fixtures he’d stacked in a corner of the kitchen.

The furnace and air conditioning units had to be replaced, which was no surprise. Insulation needed to go in, too. He set that in motion. At least the newer systems would be more cost effective than the old ones, and safer for the children.

He refused to worry about how much of Thran’s money he was running through. Thran had no concerns, though Bard intended to give him a complete accounting once they could spend time together again. He wanted nothing to be a surprise, or to engender mistrust. He was careful to use only the most qualified and experienced firms to do the work, so that nothing would have to be done over again.

The nightly texts he and Thran traded helped him bear their separation a little better. Blessedly, Thran kept his messages light, without the charged banter he so loved, instead texting about what he and Legolas had done – the skating Thran had mentioned, a visit to the MOMA, another to the Hayden Planetarium, dinners out to sample several exotic cuisines, and long walks.
Are you neglecting your morning rituals? Bard typed, smiling.

Legolas sleeps almost as much as he eats. Never up before 10 or 11. Lots of time for rituals

How’s your fridge holding out?

Empty every 2 days. How do you feed 3???

I use a shovel esp w/ Bain

Our first night L ate full supper. By the time we walked home we had to stop for pizza where we ate last Sat

Did he leave you any, lol?

I ate half a slice. We brought home half of the pizza. Gone when I got up next a.m.

Ouch, sounds like Bain

Pizza may be good way for them to bond. Or mass quantities of anything

Good idea. I can make or we can go out. Weekends are best, as S, B, & T have homework weekdays Understood. Will let you know. Hope for Fri. How is house?

Lead testing passed! Big deal. Roof/gutters done. Heat/AC nearly done. Wires/pipes/insul next

It goes well, then

Will give complete acctng when c u

Not worried. Will be fine

Kitchen soon! Need to pick colors so can paint before refinish floors

If there on weekend, can choose colors. Or you can choose. I don’t mind

Ideas on how to get L to house?

Fence in the ballroom

Who’ll fence with him?

I will. Knives aren’t only weapons I learned from Russian mafia

The medieval Russian mafia, given the weapon

Funny saint!

Can’t wait to c fencing. And u. Miss my angel

U have no idea how much I miss my saint. Hope for Friday pizza!

I do. GTG. Long day tmw. Take care of yr wings

U r my wings. Take care of yourself until I can, lyubov moya Stay safe for me, too, fy nghariad. Night

Night

Bard turned off his mobile, smiling. He shut his eyes, and thought about Thran, three floors above him, likely smiling as he lay in bed. He was probably naked, with his white silky hair spread across his pillows like a beautiful mantle. In a few weeks, Bard intended to shed his plaid flannel sleep pants and tee, climb into that bed, and wrap himself in that white silky mantle.

What happened after that...

Bard sighed. If he thought about that now, he’d never get to sleep. So he tried not to.

That was damned near impossible, but he had a secret weapon that worked no matter what he thought about. Exhaustion.

He was asleep in minutes.

* * *

Bard’s mobile buzzed at two the next afternoon. He was at the house, talking to a contractor to determine what millwork to use in the third floor rooms.

Can I call u? he read from Thran.

I’ll call u in 10, he typed. He wrapped things up with the contractor, then keyed his speed dial for Thran.

“How’s my angel?” he said, when Thran answered.

A chuckle. “Do you know how much I enjoy it when you call me that?”

“No, but I’ll let you tell me in detail one night before too long.”

“You certainly will. I have my test results. Yours are likely in your mailbox.”

Bard grinned. “I’ll check as soon as I get home. Good news?”

“As pure as my hair.”

“That’s pretty damned pure. Don’t know if I can live up to that.”

“I hope you can. About Friday...”

“What about it?”

“Five-thirty at the famous corner pizzeria?”

Bard grinned. “That’s great! You think he’s ready, then?”

“He has been home long enough to tire of just his father’s company.”

“How do you want us to play it? Have you said anything to him about you and me?”
“Only that a friend has a son about his age who enjoys soccer and pizza.”

“Sig will be mum. I don’t think Bain or Tilda have made the connection about you coming to the house yet, though I’ve learned that children are a lot more aware of things than they sometimes let on.”

“Things will progress as they progress. I admit that I am impatient for them to do so.”

“If things go well, do you want to spring the plan about the fencing on Saturday? It’ll be a tight squeeze in the truck, but we’ll manage.”

“I would like that very much. Oh, he is out of the shower. I must go.”

“See you Friday, then. Miss you, fy nghariad.”

“And I you, lyubov moya.”

Bard went back to the concerns of millwork and paint with anticipation.

* * *

Thran’s mobile buzzed. It was late, and he was in bed. Legolas was in his room, plugged into his computer playing a video game, so Than picked up his mobile. Yes, it was Bard. Even though it was only a text, it was still a welcome reminder of the saint three floors below him.

Pure as your hair, it read.

Bard’s blood work had come back, then. Smiling widely, Thran typed quickly.

I had no doubt. You are a saint, after all

Not for much longer. Want you

I am just as eager. Soon

Not soon enough. Sleep well now. You won’t later

How am I to sleep now, if I think of all the ways we will not sleep later?

Try home renovation. Even if you came down here, I couldn’t stay awake for long. Tired

Don’t hurt yourself, lyubov moya

It’s a good tired. Working on our future. Nothing better

I wish I could be there to help

U r w/ Legolas, and u r doing yr dance rituals. That’s help. Can’t wait til Fri to meet him. And c u

I miss you, too. So sleep well now. Soon, you won’t, either

Can’t think of anyone I’d rather not sleep with, ha, ha
Thran chuckled softly as he typed. *Funny saint. You won’t laugh when I tie you to the bed and have my way with you

*LOL you don’t want to tie me. Think what that would keep me from doing to you

Bastard saint. I am wide awake now

Paybacks are hell

Hell with you is paradise. Until Friday, saint

Until Friday, angel

Thran set his mobile on the nightside table, and settled under the covers again. He closed his eyes, and thought about the day when he’d reach under the covers for the dark velveted body of the saint next to him. No matter what position they chose after that, it would be paradise.

* * *

On Friday, Bard picked up Tilda from school early and came home to find Sigrid already at her homework. Bain came in not even a minute later, panting from his pickup soccer game.

“Into the shower with you, Bain,” Bard pointed, as he hung Tilda’s coat beside his on the hooks by the door.

“Now?” Bain protested, yanking off his cleats. “I’m starving, Da! I’ve got to have something to eat now!”

“We’re having a treat tonight,” Bard explained, as both of his daughters looked up at him. “Pizza at Iolanda’s. Once you’ve showered.”

“Sweet!” Bain yelped, dropping his cleats and dashing to the bathroom. “I’m halfway washed already!”

“What’s the occasion?” Sigrid asked from the table where she typed on her homework.

“A good one. Bain, hold on a moment, so you can hear, too.”

“You said get in the shower, so I’m going, but now you want me to stop? Da, there’s pizza waiting!”

“It’ll wait for a minute longer. Remember when I told you that Thran’s son was coming home from his school?”

Sigrid gave him a look. When Bard winked at her, she looked back at her computer, shaking her head and smiling.

“I remember,” Tilda said helpfully. “You said his name was Legolas, and he likes fencing and archery.”

“That’s right, Til. He’s a year older than Bain. He doesn’t know any children here, and Thran wondered if he could introduce Legolas to you all so he’d know some. It turns out that Legolas likes pizza almost as much as Bain does, so Thran thought that pizza would be a good way for him to get to know all of us, and for us to get to know him.”

“Whatever. As long as there’s pizza,” Bain shrugged, licking his lips. “So can I shower now, Da?”

“Just one more thing. It sounds like Legolas is pretty quiet, so you three take it easy on him. Show him a good time. All right, Bain. Go.”

“Gone!” Bain claimed, as he dove back into the bathroom.

“Do you think Legolas would like a picture?” Tilda asked thoughtfully a few minutes later. “I could draw him one.”

“That’d be a kind thing for you to do, little doll. I think he’d like a picture. What are you going to draw?”

“Maybe a picture of him with his bow and arrow – wait, I don’t know what he looks like.”

Bard fished out his mobile. “Thran sent me a picture. Let me find it.” He paged through his photos, mostly of his children, and found the one Thran had taken of his son skating at Rockefeller Center. “Here it is.”

He came to the table so Sigrid could see the picture, too; she and Tilda bent over Bard’s mobile to study it.

“Does he have white hair, too?” Tilda said.

“I don’t know,” Bard admitted. “I think it’s blond.”

“His hair’s almost as long as Thran’s is,” Sigrid agreed, squinting at the picture. “Wait... is part of it green?”

Bard chuckled. “Just the two braids in the front, or so Thran says. But they might change to blue before long.”

Tilda frowned, still concentrating on the picture. “He’s skating?”

Bard nodded. “So he is.”

Sigrid looked up at Bard. “Wow. Skating, archery, fencing... he’s good at sport, all right.”

“I think he’s learning to ride a horse, too. So yes, very good at sport.”

“Sport?” Bain came back into the living room, still rubbing his hair dry. “Who’s good at sport? Legolas?”

Bard nodded.

“Do you think he likes soccer?”

“That gives you something to ask him,” Bard smiled.

“Hey, is that him?” Bain leaned forward to look at Bard’s mobile in Sigrid’s hand. “Wow, he’s skating? Maybe he likes hockey.”

“That gives you something else to ask him.”
“Cool. When do we go?”

Bard took his mobile back from Sigrid. “It’s nearly five now. We’ll meet them at Iolanda’s at five-thirty. So get dressed, Bain. Something without holes in it.”

“Can I wear my soccer jersey?”

“Only if it’s clean.”

“It’s sort of clean. Only one practice.”

Bard smothered a grin. For Bain, that was sort of clean; for anyone else it would be rank, but in the scented atmosphere of a busy pizzeria, no one would notice.

“Fine. As long as it hasn’t got any holes.”

“Yes!” Bain ran off to find the cleaner of his two jerseys.

Tilda had collected her paper, crayons, and colored markers and arranged them next to Sigrid’s things on the table. She chose a marker, considered her paper for a few seconds, then started to draw. Sigrid shared a fond smile with Bard, then gathered her papers and shut off her computer. Bard ducked into the shower to wash off the day’s construction efforts, but Sigrid was waiting for him when he came out of the bathroom to find a clean shirt to wear with his jeans.

“Why don’t you wear that nice new Henley you got recently?” she suggested with a mischievous smile as Bard considered the options in the drawer under his bed.

“Hm, that sounds like a suggestion,” he said mildly. He’d resisted the urge to wear Thran’s shirt all week, not willing to waste it on a construction site. He’d had to wash it, so it didn’t still smell like Thran, but the luxurious touch of the soft fabric was a delicious reminder of him. He pulled it out and armed his way into it. “It’s a very nice shirt.”

“It certainly is,” Sigrid said, standing beside him. She lowered her voice. “Does Legolas...?”

Bard shook his head. “Let him get to know us first, okay? Be nice.”

“I feel like a fellow conspirator. Does that make me an adult?”

“No more than it makes the rest of us,” Bard chuckled. “Still... thanks, Sig.”

Sigrid patted his arm. “It’s good to see you so happy, Da. And we’re getting out of here.”

“We’re getting out of where?” Bain asked, coming out of his room with his soccer jersey, jeans, and battered trainers on.

“Out of here, as soon as Tilda’s finished her picture. Pizza, remember?” Bard replied smoothly, with a wink at Sigrid.

“Then hurry up, Til!” Bain exhorted his sister. “I’m starving!”

“She’ll be done in a minute, you. Tie your shoes while you’re waiting.”

“You’d better find yours, Da,” Sigrid pointed to Bard’s bare feet. “Before Hurricane Bain erupts down the stairs.”

By the time Bard had put on his shoes and socks, Tilda had added the last flourish to her picture and held it up for approval.

“Do you think it looks like him?”

Bard considered, cocking his head at the paper. The figure was obviously drawn by a child, but it was much better than a messy scribble by her contemporaries. She’d be a good artist before long. He smiled; if Tilda wanted art lessons at some point, soon he’d be able to pay for them. It was one thing for him to give up the things he loved, and entirely another for his circumstances to force his children to. “It’s good, Til. There’s his bow and his long hair, and there’s the archery target.”

“Oh! I forgot!” She turned back to the table, found her green marker, and added two careful squiggles. “I forgot the green braids.”

“Then let’s head out,” Bard said, grabbing his coat and Tilda’s from the wall hooks by the door. “Got your picture, Til?”

“Got it,” she said, holding it up. “I’ll roll it up so it doesn’t blow away when we get outside.”

They trooped down the stairs and out onto the sidewalk, and walked quickly to the pizzeria. Iolanda herself was behind the counter tonight, a pixie with spiky grey hair, five earrings in each ear, and a wide smile. She had to stand on her tiptoes to see over the counter and wave when Bard stepped in with his children. When he told her that two more would join them, she waved them to the biggest table in the place, the big round one in the back corner. Bard ordered a couple of pitchers of water – he’d learned long ago that water was free where soda and tea were not, and that was one more way to stretch his meager budget.

“Can we please order one of the pizzas now?” Bain pleaded, crowding into the center of the banquette, right at the corner between the walls. That was his favorite seat because he could watch the pizzas coming out of the oven as well as the front door to see who came and went. “I’m starving!”

“Give Thran and Legolas a chance to get here,” Bard counseled. “We don’t know what kind of pizza they like.”

“Thran ate pepperoni and onion with us,” Tilda remembered, putting her picture carefully on the table before she sat down.

“He did,” Bard agreed. “But let’s be polite. They invited us, not the other way around, so they get first dibs on choosing the pizza.”

“I hope they don’t like that white pizza,” Bain grumped. “Too much garlic!”

“I liked that one,” Sigrid said. “With the five cheeses and the seasonings. Though to tell the truth, I’m happy with any pizza that doesn’t have anchovies and pickles on it.”

“I don’t like the fish things, either,” Tilda told her sister. “They have whiskers!”

“I know!” Sig agreed, laughing with Tilda. “How can a fish have whiskers? It makes no sense.”

“Ugh,” Tilda made a face. “I don’t think it’s a good idea to eat any fish that has whiskers.”

Bard chuckled as Iolanda came with a tray of water glasses and the pitchers. “Evening, all! Anything to start while you wait?”
“We’ll wait,” Bard demurred. “They won’t be long – in fact, there they are. Give us a few minutes, and we’ll make up our minds.”

“Sure,” Iolanda nodded with a smile. “Take your time. Just come up to the counter when you’re ready. I’m short tonight – well, ha, ha, I’m short every night, but tonight I’m short-handed as well as short-heighted – so if you’d order from the counter, that’d be a help.”

“Glad to,” Bard assured her, then turned back to see Legolas come in behind his father. Only a couple of inches shorter than Bard, and crowned with silky blond hair – plus the green braids that hung down in front of his ears – Legolas had his father’s handsomeness, if not his ethereal quality. He was not as pale as Thran, though as he took off his coat, he revealed a frame just as slender as his father’s – this youngster had a ways to go before he filled out. His shoulders were broad and his arms were muscled under his olive green thermal shirt, evidence of his archery and fencing training, and he had the balanced carriage of a fencer. His jeans were a well-faded grey, and he wore black boots with lugged soles. The hand not holding his coat was stuffed in the front pocket of his jeans, and he had a quiet, shy air.

When Bard’s eyes met Thran’s, the jolt that shot through him felt strong enough to shake the ground under his feet. Under his leather jacket, Thran had on one of the soft Henleys that he favored, this one in dark burgundy; his usual black jeans; and his hiking boots. As usual, he made such simple, unadorned clothing look elegant. That smile, those clear grey eyes intent on his, the beautiful, erect bearing and silky movements of a dancer, and that crown of silky white hair...

Gods, what he wouldn’t give to be able to kiss his angel. But that had to wait for another time.

Bard offered a wave, not quite trusting his voice to be steady. Thran waved in response, just as silent, but he offered a word to Legolas and pointed towards their table. Legolas scanned the faces watching him expectantly, and dipped his head, perhaps a little nervous.

“Hello, one and all,” Thran began with a smile. “It is good to see all of you. This is my son, Legolas. Legolas, this is Bard, and his children, Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda.”

“Hello,” Legolas said with a nod. He had a quiet voice, without Thran’s Russian accent. “I’m glad to meet you all.”

“Let’s sit down,” Bard said, and managed to put Thran between him and Legolas, Tilda beside him, and Bain and Sigrid beside each other in the corner.

“I made you a picture, Legolas,” Tilda offered, leaning forward to see Thran’s son around the table. She held out her paper to him. “Da told us that you like archery, so I drew a picture of you and your bow.”

Legolas took the paper and unrolled it, smiling at the drawing. “It is a good picture, Tilda. You even put in my green braids.”

“I did that specially. Though if you do a different color, I can draw you another one with the new color.”

“Thank you very much. It was nice of you to think of me.”

“So can we order the pizza now?” Bain asked hopefully. “I’m starving!”

Thran looked at Legolas with a wry smile. “Where have I heard that before?”

Legolas gave Bain beside him a tentative smile. “We should be polite and order something for Bain, Father. He’s hungry.”

“And of course you are not, yes?” Thran teased. “Well, then, perhaps we should order just one to hold Bain until the rest of us have made up our minds.”

“Oh... perhaps two. Just to make sure,” Legolas amended.

“Of course. What would you and Bain suggest?”

The two boys looked at each other, not sure how to proceed. But Bain’s hunger was a great driver, for he grabbed one of the menus and opened it to the pizza section. He put it between him and Legolas on the table. “They have really good pepperoni here. And the sausage is really spicy. But this is the best one of all.” He pointed, and Legolas leaned near to read what Bain pointed at.

“‘Meat Extravaganza,’ ” he read aloud. “‘Ham, pepperoni, sausage, ground beef, and bacon, with extra cheese.’ ” He looked up at Bain. “That sounds awesome!”

Sigrid rolled her eyes, and Bard smothered a laugh at both her and the boys. Thran looked appalled, but so would any ballet dancer with an aversion to fat calories and carbs. He met Bard’s gaze with a comical wince. “We know what to get for the boys. What would our two jolies filles like, then?”

“I would like cheese, please,” Tilda replied gravely, drawing Thran’s smile.

“I’m happy with veggie, or pepperoni, or any combination,” Sigrid said. “Whatever you and Da want, Thran.”

“I’m fine with whatever you want, too,” Bard added.

“Then perhaps half with just vegetables, and half with vegetables and the pepperoni?”

“Good by me. Sig?”

“Perfect,” she nodded. “Maybe one of their big salads to share, too?”

“Of course. So a large for the boys, a small for Tilda, and a large for the rest of us, and salad. I shall pass the word.”

Thran got up to relay their order to Iolanda, which gave Bard the chance to watch Legolas and Bain get to know each other. The pizza order had broken the ice, and Legolas was asking Bain about his soccer jersey, and by the time Thran came back with a basket of rolls and a plate of olive oil, the boys were talking easily. Tilda reached for the jar of crayons that always sat in the middle of the table, and soon she and Sigrid were drawing on the paper covering the table. Bard took up a crayon to draw a house that looked like his, and both the girls leaned over the table to add trees with a swing and a gazebo. Thran added an angel on the roof, under the sun that Tilda added. Snickering, Sigrid added a stick figure with a tiny bow and arrow, and another kicking a soccer ball, but Legolas and Bain were too busy talking about sports to notice. Bard caught Thran’s eye and winked.

By the time the drawing had acquired a zoo, an airport, a bus, two giraffes, and an alien space ship, breadcrumbs were sprinkled over the paper, and the water glasses were getting low. Iolanda brought the boys’ pizza, which they met with a yelp. Two pieces were gone before Iolanda could bring Tilda’s small pie and the other large one. Silence descended as everyone dug in, making Iolanda grin as she refilled their water pitchers.

“This is really good,” Legolas managed to say around his third piece. “Really good.”
“Mmm,” was all Bain could manage, with a tomato smile.

Thran ate mostly salad, but he had a slice of the veggie part of the pizza, and half of a pepperoni one. He even sampled the ice cream that Legolas had afterwards. There was very little pizza left over, just one slice of the veggie pepperoni and one of Tilda’s cheese, but the boys scarfed those down without pause. They tried to convince Bard and Thran to order another large mushroom and pepperoni pizza to go to take home with them, but both men nixed that.

“I made gingerbread yesterday, if you’d like some,” Bard offered.

“Yeah, it’s really good, and we can play video games for a while if you want, too,” Bain enticed Legolas.

The blond looked to Thran. “Could we, Father?”

“It would be nice to do that, yes,” Thran nodded, and though he looked thoughtful, Bard caught the gleam in his eye. “For a while, perhaps?”

“Let’s go,” Bard agreed. “You know the drill, children. Iolanda’s busy tonight, so help her clean up. Crayons back in the jar, chairs pushed in, coats on.”

He and Thran went up to settle the bill – Bard insisted on paying his family’s share – while the children tidied the table. Iolanda noticed, and gave them a bright smile back with their change.

“Wait, thanks for cleaning up,” she said, scooping up a bag full of rolls and handing it to Bard. “You’ve got a couple of chow hounds. Maybe a few extra rolls will help keep them full until the morning, eh?”

“You’re a gem, Iolanda,” Bard grinned. “It was good as always.”

“Good to see you all again. Things are better, then, Bard?”

He nodded. “Lots better. Thanks for asking.”

“Good. Maybe I’ll see you more often now.”

“You’ll certainly see my son,” he laughed. “Have a good night.”

“You, too. Ciao!”

He and Thran shepherded the children out and back towards their apartment building. Once they got to Bard’s apartment, Bain drew Legolas to the sofa, handing him a game controller, and turning on the TV. Bard went into the kitchen to get the gingerbread, and Tilda settled at the table with her drawing things. Thran opened the cabinet Bard indicated for the plates, and Sigrid found the forks. She leaned against her father as Thran put the plates on the table and came back for the cake slicer.

“So are we all going to the house tomorrow?” she murmured in his ear.

“Shh. We’ll see. Give it a bit longer,” he cautioned. “But it looks good so far.”

“Excellent,” she rubbed her hands together with a calculating smirk on her face. “Our plan proceeds apace.”

With cake slicer in hand, Thran had paused to listen, raising his eyebrows at Sigrid’s exaggerated pose. “Ah, you have become our accomplice, then, ma chère? And a fine accomplice you make. I will see that you have an extra nice slice of the gingerbread.”
He gave the cake slicer an expert twirl and saluted Sigrid with it, smiling, which Sigrid returned with a flourish and a bow.

“Pirates, both of you,” Bard murmured, then looked towards the living room. “Gingerbread, lads!”

Bain and Legolas came to the table only long enough to wolf down their pieces, then returned to the sofa to continue their game. Tilda and Sigrid took longer to finish theirs, then Tilda fetched a book for Sigrid to read to her. They sat at the table, Tilda drawing as Sigrid read, so Bard and Thran retreated to the kitchen to talk quietly.

“Tea?” Bard asked. When Thran nodded, he filled the kettle at the sink. “There’s the caddy. Pick your poison.”

Thran found cups, then opened the caddy, passing the package of green tea to Bard. When Bard reached for it, he held onto Thran’s fingers.

“Missed you,” Bard whispered, not letting go.

Thran squeezed Bard’s fingers back. “I also. Hurts here.” He pointed to his chest.

“Know the feeling, Gods, I know. I want to hold you.”

Thran released his fingers, leaving the tea packet in Bard’s hands. He moved the two cups closer to the stove, which let him press his hip against Bard’s. He brushed a quick, surreptitious kiss on Bard’s temple, his breath catching. Bard returned the caress before they moved apart.

“Sig, you want any tea?” Bard asked, forcing his voice even.

“No, thanks, Da,” came Sigrid’s voice.

“You’ve got to come out to the house tomorrow,” Bard whispered. “I can’t go another week like this.”

“Then let me set that in motion,” Thran whispered back, his hand touching Bard’s arm only briefly, before going out into the living room.

“Legolas, we have been invited on an outing tomorrow. Bard has a house outside the city that he restores. It has a ballroom that is the perfect size for us to fence. Would you offer your father a match or two?”

Legolas looked up at his father with a pleased look of anticipation. “Really? It’s big enough for fencing?”

“I would like to, Father,” Legolas nodded. “I would like that very much.”

“We can take a picnic and make a day of it,” Bard said, coming behind Thran. Gods, the urge to touch the back in front of him was almost irresistible, but somehow he kept his hands at his sides. “I’ve got some work to do out there, but the ballroom’s yours all day, for as long as you want to use it.”

“Then we would be delighted to visit,” Thran said, turning towards Bard. “We can stop at the market on the way to collect a lunch, then be on our way. What time would you like us to be ready?”
“Nine or ten? On Saturday, the market will be crowded if we go much later than that.”

“Can you get up by then, Legolas?” Thran asked.

“Nine-thirty, then. You will have to get up in time to have breakfast before we go.”

“Will that give you time enough for your morning practice?” Bard asked Thran.

Thran nodded. “I will do only the yoga. The rest I will do in the ballroom, before the fencing.”

“Good enough,” Bard nodded.

“We should go in a few minutes, then, Legolas, so that you get enough sleep to get up so early tomorrow.”

“Can I finish the game with Bain first, please?”

“If it takes only a few minutes, and not half the night,” Thran replied.

Bard laughed. “You’ve learned. Some of those things go on for hours.”

“This one is a short one, Da,” Bain called from the sofa. “Fifteen minutes.”

“That’s fine, Bain.” Bard came around Thran to pick up the cake plates and forks. “We’ll have time to drink our tea.”

The kettle whistled, Bard poured the water into the teapot, and ran enough water in the sink to wash the plates and forks. Thran took the dishtowel to dry each one as Bard finished it, his fingers brushing an occasional touch on Bard’s hand. They didn’t speak, but at least they were able to look at each other. When the plates and forks were put away, they sipped their tea in silence, leaning side by side against the counter. It was as much comfort as torture, for while they were physically close enough to touch, they couldn’t. Bard sighed silently.

“This is going to kill me,” he breathed.

“I will if you will.”

Thran hummed. “It is not easy.”

“No. I’m going to hug you tomorrow no matter what it takes.”

“I need that as badly as you. But tonight, it is the children’s hour.”

“We’re finished, Father,” Legolas called.

“Then it is time for us to take our leave. We will see you tomorrow morning at nine-thirty, then.”

“We’re looking forward to it,” Bard said. Gods, how badly he was looking forward to it bore no contemplation. “Just knock on our door when you’re ready, and we’ll head for the market.”

“Until then,” Thran nodded. “Sigrid, Tilda, good night, mes jolies filles. Bain, good night. You were good to host Legolas so well. Bard, thank you for the gingerbread.”
“Thank you for the pizza. Legolas, it was nice to meet you at last. I’m glad you and your father will be with us tomorrow, too.”

“I had a lot of fun,” Legolas said simply, his smile a little wider than it had been when he’d first met Bard. “And I look forward to tomorrow. I’ve missed not being able to fence, so I appreciate you giving me the chance.”

Legolas went to Tilda. “Thank you for the picture, Tilda. I like it very much. I’ll put it on my wall upstairs.”

Tilda put out her hand, which Legolas took. “You’re welcome. And thank you for my pizza, too.”

Thran and Legolas walked to the door, collected their coats and boots, and went outside.

“Good night,” everyone chorused, and Bard had just a second to catch Thran’s eye before he went up the stairs after Legolas. He was sorry for Thran to leave, but at least he would see more of him tomorrow. And somewhere, somehow, he’d find a private moment to tell his angel how much he missed him.

By the time he’d shut the door, Bard had started a solo game on the TV, Tilda had gone back to her drawing, and Sigrid had gathered up her homework. There was little to clean up, so Bard eased into his chair to think about tomorrow. When Sigrid headed to her room to work, she squeezed his shoulder, drawing his gaze to hers. She winked as she passed by.

Later, once the children had gone to bed, Bard put on his flannel sleep pants and ratty tee, and got into bed with his mobile.

In bed yet?

Damnably alone. Want you now!

Bard exhaled. If only. Can you die from lack of an angel?

From lack of a saint, too

All I want for Christmas is an angel in my arms

Do you celebrate Christmas?

We do. No room for a tree in the apartment, but we do gifts and dinner. Do you?

We do. No tree, either, but gifts. Next year, Tilda’s tree

Yes

Do you want to do Christmas together? A dinner would be nice, Thran texted.

It’s next Friday. Turkey again, or something else?

Discuss tomorrow. Perhaps ham?

What, no poultry?

Funny contractor. One day of ham will not kill me

Children like ham. Legolas?
Loves it

So ham. Wish I could have held you tonight

I die of skin hunger. Would settle for us nested on sofa Wouldn’t even need to watch a film. Just nest

Mmmmm

So go to sleep. Make tomorrow get here sooner

I hear and obey, my saint

Miss you too much to make a snarky comment. Gods I love you

I love you, too. See you tomorrow

You, too, angel

Bard sighed, switched off his mobile, and put it on the floor by the bed. He shut his eyes, and willed himself to sleep.

Chapter End Notes

P.S. - In the interest of moving the story along, I did a little judicious rewriting of Chapter 12 to preclude the need for poor Bard to go through lead paint abatement on his beautiful house (required in the US for all houses built before 1978). This is a bear that takes weeks if not months to do properly, and costs more than many cars do. Most of you won't care about this, but for you sticklers of home repair, I had the previous owner of Bard’s house take care of this horrendous chore.

None of us want that kind of delay to deter Bard and Thran from finally getting past the wishing and sighing stage, do we?
Chapter 14

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint venture forth with blades in hand - fencing blades, and saw blades. But with four children in tow, it'll be hard for them to cut up in any but the most decorous fashion. Words may have to suffice.

Words between frustrated lovers are still potent weapons.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

Mab i ast = son of a bitch (Welsh)

“Legolas?” Thran edged open the door to his son’s room. It was completely dark, given the pulled shades and drawn draperies. An unmoving lump sprawled across the bed. “It is quarter of nine o’clock, synok. Do you want porridge, or eggs?”

“Mfph,” came from somewhere in the middle of Legolas’s bed.

“Porridge, then?” Thran persisted, smiling. He recalled his own bleary mornings in countless dance academy dormitories. Why was every child a night owl, or at least as slow to rise as one? “Come, Legolas. I look forward to the rare chance to fence today. Porridge or eggs?”

A groan issued from the middle of the disarranged bed linens. “Ummm... wha...”

“Breakfast. Fencing. Immense lunch. Remember?”

Legolas sat up, his long, blond hair messy around him. A lot of it fell in his face, so a hand emerged from the blankets to brush it away. Some of it refused to go, and so the other hand had to join the first to urge the rumpled locks back. He blinked against the bright light coming from the doorway, and stretched – only to flop back down onto his back with a deep breath.

“It’s too early,” he wheezed.

“The world does not wait for sleepy children. It is a sunny day, though cold, but not so damp a cold as to be miserable. Come and eat something, or you will have to wait to get something at the market before we leave for the country. So... porridge, or eggs?”

“Um... both?” Legolas sat up again, and this time actually got his feet over the side of his bed. He was bare but for his baggy boxers. Thran smothered a giggle; the boxers had small cherubs bearing bows on them – Cupids, he recalled. He wondered what the story was about those. Despite the dim light, a slouch, and a fumbling rub of the eyes, the strength of Legolas’s shoulders and chest stood out. He’d filled in a bit more since Thran had seen him in September. He’d grown a couple of inches, too; he was already as tall as his fiery mother had been. Before the next year was out, he’d likely be taller than Bard, who was a respectable couple of inches over six feet.

Bard. His breath caught for half a heartbeat. Gods, he was dying for lack of svyatoy yego, son saint, viņa svētais, his saint. No matter what language he used, none of them assuaged how badly he craved the easy company of a tall, muscular, gentle man with unruly dark curls and warm brown eyes. This was more than missing mere sex; it was missing companionship, understanding, love – his other half.

Not that Thran didn’t want to indulge himself in playing with Bard’s most companionable body... no, not at all. But that was no longer all that he wanted.

“The porridge is already hot. I will put on the eggs.”

“Hard boiled again?”

Thran looked back at his son. “That is my usual.”

“We’ve had hard boiled eggs every morning since I came home.”

“Would you like another kind?”

Legolas gave his father a half smile. “Do you know how to make another kind?”

Thran chuckled. “No, but if you do, perhaps you will show me, and I will make those.”

Legolas stretched again. “Is there a drop of butter in the fridge? Or oil in the pantry?”

“Of course not.”

“Of course not.” Legolas stood up for yet another stretch. “Then do you have a nonstick pan?”

“I have no idea. Come look. If not, then I will get one, and also butter the next time we go to the market.”

Legolas shook his head, smiling. “You are still my inadvertently funny father.”

“All ballet dancers are eccentric,” Thran waved his hand, playing along with Legolas’s teasing. “This one prefers to be careful about what he eats rather than to ruin his teeth through constant purges.”

“I’m glad of that. I’ll dress, and then see about the eggs.”

Thran went back to the kitchen to look for some sort of pan. He had bought a set of them, but he’d never ventured so far as to use the skillet. Skillet meant frying, and frying meant oil, and oil was not something he ate a lot of, just enough to keep his hair shiny and his body well maintained. It was easier just to boil his chicken, or to roast it in the small square pan that had come with the set.

He hoped Bard could tell him more about cooking. Legolas didn’t want to eat every meal in a restaurant, so he needed to learn some simple things to keep Legolas properly fueled. Tomorrow, he would make a soup in the biggest stovetop pan –

“How many eggs do we have?” Legolas asked, appearing in a tee shirt and baggy pajama pants. Was that what Bard wore when he slept? Hmm. Thran would find several ways to convince his saint of the delights of sleeping nude –

“A dozen eggs.”
Legolas stuck his head in the fridge. “No butter, as you said.” He went through the pantry, pulling out a jar. He unscrewed the lid to sniff. “What’s this? The coconut oil for your hair? You can eat this, you know.”

“I had not assumed otherwise, given that it is made of coconuts, which as I recall are still your favorite chocolates in the box.”

“Mmm,” Legolas wiggled his eyebrows at his father. “So eggs and oil. Any spices or herbs?”

Thran pointed to the canister of parsley proudly. Legolas gave him a surprised look, but took out the parsley and the pepper beside it.

“Now, a pan? Hmm. You’ve gotten some new ones since September.”

“I bought a set just after you left, because I thought that I should learn to cook.”

“Good, you have a skillet. So, scrambled or fried?”

“Which has the least amount of oil?”

“Scrambled.”

“Then show me how to make those.”

Legolas put the skillet on the stove, turned it on – just to medium, Thran noted – and cracked six eggs into a bowl. He put a small dab of the coconut oil in the pan to melt, then smeared the liquid oil over the entire pan surface. He stirred the eggs to a uniform yellow, then poured them in the hot pan.

“Cooking tools,” Legolas said, when he couldn’t find a spatula. “We need to get you some cooking tools.”

He used a fork to stir the eggs around until they were soft curds, sprinkled them with parsley, stirred a bit more, then shoveled them out onto a plate. After adding salt and pepper, he offered his father the fork. “Have a bite.”

“Very good,” Thran discovered.

“And not too much oil.”

“Not too much oil. So now I can make soup and scrambled eggs. I progress.”

“And last night you ate pizza. Amazing!” Legolas pretended to marvel as he took his plate to the kitchen table and sat down. Thran spooned bowls of porridge for them both, brought them and a bowl of cut-up fruit to the table, and sat down. As he sprinkled the bananas and apples on his cereal, Legolas gave him a look.

“What kind of soup can you make?”

Thran sprinkled cinnamon on his porridge, then poured vanilla almond milk – unsweetened, of course – into his bowl. “Chicken with carrots and celery. And the parsley. It is chicken noodle soup without the noodles.”

“What, did you find one of those cooking shows on the net that showed how to make it?”

Here it comes, Thran thought, but he kept his face serene as he began his breakfast. “I had a cooking lesson from Bard, whom you met last night.”
“Oh?” Legolas seemed to mull that over. “Why’d he give you a cooking lesson?”

“I was very rude to him and his children the day the ballet company suspended my contract. I had had to walk home in the rain, and so was soaked and chilled. I came home to a cold apartment, for the radiators were not working. Bard was the night super on duty that day, and I was very angry because I thought he had ignored my request to fix the radiators. But he is a patient man, and fixed the radiators without complaint, even though he was not the one who had ignored my repair request. I apologized, of course. He took pity on me and taught me to make the soup so that I did not get sick from the weather.”

“Did he introduce you to pizza, too?”

Thran chuckled. “I know what pizza is, Legolas. I know what nachos and burritos and chimichangas are, too – even hamburgers and potato chips and ice cream. That does not mean I eat them.”

“But did you eat pizza with him before last night?”

“Even worse. I had Thanksgiving turkey and cranberry sauce and potatoes with Bard and his children. I made the broccoli. We plan to share Christmas dinner, too. Perhaps ham?”

“Mmm. Ham!” Legolas brightened, then went back to his speculative look. “He seems like a normal guy. What’s he got to do with the ballet?”

“Nothing,” Thran shook his head. “He is a gifted metal sculptor. Perhaps he will show you some of his work at the house today.”

“So why does he live here, if his sculpture’s out there?”

Thran gave his son a look. “For his children, mon cher. He needed another job to support them after their mother died, and so he sacrificed for his children. Soon, maybe he will be back to his sculpture, once he has finished his house.”

Legolas turned his attention to his eggs, shoveling them down in fewer bites than seemed physically possible. Porridge came next, all that Thran hadn’t eaten topped with the remains of the fruit. Thran wondered if his tenacious son would let the conversation lapse, so he drank his tea quietly and waited. He didn’t know whether to hope Legolas let it go, or pursued it. But his son concentrated on his food and made no further comment.

When Thran had finished his tea, he got up to clear the dishes away, and pushed his sleeves up to run soapy water in the sink. He gave the bowls and cups a good soaping and set them on the dishtowel to drain. Legolas finished his porridge, and brought the bowl to the sink for Thran to wash.

“What blades will you choose today?” Thran asked his son. “I am very out of practice, whatever your choice.”

“Perhaps the foil, then? Smallest target area.”

“Not épée, to give you the best chance to score?” Thran teased. “Or sabre, to make the most of your speed? Not that it matters. You will soon outfence me, regardless of which weapon you choose.”

Legolas grinned, pleased at Thran’s prediction. “Your height will always give you an advantage at épée, Father. As for the others, it’ll be a while before I best you at those, too.”

“It will not. And when you do, I will be very proud of you.”
“You’ll still outdo me with knives.”

Thran put a hand on his son’s shoulder. “This is not a competition between us. I am not the fencer or archer you will be, just as you will not be the dancer I am. Take pride in what you do, not what another does.”

Legolas nodded, smiling. “I will, Father. So... I have blades for all three in the case. We can see what we feel like when we get there.”

“That is good. So, all is clean and put away. Dress, and we will venture downstairs.”

Legolas disappeared into his room to change out of his pajamas. Thran brushed his teeth, braided his hair, and put a warm sweater on over his Henley (not Bard’s, he thought with a pang, but Legolas would wonder why he wore such a shabby thing for anything other than ballet practice). He found coat and gloves, his red cashmere scarf, and a large zippered canvas bag.

“I’ve got the fencing jackets and masks,” Legolas said, coming out of his room with the mentioned pieces. “The jackets are clean, you’ll be glad to know. I did get those washed before exams.”

“I thank you.” Thran held the canvas bag open. “They can go in this. The only other thing we need is the blade case.”

Legolas returned to his room to fetch the blade case, and his coat. He pulled a slouchy knitted hat on his head, armed his way into his coat, and hefted the case. “Ready.”

Thran locked the door behind them, collected the bag of equipment, and went down the stairs after Legolas. Their footfalls were light, apt testimony to the years of athletic training that had formed both father and son. At Bard’s apartment, Legolas knocked softly.

“Hi!” Bain greeted them breathlessly, yanking open the door. “C’mon in, Legolas. We’re almost ready. Hi, Thran!”

“Hello,” Legolas ventured, coming after Bain.

“Are those your swords?” Bain asked eagerly. “Can I see them?”

“Sure,” Legolas agreed. “They’re not sharp or anything, but um, please don’t touch them?”

“No, course not. I’ll just look. C’mon, we can put your case on my bed, out of the way.”

“Hello, Sigrid, hello, Tilda, hello, Bard,” Legolas waved in passing as Bain pulled him into this room. “Good morning.”

“Hi,” the girls waved.

“Ooh, I’d like to see the fencing things, too,” Sigrid said, realizing what the boys were up to. “Come on, Tilda, Legolas has real swords!”

“Really?” the little girl looked up from her oatmeal. “I’d like to see them, too.”

She trotted after her sister, leaving Bard to meet Thran at the door.

“Hey, my angel,” Bard breathed, his eyes brightening. “You are a beautiful way to start the morning.”

“No more so than you, lyubov moya,” Thran murmured back. Pulling off his glove, he kissed his index finger and touched Bard’s lips with it. “This is all I can offer now, but take it as a promise for what I would prefer to offer.”

Bard’s lips twitched in a perverse smile. He kissed his index finger and touched Thran’s lips, but didn’t stop there. He traced his finger down Thran’s chest and past his belt buckle to the zipper of his jeans, and circled there. “See you, and raise you.”

Thran’s eyes widened. “Don’t, you bastard. I already have too hard a time to control myself.”

“I can tell,” Bard poked the zipper of Thran’s jeans before backing away a step.

“Supremely arrogant bastard,” Thran growled under his breath, but a smile twitched at his lips. “One day, you will regret that you do that to me.”

Bard arched an eyebrow. “No, I won’t. And neither will you. Let’s rally the troops.”

He headed back to Bain’s room. “Come on, lads. Time to go. Tilda, finish your oatmeal and wash your bowl. And put away the milk.”

“But I didn’t leave the milk out, Da,” Tilda said in injured tones, coming out of Bain’s room.

“Then whoever did, put it away. Bain, come on. Legolas will show us everything as soon as we get to the house. So let’s get the kitchen shipshape, and ourselves out of the door.”

The children scurried – it was Bain who’d left the milk out – and soon were gathering coats and hats and gloves. Bard had a bag of tools to take and an empty cooler, Sigrid had her computer and school backpack, Tilda had a bag of drawing things and her books, and Bain had his ever-present soccer ball, so they were well laden as they came out onto the sidewalk. Bard’s truck was almost right in front of the door, so he opened the lid on the back to stow the bags, the cooler, and his tools, fastening everything down with bungee cords to keep them from shifting as they traveled.

“Okay, this’ll be a tight squeeze, but we’ll get it sorted. Tilda, you’re up front between Thran and me.”

“Legolas can sit in the middle in the back,” Bain offered, hopping into the back seat. C’mon, Legolas, there’s more room in the middle for your legs.”

Thran’s son climbed in after Bain, and Sigrid squeezed in after him with her computer cradled in her arms. Thran took the front beside Tilda, and Bard climbed in last.

“Everybody buckled? Good. Next stop, the market.”

They were still reasonably early, so they found a parking space not too far from the market, and soon emerged with several bags of provisions to stow in the back of the truck. Shortly thereafter, they were on the highway, heading west. Sigrid got Legolas to talk about his archery, and soon Bain could carry the brunt of that conversation. Thran asked general questions about the repair work, as if he were only making polite conversation, and Bard kept his side of the conversation just as neutral. Thran was relieved that the children sounded relaxed. Whether consciously or not, Bain’s genuine interest in all things sport was drawing Legolas out, so the time it took to get to the house passed easily. Before long, they pulled into the short lane. Today, however, they didn’t stop by the gate that guarded the path up the short rise to the house. Bard continued on to pull into a driveway that ended at the front corner of the house by an outbuilding - perhaps a garage? Bard had taken Thran up the rise the first time to show him the house to its best advantage, from the front.

After Bard parked next to the garage, everyone piled out of the truck while he jumped in the back.
Once he’d handed down all the things they needed to bring into the house, everyone had lots to tote.

“Once the construction’s mostly done, the carriage house will be empty enough to actually put a vehicle in,” Bard commented, leading past the garage and towards the porch steps. Thran let the others precede him, taking in the changes that had taken place since he’d last been here. The grass was mowed, the bushes were trimmed, the leaves were swept off the porch and out of the borders, and even though the outside paint was still worn, the place looked much less neglected. What had been a beautiful relic was still worn on the edges, but it was no longer a relic. Thran had not thought that his spirits could rise more this morning – he was already thrilled to be with lyubov yego, at the house that would soon bring them together – but the ongoing restoration heartened him even more.

The day was coming. It was coming. Thran had to swallow down his anticipation as he belatedly followed after the rest.

Inside, the most apparent change was in the just inside the entryway. What had been an empty, dusty space was clean and bright, if not yet painted. In the middle of the floor was Bard’s stylized antelope sculpture. Now that it was freestanding rather than mired in the clutter of the barn, its satiny finish glowed a warm caramel gold in the light of the open door and sidelights. The antelope rose on her hind legs, her front legs kicking out as she looked straight up, her curving horns making an elegant vertical arc from head nearly down to her tail. She stood nearly eight feet high, but as there was not yet a chandelier in place, the height didn’t matter.

“Da!” Sigrid exclaimed, touching one of the antelope’s front hooves. “Oh, Da! You put Hope the Lope back! You put her back!”

Sigrid let everything in her arms slide to the floor, even the bag with her computer, and flung her arms around Bard in a tight hug. The spontaneous embrace caught Bard by surprise, but he wound his arms around Sigrid and held her as she squeezed him.

“Of course I put her back. This is where she belongs,” Bard said, holding Sigrid close. He caught Thran’s eyes, and gave a self-conscious smile. “Come on. Let’s get everything in the kitchen, and then you can come back and give Hope a proper hello.”

Everyone followed Sigrid and Bard as they circled the antelope, passed through the dining room, and came into the kitchen. It, too, was much cleaner, if still echoingly empty. Part of the walls had been tiled in white subway tiles, though the grout was not yet done. Light switches and fixtures were in place. A large farm table now sat in front of the windows, albeit with only three chairs around it, but it was a good place to put their supplies for lunch.

“It looks so different,” Tilda said into the silence. “Nicer.”

Thran thought so, too, but kept his silence.

“It gets nicer every day, little doll,” Bard replied. “Who wants to show Legolas around? Or would you like to see the ballroom first?”

“I want to see the rest,” Thran said. “This is a beautiful house.”

“I’ll give you the tour, then,” Bard said, smiling. He was relieved, then. Gods, had he worried that Thran wouldn’t love the differences? The care and attention Bard had lavished on this place were already apparent, even after just a few days. What a spectacular place this would be before long!

“The wiring’s done pretty much all over, and the plumbing, so the place has water and bathrooms now,” Bard said. “Heat’s on, too, so we’ll be comfortable today. The roof’s done, and the gutters.
Nothing’s painted yet, and the floors will be refinished once the painting’s done. The entryway will be just the woodwork and a pale paint that makes the most of Hope...”

They went through the house, Bard describing what had been done, what was about to be done, and what would be done after that. The children ran ahead of them, but at no point did Thran feel safe enough to say much. Anything he said would reveal everything to everybody, not just Bard. So he schooled his face into only polite interest. Fortunately Bard understood his reticence, so wasn’t upset when Thran said little. Finally, when all four children ran down to the ballroom ahead of their fathers, Thran risked stroking Bard’s hair as they descended the stairs. Bard stopped stock still, looking back at Thran.

“It is perfect. Everything. You make our home,” Thran whispered, stroking the side of Bard’s face. “I see it everywhere. You have no idea how badly I wanted to tell you so.”

Bard tugged the end of Thran’s braid. “I saw it in your eyes. Don’t worry. Come on. The ballroom.”

Thran nodded, and they continued down the stairs. “Tell me about the antelope.”

Bard ran a hand through his hair. Self-conscious, then. “It was one of my first pieces. I’d seen an animal documentary about lions, and there was this antelope that no matter how many times the lions went after it, it just refused to go down. It was this beautiful creature, nearly too beautiful to live, but it was also one tough mother, the way you have to be in this world. I called my antelope Hope, after the one the lions couldn’t take down. It was Sigrid who called her Hope the Antelope, shortened to Hope the Lope. The entry hall was where she stood when we were here. I don’t expect Bain remembers, and I know Tilda doesn’t. But Sig didn’t forget.”

“She is back where she belongs, then,” Thran agreed. “I see why you did not want to sell her.”

“She would have been the last one,” Bard nodded. “Though if I’d ever had to... I think it would have killed me.” He glanced at Thran. “Ballroom.”

“Of course.”

A soccer game was already in progress when they came in.

“Father, this is amazing!” Legolas called. “It really is a ballroom. I didn’t expect it to be – it’s more than big enough for four fencing pistes. And the floor is perfect. Not too hard, not too bouncy.”

Bard laughed. “I guess the folks who built the place knew what they were doing about a suitable dance floor.”

“Then we must put it to good use, yes?” Thran grinned. “I will do a short barre first, to warm up.”

“I should do the same. I haven’t since before exams,” Legolas grimaced. “I can feel it.”

“Then let us make do with the scaffold,” Thran pointed at the end of the ballroom, where a structure of pipes was set up, ostensibly for the painters to reach the ceiling, but as the painting had yet to be scheduled, Bard must have put this in the ballroom just for Thran and Legolas to use. He glanced at Bard, offering silent thanks. “I do not think the painters will mind if we use it today.”

“There’s a pantry in the kitchen if you want a changing room. There’s a half bath in the sitting room, too. So... I’ll leave you to it. Sig, what’s your plan for the morning?”

“I’ve got a paper to write, so I’ll work on that for a while. Though... Thran, Legolas, when you do the fencing, do you mind if we watch?”
Thran looked to Legolas, leaving it up to him. But his son shook his head. “No, it doesn’t bother me. I’m used to people watching the matches, so if you want to, I don’t mind.”

“Sweet,” Bain muttered, his hands clenching in approval. “Um, yeah, Da, I know, I have a math thing to do before I watch. I know. So I’ll get on that.”

“I don’t have any homework,” Tilda said. “So may I stay in here?”

“As long as Thran and Legolas don’t mind. Make sure you listen to what Thran says about it. I’m going to finish some woodwork so it’s ready for the painters when they get here. Anybody need anything before I head upstairs?”

No one did. So Bard ducked out of the ballroom as if he had no interest in seeing Thran do his warmup.

Thran knew better. It gave him something to smile about – sigh about – as he changed his Henley, jeans, and hiking boots for stretchy knit top, warmup leggings and fencing shoes. As Legolas gathered his things to change, Thran went to the scaffolding. It wasn’t at exactly the usual height, but it was adequate for the day. He fell into the stretches and steps and folds, savoring the familiar routine, the quiet that always descended inside when he was at the barre. He sensed Legolas taking his place beside him, and Tilda at the far end by the garden furniture with her books and drawing things. Upstairs was the faint sound of footsteps as Bard made his rounds. Thran shut his eyes, and let the routine take him. This was the first one he would do in his emerging home, and he wanted to do it justice.

** * *

Bard gritted his teeth as soon as he was out of sight of the children. Gods, what he wouldn’t do to stay in the ballroom, watching Thran warm up for his fencing practice with Legolas! Nobility for the sake of their children was becoming nearly unendurable – first no touches, then no words, and now not even a look! He had the worst urge to march downstairs, cart Thran out of the ballroom over his shoulder, toss him into the truck, race down the road, cart him into the first vacant room in the first B and B he found, and then lock them both inside for a week with nothing to do but have at each other, until they were too exhausted to do more than fall into bed for another week.

That would be a shitty thing to do to Sigrid, leaving her to make do with three children.

Gods, he couldn’t stop being responsible even in his daydreams!

Sighing, he plugged in the miter saw, put the first strip of molding on the table, measured the space he had to fill, marked the molding, cut the molding, plugged in the nail gun, nailed the molding into place around the door. He measured the next space, marked the molding, cut the molding, nailed the molding. Repeat, repeat, repeat. He didn’t think about anything but the molding, so he got the whole room done in twenty minutes. That was enough, right? Wasn’t that enough to justify a break?

It wasn’t, but he went downstairs anyway, and let the gods bite anyone who complained.

Thran was still at the barre. So was Legolas, but Bard had eyes only for his father. The last time he’d seen Thran at the barre, he’d lost all control and plunged them both into a love affair that so far was laughably chaste. Only the presence of four children kept him from changing that. Behind him, Bain and Sigrid still worked at the kitchen table. Tilda sat at the garden table in the ballroom with her drawing supplies arranged, but she was quietly watching the two at the other end. Legolas seemed to concentrate on stretches for his fencing, but Thran was inward, meditating on the small, controlled movements of each muscle from head to toe. Then followed the longer stretches into extensions of arms and legs that seemed as alien as they were graceful. Even more amazing than the extension was the seeming ease, as if there were no bones or joints to impede the movements. Not a muscle trembled, and neither gasp nor ragged breath ruined the illusion of infinite ease. No human could possibly move that way.

Of course no human moved that way. Only an angel did.

“He makes it look like anyone could do it, and yet no one could do it,” Sigrid murmured at his shoulder. “It’s no wonder he’s the best there is.”

“I’ve never seen anything like it, either,” Bard shook his head.

“You are both kind,” Thran said, as his arm swept down to his toes, then up over his head, his fingers gracefully poised. “It is funny, yes? How many years it takes to make so much effort look like no effort?” He looked back at Legolas. “I am ready when you are, synok.”

“Can you still do the Scorpion?” Legolas asked. His tone was so casual that Bard gathered that whatever Legolas had asked had had a history.

Thran laughed. “Why do you like that one?”

“Because it’s hard. Because it’s cool. Please?”

Thran took a deep, marshaling breath, then moved away into the middle of the floor. He leaned over and put both hands on the floor by his feet. He was so flexible that his chest touched his knees, and his elbows were bent. One leg went straight up, then the other, putting Thran in a perfect handstand. When Thran arched his back, his legs curved over his head - of course, that formed the scorpion’s tail. But the pose didn’t stop there; Thran’s feet came to rest on the back of his head.

“Whoa,” Bain whispered, peeking behind Bard. “How does he do that?”

“I have no idea,” Sigrid breathed. “No idea at all.”

Thran held the pose for a full thirty seconds, then gracefully uncurled. When Bard and his children all applauded, he offered them a graceful bow. “My son never fails to ask for that one. It is the hardest one I know. I think he asks me to wear me out and make it easier for him to win at the fencing. Are you ready, Legolas?”

“I’ll get the jackets and masks,” Legolas said, and fetched the bags from the kitchen.

As they put on the white jackets, Bard asked, “Where do you want us to be so that we’re out of the way?”

“The end by Tilda is fine, or if you want a better angle to see the exchanges, then one side or the other, but not both,” Thran directed. Legolas opened the case of blades by Bain, and the younger boy peered in eagerly.

“They’re all different?” Bain asked curiously.

Legolas shook his head. “There are three kinds, for the three fencing events – foil, sabre, and épée. Everyone usually starts with the foil. Sabre’s the fastest. I like épée the best. It’s the most like real fighting used to be a long time ago.”
He explained a little about the different blades and the different target areas allowed for each type of blade. Legolas said that the entire body was a valid target during an épée match.

“The foil is the lightest blade, and you can touch only the upper body to score a point. Father, do you want to start with foil?”

“Your preference, Legolas. If you want to go right to épée, I do not mind.”

“Épée, then.” Legolas took out two of the blades, and handed one to his father.

Both put on their mesh masks. Bard and his children moved out of the way to stand along one of the long sides, Tilda with Bard, and Bain with Sigrid. Thran and Legolas then positioned themselves opposite each other in the middle of the ballroom.

“En guard,” Legolas said. Both he and Thran came to their stances, épées ready, knees bent, opposite arms behind them.

“Prêt?” Legolas asked.

“Prêt.”

“Allez!” Legolas barked, and the two fencers began their dance.

Bard had seen fencing only rarely, mostly every four years when the Olympic Games appeared on mainstream television, so he didn’t know the intricacies of what Thran and Legolas did. But he understood the goal for one fighter to score a touch on the other while preventing the reverse from happening. Those opposing goals made the dance between the two fighters seesaw up and down the ballroom. Each time either scored a touch, they would reposition themselves in the middle of the ballroom to start again. Both were skilled fencers, but where Thran had more experience to anticipate Legolas’s moves and a longer reach, Legolas was more practiced, and a hair faster. Soon, his speed would best his father’s experience and reach. Both scored several touches back and forth, but whether one scored more than the other didn’t seem to be a concern. They merely enjoyed the interplay, the strategy, the expertise. They were not silent, either, both calling out to recognize a good feint or touch, or to comment on a missed opportunity. Even though Bard couldn’t see Thran’s face behind his mask, the alertness of his body, the intense focus on Legolas, and the swiftness of his moves revealed how much he enjoyed himself.

After about five minutes, Legolas called, “Arrêt,” signaling the end of their play. Both he and Thran eased out of their stances, and pulled off their masks to reveal matching grins.

“You are faster than ever,” Thran complimented Legolas easily, bringing an appreciative glow to Legolas’s face. “Soon I will not keep up with you at sabre, I think.”

“Your ankle is fine, Father. I didn’t notice any slowness or imbalance at all.”

“That is good,” Thran said. “I will not audition until after the holidays – now is the time I spend with you. But afterwards, when you are back at school, I have two or three scheduled. I will have to increase my practice to prepare for them. I want to be well healed by then.”

Gods, Bard had forgotten that Thran was on a forced hiatus from his dancing. Wouldn’t living forty-five minutes from the city be a burden on him, compelling him to spend so much time on the road? Did Thran even drive? Have a driver’s license?

_Calm down_, he ordered himself. Trust Thran to raise the issue if it was one. He wouldn’t have put himself to the expense of renovating Bard’s house if he didn’t intend to live here. And he had said on the stairs how excited he was about this being their home.

It was moments such as this one that made Bard wonder again about dreaming, or the wisdom of falling so hard for an angel less than three weeks after meeting him. Talk about the sappy teenager routine...

Thran and Legolas began another bout, this time with the lighter sabres. Here was where Legolas’s speed shone, and Thran’s height didn’t offer as much of an advantage. But his dancer’s reflexes, so exquisitely honed over so many years, still made him a respectable opponent for his son. Legolas might be just fourteen, but the seed of a gifted fencer was already clear, and Bard hoped he’d get his chance at an Olympic berth in a couple of years. Thran had mentioned last night over their pizza that Legolas was already used to competing at a high level for his age group, but was unhappy with the coach at his boarding school, and so he would look into alternatives in the next week or so.

Did Greenwood Dale on the Lake have a fencing club, or was there one nearby?

He gulped. He was getting ahead of himself. Legolas wasn’t his son.

Was it a good sign to think about what it would be like to have another son join his children?

Gods. He hadn’t managed to kiss Thran in days, and here he was noodling about looking out for Legolas. If this wasn’t a ridiculous situation, he didn’t know what was.

Thran and Legolas finished their match, to the applause of their four spectators. Legolas offered them a pleased smile as he saw to the weapons, wiping them from one end to the other before carefully stowing them in the case. Sigrid asked to hold one, and then Bain, so Legolas got out the thinner foils. He directed them in how to take the proper grip, come to the starting stance, and follow some of the rules about carrying the blades safely. Tilda went over to stand beside Legolas, asking questions, though she didn’t ask to hold any of the swords. Bard ventured to Thran’s side to watch them.

“You are both very good. Legolas will be superb before long.”

Thran nodded gravely. “He will be more than superb. That is why I will find him a better alternative to his school coach. The man is an ogre.”

“I was just thinking that we should find out if Greenwood Dale on the Lake has a fencing club.”

Thran’s eyes took him in as he took off his fencing jacket and draped it over the scaffolding. “I am touched, lyubov moya. Thank you.”

“About those auditions...”

Thran shook his head, looking at the children and then looking back. “They will hold until a later moment.”

Bard jammed his hands into his front jeans pockets. “Mab i ast, Thran! There are things we need to talk about, and things we want to talk about, and we can’t figure out how to do either.”

Thran sighed. “I know. I know. Perhaps in a few days? Rest assured that I have no worries about the house. Do as you see fit for both of us, as you have done so well already. Whatever color you want to paint anything is fine.”

“Even bordello red for the bedroom?”
Thran’s eyes slid to his, and he smiled. “You would not do that, as red does not suit either of us. You are an artist. You know what colors would.”

“Peacock blue, with silver and grey,” Bard murmured without thinking.

Those grey eyes slid to his again, and a faint, pleased smile curved Thran’s lips. “I leave it to you. Now. I must stretch, so that the muscles do not tighten.”

“How long do you need? I’ll get lunch ready.”

“What, you will not watch?”

Bard snorted. “That... would not be wise. And since I can’t do anything but watch, better I take a rain check.”

“I would rather you take me.”

“So would I, you bastard. But I can’t, so stop teasing me before I embarrass both of us.”

“Payback for your provocation this morning.”

Bard held up his hands in surrender. “Stretch. I’ll get lunch.”

“Fifteen minutes, then. I will not draw it out.”

Bard headed into the kitchen without a backward look. It didn’t help. His imagination was more than enough to devil him without a single glance back at his angel.
Chapter 15

Chapter Summary

The angel and the cherub have had their fencing match, but the pas de deux between angel and saint continues. Fencing is not the only game of strategy in play - is there a brief respite in sight?

Chapter Notes

I don't hold any copyright to the syndicated comic strip, Blondie. I only enjoy their antics.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Once Thran had properly cooled down from the fencing, he came into the kitchen to find the children unpacking the lunch things they’d bought at the market. To his relief, Legolas was helping – he and Bain passed him carrying the garden bench from the ballroom, then returned to bring in the two chairs, to add seats around the kitchen table. Tilda kneeled on the garden bench to reach the tabletop so she could arrange fruit in a basket. Sigrid retrieved containers of cheeses and meats from the cooler. Bard took a large container of salad from a shopping bag, and got a stack of paper plates, napkins, and plastic utensils from a cabinet to put beside the salad. Everything went down the middle of the table, and Bard began to fill plastic cups with water from the sink, handing them to Sigrid to place around the table. As everyone chose a seat, Tilda sat down on the garden bench, but it was so low that she barely peered over the table.

“I think you need a taller chair, little doll,” Bard grinned, as Tilda leaned her chin on the table, making googly eyes as a joke. “You look like a head and nothing else!”

“Then you’ll have to feed me,” she said, opening her mouth wide. “Grape, please!”

Bard popped a grape into her mouth, then picked her up to drape her over his shoulder. She giggled as he plopped her down in one of the taller chairs so she could sit higher. “Do I need to get you a box, too?”

“No, silly Da, this one is tall enough,” she said, still giggling as she pulled one of the paper plates over. “Pass the bread, please?”

Bard reached for the bread Tilda wanted, then took a large bowl out of a cabinet and passed it to Thran. “Here, Thran. Salad’s easier to eat out of a bowl than on one of those flimsy paper plates. I got some roasted turkey breast so you don’t have to eat plain salad in the midst of all the gluttony. Low salt, low fat.”

He caught Bard’s eyes, touched at his thoughtfulness, but his only outward sign of his appreciation was a nod. “Thank you,” he said casually as he filled his bowl from the container and took Tilda’s vacated garden bench next to Legolas as his perch. As hands reached here and there, nibbling bits of cheese (Tilda), or scarfing down whole slices of meat (Bain), or arranging a tidy sandwich (Sigrid), Thran realized that Legolas had already assembled an impressive sandwich that featured something of everything on the table but the fruit.

“That looks like a Dagwood sandwich,” Tilda decided. “Like the ones that man in the comic with the funny hair eats.”

“Impressive,” Bard allowed, smiling at Legolas, who smiled back.

“How do you manage to eat all of that?” Thran marveled, as Legolas took an unapologetically huge bite.

“Teenaged boys defy physics,” Sigrid declared. “Or maybe their legs are hollow or something. All that stuff can’t possibly fit in their stomachs alone.”

“You’re jealous,” Bain shot back, his mouth full of the enormous sandwich piled on his plate, a respectable match to Legolas’s. “You wish you could eat as much as Legolas and I can.”

“I wouldn’t eat half of the things you eat, Bain,” Sigrid said with a shudder. “That awful chili that you eat cold – cold! – out of the can, or that fake cheese dip out of another can. There’s no end to the things that you eat that I wouldn’t touch.”

“The stuff the school makes is okay. I don’t know if it comes out of a can, but it’s hot. It doesn’t have a lot of beans, but it’s pretty good if you put a lot of cheese and onions on it. I haven’t had the kind you like.”

“That’s because your school doesn’t want to poison you,” Sigrid said with a pointed look at Bain.

“Oh, Sig, it’s not poison! It’s good! Tilda likes it, don’t you Til?”

Tilda looked dubious as she nibbled her plain cheese sandwich. “It was sticky. I’d rather have Da’s soup.”

That sent a laugh around the table as everyone settled to their lunch. Bard hadn’t sat down yet - he seemed to find no end of other things to do, such as pass Tilda a napkin, or refill Legolas’s water glass, or wash the grapes. It dawned on Thran that Bard wasn’t just fussing – he was waiting to make sure the children had enough to eat before he made his lunch.

Gods. When was the last time Bard had eaten something other than whatever the children had left him?

Soon, Thran would take Bard to a very good restaurant, tell him to order whatever he wanted, and see that he ate every bite of it. No matter how much Bard protested. The man needed to eat, especially given the heavy manual labor he did every day. If he didn’t eat more, he’d never regain the strength he needed to work metal again.

“Everyone has enough,” Thran finally said, when he could endure Bard’s forbearance no longer. “Come, Bard. Make something for yourself.”

Ah, an expression of being found out washed over Bard’s face, but only for a split second. By the time Sigrid gave her father a look, Bard revealed only mild amusement. “I was waiting until it was safe to stick my hand in the melee. I didn’t want to lose an arm.”

Sigrid looked no more convinced than Thran did, but between the two of them they stared Bard into the chair between his daughters. Sigrid handed him a plate, then the bread. Bard offered her a smile as he took two slices of the bread.

Conversation lapsed again as everyone eased their hunger. When the pace slowed, Bard got up to bring the boxes of brownies and oatmeal cookies to the table. As eager hands dove for the treats, Bard reached across the melee to hand Thran a smaller box.

“Even ballet dancers need dessert,” he observed, as he snared a brownie for himself.

The box held raspberries, one of Thran’s few indulgences. He gave Bard a half smile – oh, to be able to give him a much more overt sign of his appreciation! – and opened the box eagerly.

“This is one of the best desserts to have,” he observed just as blandly, and sat back to enjoy his treat. “Decadence that does not ruin the body.”

Thinking about all the ways he wanted to ruin Bard’s body made the raspberries taste even better.

* * *

Few leftovers remained from lunch. Tilda and Sigrid were so fond of the seasonal clementines that they each ate two, and Legolas and Bain needed no encouragement to finish off the meat. Thran and Bard sent the children back to play in the ballroom while they cleaned up the few remains.

“Here. I want you to eat this.” Thran handed Bard the container that held the last of the Swiss cheese. “I know it is one of your favorites, and it is not enough to take home. So enjoy it. As I did my raspberries.”

Bard gave him a sheepish smile, but took one of the slices to nibble.

“I see I will have my work cut out for me, getting you to eat enough,” Thran murmured, circling the table to stand beside Bard. His hand strayed around Bard’s hip, stroking lightly.

“Look who’s talking,” Bard murmured back, swallowing his cheese. His hand strayed behind Thran’s back to run up his spine, between his shoulder blades. “The dancer tells the welder to eat more.”

“The dancer knows to a nicety how to care for his body. The welder worries too much about others to do so for himself.”

“That’s the way the world works sometimes,” Bard looked down at the table.

Thran’s fingers traced up Bard’s back, slid into his hair, and tipped Bard’s face up to his. “That is about to change. Now, before we are interrupted...”

Thran pressed a quick kiss on Bard’s lips, or at least he had intended it to be quick, until Bard’s hand went to his nape, stroking his hair and urging him into a deeper kiss. It was impossible not to melt under that beckoning touch, but they didn’t dare let it linger too long. Bard bit at Thran’s lower lip as they eased out of the caress.

“I don’t know which is worse – these little scraps, or nothing at all,” Bard winced.

“I don’t know, either. Both are agony. We have to do something, lyubov moya.”
“I have an idea. I’ll text you tonight. It might get us a couple of hours.”

“Anything. Anything.”

“Later.”

Reluctantly, they eased apart to finish the cleanup. Thran snared the last piece of cheese to feed it to Bard in bites, something they both enjoyed. Thran unbent enough to sample a bite of an oatmeal cookie, even a bite of a brownie, if only to give the rest to Bard. Other than a few cookies and pieces of fruit, everything else had been eaten.

Legolas asked to fence another few rounds, to which Thran gladly agreed once lunch settled. In the meantime, Bard took them out to the barn to show Legolas his sculpture. This time, he pushed the barn door completely open, flooding the interior with light. He’d wiped the dust from the pieces since Thran had seen them, and the metal gleamed in the bright afternoon sun.

“Are you going to put these in the house, too?” Legolas asked. “Like the antelope?”

“I’ll put this one outside the solarium,” Bard replied, touching one of the branches of the pine tree. “You’ll be able to see it from the inside, right in the middle of the center window. It’ll really stand out when it snows.”

“It would look especially striking if you put it in the middle of a pond,” Thran said. “Like some of the formal Japanese gardens I have seen. Natural, but very stylized. Very modern, yet very old at the same time.”

“I like that,” Bard nodded. “I’ll give that serious thought.”

“What about the rest of them?” Thran asked.

“They’re all outdoor pieces, so they could go anywhere,” Bard shrugged. “I’m focusing on the house right now, but once it’s done, I’ll see where they fit. I may have to do a bit of landscaping to make the right place for them.”

He led the way further into the barn, back to where his workshop was. Had Bard had to sell any of his equipment? Perhaps not - an anvil and locked cupboards of tools and supplies were still in place.

“Is this where you made the balustrade for the front stairway?” Thran asked, pointing to the anvil.

Bard nodded, leaning over to pick up a stray piece of iron. He hefted it, a piece about four feet long with a twist in the middle. “This was one of the experiments I made to decide which pattern I wanted to use. This one was too thick and too elaborate. I ended up using thinner, plainer ones that looked better with the glass globes. Sigrid thought the globes looked like little pumpkins, so she wanted to paint faces on them. It took a long time to talk her out of it.”

Bard had smiled as he related his tale, an expression that Thran was happy to see. He suspected that for many years Bard had recalled such things only as bleak reminders of how much he’d lost.

“I think we ought to put Santa faces on them at Christmas,” Tilda decided.

“Do them as eggs for Easter,” Sigrid added, smirking at her father.

“Turkeys for Thanksgiving!” Bain suggested.

“How about we just admire them the way they are?” Bard shrugged. “Save the decorations for “Where’s the fun in that?” Bain snorted. “Hey, Legolas, did you know there’s a bird’s nest in the gazebo? I can show you if you want.”

The boys ran off as Bard shut the door to the barn.

“Will you show me where you want to put your pine tree?” Thran asked.

“Sure. It’s around the back of the house.”

Sigrid and Tilda came with them as they paced over the grass until they faced the wide expanse of glass that fronted the solarium.

“Did you ever see one of those wild Welsh cottage gardens with everything growing over the edges of the gravel paths?” Bard asked. “I wanted to put one outside the solarium because when you came into the room with all the glass, you wouldn’t know at first what was inside and what was outside. But there isn’t enough light here to do it – it’s too northerly an exposure. It’s better suited to mosses and evergreens, which would also suit the pine tree better. Your idea about the Japanese garden is something I hadn’t thought of, but it’d look great. I’ll save the Welsh wilderness for the end of the house around the ballroom. Better light there, and it’d still look great outside those windows opposite the fireplace.”

He walked to a spot some twenty feet from the solarium windows and held his arms out. “Do I look like a tree, little doll?”

“You need more branches,” was Tilda’s verdict.

“I need help for that,” Bard said, abandoning his pose to sweep Tilda into his arms, He lifted her up to sit astride his shoulders. “There, you’re the top of the tree, Til! Stick your arms out!”

Laughing, Tilda did, and Bard held out one of his, keeping a tight grasp on Tilda’s legs with the other.

“What do you think?” He asked Sigrid and Thran. “More treelike now?”

Thran laughed, but it was Sigrid who spoke through her amusement. “You two make your tree sculpture look even better, Da. Even with Tilda, you make a spindly tree.”

“No respect,” Bard grinned, tumbling Tilda head over heels and into his arms. “Your sister thinks we make a poor tree, little doll. I guess we’ll have to go back to being people.”

“Or we could practice being a tree more,” Tilda smiled up at him. “That was fun.”

Bard ruffled her hair, sending a flutter in Thran’s stomach as he wished for Bard to ruffle his hair like that. As good a time as he was having now, he couldn’t wait until tonight to find out what Bard’s plan was to give them a few minutes together, without children.

“I’ve still got some more woodwork to put up, if you and Legolas want to get back to your fencing,” Bard said. “I’ve done one room’s worth, but I’ve got another one I want to finish today if I can. The painters can’t start for another week or so, but I’ve got a lot of things to do before they get here.”

“Is it hard, this woodwork?” Thran asked curiously. He’d never thought about how houses went together before.
“Not with the right tools. The boys are still looking at the gazebo, so you can come take a look while you’re waiting for Legolas. Come on, girls.”

They went back inside, shed their coats, and trooped upstairs to the third floor, where Bard had been working earlier. As he showed how he cut and set the pieces of trim, Thran savored the assured way Bard handled the wood and his tools. His saint might not be a dancer, but he had his own beautiful way of moving. His fingers caressed the wood, holding it firmly in place as he nailed it in place.

“No hammer and nails, then?” Thran marveled. “This is a wonderful invention, this nail gun.”

“My best friend,” Bard grinned. “No pounded thumbs, no dents in the trim; one little press of the button, and the nail’s in. The best invention in a hundred years.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. “Only a guy would say that.”

Bard turned that mild look on his oldest daughter that Thran recognized as Bard’s unique brand of quiet humor. “And what would a woman say? The hair dryer?”

Sigrid stuck her tongue out at her father. “That’s old fashioned, Da. Everyone knows it’s the ceramic plate hair iron.”

“A power tool, nevertheless,” Bard said, winking at Sigrid. “So let me get on with this before it gets too late and we have to head home.”

“That is what we call on the stage a cue to exit,” Thran said to the girls. “Let us leave the artist to his labors.”

“I want to look at the mural in my room again. I might want to change it. Maybe add a meadow around the trees. What do you think, Da?”

“That’s fine with me, but it’ll be a while before I get someone in to do that,” Bard shrugged. “I can paint a wall, but not a meadow.”

The two girls headed downstairs, but not before Sigrid gave her father a wink. He slowly reddened.

“She’s going to give someone hell one day,” he murmured, looking askance at Thran.

“She is a most able accomplice,” Thran replied, already reaching for Bard. He filled his hands with Bard’s buttocks to coax him close. “Let us make the most of her efforts. Give me the kiss I have craved all day.”

Fingers slipped into his hair to trace over his scalp. Thumbs stroked his earlobes. Lips nipped and nibbled before they enveloped his in a kiss. If Thran thought such a moment would ease the ache in his chest, though, it only made it grow even more unbearable – there was so much more he wanted. But he savored all that this moment had to give, and tried to contain his anticipation of all that would come later.

“You are going to kill me, if the lack of you doesn’t first,” Bard whispered in Thran’s ear, his breath warm against Thran’s skin, giving him gooseflesh. “I can’t stand this much longer.”

“Nor I.” Thran drew Bard’s hips against his and rubbed against him until the urge for more made him stop. “When our time comes, it must be a very long time. Perhaps an eon. I will need that long to have enough of you.”

“You have no idea.”

“Let this be encouragement for you to eat more. I would not want to wear you out too early because you are malnourished.”

Bard chuckled and mirrored Thran’s position, taking Thran’s buttocks in his hands to keep them close. He kissed the hollow of Thran’s throat. “I’ll finish the kitchen before New Year’s, all but the floor. We’ll be here when the next year begins, with our children, in our house, even if we can’t live here yet. Then I’ll finish our bedroom, where I want to commit every sin I can think of with an angel.”

“It will be no sin, lyubov moya. Only sacrament.”

“It won’t get here soon enough.”

“If it were today, it would not be soon enough. But we will survive, if not easily.”

“Father? Are you ready to fence?” Legolas’s voice echoed up the staircase.

Thran eased away from Bard, his fingers stroking Bard’s lips before he leaned over the landing rail. “I am. I will be right down.”

He turned back to Bard, who faced away from him, leaning on the saw table, his head hanging down. He stroked Bard’s back.

“Finish soon, then come down. If I cannot kiss you, at least I can look at you.”

Bard looked up at him, straightened, then put a strong hand behind Thran’s head at his nape. He pulled Thran close for a fast, hard kiss.

“This’ll give you something to think about while you fence,” he whispered, then bit at Thran’s lips again before letting him go. “It’ll certainly give me something to think about while I do molding.”

“Please, lyubov moya, if you are as bedazzled as I am, then you must take care not to nail your fingers to the wall instead of the trim.”

Bard smile was crooked. “Good luck scoring against your son, too.”

He turned back to the saw and the pile of molding, then looked back over his shoulder to watch Thran turn and go downstairs.

Thran got six steps down the staircase before he realized that he had to rearrange the contents of his jeans. Part of him was far more interested in something other than fencing.

***

When Bard crawled into bed that night, he sighed. The day had gone well; his children had enjoyed themselves, though he wasn’t sure what Legolas thought about things. Thran had not been able to say much about what he thought about the work on the house, but the glow in his eyes had shown his pleasure. It was humbling that Thran had such trust and faith in him to make his house a retreat for both of them. As fast as Bard could make that happen without compromising the quality of the work, he intended to do so. Tomorrow, he would call the kitchen appliance house he’d been working with to finalize the order for stove, fridge, microwave, and Thran’s small wine cabinet. The cost was a bit higher that he might get at some of the big box stores, but this place had guaranteed everything to be in stock and ready for installation before the end of the year. Having the kitchen ready would make it much easier for him and the children to stay there on weekends while he worked on things.

As for Thran... Bard closed his eyes and swallowed a moan. That ethereal ballet dancer had become his worst addiction, even though they’d had almost no chance to act on it. This was more than sexual appetite, though the gods knew that burned in both of them at a fever pitch. They fit together so well, complementing and balancing each other. Where Bard was practical and grounded, Thran conjured a glamour that turned their time together into a refuge and haven. Bard knew the value of a home and gave Thran the solid base he’d never had before; Thran understood the sacrifices to his muse, and encouraged Bard to follow his. Bard was well organized in running a household; Thran had the business savvy to protect them both.

He wished he knew what Legolas thought of this, if anything. Sigrid was firmly approving. He expected Tilda to take it all stride. Bain... he liked Thran, and had been so impressed with the fencing that he didn’t see any problems there. But Legolas, Legolas... He was a quiet boy, reserved if friendly enough, and more than willing to help with lunch chores. Bain’s interest in his fencing seemed to touch him. Maybe the strangeness of living in a boarding school had taught him to withhold immediate judgment. Bard couldn’t imagine a boarding school being so comforting a place, with so many people around but no family. He’d heard tales of the elitist attitudes of some, and the cruelty of hazing at others. Add the rarefied air that a rising athlete breathed, and the isolated existence with his father when he wasn’t at school, and who knew what Legolas’s reaction to Bard and his children really was?

He put all that aside as he settled into his pillow with mobile in hand.

In bed, angel? he typed.

A few seconds went by.

Almost. In 10.

Bard swallowed his impatience, shutting his eyes in the darkness. He willed himself to patience by going through the list of things he wanted to see to next on the house. First, order the kitchen appliances. Fill the holes in the walls where the insulation had been inserted. Prime the walls and trim. Decide on the paint and order it. Retile the downstairs half bath. Get estimates for a big tub in the master bath; an achy ballet dancer would need a place to soak in the warmth. Retile the bathroom. That white marble was expensive, but Thran would love it, so he’d spring for it. Bard was saving money by doing the tile work himself, so the budget could bear it. Figure out when to call in the floor refinishers –

Now in bed. How are you, lyubov moya?

Missing an angel. Good day, though

Any day we kiss, even in so quick a fashion, is a good day

A better day would be doing more than snatching one kiss

There was more than one, lol
Several small ones. Hardly enough

So what is your plan to let us savor more?

Bard felt his anticipation rise, as well as something else. Legolas sleeps every morning to 10 or 11?

Now he sleeps to 11 or later. Why?

I order our kitchen apps tmw

Yes?

So I don’t have to go to the house Monday unless I want to

And?

Sig leaves at 6:50. Bain at 7:40. Tilda’s bus comes 8:45. That leaves 2 hours before Legolas gets up

As soon the bus leaves, text me, and I will be down!!!

Bard typed with a grin, Or I down on you, lol

Don’t tease. I already find it hard to sleep

You do that to me several times a day, not just at night

Stop!

Then tell me about L. Any indications? Did fencing help?

I think yes. He asked pointed questions at breakfast, but didn’t pursue

Boys are slower than girls. About 2 yrs. So if Sig’s got it at 16, L’s at about 12

Good to know. He seems to like you all

I wish they’d all instantly divine it. No fun being noble

None at all

Don’t want to push L, but if you want to come down tomorrow, that’d be great. If it’s better for L to let it ride, do so. We’ll survive

I’ll see. You’re wiser about such things than I

Just more children, that’s all. Better go. I’ll text you tmw if I don’t see you. Love you

Love you. And miss you

It’s coming

Soon you will be, too, lol

Thought you said no teasing?

I am not a good angel when I have the chance to devil a saint
I bet you're damned good. Prove me right Monday, you bastard

You are one, too. So sleep well tonight and tmw, then. You will need it

So will you

I hope so. Love you

Love you. Night

Night

Bard set aside his mobile, swallowing hard. Gods, how was he going to get to sleep, thinking about Monday morning?

It took a long time.

Chapter End Notes

To all of you who asked for pictures of Bard's house, I tried to put them in a separate chapter, but it doesn't want to cooperate. So I put them on my Tumblr page:

www.eldritchmage.tumblr.com

Hope they help you visualize a bit more!
Chapter 16

Chapter Summary

It's Monday morning. That Monday morning, when an angel and a saint will have two precious hours alone together. After so many sighs and longing looks, don't you bet they'll make the most of it?

Chapter Notes

Yes, this is a chapter that earns the Explicit rating. Enjoy.

Thran lay cradled in silk and cashmere, but his thoughts were so charged that he struggled not to toss and turn in his elegant nest. It wasn't the faint murmurs of Legolas's computer game that needled him; rather, a few silent letters conjured on the tiny screen of his mobile had wound him more tightly than anything could, short of an appearance by the man who'd typed those letters.

In thirty-six hours, he would have two hours alone with lyubov yego.

Could any prisoner drool about release with any more intensity?

Before those two hours would arrive, though, Thran had to get through tonight, all of tomorrow, and tomorrow night, likely without sight or sound of Bard. Thran couldn't recall feeling so keyed up over a dance performance. The fire that was his anticipation of dancing before an audience was something he could manage with barre work, or yoga, or walkthroughs with his dance partner when there was one. But this... there was nothing to practice, nothing to do... nothing but wait.

He refused to think about what those two hours would bring. This was one dance he did not want to choreograph or direct. He wanted it to be spontaneous, without expectation, to unfold as it would. Anything less would do no justice to the moment.

So he tossed, turned, tried to calm his eagerness... and failed.

Eventually, he fell asleep.

Morning arrived.

He woke groggily. It was late, nearly eight. He usually rose an hour before that. He didn’t like to disrupt his usual routine, but he consoled himself with the knowledge that one more hour had passed between now and Monday morning. He rose, took care of necessities, rinsed his face, braided his hair, put on his practice attire. He put on Bard’s worn Henley as a comfort, but feeling it against his skin roused him so much that he had to take it off. The ragged shirt he wore the day he’d teased Bard at the barre was no more settling. So he put on the rattiest top he had, one that was not a Henley, because the raveled and faded fabric reflected the disorder of his mind.

There was no sound from Legolas’s room, not that he had expected there to be. His son had stayed up well into the morning, for Thran had seen faint light glowing from under Legolas’s door when he’d gotten up in the night for water. He went to the barre, then, hoping for the familiar routines of yoga and ballet to settle him. Perhaps they did, but only as long as he was in the middle of them; once he stopped, his anticipation rose again.

He didn’t know whether to be annoyed or amused. Or to just declare the whole scenario too sad or ridiculous for words.

He showered, dressed, and ate his breakfast in distraction.

At eleven, when Legolas still showed no signs of rousing, Thran left him a note about going to the market, got his coat and market bags, and went downstairs. He looked at the door to Apartment 2A, but didn’t slow. He jounced down the front stairs and headed for the market, thrusting his hand deep in the pockets of his pea coat to draw it closer to his body. His brisk pace helped to warm him, and to burn off some of his agitation.

Once at the market, he perused the stalls slowly. He found some cooking tools. He bought some ground beef for Legolas to make the ubiquitous hamburger sandwiches, as well as cheese, ketchup, and buns. He bought a piece of salmon; Bard had told him how to cook it in the oven. More spinach, peppers, and leaf lettuce for salads. More eggs. Legolas went through more eggs than a fox. Butter and olive oil. Bread – wheat with oatmeal. A jar of peanut butter – natural, chunky – and saltines, things that Bard told him Bain ate a lot of. Two kinds of ice cream, another thing boys ate a lot of. More tea for himself. And raspberries.

His bag was getting heavy, so he carried the perishables to the stall register, paid his bill, and hefted the load over his shoulder for the trip home.

He look at the door to Apartment 2A on the way up, but didn’t slow.

After twelve. Noon. Legolas still hadn’t roused. Thran put his groceries away, washed his cooking tools, and found an empty drawer near the stove to hold them.

Legolas finally shambled out of bed while Thran was making his lunchtime salad, close to one o’clock. Despite his preoccupation, Thran grinned at the rumpled hair, the bleary eyes, the cartoon character boxers – someone with a bow and arrow. Yesterday, Cupid; today; superhero archer. Was Legolas’s choice of underclothing his doing, or one of his schoolmates’ ideas? It must not be an unpleasant one, or Legolas would have shed such outrageous things as soon as he’d gotten home.

“Who is that on your trusy?” Thran could not help but ask, as his son came in to give him a good morning hug.

Legolas yawned and tried to run fingers through his tangled hair. “Hawkeye.”

“And yesterday was Cupid. Do you invoke the mojo of the mythical to help your archery?”

Legolas snickered. “You said mojo.”

“Do you prefer magiya?” Thran deadpanned, arching one eyebrow. “Or perhaps I should just call them vashi volshebnyye trusy.”

“My magical underpants?” Legolas translated with a wince, drawing Thran’s smile. “Father, you get stranger every day.”

“Then I do my job well.” Thran heaped the spinach and lettuce in a bowl, added shreds of chicken, a few walnuts, then a handful of chopped carrots and peppers. “So what would you like to do today?
Or are you too sore from yesterday’s fencing for anything other than a film or a gentle walk to the park?”

“Yesterday was fun,” Legolas admitted, smiling, reaching over to filch a piece of chicken from Thran’s salad. “It’s always fun to fence with you, Father. But it’s also a relief to fence with someone who doesn’t think yelling makes the lesson sink in better.”

Thran hummed, poking Legolas’s fingers with his fork when his son tried to filch another piece of chicken. “There is plenty of chicken in the refrigerator, Legolas. As well as peanut butter and ice cream, even ground beef if you want to make yourself a sandwich. Leave my poor salad in peace.”

“Ice cream? Were you out to the market already today?”

“After my morning rituals.” He opened the drawer by the stove and brandished one of his new spatulas with a flourish. “We now have cooking tools.”

“You bought ground beef?”

“As well as cheese, buns, and ketchup. You will forgive me if I did not buy that strange plastic yellow cheese. I bought a good cheddar instead.”

“Any lettuce?”

“In the crisper.”

“Crisper?” Legolas gave his father an incredulous look. “Now you know what a crisper is?”

Thran opened the refrigerator door and pointed to the label printed on the front of the bin. “It says crisper. Right there. You do recall that I read English as well as Cyrillic, yes?”

“Yes, but you never said crisper before.”

“I never had a need to.” Thran gave his son an amused look. “You are in a mood this morning. Perhaps you need to eat something. Or perhaps vashi volshebnyye trusy are in a twist.”

Legolas gave his father a look reminiscent of the ones that Bain gave Bard at frequent intervals. His son was almost completely an American now, as Thran never would be, but the thought was more of a comfort than not. “I’ll get dressed, then I’ll make a hamburger.”

He disappeared into the bathroom, reappearing a few minutes later with his hair combed, jeans over his boxers, and a long sleeved tee shirt. Mismatched socks, but Thran made no comment. While Thran sat at the kitchen table, Legolas patted two lumps of the ground beef into patties, then assembled the makings of his sandwiches while the meat cooked. He sat down with Thran and set to with gusto.

“This is good cheese,” Legolas commented.

“I thought so, too. Nicely sharp. Yesterday’s fencing did you good, then.”

Legolas nodded. “A good piste, and a good opponent. You haven’t lost your edge, Father.”

“You have honed yours well. I am very proud of you. It is a joy to fence with you, and to have you here. I miss you when you are in school.”

“We Skyped a few times.”
“True. But to see you twitch and jerk on a little computer screen is not the same as when I sit across the table from you.”

Legolas finished his sandwich and started on the second.

“I hope you enjoyed our time with Bard and his children. I have become quite fond of them.”

Legolas gave his father a look. “The little girl, Tilda, was very nice to make me a picture. And Bain likes so many sports. He’s a good soccer player. I can’t say about Sigrid. She is very smart, I think. She works very hard.”

“Bard says she is very smart. Tilda will likely become a good artist, like her father.”

“So... you’ve spent a lot of time with them,” Legolas ventured.

“Not a lot. Only since I was injured. They have been very kind to me, and I like them.”

“I’m glad you have friends outside the company. I know it’s a good one, Father, but some of them are...”

“They are. I have looked at other companies already. I have no worry about any of the auditions. The more important factor will be to find a company where I feel comfortable. I will not dance for an overseer again if I can help it.”

“Will we have to move?”

Thran shrugged. “I will not worry about that until after the auditions. It is not a change to consider until then. But I do consider a different change.”

Legolas paused in his chewing. “What?”

The effort to remain calm and casual and assured was tougher than preparing for many of the ballets Thran had danced. “I like Bard very much. I will ask him out before long.”

Legolas blinked, and his hamburger was cradled in his hands, forgotten. “You mean... ask him out... on a date?”

Thran nodded.

“So he’s...”

Thran nodded again.

“How does he have three kids if he’s gay?”

“How did I have you?” Thran took a bite of salad. “I would likely have had more, if your mother had lived.”

“Is he divorced?”

“His wife was killed by a drunken driver when Tilda was a baby. He has been alone for many years.”

Legolas considered that as he ate his sandwich, but Thran resisted the urge to ask what Legolas thought. He would not give the impression that he looked for permission or approval; he loved Legolas very much, but his son would not have veto power over such an important part of Thran’s personal life. So he attended to his salad, chewing each bite carefully, and waited to see what fruit his revelations would bear.

Legolas looked thoughtful. To be honest, he looked so neutral that Thran couldn’t tell if regret, jealousy, resentment, or acceptance prevailed. As Legolas finished his sandwich, and Thran had the last bit of chicken from his salad, he decided to move on.

“So what would you like to do this afternoon? Museum? Film? Walk? The shops? You likely need new clothes for next term, yes?”

“I do need new jeans. I’ve outgrown two pairs since September.” Legolas stuck out his leg, where an incongruously long shin, ankle, and foot protruded from a short pant leg.

“Then we will shop. Perhaps you also need new trusy without so much mojo.”

Legolas grinned self-consciously. “I think I’m good there.”

They finished their meal and cleaned the kitchen together. Then they went out to the nearest mall where they got two new pairs of jeans for Legolas, and one pair for him. Despite his wealth, Thran was not one to indulge in designer clothes for either of them, though he had a few things for them both that were de rigueur when they attended certain of Thran’s ballet premieres. Legolas’s new pants were perfectly serviceable if unremarkable, but given that he’d outgrown them before his next school term was over, nothing else made sense. His own jeans were more expensive, given their better quality and the unusual size to fit his tall slender build, but they were still plain, black, velvet cut corduroy.

Shoes, however, were another story. Like his father’s, Legolas’s long, slender feet required shoes that were not run of the mill. They were fortunate to find a new pair of athletic trainers in his size at one of the specialty running stores. It was important to Thran that Legolas have the best equipment to safeguard his training, and good shoes would let the miles of conditioning runs pass by as comfortably as possible. He let Legolas talk him into trying on a pair for himself, though his were not the flamboyant green things that his son’s were. He kept to his usual palette, choosing comfortable ones in plain black.

“Boring, Father,” Legolas sighed, but Thran contented himself with a smile. His son had yet to learn that it was better to have people look at him, rather than his clothes.

He looked forward to the day when he could take Bard shopping. Clothing that muscular body properly would be a pleasure. So would unclothing it afterwards...

He would NOT think about tomorrow morning. Not yet.

By the time Thran and Legolas finished their shopping, it was time for an early supper, so they decided to make a pilgrimage to their favorite Russian restaurant. It was a small, unpretentious place, with a large, devoted clientele of expatriate Russians. They served a well-spiced Georgian lamb stew that Thran particularly loved, and Legolas was happy with a huge plate of lamb pelmeni doused with lots of butter and sour cream. He also enjoyed the chance to listen to the tongue he’d spoken for so long, and to speak it with his son.

They came home tired and well fed, happy to spend the evening talking about Legolas’s schooling, what sort of fencing coach to consider, and the subjects that Legolas would study next term.

Thran had lived all of his life in the isolated, rarefied world of dance – many years at the Vaganova Academy of Ballet in St. Petersburg for his training, and the following years dancing in the Mariinsky Ballet associated with the academy. There had been little time for outside interests, and friends outside of that rarefied world had been almost nonexistent for all of the dancers. It did not escape Thran that his son was just as isolated, if for different reasons. Yes, he was a gifted athlete, and yes, he was quiet, but he was not in a state-run institution that restricted time and contact outside of studies. Even so, Legolas had few friends.

Why else would a teen-aged boy be content to spend so much time with his father?

Thran sighed. He’d have to be very careful that his relationship with Bard did not cause Legolas to worry that his father was abandoning him.

At length, Legolas retreated to his room to play his computer games – he seemed quite enamored with a role-playing one full of Elves, Orcs, Dwarves, and other fantastical creatures. Left to his own devices at last, Thran showered, taking particular pains with his hair. Three stories below, did Bard wash his tousled locks with as much care? Gods, he wanted his hands full of Bard’s hair – so much more than that. He forced himself to wash slowly, to oil his hair and body carefully. What would it be like to run his fingers through the hair on Bard’s chest – to actually see that chest for the first time? To see more than that? Thran couldn’t think of it for long; he didn’t want to drive himself to such a fever pitch that he came alone in the shower. When he released, he wanted it to be under Bard’s hands.

He dried his hair to its usual pale silkiness. He put on his Mandarin silk robe to retreat to his room, shut the door, and disrobed to settle into bed. His mobile showed a text message waiting. From Bard, just five minutes ago.

In bed yet?

I am now. Just out of the shower

Me too

Please tell me that we are on for tomorrow a.m.

Gods, yes! Can’t wait!

I do not expect to sleep well. Impatient!

Me, too. Missed you all day

L and I shopped. I bought kitchen tools and jeans. Had Russian lamb stew.

Sounds delicious

Was. Still missed you. I told L that I would soon ask you out on a date

You did???? What did he say? Was he okay?

He asked if you were gay, and how you had 3 children if you were

And you said...?

That I was, and had him, had I not? Told him of Daphne. He mulls

So S for us, L on the fence, and B & T no idea. Why did you decide to tell him?

It was time. When will you tell T & B?
This week. After tmw
Thran snickered. Ah, you wait to see if I am worth more than a test drive
You never know about those foreign imports. Some are high maintenance
Some are exquisite high performance delights
Modest, aren’t you?
What is the adage? I do not brag if it is true?
LOL, bastard!
I hear Welsh imports are well known for their stamina
They take careful handling. The first ride is liable to be fast, but they get better with repeated efforts
Now you are the bastard
So go to bed. Make the morning come faster
I am in bed, and I can’t wait to make you come faster
All you’ll have to do is look at me, and it’ll happen all by itself
I would enjoy that. Then I will enjoy the rest of you
I don’t want to say goodnight, but if I don’t, it’ll happen without you even looking at me
My poor saint. Please save it all for me
Then go. I’ll text you as soon as the bus leaves. 8:45!
I will be ready
Fy nghariad
Lyubov moya
Than put his mobile aside.
The night wouldn’t pass quickly enough. When it did, may the gods preserve the health of children about to go to school, the reliability of busses that carried children to school, and the habit of teenaged boys to sleep until noon.
He and Bard would see to the rest themselves.

* * *

The alarm on Bard’s mobile chimed, jerking him awake.
6:00 a.m.
His eyes flew open. He’d sat up before he’d registered the motion. Gods, gods, it was Monday morning! He flitted into the bathroom quickly before Sigrid decamped from her room, then pulled off his tee shirt and replaced it with the long-sleeved shirt he usually wore to make the children’s breakfasts and lunches. On went the tea water, the porridge. Sigrid’s wheat bagel went in the toaster and the peanut butter went on the table with a knife. Green tea in the pot. He started the usual assembly line for sandwiches – one plain cheddar cheese on wheat for Tilda, two ham and cheese with lettuce for Bain, one ham and lettuce with no cheese for Sigrid. Fruit – clementines for Til and Sig, pear for Bain. Fig bars all around. Napkins. Water bottles. Where was Bain’s lunch bag?

As he looked around for it, Bard noticed his hands were trembling.

6:20 a.m.

Sigrid padded into the kitchen. She gave Bard a sleepy kiss.

“Morning, Sig.”

“Morning, Da.”

“Usual bagel?”

Sig pushed the toaster lever down. “Uh-huh. Green tea left?”

“In the pot. I’ll get the water.”

“I’ve got it.”

“Thanks.” Bard got two mugs from the cupboard. “Have you seen Bain’s lunch bag?”

“Uh-uh. Probably left it in his book bag again. Hope there’s nothing ripe still in it.”

The toaster popped, Sigrid put the hot bagel on the plate Bard had set out beside the toaster, and carried it to the table. Bard brought her tea and set it beside the bagel.

“Thanks, Da.”

“Welcome.” Bard poured tea for himself and sipped gingerly. He was too charged to eat, but he had to eat something, so he dished up a bowl of porridge and carried it to the table. Raisins, cinnamon, milk. Mix, mix, stir, stir. Shovel it down.

6:40 a.m.

Sigrid finished her bagel, her tea, carried the dishes to the sink, and washed them. Left them in the drainer to dry.

Why was every sound so clear and precise?

Sigrid vanished for her second foray into the bathroom, soon emerging with makeup in place – not too much, thank the gods, because Bard didn’t have the capacity to argue about it this morning – and backpack in hand. Bain shuffled in, yawning, waving mutely as he ladled out porridge. Bard went with Sigrid to the door.

“I’m off,” Sigrid smiled.

“And you’re leaving, too,” Bard smiled back. He gave her a hug. “Do your best, just like always.”
“I will. See you this afternoon. I’m tutoring today, so won’t be home until five.”

“Okay. Love you.”

“Love you, too. Bye, Da.”

“Bye.”

One down. Two to go.

6:50 a.m.

Bain was eating his porridge. “Where’s your lunch bag?”

“Dunno,” Bain said sleepily. “It’s not on the counter?”

“Would I ask if it were? Go check your book bag, please.”

Bain got up from the table as if he were sleepwalking, shuffling back to his room.

“Found it,” he mumbled, handing it to Bard as he resat himself in front of his porridge bowl.

Fortunately, the bag was empty. Bain didn’t have the capacity to argue about smelly lunch bags this morning, either. He packed Bain’s sandwiches, fruit, and cookies in the bag and set it on the counter. Bain finished his porridge, went back for more, ate that, got up to wash his bowl, and shuffled off for his second foray into the bathroom.

Ten minutes went by. 7:10 a.m.

“Getting late, Bain. Time to go.”

“Coming, Da.”

Bain reappeared in his school clothes with book bag in hand. A handful of papers stuck out of the top.

“Put those where they belong before they blow down the street,” Bard asked, pointing to the papers.

Bain was too sleepy to argue. He settled his papers, took the lunch bag Bard held out to him, and packed it with his books.

7:25 a.m.

“I’m off,” Bain murmured, finally looking awake enough to smile at their old gag. Bard ruffled his hair, handed him his coat, and walked him to the door.

“And you’re leaving, too. Do your best, just like always.”

“I will. Soccer today. Tomorrow, too, but not Wednesday.”

“No more until after the holidays. So get your kicks in today and tomorrow.”

“Ha, ha, Da,” Bain groaned, arming his way into his coat. He hefted his backpack. “Love you.”

“Bye.”
Two down.

7:30 a.m.

It’d be half an hour before Tilda got up. Bard was too keyed up to surf the TV channels, so he went into the bathroom to shave. His hands were still a little shaky, but he managed to get through without cutting himself. He trimmed his mustache, his sideburns, combed his hair, not that that would help. His long hair would be in his eyes within five minutes. He hated to pay someone to cut it when the children needed more important things. He’d just keep pulling it back into its tail. Besides, Thran seemed to like it long –

Gods, that long white hair. That long, silky white hair...

Bard swallowed. Rinsed his face. Washed out the sink.

His hands were shaking again.

He went back to the kitchen, cleaning up the spilled tea, the crumbs on the table.

7:55 a.m.

Tilda’s alarm chimed. After not hearing anything for a few minutes, Bard headed back to Tilda’s room. Oh, gods, don’t let her be sick, today of all days...

The light was on, and Tilda was pulling the sheet and quilt up on her bed. She placed Mr. Bun in the middle of the pillow. When she heard his step, she looked around with a smile.

“Morning, Da.”

“Morning, little doll. What would you like for breakfast this morning?”

She considered. “Apple and peanut butter?”

“Coming right up. Tea?”

“Yes, please.”

“You get dressed and I’ll cut up the apple.”

“Okay.”

Bard returned to the kitchen, got the apple – two left, enough to last before the holiday break, which meant he wouldn’t have to go to the market for more – and cut it up on a plate for his daughter. Peanut butter was already out; so was the knife. He needed a teacup and another napkin. Tilda came out of the bathroom, already dressed. When she sat to eat her apple and peanut butter, Bard kept her company with a second cup of tea. It gave his hands something to do.

“Just two days after this, then a holiday,” he said.

“Are we going to see the big Christmas tree near the ice rink this year?”

“We do every year, don’t we? I wonder how tall it’ll be this year?”

“Maybe bigger than last year,” Tilda allowed, painting another apple slice with peanut butter. “I like to watch the skaters.”
“Remember that boy last year who did all the fancy jumps?”

Tilda nodded. “He was good. Maybe we’ll see him again.”

“Or someone else just as good.”

“I finished my apple, Da.”

“Go brush your teeth, then. I’ll wash up.”

Tilda made her final foray into the bathroom. Bard washed her plate, the knife, the teacup. Put away the peanut butter. Rewrapped the bread. Dumped the tea leaves. Wiped up the crumbs.

8:20 a.m.

There were butterflies in Bard’s stomach.

Tilda came out of the bathroom, so Bard grabbed his jeans and shirt, and ducked into the bathroom to brush his teeth, and exchange his ratty sleep pants and tee for jeans and Henley. Damn, he’d forgotten his boxers – no time to grab them. He grinned; would going commando imply he was eager?

He was, but Thran would be just as eager. It’d be funny if he showed up just as unencumbered.

He found his socks and boots and sat on the sofa to pull them on while Tilda got her backpack. He handed her her lunch, got her coat and his, and made sure to stuff his mobile in his jeans pocket.

8:35 a.m.

“Ready to go?”

Tilda nodded. “All ready.”

“Let’s go wait for the bus, then. We’re off…”

“And we’re leaving, too,” Tilda grinned gleefully. “I’ll do my best today, just like always. So you do, too.”

He hoped he would. “I’ll give it my best shot, little doll. Okay. Got my key. Let’s go.”

They went down the stairs, out the door, and onto the sidewalk. Bard resisted the urge to look up, to see if Thran’s tall figure stood at his window to watch for him. He and Tilda went the half block down the street where a group of parents and children already stood waiting.

The bus arrived only five minutes after they reached the bus stop, but it was the longest five minutes of Bard’s life. As the children lined up, Bard gave Tilda a hug.

“Love you, little doll.”

“Love you, too, Da. Bye!”

“Bye!”

He saw Tilda safely onto the bus, and the bus well away. He turned back to the apartment building, his mobile already in his hand, ready to text. But he didn’t have to.
I come!

Bard jammed the mobile back in his pocket and ran up the street. He took the steps two at a time, shoved through the door, ran up the stairs, groping for his key –

Someone was pelting down the stairs. Thran, winging around the last landing, white hair flying around him in a cloud, grey eyes wide as he leaped down the last flight of stairs –

Oh, gods, oh, gods, oh, gods –

Somehow Bard got the key in the lock, the door open, and both of them inside. As the door slammed shut, arms went around him, pulling his coat off his shoulders and down his arms to drop to the floor, then hands wound in his hair, and lips swallowed his in a desperate kiss. White hair fell over his face, down his back, over his arms, hair that curved him like an angel’s wings. He wound arms around that angel, no longer elusive and ethereal, but real and trembling under his hands. He picked the angel up off his feet, carried him to the sofa, and threw them both down on it, scrabbling on top into a tangle of arms and legs.

“Oh, gods, oh, gods, oh, gods, I am going to die if I have to wait one more bloody second!” he snarled, knees burying between Thran’s, one hand going behind Thran’s head to grab a handful of hair, and the other pulling Thran’s leg over his back. He dove in for another kiss, fell into it, and reveled in the soft caress of hands over his back and down his ribs to massage his buttocks. As Thran kissed him back thoroughly, it sank in what he finally, finally held in his arms. He drew a stuttering breath.

“I’m sorry. I’m sorry. I didn’t hurt you, did I?”

“You did not hurt me. I am here. I am yours. Just...”

“I did hurt you, didn’t I? Oh, gods, Thran, I’m sorry!”

“I am fine, Bard. I am fine. All I ask is that you leave no marks on my skin. Bruises take a long time to heal for me, and I will audition soon –”

“I won’t. I won’t. I don’t want to hurt you. I never want to hurt you.”

“Nor I you, lyubov moya. Nor I you.” Hands stroked down his back, slowly insinuating themselves under his shirt. When long, warm fingers traced over his skin, he shivered. To look down at the pale angel lying so willingly beneath him, white hair flung in all directions, made him gulp. Thran looked up at him through his lashes, his lips curving into a half smile.

“Kiss me again,” Thran whispered. “Please, kiss me again.”

How could Bard do anything else? He fell into that invitation without resistance, but his kiss was softer, gentler this time, a caress rather than urgency. Long fingers kept working the tail of his shirt out from his jeans until it was free, then inched it up over his ribs.

“Let me see you,” Thran invited, thumbs stroking Bard’s ribs. “Let me see you.”

As Thran eased Bard’s shirt higher, Bard shrugged out of it without embarrassment, pleased when Thran’s breath caught. A long slender hand stroked up his belly and over his sternum, playing with the dark hair that covered his chest.

“You are so beautiful.” Thran traced a finger under first one pectoral, then the other, before laying a hand over one. He rubbed softly, his palm dragging against Bard’s nipple. Soft lips went to the other nipple, nuzzling and suckling gently. The sensation was so intense that Bard gasped and had to ease away.

“D-don’t. I won’t last a second if you do that. In fact, if you do anything, I won’t last a second. Don’t take me so fast.”

“I promise to take you a second time, lyubov moya. You will enjoy that one even more than the first,” Thran purred, still stroking Bard’s chest. “But first we must enjoy the first one.”

Bard hummed as Thran’s touches warmed his body. “How would that look? I’m on the top, but not the one in control.”

“I think it will look delicious. Shall I go on?”

Bard had to shut his eyes – looking at Thran, curtained in his disheveled white hair, teasing him with soft eyes and slow, enticing touches, was too erotic to bear. “Gods, you are such a bastard.”

“I take that as a yes.” Thran untied the ends of his knitted top, slipping them to the side, baring his chest to Bard’s eyes. Such exquisitely defined musculature under alabaster skin, veiled only with the palest fuzz of absolutely white hair, was so compelling a sight that Bard only belatedly registered the fingers slipping down to his belt buckle, his zipper, easing his jeans down over his hips.

“Thran, wait –”

“Shh, my eager saint,” Thran purred again. He combed fingers through the dark hair that curled within Bard’s jeans, then drew Bard’s cock, already erect, out to rest on his abdomen. His touch felt like warm velvet against Bard’s skin. “Savor.”

Thran cradled Bard between his legs, stroking his buttock with one long, flexible foot, twining a hand into his hair to hold him close. He suckled Bard again, stroking the other nipple at the same time, and pressed their bodies together with his foot. Those chiseled abs rubbed against him slowly, slowly...

Against such an overwhelming assault, Bard had no defense. The urgency that so far had only teased him rose unbearably to consume him. He convulsed helplessly, falling into Thran’s arms without thought of anything but ecstasy, gasping as breath failed him.

Arms enfolded him, cradling him as he calmed. He lay against Thran’s chest, listening to the combined beating of their hearts as Thran stroked his bare back slowly. As his release faded, leaving calm behind, Bard remembered to breathe again.

“You really are a bastard,” Bard rasped, smiling. “And I love you for it.”

A low chuckle rumbled deep in Thran’s chest. “Show me,” he whispered, as he stroked Bard’s back, then spread an elegant hand over Bard’s buttock to squeeze gently. “I am yours, so take me, as I did you.”

Bard lay still only for a moment, savoring all the ways there were to repay an angel for his teasing. The toughest part was to decide where to start.
Chapter 17

Chapter Summary

Just how do you think a saint repays an angel for pillaging him so fast? Not so fast, and twice as thoroughly. Which one will be the last one standing?

Chapter Notes

Yes, this is another Explicit Chapter. But you expected that, right?

Thran lay under Bard as his love lost control, finally – finally! – surrendering to the compulsion that Thran had stoked in him. It was only the opening act of the morning’s ballet, only the first delirious confection, but Thran was well satisfied with it. He had not had to work very hard to bring it about.

Not fifteen minutes ago, he’d stood at his window, watching for the first sign of a yellow school bus. He was dressed in old jeans, his new supple black trainers, and a thin, soft, wrapped practice top, easy to shed when the moment was right. His hair was sleek, soft, and loose around his shoulders. A thicker shirt, his cashmere scarf, and his coat lay on the chair by the door, ready for him to grab. His mobile was in his hand, waiting for his cue that the dance was about to begin.

As soon as Tilda’s bus appeared down the street, Thran had typed I come! into his mobile, but hadn’t press Send. He’d watched as the bus had stopped, Tilda had gotten on, and Bard had waved a farewell as the bus had trundled away.

Only when Bard had turned back to the apartment building had Thran pressed Send. He’d grabbed his shirt, scarf, and coat, slipped through the door, and locked the door behind him. He’d thrown himself down the stairs as recklessly as a boy, without thought for a body that had taken years to train, that had been cosseted and protected as a national treasure for almost as long. He’d given no thought to spraining an ankle as he took the steps three at a time until the last landing, where he’d flown down the last flight without touching any of them.

The front door of the apartment building had banged open. Bard had crashed through it and bounded up the stairs like a stag, his coat flying wide, his hair in glorious disarray, so intensely alive. He’d unlocked his apartment door by divination, his eyes only on Thran as he’d flown down beside him, throwing himself into Thran’s wide-stretched arms. They’d dragged each other into Bard’s apartment, Bard kicking the door shut and groping to throw the lock as Thran had dropped his shirt, scarf, and coat, kicked off his shoes, and pulled off Bard’s coat. Then he’d enveloped Bard in the kiss he’d ached to give him, one as long and deep and thorough as his saint deserved.

This much, Thran had choreographed. What was to come, he had not. To Thran’s delight, the improvisation that followed was his abduction. Bard tore him off the earth, threw him onto his back, and descended upon him like a beast. This was even better than Thran had hoped for. He gave himself up willingly to grooping hands, frantic lips, lunging body. Hands wound themselves in his hair, pillaging it thoroughly as lips had bitten and gnawed his. Thran wrapped himself around his possessor, reveling in the play of the muscles under his hands, those hard clenches of shoulders and arms and buttocks that were so irresistible.

And then his saint recalled his humanity, worrying about the angel beneath him that he was about to despoil. The first despoiling would have to be Thran’s doing, then. He’d anticipated as much, but as despoiling was just as delightful as being despoiled, he never cared which happened first.

He teased both of them when he coaxed Bard out of his shirt, revealing the powerful muscles he’d known would be there – tight pectorals, taut rectus abdominals, and his favorite, the delicate external intercostals along the ribs. It was unusual for someone who was not a trained athlete to have so much muscle delineation; it was because Bard had shorted his rations in favor of his children for so long. While Thran abhorred those circumstances, he couldn’t deny that the muscles flexing under his hands made his mouth water. Even better, Bard’s chest was beautifully velveted in dark hair. Thran’s body was not hairless, but his hair was all as pale as what was on his head, and fine, with just faint fuzz over his chest that was more suggestion than reality. If Thran were the smooth, refined, elegant dancer, Bard was the rugged film idol. It was no conscious act to lay a hand on that chest, to trace the lines of muscle, to revel as the muscles tensed and jumped under his hand. And those nipples, those small, hard, brown pearls beckoning within dark hair... they begged to be caressed and kissed. They were infinitely responsive, too – jewels, indeed. Not all men had such gifts, so Thran treated them as they deserved, kissing and suckling and rubbing, until Bard was frantic. He didn’t feel Thran breach his belt buckle, his zipper – ah, nothing underneath! Was that Bard’s normal habit, invitation, or mere oversight? It made no difference. Thran caressed the lavish hair underneath, found Bard’s cock, and teased it out. It was as muscular as the rest of his lover, setting Thran’s loins to aching in response.

But it wasn’t yet time for that ultimate joining. First he had to ease the blinding urgency that had driven Bard into oblivion.

Thran trapped Bard’s cock between their abdomens, clamping their bodies close with a foot pressed hard against the middle of Bard’s lower back. He tangled a hand in Bard’s hair too deeply for him to pull away. Then he abandoned himself to the brown pearls that beckoned to him so compellingly, teasing himself with the sound of Bard’s soft moans and the skittering twitch of muscles under his hands as he drove Bard’s body past control.

It had taken only seconds, but Thran had reveled in them all. He closed his eyes when warm liquid spread over his abdomen, and smiled. His saint was delivered, then.

He couldn’t wait to see what reward his teasing gained him.

The first things it earned him were kisses. The strong body atop him held him close as Bard pressed kisses on the top of his head, his forehead, his nose, his ears, his cheeks, and finally his lips. A tongue pressed against his teeth, and he welcomed it eagerly, his abdomen tightening in anticipation. His fingers clenched against Bard’s back, hard enough that he had to force himself to relax them before he left marks. Even in the depths of his arousal, Bard had respected Thran’s pale skin, so easily marred. It was hard to maintain his reputation as the Prince of Ice with a lover’s marks scraped across his ribs, though on Bard, such marks would be more erotic than anything else. Until Thran learned whether such things concerned Bard or not, he would refrain from marking his pelt.

He forgot that resolution when Bard bit his lips and slid down to kiss his throat, the hollow at the base of his neck, the line between his pectorals. Perhaps his fingers dug in too hard, for hands found his, drawing them above his head. When one hand pinned them there, Thran barely suppressed a gasp. Bard gave him a look, understanding enough to smile in anticipation.

“Gently,” he whispered, kissing Thran. “Gently.”

Thran forced himself to relax, swallowed hard, and nodded, but the hand holding his squeezed once, ruining his efforts. Bard’s sly smile ruined any hope Thran had of relaxing, no matter how hard he tried. Thank the gods he had Bard’s body above his to keep him on his back. Bard resumed his kissing, teasingly avoiding Thran’s pale nipples until Thran wanted to beg him to kiss them. As if he heard that plea, Bard finally nuzzled his left nipple, but only lightly, drawing Thran to groan in frustration. That only encouraged Bard to take his nipple in his teeth, tightening oh, so lightly, not to the point of pain, but twitching was out of the question. When a thumb and forefinger trapped his right nipple, rolling it roughly between them, Thran arched up in a gasp.

“You are not a saint,” he growled, because there was no movement allowed him.

Bard drew in his nipple to suckle, pressed it between teeth and tongue, then let it slide out before favoring him with a perverse smile.

“Saints take no pleasure when they deliver a payback. I do.”

He raised himself to his knees, one hand still holding Thran’s above his head. He had a good look at Thran lying beneath him, humming in appreciation. Thran quite enjoyed the view of Bard’s bare chest, his jeans breached, his cock already twitching for a rematch.

“What turns you on more? Me telling you to strip, or me doing it myself?”

“I like both. But since you’ve pinned me so nicely, I will enjoy it when you do it yourself today.”

“Good. I’ve always wanted to strip an angel bare...”

Bard unbuttoned his jeans, unzipped them, and dragged them down off his hips, all while still holding his wrists. Each touch drew Thran taut, his skin in gooseflesh, a smothered whimper on his lips. Fingers stroked down his abdomen, down each side of his cock without touching it. Bard drank in each every reaction and altered his teasing accordingly, which spiked Thran’s arousal still higher. Gods, those teasing fingers that refused to touch... the very thought of them tightening about his cock had him half erect already. But the touches didn’t come until Bard leaned over to swallow his lips in a hard kiss. Only then did a hand envelope his cock, and if it didn’t manhandle him, it stroked him none too gently. Thran’s back arched, and the moan on his lips turned into a gasp under such a concentrated attack.

“Should I take pity on you? Ease your suffering?”

Thran grinned. “If this is what it is like to suffer, then I suffer quite deliciously. I am in your hands willingly, to do with as you see fit.”

“Then I’ll indulge both of us.”

Bard released Thran’s hands, but it was no reprieve; he wound both arms around Thran’s hips, settled between his legs, and bent over Thran’s cock with a sigh. Lips descended, first licking and nipping, then sucking his cock into a warm mouth. A tongue caressed him; teeth nipped delicately in the most divine places; everything narrowed down to the talented mouth engulfing him in that most intimate way. The pleasure after so many years of abstinence was nearly unbearable. His cock rose hard under such temptation, and the rest of his body curled in on itself, but that only thrust him deeper into Bard’s mouth. Bard wound his arms around Thran’s hips too strongly for him to get away, as if he were such a fool as to want that. He found himself on his elbows, to savor the sight of Bard’s dark, tangled hair falling over his abdomen. Bard pushed Thran’s legs wide, the better to feed on him. And feed on him Bard did – such a skilled mouth with a tongue that rubbed against the underside of his cock, then licked at the tiny opening in the head so insistently; and teeth that found the exact spot just above his balls that was the most vulnerable, the most sensitive; and lips that sucked him in, then out, then in, then out... When he tried to pump his hips in rhythm, Bard’s grip on his thighs tightened, holding him still. It was Bard who fed, who consumed, and Thran who was the sacrifice, not the other way around. What could be better?

Bard loosed one arm from its insistent grip on Thran’s hips. A second later, he closed his hand around Thran’s balls, massaging and rolling and teasing in tempo with the assault on his cock. To be so open, so taken, so desired, was too much to resist, and Thran thrust up, driving his cock deeply into Bard’s mouth, and let everything go. Strong hands kept him pinned throughout, and that talented mouth took every drop of him until he was drained. As his pleasure waned, lips nibbled at him until he fell back on the sofa, eyes closed.

The grip on his hips eased away. A hand rubbed his abdomen slowly, mixing a few drops of his issue with all of Bard’s to anoint him. Thran kept his eyes shut, but grinned as he stretched, enjoying Bard’s caress and the aftermath of a release so long denied.

Thran smiled in contentment. “Willingly so. How soon before you do it again?”

Soft laughter. “Greedy bastard.”

“I have done without for eight years. You, likely more than ten. Tell me you are not just as greedy.”

Bard ducked under Thran’s leg, went to his knees on the floor, and leaned over to brush a kiss on Thran’s lips. “I can’t. Even if I hadn’t gone so long, I would have been just as eager. You’re beautiful, and completely evil. I could drown in you.”

Opening his eyes, Thran stroked Bard’s unruly hair out of his eyes. It was such a pleasure to have that hair in his hands that he didn’t stop, gratified when Bard closed his eyes and leaned into his caress with a hum.

“I intend to make you drown as often as I can get my hands on you. But I warn you. I will not always be the one who begs.”

“No, you won’t,” Bard admitted. His gaze strayed down Thran’s chest, then to his own. “We’re both pillaged.”

“We will wash soon, but not yet. Unless it is too late.”

Bard dug into his jeans pocket, pulled out his mobile, and looked at it. He grinned. “Only 9:45. We’ve still got time.”

“Good. Just to look at you without having to veil my glance is such pleasure. To see you in such disarray is more so, especially when I am the one who made you that way.”

“That’s what I mean about you being completely evil. You like to pillage.”

Thran sat up to lean against the back of the sofa. His hair looked like he’d been doing exactly what he had been doing, which he savORED. There were few better sensations than those after loving, even in the dance. “I like to pillage. I like to be pillaged. I like many things that are love between two. I do not like to hurt, or to humiliate, or violence. I hope you feel the same.”

Bard clambered to his feet, hitched up his jeans to hang on the point of his hips, and sat next to Thran. “So... tackling you and tossing you on a sofa isn’t violence, then.”

Thran stretched a long hand across Bard’s thigh and rubbed up and down, drawing Bard’s sigh.

“Good. I don’t ever want to hurt you or humiliate you. You’re my pale angel. I want you to be so for a long time.”

“We will be many things to each other. But all will mean beloved.”

Bard leaned close to nuzzle a kiss behind Thran’s ear, a very sensuous place to kiss. “I’ll take that as a promise.”

“I will take more than that, because it is still early. Feel free to stop me if you prefer.”

Thran slipped onto his knees between Bard’s, leaned in, and bit at the dark hair still visible above Bard’s jeans. Bard jumped at the unexpected touch. Good. How much could he make of that? He looked up into Bard’s eyes, narrowing his gaze as he tugged at the back of Bard’s jeans.

“Take them off. Now.”

“I can’t. Boots,” Bard said weakly.

Instantly, Thran was yanking laces free, boots off. “Now. Take them off.”

“You are one greedy –”

“Now. Or I will. I will likely leave marks.”

Bard hastily shifted his hips up to slide his jeans down, which gave Thran the perfect opportunity to dive into Bard’s crotch. The cock within so much dark hair was still soft, so Thran got it all in his mouth before Bard could flinch. He tightened his teeth on it, holding Bard immobile while he yanked Bard’s jeans down his legs, then off, and then pushed his knees wide. He kept his hands on Bard’s thighs while he teased, not going for finesse this time, but intensity. When Bard’s cock swelled too hard for Thran to hold it all, he kept its head in his mouth, put one hand around the shaft, and the other as a cage around Bard’s balls. Bard’s hands wound in his hair, keeping the white strands out of the way so that he could watch Thran take him. At the last second, when Bard bucked hard underneath him, Thran looked up to revel in how Bard’s orgasm consumed him. His head went back in rapture, or perhaps agony, his eyes fluttered closed, and his hands clutched against the sofa cushion. When Thran’s name stuttered out of Bard’s mouth like a confession, Thran laughed softly, well pleased. He bent low again, licking and kissing and stroking, until all of Bard was limp under him.

“Consider yourself mine. From this day forward.”

“Gods.” Bard’s chest heaved as he remembered to breathe again. He managed to look up. “You’re the palest angel I’ve ever seen, but your heart is darker than Satan’s.”

“Only for you, my love. Only for you.”

An exhausted smile twitched at Bard’s lips. “I’m doubly blessed. And pillaged. Now I do need a wash.”

Thran shifted aside, letting Bard up to resume his jeans, rising after him to pad to the bathroom. Bard ducked into the shower for a washcloth, and found a clean one for Thran.

“Do you want to shower?”
Thran shook his head. “We do not have time to do that justice. And since this is our first time, I want to keep your scent on me.”

“I feel the same way. So a quick wash’ll do.”

Thran leaned on the doorjamb while Bard cleaned the worst signs of their indulgence off his torso. It was entirely too enticing to watch him disarrange the dark hair that so fascinated Thran, to lean over the sink to rinse the soapy water off, then to towel dry – too enticing by halves. Even to watch Bard shimmy his jeans up over the points of his hips and fasten them was erotic. When Thran had his turn at the sink, his hands were not matter-of-fact as he eased his jeans off his hips and stroked the washcloth over his skin.

Hips pressed against Thran's buttocks. Warm, brown eyes savored the reflection of his pale body.
Arms slipped under his and around his ribs. Hands cupped over his pectorals to drag over his nipples. Fingers took his nipples to gently squeeze. Those hands stroked lower, circled his hips, and took the washcloth out of his hands to rub his abdomen gently.

“If you’re going to enjoy a little warm water and soap so much, let me make it worth the effort. I want to watch you come.”

“You will be the death of me,” Thran breathed, as the washcloth ended up in the sink and slick, soapy hands explored him. A breathy kiss pressed against his neck, and the rough cloth of Bard’s jeans rubbed against his buttocks. Gods, his skin clenched and a chill ran up his spine.

“What, you don’t want me to do this? You want me to stop?”

“Does it look like I do?” Thran hissed. His cock was already alert.

“It looks like you want me to do exactly what I’m doing.”

“My body is a discerning connoisseur.”

“Then watch me tease you, and watch me watch you enjoy it.”

The mirror doubled the pleasure of Bard’s hands roving over him, slippery and insistent, because it revealed every nuance of each caress. It revealed Bard kissing his shoulders, his back, his neck. It revealed how his body twitched and arched and yearned under those touches. To watch another possess his cock, stroking it gently at first, then, when he was hard and aching, jerk him off without mercy, was not a pleasure he’d had before. His saint, it seemed, had just as dark a heart as he did.
Oh, how much they would make of that, now and forever!

When he released, Bard’s arms held him up, compelling him to watch every last spasm, hear every cry, feel every muscle strain up to that sweet height of ecstasy. And when he came down from that height, Bard washed him gently clean, dried him tenderly, and eased his jeans over his hips. He carefully tucked the curls of damp hair and exhausted cock inside, eased up the zipper, and buttoned the top button. Then he turned Thran around to take him in his arms. Thran wound arms around his lover, and they stood there in the bathroom together, savoring satiety.

“I do not want to, but I should check the time,” Thran winced at last.

Bard sighed. “I know. I don’t want to, either, but we should. I hope we won’t have to for much longer.”

“Nor I.”
They returned to the living room. Bard cleaned up the traces of their indulgences while Thran checked his mobile.

“Ten-thirty,” he sighed.

Bard sighed, too, as he stooped to retrieve Thran’s extra shirt from the floor. “Change of wardrobe?”

Thran smiled as he took his shirt. “I am a devious parent. I thought I would change my shirt and take a walk around the block before I went back upstairs.”

Bard’s laugh was chagrined as he shook his head. “I had the same thought. We could walk to the market if you need anything.”

“Do you?”

Bard held up his hands. “I always need something. Come on. Let’s go. It’ll be our first shared domestic chore.”

A wide smile crossed Thran’s face. “I would like that. You can show me some new food to try. But first, to change my shirt – shall I go into the bathroom so that I do not inflame you again, or can I do it here?”

“Would you do it here, so I can enjoy it?”

Thran had endured too many frantic costume changes that had left him stripped to dancer’s belt and nothing more, with hands tugging and pulling at him to get him into another costume, to suffer from modesty. But those times had never been erotic the way peeling off his thin practice shirt was today, in front of his lover. Bard hummed in appreciation, even leaned close to kiss him, but he didn’t venture more. As Thran pulled his heavier Henley over his head, Bard trotted to the bathroom, returning with a comb.

“I don’t use this much, if you can’t tell, so it’s more or less clean. But the Prince of Ice will ruin his reputation if he goes out looking like you do right now.”

“As you say.” Thran took the comb, returned to the bathroom to smooth his hair – he couldn’t remember the last time it had looked so disarrayed – and returned with a satisfied smile. “I cleaned the comb so as not to leave incriminating evidence of my part in your ruination.”

“Maybe watching those crime lab shows has a practical benefit,” Bard allowed. He had his boots and coat on, and handed Thran’s coat and scarf to him. “Off to market, then.”

“Not yet.” Thran used his cashmere scarf to lasso Bard, easing him close. “A kiss, first. The first of many.”

“Mmm. You’re delicious as well as evil. The perfect combination.” Bard flipped the scarf over Thran’s head, and tucked it around his neck. “Now. Bundle up so you stay warm. Can’t let you risk a chill.”

“You look after me well, lyubov moya.”

“It’s my pleasure.” Bard snuck a hand under Thran’s coat to squeeze his buttock. “It’s really my pleasure, fy nghariad.”

Snickering, Thran pulled Bard towards the door. “Market!”
They forged out of the apartment and down the sidewalk, side by side.

Thran’s balls ached, but his heart didn’t.
After a sublime morning, an angel and a saint turn domestic - shopping and tending to the young. An important milestone is set, then carefully scrutinized by the choir. When two voices are not so sure of the tune, two disparate discussions ensue. Both prove that parenting can be awkward.

Cold, damp air rushed into Bard’s face as he and Thran forged out of their apartment building. The sky overhead was grim, full of lowering clouds that threatened imminent rain, and the breeze was fitful and sharp. None of it dimmed the warmth glowing inside him, a warmth that sparked anew each time he looked at the tall, elegant angel beside him. How had such a talented man, so exotic and beautiful, come to walk beside him? He waited until they turned the corner, away from their apartment building, before he lengthened his stride, fell into step with Thran, and put an arm around his hips. As Thran’s arm went around his shoulders, Bard felt lighter than he had for longer than he remembered.

They just beat the rain, dashing into the pavilion before the drizzle grew stronger. Inside, they walked up and down the aisles of shops, stopping here and there, but the scenery was mere backdrop to their conversation. They talked about everything – what they saw, where they’d been, what they’d known and liked, and their plans for the house. Once it was ready for them to move in, what little furniture they had between the two of them would not be enough to equip it. Bard suggested that second hand flea markets that would be fun to peruse, and he was gratified when Thran agreed.

“Of course it would be fun. It is the thrill of the chase,” Thran observed, picking up a strange vegetable. “Things with a patina appeal more, and would fit the house better. What is this, lyubov moya?”

“I like flea market finds more than new, too, and not just because they’re cheaper. That patina you mentioned... that’s exactly the right word. It’s a story waiting to be told. I spend a lot of time on the patina of the metals I use. That? Oh, that’s a gourd. Decorative. You can’t eat it.”

“That is a relief,” Thran put the gourd down gingerly. “So many points and bumps... it looks like it would cause a stomach ache.”

Bard laughed.

“So perhaps we can visit these flea markets,” Thran continued.

“The children love to go. Bain looks for sports cards, and Sigrid likes old jewelry, and Tilda is happy with books. Maybe Legolas would like them, too.”

“Perhaps. I think he has been too studious, and at the same time too devoted to his sports. He does not have many other activities, and few friends.”

Bard hummed. “Me and mine are likely overwhelming him. How can we make it easier for him?”

“I begin already. I told him I wanted to ask you out, so he knows I am interested in you as more than a platonic friend. The next thing is to ask you out. So, Bard, will you go out with me? I would like to take you out for a nice dinner, where you do not have to worry about your children eating enough before you eat.”

Bard tensed. He’d done just as Thran had observed for so long that he no longer thought about it, but having it pointed out to him embarrassed him. He concentrated on the bin of onions, putting a couple into the shop basket he carried. “You don’t eat for your dancing. I don’t eat for my children.”

“Both are true. I mean no criticism, Bard. I merely worry for you.”

Bard added sweet potatoes to his basket, and one apple. Thran’s voice was soft, and his expression was concerned, so Bard sighed. “I’d hoped that this would be the last hard year. Once I got us through the summer, Til would be in middle school, which would mean I could get on site earlier to weld. The middle school is closer to the apartment, and the afterschool program is open later, so I could pick up more jobs. Maybe be full time somewhere long enough to get health insurance for the children. So things would look up soon.” He glanced at Thran, but found only understanding, not censure. “You’ve had to sacrifice for Legolas, too. It goes with being a father.”

Thran nodded, picking up a red pepper. “Can I cook this?”

“Red pepper. It’s good cut up raw in your salads, or even just to eat. Raw is better than cooked, to my lights, unless you’re doing spicy sausage with onions and peppers. But sausage is something I bet has never passed your lips.”

Thran snickered ruefully. “Not for a long time, no. But yes, I have done things for Legolas. Dance when not quite well, or slightly injured, both manageable if done carefully. The biggest sacrifice is to send him to boarding school. I miss him.”

“How many years has he been in boarding school?”

“Four years. Every time, it is the worst feeling of my life to put him on that train and watch it pull away from the platform. I hate it.”

Thran’s face spasmed with regret, drawing Bard to put a commiserating hand on Thran’s shoulder.
“So now neither of us will have to do a few of the things we hate. You won’t have to put Legolas on a train, or miss him, or dance when you’re sick for him. And once I go back to the metal, I’ll be able to pay for Bain’s soccer, and Tilda’s art lessons, and Sigrid’s college. So not only do we have each other, we’ll keep our children well, too.”

“And you will eat more. Though not too much, because your body is beautiful, and it would not do to spoil such perfection.”

Bard laughed. “High compliment, coming from the most ethereal ballet dancer in the world.”

With a wave of his hand, Thran dismissed Bard’s demurral. “I know what I look like. I know what you look like, too, and I find it divine. So, please come to dinner with me.”

“It can’t be anyplace fancy, Thran. You’ve seen me in my best clothes. This is it – work jeans and steel-toes. I’m not fit to go in most places in the city.”

“You don’t know the best places to go in the city, lyubov moya. Places where your jeans and mine are more than fine, where the emphasis is on delicious food and good company, not uncomfortable chairs and small plates and haughty waiters who look down their noses. There are cuisines from all over the world, and welcoming smiles from waiters who are glad to see us, and delicious things to eat. Tell me what food you would like to try, and we will go out tomorrow night. Please?”
Bard didn’t have to think about answering for himself, but his prevailing thought was about his children. They wouldn’t have activities after school tomorrow, not this close to the holiday. If he made a good pot roast for them, he could see them well fed before he went out with Thran.

It would also start the conversation about their Da dating, and everything that came after that...

Better to start that than not. Sigrid was already on board, and Bain liked Thran, and might be a good friend to the lonely Legolas. That just left Tilda, and the whole conversation about sexual orientation...

Eh... he’d need to have that conversation with her sooner or later. She’d handled the whole female puberty thing at school with her usual aplomb, especially with Sigrid’s help from the female perspective. She’d heard the basics of sexual education along with that, so the conversation about his nature was coming soon, whether he went to dinner with Thran or not. After that conversation, he wouldn’t have to hide so many things, and the house would be waiting, and...

He’d return to his art again.

Gods, could he stand to risk breaking his heart again over so much scrap metal and the images he saw in his thoughts that turned the metal into visions?

He’d given Hope the Lope her name for a reason.

So he’d go to dinner, and that would be the start of much more.

“Okay,” Bard agreed. “I want to make sure the children get their supper and start on their homework, but okay after that.”

“Good. Thank you, lyubov moy. That makes me very happy. Now tell me what kind of food we should try.”

Spreading his hands, Bard chuckled. “As long as it’s not ramen, I can find something pretty much anywhere.”

“Ramen? Do you mean those small packets of dried noodles and their enclosed smaller packets of supposed seasonings? Gods, Bard! Those are not food! Nasty, soggy cardboard, at best!”

“They’re cheap, Thran. Ten for a dollar. The staple of college students and starving artists everywhere.”

“No ramen! If that is the best you can offer, then I will choose something. Do you like steak? Asian food? Sushi? Afghani? Lamb or pork? Spicy or mild? Tell me.”

Bard laughed to see Thran so animated. “You’re funny when you’re excited, and you’re very excited for a man who doesn’t eat much. I like beef, pork, lamb, seafood – speaking of that, let’s get you a nice piece of salmon. You need the Omega-3s and such to stay healthy. Cold water fish, that’s the thing.”

“Salmon, then. Lead on to the fishmonger. But first, we pay for the vegetables.”

They did so, and found the fish counter for Thran’s salmon. Their last stop was the grocery to get Thran a few herbs for his fish.

“There’s all kinds without salt in them, or sugar, or oil, already mixed for you. You can put them on your salads, too. Maybe you have to stay away from simple carbs and such, but there’s no reason why your food can’t taste better than bland.”

“I will try this one, then,” Thran said, picking up a blend of green seasonings. I have eaten a lot of French influenced foods, and I like the seasonings. And this spicy one. You say this one is good on the salmon?”

“I like it,” Bard nodded. He didn’t say that it had been years since he’d bought salmon. It was one more thing his scanty budget didn’t often accommodate. He thought about how good it was poached with that seasoning coating it, and perhaps the slightest drizzle of orange sauce...

Thran paid for his spices, and they took a look outside to see how the rain had progressed. The drizzle had paused for the moment, so they decided to head home.

“So, the dinner,” Thran continued. “What is something you like, but have not had in a long time?”

“That would be not ramen, and not chicken. I like the chicken, but I eat a lot of it.”

“So, that leaves beef, pork, lamb, seafood...”

“What do you like?”

“Everything except ramen and eggplant. And haggis.” Thran cast him a look. “I hope the haggis does not offend you.”

“It’s Scotland, not Wales, that eats haggis.”

“Ah. Good. No haggis or chicken or ramen, then. Greek lamb kabobs are very good. Or grilled redfish.”

“I haven’t had seafood in a long time. That’d be good.”

“So it is decided. We shall eat seafood. I am especially fond of calamari. And oysters.”

There was a bit of a leer in Thran’s smile as he said the last part. Bard gave him a mild look. “This morning wasn’t enough for you, then? Or was it too much, and you need to recharge?”

Laughing, Thran linked arms with Bard to pull him up the street. “It was what that small girl said in the tale – just right. But I admit I look forward to more very soon. What do your children do tomorrow morning?”

Bard felt a jolt in his loins, hard and insistent, something the tough fabric of his jeans rewarded with an uncomfortable scrape against tender skin. “Goldilocks. You mean Goldilocks and the three bears. You’ll have to be her because you’ve got the hair. I’ll have to be the bears because I’ve got the pelt.”

“A pelt I find very erotic, one I cannot wait to pillage again. So, tomorrow morning?”

“Tomorrow morning.” Bard winced, drawing Thran’s worried expression.

“You are all right?”

“A little too all right, fy nghariad. I forgot underwear this morning because I was distracted, for some unknown reason, and jeans are not the most comfortable way to go commando, especially when an angel plots to pillage me again. So what’s your excuse? I didn’t see any of that black silk you teased me about.”

Another lecherous laugh. “I saw no reason to impede whatever happened once I flew down the stairs. As I have never found underpinnings to be erotic, no matter what they are made of, I dispensed with them.” He gave Bard a sideway glance, his lips curving up. “It was a good gambit.”

“I’ll say. Although I expect the black silk looks stunning with all that white hair.”

“If you say so,” Thran said shrugged, but the arch of his neck as he looked at Bard through lowered lashes was just so, and laughter lurked behind his smile.

“They call that eye fucking, you know,” Bard breathed. “You know you’re doing it, too. You do it so well that I’m surprised some photographer hasn’t begged you to pose for him – or her. It’d be hard core porn without you ever showing an inch of skin.”

“I shall keep it in mind when I no longer dance,” Thran grinned wickedly. “Perhaps this photographer will see me making such eyes at you and ask to photograph us both. We would make your hard core porn even harder, without either of us showing an inch of skin.”

“Hard core porn with you, yes. Photographer, no. I’m camera shy.”

“You will have to get used to a little of it, I fear. It will be my fault. Cameras like me, though I do not like them, and it happens.”

“I’ll stay in the background. If anyone asks, I’ll tell them I’m your... driver.”

Thran’s eyes widened, and he laughed. “We will make that truth soon enough. And I yours. Both are delicious to consider. But not quite yet for either, do you think? They are the ultimate moments, and I want them to be perfect for both of us. Not rushed, not catch as catch can. In the right place.”

“So... does that mean you want us to get married? Or be in the house, or...?”

“That, we should both decide. There are things to recommend several situations. Being lovers, but not spouses, is forbidden and dangerous and flaunts authority. I like those things. Being spouses as well as lovers is proud and unashamed and committed, and is kind for the children. I like those things, too. Being in our house... yes, that would be very nice, rather than in my sterile apartment or your children’s haven or an anonymous hotel room. What do you think?”

Bard considered. “I want those moments to be special, too, so what you says makes sense all around. The house would be nice – it would be ours, not mine or yours, but something we made together. So why not make love for the first time in the place we’re making with love? Gods, that sounds sappy.”

Bard glanced at Thran, wincing, but his lover looked back without derision. “I do not think it sounds sappy.”

“Okay,” Bard nodded with a sheepish smile. “So which one of us will get down on bended knee to offer marriage to the other? Though the renegade lovers sounds sexy. I’ll need a biker’s jacket and some tats for that.”

“No tats, please, Bard? I love your skin the way it is. Ink would ruin it.”

“Yours, too. No tats, either of us. But you’d look good in a biker’s jacket, too. Gods, maybe we should find that photographer. You’d be stunning.” Bard winced again, but waved off Thran’s concern. “Jeans again.”

“What’s in them, you mean. And I will pose only if you pose with me. I would find it quite erotic.”

“Hmm. Don’t think I’m ready for that yet. I think I’ll stick to worrying about getting our kitchen in by New Year’s Eve. I want us to be there then, to start next year where we belong.”

“How much is left to do? Just the appliances, you said?”

“The floor, but that’ll come later. I want to be able to cook. We’ll make a good supper, and have treats at midnight. You can put a bottle of your fancy champagne in your new wine fridge.”

“Along with milk for the children.”

Bard snickered. “And milk for the children.”

The apartment building was before them, so they went up the stairs and inside. Outside Bard’s apartment door, they lingered.

“So... do you need me to write down how to do the salmon for you?” Bard asked, not willing to let his angel go.

“I do not need you to,” Thran murmured. “But I would like for you to. And I must get my shirt.”

Bard let them in, shut the door, and turned into the arms that already reached for him. They twined around each other for a long moment, enjoying the closeness. Then Bard slipped away, found a scrap of paper and a pencil, and scribbled the few steps needed to poach the salmon while Thran put his practice shirt on over his Henley, tying it loosely. He armed his way back into his coat, then took the paper that Bard handed him with the recipe.

“I hate to let you go, fy nghariad.”

“You do not let me go. I am merely three floors above. Separate, but not gone. We will text tonight.”

“We will. The same time tomorrow is good, unless I text you otherwise?”

Thran nodded. “It will be perfect. As today was.”

“Make sure you do your yoga and barre. And your classes, now that your ankle is healed. You’ve got auditions coming. I want to know all about those, how I can help other than preserving your perfect skin. It’s a treasure, you know. Just as the rest of you is.”

Thran offered a chuckle and a little bow, one hand over his heart. “I hear and obey, my saint.”

Bard took Thran in his arms to hug tightly. “Miss you already. Hope all goes well with Legolas today.”

“And I. Know how much I love you.”

“I love you, too.”

They shared one kiss that didn’t last nearly long enough, and then Thran slipped through the door with his bags and was gone.

Bard locked the door, shrugged out of his coat, and leaned back against the door, his eyes shut. How could such a crowded apartment seem so empty?
Thran carried his bags of groceries up to his apartment and let himself in. He toed off his shoes and took off his coat, then carried the bags into the kitchen quietly. Before he unpacked them, he looked at the door to Legolas’s room. Still closed. He went into his room long enough to put his practice top into the laundry hamper in his closet, then returned to the kitchen to unpack his purchases. He had everything on the counter and was reading the label on one of the spice containers when Legolas shuffled out of his room.

“You are a sleepy one this week,” Thran commented, smiling. Legolas didn’t need to know how much he’d appreciated that this morning.

Legolas grunted. “To the market again? Father, you got salmon?”

“I did. I ran into Bard there, and he wrote down a recipe for me. Wait, it is in my coat pocket.” He fetched the small scrap of paper and handed it to Legolas. “It is easy, and he tells me that cold water fish are good for athletes. That is both of us, so I thought it would make us a good supper tonight.”

Legolas read the recipe. “Sounds easy. What to go with? Could we have potatoes?”

“I have rice. Bard bought sweet potatoes this morning, so perhaps you can go down and borrow some from him. Or I can. By the way, I asked him to go to dinner with me tomorrow. He said yes.”

Legolas leaned elbows on the counter, watching his father put the salmon and the red pepper and the eggs in the refrigerator. “So... he likes you.”

Thran thought about all that a certain bathroom mirror had deliciously revealed earlier this morning.
“I think so.”

“And... you like him.”

“I like him very much.”

“Where are you going?”

“I have not decided yet. He likes seafood. I thought I would take him to Kasim's. You remember his small café, and the redfish that he grills so well?”

“That isn’t a very fancy place.”

Thran put his two spices in the cupboard. “Bard is not a very fancy sort. Nor am I. He values good food. So do I. What would you like to have for tomorrow’s supper? I will make sure it is ready for you. Would you like to ask someone over?”

Legolas waved a hand. “I’m fine, Father. There are plenty of things to eat here, and you won’t be gone that long.”

Was Legolas asking for reassurance, or...? Thran couldn’t tell, so he answered matter-of-factly. “I do not expect to be out very late, no. Bard’s children remain in school tomorrow and Wednesday, and he has work to do on his house. So perhaps nine or ten.”

“I’ll manage.” Legolas belatedly took a bowl from the cupboard, then the oatmeal, and set to his breakfast. “Did you say something about Christmas dinner with them?”

“It was mentioned. More to your interest, ham was mentioned. I will see if more has developed tomorrow at dinner. Is there something special you would like? I can offer to bring it.”

“I liked those small tangerines.”

“Clementines. Spanish in origin, though many come from California now.”

“Pie?”

“I will see what our hosts would prefer. We will have time to get something on Wednesday or Thursday. Now, what is your plan for today?”

“When do you have class?”

“At two.”

“Maybe a film afterwards? There’s a space one that looks cool.”

“Of course. And salmon afterwards. With potatoes. Which we do not have. I will ask Bard if I may borrow some.”

“Rice is okay,” Legolas shrugged.

“Then rice we shall have.”

In a way, Thran was relieved that Legolas was happy with rice. If Thran saw Bard again so soon after their tryst this morning with Legolas in tow, his son would know that they had shared much more than a meeting at the market. In a few days or weeks, they could be more open with their relationship. But to thrust it upon his son so abruptly would do more damage than good.

As Legolas cooked his porridge, Thran sighed at the irony of the parent having to be more circumspect than the child.

* * *

The phone call from the kitchen appliance supplier elated Bard as much as deflated him. He listened as the woman explained, gave her his answer, discussed ramifications, then hung up. He leaned back on the sofa, his mobile still in his hand. He called Morgan, the mother of Tilda’s friend Nicole, and made the needed arrangements. The next call was to Thran.

“Bard?”

“Tell me.”

“The good news is that I got a big break on the kitchen appliances. Saved some money, and everything will be installed early. The place had another job fall through, and was looking to fill the hole if I could take everything on short notice. The bad news is that everything’s coming tomorrow morning early. It was then, or we’d likely have to wait until after the first of the year. So I said yes.”

“I would have said the same. Do not worry.”
“That shouldn’t change our dinner plans. Just the morning, which I hate to do.”

“We will manage.”

Bard swallowed. “You could come with me, if you want. Legolas, too. More fencing, or practice for your auditions, or something, but we’d have to leave by seven-thirty. I have to be there at eight-thirty, so I’m dropping Tilda off at her friend’s flat to get on the bus.”

“I will ask. I could spend the time in much-needed practice, in addition to the fencing. It is important that I resume my usual practice before my technique starts to deteriorate.”

“That’s the most important thing – you take care of the dancer. I’ll take care of the kitchen.”

“Just so.”

“Legolas is likely with you, so I know you can’t say much. But text me tonight, as I will with any updates, and we’ll plan.”

“As you say.”

“I know you love me, so you don’t have to say it. I love you, too.”

“Of course. Thanks for letting me know. Bye.”

“Bye.”

Bard switched off his mobile with a wince. Yes, the greater goal was better served by getting a break on cost and installation of the heart of the home he made, but his heart – well, his cock, too – was not convinced. He tried to ignore his disappointment by calling the plumbing firm that was working on the house. It was too much to ask whether they could be out tomorrow to hook up the gas stove, but he’d ask.

A few minutes later, Bard switched off his mobile again. The plumber would be out late Wednesday morning to connect the gas line.

They’d be cooking by Christmas.

He tried to keep that in mind through the rest of the day. He went to the home center to buy more paint and brushes, and he perused the contractors’ lists to see which firms were skilled in restoring vintage floors. It was important to find one that would guard the beautiful inlaid borders from damage, and could attend to any special considerations for the ballroom floor so that it was suitable for Thran to dance on. Before he knew it, Sigrid was home, and Bain shortly after her. Tilda came home on the bus today, since he was home, so before long he put aside his papers and lists to start supper. The children rallied to help with their usual chores.

After they’d sat down to Indian spiced chicken, rice, and green beans, Bard cleared his throat awkwardly.

“Um, about tomorrow...”

Sigrid looked up in interest, but didn’t say anything. She had this suppressed look of glee in her eyes, mostly at his discomfort. His eldest daughter was getting entirely too good at divining the source of her father’s awkwardness.

“The kitchen appliances are all coming to the house tomorrow. The place had a delivery opening, and gave me a break on the prices as well as free installation if I could take them first thing in the morning. So Bain, you'll need to be out the door ten minutes early. Til, you'll need to get up with Bain, so I can take you over to Nicole’s to get the bus. It'll be a big help to me if you both get yourselves ready as easily as possible tomorrow.”

“No problem, Da,” Bain shrugged, shoveling more rice into his mouth.

“I like going to Nicole’s,” Tilda offered. “I get to play with their cat.”

“Thank you both. And um... I’ve been asked out to dinner tomorrow. So I’m going to make your supper a little early so I know you’re all set before I go.”

“Spaghetti?” Bain asked quickly. “Can we do spaghetti?”

“That’s easy. I want you to eat salad, though. You all need the veg.”

Bain made a face and disapproving noises, but a quelling look from Bard reduced the grumbling to an afterthought. That same expression didn’t deter Sigrid’s speculative expression. She folded her arms before her on the table.

“You’re going out to dinner with Thran, right?”

Three pairs of eyes met his. Bard smothered an awkward smirk and told himself he would remind Sigrid of this the next time she brought home a boyfriend.

“Yes,” Bard said. If his children knew how hard he worked to make that single syllable matter-of-fact and casual and relaxed, they’d laugh.

Tilda looked puzzled, and Bain’s eyes flitted back and forth between his father and his sister. Ever tactful, Bain cleared his throat and said, “Is it a date? You’re going on a date with Thran?”

Wincing, Bard rubbed the back of his neck unconsciously. “I guess I am.”

Sigrid snorted and took up her fork again. “There’s no guessing about it. It’s a date.”

“A date?” Tilda ventured. “You mean, like when Sigrid went to the films with Finn Durinson that time?”

“Exactly like that,” Bain chortled, because Sigrid’s dramatic roll of the eyes hadn’t disguised the blush that washed over her cheeks. “When’s he going to ask you out again, Sig?”

“Shut up,” Sigrid hissed. “As if that’s any of your business.”

“That’s enough, you two,” Bard cautioned. “Whether Finn asks Sig out again or not is none of your business, Bain, and there are nicer ways tell Bain that’s none of his business, Sig. So you both owe each other an apology.”

“Sorry, Sig,” Bain muttered.

Sigrid sniffed, drawing Bard’s regard. She exhaled and looked at her plate. “Sorry, Bain.”

“Da?” Tilda asked, looking up with a puzzled look. “I don’t understand what a date is, then? I thought –”

“Let’s get through supper, all right? Then you and I can talk about it while Sig and Bain clean up.”
“Da!” both Bain and Sigrid protested, but Bard gave them both an exasperated glare until they subsided. “Yes, Da.”

They got through supper without any more awkwardness, though Bard didn’t taste much of the rest of his. Nerves. He got his two elder children started on the cleanup, and then sat with Tilda on the floor of her room with her in his lap, took a deep breath, and had The Talk. There was no easy way to broach the subject of a parent who was normal but not typical, and even though he’d done this twice before, it was harder this time. It was hard enough for children to think of their parents as anything other than a parent – always there, always attentive, always protecting, always without any other role outside of a child’s champion. But where Sigrid and Bain remembered their mother, and remembered her with Bard, Tilda didn’t. All she had to help her understand was what she’d seen among the families of her friends. The biggest help came when Bard remembered one of the boys in Tilda’s class.

“Remember Mason in your class? He has a sister, Tayloe, who’s a couple of years older, right?”

Tilda nodded. “He has two Mams. But no Da.”

“That’s right. So parents come in all kinds. Sometimes it’s just one, or an Auntie or a Gran. When there are two, sometimes it’s a Da and a Mam, and sometimes two Mams, and sometimes two Das. So... the way it starts out is that one person finds another person they like, and they spend time together to become good friends. Sometimes, good friends fall in love and become a family, and then, sometimes, the family grows to include children. So... I like Thran, and he likes me, and that’s where we are so far.”

“Is Thran going to become our Da?”

Bard swallowed. “Maybe. We want to be friends for a while first. What do you think about that?”

Tilda snuggled into Bard’s arms. “I like him. I could help him with parades and things. He doesn’t know very much about a lot of things.”

Bard chuckled. “He’s had to work very, very hard to be such a good dancer, little doll. He hasn’t had a lot of time to do much else.”

“So... does he have time to be friends with you? With us?”

“I think he’d make time for all of us. He hasn’t had the chance to be in a family much, and he misses it. He was sent away to a special dance school, away from his family, when he was six.”

Tilda sat up to look at him. “By himself? Who took care of him?”

“The teachers, I suppose.”

Tilda shook her head emphatically. “I wouldn’t like that. Mr. Fundin is nice, and he makes everything interesting, but it’d be hard having only him look after all of us in my class. I’d miss you a lot.”

“I’d miss you, too, little doll.” He rubbed Tilda’s back gently. “So have I explained everything you want to know?”

“So a date is when two people who like each other do something fun together.”

By Tilda’s definition, how he and Thran had spent the morning was a date. A hell of a date, but one nevertheless. Bard smiled, but only a little.
“That’s right.”

“You should ask Thran on a date to go to the zoo. That’s a fun thing to do together.”

“That’s a good idea,” Bard grinned. “Maybe I’ll ask him to go to the zoo. Maybe you’d like to go, I take it?”

“Da,” Tilda snorted. “It’s not a date when children go. That’s a play date.”

“Oh, I see. I’ll keep that in mind. So, any homework for tomorrow?”

“Just a work sheet for history.”

“Let’s get you started, then. You need to go to bed a little bit earlier tonight, because you’re getting up earlier tomorrow.”

“Okay,” Tilda sighed. “Just two more days until Christmas vacation.”

“That’s right. We need to plan our trip to see the tree at Rockefeller Center.”

“You could ask Thran and Legolas.”

“That would be a play date, then, right?”

Tilda giggled. “You’re silly, Da.”

“I’m silly. And you need to finish your work sheet. Come on.”

After Tilda clambered out of Bard’s arms to unpack her school things, Bard went out to check on Bain and Sigrid. Furtive whispering abruptly ceased as he came down the hall. He stuck his head around the corner, arms akimbo.

“Yes?” he asked pointedly, smiling.

Sigrid and Bain looked at each other guiltily.

“I see. Sniping about Sigrid and Finn Durinson, or me and Thran? Likely both, I imagine.”

The looks turned chagrined, but Sigrid recovered first. “It’s okay with us about Thran.”

Bard laughed. “Oh, well, I’m glad that’s settled. What about you and Finn? Is that okay, too?”

Sigrid reddened again, and Bain snickered. “That is still none of anyone’s business,” Sigrid declared, turning back to the sink with a flounce. “Maybe I don’t even like him.”

“Maybe,” Bard allowed, which drew Bain’s snort. “Be nice, Bain. When you decide to ask Angelica Crofton to the eighth-grade dance, you’ll want your sister to be nice to you.”

It was Bain’s turn to redden furiously, and Sigrid’s to laugh.

“Now that we’ve discussed all of our social lives, get started on your homework. Tomorrow morning’s going to be hectic, so I want you both to get everything done tonight. Not that your routine will change, Sig, but yours will, Bain. You won’t have time for any last minute scribbling tomorrow morning before I have to head out with Tilda.”

“Yes, Da,” both children chorused, and the usual homework routine began once more. Tilda sat with her work sheet and map, Bain puzzled over pre-algebra, and Sigrid sorted through French grammar. Bard retreated to the sofa, feeling a bit like he’d survived a major military engagement.

But the children were on board.

* * *

Bard was in bed early, in preparation for tomorrow’s campaign. He had his mobile already in hand.

In bed yet?

Not yet. But no matter. Rather hear from you

Miss my angel

Miss my saint. I am sorry but we cannot go tomorrow. I sense that would push Legolas too much. And I should go to class

I expected as much. But I’m sorry to be right

As am I. Wednesday?

The plumber’s coming to hook up the gas in the kitchen, but not until 11. We’d have a little time

I want that. Your children will be home for winter holiday after that, and then we will have no time together at all

I told S, B, and T that you asked me out. I have their permission to date you

LOL! Did you ask for it? How did it go?

No, but since they approved I didn’t tell them I hadn’t asked for it. They like you

I am honored. Wish L was more at ease

He’s afraid of losing you. I understand. We’ll make sure he knows he isn’t losing you, just gaining us. Or maybe that is what scares him, lol

The former, I think

We need to look at schools for next year. Maybe one of them will offer things that will give him something to look forward to

Like soccer for Bain, so archery and fencing for Legolas

Yes. We should visit schools once children return to school after holidays

Yes

GTG, fy nghariad. Early and long day tomorrow. Don’t want to be ragged for my hot date

I love you disheveled. I love to dishevel you
Hold that thought until Wednesday. Love you, my angel

Love you, my saint, lyubov moya

Bye

Bye

Bard put his mobile aside, pulled up his blanket and sheet, and shut his eyes. There would be no angel in the morning, but the kitchen would come together, which would bring his new life with an angel one step closer.

In the afternoon he’d be home to see to his children, and then in the evening, he and Thran would venture out on a date. After this morning’s decadence, it would be a sedate, almost prim affair. It was still an important milestone, all the same, for it eased four children closer to the idea that one day their fathers would not be alone.

That would be good seasoning, no matter what was on the menu.
Chapter 19

Chapter Summary

A kitchen causes sparks for an angel and a saint, and a benevolent cherub bestows his blessing.

Bard was on the highway and heading west in record time. Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda had been champions this morning, getting themselves ready and out of the door without fuss. Even Tilda, who’d had to get up an hour early, had had no complaint because she’d been excited to visit Nicole and her cat. Morgan had greeted them at the door with a smile and happy wave, and Bard had left feeling relieved that all three of his children were in good hands. The trip to the house passed quickly, and he parked by the carriage house just before eight-thirty.

He turned up the heat out of its standby mode, and went into the kitchen with his carafe of tea to get a cup. It was good to feel the heat come on enough for him to shed his heavy coat. His tea was still warm, if not piping hot, but he drank it knowing that in just a few hours he’d have a stove and a microwave to provide the means for hot tea on demand. He found the broom and gave the spaces for the fridge and stove a good sweeping. He’d already cleaned the floor with steel wool and mineral spirits, then polished it with paste wax, so he wouldn’t have to move the appliances once they were in place. He liked the old, distressed wood, and decided that the soft, waxed finish was perfect for the homey space; anything more elaborate would wait for the fancier inlaid floors in the public rooms.

The installers arrived less than twenty minutes later, and Bard’s tea was forgotten as the workmen came in to prep the spaces. To Bard’s surprise, a plumber that the installer had provided came in first to assess what she needed to do to connect the gas to the stove.

Oh, gods, he’d have tomorrow morning with Thran –

Calm down, Bard told himself sternly. He wouldn’t get his hopes up until the installers were done, and he saw for himself that everything was in place as it should be.

The stove came in – a professional, six-burner model with a grill, two ovens, and a warming tray that took an immense dolly and three men to move it into the kitchen. The plumber squirmed behind it to connect the flexible gas conduit, then slithered out again. The installers nudged the stove into its niche, and methodically checked each oven and burner. As the range hood went up, the plumber sorted out the dishwasher and sink disposal. The microwave and Thran’s small wine chiller were next. The last piece was the immense fridge. As the installers wrestled it carefully into place, the plumber connected water lines and got the cold-water dispenser in order.

The room had suddenly gone from construction site to working kitchen. The house was now a home, albeit an empty, unpainted, unpolished one. But with a working kitchen to cap off a new furnace, functional bathrooms, and a solid, insulated roof, the rest would follow.

“Sign here.”

Bard tore himself from his reverie, took the clipboard holding the installer’s paperwork, read everything, and signed his name with a quiet feeling of elation.
It was happening.

When the installers were gone, Bard called the plumber he’d scheduled for tomorrow to cancel the appointment. Then he went back to the kitchen to admire the stove, listen to the fridge cool down, set the clock on the microwave, sweep the floor again, and wipe down the countertops. He got the boxes from the solarium that held the new red cookware, all ceramic-clad cast iron, expensive but worth it to feed his family well, and set it in the cabinets. He arranged cooking tools in a deep ruby red art glass vase beside the stove. He put the black teakettle on the stove. They still needed dishes, glasses, and flatware, but nevertheless, the kitchen was ready.

He checked his mobile. Eleven-thirty. Thran should be through his yoga, barre, and breakfast. His class wouldn’t be until the afternoon. Bard took a picture of the fridge, captioned it with Ready for food! and sent it to Thran.

He sent one of the wine chiller. Ready for champagne!

He sent one of himself in front of the stove, pointing to the teapot. Ready to cook! Call me!

His mobile beeped immediately. “It is done? It looks fantastic!”

“It’s beyond words, Thran. Amazing. The installer sent a plumber, so the gas is on, the water’s on, everything’s working. Stove, fridge, your fancy wine chiller. I wish you were here. It’s a working kitchen now. We have pots, and once we find some plates at the flea market, we can eat here. We just need a few more chairs.”

“I wish I were there, too, lyubov moyya. It looks and sounds wonderful. I cannot wait to see it in person.”

“I want to visit the flea markets as soon as possible so we can start to come out here on weekends.”

“Perhaps this weekend, after the holiday?”

“I’m game. But we’ll have a chance tomorrow for a little holiday of our own before then. Since the plumber came today, I don’t have to come out here tomorrow. I can stay in the city and hope that an angel might want to come with me there instead.”

A soft chuckle. “I will watch as before, and alight shortly thereafter. Be ready.”

“The next thing to do is get the painters out here. Or I can do a lot of it to save us money.”

“Let us settle on colors, then hire someone. Have it done quickly, while we peruse the flea markets. Then we will have those weekends in the country until we can move there full time.”

“We won’t have much luck trying to hire painters until after Christmas, so you can come out here to see the paint in the right light, and we can decide. Once the holidays are done, I can wrangle the painters while I work on whatever. After that, the floor, and we’re done.”

“This is the best news.”

“It is. I won’t keep you, angel; you’ve got to eat before class, so I’ll see you for dinner.”

“I will see you at six.”

“I’ll be ready. Jeans washed, boots polished.”

Another soft laugh. “I love you, lyubov moyya.”
“I love you, fy nghariad.”

Bard switched off his mobile, and spent another few minutes looking around at the kitchen, the heart in the center of a promise. Then he drove... not home, but back to the city. Home was now behind him.

* * *

Thran put his mobile down, grinning about how a few pictures of a kitchen’s resurgence and his lover’s excitement had delighted him. Bard had outdone himself to jockey so much work to completion in such a short time – roof, insulation, kitchen, furnace, plumbing, hot water heater, and surely half a hundred other things that Thran knew nothing about. More than anything, he wanted to be with Bard to share their growing excitement as their house blossomed into the beautiful home they both wanted. But working towards this new life was not Bard’s undertaking alone; Thran had had his own part to play, a part that so far was still developing. Once Thran finished packing the things he needed for his afternoon class, he took up his mobile again and called the resourceful Mr. Nori to ask a few more questions. He followed that up with a call to his agent, discussed his upcoming auditions, agreed to another one, then ended the call well satisfied. Matters were progressing.

Legolas surfaced from his blankets at last to spoon his way through his morning oatmeal, if noon were still considered morning. He planned to avail himself of the barre this afternoon and then practice his fencing exercises while Thran was at class, then peruse a film on his computer afterwards.

“You are so much by yourself,” Thran ventured as he filled a glass with water from the kitchen tap. He looked over his shoulder at his son who sat at the kitchen table. “Would you like to ask Bain to come up to play a game, or watch a film with you while I am at dinner tonight? Or you are welcome to go there instead.”

“I like Bain,” Legolas admitted. “We had a good time together at the pizza shop. But... to be honest, Father, I’m glad to have a little time alone. I am never alone at school.”

Thran turned off the tap and carried his glass to the table to sit across from Legolas. “You are never alone, but never with anyone, either. Am I right?”

Legolas looked up guiltily, swallowed, then looked back at his porridge.

“I called it ‘Alone in the Midst of the Throng.’ I hated it.”

Legolas looked up again. “That’s what you felt when you were in school?”

Thran nodded. “Always. At first, when I was very small, I thought it was only because I missed my mother and father. But after some years, I discovered that it was more than that.”

“What else was it?” Legolas asked, his porridge forgotten as he regarded his father.

Thran shrugged. “Some of it was my nature to prefer my own kind, which the school and the regime did not tolerate. Some of it was because I looked so different – you know my hair turned white when I was younger than you are now, and I chose to wear it long, which made it all the more obvious. Some was because I had nothing in common with any of the other students. I became very good at the dance very fast, and I was much younger than the other dancers. All uncomfortable.”
Legolas looked back down at his cereal bowl.

“It is like that for you, too, perhaps?”

Legolas swallowed his porridge, but looked as if he weren’t sure of what to say.

“I do not think you are gay, so that is probably not what isolates you. But you are an elite fencer and archer, and I expect that some of the older athletes do not appreciate your abilities. Your looks set you apart as well. And I would not be surprised to find that you have little in common with most of your fellow students. To be in such a situation is hard, and I well understand your desire for a respite.”

Legolas nodded. Perhaps the last bite of porridge went down in more of a lump than the others had.

“You have kept up with the crime dramas you like so much,” he said with a smile.

“I do not need a crime drama to tell me that my son is weary.”

Legolas sighed. “The boarding school is very good in many ways – the subjects are interesting, and I learn a lot. But... I am in the high school section now... the social groups, the cliques, they’re so intense, Father. Many of them are cruel to students who don’t look or act the way they do, or worse. And the fencing, one of the two things I love most... several friends from my middle school team started on the high school one, so I had friends, but then so many dropped out because Master Schroeder sucks the joy out of the art. And you’re right, some of the older boys don’t think I should be on the team. Fencing was my refuge, as dance was yours. But...”

Legolas sighed again. “I know why I have to be there, Father. I do, and I appreciate the sacrifices you make to send me to such a good school. But... honestly? I would rather be here with you.”

Thran’s throat closed. He choked his next sip of water down with difficulty. “I do not like being apart from you, Legolas. Not at all. I hope it will not be for much longer. You are fourteen now, and able to see to yourself when I am in class. The only difficulty is when I must travel, as I still must do a few times a year. I do not like to leave you alone then, and it is not feasible or fair to you to make you follow me about. But my ankle injury has caused me to consider my future, and yours with it. You know that I must audition to regain my place in the company. I have arranged other auditions as well, to see if I can change my circumstances so that you and I can be together again.”

Legolas’s eyebrows went up. “Really? Other auditions? With other companies?”

“So... instructor? Or maybe offer master classes, as so many dancers do?”

“So I consider, yes. It does not interest me to teach small children, but master classes for senior dancers offer interesting possibilities.”

“Wow.” Legolas looked at his father with surprise. “That’s a big change.”

Smiling ironically, Thran shrugged. “I like the chance to dispense with your boarding school. And to face banishment instead of gratitude when I save one of the company’s princesses - that I will not accept meekly.”
Legolas grinned, even chuckled in appreciation. “No, I can’t see you doing that. When will you know anything?”

“Likely not for a while yet. But perhaps you will not have to go back to the boarding school after this term.”

Legolas’s grin waxed wider. “I hope not. I hope it comes together, Father.”

Thran grinned back. “So do I, synok. I very much do. Now, I must go to class. Nothing will happen if I do not keep the body fit.”

“Have a good class, Father. I’ll see you after.”

“Enjoy the barre and the fencing.”

Thran put on his coat, scarf, and boots; collected his bag; and waved goodbye to Legolas as he went through the door. As he walked downstairs, he thought about all the future plans that swirled around him. May they come together, and sooner rather than later.

* * *

After his class, Thran walked home briskly, pleased at how well his ankle had handled the precise movements and strenuous exercise after its layoff. He could resume his regular daily classes without risk of aggravating his ligaments now. It had felt good to stretch, to enjoy the work with the dance master who knew him well and could challenge him without overstressing his body. He had landed each jeté precisely; traced each tendu, développé, and plié with control. He was well able to read the mood of the other dancers as well as the dance master, and he was satisfied that word would soon pass that his form was as strong as it had been before the muggers’ attack. Not only would that give him more leverage with his existing company, should he decide to stay there, but also with the other avenues he pursued.

Legolas was working on his forms when Thran returned, and they spent some time discussing finer points of one position or another. It was a pleasure for them to converse on any subject, given the more than three months that had passed since the start of Legolas’s term, but the finer points of fencing or archery or the dance were their especial pleasures.

Thran left Legolas to finish his stretches while he showered before his dinner with Bard. He paid his usual careful attention to his hair, deciding to leave it loose rather than confine it in its usual daytime braid. Clothes were nothing to fuss over tonight, merely the jeans and Henley that had become his usual attire when he was with Bard. Wallet and keys went into the pockets of his jeans, and he came out into the living room. Legolas was curled comfortably on the sofa, listening to music on his computer while he waited his turn for the shower.

Thran bent for his hiking boots and sat in the chair beside Legolas to lace them up. Legolas looked him up and down.

“So, Kasim's grill?”

Thran nodded. “That is my plan. If it changes, I will text you. Call if you need anything.”

“I’ll be fine. There’s some leftover salmon from last night. That’ll be good. And the last of the cooked rice.”

“Eat some vegetables, of course. There is a lot of broccoli.”

Legolas laughed. “There is always a lot of broccoli. Our refrigerator will never be completely empty, because there will always be broccoli in it.”

Laughing, Thran patted his son’s knee. “Eggs, also. Always eggs. Enjoy your film.”

“Enjoy your dinner, Father. I’ll see you soon.”

Thran armed his way into his coat, collected his scarf and gloves, and lifted a hand in farewell. He descended the stairs to Bard’s apartment to knock on the door. Sigrid opened the door, greeting him with a big smile.

“Ada!” she winked as she drew him in. She raised her voice to call back into the apartment, “Da! Thran’s here!”

“Be right there!” Bard called back from the kitchen.

Taking advantage of the momentary privacy, Sigrid gave Thran an impulsive hug. “Thank you for making Da so happy,” she whispered.

Thran took her hand and brushed a kiss on the back of it with a pleased smile. “It is my pleasure, ma chère. You are kind to welcome me so kindly. I am grateful.”

“Sigrid, spaghetti’s on,” Bard called from the kitchen.

Sigrid rolled her eyes at Thran. “We can get it, Da. Go have your dinner.”

“As soon as you sit down, I’ll go. Bain, get the salad bowls out of the cabinet, please.”

“We can get it, Da,” Bain echoed his sister’s protest. “Look, Til’s got the bowls already. So we’re set.”

Sigrid squeezed Thran’s hand before she headed for the table. “Yeah, we’re set. So go on, Da!”

Bard came out of the kitchen looking harried, but Thran expected it was more nerves than anything else. He was freshly washed and shaved, in clean jeans and plaid shirt and the boots Thran had expected. He smiled in welcome when he met Thran’s eyes, and seemed to settle. “Hi, Thran. Be right there.”

Thran stuck his head into the kitchen. Sigrid ladled out noodles from the colander, Bain got the sauce out of the microwave, and Tilda took a block of cheese from its waxed paper wrappings to set by a small box grater. Salad waited on the table. Tilda gave him a warm smile.

“Hi, Thran!” she greeted, and Bain echoed her.

“Bon soir, ma petite Tilda, and mon cher Bain. You are all well tonight?”

“Very well,” Tilda nodded. “Only one more day of school before our holiday vacation! I can’t wait! Do you know we’re going to see the skaters by the big Christmas tree one day soon?”

“That is always fun,” Thran agreed. “Legolas and I go every year, too.”

“It’s my favorite place to visit at Christmas,” Bain chimed in. “Because I get to skate!”
“Legolas enjoys that, too. Perhaps you and he can go together this year.”

“That’d be good!”

“We will plan to, then, if your Da agrees,” Thran said.

“Sounds like a plan,” Bard winked at Tilda. “It’ll be a play date, right, little doll?”

“Oh, Da,” she shook her head.

“Go on, Da,” Sigrid gave Bard a shove. “Or you’ll make Thran think you don’t want to go!”

“Yes, ma’am,” Bard said mildly. “So be nice, clean up, and start your homework. It’s the last night before you won’t have any for a week, so finish strong.”

“Yes, Da,” came the chorus.

“See you soon. Call if you need anything. I’m off...”

“And you’re leaving, too!” chorused the children, giggling at the old joke.

Grinning, Bard pressed kisses on the heads of his children, and let himself and Thran out of the apartment. When the door closed behind them, Bard leaned in for a quick kiss, one Thran was happy to return before they ventured outside to the sidewalk.

“So where are we off to?” Bard asked, buttoning his coat.

“A warm harbor. But first, a quick walk to a busier street to find a cab. Would you tell me about the kitchen while we walk?”

They forged down the street together, Bard describing how the kitchen installation had gone, answering Thran’s questions along the way. They quickly found a cab to sweep them quickly to the small restaurant that Thran had chosen. It barely registered as an eatery, but the smell emanating from the door was proof enough that an expert chef was on premises. Bard sniffed appreciatively.

“I like it already,” he nodded, taking in the raw bar to the left, the scant dozen small tables lit with tiny votive candles on the right, and the patrons casually attired in jeans and sweaters. The chef in a long white apron came forward to meet them, smiling as he recognized Thran.

“Welcome back, Thran!” the chef held out his hands wide. “We have missed you! How is your son? Still shooting his arrows?”

“Still,” Thran replied, smiling. “Kasim, this is my friend, Bard, and I have told him how excellent your grill is. What is good tonight?”

“Come,” Kasim beckoned, showing them to a small table in the back. “Our grill is always good, Thran. You know that! But tonight, I will tell you that I think the salmon is best. It has a nice glaze, not too sweet, not too hot. There is your favorite redfish, too, and a good grouper. Oysters, of course. And perhaps I can find a few rings of calamari? And of course there is what’s on the menu.”

He waited until Thran and Bard had piled their coats in the extra chairs, then handed them the short menu with a flourish. “I will bring you a glass of wine and a few oysters while you decide, perhaps?”

“Are the oysters Pacific or Atlantic today?”
“We have some very nice Atlantic Beausoleils, small, and very nutty. I think you would like them.”

“You know I cannot resist them, Kasim. Six would be very nice.” Thran looked to Bard. “Do you like white or red wine, lyubov moya? Or would you prefer very cold vodka with your oysters?”

Bard leaned over his elbows. “I like a red, when I drink it.”

“I as well. So, Kasim, perhaps an Austrian Zweigelt for us both, to go with the oysters? And a small plate of the calamari.”

“Of course. I will bring them while you decide about the rest.”

Kasim trotted off, so Thran turned to Bard. “Kasim knows I must eat small portions of everything, and makes the plates for me himself, just so that I may sample the other good things here. Kasim will bring us more of anything if you wish.”

“I’m good.” Bard gave Thran a lopsided grin. “I’ve never gotten to be the girl on a date before. Should I flutter my eyelashes or something?”

“Gods, I hope not,” Thran scoffed. “Only enjoy yourself. That is all you need to do. Now, the menu. What looks good to you?”

Bard was scanning the menu carefully. “Hmm. It all looks good. Though yesterday, when we bought your salmon, I thought that sounded great. So I’ll go with that. What about you?”

“I love their redfish, so that will be my choice. The salad has a nice bitter tang to it to contrast with the slight sweetness of the glaze, if you like that. Or the asparagus is specially grilled and sprinkled with lemon juice, and is very good.”

“I’m always up for asparagus. I think I’ll try the beet salad with mine.”

“Also good. There are four kinds of beets in it!” Thran grinned.

Kasim set their appetizers and glasses of wine before them, took their order for their entrees, and swept away to see to the grill.

“So. The oysters.” Thran gave Bard a look. “Do you like them?”

“I’ll try anything once,” he said, looking askance at the plate. “Though I must say that the lad who tried the first one was brave.”

“Or desperate,” joked Thran. “They are not auspicious to look at, I concede. But if you ignore that part, they are the best taste of the ocean there is.”

“Do you put all of these on one oyster?” Bard pointed to the wedges of lemon, the salt, the small dabs of cocktail sauce and hot sauce.

“I prefer mine with just a hint of lemon, nothing more. But try the cocktail or hot sauces if you like. Or they are good plain. Then, like so,” Thran squeezed a drop or two of lemon juice atop one of the oysters, “and like so,” he picked up the shell, “and like so.”

He slurped the oyster and its juice off the shell, chewed appreciatively, swallowed, and had a sip of wine. “Delicious. Nutty, just as Kasim said.”

Bard had paid close attention, so when Thran waved a hand at the plate, he considered the seasonings, chose just the lemon, slurped, and chewed thoughtfully. “I understand what you mean about the taste of the ocean. Just a little salty, and nutty. And you’re right. They taste better if you don’t look at them.”

They had the last four, though for the last one Bard tried a little of the hot sauce. “Mmm. That adds a good tang to it.”

“I’m glad you enjoyed them. Would you like more?”

“I’m ready for the calamari. And dinner’s coming after that. I have to pace myself, or I’ll be too full to enjoy it all.”

Thran wondered when the last time Bard had been too full. Likely the last time Thran had been. They both had reasons for sparse rations. But tonight there would be nothing of that. They dug into the crispy calamari and remoulade together, enjoying the treat with their wine. As they sampled, Bard told Thran about the conversation he’d had with Tilda to explain what a date was, which made Thran laugh. In turn, he told Bard about the conversation he’d had with Legolas about the boarding school, and that he’d scheduled another audition for late January.

“What kind of auditions?” Bard asked. “For other companies, or specific roles, or something else? This is all foreign to me.”

“My agent has talked to other companies, but he is also pursuing other things. I did not say much to Legolas about them, other than it was my hope that he would no longer have to go to boarding school after the spring term. I consider several things, and I will tell you what they are so far. It may be better for me not to sign a contract with a single company where I would dance the roles they tell me to dance. Some are not suited to me, nor I to them. I am known for some of the more... outré works. My knife dance is one. The Prodigal Son is another. The Golden Slave in Scheherazade is a third.”

“The Golden Slave?” Bard grinned, giving Thran a look that sent a jolt through him. “I might like to have a personal demonstration of that one. Does it come with chains?”

“It comes with a delightful slave’s costume. I die at the end most horribly. That happens in Spartacus, too. At least as the prince in Sleeping Beauty I get to keep the girl.”

“The girl?”

Thran shrugged. “I am known as a romantic dancer, lyubov moya. The eye fucking? It works very well on ballet audiences, even for a gay dancer.”

Bard nearly choked on his calamari, and they both had a hearty laugh.

“To be honest, I think they put me in Spartacus because he has to carry Phrygia so much in Act III. It takes a strong back to do that. I am of a size and strong enough to make it look much easier than it is.”

“What’s the hardest role you do?”

Thran considered.

“Prodigal Son is very hard, but I enjoy it. I like many of Nijinsky’s roles because he trained at the Mariinsky before it was named thus, and his roles are emphasized there. Nureyev also danced there, and added his own stamp to many of Nijinsky’s pieces. I like Scheherazade because it was Nijinsky’s most famous role. The choreography caused a scandal when it was created, because it was very sensuous and Oriental and foreign, and of course the story is scandalous. The rajah goes hunting, the concubines bribe the eunuchs to release the male slaves, and an orgy ensues. At the end, the rajah kills everyone but Scheherazade, who stabs herself for the loss of her Golden Slave. All very epic, and outré for 1910.”

“Why do I not find it surprising that you like flamboyant roles?”

“Perhaps because I am a flamboyant dancer?” Thran teased.

“Maybe you are. I haven’t seen enough to know, though I’d like to change that. But you look pretty epic draped over my ratty sofa like a virgin sacrifice.”

“That is a role I particularly enjoy. I’m very good at deflowering virgins, too. I hope to give you a personal demonstration of that very soon.”

Bard’s grin was part hilarity, part grimace, as he shifted in his chair. “Damn, Thran.”

“Ah, perhaps the addition of underpinnings has not helped?”

“No,” Bard gave him a mock glare. “I don’t think either of us needed the oysters, either.”

“Not in that sense. But I like them, and as you say, it is important to eat well. You must do so, too. You need strength to work the metal, yes?”

Bard picked at the emptying plate of calamari. “Less than you think, but enough. It’s not like I have to lift a finished piece, or bend iron bars like the lad in the circus. More endurance than anything else. Some parts of forming or assembly take a good stretch of time. I used to put a sign out by the barn door before I began a long session. It said ‘Metal in Progress – Go Away.’ An interruption at the wrong time could ruin the piece.”

“I will not intrude when your sign is in place.” Thran speared the last piece of calamari, dipped it in the sauce, and held it out to Bard. “So build your strength, Bard. Finish the calamari.”

Bard leaned forward to bite the tidbit off the fork. “Yes, fy nghariad. Right away, fy nghariad.”

“Such compliance!” Thran laughed. “What else can I entice you to do?”

“In a public restaurant? Not much other than enjoy the company and the food. Both of which I am happy to do.”

“Nothing else?”

Bard grinned and a gleam was in his eye. “Hmm. Maybe one more thing.”

“We agreed to that during my second visit to the house.”

“That was just a warmup for the real thing.”

“Be sure of what you ask of me, lyubov moya.”

Bard shrugged. “I’m game if you are.”

“You are very nice game. I get very hungry to look at you. So yes, I am game, too.”

“You’re sure, too?”

Thran edged a hand across the table. “How better to treasure the beautiful saint who has graced my
“And the angel in mine.” Bard met Thran’s fingers with his own. “So...”

“Yes. You?”

“Yes. Just yes.”

Thran’s lips curved up into what was likely a silly grin. “Ah. Once again, oysters have justified their magical reputation.”

Bard sat back, laughing softly. He ran a hand through his hair, pausing at his nape to savor his incredulity. “Forget the mollusks. It was the kitchen installation pictures.”

“Likely so. To see them made everything seem more real. Like the way scenery changes a bare stage to a place of magic.”

“It was magic. I wish you’d been there to see it, Thran. One minute, it was a construction site. The next, it was a kitchen. No, more than that – it was a home. Still rough on the surface, but it’s coming. It was amazing.”

“I’m sure I will feel that way when I see it for myself, too. But now, let us allow poor Kasim deliver our salads. He has been most patient with us.”

Bard sneak a look at the chef moving about the room to attend to other diners. Yes, Kasim had kept an eye on them, proving so with the most conspiratorial smile he bestowed upon Thran. In seconds, the chef was at their table to sweep away their empty hors d’oeuvres plates and quickly return with their salads. He didn’t speak, but his smile was benevolent as he left them to indulge.

“He’s on to us,” Bard muttered to his plate, looking chagrined.

“Kasim is a most discerning and attentive fellow. How are the beets tonight?”

“Delicious. I don’t get to enjoy them too often, as Sigrid and Bain aren’t fond of them. Tilda likes them, though. So this is a pleasure. How’s the lettuce?”

“Arugula. Quite piquant. I like it.” He drizzled the barest bit of balsamic dressing over it and started to eat. “Bitter things are good to balance the sweeter seafood, the slight glaze that will be on the redfish. A good tonic.”

Bard hummed and attended to his salad. Their entrees followed, Thran’s redfish was grilled to Kasim’s usual perfection, but as much as he enjoyed it, it was even better to watch Bard savor his salmon with reverent appreciation. The salmon was just the barest bit crispy on the outside, but still buttery on the inside. Bard offered him a taste; the only reason Thran consented was because he could offer Bard a taste of his redfish, which his saint enjoyed. The Zweigelt that had accompanied their appetizers worked well with the fish, and Thran regarded his empty plate with a sigh of contentment.

“That was wonderful,” Bard said. “The best meal I’ve had in I don’t know how long. Your friend Kasim is a genius.”

“Please tell him so,” Thran asked. “It would please him very much. So, dessert, and tea?”

“Only if you’re having some of each.”
“Such a night deserves both. Let us see what Kasim has to recommend.”

Thran looked for their chef, but he was already heading for them, a platter in hand. With a flourish, he set two small ramekins before them, then spoons, then a pair of filled champagne glasses. He offered them both a bow.

“May I be the first to offer my congratulations?” He turned to Bard. “Thran has been a good friend for many years, and I hope you will soon be, too, Bard. Please, enjoy a little sweetness from me to compliment yours.”

“Kasim, you are magnificent! Crème brulée au chocolat avec des framboises?”

“Your favorite, I know,” Kasim said smugly. “You did not expect me to forget that, did you? Of course I remember. I am Kasim.”

“You outdo yourself. I am touched beyond speech.”

“Then eat, eat! Enjoy!”

“This is nice of you,” Bard said simply. “Everything I've had tonight has been delicious, and I'm sure this will be, too. Thank you.”

“You are most welcome. Now, enjoy.”

Kasim went to attend to other diners, leaving Bard to regard Thran with speculation. “Did the children tell you how much I like chocolate crème brulée? And did you tell Kasim?”

Thran held up his hands in denial. “I did not speak to anyone about dessert, either your children or Kasim. This is his initiative, and his alone. But it is a very nice initiative, isn’t it?”

Bard took up his champagne glass. “Very nice, indeed. So, fy nghariad, to us, the night, the brilliant chef, a perfect dinner, and everything that follows such an auspicious start.”

Thran touched his glass to Bard’s. “To everything.”

For the first time in memory, Thran drank his glass empty. Bard was no less thorough. To toast all that was to come with less bore no contemplating.
Chapter 20

Chapter Summary

A pair of inquisitions ensues. Then a pair of lovers steals a little private time.

Chapter Notes

Ah, yes, another chapter that earns the Explicit rating. Enjoy it.

Enjoy the cold shower that follows, too :-).

The cab ride home was warm and loud, thanks to their Algerian cab driver. He had the heat on full blast, as well as some wonderfully raucous music that wailed too loudly for anyone to talk over. Beside Bard, Thran made an incredulous face, which drew them both to laugh, but they were content to take in the overload without complaint. Bard relaxed against the back of the cab as the ululating music swept over him, its jubilant racket the perfect accompaniment to his happiness.

A mere glass of wine, even when followed with gleeful champagne and wild North African music, was not the reason for his high spirits – an angel was. His angel. His angel alone, as thoroughly as he was the angel’s saint.

What a couple of delirious saps they were.

The cab racketed through the streets back to their apartment building in minutes, the lights of the city streaking by like fireworks to accompany the staccato music. When Bard and Thran emerged before their apartment building, Bard felt as if he’d passed through a festival. As the music from the cab faded into the distance, Bard thrust his hands deep into his coat pockets and took a deep breath of the chill air and relative quiet that stretched up and down the street. With Thran beside him, they climbed the stairs to their building, slipped inside the door, and shut the door behind them.

“That was quite a meal,” Bard breathed, his fingers reaching for Thran’s in the dimness. “Perfect place, perfect food, perfect company. Especially perfect company. You know how to show a welder a good time.”

“I expect you to put out, of course,” Thran deadpanned, as he slipped his hand around Bard’s hip to stroke his buttock.

Snickering, Bard’s hand snaked to Thran’s nape and pulled him close enough to kiss. “Always the greedy bastard. You’ll have to wait until tomorrow morning. And we both decided that we’d put out only so much until the right place and time came along.”

“True. But know that I would prefer to coax you into my bed and keep you awake all night, even though we must bow to the needs of our children.”

“Not for much longer, my angel.”
Thran hummed as he eased his arms around Bard and kissed him again. “How I love to hear you call me that.”

“Somebody told me once that it wasn't bragging if it was true.”

“I leave it to you. Just as you must leave the bestowal of sainthood to me. So... until tomorrow.”

“Until tomorrow. Unless one of us decides to text something racy from bed.”

“That would keep us both from sleep, which would make the time between now and tomorrow morning pass much more slowly.”

“True. I’ve got enough to think about, anyway. Do you want a ring? I’d like us to have them.”

“As would I. White gold for me.”

“For me, too. Nothing ostentatious, but not completely plain.”

“Of course not. Neither of us is plain.”

Bard laughed. “Not at all. So give it some thought.”

“You, too.”

They walked up the stairs to Bard’s door. One last kiss, a lingering touch of hands, a whisper of farewells, and Thran turned up the stairs. He turned at the landing, smiled, and disappeared on soft feet, back up to heaven.

Exhaling, Bard indulged in a private grin. How had his life become such a fairy tale? One where a tall, exquisite ballet dancer acted as both prince and fairy godfather, making all things happen? Thran was such a skilled dancer that maybe he’d danced dual roles in a single ballet so effortlessly before. May these two be ones that his angel would grace for the rest of their lives.

* * *

Legolas looked up from his computer as Thran let himself in the door. “You’re back early.”

Thran blinked as he slipped off his coat and took off his hiking boots. “Am I? What time is it?”

“Just nine-thirty.”

“Kasim asked about you. He sends his warmest regards.”

“That was nice of him. What did he have for you?”

“Beausoleil oysters. Calamari with his special remoulade. Grilled redfish, asparagus, his special arugula salad, and crème brulée au chocolat avec des framboises. All up to his usual excellence.”

“What did Bard have?”

“Grilled salmon with the asparagus and the beet salad, and the crème brulée. Also excellent.”

“Did you... have a good time?”
Thran sat down in the chair by the sofa and stretched his long legs out in front of him before giving Legolas his full regard. “I had a wonderful time. A very wonderful time.”

His son paused his game, but said nothing, only gazed at him with a mixed expression. Oh, so much to say, and how to say it? Such things were never easy.

“I like Bard very much,” Thran said.

A long silence passed, but Thran was content to see how much Legolas would press if given the time.

“How much?” Legolas finally ventured.

“More than I have liked anyone since your mother died.”

“So... more than just as a friend.”

Thran nodded.

“And... does he...”

Thran nodded.

“Oh. So... what does that mean?”

“It means that we will continue to do what is best for our children. The four of you will always come first for us.”

“So all those things you talked about earlier, about your auditions...”

Thran got up out of his chair, sat beside Legolas, and put an arm around his son’s shoulders. “Those things began as I told you – because of the poor treatment from my company, and because I hate to send you to boarding school. I have never liked to be apart from you for so long at a time, and I do not like that you are miserable there. I know what that is like, and the sooner that ends, the better for both of us. Nothing matters as much as that. Nothing matters to me in the same way that you do.”

“So... what happens now?”

“I do not know, entirely. I have started my search for a suitable school for you, and for fencing and archery instructors. Until I decide what to do about my contract, decisions must wait. But I will not choose a school or instructors for you until you see them first. Be sure of that. I do not want to change one ill-fitting situation for another.”

Legolas didn’t hug his father, but he didn’t move out from under Thran’s arm, either, glad of the physical closeness. Thran jostled him gently.

“I love you very much, Legolas. You are my son and treasure, and I am very proud of you. No matter what happens, those things will always be true. So you will not lose me to anyone. This will likely cause you great distress when you start to date.”

Legolas snickered. “It will, if you glare at everyone I bring home the way you glare at me.”

“We shall see when that moment comes. Until then, you must bear the glare alone.”

As Legolas went back to his video game, smiling, Thran took a surreptitious deep breath.
Two speculative stares skewered Bard as he came into his apartment – Bain and Tilda were on the sofa together, watching a film. A flurry of motion came from Sigrid’s room, and his oldest child scampered down the hall.

“How was it?” she asked breathlessly.

“Delicious. Very, very good.”

“What’d you have?” Bain asked, pausing the film. Oh, gods. There would be no avoiding the Spanish Inquisition tonight.

Bard hung his coat up on its hook and unlaced his boots. “The first part was oysters.”

“What, fried?” Sigrid asked. When he shook his head, her eyes went round. “Not raw?”

Bard sat in his chair to describe the eating of raw oysters, and then of everything else. Tilda wanted to know if the crème brûlée had the crust on top, and Bard assured her that it had taken three raps with his spoon to crack the hard sugar crust to reach the creamy chocolate underneath. Then he had to describe everything that Thran had eaten, and all about the restaurant, and Kasim. It was a pleasure to savor each detail again as he described it for the children. Bain was especially fascinated with the description of the nimble oyster shucker who manned the raw bar, skillfully opening and preparing the mollusks, then dealing them out to the patrons sitting before him as if he laid out their fortunes. They were so interested in everything, down to the color of the cloths on the tables – blue gingham, not the expected red – that Bard almost thought they’d forget to ask anything else.

Sigrid soon disabused him of that hope. “How was the date part?”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “The... date part?”

“Yeah, the date part. In and around the food, how were you and Thran?”

Three sets of very curious eyes bored into Bard. All they needed was a bright light to shine in his eyes – on second thought, they didn’t need the light. Their eyes were bright enough.

“Um, let’s turn that around. How was the date part when you and Finn went to the film?”

“Yeah, how was that?” Bain chortled gleefully, laughing even though he’d been no less interested in anything Bard had to say.

“That’s none of anyone’s business!” Sigrid huffed.

“That’s right. It isn’t. So if you want others to be respectful of your privacy, then you need to be respectful of other’s privacy, too.”

“So there was a date part, then!” Sigrid pounced, sending Bain off into laughter again. Tilda cradled Mr. Bun and frowned.

“I had a very good time, with very good food, with a very good friend,” Bard said patiently. “I enjoyed it very much. What’s the matter, little doll? You’re frowning.”

“I thought a date was what people who liked each other did that was fun. Your dinner sounded fun. So what are Sigrid and Bain talking about? Wasn’t the dinner the date part?”

Bain collapsed into gales of laughter, and even Sigrid started to laugh.

“The dinner was the date part, yes,” Bain told her, giving Tilda’s siblings a glare. “And it would be wise for two particular children to think carefully about what they say next, unless they want to spend a large part of the holiday grounded. What I said about respect still holds.”

Bain and Sigrid exchanged looks, but subsided.

“Homework?” Bard asked, glad to have diverted his children, if only for the moment.

“I’m done,” Bain said, and Tilda echoed her brother.

“Almost done. A bit more on my French essay, that’s all.”

“Everything in the back packs? Baths?”

Tilda and Bain had packed their things and bathed.

“Then into bed, you two. Tomorrow you can stay up a bit longer for the holidays. Tonight, though, it’s still a school night.”

As the children scattered, Bard got up to brush his teeth, glad to leave the field of battle relatively unscathed. It wouldn’t last.

* * *

Up at six-thirty. Very slow stretches in bed before rising – ankles, wrists, hips, shoulders, neck, all gently but completely, like the luxuries of an odalisque, or a sleek feline. He thought of what it would be like if Bard lay sleepily beside him to watch him stretch, gradually awakening as Thran teased him with his languid movements. How long would it take before he could rouse Bard to do more than watch? Thinking of the possibilities lent a warmth to his extensions that they would not otherwise have had.

Finally rising, morning ablutions, practice attire, then to the barre for the morning ritual. A bit shorter today, then the yoga, though it was hard to center himself this morning. The reason for that gave him something else to smile about as he did pliés, arabesques, tadasanas, utanasanas. He made his porridge. He brushed his teeth, showered, dried his hair, braided his hair, put on his clothes – Chinese mandarin tunic in grey blue slubbed silk with monkey paw buttons, pale grey leggings, and loose, darker grey wooly socks.

Only then did he look at his mobile for the time. Eight-thirty-four.

He took up his station by the window.

In ten minutes, Tilda’s bus made its appearance. Thran had his mobile and keys in one hand, a collection of heavier clothes and his boots in the other.
Yes? he sent, when the bus drove away.

Yes!

He let himself out of his apartment, padded downstairs in his socks, and met Bard, who was already smiling a welcome as he unlocked his apartment door. Thran followed him inside wordlessly, put his things with the coats and boots and other accouterments by the door, and straightened to find Bard’s eyes on him.

“I could get used to having an angel meet me at the door every morning.” Bard reached out to touch the collar of Thran’s silk shirt, then traced a finger down his neck to the first button that Thran had not bothered to button. He traced down to the second button, also unbuttoned. The third was buttoned, but only until Bard’s fingers reached it. Once the button came open, Thran took Bard’s fingers to kiss.

“If you want to unbutton any more, my saint, you must take off your coat, and your boots, and perhaps a little more.”

Bard’s coat fell to the floor. As he stooped to untie his boots, Thran touched the bent head, stroking the tangled curls, threading his fingers through it as lightly as a breeze. The boots followed the coat, and Thran drew Bard to his feet to cradle his head in his hands. He brushed the lightest of kisses on Bard’s lips, more invitation and promise than actual touch. Bard traced his hands around Thran’s ribs, settling at his waist just above the points of his hips, tightening to ease him closer.

“So how should I tease you this morning, lyubov moyya? Be your sacred angel, or your profane devil? Be your spoils of war, or the one who despoils you? Tell me your greatest desire.”

“Are you a magic djinni, then?” Bard breathed, rubbing his hips against Thran’s slowly back and forth, back and forth.

“Would you like me to be? Only remember that the next choice is mine. So choose wisely.”

“Take off your clothes. All of them. I want to see you naked.”

With a smile of anticipation, Thran backed away a step to give Bard a better view. He unbuttoned his shirt slowly – was he tentative, or teasing? Shy, or seductive? He let Bard decide. The exotic style of his shirt, and the soft silk, so soothing against his skin, whispered of secret and arcane rituals that he would reveal to his lover. He teased himself with that fantasy to turn the mere removal of clothes into the unveiling of a present. When he let the shirt slide oh, so slowly off his shoulders, down his arms, and over his hands, he laid it on the back of Bard’s chair. He shook his braid over his shoulder, letting it swing against his back like the touch of a lover’s hand as he hooked his thumbs in the top of his leggings, eased them lower, then caught his underwear, and eased both still lower, letting Bard savor the view from behind. It was a subtle trick to step on the toe of a sock so that it slipped off when he slid his leggings down. He lifted first one leg, then the other, letting the leggings and socks and underwear fall to earth before straightening to his full height. Turning only slightly towards Bard, Thran looked over his shoulder, teasing his lover with what he showed and all that he didn’t. He made an elegant gesture with his hands, both presentation and invitation.

“Oh, gods,” Bard swallowed. “Oh, most holy gods, Thran.”

“Touch me.”

“Where?”

“Everywhere.”
Hands alit on his shoulders, squeezing briefly, then stroked down his arms to his hands. A kiss pressed against his nape, then traced down his spine, one vertebra at a time, then fingers kneaded his trapezius and deltoids in slow, delicious strokes. Thran hummed softly as the slow, lulling massage flooded him with endorphins. He shut his eyes to intensify the feeling, leaning into Bard’s caresses.

“So good,” he whispered. “So very good.”

Bard drew him closer. The touch of a soft shirt against his shoulder blades, the small coldness of a belt buckle against the base of his spine, the rougher scrape of jeans against his buttocks, had his flesh in goosebumps – to be naked, with another’s hands on him from behind, one still clothed, had always aroused him because of the implied danger. Whether he was the sacrifice, or the god to whom the sacrifice was to be made, made no difference. Both were irresistible.

His breath lurched as his arousal grew. Bard wound his hands around Thran’s ribs in reaction, kneading and stroking, then pulled him against his jeans. Fingers explored the points of his hips, then knuckles pressed into the hollows below the points, circling lower to his groins and the creases between torso and legs. Being pressed between Bard’s clothed body and those insistent hands flooded him with more than endorphins. Did the mortal behind him take him, or did he call the mortal to worship? Moaning soundlessly, he clenched hands around the thighs behind him. In response, Bard pressed their chests together and swallowed him in a kiss, his fingers winding in the base of Thran's braid as if it were a leash. Fingers traced the crease between his buttocks, both invasion and temptation, making him gasp, making him wrap one long leg around Bard’s waist, and both arms around Bard’s ribs. Kisses nibbled their way from his lips down his throat to his chest to nip at both nipples, more tease than anything else, then continued lower. His braid fell free as hands dragged down his back to his buttocks, then Bard sank to his knees before him. The tongue tickling Thran’s flanks wormed its way through the hair at the top of his pubic bone to lick the base of his cock. Oh, gods – this was both possession and worship, profane as well as sacred. Thran swayed against the insistent pull of Bard’s mouth engulfing the core of him, Bard’s hair brushing against his thighs, Bard’s hands kneading his buttocks. When he stroked Bard’s tangled hair, it was a plea for mercy, yet also encouragement for more. When the warm, wet touches turned savage, they drove him to irresistibly to ecstasy. As his body convulsed, as he cried out wordlessly, his knees turned to water, and all that held him upright were strong arms wrapped around his legs. They held him through each tremor and spasm.

As the intensity faded, lips kissed his softening cock gently, and nuzzled his pubic hair with gentle, tickling caresses. The hands that had cradled him so firmly kneaded buttocks, hamstrings, thighs gently, and then Bard straightened to hug Thran against him – no, not just hug him, but pick him up and carry him to the sofa to deposit him on the soft blanket draped there, as if he were a great treasure. As his eyes closed, Bard stroked the tousled strands of hair that had escaped from his braid away from his face, and pressed a kiss on his temple.

“You are amazing.”

Thran smiled and opened his eyes. His lover regarded him with so much awe that Thran took Bard’s hand to press a kiss against it.

“I rather think that you are the amazing one, lyubov moya. You have the most irresistible mouth. I may not survive when you finally make love to me.”

Bard’s awe faded into a crooked smile. “I’ll make sure you do, fy nghariad. Just so I can do it over and over again.”

“How delicious. When our moment arrives, I intend to repay you in kind.”
“I’m looking forward to that.”

“So am I. How soon before we can move into our house?”

“We need furniture. Once I get the painters started, I’ll scour the flea markets, and antique stores, and whatever else we run across.”

“I will enjoy that, too. This will be the first time I have ever had the chance to make more than a few rooms to hold a bed where I sleep between classes and rehearsals and performances.”

“Then we’ll plan to start looking this weekend. We’ll take the children. I know one place that comes up with some of the most intriguing pieces. A lot of Oriental, for some reason. Some nice carved pieces.”

“I like those, too. I admit I am not overly fond of ornate French pieces. Too much like the Hermitage museum. Beautiful, yes, but so busy that it becomes tiresome to look at. I like more serenity.”

“I feel the same way. We’ll see what we can find.”

Thran stroked Bard’s cheek appreciatively, drawing Bard’s smile.

“Are you warm enough? Would you like some tea?”

Thran grinned. “I am very warm after our ardor, sweet Bard. And I do not need tea. I will enjoy a few more moments of respite to savor your delight, and then it will be my turn to ask something of you. There are so many possibilities, I hardly know where to begin…. No, that is not true. I know exactly where to begin.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “Do you?”

“I’m waiting.”

Thran stretched luxuriously, and his smile was sly. “Ah, my lover awaits my commands, as he should. So here is the first.”
Chapter 21

Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint make the most of the limited time available to them. They make the most of each other, too.

Chapter Notes

This is a very short chapter, because the next bit is Christmas, which is long and involved, and it would have been cruel to delay the conclusion of Wednesday morning's tryst. It's another Explicit chapter, so I don't guess you'll mind terribly.

Our boys certainly didn't.

Bard’s loins clenched hard when Thran stretched fully prone on the sofa, reveling in the elegant body that looked so ascetic, yet so voluptuous at the same time – lean and attenuated from so much training, yet moving so sensuously, so invitingly. To finally see that pale, graceful body without the blasphemy of clothing was a gift. Unmarred skin, pink nipples and long, graceful cock, completely white pubic hair – no armpit hair, though; Bard seemed to remember reading that many male dancers shaved it off – were more dreamlike than real. Perfect musculature under that silky skin trembled and tensed when pleasure flooded them. To have that body under his hands seemed more surreal fantasy than reality. But he’d driven that exquisite body to orgasm just seconds ago, driven it to abandon all its years of discipline and training and dissolve into uncontrolled, overwhelming release. Would he ever get tired of that?

Would he ever get tired of Thran’s retaliation?

It was such delight to suffer in the arms of an angel.

Thran finished his stretch, then slid over to the end of the sofa to rest against the arm, reclining like a sultan. He draped the blanket over his body as if it were the sultan’s robe, leaving one shoulder and part of his chest bare. He eased the elastic off the end of his braid and shook out the twists to let his hair twine loosely over his shoulders and down his chest. Now he could be either prince or princess inviting a lover into his/her bed. The gender didn’t matter; both were alluring enough to make Bard lick his lips.

The arousal behind Bard’s unconscious movement wasn’t lost on Thran. The smallest smile touched his lips – a wicked one.

“Take that off,” Thran said, one hand gesturing from Bard’s head to his heels, then pointed to his shirt draped over Bard’s chair. “And put that on.”

Bard stood up. He was too eager to take his clothes off as slowly as Thran did, and he couldn’t have done it so provocatively, anyway. So he peeled his Henley off over his head, facing Thran to watch what kind of reaction he got. He’d learned that already from Thran, who was a master at tailoring his actions to make the most of Bard’s reception. Thran’s eyes were not on his, but on his chest, and then his jeans when Bard unbuckled his belt, unbuttoned the top button and unzipped. To be so thoroughly ogled sent a flush of heat throughout his body, and made the hackles on the back of his neck go up. He maneuvered his jeans down over his hips with little tugs, first to one side then the other, before shucking them off to lie in a heap. He’d forgone socks this morning just because he was in too much of a hurry to bother with something he’d fully expected to strip off within minutes of putting them on. His cock was already half erect – how could it not be, after bringing Thran to orgasm the way he had, and anticipating what might happen next? He took it in his hand and stroked once, which got a hum out of Thran.

“Not yet. Turn around first.”

Bard obeyed, but he didn’t take his hand off his cock. It felt too good, especially with Thran watching him as if he were on an auction block. Perhaps the sultan had asked the merchandise for a demonstration? Hmm. Thran loved fantasy, and Bard was learning to, so perhaps he ought to spike the fantasy with a little rebellion...

“Not yet. Put my shirt on first.”

“I thought you liked your slaves naked.”

Thran’s eyes widened. “I like them to do as I bid them.”

“No, you don’t. You like them to fight a little. So make me stop, and make me put your shirt on.”

Thran’s grin was entirely feral as Bard stroked his cock slowly. What would Thran do if Bard shut his eyes and let his breath catch just a little?

What it got him was Thran biting his bottom lip, then prowling naked off the sofa to wind an insistent hand in the back of Bard’s long hair. The kiss that followed was rough, but Bard responded in kind, biting and nipping, and still stroking.

Thran pulled Bard’s head back by his hair. His angel was all but crackling with tension, drawing Bard’s unrepentant grin. He forced his head forward to bite at Thran’s lips again.

“I was right. The sultan likes merchandise with a little fire. Don’t you?”

The hand in his hair forced him to his knees, then released him only to yank his hips back hard against the taut body behind him. Knees shoved his legs apart, then muscled between his thighs. Finger pads goaded his nipples until they ached, then dragged their way down either side of his cock, massaging the base of it, and cradling his balls gently despite the posturing. Teeth gnawed at his earlobe, then bit at his neck. The final enticement was the long, erect cock that slid between his buttocks to press against his balls, so unexpected that he gasped, making his cock spasm in response. Hands pried his away from his cock only to possess it instead. When he fell forward onto his hands, Thran was right there, crowding behind him, even biting at the base of his neck like an animal would do. Oh, gods, to feel Thran all over him like this, so relentless...

“The next time you try to take yourself before a sultan,” Thran hissed in his ear, “you will find yourself on your knees just like this, and I will have my cock buried inside you as well as my hand around yours, and I will rip your release out of you the way you so richly deserve.”

Just the thought of Thran sliding inside him pushed Bard over the edge. Thran felt him spasm and twined one hand in his hair again to further reinforce just how possessed he was. As he released, he let Thran wring him dry without resistance.
The fingers in his hair turned soft and caressing, and the hand around his cock soothed and massaged gently, bringing him down slowly. The teeth that had bitten his ear slipped behind soft lips that kissed his neck, his shoulder, his spine.

“Can you get up?” a soft voice whispered.

Bard grinned, deliberately misunderstanding. “Not for a few minutes, you greedy bastard. Can’t wait for want another one, can you?”

Thran asked. “I meant, can you stand up? Your knees...”

“They still work. But I admit they’ll work better in a couple of seconds.”

“You don’t make a very biddable slave, lyubov moya.”

“You don’t like biddable slaves, fy nghariad.”

“I do not. Unruly slaves are a much more delectable delight. Never change that.”

Chuckling, Bard shifted a bit, and Thran eased from between his legs to get to his feet. He held out a hand to help Bard up, who rose gingerly in deference to the unaccustomed position. Thran wrapped him in an embrace, kissing his neck and stroking his hair.

“You are a jewel. My jewel,” Thran whispered in his ear. “I love you.”

“I love you, too, angel. Now let me brush my teeth so I can kiss you.”

Thran scoffed, and gave him a full kiss on the mouth. “A little essence does not deter me. Especially when it’s mine.”

Bard laughed. “You’re filthy.”

Thran’s grin was unrepentant. “Filthy would be to kiss you if it were not my essence. But if it were not my essence, I would not kiss you.”

“No chance of it being anyone else’s. I’m happy with the only angel on earth, and I intend to stay in his good graces. Among other things, before too much longer.”

“Before too much longer. Now, we are a delightful mess, so we must wash.”

“That’s an order I can get behind.”

They padded naked to the bathroom, Thran to wash his hands, Bard to brush his teeth and wash his torso. What a contrast they were – Thran pale, slender, and seemingly hairless, and Bard darker, more muscled, and pelted in dark hair. Thran finished his cleanup quickly, then made no secret of watching Bard rinsing away signs of their indulgence. He massaged Bard’s shoulders as he watched Bard dry off in the mirror. Those adept fingers were both wonderfully soothing and rousing at the same time.

“What time is it?” Bard asked, as they came back to the living room. He ducked into the kitchen to fetch paper towels to sponge the carpet clean, dabbed quickly, then disposed of the towels in the trashcan.

“A quarter of ten. Time enough for me to ask you to try on my shirt. I think it would suit you to have something exotic. The color is good for you, too.”
Bard eased his undershorts and jeans on, then he armed his way carefully into the silk shirt; he was beefier than his slender angel, and he didn’t want to tear it. It was only a little tight across the shoulders, but the soft fabric was lush against his skin.

“Trying to turn me into a peacock, are you?”

Thran shook his head as he studied Bard. “I am enough of one that we do not need two. But you are not a drab little wren, lyubov moya. You have your own beautiful grace that I enjoy. To be honest, I cannot wait to see you work on your metal, as I imagine it turns you quite sweaty and gritty, and in your jeans and boots I will not be able to resist you. But that is for me to see, not the world. In the world... the biker persona you mentioned would suit you well, but it is so overdone. Something more unexpected will be much more intriguing. A Tibetan shirt, perhaps, or a Cossack one, with your jeans. Do Welshmen wear kilts?”

Laughing, Bard shrugged out of Thran’s shirt and pulled his Henley over his head. “No, fy nghariad. That’s only the Scots. Wales doesn’t have a national costume.”

“Just as well. A kilt would make you look too civilized. I like the rebel.”

Even a thoughtful naked Thran drew Bard’s hands to him. He eased his angel close to kiss, to stroke that long, white hair that flowed over them like a veil, then rubbed his buttock. “I like you in anything. I especially like you in nothing.”

“I cannot wait to get you in bed that way. We will see how unruly you are there. I hope very.”

Bard laughed as he rearranged his jeans. “Gods, Thran.”

Thran didn’t help matters by putting a hand over his crotch to squeeze gently, but let his hand slip away to stoop for his clothes. Bard sat on the sofa to admire Thran as he slithered into the black silk underwear he’d teased Bard about at Thanksgiving, then sorted through the clothes he’d carried down with him. He put on the Mandarin shirt, but drew on heavier jeans rather than his leggings. One of the long, soft sweaters that so suited him went atop his shirt, then he drew on wooly socks and boots. When he was dressed, he ran fingers through his hair to untangle it, then sat beside Bard to braid it.

“So what’s our plan to follow the morning’s indulgence?” Bard asked, when Thran had finished his hair.

“A walk in the park, perhaps? We can discuss Christmas dinner.”

“Good by me. Oh, before we go...” Bard pulled the blanket off the sofa and arranged it atop his bed, smoothing the quilt on top. He gave Thran a considering look. “When I get into bed tonight, it’ll smell like you.”

Thran tsked. “I am envious. I will have no such reminder of you.”

“I’ll give you my shirt to take with you,” Bard said facetiously as he grabbed his coat and Thran’s. He tossed Thran’s to him and armed his way into his. “You can sneak it under your pillow.”

Thran, however, didn’t laugh. “I would like that.”

Bard’s gaze softened as he locked the apartment behind them. “Okay. A walk in the park, then back here, and my shirt is yours.”

A kiss brushed his cheek. “Thank you, lyubov moya.”
Gods. What a couple of saps they were. Horny saps, but saps nevertheless.
Chapter 22

Chapter Summary

It's only Christmas Eve, but intangible gifts are already arriving for an angel and a saint.

A brisk walk after such an indulgent morning was a good tonic. The fitful breeze was cold, the perfect enticement to draw Thran’s saint close, and they paced arm in arm twice around the children’s play areas and most of the sport fields, discussing their plans for Friday’s Christmas dinner. They agreed that it was too much to push the children into the exchange of gifts, but would keep the early morning for their private exchanges, then Thran and Legolas would come down to Bard’s apartment around eleven to start the meal. Most of the prep work would happen tomorrow, Thursday, so that all they’d have to do on the actual day would be to put everything in the oven.

“So come down tomorrow before lunch, and we can do the prep,” Bard said. “The children and I make the prep into part of the celebration of Christmas Eve. We make the dessert, get the rolls in the pan ready for the oven, prep the veg, the potatoes au gratin, and so on. Everyone makes one dish, and I make everything that’s left. Two more sous chefs would be fun, and give Legolas a chance to ease into the mix.”

“I would like that,” Thran nodded. “Though you know I am not much of a cook. Perhaps Tilda will take pity on me and help.”

Bard chuckled. “It’s funny. You know a lot about good food, but you can’t cook.”

“I know how to drive a car, but not how a car works,” Thran pointed out. “You likely know how your truck works, I imagine, but I do not. But I will not always be ignorant of cooking. I enjoy when you show me.”

“So do I,” Bard agreed. “I liked when we puttered about for Thanksgiving.”

“I did as well. So what will we make tomorrow? Oh, you said potatoes au gratin. What is that?”

“It’s potatoes with milk and cheese with crumbs on top. The children like it with ham. Sigrid’s doing that this year. We’ll have the ham, of course. That just gets stuck in one of those cooking bags, so it doesn’t count as something someone does. Yeast rolls – that’s me. Tilda will do green beans. Bain’s doing dessert. Sigrid wanted pumpkin pie, so he decided he’d do that rather than the potatoes.”

“Legolas said something about clementines. He liked those, so we could bring a box if you would like them. And he said pie.”

“The children can’t get enough of the clementines. As for the pie, does Legolas know how to cook at all?”

Thran shook his head. “More than I do, but that does not say much.”

“Then maybe he’d like to help Bain with the pie. It’s easy, and it’d give him and Bain something to do together.”

“Perfect,” Thran agreed. “And what should I make?”
Bard’s eyes never left the view before them, but his arm around Thran’s waist tightened. “If you don’t make a thing, it won’t matter. You’ve already made me happier than I deserve.”

Thran’s throat tightened. “You deserve good things no less than anyone, lyubov moya. We both do.
So we will make each other happy without apology. But as to the Christmas dinner – how will it look to our children if I do not help with something?”

“Valid point. You can do the ham, then. That’s easy. Maybe chop some carrots. And we can tease each other when we’re kneading the bread dough.”

“Terribly romantic,” Thran tsked, smiling.

“It won’t be like Swan Lake,” Bard conceded.

“Ah, the welder knows Swan Lake!”

“I looked it up on the Internet. I’m trying to become educated.”

“The Internet will not tell you that most ballet corps hate Swan Lake. In Russia, it is danced in three acts and several scenes; in this country, four acts and several scenes, but the result is the same.
Beautiful, but at a price. The prince is onstage for all of them, and the corps also for most... nothing but aching feet by the end.”

“I read about the mess of dancers’ feet,” Bard winced. “I couldn’t do it.”

“That is the price of dancing en pointe for so many. The ballerinas. A few men do it, also, but I am not one of them. I am tall enough as it is, and the pressure on my feet would be devastating. It is hard even to manage four acts of Swan Lake as it is.”

“I can’t imagine. My steel-toed boots have good cushioning in them, but even with that, after I’ve been on my feet all day, I feel it, and I’m not leaping about carrying pretty ballerinas around.”

“You are likely on your feet during the day more than I am, doing heavier work.”

“We both do heavy work. Yours is cleaner and more elegant than mine, that’s all. They’re both a living.”

Bard angled them across the sports fields, off the path they’d been following around the park. He’d done so on their first circuit, too, but Thran hadn’t commented about it then. Now, however, he cast Bard a look.

“Why do we avoid that corner of the park, Bard?”

“We’d probably be okay today if we went on around, but that’s one of the gang turfs, so I tend to skirt it. Discretion being the better part of valor, as they say.”

Bard met his eyes. “Oh?”

“The two who accosted Irina and me. It was near that corner.”

“People stay away from that corner at night unless they want drugs.”

Thran shrugged. “We did not want drugs. Irina lives nearby. I offered to walk her home. Generally I am of a size that deters predators. It did not that day. Irina was not hurt, but badly frightened. She has since moved to a safer place.”

“You’re lucky it was just two of them.”

“We were lucky that two policemen arrived just as I hurt my ankle.”

“I’ll bet one of them was Mr. D.” At Thran’s inquiring expression, Bard explained. “Mr. D’s the local plainclothesman – a sergeant, but everyone calls him Mr. D. Quite a character. Short bald guy with an earring and more tats than a gang of bikers. Everyone knows who he is, and nobody messes with him. He looks after this park especially. Loves the kids. They love him, too, despite what he looks like. You’ll generally find him around when the kids have their rec council games.”

“He was one of the policemen,” Thran confirmed. “I was quite impressed at his command of several languages.”

“All of them profane,” Bard grinned.

“Very. I taught him suka blyad.”

“I bet he loved that,” Bard chortled.

“He thanked me. I do not think he knows how to smile.”

“It’s not part of his persona, but he’s got a good soul. He’s a Pagan, or something – not the biker gang; the religion – so he doesn’t celebrate Christmas. Every year, he’s here to watch over the children trying out their new bikes or sleds or whatever, making sure the gangs leave them alone. We always come out to play a little soccer after dinner, and we bring Mr. D a slice of pie, or a sandwich. It’s not Christmas without seeing Mr. D.”

“Then I hope we see him this Friday, so I may thank him for his timely appearance.”

“The news stories made it sound like you didn’t need any help.”

“Not with the two who attacked us. But I suspect that more would have arrived shortly if Mr. D. and the other officer had not arrived so quickly.”

“Probably.” Bard gave a look around, but the park was empty, so they headed back to the apartment building.

Once back inside, Bard stripped off his shirt as promised, and tossed it to Thran. As he got a clean one to put on, Thran held the shirt to his nose, breathing in.

“Yes. That is my saint. It will ease my sleep tonight.”

Bard gave a gentle tug to Thran’s braid. “As long as it doesn’t keep you awake.”

“I will not complain if it does.”

Bard took the braid in his hand to caress. “You need to get enough sleep, angel. Auditions coming up.”

“Having something to look forward to with you will do me more good than a few missed hours of sleep can upset.” Thran stroked Bard’s hair away from his face. “Now, I do not want to, but I must go. I want to be back upstairs before Legolas wakes. I do not want to have to explain why I am carrying a pair of my leggings and your shirt.”
Bard’s wince was amused as well as sympathetic. “I understand completely. I’ll see you tomorrow, then. Though I wish we could split supper tonight. I’ll miss you.”

“I will, too. But we will have most of tomorrow, and then Christmas Day. So the children will be used to us being together soon.”

“Not soon enough. So kiss me. It has to last me until tomorrow.”

It was a pleasure for Thran to enfold Bard in his arms, to feel his solid, powerful body in his arms, to feel powerful arms wrap him in solid comfort. He soaked up that warmth, comfort, and affection for long seconds, nuzzling his nose into Bard’s neck, savoring the tickle of Bard’s hair against his cheek. But eventually, they had to ease apart.

“I’m going to look at the school web sites I found,” Bard offered. “I’ll email anything interesting to you, if you’re going to be online today. No, I’ll text you to go look at your email if I find anything. Then you can do your barre, or go out with Legolas. We’ve got a while on that, but since I’m not going out to the house today, I thought I’d do that to keep us forging ahead.”

“I’ll look at anything you send me, plus I will look at the ones I found, too, as well as fencing and archery coaches. As you said, we will forge ahead.”

“Miss you already, angel.”

“And I you, my saint. I love you.”

“Love you, too.”

Thran slipped out of Bard’s apartment reluctantly, and climbed the stairs. He rolled his leggings and Bard’s shirt up as small as he could make them, and stuffed them under his coat, but he needn’t have bothered. Legolas’s door was still shut when he got into his apartment, so he shed his boots and coat, stashed Bard’s shirt in his room, and exchanged his jeans for the leggings. He made himself a cup of tea, and settled on the sofa with his computer.

It was hard to concentrate on so many jarring websites when he had tomorrow to think about.

* * *

It was barely eleven, and Bard was too antsy to stay in the apartment and look at school web sites. The schools were important, but they had nine months before the children would have to attend them. What they needed first was furniture for the house so they could at least spend weekends there. Bard put his boots on, got in the truck, and headed out to the house. If he stayed off the highway and took the back roads, there was a horde of small junk shops, antique stores, and consignment shops along the way. He stopped at the first several, not finding much beyond a battered fainting couch that would look perfect in the solarium. It was just the thing for his angel to relax on amid the plants. A small fountain would be nice, too, to add the sound of water, just what Thran needed to help him relax. He’d keep his eyes out for one.

He almost didn’t stop at a place that looked more closed than open, for there were no lights on that he could see, and no cars out front. But he’d found some good things here a time or two before, eccentric finds more than rare ones. He wasn’t interested in provenance, only character, so he figured it did no harm to stop. Almost right away he found bins of mismatched flatware, most of it sterling.
He picked out enough for twelve place settings, and even found some serving spoons and forks. The price was so little that he flipped the pieces over again, just to check that the maker’s marks were what he thought they were, but yes, they were sterling, even if badly tarnished, with a nick here and there. A little polish, not too much, and they’d gleam, but still have the patina of age that he liked so much.

Silverware, done.

Another table held beautiful old crystal. Nobody wanted such things anymore, or so he’d been told when he’d tried to sell his mother’s things after her death. Less than a hundred dollars for the lot was the best he’d managed, so it was still in the attic at the house, in boxes. He’d have to remember to get it down and wash it. It’d look good behind the glass-fronted cabinet doors in the butler’s pantry. He added a few etched glass bowls to his trove that were a close match to his mother’s things.

There were many tables of old china, but most of it was so ornate that it would upstage any food put on it, and none of it would blend with the pale green paint in the dining room. He’d be happier with plain white dishes, if he could find them.

He found a black cast iron teapot, likely Japanese, and five cups. They made him think of Thran, so he added those to his trove. He had to smother a smile about his angel playing the feral sultan this morning. Gods, that had been the most fun he’d had in years. Stripping that angel bare had been, too.

He just might explode waiting for the children to go back to school, when he’d have more than an hour at a time doing everything he and Thran could come up with to each other, with each other.

He was so busy trying to decide how he wanted to make love to Thran first that he almost missed a side room that held furniture rather than tables full of dishes and flatware. He ducked in as an afterthought, just because he liked to be thorough in his searching.

He couldn’t wait to thoroughly search Thran...

A small carved chest attracted his attention, but only because he appreciated beautiful things. It was impractical for his needs, a woman’s jewelry box with three drawers, with an inlaid design of butterflies on the top. Still, he ran a finger over the top, appreciating the skill that had gone into setting the mother-of-pearl into the rosewood so evenly. He moved on, his eyes falling on another piece of carved wood that unfortunately ended in a ragged break. It looked like a column of some kind, so he stopped to puzzle it out. Perhaps it was a piece of architecture salvage for a doorway. If there were two columns, he might be able to use them to frame the solarium doorway. But no, there weren’t two columns – there were four, and some sort of framework – was that a canopy?

His brain finally put all the pieces together – it was an ornate, carved frame for a daybed, vaguely Indian, or Indonesian, or something else equally exotic. It was old, for the wood had weathered to a silvery grey finish. It looked wider and longer than normal, and he wasn’t sure all the pieces were there. Still, he imagined it reassembled, the grey wood enhanced with a bit of silver gilt, dressed in silk, and Thran ensconced in the middle of it...

He looked around. No one else was perusing, so he kept going, seeing what else there was to be had. He found an offbeat blue table inlaid in shell, and an old battered Persian rug that had faded to a soft rose red. He found the owner drowsing in the back, told him what he wanted, and came to a good price for the lot.

“What’s the story about that carved lot of stuff in the side room?” Bard asked. “Against the wall?”

He had to show the daybed frame to the man before he recalled it.
“Oh, that. Indonesian, I think, but it’s a size no one wants, and it’s missing part of the canopy and bottom frame. Been here for years. You interested?”

“Dunno... maybe, if you give me a good price on it.”

They haggled a bit, but the lowest the man would go was higher than Bard wanted to pay for a lot of scrap.

Thran on that bed, in their bedroom, on silk sheets...

“We’ve got a deal,” Bard agreed. If the scraps were beyond repair, he could still use them to frame doors, or build a folly for the solarium.

It was a tight fit getting everything in his truck, but if he piled the flatware and glass bowls in the front seat, put part of the scraps of daybed in the back seat, and shifted his tools, he just managed to corral the biggest pieces of the frame in the bed with the rug and the inlaid table, albeit with the tailgate open and a lot of cordage to keep things in place. Once he got into the truck and headed down the road, he allowed himself a big smile. Thran would love the bed, if Bard could fit it all together.

He didn’t have much more room in his truck, but Bard stopped at two more places to see if they were worth revisiting. One was more sixties retro, which he’d never cared for. The other, however, was old and dusty, with another room piled high with dishes. He found a nearly complete set of white ones that looked like cabbage leaves. The color was what he preferred for showcasing food, and the leafy design was a nice organic fillip. He piled that in the front seat with the flatware, along with seven etched Russian tea glasses with silver metal frames.

It was getting late, so he headed straight for the house, piled the dishes in the kitchen, hauled the inlaid table and rug into the empty main room, and got the fainting couch into the solarium. Then he carted the pieces of the shattered bed frame up to the master bedroom. He managed to piece together most of the bottom; there was a piece missing from the footer, but he thought he could replace that. One of the canopy posts was cracked, and another one was snapped in two, but he jogged out to the barn for clamps. There was wood glue enough to see to both posts, so he daubed liberally and clamped everything in place. A piece from the canopy was also missing, but he’d figure out a way to replace it, too. The bed was an odd size for a daybed, more square than rectangular, but it looked long enough to fit Thran’s long body. In the center of the room, cleaned up and with that silver gilt he’d add, it would be spectacular.

Maybe not grey silk bedding, but a soft Rembrandt red for winter, and a cool peacock blue for summer...

Bard’s cock liked the thought of both.

He didn’t linger to speculate more. He needed to get home before Tilda’s after-school care program ended. There was just time to wash all the dishes and flatware he’d bought and stow them in the kitchen. He locked the house, got in his truck, and zoomed back to the city, a big smile on his face.

He couldn’t wait to tell Thran about it all.

* * *
Later that night, once the children were done with supper and they’d planned tomorrow’s cooking, Bard crawled into bed. Gods, his blanket still smelled like Thran – a bit of vanilla, a bit of coconut, and some rare oil. Likely shampoo rather than cologne, or maybe body wash; Thran didn’t seem the type to like cologne. He breathed in, savoring the scent of his angel, and listened to the quiet for a few seconds, imagining the coming day when he’d have more to comfort him than merely his angel’s scent on his blanket. He reached for his mobile and started to tap.

In bed yet?

Sadly, I am in bed alone

What’d you do today?

Thought about how well you tease me. You are evil

You like me that way

Mmmmm. I very much do

LOL. Don’t drool all over those beautiful grey silk sheets

I want to come inside you with you sprawled all over these beautiful grey silk sheets

Gods, for 2 cents I’ll be up there

You work cheap

I’d pay to work you over on those grey silk sheets until we’re both toast

I’d pay you to do it. But, alas... What did you do today? Schools?

Too keyed up after what an angel did to me this a.m. Went shopping.

What did you buy? House things?

Beautiful house things. Flatware, plates, tea glasses, inlaid table, Persian rug, fainting couch

OMG, sounds wonderful. Wished I could have been with you

Me, too. We’ll go back to some. Guess what the best part was?

Better than podstakannik and magic carpets?

I found the perfect bed. A wreck, in pieces, needs a lot of work. But it’s a temple

Tell me!!!

Sending you a pic

Bard found the picture he took of the frame partially assembled in their bedroom, typed, Indonesian? grey wood, carved posts, canopy and sent it.

OMG!!!

Will look wonderful trimmed in silver gilt. And you will look beautiful in it. Had to have it Stunning! Can’t wait to see it in person!

Odd size, will likely need custom mattress, bedding. Will see what I can do with it

A custom mattress is no trouble for such a wonder

Got 2 broken posts glued, clamped. Maybe put rest tgr when there next Make more rounds on Saturday?

That’s my plan. Hope u like plates. Flatware’s sterling but mismatched

More charming that way. I will love all

I can’t wait. This is magic

It is, lyubov moya. So happy

Me 2. Ought to go to sleep. Make tmw get here sooner

Will be hard to sleep if I think of our bed. I would think of how best to christen it!

How about we christen it many times?

And every room in the house, too

Think about how & where you want to do it first. I will, too

I have a very long list of how I want to do it

How horrible it’ll be to work through your list. I’ve got one, too

Delicious. Damn you, bastard saint! It will be hours before I can sleep now!

Sorry... not, lol

Enough. Let us try to sleep. I will see you ~11. Can we bring something for lunch?

I have a pot of chili on. It's turkey, so you can eat it without fear of beef fat

You look after me so well

U R my pleasure. REALLY my pleasure

Stop! Good night!

If you insist

I don’t want to. But I need to sleep as you say. I love you Love you, too, angel. Sleep well

You too. Bye

Bye

Bard plugged in his mobile to charge, smiling. Thran was as excited about the wrecked bed frame as he was, which made him feel good. The rest of his haul was good stuff, too, but what he thought about for the next few minutes was that bed frame repaired, refinished, gilded, assembled, cradling a mattress, and harboring an ethereal angel, one he couldn’t wait to desecrate.

He looked forward to the angel returning the favor.

* * *

It was a luxury to lie in bed longer than 6:00 a.m., an even bigger one not to work through making breakfasts and lunches for three children and himself. He snuggled deeper into his blanket to drift off for another hour or so, then got up long enough to get the crockpot of chili out of the fridge and plug it back in. Back to bed for another drowsy hour before finally getting up at just before eight. He padded to the bathroom to take care of necessities, then changed his tee shirt for a warmer Henley to make himself tea. He was just putting on a couple of eggs to soft boil when Tilda padded into the kitchen, Mr. Bun under her arm.

“Good morning, little doll.” Bard stooped to hug Tilda, who rubbed her eyes sleepily. “How are you and Mr. Bun?”

“Sleepy.” She blinked a little, then her eyes sharpened and she smiled. “It’s Christmas Eve today!”

“It is,” Bard confirmed, his arms on her shoulders. “What would you like for breakfast? I was about to make some soft-boiled eggs. Would that be good?”

She nodded. “But not too soft. I don’t like the runny part.”

“So hard-boiled, then. One egg or two?”

“Just one, please,” she nodded again. “And toast?”

“Butter or marmalade?”

“Marmalade, please.”

“Coming right up.”

Bard put an extra egg in the saucepan and set it on the stove to boil. Tilda sat at the table, content to hold Mr. Bun while the eggs cooked. Bard took his out early, then put bread in the toaster for them both while Tilda’s egg finished cooking. He put Tilda’s egg in a bowl and set it down in front of her, then the toast, and then joined her at the table to have his breakfast. They shared a companionable silence as they ate, then washed their few dishes. When Bard settled on the sofa with his tea, Tilda climbed into his lap with Mr. Bun and nestled close.

“You’re a snuggle bug this morning, little doll,” he murmured, putting his arms around his daughter.

“Still sleepy,” Tilda sighed comfortably, shutting her eyes and tucking Mr. Bun under her chin.

“No harm in that,” Bard agreed, pressing a kiss on the top of Tilda’s head. “Did Mr. Bun keep you awake?”

“Uh-uh,” she denied. “Excited about Christmas Eve.”

“What part?”
“Getting presents, of course. I think Bain’s getting me a real paint set.”

“We’ll see tomorrow morning, won’t we?”

Tilda hummed. “I like the food, too. I like making it with everyone.”

“I like that part, too. Even better than the presents.”

“Are Legolas and Thran coming?”

“They’ll be here this morning at eleven to help us cook. Legolas and Bain can make the pie. Thran will do the ham and help me with the rolls.”

“Mmm,” Tilda said, smiling. “Ham. And cheesy potatoes.”

Conversation lapsed, and they sat quietly for a few more moments. Eventually, Bard nudged Tilda.

“It’s nine-thirty, Til. I’ve got to get your brother and sister up to have breakfast and get dressed before Thran and Legolas come down. We’ll have chili for lunch.”

“Biscuits, too?” Tilda sat up to stretch.

“Biscuits, too. Cheesy ones. Or maybe garlic chive.”

“I like both.”

“Me, too. So you and Mr. Bun get yourselves dressed while I roust the rest of the troops.”

“Okay, Da.”

Neither Sigrid nor Bain were too happy to wake up, but the prospect of visitors and the Christmas dinner preparations dispensed with most of the moans and grumbles soon enough. In an hour, everyone had had breakfast, was dressed, and the apartment was tidied. They had just a few more minutes before their guests would arrive.

“So, we need Christmas music,” Bard reminded his children as he looked through the stack of CDs. “I vote for Charlie Brown.”

“I like that one, too,” Tilda agreed.

“The harp one?” Sigrid suggested. “I don’t know why, but it makes me think of Wales.”

“I like the Trans-Siberian Express,” Bain chimed in.

“That one’s good for later, after everyone’s awake,” Bard decided. “So Charlie Brown first, harp second, then the TSE after lunch.”

He put the CD in the old player he’d gotten for a couple of dollars at the thrift store, and soon the sounds of Vince Guaraldi played softly. The first track was only half over before a soft knock sounded at the door, and Bard let Thran and Legolas in.

“We are early, so I hope that is all right,” Thran said, his eyes warming when they met Bard’s. “We went to the market, and got back early.”
“Glad you are. Hope you two are ready to cook.”

“We brought you some clementines,” Legolas offered the box shyly. “I liked them a lot when I had them with you all.”

“Thanks,” Bard nodded. “Children, the fun has arrived.”

“Hey, Legolas!” Bain waved. “Do you want to help me make the pie? It’s pumpkin, and really easy. Or you can do the carrots.”

“Pie sounds like more fun than carrots,” Legolas agreed. “You say it’s easy?”

“Yeah, just the crust, which I know how to make, and the rest you just stir up in a bowl. You want to do that part?”

“Sure. Hi, Tilda. Hi, Sigrid.”

“Hi, Legolas. Come on in. We’re just starting, so you can help us get everything out.”

Legolas went into the kitchen with the children, so Bard risked a quick kiss. Thran met him halfway, and they had a good grin about it.

“So, what is a ballet dancer to do?”

Bard snickered. “I think we have a CD of the Nutcracker somewhere, if you want to try to dance on the living room carpet. Otherwise, you’ll have to make bread dough with me.”

“Ah, I have been promoted from potato slicer to bread dough maker. That is much more useful than to dance the Nutcracker on such a small stage.”

“Then come on.”

They joined the children in the kitchen, who were getting out vegetables, eggs, shortening, and other things, and sorting out who would work where. Tilda took her sack of green beans to the far side of the table to snap them into a bowl. Sigrid joined her to thinly slice her peeled potatoes and arrange them into a baking dish, then moved to the stove to make the cheese sauce. Bain was showing Legolas how to make piecrust, which they put in a pan, then they began to mix the filling. Thran took over Sigrid’s spot at the cutting board to slice carrots and ginger into another bowl, and Bard made sure everything moved smoothly, passing out needed ingredients or bowls or serving dishes as they were needed. Eventually, the boys’ pie went into the oven, Sigrid’s potatoes were ready for baking tomorrow, and the carrots and green beans were cut and stored in plastic bins. Once the boys went into the living room to play a video game, Bard and Thran started the bread.

Bard did the mixing, but he turned the kneading over to Thran, who’d never done it before.

“You just stick your hands in it and squish it together. That’s easier than trying to use a fork,” Bard advised, so Thran pushed up his sleeves and plunged his long fingers into the bowl. Once he had everything mixed, Bard had him dump the unfinished dough out on the counter in the middle of some flour, and then showed him how to slap it down on the counter, knead it into a roll.

“Keep doing that,” Bard explained. “See how it gets glossy? When it springs back when you poke it, you know it’s ready.”

Thran nodded. “Just so.” He slapped and kneaded some more, adding the quarter twist that Bard had showed him. “Very therapeutic.”
“I think so, too. While you knead, I’ll mix up the biscuits for lunch.” He raised his voice to carry into the living room. “Cheese biscuits, or garlic chive?”

“Cheese!” was Tilda’s vote, then Bain’s.

“Garlic chive,” said Sigrid.

“They both sound good,” Legolas said diplomatically, drawing Thran’s smile.

“Either,” was Thran’s choice.

“I like the garlic chive,” Bard said. “Only one thing to do with a tie vote. Make both.”

He divided the dough into two parts, mixing cheese in the first until it was ready, and plunked that on the baking pan, then mixing the garlic and chives into the second part. He patted the dough out as before, trading sly glances with Thran as they worked their doughs. He had Thran put his dough aside in a bowl to rise, then put his biscuits in the oven.

“Lunch in ten minutes, all. Let’s get the table cleaned off for the chili.”

By the time the biscuits were browned, the table was ready, and everyone crowded around the table.
It was a tight fit, but no one seemed to mind. The bowls of chili went around, then the plate of biscuits and butter crock, and everyone set to with appetite.

Bard sat across from Thran, but if he wasn’t beside his angel, he was better able to trade glances with him. The children sat on either side of them, chattering and laughing, even the quiet Legolas. For the first time in a long time, he dared to relax a little of his worry, wondering how he would care for them. Legolas seemed happy to be with them, and Thran was laughing as Sigrid practiced her French with Legolas. She was unabashed about her accent, but happy that she did well enough to be understood.

This was going to work. It was.

The lump in his throat was hard to swallow, but it was a happy lump, not a sad one.

To great applause, Bain and Legolas got the finished pumpkin pie out of the oven to cool on the counter. The latter seemed astonished that the soup he’d mixed up had turned into pie filling, touching it gingerly to confirm that it really had set. As the children set to cleaning up lunch, Bard and Thran got the bread dough into the baking pans, ready to go into the oven tomorrow. That was the last thing to be done today; the ham would wait to go in its cooking bag tomorrow morning.

Their work done, Bard expected Legolas to want to go back to his apartment, but to his surprise he seemed in no hurry to leave. Bard was happy to sit on the sofa with Thran as the children chose a film to watch, and the rest of the afternoon passed so gently that Bard kept pinching himself.

“What do you do?” Thran finally asked him after the film was over, when the boys had gone into Bain’s room to play a game, Sigrid went into the kitchen to make tea, and Tilda padded to her room for a book.

“Pinching myself,” Bard whispered back. “I can’t believe this is happening. We’re a family together.
Gods, Thran. We’re a family.”

A long, slender hand rubbed his thigh. “I cannot believe it, either. I am very happy for us all.”

“I keep waiting for the other shoe to drop.”
“What is this other shoe?”

“That everything’s going too well. That it’s too good. The calm before the storm. Something will happen to ruin it all.”

“Don’t worry, lyubov moya. All is well.”

Bard leaned his head on Thran’s shoulder for just a moment, before any of the children came back. “You’re right. It is. It is.”

“May it stay that way,” Thran whispered back.

“Yes.” He gave Thran’s leg a rub. “Merry Christmas Eve, fy nghariad.”

A quick kiss brushed on his hair. “To you, too.”

Bard smiled. It didn’t matter what present he got tomorrow. He’d already gotten all he’d wanted today.
Chapter 23

Chapter Summary

Chili is in the crock pot, and Christmas dinner is underway. With so many willing hands to help, how can an angel and a saint help but see that brighter days are coming?

Only Sigrid sees the trouble lurking at the end of this day, and only when it's too late to avoid it. How long a shadow will it cast?

Chapter Notes

I don't own any rights to "The Christmas Story," the film about Ralphie's lust for a Red Ryder BB gun. It's a great film!

I don't own rights to any of Marvel's X-Men, Wolverine, and Storm stuff, either. I'm just a fan, that's all.

Many Christmas Eves had passed since Thran had one as happy as this one. The warmth of Bard’s small apartment crowded with animated children, the busy ebb and flow of cooking, the smell of spices and cheese, sounds of soft Christmas music – the harp was especially nice – were comforting. The best part were Bard’s soft looks as he oversaw the industry, looks that radiated quiet happiness. His saint was most content when he cared for his family.

Thran couldn’t wait to see Bard restored enough to begin his art again. When that happened, Bard’s recovery would be complete.

Bard was not the only one to relish the day’s domestic tasks. Thran’s mother had died when he was Tilda’s age. While his father had been proud that his son had been enrolled in such a prestigious ballet academy, he was more comfortable with the monthly stipend he received for Thran’s contribution to the state than he was with a gay son. He had rarely asked Thran to come home to visit. He had died just before the train station bomber had claimed Vileria. Now that Thran considered it, outside of his returns to his parents’ home for their funerals, he had gone back to Latvia only six times. All of the visits had been awkward, as if between strangers, and Thran had always been glad when they were over. Even the train back to St. Petersburg seemed friendly compared to the silence of his parents’ home, broken only by the sound of a nearby factory klaxon and a quavering teakettle.

To watch Legolas and Bain confer over the mixing of pie filling, darting fingers into the bowl to taste when they thought no one watched them... Sigrid helping Tilda snap the cover on the plastic bin of beans... Bard putting a bowl to hand or offering a spoon or mopping up a spill without anyone noticing he did so... Bard’s hand on his as he showed Thran how to knead dough... these things were gifts.

Lunch was more comedic as the children bantered back and forth about their cooking efforts. Sigrid was brave enough to practice her French with Legolas, who had grown up speaking it, but she was good-natured about her American accent.

“At least you know what I’m saying, so it can’t be that bad,” she shrugged, unconcerned. “I heard about one college where you can live in a dormitory where nothing but a foreign language is spoken. I bet that’s the way to get better fast. Is that why your French is so good, Legolas – they spoke it in your school in Russia?”

“I learned in school in St. Petersburg, yes,” Legolas confirmed. “We learned English and French as well as Russian. I didn’t have to learn French, but it is the language used in fencing, so it was a help to know it. Father speaks it so well that we often speak it at home.”

“And how come you speak French so well, Thran?” Bain asked.

“The Vaganova Academy, where I went to school, was one of the first ballet academies in the country,” Thran explained. “The method of training came from French masters, so in the dance classes, instruction has always been in French. So in my educational classes, we learned French as well as Russian, and also English.”

“Wow,” Bain shook his head. “Just learning the French is hard enough for me!”

“Some of your English isn’t so good, either,” Sigrid snarked.

“Hey, I may not be the writer you are, Sig, but I do all right. I got an A on the part about Julius Caesar, didn’t I?”

“Oh, I liked that, too!” Legolas chimed in, eyes brightening. “We just did that this term. That and Moby Dick. I hated that part!”

“Ugh, I did, too,” Sigrid made a face. “Ahab was a nut, if you ask me, and not one I wanted to read about.”

“We’re going to read Macbeth next term,” Legolas said. “That one has witches and fighting, and sounds exciting.”

“I think I am, too,” Bain said. “It’s all about Scotland, which is sort of near Wales. They’re nothing alike, really, but I like that it’s sort of near someplace that my family once was.”

“I saw a picture of Wales in a book from the library,” Tilda offered. “It was all green.”

“That was Ireland,” Bain corrected, slathering his biscuit with butter.

“It was not,” Tilda protested. “Wales is green, too.”

“A lot of the world is green, Bain,” Bard said, when his son drew breath to protest. “Look at Hawaii. It’s very green there.”

“Yeah, that’s where they filmed all those dinosaur films!” Bain enthused. “Have you seen those, Legolas?”

And so it went all afternoon.

Thran thanked the gods for icy radiators, and for night supers who were generous enough to fix them.

When eventually Thran and Legolas took their leave, they were both sorry. They’d stayed long after supper, which was the rest of Bard’s huge pot of chili, more biscuits, and salad that Thran fetched from upstairs, so no one complained. They agreed to regroup at eleven tomorrow to put their dinner in the oven, and watch a film while waiting for the ham to cook.

“I will text you,” Thran whispered, as the children discussed what film to watch tomorrow. “Today has been perfect, lyubov moya. I love you.”

“It has. Love you, too, fy nghariad. See you tomorrow.”

“See you tomorrow. Bye, Tilda, Bain, Sigrid. Until tomorrow.”

“Yeah, bye, Legolas! Bye, Thran!” the children waved, and Legolas waved back with a smile. He preceded his father up the stairs to their apartment, which seemed empty and quiet after the liveliness they’d left behind. Thran closed the door behind them, and turned on a light.

“I hope you had a good time,” Thran ventured, as his son went to the window to look out.

Legolas turned to regard his father. “I had a great time. It was fun making the pie, and seeing everyone doing different things. Everything tasted so good, too. I was sorry to go.”

“So was I.” Thran carried his salad box into the kitchen to wash. “Would you like tea, synok?”

“That would taste good, Father. Thank you.”

Thran put on the kettle, washed out the salad box, and set it in the dish drainer to dry. Legolas set out the teapot and two cups, and looked through the cupboard for the fig bars he liked. He wolfed down a couple of the cookies before the kettle heated, drawing Thran’s smile.

“I’m sorry,” Legolas said, as he paused before engulfing a third cookie. “Would you like one?”

Thran shook his head. “Thank you, but no. I have eaten biscuits today, and butter, and tomorrow I will eat potatoes and bread and especially pie that my son helped to make. So tonight I leave the confections to you.”

“You did your barre and yoga.”

“I did. And I will do them tomorrow, too, and every day after that. In a week we will have another feast, and after that I must prepare for auditions, so it is best not to make too much work for myself between now and then. I would rather have a taste of your pie tomorrow than a fig cookie tonight. It smelled delightful while it cooked, didn’t it?”

“It did. At first, I thought Bain was having me on, telling me to mix up all this stuff in a bowl that looked like soup. But he wasn’t. That’s really how you make pumpkin pie. It was easy!”

Thran looked at his son. “Why would you think that Bain would trick you?”

Legolas shrugged. “That happens a lot at school. I know who does it, so I find other boys to talk to.”

Thran winced. “We will find a new school, Legolas. The more I hear about this one, the less I like it.”

“I stay out of most of it, Father. I do. It’s all right. I know what to look for, who looks like a friend but isn’t for long.”

“I hope you don’t think Bain and his sisters are like that.”
“I don’t...”

The teakettle was ready, so Thran poured the hot water into the teapot before he gave Legolas his full attention. “But you are not sure?”

Legolas shrugged. “I like them, Father, I do. Sigrid was brave to speak French even though her accent is terrible, even though she knows it’s terrible. At school, that would have gotten her royally dissed, but she didn’t care. And Bain was great about the pie, and showing me his soccer cards. He knows a lot. And Tilda is sweet. They were all nice to me.”

“So what are you not sure about?”

Legolas sighed, but met his father’s eyes. “I hope they weren’t nice because they wanted something.”

Thran blinked. “What would they want?”

A shrug. “At school, some boys want to say they know the fencing prodigy. Or the girls want to... well, I’m not sure what they want, but it’s weird.”

Thran laughed. “You are a handsome young man, of course, and your hair is likely a novelty that sets you apart. Bard’s children do not know you are a fencing prodigy, or an archery prodigy, for that matter, though if they did, they would not care. Bain is interested in many sports. He is a good soccer player, so he appreciates talking to someone who is just as fond of sport as he is, regardless of the sport. When he heard that you skated, he thought that the two of you might have fun skating together. As for Sigrid, I have heard from Bard that she is interested in a boy named Finn. Tilda is too young to be that sort of admirer. So I do not think they want anything from you, other than to be friendly. I have found them to be very kind, just as their Da is.”

Legolas nodded. “Thank you for telling me that, Father.”

His son was so polite, so unconcerned. How often had Thran presented that same face to the world when he had been in school? He, too, had learned that being different attracted the curious, the infatuated, and the jealous in enough quantities that people genuinely interested in friendship had been hard pressed to get through the throng. That his son had already learned to present that careful façade of neutral confidence concerned him. But before he could think of how to say so, Legolas had decided to shower and then play his solitary video games.

Before long, Thran followed him through the shower and into bed. He settled into his nest with his mobile.

I’m naked in bed and wish you were here in the same condition, he sent.

I wonder if Santa Claus would send me up there to give my angel the perfect Christmas present? Bard sent back.

I’d give you a present, too, lyubov moya. It would not include sleep

I wouldn’t want to sleep

Thank you for a wonderful day. I have not been so happy in a long time

Me, either. That was the best Christmas Eve in a long time

Yes
So go to sleep so we can have Christmas Day. Hope for another perfect day.

I will hope so. I will also hope for the day when we hope together rather than apart.

It’ll be here soon. The sooner we find bedframes for the children, the sooner we can spend the weekends there. I can’t wait!

Perhaps Saint Nicholas will be kind to a fellow saint and speed the time along.

If he does, I’ll thank him kindly. Barre and yoga tomorrow a.m.?

Of course.

Of course. Now imagine I’m kissing my beautiful angel goodnight. I’ll see you soon.

I send you a kiss, too. Until tomorrow, my saint.

Bye.

Bye.

Thran laid his mobile aside, settled into bed, and shut his eyes with a sigh. He was very tired of sleeping alone.

* * *

“It’s Christmas Day! Come on, Tilda! Come on, Sig! Christmas Day!”

Bard jolted awake. Once again, Bain was the one to herald the arrival of the holiday. For a lad who was generally so adamant about sleeping as late as possible, he was invariably the one to get up early on Christmas Day. Bard rubbed his eyes and groped for his mobile to read the time. Eh, not too terrible – it was just a little before eight. As he sat up on the edge of his bed, Bain leapt past his niche, heading for the living room sofa. That was where the Christmas gifts appeared magically once the children went to bed. None of them believed Santa Claus actually flew around the world to distribute presents, but they had the utmost faith that one of Santa’s elves made presents appear on their battered sofa.

Bard grinned. Being one of the millions of Santa’s elves was a job he enjoyed. All the ramen he’d eaten was worth it, as long as he had a few things to put on that sofa for Christmas Day.

“Come on, you two!” Bain ran back to the girls’ room. “Come on, come on, come on! It’s Christmas Day!”

Bain ran back to the living room, hair flying. He was still in his sleep tee and carried his fleece pants, but at least he had socks and underpants on. Tilda and Mr. Bun were close on his heels; her sleep-tousled braids stuck out at funny angles, and she tried to pull her shirt down with one hand while holding Mr. Bun with the other. Bard stood up to stretch, then smothered laughter when Sigrid paced past, her expression disgusted.

“Too early for you, Sig?” Bard joked, pressing a kiss on his daughter’s head.

“I don’t want to see a teenaged boy’s purple underpants coming out of a dryer, much less on my brother’s body when he bursts into my room and wakes me out of a sound sleep to leap around like an electrocuted frog. I’m scarred for life.”

Bard laughed. “At least he had the purple underpants on, Sig.”

“Ew! Da!” Sigrid shuddered. “That is so gross!”

“Come on, come on, come on!” Bain badgered, running back to pull Bard forward. “Come on! Or I’m opening mine without you!”

“You can wait, Bain,” Bard said mildly, as Sigrid disappeared into the bathroom and closed the door with an emphatic thunk. “Give your sister a minute or two to recover from your purple underpants, and we’ll be right there.”

“Hey, what’s wrong with my underpants? They’re on, aren’t they? Come on!”

“Hang on. Let everyone cycle through the bathroom first. Til? Did you stop in the bathroom?”

“Yes, Da.”

“All right. When Sig comes out, let me go in, and then we’ll do presents.”

Bain rolled his eyes and threw himself into Bard’s chair with a loud exhale. “Don’t take all day!”

“The louder you complain, the slower I go,” Bard warned, as Sigrid reappeared. With Bain’s loud complaint in his ears, Bard took his turn to tend to necessities and splash some water over his face. He traded his sleep tee for a long-sleeved shirt, then prepared to face the frenzy in the living room.

There weren’t a lot of presents on the sofa, but each of the children had more than one – one from Bard, and usually one from each sibling. There was also the Elf Box - a wrapping paper-covered shoebox - that sat empty until Christmas Eve, when supposedly Santa’s elf filled it with sweets. This year, Bard had filled it with candied orange slices, chocolate peppermints, nuts in the shell, and a small Italian panettone, a sweet bread studded with fruit.

“May I open the panettone, Da?” Tilda asked, reaching for the small box.

“Do the honors, little doll. I’ll get the bread knife.”

The small loaf was duly sliced into four pieces, and everyone had one as they pounced on their gifts.

Sigrid got the blue sweater she’d liked so much at the mall from Bard, a bag of pistachios from Bain, and a blue beaded necklace that matched the sweater from Tilda.

Bain got new soccer cleats from Bard, a two-pound box of chocolate caramels from Sigrid, and three packets of soccer cards from Tilda.

Tilda got a beautiful illustrated storybook from Bard – a book he never would have been able to afford new – and a big box of good-quality art supplies from Sigrid and Bain.

There was also a package of second-hand books for the family, which was one of Bard’s favorite Christmas traditions. In the same shop where he’d found Tilda’s storybook, he’d picked up Horatio Hornblower, Twenty Years After, and The Vicomte de Bragelonne – the latter two were sequels to The Three Musketeers – for Bain and Sigrid. He’d also found a nice copy of Wind in the Willows for Tilda.

“Open yours, Da,” Sigrid invited, holding the largest remaining gift out to Bard. “This is from all three of us.”

The children had combined their money to buy him a shirt – a good one. It was thick, blue plaid flannel, and if it came from the thrift store, it was so nearly new that Bard couldn’t tell. It was the nicest one he owned.

“This is wonderful,” Bard marveled, shaking out the folds and holding it up to admire it. “Feel how soft it is. And my favorite color, too. You all picked a winner. Thank you!”

He unbuttoned the shirt to put it on over his Henley. “It fits just fine, too. It’s just the thing to wear today. It’s a Christmas shirt.”

“I still say we should have gotten Da the Wolverine underpants,” Bain shook his head, but he was laughing.

“I like my new shirt much better,” Bard assured his children. “Wait, there are two more presents on the sofa. Whose are those?”

“They’re for Thran and Legolas,” Tilda said, smiling.

“They’re nothing big, Da,” Sigrid assured Bard. “Just something fun.”

“Fun, as in embarrassing?” Bard gave Bain the eye. “If they’re underpants, the answer is no.”

“They’re not underpants, and they’re not embarrassing,” Sigrid assured her father, also giving Bain the eye. Sigrid’s brother sighed, clearly unimpressed with his family’s sensibilities. “It was Tilda’s idea, and it was a really good idea.”

“Well, then I won’t worry, if Tilda thought of it,” Bard said, giving his youngest child a smile. “Did you think of something nice, then?”

She nodded vigorously. “But you can’t know what it is yet, so you don’t ruin the surprise.”

“Good enough. All right, breakfast. Big dinner coming, so what would you like to follow your panettone?”

They settled on eggs with cheese, and toast, so Bard set to. Tilda picked up the scattered wrapping paper, and Bain set the table, and Sigrid got the toaster and bread ready. They had a leisurely breakfast to the tune of their Christmas CDs, cleaned up, and settled to their presents. Bard made tea and picked up Horatio Hornblower. It’d been years since he’d read that rousing seafaring tale –

A knock on the door broke the quiet air. Their guests were here – no, not guests, Bard corrected silently. The other half of their family was here.

“Merry Christmas, Thran! Merry Christmas, Legolas! Come on in! What did you get for Christmas?” Bain greeted.

“Merry Christmas, everyone!” Legolas heralded, waving. “Father gave me a new bow, Bain. I can’t wait to try it out.”

“Sweet! I’d love to see it,” Bain breathed. “I got new soccer cleats, caramels, and new soccer cards.”

“And what did you get for Christmas, Thran?” Bard asked with a crooked smile. From the answering smile he received, Thran was just as eager for the present Bard wanted to give him as Bard was to bestow it.
“Much joy, and an ironic tee shirt.” As Thran slipped off his hiking boots and added his coat to those on hooks by the door, he gave Legolas a mock glower, provoking a snicker from his son. This morning, he wore a cushy flannel shirt in a soft red – yes, Thran would look stunning on Rembrandt red sheets – atop a grey tee shirt. He unbuttoned the flannel shirt the rest of the way – gods, he couldn’t think about what was under that shirt, not with the children around – and held it open to reveal Wolverine leaping with claws at full extension. “Apparently synok thinks that my exploits with the knives of muggers deserve such a shirt.”

“It suits you,” Bard laughed. “At least he didn’t give you a Storm tee shirt instead.”

Thran’s expression was blank. “What is this Storm?”

“She’s another one of the X-Men. The one with long, white hair.”

Thran’s glare turned glacial as he turned it on Legolas, who snickered, then pretended to cringe. “I’ll remember that one for your birthday, Father.”

“No, you will not,” Thran growled, but a smile pricked at the sides of his mouth. “I would not want to embarrass this Storm because I certainly have much nicer hair than she does.”

That provoked much laughter, and Bard beckoned to Thran. “Come on, Wolverine. It’s time to put the ham in the oven.”

“No, not yet!” Tilda piped. “Thran and Legolas have to open their presents first!”

“We brought you a present, too,” Legolas held out a rectangular box to Sigrid.

“A small gift only,” Thran demurred, as they all found seats on the sofa, the chair, or the floor nearby. “But we hope you enjoy it as much as we do.”

“It’s pastry,” Sigrid discovered, reading the box. “Alexandertorte.”

“It’s a popular pastry in Latvia, where Father was born,” Legolas explained. “It’s thin layers of cake with jam and fruit in between, and then sweet icing on top. I like it a lot.”

“So much that I had to get Legolas his own pastry, otherwise I would have not been able to keep him from eating this one,” Thran teased his son.

“They’re good, Father!” Legolas protested, as if that explained everything.

“Now you open your presents,” Tilda prompted eagerly. She handed one of the two small packages to Thran, and the other to Legolas.

“Whatever those are, they’re Tilda’s idea,” Bard held up his hands, when Thran shot him a look.

“Then let us see what Tilda’s idea is, Legolas,” Thran prompted, slipping off the ribbon and opening the paper. His face spasmed in laughter, and he held up a pair of brightly striped socks – electric purple, peacock blue, and vibrant green alternating with black. Legolas had a similar pair in green, yellow, and orange. “It is a very good idea, Tilda. I do not have any socks this color. I like them very much.”

“Yes, thank you,” Legolas grinned. “They’re nice and soft. They’ll keep my feet warm when I practice my archery outside.”

Tilda’s smile was gleeful. “I told you he’d like them! I told you!”
Bain rolled his eyes; apparently he’d been less sanguine. Sigrid’s expression was suppressed laughter, so clearly she’d been in the pro-socks camp. Bard chuckled at the discussion that must have taken place in the shop where they’d bought the socks. Thran offered his hand to Tilda, who gave him hers willingly. He kissed the back of it.

“I congratulate you, ma chère Tilda, on choosing exactly the present I needed. Now I will not have to wear plain black socks when I visit you.”

“You are very welcome,” Tilda said with great dignity, but then she smiled widely. “I’m glad you like them. Maybe next time I’ll get you dotted ones.”

“I have no dotted ones, so I am sure you will choose good ones,” Thran nodded. “Now, let me help your Da with the ham so that our dinner will be ready soon.”

“It won’t take us long,” Bard told him. “Children, you decide what film we’re going to see.”

“Thank you for being kind,” Bard whispered, when he and Thran were in the kitchen. “She was really excited.”

“They are nice socks, and playful. They will be a good reminder to smile when I see them.” He brushed a kiss on Bard’s cheek. “She is very sweet, just as her Da is.”

Bard heard a noise behind them. There stood Sigrid, arms akimbo, shaking her head at them. Grinning, he winked at his daughter, then deliberately kissed Thran’s cheek. Sigrid threw up her hands and retreated, drawing Bard’s laughter as well as Thran’s.

How good was it to tease his daughter? Almost as good as it was to kiss Thran without embarrassment.

* * *

Thran smothered a snicker as Sigrid retreated in the face of her father’s unabashed delight when he bestowed a kiss on Thran’s cheek. Bard was as amused, but he quickly brought them back to task.

“The ham,” Bard exhaled, and handed Thran a small box. “One of those. I’ll get the ham.”

Together they got the ham packaged in its cooking bag, and then into the oven. They had two hours before it would be ready, then they’d see to the potatoes and vegetables. The children had chosen a film that Legolas had not seen about a boy who wanted a BB gun for Christmas. As Thran had not seen this film, either, he had a good laugh over the antics that poor Ralphie endured. They managed to fit Thran and Bard on the old sofa, with Bain in Bard’s chair, Legolas beside Thran, Sigrid beside Bard, and Tilda on Bard’s lap. It was a tight fit, but to be so close to lyubov yego was no hardship. When the oven timer dinged, Bard got up to wrangle the ham out of the oven, the potatoes and rolls in, and the vegetables on the stove. That left Thran alone with four children, which was a distinctly novel experience.

This was what it was like to be in a family.

Ralphie’s problems solved, everyone sat down to the dinner they had all worked to make. Because they’d already shared two meals together, this one was relaxed, without so much excitement at the novelty of guests. Bard was right. The children were getting used to each other. The only thing that kept Thran from relaxing completely was the apprehension Legolas had revealed last night. Still, continued visits would ease that better than anything he could say to his son.

As usual, Bard’s cooking had produced a hearty, tasty meal that everyone enjoyed. Thran made a point of having a full slice of the pie that his son had made, which pleased Legolas. Thran refused to worry that a slice of pie, a helping of creamed potatoes, and a buttered roll would instantly ruin his body – he’d gotten up half an hour earlier this morning to spend longer at the barre to compensate. The pie was delicious with spices, complemented nicely with similarly spiced hot tea. When all declared themselves stuffed, he and Legolas pitched in with the rest to clean up the remains of the meal.

“Now soccer!” Bain clamored, his new soccer cleats in his hands. “Soccer, Da!”

“In a minute, Bain.” Bard was still in the kitchen, sandwiching a thick slice of ham inside a roll and slathering it with mustard. “I’m just making Mr. D’s sandwich and wrapping up the last piece of pie for him.”

“Here are the bags.” Sigrid passed her father a plastic food bag to hold the sandwich, then another for the pie. “I’m putting one of the peppermints in there, too.”

“Mr. D likes peppermints,” Tilda handed the candy to her sister.

“I know he does,” Sigrid agreed. “Even if he doesn’t smile, I know when he likes something.”

“All done.” Bard hustled to clean the knife he’d used on the sandwich. “All right, Bain. We’re ready. You’re going to try your new cleats?”

“Course I am! Where are the soccer balls?”

“I’ve got them,” Sigrid said, holding up the net bag holding the two balls.

“I’ve got the sandwich,” Tilda said. “And Da has the pie.”

“Boots on, then,” Bard shooed his children. “Coats, one and all.”

They trooped outside and headed to the park. It was only three o’clock, but the layer of high, pearly clouds made it seem later. As the children walked ahead of them, Thran fell into step with Bard.

“Thank you for a most excellent meal, lyubov moya. And a perfect day.”

“Everyone helped with the meal, fy nghariad. That’s what makes the day so good – because it’s got something of everyone in it.”

“True,” Thran conceded. “But I see who orchestrates it all to be so good. You are the choreographer.”

Bard shrugged, but his smile was pleased. “Whatever works. Whatever makes us happy.”

“I am very happy. Each day seems to bring a little more.”

“It does.” Bard thrust his hands in his pockets and looked up at the sky. “It would make me very happy to hold you right now, but since we’ve got only Sigrid on board with that, you’ll have to imagine me doing it.”
Thran’s laugh was quiet, but lecherous. “I can imagine much more than that, dear saint. None of what I imagine is saintly, or angelic.”

“Guess I’d better get my ass around to fixing that bed frame, then.”

“If you cannot, I can offer you several alternative positions for your ass, all close to mine.”

Bard snickered. “We are terrible.”

“We will be worse in bed. I look forward to it.”

“Right now, we’d better haul our asses to the park. The children are leaving us behind.”

Thran lengthened his stride. “Then let us give chase.”

* * *

Sigrid was almost as eager to reach the park as Bain was. Soccer didn’t hold the same fascination for her as it did for her brother. But it was an inviolate part of the High Ritual that was the Bowmans’ Christmas Day.

Every year, no matter what, that ritual held without fail. The day before, they worked together to prepare Christmas dinner. The day of began with presents on the sofa, maybe not many, but some, then progressed to a film, and after that soccer in the park no matter rain, snow, or sun. Afterwards would be a supper of leftovers, and hot cocoa. The next day or so, they'd make soup from the last of the ham or turkey, and make a pilgrimage to the house.

That inviolate High Ritual became even more precious once Sigrid realized how much work Da put into making it happen without it seeming like he did anything at all. When she figured out that all the extra overtime, the ramen he claimed to like, and long, sleepless hours acting as night super were what made the High Ritual possible, she’d cried. Then she’d worried when the strain increased, and whether she should tell him not to work so hard. Then he caught her sneaking her tutoring money into the household change jar, and made her take it back. So she’d said that she thought she was too old for Christmas, and he didn’t have to get her a gift.

He’d smiled back and said that was sweet of her, but that he liked making a nice dinner and giving her a gift too much to stop.

So each year Sigrid made the most of the High Ritual, because Da worked hard to make it so, and he liked to see her and Bain and Tilda enjoy it. So what if soccer was more Bain’s joy than hers? It was her joy to see Da happy.

This year, Thran and Legolas were with them, and her Da had never been so happy, because he was in love with Thran Oropherson, ballet dancer extraordinaire. It was soooo obvious, Da and Thran mooning over each other, sneaking kisses, whispering to each other, and looking like they couldn’t wait to hold hands on the street. How did Bain and Tilda manage to be so oblivious? She wasn’t sure that Legolas was as oblivious, but he was so private, nice enough, but content to stay hidden behind his mask. Maybe he was shy, or maybe it was hard for him to be easy around new people. He unbent a little when she tried out her French on him. Her accent was atrocious – Mme. LeClaire had all but given up on it – but she understood the grammar reasonably well, and her vocabulary was improving. Legolas spoke beautifully, and was nice enough not to tell her what she already knew about her pronunciation, and seemed to loosen up when she laughed at her mistakes.

She wanted to like Legolas, because she wanted Legolas’s father to keep making Da so happy. How much money had he given Da to fix up the house so they could move there? Would he come with them? She hoped so.

The boys had run ahead of her and Tilda, looking for Mr. D. They found the bald policemen near the swings, lounging against the heavy iron framework. He was outfitted in his usual well-worn leather jacket, blue jeans, and shit-kicker motorcycle boots. A small gold ring gleamed in one earlobe, and his scarf didn’t quite cover the top edge of one of the tattoos at his neck. He was covered with them, as was obvious during the summer when he patrolled in just a tee shirt.

“Look, Til,” Sigrid pointed. “Bain and Legolas have found Mr. D.”

“I’ve got his sandwich,” the little girl grinned. “Come on!”

Sigrid followed Tilda more slowly, for she had the netted balls over her shoulder. By the time she reached the other children with Mr. D, he’d already scarf ed down half of his sandwich.

“Merry Christmas, Mr. D,” Sigrid waved. “Da’s got your pie. He’s coming along in a minute.”

“Thankee, lass,” the short, stocky man said in a thick Scottish accent. “Merry Saturnalia to ye. Here to play a bit of soccer, as usual?”

“As usual,” Sigrid smiled. “It wouldn’t be Christmas without it.”

“Mr. D has a new tattoo,” Tilda told her sister. “It’s a family crest on his arm.”

“Aye, the McTavish sigil,” he said, chewing. He pointed to the inside of his left arm. “Right here. I’ll show ye come spring, lassie. Too cold today. Ah. Hullo to ye, Bard. Merry Saturnalia. And ye be Mr. Oropherson, aye?”

Thran held out his hand. “Call me Thran. I hoped to see you today to thank you for your help a few weeks ago.”

“Ach, laddie, ye barely needed me. Two down and one with his own knife – nicely done, I call that. And this be yer son, aye?”

“I’m Legolas,” Thran’s son said quietly, offering his hand. “It’s nice to meet you.”

Mr. D whuffed. “Glad to meet ye, too, laddie. Though there are some who don’t agree with ye, but they’re not worth thinking about.”

“Brought you some pie,” Bard handed over the small bag. “Hope you’ve had a quiet day of it today from those who aren’t worth thinking about.”

“Not bad, not bad,” Mr. D nodded, opening the baggie and engulfing the pie in two bites. “Nicely done with the pie, as yer usual. Weather’s kept most people in, but a few hardy souls have ventured out. None of the troublemakers so far. Never doubted ye and yers wouldn’t make it out. Hardy souls, ye are.”

“We’d never miss our Christmas Day soccer,” Sigrid said firmly. “Or seeing you, either, Mr. D.”

“Then off with ye, lass, and yer sister and brothers, and right quick with ye, or I’ll be tempted to make a right fool out of myself with ye. Get ye along, then.”
“Bye, Mr. D,” Tilda waved. “See you later!”

Sigrid waved, and followed Bain and Legolas past the swings and jungle gym to the playing field. She let the balls fall out of the net, and sent one careening off after Bain and Legolas, and the other towards Tilda. They quickly spread out in a big square to send the balls flying back and forth. Legolas was a good runner, and easily intercepted the balls Sigrid sent his way. Bain was the better player, practicing a few knee ups and headshots as they came to him. Tilda might be smaller than her three playmates, but she was quick and had a good command of kicking, usually directing the ball where she wanted it to go.

Da and Thran remained behind to talk to Mr. D, but were still within earshot. After a few minutes, Mr. D waved goodbye and continued his patrol around the park, leaving Da and Thran to talk among themselves. Probably making googly eyes at each other and whispering like the love-struck couple they were. She fielded the ball that Tilda had sent her way and gave it a hearty boot, sending it past both Bain and Legolas. Uh-oh – they were drifting towards the druggie stop, the nasty part of the park where the addicts collected, not that most of them gave anyone any trouble. It was the thugs who supplied the addicts who were the problem. She waved at Bain, signaling him to head back this way, but her brother didn’t see. He and Legolas were in a full-throttle kicking frenzy, sending the ball back and forth in a blur.

Sigrid caught up to her sister. “Hang on, Til. We need to get the boys to come back this way. They’re getting too near the druggie stop.”

Tilda sobered instantly, coming to stand close to Sigrid. “I don’t see anyone there. Do you?”

“Not yet, but it’d be better if we played farther away. I’m going to tell them to move back.”

She waved at Bain again, without success, so she yelled his name. Ah, she had his attention now. She pointed behind him, then beckoned him back towards her. He waved, telling her that he understood, and trotted towards her.

Legolas, however, didn’t know about the druggie stop, and thought Bain was still playing. He kicked the ball past Bain - well past, and far closer to the druggie stop than Sigrid liked. She grabbed Tilda’s hand and hurried forward.

“Bain! Get Legolas! Wait for Da!”

But Legolas had already trotted after the ball.

Three figures sitting at a battered picnic table watched the ball roll near with Legolas coming after it. As they got up, Sigrid recognized one of them, and swore under her breath. Tilda stopped cold.

Tilda turned and ran as fast as she could.

Sigrid wanted to run away, too. But instead, she ran after Bain and Legolas.
Chapter 24

Chapter Summary

The storm is swift, savage, and leaves wreckage in its wake. How will an angel, a saint, and their cherubs fare?

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:
sukin syns = sons of bitches (Russian) slava bogam = thank the gods (Russian)

Legolas skidded to a stop as soon as he spotted the three who had Bain’s soccer ball. The one in the middle had his foot on the ball, his arms crossed over his chest and a glower on his face. The two on either side of him looked no less intimidating, hands at their sides, but twitching, as if wishing for a knife, or worse. Maybe they were a year or two older than he was, if that, but there was a feral hardness to their faces and a skittish, jumpy tension in their bodies that made them seem much older. Each one of them wore a blue bandana around his forehead.

Even he knew gang members when he saw them.

He’d pointed to the ball before he thought. Damn it, that was stupid – worse, he’d made eye contact with them. He should’ve just turned tail and run, then bought Bain a new soccer ball rather than risk any of them getting hurt. But the boy in the middle rolled the ball under his foot.

“What, you want your ball back, Blondie? Pretty little Blondie wants his ball back? C’mon, we can be nice. You come get it, and we’ll show you how nice we are.”

“Lance? Lance Dunmont!” That was Sigrid, her voice high and strained. He could just place her out of the corner of his eye, her face tight, her hands twisting the net bag that had held the soccer balls. Bain was on his other side, standing his ground, but clutching the other soccer ball looking scared. “I know that’s you, Lance. Just kick the ball back, and we’ll clear out. Come on.”

“’Lo, Sigrid Bowman,” Lance drawled, rolling the ball under his foot. “You know the rules, doncha? This is Crip turf.”

“Don’t be ridiculous,” Sigrid snapped. “You and Manny and Jinks aren’t any more a Crips set than I am. You just want to look tough. Just give us the ball and we’ll leave you to your crummy turf. Just drop it.”

“That’s where you’re wrong, smartass Sigrid,” Manny snarled. “We’re a real set now – running for Angelo. Keeping his turf clear for business. Your friend Blondie here crossed the line. We can’t have that. Those nice, green shoes of his will look real good as a marker for us on the power lines.”
Manny and Jinks started towards Legolas, who backed away in response.

* * *

Tilda flew away from Sigrid, her heart pounding so loudly that it was all she heard. Da – where was Da? There, ahead of her, smiling and laughing with Thran, not looking at her, just laughing –

“Da! Da!” she gulped, hardly able to speak. “Da! Help!”

Da was beside her, stooping beside her. “What’s wrong Tilda? Is someone hurt?”

“Legolas kicked the ball into the druggie stop and Lance Dunmont was there and they took the ball and Sigrid told me to get you –”

“Oh, gods!” Da grabbed Tilda hard, his eyes searching the field frantically.

“What is it?” Thran stooped beside them, his voice higher than usual.

“Lance’s a wanna-be thug. Does some running for the local heroin dealer. Til, Til, Mr. D’s by the swings. Run straight there and tell him to run to the druggie stop. Can you do that, little doll?”

She nodded. Bard thrust his apartment key in her hand.

“Run hard, tell Mr. D, then you go straight home. Stay in the apartment. Don’t come out.”

“Da –”

“Go, Tilda. Go!”

Da and Thran raced towards the druggie stop, so Tilda turned heels and ran for the swings. Halfway there, she spotted Mr. D. She screamed his name, over and over. He ran to her quickly.

“The druggie stop!” she gasped. “Lance Dunmont and two more – going to hurt Legolas and Bain! Hurry!”

Mr. D ran, already calling for backup on his police monitor, leaving Tilda to clutch the apartment key.

She started to sob.

* * *

“Oh, for gods’ sakes, Lance!” Sigrid snapped. “Jacques doesn’t know it’s anybody’s turf! He’s just a guest, here for the day! He doesn’t speak English very well, so he doesn’t know what you’re telling him! Just leave him alone! Frère Jacques, le gendarme arrive, tu comprends? Marche à reculons vers moi.”

Legolas didn’t laugh at Sigrid’s mention of the old song, Frère Jacques. The important part was the rest – the policeman’s coming, walk backwards towards me. He tried to look calm, not confused or scared. But Lance’s two companions leaped forward, and he found himself on the ground with both boys on top of him. Before he could get a grip on either, one grabbed a handful of his hair and yanked hard. The second sat on his chest and struggled to pin his arms over his head. The third one was at his feet, wrestling off one of his shoes no matter how hard he kicked.

“Stop it, Lance! Stop it!” Sigrid shrieked. “Or I’ll scream so loud that Mr. D will beat your ass into pulp!”

“You open your mouth, ho, and I’ll slap it into the Bronx!” Lance snarled.

“What, you’re going to stop me, ball boy?” Lance taunted, yanking Legolas’s shoe free. “Little Blondie girl’s gonna stop me? Your fucking sister’s going to stop me?”

Manny fielded Bain’s soccer ball right in the face, knocking him off Legolas. As he fell onto the grass, Sigrid ran forward to slap the soccer ball net at Lance’s face and smacked him hard enough to earn her a curse. Legolas heaved and kicked, unseating Jinks, then grabbed his shoe, rolled away from the trio, and scrambled to his feet. He had a disjointed view of Sigrid winging the ball net around her head, then flicking it over and over at Lance, who fought to grab the net. Bain had plowed into Jinks, the smallest of the three, punching and grabbing, trying to keep him away from Legolas. That left Legolas with Manny, who put his head down and charged at him. Legolas dodged him easily, but Manny didn’t circle around for another shot at him; he ran back towards the picnic bench where the trio had sat earlier.

“Manny’s going for help, Sig!” Bain called to his sister. “Back off, back off!” Bain grabbed Legolas’s arm, pulling him after him. “Come on, Legolas, before Manny gets back!”

Lance finally landed a hand on the ball net and jerked hard, pulling Sigrid forward, grabbing her around the waist.

“Fuck off, lowlife!” she snarled, stamping her foot full force on Lance’s instep. He howled, and Bain and Legolas jumped forward to pull her away. “Let’s go, let’s go!” she shrieked.

Manny and a pair of glowering strangers blocked their path. Jinks and Lance regrouped at their backs, and the five spread out in a circle around them to trap them in the middle.

“Face out!” Legolas told Sigrid and Bain, and they jostled to do that. Beside him, Sigrid put on a brave face, even laughing.

“You bastards are in so much trouble,” she taunted. “Be smart, Lance. Back off before you get your asses handed to you on a platter!”

“Who’ll do it, bitch? You? The three of you?”

“That’s right, cumrag,” Sigrid shot back. “We will. We’re the Three Musketeers! And we’ve got cavalry. Better run before it gets here, or we’ll stomp you like maggots! Nos pères sont ici!”

Our fathers are here! Legolas translated, then burst into a grin. Yes, Bard and Father raced towards them. Bard jerked Manny around by the back of his jacket and tumbled him into the grass. Father stood between Manny and the rest to keep him from rejoining them, and Bard pushed Jinks out of the ring.

“Everybody calm down,” Bard panted, holding his hands out. “The children didn’t know they were so near your turf, Angelo. They were playing soccer on Christmas Day, that’s all. We’ll get them out of here, and leave the place to you.”

The new arrivals ignored Bard. One of them stared at Father. “You. White hair.”

When Father favored Angelo with an unblinking stare, Legolas gulped. That was the glare reserved for only the most loathsome of ballet critics, and even though Angelo was bulkier than his father, he couldn’t compete for menace with the Prince of Ice.

“You’re the one who put Carson and Rossi in hospital.”

“Bain, Sig, Legolas, marchez vers moi,” Father murmured quietly. Walk towards me.

Legolas groped for Sigrid’s hand and Bain’s, and edged them towards Father.

“They don’t move,” Angelo snarled.

“Stand still.”

“Angelo, they’re children,” Bard urged. “They’re not cutting into your business, not crossing your turf. Just let it drop.”

Angelo pulled a knife. That was stupid – all it did was deepen the menace coiled in Father’s body.

“Ah. I believe that is my cue to ask you not to threaten our children,” Father said. His face was even more ghostly than his hair, his voice had dropped an octave, and his glare should have melted Angelo where he stood. “We will leave, and not bother you, or you will regret it.”

Angelo smiled, and took a step towards Father, who was poised as precisely as he would be on the stage, smiling the most horrible grimace Legolas had ever seen. Gods, did he think this was a game?

Sigrid’s grip on his hand grew excruciating. Gendarme D est derrière le connard, she hissed. Mr. D is behind the asshole.

“You hurt two of my boys, white hair. Eye for an eye.”

“Sig, Bain, Legs, to me!” Bard shouted.

The three of them moved as one, swinging and kicking and punching at Lance and Jinks, charging away from Angelo and Thran as they squared off. Mr. D hurtled into the mix like he was still a star rugby player, and he and Bard clotheslined the other adult beside Angelo and thwacked him into the grass with a sickening crack.

One down.

Legolas put a shoulder into Lance’s gut before he could get out of the way. Sigrid flung the net over Lance’s head, then threw all her weight behind it to send him face first into the ground. She scrabbled over his body to jerk his arm up his back, hauling on it until he shrieked.

“You twitch, Lance Dunmont, and I’ll break your arm!” she snarled, hauling on his arm again to reinforce her point.

Two down.
Bain was doing his best against Jinks, so Legolas piled into the smaller boy to knock him down. Bain stomped both feet onto Jink’s arm at the elbow and grabbed his wrist, levering hard enough to keep the boy flat on his face.

"Unless you want me to break your arm, don’t you twitch, either!" Bain spat. "Fucking bastard!"

Three down.

Manny took one look at Legolas and turned tail. The last time Manny had fled, he’d returned with reinforcements, so Legolas stormed after him, launching himself to tackle the boy. They crashed to the ground, Legolas on top of Manny, so he copied Sigrid, grabbing an arm and cranking it up his back.

“Hold still, connard!” Legolas growled.

Four down.

That just left Angelo, and his Father. He looked around frantically –

Mr. D and Bard still wrestled with the man they’d taken down, and just beyond, Angelo lunged with his knife right at Father. Legolas fought down the urge to scream a warning, because that would only distract Father from concentrating on the blow, but Angelo was so fast, so big, so strong, and Father was so much lighter –

Ever the graceful danseur, Father stepped nimbly towards Angelo, throwing off the thug’s approach, grabbed his knife hand at the wrist, and wrenched it back and down so hard that Angelo shrieked. Had Father driven the knife into his chest? No, no, only the most basic of karate moves to apply pressure to the wrist. Father squeezed hard, and Angelo let the knife drop.

Five down –

“Look out, look out!” Mr. D shouted. “He’s pulling a knife, the bastard –”

Mr. D kicked once, twice, and Bard wrestled to grab the thug’s hand before he could get the knife free. The man’s wild kick knocked Bard away, and Mr. D dove in with fists flailing. The pair rolled around, which encouraged Manny to start struggling again. Legolas gave his arm another wrench –

A shot, then Sigrid's scream. Father lit out with words Legolas had never heard him say before and kicked Angelo in the head so hard that the thug fell still.

The silence was uncanny for three seconds, then sirens wailed in the distance. Lights flashed a block away, coming around the park towards the druggie stop. In less than another minute, uniformed figures ran towards them. One officer took Jinks away, leaving Bain to struggle to his feet. Another relieved Sigrid of Lance, and two others took off Angelo. One of them had a gun in a plastic bag. Had it been Angelo who’d fired? Finally, finally, an officer stopped beside Legolas.

“I’ve got him, son,” the female officer assured him, and he was able to climb off Manny.

“Thank you,” he said faintly. The polite reply sounded ludicrous even to him.

He joined Bain and Sigrid, both of them pale and shaking, to watch Mr. D direct a trio of officers in hauling off the fifth man. Father came to him at once, pulling him into a hug. Bain and Sigrid huddled close with him, and Father pulled them into the embrace. They were all safe.
Dazed and numb, Thran clung to his son, his lover’s children. Legolas was safe in his arms, and so were Sigrid and Bain. They were safe. It had taken only a few seconds for child’s play to erupt into a fight over nothing, a fight that could have taken his children’s lives. Just a few seconds. Only a few precious seconds. How could so much terror descend in so short a time?

Legolas was safe. In his arms. Sigrid was safe. Bain was safe. All was well. It was. All was well –

“Is everyone all right?”

Thran’s head snapped up. Was that Bard? His voice sounded thin, even wheezy. He looked up from the children to find his lover swaying on his feet, his eyes unfocused. He was terrified when Bard stumbled to his knees.

“Bard?” Thran wavered, clutching the children. “Lyubov moya?”

“Da?” Sigrid gasped. “Da, what’s wrong? Da!”

Bard stuck a hand inside his coat. When he pulled it out, it was bloody.

“No, no, no, no!” Sigrid shrieked, pushing away from the huddle to run to her father. Bain was right behind her. “Da! No! Mr. D! Mr. D! My Da’s been hurt! Mr. D!”

“Suka blyad!” Thran gasped, barely aware that Legolas had mouthed the same thing. “Oh, gods, lyubov moya!”

Sigrid and Bain supported their father between them, but he slumped against them. Mr. D waded into the mix, grabbing Bard and easing him to the grass. The policeman shot a harried glance at Thran.

“You! Get them away so I can work!”

Thran grasped Legolas’s shoulders. “Help me.”

As he and his son drew Sigrid and Bain away, the stocky plainclothesman stayed beside Bard, barking orders in a Celtic brogue so thick that Thran couldn’t make it out. A policeman came running with a medical kit, and another was radioing for an ambulance. Mr. D ripped Bard’s coat open and yanked his shirt up. Blood covered his left side in such gouts that Thran’s throat closed.

Oh gods oh gods oh gods, please don’t steal his saint from him, from his children –

Did he hear a child’s hysterical crying?

“Tilda!” Sigrid pushed away from Thran to intercept the little girl who ran towards them. Thran followed with Bain and Legolas as Sigrid engulfed her sister in her arms. Tilda collapsed into sobs, burying her face in Sigrid’s chest, clutching her arms around her.

“Is Da dead?” Tilda sobbed. “Da’s dead, isn’t he?”

Bain and Legolas closed ranks around the girls, Thran with them though he desperately wanted to be beside Bard. They stared in shock as Mr. D swabbed at the blood with the hem of Bard’s shirt, then pressed the cloth to Bard’s side. Thran couldn’t stand it, so he jostled the boys.

“Stay here with the girls. I will see how Bard is.”
He hastened to Bard’s side, attracting Mr. D’s glare. “You! Down here!”

As soon as Thran scrambled to his knees, Mr. D grabbed his hand and slapped it on top of the cloth pressed to Bard’s side. “Keep a good firm pressure on it. Don’t let go, ye hear?”

“I hear you,” Thran grumbled, leaning over Bard to scan his face. “How badly is he hurt?”

“Just a graze. Looks a lot worse than it is. He’ll be fine.” Mr. D looked up at Thran, cocking his head. “Question is, will you be?”

“Slava bogam,” Thran gulped. His gaze sharpened to skewer Mr. D. “Why wouldn’t I?”

“Not leery at the sight of blood, are ye? Yer lookin’ a wee bit pale.”

“I always look a wee bit pale,” Thran snapped. “This is what color I am all of the time!”

“Ach, likely so. Not to worry. Yer friend will live to rue the day. Ask him yourself.”

Thran tore his eyes from the stocky policeman, and found Bard looking up at him with a bemused expression on his face.

“If you push any harder, Thran, you’re liable to break my ribs.”

Bard’s voice was so weak that Thran’s throat closed. He managed to find an affronted expression. “Hush. I keep the blood inside you.”

“It hurts.”

“Good. That means what I do works.”

Mr. D had a wad of gauze. “All right, laddie, let me get in there with this until the EMTs arrive.”

Thran took his hands away. Mr. D pulled up the shirt to reveal a long, bloody weal across the right side of Bard’s ribs. He pressed the gauze over the wound, and pulled Thran’s hands down on top.

“Keep pressing. The EMTs will be here in a tic.”

Mr. D looked around to call to one of the other officers, so Thran risked twisting around to find the children.

“It is not serious!” he called to them. “Sigrid, Bain, Tilda, your Da will be fine! Legolas, make sure they understand.”

“I will, Father,” Legolas nodded, and began to speak softly to the other children. In a few seconds, all of them ventured close.

“Da?” Bain wavered.

“We’re fine, Da, we’re fine,” Bain replied, but he was just at the shredded ends of his composure. “T-Tilda’s fine, too.”

“Tilda’s here?” Bard’s eyes flew open. “I told her to go home. Is she here?”

“I couldn’t!” Tilda sobbed. “I was scared and I didn’t want to go home by myself and I couldn’t stay there by myself!”

Bard tried to sit up, but Mr. D clapped a hand on his shoulder. “Yer nae going anywhere, Bard. The EMTs are coming, and Thran will see to your bairns. All right, Thran, give the techs a wee bit of space, and we’ll see to him.”

“Do you want me to take the children home? Will Bard need to go to hospital?”

“Can’t say about hospital; that’s the EMT’s call. Ye wait a bit here with the bairns, and we’ll know something in the meantime.”

“Then you see to the suka blyads who threatened my children and hurt lyubov moya. I will gladly help you cut off their balls with a rusty can lid, even those of the young ones. If doing so is frowned upon, then I will try to make do and press every charge I can think of.”

Mr. D smiled. It was more a fierce grimace than a smile, but anything gentler would not have been fitting. “Aye, I’d like tae oblige ye, laddie, but that’d land us both in more trouble than they’re worth... almost. But I’ll see they hae a nice long stay in a cell with their own kind. That ought tae weed out a few of the bastards.”

“Not enough.”

“Not nearly enough. Ach, here are the EMTs. Nice work on this lot. Ye all did well.”

Mr. D stood up to wave the pair of medical techs to Bard’s side.

“I swear, Thran, you really are in the Russian mafia,” Bard whispered, smiling thinly.

“If I were, then very little of those sukin syns would be left to be thrown into a cell.”

“You’re cute when you’re mad.”

“I am not mad. I am scared to death.”

“I’ll be fine, fy nghariad.”

“I will hold you to that. Now, here are the EMTs. I will watch our children, so they will be safe. You will do everything the techs tell you, yes? Promise me.”

“I promise.”

A hand slid beside Thran’s. It belonged to one of the EMTs who would see to Bard. Thran backed away a step or two as the two techs busied themselves with swabs and gauze and more things than he wanted to think about. He went to the children, still huddled together. All of them were weepy and shaky, understandable after such an ordeal. He folded himself down on the ground, eased Tilda into his lap, Legolas beside her, and Bain and Sigrid to either side, and put his arm as far around the lot as he could stretch them.

“Your Da will be fine,” he told them. “It is not more than a big scratch. I have seen it. It is not so bad at all. So all will be well very soon.”

The children didn’t speak, but they settled against him with a bit more ease.

Now, if only someone would ease the pounding of his heart...
Chapter 25

Chapter Summary

Plans change in the aftermath of a holy war.

Chapter Notes

Once again, I don't own any rights to "Flushed Away." It's just one of my favorite films, that's all.

I had a little fun with some cameos in this chapter, so I hope you enjoy them.

Many thanks to MaleficentGirl for her help with the police procedures.

People flitted in and out of Bard’s vision in a dizzying blur. Or maybe the agony branded across his ribs was what made everything reel so badly. Or the burning torment that intensified each time he tried to breathe in. It seemed to be getting dark, too, for his vision greyed out – no, it lightened... no, it greyed again...

He got a fractured image of Thran’s horrified white face staring at him. His angel had his arms around Legolas, Sigrid, and Bain. Good, they were safe. They were all safe...

Sigrid and Bain were beside him, both of them screaming. The pain in his left side was fully awake now, tearing at him like a beast, pulling him to the ground...

Mr. D appeared above him, snarling and snapping, tearing at his clothes, then Thran was beside him, pressing on the point of his worst agony, greying his vision again...

The next moments were nothing but shards, disjointed images and sounds and sensations. Did he speak to the shadows who visited him, his children, his angel, an angry bald policeman with an incomprehensible Scottish burr? He wasn’t sure. The only thing that seemed real was the pain gnawing at him, turning his stomach queasy and his thoughts to mush.

“I’m giving you something for the pain while I stitch you up,” a voice wandered into clarity. “You’ll feel better in a minute.”

“Are my children all right?” he struggled to say. Had he said that already? Did he say it now, or just think it? He had no idea whether he’d gotten the words out of his thoughts and into sound, but maybe he did, because another voice assured him that all of them were fine. There was a sting in his side, then another – hypodermics? There were bright flashes of light – a police photographer documenting his wounds – and more mutterings as the EMTs described those wounds to a shadowy figure in a drone that Bard couldn’t decipher. After a few seconds, the pain receded one small bit at a time. Gradually, gradually, the world settled, and he floated down into it again.

“Back with us now?” a genial baritone voice queried.
Bard opened eyes on the pair of EMTs crouched beside him. One of them had a bush of dark red, wiry hair, a serious beard, and a nametag that said Gloin. The other one, Oin, was even hairier, with wiry grey beard and hair in a long queue that fell over his shoulder. Gloin rummaged through his box of gear, finally coming up with a big tube of something, and handed it to Oin, who’d spoken to Bard.

“Think so,” Bard ventured.

“Ah, good.” Oin took the tube, squeezed out a generous dollop of goo into his surgically gloved palm, and smeared it over his side. Those gloves were also smeared with blood, which Bard didn’t want to think about. “Nothing too serious, you’ll be glad to know, no matter that it burns like the depths of hell. Not deep, and only about five inches long. I’ve put in ten stitches, steri-stripped it to boot, and I’m coating it with this stuff. It’s a bit more potent than your garden-variety triple antibiotic ointment, but it does the same thing – keeps the wound moist and protected from germs. I’ll put a dressing over it. If you want a trip to hospital, I can see to it, but you don’t need to go unless you want to.”

“I want to take my children home,” Bard said without hesitation.

“Good man,” Oin nodded with satisfaction. “Once you get them there, have them do for you for a day or two. I’ll give you a sheet of instructions about how to take care of your souvenir.”

“Make sure you follow my brother’s instructions to the letter,” Gloin gave him a stern look as he handed gauze pads to Oin. “That’s not a terrible souvenir, as Oin likes to call them, but you still need to take care of it properly. I don’t want to see you in hospital with an infection because you lack the common sense to look after a few stitches.”

“I’ll be a good patient,” Bard smiled, surprised that he no longer hurt too much to preclude smiling.

“See that you are,” Oin nodded. He looked off to the side, then back at Bard. “Ah, your friend with the white hair has your instructions. In about four hours, the stuff I gave you will wear off. You can have some regular OTC painkiller then, if you need it. Any of the acetaminophen family’s better than ibuprofen, all right? Not aspirin. Just the regular dose. If they don’t ease you, see your regular doctor.”

“Yes, sir,” Bard agreed.

“Sir, yourself,” Oin grinned. “Now, let’s get you over to the ambulance, where it’ll be a bit warmer while we get some wrappings around your souvenir. After that, you’ll be set to go.”

Oin and Gloin carefully got Bard to his feet, which instantly drew Thran and the children to his side, all of them anxious and worried.

“He’ll be fine,” Oin assured them, quieting the clamor that greeted Bard. “We’re just going to do a bit more bandaging over at the wagon, that’s all. When you get him home, you see that he rests for a day or two, won’t you? No more fisticuffs or brawls, and don’t let him stand up for too long tonight.”

Bard let the two EMTs guide him to the ambulance, where he sat on the back bumper for them to complete their work. The children held his coat and watched closely while the EMTs reinforced the tape on his bandage, then wound a few rounds of elastic mesh around him. Then they eased his shirts down, and helped him into his coat, for which he was grateful. Shivering in the cold would not have been pleasant even without a wound that pulled and burned.

“Can we take him home now, please?” Thran asked. Gods, his angel was even paler than usual, and his face looked haggard. The children were little better – little Tilda still clung like a limp rag doll to Sigrid, and Bain looked like he’d played in the world’s longest soccer game. Legolas was pale, too, and kept one hand on his father. The lot of them needed to go home as much as he did.

“I’ll check with the officer in charge of the crime scene,” Gloin replied, and ambled off to find him.

Crime scene? Gods, that what it was, wasn’t it? Not a park, but a crime scene where an errant soccer ball had nearly gotten his children, his lover, and him killed.

“Steady on, laddie,” Oin grabbed his arm. “You turned white as your friend’s hair. The pain medication shouldn’t be wearing off this fast.”

“I’m fine,” Bard said through gritted teeth. “I’m fine. It just hit me that those bastards tried to kill my children.”

Mr. D threaded through the officers still going to and fro, trailed by a taller man in a nicely tailored suit and topcoat. When he removed his fedora, he revealed neatly trimmed dark hair threaded with grey. His beard and mustache were greyer, but also neatly trimmed, and his steady eyes were a deep blue. His steps were unhurried, deliberate, and calm, and he carried his head high, but with gravity rather than arrogance.

“This is Mr. Bowman, Thor. Bard, Chief Inspector Thor Oakland. He’s in charge of this wee minuet.”

Bard gingerly extended a hand. “Chief Inspector.”

“Mr. Bowman,” Oakland shook Bard’s hand gently. “Sergeant Fundin’s given me an earful about what’s happened in the last hour. If you’re up to it, I’d like to ask you a few questions.”

“A lot of questions, I’d guess,” Bard gave him a crooked grin. “Would you let me take my children home first? They’re exhausted and scared. You likely want to talk to them and Thran Oropherson, too, so you’re welcome to come with us. It’ll be out of the cold.”

“That’ll be fine, Mr. Bowman. I’ll send a pair of officers to get you home safely, and to start the interviews.”

“Thanks. Can we go now?”

The inspector nodded. “As soon as I’ve got a couple of officers to go with you. Dwalin, send Jackson and Boyens with them.”

“Aye; I’ll see to it.”

The chief inspector nodded to one and all before moving off with Mr. D to make the rounds of his officers. Oin and Gloin stayed with Bard at the ambulance until Mr. D reappeared with his two uniformed officers in tow, one a short, squat, rumpled man with disheveled hair, and the other a tall, neatly dressed woman with a mane of dark hair pulled back into a long, straight ponytail. Bard climbed into the ambulance for the brief ride across the field – Thran would follow on foot with the children – and in a couple of minutes they let him out in front of the apartment building. Thran and the children arrived breathlessly within seconds, and they trooped with the two officers inside and into Apartment 2A.

Never had that crowded apartment seemed so welcoming.

Thran took charge immediately, as imperious as any ballet impresario, ordering Bard ensconced on the sofa with Tilda tightly at his side – the right one, fortunately. Bard would have laughed if he hadn’t been so suddenly weary, and did as he was told. Officer Boyens went with Legolas into Bain’s room to talk, leaving Bard and Tilda with Officer Jackson, while Thran shepherded Bain and Sigrid into the kitchen to muster something to eat. Tilda was so exhausted that the officers asked their questions of her first, and then she immediately fell asleep with her head in Bard’s lap. Thran handed around cups of tea, for which Bard was profoundly grateful. The warm comfort of the humble beverage sustained him during the next hour as the officers wrote down the events at the park from everyone’s point of view. After they conferred, they asked a few more questions, then took both of Bard’s shirts and coat as forensic evidence, but at last they were done, and took their leave.

When Thran closed the door behind the officers, everyone gathered in the living room. Thran sank into Bard’s chair, shifting his legs so that Legolas had room to sit between his legs. He wound arms around his son, who leaned back against his father. Sigrid sat carefully beside Bard and Tilda on the sofa, leaned her head against Bard’s shoulder, and rested her hand on Tilda’s hair. Bain settled on the floor between Bard’s knees, snuggling himself between them and wrapping an arm around Bard’s leg. No one spoke. Bard savored the closeness of his children, and if he couldn’t touch Thran, he could at least look at him and be grateful that his angel hadn’t been hurt. Thran still looked wan and hollow, but the grey eyes looking back at him warmed, and a faint smile eased the lines in his face.

Legolas finally looked up. “You were amazing, Sigrid.”

Sigrid had Bard’s hand tightly in hers, and her eyes were red, but she breathed easily, and a small smile touched her lips.

“Thanks.”

“No, you really were. You should have seen her, Father. She spoke French so that Bain and I knew what was going on, and could work together. And I heard one of the gendarmes say that she broke Lance’s foot when she stamped on it.”

“I did? Good. He’s such a rat bastard.”

Bard didn’t know whether to be appalled or amused at the satisfaction in Sigrid’s hard voice. “You did what? Why? And what did you call him?”

“He deserved it,” Bain growled, his fingers tightening on Bard’s shin. “He called my sister a ho. Nobody calls my sister a ho.”

“You were great, Bain,” Sigrid sat up a little more, and her smile grew a little wider as she tugged a piece of Bain’s unruly hair. “You put that soccer ball so hard into Manny’s face that I hope he lost teeth. It was brilliant.”

“Thanks, Sig. And Legolas, where’d you learn to tackle like that? I thought you’d drive Jinks through the ground to China! You drilled all three of them.”

Legolas sat up, too. “You both got me out when they tackled me. I was glad to return the favor.”

“Wait,” Bard held up a hand. “I’m not sure whether I want to know what you all are talking about or not.”

“I do,” Thran said without hesitation. “I want to know about the brave exploits of our children.”

The three older children began to talk all at once, one starting a sentence and another finishing it, but gradually the tale of what had happened came out, complete with profanity. Bard found it impossible to rebuke them for any of it, and he was proud of how well they’d handled themselves.
“So you really were the Three Musketeers,” he complimented. “I’m proud of all of you for sticking up for each other.”

“Yeah,” Bain grinned proudly at his two cohorts, who grinned back. “We really were.”

“It was more than the three of us,” Sigrid said. “Tilda was just as brave, running off to get you both and Mr. D for us. And Da tried to cool Angelo down, and then he and Mr. D took out that big guy, and Thran – gods, Thran, you took out Angelo barehanded – you saved my Da. So it was all of us. The whole fierce tribe of us.”

Bard laughed softly. “Clan Ffyrnig.” When all eyes were on him, he shifted gingerly. “Welsh for the Fierce Clan.”

“Yarostny Klan,” Thran murmured, smiling at Legolas. “In the Russian. But as that is too hard to say, let us call ourselves Clan Ffyrnig.”

“Yeah,” Bain sat up, nodding. “Yeah. We’re Clan Ffyrnig.”

Bard let the children savor their moment. There would be unpleasant consequences of what they’d done today – what all of them had done – but now wasn’t the time to mention them. He and Thran would talk later, and act accordingly. For now, it was enough that the children rallied.

In a few minutes, Thran led Legolas, Sigrid, and Bain into the kitchen to bring out plates of food. It was mostly leftovers from their earlier feast – that was a lifetime ago – with a few additions. Once rolls filled with ham and various embellishments, leftover potato casserole, more of Thran’s salad greens, and the box of clementines filled the table, Bard was allowed to gingerly walk from the sofa to a chair to eat. Tilda had rallied, though she refused to move away from Bard’s side for more than a few seconds. After they ate, Bard was ordered back to the sofa while the rest of the clan saw to the cleanup. Bard found a soccer match rebroadcast and turned the sound down low, which provided a comforting low buzz of normalcy to the day’s events. The others drifted in one at a time to settle with him. Thran was last, bringing Bard a fresh cup of hot tea.

“You all will spoil me,” Bard teased, but Sigrid gave him a sharp look.

“We want to. We’re glad to. You could have –”

Her breath caught, and she looked away as she struggled to keep her composure, but Thran set Bard’s teacup down and eased Sigrid into his arms.

“Your Da will tell you not to cry because he is all right. But I will tell you that few things merit tears more than relief when the ones you love survive. So you have the best reason to cry if you want to.”

Bard felt his own eyes burning when Sigrid turned into Thran’s arms and buried her face against his shirt. But after just a moment she looked up, smiling. She patted Thran’s chest.

“Thank you, Ada. I’m all right now.”

“As you say.” Smiling, Thran touched her nose with a long finger. “So, perhaps a film or Bard’s soccer game would be nice?”

The old reliable Flushed Away went into the DVD player, and everyone settled for a dose of calm and normalcy as only modeling clay magic could deliver. When it was over, Thran stirred in Bard’s chair.

“You are comfortable, Bard? More tea, or something else to eat? Do your stitches hurt?”
“I’m fine, Thran.” How touching was it to see his angel look after him with such care? “I don’t need anything.”

“Then let us read the instructions about how we are to care for you.” Thran retrieved the sheet he’d gotten from the EMTs, and sat down to read it. “So. We have fed and warmed the patient. We have gotten him to rest, and must continue to do so. We have asked him if he needs something for pain, and he says he does not. We must not let his stitches get wet for two days.” He looked over at Bard. “So no showers, only sponge baths, and you must wind plastic wrap around the bandage just in case.”

What Bard wouldn’t give to be able to ask Thran to help him with those sponge baths, but the children were not quite ready for that. He sighed, and hoped that the children took his regret for the inconvenience he was about to be put to, rather than for a missed opportunity.

“I’ll do my best,” he conceded. “But I’ll still be grimy at the end of it.”

“We’ll sort out something,” Sigrid looked up from reading the paper over Thran’s shoulder. “I can scrub your hair for you over the tub, Thran can help you get up and down, and we’ll manage.”

Well, out of the mouths of babes… Bard had all he could do not to grin in anticipation of Thran’s part in this, if not Sigrid’s.

“The important part is to rest,” Thran said smoothly, concentrating on the paper. Gods, the bastard was having the same thoughts he was about “helping” Bard wash. “Now, we have all had a long afternoon and evening, and it would be best if we rested. I do not want to leave you to fend for yourself, Bard. So Legolas, if you do not mind resting alone upstairs, or if you can make do on Bard’s sofa, I will watch over us from this chair, and see that we all rest in quiet.”

“I don’t want to be by myself,” Legolas said at once.

“You can stay with me,” Bain offered quickly. “I have a double bed, and… I don’t want to be by myself, either. You can have either side you want. Or we could stay up and read or play a game or something.”

“That’d be good,” Legolas agreed.

“You don’t have to do that, Thran,” Bard felt obligated to protest. “I’ll be fine. You and Legolas need to rest, too, and you’d rest better in your own beds.”

“I will rest best when I know that you are well and do not need anything,” Thran shot him a dismissive frown. “Legolas and I will be fine.”

Bard held up his hands. “All right, Prince of Ice. Do as you like.”

“I always do.” Thran said offhandedly, continuing to scan the paper. “It is the prerogative of the Prince of Ice. Now. It is late, and perhaps the children should bathe. Legolas and I will go upstairs to do so and be back in a few minutes. Sigrid and Bain, make sure that your Da does not do anything foolish while we are gone.”

Sigrid giggled. “I think I’m going to like pushing Da around for a couple of days. Right, Bain?”

He grinned. “Paybacks, Sig. We’ve got major paybacks coming.”

Laughing, Thran and Legolas let themselves out.
“I think we should just let Tilda sleep,” Bard said, rubbing the little girl’s back. She’d fallen asleep in her father’s lap halfway through the film, and didn’t rouse now.

“I’ll get her in bed,” Sigrid decided. “Bain, go wash, and I’ll follow you.”

“Sure, Sig. Done soon.”

With coaxing, Bard and Sigrid got Tilda upright, and her older sister guided her into the bathroom to brush her teeth. In a few minutes, Sigrid returned to sit next to Bard.

“Tilda’s already asleep.”

“That’s the best thing for her.”

A long silence was broken only by the sound of water running as Bain showered.

“It seems like a bad dream,” Sigrid murmured.

Bard reached up to stroke her hair, but stopped short when his stitches pulled. “It came out all right.”

“For now. You know as well as I do that Angelo’s gang won’t like what we did.”

“Don’t worry about that tonight, sweetness. Rest, and tomorrow we’ll take stock.”

“Easy to say, hard to do.”

“I know.” Bard settled for rubbing Sigrid’s knee with his other hand. “We’re safe tonight, and after a good night’s sleep we’ll figure out what to do.”

“All right, Da. I love you.”

“Love you, too, Sig. Sleep well.”

Sigrid padded off to the shower. In a few minutes, the water went on. Bard clicked the television back on, and found a hockey game to provide more of that comforting background hum that signaled normalcy. He shut his eyes, trying not to think about anything for a few minutes while the announcer droned about an icing penalty and Sigrid’s shower ran. The water was still going a few minutes later when a knock sounded on the door. Bain dashed out of his room to get it.

“Look through the peephole first,” Bard cautioned him, as his son reached for the doorknob. Bain processed that quicker than Bard expected or liked, and looked without protest.

“It’s them,” he confirmed, opening the door. Thran and Legolas came in with armloads of stuff – pillows, blankets, and clothes in Thran’s case, and a computer and game controllers in Legolas’s.

“I brought that new zombie game,” Legolas greeted Bain, who grinned widely.

“Sweet! Come on!” the boys disappeared into Bain’s room.

“Don’t stay up too late, Bain, and keep the sound down,” Bard called softly.

“We won’t, and we will!”

The door closed with a hasty click.

Thran put his armload of things down in Bard’s chair, and sat carefully on the right side of the sofa so that he didn’t bump Bard’s stitches. “The girls are in bed?”

Bard nodded. “Tilda was out right after you left. Sigrid’s probably going to read a bit.”

“And the boys play zombie apocalypse.” Thran looked puzzled. “I have never understood the attraction to shoot decayed corpses in decayed environments.”

Bard chuckled. “It’s the age, I guess. It’s not my hobby, either.”

“So we are alone for the moment, then?”

Bard’s smile was rueful. “Subject to change at any second.”

“Then I will make the most of it.” Thran put his arm carefully around Bard, and laid his head on Bard’s shoulder. “I have never been so frightened in all of my life as today, lyubov moya. I could have lost you. I could have lost you.”

As Thran clung to him, Bard stroked Thran’s thigh, his arm, his hair. “It could have been any of us, fy nghariad. Any of us. One of the children, you, me, any of us. Be grateful that all it cost us was ten stitches.”

“I watched the EMT put in each one of those ten stitches. It was horrible. I never want to see anyone put stitches in your body again.”

Bard chuckled. “Better me than you. On me, it’ll look sexy. On you, it’d ruin your Prince of Ice hauteur.”

“It is not something to joke about!” Thran hissed. “It is far from anything to joke about.”

“I’m not trying to joke, Thran.” Bard took up Thran’s hand to brush a kiss on the knuckles. “I’m just trying to help you feel better.”

“That will not be easy,” Thran swallowed. “I have been noble all afternoon. I have fought suka blyad heroin gangs, protected our children, been strong for them when their father is hurt, answered many police questions, and acted like my heart does not break in my chest, and I am well tired of all of it!”

Warm drops fell on Bard’s shoulder, which brought a lump to Bard’s throat. “It’s all right now, angel. It is. I’m fine, and so are the rest of us. It’s all going to be fine.”

“How can it be fine when we spent the afternoon to make minced meat out of a heroin dealer and his minions, for which they will surely want to exact revenge before long?”

Bard winced. “You thought of that, too, did you? So did I, and so did Sigrid, and Bain’s not much farther behind. We’re probably all right for a day or two, but probably not longer than that.”

“All for a stupid soccer ball?”

“Not for a soccer ball, Thran. Because we didn’t let them push us around.”

Thran took an uneven breath, and looked up. His eyes were red. “It is a difference that does not matter.”

“True.”

“So we need to take ourselves out of harm’s way.”
Bard nodded slowly. “That’s what I’ve been thinking all afternoon. Legolas will be back in boarding school in another ten days or so, so he’ll be okay. My children are more at risk –”

“So you must move them to the house now, before their term ends.”

“That’s exactly what I’ve been thinking all afternoon. I don’t like moving them into a construction site, or in the middle of the school year, but better than letting Angelo’s gang come after them. I can work on the house full time, then, and get it finished faster. You’ll have to come, too. You can’t stay here, not after two run-ins with those fuckers.”

“My auditions –”

“I thought about that, too,” Bard said quickly. “If I paint the house rather than contractors, that’ll save a big chunk. Take that money and buy a good car to take you to and from the city. If it’s not enough money, then pull Legolas out of that boarding school so he can start with the other three in a new school, and they’ll have each other to help them along.”

“That is very close to what I was about to suggest,” Thran said. “We will need a bigger vehicle to carry the six of us, so perhaps an SUV rather than a car. And my auditions are not all within the city anyway, and will require some travel. But we will worry about the details of that once I know more about the auditions. For now, we must explain the move to our children.”

“Sigrid’s already thinking about this. Legolas wants to get out of that boarding school, so he’ll go with it. Bain’s complained often about being the lone boy to the two girls, so he’d like to have Legolas to balance the load, so to speak. And I don’t think Tilda will mind at all. She likes you and Legolas a lot.”

“And I will certainly not complain to finally have my saint within reach.”

Bard squeezed Thran’s thigh, and rubbed it slowly. “Oh, I will certainly not complain about having an angel to hold,” he exhaled, and brushed a kiss on Thran’s cheek. “So that leaves just one question.”

“Do we get married now or wait?”

“Exactly.”

“I know what I want. I know what you want. But I think we should wait still a bit longer, so that it does not seem so abrupt to our children.”

Bard snickered. “You think they’ll go with us living together? In the same bedroom? Oh, I guess we’ll have to do separate ones until I get our bed put together.”

Thran’s expression finally eased from its haunted worry. “Perhaps that would be best. Well, shall we go through the list again? Sigrid is for us. Legolas understands that I am very fond of you, in that special way. Bain is clueless, and Tilda will likely not care.”

“That’s the way I’d call it, too. So that’s... what, one for, two unopposed, and one doesn’t know?”

“I concur.”

Bard exhaled again, albeit gingerly. Thran was instantly alert. “Does it hurt now?”

“It’s fine.”
“You are sure, lyubov moya?”

“I’m sure, fy nghariad. Don’t worry.”

“Now you know what it is like to have someone think you might break at the least strain.”

“After watching you throw yourself down the stairs last Monday morning, I know you won’t break at the least strain.”

“I am not at that point yet. Perhaps in a while.”

“So we’ll tell the children tomorrow. Over breakfast, before we go to the junk shops.”

Thran’s laugh was a choked, incredulous sound. “What did the EMT tell you, whose instructions you promised me you would follow? Rest, rest, rest! Perhaps Sunday or Monday we will go.”

“We’re moving into our house as soon as we have enough furnishings to hold us,” Bard insisted. “I won’t let a few stitches stop that. It’ll be good for us to get the children outside and away from here, anyway.”

Thran looked unconvinced, no matter how much he wanted to move ahead with their plans. “Let us see tomorrow at breakfast, Bard, how your stitches feel.”

“And how your back feels, too, funny dancer. This sofa isn’t what you’re used to. In fact, why don’t you take my bed, and I’ll stay here? Maybe I won’t sleep that well anyway, so there’s no reason you should lose sleep, too.”

“I thought you said you didn’t hurt.”

Bard gave Thran an exasperated expression. “I don’t. But I might. So take my bed. It’ll smell like me. You’ll like it.”

Thran’s lips twitched in a smile. “Oh, my saint, that is not fair. But even that will not tempt me. I will stay here, and you will go to bed. Now. Or you will be too tired to go tomorrow. Please, lyubov moya?”

“Gods, Thran. You’ll put pleading little puppies and kittens out of business with those soulful grey eyes of yours.”

“Then let my puppy/kitten eyes persuade you to do as I tell you. Go to sleep.”

Bard sighed. “How about we just sit here for a while? That’s even better than looking into your puppy/kitten eyes.”

Thran stroked Bard’s tangled hair out of his eyes. “That would be fine, Bard. Quite fine.”
Chapter 26

Chapter Summary

While the angel and the saint consider, their able co-conspirator makes her case, and Clan Ffyrnig prepares to fly.

Keep an eye out for two more cameos!

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

spokoynoy nochiu, ya lyublyu tebya, svyatoy moy = sleep well, I love you, my saint (Russian)

cysgu yn dda, rwy'n dy garu di, fy angel = sleep well, I love you, my angel (Welsh)

After such a day, all Thran wanted to do was to nest. How nice it would be to take Bard upstairs and enfold him in Thran’s silk and cashmere bedding, even if all they did was to lie beside each other. But they would make do on Bard’s old sofa. Thran wanted to swath them in the pile of pillows and soft blankets he’d brought from his apartment, but Bard thought he ought to wash what he could first.

“I’m still covered with blood,” he admitted ruefully. “This is not a come-on to get you in the shower with me, though I wish it were, but I’m going to need help.”

“You will have it, lyubov moya,” Thran said, stroking Bard’s arm. “I do not take advantage of an injured man... at least, not tonight.”

Bard gave him a wry look, eased off the sofa, and fetched his sleep tee shirt, flannel pants, and warm socks from his bed. Thran followed him to the bathroom to help him ease out of his flannel shirt, then strip the rest off. Thran winced at the splotches of blood on Bard’s back that remained from the EMTs’ work, and stroked Bard’s arm in sympathy. Bard looked over his shoulder at himself in the mirror, caught Thran’s grimace, and shrugged.

“It’ll wash off, Thran.”

“It will not wash out of my thoughts so easily, lyubov moya. I am very glad that it is no worse than ten stitches.”

“So am I,” was Bard’s frank assessment, as he got his washcloth out of the shower. “Though I wish they hadn’t ruined the shirt I had on. That was my Christmas present from the children. Now it’s in a police file somewhere.”

“That is a hard thing to lose. But perhaps it will help to prosecute the sukin syns that ruined it.”
Bard’s hum was noncommittal as he turned on the water in the tub, as if he would’ve gladly taken another ten stitches if doing so would’ve preserved his children’s gift. Bard managed to wash and rinse everything but his back, so Thran carefully sponged the splotches of blood away to keep the bandages dry. Then he dried his saint with utmost care, helped him into his pajamas, and followed him back to the sofa.

“You should go to bed, Bard,” Thran urged. “You need to rest.”

“Not when I have a legitimate reason to snuggle with an angel on the sofa until the angel decides he’s ready for bed.”

“I would rather snuggle with you than sleep, too. So let me make us a nest.”

Thran arranged down pillows in the corner of the sofa, then sat himself against them, and urged Bard to lie between his legs against his chest. They shifted until they were mostly reclining, and both of them were comfortable. Bard wrapped an arm around Thran’s bent knee, rubbing slowly. In return, Thran ran his fingers through Bard’s unruly hair, smoothing it out of his face, calming himself with the soft touches.

Bard sighed. When his body eased a bit more, it reminded Thran once more of how much he could have lost this afternoon.

“I’m all right, angel,” Bard murmured, before Thran realized he’d tensed. Bard’s hand tightened briefly on his knee. “Everyone’s all right.”

“So I try to remind myself. It is not easy.”

“I’ve got the easy part. I get to lie in the arms of an angel, where it’s hard to think of anything bad. If it’ll help you feel better, we can switch.”

Thran tsked. “You have seen to everyone around you for so long that you do not know how to let someone else see to you. Let me do this for you. Are you warm enough? Do you want a blanket? Or your warm socks?”

“I’m fine. Better than fine. Nothing hurts, I’m warm, and I’m with you. And we’re allowed to touch. Nothing could be better. Are you comfortable? I’m not crushing anything important, am I?”

Thran grinned. “No, you are not, and yes, I am very comfortable. You are warm, and close, and safe, and mine.”

Bard’s chuckle was sleepy. “Yes, I am. Gladly so.”

“Then rest. Enjoy our chance to be so close until we sleep.”

Bard stroked Thran’s leg again, and he shut his eyes. “I will if you will.”

Thran stroked Bard’s hair. “We both will. Spokojnoy nochiu. Ya lyublyu tebya, svyatoy moy.”

“Cysgu yn dda. Rwy’n dy garu di, fy angel.”

* * *

*[Translation:]: Spokojnoy nochiu. Ya lyublyu tebya, svyatoy moy. — Peaceful night. I love you, my saint.]

[Translation:]: Cysgu yn dda. Rwy’n dy garu di, fy angel. — Peaceful night. I love you, my angel.
Everything faded away into a warm blur for a while. Eventually, the body cradling Bard shifted, nudging him to awareness again. That body shifted again, and Bard woke fully. He was still on the sofa, nestled between Thran’s legs. Gods, what time was it? He groped for his mobile on the coffee table. 3:12 a.m. He groaned softly and sat up.

“Are you in pain?” Thran’s voice was soft.

“No, but you probably are, considering I’ve been lying on you for three hours. Did you sleep at all?”

“I enjoyed to hold you.”

“You didn’t, then. Please, angel, take my bed and rest. You aren’t built to stay awake on an old sofa all night.”

“And how would it look in the morning when our children awake to find me asleep in your bed and you awake on the sofa?”

“I won’t be awake on the sofa. So go. Please. I won’t sleep well if you don’t.”

A tsk. “That is most unfair, to claim you will not sleep unless I take your bed.”

“Whatever works.” Bard rubbed Thran’s leg. “If you want, I can pull out the big guns and tell you to get off my sofa so I can go back to sleep.”

Thran sat up beside Bard stiffly, not groaning, but the ginger way he moved showed how uncomfortable he was. “You do not know the concept to fight fairly.”

“Not when you hurt, I don’t. I hope my bed’s not too short for you. Take one of your blankets with you, and your pillow.”

“I may take one of the pillows, but the blankets are for you, lyubov moya. Enjoy them. Soon you will enjoy them every night, but on a bigger bed, and with me beside you.”

Bard hummed in anticipation. “Oh, that’ll make it easy for me to go back to sleep.”

“See that it does,” Thran’s lips curved up in a smile. He leaned over to kiss Bard’s lips, then got to his feet with one of the pillows in his hands. “See you in a little while.”

“You, too.”

Bard waited until Thran had settled in his bed before he headed to the bathroom. His side was tender, so he took a couple of acetaminophen tablets with a little water, then padded back to the sofa to rearrange Thran’s blankets and pillows. They made a cozy nest, and Thran’s scent on the fabric was comforting enough that he dropped off without effort. Everything faded away for quite a while, for when he roused next, pale daylight shone through the window by the dining table. Sigrid was eating a slice of bread and butter.

“Da?” she asked, when he levered himself up carefully. Yes, his stitches were definitely sore this morning, and he was careful not to flex his abs. “Are you okay, Da? Do you need any help?”

“I’m fine,” he demurred. “Keep it down, Sig. Thran didn’t go to bed until three, and I want him to sleep as long as possible.”

“Okay,” Sigrid whispered, as Bard tiptoed to the bathroom. Yes, Thran was still curled up on his bed, his back to the rest of the apartment. Good. Yesterday’s ordeal had taken it out of Bard’s angel, and he needed to restore himself as best he could on Bard’s meager bed. He half wished he’d persuaded Thran to sleep in his own bed, but the luxury of nesting with him last night on the sofa was something he was grateful to have had. He hoped Thran didn’t wake up sore and exhausted.

He tended to necessities, washed his face, and joined Sigrid at the table.

“No toast?” he queried, as Sigrid buttered another slice of bread.

“I didn’t want to wake you with the toaster.” She passed Bard the loaf of bread. “So how did you end up on the sofa?”

“Because I wanted to be. Thran’s an elite athlete who needs a decent night’s sleep, and isn’t used to sleeping on a sofa. I slept on it just fine.”

“What’d you do, claim you liked to sleep on the sofa? He loves you too much to take your bed without a fight.”

Bard gave her a look, which she returned with an exasperated sigh.

“Well, he does, and I’ll be really glad when we can get the rest of Clan Ffyrnig with the program. Watching you two trying to act nonchalant is funny, but it’s wearing thin. So what’d you tell him?”

Bard smothered a chuckle. He agreed with Sigrid heartily, but telling his teenaged daughter so was not a good idea. “I told him the sofa had mega fleas nurtured on all the cracker crumbs you three have scattered over it. He went like a shot.”

Sigrid giggled. “No, you didn’t, but it’s a good story.”

“Glad you liked it. What time is it?”

“After nine.”

Bard blinked. “Hmm. I’m surprised the boys aren’t up. Or Til.”

“Are you kidding? The boys were booping and beeping and blowing stuff up all night. They crashed about four or so. Tilda was exhausted, so it may be a while before she surfaces.”

“Sounds like you didn’t sleep all that well.”

Sigrid waved a hand. “I did, actually. I heard the boys cycle through the bathroom. They were still chortling, but yawning so hard I didn’t figure they’d last much longer.”

“I’ll put on water for tea. You want some?”

“That’d be good. And I’ll put it on. You’re supposed to rest.”

“Putting the kettle on the stove isn’t work.”

“Sit, Da. I’ve got it.”

Sigrid filled the kettle and set it on the burner carefully so that it didn’t clank. In a few minutes, she put a pot of tea on the table and a cup for each.

“I put some eggs on, too. You need something warm.”

Bard thought about teasing Sigrid for her doting on him, but her determined face persuaded him otherwise. “That’ll be nice, Sig. Thanks.”

He quietly sipped his tea while Sigrid set out a spoon for each of them, then salt, pepper, butter, and jam. Maybe she was making toast, too. But no, in a few minutes she put a bowl with two soft boiled eggs in it in front of him, then a plate with the two remaining rolls from yesterday’s Christmas dinner, nicely warmed.

“This is great,” he smiled, as Sigrid sat beside him with her own bowl of eggs.

“Better eat one of those before I eat them both,” she warned, pointing to the rolls. “You know how much I love them.”

“I know,” Bard agreed, taking one and buttering it. Sigrid took the other without hesitation. “I’ll have to talk Thran into making some more.”

“Do that,” Sigrid nodded, her mouth full. “I may not be able to wait until your stitches are healed before we have these again.”

“I’ll see what I can do.”

“So I was thinking about what we have to do about the druggie lords,” Sigrid said in an offhand voice. She concentrated on shelling her eggs, interspersed with bites of her roll. “We have to move, of course, and since you’re already working on the house, I think we should just move there now and be done with it. So we need to call a moving company today and see when they can come to lug our stuff. You said Thran and Legolas don’t have a lot of stuff, but it’ll take us a while to pack everything, so we’ll need boxes. The boys will think it’s exciting, but I’m a little worried about Tilda. She was so scared yesterday... what?”

Bard gaped at her, his roll and eggs forgotten. A soft chuckle came from the doorway, where a tall ballet dancer leaned against the doorframe. “You are a surprising young woman, Sigrid. You have left your Da speechless.”

“She said –”

“She said exactly what you and I said last night, and she has considered what we must do to make that happen. I would like to hear what else she has considered. Are there more eggs?”

“If you don’t mind them hard-boiled,” Sigrid replied, glowing with triumph. “I can put some more on if you want them soft boiled, or some porridge.”

“Hard boiled is fine,” Thran agreed. “I will wash my face, and be back.”

Sigrid snickered to herself as she got up to put Thran’s eggs in a bowl, pointedly ignoring Bard’s incredulous look.

“Sig –”

“He said you two discussed the same thing last night, Da. I agree with you. We have to go.”

“But what about school?”

“There are schools in Greenwood Dale on the Lake. Probably better ones than here.”

“It’s in the middle of the year.”

“So?”
“So... you’re okay with packing up and moving at the drop of a hat. You’re okay with changing schools in the middle of the year. You’re okay with living in a construction zone until I can get enough of the house painted and the floors refinished. Are you okay about moving away from Finn Durinson, too?”

“That sucks,” Sigrid admitted. “That’s the only thing that does. But... Finn’s kind of a doofus about getting together, anyway, so... maybe this’ll make him go one way or the other. And it’s only forty-five minutes away, so...” she swallowed, then looked at Bard. “I’m not giving that dickwad Lance Dunmont another shot at any of us, Da. Especially Tilda.”

Thran slipped into the chair across from Bard. His hair was combed and he had a warm sweater on over the shirt and soft pants he’d slept in. He looked reasonably refreshed, much better than how drawn and pale he’d been after the fight yesterday. Sigrid slid his bowl of eggs towards him, drawing him to nod his thanks.

“You do know it’s not a good idea to call anyone a dickwad in front of your Da, right?” Bard said mildly.

“I get an exception this time because Lance Dunmont is a dickwad. You have to grant me that.”

“True enough,” Bard conceded. “And yes, Thran and I talked about moving last night. I’m not willing to put you and your brothers and sister out there for Angelo’s minions to harass.”

“So call a moving company this morning. Maybe they can come next week while we’re still on break.”

Bard glanced at Thran, quietly tending to his eggs. A perverse smile twitched at his lips. As soon as he felt Bard’s regard, he shrugged. “She makes a very good co-conspirator, our Sigrid.”

“Yes, I do,” Sigrid agreed without apology. She stood up. “I made a list of moving companies on my computer last night. I’ll go get it.”

As soon as she was out of the kitchen, Bard wrung a hand over his face. Thran laughed quietly as he peeled his eggs and sprinkled them with salt and pepper.

“Remember when I said that Sigrid would give someone hell someday?” he whispered to Thran.

“I do.”

“I didn’t expect that I’d be the first.”

“She takes what comes in stride, and then acts. Just as her Da does.”

“Maybe. It doesn’t seem so unnerving when I do it, though.”

“Of course not. You are in control then. This time, she is, rather than you.”

“And you’re encouraging her.”

“I am. She is right, just as we were last night. So let us look at her list, and make some calls. It would be wonderful to be in our house before the New Year arrives.”

“It would.”

Sigrid returned with her laptop cradled in her arms. She sat at the end of the table, and both Bard and Thran slid closer to peer at the screen.
“I made a list of eight of them. I like this one. They specialize in quick moves. I think they’re a big name in the divorce market, people needing to move fast, I mean. At least that’s what I thought, reading between the lines. They’ll even help us pack if we want, but if we get some boxes, we can probably get most of our stuff packed ourselves in a day or two. Then there are these other three that looked good, and four more run of the mill ones...”

Sigrid had done her research well, Bard had to admit. So he pulled out his mobile and dialed some of Sigrid’s second choices, just to see what prices and time frames would be like. When he got three that were comparable, he called the quick move specialists.

If Clan Ffyrnig would pack up by Tuesday night, Dain Brothers movers could be there first thing on Wednesday morning.

Both Thran and Sigrid nodded vigorously. So Bard took a deep breath.

“Oh, that’s brilliant,” he breathed, looking at Legolas. “I didn’t want to say anything to Legolas, because he’ll be back at his boarding school soon. But it’d be an awful pain trying to stay out of the gang’s way all of the time for the next however long.”

“You are kind to want to spare Legolas, Bain,” Thran said.

“You’ll go back to school, little doll,” Bard assured her. “It’ll be a new school, near the house.”

“Will I get to see my friends again? Nicole? Sarah?”

“We’ll call them once we move and you can make as many play dates with them as you want.”

“I’ll have a new teacher, too?”

Bard nodded, wincing. Sigrid was right; this move would be the hardest on Tilda. “That’s right. A new school and a new teacher. It’ll be hard for a few days. But you’ll soon make some more friends, and we’ll all be there together. So we’ll help each other get through it.”

“Why are we moving?” Tilda asked. “Because of what Lance did yesterday?”

“Because of some things that happened yesterday, but that’s not the only reason. You know we were planning to move anyway, right?”
Tilda nodded, holding Mr. Bun a bit tighter than usual.

“We’re just moving a little earlier than we thought, that’s all.”

“All of us are moving?” Tilda persisted. “Thran and Legolas, too?”

Bard swallowed. Gods, the moment was here, and he wasn’t sure if he would find the right words to say or not.

“Thran and Legolas, too. They’re part of Clan Ffyrnig.”

Tilda sat up to look at Bard, then speculatively at Thran and Legolas. Legolas looked bemused, and considered Bain with a long look.

“I told you,” Bain muttered.

“Hmm,” Legolas replied, considering his father.

“They’ll live... in our house?” Tilda asked.

Bard swallowed again. “That’s right. We’ll all live in our house together.”

A long silence fell that no one wanted to break. Tilda hadn’t quite worked things out yet, and the boys were wise enough to remain silent. A pale, pale blush bloomed in Thran’s cheeks, and Bard swore he was biting the inside of his cheek to keep from laughing. Sigrid was doing her best not to laugh, either, and stared down at her lap to keep quiet.

Bard sighed. Why did such things always fall to him to explain? He sighed again.

“We’re all going to live in our house, Tilda, because that’s what families do. Thran and I are going to be a family together with all of you, in a house for all of us.”

“Finally,” Sigrid exhaled, shaking her head.

Bard gave her a look. “It was nice the way you all hung me out to dry like that. I’m supposed to be recuperating.”

“I just wanted to see if you’d really say it,” Sigrid shrugged.

“Father?” Legolas finally spoke. He still looked confused.

“Yes, synok?” Thran answered softly.

“On Wednesday, we’re going to move to Bard’s house?”

Thran nodded. “To a house for all of us, yes. Out of our bare apartment upstairs, and into a real home.”

“Will I still go to boarding school?”

“Only if you wish to. As soon as we move our things, Bard and I will look at schools for all of you, and for new fencing and archery coaches for you, and perhaps a soccer coach for Bain, if he wants that.”

“I want to be with you, Father. And it would be nice to have another brother and two sisters.”
“The sisters can be a right pain, so it’d be a relief to finally have someone else on my side. Right now, I’m outnumbered,” Bain grimaced, which drew Sigrid to stick her tongue out at him.

“Have I explained everything so you understand, Til?” Bard hugged his youngest child carefully, in deference to his stitches.

“We’re going to be a family with Legolas and Thran,” she summarized. “And we’re going to live in our house together with them.”

“That’s right.”

“I’m not sure how I feel yet. I’ll miss my friends.”

“That’s okay, little doll. You may not know for a while how you feel. Not all of this will be easy. But once we get settled, things will be easier. We can talk about it any time you want to. We’ll help each other to get through it.”

“Father?” Legolas asked.

“Yes?”

“We’re... not just moving because of what I did yesterday, are we?”

“You did nothing wrong yesterday, Legolas,” Thran shook his head emphatically. “As Bard said, we had planned to move, and so now we merely move earlier than we expected. I love Bard very much, and want us to be that family he spoke of. Clan Ffyrnig. While I do not like what happened yesterday, I am still very happy that we will become a family earlier than we hoped. I am proud of you, and all of our clan, for what we did yesterday. We did not start a fight. But we finished it.”

“Yeah,” Bain seconded, but softly. He took Legolas’s arm and jostled it. “It’s okay, Legolas. I should have told you about the druggie stop, and I didn’t think to do it. So if it’s anybody’s fault, it’s mine. You didn’t know. It’s okay.”

“So now that the big secret’s out in the open,” Sigrid said, “What’s Clan Ffyrnig’s first order of business? I say we get our hands on a lot of boxes and start packing.”

“Will I have to leave my toys here?” Tilda asked in a small voice.

“Not even one,” Bard hugged her. “All your toys and books will move with us. Everything.”

Tilda looked around at the apartment. “I think we’d better get a lot of boxes, then.”

And so they did. Sigrid found a moving office that sold boxes, so they called to reserve enough for both apartments, then Bard headed out with Thran and the boys to pick them up. Bard was not allowed to lift anything, only drive the truck. Once they luged the boxes inside, packing commenced.

The next few days were a flurry of sorting, packing, and stacking, with little time for anything else. Thran and Legolas had very little to pack, and the movers would take care of the furniture. They spent most of their time in Apartment 2A, helping Bard and his children pack the contents of their crowded rooms into cardboard boxes, separating only to sleep. There were a few loose ends to tie up – Bard let the police know that they were moving, and what their new address was. Thran scheduled an interview at a school that looked promising for all of the older children, and another at a school for Tilda. Still, the stack of cartons by the door grew higher, and the children’s rooms were soon bare of everything but the minimum needed to get through those few days. The kitchen was reduced to a stack of paper plates, plastic utensils, a couple of pans, and the teakettle.

Wednesday morning dawned. Everyone was up early to eat the odd assortment leftovers from the fridge – a few pieces of leftover pizza, oatmeal, an odd bowl of stew, and a bowl of hard-boiled eggs. When a heavy hand banged on the door, everyone stilled, and Bard went to the door to reveal a thickset man with a red Mohawk, a formidable beard full of dangling charms, and a pair of matching dangles in one ear.

“And a good morning to you. Dain Brothers. You the Bowmans?” he whuffed.

“That’s us,” Bard nodded.

This flat and 5B, too, right?”

“Yes, sir,” Bard nodded.

“Right. All right, I’ll have my boys get started on your boxes while I have a look upstairs. Want to get this lot loaded right quick. The van’s double parked.”

“Suits us,” Bard agreed, as another mover came to the door, this one with spiky black hair, a black and white-striped beard, and a huge dangling earring. He muttered in a language so guttural that Bard couldn’t tell if it were Slavic, Germanic, or Mongolian. The lead mover answered back in the same tongue, and headed with Thran upstairs.

A steady stream of moving men soon descended upon them. Bard was impressed with how fast the apartment emptied, first of the many boxes, then the furniture. Occasionally some piece of Thran’s possessions came twisting down the stairs to join their things in the van. The children stayed in the kitchen for the most part, for Bard and Thran were leery of them lingering on the sidewalk for long, not knowing whether the heroin gang would be lurking nearby. Tilda was content to stay inside with Mr. Bun; she was still feeling the effects of those few moments of terror in the park, and had stayed close to Bard since. The older children had their various computers and gaming consoles in hand, preferring to take them themselves rather than pack them in the moving van.

By eleven, Dain Brothers movers had emptied both apartments, closed the back of the van, and driven off. They’d meet Clan Ffyrnig at the house.

Bard, Thran, and the children took one more look around their empty apartments, but they were not long looks. The better view lay forty-five minutes away, and everyone was excited to get there.

“Everyone make one last trip through the bathroom,” Bard called, as they trooped down from Thran’s apartment. “Once I turn in the key, you’re stuck until we get to the house.”

Everyone cycled through Apartment 2A, then Bard locked the door for the last time. Thran took the keys upstairs to give them to Steffen, then they were out on the sidewalk. Bard’s truck was just half a block down, and they walked briskly to it and piled inside. Thran and Bard stuck the cooler holding the few remaining perishable food items in the back, then climbed into the front seat on either side of Tilda. Bard started the truck, but before he put it in gear, he looked around at everyone.

“Everyone ready? Seatbelts on?”

“Yes, we’re ready.”

“Next stop, the ancestral home of Clan Ffyrnig.”

As Bard maneuvered the truck away from the curb, he wasn’t the only one grinning.
Chapter 27

Chapter Summary

The consecration of the house happens in the best way - with a pot of hearty soup and a loaf of good bread.

Thran found it hard to control his excitement as Bard pointed the truck down the road and onto the highway. Grinning widely, he looked over Tilda’s head at Bard, and got a wide grin in response. He looked behind at the older children, still smiling. Sigrid looked especially smug, and he offered her a wink as befitted her standing as excellent co-conspirator. She chuckled silently and winked back. Legolas, he was happy to see, was also smiling as he leaned towards Bain to share a word.

Tilda sat quietly with Mr. Bun firmly in hand. She had not been herself since the fracas in the park, but she was gradually coming back to her normal sunny self. Perhaps the house, far away from the menace of the heroin gang, would further ease her.

The forty-five minute trip passed slowly, but that was due to Thran’s anticipation rather than traffic. The last time he’d been to the house, it was as a guest, with Legolas to fence, and Bard had done a lot since then. Now he returned as a resident, part of a family, something that had never been true anywhere else before. The heart of this new home, the kitchen, would be the biggest change, for it was ready to host them. Once the movers unloaded their things, there would be chairs enough to go around the table, and more pots and pans, and dishes and glasses and bowls. They still needed a trip to the market to fill the refrigerator, but other than that, everything would soon be ready for Bard to fire up the stove and cook. And then they would eat together.

As a family.

If Bard had asked him to explain what this meant to him, he would not have been able to.

“The first thing we need to do when we get to the house,” Bard said, “is for Legolas to choose his room. There are four you can choose from, Legolas. Any of them is fine. Then we can tell the movers where to put your things.”

“I get to choose? Legolas repeated. He sounded surprised, and when Thran turned to regard him, his brow was wrinkled.

“Course,” Bard replied. “There’s a couple on the top level, but they’ll be the hottest part of the house in the summer, so think about that. There are two on the same floor as the other children’s rooms, so you’d be closer to them. It’s your choice.”

“If Legolas picks one of the top rooms, can I move up there, too?” Bain asked, then looked at Legolas. “If you wouldn’t mind, of course.”

“Sure, but remember how hot it gets up there in July and August,” Bard reiterated. “And you’d still have the same bedtime.”

“Aw, Da,” Bain grumbled.

“You still have to get up for school, no matter what room you’re in, Bain. But let Legolas choose “what he wants before you go moving yours.”

“Yes, Da.”

Thran had the feeling that having a son away in boarding school for four years had dulled his parenting skills, but four children would soon change that. Thank goodness Bard was well versed, or there would soon be havoc in the house.

“The next thing we need to do is to decide where the big things go, Thran, so the two of us can help direct the movers. I’m sure there will be several things that we’ll end up shifting, but it’ll help if we can get most of the big stuff in the right places. I hope that the movers will put the bed frames together and place the mattresses, which’ll help.”

“I will be ready,” Thran nodded. He looked down at Tilda. “I think perhaps our Tilda would be a good helper for you, Bard, as you should not lift anything heavy. And Mr. Bun.”

Struck by the idea, Tilda looked up at him with interest, an expression that didn’t escape Bard.

“That’s a great idea. What do you say, Til? You can help me direct traffic while Thran helps Bain, Legolas, and Sigrid.”

“Okay,” she nodded, smiling a bit. “I can do that.”

“I heard the movers say they’d stop someplace for lunch before they deliver our things, so why don’t we stop someplace, too? Then we’ll be ready to get our things arranged.”

That met with unanimous approval, so the discussion turned to where to stop. Everyone was too excited to want something that took a long time, so they ended up at the carryout bar of a local grocery while Bard went around collecting enough things to tide them over for a few days. Thran got his usual salad, then a big slab of lasagna for Bard. The children got noodle bowls or sandwiches.

The rest of the way to the house passed quickly, and they pulled into the driveway. As they carried their lunches into the kitchen, Thran marveled at the change the appliances made. Bard had been right – this was a home now. While Bard quickly put a pot of soup on to simmer for tonight’s supper, the children sat around the table to engulf their food, too excited to spend long at it. Legolas and Bain ran off to choose the former’s room, leaving Thran to slip Bard’s lasagna into the microwave to reheat it.

“How long should this heat, Bard?” Thran asked, fingers hovering over the control pad. “A minute? Ten?”

Bard looked up from his pot. “Um, maybe three? Push three-nil-nil, then Power, then seven, then Start.”

“What does the seven mean?”

“That’s to cook at seventy percent power. So that the inside gets hot before the outside turns into leather. Thank you, fy nghariad.”

“Let me help you so you have time to eat before the movers get here. What else needs to go in your soup?”

“The meat and onions are brown, and I splurged just this once to buy cut-up veg because we don’t have a knife yet, so that’s in. Just open the can of tomato stuff, and pour that in.”
Thran looked around in various drawers. “Is there a can opener?”

Bard winced. “Hmm, that’s in the moving van, too. We’ll add that later. So all it needs is water. Just to the top of the cut-up stuff.”

In the cupboard, Thran found a tea glass in a silver metal holder and used that to add water to the pot. He held up the glass to Bard. “This is beautiful. This is one of the podstakanniks you found last Wednesday?”

“I did. Only seven, so one got dropped somewhere in its life, but as there are six of us, we have one to spare. And look in that cupboard. I saw that and thought of you.”

A Japanese teapot in black cast iron sat in the cupboard, along with a standard set of five handleless porcelain cups. “I like it very much. So elegant!”

“Like a certain dancer I know,” Bard smiled. “Maybe I can find another set of teacups so we have more than the usual five. Or someone can use one of your podstakanniks. All right, soup’s on for later.”

The microwave chimed. “Then come eat your lasagna, Bard, before the movers get here.”

Thran carried the container of lasagna to the table and urged Bard to sit before it. Tilda was still working on her cheese sandwich, and Sigrid had almost finished her bowl of noodles. Thran found a couple of forks in a drawer, and sat down beside Bard to eat his salad.

Thran accepted the taste. “Mmm. Lots of cheese.”

“You and Tilda,” Bard grinned, ruffling Tilda’s hair. “She loves her cheese sandwiches.”

“I would not be a good person to work in a cheese shop,” Thran admitted. “That is the hardest thing for me to resist, much more than sweets.”

“I wouldn’t be very good in a cheese shop either,” Tilda decided, after thinking about it. “I’d want to try all of them.”

“Is there a cheese shop in the village?” Thran asked. “Perhaps you and I can find a few things to try there. If we go together, we can help each other not to eat too much.”

Tilda brightened. “That would be fun. And we’ll know a good place to go for Christmas presents next year.”

“Then we will venture out soon in search of cheese shops,” Thran agreed.

Bard wolfed down the rest of his lasagna. “Better show you and Til where things are supposed to go before the movers get here. Bring your sandwich, little doll. Sig, you want to come, too?”

“Sure. I want to see all the stuff you got last week. I’ve never seen a fainting couch before.”

They went through the house quickly, deciding where to place what little furniture they had; most of it would go into the children’s bedrooms. As they went upstairs, Legolas and Bain met them to show off the room the former had chosen. The attraction of the private upper rooms was difficult to resist, but the rooms were smaller, and the summer heat had swung the decision. Legolas chose a room on the same side of the house as Bain’s, with a room between them that all four children could share as a study and playroom. Tilda and Sigrid had their rooms on the other side of the house, with the main bathroom and the narrow servants' staircase up to the third floor between them. The master bedroom, closet, and bath stretched the length of the floor on the northern side of the house, between the two sides.

There was just time for Thran to see the fragmented bed frame that Bard had pieced together, and to feel an anticipatory lurch in his loins when he thought about ravishing a certain saint within it. But that would have to wait until Bard could repair it, and they could order the needed mattress and bedding. For now, Thran’s bed would have to do. So he helped Bard shift the pieces into the playroom, so that the movers could set Thran’s bed into place.

A bang on the door signaled the arrival of the Dain brothers. Tilda ran downstairs first, at last giving her excitement full rein, but the other children came right behind. Sharing a grin, Thran and Bard followed only a bit less slowly, and soon the parade of boxes and furniture began. Sigrid ran through the house to tape the room labels she’d readied to doors and walls to help direct the movers. Bard and Tilda stood in the central hall to direct each load to its correct room, and the two boys raced around looking at each new addition.

Thran spent a little time directing movers and children, but mostly he watched his saint. With each box or article of furniture that came in, Bard’s face grew lighter. Time and again, he looked around to remind himself that this was reality – his family had returned to its home, a family that had expanded to include two more in its circle. Time and again, he swallowed hard as he struggled to contain his emotions.

It took less time to empty the van than it had to fill it, so by just past three the last box came inside, and the movers filed out. Thran took care of the bill, and shut the door behind them. The children had all gone upstairs to unpack their things, leaving Bard to stand beside Hope the Lope. The soup had sent its aroma through the house, and the children’s excited conversation drifted to Thran as he turned back to Bard.

His saint looked up at the ceiling of the stairwell two floors above, and swallowed yet again. Thran came to his side to envelope him in his arms.

“We are home, lyubov moya.”

Arms wound around his ribs, tightening until they were close. “We are. I’d thought we never would be. But we are. Thank you for it all.”

“Not just me, Bard. You, too. You have made this our home. Thank you for it all, too.”

Bard pressed a kiss to Thran’s jaw, and stroked the back of his head gently. “Both of us, then. I just...”

“Yes,” Thran rubbed Bard’s back slowly. ”I feel it, too.”

They held each other for long seconds, because today was the end of a long famine and the start of better times. Eventually, Bard’s arms tightened around Thran briefly, then eased away.

“Better see what the children need before it gets too late. And somewhere in all of this, we need to find their bedding...”

“I saw those boxes go upstairs,” Thran assured Bard as they started upstairs. “So they will have their blankets and pillows soon enough.”

The afternoon was spent getting the children’s rooms in shape. The movers hadn’t assembled the bedframes, but with everyone helping those were soon put together and the mattresses returned to their proper places. Sigrid and Tilda found the boxes of linens, and bit by bit four rooms full of stacked boxes transformed to occupied rooms. Tilda finally put Mr. Bun down to arrange her books on the bookshelf, and the boys debated whether to put the computers in their rooms or in their study.

“In the study,” Bard and Thran both chorused, much to their amusement, which prompted a protest from both boys. “The bedrooms are for sleeping and quiet time,” Bard continued. “The playroom is for playing.”

“Father...” Legolas looked exasperated.

“Bedroom, sleep and quiet. Study, ‘more stuff blows up,’” Thran reiterated. “And schoolwork, in its time. We will have to get them desks, Bard.”

“Agreed. Sig, how’s your room coming? Do you need help with the mattresses?”

“I’ve got the bed together, and the mattresses down. But... I can’t find my mattress pad?”

Tilda trotted into her room and came out with the pad. “I have it, Sigrid. It was with mine.”

“Thanks, Tilda,” Sigrid smiled. “Do you need help with your sheets?”

“With the bottom one, yes, please.”

“I’ll help you with that, then.”

Thran took over unloading towels and bathroom supplies while Bard helped Tilda unload her clothes into the closet. They left the children to continue arranging their things and went downstairs to unload kitchen items. Thran unpacked and unwrapped while Bard added the last ingredients to the soup, then they arranged items on shelves and in cupboards. The soup continued to simmer, its warm aroma promising that a good supper was on the way.

“We’ll have to leave the rest of this until later,” Bard said. “The soup’s ready.”

“I will move some of the chairs from the dining room in here. The garden chairs go back in the ballroom for now, yes?” Thran asked Bard.

“They’ll go outside on the terrace before long, but for now, into the ballroom with them.”

Bard came around to pick up one end of the bench, drawing Thran to tsk.

“Your stitches, Bard. I will call the boys, and they will move this out as they moved it in.”

“My stitches are fine, Thran.”

“Of course they are. And I intend for them to stay that way.” He went through the dining room and into the central hall to call up to the boys, who quickly appeared to haul the garden furniture out of the kitchen, and three of the chairs from Bard’s apartment out of the dining room and into the kitchen. They now had enough chairs to seat everyone at the big kitchen table.

“Supper in ten minutes,” Bard told the boys as they headed back upstairs. “Tell the girls, and make sure you wash your hands.”

They ran off with assurances of both, leaving Thran to bear Bard’s reproachful look.

“I’m not going to rip out my stitches by moving a few chairs, angel.”
“As I said, of course not, for I will not let you. So, I found the spoons and such earlier. Where are the plates and bowls?”

Sighing, Bard gestured to the correct cabinet and stirred the soup again.

Thran stroked Bard's back as he went by, and pressed a kiss on his neck. “I know you are not made of glass, lyubov moya. No more than I. Do not be angry that I look after you as well as you do me.”

“I’m not angry,” Bard murmured, lips curving into a chagrined smile. “Not at all. I’m not a good invalid, that’s all.”

“All of us should be such good invalids as you, dear saint. You have worked hard all afternoon to set our children right, and you have made us delicious soup, and all is perfection. Where is the bread knife?”

“It’s supposed to be in the knife block, but... I don’t know where the knife block is. Maybe it got stuck in the pantry?”

“I will look. Yes, it is with the canister of flour. Did we ever find the can opener?”

“I found that. Now we have the knives. Is the cutting board in there?”

Thran kept rummaging. “What color is it? White?”

“There’s a wooden one. A little bigger than the white one.”

“Not here.” He stuck his head out of the pantry. “Where else would a cutting board be?”

“With the cookie sheets, maybe? Same size. I think it got packed with the cookie sheets. So...” Bard studied the cabinets, then opened a tall, thin one. “Right. Cookie sheets, roasting pan – ah. Here’s the wooden cutting board.”

Thran pulled it out. “I think it will take us some time to sort everything out, yes?”

Bard grinned. “Yes. But we’ll have a good time doing it. I can’t think of anything else I’d rather do tonight.”

Thran slid a few things around on the kitchen island to make room for the cutting board, retrieved the bread knife, and unwrapped the loaf of French bread. “I can. Do you want me to put the knife block by the stove? It would be convenient there.”

“That’d be fine. What would you rather do? Unpack the stuff in the main room?”

Thran sliced the French bread into rounds. “After supper, we will unpack and arrange our bedroom, lyubov moya. After that, nothing will stop me when I take a saint to bed.”

Bard paused in his stirring to stare off into space, then looked around at Thran. “Um... did I say something rash about rearranging the kitchen tonight?”

Thran’s looked through his lashes at Bard. “I do not think so.”

Bard put down his soup ladle, came around the kitchen island, and settled Thran’s hips against his. “Oh, good. Because I just thought of a few things to do that are much better than rearranging the kitchen.”

“Did you?” Thran left the bread knife on the cutting board to put his arms around Bard’s neck and brush a kiss on his lips. “I can think of a few, too. Perhaps more than a few.”

“Mmm,” Bard kissed back. “But I warn you...”

“What?”

“It’s our first night in a strange house. Don’t be surprised if we’re interrupted while our children settle in.”

“Hmm. I had not thought of that. You are likely right. Especially Tilda. She will not have her sister in her room now, and she may be apprehensive.”

“She’s the first one I expect. Sigrid is fine. The boys.... could go either way. So all we may get until late is not much of anything.”

“Father first, lover second,” Thran sighed, looking down at his feet, then up at Bard again. “So it will likely be. But at least we will be in the same bed. That in itself is a big accomplishment.”

Bard grinned as he rubbed his hips against Thran’s. “A very big accomplishment. We’ll see how far we get after that.”

The boys’ voices rose as they clattered down the stairs, so Thran and Bard eased apart to finish their preparations for supper. Thran sliced bread and fetched butter from the refrigerator. Bard gave a final stir to the soup, and set out salt, pepper, and a container of strawberries. When the boys came in, Bard had them set flatware and plates around the table, and Thran went to call the girls down. As the children chose their seats – girls to one side, boys to the other, with Thran and Bard at the ends – Thran carted the soup pot to the table, and Bard brought the bread. Bard ladled out bowls of soup, which went around the table, and everyone set to.

At first, everyone was too hungry to talk, but as the soup pot contents diminished, conversation began again. The children were still excited, but were more subdued than they had been at lunch, evidence that the day’s rigors had tired them. They shared out the kitchen cleanup duties, then headed upstairs. The boys retreated to play a video game, and Sigrid decided to read and listen to music. Bard made sure Tilda had everything she needed for her shower, helped her fiddle with the water until it was warm, then retreated. He met Thran coming from the boys’ sanctuary, and they went into their room together –

It was a disaster.

The bed frame was piled in a corner. The box springs still leaned against the wall, but the mattress had fallen over onto a stack of boxes, which had tipped over. Other boxes filled the floor, leaving no room to set up the bed frame. They looked at each other.

“Pile the boxes outside until we get the bed set up?” Bard suggested.

“I will get the boys.”

“No –” Bard blurted. When Thran eyed him, he blushed. “I mean, we don’t need them trooping in here... right now. What’s in the boxes?”

Thran opened one. “Clothing. We could just hang it up and then put the cartons outside the door.”

Thran smothered a smile. His saint was cute when he was flustered, but he said nothing as he reached into the box for the first items of clothing.

Most of the first several boxes held clothing that went in the closet. As they arranged things, Bard described how he’d combined the original bedroom with a small sitting room to add the walk-in closet on the left side of the room, and the bathroom on the right. The bathroom had a lot of work left, but the shower was finished, and would hold them until the big soaking tub was put in. Thran looked forward to that, especially after grueling rehearsals in the middle of winter. He was touched that Bard had thought so much of his comfort.

The next several boxes were linens, which went in the bathroom closet. That made enough room to move the bed frame pieces into place in the center of the room. The frame went together quickly, and they put the box springs in place. Thran would have preferred asking the boys to help haul the big king-sized mattress into place, but with a little maneuvering they walked the mattress over to the bed and flopped it into place without endangering Bard’s stitches. The dressers went against the walls, and the nightstands went to either side of the bed. When Thran placed lamps on both nightstands, the mess resolved into a bedroom. Thran found the box with the bed linens, and before long, his nest of silk and cashmere beckoned.

Thran flattened the box, and put it outside the bedroom with the others by the stairs. He turned back to find Bard considering the bed, one arm crossed over his chest, and the other hand scratching the small tufts of beard under his lips and on his chin.

“Yes?” Thran purred.

Bard glanced at him. “You don’t want to know. I think I’d better check on the children.”

Thran chuckled. “Then I will see to Legolas, too. Then I want a shower.”

“At least,” Bard agreed. “So, children.”

They went to the boys first. Both had washed and changed into pajamas, and sat on Bain’s bed looking at a video. “It’s late, Bain,” Bard said. “Time for lights out.”

“So it is for you, too, Legolas,” Thran said. “We have many things to do tomorrow to settle ourselves, so sleep well.”

It was a mark of the boys’ fatigue that neither argued, and they were both soon tucked into bed and wished a good night.

Sigrid was ready to rest, and was just getting out of the shower when Bard came to tell her goodnight. She had a ready smile and hug for both Bard and Thran, and shut her door softly behind them.

Tilda was last. She was so tired that she was nearly asleep, with Mr. Bun firmly in her grasp. No bedtime story was needed to coax her to sleep.

“I'll leave a light on in the bathroom for you,” Bard said. “And your night light, too.”

“Okay.”

“How’s Mr. Bun? He looks pretty sleepy to me.”

“He is,” Tilda yawned. “So am I.”

“I can tell. Here’s Thran to tell you good night.”
“Good night, ma petite,” Thran said softly, kneeling at the edge of Tilda’s bed. He kissed her hand. “Sleep well.”

“Night, Thran,” she murmured, all but asleep.

Bard took Thran’s place. He leaned over to brush a kiss on Tilda’s hair. “Good night, little doll. I’ll see you in the morning. I love you.”

“Love you, too, Da.”

Bard switched the small nightlight by the door to glow dimly, then turned off the lamp by Tilda’s bed. He and Thran tiptoed out, and Bard eased the door closed. As he took one more look back, Tilda curled around her toy, and was instantly asleep.

The house was silent, and the nightlight in the children’s bathroom cast enough light to see the stacks of folded boxes and the few left to be unpacked. But Thran had no eyes for cardboard, whether full or empty. He had eyes only for his saint.

He reached for Bard’s hand, urging him towards their room. Smiling, Bard let Thran draw him inside their sanctuary, sliding the pocket doors shut behind them, then easing Thran into his arms. Hands stroked his hair, and fingers caressed his ears, his jaw, his lips. As delicious as these touches were, they were only the beginning.

Silk and cashmere awaited them both.
Chapter 28

Chapter Summary

The move is over, the hour is late, and the children are finally in bed. It's time for an angel and a saint to begin their private celebration.

Yes, all - THAT moment is finally here... at least the first part is. Enjoy yet another chapter that earns this story an Explicit rating.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

ya lyublyu tebya = I love you (Russian) zoloto moyo = my treasure (Russian) rwy'n dy garu di = I love you (Welsh)

“We’re both gritty,” Bard murmured, as Thran nuzzled his neck and rubbed his back slowly.

Thran bit Bard’s earlobe. “I like gritty. In fact, I like almost anything you’d care to indulge in. What would you like first?”

“Mmm. I’ve thought about that every day since we met. I could never decide whether I wanted to take you first on the barre, the way you wanted me to that Saturday, or in this bed, the way I wanted to when I fixed your radiators.”

Thran grinned. “You thought of us as lovers that early? I am flattered.”

“I tried not to think about it at all. You were way out of my league.”

“Do you still think so?”

“I’m down to thinking so only half of the time.”

“I can think of six different games we can play with that. But I would prefer not to play any games tonight. This is our first night in our home, and our first night together. It is our marriage night, in all but the ceremony, which will come at some point. So let tonight be between us, rather than between characters in a game.”

“I’d like that, too,” Bard stroked Thranduil’s beautiful white hair. “I want to marvel at you for a while before I do anything else.”

“I think I shall marvel for my own part, too. So first we bathe. You start, and I will join you in a moment - I must get the champagne from the wine fridge.”

Bard chuckled and looked at Thran askance. “The champagne?”
“Of course, the champagne,” Thran shrugged as if it were obvious. “Did you expect any less? This is the most special of special nights.”

“Children allowing,” Bard amended.

“Children allowing. Now, you start the shower, and I will get the champagne.”

“Hurry back.” Bard pressed a kiss under Thran’s jaw, just where it met his neck. “The shower’s got room for two.”

Thran’s eyebrows went up in anticipation. “I will fly, lyubov moya.”

As Thran hurried out of the bedroom, Bard savored a grin, then bent to unlace his boots and toss them in the closet. He stripped off his clothes, dumped them in the laundry basket, and found his usual sleep tee and flannel pants. He prayed he wouldn’t need them tonight, which would be true only if all four children stayed asleep. He laid them on the foot of the bed rather than on the floor on one side; he didn’t know which side Thran preferred. After so many years of sleeping in a single bed, Bard didn’t have a preference, so it’d be easier for him to accommodate whichever one Thran didn’t prefer.

He padded naked into the bathroom to strip off the bandage covering his stitches. It’d be at least another week, if not longer, before they’d come out. He was supposed to keep them bandaged so that neither clothing nor sheets irritated them, but damned if he’d wear purple surgical tape and steri-strips to bed on the first night he slept with an angel. He’d rebandage them once they decided to sleep – if that happened – but not before. He was still looking in the mirror to peel away the tape when Thran appeared in the bedroom with a tray. A big bowl of ice had a champagne bottle stuck in the middle of it, and a bottle opener and two flutes were beside it. Thran put the tray in the middle of the bed, disappeared into the closet to strip his clothes, and then eased into the bathroom. Bard paused, too intent on the beautiful nude before him to bother with removing adhesive tape from his ribs. At sight of Bard’s bandage, however, Thran’s anticipatory smile turned somber.

“I have not seen your stitches since I watched them sewn in,” Thran said softly. “Do they trouble you?”

Bard shook his head. "Just itchy, which is a good sign. I’ve followed all the directions, so they’re healing well. I can get them wet now, which means I can take a shower. I can’t stay under the water for long, but I can for long enough to get a good scrub.”

He peeled the surgical tape off bit by bit, trying not to rip out any more hair than he had to, but he wasn’t all that successful, and he winced several times along the way. Finally, the mirror revealed the five-inch scar running parallel to his ribs on his left side, punctuated at regular intervals with black stitches. Thran tsked and shook his head.

“My poor saint.”

“What, you’re saying I don’t look good in black silk?”

“That is not the kind of silk I would prefer you wear.”

“They won’t be there long. Another ten days, no more. In a few weeks, it won’t look like anything.”

“Good.”

“You want me scruffy, or shaved? Your choice.”
Thran’s lips twitched slyly as he considered. “That is a most difficult choice. Perhaps shaved, as long as you do not take off this,” he kissed the small tuft of hair on Bard’s chin, “or this,” he kissed the tuft under his lower lip, “or this,” he kissed Bard’s mustache, “or these.” He kissed each of Bard’s sideburns.

“That doesn’t leave me much to shave,” Bard teased. He stroked Thran’s cheek. “Do you have to shave at all? Other than your pits, I mean.”

Thran snorted. “Of course I do. But as all of my hair is white, no one thinks that I do.”

“The pits are because of the dancing?”

Thran nodded. “The sensibilities of the purists, I suppose. It is less obvious on me than on others, but I follow the tradition nevertheless. If you shave, then so should I. It would be easier on your thighs. Assuming I let you off with just a blow job, which I am not inclined to do.”

The offhand remark caught Bard by surprise, and he snorted in laughter. “Bastard.”

Thran cupped his hand over Bard’s cock, fondling it briefly before sidling away to find his razor. “Entirely.”

“You’re going to find yourself fucked in front of the mirror rather in bed if you don’t watch it,” Bard growled.

“That is the pleasure of the mirror, of course. I can watch you fuck me as well as feel it. I would enjoy it immensely, and I am sure we will do it thusly before long. But tonight, let us wash first.”

“Then stop teasing me. Or I’ll be too wired to shave.”

“If I must,” was Thran’s unrepentant reply. He lathered and drew his razor over his cheeks and chin quickly; Bard took longer to maneuver carefully around his mustache and tufts and sideburns. Thran stepped into the shower cabinet and adjusted the water, sighing as the hot water rained over him. Bard brushed his teeth and came in after him, unable to keep himself from stroking the water-slicked alabaster skin before him. Thran hummed in such pleasure that Bard groped for the body wash – only to be confronted by an elegant collection of dark grey bottles and jars, all of them unlabeled.

“Um, which one is your body wash, fy nghariad?”

Thran selected one of the bottles and handed it to Bard. “This one.”

“No labels?”

Thran smiled. “Other than a saint, I have very few indulgences. These are one of the few. I must look after the Prince of Ice properly, so these see to my appearance. They are formulated for me in France.”

“And probably cost more than a small car,” Bard quipped, squeezing out a dollop of pearly white liquid. “Washcloth good, or just my hands?”

“Washcloth. But gently, please.”

Bard eased the plush cloth over Thran’s back in long, slow strokes until Thran purred.

“They are worth it. I work very hard, and a hot bath is a much-needed restorative on many days. Exotic scents and soothing oils make the hot water feel even better. Though tonight I find my nice soap feels even better when a saint strokes it so deliciously over my back.”

“Turn around, and I’ll stroke it so deliciously over the rest of you.”

Thran complied. “You are a delight, lyubov moya.”

Bard took his time, caressing the exquisite body of his angel from top to bottom. First the long neck, then broad shoulders, sculpted arms, and elegant fingers. Then the flaring chest, flexing so enticingly as Thran reveled in his touch. Such a long, long, abdomen with lean bands of muscle that beckoned with the slightest move, and such narrow hips, and the groins cradling the white nest of hair with its long treasure within. Hard, rounded buttocks just aching to be kneaded, impossibly long legs with well-developed thighs and calves, and long, elegant feet. Touching this treasure was far too carnal to be an act of worship, but worship was what Bard considered it, nevertheless. Why, in the name of all things sacred and profane didn’t his angel have an entire harem of worshippers, all of them princes and princesses begging to see to his every need?

“Because I am just a beautiful animal to them, a performer. The Prince of Ice. I would always play that role for them, never myself. You love me as I am.”

Bard swallowed. He hadn’t realized he’d spoken that question aloud. “‘You as you are’ is spectacular.”

“You are no less spectacular. I am merely the more flamboyant of the two.” Thran offered him a wet kiss. “I will wash my hair, and then I will tend to you.”

Strange purple liquid went into Thran’s hair. He massaged gently, only on his scalp, then squeezed the soap through the rest with painstaking care. Bard took the moment to soap and rinse his hair and face, but when he finished Thran still carefully tended to his mane.

“Purple shampoo?”

Thran grinned. “I like my hair icy white. Purple keeps it so. Other colors turn it yellow.”

“You are a vain creature, Thran.”

“I make the most of what I have. Granted, that is a great deal, but there is no vanity to care for it well.”

“You can’t tell me that you don’t like the way people look at you.”

He shook his head. “I cannot. But if they choose to look at me, I prefer them to see nothing less than the best of me. It is actually an asset that I take these pains, because if my hair is not so white, or my skin is not so smooth, then some think I am not so perfect, and then look for flaws when I dance. Some will always look for flaws when I dance, but I do not have to encourage them to do so.”

Thran stuck his head under the water, letting the suds flush out of his hair. With his head thrown back, hands in his hair, eyes closed, sheeting water, Bard could easily imagine what he would look like under him in the midst of their passion, and couldn’t keep from easing himself against Thran’s chest. He filled his hands with pale, rounded buttocks, and nuzzled a kiss on first one nipple, then another. Thran continued to let the water flow through his hair, his eyes still shut, but with a smile on his lips. He brought his hands down to cradle Bard’s face and kissed him, his tongue pressing against Bard’s teeth, then filling his mouth. Bard’s cock twitched in urgency, drawing both of Thran’s hands to massage it until Bard growled. Thran chuckled.

“I think we had better wash you now, or the bed will miss its christening.”
“Then stop teasing me, bastard. You’re driving me crazy.”

“Not intentionally. I merely wash my hair.”

“Like hell you do. You like to tease.”

“I like to see that need in your eyes, because it matches what I feel, so to posture a little as I wash my hair makes us both happy. So let me caress you as you caressed me, and then we will find other ways to tease each other.”

Thran put some of his soap on Bard’s washcloth and began to rub his shoulders.

“That’s your expensive stuff, Thran. Mine’s in the blue bottle.”

“I want my scent on you. Think of it as a measure of the delight you are, or comfort in our closeness, or me as I claim my property, whichever one arouses you more.”

“Hedonist bastard,” Bard growled, but the last syllable ended in more moan than growl. “Gods, that feels good.”

“Does it?” Thran questioned, smiling. “Imagine that.”

“I don’t have to imagine, not while you’re doing it. It’s the most erotic thing I’ve ever done in a shower.”

“Hmm. It seems I have some things to show you, especially when your stitches are gone, and especially when our tub arrives. That was generous of you, the soaking tub. You take very good care of me.”

“I intend to waste you a few times in that tub, so it wasn’t entirely altruistic.”

“Even better. Love and lust are a divine combination.”

“You’re a treasure, Thran.”

Bard shut his eyes and let Thran work his magic over his skin. Long, elegant fingers stroked and caressed as they washed him clean, and the rigors of the day’s move melted away into warmth.

“I will wash your stitches very gently with my fingers,” Thran warned, when the rest of him was clean. “You will tell me if it hurts. I do not want to hurt you.”

“You won’t. You don’t have to wash much. It’s mostly a matter of rinsing everything completely afterwards.”

“All right. I begin.”

Light, hardly perceptible touches traced the wound. The healing flesh was still tender, but not uncomfortably so, and Thran was very careful.

“Rinse, lyubov moya.”

Bard did, careful not to let the shower spray land directly on his stitches. As he let the soap wash away, Thran squeezed out another of his potions, rubbed it between his palms, and then stroked it through his white hair. He rubbed what was left over his body, then added a little more.

“Lean over a little,” he invited, and rubbed the potion over Bard’s hair. It was some sort of smoother, because it coaxed Bard’s tangled hair into less of a tangle, and smelled delicious. It was the lingering aroma of that potion that was part of Thran’s unique scent. “Now rinse only a little. Leave some of it in.”

Bard stuck his head under the shower, running his fingers through his hair. “Whatever that stuff is, it smells wonderful.”

“I like it, too. A little argan oil, a little coconut oil, and other things. All good for hair. Are you ready to get out?”

“I’m as clean as I’m going to get. My body, anyway. I’ve still got impure thoughts about what I want to do with an angel.”

“Mmm. Should I tell you what anticipation of your impure thoughts does to me? Where the flush first begins, and where the ache begins?”

Bard’s loins clenched in response. “Oh, I think I’ve already got an idea of that, because I’m having the same reaction. Dry off, angel, before I take you on the floor.”

“Another delight we have yet to explore. But not yet. Bed and champagne first.”

Thran tossed him a towel, and took up another to towel off gently, as always careful with his pale skin and hair. He found the hair dryer, and flipped his hair over his head to dry it, again carefully, complete with diffuser that didn’t blow the white strands around. Bard wrapped his towel around his waist to watch. How did Thran manage to make such a mundane task look like a photo shoot? It was no wonder that cameras loved him so much – he seemed unable to do anything without grace. When he flipped his hair back over his shoulders, his cheeks were flushed, but they quickly paled to their normal hue. He put a hand to his heart and bowed, accepting Bard’s wordless admiration, then held out the hair dryer.

Laughing, Bard held up his hands. “Wouldn’t have the first idea of how to use that.”

“Then let me do it for you. Wet hair in bed is nice in the heat of summer, but not in the cold of winter. Please?”

Shrugging, Bard agreed. “This ought to be entertaining.”

A big smile crossed Thran’s face. “Of course. Lean over as I did. Oh, first, I need a comb. Your hair is thicker than mine.”

Bard proffered the comb, and leaned over as Thran requested. The dryer was warm, not too hot, and Thran’s fingers working through his hair was unexpectedly soothing. This must be why so many women loved trips to the hair salon – having someone tend to him like this was a luxury. Thran smeared something through his hair, something that smelled like the oil he’d offered in the shower, and the dryer went back to work. In a few minutes, Thran sat him down on the toilet to finish. He watched in the mirror as Thran’s expert fingers flicked a strand here and there. A little more of something else went through the bottom part of his hair, and a little more drying followed.

“There. Perhaps you will let me take you to my hairdresser for a trim, but nothing radical. I like your hair the way it is. Do you pull it back when you work your metal?”

Bard nodded. “Not the thing you want near an arc welder. Or a forging fire.”

Thran gathered Bard’s hair back in a tail, looking at him in the mirror. “It looks nice that way, too.” He let Bard’s hair go. “Or loose.” He ran his hands through both sides, holding just part of it back.
“Or halfway. Very beautiful.”

In the mirror, Thran seemed thoughtful as he stroked Bard’s hair.

“What’s that look mean?”

Thran’s expression waxed sly. “I recall the day we first kissed. Your hair looked as if you’d just risen from bed. Now you are about to go to bed with me. I cannot tell you how much I wanted you to then, or how much I have wanted you to since then.”

Bard got up from the stool, tossed his towel on the counter, and drew Thran close to kiss his lips. “Then take me to bed, angel. I want it as much as you do.”

Humming in anticipation, Thran let his hands fall to Bard’s hips and backed towards the bedroom, drawing Bard with him. Those same hands nestled him close for a long kiss at the foot of the bed, and kneaded his buttocks with strong fingers. Bard found Thran’s nipples to tease and massage, until Thran’s breath stuttered and caught, even as his lips nipped at Bard’s –

“What are these?” Thran broke away to seize Bard’s tee shirt and flannel pants and shake them at Bard.

Laughing at Thran’s indignation, Bard took his night clothing. “Which side of the bed is yours?”

Thran gestured at the left side. “Why?”

Bard tossed his things onto the floor beside the right side of the bed. “Because you’d better find some for yourself. With four children in the house, there will come a night where you’ll need them.”

“Ah. I am relieved they are only a precaution. I was concerned that you intended to wear such things into bed with me. Oh, what about your stitches? Do you need to bandage them?”

“I won’t wear purple surgical tape into bed with an angel any more than I will those flannel pants. So find something for yourself to put on the floor, and then we can get back to us.”

Thran rooted through his dresser for a tee shirt and leggings, dropped them on the floor by his pillow, and then sat on the foot of the bed. A smile was all Bard needed to join him as Thran pulled the champagne tray close. He slid a glance at Bard.

“I think we should drink this first, before we forget to drink it at all.”

“Good idea.”

Bard got the glasses while Thran uncorked the bottle, holding them out to be filled. The bottle went back on ice, and Thran held his glass up to the light, eyeing the bubbles.

“So, lyubov moya. In bed at last.”

“On the bed. Not yet in the bed.”

“True. But I enjoy the anticipation as much as the deed. There will be only one first time.”

“You’re liable to kill us both.”

“Also true. But it is a nice way to go.”

“Very nice. So here’s to a hell of a ride so far, in anticipation of a hell of a ride tonight.”
“Mmm. Perhaps more than one.”

“I hope so.”

They touched glasses, and sipped. The chilled mouthful tingled as it eased down Bard’s throat, then warmed in his belly. It was a heady sensation, tingling followed by warming, but nothing compared to having his angel clothed only in his hair beside him. Bard stroked that hair back from Thran’s jawline, his solar plexus clenching as Thran leaned into his hand. His eyes were half closed, and he sighed as he brushed a kiss on Bard’s hand. It was the only incentive Bard needed to put his glass back on the tray, then set the tray on the floor at their feet. Thran put his glass down on the tray, eyes bright, waiting to see whether Bard would make the first move, or if he should.

If Bard was first, grasping Thran’s shoulders and urging him into the nest of silk and cashmere, Thran was right behind, pulling Bard atop him, dragging them up into the eider pillows and between the layers of silk, his white hair flying around them like angel’s wings before settling into a corona around his head on the pillows. Pleading eyes, parted lips gasping endearments, frantic fingers clutching at his hips were so sweet, so urgent, that Bard fell into a hard kiss, teeth nipping at lips, tongue probing, taking all that was offered and offering his own in return. The hands on his buttocks vanished for a moment, but by the time the loss registered, well-lubricated, slippery hands were groping for his cock, then closing around it. Warm, rhythmic stroking was impossible to resist. Gods, gods, how could anyone deny such insistent, talented hands? But that was only the start. Thran curled his hips, and put his feet on Bard’s buttocks, still stroking his cock without mercy. He stopped stroking only to guide Bard’s cock into position, and then pressed Bard that first little bit inside.

“Oh, gods, Thran, it’s too much, I can’t stop, I don’t want to hurt you –”

“You won’t. I took precautions earlier. I’m open. Come take me. Please, Bard, please, before I die of the want –”

The urge was so, so blinding, so instinctive, but Bard wouldn’t let himself force his angel like a rutting animal. Somehow, he found the strength to ease in, one slow fraction of an inch at a time.

“You kill me, you bastard,” Thran pleaded. “Gods, Bard!”

“If I go any faster, it’ll be all over before I can do anything else! Just – just give me a second –”

“I will try. I will try.” Thran swallowed hard. “I cannot stand it. It is too good, it is not enough, it’s –”

“I’m almost there. Almost all the way in. Just a little more. Mmm. Almost there. Almost there.”

Thran grinned. “Oh, yes, you are. Yes, you are. Ah... mmm. To feel you inside me is even better than I thought it would be.”

“Okay. Okay. I’m there. Lubed enough?”

“I will add a little more when you pull out the first time. It is entirely – gods, I cannot – you are the worst bastard in my life!”

Even in the midst of Thran’s tight warmth, Bard grinned. “You like me like that.”

“I do. I do.”

“I’m going to move. Just a little. Just to make sure we’re lubed enough.”

Thran nodded. “Slowly. Slowly. I don’t want to go yet.”

“I love you, too. Especially when you make love to me.”

Bard pressed a kiss at the base of Thran’s jaw as he rocked his hips back just a little, so slowly, but even that sent so much pleasure racing through him that he had a hard time not wanting to thrust back in. Beneath him, Thran moaned soundlessly, his face transfigured by his longing. As Bard eased out, Thran slathered them both with more lubricant, and the journey back into his depths was less intense, more bearable.

“Good. So good,” Thran whispered. “You?”

“Perfect.” Bard sat back on his knees, savoring Thran pinned beneath him, hair scattered around him, his beautiful body tight with desire. When Bard rocked gently out, Thran arched with want; when he eased gently in, Thran curled around Bard, sighing with satisfaction. The tube of lubricant lay abandoned on the pillow, so Bard slicked his hand, and wrapped it around Thran’s cock. He was already fully erect, and as soon as Bard touched him, Thran writhed and moaned underneath him.

“Slow, or fast?”

“Slowly. Slowly. Oh, gods, I may die. I cannot – you – oh, gods!”

Between the tight hold on his cock and his angel so thoroughly transfixed beneath him, Bard was only seconds from release. He sped up his stroking, wanting to carry Thran over the edge with him. Thran’s hands groped for purchase on the silken sheets. His back arched; his head went back; his lips parted in a gasp. Then he clenched hard around Bard’s cock as his orgasm tore through him, so hard that Bard had no choice but to hurtle after him. As his release rose and crashed over him, he managed not to ram deeper into Thran, or tighten so hard on Thran’s cock that he hurt him. Bard fell forward onto his elbows, still bucking, his lips and tongue seeking those of the impassioned angel beneath him. Thran wound arms and legs around him, keeping him close.

It took several seconds before either of them remembered to breathe.

“Ya lyublyu tebya,” Thran breathed into his ear, caressing the lobe of his ear with a kiss. “Zoloto moyo.”

“Rwy’n dy garu di,” Bard replied just as softly as he brushed a kiss on Thran’s cheekbone. “All right, angel?”

Thran nodded. He opened soft, grey eyes on Bard, humming deep in his throat and smiling. “Consumed. Ecstatic. You are all right, too?”

Bard stroked a kiss on Thran’s cheek. “Righter than I have been in a long, long time.”

They rested for a moment, until Bard softened enough to ease out. He got up to wash, smiling at his reflection in the mirror as he rinsed, an expression that Thran matched as he followed Bard in. It was easier for Thran to rinse off in the shower, so Bard had his towel ready for him when he stepped out of the cabinet. Thran’s eyes never left him as he took the towel and dried off, then eased Bard close for a hug.

“You are a good fit,” Thran murmured in his ear with a grin.

Bard snorted in laughter. “Good thing. You didn’t give us much time to find out otherwise.”

“I was hungry.”
“So was I. It was sweet.”

“It was. Let us enjoy our champagne while we savor it.”

They padded back to bed, bringing their glasses with them as they plumped pillows and lay back beside one another. Bard snuggled close when Thran’s arm went around his shoulders, entwining his fingers with those draped over his chest. He held up his glass.

“To the first delight,” Bard said.

“And to anticipation of the second,” Thran replied, smiling as he touched his glass to Bard’s. “And many more after that.”

Bard grinned as they sipped. “Let me savor the first one a little longer, fy nghariad. Then we can tease each other about what a proper follow up should be. Or would you prefer an improper one?”

Thran laughed as he sipped his champagne. “Ah, my saint. You learn fast.”
Chapter 29

Chapter Summary

Can an angel introduce a saint to carnal pleasures as yet untried? Of course he can... if he's an angel of the devil. And Thran is.

Yes, it's explicit, and yes, you'll enjoy it. Just lie back and savor while an angel does his worst. Or is it his best?

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:
cariad = my love/my darling (more colloquial than fy nghariad; Welsh)

Thanks to johnnysmitten for technical support :-) You are the best! ♥

Thanks to loveactuallyfan for the amazing artwork for this fic! You can see it on my Tumblr site at http://eldritchmage.tumblr.com or at

Thanks to revoluutions for help with my Welsh - You are the best, too!

Thran sipped his champagne and savored the warmth of the body beside him. It was a rugged, powerful body, and thinking of it atop him, inside him, sent a jolt of arousal through his loins up to his solar plexus, no matter that he’d just had the best orgasm of his life. If he thought about it too much, he’d want another right away, and perhaps Bard needed more time to recover than he did.

Thran had never desired mere physical indulgence; he needed rapport with a partner first. But rapport had been elusive, so he’d done without since Vileria’s death. Before that, he’d made do with a partner with whom he did have a close rapport – Vileria was a kind, generous, and true friend – but she was no more sexually compatible with him than he was with her. Bard was both devoted friend as well as divine lover, a bounty that Thran found impossible to resist. How many times in the past month had he thought about Bard lying beside him in this bed, against these grey silk sheets? How the love softly glowing in Bard’s warm brown eyes would change into quiet arousal, and then intensify into fire under Thran’s teasing? He’d seen that fire ignite above him only moments ago, but he hadn’t yet savored its softness in repose, at ease. He drained his champagne as an excuse to slip out of bed and refill his glass. After he poured, he stood at the end of the bed, looking back at Bard.
Gods... bare chest gloved in dark hair, unruly brown hair falling in his eyes, powerful arms and hands, legs swathed in silk but still beckoning, and those nipples, such lovely brown pearls, no longer hard, but soft and beckoning. Strength rested in that body for now, but even that was a tease, for it might rise at any moment. How did Bard exude so much allure simply by reclining in the midst of soft pillows? Thran’s hands itched to stroke that body without Bard ever having to speak an invitation. Would he see that soft look in Bard’s eyes that he anticipated?

Not yet. Bard’s gaze was still intent on Thran, caressing each muscle, each gesture. When a lock of white hair fell off Thran’s shoulder and traced down his chest, Bard tracked its fall so closely that Thran bit his lower lip. No soft repose glowed from those brown eyes, but arousal already rising towards fire again. Just to have Bard’s eyes on him spiked Thran’s thoughts with all they could do next.

“I have thought so often about how you would look enthroned in this bed.” Thran considered Bard again, his regard sliding from unruly locks, past velveted chest, to the barest hint of dark pubic hair. “For you to be here at last... it is hard not to look at you.”

Bard sipped his champagne, keeping his gaze on Thran. “You’re so beautiful that I can’t stop looking at you, either.”

Thran offered Bard a pleased smile, then slid the tray of champagne over to his side of the bed. He sat beside Bard with the bottle in hand to refill Bard’s glass, then put the bottle back in its bowl. He drank most of his glassful, put the glass on his nightside table, then slid the sheets aside to perch across Bard’s thighs. He traced a single finger from Bard’s lips, down his chin and throat to caress the hollow at the back of his clavicle, then slowly traced the line between his pectorals.

“Your body is beautiful, too. Strong shoulders.” Thran ran his hands across Bard’s deltoids. “Broad chest.” he stroked his hands over Bard’s pectorals, dragging his palms over the nipples that so drew him. “Cut abs.” Thran drew his knuckles over the ridges of muscle in Bard’s torso. “I especially like these.” He traced the delicate intercostals, careful not to touch Bard’s stitches. “And these.”

Bard drew a sudden breath when Thran’s hands went around his ribs, and thumbs rubbed slowly over his nipples. Thran swallowed that breathy hitch in a kiss, then hovered until Bard’s breath caught again, offering him another hitch to swallow.

“They are so sensitive,” Thran whispered, kissing the corners of Bard’s eyes. “Where do you feel it when I do this? Not just here, no?”

Bard shut his eyes, one hand kneading Thran’s thigh, the other clutching his glass. “Gods, no. There, and all the way down.”

“How far down?” Thran grinned. “Down to your toes?”

Bard tensed as Thran rubbed his nipples a little harder, and his breath caught again when Thran’s hair brushed against his abdomen. “Just about, you bastard. Let me put this glass down so I can give you as good as I’m getting.”

“Not yet. Let me please you, without you thinking you must do something in return. Let me give you a gift.”

“That’s not fair to you. It’s too one-sided. I don’t like using you.”

“To accept a gift I freely offer does not use me, lyubov moya. You have just made the most delicious love to me, have you not? Besides, it turns me on to watch my lover enjoy himself, to know that I “please him.”

“If you’re as turned on from watching me as I am from what you’re doing, then you’re very turned on.”

“I am,” Thran grinned, still rubbing. “You are a delicious morsel to please.”

“Be careful,” Bard said, then his breath hitched again. “Mmm, you are such a bastard. You’re going to get into so much trouble if you do that for much longer.”

“I hope so,” Thran bit at Bard’s lower lip. “Will you let me?”

Bard didn’t pretend to misunderstand. “I’ve... never done that with anyone before.”

Thran wasn’t surprised. “You prefer the top.”

Bard looked apprehensive, but Thran massaged slowly, letting endorphins and arousal do their work. “I don’t think it’s a question of... preference. I think it’s a question of... trust.”

Thran insinuated his feet between Bard’s legs, and used them to slide Bard’s legs apart so that he could settle between Bard’s knees. Not being pinned beneath Thran’s weight might help Bard feel more comfortable.

“Or lack of it, yes? The bottom can feel more vulnerable,” Thran agreed.

Bard chuckled. “You don’t feel that way, do you? You revel in it.”

Thran kept up his slow strokes and caresses. “I revel in everything we’ve done so far. I expect we will find much more to revel in as we learn how to please one another. I would like to take the top with you, but only when you are comfortable for me to do so. If it turns out not to be your preference, then we will find other things to do that we both enjoy. That kind of one-sided holds no allure for me.”

“I appreciate that.”

“Did you have a lover who was not kind, or...?” Thran ventured.

Bard shook his head. “Nothing like that. I just... never had a lover I... felt that sure of.”

Thran nodded again. “The top is usually more in control. The bottom is not. If you are not sure of one another, then it is not easy to let yourself be out of control in so intimate a way.”

Bard chuckled again. “You’re never out of control, even when you’re out of control. You orchestrate everything, and then fling yourself after.”

“I am what they call the power bottom, yes?” Thran snickered. “Though that is not entirely true. I like both, and perhaps prefer the bottom only slightly more. It depends on the partner.”

“Versatile.”

“That is the term, or so I have been told.”

Bard sipped his champagne again, and sighed, not fighting the sensations Thran roused in him. He reached out to draw Thran closer for a kiss, then sighed again. Or maybe he marshaled his resolve. “You’ve been honest, so I will be, too. I have thought about what it would be like to do that with you.”
“I take that as a good sign, that I have earned that much of your trust.”

“You have all of my trust. I’ve trusted you since we met. Somehow... we felt right from the start. So I did think about it, just because there’s never been anyone else I trusted so much before. Then last week, last Tuesday, when we rouged around a little... I did more than think about it. If you’d done me then, I wouldn’t have stopped you. In fact, thinking about you doing me was what got me off.”

Thran’s lips curved up in a smile, recalling how close he’d been to doing just that. “I enjoyed what we did. It was good that we went slowly, because it saved something special for our life here. But I am happy that we will eventually come to it, when you are comfortable.”

“Oh, between what you’re doing, this bed, and some very nice champagne, I’m quite comfortable. Besides, I don’t want to deny my angel anything. And I think I’m drunk. Almost.”

“Are you, lyubov moya?” Thran laughed, charmed at his lover’s artless confession.

“Oh, I’m buzzed,” Bard’s grin was crooked. “Are you?”

“No, unless you want me to be, and then I will tell you yes.”

Bard’s smile faded. “Don’t. It’s important that I know you’ll always tell me the truth, no matter what. I don’t want to wonder.”

Thran kissed Bard. “Then I will always tell you the truth, even when we play. So no, I am not drunk. I try never to be drunk, because it plays havoc with my body the next day when I must dance. A slight buzz, as you call it, is the most I indulge in. Tonight, I need one more glass of champagne before that happens.”

“Okay,” Bard nodded, smiling again. “That’s good to know.”

“I hope you are not drunk. I would not want to take advantage of you.”

Bard’s hand went to Thran’s chest, caressing a nipple. “I thought you told me once that you excelled in deflowering virgins.”

Thran snorted in laughter. “Only in the ballet. Such roles are ogres. I would not treat my one true love so contemptibly.”

Bard sipped his champagne, looked at the glass still half full, and drained the rest. Looking bemused, he sighed and shook his head. “You really are a bastard, Thran.”

“Still? Why this time?”

“Because I’ve told you I trust you, I’ve told you I’m comfortable, I’ve told you I’m a virgin, I’ve told you I can’t tell you no, and I’ve told you I’m drunk, and you’re too honorable to do anything about it. What else do I have to say to get you to fuck me?”

Thran sat back on his heels, laughing. “I would not dream to fuck you tonight. Nothing you say can make me do that. But...”

“But what?”

Thran stroked Bard’s chest. “But I would like to make love to my husband on our wedding night. If you ask me to do that, then that I will do.”

Bard handed Thran his glass. “Then please, fy nghariad, make love to me.”
Thran sat Bard’s glass aside, and drew Bard out of the pillows until they kneeled facing each other, kissing and stroking. “Do you want to tell me how I should, or do you leave that to me?”

“I trust you.”

Thran kissed Bard. “Thank you, lyubov moya. Let us see what develops. All you need to do is relax, and enjoy yourself. Nothing more. If something is not right for you, then tell me. You know about trigger words?”

Bard nodded.

“Then if you say... hmm... ‘sanctuary,’ then I will know, and we will do something else.”

Bard stroked Thran’s chest, and kissed his throat. “All right. ‘Sanctuary’ it is.”

Thran did nothing more than stroke and caress for some moments, putting aside his own arousal to make sure that Bard was properly relaxed. What had aroused Bard so much when they’d played in Bard’s apartment? A little feint at dominance had started it all. Thran might need that, as well as the champagne, to ensure that Bard was well prepared. The trick would be to make sure Bard was well aroused, so that Thran’s preparation felt good, the teasing only a prelude to what would soon feel even better.

Slowly, Thran’s hands strayed from shoulders and pectorals and nipples, to abdominals and hips and groins. Bard hummed, eyes closed as he relaxed into Thran’s caresses, and soon Thran’s fingers traced from groins to balls. Fondling gently, he rubbed them at their base, on each pass tracing closer and closer to the opening just behind, quickly finding exactly the right touches to tease Bard’s cock into rising. He shifted to kneel beside Bard, found the tube of lubricant, and slicked his fingers. When he leaned over to take Bard’s cock in his mouth, he stroked Bard’s opening. At just that single touch came a gasp, then a moan, and Bard’s cock spasmed hard. There was an echo of that jolt of pleasure in Thran’s solar plexus, his loins, his cock, then another when he slid one finger inside, stroking in time to the caresses he lavished with his tongue. The second finger went in unnoticed, and Thran flexed them slowly, stretching Bard wider.

“Oh gods, Thran –”

Thran slid the third finger in, stretching Bard still wider. His lover arched back, and the cock in Thran’s mouth swelled harder. Gods, Bard would go before Thran ever got his cock inside, so he sat up, fingers still within, stroking only a little, but stretching a little more. He kissed Bard’s lips, pushing his tongue into Bard’s mouth, wondering if the double penetration excited Bard as much as it did him. Dragging his lips from Bard’s down his jaw, then his throat, he bit at the base of Bard’s neck as he had a week ago, but gently, only a pale shadow of domination. Yes, Bard was well lubricated, well open, trembling as his body rose. He was a pretty sight on his knees, head back, eyes closed, back arched, cock rising thick and engorged against his abdomen. What Thran wouldn’t do to have that cock within him again... but this was not the time for that. Instead, he imagined how it would feel to slide inside Bard. He licked his cock and stroked hard, not that he had to – he was already tense with anticipation of what he was about to do to them both.

With a quick shift, he was behind Bard, between his legs. He pulled his fingers out, took his cock in hand, and pushed inside just an inch. Bard jumped, but Thran grabbed his hips, keeping him centered. He rocked gently, surprised at how easily he slid deeper inside. He’d lubricated them both well, so very quickly he was as deeply inside as he could get, and Bard was arching back to take him. Thran pulled him tightly against his chest, wrapping his arms around him, teeth at his neck. He massaged the base of Bard’s cock deeply, then rolled those brown pearls between his fingers. Bard’s head went back, resting on Thran’s shoulder, completely consumed by everything Thran aroused in him. It was such a delicious, addictive sight that Thran slicked his hand again. He took Bard’s cock in hand, not gently, and pulled Bard’s buttocks hard against his hips, driving his cock as far inside as it would go. He flexed backwards, pulling out, then forwards, driving in, not stroking Bard’s cock but possessing it. Underneath his hands, Bard moaned, pleading not for Thran to stop, but to deliver more.

“G-g-gods, Thran, gods, take me. I-I can’t stand it!”

Oh, gods, gods, to consume his lover like this was nothing short of delirious, so delirious that Thran bit Bard’s ear.

“Beg me,” he hissed, pulling partially out, leaving Bard suspended on the cusp of his rising. “Beg me to take you.”

“Please, you bastard, don’t stop now! Put me out of my misery!”

“That’s not begging. Beg me!” he growled, stroking so deeply that Bard gasped, then half pulled out again. He let Bard’s cock go, grabbed a handful of his hair, and pulled his head back. He bit Bard’s neck at the base of his shoulder. “Tell me you’re mine, and you don’t want me to make love to you, you want me to fuck you until you can’t see and then some.”

“I’m yours, and if you don’t fuck me until I can’t see and then some, I’ll put you on your face and fuck you until you can’t sit down for a week!”

“Ooooh, you tempt me,” Thran purred, grinning. “But not this time. This time, you are mine to fuck however I choose, until you scream for release. That is what you so richly deserve.”

Thran teased them both for far too long with his long, slow stroking, pulling almost all of the way out, then sliding oh, so slowly all of the way in, still pinning Bard with a hand in his hair and the other clutched across his hips. It was intoxicating to feel himself so deeply within Bard’s body, to feel that body arch and bow with such want, such terrible want, then to slow until Bard moaned in frustration. Playing Bard’s sensations against him was wanton, blatant depravity, so delicious that soon Thran lusted for release as much as Bard did. He sped up his thrusting, holding Bard close by his balls. He released Bard’s hair to grab his cock, stroking it roughly in time to his thrusts. He shut his eyes, savoring the last precious seconds of control, and then he manhandled them both to orgasm. When Bard whimpered and started to buck, Thran used his hold on Bard’s cock and balls to keep himself deeply embedded as they both spasmed in release.

After long, chaotic, delirious seconds, Bard fell forward onto his hands, pulling Thran with him. He was too unsteady to hold there, and fell face down onto the bed panting, Thran still within him. Thran managed to keep from falling on top, but had to press his hands against the mattress on either side of Bard to do so. He was panting just as hard. He stayed on his knees until he’d softened enough to ease out, then flopped down on his back beside Bard, eyes shut.

A rueful chuckle drew him to open his eyes. Bard’s chin was propped up on his hands, but he looked at Thran.

“I thought you said you wanted to make love to your husband.”

Thran grinned. “I did. Then I banged him like a mother. He seemed to like it.”

Bard’s answer was to lay his forehead on his hands, then he looked up again. “I think my life will be in danger no matter how I answer that.”

Thran chose to answer that with a grin. “I wanted to make sure your virgin experience included a little of everything.”

“Oh, was that what it was? Pure altruism?”

“No, my saint. It was loving tenderness followed by lustful desecration.”

“That it was. I have been well ravaged.” Bard exhaled, eyes shut. “You did it so well that I’ll have to make it up to you the next time I make love to you.”

“You were quite delicious tonight when you made love to me, so I am sure that whatever you come up with in the future will be no less so. Now, I want my last glass of champagne.”

Bard was on Thran’s side of the bed, so he slid over to reach the bottle and Thran’s glass. He filled it and held it out. Propping himself up on one elbow, Thran accepted the glass and sipped delicately.

“Very nice. Though I am afraid I need another shower. And we have pillaged the sheets.”

“We have, that. Where are the clean ones?”

“I put another set aside in anticipation. They are on my dresser.”

Bard rolled over to flop into the midst of the pillows. He tipped the bottle up to his lips to drink the remaining champagne, no more than a couple of mouthfuls. “No point in changing the sheets until we clean up. Can you get to the shower without help, cariad?”

“I can, if I do so before this last glass of champagne hits.”

They clambered out of bed and helped each other into the shower; both of them were too sticky for a less thorough rinse. Once they’d dried, they sleepily fumbled clean sheets onto the bed, balled the old ones into the closet, and climbed into bed yawning. Bard turned out the light on his side of the bed, but Thran lingered until Bard had settled and heaved a satisfied sigh. He blinked sleepily at Thran sitting on the side of the bed as he braided his hair into a loose plait.

“Everything all right, Thran?”

Reaching out, Thran stroked a piece of Bard’s hair out of his eyes, drawing a smile from his lover. Yes, at last, that was what he’d hoped to see, the soft look in Bard’s warm eyes, the proof of his love kept close and alive, banked now, but ready to rise to meet Thran’s without condition.

“All is well,” Thran agreed, smiling.

He turned out his light, slipped between the sheets, and snuggled close, his head cradled on Bard’s shoulder and his arm across Bard’s chest, fingers stroking sleepy circles in the dark hair that furred Bard’s chest so beautifully. Humming, Bard put his arm around Thran’s back to stroke his hip.

“Tomorrow’s New Year’s Eve,” Bard murmured.

“You are right,” Thran realized. “How should we celebrate?”

“We’ll have to get the TV or the computers connected if we want to see the ball drop at midnight.”

Thran hummed. “I’m sure the children can help us with that. I know nothing about anything mechanical.”

“I can handle it. Tilda will want to see the Rose Parade on New Year’s Day, anyway.”
Smiling, Thran rubbed Bard’s stomach. “She will explain it all to me very well, I am sure.”

Bard laughed softly. “She will. She’s my little doll.”

“A very sweet one. So we hook up the TV. We watch the ball drop and the parade. What else?”

“Cooking, of course. I got enough stuff today to hold us until the second, then we’ll have to do a major foray. I’ll warn you ahead of time that the cost will take your breath away.”

“I am sure it will. There are six of us now, not just one. I will survive the shock.”

“You need to do your barre and yoga tomorrow. You didn’t today, and you’ve got auditions coming. I can wrangle the kitchen and unpacking while you do your work.”

“I want to know where you put everything in the kitchen, or I will never learn to cook.”

“I’ll sort it out first, figure out where things need to go, then I’ll show you everything. It’ll take a few days of cooking to settle on some of it.”

“We have interviews at schools for the children next Monday.”

“We do. I hope we’ll get them settled quickly, so they don’t miss more than a couple of days. I like one in particular – the Imladris Academy. Covers kindergarten through high school, so all four could be in the same place.”

“I like that one, too. They have soccer for Bard, archery for Legolas, art for Tilda, and writing for our Sigrid. A good academic program for all, too, though I must ask about fencing. Then once they are in school again, lyubov moya, let us go to the county office and get a marriage license.”

“I want to, too. I can’t let anyone pillage me that thoroughly but my husband.”

“Nor I.”

“When is your first audition?”

“January nineteenth.”

“Soon.”

“And I will have to work very hard to be ready. I have not been consistent for the past week, and I feel it.”

“Then getting ready for your audition takes precedence, Thran. That’s your life. Whatever you need to do, I’ll work around it.”

“My life is more than the dance now, Bard.”

“Of course it is. But the dance still takes precedence. Until I can work metal again, you’re the breadwinner.”

“It will work out, dear saint. It will all work out.”

Bard sighed beside him, continuing to stroke Thran’s hip slowly. The gentle caresses against Thran’s skin lulled him into half sleep, but he was still aware of the substantial body beside his. He stroked Bard’s chest in appreciation.
“I know it will. It’s already worked out better than I ever thought anything could.” Bard caught Thran’s hand and pressed a kiss on it, then another onto the top of Thran’s head. “Sleep well tonight, angel.”

Thran smiled in his half sleep, and snuggled closer into Bard. “You have seen to me so well that I am sure to. Even better, my saint will be beside me, as I have wanted for so long. I love you.”

“I love you, too, cariad.”

They lay entwined, and lapsed into silence.

Thran drifted for a few moments in his half stupor, then gently faded into sleep.
Chapter 30

Chapter Summary

An angel and his saint might enjoy a little domestic bliss as they start their new life, but Sigrid's got business to take care of, much to her father's amusement.

Sun shone palely through the windows when Bard woke the next morning. For a moment, he stared blankly at the ceiling, not remembering where he was. This looked like the master bedroom in his house... ah, he was dreaming about it again. Even though he’d had to move away from his house eight years ago, he still dreamed about it at least once a week. At first the dreams had been memories of living there with Daphne and the children, happy memories of laughter and endless work and his wife’s sweet face as she painted the children’s murals. Then, as life got more precarious, the dreams had been of the house abandoned, empty, and decaying, and himself wandering from empty room to empty room, wondering where the children were. Even those had faded; for the last couple of years, the dreams were only of him standing outside the house, unable to go inside because he’d lost the key to the front door. In one, the house had turned into a dusty doll’s house; in another, it had crumbled to dust at his feet. To finally dream about being inside the house again was an improvement... except that was still a tease, still an elusive, unreachable dream. To dream about lying in bed in his bedroom was even worse. This would never, never happen –

The bed shifted beside him. Daphne? Years had passed since he’d dreamed about her, so long that he didn’t remember her voice or how she moved, only how she appeared in old photographs too painful to look at. He looked right –

Wait... he’d slept on the right when Daphne had been alive. So...

Thran lay beside him, still asleep.

His angel. His love. Lying here, beside him, in his house – their house! – asleep.

Oh, gods.

This wasn’t a dream? This was real?

Bard shut his eyes, swallowing hard, his heart racing, his body flushing with heat as it threw off its repose. He held his hand up before his face, pinched his arm, tasted the worst morning breath ever.

This was real.

Bard took a long, deep, marshaling breath. Thran lay on his side, facing Bard, his ribs rising and falling in slow rhythm, his face heartbreakingly beautiful as he slept. His long lashes were as dark as his eyebrows, and his braid of silky white hair lay curled on the grey pillowcase by his head. Bard watched Thran breathe until his heart stopped racing, until he’d reminded himself of everything that had happened in the past week, and of each detail of yesterday’s move, and then of last night, how he and Thran had thoroughly driven each other into exhaustion.

Bard smiled. Well, perhaps not complete exhaustion. What could he entice Thran into tonight? Not this morning, as tempting as that was, because his angel needed to be about his preparations for his Bard took pains to ease out of bed without waking Thran, then tiptoed to the bathroom with flannel pants and tee shirt in hand. He tended to necessities, stretched, splashed water over his face, ran a comb through his tangled hair. It looked good this morning, if as unruly as ever, but shinier, smoother, all courtesy of Thran’s expensive hair potions and hair dryer. He’d have to learn to dry it himself like Thran had, though it had been wonderful to have Thran do it for him. He stretched again in the mirror, trying to work out the small kink at the base of his neck, but it didn’t ease. He put fingers to it, kneading gently, but it didn’t feel like a muscle strain; more like a bruise. Where was the hand mirror? He found it in one of the vanity drawers, angled it to see the reflection of his back, and snorted in chagrined laughter when he saw what it was.

Bite marks. Right over his spine, at the base of his neck. Claimed, he was, right and proper.

Thran padded into the bathroom, an ethereal creature of light and air despite looking so sleepy. He took in the hand mirror, and what Bard looked at, and bit his lip. His small smile was both apologetic and mischievous as he turned Bard around to face the wall mirror. He pressed a soft kiss on the mark, and put his arms around Bard’s shoulders.

“Oh, my poor saint... I am so sorry, Bard,” Thran murmured, pressing a kiss on his hair.

Bard folded his arms across his chest. “You are the spawn of Lucifer.”

Another kiss pressed against his ear. “You were very hard to resist last night, lyubov moya.”

Bard grinned as he savored how he’d acquired those marks. He slipped one arm around Thran’s waist. “You were very hard last night. I might try that last bit with you, though I promise not to leave the same marks. No need to advertise that you’re just as claimed as I am.”

Thran’s smile widened. “Thank you, lyubov moya,” he said meekly, drawing Bard to laugh.

“Mmm, I want to hear that soft little voice in bed later. But this morning we need to get you to the barre, and me to the kitchen. Tell me what you’ll want to eat when you’re done, and I’ll have it ready for you.”

“Do we have porridge, eggs? Any fruit?”

“Both porridge and eggs, and we have bananas, raisins, blueberries, and raspberries.”

“Porridge would be nice, then, with blueberries.”

“I’ll have it ready. Tea?”

“Yes, please. Whatever kind you prefer. Although no fruit tea, please. I am not fond of those.”

“I don’t like them, either. How about lemon ginger? That’s a good tonic. Or black?”

“I have not tried the lemon ginger, so I will try that one.”

“Lemon ginger it is.”

Bard stroked Thran’s bare buttock, and left the bathroom to his lover. Back in the bedroom, he put away his nightclothes, dressed in jeans, socks, and Henley, and made the bed, force of long habit. He pocketed his mobile, noting that it was still early, around seven. As he padded out of the bedroom, he paused on the landing to listen for sounds from the children, but wasn’t disappointed to be greeted with silence. Seven a.m. on a holiday morning was way too early to expect any of the four to be up yet. He continued on downstairs, threaded his way through the boxes stacked in the dining room, and came into the kitchen. A few boxes remained there, too, and a clutter of things remained on the kitchen island. He stuck his head in the pantry, but little of that had been unpacked. Where was the oatmeal? He rooted around until he found one of the boxes of staples. Yes, there was the oatmeal. Milk, raisins, and blueberries were in the fridge, so all he needed was sugar. Fortunately, sugar was in the same box as the oatmeal, so he set that on the counter, then put the rest of the items in the pantry.

Thran padded into the kitchen, dressed in his working tights and shoes, leg warmers, several layers of sweaters, and fingerless gloves. Bard took one look at all the layers and shook his head.

“It’s too cold for you to work, isn’t it? I haven’t set the thermostat program yet, so I’ll do it now. There’s a separate heat zone for the ballroom, so you can make it as warm as you like.”

Thran snickered. “I understood very little of that, I am sorry to say, other than it is too cold, and I can make the ballroom warmer.”

“Do you want some tea before you start?”

“Tea would be nice, yes.”

“Kettle’s on, then. Come on, I’ll explain the programmable thermostat to you while it’s heating.”

Bard led Thran to the control panel in the dining room and explained how it worked. He keyed in the settings for the lower floor, all of which Thran watched closely.

“So there is a heating zone on this floor, and another for each of the upper floors, and one for the ballroom?” he summarized.

“Exactly. So let’s go set the one in the ballroom so it’ll be warm enough for you once you’ve had your tea.”

The kettle had boiled, so Thran waved to Bard. “I will set the thermostat in the ballroom myself, if you would make the tea.”

“Sure,” Bard grinned. It was funny to watch an elite athlete – on the dance floor as well as in bed – get excited to learn how to program a thermostat. He found the teapot, made a potful for him and Thran, and set out a big mug for Thran and a smaller cup for himself as the tea steeped.

Thran reappeared, looking exasperated.

“I’ll fix it,” Bard said hastily. “It’s all right. Thermostats can be confusing, I know.”

“The thermostat is set,” Thran replied. “Your explanations were very clear, so I had no trouble. I need your help with something else.”

“What?”

“I think the movers confused the main room with the ballroom.”

Thran led Bard into the ballroom. Thran’s barre was there against the wall, but so were several stacks of boxes, all standing in front of the barre.

“Looks like they did. Do you want me to move the boxes out completely, or just get the barre out for now?"

“I can work quite well among the boxes. I need only help to free my barre from its captivity.”

Snickering, Bard offered a sketchy bow. “Then let me slay the box dragon for you, Prince of Ice.”

Thran offered him a theatrical bow in return. “I will be in your debt, my champion.”

“Are you trying to get me back into bed again?”

“I do not think I would have a very hard time to get you there. But we both have work to do before we earn that delight.”

“Sad, but true.” Bard shoved a few of the boxes, making a narrow path between the middle of them to reach the barre. “Oh, I see. The legs turn flat to store. So all I need to do is lift it over the boxes…”

“Do not pull your stitches, Bard!” Thran exclaimed hastily. “Hand me one end, please!”

“As long as I pick it straight up and don’t twist, my stitches will be fine, angel. Don’t worry.” Bard suited action to words, got the thing over his head, and slipped out from between the boxes to set the barre on the open floor. “I’ll hold it while you turn the legs.”

Thran did so with well-practiced ease, and then he and Bard slid it well away from the boxes.

“Good?”

Thran nodded. “Thank you. I am sorry I must ask you for help.”

“I’m not. Gives me a reason to give you a kiss.” He did so, gaining a smile from Thran. “That’s one of the joys of having a partner – always someone to help share the load. So come enjoy your tea, and the ballroom will be warm for you when you finish it.”

“I will fetch it, and bring it back here to sip as I warm up.” A long, slender hand reached out to stroke Bard’s hair as they walked back to the kitchen. “You encourage me to invent things for you to help me with.”

Bard poured tea into Thran’s mug and slid it to him. “If you run out of things, I’m sure I can think of a few more.”

A wistful sigh escaped Thran as he collected his mug. “You must stop, Bard. Or I will never be able to concentrate on my barre.”

“I’ll have breakfast and start on the kitchen, then. Will my rummaging bother you?”

Thran shook his head. “It will be fine.”

“There’s an old CD player somewhere I can set up for you if you need music.”

“Not today, but thank you.”

Bard gave Thran’s braid a tug. “I’ll leave you to it, then. Call if you need anything.”

“I will.”

Smiling, Thran stroked Bard’s hair and disappeared into the ballroom. Bard turned back to his tea, made himself a bowl of porridge, and ate it standing up in the solarium as he looked out at the terrace and imagined what his pine tree sculpture would look like in the middle of the Japanese garden Thran had suggested. Still spooning up his breakfast, he wandered into the sitting room, seeing nothing but a clutter of furniture and piles of boxes, then back into the main room – virtually empty of boxes, so Thran had probably guessed correctly that the movers had confused the ballroom with it – and around into the front hallway where Hope stood. He wound his way back through the dining room and into the kitchen, and he was ready to start reclaiming his home from the boxes.

He worked steadily, unpacking the things they’d brought from their apartment kitchens. Afterwards, he went upstairs to the attic for the boxes of his mother’s things he’d stored without hope eight years ago when he’d had to leave the house. Carting them downstairs, he washed and dried the contents, and put the old stemware, platters, and other dishes on the shelves and in the cabinets of the butler’s pantry. An old silver tray went in the corner of the walnut countertop, the perfect setting for his mother’s crystal decanter and a pair of her glasses etched with flowers, angled to catch the undercabinet lighting. Most of what was left on the kitchen island was stuff for the pantry, so he mulled the best way to arrange that. As he put things away, he started a fresh pot of tea, then a list of everything they’d need to completely stock their shelves. By the time Sigrid came into the kitchen, the place looked well settled.

“Wow, Da, you’ve been working hard,” Bard’s oldest daughter commented, looking around.

“Morning, sweetness,” Bard smiled a welcome, hugging her. “It’s coming along. What would you like for breakfast?”

“I’ll get it,” she said, looking into the pantry. “Any bagels left?”

“No bagels until we get to the market, but there’s toast, porridge, and eggs.”

“Porridge, then. What kind of tea?”

“Green jasmine’s in the pot.”

“Mmm.” Sigrid went about making her breakfast thoughtfully, pausing now and again to look about her as if she were just as grateful to be here as Bard was. While she ate, he turned back to the unloading of boxes and bags, and the arranging of shelves. He was almost finished in the pantry when Sigrid came to stand in the doorway.

“So…”

Bard stood up and looked back at her, his eyebrows going up in inquiry.

“Did I hear you say that we were going to look at some schools on Monday?”

Bard nodded. “We’ve got appointments at three. One on Monday, and two on Tuesday.”

“Is one of them the Imladris Academy?”

Bard nodded again, surprised. “That’s the one on Monday. What’s up?”

“I’ve heard good things about it.”

Bard smothered a smile. Sigrid’s voice might sound calm and matter of fact, but her eyes were intent on a box of pasta, not meeting his. He ushered her out into the kitchen, poured them both more tea, and carried it to the big table at the end of the island. He put the cups down, and sat before one of them. Sigrid sat beside him and concentrated on her teacup.
“What things have you heard?”

Sigrid sipped her tea, then heaved a sigh that was half exasperation, half embarrassment. “I called Finn.”

Bard nodded.

“To tell him we moved. To tell him what happened at the park.” She looked up quickly. “Oh, I told him not to tell anyone, but I wanted him to know that I was sorry I might not get to see him any more.”

Bard sipped his tea to cover up his guilt for uprooting his children so abruptly, no matter how necessary it was, no matter how much it was for a better future. “If you want to see Finn again, Sig, we’ll make it happen. You could ask him to a film if you want, and I’ll take you.”

“I know, Da. Finn’s kind of a doofus, but he’s a sweet doofus. I do like him. And if you tell Bain that, I’ll kill you.”

Bard held up his hands. “Not a word. On my honor.”

Swallowing, Sigrid ventured a smile. “Okay. Well, anyway, I didn’t tell him where we were, in case Angelo’s gang wanted to make trouble, just that we were out of the city. And I told him that you and Thran were getting married, and that Thran had a son who was really good at archery and fencing. And he told me about this cousin and the cousin’s girlfriend whom he sees pretty often. They’re both really good at archery.”

“And this cousin and girlfriend go to the Imladris Academy, right?”

“Got it in one,” Sigrid smiled widely for the first time this morning. “They go to the Imladris Academy. The school has a really good archery program, which Legolas might like a lot.”

Bard smiled. “So besides having an archery program that might give you the chance to see Finn when he comes to visit his cousin, does the Imladris Academy have anything else to recommend it?”

Sigrid’s grin was embarrassed but she plowed on. “Finn seemed pretty impressed with it. Of course, it doesn’t have as many idiots to deal with as my old school did, and the kids are pretty smart. They have more class choices than my old school, and tutoring help, and a small student-to-teacher ratio, and a lot of different things to do outside of classes, and before and after class day care, and –”

“Finn knows about student-to-teacher ratios?” Bard arched an eyebrow.

“Of course he doesn’t,” Sigrid rolled her eyes. “But I do, because I looked it up on their website. I can’t tell if they have fencing or not, that’s the only thing. They might, because Finn was sure that Killian and Tara were on the academy’s archery team, and archery isn’t listed on their website. So maybe they offer things not listed on their website.”

“Sounds like you’ve done your homework,” Bard teased gently.

“Da, that is so lame.”

“It is. But I’m glad you were interested enough to look. Just comparing schools by their websites, that’s the one that looks the best to Thran and me, but I want us all to see it in person. A website is one thing; in person is another.”

“So we’ll see it for ourselves Monday?”
Bard nodded. “All of us. Ten o’clock. It’d be great if all four of you liked it, so you’d all be together. But if some of you end up in different schools, so be it. What matters is that we find schools that offer good educations, not just dating opportunities.”

“Da,” Sigrid groaned.

“Sig,” Bard groaned back in imitation, but with a smile. “If it doesn’t work out, you can still ask Finn to a film or something. Okay?”

“Okay.” She sipped her tea. “What do you want me to help with?”

“The kitchen’s in good shape. Just need a trip to the market, and we’ll do that Saturday or Sunday. You’ve got all your stuff put away?”

“Some of it. I thought maybe I could paint my room first, and then put everything away? You’ve got the paint I wanted; I saw it in the main room.”

“The windows need stripping, and so does your closet door.”

“The woodwork doesn’t, though, Da, so I could do the walls now and leave the windows and closet for later. You wouldn’t have to do much for me. I know how to tape the woodwork and use the roller. I’ve already got everything piled in the middle of the room, so all I need are the drop cloths and the rollers and brushes.”

“Let’s see if you’ve got spackling to do first, then we can decide.”

Bard went upstairs with Sigrid, and found the truth to her assertion that everything was piled in the middle of her floor in anticipation of being able paint the walls. The woodwork was unpainted—Bard remembered that Daphne had stripped it in preparation to painting it just before she’d died, and Bard had never had the wherewithal to finish it. It would need priming before it was ready for the bright white paint Bard wanted to use throughout the upstairs, but at least there was no stripping needed. There were few dings in the walls, for ten years ago Daphne had carefully patched everything before she put in the small mural of a grove of trees.

“The walls look good. You’ll have to tape around the moldings, top and bottom, first. Why don’t you start with that, and we’ll see how it goes to paint this afternoon?”

Sigrid pressed an impulsive kiss on Bard’s cheek. “Thanks, Da! Can I use the wide tape? I’m not as good a painter as you are yet.”

“I got extra of the wide. It’s in the main room. The stepladder’s in there, too. Need help with that?”

“I’ll get it. You go back to making sense of downstairs, and I’ll do this.”

“Come get me once you’ve taped, and I’ll clear you for painting.”

“Okay.”

Tilda came out of her room in her nightclothes with Mr. Bun under her arm, rubbing her eyes. “I heard you talking. Is Sigrid going to paint? She said she was last night.”

Bard stooped to give Tilda a hug as Sigrid ran downstairs to collect painting supplies. “She’s got a lot of taping to do first. Then we’ll see about painting. You ready for breakfast?”

Tilda nodded. “Porridge, I hope?”
“Coming up. You get dressed, and come down to the kitchen when you’re done.”

“Okay.” She disappeared into the bathroom, and Bard headed back down to the kitchen. In a few minutes, Tilda appeared.

“Where’s Thran?” she murmured as Bard sat a bowl of porridge and a filled teacup in front of her.

“He’s doing his barre, little doll. Every morning, that’s what he does. So he’s in the ballroom.”

“Can I watch?”

“Not right now, Til. He’s working, and needs to concentrate.”

Tilda nodded. “Oh. Like when I’m trying to draw a picture, when I don’t want anyone to stare at me?”

“Exactly like that. After breakfast, would you help me unload the DVDs? I’m going to set up the TV so we can watch the parade tomorrow.”

Tilda’s eyes brightened. “The Rose Parade! It’s already New Year’s Day tomorrow?”

“That’s right.”

A clatter behind them announced the appearance of Bain and Legolas, both ravenous.

“Morning, lads. Porridge is hot, or we have eggs or toast.”

“Porridge for me!” Bain yelped.

“Legolas, what do you like for breakfast?”

“Porridge is good, and most kinds of eggs. I’d rather not have hard boiled eggs.” Legolas gave a wry laugh. “That’s all Father knows how to make, and I get tired of eating those so often. I can do scrambled or fried myself, but I’ll have porridge today. Too hungry to want to cook!”

“Just as well. It’s going on ten, and we’re going to eat lunch about one. I’ve got a little job for you and Bain beforehand, if you’re up to it.”

“What?” Bain asked, mouth already full of porridge.

“Bain, manners,” Bard gave him a look. “It’s New Year’s Eve, so if we want to see the ball drop in Times Square, we need to set up the TV. Think you and Legolas can help with that in the sitting room?”

“Course,” Bain agreed, making Bard smile at his son’s nonchalance. “Legs and I can do that, right?”

“We’ve got Thran’s stuff to wrangle, too, not just ours,” Bard amended.

“I know how to put that together,” Legolas volunteered. “I did it for him. Father’s not mechanically inclined.”

“He’s good at other things,” Bard agreed. “So after breakfast, we’ll get the sitting room set up so we can watch the ball drop.”

“And the parade,” Tilda amended.
“Where’s Sig?” Bain asked.

“Upstairs. Hot to paint her room.”

“Oh, can we paint, too?” Bain asked, eyes wide.

“One painter at a time. Besides, the sitting room....”

“Father’s at the barre?” Legolas asked.

Bard nodded. “Just like every morning. Do you want tea, Legolas?”

“I’d like juice, please, if we have any.”

“Not yet. Just milk for now. I’ve started a list for the market, so I’ll add juice. What kind?”

“I like grape, and orange.”

“At lunch, we’ll talk about all the things you and your father like to eat, so we can get them on the list.”

“Okay.”

The boys and Tilda had just begun their porridge when Thran made his appearance. His clothing was damp with sweat in places, and his hair was wet at his nape, but he smiled as he mopped his face with a towel.

“Good morning, all,” he greeted, putting his empty tea mug in the sink. “Did everyone sleep well? Where is our Sigrid?”

“Painting her room. Or getting ready to paint her room. She’s got to tape the woodwork first. Do you want to shower first, or eat first?”

“A little tea first, then a little porridge, then I will shower. I am sorry to be so late, but I had extra work this morning to make up for missing so many classes this week.”

“You’re not late for anything,” Bard assured him. “Tilda and the lads are just starting breakfast. They’re going to help me set up the sitting room so we can use the TV, and I’m about to put on lunch to simmer. After that, we’ll all find some boxes to unpack, and get things as settled as we can.”

He put tea in front of Thran, and a bowl of porridge when he was ready, and while the four were eating he put on a kettle of ground beef and vegetables for sloppy joes. He also had a pan of chicken breasts ready for the oven in case Thran preferred that for lunch. By the time Thran and the children were through breakfast, he had lunch well under way, and so shepherded the children into the sitting room. They decided the best places to put the sofas and chairs to see the TV, then Bain and Legolas started to arrange the components while Tilda and Bard put the DVDs and CDs on the bookcase that had held Bard’s tools in the apartment. Sigrid came down to say she’d finished her taping, and upon inspection Bard agreed she could start painting after lunch. Bard hurried to put Thran’s chicken in the oven, and shortly thereafter everyone sat down for lunch. The list for the market grew longer and longer as everyone discussed their favorite dishes. Bard had a good sense of how to add Legolas and Thran to his usual cooking, and how to add a bit more variety into Thran’s rigorous diet. It was going to be a hard balance between four hungry, growing children and a ballet dancer who had to be so careful about what he ate, but Bard would manage.

During the afternoon, Thran helped Bard arrange what little they had in the dining room, mostly a table and chairs once the boxes were cleaned out. The boxes in the ballroom went into the main room where most of them belonged, but as they got to the boxes containing a little of this and a little of that, progress slowed as the items were distributed throughout the house. Eventually Sigrid appeared, triumphant at completing her painting. She’d chosen a pale green that matched her mural, and the clean, bright walls lifted Bard’s spirits even more. Once the paint dried, Sigrid’s room would look much more cheerful. Supper was full of debate about whose room would be next.

The lads had done a good job of getting all the media components working, and proudly demonstrated that the TV, DVD, and CD player all worked. They sampled some of each all evening, and at midnight watched the New Year’s celebration together. Tilda was almost asleep, but roused enough for the final countdown, then was happy to go upstairs to bed. As the house quieted, Bard and Thran retreated to their room in good spirits. Thran cycled through the shower first, as he didn’t need to wash his hair, and Bard left him to settle into bed while he had a more thorough scrub. When he returned to the bedroom, Thran was curled among the pillows, all but asleep.

“You wore yourself out today, cariad,” Bard murmured, as he climbed in beside Thran.

“I did,” Thran sighed softly, sliding over to make room for Bard. “I did extra barre to make up for missing so many classes, and then I was busy with the unpacking. I never got to ask you about the kitchen.”

“The kitchen will still be here tomorrow, or the next day. Right now, your job is to take care of you.”

“We have so much to do, lyubov moya. The children’s schools first, then finish so much construction, and then find the things to make our house less empty.”

“It’ll come. The house is full of the most important things already – us. Everyone’s getting along – Bain and Legolas did a great job of setting up all the media. Sigrid painted her room, and Tilda helped with the unpacking, and you were able to work in the ballroom. I cooked. Tomorrow we’ll get a little farther on. Sunday, maybe we can take the children to see the tree at Rockefeller Center. You and Legolas have already gone, but Sig, Til, and Bain haven’t, and I promised them we’d go. And Monday we start to line up the children’s schools.”

Bard told Thran what Sigrid had said about the Imladris Academy. Thran listened sleepily, smiling at why Sigrid had taken such an interest beyond mere academics, and agreed that he would ask about fencing and archery for Legolas.

“Enough family business,” Bard said, stroking Thran’s hair. “You’re exhausted, and need to rest.”

Thran didn’t protest as Bard turned out the light and gathered him close, cradling Thran’s head on his shoulder. He rubbed Thran’s back slowly, earning a low rumble of contentment.

“Oh, my saint, you are zoloto moyo – my treasure. That feels so good.”

“I’ll call the tub installers next week. If you’re going to work so hard, you need that soaking tub to recover.”

Thran chuckled softly in the dark. “Only if you promise to get in with me.”

“That’ll get us both into trouble.”

“I hope so.” Thran sighed as he snuggled close into Bard. “I am very sorry, my love. I had wanted to play tonight, but I am very tired.”

Bard hushed him. “If you expect us to pillage each other every night, we’ll be dead before the year is out. It’s a treat, a treasure, not an obligation. You need to get strong again for your auditions. I’m happy to hold you like this, to be warm in bed with you. So sleep, silly dancer.”

Thran sat up enough to kiss Bard. “You take very good care of me, lyubov moya. I love you very much.”

“Of course I do, angel, just as you take care of me. Now go to sleep.”

“I hear and obey, my saint.”

Bard grinned as he snuggled into the pillows with Thran in his arms. He didn’t have to see Thran’s face to know that he smiled.
Chapter 31

Chapter Summary

Domesticity descends upon the house of a saint and his angel, and the search for a suitable school for four cherubs begins.

Thran drifted off into sleep, cradled in the arms of a saint. He so wanted to do more than soak up Bard’s warmth, feel the soft caress of Bard’s chest hair against his cheek, savor the stroke of Bard’s hand across his back, but he was so, so tired. He’d pushed himself ruthlessly at the barre this morning, not enough to injure himself, but enough to recover a little of the edge that distinguished him from so many other dancers. He still had far to go to recover his full technique, but he was satisfied in his progress. And though he shouldn’t have worked so hard to help Bard unpack, he wanted to – this was his family now, his home, and he wanted to add his stamp to it, too. He had thoroughly enjoyed watching Legolas with Bard’s three children to bring the sitting room into being, and helping to serve the supper, and being part of the cleanup. He’d never done such things before. Even to slump between Tilda and Legolas to drowse through cartoons until midnight, cheer the dropping ball, then shepherd sleepy children to bed, had been novel. He felt like a small child himself, struggling to stay awake so as not to miss a minute of anything.

It was perfect to end the day in bliss with his saint, even if tonight bliss meant only nesting together like puppies.

He slept soundly without waking until morning.

When he opened his eyes, it was to see Bard asleep beside him on his back, wavy brown hair scattered in his eyes and across the pillow, a half smile on his lips. Thran was content to watch Bard sleep for some minutes before he slipped from between the sheets and headed into the bathroom to change into his dance clothes. When he came out, Bard stirred.

“Happy New Year’s Day, angel.”

Thran’s mouth watered at Bard’s drowsy Welsh accent, at warm brown eyes still not quite open, at the first languid stretches of a powerful body, at the heart-stopping glimmer of a smile that greeted him. He’d kneeled by Bard’s side of the bed before he’d fully registered doing so.

“Happy New Year’s Day to you, lyubov moya.” Thran took up Bard’s hand to kiss. “My beautiful saint.”

“Am I?” Bard shut his eyes and chuckled. “Don’t come any closer, then, or my breath will change your opinion.”

Thran added his chuckle to Bard’s. “Stay in bed. It is only seven. I am off to the barre.”

“I’ll be up soon, angel. Stretch well.”

He left before he abandoned his resolve and crawled back into bed with his sleepy lover, took himself down to the kitchen to make tea, carried the steaming mugful into the ballroom, and set to his work.

It took longer than usual to settle into his routine, and it was entirely because he had more than the dance to occupy him now. He had a lover sleepily rousing upstairs, four children to care for, and a house to settle. But his part in this family was to dance, and he was not in proper condition to do so. That he could remedy only at the barre.

Today’s routine was just as strenuous as yesterday’s, but he wasn’t so drained at the end of it. Once the holiday was over, and the children were in school again, he would be back in class every day, and his recovery would go faster. But after so many years, Thran was well able to put himself through anything from the gentlest to the most rigorous of routines. He followed his barre work with jetés and footwork, taking advantage of the expansive ballroom to push right up to exhaustion without passing into it. His yoga that followed so much work was calming, lengthening, restoring, until he was supple and centered, and ready for the rest of the day.

He took his empty teacup into the kitchen, but no one was there. He followed the sounds of voices into the sitting room where Bain, Legolas, and Tilda had gathered, waiting for the Rose Parade to begin. Tilda brightened to see him.

“Thran! The parade will start in just a few minutes! I’m ready to explain it to you, if you’d like.”

Legolas looked at him as if he were mad, but Thran smiled benignly at him. He put his hand to his chest and bowed to their youngest child.

“I would enjoy that very much, Tilda. I will shower, and come down right after.”

“Okay,” she nodded, smiling. “Get Da and Sigrid, too. They’re upstairs in her room.”

“I will do so,” Thran agreed, and took himself upstairs. He found Bard perched on a ladder, brushing paint on the woodwork between the wall and the ceiling. Even paint-stained work pants and an old tee shirt couldn’t hide Bard’s quiet strength – if anything, the rough attire just added to his allure. If Sigrid hadn’t been painting in the opposite corner, Thran might have been tempted to tease Bard off that ladder and into bed. But the moment for that would come soon, when the children would be in school, and the house would be empty but for the two of them...

A jolt in Thran’s loins drew a wince from him. A dancer’s belt was not the most comfortable confinement for an aroused cock.

“Good morning, ma chère Sigrid, lyubov moya Bard. Already hard at work?”

“Da is such a slave driver,” Sigrid teased, putting her brush down and coming to give Thran a hug. “Morning, Ada. I mean, he made me come up here and start priming woodwork at eight o’clock this morning! Who does that?”

“I think you have a loving Da who lets his beloved daughter convince him to help her paint woodwork at eight o’clock in the morning, yes?”

Sigrid giggled. “Welllllll.... I guess it did kind of happen that way. But it’s going to look great, isn’t it?”

Thran looked around admiringly. The pale green walls and white woodwork looked calm and fresh, and the light streaming in from the two windows was cheerful. The ceiling still looked like it needed painting, and the floor needed a good cleaning, but before long Sigrid would have the lovely sanctuary she craved.
“It already looks wonderful. It will suit you very well, ma chère.”

“We’re doing this ass-backwards, I know,” Bard said, climbing down from his ladder. “We should have done the ceiling first, then the walls, then the woodwork, but I’m not about to turn down such enthusiastic help with the painting.”

“Da makes it go faster, anyway,” Sigrid said, smiling. “He’s got such a steady hand that he doesn’t have to tape everything the way I do. So that saves a lot of time. We’ve got almost all of the woodwork primed, and this afternoon we’ll do the ceiling –”

“You’ll do the ceiling,” Bard amended.

“Okay, then, I’ll do the ceiling, and then we’ll do the woodwork with the gloss white, and it’ll be done. Tomorrow, I’ll clean the floor, and I’ll be set. Da, can I use the sewing machine? I can make curtains like I learned in family arts.”

“It’s in the main room,” Bard replied. “I haven’t figured out where it should go yet. Maybe we’ll turn one of the upstairs rooms in to an art studio for Tilda, and it can go there.”

“I can put it in my room for a while,” Sigrid offered, drawing Bard’s laughter.

“One thing at a time, Sig,” he counseled. “Paint first, then floor, then curtains.”

“Okay,” Sigrid conceded, smiling.

“Finished your barre and yoga, then?” Bard asked, brushing a kiss on Thran’s lips. Sigrid snorted in quiet laughter, but that merely encouraged Bard to wiggle his eyebrows at her and give Thran another kiss.

“I have. I have been directed to shower and then come down for the parade, and to bring the two of you with me.”

“Have you eaten?”

“Not yet. I will eat while I watch the parade. Tilda is eager to explain it to me, and I will not deny her that pleasure.”

Bard’s appreciative smile was such that Sigrid rolled her eyes again. “Honestly, you two are the biggest saps! When we go out in public, try not to do that. It’s cute here, but out in the world, it’s so embarrassing.”

“Paybacks are hell,” Bard winked at Thran, reminding him of when Bard had quoted the old adage to him. His loins jolted again, drawing another wince from him. “You had your chance to embarrass your Da in public when you were a baby. Now it’s my turn to embarrass you.”

“Just don’t do it Monday, okay?” Sigrid pleaded. “I want to like that school, and I want them to like us. So don’t embarrass us. Please, Ada? Please Da?”

“We will do our best to look properly... stodgy, is the word, perhaps?” Thran deadpanned.

“Ew, that’d be even worse. Just look hot, but not all kissy-faced.”

Bard burst out laughing. “You want your Da to look hot? That’s a first.”

“No, it isn’t. Ada, would you please take Da shopping and get him a decent pair of pants and a couple of shirts, and a good pair of boots? Tomorrow? So he looks hot on Monday?”
Thran could no longer suppress his laughter. “Oh, ma chère, tu es formidable! I will do my best, if I can persuade your Da to take us to the mall tomorrow.”

“We were going to Rockefeller Center tomorrow,” Bard protested.

“We can still do that, Da. We’ll go early to the mall, get your stuff, and then go skating.”

“You do need some new clothes, lyubov moya,” Thran agreed.

Bard was laughing, but his face had reddened, and he’d thrust his hands into the pockets of his jeans. “It looks like you two have planned my day, doesn’t it?”

“It’ll be fun, Da. Really,” Sigrid assured him breezily, but Bard regarded her with wary amusement.

“If you say so,” he shrugged, winking at Thran again.

“So I am for the shower, and then for the parade,” Thran wiped his face again with his towel.

“We’ll cap the paint, put the brushes in plastic wrap, and be right down,” Bard agreed. “Porridge good?”

“Perfect,” Thran agreed, and they separated to their various tasks. In the shower, Thran took his usual care with his hair, but he did so quickly, then hurried into his clothes and downstairs to sit beside Tilda. He’d missed only a little of the parade. As Bard handed him a bowl of porridge and a cup of tea, their youngest child launched into an explanation of how all the floats had to be covered in natural materials. Bard returned to the kitchen to bring out a basket of muffins for everyone to share and cups of hot cocoa for the children.

“You spoil us all terribly, my domestic saint,” Thran observed, smiling as four hands descended upon the muffins.

“And happily so.” Bard sat down beside Thran, venturing to take a muffin after four hands had grabbed theirs. “Want a taste?”

“A small one,” Thran agreed, breaking off a small piece from Bard’s. “Mmm. Delicious. Blueberry. So, Tilda, the parade is in California, yes?”

Tilda continued her explaining, which drew Legolas to shake his head, but he listened despite his apparent dismissal, even asking a question or two. When the parade was over, the boys turned on one of the day’s ubiquitous American football games while Bard and Thran got lunch ready. Thran had his tour of the kitchen as he and Bard set out plates on the table, and food on the kitchen island.

“Gods, we’re running out of everything already,” Bard looked apprehensively at the inside of the refrigerator, rubbing his chin. “I think I can stretch everything until Monday. We’ll have to go to the market after we see the school. Can’t go Tuesday, because we have two schools to see, and if I wait until Wednesday, we’ll all be eating ramen.”

“No ramen,” Thran said firmly. “We will make do, and go Monday after the school. We will buy half the store.”

Bard exhaled as he shut the refrigerator door. “I hope you have every one of those millions I think you do, Thran, because I’m running through at least one of them hand over fist. I’m sorry.”

Thran snared Bard by the kitchen island and put his arms around him. Yes, his saint was taut under his hands, but with worry, not arousal, and his posture was hunched. “We have money, Bard. There is nothing to worry about. None of us will have to eat that wretched ramen, ever. Though I suspect the boys will do so willingly, because boys have little concept of the wretchedness of junk food.”

A little of the tension eased from Bard’s shoulders, and he patted Thran’s hand. “Some moments, it takes my breath away how mad this all is. What was I thinking?”

“That we were in love and had chance to make a better life together with our children. That is what we both thought. We have done the hard part, lyubov moya. We have come together, we have become a family, we have moved here. Now we have the pleasure to finish our home together, and care well for our children. So please, don’t worry. All is well.”

Bard took another marshaling breath. “Keep reminding me of that, Thran. I keep expecting to wake up back in Steffen’s grotty apartment, and that would shatter me.”

“I will remind you. Now, let us call Clan Ffyrnig to the table.”

“The place where they’re at their fiercest,” Bard shook his head, wryly. Good, his saint was back on keel again. “I’ve got your salad greens, and some chicken. What veg do you want with them?”

“I will see to them. You put on the teakettle, and prepare for the onslaught.”

Lunch was a loud affair. The children had been together long enough, and enough time had passed since the fight in the park, that they were easing their careful protectiveness of each other, and snarking back and forth as if they’d lived together for years. Legolas was still quieter than the others, but his expressions of delight, outrage, hilarity, embarrassment, and a host of other emotions were open, without reserve; his son was fitting into this merry band of fierce children well. After lunch, Bard decided what to make for supper, Tilda settled with Mr. Bun to read the storybook Bard had given her for Christmas, and the boys debated which video game to play. Sigrid was eager to get on with her painting, but first she found both him and Bard in the kitchen mixing a marinade for tonight’s chicken.

“Why don’t you two go to the mall to get Da some clothes now?” she suggested. “It’s Friday, the shops will be open, and you won’t have the four of us hanging around getting bored. We can handle everything here for a couple of hours.”

Thran continued to stir the concoction as Bard added more spices to the bowl. “That is a good idea, Sigrid. Do you think so, Bard? There is nothing that we planned to do here this afternoon that cannot wait another day.”

“Except for the bathroom tiling and Sig’s woodwork and half a dozen other things, but I guess there’s no dodging it,” Bard conceded. “If you’re okay with the children being here alone for a couple of hours —”

“Alone?” Sigrid repeated, her hands on her hips and her head canted to one side. “There are four of us, Da. No one’s ever alone in this family.”

Bard’s lips twitched. “That’s exactly the way I want it, sweetness.”

“And that’s the way it is with four of us. We’ll be fine for a couple of hours.”

Bard held up his hands in surrender. “I’m game if you are, Thran. Though I warn you, you’ve got your work cut out for you.”

“I do not,” Thran shrugged, stirring the marinade. “It will be no work at all. Wait and see.”
He gave Bard a look, which Bard returned, both of which had Sigrid throwing her hands up into the air. “Ye gods and little fishhooks, get a room, you two! Honestly, it’s like being in middle school!”

Laughing, Bard swept Sigrid into a dance around the island. “It’s getting too easy to tease you, sweetness. So come into the sitting room for a minute so we can tell the lads and Tilda where we’re going.”

They made the children promise to behave – Thran hoped they managed to keep from thumping the house down around their ears – and designated Sigrid as captain with Legolas as first mate for the three-hour cruise. This, apparently, was a reference to a TV show from long ago that Bain found particularly funny.

“And make Da get a coat, Ada!” Sigrid exhorted Thran. “He’s been making do with two sweaters since the cops took his for evidence, but he needed one long before that.”

Thran realized with a pang that Sigrid was right – for the past week, Bard had simply pulled a pair of thick sweaters over his Henley each time they’d gone out. He hadn’t noticed because Bard hadn’t called attention to it.

“You can wear one of mine today,” Thran offered. “Let me get it.”

He fetched coats and boots from the entry closet and came back to the sitting room with his armload, handing his leather jacket to Bard and keeping his grey pea coat for himself. After putting on his boots, Bard awkwardly pulled on Thran’s jacket, reddening when Bain and Sigrid started oohing and aahing. Bard was not as slender as Thran was, but the supple leather accommodated his muscular frame beautifully. Tilda looked at her father with her usual careful consideration.

“You look great, Da!” was Sigrid’s opinion.

“You do!” Bain agreed, sounding so surprised that Thran laughed.

“Very funny, both of you,” Bard grimaced. He gave Tilda a look. “Well, Til, let’s have your two cents’ worth, too.”

“I think you look nice,” she pronounced. She bent to sniff his sleeve. “You smell nice, too.”

“That’s good to know... I think,” Bard ran a hand through his hair. “All right, you lot, no jumping on the furniture, and don’t turn the game console on so loud that the windows blow out, and look after each other while we’re gone.”

“Okay Da.”

“Legolas, please wait to practice your archery and your fencing until we return,” Thran added. “Our usual rules apply.”

“Yes, Father. Have a nice time.”

Thran and Bard made their escape out to the truck, and were soon on their way. Bard ran a hand through his hair again, his usual sign of discomfort.

“What is it, Bard?”

His half grin was both amusement and chagrin. “Children pull no punches. I guess it bothers them, the way I look.”
“I do not think it bothers them. They are proud of you. They are proud of all you have done. They know that you have sacrificed so that they have what they need. Now they are excited for you to have some new things for yourself, that is all.”

“It’s true, most of my stuff is in rags. That didn’t matter when I was welding. Construction’s hard on clothes. I ought to throw most everything I own out.”

“Please do not throw all of it out,” Thran put a comforting hand on Bard’s thigh as they drove. “The sight of you in your boots and jeans... I cannot describe how erotic that is. Especially when those jeans ride so low. I think you do that just to devil me.”

Bard snickered. “I didn’t, but I think I’ll do a little more of it from now on. Deviling you has become one of my favorite hobbies. Enjoying your retaliation when I devil you is another one.”

“Then if you want more retaliation, you will keep your jeans and steel toed boots. Today, then, we will not find replacements for them, but things to wear when we interview schools, and go to films and the market and other places, and talk to artist’s reps.”

“Artist’s reps?” Bard gave him a startled look.

“Not for a while. Our house needs work, and you are the best one to see to that, and I agree with you that that is what you should do. But before long, you will start on your metal again, and you will need an artist’s rep to broker your work. I know of one that I think would be good to talk to, when you are ready.”

“It’s not Isen Saruman Brothers, is it? They’re sharks, both of them.”

Thran shook his head. “No, I am aware of them and their poor reputation. This is a relatively new firm, still small, and therefore willing to work for a few percentage points less than usual. They may not have the widest reach of such folk, but by reputation they are diligent workers, and understanding of their clients. The firm is Shire Hills.”

Bard shook his head. “They must have started after I had to move to the city. But if you think they look good, I’ll talk to them. Just as soon as we get the house a bit farther along.”

“How much is farther along?” Thran asked, curious rather than challenging.

“All the children’s rooms and our room are painted and the floors done. Both of the upstairs bathrooms are finished. The kitchen floor’s cleaned and waxed, and the walls are painted. The other lower level rooms are painted and the floors are done. That should keep us for a while. Is that okay with you?”

Thran nodded. “It is.”

“Oh, and the ballroom needs painting and the floor done. You’ll have to tell me what to do to the floor so you can dance properly. And we have to sort out your auditions. I’ve been worried that you’ll have to take something where you’ll have to live in the city during the week, and spend only the weekends at home. Could that happen?”

Thran considered. “Conceivably, if I decide to take a position that makes the commute too difficult. But the one position that would require that I do not expect to take, so I will not concern myself yet. I also mull the possibility to teach master classes, which I could hold in the ballroom, if that is something you would allow. There is good money in that, and I have had requests to teach before now, so I think I could stage several classes to make the annoyance and cost of insurance worthwhile. I would like to talk to you about that in detail, so you know what would be involved, and can say whether you would allow such an intrusion into our home.”

“If you would like to do that, then we’ll make it happen,” Bard shrugged. “But right now, you’d better tell me where we’re going. The mall’s just ahead.”

“Then let us forge into the mall, and see what they have to offer us,” Thran agreed. “This will be fun, lyubov moya. It will.”

“If you say so, angel. It’s been so long since I’ve been shopping that I don’t know if I remember how.”

Thran grinned in anticipation. “That does not matter. I know how. And I will enjoy this.”

“Just don’t dress me up as a starving artist, please. I’ve already got the wardrobe for that.”

“I don’t intend to ‘dress you up’ as anything. Tcha, do you not know the secret of how to buy the best clothes, Bard?”

“I freely admit that I don’t,” Bard chuckled, pulling the truck into a parking space at the back of the lot.

“Buy only clothes that you wear. Do not buy clothes that wear you.”

Once Bard switched off the truck and pocketed the keys, he leaned over the steering wheel and cast Thran an amused smile. “I hope you’re going to explain what that means.”

“In detail, my saint.”

Bard’s sigh was longsuffering, but the hint of anticipation in his eyes revealed that he wasn’t as tentative about this endeavor as he let on.

* * *

The mall was crowded with shoppers looking to cash in on the last of the holiday bargains, patrons deciding to exchange old gifts for new, and teenagers bored of staying inside with families and eager to catch up with friends. Bard steered them to the directory kiosk, which Thran studied for a few seconds. He pointed to a couple of places.

“These first, I think.”

“Sigrid says that one has a discount department. A lot of designer stuff for reduced prices.”

“A good place to try,” Thran agreed, and led the way through the throng. It struck Bard how many people stared at them – at Thran, not him, and he well understood why. Such a tall, graceful man, so slender, with such hair, was striking even in his usual black velvet jeans, grey Henley, grey pea coat, and bright red scarf. All at once, Bard understood what Thran had meant by buying clothes that he would wear, rather than clothes that would wear him. Nothing Thran wore called attention to itself; in fact most of what he wore was little more than ascetic, if good quality. But the stark colors and streamlined styling emphasized all of Thran’s best features. Realizing that made Bard feel a lot better about this expedition.

“I figured it out,” he murmured, watching a pair of teenaged girls eye his lover, then smother giggles
“What?” Thran murmured back, eyes sliding towards the two girls.

“About me wearing clothes instead of clothes wearing me. Half of the place is looking at my lover because that’s what you do. So we’re here to find things that do the same for me.”

Thran cast him a pleased smile. “Exactly so, my saint. When we leave, I fully expect the other half of the place, as you call it, will look at you. We will make a striking couple, not that we don’t already.”

Bard snickered. “The next thing I want you to teach me is how to ignore half of the place looking at me.”

“That is simple to explain, though hard to do. One – consider your half of the place to be a field of cabbages, because vegetables have no power to unnerve. Two – be aware of your posture, do not chew gum or smoke, do not play with your hair, do not curse in public in a language anyone understands. Three – if anyone speaks to you, be polite, never explain or volunteer anything, do not banter, especially with young females, and pretend not to hear anything said as an aside, good or bad.”

Bard straightened, smiling as he did so. Beside him, Thran also stood a hair straighter, brushed a strand of white hair over his shoulder, and gave a miniscule nod towards the pair of nervously giggling girls as they angled closer.

“Mr – Mr. Oropherson? Please? May – may we have your autograph? P-please?”

Thran’s smile was gracious as he took the piece of paper and pen that one of the girls had thrust out at him. “You are kind to ask, ma chère,” he murmured, his Russian accent more pronounced than was his usual. “What is your name, then?”

“Fern and Miriam?” one offered, clutching her friend’s arm in a death grip. “I’m Fern, and she’s Miriam. Ohmygodohmygodohmygod, it’s like such an honor to meet you!”

Thran traced a graceful flourish on the paper, and another on the paper held out by the second girl. “Are you dancers, mes petites?”

“Oh, we like so are, and we’re your biggest fans ever!”

“Yeah, we’ve watched you on YouTube like so many times, we know all your dances! You’re the best ever!”

Thran handed back the papers, and offered one of his Continental bows. “I thank you so much. I am happy you enjoyed them.”

“Can we have a picture with you, too? Please?”

“Of course.” He turned to Bard. “Perhaps you can take it for her, lyubov moya, so they both can be in the picture with me?”

“Of course,” Bard grinned, tickled at the whole affair. He took a couple of pictures with each mobile of the girls standing on either side of Thran, then handed them back.

“Thank you, thank you, thank you so much!” one of the girls squealed. “And thank you, Mr. Oropherson’s friend, for taking the pictures for us!”
“Glad to oblige,” Bard nodded, smiling.

“You are so lucky to be his friend!” the other one added enviously.

“I am,” Bard agreed, winking at Thran as the two girls scampered off, squealing to each other about their trophies.

“I am the lucky one,” Thran winked back at Bard. “Come, before more descend.”

They continued on their way without interruption. Once in the store, they headed to the men’s department, a place that was blessedly free of teenaged ballerinas. Thran cruised through the racks leisurely but methodically, occasionally touching one article or another, but he didn’t linger over anything until the fourth or fifth item. He took out a blue-grey shirt, and handed it to Bard, then kept moving.

“How do you know when to stop at something?” Bard murmured. It’d been a long time since he’d had the luxury of shopping like this. Usually he headed to the thrift store, or at best the irregular rack of the cheapest off market store, and bought whatever fit him.

“You need shirts, sixteen or seventeen inch neck, thirty-six inch sleeve. You are six feet two inches, which means a tall size. Blues and greys and subtle patterns suit you, not blacks or beiges or loud patterns. So I look only for shirts in those sizes and colors. When I find one, I see if the style suits you and if the fabric is nice. I pick up only what meets all of that.”

“Hmm,” Bard shrugged. “Easier than I expected.”

“It makes sense. Look at only what suits you from the start. Ignore the rest.”

Thran kept moving, and Bard went one rack over to try the same thing. At the end of the row, they had six shirts. They moved on to trousers, and soon came up with four in Bard’s size. Thran ushered him to the dressing room, squeezing himself into the corner while Bard tried on all of the pants. Only two felt good, so Thran collected the other two and put them aside. Only then did Thran pass over the first shirt. That went faster, though Thran silently ogling him from beside the mirror gave them both something to grin at. Four of the shirts didn’t suit, but the last two were possible. Thran held silence as Bard considered.

“They’re both nice, but this one doesn’t feel as good –”

“Then off it comes. Toss it to me.”

“But –”

“No buts, lyubov moya. Your body knows better than your eye. If it does not feel like your skin, then it is not right.”

“That’s not going to leave me with much.”

“Exactly. You do not want anything that does not feel like your skin. Only perfection. Not almost perfection.”

“Okay, then not these pants, either. Just the dark blue ones.”

“And that shirt?”

Bard nodded. “That one’s nice.”
“So put them on together, and see how that looks.”

Bard did, and gave himself a gander in the mirror. Neither blue grey shirt nor dark blue trousers called attention to themselves, but Bard liked the way they looked on him. Thran was nodding, a smile on his face.

“Yes. Those are the best ones.”

They took another pass through the racks, found nothing else that appealed to either of them, then headed on. After visiting five or six stores, Bard emerged attired from head to toe in his new purchases. In all, he was the proud owner of three pairs of pants, two pairs of jeans, seven shirts, a sweater, oxfords, a pair of boots, socks, underwear, winter gloves, new sleep pants that were not plaid or ratty, and a soft grey coat that felt luxurious and looked better.

“Look in that store,” Thran stopped Bard as they backtracked through the mall, heading towards the exit nearest to the truck, both of them laden with bags. “That grey-blue scarf on the last maquette.”

“Mannequin.”

“Yes, that. It matches your coat.”

Five minutes later, Bard draped the blue scarf around his neck, enjoying the soft brush of the plushy weave on his neck.

“Yes,” Thran purred, as they walked.

“Yes what?”

“The scarf feels good, and so does everything else, yes? It shows. You were beautiful before, but you are more so now, because you have an outer skin that suits you. And now your half of the place looks at you.”

Bard winced, but Thran was right. Maybe people stared at Thran first because he was so striking, but Bard was getting a share of the looks, too. Too tongue-tied to speak, Bard could only smile as he walked beside Thran. His tall lover gave him a sideways smile, then linked his arm in Bard’s.

“We are a striking couple, are we not?” Thran murmured.

“We are,” Bard agreed.

* * *

When Bard and Thran walked into the house after their shopping venture, they came into the sitting room where Bain and Legolas were still glued to the TV and their game console. A clatter behind them announced Sigrid’s arrival from upstairs.

“Gods, Da! Look at you!” Sigrid exclaimed as soon as she came into the room. She had a smudge of white paint on her arm, but otherwise looked unscathed from her exercise in ceiling painting. “Ada, you’ve made him look so great! I can’t believe you, Da!”

“Yeah, uh-huh, Da, you look good,” Bain nodded, eyes on the TV and the game he and Legolas were playing. Bard grinned; no coat, pair of pants, or shirt had yet been made that could distract Bain’s laser focus away from a video game.

Legolas, at least, gave him a little more of a look, offering a smile. “You do look nice,” he said shyly.

Tilda arrived, her book in hand, to look her father up and down. She touched the trailing end of Bard’s blue scarf. “Mmm, that’s so soft. I think you look nice, too.”

“So you’ll wear that Monday when we go to the school, right?” Sigrid asked.

“I don’t know, Sig. Does this look too hot?” Bard teased, holding his new coat open to show his new shirt and pants. “I don’t want to make the other Das feel bad.”

“So what if you do?” Sigrid shrugged. “I can’t wait to visit this new school!”

The shopping expedition, then, had been a success.

The rest of the day flew by. Bard had just time to take off his new clothes before he started supper, and then children began to cycle through baths and wind down for the night, and then he and Thran had time to tend to themselves. Because they expected to spend Saturday unpacking, they kept their private indulgences short, but thorough.

Saturday was a quiet day. Everyone was glad of the chance to spend the day leisurely unpacking, arranging, playing games, eating whenever they felt like it, and watching DVDs. They played a little soccer outside, laughing in the cold air. After Bard showed Thran the extent of their property, they walked around outside the solarium windows, planning their Japanese garden.

The slow day was the perfect lead-in to Sunday, which began with a good breakfast, then a trip to Rockefeller Center for the skating trip that Bard’s children had looked forward to. All of them ventured onto the ice, even Bard. Despite how many years it had been since he’d skated, he still remembered how, and managed to keep his feet for the entire session. Thran was as graceful on skates as he was on his feet, and to see his hair drifting around him in a cloud reminded Bard of how that hair had floated around him the morning he’d come hurtling down the apartment stairs for their first liaison. They circled the ring together while Bain and Legolas rocketed around pretending to be their favorite hockey players.

Sigrid must have called Finn Durinson about the trip, because the stocky boy with a mop of wavy blond hair and a New York Islanders #86 jersey magically appeared, hockey skates in hand, shortly after they arrived. He and Sigrid spent most of the session circling together and talking, which helped Bard feel a little better about uprooting his family so abruptly. Maybe the thought of not seeing Sigrid every day at school had been just the nudge Finn needed to pay her more attention.

Being the youngest, Tilda was not the strongest skater, and by the end of the session she was happy to skate between Thran and Bard, laughing as they sped around the rink faster than she could go herself.

When their session was over, everyone was well winded, though Sigrid lingered on the ice to talk with Finn. It wasn’t until the attendant chased the pair off that they finally exited. Finn came over to the rest of the family with Sigrid, smiling a cheerful greeting to everyone.

“Ah, a good choice of jerseys,” Thran commented as Finn shook his hand. “Kulemin is the only Russian on your Islanders team, yes?”

Finn’s eyes sparkled. “Yes, sir, he is. He’s the best!”

Bard snickered. Thran didn’t know a lot about many things, but he knew his Russian athletes.
Bain and Legolas joined Finn and Sigrid to talk about skating and hockey, so Bard and Thran stood with Tilda to watch the Zamboni trundle around the rink. Tilda happily explained to Thran why the Zamboni had a sticker of a certain cartoon beagle on the side, and how that same beagle was also a World War I flying ace. Bard listened in silence, happy to watch the two of them laughing together.

How had life become so rosy, even in the depths of winter?

In deference to Sigrid’s pleading eyes, they found a nearby place for lunch so that Finn could join them, and the four older children shared pizza at one table while Bard, Tilda, and Thran had their lunch at another. Tilda felt special, as she had the devoted attention of both her fathers, and the four older children were free to laugh and talk about anything they wanted without worry of outraging either younger siblings or parents. Afterwards, as Finn bade them a reluctant farewell, Bard kept quiet about the promise he overheard the boy make about calling Sigrid every night. He didn’t expect to have to remind Sigrid that schoolwork came before mobile calls from hockey-playing boyfriends, but he’d keep an ear out for late-night giggling all the same.

After lunch, they had their traditional walk around Rockefeller Center, then piled into the truck to head for the market. Because it was still early, they decided to shop for provisions now rather than after the school interview tomorrow. Bard had their list in hand as they went into the big grocery. His children knew the routine of not begging for whatever delight they saw, and Legolas was not the child to act that way, either, but even so, the amount of food that went into two carts was daunting. Bard's old anxiety about money rose with each item that went into the carts, but he told himself that it was all right, Bard had their list in hand as they went into the big grocery. His children knew the routine of not begging for whatever delight they saw, and Legolas was not the child to act that way, either, but even so, the amount of food that went into two carts was daunting. Bard's old anxiety about money rose with each item that went into the carts, but he told himself that every shopping trip would not be so outrageous, because this one included all the things they needed to stock their pantry, in addition to the weekly food items. At least he didn’t have to buy many expensive spices, for his stash had moved with them from the apartment. But the amount of meat alone made him gulp. Most of that was chicken, always less expensive than beef. Fish, however, was not cheap, but it was good for the children and Thran, so he got a couple of meals’ worth of that for the week. At least the junk food aisle didn’t get any of their business, or the pastry case, or the expensive boxed cereal section.

He gritted his teeth when the checkout clerk displayed the total for their haul, and tried not to wince. But Thran was his usual unperturbed self as he pulled out his credit card and signed for the lot. The boys wheeled the carts out to the truck, calling and laughing to each other.

“It is all right, Bard,” Thran said softly as they followed the children. “We have to eat.”

“I know we do. It’s just...”

“I understand. But it is all right. We are all right.”

Bard smiled ruefully. “Some of this is still hard to get used to.”

“Some things for me, too. But we will get each other through this. If you want, I can come with you each time we go to the market. I like to visit here.”

Bard gave Thran a surprised look. “You do? Why?”

Thran shrugged, grinning as he thought about it. “Because it is a place so full of possibilities. So many things to try, to look at, to wonder where they came from. To consider the different kinds of fish, to marvel at the lady who iced the small cakes with such a deft hand, to appreciate the artful person who arranged all the rows of yogurt cups into colorful stripes, to smile at the young clerk with the beautiful headscarf at the kosher counter... so many things. Then there is the anticipation of all the delicious meals we will make, and how we will sit around our table with our children and laugh as we eat. What could be better?”
Trust Thran to find the magic in such mundane task as shopping for food. But as Bard thought about what Thran had said, he realized that he enjoyed the market for the same reasons, and felt a little better.

It took everyone to haul in the bags of food when they got home, though Bard was allowed to carry in only one bag at a time, and a light one, at that, in deference to his stitches. Bard had Tilda and Legolas ferry staples into the pantry, Sigrid stack meat into the freezer, and Thran load the heavy jugs of milk and juice into the fridge, while Bain washed the produce before it went into bowls on the counter or the fridge crisper bins. As they worked, they discussed tomorrow’s visit to the Imladris academy, and soon children were scampering to collect their laundry to cycle through the washer and dryer so that they’d have clean clothes for their visit. Laundering was another thing Thran knew nothing about, other than how to wash his dancing things.

“They are things to wash by hand, and hang to dry,” he explained, as he and Bard stood in the mudroom off the kitchen amid baskets of dirty clothes. “Never in the dryer. This, apparently, is too hard for launderers to remember, and after they ruined several things, I chose to do them myself. The rest of my things, and Legolas’s, I sent out.”

“Okay,” Bard nodded, eying the basket full of tights and stretchy shirts and the mysterious dancer’s belts, which he discovered were just a different configuration of jockstraps. “Your stuff, hand wash, line dry. The washer does have a delicate cycle, though. What about that and cold water? That’d spare you all the hand washing, and it’d get more of the water out, so everything would dry faster.” Thran looked dubious, but he shrugged. “I will try that once. But nothing must ever go in the dryer.”

“Got it.”

Bard set to sorting the rest of the laundry, another thing Thran knew nothing about, nor had he used a washer or dryer before, but he nodded understanding at Bard's sensible explanations. He volunteered to put in the first load under Bard’s eye, smiling triumphantly when he adjusted the machine correctly.

“You’re funny,” Bard shook his head as they dumped in the first basket of clothes. “You’re this elite athlete, this eminent dancer, but you get excited about programming the thermostat, or filling the washer, or going to the market.”

“Because all these things mean I live in a home with a family, Bard.” Thran put the last of his tights into the washer and shut the lid. “I did not learn these things as a child in a dormitory, or as a dancer in the academy, or as a dancer with the company. There were people who did these things so that I could perfect my technique so as to reflect well on the state. When I came to this country, I hired people to clean and to launder. I bought food already cooked or things simple enough to make myself. There was no reason to do otherwise until now. Now I learn from the best of teachers so that I can help our family.”

Bard stroked Thran’s hair back over his shoulder. “Hmm. Maybe I can think of a way to reward you for being such a quick study.”

“If it involves a hot shower and a massage, that would be very nice.”

“I’ll give it some thought, and let you know after we get the children in bed. Why don’t we meet in our room at, say, ten, and talk about it?”

Thran gave him a coy look and an anticipatory smile. “I hope we will do more than talk about it.”
“So do I.”

Some hours later, there was very little talking, but quite a lot of soft moaning. Bard rewarded his angel so well that he was well rewarded in return.

* * *

Everyone was up before eight the next morning, Thran included, but he would not take his place at the barre this morning. Instead, he would help to marshal a good breakfast for his family before they went to visit the Imladris Academy. Bard tried out the new griddle on their stovetop to produce a mountain of blueberry pancakes, as well as some scrambled eggs for Thran. The children all talked eagerly about the upcoming visit; Finn had been a wealth of information yesterday at lunch about the school that his cousin attended. He’d confirmed the archery team that Killian and his girlfriend Tara were part of, but also that there was not a fencing team. That did not dismay Thran; he hadn’t expected one, and even if there had been one, it would likely not have been challenging enough for Legolas. Once life stopped whirling like a dervish, he would find a suitable one.

Finn’s testimony had also implied good things about the academic program, if the number of his groans about hard tests and demanding teachers had been any indication.

The school was on the other side of Greenwood Dale on the Lake from the house, but the drive took only fifteen minutes. Clan Ffyrng piled out of Bard’s truck at a few minutes before ten to regard the school campus. It had once been a monastery some decades ago, and had remained a beautiful but empty relic for some time after that. When the artists’ colony had sprung up about fifteen years ago, so many young artists with families had moved in that the local school was hard pressed to absorb them. The old monastery had been opened as a school for the children nearest the artist’s colony.

“It looks like a church,” Tilda ventured.

“It once was a place where brothers of the church lived, little doll,” Bard agreed. “But when they left, there were so many children that it became a school.”

“I think it’s pretty,” Sigrid said.

“Look, Bain, there are the soccer fields,” Legolas pointed to the telltale cages on the athletic fields on the right.

“Wonder where the archery field is?” Bain asked in return, following Legolas’s finger.

They went inside the main hall, and found administrative offices just inside. A receptionist took their names, and showed them to a waiting area. A case of sport trophies beckoned their attention, and the children went up to it to look.

“That’s got to be Killian,” Sigrid looked closely at the team roster picture beside an archery trophy. “He looks just like Finn, but with dark hair. And maybe that’s Tara? She’s got really long red hair, Finn said.”

“Mr. Bowman? Mr. Oropherson?”

The family turned to find a lean, dark-haired man offering them a welcoming smile. He was as tall as Bard, dressed in dark pants and a burgundy tunic with a high collar.
“Welcome to the Imladris Academy. I’m Headmaster Elrond L’Èarendil.”

“Hello,” Bard leaned forward to shake hands, as did Thran. “These are our children, Sigrid, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda.”

“Good morning to you all,” Elrond nodded, shaking hands with each child in turn. “We have a small meeting room where we can talk for a while. Would you like coffee, tea, or juice?”

Thran and his family followed the headmaster to the meeting room where beverages and a tray of pastries waited for them. Thran was pleased that all of the children showed great restraint and didn’t dive for the pastries at first sight, but waited until they were invited to help themselves. Thran refrained, and he was touched to see Bard do the same so that he wasn’t the only one not eating. He was content to listen quietly to the headmaster’s description of the facility, the curriculum, the philosophy, the class structures, and so forth. He’d endured several such spiels when he’d searched for a school for Legolas four years ago. What impressed him this time was how the headmaster talked to each of their children, not just to Bard and him, inquiring about their interests and their experiences. Bain was the funniest, bringing up Legolas’s proficiencies at archery and fencing before Legolas himself did.

“We do have an archery team,” Elrond confirmed, smiling broadly. “I’m pleased to say that we took the state championship for independent academies last year. How much experience have you had, Legolas?”

Thran listened to his son’s modest assessment with amusement, but it didn’t pass Elrond by that his young son had placed on the varsity team of his school and was training for a future Olympics berth.

“That is quite impressive,” Elrond agreed. “And so are your fencing skills. We do not have a school team, but we are fortunate to have a very talented pair of trainers close by, so the three or four students who wish to pursue the sport have access to their expertise. Both have plied the sport on the international circuit for some years, and are quite experienced – Lady Gondor in the foil, and Lord Gondor in the épée.”

“Arwen and Aragorn Gondor?” Legolas asked. “I know them! I actually saw him at the last International trials! Remember, father? He placed third!”

“I do remember, Legolas,” Thran confirmed. “His match was very close. He almost took it from the Spaniard who took first.”

“Which of the events is your preference?” Elrond asked.

“I like them all, but I love épée the most, like Aragorn. My father is quite skilled, and I love to practice with him.”

Thran smiled proudly at Legolas. “My son is gracious. He takes more of our matches than not these days, and he improves every time we spar. He is very fast.”

Elrond’s eyebrows went up. “Indeed. I didn’t know that your ballet training also included fencing.”

“That’s why Legolas is such a good a fencer,” Bain inserted proudly. “Thran dances with knives!”

Everyone burst out laughing at that, including Elrond. “I see. You are from a talented family, then.”

“We’re all good at something,” Tilda piped up. “You know about Legolas and Thran. Sigrid is a good writer. Bain is a good soccer player. I like to draw. And Da is a metal sculptor.”
“Talented, indeed. I’ll keep all of these things in mind as I take you around the school.”

They put on their coats to visit all the various departments in other buildings. There was a bright and sunny art studio that all the grades shared, full of examples of works from pastels to oils and clay. Elrond made a special effort to find one of the art instructors, Mr. Rohan, who talked to Tilda and showed her the clay horse sculpture he was working on. They met several other instructors, including Mr. Gandalf, who taught chemistry; Ms. Galadriel, who taught history; and Mr. Glorfindel, who taught music. Elrond made a point of taking them through the gymnasium to meet Mr. Faramir, the gymnasium master and archery instructor. To Thran’s surprise, he had heard of Legolas, and welcomed him warmly, saying he would be well pleased to have him on the school team. When Mr. Faramir heard of Bain’s interest in soccer, he found Mr. Boromir, the soccer and lacrosse coach, to talk to Bain. As they were leaving the gym to see more of the classrooms, a shaggy-haired boy shouted and sprinted towards them.

“Hi, Mr. E!” the dark-haired boy heralded with a bright grin and a wave. “I think I know one of your guests. You’re Sigrid Bowman, aren’t you?”

Sigrid’s eyes widened, but she found her poise in another heartbeat. “And you’re Kíllian Dís.”

“Sure that I am, and good to see you!” the boy pumped her hand vigorously. “Hi, all! Finn told me to look out for your lot, and to tell you hello for him. So I’m glad to pass on his message.”

When they introduced themselves all around, Kíllian exclaimed when he met Legolas. “I thought I recognized you! You were on Eregion’s archery team, weren’t you?”

“I was,” Legolas nodded.

“They’re pretty good! Well, just wanted to give you all a shout out. Maybe I’ll see you again. Thanks for letting me interrupt, Mr. E.”

“Quite all right, Kíllian. I hope I’m not going to see you so often this term.”

Kíllian grinned without shame. “I hope not either, Mr. E. Though ‘tis always nice to see you, sir. Bye, all!”

The boy ran back into the gym, waving vigorously at the door before he went in. Elrond shook his head and chuckled.

“That one’s a scamp, I gather,” Bard grinned.

“In the best way, but yes,” Elrond admitted. “Very smart, and the best archer I’ve seen in the school for a long time. A bit reckless, and overly fond of silly pranks. I feel quite bereft if I don’t see him at least once a week.”

Bain snickered, but quickly quieted when Bard’s eye fell on him. “None of you have that predisposition, do you?” Bard asked mildly, winking at Elrond.

“No, Da,” Bain murmured, drawing Sigrid to snicker.

“So let’s continue, shall we?” Elrond turned, leading them towards the next building.

Over the next hour or so, Elrond showed them more of the facilities, introduced them to a few more instructors, including one who taught creative writing for Sigrid to talk to. Along the way, Thran and Bard exchanged glances. Bard’s eyes had the same suppressed excitement that Thran felt in his chest, and the children were all attentive, interested, and full of questions for all of the staff they met.
This was a vibrant place that would encourage their children intellectually as well as artistically and physically.

Thran wondered what the cost of all of this would be. If it were too much, Bard would balk. He already suffered over the cost of renovating the house, the cost of food, the cost of the clothing Thran had bought him, the cost of everything. How dire the past years had been to weigh so heavily on the soul of his saint!

At length, Elrond wound up their tour, and left them for a few moments to discuss among themselves. But there really wasn’t much discussion – the children were unanimous that they liked the Imladris Academy, and both Bard and Thran concurred.

The children stayed in the meeting room with another tray of pastries while Thran and Bard went into Elrond’s office to discuss terms. Elrond indicated comfortable chairs for his guests as he took his place behind his desk.

“I should explain something unique about our Academy. When the artist’s colony was first founded, most of the families lived on a shoestring, because they were not yet established artists. Not all were able to continue here, whether through inclination, or lack of success, or worst of all, family tragedy.” Elrond met Bard’s eyes frankly. Ah, so he knew of Bard’s loss so long ago. “But of those who were able to stay, many were highly educated, and valued the same for their children. So I established the Academy to provide that high level, understanding that high tuitions were not feasible for most of our students. The way we keep tuition low is to call on our parents’ expertise to supplement our instructors. Some work as instructors for master classes twice a year. Some fill in as teachers’ aides. Others donate works that we can auction to raise funds. Still others are part-time instructors. If either or both of you would help in that capacity, I think you will find the tuition quite feasible. Also, if all four of your children choose to attend, we offer a family discount.”

Elrond named a figure that was more than reasonable, if Bard and Thran were willing to commit to a given number of hours as teachers or helpers. Bard was already nodding before he looked at Thran, but Thran was as well.

“I like it, too,” Thran said without hesitation. “I would like to talk again with our children first, if you would indulge us.”

“Of course,” Elrond nodded. “If you would like to take a few days to consider, that is no problem, as well.”

“Let us see what the children think,” Thran replied, and so he and Bard rejoined their children in the meeting room. Bard shut the door behind them.

“What do you think?” Thran asked, sitting beside Tilda.

“We get to vote?” Bain asked.

At nods from both Bard and Thran, the children traded inquiring questions.

“I still like it.” Tilda said first.

“So do I,” Legolas said firmly. “It is much nicer than my boarding school, and to take fencing with the Gondors and archery from Mr. Faramir would be wonderful.”

“I like it, too,” Bain nodded. “Mr. Boromir was really nice, and I liked the languages teacher. And “We’ve still got two schools to look at tomorrow,” Bard reminded them. “Do you want to think about it overnight, see the other schools, and then choose one? What if one of the schools we see tomorrow is a better one?”

The children looked amongst themselves, but even Tilda shook her head.

“We like this one, Da,” Sigrid reiterated.

Bard’s look at Thran was inquiring, but Thran already agreed with the children that this school seemed to suit them very well.

“I’m good,” Bard said.

“So am I,” Thran agreed. “So let us tell the headmaster that our children are most eager to begin their classes here.”

“All right. You’re sure, everyone?” Bard asked one last time, but he received the four nods he expected. “Okay, everyone. We’ll go sign the papers.”

And so it was done. The children would be in school Wednesday.

As they drove home, the children talked excitedly about their upcoming first day of school. Thran looked forward to it, too. He had a few ideas about how he and Bard could spend their first day alone in their house. None of them were particularly angelic, but all of them brought a smile to his lips.
Chapter 32

Chapter Summary

When a saint has a crisis of faith, even the grace bestowed by an angel is hard pressed to hearten him.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

Vykluchi etot chertovy svet! = turn off the fucking light (Russian)
Vot der'mo, = oh, shit (Russian)
Oy = ouch (Russian)
Sukin syn = son of a bitch (Russian)
Suka blyad = Motherfucker, bitch (Russian; a good all around useful curse)

The rest of Monday was a blur of activity, all centered around getting the children ready to attend their new school on Wednesday. Bard stopped by the office supply store on the way home for them to collect the school materials listed in the reams of paperwork the headmaster had given them. Bard gulped; more money to be spent. How long would this go on before Thran balked? He didn’t want to think about how much of his lover’s money he’d run through in the past month, or how much he’d spend in the next one. Even he hadn’t realized how much everything would cost, and to be honest, he was just as glad he hadn’t. If he’d counted up just the cost of renovation before he’d met Thran, he would have realized that he would never escape Steffen’s grotty apartment alone, and he would have died inside. He owed Thran so much that a panicky tightness settled in his chest.

The only thing to do about that was to take care of his family as best he could, get busy on the rest of the repairs, and then get back to his metal. He wouldn’t be an equal partner in this family until he contributed something other than sweat equity.

Once they got home, he called both of the other schools to cancel their appointments for Tuesday, then got lunch on. Today’s topic of conversation was what to put in the children’s school lunches on Wednesday. Fortunately, everyone liked ham sandwiches, so Bard planned to cook a ham for tomorrow’s supper as well as the sandwiches. They had plenty of fruit and yogurt, so Bard mixed up brownies to bake. While he was baking, the children spread their new school supplies over the kitchen table, divided everything up, and packed their book bags. They found their lunch bags, and lined them up on the counter with Legolas’s new one, ready for Wednesday’s assembly line. Thran watched all this activity with amusement.

“You are a masterful general, Bard,” the tall dancer declared as he washed the dishes from Bard’s efforts. “None of us would survive without you.”

“You’d sort it out,” Bard demurred, grabbing a dishtowel and drying the mixing bowl.

“I have never done this before, and the children would not know to do it, so it is important that you
“do it for us,” Thran observed. “You are the heart of us, lyubov moya. Our captain, yes? The one who keeps us on course.”

Bard reddened, but appreciated Thran’s sentiment. He’d never thought of what he did in that fashion; it was just what he did to keep everything from crashing down around his ears. But knowing that Thran appreciated and valued it eased the tightness in his chest, and helped him feel a little better about the money he worried over so much. Maybe he couldn’t bring money to the family yet, but to keep it running smoothly was a useful skill, even more important now that there were six of them.

The children retreated to continue their room arranging, and Sigrid asked Bard to show her what she needed to do to the floor in her room, and of course that soon led to Bard getting down on his hands and knees with her to clean the boards with mineral spirits and steel wool. Tilda decided to help, and Thran did a little before reluctantly disappearing into the ballroom to do his delayed barre and yoga.

Once the detritus on Sigrid’s floor was wiped away, Bard, Tilda, and Sigrid set to with paste wax and rags to polish the cleaned boards to a soft luster. As the sky grew dark, Sigrid gleefully cleaned up rags and steel wool and paper towels, and pushed her bed and dresser into their final positions.

The first of the children’s room had been recovered.

“Can my room be next?” Tilda asked, holding the trashcan for Sigrid to dump her handful of used paper towels into it.

“Let’s talk about it at supper, all right? We’ll include the lads, and see what has to be done in all of your rooms, and we can decide. Have you thought about what color you and Mr. Bun would like, little doll?”

“Yellow. To go with my mural. Like lemons, but paler. Not too bright or too loud.”

“Nice and sunny,” Bard grinned, grabbing Tilda for a hug, which set her giggling. “Just like you.”

The resulting dinner conversation gave Bard a list of paint colors – yellow for Tilda, green for Legolas, blue for Bain, and bright turquoise for the bathroom, though the study was still subject to debate. Tilda’s room had the least amount of stuff in it, and the walls were in reasonable shape, and Bain’s room was also in reasonable trim. Legolas’s room, however, needed the most work, for the trim hadn’t been stripped, the walls needed resurfacing before they could be painted, and the ceiling was dingy. Perhaps Bard should repaint the study first to give Legolas a decent place to stay while he worked on the walls and woodwork of his room. Once he finished those two rooms, Tilda’s and Bain’s would follow in short order.

“I’ve got my work cut out for me,” Bard exhaled, as he and Thran settled into bed later that night. “But in a week or two, we’ll have the children’s rooms settled, which means they can settle.”

“It is a lot of work,” Thran laid his head on Bard’s shoulder and stroked his chest. He had switched to Bard’s side of the bed so that he could snuggle close without pressing against Bard’s stitches. “I worry that you push yourself too hard. It will all get done.”

“This won’t be as hard as welding all day and being the night super all night. It’s not so much.”

“Save a little for me to pillage at night.”

Bard rubbed Thran’s arm. “I just want to get us out of the construction site as soon as I can, angel. I won’t feel right until I do.”

Thran was silent, but a faint tension crept into his body. It took him some seconds to speak, and when he did, it was hesitantly. “Is this about how long the work takes? If it is, then perhaps we should hire painters to do this for us? To help you feel better sooner?”

It was Bard who was tense now.

“Ah. This is not about the time it takes, then. If you want to do the work yourself because you have waited so long to do so, I understand. I would not deny you the pleasure. I only want to make sure you do not exhaust yourself because you think there is some deadline you must to meet. There is not.”

Bard tried to speak evenly. “Um, yes, I always thought I’d do the work myself. It’s not complicated, I take more pains than a contractor would, and...”

Thran’s fingers snaked up to his shoulder and clasped it. “This is about the expenditure of money, yes?”

That tightness in his chest was back, only worse.

“Bard, my saint, my love, please... it is all right. We have money. You do not have to toil as a slave for us.”

Bard gulped. “I... can’t help it, Thran. I’ve lived hand to mouth for so long that I can’t take having money for granted. I don’t think I ever will. It bothers me that I’ve spent so much of yours...”

Sighing, Thran sat up against the pillows, and drew Bard into his embrace, reversing their positions. “I have never lived with such want, so I do not presume to understand. It is not that you mistrust me or my affections, but you are afraid to let down a long held guard, yes?”

Bard swallowed hard. “I trust you. I do. But... those cold, hard numbers...”

“You think that if you do not worry, then something will happen, something that might break you.”

Bard’s throat closed, and he couldn’t speak.

Thran rubbed Bard’s back slowly. “Oh, lyubov moja. I wish I could ease your fear.”

Bard gulped. “I don’t think anything can.”

“Perhaps not. But I will try. First, there is no blame to be laid on you for our expenses so far. You did not spend our money alone. I agreed to each penny, too, or else it would not have been spent. So we spent the money together. What did we spend it on? To make the home we crave, where we and all of our children will be happy. This is so much better than our apartments in the city, yes? Here we are together, our children are happy, we are happy. Where is the sin to spend money for such a cause? What is the point to have money if we do not spend it on something so worthwhile?”

Bard’s throat eased a little, and Thran’s gentle strokes on his back further calmed him. “That’s all true,” he admitted. “But... it’s still a lot of money to spend.”

“Has there been one frivolous expense in any of this?”

“N-no. Unless you count the marble bathroom tile.”

“That is beautiful. I like it. I am glad we have it.”

It was still no easier to breathe. “It’s not the end of the expenses, though. We have more yet to come, and –”
“For things like paint and floor cleaners and other such things. Those are not frivolous expenses, either. They are necessary. I accept that.”

“I... just don’t want it to be so much, Thran. It’s a lot.”

Thran sighed again, but kept stroking. “It seems I must do what you call ‘pull out the big guns’ to try to reassure you, then. Forgive me for this. But those cold hard numbers that you stare at? Let me give you one more to think about, lyubov moya. It is a very important number, so listen very carefully. Are you ready?”

Bard gulped. “I’m-I’m ready.”

“All the money we have spent on our happiness thus far is less than two percent of the money we have at our disposal. Less than two percent.”

Bard’s eyes flew open, and he forgot to breathe. He jerked out of Thran’s arms, sat up, and lunged to turn on Thran’s bedside light.

“Oy! Suka blyad!” Thran flinched against the sudden brightness, shielding his eyes with his hands, then burying his head in the pillows. “Yebena mat’, Bard! Why on earth do you light lamp while we are happy in dark? Sukin syn!”

“Holy fucking shit, Thran! I’ve spent more money than a small country, and you say –”

“Vykluchit etot chertovy svet! Vot der’mo, Bard! Turn off the light! Please!”

“Why in all of the hells are you messing with me when you’re worth – ulp!”

Thran had groped blindly for Bard’s arm, yanked him flat onto the bed, and rolled partially onto his chest, gently pressing his fingers against Bard’s lips. “Stop, Bard. Please stop. The light hurts my eyes, and the shouts hurt my ears.”

“Da?” That was Sigrid’s voice at the door. “Da? I heard someone yell. Are you and Ada all right?”

When Bard sat up, Thran shifted over and buried his face in a pillow. “We’re fine, Sig,” he said, managing to keep his voice even rather than panicky. “I tripped over something on the floor in the dark and stubbed my toe, that’s all. Everything’s fine.”

“Okay, just wanted to be sure you and Ada were okay.”

“Thanks, Sig. I’m sorry I woke you. I’m fine. Good night.”

“Night, Da.”

Footsteps retreated from the door.

Swallowing hard, Bard turned back to his lover. When Thran looked up, his eyes had watered so badly that his cheeks were streaked with tears, and he still squinted against the glare. Could he see anything at all?

“Will you not shout now? Please?”

Bard nodded, so Thran rolled onto his back, and lay against the pillows with his hands over his eyes.

“Why didn’t you tell me?”
Thran snorted. “I ask you to replay the last thirty seconds of our lives. That is why.”

“But that means you’re worth –”

“The number is not important. We have enough. That is all that is important.”

Bard couldn’t keep from doing the math, just like he’d done so obsessively for so long, balancing every expense against every meager paycheck until he knew to the penny how deep the hole was that swallowed him. Even as scattered as he was tonight, he still came up with not the few millions that he’d thought Thran was worth, but twice that, maybe more. Maybe Thran heard the counters whirling in his brain, for he groaned in frustration.

“I did not tell you because I did not want you to worry about it, which you now do. I did not want you to question why I loved you, or if I even did, which you now do. I did not want you to set yourself an impossible task to think how to repay the costs to me, or whatever it is that you expect of yourself, which you now do. So now we have a bigger problem, the awareness of a lot of money and the repercussions thereof. This is not a problem I want in our bed.”

Bard was too rattled to know what to say. When he didn’t say anything, Thran muttered another Russian curse under his breath and climbed out of bed. As he bent for his leggings and pullover by the bed, Bard’s mouth went dry.

“Wha-where are you going?”

“I do not know. Downstairs. Perhaps some tea...”

Bard scrambled out of bed and took hold of Thran’s leggings before the dancer could put them on. “Wait. Wait. Let’s start over. I’m sorry I turned on the light. It hurt you, and I don’t ever want to hurt you. And I’m sorry I panicked. I just... I just... don’t want you to think all I do is take from you, because that’s what I’m afraid I’m doing. I love you, angel, and I wish I had more ways to show you than I do. So... let’s just go back to bed, and turn out the light, and start over.”

Thran’s eyes had finally adjusted to the light, and they softened when they met Bard’s. “I would like that much more than tea.”

Thran put his clothes back on the floor, they eased under the sheets again, and Thran turned out the light. He sighed in relief as darkness descended. “So we are back in bed in the dark.”

“I’m sorry,” Bard whispered. “I’m so sorry.”

Thran waved a hand in the dark. “That you turn on the lights, I will survive. That we have money... what do we do to help you survive that?”

“I just never thought that... you had... that much money, Thran. I didn’t.”

“Now that you do, will you not worry when we spend what we need to live well? Please, lyubov moya, you have managed everything so well that I have no concerns about the amount. That amount is far less than if we had had to buy a new house, which would not be as nice as this one. This house is unique, ours alone. I love it here, even though there is still work to do. It will get done, and I have no worry about it. Do you believe me?”

Bard took himself in hand. All worrying had done was hurt his angel, who had told him repeatedly that everything was fine. Didn’t he trust Thran? He knew enough about financial statements to know that Thran was wealthy, and if Thran said the expenses didn’t worry him, then he had to believe him.
“I believe you,” he said softly. “I believe in you, too. It’s me I worry about.”

“Because you do not understand or appreciate what you bring to our lives. You are the heart of the house, the one who sees that everything runs, and is happy and calm. You care for our children. You care so well for me that I am quite spoiled. Remember when I told you that you had made a rare home and family despite few material things, where I had material things but had not made either a home or a family? That is still truth. You will make our beautiful home even more beautiful, and we will all be happy here, and soon you will begin your sculpture again. I have no doubt of these things. What better things should I spend our money on?”

“May I ask how you’ve managed to amass so much money?”

Thran shrugged beside him, staring up at the ceiling. “I had no reason before now to spend much of what I made. I made good investments with a lot of it, and so I amassed more. Money is just a tool that I have learned to use well. It is a pleasure to use some small part of it to make us happy.”

“Okay. I was worried that maybe you’d earned it by doing a lot of wetwork for the Russian mafia, then.”

Snickering, Thran rolled over onto his side to urge Bard to nest with him. To have Thran’s chest at his back was a warm comfort, and so was the hand that caressed his shoulder. “No, lyubov moya. No Russian mafia wetwork.”

“Well... I’ll get used to it. Knowing you have so much.”

“I hope so. Because I want to spend some more of it. I would like your help to do so, but if you were to balk, then I would have to do so alone, and I would likely not spend it so well as if you were to help me.”

“What now? A summer cottage?”

“Tcha, we have our beautiful house, and it will be here in the summer as it is here in the winter. I want to buy an SUV. You know more about such things than I.”

“An SUV?”

“I will need a vehicle to drive back and forth to my dance classes. I think it should be an SUV rather than a small car, so that when I am on the highway I have more steel between me and all manner of mad drivers. It will also be useful to take our children places, such as school or fencing practice or the ice hockey rink. It must have lots of air bags and power steering and room for at least six, but not those ridiculous televisions in the back. Lots of cargo space, and seats that go up and down so we can haul home small treasures from the junk shops, though your truck will be more useful to haul home the larger ones. I have looked at pictures of several SUVs, but you know more about such things than I, so would you please help me decide?”

Thran’s artless recitation was so matter-of-fact that Bard couldn’t resist a chuckle.

“Ah, good. You ease. Though I am serious about the SUV. I have found three kinds so far that are big enough, but there are so many things to consider, and I do not know what are the most important things. Should I care more about pounds of torque or cargo capacity?”

“I’m sorry, but I have to ask, angel. Do you have a driver’s license?”

“Oh, of course I do. Just because I know nothing about cars does not mean I cannot drive one.”
“When was the last time you drove one?”

“Not since I moved to the apartment building last July. I had a car before that. After the sixth time someone broke into it, though, I had had enough.”

“After the radio?”

“I have no idea. I kept nothing in the car, and the radio was cheap, as I would not put anything better in it just to appease the thieves. I never listened to it, anyway.”

“Maybe it just got to be a point of honor to break into your car. But anyway, you’re right that you need something to drive, and an SUV sounds like a good choice. Tomorrow we can look on the Internet to see what you’ve looked at, and when the children are in school one morning, we can go look at some. We can go look at the big used car chain where everything’s vetted and you don’t have haggle, or we can look at the new ones, whichever you like.”

“Does it make more sense to buy a used one, or a new one?”

“We can look up stuff about each one you’re interested in, and see what makes sense. Some brands hold their value better than others.”

“Then we will look up such things tomorrow. So, can you reassure me that the money changes nothing of what you feel for me? We had enough before you knew; we have enough after you knew.”

Bard stroked the arm that cradled him, then took Thran’s hand to kiss it. “I can’t love you any more than I already do. So that hasn’t changed.”

A kiss pressed against his hair. “Nor can I love you any more. I do not want either to change.”

“I don’t, either.”

“Then there is only one more thing I would like to add to your list of things to do once the children are settled in their new school.”

“What’s that?”

“I want you to help me properly christen every room in our house, except the children’s rooms, of course. If we do one every other day or so, that would be delightful. If you are so inclined, of course.”

The hand stroking Bard’s shoulder had slipped across his clavicle and down the line between his pectorals, then further down to find his nipple. Bard’s breath caught, and his cock twitched in anticipation.

“Mmm, I think I might be inclined for something tonight, but that’s your intention, isn’t it?”

“It could be.” Thran kissed his ear, then shifted atop Bard, careful to avoid his healing stitches. He brushed a kiss on Bard’s lips, dragging a palm down Bard’s chest, teasing a nipple until Bard moaned silently. “I could say that I just want to help you feel better that we have money to spend, or claim that I need to be soothed after being so rudely blinded, or offer you a taste of what we may do in each of our unsanctified rooms, or just confess that I want you on general principles.”

Bard filled one hand with Thran’s buttock, and the other with silky white hair. He drew his angel close for a long, deep kiss. When they surfaced, he smiled.
“They all sound like good reasons to me. Pick whichever one suits you, and have at.”

Smiling, Thran nipped Bard’s ear. “I will.”

He did.
Chapter 33

Chapter Summary

The holiday season ends with fit celebration, and a new season begins.

It would be good to soothe away the night’s earlier tension with proper lovemaking – not that much of what Thran and Bard would engage in was proper, but Thran wanted to make sure that Bard would be well drained after so much upset. Maybe in the sleepy glow that followed complete release he could relax more of his worries about the abundance or lack of money. His saint was so unaware of his own strengths and assets that it was hard to reassure him that theirs was not an unequal partnership. It was never a chore to lavish the most delicious attention on his saint, but Thran would take extra pains tonight, wanting Bard to believe without question that he was loved, adored, needed, worthy.

Of course, Thran didn’t suffer when he lavished that attention. Pinning such a beautiful body to the sheets, then teasing it until Bard trembled and gasped beneath him was delicious enough. When Bard took his buttocks in hand to pull him in even deeper, then speed their tempo, though... it was the first time Thran had been the ultimate top, only to have the ultimate bottom wrest control from him and consume him without mercy. Power from below was a role he particularly liked for himself, but to have it sprung upon him was irresistible. He wound his hands in Bard’s hair, swallowed Bard’s lips in a kiss, and let his saint take him as he would. The tight, slippery hold on his cock peaked ever so slowly until it was inevitable, then he convulsed as the sensation threw Bard into orgasm. That stuttering tightness was more than Thran could resist, and release exploded through him in an all-consuming flood. He buried his face in the pillow that cradled Bard’s head to muffle his moans. He lay there spasming for some seconds, craving each and every ripple of pleasure that swept through him.

“Vot der’mo,” he whispered hoarsely. “Oy, svyatoj moy, the things you do to me.”

“You nailed me right and proper,” Bard panted. “Gods, Thran. You’re an animal.”

Grinning, Thran growled softly into Bard’s ear. “Perhaps I need more training. Would you like to apply for the job?”

“That might kill us both.”

“What a way to go, yes?”

“Ohhh, yessss,” Bard exhaled. His breath calmed, and he swept all of Thran’s white hair into one hand to get it out of his face. “We should call this position the Lion’s Mane, because I’ve just been engulfed in it.”

Snickering, Thran bit gently at Bard’s lips. “Lions mate back to front, lyubov moya, not front to front. If you like, I can do this again in that position, so you can have my hair run down your back and shoulders, and over your hair while I slip inside you...”

“Gods, you are one greedy bastard, Thran. You don’t finish pinning me to the bed before you plot how to do me next.”
“Mmm, I am, and I don’t, and I do.” Thran kissed Bard’s ear. “It is the most delightful way to enjoy the last drops of ecstasy.”

Bard laughed silently beneath Thran, still massaging Thran’s buttocks. There was a particular spot Bard had found near each hip that brought blissful delight when stroked lightly, a spot just below the iliac joint where several nerves converged. Bard found those spots and stroked them gently, flooding Thran with even more endorphins.

“Mmm, this is another most delightful way. Oh, my saint, you spoil me so. I wonder if we can find someone who can complete the marriage ceremony when we are so entwined? That would be appropriate.”

“Save this for us alone, angel. So have you pillaged me enough, or do you need to again?”

“Is that wishful longing I hear in your voice?”

“It could be, if you’re not sated yet.”

“I am sated enough, if only for now. I must conserve my strength so that I am fit to see our children off to school Wednesday, and to console you afterwards if the house seems too empty.”

“I’ve thought about what to do in an empty house, too. But we’ve got tomorrow, then a busy morning to get through first.”

Thran eased out of Bard. “So we do. So wash, then bed, then sleep.”

They cleaned up quietly. Thran helped Bard bandage his stitches, and they helped each other settle into bed. After the savor of goodnight kisses and whispered endearments, his saint sank easily into sleep.

Thank the gods that Bard was back on keel. His saint had labored alone with nothing, not even hope, for so long. It was time for that to change, now and forevermore.

* * *

Tuesday was a mixture of both excitement and regret, at least on the part of the children. On the one hand, they were excited to start the adventure of their new school. On the other, today was the last day of a long vacation, and the last breath of freedom without homework and school activities for a long stretch. Bard made sure to get everyone up close to the time they’d have to rise on Wednesday morning, just to get everyone acclimated to the upcoming schedule. He made a big breakfast for the children – pancakes with fruit and honey – which even Thran shared with them. Starting tomorrow, Thran would put off his barre and yoga until the children were off to school, so that he could be with them as they got ready, but today, he wanted to be part of the last festivities, too, despite his need to prepare for his auditions. He had two pancakes with fruit and a little honey – Bain and Legolas, in comparison, ate six pancakes apiece slathered in a pool of honey and a pile of fruit – and Bard was pleased that he liked them.

After breakfast, they took a long walk into the village to peruse the shops, enjoying the lack of crowding now that the holiday rush had passed. Sigrid found a pretty marcasite necklace in the antique jewelry bin at one shop. Tilda found one of Andrew Lang’s fairytale books on the dusty shelves of the used bookstore. Bain and Legolas, however, weren’t content with jewelry or books, or even old toys. They came scampering back to their fathers with bright eyes.

“Father, come see what we found —” Legolas started to exclaim, before Bain yanked on his arm.

“Shh, Legs! I told you!” Bain hushed the older boy. “Never show the owners you’re interested in something. It makes the price go up!”

“Oh, I forgot,” Legolas winced. His voice dropped to a whisper. “Sorry, Bain. Father, Bard, please come see what we found that we don’t really like at all.”

Thran smothered a chuckle. “Our Bain is a canny shopper, it seems. Let us see what not-much-of-a-treasure you have found.”

He and Bard wound their eventual way closer to whatever had entranced the boys, and Bard moved to one side to peruse a chest of drawers while Thran followed his son. Legolas leaned close.

“See those things against the wall? Chests on the bottom, with bookcases on top? They have pieces that slide out to make a desk. Bain said to just look from here first, then walk by casually to see what the prices are. But I already looked.”

Legolas whispered the prices to Thran, who nodded in understanding. There were three of them, tall things in a warm brown wood. They would be elegant fixtures in the children’s study, and would take up less room than conventional desks, which would leave more open space for play. Thran angled his way to Bard ostensibly examining a graceful lady’s desk nearby.

“The children’s study?” Bard asked softly.

“Just so. Legolas told me the prices.” He murmured them to Bard. “Is that a lot?”

“Not for such old pieces. Looks like cherry, not mahogany; but we’ll have to clean up the finish a bit to be sure. They’re taller than eight feet, so they won’t fit in too many modern houses. Our ceilings are ten feet except for the third floor, so they’d fit. Aren’t in too rough a shape, though a couple of the glass panes are missing. That’s easy to fix. This desk would suit Sigrid, too, if she’s interested in it.”

“I will send her over. You look at the boys’ treasure.”

Sigrid had paid close attention to the murmurs and maneuverings, and angled towards Thran when he came towards her. A couple of words were all she needed to go take Bard’s place by the desk he’d examined, so he trailed after her. How fascinating it was to watch his family in action. Was this what his favorite crime scene show meant when they talked about a family of thieves casing the joint? He hugged himself in amusement.

Everyone drifted into other rooms once they’d had their look. Sigrid liked the desk for her room, and the three larger pieces would give Tilda the place in the children’s study that she wanted. Bard and Thran added up the cost of the four pieces, Bard knocked off thirty percent to serve as his starting offer, and they decided what their top limit was. As Bard ambled off to find the owner, Thran trailed along behind to overhear. Fortunatley there was a jumble of old glassware and dishes nearby, so Thran sorted through them – would those two small Asian teacups blend with the ones Bard found to go with his Japanese iron teapot? – as Bard set to haggling.

It took time, and was far from straightforward, but after twenty minutes, Bard had his deal. They didn’t get thirty percent off the listed price, but it was just under twenty with a nominal delivery fee, given that the truck would be close to full when it arrived at their house. When Thran brought forward his two teacups, the owner waved at him and told him to take them. They came out of the shop feeling elated.

“Bless high ceilings,” Bard murmured to Thran. “I think he was glad to get rid of that lot. That’s why he didn’t dicker much, and threw in just a twenty-five-dollar delivery fee.”

“That was a short negotiation?” Thran arched an eyebrow.

“I’ve seen them go on for a couple of hours, back and forth.”

Thran shook his head. “The markets of Istanbul and Cairo are different. High speed, very agitated. The seller cries that such a low price drives him out of business, the buyer maligns the goods, both walk back and forth and gesticulate many times. Highly entertaining. Russian high dudgeon lends itself very effectively to such methods. This is much more roundabout.”

“If we ever get to Istanbul or Cairo together, you get to do the haggling, then. I’d enjoy watching that. Nice teacups, by the way.”

“I thought they would complement the five you found. Those are all different – very Japanese, that – and so are these two, so it will be nice for us all to have one when we make tea.”

“They’ll fit right in. I guess we’ve done enough damage for today, and should head home.”

“We still have one more shop to explore,” Thran teased, pointing to the cheese shop next door. “It would be a shame not to be thorough.”

Bard laughed, for Tilda had already spotted the shop and was hurrying to Thran’s side.

“Thran! Look! It’s a cheese shop!”

“I attend at once, ma petite!” Thran laughed, letting Tilda take his hand and pull him towards the door. “Let us see what delights are inside.”

Three kinds of cheese later, the group headed home, where lunch went on. The boys found a film to distract everyone for a couple of hours, then Legolas challenged him to a fencing match, which Thran enjoyed for the rest of the afternoon. They had just time to tidy the children’s study in preparation of Bard’s painting work and the delivery of the furniture coming Friday before sitting down for supper.

Everyone busily helped to clean up supper, then arranged school things by the front door, then cycled through showers. Bedtime was hectic as the children bounced around in excitement of what tomorrow would bring. When at last everyone was in bed, Bard and Thran collapsed on the sofa in the sitting room, glad at last for a little quiet.

“How do they have so much energy?” Thran said into the air. “I wish I had some of it. Especially when I dance the fourth act of Swan Lake.”

“I hear you.” Bard stuck his legs out and slumped comfortably, one hand rubbing Thran’s thigh up and down. “I get tired just watching them. Do you want music or TV or anything?”

“Soft music would be nice. Nothing rousing. Perhaps some Ralph Vaughn Williams? ‘Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis?’”

Bard eyed him. “Do we have that?”

“I did. If the boys put all the CDs together, then it will be there.”
Bard got up to look at the stacks of CDs. “Bless Tilda. She sorted all of them by alphabet. Is that one under V or W, cariad?”

“It should be by V, but our Tilda may have put it under W.”

“Ah. Found it. Under W.” Bard put in the CD and soon the quiet strains of Vaughn Williams’s evocative melody filled the room. “I like that.”

Thran hummed. “I have always found it soothing, even though it is so haunting a melody. It is a conversation only half overheard, and even that part is mysterious.”

Bard settled beside Thran again, and they comfortably snuggled together to share the music. By the time it was over, Bard was slumped back in his comfortable slouch, and Thran lay across the rest of the sofa with his head in Bard’s lap. The music was nearly done when footsteps padded near.

“Da, I’m hungry.”

Bain. Thran went to sit up, but Bard’s hand on his shoulder urged him to stay were he was.

“Have some crackers and peanut butter if you want, boyo, or some nuts, or a glass of milk, or a piece of bread. Nothing with sugar, same as always.”

“Okay, Da.”

The footsteps headed into the kitchen, where various rummagings indicated the consumption of food – peanut butter, from the sound of the jar opening and the knife clinking against the countertop. Thran fell back into his reverie until footsteps approached again.

“I’m done, Da.”

Bard patted Thran’s arm as he eased off the sofa. “Kitchen clean?”

“Yes, Da.”

“Okay, lad.” Bard gave his son a goodnight hug. “Be sure to brush your teeth before you go back to bed. I’ll see you in the morning. Sleep well.”

“Good night, Bain. Sleep well,” Thran wished him.

As the footsteps receded up the stairs, Bard came back to the sofa. “Sounds like you need to go to bed, too, angel.”

“I agree with you,” Thran replied, sitting up. “A shower, then bed for me. Tomorrow is a big day.”

Bard held a hand out to help pull Thran to his feet. “It is. We’d better get to bed. Six a.m. comes early.”

Through the bath and into bed, then Thran drew Bard close as they warmed. As chilled as he always was when he first got into bed during the winter, he’d come to relish it if only because it made nestling into Bard’s warmth so much more intense. The silk sheets around him were a cold cocoon at first, but the blood heat from Bard’s body soaked into Thran’s, relaxing and soothing him. He hummed in sleepy appreciation.

“You’re colder than usual tonight,” Bard whispered in concern.
“I worked hard today. First a long walk, then I fended off the attacks of my son's ferocious épée. I will not have advantage over him much longer.”

Bard nestled him closer. “Then come here and get warm.”

Thran twined closer with another hum. “You are very warm. You make me feel like a vampire who lusts after the warmth of the living.”

Bard snickered. “You don’t want to see what my technique is for staking a vampire as beautiful as you. It doesn’t kill you, but it does make you my slave forever.”

“It sounds delightful. Let us do that soon on a night when neither of us is so tired.”

“We’ll put it on the list. But not tonight. I’m knackered, too.”

“Oh? What did you do while Legolas and I fenced?”

“Cleaned and waxed the kitchen floor. Halfway done.”

Thran grinned. “It is well that I did not see you. You know what happens when I see you on your hands and knees.”

“I do. I don’t know which end to guard.”

“Pick one. I will deal with the other most deliciously.”

“Not tonight, vampire. It’s after eleven, and we’ve got to get up at six.”

“I hear and obey, my saint. To sleep we go.”

As they lay nested closely, Thran savored the quiet punctuated by the sound of Bard’s heart beating under his ear. The sound comforted him as he drifted off.

* * *

From Les Sylphides? Ballet music?

Thran got his other eye opened. Bard was already sitting up on the edge of the bed, reaching to turn off the clock radio.

Wednesday. The children’s first day of school.

“Please, leave it on,” Thran murmured, reaching out to touch Bard’s leg. “It is nice music to wake up to.”

Bard leaned over and kissed Thran’s hair. “Morning, angel. The adventure begins.”

Chuckling, Thran stretched one careful inch at a time. “So it does. Have your turn in the bathroom. I will follow in a moment.”

Bard caressed Thran’s shoulder where it peeked out of the bedding, then stood up. “Won’t be long.”
Bard disappeared into the bathroom with sleep pants and shirt in hand, and eased the bathroom door shut behind him. Thran turned on his nightside lamp to its dimmest, and took his time to stretch ankles and wrists, then knees and elbows, then hips and shoulders and neck while the Chopin waltz played just barely at the edge of audibility. He’d eased on his leggings, long waffle-weave shirt, and thick socks by the time Bard came out, so after he’d had his turn in the bathroom, Bard was dressed. They made the bed, then went downstairs together. Thran set the teakettle on the stove and started the porridge while Bard got out everything to assemble ham sandwiches and the rest of the children’s lunches. They snickered about setting up an assembly line where Thran sliced ham and put it on the bread Bard laid out, then Bard added cheese while Thran did lettuce, then they passed the mustard down the line. Bard showed Thran how he wrapped the sandwiches in waxed paper, and Thran put them in the lunch bags. Fruit and brownies and water bottles followed, and by the time Sigrid and Legolas appeared, the lunches were done.

“Bain and Til up?” Bard asked.

“On their way,” Sigrid nodded. “We haven’t gotten the bathroom system down yet.”

“Some of us like to take a long time in the mirror,” Legolas murmured, looking from Thran to Sigrid and back, drawing Thran to smother a laugh. Was his shy son actually snarking at his stepsister?

“I understand, Legs,” Sigrid replied without heat as she took her bowl of porridge from Thran. “You’ve got really nice hair, and you want it to look nice on your first day.”

“Me?” Legolas gaped. “It was you and that stuff you put on your eyes that took so long!”

Bard shared a grin with Thran. “Maybe you could use a makeup mirror in your room, Sig. Four children trying to get in one bathroom at the same time is a tough squeeze. Or you could use our bathroom.”

“A lot of long white hair on the floor, maybe,” Thran offered, trying to get in the spirit of the give and take.

“We’ll talk about it at supper, sweetness. Maybe you can put your makeup in the half bath in the sitting room and do it there. And Legolas, you can use the mirror in your room for your hair.”

“But it wasn’t my hair...” Legolas began, but trailed off as Bain and Tilda came into the kitchen.

“Hi, all,” Bain waved, already stuffing a fig in his mouth. “Where are the raisins?”

“On the table where they always are,” Bard said as Thran spooned out another two bowls of porridge for their last two children. “Morning, little doll.”

“Morning, Da, morning Thran,” Tilda yawned. “It’s too early.”

“It is for you,” Bard agreed. “It’ll take a little while to get used to getting up with the rest of Clan Ffynig. But at least you’ll get home a little earlier.”

“Apple, please?” Tilda asked, taking her porridge from Thran.

“I will cut it up for you,” Thran said, getting the fruit from the refrigerator. “Half, or all, ma petite?”

“Half, please.”
Breakfast proceeded quietly. Once again, Thran noted how quietly Bard steered the children through their meal, replacing the empty milk carton with another before anyone noticed the first was empty, or having the teacups filled for those who wanted it. The children rinsed their dishes in the sink and put them in the dishwasher as they were done, and the race was on to see who could get to the bathroom to brush teeth first. Bard and Thran ran upstairs for jeans and sweaters, then lunches went in backpacks, boots and coats went on, and everyone trooped out to walk to the bus stop.

“Remember you must go to the office together when you get to school,” Thran said, as they headed down the lane. “Someone will meet each of you to give you your class schedules and take you to where you are supposed to be.”

“We’ll be fine, Da,” Sigrid said jauntily, and Bain and Legolas agreed. Tilda, however, looked less sure. She was the only one who would be in the elementary wing. She slipped her hand into Bard’s and looked up at him with eyes that were unblinking and solemn.

“I’m a little scared, Da,” she said in a very small voice, when they got near the bus stop.

Bard stooped beside her. “It is a little scary today because it’s all new,” he agreed. “But Sigrid and Bain and Legolas will be with you when you get off the bus, and your new teacher will be waiting for you at the office. So you won’t be by yourself. You won’t have to move around to different rooms all day as your sister and brothers will, and someone will help you get on the bus to come home. You’ve got your mobile, right?”

Tilda nodded once, her eyes never leaving Bard’s face.

“Then if you want to call me at lunchtime, tell your teacher that I said it was okay, and you call me. All right?”

“Okay, Da.”

Legolas edged closer. “Tilda?”

“Yes, Legolas?”

“I’ve had to go to a new school a bunch of times by myself. It’s hard. But this time I won’t be by myself, and you won’t, either. We’re Clan Ffyrnig, and we’re going together, so it won’t be so bad.”

Tilda ventured a smile. “That’s right, Legolas. We’re going together.”

She slipped her hand into Legolas’s for the rest of the walk to the bus stop. Thran caught his son’s eyes, and gave him a proud thumbs-up. He got a shy but firm smile in return.

Seven other children already waited at the bus stop, along with a couple of parents shepherding younger children. There were a few quiet seconds as the other parents considered them, but a tiny woman with a full head of golden ringlets and lively brown eyes suddenly cocked her head at Bard.

Bard grinned widely as he recognized the woman. “Rosie? Rosie Gamgee?”

“That’s right! Wow, it’s been so long! Are you back now? That’s fantastic!”

“I am. Amazing, I know. It’s great to see you after all this time! Um, this is my husband, Thran Oropherson. These are our children, Sigrid, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda. We just moved in last week, so today’s their first day at the academy.”
Hi, Thran, nice to meet you! And that’s Bain? Wow, he’s almost as tall as you are now! Hi, Sigrid, Legolas, and Tilda! My brood’s the four curly blonds – Elanor, Frodo, Rose, and Merry. Wave hi, everyone, to Sigrid, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda. They’re starting school with you today.

The other parents introduced themselves and their children, and chatted amiably for the few minutes it took the Imladris Academy bus to trundle into view. Tilda felt a little better, for little Elanor was a fifth grader, which gave her someone to talk to. As all of the children climbed aboard for the short ride to school, Sigrid turned to grin at Bard.

“We’re off, and we’re leaving too!” she called.

“Do your best, just like always!” Bard laughed as he waved to all of the children.

Tilda perked up at their old saw, and looked a little more sanguine as she waved from the window as the bus pulled away. Thran and Bard waved goodbye until the bus was out of sight, then turned to see the other parents lingering to exchange pleasantries.

“It’s good to have you back, Bard!” Rosie enthused, patting Bard’s arm. “I can’t wait to see new sculpture coming out of your barn again.”

“It’ll be soon, I hope. We’ve got a lot of renovation left to do first. But we’ll get there.”

“Are you an artist, too, Mr. Oropherson?”

“Thran, please. I am a ballet dancer.”

Rosie’s eyes widened. “Oh – you’re... I thought I recognized you. The knife dancer.”

Smiling, Thran offered a slight bow. “I am.”

“You’re a wonderful dancer, Thran. I hope you and Bard will be very happy here.”

“We are most happy, already. And it is a pleasure to meet you and your children. I am sure we will see more of each other as time goes on.”

“I hope so. I’ll see you both later,” Rosie waved, as they separated. “Bye!”

“Bye, Rosie! Give Sam my regards!” Bard waved, as he and Thran turned for home. “Rosie’s a stained glass artist, a lot of modern stuff. I think you’d like it.”

Thran turned a considering eye on Bard as they came back onto the porch of their house. “I know what I would like more.”

“Oh?” Bard returned his consideration with as much intensity, which sent a jolt racing through Thran’s loins. “What?”

“Choose a room to christen, lyubov moya. Right now. Or I will.”

Bard paused by the door, laughing, when Thran gave him a push towards the door. “What happened to your barre and yoga you said you’d do when we got home?”

“I did not promise to do them as soon as we got home, did I? First, I will see to my husband.” As Bard opened the door, Thran followed him in, shut the door behind them, and put a hand on Bard’s shoulder to ease him into his embrace. “So you have but one question to answer. Which room shall we christen first?”
Stroking Thran’s hair, Bard offered him a kiss. “Hmm. Does it matter?”

“No,” Thran kissed Bard back. “It doesn’t at all.”
Chapter 34

Chapter Summary

When the cherubs' choir goes off to school, an angel and a saint find a decadent way to celebrate. Then preparations begin for the angel's return to the heights of the dance, and the cherubs' return home.

Chapter Notes

Yet another chapter that earns the Explicit rating, but not just for erotica featuring an angel and a saint. Thran proves that despite how ethereal he looks, he can swear on a par with the entire Russian navy.

Translation Notes:

suka blyad = bitch, motherfucker (Russian)
sukin syn = son of a bitch (Russian) sosi moy chlen = suck my cock (Russian) idi k chertu = go to hell (Russian) idi na khuy = go to hell, suck my cock (Russian)

“I wanted the ballroom to be first,” Bard breathed, nibbling Thran’s ear.

“So did I,” Thran murmured, letting his coat slide off, then easing Bard’s off.

“But I can’t indulge in what I want from you yet.”

“Why not? I will be yours however you want me.”

“Stitches. They pull.”

“Suka blyad,” Thran growled. “The solarium, then. That fainting couch lures me closer every time I pass it.”

“The room’s bare. It’ll be better when it’s a tropical paradise.”

“True. Our bathroom is still a construction site. The dining room is still bare. The main room is still bare, too, but it has a fireplace, but we do not have time for that this morning. Tcha, this is our first morning alone in our house, and I will have you even if I have to haul you back to our bed. In fact, I will do just that!”

Thran wrapped arms around Bard and muscled him towards the stairs, Bard laughing at his insistence.

“Wait, angel, wait! We’ve got a couple more options. You can haul me up to the garret and have the poor starving artist on his Spartan bed, or against the wall. Or...”
“Or what?”

“There’s still the kitchen.”

Thran paused, humming in anticipation. “Your domain. And all that nice marble.”

“I’ll be benevolent. Do you want top, or bottom?”

Thran grinned perversely. “I am the sous chef, am I not?”

“And?”

“Do you know what sous chef means?”

“Tell me.”

“The under cook.”

“Power, or not?”

“I give you the power.”

“Sweet, or spicy?”

“Ooooh, spicy? That.”

“Sure?”

“Do your worst.”

“On your head be it, then. Come on, angel. It’s time you had a cooking lesson.”

Bard grabbed Thran’s braid and the back of his jeans to haul him through the dining room and into the kitchen. When they got there, Bard jerked Thran around and backed him against the end of the island, one hand pressing against his chest to bend him back, the other hand breaching the button and zipper of his jeans. Another jerk, and Thran found himself flipped around, his chest down on the countertop and his jeans being dragged off his hips. Bard muscled hard behind him, shoving Thran’s feet wider and rubbing the rough fabric of his jeans against Thran’s bare skin. A hand insinuated itself between the end of the island and his hips, finding his cock to fondle it.

“So, what did you say you’d do to keep your position in my kitchen?” Bard growled, leaning over Thran’s back. “Other than this one, I mean. This one suits you, I have to say.”

“Take anything you want. Anything. Take it all,” Thran gasped.

“I might take a lot. I might make you take a lot.”

“I would love that. Gods, I would so love that.”

The sounds of buttons being forced open and a zipper being dragged down had Thran tense with anticipation. He shoved his hips back to press against Bard’s thighs, but Bard drew back.

“What’s your hurry, angel? You’ve got a nice ass. Let me look at it before I dive into it – oh, shit! I forgot the lubricant. I’ll have to dash upstairs.”

“If you dare leave me here to die of anticipation, I will kill you!” Thran growled. “Coconut oil.
Second cabinet. The first ingredient in my recipe for the day.”

“Mmm. You’ll smell like dessert. How appropriate.”

Bard kept one hand on Thran’s braid as he grabbed the jar of coconut oil. He plunked it in front of Thran’s nose.

“Open it.”

Thran got the jar open, and nudged it towards Bard.

“Not me, angel. You. You know what to do with it.”

Once Thran rubbed some of the coconut oil between his palms to liquefy it, Bard wound a hand in his braid and pulled him up.

“On your knees.”

Thran sank to the floor in front of Bard as ordered. His lover’s jeans, already low slung in that way that so aroused Thran, were open, and his cock was half erect in its nest of dark hair. Thran nuzzled into the dark nest, taking Bard’s cock in his mouth and sucking hard until it was too large for him to handle with his mouth anymore. He took it in his oiled hands, stroking as he licked the very end of it, grinning when Bard couldn’t suppress his moans.

“It sounds like you like my recipe so far,” Thran teased.

“Think so? Get up.”

Bard shoved him back face down on the island, pulling the elastic off his braid to muss white hair over his back and shoulders and onto the countertop. A little of the coconut oil found its way onto fingers that slid down between Thran’s buttocks and slicked him inside. Then Bard was on him, in him. It was so intense that Thran gasped, fingers scrabbling for purchase on the countertop, back arching to get as close to his lover as he could.

“You’re a tight one, aren’t you? Mmm, much better. I haven’t had such an accommodating sous chef in a very long time.”

“I love to work under you,” Thran shut his eyes to better appreciate Bard’s stroking. “Gods, that feels good – oh, gods –”

“You’re not going yet, angel. You need to be properly broken in first.”

Bard worked himself up with his thrusting, but kept hands off Thran’s cock, which left Thran hard, aching, and far from release. “Gods, take pity on your poor sous chef. Give me something.”

“I am, as hard as I can. That’s not enough for you?”

“Don’t just tease me, you bastard.”

“Hell, no. You like this too much for me to stop. Besides, you feel so damned good... mmm... Do you know what a turn on it is to see your silky white hair spread wide over so much white marble? Almost as good as it is to see you spread wide over so much white marble. Best sous chef I’ve ever laid.”

Bard slowed his stroking until it was unbearable, that slow, slippery slide in and out that made Thran pant and claw for release, but it wasn’t enough to send him over the edge. Bard’s soft moans teased him unmercifully, as did fingers caressing his hips and groins just far enough away from his cock that he could only wish for a closer touch. When Bard finally did venture close enough, Thran was so highly wound that each suggestion of a caress had him gasping. He groped for his cock, desperate to ease the urge that drove him.

“None of that,” Bard grabbed his wrists and pinned them to the countertop. “Looks like I need to work on my sous chef’s stamina a little.”

“You will kill me, you fucker!” Thran snarled in frustration, drawing Bard’s laugh.

“I am a fucker, yes. And you’re the one I’m fucking.”

“You do not fuck me; you tease me to death! Do more than tease!”

Bard leaned over him, snickering. “Beg me.”

“Suka blyad!” Thran spat. “Sosi moy chlen! Idi k chertu! Idi na khuy, sukin syn!”

“That doesn’t sound like begging. It sounds like you just called me a cocksucking, motherfucking, son of a bitch.”

“Worse!” Thran snarled.

“Oh, now, that’ll cost you, angel. That’ll really cost you.”

Bard pulled Thran’s wrists behind him to clasp them in one hand. The other hand snaked around to take Thran’s cock and tease it slowly, still not enough to take him over the edge as Bard slid deeper inside him. Ah, here was the ultimate pleasure of the moment, to lie over the cool marble, pinned, bound, and in hand, with nothing to do but enjoy. How good, how good it was to lie here with his eyes shut as Bard mastered him, sending the most deliriously delicious sensations coursing through him.

“Much better,” Bard leaned over him so he savored the weight of Bard’s body on his back. “That’s what I wanted – soft, submissive, subservient. The perfect sous chef.”

The firm hand on his cock tightened to jerk him off hard and fast, much too fast for him to stop Bard from ripping his orgasm out of him. He peaked hard, too wracked to breathe, only to gasp, under Bard’s tight hold. Only when he lay limp and spent on the marble did Bard sigh in satisfaction. He let Thran’s wrists go, clamped hands on Thran’s hips, and stroked himself off. Even though he’d just gone, Thran pushed back against Bard’s thighs, offering the deep access Bard needed to make the most of his release.

“So please, may I please keep my job? Please?” Thran murmured meekly, grinning, as his lover fell over him with a shudder.

“Maybe. You’ll need a lot more training.”

“Gods, I’m in for it, then,” Bard exhaled, finally straightening. He eased out gently. “You’re going to kill us both.”

“We all must die of something. This is one of the best ways to go.”
Bard snickered, drawing Thran up from the counter. “I’ll never see this white marble in the same way again. I’ll think of your white hair messed all over it, and you cursing me like a Russian sailor.”

Thran grinned as he stood up. “I can’t wait to give you the chance to curse me in Welsh. Maybe in your artist’s garret. That will be the most delicious of prizes.”

“In a day or two. Right now, I need to clean up, and you more than me.”

“Truth. Upstairs with us both.”

In the bathroom, they washed in silence, until Bard slid a look at Thran and chuckled silently.

“Yes?” Thran drawled, returning Bard’s look as he dried off.

“Good idea about the coconut oil. Very organic.”

“It was better than to interrupt such a delicious game to run upstairs, was it not?”

“Much better. You’re all right?”

“I am fine, lyubov moya. I am merely well stretched for my barre.”

Bard sobered. “There are only two weeks before your audition. Is that long enough for you to be ready?”

Thran considered as he dried off and headed into the bedroom, Bard trailing after him. “I am not worried, though I will work quite hard. I will describe everything so that you understand it all. It will seem very extreme to you, but a dancer’s life is very extreme. I will be in class or at the barre for much of the day, more than you will think wise. I will also be very disciplined about my diet. I will not eat some things at all, and will eat inordinate amounts of other things.”

Bard pulled his jeans back on and sat on the bed to watch Thran sort out his practice attire. “However I can help, I will. Tell me what you need to eat, and I’ll have it ready for you. I assume you’ll go off to the barre now?”

Thran nodded.

Bard pulled his jeans back on and sat on the bed to watch Thran sort out his practice attire. “However I can help, I will. Tell me what you need to eat, and I’ll have it ready for you. I assume you’ll go off to the barre now?”

Thran nodded.

“I’ll call the tub installer to get that moving along. And I’ll look through that stuff you told me about the SUV, and see what I can line up for us to look at. You need that as soon as we can get it. Then while you’re in class, I’ll get on with the renovations, and make sure the children are set.”

Thran had all of his practice gear out, and he explained it all to Bard as he put it on. Then he explained how many hours he expected to be training each day, and what food he needed to fuel his efforts. Bard listened attentively, nodding several times at Thran’s explanations.

“Okay, I understand how long you’ll work and what you need to eat and when. But your diet’s heartlessly plain, cariad. Can I offer any variances to make it a little less bland? A lot of different steamed veg rather than just broccoli? Can I put spices on the chicken? Put different raw veg in your salads? What about different whole grains other than just oatmeal every morning?”

“Is there any reason to vary other than to coddle my taste buds?” Thran sat next to Bard on the bed.

“That’s enough of a reason, but yes, there are others,” Bard nodded. “A variety of things makes sure you get all your trace elements. Different spices can help your immune system, like turmeric. Red pepper and garlic can help you stay healthy, too. The grains help your gut and boost your endurance.
The different veg can help you get all your needed vitamins. About that – do you take any vitamins? Any herbals? Anything I should know about?”

“No, but perhaps I should. Do you know about such things?”

Bard nodded, but his expression was ironic. “When you don’t have medical insurance, you learn everything you can to keep yourself and the children healthy. I make sure we all take a multivitamin every day. And I take a fish oil capsule. Good for the joints.”

“Then I suppose I should follow suit. And I had a thought…”

“Something else about the veg?”

“No... it is not usually done, but I think perhaps I should have you attend one of my classes, so you know what is involved. At the very least, it should banish your worries about the fragility of my health. They can be quite rigorous.”

“Whatever you need, Thran. I want to see one because I have no idea what they’re like.”

“I will see if I can arrange that. Some dance masters are notorious about allowing no one but dancers in their class. If I can arrange it, you will have to remain silent and unremarkable, so as to draw no attention to yourself. Even if someone gets hurt, or becomes upset, no reaction. Can you do that?”

Bard nodded. “I can do that for you. I’ll be the mouse in the corner.”

Smiling, Thran kissed Bard’s ear. “You are much too large to be a mouse. Or even the cat that chases the mouse. But I appreciate the thought. Now, the barre. I must go.”

“T’ll see you when you’re done,” Bard rubbed Thran’s thigh and kissed his cheek. “It doesn’t matter when. I’m not on any schedule.”

“All right, lyubov moya. You are truly my saint.”

They went downstairs, back to the kitchen. Thran savored a faint stir of arousal as he passed the kitchen island, more appreciation of his earlier enjoyment than anything else, and Bard winked at him as he headed into the ballroom. That gave him something deliciously sweet to think about as he began his stretches and bends.

* * *

Bard puttered in the kitchen, cleaning the signs of the indulgences he and Thran had enjoyed a few minutes ago. The mess on the end of the island was quick to mop up, but the coconut oil took much longer. It was streaked widely across the marble, mute testimony to Thran’s frantic reaction to Bard’s ruthless teasing. Gods, he was turning into such a glutton for any indulgence that a tall, elegant, white-haired angel offered him, no matter the position. Cleaning up streaks of coconut oil was a small price to pay for such bliss. As for payments coming due, Bard expected to owe badly for teasing his angel so mercilessly this morning. He grinned, imagining all the forms that payment might take. He was still imagining when the coconut oil was finally wiped away, long minutes later.

He called the tub installer, checking on the status of his work order. The tub was due in today, so if it did come in, he was on the installation schedule for Friday. That was perfect; he had to be here anyway to take delivery of the furniture they’d bought at the second hand shop. Once the tub was in, he could finish laying the fancy marble tile, and the bathroom would need only grouting and sealing, then a small bit of painting, to finish it.

He fetched Thran’s computer to research SUVs. The three that Thran considered were all good ones, and Bard found one more to add to the equation. He quickly eliminated that one, though, when he compared the prices and features to the other three. It didn’t take long to decide which one he thought was the best fit, so next he searched to see what was locally available. Three choices – two used, and one new – popped up, so he saved those to show Thran when he surfaced from the ballroom.

As Bard headed upstairs to start planning his attack on the children’s study, he considered all that Thran had told him about preparing for his auditions. He appreciated how clear Thran had been that this would be a long, rigorous campaign. The hours of practice – anywhere from four to eight or more every day – were daunting enough, for all of them would see Thran in constant motion. The number of calories that burned was immense. But the food to fuel that exertion seemed so small, so restricted, so inadequate, that Bard was uncomfortable. How was it enough to sustain such a perfect body?

He’d agreed to trust Thran to know how to care for himself, and so he would. But he’d keep close watch over him, too. He’d guard Thran as closely as Thran did himself.

He’d patched the dings in the study walls, and was draping the floor to paint the ceiling when he realized his stomach was growling. It was only eleven, according to his mobile, but it was no wonder he was hungry. Between the children’s first day of school and his delight with his lover, he’d never eaten breakfast. He went downstairs for a handful of almonds to hold him until lunchtime, then went back upstairs to paint the ceiling. The primer went on fast, so he sanded down the spackling while he waited for the ceiling to dry. Now, what color to paint the walls? The three bookcase desks would take up a lot of the wall space, so it had to be a color that would go with that wood. They needed chairs to go with the desks, too; maybe he could put some of the dining chairs up here to make do. A small, round table would work, too, so the children could put the chairs around the table when the desks were closed...

He worked steadily, putting the final coat of paint on the ceiling, and fetching another can of primer for the walls. His stomach would not be denied at that point, so he went downstairs, made himself a ham sandwich, and got out two packages of chicken to thaw for supper – he’d roast the chicken breasts for Thran, and make the chicken thighs for the children, maybe pot pie, or shepherd’s pie. He hadn’t yet learned all the things Legolas liked to eat, but most children liked pastry- or potato-topped meat pies.

He was mulling the possibilities when Thran appeared from the ballroom, soaked, spent, and drooping. Bard bit his tongue despite his concern; Thran had told him how draining his efforts would be, so he wouldn’t fuss.

“Soup, salad, or something else?”

“What is in the soup?”

“Just chicken breast and veg.”

“That, then. I will shower first.”

“Tub’s coming Friday. If it comes early enough for me to finish the tiling, I’ll do it right after, then grout the next day, then seal the next day. You’ll be soaking on Monday or Tuesday.”
“Slava bogam,” Thran breathed. “Thank the gods. And you.”

“Go shower then. Take your time and get warm. The soup takes twenty minutes.”

Thran brushed a grateful hand across Bard’s back. “That will be no problem. If I am not down in twenty minutes, please come get me. I will have likely dribbled down the drain.”

He padded off. Bard opened the package of chicken breasts, cut off enough thin slices for Thran’s soup, and set it aside while he quickly chopped up celery and carrots, munching some to follow his sandwich. He threw the veg in a pot to sauté for a few minutes in the barest amount of olive oil, then tossed in the chicken. Water, then a can of water chestnuts, a piece of star anise, and a few slices of ginger were next, followed at the very end by a few rings of green spring onions. Along the way, he made a big salad of greens to go with the soup; Thran needed the bulk as well as the nutrients. By the time Thran returned, looking much more refreshed, the soup was ready.

“Nothing fancy, angel, but I’ve thought of how to prep a lot of the soup so it’ll taste better whenever you’re ready to have it. I’ll chop up a lot of the veg and the meat, then once the children go to school I can sauté that to a good color. Once you’re ready to eat, I can add the water and the spices, and you’ll have a good solid soup in fifteen minutes.”

“You look after me so well that I am in awe,” Thran said humbly, as Bard shooed him to the table and put the soup in front of him, then the salad, then the oil and vinegar. He sat across from the dancer to eat a couple of the clementines he and the children loved so much. “I must thank you for making no mention of how bedraggled I looked. Practice can be quite draining, and it shows. But it is nothing to be alarmed about, and I am glad that you took it in stride. I would have worried if you had made a fuss, and then I would have tried to hide the effects in the future. I would prefer our home to be the place where I can let down.”

“Of course you can. I’ll take it as it comes. All I ask is that if you hurt, or something is not right, that you tell me. Please?”

Thran nodded as he sipped his soup. “That is fair to us both.” He smiled suddenly, meeting Bard’s eyes warmly. “I like this home we have. Decadent, beautiful, and warm, yes, but also a place where we are ourselves. That is good. And so is this soup. I am very hungry.”

“You ought to be. We both forgot to eat breakfast.”

Thran tsked. “So we did. The excitement of the children, and then our own, let in no thoughts for food.”

“Neither of us can afford to miss a meal, Thran. What if we eat before the children? Would that interfere with your barre?”

Thran considered. “No. It was my habit to eat after the barre only because I did not want to take the time to prepare the porridge before I did my work. But we have the children to see to, so if we eat when we rise, then see to the children, then get them to the bus... that is enough time to pass so that my barre will proceed as usual. So we shall do that.”

Thran worked steadily through his soup, then his salad. Bard showed him what he’d discovered about the SUVs, explained why he thought one was better than the others, and when Thran agreed with him, he showed him the three he had found.

“So we could see all three of them tomorrow afternoon, if you’d like,” Bard finished.

“Let us do so. You are right, the sooner we have it, the sooner I can get back to class.”
“Okay. I’ll line that up this afternoon. I’m working on the study, too. Ceiling’s done. I’ll prime and paint this afternoon. Then we can put the furniture in place on Friday when it gets here. I just have to pick a color. Any preferences?”

After some discussion, they decided a warm apricot would look nice with the wood bookcase desks, as the window faced east and caught the sunrise well. Bard would have to get the paint at the homeowners’ mecca, but he’d do that after he primed so that the walls would dry while he was out.

“Do you want to go, too?” Bard asked, as they carried the dishes to the sink. “Or enjoy a well-earned rest? I won’t be gone long.”

Thran put his bowl and plate in the dishwasher, then straightened to blink his surprise at Bard. “You go ahead, lyubov moya. I will rest for an hour, then be back at the barre, of course.”

Bard winced. “Of course you will. I didn’t think.”

He bit his tongue again, but Thran smiled at him all the same. “I will not hurt myself, Bard. This is what I do, and have done, for a very long time. Do not worry.”

“It’s just new to me, that’s all. I’ll get used to it. I know you know what you’re doing. I’m just... sorry I pillaged you so thoroughly this morning. We should have taken it easier.”

“Don’t you dare regret something so delicious. You gave me every choice, and if I had wanted something less... vigorous, I would have chosen so. All is well.”

“Okay, all is well. But if you need a massage or something after supper, you’ve got it.”

“As I say so often, you spoil me terribly. You are zoloto moyo, my treasure.”

“And you’re mine. And I’d enjoy my treasure keeping me company for his hour of rest while I prime the study, if he’s so inclined.”

Thran’s smile was pleased. “So I shall. Once you have one of your delicious brownies. Just because I do not eat such confections does not mean that you cannot. Enjoy it.”

“I will.” Bard grabbed a brownie, and broke off the merest corner. “Just a taste?”

Thran nibbled it out of his fingers. “Orange as well as chocolate? Delicious!”

They went upstairs, and Thran sat on the floor against the wall to converse while Bard primed the walls. He was only partially through before Thran went back to the ballroom, so he went downstairs long enough to arrange visits to the car places for tomorrow afternoon, then returned to his painting. He worked steadily until he’d finished the walls. He stuck his head in the ballroom long enough to tell Thran he was off to the homeowners’ mecca, and got a nod and a smile in return. He didn’t linger despite the draw of the elegant dancer posturing and posing, got the paint he wanted and another two gallons of primer, then perused the paint chips. Once all the children’s rooms were done, he could think about the bedroom he shared with Thran. He wanted something special for it. He found some possibilities, stuck them in his back jeans pocket, paid for his things, and headed home.

“I’m back!” he called, when he came in the front door.

“I am in the kitchen!” Thran called back, so he came in to find his angel making tea. He was bedraggled again, but not quite as droopy, and he smiled a welcome. “I make spice tea. Does that suit?”
“Sounds good. I got the paint and more primer, and some paint samples for our room. Do you want to take a look?”

Thran carried the Japanese iron teapot and two of the small ceramic cups to the table. “Of course I do. What plans have you made for us, lyubov moya?”

Bard pulled the paint chips out of his back pocket. “I know I said peacock blue, grey, and silver, but I saw this icy blue grey that would look great. It comes in a sueded finish, which would be soft in the light.”

Thran rubbed his fingers over the sample. “The color is perfect. It is a color that suits both of us very well. And the finish adds patina. I like that, too.”

“It costs a little more –”

Thran shot him a warning look.

Bard held up his hands. “But not much, and it’s just two gallons. So I’m game if you are.”

“I am very game. And gamey. I must wash yet again.”

“I set up the times for us to look at those three SUVs tomorrow afternoon. If you want, I’ll handle the children in the morning so you can go right to the barre, and get in most of your practice before we have to go out.”

“I hate for you to do that, just because it is still so new for me to see to the children. But we need the SUV, and we need me to practice, so I think that is what we should do tomorrow.”

“Okay. I’m going to put our supper pie together, then go back to start painting. If I can get one coat done today, I can get the second one done tomorrow morning, and then all that’s left is the woodwork. I’d like to get at least the bottom of that done before the furniture gets here, so we don’t have to move it back and forth a lot.”

“So we have a plan. I can help you with the supper before I wash, to save a little time. What will you make?”

“Either pot pie or shepherd’s pie. Does Legolas like either of those?”

“The shepherd’s pie has the potatoes and cheese on top? He loves that. The pot pie has the pastry crust, yes?”

Bard nodded as he got the veg out of the fridge.

“He likes that, too. The only thing he does not like that I know of is eggplant, for which I share his aversion. And butternut squash. I cannot remember if I have tasted that, so I cannot say if I like it or not.”

“Does anyone like eggplant?” Bard snickered, getting the cutting board out for Thran. “No one does in this house, anyway. They’re not big on winter squash, either. But they like the summer kinds. Oh, I had this idea about making spirals out of veg so I can make you something that looks like pasta without you having to eat wheat noodles...”

They conversed easily as Bard assembled a big chicken pot pie, then the crust, ready to put in the oven when the children came home. That would be in less than an hour, so Bard hastened upstairs to paint while Thran cleaned up their preparations. He got one wall coated before the front door opened and four children came clattering inside. He climbed down from his ladder, capped the paint, and wrapped the brush and roller in plastic wrap to keep them damp while he talked to the children, and hurried downstairs.

Had the Imladris Academy lived up to everyone’s expectations?
Chapter 35

Chapter Summary

The cherubs’ chorus reveals all about their new adventures. Meanwhile, a saint and his angel see to business, an SUV, and a certain bit of administrivia.

Chapter Notes

I don’t own the rights to Miss Othmar, the teacher Linus adored so in the Peanuts comic strip. That belongs to the estate of Charles Schulz.

I don’t own the rights to any part of Harry Potter and the Hogwarts’ Herbology class, either. Those are J.K. Rowling's domain.

Monsieur Cornett is a tribute to my second French teacher of long ago. He was a funny and caring man, and his students didn’t appreciate what a gem he was until years later. Merci, Monsieur!

Translation Notes:

Ya lyublyu tebya = I love you (Russian)
Garu di = I love you (Welsh)

Thran took it as a good sign that the children’s voices were bright and full of laughter, and their footsteps were energetic. He sat at the kitchen table, and looked up from his computer as all four children came clattering in.

“Good afternoon, mes petits!” Thran greeted with a big smile, happy that all of the children were pink-cheeked from the cold and cheerful. “How was the school today? Oh, first, let me get Bard, so he can hear, too.”

“I’m right behind them,” Bard replied, coming in behind Bain, wiping his hands on a rag. “Hi, all! How was your day?”

“I had a good time!” Tilda announced at once. Thran had learned that Tilda was generally the child who mulled things longest, and was most considered with her words. Not today, though – her words were firmly enthusiastic. “I’m in the Blue reading group, which is the one with the most interesting books, though I’ve already read a bunch of them. Miss Othmar says she’ll have to find some new books because of how many I’ve read, and she asked me which ones I thought would be good. And I explained to one of the girls in my math group how fractions are like slices of pie, just like you told me, Da, and she got it. It was a lot of fun all day.”

“That’s great, little doll,” Bard smiled, getting out two big blocks of cheese from the refrigerator and putting them on the counter. As he got the boxes of crackers, a cutting board, and knife, his face relaxed into relief at news of Tilda’s successful day. “Homework?”

“Some. I understand it all,” Tilda said with a big grin as she opened one of the cracker boxes and helped herself to one.

“Perfect! Go hang up your coat and take off your boots before you eat, little doll. Legolas, what do you want for a snack – oh, I guess cheese and crackers are good, then?”

“Great,” Legolas mumbled, mouth already full as he dove in for another piece amid the other hands diving beside him. “I had a good day, too. I’m in Sigrid’s French class, Father. We’re in the top one.”

“That’s because you speak it so well, Legs – he dazzled the instructor, Ada. I did, too, but in the other way – I understand well enough, but my accent is so terrible! You and Legs have to help me get better! And when we start reading that Camus novel, I’ll be asking both of you vocab questions right and left.”

“I’m in two classes with Bain, too,” Legolas continued. “Science and math. Algebra.”

“The math’s got to be a mistake,” Bain snickered. “What I know about algebra would fit in a thimble!”

“It’s pre-algebra, Bain,” Legolas amended.

“And I know even less about that!” Bain threw up his hands and rolled his eyes.

That got a laugh from everyone. Thran put aside his computer and helped Bard put the crackers, cheese, and fruit on the table for everyone to enjoy while the children described their day. Tilda was the most enthusiastic, but Thran took that to be a sign of just how nervous she’d been this morning, and how brave she’d been to forge ahead despite it. Her teacher was young and attentive, and there were sixteen other students in her class. Twice a week she had art class, twice a week she had music class, and once a week she had a special Plants and Pets class in the school greenhouse, which the children had nicknamed Herbology after the Harry Potter books. Not only were there many plants to see to, but there were several animals to learn about – a tortoise, an iguana, and a ball python among them. It was good to see their youngest child so enthusiastic.

Bain was less effusive; in fact, all three of the older children were more reserved. Thran’s experience in dance school had taught him that it was better to remain above the fray until one better understood exactly what the fray was, and which factions vied for control. Legolas certainly knew that from boarding school. As students in inner city schools, Bain and Sigrid surely knew, too. Some of the conversations he’d overheard between the children since the fight in the park had revealed just how careful one had to be to avoid the wrong elements. Still, if he read the three older children correctly, all three were cautiously optimistic. They were in a wide variety of classes, from the ubiquitous English and maths to French – even Tilda had a brief French lesson once a week this term, which delighted her, as soon she’d understand what her older siblings said – and various sciences. Everyone had some sort of sport – Bain chose soccer, of course; just as predictably, Legolas chose archery. Sigrid was the surprise. She chose running.

“It helps me think,” she shrugged. “It’s peaceful. I never saw the point of chasing a ball, anyway.”

Tilda was in a general sport class; she wouldn’t choose a specific one until next year, but so far she thought either running like her sister might be nice, or perhaps badminton.
“I can lift those racquets a lot easier than the tennis ones,” she informed everyone, which brought another laugh.

“I talked to Mr. Faramir about the fencing, Father,” Legolas said. “I need special permission, which I expected, but it’s just a formality – you must sign a form, that’s all. Mr. Faramir said he’d contact the Gondors, and he didn’t see any problem with me working with them. Their studio is just a block from the school, and the students walk over together in a group, so it’ll be safe. I can catch the late bus to get home after the practice.”

“I can, too, if I make the soccer team,” Bain added. “This season’s almost over, of course, but the team still practices, so Mr. Faramir told me to see Mr. Boromir about it tomorrow or Friday, whenever I have a minute.”

“Did you get to do any archery today, Legolas?” Tilda asked, holding out an apple to Thran for him to cut it up for her.

Legolas nodded. “I did. The school bows are all right, but Mr. Faramir said I could bring mine if I want to, and I do. I met Killian Dis again, and Tara Green. They’re both friendly, and showed me where things are and how the team practices. They’re both very good archers, too, Father. In fact, Killian is about the best archer I’ve seen, and he’s a year younger than me. Tara’s my age, and she’s amazing, too. I’ll have to work hard to stay up with them.”

“All to the good, synok,” Thran nodded. “Such competition will make you sharper.”

The children continued to chat about their impressions of the day, which Thran and Bard followed with interest. About the only negative thing anyone said was about Sigrid's government class. Mr. Saur was like a strange, marabou stork without the ruff that wore the school instructor’s tunic like a straitjacket. He never met anyone’s eyes and kept an odd wide grin on his face most of the time.

“The other students call him the Mouth of Sauron,” Sigrid confessed, looking embarrassed. “It isn’t very nice, but honestly, he does look exactly like that guy in the Return of the King!”

Everyone laughed in varying stages of disbelief, but Legolas nodded in support of his stepsister. “I think I saw him today in the hall. Did he have on a black tunic? With black hair? And that little cap like the cheesemongers in town wear?” Sigrid nodded. “Then Sig’s right. He does look like the Mouth of Sauron!”

“Thank the gods he doesn’t have black teeth. He’s pretty dull, but you can’t take your eyes off him because he’s sooooo strange!”

“My art teacher was out today, but the substitute was strange,” Tilda said, “but in a good way. She wore shoes with great big pompoms on them. They were green!”

“What about you, Bain, and Legolas?” Thran laughed. “Have either of you a strange teacher?”

The boys both shook their heads. “Mostly normal, I have to say, compared to pompoms and funny hats,” Bain shrugged, taking another sip of milk. “I like the French teacher. I think he’s the same one you and Legs have, Sig. He’s tall and thin with these eyes that bug out, but he’s funny, and he explains stuff better than my old teacher. Monsieur Cornett’s his name.”

“That’s him,” Sigrid nodded.

“Oh, I have him, too!” Tilda’s eyes widened. “I like him. He knew I didn’t know any French yet, so when the other children were working on an assignment, he came over to teach me a few things. Bonjour is hello, and à bientôt is see you later today. He gave me a list of things to learn for next “Perhaps Legolas and I can help you learn the words, ma petite,” Thran offered.

“I think I’ll sit in on that,” Bard commented, nibbling a piece of cheese. “All of you will know French except me, so Tilda, I’d better learn your words, too, so I know what’s going on around me.”

“Father helped me a lot,” Legolas said, smiling. “We would speak nothing but French, or Russian, all day so that we didn’t forget it. Once you know a few words, it’s not so hard. ‘Pass me the milk, please,’ is ‘passe-moi le lait, s’il vous plaît.’ So then you can say ‘passe-moi le pain,’ the bread, ‘passe-moi la fromage,’ the cheese, ‘passe-moi les framboises,’ the raspberries.”

“So passe-moi la fromage, s’il vous plaît,” Bard said to general laughter. “Then I need to get back to painting. Supper’s going on in half an hour, and we’ll eat forty-five minutes after that. So supper crew, you’re on duty in an hour.”

“What did you paint today, Da?” Sigrid asked.

“Upstairs study, so it’ll be done when the furniture comes on Friday. The tub’s going in on Friday, too...”

Thran trailed along after the children to see the progress of the children’s study. Bard had only one wall done so far, but it was enough to show the sunny color. As the children scattered to their rooms, Thran surveyed the wall.

“I like it, lyubov moya. Could you use another pair of hands before supper?”

“Always. I’ll cut in, and you can do the roller.”

“Cut in?”

“That means I use the brush to paint up to the woodwork where the roller can’t reach, and you do the wall from that part over. Here, I’ll show you.”

Thran watched closely as Bard showed him how to fill the roller and paint the wall smoothly without streaks, so Thran began carefully as he’d been shown. He didn’t have the fast technique that Bard did, but he was more concerned with keeping the paint even and streak-free. They painted together for a while, talking back and forth about the children’s day, tomorrow’s car shopping, and other inconsequentials. In a bit, Bard went downstairs to put the pot pie in the oven, and returned to help Thran finish rolling the second wall. They managed to get the third wall done before the pot pie was due to come out, so Bard showed Thran how to put the brushes in plastic wrap to keep them moist while they ate. He intended to finish the last wall while the children worked on homework and cycled through the shower. He hoped to finish the second coat and the woodwork before the furniture came Friday so that the furniture could be set in place. Then the children would have a good place to study or play, and the pile of books in the main room downstairs could go on the shelves.

Everyone pitched in to get supper on the table, then cleaned up. Afterwards, the children settled at the kitchen table to start their homework. There was a mountain of forms for Thran and Bard to fill out, as well, so Bard didn’t get back upstairs to finish painting as early as he wanted to. But eventually all the forms were done, and Bard ran back upstairs to get the last wall done before the children went to bed. Despite Bard’s protests, Thran insisted on helping, too, so that his saint wouldn’t have to labor so long. Finally, at close to nine-thirty, the last wall was done. Bard capped the paint, and took the brushes downstairs to the laundry room to clean.
“I’m sure I’ll have to do a second coat, but at least the first one’s done today. I’ll try to get as much done tomorrow morning after the children are off to school, then finish after we go see the SUVs. Make sure you take your driver’s license, angel. If we buy one, you’ll have to drive it home.”

“I will be ready,” Thran assured Bard. “For now, though, let us get the children ready for bed, and then we can have a few minutes to rest before we must follow them.”

All but Sigrid were through their showers, so Bard read Tilda a story before she went to bed. Legolas sat cross-legged on his bed with Thran at the foot, talking a little more about Legolas’s impression of the academy.

“It is much nicer than boarding school already,” Legolas confided. “But I’m glad to have the classes with Sigrid and Bain, so I see a friendly face a few times a day.”

“I’m glad it went so well today. You will soon know more of your fellow students, I am sure. And I want to tell you how proud I was of you this morning when you spoke to Tilda. It was kind of you.”

Legolas blushed, but only a little. “Our Tilda is sweet, isn’t she? She made a picture for me before she ever met me.”

“So she did.”

“So I wanted to help her feel better.”

“It was nicely done, Legolas.” Thran tugged one of Legolas’s green braids. “The green is fading. Will you make them green again, or another color?”

Legolas grinned. “The school colors are blue and gold. Maybe I’ll make them blue this time.”

Thran snickered. “Please make sure the bathroom remains the color it is now when you do. Our Bard works very hard to make the paint look nice.”

“He works very hard at everything.”

Thran nodded. “He takes good care of us all. Now, it is late, and time for bed.”

Legolas leaned over to hug Thran. “I’m glad we’re here, Father.”

“So am I, synok. Very much. Sleep well now. Oh, we forgot to say. Tomorrow, Bard will do all the school prep so that I can finish my barre early. He and I will shop for an SUV for me tomorrow afternoon, so please help him in the morning as you would me.”

“So the SUV?” Legolas’s hands tightened on Thran’s arms in anticipation. “What kind?”

“We shall see tomorrow. We have three to look at.”

“That’s cool! So you might have it when we get home?”

“Perhaps so. If we are not home when you get off the bus, then please help Sigrid until we return.”

“I will, Father. That’s cool!”

“It is. Sleep now, and tomorrow will come sooner.”

“Yes, Father. Ya lyublyu tebya.”
Thran kissed the top of Legolas’s hair, helped him slide into bed under the covers, turned out the light, and pulled the door mostly closed against the light on the landing. Bard was just coming out of Tilda’s room, so he poked his head into Legolas’s room to wish a good night while Thran spoke to Tilda. Bain was tucked in in similar fashion, and then Sigrid. When they came out onto the landing again, they looked at each other with a sigh of accomplishment.

“Music, or film?” Bard offered.

Thran was tempted, but when he regarded the pocket doors beckoning him towards their bedroom, he shook his head. “I am very tired. I don’t need another shower, but you do, so I will settle in bed while you bathe.”

“I’m all for that,” Bard exhaled. “I’d be smart to bathe before I sit down again, anyway, or I may not manage to get up again.”

Thran chuckled in wry commiseration. “It has been a very long day for all of us. So I am happy to take to our bed.”

“Let’s do the rounds, then.”

They checked that all was put away and ready for the morning, and that the children’s bathroom nightlight was lit. Once Bard had bathed, he crawled in beside Thran, and they arranged themselves comfortably in the dark.

“A good day, cariad.”

“A very good day, lyubov moya. The first of many.”

“The first of very many. Garu di, angel.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, my saint.”

It was a mark of the day’s labors that neither of them lasted more than a few heartbeats after that before falling asleep.

* * *

The next morning came on like a thoroughbred down the final stretch of Bangor-on-Dee Racecourse. Bard hurried downstairs with Thran on his heels, him to the kitchen to start the children’s breakfasts and lunches, and Thran to the ballroom for his barre work. He had the lunches in progress when Sigrid came down.

“Where’s Thran?”

“At the barre early. We’re going into town this afternoon to look at an SUV for him to get him to and from class. So he’s doing his practice early so he stays on track with his audition prep. The first one’s January nineteenth.”

“An SUV? Cool! Here, I’ll help with the lunches,” Sigrid said, setting her porridge down on the kitchen island by Bard’s lineup of waxed paper sheets with bread atop them. “Does Legolas like
They worked on opposite sides of the island to assemble the four sandwiches. Sigrid folded them in their waxed-paper wrapping and put them in the lunch bags; Bard had water bottles filled and fruit ready to add with the sandwiches. The pan of brownies came out, Sigrid put the cookies Bard cut into more waxed paper, and those went into the bags.

“Thanks, Sig. Finish your porridge, and I’ll get this cleaned up.”

“Make sure you eat, Da,” Sigrid replied. “You didn’t yesterday.”

“I ate after you all went to the bus.”

“No, you didn’t. I’ll bet you marched upstairs and started painting, and Thran marched into the ballroom and started dancing.”

What actually had happened when Bard and Thran had come home after seeing the children to the bus had been worth missing breakfast for, but Bard refused to let his face reflect how much he’d relished that. “I didn’t quite march up the stairs as soon as we came back, but soon enough.”

“We’ve got enough now, Da. You can’t keep shorting yourself. And while you’re at it make Thran eat more, too. He’s gorgeous, but he needs more meat on his bones.”

“You’ll have to help me work on that,” Bard shook his head. “I think he needs to eat more, too. But he’s taken care of himself for a long time, and he’s promised to keep doing so. I’ve promised I’d trust him to keep doing so, too.”

“Well, that’s all right, then.” Sigrid finished her porridge, rinsed out her bowl, and put it in the dishwasher.

“It is?” Bard dished up a bowl of porridge for himself.

“Sure. He’d do anything for you, so if you made him promise to take care of himself, then he will.”

Bard smothered a grin at Sigrid’s blunt assessment of her father’s relationship with a Russian ballet dancer. “I hope so.”

The boys and Tilda came clattering downstairs, so Bard handed off his bowl of porridge to Legolas, dished another for Bain, and a third for Tilda. He had to explain where Thran was again, and why he was at the barre so early, so the breakfast chatter was full of speculation about what SUV, if any, might appear in front of the house this afternoon. He set the order of who’d be in charge if he and Thran weren’t back before the children came home from school, and made sure everyone ate enough breakfast. Before long, the children were ready to head out to catch the bus, so they trooped to the ballroom to wave goodbye to Thran. He paused long enough to hug everyone goodbye, then Bard went out with the children. Rosie was already there with her four children.

“I hope you, Thran, and your children can come over to supper with us one day soon, Bard,” Rosie said.

“That’d be nice, Rosie. We’d like that, all of us. I still remember that spicy cornbread you made so often. But I have to hold off for a couple of weeks, if you don’t mind. I’ve got a mountain of renovation to do to get the children’s rooms finished. Thran’s got auditions coming up, and he’s working around the clock, too, to get ready. Would you mind if we get ourselves a little more settled before we visit you and Sam and your children?”
“Of course not! If you don’t mind me asking, it sounds like you hadn’t planned to move out here as soon as you did.”

“We didn’t, but the owner of the apartment building we lived in wanted in on the whole gentrification craze and decided to do a major renovation, then wanted to renegotiate all the apartment leases accordingly. So we decided to move early,” Bard explained. This was the story he and Thran had agreed to use if anyone asked, rather than to talk about the heroin gang. The children had been instructed not to say anything about it, either, as at some point a trial or some other legal proceeding was likely to take place, and Bard and Thran had decided that the less talk about what had happened the better.

“Understandable,” Rosie nodded. “I know you’ll do a good job on it all. You always do. And I can’t wait to see you get back to your sculpture again. A lot of us have a new artist’s rep now. Maybe you’ve heard about them – Shire Hills?”

“I have,” Bard nodded. That was the name of the firm that Thran had mentioned. “They’re good?”

“I like them,” Rosie agreed. “They’re less expensive because they aren’t well established nationwide yet, but they’ve gotten some nice commissions for several of us in the past six months. I got a nice church window job just after I signed with them, and that job brought in two more commissions, good ones. I can get you their name and number if you like.”

“I’ve got it already, somewhere in the piles of stuff not put away yet. If I can’t find it, I’ll ask. Someone else recommended them, too, so I’d planned to call them once the house is farther along.”

“I hope you do. Greenwood Dale on the Lake is just on the edge of becoming a bigger draw, so having you back means one more to help pull us all along. We don’t have another metal sculptor, so you’re filling a niche we need filled. Oh, here’s the bus. Let me know if there’s anything Sam and I can do to help, and you know we’ll be over.”

“Thanks, Rosie. I will.”

As Rosie hurried to hug her children goodbye, Bard turned to his children to complete the old saw.

“You’re off!” he called, grinning.

“And we’re leaving, too!” came back the chorus, even from Legolas.

“Do your best!”

“Just like always!”

When the bus trundled off, Bard waved to the other parents, and headed home at a trot.

“I’m back!” he called as he came in the front door. He walked back to the ballroom, where Thran stood on one foot, the other stretched behind him straight up in a split. His shoulders nearly touched his calf, and his hands grasped his uppermost foot.

Bard paused, mouth open. He belatedly swallowed. “That... shouldn’t even be humanly possible.”

“It is what they call a flashy move,” Thran agreed, eyes shut as he concentrated on the stretch. “A profound stretch of the psoas. But I like it.” He released his foot, which did not move as his torso fell gracefully forward until it met the shin of his other leg. His hands wrapped around his ankle. “The counter is a good stretch of the opposite hamstring. I like that, as well. The children are on the bus without trouble, then?”
“Um, yes, no trouble,” Bard shook himself out of his regard of his lover’s stretch. “Rosie’s asked us to come for supper one night. I said we’d be glad to visit once our place is more settled, and you’re through a few of your auditions.”

“I appreciate that you saw to the children, and got us a little time to settle. I agree with you that we are not quite ready for visiting yet.”

“Anything specific?”

Thran reversed his stretch again, very slowly. “I think we would be wise to be married before we visit too many people.”

“Good point. Maybe we can stop by the county building this afternoon, if we get through the SUV shopping early enough. We have to apply for the marriage license together.”

“We do. Let us take our paperwork with us, and see how the day goes.”

“All right. I’m headed upstairs to paint. I’ll put your breakfast on when you come up for a shower.”

“That would be very nice, but I can make porridge on my own if you are in the middle of something.”

“We’ll see how the day goes about that, too. So practice well, angel. I’ll see you in a bit.”

Thran grinned and blew him a kiss as he backed out. Laughing, Bard came back in the ballroom and waited until Thran reversed his stretch again to kiss him as he reached for the floor.

“Very nice,” Thran purred. “Would that every session at the barre offered such delights.”

Chuckling, Bard headed upstairs and got out his brush and roller.

More than four hours later, it was nearly noon, and Thran had not come upstairs. Bard kept to his painting, but couldn’t keep from worrying. He hoped Thran had gotten something to eat, but he suspected that his lover had stayed at the barre, working overtime to get that long, elegant body back into dancing trim. He managed to get the second coat of paint on all four walls without going downstairs to check, but when the last roller of paint was on the walls and he couldn’t find any more missed places in the bright sunlight, he capped the paint and brought the brushes and tray downstairs to wash in the laundry tub.

When the brush and roller were clean and drying in the laundry room, Bard went looking for Thran. He found him right where he expected – in the ballroom, sitting on his yoga mat, folded over his outstretched legs. His clothing was soaked in places, his hair was mussed out of its usual smoothness, and his pose was limp and exhausted.

“Angel, it’s almost noon.”

“Is it?” Thran looked up, his face pale. “I had not realized it was so late.”

“Did you eat anything?”

Thran didn’t answer. When Bard sighed, Thran flicked him a glance. “Did you?”

He hadn’t. He’d handed off his porridge to Legolas this morning, and had never gotten back to dish up another bowlful for himself. He winced. He came over to Thran’s mat and folded himself cross-legged beside him.
“What are we going to do with us? We can’t keep skipping meals. The children need us healthy, not wasting away because we’re too busy to eat.”

Thran eased out of his stretch to sit beside Bard. “You are right. We have been remiss two days in a row.”

“I’ve just made a new house rule. No missed meals.”

“I had not intended to. The dance took me, and I lost track of time.”

“I guess wanting to get things right for the children took me, too. I actually had the bowl of porridge in my hand, then the children came down, and I gave it to them, and... I never got back to the porridge.”

Thran leaned his head on Bard’s shoulder, and rested his hand on Bard’s thigh. “I admit that I am exhausted.”

“You look it. Not good. I’ll take you upstairs to make sure you get into the shower, then I’ll make us a big lunch. And we both will eat every bite of it.”

“Yes,” Thran agreed simply. How could one syllable contain so much weariness?

Bard drew Thran up from the floor, and they went upstairs arm in arm. Bard hoped Thran was perfectly capable of undressing and getting into the shower alone, but he seemed so droopy that Bard did it for him. When he got Thran into the bathroom, even the ballet dancer winced at his reflection.

“Did you just wear yourself out thoroughly, or did you hurt something, too?” Bard asked as dispassionately as possible – not easy, as pale as Thran looked under the fluorescent lights.

“Nothing hurts. I am well. Merely... tired.”

“Can I trust you to get yourself through the shower while I make us lunch, or do you need me to scrub you down?”

Thran turned the ghost of a sly smile on him, but even the ghost was mostly bravado. “I am as eager to christen this lovely room as you, lyubov moya. But I would not do you justice right now, and I prefer to wait for the soaking tub. So you will make our lunch, and I will revive the dead.”

“That’s not far from it,” Bard returned, kissing Thran’s ear. “Get warm and clean and dry, angel, and then I’ll feed both of the dead.”

Once Thran got into the shower cabinet and under the water, Bard went back downstairs and perused the fridge for lunch. By the time Thran reappeared in black jeans, grey Henley, and warm socks, his hair clean and shining in its loose braid, Bard had a skillet of sautéed chicken; another of quinoa; and a bowl of salad.

“Grab plates, then we can eat,” he invited.

“This smells wonderful,” Thran breathed in deeply as he leaned over the quinoa. “What is it?”

“Quinoa. It’s got a lot of protein in it, which you need. The rest is just onions, raisins, dried cherries, pine nuts, pecans, almonds, a lot of turmeric and cumin, and a little butter and olive oil. I hope you like it.”

“To be honest, Bard, right now I could eat my boots with gusto.”
Laughing, Bard took the plate Thran handed him and waited for Thran to help himself from the pans. When the dancer took only two small pieces of chicken, Bard took the fork, speared another small piece, and put it on Thran’s plate. Thran shot him a reproving look, but Bard shrugged without apology. “You need to eat, Thran. Even Sigrid noticed how little you eat. She fussed at me this morning about us both missing meals, so while I won’t say a word if you pass up the cheese and crackers, cookies, red meat, and simple carbs, I will nudge you about eating protein and complex carbs.”

Thran exhaled in exasperation, but he didn’t remove the chicken. “Is it not enough that I submit most deliciously to you in bed? Now you want power over my plate, too?”

“I want you healthy and happy, with enough meat on your bones to make you worth pillaging. And able to dance. And able to pillage me at any time.”

Thran sat down at the kitchen table with his plate. Bard set his plate down, then ducked into the fridge to pour them both glasses of almond milk. He brought the glasses to the table, put one in front of Thran, and sat down with his. “This stuff’s pretty good. And twice the calcium of the dairy stuff, another thing you need.”

As Thran took up his fork, he glowered at Bard. “You are a tyrant.”

Bard snickered. “You can take it out in trade, once you’ve eaten enough to do so.”

Thran’s glower crumbled into laughter. “That will not be hard, lyubov moya. Everything is delicious.”

It was more than delicious, if the way Thran wolfed down everything on his plate was any indication. He even went back for more of the quinoa, laughing when Bard told him that Tilda called it the Saturn grain, because the quinoa germ traced around each small seed like the rings around the planet. With every bite, Thran revived, and soon he looked himself again. Bard was no less eager to eat, and felt much better when he was full. There were more than enough brownies left for the children’s lunches tomorrow, so he took a small one and cut it in two, offering half to Thran, who looked at it askance.

“It’s only half a brownie, and I promise that I didn’t put any arsenic in it. Besides, you didn’t have breakfast. They have orange in them.”

Thran engulfed the scant mouthful before he thought better of it. “They do. Gods, Bard. You can tempt the Devil towards redemption with these.”

“As long as I can tempt an angel back to balance, Old Scratch can take care of himself,” Bard grinned. “You look better, so I hope you feel better.”

“I am much revived, thanks to my saint, and quite ready for our expedition to view SUVs. When is our first appointment?”

“We’ve got time to clean up before we head out. Wash, or wipe?”

“You cooked. I will wash.”

They cleaned up the kitchen, brushed teeth, and collected paperwork in case they had time to go to the county office for their marriage license. Once on their way, they decided that Bard would make sure the mechanical aspects of the SUVs were up to snuff, and Thran would concentrate on the body language of the sellers. That would help them get the best read on which purchase to make, if any.
A couple of hours later, they had Thran’s SUV. The widow offering one of the used ones was unpleasant – Bard suspected she disapproved of whatever she saw in two men trying to buy her husband’s vehicle – and the new one was tricked out with so much bling that neither Thran nor Bard wanted it. The third one, a recent model, was more serviceable, and had been well maintained, so money changed hands, and Thran got behind the wheel with satisfaction. Bard had been a little concerned about this part – the Prince of Ice actually driving. But on the trip from seller to title shop, Bard’s rear view mirror proved that Thran was more than capable.

Once they took care of the paperwork and fees, Thran pulled out his mobile. “It is only three-thirty, Bard. Do you think we have time to go to the county office for our license?”

“We’re pushing it, but let’s stop anyway. We need our paperwork from the truck, then we can walk over. It’s a couple of blocks, but we’d take just as long walking as we would trying to find another parking slot.”

“Let us go, then.”

They reached the right clerk with fifteen minutes to spare. They handed over their birth certificates as well as the sad reminders of their wives’ demises, and soon had the small certificate in hand. Their expressions remained matter-of-fact in front of the clerk and the various people they passed as they retraced their steps through the building, but Thran gave Bard a surreptitious peck on the cheek as they stepped onto the sidewalk.

“Thank you, lyubov moya.”

Bard swallowed what was surely a silly grin, but he couldn’t smother the chuckle. He put his arm around Thran’s hips under his coat to give a squeeze before they headed back to their vehicles.

“Thank you, too, angel. Let’s go home.”

“Quickly. The children are home by now, and they likely pillage the kitchen as we speak.”

They separated for the brief drive home. As Bard climbed into his truck, his silly grin refused to leave his face. Why had taking care of a trivial and bureaucratic necessity make his heart beat a little faster? It wasn’t as if his feelings for Thran had changed – he still was the most blessed of men to have his ethereal angel as his partner. Had a scrap of paper made their pairing seem more real? Maybe that was it. Whatever it was, he was glad Thran didn’t see the goofy expression that would not leave his face as he drove.

He pulled up to the house and parked his truck beside the carriage house. As Thran pulled up beside him, the front door opened and all four children spilled out.

“Whoa, look at this!” Bain exclaimed, with Legolas on his heels. “Legs and I claim the back seat!”

Bard climbed out of his truck as a laughing Thran let the children climb through the new SUV. “A little more room than Bard’s truck, yes? So we will be more comfortable on trips.”

“It suits you, Ada,” Sigrid stuck her head out of the window where she and Tilda sat in the middle seats. “It’s silver!”

“The angel’s chariot, indeed,” Bard teased, joining Thran to laugh at the children testing the seats and poking into all the pockets.

“Hey, there’s a snack tray!” Legolas called, sounding just as loud as Bain. It was good to hear their quietest child roar a little louder. “Look, Bain! A snack tray!”
Bard leaned towards Thran. “If you’re smart, cariad, you’ll ban snacking in the SUV right up front. Once that artificial cheese smell gets into the upholstery, it never comes out.”

“Ugh,” Thran made a face. “I will do so at once. I do not like that smell in any shape or form.”

“We have one, too!” Tilda announced, pulling the small tray down between her and Sigrid. “See, Bain? We have a snack tray, too!”

Bard didn’t have to nudge Thran before the tall dancer leaned over to look inside the SUV. “The snack tray will make good arm rests, yes. Snack holders, no. We have tables in the house to hold snacks.”

“I knew it,” Bain looked at Legolas. “Your Da listened to my Da, and now we’ll never get to snack in here.”

“You don’t snack in the truck, do you?” Bard looked back at his son. “Same rules apply for Thran’s SUV.”

That met with a chorus of groans, but it didn’t last long given that three of the children already followed those rules in Bard’s truck. After a few more minutes of exploration, the children were ready to follow their fathers into the house to get ready for supper.

Even though Thran had worked so hard earlier, he pitched in to help with the kitchen prep. Today’s menu included salmon, sautéed vegetables, and potatoes, all quick to prepare. In half an hour, all six sat down to full plates.

Bard surveyed the full table. All of the children were full of news about their day at school. Tilda tried out one of her new French words on Thran. Sigrid and Legolas and Bain laughed about a special assembly they’d seen today. At the other end of the table, Thran caught his eye, smiling.

Yes. Just yes.
Chapter 36

Chapter Summary

A saint and his angel consider ramifications in the middle of renovations.

Chapter Notes

J.K. Rowling holds the copyright on her Harry Potter world, not me. I just enjoy her world.

I don't hold any rights to "The Secret Garden," either.

What was better than the laughter and conversation swirling around the kitchen table? It was surely the smile that transfigured Bard’s face. His saint sat at the other end of the table, watching and listening and savoring the children’s banter more than he would water in the middle of Death Valley. The children’s unconscious ease and good appetite were welcome signs of a whole family, the thing that Bard treasured most.

Thran let Bard indulge in his delight for another few seconds, then caught his eyes again. He held up his fork and pointed to his plate, which brought a chagrined grimace to Bard’s face as he belatedly took up his utensils to eat his supper. At least he ate with good appetite, when he remembered to do so.

Despite their rapid-fire conversation, the children downed their suppers in minutes. After dessert, Bard and Thran marshaled the cleanup crew, then the children settled around the table to work on homework. Thran took it upon himself to preside, and sent Bard upstairs to get the study woodwork painted in anticipation of tomorrow’s furniture delivery. Most of the homework questions he got were about French, especially from Tilda; the older children were able to handle the rest. That was good; Thran couldn’t remember the last time he’d studied pre-algebra, and from the boys’ discussion, he’d be no help to them at all. At least he could still muddle through Tilda’s few questions about her English assignment about the subjunctive verb tense. When she was through, she showed him her list of French vocabulary, and they played with the words. If he had anything to say about it, Tilda would soon catch up to the rest of her class.

At length, it was time for the children to cycle through showers, so Thran went upstairs with Tilda to see how Bard had done with his painting.

“I’ve got the wall done where the bookcase desks will go,” Bard said as he sat atop his ladder. He held a small cup of paint in one hand and his brush in the other, concentrating as he smoothed paint on the next bit of crown molding with precise strokes. “So we can put them in place tomorrow. I’ll do the rest tomorrow, so I can sand and wax the floor by the wall tonight. Those things are heavy, and they’ll be even heavier when we put all the books and so forth in them, so I don’t want to have to move them once they’re here.”

“A good plan,” Thran agreed; his attention wasn’t on Bard’s words, but his shirt. Each time Bard raised his brush to the woodwork, his shirt rose accordingly, giving tempting glimpses of lean flank. As tired as he was, he still felt a jolt in his abdomen, doubly so because Bard wasn’t paying him any attention, merely attending to his painting with unstudied grace.

“Where are we going to put the desks, then, Da?” Tilda asked. “All on that wall?”

“That’s right, little doll,” Bard glanced down with a smile before refocusing on the molding. “One goes on that end, one goes between the windows, and one goes on this end. They’ll look nice from the doorway with all the books in them.”

“Do I have to put all my books in here?”

“Of course not. You’ve still got your carved bookcase in your room to hold all your favorites. We’ll put the house books in here, though, so we can all get to them to read.”

“And chairs, too?”

“Course. We’ll use some of the dining room chairs until we get some for up here. And maybe a table for doing puzzles or looking at picture books or doing projects.”

“Maybe a rug?”

“That’d be nice in the winter. It’d keep your toes nice and toasty. We’ll look for one in the junk shops the next time we go.”

“When you finish this room, will you work on my room next?”

“I’ll do Legolas’s next, little doll. Yours and Bain’s are in pretty decent shape. His isn’t. In fact, there’s a hole in one of his walls, so that’s not good. I’ll get his in decent trim, then you and Bain will be next.”

Bard finished the end of the molding on this end, so he looked down at Thran and Tilda, giving Tilda a wink before he caught Thran eyeing how his shirt had ridden up. He held brush and paint cup in one hand so he could pull it down, then climbed down from his perch atop the ladder.

“Done all your homework, then, little doll?”

Tilda nodded. “Thran helped me with my French words. He does this funny thing with the Rs.”

“Rrrrrrrr,” Thran rolled, smiling. “Comme ça, ma petite?”

“Oui, comme ça,” Tilda giggled. “Comme ça means ‘like that,’ Da. I can’t do the Rs yet, but I will.”

“Of course you will,” Thran agreed. “It takes only practice, nothing more.”

“So comme ça means like that,” Bard repeated, grinning at his daughter as he put the paint cup on the floor out of the way. “So I’ve got a new word, too. Now, off to the shower?”

Tilda nodded. “Then could we read a story?”

“Course. Which one this time? More Secret Garden?”

“I like that one. You do the accents so well.”

“We’ll have to find something with a Russian in it, then,” Bard ruffled Tilda’s hair. “Thran could do that one.”
Tilda giggled. “He could do all those Durmstrang people in Harry Potter.”

“I have not read any of the Harry Potter books,” Thran confessed. “I did not know they had Russian characters.”

“Book Four,” Bard grinned. “Goblet of Fire. Lots of glowering Russians. You’ll love it. But right now, Til, the shower. You’ve got three more behind you, so we can’t clog up the works.”

“Okay, Da.” Tilda scampered to her room to get her pajamas, and soon disappeared into the bathroom.

“Now you, funny dancer. Did you get enough of a view to hold you until I can do the floor, or do I have to service you first?” Bard murmured, looking Thran up and down.

“Not quite.” Thran took the trailing edge of Bard’s shirt, edged it up, and gave the enticing torso underneath a good ogle – only to expose the bandage over Bard’s stitches. “Oh, my saint, your stitches. How long before they come out?”

“Soon. Another day or so. Won’t be long.”

Thran let Bard’s shirt drop. “I hope not. I am eager to put such unpleasantness behind us. Unfortunately, I must bring up another unpleasantness. I am sorry to do so.”

The teasing expression faded from Bard’s face, and his eyes darkened with concern. He wiped his hands on a paper towel, then gave Thran his full regard. “What is it, Thran?”

“Have you finished the wall as you needed to?” Bard nodded. “And what is needed for the floor?”

“Same as what I did to Sigrid’s floor – light sanding where the bookcase desks will go, then some paste wax. The edges of the floor are in good shape, not like the middle, so they won’t need much to bring them back.”

“Then perhaps I can help you as we talk.”

“You don’t have to, Thran. Just sit while I do it, and that’ll be enough.”

“I do not like all the work to fall to you, lyubov moyo. Is there something I can do that does not cause more trouble than I remedy? If it is, then I want to do it.”

“Sure; it’s not hard, just needs a light hand.”

“Then show me, and I will tell you.”

“Go put on something crummy.”

Thran padded into their room for old leggings and tee shirt, then Bard explained about steel wool and other arcana, and showed Thran what to do. He gave Thran his work gloves, and soon they both sanded away.

“I do not think we should wait too long to have our marriage ceremony,” Thran began.

“You’ve got reasons other than our personal preferences,” Bard surmised.

“The marriage license is a public document, I think,” Thran replied, studying his piece of floor. “It will likely not escape notice that my name is on it.”
“I thought about that, too,” Bard said, sanding away. “I don’t know if you’ve checked the Internet about what happened in the park, but the news wire carried the story for a couple of days because you were involved. A couple tied back to your earlier fracas.”

“I refuse to read anything with my name in it that is not a ballet review,” Thran snorted. “Half of those I wish I had not read, and the other half I do not believe.”

Bard chuckled. “When I was working metal, I felt the same way. I expect I still will when I start again.”

“A healthy reaction.”

“So you think someone will notice, and come snooping around?”

“I hope not, but I must consider it. I do not care for myself. I have dealt with the press for many years. But perhaps you, and certainly our children, have not. I do not want our children frightened or harassed.”

“I don’t, either. What should we do?”

“I expect little of substance to be involved. Likely paparazzi. They can be obnoxious. But as I am only a ballet dancer, and not an eminent statesman or an American footballer or a rock star, they should not be interested for long. So if we teach the children to do what I call the Smile and Nod, we should weather this well.”

“The Smile and Nod,” Bard snickered as he sanded. “And you think we should do the ceremony soon, to as not to drag things out too long?”

“Just so,” Thran smiled at Bard’s amusement. “What would you like to do? We could dress in very formal tuxedos and the children in the same and make a spectacle of ourselves in some scenic location.”

“That might almost be worth it for the sheer rarity of dressing all of us up. But even Sig couldn’t sit still for much of that. What if we do a low-key ceremony and then go watch a spectacle? There’s one of those Japanese steak houses in the village where the chefs cook on a grill right in front of you, and they put on a show while they do so – they juggle eggs, and so forth. Bain’s been trying to get us to go to one for at least a year, but I didn’t have the money. I held him off by telling him he’d have to use chopsticks, but that made Til and Sig want to go more, so I didn’t solve my problem.”

Laughing, Thran looked up from his sanding. “That sounds like fun. Or we could go back to the place where we had the seafood. Bain would like the raw bar.”

“That’d be fun, too. They grilled me about us going there. Til even asked me what color the tablecloths were. They’d like Kasim, too. Or we could go to that Russian place you told me you liked so much.”

“All good choices. I suppose it depends on the ceremony we choose.”

“We can get it done at the county office, first come, first served. It’s open until four on weekdays, so we could pick up the children from school early one day, or right when class ends, go for the ceremony, then do whatever afterwards. Costs next to nothing. Tuesdays and Wednesdays tend to be less busy. Or we could find a justice of the peace and do it over a weekend, I guess. I haven’t looked into that.”

“Either would be expedient, and we would not have to dress up. We consider ourselves married already, so we do not need the ceremony for sentiment, only legality. Then I like the Japanese restaurant spectacle. We would likely run into fewer annoyances than if we go into the city."

Bard nodded. “That sounds fine. The children will like the cooking thing. We need rings, though – eh, I suppose we don’t, but I’d like one.”

“So would I. So we must find them.”

“There are a few jewelers in the village. We could look there for something unique. Or would that just telegraph our intentions to people we don’t want to telegraph them to? We could look at jewelers in the city. I’m sure a lot of places there would do whatever we want, and no one would notice.”

“I have something planned for Tuesday morning in the city for you and me. We could look after that.”

Pausing in his rubbing, Bard sat back on his heels to regard Thran. “Oh?”

Thran nodded. “I have arranged for you to come to class with me, if that is all right with you.”

“When did you do that? We’ve been busy all day.”

Bard sounded so surprised that Thran laughed. “I asked yesterday. When I helped the children with their homework tonight, I received email that you would be allowed to attend my Tuesday class. I will call tomorrow morning to confirm, and to find out if the master has any concerns you must address. This master is very good, and he and I work well together. He is also very thorough, so you will receive a rigorous introduction to this world. Would that suit?”

“Of course. Of course it does,” Bard was quick to exclaim. “That’ll be brilliant.”

“I will explain everything to you beforehand. I must, as this master prefers to teach mostly in French. Most of his students are old school classicists, but he is primo for refinement and technique for many more than classicists. He is also not so dictatorial that he met my request with scorn or anger.”

“Does he know why you asked?”

Thran nodded. “I explained that my husband wanted to better appreciate the art and discipline of the dance, so that he could embody it in his own art and discipline.”

Bard made suitably impressed noises. “Oh, you didn’t tell him it would be a kindness to let your chauffeur sit in the warmth inside rather than in the cold car outside while he waited for your eminence to take his class?”

“I did not. What respect could the Prince of Ice command to marry a chauffeur? A fellow artist, especially a sculptor of metal, is much more impressive, as well as true. So you must act suitably sculptor-like.”

“Sculptor-like?” Bard gave him an incredulous look, all raised eyebrows and bemused smile. “What does that mean?”

Thran waved his steel wool pad to the ceiling. “I have no idea. Perhaps you could bring a sketchpad? I assume a metal sculptor knows how to draw, yes?”

“Sounds like I need to explain what I do as much as you have to explain what you do.” Bard slid over to sand the next bit of floor. “Yes, I can draw. In fact, it would be fun to sketch your class, if your master allows it. I’d like that.”
“Consider it so, then. I will tell Monsieur LePied to expect such. Have I sanded this enough, lyubov moya?”

They continued to sand the two-foot wide strip of floor along the wall while the children took their showers. The paste wax went much faster, and by the time Sigrid was done, so was the strip of floor. Thran’s fingers ached from the concentrated rubbing, and he flexed them gently as Bard replaced the lid on the can of paste wax.

“That’s enough for tonight,” Bard sighed. “I’ll read Tilda her story, then we’ll get the children to bed.”

“I shall check that everyone’s homework is done,” Thran decided, and headed downstairs to do so.

Bain and Legolas were in the sitting room, playing one of their games. Both of them had finished their assignments, but had left papers and books scattered on the kitchen table, so Thran shooed them back to put everything away. He remembered to ask about lunch bags when Bain’s fell out of his book bag, so soon all the bags and water bottles were ready and waiting for tomorrow’s routine. The boys had another fifteen minutes before bed, so they went back to their game. When he escorted them upstairs, Bard was just finishing Tilda’s story. The three youngest children soon bedded down and were bid goodnight.

Thran followed Bard as he stuck his head in Sigrid’s room.

“Your desk comes tomorrow, sweetness. Where do you want it?”

Sigrid pointed to the wall between her two windows. “Right there, centered. I’ll need a chair and a lamp.”

“We’ll use the dining room chairs until we get to the junk shops. Put a lamp on your list.”

“Will do. Maybe one of those globe ones.”

“We’ll see. Finished your homework?”

“All but the last part of an essay. I won’t be much longer.”

“Okay. I’m knackered, so I’m for the shower and bed.”

“Night, then, Da. Night, Ada.” Sigrid got off her bed to give both Bard and Thran hugs. “Both of you, promise me you’ll eat breakfast tomorrow? Please?”

The look Bard shot Thran was accompanied by a shrug, but both of them clearly conveyed I told you so.

“I will be sure to do so,” Thran tapped her nose. “And I will see that your Da does, too.”

“I’ll have breakfast, and I’ll see that the Prince of Ice does too,” Bard quipped, pressing a kiss to the top of Sigrid’s hair. “We had a long talk about it this morning, and we have a new house rule. No missed meals for either of us.”

“About time!” Sigrid snorted. “Gods, it’s about time. You’re both gorgeous, but you’re both too thin, too!”

“The queen has spoken,” Bard exhaled. “Night, Sig.”

“Good night, ma chère.”
“Night, Da. Night, Ada. See you in the morning.”

Thran gratefully pulled the pocket doors to their room closed behind them. He was exhausted after such a long, busy day, and he was glad to put down the mantle of parenthood for the night. By the end of the bed, Bard stood looking down at the mattress, clearly tempted to merely fall into it.

“Let me return the favor you did me at noon,” Thran whispered as he stood at Bard’s back to ease the flannel shirt off Bard’s shoulders. Bard let Thran slip his Henley off afterwards with only a sigh. Thran rested his chin on Bard’s shoulder and rubbed his thumbs along Bard’s skin just above the top of his jeans, stroking slowly until Bard shut his eyes and hummed in enjoyment.

“Unbutton your jeans,” Thran whispered. When Bard did so, Thran ran fingers under the fabric, caressing the points of Bard’s hips and the creases of his groins. “Mmm, you smell good.”

Bard’s laughter was faint. “I smell like a common laborer.”

“You are an uncommon laborer, and you smell like the man I love. I am half tempted to have you here and now, gamy and half stripped. But you are exhausted, and so am I, and it would be easier for us both if you wash before we go to bed. Then, whatever we are capable of, we have nothing to do after but to fall asleep in each other’s arms. Have I given you enough motivation to get through the shower?”

“Once that hot water hits me, you may end up with nothing but a puddle.”

“Perhaps. But you will be a clean puddle. So wash.”

Thran slid a hand down the length of Bard’s cock only once before slipping away, which got a growl out of Bard. “Bastard.”

“For you, always. Wash, lyubov moya. Before we both fall asleep.”

Bard sat down to unlace his work boots, then stripped off what was left, and vanished into the bathroom with a stretch. As the water came on, Thran slipped out of his clothes and hung them up, trembling as the cool air surrounded him. He hastened into bed and burrowed into the silk sheets and cashmere blankets and down pillows, shivering as the bedding slowly warmed. Gods, gods, it never failed to appall him how quick he was to chill, yet how slow he was to warm. He hoped Bard would join him swiftly and rescue him from the icy bedding. There, yes, the silk was slowly warming, easing his tight muscles, coaxing him from his fetal curl, yes, so much warmer now, so much warmer...

* * *

Hot water was a godsend that took away most of the world’s evils. Why hadn’t church services incorporated hot baths into their liturgy? It was hard not to feel redeemed and saved when washing the day’s labors away with lots of body wash and hot, hot water. Bard managed not to moan too loudly as he stood under the deluge, savoring every drop that ran down his body. It was such a temptation to stay there, warm and loose, but an angel awaited him, one who was likely shivering with cold even under such elegant bedding. Bard shut off the water and dried off, toweling his hair briskly to get as much water out as possible. He was too tired to pull out Thran’s hair dryer, so the towel would have to do.
He didn’t bother to rebandage his stitches, either. They were ready to come out, and Bard would see to that soon. But now it was time to tend his angel, as if either of them were fit for anything tonight. He padded out, about to say something to Thran –

His exhausted angel lay tightly curled in the middle of the bed, sound asleep. Bard smiled at the sight of the Prince of Ice lying so sweetly asleep, so he turned off the lamps and eased in beside him. Thran sighed and loosened out of his curl to soak up Bard’s warmth, but he didn’t wake. Bard had no complaints. He was just as tired, and they had spent too few nights together for him to consider merely sleeping beside an angel to be a poor way to spend the night. He curled around Thran, shut his eyes, and was asleep in half a dozen breaths.

In half a dozen more breaths, it seemed, the alarm went off. The haunting melody that Thran had requested a day or so ago by Vaughn Williams began, and Bard stirred, sorry to have to get up. But it was Friday, and the children needed hot breakfasts and lunches before school. He slipped into the bathroom, then returned to find Thran stirring slowly. Bard sat on the bed to kiss his shoulder.

“Morning, angel. I’m off to the kitchen.”

A long, pale arm snaked out and went around Bard’s neck, easing him down for Thran to press a kiss on his hair. “I will be there in a moment, lyubov moya.”

“Porridge?”

“Yes, please. And tea. Perhaps oolong?”

“Consider it in the cup. See you in a minute.”

Bard pulled on his socks, sleep pants, and Henley, and slipped out of their room. Sigrid and Legolas were already stirring, so he made sure Bain and Tilda were also up before he headed down to the kitchen. The pot of porridge went on, then the teakettle, and Bard piled all the stuff he needed for the lunches on the kitchen island. By the time Thran padded into the room, he had waxed paper and bread lined up for sandwiches. Wordlessly, Thran laid out lettuce across the bread, then took the bin of the remaining ham slices and divided them up across the sandwiches. Once Bard followed with cheese and mustard, they packaged the sandwiches. The water bottles were filled, the lunch bags soon followed, and then Bard put a bowl of porridge in Thran’s hands. Bard had his own in hand as he pointed them both to the table.

“House rules, angel. Eat.”

“As long as you do, too,” Thran said, as Sigrid and Legolas came into the kitchen. Bard made to get up, but Thran glared at him. “Sit!” he growled. “Our children can get their porridge. Sigrid, Legolas, get your porridge so that Bard may eat his.”

“About bloody time,” Sigrid said, filling Legolas’s bowl for him, then hers. “I like that growl of yours, Ada. Sounds serious.”

“It must be, to get your Da to listen,” Thran glowered, drawing Bard’s laughter. “So, eat, lyubov moya, so that I may eat, too, rather than growl at you again.”

“I hear and obey,” Bard teased. “Pass the raisins, please. What’s that in French? Passe-moi the what?”

Legolas snickered. “Passe-moi les raisins.”

“Hmm, I hope I can remember that one,” Bard gave a mock frown of confusion. “That one’s hard.”
Legolas’s snicker spread around the table. Bain and Tilda joined them, and Sigrid got up to help Tilda with the porridge. “Sit, Da. Or I’ll tell Ada to growl at you again.”

“No respect,” Bard shook his head, smiling. He was glad of the warm porridge to fill his empty stomach, and doubly glad that Thran was eating, too. They were off to a good start, at last.

This morning Thran joined the parade to the bus stop, and joined in the old saw about being off and leaving too, and doing their best. Rosie’s husband, Sam, was at the bus stop today in place of his wife, and once the bus pulled away, Sam came up to greet his old friend with a huge hug. Sam was not much taller than the petite Rosie, but he was broad and stocky, with a tangle of blond curls and an open smile.

“Are you still running the Green Thumb, Sam?” Bard asked, after Sam had wrung Thran’s hand in a friendly shake of welcome.

“Of course I am, Bard! You know nothing could take me away from that,” Sam assured him.

“Sam runs the garden and landscape design center on this side of the village,” Bard explained to Thran, whose eyebrows pricked up in interest.

“Do you? Oh, then as spring nears, we will come to see you, then. We have a small Japanese garden planned, and perhaps you can suggest good plants for it?”

“That sounds great,” Sam nodded. “Just the gravel, or something greener?”

“We were thinking evergreens, outside the solarium,” Bard offered. “Remember my pine tree sculpture? I thought it’d look good there with the garden around it.”

“Oh, that’ll be stellar,” Sam’s eyes sparkled. “That’s a northern exposure, isn’t it? I have several hardy things you can think about. But what about a few flowers, Bard? I thought you were a Welshman!”

“I want a proper Welsh garden on the window side of the ballroom, Sam, never fear. Lots of your brightest colors.”

“I’ll keep an eye out for suitable things for that, too. I’ve got a nice bulk discount I offer on blocks of fifty annuals, or twenty perennials.”

“Sounds good. I’ve still go so much to do inside, but I hope we’ll be ready to do something about the garden in the spring.”

“I hope so, too. If you need another strong back for anything, you just let me know, and I’ll be around.”

“Thanks, Sam. I’ll see you later, then.”

“We will. Nice meeting you, Thran. Good to have you with us!”

“Thank you,” Thran nodded, smiling. “Enjoy your weekend, Sam.”

“Thanks! You, too!”

“He is very enthusiastic,” Thran smiled as he and Bard went back to the house.

“Sam’s a good soul. He’s a good balance for all the flighty artists around here – solid as they come, and a true friend, and it’s no lie about his strong back. He’s hauled metal for me more than once.”
“Is he a good gardener, too?”

“The best. Wait until spring. His place is the envy of the neighborhood, and he’s generous to a fault with it. Be careful about admiring anything – he’s liable to dig up a piece of it and give it to you.”

“We will invite him and Rosie and their children over for soup one day, then. They sound like good friends to have.”

“The best.” Bard let them in the front door and headed upstairs to put on his work clothes; Thran followed him to change into his practice attire. “That’s another thing we need to put on the list of stuff to do. Make door keys for you and the children.”

“We need somewhere to put the list, too.”

“We do. A chalkboard, dry marker board, something. It’s got to be in the kitchen, and big, so the children will remember to list things we need at the market when they eat the last of anything. It doesn’t take long to train them to do that, because if it isn’t on the list, it doesn’t get bought, and someone does without until the next trip to the market.”

“Wise,” Thran agreed. “So I will go to the barre, but only if you promise me something.”

“What’s that?”

Thran stroked Bard’s hair, then scrubbed his fingers through his hair, urging him close into a kiss. “I must do my barre, and you must prepare for the installer and delivery truck. Please, please, promise me that we will make time for ourselves today? Our children will be in residence all day tomorrow and Sunday, so we may suffer a long spell without respite if we cannot see to ourselves before they come home from school.”

Laughing, Bard pressed his hips against Thran’s and rubbed gently, then tipped them both into bed, snuggling Thran close. “Hmm. What if we do that right now?”

A knock on the front door rang up the stairwell, drawing Bard’s sigh, as well as Thran’s rueful chuckle. “If that is the plumber, I will not do anything to keep him or her from bestowing our soaking tub upon us, no matter how much I love you.”

“Agreed,” Bard agreed, sitting up and sliding to the edge of the bed so he could stand up. “You get to your barre, and I’ll get the door. I’ll have lunch for you when you’re done.”

They kissed quickly before Bard headed for the front door. Thran listened long enough to confirm that it was in fact the tub installer, then grabbed his practice things and dodged into the children’s bathroom before Bard led the installer upstairs to show him where the tub was to go. As they talked, Thran changed his clothes and took himself off to the ballroom with a sense of anticipation. In another few days, they would have a soaking tub to make short work of cold, aching muscles.

He’d make short work of a saint in that tub, too.

* * *

Bard managed to change out of his decent clothes and into his old painting jeans, shirt, and work boots before the two installers brought the tub upstairs. He made sure they had everything positioned as he expected and were ready to run the plumbing before he shut off the water, let Thran know the water was off, then went back upstairs to resume his woodwork painting. He was just about done when another knock rang off the front door, so he skipped downstairs to find the first bookcase desk on the porch cradled in its dolly, ready to be hauled upstairs. Unlike the tub, the bookcase desks and Sigrid’s lady’s desk took only a few minutes to be set in place. Bard signed the delivery slip for the haulers, waved goodbye, and then came back upstairs to view the study in satisfaction. The cherry looked good with the apricot paint, and Bard hastened to paint the last stretch of baseboard. He found the oil soap and set to work on the grime that clouded the wood in several places. The ladder made quick work of reaching the top of the pieces, and the clean smell of the soap added a nice patina to his work. To complete his reclamation, he used a little furniture oil to bring the wood back to near its original luster. On to the glass in the bookcase doors, which was also well grimed, but a little vinegar and elbow grease solved that. The two missing panes would be easy to fix once he got replacement glass – another thing to put on the list for the homeowners’ mecca - but even so, all three already looked brighter and cleaner.

He stuck his head in the bathroom to see how the tub installers were progressing. The tub was in place, and the installer had the faucets mostly installed. Even though the tile wasn’t around the tub yet, the bathroom looked much more finished without the gaping hole by the shower.

“Another half hour, and we’ll be ready to test for leaks,” the lead installer said. “About that long, Pip?”

“Right you are, Merry,” the younger one added easily. “I don’t want to be hasty, but I wager we’ll be done by elevenses, Mr. Bowman.”

“That’s great,” Bard nodded, smiling. “Let me know when you’re ready, and I’ll turn the water on.”

“Righto,” Merry nodded, and turned back to the piping.

Sure enough, in just a few minutes, he stood by the shutoff valve, ready to turn the water on and off as the installers directed. There was one small reversal as a clamp was found to be loose, but that was quickly remedied, and just after eleven o’clock the installers pronounced the tub to be properly installed and leak-free.

Bard bade them goodbye with a sense of anticipation. He ran back upstairs, pulled the boxes of white marble tiles out of the closet, set them in the bathroom, and measured the first line of marble he needed for the wall above the tub. The wet saw tile cutter was still sitting in the solarium, so he got that outside onto the terrace to cut the marble to size. He’d gotten the wall tiles cut when Thran appeared in the solarium window, waving to him.

“This is the last of the wall tiles, then I’m ready to put them on the wall. Then comes the little bit of paint to finish the wall. After that, the floor. I’ll have the marble done tonight, grout tomorrow.
Monday, we soak.”

Thran’s top was soaked and his hair was disheveled, but today he was not paler than normal, nor did he look as exhausted as he had yesterday. His eyes were bright as he took the piece of marble Bard handed him. “The tub is in, then?”

“It’s in,” Bard confirmed. “The bookcase desks are in place, too, and cleaned up. So is Sigrid’s desk.
Come see for yourself. The place is coming into its own!”

“Show me,” Thran demanded, and they hurried upstairs, where Thran admired Sigrid’s graceful desk sitting between the windows, then the children’s study. “The bookcase desks are perfect there, and will look wonderful with the books in place. I hope the children love it as much as I do. A small table “We’ll look this weekend. I’ve got to go out to get the glass to replace the broken panes, so we can check through the junk shops and such again.”

“I will enjoy that, too. Now, the tub. I cannot wait to see this marvel!”

“It already looks wonderful,” Bard assured Thran as they went into the bathroom. “Just remember that we can’t climb in just yet. I lay the tile; the mastic sets for twenty-four hours. Then I grout the tile; the grout sets for twenty-four hours. We’ll have to use the children’s bathroom for a couple of days. But after that, it’ll be our playground.”

Thran gave him a sideways look. “It is a wondrous thing, Bard. You are truly zoloto moyo. And all before noon! So tell me this, my saint. How long does it take to lay all this marble?”

“The wall, about half an hour to place the tiles, and another half hour to paint. I’ve already cut all the floor tiles but around the tub, so I just have put down the mastic and lay the tiles. Maybe two, three hours for the floor. I’ll be done by supper.”

“So... I wonder if you would consider the promise we made each other this morning? What if you do the wall tile and paint, then you let me show you how much I appreciate all this work you have done today? I want to do so while we have the daylight to savor, and privacy.”

As Thran stroked Bard’s cheek, smiling in anticipation, Bard savored the jolt in his loins as he thought about climbing into bed with a grateful angel. He gave a gentle tug on Thran’s braid, then an exaggerated sigh. “Huh. The demands some people put on their contractors.”

Thran’s finger traced over his lips, then down his throat. “You suffer mightily. So, I will wash, and you will paint and lay tile. And then, my toiling contractor, I will lay you. Quite thoroughly.”

“Yessir, I’ll see to that tile right away, sir. Right away. Then I’ll see to you, yessir.”

Thran’s grin was feral as he gathered up his clean leggings and shirt and sauntered out of their bedroom with a lingering look back.

Bard ran a hand through his hair, trying to get his cock to behave itself long enough for him to concentrate on arabesque marble tile and pearlescent paint. It wasn’t easy.

He’d have to charge Thran overtime for that.
Chapter 37

Chapter Summary

An angel's plans for ambush are sidetracked, but not forever. Meanwhile, a saint's labors start to pay off.

Chapter Notes

Yes, the reference to Prince Buttercup is an allusion to "The Princess Bride," which I don't own rights to. Just remember what Wesley meant when he said, "As you wish."

Thran padded into the children’s bathroom, thinking of all the possibilities that awaited him when he was clean and dry and ready to pounce on a certain hunky contractor with unruly hair in his eyes and jeans that rode low. In seconds, his dance belt grew very uncomfortable as his cock considered the possibilities, too. He looked for someplace to put his clean clothes out of the way while he showered —

And found nothing. Not a hook on the wall, nor a shelf that wasn’t already crammed with towels, nor a chair, nor a stool.

Hmmm. Welcome to another reminder of living in the middle of a house in progress.

Despite himself, he looked around as Bard might, taking in the scuffed walls, the corner of the tile floor that was cracked and missing pieces, the relatively new shower cabinet, the double sinks. There was space to put a stool under the counter between the two sinks, and room to one side to add another pair of towel racks. Those small things would add much needed capacity to help the children stay organized, so that each could have a towel rack rather than having to share one. And perhaps a row of hooks on the back of the door, to harbor robes or pajamas? At least the new electrical outlet over the sink was one Tilda could reach, unlike the one in the ancient, battered light fixture over the mirror...

He snickered. If he were learning to assess the needs for renovation, would Bard soon take up dancing in the ballroom with him? Not that that wouldn’t be delicious...

He wandered back into the bedroom to get his bathing things, smiling. “Lyubov moya, I think we should add a pair of towel racks to the children’s bath – what are you doing?”

Bard stood in front of the mirror above the sink, shirt off, small scissors in his hand, looking at his reflection in the mirror. He flinched as if Thran had caught him doing something dodgy, then grimaced. “You’re supposed to be in the shower, angel.”

“I need my towel and soap and so forth,” Thran gestured towards their shower cabinet. “You said you would tile and paint. Why, then, do you stand in front of the mirror with scissors – oh, gods, Bard! You try to take out your stitches!”
“They’re healed, so it’s time for them to go.”

Thran hissed. “You promised me you would do just as the EMTs told you! You would care for them and then you would see your regular doctor to have them taken out. You promised me!”

Bard met his eyes. “So I did. And so I have.”

“You do not take out your stitches! That is for the doctor!”

Bard nodded. “I said I’d see my regular doctor to take out my stitches, yes. And so I am.”

Thran’s jaw fell open, and his cheeks turned hot. Oh, gods, Bard had no medical insurance – there was no regular doctor to see. Hadn’t Bard told him this more than once? Why hadn’t the implications sunk in before now? “Oh. Oh, suka blyad...”

Bard looked back at his stitches in the mirror. “It’s all right, angel. Go take your shower. This won’t take but a minute, and they’ll be gone by the time you get back.”

“Absolutely not. If you insist to do this, then I insist to stay right here. I saw them go in. I will see them come out.”

“It’d be easier if you didn’t watch.”

“Why? Because you expect it to hurt, and you do not want me to know that it does?”

Bard’s lips trembled into a reluctant smile. “Because you watching will make me nervous, and that might make it hurt.”

Thran snorted. “Idi na khuy, you bastard. You will not guilt me so much that I leave you here alone. Besides, you cannot possibly reach the top two. I will have to do those.”

“Thran, you’re making a big production out of this –”

“You make the production! I make only sense. It will take both of us to do this. That means we must be very clean, and neither of us are. So please, finish the tile and the paint, while I wash very carefully. Then we will wash your stitches very carefully, and then all the scissors and pliers and other tools very carefully, and –”

“Pliers?” Bard laughed. “Other tools?”

“Whatever you call those things – the forceps, the tweezers, those. We will wash them very carefully, and only then will we take out your stitches.”

Bard quirked a smile. “You’re cute when you’re mad.”

“Do not make me use my Prince of Ice voice twice in one day. You will do this because it makes sense.”

Conceding defeat, Bard put down the scissors. “As you wish, Prince Buttercup. If you can hold off washing for a bit, then hand me the tiles. It’ll go faster that way.”

“Of course. Let me get a sweater.”

Thran scampered to the closet, where he yanked off his tights and dancer’s belt, replacing them with an old pair of sweats. His sodden top was already icy against his skin, so he stripped it off, yanked on an old sweater, then hurried back into the bathroom; he didn’t trust Bard not to return to his stitch removal as soon as he was out of Thran’s sight. But no, Bard had put his Henley back on and had taken his boots off, and was stirring the pot of adhesive. He climbed into the tub, smeared a coat of the sticky mess onto the wall, then pointed to the tiles lined up neatly on the floor.

“They’re all laid out how they’ll go on the wall. That end near your foot is the bottom left edge. So start with that one, all right?”

“All right.” Thran squatted by the tiles on the floor. As Bard indicated, Thran fed him one tile after another, until the first line was done. The following courses followed quickly, including the corner pieces, and finally the border tiles. Despite his concern about Bard’s stitches, Thran admired the graceful play of the light across the subtle veining in the marble.

“Beautiful,” Thran nodded, as he stood up. “We will have a palace of a bathroom very soon.” Bard grinned appreciatively. “It looks great. Now, just a little paint over the primer, and these walls are done. So go wash, and I’ll finish this.”

“Promise me you will not touch your stitches until I come back,” Thran put his arms akimbo.

In response, Bard raised both of his in surrender. “I won’t touch them. So go.” Thran sniffed in skepticism as he collected soap and towel, but he went. He expected to be back in the ballroom this afternoon, so he didn’t wash his hair, but he was still glad to soak up the warmth of the hot water. Not for the first time did he appreciate Bard’s insistence for an extra-capacity heater to make sure they never ran out of hot water. He soaked until his limbs didn’t feel so heavy, then dried and dressed quickly to return to the master bathroom to see how Bard’s painting had progressed.

One wall was done, and the second one around the window was nearly so. The paint was white, but something in it reflected the light as softly as pearls. Bard sat atop the ladder wielding his brush to smooth the last edge of the wall, and nodded at the paint tray on the floor. “Would you hand me the roller?”

Thran loaded the roller as Bard had showed him, and passed it over. The paint went on quickly, and with just another couple of roller passes, the second wall was finished. While Thran carried the ladder out of the bathroom, then returned to admire the finished wall, Bard emptied the remaining paint back into the can.

“I’ll wash the brushes, then be back up.” Bard gave Thran a considering look up and down. “Don’t start without me, okay?”

“Don’t make me wait too long,” Thran purred, smiling.

“Wouldn’t dream of it. Back in a few.”

Bard carried the paint stuff downstairs, and Thran soon heard water running in the laundry room. He continued to admire the morning’s work, imagining how the floor would shine when marble tile covered the subfloor. He came back into the bedroom, moved the ladder out of the way into a corner of the landing, and then considered what to do about Bard’s stitches.

One must sterilize the scissors and such, yes? He poked through the bathroom cabinet to find rubbing alcohol and cotton balls, then examined the small scissors Bard had held earlier. They belonged to a surgical set, perhaps? Yes, a small kit lay unzipped on the counter. Thran opened it with one ginger finger, cataloging the various implements – this was a full surgical field kit, complete with needles and sutures in sealed sterile packets. Despite himself, Thran shuddered. No matter how much pain from strains, sprains, bruises, wrenches or aches he had endured without complaint during his years of dance, the very idea of metal objects invading his body made him ill. May he never cause himself enough damage to find out the reality behind his imaginings!

“Why do you have this?” Thran asked with a wince when Bard came back into the bathroom. “These are fiendish devices.”

Bard’s smile was sympathetic. “I work metal, Thran. I can’t run to the ER every time I get a scratch. Fortunately, I haven’t needed those ‘fiendish devices’ for a long time. When you don’t have medical insurance, that’s medical insurance.”

Thran hummed a concession. “Another reason for us to hasten our marriage, then. So that we can get you and the children proper medical insurance.”

“What are you sure you do not want me to do this?”

“I did. I will wash my hands again, and then swab the scissors and the forceps. Then you. Off with the shirt.”

Thran scrubbed busily, then soaked his hands with the alcohol, then the tools. Watching him, Bard ran a hand through his hair before he started to scrub his hands. “You’re making more of this than it is, angel.”

“Let me. Then it will not make more of itself later. So... let me swab the stitches.”

Bard endured Thran soaking his stitches with alcohol, not once, but twice. “That’s good, Thran. You’ve drowned every germ in the world by now. Where are the scissors?”

“Are you sure you do not want me to do this?”

“It’ll be fine, Thran.”

“Rub the alcohol on your hands first.”

“Okay, angel. Okay. There. Now, let me concentrate.”

Thran pressed his lips together and forced himself silent while Bard considered his stitches as dispassionately as if he looked at a maquette – no, Bard had told him the proper word was mannequin. His lover’s hands were steady as he took up the forceps and scissors, picked up the end of the bottommost stitch, and snipped it just above the knot. With only a little coaxing, the stitch slipped out. There was no blood or pus, and only a pair of small red dots showed where the stitch had been.

“See? Not so bad,” Bard said, dropping the stitch in the trashcan.

Thran held silence as Bard eased the next seven out. The last two, however, were right under his pectoral muscle, and impossible for Bard to see except in the mirror. Thran tsked and tried to look at the remaining two stitches with the same dispassion that Bard had showed.

“You cannot reach them, lyubov moya. Give me the tools, and I will get them without poking you as you have done twice already.”

“You look a little pale, angel. I’ll get them.”

“Why do you and a certain Scottish policeman think it is funny to call me pale?” Thran snorted, nearly spitting the last word. “It is an insult, because I am always pale! Come, lie down on the bed where I can brace my hands, funny welder, and I will take the last two out.”

Thran practically snatched the forceps and scissors from Bard’s hands and pushed him into the bedroom. “Come, come, come! Before I think about this too much! There! Down!”

Bard laughed, but he did as he was told, lying down in the sun where Thran would have the best light to see what he was doing. As Thran draped himself beside Bard, his lover snickered.

“Are you sure you want to do this –”

“Quiet! I begin. Do not move.”

With more aplomb than he felt, Thran took up the stitch end as he’d seen Bard do, found the knot, snipped, and pulled. The stitch came out easily, which encouraged Thran to take up the last one. Up, find the knot, snip, then pull...

“Suka blyad,” he hissed. “This one is stuck.”

“Just pull it out.”

“It is still stuck.”

“Give it a good tug.”

“That will hurt.”

“No, it won’t. Just pull it out.”

“Bard –”

“You’ve got hold of it?”

“Yes – Bard, you bastard!”

Bard had grabbed Thran’s left hand holding the stitch in the forceps and given it a hard yank. He held up Thran’s hand, still holding the forceps. The stitch dangled from the forceps, out at last.

“Any bleeding or pus?”

Thran gave up his glare to check. “No, not that I see. Perhaps it was merely stuck.”

“The important thing is that they’re out. Thank you for seeing to the last ones.”

“I am not done yet. Wait here.”

Thran clambered out of bed with tools in hand, left them in the bathroom, then soaked a cotton ball in alcohol. Returning with it, he rubbed a wide swath of Bard’s side. “Now I am done.”

“And so are the stitches.”

“Does your side hurt?”

“No.”

Thran glared at Bard. “Why are you laughing?”

“Because you’re sweet. Because you made a fuss. Because no one’s ever made the taking out of stitches into such a production.”

“And just how often have you had stitches taken out?” Thran said icily, but his tone only broadened the smile on Bard’s lips.

“More times than I care to count. This was the best time of all, though. I’ve never had anyone make such a good job of it.”

It was impossible to glare at Bard any longer. The stitches were out, and the fiendish implements of mayhem were back in the bathroom, and his lover lay in the sunlight, smiling fondly at him.

“I love you, too,” Bard murmured, rubbing Thran’s leg.

The last of Thran’s concern melted, and his lips curled into a smile as he insinuated the button of Bard’s jeans open, and the zipper down. “If you take these off, I will show you how much I love you, foolish man.”

Bard had his jeans and undershorts off in a couple of tugs, but he hadn’t kicked them to the floor before Thran had stripped off leggings and sweater and pressed a kiss on his lips. What came after in the depths of silk and cashmere was so thorough, so insistent, so all-consuming, that Bard likely looked forward to the next time he’d suffer stitches. Acquiring them would not be pleasant. But removing them certainly would be.

* * *

By the time Thran finished declaring his love in the most outrageous fashion, the afternoon sun had waned low enough to cast the children’s study into near darkness, warning them that the children would soon be home. Bard lay drowsily for a few more seconds wrapped around Thran, rubbing his lover’s hip in slow, lazy strokes. The head pillowed on his arm shifted a little, and Thran sighed softly.

“We must get up before we are inundated with children,” Thran murmured sleepily. “Though I would rather stay here with you.”

“So would I. But that tile’s not going to lay itself, and your barre isn’t going dance by itself, either.”

“We forgot to eat lunch, too.”

Bard swore under his breath, but with chagrin rather than heat. “Even when we swear we’re going to eat, we can’t seem to remember to. What time is it?”

Thran looked up enough to see the clock radio on Bard’s side of the bed. “Ah. Not so late as I thought. Only just before three.”

“Then down to the kitchen with us, then. Before the children come home and Sigrid yells at us.”

“Preispodnyaya, yes,” Thran agreed. They scrambled into clothes, hastened downstairs, and made a quick lunch of the last of last night’s salmon, a plate of raw veg, and tea. Because Thran had just eaten and did not dance in such circumstances, he offered to help Bard with the marble floor upstairs, so they set to. By the time the children clattered inside around four-thirty, they had most of the floor done. The children trooped upstairs to survey the bathroom and their study, and it took little encouragement for them to haul the boxes of books out of the main room upstairs. Barn and Thran shared silent amusement at the discussion that ensued about how to arrange the books, which seemed to change every three minutes. When Bard went by to cut the next batch of floor tiles, he found all of the children arranging and rearranging. A well-depleted plate of cheese and crackers sat in the middle of the floor, mute testimony of how the children had fueled their efforts.

“How do you like your desk, Sig?”

“It’s perfect!” she grinned up from the box she and Bain were sorting out. “It looks great between the windows, doesn’t it? Maybe it’ll make the homework get done easier.”

Bain rolled his eyes. “Like anything helps with that.”

Bard laughed. “Just got a few more tiles to cut, then we’re done with the floor for the night. Then we’ll start supper, and talk about how your day went.”

“How do you like your desk, Sig?”

“It’s perfect!” she grinned up from the box she and Bain were sorting out. “It looks great between the windows, doesn’t it? Maybe it’ll make the homework get done easier.”

Bain rolled his eyes. “Like anything helps with that.”

Bard laughed. “Just got a few more tiles to cut, then we’re done with the floor for the night. Then we’ll start supper, and talk about how your day went.”

“How do you like your desk, Sig?”

“It’s perfect!” she grinned up from the box she and Bain were sorting out. “It looks great between the windows, doesn’t it? Maybe it’ll make the homework get done easier.”

Bain rolled his eyes. “Like anything helps with that.”

Bard laughed. “Just got a few more tiles to cut, then we’re done with the floor for the night. Then we’ll start supper, and talk about how your day went.”

“How do you like your desk, Sig?”

“It’s perfect!” she grinned up from the box she and Bain were sorting out. “It looks great between the windows, doesn’t it? Maybe it’ll make the homework get done easier.”

Bain rolled his eyes. “Like anything helps with that.”

Bard laughed. “Just got a few more tiles to cut, then we’re done with the floor for the night. Then we’ll start supper, and talk about how your day went.”

“How do you like your desk, Sig?”

“It’s perfect!” she grinned up from the box she and Bain were sorting out. “It looks great between the windows, doesn’t it? Maybe it’ll make the homework get done easier.”

Bain rolled his eyes. “Like anything helps with that.”

Bard laughed. “Just got a few more tiles to cut, then we’re done with the floor for the night. Then we’ll start supper, and talk about how your day went.”

“Hurry up, Da. I’m starving!” Bain groaned.

“So am I,” Legolas and Tilda agreed, both of them laughing at their inadvertent chorus.

“Okay. Couple more tiles, and we’ll get started. Back in a bit.”

The last tiles were trimmed and fitted in good time. Bard pulled Thran to his feet to survey the expanse of pearly white and silver marble.

“It’s already beautiful,” Thran said, tucking a stray lock of hair behind his ear. “We cannot walk on it until tomorrow, no?”

Bard shook his head. “No, not until the mastic dries. So the children can look through the door all they want, but they can’t go in there.”

“Now, to supper. I confess that I am just as hungry as Legolas and Tilda, even though I did not do my barre this afternoon.”

“You got a workout crawling all over the floor laying tile, angel. So you don’t need to do any more today, by my lights.”

“I agree with you. Let us make supper, then. What do you plan for us tonight?”

“Does Legolas like tacos? They’re fast, and my three love them. I can make some chicken filling for you as well as the regular beef.”

“One meal of beef will not hurt me. It is lean beef, yes?”

“The only kind that comes in the house. All right, Mexican Feast it is.”

The family divided up the chores to make supper, chopping veg, grating cheese, heating filling and beans, assembling salad, warming tortillas. Along the way, the day’s events at school were thoroughly discussed, as were plans for the weekend. Bard, of course, had a long list of things to get at the homeowners’ mecca, from glass for the bookcase desks to house keys for Thran and the children. They also started a list of things to look for at the local flea markets, thrift stores, and junk shops. To celebrate the end of an eventful week, the children took the night off from homework, and they spent the evening in the sitting room. The boys and Bard watched a hockey game, Tilda read one of her books, and Sigrid and Thran played cards. After the game, Bard made popcorn for the children, and everyone soon headed up to bed.
The next morning, Bard snuggled peacefully with Thran for a few extra minutes before the tall dancer slipped downstairs to do his barre and yoga before breakfast. When he’d gone, Bard thought sleepily about getting up to grout the bathroom floor, but the mastic hadn’t had time enough to dry yet, so he enjoyed the luxury of another half hour of sleep. Eventually, knowing Thran was up and working roused him out of bed, if slowly. He eased into his work clothes, and carried his work boots downstairs. Maybe he’d paint one of the kitchen walls while everyone was still asleep. Or maybe he’d make a batch of muffins for the children’s breakfast... orange cranberry, maybe?

The teakettle was still warm, mute evidence that Thran had made his morning tea. Bard made himself a cup, then decided he’d have just time to paint the wall behind the kitchen table before everyone got up in anticipation of their trip to the various secondhand shops. He got the ladder from where Thran had stowed it yesterday, got his brush and roller and the can of paint, and set to leisurely. The morning was quiet and peaceful, and painting was calming. Bringing something into order, making it better, was always a satisfying way to pass the time, especially in such quiet. Painting around the wide windows gave him the outside to look at as well, and he imagined what the Japanese garden outside of the solarium might look like in the spring.

He’d finished the wall before either Thran or the children appeared, but he wouldn’t have time to paint another whole wall before someone would want breakfast. So he cleaned his brushes and put the ladder aside, and started on his muffins. Before long, Thran appeared, shirt sodden and hair mussed, but he wasn’t exhausted. His angel was getting stronger, then, which gave him something else to smile about.

“Something smells divine, lyubov moya,” Thran sniffed appreciatively, wiping his face with a towel, then offering Bard a kiss. “What delight do you bring us this morning?”

Bard stroked his lover’s back. “Orange cranberry muffins. To go with scrambled eggs. Or would you rather have boiled?”

“As long as there is little oil in the scrambled ones, that is fine. I will wash, and be back down. Have you been painting?”

“The window wall. If the children are up, warn them before they come down.”

“I hope they are not up yet. It clogs the works, yes, when I shower in their bath? They cannot use it when I am there.”

“They can come downstairs and use the sitting room bath for the few minutes it’ll take you to wash.”

“I go, then. Back soon.”

Thran was as good as his word, reappearing quickly dressed in jeans, shirt, and sweater. The children appeared soon after, and after devouring breakfast, they set out in Thran’s new SUV. Bard had the lists they’d made last night, and by the time they returned, he had enough supplies to fix several small projects. They also found a small rug for the children’s study, three desk chairs that needed reupholstering, a trio of lamps, and a fountain with a lion’s head spout and a semicircular basin. They spent the afternoon arranging their new treasures while Bard grouted the bathroom floor.

On Sunday, the children worked on homework while Bard painted the next kitchen wall. Life was settling into a calmer routine, and the aroma of smoky bean soup lent a welcome coziness to the house. The ballroom got another fencing workout as Legolas had at with his father, giving Bard something to grin about. Now that his stitches were gone and the remaining scar was solid, he intended to give Thran an entirely different kind of workout in that ballroom. He’d wait until after he visited Thran’s dance class on Tuesday... eh, in another week was Thran’s audition. Maybe he should wait until after that...

It didn’t matter when the consecration of that part of the house occurred. They had time.
Chapter 38

Chapter Summary

To (im)properly prepare a saint for his invitation to the dance, he and his angel engage in a different kind of yoga. The next morning brings enlightenment, as well as healing - there are now two artists in residence.

Chapter Notes

I don’t own any rights to Yoda, Jedi masters, or Star Wars. But I agree that Yoda is a yoga master as well as a Jedi master.

Translation Notes:

ty grebanyy huiesos = you fucking cocksucker (Russian) ty sukin syn = you son of a bitch (Russian) suka blyad = bitch motherfucker (Russian)
idi k chertu = go to hell (Russian)

When Thran finished drying his hair, he hurried into his Mandarin robe before the heat of the dryer faded. The silk would keep him warm enough until he dashed into bed where Bard waited for him. Still, he lingered to admire the finished bathroom for just another moment, savoring the pearly paint that glowed softly in the light, the opulent mosaic on the floor, the matching arabesques on the wall above the soaking tub – he couldn’t wait to indulge in that; perhaps tomorrow, or Tuesday after his class? Bard had created the most wonderful oasis imaginable, and it was still too recent a change to merely dash out without appreciating it.

He put his hair dryer away, wrapped his robe around him tightly, and hurried into the bedroom. Bard was already there, one arm outstretched to gather him close, so he turned out the light by the bed, stripped his robe, and dove under the covers.

“Gods, you’re cold,” Bard murmured as Thran plastered himself to Bard’s side and wrapped an arm across his chest. “How do you do that after just getting out of a hot shower?”

“I stayed a moment to admire the marble, and to consider when to try the soaking tub. Perhaps tomorrow, or Tuesday after class.”

“Whichever one you choose, I’ll join you. Always wanted to soak in hot water with an angel.”

Thran snuggled close. “And I with a saint, though you are so nicely warm now that it is a delight. Now, I must ask you – what are your plans for the morning, lyubov moya?”

“I planned to start on Legolas’s room. It’s a hovel, and I don’t want him to endure that any longer than he has to. Do you have something else you want me to look at instead?”
Thran stroked Bard’s chest, playing with the dark hair that covered it. Why was that so soothing, yet so arousing at the same time? “We go to ballet class Tuesday, yes? I would like to explain much about it before we go, so that you understand what to expect. So once the children are off to school, if you would like to watch my barre, I could explain.”

Warm, strong hands rubbed Thran’s back and arm, bringing the most delicious ease. “Of course, angel. Whatever you need.”

The caressing rumble in Bard’s voice brought a grin to Thran’s face. “You think of the day I first seduced you.”

“I think of that day more than I should admit. Gods, you didn’t fight fair. Is that what I’m in for tomorrow?”

“We both want to christen the ballroom in homage to that first day. If you want us to end my lesson that way, we will. But I do have much to explain, and if we prefer to save our christening for another time without so much work in it, that is fine, too.”

Bard hummed, then rolled over slowly until he was atop Thran, lips nuzzling the hollow at the base of Thran’s throat. “It depends. Would knowing that I’m going to nail you over your barre at the end of your lesson be too much of a distraction?”

Thran wound fingers in Bard’s hair, shivering as his body responded to the fingers tracing over his ribs and down his flanks. “Mmm... it is a terrible distraction right now.”

“You had me in this bed earlier. Still hungry?”

“I think you are the hungry one this time. Especially when you make.... ohhhh.... such a concerted effort to... d-d-distract me.”

“Oh, am I distracting you?” Bard burrowed lower under the covers until his lips brushed a kiss just above Thran’s stirring cock. Before Thran could moan, his cock slipped between soft lips into a warm, wet refuge.

“Suka blyad, you bastard!” Thran gasped, his fingers clenching on Bard’s shoulders. “This time, it is you who does not fight fair!”

Bard hummed deep in his throat, sending the most delicious vibrations through Thran’s cock before Bard loosed him. “Better do something about it, angel. You’re about to get nailed.”

Thran flailed arms from under the bedding, groping for the drawer of his nightside table that held the lubricant, but he couldn’t pull away from Bard’s arms wrapped around his hips. “Ty grebanyy huiesos, I can’t reach the –”

“Under my pillow. Better hurry.”

“Ty sukin syn!” Thran scuffled through the pillows, found the tube, slicked his hands, and groped frantically under the covers to slather the stuff over himself. Bard crawled up his body, giving him just seconds to grab Bard’s cock with his slippery hands before Bard was inside. But that wasn’t the end of it. When Thran wrapped his legs around his lover’s body and pulled him close, Bard took one of Thran’s ankles in hand and pushed it higher.

“Behind your shoulder. I know you can do that.”

Oh, his bastard of a lover had done his yoga homework, hadn’t he? Thran stretched his leg behind his shoulder. “You want both of them comme ça, yes?”

“Yes. Very much comme ça.”

“Be gentle. The angle is intense –”

“Good.” Bard took his other ankle in hand.

“Idi k chertu,” Thran gasped, as that angle grew more extreme. To be spread open so wide and filled so completely... even the slightest motion sent waves of pleasure sweeping through him. “Oh, gods, ty grebanyy huiesos!”

“If that means you like being fucked like this, you’re welcome.”

“It does not!” Thran hissed, worming his other leg behind his shoulder. “It means –”

Bard swallowed whatever Thran was about to say in a deep kiss, full of invading tongue and nipping teeth. “Shh, my angel. I know you want more; I know. I’ll do anything you want, I promise. No matter how much it takes to satisfy a greedy, insatiable, demanding angel...”

Bard had Thran’s wrists in his hands, held fast over Thran’s head, effectively locking his legs in place. Gods, who knew that his gentle saint would acquire such a taste for mastering the Prince of Ice? Who knew the Prince of Ice would revel in that mastery? Bard swallowed more of Thran’s curses in another kiss, humming as he stroked.

“Gods, you were right, Thran. The angle is extreme. So intense. Gods, so, so intense. You’re so open... so perfect... oh, gods...”

There was nothing to do but go along for the ride, a ride that grew more overwhelming, more compelling with each teasing, slow stroke, until Thran was taut and gasping for release. Just as consumed, Bard slowed, slowed, slowed, holding himself on the edge of release for the longest seconds, before finally spasming hard. He groped for Thran’s cock, but just his touch was enough to drive Thran over the edge. Bard held him as their orgasms wracked them, pressing kisses against Thran’s jaw.

“Mmm. Much better,” Bard sighed. Thran didn’t need light to see the grin that was plastered on Bard’s face. His tone of voice conveyed it without apology. “That might help me from being distracted tomorrow morning. Maybe. Though maybe I distracted you a little bit.”

Thran sighed as Bard eased first one foot from behind Thran’s head, then the other. He wrapped his legs around Bard’s hips as they calmed.

“The things you do to me, you bastard. This time, you have trashed me,” Thran exhaled gustily. “I have to get in the shower again to clean away all this mess.”

“I trashed both of us. Come on.”

They ducked into the shower again, using the handheld sprayer to keep the water out of their hair, dried quickly, and dashed back to bed. Despite their speed, Thran still shivered, so Bard gathered him close and curled around his back when they piled under the sheets again.

“So you still want me to watch your barre tomorrow morning?” Bard teased sleepily, stroking Thran’s shoulder.

Thran snorted in mock annoyance. “Perhaps I should tie you to the garden bench before I begin.
That might slow you down.”

“It might excite you to do something else, too.”

Thran chuckled, interested despite himself. “It might. I make no promises of forbearance or mercy.”

“How am I supposed to sleep now?”

“If we do not, consider how grouchy we will be tomorrow to make the children’s lunches on three hours’ sleep.”

“Good answer. You were sweet to indulge me, cariad.”

Thran enjoyed a satisfied smile as he shut his eyes. “I was. And you rewarded my sweetness with spice. It was delicious.”

“So were you. Love you.”

“I love you, too, lyubov moya.”

Thran relaxed as the warm body behind his eased towards sleep, taking his with it.

* * *

Once Thran and Bard saw the children onto the bus, Bard turned towards home with a sense of anticipation. Today he would finally get to see Thran in his element. Today he would have full measure of the rigors of that graceful art as revealed to him by one of the world’s best practitioners. He followed Thran upstairs to change into comfortable sweat pants and a sweater, while Thran donned his practice wear. They paused in the kitchen only long enough to make a pot of tea, then Bard followed Thran with the tea tray into the ballroom.

Bard set the tray down on the garden table at the end of the ballroom. “Where will I be out of the way?”

“Anywhere you are comfortable,” Thran waved a hand as he put his water bottle and towel on the floor by the barre, then his computer on the garden bench. “I am used to being stared at, so it does not matter.”

“What, do the other dancers ogle you?” Bard joked, but Thran had started to turn inward, focusing on what was to come, and did not joke back.

“We all look at each other, but not to ogle. To study the technique, the turn of a leg, the position of an arm... and of course the dance master always looks at us, to correct and improve.”

“Oh,” Bard held up a hand. “I’m sorry, Thran. I forgot my sketchbook. I thought that while you practice the dance, I’d practice the drawing, so I’ll be ready to look sculptor-like tomorrow.”

Thran grinned. “Prudent. I will wait.”

“Won’t be a tick.” Bard trotted back to the main room where so many odds and ends still remained to be sorted out. His box of long-neglected art supplies was among the clutter, and for the first time in a long time, he opened it with anticipation. How long had it been since he last sketched anything?
Years. He’d given it up long ago because the ache of neglecting his artwork had threatened to engulf him, and the children had needed him too much for him to give in to his grief. There were his pencils, cached in an old cloth flatware roll. There was his box of pastels, and the other of charcoal sticks. There were his old watercolour box and brushes, not that he’d used them much, even while he’d been working. Maybe Tilda was old enough to use them? He’d think about that. Yes, underneath the lot was a trio of sketchbooks. He grabbed the lot and his pencils, and trotted back to Thran, not wanting to keep his lover waiting.

Thran had begun to stretch, little more than walking about the ballroom, lengthening arms and legs, flexing feet and hands, rolling his neck. Bard settled cross-legged on the floor against the wall, facing the barre, deciding that would give him the best view of the proceedings.

“So. I begin.” Thran said softly, and took his place at the barre. “Every day, six days a week, the day begins this way. One hour and a bit more, to warm the body, to prepare for rehearsal in the afternoon, and then performance in the evening. This is the dancer’s meditation, to refine and perfect technique, to correct problems, to have the master identify things that perhaps the dancer does not see and should. It is done in a room full of people, but is private at the same time. Depending on a dancer’s role during the rest of the day, he or she may work very hard, or not so much. This is the time to work out something, if needed, or to try something new. No one need look pristine or perfect at the barre. That is reserved for performance, of course, and often rehearsal.”

Bard nodded understanding. Thran went on to describe how barre work began slowly with basic bends and stretches, progressed to footwork and armwork, then advanced to steps and turns, saving the most energetic moves, the jumps, for the end. He explained how the masters and instructors worked, calling the sequence of moves to follow. The steps and positions never changed, but the sequence changed every day, to keep the dancers’ bodies properly warmed to address the day’s demand. He also explained that the fortunate companies had a pianist to provide live music every day, because the dancers’ bodies were attuned to address the music, and it was best not to get used to a static piece played on a CD or tape.

“After all,” Thran shrugged, as he bent and limbered, “we dance to live music during performance each night, yes? So it is best to practice that way, too.”

“Makes perfect sense,” Bard agreed.

“So I thought the best way to give you the sense of the class is to show you one in two ways. There are several on the Internet, so I have chosen one so you can watch it and me as I follow it, and also you will see how much the music adds, and how the instructor works.”

“They have classes on the Internet?” Bard’s eyebrows went up.

Thran shrugged. “Many companies struggle. To show the life of a dancer is a good way to raise awareness, and to generate interest in upcoming performances. I like to see what different companies do for professional reasons, and to see how various instructors and masters work.”

“So is this one of your favorite classes that you do over and over?” Bard asked.

Thran shook his head as he opened his laptop and found the class video he wanted. He brought the laptop to Bard and set it beside him on the floor. “I chose one from a good company, but a class I have not seen before, so that you get the proper sense of me not knowing exactly what to expect. So start it as you will, and we will begin. It will last about seventy-five minutes.”

Bard did as directed, and soon the sound of the instructor calling out instructions mostly in French began. Thran had told him that the names of all the positions and steps were in French, because ballet had originated in France. Bard looked from the screen to Thran and back over and over, marveling that Thran’s steps exactly matched what the dancers were doing in the video. The instructor called out long chains of incomprehensible steps – even if he’d known the movements associated with each term, he didn’t think he could remember the right sequence of steps as easily as the dancers did. Thran might never have seen this video, but he performed everything in the correct sequence, over and over again.

After some minutes, once Bard had the sense of what the class space looked like, and the variety of clothing dancers wore, he looked less at the computer screen and more at Thran, contrasting what he saw on the video and what he saw before him. Thran wore just as many layers of tights and leg warmers and tops and sweaters as any dancer, but he catered to his image as the Prince of Ice, sticking to his preferred palette of creams, whites, and greys; and unfussy, sleek lines. Even his hair was sleek, held in a braid wrapped around his head, with a white scarf at his forehead to keep the braid in place.

They were a quarter of the way through the video before Bard remembered his sketchpad. He propped the medium-sized one up against his knees and emptied his mind, trying to recall what it was like to sketch again. The first tentative traces of pencil on paper were little more than scrawls, but that was always the case, and he ignored them. How to capture the fluidity of a dancer in constant motion on static paper? How to convey the paradox of mortal flesh and bone turned lyrical and evanescent? He held his brain above the question, for it was not for his brain to answer, but for his fingers on the pencil and the pencil on the paper.

By the time the video class turned to jumps, Bard’s hand had recalled its skill, and he sketched rapidly. It was one thing to see little figures performing such moves on a small computer laptop screen, and another to see all six feet and five inches of Thran execute the same moves in front of him. Even though Bard was close enough to see the sweat dotted on Thran’s forehead, hear the power of his breathing, and see the concentration in his grey eyes, it was still more ethereal than labored. The culmination of so much preparation – the turns, the spins, the twirls, and finally the grande jeté – was stunning in the power that it required, as well as the beauty of its execution. When the video ended, Bard didn’t hesitate to applaud.

“That was the most stunning thing I’ve ever seen,” he admitted. “Even more than Bobby Orr skating backwards against three attackers and holding them off with one hand.”

Thran grinned and offered the same elegant bow he made at the end of a performance on the stage. “Thank you, lyubov moya. That is high praise from a hockey fan. Did you understand everything? What can I explain?”

“I understand what’s involved, though I never realized dancers needed such good short term memory. How you remember all the sequences the instructor calls out is more than I can do.”

Thran shrugged. “Long practice. We learn the names of steps as children, and some sequences are typical and familiar. So, now I am properly warmed and stretched, and ready to begin work.”

Bard shook his head. “That’d put me right down for a nap, but you, it just gets ready to work. What comes next?”

“If I were in rehearsal, I would have a fifteen minute break, and then go to work. But as I am not in rehearsal, I will do the yoga. That is my preferred method of refinement. Pilates is also good. Many dancers even work with weights. Modern companies offer many ways for a dancer to stay healthy and strong.”

“What does the yoga do for you?”
“It focuses on balance, mental and physical. It also provides the strength and flexibility training that I prefer. It can be very invigorating, such as when I practice the back bends, or very calming, such as when I practice the headstand. It is flexible enough to accommodate what the day brings me.”

“So what does today bring you?”

Thran smiled. “I think that since tomorrow will bring me ballet, and mostly legs, today I will do inversions. Upside down things, good for balance, good for arms and shoulders.”

Thran slipped back into his inward reverie as he began his yoga. This was done on a mat for the most part, and barefooted. Was the temperature warm enough for such efforts? When he ventured to ask, Thran murmured that it was fine, so Bard lapsed back into silence, not wanting to intrude. The slower movements of the yoga offered Bard more chances to do fuller studies on his sketchpad, and he took advantage of that, seeing just how few strokes he needed to convey the position and the attitude of the poser. Before long, he understood why Thran liked yoga so much – it was another form of dance, albeit a slower one, and each pose held as much beauty as any ballet jeté or plié. By the time Thran settled a blanket over his mat, Bard was entranced.

“So what?” he asked.

Grinning, Thran sat down on the blanket-covered mat and pulled another over his legs. He removed his headscarf and unwrapped his braid. “Every yoga student’s favorite pose. Savasana. Corpse pose. The ten minutes of peace at the end of every class. It is quiet and restoring.”

“Okay,” Bard nodded. “Nighty-night.”

Thran snickered as he lay down and pulled the top blanket up to his shoulders. As he shut his eyes, Bard imagined him communing with the spirits of past yogis and dancers. Had Yoda ever wandered through those exalted realms? The little Jedi master was a guru if ever there was one. Bard smothered a smile – imagine Yoda doing either ballet or yoga!

Bard sketched quietly while Thran completed his internal communion. So much of what he’d seen today was worth sketching, and he’d filled many pages with his impressions and studies. But in the silence, what came to him to sketch was not a yoga or ballet pose. As he drew first one study, then another at a different angle, then another at a third, what came from his fingers was something else again. He let it come, keeping his mind out of it, letting only memory and internal vision guide his hands. As he worked, as the welder and night super melted away, the sculptor came back to claim its rightful place in Bard’s life, and something settled.

He knew what the first piece he’d create would be when he went out to the barn again. He knew.

He was whole again.
Chapter 39

Chapter Summary

The angel dances, and the saint draws.

Chapter Notes

Charisse is named for the glorious Cyd Charisse, dancer extraordinaire. If you don't know who this lady was, go find out. Think Fred Astaire, Gene Kelly, Leslie Caron, Ann Miller, and my absolute favorite, Vera-Ellen. Cyd's the gorgeously seductive dragon lady in Gene Kelly's long dance sequence in "Singin' in the Rain." Yeah. The one in the green dress with the smoke coming out of her nose. She was one of the best!

As Thran roused from his restorative Savasana, he considered fingers and toes, hands and feet, arms and legs, neck and shoulders, and then the core of his body. Yes, all was well, supple and strong. This was the best he’d felt since before he’d hurt his ankle two months ago. It wouldn’t take much more before he was back in trim, ready for the rigors of rehearsal and performance again. Despite the hours of work that entailed, he looked forward to it eagerly – no, more than eagerly. He craved it. How he had missed the daily classes, the constant refinement, the continual striving for perfection in each gesture, each step. His first audition was a week from tomorrow. It was not the audition he was most interested in, but it was with a reputable company, if more traditional than he wanted at this stage of his career. If nothing else, it would be good practice for the auditions that followed it.

The only thing he regretted about returning to dancing full time was the time he’d be away from Bard, the children, and the house. So much work was progressing, and he wished he could be a bigger part of it, even if he didn’t know much about painting or sanding or all the other things that Bard did so competently. But Bard was as eager for him to be healthy and happy again as he danced, and the renovation would not go on forever. Soon enough, his saint would be just as busy at his art as Thran was at his, and there would be balance.

He rolled to his side and sat up, folding himself cross-legged on his mat for a few moments of pranayama breathing. When he felt calm and centered, he opened his eyes.

Bard sat quietly against the wall, sketching. He looked so focused, so inward, that Thran held his breath, not wanting to disturb his reverie. Something had happened, something profound, and whatever it was, Thran was content to watch Bard from under his lashes. Let Bard think Thran still meditated, so that whatever muse had taken him would release him as she would, without interruption from a dancer.

“It’s all right,” Bard said softly. “You don’t have to sit still. Do what you need to do to stay warm.”

“May I see?” Thran asked just as softly, because the moment didn’t call for more.

“If you’d like to.”
Thran eased out of his blankets, pulled on another sweater and a second pair of socks, then crawled over to Bard, still sketching. He nestled at Bard’s right side, curling an arm around Bard’s waist and putting his chin on Bard’s shoulder to watch his lover complete his sketch. There was Thran, sitting like a Buddha with a blanket draped over his shoulders, braid tracing down one side of his neck. Bard had a very minimal drawing style, almost like the sparsest Chinese brush painting, but despite the few strokes, the subject of the sketch was clear. One hand peeked outside the blanket to rest on one knee, palm turned downward, fingers slightly curled, but still sensually draped. Just a few lines defined facial features, but the angle of the cheekbones, the fall and drape of the braid, the slight angle of the neck – all were unmistakably Thran. It was worthy of a frame, and a place on any wall.

“May I see the rest?”

Bard flipped back through nearly twenty pages of his sketchbook. The first one or two were not much more than scribbles, or perhaps they were to refine the edge of the pencil to Bard’s liking, but the rest were expressive, evocative. Bard let Thran page through them as he would, and he did so slowly – here he was in a simple plié, and there he was in a split. Another was just a torso with one arm half done and the other fully rendered, down to the fingernails – that was exactly how he curled his middle finger the merest hair more than the others. Standing at the barre in fifth position, one hand on the barre, the other curved above his head, arching back. So many more, some the merest few lines in the margins of larger sketches, just a hand or a foot or a nape, and others finely detailed. The yoga poses followed – first a loose Utanasana, standing forward bend, where his chest rested on his thighs and his arms wrapped around his calves and ankles. Then Virabhadrasana, Warrior I, II, and III, all requiring strength in the hips and glutei, and flexibility in the psoas. Sirsasana, headstand. Ahdo Mukha Vrksanana, handstand. Several handstand variations followed, even Legolas’s favorite Vrschikasana, Scorpion, each drawn with calm confidence.

“It is good that you are not a dancer,” Thran said.

Bard glanced at him askance. “Why?”

“Because, lyubov moya, if you were as good a dancer as you are an artist, I would have serious competition. These are marvelous.”

Bard snickered. “You haven’t seen much artwork, then.”

“Yes, I have. All over the world, I have seen artwork, from the worst to the best. I know the hand of a master when I see it.”

Bard didn’t make the joke Thran expected, about either of them mastering the other so deliciously in bed. Instead, he pressed a kiss on Thran’s cheek. “Thank you, cariad.”

Thran kept paging through Bard’s sketchbook, pausing when he got to the pages that preceded the sketch of him meditating. These pages revealed something far different than ballet and yoga sketches.

“What are these?”

Bard smiled. It was his familiar affectionate expression, but with a noticeable change. The faint sadness that had always lurked in his warm brown eyes, regardless of everything else, had eased.

“They’re studies for my next sculpture. I hope you’ll sit for me to refine them.”

Thran leafed through the next four pages, each one full of different versions of the same image, over and over again - an angel with long hair flying around his head in a corona, and magnificent wings fully extended on high as they backwinged, and one toe stretched towards the earth, one split moment before alighting. Before him was the smaller figure of a man lying nearly prone, looking up, one hand outstretched in longing.

“Oh, lyubov moya,” Thran whispered, leaning his head against Bard’s. “I do not know what to say.”

“Does it bother you?”

“Is that how you look at me?”

Bard rubbed Thran’s thigh, and cocked his head to consider his sketches. “It was, that first morning, when you flew down the stairs like Rahmiel.”

“Rahmiel?”

“The angel of mercy and love.”

Thran put his arms around Bard’s shoulders and nestled his nose in the crook of Bard’s neck, just where it joined his shoulder. “I am not nearly so glorious, Bard, and you are not nearly so small.”

Bard’s right hand snaked around Thran’s ribs, hugging him close. “You were that morning, and I was that morning. I’ve never seen anything that looked like you did that day. I never will again.”

“When you make such a thing, I will never let you sell it. Never.”

“I will never offer it for sale.”

“Good.”

“So will you pose for me?”

“I will.”

“Thank you.”

“You are welcome.”

Bard chuckled at their tender formality. “Be glad I have a few months of renovations to do, then. It’ll be warm when you pose.”

“Oh, am I to pose in the nude, then?” Thran looked up, laughing.

“Of course. There is no raiment that could do my angel justice.”

“Hmm,” Thran smirked. “Not even a fig leaf?”

“This isn’t a Biblical allegory.”

“Do angels have genitals, lyubov moya?”

“Mine does. Quite delightful ones. Would you prefer this not to have any? Because if you do, you’ll be disappointed.”

“As long as the phallus does not present as erect.”

Bard laughed. “That wasn’t the kind of glorious I intended to convey.”

“Ah. Then I will have some privacy.”
“May it always be so. Now, while you shower, I’ll sort out lunch. Any preferences?”

“I think I will merely change into dry clothes. I expect to be back here this afternoon, so I will wait until tonight to bathe.”

“Want to try the soaking tub tonight?” Bard suggested, smiling.

“I did consider it. But given that tomorrow I want to be at my best, I prefer we christen the tub tomorrow.”

“ Impressions at class tomorrow are important, then?”

Thran nodded. “Word will pass as to my fitness. I want to leave no doubts about it.”

“Then take it easy this afternoon. And soak in the tub if it’ll help; that’s what it’s there for. I can offer you a massage, too. Whatever will help you to be at your best tomorrow.”

Thran’s arms tightened around Bard’s shoulders. “I am the most blessed of angels.”

“You deserve it,” Bard shrugged, climbing to his feet and offering Thran a hand up. “Speaking of deserving, while you’re in here this afternoon, I’ll get Legolas’s walls patched. The lad probably thinks he’s Cinderella, as battered as his room is compared to the other children’s rooms. He deserves better as fast as I can deliver it.”

“He understands.”

“I hope he doesn’t have to for long. His room’s in just about the worst shape in the house.”

“Only on the surface. He did choose it, remember.”

“True. So, back to lunch. What would you like?”

“What is left?”

“Let’s see.”

They perused the refrigerator, deciding on the last of the soup Bard had made Saturday. Bard busied himself with the preparation while Thran changed into something warmer, then they sat down to a hot meal. They talked about tomorrow’s class, and where they’d go afterwards to look for wedding rings. After cleaning up, they went upstairs to look at Legolas’s walls, and Bard showed Thran how to spackle the dings and dents while he cut a patch for the gaping hole.

“This is not so bad,” Thran ventured, scraping off the excess goo with a putty knife.

“No, this is easy. Leave a little extra; the stuff can shrink a bit as it dries, so it’s faster to put on a little more and sand it flat after it dries, rather than to take off too much and have to put on another coat.”

“Ah,” Thran acknowledged, eyeing the gouge he’d just filled. He slathered a little more on it, and smoothed it with his putty knife. “So this dries, and then the primer, and then the color?”

“For the walls, yes. Unfortunately, I’ve got to strip the woodwork before I paint anything.” He rubbed the wooden trim around the doorway, pointing out the uneven surface. “This is what the whole house looked like when we moved in. Stripping woodwork is nasty, so the previous owners never did. They just slapped on another thick coat of paint. So all this has to be cleaned off before I paint anything.”
Thran catalogued the baseboard molding, the crown molding, the window and doorway trim. “This is a lot of woodwork.”

Bard shook his head, exhaling. “It is. It’ll take at least a full day to get it done, if not two, even with a chemical stripper. Legolas shouldn’t sleep in here while I do that, so I’ll move his bed into the children’s study for the duration. It’ll be inconvenient, but at least he won’t have to sleep in the midst of a construction site. I hope he’s patient. We’re out tomorrow, so I won’t start until at least Wednesday.”

“We will explain this at supper, so that all the children understand that you work as fast as you can.”

“Do you think Legolas would like to help paint, as Sigrid did? It’s okay if he doesn’t, but if he wants to help, he can when I get to that point. Just on the weekends. Schoolwork comes first the rest of the time.”

“I agree. We will say this at supper, too.”

“We’ll put it to both of the boys and Tilda. I’m less interested that they do a lot, and more that they understand what goes into it. They’ll need to know one day.”

“So this is Bard’s trade school, yes?” Thran smiled, wielding his putty knife on the next hole. “To educate dancers and children on the rigors of home repair.”

“So far, the dancers and children have been good students,” Bard quipped, grinning. “There. At least the big hole is repaired, and the joint compound’s setting. So now it’s a patched garret, not a ventilated garret.”

“I’m sure Legolas will appreciate the difference,” Thran agreed. “So, I have done this wall.”

“Looks good. That’s the last of it. Since I won’t start on the woodwork today, I’ll see if the walls in Tilda’s and Bain’s rooms need any work, then ours, so I keep moving ahead.”

“It is all coming together well, Bard,” Thran assured him as he helped Bard carry the patching materials to Tilda’s room. “It will all be done soon.”

“I’ll feel better when the children’s rooms are in good shape. They’ll all settle a little more when their sanctuaries are settled. Now, go dance, cariad. I’ll handle the rest of the spackling.”

Thran kissed Bard’s hair. “So I will go. See you soon.”

“Happy dancing.”

As Thran changed into clean dance attire for his afternoon work, he smiled. How many other ballet dancers learned to patch old walls between workouts? Likely few of his colleagues were interested in such things. But Thran was glad to learn, if only for what it meant – he no longer existed in an echoingly empty apartment, but lived in a home, one that harbored his husband and their children. That was worth the struggle to scrub dry spackling off his fingers, and more.

* * *

It didn’t take long to finish spackling the Tilda’s room, then Bain’s, then his and Thran’s room. The one that took so long, though, was the children’s bathroom. If Bard didn’t have so much to do on the children’s rooms, he would have started with this one. The tile needed work, and the old walls were dinged, dented, and gouged. He spent as much time slathering spackling over these walls and ceiling as he did patching all the holes in Legolas’s room. But eventually he got all of the damage filled.

When he finished, it was time to head downstairs to put on a pot of chili for tomorrow’s supper. It’d simmer until everyone went to bed tonight, so it’d be ready to warm when Bard and Thran got home from the city tomorrow. It had just started to smell good when the children came in from school, and the rush was on to start dinner. Thran came in from the ballroom, and dashed quickly upstairs to change to into warmer clothes so that he could help. The children were settling in well at the Imladris Academy, and the conversation over supper was rife with references to one class or another. Beside Bard, Tilda was her usual quiet self, listening to the other children talking back and forth, so Bard leaned towards her.

“What about your day, little doll? What happened that was interesting?”

She chose a carrot stick and chewed thoughtfully. “My reading class.”

“What about your reading class?”

“Miss Othmar asked if any of us knew what a metaphor was. I was the only one who raised my hand. So when she called on me, I said that the metaphor in the story was a broken heart, because the boy didn’t really have a broken heart, he just missed his dog. Miss Othmar looked surprised, and asked how I knew what a metaphor was, and I said that we read a lot at our house, and that you and Sigrid had explained it to me. I don’t think she quite believed me, because she asked me to give her another example. So I said blanket of air, apple of my eye, couch potato, and early bird. I guess she believed me then.”

Sigrid laughed, but she looked proudly at her sister. “Of course you knew, Til! That was when I had it in my English class, and I didn’t understand it, so we talked about it at supper. Remember how we thought up different metaphors for the next three days?”

“That was fun!” Bain snickered. “It sure made homework a breeze when I got to it in my English class!”

“Well said,” Bard said with a grin, amid the laughter Bain’s metaphor had garnered.

“Remember the fun we had doing collective nouns?” Sigrid said. “Flock of seagulls, herd of horses, gaggle of geese...”

“A skein of geese, too,” Legolas added, getting into the spirit of the game.

“A murder of crows,” Thran said in a deep, menacing voice, wiggling his eyebrows as he took a piece of red pepper from the communal veg plate.

“Ooh, those are good ones!” Sigrid grinned. “Remember your favorite one, Til?”

“A parliament of owls,” she said primly, eyes wide like an owl’s eyes were, then giggled. “We made a long list of them. I wish we still had it.”

“I think we do, little doll.” Bard rubbed his neck, trying to recall where it had ended up in the move. “It’s likely still in one of the boxes in the main room. We’ll have to look for it.”

“When we do, we can put it on the fridge door like we used to,” Bain suggested, mouth full of broccoli. When Bard and Thran both shot him a look, he swallowed hastily. “And add that murder one. I’ve never heard that one before.”

“What about a clowder of cats?” Legolas offered. “Did you have that one?”

“I don’t think so,” Bain said. “We’ll add that one, too.”

“Let’s look after supper,” Tilda said.

“Homework first, please,” Bard said, an instant before Thran did. “I know, it’s more fun to come up with collective nouns, but it’s important to learn other stuff, too. So after clean up, it’s homework. Maybe it’ll be the breeze Bain thinks it is.”

That met with a chorus of groans, as well as Thran’s laughter.

“Okay, all. Just a word about tomorrow,” Bard went on. “Thran’s going to class tomorrow, and he’s taking me with him. We’ve got a few errands to run in the city after, so we might not get home until just before you do. Whose turn is it to be in charge tomorrow?”

“Legolas,” came the chorus.

“Okay, Legolas,” Bard continued. “Snacks are okay, clean up after yourselves, start on your homework. There’s a pot of chili in the fridge, so Sig, you and Bain second Legolas if it gets late and you have to start supper. Sig’s in charge of the stove. Any questions?”

“Are we allowed to eat the brownies?” Legolas asked immediately. He’d quickly become addicted to Bard’s confections.

“You have to leave eight for lunches the next day. Share the rest out equally. If there aren’t an even number to go around, then cut them in pieces until there are. Unless you can stand to leave the extras in the pan.”

“Okay,” Legolas agreed, trading anticipatory glances with Bain, who was just as enamored with brownies.

“We have a renovation update, too,” Thran supplied. “Bard patched all the walls in our bedrooms and your bathroom today. So Legolas, that big hole in your wall is no more. I take Bard with me to observe class tomorrow so that he knows what that is about, so he will not do more tomorrow. But after that, he must do nasty things to your woodwork to restore it, so we will move your bed into the children’s study Wednesday so that you do not have to endure the smell and mess of that. It will take a few days to fix all the things your room needs, but after that it will be very nice. So I ask you to be patient, and I ask Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda to be, too, while Legolas’s room is under repair. I think it only fair that we respect the study as Legolas’s room while he is there, just as we will respect it as Bain’s room or Tilda’s room as Bard’s efforts progress. This is clear?”

“Yes, Father, yes, Ada, yes, Thran,” went around the table.

“That means that this table becomes homework central again, once I start on Legolas’s room,” Bard continued. “So tomorrow when you get home from school, if there are things in your study that you need for your homework, bring them down here so you’ll have them without interrupting Legolas. You can put the stuff in the solarium for now.”

“Okay, Da, yes, Bard,” went around the table again.

“Thanks for taking it all in stride. It won’t be long before your rooms will be in good shape. Now, who wants dessert?”
Later that night, Thran did opt to try out the soaking tub, but only when Bard prodded him. As they helped the children with homework, Bard noticed that Thran moved a little stiffly, so he dispatched him upstairs to soak. He didn’t have to work very hard to do so, which said something about how hard Thran had worked all afternoon. Bard stayed in the sitting room, available for the children’s questions as needed, listening to quiet music and looking at the book he’d gotten Tilda for Christmas, admiring the illustrations. He had both the boys in for questions about their math class, which he managed to muddle through. That wouldn’t be true for much longer; they’d have to rely on Sigrid before long. Tilda brought her map of Africa to show him how many countries weren’t much older than she was, then she was ready for a story. After a quick one, she headed upstairs to bathe, and the older children cycled through after her. Before long, the schoolbooks and papers were tucked into backpacks, lunch bags sat ready for the morning, and everyone was ready for bed.

Bard headed upstairs to check on Thran. He chuckled to find the tall dancer still curled in the huge, steaming tub, blissfully relaxed in the water.

“I take it you like the tub,” Bard grinned. He sniffed. “What’s that smell?”

“The tub is divine. The smell is a drop or two of the oil I put on my hair. I like the scent.”

“Very nice,” Bard agreed. “The children have finished their homework, and I think Sig’s the last one in the bathroom, if you want to wish them goodnight.”

“Of course. That is my pleasure.” Thran gathered himself up to stand up. Bard’s mouth watered at his angel’s pale alabaster skin and long, slender body as he rose out of the water. As he handed Thran his towel, his lover turned the slightest bit more pink, and looked at him through lowered lashes. “Hmm, how you look at me, lyubov moy. I am abashed.”

“Nothing does that,” Bard grinned. “For which I am eternally grateful. As for how I look at you, you know what you look like, and you know how I love you.”

“I do.” Thran rubbed his face with the towel before he stretched out a hand to stroke Bard’s cheek. “I am grateful for such looks, nevertheless.”

Bard and Thran soon made the rounds of the children to wish them good night, then Bard washed and slipped into bed with Thran. His angel still had on his warm Henley, but slipped it off when Bard lay beside him. They snuggled together to warm each other.

“Ready for tomorrow?” Bard murmured, stroking Thran’s hair.

“I am,” Thran sighed. “Please do not take this as a slight, Bard. I am eager to get back to the dance. I have missed it.”

“I understand. I’m eager to get back to the metal, too, but the renovation is almost as good. When we’re both back doing what we love, it’ll be great.”

“I do not know how you endured going so long without working your metal,” Thran whispered. “I would have died.”

“You would have done whatever it took to care for Legolas.”

“Yes, but for ten years... you are so strong, my saint. And something of you came back this morning, while you sketched.”

Bard nodded. A knot settled in his throat, but it was a good one. “The muse never went away. She was right there, the second I started to sketch. And when she gave me Rahmiel, that was her forgiving me for not being able to listen to her for ten years.”

“Because she understood why you couldn’t. Because you cared for Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda.”

“Maybe so. And tomorrow, your muse will grace you, too.”

“Mine was patient as I healed. So tomorrow, all will be well.”

“It already is.”

Thran chuckled softly, all but asleep. “So it is. Good night, my saint. I love you.”

“I love you, too, angel.”

Bard shut his eyes, and was asleep two heartbeats later.

* * *

How strange was it to climb into the front passenger’s seat of Thran’s SUV? Bard couldn’t remember the last time he’d been in a vehicle where he wasn’t in the driver’s seat. Today, though, it was his place to ride shotgun beside a tall, pale ballet dancer. That would be his place all day – he was with Thran to learn something of his lover’s world, and to support Thran as needed. He glanced at Thran as he settled into his seat and fastened the safety belt, but his lover was calm as he pulled out of the driveway and headed down the road.

In case Thran liked to contemplate his coming class in silence, Bard sat wordlessly and watched the scenery go by. Once they were on the highway, his silence won him a sideways glance and smile from his lover.

“So quiet, my saint.”

Bard grinned. “I thought you might appreciate the chance to settle yourself without me nattering.”

“This is only class, Bard. A familiar and comfortable thing.”

Bard nodded. “I’m eager to see it for myself. Will there be a live pianist, as there was in the video you showed me?”

“There will. And Monsieur LePied will be just as staccato in his directions. Unlike Olga, the instructor you saw in the video, he does not smile so much. It means nothing, his frown. That is just how he concentrates.”

“Will there be anyone else watching, or just me?”

“There may be. All I ask of you is that you do not talk during the class out of respect for the instructor and the dancers, but I know that you will be the height of courtesy.”

“Maybe this is a silly question, but will there be any... questions about why I’m there? Or...”

“Or speculation of what you are to me?” Thran grinned. “Likely. Dancers are a gossipy lot. I hope someone asks me why I am in the company of such a handsome man, just so that I have the pleasure to tell him that you are the talented sculptor who happens to be my husband.”
A silly smirk would not stay off Bard’s face. “Um. I guess I’d better figure out how to act sculptor-like, then.”

Thran snickered. “If it is anything like what you looked like yesterday morning while you sketched, then you will look formidable.”

They lapsed into silence for the rest of the ride into the city. Thran drove through the crowded streets with confidence, finding them a parking spot just a block from the studio. Bard shouldered his bag of sketchpads and pencils and fell into step with Thran, similarly burdened with his bag of dance gear. Several people called out a welcome to Thran, who replied with smiles and waves, and even a few hugs and the funny air kisses that Bard disliked so much. But when Thran offered them, they were exotically European. Thran was already in his dance attire, so he led Bard through the maze of hallways to a large studio space where the class would be held. He sought out the instructor directly, exchanging pleasantries in French, then drew Bard forward to introduce him.

“Bard, may I introduce Monsieur LePied, the senior instructor here? Monsieur LePied, this is Bard Bowman, my husband.”

Bard shook hands with the master, who was very small and slender, with a shock of wild grey atop his head that seemed more dandelion puff than hair, and black eyes that measured him as precisely as they did dancers. “A pleasure, Monsieur.”

“Thran says you are a sculptor, oui? Here to sketch?”

“Yes, sir. I appreciate you granting me the opportunity to observe your class.”

“You have great appreciation of the dance, then?”

Bard decided honesty was the best policy. “I’m an admirer, though most of what I know about it I learned from the work of Edgar Degas, Henri Toulouse-Lautrec, and Pierre-Auguste Renoir in art school, and now Thran. It’ll be a treat to see more dancers for myself, rather than just in beautiful paintings.”

“I hope so. You are welcome, as long as you remain quiet and out of the way.”

“Of course. Thank you.”

The instructor moved away to speak to someone else, so Bard offered Thran a wry look. “Where is out of the way?”

Thran nodded to the long wall without mirrors. There were a few chairs there, and a few portable barres that were not in use. “There would be best. Though be ready when the barres in the middle of the room are moved out of the way. They will be put with the others on that side.”

Bard nodded. “I’ll keep out of the way. So forget about me for the next hour and then some, angel. Think about class.”

Thran gave him a quirk of a smile. “So I shall. We will reconvene afterwards.”

Bard returned the expression with a wink, and stood watching as Thran carried his bag of gear to a spot along the wall. He set out his water bottle and towel, took off his leather jacket, and looked in the mirror to wrap his braid around his head and tie his scarf around his forehead. Then he began the slow warmup Bard had seen yesterday, gently coaxing his body towards movement. They had arrived some fifteen or twenty minutes early, so several dancers came up to speak to Thran, both men and women. Bard found it amusing that many continued to warm up as they conversed, legs and arms extending into stretches, ankles and shoulders and wrists rolling, necks and torsos bending this way and that. Several of the ballerinas banged point shoes on the floor, and one or two sewed ribbons into place. As far as Bard could tell, Thran’s presence was met with appreciation and pleasure, without any envy or malice that he recognized. He took off his coat and scarf, using them to pad the hard folding chair he claimed as a perch and sat down. He had just time to get out his sketchpad and pencils before Monsieur LePied called the class to order.

At first, Bard let the sights, sounds, and smells of the class wash over him. The riot of different clothing covered the gamut from the plain dark blue tights and shirt of one male dancer to neon pinks and lime greens of a few ballerinas. One black dancer cut a dashing figure in grey tights, a black vee neck shirt, and a black and white patterned scarf wrapped around his waist like a cummerbund, though it was as likely in place to keep his back warm rather than a stylistic addition to his costume. Several of the dancers, particularly the ballerinas, wore quilted down vests. One ballerina wore just one wildly striped leg warmer on her left thigh. Another wore red and white striped leggings, looking like a sprightly candy cane.

Thran stood quietly in his simple pale grey tights and ruched leg warmers, two layers of darker grey tops, a red cotton scarf wrapped several times around his neck, and a loose white knitted sweater tied around his waist by the arms to keep his back warm. The simple colors and his extreme height made him stand out even amidst all the bright colors.

Once Bard took in the dazzling visuals, the sound of the piano became more obvious. It was in tune, and well played – the pianist was a woman of about fifty, all in black, her steel-grey, curly hair caught up in a messy topknot, with glasses in bright red frames. Her attention was not on her fingers, but the dance master, waiting for his direction as to tempo and duration.

The space was bright despite the lack of windows; racks of lights in the ceiling shed enough illumination for the dancers to cast faint shadows, but the light was without glare. There was the faint smell of heated dust so common in industrial settings, but it was not obtrusive. As the class went on, the smell of working bodies rose, but again, it was not obtrusive. Other than the master’s instructions and the sound of the piano, there was little sound, even though close to thirty people were the room; all the dancers were quiet, concentrating on their movements.

The sequence of the class roughly followed that of the video class Bard had watched yesterday, from warming moves to progressively more energetic ones. Bard felt he was on familiar ground as the dancers bent and stretched and gestured. He was glad that Thran had showed him the video, as Monsieur spoke almost no English in his instructions; he listed the sequence of moves by the French terms, and gestured here and there to indicate where he wanted people to go. As the class progressed to the more vigorous moves, his English comments became more common as he corrected here and observed there.

Bard sketched rapidly, getting the sense of how the dancers moved and flowed. Here was a very small ballerina, very good at rapid footwork. There was a muscular male dancer, powerful and majestic. As Bard worked, he began to pick out the dancers who were principals, whose moves were just that much more crisp and precise, or whose gestures were more expressive, even in a class that didn’t call for it. One principal was likely not dancing in performance tonight, for her work was intense, especially her turns. Another likely would be in performance, for his steps were gentle, marshaling, working to ease the body in preparation for later endeavors.

Time and again, Bard’s eyes went back to Thran, gauging his lover’s efforts against what he saw in the other dancers. Thran worked as hard as anyone in the room, even the ballerina so obsessed with her turns, to build his endurance. But what impressed Bard more than how hard he worked was the precision of his moves. No gesture, bend, or jump was casual, sloppy, or half hearted, but as fully committed as if each were the last movement Thran would ever make. His grand jetés were stunning, and not merely because of his height or the height of his jumps – each looked as effortless as floating clouds.

If Bard’s completely uneducated opinion meant anything, then his angel was well set to ace any audition he chose to make.

After the grand jetés, the class calmed, allowing the dancers to cool down without injury or stress. As the various layers of clothing had come off, now many went back on so that chills and drafts didn’t stress finely honed physiques. Bard quickly sketched a ballerina, her soft sweater flying around her like a matador’s cape when she threw it around her shoulders. He captured Monsieur LePied in conversation with the pianist, one foot in front of the other, his arms crossed over his chest and fingers pulling at his lower lip as they discussed some refinement. He caught the pianist in the next second, pushing her glasses up atop her head as she gathered up her music. Another trio of danseurs laughed over a joke while one arranged the elastics on a shoe. The wonderful, magical feeling that had begun yesterday, when images flowed from eye to hand to paper, had strengthened, bringing a smile to his lips.

“And what did our class teach you?”

Bard looked up to see Monsieur LePied standing beside him, looking rather imperious. Thran had said he rarely smiled, so Bard didn’t bridle; he merely held out his sketchbook. The master rifled through the myriad of sketches that Bard had made, filling nearly half his sketchbook, with a casual air at first, but after the first few pages, he slowed, studying first one and then the next drawing.

“You have an unerring eye to capture what makes a figure unique,” the master finally allowed. “As rapid as many of these are, I can still identify the individual in each one. What did you say your name was?”

“Bard Bowman.”

“Well. These are very nice. You are welcome to any of my classes.”

Monsieur LePied handed Bard’s sketchbook back to him, offered a nod, and moved away.

Thran had packed his things in his bag, and came up to Bard with a curious look back at the master. “What did he say to you, lyubov moya?”

Bard ran a hand through his hair. “That these were very nice, and I was welcome to any of his classes. I think that’s good.”

Thran blinked in surprise, and gestured towards the sketchbook, which Bard duly passed him. “That is unexpected, but very good, as you thought. He is rarely so forthcoming with praise.” He paged through the day’s sketches. “These are wonderful, Bard. I know which dancer you drew in each one. Even in the ones so quickly drawn, I know.”

“That’s what Monsieur LePied said. So I’m getting back to myself.”

“You are. I see the improvement even after a single day. You are wonderful.”

There was no time for Bard to thank Thran for his praise, for several dancers came up to them. Soon Bard’s sketchbook was making the rounds from hand to hand, and he was pleased to see so many interested in what he had done. One of the ballerinas was so sweet with her praise that Bard took the sketch out of his book and offered it to her.
“Make sure you have him sign it, Charisse,” Thran winked at him. “For then you can prove to your petite Maman that a great artist thought enough of her daughter to sketch her at the dance.”

That brought an appreciative laugh from the dancers and a blush to Bard’s cheeks, but he fished out a pencil to inscribe the sketch, “Charisse at the Dance,” signed and dated it, and handed to the ballerina.

“That’s so sweet of you,” Charisse breathed, “and my petite Maman, as Thran calls her, will like it very much.”

“I hope she does,” Bard nodded, then stowed his sketchbook back in his bag. “I appreciate the kind words, too.”

After a few more words, Thran was ready to go. He ducked into the dancers’ locker room to change out of his dance wear and into jeans and warm shirts, then he and Bard ventured out.

“How do you feel? You looked fit, elegant, well healed... your usual beautiful self,” Bard offered, as they headed back to the SUV with their bags. “Did you make the impression you wanted?”

“I am well satisfied,” Thran nodded, considering. “I felt strong, without pain in my ankle or anywhere else, and I was as precise as I wanted to be.”

“I noticed how exact you were with every move. You were unhurried, like you had all the time in the world to make each move.”

“Ahh,” Thran said with satisfaction. “That was exactly my intent. You know the jazz trumpeter, Louis Armstrong?”

“Satchmo? Everyone knows the great Satchmo. From New Orleans.”

“Yes, that is he. Someone once asked him how he had time to play so many notes. He said there was always time to play all the notes. What he meant was that one must relax and take all the time there is to play all the notes, without rushing or leaving any out. It is a good metaphor for how I was taught to dance. Make the leap, turn the body, make the fingers just so, and then land precisely, in the time there is.”

“The dance take on the jazz take on the Zen take of being in the moment.”

Thran grinned. “Just so. It is good that so many traditions riff on the same thing, yes? So, lyubov moya, what next? Lunch, perhaps, then shopping?”

“Sounds good to me. Anything you want to eat is fine with me.”

“There is a small café nearby that serves wonderful satay. Chicken skewers in peanut sauce.”

“That suits me. It’d be good to talk about where to shop over something warm.”

“That suits me, too.”

They linked arms as they headed down the sidewalk.
A faint, familiar heaviness coursed throughout Thran’s body, the residue of the morning’s exertions. It was without pain or exhaustion, but after a good night’s sleep it would translate into more muscle, more endurance, more control – all things Thran needed to stay the elite dancer he was. He was pleased to feel his edge return.

He had other things to smile about – the warm greetings from his fellow dancers, men and women alike, not the least of them. He and the tiny Charisse had once paired in a comic dance for a benefit as a pair of mismatched clowns, and they had had such fun hamming up their performance for the donors’ gala. She’d been very sweet to compliment his saint so kindly, though Bard’s sketch of her had been worth all of her sweetness. Even the dancers who knew him only by reputation or who were not close had seen his fitness, and word would spread of that quickly.

There would be some discussion about Bard, as well, and not just because of his drawing talents, formidable as those were. Perhaps Bard had not had cause to refer to their pairing, but Thran had dropped word of it once or twice, casually, to the dancers closest to him. Word of that would spread, too.

As close attention as Thran had paid to his dancing during the class, he had surfaced from his reverie a time or two to consider the rebirth of his saint. Bard sat unobtrusively off to one side, sketching rapidly, his surety and confidence growing with each stroke of his pencil. His style was so distinctive, and if it didn’t look anything like Picasso’s line sketches, it shared the same evocative ability. What did one call an artist who worked in pencil rather than paint? Whatever such an artist was called, perhaps Bard would consider doing more of it to complement his sculpture. As soon as Bard spoke to Shire Hills, he would put that forth for Bard’s consideration.

As they walked towards the café, both of them bearing the bags of their callings, Thran appreciated the subtle change in Bard’s usual long stride. He stood a little taller, the light in his eyes was a little brighter, and his step held a firmer purpose. It was such pleasure to draw him close, to feel the subtle adjustment of Bard’s stride as he kept them in step. When he grinned, Bard favored him with a mischievous smile.

“We make a striking couple, do we not?”

Thran laughed. “So we do. May it always be so.”

The café specialized in Asian street food, and did most of its business as carryout, so it held no more than half a dozen tiny tables. Inside, the air was dense with steam and spicy aromas, predominantly cumin and turmeric. Thran breathed in that heady perfume, humming in appreciation. It was such a pungent bouquet of flavors, too many to sort out individually, but the overall sense was earthy and welcoming. A black woman, bundled in a bright green wool coat and darker green earmuffs and scarf, stood ahead of them at the counter, waiting for her foil-wrapped carryout packet – she was one of the ballerinas from Thran’s class, which drew laughter from all three of them. Thran and Bard invited Marisa to eat with them, and they squeezed around one of the tiny tables to enjoy their food. Thran had his favorite Indonesian satay, and Marisa her British/Punjabi tikka. Bard’s chicken shish kebab came nestled in warm naan, which he wolfed down with gusto. It was wonderful to talk with another dancer again, and Bard fit into the conversation easily, as content to listen to discussions of ballet technique as he was to talk about his sketching or music or cuisine.

“But you draw so fast, Bard!” Marisa exclaimed. “You seem so calm, but your pencil flies! Just a few strokes, and you have the essence of a person! How does that come so easily to you?”

Bard ran a hand through his hair, revealing that he was both pleased as well as embarrassed at Marisa’s enthusiasm. “Oh... I didn’t have a lot of money in art school – no surprise there, right? No art student ever has money. So I worked a lot of craft fairs doing caricatures. You get just a few minutes to capture enough of a person in a cartoon that they’ll be happy they paid for it. It was good training. Better than what I learned in some of my classes, to be honest, and I didn’t have to pay for the privilege.”

Bard’s smile was wry, drawing Marisa to chuckle. “Every art has its self-important teachers who do you the favor of imparting great knowledge, I think. Sometimes that great knowledge is only of what not to do.”

Bard snickered. “Very true. But every now and then one of those teachers turns out to have a lot of good things to offer, so you have to pay attention to all of them. Sometimes it can take a long time to find out which ones were good and which ones weren’t.”

“I had a teacher like that once, when I was a child,” Marisa mused, her lips quirking in a smile. She had a lilting accent, heritage of her London birthplace. “She was very strict and stern, and what child likes that? I almost gave up dancing because she was never satisfied. Over and over, she made me do pirouettes, until I was sick of them! She claimed that I wasn’t straight, so over and over, and around and around...” Marisa rolled her dark brown eyes just as Sigrid did when she was exasperated, drawing Thran’s laughter. “I was sure she didn’t know a thing about pirouettes. Then in my first professional audition, of course the master called for a whole series of pirouettes, and of course I did them my way. I couldn’t hold the number needed. Only then did I realize that old woman knew everything about pirouettes. The next audition, I did the pirouettes her way, and I got the job.”

“Experience is a hard teacher,” Bard agreed, smiling.

“Very hard,” Than agreed. His saint could give lessons to anyone about the truth of that.

Thran and Bard soon bade Marisa farewell, and climbed back into the SUV to make their way to the gold market. As parking was rare, they had a chance to see what shops appealed to them – or not, in Bard’s case.

“I’m not sure about this, Thran,” Bard said, rubbing his chin dubiously. “This looks like the jewelry equivalent of a red light district. A lot of hustle.”

“I am of the same mind,” Thran agreed. “So many signs that shout of bargains... it reminds me of a not-so-savory section of a market in Marrakesh. Perhaps this is not the best place for us to look.”

“I’m not too sure what kind of reception a couple of gays would receive, either.”

Thran glanced at Bard to offer a sly smile. “I thought only one of us was gay, lyubov moya.”

Bard’s wrinkled brow smoothed as he grinned back. “I’m as good as. That’s what loving an angel has done to me. Not that I’m interested in any other guys, mind you. Any other anything, when it comes down to it.”

“Excellent,” Thran purred. “My evil plan proceeds apace.”

“You’re an impossible act to follow. So what do you want to do? I don’t think this is anything we want to get into.”

“Agreed. Do you want our rings to match, or be different?”

Bard considered. “Which do you want?”

“I asked you first.”

Bard looked back out at the shops rolling by. “I’d like them to match, but only if you would, too. If you’d rather them be different, that’s fine.”

“No, I would like them to match, too. I ask only because if we want them to match, then we should not look in vintage stores, as the chance of finding two such things is not promising.”

“Agreed. We could stop at one of those big box jewelry stores, just because we’d have lots to choose from, and maybe a bit lower price. Or we could look at the shops in Greenwood Dale on the Lake. They could do something custom for us.”

Thran considered. “Let us try the first, if there is one on the way home? It would be less conspicuous, and we would have more choices, as you say. If we see nothing we like, then we can try the smaller shops in the village.”

“If you pass me your mobile, I’ll see what I can find that’s on our way home.”

Thran pulled out the device and handed it to Bard. His lover might have only a basic mobile, but he’d easily learned how to use Thran’s, so he rapidly scrolled through the screens. “If we head back home the usual way, there’s one just two exits down the highway, and another one two exits after that. Different ones, so we’d have a couple of choices.”

“Let us try the nearer one, then. If that has nothing to suit us, we shall try the second. If that does not suit us, either, we shall stop in the village.”

“We have a plan.” Bard put Thran’s mobile in a niche of the central console, and Thran turned them back towards the highway. “What kind of ring do you want? Something plain, or more elaborate?”

“We both like the white gold, yes?” Bard nodded. “With jewels?” Bard thought, but shook his head. “I agree. Just the gold. Absolutely plain seems too stark.” Bard nodded again. “So something not gaudy. Perhaps with embossing, or a beaded edge, or carving?”

“Some sort of texture,” Bard agreed. “No flowers, though.”

“Agreed. And I will tell you now that I will not wear mine always, because I cannot when I dance in performance. On the stage, I must disappear into the role, yes?”

“I won’t wear mine always, either. Not the thing to do when I weld or forge.”

“Prudent. Perhaps we should have a box to hold them when we cannot wear them, to keep them safe.”

“That’s something we can probably find in one of the junk shops. Something that appeals to both of us.”
“I like that. So, this exit?”

“Yes, this exit. Then right at the light, and down half a mile on the left.”

Thran proceeded as directed, and soon they walked into the huge jewelry store. It seemed to cater to more than jewelry, for a display of wedding china appeared to their left, and flatware to the right, with the jewelry counters right before them. There were several patrons already at the counters, which seemed to ease Bard.

“Start on the left and work right?” Bard suggested.

“As good an approach as any,” Thran agreed, so they slowly angled to the left. They perused several of the counters before they found the display of men’s rings, then slowed to see what struck them.

“Trying too hard,” Bard murmured, as they passed the modern styles, and Thran had to agree. None of them looked like anything he wanted either of them to wear. A display of extremely plain styles followed, which also didn’t appeal to either of them. The few that remained were neither one thing nor another, so before any of the clerks came up to them, they made their exit.

“Let us hope the second shop is not as...”

“Plain and vulgar at the same time?” Bard grinned. “I’ll keep my fingers crossed.”

A few minutes later, they walked into the second huge store. This time, the wedding china and flatware were all on the right, and sports memorabilia was before them. The jewelry was on the left, so they started their perusal on the left. There were fewer of the unattractive modern styles, and more of the plain ones, but at least this store had two display cabinets of more interesting pieces.

“Look at that one,” Bard murmured. “Second row –”

“Third one on the left?” Thran finished. “That one drew my eye, too. I like the small beading on the edges, and the carved center. Very elegant.”

“Not gaudy. Not plain, either. Elegant, as you said.”

“Good afternoon,” a middle-aged clerk with thinning brown hair and a black skullcap came trundling down the line of counters towards them. “Is there something interesting you’d like to see close up?”

“Good afternoon to you,” Bard replied. “Um, we’d like to see that one? With the carving?”

“A very elegant ring,” the clerk nodded, opening the case. “What size are you interested in? I’ll see if I have one in your size.”

Bard glanced at Thran. “I probably need an eleven or so. What about you?”

“Perhaps a bit smaller. Ten, perhaps?”

Hesitating, the man gave a sharp look back and forth between them, but before he said anything, a younger clerk came up beside him. “Papa, David needs you to look at the old watch he’s repairing in the back. It’s one of the tricky ones with the seventeen jewels. I’ll take care of the gentlemen.”

“That David, he needs constant watching...” the older man trundled away, shaking his head.

“Papa is more traditional,” the clerk confided with an apologetic smile. “David and I, we have this game we play to divert him. I am pleased to show you whatever you’d like to see of our rings. First, let me size each of your fingers...”
That was quickly done, and the rings were produced. Thran slipped his on his finger experimentally. It was a beautiful piece, and Thran admired the way it graced his hand.

“I am surprised you have such a large stock,” Thran observed. “Usually such things must be ordered?”

“That’s true,” the clerk allowed. “But sometimes we end up with several sizes in stock for one reason or another. This one, for example, is beautiful, but the style is discontinued, so we ended up with the combined stock from several stores. It takes a certain gravitas to wear it, I think. It’s understated, but a statement all the same.”

“It looks nice on your hand,” Bard agreed. “You have the certain gravitas, I think.”

“How does it look on your hand, then?” Thran asked, and Bard held out his hand. “I think you have the gravitas, too, yes? Do you like it?”

Bard considered his hand, nodding. “I do. But you have yours on the wrong hand.”

“Russians wear such a thing on their right hand. Welsh are like Americans, yes? To wear it on the left?”

“It looks very distinguished on either hand,” the young clerk offered, drawing Thran’s soft chuckle.

“So it does. What do you think, lyubov moya?”

“I think we should ask discreetly about the financial aspect of the transaction.”

The clerk grinned at Bard’s wry phrasing. “I think I can offer you a nice price on the two, with a little discount for your patience with Papa. He is a good man, you understand.”

“Of course,” Thran agreed, when the clerk named a very reasonable price for the pair. “Is it possible for them to be engraved?”

“That’s no problem at all. We’re not busy, so if you want to wait a few minutes, I can have that done now, and you can take them with you.”

“Wonderful. Let us consult for a moment, and we will tell you what to engrave.”

“Take your time. Thank you!”

As the clerk moved away, Bard looked to Thran. “What do you want to put inside? Our initials? The date? Which date?”

“I thought I would put in yours, ‘From an angel to his saint.’ And perhaps you would put in mine, ‘From a saint to his angel.’ Would you like that?”

Bard nodded. “That’s perfect. Exactly the right thing.”

They told the clerk, who headed back to the workroom with their rings, and in twenty minutes, their rings were back, properly inscribed on the inside of the bands. The clerk polished each of them carefully once more, tucked them into plush boxes, and those into a small bag, and handed them over with a smile.

“Congratulations. I hope you’ll both be very happy.”

Thran offered a graceful nod. “Thank you. We will be.”
“We already are,” Bard seconded. “We appreciate your help.”

“Please come back again.” The clerk offered a wave. “It’s been a pleasure.”

They walked outside to the SUV, both of them grinning. When they’d climbed back inside, Bard dug the two little boxes out of the bag and opened one. “I don’t want to wait to wear mine, cariad. Let’s wear them now.”

“I agree, lyubov moy y. So give me yours, so I may put it on your finger.”

“Okay, this one’s mine. Here. I’ve got yours. Right or left hand for you?”

“Hmm. On which hand did you wear the ring you had from Daphne?”

“The left.”

“And I wore Vileria’s on the right. So I will wear yours on the left, to honor Vileria as well as you, and because a Welshman bestowed it upon me.”

“I like that. So I’ll wear mine on my right, to honor Daphne as well as you, and because a Russian gave it to me. So together?”

“Of course.”

“For now and forever, my angel.”

“For now and forever, my saint.”

Neither of them spoke for a moment, until Bard snorted self-consciously. “Was this sappy?”

Thran laughed. “I do not think so. But then, perhaps I am too entranced with my husband to be objective.”

“I think I’m just as entranced with mine. So I guess we’d better go home and have our children give us a dose of reality.”

Thran rolled his eyes. “It will be a large dose, I am sure. So let us kiss, and savor the moment before the reality arrives.”

They did, just a quick caress, but it was sweet, and brought a smile to both their faces. Thran started the SUV and they had traveled several exits down the highway before either expression faded.

“Do you still have your old wedding ring?” Bard asked after a while.

“I do,” Thran nodded. “I have Vileria’s, as well. Perhaps our marriage was not what either of us would have chosen, but we were good friends, and so I saved our rings.”

“I have mine and Daphne’s, too. I’ve been thinking...”

“Always dangerous,” Thran gave Bard an amused look. “What have you thought about?”

“Vileria and Daphne were the mothers of our children, and while Tilda’s not old enough to remember her mother, the rest of our children are. So I wondered if we might want to put something in the house so the children know it’s all right to think of their mothers, even though we’re together.”

“I would like that, very much,” Thran agreed at once. “Is that why you asked me about my old wedding ring?”

Bard nodded. “Do you have a photograph of Vileria?”

“I do.”

“I thought if we put up pictures of them, and the wedding rings...”

“A shrine, perhaps.” Thran mused, then grimaced. “That is not the right word, I think. Not a religious place, as in a church. A place of remembrance. I like that idea very much. Where should we put it?”

“I don’t know yet. I thought the central hall, then I thought the main room, then I thought the children’s study... we have time to choose a spot. Maybe the children have a preference.”

“Vileria would like the children’s study, where she would enjoy to watch the children grow up.”

“Daphne would, too. We’ll see what the children think. They might think that’s depressing.”

Thran hummed. “They might. We will ask, when the moment comes.”

They were almost home. It was too early for the children to be home from school, so Bard suggested they stop by Sam’s greenhouse to see if they could find a few plants to make the solarium look less empty. Thran agreed at once, so they pulled in to the parking lot discussing what sort of plants they wanted. Palms were a good place to start, so when Sam came forward to greet them, he steered them towards the back of the greenhouse where he had several large specimens. They chatted briskly about the height of the solarium, and how cold it got and how much sun, and before long they had a quartet of low maintenance palms and a few potted ferns that preferred cooler, lower light conditions. Sam wrapped the pots of the tall palms so they wouldn’t spill dirt all over the SUV when they were put in horizontally, and put cardboard trays under the ferns to keep them from dampening the upholstery. They headed home with their leafy cargo, and were soon carting the pots inside.

“Is it better to put the pots near the windows or the inner walls?” Thran asked, as he carried in the last of the ferns.

“Probably the inner walls for now. I haven’t checked the glazing yet, but I’d bet a lot of it’s old and needs replacing, so it might be drafty. We can arrange them around the fainting couch. That’ll need reupholstering at some point. Just as well. That brown print is some kind of ugly.”

Bard shot him a glance. “There’s this stunning blue called Majorelle blue, named for the artist, Jacques Majorelle. It’s used a lot in Morocco. All that garden furniture in the ballroom needs repainting; I thought that Majorelle blue would be brilliant. That same blue on the fainting couch would make it hard to tell where the inside ends and the outside begins. I like that.”

“Do you have a picture of this color, this Majorelle blue?”

“I do. It’s in my art books in the main room.”

Thran followed Bard into the main room where he considered the remaining boxes. “It’s in one of these. I’ll take this one, if you take the other. It’s a book about Islamic tessellations.”

Thran eventually produced the book, and held it up. “This one?”
“That’s it. So, Majorelle blue...” Bard paged through too quickly for Thran to see a lot of detail, but it was enough for him to want to peruse the book later at more leisure. “There. That’s the color I was thinking about.”

“Ooh, I like it very much!” Thran exclaimed. “Like lapis, but a bit more purple, a bit brighter than indigo. Ultramarine, perhaps? A very distinctive blue.”

“It’s like nothing else,” Bard agreed. “I don’t know if we can find anything that color to put on the fainting couch, but it’d be stunning.”

“We live near New York City, Bard – it is one of the fabric capitals of the world, given all the theatrical and fashion endeavors. I know costumiers of the ballet. They can tell me where to find such a thing.”

“It’d be amazing. But we don’t need to talk to your costumiers yet. I still have so much work to do inside before we get to the soft stuff.”

“It will come. It is good to think of these things now, so that if there are things we want to do on the hardscape to match our vision, we can do so. Would you leave this book out for me? I would like to look at it more. Our solarium would make a fine courtyard like some I glimpsed in this book.”

“That would be something. Sure, keep this one out and we can look at it. Oh, it’s going on four-thirty. The children will be home soon. I want to get the chili out and warming so it’s not too long before we eat.”

“Which one of the children do you think will notice these first?” Thran grinned, carrying Bard’s art book with him as they returned to the kitchen.

“My money’s on Sigrid. She’s got the eyes of a hawk,” Bard said, as Thran opened the refrigerator for his lover to haul out the big pot of chili.

“That would be my guess, as well.” Thran shut the refrigerator, and Bard heaved the pot onto the stove. “The boys will be oblivious, so our Tilda is my second choice.”

“Mine, too. Do you want any tea before supper?”

“I would. I want to use one of our podstakanniks. They are a very elegant way to enjoy tea.”

“They are.” Bard put the kettle on, then came beside Thran to put his arm around his waist. They paged through Bard’s art book together as the kettle warmed. “Just one thing left to do, you know.”

“The ceremony. Perhaps Thursday or Friday, or next week?”

“That’s up to you, Thran. You’ll be back in class almost every day now, right?”

“I will.”

“The day isn’t particular to me. We just need time to alert the school that we’re picking the children up a little early, that’s all. All that’s important to me is that we do it.”

“I feel the same. So perhaps we need to ask the children what is a good day for them. Legolas said something to me about the first day he would go to the Gondors to fence, and I would not want to choose that day.”

“So we’ll ask at supper. But I say we wait to see if they notice the rings, first.”
“I agree.”

“Won’t be long. It’s almost four-thirty now. Any moment, the horde will be upon us.”

The mudroom door clattered open, and four excited voices echoed through the house. Thran gave Bard a quick kiss. “The horde is here.”

Bard laughed. “Think they’ll get it in ten?”

“Before supper, surely.”

“Okay, we’ll see.”

They turned to welcome four children with bright eyes and reddened cheeks into the kitchen.
Chapter 41

Chapter Summary

The saint and the angel find out which of them wins their bet, then engage in an intimate trust-building exercise.

Chapter Notes

I don't own the rights to "Dante's Peak." I just enjoy the "more stuff blows up" in it.

Yes, it's another chapter that earns the Explicit rating. Enjoy!

“Welcome home, all,” Bard heralded, as the children bustled into the kitchen through the mudroom, shoeless and coatless. “How was school today?”

“Archery today, Father!” Legolas replied, a huge grin on his face. “It was so great to pull my bow again! There were a few new students from the lower grades, so Mr. Faramir spent a lot of time with them, but the older students got to hold a shoot off. Once Mr. Faramir saw that I was capable, he let me go with the older students, and then we got down to it. That Kilian is something! I told him he should try out for the Olympic team when he’s old enough. He’s got dual citizenship, American and Irish, so he could try for either team. He’s got three years before he’s eligible, so he’ll be spectacular by then. Tara’s almost as good.”

“Are they more skilled than you?” Thran asked, smiling.

“On any given day, any of us can outshoot the other. But I think Kilian’s got the edge on Tara and me.”

“Honestly said,” Thran nodded. “I hope they both will be friends, then, and not rivals.”

“They’re not like that, Father,” Legolas hastened to say. “That’s so different from my old school. They seemed glad that I was there. I think we’ll be good friends. May I ask them to visit sometime?”

“Of course. Perhaps the weekend?”

“Kilian and Tara both fence, too. So if they could come Sunday, would you referee?”

“Of course. That will be my pleasure. Have you learned when you will go to the fencing instructors?”

Legolas nodded at once. His face lit with even more excitement as he gave his father his full regard. “Tomorrow! Mr. Faramir let the Gondors know I’ll be with the regulars, and I’m so excited to meet them in person, as well as start to fence again. They already have your mobile number, so after I see them tomorrow, they’re supposed to call you Thursday to talk about it. You’ll be in class all day...
then, won’t you?”

“I will. If you would let them know that it is all right to call me in the evening, I would appreciate it. And please tell them I look forward to our talk.”

Bard brought out the bowl of fruit, then the cheese and crackers. “Will you have archery and fencing matches, Legolas? I’ve seen a little of the fencing during the Olympics, but never archery, and I’d like to.”

“I don’t know about the fencing yet, but I do for the archery. We’ll have meets in the spring, when the weather is warmer.”

“When you get a meet schedule, we’ll put it on the board. I know your father will want to go, and so will I.”

“The board?” Legolas repeated, his brow wrinkling.

“Yes, the board... that we don’t have yet,” Bard admitted, looking around the kitchen. “We need somewhere to put up all your schedules, the list for the market, doctors’ appointments, and so on. Another item to put on the homeowner’s mecca list.”

“I learned to jump rope today,” Tilda announced, taking a clementine.

“You already know how to jump rope,” Bain snorted, stuffing cheese in his mouth.

“This is the kind with two ropes,” Tilda corrected.

“What, Double Dutch?” Sigrid asked as she peeled her clementine. “That’s neat!”

“It took a while to get the hang of it. I’m not very good yet. Some of the other children really are. There’s this one boy who can do it on his hands.”

“It takes time to learn anything new,” Thran said.

“Thran’s right,” Bard agreed. “The important thing is whether you had fun doing it.”

“I thought it was fun. And we got a new book to read today. The Hobbit, by JRR Tolkien.”

“I know, but none of the other children have, so I don’t mind reading it again. Except the end is sad. And we started studying Russia in geography. I have a new map. Thran, did you ever live in Siberia?”

Thran laughed. “Despite being so different, no, I was never sent to Siberia, Tilda. It is terribly cold there, and I would not have liked it at all. Perhaps you will show me your map, and I will show you where I did live.”

“What about you, Bain and Sigrid? Anything interesting in your worlds today?”

“Mr. Saur gets stranger and stranger. I liked running in sport class, though. I’m doing okay in trigonometry. I don’t know why it works, or how I know it works, or how you explain it to someone who doesn’t know how it works, so I’ve decided that trigonometry is just a modern word for magic, and let it go.”

That brought a laugh around the table.
“Nothing from me, really, other than geology is cool. Lots of magma and volcanoes this week,” Bain reported.

“So it’s more stuff blows up at school, too?” Bard teased, getting a laugh. “How many times have you watched Dante’s Peak? You could teach the class about acid water supplies and pyroclastic flows.”

“Hey, I could!” Bain agreed, pumping his fist. “I’ll tell Mr. Gandalf that. He’s the chemistry teacher, but he comes in to teach this section about geology. He makes it so interesting! Maybe he’d like to borrow our copy of the film.”

“I’d hazard he’s already seen it,” Bard replied, “but he’s welcome to borrow it if he hasn’t. Don’t eat too much before supper, all. We’re eating at six, and it’s chili, salad, and strawberries.”

“What about dessert?” Legolas asked, pausing his chewing as he imagined the possibilities. “Cake, I hope?”

“No cake today,” Thran shook his head. “We have two kinds of ice cream, I think.”

“Strawberry and double mint chip,” said Bain, the authority on current supplies of dessert.

“What kind of cake do you like?” Bard asked, nibbling a piece of cheese. “I’ll put it on the menu soon.”

“Spice cake.” Legolas looked to his father. “Remember that cake we had at the Russian tea room, Father? Was that spice cake?”

Thran chuckled. “It was applesauce raisin cake, as I recall. With thick, sweet icing. Very, very sweet icing. You ate all the icing off yours and mine both, with great gusto.”

That brought another laugh. “I like the sweet kind, too,” Bain admitted. “But Da never puts enough of it on the stuff he makes.”

“I put on plenty for most humans, just not enough for teenaged boys,” Bard laughed. “Everyone done with the cheese and crackers?”

Bain swiped one more piece of cheese as Bard leaned forward to take the plate. Before Bard could pick up the dish, however, Sigrid grabbed his right hand, squealing.

“What is this?” she demanded, holding it up to the others. “Gods, is this what I think it is? Legs, does Ada have one, too? Did you two get married? Did you? How could you, without all of us? How could you!”

Legolas held up Thran’s right hand. “He doesn’t have one.”

“Yes, he does,” Tilda announced, examining Thran’s left hand, then looked up at him with a reproving glare. “It’s over here. Thran, that wasn’t fair!”

“Geez, Da!” Bain protested. “Til’s right; that wasn’t fair! Legs, they didn’t tell us!”

“Father, you didn’t tell me?” Legolas’s face was downcast, and his tone was plaintive. “Why didn’t you tell me?”

“You rats!” Sigrid exclaimed, poking Bard so hard in the ribs that he flinched in laughter. “I can’t believe you two got married without us! That is so rude! I can’t believe it!”
“Please, ma chère,” Thran protested through his laughter, catching Sigrid’s hand as she tried to poke him. “Why do you think so badly of us, I would like to know? Of course we would not do such a thing without the four of you! Never would we! We merely bought the rings for the ceremony. They are very beautiful, and we could not wait to wear them, so we did not wait. Instead, we laid a small bet on as to which of you would notice them first.”

“Oh – so you didn’t get married?” Legolas turned a confused look on Thran.

Thran reached out to tug one of Legolas’s faded green braids. “Not yet, synok.”

“But you’re going to, right?” Bain pressed.

“When?” asked Tilda.

“We didn’t get married yet,” Bard assured them. “We wanted rings for the ceremony, so we got them. We just wanted to see if you’d notice them, that’s all. It’s just as Thran said – we would never hold the ceremony without you all. We want you with us for that.”

“Hmm,” Sigrid growled, only slightly mollified, as she poked Thran again, then Bard. “Okay, you’ve had your joke. So what was the small bet about, and who won it?”

Bard looped an arm around Sigrid to hug her close. “We both did. We both said you’d be the first to notice.”

That brought a smug smile to Sigrid’s face. “Well, you had that right. I’ve been watching you both like a hawk since we moved in here!”

Thran’s laughter bubbled out to consume him. “Oh, ma chère, those are exactly the words your Da used. You do not disappoint, woman with the eyes of the hawk!”

“When?” Tilda persisted. “When will you do the ceremony?”

“We thought to make a celebration of it,” Thran said. “The actual ceremony is just a few minutes, and is not all that interesting. But afterwards, there is a Japanese restaurant –”

“Yessss!” Bain pumped his fist again. “Legs, it’s that place I was telling you about with the guy who throws eggs!”

“Really?” Legolas leaned forward to lock eyes with Bain. “The one who juggles the knives, too?”

“Yeah, that one, and he –”

“Let them get the rest of it out, you two!” Sigrid ordered. “So where is the ceremony?”

“We’ll just go down to the county office, and they’ll do it. It’s just a formality,” Bard explained. “After that, we thought you’d all like the Japanese restaurant for supper.”

“May I wear a dress?” Tilda asked. “And try the chopsticks?”

“You can wear anything you want, as long as it’s nice.”

“Are you going to wear tuxedos?” Sigrid asked.

“I think we’ll just wear something normal. We’ll save the tuxedos for one of Thran’s ballet premieres that’ll come along before too long.”
“Really? A premiere?” Sigrid shared an impressed look with her sister. “Tilda, we can really dress up for that! It’ll be fun!”

“No, it won’t,” Legolas sighed, looking at Bain with a glum face. “We’ll have to wear suits, Bain, and stand around looking stoic. It’s boring.”

“Lots of cameras and stuff?” Bain said, struggling to look blasé, but his eagerness ruined the attempt.

“Enough to make you see blue spots in front of your eyes for hours.”

“May I have a new dress for that?” Tilda asked. “Maybe one like the dancers wear, with all the layers in the skirt?”

“We’ll see, little doll. Let us get married first, and let us get Thran through his auditions and back to work.”

“Maybe we will have a premiere for your Da, too, when he is back at his sculpture,” Thran inserted. “We will dress like artistes for that, yes? Perhaps the cliché of a French beret?”

“You can’t get too wild at an art premier,” Bard winced, running a hand through his hair. A lot of art patrons seemed to like to compete with the artwork in making an impression. The last artist’s opening he’d gone to had been a sea of black clothing and multicolored hair, and that older woman with lavender hair... ouch.

“You still haven’t said when,” Tilda exhaled with longsuffering exasperation.

“That depends on all of you, mes petits,” Thran said. “We will choose a day together, yes?”

By the time all the children had sorted out their schedules and Thran had considered his class workload, it was time to get ready for supper, but at least they had a day. They would pick up the children on Thursday at the end of the academic portion of school, and descend upon the county office a few minutes later. Bard would call in the morning to see if there was any possibility of making an appointment, but failing that, at least let the office know they were coming. The suppertime conversation was full of the children deciding what they wanted to wear to the occasion of watching a Japanese chef toss eggs into his toque.

Bard was still laughing about the children’s focus on the theatrical adventure that Thursday offered rather than the marriage of their fathers when he kissed Sigrid goodnight and came into the bedroom. As he expected, Thran was ensconced in the soaking tub. After the dancer had bade the children good night, he’d washed from head to toe in the shower cabinet, and now reclined at his ease in the tub with a glass to hand that contained no more than two mouthfuls of red wine.

“Look at you, you sybarite,” Bard stood with arms akimbo to regard his lover. “You look like some hellaciously decadent rock star, waiting for the virgins to be led in for sacrifice.”

Thran’s eyes remained closed. “I do not feel like a decadent rock star, to be sure. I feel like a very tired ballet dancer. You have bid our children good night, too? They are all in bed?”

“They are.”

“Then I want my husband to wash and then join me so that both of us enjoy his foresight to add this divine soaking tub to our bathroom.”

Bard unbuttoned his flannel shirt, shrugged out of it, and pulled his Henley over his head. “Think you’ll be able to stay awake long enough for me to wash?”
“I will do my best.”

“Open your eyes. Maybe watching me strip will help to keep you awake.”

Sleepy grey eyes opened, then widened as Bard eased his jeans off his hips. “Mmm. Such a beautiful body... such an entrancing sight. I think perhaps I can stay awake now.”

“Won’t be long.”

Bard savored the hot water and soap as he washed away the day’s efforts, then padded to the tub. He thought to dim the lights to a low glow, which brought a smile to Thran’s lips.

“I’ll get in behind you,” he invited, and Thran roused enough to let Bard settle against the back of the tub, with Thran cradled against his chest. “Ohhhh, yes... mmm... gods, this feels good.”

Thran closed his eyes and settled against Bard’s chest with a soft sigh. “Have you never been in a soaking tub before?”

“I was in a hot tub once, but it was ninety and humid, so I didn’t stay in there long. I felt like a lobster about to become supper.”

Thran snaked an arm around Bard’s leg to stroke it languidly. “Hardly the opportune moment. It is much better in glacial winter, so that the warmth is pervasive, and the urge to nestle with another is irresistible.”

Bard stroked Thran’s upper arm and shoulder. Despite Thran’s ease, the muscles under his hand flexed under his attentions. “Nestling with you would be irresistible just about anywhere I could imagine.”

Long, elegant fingers tightened around Bard’s knee before resuming their stroking. “You are no more resistible. But perhaps one day we will visit Norway, or some other land of the midnight sun, and then find a hot tub where we will nestle together in such warmth, while above us dances the aurora borealis. How magical that would be.”

“I’d like to see the northern lights one day,” Bard hummed. “I can’t think of a better way to see them, either, or a better person to see them with.”

“Nor I.”

“Want any more of the wine, angel?”

“I do not need the calories, but I will have the merest drop more because this is our first soak together.”

Bard snared the wine bottle to pour himself half a glass. When Thran held up his, Bard splashed another mouthful into it. They clinked glasses and sipped. “Mmm. I like this one.”

“So do I. Little oak. I do not like tannic acid. This is soft.”

As the warmth of the water soaked into Bard’s bones, the excitement of the day calmed, leaving him with a glow that the few sips of wine further gilded. He slipped his arm under Thran’s to wrap around his ribs, tracing light circles against his lover’s skin. With a soundless sigh, Thran relaxed even more against Bard’s chest. They lay there together in the dimness without words, letting the water ease them.
At length, when the wine was drunk and the water had cooled, Bard squeezed Thran’s shoulders. “Let’s get out, angel. Let me dry you off, and coax you into bed for a massage.”

A long rumble of contentment was Thran’s response to Bard’s suggestion. “That sounds delightful. You take such good care of me.”

“You deserve it. Come on, before you get too chilled.”

They helped each other out of the bath. Thran let out the water while Bard fetched towels, and in a few seconds they were arranging themselves in bed. Bard urged Thran onto his stomach, comfortably propped on a pillow, and Bard kneeled astride him to knead his shoulders.

“Do you hurt anywhere? Anyplace that needs more or less attention?”

“Nothing hurts,” came the drowsy answer. “That is a blessing. I am merely tired. The class was intense, which wore me out well, and the shopping was the same, which also wore me out. Both were good, and I am better for both.”

“Okay. Tell me what feels better as I go, all right? Slower, faster, harder, softer, whatever you would like.”

“What you do now is delicious. Careful kneading, gentle stroking. I like that.”

“Good.”

Bard tended to the beautiful body of his angel, which was as much an indulgence for him as it was for Thran. To soothe such a finely sculpted work of art, one without flaw, was an act of worship, and he put all of his love, affection, and regard for his lover into his touches. From shoulders and arms and fingers, then from back down to hips and buttocks, then further to legs and toes, Bard massaged and kneaded, each stroke a caress. Beneath him, Thran sighed in silent appreciation, but never spoke. Apparently Bard’s touches were just to his liking, without need for adjustment.

“Roll over, and I’ll do your other side,” Bard murmured, stroking Thran’s hair down its length, and when his lover did so, he began at the top again, massaging temples, scalp, neck, shoulders, arms, divine torso, hips, legs. Thran accepted everything he offered, eyes closed to better revel in each touch. The expression on his face made no secret of his appreciation, his enjoyment, his love for such a gift. So much trust was in that expression, for it was not closed, not hidden, but open with how good Bard’s massage made Thran feel. Before he realized it, Bard laid his hand on Thran’s chest, slowly stroking his collarbone, the skin just underneath that bone, down across one pectoral to gently run a finger across the palest of pink nipples.

Thran’s slow breathing hitched only the tiniest bit, but Thran turned his head towards Bard, and opened his eyes. His lips parted as his breath caught again, and he caressed Bard’s cheek with one long, slender hand.

“My saint,” Thran whispered so softly that Bard read the words on his lips rather than heard them.

That was all the encouragement Bard needed to run his fingers over Thran’s nipple again, then trace the barest touch down his ribs, his abs, to the top of his pubic bone. He laid his hand over Thran’s cock gently, the barest caress, but pale skin rippled in gooseflesh nevertheless. The faintest inhalation, the merest tension in hips and abdomen, teased Bard into rubbing gently, until the softest moan stuttered from between Thran’s lips.

“It’s too much,” Bard whispered, letting his hand slip from Thran’s cock down his thigh. “I’m sorry. I know you’re tired. I just... it’s hard not to touch you. You’re so beautiful, and I still can’t believe “Don’t stop,” Thran turned towards him, stretching out his hand to stroke Bard’s chest. He cradled Bard’s right hand and drew it to his lips to kiss Bard’s ring. “I don’t want you to stop. This is the perfect way to celebrate these, and the days that are to come. Please.”

Thran laid Bard’s right hand over his heart, smiling encouragement, so Bard stroked the lean chest under his hand, and back down his abdomen. He leaned over to kiss Thran’s lips.

“Would you do something for me?” he breathed.

“Show me how you take yourself.”

Thran’s body was no less languid, but his eyes sharpened, and he bit his lower lip. Dark lashes veiled pale grey eyes, but not fast enough that Bard didn’t recognize the arousal in them.

“Would you do the same for me, my saint?”

Oh, he should have realized that Thran would want the same revelation. It took so much trust to reveal something so intimate; in many ways, it was harder to open himself that way than it was to share more blatant pleasures. But Thran’s willingness to reveal himself so completely – was there anything his angel would not do? – demanded no less from him, so he kissed Thran again.

“I will.”

Thran stroked his lips with a finger. “Should I tell you as well as show you?”

Bard nibbled at Thran’s fingers. “Whatever pleases you. However you want me to know.”

“All right. First I think about you, my saint – your tangled curls that look like you just roused from bed, your warm eyes, the beautiful hair on your chest that I cannot resist, and your nipples like two brown pearls that are so sensitive and tender. I love your muscles, how they flex in the light... such a compulsion they rouse in me... I love your cock, as muscular as the rest of you, and how it slides inside me so deeply... I love how your breath catches when I go inside you, how you fall back against me, giving me all of you... all these things and a thousand more I think about, and half my job is done already.”

Thran spoke nothing less than truth, for his long cock was already half erect. The sight of it rising under Bard’s eyes had his stirring in response, but he resisted taking himself in hand, instead watching Thran, who never took his eyes from Bard.

“I think about you taking me off the ground that first day, and how every nerve wanted to die when you put me down again. And then I am ready to imagine you kissing me here,” Thran traced a finger across one nipple, then the other, “and here. So sweet, your touch, lyubov moya; you do not know how sweet. Oh, the urge you raise in me, so intense that I cannot bear it, and my hands cannot contain it, cannot put out that fire...”

Thran dragged his palms over his nipples once, twice, three times, each time sending a ripple of arousal through his body from head to toe. He hissed but only in desire, and he dragged his fingers down his abdomen to rub his groin on either side of his cock.

“It is not enough, because I want your hands on me, not mine, but mine must do in the void, even though they are nothing like yours, not so strong, not so unpredictable, and they are nothing like the... inside of you, not so tight and warm.” Thran’s hand was on his cock now, but not stroking yet, while the other continued to stroke the skin to either side of it. His breath caught as he ran a finger over the head of his cock, concentrating on a spot just below the opening, making it spasm with each touch until his body knotted as his urgency for release rose. “How you hold my ass to keep me tightly against you when you are inside me from the front, or my thighs when you are inside from behind... How you kiss that place just behind my cock until I want to die, how you lick the very top of it when you are about to engulf me in your mouth... so many ways you tease me.”

Bard licked his lips as Thran roused his body, his own arousal flooding him as Thran’s back began to arch. “Show me how you stroke yourself. Show me how you come.”

Thran’s grip on his cock tightened as he stroked slowly, but that was too frustrating, and his pace increased without conscious thought. He began to pant as the motion of his hand grew frantic, and his other hand cradled and massaged his balls. He still hadn’t looked away from Bard, but his expression was no longer calm and languid, but a rictus of unfulfilled longing.

“Oh, gods, I want you in me, on me, all over me, but I cannot have you this time, you are only a vision that devils me, that damns me to preispodnyaya! Oh, you fucking bastard, oh, gods, oh, gods, put me out of my misery!”

It was hard not to drown Thran in a kiss, or to possess his writhing body. Had he really driven his angel into such an agony of passion?

The blatant answer to Bard’s question came a second later, when Thran’s body convulsed. His back arched, his eyes went wide and unblinking, his mouth worked in a silent prayer of release, and his chest heaved for several breaths as if he’d been starved of air. But slowly, slowly his body calmed until he lay drained and limp beside Bard.

“You are the devil’s child,” Thran whispered. “No saint, but a flame sent to draw a moth to its death.”

“I could say the same of you. Gods, Thran. I’ve never seen anything like that.”

“Blame yourself, lyubov moya. You saw nothing but the heat you raise in me. I cannot resist it, and so it consumes me with just the barest thought.” He heaved a sigh, opened his eyes, and smiled slyly. “Eh, perhaps you also see how shameless I am, just a little.”

“Just a little?” Bard’s eyebrows went up as he brushed a kiss on Thran’s lips. “If that was just a little of how shameless you are, then you may kill me with any more. I’ve never met anyone as uninhibited as you are. How are you like that?”

Thran grinned. “Only with you am I like this. Not even with another lover before. Only you. Why? Because I feel safe and comfortable with you. You love me, you will not hurt me. Why should I hold back my enjoyment from the one I love and trust? Perhaps my enjoyment will spark enjoyment in you, and then think of the pleasure we will share together. If there is something you do not like, then better I know, and I will adjust. I do not want either of us to hesitate to show our delight in each other.”

Bard stroked Thran’s silky hair, letting the rhythmic touches lull his lover into peace after his exertions. But eventually, Thran sat up, mirroring Bard’s position on his side, propped up on one elbow. Now it was Thran who stroked Bard’s hair.

“If it is too uncomfortable for you to show me now, it is all right. We have many days and nights before us, and I do not want you to feel anything but comfortable in what we do together.”
“I want to keep my word, to you of all people.”

Thran shrugged as he stroked Bard’s neck. “I have no doubt that you will. The timing of it does not concern me.”

“I’m... not sure I can do it the way you do.”

Thran shrugged again. “You don’t have to. You are you, not me. We do not need two of me in our relationship.”

“I’m... not sure how far I’ll get.”

“That does not matter, either. This is an act of trust more than anything else, and you should not force yourself before you are ready.”

Bard swallowed. “I trust you like I trust no one else, Thran. But...”

The fingers on Bard’s lips were gentle, but firm. “You have lived under siege for many years, lyubov moya. You have not been able to let down, not even for a moment. I do not take this as a matter of your trust in me, but in yourself. I am content to wait until you can do this for yourself, not me. However I can help, you know I will, but if you prefer to go to sleep now, I can take what they call a rain check.”

Bard’s lips trembled in a self-conscious smile. “You might have to. But... I’ll see what I can do.”

Thran leaned forward to kiss him quickly. “Lie back, then.”

Bard lay on his back, taking some seconds to relax against the sheets, to sense the soft fabric against his skin. He pulled one of the down pillows to tuck under his head, then glanced at Thran. His lover had already arranged himself on his side, a pillow under his head, and one arm tucked under the pillow. He’d gathered his hair to drape over his shoulder and down across his chest.

“Know that you are safe here with me. You can do anything you want, or nothing. If it helps, shut your eyes. And you do not have to speak, if you choose not to.”

“You might not learn much of anything if I do that.”

Thran’s lips curved into a mischievous smile. “Do not concern yourself, my saint. I pick up hand signals very well.”

“I bet you do,” Bard snorted, unable to resist a perverse grin. He settled himself again, and despite himself, shut his eyes. Thran was right; it was easier to start that way.

When was the last time he’d banged off? It didn’t surprise him that he couldn’t remember. Living in a crowded apartment where he’d had no privacy, not even an identity other than father, welder, night super, hadn’t allowed it. He hadn’t even thought of himself in sexual terms since Daphne had died, because the children had needed him too much to think about anything beyond their survival. He’d barely thought of himself as a man of flesh at all, but more as an automaton, a robot. Just another drudge in the world.

Six weeks ago, the angel who’d flown into his life had changed everything. The man of flesh and blood had come roaring back to life with an intensity that stole his breath, his caution, his shame, and replaced it with a craving for more than the crumbs he’d allowed himself for so long. A flamboyant ballet dancer with a mane of silky white hair, a body that made him ache with desire and goaded him into fantasies uncounted, and a manner that was elegance personified had possessed him. How he had come to treasure such a lover was inevitable; but how that lover had come to treasure him as much in return was the surprise –

No, it wasn’t a surprise. Thran had been just as bereft as Bard, just as empty, just as incomplete, no matter how much money he had. He’d wanted all the same things that Bard had wanted, so they were not that different at all. As much as Bard wanted a good life with his children, so did Thran. As much as Bard wanted a soul mate, so did Thran. As much as Bard craved a compassionate and playful lover, so did Thran.

But... if they were so much alike, then Thran’s complete abandon in bed had its match in Bard – all he had to do was find it. He thought of how easily they had begun to play.... Thran reveling in being stripped bare and sucked off by a common laborer in his old apartment... him reveling in imagining himself about to be auctioned off to a sultan... Thran taking him their first night in this house... him taking Thran in the kitchen, both of them posturing like a couple of porn stars...

Oh, gods, how many more things they would do together... the shower was only the start of it. What about the fainting couch when the weather got warmer, when maybe he’d come upon an ethereal angel sleeping amid the tropical paradise, just waiting for him to fall upon him and smother him with kisses as he pinned him among the greenery, or would that angel turn into a predator, a spider ready to draw him into a web of ecstasy from which there was no escape? Of course there was the ballroom, where they both wanted Bard to finish what Thran had started that first morning, teasing him until he’d thrown himself at him. The next time he found Thran at the barre in an empty house, he’d have him over that barre or against the wall, both of them grappling and wrestling and moaning while one of them took the other.

So much lay ahead for them to enjoy – lust, love, infatuation between an angel and a saint. Bard wasn’t an automaton, a robot, any longer. He was blessed with an imaginative lover, a treasure beyond all price, and that lover, that treasure, was with him because he had the same imagination. He had only to find it.

“It’s so easy to get myself off. All I have to do is think about this man I met six weeks ago,” Bard whispered. “Except he isn’t a man. He’s an angel, a living angel. Just one look at him, and I want him more than I’ve wanted anything in my life. He’s gorgeous, with this body that drives me wild, this long white hair like silk, these beautiful silver grey eyes... every move, every gesture he makes is as beautiful as he is. All I have to do to get off is to think about how I want to touch him, taste him, strip him bare, make love to him until both of us are half dead. Gods, how he tortures me! I’m a common laborer, and he’s this ethereal creature of light, but it doesn’t matter – I still want him. I want to make love to him until he cries out in ecstasy. I can’t sleep, thinking about him. A touch is all he needs to have me, just one of his long, elegant fingers on my lips...”

Bard touched his finger to his lips, imagining Thran doing that instead.

“He’d trace it down my neck, and find out what he could do to me with these...” he scrubbed his fingers across his nipples until he couldn’t bear it. “Oh, gods, when I think about an angel kissing me there, I am so lost, so lost...”

Bard’s hands stroked down his chest, down his abs, right to his cock, already hard and aching. Just to close his hand around it spread the ache to his loins, his balls, his gut, and it was torture not to stroke himself, so he surrendered to the compulsion, though doing so both eased and worsened the ache, no matter how fast or slowly he did it.

“I think about him touching my cock, first sucking me off, then making love to me... oh, gods, he’s going to be the death of me...”
When he opened his eyes, he found the angel who haunted him right beside him, his ethereal face framed in beautiful white hair. The angel took a lock of white hair to trace over Bard’s lips, his nipples, drawing a near whimper from Bard. At the sound, the angel’s tongue roved over his perfect lips. He bit his perfect bottom lip.

“Come for me,” the angel enticed.

Just the weight of an angel’s eyes, just three words from the angel’s mouth, and he was so, so, close...

The angel brushed the slightest kiss on his lips.

“Oh, gods,” he whispered, and he was gone, everything spasming in the most exquisite pleasure, all senses obliterated in that overwhelming sensation of release.

Soft lips kissed his temple, and a slender hand stroked his face and hair until he had calmed. The bed shifted as Thran got up to fetch a towel from the bathroom, then shifted again as he sat beside Bard to wipe off his belly. He took the towel back into the bathroom, then drew the sheet and blanket over them both. He nestled into Bard’s embrace with a sigh.

“You are the devil’s bastard,” Bard murmured.

A chuckle. “When I called you something similar, you told me that I liked you that way. So I will tell you that you like me that way, too.”

Bard found Thran’s left hand and the ring on it, and stroked it with his fingers. “I do.”

“Then we are well matched, and both of us are happy.”

He was right.
Chapter 42

Chapter Summary

Today's the day an angel and a saint get married. 'Nuff said.

The next morning, the children were not the only members of the household who prepared to leave the house. Thran would resume his usual routine of daily classes, not with his old company, but with Monsieur LePied until he found a new company. Bard was gratified to see how excited Thran was to be back in harness again; it put a new alertness in each step his lover took. Once the children were through breakfast and off to school, the tall dancer must have repacked his bag four times, as excited to be heading to class as Legolas had been. Thran’s son would attend the Gondors’ fencing school for the first time this afternoon, with Killian, Tara, and the other handful of students. Had the long layoff diminished Legolas’s skills? Would he find the Gondors to be a vast improvement over his previous instructor at the boarding school? Perhaps Thran’s chat tonight with the Gondors would reveal all.

Once they’d returned from the bus stop, Thran trotted upstairs to change into his class attire, so Bard headed to the kitchen. He expected to spend most of the day upstairs in Legolas’s room working on the paint-caked woodwork, but he wanted to put something in the oven for tonight’s supper first.

“Bard?” Thran called from upstairs.

“In the kitchen, cariad,” Bard replied.

Thran appeared in his practice clothes, bag in hand. “I will leave in a few minutes, lyubov moya. How will you cope today being the only one in the house until nearly supper?”

Bard chuckled as he stirred his bowl of batter. “I’ll have to crank up one of the boys’ metal CDs while I scrape the woodwork. That ought to approximate the din of our normal state of affairs.”

“Oy,” Thran winced. “I do not know how they listen to some of that. So loud, and no discernible tune. And the dancing is nothing more than jumping up and down.”

“Our parents said the same thing about our favorite stuff.”

“As I recall, my parents liked Tchaikovsky, if not Stravinsky.”

“Only a ballet dancer would say that,” Bard shook his head, smiling.

“Likely. What do you make?”

“That cake Legolas said he liked. Applesauce raisin cake.”

Thran’s sniff was appreciative. “The spices smell wonderful. The whole house will smell wonderful when it bakes.”

“And then I’ll ruin it all when I pull out the paint stripper.” Bard poured the stuff in his bowl into a pair of loaf pans. “At least the stuff I use doesn’t smell much. I’ll see how far I get today. There must be eight or nine coats of paint on that trim in Legolas’s room.”
“It will not withstand the patience of Bard, renovator extraordinaire. Remember to eat lunch, please?”

“You do the same,” Bard shot him a look as he put the pans in the oven. “Do you want to take something with you? Some salad, at least?”

Thran opened the refrigerator. “Do we have any chicken breast left?”

Bard set the oven timer. “Enough for a day or two. It’s on the second shelf, in the oblong bin with the red top.”

Thran pulled out the correct bin and the box of spinach. “Then I will make a little something. I expect to be at the studio until at least three. There is a partner class in the afternoon. I want to make sure that my upper body strength has not deteriorated.”

“After watching you at your yoga, I’d hardly think so, but if you want to do something more strenuous, I can introduce you to my chin up bar.”

Thran looked up from making his salad to eye him, slowly breaking into a sly smile. “And where is this chin up bar?”

“Out in the barn. I have to get back to it myself, to get back into shape to work metal.”

Humming, Thran edged close enough to Bard for his hand to stray over Bard’s backside. “Will you give me a personal demonstration of this chin up bar of yours? It would be a most entrancing sight.”

“Maybe I could entice you into doing a few. Good training for the lifting of ballerinas.”

“Perhaps so. Though ballerinas do not weigh as much as I do. They merely feel as if they do.”

“You make it look effortless, I’m sure.”

“I try very hard to do so. Now, I have a few minutes before I must leave, and the cake is in the oven. Please, show me this chin up bar.”

“It’s just a rafter in the barn, angel,” Bard said, trying to ignore the hand that still stroked up and down his back.

“I want to see it,” Thran purred. “Please, lyubov moya?”

“You bastard,” Bard shivered as Thran’s touch sent a jolt of arousal through his body. “Gods, I am so owned. Let me get the key.”

Leading the way to the mudroom, Bard pulled his boots on, grabbed the key off its hook, and armed his way into his coat. Beside him, Thran chortled in triumph as he pulled on his coat, linking arms with him as they took the few steps from house to barn. Bard unlocked the side door rather than the main sliders, and flipped on the overhead lamps to flood the space with light.

“It’s in the back,” Bard explained, leading the way through his sculptures towards his workshop. “See? Up there.”

Thran peered up towards the roof. Above a big wooden crate was the cross piece that Bard indicated. Thran’s expression was thoughtful as he considered the rafter, though a small smile tugged at the corners of his mouth. It didn’t take a genius to figure out what he thought about. Hmm... what if Bard twitted his lover a little, gave him something to think about on his drive into the city?
Work gloves were on the bench behind his anvil, so he tossed them on top of the larger crate. Then he shifted a smaller crate beside the bigger one, and climbed up. When he stood atop the bigger, one, he peeled off his coat, then his flannel, and pulled the hem of his Henley free from his jeans.

“What are you doing, lyubov moya?” Thran asked.

“This is what you came to see, isn’t it? Not the rafter, but me on the rafter.”

“It is freezing, Bard!”

“Believe me, this’ll get me warm fast, as if you looking at me won’t.”

Bard pulled his Henley off over his head to stand bare chested in the cold, and donned his work gloves. Gods, he hoped he still could do these. It’d been last fall since he’d done any. The cold air on his skin stung like a thousand needles, so he didn’t take too long rolling his shoulders and shaking his arms to limber them. He jumped up, fingers finding the familiar grooves, and heaved upwards. Damn, how had this gotten to be so hard? He got his chin above the rafter, and lowered slowly. The second was a little easier, and the third easier still. He found the rhythm of breathing he remembered, and flexed up for a fourth. His muscles burned now, but he’d be damned if he wouldn’t do that fifth one before he let go. Lats and triceps blazed in conflagration, but he managed to just graze the top of the rafter with his chin, then fought to ease his arms straight again. He dropped to the crate, chest heaving.

Gods, he was so out of shape!

“Not...” my best, he was about to say, but stopped when he met Thran’s eyes. His angel had his lower lip between his teeth, and the most predatory look that Bard had ever seen on a man’s face. Bard should have been embarrassed at how much he savored that look, but he wasn’t.

Remember last night. No shame.

“...bad,” he finished. He dropped his gloves on top of the box, and sketched a cocky bow like one he’d seen Errol Flynn offer in an ancient black and white pirate swashbuckler epic. He picked up his shirts and coat and clambered down the boxes to the ground. He didn’t get his shirts on before Thran put hands behind his head, pulling him into a hard kiss.

“If it were any warmer,” Thran breathed, before consuming him in another kiss, “I would strip the rest of you bare and bang you right here until we both scream. That was evil.”

“Mmm,” Brad murmured, ridiculously pleased to have gotten such an ardent reaction out of Thran. “Maybe I’ll have to do a few more of those. Just to keep my angel interested in the earthier aspects of life.”

“That was not earthy,” Thran dove in for a third kiss. “That was hot.”

With a snort of laughter, Bard kissed Thran back, but couldn’t suppress a shiver. “Glad it was. But I’m not. Let me put my shirt back on.”

“Oh, gods, of course,” Thran let go at once, but he couldn’t keep from running a finger down Bard’s chest as Bard pulled his Henley over his head. “I am sorry, Bard. You drove every thought of sense out of my head.”

“I noticed,” Bard grinned, hustling back into his flannel, then his coat.

“Surely you can find a rafter in the front of the barn where you can do those. It would be more convenient to have a place out of the middle of your workshop, and I could see you from the ballroom as you did them. I would savor that more than you could imagine.”

“And neither of us would get any work done,” Bard observed with a snicker. “Gods, that’s funny.”

“Why is it funny that I want to ogle you when you do something so divine?” Thran held his hands out in protest.

Bard locked the barn door behind them and cast Thran a look as they returned to the house. “Because you’re not the first to want to.”

“No?”

Bard shook his head. “I used to do my chin ups at the front of the barn, because it is more convenient. I could leave the crates in place that way, and didn’t have to shift them out of the way when I worked. But Daphne caught me at them one morning, and neither of us got anything done for quite a few days until I almost missed the deadline for a commission, so into the back of the barn I went.”

“She was a most discerning woman. I like her more now that I know we share the same excellent taste in men.”

“She would’ve liked you, too.”

Bard hung up his coat in the mudroom, and shed his boots. In anticipation of his imminent departure, Thran kept his coat and boots on and followed Bard back to the kitchen. As they entered, the aroma of Bard’s cake had both sniffing appreciatively.

“How did you meet Daphne?” Thran asked as Bard rinsed the cake batter bowl and utensils in the sink. Thran opened the dishwasher and put the rinsed items inside as Bard handed them to him.

“At a party in art school,” Bard confessed, smiling wryly. “I’ve never been much for such things, but a bunch of buddies dragged me along for moral support as they tried to score with some woman or another. Such things tended to be well fueled – mostly beer, but that was far from the only thing. Someone passed around a joint, so I had a toke to be sociable. I had to drive home that night, and I don’t like getting high – it makes me dizzy – so I didn’t hold it, but I let it out slowly so no one would think I’d wasted the toke. Thirty seconds later, this woman comes up to me and tells me that watching the smoke curl out of my mouth that slowly was the most sensual thing she’d ever seen. That was Daphne.”

Cocking his head, Thran gave him a speculative look. “Yes, I can imagine that. You would look mysterious and dangerous, yes. The bad boy so many women like. And so many men, too.”

“You are very desirable, lyubov moya,” Thran purred. He closed the dishwasher and drew Bard back against his chest. “Even without smoke.”

Bard put his hands atop Thran’s and savored the feel of his lover’s solid presence behind him. “What “When I came to the school of dance from Latvia, so she came from Moscow.” Thran’s voice was thoughtful. “She was always there with me, and we were the best of friends. We told each other everything. She was the first I told that I thought I was gay. She laughed and said she was lesbian, and so we had one more thing in common. Then she grew so tall, and so did I, and our bodies moved in similar ways. As you have heard me say, we were a striking couple, and very compatible as dancers. So we were paired professionally at a very young age. We were just nineteen when we were married, and just twenty when Legolas was born. We were seen to be the ideal couple, yes?”

“So you’re thirty-four.”

“I am. You are older than I, by a little.”

“Thirty-eight.”

“Your birthday is in May. The second.”

“And yours is in October. Also the second.” Bard exhaled. “Libra and Taurus. Very auspicious for gay men.”

Thran slid him around to give him a surprised, skeptical look. “Astrology? Gay astrology? Please say no, my saint.”

“Easily. Daphne was big into it, though, so I learned a bit just through osmosis. She used to do Tarot, too, but I never understood any of that. She had a bohemian soul.” Bard exhaled again, enjoying the feel of Thran against him. “You’d better head out, Thran. Give yourself time to warm up well before your class.”

“Yes, I must go.” Thran kissed Bard’s temple. “I think you for the demonstration. It will keep me most warm as I drive to class.”

“Good. After you spend all day with so many beautiful dancers, I’ve got to give you some incentive to come home.”

“Tcha,” Thran scoffed, squeezing Bard’s shoulders. “I have every incentive to come home to you, our children, and our beautiful home. So please, lyubov moya, remember to eat lunch, and I will see you this afternoon, likely just before our children come home.”

“Okay, angel. Dance well.”

Thran gave Bard one more kiss, then released him to pick up his bag. “I will. And I wish you victory against the woodwork.”

He stowed his lunch in his bag, zipped it shut, and slung it over his shoulder.

“Give my regards to Monsieur LePied, and my thanks for letting me observe.”

“I will. Until later, lyubov moya.”

“Until later, cariad.”

One more quick kiss, and Thran headed out through the mudroom.

As the door fell shut behind Thran, unfamiliar silence fell over the house. Bard leaned against the kitchen counter by the sink, letting that silence sink into him, but it didn’t last long. The over timer dinged softly; Legolas’s cake was done. Bard eased the two pans out of the oven and onto the stovetop grill plate, letting them cool while he found a platter and a knife. He loosened the cakes in their pans, upended them on the platter, and extracted the cakes. He filled the empty pans with water to soak, then fired up Thran’s computer to look up the number of the county offices.

He called the number listed to ask about making an appointment tomorrow for their marriage ceremony, but the woman he talked to confirmed that he couldn’t make a reservation, but appreciated him letting her know that they’d appear around three o’clock. Next, he called the Japanese restaurant and made a reservation for six at five o’clock. If they arrived earlier than that, though, the restaurant assured him that it would be no problem. He stuck his mobile back in his pocket, satisfied that he’d arranged what he could for tomorrow.

Time to face the woodwork.

He dismantled Legolas’s bed and reassembled it in the children’s study, and shoved the rest of the furniture out onto the landing and then into the study after the bed. Now that the room was empty, he was ready to start its renovation.

Despite what Bard had told Thran, the silence that permeated the house was welcome. Bard spread his drop cloths and assembled his collection of paper towel rolls, putty knives, dental tools for fine crevices, steel wool, the big container of stripper, and a big plastic trashcan. He set to.

There was no getting around it – stripping woodwork was a messy, tedious, time-consuming task, with few shortcuts. So Bard started with the crown molding that required the tiring effort of working over his head, for getting that out of the way first would make the rest seem a little easier. Still, it was a long three hours before he’d scrubbed and scraped the detailed molding down to bare wood. He managed one of the windows in an hour, for the molding wasn’t so intricately carved.

His mobile chimed. Pulling off his glove, he fished it out of his pocket. Thran. His heart jolted. Was everything all right?

The message displayed – a photo of Thran holding up his empty lunchbox.

Have you had lunch yet? If not, why not?

Chagrined, Bard checked the time – after noon, in fact close to one. He yanked his other glove off, capped the stripper, and collected all the scattered paper towels and shredded bits of steel wool that had missed the trashcan. A contender for the NBA, he wasn’t. He fastened downstairs, washed his hands, and stuck his head in the fridge. Ah, there was the small bin of chicken casserole left over from last night’s supper. He pulled out the dish, scooped out a big spoonful, and took a picture of himself and the dish with the bite taken out of it.

Almost done.

You ran downstairs when you got my text and took a picture of the first thing you found in the refrigerator, didn’t you?

Guilty as charged. Thanks for reminding me. How is class?

Good. M. LePied sends you his regards, too.

Nice of him.

How is the woodwork?
Crown molding, 1 window done. Think I can do door, 2nd window 2day. Baseboard molding have to wait til tmw.

No matter.

Doesn’t smell too bad so far.

Good. Must go back to class now. Eat more than that one bite!

I hear and obey LOL.

Love you, my saint.

Love you, too, my angel.

Bard put his mobile down, smiling as he put the spoonful of casserole back in the dish. He shoved it in the microwave, surveying the fridge for something else to follow it as it warmed. Nothing struck his fancy, so when the casserole was hot, he sat at the table to shovel it down in between sips of almond milk. A couple of clementines finished off his lunch, and he rinsed his dishes and the cake pans and put them in the dishwasher. Then it was back upstairs and more woodwork.

He’d gotten the second window and the doorframe done, and had just started the baseboard molding when footsteps echoed in the downstairs hall.

“Are you still upstairs?” Thran heralded.

“Still upstairs,” Bard confirmed, rolling to his feet. “How was class?”

“It was fine, even the partner class,” Thran called up the steps. “I will unpack my bag, and be up.”

“Okay,” Bard replied, putting his putty knife aside. He collected the scattered paper towels and steel wool bits as before, tossed them in the trashcan, and went back to scrape off the last bit of stripper he’d just slathered over the first section of the baseboard. After the first pass, he coated the next section to soften the paint while he wiped the first section a few more times. At least the baseboard wasn’t as ornate as the crown molding, so he got the worst of the mess off in long scraps with his putty knife. A few pokes with dental tools, then a good wipe with steel wool soaked in the stripper, got the rest out of the crevasses, and he could move on.

“The smell isn’t so bad as I expected,” Thran said, sticking his head into the room. He’d changed out of his dancewear at the studio, so he’d been comfortable driving home in his soft black jeans, long sweater, and supple trainers. “I should not touch the woodwork, then?”

“It’s washed down, all but the bottom that I haven’t done. Once I finish this, I’ll sand it all, then it’s ready for the primer. What time is it?”

“Nearly time for the children to come home.” Thran ventured in as Bard stood up. He came to offer Bard a kiss, then looked around at the cleaned trim. “So amazing. I had not realized that the woodwork was so detailed. All the paint smothered that groove completely, and the pieces in the corners above the doors are small leaves, not blobs.”

“Hence the reason to strip it. It’s a pain in the ass, but it looks so much better.”

“To be sure.” Thran nodded readily. “So you paint the stripper on, and then...?”

“You wait until the paint softens, scrape it off, paint on more if needed, scrape that off, pick out the chips in the crevices with the dental tools, then make one last pass with steel wool soaked in stripper.
Wipe it down, and move to the next piece. Wash the whole thing down with water, then dry it off. It’s almost easier to replace the trim, but this is solid oak, and worth the effort. Some of the stuff downstairs is mahogany. It’d cost a fortune to replace it, if you could even find the stock to do so. So... scraping just costs elbow grease, and it gets you the beautiful millwork that was original to the house.”

“To look at the trim in Sigrid’s room shows how well your elbow grease pays off,” agreed Thran. “This does, too.”

“It’s worth it,” Bard exhaled. “I’ll scrape this last bit I’ve coated with the stripper, then be down to start supper.”

Thran watched closely as Bard cleaned off the next section, then recoated it to get the last bits of the remaining coats of paint, then painstakingly scraped the small grooves clear, then scrubbed gently with the soaked steel wool. As the last step, he wiped a wet sponge over the cleaned section to remove the last of the stripper. Thran came behind him with a towel to dry the cleaned section.

“I’ll be glad when this part is done,” Bard admitted as he tied off the trash bag and carried it downstairs to put in the outside garbage can. “Tedious, messy, and slow.”

“Just a little more left for tomorrow, and then things will progress faster,” Thran consoled, bringing the putty knives and dental tools downstairs to be washed.

“Good. Here, I’ll get these, Thran. Do you want to wash before supper? Have a soak? How did your partner class go?”

“Well, for the most part. I think I may have to resort to your chin up bar, though. I am sorer than I wish.”

Bard laughed. “I’m sorer, too, and it’s because I did those chin ups. It was worth it, though. I was well rewarded for every one of them.”

“So was I,” was Thran’s sly reply. “So I will help you with supper, and we will share a soak later, perhaps. Or at least a very hot shower.”

“Mmm,” Bard arched his eyebrows in anticipation. “Sounds wonderful.”

“Mmm,” Thran echoed, arching his eyebrows to mirror Bard’s expression. “What delight do you plan for us tonight?”

“Pork roast, in one of those bags. Steamed veg. Farro – that’s a whole grain, so it’s good for all of us. Whatever fruit’s in there. And Legolas’s cake – I have to make the icing. I’ll leave some for us without the icing.”

“It all sounds delicious.”

The tools were quickly washed, and by the time the children came in from the bus, the icing was going on the cake, and Thran had bowls of carrots, onions, peppers, and broccoli cut up for the steamer.

Legolas was jubilant, for he’d made his expected trip to the Gondors’ fencing studio with Killian and Tara. Bard had not seen the normally quiet boy so animated as words bubbled from him about the instructors, the facility, and the excitement of meeting Aragorn and Arwen personally after following their careers for so many years. Bain stayed by the table listening in rapt attention, and Sigrid took over Thran’s station in front of the cutting board to chop the snow peas. Tilda brought a sheet of paper over to Bard.

“Would you sign this for me, Da? I need a drawing book for art, and the school will give me one if you sign this form.”

“Let me put the raspberry stuff on the roast, little doll, and I’ll take a look.”

“Let me help, too.”

“Okay. You know how to spread the preserves on the top. I’ll hold the bag open for you.”

Bard plopped a big spoonful of the stuff on the top. After Tilda made sure it covered the roast from one end to the other, Bard closed the bag and put the pan in the oven. He set the timer, and took the paper Tilda held out to him. Scanning quickly, he nodded as he got the gist of the text.

“So it’s for a sketchbook and the instruction book, too? That’s exciting.”

Tilda smiled proudly. “It’ll be neat to have my own sketchbook.”

“A nice one, too, as nice as any of mine.” He took the pen Tilda held out, signed the form, and handed it back to her.

“Really?” Tilda smiled in delight.

“Really. I’ll get you the money after supper, all right?”

“Okay.” She skipped away to put the form in her backpack.

Legolas, Bain, and Thran had gone into the sitting room to continue their discussion about Legolas’s fencing, so Sigrid leaned over the kitchen island.

“So tomorrow’s the big day,” she observed, giving Bard a smile. “Are you excited?”

Bard touched her nose with his index finger. “I’ve been excited about something every day for the last ten weeks. This has all been such a surprise.”

“A dream come true?” she teased as she opened a can of water chestnuts. “All of it has been, except for those few minutes in the park. Have you heard anything about that?”

Bard shook his head. “Just a couple of short calls from Inspector Oakland. Apparently it’s cut and dried. All of our stories matched, and the younger children with Lance Dunmont told the same story. So I hope it’ll blow over pretty soon.”

“Did anyone notice that they had at least one knife and a gun, and all we had was a soccer ball, a soccer ball net, a welder with a terrific left punch, and a really, really pissed ballet dancer?”

“Someone noticed,” Bard nodded, grinning at Sigrid’s acerbic tone. “Try not to worry about it. The gang saved face because we moved out, so I don’t expect anything more to come of it.”

Sigrid nodded. “So tomorrow... what’s the plan?”

“Thran and I will pick all of you up at school after your last academic period, and we’ll head to the county office. They wouldn’t take an appointment, so we’ll have to sit until they call us. When it’s our turn, they anoint us with sanctified root beer, sing the Hallelujah Chorus in Russian, Welsh, and English, sacrifice a block of consecrated tofu to the gods, and then turn us loose. After that, we have a reservation at the Japanese steakhouse theatre of egg juggling.”

Giggling, Sigrid piled the sliced water chestnuts in the bowl with the snow peas and broccoli. “I wish they did all that. It’d be a lot more fun than what they’ll really do. Especially the sacrifice of the consecrated tofu. That’s all tofu is good for.”

“No argument here,” Bard grinned, as he put the farro on to cook, then piled the veg in the steamer.

Tilda came back into the kitchen, so the three of them laid out the flatware and glasses around the table, and got out the fruit to be cut up. Tilda got up on the stool and under Bard’s watchful eye, cut the strawberries into pieces. Before long, the roast was on the counter to rest while Bard steamed the veg, and in a few minutes everyone gathered around the table to eat. Of course there was more discussion of tomorrow’s ceremony, most of which centered on what the children wanted to wear.

“There is one more small thing to speak of,” Thran said, once Tilda had decided that she wanted to wear her favorite green sweater. “If we must wait very long for the officials to make our ceremony, we may find that we attract some unwanted attention when we leave the county building.”

Legolas knew what his father referred to, and Sigrid did, too. Bain didn’t, but when Legolas mimicked someone taking pictures, he got it. Tilda, however, looked at Bard with puzzlement.

“What kind of unwanted attention? It isn’t Lance Dunmont, is it?” she said anxiously.

“No, little doll, don’t worry about him. He won’t bother us anymore. What Thran means is that there might be some photographers outside the building, waiting to take pictures of us.”

Tilda cocked her head, still puzzled. “Why?”

“Because Thran is a very famous ballet dancer, little doll. He’s getting married tomorrow, and some people other than us care about that.”

“Oh,” Tilda shrugged, unimpressed. “Don’t they have anything else better to do?”

That brought snickers from around the table, Thran’s not the least of them. “One would think,” he agreed. “So I stopped on the way home from class today, and brought us the means to make the paparazzi a little more bearable, if any happen to appear.”

He got up, and soon reappeared with a bag. Bard was as mystified as the children, but laughed when he saw what Thran handed around the table. They planned how best to use Thran’s purchases, then it was time to clean up the remains of the meal. After everyone surveyed the progress in Legolas’s room, they returned to the kitchen table for homework. Bard ended up overseeing most of that, as Thran took the expected call from Aragorn Gondor about Legolas’s fencing. He reappeared briefly to ask if Bard was amenable to having the Gondors come for fencing and lunch Sunday afternoon, to which Bard quickly agreed.

The rest of the evening progressed quietly, and despite the children’s excitement over tomorrow’s occasion, they settled quickly. Tilda reminded Bard about the fee for her sketchbook, so he fetched the money for her to tuck into her backpack with the form. Once the children were in bed, Bard and Thran retreated gratefully to the shower, then the soaking tub.

“I’m paying the price for showing off like a peacock this morning,” Bard admitted, hunching down in the tub until the hot water covered his shoulders.

“I am as well for lifting so many ballerinas,” Thran agreed, copying Bard’s hunch. “Thank goodness I do not have a similar class tomorrow. I will need a day or so to loosen such tight
“I don’t think I’ll be hauling myself up and down in the barn tomorrow, either. No time, anyway. I’ve got a hot date with an angel at the county offices.”

“Do you?” Thran rumbled, sighing as the heat soaked into his shoulders. “I have similar plans. My hot date is with a saint at the same place. Perhaps we should go together.”

“With entourage. Or what’s the word for that these days?”

“Posse,” Thran murmured. “Eh, that is likely outdated, too. I rarely register such terms until they are already passé.”

They sat at opposite ends of the tub for long minutes, letting the warmth ease the rigors of the day. When they were well relaxed, Bard crawled out to dry his hair first so that he could warm the bed before Thran crawled in. Bard settled under the sheets while Thran applied the dryer, and before long the tall dancer came to nestle beside him.

“So just your morning class, and home by one?” Bard asked sleepily, wrapping himself around Thran to keep him from shivering.

“Just so,” Thran murmured. “Just time to wash and eat, then we are off to the school, and then to the county office.”

“Do you think we’ll have paparazzi to fend off, really?”

Thran sighed, and found Bard’s hand to stroke. “I hope not. I do not like the upset they might cause to the children. If we must wait for long, though, someone will call the press. But they are not allowed to touch, so merely smile and nod and keep moving. Keep Tilda close to you. She may find them frightening.”

“Your so-called armor will help.”

Thran’s snicker was sleepy. “I hope so. It will also help the children to smile.”

“Some smile,” Bard agreed, rubbing his lover’s arm. “So... tomorrow night, we’ll be legal.”

“I promise not to let it change the way I look at you.”

Bard rumbled an inquiry. “What does that mean?”

“I like you as my illicit lover who plays with me so deliciously because he wants to, not because he has to.”

Grinning, Bard insinuated his hand under Thran’s arm to stroke his abdomen. “Oh? You got pretty turned on when you were the sultan about to buy a not-very-cooperative slave.”

“I hope to get just as turned on when you are the sultan about to buy a not-very-cooperative slave. More so, because this time I have a bed to chain him to so that I can have him repeatedly at my leisure. In fact...”

“Save it for tomorrow, sultan. It’s late, and we have a long day ahead of us.”

“If I must.”

“Hmm. Sounds like I need to chain an exotic harem dancer to my bed and until he’s shown me every variation on the Kama Sutra there is.”

“Tcha,” Thran snorted. “That is not a very interesting chronicle of such things. The Chinese, however, have several much more interesting variations –”

“Why am I not surprised that you know that?”

“It should be obvious that I am a connoisseur of more than ballet and yoga.”

“Showoff.”

“I do not brag if I speak the truth. Would you like me to prove it?”

Bard buried his nose in the crook of Thran’s neck, savoring the exotic smell of his lover, the silky touch of his hair, and the soft skin. “Only for the next seven lifetimes and then some, cariad.”

Elegant fingers found Bard’s right hand, and brought it to Thran’s lips to kiss its ring. “That lyubov moya, will be my delight.”

Bard found Thran’s left hand, and stroked the ring it bore. “Mine, too.”

Neither of them needed any further demonstration of affection for the night.

* * *

The morning was even more frantic than usual, because of the excitement of the afternoon’s impending visit to the county offices. Even the boys, usually so mopey through breakfast, were chattering back and forth. When Thran peeked into Sigrid’s room, she’d scattered clothes from one end of it to the other, which took doing, considering that none of Bard’s children had a lot of clothes. She’d finally settled on a blue sweater tunic with a darker blue skirt and blue leggings. Tilda had made her choice with less scattering, opting for a green knitted top, her favorite blue and green pinafore, blue leggings, and her favorite green hoodie over that. The boys had decided to dress similarly, in dark jeans and boots, and Mandarin collared shirts from Legolas’s closet. Bain wore blue; Legolas green.

“This must be a special occasion,” Thran teased at breakfast, tugging one of Legolas’s braids. Both were freshly dyed green.

“I wanted them to look good in case anyone takes a picture,” his son smirked. “I offered to help the girls do one for themselves, but they didn’t. Bain did, though.”

Bard stood at the stove ladling out porridge, but swiveled around when he heard Legolas’s comment. Bain hunched down a little at the table, then a little more as Bard came over to stand with arms akimbo to examine his son’s head. Bain’s hair was much darker than Legolas’s was, but Thran quickly spotted the streak from crown straight down the back – it was blue, however, not green.

“Hmm,” Bard said, meeting Thran’s eyes. Both of them struggled to control their smiles. “I’m glad you didn’t go green. The blue looks a lot better on you.”

Bain’s eyes bugged out, and Legolas couldn’t stifle his hilarity. “I told you your Da wouldn’t mind.”

“I don’t,” Bard agreed, “But next time, ask first, so I can check that whatever chemicals you use aren’t lethal. After that, as long as you clean up the bathroom, and stick to just a streak or two in something other than pink or chartreuse, I’m okay.”

“Can I do all of it in blue?” Bain asked.

“No. Finish your breakfast, lads. The bus’ll be here soon.”

“Maybe I should have done a blue streak, after all,” Sigrid shook her head as she headed upstairs with Tilda to brush her teeth.

“I thought Da wouldn’t like it, either,” Tilda agreed.

Bard watched them troop out of the kitchen with a chuckle. “If all I have to worry about is a streak or two of hair dye, I’ve gotten off easy.”

“Yes,” Thran nodded over his tea. “So far, we have both gotten off easily.”

“It won’t last,” was Bard’s prediction. He didn’t seem overly concerned about it, which was a good sign. His saint was finally easing some of his excessive worry. “They haven’t had a knock down, dragged out fight since the day you came down about your radiators, so they’re overdue. Put Legolas in the mix, and they’re really overdue. Blended families never get along so well as ours has so far.”

“Let us hope that we survive today in good form, then. After that, whatever comes will come.”

“True. Have you packed your lunch yet?”

“I thought that it would save time if I came straight home after class and eat here, before we pick up the children.”

“Likely it would. I’ll have something ready for us at one when you get here, then.”

“You look after us well.” Thran held up his teacup in salute as the children filtered back down to the kitchen. “So, children! Lunches into the backpacks, and on to meet the bus.”

“Here are the notes to excuse you from class before sport,” Bard said, handing them out. “Remember to give them to your teachers, so we’re not late to the county office. They’re not open but for so long, and if we’re late, we don’t get married, and then we don’t get to see the egg juggling.”

“Okay, Da! Okay, Bard!” the children chorused, and the caravan through the mudroom and out to the bus stop commenced.

With the morning’s stir, they were a few minutes late out of the door, so the bus was already trundling up the road as they neared the stop. The children ran to catch up, and so Bard and Thran hastily completed the ritual about being off and leaving too, waved quickly to Rosie and the other parents, and hurried home. While Thran changed into his dance attire, Bard got set up to finish Legolas’s woodwork. Thran packed his clean towel, his extra shoes and tights and leggings, and braided his hair. He came into Legolas’s room to find Bard already painting stripper over the base molding of the wall he’d started yesterday.

“I am off and am leaving, too, lyubov moya,” Thran grinned as Bard looked up with paintbrush in hand. “I will text you when I leave to come home, so have your mobile with you.”

“I will. I hope I’ll be done this by the time you get here. I’m ready to do something else that isn’t as messy.”
“I am sure. So I will dance, and you will strip paint, and soon we will be together again.”

Bard stood, holding his paintbrush well away from Thran as he gave him a kiss. “So we will. Dance well, and come home soon.”

Thran tugged a lock of Bard’s unruly hair. “Until then.”

It was hard to leave when such a warm smile on Bard’s face beckoned him to dally, but it was his role to dance this morning, and so Thran took himself downstairs to collect his bag and his coat and his boots, and he was soon heading for the highway. Traffic was its usual congested self as he approached the city, but the annoyance of that soon dropped away as he parked outside the studio and began his familiar routine. To chat with the other dancers, to arrange his things by the barre, all were familiar and comforting. Still, even those didn’t quiet all of his anticipation for the afternoon’s festivities. Not for the first time, he missed Vileria’s strong presence beside him at the barre. She had been his best friend for over twenty years, and even seven years after her death, he still missed her. How he would have loved to tell her of his saint and his new life with him. She would have been happy for him, and would have been glad that their son was no longer in boarding school, but with a family, among friends. She would have loved Clan Ffyrnig as much as he did.

How glad he’d been when Bard had suggested they add a remembrance to Vileria and Daphne in their house. Legolas was not the only one who missed Vileria, and Sigrid and Bain were not the only ones who missed Daphne. Remembering them was like asking them to watch over their blended family, and to be happy for them, and that was nothing but an added blessing to everything they had so far.

Monsieur LePied arrived, and Thran gave himself to class as he always did. It was good to dissipate yesterday’s exertion in partner class with familiar movements, and it also helped him burn off his impatience for his upcoming marriage. Yet he remained silent, keeping his expression serene, burning off his energy in his jetés and pirouettes and arabesques. He put so much energy into his moves that at the end of class his shoulders and thighs were achier than usual. He bid his friends, colleagues, and Monsieur LePied good-bye, and headed right to his SUV without changing. He remembered to text Bard that he was on his way, received a brief acknowledgement in return, and then headed home.

Forty-five minutes, later, he pulled up to the house, grabbed his bag, and dashed inside. “Bard?” he shouted. “I am back!”

“Upstairs!” came back Bard’s baritone. “Almost done!”

Thran pulled off his coat, left it on the washer rather than hang it up, kicked off his trainers, and ran upstairs. “Is there anything I can help with?”

“I’ve just got this one little bit to go. If you swipe the rest with the sponge and water, that’d be a big help. Put on something crummy so it doesn’t get on your dance stuff.”

“I fly to the closet,” Thran replied, and did just that. It was a relief to get out of tight dance belt and sweaty tights, even if their replacement was a pair of Bard’s rattiest jeans. They were too big in the waist for him, but he found a belt to tighten them, then found a crummy tee shirt and old socks, and scampered back to Legolas’s room. Bard pointed him to the box of disposable surgical gloves, then showed him how to rinse the remaining stripper off the cleaned woodwork. By the time he’d rinsed all of the base molding, Bard had scraped the last bit free of paint. He plied the dental tools to clean out the narrowest crevices, did another swipe with stripper-soaked steel wool, then Thran rinsed that.

“Done!” Bard announced with relief, and capped the stripper. Thran helped him gather up the used paper towels and bits of steel wool, then wash the putty knife and dental tools. They left the tools to dry in the children’s bathroom, then dashed into their own bathroom to shave and scrub. They were both foul.

“If it’s bad luck to see the groom before the ceremony, then we’re in trouble,” Bard quipped as they got into the shower. “Because I’m seeing just about all of the groom there is to see right now.”

“Consider it an enticement for what comes later,” Thran said, eyes shut as he rinsed shampoo from his hair.

“I don’t need one,” Bard replied. “Not more of one, anyway. I’m already wired enough.”

“So am I. Even the dance did not entrance this morning as it usually does. I thought very often about how wonderful it is that this afternoon we will be married.”

“That same thought made stripping woodwork seem to take a lot longer than usual,” Bard said, stroking Thran’s back. “I’m done.”

“As am I.”

They toweled off. Thran dried his hair, and then helped Bard dry his. They dashed downstairs to eat the lunch Bard had made for them, then got dressed. There was some discussion about what to wear, but nothing that compared to what the children, especially Sigrid, had required. Since all the clothes Thran had bought Bard at the mall were comfortable and well fitting, Bard let Thran choose his things first, and then Bard matched his clothes to Thran’s. They grabbed Thran’s bag of props, got into the SUV, and set off for the Imladris Academy.

All four children were waiting for their fathers in the school office when they arrived, so they reached the county office just after two-thirty. Sigrid took possession of the bag of props. Bard and Tilda led the way, followed by the two boys, then Thran with Sigrid beside him. Bard spoke to the woman at the window, who pointed him to a bench to the left. Two couples already sat on the bench, so Bard, Thran, and the children filed to the far end of the bench. There was just room for Sigrid and Tilda to sit down, so the boys sat on the floor, and Bard and Thran stood beside them.

A doorway opened, a man came out, and gestured to the couple seated at the rightmost end of the bench. When the couple disappeared with the man through the doorway, everyone slid over, and now all of the children had space to sit down.

After so much anticipation throughout the day, to suddenly have to sit and wait was like being about to step onto the stage to dance, then have to wait for some inexplicable delay. The same tension was in Bard’s eyes, and all of the children were fidgety. When Bain and Legolas became too energetic in their poking and prodding of each other, he and Thran separated them, putting Tilda and Sigrid between them. Tilda reached into her coat pocket and pulled out a book, but even that wasn’t the calming influence it normally would be. On top of it, the woman behind the counter kept looking at them with a frown, and the couple beside them didn’t look too sanguine either, so Thran wracked his brains for something that would distract the children.

“Perhaps I could take the boys for a walk around the building?” he murmured to Bard. “How long do you think we must wait?”

“The clerk on the phone said the ceremony takes twenty minutes. So the first couple just went in, and there’s one more ahead of us, so we’ve got maybe thirty or forty minutes to wait.”

“Is there anything in the building that the children could look at to distract them?”
“Not much, and we can’t use our mobiles to get us all back here in case we misjudge the time. Wait, I’ve got an idea. Tilda, would you let me borrow your book? I’ll read it aloud so we all can listen to the story while we wait. In fact, we can all take turns reading. How about that?”

The boys were less than interested, but Bard sat on the floor against the wall opposite the bench and began to read. It was Tilda’s copy of The Hobbit from school, which all of the children had read, but even the boys settled as Bard began the tale of the small, sheltered hobbit and the wizard and dwarves who had descended upon him. Thran sat beside Bard, and soon Tilda climbed into his lap to listen, which captivated him completely. Even the other couple began to listen to the story, and by the time their turn came to venture through the door, they seemed sorry to go. The book went around among them, each reading a few paragraphs before passing the book along. When Tilda’s turn came, Thran held the book for her, turning the page as directed, then he read the next part before handing the book to Sigrid. They got through several pages before the door opened for them.

“Next?”

Bain handed the book back to Tilda, who put it back in her coat pocket, then they all trooped through the door.

The next fifteen minutes were the most mundane Thran could have imagined, barely more exciting than renewing a driver’s license at the Motor Vehicle Administration. The ceremony that had made him an American citizen had held much more excitement. But this one was no less momentous, despite the plain setting and the short routine. They handed over their marriage license and the fee for the ceremony to a clerk, who typed up the marriage certificate for them to give to the official who would perform their ceremony, and pointed them to another door.

Inside the door, they met the official who would perform their rite. The young man was almost as tall as Bard and as slender as Thran, though where Thran was clearly an athlete, Mr. Lindir was the slight, bookish short. He greeted them with a smile and shy efficiency, and took a few moments to chat with them before beginning the ceremony. He soon understood that Thran and Bard wanted to include the children in the ceremony as much as the standard form allowed, and so arranged Bard with Bain and Sigrid to either side of him and Tilda in front, and Legolas to Thran’s right.

He began the ceremony without preamble, reading with respect, without rushing, and took pains to include the children in his comments. Then he led them through their vows, Bard first, then Thran. For the exchange of rings, Bard took his off and handed it to Sigrid. It went from Sigrid to Bain and then to Tilda, who handed it to Legolas, who gave it at last to Thran, so that he put it back on Bard’s right hand with the blessing of all the children. Likewise, when Thran handed his ring to Legolas, it went to Tilda to Bain to Sigrid and at last to Bard, who put it back on Thran’s left hand with the children’s blessing. At the end, when all had been said, Thran and Bard exchanged a quick kiss. Mr. Lindir signed their certificate, placed it in a plain white envelope, and handed it to them with his kind congratulations. He was also kind enough to take a picture of the six of them with everyone’s mobiles before they left. The clerk who showed them out of the office echoed Mr. Lindir’s congratulations, and it was done.

The hall was empty when they re-emerged, so Thran took advantage of the relative privacy to hug Bard hard.

“I couldn’t be happier, lyubov moya.” The grin on his face was surely silly and sappy and foolish, and he didn’t care.

“Nor can I.” Bard hugged him just as hard back, and wore a similarly wide grin. “What a ten weeks it’s been, cariad. I can’t believe any of it. If this is a dream, I never want to wake up.”
“I don’t either.”

“How can we go eat now?” Bain, naturally, asked. “I am starving!”

“You're always hungry,” Legolas snickered.

“We can’t go yet,” Sigrid protested. “First I want to hug my Da and my Ada. You know you both owe me big time for being your excellent co-conspirator, don’t you?”

“We do, ma chère,” Thran laughed as Sigrid wrapped arms around him, squeezed hard, and planted a big smack on his cheek. She repeated the performance on her father, who hugged her tenderly and whispered in her ear. She swallowed hard, but was still smiling when she let her father go.

Tilda gave her father a hug and a kiss, then turned to Thran. He stooped down to her level. “Can I give you a hug, too, Thran?”

“I would be delighted, ma chère,” He enfolded her carefully in his arms, not squeezing too hard. But her arms tightened around him, and a prim kiss pressed against his cheek. “Oh, you are sweet to offer me a kiss, too, Tilda. It makes me very happy.”

“You’re welcome,” Tilda nodded with a smile.

“Can we please go eat now?” Bain repeated more impatiently.

“Let me shake your hand first,” Thran extended his. “I am glad we are all in Clan Ffyrnig together now.”

“So am I,” Bard agreed, offering his hand to Legolas. “Thanks for being such a good friend to Bain. You saved him from his sisters.”

“You got that right,” Bain said, shaking Thran’s hand. “So now can we go eat?”

“Bain’s been a good friend to me, too,” Legolas said as he shook Bard’s hand. “And I agree with him. Can we please go eat now?”

“Now we can go eat,” Bard agreed, sharing a laugh with Thran. “It’s only four, so we’re an hour early, but the restaurant said it didn’t matter if we were.”

They retraced their steps back to the front security checkpoint, where one of the officers waved to them as they headed out.

“Either of you Thran Oropherson?”

Thran stepped forward, searching the officer's uniform for his nameplate. “I am, Officer... Hardy. Is there some problem?”

The officer jerked his head towards the front door. “There’s a half dozen guys out there with cameras looking for you. They tried camping out in here, but we told ‘em they’d have to wait outside. Just thought you’d like to know you’ll have company when you walk outside.”

Thran looked around at his family – his family – with a smug smile. “Thank you, Officer Hardy. We came prepared for this. Clan Ffyrnig, it is time to put on our armor.”

Snickering, Sigrid held out the bag of props. Everyone donned one of the items in the bag, drawing the two officers on duty to laugh, but Tilda decided her disguise wasn’t complete yet. She dug in another pocket of her coat and pulled out a headband decorated with two antennae topped with big yellow pompoms.

“Very fetching, little doll,” Bard complimented, taking her hand. “Everyone ready? Just keep walking, smile, and don’t say anything. In ten minutes, they’ll all be gone.”

Sigrid slipped her arm into Thran’s to take the lead. Bain and Legolas lined up behind them, and Bard and Tilda brought up the rear.

“Ready to mislead the press?” Sigrid cast him a conspiratorial look as she donned her armor.

“Always, ma chère. Armor on, Clan Ffyrnig! We go!”

They came out of the county office so briskly that several of the paparazzi were caught off guard. It wasn’t until they were some several steps down the sidewalk that Thran’s white hair gave them away, and came in pursuit. The howls of complaint had Sigrid giggling beside him.

“Mr. Oropherson! Mr. Oropherson! Is it true that you’ve just gotten married? What’s the young lady’s name, sir! Over here, Thran! Aw, come on, Mr. Oropherson, give us a break! Take off the Groucho glasses! Let us see the young lady! Sir, sir, are you the young lady’s father? Can you speak to us please? Are you excited about your daughter’s marriage to such an eminent ballet dancer? What about you, young man? Are you excited about your father’s marriage?”

Bard, Sigrid and Thran were laughing by that time, but Clan Ffyrnig held formation until they reached the SUV, where the children piled into the back seats. The paparazzi stayed back far enough to let Thran and Bard get into the front seat, and edged back as Thran maneuvered the SUV away from the curb. A half a block down they were out of sight.

“Okay, armor off,” Bard declared, pulling off his Groucho glasses with its huge fake nose, bushy eyebrows, and equally bushy mustache. “Everyone okay?”

“I’m fine, no problem, I’m all right, what a pain those guys are,” came from the children.

“They thought Thran married Sigrid?” Bain called from the back seat, snorting in derision. “They’re a right lot of fools, aren’t they?”

“I hadn’t expected that,” Thran admitted. “I mean no insult, Sigrid, but clearly, they are fools.”

“No offense taken,” Sigrid shook her head. “Although it’ll be a good story to tell Finn Durinson.”

That brought a raft of jibes, laughter, and snorts from the car’s occupants, not the least of which were from Sigrid.

“So are you married now?” Tilda asked from behind Thran.

“We are married now,” Bard assured her. “All signed, sworn, and sealed. For good.”

It had been a long time since Thran had heard anything that sounded so wonderful. He met Bard’s eyes with a contented smile.

“Yes,” he echoed. “For good.”
Chapter 43

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint, with cherubs in tow, enjoy a show at their wedding feast.

Later on, an entirely different sort of wedding feast ensues.

Chapter Notes

This chapter is rated Triple E - Extremely Explicit Episode.

Never let it be said that readers can't convince me to add a little spice to the story. This is a lot of spice, and the ones to blame for it know who they are. We will all burn in someone's version of hell for this, but at least we'll all be there together, and so will all of our friends. It ought to make for quite a party. See you there!

The journey between the county office and the venue for their supper was far enough that none of the press followed them, so they were able to dash inside the Japanese restaurant without incident. Bain and Legolas were the first through the door, so excited were they to be initiated into the wonders of tableside cooking and showmanship. Thran held the door open for Bard to precede him, so Bard took Tilda's hand and drew her inside ahead of Sigrid and Thran. The boys were already jumping up and down at the hostess station, where a young Japanese attendant with spiky red and black hair, an equally bright red cap, and black chef's coat, pants, and clogs laughed at their excitement. Bard moved ahead to speak to her about their reservation. As promised, there was no issue about their early arrival, and they were led to a small dining room right away.

The main attraction of this restaurant was the cooking that took place in the center of the diners. In this small room, a wide cooktop sat in the middle with dining spaces for two arranged around three sides. The boys wanted the far corner, so Thran took the end seat next to Bain. Tilda sat beside Legolas, in the second corner with her sister. Bard took the other end beside Sigrid, across from Thran. The attendant – her chef's coat identified her as Cindy – handed menus around, bustled to bring pots of tea while they decided what they wanted, and complimented the boys about their dyed hair. She answered their questions about the menu, noted their choices, and went off to relay their order to the kitchen.

In just a few minutes, Cindy reappeared carrying a big cutting board full of vegetables, three bowls of various meats, and a huge bowl of steaming cooked rice. She would be their chef. As she set the bowls on the cart beside her and turned on the grill, Bain's face fell, and Legolas looked worried. Bard smothered a grin of anticipation. His son thought Cindy wouldn't give him the show he expected.

“Awww, why the long face?” Cindy put her arms akimbo and gave the boys an exaggerated frown. “Are you gonna give me a lotta trouble about eating your vegetables? Are you gonna tell me you don't like red pepper and purple onions and orange carrots? I mean, who doesn't like red pepper and purple onions and orange carrots? I bet your sisters like vegetables, right, girls?”
“I do,” Tilda said, leaning forward as Cindy squirted oil out of a squeeze bottle onto the grill, and pulled out a big cleaver.

“Sure, I do, too,” Sigrid seconded her sister.

“Of course you do! I like ‘em, too. Especially when I get to chop ‘em up!”

Cindy tossed her cleaver in the air with a little twist, caught it on the way down, and chopped the ends off all the vegetables on the cutting board. She threw the ends in a waste can underneath the griddle, then proceeded to make slivers and slices of the vegetables in a blur of motion.

“Whoa,” Bain breathed, starting to smile.

“Yeah,” Legolas agreed. “Wow!”

“See? I knew you liked vegetables!” Cindy grinned, scraping the vegetables onto the grill and stirring them into the hot peanut oil so that they sizzled. She took up the bowl of chicken and spread the pieces over the cutting board. “Now, I know you won’t tell me you don’t like chicken, will you?”

“I like chicken, and so does Thran!” Tilda said, getting into the spirit of things. “We all like chicken!”

“A little steak and shrimp, too?” Cindy grinned. “We need more cleavers for all of that, doncha think? Like, maybe three?” She pulled out the extra cleavers, but made another face. “Oh, now what? Two hands, three cleavers? That doesn’t come out even, does it? I guess I’ll have to put one down...”

“No!” Legolas and Bain and Sigrid protested. “Don’t put any of them down!”

“Don’t put any of them down? Geez, you guys! What am I supposed to do? I’ve gotta chop up all of this chicken, or you don’t get dinner! I gotta put one of them down!”

“Oh, don’t!” Tilda clapped your hands. “You can do it!”

“I can do what? What can I do?”

“Juggle!” all four children chorused.

“Juggle! You think I can juggle cleavers? Are you crazy? These big knives?”

“Juggle!” The children cheered, clapping.

“Wow, you’re a tough crowd! I dunno, though... I’ll try, I guess, but I don’t know how it’ll go...” Looking nervous, Cindy tossed the first cleaver up, then the second and third, but her hands never hesitated, and the knives went around in an impressive flash of blades to great applause. Every few rounds, she juggled two knives in one hand while using the third knife to slice a piece of the chicken.

“You are very good!” Thran clapped, laughing. “Most excellent!”

“Thank you!” Cindy said, the knives still going around and chopping. “You are a discerning diner!”

“He dances with knives, so he knows with he’s talking about!” Bain bragged, drawing Cindy to smile a little wider.

“Then your compliment is high praise, indeed. Thank you! So I think we have enough chicken.” She caught the cleavers, scraped the chicken onto the cooktop, stirred it around, then dumped the bowl of meat onto the cutting board. She repeated the same juggle of knives to chop up the meat, scraped it onto the grill, and added the shrimp beside it. “So, are we good for meat, now?”

“We’re good!” The children cheered, even Sigrid, laughing.

“Okay!” She put the first cleaver down, caught the last two, and put them aside. “So we’ve got veggies, we’ve got chicken and steak and shrimp... what else do we need?”

“Rice!” Tilda cheered.

“And eggs! You have to juggle the eggs!” Bain yelled, jumping up and down in his seat, making Bard laugh.

“Juggle eggs? Boy, you are a really tough crowd! I juggled three cleavers for you, didn’t I?”

“That was for Bain and Legolas,” Tilda said with a big grin. “Juggling the eggs is for Sigrid and me!”

“You got it, girl!” Cindy cheered, reaching under the counter for a bowl of eggs. “Okay, let’s do eggs! How many eggs do we need? Two?”

“No, more!” Tilda replied with a vigorous shake of her head.

“Three?”

“More!” Bain and Legolas protested.

“More?” Cindy looked flustered. “I’ve got only four eggs in here, guys! You want me to juggle all four of them?”

“Yes!”

“But there’s a problem. I can juggle only three things at a time. That’s my limit. I can’t do any more than three. So I’ll just have to get rid of one of these eggs, I guess –”

Cindy tossed the egg high, eyeballed it once, and caught it in her cap, to great applause. Then she tossed up the other three eggs, spinning them around and around, then let one smash onto the cooktop. She juggled the two eggs in one hand as she picked the shell off the cooktop.

“Oops! Good thing I still have one more egg left, isn’t it?” She snatched the egg out of her hat, spun the three eggs around a few more times before catching one in her hat again. She cracked the remaining two over the cooktop at the same time, one in each hand, then tilted her head forward to tip the last egg onto the cooktop. She cleaned away the shells, stirred the four eggs around to cook them quickly, and dumped the cooked rice over the eggs. A splash of soy sauce, a sprinkle of chopped green onions, and the rice was ready. She stirred everything else around to keep it cooking evenly, and finished her performance off with an exaggerated bow to great applause.

“Amazing!” Legolas breathed, jostling Bain. “That was just so cool!”

“Yeah, you were amazing!” Bain agreed, clapping. “How long did it take you to learn that?”

“Oh, about fourteen thousand eggs,” she laughed. “My mom hated me!”

“But the children love you,” Bard laughed. “Show Cindy how much you liked her cooking, all!”
Cindy received another round of enthusiastic applause, which brought a big smile to her face. “You are the best! So, who wants some of this great food?”

She plated the cooked food, and everyone dug in with great enthusiasm. Because they’d come in so early, Cindy lingered to talk to Thran and Bard about knife juggling and how enthusiastic the children were. She showed Tilda how to hold the chopsticks, giving her a big smile when Tilda figured out how to pick up a round of carrot. The boys persuaded her to juggle a trio of the light chopsticks, which she managed easily. She topped that by juggling a chopstick, a carrot, and a cleaver, which impressed Bard as much as anything else she’d done – it was no small feat to juggle three such differently shaped and weighted objects.

Despite all the laughing, it didn’t take long before all of the food had disappeared, and Cindy presented them with a big platter of different ice creams. Bard tried a little of each flavor – green tea, orange, coconut, and cinnamon. Even the boys were full when the ice cream was gone. In addition to the large tip they left, Thran and Bard made sure to compliment the restaurant manager on Cindy’s skills.

The ride home was well animated as everyone marveled over Cindy’s juggling. Bard was just as impressed at her skill at managing young boys who had thought the appearance of a girl meant they’d miss the show they expected. Thran further gilded her performance by talking about how hard he’d worked to master knives for his dancing.

“Can you juggle knives like Cindy did, Thran?” Tilda asked.

“I can juggle batons, so in theory, perhaps so,” Thran considered. “But I think I should leave such things to the experts at the grill. They are much better practiced than I!”

“I thought she was stellar!” Sigrid said. “You didn’t think she’d be able to do anything, did you, Bain? But she set you right.”

“She was amazing,” Bain admitted without rancor.

“I liked how she chopped up everything while she juggled,” Legolas said. “It’d be cool to learn how to do that.”

“Stick to fencing, please,” Thran asked. “Do not decide to borrow Bard’s kitchen knives for anything other than to sedately chop the vegetables.”

That brought groans of disappointment from the boys and laughter from everyone else. The boys continued to discuss the nuances of Cindy’s expertise until they came into the house.

“All right, Clan Ffyrnig, it’s still a school night, so go brush your teeth, and then get out your homework,” Bard directed. “Time to pay the piper for the fun supper.”

That met with little enthusiasm, but soon enough everyone had settled around the kitchen table to fill out worksheets, make trigonometric and algebraic calculations, study maps, and write essays. Bard put on the kettle for more tea, and he and Thran went upstairs to change out of their good clothes. Thran pulled on leggings and long sweater, but Bard pulled on the old jeans and tee shirt that Thran had worn earlier.

“Why those?” Thran looked at him askance.

“They smell like you,” Bard admitted.

“I was rank from the dance when I put them on.”
Bard shrugged, grinning. “I like knowing you had these on before me.”

Thran rolled his eyes, but didn’t say any more. They returned to the sitting room to enjoy their hot drinks while the children worked. It was sweet to sit side by side, to admire the ring on his right hand as he stroked Thran’s thigh, just as sweet as it was to admire the ring on Thran’s left hand as he stroked Bard’s thigh. As the implications of the day’s events sank in, a smile grew on his face. It was just a Thursday night, and yet it was so much more.

Lips brushed on his temple, and long, pale fingers tightened on his thigh.

“I feel it, too,” Thran whispered.

“I hope it’s not indigestion,” Bard whispered back. “You’re not used to ice cream, angel.”

Thran’s laughter was breathy. “I do not think my happiness is the result of indigestion, lyubov moya. But if so, then the next time we are at the market, we must get more of the coconut ice cream. It was delicious.”

“The cinnamon was good, too. In fact, they were all good. Did you try just the coconut?”

“Of course I tried them all – a mouthful of each, then a little more of the one I liked the best.”

“So you had... what? A huge quarter cup, all told?”

“I do not need a lot of ice cream,” Thran sniffed the steam of his tea, humming in appreciation, before he took another sip.

“That’s just as well. The children ate triple what they needed.”

“Fuel for the homework. It goes quietly, I think.”

“Quiet and children is never a good sign,” Bard cast Thran a look as he sat forward on the sofa to look towards the kitchen. “Everything all right in there? You’re very quiet.”

“We’re fine,” Sigrid’s voice came back. “Everybody’s working on essays.”

“Okay,” Bard called, sitting back. “Til, how’re you coming along?”

“I need to work on my French words. Thran, tu peux me demander mes mots?”

Thran and Bard looked at each other in surprise. Apparently Tilda had learned some French very quickly.

“Certainement, ma petite,” Thran replied. “Passe-moi ta liste et je vais t’interroger sur ton vocabulaire.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up when Tilda trotted into the sitting room with a piece of poster board in her hand, and he looked at Thran in surprise.

“I said, ‘would you ask me my words, and Thran said, ‘pass me your list, and I’ll ask you your words,’” Tilda replied with a mischievous smile.

“I think someone has had a little help, yes?” Thran scrutinized Tilda with amusement.

“Peut-être,” she shrugged. “Eh, Legolas, Bain, et Sigrid, ils m’ont aidé.”
Legolas, Bain and Sigrid helped you,” Thran translated.

“Yes. They helped me with this, too.” Tilda looked back to the kitchen. “Clan Ffyrnig, ici!”

The older children came in from the kitchen as Tilda turned the poster board around and held it up for Bard and Thran. It was an elaborate, brightly colored, hand-drawn picture that said Happy Wedding Day across the top. Underneath was a drawing of the house, with Clan Ffyrnig written over the door, and six figures in front of it. Names were neatly printed underneath each figure, but under Thran’s figure were printed, Ada, Thran, and Father, while under Bard’s figure were printed Da and Bard.

“We couldn’t find a good card in the shops, so we made this instead,” Tilda explained.

“This is twice as wonderful as a card from any shop,” Thran said as he regarded the poster in amazement. Pointing to the tallest dark-haired figure, rather than the one with the long white hair, he said, “This is me, yes?”

“No!” Tilda scolded. “That’s Da! You’re the one with the long white hair, silly Thran!”

“Oh, so I am,” Thran put a hand to his heart and bowed abjectly. “I am so sorry. Please, may I give you a hug for such a wonderful picture? For you drew it, yes?”

“Sigrid thought about what we should draw, Tilda drew it, and Bain and I thought of what each of the figures should include so you’d know who gave it to you,” Legolas explained. “Then we all filled in the colors.”

“Yeah, see there, Legs has the bow and sword, and I’ve got the soccer balls,” Bain explained as Tilda gave Thran a hug. “Til’s got the paint palette and book, and Sig’s got the running shoes and the pencil. Da, you’re beside Hope the Lope, and Thran, you’re beside your ballet barre.”

“This is great,” Bard said quietly, giving Tilda a big hug after Thran. “Just great. It’s the best present you could have given us. We’re going to get a frame for it and hang it somewhere. And when I get enough of the house fixed, I’ll make us a sign that says Clan Ffyrnig on it, and we’ll put it over the front door just as you’ve drawn it.”

Bard got up to hug all of the children, gratified when he got an embrace and big smile from Legolas. They propped the poster over the mantle until such time as they’d find a frame for it.

“I hate to ask this after your so kind gift,” Thran asked with a grimace, “but have any of you done your homework, or have you completed your masterpiece instead?”

“Tilda’s done,” Sigrid assured them. “I’m almost done. I think Legolas and Bain are not too far from done, either.”

“But I really do need help with my French words,” Tilda looked up at Thran.

“So bring me the real list this time, and we shall review them,” Thran smiled.

“And the rest of you, try to finish quickly so you can cycle through the shower,” Bard said gruffly, trying to swallow the lump in his throat.

“May I go up now?” Sigrid asked. “I want to wash my hair, and it can dry while I do this last government assignment.”

“Fine,” Bard nodded. “Go.”
As the children scattered, Thran put an arm around Bard’s shoulders and brushed a kiss on his hair. “They are something, our Clan Ffyrnig.”

The lump grew larger in Bard’s throat, but he nodded without hesitation. “Like nothing before or after.”

Tilda went through her list of French vocabulary three times before the lump in Bard’s throat went down.

* * *

Despite the children’s extracurricular drawing of posters, homework and showers progressed at a good pace, and soon the children were in bed, leaving Bard and Thran to themselves. When Bard came into the bedroom after telling Bain and Legolas goodnight, Thran had already changed out of his leggings and sweater into the silk Mandarin robe that so suited him. Bard sighed as his long, elegant husband swathed in pale grey gossamer silk enfolded Bard in his arms and pressed a kiss on his ear.

“My sweet husband,” Thran whispered, stroking Bard’s hair.

Bard nestled Thran against him, cradling Thran’s buttocks in his hands, burying his nose in the crease of Thran’s neck where it joined his shoulder. He breathed in to get his fill of Thran’s scent. “Oh, yes. How do we celebrate, cariad? We shared the traditional wedding night pleasures the first night we moved in.”

Thran hummed suggestively. “We did. But now we are legal.”

“I thought it was the illicit that turned you on.”

“It is,” Thran admitted, threading his fingers through Bard’s hair, stroking the nape of his neck, tugging the long hair there gently from roots to ends, over and over, touches both calming and arousing. “So... perhaps we should balance our observance of tradition with something... less traditional, and... more illicit.”

“What do you have in mind?” Bard murmured, stroking Thran’s lips, drawing his fingers back when Thran nipped at them.

“I was very... accommodating when we christened the kitchen, lyubov moya,” Thran purred.

Something about the way Thran caressed the word accommodating sent a stir of arousal through Bard. “Very.”

“How... accommodating can you be tonight?”

The fingers stroking his hair had strayed from back to front, tracing down his ribs, not touching his nipples, but drawing Bard’s tee shirt over them enough that they tingled.

“That, you bastard, depends on what you want me to accommodate.”

Lips nibbled his ear. A breathy whisper raised the hackles on the back of his neck. Fingers caressed his ribs, pulling his tee shirt back and forth over his nipples. “Yesterday morning...”
“Mmm... w-what about... yes-yesterday morning...”

“When I asked you to show me your chin up bar...”

“You didn’t ask me,” Bard swallowed as his nipples hardened under Thran’s teasing. “You teased me into it, just like you’re doing now. So tell me what you want this time.”

“You showed me your chin up bar because you said I owned you. What that did to me... such a fire it lit in me. I cannot resist it. I want to own you tonight.”

Bard swallowed hard as his body flooded with heat and his loins spasmed with arousal. Thran would not be any more merciful than he’d been when he’d teased Thran to within an inch of his endurance in the kitchen – probably less so. Oh, gods, I am so screwed...

“I feel you tremble already,” that breathy voice coaxed. “You want it. You want me to own you.”

“Remember what I told you I’d do to you in the ballroom.”

Thran grinned, a most predatory expression. “I look forward to it more than I should admit. Tonight, let me offer you even more incentive to make a truly overwhelming game of it.”

“We still have our trigger word?” Bard whispered, his body already betraying him – skin in gooseflesh, loins aching, every nerve ending alive and awake.

“Always, lyubov moya. That will always be inviolate. There will never be coercion, pain, disrespect between us. Only love.”

Bard shut his eyes. Why did his body lust to relinquish control to an angel who would turn into a devil as soon as he consented to his own desecration?

“You own me. Take what you want.”

The hands in his hair tightened, and the lips near his ear drew back, baring teeth to nip, but the voice that whispered in his ear remained as soft as Thran’s silk robe.

“If I own you, then you are property. Property does not wear clothes. Strip now.”

As soon as Bard pulled off his tee shirt, Thran’s hand was wound in the back of his hair, holding him at the scruff of his neck as he fumbled to unhook his belt, unbutton and unzip his jeans, and shimmy them down over his hips. He stepped out of them, toed off his socks, and stood naked in Thran’s grasp.

“Property does not stand in my presence. Down.”

The pressure on his nape urged him down, so Bard sank to his knees. The fingers in his hair loosened to stroke the strands over and over in that same compelling rhythm. Shutting his eyes, Bard soaked up the caresses, letting the slow touches lull him. He nosed Thran’s robe open until he could nestle against his bare legs, rubbing his cheek against the inside of Thran’s knee.

“Property does not touch me until I allow it.”

“I know what you like,” Bard whispered, still rubbing his cheek against Thran’s leg, higher this time, against Thran’s inner thigh. “The harem talks. They whisper in the shadows about what the pale mandarin wants, what he craves. I listened. I know what you want, what you crave. I can give it to you.”
“Shut your eyes.”

“They already are.”

“Stay.”

Thran moved away from him. Bard bit his lip, wondering what Thran was about, but he stayed where he was, blind and unmoving.

“Property does not speak, does not presume. You have done both. Do you know what happens to property so bold?”

Bard shook his head.

A rustle at his back, then at his nape, and something went over his head to settle around his neck – the worn leather belt from his jeans, looped like a choke chain through the buckle. Thran drew it snugly against his skin, but not tightly.

“It is leashed. If that is not enough, it can also be gagged, blindfolded, and bound. I hope that will not be necessary, especially the first. I prefer to make better use of your mouth. Do you understand?”

Bard nodded.

“Good. Come.”

Thran tugged on Bard’s leash, leading him to the chair in the corner of the room. Thran sat down, then drew Bard to curl on the floor between his knees. Fingers stroked his hair again.

“Stroke my leg as you just did.”

Bard rubbed his cheek against Thran’s leg, taking care not to rub too hard. After a few strokes, he dared to press his lips against the inside of Thran’s knee, then when that didn’t earn him a reprimand, he drew his teeth lightly down Thran’s calf, barely nipping at it, then brushing his lips against the places he nibbled. The belt tightened around his neck, drawing him up. As fingers went under his chin, tilting his face up, he lowered his eyes, keeping his gaze on the silk robe beneath him.

“Good. You know something of the proper deference. Loosen my robe.”

Bard fumbled to free the small monkey’s paw buttons from their loops down the front of Thran’s robe. He couldn’t concentrate with Thran’s fingers caressing his scalp, then teasing a lock free to slide it through his fingers, over and over in time to his heartbeat. Before he was through all the buttons, his hair was in his face, brushing against his forehead and cheekbones, a feathery touch no less arousing than Thran’s fingers. The slivers of pale, pale skin peeking from under silvery grey silk were another tease that made his mouth water so much that he had to swallow. When he finally breeched the last button, slippery fabric slid to either side of Thran’s body, forcing him to swallow again. That lean, muscled body was something he was forbidden to touch until commanded, yet it lay before him, elegant and compelling. He was only inches from Thran’s cock nestled in its nest of white hair.

The belt tightened until it was too short for him to sink back to the floor, and Thran wrapped the end around the wooden arm of the chair to tether him in place. As soon as a hand wound in into his hair at the base of his neck, Bard didn’t need words to know what Thran wanted. He lowered his head to nuzzle the long cock before him, kissing and licking and nipping before engulfing all of it in his mouth. He lavished all of his attention on his lover, edging his hands up to stroke Thran’s inner thighs, his groins, his abdomen, then to fondle his balls. As Thran grew hard and erect, he wound both hands in Bard’s hair to position him as he wanted, and Bard employed everything he’d learned from Thran’s uninhibited display of a few nights ago to please him. Soon enough, Thran no longer sat languidly with Bard’s face buried in his crotch, but was coiled tightly, hands clenched in Bard’s hair. All at once Thran tore the belt free of the chair arm and jerked him back. Thran stood before him and dragged him back into position. Bard steadied himself with hands on Thran’s buttocks as Thran resumed his hold on Bard’s hair and plunged his cock into Bard’s mouth, working in short, uncontrolled thrusts to bring himself to release.

Bard swallowed everything Thran gave him, humming as his lover swayed in the depths of his climax, steadying him until the flood had passed. He let Thran’s spent cock slip out of his mouth, pressed kisses on his thighs and groins, and massaged his buttocks and hamstrings. Thran backed up the two steps he needed to lie back on the bed, savoring his release with a long exhale. He still held the end of the belt loosely in his hand, so Bard sank to his heels, but otherwise didn’t move, no matter how badly he wanted to climb atop the pale body that had teased him so.

In a minute or two, Thran raised himself up on one elbow. His robe was off one shoulder, and the soft fabric veiled only part of his body. His hair was still smooth, without disarray – how Bard wanted to twine his hands in it, ruin its elegant smoothness, make his lover cry out in another release.
Thran’s lips curved in a sly smile. His lover wasn’t through yet, then. Indeed, no sooner had Thran smiled but the belt tightened, drawing Bard to the end of the bed. Thran shifted until he reclined at the foot of the bed, with Barn crouched on the floor near his head.

“You did well,” Thran murmured, stroking Bard’s hair again. “Perhaps I should reward you. Would you like that?”

Bard nodded, daring to look up into Thran’s eyes. Fingers cupped his chin, and lips descended to give him a deep, deep kiss, full of tongue and nipping teeth. The fingers cradling his chin traced down his neck, and found one of his nipples. They caressed and pinched and rolled, sending one hard jolt of pleasure after another through him. He couldn’t resist a shiver, a soft moan.

“I did not give you permission to speak.”

Those insistent fingers kept teasing, teasing, teasing, and the tongue deep in his mouth was too much a reminder of the cock that had preceded it. He couldn’t suppress another moan.

“My property cannot control itself, it seems. Do you want more? Tell me.”

“The pale mandarin’s property craves everything the pale mandarin deigns to give it.”

“Two paces back. Sit on your heels. Eyes down.”

When Bard had arranged himself as ordered, Thran rose from the bed to circle him, letting the belt loosen, then drape over his back. As wired as he was, even that touch felt electric, and he shut his eyes, trying to calm himself. He’d barely succeeded when the hem of Thran’s robe fell over his back, jacking him back up as highly as before. Fingers teased through his hair again, this time pulling his head up.

“Widen your knees. Hands up.”

He was all but offering himself to whatever would come. What would it be? A stroke down the back, a caress across the cheek, another kiss? He didn’t expect the hand that gathered his balls and hefted them as if to weigh them. Before he flinched, the leash pulled his head up for Thran to swallow him in a kiss. Thran released his balls only to rub at their base until his cock strained erect.
Fingers traced over his balls and up his cock, but there was no further touch. He moaned in frustration, drawing breathy laughter as Thran folded down behind him, thighs pressing against his hips, his silk robe brushing Bard’s shoulders like the wings of a predatory bird against downed prey. Hands went around his ribs, finding his nipples and kneading them hard, and a chest rubbed across his back. Already Thran’s cock was rising, pressing against his tailbone with increasing urgency.

“Property that cannot hold still can be bound into compliance,” Thran said when Bard flinched. “Is that what you want? Speak.”

“No,” Bard whispered. “No. I’ll be good. Isn’t leashing me enough?”

“Not if my property cannot control itself. I still have much to do. I am a benevolent mandarin – if binding my property aids its stamina, I will oblige until I have had all that I want of it. Is this so unpleasant?”

Bard shook his head, trying to swallow the hitch in his breathing that Thran’s fingers drew out of him.

“Tell me. Tell me how good it feels.”

“It’s divine. It’s sweet and it’s fire and it’s so, so good... that’s why I can’t hold still, why I gasp. You’re so good, I can’t help but enjoy the gifts from a pale mandarin.”

“Ah, such a sweet answer. Perhaps I should offer you a little more. Would you like that?”

Bard nodded.

“Tell me what you would like.”

“Take me.”

The kiss pressed against Bard’s nape turned into bared teeth that traced down his spine. “You haven’t even earned the right to touch my bed yet. Do you want to? Or should I send you back to the harem for the guards to enjoy? Decide.”

“Tell me what you want. I’ll give you anything... everything.”

“Property cannot give me what is already mine. You told me to take, and I will. Try again.”

“Waste me on the harem guards if you want. But why give them a pleasure you’d deny yourself?”

The hands on him slipped away, but the memory of their caresses made him tremble anyway. The belt around his neck pulled his head forward, forcing him onto his hands and knees, and seconds later, Thran was sliding inside him, well slicked and as hard as if he hadn’t already gone. The leash kept his head down as Thran eased deeply inside with a sigh, then pulled him back to seat him firmly in Thran’s lap. Bard tried to hold still, his eyes slitted shut when Thran resumed that devastating stroking of his hair. His tangled hair was everywhere, in his eyes, brushing his shoulders, mingling with the silky white hair that fell over his chest when Thran pressed a kiss on his shoulder. How easy it was to relax under that barrage of light strokes – until Thran flexed deeply inside him, sending a jolt of wild urgency rushing through him. Over and over, Thran soothed and petted him until he eased, only to stroke him inside, sometimes deeply, sometimes only a little, until Bard trembled with anticipation and his cock was as hard as it could be. When Thran brushed fingers against his cock, nothing more, Bard’s breath caught in a gasp.

“Still. Silent. Or I will bind you.”
At the next trace of fingers over his nipples, Bard couldn’t swallow a whimper. The sensation was so intense, yet too little to quench the fire Thran had stoked in him. Soft lips burrowed through his hair to nibble his ear, and the fingers on his nipples massaged without mercy, jackng Bard’s arousal that much higher.

“Not enough? Is this not enough for my property?”

“Oh, gods, oh gods, you’re going to take me – ”

The fingers teasing his nipples raked down his flanks to dig into his hips, and the body behind him turned hard and urgent as it stroked him so deeply inside. Bard grabbed for his cock, anything to end this aching need for release, as the thrusting within him grew faster, more compelling. But hands yanked his away and forced him forward onto hands and knees so that Thran could work into him even more deeply. In seconds, Thran was off again, grinding against his hips as he wrung out every last drop.

Before Bard could make the most of Thran’s collapse atop him, the leash tightened, holding him just inches off the floor. Panting, Thran lay over Bard until he softened and drew out. The sudden emptiness left Bard trembling, aching, desperate for release.

“Not a word,” Thran rasped, biting Bard’s shoulder. “Not a word. I am not through my play with such a delicious morsel.”

Oh, gods, would Thran work him over a third time? Or would he take mercy on him and see to his release quickly? It wouldn’t take much to carry him over, just a hand on his leaking cock, or better a pair of lips to suck him off, whether fast or slow. As Thran eased off him, Bard tried to catch a glimpse of his lover, hoping to see satisfaction enough to end his teasing. But Thran left him on the floor as he lay face up on the end of the bed, stretching as he enjoyed his release, one hand dangling over the edge of the bed with leash in hand, the other stroking his abdomen with the same teasing fingers he’d employed to overcome Bard. Oh, gods, was the bastard still not done with him? What else was left to take from him?

There were only two answers to that question, neither of which would end Bard’s teasing. If he moved fast enough, he could straddle Thran and use his greater weight to pin him to the bed while Bard put himself out of his misery. But the crouch Thran had kept him in wasn’t the easiest to get out of with any speed, and Thran had him off balance with the leash before he’d gotten off his hands. He tossed a towel onto the floor in front of Bard’s nose.

“Clean yourself off.”

Bard swiped the sweat from his face, and Thran’s essence off his thighs.

“Are you blind to everything else but your own need yet? Thran whispered, smiling. “Or do you still have something left for me to take?”

Bard was nearly as blind as Thran teased him of being, but he wouldn’t let the devil who owned him know that. “If you think you’ve had all of me, then I’m disappointed. I thought you had more imagination than that.”

“Ah, perhaps not quite blind yet. Very few do so well. Up.”

The leash tightened, drawing Bard to crawl into bed. He stayed crouched on his knees, but Thran wasn’t content with that.

“You’ve already shown me what you can do on your knees. Show me what you can do on your back.”

Oh gods, he’d guessed right about what Thran still wanted from him. He lay in the middle of the bed as Thran watched him from the end, the shoulders of his robe down around his elbows, still elegant, hardly a hair out of place despite climaxing twice and teasing Bard so mercilessly that he felt as if he’d run for miles. Thran finally shed his silk robe to settle naked between Bard’s legs, regarding Bard as if deciding where to resume his teasing. Just when Bard drew breath to speak, Thran’s head dipped low, and he licked the end of Bard’s cock, making it leap to full attention again. Twice more he did that, until Bard wanted to bury it anywhere he could put it. A moan forced its way out of his throat, and he reached for the lean body that tormented him so. But pale hands knotted in his leash, keeping him pinned flat, and Thran leaned over him to take his throat in his teeth. When Bard forced himself still, lips caressed his ear.

“Have you forgotten? I own you. I will tease you for another week if I choose to, and you will lie here like the property you are and not lift anything other than your cock. Hear me?”

“I hear you.”

“Then say it.”

“You own me, body and soul. You own me.”

“Very good. You’ve earned a little more of my grace.”

It was coming now, Bard was sure of it. He was almost at his limit, his cock hard and aching, his balls almost too sore to touch, and every nerve ending on fire. Thran would either suck him off, or pin him, and whichever it was, Bard would bless it. He’d never felt such need, such drive, such frustration. So when Thran sat back upright and anchored the end of the belt under his knee, Bard was sure he was about to be opened wide to take Thran one more time. But instead, Thran had his hands full of lubricant, slicking himself, then taking himself in hand to stroke himself back to full length. There was nothing subtle about how Thran worked himself, all hard, fast jerky movements of his hips. Was the bastard going to take himself and make Bard watch? Gods, the agony couldn’t get any worse –

Just as Bard thought Thran was about to bring himself to release, he shoved Bard’s knees wide and up, positioned himself at the right angle, and slid inside Bard again. The white body over his shuddered at the intensity, and white hair fell over him in a cloud. More of the slow, deep thrusts in and pulls out wound Bard as tightly as a bowstring, and he gasped, clawing the sheets for purchase. Watching Thran writhing consumed above him, milking every nuance and subtlety out of each thrust, made his driving urgency worse, but it was not enough to send him over the edge. As if he knew that, Thran slowed, smiling down on him like a devil. Slippery hands found his nipples to tease, and a tongue found his mouth to penetrate him as deeply as a cock did his depths. He gasped as palms dragged over his nipples again.

“You are so beautiful when you are nothing but want and desire. I almost cannot bear to end such sweet delirium,” Thran’s soft voice whispered, as he finally – finally! – took Bard’s cock in a slippery hand. “But you have given me everything else, so there is nothing left for me to take. So give me the last of you. Give me all of you.”

Thran stroked him within and without very slowly, then faster, and finally with such compulsion that Bard’s back arched uncontrollably, and everything exploded – cock erupting, balls aching, every muscle spasming as release crashed down on him. As he convulsed, so Thran did within him, sending another deluge of pleasure rushing through him. How many seconds passed as the flood swept him beyond thought, he didn’t know.
When he could think again, the belt was gone from his neck, and Thran lay nestled beside him, his silky head on his shoulder, and his arm across his chest, stroking his arm softly. Bard’s breath calmed from its rough panting, and he felt the soft silk of the sheets under his hands again.

“I think I’m dead,” Bard whispered. It was barely an audible sound. “If I’m not, I should be.”

“I think I am, too.” Thran said. He sounded like he’d run for miles. He looked up, smiling without apology. “You are a lot to possess.”

“I hope you’ve possessed enough for a while. You teased me to within an inch of my life, you bastard.”

“I did. I enjoyed it more than you can imagine. I hope you did, too.”

“I think ‘enjoy’ is too mild a word to describe what it’s like to die by the merest fractions of an inch over the course of an hour.”

“I have never seen or felt such an intense climax as yours before.”

“Neither have I. I don’t think I can move.”

“You don’t have to.”

“Yes, I do. I’m covered with you, me, and more lube than an all-night bathhouse. I’m stuck to the sheets.”

Thran snickered.

“What’re you laughing about? And what the hell, Thran! I’m taking away those vitamins I’ve been feeding you. Three times in an hour?!”

Thran kept snickering. “I outdid myself. I will likely not make it to class tomorrow. But it was worth it. You were a delight, to indulge me so thoroughly. Thank you.”

Grimacing, Bard exhaled. “I am so owned. So owned.”

“I would not worry, lyubov moaya. I am so owned, too. We both know this is true. And I love you for it.”

Bard rubbed his husband’s arm. “Eh, we both are. So help pry me off the sheets and get me into the shower.”

“I hear and obey, my saint and master,” Thran said humbly, and they went into the shower together.
Chapter 44

Chapter Summary

After their marriage, the lives of an angel and a saint find direction toward the future.

Chapter Notes

I don't own the rights to "Spirited Away." It's just one of my favorite movies.

After last night’s carnal excesses, Friday morning came in a blur. How Bard clambered out of bed so easily was beyond Thran; likely because his husband had expended himself only once last night. It had been Thran who’d overindulged, which had left him drained. His balls didn’t exactly hurt, but he had no interest in exercising them just yet, either. He grinned; if one had to wake up in such a state, at least it was for due cause. He stayed buried in the sheets and blankets without moving while Bard was in the bathroom, though he managed a single wave of the hand when Bard came out.

“How are your balls, angel?” Bard murmured, smiling as he sat on the side of the bed to brush a strand of hair out of Thran’s eyes. “Need to take the edge off?”

Thran groaned softly, drawing a faint chuckle from his husband. “Even for you, lyubov moya, I could not manage a thing. What is the term? AFO?”

“Imagine that. Sleep it off. I’ve got the children covered.”

“No, I will be down in a moment. But you will be my savior if you put water on for tea when you reach the kitchen.”

“I’ve got your back. What kind of tea?”

“I think the lemon ginger.”

“Okay. See you in a bit.”

Bard stroked Thran’s shoulder and leaned over to brush a kiss on his hair, then padded downstairs to start the children’s lunches and the communal porridge. The warm bedding and the complete lack of tension in Thran’s body sent him drifting for a bit, but eventually he dragged himself back to consciousness and fumbled out of bed. Shivering, he pulled on warm Henley, leggings, thick socks, and thicker sweater before shuffling into the bathroom to tend to necessities. As he surveyed himself in the mirror, he grinned at the faint circles under his eyes. Gods, no matter how dissipated he looked this morning, last night had been worth it. How Bard’s eyes had closed and his head had gone back to better savor Thran’s touch on his skin, his hair... how his breath had stuttered when Thran stroked his nipples... how he’d had trembled each time Thran had paused his caresses, anticipating Thran’s next touch... how he’d gasped when Thran had licked his straining cock...

Despite last night’s exertions, his cock stirred. How had such a mild, patient, gentle man turned Thran into such a glutton in the bedroom? He washed his face and combed his hair, setting aside his musings about the pleasures of owning a certain metal sculptor to concentrate on the morning routine.

He came downstairs to the kitchen, where Bard pointed to the big mug of hot lemon-ginger tea waiting for him on the kitchen island.

“Slava bogam,” Thran breathed, wrapping cold hands around the mug and inhaling the fragrant steam. “Mmm. You are truly a saint. What do you make for the children’s lunches today?”

“We’re scraping the bottom of the barrel, given all the festivities this week. I hope Legolas likes peanut butter.”

“Yes, but I do not know whether he prefers it with jelly or not. What are our choices?”

“Tilda likes hers on soda crackers instead of bread, no jelly, banana on the side. Sigrid likes hers on wheat bread with raisins instead of jelly. Bain likes his on wheat bread with banana, grape jelly, or that chocolate hazelnut stuff, but we don’t have any of that. So Legs has options.”

“I will go ask him, so that it does not slow down the assembly line.”

“He’ll be down in a minute, so I can wait. Sit down and have your porridge. You had a hard night’s work.”

“It was not work,” Thran said, stroking Bard’s hip as he walked by him to stand before the cutting board where vegetables awaited. “Carrots and peppers for each?”

“Carrots are already peeled; they just need cutting up. A handful apiece.”

Thran chopped and packaged vegetable sticks into twists of waxed paper while Bard assembled Tilda’s crackers and Sigrid’s sandwich. This morning, the boys were down first, so Bain chose grape jelly over banana, and wheat bread rather than crackers.

“Wheat bread for me, please. Do we have any other kind of jelly?” Legolas asked, looking in the refrigerator. “What’s this? Oooh, blackberry! Can I have that instead of grape?”

“Hand it here,” Bard stuck out his hand, and Legolas put the jar into it. “One or two, Legs?”

“Two, please.”

“Two for me, too, Da,” Bain looked up from his porridge.

“I’ve already got both of yours done,” Bard assured his son, finishing Legolas’s two sandwiches with a few swipes of the knife. “What fruit, you two?”

“Pear for me,” Bain called.

“Clementine for me. I’ll get them. Tilda will want one, too, won’t she?”

“Sigrid, too, please. Thanks, Legs. Where are the girls this morning?”

“I’m right here,” Tilda announced, carrying her backpack. “Has anyone seen my History book?”

Bain craned his neck from the table. “Is that it in the solarium?”

“Thanks, Bain.”
“Where’s Sigrid?” Bard asked. “She’s going to be late.”

“She’s primping,” Bain snorted.

“For what?” Bard asked, stacking cookies on waxed paper.

“Not what, who. Finn Durinson, of course,” Bain snorted again.

“Ah, our fan of Russian hockey forwards makes an appearance today, then?” Thran asked, putting sandwiches and ice packs into lunch bags.

“He’s staying the weekend with Kíllian,” Legolas explained as he sat beside Bain with his bowl of porridge. “He’s coming out this afternoon. I think he might meet Kíllian and Tara after sport, so I guess Sigrid thinks she might see him then. I expect him to arrive with Kíllian and Tara Sunday when they come to fence with the Gondors here.”

Bard looked up. “Six of us, the Gondors, Finn, Kíllian, and Tara... that’s eleven. I’d better put a big pot of soup on for us, then.”

“Can you make that Indian chicken with the rice?” Bain asked.

“Sure. Is that good for everyone else?”

Amid murmurs of agreement, Sigrid bounced into the kitchen; her face was much brighter than it usually was on an early school morning. She wore the teal blue sweater tunic Bard had given her for Christmas over her blue jeans, her dark hair was pulled back into a pretty French braid, and she wore the blue beaded necklace Tilda had given her for Christmas. And... was that mascara on her eyelashes? A subtle twinkle of eye shadow on her eyelids? Thran smothered his smile, waiting to see what Bard had to say about his daughter’s efforts.

“Morning, all,” she said breathlessly, hurrying to dish up a bowl of porridge. “Sorry I’m late, Da.”

“I hear Finn will make an appearance this afternoon,” Bard observed, folding his packets of cookies and handing them to Thran to put in the lunch bags.

“Yeah, the boys made a big deal about it,” she said casually. “I likely won’t see him even if he gets to the school before the end of sport. We’re having a our first indoor track meet this afternoon, so I’ll be in the gym.”

Bard looked up. “You are? With another school? Can parents come?”

“This one’s just a practice to sort everyone out, so there won’t be anything to see. The first real meet is next week. It’d be neat if you came to that.”

“I’d like to. What day?”

“Wednesday.”

“I’ll be there,” Bard nodded.

“So if you’re going to be all hot and sweaty in the gym,” Bain needled, “how come you had to clog up the bathroom with all the primping?”

Sigrid ignored him in such a pointed fashion that Thran smothered a snicker.

“You look nice, Sig,” Bard said mildly, fixing Bain with a quelling stare.
“Thanks, Da. I have a presentation to do in English class. I want to look nice, because it’s to help us prepare for the college interviews that start next month.”

That gave Bard pause, and he looked at Thran in veiled surprise. “Um... college interviews?”

Sigrid nodded. “The guidance office has all kinds of programs and information about colleges, so I’m looking at lots of different ones. And there’s a lot of financial aid information, too. So I’m looking all of that, too... just to see what’s possible, what’s available, that kind of thing.”

Sigrid didn’t quite look at Bard with a pleading expression, but its intent was easy to divine. Thran put the next packet of cookies in a lunch bag.

“Your Da and I have talked about our good fortune that all of you are enrolled in such an excellent school. I am glad that you take advantage of what it offers, Sigrid. I am sure that it will help you find a good college that suits you. Perhaps in some kind of writing?”

Sigrid gave him a big smile. “There are a lot of fields where I could use my writing. I’ve read about being a museum curator, or an archeologist, or a science editor. There are a lot of other cool things, too.”

“We can go on college visits when the time comes,” Bard offered. “I can’t spring for an Ivy League or anything like that, but there are a lot of other possibilities. When you find the right school, we’ll make it happen.”

“I don’t want anything Ivy League, anyway,” Sigrid shook her head. “Something more practical and pragmatic. Oh, gods, look at the time! We’re going to be late!”

“Brush your teeth!” Bard shouted, as four children hurried to down the last bite of breakfast and dash upstairs. Thran hastily stuffed paper napkins into the lunch bags, closed them, and held them out as the children hurried back into the kitchen to collect their things. He and Bard pulled on boots and coats and gloves against the cold for the morning escort to the bus stop, then he and Bard waved as the bus pulled away. They had a couple of minutes’ chat with Rosie about their progress on the house, then headed back home.

“College already,” Bard murmured, as he shrugged off his coat and stepped out of his boots in the mudroom. “At least I’m in a better spot to make it happen now. In few months, I’ll be back to the metal, and I’ll be able to pay for a good school for Sig.”

“We already have enough money to pay for all the children to go to college, if they choose to,” Thran reassured Bard. “In a year, we will have even more, because you will have commissions by then.”

Bard gave Thran a grateful smile. “Thanks for saying that about the commissions. I hope I’ll be well back to the barn by then, and the market will be in the mood for my stuff.”

“Have you considered a talk with those art reps we’ve heard mentioned, Shire Hills?” Thran took the bowl of porridge that Bard handed him, and followed his husband to the kitchen table to eat. “Perhaps if you would talk to them now, they could start to work for you, so that when you are through what you think is necessary here in the house, you can begin work with an eye to what they have to say?”

“I have, and I will. A few more weeks here first. But it won’t be long.” Bard brought his tea to the table, and passed Thran the bottle of multivitamins, albeit with a rueful grin. “After last night, I don’t know whether I should keep giving you these.”
Thran snatched the bottle and clutched it to his chest as if it were filled with gold. “After last night, I will always take my vitamins. You were delicious. Besides, it will help me survive today’s class.”

“I thought you were skipping class today,” Bard gave him a concerned look. “Will you be all right?”

Thran waved a dismissive hand, then shook out a vitamin for himself and another for Bard. They both downed the vitamins with a few swallows of tea. “The rigors of schooling my husband are a delight, and far from the grind of a rigorous rehearsal schedule. I will be fine. Even if I were exhausted, I would still go today. My auditions begin next Tuesday, and it would not be proper if I skip a class so close to them. To skip class would not help me to prepare for them, either.”

“How many auditions do you have lined up so far?”

“Four. The first one is not one I seriously consider, but it will be good practice for the ones that follow. Two would be very nice positions, both with respected companies, if traditional. The fourth does not pay as well as the others, and is a much riskier proposition. But it is the one I have the most interest in.”

Bard put his elbows on his table to give Thran his full regard. “What about that one appeals to you?”

“Several things. First, there is a choreographer who works extensively with this company. I would like very much to work with him. He is from Montreal, and far from traditional. Some of his work is disturbing. All of it is difficult, both for the level of technique and the dramatic demands placed on the dancers. His choreography and my body suit each other very well. I have not worked with him before, but I sense that we could make each other’s career memorable if we collaborated. So of course that is a great attraction, despite the challenge.”

“Of course it is. Any good artist wants to stretch, to do something unexpected and new. What else?”

Thran sighed. “I am at the height of my physical abilities now. But I am realistic, Bard. I have perhaps only another six or seven years before my body can no longer perform at such a level. It is wise to consider now what to do once I no longer dance as well as I want. This company is only recently established, and it needs more financial backing. I consider if I should follow my fellow Latvian compatriot, the great Baryshnikov, and become a ballet director. If this choreographer and I make a good season, then perhaps we can make more than that.”

“You’re thinking about investing in this company, then.”

Thran nodded. “I want to see the financials first, of course. But I do consider it. I have already made inquiries.”

Bard nodded and didn’t ask more questions; if he had, Thran couldn’t have answered many of them. The inimitable Mr. Nori had not yet completed his examination of such things yet, but he’d report back when he’d done his usual thorough investigation.

“I do have one more reason.” Thran spooned up his porridge, then swallowed. “It is a purely selfish one, I admit. This small company is not in the city, but on the outskirts. It would mean a shorter commute, and a more pleasant one by far, so that I am not so much on the road. And if I choose to conduct master classes, I could conduct them there as well as here.”

“What do you think your chances are with all of these auditions?”

“I am strong, and fully healed. I am well respected, and known as a hard worker. I am happy and settled in my life with you and our children. So while a sure thing does not exist, while I cannot predict if I will match the needs of the companies who hold the auditions, I think I will have more
Bard nodded over his tea. “Then whatever you choose to do, cariad, I support. Make the most of whatever comes. I had an idea about that, by the way. We should visit the village chamber of commerce to see what their plans are. Maybe your idea about conducting master classes here would appeal to them. When I was in art school, the faculty and students worked with a nearby music school to put on public shows a few times a year. It pulled in people interested in both music and arts, so the art students made a few dollars selling artwork, and the music students got performance experience as well as gig money. It helped both schools more doing it together than separately. Maybe when you hold your master classes, some of the restaurants might want to offer deals, or the galleries might want to offer special discounts for attendees or observers or whatever, so everyone does a little better.”

“I like that,” Thran nodded vigorously. “All of the arts would support each other. Let us find out more about that.”

“Rosie will know. I’ll talk to her.”

“Good. We should have them to supper soon, too. But now, I must go to class.”

“And I’m off to Legolas’s room to paint. No more woodwork for a while!”

“Excellent!” Thran applauded. “I will be home near one, so after lunch, I want to help, if that would speed things.”

Bard snuck his hand across the table to curl his fingers around Thran’s. “I’m always glad to have company and whatever help you want to offer. But your auditions and dance prep come first for you right now. Painting and such comes second.”

“What you do does not matter less than my dance, lyubov moya.”

“You’re right. In the long run, it doesn’t. I finally got that in my head. I figured out that one of the many wonderful things about us is how well we complement each other. You’re the businessman for us. I run the house for us. You dance; I renovate, and will work metal before long. We both see to the children. We both play a lot of roles as we build our house of dreams. Right now, it’s important that you dance for our family, and I renovate. That’ll get us to the day when I’ll work metal for our family, too. It balances out.”

Bard laughed. “It’s tŷ o freuddwydion in Welsh.”

“Gods!” Thran winced, laughing. “Russian is hard enough to pronounce. I cannot imagine even how to spell such a thing as your Welsh.”

“It’s a jawbreaker,” Bard admitted. “The spelling’s worse. What do you expect for a language where W is a vowel? I think we’d better stick to your Russian. That sounds manageable. Dom Mechty?”

“Just so.”

“So let’s get you to the class, and me to the paint.”

They cleaned up the remains of breakfast together, then went upstairs to dress for their respective endeavors. In a few minutes, Thran was in his dance attire and had his bag packed for class. Bard was in his painting clothes, ready to banish Legolas’s dingy walls and ceiling behind a coating of primer, but he walked downstairs to see Thran off. He offered a hug and a kiss goodbye to keep Thran warm on his journey, then headed back upstairs.

The commute into the city was typical of a rainy Friday morning – chaotic and snarled – but Thran paid it no mind. Bard had finally, finally realized his worth in the family he and Thran had forged, and that was no small blessing. His saint might never relax enough to take the having of money for granted, but at last he understood and believed that his contributions were just as important as Thran’s. The inconvenience of too many cars on the slippery roads could not ruin Thran’s elation about Bard’s new confidence.

Class was not as difficult as Thran had expected after spending last night in decadent celebration of his marriage. Once he fell into the ebb and flow of the movements, his body regained its vigor, and he enjoyed the work without concern. Afterwards, he shared a little of the gossip that pervaded the dancers’ world. Monsieur LePied’s class drew attendees from several ballet companies, and so the gossip was meatier than it was among dancers from a single company, so he had a sense of the state of several of them. Two were the companies with which he had auditions lined up in a week or so. There was also a little talk about the outré choreographer that so interested Thran, but he gave it little heed. He had heard enough of the silliness that had pervaded the gossip about him over the years to recognize the lack of facts when he heard it.

He changed out of his dance belt and tights for the drive home; soft jeans and regular underthings were always more comfortable than constricting practice wear. He drove carefully through the icy rain, but still made it home before one. He shed his coat and boots in the mudroom, calling to let Bard know he was back.

“Still upstairs!” Bard returned, so Thran washed out his water bottle and left it to dry in the kitchen before heading up.

“How is the painting – oh, I see for myself! So much brighter!” Thran looked around the room, impressed at what a difference plain white primer made. “It will soon be finished!”

“The ceiling’s done,” Bard said, leaning down from his ladder to give Thran a kiss. “The walls are primed, and I’m almost done priming the woodwork. Maybe I can get the two coats of wall paint on tonight, and do the woodwork tomorrow morning. I’ll sand and wax the floor tomorrow afternoon, and that’ll let Legolas move back in here tomorrow night.”

“That is very aggressive,” Thran looked around at the large room.

“We have a lot to do. If I can get the children’s rooms done soon, it’ll be better for them. They won’t mind living in a construction site so much once their private spaces are done.”

“I will help this afternoon,” Thran said firmly. “But for now, we need lunch. Are you at a point where you can stop now?”

“I have that strip of woodwork to go,” Bard pointed to the baseboard molding on the wall opposite the door. “Paint looks bad if you stop in the middle of a wall, so I’ll finish before I clean up.”

“Then I will assemble a good lunch for us. Tell me what is for supper, so that I choose something else.”

“It’s Friday, so I thought I’d make pizza for the children. I used to do that most Friday school nights as a treat for the children, plus pizza’s cheap to make compared to meat. I’ll mix up the dough after lunch, and it can rise while we paint. I can do a stir fry for you and me with chicken and vegetables, if you don’t want pizza.”

“I would love to have the pizza, but as next week holds so many auditions, I will hold firm to my usual fare. I am sorry to put you to so much work, lyubov moya. I will have pizza once the auditions are over to celebrate.”

“Stir fry’s easy, angel. I’ll show you tonight, so you can make it for yourself. We always have that stuff in the fridge, so you’ll be all set.”

“Another cooking lesson – most welcome!” Thran grinned. “So I will find our lunch while you finish the trim.”

“Righto,” Bard agreed, and took up his brush again while Thran headed to the kitchen. He put on the kettle to simmer so that it’d be hot when they were ready for tea after lunch, then contemplated the choice of things for lunch. There was salad, of course, and chicken breast, of course, and while Bard would be happy with that, perhaps there was something a little more interesting he could make for his saint. He perused the pantry, and found a bottle of Thai peanut sauce. Could he use that to approximate the chicken satay he liked so much? The label listed a brief and unhelpful recipe about how to cook the chicken, but Thran’s chicken was already cooked, so could he just make the sauce? Or was the sauce all right to use out of the bottle, and needed only to be warmed? Bard would make quick work of it, but Thran wasn’t well versed enough to fathom it. At least the sauce didn’t have a lot of fat calories or too much sodium – Bard was careful about both of those – so he took it out to ask Bard.

He rummaged for the cooked chicken breast, the lettuce, the carrots, the peppers, and had everything on the counter when Bard came down with his brushes to wash in the mudroom.

“What are we having?” Bard asked as he went by.

“I hope we will have chicken to dip in peanut sauce. But perhaps I need a cooking lesson now to know if that is possible.”

“Okay, I’ll put the brushes in to soak and be right there.”

When Bard came back from cleaning his brushes, Thran showed him the bottle and explained what he hoped to make, and was gratified when Bard nodded. “That’s a good idea. We can cut up the chicken and heat it up, heat up the sauce as is, and we’ll be set. It’d be nice to have something warm on such a cold day.”

They divided up the tasks – Bard chopped the chicken and vegetables, and guided Thran through the rest so that he sorted out how to do them. Learning to cook, or at least make peanut sauce, was easy when the teacher was as easy-going as Bard was. The result was warm and far superior to plain, unadorned, cold chicken on dull salad.

Despite the warmth of chicken and tea, neither Thran nor Bard lingered over lunch. Bard was anxious to get as far as he could on Legolas’s room, so he and Thran quickly mixed up the pizza dough for tonight’s supper, then headed upstairs. Bard found another pair of his old construction pants and an equally old flannel for Thran to wear, for he had nothing so battered. Thran didn’t have any work boots, either, so he put on his hiking boots instead.

“We need to get you some good work boots, angel,” Bard commented, as he sat atop the ladder to cut the green paint in around the woodwork and windows. “You need the cushioning so standing isn’t so tiring, and you need the steel toes for protection.”
“We will add them to our list,” Thran said, admiring how Bard’s steady hands laid on the paint neatly, without smears on the woodwork.

“We need to add the list to our list,” Bard gave him a wry smile. “We still don’t have a place in the kitchen to write things down.”

“What about that paint I read about in the mail circular? It makes a wall into a chalkboard? We could paint the center panel of the pantry door with it, perhaps?”

“That’s a good idea. We can see what it says on the can the next time we’re at the homeowners’ mecca.”

The painting went quickly with the two of them working at it, Bard doing the edges that required a steady hand, and Thran rolling the rest where it didn’t matter if he were not as exact. In a couple of hours, they’d gone around the room once, then started again for the second coat. By the time the children came home from school, they had finished two of the four walls. The promise of Friday night pizza and no homework excited the children, so they were happy to entertain themselves until Thran and Bard finished the remaining two walls. By seven-thirty, Bard set the boys to cleaning the brushes, while Thran got the girls to help make the pizza. By the time the boys had finished the brushes, Bard had the toppings set out and the dough ready to be flattened. Each of the children patted out enough dough to fill half a cookie sheet, and chose toppings. As the pizza baked, Bard and Thran made their stir-fry, and soon everyone sat down to a late supper. Sigrid described how her presentation had gone, and the other children were full of conversation about their day. They were all settling into school well, and each of them was making new friends. It was good to hear so much laughter and animation around the table.

After supper, Sigrid retreated to the shower, then her room to talk to Finn on her mobile. Bain and Legolas opted for a video game, and Tilda crawled between Bard and Thran to watch Spirited Away yet again. Bard told him that this was one of Tilda’s favorites, and he watched with her in equal fascination as the tale unfolded of a small girl’s adventures in the bathhouse of the spirits. It had the same surreal sense of the fantastic as the tales he’d heard as a small child in Russia.

Bard was nearly asleep as the film ended, so Thran let his husband drowse undisturbed as he went upstairs with Tilda. He urged her into the shower, then checked on the boys in the children’s study. They had Legolas’s computer hooked up to one of the game consoles and were absorbed in some sort of mayhem – a post-apocalyptic disaster, most likely. He interrupted them briefly to tell them that Tilda was in the shower, and that they should follow her. He also explained Bard’s plans to paint the woodwork and sand the floor in Legolas’s room starting early tomorrow morning. Legolas was excited at the prospect of moving into his refinished room tomorrow, but Thran cautioned him of how much remained to be done, and how hard Bard was working to finish it. In time, Tilda exited the shower, so Thran tucked her in with Mr. Bun while Bain had his turn in the shower. Once Tilda was settled, Thran spent a few minutes talking with Legolas about the fencing they’d planned for Sunday. When Bain returned, Legolas headed for the shower, so Bain explained the game he and Legolas had been playing. Thran had a go, but he wasn’t very good at it, and by the time Legolas returned, Bain had killed Thran’s avatar three times in the space of fifteen minutes.

“I make a poor zombie killer,” Thran held up his hands and shrugged. “When this zombie apocalypse comes, we will have to rely on the expertise of both of you, I fear. Though perhaps I can be useful with the cutting off of heads. That is how one kills a zombie, yes?”

“That’s one way, but you can’t let them scratch you, or you turn into a zombie, too,” Bain explained, and then he and Legolas launched into a discussion of the best way to cut the head off a zombie without getting scratched, which was entirely too bloodthirsty for Thran’s preference. Laughing, he told the boys to finish their game in the next few minutes.

“There will still be zombies to kill tomorrow, I am sure, so sleep now. Remember that Bard will begin work on the woodwork tomorrow early, so that the paint dries in time to allow him to finish the floor in the afternoon.”

“Yes, Father, yes, Thran,” the boys replied.

“Now, I will bring Bard to wish you good night.”

He stuck his head in Sigrid’s room, where she still talked with Finn, and mouthed that it was time to retire. She nodded, so Thran returned to the sitting room. He sat beside his husband and put a light hand on Bard’s thigh to rouse him.

“The children are ready for sleep, lyubov moyo,” he said, when Bard stirred.

“I think I’m ahead of them,” Bard grinned sheepishly. “What time is it?”

“Nearly eleven.”

Bard winced. “I fell asleep for longer than a few minutes, then. I’ll head upstairs to tell everyone goodnight. Tilda’s probably already asleep.”

“I tucked her in with Mr. Bun. The boys settle. Sigrid likely still talks with the hockey fan.”

Bard snickered. “They’re funny. We’ll see how Sunday goes. I hope the Gondors aren’t put off at the state of the place.”

“The state of the place improves by the hour. Do not concern yourself.”

Bard squeezed Thran’s shoulder in appreciation, and heaved himself off the sofa. “Let’s settle the clan, then I’m for bed in short order after them. I have a lot to do tomorrow.”

“It will all get done, lyubov moyo. Do not worry.”

They headed upstairs, bid the children goodnight, and were soon in the shower. Thran sent Bard to bed while he dried his hair; by the time he came out of the bathroom, Bard was nearly asleep again, stirring only a little when Thran sat on the side of the bed. Smiling, Thran curled carefully around him without rousing him, and settled comfortably under the covers.

Last night, Thran had owned his saint. Tonight, it was his privilege to treasure him.
Chapter 45

Chapter Summary

While the saint labors, the cherubs stage a riot. How will an angel cope?

After the storm, royal guests grace Clan Ffyrnig's ballroom for a round of fencing.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

Eh bien, mon affamé de fils = All right, my hungry son (French)

The morning was still quiet when Bard ventured into Legolas’s room to paint the woodwork. Thran had opted to practice his barre in the ballroom this morning to save the hour and a half commute to and from the city, so he’d have more time to help Bard get ready for tomorrow’s fencing extravaganza. The house would benefit from general tidying and sweeping to make it more presentable for guests, and there was cooking and baking that Bard wanted to do in addition to finishing Legolas’s room. So after seeing Thran off to the ballroom, Bard downed a quick bowl of porridge and brought his tea upstairs.

He started on the baseboard trim first, so it would be dry by the time he wanted to work on the floor this afternoon. The house was quiet and serene as he wielded his brush, and he took pains to be just as quiet so as not to disturb the children as they slept. When Thran came upstairs with bowl of porridge in hand, he’d completed the baseboard and the crown moldings, which just left around the doors and windows to do. He kept working as Thran sat with him as he ate his porridge, then disappeared into the bathroom to clean up from his exertions at the barre. At last he finished the first coat of gloss white on all of the woodwork. Without pause, he launched into the second coat for the base molding and managed to get through that before the children got up. It was just as well; he was too hungry to keep going. He headed downstairs to fix their breakfasts and to get something for himself. To his surprise, it was lunchtime, so he put on a big kettle of dirty rice with sausage, and set out a platter of veg and hummus for everyone to nibble on while the rice simmered. There was still enough chicken breast, so he warmed that with the last of the peanut sauce to accompany a good spinach and veg salad for Thran. When everything was ready, he was grateful to sink into his chair and attack a bowl of the concoction in minutes, barely tasting it, relieved to quiet the gnawing in his stomach. He finally slowed down to eat a couple of clementines.

“You know the routine this afternoon, all,” he said, as he brought out the last of the cookies and passed them down the table. He’d have to make some more tomorrow to carry them into the next week. The children groaned, drawing his grin. “That’s right, homework. We have guests coming tomorrow for lunch and fencing, so get your work done beforehand. That way, if you want to enjoy the company a little longer, you don’t have to say no because you’ve got work to do.”

Did Sigrid’s eyes brighten just the least little bit? Tomorrow, he’d take a gander at her and Finn to gauge just how serious this budding romance was.

“I will be the homework help today,” Thran said from the other end of the table. “Bard works hard to finish Legolas’s room, so we will see to the cleanup here, and then to the homework. So, what wonders of the world will we look at today?”

Thran waved his hand at Bard, so he headed back upstairs to finish the woodwork.

Two hours later, he was through the crown molding, window trim, and door molding. He’d clean the brushes and then head back up to start on the floor. Thank the gods all that took was mineral spirits, extra fine steel wool, and then paste wax –

The bag of extra fine steel wool had only one wad left. He’d have to make a quick trip to the homeowners’ mecca for more.

Bard sighed, but out of steel wool was out of steel wool. It wouldn’t be so bad – while he was out, he’d stop at the market to get enough chicken for tomorrow’s lunch so it could marinate all night in the Indian seasonings the children liked so much. He ducked into the bedroom, stuffed his wallet and keys into his jeans pockets, grabbed the paintbrushes, and headed downstairs.

The older children were still at the kitchen table, working on their homework. Thran was in the sitting room with Tilda. Shoes off, Thran sat on the rug in a wide side split, leaning forward on his elbows as he looked at Bard’s book about Islamic tessellations. Tilda sat on the other side of the book with a pad of paper, drawing shapes like the tessellations in the book.

“You make that look comfortable,” Bard ran a hand through his hair.

Thran looked up with a smile. “It is. Tilda and I think we should make a mosaic like one of these for the solarium. And do you know she does a very good almost split?”

“Yeah, I do!” Tilda smiled, sticking her legs out to the side like Thran’s. She didn’t have quite the hundred-eighty degree angle that Thran had, but it was respectable. Bard’s hamstrings ached in sympathy, but neither Tilda nor Thran showed any discomfort. “We’ve invented a new yoga pose. It’s called Road Kill Asana.”

She flopped forward, lying flat on the floor between her outstretched legs. Thran flopped forward as well, drawing Bard’s appreciative laugh. “You both look like road kill, you do. At least you smell better.”

Tilda giggled. “That’s good. I don’t want to smell like that!”

“Can you wrangle things here a little longer, Thran?” Bard asked. “I’m out of the steel wool I need to finish the floor, and I need to hit the market so we have enough chicken for tomorrow.”

“We are quite fine here,” Thran sat back up. “The painting is done, then.”

“All done. The floor won’t take too long once I have the steel wool.”

“That is wonderful. I will see to things here, and you get what you need.”

“Okay. Little doll, be your own sweet self, and I’ll be back in an hour.”

“Okay, Da.” Tilda got up to kiss Bard’s cheek, and Thran got up after her. They trailed him into the kitchen, where Sigrid was helping Bain and Legolas with a math problem.
“Off to get more steel wool for the floor, and chicken for lunch tomorrow. Anyone need anything else at the market while I’m there?”

“Milk,” both Bain and Legolas chorused.

“And orange juice,” Legolas amended.

“Oatmeal,” Sigrid added.

“Pickles?” Tilda asked in a hopeful voice. “And bread.”

Bard grinned ruefully as he gave Thran his regard. “Anything for you, angel?”

Thran colored; it was the first time Bard had used his pet name around the children, and the term met with some surreptitious wide eyes and smothered smiles, especially from Legolas. “I regret to say that we could use a little more broccoli.”

“Maybe I’ll just do the week’s shopping,” Bard decided. “All right, back soon. How’s the homework going? Almost done?”

“I’m done,” Tilda announced; the other children were almost through.

“Okay, keep plugging away. Be good for Thran.”

As Bard pulled on his coat and headed out to the truck, he didn’t suppress a wide grin. How long would it take before one of the children made a crack about living with an angel in the house?

* * *

Homework resumed when Bard headed out on his errands. Thran went back to the sitting room with Tilda, and the three older children went back to their studies. Whatever math question the boys had, it was a vexing one, because Sigrid explained it patiently more than once. Algebra, Sigrid’s favorite trigonometry, geometry – none of them made sense to Thran. He was very good with the math of finance, and had recently discovered that he was nimble enough to resize a recipe, but as he’d never studied the higher forms, they were beyond him. He listened as Sigrid explained the problem once again.

“That’s why they give you two equations,” Sigrid pointed out. “Two variables, two equations. So you juggle one of the equations around to put x on one side and y on the other, then you substitute the value for x into the second equation, then solve for y. That gives you a number. Then you put the number back in the first equation in place of the y, so you can get a number for x.”

“Easy for you to say,” Bain muttered.

“But why do you have to put the x on one side and the y on the other? There’s a two that way,” Legolas groaned.

“So you move the two on the other side, and just leave the x.”

“Like this?”

“No,” Sigrid replied. Her voice had gotten sharper. “That’s a multiply. It’s a multiply on the x side, so you have to divide both sides by the two, so it’s a divide on the y side.”

“But –”

“This is dumb,” Bain groaned. “You don’t make any sense, Sig.”

“I make perfect sense. It’s you two who don’t make any sense. You aren’t thinking about the problem.”

Legolas tsked. “I’m going upstairs. Maybe if I stare at it a while in my room, it’ll make sense. Oh – I forgot. I can’t go in my room. Ugh. It takes a long time to finish a room.”

“Da’s working on it as hard as he can,” Sigrid bridled. “He can’t work any harder.”

“Yeah, Legs, he’s working pretty hard,” Bain added reluctantly. “He did your room before mine and Til’s, didn’t he?”

Tilda pushed her drawing paper aside and trotted into the kitchen. “It isn’t fair that my Da is working so hard on your room first, and you don’t even appreciate it!”

“I wasn’t criticizing!” Legolas protested. “And he didn’t do my room first! He did Sigrid’s first, and then the study!”

“I did a lot of my room myself!” Sigrid flared.

“Yeah, but you didn’t give us a chance to sort out whose room went first.” Bain retorted, drawing Thran’s wince. “You just went ahead and did it, Sig. That wasn’t fair, either.”

“At least I did something, Bain! You and Legs just want Da to do it all for you!”

“What’re you yelling at us for?” Bain shot back. “Tilda doesn’t do much, either, and no one thinks anything about that!”

Tilda was indignant. “That’s not fair, Bain! I clean my room better than you do, and I help with the dishes –”

“Oh, so you admit you and Legs don’t do anything!” Sigrid yelled, her temper finally in full ire. “All the two of you do is boop and beep all night on that stupid game –”

“It’s not stupid!” Legolas protested angrily. “And it’s not all night –”

“Hey! Sigrid, you interrupted me!” Tilda stamped.

Thran scrambled to his feet. The fracas was escalating, and it was time to put his rudimentary parenting skills to work. He swept into the kitchen, arms akimbo.

“Stop! Stop this instant! All of you!”

“Father, she said that I –”

“Silence!” Thran barked, his best Prince of Ice glare at full intensity. As he skewered each of the children with that look, they subsided with abashed looks at the table or the floor, rather than at him or each other.

“Such a fuss you make about so many things!” he growled into the silence, hands gesticulating. “And so much you leave me to sort out, things you should already know. Bain and Legolas, Sigrid was kind to try to help you with the math. It is not her fault that math is not so easy to understand, so be glad she tries to help you.

“Legolas, I am sure you meant no criticism of the one who is the heart of our family. He works very hard, so hard that he wears himself out to see to us. Recall that and be more tactful when you speak of his efforts to those who love him.

“Sigrid, you were kind to help the boys, and yes, you did much of the work on your room. But appreciate that others wait for their turns, too.

“Tilda, it is good of you to speak up for your Da, and for you to help in many ways. But it does not help to add shouts to an argument already underway. It is to pour gasoline onto the fire, yes?

“So all of you said things you did not mean because you were angry, and all of you were not so kind as you could be to each other. To make the apology to one another is something you all must do. Now, please.”

He waited, arms folded over his chest. Who would make the first move?

After many seconds, Sigrid heaved a sigh. It was only a little theatrical, and more to cover up her embarrassment than anything else. “I’m sorry I interrupted you, Tilda. And I’m sorry I snapped at you, Legolas, and you, too, Bain.”

No one else moved, until Legolas glanced up. Thran turned the full force of his glare on his son, who gulped.

“I’m – I’m sorry, all of you. Your Da works very hard, and I just meant that it was a lot of work that he had to do on my room, and that it took a long time to do it all. I wasn’t criticizing him because there’s so much work. I wasn’t.”

Murmurs went among the other three children, varying degrees of acceptance.

“I’m sorry I yelled at you, Legolas,” Tilda ventured. “I thought you were mad at Da.”

“I wasn’t. I really wasn’t. I... just didn’t think.”

“I didn’t think, either,” Sigrid said. “About my room, I mean. I just was excited to be here, and I thought I was helping to do as much of it as I could... I wasn’t trying to make the rest of you wait.”

Bain was the last one, and his expression was as chastened as everyone else’s when he looked around. “I’m sorry I added to the mess, too. Da works hard for all of us. I just don’t understand this math, and I took it out on everyone. I’m sorry, all.”

“Very nice,” Thran nodded, as the children uncoiled. “So we have restored harmony, and I can be the benevolent angel again instead of the devil, yes?” That got him four surprised looks. “But there is a core to this that would be good to discuss.”

“What’s that?” Legolas’s brow wrinkled.

“You all said how hard Bard works for us. Have you noticed all he does for us, how hard he does more than paint and sand and all such things? The food he cooks, the laundry he washes and dries, the shopping he does, even now? He is our saint, gladly so, without complaint. He works harder than any of us, and now he works not only to finish your room, Legolas, but also to make the preparations for tomorrow’s fencing and lunch for us. That is something that we all should help with. So, finish the homework quickly, and then we will divide up the things that we can do to help the heart of our family. What is left for you to do? Tilda, I know you are done already.”

“I’m done, too,” Sigrid confirmed.

“Just this math for Bain and me,” Legolas added.

“Then here is my direction – Sigrid, be so good as to write out all the steps for a problem similar to the one in the boys’ assignment. Boys, you will follow these steps to see if they solve your difficult problem. Then we will plan our attack to prepare for tomorrow.”

“Yes, Ada, yes, Thran, yes, Father,” went around the table.

While Sigrid worked with the boys, Thran and Tilda went into the sitting room to tidy, dust, and vacuum. By the time they were done, Sigrid’s painstaking, step-by-step explanation had finally registered, and Bain and Legolas were able to complete their worksheets. While the older children packed their things away, Thran considered what they should do next.

Renovation? No, that was best left to Bard – Thran was prudent enough to stick only to tasks he understood. So he had the children marshal the mountain of laundry, sort it, and get the first load in the washer. He sent the boys into the main room to tidy the remaining boxes there, then to sweep all the floors on the lower level, including the ballroom. Tilda watered the plants in the solarium, swept the solarium floor, turned on the dishwasher, and tidied her room. After tidying her room, Sigrid offered to bake a cake for tomorrow’s lunch, so she began that while Thran put away things in the kitchen. Sigrid gave him another cooking lesson, explaining about greasing pans and preheating the oven, then he swept the floor while she washed and wiped the baking things. When the boys were through with the sweeping, they went upstairs to tidy their rooms. By the time Bard clattered into the mudroom laden with bags, things were well in hand, and the house smelled of pastry.

“I’m back!” Bard called, carting several bags of groceries in both arms into the kitchen. “Oh, you’re right here, Thran. Mmm, something smells good.”

Thran nodded as he took some of the bags from Bard to set them on the kitchen island. “Welcome home, lyubov moya. Are there more things to come inside?”

“More groceries. I did the week’s shopping since we were low on so many things. Where are the children?”

Thran’s grin was likely smug. “They do penance. There was a small... meltdown, but all is resolved.
They have started the laundry, made the cake for tomorrow, and cleaned the downstairs. They tidy their rooms now.”

Bard hesitated as he put bags on the island. “A meltdown? About what? It must have been epic, if they’re doing laundry, baking, and cleaning.”

“Nothing of consequence. For now, merely enjoy the fruits of their regret.”

He gave Bard a wink as he went to the kitchen doorway that led to the central hall. “Children, Bard is home! Please come to help with the groceries!”

He was well pleased when all of the children came quickly, Bain and Legolas to bring in the rest of the groceries, Sigrid to take her cake out of the oven, and Tilda to climb onto the stool at the end of the island to help unpack the bags. Bard watched all of this bustle with a bemused expression, but wisely didn’t protest or question. He merely leaned over the cake pan to sniff.

“Smells good, Sig. What kind did you make?”
“Marble, chocolate and orange.” She slid a sheepish expression at Thran. “The boys and Tilda like that.”

Thran gave her a wink, which Bard noticed but let pass without comment.

“I like that kind, too. Chocolate icing?”

“Of course. Is there any other kind?”

“No,” Bain wheezed, heaving three heavy bags on the island. “Smells good, Sig!”

“It does,” Legolas was quick to second, coming behind Bain with the last of the bags. “We got all the bags out of the back, Bard. Were there any more?”

“Just the steel wool and the small can of paint in the front seat,” Bard asked, eyeing Thran at Legolas’s conciliatory tone.

“I’ll get them,” Legolas scampered out.

“Lock it when you come in, please,” Bard called, which met with a wave in reply.

“Now, we unload the groceries,” Thran directed, as Legolas came back inside with the bag from the homeowners’ mecca. It held enough steel wool for an entire ballet corps, and a small can of the chalkboard paint that Thran had read about. “And after that, Bard, the troops will help you with Legolas’s floor to finish it quickly, so that you have a well deserved rest before supper.” He looked around at the children. “Yes?”

Trading more sheepish looks, the children nodded quickly. “Yes, Thran, yes, Ada, yes, Father.”

Thran gestured as if he were a ballet master directing the corps. “Eh bien, mes enfants. Commençons!”

Tilda looked at the others, saw that they were unpacking the groceries, and leaned towards Legolas to whisper. “What does that mean? Commençons?”

“We begin,” Legolas whispered back. Tilda’s mouth made a silent O, and she took the box of oatmeal from him to take into the pantry without further delay.

Bard put both hands over his mouth, fighting hard not to laugh. “Um, you’ve got things well in hand, then.”

“We do. So upstairs with you. I shall bring nos enfants upstairs shortly, yes? So that they can help?”

“Um, that sounds good,” Bard nodded. “I’ll... just hang up my coat and take off my boots, and I’ll get the floor set up for our troops.”

He disappeared into the mudroom, returned to grab the packages of steel wool, and hurried upstairs. Thran followed him into the central hall in time to see him standing beside Hope the Lope, consumed in silent laughter. At the sound of Thran’s soft footstep, he turned.

“Oh, ye gods and little fishhooks!” he whispered in a strangled tone, trying to control his hilarity. “What did they do?”

“Nothing of consequence, my saint. They sniped at each other because the math is a frustration, and their attention span is short. I did not have to glare but the once. And then they were reminded of how much you do for us, and so I took advantage of their realization to prepare the house for tomorrow. Now, we will help you finish Legolas’s floor, and then all will be ready for a rest until supper.”

“I’ll get right on it,” Bard wiped tears of helpless laughter from his eyes. “Nothing like a trial by fire to find out whether you’ve got the chops to be a good parent, or if you’re just a doormat.”

Thran arched a single eyebrow at his husband. “I have been called many things, but doormat has never been one of them.”

“I believe it,” Bard breathed. He leaned in for a quick kiss, then headed upstairs.

Thran headed back to the kitchen, smiling. No doormat, indeed.

* * *

Bard’s hilarity calmed as he gathered up the drop cloths on Legolas’s floor, folding them to be ready for the next room. Thran’s troops came up shortly, and Bard showed everyone how to lightly scrub a section of floor with steel wool dipped in mineral spirits, then wipe off the residue, then rub in the paste wax with a cloth, then buff the wax until it gleamed. With six of them working at it, it was done quickly, and they all stood back to admire the reclaimed room. The walls were a yellower green than the one that Sigrid had chosen for her room, but it looked just as good with the white ceiling and trim, and the cleaned and polished oak floor. Legolas was eager to move his things out of the children’s study and back into his room, so with everyone’s help the room was his again in a few more minutes. He had a nice rug from his room in Thran’s apartment, and comfortable linens, so as the indirect afternoon light streamed in through the two big windows, the room was ready to welcome Legolas back.

“So can mine be next, Da?” Bain asked, even before Legolas had the last of his things out of the children’s study.

“Tcha,” Thran tsked, looking up from the floor where he was plugging in the lamp beside Legolas’s bed. “Let your Da have two deep breaths before you put him to work again.”

“Maybe I should work on the children’s bathroom first,” Bard pretended to muse. “It needs a lot of work.”

“No, no!” Tilda and Bain chorused, drawing laughter. “Our rooms first!”

“Why can’t my room be next?” Tilda said, appealing to Bard. “Why Bain’s?”

“I’ve been thinking about that,” Bard replied, looking at his youngest children. “It’s true, someone has to go next, and someone has to wait until last. So I am prepared to offer a prize to whoever goes last.”

“A prize? What kind of prize?” Bain demanded.

“Tilda, if you go last, you can choose three books from the used bookstore in the village. Bain, if you go last, you can choose two used video games from the game store.”

“Sweet!” Bain looked gleefully at Legolas. “I could get that alien zombie game we wanted, Legs!”
“Three books? Any kind I want?” Tilda bit her lip, sorely tempted. “Some of those fairytale ones? Or maybe some books about drawing?”

“Those would be nice,” Bard agreed. “Any takers?”

“I’ll go last,” Tilda decided. “Your room can be next, Bain.”

“Okay, Bain, your room will be next. Thanks, Til. Next weekend, we’ll go to the bookstore for you to choose your books.”

If Bain looked disappointed about not getting the video games, at least he was pleased that he’d have a refinished room before next weekend. Tilda smiled, thinking about the fun she’d have choosing her books.

It wasn’t quite time for supper yet, so Sigrid iced her cake, and Bard mixed up the marinade for the Indian chicken, filling the biggest bowl in the kitchen with the pieces to stash in the fridge overnight. He had a brief rest in the sitting room with Tilda and Thran looking at the tessellation book, considering whether they could make one out of tile for the solarium. But soon enough, it was time for supper. Thran helped Bard bake pork chops with herbs, mash potatoes, and steam their usual wide variety of vegetables.

After supper, Sigrid retreated for more conversation with Finn. Tilda wanted to draw more of the tessellations from Bard’s book, so she curled in Bard’s chair to draw while the boys, Thran, and he watched the Bruins - Maple Leafs hockey game on television. Anticipating tomorrow’s guests, Bard and Thran made sure the children cycled through the shower early. Because tomorrow was one of the rare days that Thran would not spend the morning at the barre, they planned a good breakfast that would carry them through the first rounds of fencing, with a late lunch at two.

When Bard crawled into bed with Thran near midnight, he snuggled into his angel’s embrace with a glad sigh. Despite the help that Thran had mustered to help him complete Legolas’s floor, he was tired. Still, he wasn’t too tired to savor a little conversation with his husband.

“So tell me what happened when I went shopping this afternoon.”

“It was only as I said, my saint. Math was a confusion, Sigrid tried to help, the boys vented at her, she vented back. The melee expanded so that Tilda felt obligated to defend her honor, and so I swept in as the angel of justice to calm the waters.”

Bard snickered sleepily. “A mixed metaphor if ever I heard one.”

“I dispensed the storm, regardless of the metaphor,” Thran waved a hand in dismissal. “Afterwards, I provided the means to for them to dispense their chagrin.”

“Did you gesticulate?”

Thran waved his hand again. “I was emphatic. What is this gesticulate?”

“It’s what you do when you get excited. You wave your hands, your accent gets a lot deeper, and you talk fast. It’s endearing.”

Thran sniffed. “The children did not seem to think so.”

“They wouldn’t. But I would. When you made such a fuss about my stitches, it was because you cared about me. I loved you for it, but it was still funny.”
“You have a perverse sense of humor.”

“I also have excellent taste in husbands.”

A snort of laughter was soft against his hair. “You certainly do. And so do I.”

Bard grinned. “Then we’re both happy, aren’t we?”

“So we are.” Lips pressed kiss against his hair. “It is something to marvel, every day that passes.”

Stroking Thran’s chest, Bard closed his eyes and savored the warmth of the long, elegant body that lay beside him. “May it always be so.”

The arms that tightened around him proved that Thran was of like mind.

* * *

Sunday could have been a holiday. Rather than labor at the barre or in class, Thran had the rare delight to indulge with Bard before rising. When they did finally clamber out of bed, Bard put together a delicious breakfast – cinnamon raisin muffins, a pair of egg puffs with various toppings, and fruit – that he was glad to devour as eagerly as the children. All was cleaned up by the time the first of their guests came to call.

Thran was not surprised that the trio of Finn, Killian, and Tara appeared earlier than expected. Finn’s pleasure at seeing Sigrid again was just as clear as Sigrid’s was to see him. Finn wasn’t in his hockey jersey this morning; he looked handsome in a blue flannel shirt and hoodie over his blue jeans and black boots, his long blond locks topped with a slouchy knitted hat. Sigrid, too, had dressed up, resorting to her blue Christmas sweater, leggings, and boots, but her dark hair was loose about her shoulders. They greeted each other with more bright eyes and smiles than words, sliding furtive glances at each other when they thought no one watched them. But someone did – it was funny to watch Bard give his daughter’s beau a more than casual once-over. Their oldest child would not be a child much longer, and while Bard was pleased to see her blossom, he was still the protective father. There would not be any disappearing into the barn for this pair – they had to make do with the sitting room or the solarium as the site of their conversation.

Tara and Killian were a delight. She was very tall, very slender, and very beautiful, with long, red hair that fell nearly to her hips, and clear green eyes. She bore herself like a fencer, balanced and alert, but with a quiet sense of humor and a gravity that was beyond her fourteen years. She was a devoted fencer, and spoke well of the Gondors to Thran. In contrast, Killian was a year younger and several inches shorter than his girlfriend, dark eyed, with curly black hair only partially corralled in a messy knot atop his head, leaving many strands to fall in his eyes. He had a small hoop earring in one ear that completed the image of him as the dashing Irishman. He was always laughing, always smiling mischievously, with many a funny story to tell, most of which seemed to reveal both his lack of regard for his own safety, and his willingness to laugh at himself. If Thran had to guess, he expected Tara to be the cool, cerebral fencer, and Killian the fiery, impulsive one.

Legolas, Killian, and Tara were still sprawled on the floor of the ballroom to chat when the Gondors arrived. Thran knew both by reputation only, having seen Aragorn compete in the championship he and Legolas had attended a few years ago. He’d never seen Arwen fence in person, though he and Legolas had seen several of her matches on the Internet. As Bard led them into the ballroom, the pair seemed so down to earth, both soft spoken, though the wide smile on Aragorn’s face to see the three young fencers spoke volumes about his passion for his sport, as well the teaching of it. Bard brought his children and Finn into the ballroom for introductions, and set down a big basket of muffins and a pitcher of juice for everyone to enjoy as they limbered for the fencing. Thran and Legolas had already eaten muffins at breakfast, but that didn’t stop Legolas from helping himself to several as he warmed up. He helped himself to two more just before he pulled on his mask.

“These are different, Father,” Legolas shrugged, as if that explained everything. “This one is orange cranberry, and this one is corn onion. They’re both good.”

“Eh bien, mon affamé de fils,” Thran shook his head. “En garde.”

They were the first pair to square off, and Thran was glad to begin with an opponent he knew well. He was likely the poorest fencer on the floor, though that did not concern him. Two of the other five were among the best in the world, and the other three were much younger. Perhaps he could best three of those five with his experience, but he didn’t expect to have any such luck against the Gondors.

The next two hours were among the most enjoyable he’d had while fencing. The Gondors were both superb fencers, but their further skill was their teaching. Invariably, when a touch was scored, one or the other explained all the whys and wherefores about it. Even when the touch was against them, they made the same study, and often revisited the blow to see how to defend against or further press the attack. Kilian was a saber fencer, rather than an épée, but he willingly took up either blade as requested. He was very fast, had good instincts, and soaked up everything Aragorn and Arwen had to tell him. As he expected, Tara was a less impulsive, more thinking fighter, but she had an instinct about her opponent that made it very hard to score against her.

When Arwen paired Legolas, Thran put up his blade to watch. He was proud of his son’s skill, but even more of how fast he applied all he learned. When Legolas managed to score once against her, she complimented him warmly, and explained to the other fencers how he’d gotten past her guard. Legolas retired for the next pair flushed at his accomplishment, reddening at Thran’s praise.

The children were not the only ones to benefit from the Gondors’ instruction. When Thran fenced against the young fencers, he held his own respectfully. Against the Gondors, however, he had a much harder time – the only advantage he had was his height, for he was six inches taller than Aragorn, and eight inches taller than Arwen. Even his longer reach gave him little advantage. Still, no matter how many times the Gondors scored against him, he was pleased to fare as well as he did against such skilled opponents, and to take the lessons they offered.

Everyone was well exercised and well ready for lunch by two o’clock. The aroma of Indian spiced chicken and jasmine rice had tantalized them for half an hour, so when Bard stuck his head into the ballroom to say that lunch was ready, the irrepressible Kilian yelped in delight. Tara rolled her eyes, but she didn’t resist when Kilian pulled her after Bard into the kitchen. The feast that awaited them was a massive pot of rice, an equally massive pot of spiced chicken simmered so long in its spices that it had turned bright orange, and salad. On the table, warm naan awaited them.

By crowding close, everyone managed to fit around the kitchen table. How Kilian managed to laugh so much and tell so many stories while he inhaled so much food was laughable.

“He’s quite the scamp, our Kilian,” Aragorn said quietly to Thran. “But he has a good heart, and he is a very good fencer. He’s an even better archer.”

“So Legolas tells me,” Thran murmured. “That is a big change for Legolas. At his previous school, he was not welcome because of his age. His older teammates resented him for taking a place they thought belonged to one of the older members."

“I gathered as much,” Aragorn nodded. “Your son is quiet, but not only because that is his nature. He was careful not to say too much at first, I thought likely because he waited to see how a new student would fare with the others.”

“He mentioned early on that Tara and Killian made him most welcome. You have taught them well.”

“They have welcoming personalities that came before my teaching. It was Tara who spoke to me of what she thought Legolas’s previous experience might have been.”

“Then Legolas and I both owe her a debt of gratitude.”

“Your son is very skilled. If he were old enough, he would be qualified to try for a spot on the Olympic team he seeks, though I think it would be a long shot. When he is old enough, I hope he will be even more qualified, and his chances will be much higher. Would you consider allowing him to train more extensively than twice a week? Arwen and I hold a Saturday session for those who seek more advanced training. He would be a welcome addition.”

“I will speak to Legolas, but I expect that he would be eager to join you. He has enjoyed his lessons with you so far. He trained for three years with Seamus Finn, who nurtured him well. His instructor this year, however, was not a good fit, and Legolas was discouraged.”

“Ludwig Schroeder, I believe,” Aragorn nodded. “I’m aware of him, and I well understand why Legolas didn’t take to him. Legolas is well disciplined, and does not need to be told twice to do something. Master Finn was the perfect guide for him. Master Schroeder is... a more pedantic teacher. Not a style that suits a finesse fencer such as Legolas.”

“I will speak to Legolas, then. I know he will love to learn more, and I thank you for considering him.”

“You would be welcome at our session, too, if you are inclined, Thran,” Aragorn smiled. “You are very good for as little as you say you practice. If you would like to sharpen your skills, you would be welcome.”

Thran’s smile was gratified. “I thank you for the compliment. Perhaps as the rigors of my dancing allow, I will do so. The day is not far off when Legolas’s épée will best mine. Perhaps your classes will help me to delay it a little, but nothing will for long.”

“He has the potential to be excellent,” Aragorn shrugged. “I know you are proud of him. You have reason to be.”

“I do,” Thran replied simply. “He is my treasure.”

As Aragorn got up to help himself to more of the chicken, Thran’s smile was broad. Life had grown better every day since he and his family had begun their new life in this house. Today’s triumph, however, to know his son was valued and appreciated for his talents where before he had not, was one of the best.
Chapter 46

Chapter Summary

The angel fences, the saint draws, and another room receives its christening. Which one will it be?

Chapter Notes

This isn't a very explicit chapter, but a nicely warm one nevertheless :-).}

Bard was pleased to see everyone enjoy his bountiful lunch. Despite the crowded quarters around the kitchen table, it was replete with laughter and animated discussion as well as good food. Kíllian, the short, stocky rascal who had a romantic Irish glamour about him, kept everyone laughing with one funny story after another. If the group got back to fencing after lunch, Bard intended to pull out his sketchpad and capture the boy in action; fencing was one of the few things Kíllian was serious about, but even in the heat of action his spritely personality showed through.

He’d have no end of worthy subjects for his pencil, to be honest. Kíllian was the clown of the group, but Tara had a grace about her that reminded him of the ballerinas he’d watched in Thran’s ballet class. When she fenced, she was so balanced, so centered, rarely caught off-guard, a formidable warrior. At ease, however, Kíllian made her laugh until she lost her serious mien, and she seemed to be a more typical teenaged girl. If the way her eyes softened when she looked at him were any indication, she was very fond of the scamp. On the surface, Kíllian only seemed less bedazzled than his girlfriend, but Bard knew better. How many times had he looked after Thran in the same longing, infatuated way? He hoped he covered it better than a thirteen-year-old boy mooning over his tall girlfriend.

Finn was much more serious than his cousin, but he was two years older, and very much at pains to be on his good behavior, given his interest in Sigrid. He’d shaken Bard’s hand firmly, met his eyes directly, and was the face of courtesy. As if knowing Bard’s eye was on him, he’d been to content to sit with Sigrid to watch the fencing, though neither their attention nor conversation was often on the matches. As they sat together during lunch, it was funny to watch the boy so courteously ask Sigrid if she wanted more salad, or could he fetch her a little more chicken and rice, or perhaps a piece of the marble cake, and how good it was, and oh, you made it? Well, it was wonderful, his new favorite kind. Sigrid had always been a pragmatic girl, tough when she dealt with unsavory denizens of her old city school, and never one to suffer fools for long. To watch that formidable Amazon soften in the face of Finn’s old-fashioned courtesy was both charming and disconcerting. When Bard caught her eyes at lunch, she blushed just a little, but her smile was just as amused as his was, reminding him of her mother’s self-possession and confidence. Finn had no idea what he was up against if he hoped to pursue his eldest daughter.

The Gondors were no less interesting than the youths. Aragorn was likely a few years older than Bard, for silver strands already streaked his dark, wavy hair. He had a quiet, weighty dignity; when he looked at anyone, he gave them his complete attention and consideration, and his replies were always considered and well thought out. His affection for his students was clear in how easily he laughed with them, and how he delivered his instruction with respect as well as precision.

Aragorn was a different man when he looked at his wife, though. Arwen’s ethereal beauty was warmer, earthier than Thran’s, but she had the same not-quite-of-this-world aura. When Aragorn’s eyes fell on his lady, he seemed ten years younger, a medieval knight to her regal queen. She was a fierce fencer, the full-fledged Amazonian queen that Tara might one day be, as focused as any fencer could be. But she, too, changed when she regarded her husband. At the end of a match between them, when they pulled off masks and shook hands, he bowed over her hand to kiss it, and she offered him a gentle bow and a warm, affectionate smile.

Lunch lingered long over Sigrid’s cake and whatever ice cream was in the freezer, but eventually the fencers returned to the ballroom for a few more bouts. When Bard pulled out his sketchbook and pencils, Tilda came up with hers, drawing his smile, so they sat side by side to sketch. She chose to draw just one picture, a pair of fencers facing each other in the classic beginning pose, one with Tara’s red hair and Arwen’s blue shirt, and the other with Legolas’s blond hair and Aragorn’s red and black sweater. While she concentrated on her single picture, Bard filled several pages with quick sketches as he had during Monsieur LePied’s ballet class – here was Legolas, his blond hair flying behind him like a horse’s tail as he lunged at Kíllian; and there was Kíllian leaping backwards, suspended above the floor in mid-leap, blade sweeping down to deflect Legolas’s. Thran stretched to his fullest extension against Tara, looking as if he danced rather than fenced. Aragorn’s blade arced forward, his other arm acting the counterweight... Sigrid and Finn by the window, their heads nearly touching as he bent to hear something she said... Bain munching a second piece of cake, pointing at Thran as he fled backwards under Arwen’s bold attack... Bain and Legolas standing side by side to watch Tara and Kíllian’s match... Tilda sitting beside him, head bent over her pad...

Before he knew it, he’d filled the remaining pages of his sketchbook. He’d have to stop at the craft store for a new supply, as this was his last one.

“How have you captured us all, lyubov moya?” Thran squatted beside him and Tilda as the other fencers shed their jackets and stowed blades in their cases.

“I got some good sketches,” he allowed, flipping back through the pages. “I like this one of Kíllian.”

“That is him, without doubt,” Thran agreed, smiling at the minimal dash of lines that still clearly conveyed the young fencer not in a match, but leaping just because he could in such a large open space. “His exuberance is like no other’s.”

“Do you like my picture, too?” Tilda asked, holding her pad out to Thran.

“I do,” Thran nodded. “You have the grips on the épées just right.”

“Maybe you’d like some drawing classes, little doll?” Bard asked. “Or would you like to go a little longer on your own?”

Tilda looked up expectantly. “Would you teach me?”

“Of course, if you’d like me to. The best thing you can do is practice, just as you’re doing now. And I’ll get out my old schoolbooks for you. But when you’d like lessons from someone else, say the word.”

Tilda dimpled at him. “Okay, Da. But I like you to show me just fine.”

Bard didn’t get a chance to bask in his daughter’s smile for long. Arwen came over for a look at Tilda’s picture, then Bard’s sketches. She smiled at the one of Kíllian with Thran, but she also liked one of Tilda laughing at something Aragorn said to her.

“I have seen that same laughing smile on Aragorn’s face so often when he talks with our son, Eldarion,” Arwen confided, smiling fondly. “That is exactly the tilt of his head, and the way he stands. I see him in every line of your drawing, Bard. It is wonderful.”

“Thank you,” Bard nodded, running a hand through his hair – he had to stop that. Thran was right that he did it when he felt shy, which was invariably his reaction when someone complimented his work. It wasn’t that he lacked confidence in his abilities, but compliments usually made him feel exposed, as if his art had revealed a secret about himself he hadn’t intended. “It was fun to have so much to sketch.”

“Legolas has told us about your sculpture, and your plans to return to it after so long away. I look forward to seeing it.”

“It won’t be long,” Bard nodded, firmly keeping his hands on his sketchbook and not in his hair. “Once I get a little more of the house reclaimed, I’ll be back at it.”

Aragorn came to stand beside his wife. “This has been a wonderful afternoon, Bard, Thran. Thank you for hosting us, and I hope you’ll ask us back again. This is not just a beautiful place to fence, but a beautiful home, too.”

“You’re more than welcome anytime, with or without fencing equipment,” Bard smiled.

“I hope we’ll see you and Legolas on Saturdays,” Arwen added to Thran. “You are not as rusty as you think you are, Thran.”

“You are kind,” Thran put his hand over his heart and offered Arwen a little bow. “It would be my pleasure to come as my dancing allows, and of course Legolas will be there. He enjoys it so much. Thank you for today’s lessons from both of us.”

Kíllian, Tara, and Finn were also preparing to take their leave, so Thran, Bard, and the children walked everyone to the front door to say goodbye. Of course, Sigrid and Finn had great difficulty breaking off their conversation, much to the teasing delight of their mates. But eventually, Kíllian and Tara drew Finn to his car, and got in amid calls of farewell. Arwen and Aragorn were already in their car, and waved goodbye as they pulled out of the drive. Behind them, Finn started his car, turned it around to head of the driveway, but stopped long enough to roll down the window.

“Bye, Sigrid!” he called. “I’ll call you when I get home, all right?”

Sigrid reddened. “Just you finish your trig homework first, Finn Durinson! I’ve already done mine, and I’m not going to do yours, too!”

Tara and Kíllian found that hilarious, which meant that Finn was now blushing as much as Sigrid was. He mugged at their antics, and gave Sigrid a big smile and wave as he drove away.

“That was so much fun,” Legolas said regretfully, looking after the retreating car. “A lot of fun.”

Thran put an arm around his son’s shoulders and jostled him. “So it was. The Gondors are both excellent teachers and we have both been well schooled. I like them.”

“So do I, Father,” Legolas agreed as they walked back inside. “I can’t wait to join the Saturday class! I know I’ll learn so much. You don’t know what a relief it is to be done with Master Schroeder!”
Thran laughed as he shut the door behind them. “I think you give me a good idea, Legolas.”

“Bain and Tilda, thank you for being such good hosts for our guests today.” Bard said to his younger children. “It was nice of you to help them feel welcome, and to let Legolas enjoy his time with them, doing something he loves so much.”

“I enjoyed watching them,” Bain shrugged. “I’ve never seen any fencing before. Boy, Legs, the Gondors are so good! I can’t believe how fast they are!”

“I know!” Legolas agreed at once. “Did you see how fast Aragorn came after Kilian that one time?”

“When he jumped up to touch Kilian’s mask?” Bain said. “That was amazing!”

“Let’s get everything cleaned up, then we can take a rest,” Bard said. “Not that there’s much food to put away. I don’t guess anyone will want any supper, will they?”

“Da!” Bain looked aghast. “We just ate at two! We can’t go all night until breakfast without something!”

“Just checking,” Bard tousled Bain’s hair. “Come on, then. We’d better take stock and see what’s for supper. Maybe sandwiches.”

Later that night, after sandwiches and showers, after the children got reluctantly in bed in sad anticipation of the start of another school week, Bard sent Thran to shower while he filled the soaking tub. Once Thran settled in the hot water to savor the warmth, Bard followed him for his shower, and soon came out dripping.

“Join me?” Thran invited, holding out a hand.

“Are you sure? You look like you’re comfortable.”

“I am. I will also be comfortable when my saint enjoys the tub with me.”

“Behind you, or at the other end?”

“I am well able to cradle you, lyubov moya.”

“You look sore, angel. I’d rather you arrange yourself so that whatever hurts is under the water, and I’ll accommodate.”

“I am not sore, merely out of practice at fencing, and I worked hard at it today. I restore myself for the dance tomorrow.”

“So tell me what will help you restore yourself better.”

He got an appreciative smile and a slight wave of the hand from his husband. “If you insist, then behind.”

Bard eased behind Thran, and settled against the back of the tub with Thran nestled against his chest. “Mmm. Feels good. Okay for you?”

Thran sighed. “More than okay. I am warm, my saint is with me, and all is well. Thank you for hosting today, Bard. It was a delicious lunch, and a wonderful time. I have been to many parties that were not so finely arranged. You have a gift.”

Bard chuckled. “It’s called cooking in mass quantities for hungry athletes. They’ll eat just about anything you put in front of them.”

“That was not just ‘anything’ you put in front of us. So delicious! I ate so much of the chicken that my hair will turn orange by tomorrow.”

“I hope not. It’d be like living with a giant cheese puff. I’d rather keep the pale angel.”

Thran’s quiet laughter was rich. “You are right. I would look ridiculous as a piece of junk food.”

“So what’s your agenda for tomorrow? Class in the city?”

“I think not. I must practice my performance piece for my Tuesday audition, and that is best done here.”

“Is that how a dancer auditions? Present a performance?”

“Group auditions generally have two parts. The first is a regular barre, so that those holding the auditions can get a sense of all of the auditioning dancers together – how each one moves, general attitude and demeanor, assessment of physical advantages and disadvantages one dance to the other, and so on. Then each dancer who auditions performs a piece.”

“What are you going to do for your piece?”

“I have two I prefer. One is part of the knife piece choreographed for me. It is technically precise as well as flashy, especially if I wield the knives. The other is more classical in form, though no less technical. While I am known as a theatrical dancer, I find it useful to perform something you might call ‘old school,’ more traditional, just to show that I can embody that precision, that restraint.”

Bard hummed. “When your auditions are done, I hope one day that you’ll let me watch you dance. I’ve seen you on the Internet, but it’s not the same as in person.”

“Of course. You have only to ask. You are always welcome when I am in the ballroom. I ask only that you understand that when I am there, it is my place to work, and I am very intense, very focused. The outside world does not intrude.”

“It’ll be the same when I work metal,” Bard stroked Thran’s shoulder. “I’ll respect your workplace as you will mine. Would it bother you if I come in to sketch now and again?”

“No, as long as you understand that I may ignore you.”

“Of course.”

“If you would like to watch my practice tomorrow at some point, I do not mind. I expected to have you on call for part of it, anyway, when I use the knives.”

“You don’t look like you’ve ever had trouble with them,” Bard grinned. “Not a scar anywhere on you.”

“I expect no trouble tomorrow, either. It is just the practice that someone is on call when such things are in use.”

“I’ll be your backup.”

“As you always are,” Thran murmured comfortably, rubbing Bard’s knee under the water. “I am a very fortunate angel.”
“What time is your audition Tuesday?”

“One. It is in the city.”

“And this is the one you’re not all that interested in?”

“That is so. But it will prepare me mentally for the ones on Thursday, Friday, and next Monday.”

“Which one is the risky one, the one you want?”

“That is next Monday. I think I will do something not usually done before that one.”

“What’s that?”

“You know already that it is not the company so much that interests me, yes?”

“You said it was the choreographer.”

Thran nodded. “So I think I will contact him and see if we can arrange to meet beforehand. Would you mind if I ask him to meet here?”

“Of course not. I can make you lunch or something, if that’d help.”

“I thought I would suggest that this choreographer and I attempt a short collaboration, to see if we are compatible. There is no point tying myself to a company with more risk and less compensation if we are not.”

“Do you think he’d agree?”

Thran shrugged. “If he does not, then that is its own answer. But he is likely as aware of my reputation and credentials as I am of his, and if he is intrigued, then perhaps he will.”

“You don’t seem worried.”

“Such things are the nature of the dance. I will call him tomorrow, in hopes that we can meet before my second and third auditions. I will make no more or less effort in those, regardless of what this choreographer does. But I prefer to go into them knowing how I feel about the fourth one.”

“Makes sense.”

“What is your plan for tomorrow? Bain’s room?”

“Bain’s room,” Bard confirmed. “Thank all the gods, the woodwork in his room and Tilda’s aren’t in the state that the stuff in Legolas’s room was. I can go right to primer and paint on both. So maybe I can get both done this week.”

“Progress as you see fit. It will all get done.”

“I can’t wait to get to our room. That icy blue will look much better than the current dingy white. I think we ought to move your white rug from the main room up here when I’m done, if not before. The children are hard on it.”

“You were wise to suggest that nice red rug you found in the secondhand shop for the sitting room rather than my white rug. We thought it would look nice in the main room, but the children like to play there when I am in the ballroom, and that has taken its toll, so yes, let us save it from further desecration.”
“I want to keep it nice enough for me to make love to you on it.”

Thran’s rumble of anticipation was considerably less sleepy than his previous murmur. “If I offer you two cents, would you take me downstairs and make love to me there now?”

Bard laughed. “I thought you were sore from fencing.”

“Warm water is a great restorative. Take advantage of it to take advantage of me.”

Bard snaked hands around Thran’s ribs to massage his groins, then either side of his cock. “Don’t mind if I do. You’re the perfect bath toy.”

“I am not.” Thran said weakly, trying to sit up, but Bard held him tightly around the ribs, and twined his legs around Thran’s to urge him to stay still.

“Yes, you are. Be good and I’ll make you squeak.”

“Gods, you have more limbs than an octopus.”

“I’m better than an octopus. I have hands.” Bard took Thran’s cock in hand and pressed a kiss against his neck. “I bet it doesn’t take me long to make a jellyfish out of you.”

Thran’s resistance melted, and he lay back against Bard with a silent moan. “Oh, gods, it won’t. That feels divine. I should be ashamed at how good that feels.”

“But you won’t because it feels so good. Besides, you know how much I crave such an easy lover. Just a quick little ambush, and you’re mine. Aren’t you?”

“I am. Gods, I am. Please, don’t stop.”

“Owned in the bath.”

“I am. Oh, gods, Bard, you’re too good – I can’t – you have to –”

“I have to what, angel?”

“I can’t – oh, suka blyad, you know me too well, and I’m – you’re –” Thran growled in arousal as Bard’s insistent hands consumed him, winding his body tight against Bards. “Oh, for all the gods, you are the worst bastard!”

“Your favorite kind. Come on, angel. Show me how much you like being owned in the bath.”

“Oy, ty grebannyy huiesos, ty zastavlyayesh’ menya konchit –” Thran gasped. His head went back as Bard’s teasing sent him spasming into release. Bard stroked his cock until the height of his orgasm had passed, then massaged his abdomen, his groins, his hips, as he came down from that height.

Thran lay limp and unresisting against Bard’s chest. “I am no longer safe in this tub when you are in it with me.”

Chuckling, Bard rubbed down Thran’s flanks to his groins and back up again until the dancer hummed in enjoyment. “You don’t seem too worried. Good thing – it’s too good a trick for me to give up. Can I get you a towel?”

Thran hummed in agreement, and sat forward for Bard to clamber out. He took the towel that Bard handed him, standing to dry off while Bard did the same. It always took him longer to dry than Thran, because he had so much more body hair, so it was no surprise when Thran finished first. As usual, Thran dried his hair while Bard finished toweling, then turned the dryer on Bard's. As Thran stowed the dryer, Bard ran both hands through his hair, combing it through with his fingers. He shut his eyes, savoring the sense of warm, clean, and dry... oh, someone just as warm, clean, and dry eased him close, nestling his back against a lean, sculpted chest. Of course, long, elegant hands circled his ribs just as his had circled Thran’s, and descended to his crotch with no less insistence.

“That was very nice, lyubov moya,” Thran teased, turning Bard towards the mirror. “So nice that I will reward you in kind. What is the term? See you, and raise you?”

“What do you call this? King Neptune’s revenge?”

“A welder had me this way in a grotty apartment building in New York City. You will have to ask him what he called it.”

“Gods, you pick up guys in the seamiest places. You and your taste for the illicit.”

“Always. In my own defense, the welder was deliciously talented. Let us see if I live up to his teaching.”

Thran took less time to bring Bard to release. That likely had something to do with how turned on he’d gotten taking Thran in the bath, and more to do with the pleasure of watching Thran in the mirror make quick work of him. There was something about his angel’s sly smile that never failed to send a jolt through his loins. He followed Thran to bed well satisfied.

“So, another room christened.” Thran stretched luxuriously against the pillows, veiled only in grey silk from the waist down as Bard got in beside him.

“Keep doing that, and I’ll christen you again in this one,” Bard growled.

“Once tonight is enough for me, lyubov moya. I must be serious about my auditions this week, or I will not be back at the dance as I should.”

“Just do a little of that eye fuck thing. They’ll offer you anything you want.”

Thran’s snicker was half muffled in his pillow. “Most of what that would get me would be unsavory. I will save that tactic for you only.”

“Then I’m one lucky man. Porridge with me in the morning, or eggs?”

“Porridge with you will be very nice. Then we see to the children, and then I go to the ballroom, and you go to Bain’s room. So we will work.”

Long arms drew Bard to rest his head on a pale shoulder, and stretch an arm across a pale chest. He stroked the braid of white hair that lay against Thran’s chest, as silky as the cashmere blankets. With a sigh, he closed his eyes and drew Thran close.

“Garu di, cariad.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, zoloto moyo.”
Chapter 47

Chapter Summary

As the angel prepares for auditions, he reveals the secrets of the dance to his saint. Whether the dance that follows is just good clean fun is open to interpretation.

Chapter Notes

Yet another explicit chapter. Our gorgeous guys are taking full advantage of an empty house to celebrate their recent marriage.

Thran carried the hinged wooden box he kept in the bottom drawer of his dresser downstairs, snared his mug of tea, and ventured into the ballroom. The children had left for school, and it was not yet seven-thirty. The ballroom was still cool, though the sound of the furnace revealed that it would soon be warmer. He put the box on the garden bench, took up the wide mop to run back and forth over the floor to remove the dust and grit from yesterday’s fencing extravaganza, then headed to the sitting room to peruse the orderly stacks of CDs. Ah, there were his three audition CDs in the third stack. He then came into the main hall to call up to Bard, already at work on Bain’s room.

“Lyubov moya, where is the portable CD player? It is not in the sitting room.”

“I think it’s in one of the boxes still in the main room,” Bard called downstairs. “Do you want me to look?”

“No, I will. Thank you!”

Thran scanned the boxes still remaining in the main room, all of them lined up against the inner wall opposite the fireplace. He found the CD player in the third of the boxes, along with another stack of CDs. He carried the box into the sitting room, unpacked the CDs, and put them by those already arranged on their shelves; someone could add them to the stacks later. The flattened box went into the mudroom to be recycled; the CD player came with him to the ballroom. The device was old, likely something Bard had picked up at a secondhand shop for next to nothing, then cleaned and repaired, but it worked just as well as anything more modern. Thran plugged it in, arranged it on the table in front of the garden bench, and was gratified to see the display lights appear. He slipped in one of his CDs, pressed Play, and sipped his tea before the music started. Ah, there began the lyrical strains of Chopin, a lone piano playing one of his favorite waltzes, the first of several on this long practice CD. This was not his audition music, but he let the CD play nevertheless; it would suit as he warmed up.

He put down his mug, letting the music coax him not to the barre, but across the floor in a triplet of steps, a simple turn, and then back in another triplet, but he was too wise to do much more than that before a proper warmup. He had another sip of tea, took himself to the barre, and gave himself to the gradual stretches and extensions, limbering joints, warming cold muscles. It felt good to move, to coax his sleepy body into the alertness and refinement it needed to properly embrace the dance. The rigors of yesterday’s fencing had not done any harm; in fact they had helped to build Thran’s endurance back to what it would need to be once he began work with a company. That brought a smile to his face as he continued to warm up.

He’d cycled through the Chopin CD before he’d completed his warmup, so he let it repeat as he moved away from the barre and began his steps and turns. He went back to the simple triplet of steps that went so well with the waltz, taking advantage of the ballroom’s length to fully extend into his stride. When he neared the fireplace, he spun in a double turn, then went back to the triples to return to the other end –

Bard leaned against the doorjamb, arms crossed over his chest as he watched.

Thran hadn’t heard Bard approach, because his husband had taken his work boots off in deference to keeping the ballroom floor clean. The smile tracing Bard’s lips was small, but affectionate and admiring. Thran kept dancing, offering his own smile as he stopped in front of his husband.

“To what do I owe this pleasure, my saint?”

Bard gave a light tug to Thran’s braid. “Nice music, beautiful dancer... thought I’d indulge myself with a quick look.”

In return, Thran tugged a lock of hair that’d escaped the messy knot at the back of Bard’s head. “Chopin is very nice music. His waltzes are my favorites.” He cocked an ear towards the CD player, and offered his hand. "It is a waltz that plays now."

Bard looked away smiling, then looked back and presented his hand with a bow. “Yes, I know how to waltz. So...?”

Laughing, Thran put Bard’s hand on his waist, and put his own on Bard’s shoulder. “So let us dance.”

Bard took his hand on Thran’s waist as the tacit invitation to lead that Thran had intended, and so swept them around the ballroom slowly at first, then with more speed as he got the sense of how they moved together. He was a graceful man, and would make a good dancer with a few lessons, which Thran intended to provide, if only to enhance their pleasure of gliding around their ballroom together. How romantic would it be to do so on some spring evening, with the windows open to capture in the breeze, and candlelight and fireflies to gild them as they swept around and around? To waltz with his husband this first time in the full light of the sun was no less romantic, because Bard’s warm hand was firmly at his waist, his other supported Thran’s hand, and his warm brown eyes were full of quiet pleasure.

When the waltz ended, Bard drew them to a stop beside Thran’s barre. The next piece of music began, but they remained by the barre. Bard released Thran’s hand, but his other hand remained at Thran’s waist.

“That first morning...” Bard murmured.

“Yes?”

“That pose... it was an arabesque.”

Thran traced a single rond de jambe à terre with his left leg, then arched it up into the arabesque à la hauteur, Bard’s right hand still on his waist.

“How do I hold you properly?”
Thran moved Bard’s right hand from his waist to rest on his right ribs, then guided Bard’s left hand to wrap over and around his raised left leg. “A simple fish dive lift, yes? Center yourself to my right leg. Then...

Bard settled Thran’s body against his, supporting and cradling it. “Then?”

“Lean back onto your left leg, and bend forward just to tip me forward and down, and I curl my standing leg.”

“Like this?” Bard tipped him just a little forward. Bard’s arms were strong around him, without tremor, so Thran curled his standing leg into a parallel passé, arched his back, stretched his left arm back and his right arm forward, and gave himself to the lift.

“Come out of it the same way as you went into it.”

Bard did, making sure that Thran was grounded before he shifted his hands, but it was not to release him, only draw him closer.

“Once more, with feeling?” Bard asked softly.

“As you wish.”

Strong arms settled their hold again, dipped him a little deeper, held him a little closer. It was just the simplest of fish dives, but it was lyubov yego who held him, who took him off the ground and kept him safe while he flew. When Bard eased him upright, his knees quivered. When Bard eased away, his heart quivered, too.

“Don’t.” he whispered, as he put a hand on Bard’s arm.

Bard found Thran’s left hand, and drew it up to kiss its wedding ring before enfolding him in his arms. “You know I’m yours, angel. It took me too long to find you, so I’m not about to let you go now.”

“Nor I you. So...”

Bard kissed him. “So... I came in here to finish what we started that Saturday after Thanksgiving.”

“Oh, lyubov moya, I want you to. Please.”

Bard stroked his cheek. “But now that I’m here, I realize that what I came to do isn’t right. It’s not right at all.”

Thran blinked. “Is it not? Why not? This is not a church, merely a ballroom!”

Bard looked around the ballroom, his lips quirking in sly anticipation. “It’s not merely a ballroom, Thran. It’s our ballroom. Christening it deserves drama. It needs candles flickering at night, and exotic perfume, and a dangerous liaison.”

Thran’s disappointment melted in the face of intrigue. Had his sense of adventure kindled the same in Bard, or had his merely awakened what had always been in Bard’s heart, albeit buried for too long? Either delighted him. “And how do you plan to make this dangerous liaison, my theatrical saint?”

Brad smiled. “I’m going to make a date with the angel who seduced me, for midnight tomorrow night. I’m going to entice him to sneak down here with me at the witching hour, and I’ll light a few candles, maybe find a bottle of wine and a little chocolate, and then I’m going to make love to him.
on his favorite white rug in front of those windows, under the stars.”

Thran’s grin was probably utterly besotted as he followed Bard’s pointing finger to regard the expanse of windows behind the garden bench, but he didn’t care. “And this is what you call a dangerous liaison?”

Bard’s grin went a little lopsided. “There are four children in the house, Thran. If they catch us, we’d scar them for life, which I grant you isn’t as erotic as illicit lovers trying to avoid an angry spouse. But it has the potential to raise an even bigger hue and cry.”

Thran dissolved into silent laughter. “Oh, Bard, that is all too true. It will add quite the frisson of danger. Do we have candles?”

“We have candles. I keep a few boxes around in case the power goes out.”

“We have plenty of wine and chocolate.”

“And we have a white rug. So...” Bard got down on one knee, grinning. “Do we have a date?”

Thran pursed his lips. “If you do not get up, I will think of something else for you to have, and in short order.”

“Then say yes.”

“Yes. Many times yes.”

Bard got to his feet and enfolded Thran in his arms. “Then we both need to get back to work. And keep your fingers crossed about tomorrow night. We’ve been lucky so far with the children at night. Our luck’s bound to run out before long.”

Thran’s arms went around Bard’s shoulders, and he threaded his hands through Bard’s hair. “I think it will hold long enough for me to indulge in a kiss with my husband.”

The lips that kissed him back were warm; the body that nestled against his was solid and strong; and the soft, Welsh-accented words that caressed his ears were full of love. When Bard eased away with a smile, his warmth, strength, and love lingered long after he slipped back upstairs to continue their renovation. That gave Thran something to smile about as he resumed his dancing in the sunlit ballroom.

Tomorrow night, candles would replace the sunlight, the discipline of ballet and yoga would give way to unrestrained passion, and the pas de deux that ensued would be an erotic one. How delicious that would be, and not just for those moments. That passion would be in his thoughts every time he danced here thereafter.

What could be more wonderful?

* * *

Primer went on two of Bain’s walls before Bard stopped smiling about making a date with an angel. Not just a run-of-the-mill, dinner and coffee date, but one at midnight, in a ballroom, on a furry white rug, in full view of the stars above. With candlelight.
Gods, let all the children stay firmly asleep! Paying back an angel for seducing him the Saturday after Thanksgiving did not need the reality of being a parent to intrude on it. Not that he could complain; so far, no one had gotten sick, Thran had handled the sole meltdown admirably, nothing in the house had broken, the renovation had gone quickly, and the children had settled into their new school faster than he’d expected. How had he ended up living in a fairytale?

He set to his painting with renewed focus. Bain’s ceiling was done, and the primer was proceeding quickly. Depending on how soon Thran needed him as a spotter when he wielded his knives, he might get at least one coat of paint on the walls this afternoon. If he could get both on, then tomorrow he’d do woodwork and floor, and Bain’s room would be settled. He liked the soft blue Bain had chosen, slightly less grey than what he and Thran had chosen for their room, not as turquoise as the bright blue that would transform the children’s bathroom. Maybe by next week he could get to his and Thran’s room. Their room was bigger, and would take longer, and there was the closet to wrangle as well; that would be a soft white with just a hint of blush in it that only he would know was there. Daphne had taught him that – an imperceptible rosy tinge to walls and lighting made anyone look better naked. Imagining how Thran’s pale skin would glow with that faint blush on the walls and a similarly-tinted silk Fortuny shade on the overhead light got him through the third wall of primer with a smile.

He’d started on the fourth wall when Thran came upstairs. His brow had a faint sheen of sweat on it, and his shirt between his pectorals was damp, but he looked invigorated rather than winded. He had an old, long sweater wrapped around him, and another wrapped around his waist to keep his back warm, and fingerless gloves.

“How is the primer?” he asked, sticking his head inside Bain’s room to look around. “Ah, so much brighter already! I have worked on my traditional audition piece several times, and would like to work with the knives, once you can take a break. Or if you need a longer time, I will work on it after lunch.”

“I won’t be long, maybe another half hour? Is that too long?”

Thran shook his head. “No, that will be fine. I prefer to work now rather than after lunch, so that I do not have to warm up so much again. I will stay warm with simple things until you are done.”

“I’ll be quick.”

Thran gave him an amused smile. “I will tell you what a certain artist repeats to me as a mantra – ‘do it right the first time, or do it over.’”

Bard laughed. “My father had a saying that fits. ‘Take your time, but hurry.’ It made me laugh every time he said it.”

Thran laughed, too. “Which was one to follow? The care, or the speed?”

Bard shrugged as he rolled primer on the bottom third of the wall. “It depended on the moment, to be honest. So go stay warm, and I’ll take my time up here, then hurry down in a few minutes.”

With a flourish of the hand, Thran made a graceful bow. “So it shall be done, lyubov moya.”

The tall dancer disappeared, so Bard applied himself to the primer, taking pains to put it on the wall with all due care, but as quickly as possible. He didn’t want Thran to cool down too much to apply himself well to his practice. The easy part was to roll the primer over the walls quickly; he took more time to cut in the primer around the moldings. In about twenty minutes, he was done, so capped the primer, and carted his brushes downstairs to soak. He left his boots in the mudroom, washed his hands, and came into the ballroom still drying them.

“I started a little without you,” Thran confessed, standing in the middle of the ballroom floor well swaddled in legwarmers, a thick, long-sleeved shirt, a sleeveless quilted vest, and a sweater tied around his ribs. He had a curved knife in each hand, each about eighteen inches long, bending and flexing his wrists as he rotated them.

“I’ve never seen knives like that before,” Bard said.

A shrug accompanied Thran’s chuckle. “There are no others like these. They are loosely based on a much longer Mongol cavalry sword, but they have no practical counterpart. They are only props for my dance, even though they are properly forged and balanced.”

“May I see one?”

With a flick of his wrists, Thran reversed both of the knives in his grip and held the hilts out to Bard. They were not flimsy prop implements, but real knives, no matter how dull the single cutting edges. Each blade was a polished, undecorated expanse of elegant, silvery steel, slightly tapering to its point. Each curved gracefully more than a katana, less than a Malay kris; the hilt curved slightly in the opposite direction. Braided leather wrapped each hilt, providing a nonslippery grip. The weighting was precise, as well, for Bard was able to balance each on one finger at the hilt.

“They’re beautiful pieces,” Bard nodded. He waited for Thran to slip off both of his sweaters and his fleece vest before handing back the blades. “They suit you – elegant and beautiful.”

Thran offered him a smile and slight bow. “You are gracious. So, there is nothing you need do, only be nearby as insurance.”

“Should I bring down the medical kit, in case?” Bard offered.

Thran shook his head and held up his hands, indicating his long-sleeved shirt. “I do not think I will need it. I wear this when I practice with the knives. It has a thin lining of Kevlar, so it is a little stiff, but it is wise for me to wear it now after so long away from the knives.”

Bard nodded. “Okay.”

“So if you will press Play on the CD player, then Repeat, I will begin. If you want to just watch, or sketch, I do not mind.”

“I filled my last sketchpad at the fencing. I need to get some new ones.”

“We will do so at once,” Thran said as he walked to the middle of the room, knives in hand. “You have come back to yourself, and I do not want that to stop.”

Bard looked up from the CD player. “I don’t want that to stop, either. I’ll pick some up the next time we’re out. But right now, I’ll enjoy just watching you dance. Say when.”

“When,” Thran nodded in reply, taking his stance.

The music started, nothing but a single building dissonant chord, angry and threatening, followed by a breathless silence, then another chord that was even more malignant. The music that followed was a deep glowering rage, but beautiful and compelling even as it rose. Strings swirled above the darkness like birds driven in the storm, but rather than lightening the mood, they only reinforced it, as lightning did the sound of thunder. Through it all, Thran was the sinister magician that conjured the storm, but if the music was heavy, he was anything but. How he hung in the air as long as he did,
Bard couldn’t fathom. Nor could he fathom how the knives in his hands defied gravity to levitate a time or two, or flashed so brightly in mere sunlight. His feet seemed to move in a blur at times, and the precision with which he placed each step, each hand, without tremble or hesitation, made Bard’s jaw drop. This was the first time he’d seen his angel at his best, and it seemed hardly human – angelic, indeed, but one from the depths of hell, not heaven.

The music stopped, then began again. Thran repeated his performance with the same precision, but the impression was very different. The first time, Thran had been a sinister magician. This time, he was something worse, full of more than human malice and hate. The third time, he was different yet again, more sensual, more rounded in his movements. The fourth time, he changed yet again to something less overtly passionate and more controlled, colder, yet even more compelling.

When the music ended this time, Thran pointed to the CD player, so Bard hastened to pause the music.

“You did the same steps each time, but you were different each time. Completely different,” Bard marveled. “It was amazing. And the music – what is it? Very dramatic!”

Thran came to stand with him by the CD player. “Thank you, lyubov moya. Yes, I like the music very much. Of course it is dramatic – it is Russian! It is the first two minutes of Prokofiev’s Dance of the Knights from his Romeo and Juliet. And yes, I danced a different role each time. Please, tell me who I seemed to be each time.”

“The first time, you were an evil sorcerer casting a spell, seriously malevolent. But the next time, you were even worse – you were the ruler of Hell, enforcing damnation on the dead. The third time, you were a goddess scorned in love, plotting revenge. But the last time... that was chilling. You were Death collecting souls in the middle of a battlefield, with the sounds of the wind and the screams of the dying all around you.”

Thran’s smile was pleased. “Ah, Bard, you are a poet as well as an artist. So vivid are your words!”

“My words? Your dancing, cariad. It was brilliant each time. So did I guess close to what you intended?”

Thran nodded. “You put names to the characters where I merely set my intent, but they match well. The first time through, I wanted mostly to resume my familiarity with the knives, but still convey malice. The second time, I intensified the malice. The third, I added the feminine softness to the malice, always a fascinating combination. And the fourth, I set aside the malice, the masculine, and the feminine to convey inevitability in the storm. But I very much like the images you gave name to, especially the last one. Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield. So apt a name. Perhaps if this choreographer and I can come to an understanding, we can make something of that.”

“Maybe you’ve been away from your knives for a while, but you were brilliant with them. Just stellar.”

“I thank you, lyubov moya,” Thran nodded. “We will see if I use them in any of my auditions. It is still an effective piece if I do not wield them. Tomorrow, I will likely do the Chopin piece. But if the mysterious choreographer and I suit each other, I will do Prokofiev with the knives on Monday. Now, I will cool down, and then I will be ready for lunch.”

“Before you cool down, would you show me your Chopin piece?”

“Of course. I am still well warm for it. First, I put away the knives.”
Thran wiped his knives carefully, then stowed them in a beautiful wooden box, replete with carving on the outside, green velvet lining on the inside, and padded inserts under the velvet to hold the knives snugly. A small silver plate on the outside of the box was engraved with several lines of Cyrillic characters.

“What does the inscription say?” Bard asked, as Thran closed the box.

“The top line is Tanets Klinkov, or Dance of the Blades. That is the name of the dance made for me, and for which these knives were made. The second is my birth name, Thran Mrachnyylesavich Orophersky. The third is Mariinsky Ballet, and the fourth is the date of my first public performance of Tanets Klinkov.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “Thran Marach...”

Thran grinned. “It is a great mouthful, yes? Thran Mrachnyylesavich Orophersky. Thran, son of Mrachnyyles - which means the murky forest, if you can believe the silliness of my father’s parents - from the family of Oropher. In either case, it is a lot to ask Americans to pronounce, so when I came to this country, I changed it to the simpler Thran Lesavich Oropherson – Thran, son of the forest, from the family of Oropher.”

“Did you change Legolas’s name, too?”

Thran nodded. “Only a little. Vileria and I, we were not very conventional, either. Her name was Vileria Mikhailova Borodina. So we named our son Legolas Thranovich Orophersky-Borodin – Legolas, son of Thran, from the families of Oropher and Borodin – to remember both of his parents. So I changed his last name as I had changed mine, Oropherson-Borodin, but kept his matronymic name unchanged so that he had something of his mother with him always. So, the Chopin.”

Thran took out the Prokofiev CD, replaced it with another, and cued it to Track 4. He stripped down to a single practice shirt, and took his place on the floor. At his nod, Bard started the music. This was a completely different performance, more of what Bard envisioned as typical ballet. It was very controlled and precise, but with the lightness that Bard was beginning to recognize as a distinctive part of Thran’s dancing. He made hardly a sound on the wooden floor even during his leaps and turns, and his attitude was spritely and inviting, well suited to appealing to a traditional panel of ballet judges. Thran performed it perfectly, his command and control of his body all the more remarkable because of how natural and unconscious it seemed to be. It was two minutes of bright elegance that drew Bard to applaud softly.

“You make that look just as wonderful – so light, so effortless. I’ll bet that lightness is one of your trademarks, isn’t it?”

Without false modesty, Thran shrugged assent as he pulled on one of his soft sweaters. “I worked very hard to achieve that. It is not easy for someone as tall and weighty as I am, but worth the effort.”

“You’re hardly weighty, given your height,” Bard observed. “I’m three inches shorter, but I probably weigh as much as you do.”

“You are much more muscular than I,” Thran amended. “Deliciously so. What those muscles did to me when you did your chin ups.... or when you ride me from the top... Mmm.”

Thran’s eyes slid sideways to give Bard a look up and down, and a small smile traced his lips. Gods, it was that smile that invariably presaged Thran’s most ardent arousal, the smile that revealed that Bard was about to be lunch. How was it possible for his Russian bastard of a husband to turn from work to lust on a dime? The thought of teasing it along made his loins stir in anticipation as he turned off the CD player, then gave Thran a long look, pursing his lips as he admired his husband’s body. “You’re incorrigible, angel.”

“I am,” he purred, eyes narrowing as he came towards Bard.

“Um, so... how long do you need to cool down?” Bard said lightly, backing up towards the main room. “I can see to lunch in the meantime. Something warm? Soup? Chicken with salad? What appeals to you?”

Thran followed right behind. He peeled off his sweater, then rubbed his hands on his hips. “My saint, in bed, on his back, begging for me. Mere food pales in comparison.”

Bard kept backing up, through the main room, across the main hall, and into the dining room. “You do know that starvation increases a man’s sex drive, don’t you? Yet another reason why you need to eat more. As in lunch?”

“That does not make me the least bit inclined to eat, at least not food, and all the more predatory. If you intend to run, you should do so now. But I encourage you to pick an unchristened room as your refuge, because wherever I catch you, I will have you.”

Bard held up his hands. “No lubricant down here, angel.”

“If you continue to back up, you will end up in the kitchen, where the pantry holds the coconut oil. When I reach for it, you can take that moment to run if you truly want to, but I will come after you immediately after. So, the dining room, perhaps? The sitting room? The main room? I doubt you will get any farther than that.”

“I thought you had to cool down. For your audition.”

Thran grinned. “I have one more dance in me before I need worry about that.”

They circled to the kitchen, and Thran went right to the pantry to grab the coconut oil. Before he could grab it, Bard dodged out into the main hall again, laughing when his sock-clad feet slipped as he tried to turn back to the dining room. Whooping like a Cossack, Thran came darting after him, his dance shoes offering much better traction on the wood floor. Swearing through his laughter, Bard ducked Thran’s arm and made it through the dining room and back into the kitchen, but he couldn’t make the tight turn back towards the hall. He dodged through the sitting room, trying to make it into the hall, but his socks undid him again and he couldn’t hold the tight turn. Thran tackled him as he tried to keep his balance, winding arms around his waist and heaving him off his feet with a triumphant yell.

“Oh, you unholy fucker, Thran!” Bard tried to pry Thran’s arms from around him, but his chortling lover refused to let go, instead carting him to the wider of the two sofas and wrestling him down onto it. He straddled Bard’s chest to yank and grab at Bard’s jeans, swiftly breaching belt buckle and button and zipper with an urgency that fired an equal one in Bard. In seconds, an eager mouth engulfed his cock, sucking greedily.

“Holy hell!” Bard swore as his cock sat up and took notice of the attention Thran lavished on it. “You damned vampire, you greedy cocksucker...!”

That drew only a nasty hum of laughter from Thran, which felt so good vibrating through his body. All Bard wanted to do was to close his eyes and let Thran have all of him, whatever he chose to do. But if he did that, before long all Thran would have to do was look at him, and he’d be stripping himself bare in anticipation... was that a bad thing?

Maybe he could make it a better thing. He stopped struggling, shut his eyes, and enjoyed Thran doing his worst. At his apparent concession to the inevitable, Thran settled to his pleasure, drawing closer, closer, finally close enough for Bard to get his arms around Thran’s waist. From there, it took just a second to loosen the belt that kept Thran’s tights snug, then peel tights and dance belt down, revealing his stiffening cock. Two could play Thran’s game, and Bard gave himself to it without hesitation. Above him, Thran moaned a garbled curse while Bard kissed and sucked and nipped, so Bard wound his arms around Thran, refusing to let him pull away. From the sounds that drew from his husband, Thran found Bard’s escalation irresistible, so he applied himself with as much urgency as Thran did. Which of them would have the other first?

It was too close to call. Thran might have spasmed first, but to feel the dancer’s exquisite body bucking from his ministrations was too erotic to ignore, and Bard followed right after him, arching against Thran’s body. When he fell back against the sofa panting, the straining body atop him slid off to the floor. Bard opened his eyes to see Thran sitting on the floor by the sofa, head back against Bard’s stomach, eyes shut, breathing hard, a satisfied smile on his face as he dragged a forearm across his mouth.

Gods, when such an elegant creature revealed his pleasure with such a profane, decadent gesture, Bard was lost. He wasn’t sure how he managed it, but somehow he slithered close enough to engulf Thran’s lips in a rough kiss. When they came up for air, they were both laughing.

“Oh, lyubov moya, what will we do when the children are not in school during the summer?” Thran mourned.

“Send them to summer camp,” Bard exhaled.

“There are such things?”

“There are.”

“We must find out.”

“We will. Now, have you had enough of me to get you through lunch?”

Thran’s grin was wicked. “You are very hard to resist. The only reason I have not already dragged your very sweet ass up to bed is because I want tomorrow night’s date to be memorable. So I restrain myself.”

Bard guffawed. “You do, do you?”

“Of course,” Thran shrugged in that oh-so-Russian way he had. “I am less interested in quantity of sex than in quality.”

“We’ve had plenty of both.”

Thran hummed appreciatively. He looked down at himself, and shook his head. “I am foul. I need a shower.”

“Soap doesn’t wash the filth out of your brain, cariad. And if it did, I’d never let you near the stuff.”

A snicker was an apt answer. “Nor would I get near it. But as it does not, let us indulge in enough to clean the skin, if not the libido, and then we can have lunch.”
Bard clambered off the sofa, hitched his jeans up, and offered Thran his hand. Thran let Bard pull him to his feet, then drew up his dancer’s belt and tights with a sly smile.

“I like this new twist on lunch,” Thran murmured as they headed upstairs.

“What, dessert before the main course?” Bard teased.

“Mmm,” Thran stroked his back softly, drawing Bard’s shiver. “You are the perfect sweet, whether you are the first course or the last.”

Bard didn’t suppress his grin. Gods, it was fun letting his husband turn him into a hedonist.
Chapter 48

Chapter Summary

The angel auditions, scores a find, and dallies with a saint in the ballroom. 'Nuff said.

Chapter Notes

Yes, it's another Explicit Chapter. Enjoy!

Thran settled himself for the drive into the city. He was early, considering that his audition was not until one, but even during the week traffic could be difficult around lunchtime. It would not do to arrive late, not even for an elite dancer. One of the ways Thran had become an elite dancer was to extend full courtesy and respect to the companies he worked with, whether as a member or as one who auditioned. Do one’s research, prepare properly, dress properly, be on time, treat other dancers and dance masters with respect, and so on and so forth. Thran approached such things now just as he had as a student and junior dancer – without ego. One could always learn, always improve, always grow. That was how one became an elite dancer. It was also how one stayed an elite dancer.

Consequently, he rarely had to employ his formidable Prince of Ice glare against other dancers or masters; his respect met with the same from others. There had been that one choreographer who had demanded that he stop looking so much taller than his partner – what an idiotic thing that had been; if the choreographer had wanted a shorter dancer, he should have ensured that the company had chosen one. For the most part, it was only ignorant ballet critics who merited his glare – ah, yes, also the occasional child in the middle of a meltdown. At least the latter gave Thran something to snicker about. He and Bard were well blessed to have such wonderful children who rarely needed an icy glare to settle them.

He settled to his usual audition routine, concentrating on the drive, taking his time. That was why he always left so early, so that even unexpected traffic didn’t make him rush. The trip took however long it took.

The brief, disconcerting conversation he’d had this morning with Irmo Lórien, the choreographer who so interested him, intruded briefly on his thoughts, but he set it aside. There would be time to consider the ramifications of that conversation later. Right now, his audition took precedence, and he let nothing interfere with that.

When he arrived at the ballet studio, he made sure he had his keys and bag, locked the SUV, and found the correct entrance. He notified the woman waiting at the desk of who he was and why he was there, thanked her for her directions to the changing room and correct studio, and made his way to the former. He was already dressed in most of the traditional audition attire – black tights and white top – but he changed his socks and boots for ballet shoes, wrapped his braid around his head, and topped it with his usual white scarf. He had on the usual layers of sweaters and leggings and scarf, but he expected to shed most of those during the first part of the barre warmup. He repacked everything in his bag, put his towel and water bottle on top, and made sure all was well arranged.
This was not neatness for neatness’s sake, or merely to present a professional appearance; as Thran tidied his things, so he also mentally put everything aside but the coming audition.

As he expected, only a few dancers had preceded him into the studio. He chose a spot in the middle of the wall where he had a good view of the rest of the room. He had no need to take a spot in the middle at the portable barre; his height would make him visible wherever he stood. He put down his bag, got out his towel and water bottle and put them to hand, then began his slow preparation. Gentle rolls of ankles and wrists and neck, slow stretches, and gradual elongations were the order of the moment. Thran gave himself to them with unwavering focus, using them as a calming meditation as the room gradually filled. When the dance master and audition panel came in, there were perhaps fifteen other dancers in attendance, all male.

The barre began after only a few short words. Thran stripped off his leggings and all but one of his sweaters; even at the beginning of the barre, the panel wanted to see musculature, movement, control, form. Fortunately, the studio was warm enough that Thran was not overly concerned with being chilled. He concentrated on the movements as they came, without hurry, without anxiety. An audition was a performance, as far as Thran was concerned, and he had never suffered from nerves about performing. In this part of today’s performance, he projected calm, control, refinement, balance, serenity.

The single time the dance master spoke to him, asking for him to repeat a movement and hold it a second longer, he did so as directed, and made the expected response thanking the master. In this case, the comment meant little, only to see if he observed the correct courtesy.

The floor work was what he had expected. This dance master was not the easiest to hear, and occasionally mistook one term for another, but he had known that before he arrived, and so listened hard to divine what she wanted out of the dancers. He emerged from that portion unscathed, though two or three of the other dancers had gotten confused in one section, and he had had to dodge quickly out of the way of one to avoid a collision. The other dancer was red-faced, but Thran was quick to assure him that no harm had been done.

The solo pieces were next. As expected, Thran’s was near the end, so he retired to the sidelines to stretch unobtrusively, keeping his muscles carefully warm and limber for the twenty minutes or so that he would have to wait to do his two-minute piece. He maintained the proper decorum – applauding for each dancer, not lounging, not making a spectacle of himself – until it was his turn to dance.

When the moment arrived, he presented his music on both CD and thumb drive, took his place in the middle of the floor, and relaxed into his breath. He signaled his readiness, and waited for the music to begin.

As the strains of Chopin’s lovely waltz began, he flowed into it easily, letting it rise and fall in his body, infuse his muscles, guide his steps and turns and leaps. Each gesture of his fingers was crisp, and each arch of his neck was balanced. He played a little to the three judges, making eye contact and smiling as if he enjoyed the dance – he did. When the music fell silent, he held the ending pose a second longer, then offered his bow and made his exit.

Was the applause that followed his dance a bit more than that for the other dancers? If so, he was gratified; if not, it was of no consequence.

Only one dancer remained to follow him, so in just a few minutes, the audition was over. There were the usual words of thank you, we appreciate your attendance and attention, we’ll be in touch, and so forth. Thran spoke to the dancers he knew and those he didn’t who spoke to him, then ducked into the changing room to exchange dancer’s belt and tights for more comfortable underthings and soft jeans for the ride home. Another dancer or two spoke to him as they changed, and he made friendly, innocuous conversation as they left the studio. A short, brisk walk brought him back to his SUV, and he got inside for the drive home.

Before Thran pulled into traffic, he turned on the GPS. It was after three, nearing rush hour, so he checked if any backups had already piled up. Yes, there was one on his most direct route to the highway. He preferred to detour through one of the myriad residential neighborhoods, rather than sit and wait along the direct route.

Strategy decided, Thran maneuvered onto the street, cutting away from the main route a block before the backup began. He passed row after row of brownstones, most renovated into palatial oases over the past several years. That reminded him of Steffen, his grotty apartment building, and his illusions of similar grandeur. His old apartment building could have made a similar transformation, if Steffen’s penchant for miserliness hadn’t prevented him from taking the pains such a transformation required. His treatment of Bard still angered him, but he pushed it aside. That was months in the past, and his saint was nearly whole again. Gods, how quick любовь yego was to play now, whether with their children, in the kitchen, or in bed with Thran. Yesterday’s tussle where they clattered through the house, whooping and laughing like boys, ultimately to drive each other into ecstasy on the sitting room sofa, had been a delight. And tonight, at midnight, they would creep downstairs to court in the ballroom like a pair of clandestine Victorian lovers amid candles and wine, then tempt each other to passion savored between soft fur and twinkling starlight –

What was that sitting out on the sidewalk not three houses ahead?

The narrow, wobbly, paint-scarred table was nothing to speak of alone, if nicely shaped, but was that a marble top propped up on the steps behind? And a small carved stool beside it? The carving looked like horses...

Thran had heard tales of how city people put their unwanted furniture on the sidewalk for the refuse companies to haul away. Supposedly, it happened often enough to be a cliché, but Thran had never seen it in action. He double parked beside the table, jammed on the brakes, and flipped on his hazard flashers. By the time a broad-shouldered young man reappeared with bits of a broken étagère and a slender younger woman with another small stool, Thran was beside the table. The pair was likely brother and sister, for both had similar features and the same wavy brown hair that drifted wildly in the gusty breeze.

“Do you get rid of this?” he asked, he hoped in typical New Yorker directness.

The young man glowered. “Oh, yeah. My uncle tried to move it yesterday, and all hell broke loose. The leg fell out, the top fell off, and bam! Busted his foot just like that,” the young man snapped his fingers. “Rohan, he was pissed! First thing he says when he gets home from the hospital is dump the table. So see ya, busted table. You want it, it’s yours.”

“He’s taking the table, Eo?” the young woman called.

“Yeah, Wyn, he’s taking the table.”

“Good! Take it quick, before Uncle Theo changes his mind! Do you want these stools, too?” Wyn called, pointing to the stool she held.

“Whatever you have, I will take,” he nodded, already opening the back seat of the SUV and flipping the seats down. “Would you grab the other end of the top?”

“Sure thing, pal.” Eo grabbed the other end of the marble, and they laid it in the back of the SUV.
The table went in on top – yes, the leg fell off as soon as they picked it up, but Bard could surely fix that. Wyn passed him the two stools, both of them with the charming carved horses, as if they’d originally come from some rustic Old World cottage, and he put them in after the table. The étagère didn’t appeal to Thran, but he tossed the bits in the back all the same. Tilda might like to repaint it and put toys on it. He hopped back into the SUV with a wave and a shout of thanks, blithely ignored the beeping horns behind him, and drove off.

Even if Bard couldn’t fix the table, the marble top – an unusual black veined in green and white – looked whole except for one back corner that had chipped off, maybe when it had inflicted the broken foot on Uncle Theo. Maybe for the solarium?

His stop didn’t delay him long, so he managed to avoid most of the rest of the traffic waiting to get on the highway. In a few minutes, the slowdown faded, and the rest of the trip home was at speed, so fast that he had little time to think about Irmo Lórien.

He skipped into the mudroom, scrubbing the soles of his boots on the mat before he hurried inside. “Bard? I am back! Can you come down? I have a surprise!”

“Be right down, Thran! Two minutes!”

“All right!” Thran came into the kitchen and got himself a glass of water while he waited for Bard. In perhaps three minutes, Bard clattered down the stairs, wiping his hands on a rag as he came into the kitchen.

“Welcome back, angel,” Bard smiled, giving him a quick kiss. “How was your audition? What’s the surprise?”

“Audition later; surprise first. It is in the SUV. I hope it is a good one. Get your coat and help me carry it all inside!”

Smiling, Bard followed closely as Thran hurried through the mudroom and outside. “It must be a good one, as excited as you are.”

“You tell me,” Thran replied, opening the back of the SUV and waving proudly at the contents. “A marble-topped table, a pair of interesting stools, and an étagère. The latter is not much, but they were nice to give me the rest, so I thought we could burn it if we did not want it for anything else.”

Thran explained how he’d come across the brother and sister discarding the bits of étagère, stools, and broken table. When Bard got a good look at the marble top, he rubbed it with approval.

“This is beautiful, Thran! The two stools are cute for the children –”

“Yes! I thought they could go in the bathrooms upstairs?”

“I thought the same thing. And the étagère might suit –”

“Tilda,” they both said at the same time, drawing laughter.

“Yes, exactly so, our Tilda for her toys perhaps. And I liked the marble. Solarium? Under the windows, to hold plants that like the sun?”

“Just the tick,” Bard nodded. “The table probably just needs regluing, which won’t be hard to do.”

“I had hoped not. So my surprise is a good one, after all.”
“A most excellent one! You made quite a score.”

“My luck has run quite high ever since the week before Thanksgiving.”

“Gods, that’s so true for both of us,” Bard replied with conviction. “So, upstairs with the stools?”

“Yes. I thought the most battered one we could paint in the same blue as the children’s bathroom, as it is just wood, and the other one would look nice in silver for our bathroom.”

“The blue paint will work well. It’s a high gloss, so it’d protect the wood against moisture. I still have some of the pearlescent paint from our bathroom, also high gloss, so maybe that as the bottom coat of the other one, then some silver rubbed into the carving to bring it out? That’d match how I want to refinish our bed.”

“Perfect,” Thran agreed, as they came downstairs for the next load. They piled the pieces of the étagère next to the bed frame in the main room, then they brought the table and its top. Once Bard had a better look at the table, he discovered that the leg that had come out was nearly cracked through.

“That’s not hard to fix,” was Bard’s opinion. “A little glue, a couple of clamps, and it’ll be fine. Then we can refinish the whole thing, reglue all the legs, and it’ll look great. I expect to refinish the fainting couch, so we can make them match.”

“In your book of Islamic tessellations, there are some beautiful carved wooden screens,” Thran said. “Perhaps we can find something like them in a shop, and we will be well on our way to making our own mystical pavilion.”

“A salvage shop might have something like that,” Bard replied. “That would look great.”

“A salvage shop? What is that?”

“It’s a place that sells bits and bobs of architecture – doors, windows, wooden screens like the ones you want, finials, all sorts of things. A lot of times, stuff from demolition sites ends up in the salvage shops so they can go into other houses. They’re fun places to visit. That’s where the pocket doors and the end panels outside our bedroom came from. They were for a big parlor or sitting room or something. Daphne and I got one of the local carpenters to put it in for us. Daphne did a mural for him in exchange, so we both got a deal. I love the stained glass.”

“They are beautiful,” Thran agreed. “So let us go to such a place to look for wooden screens for the solarium.”

“Of course, when we get there. Bedrooms first.”

“Of course,” Thran agreed. “And the Majorelle blue must be part of our solarium, too.”

“Absolutely.” Bard straightened from his study of the broken leg. “While we’re here, let’s move your white rug out and put it in the ballroom.”

Thran hummed in anticipation. “Oh, do you reconsider when we will christen the ballroom? Now, perhaps?”

Laughing, Bard stooped by one end of the rug, indicating for Thran to kneel next to him so they could roll up the rug. “Furl your wings, greedy angel. Moving this isn’t something I want to do at midnight, as it’s heavy. Tell me how your audition went.”
“Exactly as I expected,” Thran shrugged, picking up his end of the rolled-up rug. “Suka blyad, you are right. This is a very heavy rug.”

“No shit. You're ready on your end?”

“Ready.”

They hauled the rug into the ballroom and let it down with a thunk by the windows. Then they moved the garden furniture further out into the ballroom so they could unroll the rug under the windows.

“Very nice,” purred Thran, arching his eyebrows at Bard.

“It is,” Bard grinned back. “Save it for tonight, okay?”

“As you wish. I will distract myself to tell you of my audition, and you will show me Bain’s room.”

“Righto. Come on.”

They headed upstairs, Bard listening and nodding as Thran described his afternoon.

“So what do you think your chances are, even if you don’t want this one?”

“Reasonably good, assuming I am the type of dancer they want. Not everyone wants one so tall, so pale, so whatever. More importantly to me, it was good practice for the next three. I am well settled, in good form, so I am very pleased. And I found us some nice castoffs.”

“Indeed you did,” Bard affirmed.

“And you are through the painting!” Thran admired the clean blue walls and bright woodwork to go with Bain’s mural of planets that went around the room just under the crown molding. “It is restored!”

“Almost done,” Bard nodded. “I’d just cleaned up the painting things before you came home, so I’m going to mix up supper, then see if I can get through the floor tonight. Even if Bain doesn’t move his stuff tonight, I can tomorrow, and get on with Tilda’s.”

“What delight do you prepare for us tonight, svyatoy moy?”

“Beef stroganoff over noodles, and our usual collection of steamed veg. I can marinate chicken breast for you if you don’t want the beef.”

“There is sour cream in the beef, yes?”

“There is,” Bard nodded, opening the refrigerator. “Two cups in the whole potful, so not a lot in one serving.”

“I love stroganoff,” Thran said wistfully. “Perhaps one serving will not kill me.”

“I can make farro or brown rice instead of the noodles for you, so you get a whole grain rather than a simple carb.”

“I would like that,” Thran nodded in gratitude, taking the things Bard handed him from the refrigerator and putting them on the kitchen island. “The farro is very good.”

“Farro it is. Are you headed to the barre, or are you done for the day?”
Thran considered, finally smiling when Bard closed the refrigerator door and gave him an inquiring look. “That depends on what happens at the witching hour, as a certain welder calls it. Until then, I will help you in the kitchen, and then I will help you with the floor. The children will be here in an hour, and perhaps they can help us finish before supper.”

“We’ll see how much homework they have, but if they chip in, we’ll be done soon.”

“To the pots, then!” Thran exhorted, as Bard dug out their biggest pot – Bard called it a Dutch oven – and set it on the stove. Bard cut up onions as Thran browned small pieces of beef in olive oil, then they added the onions and different spices, and set the resulting mixture to simmer until supper. All they would have to do to ready the mixture would be to stir in the sour cream. Then they headed upstairs to work on the floor. As they donned surgical gloves and soaked steel wool in mineral spirits, Thran looked over at Bard.

“I do have one other thing to report about today.”

Bard looked up from the floor. “What’s that?”

“I talked to the choreographer this morning. Irmo Lórien.”

Bard sat up. “You did? How’d that go?”

“He will come here tomorrow. Ten a.m.”

“You sound like... you’re not sure how you feel about it.”

Perhaps I am not. He was very brusque.”

Bard’s hum was apprehensive. “But he agreed to come out here.”

“Very quickly. I hardly had to say three sentences. So I do not know what to think of it.”

Bard returned to his careful scrubbing. “Hmm. Quick agreement, but short. I don’t know what to think of it, either. Is he coming just to talk, or to try a quick collaboration?”

“I do not know. Once I spoke those three sentences – Hello, this is Thran Oropherson, I am very interested in your work, do you have time to discuss a possible collaboration – he cut me off to ask where we could meet. I suggested here, he agreed, again, quickly and shortly. I gave him our address, and he hung up.”

Bard thought about that in silence for some moments as he scrubbed. “I guess... I’d hope that because he agreed so fast means he’s interested in whatever you have to say.”

“I hope so. I did not think about it much this morning, as I concentrated on my audition, and on the way home I was excited about my treasures. So now is the first deep consideration I give it. I will hope as you do, that his brevity signaled his interest.”

“Anything you want me to do for you tomorrow morning? Make tea and crumpets? Stay upstairs and play the hired contractor? Hang around and glower like your bodyguard?”

Thran snickered as he rubbed his steel wool over a particularly sticky piece of stained, built-up floor wax. “If I need any of those things, I will signal you. You are kind to offer.”

Their conversation turned to inconsequential things as they worked on the floor. By the time the children came home, they were halfway through the first step. Sigrid was excused to study for a big trigonometry test tomorrow, but the other three children pulled on gloves and helped to finish the cleaning. The paste wax went on much faster, and they finished not much later than their usual time to begin supper preparation. Bain and Legolas were excused from supper prep to move Bain’s things from the children’s study back into his room. Thran was gratified when Bain threw arms around his father.

“It looks great, Da. I know how hard you worked to get it all done. Just... thanks.”

Bard wrapped arms around Bain with a tender smile. “Glad to do it, boyo. Hope you enjoy it.”

“I will. Legs and I’ll get everything moved, and I’ll get right to my homework as soon as supper’s over.”

“I appreciate that, Bain. Thran and I’ll start supper now. We’ll call you when it’s ready.”

“Okay, Da. Thanks.”

“You’re welcome. Legolas, thanks for helping with the floor, and for helping Bain move his stuff.”

“Welcome, Bard. Bain’s room looks great.”

“Thanks. See you two in a bit.”

As Thran, Bard, and Tilda went downstairs to the kitchen, Bard ruffled Tilda’s hair. “Thank you for helping with the floor, too, little doll. It helped me get Bain’s room finished, so tomorrow I can start on yours.”

“Goodie!” Tilda clapped her hands in enthusiasm. “Today is Tuesday, so maybe by Friday mine will be done, too?”

“That’s my plan,” Bard nodded. “Saturday we’ll go to the bookstore for you to pick out your three books. You’ve been very patient.”

“I can’t wait,” Tilda smiled. “I love going to the bookstore. Maybe we can go to the cheese shop, too, Thran?”

“I want to go to the craft store, too,” Bard said. “I filled the last of my sketchbooks, so I need some new ones.”

“Legolas and I plan to go to the Gondors’ fencing session, too. Also, I am sure there must be something we need at the homeowners’ mecca,” Thran added as Bard put on the farro to cook, then a large pot of water to boil for the children’s noodles. Thran set the steamer pot on another burner, found the steamer rack, and decided what vegetables he’d steam for the meal. “We have rounds to make, then.”

“No doubt,” Bard said wryly. “Since we finished Bain’s floor, maybe while the children work on their homework tonight, I’ll paint the chalk paint on the pantry door. It’ll take a couple of coats, but since it’s only that big central panel, it won’t take long. Til, you can put out the flatware and glasses to get us ready for supper.”

“Yes, Da. I’m excited that you’ll start on my room tomorrow. It’ll all be yellow!”

“A sunny color for my sunny little doll,” Bard grinned. “Nice and bright.”

Tilda, Bard, and Thran worked together to get supper ready. Tilda brought Bard the packages of egg noodles to dump into the boiling water, and Thran piled the vegetables in the steamer. In a few minutes, Bard stirred the sour cream into the stroganoff while Thran and Tilda washed grapes for the fruit bowl. The older children came down in response to Bard’s call to supper, and everyone soon set to.

Conversation was brisk as everyone talked about the day’s events. The children asked Thran about his audition. Legolas and Thran talked about their plan to attend the Gondors’ fencing class on Saturday morning. Tilda was excited about going to the bookstore. Bain talked about soccer. Sigrid was preoccupied about her trigonometry test tomorrow, but she did rouse long enough to mention that today’s mail had included a course catalog from the local rec council.

“I looked through it, Da, and they’re offering an upholstery class. I can get school credit for it if I take it, and maybe I can learn how to redo those chairs we got at the second-hand shop for the study. If you took it, too, you could do the fainting couch.”

“They all need refinishing first, but the class sounds like a good idea,” Bard nodded. “How long is the class?”

“Just six weeks, one night a week. I’m willing to clean up the chairs. They’re not in too bad a shape.”

“It wouldn’t take long to strip one or two,” Bard mused. “The wood’s a nice fruitwood that would look good just stripped and oiled. If you can do that, that’d be a great project. When does the class start?”

“The next one’s not until the beginning of March, so I have time. If I figure out the stripping stuff well enough, maybe I can help you with the fainting couch.”

“We’ll put it on the list,” Bard agreed. “That’d be fun to do together. Oh, one thing, all. That white rug in the main room has taken a beating from all the running back and forth, so it’s now in the ballroom until I get our bedroom redone. So please stay off it. It’s not meant to withstand the epic battles of Clan Ffyrig.”

“But it feels like a big, fuzzy bear,” Tilda protested. “I like to read on it.”

“It doesn’t like all the dirt,” Bard replied. “So we’ll take it easy on it from now on.”

“Yes, Da, yes, Bard,” the children agreed, albeit with varying degrees of acceptance.

“Okay, all. We’re a bit later tonight, so let’s clean up and get to the homework. Thran and I’ll clean up the dishes once we get the table cleared off, so you all bring in your plates, then get your books.”

Cleanup and homework commenced. While the children worked, Bard and Thran tidied the kitchen, then taped off the part of the pantry door they would paint with the chalk paint. The first coat went on quickly, and they added chalk to their running list of things to purchase so that they’d have the means to use their new list once the paint cured.

“Can we have colored chalk?” Tilda called from the kitchen table.

“We can look for it when we go to the craft store for my sketch pads,” Bard called back. “Why use white when we can have colors?”

“Just don’t get pink,” Bain muttered, drawing Legolas’s snicker. “Why don’t they make bright red chalk?”
“They do,” Bard answered, giving Thran a wry look as he smoothed on the second coat of paint. “It’s called artist’s chalk and it goes on paper, not lists for the market. Too expensive.”

“Blue, at least?” Bain asked.

“We’ll see what’s for sale. How’s the homework coming?”

“Two more problems for me,” Legolas said.

“I have to finish coloring my map,” Tilda replied.

“All done but studying for the test,” Sigrid said. “I’m for the shower, then I’ll review my notes some more.”

“The last part of my essay, that’s it,” was Bain’s answer.

“That is good,” Thran nodded, capping the paint. “Try to finish soon, so you are ready to shower once Sigrid is finished.”

“I’m done,” Legolas said, scribbling the last answer in his math workbook. “Archery tomorrow, Father. Fencing Thursday.”

“I know you look forward to both, synok,” Thran smiled as Legolas gathered his school things to put back in his backpack. “Ah, put your lunch bag on the island, please.”

“Yes, Father,” Legolas said. “It’s still strange to have a lunch bag. And so much better to have our lunches than the ones they served in my boarding school. Does anyone really eat creamed spinach?”

Bain, Tilda, and Bard all made disgusted noises. “Nasty,” Bain gulped, shaking his head. “Really, really nasty. Okay, my essay’s done. My lunch bag’s already on the island next to Sig’s, Da.”

“Thanks. Til, how’s your map coming?”

“Just the last part to color.”

Legolas zipped his backpack closed. “Bain and I are packed. May we play a game while we wait for the shower?”

“As long as one of you gets into the shower as soon as Sigrid is done,” Thran cautioned.

“Okay, we will,” Legolas assured his father, then he and Bain raced upstairs. In a few minutes, Tilda was satisfied with her map, so put the colored pencils back in the communal bin, and packed her papers and books away. Soon she, too, headed upstairs to get ready for bed. Thran and Bard followed, Thran to check that Legolas had gotten into the shower as he’d promised, and Bard to see if Bain needed any further help to arrange his room. All was well in hand, so Thran had another go at the zombie apocalypse game with Bain. He improved over his first effort; Bain managed to kill his avatar only once before Legolas returned from the shower. Tilda and Bain followed in short order, and soon the three younger children were settled in bed. Sigrid pleaded for a few more minutes so she could talk to Finn, but in an hour she, too, turned out the light, leaving Bard and Thran to themselves just after eleven o’clock.

“I’ll get in the shower, then I have a few things to do downstairs,” Bard said as he took off his flannel.

“I will follow you when you’re done. Do you want me to dress a certain way?”
Bard stopped, considering, then wandered into their closet to contemplate Thran’s racks of clothes. “May I?”

Following him in, Thran waved a hand. “Of course.”

Bard sorted through the racks slowly, arching an eyebrow when he got to the low-slung, black leather pants that laced up the back as well as the front, and the black satin jacket that went with them. Thran shrugged and offered a sly smile. “A costume party. Vileria and I went as rock stars. The heavy boots and small, round, black glasses were fun. So much jangling jewelry, not so much.”

“I’ll bet you didn’t wear anything under the jacket, either.”

“Of course not.”

“And you had half the party chasing you all night. Both sexes, and everything in between and beyond.”

“I was not the only one so pursued,” Thran grinned.

“Oh, the other half chased Vileria, yes?”

Thran shrugged, conceding the accuracy of Bard’s guess. “She did not wear anything under her jacket, either. I admit she outdid me in that regard.”

Bard snickered appreciatively. “I would’ve had you in the nearest coat closet.”

“I would have let you. I’ll let you tonight, if you like.”

“Hmm. Tempting, but not tonight. Tonight I’ve got a date with an angel, not a rock star.”

Bard kept sorting until he got to something at the back of the rack. He held it up on its hanger, a long kimono in pale sage green cotton, figured with white cranes around the bottom edge. He looked an inquiry at Thran.

“I bought it when I performed in Japan. It is a humble thing made for tourists, not nearly so fancy as the best of such things, but I think it is very beautiful.”

“Is it okay for you to wear it? It’s not artwork, or too fragile to wear, or...?”

“It is just a cotton kimono, a beautiful thing to wear. Not fragile, not artwork. I like it very much.”

“It is beautiful. Something an angel would wear. Would you be warm enough in it?”

“I will bring a blanket from our bed, in case I get cold.”

“I left the heat up, but I’ll take one down in case we want it. You come down when you’re through your shower, and I’ll have everything ready.”

Thran nodded. “Thank you. So, into the shower with you, and I will follow.”

Bard hung up the kimono, and ran a hand over Thran’s arm as he headed into the bathroom. Once the shower began to run, Thran made himself comfortable on the bed with Bard’s Islamic tessellation book. When Bard came out, clean and dry, Thran ducked into the bathroom without looking at his husband much, not wanting the sight of that muscled, naked body to arouse him too soon. He shaved, stripped off, washed, and dried, then carried his clothes into the closet to toss them in the hamper. He shrugged into the cotton kimono and warm socks, shivering a little until the cool fabric warmed against his body, then ventured out of the bedroom. He drew the pocket doors closed behind him softly, and listened for a moment – good, none of the children stirred – before he padded downstairs.

As he threaded his way between the boxes and bits of furniture to either side of the main room, the open door at the far end was open, and a faint, flickering light beckoned him forward. Thran wrapped his kimono tighter around him, and ventured into the ballroom.

The source of the flickering light was a silver hurricane candlestick placed on the garden table, its etched crystal glass shielding a white taper. Beside the candle was a silver tray holding a bottle of wine, two glasses, and a small plate of chocolates. Bard stood in front of the window, his hands thrust in the front pockets of his jeans, looking up at the sky. His Henley was untucked, and his sleeves were pushed up towards his elbows. Socks kept his feet warm, and his hair was loose over his shoulders. He turned when he heard Thran come in, his lips curving up into a warm smile.

“The angel appears.”

“How could I resist a saint’s promise of wine and chocolate gilded in candlelight? I know of nothing so bewitching.”

Bard came to him, took his left hand to kiss his wedding ring, then drew him into the room. “I do.”

As Bard led him to the window, Thran reached out to stroke Bard’s tousled hair. “What is that?”

Bard pointed up to the sky visible through the windows. “You under the starlight. You look more like an angel than ever. Do you know how wonderful it is to be here with you?”

“I know how much I love to be here with you. There is no part of my life that I have loved more.”

“It’s all such a fairytale. Poor welder meets angel, magic ensues.”

“Oh, lyubov moya, that is not the whole story. You do not start it soon enough.”

“I don’t?”

Thran shook his head. “Pour us a little wine, and I will tell it to you.”

Bard poured both glasses one quarter full, handed one to Thran, and they settled side by side on the furry rug by the windows. Even though the ballroom was warm enough, Bard had one of the soft blankets from their bed to hand, and he unfurled it around Thran’s shoulders, offering more welcome warmth. As he settled beside Thran, he put the plate of chocolates before them and nestled close under the blanket. They shared a sip, and Bard took one of the chocolates.

“They’re all orange or coconut or coffee crèmes. The boys ate everything else.”

Thran chose a coconut crème. “I am surprised that Legolas left a single coconut crème in the box. He has an unerring radar to ferret out any within a half kilometer radius.”

Bard snickered. “That’s Bain and the caramels. I like the orange crèmes. So tell me a story, angel.”

“Once there were two men who lived far, far apart from each other. One danced so well that he became an angel who attracted the patronage of a great emperor, and so went to school to dance for the glory of the state. The other was so kind and good and caring that he became a saint, and he made his way in the world to become a gifted sculptor.
“But tragedy struck both the angel and the saint, and they were left only with their children to treasure and care for. Both sacrificed and labored to do so, and while their children were well cared for, they were not. The angel was able to dance, but was away from his son. The saint was with his children, but away from his art, so neither was whole. What was more, both were alone and bereft.

“So alone and bereft were they that the very elements themselves took pity on them, and conspired like celestial matchmakers to bring the two together. One day, the rain and the wind and the cold harried the angel so badly that he flew into a rage, and cast about for anyone who could bring warmth and comfort back to him. The first person he met was the poor saint, who worked his magic to warm the angel. But in warming the angel’s body, he also warmed the angel’s heart, and in gratitude, the angel warmed the saint’s heart.

“So they were restored, but that was not the only magic done that rainy night. In the days that followed, both the angel and the saint realized that their hearts had come to beat as one, and with each beat, they were drawn closer together. Both were wise enough to know how foolish it was to resist such magic, and so they embraced it and each other, and were grateful for all the good that the magic brought them. And so they prospered.”

Bard smiled as he leaned his head on Thran’s shoulder. “You’re right. I didn’t tell the whole story.”

“It is hard sometimes to know all the parts of the story when one lives in it.”

Bard set his wineglass back on the table behind them. “No matter what came before, I know everything here is all I could ask of it.”

“I feel no differently.”

“I won’t thank you for saving my life, cariad. I’d lost most of it long before I met you. But I will thank you for giving it back to me. I could never have done this on my own.”

“Nor I, lyubov moya. We had to find each other to be whole, and so we did, and so we are.”

Bard’s smile was tender, but it slid into something more intent as he bent in to kiss Thran’s lips. The slight taste of wine on Bard’s lips, then the stronger taste of chocolate, enhanced the allure of the kiss, and Thran shut his eyes to better savor it. This was the first time that he and Bard had kissed this way, not rushing through it to get to more explicit pleasures, but lingering, letting the soft brush of lips against lips, then lips against skin as Bard caressed his cheek, his jaw, his throat, calm and soothe and entice all at once. They paused to sip the last bit of the wine in their glasses, then set them aside, and then Bard enfolded Thran in his arms to kiss thoroughly. Fingers scrubbed through his hair, then threaded it through it from top to bottom with exquisite care, soothing and calming and caressing. Thran kissed back with equal ardor, his hands full of those tangled curls that always looked as if Bard had just risen from bed. Under the blanket, warm hands slipped between the folds of his kimono, stroking so slowly, so lightly, such a featherweight touch. It was so sweet to succumb to the urges those touches roused in him, to slip out of his cotton wrapping and lie back on soft fur, to let cashmere fall over him, making a cocoon for him and the velveted body that lay beside him, still stroking and kissing. He was so lost in the bliss of those touches that he couldn’t say exactly when Bard shed his Henley and jeans, but that only added the warmth of more skin against his, cradling and comforting. There was no hurry, no rush towards more than the touches –

The body next to his stiffened, stilled, shocking him out of his ease.

“What?”

“Someone’s up.”
Thran swallowed a curse, but Bard was already grabbing for jeans, for Henley, before Thran even sat up. He scrabbled for his kimono, but it was tangled in the blanket that had covered him. Bard pulled him upright, stuffing the blanket, his kimono, his socks, and his wine glass in his hands, then grabbed the second wine glass and blew out the candle.

“I’ll head whoever off in the kitchen. Hide in the hall closet if you have to.”

Thran smothered a titter at the absurdity of racing through his own house naked to hide from a child. Shouldn’t it be the reverse? No matter. He dodged the obstacles in the main room after Bard, then stuttered to a stop in the central hall while Bard flitted straight on, heading through the dining room and on to the kitchen. As he fumbled through the folds of cotton and cashmere to feel along the wall for the closet doorknob, he desperately tried not to drop his wine glass.

Gods. Being a parent should not be such an exercise in absurdity.

* * *

Bard managed to slow down in the dining room so that he came into the kitchen slowly, but his heart was still pounding. He stuck his head around the corner – yes, the fridge door was open, and two bare feet showed below it.

“Bain?”

Plastic clattered as a bin hit the floor, accompanied by a smothered exclamation. Bain’s head appeared around the door. “Da! Gods, you scared me!”

“It’s midnight, Bain. You’re supposed to be in bed.”

“I’m hungry, Da. I can’t sleep when my stomach is growling so much.”

Bard switched on the task light on top of the oven hood to its dimmest section. “Get something, then. No sugar. Have some peanuts, or cheese, or crackers.”

“Can I have a peanut butter sandwich?”

“That’s fine. Then you need to get back to bed.”

“Okay.” Bain got out the jar of peanut butter and the bread, and sleepily made himself a sandwich. “What’re you doing still up?”

“Making the rounds, just like I do every night. Making sure everything’s snug, and ready for tomorrow.”

“What’s that?” Bain nodded at Bard’s glass.

“It was red wine. A sip’s nice when I look at the stars at night.”

“Where’s Thran?”

“Getting ready for his meeting with the choreographer tomorrow. He should be asleep by now.”

“What’s a choreographer?” Bain asked, munching his sandwich.
Bard leaned his elbows on the kitchen island beside his son. “A person who creates the steps the dancers do in a ballet. This one’s a very good one, and Thran is quite interested in working with him. The maestro will be here tomorrow at ten, so keep your fingers crossed that he and Thran hit it off.”

“Okay.” Bain stuffed in the last bite of his sandwich, then leaned against Bard. “Um, Da? Thanks again for fixing up my room. It’s great. I really like it.”

Smiling, Bard put an arm around Bain’s shoulders and held him close. “I’m glad it turned out so well. Thanks for helping with the floor.”

“Wellcome.”

“So, stomach not growling any more?”

“It’s good.”

“Okay. Brush your teeth before you get back into bed. I’ll clean up down here. Morning’s just six hours away.”

“Ugh,” Bain grimaced, but squeezed Bard once before he eased away. “See you then, Da.”

“Sleep well, boyo.”

Bain padded back upstairs. Bard stayed where he was, putting away the bread and peanut butter, washing the knife and returning it to the cutlery drawer, then wiping up the crumbs. He came out into the central hall to listen for Bain to finish in the bathroom, then pad back to his room. When the door shut, he exhaled.

Gods. Being a parent should not be such an exercise in absurdity.

* * *

Thran bit down on the cuff of his sock, trying to keep his teeth from chattering as he cowered in the coat closet. He was freezing, but the murmur of voices was too close by for him to risk wrapping the blanket or his kimono around himself. What if he knocked one of the hangers onto the floor? What if he dropped his wineglass? If he thought it was uncomfortable to shiver in the closet naked with an armload of blanket and an empty wineglass, how much worse would it be if one of the children opened the door and found him in the closet naked with an armload of blanket and an empty wineglass? He clamped teeth down on the sock and waited. Gods, how long did it take for Bard to send whichever child back to bed?

He stilled when the voices drew closer, then footsteps padded through the hall and upstairs. Silence fell.

Heavier, slower footsteps ventured into the hall. That must be Bard, but Thran didn’t move, other than to pull the sock out of his mouth when the knob turned. Bard peeked in, drawing a relieved exhale from Thran.

“Which one was it?” Thran whispered.

“Bain. Too hungry to sleep. He had a peanut butter sandwich and should be good for the rest of the night."

"Thank the gods. Let me out. I am frozen!"

"I’m sorry, angel. Looks like we had a dangerous liaison after all."

Thran grinned as he wrapped the blanket tightly around his shoulders and pulled Bard back towards the ballroom. "We have had the danger, yes, and may that be the end of it. Now let us have the liaison."

Bard came willingly, relighting the single candle before he drew Thran down, returning them to their nest of white fur beneath them and grey cashmere above, to slowly warm each other. This time, Thran got to ease Bard out of his shirt, savoring the shadowed torso of his husband in the candlelight. As Bard eased his jeans off, the slow unveiling coaxed a near silent hum of anticipation from Thran.

"My beautiful saint," he breathed, stroking the hair on Bard’s chest. "So beautiful."

Bard leaned in for another kiss. "That first morning, when you were at the barre, you didn’t seem human. I still thought of you as a dream, and I hardly believed you’d ever be more than that. So when you held that pose, and you said, ‘How many of these must I do,’ I thought I was hearing things, or seeing things – it couldn’t be that you wanted me."

"I wanted you very badly. You had something in your eyes that captured me, something that was more than just the two of us teasing each other. It was so electric, so deep. It still is. You look at me like that, and I am lost."

Bard nuzzled a kiss on Thran’s temple. "It’s the opposite for me. When you look at me like that, I find everything I ever want."

"Then look at me like that now, and when I lose myself, make love to me so that I find my way back to you, back home."

Bard pressed a kiss on his forehead, then stroked his hair away from his face until it lay around him like a corona. He eased atop Thran, still kissing, still stroking, his touches still light and slow, but this time those touches only teased Thran into wanting more. As lips kissed down his throat and across his clavicle, as a tongue found first one nipple, then the other, to entice and arouse, Thran’s body tensed, yearning for more. The wavy hair that fell in Bard’s eyes teased every time it tickled Thran’s chest, then his abdomen, then his thighs as Bard’s eyes teased every time it tickled Thran’s chest, then his abdomen, then his thighs as Bard’s mouth surrounded his cock with slippery warmth. But he had hardly gasped at that escalation when Bard’s cock eased inside him, slick and hard. He stretched wide under Bard, eager for the pleasure that spasmed through him with each stroke.

"You’re beautiful in starlight, angel," Bard whispered, his breath warm on Thran’s chest as he nuzzled his nipples. "So pale, so ethereal, so perfect. I love you so much."

"So good, so good," Thran whispered, hands clutching on Bard’s thighs each time they flexed. The movements were slow, infinitely slow, as Bard sought to prolong Thran’s rising. Thran gave himself to it, letting Bard have all of him, offering no resistance each time Bard’s cock filled him. When Bard settled into him as deeply as he could go, Thran pulled him forward, so that he could fill his hands with Bard’s taut buttocks. As he massaged and kneaded, those movements sent small spasms of pleasure through him. He brought his knees up and out so that Bard’s arms pressed them flat against the furry rug, and he was stretched open as wide as his body would go. Now when Bard stroked him, each tiny bit in or out was exquisite, hardly bearable. When the intensity rose to more than he could bear, he pulled Bard hard into him.
“Take me now. Oh, gods, Bard, make me yours. I cannot bear it any longer.”

Bard stroked hard and deep, and in three strokes, climax ripped through Thran with a power that left him helpless to resist it. Bard stayed in deep to intensify Thran’s orgasm, but he didn’t follow Thran in release. When he eased out, he was still hard and erect.

“Oh, lyubov moya, I am sorry,” Thran whispered when he could talk again. “I wanted to take you with me. I am sorry I could not.”

“That wasn’t your fault, cariad,” Bard whispered, as he lay beside Thran. “That was me being greedy. I hope I didn’t ruin it for you.”

Thran rolled onto his side, stroking Bard’s chest. “It was divine. But what is this greedy?”

“I wanted to watch you go. I wanted to see you lost in the moment. It was a gift.”

“So much that you did not let yourself go after me?”

“In part, yes.”

“And... what is the other part?”

“The saint wanted to take his angel to heaven. I hope he did.”

“Very much so.”

“But there’s this welder who wants to take a dancer at the barre, to thank the dancer for seducing the welder that first day.”

Thran grinned. He’d just had the most spectacular orgasm, yet already his loins were stirring at the thought of another. “The angel is happy in heaven with his saint. The dancer, however, is very tired of waiting for his welder. When will he appear?”

“The welder’s content to wait until the dancer’s ready. But it won’t take much to tease him along.”

“No?” Thran stretched luxuriously. “Let us see.”

He rolled over, staying on his hands and knees only long enough to brush a kiss on Bard’s lips. As soon as Bard arched up to kiss him back, Thran pulled away, smiling coyly. He stood, padded to the barre, and ran his hands along it, keeping his back to Bard. All he had to do was shake his hair back over his shoulders to brush down his back, then turn slightly towards Bard to look at him from under his lashes, and Bard was behind him. Hands grasped the barre on either side of him, caging him between a muscular body and the barre. Thran pressed his hips back against Bard, rubbing and teasing the cock that was still erect. Hands moved from the barre to Thran’s hips.

“You teased me until I couldn’t see that morning,” Bard whispered, his mouth at Thran’s ear.

Thran rubbed his cheek against Bard’s. “I did. I told you how badly I wanted you. I want you just as badly now. Finish what I started on that Saturday.”

Bard’s cock slid back inside him, drawing his silent gasp. He was still sensitive from his orgasm, but Bard was slow and gentle, wrapping his arms around Thran’s waist and pressing him against the barre to keep them close. To further the stretch, Thran brought his left foot up to the barre, lengthening out until both legs were stretched straight and wide, with Bard deeply within. He leaned over the barre, eyes shut as the wide stretch and the cock within him irresistibly flooded his body.
“Hold me tightly against you,” he pleaded. “So tightly that I will never escape.”

The cock within settled deeper, and the arms around his waist coiled tighter. Arching his back, he stretched arms over his head and back, pulling his back against Bard’s chest to clasp his hands behind Bard’s nape. Now he was truly caught, not just an ethereal dancer in the clutches of a welder, but a butterfly in the grasp of a mantis. When one of the arms shifted around him to take his cock in hand, he bit back a cry.

“Oh, gods, you have all of me!” he pleaded. “I have nothing left!”

“Yes, you do,” the soft voice whispered in his ears. “Come for me. Give me all of you, and I’ll give you all of me.”

“Take me, then. Take us both.”

The slow stroking inside grew faster, deeper, harder. The profound stretch made it impossible for him to resist, leaving him wide open to whatever Bard would do. As the sensation intensified, Thran spasmed hard, unable to hold back a cry. A hand groped for his mouth, stifling him, and that last fillip sent him roaring into release, with every nerve ending aflame. Within him, Bard released, his body bucking hard against him, arms tightening around him hard, keeping him pinned until his lover was through with him.

In seconds, exhaustion flooded Thran. His arms fell nervelessly away from Bard, groping for the barre to take his weight as he sagged over it. Bard slipped out of him but continued to hold him gently, not letting him fall. He managed to get his leg off the barre and his foot back on the floor without straining a muscle, but leaned over the barre as he caught his breath. There was a faint sheen of sweat over his skin, and as his body cooled from its passion, he shivered.

“Are you steady on your feet?” Bard asked. At Thran’s weary nod, Bard moved away, then returned with a towel to pat his back dry, then to wipe the essence from his thighs. His kimono came to rest over his back, and he managed to get his arms in the sleeves before the cashmere blanket went around his shoulders. Bard eased him down on the garden bench.

“Give me a minute to destroy the evidence, and I’ll get you upstairs,” Bard asked, stroking Thran’s hair over his shoulders.

“I will help you,” Thran said, but Bard urged him to stay on the bench.

“I’ve got it, angel. A welder can clean up after himself.”

Bard cleaned up what spills they’d made, then took the wineglasses and their accouterments into the kitchen to clean and put away. In a few minutes, he was back, blowing out the candle and putting it on the mantle at the other end of the room. He drew Thran up, and together they went upstairs to clean up and settle into bed. Thran was thoroughly chilled by then, but he had no complaints as Bard wrapped around to warm him under the covers. His sigh was long and contented.

“It’s almost one,” Bard murmured in his ear. “I’ll wrangle the children tomorrow morning. You stay in bed so you’re rested for your meeting with the choreographer.”

“That is not fair to you,” Thran protested sleepily.

“That is not fair to you,” Thran protested sleepily.

“It won’t kill me, and I want you to be at your best for the choreographer. That’s more important to me than a couple hours of sleep.”
“You lost enough sleep to that grotty Steffen. I will not let you lose any more.”

“This is for a good cause. Besides, if I’m that tired tomorrow afternoon, you’ll just have to put me to bed for a nap.”

Thran grinned despite his sleepiness. “Mmm, I am sorely tempted. I concede this much – I will see how I feel when the alarm goes off in the morning.”

“Okay. Though I’ll take it as a slight of honor if my ministrations don’t send the beautiful hero of the fairytale into a deep sleep for at least eight hours, if not a hundred years.”

A chuckle. “You were quite thorough. Deliciously so.”

“I’m relieved I didn’t snap you in two like a wishbone the second time.”

“That was exquisite. So intense. So extreme.”

“You, in a nutshell.”

“You love to do me that way.”

“I do, and I did. Now go to sleep. I have to get up in five hours.”

“Next time, the witching hour should be on a weekend.”

“Good idea. Now hush.”

“Not yet. I must do something first.” Thran rolled over to face his husband, and drew him close for a long, deep kiss. “That is to thank my husband for being gentle saint, muscular welder, rebellious property, loving husband, and perfect fairytale consort. I love all of them.”

Bard didn’t laugh at Thran’s whimsy. He offered an equally loving kiss in return, and snuggled them together. “They’re all yours, angel. Always.”

They settled quickly. Thran remembered only a pair of breaths before sleep took him.
Chapter 49

Chapter Summary

The cherubs give the saint a hard time, and the angel meets a choreographer.

Bard managed to wake just before the alarm went off at six. He wanted Thran to sleep in this morning so that he’d be well rested when Irmo Lórien arrived at ten. He rolled out of bed stealthily, switched off the alarm, grabbed the clothes he’d put by the bed last night, and let himself out of the bedroom as silently as the pocket doors would let him. He took one look back at Thran to assure himself that his husband stayed buried in the covers and unmoving, then eased the door shut behind him. He ducked into the children’s bathroom to tend to necessities and dress, then padded downstairs.

Gods, what a rendezvous he’d had with an angel last night. He hardly registered putting on the daily porridge and teakettle, setting the crock of raisins and the sugar and cinnamon on the table, then laying out sheets of waxed paper and bread for the children’s sandwiches. He was too preoccupied with recalling each slow caress, each nuanced kiss, each whispered endearment. Thran was so open with his passion, so unashamed of everything they did, so inventive, so careful to make sure that Bard savored everything as much as he did. That rising at the barre... gods, how had Thran put himself into that split, trusting that Bard would hold him safely, both within and without? He’d given every bit of his exquisite body to Bard to devour, but in doing so he’d consumed Bard, plunging them both into the deepest ecstasy. How had he ended up with such a glorious man?

“Morning, Da.”

Bard started out of his reverie. He blinked, found Sigrid smiling slyly at him.

“Um, morning, Sig.”

“Where’s Thran?”

“Sleeping. That choreographer’s coming at ten. I wanted him to be well rested.”

“Oh.” The look his eldest daughter gave him was knowing, full of suppressed laughter. Heat crept into Bard’s cheeks, but he kept his expression neutral as Sigrid held his eyes. “You look a little ragged this morning, Da. And you do know you’re putting mustard on Legolas’s peanut butter sandwich, right?”

Bard jerked his gaze down at the kitchen island, and found that Sigrid hadn’t exaggerated. The slice of bread that would top Legolas’s sandwich was slathered with bright yellow mustard. “Oh. Shit.”

“Here.” Sigrid swapped the mustardy bread for a plain one further down the line. “Now the mustard will go with my chicken, cheese, and lettuce, and the plain one’s ready for Legolas’s blackberry jelly.”

Bard grumbled at his lapse, drawing a snicker from his daughter, quickly smothered. “Maybe you ought to go to bed earlier. Or maybe you did, and –”

Bard cleared his throat in warning. “I know you’d really like to see Finn the next time he visits Killian, so it’d be a shame if you were grounded that weekend.”

Sigrid made a pout. “That’s no way to treat your excellent co-conspirator.”

“My excellent co-conspirator needs to eat her breakfast and let me get on with making lunches.”

“Have it your way.” Sigrid gave him a reproachful look as she came around the island to scoop up a bowl of porridge. She sat at the table, added raisins and cinnamon, and started to eat. “I’m just glad to see you happy, you know. You are, aren’t you?”

Bard gave his irrepressible daughter a look, but she looked back without apology. When that same sly smile tugged at her lips, he couldn’t keep a chagrined one off his face. He gave into it, and offered a bit of a nod as he slathered blackberry jelly on Legolas’s sandwich.

“Good. You’re allowed. Das are people, too.”

Bard snorted as he finished Legolas’s sandwich and moved on to Bain’s. “Thank you... I think.”

“They are. Even when they look ragged out.”

Sigrid was openly snickering now, which drew a half-hearted glare from Bard. As footsteps clattered on the stairs, signaling the arrival of the boys, he muttered, “Cut it out, Sig.”

“Yes, Da,” she offered, schooling her face into something less teasing.

“Morning, lads,” he offered Legolas and Bain as they came into the kitchen. “Porridge is hot. Either of you want tea?”

“I do,” Bain replied, dishing up his porridge. “Can I have the oolong?”

“Juice for me,” Legolas said, sticking his head in the fridge. “I’ll get it.”

“Thanks, Legolas. Water’s already hot, Bain.”

“I’ve got it, Da.”

“Okay. What time is your track meet today, Sigrid?”

“You remembered!” Sigrid said, gratified. “Three-thirty. In the gymnasium. So you’ll come?”

“That’s my plan. Morning, Tilda. Porridge for you?”

“Yes, please. May I have apple instead of raisins? Where’s Thran?”

“I’ll cut one up for you. Just half?”

“Yes, please.”

“I’ll eat the other half,” Legolas offered. His brow wrinkled. “Is Father all right?”

“He’s fine, Legs. That choreographer’s coming this morning, so I told him to sleep in a little longer to make sure he’s at his best in case he ends up dancing for him. Keep your fingers crossed for him, everyone. Here’s your apple, Tilda. Legs, do you want the rest sliced?”

“The half is fine, thank you. Oh, you cored it – thanks!”

“My pleasure.” Bard got ice packs out of the freezer, put them in the lunch bags, then put the sandwiches atop them. Pears and clementines went in after, then the packets of cookies. “Okay, lunches are ready.”

“Make sure you eat, too, Da,” Sigrid prodded him as she brought her empty bowl to the sink to rinse. “Here, I’ll dish it up for you.”

“Gods, Sig, that’s enough for three,” he said when she handed him the bowl.

“You work hard enough for three, so eat it,” she fussed.

“Yeah, Da,” Tilda echoed from the table.

Bard sat next to her, wiggling his eyebrows at her. “I seem to have acquired two yentas this morning.”

“What’s a yenta?” Bain asked, shoving the raisin crock towards Bard. “Are you okay, Da? You look a little ragged.”

“Make that three,” Bard shook his head in resignation as he mixed raisins into his porridge.

“I hope you aren’t catching a cold,” Legolas frowned over his porridge. “You work very hard, Bard. It’s easy to catch a cold when you work so hard.”

Sigrid laughed at Bard’s exasperated look. “Dead to rights, Da, four times over.”

“I’m fine. And I appreciate you all looking out for me. But the only thing you need to worry about right now is getting ready in time to make the school bus. So chop, chop, everyone.”

Bain headed upstairs with his sister. “I still don’t know what a yenta is,” he murmured.

“It’s a nice way of calling someone a nag,” Sigrid returned, drawing Bard’s grin. He dug into his porridge still smiling.

He just had time to shovel down Sigrid’s mountain of porridge before the children were ready to leave for the bus. To his surprise, a spritely Thran trailed behind them, dressed in jeans and Henley.

“Of course I am up,” he shrugged, after kissing Bard good morning. “I want to see the children off, and wish them to do their best, just like always.”

“You just made it, then,” Bard handed Thran his coat. “You’ve all got your lunches? Bain, zip your backpack before your lunch falls out.”

Clan Ffyrnig pulled on boots, shoes, and coats, then trooped out of the mudroom. Rosie and her four children were already at the bus stop, so Bard brought up the questions he had about who to contact in the village about the local chamber of commerce. It was no surprise that Rosie and Sam were on the board, so Thran and Bard made plans to talk to her once Thran knew more about what company he would be with, and whether he wanted to supplement that effort with master classes. Rosie was enthusiastic about the possibilities, and promised to check back with them in another week or so.

“That’d be great, Rosie,” Bard nodded with a big smile. “We want to have you over soon, too. I’ve got a few more rooms to go, but it won’t be long.”

“You know us, Bard. Informal to the max,” Rosie grinned. “A pot of soup, a loaf of bread, and we’re happy.”

“Well... maybe next week, then?” Bard asked, looking at Thran, who nodded at once. “Friday, Saturday, or Sunday?”

“I’ll talk to Sam, and we’ll get back to you. We’ll talk food when I do. We’ll make a feast!”

“You know Clan Ffyrnig well,” Thran laughed. “It will be a festive time.”

“Oh course!” Rosie agreed, grinning. “Okay, you lot! The bus is here!”

“We’re off, and we’re leaving, too!” Sigrid, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda shouted, hurrying to queue up with the other children.

“Do your best, just like always!” Bard and Thran chorused in return, waving.

“I’ll see you at three-thirty, Sig!” Bard added.

The children waved back as the bus pulled away, and Bard and Thran waved to the other parents before they headed home.

“What is at three-thirty, lyubov moya?” Thran asked as they walked.

“Sigrid’s track meet. If you come along, you could watch Legolas’s archery.”

“I had forgotten about the track meet. Yes, I would like to go, too, to see both Sigrid and Legolas. We need more than the chalkboard list, yes? A place to put all the schedules.”

“Maybe a cork board where we can pin things. There’s room on the end of that line of upper cabinets. I’ll paint it white to match the cabinet, so it’ll fit right in.”

“The perfect idea. So let us put it on the list for the homeowners’ mecca.” Thran opened the door to let them in, and they shed coats and boots in the mudroom. When he glanced at Bard, his smile was small, but wicked. “You look like you spent last night doing exactly what we did last night.”

When Bard exhaled it was partly in resignation, partly in exasperation. “You’re the fifth person to tell me so this morning.”

Thran laughed as they came into the kitchen. “Am I?”

“Eh, the second in so many words. The other three just said I looked ragged, needed to eat more, and not work so hard.”

“Oh, my poor saint,” Thran snickered, enjoying Bard’s exasperation all too much. “Let me guess – our Sigrid knew exactly, Bain said you needed to eat more, Tilda said you looked ragged, and Legolas said you should not work so hard.”

“Half right. Bain said I looked ragged, and Tilda said I needed to eat more.” Bard turned on the burner under the teakettle. “Are you going back to bed, or do you want breakfast?”

“Since you will not get your nap this afternoon, I should take you back to bed with me,” Thran mused as Bard set the porridge pot back on the stove to warm. “But that would lead to more exertion of the sort that we enjoyed last night rather than sleep, so perhaps that is not the best idea. I should do a short barre this morning in preparation for Irmo Lórien, at any rate. Then you can go back to bed for another hour, yes?”

“I’m up now, and I might as well stay up. I’ll get started on Tilda’s room before the mysterious Mr. Lórien appears.” Bard stirred the porridge, got a bowl out of the cupboard, and filled it for Thran. As he handed his husband the bowl, Bard snorted. “You look like you spent the night innocently asleep, and you were the one who got off twice to my once. And gods, how you got off, you fucker. There’s no justice.”

Thran took his bowl to the table with a smug grin. “I keep a portrait in the closet, well hidden.”

“Ha, ha, Dorian Gray.” Bard filled two teacups and brought them to the table.

“Perhaps we should let a day or two go pass before we indulge in such... energetic delight next.”

“We may have to, anyway. You’ve got the choreographer, then two auditions, then fencing, then another audition. You’re liable to be the one looking ragged in a day or two.”

Thran hummed as he ate his porridge, conceding the possibility, but gave Bard a regretful look. “We have been married less than a week, lyubov moya, and have not allowed ourselves a honeymoon. And now even more things intrude so that we cannot fuck ourselves blind. I have always wanted to do that at least once in my life.”

Bard guffawed. “Listen to you!”

“If I do, then I will tell myself to skip my barre, drag my husband back to bed, fuck him thoroughly, and then meet this choreographer as the dissipated primo danseur he might think I am.” As Thran swallowed a spoonful of porridge, his eyes lingered on Bard. He hummed, smiling. “Oh, my sweet saint, it bears no contemplation.”

Laughing, Bard nearly choked on his tea. “What’s gotten into you?”

“You, last night. Gods, how do you do this to me? All I do is think about you and what we do, and I want more of it. Do not make me beg!”

“That choreographer’s going to show up in two hours, and –”

“And so we waste time! The longer you think about why we should not do this, the less time we have to do this. So do you come upstairs with me or not?”

Bard cradled his chin in his hand to regard his amorous husband. “I don’t believe you. You just got through explaining why we shouldn’t, and even you don’t listen to it.”

“Is there a reason why I should listen to such poor advice?” Thran scooped up the last of his porridge, drank down his tea, and looked at Bard from under his long lashes. “I go upstairs. But before I do, I offer you a little incentive not to listen, either.”

He stood up, kept his eyes on Bard as he pulled his Henley over his head. He tossed it at Bard, draping it over his head. When Bard pulled it off, he was confronted with Thran’s broad shoulders, lean ribs, and narrow waist. White hair fell loose from its braid over a sculpted chest like a caress, and below it, black jeans gloved narrow hips. Tight black jeans. Unbelted, tight black jeans, low on narrow, muscled hips...

Unbidden, Thran’s black leather pants came to mind...

As Thran retreated towards the main hall, with each step those jeans loosened and slipped one inch off one muscled hip, then the other, back and forth, with as much finesse as any stripper could have displayed. White hair stroked pale skin in a feathery caress. When Thran stood silhouetted in profile at the end of the hall, he slid his jeans off rounded buttocks and down long, elegant legs. Once he stepped out of them, he cast another look at Bard before he straightened and disappeared, dragging his jeans behind him.
Bard sat there, thinking of every reason why he shouldn’t climb into bed after a lascivious ballet – no, exotic – dancer: Tilda’s room, choreographer, painting, broken bathroom tile, floor refinishing...

Two seconds later, with a curse under his breath and a rueful grin on his face, he toed off his socks, and shoved his chair away from the table. He’d stripped off his Henley before he reached the foot of the stairs.

“You’d better be in bed, you bastard!” he yelled up the stairs, taking them two at a time. When he came onto the landing, the pocket doors to their bedroom were open, and Thran was posed as provocatively as any pinup in the middle of the bed, his white hair tousled out of its usual pristine smoothness, in his eyes, over his chest, onto the sheets.

“Of course I am in bed,” he purred. “Where else does one go to be decadent in the morning, while the rest of the world rushes about to do proper things?”

Bard shucked off his jeans and dove into bed after Thran with a growl. “You are going to be the death of me, you fucker!”

“I hope so,” Thran grinned, as he pulled Bard into his arms, them flipped him onto his stomach with Thran on top. “I promise you it will be a long, slow, lingering death, achieved through constant and frequent indulgences over a lifetime.”

Bard grinned as Thran set to doing his worst – or was that his best? In either case, Bard wasn’t about to stop him. There were worse ways to die, and no better way to live.

* * *

Bard didn’t last long under Thran’s concerted efforts, and it didn’t take much to coax him to sleep in Thran’s arms afterwards. Thran was content to drowse with Bard curled against his belly; his poor saint needed to sleep, but not just because of last night’s late exertions. Bard worked very hard on the renovations of their house, but also to see to everything their family needed, from meals to homework help to laundry. Once the children’s rooms were finished, Thran would see to it that Bard took more time to restore himself, no matter how hard it would be to coax Bard to do it.

When he woke fully, it was after nine. Bard remained solidly asleep for a little longer, then his breathing changed. He shifted the slightest bit under Thran’s arm draped softly around his ribs, as if he didn’t want to rouse just yet.

“Feel better, my saint?” Thran asked drowsily, stroking his husband’s ribs.

“Always, angel. I don’t want to get up, but I guess we’d better. Your Mr. Lórien will be here within the hour.”

“I know what time it is. I would have woken you in a few minutes if you had not roused. I enjoyed to hold you while you slept.”

Bard’s hand tightened on Thran’s. “I enjoyed sleeping in the arms of an angel. And getting pillaged by an angel, too.”

“I did not pillage,” Thran protested comfortably. “I merely provided the means to coax you to sleep for a little. You needed it.”
So everyone in the house has told me. So let me get up and wash some semblance of sense into my body before this choreographer tells me I look ragged, too.”

Thran chuckled. “We will get up, yes. And tonight we will go to bed earlier than we did last night. And try not to indulge. It is difficult not to, after so long without. And you are delicious, which does not encourage me to abstain.”

“Here’s something that might help. We’ll play a game.”

As Bard sat up on the edge of the bed, Thran opened his eyes to regard him with interest. “What sort of game, lyubov moya?”

“A game to plan our next indulgence.” Bard leaned back to stroke Thran’s hair. “Every time we pass each other between now and then, we’ll take turns to add something about what will happen then. When, where, a piece of clothing, a role, a line...”

Thran bit his bottom lip, his arousal already piqued. “An intriguing game, indeed. So I will start it. Friday.”

Bard nodded. “Okay. Then for my turn... first, when is your audition Friday?”

“Ten in the morning. In the city. I should be back by two.”

Bard nodded. “Then I’ll say... three in the afternoon. If you don’t get home in time, then after the children go to bed.”

Thran sat up. “And so now we must go about our day, and not add to the game until we come together again, yes?”

Bard nodded. “That’ll let us stretch it out.”

Thran hummed. “I make no promises about what such a buildup will do to me over two days.”

Bard got up and headed to the bathroom. “I won’t, either. But it might mean we get to sleep earlier tonight. We both need it, even if you don’t look like it.”

Thran laughed as he got up, too. “True. For now, let us prepare for our guest.”

They washed, then Thran considered the closet as Bard went downstairs to tidy up the kitchen before Irmo Lórien arrived. Thran opted for his usual black velvet jeans and warm socks, then came out onto the landing to pull on the shirt Bard pitched up the stairs to him. He retreated long enough to pull on a long tunic sweater over the Henley before heading for Tilda’s room. He helped Bard move their youngest child’s things into the children’s study so that Bard would have open space as he painted ceiling, walls, and woodwork. They were just spreading the drop cloths over the floor when a knock sounded at the front door.

Bard and Thran looked at each other, then headed down the stairs together. Bard pulled open the door to reveal the man on their front porch.

“Irmo Lórien,” the man said in a clipped, French-accented voice. He was perhaps five-eight, with a barrel chest and huge hands, bald but for the grey stubble that cast a horizontal shadow from one ear, around the back of his skull, to the other ear. His thoughtful eyes were deep-sunk in an expressive, mobile face, and so dark that their pupils were indistinguishable from their irises. His skin was either deeply tanned or naturally swarthy, the color of dried tobacco. Despite his accent, was he Spanish, Persian, Turkish, something more exotic than French Canadian? He was nicely if casually dressed in dark grey work pants, sturdy brogues, and puffy, deep amethyst down jacket, with a muted purple and grey scarf looped around his neck.

Thran stepped forward to extend his hand. “Thran Oropherson. This is my husband, Bard Bowman. Welcome to our home. Please come in.”

Irmo shook hands with Thran, then with Bard. He had a firm grip, and his carriage was assured as he came inside. After Bard hung up Irmo’s coat in the coat closet, Thran led him to the sitting room to sit down; Bard stayed in the kitchen to make tea.

“I was elated when you called,” Irmo began without waiting for Thran to speak. “Although I am sure you didn’t think so.”

“You were short,” Thran agreed without rancor. “Perhaps I called at an inopportune moment, or perhaps not. I am less interested in the reason for your terseness than I am about whether you seriously consider a collaboration between us.”

“But such a thing is obvious, is it not?” Irmo shrugged, frowning as if Thran were a slow child. “I have wondered why you had not called long before now.”

Thran cocked his head. “Ah. Perhaps I am unaware of some injury that you have suffered, one that left you unable to call me.”

Irmo’s laugh was rich and unrestrained. “Ah, you are no fool, then. Good, good. Yes, you are right; I should have called you some months ago. But there was your injury, and the questions about which company you would end up joining, and so I decided to wait and see. I took your call as a good sign that your injury was no more, and that you had not yet settled on a company. Several are interested in you. Which ones interest you?”

Bard came in with a tray of tea things, put it on the table between the sofas, and gave Thran a wink that Irmo couldn’t see before silently disappearing.

“That may depend on the outcome of this conversation.” Thran leaned forward to pour one of the small Japanese cups of tea full, and offered it to Irmo. The choreographer leaned forward to take the small cup, then Thran poured his own. “I do not like to be coy, Irmo. I gauge you to be just as blunt. So I will say that I am interested in your choreography. The subjects, the way your dancers move, the deep emotional content, all appeal to me. They fit very naturally with the kind of dancer I am. They go in directions that interest me as an artist. If we can establish a rapport between us, we will make something unique. I want to explore the potential for that before I settle on a company.”

Irmo sipped his tea, nodding. “I am no less fond of anything other than brutal directness. In that, my reputation is correct. When I learned you had begun to audition, I made it my business to find out which companies you intended to see. I was disappointed that you wasted your time with the company you saw yesterday – you would be wasted on them. But I expected you wanted a warmup audition before you made serious applications elsewhere. I was pleased to see you scheduled an audition with UltraViolet, the company I work with so extensively.”

Irmo sipped the last of his tea and held out his cup for more. Thran refilled it, then his own.

“There are considerations before I choose a company.” Thran set the teapot back on the tray. “To dance memorably, to leave my mark on the body of work, of course. But I have my family to think of, as well as my future. UltraViolet Ballet is a new, struggling company. It cannot compete for compensation and exposure as can other companies I consider. It also needs capital, and soon, I suspect, direction. The risk inherent in such things does not interest me if a position within it is relegated to traditional roles, traditional approaches, traditional choreographies."

“It needs an angel, to be sure,” Irmo shrugged, unconcerned. “I myself have not allied with it for many of the same reasons, though I have no family to concern me. So far, the company has attracted solid talent, most of it young, and all willing to try new things. But it does not have a prima or a primo who interests me, who would entice me into being more than what they call guest choreographer. I know of your work, of course, and have seen video of you. You are an interesting and talented dancer. None other interests me so much. So perhaps there is mutual interest between us, enough to see if we can work together. We both have large personalities. Neither of us suffers fools well. But neither of us are fools. We may mesh well, or we may not. We will have to see.”

Thran put his teacup on the tray and stood up. “Then I would like to show you something. If you would follow me?”

“Of course, of course.”

Thran led Irmo through the house to the main room. Pausing by the door to the ballroom, he looked back at the choreographer. “If you would remove your shoes, please?”

Irmo looked at him askance, but did as requested. Thran opened the door to the ballroom, and let Irmo inside.

“Oh, mon Dieu, c’est magnifique! I understand about the shoes now.” Irmo’s dark eyes lit up as he took in the expansive space. “C’est formidable!”

“C’est ça,” Thran agreed, smiling. “So I propose we try a little something, if you are so inclined, to see whether we mesh well, or not.”

“Mais oui, certainement,” Irmo nodded at once, rubbing his hands. “Let’s do it.”

“I will change into something I can dance in, and return shortly. Will you excuse me?”

“Go, go!” Irmo shook his hands at Thran, still staring up at the ceiling, down at the fireplace, and around at the worn herringbone wood floor. Thran smothered a grin and headed upstairs.

“How’s he look?” Bard whispered from atop his ladder when Thran stuck his head into Tilda’s room. He was partway through painting the ceiling.

“Very direct, very pointed, very refreshing. So we will be in the ballroom. You will likely hear music at some point.”

Bard climbed down from the ladder and followed Thran into the bedroom to talk to him while he changed into his dance attire. “Will you do your Knight’s March piece for him?”

“Perhaps. I have to warm properly, and we will talk throughout, so we will see.”

Bard snared Thran for a quick kiss before he headed back downstairs. “I’ve got my fingers crossed for you, cariad.”

Thran kissed Bard back with a smile. “Thank you, lyubov moya.”

He returned to the ballroom. “I have not been at the barre this morning, so that is a good place for us to start.”

Irmo nodded. “Good, yes. First, the basics.”
Thran acted as both ballet master and dancer, calling out the steps and moves, some of which Irmo did with him – no surprise there; the choreographer had danced himself for many years – and some of which Irmo watched Thran perform with a critical eye. At frequent intervals, the choreographer questioned a position, or asked for a different sequence, or asked what would happen if the position were changed just this much or that much. When Thran was well warmed, he did longer sequences, gauging what it would be like to have such a man craft dances with him. When Irmo asked if Thran had any complete sequences he could dance, Thran told him of the two audition pieces he had prepared. Irmo was silent through the Chopin piece, but spoke up at once as soon as the piano music faded.

“Very traditional, but not unexpected for you,” he shrugged. “You are seen as such an extreme, oui? So it is smart of you to craft such a piece to show how disciplined you are. Your footwork is quite precise, and your balance is superb. It is very nice. But it is...”

“Traditional,” Thran agreed.

“So show me something untraditional.”

Thran allowed himself a pleased smile. “Of course. You will excuse me while I call Bard to spot.”

“Why? What do you need a spotter for?”

“The knives, of course,” Thran shrugged, imitating Irmo’s dismissive gesture, drawing a bark of laughter from the choreographer.

“Ah, so you have the little joke, then,” Irmo laughed. “Call him, then.”

Thran snickered as he went to the bottom of the stairs to call up to Bard. “Lyubov moya, may I interrupt you for a little while?”

“Just finished the ceiling,” Bard called down. “Let me cap the paint and put the brushes in to soak, and I’ll be right down.”

Thran waited for the few seconds it took Bard to clatter downstairs, still smiling. Bard caught the expression as he came beside his husband. “What’s up? Is it going well?”

“So far, so good. I want you to spot, that is all.”

“Knives?” Thran nodded. “All right. Be a second.”

Thran headed back to the ballroom, where Bard joined him as he opened his knife box and took out the two blades.

“I will dance this twice. The first time, I will be traditional. The second time, I will not.”

Bard had positioned himself by the CD player, and started the music at Thran’s nod. The first time through, he suffused his dancing with all of the malevolence he could, almost over-emoting. He held the final pose for three seconds, took his beginning stance again, and nodded to Bard to restart the music. This time, he danced the role that Bard had named, Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield, with dispassionate, inevitable, inexorable control. He let his hands fall, knives gracefully dipping to cut the final skein of human existence, and shut his eyes.

When he straightened, his first sight was of Bard, his hand over his mouth, keeping all reaction within, but his eyes were shining, and he nodded once, wholehearted approval. Thran swung his gaze to Irmo, who stood stock still.
“Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield,” Thran said.

For some seconds, Irmo said nothing, did not move. But Thran kept his regard calm, confident, until Irmo nodded. It was not a theatrical gesture, but surprisingly humble.

“Yes. It was. You were. I have not seen the like,”

Thran offered a slight bow. “Thank you.”

“So that is how you want to dance.”

With a slight smile, Thran shook his head. “No. That is only the start of how I want to dance. Is that something that intrigues you?”

Irmo smiled. “Ah, mon ami, it very much does. I think you and I have much to talk about.”

Thran glanced at Bard, silent but grinning widely. He offered a quick wink in celebration.

“I think we do. So, where would you like to begin?”
Chapter 50

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint spend the afternoon attending sporting events, and their game grows more interesting as Round Two ends and Round Three begins.

Chapter Notes

Here's a HUGE THANK YOU to rhosgobelrabbit96, who sent me a whole lot of proofreading corrections, and which greatly cleaned up my tale. YOU ARE AWESOME! ❤

Fellow writers, when folks care enough about your stuff to help you fix it, that's the biggest gift in the world, and you are blessed. So thank you to everyone who has been so nice to me! I love you guys!

I still don't own any rights to "The Secret Garden." It's just one of my favorite books, as it is one of Tilda's.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was all Bard could do to hold still and silent while Thran danced for Irmo Lórien. The first time through was stunning enough, just for the sheer crash of the seething music and the magnificent body that interpreted it. But the second was far more powerful – Thran’s restraint and inevitability as Death were the unexpected, yet perfect, counterpoint to the harsh music. Still, even with such a restrained performance, Thran left no question as to the consummate height of his abilities. Would Irmo be as impressed as he was?

The small choreographer made no move, but there was an eager alertness to his pose, and he didn’t blink at all during Thran’s second run-through. Those alone were enough to reveal the intensity of his reaction. Bard had to put a hand over his mouth to keep from chortling at how firmly Thran had hooked his prey.

He had to put a hand over his mouth to keep his jaw from dropping, too. The beauty, the grace, the divine skill that suffused his angel’s dancing was overwhelming.

He left Thran and Irmo in the ballroom to continue their discussion. He hadn’t gotten halfway to the stairs before the dialogue had switched to French, bouncing rapid-fire between the two. Something amazing had happened, and Bard went back to Tilda’s room content to let it ferment on its own. Soon enough, Thran would be back hard at work, and Bard wanted to be through all of the essential house renovations so he could be the backbone of the family they needed. He was musing on the implications of that when Thran called to him from the main hall.

“Bard, Irmo bids us adieu.”

“Be right down,” Bard called, putting down his roller and grabbing a rag to wipe his hands. He came down the stairs to find Thran holding Irmo’s coat for him to slip on.

“We will be in touch, of course,” Irmo said, smiling. “I am excited at the possibilities we’ve discussed. And I will see you Monday at your audition. You should save yourself some effort and cancel your auditions tomorrow and Friday, as they are of no consequence. Take the time to prepare for Monday, though I am already convinced by what you showed me today.”

Thran chuckled. “I will observe the politenesses, to be sure. And I will be pleased to see you on Monday. I am glad you agreed to meet this morning to discuss. Thank you.”

Irmo waved a hand. “It was inevitable, to be sure. And now we have set the future in motion. Bard, I am pleased to have met you. I am sure we will meet again very soon.”

Bard leaned forward to shake Irmo’s hand. “I expect we will. Thran’s a spectacular dancer. He needs spectacular dances to perform.”

The choreographer crossed the porch, went down the stairs, and headed to his car without a look back. When he’d pulled out of the drive, Thran shut the door and gave Bard a speculative look.

“I think something wonderful has begun, lyubov moya ,” he murmured, smiling.

“I thought so, too,” Bard agreed. “What time is it? Close to lunchtime?”

Thran pulled out his mobile. “ Zut alors, oui . After one. Are you at a stopping point?”

“Almost. Let me get the wall done, and we’ll eat.”

“I will come with you. Perhaps I can help with something.”

Bard had almost finished priming the third wall of Tilda’s room, so he hurried to do the last bit while Thran picked up the bits of detritus he’d generated and put them in the trashcan. Bard capped the primer, and they brought the brushes down to wash them in the mudroom. Then they scrounged for lunch, and brought a collection of things to the table to eat.

“So what’s the next step, angel?” Bard asked, taking a huge bite of his chicken sandwich.

“I will attend my auditions tomorrow and Friday, despite Irmo’s suggestion,” Thran replied, helping himself to chicken. “That is the polite thing to do. I have accepted the auditions, and it would be neither kind nor professional to skip them at this late date. They will be good warmups, and give me a current view of both companies, which is always useful information. And I will speak to Mr. Nori about some things. There is still much to sort out. But for now, I will simply savor the morning and how well it went. Something was in the air.”

Bard paused in his chewing. Something in the air.... He grinned as he swallowed his bite, drawing Thran to raise his eyebrow.

“That look you give me is most devious. Does it have something to do with our game?”

Bard nodded once, still smiling perversely.

Thran held up his hands in puzzlement. “What, then?”

“You went first for Round One. So I get to go first for Round Two.”
Thran nodded. “That is fair. And so what is your addition to the game?”

“Pheromones.”

Thran looked blank. “Fero - what?”

Bard shook his head. “That’s all I’ll say. Pheromones.”

Thran looked mystified. “You must tell me how to spell it, so I can look it up.”

“P-H-E-R-O-M-O-N-E-S.”

“Ah. P-H, not F. I will research, and return with a counter offer.”

“Okay. Meanwhile, I’ll try to get the last wall of Tilda’s room primed. I won’t get much more than that done before it’s time for Sigrid’s track meet.”

“You haven’t finished your lunch,” Thran protested. “We have an agreement, yes? Never do we skip the meals!”

“I’ll take it up with me,” Bard assured his husband. “Believe me, I’m an old hand at painting with one hand and eating a sandwich with the other.”

Thran snorted. “Then I will do the same thing so that we finish that wall so that you finish a proper lunch. You do not eat enough!”

“Neither do you,” Bard said seriously. “And it’s a problem.”

“What, that I do not eat enough?” Thran looked affronted.

“No, no, cariad,” Bard hastened to assure Thran. “We both have the problem, not just you. I was thinking about it just before Irmo left.”

Thran’s brow cleared, and he speared another mouthful of chicken. “What did you think about?”

“That we need to watch out for each other, that’s all. You’ll dance fulltime and then some very soon. I expect you to be away for long hours, especially if you end up dancing for Irmo. You’re both very intense, and getting either of you to stop will not be easy. It’ll be even harder to get the two of you together to stop. So I need to get a lot of the renovation done so I can cover more of the home stuff for us. The children rely on us, and we can’t neglect care of ourselves. That means we both need to make an effort to eat well.”

Thran unwound completely at Bard’s summary. “You are right, lyubov moya. I have not ever had to worry about such things before. In Russia, Vileria and I had someone to look after Legolas, and someone else to look after our flat, and yet someone else to look after both us, and of course we both danced, so the rigors did not seem so extreme because we both endured them. But that is no longer true, and it is you and I who must see to these things now, as well as to all of our children. Perhaps we should hire someone to help us?”

“We may want to at some point, but I still want to keep working on the house myself,” Bard admitted. “Getting the second floor done will go a long way to getting us ready for whatever comes after that. So we can take stock again after that point. But regardless, we need to promise ourselves to eat what we should. Agreed?”

“Agreed,” Thran replied without hesitation. “So let us take the five minutes we need to eat our lunch. together now, and then we will see to Tilda’s wall. With two of us, it will not take so long.”

Bard nodded. “You’re right. So eat up.”

They finished their meals, even taking time to finish off their main courses with fruit. They carried their tea upstairs to tackle the last of Tilda’s walls with primer, and in a little over an hour they were finished. They had just time to clean all the brushes and tidy the room before it was time to head to the school for Sigrid’s track meet.

“We should take the SUV,” Thran suggested, as they got their coats. “Then we can bring the children home with us, so they do not have to ride the bus home.”

“And maybe we can get them started on homework early, and have supper a little earlier, which means we might get to bed earlier,” Bard agreed, not really expecting any of that to happen, and the look Thran shot him looked no more sanguine. They shared a commiserating laugh, then climbed into the SUV and headed for the Imladris Academy.

In a few minutes, Thran pulled into the school parking lot. A bus from another school was parked there already, and as they walked to the gymnasium, they spotted athletes in red and white uniforms as well as in Imladris blue and gold. They made their way to the bleachers, and found seats in the top row that gave them a good view of the proceedings.

“I have never been to a track meet before,” Thran confessed, looking around with interest. “Is it all footraces?”

“A lot of it is,” Bard replied. “Relays, and solo races, of course. Maybe hurdles? I should have asked Sigrid.”

“Look, there she is,” Thran pointed. “Do we wave to her?”

“That’s probably not cool,” Bard grinned. “But I’m going to, anyway.”

“Ah, she looks this way,” Thran said, waving. “Tcha, she does not see us.”

“I’ll get her attention.” Bard whistled shrilly, just a short note, but when Sigrid looked around, he whistled again. She spotted them, and sent them a grin as she waved back.

“That is a convenient skill to have, to whistle so loudly,” Thran grinned, wide-eyed as he pretended to clean out his ear with a finger. “Good for track meets as well as to call city taxi cabs.”

Bard chuckled. “It’s just the tick to let the troops know I’m here.”

“How does a track meet work? How do we know when Sigrid will run?”

Bard craned his neck. “Maybe there’s a schedule somewhere. If you want to go watch Legolas’s archery, I can hold the fort here.”

“I would like to see Legolas, yes, and speak to Mr. Faramir to see how he thinks Legolas progresses. But first, let us see if we can find a schedule for Sigrid’s meet.”

They left the bleachers to walk around a bit, and found a student who had a stack of schedules. Fortunately, Sigrid was in one of the earlier relay events, so they returned to the bleachers to wait. A voice heralded them, and they found Sam Gamgee climbing up to join them. His oldest son, Frodo, a sixth grader, was also running, so they enjoyed a few minutes together while they waited for their children’s races to begin. They decided next Friday night would be a good time to get their respective clans together for a simple supper of soup and bread. By the time they’d worked out the details, Sigrid’s relay was ready to start.

“Look how fast she is!” Thran marveled, as Sigrid took the baton from the second runner on her team, and raced around the track four times before handing off to the anchor runner. The Imladris team came in just a few feet ahead of the other team, which drew Bard to whistle in celebration.
Beside them, Sam whistled, too, so Thran joined in, much to Bard’s delight. It was cute to see his elegant husband create as much racket as everyone else, and look elated to do so.

The checked their schedule, and found that Sigrid had one more event in about fifteen minutes, so they stayed in the bleachers talking to Sam for most of that time. Sam left before Sigrid’s race so that he could move to the other side of the gymnasium to watch Frodo’s jumping event, but in just a few minutes more, Sigrid lined up with another four girls for the start of her race. She would have to circle the track a dozen times. Each time she ran by them, Bard and Thran yelled loud couragement, especially in the second half of the race, when one of the girls on the other team pulled ahead by a sizeable margin. Sigrid ran with determination, and slowly pulled ahead of the other two girls, and began to close the gap between her and the girl in front. Over the last two laps, she pulled within just a body length of the leader, but ran out of room just before she overhauled her.
Still, she made a strong finish, and looked elated despite her second-place finish. Bard and Thran cheered and clapped loudly for her, which she rewarded with a huge smile when she looked towards them in the bleachers. They threaded their way over to congratulate her.

“That was great, Sig!” Bard put an arm around her to hug hard. “Another half lap, and you would have caught her!”

“As swift as a deer!” Thran added, grinning.

“The girl ahead of me was the deer!” Sigrid laughed. “I was trying to be the wolf behind, but I ran out of room before I pulled her in.”

“Something to work on next time,” Bard offered. “Do you get to run again? I didn’t see your name on any of the other races.”

“I might end up subbing for one of the girls in the four hundred,” she replied. “Lily pulled a muscle in the relay. But I won’t know for a half hour.”

“Thran wants to go watch Legolas’s archery for a bit, so I’ll go with him, and we’ll check back in about twenty minutes, then.”

“That’d be great, Da. I’m so glad you two came!”

“I have never been to a track meet before, so now I am more educated,” Thran grinned. “So, until a little later, ma chère.”

“We’ll be back in a bit, sweetness,” Bard called, as Sigrid headed back to rejoin her teammates. She waved in reply, so Bard and his husband made their way out of the gymnasium and headed for the fields outside. They spotted the group of archery students off to the left, so they angled that way, and soon drew close enough to spot Legolas among the group. Just beyond him were Killian and Tara.
All three were at the line, shooting as they sighted in on their marks. When Legolas let his arrow fly, it landed as close to the exact center of the target as was possible, drawing Thran to hum in satisfaction.

“He’s amazing,” Bard complimented. “Our own Robin Hood.”
“Indeed,” Thran nodded, pleased. “Do you know our own Robin Hood wears trusy with archers on them for mojo?”

Bard snickered. “If you mean have I noticed that Legolas’s boxers have Cupid, Hawkeye, and Robin Hood on them, then yes, I have. What did you call them? Trusy?”

“Trusy,” Thran nodded, grinning. “I have not asked how he acquired them. It was not my doing.”

“Every boy needs some secrets,” Bard grinned. “We’ll just leave his underpants alone.”

“Agreed.”

They watched quietly from the side for a while. As this was just practice, there were no other parents in attendance, but eventually Mr. Faramir came over to them to say hello and exchange a few words. The instructor was highly complimentary of Legolas’s skills, which pleased Bard almost as much as it did Thran. As they two talked, Bard watched the children working on their skills, and was amazed at how focused the irrepressible Kíllian was. When he was at the line, he was entirely calm, in his zone. He sent arrow after arrow at the target, none of them ever more than an inch or two from the center of the targets. Legolas might be the older and more practiced of the two, but Kíllian had the better instinctive affinity for his weapon. So interesting was he to watch that Bard almost forgot to notice Tara’s efforts further on. She was a tall and graceful archer who embodied a quiet fierceness, and was well worth watching. All three of the young archers gave truth to what Legolas had told his family around the supper table so often – on any given day, any of them had the potential to outdo the others.

When the archers called a hold to clear the targets of arrows, Legolas spotted them. Once he’d cleared his target, he trotted up to Bard and his father to say hello. He was pleased to see them both, and happy he’d shot well. Thran told him where the SUV was parked and that they would soon return to the gymnasium for the rest of Sigrid’s track meet, so that Legolas would not race to meet the school bus after his archery practice. He promised to stop by the gymnasium when he was done, so Thran and Bard waved a short goodbye to him and headed off to the soccer field where Bard had spotted Bain. They stopped there only briefly, long enough to pass on the same information about where they were, before heading back to the gymnasium.

“So the only one we have not found is our Tilda,” Thran said, looking across the fields. “Do you think she might be inside for her sport today?”

“The track meet’s taking up the gymnasium,” Bard replied. “I don’t know where she might be. Maybe she already got on the bus and went home. But she knew we were going to be here today, so I don’t know where she is.”

“Perhaps we should check the SUV to see if she waits for us there,” Thran suggested.

“Good idea.”

They walked briskly around the gymnasium to the parking lot, and there beside the SUV was Tilda, looking teary. Bard’s heart leaped into his mouth, and he was quick to wave and call to her. She ran to them quickly.

“What’s the matter, little doll?” Bard hurried forward to meet her.

“I couldn’t find you in the gym, so I came out here, and I still couldn’t find you, and I got worried that something had happened,” she gulped. “The early bus had already left, and I was afraid the late one had too, so I didn’t know what to do.”
Bard stooped down beside her, and so did Thran. The tall dancer rubbed her back in comfort, and Bard took her hands. “We went over to see Legolas at the archery targets, that’s all. I’m sorry, Tilda. We were just about to go back inside the gym. Here, let’s put your backpack in the SUV, and we’ll go see if Sigrid’s going to run again. Bain and Legolas will be here soon, too, so you would’ve found someone before too long.”

“I know. I just...”

Bard’s jaw tightened. It seemed that Tilda was still a little skittish because of the altercation in the park on Christmas Day.

“You just didn’t like not being able to find anyone. That’s sometimes a little scary, I know.”

She nodded. “I’m glad I found someone.”

“We wouldn’t have left you,” Bard assured her. “You’ve got your mobile, right? You have all our numbers so you always have five other people to call, plus Elanor Gamgee’s Mam. So you’ll always have someone to find you.”

Tilda swallowed, but looked a little more reassured. “I remember now. Next time, I won’t be so worried.”

“It’s okay, Til. New stuff is often scary the first time.”

“Even for you and Thran?”

Bard nodded. “Even for us.”

Tilda looked from Bard to Thran, who nodded soberly. “Of course, ma chère. For example, do you know that today is the first time I have seen a track meet? I had no idea what to expect. But I had Bard and our friend Mr. Sam to explain it to me. It is much easier to do new things with others, I think. Come, we will put your backpack in the SUV, and then we will go back to the track meet. I can explain it to you, if you like, just as you explained the parades to me.”

That got a smile out of Tilda. “Okay. That’d be good.”

Behind Tilda’s back, Bard gave his husband a thumbs up, so after stowing Tilda’s things in the SUV, they walked back together to the gymnasium. They were just in time to see Sigrid line up for the four hundred-meter run, and in the excitement, Tilda forgot her apprehension and yelled shrilly as her sister managed to get a nose ahead of the same girl who’d held her off in the eight hundred-meter run.

“Did you see that?” Tilda shouted, jumping up and down. “Sigrid won!”

“She sure did!” Bard clapped loudly and whistled, and so did Thran. “Great run, Sig!”

There was only one more race left in the meet, so Tilda, Thran, and Bard stayed near the door until the last runners had completed their circuit, the teams had had their final words, and Sigrid collected her things to go home. She was still elated about her win, and almost danced out of the gymnasium and out into the parking lot. Legolas and Bain were both waiting at the SUV, so everyone piled in to make the trip home.

That evening after supper, as Thran and Bard sat in the sitting room to be near at hand if the children needed homework help, Bard leaned back against the sofa and rubbed his husband’s thigh.
“Tilda’s still a little skittish because of that day in the park,” he murmured softly.

Thran’s long fingers laid against the back of Bard’s hand. “She is. I was worried for her.”

“Once she’s through her homework and had her shower, I want to spend a little time with her upstairs. She’s in the children’s study tonight, which is unfamiliar, so I want to help her settle as much as I can.”

“Of course. However I can help, I will. I can be the first line of homework help down here. As long as they ask me only questions about French or perhaps English, I will be fine. They are all ahead of me in the maths and the sciences.”

“I’m right there with you,” Bard agreed with a wry grin. “From what Sam and Rosie tell me, we’re not alone. It seems that every generation adds just enough new stuff to keep parents in a constant state of ignorance.”

Thran snickered. “Perhaps that is so. At any rate, I shall muddle through as best I can while you see to our Tilda. I do not like to see her frightened so much.”

Soon enough, Tilda finished her work, and Bard headed upstairs with her so he’d be ready to read with her once she’d showered. As he waited for her to cycle through the bathroom, he sat on her bed, looking around the children’s study. Even at night, the apricot walls were warm, and the children had filled the shelves of their desks with colorful books and a few trinkets. It would be good to finish Tilda’s room, just so the children could settle into using their study. But it’d be only another day or two before that would come about. Then they could look for a table to offer room to work puzzles or play games, and the sanctuary would be complete.

Tilda came in from her shower, and settled beside Bard with their old favorite, The Secret Garden. But they ended up talking about one thing or another rather than reading. As the older children began to come upstairs, Tilda looked up to Bard.

“How much is left on my room, Da?”

“It’s my plan to get all the yellow done tomorrow, little doll. If I can get started on the woodwork, too, I will, but likely that’ll happen Friday. Then there’s just the floor. I hope you and your brothers and sister will help with that, so Friday night you’ll be back in your room.”

“That’ll be nice,” Tilda agreed, looking around. “It’s kind of different in here.”

“A little,” Bard allowed. I might find out that for myself when I paint our room, too, now that I think about it. It’s a lot faster and easier to paint when I don’t have to go around a lot of furniture.”

Tilda nodded. “It’s not so bad. And it’s just two days.”

“Just two days,” Bard agreed. “You’ve got Mr. Bun and all your toys with you. And you know that if you want, you can knock on my door and I’ll come in with you.”

“Okay,” she agreed firmly. Bard was proud of her for being so brave about something she wasn’t quite comfortable with. “It’s just two days.”

“There’s lots of books in here to read, too,” he teased lightly. “You can turn on the light and read if you want, but it’d be better if you try to sleep. Otherwise you’ll be awfully sleepy during the rest of school this week.”

“Can I put my nightlight in here?”
“Sure can. I already moved it. See, it’s right there on the wall.”

“Good. Then I’m all set.”

“You are. Okay, little doll, it’s time for you and Mr. Bun to get tucked in.”

Bard saw his daughter and her toys – there were three or four more than usual tonight – well snuggled under the covers, kissed her goodnight, and make sure her nightlight was lit.

“Sleep well, Til. I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Okay, Da. Love you.”

“Love you, too, little doll.”

Before long, the rest of the children followed Tilda to their rest, and Bard came downstairs to find Thran. He’d just entered the kitchen when a burst of incredulous laughter, quickly smothered, came from the sitting room. When Bard stuck his head in, he found his husband on the sofa with his computer cradled in his lap.

“What’s so funny?” Bard queried, brow wrinkling to see Thran with both his hands over his mouth, consumed with amusement.

“Oh, lyubov moya, the things I learn! There is no limit to the outrageousness I find. So I have the answer to your start to Round Two of our game, as well as how I will start Round Three.”

“Okay,” Bard put his hands akimbo. “Do your worst.”

“You tell me ‘Pheromones,’ yes? So I counter with ‘The King’s Bitch.’ And I start Round Three with ‘The Spoils of War.’”

Bard’s eyebrows had likely ascended into his hairline. “ ‘The King’s Bitch?’ ‘The Spoils of War?’ What in the name of hell does that mean? They sound like the titles of a couple of bad romance novels.”

Thran dissolved into laughter. “Tomorrow, when I am at my audition, you can look these things up for yourself. I will say no more until you counter with your addition to Round Three.”

“I have the feeling this game has just veered into a little more than I’d expected,” Bard shook his head.

“Things should always deliver more than expected,” Thran grinned, hugging his arms around his shoulders. “This will be fun.”

“So show me what you looked up,” Bard asked, coming to sit next to Thran, but Thran had already wiped his search engine, and closed his laptop before Bard saw anything but the desktop.

“I will not. You make your own discoveries tomorrow. But I admit that I cannot wait to hear your counter, or to start Round Four.”

Thran’s glee was infectious, and as they went upstairs to shower and get into bed, Bard couldn’t resist a grin. “I hope I live up to your expectations, angel.”

“I have the utmost faith in you, my saint,” Thran grinned, linking his arm with Bard’s.

The last sound in Bard’s ears before he fell asleep was Thran’s snicker. Gods, what had he gotten himself into this time?

Chapter End Notes

For those enterprising readers who are curious about Thran's entries in Rounds Two and Three of the game, you won't find anything on the web about either that pertains to this story. Just trying to save you a little time :-) as you wait for the next chapter. Soon more will be revealed!
Chapter 51

Chapter Summary

Two of the cherubs misbehave, invoking the wrath of an angel and a saint. Auditions and renovations proceed, and so does a certain game.

I don't hold any rights to the Candyland game. I only remember it fondly.

Chapter Notes

To all of you reading along,

On March 11, 2016, the hit count for this story passed 10,000! This is amazing, and you all made it happen. Thank you so much for sticking with me, our gorgeous guys, and a quartet of cherubs!

!!!!!❤️ ❤️ ❤️ ❤️

Thran’s amusement at the results of his Internet searching faded as he enfolded Bard in his arms and they settled for sleep. How blissful was it to lie here so comforted and cocooned? He hoped that when Bard made his own Internet searches, he remembered this comfortable cocoon and planned accordingly. If he didn’t, then Thran would, regardless of the scenario they devised. It was something they both needed.

The simple enjoyment of skin against skin was one of the best things to savor about winter. Thran was never one to care for hot weather, particularly given how careful he had to be to protect his pale skin and eyes, but to ruin the sensuousness of skin against skin with sticky sweat made summer all that much more annoying. Vileria used to tease him that he was the only Russian who wanted to be sent to Siberia.

She would approve of how and where he lived now, and would love to see how happy Legolas was. He would mention their idea to add a remembrance of Vileria and Daphne in the house to Bard again. It would make him happy to include a small reminder of their wives, the mothers of their children, in the happiness he enjoyed here with his family.

He drifted off, happy to fall asleep bathed in Bard’s scent, which made him smile about pheromones again. But he didn’t stay asleep for long – a persistent tapping roused him. Bard was already grabbing the tee shirt and flannel pants he kept at the side of the bed.

“Da?”

That was Tilda’s wavering voice, so Thran reached down for his leggings and shirt and sleepily pulled them on as Bard went to the door and opened it.

“I’m here, little doll. What’s wrong? Did you have a bad dream?”
“No-o-o-o.” Her reply was uneven, and she went right into Bard’s arms. “There’s a weird noise in the study. I’m scared.”

“Okay, let’s look.”

Thran tucked himself under the covers, but he kept his clothes on in case the outcome of Bard’s investigation was not reassuring. He shut his eyes, and drifted off enough that he didn’t know how much time had passed when Bard came back into the room. Thran roused to find that the pocket doors to their room were still open, and Bard didn’t undress before he got back into bed.

“She is reassured?” he mumbled sleepily.

“I wouldn’t count on it,” Bard murmured back. “I didn’t hear anything, but I’d give less than even odds that she goes back to sleep for long.”

“Let her stay here with us, then,” Thran offered. “Legolas did not sleep well for a long time after Vileria died. It comforted him to stay with me.”

“I was about to ask if you’d mind if it came to that, so thank you, cariad. Keep your fingers crossed.”

Thran had almost drifted off again before Tilda returned with Mr. Bun and another toy in her arms.

“Da, I heard the weird noise again.”

“That’s okay, Tilda. You can stay with us for a while. Do you need to stop in the bathroom?”

“Will you stand at the door?”

“Of course, little doll.” Bard clambered out of bed, and went to his daughter. “Here, I’ll hold Mr. Bun and Lollybear for you, okay?”

“Okay.”

Bard disappeared to wait for Tilda to visit the bathroom, then drew her into the bedroom. “Okay, hop in. Do you want to sleep in the middle between Thran and me, or on the edge?”

“In the middle. Hi, Thran,” Tilda ventured, climbing into bed. “There’s a scary noise in the study.”

“Hi, Tilda. I do not like scary noises, either. But you can stay here with us. I will keep away any scary noises for you on this side, and your Da will keep away any scary noises for you on that side.”

“Good,” Tilda said with a little gulp. Bard got in beside her, and put Mr. Bun and Lollybear in Tilda’s arms. She clutched them and crowded hard against Thran’s chest. She reached out to pull Bard in just as close. “Closer.”

As Bard snuggled in, a host of emotions went through Thran. To have their youngest child trust him enough to huddle against him was an honor. To smell the scent of Tilda’s hair, overlaid with just the faintest dusty tinge of her well-loved toys, was to recall how frightened Legolas had been many nights, waking up in tears as he dreamed about the explosion that had killed his mother. To witness yet another example of how tender Bard was with his children made him love his husband even more, if that were possible.

If he were honest, however, the scent of Tilda’s hair sparked a reminder of the game he and Bard had begun. He couldn’t wait to see what Bard would do with pheromones.
Despite Tilda’s scare and subsequent arrival in bed, Bard fell asleep quickly. Tilda didn’t rouse, and he hoped Thran wasn’t kept awake for long. When the alarm went off at six, he hurried into the bathroom. To his relief, Tilda was just rousing when he returned. Thran was awake and murmured softly to Tilda, retrieving Mr. Bun from atop the pillow to hand to her.

“Is it morning?” Tilda asked sleepily, as Bard sat on the side of the bed.

“It’s morning,” Bard assured her. “Let’s get you to the bathroom, and then you can put your clothes on for school.”

“Oh, it’s not the weekend, then,” Tilda said. “It’s just Thursday.”

“Thursday it is,” Bard agreed. “Did you wish Thran a good morning?”

She nodded. “He found Mr. Bun for me. Sometimes Mr. Bun likes to wander at night.”

“He’s still got a lot of the house to explore, I think. He’s interested to find out all the special nooks and crannies.”

Nodding, Tilda rolled over and sat up, then crawled back to press a kiss on Thran’s cheek as he lay drowsing. His eyes lit up, and he smiled as if he’d been given a gift.

“That is a very nice good morning kiss, Tilda. Thank you.”

“Welcome. Thank you for keeping away the noises with Da.”

“It was my pleasure. Now, I will find my clothes, too, and see you in the kitchen in a minute to make lunches.”

“Okay.”

Bard offered Thran an appreciative smile for his graceful morning welcome to Tilda, and to congratulate him that Tilda felt so comfortable with him. Then he shepherded Tilda to the bathroom, and into the children’s study to find school clothes for the day. He heard Thran head downstairs, so by the time he and Tilda followed him down, the teakettle was warming, the porridge was simmering, and the fruit bowl was filled. Bard started the sandwich assembly line, and before long the morning had returned to its normal routine.

Sigrid soon appeared, yawning, but her eyebrows went up to see Tilda already at the table. Before she got her porridge, she came to give Thran and Bard a morning hug as they finished making the lunches.

“Til’s okay?” Sig murmured when she gave him his hug.

Bard put an arm around Sigrid to return her hug, and put his mouth close to her ear. “Scary noises in the study last night. She spent the night with us.”

Sigrid made a silent O with her mouth, but didn’t say anything as she got her bowl of porridge from the pot. She went to the table to sit beside her sister as Bain and Legolas clattered in.
“Morning, Legs; morning synok; morning, Bain,” Bard and Thran greeted their sons as they filled their porridge bowls and came to the table.

“Morning,” the boys responded, queuing for their porridge. Legolas ducked into the fridge for his juice, Bain made his tea, and both boys carried their breakfasts to the table.

“Morning, Til,” Sigrid wished her sister. “Everything okay this morning?”

Tilda nodded solemnly. “But there was a scary noise in the study last night.”

The faintest ripple of something went between Legolas and Bain. No one else noticed it, but Bard had been a parent too long not to. His gaze sharpened, looking between them, and it was the slightest twitch of Legolas’s lips that gave them away.

“Maybe Legolas and Bain heard the same noise,” he said mildly. “Let’s ask them.”

“That’s a good idea,” Tilda looked up, brightening, not sensing that the undercurrent between the boys had taken a guilty turn. Bard slid his eyes to Thran, who was trying to puzzle out what Bard meant, alerting him that something was up. “Did you hear it, Bain? It was a thumping sort of noise. In the wall. I thought it was a big rat or something.”

“A rat? There aren’t any rats in the walls, Til –” Sigrid scoffed, but quickly broke off when Bard shot her a look. “Oh, but you heard something, right?”

Tilda nodded vigorously. “I didn’t see anything, even when I turned on the light. But it was still scary.”

“Bain? Legolas? Do you have any idea about what made the noise that scared Tilda?”

“I don’t know,” Bain ventured, but Legolas’s ears turned red, and he didn’t look up from his porridge bowl.

“Bain, Legolas, the sitting room,” Bard said very quietly. “Now.”

Thran reinforced the quiet command with one of his Prince of Ice glares, and both boys shuffled out of their chairs. As they went into the sitting room as ordered, Bard gave the girls a reassuring look.

“Carry on with your breakfasts, girls. We’ll be back in a minute.”

“Yes, Da,” they replied, and Bard headed after the boys with Thran at his shoulder. They found the boys sitting hunched on one of the sofas, whispering. The whispering stopped when Bard and Thran sat side by side on the facing sofa.

“Yes?” Bard asked, with a firm look at both of the boys.

“It wasn’t much, Da,” Bain said with an innocent expression. “We – I just bumped the wall, that’s all. It was an accident.”

“You’re both already grounded for two days, Bain. If you don’t want to be grounded for more, tell me the real story.”

“Two days?” Legolas blurted, eyes wide. “Starting when? Does that mean I’ll miss fencing on Saturday?”

“It does,” Thran growled, his eyes hard and icy. “Our Tilda is still easily frightened after what happened in the park Christmas Day. She was already worried to sleep in a strange room. You were most cruel to scare her still more. In fact, if both of you do not make a complete confession this moment, we will ground you for more than two days, and confiscate a certain zombie apocalypse game for far longer. Now, speak.”

“It was my idea,” Bain stammered, looking at Legolas with embarrassment. “I don’t want Legolas to miss his fencing for my dumb idea.”

“He will not miss his fencing for your dumb idea,” Thran replied, still glaring at Legolas. “He will miss his fencing because he took part in your dumb idea. Now, speak.”

“I thought it would be funny to rap on the wall at Tilda, that’s all,” Baid confessed with a shamefaced look. “I didn’t think she’d get scared. I didn’t.”

“Well, she did,” Bard took up where Thran had left off. “And I don’t think you just need to tell us about rapping on the walls. Which one of you snuck into the other’s room, and why?”

“We were in Bain’s room,” Legolas admitted. “We wanted to play the zombie apocalypse game for a while longer. And then Bain... and me, too... we rapped on the wall to see if Tilda would hear it.”

“So Legolas snuck into Bain’s room, you played video games long after bedtime on a school night, and you tried to scare Tilda. Just for the record, how many days have you been sneaking into Bain’s room to play after bedtime?”

“Just last night and the night before,” both boys hurried to explain.

“So two days. How are either of you still awake?” Thran frowned. “I think the zombie apocalypse will take a week’s rest, yes?”

“At least,” Bard nodded. “And you’re both grounded for three days. You also need to apologize to Tilda, and do something to make up for scaring her. If you do anything like this again, the penalty will be double. Do you understand?”

“Yes, Da; yes, Bard,” the boys replied in subdued murmurs.

“Back to the kitchen, then.”

They all trooped back to the kitchen, where Tilda and Sigrid looked up in inquiry. As they sat down, Bard met Tilda’s eyes.

“Tilda, the boys have something to tell you.”

“I’m sorry that I scared you,” Legolas said, swallowing. “I didn’t think that rapping on the wall would scare you, and I’m very sorry that it did.”

“Me, too, Tilda,” Bain continued. “It was stupid, and I’m sorry I did it.”

“I was really scared!” Tilda said angrily. “I thought it was a rat, and it would bite me!”

“I didn’t mean to scare you, Til, I really didn’t,” Bain pleaded, wincing at his sister’s anger. “I’m sorry.”

“I am, too,” Legolas repeated.

“The boys owe you something more than an apology, Tilda,” Thran said. “Perhaps there is something you would like them to do for you?”
“Would they?” Tilda eyed them with both speculation and eagerness. “Maybe play one of my games with me?”

“Oh, no,” Bain muttered. “Not Candyland again.”

“How about they play games with you a half-dozen times apiece?” Bard sent a quelling look at his son. “Or you could ask them to read with you, or help with your homework.”

“Really? And they’ll do it?” Tilda asked with a hopeful look towards the boys.

“They’ll do it,” Bard nodded, and under their fathers’ pointed looks, both boys nodded in agreement. “So think about what you want to ask them to do, and we’ll decide at supper. Right now, you’ve got to get ready for school, and Thran’s got to get ready for his audition.”

The impending trip to the bus ended any further discussion about the nights’ transgressions, and the morning routine resumed once again.

As Bard and Thran walked home from the bus stop, Bard asked, “Did you sleep at all after Tilda came in?”

He nodded. “Our bed is large enough that the little one did not keep me awake for long. She does not thrash as Legolas did when he was small.”

“Oh, that’s good. I was concerned that you’d be ragged out for your audition this morning, so I’m glad you’re not.”

“I am fine.” The tall dancer turned to Bard. “How did you know that the boys were the culprits responsible for Tilda’s noise last night?”

Bard laughed wryly. “A father’s instinct. Yours will be up to snuff before long. It was Legolas who gave it away, if you want to know for next time. He hasn’t had as much practice holding a poker face as the other three have. And his ears turned bright red as soon as I looked at him.”

“Ah,” Thran nodded sagely. “I noticed the red ears, but was still puzzled about the reason for them when you sorted out the cause. I will learn soon, as you say. But I liked how we supported each other, Bard. I have heard it said that parents must present a unified front to misbehaving children, and now I know what that means. It was a good lesson for me.”

“We did well, all round,” Bard agreed. “The Prince of Ice glare was perfect. I hope you never look at me like that. I’d melt.”

Thran linked arms with Bard. “I like to melt you, but I have better ways to do so. I cannot wait until the next time I have that privilege.”

“Not until Friday,” Bard grinned. “Meanwhile, you need to get to your audition, and I need to paint. I won’t be able to get Tilda’s room done completely today, but I want to get the yellow paint done, anyway. And since we have a couple of grounded children this weekend, I just might put them to work.”

“A good way to burn off so much creative energy,” Thran agreed. “What will you have them do?”

“There’s a lot of stuff in the yard they could clean up – sticks out of the trees, and such. That reminds me – we can’t use the fireplaces until I get in a chimney sweep. Are you okay with me calling one today? It’d be nice to use the fireplace in the sitting room, especially. I like a fire, and then there’s popcorn, marshmallows, and so forth.”
“Of course; that would be wonderful,” Thran nodded at once. “I have never had a fireplace before. Or toasted a marshmallow. I would like to.”

“Marshmallows don’t taste like much, but they’re fun to make,” Bard admitted as they left their coats in the mudroom. “I like the toasted part best. I’ll show you how to toast them twice to get more toasted part than goo.”

“It sounds like fun,” Thran agreed, hanging up his coat and slipping off his boots. “But now, I must hurry. My audition is at nine-thirty, and I do not want to appear late or frazzled.”

“Go get yourself ready, angel,” Bard pointed Thran towards the stairs. “There’s not much to sort out down here, and then I’ll lay about with a paintbrush.”

The caress of long, elegant fingers across his back sent a shiver down Bard’s spine as Thran went past him to head upstairs. He busied himself washing out the porridge pot and putting away the leftover fruit and raisins. Since Thran would be home in time for lunch, he put a couple of chicken breasts in water to simmer, so that they’d be done whenever Thran got home. It would take only a few minutes more to add sliced vegetables and spices to give them a fresh, warm lunch whenever they chose to have it.

“I am ready,” Thran called, reappearing in the kitchen in his tights and practice top. He pulled on leggings and a pair of sweaters over top, and filled his water bottle from the tap and placed it in his bag. “Or as our children are so fond to say, I am off, and I leave, too.”

Snickering, Bard gave Thran a goodbye kiss. “And as we’re so fond of saying, do your best today, just like always. I hope you nail it, even if it’s ultimately not the position you want.”

“I will do my best, for there is no point to do less,” Thran shrugged, heading to the mudroom with Bard trailing behind him. He pulled on his boots, let Bard help him with his coat, and collected the keys to the SUV from the row of hooks. “I will text you when I am about to start for home.”

“That’d be good. I’m making soup for lunch, so I’ll know when to add the veg.”

“Perfect,” Thran nodded. He gave Bard one last kiss. “Now, I go. I should see you near one, I think.”

Bard nodded. “Knock ‘em dead, angel.”

With a smile, Thran headed out, and Bard shut the door behind him with a smile.

He gave Thran ten minutes to make his way away, then Bard opened his husband’s laptop on the kitchen table. When he’d accessed the web, he typed T-H-E – K-I-N-G-‘S – B-I-T-C-H into the search engine.

Before long, he was reading a very strange short story on a site hosting fiction works of dubious merit. The erotic graphics of the site’s home page alone reeked of overkill. It didn’t take long before he echoed Thran’s incredulous laughter, but he kept reading. When he’d finished, he read it a second time. Despite the lurid and improbable premise, it wasn’t hard to see what had drawn his husband to such a thing. Nor did he have to search for The Spoils of War. He knew exactly what idea Thran intended for their game, and which part each of them would play. He wiped the search history as Thran had taught him to do, and made sure everything was shut down completely before he closed the laptop. Then he considered as he started painting. If he put aside the more ridiculous elements of the plot, what remained was tempting. Very tempting, indeed.

There was no question which of them would be the bitch – that suited Thran to a tee. So just what sort of king would Bard choose to be? What was a good counter to Thran’s start to Round Three, The Spoils of War? And how should he begin Round Four?

He arranged for a chimney sweep to come out tomorrow morning, and got through two walls before the answers came to him. This time, his laugh wasn’t incredulous, but full of anticipation.

Friday afternoon was looking better and better.

* * *

Thran’s audition proceeded as he expected. The best part about it was the surge of delight that swept over him to be back at the dance he so loved. This company was well respected, more open-minded than many, and if it offered him a position, he’d be sorely tempted to accept it, despite the long commute he’d endure six days a week. He had worked with this ballet master once before, and got along well with her. The choice of roles tended more to the extravagant ones he preferred, and the compensation was among the best. He didn’t have to feign excitement as he chatted with others taking part, and he saw several dancers he knew moving to and fro. This would be a good, challenging yet comfortable position that would please him for some time. So despite his eagerness about his Monday audition with the UltraViolet Ballet, he had mixed feelings as he drove home.

It did him no harm to wait until early next week to decide anything. He still had two auditions left, and it would take some days before any of the companies got back to him with offers or rejections. So he let his mind consider everything that had happened in both auditions as well as his meeting with Irmo Lórrien as he drove home.

“Bard, I am back!” he called as he came in the mudroom door.

“Welcome home! I’m upstairs!” came the reply, so Thran shed his coat and boots and went to join his husband.

“Did everything go well?” Bard asked with some concern as he climbed off his ladder. “I checked my mobile, thinking I missed your text, but I didn’t get one.”

“Tcha,” Thran tsked, annoyed at himself. “My apologies, lyubov moya. All went so well during my audition that I was distracted, and I forgot to text you that I was on my way home. Such a nice color for our Tilda! And all four walls done!”

“Just the first coat,” Bard amended. “Still, that’s good progress. I should have the second coat done this afternoon. I’ll still have the woodwork to do tomorrow, so we may have a small guest with us tonight. But she’ll have her own room back tomorrow night.”

“We will manage,” Thran shrugged, unconcerned. “So it looks as if my arrival comes at the right moment for us to make lunch, yes?”

“Yes,” Bard agreed wholeheartedly. “I’m starved. Do you want to shower and change first while I add the veg?”

“I will help you this afternoon,” Thran demurred. “So there is no point for me to wash but so much now. So I will change into work clothes, and help with the soup and the rest of lunch, and tell you about my audition.”
“Good, I want to hear how it went, and what was different about it compared to the other one.” Bard gathered up his roller and brush and followed Thran out of Tilda’s room. “I’ll wash up the brushes, and see you in the kitchen.”

“I hear and obey, my saint,” Thran agreed, and ducked into the closet to find the old pair of jeans and shirt that he wore to paint in. In a few minutes, he was chopping vegetables for the soup, and Bard was mixing biscuit dough. As they worked, he described his audition and how good it felt to get back to his art.

“Soon you will feel the same excitement, perhaps,” Thran ventured, “when you begin to work your metal again.”

“I already feel that way working on the house, but I will even more so when I get back to sculpting and such,” Bard agreed. “I have a mess out in the barn – I haven’t been able to work there for over eight years, and it needs a good cleaning. Some of my equipment needs a good cleaning and checking, too, so I have lots to do. But my acetylene torch is still out there and in good repair, so I can work on smaller pieces right away. But we’ve got a few rooms to get through first.”

“It all comes along well,” Thran insisted. “The second floor becomes more beautiful each day.”

“It does. Our room will take a bit longer, I think. It’s bigger, and there’s the closet, and that special blue paint might be harder to apply than the regular kind. I want to look on the web to see if any of the DIY sites have any tips about putting it on.”

“DIY?” Thran repeated.

“Do It Yourself,” Bard explained. “That’s me, in a nutshell.”

“You do better work than many professionals,” Thran assured him. “And you are much less messy.”

“It’s always easier to do a better job when it’s your house,” Bard grinned. “Oh, by the way... to end Round Three, to counter ‘The Spoils of War,’ I offer you this: ‘The Garret is a Prison Cell.’”

“Oooh,” Thran grinned in anticipation. “I like that one. And how do you propose to begin Round Four?”

Bard gave him a long, considering stare and a sly smile. “‘The Bitch is Naked.’”

Thran’s grin was entirely too wide. “Oh, tcha, that is too easy, as I intended to be. Try again.”

“Oh, you’ve already claimed the role, have you?”

“It fits me. You cannot deny it.”

“And then some.”

“So leave the trappings, or lack of them, perhaps, to me.”

“On your head be it. All right, let me think... um, how about this? ‘The Bitch’s Children are Portents for the King.’ Do you like that better?”

“Ah, that one is very good! It addresses the one part of the role I admit I found difficult to understand, as I do not want to deliver children myself, nor does such a thing make sense to me, even in a story. But portents.... oooh, yes, that is perfection!”

“And do you have a counter now, or do you need to consider?”
“The rules of our game were that we must wait until our next meeting for my answer. I want to think about it, besides.”

“That’s fine.” The oven timer dinged, so Bard took out their biscuits. “How’s the soup?”

“Ready, though the carrots are still a little crisp. As I like them that way, it is no hardship for me to eat it now.”

“I’m fine with that, too. Butter or honey with your biscuit?”

“Mmm,” Thran considered. “Perhaps honey. I have not tried them that way yet.”

“Righto. I’ll get the honey while you dish up the soup.”

They sat down to lunch, and they talked about Thran’s auditions and Bard’s metal through two bowls apiece. It was a simple thing, to have a good meal with his saint, to see Bard’s rejuvenated spirit shine through his eyes, to laugh and talk about anything and everything, but it was a treasure, nevertheless. Nothing would please him more than if his life with his saint were always so blessed.

After lunch, work continued on Tilda’s room. By now, Thran had learned he was most helpful if he plied the roller to cover the walls evenly while Bard did the more exacting work around the woodwork. He recalled how much time Sigrid had spent to apply painter’s tape around the trim to keep from streaking paint in places it didn’t belong, such as wall paint on the trim, or trim paint on the walls. Bard had such a steady, careful hand that he didn’t have to tape much. Perhaps it was his artist’s training that gave him that skill. He got Bard to talk about his time in art school, the different kinds of training he’d received, and why he’d chosen to work in metal as opposed to oils or ceramics.

“I do work in clay some of the time,” Bard said, as he sat atop the ladder to paint between the crown molding and the window frame. “When I work on Rahmiel, I’ll do the models in clay first, small ones first, then larger ones. That lets me play around with the proportions and the positioning before I get to the metal.”

“You will cast that piece, yes?”

Bard nodded. “That’s right. I make the clay model, then I make what’s called the mother mold of it. It’s made out of something flexible, either polyurethane or silicon rubber. I use the mother mold to make a ceramic mold, which takes a lot of steps, but that ceramic mold is what I use to actually cast the metal.”

“How many pieces can you make from the ceramic mold?”

“Just the one. It’s the lost wax method, and the ceramic mold is destroyed to free the cast metal piece. If I want to make another one, I have to go back to my mother mold and make another ceramic one.”

“So each piece is different.”

“That’s right. One of a kind.”

“Is the piece solid, then?”

“Some small ones can be. But larger ones are usually done in pieces that I weld together after they’re cast. There’s a lot of finishing to do so the seams disappear. After that, all I’ve got is a raw metal piece. The patina goes on after.”
“You can do all this in the barn?”

“I can do small pieces out there, start to finish. The bigger ones, I can do the armature and clay, even make the mother molds, but I have to contract the casting out. I don’t have the capacity to cast a life-size piece, for example, unless I did it in very small pieces, and that’s not productive. That’s why I need commissions, so I can afford to get big pieces cast.”

“Hope the Lope is a cast piece, yes?”

Bard nodded again, then climbed off the ladder to move it over for the next piece of wall. “But the stair balusters are smithed, and so is Alexander's Downfall, the knot sculpture. And the Ring Thing. The trunk of the pine tree is cast and welded together, and the needles are forged and smithed.”

“And yet the needles move in the breeze,” Thran marveled. “It looks so lifelike even though it is made of hard metal.”

Bard smiled at Thran’s praise. “That one was the devil to get the needles right. The first three or four tries didn’t work out, but when I finally got it right, it was something special. I just had to keep at it.”

“It will look beautiful in our Japanese garden. Perhaps with small stone lanterns nearby?”

“That would look good at night, with the lanterns lit. I wonder if there are lanterns with solar cells in them so that they’d light every night, without us having to put candles in them?”

“I do not know.” Thran eyed the swath he’d just rolled, and rerolled down the middle to smooth out a bubble. “We will add it to our list. I would like the lanterns to light themselves each night as if by magic, without waiting for us to do so. A garden designer might know if there is such a thing, yes?”

“True. We can ask Sam about it.” Bard climbed down from the ladder. “I’ve got the top done on this wall. I’ll do down the corner if you want the ladder.”

“I will use the ladder. And I think I have the counter to end Round Four, my saint.”

Bard paused in his painting. “Oh? What sparked that?”

“The idea of things that seem to happen by magic, without conscious thought. Once a solar cell stores enough energy, it makes a light appear in the dark regardless, yes?”

Bard nodded. “So what’s your counter?”

“’The Bitch Does Not Choose the King.’ ”

Bard was thoughtful as he repeated Thran’s counter to himself under his breath. “Hmm. That’s... interesting.”

“Acceptable?” Thran asked, looking down from the ladder at his husband.

Bard considered it in silence as he painted the corner between the two walls from top to bottom. Thran concentrated on his roller while Bard thought; he covered half the wall between window and corner before a curious smile crossed Bard’s face. He paused in his rolling to regard Bard with an arched eyebrow.

“I can live with that,” Bard nodded at last. He slid his gaze to met Thran’s eyes. “The question is whether you can or not.”

Thran went back to his rolling with an arch grin. “It will be delirious to find out, will it not?”
Bard snorted as he turned back to the wall. “You’re going to kill us both.”

That might be true, if anticipation didn’t do so first.
Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint share a little sweetness and a lot of labor. Afterwards, they reward themselves with a little fantasy. The game is afoot!

Chapter Notes

The guys venture into a little alpha/omega dynamics in their fantasy, so if this isn't your thing, be advised.

J.K. Rowling still owns all the rights to "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone." I just enjoy it!

Dinky Farm isn't a real game. I just made it up :-)

Translation Notes:

Braw = fine (Scottish)

Bard and Thran worked steadily to finish the second coat of paint on Tilda’s walls. It was a big help to have someone else working with him, so that as soon as he cut in the paint around all the woodwork, Thran rolled paint on the rest of the wall immediately, which kept the edges from looking streaky. Thran was a good soul to work so diligently; Bard still hadn’t gotten used to how such an eminent and gifted dancer was happy to learn, much less do, painting and scrubbing and so many other mundane things, without ego or reluctance. That as much as anything revealed how much Thran loved the family they’d made, and wanted to contribute more than money.

Money... for an instant, Bard’s old worries resurfaced, but he sternly banished them. Thran had no issues about money, and since he was currently the one with the money, if he had no issues, then Bard shouldn’t, either. He would continue to do his part by doing as much work on the house himself as he could, and keeping a careful eye on what money he spent. The amount he’d saved just in painting costs alone so far was substantial, and until he got back to his metal, that would be his contribution.

It was after four when they finished the wall paint. Bard decided to go right into the woodwork, concentrating on the baseboard so that it would be well dry in time to work on the floor tomorrow. After last night, he didn’t want to delay Tilda’s return to her room. He gave even odds as to whether she’d stay in the children’s study all night as it was, and the best thing to help settle her was to get her back into more familiar surroundings. To speed things along, Thran taped off the floor so that Bard could prime faster, though he still had to be careful along the top edge. He didn’t want to tape the freshly painted wall and risk the tape peeling off any of the yellow that would require him to go back later and retouch. He got all of the baseboard molding done before the children clattered in from school. Tilda came right upstairs to see how her room was progressing, and was excited to see the walls done.

“It’s nice and bright, and it matches my mural,” she said, looking around. “Just woodwork and floor left!”

“That’s right,” Bard smiled, smoothing one last brushful of paint on the baseboard, then straightening. “If all goes well, I’ll finish the paint tomorrow. I’ll need help with the floor, though.”

“Everyone will help,” Tilda nodded firmly. “We all helped in the other rooms, so we’ll help in mine.”

“Good enough,” Bard nodded. “Thran did a lot of your walls, too, little doll. That got us through a lot faster.”

“Thank you, Thran,” Tilda looked up at Thran shyly. “Is it okay... if I call you Ada, like Sigrid does?”

Thran stooped beside Tilda. “I would be very honored if you did, but only if you want to.”

She nodded. “I want to. You helped me not to be scared last night. And you go to the cheese shop with me. Both of those are nice.”

“You make me very happy, Tilda. I would like to give you a hug. May I?”

She nodded, smiling. A lump grew in Bard’s throat when his tall and elegant husband put long arms around Tilda and hugged her close. She snuck arms around Thran’s ribs and hugged him just as close.

“You are moya malen’kaya kukla,” Thran murmured, rubbing her back. “My little doll.”

Tilda looked at Thran with considering eyes. “It takes a lot of words to say ‘little doll’ in Russian.”

Thran grinned, but there was no disguising his pride. “So it does. So perhaps I should just call you Kukla. That means doll. Or Russian doll is Russkaya Kukla. Which one do you like?”

“Russkaya Kukla is funny. I like that. Or Kukla, like the puppet. I liked Kukla best.”

“He is a very old puppet, but very cute, like you,” Thran nodded. “I watched videos of him when Legolas was little, to help him learn English. He was my favorite, too. So we are agreed, then. Now we will clean up, and then your Da will organize us for our supper, yes?”

“Okay,” Tilda nodded. “See you downstairs in a minute, Da and Ada.”

Tilda trotted out. Thran got to his feet, and had to swallow hard when he met Bard’s eyes. Smiling, Bard put his arms around Thran.

“She got you, didn’t she?”

“Oh, she most certainly did. I am quite overwhelmed.”

Thran buried his nose in the crook of Bard’s neck, and Bard rubbed his husband’s back slowly. “You earned it, cariad. Children don’t lie about their affections. Thank you for looking out for my children so well.”

It was a moment before Thran spoke. “You look out for Legolas, too.”
“I do. I hope he’ll come to trust me the way Sig and Til trust you. But he’s still learning how to be in a family yet. Believe it or not, his little escapade last night is a good sign that he’s coming out of his shell. He’ll warm up to me in time.”

“I hope so.”

“It’s an odd thing about children. Girls warm up to their fathers, and give their mothers hell. Boys warm up to their mothers, and give their fathers hell. Same sex rivalry, I suppose. So Bain and Legolas will be slower to give us an inch than the girls.”

Thran eased out of Bard’s arms, tightening his hands on Bard’s shoulders before letting him go. “As you say. When the zombie apocalypse game is out of the penalty box, I will try it again with Bain, to help him get to know me. We must find something like that for you and Legolas to do.”

“I’m not very good with those games,” Bard admitted. “I never had much time to play with Bain when I was the night super. But I could give it another go. Maybe there’s one that we could play four players in teams.”

“We will ask. Then you and I will learn together. We are done here for now, yes? Do you want me to take the brushes downstairs to wash?”

“I’ve got the paint capped, so we can clean up. Oh, the chimney sweep is coming tomorrow morning.”

“Good. If all goes well, perhaps this weekend we can have a fire.”

Bard grinned. “You mean, one after whatever we get into tomorrow afternoon?”

Thran made a purring sound as they headed downstairs. “Perhaps one not so hot as that, lyubov moya. We do not want to burn down the house.”

“We’ll need to put the boys to work in the yard. We’ll have enough wood to make a fire only after they clean up the back yard.”

“Do we have marshmallows? Popcorn?”

“We’ll put them on the list for Saturday’s rounds,” Bard said as they came into the kitchen.

“So we will plan for the fire on Saturday,” Thran suggested. “Welcome home, Legolas, Bain, and Sigrid! How was school today?”

“Hi, children!” Bard echoed. “I’m just washing out the brushes, then I’ll be back.”

The afterschool bustle clattered on as the children talked about their day, unloaded lunch bags, and sorted through papers around the kitchen table. It wasn’t long before Bard joined them, checking that no one had permission slips or information cards that he or Thran needed to fill out. Once everyone had sorted out what homework needed to be done and Thran had brought out the cheese and crackers and fruit, Bard looked to Tilda.

“Tilda, have you thought about what you’d like Legolas and Bain to do in apology for last night?”

The boys immediately sobered, casting glum looks at each other. Sigrid smothered a smile, but Tilda gave Bard a solemn nod. “I would like Legolas to read with me six times, and help me with my French words six times. And I would like Bain to play Dinky Farm with me six times.”
“No, Tilda, not Dinky Farm!” Bain shouted, but between Bard’s stern look and Thran’s icy glare, he quickly lowered his voice. “Oh, Da, please, not Dinky Farm. That’s so lame.”

“I like it,” Tilda said stubbornly.

“Da, no!” Bain pleaded.

“I’m fine with your choices, Til,” Bard decided, looking to Thran. Bain was crestfallen when Thran nodded his approval. “But you’ll have to wait for a week for the game, Tilda, as gaming’s off limits to the boys for a week.”

“That’s okay,” Tilda nodded.

“Good enough. What do you think, Thran?”

“How long does a game of this Dinky Farm take to play?”

“About an hour.”

“Then Legolas, to be fair, you will read with Tilda at least half an hour each time, and help her with her French words at least half an hour each time. Of course, you may take more time with either, as you prefer.”

“Yes, Father,” Legolas answered. Bard smothered a grin; Legolas was learning to recognize that protesting gained him only more penance to pay.

“Then so it will be,” Thran held up his hands to signal an end to the matter. “So, Captain Bard, what are your orders for supper tonight?”

“Grilled hamburgers and chicken tonight?” When that met with a chorus of enthusiasm, they settled who wanted what, and preparations began. While Bard put rice with lime and cilantro on to steam, Thran and Sigrid prepped veg for the steamer, Legolas shaped hamburgers, and Bain laid the table. The hamburgers and chicken went on the grill, with the veg shortly thereafter, and soon the family was assembling sandwiches and spooning rice and veg. Now that last night’s shenanigans had been addressed, the conversation returned to its usual lively banter replete with laughter. Cleanup commenced quickly, then homework. Everyone finished early enough that Bard headed upstairs to continue with his painting. He got through the door and window frames before the children began to cycle through their showers.

“Only the top molding remains?” Thran asked, as he came in to look around.

“That’s it. If I start early tomorrow morning, I should be able to get the rest done before lunch. I’ll have to get the sweeps started, too, but they won’t need me once I show them the three fireplaces.”

“Will they be here after lunch?” Thran asked innocently, but a crooked smile on his lips gave away the reason for his question, drawing an equally perverse smile from Bard.

“They promised to be done by noon,” Bard assured his husband. “So your doom in the garret is set.”

Thran’s chuckle was low. “I certainly hope so. Oh, which room did you mean to choose, lyubov moya? The empty one, or the one with your poor bed in it?”

“The empty one. I’m still hoping for a game of starving artist and his model in the other one.”

“Oooh, another delight to anticipate,” Thran’s pale hand sketched a caress over Bard’s chest, then lower. “But I cannot imagine that one yet. Tomorrow’s delight beckons first.”

“Do you need another round, or are we set as is?”

Thran shook his head as he added a kiss on Bard’s ear to the tracings of his hand. “I would not want to limit either of us too much.”

“Stop it, you bastard,” Bard breathed, backing away a step, before his cock got too interested in Thran’s teasing. “Keep it for tomorrow.”

“If you insist,” Thran grinned without apology. “If I cannot tease the painter, then perhaps the painter will explain what this Dinky Farm is that Bain hates so much.”

Bard capped the paint can, and carried his brush downstairs to wash out, Thran trailing behind him. “It’s a fun little game, to be honest. Each player gets a plot of land, and you have to build up a small farm with different crops and animals. Tilda can play it by herself, but it’s also got a multiplayer mode where you can barter with other players. You can trade your produce for seeds to get crops you don’t have, or a beehive that gives you honey to trade, or eggs that turn into chickens. When you get enough produce, you open a farm stand, and then you get money that you can use to buy more things for your farm, or put in the bank. The goal is to try to build a better farm than the other players. It’s for younger children, so it’s not that complicated, but I like it better than zombie apocalypse.”

Thran hummed as he tore off a couple of paper towels for Bard to blot his rinsed paintbrush. “That one sounds useful – how to make something more out of what one starts with.”

“The only red stuff you make is when you turn the strawberry crop into jam,” Bard grinned.

“Which makes it unacceptable to a teenaged boy, of course,” Thran shook his head.

“Of course. What time is your audition tomorrow?”

“Nine a.m. I will be up early tomorrow, also. I will have to leave just after seven to make sure I arrive on time.”

“Then I’ll handle the bus stop duties. Porridge for you?”

“But no tea, please.”

“I well understand. Do you want to throw anything in the washer tonight, or do you have enough clean stuff for tomorrow?”

“I am well supplied. I will pack my things tonight to make sure I am ready to leave on time tomorrow.”

Bard took the paper towels Thran had ready. “In another week, I hope things will be a bit more settled. I’ll have most of the second floor done, and you’ll know more about where the dance will take you. I feel bad for leaving you with all of the homework duty.”

“No more than I do to leave you with the bus duty. We know we both work to better our lives together, and we will come to our rhythm soon. It is much work, yes, but it is exciting all the same. Each day brings us closer to less preparation and rehearsal, and more polished performance.”

“That’s a good way to look at it,” Bard conceded. “All right, everything’s clean and ready for me to start tomorrow.”
“Then let us check our children, and make sure they make good progress tonight.”

They headed upstairs, to find Legolas reading from Harry Potter and the Sorcerer’s Stone to Tilda. He had not read any of the series, and he looked so interested in the story that the penance of reading to her for three hours would likely not be much of one. That bothered Bard not one bit. Bain was just finishing his shower, and when he heard what Legolas was reading, he came into the children’s study to listen. Sigrid was in her room, on her mobile talking to Finn. It was still early, but Bard took advantage of the quiet to shave and shower so that he’d get to bed early. He took Thran’s place in the study to listen as Legolas read, snuggling Tilda on his lap atop her bed. Thran rejoined them when he was clean and dry, and listened until it was time for bed.

“Oh, it’s just two more pages until the end of the chapter,” Legolas protested, which drew a smile from both Bard and Thran.

“Then let’s go until the end of the chapter,” Bard agreed. When the two pages were done, Legolas closed the book with regret.

“This is a good story,” he admitted.

“It is,” Tilda nodded. “We have all of them. You can read them yourself if you want, after your three hours.”

“I want to. Thanks, Tilda.”

“Thank you for reading to me.”

“Thank you for reading to all of us,” Thran added. “I want to read these for myself, too.”

“When we get to the one with the Russian school in it, Durmstrang, will you read those characters?” Tilda asked. “You can do the right accent.”

“He could do the French characters, too, or Legolas can,” Bain added. “Remember? Beauxbatons is the French school.”

“That’s right!” Tilda exclaimed. “I forgot. That would be fun.”

“We could read in the sitting room around the fireplace,” Bard commented. “The chimney sweeps are coming tomorrow. If they can get the fireplaces up to snuff, and if the boys get enough stuff cleaned up from the yard, then Saturday we can have a fire while we read. We can show Legolas and Thran how to toast marshmallows, too.”

“Marshmallows?” Sigrid asked, coming across the landing to the study. “Who’s got marshmallows?”

“We might, on Saturday,” Tilda told her.

“Chimney sweeps are coming tomorrow,” Bard reiterated. “So maybe the fireplaces will be ready to use.”

“Sweet!” Sigrid grinned. “Better put marshmallows on the Saturday list.”

“Already noted,” Bard assured her. “Now, time for bed, all. Thran’s got an early audition, and I’m starting on Tilda’s woodwork early, hoping to get her room done tomorrow. You want to finish the week strong, too, so let’s get to it.”

“Yes, Da; Yes, Bard,” the children replied, and soon Bard was the only one in the children’s study.
Tilda returned from the bathroom in time to see Bard turn on her nightlight, and she got into bed without apparent concern.

“I don’t think you’ll hear any thumping tonight,” Bard smiled.

Tilda dimpled. “If I do, I’ll know who it is. Maybe I can get a few more hours of Dinky Farm and reading out of it.”

Bard laughed as he hugged her. “That’s the right attitude, little doll. But if you need to, you know you can come get me.”

“I liked staying with you and Ada. I felt safe.”

“I’m glad. I’ll do my best to get the rest of the paint done in your room, so tomorrow you and Mr. Bun and the rest of your toys will be back where you belong.”

“Where’s Lollybear?”

“Right here. And Tigerstripe, Pickles the Cat, and Nell the Nelephant.”

“Good. I’m set, then.”

“Okay. Thran will be here in a minute to say goodnight.”

“I am here.” Thran squatted beside Tilda’s bed. “Goodnight, Russkaya Kukla. May you have good dreams.”

Tilda held out her arms, so Thran hugged her and brushed a kiss on her forehead. With a big smile, Tilda snuggled under the covers with her arms full of toys. “Goodnight, Ada. You sleep well, too.”

“Thank you, Kukla. I will.”

“Night, Da.”

“Night, Tilda. Sleep well.”

Bard turned out the light, and closed the door. Bain was next, and Bard was gratified that his son didn’t try to wriggle out of his assignment to play Dinky Farm with Tilda. The youth bade a cheerful goodnight to Bard and Thran, so their next stop was Legolas’s room, where the goodnights were just as pleasant. Sigrid was just getting off the phone with Finn, so hugged both her parents, and wished them a good night. Bard and Thran made their rounds to ensure that all was ready for tomorrow in the kitchen, the doors were locked, and the lights were off. Then they retired to their sanctuary.

“We still sleep like puppies,” Bard observed, as Thran nestled close, his head on Bard’s shoulder and his arm across Bard’s chest.

Thran hummed in comfort as he adjusted his position. “I like being warm and close. Tilda is right – it is easy to feel safe when nestled so close.”

Bard grinned in the dark. “I’ll remember that tomorrow afternoon.”

“That is entirely the point of tomorrow,” Thran yawned.

“It’s not entirely the point of tomorrow,” Bard murmured, stroking Thran’s arm.

“Is it not?”
“You like being shameless.”

“You like me when I am, and react quite delightfully in turn. So if acting shamelessly rewards me so well, why would I not relish the chance to indulge us both?”

Bard’s loins stirred obviously enough to draw Thran’s low chuckle. “Gods, I want to indulge us both right now.”

“Save yourself for tomorrow. I quite look forward to it, and to take the edge off now will lessen the urgency tomorrow. The bitch must yearn for his king.”

“The things the king has to do for the good of his people,” Bard sighed, pressing a kiss onto the hair of his husband.

“You suffer mightily.”

“I do. So if I must suffer tonight without indulging, it’s better if I do it asleep.”

“Indeed. Settle yourself, and tomorrow will be here soon enough. We both have labors to undertake before the afternoon is ours.”

Bard stroked Thran’s back and drew the covers a little tighter around him, keeping the cool night air away from the exquisite body that chilled so quickly. “Garu di, cariad.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya, zoloto moyo.”

Bard closed his eyes, and savored Thran’s warmth as sleep descended upon him.

* * *

It seemed as if Bard had only closed his eyes a moment ago before the alarm sounded. He reached over to shut it off, and allowed himself only a deep sigh before he sat up. There would be no dawdling in bed this morning, not with Thran’s audition, the arrival of the chimney sweeps, and his painting to fill the morning. Such a busy morning would find its reward this afternoon, if all got done, so he offered Thran his usual good morning kiss and then headed into the bathroom. Necessities dealt with, he dressed quickly as Thran followed him into the bathroom, then he headed downstairs to begin Friday morning’s prep for the children. Tea, porridge, lunches all got underway. Thran was down soon after in his dance attire to eat his breakfast at once rather than later, in deference to his impending audition. His bag of gear for the audition was already packed and waiting, so he helped Bard finish the children’s lunches while the children ate their breakfasts. Bard downed his porridge, then it was time to see everyone off; Thran would leave to drive into the city as the children left for the bus stop. The children all wished Thran well, and Bard hugged his husband firmly beside the SUV.

“Do your best, just like always,” he wished Thran, smiling. “Even if that means you leave the other dancers and the master stunned and amazed.”

“I will,” Thran grinned, hugging Bard back. “Goodbye, children! I will see you this afternoon, and then it will be the weekend!”

“Bye, Father; bye, Ada!” the children chorused, and waved with Bard as Thran headed out. Once he had pulled out into the lane, the children and Bard walked to the bus stop, and in just a few minutes they bade Bard farewell as the bus lumbered on its trek to school. After a quick goodbye to the other parents, Bard trotted back home. As soon as he got in, he turned up the heat on the third floor, and swept the floor of the empty garret room clean. It was a cheerless little room at the moment, all grey plaster walls; raw, unfinished woodwork; and scuffed, scraped pine floorboards – perfect to act as a bleak prison cell. There was nothing left to do to prepare it for this afternoon, so he trotted downstairs to Tilda’s room. He had painting to finish!

He finished the first coat on the crown molding, and started on the final coat of the baseboard. He got that done and around the first window before a bang on the door signaled the arrival of a single tradesman from Glittering Caves Chimney Sweeps and Fireplace Construction. The sweep was a short, squat, bear of a man, with a thick, grizzled beard and mane of ginger hair, deep brown eyes, and a company shirt emblazoned with his name, Gimli. Bard showed him the three fireplaces – sitting room, main room, and ballroom – and Gimli set up his tools and equipment without further ado.

“‘T is a good thing your ballroom and the main room don’t have rugs I have to worry about,” the sweep said. “Looks like you’ve got debris in at least one of them, probably some beastie’s nest. I think the one in the sitting room’s braw, but I’ll pull back the rug just in case.”

“I’ll help you move it out of the way,” Bard offered, and so that’s where the sweep started. Once the sitting room rug and furniture had been moved back, Bard left Gimli to his cleaning, and hastened back to his painting. Around the windows proceeded, then around the door, and finally the crown molding again. He was almost through when Gimli shouted upstairs that he was done, so Bard hurried downstairs.

“I was right; looks like you had a brace of raccoons in the big ballroom chimney at some point, but they’ve moved on, so I cleaned out all of that. Keep your flue vents closed until you can get yourself some sturdy chimney caps from the local hardware store. Those are just what you need to keep the beasties from crawling in. I’ll write on your invoice what size caps you need.”

“That’s kind of you,” Bard thanked him. “They’re all sound, then?”

“Aye, they’re in good shape, one and all. I added a bit of caulk to the one in the main room, so wait two days before you use that one. But the ballroom one is braw, and so is the one in the sitting room.”

“Good. The children were hoping to toast marshmallows tomorrow night,” Bard grinned.

“How many bairns?”

“Four, from ten to sixteen. And they all like marshmallows.”

“Not the thing for me,” the short man grinned, stroking his wiry beard. “Hard to get that lot of sticky out of my whiskers.”

“I can understand that,” Bard conceded. “They’re too sweet for me, but you can’t tell children that anything is too sweet.”

“True, true,” the sweep laughed. “Especially the wee bairns. All right, Mr. Bowman; here’s your invoice. I can take a check or a credit card.”

Bard dug his wallet out of his back pocket, pulled out the credit card Thran had given him, and handed it over. He got it back with a receipt, and the sweep bid him a smiling farewell. As soon as the door was closed, Bard raced back upstairs to finish the last of Tilda’s woodwork. It was going on eleven-thirty when he finally finished. He capped the paint, folded the drop cloths, collected the detritus, and mopped the floor. Only the floor cleaning and waxing was left to do, and he’d set Clan Ffyrnig on that this evening.

Right now, though, he had a few things to do before his afternoon rendezvous. He trotted out to the barn, retrieved an old wicker basket that had once held laundry, and hauled himself up and down in as many chin-ups as he could manage. He brought the basket back inside, stowed it in the pantry, then sank down on the floor for a few pushups. By the time he couldn’t do any more, he was rank. Good – Thran wanted pheromones; he’d give him pheromones. Panting, he sank into one of the kitchen chairs, propped his feet up on one of the others, and shut his eyes while he caught his breath. All that remained was for Thran to get home.

In barely fifteen minutes, the door from the outside to the mudroom opened.

“I’m in the kitchen,” Bard called. He barely had time to wipe the anticipatory smile off his face before Thran came in. His husband had shed his coat, and he carried his bag of dance things. “How was your audition?”

“Quite vigorous,” Thran replied, bending over to kiss Bard as he stayed slumped in his chair. “Exciting, and quite positive. It would be a good position, without doubt.”

“Which audition piece did you do?”

“Both of them,” Thran said with satisfaction. “I asked which style they preferred, and they wanted to see both. So I did the knives first – though not Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield, I admit – and then the Chopin. They were very impressed. Depending on which companies offer me a position, it may be very hard to choose between them.”

“An enviable position to be in,” Bard observed, as Thran took a large glass from the cabinet and filled it from the sink. Before he could take a drink, though, Bard prowled out of his chair and came to take the glass from him. “Before you guzzle that down, I want to make sure that you’re well after such a rigorous audition. No pulled muscles, no pain, no exhaustion?”

“I am fine,” Thran frowned, regarding his glass of water in Bard’s hand. “I am very thirsty, though, and well ready for lunch. It was a vigorous morning, to be sure. So you may safely give me my glass of water back.”

“Uh-uh.” Bard poured the water out into the sink. “What I will give you is ten minutes to get yourself up to the garret. I want my bitch to be... needy.”

Thran’s eyebrows went up as he looked between Bard and the empty glass. He licked his lips, but those same lips curved up into a perverse expression. “You are rank.”

Bard smiled. “So are you.”

“Ah. Pheromones. You do not want to waste time, it seems.”

“I don’t.”

Silently laughing, Thran took up his bag to go upstairs. “I hear and obey, my king.”

“In ten minutes, we’ll see whether you do or not.”

Thran disappeared. When Bard heard his footsteps on the stairs, he glanced at the oven clock, got the wicker basket, and set about filling it with enough food and water to make a substantial lunch for two—chicken breast, grapes, cheese, half a small loaf of uncut brown bread, and a big carafe of water. He didn’t need plates, utensils, or napkins, but he did snare a battered metal measuring cup. When his ten minutes were almost up, he started upstairs. Thran was nowhere in sight, so he had already taken himself up to the garret. Bard stripped off everything but his jeans, and rummaged through Thran’s clothes until he found a Japanese haori in black. He armed his way into that, but left it hanging open to leave his chest bare. He took one of the blankets off the bed, folded it up, and draped it over his shoulder. Then he took up his basket and headed upstairs.

The door to the empty room was closed. Thran was behind it, waiting for him. As Bard grasped the doorknob, a jolt of anticipation went up his spine before he pushed his way inside. The game was about to begin.

* * *

The seer was huddled in the far corner. He had long white hair, smooth and silky at some point, but bedraggled and ragged now, and a pale, emaciated, birdlike body that was like nothing human the king had ever seen—of course not; seers were rare, unseen by most, even a king of the line. He was naked but for a necklace around his neck, nothing more than a thin chain that held an amulet, but that was the way he’d been found in the dead king’s private chambers.

The cell was rank with the seer’s pheromones—a fertile, frantic wallow of desperation.

The king kicked the door shut behind him, dropped the blanket to the floor, and set the basket on top. Then he crouched down on his heels, close enough to touch the seer. He reached out to trace a single finger along the instep of the seer’s long, elegant foot. The seer flinched away, but as tightly as he’d wedged himself into the corner, there was little room for him to retreat.

“Look at me.”

The seer met his eyes only a second before they flitted away.

“They told me you were beautiful. They were right. Even after two days in here, you’re still beautiful.”

The seer looked up again warily, but stayed in his tight coil.

“You’re hungry, too. Thirsty. Cold. Probably haven’t slept much. Why do you think I’d treat you like that?”

The seer gave a tentative shake of his head.

“Because you’re a seer. A mage. A shaman. One who foretells for the line of kings.”

The seer swallowed and looked away.

“You’re a rare commodity. Valuable. That’s why no one despoiled you when you were captured. I wanted you intact.”

“I am no good to you.” The seer’s voice was whispery. “I cannot see for you. Only my king.”
“My sages tell me that’s not exactly true.”

“Yes, it is. I see only for my king. Where is he? I belong with him.”

“That’s... problematic.”

“What is problematic? I belong with my king. Take me to him. Where is he?”

“His head’s decorating a pike up on the ramparts. I can’t speak for the rest of him. Still want to be with him?”

The seer swallowed, and his eyes flitted around the room, looking for an escape that was not there. The king smiled in anticipation. “I brought water, food, a blanket. It’d feel good to ease your thirst, your hunger, your shivering, yes?”

The seer swallowed hard again, and his eyes stayed to the basket.

“I thought so. All you have to do is answer my questions. Every time you do, you earn a sip of water, a bite of food, a warm blanket. Not so hard, no?”

The seer’s expression couldn’t be more desperate, so the king reached back for a carafe of water and a tin cup. He poured a couple of mouthfuls into the cup and held it out. “The first one is free.”

The seer looked at it, then reached a tentative hand out to take the cup, but the king wouldn’t let him have it.

“I’ll hold the cup for you, pretty bird. All you have to do is sip.”

The seer shifted, finally leaning forward to take the sip eagerly, but it wasn’t much. As he drank, the king caught the amulet he wore. The seer flinched, but the king held fast to the amulet. It was silver, shaped and carved like an eye.

“I’m not interested in hurting you, pretty bird. Just answer my questions. You are a seer, yes? You wear the seer’s eye.”

The seer stared at the cup as he nodded. The king let go of the amulet, poured a larger sip of water in the cup, and held it out. “Come on. I know you’re thirsty.”

When the seer edged closer to drink the water, the king stroked his hair. The seer didn’t flinch as badly as he had when the king had touched his foot.

“They call you Brego’s Bitch. The king’s bitch.”

The seer’s nod earned him another sip of water, and another caress.

“You’re the one who sees the king’s path to victory on the battlefield.”

His nod gained him another sip of water, as well as another caress. This time, he didn’t flinch at all.

“Your portents are supposed to be infallible, yet Brego lost today. What happened?”

The seer looked away. “My king did not ask me to see today for him. I do not know why.”

The king reached into the basket and got out a slab of chicken. He tore off a chunk and held it up.
“Come on. You must be starving after two days without food.”

The seer leaned forward to take the morsel from the king’s fingers. As he chewed, the king continued to stroke his hair. It wasn’t long before the seer’s breath caught as the gentle caresses soothed him. The king offered him another mouthful of chicken, and this time he stroked the seer’s cheek and shoulder.

“Maybe he thought victory was so close that he didn’t have to ask his bitch. Did you see it? Foretell it? The rout of King Brego’s army?”

A shake of the head. “Neither. I am kept away.”

The king offered another bite of chicken. The seer took it eagerly, giving into his hunger. “Away from what?”

The seer shrugged. “All but my king.”

“Why?”

“I see better that way.”

The king reached into the basket, took out a small cluster of grapes, and fed them to the seer one at a time. “How does it happen, your seeing? Does it come to you unbidden, or do you search for one thing or another?”

“I do not direct it. I see what I am shown, when my king... asks.”

The king held out a bit of brown bread, but this time, when the seer opened his mouth, he didn’t hold the morsel out so far, so the seer had to slide closer to take it. He didn’t retreat, but stayed at the king’s knee to wait for the next morsel.

“Oh, your king has to ask? Do you make him beg?”

“It does not work that way. I cannot see until my king... asks.”

This time, when the seer nibbled the bread from the king’s fingers, the king cradled the seer’s chin in his hand. When the seer tried to flinch away, the king held tight. “That’s the second time you hesitated about your king... asking. Tell me how he asks you to see for him.”

The seer’s eyes grew wide, then shut. “It is not something for those who are not kings.”

“I’m the king who put your Brego’s head on a pike, pretty bird.”

“The ability to kill does not make you a king.”

“No, but being of the line does. I know you smell it on me. A seer knows a king’s pheromones.”

“You are no king!”

The king slid back out of the seer’s reach, and took up the carafe with a shrug. “There’s not much water left. If I drink it all, it’ll be another two days before I come back.”

He tilted the carafe up and took a deep drink.

The seer lurched forward, not daring to touch the king, but his hand hovered over the king’s knee as if he wanted to. “Please! I will not last another two days!”
The king paused. “Likely not. So do you admit that I’m from the line, or not?”

The seer gulped. “Yes. Yes. Your scent is from the line.”

“Excellent. We’re making progress.” The king filled the tin cup nearly full and held it out. The seer lurched forward and grabbed the king’s hand with both of his, drinking quickly, but not quickly enough to avoid the king’s hand stroking his fingers, his arm, his shoulder. When the cup was empty, the seer stayed crouched by the king’s leg, his eyes shut as he drank in the caresses.

“This feels good?”

The seer’s eyes remained shut. His nod was reluctant, but it was a nod nevertheless. The king moved away from the seer to sit against the wall. He patted the floor between his knees. “Come.”

The seer shook his head frantically, so the king took up the carafe to drink again, which got a near silent whimper from the seer.

“Come. Or the water’s gone, and so am I.”

The seer crawled between the king’s legs. He curled into a knot as if he tried not to touch the king, but when the king tipped the carafe towards him, the seer drank from it eagerly, deeply, until it was almost empty. While he drank, the king stroked his back, his thigh, his ribs, just light, slow caresses that would flood the seer with endorphins. The seer’s head went back, his breath caught, and his eyes fluttered closed as the sensations pulsed through him. The king set the carafe aside, then pulled the basket close.

“That’s better. It feels so good when a king of the line touches you. You can’t resist it.”

The seer hummed softly, as if the king’s touch had entranced him.

“Tell me how your king asks for your portents.”

“We join.”

“As in... sex.”

“Join one to the other.”

The king offered more chicken, and the seer took the morsel without conscious thought, chewing slowly, eyes still shut.

“So if I want a portent from you, I... join with you.”

The seer shook his head dreamily. “It will do you no good. I see only for my king. I am attuned only to him.”

The king stopped his gentle stroking and stretched his fingers around the seer’s neck. He only rested his hand there, without tightening his grasp, but the implied threat was obvious, and the seer stilled. His eyes were wide and unblinking.

“Brego’s dead. Have I wasted my time to keep you whole for the past two days? Should I put your head beside his?”

With an effort, the seer shook himself out of his reverie, and tried to make a brave face. “I belong with my king.”
“So you do, and so I intend. There’s just the matter of how to break your bond with Brego, and set a new one with me.”

“That does not happen,” the seer replied, but he sounded tentative.

“I’m not stupid, pretty bird. Seers are rare, and their powers are too great, too valuable to sacrifice when a king dies. Seers pass from one king to the next like the treasures they are.”

Swallowing, the seer tried to pull away, but the king took hold of his amulet to hold him close, and continued his slow, gentle stroking with his other hand until the seer’s resistance melted with a soft moan. In reward, the king released his hand on the seer’s amulet.

“The reason I isolated you here for two days wasn’t just to deny you food and water. I wanted you starved for pheromones, too. They’re what bind a seer to a king, aren’t they?”

“You lie,” the seer whispered, but his voice was shaky.

“Do I? After just two days away from Brego, your body craves a king’s pheromones so badly that it’s pumping out its own, telling anyone of the line within range that a receptive bitch is near. The scent is overwhelming. So here I am, rank and reeking of just what you crave, and you’re already melting. In an hour, your old bond will be so weak that you’ll be half mine without either of us doing anything else. But I don’t want just half of you. I’ve got a kingdom to care for, and unlike your dead bastard king, I want to do a good job of it. So tell me how I strip Brego’s bond from you and replace it with mine, so that I have all of you. I’m not a cruel master unless provoked, and I’d prefer to be gentle with you, but it’s your choice.”

The seer trembled in the king’s arms. His trembling worsened when the king eased him against his chest and put arms around him. “Pretty bird, you’ll die if I leave you here for another two days. Alone, cold, starving, thirsty, and not the least trace of the pheromones you need.”

“It... calls for... three parts,” the seer said faintly, curling tighter against the king’s chest and wrapping arms around him. He rubbed his cheek against the king’s chest.

“Three parts.”

The king stroked and petted. “Good, pretty bird. You deserve a reward.”

He pulled the blanket within reach, and settled it around the seer in his arms. The seer heaved a shuddering sigh of pleasure, pulling the blanket tightly around them as he snuggled more deeply into the king’s embrace.

“Mmm,” the seer breathed. “So warm, so warm...”

“It feels good to be so warm in my arms, doesn’t it? Are you still hungry?”

The seer nodded. So the king fed them both little bits of food, making sure to keep stroking and touching and caressing the seer under the blanket as they ate. He wouldn’t let the seer take the food from his own hands, insisting that the seer take each bit only from his fingers, so that he’d look to him for every need, every pleasure. When the food was gone, he kept stroking and touching, but now he began more erotic touches, stroking a nipple, or tracing a finger down the seer’s abdomen, as he sought to make the seer his own. The first time he touched the seer’s crotch, the seer whimpered and tried to close his legs, but the king was firm, stroking until the seer relaxed under his touch. Before long, the seer’s legs fell open without encouragement, and the king could do as he pleased. In
The seer’s fingers strayed to the king’s chest and stroked gently, as if he weren’t sure what reaction he’d get.

“That’s right, pretty bird. I’m not going to hurt you. I want to treasure you, protect you, like the jewel you are.”

“It hurts,” the seer whispered. “I do not want it to.”

“What hurts, pretty bird? How do I hurt you?”

“The old bond. It fights against you. It does not want to let me go.”

“Tell me how to break it, so it doesn’t hurt you.”

“Open. I am not open.”

“What opens you?”

“Remain gentle, and it will happen on its own. The pheromones shift, and I cannot resist them. When I present, you will know what to do. I must not release, only you.”

“Why only me?”

“Because my release would strengthen the old bond. Open first, then cleanse. Not until attuning does my release strengthen a new bond.”

“I understand, pretty bird. So pale, so graceful, so beautiful a thing you are. A cold cell isn’t the place for you. Think of how warm you’d be in my bed, in my arms. All you have to do is help me break your old bond, and I’ll take you there.”

The seer lay in the king’s arms, soaking up his caresses and body heat, and before long, hiscock stiffened enough that he moaned. His back began to arch, and he nuzzled the king’s chest, nosing for his nipples, then suckling eagerly when he found them. The king teased himself with the seer’s caresses for some seconds, but kept stroking and rousing the seer. He was soon rewarded when pale fingers fumbled to unfasten his breeches. As warm lips descended on his cock, the king pulled away the blanket to savor the sight of the seer’s pale, naked body crouched over him. Somewhere in the tangle of disarrayed white hair that flowed over the king’s hips and onto the floor, the seer’s eager mouth sucked and nibbled and kissed the king’s cock. The seer’s amulet dangled low enough that it occasionally trailed against the king’s balls, adding more arousal to the eager sucking mouth that had such a firm grip on him.

The king reached for the basket, found the jar of oil, and scooped some out. He urged the seer away, who moaned in distress until he saw the king’s erect cock. He sank to the floor, crouching on his elbows and knees, his head abjectly low, his white hair puddled on the floor around him. The king rubbed the oil in his hands, liquefying it, and let the seer see him massage the oil along the length of his cock.

“Not so fast. I don’t want to hurt you.” He rubbed his slicked hands over the seer’s buttocks, massaging and kneading until the seer moaned. When his hands traced between the seer’s buttocks, slicking opening and balls, the seer spasmed, his back arching, his head up and back, his breath coming in short, frantic pants. The king moved behind him, letting his cock rub against the seer to tease him. When he finally slid inside – so, so warm, and tight – the seer shoved his hips back against the king’s thighs with a mewling cry of want. The king wrapped his arms around the seer’s waist and leaned over him, pressing his chest against the seer’s back. He wound one hand in the hair at the base of the seer’s nape, keeping the seer’s head up and his back arched as the king stroked him. The seer reacted as if he were a feral animal giving himself mindlessly to the rut, widening his knees, rocking back against the king’s thighs. With such an eager, unresisting partner, it didn’t take the king long to stroke himself to release, but he pulled out before he spent himself inside the seer, instead spilling over the seer’s back. He sighed in satisfaction as he rubbed his essence over the seer’s back, balls, and still erect cock.

“You’re well opened now, pretty bird,” the king said, pulling up his breeches. “And well anointed with my scent. That’ll remind you who you belong to when I take you out of here.”

The king grabbed the blanket and the basket in one hand, and pulled open the door. He bent down to take the seer’s amulet in his fist, drawing him up. “Come.”

The seer got to his feet, and followed docilely as the seer led him from the cell to his private chambers. At sight of the immense bed, the seer jerked towards it, but the king drew him up short. He put down the basket, and tossed the blanket on the bed.

“Not yet, pretty bird. Even after two days, you still stink too much of Brego for me to let you into my bed. You need a bath. Once you’re properly stripped of his stench, you’ll take to me all the faster.”

The seer didn’t resist when the king pulled him into the bathroom. The king stripped, and guided the seer into the bath, where he thoroughly washed him, fondling and caressing as he went. The seer’s cock was still hard through most of it, even when the king washed himself. Once they were clean and dry, the king drew the seer close by his amulet, still stroking and petting as he carefully combed the seer’s silky hair smooth. He was such a beautiful creature, so pale, so smooth, so exotic, and he trembled under the king’s hands. Even after the hot bath, his slender body cooled fast. Such a creature likely remained swaddled in bed most of the time to stay warm, and ready for whenever he was needed.

“It’s been a long time since you haven’t been covered in a king’s scent,” the king whispered in the seer’s ear as he combed. “Even worse, you’re opened and cleansed now, unclaimed, ripe to rebond. The urge must be so strong, so hard to resist. Can you smell your pheromones, calling to me? They’re nothing but desperation. Nothing but lust.”

The seer swallowed. “I... oh, gods...”

“Tell me, pretty bird. It’d be awful to go back to that cell so naked, so open, and no way to save yourself.”

“No! You know I am defenseless. I am open, and clean. If a king does not claim me, I will die. I will die.”

“Good. Your choices are clear, then. Will it be my bed, or your old cell?”

The seer bolted out of the bathroom and dove into bed, burrowing under the covers in a flurry of arms and legs. The king let him settle in, swaddling himself in the sheets and blankets, while he leisurely combed his wet hair and dried more thoroughly. When the sound of the seer rooting around in the covers calmed, he came into the bedroom, made sure the oil was within reach, and sat on the edge of the bed.

“Enough pheromones for you, pretty bird?”

“No,” came a distressed whisper. “Please.”
The king stroked the top of the seer’s hair, the only part of him that was visible. At his touch, the seer wormed his way to the king’s side, snaking a hand out from under the sheets and blankets to stroke his ribs. “Please. Please. Do not make me suffer. Claim me.”

As the king thought about where to start, his cock stiffened. He slathered himself with oil before he got into bed, then slid between the sheets to lie on his side. He pulled the seer back against his chest and eased his cock inside the seer before the seer could gasp.

“Mmm,” the king sighed, wrapping arms around the seer’s waist to keep him close. “You’re so tight, and even after a bath you smell like a bitch in heat. It’s maddening. But a quick rut isn’t the best way to attune a seer, is it?”

“Take me now,” the seer whispered, arching back against the king to take him in deeper.

“A quick rut leaves you too much power. Drawing it out gives it all to me. It’s best to keep you well aroused throughout, but not aroused enough to release, until you’re so soaked in my pheromones that you can’t think about anyone else. By the time you do release, my pheromones aren’t the only thing you’ll be soaked in. Once you’re well fucked, body and soul, you’ll be mine, body and soul.”

The king dragged his palms over the seer’s nipples, earning a soft moan. At that soft sound, the king rolled the seer to his belly, covered him as any stud covered a receptive bitch, and stroked himself almost to release before easing them back on their sides. How good it was to wind his arms around that delectable morsel to remain deeply seated, caressing every part of the seer he could reach while his cock calmed into almost softness. He rolled back atop the seer, winding arms and legs around his prize as he thrust himself back to hardness. He lost count of how many times he did that before he smelled the change in the seer’s pheromones from mindless lust to submission to the one who mastered him. Only then did he release deep inside the seer. Even when he slipped out, he held them tightly together, possessive of his prize so recently won. He fell into a doze, vaguely registering the seer rearranging them until the king lay on his back and the seer curled around him, soaking up his warmth. At some point, he woke to feel hands slicking his cock again, and stroking him back to erection. He rolled over, groping to pin the seer beneath him without ever opening his eyes, stroking, then resting against the seer’s chest, stroking again only enough to keep himself inside. The seer was panting, whimpering in frustration as the king slowed again. The king nuzzled one nipple and stroked the other with his fingers until the seer was frantic.

“Attuned yet, pretty bird? Or should I spill inside you again, then rest until I’m ready to take you again?”

“I am yours, my king. Please, please, let me release to set the bond. I die like this.”

“I want a strong bond. I want a bitch who knows whom he belongs to.”

“You have all of me. Please, I beg you. Make me yours now, before I die.”

“On your head be it, pretty bird.” The king pulled out, rolled the seer to his elbows and knees, wormed atop him, and eased his cock back in. He leaned far over the seer, biting just where the seer’s neck met his shoulder to hold them close, then took the seer’s balls in one hand and his cock in hand to stroke him. He teased the seer along until he was sure his own orgasm was imminent, then mercilessly drove the seer to release. The tight spasms around his cock were enough to set him off, and he let himself go with a gasp and a growl. This one felt like it came from the depths of his very existence. He collapsed atop the seer without the energy to heave himself off. When he finally softened, he managed to roll off, but still pulled the seer tightly against his chest.

“The king’s bitch is mine. My bitch.”
“From now until death.”

“What prophesy did our bonding show you?”

The seer shifted, submissive as he curled around the king’s body, deliciously close and warm, and utterly devoted. “That you will be a good king to me and all your people. You will live a long life, your lands will be fruitful and peaceful, and your enemies will vanish before you.”

The king chuckled and stroked his arm. “If I won’t be going to war again, then, what will my pretty bird have to foretell?”

The seer stroked the king’s chest softly. “Even a king needs someone to love him without reservation. I will always be that one. So, my king, close your eyes, and sleep. You are safe with your seer, now and forever more.”

The king might rule his kingdom and his seer, but he obeyed those soft words.

* * *

Thran smiled as Bard fell asleep. Their game had been a delicious one, and he was well teased, well fucked, well loved. Who knew his quiet, down-to-earth husband would take to a little fantasy so well? He made a delicious king – utterly seductive with his stroking and caressing and soft words, still the gentlest of souls, but ruthless about getting what he wanted. He’d outdone himself. The hardest part had been to resist Bard for as long as he had. But he’d managed, if only to encourage Bard to feel safe playing such a game with him. Now his saint was well asleep beside him, with a faint smile on his lips. Thran snuggled him close – gods, how he loved body warmth! – and closed his eyes.

Maybe Bard would consider a rematch in the not too distant future. He wondered what sort of seer Bard might make. The possibilities made him smile as he drifted off.
Chapter 53

Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint take a breather from their games to enjoy a lot of domestic bliss.

The soft strains of Debussy’s “Clair de Lune” roused Thran from his drowsing. Warm and relaxed, he lay with his head on Bard’s shoulder and his arm across Bard’s dark-velveted chest. The soft, mysterious music brought a smile to his lips as Bard stirred, then stretched an arm out towards the clock radio, intending to switch it off.

“Leave it on, lyubov moya,” Thran asked softly, rubbing Bard’s chest slowly. “It is beautiful music to wake up to.”

“It is,” Bard murmured, rolling over to wrap an arm around Thran. “Mmm, you’re warm, and I feel so relaxed.”

Thran grinned. “I must tease you into what hockey players call a hat trick more often.”

Bard’s laughter rumbled up from the depths of his chest. “Gods, that was fun.”

“It was. You were a brilliant king. I am your seer now and forevermore, and anything else you want me to be. So gentle and yet ruthless you were.”

“You were... so many things. Alien, vulnerable, mystical, blind in the throes of rapture, abject slave... all of them so real. Maybe you should think about becoming an actor when you don’t want to dance any more.”

“I suppose it would not be so different from the acting I do when I dance,” Thran murmured comfortably. “For now, though, I reserve my performances for our enjoyment, because it is easy to act with you. I trust you, and we have fun together. You made such a good story for our game! I liked it very much. I knew what to do to add to it very clearly.”

“I liked the part you added about opening, cleansing, and attuning. That was so much more fun than just telling the king to ask the seer if he wanted to join the team.”

Laughing, Thran stroked Bard’s hair. “I had a king eager to do anything for his kingdom. How could I not take advantage?”

“The power behind the throne, to be sure.”

“It was you behind me, as well as atop me, astride me, and in me,” Thran purred, his hands tracing over Bard’s chest. “You can indulge me in those ways anytime you choose.”

“Don’t start, you bastard,” Bard pleaded. “You fucked me dry.”

“I didn’t fuck you. It was you who fucked me, and quite deliriously, three times.”

“A technicality. I’m still dry.”
Thran sighed. “This is the problem to be married to such a delicious husband. I cannot get enough of you.”

“I appreciate that, especially since I have the same problem. But even if I had a drop left in me, we’d have to hold off. I set the alarm for four o’clock, and the children will be home from school any minute.”

“Oh, gods, so they will.” Thran sighed gustily. “Then your ass must wait for its pillaging a while longer.”

“I’ll soldier on somehow,” Bard grinned, sitting up. “Gods, we pillaged the sheets again. Come on, we’ve mere seconds to clean up the mess before we’re inundated with curious children.”

They climbed out of bed, quickly cleaned up and dressed, and managed to get the bed stripped and remade without interruption. Thran ran upstairs to make sure the garret was cleaned up while Bard ran downstairs to throw a load of sheets into the washer – that was the third set this week, which gave Thran something to smile about as he brought Bard’s wicker basket downstairs. There were only a few grapes and meager remnants of brown bread and cheese left, so he wolfed most of it down as Bard returned from the mudroom.

“Here,” Thran said, holding out the last bit of cheese to Bard. “Consume the last of the evidence of our delicious misbehavior. Where does the basket go?”

“Out in the barn. But we can use it in the sitting room to hold wood for the fire, so just set it in there.”

“I shall.” Thran disappeared momentarily to put the basket by the sitting room fireplace, then returned. “We embroiled ourselves so quickly in our game that I did not get to ask about the fireplaces and Tilda’s room.”

“The chimneys have been duly swept. The one in the main room needed some new caulk, so we can use that one in two days. The others are ready now. We just need wood, and of course the children’s marshmallows. I want to give the andirons in the sitting room a good scrape and scrub before we use them, too. That’s for tomorrow.”

“And the paint is done?”

Bard nodded. “Done. I say we put the children to work on the floor with us before supper, and then we can get Tilda back where she belongs.”

“That is a good idea. If we all help, it should not take so long. That will also be the end of the efforts for their sanctuaries, so your pace of renovation will not have to be so incessant.”

“I’ll still push to get their bathroom and our room done. Then I can start to relax a bit more.”

“I will hold you to that,” Thran brushed a hand over Bard’s back. “You work so hard for us all. Come, let us put the sitting room rug and furniture back in place while we wait for the children.”

They’d just set the rug straight when the children clattered in from the mudroom, eager to see what their fathers were up to. As they helped Thran and Bard put the furniture back, Bard divulged the plan for a fire tomorrow night once wood and treats had been acquired. Tilda was eager to get started on her floor, so the plate of cheese and crackers came out with the fruit bowl, and duly accompanied the floor refinishers upstairs. The children changed out of their good school clothes into grubbier play clothes, then talked about the events at school today as they worked. Thran added a summary of his audition, and Bard described the chimney sweep and the pile of raccoon bedding that had come out of the ballroom chimney. In an hour, the floor had been cleaned and waxed, then everyone helped Tilda move her things back into her room. She set Mr. Bun on her pillow with a big smile.

“It’s all done!” Tilda grinned, looking around. “It’s so pretty now!”

“All but the window sashes,” Bard nodded, happy to see his daughter so enthused. “But January’s not the time to pull them out to strip and reglaze. I’ll wait for July for that.”

“That is a hard job?” Thran asked, moving to the window to contemplate the sash.

“Pain in the ass,” Bard shook his head. “Tedious beyond belief. And we’ve got a lot of windows to do. It’ll take me weeks, I’m afraid. We have to decide what color to paint the outside of the house first.”

“Black!” Bain teased as he stripped off his surgical gloves. “With a bright red roof!”

“The grey roof’s brand new, doofus,” Sigrid scoffed. “Da’s not going to paint that anything. And think how hot the house will get if the outside of it’s black!”

“I like it the color it is,” Tilda said. “White.”

“There aren’t very many shutters,” Legolas noted. “They're green. But... not a very... nice green?”

“It’s not at all, Legs,” Bard laughed in agreement. “Washed out, bilious, and all around ugly. I was thinking black ones would look sharp.”

“And a red door!” Tilda offered. “A bright red door.”

“Cranberry,” Sigrid amended. “A deep red, not a tomato red. With Clan Ffyrnig painted on it.”

“And a Welsh dragon,” Bain added.

“Wow, that would be cool,” Bain agreed. “Yeah, Da – a dragon and a double-headed eagle.”

Thran nodded as they trooped downstairs to get ready for supper. “That does sound very nice, children. I like it.”

“So do I,” Bard said. “I know what a Welsh red dragon looks like, but not a Russian double-headed eagle. So we’ll find pictures and I’ll sketch something out. Then we’ll see if any of the locals would like to work a trade – a door design for something we can do.”

“Is that how artists work? In trade?” Thran asked.

“Among ourselves, some of the time. It can mean that the artists doing the trade all get works they can showcase in their portfolios to attract more commissions or sales. And everyone tends to put in a little more work than they might for a straight fee. So it works out all around.”

“We can look for pictures after supper,” Tilda suggested, looking up at Legolas. “Maybe while we read?”

Legolas smiled. “Yes, I’d like to read some more tonight, Tilda. I want to know what happens to Harry next.”
“So do I,” Thran admitted with an exaggerated shrug. “But now, I am hungry. What is for supper tonight?”

The clan set to a supper of chicken Parmesan with noodles, green beans, and kale, with blueberries for the fruit course. As good as the feast was, no one dawdled, because the children wanted to continue on with reading aloud. Once the kitchen was clean and all was put away for the morning, they retired to the sitting room with tea and various desserts to begin their reading.

While Legolas read, Thran and Bard made their list for tomorrow’s errands, and Sigrid scanned her laptop for pictures of Welsh dragons and Russian double-headed eagles. At the end of the chapter, everyone conferred about which pictures they liked best, and Sigrid disappeared upstairs to print pictures of their choices. Bard would have to wait until tomorrow to make any sketches, as he was still out of sketchbooks.

“Then make sure the craft store is on our errand list,” Thran directed. “We forgot to add that. Sketchbooks. And chalk.”

“And a corkboard,” Sigrid added as she came down with the pictures in her hand. “And I hate to say it, but I’m almost out of printer toner.”

“Got it,” Bard scribbled. “The bookstore for Tilda’s books. Marshmallows. I’d better put graham crackers and chocolate bars on the list, too. Someone’s sure to ask for s’mores.”

“S’mores?” Thran questioned. “What is such a thing?”

“Gooey and sweet,” Bard warned Thran with a grimace.

“Yeah, they’re great!” Bain assured Thran. “Have you had them before, Legs?”

“Some of the boys at boarding school had those breakfast toaster pastries with that name. They tasted like sweet cardboard. Is that what they are?”

“Ew,” Tilda grimaced. “Those aren’t real s’mores, Legolas. First you have to toast a marshmallow over the fire, and then you stick it onto half of a graham cracker. Then you smush it flat with a piece of chocolate bar, and then you top that with the other half of the graham cracker. Then you eat it. They’re so good!”

“I think perhaps I will try only a small bite,” Thran said dubiously. “They sound much too sweet for me.”

“Whatever you don’t eat, I’m sure you’ll have any number of children clamoring for the rest of it,” Bard assured him. “So let’s talk about tomorrow. It’d be better to run our errands in the morning before the shops get too busy. Then in the afternoon, we’ve got a couple of grounded lads who need to do some yard work. We can’t have a fire until you two collect some wood for us. And you’ve all got homework. So we’ve got a busy day ahead of us. What would you like for tomorrow’s breakfast?”

The decision was for Egg Puff and Bard’s special Nirvana muffins, so Sigrid headed upstairs to talk to Finn. Legolas offered to read some more, so he, Tilda, and Bain stayed in the sitting room. Thran wanted to hear the story, too, but Bard left them to head up to the attic for a few minutes, soon reappearing with a set of fireplace tools. They were black iron, and clearly Bard's work - the graceful handles were a variation on the main stairway balusters as well as the andirons. He placed the rack of tools at the side of the hearth, ready for tomorrow, then rejoined Thran and the children to listen to the story. After they’d read another chapter, the children started on their baths, and soon after that, Bard and Thran saw the children into bed. Tilda was especially happy, for she was back in her own room.

“It’s so nice, Da and Ada,” she said, bouncing Mr. Bun on her stomach. “I can’t wait to wake up tomorrow and see how bright it looks in the sun. Like a big daffodil, maybe.”

“Maybe,” Bard chuckled. “It’d be nice to plant some daffodils this color in the fall, wouldn’t it?”

Tilda nodded. “I like the small ones with the white petals and the orange cups, too. Not just the yellow ones.”

“We’ll do different kinds, then. But for now, tuck in, and you and Mr. Bun get ready to see the sun tomorrow morning.”

Smiling, Thran collected his hug from his small Russian doll. “Goodnight, Russkaya Kukla. Goodnight, Mr. Bun. Sleep well.”

The boys were both quick to settle, but Sigrid was still talking to Finn on her mobile. When Bard and Thran stuck their heads in the door, she looked up with hopeful eyes.

“Is it okay if Finn comes out tomorrow afternoon? Just to hang with us for a while?”

“That’s fine with me,” Bard nodded, smiling. “You’d better warn him, though. He might get roped into some yard work.”

Sigrid grinned in gratitude. “He won’t mind. Thanks, Da!”

“Welcome. Don’t stay up too late, sweetness. Breakfast’s at nine.”

“Goodnight, Sigrid,” Thran offered her a hug, and Bard after him, and they closed the door on the happy teenager.

As they pulled the pocket doors of their room closed behind them, Bard grinned. “Finn has no idea what he’s in for with my fierce girl.”

Thran walked into the closet to shed his clothes, also grinning. “No, he does not. But he seems a most courteous and kind sort.”

“So he does.” Bard followed Thran into the closet. “We’ll see how they sort out.”

As they clambered into bed together, Thran was happy to wrap his arms around his saint and nestle him against his chest. They rested quietly for a few moments, letting the night settle over them like another blanket.

“I have a confession to make, lyubov moyya,” Thran murmured.

“Oh?” Bard replied sleepily as he rubbed Thran’s arm draped over his ribs.

“I have fallen in love with a woman.”

A chuckle. “Have you? Which one, Sigrid or Tilda?”
“Well... they are both very sweet. But it is the smallest one who has ensnared me most.”

Another chuckle. “If I have to share you with a woman, at least it’s Tilda. She’s very easy to fall in love with.”

“I am quite hopelessly smitten.”

“I forgive you. Even an angel has no defense against Tilda.”

“None at all. I am grateful that you brought her into my life. As well as our fierce Sigrid and our enthusiastic Bain. Thank you.”

“Thank you for our reading Legolas. I think he’s smitten with Tilda, too.”

“Just so. What do you think the chances are that he will read a mere three hours to her? Or even just six?”

“Zero,” Bard exhaled.

“Agreed.” Thran shifted, and stroked Bard’s hair, drawing a hum of contentment from Bard. “I am very happy.”

“Gods, so am I. So am I. Every day is better than the one before.”

Thran kissed Bard’s hair. “It is.”

“Thank the gods for Steffen and his grotty radiators.”

Thran snickered. “I would prefer to thank him for nothing, but you are right. Sleep well, svatoy moy.”

“Sleep well, fy angylis.”

As Thran fell asleep, he smiled. The pheromones of lust were wonderful, but even they didn’t compare to the pheromones of domestic bliss.

* * *

Thran was the first one up the next morning. Bard lay beside him, solidly asleep, drawing a silent hum of appreciation from Thran; his husband was a beautiful man, even asleep, dark curls in his eyes and trailing down his neck as if they’d been disarranged during lovemaking. He grinned to see Bard so deep in slumber, mute testimony to the thoroughness of the lovemaking he’d indulged in yesterday. Oh, gods, what an adventure that had been! He slipped out of bed with stealthy care, not wanting to disturb Bard’s slumber. Thran wanted many repeats of yesterday’s excesses, and making sure Bard was well rested would help see that come about.

Padding to the bathroom, he shut the door quietly, turned on the light, and tended to necessities. He found his brush, unwound his hair from the braid he usually wore to bed, and carefully untangled the strands –

What was that on his shoulder? The faintest red mark at the junction of his shoulder and neck? He rummaged through the drawers, pulled out the hand mirror, and angled it to get a better look in the mirror over the sink –

“Suka blyad,” he swore softly when he got a clear view of the mark. “Ty grebanyy huiesos. Chert, ty grebanyy huiesos...”

He tossed the mirror back into the drawer, shoved the drawer shut, and came out of the bathroom to glare at his husband so blissfully asleep. “Ty grebanyy huiesos!”

Bard’s lips curved up, though his eyes stayed shut. “You saw it, did you?”

“You bit me! And you left a mark!” Thran grabbed one of the pillows and thwacked Bard hard, making him double up.

“Hey, that’s no way for an omega seer to treat his alpha king!” Bard chortled. “It’s just a little mark, just enough to let everyone know you’re mine.”

“Oy, idi k chertu, sukin syn!” Thran thwacked Bard with the pillow over and over again. “I have an audition Monday, sukin syn! I will kill you!”

Bard wrapped his arms around his head and curled into a ball until Thran had thoroughly vented his spleen with the pillow. He hurled it at Bard and stamped back into the bathroom to look at the mark again. Bard came in behind him, looking properly penitent.

“I’m sorry, cariad,” he offered softly. “I didn’t think I bit down that hard.”

Bard offered a soft kiss on the mark, making enough pleading puppy eyes that Thran offered a grudging smile. Brightening, Bard bared his teeth and pretended to bear down on the mark, but Thran elbowed him away.

“Do not dare, ty grebanyy huiesos. Or I will give you another reason to think I work for the Russian mafia.”

“Gods, I don’t need another one; I already know you do. I’m sorry about the mark, Thran. It’s just red, not bruised, so it’ll fade before Monday. Here, I’ll put some arnica on it. That helps bruises.” Under Thran’s glare, Bard rummaged in the drawers for a small tube of ointment and smeared a generous fingerful of the stuff over the red mark. “I promise, this’ll help. Every couple of hours, I’ll put some more on it. It’ll fade.”

“If it does not, your ass is mine for the next week, however often I want it. I will make you suffer like the worst omega, face down, on the bottom, and I will not let you go a single time.”

“Mmm,” Bard grinned, “I don’t know whether to look forward to that, or remind you that your turn will come after.”

“And what exactly does that mean, if I may be so bold as to ask?”

“You fucking cocksucker.”

Bard snickered. “I may be a fucking cocksucker, but you have to admit I’m a very good fucking cocksucker.”

“You are. I just...”

“I know, angel. I’m sorry. It was the heat of the moment.”
Thran gave another grudging smile. “It was a very nice heat of the moment. The seer was well attuned.”

“And sweet. ‘Even a king needs someone to love him without reservation. I will always be that one.’ I was very touched.”

“I will always be that one.”

“As long as I remember not to bite.” Bard kissed the mark on Thran’s shoulder again, then wrapped his arms around Thran’s ribs. “Considering the king had to fight a war and chop off the head of a rival king just to get his seer in a prison cell, you didn’t come out of it too badly.”

Thran turned around to nestle them chest to chest. He offered Bard a kiss on the ear. “You are my champion. The old king was not nearly so good as the new one is.”

“Your champion needs to go down to the kitchen and start muffins.”

“Ahh, the Nirvana muffins,” Thran recalled, as they went into the bedroom closet to find clothes. “What is a Nirvana muffin?”

“Lots of fruit and spices. I vary the basic muffin recipe I use every time I make them, and the children and I really liked this one. I didn’t think Kama Sutra muffins was the right name for them, given the curious nature of my children, so I settled for Nirvana muffins instead.”

“So they have an Indian influence,” Thran surmised, pulling his jeans up over his underwear.

“The spices remind me of Asia – cinnamon, cardamom, allspice, nutmeg, and mace. There’s a little orange in them, too, though sometimes I put in rosewater instead of the orange.”

Thran hummed in anticipation. “They will be the perfect thing to serve in the solarium when we have restored that room. With hot spiced tea.”

“That’ll be a fun room to do,” Bard admitted, arming his way into his Henley. He stooped to pull on socks. “It’ll be a while, though. Bedrooms and bathrooms and the kitchen floor come first.”

“All will come in its turn.” Thran slipped his soft red flannel shirt on over his thermal. “We need a stool in here, lyubov moya.”

“Maybe we should move that stool you got with the marble table in here.”

“That will do for now, yes. So, to the muffins.”

They headed downstairs, where Bard showed Thran the wonders of spiced muffins full of chopped apricots, raisins, and cranberries. The children arrived in short order, surely drawn by the wonderful scent of the muffins, then the tempting smells of frothy Egg Puffs topped with various combinations of cheese, onions, chives, and ham. Everyone was well fed as they piled into Thran’s SUV for the round of errands.

The craft store gained them a corkboard and packet of pins, chalk for the market list – no pink, as per Bain’s request – and six new sketchpads for Bard. The office supply store provided Sigrid’s new printer toner cartridges; the hardware store supplied items to help with the house’s continuing reclamation. The used bookstore took a long time, as everyone found something to entice them. Tilda chose a collection of Andrew Lang’s fairytales, a drawing tutorial, and a book about Russia. Thran found a coffee table book about the Taj Mahal, and another about the Alhambra.
Another lengthy stop was at the architectural remnants center. While the rest of the family perused the collection of finials, screens, panels, and grates, Bard picked through a few boxes of chipped tiles with Thran for replacements to match the floor of the children’s bathroom. There were no exact matches, and all were littered with bits of old grout and mastic, but as the amount Bard needed was small, he filled a bag with a collection of bits and bobs.

“What do you do with these?” Thran asked doubtfully, picking up a hexagonal tile in an unattractive salmon pink. He made a face, imagining an entire floor made of such a dubious color. “They do not look auspicious.”

“They don’t. I’ll have to chip off the old mortar and cut them to size, but I don’t need many. It’s just to replace the crumbled ones behind the toilet, so they won’t show much, which means that no one will notice that they don’t exactly match the old ones. I’d rather they don’t match than replace the whole thing. That’d be a pain, and I like the old floor.”

“So do I,” Thran agreed. “So, now that you have the tile, do you think we might look to see if we can find some screens for the solarium?”

“We’re here, so let’s look,” Bard nodded. “At least we’ll get an idea of what’s available and sizes and costs.”

They didn’t find any of the carved wooden screens like what Thran had seen in Bard’s art book, but they did find an old doorframe shaped in a Moroccan arch that they could put on the wall and flank with lattice. There was another small carved panel that would fit on another wall, and Sigrid and Legolas found a small round brass tray with an elephant etched on it that would make a nice side table. In talking to the owner, they described the kind of wooden screens they were interested in, and she promised to make some inquiries for them. They made arrangements to have Bard bring his truck to pick up the doorframe next week, then headed to the SUV with the wooden panel and the brass tray.

After a quick stop in Tilda and Thran’s favorite cheese shop, they headed for the market to stock the refrigerator with more than marshmallows, and headed came home with the SUV laden. They hadn’t even carried the bags into the house before Finn arrived with a shout and a wave, and he willingly pitched in to tote groceries and renovation supplies. After putting everything away and a quick lunch of sandwiches and salads, Bard and Tilda mixed up the children’s favorite gelatin/fruit salad, and Thran, Bain, and Legolas helped chop vegetables for tonight’s soup. Finn helped Sigrid mix up orange slices, pecans, and dates with a rosewater dressing. Then everyone trouped outside to survey the yard.

Even though Tilda and Sigrid weren’t technically required to help with the cleanup, everyone was glad to get outside, and Finn wouldn’t stray from Sigrid’s side. He was a big help hauling bits of a broken tree down with Bain and Legolas while Bard cleaned up the sitting room andirons, and then bracing the tree bits for Bard to cut up with a chain saw. Thran was not about to get near such a thing, but as he wielded a rake beside Tilda he kept a close eye on Bard. His husband wasn’t a dancer, but he had his own earthy assurance, and handled his tools and the heavy branches with confidence and ease. More than once, Thran’s loins twitched as he watched Bard work, imagining how compelling a vision his husband would be in the summer when not encumbered with so many heavy clothes. How would Thran resist? He was almost sorry when the last of the broken limbs were cut into lengths for the fireplace and stacked near to hand. While the boys fetched the wicker basket from the sitting room to fill with small sticks for kindling, he helped Bard repair the wire mesh that made up the compost heap so that they could pile dead leaves and other plant detritus in it. The place looked well groomed after two hours’ work.
With so many hands to help, Bard was persuaded to haul his pine tree sculpture out with the dolly and place it on the terrace outside the solarium window. Tilda stayed well back, but everyone else helped tie the piece onto the bed of the dolly. While Finn, Bard, and Thran tugged it along, Bain, Legolas, and Sigrid made sure it stayed solidly on the dolly. Guided by so many hands, the pine tree inched its way from the barn, over the lawn, and finally onto the stone terrace. The animated discussion about the exact placement of the piece was involved and made Thran smile, but finally the precisely correct spot was determined, and Bard set about setting long, heavy anchor bolts that would keep the piece firmly in place. One more piece of the house was now reclaimed.

In putting away all the tools, Bain pointed out the chin-up bar to Finn, and so of course that got a workout. Bard had improved; today he did ten rather than the five he’d done for Thran not long ago. Legolas and Bain both did a respectable five, and Finn managed eight. Legolas gave his father a hopeful look.

“Would you try, Father?” he encouraged. “You’re very strong; you can do these much more easily than I can.”

“I have an audition Monday, Legolas,” Thran said, “but I will try one carefully. I do not want to ruin my chances with the UltraViolet Ballet.”

Thran took off his coat and clambered up atop the box, despite Bard’s concerned look. “I will be careful, lyubov moya.”

“Why does he have to be so careful?” Finn asked Sigrid quietly.

“Because he’s just about the world’s best ballet dancer, that’s all,” Sigrid said casually. “He’s a national treasure.”

Thran refused to give way to his amusement at such a ridiculous claim, or at how proud Legolas looked to overhear Sigrid’s words, but he winked at Bard. “Come, toss me your gloves.”

Bard shook his head, but tossed them up anyway. Thran pulled them on, and reached up to grasp the rafter. He pulled up gently; when nothing hurt, he increased the force, and up he went. Three were all he ventured, despite his pride wanting to do at least as many as the younger boys. But remaining loose for his audition was more important, and so he stopped there. He was not breathing hard, nor had he strained, so he had acquitted himself well for his first effort.

“That is enough for today,” he said, looking down at Legolas. “Today, synok, it is you who upholds the honor of the Russian half of Clan Ffyrnig.”

“Oh, Ada, you made it look a lot easier than anyone but Da,” Sigrid observed, drawing a wry grin from Finn. “So the Russian half has every reason to be just as proud as the Welsh half.”

“You still do the best Scorpion,” Tilda nodded. “None of us can do that. At least I think we can’t. Can you do it, Legolas?”

“Not as well as Father,” Legolas shook his head. “I can manage the arm balance, but I can’t get my feet quite to my head.”

“Wait, what?” Finn repeated, eyebrows raised. “You put your feet on your head... how?”

“Maybe Father will do it for you when we go inside,” Legolas promised, as they left the barn. “He does it better than I do.”

“He’s really good at it,” Sigrid assured Finn as they came out of the barn.
“And he fences,” Finn shook his head. “And your Da makes sculpture and fixes houses. Tilda draws, Bain plays soccer, and Legs fences and does archery. And you’re really smart at everything, Sig. What have I gotten myself into?”

“You have no idea!” Thran and Bard chorused, drawing a laugh from everyone, Finn included.

“I guess I didn’t,” Finn admitted, holding up his hands. “But now that I do, it’s great!”

Everyone helped to collect enough wood and kindling to lay their fire for the evening, then trooped inside, glad for a rest. Once he took his boots off, Thran sketched a reasonable Scorpion for Finn in the middle of the sitting room floor, then he and Bard got Bain, Legolas, and Tilda started on their homework at the kitchen table, leaving Finn and Sigrid to enjoy the sitting room in relative privacy.
Thran and Bard settled at the table to help with homework questions as they arose, and when Tilda was finished hers, she and Bard began to look through the drawing book she’d gotten from the used bookstore. It was fun to watch his husband and their youngest child talk about drawing, and Bard fetched one of his new sketchbooks to show Tilda a few things. As shaded spheres appeared on the page for Tilda to copy, or small cubes, Thran decided that he would urge Bard to put aside the renovation at least once a week so that he could pursue his art. Even as fast as Bard worked, it would be months before everything was finished to his husband’s high standards, and that meant it would be just as long before Bard turned his hand to his metal again. But if Thran could persuade him to devote just one day in seven to the pleasure of his art, then that would be all to the good. Perhaps he could help him clean up his workshop, or ask what sort of clay he needed to begin his modeling of Rahmiel. Yes, Bard was happy working on the house, but he’d be happier when he was an artist of more than plaster, paint, and woodwork again, too, and that would make Thran equally happy.

As the sun faded, the boys finished their homework, and Bard put the finishing touches on supper.
Biscuits came out of the oven, gelatin/fruit salad went onto a platter, honey and jam sat beside the butter on the table, and soup waited in the big Dutch oven on the stove. They squeezed Finn in between Sigrid and Tilda, and everyone set to with appetite.

Of course, after supper the children clamored to light the fire so that the coals could burn down to make the s’mores. Legolas read more of Harry Potter while they waited, finishing the chapter in time to catch a hockey game on TV. Hockey was about the only thing that could distract Finn from Sigrid, but she joined him to argue the merits of Columbus versus Boston with Bain and Legolas as the game proceeded.

When the coals were ready, Bain scampered upstairs to fetch four wire coat hangers, which the children unwound and stretched into long wires. Bard commandeered two for himself and Thran, while Tilda and Legolas took the other two. Sigrid and Finn fetched the graham crackers, chocolate bars, and marshmallows, then the first wave of marshmallows went on to toast.

“How does this double toasting work?” Thran asked Bard, as he held his marshmallow over the coals.

“First you toast it until it’s as brown as you want. If you’re as impatient as Bain, you just light it on fire,” Bard grinned, doing just that. Amid the children’s groans – Bain excepted; he cheered – he pulled the flaming candy out of the fire and blew it out. “You let it cool a second, then you carefully pull the toasted part off the rest of the marshmallow, like this.” He did so, and popped it into his mouth. “You eat that part, and then you put the rest of the marshmallow back on the fire to toast. So you get two for the price of one.”

Thran studied his marshmallow. “Ah. So mine is now toasted enough, so I take it out, skin it just so, and then toast the rest again.” He chewed the toasted part experimentally. “Very sweet, as you said.
But the toasting is nice.”
“This is how you make a s’more,” Tilda went on, pulling her marshmallow off the fire. She pulled the whole thing off her wire, and carefully put it on half a graham cracker, topped it with the chocolate, and added the top cracker. She took a big, gooey bite. “Mmm!”

Bard had started his second marshmallow, which he let toast to a golden brown. He made a s’more out of it, and offered it to Thran. “Have at.”

Thran took a small bite, but the way the cracker broke gave him more to fumble into his mouth than he expected, and his fingers were sticky by the time he crammed a full half of it in. It was just as gooey and sweet as he expected, but a single bite was not too much. He gave the rest of it back to Bard, who wolfed it down.

“Good, right?” Tilda grinned, stuffing the rest of hers in her mouth. “Do you like it, Legolas?”

“Mmm,” Legolas managed, grinning at the mess. “You’re right, Tilda. It’s stellar.”

“I’ve had my quota,” Bard said, holding up his wire. “Sigrid? Finn? Do you want a turn?”

“Absolutely,” Sigrid reached for the wire. “Let me at the coals!”

Thran gave his wire to Finn, and once Tilda’s next treat was well toasted, she gave her wire to Bain. Bard and Thran turned over the hearth to the children to watch the next period of the hockey game.

“You are right, lyubov moywa,” Thran murmured, watching the children as they assembled their treats. “It is very sweet.”

Bard caught the double meaning that Thran had intended, and grinned. “It is. Nothing quite like it, is there?”

“No,” Thran shook his head. “Nothing like it at all.”
The angel and the saint have a cornucopia of things to share, from Russian nalivka before the fire to waffles for breakfast. Conversation is just as varied, and the cherubs have some thinking to do about their pasts - do they embrace it as their fathers suggest, or are old memories still too tender? A certain cherub with long blond hair and green braids finds that to be a very hard question to answer. And what do the angel and the saint plan for their next game?

Finn bade Clan Ffyrnig goodbye after the hockey game ended, and the night wound down to a sleepy close. Once the children were through baths and had settled into bed, Bard and Thran returned downstairs to enjoy the remains of the fire. The television was off, the lights were low, and the only sound was the quiet crackle of the fire as it ebbed. Bard leaned back against the sofa to enjoy the dance of the flames as Thran busied himself in the kitchen. When the tall dancer came into the sitting room, he carried two small glasses filled with a deep red liquid. He handed one to Bard before he sat down beside him.

“What’s this, cariad?” Bard asked, sitting up to take the tiny glass.

“Nalivka,” Thran replied, settling next to Bard. “Russian liqueur made of vodka and cherries, not too sweet. I had forgotten I had this. But the deep red coals of our fire reminded me of it, and I thought we might enjoy a small sip before we go to bed.”

Bard ventured a taste. “Hmm. I’ve never tasted anything like this. I can taste the vodka, but the cherries really come through.”

Thran sipped his. “So they do. The best vodka, the best ripe fruit, and only the least amount of sugar make the best nalivka, and this is a very nice one. It is a pleasure to have a small taste of it with you by the fire.”

“Gods,” Bard exhaled, rubbing Thran’s thigh. “Can it get any better? Less than two months ago, I was rotting away in a grotty apartment struggling to care for my children, and you were alone in your sterile aerie three floors above. Now I’m married to an angel, we’re here, our house is becoming a beautiful sanctuary, and our children are with us, happy and safe.”

Thran drew Bard back against his chest and put his arm around Bard’s ribs. “It is wonderful. I cannot be happier, at least not until tomorrow, when I will be happier still.”

Smiling, Bard sipped his nalivka. “I should be the one cradling you, angel. The heat’s down for the night, and even with the fire, it’s cool. Are you warm enough?”

“I am fine, Bard. You look after me well.”

“It’s my pleasure. I never want this to end.”

“We will have many years to enjoy each other, my saint.”

“I hope so. It’ll take thirty or forty years before I stop acting like such a sap.”
Thran rubbed Bard’s arm slowly. “I am Russian. I dance romantic Russian ballet. I married a fellow artist. Emotion is in my blood, so there is no such thing as sap between us. Only mutual delight in each other.”

Bard hummed in contentment. “I like your story better. No sap; only delight.”

Thran’s hand tightened on his shoulder briefly before it resumed its slow stroking.

Bard let his head fall back against his husband’s chest, silent as they watched the fire die together, warming the minutes with tiny tastes of the nalivka until the embers vanished into ash. Thran got up to wash their glasses and put them away, while Bard stirred the ashes until they were barely warm and closed the fireplace flue.

He and Thran made their usual rounds of the house together before heading upstairs. Tonight, both of them were happy to share the warmth of the shower, dry, and help each other into bed. They settled into each other’s arms, Thran shivering briefly until the bedding warmed around him. There seemed to be no need for words to follow what had been spoken in front of the fire, so they kissed, cuddled briefly, and let sleep draw near.

Despite how sleepy Bard was, he still had a lump in his throat. He’d need a lifetime to tell his angel just how much he loved him, and how much he treasured the life they were building together. Maybe when he began work on Rahmiel, the sculpture that would be his first piece after so long away, he could convey some of what he felt in it. Thran deserved no less.

Their love didn’t, either.

* * *

Bard dug out the waffle iron for Sunday’s breakfast. It’d been too long since he’d made the crisp delights for the children, and neither Thran nor Legolas had had homemade waffles before. Legolas had previously sampled store-bought things, but Bard had never thought the limp, often simultaneously burned and frozen things that came out of toasters compared well with the crisp warmth of a real waffle. They were easy to mix and bake, though it was hard to keep up with demand when the waffle iron produced only four at a time. While the first batch baked, the children rummaged for butter, honey, and various jellies to top them, and Bard stirred some scrambled eggs for Thran. The elegant dancer sat at the end of the table to survey the children as they wolfed their way through their treats. Legolas decided after one bite that the toaster version of a waffle bore no comparison to this, and he and Bain accounted for four waffles apiece. Even Tilda had two, as did her sister. The last batch of four appeared in a lull of the children’s consumption, so Thran took one and Bard claimed the other three. When Bard finally sat down to his breakfast, however, the children were ready to bolt from the table.

“Wait, mes petits,” Thran held up his hands to draw the children’s attention. “Before you leave such a delicious breakfast, we must talk of several things.”

Bard paused as he slathered his waffles with butter and honey. “What’s on your mind, Thran?”

“I want to talk about things we do today. Tomorrow begins a new week of school and dancing and renovation, so today we should pause and prepare. Laundry, yes? We all need clean clothes. So we will do that today. And we need to tidy and clean. Rooms, bathrooms, and so on. So we will divide these things up so that none of it takes very long.”

Bard grinned when the boys groaned. “That’s a good idea, Thran. We need to get on a regular schedule of such things, anyway. We’ll rotate the chores each week, so who wants to start off with what?”

Bard worked through most of his waffles before that was settled, but before long they had a list of chores, what needed to be done, and an equitable division of the work, and everyone knew what they would do today. But chores were not the only things Thran wanted to talk about.

“So we are settled in the chores. Now, I bring up a more serious subject. Bard and I have wondered if you would like to make a small remembrance in our house for your mothers.”

All of the children sobered, and regarded Thran with mixed expressions. Sigrid and Bain both glanced at Bard, though neither spoke. Bard nodded to Thran, encouraging him to continue.

“They were dear to all of us, and I am sure they would be pleased to know how well and happy you are. Bard and I thought you would like to have the comfort of their memory, but only if it would be so. Perhaps a picture or two? I do not think it is fair to press anyone to decide this without reflection, so we will save discussion for another day. But would you like to consider this?”

Sigrid and Bain were quick to express their willingness, but Bard had never doubted that they would. It was Tilda and Legolas whose reactions Bard was more interested to see. Tilda didn’t remember her mother, and had much less invested in her memory than her older siblings. Legolas, however, had much more invested, because he’d lost his mother so horrifically. Thran had told him how badly Legolas had suffered over long weeks and months, and how many weeks and months Thran had not danced to remain beside his son. Would a photograph bring back those terrible memories of her murder?

“What if we give it a few days, and talk about it together on say... Wednesday? Or next weekend? What do you think?” Bard asked.

“Wednesday,” Sigrid and Bain said. Tilda and Legolas said nothing, but Legolas’s expression was pensive. He murmured something in Russian to Thran, who murmured something else back.

“What are they saying?” Tilda whispered to Bard.

“I don’t know, little doll, but it’s okay. They just need to be private for a minute, so we’ll respect that.”

“Okay,” Tilda whispered back.

“We will talk on Wednesday, then,” Thran offered. “Is that all right with you, too, Tilda?”

The little girl nodded. “It’s okay.”

“Then we will leave that for now. So there is just one more thing to talk about today.”

“What?” the children chorused, but Bard had no more idea than they did. Thran leaned forward over his plate to give Bard a mischievous smile.

“I would like us to gang up on our Bard.”

“Everything,” Thran grinned back. “And that is exactly the point. You do everything for us, yes? The renovation, you feed us so well, you keep us organized and well prepared. But we can spare one day each week for you to come back to your art. You need to draw, to play in the barn, to plan your return to your metal. Children, I say that on Sundays, Bard will not do any renovation, but will work on his art instead. We will practice what he has taught us about cooking for supper, and he will eat what we make, rather than we will eat what he makes.”

“Yeah!” Bain agreed enthusiastically. “Yeah, Da! You can weld out in the barn again! Legs, you wouldn’t believe how cool that is! Sparks go everywhere!”

“But there’s still a lot to do!” Bard protested. “I don’t want to make everyone live in a construction zone even longer than we will –”

“It’ll all get done, Da,” Sigrid interrupted. “Really, it will! Look, the kitchen is all done but the floor, and all our rooms are done, and you’ll be done in your room soon, and we have the children’s study, and the sitting room is livable, to so we’ll get by. It’s already better than the grotty apartment we spent years in, so another month or two here won’t bother us a bit. So I say Ada’s right – no renovation for you on Sundays!”

“Yeah, Da,” Tilda said, stoutly supporting her sister and brother.

“That seems fair to me, too,” Legolas nodded, smiling. “I learned how to make bangers and mash at boarding school from an English boy, so I can make that one night.”

“So the vote is five for, and one against, so the pro-artist vote carries,” Thran declared triumphantly. “See, I remember from my citizenship classes. We have had a successful vote.”

The children clapped, especially when Bard pretended to cringe in defeat. “If you insist. I guess I’ll have to spend the day puttering out in the barn.”

“Or you may draw, or go to the art supply store to get clay for your sculpture models. Whatever you choose.”

“I’ll think about it while we start on our chores,” Bard replied. “Has everyone had enough waffles?”

Everyone had. Cleanup commenced, and then the clan scattered to work their way through the chores. By dint of everyone’s effort, everything but the laundry was finished by lunchtime. After a quick smorgasbord lunch to finish off the week’s leftovers, everyone headed for the mudroom to put on boots and coats and gloves and go outside for a little air. A casual tour around the yard eventually evolved into a brisk game of soccer, after which Bard got the keys to the barn and opened the bay.

Eight years ago, when he’d closed the doors on this place, he’d wondered if he’d ever work here seriously again; now that moment had come, it seemed unreal, even foreign. There was so much to do to return this abandoned place to a working studio!

A good first step was cleaning. He climbed up on the crates under the chin-up bar with a broom to sweep away as many cobwebs as he could reach, then Bain, Legolas, and Thran helped him move the crates around until he’d cleaned the rest of the rafters. He left the crates under a rafter in the front of the barn, which opened the space near his workbenches and tools. Leaving the boys to determine which of them could do the most chin-ups, he mulled the next step.

Tilda and Sigrid took up brooms to sweep off the workbenches, the anvil, the fire bed, and the walls. Thran found a push broom to send the dust on the floor billowing out of the front bay in sneeze-inducing clouds. It was only a perfunctory cleaning, but Bard felt heartened as the afternoon waned because the house’s reclamation had extended to include the barn.

Supper was simple hamburgers, beans, steamed veg, and fruit salad, because the children had taken Thran’s prohibition on Bard’s cooking seriously, much to his amusement. How long would that last? Still, he sat in the sitting room with his sketchbook while supper preparations ensued. In was impossible to concentrate on sketching anything, though, as he had to try his best not to get up and plunge into the fray when one person or another popped in to ask him a steady stream of questions.

“Da, where’s the minced onion?”

“Lyubov moya, where is the vegetable peeler?”

“Da, do we have any flaked coconut?”

“Bard, do I turn the oven on bake or broil to warm the buns? Broil? Um, high or low?”

“Da, how soon do I turn the veggies on before the hamburgers are done?”

“Bard, can you put a glass bowl in the microwave for the beans? Or do they go in a pan on the stove?”

“Da, do we have a cheese knife?”

When Bard heard the clatter of a pan falling on the floor, he could no longer help himself, and got up from the sofa to stick his head in. Five faces turned to regard him, then five voices raised to protest his appearance.

“I just wanted to make sure everything was all right when the pan dropped,” he held up his hands.

“We’re good, Da,” Bain pushed him back towards the sitting room. “No worries.”

“Easy for you to say,” Bard replied.

“Five more minutes, then we’re done, Da,” Sigrid called. “Control yourself until then!”

In five minutes, he was called to the table, and despite all the questions, supper was well put together, well presented, and quite edible. Bard made sure to compliment all around for their efforts.

“Did you draw anything while we made supper?” Tilda asked.

Bard gave her a sheepish grin. “I didn’t, little doll. I was too busy listening to what you were all doing and trying not to interrupt.”

“We will get better each week,” Thran waved a hand as he cut up his hamburger – small, bunless, and cheeseless – into small bites. “You will not have so much to listen to next week.”

Bard expected that he would, but he merely smiled.

* * *

After supper, the usual Sunday night flurry began to track down lunch bags, repack backpacks, and check for last minute assignments, and the last of the mountain of clean laundry appeared out of the dryer. They just had time for half a chapter of Harry Potter before it was time to wash and get ready for bed. Bain raced Sigrid to get into the shower first, and when the losing Sigrid flounced into her room, leaving Bain to chortle at his victory, Legolas followed Thran into the bedroom he shared with Bard.

“You are quiet tonight, synok,” Thran ventured, as he dumped the basket of laundry out on the bed. As this was mostly the children’s clothing, he beckoned to Legolas to pick his things out of the pile.

“I think about Maman,” Legolas admitted, looking at his thermal shirt in his hands.

Thran gave Legolas his full regard as he sat on the bed. “What do you think of?”

Legolas said nothing for a long moment, but eventually came to sit beside his father. When he finally spoke, it was in Russian, and soft, as if he didn’t want to be overheard. “I still miss her so much.”

“How could you not?” Thran replied in the same language. He put a long arm around his son’s broad shoulders. “She was very dear to you, and she loved you very much.”

“But it’s been a long time, Father. Why do I still miss her so much?”

Thran couldn’t reply before Bard appeared at the door with another basket of laundry, but he didn’t need Thran’s warning look to know that his appearance was inopportune. He disappeared into Sigrid’s room with the basket, leaving the bedroom to Thran and Legolas.

“Because it is normal to miss someone you love so much, especially when they are lost to you too soon. You may miss her for a very long time, just as you love her – even when you are seventy, or eighty, or ninety. It will still be normal to feel so, even then. But it is also normal that we learn to go on without her, even though that is sometimes very hard. That is why I spoke as I did at lunch today, Legolas. I do not ever want you to think that because we live here, and I am married to Bard, that you must forget Maman. Nor should Sigrid and Bain and Tilda forget their Mam, nor Bard his Daphne, nor I my Vileria. Even though your mothers are not with us, they are still part of us, and I would welcome a remembrance of them, but only if that would not make you and the other children sad.”

Legolas looked at the shirt still in his hands, but he didn’t speak. Likely he didn’t know what to say, because he didn’t yet know how he felt. Thran let the silence stand as he rubbed his son’s arm in comfort.

“Do you... still have our album?”

“Of course. Would you like me to get it out?”

At Legolas’s nod, Thran stooped by the lowest drawer in his dresser, opened it, and took out a cloth-wrapped bundle. He put it on the bed beside Legolas, and unwrapped the soft wrappings to reveal an ornately tooled, leather bound photograph album. As he sat beside the album, Legolas regarded it with a regretful expression, and after some seconds, he opened it.

The first several pages held pictures of Thran as a young boy, most of them dancing pictures. There was only a single picture of Thran’s mother, and only two of his father, but Thran had stared at them too long to feel much more than a vague connection to the black and white images revealed in the pictures. The next several pages contained more dancing pictures, and gradually a skinny, dark-headed Thran gave way to a skinny, white-headed Thran. Then appeared pictures of a young Thran beside an equally skinny, dark-headed girl with sharp cheekbones, a wide smile, and expressive eyes. Vileria had been so alive and bubbly then, before an awakening sexuality had clashed with official disfavor. Watching her struggle under such a burden had prepared Thran when his own sexuality had made itself known. He and Vileria had grown even closer after that, both because they understood each other’s burden, and because that friendship diverted at least some part of the official machine’s censure. When they had been urged to marry, they had agreed with more relief than anything else. Both had pursued careful relationships with others without resentment or censure, even laughing about providing each other cover when the official eye turned their way.

The pictures that followed celebrated ballet triumphs, parties, casual outings together, then the happy surprise of Legolas’s conception, revealed in Vileria’s blossoming figure. Legolas paused over many pictures of proud parents with their tiny son, for both Thran and Vileria had enthusiastically welcomed Legolas. The turning of pages slowed now; while pictures still celebrated ballet triumphs and premieres and openings and spectacular jetés, more celebrated two doting parents and the growing son they cherished, and Legolas looked long at them.

One of the last pictures taken before Vileria’s death showed her snuggled in an overlarge, ruby red sweater, her hands clasped under her chin. Her smile was wide and laughing. Her dark eyes were beautifully made up without looking overdone, and her expression was gleeful and unstudied, yet wise. She was a beautiful waif, mischievous clown, evanescent sprite. Despite his happiness with Bard, Thran found it impossible to look at that picture without a surge of aching loss, but another picture taken at the same session was the one that held Legolas’s eyes. It showed Legolas standing with a tiny bow and arrow in his hands as he beamed at the camera, with Thran and Vileria stooping beside him, their arms around him and their cheeks pressed to his. Father and mother were young, seemingly happy and without care, and the love for each other and their son was palpable.

Legolas didn’t move, but Thran heard the hitch in his throat. Whether Legolas reached out to his father first, or Thran enveloped his son in his arms first, didn’t matter. What did was that Legolas had someone to hold him.

“I’m sorry, Father,” Legolas whispered. “I wish I didn’t miss her so much.”

“There is nothing to apologize for, Legolas,” Thran replied just as softly. “She was your mother, and she loved you without reservation. I loved her, too. Very much. Nothing will ever change that, nor will I forget her just because my life is different now. She is part of you, of me, and she always will be.”

“You mean that, even though you’re married to Bard?”

“Of course! Bard still loves his Daphne, too, you know. That does not change what we feel for each other, just as what we feel for each other does not change what we felt for Vileria and Daphne. So if you would feel comforted to have a picture of your mother, or several if you like, then we will have them. Would you like to take the album and put it in your room? You can look at it anytime you like, and when you are ready, you can choose something to display. I think our Tilda and Bain and Sigrid would like to see your mother, just as perhaps you would like to see their mother. Your mothers made you, Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda what you are.”

“I would like to look at the album, Father. Thank you.”

“Look at it all you like. Whatever you decide on Wednesday, even if you decide that you would like more time to consider, that will be fine. I want whatever would make you happiest.”

“What if the other children want a picture but I don’t, or if I want one and they don’t?”

“Then that is what we will do. Nothing is forever, Legolas. To display or not display a picture today does not dictate what happens tomorrow.”
“That makes me feel better. I don’t want to do something that the other children don’t want, and then they’ll think I want them to do what I do.”

“We will accommodate whatever each of you decides. Have no worries about that.”

“Do you think... if we did display some, could we have a shelf with a vase? Maman loved flowers, and so sometimes I could put some with her picture?”

“She would love that. If you decide on a picture, we will have a place for flowers near it.”

Legolas’s arms tightened around his father. “Okay. Thank you, Father.”

“You are the best son. I love you very much.”

“I love you, too, Papa.”

Legolas had not called him that for a long time. Thran’s throat tightened until he had to swallow, but he made no notice of it other than to stroke Legolas’s long blond hair. He gave a gentle tug on one of the small green braids. “I think that Sigrid and Bain and even Tilda are through their showers now. So see to yours, and then it will be time for bed.”

Legolas eased away from Thran. His eyes were damp, but Thran made no notice of them, either, only smiling fondly at his son. He took up the photograph album, and handed it to Legolas. The boy cradled it in his arms and offered a smile as he carried it to his room.

Perhaps the next time that Legolas looked at the pictures of his mother, he would find a little more peace.

* * *

After Bard said goodnight to Bain, he came into the bedroom to find Thran sorting through his pile of clean clothes.

“Is Legolas all right?” he murmured softly.

Thran nodded. “I think so. He still misses his mother very much. I told him that Vileria is still his mother, just as Daphne is the mother of your children, and that we will always love them both. What you and I have now does not change that.”

“Of course not,” Bard agreed. “I just said the same thing to Bain. Sigrid already knows it, and Tilda doesn’t remember much about her mother, so she’s not as emotionally invested in her mother as our other children are. But Bain needed the same reassurance as Legs did. So if they compare notes, I hope they’ll see that they heard the same thing from both of us.”

“I hope so, too. I find that I would like to display a picture for myself. Looking at our old album... despite the state, despite that we were both gay, Vileria and I had many happy times. The pictures show that.”

“I promised Bain and Sigrid I’d get out our box of pictures for them to look through. Daphne and I had a lot of happy times, too. There’s one picture in particular I’d like to see again.”

“We will see them all, before long,” Thran surmised. “That will be all to the good. We will bring the past into the present, and both will be welcome in our house.”

Bard hummed in agreement, then exchanged his pensive expression for a more overt smile as he regarded the pile of dancer’s belts, tights, and tops that covered Thran’s side of the bed. He moved to the much smaller heap on his side of the bed, all of it workpants, shirts, socks, and underwear. “I had no idea dancers went through so many clothes.”

“The pile will be much larger when I begin work with a company,” Thran warned him. “ Likely two sets a day, if not more.”

Bard whistled. “Too much to leave it all for the weekend. Twice a week, at least, we toss stuff in the washer. When’s your audition with UltraViolet tomorrow?”

“That question has an interesting answer,” Thran replied.

Bard paused as he folded up a tee shirt. “Why?”

“I do not know. A dancer I know well emailed me early this morning that he hoped he’d see me at the UltraViolet audition on Wednesday.”

“Wednesday? I thought it was Monday. Did they move it?”

“My very question. I also received an email from the inimitable Mr. Nori to inform me about this Wednesday audition, since he is aware that my audition is Monday.”

“You’ve mentioned Mr. Nori before. Who is he?”

“Someone whose business advice and discretion I make regular use of. A most discreet individual.”

“Let me guess – he works for the Russian mafia, too.”

Thran smiled, but made no comment about Mr. Nori’s ties to the Russian underworld. Did that speak volumes, or what?

“What did you do?”

“I emailed Irmo to reconfirm the date and time of my audition. I received a reply just before I came upstairs with Legolas. Irmo confirmed that he would see me tomorrow at one.”

“So what’s going on?”

“I do not know,” Thran shrugged. “It is not typical for auditions to be on two days, unless there are separate auditions for different types of dancers. But that does not seem to be the case this time. I will attend tomorrow as I planned, but I expect something unexpected, whatever it may be.”

Bard carried his stack of Henleys to hang up into the closet. “ Do you think Irmo’s up to something?”

“Most assuredly, for all that he is not the director or the ballet master. He is known to push to get what he wants, and as persuasive as he can be, it is the rare person who can tell him no with any authority. I could flatter myself and think that he wants to see me alone, with the ballet company officials in tow, to try to snare me for UltraViolet right then. But if that is the case, I will not sign anything tomorrow, no matter how persuasive he is. There is courtesy to show the other companies, and I want to weigh the offers fairly, both for our family and myself. On the other hand, perhaps he wishes to tell me in private that UltraViolet has no interest in me, but he wants to plan a venture between us, and UltraViolet will hold its real audition with other dancers on Wednesday. There is no way to know until tomorrow comes. What is your plan tomorrow? The children’s bath?”

Bard nodded. “Paint first, then regrout the wall tile. Add the extra towel bars. Patch the floor. It’ll be two or three days at least, I expect, then it’s our room’s turn. Would you prefer I do the closet first, or out here first?”

“It does not matter to me, but it would be nice to see our room transform, yes?”

“That’s what I thought. I’ll move a lot of our stuff out of here to make it easier to paint, but I’ll keep the bed in place. We’ll just have to be careful at night to remember we’re not hard up against the outside wall, and leave a clear path to the bathroom so neither of us trips in the dark.”

“We will manage,” Thran said without concern. “There, my things are put away, and I have packed my bag for tomorrow’s audition. I am ready for a hot shower. Not the soaking tub tonight, I think. I will save that for tomorrow. I expect that I will need it after my audition.”

Bard hummed, conceding the likelihood that Thran was right. “Do you mind company in the shower?”

“Not at all,” Thran assured him, as he shed his clothes. “I will start, and you join me as you are ready.”

“I will.”

Bard put the rest of his clothes away, and joined Thran just as his husband finished washing his hair. As he expected, his husband offered his usual kiss of welcome and caresses as he scrubbed himself clean, but he seemed more thoughtful than playful tonight. He was likely preoccupied about the irregularities that might surround his audition tomorrow, so Bard didn’t intrude. He washed thoroughly, dried while Thran saw to his hair, and then turned the dryer on himself long enough to get the worst of the damp out of it. He climbed into bed and eased his shivering husband against his chest to warm him.

“I’ll bet you’re not a fan of too much air conditioning in the summer,” Bard teased as Thran crowded close.

“ Enough that we snuggle in bed comfortably is nice, but no Arctic gale,” Thran agreed. “I feel claustrophobic when the house is closed too tightly in nice weather.”

“I don’t like it, either.” Bard tucked the blankets around Thran’s shoulders snugly. “And so another week begins.”

Thran hummed comfortably. “Perhaps we should plan our next game. The artist’s garret awaits us.”

Bard grinned. “And I’m supposed to get to sleep mulling all the possibilities of that? You’re cruel, angel.”

Bard felt Thran’s smile, even if he didn’t see it. “I do not mean to be.”

“Same rules as last time?”

“Let us seed the game first before we consider whether we need rounds again. We know the place. The time will be during the day when the children are at school. Because I was the bottom in the empty garret, perhaps you can be this time, unless you have a strong preference otherwise. You know I am happy with either.”
“You are. So am I. So the top is yours. Power, or not?”

“Oh, lyubov moya, after playing the seer to your king, I will gladly take the power this time. I hope I can bring as much delight to the role as you did.”

“Do you want to be the artist, too?” Bard snickered.

Thran snickered in kind. “I will not deny you that.”

“If I’m the artist, and I end up on the bottom, then you’d better be a rich patron who decides to take liberties with his impoverished portraitist, or the angel who rewards a mortal artist’s efforts with a liaison, or the landlord who takes out his rent in trade.”

“Mmm, so many possibilities,” Thran rumbled deep in his throat.

“I wonder if I can draw erotic images while engaging in them at the same time?”

Thran’s fingers traced over a nipple, making Bard twitch. “Perhaps I will be an oversexed ballet dancer who wants a provocative portrait of himself, and decides that his artist is too tempting not to sample along the way. That would be no game, though. Merely my usual state of being when confronted with my irresistible husband.”

Bard snickered again. “I’d better keep that sketchbook under our bed to keep the children blissfully ignorant to the dissipation of their fathers.”

“I think so. Though I warn you – having it under our bed will only lure me to look at it, and that will provoke me to visit more of the most depraved acts upon you.”

Bard bit Thran’s ear. “You might get a few of those visited on you in return. But not tonight; save them for the garret. Say... Wednesday? Oh, no, not then; Sigrid’s got another track meet. Tuesday, or Thursday?”

“Tuesday, assuming something does not arise about my auditions. We must take advantage of ourselves while we can, my saint. As you said, soon I will be back at work, and our times to indulge here during the day may be rare.”

“Tuesday, it is. Need rounds?”

Thran shook his head. “I have quite enough delicious things to consider as a demanding ballet dancer. Do you prefer me pushy, or seductive?”

“Oh, I go for seductive any day. You’re very good at that.”

“So we are agreed,” Thran said, snuggling closer.

“I just have one question for you,” Bard enticed.

“What is that?”

“Which do you think an oversexed ballet dancer would prefer – chocolate syrup, or sweetened whipped cream?”

Thran looked up at him. “What do you intend to do with those?”

“Why don’t you think about it between now and Tuesday?”
“Suka blyad,” Thran growled. “How am I to sleep with such a question before me?”

Bard grinned. “I’m sure you’ll manage it, cariad. Sleep well.”

Thran’s answer was another growl. It wasn’t a very sleepy one, either.
Chapter 55

Chapter Summary

The angel's audition is on with UltraViolet Ballet... or is it? Will the Prince of Ice need to make an appearance? Afterwards, the saint offers a hint of an interesting financial transaction for tomorrow's game.

Chapter Notes

Our ballet master, Abebe, is named in honor of Abebe Bikila, the great Ethiopian distance runner who won the 1960 and 1964 Olympic marathons. For the former, he set a world record, and he did it barefoot. For the latter, he successfully defended his previous title just 40 days after suffering appendicitis, and he set another world's record. He also single-handedly began East Africa's dominance in distance running. What an amazing runner!

Thran set off for his audition with more than his typical anticipation of such things, because he did not expect this to be a typical audition. Just what Irmo had in store for him he didn’t know, and he didn’t spend time in speculation. Whatever it was, he would soon discover. For now, his purpose was to reach the UltraViolet Ballet studio safely and calmly, in balance, and ready to react to whatever he was presented.

At least he didn’t have a long drive to make. The studio where UVB conducted its practices and auditions was not in the city; it was just barely beyond the outskirts of Greenwood Dale on the Lake, perhaps twenty minutes from the house. It was by far the most convenient practice location of the four companies he’d considered, but the length of a commute was far from the most important aspect of choosing the direction of his career for the next several years. In fact, it was almost the least important aspect. But considering it put him the right frame of mind – he would weigh everything, from the least detail to the biggest.

The studio appeared before him ahead on the left in an industrial park that seemed recently built. The building seemed to be neither one thing nor the other, but that did not concern him; as long as the practice space inside was well equipped and tailored to dancers, it did not matter that it was indistinguishable from the medical lab equipment builder next door. Several cars dotted the lot outside the front door, so others had preceded him, though who those others were remained unknown. Perhaps other dancers; the makes and models of the cars were not expensive ones, and several contained what Thran called dancers’ detritus – stray sweaters, extra dancer’s shoes, and so on. The building displayed no large sign, though the distinctive UVB logo was stenciled on the glass front door. He parked the SUV, got his bag of things, and headed inside.

A small if attractive lobby with a receptionist’s station greeted him. A pair of ballerinas looked up from behind the station, their eyes widening as they recognized him.

“I'll tell them,” one of the girls told the other, and hurried down a hallway. The other gave Thran a smile full of suppressed excitement.

“Good afternoon, Mr. Oropherson. It’s so exciting to see you!”

“Good afternoon,” Thran replied, smiling. “I am flattered.”

“Everyone’s ready for you, Mr. Oropherson. The studio’s straight ahead. The men’s dressing room is down the hall, then right before you get to the studio doors.”

“Thank you,” Thran replied, and continued on. Already this was no ordinary audition – who was this everyone who was ready for him? Usually in an audition, it was he who should be ready for the panel and the ballet master, not the other way around. He stopped in the dressing room, took off his coat and folded it neatly over his bag, and tended to necessities. Something told him he would not be given an instant, not even to piss, once he walked onto the studio floor.

As he left the dressing room and headed back to the doors that led to the studio, he took a marshaling breath, straightened to his tallest, and squared his shoulders. He would not sweep into the studio – that would be arrogant and presumptuous. But he would make an entrance, nevertheless. The question was not whether an audience awaited, only what sort.

As he came through the door, he swept the space quickly with a glance. Ah, this was not an audition at all, was it? The dancers arrayed around the room were the members of the company, male and female, perhaps thirty all told – all ethnicities, from several traditions, from very classical and contemporary ballet, both of which Thran danced, to a smattering of others, likely modern and perhaps ethnic/urban. An interesting mix, but what did that mean for a company to have so few dancers across so many traditions? They were arrayed around the room just as dancers were before the start of every morning barre, stretching, chatting softly, sewing ribbons on pointe shoes, wrapping sweaters around slender midriffs. All that paused, however, at Thran’s appearance. There was an expectation, an excitement, as well as close scrutiny, from every dancer, regardless of tradition. What had Thran gotten himself into?

“Ah! Thran!” Irmo heralded.

To the left by the piano stood a cluster of people – Irmo; a trim, black man with greying hair and attired in dancer’s garb; an equally trim, middle-aged Asian woman in business clothes; a young woman with short blond hair and a bundle of music sheets under her arm; and another man dressed in such an eccentric mélange of things that he could be a homeless vagabond as easily as an artist. So... Irmo, ballet master, artistic director, and pianist. That left the eccentric, who was likely not a choreographer, as Irmo was not the type to suffer another in the same room with him. Perhaps set designer? Costumier? Why would either be present at an audition, even an unusual one?

“Bonjour, bonjour!” Irmo welcomed Thran, beckoning him closer. “Thran, let me introduce Lettie Jenkins, the artistic director of UltraViolet Ballet, and Siobhan Turner, pianist. Also Abebe Lançot, UltraViolet Ballet’s ballet master, and Rada Brown, costumier.”

Thran shook hands with everyone, offered polite greetings, then gave Irmo an amused look. “Ah. The traditional audition is on Wednesday, then. It only remains for you to reveal what kind of audition I am here for today.”

If everyone but Irmo looked startled, the choreographer was unconcerned. “But of course this is not an audition, Thran. That should be obvious, yes?”

Thran chuckled. “Of course, I see now. This is your regular company class, yes? My apologies – I interrupt. And you have my condolences, Irmo. It seems that the same illness that would not let you call me to arrange a meeting has struck again, so that you were unable to call me to inform me of today’s adventure. Perhaps you would prefer I come back on Wednesday with the other dancers, yes? I will see if my schedule is still open for that time, and will attend if I do not have a previous engagement.” He offered a nod to those with Irmo. “It was good to meet you. Again, my apologies that I interrupt.”

He made his unhurried way back towards the door. Which of the group would chase after him? How close to the door would he get before someone spoke? Or would they wait until he left the studio, so as not to say anything in front of the company?

He got through the studio doors, and headed down the hall to the lobby. Ah, well. No matter how promising things had seemed last Wednesday, it was better to know now, before he invested any emotional or financial resources, that Irmo was too scattered to make a successful collaboration –

“Mr. Oropherson?”

That was Lettie Jenkins, the artistic director, who pursued him. He paused to look back at her, but only halfway, as if he still might continue on his way out of the studio.

“I am so sorry for the confusion, Mr. Oropherson. I had no idea that Irmo wouldn’t have called you to explain the change in our plans. I should have called you myself, and it reflects badly on UltraViolet Ballet that I didn’t. I apologize to you, both for my lapse, and for wasting your valuable time. May I offer you an explanation for your trouble, at least?”

The poor woman looked so abashed that Thran winced in sympathy. This was Irmo’s doing, likely not intentional, but visionaries were often blind to the efforts others had to put into making their visions real. He turned to fully face Lettie, and offered a commiserating smile. “Of course. Perhaps I am not the only one surprised this afternoon.”

“You’re not,” Lettie said frankly. “Irmo is a brilliant choreographer, but he’s not the best in explaining the leaps of intuition that make him brilliant to lesser mortals.”

“So I have learned myself,” Thran nodded. “So what did he plan for today, and what should I have known before I arrived?”

“You really impressed Irmo last week when you met with him,” Lettie admitted. “He came to us more excited than I’ve ever seen him, convinced that you were the only one we needed to look at for our principal male dancer. He was so sure that he insisted we make today’s meeting a working session with the company to see how the chemistry between you and our dancers developed. There is another audition on Wednesday, to satisfy our board that we’d have something in place if you didn’t choose to talk with us further after today. Irmo insisted that he would explain this to you – he was quite adamant. But...”

Thran hummed in sympathy. “Irmo is right about my interest in working with him. But it is only fair to tell you that I have auditioned with several other companies, and I have not yet made a decision as to which company I plan to join. With your company, there are other considerations beyond the dance, of course. Depending on how this chemistry goes, we would need to discuss those other considerations. But I must tell you, if I choose to work with UltraViolet, we must have no more surprises. Such things do not make the best of any of us.”

“You’re absolutely right,” Lettie nodded, sighing. “Frankly, you’re the first person who’s had the gravitas to challenge Irmo. We need a little more of that. If you’d consider continuing with today’s plan for a working session, and you do decide to work with us after that, I will personally see to it that you’re fully aware of everything from then on.”
Thran considered. There was no reason yet to dismiss UltraViolet, for Lettie’s attitude was not desperation, but embarrassment; she cared about her company, and was pained that Irmo’s lapse had reflected badly on it. And he was prepared for class, whether as part of a traditional audition or not, and he had already invested the time to travel here. So he lost nothing to take part in a working class, and it would reflect well on him that he had been forbearing. So he offered another small smile.

“I am pleased to work with your company today. Let us see what we can make together.”

Lettie’s smile was relieved and gratified. “I appreciate your courtesy, Mr. Oropherson.”

“And I appreciate your honesty. I prefer to start off on that foot always.”

“So do I.”

Thran and Lettie walked back into the studio side by side. Again, the before-class stir stilled, and a few dancers murmured among themselves as Thran and Lettie rejoined Abebe, Irmo, Siobhan, and Rada by the piano.

“I explained the plan for this afternoon with Mr. Oropherson,” Lettie told the others quietly. “He’s graciously agreed to join us despite our confusion. I’m sure we all appreciate his patience with us, and with our lapse. I’m also sure we’ll all take pains not to let any more surprises creep into the proceedings.”

She directed a pointed look to Irmo, who only smiled. Thran was not encouraged at his dismissive stance, so he looked directly at the choreographer. He didn’t indulge in his Prince of Ice stare, but Legolas had endured his unwavering regard before and understood its seriousness.

“I thank UltraViolet for that consideration. Irmo, if I might have a brief word?”

“Of course.”

Thran and Irmo stepped off to the side. Thran turned his back to the rest of the room, and put more steel in his regard of the choreographer.

“You want to take me to task, then?” Irmo smiled.

“I do. You and I may make wonderful dances together, Irmo. But we will not do so unless you understand that surprises do not engender trust or rapport with anyone. I am no exception. You have been rude twice, the second time to others as well as me. It must stop if you want UltraViolet or me to trust in your visions. What is said about the great American game? Three strikes, and you are out?”

Irmo frowned. “But this collaboration is fate, Thran. You know this.”

“Right now, you want this collaboration more than I.”

Irmo’s eyes widened. “How can you feel so?”

“Because the rapport we need to make the most of us requires openness and honesty. If you cannot trust me enough to be open and honest with your plans, say so now, before either of us invests anything more.”

Irmo said nothing, as if he didn’t quite believe what Thran said.

With a shrug, Thran straightened. “Then this is your loss. Call me if you ever get to a point where you can offer such a collaboration, and perhaps we will talk again.”

“No, wait...” Irmo spread his hands slightly. “You are right, Thran. I will have to find the words. Sometimes, that is very hard, to explain. My brain, it runs so fast and so hard... it comes off as rudeness when I don’t intend it to. I merely try to keep up with what’s in here.” He waved his hand at his head.

“I have heard others say similar things,” Thran allowed. “But your visions are too large to bring to life without help, you understand? You must agree to speak as best you can to those who can help you make the visions, or your visions will never come to life.”

“You are right, you are right.” Irmo shook his head. “I can only say that I will do my best. I will try. But when the brain races, it will not be easy.”

“Honestly said. So, do we dance now?”

Irmo’s smile reappeared, if a bit more chagrined. “We do. The company is most excited to have you here.”

“And I am glad to be here, as long as there are no more surprises for anyone. Yes?”

“Yes,” Irmo nodded.

As Thran went back to the ballet master, he wondered how many times he’d have to give this same talk to Irmo, and how long it would take to prove whether such an investment was worth the effort. At least he still had three other companies to fall back on, if he decided Irmo was too high maintenance.

* * *

Class sorted itself out in short order. Thran took his place with the other dancers to begin the familiar sequence – only to find that not all of it was the familiar sequence. Thran had trained in both classical and contemporary ballet traditions, so was well familiar with steps and combinations used in both. He was not as familiar with modern traditions, so was interested to see what others brought from those. He was good-natured about not being as proficient in those, putting a more balletic than urban flavor into his steps, but Abebe was a good instructor to show him how to alter a position. There was a little partnering practice, which Thran enjoyed; the dancer he was paired with to do a Latin-infused sequence was shy, but very capable. When Irmo asked if she would loose her long hair out of the traditional bun, and for Thran to unwrap his braid as well, then repeat the sequence, the long locks flailing around them added a wilder, more sensual take on the steps.

“Again, with feeling,” Irmo called, smiling.

Thran quirked an eyebrow at Deela, and offered her his hand. “Let us make love together, then, ma petite.”

Her smile was a little wider as she put her hand in his. “I’ll follow your lead, Mr. Oropherson.”

“Thran, ma petite,” he grinned, drawing her hand up to kiss. “For the next two minutes, we are the closest of lovers.”
And off he swept her in time to a rhumba on the piano. Deela was still shy, but not as much, and it was a good pairing, fun when their hair intertwined and got in their eyes. If it had been Vileria dancing with him, she would have turned that tangling into a torrid affair, stroking the white hair out of Thran’s eyes with a seductive sweep that would have made him melt. The tiny Charisse would have done so sweetly, capturing him with her innocence. Deela did not compare to either of them, but it was a charming moment, all the same. When they came to a halt in the last pose, it was Thran who brushed the hair tenderly out of Deela’s eyes, turning the moment into devotion rather than lust.

“Well done!” Abebe nodded, and waved to the next couple to take their place.

Thran brushed another kiss on Deela’s hand, drawing a dimpled smile from her, then walked with her off to the side. Irmo ventured near, beckoning to Thran.

“May I prevail upon you to do your Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield?” he asked softly, when Thran had moved away from Deela. “Both the traditional way, and your way? I want the dancers to see the difference between emotion and collection.”

“I am well warmed,” Thran nodded. “I had expected to perform it today, so I am happy to do so. I have only to rebraid my hair.”

“Can you do it with your hair loose?” Irmo asked.

Thran considered. “Yes.”

“Then please, I ask you to do so. And please, dance it your way second. So that they are left with the correct impression.”

Thran smothered a smile. Perhaps he’d already made an impression – he’d gotten two pleases out of Irmo. “Of course. Do you have a machine to play the music? I have it on CD and thumb drive.”

“We do. Give me the CD, and I will take care of it.”

Thran got the CD from his bag and handed it to Irmo. “Track four.”

Irmo nodded, and moved away. Thran turned back to watch the other dancers, clapping when they were done.

When all the dancers were through the rhumba, Abebe gestured to Thran. “Mr. Oropherson came prepared for an audition, so he’s offered to perform his piece for us. He’ll do it twice; once in the traditional style, and once in a more personal style. Mr. Oropherson, the floor is yours.”

When Thran walked out with his knives, a murmur went around the room. Thran shook his loose hair over his shoulders, took his stance, and waited for the music.

The first time through, he pushed the rage and the fury, and learned where he needed to twist just a bit more to keep his hair from blinding him. He received enthusiastic applause, to which he bowed with a smile, took another two breaths, and then nodded to the pianist who ran the CD player. This time, the dance would be his.

As the first two powerful, dissonant chords blared, Thran thought about the control and inevitability that Bard had seen in his performance, and focused on that. His loose hair added a bit more wildness to the piece, or perhaps something more primeval. He went with that, making Death ancient, merciless, dispassionate, layered past human understanding. He ended this version in a different way, rising to his full height, knives at his side, sweeping the other dancers with his unblinking gaze. As the last note faded, he tilted his head, as if Death considered which soul He would collect next. It was a decidedly chilling moment, even for him – his skin flexed in gooseflesh from head to toe.

He broke the pose, offered his bow, and went to put his knives back in their box.

“Oh, gods,” someone whispered, just barely on the edge of Thran’s hearing, then more than casual applause broke out. He looked back at the company with a smile, and offered another bow, his hand to his heart.

“I think the only thing that can follow that is to stand down,” Abebe murmured, turning to Thran and offering his own bow. “That was magnificent. Thank you.”

“You are very welcome. Thank you for the patience to sit through it twice.”

As he took his place back at the barre to cool down, one of the ballerinas he passed leaned towards her neighbor. “I’d watch him do that forever and never get tired of it.”

“Neither would I,” sighed the other.

Thran smothered a smile as he rebraided his hair to stay out of his way as he cooled. In years to come, when he could no longer dance, such comments might ease his loss, or they might not. Today, however, they satisfied him. He had made the impression he wanted.

* * *

The class wound down, and Thran chatted with the other dancers as they made preparations to leave. Abebe spoke to him to offer his appreciation for Thran’s participation, and Lettie also came up to him. She offered him a small business card.

“I’d like to call you tomorrow, if that’d be convenient,” she asked.

“Of course. I have recently moved, but if you have another card, I will write down my number for you.”

She passed him a second card and a pen, and he quickly noted his name and number on it before handing it back to her. “I appreciate it. I hope tomorrow we can discuss a few things without so much Sturm und Drang swirling around us.”

He grinned. “But that is the nature of ballet, yes? Lots of Sturm und Drang.”

“Behind the scenes, I’d prefer a little less where that’s possible,” she admitted, laughing. “Again, I appreciate your patience with us, and the chance to talk further tomorrow.”

“Of course. I look forward to your call. Until tomorrow, then.”

“Until tomorrow.”

Irmo waited for him in the lobby, and fell into step with him as he walked out of the building and into the parking lot. “Great things have begun.”

Thran chuckled. “Perhaps. A great deal remains to be determined and settled. And I have three other companies to consider.”
“None of them are worth your time, Thran, I assure you.”

“Perhaps not. The coming days will tell.”

“Thran.” A hand fell on his arm, urging him to slow. “Believe me. We must do this together. We will change everything.”

“I see the chance of that as well as you, Irmo. I would like to take that chance as much as you. I believe we can take my Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield and make it only the first scene in a new ballet that will be unlike anything seen before. I want to see that happen. But we need more than your vision and my dancing. We need a solid corps, where UltraViolet is only the germ of one. We need a principal ballerina. We need backers, promoters, so much more. You must keep all the other things we need in mind, and you must support them, as you demand them to support your vision. No primos here, yes? Many together. Or this will not work.”

Irmo’s hand tightened on his arm before it slipped away. “You are right, of course. So right that it is infuriating. But that is my burden, not yours. The vision is very clear, and of course it is to create the rest of our ballet about Death on the battlefield and beyond. It is so clear to me. The vision is impatient, however, and hard to control. Thank the gods that you have the practicality that I do not. And you are not afraid to cross me. So... I will try, and you must continue to cross me. And then we will make this ballet.”

Thran nodded. “We will see. We will be in touch, I am sure.”

“Without doubt.” Irmo extended his hand. “It won’t be long.”

“Until later, then,” Thran shook hands. “À la prochaine.”

“A la prochaine.”

Thran drove home, trying not to think about the afternoon’s events. Better he let things settle for now, then consider them later when a little distance and a hard dose of reason would help him sort through the myriad impressions.

He grinned at himself in the rear view mirror. Of course the whole enterprise would be mad, impractical, and unreasonable. But so had been the beginning of his affair with a welder, and how well had that turned out?

* * *

Bard spent the afternoon as he’d spent the morning – on a ladder in the children’s bathroom. In the morning, he’d scraped paint, spackled, and sanded, then begun to prime the prepped walls. In the afternoon, he finished priming, and got the finished coat of gloss white paint on the ceiling. The woodwork needed stripping around the window and door, but at least there was no crown molding or baseboard molding. Tile covered the walls from the floor to halfway up, so the painting would take less time, too. The white wall tile was in decent shape, though the grout was discolored; he’d have to grind that out and replace it. But it would be nice to do something other than painting, so he set to stripping the woodwork with a will. If he could get that done before the children came home, he’d be happy.

He’d finished the window and half of the doorframe by the time the children clattered in. He shouted... down a greeting, and the thump of feet on the steps heralded the arrival of four bouncing children.

“Welcome home, all!” he greeted, wiping his hands on a rag. “How was school today?”

“A pain,” Sigrid groused, looking up at the ceiling. “That Mr. Saur is a menace. I’ve got another boring government paper to write on the ramifications of some legal case no one’s ever heard of. Dull, dull, dull!”

“I got new French words,” Tilda said. “Legolas, they’re all about food this week.”

“Then they won’t take you long to learn,” Legolas smiled. “You’ve got a good memory, Tilda. Bard, the ceiling is so much brighter now. It’s a big difference.”

“Yeah, now I can see that many more zits,” Bain snarked. “Gee, thanks, Da!”

“You’re welcome,” Bard chuckled.

“Where is Papa?” Legolas asked. “Isn’t he home from his audition yet?”

“No, he’s not,” Bard replied, “but I’m not too surprised. This one was with Irmo, that choreographer who was here last week, and I thought it might run late. Do you all want a snack while we wait for him?”

“Snack!” was the unanimous decision, so Bard made sure the stripper container was closed, and he’d scraped all the softened paint off, before they all headed downstairs. He washed his hands as the children unpacked their lunch bags and sorted through their papers for anything he or Thran had to cover. Tilda had a field trip notice, so Bard found a pen and signed that so that Tilda could put it back in her backpack. Bain and Legolas had the same order slip for a new workbook for their pre-algebra class, so Bard raided the household cash stash for the money they needed, and signed Bain’s slip.

“Is it okay if I sign yours, too, Legs, or do you want to wait for your Papa to do it?”

“I am here,” Thran said, coming into the mudroom. “What do you need?”

“Legs and Bain are getting new math workbooks,” Bard explained. “I’ve given them the money; just sign Legolas’s form, and he’ll be set.”

“Of course,” Thran came into the kitchen to give Legolas a hug. “Hello, synok, children, Bard! Where is the pen?”

Legolas handed it to him as the other children greeted Thran.

“How was your audition?” Bard asked as Thran sorted out the form for Legolas and returned it to him. “Was there any drama about it, as you expected?”

“Of course,” Thran grinned. “So much that I am quite hungry. Do we eat early, or have a snack now?”

“The children wanted snacks, but the chili’s ready, and the cornbread takes only twenty minutes, so we can have supper now if you want.”

“I am very hungry,” Thran confessed. “Supper, please?”

“I’ll marshal the troops.” Bard scanned the children. “Let’s feed the hungry dancer, all.”
Bard mixed the cornbread and put it in the oven while the children set the table, made salad, and prepared fruit. Thran sprinted upstairs to change out of his dance things and into soft leggings, Henley, and sweater, and soon they sat down to supper. As hungry as everyone was, it was no surprise that the only sounds that broke the silence for some minutes were chewing and the clink of flatware against bowls and plates. Thran’s audition must have been strenuous; Bard didn’t have to encourage him to have two big bowls of chili, salad, his favorite raspberries, and a human-sized slice of cornbread with butter.

“I needed every mouthful of that,” Thran sighed, sitting back in his chair. “Thank you, Bard!”

“What’s for dessert?” Legolas asked. “Any cake?”

“Just for you, Legolas, we have cake,” Bard replied. “Chocolate peanut butter chip.”

A chorus of eager hums from more than Legolas met that announcement, so it took no encouragement to get the table cleaned off and the cake plates out. Even Thran was persuaded to have a slice. It had no icing, but that didn’t deter Legolas from having a huge slab, and Bain, Sigrid, and Tilda were no less enthusiastic. When all was said and done, half of the confection was devoured. Bard poured hot water to brew tea in the big teapot while they cleaned up the dishes, then the children settled with their tea and homework around the kitchen table while Thran and Bard retired to the sitting room.

Bard listened as Thran described the initial turmoil surrounding his audition, then the subsequent abeyance. “How long do you think that’ll last?”

Thran shrugged. “Perhaps not long, perhaps longer than I expect. I will be interested to see what the artistic director says to me tomorrow when she calls.”

Bard mulled. “I don’t know, Thran. I’m not trying to tell you what to do. But this whole thing seems dodgy to me.”

Thran nodded. “It is dodgy. Mr. Nori has taken many very hard looks at this from several aspects. The initial signs are not good. The company is underfunded, lacks a home venue, and is very small. The dancers are all well skilled, and some are well able to do solo work. But there are no principal-quality dancers. Even if I join them, it needs other principals, especially a ballerina.”

“Those are the cons,” Bard nodded. “What are the pros?”

“An erratic choreographer with the ability to dream. A very skilled ballet master. An honest, devoted artistic director. And me, if I join them.”

“Do they have any works they can perform?”

“A few chestnuts. They need new works, to be sure. That is one thing I hope you will help me with.”

“Me?” Bard’s eyebrows shot up nearly to his hairline. “I don’t know a thing about ballets.”

“No, but you know how to make a good story. The story of the seer and the king was very good. You came up with the name for my performance piece, Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield. What can you make of that, to make a complete tale?”

Bard’s initial reaction was to say that he couldn’t make anything out of it. But the denial died on his lips as soon as he thought that. Hadn’t he told Sigrid back in the apartment that he’d never been good in history class, because he liked his stories better? And hadn’t he come up with some interesting twists he hoped to try when he and Thran had their game in the artist’s garret? He owed Thran so much – he could at least try to think of something.

“I’ll... think about it. Can I have a few days? Maybe we can toss a few ideas around about it?”

Thran nodded. “Of course. I will not decide to work with a company for a few more days, if at all. Much needs to be worked out, and I want you to be part of my decision.”

“I want what will make you happy,” Bard shrugged. “Whatever that is, I’ll support it.”

“I want what will make us all happy, lyubov moya.”

“So do I, long term. If the short term offers some things that aren’t that easy, but it’s only for a while, then I’m fine with that, too.”

“We will see what the next week brings, then,” Thran rubbed Bard’s knee slowly and sipped his tea. "For the moment, though, I am free to do as I like tomorrow, so our game can go forward without hindrance.”

The look on Thran’s face was sly, which enticed a similar expression to twitch at Bard’s lips. “It can, can it? Then I have one thing to add to it.”

Thran’s eyes slid to his. “Do you?”

Bard nodded. He let his smile wax a bit more. “Tell the bored, oversexed ballet dancer that he’d better bring cash. The kind of artist he’s going to see doesn’t take credit cards.”

Thran’s eyes widened, and he smothered a delighted snicker. “Oooh. Perhaps the bored, oversexed ballet dancer might not be the top, after all.”

“I give it even odds.”

Thran didn’t have a chance to reply, as Tilda came in with her French words. That suited Bard. Teasing Thran was as incendiary as pouring gasoline on a fire. Between now and tomorrow afternoon, Bard intended to pour just as much gasoline on his husband’s fire as he could. The resulting conflagration would offer the perfect way to consume them both.
Chapter 56

Chapter Summary

While the angel spends his morning on the phone dealing with the hard realities of business, the saint muses about myths and legends. What can they make of the saint's musings?

“I hate to point this out, cariad,” Bard said, as he and Thran snuggled into bed that night.

“What, lyubov moya?” Thran replied sleepily, snuggling against Bard’s chest.

“You won’t be able to exact revenge for me biting you. I looked when we were in the shower tonight. Not a sign of a mark on your perfect skin.”

Thran’s hum was disappointed. “Suka blyad. I had forgotten, but you are right. No mark.” His sigh was exaggerated mock annoyance. “I will have to think of some other way to have my way with you.”

“What, you haven’t thought about tomorrow?”

“Oh, I have thought quite a lot about tomorrow. This artist who takes only cash... I am intrigued. We shall see if the bored, oversexed dancer can find something to do with his cash.”

Bard grinned. “I hope we will. When does the dancer want the artist to be ready?”

“I suspect that I will be on the phone most of the morning, but I hope to do my barre and yoga before that. So we will have the school drill for the children and breakfast. Then I will go to the ballroom and you will renovate, and we will see what happens after that. Perhaps an early lunch, then we will go adventuring?”

“Sounds good.”

“How much money should the dancer bring?”

“Not much. Tens and twenties. The artist’s counterculture.”

“Counterculture? What is that?”

Bard rubbed Thran’s shoulder slowly as he smiled. “The dancer will find out tomorrow.”

Thran’s growl rumbled through Bard’s chest. “You fight dirty.”

“I learned from one of the best.”

Thran chuckled low in his throat. “And little did I realize what delight I would give us both when I began.”

“So go to sleep. You won’t enjoy tomorrow nearly as much if you’re tired.”

“How am I to sleep, imagining this artist who awaits his dancer?”
“Do you need to take the edge off?”

“No. I want to save all for tomorrow.”

“Then you’ll have to find some other way to fall asleep.”

Thran grumbled. “Then rub my hip, the way you do so deliciously.”

“Here?”

“A little lower. Ah. Yes. There. Slowly. What that does to me…”

“I hope it puts you to sleep.”

“It relaxes me. There must be nerves there that you soothe so well. Mmm. Yes. Like that. So good.”

Bard rubbed slowly. Gradually Thran’s breathing deepened, and his body relaxed against Bard’s. The dancer sighed, stroking Bard’s shoulder and arm in the same slow, gentle strokes that he enjoyed so much. It was only a few minutes before Thran squeezed his shoulder with light fingers.

“Ya lyublyu tebya, zoloto moyo,” Thran breathed softly.

“Garu di.”

Neither of them stayed awake for long after that.

* * *

The morning progressed smoothly. It was good to see how quickly the family had come to a rhythm so that all awoke to calm and quiet, the children had a good breakfast, and Bard and Thran worked well together to make the children’s lunches and have their own porridge. The trip out to the bus stop was brisk, for the temperature had fallen even lower last night, and all of the children were eager to jump around to generate a little heat. Rosie was at the bus stop, so she and Bard talked about their upcoming soup supper on Friday. They decided to make an afternoon of it, making their concoctions in the afternoon together in Bard’s kitchen, which would give the eight children time to play together outside. The sitting room fireplace could offer a warm greeting to everyone when they came inside, and after supper marshmallows and popcorn would make an appearance. Bard would make chicken vegetable soup and carrot ginger soup, and Rosie would make potato bacon cheese soup and mushroom bisque. Various appetizers and desserts would also appear.

“We will never eat so much food on Friday,” Thran murmured as he and Bard returned to the house. “Four kinds of soup?”

“Don’t count on leftovers,” Bard cautioned him as they shed their coats in the mudroom. “I thought Legolas might want to ask Kíllian and Tara to come, and Sigrid might want to ask Finn. Sam and Rosie’s children are closer to Tilda’s age, and the older children would have some their own age to be with. That’d make fifteen people. You haven’t seen how much food this lot will go through. It’ll all be delicious; both Rosie and Sam are good cooks. Sam makes beer on the side, too, so I expect some of that’ll make an appearance. It’ll probably be in Rosie’s potato bacon cheese soup, too. That’s nothing but decadence in a bowl.”
“I will ask Legolas. This will be a big gathering,” Thran said, looking around the kitchen. “I look forward to it. But now, I must go to the barre. I will take my mobile with me so that I will hear it if Lettie Jenkins calls early.”

“I’ll haul myself up to the children’s bathroom. I’m almost through stripping the woodwork. Then I’ll grind out the old wall grout. Better I do that before I paint any of the rest, so the grit flying around doesn’t end up in the new paint.”

“It will be exciting when the paint goes on,” Thran’s eyes widened. “That deep turquoise will turn it into a jewel.”

“I think so, too. Then the floor and the towel bars, and we’ll be in business. Oh, we’ll need to cycle the children through our shower tonight because of the grout. So hide your expensive soap, or certain small folks will be tempted to sample.”

“I will do that,” Thran laughed ruefully. He kissed Bard quickly. “Now. To the barre. I will see you shortly, my saint.”

“Happy yoga, angel. See you soon.”

Thran collected his mobile and a fresh cup of tea, and took himself off to the ballroom. Bard got his own tea and a couple of things from the fridge, and headed upstairs. Before he started work on the bathroom, he headed up to the room on the third floor where later today an artist and a dancer would tempt each other. He opened the window long enough to stash his couple of items from the fridge between the window and the storm window, then closed it. He swept the floor, made sure his old bed had enough linen to make it comfortable, then pulled open the access hatch to the attic.

Against the attic wall by one of the chimneys was the huge mirror in an ornate, gilded frame that had come with the house. Bard had contacted the previous owner when he’d found it in the attic, for the frame alone was substantial, if in need of repair, but Jerry had been too harried by creditors to want to bother with it, and had told Bard to keep it. Bard and Daphne had left it in place, hoping to use it in the main room once they’d renovated it, because Bard had liked the old wood and gesso frame. He and Daphne had never gotten far enough in their renovations to use it, but as elaborate as the frame was, it was fitting that its first appearance in the house would be to reflect an outrageous ballet dancer.

Bard wiped the mirror clean, wrestled it out of the attic, and got it into the room. The mirror looked even more massive propped up against the eight-foot wall, for it was only inches shorter than that. He carted up a couple of chairs from the children’s study, and a couple of sketchbooks and a handful of pencils from the sitting room. He went back into the attic to fetch an old wooden fruit crate that had also been in the house when he’d first bought it. A handful of things went atop the crate, then he shut the access hatch with a smile of anticipation.

Back in the bathroom, he set aside his thoughts of what the afternoon might bring to consider Thran’s request for a story that might become a ballet. What made a good theatrical story? Death was already in the mix for this tale, so as Bard finished stripping the woodwork, he thought about all the treatments that Death had gotten in the films and plays he’d seen, in the books and poems he’d read. Death was always the victor, no matter the valor of the hero, the sweetness of the heroine – oh, that was something this tale needed, a heroine, but back to the inevitability of Death. That always won. Everyone knew it, everyone expected it, every tale embodied it.

Thran would dance the role of Death – that much was certain. His dance with the knives proved that he had the skill, the temperament, and the presence to handle that. He was an exceptional dancer, and he would bring exceptional power to anything he danced. He would be just as inevitable a power as Death itself.

Unbidden, Thran as the beleaguered seer, compelled to abject submission because of another inevitability, the biology of pheromones, came to mind. The same dancer who danced Death so compellingly had cowered on the floor, pathetically pleading for a king to mount him, to take him like an animal, because that was the only way to save his life. He’d been no less convincing as the seer as he had been as Death.

What bested Death? What could bring Death as low as the seer? Or lower?

He thought about that as he finished stripping the woodwork, and started to grind out old grout. He also thought about what made a good spectacle, because what was the point of a small tale when it was about Death, and its star was Thran? A proper spectacle had lots of action, angst, a hero, a villain, a brave girl whom everyone adored, a love triangle, a little treachery, a seeming doom, and a last minute rescue.

So, again... what bested Death?

That occupied Bard through three and a half walls of grout.

Years ago, there had been some film, play, book... something...

A film. A film with a tag line that had nearly crushed him.

He’d never seen it. In fact, he’d refused even to find out what it was about, merely because of that devastating tag line. Gods, how badly had he wished that he’d never heard it? Daphne had not been dead long, and he’d been barely able to function to keep body and soul together for the children. Just when he’d thought he couldn’t sink any lower, he’d had to leave this house for a grotty apartment to care for the children. Then a three-word tag line from a film he’d never heard of had echoed everywhere until he dreamed about it at night. It had been a condemnation, an accusation, a punishment, a surety that he’d never recover, never get over Daphne’s death, never move past it. It had snuffed all hope, and spirited all expectation of future recovery out of reach.

Three words had done that. Just three words.

Love Never Dies.

He’d never be free of his grief, his despair, his emptiness.

Yet... ten years on, long after he’d given up everything of himself, an angry angel had appeared to give him everything he’d needed and more – salve for his grief, love for the future, happiness for them both that grew every day. Now those three words held nothing but promise, and rather than doom, they had become anticipation, full of the hope he’d longed for.

Love Never Dies.

By the time Bard finished the fourth wall, he knew what would make the core of Thran’s ballet. Death would be the star, but Death would not be the victor. Death would fall to Love.

As Bard vacuumed away all the grout dust, he smiled behind his filter mask. Maybe he wasn’t such a bad storyteller, after all.

Once the dusty remnants of old grout were vacuumed, wiped, and vacuumed again, Bard let the air clear while he contemplated his next step. It would make sense to paint first, so that splatters didn’t stain the new grout. It took only twenty minutes to prime the bare woodwork. He put the ladder in the corner, poured the bright turquoise paint into the roller pan, and climbed up to start the wall over the door. He worked quickly yet neatly, and had the first wall cut in and filled in short order.

“Oh, my saint, the color is luscious!” Thran exclaimed, coming into the bathroom to look up at the walls. “With the white walls and fixtures, it is just the small jewel box I thought it would be.”

“I like it, too.” Bard looked at the wall with a critical eye, smiling. “It may need a third coat to get the coverage perfect, but it won’t be like painting one of the children’s rooms. The paint has to cover only half as much wall in here.”

“How many coats it takes, it will be worth it.”

“It will. Did you get through your barre and yoga before your mobile rang?”

“For the most part, yes. Lettie does not need to know that I finished my cooling poses while I talked to her.”

“How did your conversation with her go?”

Thran rolled his eyes and gestured with his hands. “Which one? I have spent hours with the phone pressed to my ear. First with her, then Mr. Nori, then her again, and then both of them together. Then her and the dance master. Then all of them together. It was a marathon.”

“It must be good if you talked so long, I’d think?”

Thran rolled his eyes again. “It is not yet clear. This is a mad venture, Bard. Quite mad. It still may not come together.”

“I notice you didn’t mention Irmo.”

“With reason. He has no head for the things we talked about – logistics and practicalities and financing and personnel... the list of things Irmo has no head for is long. We all agree that he has great vision, and we all agree that as difficult as making this come to pass, something amazing will result. But... there is much to do. We do not even have a tale to tell yet.”

“I... might have something about that,” Bard offered tentatively. “It’s just a start, but... eh, maybe it is, maybe it isn’t.”

Thran’s eyes sharpened. “I would like to hear what you have thought of, lyubov moya.”

“What time is it? Are you off the mobile for a bit? If it’s lunchtime, I can tell you over lunch.”

Thran fished his mobile from the pocket of his thick sweater. “Eleven-twenty,” he offered. “Time for an early lunch?”

“I’ll clean out the paint tray, wash the brushes, and we’ll eat.”

“Give me the roller. I will wash it while you do the paint tray.”

Bard handed it over. Thran disappeared downstairs with the roller; Bard soon followed with the empty paint tray and brush. It was funny to come into the mudroom to see Thran in his tights and top, sweater discarded as he scrubbed the roller vigorously in the laundry sink. When he was done, Bard took care of the brush and tray, and they left everything to dry.

“What do you feel like for lunch?” Bard asked, sticking his head in the fridge. “Chicken and salad, of course, leftover chili – not much of that – enough cheese to choke a dairy, and... the tail end of last week’s meat loaf.”

“Chili or chicken, whatever we have most of,” Thran said, bringing out plates and cups. "Tea?"

“Always good,” Bard agreed. “There’s enough chili for two, but that’s it.”

“Something warm is always my preference.”

“Chili it is.” Bard brought out the container, scraped the contents into a bowl, and stuck it in the microwave.

“So tell me about what you considered for our story.”

Bard described what he thought the ballet should include – spectacle, romance, angst, and so on. Thran listened attentively, nodding along the way.

“All good things,” Thran agreed. “So...?”

Bard got the bowl of chili from the microwave, and nudged it towards Thran to take what he wanted. Of course, Thran didn’t take enough, so Bard plopped one more big spoonful into his bowl before Thran could carry it to the table. At Thran’s look, Bard shrugged.

“I can’t eat all of the rest myself, angel, and it’s not enough to put back in the fridge. And you need the nourishment.”

“How you fuss, my saint,” Thran shook his head, but he left what Bard had added to his bowl and carried it to the table. Bard snared the fruit bowl and carried it with his chili after Thran. “So we need spectacle, a winsome heroine, Death incarnate, other things. And what did you come up with?”

“This needs to include something new. What’s always true about Death? It’s inevitable. But what if it’s not? What if something conquered Death?”

Thran’s eyebrows went up. “I like that.”

“I do, too, and not just because it’s different – because you can pull it off. I’ve seen you become Death. I’ve seen you become a wretched seer forced to the lowest low, too, just as believably. Imagine what the reaction will be when first you make Death invincible, and then you make Him fall?”

Thran’s eyes met Bard’s. They were sober, measuring. “What will make Death fall?”

“Love.”

“Good. A basic, elemental theme,” Thran nodded slowly. “And does Death fall in love, or does it come upon Him as love between others, and in either case how does that kill Him?”

“I haven’t gotten very far on that, but... suppose there’s a war. That’d make a good rousing start to things, a big fight. And when it’s over, Death comes down to collect the souls of the dead. So the big battle first, then a silence, then your dance. At the end, He sees people coming to the battlefield to search for their kin, and He sees a girl looking for her brother or sweetheart or something, and He falls in love with her in an instant. And just as He is about to take the soul of one of the dead soldiers, the girl spots the dead man as the one she’s looked for, but he’s not quite dead, and so Death has to back off. He watches the girl tend to her soldier, not interfering, but He remembers the girl. That’s as far as I’ve gotten.”
“It is a good start!” Thran nodded, eyes bright. “It has much to recommend it. And perhaps I can take it a little farther.”

“Do. What comes next?”

Thran spooned up his chili as he thought. “Ah. We must have the poor soldier recover, so that he and his beloved – for of course they must be deeply in love – can dance a pas de deux that shows how deeply they are in love, how devoted they are. Then there must be a second battle, and the poor soldier does not survive this one, and so Death comes to collect his soul, and the soldier’s beloved is left to wail and mourn. When the soldier is brought to the Underworld, there must be a dance with the corps to show the shadowy land of the dead. Of course, the soldier’s beloved must grieve so piteously for him that she desperately comes to the court of the underworld to sue for his return.”

“That sounds great. Some good dances with everyone, then some solos, and some pairs, all mixed together. Um, please don’t make this like so many operas where it takes forever to say anything and everyone’s sick of it all before the first intermission.”

Thran burst out laughing as he reached for a cluster of grapes from the fruit bowl. “Ah. You are not an aficionado of the opera.”

“Daphne cured me of that. In art school, she bought tickets for us on our student cards to see all four operas of Wagner’s Ring Cycle. Seventeen hours over four days, it was. I never wanted to see another opera again.”

Thran kept laughing. “Oh, lyubov moya, that was a hard introduction to opera. Only the most enthusiastic of opera lovers can endure The Ring of the Nibelung in its entirety in such a concentrated dose.”

Bard gave a pained grin. “It was like drinking from a fire hose – lots of screaming, a dumb story, and way too long. I know, I know, I’m a barbarian who doesn’t appreciate German opera. I learned a long time after that some operas weren’t anything like Wagner, and weren’t half bad. Carmen is good. No screaming, a story that makes sense, and not nearly so long.”

“So we will keep it in mind to make a succinct ballet so that barbarians will enjoy it, too,” Thran grinned. He took another spoonful of chili. “So if our winsome heroine comes to the court of the underworld to sue for her soldier’s soul, what will be Death’s response?”

Bard thought as he ate another two spoons full of chili. “Hmm. If Death is in love with the heroine, then maybe He says she can have her soldier back, but only if.... hmm. Only if what? Only if she stays in the underworld with Death? Wasn’t there a myth about a goddess who had to stay with Hades because she ate pomegranate seeds?”

“Persephone, yes,” Thran nodded.

“So the brave heroine agrees because she would rather see her soldier returned to life than dead in the underworld. Then you could have a dance about how much Death loves the heroine, maybe showers her with gifts and luxuries, but all she has sees is the memory of her soldier, and she doesn’t so much reject Death as just not see Him.”

“Oooh, that is very good!” Thran agreed. “I like that very much! What an interesting pas de deux that would make. So the heroine is in the underworld, Death is in the underworld, but the soldier is in the land of the living. But he loves the heroine as much as she loves him, yes? So he despair and grieves and mourns just as much, and so he comes to the court of the underworld to undo the pact.”
“To which Death says, no deal, because you still live,” Bard added excitedly. “And the soldier says what about when I die? Will you still hold my beloved?”

“And Death says no, He cannot hold her after the soldier’s death, so the soldier –”

“Kills himself,” they both chorused.

“Of course!” Thran said excitedly. “Right in the court, he stabs himself, and there he falls. And so as Death stoops to take his soul, He banishes the heroine from the court, and just as the gates to the underworld close, she –”

“Yes! She picks up the soldier’s knife and stabs herself, and then runs into the underworld just as the gates close.”

“Yes! And then there will be a wonderful pas de trois, as Death tries to lure the soul of the heroine away from the soul of the soldier, but He cannot because –”

Thran nodded. “So it does not. Their souls are bound together too strongly, and resist even the pull of Death. Thus Death falls defeated. Then perhaps the other gods take pity on the two lovers, and turn them into stars in the sky – twin stars that can never be separated, and will always be together.”

Bard nodded, gratified that his germ of an idea had grown into such a tale. “What do you think? It’s certainly theatrical enough.”

“Without doubt. And it will suit Irmo. He will make this into something amazing.”

“Does UltraViolet have dancers who can do the soldier and the heroine?”

“There is one male soloist I think would be up to the challenge. No ballerina, unfortunately. Do you remember Charisse, who so admired your sketch of her? She would be perfect for it. She is so small that it would further reinforce the difference between the mortal heroine and the immortal Death. We have danced together before, and it would be a good pairing. But I do not know the state of her contract, nor whether we could arrange with her company for her to be on loan to UltraViolet for the time it would take to mount this ballet. But we have a story that has merit to it. That is more than we had a moment ago.”

Thran savored his satisfaction a moment longer, then turned an affectionate look on Bard. “Thank you, lyubov moya.”

Bard felt heat in his cheeks. “Glad it helped.”

“So... are you through your lunch now?” Thran asked innocently, but the warmth in his eyes had already begun to turn from affection to something far from innocent.

“Maybe,” Bard plucked a grape from the fruit bowl and munched casually. “I might like a few more of these.”

“I cannot hold the bored, oversexed dancer in check much longer,” Thran warned. “His attention span is very short.”

“I guess I’d better clean up the dishes, then,” Bard wiggled his eyebrows at his husband. He carried his empty bowl and glass to the sink. “I wouldn’t want that attention span to drift too far off.”
“I will see to the dishes,” Thran said, bringing his dishes behind Bard. “You will dress the artist. Call down when the artist is on his way to his garret, then I will dress the dancer, and be up shortly after.”

Bard put a hand over Thran’s buttock and squeezed gently. “I love you when you’re... eager.”

Thran snickered. “Then you must love me very much right now. Go.”

“I hear and obey, my angel.”

Thran eyed him up and down as Bard headed out of the kitchen. “Before long, I hope so.”

Laughing, Bard left his husband in the kitchen and took the stairs up to their bedroom two at a time. He brushed his teeth. He dug through his dresser for the pair of rings he rarely wore anymore, and got one of them in each earlobe without too much pain. Off came his renovation clothes, and on went a pair of battered jeans he wore out in the barn and a flannel shirt so limp, frayed, and faded from repeated washings that it was hard to tell that it had once been plaid. He rolled the sleeves up sketchily past his elbows, and left the top two buttons undone. Heavily scarred leather belt, wallet on a chain in the back pocket, steel-toed boots, a couple of hemp bracelets on his right wrist, an old ratty scarf looped around his neck, a battered ring with a wolf’s head on it on his right hand where his wedding ring should be. A handful of Thran’s hair goop kept his hair back out of his eyes, though how long that would last gave Bard something to lick his lips about.

“Elvis has left the building!” he called down the stairs, and headed upstairs when Thran laughed.

He let himself into the room, pulled the whipped cream and chocolate syrup out of the window, and set them down by his chair. He lit the trio of candles, then the incense, then his cigarette. He sat down, tilted his chair back against the grey plaster wall, and waited.

* * *

“Elvis has left the building!” Bard shouted down the stairs.

Thran laughed, then drained the last of his tea before he headed upstairs. Yes, his saint was gone, replaced with what Thran did not know. But he had his own transformation to make. He brushed his teeth, then ducked into the closet to strip off his clothing. When he was naked, he took the leather pants that had drawn such a long look from Bard, shimmied into them, and pulled the laces tight. They rode so low on his hips that the only reason he’d never been arrested for public nudity was the whiteness of his pubic hair. He bypassed the satin jacket, and perused Bard’s clothes until he found a black tee shirt emblazoned with the sinister logo of some nihilistic band. Heavy motorcycle boots added another couple of inches to his height, and small round dark glasses made him look as if he’d stepped out of the pages of a Japanese manga. He left off most of the junky jewelry that went with the rock star costume, but on consideration, he put the silver dog chain around his neck. It might look very nice around the neck of an artist.

He came out into the bedroom to bend and stretch, letting the leather pants conform to his body. He wanted them to be a supple second skin that left nothing to the imagination. When they were warm, he came out of the bedroom and headed up the stairs.

The bored, oversexed dancer was about to meet a dodgy counterculture artist.
Chapter 57

Chapter Summary

The game's afoot! In this corner, an oversexed dancer who isn't what he seems; in that corner, an artist with a secret. This will be a dirty fight.

Chapter Notes

A head's up... in this game, our guys get a little sleazy, a little rough, and talk a lot of trash. Be warned. There be neither saints nor angels here.

Yes, I know... I will burn in hell for this. But I'm already there, so...

The door before Thran was battered, unlabeled, and far from inspiring. What else did he expect in this scuzzy part of town? If the rest of the coven hadn’t been so insistent that he’d find the perfect cure for his boredom here, he would have turned on his heel, found Sergei, and coaxed him into... something. At least that would take enough of his edge off that he could look for something more satisfying. But here he was.

He banged on the door.

“It’s open.”

Thran swept through the door, then stuttered to a stop when he saw how small the room was – nothing more than an attic garret. Greying and dinged plaster walls; bare, scuffed pine floor. It was midnight outside, but it was one full of garish neon and glaring streetlights. In here, the glare was mostly blocked behind dusty green cotton draperies. What light came in was further filtered through limp, browning lace curtains, and three guttering candles in mismatched silver candlesticks cast darting shadows on the walls. Two filmy windows, one on the wall facing him, and one on the wall to his left –

Movement drew his eye, but it was his reflection that gazed back at him. In the corner of the room, between the two windows, leaned a huge, fly-spotted mirror in an ornate yet battered gilt frame. In front of the mirror was an empty chair, also battered with frayed upholstery. A narrow bed, more cot than anything else, was lengthwise against the wall to his left. To his right was a fruit crate pulled out of some ancient rubbish heap, and another dilapidated chair –

Oh, my. That chair was occupied. Well occupied.

Where to begin to describe this beauty? Perhaps at the bottom - scuffed, brutal boots, scruffy jeans that were likely filthy, one foot on the fruit crate, the other on the floor, legs tantalizingly wide, chair tilted back against the wall. Equally filthy shirt open at the neck, revealing a chest temptingly covered in dark hair, though a ratty blue scarf looped around the neck obscured more of that than Thran preferred. Mmm, hunky body, well endowed under the ratty jeans. Strong forearms – oh, gods, hemp bracelets and chunky ring and a chained wallet, such delicious, clichéd tokens of the rough boys he liked to subdue.

Maybe the coven had been right. The body had possibilities. What about the face?

The face was beautiful, with warm brown eyes and a scruffy beard, framed in a cascade of tangled brown hair – and earrings? Oh, gods, how enticing was that? A small ring pierced each earlobe, part forbidden exotic, part biker, complete tease. And did this vision... smoke?

It wasn’t a joint, though it looked like one. The smell was wrong. Some sort of herbal thing, though only gods knew what was in it. Hints of vanilla, perhaps... hard to tell in the swirl of patchouli that hazed the air. The artist wasn’t stoned; in fact, he looked at him with coolly assessing eyes and an amused smile. In his lap was a sketchpad; in his hand, a pencil that darted over the paper.

Not a drawing appeared anywhere in the room.

“Where is the art?” Thran demanded.

“That depends.”

“On what?”

“On what kind of art you want.”

“What kind is there?”

The artist shrugged. “If you want your art in a glass, there’s a bar two doors down. If you want ink under your skin or a ring in your cock, that’s next door. If you want to explore the dichotomy between the gods and humanity with your choice of partners, that’s next door, too, one flight up.”

His voice was soft, Welsh accented, and completely at ease, as if Thran’s staying or going was immaterial.

“What about you? What kind of art do you do?”

The artist held up his pencil.

“Show me something.”

The artist took a drag on his cigarette as he held up his sketchpad. There was a distinctive picture of Thran standing in the doorway, from top of long white hair and black glasses, to bottom of heavy motorcycle boots, and everything in between. So few lines, but him without mistake – those few lines revealed the carriage of the dancer he’d been long ago, as well as his arrogance and impatience. He flicked his gaze to the artist’s face; he got another small, assured smile, but this one was veiled in tendrils of smoke that curled from his mouth and nose.

His boredom vanished with the last caress of the smoke.

“That is very good.”

The artist nodded once in appreciation.

“Show me more.”

“Forty dollars gets you an hour’s worth.”

“That is not much for something that good.”
Another single nod. “I’m not in it for the money.”

“What are you in it for?”

A little wider smile. “One thing or another.”

Thran dug into the back pocket of his pants and pulled out a handful of bills. He peeled off a pair of twenties, folded the rest back into his pocket, and held the twenties out between his index and middle fingers. The artist put his chair back on the floor, leaned forward to take the bills, and stuffed them in the front pocket of his jeans. He moved with deliberation, no wasted effort, but the hint of lean ribs and abs made Thran’s loins tighten in anticipation. Yes, this was a morsel worth pursuing. It would be a slow pursuit, but all the sweeter once he teased this artist out of his blasé calm.

The artist pointed to the chair. “Have a seat. Or not. Up to you. If you like to look at yourself, there’s the mirror.”

Thran angled the chair towards the artist, who took a last drag on his cigarette, and stubbed the butt out on the fruit crate. Thran preened a little at his reflection, shaking his hair over his shoulders, then turned around to perch on the chair, legs wide, hands leaning on the seat of the chair in front of his crotch. He didn’t need to look back at himself in the mirror to know when he’d arched his back just the amount, because the artist’s lips curved the merest hair and smoke curled around him again.

“Do you want a lot of quick sketches, or fewer detailed ones?”

“You showed me a quick one. Show me a detailed one.”

“Full on, or just torso?”

“Full on.”

The artist nodded, unperturbed and unmoved at Thran’s brusque reply. His eyes were already on his sketchpad, glancing up at Thran in a dispassionate way as he worked. It wasn’t Thran’s habit to remain still or silent for long, but he made a game of it, imagining the artist undressing him with each glance, then caressing him, then trembling under the touches Thran gave in return. It was an arousing way to spend the five minutes it took the artist to finish his sketch. He turned around his sketchpad to show the image to Thran.

More lines revealed more details, all of them dead accurate – his lean body, his unnaturally pale skin, the faint sheen of his leather pants, the gleam of the silver dog chain around his neck. There was enough predatory sexual tension in the picture to make Thran’s loins clench again, but the artist was unmoved.

“That is very good, too. You are very good. Too good to work next to a brothel and a tat parlor.”

Another smile. “As I said, I’m not in it for the money. Though that’s not bad.”

“Oh?”

“I get a lot of traffic. They start at the bar and work their way down. The tat parlor cuts me a commission if I do an ink design for someone. The meat palace cuts me another if I refer them. The clock’s ticking, friend. Take another pose.”

“What kind of pose?”

“Up to you. You pose, I draw.”
“Do I have to stay in the chair?”

The artist shook his head. “Chair, floor, against the wall, on the bed... whatever you want. I’ll slide the bed over if you want it in front of the mirror.”

Thran sat backwards in the chair and looked over his shoulder at the artist. “Tell me about the people who come here.”

“A fair number of them do, once they loosen up.”

What a tease, to utter such a line with a complete lack of heat, only factual amusement as he drew his pencil over the paper! Thran’s tongue traced along the bottom of his top lip. “If they have the balls to come here, I would think they would be loose enough.”

“Some,” the artist nodded, looking at his sketchbook. “Repeat traffic know what they want to see. Kids, though... some have to... screw up their courage.”

“Screw up their courage?”

“They make a night of it. Out to do something that’d shock their parents. Get a drink at the bar on a fake ID, get a tat, then they come here to see how far they’ll go. Maybe just pose, maybe flash a little skin. Other things.”

“Such as?”

An amused smile. “Girls make out with each other, maybe show their tits, maybe play with each other. Boys make out, flash a little cock, maybe a few hand jobs, maybe a little oral.” He looked up at Thran. “Does that tell you what you want to know?”

“What do I want to know?”

“What kind of art you want.”

“Tell me how many work up to do more than caresses and hand jobs.”

“More than you’d think.”

“Do they fuck for you?”

“They fuck for themselves.”

“Quite an eyeful.”

The artist bit his lower lip. This time, his smile was sly, not so blasé. “It’s their forty dollars. I don’t judge.”

Thran merely nodded, but inside, a wolf licked his chops. “Ah. You like to watch.”

The artist’s smile widened the slightest bit as he studied his sketchpad. He held up the pad to show the finished piece, another good one. “Next pose.”

“Suggest one.”

“Look at yourself in the mirror. Put your hand on the frame. Yes, like that. Um, maybe like you’re pushing against the frame. Good. Hold that.”
This one took longer, so when the artist indicated that he was done, Thran came to look at it. It was a complex piece for as fast as it had been sketched, showing both Thran and the room around him, as well as his mirror image and the reflected room. It was a moody piece, and unclear at first glance which was the reflection.

“I like this one very much. Very much, indeed.”

“Next pose.”

“Suggest another one.”

The artist’s gaze flickered, furtive as it scanned him up and down. “Do you strip?”

“If you mean take my clothes off, yes. If you mean perform, only for my lovers.”

“Lucky lovers.”

“No luckier than yours.”

Did that smile last a second longer? “Do you want artistic? Character study? You’d make a good Vargas boy.”

“The last one.”

He bit his lip again, and shifted a bit on his chair. Thran was as focused on those faint movements as any hawk intent on prey. “Ditch the shirt and the glasses.”

Thran pulled his tee shirt off, tilted his head as he took off his black glasses, and stared down at the artist without embarrassment.

“Put the glasses on the stool. Then put the shirt around the back of your neck, like a towel. Pull your hair over one shoulder. Good. Put most of your weight on one foot, and bend your other leg a little. Then look at me.”

Thran shook out his hair, slid one hip forward, and looked at the artist as if he was the boy for him. The artist grinned a little wider.

“Nice eye fuck. Keep it.”

The artist drew with assurance, his eyes lingering a bit longer as he sketched. “Okay. Now do arrogance, insolence, I don’t give a shit.”

Thran laughed, shook out his hair again, and gave the artist what he wanted.

“Perfect. You’re a natural. Try menace.”

The tee shirt came off Thran’s neck to dangle in one hand like a flail, and Thran thought about soccer hooligans, angry drunks, gang face offs.

“Want to try something... racier?”

“Such as?”
“You’re a dancer.”
Thran smiled. “At one time... many lifetimes ago... yes.”

“Flexible.”
Thran nodded again.

“Stand in profile to the mirror. Lean over. Oh, nice, that; chest down on your thighs. Arch your back. More. Yeah, like that. Stick your ass out. Shift your left foot forward a hair and bend your left knee, just a little. Now look at me. Hmm. Put your right hand on your calf, like you’re rubbing it. Put your left hand on the floor, palm up. Curl your fingers in a little. Yeah. That’s good. I can do that. But you could make it hotter if you want.”

“How much hotter?”

“Let the leather slide just a hair off your ass.”
Thran straightened. “I can unlace the front, or I can unlace the back.”

The tip of a tongue traced along a lower lip. “The front’s fine... for now.”

Thran loosened the front lacings of his leather pants, then resumed his forward bend. “Enough?”

“Almost.”
Thran shifted, but made sure his pants didn’t slide down any more. “Fix it.”

The artist hesitated, but got up, took the back of Thran’s pants, and tugged them farther off Thran’s glutes. Did his fingers linger just a second too long against Thran’s skin?

“Perfect. Don’t move.” The artist resumed his chair. “Okay, look at me. Bite your lower lip. Think about what your girlfriend would say if she saw you like this.”

“I don’t do girls.”

“My mistake, and their loss. So think about what your boyfriend would say.”
Thran grinned. “I have a lot of lovers. They all say I’m a bastard.”

“I don’t doubt it. You could have anyone you wanted, looking like this.”

“I’ll keep that in mind the next time I see something I want to fuck.”

“Okay. Got it.”

Thran straightened – then froze as the artist held up his hand.

“Hold that. Don’t move anything but your arms. Stretch up, like you just got up.”

“I can always get up when I see something I want.”

The artist’s eyes met his, assessing. “You’re a prick tease, are you? Then have at. Look at me like a prick tease.”

With his prey in sight, that was no challenge. Thran clasped his hands behind his head, flexed abdominals and lats, and didn’t bother to look at what showed through the laces of his pants. The artist’s Adam’s apple bobbed, and his eyes spent more time caressing Thran’s body than looking at his sketchpad. When his pencil stopped moving, though, his eyes still lingered on Thran. Inside, Thran crowed – he was closing in. He dropped his pose, stooped beside the artist’s chair to look at his sketchpad.

“Delicious,” Thran purred, for the picture was nothing less. The predatory stare, the arrogant, come-hither stance, the forward-thrust hips, the dangling dog chain, and yes, the cock barely contained behind breached leather lacings. Thran laughed at the details the artist had added to his sketch – dark, shadowed eyes, as if smudged with the kohl from a dancer’s theatrical makeup box; and nipple rings, each with a small bead dangling. “You have made me a proper slut.”

“Isn’t that what you want?” the artist countered. “As if I can’t tell.”

“You draw me well that way. How else would you like me to pose? Nude?”

“It-it’s your forty dollars,” the artist replied, trying not to look at the chest just inches from his cheek.

“So it is. Show me what you can do with it.”

The artist silently pointed to the chair in front of the mirror. Thran rose, but only to kick the chair aside. He held his pants up with one hand; with the other, he grasped the end of the bedframe to pull it in front of the mirror. He leaned over, in profile so the artist had a clear view of him as he unzipped his boots. Straightening, he toed them off, then made a spectacle of himself as he slid his pants off. The artist’s pencil danced over the pages, keeping up with Thran as he postured and preened in front of the mirror, in front of the artist. When he draped himself across the cot like an odalisque, he had the artist’s rhythm, knowing when to move to the next pose. When he saw the artist swallow hard, it was time to pounce.

He rose from the bed, and came to regard the sketchbook. He didn’t need to look at the artist to see what he’d kindled inside him.

“These are all very good. So good. How much of my forty dollars do I have left?”

“Um, you’ve still got half.”

“Good. Now I will tell you what pose I want next.”

“Shoot.”

“I want one of you. Draw me a picture of the artist who looks at his models with such eager eyes.”

The artist’s eyes met his. “I draw whoever comes in here, not me.”

“You said my forty dollars bought any pose I wanted. I want a pose of you.”

The artist swallowed hard again. To encourage him, Thran let his hand stray to the artist’s tangled hair, stroking the back of it, just at the nape. A shiver rippled through the artist’s body, but he nodded.

“The customer’s always right,” he tried to joke. “All right. What pose do you want?”

“As you are now, sketching as you sit.”

The pencil flickered over the page, swiftly revealing the artist with his foot up on the stool, the other on the floor, sketchpad on his knee, head bent over the page as he drew. “There you are.”
“It’s good. So good I want another. Sit on the bed, and look at yourself in the mirror. Draw that.”

The artist got up, perched on the end of the bed, looked out at himself, and drew another double image, showing himself sitting on the bed from the back, and his image reflected in the mirror. He was almost done when Thran came behind him, unwinding the scarf from the artist’s neck, then reaching around to unbutton another of his shirt buttons. He yanked the back collar of the shirt hard enough to bare the artist’s shoulders.

“Draw it again. Just what you see in the mirror.”

Thran knelt behind the artist and slid his hands around the artist’s ribs, reaching for more shirt buttons. He nuzzled the crease where the artist’s shoulder met his neck, grinning when the artist gasped.

“Draw what you see. Do it.”

Somehow the artist managed to keep sketching, despite the tickle of Thran’s breath on his neck. Thran savored the musky scent, for the artist was just as grimy as he looked, spiking Thran’s arousal. It was all he could do not to bite, claw, savage. But his prey wasn’t quite hooked yet. It was worth restraining himself to make sure his prey was completely, hopelessly snared. He’d know as soon as the artist’s pencil stopped moving.

When it did, Thran looked over the artist’s shoulder, first at the sketchpad. Oh, yes, the game was his – there was the artist with Thran’s hands on him, white hair drifting over his deliciously hairy chest, his head back as Thran’s touches ensnared him, eyes shut, lips parted in a soundless gasp. A flush of adrenaline raced through Thran’s body from head to toe.

“I thought so,” Thran whispered. “You love to look. That is why you are here. Because you love to look at what happens right in front of you, and again in the mirror. Do they ask you to join them?”

“I don’t fuck my customers,” the artist protested, but it was weak.

“I suppose you tell them you make love to them, then. Girls, or boys? Perhaps both. Perhaps at the same time.”

“I tell the girls I’m gay. I tell the boys I’m straight.”

“Both are a lie, then. Good. I am neither girl nor boy.”

“Gods, no. I can’t – ”

“You pay them to let you watch with your drawings. That is the real reason you are here – so you can watch strangers kiss, fondle, bang off, suck each other off, fuck in front of you. Tell me I lie.”

The artist’s fingers tightened on his pencil, but he didn’t speak.

“I thought so. Very well. I will give you something better to look at. Just look in the mirror.”

He had the artist’s shirt off before the man could gasp, then filled his hand full of tangled hair. He bent over the artist to kiss him hard, full of tongue, greedy and demanding. The artist’s pencil fell on the floor, then his sketchbook tumbled off his lap as Thran swarmed over him, fist tightening in his hair so he couldn’t pull away as Thran bit at his throat, his shoulders, his pectorals – oh, gods, how the body he savaged spasmed when he bit at nipples already hard and erect! Gasping moans only urged him to suckle harder. When the artist fell back on his elbows, Thran straddled him, tightening his knees against hard thighs and hips.
“Do you watch?” he whispered, leaning over the artist until his long white hair brushed against the artist’s chest, face, lips. “Do you like what you see? My hands all over you?”

“Oh, gods, yes, yes,” the artist croaked.

“Tell me. Tell me what you like.”

“Your hair in my face, your hand in my hair, your ass in my lap – ”

“My ass is not all you are about to have in your lap.” Thran ripped through the buttons on the artist’s filthy jeans, clawed them off his hips, and slid off the bed to bury his face in the artist’s crotch. Gods, he was rank – how long since this beauty had bathed? The musky scent spiked Thran higher as he nosed the artist’s cock out. It was already too stiff to envelope in his mouth, but Thran took as much as he could, savoring how it twitched with each lick, each bite. Thran relented only long enough to retrieve pencil and sketchbook.

“Draw everything you see,” he pushed the artist’s tools into his hands. “Do it. Draw everything you see me do to you.”

“Oh, gods, you royal bastard – ”

Thran chuckled deep in his throat as he buried his face in the artist’s crotch again. A second later, the sketchbook fell open across his back as the artist struggled to drag his pencil across the paper, but he was too entranced at how expertly Thran worked his cock for that to last long. When the sketchbook slid to the floor and the artist fell back to his elbows again moaning, Thran kept sucking, but worked the dog chain off his neck. When it was free, he pushed the artist flat on the bed, straddled him, and had the chain around his neck before the artist knew what was happening.

“I hope you can draw from memory,” Thran whispered leaning close to nip at one of the artist’s earrings. “I want a picture of what comes next. Where is the lube?”

“I don’t – it’s not – ”

“You provide your customers every encouragement. Chocolate sauce, whipped cream... I do not need a child’s enticements. Tell me where the lube is, or you will not enjoy the next part so much as you might.”

“Under the pillow.”

Thran lunged for it. When he had it in hand, he jerked the chain around the artist’s neck, pulling him upright. A hand in his hair pulled him to the side of the bed farthest from the mirror, then down on his knees, then face down across the bed. Thran opened the lube one handed, slicked his aching cock, then dragged the artist’s grotty jeans down to his knees. When he muscled behind the artist and leaned over him, his mouth watered.

“Do you like what you see?” he breathed, pulling the artist up by his hair so that he saw their reflection in the mirror. His cock rubbed against the artist’s back, teasing both of them. “Do you feel the anticipation, the urge, to know that I will fuck you like a dog? An animal?”

“Oh, gods, oh, gods, fuck me, I can’t stand it, I want to watch you fuck me, oh, gods – ”

“You are such a pretty thing, on your knees, begging...”

“Fuck me, you bastard, just do it!”
“Bastard?” Thran laughed softly. “If I am a bastard, then what are you? A bitch in heat, begging for a proper fucking? Let us see if I can give you one.”

Thran slid inside without resistance. The artist was ready for him, open and receptive. It was too hard to resist a moan of pleasure, so Thran didn’t. He worked himself in as deeply as he could, then eased out just a little at a time, a little at a time, then slid all the way back in. The artist gasped underneath him, exciting him into repeating the slow inching out, and the much faster slide in.

“Oh, gods, you’re going to split me in two,” the artist gasped. “Gods, do it. Split me in two. I want you in as deep as you can fuck me. Deeper.”

“Greedy, greedy,” Thran teased, then pushed in deeper until the artist gasped. “Like this?”

“Gods, yes! Like that.”

“Look in the mirror. Tell me what you see.”

“A pale vampire with his cock up my ass, loving every minute of it.”

“That is not all you see. Tell me about the bitch in heat with the pale vampire’s cock up his ass. Will you draw yourself this way, serviced on your knees, a chain around your neck?”

“I’ll draw anything you want, you fucker. Anything you want.”

Thran bit at one of the rings that dangled so temptingly from the artist’s earlobe. “What do you want?
Tell me what you want me to do to you, so that you have a picture of it to look at when you are alone at night.”

“Jerk me off like this, in front of the mirror.”

“Oh, that will be delicious, to fuck you and jerk you off at the same time. Which will haunt you more? Shall I be the angel and do it slowly, gently, or shall I stay the vampire and rip it out of you until you scream?”

“I go home to an angel. I come here to tempt the vampire.”

Grinning, Thran pulled the artist against his chest by his hair, then slid his hand around the artist’s neck. He wound his other hand around the artist’s cock, already as hard as it could get, and squeezed it until the artist gasped. “Mmm, such a handful, so hard, as muscled as the rest of you. Almost I am tempted to indulge myself with it. How good it would feel to let it slide inside me, to fill me so completely. But no, it is too hard to resist the bitch under me, in hand, so tight around my cock so deeply inside him, who so sweetly begs me to desecrate him. Such a sweet morsel...”

Thran ran his lips softly against the artist’s neck, a sharp contrast to how hard and fast he worked the artist’s cock. He was no gentler with his thrusting. When the artist groped to grab the arm around his neck, it wasn’t to push him away, but to drive himself back against Thran, his breath coming harsh and rough as his climax built.

“Do you watch yourself in the mirror? Good. Savor what it looks like to be driven so hard, taken to your depths. Do you like what you see?”

“Yes. Yes. Oh, gods, yes!”

Thran pushed the artist’s head forward, so that he stared into the mirror. “Then watch me make you come, my sweet bitch. Burn it in your thoughts, so that when you lie here alone at night, you come again just to remember when a vampire consumed you.”

The artist erupted under Thran’s concentrated attack, crying out as if he’d been stabbed. Thran grinned at the metaphor – oh, he’d stabbed the artist, well and good. How tempting it would be to let himself follow the artist in release, but instead, he pulled out as soon as the artist convulsed, wrestled him face up onto the bed, and fell upon him, shoving the artist’s knees apart, diving back into him, sending him into hard spasms of pleasure. A few more strokes, and the artist wailed underneath him, wrapping arms around him, whether in desperation or ecstasy Thran neither knew nor cared. It was that final, clench of orgasm around his cock, that rattling, gasping breath, that finally gave Thran what he craved – complete, total consumption.

Thran savored the sight of the artist’s oblivious face beneath him, the feel of the bucking body straining beneath him, the sound of those soft cries, the smell of the artist’s release smeared across both of their torsos.

Only one sense remained before he let himself release.

He found the artist’s nipple and suckled it, adding the salty taste of the artist’s body to the other sensations he so coveted.

So sweet was his release, bathed in the essences of prey ruined and consumed. So, so sweet.

He lay atop the artist for long minutes, a hunting bird mantling the fruits of his pursuit, until every scrap of sensation had faded. He raised himself up on his elbows, kissed the lips of the artist still consumed beneath him, then sat up on his heels astride the artist’s torso. Yes, a pretty sight, so pretty that Thran couldn’t resist running a hand from throat to navel and below. The spent cock under his hand was unresisting, and he rubbed it slowly up and down, up and down, but only until it stirred. When he felt the artist’s heat rise again, he stopped, and rose from the bed.

“Don’t. Gods, don’t leave.”

Thran looked back at the artist lying on the poor bed. “It is better to leave those I consume wanting more. That is why they all call me a bastard. I do not mind, because they all call me something else when I come back.”

The artist groaned, drawing Thran’s sly smile.

“Did I give you enough to look at?”

“No. Not nearly enough.”

“Ah. You must wait for another visit. My forty dollars are long since spent.”

“Wait. Let me give you something for all you gave me.”

“Keep the forty dollars.”

“No, not that.” The artist sat up, shaking his hair out of his face. “Something else. Please.”

Thran bent for his pants. “You have nothing I want that you have not already given me.”

“Yes, I do.” The artist was at his back, fingers tracing down his spine. “Yes, I do.”

When Thran turned to face him, the artist’s arms went around his hips, tightening and lifting until he hung in the artist’s arms. He carried Thran to the wall that faced the mirror and pressed him against the gritty plaster. Rough hands dragged his legs up to circle the artist’s waist, opening him. Strong arms lifted him higher, then lowered him onto the artist’s cock.

“Now you look in the mirror,” the artist whispered. “What do you see this time?”

The mirror showed Thran trapped naked between the wall and the artist’s heavier body, his pale arms and legs wound around the artist still clad in filthy jeans and heavy boots. There was no sight of nipples, cocks, balls, fucking. But the rapid flex and bow of the artist’s hips, Thran’s body twitching under the artist’s ministrations, and Thran’s ravaged expression all revealed what the mirror didn’t show.

“Utter bliss,” Thran whispered. “Draw this one for me. So that when I lie alone at night, I come again just to remember when an artist fucked me so completely.”

“I haven’t fucked you completely yet.”

“You will,” Thran kissed the artist’s forehead. “You will, because you want to see me consumed, as I consumed you.”

“Yes, I will. Pinned against the wall, a sexual vampire trapped between heaven and hell.”

“Well pinned I am. Gods, you fill me more than I can resist.”

“Do you want to?”

“No. It is too exquisite a pleasure. Have your way with me.”

The artist didn’t nuzzle Thran’s nipples – he nipped, bit, suckled, kneaded with his tongue until Thran was delirious. The only thing that kept him from throwing his head back and shutting his eyes was the lure of what the mirror revealed in front of him. To watch the artist’s hips thrust over and over and over into him, to twitch when the artist licked first one nipple, then the other, to savor the play of muscles across the artist’s bare back and shoulders as he held Thran suspended... it was impossible to look away. With each thrust in, the pleasure was so extreme that he whimpered.

“That’s what I want to hear,” the artist whispered. “A vampire begging for one more thrust, one more stroke. The sound I can’t resist.”

Thran gasped. Gods, he was so close, so close... “Oh, gods... I will – you have me, you bastard, oh gods –”

“Then come. Come for me.”

“I will, when you fuck me like you mean it.”

A growl, three more hard thrusts that shook Thran to his core, and then everything erupted into uncontrolled pleasure. His moan rose into a shriek, and he had all he could do to cling to the artist who consumed him. But strong arms held him until he was limp and spent, then carried him swiftly to the bed. He was laid down, then the artist pressed atop him to stroke himself to release – four strokes more were all he needed. In contrast to Thran’s orgasm, the artist’s was quieter, but no less consuming.

“Now we’ve both had something to look at,” the artist breathed into his ear, easing off to lie beside him on the narrow bed.

Thran savored the last of his release, stretched, and turned to wrap himself around the artist, kissing him slowly and thoroughly. He sat up, stroked the artist’s hair, his fingers trailing down the artists’ shoulder, his arm, his hand, his fingers.

“So we have.” Thran stood up, pulled on his pants, his shirt, his boots. As he put on his black glasses, he looked back at the artist, still lying on the bed, gazing at him with such hunger on his face that Thran smiled. Yes, he’d be back to this one, and before much more time passed. He collected the artist’s sketchbook lying abandoned on the floor. “You will fill more pages another time, I think.”

“I will. I want to. So I hope you come... again.”

Thran laughed softly. “Until then.”

He took himself outside the unmarked door, smiling. It would be a day or two before his boredom returned. When it did, he knew where to come... again.
Chapter 58

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint take a breather to recover from their game, and the cherubs come to a decision.

Bard lay exhausted and aching on his old bed for long minutes after Thran’s vampire had let himself out of the room. Gods, what that bastard had done to him, teasing him for over an hour with his seductive posing, his effortless ease at carrying off a persona, his willingness to improvise to keep their game going, and then to thoroughly possess him... On the other hand, how much fun had it been to egg his husband on with a lot of trash talk from a far-from-savory voyeur artist? Thran had a taste for the raw and gritty that was so easy to feed, and the result was enough to make Bard’s cock stir even after he’d been so roundly fucked.

Gods, to watch Thran in the mirror, hacking away at him without mercy... to imagine what Thran’s reflection had looked like only minutes later, pinned to the wall while Bard returned the favor...

His cock stirred again. But the rest of him was sore, drained, and more than content to merely savor what had gotten him into such a state.

If they weren’t careful, he and Thran would drive each other into exhaustion and oblivion.

He grinned. There were no better ways to go.

Bard revived enough to sit up. His shirt was in a heap on the floor, so he snared it, wiped the mixed essences off his chest and abdomen, and pulled up his jeans. He straightened the linens on the bed and pushed it back against the wall, opened the window to clear out the scent of incense, herbal cigarettes, and candles, and got the mirror and crate back in the attic. It took a couple of trips to haul all the stuff downstairs that he’d used to set his stage, but finally he came back downstairs for the last time. He ventured into the bedroom to find Thran naked and stretched out flat on the bed, his arms over his head and his eyes shut. He lay on one of the bath towels, mute testimony to how trashed he was. Another was laid out beside him, ready for Bard. Smiling, Bard pulled the forty dollars out of his jeans pocket and put it on Thran’s dresser. Then he ducked into the closet to strip off his boots and jeans, returned to sat gingerly beside Thran, and lay back.

“You’re a vampire and a hooligan, but you’re a considerate one.”

Thran’s lips curved up, but his eyes stayed shut. “Oh, lyubov moy, such delicious prey you were, then such a ravisher. If I think long about how much I loved to watch you fuck me so hard in your mirror, I will come again.”

Bard enjoyed a pleased smile as they lay there together for some seconds.

“I have never paid for sex before.”

Bard’s laughter was quiet. “You still haven’t. You paid for art. Actually, you didn’t do that, either. Your forty dollars are on your dresser.”

“Then I suppose I must give your sketchbook back. I do not want to.”
“A present from me to you.”
“An incomplete one.”
“How so?”
“It has so many blank pages. Promise me you will fill them all.”
“I will.”
“Then I accept. When you are done, such a pillow book we will have.”

Bard’s exhale was both anticipatory and marshaling. “Gods, cariad. We don’t need any more incentive to have at each other.”
“There is no such thing as too much incentive.”
Bard considered. “No, there isn’t. But I have to admit... right now, I’m sore.”
Thran’s smile widened into a grin. “So am I. But I regret nothing.”
“Shower.”
“Mmm. Yes.”

Bard sat up, offered his husband a hand, and pulled him up beside him. Thran’s arm went around Bard’s shoulders, and he leaned close to kiss the point where jaw met neck, then Bard’s lips. Bard kissed back slowly, then got both of them to their feet and into the bathroom.

“What time is it?” Thran asked, winding his hair into a tail and pinning it to the top of his head. “Do we have time to soak in the tub before the children come home?”

Bard checked the clock radio in the bedroom, returning to turn on the tub taps, then got into the shower cabinet with Thran to savor hot water. “Two-forty-seven. Time enough for a short soak.”

“Mmm,” Thran shut his eyes as hot water hit his chest. “Then I will wash quickly and soak, even if only for a short time. You, however, need a thorough scrub. How did you get so rank?”

With a laugh, Bard let the hot water soak into him. “I thought you liked the way I smelled.”
“Gods, I do. Such a turn on! But I have no intention to let anyone else know how much I enjoy your scent on me. Pheromones, indeed. Even when you are rank.”
“I spent the morning renovating, remember? Much more honest work than what a certain dodgy artist did.”

“He was dodgy. Delectably so. But his sketches take my breath away. Such a spare style, but so much life do you put in every line, every curve, every shadow. When you talk to Shire Hills, I hope you show some to them – no, of course not our personal ones, my saint. Other ones, such as of the fencing, or my barre work. I would not be surprised if you could not make a name for yourself with them as well as your metal. You are a double threat.”
“I’m glad you like them. It took me a long time to get to a style I liked. One of my art school classmates was a woman from China. Her work was mostly abstract, a lot of mixed media. She put this little line of squiggles in the corner of one of her pieces that intrigued me. When I asked her about it, she rolled her eyes like Sigrid does so well, and said it was, and I quote, ‘a bourgeois example of Chinese calligraphy.’ So I looked it up. It turns out that there are lots of kinds of Chinese calligraphy. There was a cursive form popular around 100 BCE that was very loose, very expressive, very mobile, that I liked. It was all about being in the movement, in the moment. So I started to try to catch the movement in the moment each time I sketched.”

“You do that so well. Even when you act the dodgy artist, that comes through.” Thran grinned evilly. “Even your porn is beautiful.”

“Erotica,” Bard protested, laughing. “It’s called erotica when it’s drawn nicely.”

Thran snorted. “I do not care what you call a drawing of how you fuck me against the wall of the garret, as long as you draw it. That one is mine.”

Bard grinned. “You might have to model for it again to make sure I get your expression right.”

Thran snickered. “Such a hard task that will be. I am done. Into the tub I go.”

“Be there in a minute.”

Once Thran was out, Bard scrubbed his hair, and then joined Thran in the steaming tub. “Oh, gods, this feels good!”

“Then come, lie back in the arms of a vampire,” Thran beckoned, settling Bard between his legs, against his chest.

“Gods, what a vampire you made, too,” Bard sighed. “That tee shirt never looked so menacing.”

“And you, lyubov moya!” Thran’s long fingers gently touched one of the earrings in Bard’s ear. “I love these. Will you keep them?”

“Depends. If they help me seduce a certain elegant ballet dancer into a dalliance with a welder, hell, yes.”

“Even without the earrings, you are so much more than mere welder, husband. But I do like them.”

“I need a haircut to pull them off. Otherwise, I look like a straggly biker.”

“You look like no such thing. But I plan to visit my stylist soon. Come with me, and she will do her magic for us both.”

“Maybe I will.” Bard allowed himself a sly smile. “If I get a haircut, what about some rings for you?”

Thran snorted. “Through my nipples, with little beads? The very thought makes me cringe. Such things must confine themselves to your drawings. They will not get near my body.”

“Good,” Bard admitted, dropping his teasing. “I don’t want anything on you that gets in the way of my tongue.”

Thran’s head went back to rest against the lip of the tub. “Stop. I am too sore to properly respond to such provocation.” He looked over at the mirror, smiling at their reflection, and rubbed Bard’s shoulders with both hands. “Even so, I still regret nothing. Our games have been the most fun.”

“They have. We don’t many rooms left. Main room, dining room, solarium. Does the mudroom count?”

Thran’s chest shook with laughter. “Do you suggest that we follow our gritty adventure in the garret
“Maybe we can skip that one,” Bard smirked. “It’ll be a while before we can christen the main room; it’s full of detritus. The solarium needs work to make it the harem paradise we want. Dining room... hmm. There’s a dull room.”

“It is far from dull in the afternoon, when the sun is most beautiful there. We will have a picnic and make dessert of each other on a beautiful Oushak rug in the sun.”

“We don’t have an Oushak rug.”

“We will, one day. Or perhaps an Aubusson, in pale sage greens to match the paint you plan for that room.”

“On the list it goes.”

“I want to add a room to our list.”

“Please, not the cellar. It’s too grim down there for sex, even with an angel.”

“No, not the cellar. Outside. I have made love outside only once. Have you?”

“Only once. It wasn’t much. Too many mosquitos.”

Thran laughed. “We must do it in the spring when it is just warm enough, but before the vicious creatures erupt from their noxious pools. We will sneak out to the gazebo and make love like furtive creatures of the night.”

“Oh, like teenagers.”

“We are too experienced to grope each other like teenagers. You will lean against the railing, and I will come behind to rock you to ecstasy. That will be a good way to celebrate a soft spring night.”

“Gods, angel. An hour ago you were a predator who ate me for lunch. Now you want to have romantic picnics and teenaged sex in the gazebo.”

Thran’s grin was unapologetic. “Yet another way I am versatile.”

“How did I get so lucky?” Bard sighed, rubbing Thran’s thigh. “I’m ready to get out. I need to get some more paint on the children’s bathroom walls.”

“You fuss that I work so hard, but you are no better,” Thran protested, wrapping his arms around Bard’s shoulders when he went to get up. “Stay warm with me a while longer.”

“The longer it takes me to get the children’s bathroom painted, the longer they’ll shower in here,” Bard reminded Thran. “Remember to hide your good soap when you get out of the tub.”

Thran released Bard’s shoulders. “Chert, you are right. All right, I will get out, too. I will help with the paint.”

“What about all the calls you made this morning? Won’t UltraViolet Ballet want to talk with you more this afternoon?”

Thran’s smile was sly as he took the towel Bard handed him and began to dry off. “Likely they will, but our game was too important to be interrupted. I told them I had another engagement this afternoon, and would not be available to take their calls under any circumstances. So I am yours until...”
tomorrow, when I expect even more calls to ensue.”

Bard tensed, and he paused in his drying. “We could have put it off, angel. I didn’t want to jeopardize your dancing –”

“Stop.” Thran wrapped his towel around Bard’s shoulders and drew him close. “How long will it take before you realize how much I love you, and that no telephone call will ever tempt me away from our time together?”

Bard’s old insecurities skittered through in his thoughts, but he gritted his teeth and swallowed them down. “It’s... sometimes hard to believe that we have so much together, that’s all.”

“You turn to deal with the telephone calls is not long off, my saint. Once our house is only a little further along, your art will take precedence, and you will be at work again. When that happens, you will remember the dancer who loves you, as I remember the artist who loves me, and you will treasure our time together as much as I do.”

“I already do,” Bard offered Thran a chagrined smile. “I don’t think that will ever be a problem. But if it is, then you remind me of this conversation.”

“So I will,” Thran nodded. “So, to the paint - no. First, move the expensive soap!”

Laughing, Bard finished drying off and went into the closet to pull on painting clothes. He padded into the children’s bathroom to move their collection of soaps and shampooos into their fathers’ shower cabinet, while Thran stashed his in the linen closet. Then he and Thran set to painting the next wall of the children’s bathroom. They needed two ladders for this part, but they made good progress, finishing two walls before the children came home from school. Sigrid and Legolas were put in charge of setting out the day’s snacks so that Bard and Thran could put the first coat of paint on the fourth wall, then it was time to sort through the children’s backpacks and assess the night’s homework. Bard asked about Sigrid’s track meet tomorrow, but it was at another school, and the team planned to go out for pizza afterwards, so Sigrid needed only a ride home from school once the team returned. She’d call Bard once the team left the restaurant.

“Don’t forget our box of photographs, Da,” Bain reminded Bard as they met in the kitchen to start supper. “So we can look at them and decide what we want to say tomorrow.”

“I’ll find it right now,” Bard agreed. “I think it’s in one of the boxes left in the main room.”

“Let’s go see!” Tilda beckoned, and she and her siblings hastened out of the kitchen and into the main room. Each one looked in one of the cartons still stacked against the walls.

“I’ve got it,” Sigrid called, unearthing a battered, somewhat squashed box from her carton. It suddenly bent in the middle, and would have spilled its contents if Bain hadn’t dived forward to catch the edge.

“I’ve got this side, Sig. Let’s take it into the kitchen.”

As Bain had most of the box cradled in his arms, Sigrid let her side go, and followed Bain into the kitchen with Tilda and Bard. The boy plunked the box onto the table where Legolas still sorted through his books and papers.

“We need a new box, that’s clear,” Sigrid observed, as a few photographs slid out of the broken box onto the table.

“Look at this one,” Bain exclaimed, picking up the top one. “Remember this, Sig? When we built that lopsided snowman in the front yard?”

Sigrid slid close to her brother to peer at the old picture. “That was probably the world’s most lopsided snowman ever built anywhere,” she agreed, giggling.

“I want to see!” Tilda exclaimed, crowding between her siblings. “I remember this picture!”

“You were only two,” Bain scoffed. “How could you remember?”

“It’s not that long ago,” Tilda refuted.

As far as Bard was concerned, it was a lifetime ago. That picture had been taken after Daphne’s death, just weeks before he’d had to move the children out of the house and into the city so that he’d be closer to more construction jobs. He held silence, for he’d kept his devastation from his children about that for ten years, and now that they were back in this house, there was no point in mentioning it. But Thran suspected something of what he felt, because his husband’s sympathetic hand came to rest on his back.

“Look at this one,” Sigrid commented, holding up another picture. “This was when Mam and Da brought you home from hospital when you were born, Tilda.”

“Here’s one of Mam and Da and me,” Tilda held up a third. “When I started to walk.”

“Or how about this one?” Bain hooted, holding up one from Bard’s college days. It had been taken at an outdoor concert, and Bard sat cross legged on the grass with Daphne sprawled in his lap, laughing. “Where did Mam get those goofy shoes?”

“They were all the rage that year,” Bard said mildly, taking that one from Bain to look at it. Thran bent close to look at it – of course, Thran had never seen a picture of Daphne. He handed it to Thran, all too aware that Legolas had sidled to his father’s side, wanting to see the picture, too.

“Your Mam was very pretty,” Legolas said softly, tentatively, as if he weren’t sure what response he’d get. Bard was surprised that the boy had commented at all.

“She was,” Bain said without concern. “Sig looks a lot like her. She’s just about as stubborn, too.”

“Do you have a picture of your Mam, Legolas?” Tilda asked. “Do you look like her?”

Oh, gods, Legolas had still, and Bard didn’t know if he’d say anything at all. The other children still, too, when they realized how silent Legolas was. The youth looked up at Thran.

“Eto budet bespokoit’ tebya, yesli by ya pokazal im nashi fotografii, Papa?” Legolas said softly, with a swallow at the end.

“Konechno, net, synok,” Thran replied softly. “Eto tebe reshat’.”

Legolas hesitated, but then eased away to disappear towards the center hall.

Tilda looked up at Thran, a troubled look on her face. “Did I say something wrong about Legolas’s Mam, Ada?”

“You said nothing wrong, Tilda,” Thran said quietly. “Legolas asked if I minded if he brought our album of photographs downstairs so that he could show you a picture of his mother. He has missed her very much. I told him that of course I would not mind, if he would like to show you one, if that would not make him too sad.”
“What happened?” Tilda asked, frowning. “Did something bad happen, like to our Mam?”

Legolas returned with a large, ornate album in his arms in time to hear Tilda’s question. He stilled again beside his father, his arms tightened around the album, and he looked up at Thran with a lost expression.

“Tilda.” Bard put a hand on his daughter’s shoulder. “Maybe Legolas isn’t ready to talk about it. Some things take a long time to settle, and it’s courtesy not to pry where we shouldn’t, or to put him on the spot like this.”

“Oh,” Tilda said, her face clearing. “I’m sorry, Legolas, if anything bad happened to your Mam, and for asking about it.”

“I’m sorry, too, Legs,” Sigrid was quick to murmur.

Bain didn’t speak, but he swallowed, and gave Legolas a grimace. Maybe Legolas had revealed some part of the story to him, maybe during one of the many rounds of zombie apocalypse.

“Thank you... Tilda, Sigrid,” Legolas ventured, his voice little above a whisper. He stared at the floor. “My mother... died at the train station. There was... a bomb. I was with her.”

“Oh, ye gods,” Sigrid breathed, her eyes wide. “I am so sorry, Legolas.”

“I am, too, Legolas,” Tilda said, her expression stricken. “I’m sorry I made you think about it. I’m sorry.”

“Were you hurt, too?” Sigrid asked.

Legolas shook his head, but it was not a very sure expression. “Physically... not very much. But I just... I got lost for a while.”

Sigrid and Tilda both looked like they were about to cry, and Bain looked almost as miserable. “You don’t have to talk about it,” Sigrid said. “It’s okay if you don’t, and okay if you don’t want to show us a picture, either, or put one up. I felt like that for a long time after Mam died. We don’t have to do anything if you don’t want. Whatever makes you feel better.”

“That’s... kind of you,” Legolas held the album tightly against his chest. “It is. All of you have been kind, right from the start. At first, I thought you were just being polite, or... something. But you’ve never acted like the kids at my boarding school... and then we fought the druggie gang together... we play zombie apocalypse, and you asked me to read, or about French... you don’t make fun of me if I do something better or worse than you... you fixed up my room... everyone makes so much good food together, and Papa is so happy. Maman would like all of these things, and she’d like that I’m happy. So... I liked the picture of your Mam laughing. It reminded me of one I have of my Maman laughing, too. I’d like to show it to you, if you’d like to see it.”

“I do, Legolas,” Tilda piped up, but she bit her lip when Bard touched her arm. “But only if you want to show us.”

Legolas put down the album, and everyone gathered around the kitchen table as he opened it. The first pages showed pictures of Thran as a child, and Legolas would have passed over them quickly if the other children hadn’t oohed and aahed over the landmarks of St. Petersburg, including the Vaganova Dance Academy. Legolas eased a bit as he named the various sights, and even smiled when the children giggled over the pictures of his father as a dark-haired youth. Thran’s hair had begun to whiten when he had been perhaps twelve, so even as a young teenager he was instantly identifiable. When the first picture of Vileria appeared, Tilda and Sigrid quickly pointed to it.
“Oh, this must be your Maman,” Sigrid guessed. “She is so beautiful. And you do look like her, Legolas. Look how long her hair is!”

“We had a competition to see who could grow the longest hair, she and I,” Thran smiled, looking down at the picture. “She won, of course. But I did not mind. She had very beautiful hair, nearly black, and very dark eyes. Once my hair turned mostly white, when we went out together, she dressed all in black, and I all in white.”

“I’ll bet you stopped traffic,” Sigrid grinned. “Oh, gods, you did! Look at this!”

She pointed to a photograph on the next page that showed a young Thran and Vileria at some official event, both smiling broadly. Her dress looked vaguely as if it were a modern take on the American Roaring Twenties in heavily beaded black satin; his tuxedo was white, from the same period, complete with top hat.

“A costume party,” Thran explained. “Fifteen years ago, just before we learned that Legolas would join us.”

“Wow,” Bain nodded, looking over Sigrid’s shoulder. “Your Mam really was beautiful, Legs.”

“She was very beautiful,” Thran agreed, rubbing his son’s shoulder. “I would like to see another picture of your Mam, Bain. Perhaps you can show us another one?”

Bain rummaged through the pictures in the box. “They’re all mixed up, I’m afraid. But I’ll find one.”

“We should put them in a book like Ada and Legolas have,” Sigrid suggested. “It’d be a good way to keep them nice, rather than being jammed in this rag of a box.”

“Easier to look at, too,” Bard agreed, writing on the chalkboard. “Photo album. It’s on the list.”

“That one,” Sigrid said to Bain, pointing to the one he held. “That’s the one I like of Mam.”

Bain held up a picture of Daphne in an old blue tee shirt at the easel, her brow furrowed in concentration as she worked on her canvas. She held her paintbrush in midair like a conductor’s baton, momentarily at rest while she considered her design.

“Where’s the one that goes with it?” Bain asked.

Sigrid rooted through the box, quickly holding up another photograph. It had been taken a moment after the first one, when Daphne had realized that Bard had taken the first picture and had looked over at him with a fond, private smile. That picture had captured her best – beautiful, immersed in her art, loving, so aware and alive. Despite how happy he was now, seeing that particular picture again after so long sent loss stabbing through Bard anew, knotting his throat as the pale shadow of those first days after her death returned. They’d been full of numb despair as he’d struggled to cope with three small, frightened children when all he’d wanted to do was crawl into the grave after his wife. It must have showed on his face, because Thran rubbed his back again. Swallowing, Bard took a deep breath. Gods, how long would that picture of Daphne continue to make him ache? And what would Thran think of him mourning his dead wife?

“This is the one of Maman laughing,” Legolas said, looking from Bard down at the page in his album. He turned the book around and tilted it up so everyone could see his mother in a loose ruby red sweater, with her hands clasped under her chin, gleefully laughing. No drawing Bard could make would ever embody all of the life and spirit of that photograph.

Sigrid took the picture of her mother from Bain, put it beside Vileria’s. Though the two photographs revealed far different expressions, both revealed a similar strength of spirit.

“They were both beautiful,” Sigrid said softly.

A murmur, whether agreement, acknowledgement, or acceptance, went around the table. Legolas looked at his father.

“I don’t have to wait until tomorrow, if you all don’t want to,” Legolas said, swallowing. “If the three of you want to put up a picture of your Mam, then I would like to put this one up of my Maman, too.”

Tilda, Bain, and Sigrid exchanged looks. Tilda was first to nod, then Bain, then Sigrid.

“We’d like to, too, Legolas. But only if you want to.”

“I do.” Legolas swallowed again, but he looked at his father, who smiled encouragement. “Yes. I do want to.”

“Sweet,” Bain ventured a smile. “Where are we going to put them?”

“We thought you’d like to choose the place,” Bard replied. “You could put them in the children’s study, which I’d bet your Mams would like. Or in here, by the table, because we’re here so much of the time –” that brought a laugh, even from Legolas, “– or in the main room, or maybe you all have another idea.”

“We don’t go in the main room,” Sigrid said. “At least not yet. We’d never see the pictures if we put them in there.”

The other children agreed. “Mam would like the solarium,” Bain offered. “Did your Mam like plants, Legolas?”

“I don’t know,” Legolas looked at Thran. “She loved flowers... but I don’t know about plants. She didn’t dislike them, I don’t think.”

“Wait – the sun might fade the pictures in the solarium,” Bain amended.

“Would it?” Tilda asked, frowning.

“Yeah, remember what happens to newspaper when it stays outside too long?” Bain reminded Tilda. “It turns all yellow and brittle.”

“I like the children’s study,” Sigrid said. “There’s that wall beside the door that has room for the pictures, and it doesn’t get the morning sun too long. Or if we got a long, thin table to put by the balustrade on the bedroom landing, we could put them there.”

“I like our study, too,” Legolas offered. “I think Maman would like to see us there together. And there’s room for a shelf.”

“A shelf?” Sigrid looked blank. “Oh, you mean to put the pictures on the shelf, not the wall?”

“I thought... because Maman loved flowers, if there were a shelf, there would be room for a vase of flowers near the pictures.”

“I like that!” Tilda brightened, and Sigrid nodded vigorously. “I don’t remember if Mam liked flowers, but I do. It would be nice to have them to look at with the pictures.”
“It sounds like we have a plan,” Bard said. “Sig, Bain, Til, why don’t we put our pictures in the sitting room, so we can look through them in the next few days? We’ll pick the ones we want to go with Legolas’s, and get copies made on acid-free paper so they don’t fade. Then we’ll find some frames and a piece of wood, or a small table for the shelf, and then we can put everything on the wall in your study.”

“Will you put your pictures in the sitting room, too, Legolas?” Sigrid asked. “I’d love to see the ones of Saint Petersburg again.”

“Is that all right, Papa?” Legolas looked at Thran.

“Of course. I know you will all take good care of them, yes? To look at them would be nice for me, too.”

“Sig, Bain, Til, please look at Legolas and Thran’s book only when they’re with you, okay? That’s a very special book, so we want to keep it nice.”

“Okay, Da,” the children agreed.

“Let us set aside the pictures for now,” Thran said. “It is time for supper, and then homework.”

That met with a groan, but the children hastened to collect the scattered Bowman photographs back into the tattered box, and then it went into the sitting room with the Oropherson album. The clan reassembled to prepare, devour, and clean up supper, then homework commenced. As the children arranged their books and papers, Thran explained about them having to shower in their fathers’ bathroom for the next two days.

“Sweet!” Bain pumped his fist. “The soaking tub!”

“Just the shower, Bain,” Bard nixed that hope. “There are six of us to cycle through one shower tonight, so the tub’s not part of the plan.”

With a groan, Bain slumped over his stack of books with a morose expression, drawing a smothered chuckle from Thran. “It’s not fair, Da! We’ve been here three weeks, and I haven’t gotten to use it once!”

“You’ll have a turn once the upstairs is finished,” Bard countered. “Remember whom the tub’s for. Thran gets first shot at it when he’s worked his hardest, so that he stays healthy.”

“I’d rather try it in the summer,” Tilda said thoughtfully. “When it’s hot. I’d put a lot of ice cubes in it and get cool.”

That brought a round of laughter.

“Oh, one more thing, before you start,” Bard remembered. “We’re having the Gamgees over for soup and such this Friday. Legolas and Bain, maybe you’d like to ask Tara and Kíllian to come, and Sigrid, maybe you’d like to ask Finn? Rosie’s coming over after lunch so we can start all of the soups, but if we’ve got more people coming, I want to make sure we make enough food. Would you all give your friends a call and let me know by tomorrow if they plan to come?”

“I’ll talk to Finn tonight,” Sigrid assured her father.

“You talk to Finn every night,” Bain smirked, rolling his eyes.

“What, haven’t you gotten up your nerve to call Angelica Crofton yet?” Sigrid shot back calmly, her eyes on her computer screen. “Why don’t you call her, Bain? Ask her to come over for soup and such?”

Bain reddened. “Nah. I don’t need to talk to Angelica. Geez!”

Thran smothered another chuckle as the children settled to their homework, but he gave free rein to it as he and Bard retreated to the sitting room.

“Our children are so funny, lyubov moya.”

Bard shared his husband’s surreptitious laughter. “You have no idea. Legolas is still staying out of the fray, but before long, he’ll snark just as well as the rest of them.”

“I am proud of my son,” Thran sobered, looking pensive. “It has been hard for him since Vileria’s death. He has not wanted to look at our pictures often before now. So I am glad that changes. I think when the rest of the children asked him so many questions, he began to see beyond his loss.”

“I hope so,” Bard murmured. He opened the battered box of photographs to take out the one of Daphne smiling at him before her canvas. “I hope you understand that no matter how hard this one is for me to look at, it doesn’t change anything about how I feel about you.”

“Of course not,” Thran looped his arm around Bard’s shoulders to pull him close. “The one of Vileria in the red sweater... she gave it to me to remind me of how much she loved me. I loved her, too, just as you loved your Daphne. What we have does not change that, just as that does not change what we have.”

Bard leaned into his husband’s embrace. “This remembrance isn’t just for the children, then. It’s for all of us. I think that would make Daphne and Vileria very happy.”

Thran rubbed Bard’s shoulder. “Of that, I have no doubt.”

When Bard looked at the photograph in his hand, Daphne’s smile seemed to wax a little brighter, as if to agree with Thran. He smiled back, and felt a little of his loss ease.
Chapter 59

Chapter Summary

The cherubs receive a surprise, and the angel and the saint discuss many things, large and small. It is the pause before new endeavours begin.

Chapter Notes

I don't own any rights to the Hellboy comics or films. But I do love that troll market!

“I just realized something,” Bard said to Thran as they slumped together on the sitting room sofa. “Our hawk-eyed child missed my earrings.”

“I give her a pass,” Thran said comfortably. “The photographs were an engrossing topic, and have brought us a good resolution. There will be time for her to see the addition to her father’s ears. Would you like a taste of nalivka?”

“If you do.”

“I would. I will go to bed earlier tonight, given the day’s delicious exertions, and what will likely be a long effort tomorrow.”

“On your mobile?”

“Assuredly. And I expect to hear from one or more of the companies for which I auditioned. The next several days will likely see me with my mobile glued to my ear.”

“I’ll keep on with the house. If you need me, just ask.”

“I will,” Thran chuckled, patting Bard’s thigh. “I will pour us a drop of nalivka.”

“I’ll put in a load of laundry. I have some evidence to destroy, and the hamper’s getting full besides.”

“I spent a long time this afternoon cleaning leather of the same evidence.”

“Why? You didn’t have those pants on for long.”

“I put them on to make my exit. It left its marks.”

Bard snickered. “I’ll bet it did. We’re a messy pair. So, back in a tick.”

Bard headed upstairs with a couple of the laundry baskets, so Thran went into the kitchen to check on the children, and to pour two tiny glasses of the Russian liqueur he was fond of. When Bard came down with the collected laundry, he helped his husband sort and start a load of clothes. Then they returned to the sitting room to enjoy their drinks.
“Anybody mind music?” Bard called into the kitchen.

“As long as it’s not singing,” Sigrid called back. “I can’t concentrate to write when it’s singing.”

“I can’t, either,” Legolas agreed.

“No singing it is, then,” Bard agreed, looking to Thran. “Any preferences, cariad?”

“Something not too rousing, for the children,” he shrugged. “Other than that, I leave it to you.”

“I liked that Vaughn Williams you played the other day.”

“Perfect.”

Bard sorted through their collection of CDs, eventually selecting one and loading it into the portable CD player. Like the rest of Bard’s things, the player was second hand, something Bard had cleaned up and refurbished. None of the children had one of the small media devices like the one Legolas had, and the two older children’s laptops weren’t the fanciest or newest. As the sounds of soft classical music began, Thran again reflected on how hard Bard had worked to care for his children for so long with so few resources other than endurance. Tonight was little different; it was close to eight o’clock, and Bard had started laundry.

“Pork chops for supper tomorrow?” Bard asked, as he looked up from the CD player. “I’ll get them out of the freezer so they’ll be thawed in time. I’ll bake them rather than fry them, so they won’t have a lot of oil.”

“That sounds good,” Thran agreed, and Bard headed off to the kitchen to dig the chops out of the freezer. Sounds of rummaging ensued, then Tilda had a question about her arithmetic. Bard was visible through the doorway to the kitchen stooping by Tilda’s chair to answer her question.

“Da... you’ve got... earrings?”

Thran smothered a giggle at the incredulous tone in Bain’s voice.

“No! Does he?” Sigrid gasped. “Gods, Da, you do! You’ve got earrings! Ye gods and little fishhooks, Da! What brought this on?”

“I used to wear these all the time,” Bard replied in the mild tone that meant he was both amused and exasperated.

“Yeah, but Da!” Sigrid exclaimed. Thran couldn’t tell whether Sigrid was outraged or approving, so he set his small glass on the table before the sofa and got up to lean against the doorway to the kitchen.

“But what?” Tilda looked up from her paper, leaning backwards to get a better view of the ring in Bard’s ear. She touched it gently. “Is there one in your other ear, too, Da?”

Bard turned his head so his youngest child could see his other ear.

“There is. I like them.”

“Has Ada seen them?” Sigrid asked.

“Ada has seen,” Thran replied, drawing all of the children’s eyes. “I like them, too.”

“Can I get one?” Bain, naturally, asked eagerly.
“Not until you’re sixteen,” Bard replied with a wry look at Thran.

“What about me, Papa?” Legolas looked at his father with bright eyes.

“Are you sixteen?” Thran asked. “Only our Sigrid is old enough for such things. They must be taken care of carefully to heal, and with all of your sports and activities, it would be an effort to see to them. Not until you are old enough to do those things without reminders from your fathers will we consider it.”

“Are you going to get earrings, too, Ada?” Tilda asked.

Grinning, Thran shook his head. “No, Kukla. Your Da does them justice for us both. Sigrid, has your Da finally moved you beyond speech?”

“Are you going to wear them all the time, Da?” Sigrid asked, still gaping at her father.

Bard grinned. “Not when I work in the barn. But I may wear them a bit more often than I expected, considering the reaction I got from you.”

“Da,” Sigrid scoffed, rolling her eyes. “You look like some kind of biker or something.”

Bard slid a suppressed look of hilarity to Thran, who had all he could do not to think of what else Bard had looked like earlier this afternoon. Then he ran a hand through his hair. “About that. I’m going to get a haircut. Tidy up a bit.”

“Really?” Tilda asked.

“When?” Sigrid continued, looking skeptical.

“In the next few days. I want to finish your bathroom and get started on our room. So around that.”

“I hope I recognize you,” Tilda pondered, looking dubious.

“I think you will,” Bard tapped her nose. “So, you get back to homework, and I’ll get back to the laundry.”

When Thran followed Bard into the mudroom, he found him silently giving into his mirth as he leaned against the washer. He looked up, still laughing.

“I guess you’d better call your hair magician,” he whispered.

Snickering, Thran opened the dryer and motioned for Bard to toss in the wet clothes. “As soon as they open tomorrow, lyubov moya.”

The rest of the evening passed without further stir, though the children’s showers took longer than expected given the novelty of bathing in their father’s domain. When at last all four were settled in bed, Thran prepared to rinse off the remnants of paint that the afternoon’s efforts had brought. He stripped off his clothes and came into the bathroom, only to find his equally naked husband looking up at the ceiling.

“What is it?”

Bard pointed to the handheld showerhead. “I’m guessing Bain.”

When Thran looked up, he realized the ceiling was dripping. “Ah. Our children still enjoy bath toys.”
“So does at least one of their fathers,” Bard replied, taking Thran’s hand and pulling him towards the shower. “Even just for a quick rinse.”

It was good to have someone to wash his back, stroke a hand across his buttock, hand him a towel, dry off the small place he’d missed on his shoulder. It was even better to have such a warm body to slide between the sheets with him, to warm the cold bedding with him. He snuggled against Bard’s chest with a hum of contentment. He thought back about today’s game, and then the previous one between seer and king. He would not like to live the life of an omega, bound by immutable physical drives to submit to the domination of others, without regard to anything other than biological need.
But the feeling of warmth, of security, of peace that his seer had felt when bound to his king resonated on some level. Perhaps it was because it was a pale reflection of what Thran felt wrapped around his husband in bed, the two of them well swaddled in soft silk and cashmere. Here, there was only love, affection, tenderness.

As if he understood the timbre of Thran’s thoughts, Bard pressed a kiss on Thran’s hair, and eased him close with a sigh.

What a gift it was to fall asleep amid such comfort.

* * *

The children’s breakfasts and lunch preparation passed smoothly. The only deviation was that Sigrid let Bard know that Finn would come to the soup and such gathering Friday. Legolas and Bain would see Killian and Tara later today, and let their fathers know this afternoon what they learned. When they headed to the bus stop, Bard let Rosie know they might have a few more guests, so they considered what other soups to make.

Once back in the house, Thran headed immediately to the ballroom to get through as much of his morning routine as he could before his mobile began to chirp, and Bard hurried to start another load of laundry, then continue his painting. Thran didn’t want the portable CD player today, so Bard took it upstairs to play the music he’d played last night, Thran’s collection of Vaughn William’s orchestral works. The various pieces seemed to speed his work a bit, and he finished the second coat of turquoise without much effort. He hoped the second coat would be enough to properly cover the walls, as he wouldn’t be able to recoat it for several hours. But the time wouldn’t be wasted; he got the tube of tile grout and started in on the walls. In contrast to the paint, he didn’t have to be quite so painstaking, so he made rapid progress.

When that was done, he fetched the bag of tiles he’d gotten at the architectural remnant shop, and spilled them out on the bathroom floor to see which pieces were best to replace the roughly two square feet of broken tile behind and around the toilet. The floor tiles had been broken when he and Daphne had bought the house, and Bard had never figured out how they’d gotten that way. There was no water damage, which he’d confirmed when the plumbers had replaced all the pipes before Christmas. He’d taken advantage of the plumbers’ work when they’d removed the old toilet to chisel out the ruined tiles and prepare the subfloor for their replacements. Before he could set the replacements, however, he had to clean and maybe shape them to make a smooth fit – a tedious task.

It didn’t take long to discover that his replacements were almost the right size, just a hair smaller, but not enough to worry about. The gaps between them would not be very noticeable behind the toilet, and not too wide that the floor would suffer. Bard counted out how many tiles he thought he’d need, added a few extra, and headed out to the barn. It would be much easier to clamp each tile in the heavy vise on the workbench and scrape off each edge carefully with a file, than to try to do so by hand.

When he passed through the kitchen, he left Thran a note that he was out in the barn. He jockeyed another load of laundry through the washer and dryer, then armed his way into his coat, tucked his long hair under a knitted hat – gods, it really was longer than he realized, and badly in need of the trim Thran had suggested – and grabbed the barn door key to head outside.

Switching on the lights in his workroom, Bard found a couple of steel files and some rags, and set to work. The rags kept the sides of the vice from marring the tiles, and the steel files made quick work of the old grout and mastic. It was a pain to shift the little tiles every few seconds, but doing so steadied the tiles so that he had only to make a pass or two on each edge with the file. He’d worked through about forty of the little tiles before the door opened.

“Bard?” Thran heralded.

“In the back, angel,” Bard replied.

“Ah, the floor tiles,” Thran commented as he approached. He picked up one of the cleaned ones. “They look so much better!”

“Good thing,” Bard exhaled, filing the tile currently clamped in the vise. “Not my favorite chore, but it’s what’s needed to finish the floor.”

Thran watched intently as Bard patiently filed a side of the tile, repositioned it in the vise, then repeated the steps until all six sides and the back were clean. Bard dropped the cleaned tile in the bucket he’d set out on the workbench, then took up the next one.

“How many tiles will you need?” Thran asked.

“A hundred, maybe a few more.”

“So many!” Thran grimaced. “So much work for such a small space!”

“It’s still better than replacing the rest of the floor,” Bard assured him. “This is a pain, but chiseling out the entire floor, then getting down to a surface to put new tile on, if not replacing the whole subfloor... agony.”

“Agony,” Thran agreed, grimacing. “So if it takes you two minutes to clean each small tile, and you need one hundred of them, then that’s two hundred minutes, or about three and a half hours minimum to clean enough tiles.”

Bard’s grimace matched Thran’s. “Maybe I’ll get faster after I’ve done a few more, but yes, you’re right about how long it’ll take.”

Thran looked in the bucket of finished tiles. “Perhaps you have half of what you need so far, so you have made good progress.”

“Enough that I’m ready to take a break. Is it lunchtime yet?”

“It is. My ear is already sore from all the calls, so I am ready for a break, too.”

“Don’t need to tell me twice.”

Bard handed the bucket of finished tiles to Thran to carry back to the house, and they made a quick lunch together while Thran summarized the gist of his calls this morning. Most were with UltraViolet, trying to reach consensus about what was needed to get the ballet about Death off the ground. Thran had emailed a summary of the story he and Bard had put together to the principals, and Bard was gratified that it had met with unanimous enthusiasm. The maze of details that needed to be worked out was formidable, but that was not the only topic of Thran’s calls and emails. Two of the other companies with which Thran had auditioned had responded with offers of a contract.

“I’m not surprised,” was Bard’s comment as he reached for a clementine. “The only question is whether either of them can distract you from your Death ballet.”

“Both are good offers,” Thran admitted. “Principal in both cases.”

“Are either of them with the company you auditioned with first, the one you weren’t that interested in?”

Thran shook his head. “I almost expect them not to offer me a contract, because I am not the type of dancer they want. They would be happier with a dancer less... how do I say without arrogance? Less... different.”

“Meaning that you in that company would be like mixing a firebird with a lot of mud skippers.”

Thran nodded without ego. “You exaggerate, but your sense is correct. It is a question of style, and they are smaller, quieter, more introspective. I can be those things, but I would prefer not to be only those things.”

“So the other two established companies offered you contracts as principal dancer. I remember you said the second one you auditioned with was well worth a look.”

Thran nodded again. “In almost any other situation, I would gladly accept a contract with them. But...”

“The chance to do something amazing is not any other situation.”

“No. It is not.”

Thran sounded so wistful that Bard reached his right hand across the table, beckoning for Thran’s left hand. When Thran offered it, Bard squeezed it gently. “I looked on the Internet. It said that the typical contract for a ballet dancer is for thirty or forty weeks, more or less a year. Something amazing doesn’t come around often. So if you take a chance on something amazing and it doesn’t work out, in a year, you can go back to something more traditional.”

Thran smiled. “You understand how hard the muse pulls any artist towards the amazing. You understand the risk, too – joy if you can embody what the muse sends you, and despair if you cannot, like what I imagine it is for you and your Rahmiel. This ballet will be amazing if many people can embody what the muse has sent us with our story. But I want you to know this – this ballet is a much riskier proposition than your sculpture, because of how much effort it needs to make it live.”

Bard kept a steady hold on Thran’s hand. “How much riskier?”

“It will need money, and a hard rein on Irmo. UltraViolet’s current finances cannot come close to what will be needed. The hard rein on Irmo will fall heavily on me because he does not intimidate me, but it will fall on others as well.”

“Where would the money come from?”
“Much of it would come from me at first, but there would also be a concerted effort to interest other investors. We would need to heavily promote what we are doing. Fortunately, we have a solid story. If we can get Irmo to produce bits of choreography early, we could film them for promotion, both to raise money and to build interest among donors and the press. We need costumes, a performance venue, and more dancers, especially a female principal. I have already spoken to Charisse, and she is interested. Many more things will we need. Much of the promotion would likely involve me, both in the parts we film, but also to personally talk to the press, the investors, and so forth. Then there is the rehearsal for the ballet itself, which would be arduous.

“I do not minimize the cost of this to you, Bard. It would put as much on your shoulders as mine. For some weeks, I would not be here when you need me, and you would manage four children and our house alone. That would be a great deal for us both to sacrifice, and for our children, as well. So before I chase what the muse dangles before me, I want you to know that such a chase is not only risky because of the money.”

Bard caught Thran’s wedding ring between his thumb and index finger. “How long does it take to bring a ballet to the stage? Are we talking about three months, or two years?”

“The coming winter season would give us nine months, but that would cost a great deal of money, and we would compete with productions from better known companies for audience as well as publicity. On the other hand, we could try to be ready in time for the summer season, something only a few ballet companies do. This would cost much less, but give us only six months at most. That is to complete the choreography, costumes, rehearsals, staging, everything.”

“So if you could do it in six months, then that’s what you’d prefer.”

Thran nodded. “Of course. Less money, but a much more challenging proposition.”

Bard continued to play with Thran’s ring. “I managed three children and two jobs in a grotty apartment alone for a long time, so managing four children in our house won’t be so bad. And there’s an advantage to a summer season that you might not know about.”

“Yes?”

“Summer’s a much busier tourist season for an artist colony. People go on vacation, the weather is nice to encourage people to get out, and so on. It used to be that Greenwood Dale on the Lake had several summer shows and such to make the most of the tourist trade. Why don’t we talk to Rosie and Sam, and see if there’s anything like that planned for this summer? If you could time something to go with a festival, that might give your ballet a bigger audience, and maybe some of the ballet publicity could tie in with something the artist colony plans. It could be a big draw for both the ballet and the artists.”

“That is a good idea,” Thran agreed. “But we must see what kind of venue might be available. UVB has no home stage.”

“I can call Rosie tonight and ask,” Bard offered. “How long can you take before you have to make a decision?”

“A few more days.”

“Then let me talk to Rosie. If we can do something this summer, then I’m game. If you and the others at UVB can keep Irmo focused, this ballet will make you, him, and UVB.”

“I think it will, too. But it would be a very difficult six months. I know I ask a lot of you. I do not want to ruin my marriage or our lives here in pursuit of this.”

“I don’t want to, either. But... not following the something amazing can eat at you if you turn away. I don’t want that for you or me, either. Let’s talk to Rosie, learn a bit more, and see what that brings us.”

Thran’s smile was grateful. “I am grateful that you understand, and are willing to see if we can make this a bit more auspicious.”

“The only thing I ask, cariad, is that you don’t risk the house. That’s not negotiable.”

“Agreed. Our home is in your name, and I will never ask you to risk it.”

Something in Thran’s face nagged at Bard. He hesitated to ask, but an inquiring look from Thran pushed him into speaking.

“I don’t want you to ruin your finances for this, either. So... is that a possibility?”

Several emotions flitted across Thran’s face, which didn’t ease Bard’s concern. In fact, he tensed.
Thran picked up on that immediately, and smiled guiltily. Guilt was such a foreign expression for Thran that Bard tensed even more.

“Maybe I like this something amazing less than I thought, Thran. How much money do you think this will cost?”

“Enough that you will no longer worry about the expenses needed to renovate a house,” Thran admitted. “And if it all comes to naught, it will be painful. But it will not be fatal, and it will not ruin me. I will still be able to dance, and you will still be a working artist, and the house will still be paid for, and the children will still be well cared for. So please do not worry about the amounts involved.”

“Is there anything I could do to help? I have no idea how to put on a ballet, but I could sketch things for you, or do a bit of design for promo pieces, or anything like that.”

“Only if you accept payment for such things.”

“I will, the same way you accepted payment for all I’ve spent on the house – with sincere thanks, and an eye to the future.”

Thran’s rueful smile conceded to the success of Bard’s gambit. “You are a quick study, my saint.”

“It’d be nice to have a way to contribute.”

“Tcha, you have so many ways to do so already!” Thran snorted, smiling. “You paint and scrub and file and repair and arrange and cook and organize and so many other things, yes? I cannot do any of these things, or draw, or design, or make metal.”

“As a certain pale, ethereal, beautiful dancer keeps telling me, it all evens out.”

“Yes! I hope you have finally come to believe that, and do not say so just to twit me. It does even out, lyubov moya, and it has, and it will continue to do so. Oh, before I forget, I called my hair stylist.
She can see us Friday at nine. It is in the city, but if we leave once the children meet the bus, we should get there in plenty of time. Is that comfortable for you?”

“As long as she doesn’t try to give me one of those shaved pate haircuts. I don’t want to go from biker to convict in one easy session.”
Thran laughed. “Rowan will do no such thing. She will ask you what you like, and offer suggestions if you like. Whatever you decide, she will do her magic.”

With a marshaling breath, Bard said, “Okay. And I don’t have to keep the earrings just because they’re a fun way to twit Sigrid.”

“Wear them on Friday. Rowan will see you with and without, and help you decide if you want her to. She is that most rare of hairdressers – one who listens, as well as one who knows.”

“What does she do for you? Not cut your hair, obviously.”

“She does, but only to keep it well groomed. She sees that it stays icy white, and well cared for, and glossy. It is more work than you think just to keep it so.”

“Simple’s always harder,” Bard agreed. “Ask any tailor, or any artist. You can get away with a lot more mistakes or bobbles if you’re doing a Hieronymus Bosch than a Piet Mondrian. Oh, that reminds me. You might want to look at some of Bosch’s works to see if that brand of demonic weirdness would help the look of your ballet. He did some visions of Hell that are downright terrifying.”

“I will,” Thran nodded. “Though that raises an interesting point – does our Death live in Hell, as in a place for demons, or the Underworld, as in a place for all of the dead?”

“Hmm... you’re right about the distinction.”

“Did you have one or the other in mind when you made our tale?”

“I thought more of the Underworld, to be honest. Our tale about Death falling in love doesn’t need any moral judgment about if He’s the devil or not.”

“I agree. That would give us many interesting things to show in the scenes in the Underworld – here are the rich, and here are the good, and there are the poor, the sick, and the evil. A more interesting place, I think.”

“I’d still look at Bosch’s work, just to see what variety he packs into each piece. And look at the Hellboy films. The second one has a troll market that’s amazing. And that reminds me of something else.”

“We are fuller of conversation today than lunch,” Thran chuckled. “What else are you reminded of?”

“Money – no, don’t get excited, this is a good thing about money. You said UVB doesn’t have a venue of its own. How much studio practice space does it have? Enough to work on a full-scale ballet?”

“It will be very tight,” Thran conceded, nibbling a grape.

“Then I suggest that I put off painting our bedroom and work on the ballroom instead. You could use it for practice space. That’d save renting more space, and it’d let you save a forty-minute commute there and back to UVB’s studio.”

“But what about our bedroom? I looked forward to that very much.”

“I hit a snag on that. That fancy sueded paint I showed you?” Thran nodded. “I looked online about it. Not easy. It’d take at least a week and a lot of coats to do it. Even after that, many folks weren’t happy with the results, so much so that most homeowners’ meccas don’t carry it anymore. So I think we ought to reconsider.”

Thran hummed. “I trust your judgment, lyubov moya. I do like the blue-grey color you showed me, so if we keep that, I am happy.”

“I looked at Venetian plaster, but that’s labor-intensive, too, and it doesn’t come in the blue we like. So I thought I could paint it the blue we like, and then later we can add some silver stenciling go with the bed.”

Thran brightened. “Oooh, I like that. Stenciling... is that hard?”

“Very easy, for what we’d want. Reasonably fast, too.”

“So I thought I could paint it the blue we like, and then later we can add some silver stenciling go with the bed.”

Thran brightened. “Oooh, I like that. Stenciling... is that hard?”

“Then I like that idea. So... if the blue-grey paint is the same kind as what you have used on the children’s bedrooms, then perhaps you can still do our bedroom next, and then the ballroom?”

“As long as painting the bedroom first wouldn’t delay you from using the ballroom.”

“We are still far away from practicing in earnest, so I think we have those few days to paint our nest. When the days become long and arduous, I think a serene place to retreat would be a comfort.”

“That’s a good point. So in and around all your mobile calls, think about what color you’d like the ballroom to be, and what kind of chandeliers to hang. There’s places for three big ones.”

“I will consider it. But for now, I must get ready for the afternoon’s calls. Many more await.”

Bard and Thran cleaned up their few dishes from lunch, and went upstairs to brush their teeth. Afterwards, Thran surveyed the children’s bathroom with Bard.

“No, I think the two coats of paint is enough, yes?” Thran considered, looking at the walls. “And the tile looks so much cleaner with the new grout. Only the few tiles in the corner remain.”

“And the extra hooks and towel racks. That won’t take long. The children will be back in here tomorrow. That’s good, considering how many guests we have coming tomorrow. We’ll need more than the toilet downstairs for that crowd. That’s another room I need to get to soon. The floor’s got to be redone completely, and the walls... eh, I might as well just say it – the whole thing needs close to a complete gut, all but the plaster.”

“It will all come in time,” Thran advised. “Just look at how much you have done so far – four bedrooms, a study, a bath, and a kitchen. The rest will soon follow, and then we will live in a palace. In fact, we already do.”

“A shabby one, but one steadily improving. Thank you for being so patient.”

“Your turn comes,” Thran exhaled. He put arms around Bard. “You will have to be very patient if we do this ballet, far more patient than I have had to be. I hope I will not ask too much of you.”

“The ballet will come in time, too, or it won’t,” Bard pressed a kiss on Thran’s temple. “Just don’t forget me in the excitement, and it’ll all work out, whichever way it goes.”

“I will not forget, lyubov moya,” Thran vowed firmly. “But if ever you think I do, please, do not suffer that in silence. We will survive anything, as long as we are together, as long as we speak to each other.”

“As long as we make love frequently, too,” Bard gave Thran’s buttock a playful squeeze.
“Suka blyad, yes,” Thran breathed. “Always that. Oh, you are such a bastard, to mention such a delicious thing mere minutes before I must plug my mobile into my ear rather than my cock somewhere else.”

Just at that moment, Thran’s mobile chimed downstairs.

“Sukin syn!” Thran growled, drawing Bard’s laughter. “Almost I think you planned that.”

“I’m not that good, angel,” Bard snickered. “But I won’t complain. You’re always an animal in bed after you’ve been teased a little.”

Thran headed downstairs, but not before he gave Bard a glowering look. “You may regret that you said that before long.”

“No, I won’t.” With a grin, Bard folded his arms across his chest and leaned against the doorjamb to the bathroom to watch Thran head downstairs. “I absolutely won’t.”

Thran’s frown slid into a smile, full of affection as well as anticipation. “Nor will I, my saint. Until later.”

“You know where I’ll be.”

Thran disappeared to chase after his chiming mobile. Bard eased away from the doorjamb, and went into the children’s bathroom to see how many of the small floor tiles he needed to clean before he could begin to patch the floor. Eh, maybe another fifty or so. He dumped the cleaned ones in a pile in the corner, then took the bucket with him back out to the barn. As he clamped the next small tile in the vise, he smiled at Thran’s enthusiasm for how often they enjoyed each other.

It’d be a cold day in Hell before he’d let anything dim his angel’s enthusiasm for that – or his own.
Chapter 60

Chapter Summary

While a saint pushes hard to turn a construction site into a home, an angel swears at his mobile... and also supplicates the gods.

Chapter Notes

Sigrid's track teammate, Jesse, is an homage to the Jesse on my son's track team who was a math genius (and still is), and as generous as the day is long. He taught a lot of children about math, and a few adults about grace.

In another hour, Bard scraped the last white, hexagonal bathroom floor tile he hoped he’d ever have to clean in his life. What a fiddly, tedious, annoying chore! On top of it, it was cold enough that his fingers ached. He counted the tiles one last time – yes, he’d finished another sixty – and scooped them back in their plastic bucket to bring into the house. He put away the files, swept up the scattered bits of grout and mastic that he’d filed off the tiles, and gladly locked the barn door behind him. As he came inside, he heard Thran’s voice in the sitting room, still on his mobile, so he didn’t interrupt, instead heading upstairs to the children’s bathroom. Gods, how good did it feel to wash his hands under hot water, as much to warm them as clean them? Now he could feel his fingers again. He removed the toilet; none of the replacement tiles needed to go under it, but with it out of the way, it was much easier for him to arrange the cleaned tiles in place. Yes, he’d cleaned enough, they fit the space, and the color matched the rest of the floor well – one would have to look closely to see the slightly creamier hue.

Bard removed the tiles from the vacant place to spread the mastic. In contrast to the hours it had taken Bard to clean the tiles, it took less than fifteen minutes to set them in place. He had a few to cut on the edge, so hauled the wet saw outside of the solarium to make the cuts, hoping the racket didn’t disturb Thran’s calls too much. A handful was all he needed, so he hurried upstairs to set those last few in place. Thanks to modern plumbing connections, he needed only another fifteen minutes to reseat the toilet.

Another piece of the bathroom was done.

He looked around in satisfaction as he cleaned up the construction debris. Once he hung hooks on the back of the door for the children’s robes, and two extra towel bars, he’d done all he could for today. Tomorrow, he’d grout the small part of the floor, give one last polish to the wall tile, and the children’s bathroom would be finished.

Checking his mobile, Bard found that he still had two hours before Bain, Legolas, and Tilda would be home, so he headed downstairs to toss more laundry into the washer. There was still one wall of the kitchen to paint, so he got the ladder, brushes, and drop cloths, and set to with a will. Bit by bit, everything was coming together.

“I have never seen anyone perched on a ladder, so hard at work, who looked so happy,” Thran’s voice penetrated Bard’s reverie.

He turned a broad smile on his husband. “I am happy. This finishes the kitchen, all but the floor. The children’s bathroom is finished but for that little bit of grout work. Tomorrow, I’ll get paint for our room and set to. It’s good to see progress.” The dryer buzzer sounded, drawing Bard’s chuckle. “Including laundry. Though in this house, that’s a rarity. There’s always laundry to do.”

“I will get the laundry,” Thran waved. “You have become the superhero with the cape, Bard. Able to renovate large houses with a single bound, faster than a New York minute, more powerful than the force of four children and a dancer to generate laundry. Is there more to put in the dryer?”

“The washer’s got your stuff in it, so that needs hanging up. If you get that, I’ll wrangle the dryer stuff and put another load in.”

“Please, allow me the luxury to hide from my mobile for a few minutes,” Thran held up his hands. “I can claim that I did not hear it over the noise of the washer. You finish the wall, which looks quite nice, if I may say so.”

“I thank you. It’ll feel good to have one public room finished when we have guests on Friday,” Bard replied. “We’ll need to catch the children when they come in to tell them the paint’s wet, or they’ll discover it in some fashion that calls for paint remover.”

Thran chuckled. “Perhaps I should tape a sign to the mudroom door.”

“Good idea.”

Thran disappeared into the mudroom to deal with the laundry, so Bard resumed his painting. He had only a little more to do, so finished the last bit of trim before Thran reappeared. Bard carried his brushes into the mudroom to find the laundry well in hand – folded clothes atop the dryer, another load in the washer, and Thran’s dance attire festooning the laundry line.

“The domestic dancer,” Bard shook his head.

“How can I not be?” Thran shrugged. “You do so much that I must look for ways to help.”

“You do plenty,” Bard assured him. “We both do. That’s a sign of a good marriage – both partners do whatever needs doing, and no one keeps score. Of course, I’m the lucky one of the pair.”

Thran paused in hanging up a pair of tights. “How so?”

Bard dumped his brushes in the laundry sink and started to rinse them. “Not many people in the world can say that their scruffy laundry is done by the world’s most elite dancer.”

Thran snorted with laughter. “No more than can say that their endless laundry is done by an elite metal sculptor. And do not try to tell me that you are not an elite metal sculptor. The Internet will call you a liar. And do not try to tell me that the Internet speaks of ten years ago. Soon the Internet will say the same thing of you again. To help with that, I would like to respectfully suggest that on Sunday, your day devoted to your art, you go to the art supply store and buy the clay you need to begin your model of Rahmiel.”

“ ‘Respectfully suggest?’” Bard gave Thran an incredulous look. “Why so formal, angel?”

Thran resumed the hanging up of laundry. “It means that I do not presume to know that what you need is clay, and what you plan to work on is Rahmiel. If you choose to work on something else, that is your prerogative. What I want most is for you to be happy to work on your art, whatever aspect of it you choose.”

Bard wiped off his cleaned brush, and set the roller up against the edge of the laundry sink to dry. He wiped his hands dry before he gave Thran his full regard. “Is everything okay?”

“Everything is fine.” Thran hung up the last of his dance things to dry. The expression he turned on Bard, however, was pale apprehension. “Everything is fine now. I want it to stay that way, and I want you to know that I want it to stay that way.”

Bard reached out to give Thran’s braid a gentle tub. “Hmm, let me guess. Something came up this afternoon during your calls, because you’re more worried than you were before. But you still want to sign with UltraViolet Ballet.”

“Now you add divination of thoughts to your list of talents.” Thran leaned back against the dryer, crossed his arms over his chest, and sighed. “Yes, the enormity... increases.”

“If you were still in your apartment, with Legolas in boarding school, would you sign with UltraViolet and try to pull off this ballet?”

“Yes,” Thran said without hesitation, but his tone was guilty.

“Then sign with UltraViolet.”

“Bard...” Thran shut his eyes. “The lure of the artistic challenge is clear, and so is my lust to take it. But I have a family now... a husband, four children... you will all suffer because of what I will do to make this ballet. What will happen when I live like a troll in a ballet studio? Will you forget you have a husband, or Legolas a father, because I am not here? What will you do when I become so tired that I snap at you for no reason? What if I do not come home one night? What will you think when I let this madness go that far?”

Bard put his arms around Thran. “Do you remember our trigger word? The word we hold in reserve so that neither of us has to do something we don’t want to do when we play?”

Thran nodded. “Sanctuary. That is our trigger word when we play.”

“We’ll give ourselves another one, except this one means everything is still okay. Even when we have no time together to do more than pass in the hall, even when you’re pulled in seven directions, or I am, we’ll still have time to say that word, and we’ll know that all is well.”

Thran smiled. “That is a good plan. So what shall we choose as this new trigger word?”

“How about ‘I love you?’”

Snickering, Thran insinuated his fingers in Bard’s hair and brushed a kiss on Bard’s lips. “Oh, lyubov moya, you are a gem. Of course that is the right thing to say.”

“I don’t know how much hell will come in the next six months. But I’ve been in the depths, Thran. Ten years of no hope that life would ever get better, that I’d ever care well enough for my children, that I’d ever get back to my art, or back here – I know in a way I hope you never do. So even if the next six months are hell, we‘ll still have more than I did for a long time, starting with each other, so we’ll get through it. I want to see you dance Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield, and Death Defeated by Love, and everything in between. If joining UltraViolet and making this ballet is what you burn to do, then you have to do it, or you will always regret it. I’ll back you however I can.”

Thran looked deeply into Bard’s eyes. “Would you do something this mad?”
“I did. We got married, didn’t we?”

“This is not the same. This is to battle a hydra. So many heads, and so few to chop them off. So I ask you again – would you do something this mad for your art?”

Bard’s nod was firm, and his regard was unblinking. “In a heartbeat, without hesitation.”

Swallowing hard, Thran wrapped arms around Bard and pulled him close. “I do not deserve you.”

“Yes, you do, just as much as I deserve you. Now we’d better stop, or our children will tease us about being sappy.”

“Let them.” Thran didn’t release Bard from his embrace. “They have no appreciation of the undeserved gifts that life bestows.”

Bard chuckled, rubbing Thran’s back. “So does this mean you’ve decided?”

For a long moment, Thran held Bard without moving, without speaking. But as Bard knew he would, Thran eased them apart to regard him with serious grey eyes. “I have. I am sorry.”

“Don’t be. I’ve got guilt covered for both of us, remember? You’re the angel, the one who flies. Say yes to UltraViolet, and don’t look down.”

Thran’s serious expression crumbled into a rueful chuckle. “Have you considered a career as a motivational speaker?”

“Only to an angel,” Bard snickered. “Come on. We’ve got just time to parcel out the clean laundry before most of Clan Ffyrnig gets off the bus.”

“Ah, I remember,” Thran observed, as he and Bard carried laundry baskets full of clean clothes upstairs. “Our Sigrid has the away track meet today.”

“I thought I’d stop at the homeowners’ mecca when I pick her up and get the paint for our room. If you trust the lads to hold down the fort while we’re gone, you can come with me and weigh in on the color.”

“We will see once the children come home. They will have to start homework without us if I go.”

“We won’t be gone that long. We’ll be home in time to make sure everyone does all the stuff they’d rather not do.”

“Then I would like to go, if only to get away from the mobile again. Tcha, so many calls!”

Downstairs, the door banged, signaling the sound of arriving children. Bard’s eyes met Thran’s, and both sprinted for the stairs.

“Ware the kitchen wall near the fridge!” Bard shouted as he ran downstairs. “Wet paint!”

He sprinted into the kitchen to see Bain’s hand poised over the fridge door, just ready to open it. Legolas looked up guiltily, his hand smudged with white paint.

“Too late,” he murmured with a sigh. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay, Legs,” Bard assured him. “Easy to fix – just a little smudge. Wash your hand so you don’t get the paint on your clothes. Welcome home, Bain, Tilda.”
“Hi, Da,” the two children chorused. “Wow, Da, you painted the kitchen, too?”

“I finished most of your bathroom earlier, Bain, so I thought I’d finish the kitchen, too.”

“Ooh, the bathroom is finished?” Tilda brightened, taking the clementine Legolas passed her. “Everything?”

“All but the grout in the floor, little doll. You have to shower in our bathroom tonight while the wall grout cures, but tomorrow you’ll be back in yours. New hooks and towel racks, wall grout, and paint are all done.”

“Your Da has worked very hard today,” Thran said, giving Legolas a warm hug. “Much more than I. All I have done today is my barre and yoga, and then held my mobile to my ear.”

“I had the easy jobs,” Bard teased, brush in hand as he dabbed away the small smear Legolas’s hand had left in the wet paint. “It’s Thran who had to spend all day trying to herd a bunch of cats. How was your day?”

The children chatted about school as Bard tidied up his painting supplies. Once Tilda helped him fold up the drop cloth, preparations began for supper. Farro, steamed veg, mixed fruit, and corn muffins supplemented the pork chops, all of which were quickly devoured. After cleanup, Bard and Thran settled the children to their homework. When Bard’s mobile signaled Sigrid’s impending arrival at the school, all was well enough in hand that Thran decided to come along.

“Legolas has the bridge until we get back,” Bard decreed with a salute to the youth. “Ensigns Bain and Tilda, stand by Lieutenant Legolas until Co-captains Bard and Thran return with Lieutenant Sigrid.”

Legolas’s grin was gleeful as he returned a salute to his father and Bard. “Aye-aye, Cap’ns.”

“Aye-aye,” Bain and Tilda seconded with identical salutes, so Bard and Thran headed out in Bard’s truck smiling.

Sigrid was waiting for them in the parking lot of the Imladris Academy when Bard pulled in. Spotting them, she hefted her backpack and sports bag, waved an enthusiastic goodbye to her teammates, and climbed into the back seat of the truck with excited hellos.

“How was the track meet?” Thran asked.

“Long, but a lot of fun. I had a lot of time between races, so I got a lot of my homework done. It’s neat, Da and Ada – a lot of kids on the team work on their homework, too, and they help each other if someone gets stuck. One of the seniors, Jesse, is a math genius, and really nice, and he helps anyone who asks. Another one, Avril, had Mr. Saur last year, and she told me about the big spring project he always does, so I’m ready for it. The kids in my old school never did that. Such an improvement!”

“I’m glad, Sig,” Bard smiled, relieved yet again for the affirmation that their precipitous move had not distressed the children for long. “How did your races go?”

“I was first in the four hundred again, which was nice. The surprise was the eight hundred. I expected to finish about third, because the other schools had two or three really good runners. But I won that one, too! And we got a good solid second in the mile relay. So we did well. The boys did, too. So well, we ate a dozen pizzas! That’s a lot for twenty kids.”

“Not as many as I would’ve expected,” Bard teased. “Be glad Bain and Legs weren’t along to help
“That would’ve accounted for at least three or four more, right there,” Sigrid agreed. “Where are we going?”

“I have to stop at the homeowners’ mecca for more paint,” Bard explained. “Maybe you and Thran can come up with something for the ballroom.”

Bard winced at Thran’s smothered chuckle. “Um, I don’t think so, Sig. Thran’s probably going to have his new company in there to practice a lot, so let’s go for something less frilly, okay?”

“So you signed with UltraViolet?” Sigrid bounced on the back seat. “And you’re going to do the Death ballet? That’ll be so cool, Ada!”

“I expect to sign tomorrow, yes,” Thran agreed, glancing sideways at Bard with a smile. “And yes, I will try to do the Death ballet.”

“Then let’s go pick out paint!” Sigrid clapped her hands, as they pulled into the parking lot.

Selecting the two colors of blue to make the subtly mottled finish for the bedroom took little time, but all three looked at the dizzying array of colors without seeing anything that struck them for the ballroom. Sigrid pulled at her bottom lip consideringly.

“Divide and conquer,” Sigrid murmured. “That’s what they told us in history class. So... do we want a warm color, or a cool one?”

“The windows let in light just from the north and south,” Bard said slowly. “So that’s more of a colder light than not. A warm color would help to offset that. Nothing too bright, though, Thran? A warm but calm color?”

Thran nodded. “Yes, warm to encourage ease, but calm not to overexcite.”

“So not too bright,” Bard said as he perused the racks of samples.

“What do all those beautiful palaces in Russia look like, Ada?” Sigrid asked.

“All very much too opulent, ma chère,” Thran shook his head and grimaced. “Very busy and overdone with golden scrolls and ugly cherubs and so forth. Even worse than French palaces, which unfortunately are nothing like the very charming French countryside. It would be much nicer if our ballroom were more like the countryside than the palace.”

“What about this one?” Sigrid pulled out one of the sample chips. “This one looks like cream. It’d look nice with white trim. No, not this one.” She stuffed the chip back in its slot and pulled out a nearby one. “This one. It’s a bit deeper, and – oh, look, it’s called Provence Crème. It’s karma, right? What about this one?”

Bard and Thran bent over the small chip. “I like it,” Thran agreed.

“So do I,” Bard agreed. “Let’s look at it under the light box.”

They held the small chip under the store light box that simulated daylight, and put a chip beside it of the bright white Bard used for all the woodwork. All three agreed that it looked warm and serene under all of the lights, and offered a good contrast to the white trim.
“What about the ceiling?” Bard asked. “All white? The same cream? A darker or lighter one? Something else entirely?”

“I once saw a palace as a small child where the walls and ceiling were the same color, and all the plaster work and trim was white.” Thran grinned in reminiscence. “I liked that one, as any small boy would, because it looked like a cake covered in icing roses.”

“A cake?” Sigrid laughed. “I can see that. It’d be cool to dance in a ballroom that looks like a fancy wedding cake.”

“So the same color on the ceiling and walls, and white on the trim. Maybe a satin finish on the ceiling and walls to reflect the light from the chandeliers? And gloss white trim?”

Thran and Sigrid looked at each other, smiling. “I like it,” Thran nodded.

“I like it, too, Ada. It’ll make you look even more like an angel.”

“Oh-oh,” Bard nudged his blushing husband. “She’s on to you, cariad.”

Sigrid tsked. “Um, Da.... didn’t you mutter something about an angel all of three minutes after you met Ada?”

“If not before,” Bard admitted without apology. “So, Provence Crème paint?”

“So it shall be,” Thran nodded.

Before long, Bard, Thran, and Sigrid loaded four gallon cans of blue paint and five five-gallon buckets of cream paint into the truck and headed home. As Sigrid dashed upstairs to shower, Bard and Thran checked on the other children. Legolas and Tilda worked on Tilda’s French words in the sitting room, and Bain was still at the kitchen table to finish an essay for his English class. Sigrid joined Bain at the table to finish the last bits of her work. When they were done, Legolas was prevailed upon for the next chapter of Harry Potter. After they finished reading, Thran told the children about his decision to join UltraViolet and create the Death ballet. The children listened soberly as Thran warned them about how much time he expected this effort to take, and how absent he might be as efforts progressed.

“I want you to know this ahead of time, so that you are not surprised. You, especially, Legolas. But we will be together in our house, and Bard will make sure that we all have what we need. So I hope you understand why I pursue this.”

“Course,” Sigrid nodded. “It’s the chance to be different, to make something new, to not be the same as what everyone else is. We’ll be fine.” She looked to Legolas. “We’ve got your back, too, Legs. When you miss Ada too much, we’ll help you kidnap him for a day or two.”

Bain’s eyes lit up. “Yeah! And I’ll be glad to play more zombie apocalypse with you to compensate.”

“I’ll read Harry Potter to you,” Tilda offered. “And help you with your French words.”

“I’ll get you to fencing and such,” Bard said. “And I’m your go-to guy when you want an easy victory in any video game.”

“Oh, that’s no lie,” Bain muttered under his breath, rolling his eyes, earning laughter from everyone, Bard included.
“I’m not that bad,” Bard protested.

“Yes, you are,” Bain assured him.

Thran laughed. “It seems you will be in good hands, synok.”

“It does, Papa,” Legolas nodded with a gratified smile around the room. “We’re Clan Ffyrnig. We’ll be all right.”

* * *

Once all the children were in bed and Bard was through the shower, Thran washed off the day’s efforts, then settled into bed beside Bard.

“Told you,” Bard murmured sleepily as Thran snuggled close. “We’ll be fine.”

The lump was back in Thran’s throat. It had nothing to do with the arduous task he’d embark upon tomorrow. That brought him nothing but excitement, albeit leavened with resolve to muster all the force he needed to keep Irmo focused. The lump was because he knew better than Bard and the children how bringing this ballet to life would stress them. He wanted to do this ballet so badly that he tasted it, breathed it, felt it, smelled it. It would be so hard not to plunge into it without regard to anything else. In the depths of it, it would take all he had not to forget everything else, even his son, even his husband.

No matter how hard that urge grew, he could not let his drive to make Death rise, then fall, destroy his family’s faith in him, their regard for him. He could not let himself forget the five people who were more important than any ballet.

He promised himself that he would remember his saint Bard, his treasured son Legolas, his excellent co-conspirator Sigrid, his mischievous Bain, and his small Kukla Tilda.

What if he weren’t strong enough to keep that promise?

Oh, gods... please, make me strong enough.

* * *

Thursday saw Thran at the barre, then back on his mobile early. Bard set out some ground beef to thaw, then finished the bathroom grout, so that was one more room done. The next order of business was to haul all of the furniture out of his and Thran’s bedroom but the bed and into the children’s study. He draped the bed and the floor with drop cloths, and set to. On went the primer, both for walls and woodwork. This was a big room, but he finished before lunch, and started on the first coat of blue. He got two walls well mottled — they looked pretty scabby, but that would improve with the second coat — then downed a quick lunch with Thran. They didn’t quite wolf down their food in their underwear over the sink like stereotypical bachelors, but neither lingered — in fact, they mixed up a meatloaf while gulping down their meal. Afterwards, when Thran went back to his mobile, Bard finished the first mOTTled coat of blue and started on the second. This one went on with rags and sponges to deepen the subtle gradation of color. When the children came home, he threw the meatloaf and six potatoes in the oven, delegated Sigrid to do the stir fry when the oven timer sounded, told her to rally the troops for supper without him, and ran back upstairs to paint and wipe and rub until he’d finished all four walls, no matter how much his shoulders and back ached from the constant strain of the day’s efforts.

When at last he came downstairs, everyone had finished eating, the kitchen was clean, and the children were around the table working on their homework. They looked up as he appeared with brushes in hand.

“Where’s Thran?”

“In the sitting room. Still on his mobile,” Sigrid replied.

“Did he eat?”

“Papa ate,” Legolas nodded. “We all said he had to, so he did.”

“Yeah, and now we have to tell you the same thing, Da,” Bain said.

“You won’t have to tell me twice,” Bard exhaled. “I’m starving, but the walls are done. Be careful when you shower, children; the paint’s still wet. I’ve just got the woodwork to do tomorrow – no, not tomorrow. In the morning, Thran and I are going to his hair stylist – ”

“Hair stylist?” Sigrid cut in.

“Hair stylist, yes,” Bard repeated, exhaling. “Hair cut, remember?”

“I remember,” Tilda nodded. “You promised that I’d still recognize you when you get home.”

“You will, little doll. When we get home, Rosie will come over to start soup. So Saturday I’ll do the woodwork.”

“So now sit down and eat,” Sigrid ordered, frowning at Bard.

“As soon as I wash the brushes,” Bard promised, crossing to the mudroom.

Sigrid got up from the table. “I’ll make you a plate.”

“Thanks, sweetness.”

“Is Ada going to get all of his hair cut off?” Tilda asked. “I hope not. I like it.”

“He’s not going to get all of his hair cut off. Just a trim,” Bard called from the mudroom. He washed the brushes quickly, impatient to get to his late supper. When they were finally done, he gladly sat at the kitchen table, where Sigrid put a warm plate in front of him. “Thanks, Sig.”

“Tea?”

“Please. Are there any homework questions I can answer?”

“We’re good so far,” Legolas replied. “Oh! Kíllian and Tara said they could come tomorrow. Tara’s mother is making a trifle. Kíllian said he’d bring cookies.”

Sigrid snorted. “I don’t think Finn will think to bring a thing.”
“That’s okay. We’ll have enough.” Bard shoveled in another bite. He was so hungry that even humble meatloaf tasted better than it ever had before. “I think we’d better add another kind of soup to the menu, though. Does everyone like ham and bean?”

“Mmm,” Tilda murmured, concentrating on her map worksheet. “I do.”

“Me, too,” Bain licked his lips.

“I like that, too,” Legolas added.

“I’d rather have potato leek,” Sigrid allowed, "but you're making carrot ginger, and I really like that, so ham and bean is fine.”

“Okay, ham and bean. Maybe some corn muffins to go with.”

The children weighed in on their choice of muffins, but shortly conversation lapsed as the children concentrated on their homework and Bard on his supper. He was so hungry that he went back for more meatloaf, then a slab of cake to finish with his tea. He cleaned up his dishes as Tilda went off to shower. Bard carried the last bit of his cake and his tea into the sitting room, where Thran was just getting off his mobile, muttering in Russian. Bard didn’t recognize this particular curse, but it was clear from Thran’s inflection that that’s what it was. Thran stabbed one last finger at his mobile, turning it off.

“I have had enough of this for two days, much less one,” he growled, dropping his mobile on the fruit crate between the sofas and glaring at it. “Suka blyad!”

Bard sat down next to him and offered his cake. “Have a treat for persevering.”

Thran took – for him – a huge bite of the cake and sat back to chew it with a glower.

“Long day?”

“Very.”

Bard leaned back against the sofa for another bite, and mutely held up the cake. His husband took another big bite, and they sat side by side to chew in silence. Bard sipped his tea, and held that out to Thran as well, who took a big drink. Once he swallowed, he heaved a long sigh.

“Feel better?”

Thran’s glower finally crumbled into a sheepish smile. “I do. It is very good cake. You are kind to share it.”

“That’s the beauty of being the adults in the house. We can go back for more.”

“I have had enough.” Another big sigh. “How goes the paint?”

“Walls are done.”

Thran blinked. “What, the primer and the first coat?”

“And the second coat. That’s why I just got down here; I was on a roll. Keep your fingers crossed that it’ll still look good in the morning.”

“All of it?” Thran gave Bard his full regard at last. “Gods, Bard, you must be exhausted!”
“Sore, yes. Exhausted, no,” Bard conceded. “I may avail myself of your tub once the children are in bed.”

“It is not my tub. It is our tub,” Thran corrected in an exasperated tone.

“Our tub, then. Regardless of whose tub it is, I’ll be glad to get into it. I’ll be even gladder that I don’t have to paint again until Saturday. Assuming we’re still on for tomorrow morning.”

“After the day I have had, I need tomorrow’s respite even more than before. I will not turn my mobile back on until we come home tomorrow.”

“Was it just a lot of details, or was Irmo being Irmo, or something else?”

“A lot of details, yes. Irmo being Irmo, yes. Something else, yes. But it progresses. Mr. Nori will earn a large sum this month.”

“This Mr. Nori of yours... is he your lawyer, or your Russian mafia minion?”

Thran’s grin finally took on a gleeful edge. “He is a most resourceful fellow. Investigator, expediter, facilitator.”

“Ah. The sort of person who’d have to kill us if we found out what he really does.”

Thran laughed. “He would think that very funny.”

“And he wouldn’t disagree with me, either, would he? Will I ever get to meet him?”

“Stranger things have happened. I myself have met him face to face only a few times. He is very expensive, and worth every penny.”

“So he looks out for your interests.”

“Very much so. That is part of the reason for my annoyance today. I drive a hard bargain, but he has convinced me that I am wise to do so. It makes no sense to take on the risks this entails without reaping the rewards if it succeeds.”

“What’s Mr. Nori telling you to push for?”

“A sizable piece of the gate, as it is called. So much bantering about money, and so far very little about dancing and our story. I am still not yet convinced that this has one shadow of a chance in any hell you can imagine, but on it goes. I have made my position clear, and will let them think about it in silence until Saturday. They will either accept or refuse. When they do, then I will either accept or refuse, and on we will go from there.”

Tilda stuck her head into the sitting room. “Can we come in and read? Legolas and I are through our showers, and Bain is almost done.”

“Of course,” Thran smiled, sitting up a little straighter. “It will be good to hear the next part of Harry’s adventures.”

The children came in, Harry’s adventures continued, and shortly Thursday drew to a sleepy close. Bard was glad to retreat upstairs, even if the bedroom was still a painting site. With Thran’s murmurs of admiration in his ears, he pulled off the drop cloths, left them folded up in a corner of the landing, and edged the bed and night tables back closer to the wall so that he and Thran could sleep in more or less their usual position.
How blissful was it to sink scrub off the day’s sweat, then soak his weary bones in the tub? He shut his eyes and let Thran massage his shoulders until a little of their stiffness eased.

“I just remembered,” he murmured lazily, eyes shut as Thran worked on his muscles. “I have to take the truck tomorrow morning. I have to pick up the doorway from the salvage shop, and I don’t think it’ll fit in your SUV.”

“Nor do I. Perhaps Mrs. Mathom will have news for us about screens.”

“Maybe so.”

“You are almost asleep, lyubov moya.”

“That’s what a massage from an angel does to me.”

“That’s what working so hard does to you. I still do not believe that you painted three coats on the bedroom walls in an afternoon.”

“Nine hours... three hours per coat – shit! I am such a scatterbrain!”

“What is this scatterbrain?” Thran’s hands paused on Bard’s shoulders.

“I didn’t paint the ceiling. I completely forgot about it.”

“It is no matter. You will get to it Saturday if you want, and no one will care or notice that your enthusiasm to smear blue paint on the walls happened first.”

“How could I have forgotten?”

“It happens. One works so hard, sometimes the mundane is forgotten in the lure of the exotic...” Thran’s hands tightened on Bard’s shoulders.

Bard sat up to look back at his husband. “What is it?”

Thran shook his head. “Nothing important, lyubov moya. Merely too much time on the mobile today. So many details, so many things to remember... I am sure that before long, I will forget many things. May they all be things as easy to recover from as painting a room out of your preferred sequence.”

Bard stroked Thran’s arm. “You’ll remember everything important, Thran.”

“I hope someone will tell me what things are important, so that I know what ones to concentrate on.”

“I can tell you that. You’re a dancer – the dancer of this ballet. No one can do that part but you. Almost everything else you can hire someone to help with. Don’t let them pull you in so many directions that it affects your dancing.”

Bard was rewarded with a warm smile. “You are right.”

“I am about this.”

“So you are. That means one thing.”

“What’s that?”

“Mr. Nori will earn a very large sum this month.”
Bard’s chuckle was sympathetic as they got out of the tub and dried off. “Likely so.”

* * *

For the second night in a row, Thran wrapped himself around Bard a bit more closely. For the second night in a row, Thran’s appreciation of his husband’s warmth was tinged with sharp concern. This was what was important, to lie beside the love of his life and savor everything they had together. This was what he had to keep foremost in his thoughts –

What if the first scene of the Underworld were done on two levels, or perhaps three...?
Chapter 61

Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint indulge in a little personal grooming, after which delicious mayhem ensues. Afterwards, Clan Ffyrnig hosts its first party.

Chapter Notes

The writer admits to having tongue firmly in cheek for her references to a certain member of the Three Musketeers. Check my Tumblr blog (eldritchmage.tumblr.com) for some appropriate pictures!

"The most genial of beverages" is my nod to Elizabeth Peters, that most wonderful of mystery writers, and her intrepid heroine, Amelia Peabody. If you haven't read her books, you should. They're terrific!

Translation Notes:

krasavitsa = beautiful (Russian)

Both Thran and Bard were up early this morning, Thran to work through his barre and yoga, and Bard to wrangle children’s breakfasts, lunches, and bus stop. As soon as the children’s bus trundled out of sight, Bard waved goodbye to Rosie and hurried home. Thran had just finished a brief shower, and Bard joined him in the bedroom to dress. They had to head to the city quickly if they wanted to get to Thran’s hair stylist on time.

“I don’t suppose I should show up in work boots and grotty jeans and a seen-better-days tee shirt, should I?” Bard said facetiously, mulling his side of the closet.

“You would not look out of place,” Thran smiled, slipping his favorite black velvet jeans over his black silk underwear. “And Rowan will do her usual magic regardless of what you wear. But I suggest you wear something nicer.”

“So I don’t embarrass you?” Bard teased.

“So I am not tempted to ravish you while you dress,” Thran purred. His long glance sent a jolt of arousal through Bard. “Such a temptation you are in your work clothes.”

“Do you need to take the edge off, angel?”

“Of course I do. It has been three long days since the vampire visited his artist, and I have spent most of the time since then with a mobile plugged into my ear rather than your cock plugged into me. It would take very little to make me miss our moment with Rowan.”
“Maybe we can snatch time when we get home from the salvage center. Rosie won’t appear until we call her.”

Thran bent down to brush a kiss on Bard’s lips. “What game shall we play today, lyubov moya? Or would you prefer simple love between an angel and a saint?”

Bard gave a little growl of anticipation, grinning when he saw the light spark in Thran’s grey eyes. “Either way, you’d better tell Rowan not to spend too much time styling your pretty white hair, because I’m going to mess it up as soon as I can drag your pretty white ass into bed.”

“I will tell her to make you a beautiful sacrifice for my altar, because I intend to mess up more than your pretty brown hair as soon as I can drag your pretty brown ass into bed.”

Bard’s cock jolted half erect just at the sound of Thran’s silky voice. He winced and rearranged his underwear, drawing Thran’s anticipatory laughter. “Enough, you greedy bastard, or we’ll have to explain to the children why I didn’t get a haircut, our bedroom is so pillaged, and nothing got done around the house.”

“Then put on your clothes, and stop tempting me with the sight of your delicious, luscious, irresistible, bare chest,” Thran teased, arming his way into his black silk tee, then his usual long sweater. “Jeans are fine, and a tee shirt will allow Rowan to attend you easily. The salon is usually overwarm, so I will shed my sweater once we get there.”

Bard chose jeans, a blue tee, and a darker blue fleece pullover, so he’d be comfortable at the salon as well as when he loaded their arched doorway into the truck. Hiking boots in place, they grabbed coats and scarves and gloves, and set out.

Despite this being Friday, traffic wasn’t outrageous this morning. They made it into the city, parked, and walked into Thran’s salon with a few minutes to spare. Bard looked around with interest – he’d never been inside a fancy hair salon before, though this one looked to offer more than hair styling. As many men as women were being attended to – here was a manicurist, and there was a glimpse of a massage therapist coming out of a treatment room, and elsewhere were other stations that offered he had no idea what. Out of his league, he was, but he was more amused about that than intimidated. He’d been out of his league the night he’d had to bleed the radiators of a cold, wet, infuriated angel, too, and he’d come out of that with more riches than he’d ever imagined. Thran had spoken of his trips here with enjoyment, so he settled himself to appreciate a new experience.

Once Thran spoke to the receptionist, they shed their coats and sweaters, and retreated to the waiting area well stocked with comfortable chairs, stacks of newspapers and magazines, and a full service coffee bar, complete with pastries.

“Mmm, cappuccino,” Thran murmured, moving at once to the coffee bar. “It is very good, Bard, or do you devote yourself only to tea, that most genial of beverages?”

“Daphne loved espresso,” Bard confided. “Too bitter for me. But cappuccino’s got more sugar, doesn’t it?”

“And warm milk,” Thran said with enough lust in his voice that Bard snickered. “I love the warm, frothy milk.”

“Ah. Now I know what to get you for Christmas this year. An espresso machine.”

“Here.” Thran offered his cup – china, not plastic – to Bard for a sip. “If you like this, I will make one for you.”

“Ah. Café au lait for you, then. Just as nice. More sugar?”

“Just a little.”

Thran busied himself making the concoction, then passed it to Bard. “The pastries are very good, too.”

“I’ll have one if you will.”

“That is not fair. I want you to enjoy it all. I already know what the pastry tastes like.”

“One of these tiny pastries won’t kill you, Thran.”

“If I must, if only to see to your enjoyment. One of the nut pastries for me, I think. Or perhaps the raspberry.”

Bard chose a raspberry pastry. “Take a nut pastry for yourself. We’ll split them, so you have a bite of both.”

“An excellent plan, lyubov moya.” Thran nibbled a bit of his nut pastry, then offered the rest to Bard. “Mmm. Delicious.”

“Raspberry’s good, too. Open wide.”

They sat down to enjoy their remaining pastry. The pastry was light and buttery, and Bard enjoyed the treat between sips of his café au lait. Thran gave him a smile that was more relaxed than any expression he’d shown in the past two days, which eased Bard’s worry. As if Thran divined his thoughts, he sipped his cappuccino with relish.

“It is nice to be treated so well, yes? At home, you pamper me with tea and muffins, so I hope you enjoy a taste of what it is like to have such gifts bestowed on you.”

“I’m glad you like tea and muffins, angel.” Bard nibbled another edge of his pastry. “This is good, too.”

“Thran! Honey!”

Rowan wore the studio’s ubiquitous black pants and tunic, but they could not disguise the force of her personality. She was a sumptuously curved black woman, resplendent in shoulder-length grey dreadlocks and opulent southwestern animal fetish necklace and earrings in corals, turquoises, and creams. Her smile was warm and excited, and she approached with arms outstretched.

Grinning widely, Thran set aside his cup, rose from his chair, and met the woman’s outstretched arms with his own.

“Rowan! It is so nice to see you again!” Bard grinned as his tall husband bent down to the foot-shorter stylist to exchange the cliché of New York air kisses – no, his mistake; these kisses were the real thing. “You look well, krasavitsa.”

“Oh, honey, it’s good to see you, too.” Rowan patted Thran’s forearms with genuine affection in her sparkling brown eyes. “I’ve missed you. Where’ve you been hiding, lover?”

Thran turned to Bard. “With my husband. This is Bard. He is a very talented metal sculptor. Bard, this is my delightful friend and magician, Rowan.”
Rowan’s mouth made a silent O as she raked Bard with her glance, then looked back at Thran with admiration. “Oh, honey, I don’t blame you for hiding – he’s a dish! Hello, Bard. It’s a pleasure to meet the man who has snared my tall Russian boyfriend at last.”

Bard laughed as he shook Rowan’s hand firmly. “I’d apologize for that, except that I’m not sorry in the least.”

“I should hope not!” Rowan’s laugh was hearty. “It’s clear that you two agree with each other. So rare these days, isn’t it? The world needs more true love like yours.”

Bard reddened. “We’re still that obvious, then.”

“Oh, you’re still that obvious,” Rowan nodded, laughing at them both, for Thran had colored, too. “I love it! So what are we doing today, Thran?”

“My usual,” Thran shrugged. “As you recommend, of course.”

“Oh, you’re still that obvious,” Rowan nodded, laughing at them both, for Thran had colored, too. “I love it! So what are we doing today, Thran?”

“Of course,” Rowan winked. “And for you, Bard?”

Bard started to run his hand through his hair, but stopped himself before he got too far. It wouldn’t have worked, anyway; he’d wound it into a messy knot for the drive into the city, and it was still so arranged. His grimace was self-conscious. “I need a haircut, that’s obvious.”

Rowan nodded. “We’ll start there, then. Thran, I’ll have Marisa wash and whiten you while I talk to Bard. You know your way back.”

“Thank you, krasavitsa,” Thran bent to kiss Rowan’s cheek again, winked at Bard, and threaded his way through the salon.

As Thran retreated, Rowan patted Bard’s arm. “Come on, honey. Let’s talk.”

Rowan led him through the salon to her station, where she gestured him into the chair. Bard made himself comfortable while Rowan gave him a critical look. She eased his hair out of its knot, and arranged it on his shoulders, regarding him in the mirror.

“Why don’t you tell me a little about yourself, Bard? Any details you want to share about that gorgeous husband of yours are welcome, too.”

Rowan’s laugh was infectious, so Bard replied in kind. “He’s my angel,” Bard said without embarrassment. “But you already know that. So, um, about me... I have three children, and Thran has his son, and we live in a beautiful house that I’m renovating. I do metal sculpture, as Thran said, and he dances, and we’re very happy together.”

“You’re a busy man,” Rowan summarized. “You aren’t one to spend a lot of time looking after your hair.”

“I have other ways to spend my time,” Bard admitted. “The children are all busy, so I keep up with them. My art... working metal is hot, sweaty, and dirty. I’m behind a welding mask some of the time, or pounding away at an anvil by the furnace. Renovation’s messy, too, but I love both. What I look like then isn’t important. But when I go to the children’s school, or visit friends... or go to my art openings, or one of Thran’s performances...”

Rowan regarded him steadily, not rushing him, so Bard shrugged. When he didn’t speak, she said, “Thran’s a stunner. How do you feel about that?”
“He is. I love the way he looks, and I’m proud to be with him. But I don’t want to look like him, if that’s what you want to know, not that I could look like him, anyway. I’m happy to look like me. But I’d like to make that a little more... respectable me.”

Rowan laughed, and patted his arm. “We’re going to get along just fine, Bard. I think I can do you a bit better than just respectable. You’re right; Thran’s the rare peacock. But you’re just as gorgeous in your own way, and I can do a lot with that. Tell me about the earrings.”

Bard chuckled, and explained about Sigrid’s outrage, and how he didn’t wear them while working, but liked them for other situations.

“They suit you. Don’t do anything gaudier – leave gaudy to Thran. You’re the deep, quiet one, and subtlety works wonders for you. Now, how long do you like your hair?”

“It’s this long only because I had three children to take care of alone before Thran and I got married, and so never got around to doing anything about it. I don’t like the shaved convict look, so please, don’t do that.”

“It’d be a travesty to shave off such gorgeous hair.” Rowan gathered Bard’s hair in her hand and pulled it loosely back so that it looked shorter in the mirror. “Still, a lot of it’s damaged and needs to come off. I think you’d look better with it shorter, anyway. I can take a lot off, which would be easier to take care of, but leave you plenty to shake into your eyes when you want to tease your Russian dancer.”

Bard’s lips curved into a sly smile that made Rowan laugh outright. “Oh, my, honey; I’ll kiss you myself if you look like that for another five seconds.”

“Flatterer,” Bard riposted gallantly.

“If you don’t have enough hair to pull back in a tail, can you still keep it out of your way with a bandanna when you work?” Rowan grinned, regarding Bard’s reflection in the mirror as she held his hair back. “You’d break less of it that way, too.”

“I can do that. It’d actually give me a little padding under the welding mask.”

“It’s up to you, then. Do you trust me?”

Bard nodded, smiling. “I won’t argue with a magician.”

“Now you’re the flatterer. All right, Thran’s done his wash, so take out your earrings. You see where Thran’s sitting? Let Marisa give you a good wash and a deep condition, then we’ll get started.”

“Yes, madam,” Bard offered her a semi-serious bow, drawing her chuckle, and headed off for his wash. Thran passed by him with his hair wrapped in a towel covered with plastic wrap, smiling, so Marisa got him settled in Thran’s vacated chair, swathed him in a towel, and tilted him back to wash his hair. As the warm water splashed over him, Bard shut his eyes, and dared to relax as fingers worked soap through his hair. This was a distinctly unfamiliar experience, but a very pleasant one. It was easy to relax under the gentle scrubbing and warm rinsing. He was sorry it passed so quickly, but it wasn’t quite over. A thick goop went over his hair, then a towel like the one Thran had sported – it was hot, and felt wonderful – then plastic wrap. When he’d been properly wrapped, Marisa directed him to the plush chair beside Thran. He remembered to thank Marisa, and pass her tip to her as Thran had explained, before joining his husband.

“Do you enjoy yourself so far, lyubov moyu?” Thran murmured from his comfortable slump.
“I do. I like Rowan very much.”

Thran’s smile widened. “She is a jewel. What has she planned for you?”

“I’ll let it be a surprise.”

“Oh?”

“Don’t worry. She says I’ll be able to make you melt in under three seconds.”

“You do already that even when my eyes are shut. How does she plan to make me succumb any faster?”

“You’ll have to wait and see. And so will I.”

Thran hummed deep in his throat, then grinned. “Ah. Good. You leave it to her. You will not be disappointed. Nor will I, I am sure. So enjoy this comfortable chair, and relax while Marisa’s potion works its magic.”

Bard took that to mean that Thran wanted to savor, too, so he let their conversation lapse as he settled more deeply into his chair. In a few minutes, Marisa came to collect Thran, leaving Bard to himself. By the time Marisa came to fetch him, he was nearly asleep despite the café au lait he’d drunk. Marisa put him back in her chair to rinse the goop out of his hair, then sent him on to Rowan’s station. Thran was just rising from the chair, his beautiful hair resplendently white and silky. The ends had been subtly trimmed, and even the other stylists in the salon looked around to murmur. It brought a smile to Bard’s face to see his angel so effortlessly beautiful, so widely appreciated, and he met Thran’s eyes with delight.

“Wow,” he said simply, admiring the result of Rowan’s handiwork. “You’re good, Rowan. And you, angel, are beautiful.”

“In a little while, everyone will look at you and say the same thing,” Thran assured him. “I will indulge in another cappuccino while Rowan does her magic for you.”

Thran and Rowan exchanged more kisses, then he gave Bard a lingering look before taking himself back to the waiting area. Bard watched him go with an appreciative look.

“As I said, he’s a stunner,” Rowan shook her head. “He just might be the angel you say he is.”

“Oh, he is,” Bard nodded. “He very much is.”

“He says you’re a saint. So let’s turn you into one that an angel can’t help but worship. Have a seat.”

With a self-conscious chuckle, Bard sat.

Rowan swept a wrap around him, then hummed approvingly as she combed through his wet hair. “Much better after the conditioner. So here we go.”

Over the next thirty minutes, scissors snipped, fingers arranged, and razors trimmed. Every now and again, Rowan asked him to shake his hair, so she could see how it fell, then she’d snip and arrange and trim a little more. Eventually, she asked him to shake one more time.

“Oh, yes. I think we’ve got it.”

Bard snuck a look in the mirror, and was struck by how much of his hair was gone. Before, it had been many inches below his shoulders. Now, it was barely as long as his collar in the back, and far shorter in the front. His sideburns had been shortened, too. But even wet, it was thick, wavy, beautifully shaped. With his beard tufts, he looked like a swashbuckler – pirate, buccaneer, musketeer – any of them romantic enough to make him smile. The things he could do with that in his games with Thran...

“Honey, you’re looking kissable again. I think you’re ready for the dryer.”

The dryer and Rowan’s deft fingers danced around his head. The assured touch was soothing, lulling, and at last Bard fully appreciated why so many women loved their hair salons. He shut his eyes to enjoy the sensations without the distractions of seeing so many people move to and fro. The next time Thran offered to dry his hair, he’d say yes before Thran finished asking. This was so, so wonderful...

“Give me your earrings, honey.”

Bard dug in his pocket and handed them over. Rowan slipped them in.

“Voila. See what you think.”

Bard opened his eyes as Rowan’s fingers ran through his hair once more, this time to stroke something silky through his hair.

“Gods,” Bard swallowed, looking in the mirror. Was that really his reflection staring back at him? He’d never looked so polished, so rakish... so good. “I look like Aramis in the Three Musketeers.”

Rowan’s throaty laugh was rich. “Honey, you look good enough to eat. Sit right there; I’m going to fetch your angel. I want the whole salon to see his face when he sees you. Stay cool, okay?”

Bard gave her a crooked grin. “Okay.”

“Keep looking in the mirror. When you see me, count two, then turn the chair around. Slowly. You’ll slay him.”

Bard couldn’t control an appreciative chuckle. “You’re evil, Rowan.”

“Yes, I am,” she gave him a mysterious, secretive smile. “So sue me.”

“I would never do that to a magician. Because you are one, without doubt.”

She grinned. “Let’s see what your angel thinks. Be right back.”

Snickering, Bard watched Rowan retreat in the mirror. In a few seconds, her reflection reappeared, so Bard counted two, then slowly toed the chair around, searching for Thran’s face.

When he found it, Thran’s eyes had widened. His lips parted, then closed as he gulped. If they’d been alone, Bard had no doubt that he would have been hauled off to bed and possessed in short order.

Maybe that would happen when they got home.

Or maybe he’d take the swashbuckler to heart, and haul Thran off to bed first.

Thinking of that found its way onto Bard’s face. Whatever his expression was, Thran bit his lower lip and clenched his hands at his sides. Savoring his husband’s speechlessness, Bard’s smile deepened as he casually leaned one elbow on the arm of the chair, touched a finger to his lips, then let his eyebrows drift up in inquiry.
“Ty zastavlyayesh' menya konchit, ty grebanyy huiesos,” Thran murmured prayerfully, but Bard had heard Thran swear in the throes of passion enough times to know that what he said was neither holy nor prayerful.

“That’s a good sign,” Bard flicked a glance at Rowan. “He’s swearing in Russian.”

“Oh, don’t I know it,” Rowan chortled. “Do I need to give you a head start out the back door?”

“You might have to,” Bard nodded. “He looks serious. What do you think, Thran? Can I walk out of here sedately, or will I have to sprint to the truck?”

“You might have to sprint, yes. Rowan, you exceed all expectations.”

“I thank you kindly,” Rowan nodded, but behind Thran’s back, she gave a fierce fist pump that brought a scattering of applause and surreptitious laughter from the other stylists. “Go pay the bill, honey, while I tell Bard how to take care of his new ’do.”

Thran went without a word, which led Bard to share a look of open hilarity with Rowan.

“So what do I need to do to keep the advantage over my angel?” Bard snickered, getting up from his chair.

“Not much,” Rowan shook her head. “I’ve cut it to fall into place. Just use a decent shampoo and conditioner, and not too hot with the dryer if you use one. A little finishing oil. Don’t use a brush, just your fingers to untangle those gorgeous waves. Shake your head now and then – that’ll drive him crazy. Then come back to see me in six weeks.”

“I will. This has been a treat.”

“For me, too. It’s about time someone took that angel’s breath away, so he knows what it’s like for the rest of us.”

Bard enveloped Rowan in a big hug, and kissed her cheek. “You’re a gem, Rowan.”

“Oh, my, this is the best part of my job – I get to kiss all the beautiful guys,” she grinned, squeezing Bard and pressing a firm kiss on his cheek. “I can’t wait until you come back to visit me, gorgeous.”

“Then we’ll both have something to look forward to. Oh, I don’t want to forget –” Bard dug into his pocket for the substantial tip he wanted to give Rowan. “Thank you. I like what you did, and the look on Thran’s face... priceless.”

“Oh, thank you so much, honey,” Rowan nodded, taking the money and patting his cheek. “I’ll see you again soon, Bard. This was so much fun!”

Bard waved goodbye, and rejoined Thran at the receptionist’s desk. They bid the receptionist goodbye, collected their sweaters and coats, and headed outside.

“Now,” Bard said, turning an assessing look on Thran, “I don’t feel like sprinting to the truck, so this will have to hold you until we get home.”

He pulled Thran into his arms, bent him backwards over one of them, and planted a thorough smack on Thran’s lips. It was a move straight out of the old Errol Flynn pirate films he liked so much. Before Thran could react, Bard swung him back upright, and headed down the sidewalk at a jaunty pace, grinning.
“Oooh! You – you are such a bastard!” Thran growled, and sprinted after him. “Just who in the hell do you think you are – in the middle of the public sidewalk, like some sort of bandit –”

“Bandit, pirate, musketeer... take your pick,” Bard grinned. “And you, my white-haired, silken-tressed beauty, are my latest conquest. A pretty one you are, too. Quite delectable.”

“Musketeer? Now that book, I have read. You are not the callow D’Artagnan. Which of the others are you, then?”

“I always had a preference for Aramis.”

Thran’s eyebrows went up. “Aramis? The one who wanted to be a priest?”

“When he wasn’t bedding the ladies, yes, among other things. I have no interest in the priesthood, but bedding pretty things is another story.”

Thran hummed, then turned a sly sidewise glance on Bard. “I would enjoy being bedded by a pirate. A beautiful, rakish one. For you are spectacularly so, my saint. I am quite undone at the sight of you.”

Bard grinned as he tucked Thran’s arm into the crook of his elbow. “Let’s get our doorway, then wreak a little swashbuckling havoc in bed.”

“Hurry. I am not sure how long I can wait.”

“Pray for no traffic, then.”

Once they reached the truck, Bard steered them out of the city and back on the highway. In forty-five minutes, they were back in Greenwood Dale on the Lake, loading their arched doorframe into the back of the truck. Mrs. Mathom said she had a lead to some carved screens that they might like, and would email them pictures as soon as she received them. They headed home to unload the doorframe into the solarium.

“It’ll look great against the wall,” Bard nodded, stepping back to admire the frame.

Hands circled him. “So will you. I want to strip you bare and have you right under that arch.”

“I’d let you, if this were June instead of January, but I won’t let the moment pass unnoticed. So... since you seemed to like this an hour ago...”

Bard gave Thran another of his swashbuckler kisses, adding a little groping to the caress of his lips. When he let Thran up, he grinned at Thran’s fractured Russian curses.

“Mmm. When an angel lets me kiss him like that not once but twice, he must want me to take further liberties, no matter how much he curses. So upstairs with you, my beauty. I want you in bed, on your back, with your beautiful white hair all over the pillows... a fit offering for a swashbuckling pirate intent on ravishment.”

As Thran backed into the sitting room, Bard followed, finally giving free rein to the sly smile that had first appeared in the salon. Thran bit his bottom lip. “Oh, gods, such a look, lyubov moya...”

“Do you want to find yourself stripped and ravished on the stairs?”

Thran snorted in laughter, finally turning tail and running for the main hall. With a chortle, Bard raced after him, taking the stairs two at a time as he pursued his husband. He found Thran in their bedroom, frantically trying to unlace his hiking boots. Bard tore through his, kicked off his boots, stripped his fleece and tee, and tackled Thran just as he got his boots off, dragging him into bed to kiss him hard. Beneath him, Thran moaned as he kissed back eagerly, fingers running through Bard’s newly shorn hair.

“For all the gods, Bard!” Thran gasped, as Bard yanked him up enough to claw Thran’s sweater off his shoulders.

“Take it off.” Bard bit at Thran’s throat, shoving Thran’s sweater down to his wrists, then yanking his tee up. “Take it off!”

“I try, you greedy bastard! Give me a second!”

“No. Not a single one. It comes off now, or I rip it off.”

“Ty grebanyy huiesos, Bard! You are an animal!”

“No, I’m a pirate. The governor’s guards are after me, and I’ve no time to waste on niceties. I’m here to ravish, so ravish I will. Argh!”

Thran managed to free his arms from his sweater, so Bard yanked his tee farther up and left Thran to pull it the rest of the way off while he breached Thran’s jeans. A couple of jerks, and he had them and underpants completely off while Thran still struggled to get his tee off and his hair out of his face. Bard lunged to get the lubricant from his nightstand into hand, and by the time the black silk tee landed on the floor, his slicked hand was around Thran’s cock.

“That’s better,” Bard crooned. “So much better. Isn’t it?”

“You fucking bastard!” Thran spat, but his last word ended in a gasp as Bard stroked him. “Oh, gods... gods, Bard...”

“I’ll take that as a yes.”

“You’re still a fucking bastard... mmm...” Thran’s eyes shut and his head went back as he lay back on his elbows to savor Bard’s attentions.

“That’s no way to address the pirate about to ravish you, my beauty. For ravish you I will, whether you act the reluctant if foul-mouthed virgin, or the eager wanton. Or should I stop like a gentleman, though I am far from one?”

“I don’t want you to stop,” Thran whispered, lowering himself flat on his back. As he looked up at Bard through lowered lashes, he stroked Bard’s flanks.

“The innocent would lie back and pray. The wanton would help me with my pants.”

Thran’s long fingers groped for Bard’s zipper, then eased his jeans down his hips. Bard let his lubricated fingers stray from Thran’s cock to his opening, rubbing and teasing until Thran whimpered with desire. When Thran was well lubricated, Bard stroked his cock to slick it, then rolled atop his conquest, kneeling pale legs wide so that he could slide his cock deeply within. He lay heavily atop Thran as he stroked until all resistance had melted. Shutting his eyes, he licked and kissed Thran’s throat, his collarbone, his nipples, baring his teeth against Thran’s neck just where it joined the underside of his jaw.

“That’s right,” Bard breathed, sliding his hands down Thran’s arms to catch his wrists and hold them wide. “Give a brigand his due.”
“Let me see you,” Thran whispered, his breath catching. “I want to watch you ravish me.”

Bard let Thran’s wrists go, and curled his knees under Thran’s hips. He pushed himself up on his hands, giving Thran a view of him hovering above.

“Gods, you are so beautiful,” Thran breathed. “Such an opportunist - you do not even bother to strip before you are at me, for the guards will soon be at the door, and you will have to flee through the window. So brazen, yet too beautiful to resist. I can deny you nothing, not even my body.”

“Your body is mine, whether the guards come to the door or not. Even if they haul me away and do their worst, I’ll always be the brigand who stripped you, tamed you, and ravished you in your own bed.”

“Then do it properly,” Thran pleaded, hands on Bard’s hips to stop his stroking. He eased Bard out, then slid up to lean amidst the pillows, long legs spread, hands grasping the headboard. “Now I am a proper sacrifice for a pirate. Take me this way, so when the guards come through the door, they will see what you do to me, and how much their treasure revels to become pirate booty.”

Bard let his eyes caress the trembling, panting creature offering himself, and he licked his lips in anticipation. He stood up to peel off his jeans, but his eyes never left what waited for him against the headboard. He stalked Thran on hands and knees from the end of the bed, brushing a light kiss on Thran’s lips as he cradled his balls gently. Fingers slipped back to rub Thran’s opening, even slipped inside to make Thran’s breath catch.

“You know what I’m here to do, my beauty. Ravish you and then flee.”

“I want you to. I want you to take me. I don’t care about anything else.”

“I won’t stay, no matter how much you beg me. I’m here only to ruin you.”

“I don’t care. Ruin me, six times over.”

Bard leaned both arms on the headboard. “Open wide, pretty one. I like a wanton beneath me.”

Thran’s legs splayed wide without shame, and his eyes strayed to Bard’s cock. With an arch of his back, Bard brought his cock to bear, and eased inside without resistance. Thran sucked in his breath as Bard seated himself deeply within, and now his eyes were on Bard’s face as he stroked.

“Oh, wanton you are, for all you look like an angel. A prize, indeed, well worth the risk. I haven’t bedded such a prize in a long time. And not an innocent one, either. Methinks you like a pirate’s cock.”

“So much,” Thran moaned. “I cannot bear how good it feels.”

“Do you love me, my poor ruined beauty?”

“I love you, even as you ruin me.”

“Will you miss me when I leave you?”

“For all of my life. As I pine away, I will pray to be ruined again.”

“Then ruin you, I will. When I’m gone and your guards find you, they’ll find you covered in your own seed and know this was no ravishment, but the coupling of an unchaste wanton and the pirate he welcomed into his bed.”
“I’m every bit the wanton you think I am. Ruin me now. Do it.”

“As you wish.” Bard consumed Thran’s lips with a kiss, his tongue thrusting and probing as thoroughly as his cock did below. Gods, the double penetration was nearly his undoing, for Thran’s mouth was soft and yielding, accepting of his rough caresses, and he kept his legs wide, letting Bard thrust into him without resistance. Groping for Thran’s cock, Bard stroked it hard and fast, savoring Thran’s mewing cries as he submitted to all that Bard did. He purposely held himself back just to watch Thran erupt into orgasm beneath him, crying out as he released.

“So sweet, to watch how your body betrays you. Ruination indeed. It lacks only the pirate’s final coup de grace.”

Bard gave himself to his climax, working the whimpering body beneath him. He fell atop the pale angel to swallow him in one last kiss as his spasms shook him.

“Oh, yes,” he growled deep in his chest, nestling himself atop Thran, kissing his throat, shoulders, chest. His final kiss on Thran’s lips was slow, tender as he eased out. He slipped into the bathroom to wash and resume his underpants and jeans. When he came back into the bedroom, Thran still lay in disarray in the middle of the bed, every inch the ravaged prize. Bard leaned over to snag his shirt and fleece, then sat on the bed to stroke Thran’s flank.

“Well worth the ride. Remember me well after I’m gone, my beauty.”

Thran reached out to him with a soft pleading moan. Bard took his hand, drew it up to his lips to brush a cavalier kiss on the back of it, then stood. He threw his shirt over his shoulder, and shook his hair back into place, grinning when Thran bit his lip and swallowed another moan. He offered an Errol Flynn bow, then strode out of the bedroom.

Gods. He felt wonderful.

* * *

Bard’s footsteps faded down the stairs. Thran heaved a luxurious sigh, stretching. Gods, he’d been well fucked, and by the most beautiful creature who walked the earth. That muscular body, that meaty cock that filled him so completely, those warm brown eyes that turned devilish without warning... and now that beautiful hair. Rowan had done herself proud, for she’d started with a beautiful man and made him incandescent. The way he shook it into his eyes, or looked through it at Thran with the most delicious intention... Bard had even carried himself differently, with a hint of a swagger, though that was likely part of their game of pirate and booty. Those small, silver rings gleaming in his ears... Thran moaned in pleasure.

It wouldn’t be long before the pirate would serve a proper sentence for taking such blatant liberties with his infatuated spoils of war. Thran would make sure that none of the sentence was suspended, and it was all served at hard labor.

Plotting his revenge gave Thran something to smile about as he cleaned himself up, dressed, and remade the bed. He tossed Bard’s discarded hiking boots into the closet, then his own, and padded downstairs.

Bard was in the kitchen, rummaging in the refrigerator for lunch. He stuck his head around the door to give Thran a look. That long, slow sly smile... gods, it was all Thran could do not to envelope his husband into a kiss right then and there –

Why on earth did he resist such an urge, when there was no reason to?

Thran circled the kitchen island until he stood beside Bard in front of the open refrigerator, and insinuated a hand in the hair at Bard’s nape. He bent down for a slow kiss, one that Bard quickly reciprocated, nestling Thran’s buttocks in his hands and easing him close. In contrast to their pirate fantasy, this caress was slow, sensuous.

“Ya lyublyu tebya, zoloto moyo,” Thran breathed, filling his hands with Bard’s hair. “Svayatoy moy, lyubov moya.”

Bard hummed deep in his throat, and his hand strayed to stroke Thran’s buttock. “You’re welcome.”

Thran snickered. “And well laid. If I had known a simple haircut would unleash such a beast, I would have hustled you there long ago.”

“It wasn’t a simple haircut. Rowan is a high priestess of her art.”

Thran nodded as he ran his fingers through Bard’s hair. “Assuredly. I do not think anyone could duplicate what she did for you, for it was for you alone.”

“It passed the dancer test with flying colors,” Bard agreed. “Just the Sigrid and Tilda tests to go.”

Thran snickered again. “We will see in due time. For now, let us have lunch, and call the intrepid Rosie to begin our soups.”

Lunch was consumed quickly, and Thran ran upstairs to brush his teeth while Bard called Rosie. He was just putting down his mobile when Thran reappeared in the kitchen.

“Is Rosie on her way?”

“She needs mule service to haul some things, so I told her we’d walk over. It’ll be worth the trip, angel. Her house was beautiful ten years ago, so I imagine it’s even more spectacular now. She’s got a lot of her stained glass in place. I thought you’d like to see it.”

“I would,” Thran agreed.

“I’ll brush my teeth, then we can head over. They’re just down the lane.”

In a few minutes, Thran and his husband headed across the back yard. There was a broken garden gate in the far corner, which Bard propped open to ease their return trip. They crossed the grounds of the house beside them to come to a low, sprawling house that seemed to have been added on to over many years. Wide garden beds swathed in pine straw wreathed the house, drawing Bard’s comment.

“All those beds will be full of flowers come June,” he pointed. “You won’t believe the difference. And the wisteria around the gazebo will have flowers as long as your arm. Incredible.”

“I cannot wait to see it. Ah, there is Rosie - she waves to us.”

Indeed, the short woman with a profusion of blond curls had opened the door to the screened porch to wave at them. “Hi, Bard! Hi, Thran! Come on in!”

They ducked onto the porch, walked past the stacks of covered lawn furniture, and into a warm and inviting kitchen. Thran breathed in appreciatively, for the air was scented with orange and cinnamon – of course, for the counter held racks of cooling buns.
“You’ve been busy all morning,” Bard smiled, looking at the buns.

“I took the morning off to cook for tonight, so I figured I might as well get some of the weekend baking done, too,” she grinned. “Wow, Bard – you got quite a haircut! You look great!”

Thran kept all enjoyment of what had followed that haircut off his face, but he was glad to see Bard’s gratified pleasure at Rosie’s compliment.

“Thanks, Rosie,” Bard gave her a smile. “It’s about time that I cleaned up my act.”

“Just in time for your next artist’s opening, hint, hint,” Rosie poked, giving Thran a conspiratorial look. “I hope you’re not letting Bard spend all of his life working on the house, Thran. We want him back in the barn!”

“The children and I have decreed that he must spend Sundays working on only his art,” Thran assured her. “He has gotten so much done on the house that we are comfortable, so yes, we want him back in the barn, too. He will not be completely himself until he is working his metal again.”

“That’s right!” Rosie put her hands on her hips and smiled fondly at Bard. “I like your husband even more, Bard. He’s got his head screwed on right!”

“He does,” Bard gave Thran a smile. “I’ve told Thran about your art, too, Rosie. Would you show him some of your pieces? You had some beautiful ones the last time I was here, and I’m sure you’ve added more, and I’d love to see them, too.”

“Aw, you’re sweet to remember,” Rosie tilted her head to smile her gratitude at Bard. “Sure, this place is full of stuff, if you’d like to see it.”

“Do you still have the one I liked so much?”

“I finally sold that one, Bard, about five years ago. But I’ve got another similar one. Come on, I’ll give you and Thran the grand tour.”

Sam and Rosie’s house wasn’t the biggest, and it wasn’t the neatest, given the four small children who lived there, but it was a charming blend of worn, homey comfort and sparkling stained glass. Rosie’s specialties were two extremes – detailed, floral-inspired mandalas; and edgy, modern pieces. The mandalas were exciting with brilliant colors; the modern pieces tended to be much more subdued and subtle. Thran particularly liked one of the modern ones in shades of clear and smoky glass, with small touches of blue.

“You need to call Shire Hills, Bard,” Rosie urged. “I know you say you haven’t started on anything yet, but you’ve still got those pieces in the barn. Get to know the Shire Hills folks now, so you’ll have them on hand when you do start casting and forging.”

“The barn’s still a mess, Rosie,” Bard said. “I’ve just started cleaning it out. It’ll still be a while yet. But I will call them. In the mean time, we’ve got another venture cooking, and we wanted to run some of it by you.”

“Oh?” Rosie gave them a sharp, inquisitive look. “What’s up?”

As they helped Rosie pack up her pots and bags of provisions, Thran and Bard explained about the ballet they wanted to bring to life, and whether it made sense to link it to any of the village’s summer festival plans, to the benefit of both. Rosie’s eyes grew brighter and more excited the more they talked.
“Yes, this would be perfect to pair with one of the summer festivals!” she exclaimed as they walked back to Bard and Thran’s house. “We’ve got one tentatively set for the middle of July that would be great. We’ve done it for the previous six years, and gotten more visitors each time. Music venues and some short plays as well as the usual art openings and fairs. We even had a poetry slam last year. But we haven’t done any dance yet. This would be a great addition!”

“Is there a venue nearby big enough to hold a ballet?” Thran asked. “This will be a full two or three acts, not merely a small exhibition.”

“And it’ll be a world premiere, too,” Bard grinned with a teasing look at Thran. “Featuring one of the world’s best in an original production.”

A small knot of worry formed in Thran’s stomach. So many details that would go into that premiere, that original production, a production that so far had only a list of scenes, an eccentric choreographer, and a very small corps de ballet...

“I don’t know whether you’ve seen anything there yet, given how recently your children started at the Imladris Academy, but they’ve got a beautiful auditorium, and it’s got light and sound equipment. I’ll bet you signed on to do some work with the school to ease your tuition, right?”

Bard and Thran nodded.

“Then talk to Headmaster L’Eärendil about it. Maybe you could use the school auditorium. You might want to offer a summer workshop to some of the older students to help you work on the production. They’d pay for the workshop and would get experience, and you’d get their labor.”

“That might answer several needs.” Thran set down his bags of Rosie’s provisions on the kitchen island. “I will talk to Headmaster L’Eärendil first thing on Monday.”

Rosie heaved her pot of soup stock onto the stove. “Wow, Bard! This is wonderful! You’ve done a boatload of work! Can I have a tour?”

“Sure,” Bard nodded. “We’ve got a ways to go, but it’s coming along.”

“Bard amazes me at how fast he works, and how beautiful are the results,” Thran added, smiling.

“He’s quite a craftsman, as well as an artist,” Rosie nodded. “We had some great times in this house, Thran. I can’t tell you how happy I am that we’ll soon have more, starting tonight.”

Bard and Thran took Rosie around to see the work Bard had done so far, and Thran was pleased at how profusely she oohed and aahed over everything. She was especially interested in their plans for the solarium.

“You have to show this to Sam when he gets here,” Rosie told them. “He’ll have all sorts of ideas about which plants would work for you. And have him take a look at the window glazing. He’s been to several workshops about greenhouse design and repair, and at least one of them talked about how to make old ones a bit more weathertight.”

“I will,” Bard assured her.

Before long, they were back in the kitchen to work. Thran enjoyed the afternoon concocting all sorts of delicious things. Bard added two kinds of muffins to the buns Rosie had brought, and Thran chopped mounds of vegetables and meats for the various soups. He was introduced to the novelty of a many-layered Mexican dip that the children apparently adored to scarf down on tortilla chips, as well as a peppery cheese dip. Before long, five big pots simmered on the stove – Bard’s chicken vegetable, carrot ginger, and ham and bean soups; and Rosie’s potato bacon cheese and mushroom bisque soups. A board of cheeses with crackers was ready, and a huge bowl of fruit salad chilled in the refrigerator.

At just after four-thirty, the mudroom door banged open, signaling the arrival of the youngest members of Clan Ffyrnig.

“Hi, Miss Rosie!” Bain greeted. “Sweet, you made that cheese soup!”

“Uh-uh, wait until the party starts!” Rosie gestured with her ladle as if she were fencing. “You’ll hold for a few more minutes, I hope!”

“We saw Mr. Sam,” Tilda piped up. “He said to tell you that he’ll be along with everyone in a few minutes.”

“Tara and Kíllian and Finn will be a bit later, but they’re on their way,” Legolas reported.

Sigrid, however, had a determined light in her eyes as she came through the door, looking for her father in the press of people. Ah, she wanted to see her father’s transformation. It was sheer perversity that made Thran intercept her.

“Ah, ma chère!” he greeted. “And how are you this afternoon? Ready for the weekend?”

“Where’s Da, Ada? What happened this morning? Did he get a haircut after all?”

Thran heaved a sigh and contrived to look resigned. “Ah. So he did. I am desolate.”

Her eyes grew round. “What happened? Did he shave it all off? I thought he said he didn’t like that!”

“It is a sad thing.”

“No! He didn’t! Da! You didn’t!”

Bard appeared from the pantry. “I didn’t what?”

Sigrid’s glance raked her father and then glared at Thran. “You are a rat, Ada! You said you were desolate!”

“But I am, ma chère, for I am no longer the most handsome man in the house. For he is very handsome, is he not?”

Bard had to endure his eldest daughter walking around him not once, but twice. “Oooh, Ada, you are such a rat!”

Bard eyed Thran laughing, and Sigrid glaring. “Did you tell her I was a mess, cariad?”

“I did not.”

“No, but you implied it hard enough!” Sigrid snorted. “You are such a rat!”

“So I am a rat,” Thran shrugged, grinning. “But what of your Da? He is not a rat in the least, is he?”

“No, he’s not.” Sigrid glared at her father again, then her lips slid into a crooked smile. “You look great, Da. Even the earrings. Really great.”

“Thanks, Sig,” Bard offered a small smile. “Where’s Tilda? Or hasn’t she recognized me yet?”
“Til!” Sigrid called. “Did you see Da? He got all his hair cut off!”

“That’s right!” Bain looked away from the plate of dip he’d been drooling over. “Wow, Da, you really did! You’re practically bald!”

“He is not!” was Tilda’s stout reply as she regarded her father with her usual consideration. “You still have lots of hair, Da. I like it.”

“So do you still recognize me?”

Tilda dimpled as she nodded. “You look nice.”

“Thank you, little doll,” Bard tapped Tilda’s nose. “How was school today?”

The conversation veered off into the usual week’s end of school snippets, but the prospect of the impending soup and such were too much of a draw for anyone to want to think about school for very long. In a few minutes, Sam arrived with Elanor, Frodo, Rose, and Merry in tow, and a box full of his bottled beer. Finn arrived shortly thereafter, saying that Killian and Tara would be along soon. Contrary to Sigrid’s prediction, he had a box full of cupcakes to add to the party. Not fifteen minutes later, a knock on the front door sent Thran out into the main hall to open it. There stood Killian with a plastic bin of homemade chocolate cookies and Tara with a bowl of some kind of layered dessert, and behind them their parents. Thran had met both sets of parents only briefly at Legolas’s first Saturday fencing class, so he was quick to ask them in.

“Please, we have plenty of soup if you would like to join us,” he offered.

All four agreed, so the party was soon in full swing. With close to twenty people, people were soon gathered around the kitchen table, the dining room table, and the sitting room. Bain, Legolas, Finn, and Sigrid got a good fire going in the sitting room fireplace. Tara and Killian’s parents fit in easily for the short time that they were there, for they had tickets to share a movie in the village, and would return to pick up their children later. When they left, the initial ravenous rush of children to the various pots and plates had slowed to a dull roar, so the youths gathered in the sitting room, leaving the kitchen to the adults and younger children. It was nice to see Bard catch up with his old friends, and Tilda was happy to have a few children her age to talk to.

How different this was from the parties Thran had attended over the years of his ballet career. This one was so much less studied, and very much louder with all the children laughing and giggling. The youths began to toast marshmallows, and were so generous making treats for the smaller children that Rosie laughingly asked them to stop. Thran ate some of every kind of soup, and agreed with Bard that Rosie’s cheesy bacon concoction was wonderful, from the crusty toasted cheese bread that went at the bottom of the bowl and the soup itself layered on top, to the sprinkles of bacon, chives, and cheese that finished it. He even sampled Tara’s trifle, a decadent combination of sponge cake, raspberry jam, and creamy custard.

He refused to think about how many barres he’d have to do to maintain his leanness if he ate like this more than once a month, small portions notwithstanding. If only he still had the metabolism of his son and his friends, who descended upon the kitchen at nine o’clock to satisfy Round Two of their hunger. They scarfed down what remained of all of the appetizers and desserts, and most of the muffins and soup.

“I told you we wouldn’t have many leftovers,” Bard shook his head as Thran contemplated the scattered dishes. “They might’ve licked the dishes clean if we’d let them.”

“Don’t say that out loud,” Sam leaned closer to them as he brought an empty platter to the sink for washing. “I caught Merry doing just that the other day. Ketchup from his sandwich. He loves the stuff.”

Bard laughed as he took the plate from Sam and put it in the sink. “At least it wasn’t mayonnaise.”

“Or mustard. Or horseradish. He loves that, too. I can’t get him to touch a green bean, but he’ll eat horseradish by the spoonful.”

“Go figure,” Bard agreed, soaping the platter. “Dishtowels are in the drawer beside you, Sam.”

Rosie and Thran began to ferry the rest of the dirty dishes to the sink to make their way into the dishwasher or the washing sink. By the time Tara and Killian’s parents returned, the dishwasher was running, Rosie’s things were stowed in their bags, and only a few remnants remained of the enormous spread of food. Finn took his leave with his mates, making a point to thank Bard and Thran for inviting him, and that he hoped to see them again soon.

Sam and Rosie departed with their brood soon after. Sam wanted to take a look at the solarium in the light to see what needed to be done, if anything, and he promised to email pictures of solar powered lanterns for the Japanese garden they had planned. He and Rosie also wanted to talk more about the possible addition of Thran’s ballet to the village’s July arts festival, so they would visit again in a day or two. They waved an enthusiastic goodbye with their children, and set off across the back yard with torches in hand.

The fire had burned down to a soft flame when Bard and Thran finally sat down. As quiet descended, the children calmed from their excitement, and were glad to start the cycle of showers. Tilda crawled in between her fathers to wait her turn, happy for the respite.

“Did you get enough to eat, Kukla?” Thran asked with a smile, as his small doll burped quietly beside him.

She nodded. “I had three kinds of soup, two muffins, a lot of Mexican and cheese dip, and some trifle. And a cupcake. And five s’mores.”

Thran’s laugh was incredulous. “And you have not exploded yet?”

She shook her head. “Not yet.”

“I’d better be careful when I hug you goodnight, little doll,” Bard mused. “Or you just might.”

“I hope not. That’d hurt.”

“It would.”

“Frodo ate five s’mores, too. Merry ate six.”

“Did he put horseradish on them?” Thran snickered. “Or ketchup?”

Tilda gave Thran an alarmed expression. “Ugh.”

“Apparently he likes them on everything else,” Bard explained. “That’s what his Da said.”

“He tried the Mexican dip because he thought the sour cream was mayonnaise. He wouldn’t eat any more when he found out it wasn’t.”
“I’m sure you hated that,” Bard smiled down at her.

Tilda shook her head vigorously. “I ate it for him. I love Mexican dip.”

“I’m done!” Bain yelled from upstairs.

“Your turn,” Bard gave Tilda a gentle poke. “Brush your teeth, too.”

“I will come up to tell you goodnight soon, Russkaya Kukla.”

“Okay.”

Thran hummed when Tilda had gone upstairs. “I hope the Gamgees do not spend the night awake to deal with the consequences of too many s’mores in small stomachs.”

Bard grunted. “Children can eat almost anything, so I expect they’ll be all right. Some of the things they eat, like horseradish on a spoon, might choke the mortals among us, but not them.”

The children were too tired to read tonight, and none of them took long to finish their wash. Thran and Bard went upstairs to tuck them in bed, and Thran came back downstairs to watch the fire while Bard showered. His husband returned in his sleep pants and Henley to sit beside him and enjoy the last embers of the fire. When it was finally out, both of them were yawning. They padded upstairs, and Bard settled into bed while Thran rinsed quickly. The bed was nicely warmed when he returned from the bathroom, and he settled with Bard into their usual tangle of arms and legs. He was grateful to shut his eyes after such a busy day.

“At least we’ll have a few muffins to toast for breakfast tomorrow,” Bard murmured sleepily. Tonight, it was he who lay with his head on Thran’s shoulder and his arm across Thran’s chest. This allowed Thran to run his fingers through his husband’s newly shortened hair, which brought a smile to his lips as he thought about exacting revenge for his husband’s earlier piracy. “Do you and Legolas plan to fence tomorrow?”

“I do,” Thran sighed, stroking Bard’s hair. “I should answer my mobile instead, but this may be the last time I can go with Legolas for some time. I relish that time with my son.”

“I’m glad,” Bard sighed, snuggling closer. “It was good to see Sam and Rosie tonight, too. And spend a little time with Kíllian and Tara’s parents. I’ve missed being part of a community. Our apartment building was never that.”

“It was only a place to sleep,” Thran agreed. “This is a much nicer community, as well as a much nicer place to sleep.”

“What, you’re not going to exact payment for what a pirate did to you this morning?”

“I will,” Thran grinned, still playing with Bard’s hair. “But I want to make a proper job of it, and both of us are too tired for that tonight. For now, let us fall asleep like puppies, as you put it. My revenge will be sweeter if I give you a day or two to anticipate it.”

Bard’s chuckle was low. “I love you, angel. Pale as snow, with a heart as dark as the devil’s.”

“Guilty of both, and shamelessly so. Consider it a mark of my deep love for you.”

Chuckling, Bard stroked Thran’s shoulder, and nuzzled a kiss on Thran’s chest.

“Spokoynoy nochiu,” Thran replied. “Ya lyublyu tebya.”
Chapter 62

Chapter Summary

After so many happy days, a Ghost of Christmas Past looms for an angel, a saint, and a choir of cherubs.

Bard got up at eight the next morning to make sure that Thran and Legolas had a good breakfast before they headed out to fence at the Gondor’s academy. They had enough muffins left from last night to supplement a mountain of scrambled eggs, most of which Legolas scarfed down as if he hadn’t eaten in a week. Bard was used to this, given Bain’s voracious appetite, but Thran still found it a spectacle.

“Don’t neglect your breakfast just because you’re in awe of Legolas’s appetite,” Bard nudged Thran, who sat with his chin cradled in his hand as he watched his son wolf down his plateful.

Thran sighed as he returned his attention to his plate, where the remains of a single plain muffin without butter and two scrambled eggs lay waiting. He made short work of the eggs, and went back to his contemplation of Legolas’s voracity as he took up the rest of his muffin. “I am not sure I ever ate like you, synok. Given that you are as lean as the proverbial rail, I can only think that you are completely hollow inside.”

Legolas grinned, unabashed at his father’s observation. “We’ll be fencing all morning, Papa. I’ll burn it off, and so will you. Have some more eggs, at least. They’re protein.”

Thran gave Bard an exasperated look. “You have infected Legolas with your concern about what I eat.”

“I’ll gladly infect everyone in the house with that,” Bard returned with a smile, plopping another spoonful of eggs on Thran’s plate from the serving bowl. “I want as many people as possible looking out for you.”

Thran’s exasperation faded into a fond if reluctant smile, leading Bard to wink at Legolas. At Legolas’s giggle, Thran caught the undercurrent between them and shook his head. “It is a conspiracy.”

“I don’t care what you call it, as long as you eat enough that you don’t get any leaner. You have a lot of dancing coming up, regardless of where you sign.”

“I suppose after we fence I will be forced to turn on my mobile again,” Thran grumped. He took up a forkful of eggs and chewed. “I will likely find it glued to my ear all afternoon again.”

“It’ll be less talking and more dancing soon, I hope,” Bard consoled, finishing his muffin. “What would the two of you like for lunch today?”

“What are we having for supper?” Legolas asked.

Bard pointed to the oven where a pan of chicken breasts already roasted. “A big chicken casserole. Tomorrow, I’ve got a lamb roast prepped for the clan to put in, since I’m not allowed to cook for some strange reason.”
“Mmm,” Legolas brightened. “Do we have mint jelly for the lamb?”

“Wouldn’t have lamb without it.”

“Could we make pizza tomorrow for lunch?”

“Sure. Bain and Sigrid know how to make the dough.”

“Then Papa, do you like jambalaya? That would make a good hot lunch today. It looks bitter out.”

“It does,” Thran agreed. “It would not surprise me if we have snow today. I like the jambalaya, too, if perhaps it could have chicken in it, too?”

Bard nodded. “I’ve got extra chicken in the oven for you, angel, so I can put some in the jambalaya. You’ll be home about one?”

“Unless you have anything you want us to pick up on the way home.”

“I’ve got plenty here to keep me busy. Ceiling and woodwork in our room this morning.”

“Then let us finish our breakfast and go, Legolas. I am eager to fence this morning.”

“Me, too, Papa.” Legolas scarfed down the rest of his eggs, then carried his plate to the sink to rinse it and put it in the dishwasher. “I’ll be ready in a moment.”

Bard soon saw his husband and tall son out to the SUV, fencing cases in hand, waved a farewell, and headed back inside at a trot. Legolas was right – it was bitter out, even for late January, and the overcast sky threatened snow before the day was out, which was all the more reason to stay inside and get the last of the painting done in the bedroom. He took the roasted chicken out of the oven and set it in the fridge to cool for tonight’s supper casserole, then headed upstairs. His children were all still asleep, and Bard hoped he could get most of the ceiling done before they woke. Out came the drop cloth, down went the paint pan and the roller, and in came the ladder. He set to.

After so much practice, Bard covered the ceiling in less than two hours, so that was one more thing out of the way. Tilda finally roused, and he roused the other two children up as well so they could have breakfast and get started on their homework. While they ate, he put together the casserole for tonight’s supper –

His mobile chimed. He pulled it out of his pocket, wondering if it were Thran, but it wasn’t Thran’s name that came up on the tiny screen.

It was the New York City police department.

“Hello?”

“Bard Bowman?”

“Speaking,” he said, as three sets of eyes looked up from the kitchen table.

“Björn Björnsson. I’m with the New York City Prosecutor’s Office. You’re a hard man to catch up to, Mr. Bowman.”

“What can I do for you, Mr. Björnsson?” Bard ventured cautiously, but his children knew him too well and exchanged worried looks.

“It’s urgent that I talk to you and Thran Oropherson about some aspects of what happened on Christmas Day.”

Bard’s eyes strayed to the children. “Give me a minute, okay?”

He put his mobile to his chest, blocking the speaker. “You all keep on with your homework.”

“What is it, Da?” Sigrid demanded. “Is something wrong with Ada? With Legolas?”

“They’re fine, Sig.”

“Then what’s wrong?”

“I don’t know that anything’s wrong. I’ll find out, okay? Just hold tight while I talk.”

He ducked out to the main hall and ran upstairs before Sigrid or the other children could ask more.

“Go ahead, Mr. Björnsson,” Bard murmured, once he’d ducked into the bedroom and shut the doors.

“The case against Angelo Orker has distressed him enough that his lawyers have suggested a plea bargain. I’d like to discuss what that means to you, Mr. Oropherson, and most importantly, your children, as soon as possible.”

Bard thought fast. “I see. What do you need?”

“If you can call upon me in my office in the city, that would be ideal.”

“Have you talked to Mr. Oropherson?”

A gruff grunt. “He’s even harder to track down than you are, Mr. Bowman.”

“I’ll let him know you want to talk to him. When do you want to talk to us?”

“The sooner the better, ideally.”

“Do you need to talk to our children?”

“No.”

“All right. Is Monday morning soon enough?”

“Tomorrow would be better, but I understand that your children are with you, so Monday would accommodate them better.”

“I appreciate that, Mr. Björnsson. Let me contact Mr. Oropherson, and I’ll call you back.”

Mr. Björnsson gave Bard his contact information, and hung up. Bard stuffed his mobile back into his pocket, and swallowed.

What was a plea bargain?

He headed downstairs, and ducked through the kitchen, not looking at his children as he passed into the sitting room. He found Thran’s laptop, and sat on the sofa to open the search engine.

“Da?” Sigrid queried, coming in from the kitchen. Tilda and Bain trailed after her.
"I don’t know yet, Sig,” Bard shook his head.

“At least tell us what it’s about,” Bain asked. His arm went around Tilda, who looked at Bard with unblinking eyes.

The computer screen rolled, and Bard scanned it quickly. Ah – a plea bargain was an offer for a defendant to accept a lesser charge so as to avoid a more serious one. Accepting a plea bargain avoided a lengthy trial. Okay, he understood the rudiments of that. The next thing he did was type in Björn Björnsson’s name into the search engine. He got the usual list of social media entries, but nothing definite. So next he typed in New York City Prosecutor’s Office, but that didn’t list any names. So he pulled out his mobile and typed the number listed on the Prosecutor’s Office’s web page. When it connected, an operator asked how to direct his call.

“Björn Björnsson, please.”

“One moment, please.”

Bard waited, holding a hand up at his children’s impatience.

“Björnsson,” came the same gruff voice that Bard had talked to earlier.

“I’m sorry to disturb you, Mr. Björnsson,” Bard said. “It’s Bard Bowman again. I just wanted to confirm that you were really with the Prosecutor’s Office.”

A silence met Bard’s honesty, but a grunt eventually reached Bard’s ear. “I understand your caution, Mr. Bowman. Now that you have, can I expect you and Mr. Oropherson on Monday?”

“I’ve yet to talk to him, but I’ll get back to you as soon as I can. I apologize for my interruption.”

“Thank you. Goodbye.”

Bard ended the call.

“Are you going to tell us what this is about now?” Sigrid demanded.

“What’s a prosecutor?” Tilda asked tentatively.

“It’s the cops,” Bain said lowly. “It’s about that day at the park.”

“It is,” Bard nodded. “And I don’t know what it’s about, so don’t worry about anything yet. They just want to talk to us, that’s all.”

“What, all of us?” Bain asked.

“Do we have to see Lance Dunmont?” Tilda gulped.

“Hold on, children,” Bard held up his hands. “Let’s stay calm. Yes, this is about what happened at the park. That was the prosecutor who’s trying to make sure that the people at the park are punished for what they did. They just want to talk to Thran and me about what’s happened since Christmas Day, that’s all.”

“What about Lance Dunmont?” Tilda quavered.

Bard beckoned, and Tilda came to sit beside Bard, cuddling close. “I don’t know what the prosecutor will tell us, but he wants to see just Thran and me, not any of you. And none of you have to see any of those people. Once Thran gets home with Legolas, we’ll talk to the prosecutor again, and then we’ll know more about what’s happening.”

Sigrid and Bain exchanged looks, and beside him Tilda looked back and forth between her siblings. Bard squeezed her shoulders. “How much homework do you have left? Let’s think about that, and not worry about something unknown.”

“I’m finished everything,” Tilda said quietly.

“I’ve got half of an essay left,” Bain continued.

“I’m working on my French report,” finished Sigrid.

“Okay. You can help me with lunch, little doll,” Bard looked to Tilda. “It’s after noon, so Thran and Legs will be home soon. I’m making jambalaya.”

“Okay, Da,” the children murmured, as everyone went back into the kitchen. The older children settled at the table again, and Tilda collected her papers and folders to put her work away. Bard kept an eye on everyone as he got out the Dutch ovens for the jambalaya. He’d make two batches, a big one with two kinds of sausage, and a smaller one with mostly chicken for Thran. Once Tilda put her school things together, Bard put her to work, collecting olive oil, onions, and the bag of rice from the pantry, then the peppers, sausages, and chicken from the fridge. He chopped the veg while Tilda carefully poured oil into the two Dutch ovens, then she stirred the veg in the hot oil with a handful of frozen okra bits while he chopped sausage and chicken. Keeping Tilda busy helped ease her apprehension, and soon the aromatic smell of sautéing veg and meat filled the kitchen. Bard held the big bag of rice for Tilda to measure out the right amount into each pot, then he added water and Creole spices. Soon both pots were covered to simmer until the rice was ready. Tilda chose fruit for the big bowl that went on the table, and she arranged cheeses on a cutting board and got the boxes of crackers.

“I’m done, Da,” Sigrid said, closing her laptop.

“Another five minutes and I’ll be done, too, Bain added. “Smells good, Da.”

“It does,” Legolas said, coming through the mudroom into the kitchen, with his father close behind. “I’m starving!”

“Bain’s almost through his essay, so we’ll eat after that,” Bard said, patting Legolas’s arm in greeting and brushing a kiss on Thran’s lips. “How was the fencing?”

“I had a blast,” Legolas confessed with a big smile on his face. “Lady Arwen is wonderful! She and Tara had a spectacular saber match today that brought down the house, and Lord Aragorn did the same with Killian at épée. I can’t believe that Killian actually scored twice against him, could you Papa? They were amazing. And Papa and I had a good long one, too.”

“Who won that one?” Bain asked eagerly.

“Papa,” Legolas admitted. “But not by much.”

“ Barely is a more apt description,” Thran shrugged. “In another month, I expect our situations to be reversed.”

“The police department called,” Tilda blurted.

Bard winced at how fast the genial mood in the kitchen turned wary, apprehensive, nervous. Thran’s eyes skewered Bard’s.
“Everyone, calm down,” Bard said firmly, before anyone said anything. “Yes, they called, and no, I don’t know exactly what for. Let’s have our lunch, and then Thran and I will call the gentleman back, and we’ll find out what’s what.”

“But Da—” Sigrid protested.

“It’s not fair to hide what’s going on from us,” Bain added.

“You’re right,” Bard agreed. “It’s not. But until I know what’s going on, I can’t tell you what’s going on. So Bain, finish your essay, and Sigrid and Tilda and I will get the rest of lunch ready while Thran and Legolas but their blades away and change their clothes.”

“Does that mean you’ll tell us what’s going on at some point?”

“When I find that out, your Papa and I will decide. If this is just a request for us to fill out a lot of paperwork, then there’ll be nothing to tell, will there?”

The children exchanged glances, but their shrugs conceded the truth of Bard’s observation.

“Why don’t Tilda and I get the rest of lunch ready, and you and Ada call the guy back?” Sigrid pressed. “I’m not sure I can eat lunch with this hanging over us.”

The rest of the children nodded, so Bard nodded. “That’ll work. I hope it won’t take long.”

“I’ll put the blades away, Papa,” Legolas offered. “I’d rather you and Bard find out, too.”

“So we will,” Thran nodded. “We will call from upstairs so I may change my clothes.”

Thran led the way out of the kitchen. As soon as Bard was sure they were out of earshot of the children, he leaned close to Thran and told him about the prosecutor who’d called.

“What did he want?” Thran asked lowly as they came in to the bedroom.

“Do you know what a plea bargain is?”

Thran’s eyes turned icy, but he nodded.

“It sounds as if Angelo’s side wants one. That’s all he said. I checked on the Internet to find out what one is, but I don’t know what the offer is. I called the police department back to confirm that Mr. Björn Björnsson really is with the prosecutor’s office. He wants to see us without the children to talk about whatever Angelo’s side is up to. That’s what we’re to call him back about – when to see him.”

“When do they want to see us?”

“The sooner the better, it seems. But he did acknowledge that we have the children to see to, and grudgingly agreed that Monday would suit.”

Thran hummed. His expression was forbidding; his posture, coiled. “The children are right,” he said at last, pulling out his mobile and handing it to Bard. “We can put my mobile on speaker when we call. Better we call now and find out what this is about than wait.”

Thran peeled off his fencing shirt and pants while Bard dialed the number of the prosecutor’s office. By the time he pulled on Henley, jeans, and warm socks, Bard had Mr. Björnsson on the line.

“Björnsson.”
“Hello, Mr. Björnsson. This is Bard Bowman again. I have Thran Oropherson here. We’re on a speaker phone, so we can both hear you.”

“I appreciate you calling me back so quickly,” Mr. Björnsson said. “I’ve been trying to reach both of you for several days.”

“Bard tells me that the other party has offered a plea bargain,” Thran said grimly.

“I think we’re close to that,” the prosecutor replied. “It’s important that I speak face to face with you and your attorney about what that plea bargain might be, and what the ramifications are about accepting it or not accepting it are.”

“You said you don’t need to speak with our children,” Bard wanted to clarify.

“That’s right. We have detailed statements from all of them, and in most cases there’s no need to involve them in further discussions. When is it possible for you to come into the office?”

“I assume the negotiations with our attackers remains fluid,” Thran said. “Would an earlier appearance hasten a conclusion to that negotiation?”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. This was an aspect of Thran he hadn’t seen before – focused, intense, and merciless.

“It would certainly encourage a conclusion, if I were clear about what paths of negotiation you’re comfortable with.”

“I will call our lawyer, and see what his schedule is. If we can come in today or tomorrow, would that help?”

“I can accommodate almost any time tomorrow, or after three today.”

“Then let me see what is possible, and we will call you back.”

“I appreciate your quick attention to this. I look forward to your call, Mr. Oropherson.”

“I, too. Goodbye.”

Thran reached for his mobile to end the call, but immediately made another call. Bard didn’t have to guess who he was calling – sure enough, in seconds, the call connected.

“Mr. Nori, please. Thran Oropherson.”

Despite the gravity of the situation, Bard smiled, wishing a certain Angelo Orker could see the ruthless expression on his angel’s face. All Thran needed was a sword to embody the Archangel Michael at his most devastating.

“Mr. Nori. Good afternoon. I have just received a call from the New York City Prosecutor’s Office about a potential plea bargain. I assume you are aware of this.”

Apparently the answer was an affirmative.

“The prosecutor’s name is Björn Björnsson. He has asked to see my husband, my lawyer, and me so that we may encourage this negotiation to an appropriate end. What is your availability today and tomorrow?”

Thran listened for a few seconds. “One moment.” He looked at Bard. “If you are not comfortable leaving the children here this afternoon, perhaps we may call upon Rosie to host them for a few hours?”

Bard nodded. “I’ll give her a call now.”

Bard pulled out his mobile to call Rosie as he went out onto the landing. Sam answered, and Bard explained that he and Thran needed to tend to something immediately, and would he mind if the children stayed with them for the rest of the afternoon. Sam was quick to agree, so Bard thanked him and disconnected. He went back into the bedroom, giving Thran a thumbs-up.

“The children are set.”

Thran nodded. “Yes, we are available this afternoon. Three-thirty? Yes, that is fine. I appreciate your quick response. Yes, until then. Goodbye.”

Thran disconnected the call, and turned a chilling look on Bard. “It seems that you are about to meet the elusive Mr. Nori sooner than I expected.”

Glad that Thran’s glare was not directed at him, Bard mustered a smile. “That’s something, then.
Let’s have lunch, then we’ll see the children over to Sam and Rosie’s, and be off.”

Thran nodded, but he didn’t speak as he stood up. Bard caught his arm.

“Is that glare just on general principles, or is there something about this I haven’t figured out?
Because if you go downstairs looking like that, you’ll scare the stuffing out of our children.”

Thran met Bard’s eyes, registered his observation, and made a visible effort to relax his angry posture. “I am sorry, lyubov moya. To think about what happened on Christmas Day still enrages me. I do not like the idea that I am about to negotiate with such filth. But you are right that we must offer a kinder face to our children, who are already on edge, especially our Kukla.”

Bard nodded. “Tilda’s still scared of Lance Dunmont. He was the first thing she mentioned when the prosecutor called.”

“I do not want to frighten her more,” Thran murmured, but he sounded as if he were telling himself that rather than Bard. “I will hold my glares until we are safely on the road, so that I neither frighten our family, nor reveal my fury to the prosecutor.”

“Okay,” Bard nodded. “Let’s feed the clan, then.”

“I will call our Mr. Björnsson back and tell him when we will arrive.”

Thran redialed the prosecutor’s number, was quickly connected, and told Mr. Björnsson when they would appear. The man thanked him in a few words, and Thran disconnected the call.

“Now, let us eat.”

Bard gave Thran a frank look. “See that you do. You don’t when things get tense, but this afternoon, you have to, if only to reassure the children.”

Thran sighed, then finally eased his focused glare into a reluctant smile. “You are right. I will do my best. But it has always been hard for me to eat when I am worried.”

“I understand. But we don’t know if we should worry yet, and if so, what about. So try to let it go until we know more. Or I’ll pull a long face about making a whole pot of jambalaya with chicken just for you, and now you won’t eat it.”

With a chagrined chuckle, Thran went with Bard down the stairs. “That is a very dirty tactic, lyubov moya.”

“Whatever works, cariad. I promise not to insist that you eat any dessert, just a good lunch.”

“Thank you.”

Four sets of worried eyes greeted them as they returned to the kitchen, so Bard was glad that at least he and Thran were smiling. That defused a little of the children’s tension, but not enough that all of them didn’t erupt into anxious questions.

“We still don’t know much,” Bard held up his hands. “Let’s get our plates, and then we’ll tell you what little we know.”

The children queued up to the stove obediently. Anxious they might be, but no one shied from filling his or her plate. Bard let Thran go ahead of him and made sure the tall dancer put a good portion on his plate before he filled his own. As Bard sat down, he couldn’t resist a smile at the expectant faces that met his.

“Thran and I will meet the prosecutor this afternoon, so that we don’t drag this out,” Bard began. “We still don’t know much, other than there might be a plea bargain coming from Angelo’s lawyer.”

“What’s a plea bargain?” Bain asked, and Tilda looked no less curious.

“I know what it is,” Sigrid volunteered. “We studied it in government class. It’s an offer to accept a lesser offense in order to avoid a bigger one. New York calls stuff like what happened to us violent felonies. They’re divided into a bunch of classes – A, B, C, D, and E. Class A violent felonies are the worst ones, like murder in the first degree. If you’re convicted of one of those, it’s usually an automatic life sentence without chance of parole. Angelo pulled a gun and shot at us, and he hit Da, so I could see him getting slapped with a charge of attempted first-degree murder. Lots of the other stuff he did are Class B violent felonies, like first-degree aggravated assault with a deadly weapon – he had a knife as well as a gun. The sentence for a Class B felony varies, but it’s usually five to twenty-five years, unless the prosecutor decides that because Mr. D was there, then it’s ten to thirty years. Angelo might want to offer to plead to the Class B and hope he gets off with a lesser sentence, rather than risk getting slapped with the Class A charge. Unless he’s got a prior felony conviction, which means the sentences are longer.”

Bard gaped at his daughter, and at the end of the table so did Thran. Sigrid gave them both an exasperated look. “Ye gods, you two! What did you expect? That I’d just sit at home and worry about what was going on? I found us movers, didn’t I? I can read my government textbooks and the Internet about this, too.”

“I would have liked to know what you found out,” Bard said mildly.

“I figured you’d already looked, and didn’t want to worry us, so I kept quiet, too. But Bain and Legs knew.” Sigrid’s eyes fell on her sister. “I didn’t say anything to you, Til, because I didn’t want you to worry.”

“I don’t want to, either,” the little girl admitted. “But I didn’t really understand a lot of what you just said, anyway. I just don’t want to see Lance Dunmont ever again. He tried to hurt Legolas.”

Her eyes darkened and she looked at her lap. Legolas’s face pinched. “He tried, Kukla, but he didn’t hurt me. You should’ve seen your sister. She hurt him, badly enough that he’s the one who’s scared now. We’re Clan Ffyrnig, and nothing he ever wants to see again.”

“I hope so,” Tilda said softly.

“Thanks, Legolas,” Bard wished the youth, who nodded back. “Is there anything else your research told you about a plea bargain that we need to know about, Sig?”

Despite the humorous yet resigned tone of Bard’s question, Sigrid didn’t smile. Instead, she nodded. “There is. It’s not just Angelo who might be spared something if we accept a plea bargain. We might, too. A plea bargain means the case doesn’t go to trial, either before a judge or a jury. It’s done. Angelo will want that because if we have a good prosecutor who makes enough noise about Angelo being armed and shooting at children, a judge and jury will bury him. And we might not want the case to go to trial, because if Angelo’s got a good lawyer, he’ll put us all on the witness stand and harass us. He can try all he wants with me, but...”

She cut her eyes to Tilda, but didn’t say anything else.

“You mean he’ll – ”

“Try to harass me, yeah,” Sigrid cut her brother off with a warning look. Bain understood at once, and smothered anything else.

“Oh – um, I’d like to see him try that,” Legolas tried to cover for Bain, with a quick look.

“It’s something to think about,” Bard nodded. Thran sat at the other end of the table, his posture tight again, so Bard cleared his throat to draw his husband’s attention. He pointedly picked up his spoon. “I called Mr. Sam and Miss Rosie, and we’ll take you over there after lunch while we’re gone. You all know the usual rules about behaving yourself, and making nice with the other children. I know they’re all mostly younger than you, but I’m sure they’d love it if you play games with them, or read with them. We should be back before supper.”

“Oh, Da, okay, Bard,” went around the table, and finally everyone began their lunch. Bard made an effort to ask Legolas about the morning’s fencing, so the atmosphere soon eased as his excitement about the various matches and instruction came through. By the time lunch was done, the children were calmer. Tilda offered to bring her Dinky Farm game to play with some of the children, and Bain collected his soccer ball so that he, Legolas, and Sigrid might entice some of the others out for a match.

“I don’t think that you’ll get to play soccer today,” Bard said, looking out of the kitchen window as they got on coats and hats. “It’s snowing.”

“Really?” Tilda peered out, smiling. “Maybe we can make a snowman.”

“Maybe so. Come on, everyone. Let’s get you to Rosie and Sam’s.”

They piled into Thran’s SUV, made the quick hop to Sam and Rosie’s, and Sam let them in with a big smile and wave. As the children came inside, Bard took Sam aside to explain in a few words where he and Thran were going. Sam’s smile faded into concern as Bard told him what had happened on Christmas Day.

“Oh, that’s horrible!” Sam exclaimed lowly.

Bard nodded. “I’m telling you only in case one of them says something about where we’re off to. Sigrid’s got a firm grip on it, and the boys do mostly. But Tilda’s still shaken up. If she brings it up, just be positive. We don’t know what’s up yet; that’s what we’re going to find out. So no worries.”

Sam nodded. “Got it. We’ll keep them busy until you come home.”

“Thanks, Sam. If it gets late, I’ve got a big chicken casserole in the fridge for supper. Help yourself.”

“I will. Why don’t you give me a call when you’re on your way home?”

“Good idea. We’ll be back as soon as we can.”

“Righto. Good luck. I’ll fill Rosie in.”

“Okay. See you soon, I hope.”

Bard and Thran headed back to the SUV, and silently made their way down the lane to the highway. As Bard snuck a look at Thran, he winced at the formidable glare that had returned to his husband’s face – it was as focused as a laser. If only it were one – it had only to draw a bead on Angelo and his minions, and they’d all be burnt to ashes. But it was wishful thinking to hope that their Christmas Day melee would end so easily.

The meeting that awaited them might reveal a different end, but it wasn’t likely to be such an easy one.
Chapter 63

Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint spend the afternoon in the New York City prosecutor's office, and a certain ginger-haired mover and shaker does his thing.

Chapter Notes

For once, I have taken artistic liberties to navigate our gorgeous guys through the maze of criminal prosecutions. The laws and procedures are dizzying to understand, and I have played very fast and even looser with them both. This is by no means an accurate portrayal of what happens in a real criminal case, so please forgive my blatant misrepresentation in order to move my story forward.

All I can say is don't commit a crime. You don't want to experience any of this first hand.

Thran drove in silence, for once grateful that traffic was heavy enough that he had to concentrate on maneuvering the SUV amidst the other vehicles. That kept him from focusing on his rage. Those suk in syn drug gang thugs had attacked his children, had attacked and nearly killed his saint, his husband, had actually laid hands on his Legolas, and now they had the audacity to want to strike a deal with him? To weasel out of everything they had coming to them, everything they deserved? It would be a frigid day in the Underworld of any culture before he – “Thran, take it easy. We'll get there in plenty of time.”

That was Bard’s soft voice, not alarmed, not pressing, but still...

The speedometer read ninety.

His knuckles were white on the steering wheel.

Thran took his foot off the gas pedal at once, and forced himself to loosen his grip.

“Thank you,” he managed to say quietly, but his voice was more snarl than anything else. “It would not do to be stopped for a traffic violation on the way to the police station.”

Bard rubbed Thran’s thigh in commiseration. “No, it wouldn’t.”

“I am sorry.”

“It’s okay. You’re upset.”

Thran didn’t insult Bard by trying to deny the obvious. “I am.”

“About what specifically?”
It took a lot of effort for Thran to swallow the multitude of curses that came to mind. “After what they did... now they try to negotiate out of payment for what they did.”

“We can’t jump the gun, Thran. We don’t know what they want. Given all the stuff they’re likely to be charged with, I’m not sure they’ll be able to negotiate their way out of much.”

Thran hummed in concession. “I hope not.”

“I hope not, too. But it’d be better for us if we go in with a bit more stoicism to hear what Mr. Björnsson has to tell us.”

“I will do my best.”

“I know you will. If it helps, try to be calm for our children. We want what’s best for Sigrid, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda, and starting off stoic will help us get that.”

“That is a good way to look at it. For I cannot be calm when I think about how that fucking thug shot you.”

“Then don’t think about it. I’m fine, I’m here, I didn’t even have to go to hospital. Please, cariad. Just don’t think about it. Pretend this is just another dance performance, and do what you do to calm any pre-performance jitters.”

“I do not have pre-performance jitters. Not like this.”

“Okay, then focus on your breath like you do in your yoga. Relax in the pose – isn’t that what you always tell me?”

Thran took several breaths as Bard suggested. “This is one of those rare times when it is not good to be Russian.”

Bard smothered a chuckle. “You do have the look of Arkhangel Mikhail about you. We’re almost there, so it won’t be long before we know what’s what.”

Thran only hummed in reply, but he was grateful to his husband for trying to ease his fury. Bard was right; walking into this so clearly enraged would only give his enemies something to exploit. Better that he remained the Prince of Ice, rather than the Balrog of Moria.

* * *

Before long, Thran and Bard had parked and passed inside the building housing the city prosecutors’ offices. Bard quickly moved ahead to ask the officer at the reception desk for the way to Mr. Björnsson’s office. Thankfully, Thran let him; his angel was still working to school his face into something resembling anything but fury. Bard didn’t blame him in the least, but it wouldn’t help them if his husband acted the divo today. The prosecutor’s office likely wanted to help them make the best case they could, so they didn’t need to antagonize them from the start. Bard thanked the officer on duty, and drew Thran to the elevator, which took them up several floors. As they stepped out, Bard pointed left, so they headed that way. This was a busy place, full of people coming and going, and voices at a constant buzz. It seemed to be a maze of cubicles until they came to the far wall and a row of glass-walled offices. A tall, blond man in an impeccable business suit stood outside in the small waiting area, a trim briefcase on the floor by his ankle.
“Ah,” Thran said, recognizing the man. “Kell.”

“Thran,” the man nodded, shaking Thran’s hand.

“Kell, this is Bard Bowman,” Thran nodded to Bard. “Bard, this is Celeborn Lothlori, our lawyer.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up, but he leaned forward to shake Kell’s hand firmly. “Nice to meet you.”

“Is Mr. Nori here, too?” Thran asked.

Kell nodded. “He’s having a conversation with the defense attorney.”

“Ah.”

Bard looked back and forth between his husband and this high-powered lawyer with the imposing air and the inscrutable face. Watching them was like watching kabuki, another arcane ritual full of nuance and subtlety – Bard had no idea what was really going on under the posturing.

“Mr. Björnsson’s taking a call. He’ll be with us in a few minutes.”

“Do we know where we stand at this moment?”

Kell stooped down to take a sheet of paper out of his briefcase. He passed it to Thran, who barely looked at it before he passed it to Bard. It was a list of charges facing Angelo Orker and his associate, Feldman Snaga.

It was a very long list.

That was good, right?

When it was clear that Thran and Kell intended to continue to talk in cryptic code, Bard concentrated on the list in his hands.

Class A violent felony, attempted murder with a deadly weapon in the second degree against a police officer, two counts.

Class B violent felony, aggravated assault with a deadly weapon in the second degree against a police officer, two counts.

Class B violent felony, attempted murder in the second degree with a deadly weapon, two counts.

Class D violent felony, aggravated assault with a deadly weapon in the second degree, six counts...

The words blurred on the page after that. Bard’s mouth dried and his hands clenched as he picked out words here and there – felony possession of illegal firearms, resisting arrest, misdemeanor possession of illegal substances and controlled substances, misdemeanor assault, prior convictions for Class C and D violent felonies, prior convictions for drug offenses and money laundering....

Gods... how narrow Clan Fl闫ng’s escape had been! So, so many things could have gone so, so wrong in the park that day...

He couldn’t think about what could have happened to Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda if Angelo’s bullet had struck him three inches to the right. Or what would have happened to Legolas if it had struck Thran instead. Or what would have happened to Angelo and his minions if he’d hit one of the children. Bard would have taken all of them apart bare-handed, even the children, without thinking twice.
He sat down in the nearest chair, shut his eyes, and breathed, unspeakably thankful that he still could.

After several breaths, his dizziness cleared. Just as he got up to rejoin Thran and Kell, the door to Björnsson’s office opened, revealing the prosecutor. He once had been as blond as Kell, but his stiff, close-cropped hair was mostly steel grey now, and he had clear, pale blue eyes. He wore a good quality, well fitting dark blue suit, the jacket of which was draped on the back of his desk chair. He wore small gold cufflinks in the French cuffs of his laundry-pressed, plain white shirt, and a blue paisley tie. He looked like the kind of attorney who’d be comfortable in a courtroom arguing his case. His manner was weighty, deliberate, reminding Bard of a Swedish émigré welder he’d worked with a year ago. Gundar had told Bard about his homeland where sun was rare in winter, ice and snow were deep, and seas were dark and rough. He thought New York winters were mild, laughing in amusement at the trouble natives had with the occasional deep snowfalls. Mr. Björnsson had the same patience born of physical harshness, though his was likely born of too much knowledge of human harshness than any amount of snow, ice, and darkness.

“Mr. Bowman? Mr. Oropherson?”

“I’m Bard Bowman,” Bard extended his hand. As he expected, Mr. Björnsson’s handshake was firm and heavy.

“Thran Oropherson,” Thran seconded, also extending his hand for Mr. Björnsson to shake.

The prosecutor nodded to each of them, then Kell. “Good to see you again, Kell. Come in and have a seat.”

Kell waved Bard and Thran in ahead of him, and stationed himself at the door after he shut it behind them. Mr. Björnsson sat behind his desk, leaned back, and gave both Bard and Thran a look.

“Just to bring us all onto the same page, I’ll summarize where we are at the moment,” he began.

“You likely know that both Mr. Orker and Mr. Snaga were arraigned the day of the incident. The three minors were released since none of them had any prior record, and because your children had taken them out of the scuffle, they weren’t part of what Mr. Orker and Mr. Snaga did after that. Because both Mr. Orker and Mr. Snaga had prior convictions, bail was denied to both of them, and they’ve been sitting in our semi-palatial city jail ever since. You’re aware of the backup of cases we have in the city, so we’re just now getting to this one. I’ve read all of the reports, including the statements from you and your four children, and I’ve had a long chat with Sergeant Fundin about what took place. I’ve got a pretty clear picture of what happened, so I won’t ask either of you to go through that again. Mr. Bowman, I take it that you recovered well from your injuries suffered in the incident?”

Bard nodded. “Yes, sir.”

“Good. So let's talk about why I asked you here. Mr. Lothlori has advised you of the list of charges that might potentially come to bear against the defendants, I hope.”

Bard and Thran both nodded.

“I’ll be blunt. The worst charges, the Class A and B violent felonies, are courtesy of Sergeant Fundin, as he was part of the incident. Violent felony charges are more severe when a police officer is present. The Class D charges are solid, given the thankfully minor injuries you sustained, Mr. Bowman. The misdemeanor charges are against one of the three minors, and, compared to the other charges, inconsequential. Illegal firearm charges are reasonably serious. So we have a couple of paths we can take through this.”
“Go ahead,” Bard said, before Thran could say he didn’t want to negotiate.

“My job is to determine which charges we have the best case for, because we want a conviction. I feel reasonably confident that we can make charges for the Class A and B violent felonies stick, as well as charges for the Class D violent felonies directed against you and your children. Both the defendants have prior records, so we’ve also got some leverage under the persistent violent felon laws.”

“That’s good, right?” Bard asked, looking at Thran, Kell, Mr. Björnsson. “That you have a solid case?”

Mr. Björnsson nodded. “There is a downside, though. We can have the most ironclad case in the city, but it won’t speed the time to trial. Orker’s a thug, we’ve seen him before, but he’s got a pit bull of a lawyer, and he knows every delaying tactic, every angle to play. He’s harsh on witnesses on the stand, too. If we bring this to trial, understand that he will delay as long as possible, and he will put you and your children on the stand and tear at you like a wolf. Part of the reason he’ll want to delay the trial as long as possible is so that you and your children become less sure of your stories, and he’ll try to pick them apart to muddy the waters for the judge or jury.”

“So his lawyer will have the legal right to assault our children,” Thran growled.

Mr. Björnsson met Thran’s formidable glare with an unemotional nod. He’d answered this same question uncounted times before, and was used to weathering such outrage. “In a word, yes.”

“You mentioned a plea bargain,” Bard said, so he didn’t have to think about some sleazy lawyer humiliating Tilda to tears.

Mr. Björnsson nodded again. “Despite Mr. Orker’s pit bull lawyer, he still runs a very high risk of being convicted of a Class A violent felony against a police officer. There’s not much that can rattle Sergeant Fundin, so delaying tactics won’t shake him. Orker’s concerned enough that his lawyer’s offered to plead guilty to some of the lesser charges in return for dismissal of the Class A and B felonies.”

“What does that mean?” Bard asked quickly.

“It means that they offer to serve only a few years for only part of what they did, rather than the much longer time they should,” Thran snarled.
“It does mean they won’t face life imprisonment for the Class A felonies,” Mr. Björnsson nodded.

“What is the sentence for Class D felonies?” Thran asked.

“Five to seven years.”

“What about their prior records?” Bard asked. “Does that add anything?”

“Five to seven is with the prior records,” Mr. Björnsson replied dispassionately.

Thran’s face reddened in fury. “And how long must they serve before they are eligible for parole?”

“If they get the full seven years, then approximately four years.”

Thran swallowed a curse. “How long a sentence is possible for conviction of a Class B felony?

“Ten to thirty. The Class B felony is against a policeman, which adds five years to the regular sentence. Given their priors, they’d likely get towards the higher end of the sentence.”

“And for a Class A-1 felony?”

“Life imprisonment without chance of parole.”

“My husband’s life is worth more than four years. No, I will not accept a plea bargain that rewards attempted murder with little more than a slap on the wrist!” Thran snarled.

“Thran, take it easy,” Bard pleaded. “Think about the children, and the time it’d take to put this behind us –”

“I do not care!” Thran spat. “Oh, yes, perhaps it seems wise to call an end to today’s problem and agree to this deal with a devil, but what of four years from now, when these bastards are out again? What?”

The question hung in the air like a vulture looming over prey.

After long seconds, Kell opened the door of the office and slipped out. He disappeared, leaving Bard try to calm Thran down and Mr. Björnsson to watch him without comment. Eventually, the prosecutor began a detailed lecture on what would be involved to bring their case to trial, and which charges offered the best chances of conviction. All Bard could think about was this supposed pit bull defense attorney trying to make fools out of his children. Sigrid would give him a fit, but the boys weren’t likely to offer much of a challenge, and poor, trusting Tilda...

After ten minutes, Kell slipped back in the office. His face was as inscrutable as before, but his bearing was lighter.

“I have a new proposal,” Kell said.

“What is it?” Thran asked flatly.

“If we’d agree to drop the Class A violent felonies, the defendants will plead guilty to all of the rest.”

Bard’s jaw fell open. “Did I hear you right? They’ll plead guilty to everything else, even the Class B charges, if we drop the Class A-1 charges?”

Kell nodded once. “I recommend you accept that one, and quickly. Mr. Orker was not happy about that, but he agreed. I can’t say how long he’ll agree to that.”
“That’s ten to thirty, maybe near the higher end,” Bard reiterated. “And we don’t go to trial, it’s a done deal, and we don’t have to put the children in the witness box?”

Mr. Björnsson nodded.

Thran looked slightly mollified, but still considering.

“Thran, think about the children. It’s a better deal. I’m okay with it.”

Thran took a long moment, but eventually he nodded. “So be it. Not ideal, but better. So let us do so quickly.”

Mr. Björnsson stood up. “I’ll be right back, then, if you’re sure that’s what you want to do.”

Both Thransson and Bard nodded.

An hour later, it was done, and Mr. Björnsson escorted Bard and Thran out of his office with the first smile he’d evinced since they’d met him. He was satisfied, then, maybe even a little elated, in a very quiet way. He asked Kell to stay behind a moment, so Thran and Bard waited for the lawyer in the small waiting area outside of Mr. Björnsson’s office. Despite it being close to five o’clock on a Saturday, just as many people came and went through the maze of offices.

“At least it’s over, at least for however many years Orker and Snaga spend in prison,” Bard murmured.

Thran hummed. He’d calmed down now that the situation had resolved itself. He wasn’t happy about having to accept a plea bargain, but Bard was glad enough for both of them that a lengthy trial wasn’t in their future, and their children would not be subjected to a horrific grilling.

“I suppose so, lyubov moya,” he murmured softly. “I hope our Mr. D will not be angry at us for dismissing some of the charges related to his involvement.”

“At least they’re going away for longer than five to seven.”

Thran hummed again, still not completely reconciled. Bard looked back at Mr. Björnsson’s office, where Kell murmured too lowly for him to make out any of the words. When he turned around to face Thran again, he registered the same small, ginger-haired man who’d spoken to Kell earlier as he passed through the maze. Even at this distance, Bard could tell that he was dressed in a very expensive suit, with sizeable gold nugget cufflinks and natty silk tie. His beard was neatly trimmed, and his ginger hair was clubbed in a thick tail. He looked towards Bard and Thran, nodding once before he moved on. When Thran nodded back, Bard raised his eyebrows at Thran.

“Mr. Nori?”

Thran nodded.

“A man of few words.”

For the first time this afternoon, Thran’s lips curved up in a perverse smile. It was not a pleasant expression.

“On the contrary, Bard. I suspect that his words had much to do today with our favorable outcome.”

Bard watched the ginger-haired man disappear into the maze. “We won’t find out a thing about what he said, will we?”
As Kell finally reappeared from Mr. Björnsson’s office, Thran shook his head. “It is likely better that we do not. But rest assured that they were all to our benefit.”

“It’s good to know that the Russian mafia is looking out for us.”

Thran and Kell exchanged inscrutable glances, but neither of them disputed Bard’s semi-serious jest. Maybe it was just as well Bard didn’t know more about Mr. Nori’s machinations undertaken on his behalf. Still, he wished he could have been a fly sitting on the shoulder of Mr. Nori’s expensive suit all afternoon.

* * *

“They won’t take it, Bolger. They know what they’ve got against your client, and they’re not about to let him go with just a conviction for five to seven.”

“They’re fucking stupid not to. You know what I’ll put their kids through on the stand. They’ll piss themselves and sob like infants when I’m done with them.”

“They fought off your client, didn’t they? You won’t bully them.”

“I bet I can bully the little girl. Tell them that.”

Nori shrugged. “I’ll tell them. But they won’t buy it.”

He turned his back on the hulking attorney without haste, without concern. He threaded through the maze of cubicles and people rushing back and forth until he reached Björnsson’s office. Kell appeared at his rap.

“What’s the deal?” Kell murmured.

“Drop the Class A and B, they’ll plead guilty to the rest.”

“The kids’ misdemeanors, too?”

The kids’ charges are immaterial. Not part of the conversation.”

Kell nodded. “What do you think?”

“I’m not done with him. I’ve got a good piece left to stuff down his craw. Don’t ask. What about Thran and his boy?”

“Don’t knock Bard. He’s the only one keeping a lid on our Russian rocket.”

Nori’s smile was amused. “Didn’t know anyone could do that.”

“He can. Still, Thran’s pretty pissed about only a five to seven.”

“As expected. All right, enough time’s passed that I can go back and hit Bolger with the big one. This won’t take long.”

Kell went back into Björnsson’s office, and Nori made his leisurely way back to the hall where Bolger paced. At sight of him, Bolger stopped his pacing and waited for Nori to get closer.

“They took it, right? Smart of them.”

Nori shook his head. “They didn’t. They’re talking to Björnsson now about asking for a jury trial, and whether they can put the little girl on first, to set the proper tone for the jury to understand just what kind of people shoot at children in a public park over a soccer ball they didn’t even ask your runners to return.”

Bolger’s nostrils flared just like a bull facing a matador. The metaphor made Nori smile. This bull didn’t have horns long enough to gore him.

“They’re stupid if they try that.”

“The guy with the white hair’s Russian. Do I have to say any more? Besides, the Class A-1 means you put Fundin on the stand. Remember what happened the last time you tried that? Got Orker his first prior, didn’t it?”

Bolger ground his teeth. “You don’t have the case you think you do.”

Nori dropped his genial smile and casual stance. “You’re right, I don’t. I’ve got a better one. You ask your clients to explain the sudden disappearance of Lance Dunmont, eh? Maybe he’s off visiting his grandmother in the armpit of the Southern US of A, and maybe he’s taking a more permanent vacation. Your client couldn’t let a runner who’d fucked up so badly go without making an example of him, could he? How’d you like that to come out in your client’s trial? Something about serious bodily harm to a minor? Interested?”

Bolger’s fury shone in his eyes, but Nori’s shrewd words had struck even closer to home than Nori expected. He didn’t allow himself a smile of triumph.

“You tell your client that the prosecution will drop the A-1 charges, but only if he and his boy plead guilty to everything else. Everything else, or they’ll go to trial. Let’s see if you mauling a bunch of kids on the stand convinces the jury that your client might have done a little child mauling of his own, in addition to everything else.”

Bolger turned on his heel and retreated, likely to see his client. Nori remained in the hall patiently. Ten minutes later, Bolger was back.

“Drop the A-1 charges. Guilty to the rest.”

Nori nodded. “Pleasure doing business with you. Enjoy the rest of your afternoon.”

Bolger spat obscenities as he retreated, drawing Nori’s smile. He retraced his steps to Björnsson’s office, met Kell approaching him halfway, delivered the goods, and made his way away.

He loved his job.
Chapter 64

Chapter Summary

When an angel struggles to reach acceptance, a saint's patience and love lead the way to redemption.

“I’m calling the children,” Bard said, as soon as Thran unlocked the SUV and they climbed inside.

Thran didn’t speak. He was still furious with the vermin who had attacked his family. But as Bard had reminded him, the vermin had agreed to plead guilty to all of the charges filed against them for what they’d done to his family. The one they escaped was only the worst of the offenses that applied to Mr. D, not all of them. It was likely that both would be imprisoned for years, even if eventually they were eligible for parole.

Still...

He would have a private conversation with Mr. Nori.

He would make note of the exact sentence Angelo and his minion received.

He would attend any parole hearing and have his say.

He would hope that Angelo and his minion met with an... unfavorable reception in prison. It would be poetic justice if Angelo met a bigger thug with an axe to grind, and guards who were negligent about watching what happened in dark corners of the prison.

He brooded over that for a while.

Eventually, he registered that Bard had made his call to their children, and now regarded him in silence, patiently waiting for him to emerge from his funk.

“Forgive me.”

Bard shook his head. “You’re allowed. If you’d rather take the rest of the trip home to sort things out, I can drive.”

“I can drive.”

“Of course you can. But if you’d rather be with your thoughts than deal with traffic and snow, I don’t mind.”

Snow? Ah, yes, snow – it had fallen steadily while they’d been ensconced in Mr. Björnsson’s office, and he’d walked unaware through almost four inches of it to reach the SUV. Sighing, Thran shook the melting snow off his hair and coat, started the SUV, and pulled away from the curb. “I appreciate your offer, but better I think of something else, even traffic and snow. I envy you. How do you reach resolution so quickly?”

Bard was silent for a long moment. “You’re hotter than me by nature, without doubt. But... with all respect, cariad, I think the big difference in our reactions is because I’ve been poor, and you never Thran blinked in surprise, and glanced at Bard as they waited at a red traffic light. His husband stared straight ahead, as reflective as he usually was. “I do not understand. This is about money?”

Bard shook his head. “Not directly... rather, the power one wields in life, I suppose. You’ve been an elite all your life, Thran, maybe not used to being treated with less than consideration, of not being someone special and rare and valued. Most of the world isn’t so lucky – you have to stand in line, wait your turn, try to make your way in a world that doesn’t know, value, or care about you. Crimes end up being a double assault – first by the wrongdoers, and then by the legal system, but if you’re a nobody without power, you take it, because that’s all you get.

“We came out of this much better, because you had the power to bring Mr. Nori to broker the deal, and Kell to shepherd us through the rest. Consequently, Angelo will pay for most of what he did, we avoided a long and nasty trial, and we spared the children. Those are gifts above and beyond what we would've had to settle for, if you hadn’t had the power to make them so.”

Bard’s voice was considered, without heat or resentment, merely stating what would have been blindingly obvious if Thran had ever thought about it before. He swallowed, not knowing what to say.

“Shit happens, Thran. That’s not just a trite saying – it really does, and we can’t stop it. Getting out of shit is never easy, and always messy. But we got out of ours without much trouble, without much mess. I think about that, rather than what happened in the park, that’s all.”

“You offer a different perspective,” Thran said at last. “You are right that I wish that day in the park had never happened, which is foolish because that did happen, and my wishes do not change that. You are also right that we have put most of it aside better than what you tell me is typical, which is a great deal to be grateful for.”

Bard nodded. “That’s my take on it.”

Thran made the turn onto the highway, which settled him, because it meant he was headed home. The snowfall intensified, so he turned up the windshield wipers to compensate. “I will try to remember that.”

“It’ll be easier when we get home – when you see Legolas, and know that neither he, nor Tilda, nor Bain, nor Sigrid will have to face a lawyer every bit as vicious as Angelo himself, and not be able to hit back.”

Bard was right. When they pulled up in front of Sam and Rosie’s house, the children spilled out despite the falling snow. Thran’s heart thumped hard when Legolas ran to him and threw a hug around him. Bard had Tilda in his arms, and Bain and Sigrid on either side. The two older children dragged Bard over to Thran, and the six of them scrummed together as the snow fell.

“What happened?” Sigrid breathed as they held each other close.

“It all came out okay,” Bard murmured. “We’ll talk when we get home. But don’t worry. It came out okay.”

“I’m glad,” was Tilda’s breathy reply.

“Come in out of the snow, all of you!” Rosie beckoned from the door. “Come on! Supper’s hot, and you all look like you need it!”
“All okay?” Sam asked lowly as they came in, and Bard nodded.

“It’s okay. Later. I don’t want to upset the small ones.”

“Course,” Sam nodded, taking Bard’s coat, then Thran’s. “Just as long as it came out okay for you, I’m happy.”

They piled into the house, where the toothsome aromas of chicken casserole and warm bread greeted them. Sam and Rosie had availed themselves of Bard’s casserole, and had added one of their own, plus salad and bread, to make sure that a substantial supper was ready for them. Everyone squeezed around the big kitchen table to eat, though that meant Sam and Bard had small Gamgee children on their laps to make room. Tilda wasn’t so small, but she slithered into Thran’s lap without asking, which Thran found comforting. As Tilda was left-handed as her father was, she and Thran sorted out how to keep from tangling utensils quite well, and helped each other to bites of things. Legolas was beside him, and he and Tilda made sure that Thran had more than enough to eat. On some days, that would have been annoying. Today, it was a blessing, and a reminder that Bard was right about sparing their children.

With twelve hungry people at the table, supper didn’t last long. Rosie brought out a huge coconut cake, which delighted Legolas. He plopped a plate bearing an immense slab in front of his father, took a huge bite for himself, and insisted that Thran have a forkful as well. When Tilda leaned forward with her mouth open, Legolas popped in a big bite, which made Tilda laugh so hard that some of the cake fell out of her mouth. Bain thought that was hilarious, and laughed so hard that he choked on his mouthful, which caused Bard and Merry to smack their hands on Bain’s back.

As everyone laughed, Thran appreciated Bard’s perspective more. Angelo and his minion might not disappear into a prison for the rest of their lives, but they would for perhaps decades. In return, his children had recovered from their Christmas Day scare, and would not have to revisit it again in a hostile courtroom.

By the time they thanked Sam and Rosie profusely for their hosting and piled into the SUV for the hop home, Thran felt more reconciled.

Of course, as soon they came into their house, the three older children clamored to know what had happened at the courthouse. Tilda was quiet, but she remained in the kitchen while Bard made tea for everyone, not wanting to venture away from the rest of them. Bard brought the big teapot to the table, and everyone took one of the Japanese teacups as he explained what the result of the afternoon’s negotiation was. He did so in his usual quiet fashion, stressing that there would be no trial, and the case would go straight to sentencing, which meant Angelo and Snaga would go straight to jail, and would not bother them again.

“What about Lance Dunmont?” Tilda asked.

“He won’t bother us, either, Tilda,” Bard assured her. “We’re not in the city anymore, he doesn’t know where we are, and after what Legs, Sig, and Bain put him through, he doesn’t ever want to see any of us again.”

“Really?” Tilda asked in a hopeful voice.

“I broke his foot, Tilda,” Sigrid nodded firmly. “And Bain and Legs smacked him hard for messing with me. We trashed him. He won’t dare come near us, ever again.”

“You got that right,” Bain seconded.
“Absolutely,” Legolas chimed in.

“Good,” Tilda heaved a relieved sigh. “Good. I’m so glad.”

“So am I,” Thran finally spoke. “We are done with them, Kukla. Done.”

When Bard’s eyes met his, Thran’s rage calmed still more because Tilda’s relief was so profound. Bard was right – their good fortune was not perfection, but it was good enough.

* * *

Thran was not surprised that Bard soon nudged the children past the excitement about their fathers’ visit to the city prosecutor’s office by asking Legolas to continue their Harry Potter reading. After their chapter was done, Bain and Legolas had permission to resume their zombie apocalypse adventures, but surprisingly, Bain generously offered to play Tilda’s Dinky Farm game with her. Legolas offered to play, too, so a happy Tilda explained the rules to Legolas, and the three of them were soon embroiled in a game. Sigrid headed upstairs to shower and talk to Finn as she usually did, and the evening soon wound down.

“It’s not that bad a game,” Thran overheard Legolas admit to Bain when they headed upstairs to bed.

“I guess not,” Bain murmured back. “But don’t tell Til that, or we’ll never get to play zombie apocalypse!”

The boys shared a rueful snicker as they separated.

Bard came upstairs soon after, and they bid the children goodnight. Thran had already stripped and gotten into the shower for a hot scrub when Bard padded in.

“Care for company, angel?”

“Always. Today especially.”

When Bard let himself into the shower cabinet, Thran drew him into the warmth of hot water and his embrace. For some moments, he was glad merely to hold his husband against his chest.

“You’ve had a hard day, angel.”

Thran stroked the back of Bard’s head. “It is not easy to be reminded of all I could have lost on Christmas Day.”

“It wasn’t the way I would have wanted things to go, but it came out all right, and look what it did for us after. We moved here sooner than we thought. We’re here with our children, and they’re happy and in a good school, Legolas especially. We’re married. Our house is coming along. You’re about to do something amazing with UltraViolet, and I’m getting back to being an artist. All of those are sterling.”

Thran hummed a concession. “Wales breeds eternal optimists. Russia breeds something else entirely.”

Bard’s fingers traced down Thran’s spine. “What, exactly?”
“Difficulty.”

Lips brushed against his neck. “Some of what we went through today was difficult. But that’s not how I’d characterize a certain Russian I know.”

Thran shut his eyes to better savor the touches against his skin. “I...”

A soapy washcloth stroked his back slowly. “Let me remind you of what you are to me, Thran – cariad, my husband, my angel.”

“Oh, lyubov moya...”

Bard soothed soap over his body, tending him as if he were a treasure. He even washed Thran’s hair as carefully as Thran did – typical of the attention Bard paid to everything. When he was clean, Bard sent him out to dry his hair while he washed. Thran turned the dryer on Bard when he got out, and when they were both dry, Bard led him to bed. He enfolded Thran in his arms to stroke and kiss slowly, helping Thran to settle, to calm. When Thran let all of his breath out in one long sigh, Bard eased atop him, still stroking and kissing, proving without words how much he cherished Thran.

“Zoloto moyo...”

Slowly, one inch at a time, Bard eased down Thran’s body under the covers, but his goal was no longer to relax, but to arouse. How delicious was it to be swaddled in such softness, then to have his cock descend into the blissful warmth of Bard’s mouth? He was soothed and savored, coddled and coaxed, roused and rewarded, until everything but his husband’s worship faded. When Bard slid into him, one miniscule bit at a time, Thran was past thinking, past worry, past anything but physical sensation. He let Bard’s ministrations draw his body into rising as they would, accepting the profound gift he was given with the enjoyment it deserved, without resistance. Under such devoted attention, it took very little time to sweep him away; as he rose, he clung to Bard, gasping and shuddering, until he was drained. Bard’s release was quiet, and he eased out carefully, taking pains not to disturb Thran. He padded to the bathroom to wash, returning with a washcloth and towel to gently clean the signs of their indulgence from Thran. He soon slipped back into bed to enfold Thran in his arms again.

“I am the most loved of difficult Russians, lyubov moya,” Thran whispered, brushing a kiss on Bard’s jaw.

“The most loved of angels. Don’t let anything make you lose sight of that.”

“How do I reward such a gift?”

“Accept it as freely as I offered it, that’s all.”

“May I offer you anything in return?”

Bard rubbed Thran’s arm slowly. “Tomorrow is soon enough, or the next day, or whenever. Tonight’s on me.”

“I am very blessed.”

Bard’s chuckle was nearly silent. “You are, and so am I. And that’s the most important thing.”

Thran swallowed the lump in his throat, and vowed to remember Bard’s soft voice when he next thought about the stupidity of drug gangs.
Chapter 65

Chapter Summary

After a little snowy sojourn, the arts finally resume their rightful places in the lives of an angel and a saint. And does one more old friend finally make his cameo?

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

Akh, chto, chert voz'imi = oh, what the hell (Russian)

When Bard woke Sunday morning, he was doubly glad that last night he’d eased Thran from yesterday’s brooding. First, he’d hated to see his angel so consumed, and was relieved that he’d helped Thran put yesterday’s upset aside as soon as possible. Second, he wouldn’t have had the chance to ease him this morning, because Thran’s mobile was chiming.

As Thran whuffled into his pillow and groped for his mobile on the night stand, Bard laid odds that it was Irmo calling, or someone else associated with UltraViolet Ballet. Mumbling a greeting, Thran curled back into bed to listen. Bard drew him against his chest and held him comfortably.

“Of course I am still in bed,” Thran grumbled in a distinctly grumpy voice, drawing Bard’s smile.

“With your hunky lover,” he murmured in the pale ear that didn’t have a mobile pressed to it. “I could moan, if you’d like me to help you drive home your point.”

“Hush,” Thran mouthed, but his lips curved in a smile. “It is barely seven o’clock on a Sunday morning, Irmo. Where else would a dissipated ballet dancer be?”

A muffled string of words indicated that Irmo had several ideas of where else Thran could be.

“No, I have not talked to Lettie or Abebe since last week. I have been... occupied with other matters. As far as I know, they and their sponsors still debate the last offer I made them.”

More excited words followed. Thran gave a silent groan, but settled himself to listen with a resigned pat on the arm Bard had wrapped around his ribs. Bard pressed a kiss on his husband’s ear, and got up to tend to necessities in the bathroom. He rinsed his face, ran a razor over his cheeks, gave into the urge to run his hands through his hair – his new ’do, as Rowan had called it, still delighted him – and came out of the bathroom to find Thran comfortably propped up on the pillows against the headboard, his white hair twining over his chest and one arm flung wide as he talked on his mobile.

Angel, indeed – gods, for two cents, Bard would snatch that angel’s mobile from him and bed him summarily. He resisted the temptation and turned to dig out clean clothes – only to remember that his dresser was in the children’s study. The children weren’t up yet, so he ducked naked into the study to grab clean underwear, tee, and socks, pulling them on as he came back into the bedroom for jeans. When Thran disappeared into the bathroom, still debating Irmo, Bard looked around the bedroom, which was still more construction site than he’d hoped. He’d finished the ceiling yesterday, but the woodwork still needed to be painted, and the floor still needed to be done. Was it worth bucking Thran and the children about Sunday being reserved for his art and lobby to finish it today, or should he just wait until tomorrow?

There were only eight inches of snow on the ground, which wouldn’t preclude him from going to the art supply store for clay. There was still a lot to do in the barn to clean and organize. So he could find art-related things to do without problem. And it would be fun to give Tilda another drawing lesson. Either way, he’d find something worthwhile to do.

“Bard?”

Bard stuck his head out of the closet as he pulled on his jeans. “Yes?”

Thran was back in bed, but his mobile was pressed into the sheets, blocking the speaker. “Irmo is desperate to work on his choreography. I confess that after yesterday’s wrangle, it would be good to dance more than my barre this morning. Would you mind if he and I work in the ballroom this afternoon?”

“Of course not. Just give me time to feed you a substantial breakfast.”

Thran gave him a fond but resigned look. “Why am I not surprised? Of course, breakfast would be wonderful.”

Thran went back to his mobile, exchanged a few more words, and ended the call. He put his mobile on the nightside table and sank back into the pillows.

“And so it begins,” he said to the ceiling.

Grinning, Bard leaned against the closet doorjamb to take a long look at the pale body sprawled over grey silk sheets. “Egg Puff, pancakes, waffles, scrambled eggs, muffins, French toast, regular toast... what sounds good?”

Thran heaved a sigh as he considered Bard. “My choice would be to spend the morning in bed, where I reward the care I received last night from a compassionate and gentle saint. Do you think...?”

Bard circled the bed to his side, left his clothes on the floor, and slid under the covers, where he was enfolded in Thran’s arms. “What I think is that it’s too early to get up yet.”

Thran snuggled him close, silently chuckling. “Only in one sense.”

“Mmm.” Bard shut his eyes to better savor the feel of Thran’s body under his roving hands. “True. It’s never too early to get a rise out of my angel.”

“Oh, my... yes...” Thran murmured.

They spent a most entrancing hour alternating between drowsing and decadence before they were willing to concede that it might be time for breakfast.

“I’m sorry Irmo had no sense of boundaries this morning, but the hour after he called was sweet,” Bard murmured, burying his nose in Thran’s hair to nuzzle his ear.

Thran rolled over to wrap arms around Bard’s neck and kiss him thoroughly. “The best kind of sweet. Nothing to add to the bones.”
“That reminds me,” Bard kissed back with equal fervor. “I want to get us a bathroom scale. Not to make you worry if you gain weight, but to help you make sure you don’t lose weight.”

Thran gave him a puzzled look. “Why, lyubov moya? I have not had such a problem before.”

Bard hesitated. This ballet was Thran’s business, and Bard knew next to nothing about it. But he’d seen yesterday how consumed his husband could be over things he felt strongly about. If there was anything Thran felt strongly about, it was making this ballet. “Would you humor me about this, angel? Please? I... have a feeling that this ballet will be such an effort that you won’t have time to think about so many things. It’ll give me peace of mind, that you’ll have something to help remind you eat enough – to stay strong so you can make this ballet everything you want it to be.”

Bard brushed another kiss on his husband’s lips to reinforce that he had only the best of intentions. Thran kissed back, and shrugged a concession.

“If it will ease you, then of course. This effort asks much of you as well as me, and I want to reassure you about it as I can.”

“Thank you, angel. It will. Now, speaking of eating, it’s time for breakfast. What would you like?”

“I would like to know what you would make for yourself to eat, if a finicky ballet dancer were not your concern.”

Bard grinned at the humor in Thran’s voice. “Hmm. Not porridge; that’s for the weekdays. Egg Puff with cheese and onions, a side of rye toast with honey, a rasher of crispy bacon, and four cups of that café au lait you made for me last week at Rowan’s.”

“All of that?” Thran’s eyes widened.

“Maybe,” Bard teased. “But we don’t have any bacon, and we don’t have any coffee, so I’ll settle for the Egg Puff and toast with tea. Might I tempt a finicky ballet dancer with any of that?”

“I think you might.”

“Shave, if you want. I’ll get started, and it’ll be in the works when you come downstairs.”

“I hear and obey, my saint,” Thran smiled and stroked Bard’s cheek as they pushed back the covers.

Bard resumed his clothes and padded downstairs to rummage in the kitchen. By the time Thran joined him, he had the Egg Puff in the oven and the toaster loaded. They sat down to a good breakfast shortly thereafter, enjoying the view of the snow outside the kitchen window.

“I can’t wait to get to our solarium,” Bard commented, munching his toast. “Imagine how decadent it will be when it’s snowy outside, but we’ll have our version of Morocco inside. The fountain will work, the walls will be painted, our archway will be cleaned up and finished, and maybe we’ll have screens like those you saw. And the plants.”

“Our hidden treasure,” Thran hummed. He gave Bard a sideways look and smiled. “I cannot wait to see what royalty lounges in such a place. Perhaps he would like a devoted attendant.”

“I’ll dictate that the palace handyman must reglue all the joints in the fainting couch so it can provide sustained lounging for two,” Bard grinned. “It’s too bad we have to consider the sensibilities of our children, or I’d make us an Indian temple carving for the wall, to look down upon us with a blessing – incentive, as if we need it.”
“Oooh, one of those temple carvings,” Thran’s eyes widened. “It is such a pity we cannot indulge in one. They are beautiful.”

“They are,” Bard agreed. “We’ll have to wait until the children go to college for that, though.”

“I suppose so.” Thran put the last bite of his Egg Puff into his mouth and chewed thoughtfully. “At least you can sketch some studies for such a thing. I would be glad to model for them.”

“I bet you would. If I make too many sculptures of that, I’ll become the Robert Mapplethorpe of sculptors.”

“I would not mind.” Thran gave him another slow smile. “But perhaps it would be wise to wait until our children are grown for that, too.”

“Likely so. All right, I’m done. I’m for the snow shovel so we’ve got a clear path to the driveway and the lane. There’s not enough snow to keep the children out of school tomorrow, so I’ll need to shovel sooner or later today.”

“Do you have two so I can help?”

“I think so. It won’t take long. I bet we’ll finish before any of the children wake up.”

Bard pulled on a heavy sweater, hat, gloves, and boots, as shoveling was too sweaty a task for him to put on his new coat. Thran didn’t have anything ratty enough for such a chore, so he borrowed one of Bard’s old sweaters, and tucked his white hair under one of Legolas’s slouchy knitted hats. As they dug out the snow shovels and brooms from the barn, Bard grinned to see such an elite dancer look so down-to-earth... except that Thran didn’t look very down-to-earth, even clad in Bard’s worst castoffs; Thran remained beautiful and elegant no matter what he wore.

As they cleaned off the front and side porches with brooms, Bard told Thran how a fellow artist told him that his family always painted the ceiling of their porches blue.

“Why? Because it looks like the sky?” Thran wondered.

“Not sure. I think it’s a regional tradition – James was from someplace in the American South, maybe Mississippi? We’ve got a ways to go before we have to decide what color to paint ours, though. Maybe by summer I’ll get to it.”

“I want to hire someone to do all the outside painting, lyubov moya. It is so much work, and in the hot sun, and up so high... by summer, you will be full time at your metal, so let someone else see to such a grueling chore.”

“I won’t argue with you. Painting inside is one thing. Outside’s another story. I wasn’t looking forward to that part.”

“Then it is decided. We will hire someone for that.”

“Speaking of painting, I don’t suppose I could get a variance on the local ordinance against renovation on Sundays and finish the bedroom woodwork and floor, could I? I didn’t get as far as I wanted to yesterday.”

Thran paused in his sweeping. “What kind of ordinance would it be, if you break it the first week it is in effect?”

“A flexible one,” Bard returned with an unapologetic smirk, starting on the steps.
“How will you explain this to our children, to break a duly-enacted ordinance that came about only because the local artist would not pay attention to important things without it?”

“If you’re all right with our bedroom being a construction site for another day, I guess I don’t have to work on it today.”

Thran put his arms akimbo. “Do you tell me that you have nothing of your art to distract you from woodwork and floors, my saint? What kind of artist are you, that you cannot find something better to do than woodwork and floors?”

“I have lots of things –”

“Aha!” Thran held his hands up in triumph. “Then you must do them, and leave the woodwork and floors until tomorrow! The local ordinance stands!”

Laughing, Bard scooped up some of the snow on the steps, balled it together, and heaved it at Thran. His angel ducked, but the snowball still thwacked on Thran’s shoulder.

“Suka blyad!” Thran swore. “You did not just throw a snowball because I uphold the local ordinance!”

“Yes, I did,” Bard backed off the steps into the yard.

“That is illegal! You cannot get away with that, I warn you!”

“Oh? What’re you going to do about it?”

“What will I do about it?” Thran stalked towards him. “I am Russian. What do you think I will do about it? I will get revenge!”

Scooping up his own snowball, Thran set out after Bard with a war cry. Bard tore around to the side of the house with Thran in hot pursuit, ducking around the corner to scrape together another snowball to launch at Thran as soon as he came into view. This one missed, but Thran’s aim was not so erring. Bard’s vision vanished as Thran’s missile exploded against the back of his head, sending powdery remnants everywhere.

“Oh, you bastard! I’ll get you for that!” Bard whooped, ducking another snowball to grab for more ammunition. “Eat snow, you fucker!”

“Eat it yourself!” Thran shouted, hurling more snow at Bard. “I hope it tastes delicious, because I have so much more for you where that came from!”

“Try some of it yourself, you Russian bastard!” Bard’s missile landed full in Thran’s face. “There! How does that taste?”

“Idi k chertu, ty grebanyy huiesos! Sosi moy chlen! Idi na khuy!” Thran howled, madly hurling snow as fast as he could gather it. So furious an assault was it that Bard sprinted away around the house again with Thran close behind, laughing uproariously at his husband’s furious barrage of curses. But his laughter didn’t last, not when Thran sprinted after him with both hands full of snow, hurling one after another at Bard until he was covered in powder.

“Mab i ast!” he swore, hurling snow back in desperation, for now it was Thran who guffawed at the state to which he’d reduced Bard. “You lowborn, underhanded, sneaky wretch of a villain, I am so going to make you pay for that –”
“Da?”

“Papa?”

Bard skidded to a stop, tearing his gaze from the snowy Russian panting in front of him to the four children standing in their bare feet on the front porch. A late snowball splattered on his chest, which gave him a reason to glare at Thran.

“Five minutes in the penalty box for a late hit after the whistle,” he growled, but Thran was not impressed, and sniffed in distain.

“What was Ada saying?” an awestruck Tilda asked Legolas, who swallowed.

“Really bad words, Kukla. Really, really bad words.”

“No worse than what Da was saying,” Sigrid surmised, looking down at the two combatants.

“Actually, what Papa said was a lot worse,” Legolas admitted, a guilty smile on his face.

“And how do you know?” Thran demanded. “You did not learn such words from me. Besides, I was justified. Our Bard tried to weasel out –”

“Weasel?” Bard’s interruption was indignant. “Weasel?”

“Yes, weasel. He wanted to weasel out of our local ordinance to work on only his art today and forego renovations, and I of course told him that he was not allowed! I was justified!”

Sigrid giggled. “Ye gods, you two! You’re no better than us!”

Bard put his hands on his hips, gave a rude little twitch, and stuck his tongue out at Thran. “Nyah, nyah!”

As the children huddled, Thran replied with a raspberry and then stuck his tongue out at Bard. “Brat.”

“Don’t make us come down there!” chorused the children, laughing.

Bard laughed, too. “They’re on to us, Thran! I guess we’ll have to finish shoveling the walk instead of playing in the snow.”

“They never let me have any fun,” Thran pouted, then stuck his tongue out at the children, then couldn’t keep from laughing. “Back to the shovels we must go, then.”

“We’ll be done in a bit, then we’ll be back inside to make your breakfast,” Bard said, picking up one of the shovels.

“We’ll manage,” Sigrid waved at them. “But Thran’s right, Da. No renovations for you today!”

“They never let me have any fun, either,” Bard quipped, as Sigrid threw up her hands and headed back inside.

“Ah, lyubov moya,” Thran found the other shovel. “That is because they are the fun.”

“I suppose so. Come on, let’s get this done. I’m soaked.”

“You earned it,” Thran grinned, and bent to their task.
In a few minutes, the walk from porch to lane was shoveled, as was the path to the barn, and the driveway from truck and SUV to walk. Bard and Thran circled the house to come in through the mudroom, for both of them were splattered with too much snow to track it through the center hall. Bard stripped off his heavy sweater to shake it hard before he even went inside, so caked was he. When he was finally shorn of most of his white coat, he and Thran left their boots and outdoor clothes in the mudroom. They came into the kitchen to find the children making toast and scrambled eggs. Legolas stood at the stove, presiding with pride over the egg skillet.

“How deep is the snow, Da?” Bain asked, as he held out his plate for Legolas to fill. “Enough to sled?”

“There’s a good eight inches,” Bard told him. “We’ve still got the sled and snow saucers in the barn.”

“Can we go?”

“It would be fun,” Tilda nodded vigorously. “Have you been sledding before, Legs?”

“Not for a long time,” Legolas shook his head. “Everything around my boarding school was flat, so here were no hills to use. I remember that I went with my Maman and Papa back in Saint Petersburg once.”

“We can go after breakfast,” Bard swiped a piece of toast from the toaster and slathered it with marmalade. “What time is Irmo coming, Thran? You can come, too.”

“Not until two, though I would not be surprised if he cannot help himself and comes earlier.”

“Oh, please, Ada, come with us,” Sigrid asked. “Don’t stay cooped up in here all day!”

“You don’t have to sled, but it’s fun to watch,” Bard coaxed. “You had so much fun dousing me in snow, a little traipse from the truck to the hill won’t hurt.”

“So let us go,” Thran nodded, smiling when the children all cheered. Anticipation provided good incentive for the children to shovel down the rest of their breakfast, then they scampered upstairs to don heavy clothes. Before long, everyone ran to the barn to find the old saucers and sled. Bard plied a bit of steel wool to take the rust off the sled runners, and Bain and Legolas wiped the cobwebs off the saucers. Soon everyone piled into Bard’s truck for the short drive to the preferred sledding hill on the edge of an industrial park. Thran perked up, pointing to the building that housed the UltraViolet Ballet studio as they drove by.

At the far end of the park was the sledding hill; many children were already sliding down the slope when the family pulled up and unloaded the pair of saucers and the sled. Someone had built a fire in a reclaimed metal barrel, and several people stood around it to keep warm as they watched the sledders. Bard lingered at the top of the hill to watch Legolas and Bain commandeer the saucers, leaving the sled to Sigrid and Tilda.

“Push, Da!” Tilda demanded, pointing forward like the captain of a ship from where she sat in front of Sigrid on the sled.

“Hang on, lasses!” he said as he took a grip on the sled. “Here you go!”

He gave them a good boost on their way, laughing as both girls gave a war cry down the hill. Thran watched Bain and Legolas as they careened ahead of the girls, grinning as both saucers flew over a slight bump halfway down the hill, sending both of them into the air.
“Oh, gods!” he laughed, wincing when Bain spilled out of his saucer to sprawl in the snow. “And there go our girls, straight for him!”

“No, Sig missed them, if not by much,” Bard pointed. “Gods, nothing changes. It looks just the same as it did when I was here last, ten years ago.”

“And here you are again. Another happy reunion, I hope.”

Bard nodded. “I’m glad to see the children happy. Look – there goes Legolas, right after Bain. He’s laughing so hard he can’t stand up.”

Thran’s face bore a wide smile. “That makes me very happy. He forgets to be so studied. Your children have been good for him.”

“He has a gracious soul, just like his father. I’m glad he’s with us.”

“As am I. Ah, look. There is the price to pay to fly so fast down such a long hill. The long, slow walk up.”

“It’s a haul,” Bard grinned. “Don’t let Bain sucker you into hauling him back up on the sled. I tell them that if you go down the hill under your own power, then you go up the hill the same way.”

“A wise adage,” snickered Thran, “if an unwelcome one.”

The children were willing to traipse up the hill far more times than Bard expected; clearly their sport classes at the Imladris Academy had done wonders for their endurance. But at length Tilda was ready for a breather, and Sigrid wanted to talk to one of her classmates by the fire.

“What do you think, angel?” Bard nudged Thran with his shoulder. “Want to take a trip down the hill with me?”

“Is that sled sturdy enough for the two of us?” Thran pulled at his lower lip in speculation.

“I guess we’ll find out, won’t we?”

Thran gave Bard a look, then shrugged, grinning. “Akh, chto, chert voz’mi. Get on.”

Bard scrunched up on the sled, his feet on the steering runners, and Thran crowded close behind, fingers grasping the edge of the sled and his knees hugging Bard around the ribs. Bard looped his arms around Thran’s legs to grasp the side of the sled.

“Ready, my saint – oy!”

The sled jerked forward suddenly and they lurched down the hill as laughter from Bain and Legolas followed them – the boys had ganged up to send their fathers on their way. Gods, this was a lot rougher than Bard remembered – every bump and bobble traveled up through the sled and into his body. That same little rise that had sent Bain careening was rushing towards them faster than he could steer, so up and over they went, drawing shouts from both of them. They managed to stay on the sled, but their extra weight sent them flying down to another series of little bumps, enough that both of them were laughing hysterically by the time they tried to navigate the sharp turn at the bottom. Bard stamped on the runners, just barely keeping them upright, but the snow was softer here, not yet packed down enough for swift sledding, and they upended in a flurry of arms and legs.

“Gods, you’re heavy!” Bard groaned, as Thran fell across his chest. “Get off!”
Thran was laughing so hard that he couldn’t roll off Bard.

“Come on, you oaf! You’ll crush me! Get off!”

By dint of much pushing, Bard managed to shove Thran off and sat up to regard his usually elegant and refined husband sprawled in the snow, laughing helplessly.

“Suka blyad, I have not had so much fun in a long time,” Thran wiped his eyes. “We are not very good sledders, perhaps.”

“The hell we aren’t.” Bard clambered to his feet, and stuck out a hand to pull Thran up. “We made it all the way down, didn’t we? Look how far we have to walk to get back up to the top.”

“It was you who told me that if we go down the hill under our own power, then we must go up the hill under our own power, too.”

“Sooner started is sooner ended, then,” Bard said, pounding Thran’s coat to clear some of the snow off. “Come on.”

They skirted the sledders to trudge back up the hill, waving to Bain and Legolas as they bounced by on their saucers with wild yells. The boys caught up to them halfway up to commandeer the sled, so Bard and Thran both carted a saucer up the rest of the way. By the time they reached the top, the boys were already hurtling down with Tilda between them, all three of them ululating in high voices. Bard found Sigrid with a group of school friends, so he pointed to the huddle of people around the fire barrel.

“Need to get warm?”

“I am very warm after such a hike, but now that I am here, I will likely feel the cold soon. So yes, let us enjoy the fire.”

A small figure detached himself from the throng, pulling a sled behind him. “Excuse me, are you Bard Bowman?”

Bard regarded the slight figure coming forward towards him. He was not a youth as Bard first assumed, only a small man, perhaps in his fifties. He was well bundled in a sturdy blue down coat, with a bright yellow scarf wrapped securely around his neck and ears. His hair was curly brown untouched by grey, and his face was youthful for all his age. Yellow mittens and blue earmuffs made him a cozy figure, and the inquiring look on his face was friendly.

“I am,” Bard nodded. “I’m sorry, you have the advantage of me.”

“My name is Baggins. Bilbo Baggins. I’m very pleased to meet you. And you are Thran Oropherson, then?”

Thran’s eyebrows went up, but he nodded graciously. “I am. I am pleased to meet you, Mr. Baggins.”

“Oh, please, I’d like it if you called me Bilbo. I feel as if I already know both of you, even though we’ve not met before. You cannot imagine how many people have been insisting that I meet you, and so here we are.”

Bard raked his memory. Something was familiar about Bilbo’s name... Ah, now he had it. “You don’t know Rosie Gamgee, do you?”
“Why, yes! Yes, I do!” Bilbo smiled warmly. “It’s my pleasure to be her artist’s representative. A wonderful artist, and such a sweet lady.”

“Ah!” Thran’s eyes lit up. “You are with Shire Hills, yes?”

“I am, yes!” Bilbo nodded, gratified that Thran had made the connection. His shrug was self-deprecating. “Well, actually, I am Shire Hills. My nephew, Frodo, and I are the principals.”

“Our meeting is very timely, then,” Thran looked at Bard. “I have asked Bard several times that he should call you about his return to his art. He is most talented, and I am sure he could benefit from discussions with you.”

“Oh, my, but that is most kind of you,” Bilbo smiled in appreciation. “Rosie has said the same thing to me.”

“And to me,” Bard finally found his tongue. “We’re not long back to Greenwood Dale on the Lake, Thran and I, and I don’t have my studio in shape yet.”

“That’s what Rosie told me. Not to worry, not to worry at all. I’d be very pleased to talk to you at your convenience — about your work, where you want to go with it, media, and so forth, and how I can best help you. Once you find your stride, I can help you arrange a show and so forth. Rosie’s told me you’re a sculptor in metal, and favor larger pieces, so I’d be glad to come out for a visit if you’d like.”

Bard found Thran’s grey eyes skewering his with a veiled but pleading look. “Please, lyubov moya? It does no harm to talk to Bilbo.”

“No, it doesn’t.” Bard conceded. What a contrast — yesterday, Thran was the one who didn’t want to discuss anything about Angelo, yet today, he all but pushed Bard into Bilbo’s arms. “It’s only fair to tell you that I don’t know how long it’ll be before I’m back fulltime at my metal, Bilbo. We live in a construction site at the moment, and I’ve got a bit more to do before that changes.”

“I understand completely,” Bilbo nodded. “But I would like to see the pieces you have, so I can think about how best to help you. I’d like to bring my Frodo with me, too. He’s just getting started in my business, so seeing how things go from the start with a new client would be very educational for him.”

“Of course. When might you have time to visit?”

“I should think Wednesday or Thursday would suit, if that fits with your schedule. Here —” Bilbo unzipped his coat, pulled off his mitten, and fished a business card out of his shirt pocket. “May I ask you to call the office tomorrow morning to set up a time to visit?”

“Of course. I’ll be glad to,” Bard nodded, taking the card. “I’m glad to meet you at last, Bilbo.”

“I’m glad to meet you, too.” Bilbo smiled as if he’d just gotten a special present. “Now, one more trip down the hill, I think, and then it’s off home and a good spot of tea for me. I’m glad to have met both of you, and I hope to see you again soon.”

With a friendly wave, Bilbo sat himself on his sled and launched himself down the hill with a wide grin on his face.

“What an interesting little man,” Thran commented, as Bilbo hurtled down the hill amid all the children.
Bard gave him a look. “An interesting little man into whose arms you all but pushed me. What happened to the suspicious Russian?”

Thran gave him an unconcerned shrug. “What is that idiom? The suspicious Russian has done his homework. I inquired about Shire Hills some time ago. The talented Mr. Nori had only excellent things to say about him. So of course I want to push my husband into such worthy arms. The sooner you go, the sooner you will be the artist you long to be.”

“You’re a meddler, but a cute one,” Bard teased.

He got another unconcerned shrug. “We both are. As you ask me to be indulgent when you meddle to care for me, so I ask you to be indulgent when I meddle to care for you.”

“A fair trade,” Bard nodded. “Do you want to go down the hill again?”

“Once more would be nice. I want to steer this time.”

They got the sled from the children, and set off again. It was a distinctly different experience, hurtling down the hill in front of Thran without any control of the sled. Bard whooped as they dodged other sledders, careened over bumps, and finally lurched to a more or less controlled stop.

“Yes! We improve!” Thran chortled, as he climbed off the sled. “We stayed upright this time.”

“That seems to miss the point,” Bard laughed.

“Leave the roll in the snow to the children. Ah, now for the long trek to the top again.”

Again, the boys retrieved the sled from then so they and Tilda could take another wild ride, and this time Bard and Thran were happy to warm their hands by the fire until the children were worn out. They piled back into the truck, stopping at the art supply store for Bard to pick up six pounds of plastilina modeling clay so he could start work on Rahmiel, and a tin of furniture stripper for Sigrid. They were on the way home when Thran’s mobile chimed.

“Irmo,” Bard and Thran chorused, laughing as Thran fished out his mobile. He nodded confirmation as he put the device to his ear.

“It’s not even one o’clock yet,” Bard murmured.

“Yes, Irmo,” Thran murmured. “No, we are not at the house, as you say. We have taken the children on an outing, and will return shortly. Have patience.”

Apparently Thran’s counsel was met with less than enthusiasm, for Thran rolled his eyes. “In good time, yes. We will be home shortly, yes. Yes, soon. Until then.”

He disconnected the mobile with a shake of the head.

“He seems very impatient, Papa,” Legolas ventured.

“Rude,” Sigrid muttered.

Bard privately shared his daughter’s opinion, but he gave her a look in the rear view mirror urging patience, so she didn’t say anything else. They were home in another couple of minutes, and there was Irmo pacing by his car.

“I will deal with him,” Thran said, as they pulled up.
“That’s fine,” Bard agreed. “Everyone, sled and the saucers into the barn, then boots and coats in the mudroom, then we’ll get lunch on the table. Thran, don’t let Irmo kidnap you to the ballroom before you’ve had a bowl of soup or something to help you last until supper.”

Thran hummed noncommittally, but the children murmured their agreement as they opened the door. Sure enough, as soon as they spilled out of the truck, Irmo tried to snare Thran. The children took care of the sledding things while Bard got the mudroom door open, then took Thran’s coat while Irmo talked nonstop. Thran led him off to the sitting room and quickly returned to the kitchen.

“I loosed him on our stack of CDs to think about what music we might use while I help with lunch. You are not supposed to help today.”

“Let it go, Thran. I’ll set up my clay in the solarium this afternoon, and I’ve got supper in good hand for the children to put in. So let’s get everyone fed, you included, and the children sorted, then Irmo can have you.”

Bard was relieved when Thran agreed, and as the children trooped in, they sorted out lunch. Tomorrow Bard would have to visit the market to restock, but there was enough soup for Thran, toasted peanut butter for Tilda and Legolas, and grilled cheese for Bain and Sigrid. Bard ate the last bit of chicken casserole that had come home from Rosie’s last night, and a couple of clementines. Irmo was too excited to come in for anything, instead content to peruse Bard’s old CDs. At length, Thran finished his soup and fruit, and disappeared with a wry expression into the ballroom with Irmo.

Everyone in the kitchen breathed a sigh of relief. With Irmo out of sight, the energy level of the room went down dramatically, and cleanup progressed without issue.

“I want everyone to do a quick tidy and clean of their rooms,” Bard asked. “Then two of you can tidy and clean your bathroom, and the other two can do the same for the sitting room. After that, you can do whatever you want until suppertime.”

“May I start stripping one of the chairs I want to take to the upholstery class?” Sigrid asked.

Bard nodded. “I’m setting up my clay in the solarium, so bring your chair down there so we can keep the mess contained.”

“I’d like to draw,” Tilda decided. “Maybe you can give me another lesson?”

“I’d like that, little doll,” Bard agreed. “We can do that in the solarium, too.”

“Can Bain and I play zombie apocalypse in the sitting room?” Legolas asked.

“Sounds like a plan,” Bard agreed. “So who’s helping in the bathroom, and who’s helping in the sitting room?”

“Legs and I call the sitting room,” Bain said quickly, drawing the girls’ protests.

“That’s okay, lasses,” Bard held up his hands. “Next week, you’ll do the sitting room, and the boys’ll do the bathroom, so the chores will balance out. So everyone head upstairs to brush your teeth, then let’s get started.”

“Okay, Da; all right, Bard,” the children chorused, and everyone separated. Bard dashed outside to the barn to fetch the portable workbench he used as a base when he built his small clay pieces, and the Lazy Susan he’d scavenged from the thrift store that let him turn the pieces this way and that. By the time the children appeared to get him to review their cleaning efforts, he had a drop cloth spread and a thin board atop the Lazy Susan, ready for clay. The boys settled in the sitting room, their intermittent laughter a soft undercurrent as Sigrid hauled her chair downstairs, and Tilda curled on the fainting couch with her sketchpad. As Sigrid upended her chair to sort out how to unscrew the upholstered seat from the frame, and Tilda turned to a fresh page in her sketchbook, Bard unwrapped the first of his blocks of plastilina and set it on the board.

As Bard set to work, he hoped that the atmosphere in the ballroom was as quietly satisfying as it was in the solarium, but it likely wasn’t.

Nothing about Irmo was quiet.
Chapter 66

Chapter Summary

Pity the angel who tries to keep a rogue meteor on course! Yes, it's Irmo in the ballroom, and a saint ends up there as well.

Chapter Notes

I don't own rights to "Hellboy - The Golden Army," or the Muppets. I just enjoy both of them :-).

Oy, suka blyad, how badly Thran wanted to swear! But should he swear in frustration at a devil, or swear fealty to a divine, if possessed, spirit? Irmo was both – endlessly capricious, darting from one thing to another with only tenuous focus, and yet inspired to create something fantastical and divine. Tracking after Irmo was almost impossible, for his thoughts flitted from one inspiration to another at the speed of light – it was like trying to make sense of a maddeningly cryptic oracle where ultimate truth was just out of reach. How did one know which thread to follow, when all of them held inspiration?

It was Chaos.

“No, no, no!” Thran barked, unable to stifle himself any longer as Irmo went off again. They’d been talking about the sequence of scenes that Thran and Bard had come up with, but Irmo careened off into the costume requirements for fifty dancers. When the choreographer looked up with utter fury at the interruption, Thran had mustered his most devastating Prince of Ice glare. “What have I said six times this afternoon, Irmo? Focus, focus, focus! You cannot expect this ballet to happen if you flit off in sixteen directions each moment! We will do one thing at a time, or we will get nowhere!”

“But there are so many things that need doing!” Irmo shouted back, hands clenching into fists. “How can you expect us to get all of those things done if we force ourselves to think of only one of them at a time?”

“It is true that we have many things to do. But we cannot do any of them if we do not follow through any of them!”

“Then what do you suggest we do, then?” Irmo retorted, hands on his hips.

“We will get someone who is skilled at dictation, and he will follow you about to write down all the things you say, especially those that are not about the topic at hand, and we will organize them, and delegate them accordingly,” Thran said, just as emphatically. “Today, we may not capture each gem as you mine it, Irmo. But given how early we are in this process, we will not lose much. Today, mon ami, let us agree on the scenes in our ballet, and determine how many roles we have, and decide the character of those roles as we can. And nothing more.”

Irmo’s irritation was gone as quickly as it appeared, and he rubbed his chin thoughtfully. Putting his head to one side, he nodded. “That is a good idea. Yes, I like that. I like that very much. If we capture an idea, then I can let it go, because we can come back to it.”

“I will see to it. We will have someone soon,” Thran agreed. “So, the list of scenes?”

“Yes, yes, back to that.” Irmo picked up the list that he’d left on the garden table. “I think your husband is a wise man, to suggest that this be a succinct ballet. Three acts, but compact ones.

“Act One begins with the first battle; full corps. Death collects the souls of the fallen, solo dance. The Maid searches for the Soldier, finds him, and Death must retreat, principle dancers with selected corps. The Soldier and Maid dance their devotion, pas de deux. The second battle rages, full corps. The Soldier dies, and Death collects his soul, pas de deux. Death brings him to the Underworld, corps with principals. The Maid pursues, but the formidable gates to the Underworld separate them. End of Act One.”

“So we leave the audience to contemplate the enormity of the tragedy that has befallen our lovers,” Thran nodded, scribbling quickly to capture Irmo’s flow.

“Exactly! The Maid will collapse in wild grief in front of the gates – a most dramatic endpoint.”

“Now, Act Two.”

“Yes. Here we open the gates to reveal the Underworld – the entire corps. Death presides as he leads the Soldier around, pas de deux with corps. The Soldier wanders as he tries to find his place among the Dead, solo with corps; but all he sees is the Maid in his dreams, pas de deux with corps. Above, the Maid grieves, but all she sees is the Soldier in her dreams, solo and pas de deux. She travels to the Underworld to make her petition for the return of her Soldier, solo with selected corps as she travels, then full corps and principals. Death agrees, and so the Soldier and the Maid trade places, pas de trois and corps. Once again, we end with the gates to the Underworld separating the Maid and the Soldier.

“Finally, Act Three. We reveal Death in his palace as he tries to woo the Maid, pas de deux, but she sees only her Soldier, pas de trois. Above, the Soldier grieves in his turn, solo, but sees only the Maid in his dreams, pas de deux. He returns to the Underworld to make his petition, full corps and principals. Death refuses, the Soldier takes his life, Death takes his soul, and banishes the Maid, full corps and principals. As the gates close once more, the Maid takes her life, and the gates fall open. Maid and Soldier dance together despite all Death does to distract them, pas de trois with full corps. Death falls. The Maid and Soldier become stars in the sky, pas de deux. End.”

“Yes,” Thran nodded, scribbling the last bit. “Yes. That is it. Three acts, more than I thought, but they are compact, and I like the symmetry of ending all of them at the gates of the Underworld.”

“I do, as well. Now, the roles.”

“Death, the Maid, the Soldier; we know these,” Thran supplied. “We know the characteristics of each, as well. So the corps will be soldiers in Act One, and those who comb the battlefield for the wounded. In Acts Two and Three, the corps will be the denizens of the Underworld, with a few to act as the living whom the Maid and Soldier pass on the path to the Underworld.”

“All minor characters, but we can do much to make them individuals with costume,” Irmo mused. “Once we have the corps assembled, the dancers can do much to help flesh out their characters. Perhaps one soldier is superstitious, and always makes a ritual before battle. In the Underworld... so many possibilities! Rich men, criminals, saints, children, mothers, whores, the sick, the gluttonous —”
“I think that is a most worthy assignment for you to address in the next several days,” Thran said firmly. “Make a list of Underworld characters.”

“I will, I will,” Irmo nodded vigorously. “Yes, yes, that will give me something to think about.”

“Bard suggested Hieronymus Bosch paintings as one source of inspiration.”

“Oh, yes! That is a good idea!”

“The other suggestion he made was to view scenes of a troll market from a film.”

Irmo perked up. “A troll market? What is this?”

“I have not seen it myself. But Bard has this film, and we can look at it now.”

“Yes, yes!” Irmo nodded. “Let us look!”

Thran led the way back to the sitting room, where Legolas and Bain were giggling over their messy zombie apocalypse game.

“Excuse our interruption, but Bain, do you know this Hellboy film with the troll market?” Thran asked.

“‘The Golden Army?’” Bain asked. “Sure, we have it. Would you like me to find it?”

“I would appreciate it,” Thran nodded. “And if we may borrow the TV long enough to see this troll market, I would appreciate that, too.”

“I’ll pause the game,” Legolas told Bain. “You find the DVD.”

Bain rummaged through the DVDs, finally coming up with the case. “Here it is. Did you switch the input, Legs?”

“I did,” the boy nodded. “Put it in.”

Bain got the DVD up and running, and navigated to the scene that Thran wanted to see. As the scene played out, Bard came from the solarium to see what they looked at.

“The troll market,” Bard grinned. “That’s my favorite part of the film. You have to pause it to get the full effect – it’s so detailed and it all goes by so fast. So many different characters, different costumes, little dramas going on at the edges of the scene. The architecture, the implied trade structures... just everything.”

“This is fascinating!” Irmo exclaimed, all eyes as the scene unfolded. “I see why you mentioned this, Bard. Not so much for the look, perhaps, but the level of detail.”

Bard nodded. “Exactly. I thought of the Underworld as a place that had existed for uncounted mortal lifetimes, with little enclaves, little sub societies, all entrenched through the ages. It has its own society that’s partly like the world above, and partly not, but all very old because the Underworld denizens don’t pass on.”

“Exactly, exactly!” Irmo agreed. “May I borrow this to consider?”

“Sure,” Bard nodded.

“Think of this...” Irmo said, his eyes gazing at some far-off point. Thran recognized the light in the choreographer’s eyes as particularly inspired, so he hastily cleared a space on the battered fruit crate coffee table for him to put his paper, so he was ready to write whatever Irmo came up with.

“This tale will show the human world, the battlefield, as a stark, almost bare set, all in shades of grey and black and red, the colors of war. Only the Underworld will be a full set. It will have color, life, but in dark, rich colors, like jewels in twilight and firelight. It will reflect how Death characterizes our world – short, shallow, brutal, transitory, one-dimensional. Only the Underworld has depth and complexity. The costumes of the mortals will be little more than comic book caricatures while the characters are alive, but become more layered and detailed when they pass into the underworld. There will be lights in the costumes that show life, and then reveal the change from life to death even as the rest of the costume becomes more nuanced. Death has a fantastical costume and is so much physically bigger than the Maid and the Soldier, but he will not have that life, but something much older, much more hidden. He will glow brightest in the Underworld, but even that will not have the same intensity as the glow of the living.”

Thran scribbled madly, trying to get all of this down, but he caught a fractured look from Bard. His husband wasn’t sure if Irmo was a madman or a shaman – the same reaction Irmo aroused in everyone he met – but Bard recognized that something was there. Irmo shook himself out of his reverie only to sharpen his gaze on Bard.

“Are you strong enough to pick Thran up?”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “Yes.”

“Show me.”

When Thran stood up, his husband hefted him around the waist to pick him off his feet.

“No, absolutely, no!” Irmo snorted in exasperation. “He is not a sack of grain, Bard! Not a mere weight to be toted from one place to another! He is – oh, there is not room to do it justice here. To the ballroom!”

Irmo turned on his heel and charged off. As Bard set Thran down, Thran gave his husband a pat on the arm. “Is it convenient to stop whatever you pursued before you came in here?”

Bard chuckled. “I’ll wash the clay off my hands, but yes, I can stop. I’ll tell Sig and Til, and then report for duty.”

Thran’s snicker matched his husband’s. “Thank you. And thank both of you, Legolas and Bain, for your kindness to interrupt your game. Let the zombie apocalypse resume.”

The boys exchanged looks of suppressed glee. “He’s very intense, Papa.”

“Yes, Legolas,” Thran nodded, “he is. But he is also very brilliant, and so we cope.”

Thran padded after Irmo, who awaited him impatiently in the ballroom. He launched into a tangled explanation of the difference between the spirits of the dead and that of Death himself, and how when mortals were alive they burned so much brighter than did Death, but after they died Death’s low glow was the brightest thing in the Underground. Bard arrived in the middle of this, sock footed, hands thrust in his front jeans pockets. Irmo skewered him with another sharp look, which Bard endured without rancor or affront; his husband’s expression revealed only interest.

“Now! I will teach you how to properly lift a dancer,” Irmo said without preamble. “Come, come! Presage lift. Bard, you stand here. Thran comes before you in arabesque. You put one hand at the waist, the other below the raised leg, and straight up. Yes, up! Up!”
Bard winked at Thran, perhaps thinking of when Thran had taught him to do a fish dive. “I’ll make sure Thran’s comfortable with my position before I lift him. Thran?”

Thran backed off two steps. “I take two steps to you, and come into arabesque, and you place your hands. We try that first.”

He took the steps forward, and as his back leg lifted, Bard placed his hands into position.

“A little higher on my waist, under the ribs. Yes, there. And a little closer to the knee with the other hand. I am tall, and that will offer more stability for us both. Let us do it again.”

Irmo waited impatiently as they made two more tries, but Thran ignored him. It was his husband who lifted him, not a trained dancer, and he who would be lifted; he did not want to hurt either of them, or force Bard to bear the guilt of hurting him. Taking their time assured them both that Bard had mastered the move.

“Yes. This time, we lift,” Thran told Bard, who nodded assent. “I come two steps to you, you place your hands, and then you lift straight up. If it is too much weight, or if we are unbalanced, do not go up very high, so that I do not come down awkwardly for either of us. Go up, hold for only a second or two, then come down as smoothly as you can.”

“Okay. Ready?”

“Ready.”

“On four, then. One, two, three, four…”

Two steps. Into arabesque. Place the hands. Lift...

Thran kept his body balanced and firm; the hands on his waist and leg were steady. Bard must have been working on his chin-ups, for he didn’t tremble while he held Thran. It was rare that Thran found himself aloft during a dance; while there were roles that included a lift for the male dancer, Thran had not danced any of them since he’d gained his full height. Just as had happened the other times Bard had lifted him, arousal rushed through him, even as focused as he was on the dance. He forced that aside as Bard brought him down again. Oh, if Bard knew that lifting him off the earth affected him even more profoundly than he’d revealed...

Down to the earth again.

“Yes, yes! You have it. Now, down the ballroom. Two steps into arabesque, lift, two steps aloft, then down. Two steps together, into arabesque, and so on – you can do this?”

“So the same thing, one after the other?” Bard asked.

“Yes,” Thran confirmed. “Let us walk through this without the lift. Take off your socks so that you do not slide as we move.”

Bard pulled off his socks, and Thran led him through the sequence slowly. “So, it is a count of four. On the first two, I take the two steps to you, arabesque, and you place your hands. On the second two, you lift, take two steps with me aloft, and lower. Then we are back to the beginning.”

“Yes, I see. Two steps, arabesque, hands. Lift, two steps, down. Two steps, arabesque, hands. Lift, two steps, down. And repeat.”

“Yes. You are a quick study, lyubov moya. So this time, we add the lift. Low at first, to find the flow, and to save the strength. On four.”

“Ready.”

Thran counted slowly as they went through the steps, Bard counting softly with him. When they’d gone the length of the ballroom, they turned and retraced their steps, this time a bit faster, a bit higher.

“Again! Faster!” Irmo said excitedly.

Thran gave Bard a quick look to see if he were tired of heaving a heavy dancer up and down, but Bard grinned, signaling his willingness.

“What is he looking for, cariad?” he asked, not bothering to hide his question from Irmo.

“I have no idea, but I enjoy this dance with you, so long as you are not tired.” Thran looked at Irmo.

“What do you look for, mon ami, so that we make the best use of Bard’s patience and his strength?”

“Is it not obvious?” Irmo’s eyebrows went up. “I want to see Death fly.”

Bard grinned. “Of course, angel. I should have realized. Come on, let’s see if I can make you look like you have wings.”

“Wings?” Irmo latched onto that. “Wings! Of course! Come, come, down the ballroom once more as you have, then we will try something else.”

“Okay, I’ll give it my best speed,” Bard said. “But not enough to send Thran crashing.”

They came quickly down the ballroom as fast as Bard could manage, but whatever Irmo was looking for, he didn’t find it. He asked if Bard could hold Thran aloft for longer, so they tried that until Bard trembled as he held Thran.

“That is enough for now, Irmo,” Thran said finally, when Bard struggled to set him down without a thump. “We have worn out Death’s chariot.”

“I do not look for his chariot. I look for his wings.” Irmo threw up his hands in frustration, then clasped his hands at the base of his neck and pressed his arms against the sides of his head as he walked to the windows behind the garden benches. Thran winced as he stood in the middle of the white furry rug that was the sole reminder of the rendezvous he and Bard had made here at midnight. A glance at Bard revealed the same impression on his husband’s face. As soon as Bard finished their bedroom, they would haul the rug upstairs, never to suffer oblivious tramplings by choreographers again. But Irmo turned back to them, an inward look on his face.

“Death cannot be carried. He must fly under his own power.”

“On wings, ideally, and that is how it must appear. So we must use a flying harness.”

Thran winced. On top of everything else was now added the cost of a venue that could support such complex rigging, and riggers, and safety inspections...

As Irmo ran after his muse to monologue about aerial acrobatics and adagio ballets and Cirque du Soleil, Thran had more sympathy with Bard’s worries over money.
Bard’s arms were aching by the time Irmo had the idea of flying Death onto the stage like a circus acrobat. It was a stunning idea, but was it feasible? Wouldn’t it call for special equipment? And how safe would it be for Thran? He glanced at his husband, but he looked harried enough without Bard adding to it, so Bard decided to hold his silence. He’d have time to bring it up later, once Irmo was gone. In fact, this might be so impractical that it’d be dismissed without him ever having to voice his concern. A rustle behind him showed Tilda and Sigrid watching quietly from the door, so he left Irmo to Thran and went to join his children.

“That was amazing, Da,” Sigrid whispered, and Tilda nodded agreement.

“My arms think so, too,” he winked wryly. “What’s up?”

“It’s going on four,” Sigrid replied. “When does the lamb roast have to go in?”

“Right now, or as soon as the oven preheats. Four-seventy-five, put in the roast, let it go fifteen minutes, then down to three-fifty. Set the timer for two hours. Put the potatoes in when there’s an hour and a half to go. Green beans go on when there’s twenty-five minutes to go.”

“Got it,” Sigrid nodded. "How long is Ada going to make Irmo go? He’s intense.”

“It’s kind of the other way around, sweetness,” Bard explained. “Irmo’s like that mechanical rabbit in the battery commercials, and the rest of us just try to keep up. I’ll urge Thran to call an end to it in another hour.”

“Do you want me to cover up your clay?” Tilda piped up. “So it won’t dry out?”

“This kind doesn’t dry out, little doll, but thank you for thinking about it. I hope I’ll be back to it in a few minutes.”

“Okay, Da. Sigrid and I will get the supper started.”

“Thanks, you two.”

After the girls disappeared, Bard turned back to Thran patiently trying to follow Irmo’s impassioned discussion about costume fabric.

“That is a topic for another day, Irmo, when we have Rada Brown with us,” Thran said firmly. “Now we have done enough for today, at least until we have more of the legalities sorted. You work on the characters for the Underworld, the enclaves, the societies. You have Bard’s DVD to look at, and the Internet will provide you many of the Bosch paintings to consider.”

“Yes, yes, the Underworld,” Irmo agreed, letting Thran escort him from the ballroom to the center hall. “Hieronymus Bosch, and the troll market. Both offer so many ideas!”

“Try to write them down as they come to you, Irmo,” Thran coaxed, fetching Irmo’s coat. “I expect that Abebe and Lettie will contact me tomorrow, and we will proceed with our negotiations. As much work as you can make to define the characters and devise the dances for them, the faster we can bring this into being.”

“Of course, of course,” Irmo nodded. He glanced at Bard offering the Hellboy DVD, nodded as he took it, and then offered the same gesture to Thran before walking outside. He was already lost in thought before he reached his car.

Thran shut the door and leaned against it with a huge sigh, drawing Bard’s sympathetic chuckle.

“He’s like Lord Shiva of the Dance,” Bard shook his head. “Creating and destroying all at the same time.”

“And most of the time, it is hard to know which part is which,” Thran shut his eyes. “The first thing I do tomorrow is call Mr. Nori. I need his younger brother.”

“What, are you going to put a contract out on Irmo?” Bard teased, as they walked back to the kitchen.

“As much as I would like to, I am not yet ready to end our problems so simply,” Thran rubbed his forehead. “I need Ori to translate the oracle that is Irmo. Ori excels at the collection of scattered, fragmented, and contradictory data, from which he conjures order. I will pay him to write down all that Irmo says, categorize it, organize it, and delegate it. That way, the oracle can scatter his pearls for Ori to collect, and I will keep him on the path to make the choreography. We have the story, we will soon have all of the characters. We have ideas of the set and costumes. As those develop, Irmo will have less to distract him, and we will have the steps. Then Abebe the ballet master can help with the casting and rehearsal, and again, there will be less distraction.”

Bard rubbed Thran’s back in consolation. “You make it sound simple, but I’m sure it won’t be. But we’ll get there. It was fun to dance with you, though.”

Thran’s smile was unforced, relaxing some of his tension. “I enjoyed it, too. Oh, I smell the first aroma of supper! Sigrid and Tilda, you have kept your Da out of the kitchen, then?”

The girls nodded proudly. “We’re doing the food tonight, and the boys are doing the cleanup,” Tilda said. “But we have a long time before supper.”

“That, I do not mind,” Thran assured them. “I am tired from our sledding and so many wrangles, if not the dance. I hope you had a more relaxing afternoon.”

“I got two of the study chairs stripped,” Sigrid reported. “It wasn’t as messy as I thought it would be, and the stripped wood is a nicer color than that gooey brown treacle finish.”

“Da showed me how to draw maquettes, and I did a bunch of those,” Tilda said. “It’s sort of like drawing comics, where the maquettes are the people in the comics. And Da played with his clay all afternoon!”

“Did you?” Thran turned to Bard with an expectant smile. “I would like to see.”

“Sure,” Bard nodded. “I’ve got a good start on Rahmiel. See what you think.”

Bard led the way into the solarium, which had taken on a definite air of art studio rather than tropical oasis. Sigrid’s two chairs were against the wall, with the third one nearby, offering a contrast of what all of them had looked like before Sigrid had set to with stripper, rags, and extra fine grade steel wool. One was already glued and clamped, soon to be ready for its new upholstery. The second was stripped. Tilda’s drawings were scattered around the fainting couch. In the corner by the window was his clay stand and stool, and he was gratified when Thran went to it at once, humming in excitement.

“You have gotten so far already!” he exclaimed. “The angel is in place, and the details emerge. How is it balanced? Only one foot on the base, and the rest in the air above? It defies gravity!”
“There’s a wire armature inside the figure,” Bard explained, pointing to the wires that extended from the foot. “The armature distributes the weight of the figure to the base. Right now they’re just clamped down, but in the final piece they’ll be embedded in the base so you won’t see them, and it’ll seem like Rahmiel is suspended above the base, all but that one toe.”

“Incredible,” Thran walked around the piece to see it from different angles. “You tell me how it is done, and still it looks like magic. And the figure is already so detailed. No wings yet? Do they come later?”

“I... had this idea to try something different with the wings,” Bard ran his hand through his hair. “I got it when I was in the craft store today. There was this package of feathers and some kids’ feather boas, and I wondered... what if I made wings something like what people wear as Halloween costumes, on a frame, like real birds’ wings? And instead of sculpting the hair, I want to experiment with some very light fibers, like some of those boas, so that the hair would float upwards. It’d move with every little air current, and it’d seem more alive.”

“I think that sounds amazing,” Sigrid breathed. “I’ve never heard of anyone mixing a cast metal figure with real feathered wings and hair. It’d be wonderful!”

“I think so, too,” Thran nodded vigorously. “Perhaps I can speak to Rada Brown, the costumier, about frames for the wings, and who can help you learn to make them.”

“You could look at the Muppets, too, Da!” Tilda exclaimed. “Some of them have really floofy hair. Maybe you could use the same floofy stuff for your angel’s hair.”

Bard nodded, gratified at his family’s enthusiasm. “I hadn’t thought about the Muppets, little doll. That’s a good pointer. And help on how to make a lightweight frame for the wings would be great, Thran. Thank you, both.”

“Welcome,” Tilda smiled. She gathered up some of her drawings. “See, Ada? Da showed me how to build maquettes out of lines and balls and boxes, and once you get the pose you want, then you smooth out the edges and erase the lines in the middle, and you have a figure.”

“This is wonderful, too, Kukla,” Thran took one of the sheets Tilda handed him. “You are only ten? These look very good for one so young.”

“I want to practice a lot, especially this summer,” Tilda explained. “I told Da about it already, but not you. The art classes at our school aren’t by grade, but by how good you are and what you’ve already learned. So if I practice a lot, maybe I can go into the classes for more than basic things sooner. I’d like to learn to paint like Mam, or do sculpture like Da. They have ceramics and textiles and other stuff, too.”

“You are well on your way, Russkaya Kukla,” Thran replied.

“She is,” Bard said proudly. “I didn’t have to show her much. You’ll have to practice a lot more, little doll, but I can already see how much better you’ve gotten with just an afternoon’s practice.”

“So our house has become its own artists' colony,” Thran teased. “That is exciting! Now, I am sweaty and worn out from trying to chase a meteor named Irmo. I will bathe now so that I do not ruin the nice aroma of lamb as it roasts.”

“We’re out of light in here, so I’ll lay a good fire for us in the sitting room, so we can enjoy it after supper,” Bard decided. “We’ll pry the boys out of their zombie apocalypse, and get ready for the new week.”
Thran headed upstairs, Tilda and Sigrid went back to preparing supper, and Bard rousted Bain and Legolas to help him fetch wood for the fireplace. Before long, Thran returned much refreshed, and supper was soon on the table. The girls had made an excellent meal, and the boys didn’t fuss when the time came for them to clean up. Bard retired to the sitting room with his husband, tea, and a little chocolate. He lit the fire, Legolas opened Harry Potter to read, the family settled to hear the tale, and the evening wound down to a serene close.

Bard savored the momentary calm. Surely not every round of dealing with a possessed choreographer would end so peacefully.
Chapter 67

Chapter Summary

A saint practices a little bedtime sketching, which earns him a reward from an angel. Later, while the saint reclaims another room from neglect and disrepair, the angel has only sore ears to show for the day's labors.

Bard climbed into bed with some reluctance. It had nothing to do with the hour – just after eleven – or weariness – snowball fights, sledding, and ballet had left him well exercised – or the company – Thran was already ensconced under the covers, waiting for him. Despite the excitement and exertion that had filled the day, though, his brain still raced.

First, he was back at work. He could call himself an artist again.

Second, his muse was still with him, and she was impatient – just consider all the ideas that flooded him! Feathered wings, textile hair, and cast metal figure... the parts identical in color but with tactile differences... so many ways to turn Rahmiel from a routine metal sculpture into something more. It would be hard to sleep tonight with his head full of possibilities, logistics, construction...

“You are distracted, svyatoy moy,” Thran observed quietly. His long, elegant hand reached out to stroke Bard’s hair.

“I am,” Bard admitted, smiling. “When you dance, do you ever get caught up in what you’re creating, maybe think about how to change the steps just a little to reveal more of your character’s intent, his motives?”

Thran closed his book – no, not a book, but the sketchbook that Bard had used in their game of sexual vampire and dodgy artist. He turned on his side, propping his head up on his hand to regard Bard. “So often, yes. The role takes me, even after dancing it and it alone all day. It becomes a presence, like a close friend who stands beside me and speaks of many things. Sometimes it is hard to sleep when that presence is so strong. Rahmiel is strong with you tonight, then?”

Bard mirrored Thran’s position, and took up the end of Thran’s braid to twine it between his fingers. “It’s the muse who’s strong with me tonight. Rahmiel’s not formed enough yet, but he will be before I’m done with him. Right now, it’s the muse.”

“Is your muse male, or female?”

“I sometimes get a vague sense that she’s female. I don’t know why. Maybe because the female gives birth to creation, not the male.”

Thran hummed acknowledgement. “I half imagined your muse would be Hephaestus.”

Bard chuckled. “The Greek god of sculptors and metal? He’d be a good muse. I’ll let that roll around upstairs with everything else, and see what he or she thinks.”

“What does your muse send you tonight?”

“Oh, so many things. Wings made of feathers... that really excites me. Bronze can take a dark finish, and if I managed black feathers with the same slightly golden underglow... hair that floats on the air... the angle of the wings so they’re at full extension, just before they curve to backwing... Imagine what a life-sized one would look like.” Bard shut his eyes. “Too many visions.”

“Perhaps you should get up and draw some of your visions,” Thran suggested. “If you cannot sleep, at least you can channel what the muse gives you.”

“You and the children need breakfast and lunch tomorrow morning. And I’m going to finish this room so that we’re not living in a construction site. I won’t do the closet now, so I can start on the ballroom, because you’ll need it soon. I need to find out what to do to the floor so that it’s suitable for you to dance on it.”

“You are pulled in many directions,” Thran stroked Bard’s arm.

“So are you. I’m sure you’ve got a thousand things to think about with the ballet, too.”

Thran sighed. “I do, but my flood of thoughts is not so enjoyable as yours at the moment. Many, many headaches still. There is no contract, no agreement. The direction remains in limbo until we have a contract. I trust Lettie Johnson, but we cannot call upon her fully until we have the contract. At least finding someone to channel the geyser that is Irmo will help. There may be days of more negotiating ahead.”

“Sounds like we both need a distraction.”

Thran rolled over to pull Bard’s sketchbook between them. “That is why I looked at our book, to marvel at your skill, and also to savor the souvenirs of our game. I still want a picture of the artist as he stakes the vampire to the wall.”

Bard grinned at the clear relish that suffused Thran’s low voice. He propped the pillows against the headboard and sat up against them, drawing Thran to his side. As he opened the sketchbook to the first blank page, he asked, “I don’t suppose you hid a pencil or two under the bed with this, did you?”

“I was afraid they would break during our more... energetic moments,” Thran smirked. “There are two in the drawer of your night stand. A small sharpener that I found in the children’s box of home school supplies. And an eraser, though you seem to have little need for that.”

“Thoughtful of you.” Bard found the pencils, and Thran curled closer to watch as Bard considered the blank page. He sketched the corner of the artist’s garret with its heavy mirror that oversaw so many furtive liaisons canted at a subtly unbalanced angle. He filled in the background, a corner of the narrow bed with its limp sheet dragging on the floor, a scarred leg of the chair to the other side, the edge of a discarded boot beside the chair. The reflection was next, but only three quarters of it, as if the person viewing the sketch was as much voyeur as the artist reflected in the mirror. Bard made it brutal, the bare back of the artist and his heavy jeans and boots in dark shadows and heavy lines, and the naked angel he pinned against the wall the only lightness in the sketch. It would have been rape, but for the look of rapture on the angel’s face, and how closely he held the artist.

“Maybe not the best thing to put in your pillow book,” Bard exhaled as he shaded the sketch.

“Unsettling,” Thran agreed. “Call it ‘Dark Ecstasy.’ Whether the artist reaches above his station, or the angel below his, the title still applies.”

“I can take it out and make you another one,” Bard offered.

“Leave it. It is masterfully done. The uneasy angles; only the partial view, as if it were something come upon unexpectedly, or perhaps in stealth; the darkness surrounding the light; the passion of both, whether licit or not... I would miss it if you took it out.”

“I’ll do you another one, without so much menace in it,” Bard offered, turning the page. This time, he sketched the two of them on his old bed, entangled side by side in passion. Bard lay with his back to the viewer, while Thran’s elegant back was reflected in the mirror. Bard emphasized the contrasts in their bodies; his heavier back muscles were starkly delineated in the moody candlelight, and the curves of Thran’s more refined glutes and shoulders were seductive caresses.

“You draw the multiple viewpoints so beautifully,” Thran breathed, stroking Bard’s knee as he watched.

Bard pressed a kiss on Thran’s hair as he turned the page. “One more. Just a study.”

In a few swift lines, the sensuous curve of Thran’s glute appeared, then the more angular lines of Bard’s heavier hand cupping that glute, dark fingers pressing the pale flesh underneath them in pleading urgency. Thran growled low in his throat as that one appeared on the page.

“This one is the most erotic one of the three. It shows so little, yet reveals everything. Oh, lyubov moya, it is nothing but a flame.”

The body of the angel beside Bard flushed with heat, and silver grey eyes turned intent. “Mmm, angel. Did that last one get you a little hot and bothered?”

“Put your pencils away, and I will show you how hot and bothered that last one got me.”

Thran ogled their book one more moment before he stashed it under the bed. Bard put his pencils away, then held up the tube of lubricant. “Do I need this?”

Thran took the tube and slipped it under the pillow. When he straddled Bard, he put Bard’s hand on his glute, just as Bard had just drawn. Leaning forward, elbows on the bed beside Bard’s head, hands in Bard’s hair, he brushed a kiss on Bard’s lips. “Perhaps not. But I will.”

After Thran made thorough use of the lubricant, then the body beneath his, Bard had good reason to shut his eyes in exhaustion. Even better, his muse had retreated enough that he’d soon fall asleep without problem. He gratefully snuggled into Thran’s embrace, relieved that his visions were content to wait until tomorrow for his attention.

Even the dozen sketches that came to mind during their dalliance would wait.

* * *

Another Monday morning arrived. Bard rolled out of bed with Thran, made breakfasts, made lunches, ushered children off to the bus stop. Bard headed upstairs to resume his painting, sending Thran off to the ballroom for his barre and yoga with a kiss. Mindful of the floor, he eased the bed away from the wall, draped his drop cloths, and set to, base molding first. He painted steadily, the windows and doorframes after the base molding, then the crown molding. By the time he was through once, enough time had passed that he could start the second coat, so around the base molding he went again. He got the doorframes and one of the windows done before his stomach growled so much he could no longer ignore it. It was already after noon, so he capped his paint and took the brush downstairs to wash it. Thran’s voice came from the sitting room, so he was in the middle of one call or another. As he ducked into the fridge to scrounge for lunch, he realized that he’d have to get to the market tomorrow to restock. There wasn’t much left for supper, not even pasta. He mixed up dough for pizza and let it begin its rising in the warming oven. Once that was done, he stuck his head in the sitting room, looking an inquiry at Thran.

“Lunch?” he asked quietly.

Thran’s expression was long-suffering as he pointed to his mobile, then mimicked a blathering puppet with his hand. Bard smirked in sympathy.

“I’ll bring you a plate.”

Thran nodded gratefully, so Bard pulled out the bin of chicken breast, and enough veg to give Thran a selection. There were two pieces of chicken left; Bard put one back in the fridge in case Thran wanted that rather than pizza for supper, and the other in the microwave. While the chicken warmed, he chopped up the veg, put on the teakettle, and got a big bowl for Thran’s lunch that he could cradle on his lap and eat without spilling food everywhere. The chicken was hot, and it went in slices on one side of the bowl, beside the veg with the lemon juice that Thran used as dressing. Tea went into the pot, and soon Bard carried the filled bowl, a fork and cup, and the brewing teapot into the sitting room. He set the teapot down beside the mug, and handed Thran his fork and bowl. Thran gave him a big smile of appreciation, then blew him a kiss. Chuckling, Bard went back to the kitchen to see what he could make for his lunch.

He ended up grazing more than anything else – the remaining two slices of leftover lamb, a leftover apple, a bit of cheese, a carrot. He was still hungry, so nuked a potato, slathered it with plain yogurt and chives, and made a pot of tea for himself. He carried the teapot and a mug upstairs with him, and set to the last of the woodwork.

Another hour and a half later, the last of the woodwork was done. He was pleased at how good it looked with the subtly mottled blue walls. A little stenciling would put the finishing touch on things, but that would have to wait. The next order of business was the floor, so out came the steel wool and mineral spirits.

Without his crew of five helpers, this floor went much more slowly. It was bigger by far than the others on this level, as well, and took almost all of the rest of the afternoon to strip off the dirt and old wax. The only consolation was how much better the cleaned sections looked, especially the inlaid design around the perimeter of the room. He just managed to finish the cleaning when the children came home. As they clattered in from the mudroom, he went down to greet them.

“Welcome home, children!” he heralded. “How was school today?”

The children replied with varying degrees of enthusiasm – Bard and Legolas had a difficult math assignment, Tilda had new French words, and Sigrid was happy about doing well on trigonometry and government tests.

“Where’s Papa?” Legolas asked. “Is he still in the ballroom?”

“Your poor Papa has been stuck to his mobile in the sitting room most of the day. If he’s not still there, then he must be in the ballroom.”

“I’ll go look.” Legolas scampered off.

“I have good news and I have bad news,” Bard told the other children. “Which do you want first?”

“Good news,” Tilda decided.
“Yeah, Da,” Bain echoed. “Good news.”

“The good news is that we’re having pizza for supper. We missed it yesterday with the sledding, and the cupboard’s just about bare besides, so pizza it is."

“What’s the bad news?” Sigrid asked, taking a slice of cheese from the plate Tilda had arranged.

“I need help on the floor upstairs.” The children groaned. “But even that’s not so bad. I’ve done all the cleaning. Only the paste wax is left. It won’t take very long to do that if I have help.”

“That’s not so bad at all,” Tilda agreed. “The mineral spirits smell funny, but I like the way the wax smells. And it’s a lot easier to put on.”

“That’s no lie,” Bain agreed, as Legolas reappeared. “Did you find your Papa, Legs?”

“He’s in the ballroom,” Legolas confirmed, making a face. “He’s holding his mobile, doing pliés.”

“He’s been like that all day, I’m afraid,” Bard commiserated. “I hope he won’t be so tied up like that for too many more days. Once they settle about this ballet, then I’d think they’d talk less and dance more.”

“Pizza tonight, Legs!” Bain told Legolas. “But we have to help Da wax the floor upstairs first.”

“Okay,” Legolas looked at Bard, a torn expression on his face. “I hope it won’t take too long, Bard? I’m sorry, but I have a lot of homework tonight.”

“It just the waxing, and that should go quickly. Give me an hour, and then you can get to your studies. This’ll be the last time I’ll need all of you to help, I promise. It won’t matter if the other rooms take longer, because we don’t have to sleep in them.”

“Okay, thank you,” Legolas nodded. “So let’s go. Will there be pepperoni for the pizza?”

The children trooped upstairs to change their clothes, and Bard brought the plate of cheese and crackers and fruit bowl upstairs to sweeten their labors. Everyone set to with a will, and after an hour, most of the floor was waxed. Bard sent the children downstairs to set the table while he waxed the last bit, then ran a clean cloth over the whole floor to buff it to a shine. Done at last! He left the furniture as it was so that he could start supper. There would be time for him to put everything back in place after they ate.

“Thank you, all,” he said to the children when he got downstairs. “The floor’s done, it looks great, and that finishes our room. You’ll have your study back tomorrow.”

“Welcome,” went around the room.

“Okay, pizza. The dough’s in the warming tray. Do you want big pizzas, or individual ones?”

That prompted discussion, the upshot being that Legolas and Bain wanted one big one for the two of them with lots of pepperoni and onions, Tilda wanted her usual small cheese, and Sigrid was happy to make a big pepperoni and veg to share with Bard and Thran.

“We have a plan. You get started on patting out the dough, and I’ll see where Thran is.”

“Okay, Da; yes, Bard.”

Bard headed for the ballroom. Yes, the sound of voices revealed that Thran was still on his mobile. The device would surely need charging overnight after such a marathon. He came into the darkened room, finally locating Thran’s tall frame by the fireplace, one leg on the floor, the other propped up on the mantle in a split. One hand drew the upstretched leg against his chest; the other still held his mobile to his ear. Bard ventured close, but within Thran’s line of sight so he didn’t startle his husband.

As soon as Thran registered Bard’s presence, he held up a cautioning hand, so Bard stood still. Maybe the conversation was at a critical juncture?

“Yes, I agree. That is fine. Of course. And certainly, that is a good compromise.”

He listened a few seconds, rolling his eyes at Bard.

“That would suit quite well.”

More listening.

“I agree. Of course. That is where we will start tomorrow. So we are in agreement. Yes, it has been a long day of it, but I am pleased. Yes, I can meet with you as soon as the papers are drawn up so that we can move quickly. A most satisfying end to the day, to be sure. Of course. I appreciate your patience, as well. Until tomorrow, then. Goodbye.”

Thran took the mobile from his ear, ended the call, and then with a pointed jab, turned it off. Then he gave Bard a look of such utter exhaustion that Bard went to him and enfolded him in his arms.

“They’re done?”

Thran nodded.

“Did you get what you wanted?”

Another nod.

“Congratulations, angel. I know you’re exhausted, but I hope it was worth it.”

“It will be. Eventually.”

“Supper’s underway. Pizza, or chicken?”

A long sigh. “Tonight, I want pizza. I have earned it. So to hell with the chicken. But... with salad.”

“I will make you a salad,” Bard chuckled. “Pepperoni veg okay?”

“Perfect.”

“Come on, then,” Bard coaxed, urging Thran towards the kitchen. “Have a sit down while everything’s baking, and you’ll feel better.”

“I have been on my mobile since this morning,” Thran marveled. “Without end. I have pissed while on the mobile, I have shat while on the mobile, I have eaten while on the mobile. I have done hours of yoga and barre while on the mobile. Both of my ears are numb, and both of my arms are sore from holding the cursed device to my numb ears.”

“Hence the emphatic way you turned off the mobile,” Bard sympathized. “I hope you don’t have to turn it back on again until tomorrow.”

Thran’s shake of his head was emphatic. “Even if I did, I would not. My ears are too sore.”
“The bedroom’s finished. No more construction site.”

“I am glad that one of us accomplished something tangible today. All I did was to herd cats, push ropes, juggle limp noodles.”

“Papa!” Legolas brightened to see his father appear. “You are finally away from the mobile!”

“I am even happier about that than you are, synok,” Thran smiled a greeting, returning his son’s hug. “And we are to have pizza for supper.”

“You’re going to eat pizza?” Legolas blinked.

“I am,” Thran said firmly. “I have spent the day chained to my mobile, and now that I am free, I celebrate with pizza.”

“Yes!” Legolas gave his father a high five. “Bain, Tilda, Sigrid, we need lots more pepperoni.”

“Coming up,” Sigrid giggled. “Ada, you’re finally learning to eat like a member of the clan.”

“I have sacrificed enough today,” Thran agreed, washing his hands at the sink. “Here, Bard, I will chop the vegetables.”

As quick as it was to bake the pizzas, it took little longer to eat it. The clan traded news of the day as they ate and during cleanup, and soon the children settled to their homework. While they worked, Bard took Thran back into the ballroom to help him haul the furry white rug upstairs.

“Let us take it outside first, Bard,” Thran suggested. “We can shake out the dirt from Irmo’s shoes before we take it upstairs.”

“Good idea,” Bard agreed, as they hefted the rug. “We’ll have to take it onto the porch, though. The terrace is still snowy.”

“Suka blyad, this is heavy. I think we need the boys.”

“Girls, too,” Bard agreed as they hauled the rug through the main room and into the hall. “Legs? Bain? Sigrid? Tilda? Would you lend a hand, please?”

The boys and Sigrid came with Tilda trailing behind, so all six of them got the rug out onto the porch, shook it, then hauled it upstairs. As the children went back to their homework, Thran and Bard lifted the bed back into place, then laid down the rug. The dressers and other pieces stored in the children’s study resumed their usual positions, and the metamorphosis from construction site to bedroom was complete.

“Very nice,” Thran nodded. “The floor is much brighter, even in this dim light. It will look even better in daylight.”

“Just be careful in your socks. The floor’s a lot slipperier now that it’s cleaned and waxed.”

“So it is,” Thran said, giving it an experimental slide.

“If you want to shower and soak, I’ll handle homework duty.”

Thran shook his head. “I will change from my dance things into something more comfortable, but I want to be with my family now, even if it is only to scratch my head over the math our children do that I cannot.”
“That sounds good for me, too. It’ll be good to get out of my boots and jeans.”

In a few minutes, they were back downstairs in the sitting room, talking quietly while the children worked. Thran poured them small glasses of nalivka to savor. Tilda came in to ask Thran for help with her new French words, and Bain asked Sigrid a question about his math. Legolas asked if anyone knew how to spell apotheosis, to which Sigrid replied with the correct spelling.

“What does that word even mean?” Bard asked quietly, getting a mystified shrug from Thran.

“It means the raising of something to a divine state, or the best example of something,” Legolas called.

“Ah,” Bard nodded sagely. “Of course. So when you dance in this ballet you’re making, you will be the apotheosis of Death.”

Thran rolled his eyes. “No more talk of the ballet tonight, please. I have had enough of it.”

“I can imagine. But it’s all a done deal, now?”

Thran’s sigh was audible, but he nodded. “We are in agreement, and committed, and on our way. And may the gods smile upon us.”

Bard rubbed Thran’s thigh consolingly, but it took several seconds before Thran's expression relaxed into a smile. He hoped that wasn’t an ill omen.
Chapter 68

Chapter Summary

Both an angel and a saint find themselves negotiating for their futures.

“Do you know what I didn’t do today?” Bard murmured as he and Thran snuggled in bed.

“Hmm?”

“I forgot to call Shire Hills.”

Thran’s hand tightened on his shoulder. “You must not forget tomorrow. It is important that you hear what Bilbo has to say, for it might guide your efforts to resume your art.”

“I will.”

“Promise me, lyubov moy.”

“Promise. Once the children are off to school, I’ll head to the market, then come back here to work on the ballroom until Shire Hills opens at ten, then I’ll call.”

“The ballroom is very big. It will take a long time.”

Bard nodded. “It needs a lot of prep work – scrape and seal the walls, and strip all the woodwork. I hate to say it, but I’ll need to call in an expert for the decorative plaster, because I don’t have the expertise to repair it properly. I don’t know how long the plaster will take, or how much it’ll cost. I can do the rest myself, but it’ll take at least two weeks. And it needs three chandeliers.”

Thran was glad that the lights were off so that Bard didn’t see him grimace. After a day of negotiation about the hard financial facts of putting on a ballet, he didn’t need a reminder of another expensive undertaking.

“Were any in place when you bought the house?” Thran asked.

“The house had been stripped of the fancy bits before we bought it. The previous owner had money issues, so he’d sold the main room mantle, the chandeliers, the brass lamps.”

“That was cruel.”

“Aesthetically, it was. But Jerry thought selling the fancy bits would tide him over long enough that he could keep the house. But the cost of the lead paint abatement was a lot higher than he expected, and some of his other business dealings went bad, so he ended up selling the house anyway. It was another thing that let Daphne and me buy it so cheaply.”

“In that case, I understand. It must have been difficult for him. But I am glad you were able to buy such a beautiful house, despite all the work it needs. You have made an entire floor of it beautiful again, and the rest will soon follow.”

“I hope so. I’ll try to track down a plaster expert tomorrow. I should have thought about that before
“You have had many things to think about. And I am in no position to criticize. I forgot to call the Imladris Academy about the possibility to use the school as the venue for the ballet.”

“I need to call the school, too. You know how we’re to trade time at the school to offset the reduction in the children’s tuition? I’ll do duty for us both while you get the ballet off the ground.”

“That is not fair,” Thran protested. “You already do everything around the house for us. I cannot let you do my school duties, too.”

“Yes, you can. Remember when I worried about bringing no money to our relationship? You convinced me that the work I did was an equal partner to your money, and it’s still true. You’re the breadwinner, and I’m the home fire. While you do the ballet, I do the house and school.”

“You make me ashamed, Bard.”

“Why? You said yourself that there’s no shame in what each of us brings to our family. We don’t keep score; we just do what we each can do. Besides, things won’t remain exactly like this forever. I’ll see Shire Hills, and maybe I’ll soon bring some money in, too. The house will be done before long, and the worst of getting the ballet off the ground will be, too. In six months, a lot of the hard work will be done, and we’ll rebalance again.”

Thran hummed a reluctant concession. “There must be something I can do at the school.”

“Too bad it’s a children’s school rather than a college,” Bard grinned. “You could model for the life drawing class.”

“What is that?”

“Nude modeling. You did a stunning job of it for a dodgy artist, so imagine the reaction you’d get from aspiring artists.”

“That’s why I said college, not high school,” Bard snickered, trying to dodge Thran’s pointed jabs. “But I hope you’ll pose for me again. I enjoyed it.”

“I made sure you did,” Thran purred, mollified. “But perhaps they have dance classes I can help with?”

“I’ll ask when I talk to them,” Bard agreed. “I have no idea what they’ll want me to do, so I’ll find out for both of us.”

“So it seems that we will both have our mobiles clapped to our ears tomorrow.”

“While you were in the shower, Sigrid told me to tell you to get ear buds to plug into your mobile, so you don’t have to hold it to your ear all the time. Maybe Legolas has a spare pair you can borrow. Or put your mobile on speaker.”

“I did do the speaker several times. But I thought it might disturb you, so I did not do that all the time.”

“It didn’t bother me. Do what you need to do to save your ears.”

“Do you think that ear buds would save my patience as well as my ears?”
Bard chuckled, and stroked Thran’s flank. “Probably not. How much talking will you have to endure before you can get to the part you enjoy? Dancing, choreography, and so forth?”

“I do not know,” Thran admitted. “At least Ori will appear tomorrow. I will be at the UltraViolet studio for much of the day, signing the papers and so forth. Ori will be there as Mr. Nori’s representative, and then begin his work with Irmo. He tells me that he has something that will greatly ease our collection of Irmo’s pearls, so I will be most interested to see what that is.”

“So I’ll start on the ballroom. Is that the best way for me to help you?”

“I think so. UltraViolet’s studio is not always available, as they have classes to teach and so forth to pay their rent, but here there is no such restriction. It will mean that Irmo will be a constant presence much of the time, which will be a strain. But I see no other way to move Irmo along in good fashion.”

“Then I’ll set to. I can get a lot done even if we decide to hold off on the plaster work, so it’ll be in better shape then it is now.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya. I am sorry to change the order of your work.”

“If it helps, then I want to do it. And in two weeks, I’ll start on another part. Getting the ballroom out of the way is a huge bit forward.”

“True.”

“When I go to the market tomorrow, is there anything in particular you’d like? Soup, or goulash?”

“I do like soup for lunch. And we need lots of eggs. The children and I both like them.”

“Will do. More clementines, too. Now. Enough work. We’re in bed, and let’s make the most of it before morning arrives.”

Thran shifted, exchanging their positions so that it was his head on Bard’s shoulder, his arm across Bard’s chest, his leg over Bard’s to draw them close. He wasn’t amorous, only appreciative of their closeness and warmth – apprehensive, then. Bard well understood that; with so many negotiations in the air, so many new responsibilities to take on, Thran was likely desperate for quiet, peace, maybe reassurance. Bard nestled Thran close, pressed a kiss on his hair, and stroked Thran’s hip in the spot that his husband found so soothing.

The next six months would be a struggle, but it would be a labor of love, not a trial. Whatever Thran needed from Bard, he would have.

That’s what a saint did when an angel asked. Even when the angel didn’t ask.

* * *

Tuesday started well enough – Thran made the children’s breakfasts and lunches with his husband, ate his porridge and drank his tea, and saw his family off, the children to school and Bard to the market. Thran retreated to the ballroom to work through his barre and yoga, grateful to embrace the early-morning calm that centered him so well. He was almost through his barre by the time Bard returned home. Out of respect for the wear and tear on Thran’s feet, Bard ventured into the ballroom.
in his socks.

“Will it bother you if I start on the woodwork?” Bard asked, when Thran met his eyes. “I’ll be quiet, or I can wait until you’re done.”

“Not at all. I will not be much longer – I must leave soon for the UltraViolet studio.”

“Thanks, angel.”

Thran kept on with the last part of his barre, the grand jetés. As Bard draped his drop cloth at the far end of the ballroom, he paused to admire the jumps, but didn’t comment beyond a smile of admiration. He stacked his rolls of paper towels, poured out a small pan of mineral spirits and a bigger one of stripper, and opened a new bag of steel wool. He knelt down – such a humble position, like an act of meditation – and started to paint stripper on the base molding. He slid along the floor quietly as he laid on the gooey stuff to soften the old paint, doing a long stretch of it before he returned to his starting point to scrape off the softened paint. As Thran worked through his sun salutations, Bard was a silent, patient presence in the room, as absorbed in his task as Thran normally was in his yoga. Today, however, Thran reflected more on his husband than his yoga. Today, however, Thran reflected more on his husband than his yoga. Today, however, Thran reflected more on his husband than his yoga. Today, however, Thran reflected more on his husband than his yoga. There was so much more to Bard’s task than merely the performance of a chore – he restored a neglected house to a beautiful home; he nurtured his family. Why had such a man thought he had nothing to offer anyone? No amount of money could compare to the heart Bard brought to anything he touched.

Money... Thran winced. He hadn’t lied when he’d told Bard that the amount of money needed to bring this mad ballet venture to life was absurd. It was more than that. Nor had he lied when he said that if this mad ballet went bad it would not ruin him. He hadn’t lied about anything.

Yet...

Thran hadn’t defined what not-quite-ruination was, nor would he. Bard had suffered from want too long to burden him further. He was happy at last, healing, strong, the glue that bound Clan Ffyrnig together. If this ballet succeeded, Thran’s silence would spare Bard a great deal of unnecessary worry. If this ballet failed, no one would end up in rags living under a bridge, nor would Bard have to sell any more of his treasures out in the barn. Thran had years of his career left, and he’d have enough money left to sustain them until he found a new position that paid.

Bard would not like Thran holding silence about this. But Thran could not bear to see sadness or worry creep back into his husband’s eyes, just when it had finally subsided. As willingly as Bard had borne so much, so would Thran bear this.

He finished his yoga, and gave Bard a kiss before he went upstairs to shower and dress. When he’d washed and dried his hair, he took pains to braid his hair in an elegant fishtail braid, then considered his closet. Louis Vuitton, or Armani? No, not the former – it was a relic from his life under the state, and not something he would ever have paid for himself. Wearing it might encourage some members of this venture to spend his money on things just as foolish. Yes, better the three-piece charcoal grey Armani suit, pale grey shirt with French cuffs, silver cufflinks of double-headed Russian eagles, cranberry red silk tie in a damask paisley, dark grey socks, black leather shoes. In case, he packed a bag with dancewear. When he came back downstairs, he found Bard in the kitchen, also packing – a lunchbox for him.

“Look at you!” Bard looked him up and down with admiration. “Who knew my angel would look just as good in a suit and tie as he does in everything else?”

Thran gave Bard a wry shrug. “I have a certain impression I want to make this morning.”
Nodding, Bard returned Thran’s smile with a perverse one. “You’re the boss? Good. Start them off on the right foot, then.”

“I hope so. For all that this is a mad venture, I intend it to be a professional mad venture.”

“Good.” Bard put a handful of chopped vegetables in a small box. “You’ll probably be there until late, but even if you’re not, you’ll have something to eat. Your usual chicken, fruit, and veg. Do they have a microwave?”

“They do,” Thran nodded, smiling.

Bard stuck his head in the refrigerator, pulled out another bin, and spooned brown rice into the bin partially filled with small bits of chicken. “Good. You’ll have something warm.”

“How will it look if I interrupt one of these oh-so-serious meetings to heat rice and chicken?” Thran teased, but Bard didn’t laugh. Instead, he gave Thran a serious look.

“Like you’re taking care of UVB’s prime asset. You’re bankrolling a lot of this, if not all of it, and you’re the prime talent. Take advantage of that so you take care of yourself.”

The intensity of Bard’s regard was such that Thran wondered if his husband had divined his earlier thoughts about the stakes of this ballet. He didn’t dare ask, but he stroked Bard’s cheek in appreciation.

“You really want me to act the divo, then.”

Bard caught his hand and squeezed it. “Not the divo; the alpha, the one in charge. You’re willing to work long and hard to make this work, but you’ll take care of yourself and everyone else in the doing. If you can’t hold them off long enough to eat a decent lunch, then you’ll never keep Irmo on track. So eat your lunch and set the precedent.”

Thran cocked his head at his husband. “I thought you said you had no head for business.”

Bard grinned. “I don’t, but Daphne did. She said that being in charge means that sometimes you have to act like a bastard. As long as it’s to take care of the people you want to help you, it’s okay. So maybe some shirt gets huffy about you eating, but I’ll bet none of the dancers do.”

“I will follow her advice, then, and yours.”

Bard relaxed into a smile. “Okay. Besides, I’ve fixed it so that you’ll make style points when you eat.”

“Style points?”

Laughing, Bard sealed the last of the three small black boxes into which he’d packed the food, then stacked them into an elegant whole. “I dug out the set of bento boxes that Daphne gave me for when I was out in the barn and couldn’t get to the kitchen. It looks like nice Japanese lacquer ware, but each box can go in the microwave. One minute on high, no longer. Then you have an elegant lunch that no one can fault. I cut up everything small enough for chopsticks, if you want them, or I can put in a fork.”

Thran admired the smooth nested boxes. “Very elegant, indeed, lyubov moya. How can I resist to make such a statement about the importance of food? It would be a travesty to use a fork with such a thing, so yes, chopsticks.”
Bard produced a long, thin, slender black box, opening it to reveal a nice set of black chopsticks. He fit that box diagonally in its shallow niche in the top lid. A woven elastic band in black went around the assemblage.

“There’s a cold pack in the bottom to keep the chicken and rice cool. So don’t nuke the bottom, just the individual box.”

“I hear and obey, my saint. Now I have a request of my own. Please call Shire Hills.”

“It’s just going on ten now. I’ll see you off, then I’ll call.”

“Then let me be off.”

Bard put Thran’s lunch in his bag with his dance things, and put his arms around him to bid him goodbye. “I hope everything goes well, angel. Don’t worry about anything else.”

“You are always zoloto moyo,” Thran replied, stroking Bard’s hair. “I have no idea how long I will be gone. If I will miss supper, I will text you.”

“You won’t miss supper,” Bard said as they walked to the central hall. He took Thran’s dress coat out of the hall closet and held it so Thran could slip it on, then handed him his red cashmere scarf. “You might not be here when the rest of us eat, but you’ll be home to eat something eventually. I’ll have it ready for you whenever you get home.”

Thran looped the scarf around his neck and tucked it into his coat. “Thank you, lyubov moya. I hope your call to Shire Hills goes well.”

“So do I. See you soon.”

Bard opened the front door, and stood on the porch as Thran made his way down the walk to the SUV. As he got in, Bard gave him a wave and a smile, not going back inside until Thran had pointed the SUV towards the lane.

Thran couldn’t wait until what would likely be a long day was over, when he could come home to that same warm smile.

He took his time driving to the UltraViolet Ballet studio, putting himself in the right frame of mind for the meetings to come. He dearly hoped that most of the wrangling was done, and signing the final papers would be routine. The sooner that was over, the sooner the planning meetings could begin. How he wanted to get on to discussions about sets and costumes, but especially the choreography! They had an aggressive schedule to meet, so sooner started was sooner done, as Bard was so fond of saying.

He piloted the SUV into the UVB parking lot. Once he stepped out, he made sure his coat was properly arranged, then his scarf, then his braid. He hefted his bag, and took a deep breath.

Time for the next performance.

* * *

Bard sent a silent wish for an easy negotiation after Thran’s SUV, then headed back inside. It was just barely ten, so he cranked up Thran’s laptop and searched for plasterers. One of the advantages of living in a village full of artists was the number of craftsmen who had settled in their midst. A lot of the houses around town were as old as Bard’s, so the disciplines often crossed paths. He found two listed nearby, so rang up both of them and made appointments for the next few days for both to come out and make estimates. By the time that was done, it was ten-fifteen, so he found Bilbo’s card he’d stuck to the family’s schedule board and tapped the number into his mobile.

“Shire Hills.”

“Hello, this is Bard Bowman calling for Bilbo Baggins, please.”

“Bard! Yes! This is Bilbo. I’m delighted to hear from you. How are you this morning? Recovered from your sledding bumps, I hope?”

“Well recovered,” Bard smiled at the cheerful voice. “You, too, I hope?”

“Mostly. I do enjoy a good snowfall. There’s nothing quite as exhilarating as a good swoop down a snowy hill on a sled. It makes the warm spot by the fire that much more of a treasure, I think. So how may I help you this morning?”

“I wanted to see when you and I might talk about the chances of you representing my art. When would be convenient for you?”

“Oh, that would be wonderful. You’re welcome to come into the office anytime, but I’d appreciate it if I could come out to see the sculpture I’ve heard so much about. I mean, digital images and so forth are wonderful, these days, but there’s nothing like a good look-round in person, I always say. I hope that wouldn’t inconvenience you too much.”

“Not at all,” Bard assured Bilbo. “The barn’s a bit drafty, but everything’s there, anytime you’d like to visit.”

“Well... I am free this morning, as it happens. My nephew’s not available this morning, and I have another appointment at two, but I’d be happy to nip out to see you before that, if that’s not too short notice.”

“That would be fine,” Bard nodded. “Let me give you the address, and directions if you need them.”

“Just the address,” Bilbo replied. “Internet directions are quite good, so I won’t bother you for those. Go ahead.”

Bard relayed the address, and Bilbo confirmed it.

“So I’ll see you shortly. I’m glad we can meet so quickly. Thank you.”

“You’re welcome, and thank you for meeting with me. See you soon.”

“Yes! Goodbye for the moment.”

“Goodbye.”

Bard disconnected the call, then hurried to the mudroom for his boots and coat. He’d cleaned the dust of neglect off his remaining sculptures several times since Clan Ffymig had moved into the house. But another quick wipe wouldn’t hurt.

He scampered out to the barn, smiling.
“Mr. Oropherson!” The short, slight figure waiting in the corner chair of UVB’s small waiting area scrambled to his feet. “Good morning, sir!”

“Ori!” Thran smiled a welcome at Mr. Nori’s younger brother. Wispy ginger hair, much of it standing straight up, dark reddish-brown eyes, a soft voice, and a Fair Isles knitted sweater vest over a lavender button-down collared shirt might give the impression of a shy, sheltered youth, but it was an image that Ori cultivated. He was quiet, and he was shy around people, but he was brilliant with figures – any sort of data, to be honest. He had a nearly eidetic memory, too, which was very useful when he wanted to track down one critical fact in the midst of a huge lot of them. That would be a gift that Thran expected to call on many times before this effort was done. “Good morning. I hope you are well this morning.”

“Oh, yes, sir, I’m very well, and hope you are, too.”

“I am, thank you. How is your esteemed brother?”

Ori’s grin was entirely at odds with his innocent appearance. “Oh, you know Nori. One hand in this; another hand in that. He appreciates your business, and so do I. Thank you for asking for me to help you.”

“I understand you have a secret weapon to help us,” Thran said, as he sat down, gesturing for Ori to do the same. Ori took the seat at right angles to Thran so that they could lean close enough to talk without being overheard.

“I think I do,” Ori nodded. “My brother told me a little about the man you want me to follow. What can you tell me?”

“He is full of brilliant ideas, Ori. They come upon him in a deluge, often without any regard to what has come before, or will come after. He cannot let go of them because he thinks they are important, but that means that he cannot stay focused on the topic at hand, and so progress stalls. He is exhausting to follow, both because of his inability to focus, and because he does not wear down.”

Ori nodded. “Sounds as if he suffers from attention deficit at least, or he might be on the autism scale, too. I’ll see what I can find out when I meet him.”

“What is this secret weapon, then?” Thran asked.

